Part 001: Entering the Labyrinth

Author Note: This is the second iteration of The Cryopod to Hell (TCTH). It is more refined and edited compared to the original version, but will likely also end up being longer too. The goal of this refresh is to eliminate as many plotholes from the original work as possible, and refine characters/places/interactions/etc until it's as polished as possible. I've already planned a third iteration where the goal is to chop the story down to be much smaller and more accessible.

Confused? Check out this topic for returning readers, and this topic for new readers. Thanks!

"Just one last signature to confirm, Jason." A scientist named Rebecca smiles at me and tugs on her long, curly black hair.

She hands me a clipboard with a legal form clamped onto it. I barely glance at the paper before writing my name down. My body feels a little numb; it's hard to believe I'm finally committing.

"You'll be awake in less than the snap of a finger!" She smiles cheerfully, then steps back and presses a button on the side of my cryopod. A hatch closes in front of me, and a large glass window slides down, barring me from the outside world. It's my last chance to quit, back out, and leave... but I won't. I'm not going anywhere.

I stare out the transparent plexiglass around me as the pod closes. Nine other pods are here; their lids clamp down simultaneously. Each of their occupants' faces has a range of emotions, from nervousness, to fear, to even a bit of curiosity. The general atmosphere is intense, as this is only the third clinical trial the doctors have performed.

Compared to the others, my mind works a little differently. A calmness overtakes me, making me feel as if I'm about to land softly in a field of butterflies. My eyes lazily take in the scene around me. When I next wake up, it will be a thousand years in the future. Humanity won't look anything like they do now. They'll probably all transform themselves into sci-fi robots, or they'll live in a massive virtual reality simulation, spinning around the sun in a Dyson sphere.

Gas hisses into the small enclosed space around me. First I'll be put to sleep, then I'll be frozen, and later the auto-warmup routine will run, waking me up. This machine is supposed to have enough power attached to its battery that it won't run out before the designated time, and it will still wake me up if the battery runs low early.

If it fails... I don't even care. Maybe I'll die, frozen like an icicle. My eyes suddenly need to shut. I'm so sleepy... it's time to have no regrets...

An instant passes.

Oh shit, I'm awake!

My thoughts scream in my mind, like a drunken man in a bar. I jerk forward and bash my face on the plexiglass. The glass is fogged up. Didn't the gas knock me out? I was deathly calm a second ago, but now I'm a bucket of nerves. My hands are shaking, and my body is stiff, what just happened? Did I even go to sleep? Rebecca wasn't joking. That was insanely fast. I don't remember dreaming. Or maybe I'm still asleep?

I pinch my thigh, only to realize my grip is almost nonexistent. I'm weaker than a wet piece of paper, and my sense of touch is barely present, since most of my body is numb.

Another hissing sound. Is that more sleeping gas? No wait, the hatch is opening. I can't see anything, the glass is still fogged up, and there's no room for my hands to move so I can wipe the fog away. Might as well wait.

The hatch starts moving slowly. Very slowly. It must be crawling at a fraction of an inch per minute. Why is it so sluggish? By the time it's moved several inches, I'm ready to kill myself out of boredom. I can only see past the cracks of the hatch as it lifts up, but there's no mistake, darkness shrouds the room. The only visible light source emanates from atop my cryopod.

A shiver goes down my spine as the glass slowly inches away from my face. I can't see more than a foot forward, not even to the floor. The light is dim, and it seems to be getting fainter every second. Is the battery failing? Not good. It had better have enough juice to release me. The generator should easily last a thousand years.

Luckily it does. After the door stops moving after reaching the top, the light brightens dramatically. It must have dimmed since they share the same power source.

The problem is what I see next. My skin crawls at the emptiness surrounding me. There are no other pods here. The shiny metallic floor that I remember, the towering roof, all of it is gone. I'm not in the laboratory anymore. Hell, maybe I am and a thousand years has done a number on the place.

I cautiously stagger forward, using the door frame to prop my body up. I reach my bare foot out, and as it touches the floor, I feel a curious sensation. My heel and toes are still somewhat numb, but the flat of my feet register that the ground is warm. And it's smooth. The land is earthen, but it isn't a layer of dirt covering the floor of the Cryotek facility.

I take in the room around me. Everything including the walls, floor, and ceiling are made of that same smooth dirt. The walls are much closer than I remember. The whole space is maybe twenty feet wide and deep, and about fourteen feet tall. I have no memory of this place. Someone must have moved my pod, but to what end?

My eyes roam around the bare room until I spot a giant stone door to the right.

I need to get out of this room. The cryo-preserved storage cases the scientists left me with aren't here, and I'm weak with hunger. God, what if I'm not even in the future? What if I've woken up ten days later and this is all some elaborate prank? The researchers could have set up all kinds of crazy experiments, and I wouldn't know. I should have read the small print!

The thought this is all a prank is comforting but unlikely, given what I know about CryoTek. There must've been an accident.

I stumble over to the door. It's massive, standing nearly the full height of the wall. It appears to be a double door, with the center being what I have to push on to open it. I shove it with all my might and hear a hissing sound as it opens. I'm reminded of when Indiana Jones opened a sarcophagus and oxygen sucked inside. Suddenly, strength returns to my body, and I realize I was taking shallow breaths until just now. The room was nearly devoid of fresh air. I'm lucky I survived.

With a new surge of energy, I heave the door open.

I don't know what I expected.

The door opens, and I see nothing. There's a room somewhere in the darkness, but my eyes are useless at piercing the veil of shadow. Maybe if I could cast magic missile, that would change. Why can't humanity of The Year 3000 pay the goddamn electric bill?

A humming noise fills the air around me. My bones rattle under my skin, though the sensation is faint and indistinct. It's everywhere, yet nowhere. The air itself seems to quiver in fear.

Oh, damn, maybe being frozen for a thousand years made me evolve ESP or something. That would be awesome, but unlikely.

My hopes dash against the rocks. Let's be realistic about this, Jason, and consider what we know.

The floor is comfortably warm, like sitting a few feet away from a fire, while also covered in smooth dirt. The air itself is trembling in fear. Everyone I've ever known and loved is probably dead.

I'm at least somewhat sure that I'm not in the original CryoTek lab where I started out, and I may have evolved a spider-sense.

Yeah, this isn't helping. The future makes no sense at all.

I wander back over to the pod. What once required a small feat of endurance is now just a few light steps away. It's amazing how my life can change so quickly!

Examining the pod, I find a small hatch on its rear. When I pop it out, a little compartment appears, with some items inside.

There's a ten-foot nylon rope, a badly rusted handgun of some sort, a knife that's corroded and flaking apart, and what I assume is a flashlight. Also a few cans of 'food'? They aren't labeled, and while food preservation might be a precise science, I'm terrified of what the contents will reveal. I'll skip the chow for right now.

I pull the stuff out of the compartment and find a small knapsack made from nylon at the bottom, with straps for wearing it like a backpack. It's stiff as hell, but after yanking and beating it around a bit, I'm able to give it new life.

Well, that's handy. At least I have some tools. I don't think a rusted dull knife will be much use, the flashlight might not work, the gun is toast, and god only knows what Satan himself put in the cans of food, but at least I have supplies even if they're meager.

I stick everything into the knapsack and click the flashlight. Nothing happens. Great, that's just wonderful. I figured this was a waste of time! But wait, there's a crank on the top? Oh, that's right, this looks like one of those flashlights from the as-seen-on-TV ads, where I can spin the lever and power it. But surely it won't work, right?

After grinding the gears around inside the device, the light flickers on. Hallelujah, I'm saved! I crank it with all my strength and get a dim light that shines forward ten or so feet. The illumination is weak at best, but at least I won't be falling into any bottomless chasms or spike pits now that I have a light source.

Walking towards the still-open door, I crank the flashlight and light up the next room.

In the middle of the chamber, there's a goddamn terrifying statue there. My knees shake and teeth chatter as I walk toward it. If I had to describe the thing, I'd call it a- well, a Gargoyle, I suppose, though unlike any I've seen in my life. It looks fucking demonic.

It's a two-headed monster. The right head has a long beak sticking out with hundreds of tiny teeth lining the inside. The left one looks more humanoid, with nasty hair hanging down and a third eye on its forehead. On the outside of each one's skull, a horn sticks up into the air, with an overlapping bony pattern visible. Four 'arms' with five crocodilian talons at the ends protrude from the sides of its body.

The thing's chest has several eyes all over, each of them facing different directions. Each one is small and beady, and they appear to follow me as I move around the room. When I shine my flashlight on the statue, the eyes flicker and glow red, startling me, so I quickly aim the light away. The marble construct might be twice my size, but I'm not ballsy enough to pull out a tape measure and check.

What's up with this terrifying sculpture? Why is it facing my door, like a warning or a threat to me when I exit? I swear, if this is some elaborate ruse to screw with me, I'm going to murder whoever did it. I'd also rather it be a prank at this point because the unease wracking my heart is making my life expectancy drop several years.

Carefully, I shimmy my way past the monstrous effigy. On the opposite side of the room is yet another door. A thought occurs to me as I touch it to push it open. How am I breathing oxygen? Pulling away, I glance upward, above the statue. A small, square hole, barely big enough for a cat to fit through, catches my eye. I shine my flashlight up at it and sigh, realizing there's no point trying to climb up inside of it. Not only wouldn't I fit, but I'd also have to climb on top of the statue to reach, and no way is that happening, no sir. I get the creeps knowing the thing is in the same room as me.

Turning my attention back to the door, I start shoving it with all my might, but I'm surprised when the massive slab of stone easily flings open as if it were gliding on ice. I trip and fall forward, slamming on the ground and dropping my flashlight. In a panic, I grab my only source of light and shine it back at the statue, but the thing is in the same place as it was before. Damn my irrational paranoia.

Cautiously, I pull myself to my feet and aim the light into the new room. Well, it isn't actually a room, it's a hallway. The walls expand outward, widening dramatically to almost three times the width of the chamber I'm in now, and the ceiling is so high that the flashlight's beam can't reach it.

Slowing my breath to abnormal levels, I mutter to nobody in particular, "No need to be afraid. There's nothing here but your nerves, Jason," and slowly I tiptoe out into the corridor, glancing around nervously as I patter forward.

Darkness stretches out all around me. I can just barely see the walls on each side, and cranking the light doesn't give it much more juice. "H-hello?" My words are but a whisper, and the ether sucks them from my lips, absorbing them into the faint humming of the background noise that permeates this place.

No response greets me, as I walk further into the darkness. All at once, I feel a faint breeze on my back, and my body stiffens. Before I can spin around, a thunderous BOOM from behind nearly makes me piss myself in terror.

The door from the Cryopod room. It just closed.

Oh my god, oh my god...

It's no big deal! The door must have had a spring on it or something!

My mind screams irrationally at me as I slowly turn around and shine my flashlight at the source of the noise.

What I see next chills me to my very core.

The statue. It's gone.

For a moment, I lose the ability to control my body. My legs give out, and I fall to the floor as I stare at the spot where that goddamned statue was standing only a few seconds before. I don't feel like a human right now. My eyes leap from one crevice of the room to another, frantically scanning for threats. My mind invents a thousand possibilities for where the statue went, even thinking of crazy shit, like maybe it's just invisible to the human eye suddenly, haha!

No matter where I look, one thing is evident: the room that once held the statue is now empty.

It's hard to calm my mind down and reason. My hands shake as I carefully pull myself off the ground. I take a few steps back, as one very obvious thought crosses my mind. What if that wasn't a statue after all?

Everything about this creepy, dark dungeon makes my skin crawl. If someone is trying to pull a practical joke on me, they've won. I give up.

Jesus Christ! What if the statue monster is sitting behind the door, waiting for me to turn my back so it can pounce on me and devour my insides?! I'm thinking of opening the door to my Cryopod's chamber for some dumb reason but that would be suicidal haha why would anyone do that?!

Quickly, and stealthily, I rush over to the second door and push it shut as quietly as possible, then break into a dead run in the opposite direction, making sure to only run on my tiptoes. You bet your sweet ass I don't want that thing to hear me! Please tell me the statue demon isn't hungry. Please!

Even as I run for minutes, putting distance between myself and the room behind me, my breath starts to come in ragged gasps, and I have to slow to a stop, doubling over and gasping as sweat pours off my forehead. I was never a particularly athletic young man in school, and I sat around playing video games and Chess to pass the time before my appointment with Cryotek came up. I'm surprised I made it this far.

To make matters worse, I have no food or water. If the abomination doesn't eat me, I'll die of hunger and dehydration. I need to catch a break!

As I plop down on the ground, finally deciding to catch my breath, my heart slams against my chest. I hear something, something from very far behind me in the direction I fled.

Footsteps. Distinct, loud, and very very slow.

Thud. One, two, three, Thud. One, two, three, thud.

Oh god. It's coming.

My eyes nearly pop out of my skull, and my knees rattle in terror as I stare into the darkness behind me. The monster is in the distance, and it's coming this way. I'm going to die. I can hear the bells tolling in the back of my mind.

This is no time to rest, you lazy sack of shit, get your ass up and MOVE, my conscience and inner ego scream at me. My limbs moan in pain but I somehow manage to leap to my feet thanks to a surge of adrenaline.

I don't have the strength to run, but if that thing is coming as slowly as it sounds like it is, a power-walk will hopefully keep me ahead of it.

Ahead of it? The realization that a monster is coming to eat me makes me quicken my pace. What is going on? What kind of purgatory am I in? Did I die? Am I in Hell? Yeah Satan, you're hilarious, you goddamn piece of garbage! Just throw everything you've got at me all at once!

I do my best to walk-jog and stay ahead of the plodding footsteps behind me, but I pause for a moment and listen intently. Something is off about their tempo.

Thud... one, two, Thud... one, two, Thud.

The monster is quickening its pace. It's speeding up, and I'm still thoroughly exhausted. At this rate, I'm going to die from my heart imploding before the damn thing can catch me. What if the statue monster is toying with me? Maybe it's like a bird teaching its babies to feed.

Hold on... babies? Haha, that's- NO! What about the hole in the ceiling? That can't be- nope, I must purge the thought.

Just as I turn around and start jogging, a new sight greets my eyes. The opposite wall. I've finally reached it.

A colossal double-door looms before me, stretching all the way up to the ceiling a hundred feet above. I can't see the top of it with my flashlight, but one thing is for sure: it's much too big for me to open. I'm trapped.

Wait! On both sides of it, to the left and right, much smaller doors sit. Each one is about the same size as the stone slabs from before.

The footsteps that once sounded distant are growing steadily closer. Not much longer and that fucking dinosaur reject is going to emerge from the darkness and tear me to ribbons. Which way do I go?!

My gut tells me 'left is right,' so without any reason whatsoever, I charge into the left one, shoving with all my might until it groans open. Quickly, I slam the door behind me and lean against it, breathing like my lungs are on fire. Before me is a narrow hallway that curves slightly to the side. Wherever this leads, I have to follow it.

I'm not going back out there.

The adrenaline rush as my body trembles in terror eventually winds down once the footsteps grow silent behind me. Slowing to a tentative walk, I stare ahead into the corridor, always shining my flashlight forward, aside from when I check behind myself for jump-scares.

The first thing I begin to realize is that I'm very subtly descending downward. Indeed, conventional logic would imply that to escape this place, I must head upward, to the outside sky, but I don't have much choice in the matter. In fact, not only is the floor gently sloping down, but it's also curving to the left, though I wasn't sure at first as the change was somewhat gradual.

After I gather my bearings, I continue walking down the sloping corridor, wondering all the while if I will ever see anything besides these dark, earthen walls. I pause eventually, as I notice that the humming sound has grown more noticeable, but I still don't hear the monster following me.

My flashlight sputters slightly, and I sigh as I reach for the crank. Just as it goes out, I pause, noticing a faint light up ahead. Squinting, I take a few steps forward and confirm that yes, in fact, there is a light somewhere at the end of this damned corridor. This realization fills me with hope, as well as dread. One does not merely illuminate the darkness in a place like this without disturbing some ancient horror.

Despite the lack of light around me, I press on, creeping forward slowly. My flashlight would probably reveal my presence if there's something up ahead. I'd prefer not to expose myself to a different monster, especially after I narrowly escaped the first.

The light brightens. I carefully tiptoe down the hallway, and soon it's intense enough that I can easily see all around myself. My body is coated in fluid from the cryo-chamber, but it's begun to dry and harden into millions of sticky white flakes. I'll be lucky if I ever feel clean again.

The room where the light is pouring from is just through the doorway up ahead. I lean around the corner and peek with one eye, and what I see takes my breath away.

Three colossal statues, standing at least a hundred feet tall, tower over everything else in the room. I almost cry when I realize they aren't representations of monsters, but of human men.

Each statue is against a different wall, and all three of them are unique, holding different poses.

The first is a man with a long beard. A crown rests atop his head, and while the crown may be the same drab grey as the person it rests upon, bumps and dots line it, indicating it was a crown with many jewels studded inside. The man wears many layers of robes, each piled atop the other, and a long staff with a jewel is in his grasp, held proudly, as if he were going to cast a spell with it. To describe him, I would say he was a wise leader, someone who was fair and just. No evil escaped his gaze, but no righteousness went unrewarded either.

The next statue is of a man holding a mighty sword, both hands grasping its handle, the sword pointed out from his body, as if at any moment he could leap into action and cut his foes down. His expression is grim. He has seen many battles in his lifetime, and I can tell from the way the statue was carved that he was a feared warrior among his people. Some kings order their men from the rear flanks, while others lead the charge.

The final person is different. His arms hang limply at his sides, and his head is bowed, eyes closed. Tears, or perhaps drops of blood, roll down his cheeks. This man gave everything he had and fought to the end, but it wasn't enough. A closer glance reveals a necklace hanging from one of his hands, barely wrapped around one of his fingers. He died before his time was right, and now his likeness is frozen forever in memory of his final thoughts, I wish I had done more.

The statues aren't the only thing in the room. Gold coins are piled in the center of the room, mounds and heaps as far as I can see. If I weren't in a dark, festering hell, I might be tempted to call it the wealth of El Dorado. Amidst the gold, I spot weapons, armor, and even jewels.

But despite the incredible sights to behold, all of it pales in comparison to the final object that catches my gaze. The incredibly brilliant source of light that illuminates the entire room.

An orb rests atop a small, nondescript altar. A light not unlike that of the sun shines forth from it, reflecting off the gold and creating a dazzling display to draw my eyes to it.

The light isn't a static thing, like a lightbulb, but alive, coursing with energy. The humming that I've been feeling, without a doubt, emanates from it.

Slowly, I step toward it, my eyes darting around, looking for enemies and threats. None appear. I stare at the orb silently for a moment, and a sudden chill rushes down my back. Behind me, just around the bend I came from, a scratching sound, like a foot scuffing pavement, makes my breath catch in my throat.

Something did follow me.

My bones click together violently as I hear the thing creeping around the bend behind me. You're dead! It's going to eat you, my mind screams in alarm. Tears pour down my face, but I dare not wipe them away. I don't have time.

Suddenly my shaking stops. An idea forms in my mind. Instinct takes over. That orb. I need it. I must have it! It has to be significant!

I go from a shaking mess about to be devoured, to an animal fleeing to the only possible refuge, the one thing in this room that I know must mean something. As I rush toward the glowing orb of spirituality, a sudden scrambling noise behind me makes my skin crawl as the thing races around the corner after me. The last thing I hear before I grab the orb is a terrifying, unearthly scream, like that of a woman being torn apart by an abomination.

Serenity. Peace.

My hand rests on the orb, and the panic in my body melts away. There's nothing to be afraid of now, someone unknown says to me. Perhaps it's my mind playing tricks.

Calmly, I look back over my shoulder. The statue monster isn't there, but something else is. A shadow. I don't mean the sort of shadow made when something blocks the light, but a creature comprised entirely of blackness. I can barely even see it thanks to the brilliance of the orb and how it illuminates every corner of the room all at once, but it's there.

For a moment, it seems that the Shadow isn't moving, but after a few seconds of staring, I realize it is. Time has slowed to a crawl. It's as if I'm in the Matrix, and touching the orb has transformed me into an awakened Neo. I cock my head and stare at the creature for a moment, realizing that I'm not panicking, and yet I should be. My mind warns me that the monster is dangerous, but my body hasn't a care in the world. A sensation of power flows through my body, making me feel as if I could crush a rock with my mind.

How strange. Perhaps it isn't that time has slowed down, but that I have sped up. I'm no longer exhausted, and in fact, I could run a triathlon this very instant. Why am I so full of energy? Before, my breath was ragged and my legs scarcely even worked, but now, my body is as ready for action as if I had napped for a year straight.

After gazing at the Shadow for a moment, my eye catches the glint of something behind it. This may sound strange, but an object is glowing in the distance, and it isn't in my room. Instead, I will my eyes to pierce through the walls, spotting a sword elsewhere in this accursed maze. In another direction, a crown glows, as if it's a beacon designed to draw my attention. I quickly look around, spotting even more glowing objects. A set of chest armor, a belt, a pair of boots, all of them drawing my eyes like a moth to a flame.

When I lower my eyes to look below me, my happiness fades. Something roils in the deep, frightening and disturbing, and the longer I gaze at it, the more my newfound calmness transforms into abject horror.

A glowing sea of green, rapidly flowing from east to west, but inside the water is-

No. I don't- I can't believe it. This is too much! I don't want to be here anymore! I want to go back to the past!!

Humans fill the river, or rather, their souls do. Bubbling up from the deep, millions, perhaps billions of faces rise and fall, screaming in pain and agony. They rise out of the hellish river, their skin begins to grow back, but they fall back in, only for that cycle to continuously repeat, over and over again. Their eternal suffering won't end, for they are cursed to wallow in misery, until the end of time.

I'm not in the future. I think I died and went to Hell.

Turning back to the Shadow, I narrow my eyes. Instinctively, I raise my palm up and spread my fingers out in a 'stop' gesture. The Shadow, unable to halt its snail-worthy momentum, continues to leap at me, but a single word escapes my lips. "Light."

A ray of energy shoots out of my hand, enveloping the Shadow's entire side of the room in a luminous warmth, almost as bright as gazing at the sun during the heat of the midday. The shadow opens its mouth, but no sound comes out, as it melts away, devoured by the power of a single word.

A moment later, all is still.

Why did I do that? How and why did I know that I could shoot magical light rays out of my hand? Am I in some form of virtual reality? Of course not, that would be ludicrous! Besides, the floor beneath me still feels quite warm, and my sense of touch can't easily be fooled like my eyes and ears can.

But then, if I were in the future, especially a thousand years or so, perhaps VR might have evolved? Who knows what futuristic humans might come up with? A primitive human like me probably couldn't imagine the reality of the future.

Time returns to normal, and the orb dulls somewhat, no longer acting like a miniature sun in the palm of my hands. While it doesn't illuminate as much of the room, my eyes hurt much less, so it's an improvement compared to before.

In any case, I'm not going to figure out where I am or understand my predicament by randomly guessing. This orb has given me the ability to shoot holy rays of light, so it's a suitable weapon. I'm useless with a sword, and the armor laying around is way too big for me, so I doubt I'll need anything else. I'd better leave.

Sloshing my way through the piles of gold, I almost trip a few times but manage to keep myself together. I consider taking some of the gold with me, but I doubt it'll be any use. It'll slow me down. I can come back later if I find a use for it.

After wading through the gold, I evaluate the three statues. To the right of each one, on all three walls opposite the door I entered from, passages lead to various other hallways. I can go right, left, or forward, and there are no indicators which way is the correct path to take. Hell, with my luck, they're all the wrong path.

I don't know where the passages lead, but one thing is for sure; I do not want to head down. It may be miles and miles below, but that river of souls is the last place I want to be.

When I was fleeing the statue monster, I used the left door, and it paid off for me. Since the left passage seems to head back up, in the opposite direction as the river of souls, I trudge past the piles of coin and step inside the hallway, and am pleasantly surprised to see rocks embedded in the walls, every ten feet or so, that glow. While they don't illuminate much, they don't need to, either. That's what my new orb is for, after all!

With a pep in my step, I force the thoughts of the statue monster to the back of my mind and head down the passage, praying to whatever gods may still exist to watch over me.

As the puny human leaves the room, the Three Great Kings turn their heads to look at one another.

The Knowledge-Seeker: Is that boy a candidate?

The One Who Weeps: Difficult to say. I saw no rejection. Anything is possible.

The Greatest Sinner: He is part of the great cycle. In the direst times of need, a champion will rise. The time is right.

The One Who Weeps: It doesn't matter. The boy cannot redeem our failures. All hope is lost.

The Greatest Sinner: As long as one draws breath, there is always hope. You have forgotten the ancient struggles.

The Knowledge Seeker: You speak the truth, Arthur. As long as the boy has the Power of the Kings, he can right the wrongs we've wrought.

The One Who Weeps: He will break, just as we did, just as all heroes do. Man cannot overcome his weakness.

The Knowledge Seeker: Ye of little faith. That is why you fail.

Part 002: The Secret House

The soles of my feet slap on the floor as I walk along a narrow, lightly illuminated corridor. The sanded dirt path beneath me begins to feel less like soft dirt, and more like coarse limestone. The orb in my right-hand illuminates the way forward, but also seems redundant, given the walls have glowing rocks embedded all over the place. Where were those when I fled that damn statue monster?

Within a few minutes of walking, I head right, then left, following nothing but my intuition as I make my way down one hallway and another. To my surprise, I end up standing before a metallic frame wrapping around the entirety of the corridor. The square slabs of metal give off an impression of being unlike any metal I've seen before. I take a moment to evaluate them, only to raise my eyes and stare into a pitch-black room; one illuminated only by my glowing orb. The rocks that led me here no longer provide any light.

Stepping inside, I sweep my eyes in a wide arc and frown. The place looks like an abandoned storehouse. Piles of scrap metal lay scattered about here and there. The metallic floor exposes itself only after I leave footprints in the thick layer of dust shrouding it. The ceiling, too, almost reminds me of the Cryotek facility, in that it too has a slight metallic sheen to it. Rising nearly forty feet above me, it towers imposingly, making the storage facility seem far bigger than I might normally expect.

"Hello?"

I whisper into the void, but my voice travels only a few feet forward before the neverending darkness swallows it whole.

Slowly, I make my way forward, taking care not to step on any metal shards. The last thing I need is to hobble myself and catch an infection. Each movement of my feet brings me further into the depths of the storage. Eventually, I reach the opposite wall, nearly two hundred feet from where I entered.

The facility is quite large. Who built it? What is it doing in a place like this, where freaky statue and shadow monsters roam freely? What is its purpose?

As I conjure questions one after the other, I lower my gaze and freeze in place as one particular chunk of metal catches my eye. Unlike the others, this one has a certain shape to it, almost as if someone crafted it intentionally.

Leaning down, I bend over to pick it up. A jolt of awe shoots through my back as I quickly recognize its purpose.

"It's a gun!"

Indeed. Unlike any weapon I've seen or imagined, this weapon has a slender, circular handle, allowing me to wrap my hand around it. It contours to my hand perfectly, making me wonder if someone custom-built it, knowing I would come here. The most surprising thing is that it doesn't appear to have anywhere to insert bullets or ammunition.

It appears to be... a laser gun? A space-age weapon?

No matter how I try to explain its appearance, the fact remains that this weapon is far removed from any design I've seen outside of movies and comics. Without hesitation, I aim it at the wall and press my finger against what I assume is the trigger.

Click.

Nothing happens.

I stare at the weapon for a moment before sighing. It's dead, now. Whatever battery or power source it once had, it's long since lost its charge.

Still, seeing the blaster sends a shiver down my spine. The design is unconventional. The long needle-tip sticking out of its front appears alien in origin, making me wonder whether a human crafted it... or something else.

Perhaps those monsters I've seen might know something about it.

With a shrug, I drop the weapon and continue on my way. It won't be useful to me, so there's no reason to carry it around. I need my hands free for other purposes.

I take a moment to glance around the facility again, but its size is simply too huge for even my magical orb to light up everything. After a minute of thinking, a lightbult appears above my head.

I spoke a word when that shadow monster attacked me.

Light.

When I spoke, a blast of light fired from my palm and incinerated it. Does that mean I can do it again?

With a shrug, I speak up, elevating my voice a little louder than usual.

"Light."

A flash of brilliance escapes my body and fires into the distance! After a moment, it halts at the center of the room and begins brightening. I wince as the brilliant light easily dwarfs my orb and illuminates every corner of the massive facility.

Only then do I finally get a good look at the entire chamber. Piles of metal stack up to the ceiling at random intervals, while other areas have only small mounds of finished gadgets, all of varying quality.

I spend several minutes walking around, picking up anything I can find. However, no matter where I look, all I find are depleted weapons and random devices; their glory days long since faded. None of them serve me any purpose, so I leave them behind.

As I stumble around, fatigue swells within my body. I'm still suffering from Cryogenic sickness, but already I've fled from a statue monster and fought off a shadow monster as well.

I'm hungry, thirsty, and dead tired.

After skimming the various scrap piles, I eventually plunk my butt down on the filthy floor and sigh.

I don't know where I am, but I know it's not the Cryotek facility. How did I get here? What happened while I was in suspended animation? Where are all the people, and why do monsters lurk around every corner?

I want to cry, but I'm too dehydrated to muster any tears. Instead, I stare at my feet, wondering what I can do to alleviate my pain and suffering.

Minutes pass.

An idea occurs to me.

I spoke the word 'Light' earlier and summoned light. Could another word have a similar effect?

Figuring it can't hurt to try, I speak again.

"Pizza."

Fwoop!

Hardly has the word left my mouth before a giant pizza twice as big as anything I've received from any restaurant materializes before me. I jump in fright as the unexpected gift from the heavens falls down and slaps against the floor, scattering dust in every direction. The giant cardboard box encircling it has no logos, nor markings of any sort, giving it the impression of the Creator himself having crafted it.

I stare for a moment, wide-eyed, as the smell of a hundred mouth-watering toppings wafts toward my nose.

I summoned a pizza? I actually did it! Holy shit!

I reach a trembling hand toward the box, and a sumptuous sight greets me as I open the lid. I've always been a Supreme pizza lover, but not even I have ever imagined there could be so many toppings on a single pie.

In the blink of an eye, my hands move faster than my mind can react. I shove huge masses of cheese, meat, and vegetables into my face. Every bite intoxicates me. I almost begin to lose myself as I rapidly regain my stamina and fill up my empty belly.

Ten minutes later, I flop backward and gasp for breath. My body feels ten pounds heavier. The exhaustion from before fades away, and a comfortable sensation of satiation replaces it.

"Bed."

I speak another word, and a mattress appears behind me. It takes all of my remaining strength, but I manage to crawl atop it and drift away... away to a place where the world once wasn't so scary, and the monsters weren't out to eat me.

Ah. The simple times. How I long for them...

Zzz...

Part 003: The Prison

Upon awakening, my eyes flutter open, and a yawn escapes my mouth. I gaze at the ceiling for several seconds as memories of the previous day enter my mind. After being chased by monsters and stumbling onto a magical orb of light, I was so exhausted that I slept like an anvil. Not even a marching band with a full orchestra could have woken me up.

Without thinking, I turn my head to the left and wince as the brilliant light from my orb blinds me. "Gah!"

After a few seconds, my eyes adjust to its light. When I pick up the orb, I notice it feels much colder than it did yesterday. Most likely, I've finally recovered from the cryogenic sickness that stole my sense of touch away. Compared to how disoriented I felt when I fell asleep, I feel like a new man.

My eyes linger on the orb. I squint mightily and pull it closer to peer inside of it. I don't believe it's an object that can be described by science. It gives me abilities that are beyond human. It must be some legendary S-Tier item, but I haven't a clue where it comes from.

The closer I look, the more details I'm able to pick out. Inside the orb are hundreds, thousands, perhaps even millions of microscopic life forms. Like worms, racing in all directions, the minute organisms zip around, moving to and fro, and their excitement increases the closer I stare.

A feeling in my body makes me pull the orb away. A strange sound, like that of a gnat, buzzes in my ear. I swat at it, but the noise stays and coalesces into something more akin to a voice.

"...you?"

The voice is a whisper in my ear. I can barely make out a single word.

"...are you?"

It continues speaking, and I strain to hear it.

"Who are you?" The voice clears up and speaks directly to me. The timbre is that of a middle-aged man, deep, and full of knowledge. He's experienced many things in his life, yet there's also an animalistic growl in his voice, as if he's merged with the consciousness of an animal spirit.

"Me? I'm Jason Hiro. I'm a time traveler, I suppose." I answer the voice, figuring it must be coming from the orb. Seems plausible.

The voice doesn't respond, and the energy from the orb dissipates, leaving me wondering who it was. Perhaps the mysterious man was satisfied with my answer. Maybe I'll never know.

I climb off the dusty bed and twitch my nose in disgust at my clothes. They're still covered in the flaky debris from the cryopod, as am I. My body feels gross, but until now, I haven't had my wits about me. Figuring it's worth a shot, I speak a single word to nobody in particular. "Clean."

As expected, my T-shirt, jeans, and underwear instantly change and become as clean as if I had tossed them in a washer and dryer for an hour. I repeat the process, but for my body, and smile as I also end up as clean as if I had just climbed out of the shower. Heck, I feel completely refreshed!

I take a moment to reorient myself, then glance at the several cold slices of pizza leftover from earlier.

Should I eat them?

Nah. With my power, I shouldn't stoop to eating leftovers.

"Pizza."

Once again, a sumptuous pie materializes in midair and lands atop the previous box. I don't hesitate before diving into a second meal. Pizza is my favorite food. Even before I entered college, I tried to eat it as often as possible.

It only takes me a few minutes to eat most of the food. After I finish, I rub my stomach and ponder the meaning of life for a moment.

Then, I direct my gaze to the leftovers.

If I leave this food behind, I'll be putting myself in unnecessary danger. The smell of leftovers might attract those monsters. I'd prefer it if they never find out I was here.

"Erase."

With a single word, I eradicate the existence of the pizza and banish it to the shadow realm. Several seconds pass as I contemplate how I can figure out my powers without any trouble. Eventually, I shrug and jump to my feet.

I can't stay here forever. Even if this place looks abandoned, a monster might stumble in here by complete accident. I would be much safer if I could locate other humans. Surely I can't be the only person left alive, right?

A minute later, I step out of the facility and hold the glowing orb close to my chest, allowing it to light my path. It doesn't take long before I arrive back in the El-Dorado treasure room and decide to head down a different passageway. I have no idea where the other two lead to, but if the storage facility is a dead-end, and if the place I originally entered from leads back to the statue monster, I'll take my chances with one of the other two passages.

As I travel along, I slowly realize I've entered familiar territory. The walls of the Labyrinth are earthen again, and the glowing rocks appear to have vanished. The hallway continues for at least a few miles before opening into a series of corridors and doors. Something about the place gives me the creeps. It resembles a prison.

A dozen doors line the right wall, and at the end of the row is another entrance, far bigger than the rest. I walk up to the nearest one and shove it. Unlike every other door until to now, this one doesn't budge.

I push harder and shove with all my strength, but it still won't move. Finally, I press my back against it, and grunt out loud, "Okay, orb! I need your strength! Give me the power to open this goddamn doo-!"

My words cut off abruptly as it suddenly yanks inward, making me stumble back and slam onto the ground. My spine screams in pain, but after a few moments, I breathe a little easier and pull myself to my feet.

Only, this time, I freeze in horror. What awaits me is... no... I don't want to believe it. At the back of the room, there's a cryopod, identical to the one I left. It's broken and torn to pieces.

The walls are covered in blood.

The room yawns before me. The smell of iron forces me to stifle my gag reflex, and chunks of pizza threaten to crawl back up my throat. The sight inside of this room makes me never want to eat meat again.

The smell of death is thick, though not fresh. Much of the blood is hardened, crusty, and brown. If someone were to try and clean the room, they would need a paint scraper, and it'd be a hell of a job. The corpse torn to pieces and scattered all over the place is unrecognizable and desiccated. Whatever killed them, it happened a long time ago. The cryopod looks like something smashed through the window on the front and tore the occupant out with force.

Saying a quick prayer for their soul, I quickly step back out of the room and lean against the hallway door, and my breathing arrives in shallow gasps. If that room housed one of the other cryopod occupants, then that can only mean...

I don't want to check, but I have to. The room next door is in a similar situation. A violent murder, under the same circumstances, begins to reveal a pattern. I can barely make out long, blonde hair on a severed head across the room, but I don't want to go anywhere near the corpse. I quickly check the other chambers and find a similar situation in the third, fourth, and fifth doors.

The sixth, however, is different.

Inside, the cryopod is intact, and opened up. Whoever was inside must have escaped, since there isn't a horrible bloody mess to be seen anywhere. There's a journal on the floor, placed directly in the center of the room, laying in such a way that anyone walking in the room would see it immediately, and it's facing the door, so they'd know to pick it up.

While it feels like this is a booby trap, curiosity is my weakness, so I creep over and nudge the book with my foot. No Indiana Jones-style boulders come rolling at me, so it's probably safe. I quickly snatch the journal up and retreat to the hallway, my heart a pounding mess.

The first page has some writing, so I carefully read its contents.

Date: Unknown.

Location: Unknown.

Mental state: Hopeless.

My body is weak. I haven't eaten anything since I emerged from cryostasis, and if I don't find something soon, I'm going to die. I'm ready. I have to accept it. I always wanted to grow old and die in my sleep, but that isn't going to happen.

Anya and Faraday were my friends. That thing, the monster... Gressil. It took them. Their screams were awful. What a horrible way to go. Waking up, the jaws of a demon tearing them to pieces before they even have a chance to fight back, and all they could do was let out pitiful screams.

I don't want to go out like them. I have to try and escape, or die trying. If I can stab it once, before it kills me, I'll at least have my revenge.

Well, it's about time. My body's getting weaker. If I don't go now, I won't ever be able to leave. If only I could see my daughter again... just one more time.

Amy. I'm sorry, sweetheart. I hope Cryotek's payout helped you. I hope you lived a good life, but... daddy won't be coming home after all.

I deserve what's coming.

After reading it, I flip to the next page. Only two words are legible.

Umi watches.

Over and over, but the handwriting style is different. It's not as feminine. Perhaps someone else found the notebook and scrawled the words?

Every page has the same words repeated. Umi watches. A hundred times per page. The further through the notebook I flip, the more frantic the words become.

Silently, I set the notebook on the floor where I found it, and say yet another prayer. I don't know what happened to that man, but I hope he eventually found peace.

As I leave the room, I spin those two foreboding words around in my head, like marshmallows over a fire. Looking back on things now, I've felt that same sensation of eyes tracking me everywhere I go. Is it just my imagination? Paranoid delusions from the ever-present darkness shrouding the Labyrinth?

The final rooms hold no surprises. Apparently, only one man managed to escape without the monster tearing him to pieces. I offer more prayers for the fallen and sigh. I'm not even a religious person, and in fact, I'm something of an atheist, yet now I find myself wishing a god existed to save people from this hellish nightmare.

Finally, only one door is left; the one opposite from where I started. Whatever waits for me on the other side, hopefully my trusty Orb of Light can protect me.

The door slides open easily as I press it inward. For a moment, confusion overtakes me as I look around the room. These give way to terror and panic once I realize why it seems so familiar.

A cryopod rests against the far wall. I quickly walk over to it and examine it, spotting an open hatch on the back.

Jerking my head to the left, I spot a second closed door. The other Cryopod rooms didn't have any entrances other than the main lobby, but this room does.

I'm in my original Cryopod room. But the door that I just entered through was not here before.

The Labyrinth is shifting dynamically. The idea makes no sense, but neither does shooting light out of my hands or my sudden ability to summon pizzas.

If my theory is right, then I have a few options. First, I can return to the El-Dorado room and pass through the final door I missed. Second, I can travel past the statue monster room and go back to the giant door, hoping the smaller door on the right from earlier will take me somewhere new. Third, I can try and use my abilities to shove open the supermassive door instead. I doubt that's doable.

If these are my options, then the choice is simple; no way am I going to take a chance with statue monsters! I'd like my innards to stay inside my body, thank you very much.

Turning around, I leave my cryopod room behind and head back through the cryopod chambers toward the El-Dorado room. However, my heart sinks. The long corridor back is gone.

As expected, the Labyrinth has shifted. I guessed correctly.

I cautiously and silently sneak around, checking this passage and that. Dozens of doors greet me. I don't open them.

After a few minutes of wandering around, I stop and listen. A sound of feet pattering approaches. Two pairs, in fact. It won't take long before whoever, or whatever is approaching spots the light from my orb.

"Oy, Tvoorik! Didn't ya notice? Them doors was open. What idiot leaves the doors open?"

English. I recognize their words. The speaker's voice doesn't sound human, however. His timbre reminds me of a wolf's growl. I quickly whisper to my orb, "Dim."

Its light dissipates to nearly nothing, allowing me to see a flickering of torchlight approaching. I duck around a corner and hide behind a wall outcropping, making myself as tiny as possible while hiding the orb in my shirt.

Another voice replies. "Are ya kiddin', Ylvusk? Ain't nobody dumb enough to leave a door open 'round these parts. Gressil'd kill us!"

The footsteps draw closer. My heart smashes around in my chest like a pack of rats trying to escape. As long as the voices walk straight down the corridor, they won't see me.

"Yeah, but this place is the Popsicle Block. I thought only one fool was still left in 'ere?"

My eyes widen as the two beings appear, one of them holding a torch. Imps. I've read enough fantasy to know the difference between various monsters when I see them. They are, without a doubt, not humans. Their short little bodies, perhaps three feet tall, waddle along, and their fat eyes roll around in their heads. Bright red skin, wispy hair, and two tiny little horns give me all the other visual cues I need to fit the puzzle pieces together.

They're demons!

The two imps stop and sniff. Tvoorik speaks; a hint of wariness in his voice. "You ever wonder what Gressil does with 'is victims? I bet he lets 'em go. You know how Gressil is."

"Oh, come on," Ylvusk groans. "Keep your conspiracies to yourself."

"Nah, nah, I'm serious," Tvoorik continues. "He's been offin' the popsicles one by one over the last few years. But I got ta' thinkin'... what if he wasn't offin' 'em, eh? What if he was faking everything? Putting on an act?"

Ylvusk's expression turns sour. "Why would Gressil do that?"

"Dunno! I'm just thinkin' out loud, ya know? Don't tell me you don't have any doubts!"

"I don't," Ylvusk says, shaking his head. "Shut your trap and keep walking. We've got three more patrols to do before we earn our allotment for the day."

"Psh. You know that's just how the higher-ups keep us in line, don'tcha? It's the ol' carrot and stick treatment. I read about it in a book once!"

"Oh, stuff it, ya stupid knob! I know you ain't never read a book in your whole life! Don't throw the shrakh all over me just 'cause it works on the other dummies."

"I'm serious!"

"And I'm a succubus! Come on, move it along! I ain't got all day to listen to your globberin'."

The two imps continue walking down the hallway. I hold my breath the entire time until their voices fade into the distance.

Once I can't hear their voices anymore, I sneak down several hallways, taking random directions as I try to find a way out of this labyrinthine series of passages. The different hallways blend together. Soon, the glowing rocks appear once again, illuminating different paths.

Suddenly, I arrive somewhere completely unexpected.

A massive chamber, over one hundred feet square, holds a statue of a young girl with an umbrella. While she raises it above her head, gold-colored water bubbles up from the top of it and drips down, barely missing her body. Thousands of flowers surround her, but the ones closest to her lay withered and dead.

The look on her face is that of acceptance. She's seen things in her life, things she couldn't help. Her eyes are young, yet worn out, tired of a fear-filled existence. Most importantly, she's human and not a misshapen monster. The realization that the only humans I've found in this Labyrinth were statues and corpses fills me with dread.

A giant golden door across the room catches my attention, but I ignore it. Something about the girl pulls my eyes to her.

The closer I walk to her, the more I notice that the flowers, choked and withered though they are, slowly grow back as the light from my orb touches them. This effect is more muted as I walk nearer to the statue and discover why. In the girl's other hand, the one not holding the umbrella, she clutches a black orb. Unlike mine, hers sucks the light in around it.

An orb of life, and an orb of death. The two are opposites. One drains life; the other breathes consciousness back into the world.

I don't want to go anywhere near that orb of darkness. Everything about it screams danger. If I were the protagonist in an action movie, it would surely be the ultimate final weapon of a villain.

"Why, hello there."

A voice speaks up from somewhere in the room. I drop to a crouching position to make myself a smaller target as I look around. Nobody else is here.

"Come, now. Don't be rude."

The voice continues, and now I realize it isn't speaking to me audibly, but inside my mind.

"Who's speaking? What do you want?" I answer the voice, and turn uneasily to the orb. It can't be.

A face appears in my mind, one of a man shrouded in darkness. He smiles, and the whites of his teeth spread open, just below the fire burning inside his eyes.

"What do I want? No. What do you want? Speak truth."

I consider his question for all of three seconds, before standing back up to my full height.

"I'd kill for another pizza."

The smiling face of evil lurks in the shadows of my mind. "You would kill, hmm? It appears that this 'peat-zuh' you speak of must be incredibly valuable. Few mortals would shed blood for anything less than the object of their dreams."

I stare at the orb dumbly for a moment. This guy doesn't know what pizza is? Well, I guess that makes sense. He's inside a sphere in a labyrinth held in the hands of a statue formed in the image of a young girl. Nothing about this situation is logical.

"Pizza is food, tasty food. I'm homesick. I don't like this place, and I want to leave, jump into my warm bed, and pray I never see these walls ever again."

The face inside my head smiles even wider than before. "Ah, so you seek comfort, joy, and other trifles of life. Power will grant you all of the things you seek, and I can give it to you. With my energy, you will be unstoppable, capable of crushing all who stand before you."

"Uh. But that isn't what I want. The whole 'crushing' thing isn't my style." I take a step to the side and eye the orb a little more cautiously. "Err, don't take this the wrong way, but something about you is a little... untrustworthy. Sinister, even. Compared to this glowing orb in my hand, you sorta scream evil, you know? I think I'll pass on whatever you have to offer."

Instantly, his smile vanishes. "You deny my power? None would dare do such a thing."

I nod slowly at the face in my mind. "Well, I'm different from other people. I know how this goes. You'll offer me unfathomable power, and then damn my soul for all eternity. Doesn't sound pleasant. Besides, I've got this glowing orb here, and so far he's been nothing but helpful!"

"Hoarhiim? My brother is a weakling, incapable of helping you beyond acting as a light in the darkness. Accept my power, and you won't need a light, for you will be one with the darkness."

Ignoring his incessant prodding, I steal a glance at the small orb shining like a star in my hand. "This thing has a name?"

"Of course, as do I." The man shrouded in darkness frowns at me. "Your manners are awful, calling my brother a 'thing.' Hoarhiim! Wake up! Stop snoozing and say hello to your big brother!"

A familiar tingling itches at the back of my neck, and slowly, a second face forms in my mind. If I had to describe Hoarhiim, I'd say his face is like that of God. Shining, with long white hair that drapes down to his shoulders, and glowing eyes that could pierce the fabric of my being if he wished. While the dark-god appears to be a monster of evil and malice incarnate, Hoarhiim is more of a brilliant entity of righteousness and purity.

Hoarhiim blinks slowly. "Hmm? What is it, Blaarjiim? Why have you woken me from my slumber?"

The man inside the orb of darkness, Blaarjiim, sighs dramatically. "How long have you been in this mortal's possession, yet stayed asleep? You will never hope to defeat me if you cannot apply yourself."

With a grumble, Hoarhiim's face turns to his brother's in my mind. "Destruction is your calling, but I tread a different path. As for this young one, I felt his touch and ignored it. He hardly needs my energy."

I raise an eyebrow at Hoarhiim. "What do you mean by 'your energy'?"

"Spiritual energy, the power that manifests itself in all creatures born in this universe. As a human, you would usually possess very little of it, but in your case..." Hoarhiim trails off, and Blaarjiim pounces at the chance to interject.

"Speaking of that very thing... human, what are you doing in the Labyrinth? Only a foolish mortal or one of incredible power would dare enter this domain, especially by himself."

I don't know how to answer that. "I guess I'm foolish, then. I didn't come here on purpose; I'll have you know. It's an accident that I'm here at all."

A smile spreads across my face. Yeah. An accident. That's all it is. Even if I pinch myself, I can't wake up from the nightmare. Nothing about this place- this labyrinth, makes the slightest sense. Just when I thought it couldn't get any more bizarre, I ended up talking to a god of darkness and one of light. Next thing I know, there'll be a magical duck with the wings of a fairy guiding me to la-la land.

After a moment of silence, I turn back to Blaarjiim. "Well, anyway, I should be going. I'm glad you got to chat with your brother, and I'd consider leaving him with you, except he makes for a GREAT flashlight. So, yeah. Take care of yourself, god of all that is evil and gross."

Hoarhiim yawns mightily. "Mmm, you're an interesting human. I can't say I've known any who would turn down a chance for power, but then, I haven't known many humans."

His brother balks. "You deny me once more? You dare leave me behind?!"

"Mhm." I turn around and start to walk away. "Hope things work out for you. Ciao."

His image in my mind starts to dull as I take a few steps away, but suddenly his attitude changes. "Ah... aha! I see, so it's like that then, is it?"

"Uh, like what?" Internally I sigh, sensing that he's about to flip-flop.

"If you do not require my power now, perhaps you may in the future. Why not take me along with you? Unless you're too frightened by my infinite power, that is."

Slowly, I turn back and stare at the orb. "What, are you lonely or something? Don't like hanging around with a statue doing nothing all day?"

Blaarjiim finally decides to be honest, for once. "Yes, it is true. My existence here is empty and meaningless. With my former owner gone, I have nothing to live for."

A chuckle escapes Hoarhiim's lips. "Owner? I thought you and the girl were partners."

"Such simple words could not describe our relationship," Blaarjiim says, his evil aura from earlier somewhat muted now. "That is beside the point. I wish to travel with you. Take me along, and when the time is right, you will beg me for my strength."

"I doubt that," I say dryly, as I glance at Hoarhiim's orb. "Say, if I touch his orb, is he going to own me for life? You seem pretty honest and upstanding, compared to your brother. You wouldn't lie, would you?"

Hoarhiim shrugs. "I could lie if I wished, but it would serve no purpose. My brother can do nothing if you choose not to accept his power. You and I share a bond now, due to the manner in which we met. Your mind begged me for the strength to survive, and thus I gave it to you."

"Oh. Neat." After a few moments, I think to myself, fuck it, if Hoarhiim says Blaarjiim can't hurt me, it's probably true. I don't care either way. To be honest, if that statue monster comes back, I may need the extra firepower.

Two seconds later, I stand before the statue of the little girl and pluck Blaarjiim out of her hands. "Yoink. Alright, you can come along, but you'd better behave like a good little orb of death and misery, or I'll put you back where I found you."

Blaarjiim returns to his creepy smile from before and slowly clasps his hands together. "I get the feeling we're going to have many good times together."

As I turn away from the statue, a sudden rumbling in the distance catches my ear. The sounds of cackling and laughing, from dozens- no, hundreds of voices scream together from the hall that I came from.

With a mock look of surprise, Blaarjiim holds his hand up to his mouth. "Oops, I must have forgotten. They probably won't be too happy that you removed me."

As the rumbling draws nearer, I feel the ground start to tremble. "Fuck everything about my life."

For the third time since I arrived in this Labyrinth, I feel fear take hold of my heart and freeze me in place.

Hoarhiim is unfazed. "The Army of Sheol. They aren't very friendly. You should probably start moving if you value your life."

"Why run? Take my power, and I will allow you to slay the weak little-" Blaarjiim tries to goad me again, but I'm simply too seized with fear to listen.

"Not now! Gotta go, and fast! Which path do I take to get the hell outta dodge?!"

After a moment, I jerk around to look at the sizeable golden doors. Unlike the giant double doors I noticed when I was fleeing the statue monster, these are much smaller, but painted gold, or perhaps formed out of the material itself. If I want to escape... that path might be...

The enemy is closing. I've got seconds to spare. Leaping into action, I rush to the giant door, an orb in each hand, and slam my shoulder against it, shoving with all my might. "Gaaaah! Open up, you stupid piece of shit! OPEN!"

Hoarhiim decides now is the perfect time to chime in. "If you want, I can give you some energy to boost your body. It should give you the strength to shove-"

"Do it! For fuck's sake, they're right around the corner!" I scream at his orb, and before I know it, a sudden wondrous feeling fills my body. I feel like more of a mountain than a man. My fatigue and fear vanish all at once, and my muscles bulge as if I took ten years worth of steroids all at once. This time, when I shove against the door, electricity bolts off my body and slams into the ground, and the entryway screeches and scrapes against the stone tiling, opening up half a foot.

I barely finish in the nick of time. Once I slide inside, my eyes shoot open. A group of orcs, goblins, and skeletons rush around the corner, their eyes locking onto me all at the same time.

One of the goblins points at me. "There he is! Told ya I smelled man-flesh!"

"Human! Get him! We eat good tonight!" One of the orcs stabs a fat finger at me, and I nearly scream as that same terror comes back. No matter how strong I am, I can't possibly take on an army of monsters! Using the strength the orb has given me, I shove the door shut behind me. The sound of melee weapons banging against the other side makes me stumble backward and fall on my rear. The monsters don't seem to have the collective strength to open it.

My breathing slows to normal, as the sounds of monsters beating the door increase in volume. A quick glance around the room makes my heart sink; there isn't any other way out. I just backed myself into a dead end. Stupid, stupid!

Blaarjiim seems to notice this fact as well. "Uh oh, it seems your day keeps getting worse."

"Stuff it." I glance uneasily behind myself at the door, but Hoarhiim intervenes.

"There's no need to worry. You are safe for now. Only several trolls or a powerful demon could open this door, and they're far too busy to bother. Not even a hundred orcs bringing their full strength to bear could budge it an inch."

"Seriously? How much strength did you give me?" Even as the words leave my mouth, I feel Hoarhiim's energy slip through my hand and back into his orb. "And what do you mean by demons? Where am I? Why are there goblins and orcs and other creatures from fantasy lore? This whole Labyrinth is unreal!"

In my mind's eye, Blaarjiim sneers at me. "How does one accidentally stumble into the realm of the demons, yet not know the manner in which he arrived? You must be quite the oaf not to understand the land in which you now tread."

"The realm of the demons? What, like, I'm in Hell?"

Hoarhiim nods matter-of-factly. "That is correct. This Labyrinth is part of the great interconnected structure known as Hell."

I clasp both orbs a little harder so that my hands don't shake. "D-does that mean... I'm dead?"

Blaarjiim stares at me in silence before bursting into a fit of laughter. "Pahahaha! Dead?! Surely you jest! Hah, that's the funniest thing I've heard in ages! Hoarhiim, your pet human is completely clueless!"

Hoarhiim, to his credit, merely sighs. "He's a mortal. If he doesn't know how he arrived here, he probably hasn't the faintest understanding of Hell. I'm surprised he even knows what orcs, goblins, and demons are, given his rudimentary understanding of the universe."

I reach over and set Hoarhiim's softball-sized orb in the same hand as Blaarjiim's, though the fit is very uncomfortable and I have to rest both of them against my stomach so I can itch my cheek. "I mean, I read the Bible, and a bunch of other books when I was a kid. I'm a genre buff when it comes to mythology and other stuff like that. It never did me any good in college, and it didn't get me any attention from girls, but it was my hobby."

Blaarjiim squints to stare at me. "Caw-ledge? Buy-bul? What are you talking about? What do those have to do with books?"

Hoarhiim chuckles at his confused brother. "I suspect they are the titles of the books. I thought all books were destroyed by the demons, given their passion for illiteracy. How did you ever find books to read?"

Shrugging, I grab Hoarhiim's orb with my right hand again. "From the library. I suppose they don't have libraries here, but they did in America."

Now it's Hoarhiim's turn to look confused. "America? I have not heard of that district."

A sudden thought enters my mind. "Err, this seems like a dumb question, but I've been wondering... am I even on Earth anymore?" I thought the Labyrinth was under the surface or something, but that doesn't appear to be the case."

In unison, Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim's faces go taut. The two of them stare at me incredulously, as if they're unable to comprehend my question.

Blaarjiim is the first to break the silence. "Boy. This farce has gone on long enough. Who are you, and how do you know about Earth?"

"What do you mean? Why wouldn't I know about Earth?"

Blaarjiim stares at me with skepticism in his eyes. "As you have surmised, you now reside in Hell. Earth is not a place any mortal should know of, and very few demons do."

"Yet he does," Hoarhiim counters. "Sometimes a mortal can be full of surprises."

"I'm from Earth. I was born and raised there," I say, volunteering the information before the orbs can ask. "If we're not under Earth's surface, then where in the, err, 'hell' are we?"

Blaarjiim shifts uncomfortably in my mind, turning his back on my mental vision. "I do not think we should say. The rules forbid discussion of Earth."

Hoarhiim smoothly interjects, "Brother; those rules govern the demons. We are not demons. Jason already knows of Earth's existence, so I believe we can offer at least a bare minimum of explanation."

"Always the soft one," Blaarjiim growls. A moment later, he sighs. "Earth is dead. Destroyed."

"What?!" My voice cracks. I nearly drop their orbs. "You're kidding!"

"I am not one to jest," Blaarjiim says dryly. "'Twas wiped out, long ago. The demons live here, now."

"Forget the demons for half a second! What happened to the humans? Am I the last one alive?"

Blaarjiim squirms. Hoarhiim jumps in to answer before his brother can reply. "No. Many still live. However, they have no sovereignty. The demons control the remnants of humanity quite efficiently. Humans are little more than cattle for demons to feed upon."

Silently, I stare ahead at the golden door. The skeletons continue to bang on it, but the other monsters have given up. Maybe they're waiting for me to emerge.

"Wow. I'm not in Kansas anymore."

Blaarjiim raises an eyebrow. "Hmm?"

"Nothing. It's a saying from where I was born. Anyway, I can't worry about the humans for now. I need to think about my needs first. My first goal is to get away from the skeletons and escape."

Blaarjiim immediately reverts to his former self now that the topic of Earth has passed. "Yes, yes. If you accept my power, you would be unstoppable. Combined with my brother's energy, you could tear those monsters outside to ribbons."

"I'd rather not." Pausing, I turn to Hoarhiim. "You said before that as long as I don't ask for Blaarjiim's power, I can't use it, but he can't hurt me either, right?"

Hoarhiim nods.

"Okay, then why can I use your power? I didn't ask for it."

"But you did, young human." Hoarhiim waggles a finger and begins pacing. "Your body seized with terror, and you grabbed hold of my orb, begging me to save you from the Shade. At that moment, your intent was clear, despite not vocalizing your desire."

"Um..." Discomfort sets in my joints. "Can I give back your power, then?"

"No," Hoarhiim replies flatly. "We are bound for life until one of us dies. Given your mortal body and all its frailties, I will be back on my pedestal soon enough."

"Don't get all choked up about it or anything," I quip.

Satisfied that the monsters aren't going to tear me apart in the immediate future, I turn around to examine the room.

Compared to the ornate fountain, the golden doors, and everything else I've seen so far, including the El-Dorado room, this chamber is barren. The walls, rocky and jagged, uneven, are not the same earthen texture as the rest of the Labyrinth. There aren't any visible decorations of any sort. However, something catches my eye.

To my surprise, besides the light Hoarhiim's glowing orb gives off, there's something else illuminating the room. With the door at my back, I take a few steps forward and gape. A faint bubble surrounds a platform raised a foot in the air. The platform leads to a chair- no, a throne. On the throne rests a skeleton adorned in shredded cloths, wearing a crown.

Hesitantly, I walk toward it. The energy bubble hums quietly but grows more audible as I stop in front of it. Drawing closer, I realize the light it's giving off is green. I didn't notice before since Hoarhiim's light is much brighter.

"Uh, Hoarhiim? What is this?"

Silence. For several moments, Hoarhiim strokes his chin. "I don't know."

Blaarjiim raises his hand and grins. "I'll tell you... if you accept my power."

"Pass."

His mischievous smiles vanishes, "Very well then, I'll tell you anyway. This is the resting place of a great Hero. A mighty King, if you will."

"Hero? King? Is he- err, was he human?"

"Yes. A powerful one, at that. Humans with supernatural abilities are scarce. Only one is born every generation, in fact."

"Were born," Hoarhiim mutters. "Heroes are dead. Extinct, like the angels."

Angels, huh? I make a mental note to ask Hoarhiim about them later.

"What's with this bubble?" I reach forward and touch the energy field. A spark of electricity jumps to my finger before I can make contact, but I don't feel any pain.

A smirk appears on Blaarjiim's shadowy face. "It's a protective force field made of holy energy. Lethal to demons. Probably fatal to humans."

"Probably?"

"Probably."

Hoarhiim chuckles. "My brother loves the taste of fear. The more you squirm, the more you excite him. Worry not, mortal. Holy energy cannot harm a human."

Good to know, I think to myself.

For several moments, I pan my eyes up and down the skeleton on the throne. Who was he? Why did he die here, in this godforsaken Labyrinth? If he was a Hero, what did that mean for him?

The faded purple rags adorning his body look like they might once have been robes, something a member of royalty would wear. Blaarjiim wasn't lying about this man's status, then. A crown on his head draws my attention. I'm not fond of gold, or jewelry, or anything of the sort, but something about this circular hunk of metal makes me giddy with excitement.

Tentatively, I press my hand against the energy field. After a moment, a sensation like static electricity makes my hair stand on end, then pop! The bubble explodes with a loud snap, vanishing into the aether. All at once, several things happen. Air rushes to the throne. The skeleton seems to sigh, then the bones fizzle away, turn into dust, and fall apart. With nothing to keep them up, the robes tumble forward, and the crown falls, bangs on the throne, and clatters to the ground, rolling behind me a few feet before coming to a stop.

The two orbs stay quiet for a moment.

Hoarhiim pierces the silence. "You broke the seal."

Blaarjiim pales. "I expected many things to happen. That was not one of them."

Tentatively, I curl up my arm to hold both orbs, then lean down and use my newly freed hand to lift the crown off the ground.

Compared to how I would describe a crown, this one is plain. It doesn't have the spikes pointing upward as most crowns would, but instead is little more than a round band of gold, perhaps two inches tall. Different colored gems adorn the center, spiraling around the whole thing. As I hold it, a voice whispers to me, but fades away before I can interpret the words.

Hoarhiim leans forward in my mind's eye to examine the golden band. Blaarjiim follows suit a moment later.

"P-put it on," Blaarjiim says, though even he's more unsettled than usual.

"Alright," I croak.

Slowly, I raise it above my head, let it hover in the air a moment, then lower it.

Ten thousand voices scream out, all at once. Fire tears across my whole body.

The instant the crown touches my head, I lose motor control and flop to the ground, dropping Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim in the process. My eyes widen as hundreds of equations appear in front of me, followed by images of devices and machines I can barely fathom.

More information than one man could comprehend enters my mind. For a moment, the realization that I now have more knowledge in my brain than the Libraries of Congress or Alexandria combined gives me a feeling of elation unlike any in my life before. I'm a genius! I'm omnipotent!! I can build anything!!!

And then, as quickly as it arrived, the mental overload fades away.

I understand, now. This crown didn't belong to any ordinary king; it belonged to the wisest man of all time.

King Solomon.

It takes several moments, but eventually, the world forms around me once again. Hoarhiim's figure appears in my mind's eye. "Boy. Boy! What's wrong? What happened?"

Blaarjiim chuckles. "Don't you feel it, brother? His mind is swimming."

I clamber to my feet and shake the dizziness off. "I'm fine; I'm fine. The crown- it gave me visions."

"Visions?" Hoarhiim inquires. "What sort?"

"It..." I start to say something, but as I reach down to pick up the orbs, a fuzzy image materializes in front of me. Blinking, I straighten up and wave my hand in front of my face.

The image looks like a hologram. A series of lines, twisting and turning around each other, form a cube that expands until it takes up my entire field of vision, yet is still mostly transparent.

After a minute, I piece together what the image's contents mean. It's a map of the Labyrinth. A single red dot, smack in the middle, pulses softly, pulling my eyes to it. After a moment of staring, words appear above the dot.

CURRENT POSITION.

The dot must be me. I blink a few times, and the map disappears.

Huh. A map of the Labyrinth. It must be my birthday.

Leaning down, I grab Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim. "You're not going to believe what this crown can do."

Blaarjiim appears in my mind, casually leaning against something unseen. "I very much doubt that."

"The crown can project a mental map of the Labyrinth into my mind. I see not only where I am, but also everything around me for miles on end."

Silently I ponder the greater significance of my discovery. Solomon was a king in the Bible, one whom God blessed with untold wisdom and riches. If this is his crown, then it must be worth a fortune. Even more impressive is the ability it grants me, along with the mental acuity to understand concepts and branches of science I knew nothing about before.

Could such an object exist in reality? Perhaps I did die in that cryopod. Maybe this is all a dream brought on by cryogenic sickness.

Hoarhiim taps his foot impatiently. "You keep stopping and starting. Explain to me what's going on."

And so I do. A few minutes later, Hoarhiim turns to his brother. "You knew of this?"

Blaarjiim sighs. "My lady held me in her hand for thousands of years, brother. I considered the many possibilities that lay beyond the Golden Doors, and given the writing on its surface, only a few seemed plausible."

"Writing?" Turning around, I walk over to the entrance, and it doesn't escape my notice that the monsters outside have stopped pounding on the door. I raise Hoarhiim's orb up to illuminate it, and spot ancient letters I didn't see earlier. Usually, I couldn't hope to read them, but thanks to the Crown, I can.

TOMB OF THE KNOWLEDGE-SEEKER.

"Incredible," I murmur.

A minute passes. Carvings of humans, animals, fearsome monsters, demons, and angels cover every last inch of the towering barrier. Depictions of ancient wars, the struggles of humanity, and an apocalyptic battle I can barely fathom litter its surface.

"Hoarhiim. Does God exist?"

The being of light rubs his arms. "He did, once. The Creator was the most powerful deity in the universe. Everything in existence is a result of his efforts."

"I see."

Thinking back on my life before I entered the Cryopod, I was never a particularly bright young man. My grades were a little above average, but nothing special. I neither failed nor excelled. Trying to apply myself to my studies only ever resulted in burnout.

This crown... what would my life have been like had I possessed it sooner? I can see things in the world around me that I never noticed before. It's as if a veil has been lifted from my eyes, allowing me to examine everything in a new light.

Cricking my neck, I chuckle. "Heh, Hoarhiim, you saucy devil. Those monsters outside aren't a problem. But then, you already knew that, didn't you?"

The bright orb returns the laugh. "Haha, right you are, Jason. The crown has changed you. Do you sense my energy within you?"

I glance down at his orb. While it is stupefyingly bright, it no longer hurts my eyes as it did before. Now I can see a vague glow that envelops my body, right up to the point where Blaarjiim rests in my hand. He appears to swallow up some of his brother's energy.

My cracked lips beg for a reprieve. I lick them slowly. "I thought I was trapped in here, but that isn't the case at all, is it? Let's take the fun way out."

Blaarjiim shivers. "Oooh, exciting. I wonder what you're planning, mortal."

My smile falters.

"P-planning?"

Part 005: A Cute New Friend

It doesn't take long before I end up sitting cross-legged on the ground, mindlessly tracing circles on the smooth dirt floor with my finger. My mind churns through hundreds of thoughts, one after the other, while I try to figure out a way out of this mess. Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim's orbs sit a few feet in front of me, putting out and sucking in the light around themselves, respectively.

The Golden Doors only open inward. I shoved them shut earlier, and they don't have handles, so I don't know how the hell I'm going to pull them open to escape. Once I make it outside, I'm reasonably sure that Hoarhiim's power-up will improve my body to the point that I can either fight the monsters or evade them and flee. Probably...

I narrow my eyes and focus, and the mental map from Solomon's Crown appears once more. The Labyrinth stretches for miles in every direction, almost as if Hell is inside the hollowed-out remains of a planet. But if that's the case, why is there gravity pulling me to the ground?

While my mental map makes it seem like I'm at the center of a cube, in reality, it probably isn't displaying the Labyrinth's layout past a certain point. It could go on for hundreds, thousands, perhaps even hundreds of thousands of miles past the edge of my mental map.

Hoarhiim stirs. "What is on your mind?"

"A lot," I say, replying noncommittally. My mental map has started showing more than just a single red dot indicating my location; now it displays several other points of interest, including a few that I can only assume are the legendary weapons and armor I noticed when I first picked up Hoarhiim. However, they are considerably further from my current location than I'd like.

"Hey, Hoarhiim. Do I have to hold you to access your power?"

He shakes his head. "We are bound together, so distance is not a barrier. However, if you attempt to use my power without physically touching my orb, the connection will be substantially weakened."

"I see."

Another few minutes pass. The monsters outside seem to have fallen silent, making no noise at all. I don't know if they're waiting for me anymore. Maybe they gave up and left.

Standing up, I start pacing back and forth, chewing on my thumb as I examine the door and use the Crown to consider my options.

When I first picked up Hoarhiim, I killed that shadow-monster, but there was a trigger involved. I spoke a single word out loud. Why? What prompted me to do that?

I stop and pivot on my heel to face the entrance head-on. Raising my arm, I aim my palm at the door.

"Light."

Immediately, a light like the Sun radiates from my hand, reflects off the shiny golden door, and blasts me in the eyes, blinding me. "Geyaugh!"

Stumbling back, I fall on my ass and rub my eyes fiercely. "Fuck! Shit! Goddamnit! Worthless piece of garbage, Jason!"

After a minute, I blink my eyes open, but I can barely see anything. Hoarhiim appears in my mind and shakes his head. "Tsk. You've seared your retinas, Jason."

"No shit!"

I close my eyes again and think of the word I spoke. Light. I said it, and a light appeared. I've already made myself a pizza and a bed. What else can I summon with my words?

Stumbling forward, I lean against the wall and pull myself to a standing position, keeping my eyes closed the whole time. I aim my hand at the other wall. "Rock."

An indistinct whoomph sounds off in front of me, and something clatters to the ground. Hoarhiim inhales sharply. "Brother, did you see that?"

Blaarjiim nods slowly. "I saw it, but I don't believe it."

"Quiet," I mutter at them. "I'm thinking."

My mind races. I said the word 'light,' and created light. Then I said the word 'rock,' and a rock appeared. Does that mean that any word I say will make something happen related to its meaning?

Deep in my chest, my heart slams like a jackhammer.

"Sword."

This time, after the whoomph, a metallic object clatters to the ground. I jump at the sound.

"Merciful Creator," Hoarhiim whispers.

Perhaps an abstract concept will work?

I take a few moments to focus on my burning eyes. In the depths of my mind, I imagine each one restoring to perfection, and my pain fading away.

"Heal."

This time, a crackling sensation appears in my eyes, but it fades after just a second. When I blink my eyes open, I can see once again. In fact, my vision is damn-near 20/20.

"Holy shit!" The curse bursts out of me as I regain my vision and catch sight of the sword laying on the ground. The weapon's design is nothing special, but it looks like it can deal some damage. I snatch it up and heft it around. The sword isn't heavy, perhaps a few pounds at most, but just touching the blade nearly splits my finger open.

Blaarjiim eyeballs the sword. "You spoke a word and forged that weapon out of nothing. I've been alive a long time, mortal, and never have I seen a spell that could do such a thing."

My hands start to shake. "H-Hoarhiim, am I doing this because of you? Did you give me this power?"

The light-being shakes his head. "Nay. It is a power that you already possessed. I have only given you enough spiritual energy to realize your potential."

"No kidding," I whisper.

I swing the sword at the wall, and when it hits, it cuts a few inches inside the stone and gets stuck. Damn! It's sharp as hell!

After yanking it around for a moment, I wrench it back out. "Scabbard."

This time, instead of appearing in midair, I feel a small displacement of weight on my body, glance down, and marvel at how the sheath has emerged at my side, looping around me with a belt to hold sturdy. A smile forms on my face as I slip the sword into its holder and grab the orbs up.

"Container."

This time, two round holsters appear on my left side. They're slightly bigger than the two orbs, with a little flip-up latch to hold them in place. I put Blaarjiim in the rear and Hoarhiim in the front. Plenty of light shines through to illuminate the path before me, and Hoarhiim nods approvingly.

"Well done, Jason. You're learning how your power works at an incredible speed."

"Thanks, Hoarhiim," I say, only to pause and think about it a moment. "I can manifest objects and perform other miracles by simply speaking a word. What would you call a power like this?"

Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim stare at each other for a moment. The dark one answers first. "Err, 'word magic?'"

Hoarhiim smacks his forehead. "Terrible! The title of such powerful magic demands more majesty! This ability is unlike anything we've ever seen before. It can forge weapons from little more than Jason's spiritual energy! It's a power beyond anything the ancient Heroes could have ever dreamed up."

"Thanks, Hoarhiim."

I blush a little at my savior's sudden enthusiasm and drift back to thinking about what I should name my power.

It can forge weapons out of midair, huh? That sounds pretty badass. Forging. Blacksmithing. It's as if I am a weaponsmith, crafting a world that bows before me.

Heh, I like that. Now I know what to call my power.

"Blaarjiim, Hoarhiim, I've made up my mind. I'm going to call it 'Wordsmithing.'"

The shit-eating grin on my face can't be contained. Already my mind bubbles with the possibilities my new power gives me.

Turning around, I face the door.

"Let's get out of here. Open."

Seconds pass.

The grin on my face fades as the door doesn't budge.

I try again. "Open."

Still nothing. Frustrated, this time, I try yelling it. "OPEN!"

Finally, a reaction. The door shudders slightly and nudges inward for all of two inches before coming to a stop. Outside, the screams of monsters and demons begin anew as they realize I'm trying to exit the room. Several skeletons start pounding on the door, while other monsters bang on drums and holler like banshees. Now that the door is cracked ever so slightly, I can hear voices screaming out things like, "Man filth! Come out, coward!" Swords stab through the opening as hundreds of monsters scream and shout.

I wipe my forehead. My body feels fatigued, and all I did was speak a single word. Hoarhiim takes notice.

"Be careful, Jason. It appears your ability to Wordsmith isn't unlimited. Using magic drains the spiritual energy from your body, including that which I am giving you. If you keep spellcasting recklessly, you'll drain your reserves and leave yourself open to attack."

He's right, as always. I nod along with his words, then stand a little straighter and take several deep breaths. Unless I'm mistaken, the volume of my voice increased the energy used, but also the effect. Then, that means...

No, what am I thinking? If I use all my energy just opening the door, I'll be a sitting duck. The monsters will pour inside while I'm gasping for breath on the ground and gut me like a pig.

Yeah, that's the key. If I open it inward, I'm inviting them to carve off the juiciest part of my body. But if I forcefully open it outward, I can blow away the ones at the door and dash for the exit.

But how?

The Crown sends countless thoughts toward me, and a moment later, an idea springs into my mind.

Raising my arm, I aim it at the door. "Push!"

A wave of energy surges from my body, like a blast of wind, and smashes against the door. It impacts it with a bang, then knocks me back slightly. I quickly regain my footing and examine the door. It's rattling a little, but other than closing it the rest of the way, I don't think my magic had much effect.

Blaarjiim smirks. "You'll need more power than that, mortal."

"Right, right."

The knockback is a problem. If I turn the juice up, I won't be able to keep my balance. The door is exceptionally resistant to any form of attack. Gold is a soft metal, so given the door's defensive properties, it must only be painted gold, but forged from something far more resilient.

Aiming my hand one more time, this time, I prepare a shield for myself. "Solidify. Root."

Dense rock sprouts from the ground, climbs up my body, and wraps around my flesh to hold me in place. With my frame now firmly rooted, I take the deepest breath of my life.

"PUUUSH!!!"

A stupendous wave of energy explodes from my body, comparable to the kinetic energy of ten hurricanes, fifty tsunamis, and a giant tornado. The wave of power instantly blasts the giant golden doors off their frames, smashes through the enemies in front, and sends them careening through the wall of monsters awaiting my exit. Before I can see what's happening outside, the magic force ricochets back against my body. It rips my hardened form from the ground, flings me back against Solomon's Throne, destroys my makeshift armor, and knocks the wind out of me.

A moment later, I blink my eyes.

I can't feel anything. I can't move my head, or anything else.

No, that's not right. I feel warm. Hot, even. It's as if someone has poured gasoline on me and lit a fire. The burning agony is like nothing I've ever felt in my life.

It hurts.

It hurts!!!

"Ney-ungh-"

A pitiful whimper chokes from my throat. The world rushes back to me, and I slowly manage to discern that the side of my head is resting on the ground.

Hoarhiim says something, but I can't hear him. I can't see him, either.

His figure appears in front of me, but it's foggy and indistinct. He's... waving his hand?

"-son. Jason. Jason!" He yells and makes me flinch, the slight movement sending spasms of pain across my entire body. "Jason! Gods, your body- it's..."

"How brutal," Blaarjiim says, as he appears beside his brother. "The mortal is still alive, isn't he?"

"Barely," Hoarhiim whispers. "I think Jason shattered every bone in his body. He's not going to make it, I'm afraid."

"Well, heal him, idiot!" Blaarjiim screams at his brother in anger.

When did he become so concerned about my well-being?

"Don't tell me you've forgotten how to do that?!"

"I haven't forgotten," Hoarhiim says quietly. "But he used up much of my energy during that attack. The best I could do is stem the bleeding. It doesn't matter anyway, brother. Look."

Hoarhiim points somewhere past where I can look. I try to follow his finger, but I can't move my head at all. I can only estimate he's pointing at the doorway.

Blaarjiim's voice softens. "Ah, what a shame. It looks like you didn't get them all, mortal. We had fun while it lasted."

From the doorway, the sound of breathing emerges. Something takes a step forward, its foot causing a whoomph on the ground. "Man-filth."

I manage to wheeze out a question. "Whuh ish et?"

Hoarhiim turns his back on me. "I'm sorry, Jason. It's an orc. There's nothing we can do to help you. Close your eyes. Maybe he'll kill you quickly."

"Kuh... kull muh?"

My mouth won't form words. I can't move at all. All I can do is lie still and listen in terror as the monster takes slow, menacing footsteps toward me.

"You killed friends. Me lose many blood brothers! You pay! Bahahah!" The monster laughs, and I can only thank whatever god might exist that I can't see the monster's face.

I'm going to die now.

More footsteps. The orc pauses. "Mormok, you live too?"

A second orc voice speaks. "Yup. Human not kill everyone. Skugs alive. Diablo be very angry about losses though."

"Diablo need stuff it," The first orc says. "Let's gut filthy human 'n give him to boss."

The two of them chuckle and take a few steps forward. Soon I can hear their breathing. They're less than ten feet away now.

"Hehe. Man-filth piss himself. Scared? Should be."

Suddenly, from outside, a bone-chilling scream from another orc rings out. "Aaah! No, stay back! Get away!"

Both orcs pause, probably to look back. The first one sniffs the air. "What that?"

The orc outside screams again, but his voice cuts off midway as a sickening crunch fills the din. The sound of snapping bones turns my blood to ice.

The second orc speaks, but his voice is trembling. "H-hey, Ugna. I-isn't this room that scary place? Gressil says no come here."

The first orc's breathing quickens. "Let's take look. Someone's 'bout to die, and it ain't me."

"B-but Ugna..."

"No buts! I ain't 'fraid of nothin'!"

Both orcs turn around and head for the entrance, leaving me to bleed out on the floor. I don't know whether to be relieved or terrified at this turn of events.

Hoarhiim nudges Blaarjiim. "Brother, is that-"

"Quiet! I'm trying to listen!" The dark orb walks over and leans against a barrier, as if trying to see past the entrance. His vision must be limited in some way. "This... this could be..."

The orcs stop at the entryway. Ugna, the first orc, sniffs the air again. "Where everybody go? Where skugs? Where kobolds?"

"U-Ugna, we should leave. Look. Look!" Mormok, the second orc, yells at his comrade frantically. "The statue! It's broken! It's-"

His voice halts much too fast for him to have simply stopped mid-sentence. The sound of something wet and damp hits the floor. Ugna howls in terror.

"No... no! NO!! It's the Black Witch! Get away from me! Filthy human devil!" He swings a sword at someone out of my sight, banging it against the wall in the process, but a moment later, his voice goes silent.

Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim gape at something unseen.

The awful sound of bones snapping and sinew twisting fills the air again. This time, however, it's accompanied by another sound: Someone smacking their lips.

"Mmm, yummy! Teehee!"

A little girl's voice rings out in the now-silent hallway.

The sound of clicking, like high heels on stone, slowly approaches me.

"Hello? Are you alive, mister?"

The little girl skips toward me, kicking pebbles and loose debris out of her way. Her pitter-patter of footsteps reaches me within a few seconds. "Mister?"

"Wung-guh..." I wheeze something out, but it isn't much more than a painful gasp.

A moment later, a pair of black platform shoes, and some pale white legs appear in front of me. Two inches above the ankles, a long fluffy black skirt starts, but I can't see much beyond that. The girl kneels down, and finally, her skirted knees come into view. I raise my eyes to look at her, but she's still too high up for me to see her face. I can just barely make out a black dress with red ribbons all over the place and fluffy white frills lining her arms and stockings.

She reaches forward and pokes my chest. The slight tremor sends lightning through my body. "Hmm. Not dead, huh? You won't put up much a fight. Oh! What's this?" She shuffles slightly and reaches toward my belt. A second later she squeals excitedly. "Ooooh! Blaarjiim? Hoarhiim?! You're both here!"

Blaarjiim forces himself to look calm, but I can vaguely make out a look of joy on his face. "My queen. It is wonderful to see you once again. Long have I awaited your return."

"Oh, you! You're always so stuffy! Why are you in this guy's belt, though?" A moment passes. Her voice pitch lowers. "Did he... steal you?" The shift is frightening.

Blaarjiim pauses for a moment, before turning deadly serious. "Aye, Lady Amelia. This mortal stole me from your grasp, and sought to take my power for himself. I can only imagine what nefarious deeds he was plotting."

"Muh-hung!" I choke out a protest, but it doesn't amount to anything decipherable.

Amelia's knuckles crack. "How... how dare you. Taking away my eternal partner while I was trapped in that awful statue... I'll make you regret this."

She starts to stand up, but Blaarjiim interjects before she can turn violent. "Just a joke, my queen. A jest. He is the one who freed you from your prison."

"Yes!" Hoarhiim interjects. "This human is named Jason. He has a unique magical power called Wordsmithing."

Amelia taps her shoes on the ground. "Oh! I see, now. Haha! Blaarjiim, since when, were you one to tell jokes?"

Blaarjiim bows slightly. "Your radiant smile is worth everything, my queen. However, I must recommend that you heal him at once. His life force is slipping away."

The girl hems and haws for a moment. "Do I have to, Blaarjiim? He looks pitiful and weak."

Hoarhiim lowers his voice. "As a long-time friend, I would ask the same of you, Amelia. I have attached to Jason. I like him."

A moment passes. Finally, Amelia sighs. "Okay, fine. Blaarjiim, give me your power again. I'll heal him up in a jiffy."

What comes next shocks me. An awful pain erupts in my chest, as if a trillion watts of electricity were coursing through every nerve in my body. I open my mouth to scream, but nothing comes out.

A minute passes. My bones wrench back together violently, and my skin folds back on itself. I writhe on the ground, whimpering like a beaten dog, even after my body finishes stitching back together.

"Oooh, sorry about that," Amelia says. "The phantom pain won't last long, though!"

Eventually, as she promised, my anguish subsides. I flop onto my back and breathe heavily, staring up at the ceiling. Finally, I turn my head to examine my savior. She's just a child, perhaps twelve years old. Her black dress is an elaborate, gothic-lolita style thing, with red lacing and frills on the edges. Atop her head is a cute little fluffy red ribbon. She looks adorable.

Then she smiles, and somehow it's the creepiest thing I've seen in my life.

"Aren't you going to thank me?"

Several moments pass as I stare at the strangely dressed young girl. The gaze she sends in my direction indicates a certain casual air I've never seen in a child before. I probably shouldn't call her a child, since there's only six years difference between us, but she's very short, standing well under five feet tall.

Amelia taps her foot. "Hellooo? Is anyone home? I healed you. Where are your manners?"

"What? Oh, right! Thanks." I quickly jump to my feet, only for my legs to give out midway into the hop, making me stumble forward and bash my knees on the ground.

I can barely stand. My limbs have the elasticity of wet spaghetti, rather than the strength of bones and muscles. Every breath threatens to rob my last bit of energy from me.

Hoarhiim grunts. "Careful, Jason. Even if Lady Amelia healed you, your mind still has some leftover trauma from the grievous wounds you suffered. Further, you have almost no spiritual energy left at all. It's a miracle you haven't fallen into a coma."

"A coma?" I repeat his words disbelievingly. "I feel weak as hell, but that seems a little extreme."

To my surprise, Amelia steps forward and grabs my arm with both her hands, helping me to my feet. As she does, a slight warmth enters my body, making me realize how cold I feel.

Amelia steps back, and I notice that Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim's orbs are floating in midair, though she grabs one in each hand right as I spot them. "Jason's your name, hm? Well, I'll give you a freebie. Call it a reward for releasing me."

"Generous as always, my queen," Blaarjiim murmurs. "Be thankful, Jason. The Black Witch is very picky with whom she rewards."

I rise to my full height of six-foot, two inches, only to realize I tower over the little girl. She takes a step back in surprise. "Oh, my. You're taller than I expected. Somewhat skinny, though. Not much in the way of muscles."

Self-consciously, I rub my bicep. "Um, yeah. I, err, never saw the need to work out. Haha."

The two of us evaluate each other for a moment before I decide to ask a question. "You said I freed you. How?"

Wordlessly, she points to the exit of Solomon's Tomb. "Out there. You broke the statue."

As I follow her finger, I spot splatters of blood and gore all around where the Golden Doors once stood. A green leg lies against the wall, looking as if a horrifying monster attacked and devoured whomever it once belonged to.

Slowly, she and I walk over to the exit. She hands me Hoarhiim's orb, then points at the center area. To my astonishment, one of the doors has embedded itself in the wall across the room, while the other has crashed into the ground and buried itself several feet deep.

I knew I shoved them with my "push" spell, but I didn't expect to send them flying off their hinges like that.

My eyes look away from the doors and toward the carnage in the room. Skeletons are crushed into dust, orcs and centaurs contort into various unnatural shapes, and several monsters are little more than a collection of body parts strewn all over the ground.

And the statue! Where once a beautiful figure of a girl in a dress once stood, with water billowing from her umbrella- hey, wait a minute!

I quickly look at Amelia, comparing her to my memory of the statue. "Hold on, are you telling me you were the statue itself?"

Amelia smiles. "Mhm! And you released me! That was super nice of you!"

But, I mean, I didn't do it on purpose, I start to say. Blaarjiim appears in my mind and glares at me, waggling his finger.

Right, duh. Go with the flow, Jason. You did it on purpose.

I quickly wipe at my nose. "Yeah, nah, it was no big deal. Blaarjiim suggested smashing the statue, so I thought it would be cool. Everything got a little out of hand with the monsters, but you saved me, so I'd call us even."

Amelia's smile disappears. "Uh huh... sure."

Even as Blaarjiim grins at me for making him look good, I sweep my gaze around the room once more. Yeah, Amelia saved me, or at least I think she did. But... what about those awful chewing noises?

Maybe I heard wrong. After all, I was in a state of delirium. Still, it can't hurt to ask, can it?

"So, uh, Amelia."

"Hmm?" She walks forward and nudges an Orc corpse with her foot.

"You healed me, so you have magical energy too, right? Magical powers?"

She spins around in a circle on her heel like a ballerina. "Mhm! I've got all sorts of powers! Why do you ask?"

"Well..." I turn my gaze to one of the horribly broken Orc bodies nearby. "These monsters... they're from fairy tales and fantasy stories. I never thought in my life that they truly existed. Yet, you can fight them... but how?"

She stops spinning to frown at me. "What a silly question. Hoarhiim, haven't you taught anything to this child? Surely you've at least told him about magic!"

The white orb sighs. "I tried, but we didn't have time to explain."

Tapping my lip, I recall what he told me before. "Hoarhiim, you mentioned spiritual energy once already, then Amelia did, too. What is that? Is it like mana?"

Amelia cocks her head slightly. "Mah-nuh?"

Aw, nuts. She has no idea what I'm talking about. "It's this mechanic from video games. It's like a meter that allows you to cast spells and stuff. When it runs out, you can't use magic anymore, and end up a sitting duck."

Hoarhiim squints. "I am not sure what you're talking about, but the concept is mostly correct. Spiritual Energy is the power that allows demons and angels to cast spells. Humans typically have very little, but even if they had more, they could not use magic."

"Oh. But Amelia has magic, and so do I. Are we special or something?"

Amelia's mouth goes taut. "Special. In a way, yes. Certainly, you are. As for me, I'd rather not say."

Once again, she gives off an odd feeling I can't quite describe in words. "You're a peculiar little girl."

Her expression shifts to annoyance. "Hey! You're the child here! I'll have you know my body is immortal. I'm tens of thousands of years old."

"Really?" I eye her carefully. "I guess anything is possible with magic."

She quickly looks away and blushes. "Y-yeah. Just drop it, okay? I don't like this topic. Tell me about your magic."

She's self-conscious about her looks, I think to myself, making a mental note. That's how most women are, I guess.

"I call my power Wordsmithing. I can make things happen by speaking a single word."

Amelia continues looking away for a moment, then suddenly jerks back to meet my gaze. "Wait, you used a word? Not your hands?"

I echo her confusion. "What do you mean, 'my hands'?"

Hoarhiim clears his throat. "Ahem, well, you see, Jason, every form of magic requires a specific amount of time, hand sign combinations, and spiritual energy from the user. Your power is very irregular in that respect. I've never seen someone, especially a human, who could use magic just by speaking a word."

"Yes," Blaarjiim says. "And creating items out of thin air! That should certainly be impossible."

Amelia raises an eyebrow. "Show me."

All eyes turn to me. "W-well, see, I don't have any energy left. Even if I did, I don't know what to make."

Amelia leans toward me, reaches her free hand forward, and pokes me in the chest. A sudden rush of mana pours into my body. I stand awed by how revitalized I feel. "Have you tested your abilities yet?"

"No. I only just realized what my power was right before I sent the Golden Doors flying. I haven't had time to experiment."

Amelia nods and starts pacing back and forth. "I see. Blaarjiim, surely you've evaluated the boy. What can he do?"

I hate it when this little girl calls me boy. She probably does it to make me self-conscious.

Blaarjiim smoothes down his shirt, or whatever. I only see him as a vague black apparition, but apparently, he wears clothes. "Hmm, yes. He can heal himself, he created a sword and a rock, and he sent the doors flying. I don't know what his limits are, but based on what I've seen, I'd be surprised if he had any at all."

Amelia pauses her walking to kick an orc's helmet out of the way. "No limits? Absurd. Every magi has limits, especially if they're human. I need to test him."

She turns to face me.

"Make me a chair," Amelia points to an empty spot a few feet away. "Right there."

"A chair? That seems random."

She shakes her head. "I want to sit. Hurry up! Unless you think you can't."

"Fine, geez." I reach my free hand out and aim it at a bare patch of floor near a crushed skeleton and a beheaded horse. The sight of the corpses all around hardly fazes me anymore. "Chair."

My heart skips a beat as once again, air rushes into the spot I aimed my hand at, and a chair forms in midair. It drops a few inches, landing perfectly on its four legs.

Amelia scowls. "You call that a chair? Look at it! I'll get splinters on my legs if I sit there! Did you envision a pauper's chair? It doesn't even have a cushion! Make another one, and make it fit for a queen!"

"A queen, huh?"

I stare at the chair thoughtfully. I hadn't thought of anything specific when I first used my spell, but this time...

The Crown of Solomon seems to speak to me, bringing up a mental list of ten thousand chairs. I close my eyes and focus, bringing up an image in my mind.

With a flourish, I jerk my hand out again. "Behold! I will summon a chair far greater than any you've seen before! Prepare yourself, Lady Amelia! Hah hah hah! Chair!"

A thunk of something hitting the ground makes me jerk my eyes open. Amelia stares at me, disgust on her face. "What was with that grandiose speech? Never do that again."

"Uh, sorry." My eyes flick from her to the chair and- HOLY MOLY!

A throne, something that would make King Solomon red with envy, sits on the ground amidst the corpses. The chair's vibrant golden color mixes with its bright-red fabric and elaborate stitchings to create an awe-inspiring image. Skulls made of silver and bronze stand atop the side pegs near the head, giving off a feeling as if it once belonged to a powerful necromancer.

Amelia notices I'm not looking at her anymore, and when she turns and spots the chair, she jumps in surprise. "Whoa! You made THAT?!"

I pull away and sweep my hair back with my hand. "Heh, yeah. Now you're beginning to see the true extent of my power. Something like this is trivial for a god, like me. I can create anything with the power of a single word."

Amelia's excitement flattens as she turns to stare at me. "Jason. You're doing the thing again. Don't."

My shoulders slump a little. "Okay. Sorry."

She perks back up and skips gaily to the chair, spinning and sitting down in one smooth motion. The instant she leans back, she moans out loud, "Oh, goodness, this throne is soooo comfortable! I feel like it was made for me!"

I resist the urge to boast once more. Instead, while Amelia rubs all over the chair, smiling ear to ear and praising my handiwork, other thoughts come to my mind.

I created that chair out of nothing. This power is unusual enough that Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim both saw fit to comment on it. What other properties could it possibly hold?

Silently, I ponder a hundred different options, each one more interesting than the former. Raising my hand, I point a finger toward the opposite wall and mutter a word. "Fire."

A tiny poof of flame spits from my finger and fizzles away.

This time, I try again, but louder. "Fire."

A stream of flame shoots out, travels around ten feet, and fizzles away.

By now, Amelia has calmed down, and she watches me with interest. "Whatcha doin'?"

"Trying new things. Fire!"

I feel my energy decrease substantially, but a plume of flame spews from my finger, forming a laser of fire that jets across the room and carves a line in the wall as I move my finger. A few seconds later, it cuts off, forcing me to take a breath. That was exhausting.

"Jason," Hoarhiim speaks up, surprising me. "Take Lady Amelia to the entrance of Solomon's Tomb, then use every ounce of energy in your body with that Fire spell. I want to see what happens. Don't hold back."

Frowning, I glance at Hoarhiim's orb. "That's dangerous. I don't know if I can control my power. Besides, I might accidentally hurt Amelia."

Blaarjiim guffaws. "HAH! This mortal has a sense of humor! Flames can't harm the Black Witch, boy. Do as Hoarhiim says. The three of us all want to see what happens."

Indeed, Amelia leans forward and rests her head and hand on her knee as she stares at me with interest. "Go on. Let's see it."

I nod slowly. "Okay. Let's clear the room, then."

A minute later, Amelia stands beside me as I aim my hand toward the room of corpses and blood.

"This should be a heckuva way to clean the place. Hell doesn't have many janitors."

"Mmm," Amelia mutters.

To be honest, I'm scared. The last time I went all out with an attack, I nearly killed myself. Still, Amelia's here. The orbs insist I won't hurt her with my fire, and I know she can heal me if things go south, but still... I'm a little worried.

I stick Hoarhiim into my belt pouch and raise both arms, then take a deep breath. Using every pore of my body, I scream with all my might, "FIIIIRE!!!!"

What follows next is terrifying. A flood of flame surges from my body, screams as if it were a living being, and tears through everything in its path. It leaps from object to object, swallows the golden throne and melts it to slag in an instant, crawls across walls and the ceiling, and races down the hallway across the room in search of more prey. Everything in the path of the flames screams for mercy as it burns and devours all it sees.

It's... it's incredible! It's terrifying! If I keep this up, I'll turn the whole Labyrinth into ash! I have to stop it!! But how?! How can I-

Suddenly, a sharp pain erupts at the base of my neck. I stumble forward, and the flames cut off. My body goes limp, and as I fall, Amelia catches me before I can plunge into the lake of fire.

Everything starts to go black as I pass out. I slowly realize that Amelia must have knocked me out with a judo chop to my neck. The last thing I see before I go under is a worried look on her face.

"Who are you?"

Then the sweet release of sleep takes me.

This is Amelia and Blaarjiim

Part 006: Sloppy Wet Kisses

Yawning mightily, I stretch my arms out and blink my eyes open. The sound of trickling water nearby catches my attention, along with a distant banging, like a spoon on a pan. I start to lean forward, and my back pops satisfyingly, stunning me for a second.

I think I just had the best sleep of my entire life.

My eyes rove around. I have no idea where I am, but it seems... cozy. The cavern I'm in is perhaps thirty feet squared, and moss covers all the cavern walls. To my right, a small freshwater stream bubbles from a wall, drips down, and runs along a natural culvert in the ground until it enters another wall. Hoarhiim's orb illuminates the room, but he doesn't appear in my mind. Perhaps he's sleeping? I stick him in my belt pouch.

My head hurts. I reach up to rub it, only to realize I'm still wearing Solomon's Crown. With a shrug, I activate my mental map. It takes me a few minutes, but I manage to piece together my current position compared to where I was when I fell asleep: about three miles away. I heal the sores on my head with a quick spell and lean back to think.

I didn't fall asleep. Amelia knocked me out. Where is she?

I clamber to my feet, but there's nobody else here. The entrance before me is barely a hole in the wall. I'd have to crawl on my hands and knees to get through it. Did Amelia drag me here? How did she fit me inside?

A glance at my resting area shows the moss I was sleeping on is thick to the point of artificiality. It looks like someone grew it by hand, just for me.

Another minute passes. I don't know where Amelia is, but an idea pops into my head. "Locate."

My vision goes foggy for a second. My eyes suddenly race to the wall before me, pass through it, and travel around several corners to stop before Amelia as she walks along a corridor. She doesn't notice me, indicating I must have somehow used astral projection? I return to my body a moment later, nearly tripping and falling backward in the process.

That was jarring.

With a sigh, I get down on my hands and knees and start crawling out the little hole. Amelia's on her way back, and she isn't far, so she'll probably show up within a minute or two.

The hole looks like it was cut or smashed into the wall, and recently at that. As I shimmy through the few feet of dirt, I stop to scrutinize the hole. It almost looks like the Labyrinth's stonework is slowly growing back. Regeneration? Why would the Labyrinth do that?

I emerge from the hole and instantly freeze. The sound of humming and giggling echoes in the distance, all from women.

What the hell?

Their voices are cute. Friendly. Beautiful, even. A lump forms in my throat. I'm back in the labyrinthine dirt hallways I know and hate, but those voices are in the opposite direction of Amelia. Should I wait for her? Tch, she'll probably tell me to ignore them.

A high note from one of the girl's songs lilts up, tugging on my chest as I listen. Amelia won't mind. I just want to take a quick peek. Won't take me more than ten seconds!

No! My mind screams at me. This place is literally Hell! Don't just go check out chicks! Your life is at stake!

Oh, shut up, you. What can some pretty girls do? Besides, I have Wordsmithing. My fire spell can protect me if nothing else can. A little eye-fucking won't hurt anyone.

Two voices battle within me. I ignore the voice of reason and slowly tiptoe down the hallway. As I do, the girls grow more audible. They're perhaps the most incredible singers I've ever heard in my entire life. I almost want to grab them and force them to record music all day for me so I can run a billion-dollar recording company.

The sounds of water splashing around mix in with their giggles. Hoarhiim's orb usually lights up the Labyrinth, but it always tapers off the further away I look. This time, though, I can see a blue light up ahead.

Not wanting to disturb them, I slowly tiptoe and approach the doorway on the left. I try to muffle Hoarhiim's light with my hands, but it only works somewhat. Maybe they won't notice!

"Teehee!" A girl giggles again, making blood rush through my body. God, she sounds sexy.

Hoarhiim appears in my vision, yawning. "Oh, Jason. You're awake. What are you up to?"

I don't answer. I arrive at the doorway, and now the blue light pouring from it is unmistakable. Just inside, to the left, all those sexy girls are waiting for me. It's taking all my willpower not to tear off my clothes and dash inside. I can't do that! They'll freak out and run away!

Cautiously, I peek around the corner.

My blood freezes.

Whatever the things are in this room, they aren't sexy girls. They aren't girls, even. They're... monsters.

And they're staring right at me.

"I told you I smelled a man!" One of the horrifying fish-like creatures licks its lips, but its voice is still that of a hauntingly beautiful woman. As its tongue snakes out, I catch a glimpse of several hundred razor-sharp teeth.

"Jason..." Hoarhiim quietly whispers. "...Those are sirens. Run."

My gaze locks onto the nearest one's pitch-black eyes. We stare at each other for all of two seconds.

Then every living thing in the room leaps out of the water and slithers across the ground toward me.

One of the monsters bellows, "I saw him first! He's mine!!"

Another retorts, "I haven't tasted a man in months! I call dibs!"

I don't know the exact moment my body reacts instinctively, but one second my head is peeking inside the monster den, and the next I'm thirty feet down the hallway, running for my life. The sound of wet fins slapping on the ground and giggling of sexy women makes me move like the wind.

I glance behind me and spot ten of the monsters. Each one has a head like a cross between a fish and a shark, but their middle section is humanlike, with uncovered female breasts and two arms, while the bottom is something like I'd expect on a mermaid.

"We want to kiss you, boy! Come play with us!"

"Gah! Stay away!"

I hit the end of the corridor, then turn to take a right, only to smack face-first into Amelia.

"Wah!" She falls back and smashes onto her ass. I trip and stumble past her, bang my face against the wall, and land on the ground.

"Jason! What the hell?" Amelia leaps to her feet a moment later and turns to look at me. "You were supposed to be rest-"

"Behind you!" I yell the words out and point in her direction. At that moment, the Sirens come tearing around the hallway, giggling the whole time.

However, the instant they arrive, they stop dead in their tracks as their eyes lock onto Amelia.

Seconds pass. Amelia glares at them, and they shrink back slightly.

"B-Black Witch? But... but you're supposed to be..."

Amelia clears her throat. "What's going on here? Were you chasing my slave just now?"

"Slave? Yours? No! Of-of course not!" The head Siren shrinks away slightly. "We were just giving him a scare! Didn't want him, err, wandering into the wrong areas! Y-you know how it is!"

Amelia's foot slides forward half an inch, and the Sirens jerk away again. "Wow! I'm glad we got that misunderstanding cleared up! Hahaha! I mean, if you were trying to do something to him, I'd have to punish you! Hahaha!"

Amelia's giggle lilts cutely in a way that even the siren's don't. The Sirens all quickly retreat; their sloppy wet bodies dragging across the ground. "Well, ah, very good then! Carry on, Black Witch! Y-you have a wonderful day!"

Without turning their backs on her, the Sirens slowly slide around the corner, only to flop away once Amelia is out of sight.

A few moments pass, and Amelia sighs. "Oh, Jason. Don't tell me you got caught up with the Sirens. Did their cute voices draw you in?"

"Um... no?" I force a lie out, but even I don't believe myself. "Okay, yeah. I don't know what came over me."

"Stupidity, that's what. Siren voices can call out to males of other species and draw them in. They devour the body and lay their eggs in the fresh corpse. Even if you thought the fish-faces were attractive, they reproduce asexually. Not much luck there for you, I'm afraid."

"Y-yeah, I guess."

I don't know what to say. Sometimes hearing this child talk about such grown-up things can be very jarring.

A few moments pass, and I change the subject. "Where have you been?"

Amelia smiles. "I had to catch up on the latest happenings. Being stuck in a statue for thousands of years can put a girl out of the loop!"

"Yeah..." I pause to stare at her for a moment. "Say, all I did was smash that statue, and you were released. Why didn't anyone else do that? I didn't see anyone guarding the room..."

Her smile fades slightly. "That's not your business, Jason. Don't shove your nose where it doesn't belong."

Hoarhiim clears his throat. "Simply put, Lady Amelia had nobody to pull her out. Demons and monsters hate her, after all."

"Hoarhiim!" Amelia puffs her cheeks out. "Don't just say whatever you please!"

Well, the cat's out of the bag. I might as well push a little more. "Who put you in the statue? Medusa?"

Amelia curls her free hand into a fist. "A very evil woman, that's who. Someone who took pleasure in tormenting me. Do you want to know, Jason? Do you have to ask, even if it hurts me?"

I quickly shake my head. "No, sorry. I'm too curious for my own good and terrible at respecting boundaries."

"Yeah, I'll say." Amelia crosses her arms and looks away. "Let's move on. Why are you here?"

"I don't know what you mean."

"The Labyrinth, Jason. Why are you in the Labyrinth? Blaarjiim tells me you claim to be from Earth. I'm also from Earth, so I find that hard to believe. Humans barely live for a hundred years, let alone a hundred thousand."

"A hundred thousand? What do you mean?"

Amelia doesn't reply for a moment. "It's hard to believe, I know, but Earth was destroyed a hundred thousand years ago. You didn't know?"

"I had no idea!" I gawk at Amelia for several seconds as a bazillion thoughts appear in my mind. "B-but the cryopod was only supposed to freeze me for a thousand years! How could the battery have lasted for a hundred thousand? That's impossible!"

"Cryopod?" Amelia glances at Blaarjiim's orb. "What's that?"

The dark god shrugs. "The mortal is full of surprises."

I spend the next several minutes explaining to Amelia everything about myself and the cryopod, and she nods along, interrupting only to tell me to elaborate on this or that.

"A cryogenic pod for freezing people, huh?" Amelia finally leans back against the wall to let my words sink in. "But if it freezes you, wouldn't you die? Most humans die if they stand in the cold too long. Your story is a little unbelievable."

"It's a... uh... science thing," I reply. "The scientists used chemicals for the freezing process, and a bunch of other stuff was done to wake me up when the time was right. I'm not sure I could explain the process so you'd understand."

Amelia lurches toward me. "Are you calling me... stupid?"

"No! No, absolutely not! Uh, it's... it's mostly me! Yeah, I'm an idiot, so I can't explain it well!"

My quick deflection sates her curiosity. "Nice save. Anyway, you say you came here in that pod-thing, so where is it?"

"What do you mean? Do you want me to show it to you?"

Amelia nods. "Yeah. I want to see it. Do you know where it is?"

"Uhh..." I pull up my mental map quickly and scan the hallways. "It's a good distance away. Um. The only thing is, I kinda don't want to find it."

"Oh? Afraid I'll find out you're a liar?"

"Aaaactually, it's more about the, um, the friend I made when I first woke up. He was scary."

Sighing, Amelia cracks her neck. "Don't worry about demons while I'm around. You'll find them to be quite polite when I'm nearby."

I glance behind her at the trail of piss-water the Sirens left when they fled.

Part 007: The Demon Leaders

If we were to travel in a straight line, Amelia and I might only be a few miles from my cryopod room. Sadly, the Labyrinth is a twisted maze of right and left turns, heading up and down in many random directions. After two hours of walking, Amelia and I take yet another nonsensical right turn, then a left.

The little girl stops in front of a crossing where the path splits. She pauses for barely two seconds before quickly spinning to face left. "This way!"

Silently, I pull up my mental map and chart a course to the intended room. We are walking in the wrong direction.

"Uh, I don't want to spoil the mood, but we should go right."

Amelia puffs up her cheeks again. "I know this Labyrinth like the back of my hand. You've barely been here for two days! Just follow me, and we'll get to your pod in no time."

Before I can offer a protest, she immediately heads left.

Hoarhiim appears in my mind. Based on how translucent he sometimes appears, I've learned to tell when he's projecting himself to me, but not Amelia or Blaarjiim. "Give her time, Jason. Amelia may seem headstrong to you, but she was trapped in that statue for a long time. Her defeat, all those years ago, changed her somewhat. In the past, she'd have killed you the moment she met you, but her heart has softened over time."

Comforting, I think to myself.

We continue traveling in whatever direction Amelia pleases, and I sigh as the room for my Cryopod slowly moves further and further away. Soon we're five miles away, then six...

The walls begin to shift around us. It doesn't take long before the earthen brown texture changes to rock, and not long after that, I spot dozens of little glowing bugs crawling around on the walls.

Amelia furrows her brow. "Ugh. Maybe that last turn wasn't the best idea. Let's go back."

I pause to examine the hallway. "Where are we?"

She shrugs. "This is the Fairy Zone, one of several habitats for specific monsters. The place where demons hid my statue is near the center of the Labyrinth, so the further we stray from it, the sooner we'll enter a different area."

"Mmm." I squint to peer into the distance. There's plenty more light up ahead, green in color. "Why does the Labyrinth have varying biomes?"

Amelia's expression darkens. "Well, it has to do with Earth. Most demons lived on Earth at one point, but as humanity began to enter all-out war with demonkind, they also sought to exterminate the monsters of the world. Eventually, demons created the Labyrinth and brought monsters along to live in safety. Some monsters require or prefer specific habitats, so the demons sculpted certain areas of Hell for its various residents."

"Huh, neat. Why don't you let me lead for a while? Solomon's Crown gives me a mental map of the Labyrinth, so-"

She immediately holds her hand up. "Solomon was an ancient hero, Jason. I don't like heroes. We'll do this my way, understand?"

"But-"

"No buts!"

Defeated, I lower my head. "Alright, fine, if you insist. I'm just beginning to wonder if you know the layout of this place at all. According to my mental map, you're taking us the wrong way nearly every time."

Amelia flinches. "I am? You're lying."

Blaarjiim appears in both of our minds. "My queen, I did not wish to say anything, but the mortal is correct. I supposed you might have gotten turned around at one point, but-"

"You didn't say anything?! Oh geez, Blaarjiim! Now I look like an idiot!" She hollers at the black orb for a moment while Hoarhiim and I stare at each other awkwardly. Finally, looking more flustered than before, Amelia jerks her head up to me. "Okay! Fine! I admit it! I have no idea where I'm going! It's not like it's my fault! This stupid Labyrinth shifts pathways and moves walls around. I'm a little rusty from being out of the loop."

"Yeah," I mutter. "Look, just follow me, and I'll use my mental map, okay?"

Amelia crosses her arms and pouts. "Whatever."

A few minutes later, the glowing bugs become a distant memory, and we return to the familiar barren walls from before. We walk in silence, but a growing unease at Amelia's coldness prompts me to speak.

"So, Amelia, you said the Labyrinth changes pathways, right?"

A nod. "Yes. Why do you ask?"

"Just making conversation. The Labyrinth is massive, maybe a thousand miles cubed in every direction, and that's only the limits of my map. What is this place? Who, or what, created it?"

My question perplexes her. Amelia scrunches up her face and frowns. "Umm, I don't know. I've always wondered about that myself. Blaarjiim?"

Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim both appear and reply in unison. "We don't know."

Huh. A mystery. I glance at my map and turn right when a branch in the hallway comes up. My stomach turns into a galloping horse as we round the corner and arrive face-to-face with a gigantic troll. The monster's body takes up most of the hallway, and its head scrapes against the ceiling as it walks.

The troll glances down at us. "Hmm? Hoo-mun? What do here?"

The monster doesn't react aggressively, but his giant size sends terror down my spine. His hands are big enough to wrap around Amelia and crush her into pulp. I start to move to block Amelia from his incoming attack, but she swats my arm.

Amelia grabs me by the hand and smiles politely at the troll. "Oh, we're sorry! Are you going this way or that?" She points to the right and left, and the troll nods to the right.

"Me walk slow. Take up room. Let pass, please."

"Certainly! We weren't watching where we were going!"

Amelia pulls me back into the path we came from, and the troll ambles past us, nods politely, and continues on his way. After he leaves, Amelia releases my hand, and we continue our journey.

I breathe a sigh of relief. "My heart was pounding like crazy. That guy was huge!"

She raises an eyebrow. "What, you thought a little troll was scary? Trolls are docile for the most part. You can't judge a monster based on their looks, Jason."

I avert my eyes. "Yeah, well, up to this point, everything in the Labyrinth has tried to kill or eat me, including those sirens. I just assumed every monster and demon hated humans."

"Mmm, well, you're mostly right. Demons hate humans, but for them, it's more of a superiority complex involving disdain for weaklings. Monsters don't hate humans, but many do love the taste of human meat."

"That's comforting."

"Right?"

Several entryways come and go, and Amelia's eyes meander around inquisitively. I decide to ask another question. "So, not to pry, but, when those sirens attacked me, you called me your slave. Why?"

She blinks innocently. "Oh, you know how it is! Monsters and demons fear me, so if word gets out that you're my servant, nobody will dare to touch you."

"Why? How powerful are you for your name to cause the reactions I've seen?"

Amelia's smile falters, but she forces enthusiasm into her voice. "Very powerful! I'll have you know that I killed Satan! He used to be the First Emperor until I ripped his soul from his body! Now no demon wants to mess with me."

"Whoa. Seriously? That's... that's insane, Amelia!" I gawk at her, even as a look of hesitation enters her eyes. "I don't know how powerful Satan was, but, like, his name is Satan! Wouldn't that make him the most powerful demon of all time? And you killed him!"

My mind erupts with the possibilities. "Satan the Devil, the great serpent, the one who tricked the first woman in the Garden of Eden. It's hard to believe he existed once. Does that mean the creator you mentioned was the one from the Bible? What about Jesus? Mary, the mother of Christ? What about-"

"Jason, stop, please." Amelia pauses mid-stride and comes to a halt. Her breath catches in her throat. "Can we change the subject? I didn't kill Satan because of some moral obligation, or because I was trying to save the world. I had my reasons, and I don't like to remember them."

It occurs to me that I've been babbling without considering her feelings. My lips move, but my brain isn't keeping up.

Blaarjiim crosses his arms. "Satan hurt my queen. He took someone precious from her, and now she can never see them again. Please show restraint for once."

"Sorry. I didn't mean to dredge up bad memories."

We continue in silence for a very long time. I walk slightly ahead of Amelia, leading the way with my mental map.

Left turns become right turns. We pass various rooms, including one where I can hear orcs laughing in the distance, bashing something squishy with blunt objects. A male voice screams in agony. I try not to think about it.

At one point, a dozen imps come screaming down the hallway, their foot-tall forms and blood-red skin standing out compared to anything I've seen before. I only recognize them as imps due to my knowledge of mythology.

After they pass us, I glance back. None of them pay Amelia or I the slightest heed, and she ignores them as well.

"Those imps didn't even look at us. Why not?"

Amelia pulls on a strand of her long hair. "Imps are the lowest ranking demons. They're extremely unintelligent and rank lower than slaves until they grow into grunts. You're to pay them no mind since they have no status. Most imps are considered lower than humans on a hierarchal basis."

"What do you mean by 'lowest ranking?'"

Hoarhiim appears once again. "I can answer that, Jason. Compared to the other sentient species, demons are the most meritocratic. All demons are born weak and defenseless and must fight to improve their status. If a demon gains enough power, they can mutate into a new form, which typically varies based on their personality. The various classes of demons are known as Imps, Grunts, Lords, Barons, Dukes, and Emperors. Each rank is monolithically more powerful than those preceding."

I nod along to his explanation. Suddenly, the realization of Hoarhiim's words hits me. "Wait, but didn't Amelia kill Satan?! You said he was the First Emperor!"

Grunting, Blaarjiim narrows his eyes. "Yes, good, you fit the puzzle pieces together. However, let's not bring up that mess again."

An hour passes, and finally, we arrive in a room I can at last call familiar. Two massive doors rise into the air. I recognize them as the doors I saw while first fleeing that statue monster.

"We're close. My Cryopod room should be at the end of the hall."

Amelia yawns. "Oh, good. I'm feeling a little sleepy from all this walking. The Labyrinth could use an interior decorator, too. I get all turned around since everything looks the same!"

That's the point of a Labyrinth, I think to myself.

We start walking down the hall, and sooner than I expected, we arrive at a familiar door. It's wide open, and a shiver goes down my spine.

It's the statue room. The statue isn't there.

There's another door on the opposite wall. Based on my mental map's blinking indicator, my Cryopod is just inside.

Amelia turns to look at me. "Why are you trembling?"

"Unpleasant memories. Let's get this over with."

Now that I'm here, I suddenly realize I don't want to do this at all. The terror of fleeing this room is fresh in my mind. I had no idea where I was or what I was up against, and in fact, things are worse than I expected. It wasn't just a statue, but possibly a powerful demon chasing after me. It, quite literally, wanted to devour me.

Amelia, without any hesitation, walks into the statue room and looks around. "Huh. Neat."

"What is?"

I follow her eyes as I enter. She gazes up at the square hole in the ceiling. I can feel a faint gust of air coming from it.

"Dunno. I've never seen a hole like that before."

Behind me, a shifting of air makes my body flinch.

A voice speaks up.

"Well, well, well. If it isn't the Black Witch."

I pivot on my heel and jump back in terror as I spot two demons standing behind me! I haven't a clue how they snuck up on me, but based on their sizes, they must be powerful!

The first demon is an old man. Standing perhaps an inch shorter than me, at 6'1", he appears to be the one who first spoke. The old man leans on a walking cane with a glowing blue orb at its top. His clothes are little more than plain black robes, and his grey hair is stringy and neck-length, resembling a mop. Despite his appearance, he holds himself up with a certain regality, as though he's someone of significant standing among demons.

Beside him is a second demon, a younger, taller male who seems to be around thirty years old, though his age is probably much higher than that. The younger one wears a perfectly ironed and tailored black suit, and a yellow undershirt that stands out, contrasting with the rest of his appearance and drawing my eyes to his chest. It looks like a suit I'd expect someone in the Italian Mob to wear. His slicked-down black hair and overall appearance give him the aura of someone in control, someone who values appearance above all else.

Both of them have deep red eyes and skin, two horns protruding through their hair, and pointy ears exactly like the imps I saw before. The younger demon's horns, however, are much smaller than his senior's.

The older demon ignores my fearful reaction, and both of them set their eyes only on Amelia. "Black Witch, I'm talking to you."

I quickly turn to Amelia, only to be puzzled by the look on her face. Her expression is that of a deer caught in the headlights. It almost seems as though she's having a panic attack, as her lip quivers and her body trembles. Just as I start to wonder what has her on edge, she quickly straightens up, and her usual smile roars back.

"Oh my GOSH! Agares! You startled me! Don't sneak up on us like that!" She lunges forward, arms outspread as if to hug the old man, but both demons quickly take a step back, and the old man, apparently named Agares, lunges his hand forward to stop her movement. He palms her forehead and lightly deflects her momentum just enough that her attempt to hug him fails, but he appears fearful of using too much physical contact.

"Let's not be too friendly, B-Black Witch." Agares gulps. A bead of sweat glides down his face. "It's been a long time since you roamed these halls like the fearsome predator you are."

Amelia glares daggers up at him and crosses her arms. "Oh, phooey! That's no way to talk to a friend."

"Friend?" The younger demon shoots a look of concern at Agares. "Since when were you friends with the Black Witch?"

"Quiet, Beelzebub." Agares smoothes his robes with his free hand. "Black Witch, it seems you've managed to escape your prison. I've heard about the carnage already following in your wake. The Council demands to know what your intentions are."

Amelia slips back over to my side and rolls her eyes. "Council, shmouncil. Were you always this cold, grandpa? I thought we had a special relationship. Why aren't you calling me by my name? Afraid you'll look bad in front of that cute trainee?"

Agares shifts his foot and glances at me for a second before returning to Amelia. "Evasive as always, I see. Please, Amelia, answer the question. Now that you've loosed yourself upon the Labyrinth, what horrors await us?"

Amelia waves her hand nonchalantly at the old man. "Oh geez, I haven't done anything wrong yet. Let's cut the interrogation and catch up! I'm dying to know what's changed while I was asleep!" She pauses to crinkle her nose.

The old man sighs slowly. "More than you might think. For example, we have a new First Emperor. It took a while, but after Joan put you to rest, we learned-"

Before Agares can finish his sentence, Amelia jerks her palm up, silencing him. I glance down and notice the smile on her face has cracked, and now has a maniacal edge to it. "What did you say? Did you just use... her name in front of me?"

Blaarjiim shakes his head slowly, and mutters under his breath, "Oh, lord. Agares pushed the Joan button."

"Shouldn't have done that," Hoarhiim adds.

Agares swallows audibly. "Well, ah, I didn't realize you were still... sore. I apologize."

Amelia grinds her teeth together, creating an unpleasant sound that makes my eye twitch. "You think an apology will save you? Don't you dare mention her name in front of me. I'll tear you apart, you worthless wrinkled blood-skin."

The way she bites off the last word, as well as the look of disdain on Beelzebub's face, tells me it's a slur that demons despise.

Beelzebub takes a step forward. "The nerve. Duke of Reptiles, give the order, and I'll burn her to a crisp. You won't be able to scrape what's left off the floor."

Agares reaches his hand out to block his junior. "No, Beelzebub. She's the one who slew Emperor Satan. You haven't a chance. Besides, she's immune to fire."

"Listen to grandpa, Skippy," Amelia says, biting her words off. "I don't want to hurt a pretty face like yours."

The four of us stare at each other for several long seconds. Amelia and Agares lock their gazes, but he's the one to back down. "Devils. I'm too old for this. Amelia, I am sorry. I did not mean to offend you. Please accept my apology."

He bows his head slightly, but also reaches behind Beelzebub and forces the younger demon's head down. Beelzebub doesn't appear thrilled but also doesn't resist his mentor's command.

Amelia exhales, then composes herself. "Fine, whatever. It's not like I cared or anything, idiot. I'll answer your question from earlier. My goal is to find the one who locked me away and pay her back in full. I couldn't care less about demons unless they get in my way. Is that answer suitable?"

Agares raises his head. The sweat on his face is more pronounced than before. "Oh... you wish to- to find her? Ah... that will be a problem."

"A problem? How so?" Amelia smiles politely again, but her expression wields an edge like the side of a knife.

"Well, you see... the one who imprisoned you, Joan... She died."

Amelia pales. "What?! Died?! How? When?"

Agares flicks his eyes to his junior. "I'm sorry, Amelia. After her battle with you, she lacked the energy to continue living. We're not sure what happened, but at some point, she vanished off the radar. We don't know where she died, only that the Oracles couldn't sense her life force anymore."

Amelia nods, and I notice her jaw quivering. "O-oh. I see. So, then, if she's gone... I have..."

"No goal? No plans? Yes, I'd imagine that to be the case." Agares reaches up and loosens his collar. He appears very concerned about her going on a rampage. "Perhaps you should take a vacation. There are plenty of souls worth reaping outside of the Labyrinth's confines. Despite how powerful you are, the Council has made it clear that if you continue your past ways, they will assemble to stop you. That includes me, and I'm not keen to die just yet."

Amelia nods, but it's almost as if she can't hear him. Her eyes are unfocused. She looks at his chest, and not at his eyes. "I see."

Beelzebub notices her shift and smirks. "Perhaps you've overestimated her, Duke of Reptiles. I can't see any reason a monster like her would travel with an aesthetically disadvantaged human such as this one." He gestures at me and looks away coyly.

I frown. "Hey! Are you calling me ugly?"

Beelzebub twists his face into a facade of mock indignation. "Devils, no! I would never pass judgment on someone's appearance. I'm merely noting a fact."

Agares chortles. "Now now, Beelzebub. Let's not be rude to the scrawny one. I am curious though, Black Witch, who is this boy? Why does he hold the orb of light? I thought you wielded both."

Amelia doesn't miss a beat. "He's holding it for me. Besides, I hardly need the power of both orbs to handle the likes of some wrinkled old demons or a few hundred monsters."

"Are you threatening us?" Agares moves his cane forward as if to put up a weak barrier between himself and Amelia. "I'm an ancient old man, now. I hardly have the strength to fight an energetic young thing like yourself."

Amelia sighs. "I'm not going to attack demons, okay? If demons die, it'll be because they thought I was an easy target. You'd best warn them to give me a wide berth."

"Fair enough," Agares says. "I must say though, what you did to the Riders of Sheol was gruesome. By the time we investigated their disappearance, the bodies had nearly turned to ash. I was not aware that flame manipulation was one of your powers."

Beelzebub bristles at Agares' observation. "Yes, do tell, Black Witch. I am considered the foremost expert on flame manipulation and possess the title 'Lord of Fire,' but even I could not have unleashed such raw, devastating power upon that room. How did you do it?"

Amelia's smile weakens. It occurs to me that I should let her do the talking here. I don't want the demons to lock their sights on me. "Oh, those nasty orcs? They attacked me, so I retaliated. As you can imagine, I was in quite a bad mood once I escaped that damned statue. Perhaps if you had released me sooner, they might still walk the realm of the living."

Her words carry a threat with them, and Agares doesn't miss it. "I understand. We'll let it slide, just this once. They were only monsters, after all. Had they been demons, we might have had something to say."

Agares's shoulders relax slightly, but Beelzebub slowly turns to eyeball me, and his eyes rise to the Crown on my head. "Black Witch, you didn't answer my mentor's question. Why is this human with you? I doubt you've left him alive for conversation's sake, and that treasure on his head looks quite valuable."

Amelia stiffens. She doesn't want them to know about my Wordsmithing just yet, or at least that's the impression she's given me so far. However, she laughs suddenly, her voice lilting cutely. "Why, this one here is a mighty warrior! I procured him from a human settlement, and now he serves as my bodyguard! Do you want to face him in combat, Beelzebub? Perhaps you'd prefer-"

The old man cuts her off. "Aye, aye. Enough of those lies. The only human strong enough to be a bodyguard for you would be a Hero, and you're certainly not one to ally with them. If you're keeping him around for a snack, just say so. Seven Hells. Beelzebub, come. I've heard enough."

The younger one doesn't look as convinced as his senior, but he doesn't offer a retort. "Take care, then, humans. And for you, boy, don't worry about your face. All humans have the same malady afflicting their looks. You aren't special."

If you say so, Blood-skin, I want to say. Instead, I stick my tongue out at him. It probably just makes me look ridiculous.

The two demons turn and walk out the door. Eventually, they fade from our sight. Amelia and I stare silently for several minutes before I finally release the breath I've been holding.

"That was tense. I'm impressed though, Amelia. You even have Dukes like Agares running scared."

Amelia doesn't reply. Glancing down, I notice she's still staring at their afterimages. Her body begins to tremble.

"Amelia? Are you okay?"

Her lip trembles. "I... I..."

"Is something wrong?"

Slowly, the little girl kneels down, wraps her arms around her legs, and rests her head on her knee. She starts rocking back and forth, and a tear squeezes out. "I was... I was terrified, Jason."

What the hell? Did I miss something?

I crouch down slightly to get on her level. Standing over a crying girl makes me uncomfortable. "What do you mean? Why were you scared?"

She takes a breath, but her throat catches. "Jason... I'm not- I'm not what they think. I'm not the... the Black Witch anymore. I can't be. I'm not." She leans toward me and rests her shoulder against my side. "Joan's dead... she's dead. I can't even get revenge. After what she did to me, I can't even..."

Now I'm beyond confused. Amelia seems scared of something, but also angry, and a bunch of other emotions I can't piece together. I'm not an emotional guy, and understanding a woman's heart is way out of my league, especially when I barely know her at all.

Blaarjiim appears, but he only transmits himself to my mind. "Jason, after you used your fire spell and Amelia knocked you out to disable your magic, she put you to rest while she and I left to do some training. We took the time to evaluate our power levels. All I can say is that the might my queen once possessed has dropped off dramatically. She probably lacks the fighting power to fend off a Lord, let alone a Duke, Emperor, or the entirety of the Council."

"What? Are you serious?"

He nods. "Very. Right now, the only reason the demons haven't torn my queen apart is due to their ancient dread of her power. They don't know how weak she presently is. However, she killed Satan, the First Emperor of their kind. If the Demon Council members were to learn of my lady's paltry energy levels, they'd tear her to pieces, and you as well. Notoriety is her only ally, and if it fades, we're all doomed."

The realization of the situation dawns on me, bringing an ache to my chest. What if I'd pissed Beelzebub off and he attacked me? We could have died. He was only a Lord, but he could have eviscerated us, to say nothing of the Duke of Reptiles.

"Amelia, why are you weaker, now? Did sitting in the statue rot your muscles or something?"

She wipes her eyes, and rises to a standing position, having shaken off her earlier anguish. "It's... it's not like that. Jason, I think I need to be honest, now. The one who I fought in the past- her name was Joan. Joan of Arc. She was a legendary Hero, one whose power towered toward the heavens. She defeated me soundly, but instead of killing me, chose to lock me inside that statue with her magic."

"Joan of Arc? No way." My eyes shift a little as memories of books from my childhood appear in my mind.

Jeanne d'Arc, a warrior woman born during the 1400's in France. She was nicknamed the Battle Maiden, the Maid of Orleans, and led many skirmishes against the English. At some point, she was captured, tortured, interrogated, and burned at the stake under the pretense of witchcraft, among other charges.

My memory is a little spotty, but I remember the basics. Could Amelia have somehow fought her? Impossible. The Church executed Joan at the tender young age of nineteen. There isn't a chance Amelia battled her, given Joan's life was over in the blink of an eye.

Yeah, it must have been someone else: a copycat, or someone with the same name.

Amelia shudders. "I don't like to think about it, Jason. After battling Satan, I felt invincible. The demons shrank back in fear everywhere I walked. Earth was long-since dead, and none dared challenge me. I was neither happy nor sad, but merely content to go about my life, especially once I found Blaarjiim."

She continues. "It was then that I encountered Joan. I chanced upon a relic hidden in the Labyrinth. I don't know who put it there, but it caught my eye. When I touched it, she appeared. The Hero sprang from the weapon and declared me a servant of evil. She began fighting me, and I quickly realized her Holy Energy was unlike anything I'd fought before. Joan-"

Amelia stops mid-sentence and clutches her chest. "No, no, I don't want to talk about it. It was too awful. I couldn't defend myself, I couldn't flee, and she wouldn't even let me beg for mercy. She was a heartless, vicious monster."

I listen in silence, but Amelia trails off and doesn't continue. "I see. For a 'Hero,' she sounds despicable. I'm sorry you had to suffer through that. Perhaps she believed herself an agent of justice, but over time, she became a killing machine."

To my surprise, Amelia reaches out and wraps her arms around me, then buries her head in my chest. "You believe me, don't you? She was awful. She hurt me in ways that would make you shudder. I didn't deserve that! I'm a good girl!"

Amelia's sudden closeness startles me. I'm not used to anyone suddenly touching me, so I cautiously wrap my arms around her and nod. "Yeah. A good girl, that's right."

All the while, I wonder to myself how true that is. If Amelia is a 'good girl,' then why are demons terrified of her? Why is she such a powerful magician? Why does she care so little about killing and death? What about those monsters she killed when she saved me? Would a good girl act like a violent psychopath?

Perhaps it's just self-defense. I don't know Amelia well, or what life she's lead. I don't know where she comes from, her desires, or much of anything about her.

I don't know her at all.

After a minute, Amelia pulls away and lowers her eyes. "For devil's sake... I'm a mess. Sorry. I didn't mean to throw this on you all of a sudden."

"It's fine, Amelia. We're friends. Friends are there for each other when they're feeling blue, right?"

She jerks her head up. "What? Friends? We're- I mean, you think of me like a... a friend?"

"Well, yeah. Why not? I freed you, you saved my life, and now you've told me about your past and what haunts you. If we're not friends, then what are we?"

The little girl pauses for a moment. "I... I don't know. I've just- well, aside from Blaarjiim, I've n-never had a friend before."

"Never? Not even once?"

Her expression darkens. "Well. Yes. Once. Satan took him from me."

I nod. "Right. You did mention that before."

She smiles cutely, and while the expression is a little forced, I'm glad to see her stop crying. I stand up and stretch my legs.

"Look, whatever happened, it's in the past. You have to look to the future, Amelia. I come from a place that I can never return. I'm here alone, just as you are. Let's stick together and help each other out. Whaddya say?"

Her smile widens. "Yes. I'd... I'd like that, Jason."

The two of us share a moment of bliss. For the first time since I arrived in this Hell, I feel more than just a tenuous connection to someone. Her past doesn't dictate where she's going, nor does mine. We can work together and give each other a helping hand.

We aren't alone anymore.

Tik tik tik.

From the ceiling, an odd sound catches my attention.

Tik tik tik.

Amelia's smile vanishes. Mine does too.

We both raise our heads to look at that square hole in the ceiling. The draft of air from before gently caresses my face, but now there's something else there.

A pair of beady eyes gazes at us from above.

Oh fantastic, another new friend.

This is Agares.

This is Agares too, with a slightly incorrect design, but he does look wicked cool.

This is Agares, but an outdated character design.

This is Beelzebub.

This is Agares and Beelzebub, but with some flashier art!

Part 008: Size Matters Not

"Yeek!" Amelia yelps in fright and jumps behind me as a tiny, green creature falls from the ceiling. I flinch as well, thinking it's a giant spider, only to quickly realize it isn't.

I hate spiders.

A bipedal lizard, perhaps eight inches tall, smashes into the ground with the weight of a four-hundred pound man, nearly knocking me off my feet. It stands in the middle of the room and faces us, a look of anger in its eyes. From above, the pitter-pattering of more feet reaches our ears, and soon another lizard crashes into the ground, and another, and then a few dozen more follow. The Labyrinth trembles and quakes as each lizard strikes the floor.

Eventually, around forty of the lizard-men stand at the ready, tiny swords, shields, and armor raised for combat. I can't help but find them adorable, given how itty-bitty they are. However, I don't dare reach out to pet them, since they might chop my fingers off.

The lizard at the front, a red-scaled fellow, stands apart from his green-colored peers. He takes a step forward and raises his sword.

"Fleshbag! Intruder! How dare you intrude upon this holy domain!" He squeaks at us in an amusingly high-pitched voice, causing Amelia to smile.

"Oh, hello, little guy," I say. I drop to my knees to get a better look at him, but surprisingly, none of the lizards even flinch at my giant form dropping to their height. "Uh, is there a problem?"

Amelia leans over my back and eyeballs the lizards. She overcomes her initial fear instantly, then shoves her face down to their level to get a better look. "Oh my gosh! You're all too cute! I could gobble you up!"

The lizards recoil in alarm. One of the green ones steps forward and yells out, "King Ghidorah! The frilled one wishes to devour us! Orders?"

I raise an eyebrow. Seriously? His name is King Ghidorah? What possessed this guy to name himself after a famous Japanese monster?

The red one, King Ghidorah, bangs his sword on his shield. "Show no hesitation! The enemy will crash upon our bodies like waves on the shore!"

I quickly jump in before the misunderstanding gets out of hand. "I apologize, but my friend Amelia simply meant, uh... she meant she wants to kiss you! She loves kissing lizards!"

Nodding quickly, I shoot a grin at Amelia to hint that she should agree, but instead, she glares at me in disgust.

"Pass."

So much for that, I groan inwardly.

The lizard king examines us for a few moments. "Hmph! Lower your weapons, soldiers. These fleshbags seem tame compared to the others. Weak, too. I do not believe they mean us any harm."

"Weak?" Amelia's expression darkens, but she shakes her annoyance off after a moment. "Did we do something wrong? Why are you getting in our way?"

The king nods. "Aye, you did. We are the Children of Marie, the servants of the Greatest Prophet! Verily, she spake to us and told us to keep watch over this room. For, you see, the inner chamber holds a magical container, one she told us that would expel a most remarkable individual. Anyone who dares encroach upon this holy land must pay the price! In lieu of your ignorance, I will demonstrate my benevolence and let you off with a warning."

Amelia glances at me. I sigh. "Really, huh? A container. You don't say."

King Ghidorah nods sagely. "Aye. Our solemn duty is to guard the entrance to the container, alongside the Prison Warden, Gressil. Marie, our wise and courageous savior, has told us not to allow any intruders inside. We first assumed you wished to enter, hence our hostility."

Ghidorah's right-hand subordinate, a noticeably taller lizard than his leader, taps the king's shoulder. "Hurgh. My liege, where is Two-Heads? Was he not supposed to station a watchman here? He left the chamber unguarded!"

The king rubs his cheek. "Aye, Kar. Unusual. Gressil is not one to depart his post without giving notice. Perhaps he left for a moment to inspect the other cells in Faith's End. We will have to look into this breach of security."

A moment passes. Kar furrows his brow. "Turtle! Frilled one! I must ask why you have entered so deep into the Labyrinth. Do you not know the horrors that await? Wandering down the wrong hall will surely bring a swift end upon you."

I suddenly realize that he thinks we've stumbled into the Labyrinth by accident. "No, no, you guys are misunderstanding us. Uh, remember that magical container? I used to be inside it. Now I'm not."

All the lizards stare at me in silence. The king scratches his head. "Fleshbag, forgive my impudence, but... are you daft? Who could believe such a blatant lie? Marie has decreed that the one inside the container will not emerge for another forty-five centuries!"

Amelia shakes her head. "It's true! Jason came out of his cryptobob, and now he's here!"

The lizards share a look of unease with each other. Kar squeaks in a way that implies he's clearing his throat. "My liege, perhaps we should open the great door to check."

"Nonsense. Marie would say that we've been too kind and trusting. The fleshbags must be lying, though to what end, I do not know."

"King Ghidorah," I begin, acting as respectfully as I can of the tiny little thing in front of me, "Perhaps I should speak with Marie. Maybe I could clear things up with-"

"Tsh! Not a chance!" The King hisses, and his little tongue snakes out of his mouth. "I won't allow you to bother her with trifles!" He pauses for barely a second before turning back to his warriors. "Open the great door! We shall inspect the icy container for ourselves!"

Amelia sighs. "This is going to be a long day."

We stand silently and watch as several of the tiny little lizards walk over to the door leading to my Cryopod room. They glance back over their shoulders at us and whisper conspiratorially, but I don't catch what they're saying. Secretly, I think to myself, I wonder if I could enhance my hearing with Wordsmithing?

Of course, since King Ghidorah is watching, I wouldn't do such a thing. I don't care that much about the opinions of the little critters.

The group of lizardmen lines up against the bottom of the door. In unison, all of them shove their weight against it. I start to speak up and say, "Do you want us to help with that? It's kinda heav-" but I stop mid-sentence as the door scrapes along the ground and cracks open. My eyes widen as I watch the itty-bitty lizards heave the several-hundred-pound stone door open like it's their day job. I can only assume they must be strong like ants, with a higher muscle-to-size density than any human.

Amelia, seeing them open the door, whispers under her breath, "Oh my goodness."

Hoarhiim and Blaarjiim watch in fascination as a dozen of the lizards march into the room, and soon they disappear from our sight. I squint to try and follow them with my eyes, but I can't make out a thing.

King Ghidorah whispers to his top henchman, Kar, and the two of them have a slightly heated discussion, likely about disturbing the sanctity of my Cryopod room, but I can only guess.

To make conversation, I decide to ask a question. "So, you guys are Children of Marie? Most monsters hate humans, but you don't seem like the others I've seen. Why is that?"

King Ghidorah looks irritated that I interrupted him, but Kar jumps in with a reply. "Our Mother is a fleshbag, just like you. It was she who saved our species from going extinct. We collectively owe her a life-debt!"

"She did? That's great! Was she in one of the cryopods too?"

Kar shakes his head. "Nay. Mother is an immortal human, one who has unlocked the power of the blood-machines. Her body neither ages nor decays. She is the most brilliant human who has ever lived!"

Ghidorah crosses his arms. "Aye, that she is. Our Mother is a human who has broken the limits of her mortal body. Her ability to foretell the future is unparalleled. She once spoke of an era of peace and balance, and we now live in that time!"

Amelia doesn't buy it. "Sounds like a bunch of crap to me. Nobody can see the future. If they could, the demons wouldn't have taken over."

"Perhaps." King Ghidorah glances back to check on the lizardmen who went to look at the Cryopod, but they haven't returned yet. He returns his gaze to me. "Tell me, young one, do you believe in fate?"

I shake my head, perhaps a little too quickly. "No. I control my destiny. If fate exists, then life has no meaning."

Kar grins a toothy, crocodilian smile. "So quick to answer."

"Aye. The fleshbag believes himself smarter than our Mother." Ghidorah winks at Kar knowingly. "But young one, if you believe that you control your destiny, do you also acknowledge that reality exists outside of your control? Perhaps events happen that will push you toward a future you could never anticipate?"

I nod. "Yeah, that happened to me when I woke up in Hell."

Ghidorah's expression of contentment fades. "Everything happens for a reason. The demons may rule the Labyrinth, but there is always a higher power. I have little doubt that we met here today for a reason. You are special."

"Uh, alright, I guess."

Before I have time to ponder hisGhidorah's words, one of the lizardmen skitters back into the room on all fours. He cries out in alarm, "King Ghidorah! The magical container! It has lost its light! Nobody is inside!"

"Well, well, well, very interesting." Ghidorah says. He waits until all of the scouts return, then glances at me, curiosity in his eyes. "Perhaps you are telling the truth. Fleshbag- no, human, tell me your name, as well as that of your friend."

I nod. "My name is Jason Leonardo Hiro, and this girl is Amelia."

"Amelia Greyheart," she adds. I widen my eyes, surprised she told him that. I didn't even know Amelia's last name until just now.

"Jason and Amelia. I see." The king looks at her, then at me. "I think that soon you will soon find Marie's prophetic abilities to be quite authentic."

A minute later, Amelia and I step into my cryopod's chamber, led by King Ghidorah. We both keep our gait slow so that we don't trample the teeny-tiny lizards running ahead of our feet.

Amelia raises an eyebrow as she spots my cryopod. "That's the thing that froze you? It looks suffocating."

"I wouldn't say it was a pleasant experience, but I only felt like I was inside for a minute or two. I've had worse experiences in my life."

Truthfully, I was in the Cryopod for such a brief time that it's barely worth mentioning. Rebecca, one of the scientists at Cryotek, told me the freezing and thawing process would happen faster than the snap of a finger. She wasn't kidding.

King Ghidorah stops before the cryopod and scrutinizes it. "Hmm, yes, I see. Hmm. There can be no doubt, then. You are, indeed, the human frozen inside the magic container. Our Mother will be pleased to hear from you."

"Oh? Should I speak to her, then?"

"Nay." The king shakes his head immediately. "Mother is much too busy for something like that. We will seek her out, and when the time is right, we will put you in contact with her. There is no rush. If you are indeed the child of prophecy, then you will only grow stronger and gain more power as time goes on."

Amelia shifts next to me. She suddenly looks uncomfortable, but when she sees me looking at her, she quickly turns away, avoiding my gaze.

What's her deal?

Whatever. It's not my business. I kneel a bit lower so I can see the king more easily. "You say I'll grow more powerful. Why do you assume that?"

"Because our Mother has predicted your rise to power! Lady Marie has never given a false portent in all the years she's lived."

Ghidorah's tongue slips out and flicks at the air. "However, while I know you will someday be a warrior for the oppressed, I won't allow you to go alone. Kar! You will protect these two with your life."

At the king's words, the tallest lizardman bows. "As you order, my king. I will protect the Turtle and Frilled One with my life."

I squirm slightly. "Um, really, it's no trouble. I, uh, I don't see how a tiny little guy like you could protect me. Are you going to crawl up someone's pant leg if they jump at me?"

"Jason!" Amelia backhands my shoulder lightly. "Rude!"

Hoarhiim chuckles. "You have much to learn, Jason. While you cannot yet sense spiritual energy, the rest of us can. The King of the Lizards is nearly on par with a Demon Duke, and the warrior, Kar, is still far mightier than any human."

Blaarjiim chimes in, "Show respect, mortal. Were you to anger the king, he could tear you apart in an instant!"

"Jeez, okay," I mutter, rubbing my shoulder. "I just figured with Amelia here; the lizards couldn't possibly do much to protect us."

"Size hardly matters, ignorant one," Kar squeaks. He raises his claws into the air. "Allies, lend me your energy so that I might protect these foolish fleshbags."

Amelia glares at the little guy. "Hey! Don't lump me in with this bozo!"

We watch as all the lizardmen raise their claws and send faint shimmers of light into the air. Each tiny orb condenses into a small ball of energy above Kar. He lowers it into his mouth and swallows, then burps, satisfied.

"I am the last living warrior of the Crocodiles, tiny fleshbags. So long as I draw breath, no harm will come to you."

For once, I'm a little awed by him. While I can't exactly make anything out, his scales shimmer slightly, as if he's shed a layer of skin to increase his power. Maybe he's as strong as everyone says.

A short while later, the king dusts himself off. "Kar, you will make the matriarch of our clan proud. These two do not know the path they must take; so you will show them the way. Guide them with vigilance, and stay on the alert for enemies. Everything depends on you."

"My king," Kar says, lowering his head. "Send word to Mother at once. She must know of this turtle and his exit from the container."

"Aye. Make your people proud. We will handle the rest." Ghidorah pulls away from Kar and looks up at Amelia and I. "I will personally contact Marie. You two must leave now. We will take the magic container and bring it to our Mother."

I nod at the king, but questions flood my mind. _Is Marie the only person left from my era? Are we the only people still alive who remember Earth?

Kar saunters over to us. "Turtle, let us go. I am eager to assist you on your journey."

I have more questions I want to ask, but they feel meaningless now. Not only can I never return to Earth, but I'm isolated, cut off from anyone else who lived a life similar to mine. I now must wander deeper into the realm of the demons if I hope to accomplish anything.

"Sure, Kar. And King Ghidorah... thank you."

"Take care, young one." The king turns and walks away, bringing the other lizardmen with him.

A few minutes later, Amelia and I step outside the room where once a statue overlooked my cryopod chamber. A faint pitter-patter of Kar's squishy feet slapping against the floor is the only other thing we can hear.

Amelia rubs her nose. "I wonder how they'll get your Cryopod out. It's pretty big."

"Dunno."

She continues. "You must be pretty excited to talk to Marie. After all, she's from your era."

"I suppose."

Silence. I glance over to see Amelia scowling at me. "Is there something bugging you, or what? I'm just trying to be nice, idiot!"

I shake the fog from my head. "No, sorry, I didn't mean to be rude. I have a lot on my mind. I don't even know what we should do next."

Amelia's expression softens. She stares ahead into the darkness. "I don't know either, Jason. Up until now, all I could think of was exacting revenge on Joan, but now that I can't get my revenge..."

Hoarhiim clears his throat. "Since neither of you has anything better to do, why not try exploring the Labyrinth."

Blaarjiim chuckles. "Brother, I have a better idea. At the end of this hall are two giant doors. We saw them when we were traveling here. Do you know where they lead?"

Hoarhiim slowly shakes his head. "Nay. Where?"

"Heh heh heh... those doors are a gateway to the center of the Labyrinth. Come now, mortal, don't tell me your mental map hasn't picked up on it yet. Have a look."

Wordlessly, I activate the Crown of Solomon and force my mental map to appear. It takes me a minute or so, but I'm able to piece together where Amelia and I are, along with the room Blaarjiim mentioned.

Ah! It really is the center of the Labyrinth! "What's inside?" I ask Blaarjiim.

The shadowy figure shrugs. "I haven't a clue, having never been inside. Why not travel there and find out?"

His words stir up a feeling inside me. I want to do something, but I don't know what! I can't just sit around and mope, and whatever is behind those doors must be important. As a human, I always find myself drawn to patterns and things that appear significant. If those doors lead to the center of the Labyrinth, they must be guarding something of incredible importance.

Amelia yawns. "It sounds more interesting than just standing around. I say we go check it out!"

I glance down at the tiny reptile. "What about you, Kar?"

He nods. "I will follow you wherever you go."

Alrighty, then. A goal. I can dig it.

Amelia trudges along between Kar and me, both of their bodies creating an amusing staircase of rapidly escalating height to the top of my head. Both of them chatter about various subjects, and for the most part, I avoid joining their conversation.

Amelia lilts her voice. "Why don't you let me pick you up? You can ride on my shoulder!"

Kar shakes his head. "My apologies, frilled one. My body is far heavier than you might imagine."

"I'm pretty strong, though! Aw, c'mon, how much could you possibly weigh?"

"It is not polite to ask someone about their age or weight."

"That's only if you're asking a girl! Pleeeease?"

"I would prefer not."

"Just one little ride on my shoulder! That's all I'm asking! It'll look super cute!"

"I am the last warrior of my species; a proud vanguard of the ancient ways. I am not 'cute.'"

"Aw, jeez! Jason! Jason!"

I blink my eyes and recover from my daze. "Huh? What?"

"Help me convince Kar to ride on my shoulder! You know you want to see it too!" Amelia tugs at my jacket pleadingly, and I sigh.

Their conversation is grating. I just found out that there's another human alive, one from my Earth just like me. I can't stop thinking about the questions I want to ask her, given she's been living among the demons for so long. Instead, I have to walk along and listen to Amelia bug this pesky crocodile.

Amelia continues to pull at my jacket. "Pleeease? He won't listen to reason!"

I pull my arm away. "Amelia, stop pestering Kar. He doesn't want to ride on your shoulder. It's not polite to irritate your friends."

She pulls away from me and pouts. "What an ass."

I groan inwardly.

The door is a half-hour away down this loooong tunnel, and that's if we run. It'll take an hour at our current pace. Why does it have to be so far? Who made this stupid path anyway? If only I could speed things up a bit...

As that thought crosses my mind, a flash of inspiration strikes!

Heh, I'm a genius.

"Amelia, I'll be going on ahead. You two catch up when you can, alright?"

Amelia and Kar both glance at me questioningly, but I don't feel like explaining myself.

If this works, I will become a comic-book superhero.

"Speed!"

With a single word, I turn to look at Amelia. She freezes on the spot, as does Kar. The world around me grinds to a halt, preventing Amelia and Kar from speaking. After several long seconds, I smile, noticing Amelia hasn't blinked yet.

It seems that my guess was correct. I can speed my body up like the Flash. Now I can dash over to the golden doors and enjoy some alone time while these two work out their squabbles.

Piece of cake.

Turning toward the hallway before me, I take a step forward, and pain rips across my entire body.

I plunge into darkness as my entire body explodes into a puddle of gore.

The endless abyss swallows me whole.

"-son! Jason! Oh my gosh!"

I wake up with the taste of blood in my mouth. Everything hurts. It's a familiar sensation, like what I felt when I blew the doors off Solomon's Tomb. This time, however, the pain concentrates at the front of my body.

My face is broken. I can't move a muscle. I can't open my eyes. Both of my arms are bent in ways that shouldn't be possible, and I can't feel my legs at all.

Footsteps. Moving quickly.

Amelia rushes over to me. I can barely hear anything, and I have no idea where she is.

"Foolish turtle." Kar chastises me. "So much for the prophecy. He'll be dead in a few minutes."

"No, I have healing magic. I'll fix him up." Amelia quickly replies. I feel my body shift slightly, and she mutters some words in a language that the Crown tells me is likely Latin.

After a moment, the pain begins anew. My bones smash together like boulders crushing a wooden house, and I whimper in pain as my body pushes itself back into one piece. Not ten seconds later, my eyes finally open, allowing me to take a pained gasp of breath.

"Huhk!"

Kar's squeaky voice is the next thing I hear. "Frilled one, that was a most impressive feat, especially for a fleshbag. Few can perform the level of healing you just did. Where did you obtain that ability?"

I glance at Amelia as she stands up. Her face turns into a bucket of nerves once she meets my gaze. "Uh, hum, well- I knew this lady, and she taught me how to use her powers. It's nothing special. Jason has the same healing ability."

"Mmm." Kar walks over to my face and squints at me, but he looks unconvinced. "If you say so."

A minute passes, and I cautiously pull myself to my feet. I'm even more exhausted than the last time Amelia healed me. Her regeneration technique makes me wish I could take a bath in lava to cool myself off.

Glancing up, I spot the giant doors. I must have activated my super-speed and smashed against them at a thousand miles an hour. Judging by the blood all over the base of the door and around me, I'm lucky I didn't instantly die.

Amelia yawns. "Okay, then. Go open them."

The doors before me stand nearly a hundred feet tall and fifty feet wide. Based purely on my guesswork, each one must weigh over a ton.

I walk over to the door, and as I start to touch it, I spot blood all over my arms. With a single glance, I quickly realize my body is caked in blood.

Amelia didn't even say anything? Gross.

"Clean." I speak a word of power and breathe a sigh of relief as my clothes stop resembling a vat of raspberry sauce.

Something tugs at the bottom of my pant legs. I look down to see Kar gazing at me. "Turtle, you spoke a word just now, and your bloodied clothes became unsullied. How did you summon forth magic without performing the appropriate hand-signs?"

"Wordsmithing. I can make anything happen by speaking one word at a time. I haven't yet found a limit to what I can do, but I plan to experiment with it someday soon."

Awe appears in his eyes. "I... I understand. Use caution. Your ability is unlike anything I've heard of before." He starts to walk away, and I hear him mutter, "Indeed, I can't even begin to fathom its practical applications."

Kar trots away and turns around to watch me, so I spin to face the door.

Hmm. I don't want to use Push. That nearly killed me last time, and I've already had one near-death experience today. Maybe there's another option.

Oh, that's it! Magic words! Sometimes big doors like these are opened with unique phrases!

Smiling, I recite the first two words that come to mind. "Open Sesame."

Nothing happens.

Frowning, I try another. "Mellon."

Nothing happens.

Scowling, I try one last word. "Fuck."

It doesn't work either.

Obviously.

Amelia snickers. "Haha! What are you doing?"

"...Nothing."

I quickly walk up to the door and start shoving it with all my strength.

I won't lose to you, damn it!

Minutes pass. I give the giant slab of metal my full strength, but it doesn't budge an inch. C'mon, asshole! Open! Open! My feet grind into the ground as I heave and shove, but finally, I fall to my knees, panting like a dog.

Amelia stares at me silently. Out of aggravation, I yell at her, "Why don't you come over here and help?! Aren't you supposed to be strong as heck?"

Amelia yawns. "I'm a little sleepy. Besides, it's pointless. You've got everything under control."

"What?! I haven't made a nanometer of progress! How can you call this 'under control?'"

She shrugs, pulls her skirt under her, and plunks down on her butt to watch me. Boredom floods her face.

I wipe my forehead and tilt my head up to look at the door. It's enormous! How am I supposed to open something like this? Impossible! If only I had more strength.

Strength. Wait, hold on a second. Maybe Amelia's right after all.

I quickly jump to my feet. Aiming my hand at my body, I yell, "Power!"

Suddenly, my arms, legs, and the rest of my muscles hulk out, bulging and tearing my skin all across my body. It hurts, but at the same time, the adrenaline rush is incredible! It suddenly occurs to me that I've had this option available all along. Idiot me!

I slam my hands against the door and shove hard. "Hnnngh!"

My feet scrape across the ground, but a weird popping sound in my back makes me pause. Shit. With my muscles in this shape, I'm putting unimaginable stress on my body and heart. I could die while doing this.

Kar's squeaky voice echoes off the walls. "Turtle, if you don't mind, I could assist you."

"What?" I look down at his sincere, pleading gaze. "Uh, I mean, if you want to help, you can, little guy. I won't stop you from trying."

Kar crosses his arms. "Do you doubt me?"

"No, no, far from it! You're a, uh, big ol' crocodile! I'm sure you could do something to this door!"

Kar lowers his head. "Among my people, I am a revered, mighty warrior. I have earned intense admiration from those around me. I know what respect feels like, yet you give none to me. I must rectify this, or my people will appear weak to you, forever."

Suddenly, something incredible happens. Kar's body begins to expand. Slowly at first, but the expansion speed increases after a few seconds, and soon he reaches Amelia's size, then mine- what?!

He continues growing, and Amelia's eyes follow his head as he soars into the air. Kar's body stops rising, but not until he has exceeded well over ten feet tall.

A tongue slurps from the ginormous crocodile's mouth as he lowers his head down to smirk at me. "Well then, little turtle, who is the small one now?"

Kar's voice is no longer squeaky or silly sounding. Instead, his voice has the timbre of ten grizzly bears roaring all at once. It booms and echoes around us.

"M-me?" This time, it's my voice that cracks as he takes a step toward me.

"Mmm. What say you, tiny turtle? Do you acknowledge my power?"

"Yes. Yes! Um, I'm sorry! I meant no disrespect earlier, hehe..."

Kar grumbles in his throat before turning to examine the door. "That strength boost you used on yourself. Use it on me. I will heft this door open."

I nod, realizing what a difference it would make for him.

"You got it. Power!!"

...Nothing happens.

Kar tilts his head. "Mmm. I think I felt something. A trickle of energy. Was that all you could manage?"

I shake my head. "POWER!!!"

My energy levels drop noticeably, and my body, still fatigued from the artificial strength boost, weeps.

This time, Kar growls. "Ohh! Oh yes! There it is! I can use this!"

He stomps past me and slaps his claws against the door. "Turtle, take a few steps back."

I nod, then return my body to normal with a quick spell.

He doesn't need my help here. This door will open.

Kar looks at me in confusion. "A little further, to be on the safe side."

Oh dear.

Kar begins pushing against the double doors, and as he does, Amelia slinks up next to me. "Ohhh, that explains it."

"Explains what?"

Blaarjiim jumps in to reply. "Kar did not wish to be picked up by my queen. It seems he condenses his body into that tiny form, but it must focus his mass into a smaller area."

Hoarhiim adds, "Meaning that if he ordinarily weighs hundreds of pounds, he will still weigh that much when shrunken down."

"Ohh..." I nod, unsure if that's how the law of physics works. "Yeah, I guess that's why he didn't want you to pick him up."

Kar grunts as he heaves against the door. Amelia and I flinch as it shifts slightly.

"He's doing it!" Amelia howls, while nearly jumping for joy.

As for me, I suddenly feel apprehensive. I don't know what's inside. None of us do. We could be walking right into a trap. There might be something abominable sealed inside, and someone could have put it in there for a good goddamn reason.

The door inches forward slightly, and already I can see that Kar is running low on juice. He can't keep this up forever.

Suddenly, a horrible ringing sound screams through the air. It's both silent, and yet insanely loud at the same time. I quickly cover my ears, but my feeble attempt to block the sound accomplishes nothing. When I look at Amelia, I grimace. She's in pain. Her mouth opens as if she's trying to scream, but I can't hear anything.

The Crown gives me a hint, and I quickly face Kar. His mouth is open, and he's emitting an ultrasonic scream, like a warcry or something.

"Skreeeeeee!!!"

Suddenly, Kar's muscles bulge, and the door begins to crawl across the ground inside.

With a final shove, Kar lurches back, and bashes against the door with all his might. Some invisible object blocking it from the other side must have gone flying, because the door surges open, causing Kar to stumble inside. Finally, he ceases his warcry, allowing Amelia and I to breathe again.

"Kar? Kar?!" I run over to him, with Amelia in hot pursuit, and as we reach the doorway, I can finally see what's inside.

It isn't good.

We made a big mistake.

This is Kar

Part 009: The Labyrinth Core

It was only yesterday that I fled for my life from a horde of monsters. Not only had I never seen such creatures in my life, but I'd couldn't have imagined they existed in such numbers.

And now, for the second time, my mind boggles at how many monsters stand before me. Amelia and I gawk at what must be tens of thousands of fantastical beasts and demihumans milling about in an underground structure twenty times larger than the Dodger Stadium. What lay behind the door was a question I'd been asking myself for hours, and now that I have the answer, I regret asking.

Amelia very slowly turns to me and whispers, "Any bright ideas?"

"Not even one," I mutter.

The room just inside the door descends fifty feet into a basin filled with glowing stones, and what Solomon's Crown tells me are portals to other places elsewhere in the galaxy.

A dozen platforms rise into the air, and atop each one are two metal pylons that curve around to form an open oval. Between the pylons are images of other worlds, other places in the Labyrinth, and scenes I can barely describe.

Computers unlike any I've seen before line up in rows, each one twice as tall as my body, stretching to just above Kar's height. The towers power hundreds of monitors all over the damn place, almost as if I've arrived at the New York Stock Exchange. Their design is somewhat alien in nature, giving me an otherworldly vibe.

As Kar climbs to his feet, every monster in the room stops and stares at us, mouths agape. Instead of orcs, goblins, and demons, all the monsters here seem corrupted in some way. Their bodies leak clouds of darkness, and all of their forms appear disfigured and disheveled.

One of the monsters, a gangly looking freak with half its face melting off, slowly raises a trembling finger toward us. "F-F-F.... Fleshbags! They're fleshbags!"

Amelia forces a smile. "We... come in... peace?"

The room erupts into chaos. A hundred smoky apparitions rush this way, another hundred rush that way, and everyone loses their goddamned minds.

"They've opened the doors!"

"Big scary alligator!"

"Someone get the boss!"

"Broodmother save me!"

A chorus of screams fills the room. Monsters frantically type values into their computers, while others charge through the otherworldy portals to flee from us. Amelia and I gawk in stunned silence at their ridiculous reaction. There must be a thousand times more monsters in the room compared to the three of us, yet they're scared? What the hell?!

Suddenly, a feminine voice booms from loudspeakers in the roof of the stadium. "SILENCE!"

The crowd hushes all at once. Tranquility replaces abject terror. All of the monsters, even those about to flee, stop where they're standing. They stand at attention and wait for further orders from their unseen superior.

The monsters turn to face the right side of the room. Amidst the walls of computers, a single being steps out. Its chest and clothing are decidedly feminine, but its head is birdlike, with a beak and pitch-black eyes. The monster's appendages taper into four-fingered hands and two-toed feet, but each ends in a claw-like talon.

The monster, a female of some sort, silently strolls over to us, not a care in the world. Whoever she is, she commands absolute respect over the monsters here, and her half-bird half-human body stands out like a diamond in the rough. She's beautiful, in a majestic sense.

"Intruders. Hee! You've made a mistake, barging into my domain. Vermin are unwelcome here."

The bird-lady's voice is simultaneously delicate and soft, yet her tongue clicks every few syllables, possibly because her beak makes it difficult to form words. She sounds like a parakeet; capable of mimicking human speech, yet imperfect to a fault.

Blaarjiim grumbles. "Vermin? Well, isn't she the polite one?"

I take a hesitant step forward. All the monsters in the room swivel their heads to look at me, nearly giving me a panic attack, but I manage to keep my cowardice in check.

"W-who are you? What is this place?"

The bird-person stops thirty feet away and lightly scrapes her spiked fingers across her feathered scalp. "I ask the questions here. How did you enter? That door has a hundred tons of mass. Furthermore, it opens outward. You appear to be ordinary humans, yet-"

Her eyes don't swivel around as a human's would, but instead, she tilts and turns her head to look in different directions. Cocking it from left to right, she examines the three of us curiously.

"That big one there, the alligator. You must be the one who hefted my door open."

Kar croaks under his breath, "Crocodile, not alligator."

"Close enough. In any case, if you could open the entrance to the Labyrinth Core, your strength must on par with the Demon Dukes, perhaps even the Emperors. I presume these humans are your slaves, then?"

Amelia starts opening her mouth to object, but I reach over and squeeze her arm, subtly shaking my head. There are too many monsters here. If they all attack, we'll probably die.

Kar barely even gives her question a passing thought. "Hah! Of course they are! Do you have a problem with that?"

The bird-woman taps her beak. "Hardly. You may not have realized it, but this entire facility is mine, as are all the monsters here. I am Bahamut, the most powerful monster in the Labyrinth. Even the demons fear my wrath." She takes a step toward Kar and completely ignores Amelia and I. "Why have you come here?"

"Because I felt like it!" Kar doesn't skip a beat. "I am Kar, the second mightiest of Marie's Children. I fear no-one!"

"Don't you? Hmm? You must think yourself quite impressive, but from where I stand, you're little more than an insect at my door."

Ugh, she's painfully braggadocious, I think to myself. Does this broad ever shut up?

Bahamut and Kar go back and forth for a minute, verbally sparring with one another. After a while, she laughs, though it comes out sounding like a bluejay's chirp. "Hee! You're an interesting fellow, Kar! I will offer you a unique opportunity. Follow me."

Kar looks at us warily as she turns and walks away, but shrugs. "Let us see what she has in mind."

Amelia reaches over and takes my hand in hers. "Jason, I've got a bad feeling about this."

"Same, Amelia. Just smile like you always do, and if the worst happens, I might have a way out for us."

I'm not lying, either. I'll have to be creative with my Wordsmithing if Bahamut turns out to be a backstabber.

We follow Kar and Bahamut, glancing around nervously as the throng of corrupted creatures watches us silently.

My body perspires more than usual as we pass through hordes of monsters. Now that we've walked down the steps into the lower area of the bowl-like stadium, I can see the computers and creatures down here more clearly, and they seem very unusual compared to others I've seen up to this point in the Labyrinth. Some have skin covered in wood; many have loose hides, often disfigured by blemishes and sores, while others have tentacles instead of hair, and thousands of variations between those. One of the bastards grins evilly at me as Amelia and I walk past, his razor-sharp teeth on display.

He licks his lips and smiles. "A test. All who challenge Bahamut will lose. You'll be one of us, soon."

Bahamut and Kar don't hear him. Amelia sticks her tongue out at the monster and mutters, "Take a step closer, ugly. I'll knock your block off."

I pull her along, not wanting to start a scene. I'm sure she could tear the jackass apart with ease, but what about the other thousands of monsters? Doubtful.

Kar turns to Bahamut. "What is this place? Sure looks like an awful lot of fleshbag technology around here!"

Bahamut preens her feathers for a moment, then chirps shrilly. "Hee! You haven't a clue! The Labyrinth Core is the most valuable asset the demons have. It allows us to travel to various hunting grounds in search of food and energy. Maintaining control over fleshbags, as I'm sure you know, is a difficult task."

"Tell me about it! Bah, these worthless twig-limbs can hardly carry my supper to me every day. I beat them twice a week to keep them in line!"

I glance at Amelia and spot her glaring furiously at Kar's back. Yeah, keep mouthing off, fish-breath. I'll break you in half when we get out of this dump, her eyes say.

Honestly, after seeing Kar heft that door open, I'd be surprised if Amelia could budge him an inch. Bahamut said that opening those doors would require the strength of a Demon Duke, and they're the second most powerful beings in the Labyrinth. Kar is probably way stronger than Amelia.

Bahamut raises her hand, and the four of us stop. "Open a portal to Tarus II. On the double!"

The calmness of the monsters in the room breaks instantly as every being begins a mad scramble, dashing for their chairs and workstations, all of them trying very hard not to touch Amelia or I as they slip past. Bahamut continues walking up a walkway toward a portal. She stops in front of it, as do we, and I get a glimpse of the other side.

The portal appears to be a door to another world. It's as if we can look through a window into another plane of existence or a different dimension. The one we stop before shows an image of a river of green, and inside the rancid water, apparitions of humans rise over the low waves, scream wordlessly in agony, and fall back inside. Bahamut says nothing, but Kar strokes his chin.

"Hurgh. Is that the River Styx?"

Bahamut chirps. "Hee! Yes. A fetid graveyard, good for powering the demonic lust for fleshbag souls, but inhospitable to other life. Monsters steer clear of it, but we usually have to keep a dedicated gate open in case Diablo pops over."

Kar leans forward slightly to peer into the flowing green river. Its liquid bubbles and boils like lava formed of acid. "What happens if ya fall in?"

Bahamut's tone turns frosty. "Don't."

I glance back at all of the monsters and watch as they frantically check displays on their stations, gaze up at the ceiling to stare at numbers scrolling across the overhead screens, then look down to type commands and mathematical equations into their computer. Thanks to the Crown, I can easily keep up with them.

Five minutes pass. Kar crosses his arms. "What is the meaning of this? Why are we standing here, twiddling our thumbs?"

The bird-woman's head twitches spastically, as if Kar's impatience is irritating her. "Hee! My pawns are calculating a jump destination. Unlike demons, monsters are quite adept at technology and its practical applications. However, calculating the positions of planets in the galaxy is exceptionally difficult, so it takes thousands of us several minutes to make the necessary preparations. In any case, it's almost time."

The image of the river fades away, and the portal shuts off for a moment or two. I'm relieved that I don't have to see what looked like human souls screaming and writhing in agony, but at the same time, an odd sensation wells up in my stomach. Guilt.

They're suffering. It's not my fault, but every fiber of my being thinks it is. I'm not responsible for the plight of those poor people. The demons control the universe. What could I, a single man, do to stop them? Nothing. That's the answer. Resisting billions, even trillions of demons, is pointless.

A crack of electricity in the air jerks me back to my senses. The gate begins arcing bolts of energy from its rounded pillars into the center, and a terrific explosion of lightning erupts, creating a hole in the air that rapidly expands to the edges of the gate. Once the hole finishes forming, an image of a beautiful, green, grassy field appears. The grass sways softly as the wind sweeps across it, and sunlight beams down, lighting the clearing up, as well as trees and a stream in the distance.

I want to cry.

I've been in this Labyrinth for only a few days, but I hadn't realized until just now how homesick I've been for Earth. The dark corridors, fear of demons attacking at any moment, and trepidation I feel from knowing one wrong turn could mean my death has been plaguing my mind.

Bahamut clicks her tongue. "Excellent work, slaves. You opened that portal twelve seconds faster than usual. Double rations for everyone. Crocodile, bring the two rats with you and let's visit the world I call Home."

A great sigh of relief fills the room as the monsters quietly murmur to each other about Bahamut's praise. Her words mean everything to them.

Kar tilts his head back at Amelia and I. Smirking; he says, "Come on, rats! You heard the boss!"

I can just barely make out the sound of Amelia popping her knuckles as her saccharine-sweet smile lights up the world. "Oh, of course, Master Kar! Anything you say!"

She's going to kill him later, I muse to myself.

While I feel nervous about entering the portal, it's not as bad as I expect. The stadium's stale oxygen and murmuring of its monsters vanishes behind me. One second later, a whoomph of air hits my face, dazing me for a brief second. The sensation makes me imagine jumping from a vacuum-sealed bag into a windstorm. I take a moment to yawn and pop my ears. Amelia does, too.

The harsh brightness of a midday sun beats down on me, making me see spots and blink my eyes rapidly. I raise my palm to block the light, but it doesn't help much.

Something about this world irks me. After a moment, I realize what it is. The color is wrong. This world's sun is yellow, like Earth's, but its hue is just off-color enough that it doesn't feel right. I can't put it in words, but there's a faint orange tint to the world around me that makes the grass and other Earth-like features appear somewhat fake.

Amelia casually glances around. "Wow, pretty."

"Yeah," I mumble, as I stare at Bahamut's back. "Something seems off."

We arrive on an elevated platform identical to the one in the Labyrinth Core, but to my disgust, this world's gate sits in the middle of a field of grass. It appears that whoever built it cared little for its aesthetics. The gate's blackened stonework stands out against the bright, cheerful colors of nature like a bloodstain on a nurse's uniform.

"Wonderful, just wonderful," Bahamut says. She chirps cutely, then turns back to look at Amelia and I, making a chopping motion toward us with her free hand. Another whump echoes behind us, and when I turn around, I'm stunned to see that the gate back to the Labyrinth has been disabled.

"What the heck? Is this a trap?!" I pivot to face Bahamut, and she chirps again.

"Hee! You've seen too much, I'm afraid. Fleshbags who have seen the Labyrinth Core must be disposed of, by decree of the Demon Council. Luckily for you, I am a merciful host. Your owner, the fine specimen known as Kar, can save you if he deigns. Speaking of which, the midday sun is already in the sky. We haven't much time if we wish to get this over with by nightfall. Come along, now!"

Amelia shrugs. She doesn't care at all about this turn of events. Kar looks somewhat distressed, but he tries to smile and laugh it off. "Gwaha! You're an interesting one, Bahamut! I can only guess at what horrible torture you have planned for me!"

"Hee. Torture? I'll do nothing of the sort. Tell me, though, Kar. Do you like to play games?"

She begins walking down the steps of the portal, keeping her back to us, while Kar quickly falls into step beside her. His form dwarfs hers, yet he appears more nervous around her than vice-versa.

"Games? Hurgh, I have little time for those."

"Oh, you don't like them? Unfortunate. You see, by entering the Core without permission from me or obtaining a permit from the Demon Council, you committed a high crime against our people. If I killed you, that would solve the problem you created, but I'd rather not. I see potential in you, after all. You're not like the other vermin working beneath me."

Kar slowly scratches his arm. "Uh, thanks."

"You are most welcome."

...I guess Bahamut doesn't understand sarcasm.

The four of us walk along, and a warm breeze blows across the plains, cooling our bodies while the sun warms us up. To say this planet has the perfect climate would be an understatement. It's exquisite.

It doesn't take long before we arrive at the forest. Bahamut stops and holds a finger up. "Kar, I should warn you that the two weaklings behind us will be quite vulnerable in the Shrieking Woods. Don't let them stray far. The creatures here have all manner of poisonous fangs and barbed quills. Despite its tranquil appearance, Tarus II has a fauna predatory threat level of four stars. The plants are all deadly too, so don't eat any colorful berries you see, or you'll meet a swift end."

Kar grunts. "Noted."

Not a creature stirs in the forest, causing an eerie silence to linger in the air. The only sounds I hear as we climb over branches and limbs is wind whistling across the treetops above. Despite Bahamut's warning, not a single animal bothers us.

An hour after entering the forest, Bahamut cocks her head again. "We're almost at the test site."

Kar sniffs the air. "Test? What test?" Evidently, he didn't hear the monster mentioning a test to Amelia and me earlier.

"Hee. It's more of a game than anything else. You will see."

Amelia and I share a look of worry with each other. Bahamut has been very vague this whole time, and frankly, I'm thinking about taking her down. I'd rather not kill anyone unless it's my last resort, but her hordes of monsters aren't around here. She's defenseless.

Up ahead, the forest parts away to reveal a barren, rocky clearing. Mountains of dirt and stone form a bowl, and the path narrows to perhaps a hundred feet wide. A staircase carved into the mountainside leads to the top, while a cave to the right ominously beckons for us to enter. Ten heavily armored guards, their bodies encased in steel, patrol the entrance to the cave. All of them stop and swivel to salute as Bahamut approaches.

I decide to ask the question on my mind. "Bahamut, are we going underground?"

She flicks her head back to look at me. "Quiet! I have nothing to say to piss-ants. If you enter the depths of Tarus II, it will be as a prisoner under forced labor, mining and toiling for the rest of your life. Hopefully, your master will pass the test, and that won't happen." She chuckles. "Hee! Or at least, it would be lucky for you. I'm hoping for the opposite."

Bahamut resumes walking, and soon, we arrive at the steps leading up the mountain. She ignores the guards outside the cave, and begins ascending the steps. Due to how narrow they are, perhaps six feet wide, Kar falls into line behind her, and I let Amelia go in front of me.

Since my position is in the rear and the only view ahead of me is Amelia's long black hair, I end up gazing at the tops of the mountains as we climb. The sheer canyon walls rise a few hundred feet and flatten at the top, making them nigh unscalable, yet perfect for building on. Indeed, several structures resembling Egyptian pyramids, huts, and other such designs are scattered across the tops of the mountains for dozens of miles, indicating a primitive culture.

Kar notices them. "Bahamut, what are those odd, triangular buildings? They are quite large."

Bahamut chuckles. "Hee. I am an ancient being, one who lived long before the fall of Earth. Fleshbags and monsters have worshiped me for my entire life, and the architecture you see here are from an ancient civilization on Earth known as the Egyptians."

"Earth? What's that?" Kar questions her further, and I suddenly remember the surprise Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim showed when I mentioned it. Most monsters and demons don't know of its existence, or they've forgotten. I wonder why?

"Earth is an ancient world, one destroyed long ago during the Energy Wars. It is the homeworld of humans, demons, and monsters."

Kar grumbles something guttural. "Hurgh. Homeworld? Are you daft? Sounds like a bunch of nonsense to me."

"It's true," I say aloud. "Earth is where I come from too."

"Oho?" The entire party stops as Bahamut turns and cranes her head around to look at me. "Now there's a fib if I ever heard one. The fleshbag thinks he's special."

"Stop calling me 'fleshbag.' My name is Jason, and I'm a human."

"Yeah! And I'm Amelia!"

Bahamut eyes us suspiciously. For a moment, she gazes at the crown on my head, then toward the light-source in my belt pouch. "Your slave is talkative. Why does he wear that gaudy band on his head?"

"Uh." Kar pauses for a moment, then raises a finger. "Turtle is a king I enslaved from one of the human worlds! The frilled one is his sister."

"Hee! A king and queen. I see. Royalty. You must value your property tremendously, keeping them so close." Bahamut immediately swivels around and continues walking. "Perhaps after we finish, you should give these mouthy rats another beating. I could teach you some tricks if you'd like."

Kar doesn't reply.

Several minutes later, the end of our climb comes into view, and I can finally see our destination. Monsters of all sorts roam around, and a large, elevated platform rises ten feet above the ground. It stretches fifty feet in every direction and has several dozen green squares painted side-by-side at one side, while the other end has a stand elevated another foot up. It looks like a stage meant for giving a speech, sort of, except without any comfy chairs or anything designed explicitly for speech-giving.

Bahamut climbs up the stage, and as she does, she claps her talons together. "A crowd, please! Give me a crowd!"

Immediately, all the monsters in the area drop what they're doing. Most walk toward us, but several of them dash away, likely to tell others of Bahamut's arrival.

This bird-bitch certainly wields a ton of authority. We can't trifle with her.

Bahamut walks over to the elevated stand and smoothly plants one foot atop it, then lifts herself the rest of the way. She does it effortlessly, as though it's a ritual she's performed a million times.

"The three of you, go find one of the squares to stand on. Once the crowd is big enough, I'll begin the test."

Kar mutters under his breath, stupid test, I shoulda torn your head off while we were alone, ya dumb bird-brain, grumble grumble, but Bahamut doesn't hear him.

More monsters fill the area around us, and I hear a few of them whispering conspiratorially.

"Think they'll pass?"

"Of course not. Nobody passes. It's impossible."

"The humans'll go to the mines, but what about the big guy?"

"She wants him in a position of authority. Easy enough. It's always the same."

"Silence!" Bahamut chirps shrilly, and the sound pierces the midday winds. The crowd hushes and waits for her to speak. "Finally, we've arrived. Welcome, Kar, along with your two servants. Are you ready to begin the test?"

Kar looks anything but ready. His expression flattens, and he sighs. "What's this test all about, anyway?"

Bahamut stabs a clawed finger at him from across the stage. "I have chosen you as either my successor or as my new second commander. If you pass the test, you will take my place and lead the Labyrinth Core. If you fail, I will enslave you under me forever, just as I have every other monster you've seen up to now."

Kar sighs again. "What if I don't want to take the test?"

Calmly, Bahamut examines her claws. "Then you will die right here and now."

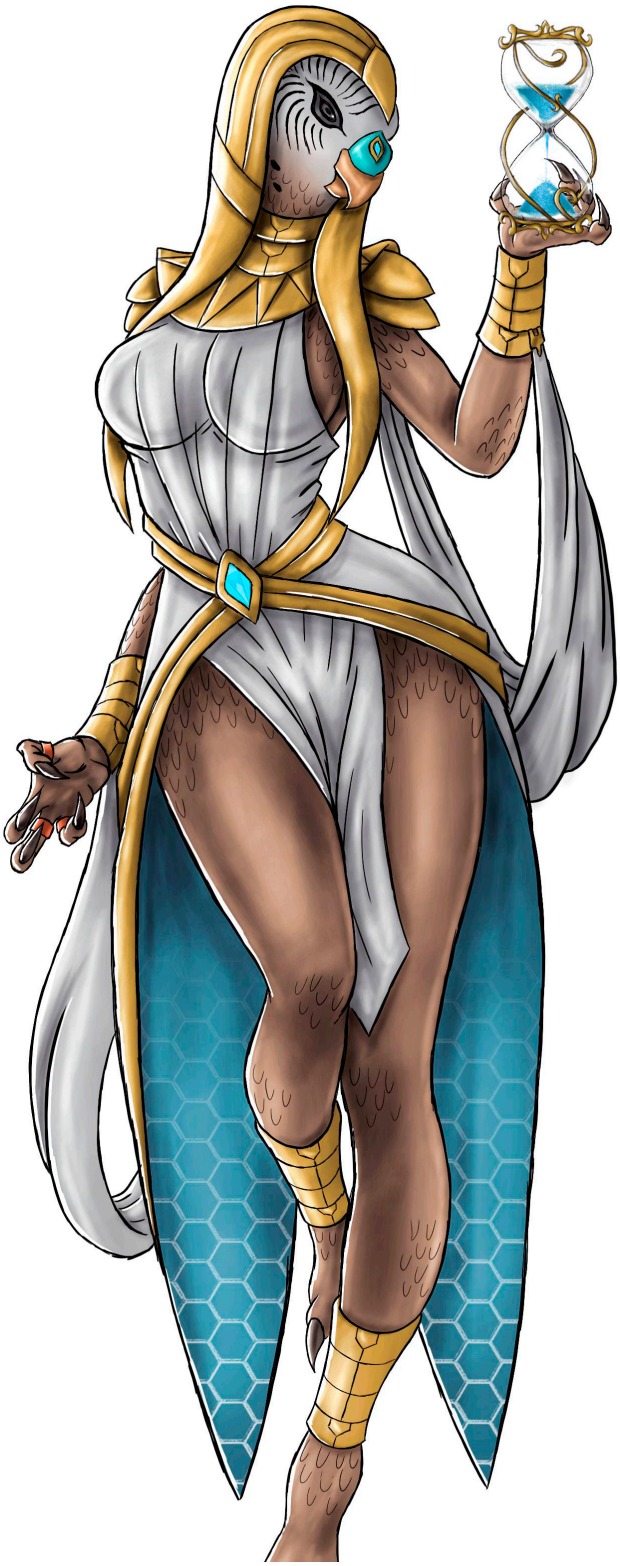
I nudge Kar. "If anything happens, we've got your back."

This seems to cheer him up. As if he's only just remembered our presence, Kar puffs out his chest. "Hurgh. Very well! I accept your test! You will find that I am impossible to stump!"

Bahamut reaches into the pocket of her coat and pulls out a small hourglass. "We shall see."

Author notes:

This is Bahamut.



Part 010: The Tests

For some reason, standing inside a five-by-five green square makes me uncomfortable. I know my 'barrier' is only comprised of lines painted on the platform's surface, but being forced to stand in a box makes me feel like a lab rat. At this rate, someone is probably going to stick a needle in my ass to test my reaction to Botox.

Kar, Amelia, and I watch Bahamut raise her hourglass in the air. She does it slowly, allowing our eyes to track the movement of her hand.

"The grains in this hourglass represent one hour. The first two challenges are not timed. However, the final challenge is. If you fail any of my tests, you will become my slaves. If you choose to forfeit, I will kill you without hesitation."

The sound of an electrical pop at all four corners of the stadium makes the hair on my head start to stand up. A second later, beams of light shoot out from the green squares. They rise fifteen feet, then force fields pop out between them faster than I can react, sealing the three of us inside our squares.

"What the hell?! What are you doing?" I start to reach forward, only for a painful zap of electricity to arc off the wall and jolt my heart. My arm flops uselessly, causing me to nearly pass out from the pain. Luckily, before I faint, I gasp under my breath, "Heal!"

My breathing quickens. I look to the side to see that Kar and Amelia don't appear especially concerned.

Kar reaches a finger forward, and when the electricity zaps him, he merely shakes his wrist in annoyance. "What is the meaning of this?"

Bahamut chirps. "Hee! Many mighty warriors used to flee my test when they realized their doom was upon them. I devised this measure to keep them safely locked in place until the test is over. By the way, when I asked if you would take the test, I forgot to mention that the tiles you're standing on have magical infusions. You're honor-bound to complete it now."

Kar crosses his massive arms. "Get on with it."

"Mmm. The first test is rather simple. You must face your inner demons, wrestle with them, and come out victorious. This test has a 10% failure rate. Those who cannot pass will typically end up as drooling hounds, lying on the ground and whimpering until I put them out of their misery. I doubt this will happen, but The Test has a way of bringing out the worst in a monster."

After she finishes talking, Bahamut waves her free hand through the air and mutters several inaudible words, all of which the Crown tells me are Latin in origin. Why Latin? What's so great about that dead language?

Nausea boils up in my stomach. I want to vomit, but I don't know why. The world twists around me. Kar, Amelia, and Bahamut all vanish into blackness.

Bahamut must be using magic to play with my mind. Am I being tested too? I thought she only cared about Kar!

The blackness shifts around me, and a familiar scene materializes. A person I once called 'mother,' my foster parent, beckons to me.

Amanda Tate, age 35, a woman living with her husband Robert and us six foster kids under one roof. We were always a handful.

My body moves by itself. I start walking toward Amanda, and my old house forms around us. The beat-up wooden floor creaks under my feet, and the smell of macaroni and cheese mixed with bacon bits fills the kitchen. She must have just finished cooking dinner.

My gaze wanders to the right, and I spot a mirror in the bathroom. My face reflects off it, revealing me to be much younger than I am now. By the looks of it, I must be around... twelve? If this is a memory, it's the most life-like thing I've ever experienced in my life.

"Jason," Amanda whispers, and her throat catches. "I need to talk to you, honey."

"What is it, mom?"

I ask the question, but it isn't me asking. It's like someone else is controlling my body.

"R-Robert... I just got off the phone with the hospital..."

"Mom? Did something happen?"

"I don't want you to be scared, okay? Robert, he... he was... there was an accident." Her voice catches again, and she quickly wipes her eyes. Now I realize the macaroni is getting cold and hard. It must have been sitting there a while.

"An accident? Is he okay?"

She wrings her hands and looks away, unable to meet my gaze. "H-he's paralyzed, Jason. I haven't told the others yet. You're the oldest, so I thought you should know first."

"Para...lyzed... how? Why?!"

She takes a step toward me, then stops to sit in a chair next to the kitchen counter. She taps the one beside her, so I quickly slide in.

"Jason, honey, life isn't fair. Sometimes bad things happen to good people, understand?"

"Is he going to be okay?"

I've heard this conversation before. I already know what Amanda is going to say, yet my words are ignorant as if I haven't a clue what's coming next. Not only is Robert paralyzed, but the accident crushed part of his skull. His job at the factory is over. He can't support the family.

I already know how this conversation ends.

From this day forward, I flitted from one foster family to the next. I was one of the lucky kids. Nobody ever abused me, but I had to deal with an unstable life, always worried about whether I would leave everything behind on any given day and start a new life.

Chaos. Disarray. My life never stabilized; not until I was old enough to fend for myself. By then, it was too late. I had lost my hope for a bright, sunny future. My mind was too weak to endure so many stresses from a young age. I put myself in a Cryopod and froze myself, arriving where I am today.

"The state is already looking into our residency, Jason. I've been on the phone for an hour talking to everyone, trying to figure out what to do. I'm... I'm at my wit's end."

Since I was eight, I've lived here. Four years of my life gone, flushed down the drain. I thought after I was tossed between the first three families, the Tates would be my final home. I got attached to Amanda, even going so far as to call her 'Mom,' but it didn't matter. In the end, the universe forced me to move on.

"I'm sorry, mom. Can we see dad in the hospital?"

Her teeth grind audibly. "Not just yet. He... he's comatose. They... oh god... they said he won't... won't wake up..." Amanda lowers her face into her hands. "Uwaa! It's not fair! It's not fair!"

"Don't cry, mom!" I jump out of my seat and hug her, but the words my mouth forms aren't the words I think.

Yes. Cry. You have to let your feelings out. Don't do anything rash, Amanda.

The memory fades away.

I'm back in the darkness now. I know how Amanda's story ends. After the children in our household, including me, were sent to other foster parents, Robert died. He only lasted three months before they turned off life support.

Amanda killed herself one year later.

I didn't find out until I was seventeen. That was a year before I entered the Cryopod.

The next four years, up to age 16, were a blur. I bounced from one family to the next. He's too quiet, they'd say. He reminds me of a serial killer.

I knew what other kids in the house would say. I didn't care. It was whenever the adults whispered about me behind closed doors, the times I accidentally overheard things no child should hear- those were what hurt me the most.

At age 16, I got a job delivering newspapers. Once I had enough money, I moved out, rented a flat, and put myself through school.

What would my life have become if I had stayed with Amanda and Robert?

Would I be here now, in Hell?

The darkness pulls away, and I blunder back to reality. The hum of electricity fills the air. I pull myself up and wipe the glumness from my face.

Bahamut cocks her head. "Oh? A fleshbag is the first to wake up. How little trauma you must have experienced."

"My name is Jason," I say, quickly correcting her. "That memory was unpleasant. I never wanted to remember that day."

"Chit-chit! Hee! The more distressing the memory, the deadlier the effect it has on the body. You're already on your feet, so you must have had an easier life than the other two."

I glance at Kar. The crocodile is bent down, one knee on the ground, while he bows his head and rests his arms on the other knee. His brow furrows, and a look of distress gradually spreads across his face, worsening every second. He looks like he suffering an unimaginable nightmare.

Then I look past him at Amelia, and my heart skips a beat. She's rolling around on the ground; her body curled up in the fetal position as tears stream down her face. Her eyes squeeze shut with enough force to crush concrete. Every few seconds, she moans under her breath, "No... no... I don't want to... I don't want to..."

"Amelia? Amelia! Are you okay?" I turn to Bahamut. "What's going on? She's having a panic attack!"

Bahamut holds up her claws to examine them. "It seems the female has experienced some awful trauma in her life. She appears younger than you, yet some unknown horror has corrupted her mind. Hopefully, for your sake, she'll pass the test. I think not, however."

Fuck passing. I don't care about the stupid test. Amelia's my friend, and she's in pain! I have to help her!

My head spins as I try to think of what I can do to escape the trial. Right! Wordsmithing! I can probably use it to get out of here and save Amelia! I just need to figure out-

"Hurgh."

Kar's voice startles me, nearly making me stumble backward. The crocodile slowly rises to his feet, but his knees tremble, and he has difficulty standing. "That was... the worst experience of my life. Experiencing the loss of my mate. How dare you make me relive that pain."

Bahamut nudges a few feathers around on her head. "Hee! The magic does all the work. I had nothing to do with it. It forces you to relive your most painful memories. Take heart, Kar, second mightiest of your people. At least you aren't experiencing the same pain as that poor child. She'll be an empty vessel once her mind rots."

Kar looks at me in confusion, then at Amelia. He gasps. "Frilled one? What's wrong?!"

Blaarjiim materializes in my mind, but his image warps unnaturally, giving him a distorted appearance. It's like I'm watching him on a busted TV, one that barely works and has those awful lines scrolling down as it adjusts the picture.

"Jason. Listen to me. This is important."

"What's happening with Amelia?" I ask.

Despite Blaarjiim's image being even more shadowy and hard to make out than usual, there's a sense of anticipation in his posture that I haven't seen before. "My queen is in agony. I can only guess what event she's reliving, but based on how tight-lipped she's been about her past before we met, I'm sure it will reawaken her primal nature. This is not a game. Bahamut is playing with fire, and it will burn us all."

My eyes flick to Bahamut. She ignores me again and opts to banter with Kar. Neither of them can hear Blaarjiim, so he must be projecting himself into my mind only.

"Is Amelia going to be okay?"

Blaarjiim turns to face Amelia in my mind's eye, stares for a few moments, then looks back at me. "You need to know, Jason. My queen isn't the same girl she was when we met. She used to be a monster, unlike anything you faced in the Labyrinth. There was a rage burning in her heart, one she neither tried to extinguish nor wanted to. I once preferred that persona. However, ever since she emerged from the statue, I've also enjoyed the simple talks we've had. Thousands of years of silence as I rested in her palm changed me as well."

"What are you saying? Out with it."

Blaarjiim's image flickers. "I feel it again. My queen's burning rage. She told me yesterday that while in the statue, she was at peace. She dreamed and allowed her mind to wander. After you released her, she had mostly forgotten the pain Joan inflicted upon her."

I finally understand what he's saying. "You're saying... she's reliving her encounter with Joan?"

"Possibly. Probably. I can't read minds, not even hers. What I do know is-"

Before he can finish, Amelia wails on the ground, releasing a high-pitched scream from deep in her chest. "Eeeeeeeeeh!!"

Bahamut and Kar both jerk back in surprise. Big Bird squeakily chirps in astonishment. "Hee?! What the Devil?"

Amelia leaps into the air from her fetal position on the ground. The movement is so quick that I can barely register it before she smashes into the electric ceiling above, which repels her body back to the floor. She pounds into the tiles and snarls viciously like a wild animal.

Amelia's heads jerks back and forth wildly as she searches for a way out. Seeing nothing, the little girl leaps at the barrier and batters it with her fist, sending what must be thousands of volts of electricity coursing through her arm. She doesn't flinch, and whales on it again, this time with her other hand, the one clutching Blaarjiim's orb. She turns his orb into a battering ram, bashing it against the field over and over again.

"Stop! Stop it this instant! The test isn't over yet!" Bahamut screeches and grabs for something in the folds of her robes. She pulls out a small device that resembles a remote control, and after tapping a few buttons, a blast of lightning erupts inside Amelia's cage, making her scream in pain.

"Eeeyah!!"

Bahamut's breathing falters. "There! Get ahold of yourself, foolish child! If you don't, I'll send another pulse your way! You won't like-"

Bahamut doesn't get to finish her sentence. Amelia grinds her teeth together and rams her entire body into the front of the cage, then kicks off of it and slams against the other barrier. Our platform shakes as she bounces back and forth. Only now does she begin screaming obscenities. "You fucking bitch! I'll tear you apart! You took him from me! YOU TOOK HIM FROM ME!!"

Bahamut's confidence vanishes. She quickly presses more buttons, and another wave of energy surges inside Amelia's chamber. This time, Amelia doesn't even feel it.

Amelia's bloodthirsty shrieks increase as she hurls Blaarjiim's orb at the wall with all her strength. He bounces off, but she catches and flings him again. By now the arena has begun shaking like a leaf in the wind. I can barely keep my footing.

"Jason!" Hoarhiim roars into my mind. "Don't just stand there! Do something! Use your Wordsmithing! Calm her down! If she breaks out, she'll tear Bahamut apart, then the rest of us! She isn't sane right now!"

Blaarjiim forms, but this time his appearance is much sharper than before, and his figure seems twice as big as usual. "Hahaha! Yes! That's right! My queen remembers her hatred! I feel fury welling up inside of us!"

Jesus Christ. Blaarjiim was calm only moments ago, but now that Amelia's awake, he's acting like a lunatic. I have to stop her. I have to calm her down.

Wait... yes! That's it!

I quickly reach my hand out, aiming it at Amelia. "Calm."

Once again, Amelia swings with all her might at the wall, but suddenly her momentum stops. She pulls her punch right at the last second, only giving the electrified barrier a tepid nudge.

Silence.

Amelia stares forward blankly. Bahamut, apparently not hearing me Wordsmith, hovers her finger over the remote. Her breaths come in shallow gasps. "Wha... what was that? Is she done?"

I, for one, can only stare at Amelia in astonishment. I changed her mental state. I calmed her down with a single word. Is this the true power of Wordsmithing?

Finally, Amelia blinks her eyes. Color returns to her skin. "Huh? What happened?"

"D-don't give me that!" Bahamut steps off her pedestal and cautiously approaches Amelia. "What are you? A shapeshifter?! No human has strength like yours! Only an ancient Hero could have the sort of power you just displayed!"

"Hero?" Amelia cocks her head. "I'm not a hero. I hate them. All heroes are my enemies."

Her voice is monotone. The entire way she holds herself is unlike anything I've seen before.

"A likely story." Bahamut's feathers ruffle slightly as a shiver goes down her back. "After this test is over, I'll investigate you more carefully." Her voice holds a note of fear.

Bahamut turns and walks back to the podium. Blaarjiim reforms in my mind, but something about him is a little off. I can't quite put my finger on it. "Haha... Intoxicating. Did you feel it? My queen's power is formidable. Even this false god, Bahamut, knows better than to underestimate her."

I eyeball Blaarjiim's smoky form for a few moments. "You went berserk for a minute. I'm beginning to think you really are the embodiment of evil."

He sneers at me and vanishes without replying.

Typical.

Kar kneels to Amelia's level. "Small one, are you of sound mind? Whatever you experienced during the first test, it left mental scars that run deep as a canyon. I am here if you wish to discuss anything."

Amelia stares at him blankly. "Yes. Thank you. I am fine. I feel no emotion at all right now."

Now that she mentions it, she is eerily calm compared to her usual self. My spell must be the reason. How long will it last? Can I disable it? Should I? Maybe it's best to let her clear her head for a few minutes.

"Ahem." Bahamut, looking worse for wear, stands on her little platform again. This time, she keeps her remote held in hand. "Well, ordinarily there would be two more tests, but after that display, I think I'll skip the second test. I'd rather not have another mental breakdown. Besides, it's too easy. Nobody ever fails."

Kar glares at her. "Good to hear."

I notice with a small amount of amusement that as Bahamut reaches into her robes again and pulls out the tiny hourglass from earlier that her claws are shaking ever so slightly. Yeah, tremble, you fucking bitch.

"Hee. I will remind you of the rules regarding the third test now. It has a time limit of one hour. You must find the answer to an elaborate riddle, one that nobody has been able to solve for all of my life. The completion rate for this final test is zero percent. To be blunt, it's impossible. However, you have two options for proceeding."

Kar flares his nostrils. "And what are those?"

"Firstly, you may surrender. If you give up now, I will flood your chambers with lethal gas. If you fail, your chambers will fill up with lethal gas. Your death will be gruesome and unpleasant. I assure you, surviving would be worse than not."

"Secondly, you may choose to undergo the test. If you fail, you will become my pawns for all eternity! After analyzing that strange female, I will send the fleshbags to the mines and press you into my service, Kar! Of course, if you succeed, I will elevate you to the position of my first-in-command! I will give you one of my rings, and you will become one of the mightiest existences in the Labyrinth!"

Bahamut holds up her free hand, and only now do I notice three average-looking brass bands stuck on her index, middle, and ring fingers. They look drab and dreary, but a hint of intrigue enters her eyes.

"These are not just any rings, mind you. Long ago, when angels ruled the Earth, I fought alongside the demons and partook in the final battle against their mortal enemies. Each of these rings belonged to one of three archangels. Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael. They are partially responsible for my awe-inspiring power."

Hoarhiim snorts. He whispers in my mind, "An unlikely fantasy. Rings belonging to the Archangels. As if such a thing could be true."

"You don't believe her?"

"Nay. If those rings are, in fact, such holy items, their power would likely kill her where she stands. Monsters and demons cannot use the holy power of an angel, let alone an Archangel."

"If you say so."

Hoarhiim knows better than me about these sorts of things. I should defer to his wisdom, but if the lie is so blatant, why bother? It seems like one of those 'so ridiculous that it turns out to be true' stories.

"Make your choice, Kar."

Her taunting words berate us, giving us little time to think. Kar glances at Amelia, then at me. "Turtle. What should I do? Bahamut's test is impossible. We'll die if we don't try it, but if we do, we'll lose!"

Kar's fearful words ignite rage within my heart.

I want to wipe that smug look off Bahamut's face. Zero percent? Get out of here. She's forcing us into a corner. Bahamut crafted this entire bullshit test to break our spirits. I won't go down without a fight.

I turn to Bahamut. "A question. Is only Kar allowed to answer? Can we speak?"

She coyly chuckles into her hand. "Hee hee! Of course, you may. Whether you have three heads or one, it makes no difference. The riddle is impossible to answer. Besides, two backwater savages like yourselves will be of little help. However, only Kar can make the final response. He is the candidate, so he must make the final decision."

I nod. It'll do.

"Kar. There's a saying on Earth, where I was born. You miss a hundred percent of the shots you don't take. Accept the test. I'm good with riddles and wordplay. Maybe we'll lose, but I can't stand the thought of willingly submitting to this stuck-up arrogant bitch."

Kar growls in his throat. "Hurgh. Wise words for a little turtle." He raises his head up to face Bahamut. "Very well. We will accept the test."

She clicks her tongue. "A shame. I had hoped to make you my pawn. Perhaps in death, your bodies may yield some use." She holds the hourglass up. "After I give you the question, I will upturn this device, and your hour will begin. If there is even one grain of sand still falling once you give your answer, it will count. If you run out of time, you lose. If you answer wrong, you lose."

I groan inwardly. Bahamut just looooves playing up the drama.

Gently, Bahamut lowers the hourglass. "Here it is, then. The final test. Riddle me this, riddle me that: What walks on four legs in the morning, two legs in the afternoon, three legs in the evening, and no legs at night?"

Pain. Anguish. Desperation. These are the looks every sucker gives me when they accept my third challenge. I warn them. I tell them the odds. I tell them the hard truth.

And still, they never believe me.

Kar, the crocodile, slowly opens his mouth, but he cannot form words. I see the defeat in his eyes. A dumb animal like him hasn't a chance of solving my riddle. The girl stares ahead blankly, while the boy smiles. Look at him. By merely hearing my riddle, his mind has already shattered. He smiles because he knows that by the end of the hour, he will be in chains, mining demonstone for the rest of his pathetic existence. Today holds the last ray of sunshine he will ever see.

How many monsters and humans have I corrupted over the years? Thousands? Millions? I am the pinnacle of monster society in the Labyrinth, a perfect specimen.

It wasn't always this way.

I was born a human, an Israelite slave among the Egyptians. Their society was the pinnacle of human engineering at the time, a marvel unlike any before. The Babylonians had their Tower of Babel, but the Egyptians had pyramids, animal husbandry, irrigation, and they even invented the first forms of writing.

However, no society is perfect. Tortured by those above me, I had no lot in life. The Egyptian masters cracked their whips and flayed the skin from any slave who couldn't scurry fast enough — no back-talking, thinking for oneself, or autonomy. Of course, as a child, I thought their actions were cruel and unjust, but I had little understanding of the world outside. Not like now.

It was during my eighth year of life that I discovered the horrors of the world. My brother's eyes were put out by a slaver for looking at the man's wife in a lustful manner. Then they took all of our belongings, flayed my mother so severely she couldn't walk, and said they would come for me on the next day.

Terrified of what fate had in store for me, I fled the city. I had no way of surviving in the desert wastes, but I would rather die in the scorching sands than at the hands of the beasts posing as humans.

I wandered the desert for two days. My throat turned to ash, and I knew that soon, I would perish. I wished to be in the arms of my mother again, but of course, that wasn't possible. Even if I wanted to go back, my weak, pathetic body couldn't handle the return trip. So I pressed onward.

On the third day, I knew the end was nigh. My life would end before I even reached my first decade alive, as so many other humans had.

And then... I found it. I stumbled upon an oasis in the desert. Cool water, trees with fruit hanging from them. Had I been a little older, I might have assumed they were mirages caused by the scorching heat, but I immediately trusted my eyes. Leaping into the water, I was fortunate that it was not an apparition.

My cracked skin softened, and my throat sighed in relief as I swallowed the tasteless liquid.

Then a gravelly voice spoke from the other side of the oasis.

"Who dares enter my land?"

I froze. Standing up in the shallow water, I turned to face what I knew could only be a chimera. A fierce beast stood at the water's edge, one with the body of a cougar, the wings of an eagle, and the head of a lion.

The beast spoke again. "Human. Why have you sullied my waters? Your kind is not welcome here."

My knees began to tremble. The beast was ten times larger than the biggest bull I had ever seen. For the second time that day, I felt my death was upon me.

"I-I-I d-didn't mean t-to..."

The words wouldn't come out. I merely stood there shaking, as the monster slowly took a few steps into the water.

"Hmm. A child. Bony, too. It hasn't had a good meal in its life. It's so terrified of me that it can't move. Bah."

The monster spoke its thoughts aloud as it approached. Soon it came to a stop about ten feet away. I could smell the blood on its breath; the remains from whatever its last meal was.

"Begone, human. Go back to your village."

"I... I... I can't." Speaking softly, I managed to slip a sentence out. "Th-they'll kill me, g-great one..."

"That is no concern of mine." The creature's eyes softened as it looked at me. "Hm. Tell me, two-legs, do you know who I am?"

I shook my head.

"I am Jarnof, the Sphinx. Based on your garb, you must be from Egypt. I know not how you stumbled through the barrier of my domain, but few humans could manage such a feat even if they intended it. My magic is powerful, and it allows me to stay here in peace without being bothered. Do you understand?"

My voice squeaked and cracked. "No... no... I'm sorry..."

Slowly, the Sphinx, Jarnof, raised his head to the sun above. "I am old. Ancient, in human terms. Ten thousand years have I lived. My body is strong as it always was, but my mind is beginning to slip. The former Sphinx, Lilliput, only lasted seven thousand years. I was but a mere imp when I first encountered him. Having solved his riddle, he chose to pass his power on to me. I, however, did not do the same when the Pharaoh Khafre solved mine."

Jarnof bows his head and yawns. "Shameful. Ten sphinxes have lived before me. I am the eleventh. Without fail, all passed their power on to the one who solved their riddle, but I did not. Tell me, two-legs, am I worthy of holding this power?"

I didn't know what events he was mentioning. It took me many centuries to understand, but once I did, only then could I comprehend the weight on his shoulders.

"You seem quite powerful to me, Sir Jarnof."

The fear was beginning to leave me. I was still frightened, but not petrified. The Sphinx sat down, allowing the water to wrap around him as he lowered his gaze to meet mine. There was no killing intent in his eyes; no desire to slay me, unlike the Egyptians who called themselves human.

The Sphinx rumbled in his throat. "All my predecessors and I were forced to live solitary lives. A Sphinx must hold no earthly attachments. We can never experience love, or joy, or any empathy toward another being. If we do, they will die. Our power is a curse. Two-legs, if you had the power to change the world, what would you do?"

Memories of my mother caused my eyes to tear up. "I'd.... I'd make the Egyptians pay!"

"Aye. Revenge. A simple, understandable goal. And what then? Once your revenge was complete, what would you do with an eternity to live?"

"I don't know."

Moments passed.

The lion's lips curled up into a snarl, as though he were trying to smile. "You will have much time to dwell on that question. Human, I will speak my riddle now. If you can answer, I will pass my power down to you, and you will devise your riddle once you have the power. Every Sphinx has a different one, and each holds a unique power. Are you ready?"

"You want me to answer a riddle? I... I don't know anything at all."

"I'll be the judge of that."

I sought freedom my life. After being bound in slavery, I knew that the only way I could lead a worthwhile existence would be to enslave and chain those who shackled me.

Jarnof's riddle has long since faded in my mind, but I'll never forget the answer. Bird, a creature which flew free in the Earth's skies, unshackled by the laws of mankind. Somehow, for a child like me, it was the perfect question.

Jarnof bestowed his power upon me, and granted me a new life. After his death, I returned to Egypt and slaughtered those who once thought themselves my superiors.

A hundred thousand years I've lived, harnessing the power of the Sphinx to rule atop the pyramid of monsters. Two people, myself and the Pharaoh, cracked Jarnof's riddle. However, none have ever guessed mine. It's impervious. I need no friends or companions. Jarnof was weak, but I am mighty. I draw strength from my solitude.

I blink, remembering where I am.

Oh, yes, that's right. There were three before me, weren't there? Hah. Look at them, quietly whispering to one another. I haven't even turned the hourglass yet. Why haven't I? Because of pity?

Perhaps I, too, am beginning to feel the effects of age. My body stays firm and taut as the years go on, but my mind no longer holds the crispness of youth. The great wonders and mysteries of the universe no longer intrigue me, as they once did.

I... am tired.

"Hurgh. Bahamut, I have an answer to your riddle."

Kar speaks, and his booming voice jars me from my thoughts.

I blink in surprise, as I glance down at the crocodile. Unfortunate. The dumbest one of the three must be ready to say the first thing on his mind. The wise may worry they don't have the answer, but fools always assume their brilliance.

"I have yet to turn the hourglass, mighty Kar. I suggest you take more time to think it over. I am showing mercy by giving you more time. Don't waste it on thoughtless-"

"No, I'm ready." Kar cuts me off mid-sentence, flustering me. He wouldn't do that if he were my minion. I don't allow backtalk from my inferiors.

My tongue clicks and I cock my head as I finally turn the hourglass around, allowing the sand to fall. "Very well, Kar. Give your reply and accept your death."

A look of worry spreads across his face. He glances at the human male. "Turtle, are you absolutely certain?"

"Mhm. A hundred percent." The boy leans back casually and scratches his head. He seems perplexed, likely about the riddle. This should be interesting. Perhaps his guess will be more creative than others I've heard.

The crocodile croaks nervously. "Hurgh. Very well, then. The answer to your riddle is... Man."

My body freezes. A thousand needles of shock lance into my stomach, causing gaseous pain to erupt in my chest.

What.

Part 011: Riddle Me This, Hero

"What walks on four legs in the morning, two legs in the afternoon, three legs in the evening, and no legs at night?"

Bahamut chirps her question, and after a moment raises her head to stare vacantly at the sky.

Several seconds pass. My heart trembles in my chest, increasing in power until it feels like a monkey trying to break out of my ribcage.

No way. That can't be the riddle.

The Sphinx's Riddle?

The easiest riddle that every grade-schooler knows?

Maybe it's a trick. Maybe the answer is different from what I remember. Bahamut doesn't appear to be someone who would waste her time on something dumb for no reason.

I shoot a glance at Kar. He slowly lowers to his knees and makes signs with his hands. "It is over. We've lost. Father, mother, ancestors, forgive me. I should have studied more as a hatchling. We will fail this challenge and die because of my incompetence."

My eyes move slightly past him to Amelia. She continues to stand, arms limply at her side, and stare ahead blankly at Bahamut. "Too bad. I don't know the answer at all. I wish I could cry."

Neither of them knows the answer, but I do.

Man.

It's so easy that I'm having trouble coming to terms with my thoughts.

I whisper under my breath, "Kar. Amelia. I know the answer to the riddle. At least, I think I do."

Kar shakes his head. "You may hazard a guess, boy, but the riddle is nonsense. Changing legs based on the time of day... hurgh. Absolute foolishness."

Amelia turns to look at me, her expression as loose and emotionless as ever. "Jason, Kar and I haven't a chance of guessing correctly. If you think you know the answer, by all means, go ahead."

I've never been in a position like this before. The other two are completely useless. I can be the savior!

Striking a pose, I snap my fingers to get Kar's attention. "Kar, the answer to her riddle is 'Man.'"

The crocodile slowly raises his head. He ponders the answer for a few moments. "Ah, you are guessing. That cannot be the case. Man walks on two legs. He does not change how he walks based on the time of day. I had hoped for a better answer, little turtle."

"No, no, you misunderstand. A riddle doesn't use conventional logic. The time of day is an allegory for the different periods of a human's life. Morning refers to childhood, afternoon refers to our prime, the evening is old age, and night-time is death."

Several seconds pass. Kar rises to his full height. His eyes narrow, and he stares ahead silently as he mulls my answer even more. "I see. But what about the legs? Humans do not grow and lose legs at different points in their life."

"The legs are also allegorical. Babies crawl on all fours, children and adults run around on two, old folk walk with a cane, and the dead do not walk at all."

Kar's eyes light up. "Ah! I see! That's... that's brilliant, young one!"

Amelia stares at me. "Yes, that is a good answer. I like it, Jason. You have outdone yourself. I suppose since you are wearing the Crown, that much is to be expected."

Her blank expression is starting to unnerve me. It's like she's become a zombie. "Uh, thanks, Amelia. I knew the answer without the Crown, but I'm glad I had it anyway." After a moment, I turn away and cough into my hand, "Normalize."

If Amelia heard me use my Wordsmithing, she doesn't mention it. When I turn back to her, she's already blinking and rubbing her forehead. "Ugh. My head hurts. Feels like an anvil was sitting on my skull."

Hoarhiim privately appears in my mind. "It seems your Wordsmithing worked on her. I would be cautious, Jason. I'm not attached to her like I am with you, and I cannot sense her emotions in the way Blaarjiim can, but my brother's mental change was... unsettling. We orbs are affected by the emotional states of those we bond. If he displayed that much intense rage, Amelia must have snapped."

I subtly examine Amelia. She looks tired, but nowhere near as angry as a few minutes ago.

"Yeah, maybe," I whisper under my breath so only Hoarhiim can hear me. "She's okay now. Those mental visions are pretty traumatic. I saw something awful too."

Hoarhiim grunts. "Mmm. I think that if we survive this encounter, you should sit down with Amelia and have a talk about her past, as well as yours."

A moment passes. Hoarhiim looks away. "Jason, you should know that... Amelia considers you a friend. I've known her, as well as my brother, for a very long time. To say she is not friendly with many would be an understatement. My brother and I do not always see eye to eye. Blaarjiim thirsts for power, as you may have already guessed. He's been quite toned-down from his past self as of the last few days, but what you saw when Amelia erupted in rage were his true colors."

"So he's evil?"

"Not exactly. Evil is a difficult term to pin down. Some commit evil acts for righteous reasons, such as when Joan tortured and violated Amelia to teach her a lesson about pain. Others perform acts of kindness for selfish purposes, such as when an individual attempts to manipulate someone else via a favor for personal gain."

"Like a politician?"

"I don't know who those people are, but they sound unpleasant."

"You've got that right."

I chuckle wryly and bow my head to stare at the ground. I don't know Amelia very well. She has an entire past, awful events she's experienced in her life, and she was locked in a statue for millennia. The fact she could live that long must mean her mind has experienced things no other human has before. I'm just a teenager. I can't even imagine what she's gone through.

When this Bahamut crap is done, I want to learn more about her.

Raising my eyes, I smile. At least Bahamut is about to have her block knocked off. I can't wait to hear her stutter and stammer when she realizes we guessed her riddle's solution.

A minute passes as the dumb bird stares up into the sky. C'mon, stupid. Let's get this over with. I want to see you squirm.

Finally, Bahamut shakes her head. She blinks, apparently trying to get some memory out of her mind. Looking down, she tilts her head to examine each of us with her black, bulbous, birdlike eyes.

Kar, realizing Bahamut has returned to reality, clears his throat. "Hurgh. Bahamut, I have an answer to your riddle."

She holds up her hand. "I have yet to turn the hourglass, crocodile. I suggest you take more time to think it over. I am showing mercy by giving you more time. Don't waste it on thoughtless-"

Kar smirks. "No, I'm ready."

I try not to laugh, but a little air escapes my lips. Bahamut's sudden look of irritation only makes his interruption funnier.

Bahamut turns the hourglass around and allows the sand to fall. "Very well, Kar. Give your reply and accept your death."

Her confidence causes Kar's to falter. He turns to me. "Turtle, are you absolutely certain?"

"Mhm. A hundred percent."

His eyes betray his unease, but still, he stands fully upright and faces the bird-person. "Hurgh. Very well, then. The answer to your riddle is... Man."

A minute of silence passes. Bahamut stares at us wordlessly, her face not betraying a single emotion.

What is she thinking?

Abruptly, her head cocks to the right. "Hee. You're wrong."

"What?! Impossible!" The words burst out of my mouth before I even realize what I'm saying. "How can it be wrong? I know what the answer is! The time of day refers to the phases in a person's life, and the legs refer to-"

"You're wrong." Bahamut interrupts me and closes her eyes sagely. "The correct answer is 'human.'"

Wh... but... she...

"That's... that's just semantics! The meaning is the same!"

Bahamut's beak vibrates, and her feathers twitch. "It's not the same! Empty-headed fleshbag! I decide the riddle, and I decide the answer! If I say it's wrong, it's wrong! Now you all die because of your stupidity! Hah, just as I expected. Nobody can guess the correct answer to my riddle. Hmph." Her entire body starts to tremble in rage. "Worthless, pathetic insect, thinking you could guess the answer! Hah! You haven't a clue! You're all braindead, empty, idiot numbskulls!!!"

My anger slips away. I see. Bahamut's trying to rationalize so she can kill us. Damn. I didn't think she'd be such a sore loser.

Amelia smirks. "We guessed correctly, didn't we? Uphold your end of the bargain. If you don't, I'll break out of this cage and tear your head off."

Bahamut recoils ever so slightly, likely from the thought of facing Amelia's wrath. "Chrrrr! As if I'd accept defeat from a couple of humans and a slimy frog!" Bahamut suddenly hurls the hourglass at Amelia's cage. It breaks apart, exploding like a tiny grenade, and the bird holds the remote up again. "You think you're so smart, hee?! I'll activate the poison gas, and you'll die! What do you think about that, little pest?! You won't beat me! I can never lose!"

Bahamut's gone crazy. This power-mad bird-brained bitch is going to kill Amelia, then Kar and I. Why did she mention those magical runes in the ground earlier, though? I assumed it was to create a magical contract with the three of us, but maybe it was for something else.

Ah! That's right; she made it very clear that only if we failed the first two tests would we become her pawns. But why? Did the magic have a specific trigger that had to activate to take over our minds?

Hell, maybe she lied. I can't be certain.

Maybe I can stop her before she kills Amelia.

"Take."

I aim my mind at the remote in Bahamut's hand, and an instant later, it appears at my feet... along with the rest of her hand.

"Heeee!" Bahamut falls to her knees and shrieks in pain as she stares in horror at the stump where her hand used to be. Blood begins squirting from the wound, and her eyes bulge as she howls and falls to the floor, clutching the bloody stub with all her strength.

I quickly bend down to grab the remote, but pause, noticing the hand I tore from her was the one with the three rings on it. Supposedly these rings belonged to the Archangels, right?!

Bahamut raises her head and quickly scans us. She spots me reaching for her hand, and her body shivers. "N-no! Stop! Those are mine! My rings! You can't have them!"

She isn't putting on an act. These rings are invaluable to her. What if I...

Reaching down, I pluck all three of them off her hand. The rings are bland and uninteresting, but now that I can see them up close, each one has a different word inscribed across the band. The language of all three words is Latin.

Michael.

Raphael.

Gabriel.

Bahamut wasn't lying! These rings must be the genuine article.

Wordlessly, I slip the first one onto my middle finger.

Gabriel.

A moment passes.

When Gabriel's ring touches my finger, nothing happens at first. I start to vocalize my disappointment, only for the world around me to fade away.

Instead of pitch blackness like in Bahamut's earlier visions, the world transforms into pure whiteness. My eyes sting from the glare, but no matter how I try to shield them, the light pierces into my mind.

"WHO has entered my domain?!"

A voice speaks, but it comes from far above me. I wince and open my eyes a crack to try and see who's talking, but my hesitation changes to fear as a gigantic foot appears before me! The foot must be ten feet tall, for I can barely see the top of the big toe. A sandal with dozens of straps wraps around the foot and a bit past the ankle.

My eyes rove higher, and a white robe comes into view. Still further, and the knees, hips, stomach, and so on continue until I take a step back and gasp. Whoever this being is, he stands at least two hundred feet tall!

Gabriel, the Archangel: A deity so imposing he could carve a chunk out of a mountain with a sweep of his hand. His white, feathery wings stretch out a hundred feet to his left and right, and his muscular arms cross in front of his chest. When I finally look up high enough to see his face, I grow a little nervous.

"Child! I asked a question! Answer!" His voice booms from the sky, pounding the ground with primal ferocity. I stagger and dig my heels in to hold myself up. Around us, the white void shifts and a field of corpses appears. The sun shines down as if it were any other day, but the mountains of armored and unarmored humans, angels, and demons litter the land. Green grass sags under the weight of blood, and the upbeat feeling one would expect from a meadow gives way to forlornness in the wake of tragedy.

I barely squeak out a response. "A-are you Gabriel?"

With terrifying speed, the giant lurches to his knees, causing a gale of wind to pummel my body. "Indeed, I am. Who art thou, and how dids't thee obtain my ring?"

"I'm... I'm Jason Hiro. I solved Bahamut's riddle, but she decided not to uphold her end of the bargain. She was going to kill us, so I tore her hand from her body and-"

"Bahamut? Stop speaking in tongues, boy. I know not of such a name." The giant uncurls his arms from his chest and swings them toward me. I gasp and curl reflexively into a defensive position, but he stops just before hitting me, extends a finger the size of my body, and pokes my back. "Tiny little thing. What a runt. Human, judging by thy appearance."

I blush and slowly rise to my feet. "Uh, um, yeah? I'm human. I-is that bad?"

"Hoho! Bad? Far from it! I've been cooped up for so long that I was growing bored! I'm just glad to have someone to chat with!" The Archangel stands up again, and the motion causes an updraft, yanking me off of my feet and nearly tossing me into the sky. "Surprising, though. None should be able to activate my ring except for another angel. They're all dead, unfortunately."

He utters the words casually, as though he couldn't care less. Despite that, his flippant observation of the past has a ring of pain to it.

"The angels are all dead?"

Gabriel gazes into the distance. "I have come to call our final stand the Day of Reckoning. The demonic onslaught was so sudden and swift that we hadn't a chance to prepare. Demons have little mercy for other beings. They are the most vicious of the sentient species, without exception."

"I'm sorry," I murmur. "That must have been..."

"The worst day of my life. Aye. Brothers and sisters I had known for millions of years fell one after the other. I exhausted my power and could only watch. Perhaps a quick, merciful death was for the best. Maybe we deserved to die."

A gasp escapes my lips. "What?! Nobody deserves to die! Certainly not angels! I mean... you're angels! Why would you think agents of justice deserved such a fate?"

"Hah. I like thee, child." Gabriel strokes the scruffy white hair lining his face. It doesn't entirely form a beard, nor does it match with the long, gangly hair on his head, but it gives him a superficial air of authority different from his imposing figure. "What is thy name?"

"Jason Hiro."

Gabriel blinks. "Jason Hiro, hm? Amusing. That name can't be coincidental. I said before that only an angel who wore my ring could speak to me, but that wasn't entirely true."

I raise an eyebrow. "If not an angel, then who...?"

The massive Archangel bends down again, but this time much more gracefully. Winds don't even kick up. He gently reaches a finger forward and touches the top of my head.

A series of images appear in my mind. Men and women bow before altars of various gods. Some wear the armor of monarchs, while others stumble about in rags.

The vision shifts to show a different scene, one of an army of demons and monsters standing off against thousands of angels and millions of humans. The angels levitate in the sky, while the humans form ranks with shields and spears.

"Long before man grew powerful enough to fight demon and monster on his own, he aligned with the angels and Titans to stand up to the infection that demons and their kin spread across the Earth. We fought together time after time, seeking to rid the world of their filth and to restore purity to the only home we ever knew."

Gabriel continues. "However, in those ancient days, even with our combined efforts, the demons were nigh unstoppable. Humans could not exterminate them fast enough. One demon could slay five members of thy species with ease, reaping their souls and increasing the power of his allies in turn. While humans, Titans, and demons could reproduce, angels could not, meaning that every one of our kind lost permanently diminished our numbers."

I want to rub my head due to a stinging pain, but can't move my arms. "How did you overcome such dire odds?"

"We merged our powers with that of man. A forbidden union of Titan, angel, and human forged a new soul, one that would later come to be known as the Heroic Aura. A human gifted with the powers of the Heroic Aura could lead the charge into battle. This proved to be the exact weapon needed to combat demonkind. For a time, stability improved. We began to drive the demonic hordes back."

Gabriel pulls away, and I can finally move again. Fatigue hits me, as though I've lived the lives he beamed into my mind. "For a time? What changed?"

"Many factors shifted over time. The important thing, Jason, is the Heroic Aura. There can only be one Hero at a given time. When they die, the aura moves to a new vessel, and that person gains incredible power."

An electric shock shoots down my spine. "Wait! J-Joan of Arc! Wasn't she a Hero?"

Gabriel nods. "Mmm. Joan. Yes. A short-lived Hero of justice, but one that stood out like a shining star. Her quick end at the hands of her species, the very ones she was charged to protect, caused a significant schism between human and angelkind. Things changed after her death."

"Like what?"

"In time, all will be made clear, young one. Know this: If my assumption is correct, then thou art a descendant of the Heroes of lore. Thou art cut from the same cloth as King Solomon, King Arthur, Jepthath the Shepherd, Joan of Arc, and so many before and after them. There is only one problem..."

I wait, but he doesn't elaborate. "And what's that?"

Gabriel's face twists into confusion. "In the human calendar of the ancient times, near the turn of the year 1900, the Heroic Aura vanished. No matter where we looked, the angels and Titans could not find the next in line. Hundreds of years later, as the Energy Wars reached their apex, and our ultimate defeat, we knew then the truth: Someone had managed to extinguish the Aura, forever. Perhaps, had there been a Hero during those dark times, we might have survived."

Silence.

The Archangel stares at me, then slowly closes his eyes. Anguish radiates from every part of his body.

My hands begin to tremble. "G-Gabriel... you said the year 1900, right?"

"Mmm. Indeed."

"I... I was born in the year 2010. If I'm a Hero, then... well, you see... I put myself in a cryogenic stasis pod. I was asleep for a hundred thousand years, and only emerged from it recently... which might mean..."

The angel raises his head to look at me. "The Heroic Aura will not pass on to the next Hero without the former passing away. If ye sealed thyself in this 'cryogenic stasis pod' as ye claim, then..." His voice trails off. "I do not know for certain."

"I have powers! I have an ability I call Wordsmithing!" My heart begins to beat furiously. "I... I must be a Hero! If I'm the missing Hero, then that means I left everyone behind to die! Earth fell because of me!"

A look of alarm appears on Gabriel's face. "Thou hath the gift of magic? When dids't thy ability first appear?"

I wasn't expecting that question.

A moment passes. I finally remember. "I touched an orb of light, and the person inside of it gave me a bunch of magical power, or energy, or... something." Pausing, I remember what Hoarhiim told me. "But I later learned that I had the power all along, and he merely amplified it."

Gabriel shakes his head. "No, how old were thee when thy power manifested?"

That answer comes much more easily. "Eighteen. Well, technically I was a hundred thousand and eighteen, but who's counting?"

A smile creeps across Gabriel's face. "Boy, thou hath given me something I lost an eternity ago; hope. Hope is a powerful weapon, able to turn ragtag militia into efficient armies. As long as one has it, they will fight to their dying breath. If thou art indeed the Hero reborn, the future is not as bleak as I've come to expect."

"Huh?" I take a few steps back as the weight of his words hit me. "Do... do you expect me to do something about... all of this? The demons, the Labyrinth, and all the rest of it?"

"Of course. 'Tis thy solemn duty, Jason Hiro. The angels and Titans have long-since entered the Great Beyond, but the demons would be lax if they were to throw their food and energy supply away. Humans still exist, somewhere out there. As the Hero, 'tis thy responsibility to unite thy people against the demonic menace and take back that which they stole from us."

"I... I can't do that! I'm just a kid! I don't know how to save anyone!"

Gabriel's smile vanishes and irritation replaces it. "How impudent of thee. Alexander the Great was a fresh-faced, eager sixteen when he raised an army to slay the demonic hordes. Joan of Arc fought for but a few precious years before other humans burned her at the stake. She was only nineteen. Thy right to object is null. As others have given their lives in the service of humanity, so too must ye, for who will rise to the cause if not thee?"

A moment passes.

Gabriel is right. I don't have a good counter to his logic. Suddenly there's this huge weight on my shoulders, but I don't know if I can handle it.

Perhaps sensing my uncertainty, Gabriel's anger fades. "Jason, the path the Hero must walk is an arduous one. Alexander the Great faced many difficulties over his short life, as did all other Heroes. Many died in spectacular battles that gave way to stories, myths, and legends... but some Heroes shirked their duty. They rejected the call and squandered their gifts, leading debauched lives. The difference is that in those days, humanity and the angels were able to fend off the demons for a time until the Hero died and passed their power to the next in line. No longer do we have such a luxury! Thou must train with all thy heart and soul if ye expect to right thy past wrongs."

Gabriel rises to his feet again, and the field of grass changes around us. I suddenly begin to fall as I appear in outer space, where the distant twinkles of millions of stars shine brighter than I ever saw on Earth. Gabriel's form expands, and he grows to the size of the Sun, then past that, until he is as big as the Solar system.

Continuing, Gabriel takes me on a journey through the cosmos until we arrive outside of the Milky Way. He gently holds his hand underneath the galaxy, allowing it to spiral in his palm.

"Thou art a speck within many specks, Jason. Even so, among humans, thy power is as unstoppable a force in their eyes as the galaxy is in thine. If ye do not fight the demons, humans will live in subjugation to them for all eternity. They will languish in darkness forever."

Gabriel reaches his hand toward me and pulls back his finger, pinching it with his thumb. A second later, he flicks me, shattering my consciousness and sending me careening across the universe.

"Go, Jason, and be the Hero thou were meant to be."

Recommended Listening.

Hero.

The word plays in my mind as Gabriel fades away. My body falls, for one year, for ten, for a million.

I'm somebody important, someone with the power to right the wrongs of the world. I have an ability passed down by ancient legends I once read about in mythology textbooks. What feats did they accomplish? What feats can I perform?

...That isn't important. Gabriel is right. I've stumbled around aimlessly my whole life. I've sought to pursue my pathetic desires without thinking of others. I've been selfish and arrogant while ending up the progeny of fate. Yes, I have suffered, but others have endured worse and even died because of me.

I shouldn't have frozen myself in the Cryopod. If I had stayed on Earth, I might have been able to save it. I doomed my fellow humans, all because I felt a little depressed.

Pathetic.

What would Amanda say? What would my mother say? Am I going to give up, just like she did? I have to fight. Everyone depends on me, even if they don't know it yet!

My body falls through clouds, and the arena from before appears below me as I hurtle to certain death. I'm not scared, though. It's just an illusion.

Ah, there I am. Bahamut stands before my cage, screaming something I can't make out, while my slumped figure lies on the ground unmoving.

Here it comes. I'm going to merge with myself once more.

My soul slams into my mind with the force of a comet.

"Hwah!" I yell something unintelligible and leap to my feet, frantically scanning the arena. A dull roar greets my ears as my hearing pops back in. Only now do I hear the maniacal ranting and raving of Bahamut as she screeches and screams.

"Insect! Thief! Monster! Give my rings back! They're mine! MINE!!"

Blinking, I spin to look at Kar and Amelia. The relief on their faces is evident as our eyes meet.

"I thought you died!" Amelia smiles cheerfully at me, but pauses and shivers. "Ooh, what's that sudden chill? Does anyone else feel it?"

Looking away, I glance down at my hand. Gabriel's ring is still on my finger, but the other two were clenched so tightly in my palm that they left circular imprints.

Raphael. Michael. I'll try them out, but later. Right now, I have other goals. Wordlessly, I slip them in my pocket and spin to face Bahamut.

Something about my posture strikes a nerve. Bahamut stops screeching and takes a step back. "Wh-what?! What are you staring at?"

My body feels different. Maybe it's just my imagination, but my energy feels more intense than before. The birdlike figure of Bahamut doesn't cut quite the intimidating figure she once did.

"Sphinx. A unique monster species. The Sphinx's spirit travels from body to body by way of Riddle Magic, granting its user unprecedented strength, agility, and immortality. It doesn't distinguish between any species, only that it must enter the mind of something intelligent enough to answer the riddle. Is that about right?"

Bahamut clutches her stump and narrows her eyes. "Where did you learn that? Did... did the Archangel tell you something?!"

"No. The Crown did. Just now. It's the Crown of Solomon, you know. Unparalleled knowledge, all that fun stuff. Bahamut, you've been a naughty girl, haven't you? You were born a human, yet you've abused the power of the Sphinx to your advantage, and even gone so far as to enslave members of your former species."

Bahamut takes another step backward. "Hee. What... what is this? Who are you? Before, you cowered like a rat. Now you stand tall and act confident! Do you think I'm frightened of you?! I have an army that heeds my call!"

Saying this, she snaps her fingers, and several corrupted monsters rush onto the stage from the sidelines. Based on their body language, none of them like or respect her, but they're unable to resist and must follow her commands.

Crown, give me information on mental manipulation. I want to know what the Sphinx can do with riddle magic.

Walls of text appear in front of my eyes, but nobody else can see them. I peruse their contents in an instant, using the Crown to augment my reading speed.

"I see. You bend others to your will with strictly enforced clauses in your riddle magic. I was right in guessing as much earlier. Unfortunately for you, I can undo your magic."

Bahamut balks. "Chrrr! Hee! As if! You're just a human! Even if you managed to speak with the Archangel, you're still nothing!"

"No."

From the sky above, a familiar voice speaks. Everyone's heads jerk up to look at it. Only now do I notice a chilly sensation that's been giving me goosebumps. It's Gabriel.

His massive form devours the horizon, but it's only an apparition. He isn't alive in his full body, but instead in spirit form. The Archangel is different from how I saw him, as he now wears golden armor and a Viking-style helmet. In his right hand, he grips a sword made of pure light, and in the other, a silver shield emblazoned with a glowing, golden cross.

"The one who stands before thee is none other than the reincarnation of the HERO. Repent and beg forgiveness, lest he smite thee where ye stand. Bare thy sins before him, or die knowing thy injustice was brought to a deserved end!"

Bahamut's eyes bulge as I lower my head to stare at her. She jumps back even further and holds a palm up to me. "A Hero?! Impossible! They died out! Went extinct! Vanished!"

"It seems I'm the last one. I will slay those who commit vile acts and atrocities, especially upon humans. You will be the first to fall."

I reach my hand forward and aim at the barrier surrounding me. "Fizzle."

A crackling sound of electricity follows after a loud pop, and the barrier fades away. I step through without any resistance, regarding Bahamut with even less fear than I did a minute ago. She's more pathetic than I thought.

"Hee! Guards! A-attack! Take the Hero down before it's too late!"

All of her guardsmen move in lockstep like a tsunami, intent on bringing their weapons to crash against my bones.

They don't get a chance. "Release."

With a single word, I break Bahamut's mind-control spell over them. The guards falter and stumble, giving me time to hop back and avoid them as they fall over each other and slump to the ground.

"What?"

"Her control! It's broken!"

"We're free!"

Before my eyes, the black smoke pouring from their bodies slows to a trickle, then disperses. Several of the monsters morph and change into humans, while others shrink from hulking behemoths back to average sizes. It seems her powers had other effects as well.

Bahamut staggers and stutters. "You... you undid..."

"Your spell? A trivial matter. Fizzle. Fizzle." With two words, I release my friends. "Kar, I think our dear Sphinx is hungry."

He steps out of his former cage and raises an eyebrow. "I beg your pardon, little turtle?"

"Give her a knuckle sandwich."

I wink at him and smile at Amelia, only to see a blank expression on her face. She hasn't moved from her cage and continues to stare at the sky toward Gabriel.

"Amelia?"

No response.

Shrugging, I tap Gabriel's ring. "How do I put him away, I wonder?"

After a few moments, air rushes toward me. I watch silently as Gabriel sucks into the ring. Before he leaves, Gabriel whispers so only I can hear him. "Thy companion's heart is besieged by darkness. Stay safe, Hero."

His form shrinks the remainder of the way and absorbs into the ring, causing it to glow and warm up for a moment before returning to its inert state.

I turn to look at Amelia, and am taken aback by her hollow gaze. Her eyes meet mine.

"So you're a Hero, huh?" Her voice is nearly a whisper.

My heart stops.

Oh. Oh no. I forgot what Amelia went through. I forgot what Joan did to her.

I'm an awful friend.

This is Gabriel.

Part 012: The Past, The Present, And The Monster Within

Amelia turns away, unable to meet my gaze. The expression on her face says it all. I should have known you were a Hero. I thought we were friends, but you betrayed me. How can I ever trust you after this?

She clutches Blaarjiim's orb to her chest and turns to walk away. "Don't even look at me."

"Amelia! I didn't know! I just found out!"

Immediately, I turn away from the defeated and humbled Bahamut to jog to Amelia's side. She's already walked a few steps away, but I grab her arm to stop her. "Please, can't we just talk for a minute?"

Amelia violently yanks her arm from my grasp. Tears well up in her eyes as she whips her head back to look at me. "I told you to stay away! You're a liar!"

Before I can react, Amelia pounds her foot into the ground and leaps away. The shockwave from her superhuman jump knocks me off my feet. I watch in astonishment as she leaps over the edge of the cliff and lands somewhere into the canyon below.

I stare blankly for a few seconds, before craning my head back. "Kar. Listen, I need to talk to Amelia. Can you handle Bahamut without me?"

The crocodile grunts. "Hurgh. Females are complex, little turtle. Do not let her be alone with her thoughts. If she begins to imagine falsities, it will tear both of you apart." He pauses. "As for the False Goddess, I will handle her myself."

"Thanks, Kar. You're the best."

There's no reason to worry. I've seen the limits of Bahamut's strength, and now that she's facing off against a turncoat army and Kar, she hasn't a prayer of winning.

I dash over to the ledge and peer into the canyon. Amelia is nowhere in sight. "Shit. Hoarhiim, any idea where she went?"

The deity of light shakes his head. "Nay. She may have entered the mines, but since she seeks solitude, the forest is much more likely. Surely you can find her with your ability?"

My heart skips a beat. Right, Wordsmithing. Duh! I need to start using it more! Hmm. Something to track her, is it? Loads of words come to mind.

Ah, right! I can use that one word from earlier!

"Locate."

Immediately, my eyes suck from my body, leap over the edge of the cliff, and hurtle to the canyon below. Then, they take a sickening lurch to the right and race into the forest. Within seconds my disembodies eyes tear through foliage and vines to find Amelia. As she runs, her dress catches on thorns and brambles. It rips at the seams, all due to her extreme speed as she runs through the forest.

A moment later, my vision returns to my body. "Amelia's moving fast, Hoarhiim. I can't possibly catch her."

Hoarhiim crosses his arms. "Is that so? Perhaps you should try thinking outside the box. You've barely begun to fathom Wordsmithing's potential. Think, Jason. Think."

I nod and furrow my brow. "Right. I can't use 'speed,' since I'll end up meat paste when I hit a tree. What can I do to catch up to Amelia…?"

Behind me, Kar howls with laughter. "Come on then, little birdie! I passed your test! Be a good sport and concede!"

A quick glance back shows Kar and Bahamut's forces converging on the helpless bird-lady. She backs up to the edge of the arena, but no matter where she looks, there's nowhere to run. Thousands of newly freed slaves linger below the platform and eyeball her with looks of rage and disgust.

"Heeee! Stay back! I own you! You're all mine! You can't turn on me like this!"

One of the monsters, a goblin by the looks of him, cackles. "Kekekeke! How the tables have turned, 'boss'! I owe you for what you did to me!"

An orc nearby yells in agreement. "Yeah, me do too!"

Suddenly, an idea comes to mind. I turn back to face the forest. "Hoarhiim, if I run through the underbrush, I'll never catch up to Amelia, but what if I travel above the canopy?"

The deity of light smiles. "That's the way, Jason. That's the way."

Perfect. "Flight."

Almost immediately, my feet levitate an inch off the ground, and the sudden lack of dirt under my shoes makes me yelp in fright and tumble off the cliff. "Aaaahhh!!!"

…Only for me to realize I've started hovering in midair.

Holy shit! I'm Superman!

Unlike the Man of Steel, however, my movements are anything but graceful. I fly around ass-first for a few moments, then suddenly my feet start dragging me around. No matter how I stretch my fist out, I can't form a Superman pose and fly naturally.

Frustrated, I lower myself to the stairs below while bashing against the cliff face a couple of times. "Normalize. Wings."

This time, feathery grey wings sprout from my back. The sensation is painless, and after they finish forming, I note with interest that they resemble the wings Gabriel had.

It's time to test my new appendages out. With a mighty flap of my wings, I leap a hundred feet into the air. My eyes bulge, and a horrified scream escapes my lips as my fear of heights swallows my mind. After a few moments, I swallow huge chunks of pizza and refocus my vision. Thanks to Solomon's Crown, I manage to reorient my body, then I check to see if I pissed myself.

Luckily, I did not.

A glance below me shows Kar beating the ever-loving shit out of Bahamut and laughing all the while. I can't hear what he's saying, but he has things under control.

A minute later, I begin gliding above the forest canopy. My wings are much easier to fly with, giving me the ability to stabilize myself, perform tricks and loop-the-loops, and other kinds of aerial maneuvers. It occurs to me as I flap around that if I had to engage in combat, aerial supremacy would be an excellent way to give myself an edge in a fight. I'll make a mental note for later.

However, as the minutes pass and the wall of trees stretches out before me, I realize I can't see anything below. Using Locate again will disorient me and send me crashing into the ground, but perhaps there's another way.

Once again, the Crown augments my mental responsiveness and an idea forms. "Thermal."

My sight blurs for a moment, and changes to a heat-based vision type, allowing me to see patches of blue for cold, and red for warmth. It only takes a minute of scanning the forest below to notice a tree shaking, along with a tiny form of redness at the base of it. I deactivate my thermals, swoop down, and pierce the canopy in one smooth motion. My wings are surprisingly resilient, allowing me to slow my fall and land on my feet without jarring my spine.

I see her, now. Amelia stands with her back to me and punches a tree over and over again. "Liar! Liar! Liar!"

Her strength causes the ground to tremble and sends ripples of air pressure through the tightly-knitted woodland. I mutter under my breath, "Normalize," and my wings shrink inside my body. I touch my back and notice my black jacket is torn apart, but it's the least of my worries.

"Amelia! Amelia!"

My voice echoes through the forest, and she stops hitting the tree. Pivoting around, she scowls at me, tears in her eyes. "Wh-what do you want?! I told you to leave me alone, Jason! We're not friends anymore!"

Her black dress is ripped and torn all over. It's as if she ran straight through a blackberry patch without stopping. Despite the damage to her clothing, I don't see a single cut or scratch on her skin. It's moments like these that make me realize how decidedly inhuman she can be.

"Yes, we are, Amelia. Stop saying that." I take a step toward her, and she tenses up.

"Oh, yeah, good friends! Great friends! Why not use that sword at your waist and cut me into chunks! How about dipping my limbs in boiling oil, or blasting me with holy energy?! That's what Joan did to me! That's what YOU did to me!"

"I don't know what you're talking about, Amelia." I take a few more steps toward her, holding my palm up to try and calm her down. "I'm not Joan, okay? I don't have any of Joan's memories, or know any of her-"

"Bullshit! Lies!" Amelia kicks her foot in the ground and sends dirt flying at me, along with leaves and a twig or two. "Do you think I'm stupid?! First, you tortured me, then you locked me in a statue, and after giving me nightmares for tens of thousands of years, you released me, all so you could see how pitiful I've become! Well? What do you think? Do you like how much I've suffered?! Does my pain fill you with joy?!"

She's irrational. Her voice cracks, and more tears come down with every word. I've never seen her, or, hell, anyone else for that matter, this shattered before. Her level of emotion is way beyond anything I've ever handled.

Even so, I must fight.

"Amelia, I need you to calm down, okay? I'm not Joan. Joan is someone else. I'm Jason. I'm your friend."

"Jason, Joan, it's practically the same name! You might as well have red letters above your head screaming 'HA-HA' because your pun is SO clever!"

Christ. Now Amelia's using wordplay to spin a bunch of conspiracies in her mind.

"Amelia... come on. That's... how can I prove I'm not lying? I didn't know anything about you when we met. You and I have already been through some terrible things together; surely we can talk stuff out."

She hesitates, for a brief second. "Yeah? Talk? What do you want to say, Jason? Are you going to apologize for what you did to me? Can you do that? What good would words be, huh? They won't give me back all the time I've lost!"

I swallow, feeling a lump of dirt form in my throat. "Amelia, I'm not lying. Whatever Joan did to you was horrible. I can't apologize enough for her actions, but she isn't me. We're different people. We're-"

Amelia suddenly slumps forward, falls to her knees and begins to wail. "Uwaaa! Don't say it! Don't remind me! I don't want to remember!" She buries her face in her hands, dropping Blaarjiim's orb on the ground midway into the motion. "Aaahh!"

She screams uncontrollably for over a minute. "Bastard! I hate you! I hate you!!"

Eventually, Amelia's anguish subsides slightly. She wraps her arms around her legs and begins rocking back and forth, as if trying to make herself as small as possible. Her actions remind me of a child throwing a tantrum... only more visceral — more raw.

Calmly and gently, I walk over and kneel beside the crying girl. She may claim to be thousands of years old, but her mentality is still child-like. Her emotional maturity is stunted, clouded by her past.

Hesitantly, I reach a hand over and rest it on her shoulder. "Amelia. I'm sorry. I... I didn't ask to become a Hero. I don't even know what a Hero is."

She chokes back a whimper. "Heroes are vicious killers. They always hurt me. You'll hurt me too."

"I wouldn't do that," I say, putting as much reassurance into my voice as possible. "I'd never hurt you, Amelia. A hero is supposed to be a good guy. If other Heroes have done evil things, then... then... I'll make up for it! I'll be a better Hero than any of them ever were."

A few moments pass as she sniffles uncontrollably.

"R-really?" Amelia swipes her arm across both eyes and rubs her tears onto her dress. "Do.... do you mean that?"

"Well, yeah. I don't lie, Amelia. We're friends, and that means we don't hurt each other. If you need help, I'll always offer a hand. That's just how it works."

Amelia doesn't look me in the eye. She continues to stare at the ground, even as she clenches her fists together and rubs them against her knees. "You think I'm a bad girl, don't you?"

"Huh? No. I don't think that."

"But... when Bahamut made me see the past, you saw me at my worst. I freaked out and exploded. I went berserk!" Now she looks up at me, and her eyes puff up and pulse red from how hard she's been crying. "I'm dangerous, Jason!"

For some reason, I don't want to look into her eyes. I reach around and pull her close, hugging her. She squeaks in surprise, not expecting me to embrace her so suddenly. Her body tenses up, and just when I feel like I've made a mistake, she exhales. A moment later, she leans into my embrace and falls silent.

Her small frame shakes slightly now and then, as if she's trying to choke down a sob, but after a few minutes, they stop. I rub the back of her head gently, and we share our feelings through touch instead of words.

When I pull away, she opens her mouth, perhaps to protest, but gives up halfway.

"Amelia. Do you still sense any hostility from me? Do you think I'm trying to hurt you?"

She looks away, shakes her head, and twirls her long black hair through her fingers. "No..."

I pick Blaarjiim's orb off the ground and hand him to her. "Good. I never want you to think like that again, okay? If we have a problem, we should talk it out. There's always a resolution."

"Uhn."

Amelia crosses her arms.

"I... I was wrong about you, Jason. I'm sorry. I never wanted to hurt you."

"Oh, jeez." I reach back and itch my scalp. "It's not a big deal. Sometimes people say things they don't mean, you know?"

"No, I don't know. I've never talked to anyone sincerely in my entire life, other than Blaarjiim. I'm... I'm glad I have you as a friend, though. Without you, I'd..." She trails off, unable to finish her sentence.

"You'd what?"

"Nothing."

Amelia jumps to her feet and takes a few steps to the side, putting distance between us.

"Let's drop it, okay? You left Kar all alone up there. We should go and help him out."

"Kar is fine, Amelia." I stand up as well, but a little more slowly and deliberately. "What about you? Are you fine?"

She nods, but won't meet my gaze. "Yes. Thank you. Why did you hold me, though? I'm not complaining or anything, it just felt nice."

I squirm slightly. "It's called a 'hug'. People who are very close friends do that sometimes. It's a sign of trust."

"You... you trust me?" Amelia raises her eyes and finally looks into mine. "After everything that's happened?"

"Yes. Especially because of what's happened."

For the first time since seeing me as a Hero, Amelia smiles. It's a beautiful expression, one lacking any sarcasm, apathy, or any other cynical emotions. A genuine, honest-to-god pure feeling of warmth radiates from her.

"I see. Thank you, Jason."

I'm glad Jason came after me, but I'm also angry.

I'm angry that I didn't put the pieces together sooner. I should have realized when Jason used his powers the first time, let alone the other times; he was a Hero.

I'm angry that I trusted him. His smile seemed genuine, but now I realize he has the same look in his eyes as all the other humans I've met.

Now I'm even angrier at myself for forgiving him. Since he's apologized and sworn to me to be a kind person who won't hurt me, I have to keep trusting him.

Jason's voice suddenly interrupts my thoughts. "Amelia, are you ready?"

"Huh? Ready for what?"

His smile fades a little. "Err, we're going back to see Kar. And, um, your dress is all torn up. I can fix that for you."

Looking down, I suddenly feel embarrassed by my exposed body. My mangled dress catches Jason's gaze, even though he looks away. It's torn up, ripped here and there, and I can even see my white under-blouse in several spots!

"Don't... don't look." I suddenly feel self-conscious and start to pull away, but Jason sighs.

"Jeez, Amelia. I can't see anything underneath," Saying that, he still blushes and looks away. "Besides, I'm not into kids. Mend."

The sounds of ripping fabric make me look down. After a few seconds, my dress pieces itself back together again. It becomes as good as new.

"Oh. Um, thanks."

"Yeah, anytime."

Both of us fidget for a few seconds before he says something under his breath. The instant he finishes speaking, two feathery wings erupt from his back.

I gawk at them for a moment. "How did you do that? Wordsmithing?"

"Yeah. I chased after you by using these."

I nod and silently take the feathery wings in. They're grey, a different color from the angels I've seen, but otherwise the same size and look. Jason gave himself the flight capabilities and appearance of an angel, and he did it with only a single word. His power is incredible.

Blaarjiim notices, and whispers to me. "It looks like the mortal is already beginning to experiment with his heroic aura."

Jason takes a few steps forward and extends his hand. "Do you trust me?"

"Huh? Oh, yes, I suppose so."

He stammers. "Err, that line was from an old movie- uh, never mind. Look, I'll fly us back to Kar, okay?"

I try not to sound suspicious of his intentions. "How?"

Jason blushes madly. He quickly walks over beside me and kneels to wrap his arm around my waist. "Hold on."

Suddenly I realize what his intentions are. I try not to let out a squeak as he flaps his wings and we both take off. The wind yanks my head back and makes my mouth flap wildly for a moment as we erupt out of the trees and into the sky.

Jason's smooth rise upward falters after a moment, and he grunts, "Ugh, you're heavier than I expected."

I spit a leaf out. "Hey! Are you calling me fat?"

A nervous laugh. "Haha... uh, that came out wrong!"

"Idiot."

I'd cross my arms if I were on the ground, but since I'm a few hundred feet up, I settle for a pouty look and wrap my arm around his waist a little tighter. "D-don't drop me, okay?"

With more sincerity than usual, Jason smiles. "I'll never let go."

I avoid his gaze. "Idiot."

I hold Amelia firmly with my left arm, using as much strength as I can muster to keep us airborne until we reach the mountain-top once again. The moment my feet touch the ground, I stifle a sigh of relief. I almost insulted Amelia's weight once, so I'd rather not repeat that mistake.

Amelia quickly pushes away from me and fluffs her dress, shivering for a moment, but not due to the cold. "You know, Jason, it's considered polite to warn a girl before you sweep her off her feet like that."

I glance past her at Bahamut's arena. The back of Kar's head catches my attention, along with the other monsters on the opposite side of the upraised platform. "Sorry. I'm kind of awkward. My social skills are lousy."

She sniffles. "It's fine. That makes two of us."

A minute later, we climb the platform, walk across it, and peer down at the crowd below. Thousands of monsters kneel and stare at Bahamut's broken and battered corpse.

Amelia gasps. "Kar! What happened to you?"

I frown, unsure what Amelia means. The moment Kar turns to look at us, I understand. His face has morphed dramatically. No longer does he have a long, crocodilian snout, but instead, a vaguely human-proportioned set of facial features, along with green scales and sharp, dagger-like teeth.

Kar waves at us, and when he speaks, the growly voice he had before sounds more pleasing to the ears. "Hello, Amelia and Jason. I see you made up with each other."

He isn't calling me a turtle anymore, so that's a positive change in my book.

"Yeah, we're doing fine now, Kar. Uh, what happened to your-"

He interrupts me. "My apologies, but given that I have vanquished the fiend known as Bahamut and thus inherited the power of the Sphinx from her, the name 'Kar' no longer suits me. I have yet to choose a suitable replacement, and was wondering if perhaps you might offer aid to help me in my endeavor."

Amelia and I both stare at Kar blankly. She points her finger at him. "He's weird now. I don't like it."

Kar suddenly laughs. "Hurgh! I fooled you! Speaking like that wears me out. Jokes aside, I am the new Sphinx. I need a new name."

I breathe a sigh of relief. "Good to have you back. Let's worry about your name later. I want to know what happened to Bahamut after I left."w

Kar gazes at me for a moment, then gestures to her limp corpse. "I killed her."

"Yes, but how?"

A look of recognition appears in his eyes. "Ah, that's what you mean. I used my fists."

This guy... he's still a meathead. I decide to drop the line of inquiry. "If you're a Sphinx now, what's changed?"

Kar shrugs. "I think I have gained strength, but it is difficult to say. Hurgh. I can use Riddle Magic, but I haven't tried yet."

The other monsters around us have been silent up to now, but one of them, a goblin I saw before, raises his hand. "Hey! I got a question! Are we all still slaves now or what?!"

Kar immediately shakes his head. "No. You're all free to do as you please. Bahamut's black magic no longer binds you."

"Nice." The goblin turns around and decks a smaller goblin in the face. "That's for stealing my sweet roll yesterday!"

"Hey! I'll knock yer block off!"

The scrawnier one jumps to his feet and starts to take a revenge swing at the first, but Kar suddenly roars, "Hey! Stop! Monsters must not fight among each other, not on this sacred day of liberation!"

Both goblins look at each other guiltily, then sag back into sitting positions.

I examine the horde of transformed turncoats. Perhaps fifty humans sit among the hundreds of monsters here and there, and they all wear beaten-up armor. Some wield swords and shields, while a few with others hold bows and arrows. The monsters barely take notice of them.

I gesture toward the humans. "I thought Bahamut put humans in the mines, but you're up here hanging with monsters. What's the deal?"

One woman, perhaps thirty years old, stands up. "Um, I can answer that." Her medium-length white hair hangs down in front of and behind her shoulders. Her pristine leather armor sticks out from the mess of people around her, and she carries an aura of authority. She appears both confused and dismayed, yet also thankful and hopeful as well.

"Great, go ahead then, miss...?"

She meets my eyes and quickly looks back at a blank patch on the ground. "Phoebe, your grace. Phoebe Berthold, a retainer under King Arthur, as it were. The humans here were born of different political or physical stature than those in the mines. Sir Adams, for example, worked closely with a man named Napoleon, while Sir Jorrin was a general in the Roman armies."

"King Arthur? The Romans? Aren't they ancient societies? How old are you?"

Amelia smacks me. "Jason! First the weight, now age too? Stop asking women such personal questions!"

Phoebe holds a hand up. "He meant no offense, young one. Indeed, Bahamut's magic changed us into monsters and gave us temporary immortality. Now that she is dead, I suspect we shall wither and die as well, or we will continue aging as we did before."

Grim, I think to myself. I wouldn't want to be in their shoes. Then again, it sounds like Phoebe and the other humans have gone through something similar to my Cryopod's freezing process. Maybe they were 'frozen' at their current ages for thousands of years, and since Bahamut is dead, they'll age normally now.

I guess we have something in common.

"Thank you for the explanation, Miss Berthold."

She blushes. "I merely perform my duties for the Hero, your grace, as do we all. To meet a second Hero in my lifetime is an honor I cannot express with words."

"A second Hero?" I echo her words. "Who was the first?"

Before Phoebe even says the hero's name, I mentally facepalm for not remembering what she said only seconds ago. "King Arthur."

Phoebe reaches down to her side and clutches the sword at her waist tightly. "He was a venerable and honorable hero, one who gave his life to save the kingdom. I pray you will be as just as he."

"Err, I'll try."

I glance at Amelia, but her expression blanks out for some reason. "King Arthur, huh?"

"What, did you know him or something?"

Amelia slowly rubs her finger across her lips. "Did I, I wonder?"

"What do you mean?"

She shrugs. "I haven't mentioned this before, Jason, but I have terrible memory problems; especially after Joan sealed me away. My past is a blur, and Blaarjiim wasn't around back then so he can't help me either."

"Oh, shucks." I rub my head and look away. Great, now Amelia is manic-depressive, suffering from trauma, and she has memory problems too. A cornucopia of quirks!

Three hours later, I yawn as Kar raises a torch and presses it against a wooden pyre. Bahamut's body lays atop it, motionless, as if waiting for her end to come.

A fire begins to rage, and her form engulfs in flames while the several hundred monsters and humans around us watch in silence. Nobody here holds any love for her, but as Kar argued, all life is sacred and deserves respect. Even those whom we hate.

Hoarhiim bows his head. "You've done well, so far, Jason."

Amelia isn't here. She followed a few monsters over to Bahamut's palace to rest. I haven't ever seen Amelia fall asleep, but she said she was tired, so anything is possible.

"Thanks, Hoarhiim. It's rare for you to commend me out of the blue, though."

He nods sagely. "Yes, well, today you went above and beyond the call of duty. You solved the riddle within seconds, chased after the friend you cared for, convinced her of your heartfelt intentions, and returned to find an ally boosted thanks to your efforts. To say the day went off without a hitch might not be accurate, but few have accomplished so much in such a short time."

"Yeah," I mutter. "And I found out I was a Hero, too."

Hoarhiim doesn't respond for a moment. When he does, he speaks slowly. "Do you... regret that discovery?"

"No. Well, yes, maybe. A little bit. I know I shouldn't."

Hoarhiim holds up a hand, and a small chair appears. He sits down on it and leans forward and waggles his finger at me. "Why do you regret learning you are a Hero? Shouldn't you be overcome with joy?"

It takes me a second to come up with a response. "Look, you heard what Amelia said. A hero viciously attacked and hurt her, then sealed her inside of a statue. Joan was scum, and I don't feel comfortable having a power that once belonged to such a psychopath."

Hoarhiim chuckles. "Heh, it sounds like you've got the Heroes all figured out, Jason. Tell me, young one, have you considered the possibility that the Black Witch hasn't been entirely forthcoming with you about her past?"

A pit forms in my stomach. I glance around and walk away from the burning pyre, noticing the sun is beginning to set. "What do you mean? Did Amelia lie to me?"

Hoarhiim touches his hands together and closes his eyes. "Jason, there's a reason everyone calls Amelia the Black Witch. There's a reason why demons fear her, and nobody released her from that statue for 100,000 years. Joan did not mercilessly attack Amelia based on some innate psychopathic tendencies, as you might have been led to believe. The punishment Joan unleashed upon Amelia, in my eyes, was more than justified. It was merciful, even, since she did not kill the Black Witch."

"Oh, come on, Hoarhiim." I glance back to make sure nobody else is around. "Joan cut her, broke her body and spirit, and you're telling me it was justified? How could that be true?"

The deity within the white orb glows slightly. Hoarhiim opens his eyes and pierces me with his stare. "How little you know. I will show you what happened on that fateful day."

Part 013: Shattered Mind, Severed Link

"What am I looking at?"

My words enter a void. A bubble of images surrounds me, as if I've materialized inside of a snowglobe, looking outward. The outside world appears distorted and difficult to perceive.

Hoarhiim's voice responds in my mind. "I will take you on a journey through my memories, back to when my brother and I had been much closer than we are now. Back when we first met Amelia."

I squint to peer at the world outside, which seems as distant as stars in the sky, yet also a.s if I could reach out and touch it. "So, back then, was this before you and Blaarjiim became orbs, or has that always been a thing?"

Hoarhiim pauses for a while. "I do not know. The existence I remember has always been my current form. Sometimes, I see flashes and images of people I no longer recognize, but they are as foreign to me as the demons are to you. Now, focus, Jason, and allow me to show you a side of Amelia you may not expect."

Hoarhiim arrives beside me. The form he takes is that of a transparent shimmer in the air, vaguely human in shape, yet hardly defined enough to be anything more than a hallucination. Hoarhiim aims his palm forward, and the images surrounding us disappear. "I apologize for the murky picture. What you are looking at is my view of the world. I perceive reality in a sphere around my orb. However, I can interpret my vision in a manner you will more easily understand."

"That'd be great, thanks," I say with a chuckle. "So you're going to show me Amelia's past?"

"No, mine. It just so happens that Amelia always took my brother and me along with her. Despite bringing me along, she never once attempted to wield my power. Considering I am a being of the light, and her darkness was incompatible with my aura, I can only guess at her intentions. If I had to surmise, I would say... loneliness. Yes, that was likely the reason she kept me at her side."

I nod, and with a wave of his hand, Hoarhiim changes the world around us. The sphere of images instantly shifts into a flat screen, not unlike a projected picture in a movie theater. The Labyrinth's walls immediately stand out to me, given I've lived for the last few days always engulfed by them. Just seeing them again gives me the creeps.

After I finish my business on Tarus II; I'll have to return to the Labyrinth. Oh boy, that sure sounds appealing.

The walls move a few inches closer, but then further away, then closer again, repeatedly, over and over. It's as if I'm standing on a pendulum, watching the walls come and go.

"What's up with this picture?"

Hoarhiim clears his throat. "Amelia always carried Blaarjiim in her hand, but dangled me in a pouch at her waist, not unlike what you do now."

"Sorry." I apologize, but don't know why.

Several minutes pass. As the walls roll past and Amelia slowly walks forward, I crane my neck to see if I can see the path up ahead. "Hoarhiim, not to be a Debbie Downer, but all I see are walls. Can you, maybe, possibly, adjust the orientation?"

Hoarhiim stares ahead at the walls blankly for several moments. He shakes his head. "Hm? What did you say?"

"The orientation. We're looking smack at a wall." I scrutinize his face for a few moments, though I still can't make out any details. "Are you okay?"

Hoarhiim waves his finger and the view rotates forward so we can see in front of Amelia. I can finally see the black fabric of her dress now, though not much else beyond that. "Apologies. I accidentally skipped forward and relived the memory ahead of time. Ah. Let's move on." The deity of pure light crosses his arms and shakes his head again, but much more slowly this time. "Maybe it was for the best," he mutters.

The bland, empty halls of the Labyrinth seem darker than usual. I can barely see anything, even with Hoarhiim's orb in Amelia's pocket. Before I can ask why, Amelia rounds a corner, and the flat walls of the Labyrinth begin to change dramatically. Instead of a brown, earthen color, they become black and grey and turn into jagged rocks. Even the floor loses it's flat, easily traversable texture. Irregular edges of rock stick up here and there and Amelia's knees wobble as she tentatively puts each foot down, searching for the best places to step.

"Where are we?" I wonder aloud.

Hoarhiim answers. "This is a sublevel of the Labyrinth. Amelia was a rather greedy person during this period of Hell's history. She pursued anything that caught her fancy, and since the Labyrinth suffered a chaotic power struggle for hundreds of years after she killed Satan, the demons and monsters couldn't form a resistance to stand up to her. She had free reign to go wherever she pleased, and she used that to her fullest advantage."

The picture suddenly shakes. Amelia yelps in surprise and tumbles to the side as her foot catches on something. "Gah! Shoot, this ground is impossible to walk on." Her voice is much deeper than the one she has now, not the high-pitched, kidlike sound I'm used to hearing.

"Hoarhiim, why does she sound different?"

The sage clasps his fingers together. "Oh, brace yourself, Jason. Amelia may look a little different than you expect." Saying this, he tilts the viewfinder up until I can see Amelia's face and body. My heart pounds in my chest. She looks a little older than me, perhaps twenty-five. She is incredibly attractive, with perfect pink lips, a softly defined nose, but also cruel, sadistic eyes. Her gaze makes me want to bark like a dog.

Amelia leans down to rub her knee. "Land's sake, at least the humans knew how to smooth out potholes. How's a lady supposed to walk in heels around here?"

Blaarjiim's voice speaks, making me nearly jump out of my skin. His tone is ten times deeper than usual, and it drips with the sensation of evil. "My queen, there are three goblins up ahead. They will surely point you in the right direction."

"Finally, good news." Amelia leans against the wall, and only now do I realize I can hear her high-heeled boots clicking on the floor as she walks.

Still, I can't take my eyes off her face. She is, perhaps, the most beautiful person I've ever seen. Her face has a hard-set edge to it, as if she could take a bite out of concrete without blinking, yet her skin is soft and fair, like that of a princess. Her long black hair flows down to her waist, blending in with the color of her black dress. Unlike the one she wears now, it exposes a substantial amount of cleavage.

"Wh-why does A-Amelia..." I swallow suddenly, realizing I've never looked at her in this way before. "Why does she look so, uh, different?"

Hoarhiim doesn't pick up on my underlying feelings. "As expected, I knew you wouldn't understand. The battle with Joan changed Amelia's physical figure, though I never knew if the effects were permanent. The girl you know today is but a child in appearance. However, this memory is from during her prime."

"Yeah. Her prime."

Amelia licks her soft, pink lips, and my tongue snakes out as well. I'm mimicking her without meaning to. I can't believe a human can look as good as she does. Her body is fully-figured too, and not like that of a child. To say she's my 'type' would be an understatement. Why couldn't I have met her when she looked like this?

Her boots continue to click on the ground. Hoarhiim turns the view away from her face, and finally, my heart slows back down. It must have been pumping at a thousand beats per second. Up ahead, the sound of three goblins cackling and laughing about something benign grows steadily more audible. Before I can comprehend the movement, Amelia lunges with terrifying speed a hundred feet down the hallway and grabs one of the goblins. She hoists him up by the neck.

"Skree! The Black Witch!" His two companions howl in alarm, fall on their asses, and scramble away, but Amelia ignores them.

"Where is it? I know you little thieves are hoarding a treasure! Tell me where you've stored it, or I'll take your head off!" Amelia squeezes the goblin's neck, and he squirms violently, hitting her arm with his hands, kicking and punching, even as urine begins to run down his leg. The poor little guy looks petrified. "P-Please! Deno knows nothing! Deno knows nothing! N-no kill me!"

"You're lying!" Amelia slams the four-foot creature against the wall, and judging by her voice and his expression, glares ferociously at him. "Last chance, puke-skin! Spill the beans, or I spill you all over the floor!"

Her squeezing grows even tighter. He wheezes out a gasp. "N... no... nothing..."

Just as he starts to slump in her grip, Amelia effortlessly flings the goblin behind her. I don't see what happens, but judging by the sickening crunch, he ends up a splatter on the wall.

Hoarhiim adjusts the view again to the other two goblins. Both of them leap to their feet and start to dash away, though their movement falters as their bodies spasm and shake in terror. "Buh-Black Witch!

Fiend! Monster!"

Amelia hops forward, clearing fifty feet in an instant, and delivers a spine-shattering kick to one of the two goblins. He hurtles forward into the darkness, and the distant sound of a boom tells a tale of his instant death.

"Goal! Ten points for me! Hyahyahya!" Amelia giggles nastily, an unpleasant, throaty sound. She lunges down, grabs the final goblin by his hair and violently thrashes him around. "Last one! Tell me where your treasure is, or you'll learn what it's like to become a bowling ball!"

She shakes the little goblin like a ragdoll, and he begins to sob uncontrollably. "Please! Please! Me don't know! Only elder knows! Elder Morru knows!"

"Elder Morru?" Amelia's voice lilts into a higher pitch. "Aww, that's more like it! Now you're saying something worthwhile. Where is your elder?"

"Huhk..." The goblin gags on his tears and snot. "M-Morru not far... me take you! Please no hurt! Me show you way!"

"Very well." Amelia releases him and stands up straight. Her hand moves past our vision, and she grunts. "Damn. Goblin blood all over the back of my dress. Why must you nasty creatures have so much of it inside you?"

Hoarhiim holds up his hand, and the image freezes. "I hope I have sufficiently shown you some of the cruelty Amelia has inflicted."

I nod. My mouth tastes like sandpaper. "Y-yeah. I... I can't believe I'm watching the same person."

The deity of light bows his head. "Amelia found Elder Morru. She tortured him and severed both of his legs, then when he finally told her where the treasure was, she killed him by tearing his jaw apart. After that, she slaughtered every goblin in their colony for wasting her time."

Hoarhiim pauses.

"Let's... move to what happens next."

"Sure."

I reach out automatically for a glass of water, but remember there isn't any here — a shame. I feel like I've swallowed all the sand in the Sahara Desert.

The image shifts again. This time, to a much brighter hallway. The floor and ceiling glow from bioluminescent moss hanging off the walls, as well as rocks embedded here and there that emit tiny sparks of electricity. Amelia casually struts forward, barely looking at anything. Her hand brushes against one of the vines, and I watch in amazement as the plant recoils, withers, and dies.

"What the hell was that?"

Hoarhiim clears his throat. "Ah, her dark miasma. It's poisonous to most life, especially vegetation. A slight brush, and most plants will die after a few seconds. Creatures, both large and small, don't fare any better."

"Jesus Christ. Talk about an environmental disaster waiting to happen."

The hallway opens into a room with hundreds of fireflies aimlessly floating around. A ray of light shines down from somewhere unseen, almost as if it were from sunlight, but since this is the Labyrinth, that makes no sense. The light beams against the far wall, forming the shape of the Christian Cross. Underneath it is a barebones altar, with dozens of flowers growing all around it. A tiny chameleon looks up, spots Amelia, and skitters away to a nearby nook in the wall.

Her voice rings out in the din. "Seriously? I traveled all this way for nothing?"

Blaarjiim responds almost instantly, and I can practically hear him rubbing his hands together. "No, my queen. Look! There on the altar! A sword and scabbard!"

Hoarhiim pans the view up so we can see Amelia's face. She sighs. "Oh. A sword. And here I was hoping for some pretty jewels or something cute."

"Be careful, my queen," Blaarjiim cautions. "I sense energy like that of the angels here. It's faint, but..."

"I've killed a few angels, Blaarjiim. Holy energy stings for a bit, then the pain fades. I'd hate to walk out of here empty-handed."

Amelia strides forward, crushing the lovely flowers under her boots. As she does, they wither and dry out, disintegrating into ash.

She stops in front of the altar, and Hoarhiim pans our view down to examine the sword. It's ugly, boring, housed in a faded leather scabbard with brass hinges and a belt that looks about ready to fall apart. I can't see the blade, but judging by the sheath, it's just over two and a half feet long, short by most standards. Almost like the sword was forged for a woman of small stature. The hilt is brown, with a glimpse of gold here and there.

Amelia hesitates. She slowly rubs her thumb around her soft pink lips. "What an ugly piece of shit. Four days of travel, all for nothing."

Blaarjiim's tone softens. "It would make a fine addition to your collection, my queen. Perhaps it may serve some use later."

"Yeah, sure. Maybe I'll use it to carve up a roast. Let's get out of here." Amelia reaches forward to grab the sword, but the moment she wraps her hand around its sheath, a sudden flash of light makes her yelp in surprise. Amelia gasps and topples backward, flopping on her ass. "What was that?!"

Her question receives an immediate answer. A stream of light erupts from the sword. It pours from inside the sheath, as if its energy were contained within the blade itself, and streams to a spot perhaps two feet away. Within seconds, a shape resembling Hoarhiim's body of light forms, and quickly takes on the appearance of a young woman. She immediately takes a knee and swallows several long breaths. Her short-cropped blonde hair and stunning blue eyes immediately grab my attention.

The woman's armor is majestic, a combination of white and gold, with a giant red cross carved onto her chestplate. Her blue cloak hangs behind her, a thousand golden crosses lining its fabric. She regards Amelia with caution.

"Merci. Long have I slept, only to be awakened from my slumber by a demon as foul as thee." The girl, perhaps nineteen years old, clambers to her feet and snatches the sword from the pedestal. "En-Garde! Have at ye!"

Amelia rises to her feet. "Who the devil are you? How did you get here?"

The blonde girl unsheathes her sword and points it at Amelia. "I am a servant of the Highest God, the Creator who formed the heavens! Jeanne d'Arc, leader of the French, The Maid of Orleans! Thy greed and malice awakened my dormant body when thou dared disturb my artifact. I sense limitless power and evil flowing from thee, thrall of the darkness."

Hoarhiim pans the view to Amelia's face. Her eye twitches. "Now listen here, you little shit. Nobody points a sword at me and lives to tell the tale. My name's Amelia Greyheart, but you will call me 'Master' after I break you in half." Amelia smirks, then crosses her arms. "You seem confident about your chances, warrior of justice, but I should warn you that I've already killed the First Emperor of Hell, along with a few million others. If you give up now, I'll make your death quick and painless."

"Never!" Joan takes a step forward and bares her teeth. "Dost thou think me a fool? A Hero never wavers! She always stands up to evil, no matter the cost! I would sooner cast myself into the raging flames of Hell than allow one such as thou to profane the name of God!"

"What a coincidence, you're already in Hell," Amelia mutters. Her hand makes a popping noise as she balls it into a fist. "I don't believe in your shitty 'God' anyway. The only deity I believe in is myself. I'll make sure you bow down to me when this is all over, sweetheart."

"Impudent knave!" Joan lunges forward with frightening speed, catching even Amelia off-guard. She drives her fist into Amelia's face and sends my friend careening backward, smashing into the wall. An instant later, she jams her foot into the ground and thrusts her sword straight into Amelia's heart.

Shik!

Joan's eyes darken as she twists the blade inside her opponent's chest. "God shan't forgive me if I spare thee! Die quickly and return to the soil from whence you came!"

Amelia wheezes in pain, but Hoarhiim pans up to show both of their faces, now only inches apart. A wild, maniacal smile spreads from one corner of Amelia's mouth to the other. "You... you fucking bitch. That hurt. I'm going to enjoy teaching you a lesson."

She kicks her foot out and knocks Joan back, sprawling the Hero across the ground before yanking the sword from her heart. Amelia pauses and stumbles for a moment before shaking the pain off with a twitch of her head. She stabs the sword into the wall behind her, then steps in front of it to block it.

"That sword must be precious to you. It'd be a shame if you couldn't use it for the rest of the fight."

Joan leaps to her feet and laughs. "Hah! Fool. That is no ordinary weapon. It is the Sword of Heaven, gifted to me by the Creator! I am bound to it for all eternity." She holds her hand forward, and Amelia stumbles suddenly as the sword yanks from the wall, tears through her body and out of her front-side, then lands in Joan's grasp. Before Amelia can regain her footing, Joan begins chanting words in Latin.

"Lux. Virtus. Miscere. By the hand of the Creator, the first rite of sealing; initiate!" Her sword begins to glow white and vibrate wildly, and a moment later, she lunges forward, pauses, and delivers ten rapid stabs into each of Amelia's limbs. A second afterward, she appears at Amelia's side, opposite Hoarhiim and I, and shoves her palm out, blowing Amelia sideways across the room. Amelia's body bashes and crashes across the ground with sickening speed. Hoarhiim and I go flying straight out of her belt loop and across the room. My body swirls unconsciously from all the motion, but once we come to a rest, Hoarhiim vision gives us a full view of the spectacle.

Amelia's broken and crumpled body lies on the ground. Her right arm twists unnaturally, and her jaw appears dislocated. After a moment, her wounds begin to heal, and she gasps violently. "Kaaah!"

Joan hesitates. "That attack dealt a most grievous blow, but thou are quite resilient. Compared to the three Demon Dukes I once fought, thy body is leagues more powerful than they. However, I warn thee, that after the third rite of sealing, you will never harm another being again."

Amelia whimpers for a moment, and then reaches out to pull herself along the ground. The fire in her eyes disappears. She manages to climb to her feet, but something about her appearance is different. She looks three or four years younger, perhaps my age. "You... you s-sealed... my..."

Joan's eyes turn a luminous white, and she holds her sword at her side, preparing for a lunging stab attack. The instant Amelia sees this; panic floods her body. She leaps to the room exit, then dashes out of sight. Joan charges after her, and a horrible scream rends my heart in two. Amelia gasps, begging for mercy.

While Hoarhiim and I can no longer see what's happening, her pitiful, heartbreaking screams make me cover my mouth.

"Hoarhiim. Hoarhiim! That's enough. I've seen enough." I stumble to the side and fight the urge to vomit as I fall to my knees. "Oh god, they're all sick and evil. Amelia tortures and murders, and Joan is no better. She enjoyed the pain she caused. What the hell? Is this the sort of person who would become a Hero?!"

Hoarhiim slowly ambles over to me, and leans down, gently rubbing my back. "Jason. I know Amelia's past is difficult to accept. After all, you've never seen her in this manner before. However, I assure you that she is not the innocent angel she pretends to be."

I start rocking back and forth. "Fuck. Fuck. No, come on, think about it. Sh-she killed some goblins! That's all it was! They're monsters anyway, right? They're sneaky, thieving bastards! Amelia didn't deserve what Joan did to her! Shouldn't Joan ally with someone who kills monsters and demons? God damn!"

Hoarhiim pulls his hand away. "Do you believe that thievery deserves a death sentence? Where was their trial? Where was your human interpretation of justice? Just because they were goblins doesn't mean-"

"No! Stop! I don't want to hear anymore! Get me out of this dream!" I quickly jump to my feet and rush to the sides, hitting an invisible wall. "Release! Escape! Leave!"

Hoarhiim's voice quiets down. "This is a mental link, Jason. Your Wordsmithing won't work in here. If you want to leave, that's fine."

I quickly turn to face him. "Yeah, yeah, I do! I can't believe you're trying to turn me against Amelia like that! You SAW what Joan did to her! Amelia barely touched the sword and Joan went Super Saiyan and started attacking her for no reason! Gah!" I start pulling at my hair and pacing back and forth. "Just let me out. I'll- I'll talk to her. I'll find out her side of the story!"

"Jason..." Hoarhiim's voice holds an edge of caution. "I wouldn't advise that."

"What?! Why, are you afraid I'll find something out? Are you even telling me the truth, or are you lying to me too?" A pause. I consider the options. "I've never seen Amelia act anything like this. You hate Blaarjiim, so it's reasonable to assume you have some goal, some plot to-"

"Jason!" Hoarhiim bellows at the top of his lungs, making me flinch. After a few seconds, he calms himself. "That's enough. Begone, then. I was trying to help. If you don't wish to see the truth, so be it. I cannot convince a fool to drink from the water of life if he wishes to die of thirst."

A moment later, the world around me fades away.

I appear back at the funeral. It's dark out, already. I'm sitting with my back to a tree, though I don't remember how I got here. Everyone else has already packed up and left.

I quickly reach down and touch Hoarhiim's orb. "Okay, look, I'm sorry, alright? I didn't mean to freak out like that. I... I can't believe you'd say all those awful things about Amelia. Can we forget about it for now?"

Silence.

I wait, but Hoarhiim doesn't answer.

"Hello? Buddy?"

Still no reply. Great. Now I hurt Hoarhiim's feelings and he's giving me the silent treatment.

Fine, be like that.

I get up and start walking to Bahamut's palace in the distance, her residence on this world. Maybe Amelia can answer my questions. If Hoarhiim wasn't lying, I'll know soon enough.

This is Joan of Arc.

Part 014: A Weapon to Surpass Metal Gear

I tap the white orb as I hold it in my hand, using it to light up the landscape around me. The darkness of night tempts me to use the stars to navigate, especially since I can't see them in the Labyrinth, but I'm tired and just want to catch some sleep.

My feet scuff across the rugged, uneven ground. Pebbles go flying as my mouth forces itself open, making me yawn violently. Fuck. Today has been rough. Not only did I nearly get eaten by a bunch of Sirens, but I also had all that fun stuff involving Bahamut, and I had to deal with a bunch of crap involving Amelia. My laziness is not something I can grow out of easily.

Bahamut's palace eventually rises before me. The building isn't as large as I expected, but it still looks to be about three stories tall and somewhat reminds me of architecture from my lifetime. It's square and mostly undecorated, sans two gargoyles, and while it does have some shiny gold and silver ornamental designs, calling it a 'palace' doesn't seem appropriate. It's more of a creepy office building. Of course, compared to the tiny huts on this side of the canyon, it's practically a mansion.

Humans and monsters mill around outside, chatting with each other about this and that. Despite the miniature sun in my hand, not many people pay me any heed. Most passersby glance at me, wince at Hoarhiim's brilliance, and look away. I pause to take in the scene of peacefulness between humans and monsters alike. The orcs don't attack the humans, nor do the goblins, the harpies, or any of the others.

It's nice. Seeing the different sides look at each other without a hint of anger or fear gives me a glimpse into something I never experienced back home, which is a total lack of prejudice on either's part. After all, they appear to all just be happy they're no longer under Bahamut's mind control. How could they care about petty matters like bigotry, or hatred based on looks?

However, I have to wonder how long the peace will last. By week's end, will everyone here begin squabbling? Will the difference between man and monster grow too much for them to overcome?

My shoulders slump at the thought. I'd hate to see this tranquillity disturbed by the will of human nature.

Continuing forth, I start to walk up the ten steps into the palace, when someone appears at my side. A white-haired woman who... ah, it's the one from before. Phoebe, I think.

I pause my ascension and turn to look at her. When I do, she hesitates and bows her head shyly.

"I see you have finished mourning, Your Grace."

"Mourning?"

Phoebe nods, but doesn't look at me. "Yes. You left the pyre with such an intense look on your face that none dared to bother you. We were moved by your respect for your adversary, even in the face of such blinding evil. It has been the talk of many while you secluded yourself."

I try not to laugh at her misunderstanding. That isn't what happened at all is what I want to say, but she's so earnest that I'd rather just let her think what she likes. "Thank you for that. Err, your name is Phoebe, right?"

She looks up at me and swipes a hair from her face. "Yes. I'm pleased you remembered the name of a lowly retainer such as I."

"I try my hardest."

With a smile, I turn away and avert my eyes. Something about Phoebe's appearance reminds me of the Amelia I saw in Hoarhiim's vision. While Phoebe has an air of humility surrounding her, her body is strong enough to heft heavy armor, but she also has the softness of a woman. She has the same hard edge to her that Amelia did, and it disconcerts me.

Phoebe reaches up and plays with a clump of her hair strands absentmindedly. "All here are your loyal servants, Your Grace. If ever you should require our services, we will do all in our power to fulfill your wishes."

A guilty feeling wells up in my chest. "No, that's not necessary. I freed you all from Bahamut's control. You're unfettered to do as you please. Both the humans and the monsters as well."

She coughs. "We know. Everyone has come to a unanimous decision, of our own volition, to pledge ourselves to you. We do it not out of fear, but respect. Your honor in the face of evil, moral uprightness in the face of malice, and forgiveness to those who might otherwise be your enemies has stirred the hearts of Bahamut's former slaves. We've begun freeing the slaves in the mines as well, and by week's end, there will be two hundred thousand willing and capable warriors ready to die in your name."

"D-die?!" I reflexively take a step back. "Phoebe, Phoebe, please, you don't need to go that far-"

"Ah, but they do."

A voice speaks from behind me, and I quickly spin to see Kar standing there, intently listening to our conversation. "Turtle, in the Labyrinth, power and strength rule. None dare object to following one who dictates using fear and violence, but their mindless terror pales in comparison to the zeal of those who follow a kind and compassionate ruler. Striking down a foe, in anyone's eyes, is morally just, especially when they have wronged you. However, sparing them takes a different sort of strength."

My heart beats irregularly. "But- but Kar! You killed Bahamut! How could I have spared her if you ended up taking her life?!"

Kar grunts. "Hurgh. I only did so at the request of her former captives. Everyone understands that you were perfectly capable of killing her yourself. Everyone knows it was you who solved the riddle. Despite this, you did not pursue your glory and personal empowerment, instead choosing to give it to one as unworthy as I."

I groan inwardly.

Great. People are quickly getting the wrong idea about me. I left to chase after Amelia, not because I cared about Bahamut. I thought she deserved to die, so why is everyone spinning the story like I forgave her sins and sent her riding into the sunset? She's dead, goddammit!

Phoebe takes a step toward me and clasps her hands against her chest. "Please, great Hero, do not forsake us. It would be our heartfelt honor to serve you. It matters not what your goals are, for we will ensure you may pursue them at any cost."

"Uh..."

I don't know how to respond. I feel like I'm being bombarded on all sides here. Still, having an army might be okay, I guess. I'd prefer they didn't throw themselves off cliffs in anguish if I rebuff their offer.

"Haaah... fine, whatever." I sigh in defeat. "Look, Phoebe, I'm a little tired right now. I'm going to find my friend and talk with her for a bit, then go to bed. I don't have long-term plans for my future. This stuff is all a little heavy for me right now, and-"

Phoebe's face whitens. "Oh, oh goodness! I am eternally sorry, Your Grace! I didn't mean to irritate you with my presence!" She quickly bows. "I shall return to my quarters and chastise myself at once. Please forgive my rudeness, I meant no disrespect!"

Before she can dash away, I reach out and touch her shoulder. "Phoebe, you did nothing wrong. There's no need to apologize."

The confusion on her face turns comical, but I force myself not to laugh. She nods slowly. "I... I see. Well, in any case, I thank you for your kindness. You are a most generous king."

"King? What do you mean, 'king'?"

She points to the Crown on my head. "Is that not the crest of a monarch? And the holy artifact of light in your belt, surely that is your demon-slaying weapon of righteousness."

"Right, the Crown. Sometimes I forget I'm wearing it. I'm an ordinary guy. I'm not king material." I reach into my belt and procure Hoarhiim's orb. "And this isn't a weapon. This is my friend, Hoarhiim."

"Your friend?" Phoebe shields her eyes from the blinding light. "You are friends with a glowing rock?"

"It's a long story. Hoarhiim, say hello."

Nothing happens.

"Hoarhiim? Come on; you're not still giving me the silent treatment, are you?"

Still no reply.

Phoebe blushes. "Your friend is quite reserved."

"I swear he talks. I'm not making it up."

"Mmm. Haha." She laughs nervously, then looks around. "Well, Your Grace, I thank you for giving me a few minutes of your time. I must attend to helping house the freed slaves tonight. If you'll excuse me..."

Without another word, Phoebe pulls away and walks down the steps, eventually fading into the distance and leaving Kar and me behind.

"Hurgh. You certainly have a way with females."

"Oh, shut up. Can you point me toward Amelia?"

Kar smirks. "Two mates at the same time. White-hair and the Frilled One. I wonder which you will take in the end."

"Come on, stop teasing. Amelia's just a kid."

"Oh? You didn't say anything about White-Hair. Perhaps you fancy her?"

"KAR!"

Kar slaps his knee. "Bahaha! Watching the Turtle turn crimson is a sight to behold!"

"I'm glad you're enjoying yourself."

Kar's human-like face contorts into a wickedly toothy grin. The scales on his face give him an eerie, monstrous look. He unnerves me when he grins.

"Turtle, you're a king now. Everyone looks up to you. The females will fight each other over you, soon enough. And that power of yours is something special. However, the test of a king lies not in what he does, but what he doesn't."

I cock my head slightly. "Are you warning me not to abuse my power?"

"Aye. Once you learn to use your magic, I believe you might become unstoppable."

A memory appears in my mind. I vocalize it. "Power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely."

Kar snaps his fingers. "Yes! I am pleased you understand."

I take a moment to reach up and touch the Crown on my head. "It's hard for me to comprehend my situation, you know? I'm an ordinary guy. It was only a week ago that I was living off cheap food from a supermarket. Now I'm a legendary Hero, and many people think of me like a King. I don't know how to adjust."

"Hurgh. It will take time. None are born knowing how to lead. All kings learn on the fly. Luckily, you've got that Crown to help out."

"Yeah... I don't think it'll be useful. But, thanks for the thought."

Kar chuckles. "You're welcome. You don't need me to tell you where the Frilled One is. Use your power. I'll catch up with you later, Little Turtle."

The croco-sphinx turns on his heel and laughs to himself about something, then swaggers away.

I yawn. Exhaustion hits me like a wave.

Fuck it. I'll talk to Amelia tomorrow. Right now, all I want is to sleep.

Turning around, I head inside. The servants tell me where my room is, and I eventually land face-first on a pillow.

Zzz...

"Rise and shine!" A shrill voice erupts from the darkness, and a light from Heaven itself blasts my face.

I leap up, screaming in fright. "Aah! What?! Who?!"

My eyes sweep my room frantically, even as I shield them from the intense sunlight. I don't remember falling asleep last night. I think I was out as soon as my head hit the pillow.

My eyes lock onto Amelia's form. At that instant, she cheerfully pinches the covers from the end of the bed and yanks them off with a flourish. "Up'n at 'em!"

...Only to expose me in just my underwear. "Amelia! What the heck?!"

She frowns. "Jason, where are your clothes?"

"Shut up! Gimme some privacy!"

Amelia rolls her eyes. "Okay, fine, geez. I'll be downstairs in the dining room. Try not to take too long getting ready for the day."

As she walks out of the room, I rub my eyes in disbelief. She isn't wearing a black dress anymore. Instead, she has a sky-blue sundress on, and she's replaced her red hair bows with blue ones. As the door closes behind her, I catch a final glimpse of her shoes; white high-heels that click as she walks.

The slamming of the door makes me blink. Amelia doesn't look at all like the monster from Hoarhiim's vision. I feel like the black color gave her a darker appearance, but with the sundress, she seems cheerful and sunny now. Perhaps she's shaken off yesterday's events.

But what about me? Have I?

I hop out of bed and start to grab my dirty clothes, only to realize they're gone. Did a maid come in and take them while I slept? This king-sized bed was undoubtedly the most comfortable thing I've ever rested on in my life. I slept like a rock and didn't hear a sound.

Well, without clothes, what am I going to do? I pull open the closet and gawk at the assortment of dresses inside, which seems appropriate given this used to be Bahamut's royal chamber. I won't wear dresses, so those are out of the question.

Almost immediately, an idea pops into my head. I turn and aim my hand at the bed. "Shirt."

A quick whoomph of air rushes to the bed, and a second later, an ordinary green T-shirt materializes. Huh. Neat.

I try it again.

"Shirt."

This time, by focusing my mind, a black T-shirt appears along with a picture of Megadeth album art on its front.

Wow. The intent of the word matters too. I used the same word but got a different result. Hmm.

Glancing at the dresser beside my bed, I pick up and stick Solomon's Crown on my head. A rush of information floods my mind for a few seconds before fading away.

Thanks to the Crown, my ability to picture specific details increases dramatically. This time, before speaking, I form a clear picture in my mind of what I want. "Shirt."

A long-sleeved shirt appears in midair and flops on the bed just like the two before it. Opening my eyes, I scrutinize the article of clothing. Every detail is accurate to the picture I had in my mind. The plain black shirt has golden threads sewing all of its parts together, and the threads string down from the shoulders onto the back, forming an intricate design of a fire-breathing dragon.

Next, I flip it around and stare at the front, which is purely black with no decorations. I form another picture in my mind. "Modify."

My breath catches as gold stitching magically appears on the front. Within one second, an image of Amelia's face from the vision Hoarhiim showed me stitches into the fabric.

I stare at it for a while, perhaps a minute. My fingers move on their own, tracing the outline of her adult face. She looks beautiful. Why did Joan attack her? Why did Amelia kill the goblins? Was Hoarhiim lying to me?

As I rub the stitching, I wonder to myself how soft her face must be. I have no romantic interest in her younger self, but the Amelia I saw in that vision was a woman. A fully figured, beautiful goddess. I want to see her like that, but in person.

If only I could change the way she looks.

Gah. What creepy thoughts am I thinking?! Amelia looks like a kid, now. Even if she is thousands of years old, it wouldn't feel right to age her up! People might get the wrong idea! God, my mind is doing some weird shit, this morning.

"Modify." I use my magic again, causing her face to vanish and be replaced with a depiction of a sword. I didn't envision any specific weapon, but after a moment I recognize it as the one Joan emerged from in Hoarhiim's vision.

Goddamn. I can't get Hoarhiim's memory out of my mind. Everything about it was all kinds of fucked-up. It had to be fake. It had to be. Amelia isn't a violent person.

Well, when I was at the foot of Solomon's Altar dying of a broken body, I did hear orcs screaming in pain... Amelia must have killed them. Those sounds after their screams cut off were unsettling.

Maybe she gave them a scare. I don't know. Perhaps they fled for their lives after recognizing the Black Witch. Yeah, that's probably it.

I change the picture of the sword once again, but this time I imagine a shield from a video game I used to enjoy playing. Between the dragon and shield, my new shirt looks like the sort of thing I'd grab off the bargain rack at a GAP clothing store. Oh well, nobody ever said I had a good sense of style.

I quickly Wordsmith myself some black jeans, some new socks and shoes, and only once I'm done do I realize how terrible I smell. I haven't showered since I left my Cryopod. Man-musk is one thing, but my stench is disgusting. Guess I'll have to take my clothes off and go shower- ah! Amelia's waiting for me. I've been goofing around with Wordsmithing instead of getting a move on!

Rather than hunting for a shower, I aim my mind at my body.

"Clean."

My body tenses up, and the feeling of a shower and drying off passes over me within seconds. I dab my armpits and shrug.

Faster than a shower, but I still like the feeling of warm water running down my body. It'll do for now.

After patting myself down to ensure I smell like an angel, I reach into my dresser drawer and pull out Hoarhiim's orb. Last night was the first time I was able to sleep without his light blinding me, but I feel terrible sticking him in a dark and lonely cage.

"Good morning, Hoarhiim!"

I pour some enthusiasm into my voice, but he doesn't respond.

"Still the silent treatment, huh? Alright, suit yourself."

I Wordsmith another belt, since my old one vanished along with my clothes, then stick Hoarhiim inside one of the pockets.

Before leaving the room, I spot the sword I made before I met Amelia. It doesn't seem necessary to keep it with me, given Wordsmithing is infinitely more potent than a blade, but who knows? Better to have a sword and not need it than to need one and not have it.

I strap it to my left side, shift Hoarhiim to my right, and turn to leave. However, I end up pausing in front of a full-body mirror on my way out. My skinny body and gangly form hardly appear heroic. How the hell can everyone look up to someone like me? I solved a riddle — big deal. I look like I could pick a fight with an eight-year-old girl and still lose.

Some Hero I am.

Once again, an idea forms. I turn to face the mirror. "Muscles. Abs. Grow."

My heart skips a beat as my body forms into something that would make any bodybuilder weep with envy. My body stretches upward ten inches, causing my spine to pop multiple times. My muscles bulge, and a six pack forms, giving me the look of a football jock. I stumble forward, almost crash into the mirror, and barely catch myself by grabbing the side of a wall. The floor looks a lot further away than it did a few seconds ago.

The Crown allows me to judge myself in an instant. I'm now exactly seven feet tall. My short blond hair and blue eyes mix perfectly with my chiseled body but clash with my face. I have what looks like a baby-face on a man's body. Gross.

Uh. What's a single word that'll make me good-looking? "Appearance."

I watch in silence as my face morphs. My jaw protrudes out, my eyes sink in and narrow, and every aspect of my face defines itself more clearly than before. After a few seconds, I look like a goddamn movie star.

My tongue slowly circles my lips as I gaze into the mirror, unable to grasp the face staring back at me.

What if I had looked like this when I was younger? How would my life have turned out?

Turning away, I finally open the door and step into the hallway.

"Ah! Good morning, Your Grace-" Phoebe is standing outside my door. She starts to greet me but freezes mid-sentence and stares at me in disbelief.

I play it cool, acting like I have no idea why she's gawking. "Do I have something on my face?"

She opens and closes her mouth several times before cocking her head. "Uh- um, no! Nothing at all! You just, ah, look very handsome this morning! D-did anything happen while you were sleeping?"

I pull the door closed behind me and wipe at my nose. "Nah. Nothing in particular. Hey, do you know where the dining room is?"

Phoebe nods dumbly. She doesn't say anything and instead continues to stare at me for several seconds blankly.

"Phoebe? Miss Berthold? Hello?"

My words wake her from her stupor. "Hm? What? Yes, of course! I will show you the way, Your Grace." She bows her head and blushes madly before quickly walking ahead of me and leading me down the hall.

Her shyness makes me grin. I've never had a woman act bashful around me before. It feels... good. Empowering. I could get used to this.

We round a corner and start to head down a spiral staircase. "Say, Phoebe, why were you waiting outside my room?"

She flicks a glance back at me for barely a second before looking forward again. "I am your personal retainer, Your Grace, just as I was King Arthur's. If, however, you should wish it... I... I can assign another t-to take my place."

I shake my head, but she doesn't see. "No, that's not necessary. Carry on."

Several minutes pass. We arrive at our destination.

"Right through here," Phoebe says, as she stops in front of a set of double-doors. They're metallic, with a large glass window on the front allowing me to see inside. As I walk up to them, the doors slide open without making a sound, which makes me pause. I know the monsters are more technologically savvy than the demons, but even so, some of the stuff I've seen is borderline sci-fi.

The dining room is stunningly ornate. I start to ask Phoebe about it, only to find she's vanished into the wind. A glance at the hundred or so empty tables tells me this is a place only meant for 'important folk.' White tablecloths, wine glasses, lines of silverware, and plates with exotic designs dot every table. A beautiful chandelier hangs from the ceiling, and the sudden realization that my clothes are too casual fills me with dread. There's nobody here to judge my appearance, but I still feel like I don't belong.

A glance at the back corner reveals Amelia leaning on her elbow, muttering something inaudible to the black sphere sitting on the table before her. She and Blaarjiim must be discussing something, but it doesn't look super important.

After I take five steps and start crossing over to Amelia, her eyes flick up to me. "Oh, Jason!"

Her voice must have caught someone's attention, because, by the time my butt hits the chair seat, the kitchen doors fly open and a cavalcade of chefs marches out with a vast array of food on rolling carts. I note with amusement that Amelia picked the remotest corner of the dining area to sit at, and we ended up with a tiny table as a result. There isn't enough room for the avalanche of food headed our way.

"Greetings, mighty Hero!" The chefs smile enthusiastically, and I nod politely back. Some of them are human, but most of them look like bipedal geckos, and one individual stands out among the rest, given he's nearly as tall as Kar. He's a giant minotaur, with a bull-head and legs, but a human torso and arms. The beast lumbers over and bows his head.

"Great Hero, the one who freed us from bondage, I am Yamir, the former head chef under Bahamut, and your loyal servant."

His voice isn't deep, loud, boisterous, or anything else, but instead quite refined and polite. He wouldn't be out of place on a Sunday morning British cooking program.

"I have cooked you a feast of the ages, and as such, you are free to eat as much as you please. If you request seconds, thirds, or portions beyond those, I will deliver them quickly and perfectly."

"Uh, awesome. Thanks, Yamir."

I nod politely again, and the giant monster walks away, leaving the others to begin serving the food.

"Might you wish to sit at a larger table, your majesty? You've hardly enough room for the feast!"

I shake my head. "No, I'm fine. What do you have?"

Several minutes pass. Amelia stares at me intently while I pick out a filet mignon, a soup made of Heaven only knows what (It smells incredible), and some other things as well. I meet Amelia's gaze. "Did you eat already?"

She shakes her head and continues to stare at me. "No. I don't eat food."

"You don't? There's no need to be shy. We have plenty to go around."

Sighing, Amelia clarifies. "I can't. It's complicated."

"Oh. Sorry. I didn't know that."

My cheeks flush, and I send the chefs away after thanking them profusely.

A minute passes, and I shovel food into my face, wondering why the heck Amelia keeps staring at me. It's only when she speaks that I remember why.

"You look very different this morning. Wordsmithing can change your appearance?"

"Yup. Do you like the new me?"

She leans on her hand. "I suppose. Honestly, you were cuter before. Now you look like a man who's about to go on a rampage. Didn't you ever learn anything about subtlety? Your chance of survival is always higher if you look unintimidating. The more your enemy underestimates you, the better your chance of surprising them."

"Well, actually, Amelia," I pause, unsure how to say this. "I thought you'd like me more if I looked masculine. I've always felt like a wimp."

She averts her eyes to stare out the window beside us. The morning sun stretches out over the mountains, illuminating the canyons and mines in the distance. Miles away, the forests stretch seemingly forever, beckoning for our return to the Labyrinth.

"You know, Jason, appearance isn't everything. Besides, why does it matter if I like you more or less? We're friends, right? I'm not going to look down on you just because you don't have the perfect body."

My hand freezes, stopping before I can put a spoonful of soup in my mouth. Friend. That's right. She thinks of me as a friend. Of course. Why wouldn't she? I've never said anything to indicate otherwise.

I quickly stick the soup in my mouth and follow her gaze to stare outside.

There's more to what she said than one might initially think. Do I judge others based on their looks? Don't I somewhat look at her as weak because she has the appearance of a child? Did I always feel inadequate because of my looks, and using Wordsmithing to change myself was just a band-aid? Hell, I even considered changing Amelia's body to look more like she did in Hoarhiim's memory.

I'm obsessed with appearance. Is that just because of my culture? Maybe I should ask.

"Amelia, how much does appearance matter to you?"

She blinks, then slowly turns to me. "Hmm? I don't follow."

"Uhh. I'm asking if you think appearance means anything at all. Do you feel that you were more beautiful before you entered the statue, or-"

"I didn't enter the statue, Jason." She clenches her teeth. "Why would you even bring that up? I told you I hated thinking about it."

"Right. Uh. Sorry, again..."

She examines me for a moment before returning to the view outside. "Did Hoarhiim show you my past?"

I flinch. "How'd you guess?"

"I wondered if he might. Hoarhiim may be misguided, but he's a sweetheart."

Amelia's eyes drift back to the table and eventually fixate on my half-eaten filet; one that was recently fished out of the local river. There's nothing like fresh produce.

"You asked about appearance. I learned a long time ago that appearances could be deceiving. Sometimes those who look like scary monsters can be the kindest, sweetest, most gentle beings you will ever meet. Sometimes, those you trust the most hide their intentions behind smiles and fake laughter."

"Sounds like a story," I murmur.

"Not one I want to tell. It carries many memories." Amelia gently pokes one of my plates nearest her. "A life filled with regret."

Another bite of soup enters my mouth. I'm starting to get full already. Gently, I reach across the table and touch her hand. "I'm always here if you want to talk."

She doesn't pull away for several seconds. When she does, it's a hesitant motion. "I know. Thank you, Jason."

After finishing my meal, I leave the building with Amelia. The sunlight shines directly at us as we exit, blinding me for a second, but I don't cover my eyes. Soon, we'll be back in the Labyrinth, and I'll miss the sun's warmth.

I'm surprised that Phoebe hasn't appeared from the bushes yet, given her stalkerish tendencies, but she's nowhere nearby. Kar stands in the middle of the gravel road, pointing monsters here and there, telling them what to do and where to go.

He turns around and spots us. "Ah, Turtle and the Frilled One. Is it time, then?"

"Mhm. I'm taking Amelia, and we're going back to the Labyrinth."

"Excellent. I'm done here."

Kar falls into step on Amelia's right, sandwiching the little girl between us, but she doesn't say anything. "Turtle, what do you plan to do once you return to the Labyrinth?"

A few ideas roll around in my mind. Those legendary weapons might be worth tracking down, plus I'd like to learn more about humans and wherever the demons have hidden them.

I decide to play it vague. "Dunno. I was thinking of traveling with Amelia until we got into trouble."

Kar grunts. "Hurgh. A haphazard plan, but who am I to argue with the Hero?"

Time passes. Instead of walking through the forest and climbing over vines, I take the time to remove trees in a straight line back to the portal, using my Wordsmithing to delete them and create a walking path behind us instantly.

All the while, Amelia observes me casually, but I see the gears turning in her head. If I had to guess, I'd assume she's wondering about Wordsmithing and its practical applications, just as I've been doing.

Along the way, a gigantic animal appears from the forest just before we get out. Its body is reptilian and reminds me a lot of dinosaurs from the Earth's history. It spots us and roars, evidently thinking we'll make for a good meal.

The creature, a four-legged juggernaut covered in bony armor, bares its flesh-rending teeth at us and charges, but with a single word, I send it flying back into a tree, making it bash its head in the process. "Push!"

Confused and panicked, the monster races away, making Amelia snicker. "Good one, Jason."

"I didn't want to hurt him if I didn't have to."

Minutes later, we emerge from the forest line and spot the portal in the distance. It takes only a short walking distance before we stop at it and stare.

"It's deactivated," Amelia says without a hint of emotion.

"Yup. Kar, you're the new Sphinx. Can you turn it back on?"

The former crocodile grunts. "Hurgh. I am not certain. Give me time."

Amelia and I cross our arms and wait while Kar walks over and pokes at the warpgate's controls. Amelia exhales out of boredom. "So, Jason, what have you found out about Wordsmithing?"

She's taking an unusual interest in my power lately. I don't know if that's a good or a bad thing. "I made this shirt with Wordsmithing, including the gold embroidering and everything."

"A shirt, huh?" Amelia leans forward to examine the design of the shield in the front. Unimpressed, she leans back. A second later, she gasps. "Whoa! Is... is that a dragon?!"

"Mhm. Stitched it with Wordsmithing, just like I said."

I glance at her face and am surprised by the stars in her eyes. "I can't believe it! Wow! He looks great!"

"I'm glad you feel that way." I smile graciously at her but feel a little confused by her over-the-top enthusiasm.

As soon as it appears, her smile fades. "Can you bring people back from the dead?"

Her sudden change of topic catches me off-guard.

Seconds pass. I hem and haw to myself. "I... I don't know. It would be incredible if I could."

Urgency appears in her eyes. "You should try it. You need to learn your limits."

"I know, I know. I'll need a dead body, first, and I'm not about to kill anyone or bring back Bahamut."

Amelia's shoulders slump. "Oh. Okay."

Resurrection. Amelia brings up a good point. Bringing people back from the dead sounds impossible, but maybe it's more doable than I think. Do I have power over life and death? Can a single word from me reshape the cosmos?

Well, I don't have a dead body hanging around, but maybe something else would work.

I take a few moments to ping the Crown and pull up several options. My eyes widen as one possibility comes into focus.

Reaching down, I pull out my sword. "Boulder." A gigantic rock pops into view and crashes to the earth. Amelia flinches, not expecting me to Wordsmith all of a sudden.

"What- what are you doing?"

Instead of answering, I swing my crappy sword at the rock. It bangs loudly and bounces off, as I expected.

"Sharpen."

I swing again, and still, it bounces off.

"Sharpen!"

This time, the sword cuts into the edge of the rock and jams a few inches inside of it.

It's working.

I yank the sword out and try again. "Sharpen!"

When I swing for the fourth time, my blade passes through the boulder, carving a razor-thin slice through it. The instant it flies out the other side, the blade snaps, and a chunk of the sword flies out and embeds in the ground ten feet away.

It's sharper, but still just a weak sword.

Now for improvements. "Reform. Sharpen. Sharpen. Sharpen. Reinforce. Reinforce."

I shake the sword around and smile when the blade doesn't wobble at all. This time, when I slice the rock, the sword passes through with no resistance, and the boulder flops over and smashes into the ground.

Now THIS is a weapon I can use against monsters and demons.

Another idea appears in my mind. Stupid, but worth a shot.

"Sentience."

I aim my mind at the sword and wait.

A minute passes.

Nothing happens.

"What are you doing, Jason?" Amelia slides up next to me and gazes at the sword.

"I'm trying to make this sword sentient. I wondered if I could make it talk or something."

She smirks. "That's silly. It's a sword. You have to have a soul to be sentient. Everyone knows that."

"The hell I do!" A shrill voice screams out from the sword, making me drop it and hop back out of fright. "Ain't no dame shit-talkin' me, no sirree! Not on my watch!"

Amelia's eyes widen like dinner plates. "Jason. The sword spoke."

"Damn tootin' I did! I got a lot to say to a pretty lass like you! Name's Dellfingler, and what's yours, sweetcheeks?"

His odd accent is rough and irritating to listen to, but Amelia doesn't seem to mind. She reaches down and picks the sword up. "I'm Amelia! How are you speaking? Do you have a mouth?"

"Course not! I'm a sword, little lady! Swords ain't got no mouths, honey-bear! I'm usin' voice projection! Can't see anything around me either, but I kin' feel the vibrations in the air!"

Amelia looks at me like a puppy. Her lip quivers. "Oh, Jason, he's wonderful! I'm not one for weapons, but can I have him, please?"

"Hell yeah, honey! That's what I'm talkin' about! You 'n me are gonna ride off into the sunset together and get all hitched up! Yeehaw!"

The sword's enthusiasm is quickly getting on my nerves. I nod. "Yeah, that's fine. I can make another one. Here, take the scabbard, too." I pull the sheath off and hand it to her, and as I do, her hand touches mine. Amelia steps back quickly, and her cheeks flush red. "Th-thank you, Jason. Nobody's ever given me a present before."

My heart beats like conga drums. "Glad I could be your, err, first. Haha."

I suddenly realize what I just said had a lot of innuendo, and I curse my filthy mouth. Luckily she doesn't pick up on it. Thank god.

Kar grunts. "Hurgh. Stupid machine. Worthless!" He pounds his fist on its display. "It's broken! Busted! We're stuck here forever!"

"You don't have a key to access it?" Amelia walks over to him after she finishes latching Dellfingler to her belt. "I thought you obtained something like that when you killed Bahamut."

Kar shakes his head. "Nay. It's not a simple matter of opening the portal with a password. We also have to do a bunch of math and crap to open the portal inside the Labyrinth Core. I ain't smart enough for this crap. The other humans and monsters on this planet rely on the team at the Labyrinth Core to open and close the portals."

Dellfingler pipes up. "Hey, I know! Why not try'n break it! Just punch it til' it works! That never fails!"

I walk over and gently nudge Kar out of the way. "Let's call that 'Option B,' okay, Dellfingler? I'll try messing around. If it's just a matter of math, maybe the Crown can help."

When I tap the console, an array of numbers and letters appears, along with hundreds of rapidly changing variables, equations, and other such things. The Crown activates, improving my mental faculties until I can understand what everything on the console does. There are variables like planet orbital speed, distance to one of seven hundred locations throughout the galaxy, atmospheric fluctuations, and more things that continue on and on.

Five minutes later, Amelia reaches over and touches my arm. "Jason? Are you okay? You've been just standing and staring this whole time..."

I nod absentmindedly. "I'm calculating. Won't be long now."

She pulls back, and I see her shrug at Kar from the corner of my eye.

Finally, my mind has all the variables in play.

I tap the connection numbers in a row. "Four deltas, sixteen alphas, four-two point two-three sequence breaks, then a parameter of eight and fifteen for the lightspeed calculations... engage." My finger reaches over and mechanically taps the initiate button.

Eruptions of electricity arc from the gate's pylons to form a circular hole in space.

Amelia and Kar exhale simultaneously. The Sphinx grins. "Unbelievable. You truly are a Hero, Jason."

I shoot a glance at Amelia, then back to Kar. "I'd prefer if you stopped calling me that, but thanks."

Before we start walking up the steps to the portal, I realize that without a weapon, if we meet armed resistance inside, I might be a sitting duck. Several weapon ideas pop into my head, including some excellent plasma blaster concepts, but a single word takes my breath away due to the sheer possibilities.

"Lightsaber."

Author Notes:

This is Phoebe.

This is Jason's bigger, buffer form.

Part 015: Jedi.

The Crown of Solomon is a weapon unlike any other, but only in the hands of a Wordsmith. It allows me to imagine the inner workings of complex mechanical objects, perform Ph.D. and Doctorate level math, and even comprehend the concepts of string theory. My mind compresses and expands, making me wince as I imagine all the parts and pieces that would go into a weapon like a Lightsaber. Despite being a fictional weapon, I rapidly manage to craft a functional prototype in mere seconds.

When I open my eyes and hold out my hand, a small cylinder, perhaps the size of a flashlight, appears in midair and lands in my palm. I stare, wide-eyed, at the silver cylinder I once dreamed about as a child.

My heart skips a beat. A lightsaber. It's a goddamn lightsaber! This is the coolest moment of my life!

I hesitate to activate it, but when I do, ecstasy overtakes me. A bright white blade of light shoots out, and a wave of heat begins emanating from the weapon.

Amelia stares, wide-eyed. "What is that?"

"A lightsaber. It can cut through anything. Metal, rock, you name it. It's the greatest melee weapon that has ever existed."

The stupid grin on my face begins to slip. The sound my new weapon makes isn't quite right. It's less of a gentle hum, and more like a fireplace rapidly crackling after tossing a bunch of kindling on top. The white color also seems odd, given I envisioned blue in my mind.

I stab it to the ground, and the moment the saber touches the dirt and grass, a small wildfire ignites, making me pull it out and step back. A second later, the saber makes a sputtering noise, then deactivates. No matter how I shake it or press the activate button, it won't reignite.

The Crown gives me an answer as I scrutinize the small weapon. Battery depleted.

Seriously? I activated it for all of ten seconds! How much energy does it use? Perhaps sustaining a beam of energy takes a lot more power than a quick energy pulse like that of a blaster rifle, so it dies rapidly. Geez. I suppose having a cool weapon isn't in the cards for me.

I hook it through my belt and sigh. "That's a bust. Let's go already. Extinguish." The fire at our feet snuffs out, bringing my smile back. I don't need a lightsaber anyway. I have Wordsmithing.

The steps leading up to the portal take only a few seconds to climb. Once we make it to the top, I almost burst into laughter. The frozen looks of fear and awe on the faces of the monsters inside are comical in a way I've never seen before.

The three of us step through the portal, and the whoomph of air pressure inside makes my ears pop. One of the monsters slowly points at me and says something, but I don't catch it. After a moment, I realize he isn't gesturing toward me, but Kar.

"...new leader! Behold his aura!" The gangly-haired monster continues to point at Kar, and several others nearby nod simultaneously.

"Yes, he has the power of the Sphinx. That must be how he opened the portal without our assistance. Only a Sphinx could have the wisdom to do such a thing."

I open my mouth to retort. "Actually-"

"All bow before the new Sphinx! May he show mercy upon us!" The monsters in the room all fall to their knees, prostrating themselves before us.

"Fuck it," I mutter. I nudge Kar with my elbow. "You can take the credit for this one."

"Hurgh. Your generosity knows no limits."

"Shut up, scaly."

Amelia pokes me in the back, hard. "Jason. Rude!"

The sudden shift in the monster's personalities surprises me. Where before they were vicious and looked like they wanted to tear the flesh from our bodies, they now smile and nod politely. Kar notices my confusion. "Monsters have a hierarchy, just as demons, angels, and humans do. The King or Queen leads all monsters, and that one's aura tends to pass down through to the rest. A wicked king will lead to violence, but one who is peaceful will lead to unity and order."

I frown. "Why is the Sphinx the leader of all monsters?"

"Hurgh. Before, t'was Dragons who sat atop the hierarchy, but as they have long since disappeared from the galaxy, 'tis the Sphinx who leads. The fewer members a species has, the more potent their magical power becomes. I am the only Sphinx; therefore, I must rule."

Amelia pipes up. "Dragons used to lead, huh? Why don't monsters slaughter others of their species to condense their power? Wouldn't that improve their magical abilities dramatically?"

A hissing to my side makes me flinch in surprise. A giant cobra slinks up beside us and flicks its tongue out. "That would be pointlesss... There can only be one rightful king. Even orcssss, without any magical power, can be ussseful in an army."

Kar barely even looks at the freakishly long cobra. "Hurgh. Exactly. A bloody war over monarchical power would serve no purpose. Besides, some monsters birth vast litters of spawnlings, while others, such as the Sphinx, cannot procreate. Our species' self-regulation determines the leader without any artificial assistance. We don't expect a non-monster to understand our ways."

I nod along, forming links in my mind. Monsters, demons, humans, angels, Titans. Each of them works together to form a complex, symbiotic relationship. The Energy Wars must have been unthinkable in scope for the Titans and angels to die off.

Kar trots away to speak with some other monsters, leaving Amelia and me alone together.

Dellfingler shrills out, "Oh boy! I hope we're going on an adventure! What do you guys think, eh?! Amelia, sweetheart, I can't wait for you to wrap those cute little hands around my-"

Before he can finish, she smacks the sword. "Hush! Lewd!"

I chuckle. "Heh. I guess we're going to go out and start looking around, huh?"

Amelia's expression grows more serious. "Jason, I have to ask you something."

"What?"

"It's regarding what we discussed while you ate." She pauses and crosses her hands in front of herself. A trio of goblins pushes past us, nudging her against me. Amelia squirms and pulls away, and her cheeks flush red. "Um, there's a lot of others here. Can we talk somewhere more private?"

"Yeah. That's fine." I swallow slowly, unsure what she wants to discuss. Lately, she hasn't been the bubbly, explosive person she was when we first met. She's grown more subdued, especially since Bahamut's visions took hold of her.

A few minutes later, we step outside of the Great Doors, which are still wide-open from when Kar flung them inward. The darkness of the corridor leading to my cryopod stretches out before us. I make a mental note to start installing lights all around the Labyrinth where possible.

Amelia taps her foot on the ground. She forces an awkward smile, then loops her hands behind her back. "L-look, um, I don't know how to ask this... it's about what Hoarhiim showed you."

My back muscles tense up reflexively. "What about it?"

"What memories did you see? You saw what I used to look like, but Blaarjiim mentioned something to me while we were walking through the forest, and it was a little unsettling."

Now I understand the look on her face. It isn't just nerves, but a lack of faith that's bugging her. She doesn't trust me, given everything she's experienced over the last day or so.

Can I blame her?

"Hoarhiim showed me the events leading up to your encounter with Joan, Amelia. He... he showed me how she hurt you."

Amelia's breath catches. "Hoarhiim showed you our fight?"

"Yeah."

Her lip quivers. "Wh... why wouldn't you just ask me about it?"

"I didn't want to push you away, Amelia. You don't want to talk about Joan, that much is clear. Anyway, Hoarhiim offered to show me. I didn't ask him."

Amelia's eyes drift down to the ball of light resting in my belt pouch. "A likely story. Hoarhiim! Don't you have anything to say for yourself?"

I half-expect him to reply, but as before, he stays silent. Blaarjiim appears in my mind, and Amelia's as well. "Hm. Odd. I cannot sense my brother's presence. He must be sleeping again."

"Sleeping?"

Blaarjiim grins. "When you first met him, he was in a similar state. If something disturbs my brother, or he feels rejected, he goes into isolation. His psyche is too fragile for my liking."

A realization hits me. "Rejected? You... you don't mean..."

Guilt hits me in waves. Hoarhiim showed that memory of Amelia for a reason, yet I spit in his face. I ignored him and called him a liar. He's always been there for me, but I didn't just doubt him yesterday, I outright accused him of deceiving me.

Is that why he's gone silent?

Amelia studies me intently. "Why did Hoarhiim show you my battle with Joan? He wouldn't do something like that without a good reason."

It occurs to me what she's prodding for. "Hoarhiim wanted to explain to me why you were, uh, hurting so badly. I didn't understand your trauma until he-"

"Bullshit." Amelia grits her teeth. "Hoarhiim isn't one to meddle like that. He thinks he's an agent of justice, a force of good against evil. He'd only show you my past if..." She trails off and looks down. A spark of recognition appears in her eyes. "He didn't just show you my fight with Joan."

"What? No, that was all he showed me, Amelia. Why don't you believe me?"

Amelia's jaw slacks, she tilts her head to look at Blaarjiim's orb. "You're right, Blaarjiim. He must have shown Jason something else."

Too late, I realize lying wasn't the best option. "Fine, he showed me one other thing. It wasn't that big of a deal, but you were looking for a lost treasure or something, and some goblins got in your way."

Instantly, Amelia takes a step back. Her jaw drops. "I knew it! You were lying to me!"

"I-I wasn't lying, Amelia! Really! Honest to god!" I start to reach toward her, but she swats my hand away.

"It all makes sense now, Jason. Blaarjiim was right about you. You're a Hero, just like Joan. You keep trying to get close to me so you can hurt me again. If you thought my past didn't matter, you wouldn't lie about it."

Things are getting out of control. She's not listening to me again. "Amelia, please, talk this out with me. Calm down."

She freezes and gawks for several seconds. "You... you used your Wordsmithing on me during the trial! Blaarjiim told me about it! I started acting unnaturally, and I lost all ability to feel my emotions! I couldn't let out the pain inside! What did you do to me?!"

"I calmed you down and undid it a few minutes later, that's all. Amelia, I swear! I didn't want you to hurt yourself-"

"Liar! Jason never tells the truth!" Tears well up in Amelia's eyes. "I... I can't believe you. I thought we were friends, but you used your powers on me just because you were scared. You should be scared! I'm powerful! I'm not a little kid you can look down on!"

"I never said you were, Amelia..."

"Your eyes say it all! You always look down on others, and on me! All you care about is looks; you even said so yourself! Huhk-" Amelia's heel on her shoe catches on a patch of uneven dirt, and she stumbles to the ground. "Ahh! I can't believe you'd do this to me! Liar!"

Blaarjiim appears in my mind, and a sinister grin appears on his face. "Hohoho, my queen is angry at you. She's about to blow, Jason. How will you stop her this time?"

Blaarjiim! That bastard!

Everything clicks into place.

Blaarjiim must be manipulating Amelia to turn her against me. I made a few mistakes, but he keeps weaving a web of conspiracy around my actions, turning me into a villain before her eyes.

"Amelia! Blaarjiim is behind all of this! He's trying to tear us apart, can't you see-"

Before I can finish, Amelia's eyes widen. She jumps to her feet. Her breathing comes in shallow bursts. "Now you're trying to lie about my best friend? Who are you, Jason?! I've known Blaarjiim for thousands of years, while you've barely been around for three days. I have no reason to believe you over him."

I can't think of a response. I watch in horror as she draws Dellfingler from her belt. The sword hollers in surprise. "Whoa, lassie! Let's calm down and think things over! No reason to-"

"Shut up, sword. You're a weapon. You do as I command." Amelia gnashes her teeth together. Her face is horrifying; an angry amalgamation of emotions I've never seen before.

She won't listen to reason. I have to Wordsmith and stop her. "Calm-"

Before the word leaves my mouth, Amelia lunges and pounds her palm into my chest. Several spinning, blurred images of the world swirl around me. My body comes to a sudden stop, and several moments pass before my brain can catch up.

Then the pain hits. I'm upside down. Every inch of my body screams for mercy. I'm in the same situation as when I first met Amelia, only now I have no recourse. My body groans and flops over. I end up face-first on the ground, with my nose and mouth inhaling and swallowing dirt. I can't see more than a few inches ahead. My vision pulses red. Blood? Is that blood pouring from my face? Where am I, again?!

"You were right, Blaarjiim. I sensed the magical buildup. He was going to use his Wordsmithing on me."

Amelia walks over and spins me onto my back with a quick kick. My body flops to the side uselessly, and I can't cry out in pain. My lung must have collapsed. I have maybe a minute to live.

My eyes swivel to look at Amelia. She looks terrifying, like a specter of Death. Dellfingler, in her hands, reminds me of a scythe. She's going to reap my soul!

"What do you mean?" Amelia holds the sword to my chest, but pauses to stare at Blaarjiim.

His face appears in my mind, and hers as well. "If you kill the mortal, his Heroic Aura will pass on to another. You'll have to face an unknown Hero eventually, one who will have the upper hand in a fight."

Amelia nods absentmindedly. Her heart has hardened, and she seems to think very little of killing. "I see. Thank you, Blaarjiim. You've given me an idea."

Dellfingler pivots in her hand, and she aims it at the side of my neck. "Wordsmithing. You must have felt pretty invincible with that power, just as you did when you tortured me, all those years ago. Heroes love to rule and flaunt their power."

The sword flicks to the side, and my eyes bulge as I feel the blade cut across my throat. Warmth spills out over my neck. "Kahk! Amel- kkuh!"

I'm going to die. I'm going to die! I'm going to die!!

Only now do I understand the foolishness of my actions. Had I paid more attention to the heart of the girl I cared about or had I heeded Hoarhiim's warning, I'd never have ended up in this situation.

Amelia steps over me, straddling her legs across both sides of my body. I watch in silence as my life ebbs away. Seconds remain.

She sheathes Dellfingler and holds her free hand up, pointing it at my chest. After making a few quick motions, she mutters something under her breath, and the pain in my body fades.

My throat stops gushing blood. My eyes begin to slump as a wave of exhaustion takes me, and Amelia sighs.

"Now you'll never hurt me ever again."

Part 016: Crippled Man, Broken Bond

Where am I?

I open my eyes, only to see an endless void. I can't feel anything. My body drifts in an infinite ocean of disorienting darkness, giving me the impression I'm floating deep in outer space. I want to move, but my body feels empty.

My nose itches. I try to scratch it, but from nowhere, a blunt object bashes me in the face, stunning me and sending my head into a disorienting spiral.

My mind screams in alarm: You're under attack! Someone's trying to hurt you!

I try to raise my hand and protect myself. "Stah- kkhnn..."

The words won't come out. My throat stings. It won't move properly. My saliva slides down my throat with the same ease as a drop of battery acid. I can't even shift my head to look around.

After a few moments, no more attacks come. Whoever struck me must be standing in the darkness, watching, waiting. It's only now that I notice a painful discomforting sensation on my skull. I'm still wearing the goddamn Crown! It can't be removed from my head unless I do so myself.

Ah! Amelia. That's right! She attacked me! Is she keeping me locked up somewhere? Why is everything so dark? Where did she put me? Hell, come to think of it, how am I alive at all? After seeing the rage on her face, I thought she was going to kill me.

Still, whoever my attacker is, he or she says nothing. I reach out to the Crown to access its database. Solomon's knowledge fills my brain up, and after a few seconds, a series of observations appear in my head.

Auditory receptors: Acceptable. Optic nerves: Burned out. Somatosensory system: Diminished. Mental acuity: Diminished. Movement: 95% impaired. Speech: Disabled.

The readings come from my body. I can still hear, but I can't see or feel anything. What happened after I passed out?

My head is still cocked unnaturally to the side, so I try to reach up to adjust it, only for the invisible assailant to reach over and strike me in the face again. "St- khh!" I choke out a weak plea for mercy, but still, they say nothing.

The sound of a door opening makes me freeze. The creaking of hinges, along with hesitant footsteps causes my heart to pound violently. Another person? Who? Someone's already here, hitting me every time I try to move, and now there's a second intruder? Oh god... I've never felt so alone and scared in my life. I'm more scared than when the statue monster chased me! I can't even defend myself or hide in a corner. I'm completely at their mercy!

"Your Grace?" A female voice pierces the din. The sudden sound hurts my head.

"Mmngh," I mutter.

The footsteps draw closer. I can hear the woman breathing now, so close is she to my bed. "You're awake? Oh, thank the gods!" After she speaks again, I recognize the woman's voice.

Phoebe?

That's right. Phoebe Berthold. I've only spoken to her twice, but she seems a kind and caring soul. Is she working with Amelia? Why would Amelia give me back to Phoebe? I don't understand.

A sensation of warmth brushes against my face. I try to reach up to swat at it, only for another violent blow to strike me. I try to cower away, but I can't even move my head to try and evade the assailant's attacks. Tears bubble in my eyes as I try to stifle the terror in my heart. Whoever's hurting me, they must love seeing the agonized look on-

"Your Grace! Be careful!" Phoebe speaks again, much closer now. The warmth returns to my face, and I finally realize she must be touching me. "Why are you striking yourself? I mean you no harm."

Striking myself? What does she mean? Am... am I the one who keeps hitting my face? But that couldn't be my hand... could it?

A moment passes, and the horrific reality sets in. I can't feel my body at all. It is my hand striking me. I thought there was someone standing above me, silently, torturing me every so often... but it was me all along. I... I feel like such an idiot.

The sound of choked breathing makes me pause. After listening for a few seconds, I realize it's Phoebe. She's trying to stifle tears, but after a few moments, she can't control herself. "Your Grace... I'm so, so sorry. I should have been there. I can't believe what the Black Witch did to you! It's my failure! I'm so sorry! I failed you in your t-time of need..."

It's not your fault, Phoebe. Don't blame yourself for this. I want to comfort her and tell her everything's going to be okay, but I can't speak at all.

"White-hair?" A masculine voice speaks now, and I instantly recognize it as Kar's. He sounds like he's at the door. "Has Turtle woken up yet?"

She sniffles audibly and pulls away. The warmth on my face disappears, and she replies to Kar, "Y-yes, my lord. He has woken, but I don't believe he can speak. He struck himself in the face, too."

"Mmm. I see." Kar's heavy footsteps plod toward me. He stops, and several seconds of silence follow. "I do not know what Frilled One's plans involved. She slashed his throat, only to then partially heal him. 'Twas only enough to close his wounds, but she left his spine shattered. He'll be paralyzed for life if we can't find someone both willing and able to heal him."

"Amelia slashed his throat? B-but, that's awful! I thought they were friends! Why would she do such a thing?!"

Kar grunts. "Hurgh. I can only hazard a guess, White-hair. Turtle is a Hero, one with a power called Wordsmithing. If he cannot speak, then he cannot use his power. It seems her goal was to turn him into a cripple. Now that he can't use his Wordsmithing, he won't get in her way."

Phoebe sniffles again, and I can barely make out the sound of her wiping at her eyes. "Horrid, foul monster. I can't believe she would do such a thing."

"Aye." Kar walks a little closer. I feel the bed shift as he sits down at the far end. "I've sent out a query to the demons, but I doubt any will respond. Healing magic is exceedingly rare, and most demons cannot heal something like a broken spine. I'm afraid that Turtle will stay paralyzed for a long time to come."

I try to blink and open my eyes, but nothing comes into view. I can't see anyone, or anything, not even the tiniest sliver of light. The sensation of tears crawling down my face makes my chest ache.

I'm paralyzed; a hero who can't move. That must be what Amelia meant. You'll never be able to hurt me again, she said. I can't hurt or help anyone. I'm useless. A lump of flesh stuck in a bed.

A choke escapes my throat. The bed shifts slightly. Kar grunts. "Ah. I've disturbed you. I'm sorry, Turtle. I know this must be hard for you, but I assure you. With some patience, I may find someone who can heal you. Don't lose faith."

"Please don't cry, Your Grace." Phoebe's warm hand touches my face again. "I shall stay by your side. I won't let you be alone, no matter the- ah!" She squeaks in surprise. "Kar! His eyes! Look!"

Kar grunts. "They're glowing? What is the meaning of this? Tilt his head this way."

Phoebe pauses. "Forgive me, Your Grace." Saying this, I feel my head shift into a more natural position as she tilts it to allow me to look straight up.

"Hurgh. How odd. Why would his eyes glow white? The color reminds me of- oh! That white orb of his! Have you seen it?"

My heart pounds in my chest. Hoarhiim! Where is he?!

Phoebe grunts. "Ah, I apologize. I know not of what you speak."

"He carried a glowing orb in his belt pouch. You removed his clothes, as I recall. Did you see it?"

Phoebe stutters and stammers as embarrassment floods her voice. "H-his clothes. Right, o-of course. I saw m-many things, but not the orb. My apologies."

"Unfortunate. Perhaps the Frilled One took it. I am sorry, Turtle, but I will do my best to locate it. As for your eyes, I can only guess what the glowing means. White-hair, is Turtle able to see?"

A sensation of wind brushes over my face. "No. He isn't following my hand."

"Can he speak at all?"

I cough and try to force out a word, but all that escapes my lips is, "Kuh- nnguh!"

Kar sighs. "I believe he could heal himself if he had access to Wordsmithing. However, I have an idea. Turtle, you may not be able to speak or move, but perhaps you could communicate in other ways? If you can understand my words, cough twice."

A flash of realization hits me. The blinking code!

I remember reading about a man who lay paralyzed and in the hospital back in my time. He was able to communicate with his doctors and loved ones by blinking once for no, and twice for yes!

"Kuh. Kuh."

"I see," Kar mutters. "Cough four times."

"Kuh. Kuh. Kuh. Kuh."

Kar's voice brightens noticeably. "That is good news. White-hair, I will leave you to take care of him. I must seek out a healer, if possible. Use simple yes and no questions to talk to him. I have known many warriors who ended up in similar situations after a battle. Try not to leave him alone, where possible. Loneliness and helplessness can crush a man's soul."

Phoebe's voice quivers. "I would sooner fall on my sword than leave him in darkness."

"I know." Kar stands up and walks to the door. "He may not be able to say it, but I sense that the Turtle appreciates you, more than you think. You must let go of your feelings of guilt if you wish to feel happiness."

Kar shuts the door behind him, leaving Phoebe and me alone together.

Questions appeaer in my mind. Why would Phoebe feel guilty? Did she do something to me?

I wish I could ask.

Phoebe sits beside me for a long while, saying nothing. I try to reach up and touch her, only for her to jump in surprise. "Your Grace?"

"Kuh." I choke out a reply, but it doesn't amount to much.

She stands beside the bed for a few seconds before sitting down again. "You can still move your right arm? Can you feel my hand?"

"Kuh."

A pause. "Ah, right. One cough for no, two for yes. That was the system, right?"

"Kuh. Kuh."

"So you can't feel my hand. I'm holding yours right now. Try to squeeze, if possible."

I try, but I'm unsure if it worked. Based on Phoebe's reaction, I failed. "Are you squeezing?"

"Kuh. Kuh."

"Nothing changed. Perhaps you can move your hand, but can't feel anything. Be careful, Your Grace. You could hurt yourself." She hesitates for a moment. "D-do you need to use the restroom?"

That's an odd question, I think to myself. A moment later, it occurs to me the gravity of my situation.

Bed sores. Food. Toilet breaks. In the modern world I came from, a hospital would be well-equipped for all of those things. How am I going to use the bathroom in my current state? How will I wash myself? I won't. Phoebe will have to take care of me.

The thought makes me want to die. I've never felt so helpless and ashamed in my entire life.

Phoebe coughs. "I... I know you must have many thoughts now, Your Grace. I just want you to understand that I'm here for you. You saved my friends and me from a lifetime of servitude to a dark god.

Please... please don't hesitate to use me. I will care for you with all my heart. I won't fail you like- like I... like I did King Arthur."

The bed shakes slightly. Phoebe chokes a little, making an odd noise in the process. She's crying again. Why does she weep for me? I feel like someone chained an anvil to my neck. I want to cry, too.

She wipes her eyes and touches my face. "Can you feel this, Your Grace?"

"Kuh. Kuh."

"Ah... I'm glad. I'll stay like this, just for a while, if you'd like."

"Kuh. Kuh."

Part 017: Trauma, Ancient Wounds, Ancient Allies

A month has passed since Amelia crippled me.

Once again, as part of my daily routine, Phoebe carefully leans me forward to rest my chin on a handcrafted wooden device. The custom-carved implement allows her to set me up in bed so she can wash my back and body. She loops my arms through the front to help support my weight, and I feel her breath in my ear as she leans close and presses the cold sponge against my skin.

Her soft humming, gentle as always, soothes me. I'm beginning to recover my sense of touch throughout my body, but only a little. My right arm and hand are just about all that I can move of my own volition, but I can't perform any delicate tasks. They're both so numb that moving them around is mostly guesswork.

"I'll read you another story later, okay? Would you like that?"

Phoebe keeps her voice low, and I cough twice to answer. "Kuh. Kuh."

Phoebe likes to read to me for several hours a day. A week or so after my paralysis, Kar found a cache of books in Bahamut's library. Most of them are dry, tedious descriptions of monster and demon physiology and none of them strike me as creative literature, but Phoebe's soft, gentle voice makes listening to them bearable.

A man named Neil Adams pops in to say hello occasionally. I don't know him, but based on his conversations with Phoebe, I've gathered that he's one of Bahamut's ex-slaves. He and Phoebe share some vague memories of their time living under the Sphinx, but neither of them likes to discuss Bahamut unless necessary.

Of course, Kar also visits from time to time, but aside from him and Neil, nobody else has so much as sent a get-well-soon card. Phoebe never explicitly states the obvious, but I get a sense that many people are disappointed in me. The almighty Hero who solved Bahamut's riddle has become an invalid; one who can only lie in bed and choke.

How can I blame them? I'm useless. I might as well be dead, for all the use I am.

Despite my dark thoughts on the matter, Phoebe doesn't mind even in the slightest. The diaper I wear now was at first a source of incredible embarrassment, and I cried several times knowing she would probably mock me, but this gentle soul never once said anything disparaging about my situation.

Her sweetness is more than a simple lack of mockery. I've come to realize that Phoebe somehow feels fulfilled when she cares for me, as though she wants to be needed by someone, and I'm an outlet for her emotions.

"La la la..." Phoebe cleans my back from top to bottom, and after she finishes, she pats me down with a towel. "There we go... there we go... nice and clean. Doesn't that feel good?"

She crawls behind me and rubs my back, pressing her hands softly against my tender muscles. I'm already beginning to feel the effects of atrophy, given my body never stretches or exercises. It probably won't be long before I can't move around even if Kar does find a healer.

Like that's going to happen.

Suddenly, Phoebe surprises me. She wraps her arms around me and leans forward, pressing herself against my back. "Your Grace... Sir Jason... I spoke to Kar today. He can't... he can't find anyone who will help you. I don't know what to say." She leans forward and rests her chin on my shoulder. I feel her heart beating against mine. "I'm sorry. I'm sorry."

Don't blame yourself, Phoebe, my mind says. It's not your fault. I'm glad you're here with me.

Every time Kar shows up, Phoebe's voice fills with hope, only for her mood to crash when he reveals the bad news. No demons are willing to heal me. I'm a Hero, after all, and while he assures Phoebe they don't know that fact, it's unlikely a demon would care in the slightest about healing a human.

If not a demon, who could heal me? Do humans exist with technology that could repair my shattered spine? If someone could fix my throat, I might be able to do the rest with my Wordsmithing.

Phoebe's hands press against my chest. My gut aches from grief. I wish I could embrace her back. She says she should have been there to protect me from Amelia, but what could she have done? Amelia's strength is superhuman, exceeding the logical. It's better that I'm paralyzed instead of Phoebe.

She's a gentle person, a kind soul. Too good for me. What have I done to deserve someone like her in my life?

Phoebe pulls away. Don't go, I plead in my mind, but she can't hear me. Her voice catches. "Okay. Time to clean your front, Jason."

An hour later, Phoebe yawns audibly and leans me back in bed. I can practically hear her eyes blinking as she pulls the wooden implement away and tucks me in.

The familiar sound of a well-worn book cracking open catches my attention. Phoebe yawns again. "Ahh, sorry, Your Grace. I didn't sleep well last night."

You don't have to read if you're too tired, I think to myself.

She doesn't hear me.

Phoebe begins to read a book regarding different subspecies of Gorgons. "The Medusa is a variant of the Gorgon that only appears every five generations. Her appearance is noted for having... having snakes instead of hair. The hair is both a defensive weapon, and a method for consuming nutrients, given..." She yawns again and pauses for a few seconds before continuing. This is the third time in a week she's started to doze off while reading.

"...given the Medusa's inability to consume sustenance through her mouth as most other monsters do. Her snakes are a precious tool, and their bite is highly... highly venomous. It has been said that one bite from... ahh..."

A silence follows. Phoebe whispers, "S-sorry. I'm... I need to rest my eyes for a bit." The shifting of the bed as she leans her face on it makes me smile. A few minutes later, her breathing evens out as she rests on the bed beside me.

I move my right arm forward, slowly, uncertain of its position in the environment around me. When I reach her head, I carefully lower it. I can barely make out the sensation of her hair under my hand, and I stroke it carefully, trying hard not to wake her up.

Considering my options, I'm probably stuck in this bed for the rest of my life. I'll eventually have to accept my fate, but what about Phoebe? No matter the guilt she feels, caring for my pathetically broken husk will wear thin eventually. She'll leave me, once she realizes a future with a vegetable is no way to live. If I were on life support, I'd cut the power to save her the trouble.

Before I entered the Cryopod, I was a leech on society. What has changed? Nothing. I'm as useless now as I was before.

Phoebe's shallow breaths seem to fill the whole room. I can't hear the outside world at all. No children playing, servants working, warriors training, swords clashing, or any other sound.

When my life ends, I can only pray I will pass away quickly. I can't dwell on my past forever.

I just...

I wish I hadn't deserted Hoarhiim.

At some point, I must have dozed off, because when I wake up, I hear Phoebe flipping pages quietly. My glowing eyes catch her attention, and she closes the book. "Did you have a good nap, Your Grace?"

"Kuh. Kuh."

"I'm pleased to hear that." I can almost feel the smile in her voice. "Um, when I woke up, your hand was on my head. W-were you trying to wake me up?"

"Kuh."

"So... you just wished to touch me?"

Her phrasing makes me blush. I don't know why I wanted to stroke her hair... I just did it. Maybe that was the wrong move.

"Kuh. Kuh."

My heart skips several beats as the seconds crawl past. Phoebe doesn't say anything. After a full minute, she exhales. "I'm glad. You know, I've never had a purpose in life. When I was a child, I wanted to be more than just a wife or a maid, so I put all my energy into knight training. Women weren't allowed to do such things, so I had to train in total secrecy. Imagine my surprise when the king himself, Arthur, took notice of me one day and challenged me to a swordfight. He must have seen me training behind his castle, but when we fought, he knocked me down in just fifteen seconds."

I stare at the blackness around me. Phoebe's more talkative than usual. I don't mind. I'd like to know more about her.

She pauses, and a lilt of sadness creeps into her voice. "I felt ashamed, worthless. The king was going to put me to death. I knew women weren't allowed to use weapons unless their lives were in danger, but I did so anyway. Despite this, Arthur surprised me. He turned out to be a kind, sweet gentleman. If a demon threatened his land, Arthur would burn everything to the ground if it meant retribution for his countrymen, but for the people under him, he never once treated them as inferiors. He told me that since I had lasted three seconds longer in combat than the average man, I deserved a position of prestige. And so, he knighted me as the commander of his Silver Battalion."

Arthur sounds like an excellent Hero, my mind says, somewhat bitterly. If only I could be as extraordinary as him.

"You know, Jason..." Phoebe trails off for a moment before continuing. "You and Arthur are very similar. Well, you were similar, I suppose. He died long ago, but all the qualities he had as a Hero, you also possess. Your kindness reminds me of him. When I'm around you, I feel... I feel as though I'm with the king, once more."

To my surprise, I feel warmth somewhere below my neck. It takes me a moment to recognize the sensation is emanating from my hand. Phoebe must be holding it again.

More silence follows, and I feel a sensation move across the top of my fingers. Phoebe strokes my hand slowly, over and over, tiring me and causing my eyes to flutter. I've begun to fall asleep more easily as of late. I can barely keep my mind awake for a few hours at a time. I wonder what that means? Perhaps death is coming for me ahead of schedule.

Phoebe pauses. The bed shakes slightly as she sits next time me. "Oh, this ring. I recognize it. Isn't this one of the rings Bahamut wore?"

I blink my eyes slowly. Yes. Bahamut's ring. One of three, as I recall. I never bothered putting the other two on. I suppose, in the end, such an act would be pointless.

The feeling of exhaustion weighing on me clears up in an instant. Wait, what am I saying? Those rings belonged to the Archangels! Where are the other two? Where are Michael and Raphael's rings?!

I pull my hand away from Phoebe and slap it against my stomach.

Rings. They were in my pocket. No, Phoebe undressed me. Where did she put my clothes? Didn't I lose my clothes before I left with Amelia? I made a new shirt and pants, so where did my old clothes go?!

"Kmungh- nguuuh!" I choke hoarsely, and my hand slaps my face as I fumble around. My mouth works just enough for me to swallow liquids, though my jaw lacks the strength to chew anything solid, but perhaps if I...

I navigate my hand to my mouth. Ring finger. That's where I put Gabriel's band.

I slide half my hand into my mouth, and Phoebe cries out in alarm. "Your Grace?! Are you choking? Is something lodged in your throat?!"

No, dammit! I'm trying to get my ring off! I carefully lick my fingers until I taste the brass band, then I slowly bite down until my incisors lock onto it. With a Herculean effort, I pull my hand away, and the ring comes off. It stays clenched between my top and bottom teeth, and Phoebe notices. "You wanted that ring off?"

"Kuh. Kuh."

"I see." She reaches forward and gently pulls it out of my mouth. I release it and let her have it. Several seconds pass as she examines the ring. "There's a word written here, but it's a language I don't understand."

Gabriel. It's Gabriel's name. Curses! How do I tell her I need to find the other two rings?!

Seconds pass.

My mind races with options. I don't know why I want to try those rings, but I feel as though something is calling out to me.

A curious lilt enters Phoebe's voice. "Say, didn't Bahamut have two more rings just like this?"

"KUH! KUHH!" I nearly spit mucus everywhere as I choke out the affirmation.

Phoebe picks up on my signals. "Do you know where the other two are?"

"Kuh."

"Do you want me to find them for you?"

"Kuh! Kuh!"

A sound of brass on wood pings to my right. "I'll set this one here on your dresser, Your Grace. I'm going to leave for a while. Perhaps I can find out where the other two went."

"Kuh. Kuh."

"As you wish."

Phoebe shuffles to the door, and a moment later, it creaks shut behind her.

I'm alone, now.

Please, Phoebe. Find Raphael and Michael.

"Your Grace!" Phoebe's voice rings out in the silence of the room, jarring me awake. The paralyzation terror hits for the third time this week, only to fade after a moment. "I've found them!"

Phoebe walks over to the bed, followed by another set of footsteps. "Huk?" I lilt my choke slightly, and Phoebe picks up on my question. She's grown adept at understanding my signals.

"It's Neil Adams, your grace. The man in charge of the mines, as you may recall? He helped me track down one of the maids who had found the rings in the wash."

Splendid, I think to myself. I smile as wide as I can, but it doesn't come out well.

Mr. Adams clears his throat. "Always a pleasure to be of service to the Hero, milord. I'm sorry it took us as many hours as it did, but the palace has quite a lot of staff."

Phoebe pulls her chair up next to the bed and touches my hand. "You wanted to wear the rings, isn't that correct?"

I pull my hand and fumble around to my side, trying to find Gabriel's ring, and Phoebe pulls my hand back onto the bed. "All you had to do was ask, Your Grace."

She slides Gabriel's ring off the dresser and places it on my ring finger. Before she can put the other two on, Adam takes a step forward. "Hold, lady Berthold. Please allow me to examine the bands."

Phoebe hesitates, unsure if it's okay to let him touch the Hero's artifacts, so I choke out a yes, that's fine. "Kuh. Kuh."

The sound of movement follows, and Adams mutters to himself. "Hmm, yes. These were Bahamut's rings, weren't they? The writing is in Latin, an archaic language. They each say Raphael and Michael, respectively."

More movement. Phoebe holds my hand up again, and a smile enters her voice. "Here you go, Your Grace."

The coldness of the first ring stings my middle finger. I choke out a gasp as a series of images flood the blackness of my vision.

Sometime later, I appear in an open clearing, where a small campfire crackles in the darkness of the night, four logs arranged around it for seating purposes. The stars twinkle above me, and a gentle breeze sways the trees in the distance.

An old man in white robes sits atop the far log and pokes the fire with a stick. His majestic white wings spread out five feet in every direction. A grey beard five inches long stretches down from his chin, nearly touching his knee due to how far forward he sits.

The old man doesn't look up at me as he reaches over and places a log in the fire. "How art thou, Jason Hiro? I see thou hath finally come to pay this old bag of bones a visit."

I nod dumbly and walk over to sit on the log across from him.

Without asking, I already know his name.

Raphael.

For a full minute, neither of us speaks. I stare silently at Raphael, grateful to have the use of my eyes again. However, after he says nothing, I figure he must be waiting for me to talk first. "Raphael, I need your help."

"Mmm, yes, I imagined as much," Raphael replies. He yawns and pushes a log into the fire to give it some air. The embers crackle loudly for a second as some kindling shifts around.

"I'm paralyzed. I need to heal myself."

Raphael shakes his head slowly. "Oh, I don't think that is thy biggest problem, young Hero. The body can heal in an instant, but the mind is where pain lingers."

"What do you mean? Are you going to help me?"

"Patience, boy. We've time aplenty to spare. Art thou in a rush?"

"Somewhat. Then again, I've already spent a month in bed, so... maybe not?"

The old man clears his throat and rests his hands on his lap. "Hahaha... The young always move too quickly. Life is a never-ending dash when one is healthy. Occasionally one must slow down, breathe deeply, and ponder the path ahead."

"I've spent a month lying in bed. I think I've taken things pretty slow."

"Nay. 'Tis not the body, but the mind that determines thy restless nature. Things both small and large cause thee endless turmoil. For example, I wonder how many times thou hath flayed thyself over the event that caused thy paralysis."

I follow his gaze to the fire and bow my head. "I keep thinking I should have spoken to Amelia differently. I should have listened and asked her about her past."

"Perhaps. One will always make mistakes when he is in a hurry, hoho."

Raphael reaches behind his log and pulls out a brass flute. He doesn't play the instrument, but instead wipes it down with his robes, cleaning some dust from it. "When it comes to women, most men are terrible at listening. I expect a blunder from one as inexperienced with the opposite sex as thee."

"Th-thanks," I mutter, trying not to sound sarcastic.

"My pleasure."

The winged grandfather twiddles his beard for a few moments. "The angels are the most ancient of all species, Jason. Of them, I am the eldest. I've seen many things strange and wondrous. Few happenings surprise me."

I rub my eyes. "What do I do, Raphael? If you're old, you must be wise too. Can't you give me any pointers?"

"Wisdom is a word used to divide the young from the old. Simply because one is old, that does not make him wise, just as a youth may not necessarily be a fool. Everyone calls me the Archangel of Wisdom, but 'tis just a title, as Gabriel is the Archangel of Power, and Michael is the Archangel of Courage. I have plenty of courage to spare, similar to how Gabriel has wisdom and Michael, power."

This guy loves his word games.

I clear my throat. "Well, you're probably smarter than me, right? How do I heal myself? How do I convince Amelia I'm her friend? How do I save humanity from the demons? How-"

Raphael holds up a palm. "Those are not the questions thou must ask, young Hero. Instead, look at the guilt welling up in thy heart. 'Tis a sore that will grow to engulf thy entire body. Thou dost blame thyself for Earth's destruction and humanity's present situation. In thy eyes, thou art a failure who has yet to measure up to the greatest heroes of the past."

I try not to look too miffed. "That sounds about right. You have me pinned perfectly."

"Of course I do. I'm old!" Raphael chuckles and sticks his flute back behind the log. "However, the heroes of the past are hardly the perfect deities ye imagine. All faced trials and tribulations that tested their mettle, their character, their morality, and their convictions."

"Oh yeah? What about Joan? She looked violent to me."

Raphael squints, and I feel the faint brush of something tickling my brain. "Ye saw a vision of Joan, eh? A courageous Hero, she was. While powerful, t'was her conviction to eradicate evil, no matter the cost, that allowed her to stand out from the crowd. Where some heroes may have stayed their blade and tried to convert an enemy to the light, Joan always hardened her heart. She cared little for her humanity, and instead sought to put every waking hour to the destruction of demonkind."

My mouth gapes open. "Joan sounds like a psychopath! Are you telling me that she murdered every demon in her path without mercy?!"

"Aye. Arthur faltered at times. Solomon was a peaceful soul. King David believed that righteousness existed in the hearts of all beings. But not Jeanne d'Arc. She believed that demons were contrary to the Creator, and that her duty was to purge them from the universe. In just a few short years, she slew tens of millions all by herself."

The air between us grows silent enough that I could hear a pin drop.

"That's... that's awful. She sounds like a monster!"

"A monster, aye, perhaps. The demons, desperate to halt Joan's rampage, pulled out all the stops to have other humans accuse her of heresy. They burned her at the stake before her 20th birthday."

"So that part was true? But how did Joan end up fighting Amelia if humans had killed her thousands of years before?"

Raphael's face turns grim. "Heroes, when they reached a certain threshold of power, tended to bind their life-force to an artifact. Solomon, for example, to his Crown. Joan, to the Sword of Heaven, her most treasured artifact. Thus, her soul survived the destruction of her flesh."

The memory of what happened hits me. "You mean... when Amelia touched the sword..."

"The Black Witch's malevolent evil activated the remnants of Joan's soul and released her from the Sword of Heaven. Joan was a purifier, one who would eliminate evil at any cost. She did not merely attack thy friend for no good reason."

A minute passes. I glower into the fire as bits and pieces of events fall into place. "Amelia murdered those goblins. She sought out the sword, and accidentally released Joan from it. Almost everything makes sense now."

"Almost?" Raphael leans back and pulls a smoking pipe from the folds of his robe. He drops some crushed leaves inside and lights it, then puffs a few smoke-rings into the air. "What confusion still befuddles thy mind?"

"Amelia never once acted the way she did in Hoarhiim's memory around me. She turned against me at the end, but... I think I deserved it."

"Ye deserved for a companion to paralyze thee and render ye defenseless? My, if she's the sort of person one calls a friend, I'd hate to meet thy enemies."

The old man chuckles again, but I don't. My head hurts from all this thinking.

"I need to face Amelia again, Raphael. I have to confront her. Will you help me? Is there a way to cure my paralysis?"

"Hm? Oh, yes, a simple matter."

The Archangel smiles but says nothing else. I wait for him to continue, but he doesn't.

"And that would be...?"

"I cannot heal thee, but Michael can. After Becky placed my ring on thy finger, time froze while we spoke. Soon she'll-"

"Phoebe. Her name is Phoebe."

He shrugs at my interruption. "Becky, Phoebe, same thing. I'm a forgetful old man. In any case, once ye leave, thou must meet the remaining Archangel. Michael may even prove wiser than I."

"I find that hard to believe."

"Believe what you will. I care not." Raphael puffs on his pipe again, and his voice grows cold. "All the angels are dead, Child of Gaia, and the Titans as well. Chains bind humanity. The demons may seem to rule on high, but they are hardly the greatest threat to life as we know it. In time, thou shalt learn of an enemy beyond the Demon Emperors. Stay on the alert. Our abilities as Archangels are but a fraction of their former power. We will be of little help to thee in the future."

Before saying my goodbyes, a question remains. I rub my hands together. "Say, Raphael?"

"Yes?"

"Why didn't Joan kill Amelia? I mean, you said Joan was a murderous Hero who always slew evil... but she left Amelia alive."

The Archangel stares at me, a grim look in his eyes. "Joan hated demons. Not humans. No matter how evil the Black Witch was, Joan would never kill someone of her species. When her fellow humans burned her alive, she went willingly, believing her death was the will of the Creator. She was vicious and violent, yet loving and kind."

"That's quite the contrast."

The old man sticks some fresh plants in his pipe's bowl. "Thou aren't wrong."

I watch Raphael puff on his pipe for a minute, then I stand up and bow graciously. "Thank you, Archangel of Wisdom. You've helped me greatly."

"And thou hath given me the best conversation in a long time! Drop by more often! Don't leave an old man to suffer in loneliness!"

"Ehehe, I'll do my best, grandpa."

Several moments later, the world fades away, and the darkness of my unseeing eyes takes over. Phoebe fumbles with my fingers for a moment. "Did you see that, Mr. Adams? He arched his back for a split second."

"Are you certain? I saw nothing of the sort." The man's gruff voice overpowers hers, and Phoebe coughs meekly.

"Perhaps t'was my imagination. Well, I'll put on the next ring, then."

The third band settles onto my index finger, and I shiver as a wave of coldness envelops me. A chilling blizzard wraps itself around my hand and travels up my arm to my heart.

The world fades away, and a different name appears in my mind.

Michael.

A frigid breeze blows across a grassy plain. October's sunlight shines down, preventing the land from freezing, though Mother Nature does her best to hush the greenery to sleep.

Winter is coming.

A nearby lake lies still, and the occasional duck flaps around, quacking in the water. Deer and Antelope graze next to a nearby forest, and the sound of a goat braying on the other side of a nearby hill somehow seems relaxing. These are not just the sounds of animals, but animals from Earth. My home.

I shiver unexpectedly and feel a small bit of frostburn on the tips of my ears. If I stay in this cold for long, I probably won't be able to wake up.

"H-hello? Muh-Michael?" My stammering voice is a squeak in the wind, barely audible even to me. A maelstrom surges, piercing every layer of my clothing and knocking me to the ground as I try to withstand winter's onslaught. Snow pours from the sky, as though the North Pole's floodgates have suddenly opened. Within seconds, two inches of snow build around and on top of me. The animals flee to the forest for safety, but it's too far away for me. I'm alone.

I'm going to freeze to death in a mental hallucination! What the fuck?! Where's Michael?!

As if my mental voice is a mighty horn beckoning across the plains, warmth surges from the hill next to me. A slow glance upward reveals a bright light atop the grassy hillock. A single man, wearing a crown of thorns, stares down at me.

"Art thou cold, young one?"

My teeth chatter. "Y-y-yeah."

"Warmth pours from me. Come closer. The snow will melt if ye enter my aura."

"I-I c-can't... m-move... too... c-cold..."

My body locks up. The slight warmth Michael gives off isn't enough to melt the snow around me. I might die within seconds if I can't get a move on!

"Dost thee lack courage, or perhaps conviction? Thy current predicament is a simple trial, a test of thy willpower. If thou cannot force thyself to stand, then perhaps ye deserve to die."

I blink in surprise. "What- what are you saying? I thought... aren't you Jesus Christ? Aren't you supposed to be kind and compassionate?!"

Michael holds his hand up, and a massive two-headed lion crawls up the peak beside him and rolls around in the grass playfully. "Kindness and compassion can take many forms. Some would call my trial 'tough love,' young Hero. Listen to thyself. Art thou still shivering?"

A quick breath escapes my lips.

Michael is right. I don't feel cold anymore. In fact, I'm halfway up the hill. When did I get here? Did I crawl?

"I'm not cold, no. Why... what...?"

Michael gazes past me at the forest across the lake. The wind slowly dies down, and the sun begins melting the snow. A single deer peeks through the trees, checking to see if it's safe to come out.

"Have ye ever sacrificed a part of thyself for someone else, Hero?"

Yes, I want to say, but I pause to think about it. "No."

"Hath thee ever gone out of thy way to help someone, even if it greatly inconvenienced thee?"

"...Not really."

Michael looks me right in the eye. "The defining trait of a Hero is self-sacrifice. A Hero must have the courage to wound themselves, even if their actions will only save the life of one person."

I nod dumbly, unsure of what he means. "That sounds about right, but I don't see what you're driving at."

Michael bows his head. "When the angels and gods were at their weakest, I knew it wouldn't be long before the demons launched a final assault and killed us all. Death is everlasting to an immortal, and incomprehensibly more painful than to a mortal. A mortal might live a hundred years, but an angel will live forever. Losing an eternity with those I loved was the price I was willing to pay if it meant they could go on without me."

"Is that why you're known as the Archangel of Courage?"

Michael closes his eyes. A single tear squeezes out and drips down to his robes. "I was terrified. I stood firm, so those I cared about wouldn't fret, but in truth, 'twas the hardest thing I ever did. The only thing that would have hurt more would have been killing my closest friend."

A shock like electricity arcs down my spine. "Killing your closest friend? Wait! You don't mean..."

"Amelia, thy companion, slew many members of my family. She is not the innocent child thou dost think she is. I know thy thoughts and thy past, Hero. Thy childhood was lonely and devoid of companions. Nobody loved thee. Upon meeting Amelia, thou didst harden thy heart and pretend not to care, but secretly, thy thoughts dwelt on her. Thy feelings for her might be pure, but she is corrupt. Few beings exist who have sunk to similar depths of depravity as the Black Witch."

Michael wipes his tears away and hardens his gaze. "Whether ye lack conviction or courage, one thing is for certain. Hero, thou must kill the monster posing as a woman. Joan lacked the courage to sacrifice her morality. She was unwilling to kill another human being, and as such allowed the Black Witch to survive to today. However, Amelia is still weak. The demons won't dare to strike at her, fearing her powers, but her weakness is known to thee. Thou hath the power and the obligation to strike her down, where others will not."

Cautiously, I stand up and take a step back from the Archangel. "You... you want me to kill her? I-I can't just kill someone! That's awful!"

"Death is a way of life," Michael snaps. "Thou hath already spent a month with thy new companion, Phoebe. She cares deeply for thee, but if ye allow the Black Witch to roam free, Phoebe will be in grave danger, along with the rest of humanity. Phoebe is willing to fall on her sword should thou ask, but have ye the same conviction as she? Art thou willing to sacrifice thy morals to save thy friends?"

"Amelia is my friend too!" Anger roars into my voice. "Just because I've spent more time with Phoebe doesn't mean I value Amelia's friendship less! What the hell kind of Archangel are you, anyway? You talk about death more flippantly than the Archangel of Power! Even Gabriel has more respect for life than you do!"

Michael glowers at me for a moment before looking away. His eyes soften. "Perhaps you're right. In a way, it takes a different sort of courage to choose one's morality over the lives of others. Still, tell me, Hero... dost thee care about Phoebe? She stays at thy side when others do not. She devotes herself to thee fully. If ye had to choose, would ye save her life, or Amelia's?"

"That's an awful question," I counter. "I have Wordsmithing. Maybe I can do both. You don't know."

"I don't," Michael admits. "But if thou can accomplish such a feat, thou wouldst be the first. One cannot merely pacify evil. The hammer of righteousness must crush darkness wherever it appears."

Michael trails off, and my gaze wanders. A glance down at my feet reveals flowers sprouting in the grass below me. Somehow, winter has passed, and spring has arrived. How long have we been talking?

"The only problem with that statement, Michael, is that evil can be very subjective. Maybe I don't consider myself a righteous paladin ready to crush demons under my boot. Even if I did, I refuse to believe what others say about Amelia until I see her supposed evil nature for myself."

Michael keeps his voice low. "A fool learns only from his mistakes, but a wise man learns from the mistakes of others. One may choose whatever path they please, but I pray, for thy sake, that thou dost not regret thy choice."

After a moment, the Archangel walks down to me. When he draws closer, I can't help but notice that I'm a little taller than him. "I will heal thy shattered spine, Hero. Before leaving, however, know this: Thou art the last Hero. Due to the extinction of the angels and Titans, the Heroic aura will no longer pass on to another after thy death. Please, I beg of thee to carefully consider the path ahead."

"I will, Michael. Of that much, you can be confident."

The Archangel walks behind me and inhales. "My power is limited, Hero. I can only help thee this one time. Take care to create safeguards for thyself, lest ye stumble into another unfortunate situation."

I nod and bow my head as his arms touch my back. An explosive pain erupts through my body, and tears of agony blast from my eyes like Niagara Falls. "AUGHHH!"

Michael releases me, and I fall to the ground, unable to control my arms and legs as they convulse erratically.

"Be strong, Hero."

Michael's last words fade as the mental world dissolves away.

A moment later, I scream a raspy, pained growl as several hands grab hold of me. The blackness around me becomes unbearable as I struggle to look at whoever is pinning me down. I can't control my limbs though, and every finger and toe squeezes together all at once.

"He's going into shock!" A man, likely Mr. Adams, yells in alarm. "Try to hold him down! He'll hurt himself otherwise!"

"Your Grace! Jason! Please, stop!"

Phoebe screams in fright and throws herself on me, but I can't control my flailing form. She wraps herself around my arms and holds them tightly, even as I unconsciously struggle to free myself. After several agonizing seconds, the pain in my body subsides as quickly as it arrived. I flop back down and gasp violently.

"Haah... haaahh..." My throat aches, but not in the way it did only minutes earlier. Phoebe pants quietly, and I feel the warmth of her breath on my face.

"Y-your Grace? Are- are you...?"

"Fah... I'm fah..." I choke and try to get the words out, but going a month without using my throat has left it dry and raspy. I take a moment to swallow, before replying. "I'm f-fine, Phoebe. Thank... thank you. Thank you for stopping me."

I can't see anything. I can only feel Phoebe's clothed body pressing against mine. A moment of silence follows before she climbs off of me. "I-I apologize for my impropriety, Your Grace."

"I... I didn't mind. Not at all," I say, suppressing a tiny smile. Cautiously, I lift my hand and squeeze, feeling vigor return to my body. My sense of touch is back. Slowly, I sit up and swivel my head around.

My vision remains black. I'm still blind.

"Vision." I speak the word, but nothing happens.

"My liege?" Adams intones questioningly. "Have you recovered?"

"I have. The Archangels healed me."

This time, a huge smile crosses my face.

I may be blind, but thanks to Michael, I can speak and move. I am grateful, Archangels. I won't waste your gifts.

Part 018: Freedom Comes With a Price

My entire body shakes as I slide my legs over the edge of the bed. My body might be healed, but I barely have a drop of strength left in me.

Phoebe sits beside me and uses her hand to support my back. "I'll help you, Your Grace. If you want to stand, use me as a crutch."

I nod. "Yeah. Thanks, Phoebe."

Disgust overcomes me as I realize I'm still wearing a diaper. I tilt my head in the general direction of Neil Adams. "Ah, would you mind giving us some privacy? I'm sorry to send you away like this, but..."

Neil coughs. "I'm glad to have helped, my liege. I shall take my leave, then. Miss Berthold, be certain to let me know if there are any complications."

A moment later, the door opens and closes behind him, leaving the two of us alone together.

Phoebe's hand brushes against my back. "Why did you send Sir Adams away?"

"Well, I'm covered in excrement. I didn't want Adams to see me like that."

I feel a faint vibration in the air as she nods. "I understand. Do you want me to leave you, then? Now that you can stand on your own, you'll certainly want to take a bath and-"

"Ah, that won't be necessary, Phoebe. At this point, there isn't anything you can see that you haven't already." I pause a moment before continuing. "Clean. Strengthen."

The filth caked all over my body vanishes. My muscles rebuild themselves in an instant, and my shaking stops. Before I know it, a nauseous sensation I'd barely noticed has disappeared too.

"Briefs. Jeans. Shirt. Jacket."

My diaper vanishes and swaps out for some underwear, and the rest of the clothes appear a moment later. Everyday blue jeans and a white shirt/black jacket combo pop onto my body like some sort of cheap magic trick. I can't see what I'm wearing, but based on Phoebe's reaction; they must look pretty dapper.

"Is that Your Grace's magic? I've not seen it until now."

"It's the power of my Heroic Aura. I call it 'Wordsmithing.' I can make anything happen with a single word, so long as the effect I want is related to the term."

"I see. Is that how you guessed the answer to Bahamut's riddle?"

"Nope. I already knew the answer from hearing it when I was younger."

"Goodness. To solve the riddle in seconds without the use of magic, His Grace must be highly intelligent."

"Uh... sure. Let's go with that."

After a moment of breathing, I climb to my feet and marvel at how my paralysis already feels like a distant memory. I'm now able to stand and move as if Amelia had never maimed me in the first place.

However, I'm still blind.

That's a problem. Hm. How do I solve this dilemma?

Well, maybe I don't need my eyes to 'see' around me. Animals use a myriad of techniques to see their environment. Perhaps I could duplicate that?

"Where's my crown, Phoebe?"

She coughs. "Err, you're wearing it, Your Grace. We were unable to remove it."

"Oh. Right. Thanks."

I groan inwardly at my absentmindedness. Within seconds, I pull up information from the Crown on animals from Earth. Bats, snakes, and dozens of other species appear, along with some deep-sea animals I've never even heard of before.

Sonar. Bats use echolocation to detect the world around them. I could turn into Daredevil and continuously scream to hear the environment surrounding me. Unfortunately, I would end up looking like a lunatic in the process.

Infrared. The ability to see heat instead of light might work.

Other options appear in my mind. I close my eyes and focus. I'll try using all of them.

"Perception. Infrared. Sonar. Detection. Tracking. Targeting."

Each word shifts my mind and body — the pores on my skin flex and shift, allowing me to feel the heat surrounding me. My ears and brain adjust, allowing me to hear in a way that my eyes never could. The sound of a mouse inside a hole in the wall sends ripples of vibration in all directions, 'illuminating' the room. I feel as if I can see a wire-frame view of the world, complete with red blobs of heat and blue blobs of cold.

"Your Grace?" Phoebe speaks questioningly, and her voice echoes throughout the room for a brief moment, displaying every object in a sphere, as though I have eyes covering every inch of my body. The experience is disorienting, yet, at the same time, it's as if I've unlocked the Third Eye. I have senses unique from any other human.

I take a step forward, and the faint sound my foot makes lights up the room again. Thankfully, I don't have to scream like a madman, since any sound, no matter how faint, displays the world in a wireframe around me. To say that normal eyesight pales in comparison would be a gross underestimation.

However, there is one downside. I can't see Phoebe's face at all, aside from a blob of featureless red. Her womanly figure gives her different curves than that of a man, but red blobs aren't attractive, no matter how I imagine them.

So instead, I close my eyes. "You were there for me, Phoebe."

My random statement catches her off-guard. "What? Your Grace?"

"You don't have to call me that, you know. You can call me Jason. I'd feel better if you did."

She stammers for a moment. "W-well, ah, that would be too forthcoming for me to use the name of the Hero so casually. I don't... I don't think I could call you by your name, Your Grace."

"You called me Jason a few minutes ago when I woke up."

The heat in Phoebe's face increases slightly. I think she's blushing, but it's difficult to tell. "Well, th-that was different. I was attempting to calm you down."

I take a moment to sit back on the bed beside Phoebe and wrap my arm around behind her. "I'm really, truly grateful, Phoebe. You never looked down on me during my paralysis. Without you, I probably would have given up within a week."

"You're much too kind. I only did what any servant would."

Her quick dismissal makes me grin. "Are you sure about that? Did anyone tell you to care for me? Didn't you choose to do so by yourself?"

Phoebe squirms. "I... I may have decided on my own. What of it?"

It takes me a moment to come up with the right words. "I care about you. You care about me. I've only known you a month, but nobody has ever meant as much to me as you do right now."

Phoebe wrenches her hands together. "Y-Your Grace... for a servant and a king, such a relationship would be... improper."

"I'm speaking to you as Jason, the person, not Jason, the king. I never asked for this. Everyone declared me a ruler without my consent, but I didn't want to let them down. As for you, Phoebe, I don't see you the same way I do the others."

Her head bows slightly. "How do you see me, then?"

I linger on the question for a moment. "As an equal. A friend, for sure, not just a subject. I'd be happier if we could go further than that, though."

Phoebe glances at me suddenly. "You've grown that fond of me? I... I don't know. We've only known each other for a month."

Disappointment itches at the back of my mind. "You don't... like me? But, I thought we had a special connection?"

To my surprise, Phoebe suddenly stands up and pulls away from my touch. "Your Grace, I can't. I simply can't. A few stray emotions clouded my judgment on occasion, but I pushed them aside. Commoners and nobility cannot court each other and mingle so freely. That is the way it should be."

"Phoebe, hold on. Look, I'm not nobility. I'm a regular guy - a commoner, like you. You don't have to overthink-"

"Not true! Not true at all, Your Grace." Phoebe's hands tremble slightly. "I cannot accept such a lie! The Hero is unlike any other human, in that their gift comes from the gods. Common nobility is too low a title for one such as yourself. When I call you a king, I refer to the highest sense, that of the divine authority to rule."

Phoebe carefully slides past me, leaning against the dresser as she makes her way to the door. "Your Gr- ah, Jason, I care for you, I do, but you're moving too quickly. You must think about your position and what it means to rule. You've only just healed, and I believe the shock has yet to wear off. I will take my leave, and once you are ready, you should come to the dining room and break bread with your palace staff."

I nod numbly at her. "Right. I.... I understand. I'll be down soon."

She stares at me for a few long moments before quickly opening the door and stepping outside. After she closes it, I suddenly feel incredibly awkward. She stops in the hallway and stares out a window blankly... but I can still see her with my spherical vision. The walls, floor, and ceiling are no barrier to me. Anywhere that sounds emanate; I can sense the surroundings within several hundred feet.

After a minute, Phoebe wipes her eyes and continues walking away, sniffling as she walks.

She's crying — the woman who took care of me during my paralysis. I did that. I made her cry. What the hell is wrong with me?! Ugh! Idiot! Bonehead!

Within seconds, another thought appears in my head.

You're too desperate, Jason. You keep making moves toward people to fill up a void in your heart. You're pushing people away, and it needs to stop.

Minutes pass, and I sigh. I'm alone now, without even Hoarhiim to fill the silence. I've always been alone. No friends. No family. Maybe that's why I keep acting so damn needy. Why would Phoebe want to hang out with a loser who latches onto every tenuous emotional connection? I'm like an emotional vampire or something.

Standing up, I spot my personal effects stacked neatly in the far corner of the room. Among them are my old clothes, and as I walk over and pick them out, I can only smile at how the blood has been thoroughly scrubbed out. Phoebe's doing, most likely.

In the basket rests my shitty broken lightsaber. It occurs to me that if Phoebe had activated it, she might have accidentally killed or injured herself. I need to be more careful in the future.

I stare at the lightsaber for a few minutes. Solomon's Crown gives me a summary of its issues. The battery is too weak for sustained use. Internal mana from my body could power it, but that would drain me quickly. External energy would be ideal, but the Labyrinth has little to no ambient power sources lying around, and certainly none sufficient to energize a weapon of this caliber. Hmm. I'll have to think about how to improve it.

"Belt."

I Wordsmith myself a belt, then slip it around my pants and stick the lightsaber in a custom-made holster.

A thought occurs to me. If I want to be a Jedi, wouldn't I need Force Push and Force Pull? Those are standard-issue basic-bitch force abilities! And what's the best way to mimic them?

"Telekinesis."

A single word spoken to the silent room is all it takes. A moment later, I aim my mind at the saber on my belt and call it to my right hand — the process so natural that it feels as if I've been using telekinesis for my entire life.

At least this is helping take my mind off of Phoebe.

Idiot! You pushed her away!

No, no, stop. You can't keep beating yourself up over your past foolishness. Negative thoughts won't get you anywhere, you stupid nincompoop.

I'm not a nincompoop! You are!

Why am I arguing with myself?!

Because you're dumb as hell!

Ahhh!

I quickly storm out of the room, leaving my split personalities to feud among themselves. Instead of pushing the door shut with my hand, I pause outside and aim my mind at it.

Foop!

With a shove from my newly acquired telekinesis, I close my room behind me and smile.

God, that's cool as hell.

Half an hour passes. I slowly stroll down the halls, adjusting to my new 'vision.'

The world around me shapes itself into splotches of red and blue. The morning sun beats down outside, warming the roof of Bahamut's palace and radiating heat down through each floor until the effect is hardly noticeable at the middle and lower levels. Bugs crawl on the walls, their tiny skittering noises making them appear as little more than bumps in need of sanding.

I'm surprised at how empty the halls are. No matter where I check, I can't find anyone in the myriad assortment of smaller quarters to my right or left. I even stop and stare out a window to see if there's anyone outside, but my spherical vision doesn't spot a soul.

Once I arrive at the lowest level and approach the dining room, a smile spreads across my face. Through the wall is a massive group of red blobs, each one crouched low to the ground. Based on their posture and body language, as well as the lack of heat from overhead lights, the people inside must be waiting for me to arrive so they can throw a surprise party. That, or I'm about to enter a room full of deadly ninja assassins and meet a quick end.

I wipe the smile off my face. They don't know you can see through walls, Jason. Make sure you play up the surprise.

Forcing myself to look slightly sad and melancholic, I push the doors open and lean against the wall, acting as though I'm having a tough time seeing around, and the room erupts into a thousand cheers. "Surprise!"

I jump back and fake confusion. "Huh? What's going on?!"

A sea of red pushes toward me as humans and monsters alike howl and jeer. "Hah! The look on his face!"

"We got him real good!"

"Welcome back to the living, Hero King!"

I smile politely and nod. "Wow, I didn't expect a surprise party! Whose idea was this?"

A minotaur strides forward, one I immediately recognize as Head Chef Yamir. "Great Hero, I am glad to see you have recovered from your wounds. The one responsible for this party was none other than your most faithful servant, Miss Berthold. She told us of your recovery, and we put the entire thing together as quickly as possible. I do apologize for the lack of decorations."

"Quick, huh? No kidding. It hasn't even been half an hour since I healed." I chuckle, and the room full of monsters roars in laughter, drowning mine out. "Where's Phoebe?"

Yamir nods behind me. "She went to train in the courtyard. Won't you come and eat? You've lived off liquids for a month now. I bet you'd kill for some juicy meat." The Minotaur's politeness fades for a moment as his giant tongue leaps from his mouth to slather his lips. "Meat is very, very good."

My throat tightens reflexively at the slight aggressiveness. "I, uh... I can make my own food. My mag-"

"Nonsense! I won't allow the king to cook. I'd sooner hurl myself into the River Sheol than make our savior feed himself! Sit!"

Yamir pulls out a chair.

I sigh.

"Alright. I'd hate to turn down your hospitality."

Moments later, the distant doors fling open, and a cavalcade of chefs pours through, mimicking my experience a month ago with Amelia. I stare silently at the wall of food approaching me at Mach 10, wondering to myself, how the hell am I supposed to eat all of this?!

Yamir places down cakes, pies, meats, cheeses, and a litany of other entrees. My eyes look from one thing to the next. "Where do I start? It all looks amazing. I couldn't imagine most of this if I wanted."

The minotaur smirks. "We don't expect you to eat the majority of the food here, Your Majesty. The leftovers will go in the trash."

"What?! No way! That's awful! Don't waste food! Give the rest to the hungry!"

He shakes his head. "I cook for kings and rulers. Besides, the commoners have food aplenty. Mister Adams has seen to that. He created a distribution network for our stores that ensure none go hungry."

"I see."

Half a minute passes. Yamir watches me expectantly as I gingerly reach for a fish.

Suddenly, an idea comes to me.

Yamir thinks I'll waste 90% of his spread. I'll teach him a lesson. Never underestimate a Wordsmith.

Casually, I spear the fish closest to me. "Yamir, I'll make you a bet."

"Oh? What would that be?" The Minotaur leans down on the table, resting on his hands.

"If I eat this entire breakfast, you have to promise only to cook one or two main entrees at a time for me from now on. You choose which ones, of course."

Yamir eyes me blankly. Then he smiles. "Hehehe, a good jest, Your Majesty. A mountain troll couldn't stomach this entire feast. I'll entertain your deal."

"Good. You're about to learn what a Hero can do."

I stuff the fish in my mouth, savoring the mixture of saltiness and sweetness, along with that delicious fishy tang. It isn't the same as tuna, salmon, or any other fish I've eaten in my life. The taste and texture are distinct, peeling apart under my fork and knife and melting in my mouth.

Christ. The food is amazing.

Minutes pass. I finish off the fish and pat my stomach. Already, the feast is looking insurmountable.

However, I have a secret.

Using my left hand, I pull a plate of cake toward me, and with my right hand, I dab my mouth with a napkin. Then, I whisper under my breath, "Empty."

The sensation of fullness in my stomach vanishes, as does all of the food I've just eaten.

A wicked smile spread across my face. I win.

Three hours pass.

Yamir stares in awe. I swallow the last swig of lentil soup and dab my face with a miraculously clean cloth napkin. He offered to swap it out many times, but since I have Wordsmithing, I cleaned it without telling him. He has no idea how I'm accomplishing my feats of superhuman eating.

"I can't believe my eyes. Your Majesty, did your paralysis inflict a devilish hunger upon your body? Are you cursed to spend the rest of your life suffering from an unending appetite?"

"Nah. I have a few useful abilities. Eating an infinite amount of food is one of them."

Usually, I would smile. At this moment, however, my jaw hurts like hell. The human mouth is not designed to consumed food for three hours straight. I cough into my fist, "Heal," and the pain vanishes.

Leaving Yamir behind, I wink at the Minotaur. "Remember the deal. No more waste."

The head chef gazes at me with a look of admiration and awe. "Of course not. I will do as you command, Your Majesty."

The cobblestone path outside Bahamut's palace appears more distinct than the grass nearby, given how my footsteps echo around it. The wind produces a steady trickle of sound, illuminating my surroundings more clearly than when I was indoors.

A bird chirps on a nearby fence. I pause to admire it, though once it sees me, it flies away.

"Turtle!" Kar's voice rings out, startling me. He's harder to see than other people thanks to his cold-blooded body. "Where are you off to, now that you've healed?"

"I'm trying to find Phoebe."

Kar slithers up to me and rests his reptilian claw on my back. "You can look for her later. I've been wanting to show you something in the Labyrinth Core. Come, follow me."

The crocodile takes off and starts walking briskly, but I hold up a hand. "You want me to walk all the way to the portal? I'd rather admire the sights for a while. Can it wait? Let's put that off until tomorrow."

"Trust me, Turtle. You'll like what I have to show you."

Kar continues to insist, so I sigh. "Alright. Fine."

It's an hour walk to the portal from Bahamut's castle, even with the path I cut through the forest, but Kar tells me all sorts of interesting things as we march. Kar was busy with various administrative tasks the entire duration of my paralysis. He and Phoebe accomplished a lot.

As it happens, the Labyrinth has several portal rooms similar to the Labyrinth Core, but all of them only have one portal each, and none are in nearly as convenient a location as the center of the Labyrinth. Because of this, we ended up taking control of one of the most critical areas of the Labyrinth, stealing it from the demons in the process.

Still, I have my doubts. As we exit the forest and the portal looms in the distance, I ask, "Aren't monsters allied with demons? Why would they stand up against their former allies and side with a human Hero like me?"

Kar chuckles. "Diplomacy is a tricky thing, little Turtle. While Bahamut was, in fact, Queen of all monsters, she only enslaved the most powerful and those she thought were worth controlling. Most of the numerous, weaker monsters stand opposed to our goals. A few powerful individuals, including Medusa, ally with the demons, since they were beyond Bahamut's ability to control. Any whom she did command now answer to me, and they all do so of their own free will."

I nod. "So, it isn't that the monsters listen to me, but that they recognize you as ruler."

Kar growls. "Hurgh. It is as you say. The monsters here on Tarus II know of your exploits, but we have agreed not to release information about you to the others. As far as my subjects are concerned, 'twas I who single-handedly defeated Bahamut."

"Well, ain't that convenient," I grumble under my breath. "I'm glad things worked out perfectly for you."

"Thank you for your blessing," Kar replies. "You are a most generous Turtle."

I decide not to explain the meaning of sarcasm to him.

When we arrive, there's a tiny figure, perhaps five inches tall, flying around outside the gate. I'm surprised to find that instead of red or blue, its heat signature is yellow. When we're a hundred feet away, the thing flies over to us and squeaks out in a cutesy female voice, "Master Kar! Is this the guy?"

The crocodile nods. "Turtle, this is Blinker. She's a fairy, and also my assistant. I couldn't manage the Core without her."

I smile politely. "Ah, nice to meet you, Blinker. I've never seen a fairy before."

She giggles cutely and flutters up close to my face. "Heehee! And I've never met a human with glowing eyes! How'd you get those peepers? They're pretty!"

"It's a confusing story. Maybe I'll tell you some other time," I reply.

Never have I spoken truer words, since I haven't a clue why they shine.

She pauses to stare at my crown. "Hey! Kar! This guy has a big shiny ring with gems on his head! What's up with that?"

"It indicates he's a king," Kar replies. "Humans call it a 'crown.'"

"But I thought you were king?"

"Of monsters, yes, my butterfly. Jason rules the humans."

"Ohhhh, I get it! Neat. Well, let's get going, already. I've been flying around waiting for you, and I could use a break. I hear the Demon Emperors are getting antsy, too!"

She darts away like a dragonfly on the wind and disappears into the portal. I shoot a questioning glance at Kar. "The Demon Emperors?"

"Aye. News of Bahamut's death has sent shockwaves throughout the Labyrinth. The fact we're barring demons from using the Labyrinth Core has sparked concerns among the demons of a possible revolt. Demons usually leave monsters alone and allow us to settle our disputes, and vice-versa, but I cannot in good conscience allow them to use our portals to kill humans. Due to my choices, our situation has changed from an internal conflict among monsters to an external one involving demons. The Emperors are sure to issue several demands shortly."

We're halfway up the steps before I fully comprehend his words. "Are you saying that you've intentionally painted a target on your back? You're willing to fight the demons to protect humans?"

We arrive at the top platform, but Kar halts before we enter. "My upbringing is quite different compared to other monsters, little Turtle. Marie, the mother of lizardmen, taught us the values of humanity. While many monsters look upon humans with disdain, I see them as beacons of hope and ingenuity. I can't say my mother would approve of my reckless actions, but I am me, and she is she."

Kar tilts his head slightly to look at me. "Demons are vile, Jason. They consume human souls, but only to fuel their lust for power. Demons are greedy beings, unlike the monsters who live in the Labyrinth. Mother may have grown used to their hunger, but I have not."

We continue forward and step through the portal. The whoomph of air pressure makes my eardrums squeal and pop for a moment, but they clear up. None of the monsters turn to look at us — they're busy doing their own thing.

Blinker flies around us in circles. "Geez! You big guys always walk sooo slow! Come on, Kar!" She flies away again to a nearby panel and the crocodile gestures for me to follow.

We stop in front of a video screen, but I can't make out any details. All I can see are varying shades of red and yellow light from the heat it produces. Blinker presses her tiny body against the panel, then buzzes over to another spot and presses again, repeating the action several times. "Okay! All done!"

Kar grunts and gestures to the screen. "Now, do you understand?"

I shake my head. "I probably haven't mentioned this yet, Kar, but I'm technically still blind."

The reptile flinches visibly. "O-oh, I didn't know. Hurgh. That means I brought you here for no reason."

"Kinda. Can you explain whatever it is I'm supposed to be seeing?"

"Certainly. We've compiled a list of planets commonly accessed by the demons. This computer pulls information from all the warp-gates used across the Labyrinth."

I nod absentmindedly. "Okay. What about it?"

"We now know where all the feeding grounds are for demons. Humans don't live in the Labyrinth. They live on planets strewn across the galaxy."

A spark of realization pops into my mind. "So we could disrupt the demon food chain by liberating the worlds they oppress?"

Kar snorts. "Hmph. It will not be an easy battle. Humans are not allowed to have weaponry, technology, or anything that might give them a fighting chance against their oppressors. They live in squalor — barely able to maintain enough food to support their population. It will be an uphill battle, to say the least."

"Why don't they build better weapons to fight the demons?" I ask, unsure of their exact situation. "Even in my day, we had guns and tanks and other shit. You don't mean to tell me the demons can fight a tank and win, can they?"

Several moments of silence follow. Kar turns his head away. "Jason. The humans you speak of are from the ancient times. Humans in the modern era are primitive and defenseless. The closest things to weapons they can use to defend themselves with are sticks. I don't know what a 'taynck' is, but it is likely far superior to anything a human has now."

Blinker buzzes in front of my face. "Kar is right! Humans haven't a chance against demons! It's probably best you give up now. Honestly, Tarus II ain't a bad home! All sorts of scenery to see, things to do-"

"No," I say, cutting her off. "If humans are suffering at the hands of the demons, I have a moral responsibility to do something about it."

She flits a foot away from my face. "Well, okey-dokey then, mister glowing-eyes person. I'm just trying to help you, not waste your time. Suit yourself!" Blinker flies back to the computer screen and lands on top of it.

Kar coughs. "Hurgh. Your reaction is as I expected. In any case, if you choose to liberate humanity, demonkind will rally against us. The Labyrinth Core is susceptible to attacks from any direction, especially with the great doors still open. How will we fight back against the demonic hordes and our fellow monsters?"

"I don't know. I have to think about it," I mutter, as my hand brushes against the lightsaber on my belt. "If demons are keeping humans weakened, there must be a reason. They need humankind for our souls, but at the same time, they fear us. Perhaps they have a good reason."

Yes. I see it now, my mind mutters. Weapons will allow humanity to fight back. Before I can decide on a course of action, though, I'll need to visit a few worlds and get a feel for their political situations. Then, I'll need to find Amelia.

No, dummy, you need to find Amelia first! She took Hoarhiim!

Yeah, good point. Thanks, me.

Sometimes I talk to myself. I'm weird like that.

"Kar, find the most populated planet full of humans and open a gate there. I'm going back to town to find Phoebe. I need to talk to her."

"Hurgh. You'll return soon, then?"

I nod. "Yup. Within a few hours, I hope. I'll be back."

I make my way to the Tarus II portal and sigh. Maybe this time, I'll summon wings. Walking is such a buzzkill.

Part 019: A Taste of the Good Life

Recommended Listening

My skirt flaps in the wind as I run through a field of wheat. Before me, a juicy snack runs with all her strength, trying desperately to escape my clutches.

"Oh my gosh! Slow down, lady!" I call out cheerfully, but for some reason, she doesn't listen!

The panicking woman screams in terror and trips over a rock. She falls to her side and hits the ground hard enough to lose her breath. "D-demon! Monster! Please, no! Stay away! I have a family and children! Don't hurt me!!"

"You've got a whole family too?! Oh, boy, it's my lucky day!"

I skip gaily over to the woman and yank her up by the front of her dress. "If you tell me where they are, I'll make this quick!"

Her eyes bulge. "No, gods! Save me! Somebody help! HELLLP!!"

Aw, man. She isn't going to squeal. Bummer.

I sigh and promptly unhinge my jaw, preparing to devour her like all the others today. "Too bad!"

With a quick flick of my wrist, I toss her flailing body ten feet in the air and catch it head-first in my mouth, squealing in delight as I bite down and savor all the blood and entrails. Ooh! She tastes way better than the others!

The woman's lip-smacking goodness rolls around in my mouth as I savor every drop of iron-rich blood. The bone-marrow is probably the yuckiest part, but it goes down without much resistance.

A glance around the farm after I finish reveals that the woman's husband and children have fled. Men are such wimps. There was once a time when I'd have to watch out for a militia, but that was long before Joan stuffed me in that stupid statue. Humans these days are utterly defenseless!

Blaarjiim smiles in my mind. "Well done, my queen. That makes two hundred and four in the last hour."

I pull my jaw back together and crack my neck. "Ohh, it takes too long to eat these snacks one by one! My teeth hurt!"

While I rub my chin, Blaarjiim looks my blue dress up and down. "You're covered in blood, my queen. Perhaps you should find a river so that you can bathe and wash your clothes."

"Oh, phooey. I'll just get dirty again. Besides, I don't have to look cute for anyone! Well, other than you, but I know you don't mind the sight of blood."

Blaarjiim chuckles. "Hehe... how right you are."

I scan the horizon for a moment, squinting to look for movement. I've already cleared out most of the farms in the area, but the woman said she had a family... they must be hiding somewhere nearby.

"Blaarjiim, sweetie, don't keep me waiting. Give me some good news."

My best friend spins in a circle. "You don't need to ask twice, my queen. I've already investigated the area to look for signs of life. To the west, there are a few birds, and a rodent scampering around in the house. Oh, and three warm bodies behind a hay bale to the north-west." He absentmindedly points toward a bale blending in with some dry, cracked yellow grass a half-mile away. "Two children and a man, it seems."

"Yay! Children are the juiciest!"

My feet kick up dust as I skip from the green grass into the yellow field and whistle merrily along the way. A six-year-old girl shrieks at the top of her lungs and bolts from behind the bale, her little brother following in hot pursuit. "Janey! Janey!!" A man jumps out from behind the bale of hay, a shovel in his hand. His entire body shakes in terror. "Fiend! I'll- I'll end you myself!"

I wiggle my finger at him and lean forward, showing him my brightest smile. "Big words, mister! Your wifey-poo screamed for help, but you let her die like the shameless coward you are! What are you gonna do with that shovel, anyway? Surely you're not going to hit a cute little girl like-"

The man leaps forward, howling at the top of his lungs. "MONSTER! DIE!"

I reward his bravery by standing perfectly still and letting his shovel smash against my face. Naturally, his pitiful attack does nothing. "Was that IT? Oh gee golly whiz, I thought you were a big strong man! I didn't even flinch!"

The man pulls away, a look of panic on his face. "You're... you're not human!!"

With a shrug of my shoulders, I sigh. "Yeah. I get that a lot."

After an awkward silence, I jump at the man and break his neck in one quick motion. His clothes are nasty, so I tear them off before hurling his body into my gaping maw.

Yeck. He tastes terrible. Far worse than his wife did.

"Aaaooo... Blaarjiim, my tummy feels awful."

He nods comfortingly. "I know, my queen, but you must endure the pain. You've already grown significantly from your former self. By human reckoning, you appear nearly sixteen years old. Soon, you'll return to your full power."

I glance down and examine myself. Already my kiddish body has begun filling out into an adult figure. "How many have I eaten?"

"Around twenty thousand, by my reckoning."

"That isn't nearly enough."

My eyes sweep into the distance. I can barely make out the forms of the little boy and girl fleeing for their lives. They won't make it far.

Blaarjiim slips a note of curiosity into his voice. "Oh? You sound worried. Does your concern have anything to do with the mortal?"

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"The Wordsmith. You left him behind with the rest of his kind. You should have dragged him along." Blaarjiim growls in annoyance. "They might heal him."

"Unlikely. Bahamut doesn't have the healing technology the humans did during the Energy Wars. Demons won't heal him. He won't be able to Wordsmith. There's no issue."

A minute passes. Blaarjiim doesn't say anything. I start to walk toward the boy and the girl, pleased he's finally shut his trap, but then he speaks again. "Your heart has grown attached to the mortal. I sense your conflicting emotions when he is near. When he summoned the wall of flame, you confided in me that his latent power was terrifying. Despite this, you revealed your weakness to him, and now he knows that you're no match against the higher demons. Even paralyzed, he could give that information to them and-"

"And what, Blaarjiim?!" I burst into anger and grab his orb out of my purse to glare at it. "He can't speak, and he can't move! Jason's just a lump of flesh rotting in a bed! No demon will heal a human, and humans can't treat him, either. He's as good as dead, so why do you care?!"

Blaarjiim cocks his head. "Ah. I understand, now. I see why you didn't bring him along."

His reversal makes me hesitate. "You... you do?"

"Mmm." He rubs his chin thoughtfully. "You plan to heal and challenge him to combat. You must still feel the sting of defeat even to this day, so your ultimate goal is to beat him and redeem yourself."

Blaarjiim's conjecture proves to be entirely wrong, but still, my cheeks burn red. "Th-that's not true."

"Of course, it's true. I know my queen all too well." Blaarjiim smirks haughtily. "I don't blame you for what happened, Lady Amelia. You were unprepared for Joan's power, and she caught you off-guard. Had your fight taken place under different circumstances, you'd-"

"Stop, Blaarjiim. I don't want to hear about her." My voice wavers slightly. "Can't we talk about something else? You're depressing me. Sometimes I wonder if you like seeing me cry."

My closest friend in the whole universe bows his head. "That isn't true."

"Yes. I know."

Minutes pass. I stare into the sky, feeling the warmth of the sun beat upon my chest.

My hand rubs Blaarjiim's orb, almost instinctively, before placing it back in my purse. I pause to tap Hoarhiim's orb as well. "Sunshine here still hasn't said a word."

"Hoarhiim continues to rest. I've never seen him in such a state," Blaarjiim muses. "We've wasted enough time. The children continue to flee. It would be unlike you to let them go."

I force myself to smile. "Don't worry your pretty little face. I won't let those snacks escape. I need their souls to break Joan's seal."

After a moment of hesitation, I jam my shoe into the dirt and leap up, scanning ahead for the children in a cornfield up ahead. A few stalks of corn move, and I lick my lips. Snacks.

It only takes a minute for me to dash after them, whistling loudly to scare them and make them run faster. "Helloooo! Are there any children hiding in the corn? Let's play Hide and Eat!"

A squeak from the little girl catches my attention. I spot a flash of brown as she charges further into the corn. Unfortunately for her, there's no escaping my maw.

With a hop, I gently leap a hundred feet forward, land right in her path, and giggle as the six-year-old slams into my legs. The dread on her face gives me the shivers. "You're a cutie! Where's your brother?"

She doesn't let out a word, so I grab her by the neck and lift her into the air. "Well, if you won't tell me, I'll just have to find him mys-"

"My queen!" Blaarjiim's voice fills with alarm. "I-it can't be!"

I pause mid-sentence and try not to look too annoyed as the child squirms and tries to unwrap my fingers from her neck. "What? What is it?"

"M-my brother's orb... it's..."

I steal a glance down at my purse — every fiber of my being freezes.

Hoarhiim's orb is gone.

Part 020: Lightsaber, Tradition

My stomach churns. My mind spins. It takes all of my concentration to break away from the scene of horror before me, and to speak a word of power.

"Take."

A moment later, Hoarhiim's orb appears in my hand, and I retract my vision from the grassy field to return to my body.

I'm sickened. Disgusted. Nauseated.

After using 'Locate' to find Amelia, I ended up witnessing a scene I'll never forget.

Amelia, her sky-blue sundress covered in blood, was chasing after a family of humans with a psychotic grin plastered across her face. Her expression reminded me of scary clowns from horror movies I saw in my youth. Unnatural.

What planet was she on? What reason could she have for performing such horrible, vile acts? What could motivate her to walk such a path of evil?

Sweat glides from my forehead and drips past my eyes. I stop at the edge of the forest and lean against a tree. Amelia isn't the sweet little girl she pretended to be, I think to myself. Everyone has been warning me, but I ignored them. I didn't want to believe the truth.

Amelia isn't just a liar; she's dangerous. She tore me apart in less than a second and left me to die. I can't allow her to slaughter human settlements for her sick, demented plans!

But... how can I stop her? She outclasses me in speed, strength, and every other category. She has magic, too; I know that much for sure. Can she match my Wordsmithing? Possibly not.

I'm vulnerable. Wordsmithing requires me to speak and form words. One broken jaw, and I'm out of the fight. I have to protect my neck, head, and lungs, at the absolute minimum. If that's the case, then it seems I need a helmet.

"What do you think I should do, Hoarhiim?"

Silence follows as the glowing white orb offers no response. I guess he's not going to say anything, after all — not even a thank-you for the rescue.

Maybe he hates me.

After a moment of silence, I stick Hoarhiim's orb in my belt-pouch. My hand brushes against the faulty lightsaber, and I decide that now is a good time to try fixing it. I need an edge against Amelia. She's too dangerous for me to ignore anymore.

When I press the lightsaber's activation button, it only makes a sputtering noise, pops out for a split second, then retracts again — dead battery.

"Recharge."

After saying a single word, I watch as the weapon activates, and the beam shoots out like it did before. However, once again, after fewer than ten seconds, it sputters and dies.

I can recharge the lightsaber's battery, but the amount of power it needs is ridiculous. Unless I plan to say 'recharge' every ten seconds during a battle, the saber is functionally useless.

Maybe there's a better way to power it. I activate the Crown and begin perusing my options.

A power cell sitting a distance away could beam the energy required to my lightsaber wirelessly, but the power draw is too high. I'll have to turn it off every couple of minutes and let it charge to full. Worse, the further I move from the power source, the less energy that will transmit.

There's also the option of adding a much bigger, bulkier battery. I might be able to create a fusion power core and attach it to the bottom of the saber, but that would make it bottom-heavy and awkward to swing. The saber also would look like an inverted hammer, which would be super dumb.

Hmm. Maybe there's another option.

Oh! I could create a portable battery and maybe wear it like a backpack! Then I could attach it to my lightsaber with a thin cord, and I could even use a wireless charging mode if the situation called for it! Brilliant!

"Battery." I speak a word of power and create a fat, highly energized cell with straps to wear on my back. The battery is a little warm, but not uncomfortably so. I then create a cord, alter the lightsaber a bit, and attach the cord to its underside.

With a flick of my thumb, I press the ignition button and watch as the lightsaber springs to life.

This time, several minutes pass, and the sword continues to hum audibly, sounding far stabler than it did before. I swipe at the ground a few times and smile as it finally serves its purpose. Best of all, I can attach and detach the charging cord using telekinesis!

Wow. That was a surprisingly easy fix. The battery is pretty bulky, but giving myself more physical power with Wordsmithing is child's play.

"Strength!"

My physical strength increases by around 40%, turning me into a man capable of lifting over a ton. The stress on my muscles nearly bursts my arteries, but I manage to solve my problems with a few rounds of healing and conditioning.

Satisfied, I nod and continue into the woods, slashing at trees every so often while I wait to see if the battery will die. Indeed, after fifteen minutes, it finally does, but I can refill it instantly with Wordsmithing. Fifteen minutes is nothing compared to ten seconds — a win in my book.

Depression takes me as the trees loom from both sides. I'm making a better weapon, just in case I have to fight Amelia. Am I going to cut her down with this laser sword? Is that the sort of person I'll have to become?

Heroes shouldn't kill. They're supposed to be saviors, arbiters of justice. Superman never kills anyone, unless it's the absolute last option. Not even Batman murders, unless a particularly edgy author is writing the comic.

A second voice appears in my mind. Those superheroes were comic book characters. Stop living in the fantasy world, Jason. To be a hero, you have to make sacrifices. Remember what Michael told you? There's no way you can argue with an Archangel who lived for tens of billions of years.

I shake my head. It's not about being like Batman or Superman. Yeah, they're only comic book heroes, but they're also inspirational. I can't inspire others to commit genocide! If I kill Amelia, who's to say I won't kill someone else, and another person, and another after them? Where will it end?

You're a gas, my second inner voice snorts. If the good guys never kill, then how will evil ever be annihilated? If we didn't kill Hitler, then who knows how many more millions he'd have gone on to exterminate?

I frown. Hitler killed himself.

My second inner voice hesitates. ...Nobody likes a smartass.

Rolling my eyes, I gaze at the sky.

Joan was supposedly a Hero, but she annihilated tens of millions of demons. By my reckoning, that made her a genocidal maniac.

She's the only Hero I know anything about, but already she's soured my image of what it means to be a champion of justice. How can someone call themselves a 'good guy' if they commit acts of evil? Isn't the point to be better than my enemies?

Maybe I'm naive. I come from a world where the 'good guys' dropped two atomic bombs on an enemy to cow them into submission and used internment camps just like the dictators they opposed. Maybe my idea of justice is infantile. I probably need to grow up and face the facts; violence is a necessary evil.

But...

...That doesn't mean I have to like it.

Half an hour later, I emerge from the woods, climb up the canyon stairs, and stop to watch a Harpy playing horseshoes with a ten-year-old girl. The two are having great fun, and it makes me realize that the monsters aren't as different from humans as their looks would suggest. Heck, the Harpy is even letting the kid win. Adorable.

"Locate." I speak the word to the wind and aim my thoughts at Phoebe. My mental vision travels into the air and zooms around to a small training area behind the castle. I pause mid-flight and watch as Phoebe swings a sword repeatedly into a training dummy, adding several chop marks into an already diced-up frame. The poor thing is on its last legs, and about ready to fall apart.

Once my mental vision returns, I summon a pair of wings and fly over the castle, waving politely at the citizens below who gaze up and gawk at me.

I swing left over the castle and smile at the sound of Phoebe's grunting as she continues to chop the wooden dummy. "Haah! Hyah!"

Landing silently about fifty feet away, I quietly magic my wings away, then Wordsmith at the dummy. "Repair." It shifts and grows back again, catching her off guard. Phoebe stops swinging and gawks at the mannequin, then spots me out of the corner of her eye. "Ah! Your Grace! How long have you-?!"

"I just got here a second ago. Sorry to scare you." I smile for a moment to disarm her anxiety before continuing. "Getting some exercise, huh? You probably needed it, after being cooped up with me for a month."

"I... I trained when I could." Phoebe lowers her sword and stares at me. "Your health was my primary concern."

"Yeah, I know. I, ah... I wanted to talk to you about that." Casually, I start closing the gap between us, walking about a step per second. "Look, uh, about earlier-"

"Twas' nothing worth mentioning," Phoebe says, clamming up suddenly. "I... I barely even thought about it! You had just woken up, and your nerves were a bit frazzled. No man could be blamed for rushing to judgment."

"Hah... rushing? No, no. I spent that entire month thinking, Phoebe." I stop in front of her and stare down at the nearly six-foot-tall blob of heat before me. She's taller than most women, but not quite at my level. "Phoebe, I can't take 'no' for an answer. Maybe I'm just a young, idiot guy, but I care for you. I don't want anything to happen to you. I want to protect you."

Her cheeks flare-up. "That is quite kind of you, Your Grace."

"No, you're the kind one, since you selflessly took care of me without anyone asking you. You could have left at any time, but you didn't. Why not?"

Phoebe stammers and reaches up to brush a stray hair from her face. "Well.... you see... you're the Hero. If you die, then humanity has no hope..."

"Yeah? So you only care about me since I'm the Hero, and not for any other reason?"

She wraps both of her hands tightly around her sword's hilt. "I didn't say that."

"Then, why?"

"Just because."

"That's not a good enough answer."

I sigh and stoop down to my knees so I can look up into her eyes, though it's mostly pointless given I can't see anything. Oh well.

"Phoebe, I'm not good at awkward things, so I'll spit it out. I love you. I don't want anything to happen to you, and most importantly, I want you by my side. You're not only a friend or a caregiver, but someone more precious to me. I hope you feel the same-"

I pause mid-sentence as Phoebe suddenly reaches a hand up to wipe her eyes.

"Are... are you crying?"

She sniffles. "N-no..."

"I think you are."

"I'm not!" She stomps her foot and looks away. "Augh! Jason, I'm a hand-maiden! You're royalty! It can't work between us!"

"Yes, it can, dammit! I was born believing that as long as two people cared for each other, it didn't matter what their status was!"

She growls. "I was taught the opposite! Only marry within your class!"

"Marry?" I balk suddenly. "Whoa, I- I didn't want to move that quickly."

She takes a sudden step backward. "You what?! But... a woman must be chaste until she enters wedlock!"

Only now do I realize the situation I'm in. Phoebe comes from a different time period than I do, and her expectations of a relationship follow from her life growing up. She isn't just old-fashioned, she's ancient-fashioned.

I, on the other hand, grew up in a time of casual romance and constant divorce. Marriage was little more than a minor formality for two people who had been together for several years already. For Phoebe, marriage is the very first step.

So, if that's the case, I have two options: I can change her stance, or I can accept it. I don't know what the correct choice is.

Phoebe kneels as well, meeting me at the same eye level. "Your Gr-, ah, Jason... if you wish it, I can be your Mistress. I... I never expected a king to take me in such a way, and it does betray my convictions, but if it's for your happiness, then-"

"No, I can't do that. That would only hurt you." I cut her off before she can finish. "You know, Phoebe, you're right. I'm taking things too fast. I'm immature, still. I have much to learn."

"We all do," She replies, nodding. "In truth, I feel the same toward you that you do me, but with God as my witness, a woman cannot shirk her sworn duties. I must protect and care for the Hero, no matter what form he or she may take. That has become a personal task above, and beyond the creed I swore my life on as a child."

Phoebe slowly tilts her head up to look at the clouds. "It was so long ago that I've forgotten the words. Does the oath bind me to my dying breath?"

"Perhaps, Phoebe. Perhaps."

Without meaning to, I stretch my hand out and take hers. It's an unconscious movement, but unlike before, she doesn't pull away. Instead, she lowers her head to stare into my eyes. "Jason?"

"I don't care what form your oath takes, Phoebe. I want you to be with me. That's all."

She smiles sweetly. "And so, I shall." A moment passes as we stare into each other's eyes. Phoebe swallows. "C-close your eyes."

"Okay."

I close them, but my eyelids don't limit my spherical vision. I watch in silence as Phoebe leans forward and presses her lips against mine.

A moment later, I pull her against me and finally release my burning passion upon her lips. I know what I want, and I won't take no for an answer.

Tradition be damned.

Part 021: I, Demon

A tiny imp races in front of me and rubs his claws together gleefully. "Emperor Diablo! Always a pleasure to see you, your nastiness!"

I nod at him. "Dingle, I've summoned the Council of Dukes. They should all be here shortly. Gather any relevant information in the meantime."

"Of course! Anything for you! Nyehehe!"

Dingle quickly turns and scurries up the hall, and I turn to the Warper behind me.

"Grigori. I'll be back soon. Consume a few souls if you must, but I don't want to wait for your energy to refill."

The lanky demon weaves some hand signs. "Of course. It is as you wish, Third Emperor."

"Great. I can't wait to hear what's gone wrong this time."

After breaking away from Grigori, I plod down the hallway, yawning all the while. I had to wake up from a nap for this. Ever since the Black Witch escaped containment, it seems there's always something going wrong in the Labyrinth.

Devils. She's more than a nuisance at this point. I'm reasonably confident she has no grudge against the Emperors, but if she does, it would be such a drag to have to fight her. There'll be a whole process. I'll have to gather the Dukes and form a strike force... what a pain.

I stop just before leaving the hall in front of a shiny demonstone slab. Thanks to the light entering from the outer room, I can check my appearance. As always, a few black hairs stick up on my head, spurning my efforts to keep everything slicked back and professional-looking. I quickly lick my hand and smooth them down, but with my luck, they'll pop back up in a few minutes anyway.

My pressed black robes, as always, are stunning. The red cloak and its golden linings speak to my status. I don't care about looking good for anyone in particular, but being a Demon Emperor means I have to try to look the part. The devil only knows how Belial's flitting about damages the reputation of the Council.

I stifle another massive yawn. I barely get any rest these days. There's always some trifle wasting my time, some inane tomfoolery pulling me away from the sweet embrace of sleep.

Stepping out into the main chamber, I stifle my gag reflex as the smell of the River Styx hits me like a cave troll. The pungent green liquid roils a few levels below, flowing from one corner of the Labyrinth to the other, forming a perpetual stream that never ends. The images of human souls rising from the liquid and screaming in agony don't sit as well with me as they did in the past ages, possibly since I don't need to consume them anymore. Judging by the greedy looks on the faces of the imps scampering about, they would be all too eager to swipe a few souls when nobody was looking, were it not for the consequences of soul theft.

I nod at several massive minotaur guards patrolling the river. Their axes swing with enough force to dent demonstone, and that's no small feat. These mangy imps wouldn't dare grab for a few souls with the elite guards patrolling. Not unless they wanted their heads lopped from their shoulders.

Yes, every soul is precious. Humans are limited in quantity, and most of the souls that end up in the Styx are aged and decrepit, or too young to have much energy. It's a delicate balance, trying to ensure the fair distribution of souls, and someone has to do it.

I just wish it wasn't me.

Minutes pass as I make my way down the side-wall paths of the massive chamber. The sounds of imps and human slaves pounding on demonstone to forge new tools echoes off the walls. Sometimes I can even hear the crack of a whip as a Demon Lord punishes a slacker. By the time I arrive at the bottom, I can finally make out the sound of deep, uproarious laughter in the distance. The one making such guttural noises can only be Bael.

"-then I said, 'If you're hankering to die, I can oblige!' So I slapped the head clean off the bastard's body! Gwahaha!"

Bael and two other Dukes, Mephisto and Barbatos, come into view as I round a corner. Bael, the fourth most powerful demon in the Labyrinth, and the highest-ranked of the Dukes, slaps his knee and wipes a tear away as he regales the other two with his no-doubt hilarious story about torture and pain. His brutishly powerful body usually cows most lesser demons into nervously laughing, but among the other Dukes, it hasn't much effect. They merely nod politely at his crude banter.

I wish Bael would put on a damn shirt. Come on, we get it; you're a big guy. The bone belt with human skulls is a little excessive too. At least he's wearing underwear. The Devil knows I don't want to see what he's hiding down there. Several chains wrap around his chest and connect to a massive flail hanging on his back, one that weighs over half a ton.

'Big Bonk,' he calls it. What a guy.

Bael spots me the instant I appear. "Oy! Diablo's here! Took you long enough, ya lazy bum!"

I force a smile. "Long time, no see, Bael, Barbatos, Mephisto."

The other two Dukes are very different from Bael and I. While we have the traditional red skin and hulking muscles, Mephisto is an incorporeal entity, not unlike a ghost, while Barbatos is a demonsteel-clad behemoth wearing black and gold armor over every inch of his body. Barbatos, the Third Duke, is the sixth-ranked demon in the Labyrinth, surpassed only by the Three Emperors, Bael, and Agares. However, my personal opinion is that he's probably the mightiest Duke of all. Bael is very fortunate the metal monster isn't one with an eye for leadership.

Barbatos growls as I stop near the trio. "Third."

He doesn't like to waste his breath.

I turn from the black and gold-clad giant to Mephisto, the Seventh-ranked demon in the Labyrinth. He's much shorter than the rest of us, which probably explains his inferiority complex. His body is partially translucent, allowing light to pass through. Mephisto's title, the Duke of Mist, befits how he lives his life. He and Barbatos, the Duke of Steel, are considered invincible. Neither has had a scratch put on their bodies in their entire life.

At least, not by other demons.

"Mephisto. It's been a while since we last spoke. A hundred years, by my reckoning."

The Duke of Mist rubs his skeletal hands together and hisses from under his grey robe and hood. I can barely make out the blood-red eyes marking his identity as a demon. These days, there aren't many demons who have seen his skinless face, but I have. "Diablo, the pleasssure isss mine. The Ssseventh Gate hasss proven quite monotonousss of late."

"So I hear," I murmur. "Who called the meeting today?"

Bael guffaws. "You don't know?! Bahaha! I bet an imp woke you up! We oughta rename you the Emperor of Sloth!"

I make a mental note to break his neck later, though not because he's correct in his assumption or anything like that. I would never dream of sleeping on the job.

"Just tell me, Bael."

The look of annoyance on my face shuts him up. He probably still smarts from the last thrashing I gave him. "Oh, erm, uh... President Ose called the meeting."

"Ose? Haven't seen her around in a while."

Barbatos shifts, causing the black metal encasing his body to clink and clank. "Agares. Belial. Where?" His deep voice is all the worst parts of a bear and a troll mixed into one; unpleasant to listen to for any length of time. I'm glad he doesn't talk much.

"I'm sure Agares will show up soon, along with that pupil of his. Belial though... well, we all know how Belial is."

Bael chuckles. "Lazy whore."

Mephisto takes a step away from Bael. "I'd watch your mouth if I wasss you, Duke of Pain. Your title will take on a new meaning if ssshe hearsss you."

"Pft. I have nothing to fear from a woman." Bael, feigning obliviousness to Belial's combat prowess, continues running his mouth without a care in the world. He knows Belial can slap him through ten miles of the Labyrinth's walls effortlessly, yet he continues to insult her. I can only hope she doesn't learn of his comments and decide to teach the big guy a lesson.

My arms cross involuntarily, and I stifle a shudder. I still remember the one time I made an off-hand negative comment about Satan's performance as the former First Emperor when Belial was around. She broke almost every bone in my body.

The other three don't say anything, but I notice Bael shoot a look of curiosity at me. It's obvious what he's thinking. I wonder if the First Emperor will show this time?

Of course not. The First is a recluse. Only Belial and I have ever seen the First in person, and neither can retain their identity in our minds. It gives me the creeps knowing the Labyrinth's highest authority is a demon nobody remembers.

The four of us share idle banter for a bit, while the stench of the River Styx wafts toward us now and then.

Bael reaches back and scratches his ass, pausing to sniff his finger afterward. Gross. "Hey, Diablo, what's the deal with the little human girl running around? When do we get to snap her in half?"

"We don't," I mutter. "Though I presume today's meeting has something to do with the Black Witch, so we'll find out soon enough."

"Whaddya mean, we don't? It's one brat! She ain't even half my size! Just give the word, and I'll have her gone by this time tomorrow!" Bael pounds his fist into his palm, making a loud wham as it sends a shockwave around the room. He's too confident in his physical strength.

"Sssize hardly mattersss," Mephisto hisses, which seems slightly ironic, given his short stature. "Bael, the Black Witch killed Sssatan. The combined power of all Dukesss couldn't achieve sssuch a feat. Have patience."

"That was a long time ago," Bael grunts. "We ain't got nothin' to be afraid of anymore. I'm way tougher'n I used to be."

I sigh and shake my head. "Perhaps so... but if Satan couldn't beat her, none of us can. That's a fact not even you can dismiss."

Bael rolls his eyes. "Pft. We'll see."

Barbatos shifts again, causing everyone to flinch, including myself, as his armor grinds together. "Agares approaches."

I quickly sweep my eyes in every direction, but no matter where I look, the old man isn't visible. It takes a full minute of waiting before the sound of his cane tapping on the ground catches our attention, causing me to wonder how Barbatos could hear him. Even for a demon, his senses are unusually acute.

"Ahh, sorry, sorry."

The Duke of Reptiles apologizes as he appears on the other side of the River Styx. It isn't a wide gap, but it still impresses me when he spryly hops the river, lands on the tip of his cane, perches for a moment, then drops to the ground into a hunched-over standing position. A glance behind him reveals his young pupil, Beelzebub, one of the more promising Lords in the lower echelons of power. Beelzebub lightly jumps into the air, and two small jets of flame erupt from under his boots, propelling him over the river. Magnificent. He's a prodigy, able to control magic without forming the signs — a rare ability among demons.

Myself, Bael, Agares, Barbatos, Mephisto, and Beelzebub form today's Council. Belial is nowhere to be seen, and the First Emperor obviously won't show up, but we have enough leaders here to deliberate.

Agares clears his throat. "I suppose we can begin."

Beelzebub sniffles. "A shame the Council had to hold their meeting here. The stench is ghastly."

"Hah! Got a weak stomach for souls, boy?!" Bael lumbers over to Beelzebub and slaps the lad on his back, knocking the wind out of him and nearly sending him sprawling to the ground. "Nothin' like the smell of death in the morning to get a demon's blood pumping! Up and at 'em!"

"Kuh-" Beelzebub gasps for breath, and twinges of fire spit from his mouth as he wheezes. "Cuh-clumsy oaf!"

While they share a moment of brotherly affection, the imp from earlier, Dingle, runs up to Agares, a smile spread across his face, and a scroll of parchment held in his hands. It's nearly as tall as his whole body. "Duke of Reptiles! Nyahaha! I have the President's thingy here for you!"

Agares smiles and takes the parchment from the tiny imp, then pats him on the head. "Thank you kindly, young one. Run along, then."

As Dingle skitters away, Agares chuckles. "Oh, they're all so cute before they mutate."

"And weak," Bael replies. He wanders back to his original spot beside me and starts grinning like he said the funniest joke in the world. I don't understand him sometimes.

Several moments pass as Agares unrolls the parchment and squints to examine it. He always tries to play up his age like he's a frail old codger, but I know better. "Hmm. Yes, yes, I see. The group of rogue humans has liberated several outer worlds in the last few months. Additionally, a monster uprising has resulted in the loss of the Labyrinth Core, which means we cannot travel to more than one planet at a time to replenish the human souls in the River Styx."

"Cheh. Monsters. I guess they've forgotten who runs the place." Bael leans forward and flexes aggressively. "I'll go down there and knock some sense into Bahamut! That oughta teach the bitch a lesson!"

Agares flicks his eyes up from the parchment, stares at Bael in annoyance for all of two seconds, then looks back down. "Beelzebub. Tell him."

The Lord of Fire smirks. "It's depressing how far out of the loop you are, Duke of Pain. Bahamut died over two months ago. She was killed by a young upstart, at that. One of Marie's children!"

"Marie?! That whore!" Bael balks for a moment, before scratching his head. "The name sounds familiar."

Agares unrolls a bit more of the scroll. "It should. Our best Oracle, Umi, works under her direct supervision. Umi has never once given us unreliable information."

Bael nods dumbly. "So this Marie chick, what kinda gal is she? Succubus? Raven? Vampiress? Maybe even a Felaris? I like their kitty tails."

Barbatos, unamused by Bael's stupidity, growls out a single word. "Human."

"What? A human?! No way! We ain't working with no stinkin' fleshbag! You've gotta be kidding me!"

"He isn't, and we are," I say, shooting a death glare at Bael. "Stop interrupting. Marie is one of our best tools. The ideal way to control humans is for someone who knows their psychology to invent mental traps.

Breaking the human body is a simple matter, but breaking the mind is no trifle. As the former leader of humanity, she's the second-best person for the job."

Mephisto hisses. "Presssident Ossse hasss done more than Marie to ssserve demonkind."

"Yes, true, and she bests Marie when it comes to knowledge of human psychology, but let's not get off track. Agares?"

Agares continues. "Thanks to the monster alliance with humankind, they've begun building fortified bases on human worlds. I've even heard talk of a technology boom. The humans may soon start creating weapons."

"Weapons?" Beelzebub leans over his mentor's shoulder and squints at the paper. "What sorts of weapons?"

Mephisto's eyes jerk around uneasily. "Kss... you were not yet whelped during the Energy Warsss, ssso you likely have little idea of what they are capable. Humansss usssed devicesss called 'gunsss' and 'riflesss' to fight back againssst the demonsss. Their technology ssslowly improved to the point that we were no threat to them."

Beelzebub crosses his arms and looks at Bael, then me. "If I weren't standing among the Council members, I'd find such a proposition laughable. Humans, fighting back and crushing demons? Inconceivable."

Bael grunts. For once, a look of doubt appears in his eyes. "It's true, whelp. Humans ain't a match for us now, but that wasn't always the case. There were times even I thought we'd go extinct, or be forced to live underground in caves and shafts for the rest of eternity."

"What changed?"

Beelzebub's probing goes unanswered. Before Bael can reply, Agares holds up a hand. "Hold your tongue, Duke of Pain. You know we're not to discuss the Energy Wars with the young." He turns to Beelzebub and waggles a finger. "You're being groomed for power, boy. Know your place. Someday the secret information will be yours for the taking, but that day has yet to pass."

Beelzebub's expression flattens, and he sighs. "Of course. Forgive my impudence."

My foot starts tapping. "Come on, let's get this meeting over with. Finish Ose's scroll so we can get out of here."

Agares nods and returns his attention to the unrolled paper. "Umi's confidence threshold has lowered ten percent since we last contacted her. She believes that the monsters are not working alone and that a certain human may be assisting them."

"Black Witch." Barbatos's voice rumbles in the air, and everyone nods along with him.

"She isss a troublemaker, that one. A ssshame Joan didn't finisssh her off."

"Maybe this is part of her plan," I muse. "Agares, didn't you tell me you confronted her recently?"

The old bat nods. "Aye. My pupil was with me at the time. She insisted she wasn't interested in causing trouble in the Labyrinth."

"She is the rumored 'Black Witch,' though." Beelzebub states. He pauses for a moment. "Come to think of it, didn't she have a human male with her?"

Agares rubs his forehead and quints at the ceiling as he searches for the memory. "Oh, yes, I remember. A lanky, scrawny little thing. Looked like he hadn't a good meal a day in his life. I wonder why she was bringing him along."

Bael snickers. "Maybe the kid broke her out of the statue."

"Don't be ridiculousss," Mephisto counters. "Her ssstatue wassss sssealed with powerful magic. We concluded that it would take the might of all the Demon Emperorsss to releassse her."

"I know, I know. I'm just kiddin', sheesh." Bael coughs into his fist. "Anyway, it sounds like we're coming back around to my plan. We gotta take out the Black Witch."

Agares rolls the parchment back up and slides it into the folds of his robe. "You might be correct after all, Bael. We assembled the Council today just in case we might have to make such a decision. Facing down the Black Witch will not be a simple task."

I shudder as a memory of the day she slew Satan appears in my mind. Waving it away, I yawn. "Fine. We'll take a vote, then. If anyone is in favor of engaging the Black Witch, raise your hand. If four of us agree to attack, we'll all have to pitch in."

I don't raise my hand. Neither does Agares, but Mephisto, Bael, and Beelzebub do. I'm slightly surprised when I look at Barbatos and see he hasn't raised his hand, either.

"Barbatos, you don't wish to attack the Black Witch?"

The Duke of Steel slowly turns his armored head to look at me. I can just barely make out the scorching red coals of eyes illuminated beneath his helmet. The sight chills me to the bone. "Peace. Negotiate. I will not fight unless I must."

I try to swallow, but my saliva sticks in my throat. "Y-yes, I see your point. Well, that's a three to three split. I guess we'll have to put it off a while."

Bael glares at me. "Pansy. I bet Belial would've raised her hand if she were here."

"Of course, but she didn't pop her head in," I say, coughing into my fist. "Barbatos has a point, however. Perhaps we could learn the Black Witch's motivations and strike a deal with her. Mephisto, Barbatos, I want the two of you to visit her. Bring Agares and the whelp along for backup. I know you four are the most reasonable members of the Council, so you might be able to persuade her to stop draining our resources."

Bael guffaws. "Hey! What about me?! If she starts swinging, I should be there to knock her flat on her ass! I'll put the little runt in her place!"

I sigh. "Ugh. Bael, you never listen, do you? We're going to try diplomacy. You're the worst when it comes to speaking softly and carrying a big stick. You'll piss her off, and then we'll be forced into a bloody conflict." I pause to stare at him for a moment. "Besides... I don't believe we could beat her even if everyone here joined together."

The Duke of Pain rolls his eyes. "I think you're just a scaredy-imp. Whatever. Just promise me that if negotiations break down, I get to take the first swing at the brat."

"I can do that. Hell, it might do you some good to get the shit kicked out of you once in a while."

"Hehe." Agares chuckles.

"HAH HAH." Barbatos laughs twice, and it's possibly the worst noise I've ever heard in my entire life. His voice reminds me of the mating call of a Demogorgon. Everyone turns to stare at him, and judging by the looks on our faces; it's safe to say nobody enjoyed it.

Mephisto shudders. "Now isss asss good a time asss any to end the meeting."

"You said it," Bael mutters. "Good talk. I'm gonna go to Faith's End. I hear Gressil's added a few pretty prisoners to his collection."

"You're sick in the head," Beelzebub replies. "Fornicating with a human. Disgusting."

"Fornicating with several humans, all at the same time," Bael replies with a wink. "Agares, you've gotta get that whelp a mate. He's too pent-up."

"I'm trying," Agares replies. He turns away and pats his pupil's shoulder. "Come, then, Beelzebub. Let's get a move on."

The two of them turn around and leap over the river, and Mephisto crinkles a finger at me. "Farewell, Third."

Barbatos doesn't say a word. He makes a motion with his hands and opens a portal, not unlike the one Warpers create. He steps through to the sounds of several mermaids giggling, and a moment later, it closes behind him.

I turn around and begin walking back the way I came. A wave of exhaustion hits me. Bael stomps away and cackles in the distance. "Have a good nap, Emperor of LAZINESS! Bahahaha!"

His humor is the worst.

When I arrive back at the hallway and travel back through, I spot my Warper up ahead, standing stiffly, and waiting for my arrival. "I hope the meeting was a success, Third Emperor."

"Oh, as good as ever, I suppose. Do you have another jump left in you?"

He smiles. "Just one, Emperor Diablo. Where to?"

"My estate. I can't wait to feel my pillow press against my face."

"As you command. You deserve the rest for all your hard work."

"Well, thank you, Grigori. I'm glad someone appreciates me around here."

A moment later, we step into his portal and vanish.

Part 022: Unforgivable Sins, Blemished Past

"Gah!" I let out an involuntary yelp as Phoebe drives the wooden sword straight into my gut, knocks me flat on my ass, and sprains my tailbone in the process. "God, Jesus, fuck! I think I hit a rock!"

Phoebe stiffens. "Your Grace! Are you alright?!"

I nod despite the tears rolling down my face. "Yup! Great! Never better! I told you not to hold back! Not your fault!"

The two of us are sparring behind the palace. For the last two months, ever since I recovered from my paralysis, I've insisted on training with Phoebe and learning how to use a sword. The uneven ground usually won't make me lose my footing, and I should have a size advantage over her, but she still routinely kicks my ass up and down the streets.

Phoebe used to go easy on me until I insisted that I wouldn't learn unless she put my feet to the fire, and I can heal myself, so it's not like she'll cause any permanent damage...

But still! Goddamn! Phoebe is light on her feet, quick to avoid even my most accurate attacks, and my spherical vision doesn't matter if my body can't react to her movements.

Phoebe steps forward and hunches down in front of me. "Do you wish to take a break, Your Grace? Your movements have slowed down noticeably of late."

"Nah, I'm fine. Heal." I drop the shield in my left hand and rub my sore ass for a moment before climbing to my feet. "That sudden stab caught me off-guard. Usually, you swing wide."

"Of course. I've been playing around with you, Your Grace, using a repetitious pattern to catch you off-guard when I eventually vary my strike. In battle, a swordsman must be inventive. He who strikes the first blow wins, after all." The heat pattern on her lips changes slightly, which I've grown to learn indicates a smile.

Reading faces is somewhat tricky when using infrared, but I can do it as long as I focus. Unfortunately, no matter how I try, I can't follow anyone's eye movements, giving me a slight disadvantage. Luckily, I make up the difference by not moving my eyes either, so it cripples my opponent's ability to read me as well.

...Or at least it would, if my opponent wasn't Phoebe. Every time I think I understand her fighting capability, I'm surprised. She isn't just a fantastic caregiver, but an expert swordswoman, too. I can't afford to underestimate her.

I force a grin. "So, uh, where did I go wrong?"

"Your shield. You always forget it exists. You could have easily parried my stab, had you raised your shield, but you didn't. If you don't protect your vitals, you might die before you can use your magic."

Phoebe's smile falters at the last sentence. Anytime she brings up my potential death, a feeling of melancholy fills the air. I can't ever let him die, her body language says. It's sweet of her and makes me want to train even harder.

I grab my shield with telekinesis. "Okay. I've gotta guard myself better. Got it."

"It isn't just that, Your Grace." Phoebe reaches out her sword and taps my knee. "You're a head taller than me. In combat, a size difference can be both positive and negative. I use my size as often as possible, ducking under your wide swings and attacking your legs. Your shield has to protect much more body area than mine does, leaving you exposed more often. If you hopped up to avoid my low attacks, that would leave me wide open for you to parry, and you would win."

I nod, forcing myself to memorize her words. "I think I can remember all that. It's a lot to recall in the middle of combat, though."

Phoebe sighs and rests her sword-hand on her hip. "You shouldn't have to think of these things consciously, Your Grace. Swordfighting comes down to split-second movements and instincts. Your body will move automatically if you train it right. That's all there is to it."

From behind the shadow of the house, I sense a male's heat signature appear. Evidently overhearing Phoebe, the man laughs. "Hah! There's a lot more to combat than rote body instinct, though the lady has a fair point." I recognize him as Neil Adams, and nod as he walks over. Neil continues, "Military tactics are the way to win battles! A sword is useless against a musket."

Phoebe's face tenses up. "Unless the musket misses."

"True, true!" Neil stops near us and examines me. "My liege, have you learned to fight back yet, or are you still taking a beating from this young lass?"

I try not to blush. "I have yet to land an unearned blow on her."

Phoebe rolls her eyes and smiles. "His Grace doesn't want to hurt me. He's too soft. He always swings slower than he should, giving me time to dodge."

"A gentleman, true to the core. I can respect that." Neil lifts his brimmed hat for a moment to scratch his head, then puts it back. From what I understand, he was a Frenchman who fought under Napoleon, but his English accent is confusingly thick, without a trace of the French dialect like Joan used. "In any case, since you two are training, this is the perfect time for me to bring up a concern on my mind. Would you care to listen, my liege?"

Without moving my head, I examine Phoebe. She doesn't have to say anything for me to know she's ready to stop the training and hear him out. Good enough for me. "Sure. What's up?"

Neil rubs his hands together. "Have you seen the quality of our military?"

"Yeah. It isn't that great."

"It's terrible," Neil says bluntly. "The monsters have no discipline. Everyone has a signature fighting style, which is disastrous for cohesiveness. I have yet to see teamwork among the different monster species. Have you heard the rumors wandering through the Labyrinth?"

I shake my head.

Neil continues. "The demon Emperors are feeling anxious. They don't like that we've controlled the Core for three months. Without the warp-gates, they can't raid human planets efficiently to replenish souls. They're stuck using the few teleporters located at the corners of Hell, which are less efficient and can only access one planet at a time."

"Replenish souls? Are you referring to the River Styx?"

The middle-aged man's expression turns grim. "Aye. Demons slaughter humans to convert us into souls for the weaker ones, which allows them to mutate into stronger forms. It appears the river has been thinning recently and they're getting antsy. I would expect an attack on the Labyrinth Core within the next month at the latest."

Phoebe bows her head. "We cannot placate them, either. The only appeasement they would accept would be allowing them to use the portals, and that would mean..."

"...More dead humans," I say, finishing her sentence. "Unacceptable."

"Precisely." Neil strokes his chin and nods. "Which is why I'm saying we need to restructure the military. I've spoken to a few close friends of mine, and we'd like to list our concerns in full as soon as possible."

I raise an eyebrow. "How quickly can we pull off something like that? We don't have a formal military right now."

Neil looks away. "During your paralysis, I took the liberty of forming some rudimentary militias. There are four squads of a hundred men and monsters each, but we still have thousands of men and monsters who have yet to touch a weapon. My comrades and I lead each militia. One to guard the Core, one to guard the inner gate, one to patrol the mines and village, and the other to guard your castle."

"Oh. I see. That was a good move. Still, we'll need way more than four hundred soldiers. Alright, fine, let's get on with it, then."

Phoebe sighs again. "And to think, we were finally making progress with your training."

I rub my ass. "Yeah. Progress."

Several minutes later, I summon two slices of cinnamon sugared toast in midair and hand one to Phoebe. The two of us munch our bread as we follow Neil, but he declines my offer for a slice. Walking past the castle, we head down the cliff-side and over to the forest, where several new buildings and a wall now stand. I erected them with Wordsmithing last month, and the lone guard tower has a telescope aimed at the portal at all times so we can keep an eye out for arrivals. There's even a flare system in case of emergencies or unexpected intrusions. If the Core were to fall, we might not know about it in time.

If only cell service could transmit through the portal, I'd have solved several problems by now. The space barrier doesn't do well with energy transmission. I'll have to think about it.

Phoebe polishes off her bread and wipes the cinnamon from her lips. "Thank you, Your Grace. It was delicious."

I chuckle. "Will you ever stop calling me 'Your Grace,' I wonder?"

"It's just habit at this point." Phoebe reaches up and swipes a stray hair out of her face. "What was that food?"

"Cinnamon bread. I just felt like eating something sweet, you know?" Saying this, I finish the last of my toast.

"You should watch yourself. If you keep eating sweets like that, you'll start looking like a hog."

I decide not to tell her that I can change my body image with Wordsmithing — too much trouble.

As we approach the border wall, Neil waves to a group of three men standing over a dead firepit, holding mugs and chatting about something I can't quite make out. The heat of the midday sun is extraordinary, yet they don't look even moderately uncomfortable.

"I've brought our King!" Neil gestures to me. "Sir Jason Hiro, I'd like to introduce you to my three closest friends, and the commanders of your military. Makoto Ueda, Hans Wagner, and Saul."

I nod politely at the three men as they turn around and make different gestures. Makoto bows, Hans raises his metal cup, and Saul merely nods and clasps his hands together. He doesn't have anything in his hands, so I guess he isn't much of a drinker.

"Uh, pleased to meet all of you," I say, bowing stiffly. Phoebe curtsies politely.

"Ja, ees our pleasure," The first man, Hans Wagner, says. While he appears to me only as a red blob, I've grown more adept at telling clothing apart. He looks to be wearing a prim and proper uniform, something with a star pinned over his heart. One thing I've learned is that most people on Tarus II come from diverse backgrounds, and many were born in entirely different time periods. This guy seems Germanic, based on the thick mustache and how his hair is slicked back carefully to preserve a military look.

"I have waited a long time to meet you, King Hiro," The next man, Saul, says. While I'm curious as to why Neil didn't include Saul's last name, there's probably a good reason for that. He wears folds of robes wrapped around his body in various ways, a style I've come to associate with ancient Rome or earlier. He might be from pre-Christ times, even. Based on the thick and long beard and mustache, he either comes from a time when men didn't have many ways to shave, or he loves long hair.

"It is big honor to meet you, kind leader," The final man says. Unlike the other two, I can immediately tell what his accent is. Since his name is Makoto Ueda, it's immediately apparent he's Japanese, though I can't guess in what period he was born. His garb is that of a male kimono, and based on the katana at his waist, as well as the chomage hairdo, he was likely born before the start of the Industrial Revolution.

The Crown is helpful at times like these. It fills in the blanks from extraneous and inferred information, making my life much more straightforward.

I bow once again after they introduce themselves, though I can't help but feel slightly awkward. All of these men are, quite literally, a hundred thousand years old, yet they treat me like I'm a king. I'm not even nineteen!

Turning to Neil, I ask, "What was it you wanted to talk about?"

Saul raises his free hand. "We wish to work on a comprehensive reformation of human and monster society. The sooner, the better. The current structure is ugly at best, and a crippling weakness at worst."

"All of society?" I raise an eyebrow. "I don't follow. I thought this was about the military."

Hans replies, "Ja, the military ees een a sorry state, Mein Fuhrer, but zee eenfrastructure ees-"

"Whoa, whoa, hold up." I raise a hand faster than I expect. "Err, what did you call me?"

Judging from how his face shifts, he looks incredibly confused. "M-Mein Fuhrer?"

Neil nudges me. "It means 'leader' in German, his native tongue."

My stomach roils. "I know what it means. I-I just... I don't feel comfortable being... being called... that."

Hans glances at Ueda, who shrugs in response, before looking back at me. "Ja, very sorry zen. Vould you prefer being called Mein Lieber? Perhaps Herr Hiro?"

Now I feel sorry for bringing it up. Maybe I should have kept my mouth shut. "Uh, Mein Lieber is fine, I suppose. It's just... 'Fuhrer' has a connotation with a particular man that makes me uncomfortable."

Hans cocks his head curiously. "I... I do not understand. Who?"

I swallow hard even thinking his name. "Adolf Hitler. He probably came after your time."

"Oh!" Hans smiles eagerly. "Ja, ja! I knew heem, of course. He vas Mein Lieber."

It takes me a moment to compile my thoughts. "Y-you knew- that is, you worked for... Adolf Hitler?"

Hans nods eagerly, apparently unaware of my feelings toward the man. "Ja. Zee Fuhrer vas a man vith ambitions for power. I did not get to see zee end of zee var, but it vould not surprise me if he vun. Sadly, such days are far in zee past."

I feel Phoebe's gaze burning into the side of my head. "Are you okay?"

My face turns pale. I can't help my reaction. This Hans guy is a Nazi!

Oh, god. I should have paid more attention! How can I possibly allow a Nazi to establish himself in a leadership position?!

"Ahh..." I try to speak, but the words won't come out. I'm the only person here, aside from Hans, who knows about what the Nazis did. Phoebe and Neil are both from the ancient past, as are Saul and Makoto, most likely. I'm the only one who realizes there's a monster in our midst, one wearing human skin.

Hans begins to notice my feelings of anger. He reaches up and wipes his forehead. "Mein Lieber... have I done somezing to offend you?"

"You worked for the Nazis..." I manage to breathe words out. "You... how many people did you kill?"

Hans' cheerful demeanor lessens. "Me? None! I vas in zee logeestics deeveesion!" He trails off for a moment and tilts his head to my side, staring aimlessly at nothing in particular. "Your reaction does bring a few questions to mind..."

"Did you know?" I ask. "About the death camps?"

Hans's entire face decreases in temperature by a degree or two. "I had heard of zem, but never visited. I assumed zey vere just rumors."

"They were real. People died. Millions."

It takes a long minute before Hans finally responds. "I vas only a lieutenant. I just did vhatever zee Fuhrer ordered. It vas zee day vhen I vas ordered to kill an innocent child zat I couldn't follow orders anymore. I left my post."

Phoebe raises her hand up to her mouth. "W-what? You murdered a child?"

She isn't the only one shocked by this sudden admission. Neil, Makoto, and Saul all take a step back, unsure of what to think. Hans quickly continues, "Nein, nein! I did not kill heem. Eenstead, I joined a reseestance group and began ferrying people out of zee country. For zees, zee Schutzstaffel slaughtered main vife and child."

A clearer picture appears in my head. "You don't think rescuing a few Jews makes it okay that you killed others, do you? You can't possibly atone for-"

"I did not kill anyvun!" Hans suddenly yells, catching me by surprise. "Please do not look at me vith such hate-filled eyes. Zings are not so seemple vhen zee leader of zee military rules vith an iron fist! Zee Schutzstaffel vere always vatching! Everyvun vas an enemy!"

My lips turn dry. I wet them before continuing. "I understand. You were merely following orders. I'm sure that helps you sleep at night."

Hans crosses his arms and straightens up to look at me. "I do not ask forgiveness, Mein Lieber. Eef you zink executing me vill make zee vorld a better place, so be eet. Throw me in prison, if you must. I am not zee man I vas back zen. I vas a young fool."

"To say the least."

The two of us stare at each other for a few moments. I, with my unseeing eyes, and he with the gaze only a monster could understand. What lurks in his mind, I wonder?

I don't know what to do. Hans did save Jews, or so he says. It's been 100,000 years as well. Should I just ignore his tainted past? If he worked under the Nazis, then can I ever trust him not to be tainted by their sins? If I keep him as a military leader, wouldn't that make me as sick as America during Operation Paperclip? They took on Nazi scientists to create new weapons, allowing the men to get away with war crimes.

But... then again... it has been 100,000 years. I'm not God. I can't judge a man by a past I don't even know. Maybe I should keep an eye on him but use his potential expertise.

There's no right answer, here. I like to think of myself as a compassionate and forgiving person, though. Jailing a man for ancient sins isn't in my character, especially not executing him.

"Alright. Hans, what you did was despicable. Unforgivable. If you ever do anything that gives me even a whiff of your origins, it's over for you, understand? But, for now, I can't sentence you for a crime nobody but you remembers. You have to live with the guilt for the rest of your life, so I can only hope that's punishment enough."

Hans nods meekly and bows his head. "You are most gracious, Mein Lieber."

Somehow, I manage to force a grim smile. "By the way, Germany lost the war. We tortured and executed every single person who committed a war crime. None escaped judgment."

The fact that I can tell a little lie here and he won't know the difference makes me feel slightly better. It isn't true, after all. Thousands of SS officers and camp leaders got off scot-free and lived long, healthy lives. Hans doesn't have to know that, though.

To my surprise, Hans smiles back. "Ja. I had hoped zat vould be zee case. Perhaps I should have been counted among zee bodies, eh?"

"Yeah. Maybe. What happened, anyway? Why didn't you see the end of the war?"

Hans shrugs. "Unfortunate circumstances. I vas fleeing zee Schutzstaffel vhen I encountered a horrifying monster before zee France border. She vas Bahamut, of course. You can guess zee rest."

"Mmm. Yeah."

There's an awkward silence as the other men and Phoebe evaluate Hans. Based on her initial impression, I get the idea that Phoebe doesn't like him, but mostly because I don't. She tends to echo my views most of the time. The other three merely regard Hans with a new level of curiosity. They'll probably be prodding him a lot later when this meeting is over.

Saul clears his throat. "That was dreadfully uncomfortable to watch. Shall we get back to the main topic, then?"

I wave my hand absentmindedly. "Sure, sure. Uh, reformation, right?"

"Yes. I've spent a lot of time talking with the people and monsters here. Morale is low because most people live in primitive huts. As I was saying before, I'd like to work on improving our infrastructure. If we can construct additional-"

"Oy!" A voice calls out from above us, interrupting Saul. He angrily looks up in the air at a guard in the tower. "What is it?! I'm trying to speak!"

"Red flare!" The scout yells out two words, and immediately Saul's attitude shifts. Everyone except for Phoebe and I jump into high gear. Neil starts barking our orders. "The Core is under attack! Gather the horses! Riders assemble! Get your weapons ready! On the double!"

Phoebe looks at me, fear in her eyes. "Jason! We have to do something! Fly over there and help, hurry!"

I grimace. Even if I fly, it will take too long. I need a faster mode of transportation, and stat.

"I have a better idea. Phoebe, you're coming with me. Grab a sword and shield while you wait. This'll take me a minute at most.

I shoot one last look at Hans as he runs to a nearby stable with several horses. With a shake of my head, I cast aside the disturbing thoughts in my mind and turn my attention to the empty patch of grass at my side.

"Car!"

A moment later, Phoebe stares at the red metal monster before me. A Ferrari, something I always dreamed about in my youth, but this one is a little different. It packs a fusion engine and can travel at up to 200 miles per hour. It's a four-seater, too.

I crack open the passenger door for Phoebe with my telekinesis, while jumping in on the driver's side. "Let's go! We're leaving!"

Phoebe stares quizzically at the vehicle. "How?"

I pat the passenger seat after closing my door. "There's no time to explain! Get in the car!"

She doesn't question my command. Ordinarily, a Ferrari would be a tight fit, but the Crown allowed me to custom build this one with lots of leg room. As she takes a seat, I gently move her sword and shield to rest at her feet with my telekinesis, then I pull her seatbelt over her and shut her door.

"Oh, thank you, Your Grace. Err, what is this... metal box?"

"It's our ticket to that gate in one minute flat. Cement!"

Aiming my mind ahead, I pave the entire path several miles forward to the warpgate, then clear any debris off the road with another word. "Sweep!"

A moment later, I press the ignition button. Heh, no keys needed.

The car roars to life like a pack of angry lions, and Phoebe's face flushes. "By the gods! What in the Heavens was that sound?!"

"Horsepower!" I stomp the accelerator, and a moment later realize I forgot my seatbelt. I'm thrown backward by the sheer force of acceleration. Phoebe shrieks in terror as we go from a standstill to sixty miles an hour in under two seconds, rapidly jump to a hundred, then a hundred and fifty. The terrified screams from the passenger side of the car only fuel my macho instincts. This is more fun than anything I've done in my life!

It only takes us two minutes of roaring engines before we reach the warpgate, and I slam on the brakes.

Screech!

The moment I hit the brakes, my body flings forward, and I slam against the horn. Naturally, I modified it to blare deep and loud like the horn on a cruise-ship, and the sound makes Phoebe scream in terror even louder.

The car grinds to a stop just a hundred feet from the shrine. Once it halts, the sudden inertia slams me back against my seat, and it takes several moments before the adrenaline stops racing through my body. I turn to smile at Phoebe, only to see a look of anguish and nausea on her face.

"...out! L-let me out!" Phoebe pounds on the window and holds her mouth, so I open the door with telekinesis and yank her seatbelt off. The moment she's free, Phoebe stumbles out of the car, past the pavement, and onto the grass and begins vomiting.

My smile fades.

What the hell is wrong with me?

I quickly clamber out of the car and run around to her side. "Phoebe? Phoebe! Are you okay?"

"Bleugh! Gwuuh!" She coughs out even more vomit, getting some of it on her white hair. Her entire body shakes, and she starts crying uncontrollably as more vomit bubbles up.

I've never seen her in a state like this. Shit. I quickly lean down and pat her back. "I'm here, Phoebe. I'm sorry. I'm so sorry!" It occurs to me that now is the time to Wordsmith, so I speak again. "Settle. Clean. Mints."

I don't do anything to stop her crying, but I can at least settle her stomach and clean up the vomit. She continues spasming for another minute before leaning against me and crying into my shirt. "Oh... oh god! I was scared! Terrified! That th-thing is a monster!"

"It's my fault, Phoebe. I'm sorry..." I pat her head and let her cry for a moment as I look up at the portal. I can't see anything inside of it with my infrared or sound perception, so I have no idea what's going on in there. Quickly, I pull Phoebe away. "Stay here. I need to see what's going on in the Core. When you feel better, follow after me."

She nods rapidly, but her motions are almost delirious. "Uh... uh huh... huh..."

I pull myself away from her, though prying her hands from my shirt without hurting her is a small challenge. After leaving her behind, I jump up to the portal and notice a single human waiting for me, anxiety written all over his face. He stares at the Ferrari for several moments before looking at me.

"Sir!" The man snaps into a salute. "It's chaos in there! We need the regiments at once!"

"What happened?"

"Shadow-walker attack, sir! Dozens of them! We believe the Demon Lords have rallied together to attack us!"

I push past him, feeling anxious at stepping into a Portal when I can't see anything on the other side for once. "Uh, stay here and help that woman. Phoebe is feeling ill because of... reasons. I'll be back."

I step toward the portal, my senses at the ready.

Whatever's on the other side, it had better be ready to die.

Part 023: Wordsmith Unleashed, An Indecent Proposal

"Summon."

A suit of metal armor materializes and wraps around my body. All at once, over a hundred pounds of weight pops into existence, causing me to slump forward. I catch myself before falling on my face and speak another word of power.

"Strength."

The metal's weight seemingly vanishes as my body's strength increases to heft the added bulk. The only exposed parts of my body are two horizontal slits for my unseeing eyes to pierce through, as well as seven thin vertical openings in front of my mouth. I'm not only protected, but I can also breathe, too.

Metal encases my arms, legs, feet, and hands. My abs, heart, back, neck, and every other part of my body can rest easy knowing that only an incredibly precise attack targeting the tiniest jointed areas could hope to hurt me.

The only problem is how slowly I move. I guess that's the price to pay for impenetrable defense. Based on the tests I've run, even if a rhino slammed its horn into me, full-force, I might get the wind knocked out of me at worst.

In addition to my armor, my fusion backpack appears, automatically attaching to my lightsaber when I yank it into my hand with telekinesis. It's go time.

My metal suit grinds together as I step through the portal. The sound is annoying, but at the same time, the noise vibrates the air all around me, giving me a continuous spherical view of the area.

The whumph of air pressure change, as always, is disorienting. Immediately, the cries of pain throughout the room, the clanging of claw and blade, and the sound of magi chanting spells transform the room into a fully visible entity, enabling me to see every corner and every individual battle with perfect clarity.

Nobody pays my presence any heed. I can't complain. It gives me time to figure out what's happening. Winged creatures, possibly harpies, fly around in the air, drawing their bows and arrows and firing with deadly precision into the crowd below. At the far end of the Core, bright red spots indicate hot-blooded demons, each one forming hand signs and chanting to cast magical spells. A bolt of black energy sails from the one's hand halfway across the room and strikes a snake-shaped monster in the back, making it hiss in agony and fall over, dead. I don't know what the spell was, but it was moderately powerful. I wouldn't want to get hit by it.

Two monsters jerk their heads toward me, and I recognize the shape of their legs and tails, marking them as kobolds. I've only seen a few, and from what Kar has told me, most are fiercely loyal to demons above other monsters. That makes them likely enemies.

The two kobolds dash at me and raise their swords to strike. My lightsaber blade pops out with a high-pitched wail, causing them to flinch and gaze at it in surprise — the perfect opening.

While they stare in shock at the weapon, I yank the wolf-like monsters toward me with telekinesis and swing the saber up and down in two quick movements, lopping their sword-arms off, then shoving them back with a telekinetic push. Just like a Jedi, heh.

I don't want to kill if I can help it, but anyone who attacks me will regret their life choices. The kobolds screech in pain and slam into several other monsters at the bottom, alerting them to my presence. While those monsters look up in alarm and their eyes jump to my glowing blade, I decide to take things to the next level.

Under my breath, I mutter, "Amplify. Amplify. Amplify. Deepen. Shift."

My voice tastes menacing, reminding me of an enraged minotaur at the prime of its life. Without even speaking I can tell my vocal cords have shifted adequately. Now, it's time to make my grand entrance.

"SILENCE! CEASE THE FIGHTING, OR I SHALL ANNIHILATE ALL OF YOU!"

My voice is so loud and powerful that sound waves smash into the far wall and tear a few chunks off. Nearby monsters go flying, and even I stagger slightly under the recoil from my own voice. Luckily, I use my telekinesis to steady my body.

The fighting in the room careens to a stop as my voice echoes for miles in every direction. Everyone falls to their knees and grabs their ears, howling in pain. In fact, the room goes so silent despite all the screaming that it isn't until I feel blood running down my neck that I realize I blew out my goddamn eardrums. "Heal."

I mutter the word as quietly as possible, but it's hard to tell how far my voice travels. Once my hearing is back, I notice everyone scanning the room, looking for the source of the Voice of God.

After a few moments, several heads turn to face me. Then others. Finally, the entire room looks at me.

It's at this point that I notice the downside of spherical vision. I can mostly make out each species of monster and demon, but I can't tell who is on which side. Anyone could be an ally or an enemy.

"Hurgh! Get off of me!" Kar's voice rings out, and he leaps to his feet, throwing two blobs of smoke through the air. I can barely even make them out since they have no heat in their bodies, and when they hit the wall, they evaporate into mist and then reappear several feet away.

Faint splotches dot Kar's body. Despite being stabbed several times, and blood rushing from the wounds, he can still move and fight. What incredible stamina he must possess.

His roar of anger shakes several enemies from their stupor. One demon leaps into the air toward me, runs across the ceiling fifty feet above after inverting his gravity, and begins casting a spell. He looks to be the same one that shot the black magic bolt from before. I don't want to get hit by it.

Oh. A simple solution.

Without moving a finger, I reach up with my telekinesis and yank him from the ceiling, smashing him into the ground. The yelp of fright he makes on the way down is both amusing and also sickening.

"Eeyak?!"

I raise him into the air and smash him against the ground two more times before letting him go. His body flops like a ragdoll and lands with a sickening crunch.

Naptime.

A strange sensation washes over me. I enjoyed that. I held the demon's life in my hands and nearly snuffed it out.

I've never felt this powerful before. It's... a little intoxicating.

Before I can dwell on the morality of my attack, a group of kobolds rushes forward. One of them hurls three knives at me. I don't bother blocking them. The blades smack against my armor and tink to the ground harmlessly. Not one to be deterred by my impenetrable defenses, that same kobold dashes in front of me and delivers a gut-busting punch straight into my stomach...

And breaks every bone in his hand.

For a single moment, a look of shock races across his face before every muscle in his arm pops at once. The poor thing howls in pain, and I lop his arm off with a quick lightsaber swipe. I can always grow it back later if he decides to join my side. If not, the limb was useless anyway.

Shoving him away with my telekinesis, I glance over at the Demon Lords. All of them chant in sync and pool their energy together. "Analyze."

My voice's almost robotic timber booms out, and a series of information floods into my mind as my Wordsmithing breaks down the components of their spell. It's the equivalent of a micro-nuke, but made of dark energy, and if they unleash it, the bomb will probably wipe out every soul in the room. They've realized I'm a significant threat, so this must be their only way to win.

Either way, I can't let them cast that spell. At the moment they fire it, my voice booms again. "Absorb." All the energy from the spell vanishes and floods my body. An odd sensation, like pins and needles, spreads through my limbs. It's more uncomfortable than painful, and it dissipates as quickly as it arrived. It felt as though I had dive-bombed into uncomfortably hot water, then climbed right back out.

Weird.

All of the Demon Lords take a step back in surprise as their ultimate magic vanishes into the breeze. I decide to use my dominant voice one more time, though I tone the volume down substantially. "ALL WHO DO NOT SURRENDER WILL FACE THE SAME FATE AS THE DEMONS WHO DARED TO ATTACK ME."

Saying this, I lift the dozen or so Demon Lords and smash them into the ground before they can react. A few slams later, and they're out cold. "Normalize." I return my voice to normal afterward and smirk.

My proclamation and follow-up attack catch the attention of all the enemies in the room. Every remaining monster and demon peels away and races out the Great Doors, grabbing their Lords hurriedly on the way.

A minute later, a collective sigh of relief washes through the room. "Turtle!" Kar yells out, and when I turn to look at him, the already low temperature in his body has dropped another few degrees. The giant lizard-sphinx stumbles forward and falls flat on his face.

Using my telekinesis, I deactivate my lightsaber and lift my armored form through the air with telekinesis to land next to Kar. He flops onto his back and gasps painfully. "Huh... hurgh... this is... this is it, for me. The shadow-walkers h-hit too many vital areas... I'm a goner."

I fight the overwhelming urge to laugh. "Heal."

Before Kar can continue giving me a deathbed speech, all of his injuries vanish. The lizard-sphinx blinks in surprise and suddenly sits up. "O-oh. You can do that. I forgot."

"Yeah... sorry, I interrupted your dramatic speech."

Kar clears his throat and jumps to his feet. "Ahem, ah, well, this is uncomfortable. I had prepared myself to die. My power is nearly on par with a Demon Duke, but there were too many enemies. You saved my life."

"Hey, no sweat. You saved mine too, remember? Just think of it as me repaying a favor."

Glancing around, I quickly heal every monster in the room that I can see, reducing my internal energy substantially. Some of our allies are already dead, and I consider resurrecting them. I've never tried it before. Would it work? Now's as good a chance as any to find out.

Kar interrupts my thoughts. "Turtle. Thank you for showing up. You've saved our lives, but this was just the beginning. Those demons were not ordered by the Dukes and Emperors to attack us. They arrived of their own volition."

I turn to look at him questioningly. "What do you mean?"

Kar grimaces. "All demons must obey the orders given by the Demon Dukes. However, in the absence of an order, they are free to do as they please, even killing one another. There are only a few strict rules demons must follow, and none of those cover our situation. The Demon Dukes and Emperors didn't order those Lords to attack, but they didn't order them not to attack. Do you understand?"

Slowly, I nod. "More will likely strike, knowing the first wave weakened us already. And those were just Lords and Monsters. If the Dukes and Emperors decide to attack..."

"We'll lose," Kar replies flatly. "Demon Dukes are not to be trifled with. The lowest-ranked Duke, Mephisto, commands the Labyrinth's undead, and even a few shadow-walkers. He can pass through walls and reap souls from bodies. Little is known of the other Dukes and Emperors since they prefer secrecy, but you won't sleep well knowing they all tower over Mephisto."

I flick my gaze to the Great Doors. "How did they get inside? We shut the doors more than a month ago."

"Hurgh. Several Demon Lords working together have more than enough power to blow the doors off their hinges, let alone merely push them open. Besides that, it appears Bahamut installed demonic codes into the doors. If one knows the password, they can speak a few words, and the doors will automatically open."

"Oh, fantastic. That's great news," I mutter.

Kar shakes his head. "I disagree, but you're free to your opinion."

From behind me, the sound of people exiting the Tarus II portal echoes inside the chamber. Phoebe, Neil, Hans, Saul, Makoto, and their militia come charging through, swords and bows at the ready, but confusion passes over their faces as they realize the battle is already over.

"Excuse me, Kar. I'll be right back." Instead of levitating to them with my telekinesis, I de-summon my armor and jog over.

"Phoebe! Are you alright?"

As I slow to a stop, Phoebe looks away. "I'm fine, no thanks to you. Ass."

"What happened?" Neil asks. He continues scanning the room, as several of our monsters pin down enemy monsters I healed up. I'd be amused at the incredulous looks on their faces if it weren't for my focus on Phoebe. Right now, if all the enemy monsters and demons died, I wouldn't even care.

"I came in and put an end to the fighting. Nonlethally."

Makoto rests a hand on the katana at his belt. "Impressive, Jason-san. Did you heal everyone with your magic?"

"Yes. Even the enemies."

"Most honorable. You are a kind and compassionate leader."

Makoto heaps some praise on me, and I force a smile, but honestly, I couldn't care less. Stepping forward, I reach past everyone to touch Phoebe's arm. "Hey, listen. Can we talk?"

She looks like she wants to pull away, but reluctantly sighs. "Is the situation stable here?"

I've never seen her this grumpy before. It's a little unsettling. "For the most part."

Phoebe jerks her head back and forth to look around for a moment, before gesturing to a quiet spot in the distance behind one of the portals. "Over there."

Nodding, I follow behind her as she takes off.

I'm going to apologize and hope she doesn't hate me. I can't just say what I did was a prank. It was mean-spirited and not like me at all.

I hope she's willing to listen.

Phoebe stares at me icily, keeping her arms crossed and body language closed. Her usual warm smile has turned into a blank facade of half-visible anger. The look on her face makes me feel like a backstabber, someone who intentionally hurt her for my amusement.

"Look, Phoebe, about what happened... I didn't mean... that is, I never intended to hurt you. I didn't think about how you'd feel being trapped in a vehicle you'd never seen before, and-"

She silently holds a hand up. "I've thought about what you did to me, Jason. You trapped me in that metal box, tied me down so I couldn't escape, and unleashed a pack of lions on me. Their roars were unmistakable. What were you hoping to accomplish?"

Phoebe's words make me flinch.

She doesn't know what a 'car' is, let alone its function. All she knows is that I seemingly terrorized her for no reason. I treated her reactions like a joke... and ended up hurting her needlessly.

I'm awful.

"Phoebe, I'm sorry. I screwed up. That's all there is to it. If you hate me, I understand. I want to try and explain what I was thinking, okay? I thought it would be a hilarious prank until I realized how badly I hurt you. I'll never do anything like that ever again."

Phoebe purses her lips. "Never?"

"Never."

Her head turns slightly as she looks past me at the wall. It's only now that I notice her lip quivering. Is she going to cry again? Fuck. Goddamn, I really stepped in the shit this time. I may never live this-

"Hahaha!" Phoebe suddenly laughs, and then the laugh explodes into an uproar as she doubles over and holds her stomach with both hands. "Haahahaha! Oh, my goodness, Your Grace's expression! It's like a puppy caught pooping on the rug for the third time! How could I ever stay mad at you?! Hahaha!"

I'm beyond confused. "W-what? You're not angry?!"

"Of course not! Heavens, no! Oh lord, have mercy!" Phoebe nearly falls to the ground laughing, and this time her laughter is an upbeat new emotion I've never seen her display before. Relief overwhelms me.

Phoebe laughs for a solid twenty seconds, before choking to a stop and wiping her forehead. "Oh, my days! I was so scared at the time, but after you left, I realized what an exhilarating feeling that speed was! I couldn't walk straight until the militia showed up. Hans explained to me what an 'automobile' was but also how he'd never seen one as advanced as yours."

I nod, unsure of how to respond. "Hans did, huh? Well, that was nice of him. S-saves me the trouble, I suppose..."

Phoebe forces herself to look stern. "Nevertheless! If you ever do something like that to me again, I'll beat you senseless during our next training! Do you understand?"

I quickly stand rigid and salute. "Y-yes ma'am!"

A moment passes, and Phoebe relaxes visibly. "Praise God in the heavens above. I must say, Jason, that had you properly warned me about that machine, I might have enjoyed it. I would like to ride in it in the future, if you don't mind." She pauses before quickly adding, "Not now, of course. Later. We've... dead to bury."

The joking mood sobers up between us as I glance out at the cooling corpses. "You've got that right."

An hour later, I move the final body to the right side of the room, as per Neil's instructions. Having divided up the allies and enemies, I now know that over a thousand Central Core monsters died, as well as three thousand monsters and demons on the opposing side. Unfortunately, the fallen from our team were more powerful, higher ranked monsters. A quick estimate tells me we took a three to five loss. Well, the numbers are meaningless anyway, since the demons are an unending horde outside the Great Doors.

We are few, and they are many.

Thinking similar thoughts, Neil exhales. "Huuu... not good, my liege. We'll be lucky to survive the next skirmish, let alone last to the end of the month. I hope you have a plan."

Makoto Ueda gracefully walks over to us, hands cupped in front of himself. "Hiro-sama, before we were so rudely interrupted, we were discussing rebuilding human society. Today has shown that we must continue that conversation and get to work at once."

"I concur," Saul says, as he meanders to us with Hans in tow. "If Demon Lords are already our enemies, I don't imagine it will be long before a Baron or a Duke shows up. Had you not healed Kar, we'd have lost one of our best warriors, and the title of King of Monsters would pass to another."

Glancing at him warily, I ask, "If Kar dies, what happens to the power of the Sphinx?"

"I haven't the faintest clue."

Hans gestures toward the Great Doors. "Vee need veapons. Good ones. Using swords and sticks to battle the demons is entirely useless. Vhy can't vee make guns? Zey vould give us a ranged tactical advantage."

My hand brushes against the lightsaber at my belt. Hans is right. Advanced weapons and armor would give us a fighting chance. It doesn't matter how much damage a demon's fists and claws can cause if I gun them down before they get close. DOOM taught me that much.

"Good idea, Hans. Maybe I should add some automated defenses too, like turrets and such. The fewer casualties we suffer, the better."

Phoebe walks up to the group with a spark in her eyes. "Demons are highly resilient. I fought alongside Arthur and slew many in ages past. If you want to kill a demon, you need to pierce their hides."

Hans grunts. "Nnn. If that is that case, perhaps bullets vould not vork very vell. Vee might need something more sophisticated than the technology I used during the Great War."

He looks at me pointedly, as if to say, you're the genius inventor, here. Surely you can think of something.

My lightsaber and armor come to mind. If we need raw force to withstand demonic attacks, and the Crown of Solomon allows me to envision complex machinery like my lightsaber, then I've barely begun to tap into its latent potential.

"Fine. I have a few ideas." I pause to gaze meaningfully at the five people surrounding me. "If my plans work as well as I hope, then I need a promise from everyone here today. My goal is not to conquer and subjugate, but to unify humans, monsters, and demons alike. We have to try not to kill when possible. You can slaughter demons all day long, but every demon you spare will catch their attention and defrost their hearts. I'd like to release the ones I healed today, too, after we interrogate them."

After I finish speaking, Neil glances at Makoto. "Have you been talking to the king recently? His words sound like something you would say."

"I met his majesty only today, when you introduced us," Makoto replies, smiling.

Neil adjusts his jacket. "Mmm. I wouldn't go so far as to call your goals naive, my liege, but demons are not the soft-hearted creatures you believe them to be. Perhaps after you combat them again and again, you will understand how they think. They will slaughter all of us in a second the moment they realize they can end our resistance. In fact, I assume that will be their next goal."

Nodding, I reply, "I know. However, I won't budge on this issue. We have to try not to kill demons where possible. I'll make sure to equip our troops with better weaponry and armor, but we have to lead by example. In the era I came from, only those who stood up against injustice and took risks with their lives changed the world for the better."

"That's admirable," Neil says with a nod. "Very well. We'll try your approach, but you'd better hurry. More demons could attack at any moment. The sooner we fortify our position, the better."

"Already three steps ahead of you," I murmur.

Makoto folds his hands together and bows his head. "It has been long time since I see a leader work hard to spare the lives of his enemies. His majesty, Hiro-sama, is most gracious and kind."

I force a smile. "Thanks, Makoto...san? I'm more American than Japanese, so I don't know honorifics very well."

He cocks his head questioningly. "Did your mother or father not teach you about your homeland?"

"My mother died when I was very young. My father abandoned me. I don't remember either of them."

Makoto's face pales. "Ah, very sorry to bring up sensitive topic. If you ever need guidance, feel free to seek my help, Hiro-sama."

My smile shines more genuinely. "Thanks. I'll keep that offer in mind."

It takes me a minute of concentration to picture the mass of gears, circuits, machinery, and metal in my mind. The Crown works overtime forming mental bridges from neurons to receptors, and finally, when I open my eyes, I speak a word. "Turret!"

Attached to the wall outside the Great Doors, a round half-orb appears. Reaching twice the size of my body, with a red iris that stares ahead blankly, the weapon sits at attention, waiting for an enemy to step in range. Bulletproof black glass envelops the iris, protecting it from attack.

A laser turret. It can fire lasers at the speed of light, cutting through most armor and flesh with little to no resistance. If the demons attack, they'll come from the side doors or the end of the hallway, exposing themselves to turret-fire.

"Turret! Turret! Turret!"

I create three more turrets, placing two on each side of the Great Doors. These weapons alone should eviscerate any attack force that approaches us. Good enough for now.

There's still a problem, though. The turrets will run out of energy after a minute of continuous fire. Just like my Lightsaber, they need a sustainable power source. I'll have to build a fusion reactor somewhere.

Neil steps through the still-opened Great Doors and stares at the black bubbles on the walls. "What are these spheres?"

"Automated defensive turrets. They have advanced Friend or Foe targeting systems, and can see a mile in absolute darkness. They're always scanning for threats, so if demons show up, they'll take him down."

Neil nods seriously. "I have no idea what you said, but it sounds good. I thought you were going for a non-lethal approach, though? These spheres seem antithetical to those values of yours."

"They have several settings. I set their attack priorities to 'incapacitate,' though they will switch to a lethal mode if they come under attack. I'll install a broadcast system to warn incoming demons of our defenses, too. If they ignore the warning, that's on them."

Phoebe slips out of the Core and approaches me. "We'd like to close the doors as soon as possible. Are you done out here, Your Grace?"

"Not yet. Soon, Phoebe."

She lingers for a moment and stares at the turrets before walking back inside, a briskness in her step. She seems slightly afraid of them.

I can't blame her, though. They remind me of the computer from an old movie I used to watch. 2001, a Space Odyssey. They resemble HAL 9000, with his unmoving red eyeball.

Creepy. I can't say I'm a fan of evil AI.

I spend the next several minutes installing a speaker and camera system, along with lights in the ceiling to illuminate the corridor. I can see in the darkness, but the others can't. A lack of light might make some demons think they're sneaky, so it's best to remedy that, now.

Stepping back inside the Core, I create two new computer terminals and beckon for two nearby Knolls to come over. They shoot questioning gazes at me but shrug since they still don't know who I am. Thanks, Kar.

They stop before me, and I beckon at the computer terminals. "I don't care who does it, but I need someone on each of these computers 24/7. This one is set to monitor the cameras outside the Great Doors, and this one is for keeping an eye on energy levels of the turrets, as well as a bunch of subsystems. You'll pick everything pertinent up as you operate the computers."

Both gnolls nod, their eyes wide. "Issh assh you sshay, hooman. You build weaponsh to protect ush, we thank you. Lose many brothersh, we did."

"I'm sorry to hear that. I hope that, in due time, no one else will have to die."

I leave them behind and walk over to an empty section of the room. It takes a few minutes for the Crown to help me envision a small fusion reactor, but when I finish, I embed the circular reactor halfway into the wall.

The rest of the work involves magically creating power lines inside the walls of the Labyrinth to power the turrets, but that takes only a few seconds.

Once I finish, I pause to sit down. My mind is woozy. Creating complex mechanical devices drains both my mana and my brainpower. It's been a while since I felt this tired.

"Are you unwell, Your Grace?" Phoebe appears beside me, and I flinch. I hadn't even noticed her there; that's how distracted I am.

"I... I'm fine — just a little tired. I can't rest yet, though. I need to start making some weapons too."

She nods and leans down beside me. "For what it's worth, I wanted you to know that your concern for my well-being was very touching."

It takes me a moment to form a coherent thought. God, I'm slow as shit right now. "Yeah? Well, it's you. I always think about you. I never want anything to happen to you, Phoebe. You mean more to me than anyone else. Perhaps even myself."

"Oh, don't say such an awful thing like that," Phoebe pleads. "You have to take care of yourself. Think of how it would make me feel if you were badly hurt. I couldn't bear to see you in such a state again."

A smile spreads across my face. "Yeah, but then you could take care of me again, like you did before. We'd have a lot more time together."

She blushes and looks away. "You don't have to get hurt for that to happen. We could do that now."

"Oh? Are you asking me on a date?"

She stands up quickly. "Gods, guide me. You're always ready with a funny quip, Your Grace."

My smile fades. "I wasn't joking."

For once, Phoebe is at a loss for words. She opens and closes her mouth several times before forming a sentence. "Haven't we gone far enough?"

"You've asked that before. I think you're making excuses." I reach over and gently take her hand in mine. "I don't know if someone hurt you in the past. I know you cared for King Arthur, but I'm not him. If... if you think I can't match up to him or something, say the word. I'll stop prying."

She doesn't pull away. "It isn't that. I... I've lost everyone I ever cared about to the winds of time. Maybe... secretly... I fear developing a deep bond with someone."

"Maybe? You're usually more certain than this. Unlike you, I don't have such fears. When I entered my Cryopod, I knew everyone I cared about would disappear into the past. I felt empty enough that I didn't care. You changed that, Phoebe. You changed me."

Rising from my chair, I try to hunch down a little to her level, but probably end up looking goofy. Just this once, I don't want to tower over her.

"Phoebe, I told you a few months ago after my paralysis that I cared about you. That hasn't changed. If anything, my feelings have only deepened. Every minute I spend with you gives me the energy to live life to the fullest. I'm not only protecting the other people and monsters, but I'm also protecting you. Everything I do, I do it for you."

I'm stunned by the words coming out of my mouth. I used to think I'd die of embarrassment if I opened up like this to someone else, but Phoebe means everything to me. I don't just care about her because she healed me... I... I love her.

Yeah. That's exactly it. "Phoebe, I love you. I want you to be mine, whatever that entails."

She stays quiet for several seconds, the look on her eyes like a deer in the headlights. The expression passes, and her gaze softens.

"I do too, J-Jason. Love you, that is. Maybe I was afraid to admit it to myself, but... if I don't say it now..."

"You'll regret it later?"

"Yes."

"I know the feeling."

Silently, I kneel down on one leg, and mutter under my breath, "Ring."

A shiny silver ring with a tiny red gem inset appears in my palm. I suddenly feel horribly flustered.

"Uh, look, here's a ring. If you, uh, if you wear it, that means you're... well, you and I are, sort of... you know?"

She grins hugely. "Yes! I know exactly what you mean!"

"So... will you wear this?"

Phoebe purses her lips. "What does the ring mean? Say it."

"Uh. It means I'm proposing marriage."

"Oooh!" Phoebe bows down suddenly and wraps her arms around me, taking me by surprise. "You're so cute when you're flustered! I will! I'll marry you!"

With her face pressed against mine, she kisses me on the cheek, and I grin stupidly.

Today is the best day of my life. Nothing can take this moment from me.

Part 024: Violence Begets Violence

Nonchalantly, I step into an interrogation room and walk toward a table. It's a barebones chamber, constructed hastily with my Wordsmithing.

The demon eyeballs me warily as I sit on the opposite side of the table from him. He's a sturdy-looking fellow with decent muscles, standing just over six feet tall. His tangled black hair hangs off his head in clumps, giving him a slightly ratty appearance, but with a shower, he'd clean up fine. Two burly minotaurs stand guard behind him, each armed with a nasty-looking halberd, but I wave them out as I take my seat. I won't need their protection.

My guest is only a Demon Lord.

"I ain't sayin' nothin'," The demon snaps. "Do your worst."

I've grown used to the red skin and horns most demons have, as well as their blood-red eyes, but what never fails to surprise me is how smartly they dress. This guy's pinstripe suit is still torn up from the battle, splotched with his blood in several places, but I can tell he enjoys dressing dapper. My mental image of the average demon has always been that they are a lot like rabid animals, keen to tear humans apart, but seeing them like this changes things. Now I have the notion that they're quite sophisticated and more than capable of intelligent thought. It seems Beelzebub and Agares aren't outliers.

"If you say so," I reply. "I want to ask you a few questions before we release you. You don't have to answer, but these aren't particularly invasive."

The demon flicks his gaze behind himself. "You sent the guards out. Don't you value your life?"

"Naturally, I do, but you don't frighten me."

"Uh-huh. What's with the... the glowing eyes?" He squints to examine my face. "Ain't never seen a fleshbag with eyes like those. You some kinda shapeshifter or somethin'?"

"I'm asking the questions here, but... yes. I suppose you could say that."

Truthfully, I'm not lying. I can change my shape, after all. Hell, I wonder if I could change everything about my looks. Might be worth a shot, sometime. "What's your name?"

The demon leans back in his seat. "I guess I can tell you that much. It's Paimon."

"Nice to meet you, mister Paimon." I hold my hand out toward him, but he merely stares at it for a few seconds.

"What the hell kind of spell are you tryin'a cast?"

I retract my hand. Ugh. Monsters and demons seem to have no concept of shaking hands. "Never mind. I'm Jason. I want to know why the demons attacked us. Can you tell me that much?"

He squirms in his seat. "You're gonna let me go if I tell you?"

"Whether you tell me or not, after I finish asking questions, you'll be free to leave."

He reaches up and rubs his chin thoughtfully. "What kinda dumb interrogation is this? Everyone knows torture is the best way to make someone talk."

"Do you want me to torture you?"

His face reddens. "N-no."

I shrug. "Where I come from, there have been studies regarding the low correlation between torture and reliable information. Besides, I'll be asking the other dozen of your friends these same questions. I'm playing the odds by assuming someone will talk."

"Huh. Interesting." He crosses his arms again and stares at me stonily for a few moments. "Maybe you are just a fleshbag. Ain't no demon or monster I know who'd say the shit you do."

"Perhaps. Would you like to answer the question, or should I move to the next one?"

Paimon looks at the blank walls around us before sighing. "Hah... you're either dumb or smart as hell. I can't figure you out. Fine. The official orders are to wait for a signal from the Dukes before retaking the Core, but some of the Lords thought it would be a good chance to reap some souls. We decided to gather up a bunch of slayers and attack all at once."

"Worked out well for you," I muse.

"Nobody likes a smartass."

I nod. "Would you care for anything to eat? Drink?"

Paimon's jaw slackens. "Now you're offering me grub? Are you pranking me?"

"No. It's just been several hours since the battle. I'm starting to get a little hungry myself. Thought I'd offer."

The demon smirks. "Guess that settles it. You are a fleshbag after all. Demons don't get hungry or thirsty, pal."

"Perhaps. Thank you for your answer, by the way."

"Maybe I lied."

I nod again. "If you did, and anyone else answers the question, we'll have two conflicting answers. I don't think you lied, though. You look fairly honest."

"Oh? Got me all figured out, huh? Maybe I'm planning to jump you and cut your throat open."

"I'd advise against that. If you manage to kill me, you won't get out of here alive. Oh, and you won't win if we clash. Don't press your luck."

Paimon sags slightly in his seat. "I'm just messing around. Doesn't matter; you won't let me go, anyway."

"Why do you say that?"

"Because fleshbags lie."

"And demons don't?"

Paimon licks his lips. "You know what I mean."

"Sure. Next question. Do you hate all humans?"

He blinks in surprise. "What? What kinda moronic-"

"Just answer it, if you want. Yes or no?"

"Yeah! Duh!" Paimon straightens up in his chair and slaps the table. I don't flinch. "You're all pathetic! Weak! Just food for us to eat! Once you were 'sposed to be these unstoppable beasts, devastating everything and ripping us apart, but now you ain't shit!"

I cock my head slightly. "You hate us because we're weak?"

"Obviously! Nothin' worse than a little shit who can't fight back! Even imps gotta fight to prove themselves."

"So, I suppose you'd say power and respect are essential to demons?"

"Obviously." Paimon starts to stand up but pauses. "Err, my legs are cramped. Mind if I stretch?"

"Sure. Go ahead. Don't try anything stupid, though. I don't want to hurt you."

"Hurt me. Psh." Paimon walks over to a wall and rubs his back against it. "Like that could ever happen."

"You said you value respect and power. Would you respect me if I proved to you that I could crush you without trying?"

He pauses and stares at me. "Is that a challenge?"

"Sure."

"If I attack you, I know how this goes. I kill you; the monsters come in and kill me. I'm outnumbered a thousand to one."

"Didn't you say you thought we weren't going to release you? Maybe you could take me as a hostage."

"What the hell good would a fleshbag hostage be? Ain't no monster that'll care if I have you at claw-point or not."

"You don't find it odd the monsters show deference to me? I'm obviously someone important."

Paimon glances away for a moment. I watch in silence as the gears turn in his mind. Something triggers in his head, and he suddenly bolts for me, but he's far too slow. An invisible telekinetic wave reaches out of my mind and smashes into him from the side, knocking him across the table and battering him against the wall.

"Guhuk!" The demon coughs in pain, then jumps at me again. This time, I calmly lean forward and rest my chin in my palm before delivering another psychic barrage to him, knocking him away from me toward the far wall. He hits with enough force that if he were a human, I'd have broken his spine. Since he's a demon, however, he merely slumps to the ground for a moment.

"W-what the hell?! How... how did you..."

While he breathes heavily, I sigh dramatically. "I told you, didn't I? You can't hope to beat me."

"That was you?! No way! No fleshbag has magic like that!" Paimon rises to his feet and wipes some blood from his lips before cautiously slinking back into his seat. "Maybe you're a shapeshifter after all. Ain't never met one with invisible fists, though."

"Anything's possible, I suppose. Are you okay? I can heal you if you like."

He scowls. "Shut up. I barely even felt those pathetic attacks. At least I know you ain't bluffin' now."

"Your wrist looks broken."

Paimon flicks his eyes down to his hand. "Maybe a little."

"I can heal it. I don't want you to be in pain."

"The hell does that mean?"

Slowly I raise my head and pretend to look at the ceiling. My eyes don't see anything, of course, but he doesn't have to know that. "Not all humans are weak. Not all humans hate demons. I believe, in time, the demons could be convinced to hold similar views. Something tells me I could lead demons and humans to stop their fighting and seek common ground."

Paimon curses. "Devils. Now you're talking like a fleshbag again. I can't pin you down — what a bunch of crap. Demons need fleshbags for souls. As long as that's true-"

"Don't humans who die of natural causes have their souls trapped in the River Styx?"

My interruption catches Paimon off-guard. "W-what? Yeah, sure. They're always old or weak, though. Young, fertile bodies give the most soul power."

"Do you need souls to live?"

He licks his lips again. "I suppose not. We're immortal."

"So the only reason you need souls is..."

"To mutate into stronger forms!"

"Greed, in other words."

Paimon leans forward slightly. A thoughtful expression crosses his face. "Well, yeah. I suppose. Who'd wanna be stuck in the body of an imp?"

"Not me," I admit. "But then, I am blessed."

"Tch. No kidding."

A long minute passes. Neither of us says anything.

Paimon rubs his wrist. "Err, say, is that offer to heal my wrist still on the table?"

"Of course."

"How many more questions I gotta answer before you do that?"

"I told you, Paimon. You don't have to answer any of my questions. I'll heal your wrist right now if you like."

For the first time since I've met him, the demon smiles. He grins, revealing his razor-sharp teeth without looking menacing or threatening. "Shit. Maybe I pegged you wrong, after all. Hit me with more questions, if you've got 'em."

"Certainly. Let me see your hand."

An hour later, Paimon grins at me as the two minotaurs enter the room. His expression is almost like that of a long-lost child returning to his parent's embrace. "Say, uh, Jason?"

"Hmm?"

"You're releasing me, right?"

I nod.

"Do... do I have to leave?"

"For now, yes. I'll release the other demons, too."

He slicks back his hair. "Damn. I hope they give you the answers you need, then. You're different from anyone I've ever met."

"Answers? No, I'm not going to question them. You fulfilled every query, after all. I know you didn't lie. You're all free to go."

"Seriously? Whoa." He glances at the minotaurs, then back to me. "Say, what was that thing you did earlier? With the hand."

"Oh, that was just a greeting. Where I come from, friends press their hands together and shake. We also do that for goodbyes."

"Friends?" Paimon glances away for a moment before bashfully jabbing his open palm across the table. "Th-then I guess if you shake my hand, that makes us...?"

I pause for three full seconds before smiling and taking his hand in mine. After shaking twice, I pull away. "Friends."

Paimon quickly stands up, nearly knocking his chair over. His body language is ridiculously giddy, and he smiles from ear to ear. "Jeez. I... I've never been friends with a fleshb- err, a human before. You're something else, Jason. I wish you the best of luck."

"Same, Paimon. Perhaps in a few months, I'll have a way for you to come back and visit us. For now, I advise staying away... for your safety."

He nods. "I understand. I'll try and talk to other demons I know. You've got the right ideas about unification. I'd never considered another way until I spoke to you. Well, uh, anyway... guess I'll be going, then."

He lingers for a moment before the minotaurs usher him out the door. After he leaves, a minute passes, and Neil enters the room.

"How did the interrogation go, my liege? We're ready to send in the next one."

"Don't bother. Paimon answered every question and didn't lie once. Release all the other demons along with him."

I stand up from the table and stretch, watching as Neil squints in surprise.

"He answered all your questions? Ridiculous. Demons don't talk to humans."

"Maybe not as a rule, but Paimon did. I may have lucked out and found an open-minded fellow, but I doubt that. He seemed emblematic of most demons. He gives me hope in my convictions. You treated the other demons well, right?"

I walk around the table to open the door, and Neil nods. "Yes, my liege. After we send them out, I'll have the Great Doors sealed shut. Is there anything else you'd like me to do?"

"No. That's enough for today. I need to get to work on human society. I want you to start scanning for human worlds. I'd like to concentrate on moving liberated populations to a few core worlds, leaving the old ones behind. If we unite the populations of hundreds of worlds into just a few, that'll give us greater numbers and allow us to focus our efforts on protecting more defensible planets. How many human worlds are out there, anyway?"

"Several hundred. I don't have accurate counts, yet, but I'll order an inquiry at once."

"Perfect."

We leave the interrogation chambers and head outside, down a few hallways, and into the Core once again. After a minute, I sigh. "I just hope Amelia will be so easy to convince."

"My liege?"

"Nothing. I'm making small talk."

Yeah, I think to myself. Just small talk.

Part 025: Battle Against the Black Witch

Recommended Listening

Rosalia slowly cracks open the mahogany doors to my luxurious inner chamber. After poking her head around the corner, she whispers, "M-Mister Beelzebub? Are you in here?"

Everything hurts. I clutch the wound at my side, pressing the cloth covered in a styptic agent against it. Black energy still leaks from the open sore through the fabric and my fingers. "I am."

The door creaks slightly as she cautiously enters the room. Her curly brown hair, a different color from the black that most demons possess, makes her already piggish face that much more unattractive. She's a short demoness, shaped like three balls of dirt smashed together. Still, as a Lord, I'm lucky to have an appointed servant. It's a symbol of my rising status in the eyes of the Dukes and Emperor. Only a few Lords stand above me, and soon I may join the ranks of the Barons and Dukes.

But... after today, I have to confess that I don't feel ready yet. I need more soul energy.

Rosalia gasps. "M-mister Beelzebub! What happened?!"

She quickly shuffles over to me, wiggling her tubby jowls as she gasps for air. Devils. There are many attractive servants available for the Barons and Dukes, but the Council had to assign the ugliest ogre possible to me. Fate is a cruel mistress.

"I'm fine, Rosalia. However, my suit jacket is stained with blood. I expect you to have it cleaned and scrubbed within the hour, and a new one in my claws by tomorrow morning."

She nods quickly but barely takes her eyes off my side. "You must have been in quite a battle! How did it-"

"That's none of your business, insignificant wench." I bite the words off, but as usual, she doesn't even flinch at my scathing words. Pathetic. She's taken so much abuse during her life that insults don't faze her anymore. No self-respect. "What happened was a matter for the Dukes and Emperors, not for an unevolved servant."

Her hand brushes against my jacket, still stained crimson from my injury. "Goodness! The Council assigned you a Duke-level task? I'm thrilled! You deserve it, Mister Beelzebub!"

My nostrils flare slightly, in spite of myself. "Hmm, yes, well, that much is true. I held my own against the she-whore. I'm sure the Dukes were impressed by my courage and resilience in the face of such a foe."

Rosalia slides onto the bed beside me and pulls my hand away from the wound, pressing hers against the cloth. "Oh, it sounds wonderful! I'm certain you were the envy of all the other Lords! Won't you tell me what happened? I won't tell anyone, no matter how secret the information is! Not unless you give me the okay! If you do, I'll make sure everyone knows about your dastardly feats!"

Damn. This flabby fiend knows how to soothe my irritation. I smirk slightly. "Of course, it was a trifle. Hardly anything worth bragging about. Any other Lord might have balked in the face of danger, but when I was ordered to stand courageously against the Black Witch, I did my duty and fought back. She may have killed Emperor Satan, but I gave her a taste of the power of fire."

Rosalia murmurs something under her breath, makes a hand sign, and touches the flesh above the festering boil. Immediately, some of my pain drains away. She's an amateur healer, hardly anything to write home about, but at this point, I'll take anything to soothe the icy chill. The Blood Pits would cost too much for a single night of recuperation, let alone what's needed to expedite the healing of this injury.

"I imagine so, Mister Beelzebub, and when you-"

"It's Lord Beelzebub, Rosalia. How many times must I correct you?"

She continues, ignoring my interruption. "...When you stood up against the Bark Witch, I'm sure she trembled in the face of your flames. How did the fight go?"

I sigh, not bothering to correct her inability to remember names. This female cares little for social niceties. That's why she'll never rise above the position of an ugly servant.

"Well, if you must know, I'll regale you with the tale."

"Are your muscles tired, Mister Beelzebub? I can massage them if you like."

"What? No. Keep the physical contact to a minimum, you lecherous troll."

She smiles far too sweetly. "As you wish!"

Many hours earlier.

A Warper demon opens up a portal, and the four of us quickly step through. A moment later, the Warper steps through as well, closing the hole in space behind himself. It will take several hours for his energy to recharge so he can open another one.

The walls of the Labyrinth have always felt comforting to me. Perhaps it's because I grew up in the comfort of the seemingly infinite maze, but whenever I step onto an Outer World, one with greens, reds, blues, and the rest of the rainbow, I always feel a little nervous. The wind too- it gets to me. I don't like the constant sensation of something invisible caressing my body at unexpected moments.

I know from the few times I've reluctantly left the Labyrinth that we're on a 'Planet,' which is a gigantic round sphere with vegetation, water, clouds, and a bunch of other whimsical niceties. Agares, Barbatos, and Mephisto haven't the slightest concern about being outside the Labyrinth, given they used to live on the homeworld, Earth, at one point. Agares won't tell me much about it, but what he has said indicates it was about as pleasant as this dried up husk.

My eyes swivel down to the grass. A slight bit of confusion passes over my face. "Is it the off-season? The grass appears distinctly dry and brown."

Agares shakily kneels and rustles the dead vegetation with his hand. "Mmm. Odd. I recall that this planet's seasons are a little irregular, but not to this level. It's quite warm out, too."

Mephisto sniffs the air. "I sssmell death. Warper, how far are we from the flessshbag sssettlement?"

The Warper points to a tree-line less than a mile away. "The largest village lies over there, Duke of Mist. There are several others scattered within a ten-mile radius, but the population of this planet is only about a million."

"Tch," I mutter. "I thought we didn't allow these vermin to grow their societies to such levels."

Agares chuckles softly. "Heh. The Overlords ensure that the most intelligent humans are picked off. We needn't worry about them developing new technology."

I look at my mentor questioningly. "Overlords?"

The Eldest Demon pales as if he's said something he shouldn't. Barbatos's metal armor grinds as he turns to glower at Agares. "Watch your mouth, Duke of Reptiles."

Agares shivers under the cold glare from the Duke of Steel. He quickly dabs at his forehead with his sleeve. "Oh, oh, right. Silly me. Drop the subject, boy."

I'd rather not risk my neck. I've heard Agares mention the Overlords once or twice before, but he never goes beyond that. Just who the devil are they? Demons of higher authority than the Emperors?

I don't get a chance to ask, not that I'd try in front of Barbatos. Mephisto hisses; a sharp sound like molten metal dropped into water. "Kss... I ssshall travel ahead to the village and interrogate the flessshbagsss... Let'sss meet up there."

True to his title, Mephisto makes a few hand signs, and a moment later, his cloaked form evaporates into the air as he transforms into his Mist-Body Form. He sails away against the wind, reminding me of Vampires and how they can explode into a horde of bats to move from place to place. Well, Vampires don't exist anymore, but Agares mentioned them in passing once or twice.

Agares moans. "Ohh, I'd rather go a little slower anyway. When you're my age, simply walking around can be exhausting. And this dry, cracked grass makes for uneven footing too!"

I force myself not to roll my eyes. The Duke of Reptiles always makes a big fuss about his supposed age, but Emperor Diablo is practically the same age. I wonder why the other Dukes and Emperors put up with his charades?

It takes thirty painful minutes for us to slowly stroll across the plains. I'm beginning to call Agares the Duke of Turtles in my mind. He never likes to hurry anywhere, and it drives me crazy.

The Warper stays behind since he might die if he came with us. If the Black Witch is on this planet, as rumors suggest, then losing our only means of returning to the Labyrinth could prove a fatal mistake. Naturally, Diablo would send a search party to recover us, but that could take a month, depending on how lazy the son of a gargoyle is.

We enter the tree-line, and after shoving some dead, brown plants out of our way, each of which cracks and falls apart at the stems, we arrive in the human village.

Thatched hut structures with mud walls elevated half a foot off the ground protect the buildings from rainfall and minor flooding. I know little of the weather on this planet, but what I do know is that rain is an unpleasant feeling. Droplets of water ripped from large bodies of water and dumped onto the mainland by uncontrollable outside forces make me uncomfortable. Water belongs under the ground, not in the air.

Mephisto's mist-form ripples in the wind. He materializes in midair, landing on the ground in a crouch. I note with interest that he's breathing heavily. His Mist-Body Form must consume a lot of energy.

"Ksss... not a sssingle flessshbag anywhere in sssight. I found blood here and there, but no bodiesss... sssomething took the corpsesss and left."

Agares inhales sharply. "That settles it. The Black Witch must be here somewhere. How many humans lived in this village?"

"Ten thousssand at the mossst." Mephisto's teeth chatter. "Sssome may have fled. We ssshould check the nearby areasss."

"No need," Barbatos says. His metallic voice causes everyone, including me, to flinch. "There. Black Witch." He points to the east, through the tree-line.

Mephisto follows the Duke of Steel's finger. "No flessshbagsss live that way. Are you sssure?"

Barbatos leans forward just the slightest bit and glares at Mephisto, making the Duke of Mist cower in fear. "Yes."

Agares yawns, pretending not to care about Barbatos's power-play, nor the venom in his voice. "Very well, then. Let's get this over with."

The four of us make our way in the direction Barbatos indicated, and I nudge Agares as we walk. "Mentor, you don't appear alarmed at all. Weren't you saying earlier that the Black Witch is the deadliest enemy we may ever face? How can you be so calm in the face of danger?"

Agares doesn't answer for a long minute. When he does, he starts with a long, drawn-out sigh. "Haaah... young one... I have never been as frightened in my entire life as I am right now. Even were Belial, Diablo, and Bael beside the four of us, I expect we would still lose a fight against the Black Witch. However, I've long since accepted that death might come for me someday. Sometimes, you have to prepare yourself for the inevitable."

Mephisto, walking in the lead, glances back at the old bat. "We mussst ssstand ssstrong againssst thisss menace. Do not falter. Be like Barbatosss, who never ssshowsss fear."

I nod. "Mephisto is right. If we don't keep our cool, we may embolden the little rat. Morale will be key at this point. I'm glad Barbatos is here as a reminder of demonic power."

From behind me, the Duke of Steel's helmet grinds against his armor as he looks up into the midday sun.

"No. I am afraid too."

His reply makes me realize we may not leave in one piece.

Several minutes later, a rustling noise makes everyone pause. I haven't spotted a single bug, let alone an animal on the planet since we arrived.

"La la la..." Singing, like that of a matured woman, whispers from the trees up ahead.

The four of us freeze in place as her singing draws closer. I can't speak for the Dukes, but my body won't move. Obviously, I'm not scared of a little girl, or a woman, or whatever the devil she is. But if I'm not, then why won't my body move?!

The foliage parts before us, and a tall, slender woman struts forward, her blue sundress dress pressing against her body in many lustful ways. The effect isn't intentional, given her dress looks too small for her. It appears to be child-sized, and has ripped at the sides, exposing a large amount of her skin.

Somehow, the Black Witch has rapidly aged since I last saw her. I've heard of magic that can alter a demon's appearance, but her situation is different. She squirms slightly, rubbing her breasts as she steps out of the tree-line.

"My, my. Four big, strong men, here to manhandle a poor, defenseless woman like me? Wipe the drool off your face, boys."

Her voice is alluring, sexual in nature, somewhat like a succubus. The tiny dress clinging to her body looks like it could pop off and leave her exposed at any moment. My eyes meander lower of their own accord, and it's at this moment that I notice the patches of differently colored blood all over her dress, arms, and legs. Human filth covers her body.

Agares coughs into his fist. "Black Witch, it seems you did come to this world, after all. Where are the humans that lived here?"

The woman yawns and rubs her eye with a hand still crusted in blood. "Black Witch? Oh, Agares, I thought we were on a first-name basis, you deceitful grandpa. Can't you call me, Amelia? Or, since I've surpassed my old power, how about... Black Queen? I think it's a better name for my position."

The old man twists his cane slightly as he tightens his grip on it. "You've... transcended? How?"

"Hah!" Amelia lilts her voice menacingly and pulls a black orb from her pouch. I remember seeing it in her hand before, but I don't know what it is. "If you had attacked me when we first met, you might have been able to defeat me all on your own! Unfortunately for you, I've already consumed most of the morsels on this planet. You're too late to stop me."

Mephisto takes a step to the side, eying her warily. "Imposssible... there are a million flessshbagsss here... to consssume that many would be..."

He trails off, and the female yawns again, this time rubbing her jaw. "Oh, it was exhausting, I assure you. I'm ready for a thousand-year catnap while I digest all those souls... but I guess you thought you'd take me out before it was too late, hm?"

Agares' voice cracks noticeably. "N-no! Certainly not, Black W-, err, Black Queen! We merely came to discuss your future in the Labyrinth, and a possible collaboration between yourself and my people."

"Cooperation?" The human takes two steps toward us, causing Mephisto to shrink back slightly. "Like a treaty? You want me to leave you alone, so you don't have to fight me. Is that it?"

The Duke of Reptiles grimaces. "When you put it that way..."

"I knew I wasn't far from the mark. Well, the only problem is that a treaty doesn't benefit me. Perhaps if you agree to hand over half the human worlds under your control, I'll consider accepting."

"H-half?!" Mephisto sputters. "You want half of the flessshbag worldsss?! Ridiculousss! The River Ssstyx will run dry in a week if-"

"Silence, Duke of Mist." Agares holds his hand up to silence his junior. "I am the ranking Duke here. It is my task to consider her request."

I balk visibly. "You can't be seriously considering..."

Agares grinds his teeth together. "C-come, now, Black Queen. Surely you can be more reasonable? The humans you've consumed haven't entered the river at all! We'd have noticed a million new souls by now. If we give you half of the human worlds..."

"Ah, hah hah hah..." She laughs creepily. "You thought I was serious? I assumed you'd understand my jokes by now, old man."

Agares sighs. "Seven Devils... if those aren't your terms for peace, then what are? Please... I am old. My heart can't take-"

"I want all of the human worlds."

Amelia's eyes darken as she takes a step forward.

"Every single one. You thought I'd let you off with only half? I haven't forgotten that you left me to rot in that statue."

Ice creeps through my veins. Agares opens his mouth to speak, but it takes a few attempts before he can reply. "B-buh.. but... we tried! Joan's magic prevented the statue from breaking! It... it couldn't..."

While he falters, a horrible shriek fills the air, and a dark form appears in my thoughts. Judging by how the other three recoil away from Amelia at the same time, they must see it too. A black shadow, hateful, filled with dark power and assuming the form of a shrouded human, materializes in my mind's eye.

"Liars. Every last one of you. I stayed in my Queen's grasp while she wept in silence for a hundred thousand years! Not one demon came within ten feet of her stone prison. You left her imprisoned, and you hoped she would stay that way."

Metal crunches together as Barbatos clenches his fist. "Blaarjiim. Dark God."

"Servant of evil," Agares mutters. "I forgot about that damned orb."

Amelia's tongue snakes out of her mouth as she wets her ruby-red lips. "Mmm, you forgot many things. How about it, then? Give me all of the human worlds, and I'll spare you. Life or death, it's an easy choice."

"Blackheart, the witch liesss," Mephisto hisses. "If we let her consssume all of humanity, nothing will ssstop her."

"That's adorable," The woman snarks. "If you wanted to stop me, you should have brought along the Emperors. The four of you haven't a chance."

I've known my mentor for a few thousand years. I've seen many emotions on his face. I can tell what he's thinking much of the time. His eyes blink hard and fast, and cold sweat drips down his brow. I can't give up the human worlds, his face reads. We'll die if we fight her now! But then, that'll happen if we fight her later, too!

Shakily, Agares drops his cane to the ground. "If this is what I must do... then... I will die protecting my children."

In a flash, Barbatos motions with his hands, and a gigantic sword, perhaps ten feet tall, materializes in midair and lands in his grasp. The center of its hilt features a monstrous, lizard-like eye that jerks around wildly, while the curved blade is sharp enough to cut through iron. The black and red sword oozes power and locks my eyes to it, as if it's going to rip the soul from my body if I look away. It appears to be a fusion of two ancient weapons, coalescing into a one-ton blade of incredible striking power.

Mephisto summons an aetherial knife and crouches low to the ground. "It'sss a fight to the death, then!"

"Pupil, take your leave. Send word to Diablo. We need everyone here. Everyone!" Agares makes a motion with his hands, and his body begins shifting. Scales form along his arms, and his face turns green. The teeth in his mouth transform into sharp, white, crocodilian flesh-renders. His robe tears apart in the back. He lowers into a four-legged crouch and a scaled tail sprouts from the base of his spine.

"No. I'll stay here and fight, teacher. I'll-"

A voice whispers in my ear. "Listen to papa, little shit."

The Black Queen! She's right next to- GUHK!

A horrific pain explodes in my left side as she plunges her hand into my ribs, then lightly batters me with her other hand.

The world goes black.

My head swims. A moment passes. Perhaps an hour. I can barely think. What happened?

The sound of a woman cackling maniacally jerks me back to my senses. I stiffen and try to sit up, but my neck is killing me.

A minute later, I pull myself together, realizing the Black Queen must have punched me damn near a hundred feet away. Blood and dark energy pour from a wound at my side. I quickly summon the power of fire and blast my gut, searing the laceration shut.

After pulling myself together, I gawk for a moment. The three Dukes don't look at me once. They can't.

The three of them jerk their heads erratically as they try to follow the woman's movements. She zips around like an imp after drinking too much Ganja Juice, attacking all three of them at impossible speeds. Without using a weapon, she swings her hand at Mephisto and passes through him harmlessly, but the air from her attack blows him back and knocks him off his footing. By the time he recovers, she's already moved on to my teacher, Agares.

His reptilian form has always been a closely guarded secret. He's only shown it to me a few times during our mock battles. Even so, I've never seen him exert as much strength as he is right now.

Agares parries some of Amelia's attacks but tries to absorb others by tanking them with his scales. He isn't nearly fast enough to follow her movements, and she delivers a punch with explosive force to his face, sending him tumbling into a tree to his right.

While the first two Dukes try to recover, Barbatos lunges forward and grabs her hair with his hand, then slams her into the ground. I'm stunned by how fast the steel giant can move. An instant later, he raises his gigantic sword and chops down with it.

In one spectacular move, it's over. Barbatos cleaves the Black Queen in half.

Ah, no! He doesn't!

The sword rips from Barbatos's grasp and careens fifty feet away, slamming into the ground with enough force to make the planet shake. Whatever deflected it moved too quickly for my eyes to follow.

"Not good enough!" The Black Queen cackles. She bats Barbatos's palm away, leaps into a handstand, and kicks him in the chest. Fortunately, even with her immense strength, it barely nudges him. He doesn't react as the shockwave from her kick shakes the trees in the forest.

A moment later, something unsettling happens. Barbatos's sword screeches like a rabid animal, and four thin, stick-like legs sprout from the handle. It pulls itself from the ground, and skitters toward the Duke of Steel, then leaps into his outstretched palm, retracting its legs in the process.

The blade is alive?! What demonic inventor created something so vile?

"Dangerous. Death. No holding back. Brother. I am sorry."

Barbatos pets the sword for a moment before raising it into the air. From the heavens above, a bolt of lightning shoots down and strikes the tip, careening down the weapon until it electrifies his armor. Barbatos howls in rage, and he lunges at the human as sparks of electricity explode from his chest.

The look of confusion on Amelia's face as she jumps back is comical. Barbatos swings his sword ten times faster than he did before, and she barely ducks in time. For a split second, I see her head cleave in two, but it's only a hallucination caused by my poor battle experience. The blade sends an arc of wind out that levels the forest up ahead, chopping fifty trees down.

Before the damn things can even begin to fall, Barbatos uses his free hand to form a fist, and a wave of wind surges from his body, sending the Black Queen tumbling away. She rights herself in midair, then dashes to her side, only to yelp in surprise as Mephisto materializes and swings his knife. He misses, but cuts some of her long, black hair off, sending it fluttering to the ground.

The tables turn quickly. Agares leaps back into the fray, roaring angrily and spitting a blob of venom at the woman. She ducks it, only for Mephisto to knee her in the teeth.

We can do this. We can beat the Black Queen.

I ready myself to lob some fire into the fray, but perhaps sensing my movements, Barbatos holds a palm up in my direction. "Leave. This fight is far from over."

The Duke of Steel dashes forward and swipes the open palm he pointed at me into the female's stomach, slapping her with the strength of a hundred minotaurs. Air erupts from her mouth as she flies through three trees and crashes into the foliage a short distance away.

I don't see what the problem is. The human was bluffing! She had a few surprises at first, but even a million souls weren't enough to compare to the power of the mightiest Dukes in the Labyrinth!

"Kah... kah... h-hitting a defenseless woman..." Amelia spits blood on the ground and glares daggers at Barbatos. "You're not like the others. What the hell are you? There's more than demon blood running through your veins."

Agares doesn't smile as the three dukes slowly surround her. "Barbatos broke a rule and consumed the essence of an Archangel. What should have killed him turned him into our mightiest warrior. You'd do well to give up now."

"As if!" She lunges at Agares, but before she can reach him, Barbatos grabs one of her legs, tosses her into the air, and swings the flat side of his sword down and against her body.

WHUMP.

With a single motion, Barbatos pounds the pathetic little female into the ground. The sound of every bone of her body breaking at once is the most satisfying thing I've ever heard in my life.

"You did it..."

The words escape my lips without thinking. This time, the Dukes don't correct me.

Agares growls. "She lied about her power. Of course. Cut her into pieces, Mephisto. Hurry. She might still be able to heal-"

"Kah... Hah..." A choked laugh escapes the woman's throat. "Haha..."

Mephisto rears his knives in the air. "Thisss will teach you to laugh!"

Before he can stab down, the Black Queen's body vanishes. Mephisto stumbles and jams his knives into the dirt. "What?!"

Several moments pass.

A male voice speaks up from behind a tree. "Hello, chums."

I don't know who it is, but immediately Agares and Mephisto's eyes widen in terror. Their former cockiness vanishes.

"Abhorrent wretch! Putrid worm! Whore of the damned!" Agares screams profanities angrily as he stares into the darkness at someone unseen. "Y-you... you dare blaspheme the dead?!"

The male voice continues speaking. "Blasphemy is something them chickens thought up, Agares. Why not say hello to an old friend?"

Barbatos takes three steps back. "Master... how..."

Mephisto vanishes, and a moment later appears at my side. "We told you to leave! Go! Ssseal this world! Leave usss behind! GET OUT!"

The terror on his face is unlike anything I've seen. I nod dumbly and quickly trip over myself as I stumble away. While fleeing, I catch a glimpse of red skin behind a bush. A demon unfamiliar to me emerges from the forest to face the Dukes.

"I'm sorry it had to come to this, old chums. Mind control. Reanimation. You know how it is."

The last thing I hear as I flee is the defeat in Agares' voice. "Yes, master. We know. Do not blame yourself."

"Mister Beelzebub? Hello?" A voice stirs me from my thoughts. "Are you okay?"

I blink. "What? Where am I?"

"At home, Mister Beelzebub. You trailed off a few minutes ago. Won't you finish telling me what happened?"

I glance up at the fat, loathsome face of my servant. Her eyes betray the emptiness in her brain; an inability to comprehend the evils and dangers of the world around us. I cannot help but hate everything she represents, not just in those beneath me, but in myself during the battle.

I thought I could make a difference in a clash between Titans? Disgusting. I am inferior to the Dukes.

And they... they are inferior to the Black Queen.

"Where did I stop talking?"

Rosalia taps her lips and bobs her head for a minute. "You said your teacher, Master Agares, was morphing into a hellhound. What happened next?"

"A hellhound? I said that?"

I spend a few moments debating the merits of killing this idiot woman and begging for a new servant. Then again, with my luck, the next will be twice as stupid and three times as ugly.

"Never mind. I blasted the Black Queen with my flames, and then I left after I weakened her. She didn't stand a chance against my might. The end. Happy?"

Rosalia nods giddily. "Oh yes, Mister Beelzebub! I knew you were incredible! You always have the best stories! I hope someday you get to rule as First Emperor!"

I smile in spite of myself. "First Emperor? Well, that's- I mean, anything's possible, but it's a bit of a pipe dream."

Hah... First Emperor... what a funny joke. I barely managed to keep it together and tell Diablo what was happening. Compared to the vicious animals I saw fighting the Black Queen, I have a long way to go.

Training. I'll need to train and devote myself to the unholy flames if I expect to overcome my weaknesses. I just... I hope the Dukes made it out alive.

Agares... mentor. I wished to surpass you one day. Survive. Don't let that wicked whore beat you.

Part 026: Roland And The Shrieking Devil

Every inch of my body trembles as my spiritual energy lowers once again. Dropping to a knee, I pant wildly. "Haah... haaahh..."

"You're doing good, Your Grace," Phoebe says. She kneels next to me and dabs a wet towel against my face, wiping away the boiling hot sweat covering me. I quickly grab the cloth and scrub my face with the cool towel.

"Jesus... how many more?" I ask.

Saul taps the paper in his hand. "Five more, Your Majesty. If you're exhausted, take a break. Nobody demands that you collapse."

Today's project has been a week in the making. While Neil investigates each of the human worlds we can travel to, Saul is having me build housing for the humans and monsters on Tarus II. Each building I create is ten stories tall, with the capacity to house a hundred beings comfortably, and two hundred if we fit two to a room. Winter is months away, but Fall is just around the corner. We can't have people sleeping in tents when the snow comes.

Where did the humans and monsters sleep previously?

I asked Saul that a few days ago, and he said that humans toiled in the mines, while monsters returned to their lairs in the Labyrinth. Since humans under Bahamut were immortal, sleeping in the dirt wouldn't kill them, though their suffering was immeasurable.

On days like this, I'm glad Kar killed Bahamut. She was a despicable animal, a monster who treated everyone else as though they were beneath her. The universe is better off without her around.

Given the current political situation in the Labyrinth, sending allied monsters back into the Labyrinth is a terrible idea as well. Demon loyalists might swarm and kill them. Not only that, but we want allies nearby in case the Core gets attacked again. I think we're okay for now since my turrets already fried a few demons, but one can never be too safe. Right now, upgrading the living quality of the humans and monsters on Tarus II is our highest priority.

I shake my head at Saul and hand the towel back to Phoebe. "I... I'm getting a second wind. I think I can manage at least one more."

"Please, Your Grace, don't push yourself." Phoebe strokes my back slowly, making me pause before I stand up. Using my magic does more than drain my spiritual energy; it fatigues my body as well — especially when my mana reaches a critical level.

"Hey, Phoebe, if I faint, will you carry me back to my room?"

She blushes. "Well, yes. Of course."

"Will I wake up with you next to me?"

"I... I beg your..." Phoebe's blushing increases dramatically, and she looks away. "...Goodness."

"Kidding, kidding," I say aloud, while thinking to myself, NOT KIDDING!

Saul gestures toward the structure before us. "Thanks to your efforts, we've managed to assemble more than enough housing for the current inhabitants on Tarus II. Pushing yourself would be unwise."

I nod. "Yeah, but I'm not building structures purely for the people, but also to find out my limits."

Saul's a hard worker. We don't chat often, but I know plenty about him. He was a retainer under King Solomon, the Minister of Construction. He helped build many fabulous and practical structures for his king. From what little I know of Solomon, he was a man who loved beauty and lavishness in all its forms. Gold, gems, architecture, women... the guy was like a medieval-era pimp.

However, when it comes to expensive tastes, Saul is the exact opposite of his former king. He wears drab, grey robes with little to no extra flourishes of color. He usually walks around in a slump, as if dealing with some ancient curse of boredom... or perhaps he's just shy. It's hard to tell.

Pulling myself up, I aim my mind at the next patch of land, one marked by a square drawn in the dirt. Thanks to the wind blowing, the environment around me is much sharper than usual.

"Build!"

My mind rapidly fills in the walls, plumbing, electrical infrastructure, and thousands of other major and minor details as I load the preset template saved on the Crown of Solomon into my mind. Another massive sphere of energy surges from my body as a ten-story building appears in midair one inch above the ground, and whumps into the dirt, shaking the land.

The trembling ground knocks me off-balance, and I fall over, gasping for breath. Everything seizes up for a moment until I regain control of my motor functions.

Eight. I can summon eight of those ten-story buildings. The more complex I make them, the more mana they require. The materials inside don't matter. I can form the structures out of gold, steel, wood, or any other element, but the details involved in their construction are what require the most energy, as well as the overall size of anything I build. I could make a city of gold if I wanted.

Phoebe picks my head up and rests it in her lap, dabbing my forehead with the cloth. "You've done enough today. These houses are beyond anything you've done before, and you're struggling more and more each time."

I can't reply. My throat burns with pain as the cool cloth soothes my aching body. Using spiritual energy, or mana, is not the same as exercising a muscle. I created seven buildings yesterday, and seven the day before. It wasn't any easier today. I only managed the eighth today after forcing the energy out.

Oh god. I feel a stupor coming on. It's so hot outside...

"Fuh... fuh... Phoebe... indoors. Hot."

Despite the cloth on my face, I can see everything around me because of my spherical vision. Phoebe's eyes widen, and she nods. "Of course! Saul, grab the stretcher! Let's get him indoors at once!"

I close my eyes and exhale, as delirium takes me.

"Blurgh..." I try to speak, but what comes out isn't English.

"Oh, the King has awoken! Nurses!" Saul's voice greets me as my spherical vision comes into focus. Unlike my eyes, my Spherical Vision is always active. It sometimes causes strange hallucinations and mirages while I dream.

Usually.

I don't remember falling asleep this time, nor dreaming.

Two women and a man walk over to me, likely the nurses and the doctor. The doctor, a Harpie, presses a feathered claw against my chest. She closes her eyes for a moment as the two nurses walk to each side of the bed. "Heartbeat normal. Chrrr-eck his pulse and temperature." Her beak clicks together as she speaks.

"Yes, doctor," the male nurse replies. He pulls out a device of my creation, a small temperature-sensing pad I made a few days ago to improve medical operations around the city, and presses it against my arm. Within seconds, it beeps, and he pulls it away. "0.3 degrees cooler than ideal, but otherwise nominal."

"Jason? Can you hear me?" The doctor waves her hand in front of my face.

"Y-yeah. Chest hurts."

She stares at my face for a few moments. "Thank heavens. You've been unconscious for three days. You were running a temperature six degrees above normal until an hour ago. I'm surprised you've recovered so suddenly."

"Three days?! Whoa."

Saul shifts past the nurses to the door. "Miss Berthold's been worried sick. I forced her to leave and said I'd keep watch. Hopefully, she rested. I'll let her know you're awake."

The bearded man shuffles out of the room, and the doctor chirps at each of her assistants. "John, you owe me twenty pieces."

I chuckle. "What, you bet I wouldn't make it?"

He shakes his head. "Of course not, Your Majesty. I simply bet the doctor you'd be comatose for a month. You woke up far sooner than we expected."

I start to lean up in bed, but my back pops painfully, so I slump back down. "Ohh, man. Why does my body hurt so much? I've felt worse before... but this is still pretty bad."

The doctor nods at the female nurse, and she scampers away, returning a moment later to hand a pad of paper to the feathered physician. "I have some notes here. A few of our more magically inclined citizens have offered an explanation for your condition. Using as much of your energy as you did caused you to dip into your internal life force. Had you continued casting a spell, you would have killed yourself."

A long moment passes. "Oh."

The feathered doctor squints at my face for a moment. "You're new to using magic, aren't you?"

"I've only had it for a few months."

"You should seek a tutor, then, before you kill yourself. Your energy levels have returned to normal, but I'd rather not see you in my office under the same circumstances again."

"A magic tutor? Those exist?"

She shakes her head. "No. Most beings are born with the intellect to understand how to use magic. Perhaps as a human, you lack the instincts bred into monsters and demons. However, someone who knows magic well might be able to assist you."

"Alright, I'll do that. Thanks, doc."

She nods courteously and gestures to the other two. "Let the king rest for now. I'm certain Miss Berthold will breathlessly race around that corner in a few minutes."

Both of the nurses chuckle, though I'm not entirely sure why.

They leave me alone with my thoughts, and I turn my head to stare out the window. I can't see anything, but the warmth of the sun on my face makes me drowsy. It was midday when I fell unconscious, and three days have already passed. It appears to be morning. I hope Phoebe didn't lose too much sleep over me.

Minutes pass, and I yawn. I've slept enough. "Heal."

With my energy fully restored, my body heals up dozens of torn ligaments, and I rub my head, realizing the damn crown is still on. When I pull it off, there's a circular indent going around my skull, and a slight rash as well. I quickly heal those and stick the crown back in my storage before swinging my legs out of bed.

The cold, tiled hospital floor jars me awake. I reach to my left and find a box full of the things I was wearing when I passed out, including my lightsaber. Phoebe must have left it there, knowing the left side of my bed is where I usually stash my stuff.

A minute passes. I smile. I can already 'see' Phoebe entering the building a floor below me and running up the stairs. The emotions on her face are a mixture of anguish, joy, and... anger.

Uh-oh.

She screeches to a stop in the doorway and pauses for two seconds, taking in my upright, perfectly healthy form.

"Uh, hi, Phoebe. I'm awake!"

WHAM.

The terrifying tiny white-haired woman delivers a bone-crushing punch right to my chin, knocking me to the ground. I land on my ass with a painful whump.

"Gurk!"

"I hope that hurt!" Phoebe yells while rubbing her fist. She looms over me and begins yelling frantically. "I thought you were going to die! Do you have any idea how worried I was?! I couldn't sleep! I didn't eat for two days! I'll never forgive you! Ass!"

I try not to let her see a tear of pain slide down my cheek. "S-sahhree." After a moment, I cough out under my breath, "Heal." My jaw fixes itself, but the phantom pain persists for a few moments. Phoebe's fist is like a ball of iron.

Phoebe stands over me for a few moments breathing like an angered bull before quickly clambering to her knees and hugging me. "I'm sorry, Your Grace! I shouldn't have hit you! That was very unladylike of me! I just-"

"Don't worry about it, Phoebe," I say, as I embrace her back. "I shouldn't have pushed myself so hard. You deserve the apology, not me."

After a few moments, Phoebe pulls away and looks into my eyes before quickly swiping a few hairs out of her face. "I'm glad you're awake. Don't screw around with your magic. You almost killed yourself."

"Yeah, I heard. I won't do it again. Promise."

She sighs. "While you were out, I received a call from Neil."

"A call?"

Not long ago, I installed hard-wired telephones at the warp-gate. They link to each of the main buildings and are designed to be as simple to use as possible. Many of the humans here are illiterate and unable to understand mechanical devices, but we'll construct schools soon to remedy that. A few buttons hardcoded to each building allow someone to pop through the gate, phone in any pertinent information, and dart back to the Core.

I tried hard-wiring straight through the portal, but electrical signals die when they pass through the 'Quantum Zone,' as the Core technicians call it. Besides that, if we ever swap the portal from Tarus II and point it elsewhere, we'll slice the cable apart, and that could cause a bunch of anomalies for the particles trapped in limbo.

Phoebe helps me to my feet. "Yes. Neil scanned hundreds of planets over the last week, and one world was vastly different from the database entries. Something happened in the last few months that reduced its ecology to levels they could no longer detect. A single human male dressed in peasant clothes stumbled through the gate within seconds of it opening..."

She trails off, and a haunted look appears in her eyes. "Jason. The man said that his world was under attack. A human female was devouring all the life on the planet. That man hadn't eaten in two weeks. He was petrified!"

"Amelia," I mutter unconsciously. "Did he say anything else?"

"No. I knew it had to be Amelia and told Neil not to send anyone there. It's too dangerous. We're going to seal the world off and warn the demons not to let her leave. The human population was over a million, and they're all dead."

"A million people?! She killed that many?!"

My head screams in pain, and I stumble back against the hospital bed. I remember when I found Hoarhiim's orb... Amelia was chasing two children. Her body was drenched in blood. That- that couldn't...

"I need to speak to the man. Where is he?"

Phoebe raises an eyebrow. "The one from the dead world? He's here, I believe. His body is in a vegetative state. We gave him food and water, but something in our air must have poisoned him, because he fell ill after a few hours. Doctors estimate he won't live for much-"

"Where is he? What room?!"

Seeing the concern in my eyes, Phoebe nods. "Follow me."

Minutes later, we arrive in a room where a thin, bony man lies in a hospital bed. An air pump sits beside him, pushing oxygen through a mask into his lungs.

"His name is Roland," Phoebe whispers. "Can you heal him?"

"I have yet to see Wordsmithing disappoint," I say, though I don't mention my failed attempt to heal my eyes.

"Heal."

My Wordsmithing sends a small bit of magic from my mana into the sickly man on the bed. A moment passes, and he gasps for air.

"Huhhh, hnugh!" Roland raises a hand into the air and swats at something unseen before jerking his eyes open and sitting upright. His face mask catches on something and yanks his head away from Phoebe and me. The moment would be humorous under different circumstances, but the terror on his face makes my heart skip a beat.

Roland scrabbles at the strange device attached to his face and yanks it off with a look of terror, as though it were a monster hell-bent on sucking the organs out of his body. Jerking his head around, Roland spots us and yelps in fear. "Hwah! By the forefathers! Who are you?!" He gazes at my face and jerks in fright. "Those eyes! Y-you must be..."

Phoebe pushes past me and rests her hand on his shoulder. "Roland? Is that your name? I'm Phoebe, a friend."

Roland turns to face Phoebe, and, judging by his expression, he can't take his eyes off her. "Fee-bee? I... who...? Where?"

"You're in a healing chamber. It's a place of great magic," Phoebe says, as she gently pushes him back in the bed. "You were very, very sick."

Her soothing voice makes him nod. He offers no resistance as she gently presses him back against the pillow.

"So, I am not dead? I have not joined the forefathers?"

"Nay, you are quite alive." Phoebe glances back at me before returning her gaze to Roland. "But you might be the only one left."

He swallows as memories pour onto his face. The temperature rises in his chest as his heart pumps more vigorously.

A minute passes as Roland slows his breathing.

"That's right. The demoness. She appeared three months ago." Roland stares vacantly at Phoebe for a moment before looking away. "My wife and children lived in the wealthiest city, the one closest to the Forbidden Mountain. When the reports first came in about the disappearance of an entire village, our Baron sent out several scouts to investigate."

Phoebe slowly sits down on the bed and holds Roland's hand, rubbing the top of it softly. "I see. Can you tell us what happened?"

He nods.

"Three months ago..."

"Roland. I have terrible news." The Baron, Sir McKellan, bows his head as he leans on his tall walking staff. His greying beard and sagging skin betray his encroaching old age. Soon, his son will take the lead in managing the kingdom.

"What is it, my liege?"

The Baron coughs. "As you know, I sent out a dozen scouts a fortnight ago, but only ten returned this morning. The other two are presumed dead."

"Dead?" A chill goes down my back. "How could- those were trained warriors! The two-rider system ensures that at least one should-"

"Neither returned." Sir McKellan raises a hand to silence me. "Of those who did, four reported a disturbing rumor. There is a demoness taking the form of a fair maiden, slaughtering all before her. Many villages have begun evacuating, fearing her attack. I am dispatching a thousand of our finest, but..."

"If she is a demon, then we should look away."

The Baron nods at my observation. "Correct. If we incur the demons' wrath, their culling will be merciless."

"But 'tis not the Year of Sacrifice!" I gesture to a wall listing the seasons. "The next generation is when we must pay the toll. Why would they attack now?"

"You read my mind, Sir Roland." The Baron chuckles. "Heh... but if the rumors we've gathered are true, 'tis but one demon slaughtering our people. Perhaps she is an aberration. Not since the time of the ancestors has such an event happened. This evil demoness kills indiscriminately. The feeble, the sickly, the healthy, even the women and children too."

I gaze out the window at the waning daylight. The demons know that killing our women will slow our birthrates. Since time immemorial, the pact we agreed was to send brave warriors, picked by raffle, to die at the hands of the demons. Only if we willingly gave our able-bodied men would they spare our villages.

If they kill our women, then our birthrates will decline, which will mean fewer offerings for the Year of Sacrifice!

"My liege, if she is an aberration, I should travel to the Forbidden Mountain. If I activate the Sacred Arch, perhaps the Gods will save us. We've never failed at giving them our best and brightest! T-they may find favor if..." I trail off as the Baron looks away.

"No, Roland. The Forbidden Mountain is a holy site. Desecrating it would bring the wrath of the gods upon us, not their saving grace. Only if extinction is at our doorstep are we ever to go there. Have faith in our warriors. She is but a single creature. If we kill her quietly, we can bury her body."

A lump forms in my throat. "What if she is an archdemon?"

The Baron smiles, but sadness is all I see. "If they have turned against us, then we haven't a chance anyway. Not even the Gods could save us."

I meet the Baron's gaze evenly. "Blasphemy."

"You are still young, Roland. As the second in line to the throne, I can only hope that you never have to rule. I've seen a great many horrors and lived through several Years of Sacrifice. Many men have knelt at my feet before marching off to give their lives in service of their people."

The Baron turns away and paces to a window. "Let us pray together, young one. Perhaps the Gods will hear our invocations and put down the demoness."

I walk over to stand beside Sir McKellan. "As you will, my liege."

Two months later.

"Mary! Mary!" I howl into the pouring rain, but the distant screams and blistering winds suck my words away into the void.

"Sir Roland!" A young squire rushes to me. "It's awful! The Temple is burning! A hundred villagers are trapped inside!"

"Forget them! We have to save those who are left! Tell everyone to flee! Scatter! The blasted banshee can't follow us if we spread out!" I point toward the direction of the distant screams. "They're already dead! We can't save them! Alert the remaining cavalry to grab any villagers and flee!"

The teen nods. "Yes, Sir Roland! What about you?"

"Don't worry about me, child. Go!"

He dashes away, leaving me alone. I quickly sprint down the streets toward the screams, each one causing my stomach to churn. Every person who howls in pain goes silent midway. That horrible demon is devouring them whole.

If I hadn't caught a glimpse of the Shrieking Devil with my own eyes, I'd hardly believe it. A woman, perhaps five years younger than I, wearing a blue dress far too small for her figure. Her long black hair waved about in the wind as she tore through a cavalcade of infantry, destroying the outer defenses with ease.

She isn't human, that much is clear.

As the screams grow nearer, I turn down a side-street and freeze. A woman lays on the ground. Her unmoving form might be hard to make out in the rain under normal circumstances, but the white and purple dress she wears...

"M-Mary? Mary!" I drop to my knee and freeze, spotting the dagger in my wife's back. Someone killed her, but it wasn't the Shrieking Devil.

"Bastards. At a time like this... who..."

I can't weep. Everything hurts. I haven't seen my children all day, so I have no choice but to leave them behind. I pray someone saved them.

Rushing past my wife, I wipe the tears from my face with a muddied glove. The stables are just up ahead.

Three horses remain, so I grab the nearest one and unhook it. The panic on all of their faces is palpable. Sorry, but you must stay.. Pray for two riders to mount you, brave steeds.

Hopping atop the animal, I gallop away. The sounds of my countrymen dying to the demoness's unstoppable rampage only fuel my desire.

The Forbidden Mountain! I must go!

To hell with the Baron's orders! He doesn't know what's best for us! I'll not stand idly by and let that blasted monster wipe us all out!

My children... stay alive. Do not meet the same fate as your mother.

Hours pass. My horse gasps for breath, but I push it as hard as possible. "Hah! Hyah! Don't you slack on me! Everything rests on us!"

The forest around me changes in color. Green becomes brown, then shifts to black. Sticks and roots pop and snap under hoof, and the smell of death fills the air.

The Demonic Gas. That's what we've taken to call the blight on our livestock, crops, and plants. All life perishes in the wake of the Shrieking Devil.

The horse finally slows to a stop, its stamina depleted. It gasps for breath and wheezes, so I hop off and pat its back while taking the bit from its mouth. After removing its saddle, I slap its ass and send it off to fend for itself. "You've done well, my friend. I will continue from here."

I've traveled far enough. The edge of the forest is near.

A mountain rises before me. An ancient staircase wraps around it, winding to the top. Legends say that it took Baron Archimedes ten hours to walk the entire path, but I'll have to make better time. My people need me.

I've done it.

Somehow, I can still breathe evenly, but the narrow staircase gave me several frights. The winds buffeted me the whole way up, and several times I thought I would fall hundreds of feet to my death, but fate was merciful.

Before me, at the top of the Forbidden Mountain, lies the Sacred Arch. Standing twenty-feet tall, it towers above me, two curved arms extending upward to form a semi-circle.

Its stairs lead to a platform with a glowing plate resting atop a small pedestal. Cautiously, I climb the steps, my heart pounding in my throat. The glowing plate seems to call to me. Even with the winds slowing down at the top of the mountain, the bright light it gives off, along with strange letters I've never seen before, tell me it is a weapon of unimaginable power.

A minute passes as I stare at it. I can't read its letters. When I finally gather the nerve, I gently tap the bright tablet, and the letters and colors change. The magical light shifts as more characters appear.

What... what do they mean?! Is this a weapon that only the ancient Gods can understand?!

Calm down, Roland. When you touch it, it responds. Everyone in the village is dead by now, so you're all alone. The worst that can happen is the gods may kill you, but you've little else to live for.

I press one of the words on the screen, and it changes again. I haven't the faintest clue what I'm doing.

Minutes pass. I press more and more changing words, but nothing happens. It defies the greatest magic I've ever seen. How can the tablet glow and change its form so fluidly? Am I doing anything at all?

An hour later, I slump to the ground.

I failed.

The Forbidden Mountain is worthless. There's no weapon here, no beacon to summon the gods, just a glowing tablet that changes into pretty colors when you press on it.

Worthless.

My eyes lower to the forest, and I stare where my village once stood. I can't make it out through the fog and rain, let alone the smoke from raging fires, but that must be where it is.

Mary... Klein... Igor... my wife and children. Taken from me not by the Shrieking Devil, but by the hands of other humans.

"Stupid! PATHETIC!" I leap to my feet and pound the glowing tablet with my fists. "Damn the gods! Curse the demons! To Hell with humans!! Why couldn't you leave us in peace?! We never once attacked you! We never hurt you! Vile monsters, all of you!"

The glowing tablet shakes and changes as I pound it over and over. "Magic! Hogwash! Invented by tricksters and deceivers to fool the common man!"

A sudden noise erupts all around me.

WOOOO. WOOOO.

I leap backward in fright.

The tablet shifts again, and hundreds of letters and numbers begin scrolling across its surface. A voice speaks from all around me.

"BAATHUN ATHSU'ASAG. AFTA'S. SUGNAFT S'ATHA UNTHUNLFTASA. SANGUNG AFTFT-FTANG GUTS'ATT TUGNAFT NUGH."

I shiver and tremble in terror as the voice continues speaking in a language I've never heard. The gods! Have they heard my plea?!

A minute passes as the voice continues speaking.

"SHUT GHU'FTG UT THIA"ANSFTX GATUGNASAG A GHIAA'ANSUNA CTHUNA. GU NUS ASSANLS SU NAKA THUNSATHS. GU NUS UNUSUASA SHA GHA'LGASA L'USUTHUFT."

Finally, the horrible voice goes silent. I fall to my knees and prostrate myself. "Great gods! Please! I beg of thee! I am but a humble servant! My apostasy — please forgive it! I meant no insult!"

The voice does not respond.

Raising my head, I stare at the two metal arms extended into the air.

Have I accomplished something? Will the gods arrive to save my people? Or have I doomed whoever remains with my words of heresy?

Fool. I am a fool.

Forgive me, Baron McKellan. If I had only pressured you sooner, I could have tried this before it was too late.

Now I must wait.

Roland rubs his throat and looks away from Phoebe and I. "And so I did. For two weeks, I lay atop the plateau, waiting for a savior. None appeared."

Phoebe bows her head. "When our soldiers found you, you were delirious and incoherent. Starved, too. I'm surprised you survived atop a mountain for so long."

The thin, gangly man doesn't smile. "Force of will, beauteous one. I needed to stay alive as long as possible if only to hold onto hope. I lived off rainwater for several days, knowing there was neither game to hunt nor fruits to eat below." Roland wipes his eyes. "I know not from what land you hail, only that you are too late. My village was on the verge of extinction when I climbed the mountain, let alone two weeks later."

A moment passes, and Phoebe pulls away from Roland to look at me. "Neil ran several scans of the planet. Its fauna and flora readings were inconclusive."

I've heard enough. I know what Roland saw, or who, rather. Amelia. Without a doubt, she is the one who terrorized his world.

But... devouring humans whole? Freakish. Impossible. How could she do it, even with magic? It isn't physically possible.

Or maybe I'm naive. Amelia nearly killed me. She murdered those monsters in the vision Hoarhiim showed me, and I saw her chasing after children with a ravenous look on her face. Amelia isn't an ally of good. She hates Heroes, and I'm a Hero. She is my enemy.

Phoebe brushes back a hair. "Um, Roland, you keep mentioning our land... I don't know how to explain where you are in a way you'll understand, so after you recover, we'll show you around. Is that acceptable?"

He nods. "Indeed. Your graciousness is boundless. I have merely imposed upon you, and I thank you for bringing me back from death. If possible, I should like to repay you for your kindness." He pauses before looking away, a dark expression on his face. "Alas, no matter how far you've taken me, it matters not. The Shrieking Devil will come. Her hunger knows no limits. I fear for your safety."

While Phoebe doesn't know how to explain where he is, I decide to try my luck. Dropping to one knee, I point to my glowing eyes. "Roland, you have nothing to fear. As you may have guessed, I am one of the Gods."

Roland smiles as if my sentence was a perfectly natural thing to say. "Aye... I suspected as much."

Using my telekinesis, I levitate Hoarhiim's brilliantly glowing orb from my belt pocket. The light makes Roland wince, and he shields his eyes.

"I am an agent of justice. I swear to you that the Shrieking Devil will not go unpunished. What she has done to your people is reprehensible."

Roland stares at me, awe on his face. "Of- of course! I believe in you, Sir... err, Mister..."

He trails off and looks away. "I don't know your names."

Oops.

So much for looking cool.

Part 027: The Overlords, Power Overwhelming

"Oh, most splendid, Your Holiness!" Roland gawks as we exit the hospital. The automatic opening glass doors once appeared as wizardry to him, but he's already moved onto bigger things. "By the Forefathers! What are those giant square boxes?!"

Roland points across the street, and I chuckle. "Those are buildings, just like the hospital. Take a look behind you."

When Roland turns around and grasps the scale of the twenty-story hospital, his eyes bulge. "By the Forefathers!"

He says that a lot.

Phoebe quickly covers up her mouth to hide a smile. She's always careful to make sure it doesn't seem like she's mocking Roland. "Oh, Your Grace, don't you suppose we should take mister Roland to the Core? We need to find out what the situation is on his homeworld."

Roland doesn't register her words for a few moments. Instead, he gawks at a Salamander racing past with a Minotaur riding atop it. While it's an occurrence I've grown used to seeing, Roland isn't accustomed to all the different species of monsters here on Tarus II. We convinced him that this planet is one where Gods and Humans intermingle, which seemed reasonable enough to satisfy his questions, but even the Harpy doctor frightened him at first. He thought she was a human, one cursed with feathers and a beak.

When Roland finally comprehends Phoebe's words, he nods quickly. "Oh, oh yes, of course. I should very much like to save anyone from my village, if possible, but..." He trails off as the wonder and excitement drain from his face.

I want to know what happened, but they're probably all dead, his body language says. It doesn't matter now, anyway. Nothing but heartache awaits.

Phoebe notices his gloom and doom and winks at me. A moment later, she steps out to the street and whistles. A small goblin comes running up breathlessly from two blocks away, and when he arrives, he pulls out a pen and pad of paper. "Yes! Ready help you!"

She whispers something in his ear, and the short little monster grunts and jots down a note. "Of course! Be back soon!"

After the lean-mean-green-bean dashes away, Phoebe walks back over, and I raise a questioning eyebrow. "What was that about?"

"You'll see."

We continue to stand out near the sidewalk until a few minutes later, when a rumbling in the distance catches my ear. I immediately recognize it, as does Phoebe, but it isn't until the sound becomes louder that it grabs Roland's attention. He glances fearfully to the rear of the hospital. "What is that?"

Neither of us answers, and after a few more seconds, the thing making the noise sputters into view. It's the local bus, one of the things I built to speed up transit around the city, though this one's route reaches as far as the warp-gate.

Roland's eyes swell into saucers as the wheeled metallic rectangle takes a hard corner and turns around the lane, heading toward us. Roland grabs for the sword at his side, only to awkwardly realize we didn't give him one, so he instead ducks behind me. "Your Holiness! What is that?!"

"It's a bus, friend. Think of it like a horse made of metal. It will take us to the Core."

He nods, but the distrust on his face is palpable. "It sounds like an angry lion!"

Phoebe glares at me. "Hmph."

The bus slows to a stop in front of us, and the doors slide open to reveal one of the few Kobolds that lives on Tarus II. Most of them stay in the Labyrinth, but a few friendlies hang out here. "Gargh! Hop on whenever yuh pleashe, mishter King, shir!"

Phoebe climbs the stairs and walks inside, but Roland hesitates. "Y-you expect me to enter the mouth of this beast?!"

I nod and slap the metal exterior with my hand. "This bad boy can fit so many passengers. Treat it like a huge tool. It isn't alive at all. Come on, now; you've got a God with you! What do you think could hurt someone as powerful as me?"

Roland nods, even as his eyes rove the bus. "I-it is as you say, Your Holiness."

He cautiously touches the first step, then starts to enter, but the Kobold grins at him, baring its teeth. "Take yer time! 'Aven't got uh thing tuh worry about with me ash yur driver, mishter hooman!"

Roland hesitates when he sees the vicious snarling mouth of the kobold, but I nudge him forward. "He won't bite, and if he does, I'll knock him out."

Minutes later, the bus putters down the streets toward a recently constructed bridge that divides each side of the canyon. However, the kobold driver spins us around and takes us toward a smooth four-lane path meant for vehicles. Right now, the only things on the street are buses and pedestrians, but I figure that given enough time, we may have dozens or even hundreds of cars on the road.

The Crown of Solomon is a wondrous item. Other than the limits of my Wordsmithing, I can create devices of infinite intricacy and push Tarus II's technology lightyears ahead in exponential jumps. When we started, this planet was scarcely at the Medieval level, and now it's rapidly becoming Industrial.

Still, Wordsmithing isn't the be-all, end-all I sometimes imagine it to be. There's a limit to how much I can create, thanks to my internal magic capacity. I have to think of a way to increase my limiter, or the Space Age may never happen.

Roland, sitting across the aisle from Phoebe and me, stares outside as we pass varying monsters and humans of all different breeds and colors. "Your Holiness, forgive my limited imagination, but how is it that all these disparate people can work together when they are so different from one another? Do you not have to deal with infighting, greed, or cruelty?"

I shake my head. "In the world I came from, that was a daily struggle. However, monsters do not judge each other based on appearance, but on their merits. Humans, likewise, having to live among monsters, have forced themselves to focus less on appearances and more on the individual."

My answer satisfies Roland, but as he looks away, a thought swells in my mind. While that might be the case now, I can't say it will stay that way forever. I can only hope everyone continues to work together.

An adage appears in my mind as the treeline approaches. Humanity always requires an adversary. We hunger for an enemy and will invent one if we must. If none can be created or found, then we will fade into nothingness.

"What are you thinking about?" Phoebe asks. "Your expression is graver than usual."

The bus illuminates the forest around us with waves of sound, allowing me to take in all of the sights at once. "Oh, you know. Dumb, boring stuff."

Twenty minutes later, we arrive at our destination.

As he exits the bus, Roland yells out in surprise. "By the Forefathers! Another Sacred Arch!" He points at the warp-gate and hops up and down excitedly. "And look, monsters and humans are moving about inside!"

I nod. "The Warp-Gate allows us to travel great distances in an instant. This one leads to what we call 'The Core,' which will have another gate that takes us back to your world."

Roland seems to be growing accustomed to unfamiliar technology and things he hasn't seen before. If I had to guess, he must be filling in blank spots in his experience with an idea like, 'Oh yes, that's just more strange magic!'

This time, he surprises me by quickly stepping through the portal before Phoebe and I. His eagerness to see his homeworld proves infectious. Once she and I step through, however, I smirk when we arrive on the other side to find him hunched over, moaning in pain and rubbing his ears. The air-pressure change can be quite a shock to the uninitiated.

I leave Roland with Phoebe and jog down to the arena below, past rows of computer terminals. Various monsters point me this way and that until I spot Neil, identifying him by the odd 18th-century hat he likes to wear.

"Neil, long time no see."

He ignores me for a moment and mutters to the goblin sitting at the terminal in front of him, "No, not that way. You have to calculate the inverse. Try it again, but make sure you apply the parameters from B-

24L."

The goblin nods and starts poking at the screen again. Neil lifts his head to look at me. "Ah, My Liege! A pleasure to see you up and moving! I heard you overexerted yourself and were undergoing bed rest."

I rub the back of my head sheepishly. "I was in a coma for three days."

Neil's face pales. "What?! Your condition was that serious?"

"Yeah, but no worries, I learned the hard way that my magic has limitations. I can't use it too much, and it doesn't increase the more I do. Unfortunate."

Neil wipes his face. "Yes... yes, I see. Well, it's good that you're back. I suppose you want me to brief you on what's occurred over the past few days?"

I shake my head. "Nah, you've got that covered pretty well. If you needed me, I'd know. I came here because I'm curious about Roland's world. You know, the fellow who was babbling incoherently."

"Oh." Neil's expression darkens. "We conducted several scans, but all results for life turned up inconclusive. Electrical storms plague the planet, and they aren't naturally occurring. I thought it best to disable our connection until you returned."

"Smart idea," I mutter. "Alright. Change one of the portals to that planet. Err, what's it called, again?"

He shrugs. "It's in the Espurn system, Espurn 03. Since it's the only habitable world, I decided to call it Espurn Prime."

"Works for me. Get a connection running. I'll grab Roland."

I turn and walk away, and as I head over to Roland, I notice him and Phoebe talking to Kar and Makoto Ueda. Makoto nods politely and rubs his hands together. "-course, I wouldn't blame you in the slightest, Roland-san. Hmm. It seems possible to me that your boys escaped, though we cannot say for certain. Mister Adams is the one who runs the Core, so he will know more about your world than I ever could."

Kar grunts. "Hurgh. We will do all in our power to help you find your family, Flappy Fish." He notices me walking over. "Turtle! White-hair tells me that you were in a coma! How are you feeling now?"

"Fine, about as good as always. I overexerted myself using too much magic. It turns out I could die if I go overboard."

"Watch yourself, and stride forward with great caution, Hiro-sama." Makoto bows slightly. "Magic is not something to trifle with."

"Oh, you know a thing or two about it?"

He nods. "Of course, as does Mister Adams, Miss Berthold, and all of the humans who lived under Mistress Bahamut's influence. Miss Berthold, for example, can sense the presence of magic nearby."

I glance at Phoebe. "You can?"

She shrugs and looks at Makoto. "I can?"

"Yes, yes, of course! You've done it before but just haven't realized it. Putting your life on the line under His Majesty, King Arthur, would surely have strengthened your spiritual connection to new heights. Bahamut's power increased it further." Makoto gently touches his forehead. "Should you ever wish to explore your inner wells of spirituality, seek me out."

I chuckle. "Funny you mention that. The doctor recommended I seek out a magic tutor. The universe is full of coincidences."

"Very few coincidences, most likely fate," Makoto replies with a sagely twinkle in his eye.

The sound of footsteps behind me makes me turn my attention to Neil as he walks over. "Uh, My Liege... a moment of your time?"

I excuse myself and sigh, walking back to Neil. "That was fast. I expected it'd take you a few minutes to open the gate."

Despite my pleasant smile, Neil doesn't return the expression. "L-listen... err... about... about that world... there's a problem."

"A problem? Like what?"

Neil gestures to the computer screen. "Take a look."

I allow a few seconds to pass before replying, "Man, you know I can't read computer screens... right?"

The screams of pain around me cause my stomach to clench. I pace through the darkened Labyrinthian hallways, and Bael stomps along behind me.

"Diablo, where'd they stick him?" Bael asks.

"The blood pits. It will take months to heal his wounds unless Belial shows up." I swallow hard as the smell of healing salts and rotten flesh fills the air.

The healing chambers are a vile place. The few demons capable of restoring life congregate nearby, but demonic magic is meant for taking life, not treating it. Broken stone benches and scratches all over the walls tell tales of demons who lashed out in pain and tore apart anything in sight. Blind rage tends to be the trait many of us share.

I stop before the main chamber, one which branches off into dozens of rooms and tunnels, stairs leading up and down, and a pulley system for raising and lowering the wounded through various levels to get them where they're most needed. A female scream pierces the din, and several voices rush to quiet her so that she doesn't disturb the other patients. I can only imagine the suffering she's enduring.

An imp notices me and skitters over. "E-Emperor Diablo! A pleasure to see you, your wickedness! How may I serrrve you today? Nyehehe!"

"Where's the Duke of Steel?"

The imp's sneer vanishes. "Ohh, you're here about him. Hooo boy. Uhh, I'll get Hellga."

The imp skitters off to grab the magistrate of the Primary Chamber, a crotchety old demon as old as Agares. Her ire is something few wish to draw, in case they ever get injured and end up under her care. While she will heal anyone's wounds without bias... her interest in treating a patient's injuries gently will depend on how they've sweet-talked her over the years.

Bael sneaks over to one of the rooms where a Skarnskin drapes over the entrance, but before he can sneak a peek at whoever's inside, I hiss at him. "Bael! Mind your manners! It's dishonorable to gaze upon a demon at their weakest!"

The Duke of Pain bows his head sheepishly. "Oh. Uh. Sorry." He lumbers back over to me, scratching his ass all the whole time. "It's funny to startle them, though."

"One of these days you'll probably end up in here. Show respect to others so they will respect you." I wave my hand at him flippantly. "Nobody likes a dunce."

Bael is unconvinced. "I doubt there's anyone left in the universe that could hurt this perfect body! Check me out! Wargh! Raww!" He pounds his chest to show off his incredible strength, so I infuse a decent amount of magic into my hand.

"There are Emperors above you, idiot." Saying this, I slap my palm into his chest and bash him against the floor, driving the wind out of his body.

"Kuhk!" He waves to swat my hand away, but I've already pulled back. Watching him writhe on the floor makes me smile for a moment, taking my mind off the sorrow I feel. "Buh-bastard! I wasn't prepared! Tuh-tricked me!!"

"No matter how strong you are, having zero magic means I'll always defeat you. Keep that in mind next time you decide to embarrass me in public."

I ignore the oaf rolling about on the ground. The sound of clacking platform shoes catches my ear. Up ahead, the old bat appears from around the corner, her bedraggled grey hair and toothless scowl displaying her annoyance openly for all to see.

"Ah, beautiful Hellga, it's been a while."

She glares at me. "Flattery will get you nowhere. Whaddya want? I was busy cleaning the Skarn droppings out of a kobold's insides. Damned fool thought they were food pellets!"

My lip curls up slightly. "That's... wonderful. I need to see Barbatos. Can you direct me to his blood pit?"

Her disgust vanishes. Melancholy replaces it. "Ah, him. So that's why the little skeever kept pestering me. Follow me."

Hellga's change in attitude stresses me out. Barbatos must be in critical condition.

Bael staggers into place behind me, still clutching his chest. He doesn't say anything, but I feel his glare burning the back of my head.

It takes us twenty minutes to navigate the maze of chambers and rooms, mostly because of Hellga. She doesn't handle stairs as well as she used to, and she frequently stops to check on patients as we walk. When I ask if we can get a move on, she glares at me. "It ain't like Barbatos will be going anywhere for a long time, boyo."

Finally, we arrive at the Blood Pits. So-named because of the mass of human blood poured into hollowed out pits in the ground, they're the best healing that demons have access to, barring someone of Belial's healing talents. She's an extreme rarity, given she can treat nearly any wound with magic. Her power borders on the Angelic, since it was a standard ability that most Angels and Gods used to possess.

Until we killed them all, that is.

Hellga pulls a Skarnskin away from the door. "Keep it short. Don't bother talking. He's incoherent."

When I enter, my foot clumsily bumps a large, steel boot. The clanking it creates makes me flinch, and then I spot all the other armor pieces lying around the room: a shinguard, helmet, gauntlets, and all manner of other demonstone armor designed to absorb damage.

Bael pauses behind me and leans down. "Boss."

I turn back to see what he's pointing out. It's Barbatos's chestplate. There's a fist-sized hole torn straight through its middle.

"Seven Hells."

Continuing forth, I arrive in the pit chamber, where the smell of iron-rich blood makes my tongue salivate. Human souls power demons, while their blood heals us. A beautiful, symbiotic relationship.

The sound of choked breathing catches my attention. I look down and spot Barbatos lying in the blood, most of his body except for his head submerged. Hundreds of scratches and scars line his face, and based on a small bit of his shoulder poking up through the blood; it's in similar condition.

Bael whistles quietly. "So that's what the harlot did to him. He looks like shit."

I shake my head. "Those are all old scars. He suffered those when he transformed into a Duke."

I remember when we first found him. During the War in Heaven, the deadliest extinction event in demon history, the little fool found a dying archangel and devoured her body. Her holy energy caused him endless suffering over the millennia. He's lucky he survived.

Or maybe he isn't. He doesn't complain anymore, but it took several hundred years before he could walk without assistance. He suffers every moment of every day — the most pitiful of all demons.

A hiss from the other side of the room makes me flinch. I look up to see Mephisto peeking at us from one of the sleeping cubbies. "Let Barbatosss sssleep. Come over here and keep your voicesss down."

I nod. Bael and I walk over to the Duke of Mist, who pulls a skin across the entry to muffle our voices somewhat. "I didn't expect Barbatos to end up this mangled. You fought the Black Witch?"

Mephisto, apparently unharmed, bows his head. "Yesss. Twasss a battle of the agesss. Asss you may know, Agaresss expired."

I swallow hard. "Yes. I never thought I'd see the day when the old man would meet the ancient demons. I can scarcely believe it."

"It wasss a warrior'sss death." Mephisto slinks off the bed and stands to face Bael and me. "Barbatosss held on asss long asss posssible. He usssed every one of his powersss but couldn't ssstop her."

"I heard as much," Bael mutters. He glances at me. "Tell him."

"We notified the Overlords, Mephisto. That dead rock exists no more."

Mephisto's eyes widen. "They dessstroyed the planet? What about Agaresss body?"

"We couldn't recover him. I sealed the planet and made sure the Black Witch couldn't escape. Even if she survived its destruction, she wouldn't be a threat anymore. Let her freeze in the vacuum of space forever for all I care. A fitting end."

Mephisto closes his eyes and looks away. "Agaresss wasss one of our bessst Dukesss. I will sssleep well knowing he wasss put to ressst honorably."

"It's what he'd have wanted," I whisper. "I feel awful for Beelzebub. I haven't told him what happened, yet."

Bael lightly slaps his chest and looks away, a sign of grief. "He's a sturdy lad. I know he'll stand firm for his mentor. Try to tell him softly, Diablo."

Sighing, I pull back the flap to gaze at Barbatos. "We've all lost someone dear. Let us hope we don't count a second brother among the fallen."

Part 028: A Million Voices Cry Out In Terror

"What do you mean?! It's a planet! How do you lose a friggin' planet?" I rest my hands on my hips, nudging my lightsaber and Hoarhiim's orb in the process. "I thought you guys had a constant tracker on its position!"

Neil tosses his hands in the air. "I don't know what to say. We shut down the gate after recovering that Roland fellow since we didn't want Amelia slipping through the gate somehow. Now we can't reconnect."

The goblin Neil was helping earlier pokes a button, then raises his hand. "Ooh! Grumbull have idea! Maybe gate was destroyed on other side?"

"Yeah, that's possible." Neil scratches his head. "I don't get it, though. Why would someone destroy the portal? Hell, who could? It must have been Amelia."

"Makes sense, I guess," I reply. "I don't see why she'd trap herself on the planet like that. Can you force open a portal without a gate on the other side?"

Neil shakes his head. "Not a chance. The only way to travel there now is via the services of a Warper, or we could take a spaceship there."

"A spaceship?"

The Frenchman scratches his chin. "Yes, but we don't have technology like that. Even if we did, the galaxy is massive. I don't know where any of these planets are in relation to one another."

An unnerving thought enters my mind. "Say, uh, Neil... I've been wondering, what exactly is the Labyrinth? Is it a cube floating in space?"

His face contorts into several expressions as he looks at me, then the goblin, then back to me again. "I haven't the faintest clue. I believe we exist outside of the Milky Way Galaxy, though."

"What?! Are we in Andromeda, then?"

Someone stomps up behind me. I don't bother turning as I recognize Kar's towering form. "My mother has told me many tales about the universe. The Labyrinth exists in a separate dimension outside of the galaxy, yet we are also within."

Once again, Kar reminds me that his mother exists. "Speaking of which, will you ever take me to chat with Marie?"

The Croco-sphinx sighs. "I do not know, little Turtle. I conversed with my brothers recently. They are pleased that I have assisted you, but not that I am King of all Monsters. Such a title traditionally belongs to the King of a clan, meaning King Ghidorah. Due to the monster hierarchy, I now outrank him. This has caused much friction between my brothers and me.

"Ah, that sounds like it could... cause issues. Haha."

"Indeed," Kar says, before turning away. "Butterfly. Butterfly!"

His voice carries over the room and all around the panels and consoles, so deep is his timbre. A moment later, a tiny flicker of movement in the air approaches us, and I recognize his little fairy assistant, Blinker.

"Heyo! Whatchu want, you big ol' gator?" She flutters down and stumbles onto on his shoulder with a half-drunken thud.

"We require the services of a Warper. Would you be so kind as to conjure one for us?"

I almost forgot about what Neil and I discussed. Good thing Kar reminded me. "Do you think we can use a Warper to get to Espurn Prime without using a gate?"

Blinker hops up to her feet and waves her arms. "Of course! Easy peasy impy squeezy! Just gimme time to work my charm, and I'll find a cutie to make a portal for ya!"

She flutters away, squeaking conspiratorially to herself the whole way, and I turn my attention back to Neil. "Keep checking to see if you can connect. I have some business to deal with."

"As you wish, my liege."

A minute later, Kar and I walk back over to Phoebe, Roland, and Makoto. Roland looks up at me, trepidation in his eyes.

"What is the verdict, Your Holiness?"

"We're having some, ah, technical issues." I shrug slightly as if to say, it can't be helped. "Kar sent one of his assistants off to find help. Sorry for dragging you out here, but there isn't much we can do today."

Roland's shoulders sag. "Ah, that's unfortunate. Still, I've met many interesting Gods here, and seeing all these magical tablets is exciting as well. I am certain you will do your best, Your Holiness."

"Thanks for the vote of confidence," I reply. I turn to Makoto. "I don't have anything better to do right now. How about those spiritual lessons you offered?"

He widens his eyes in surprise. "Already?"

"I mean, you don't have to. We can do it some other time if you like."

Makoto shakes his head quickly. "If it is for your sake, Hiro-sama, then I am always willing to make room on my schedule. Come, let us return to my home. I will discuss the different aspects of spiritual energy with you there."

It takes quite the effort for me not to say, 'aw man, but I just got here...'

Roland decides to stay behind and hang out with the humans and monsters in the Core, so Phoebe and I leave with Makoto. Once we step through the portal, I realize the bus is gone.

Phoebe winks at me. "Your Grace, why not summon an automobile with your magic? I'd like to drive it, if possible."

"Okay. I meant to make you one, anyway."

My flippant announcement catches her off-guard. "Y-you did?"

"Yeah. It's just the model that I wasn't sure about, but I think I've got your tastes pinned down."

Her face twists into incredulity. Model? What does he mean?

As the three of us arrive at the bottom of the warpgate's stairs, I aim my mind at the road. "Vehicle."

Gears appear in my mind, followed by an engine, frame, radio, cigarette lighter, dashboard, seats, and thousands of other pieces involved in making a car. My head trembles slightly from the effort of envisioning the automobile, but the sound of air rushing away from the summoning area and a loud POP follows, and with a THUD my newest creation slams onto the pavement. Ten tons of steel, wood, and plastic hit the ground with tremendous force, startling the nearby spectators.

Makoto stares quizzically. Phoebe gawks with an open mouth. "J-Jason! It's so big! What is it?"

"I got the impression that while you liked the Ferrari, you're more of a big-truck kind of girl. So... I gave you something that can go off-road."

The massive vehicle towers twenty feet in the air, with stairs for easier access to the cabin, three seating rows for passengers, a metal grill in case of a collision, and a reinforced frame. Safety first, after all. I wouldn't want something to happen to Phoebe while she drives. The rollbar ensures that even if the whole thing flips, it should end up back on its wheels.

I gesture toward it. "Here you go. It's called a monster truck."

Phoebe squeezes her hands into fists. "Eeeeh! Oh my god! It's amazing! I can't believe you made this for me!"

"I've been teaching you to drive for a reason, after all. There's no way I can continue to hog all the fun."

She startles me by leaping into my arms and hugging me tightly. "Oh, Jason! Thank you thank you thank youuu!"

Makoto smiles. "Young love is always wonderful."

"M-Miss Berthold! Slow down! That is a VERY big- gwaugh!" Makoto shrieks in fright as Phoebe races her new toy at an obstacle in the road, bouncing us several feet in the air before landing on the ground with all ten tons of raw steel. She laughs maniacally as the reinforced death machine plows through rows of corn in the local farms.

I hold onto my seat with telekinesis, while also grabbing my door for dear life. "S-sweetheart, I think maybe you're going a little too-"

"FASTER!!!" Phoebe jams the accelerator and turns toward a series of small hills and boulders, pushing the truck's suspension to the test. I can almost hear the poor metal box screaming in pain. Makoto and I toss from side-to-side while Phoebe clutches the wheel with all of her strength.

Minutes pass, and eventually, her excitement wears off as we approach the central city. She slows to a stop after climbing the ramp up the canyon and pulls to the side of the road.

Daintily, Phoebe pulls her medium-cropped hair back in a bun and whistles. "That was fun."

I dab the front of my pants to make sure I didn't wet myself. "Yeah. Fun. Right, Makoto?"

The Japanese man nods silently but conceals a look of terror. He melts into his seat; sweat covering every inch of his body.

I've created a monster.

Before she hops out of the truck, Phoebe points to a button beside the steering wheel. "What does this do?"

I swallow and smile, glad for the moment of calm. "Well, uh, you were scared of loud engines originally, so I added a button to silence it. The engine roar is all fake anyway since it uses fusion to power itself."

She nods. "That's very thoughtful of you. I wasn't scared of the Ferrari's noise though, Your Grace, but of the unfamiliar setting you put me in."

"Well, it's there anyway. Nobody wants to hear a loud monster truck driving through town in the middle of the night, right?"

"Certainly!" Phoebe hops out of the truck and slams the door, and squeals a little as she pats it. "This is by far the best present anyone has ever given me!"

"I'm glad you like it," I mutter, while swallowing the bile from my roiling stomach. And here I thought I was a speed demon.

Minutes later, Makoto shakily leads us to his residence. The adrenaline is finally wearing off, and he's mostly back to normal, but the experience in Phoebe's truck will probably make sleep difficult for him tonight.

He lives in Bahamut's former palace, just as Phoebe and I do. Most of the high-rankers live here, though I hear that Saul built a mud hut a mile away on the outskirts of town. He prefers seclusion.

The familiar walls roll past us, and Phoebe loops her arms around mine and smiles up at me. Even if I was a little scared earlier, it was worth it to see her in such a good mood. She deserves a present occasionally after all the time we've spent together. I love her.

I can't wait to get married.

Makoto stops in front of his door and fumbles with his key for a moment, before pulling it open. He steps inside, and immediately I realize something is wrong.

As we step through the doorway, Phoebe's warm smile shifts to an expression of horror. Makoto's room is piled high with trash, dust, filth, and all manner of other garbage. Plates with food crusted on them tell the tale of a lazy bum living in a slum, not a respectable military man who speaks of peace and harmony.

"Mister Makoto...?" Phoebe trails off as she looks around.

Makoto remains oblivious to our concerns. "Ah, let me get a few chairs for us, just give me one moment. Watch your step!"

My foot kicks a bag of half-eaten stale potato chips, sending some of them spilling out all over the floor. The room is so messy that I'm having trouble seeing around and navigating without bumping into anything.

He disappears into the kitchen, and his footsteps light the place up enough that I can tell the mayhem isn't isolated to one or two rooms.

"I never pictured Mister Ueda as this sort of man," Phoebe murmurs.

I pull away from her and use my telekinesis to shove debris toward the walls, so I at least have a clear path to walk. "I figured a spiritual guru enlightened about Shinto principles or whatever would have a clean house. Can't judge a book by its cover, I guess."

Makoto appears from around the corner, a wooden chair in each hand. He sets them down in the living room, though he has to nudge some books and bags of food out of the way. "I will get a seat for myself."

Phoebe and I slump into our chairs while I try to think of a way to mention the mess without offending him. Already I can tell Phoebe is itching to scrub the place from top to bottom.

When he returns, he comes back carrying not just a chair, but a small table as well, perhaps the size of a TV tray. "Would you care for some tea?"

Phoebe and I shake our heads at the same time. "We're fine."

After setting his chair and table down, he leaves and returns with a pot of cold tea and a paper cup, setting them down on the table before easing into his chair. He finally notices the distress on our faces. "Oh, so sorry about home. It is more cluttered than usual."

"Cluttered," I echo. "I, uh, didn't realize you lived like this."

"Hm?" Makoto cocks his head questioningly. "Like what?"

Phoebe grimaces. "Well, the place is a little messy, you know?"

"Oh, certainly. But look on bright side! It bring me closer to nature."

"Nature?" I echo his words a second time, my mind reeling with disbelief. "What about your home reminds you of nature?"

Makoto folds his hands in his lap and sighs. Leaning back, he stares at the ceiling. "Humans, monsters, demons, everyone... we try to rearrange things and be more orderly. Such is way of individual who has attained self-awareness. Nature, however, chaotic and sloppy. Therefore, to be closer to nature, my house chaotic, see?"

Phoebe forces a smile. "That's an... interesting way to describe a mess. I could clean the place up for you..."

"Bah, there is no need." He waves his hand flippantly. "Will just mess it up again anyway. Now then, Hiro-sama, I suppose you have questions for me about magic?"

Despite how miffed Phoebe looks that Makoto just brushed her criticisms aside, I take his stance in stride. I'm not God, so I can't judge someone else for how they live in the privacy of their home. He isn't hurting anyone.

"Mister Ueda, I need to increase my spiritual energy limit. Isn't there a way that I can expand my Wordsmithing abilities beyond what they are now?"

He nods. "Yes, yes, of course. However, depends how far you're willing to go. Demons increase limits by ingesting souls of humans. Will you take that path?"

"Of course not."

"Your power allows you speak a word and make it become reality. Have you tried using a spell to increase your limits?"

I quickly search my memories. "Yeah, but it didn't work. I didn't expect it to, either."

"Neither would I." Makoto reaches over and grabs his cold tea and sips it, then places it back on the table. "Demon way is not the only way."

"You mean I can increase my limits without devouring human souls? Sign me up!"

Makoto shakes his head. "Not quite. Angels used energy from prayers. If you are willing to have people pray to you, then it may be possible, but..."

"I'll mark that as a 'maybe.' Anything else?"

He shrugs. "Not know. However, I did wish to speak to you about something..." He falters for a moment. "...have you ever executed someone?"

Phoebe raises an eyebrow. I do, too.

"No. I'd prefer not to do such a thing."

"Are you opposed to killing?"

"I believe there are better ways to resolve conflicts, but sometimes you have to put your life on the line."

Phoebe coughs. "Ahem. Then what are you planning to do about Amelia?"

My seat burns hot under me. "I try not to think about that."

Makoto waggles a finger. "Hiro-sama, she has exterminated entire planet of people. If you can't end her, then you can never justify killing anyone."

"Murder isn't in my nature, Makoto. Wordsmithing seems like a limitless ability. I feel as if I have other options at my disposal."

He nods. "A good point. I respect your commitment to pacifism, but I wonder if you realize that your ideals will not hold up against demonkind."

A few seconds pass as I digest his words.

"Maybe they will, maybe they won't. I won't know until I try. Anyway, I thought you were supposed to be a peaceful, enlightened ascetic. Why are you talking about death and killing all of a sudden?"

Phoebe looks away, and Makoto's expression darkens. "Humans, despite our flaws, are somewhat principled when we wish to be. Humans progressed from barbarism to semi-enlightenment in just a few thousand years. Demons only became worse. It was our good intentions that doomed us. I still believe that many demons are not inherently evil, but I also acknowledge what an incredible enemy they are."

Makoto sips some more tea. "While you were gone for few days, Adams-san received word that several demons and monsters wished to join our ranks. Is very good news, in my book."

"What? They did?! That's great!" Phoebe's eyes light up like the Fourth of July. "So what's the problem?"

Makoto shakes his head. "Right now, we are little more than thorn in Demon Emperor's side. However, once we amass military might, they will turn full attention on us. Either you become willing to draw blood and display ferocious power, or you creatively think of way to persuade trillions of demons to our side."

"Trillions?" I blink in surprise. "That many exist?"

Phoebe rubs her hands together. "Humans have home planets, but so do demons. Half of all demons live in the Labyrinth, but the rest live on worlds strewn across the galaxy."

Trillions. The word echoes in my mind. We have several thousand people and monsters in the Core. What attacked us before was the tiniest tip of an iceberg. If the demons get serious, we don't stand a chance.

"Makoto... are you certain there isn't a way I can increase my limit? Anything."

He smiles and shakes his head. "Unless you are willing to strip soul energy from demons as you kill them, I see no viable options, Hiro-sama. Demonic energy is a pathway to many abilities some consider to be unnatural."

I look away from Makoto. "If you say so."

The Japanese man reaches down and grabs an opened bag of chips. He grabs a handful of stale potato chips and holds the bag out. "Hungry?"

I share a glance with Phoebe.

"Pass."

Part 029: Return Of The Monster

A few weeks later.

The specialized computer console before me illuminates its words with heatmapping instead of visible light. Thanks to my infrared vision, I can now make out the letters and shapes onscreen. From what others have told me, all they can see is a white screen. Talk about the ultimate privacy filter...

My goal today is to create new technology blueprints for a machine I built two weeks ago; a Star Trek-style replicator.

Capable of transforming raw electrical energy into objects with mass, the machine is a feat of engineering previously well beyond my reach. The only reason I was able to create it was thanks to the mental acuity the Crown granted me. Of all the things I've owned in my life, nothing comes anywhere close to Solomon's Crown.

The Crown fills in the details in my mind as I build the thirteenth blueprint: an energy rifle. I rapidly type on the Braille keyboard using senses that I've enhanced with my Wordsmithing, and the replicator accepts my inputs once I finish.

The stress on my mind is much worse than when I Wordsmith, but at the same time, the replicator does all the work once I've input my specifications. I built this system so that I could create new tools, armor, and weapons for humanity without having to worry about my spiritual energy levels. Makoto seems to approve, and I know the military is grateful for faster production options.

Still, even with a fusion reactor, it takes a while to replicate new objects. I'll build massive replicators later for tanks and vehicles, but my head hurts thinking about all the mental strain that'll entail.

A slight dizzy spell grabs me as I lean away from the computer. Hans Wagner notices, and he walks over to check on me.

"You are done vith zee blueprint, Mein Lieber?"

I mop my forehead wearily. "Y-yeah. Something like that. You can start synthesizing energy rifles whenever you feel like it."

Hans nods. "Once vee have finished zee personal shield from zee last batch, I vill begin making zee energy rifles. However, I think you should take a break. Your complexion is looking quite ghastly."

"You think so? Maybe you're onto something." I glance down at my hand and notice it's trembling. Taxing my brain has a bunch of side effects on my whole body. Good to know.

"Oh, oh, no." Hans squints to stare at my face for a moment, then pulls out a handkerchief from his shirt pocket. "Ah, Herr Hiro, zees is for zee nose."

"Nose?" I echo his words, then feel wetness on my lips. Taking the handkerchief, I dab at my nostrils and realize they're bleeding slightly. "Shit. Sorry, this is a little embarrassing. I'll magic you up a new one so that you don't have to wash the blood out of this."

Hans shakes his head. "Nein, zere is no need. Take zee day off. You've been slaving avay day and night! Nobody vants to see you in a coma again."

"Oh, alright. Thanks."

Nodding, I stagger to my feet and stumble through the factory. Not many people work here, and those who do typically help transfer replicated items to other divisions and areas — maybe two dozen staff in total.

Hans's assistant stops when she sees me. "Are you alright, Commander Hiro? You look like you're having trouble walking."

"I'm fine, Debra. I just need some fresh air. Have you seen Phoebe?"

"Miss Berthold? Last I heard she was visiting the Core to discuss our next incursion. She should be back within the hour."

"That's what I wanted to hear. Thanks."

"Anytime, Commander."

She hesitates for a moment before walking away, and I smile to myself about nothing in particular. I technically lead humanity, and everyone knows I'm the Hero who saved them from Bahamut, but I don't have an official title. Phoebe calls me 'Your Grace,' though she's growing out of the habit slowly, while Neil Adams calls me 'My Liege,' and others call me 'Commander.' I really ought to determine military rankings at some point.

Rows of machinery, including a line of sewing machines and a mechanic shop, spread out across the building, their whirrs and clicks telling tales of people and monsters crafting and fixing things for the general population. The door outside radiates warmth as the early Fall sun beams down on the lands.

When I step through, a current of air breathes down my neck, its temperature lower than the glaring daylight implies it should be. Winter is coming; it seems. The shiver down my back wakes me up, and my stupor vanishes. I guess I really did need a breath of fresh air. Go figure.

The Factory, or the Rust Bucket as some call it, sits about half a mile north of the palace. Even further north, over the ridge and down in the canyon below, Tarus II's forest stretches out for a few miles before eventually arriving at the warpgate installation.

Lately, Kar has raised concerns about the potential for demons to use Warpers and teleport into Hero City, thus attacking us at the heart of our infrastructure. He's right, of course. I take concerns about security earnestly and am debating deploying mechanized troops for day and night surveillance. With the threat of snow and the bitter cold encroaching on our doorstep, I'm worried about not only a demon invasion, but also about leaving troops out in the freezing weather.

If only I could look into the future, my life would be so much easier. Maybe I should see if Wordsmithing can bypass the boundary of time.

That's a scary thought. The last thing I'd want is to create paradoxes and tear apart the universe by accident.

Messing with time is a recipe for disaster. Marty Mcfly taught me that much.

Minutes pass as I pace down the street, inhaling deeply and kicking my legs out with more effort than usual. I try and shake some life into them, but my actions don't accomplish much. Sitting on a chair for hours is uncomfortable, no matter how much padding I slap down. I am not the office-drone type.

By the time I enter the palace, walk down the lobby and pass several people, I'm about ready to go back to work and start on another blueprint. Such is the curse of a lazy workaholic.

I arrive in front of my room. Once I open the door, my spherical vision illuminates the inside and- uh...

Phoebe lies on my bed, conked out, breathing silently. Her boots are still on, and she hasn't changed into her night-time clothes yet. Her room is right next to mine, so she must have mixed them up. This isn't the first time, and I won't complain.

I kick my shoes off but catch them with telekinesis before they thud onto the ground. Once that's done, I set the Crown on my dresser and silently glide over, ease onto my bed, and lay down beside Phoebe to rest my eyes for a moment. I know from experience that my pupils are like miniature flashlights, and on more than a few occasions, I've startled her when she saw my eyes in the darkness.

Feeling the bed move makes Phoebe's breath catch for a moment. She blinks her eyes open and yawns. "Jason?"

"Yeah. Hi."

"Oh. Sorry. I ended up in your room again." She grips the covers and pulls herself closer to me, then flops an arm and a leg across my body. "I hope you aren't mad."

"Exactly the opposite," I murmur, before leaning over and kissing her forehead. "As soon as you stop stalling and marry me, we can do this all the time."

She rubs her nose on my side to itch it, then lolls her head back. "I can't do that. We've barely been together a few months. We have to take things slowly. Besides, there are all these preparations to attend to..."

"Excuses, excuses." I poke her gently in the ribs. "You know, if we did things the way people did in my time, marriage wouldn't even be necessary."

"Not necessary? For shame. Marriage is a sacred vow, Your Grace."

"You're still calling me that?"

"Oops." Phoebe pulls away from me and adjusts her shirt. "Sorry. It's been a long day. Adams received more requests from low-level imps to join our society, along with some Gargoyles, a Succubus, two Sirens, and another Minotaur. None of them appear to be double agents, but you know what Kar says..."

"It only takes one," I say, finishing the sentence for her. "Right. Well, worst case scenario, we-"

Before I can continue, the phone beside me rings, making me damn near jump out of my skin. "Son of a bitch!"

Phoebe plays it cool, but I can tell she was a little startled too. "Want me to get it, or is the big strong man scared of some ringing?"

"I got it, I got it," I reply, before grabbing the phone. "Yeah?"

"Hurgh. Turtle, I hope I am not disturbing you. Gearhead said you had gone home for the day, but this is somewhat important."

Gearhead? Oh, right, he means Hans, I think to myself. Sometimes Kar's nicknames can get a little confusing. "I was thinking of taking a nap, but if you need me, I can pop over for a visit."

Kar clears his throat. "Hurgh. Blinker has returned, along with two demons. You might have forgotten, but I sent her off a couple of weeks ago to-"

"No, no, I remember. Yeah, I'll drop by. Have they said anything?"

I can almost hear Kar shake his head. "Nay. I haven't yet spoken to them about the Black Witch. If you'd like, I can ask them before you hang up."

"Not necessary. I'll be right over." Without saying 'goodbye,' I click the phone down and sigh. "Alright, I'll be back in a bit."

Phoebe rubs her eyes. "Was that Kar or Neil?"

"Kar. He wanted to know how my day was going and if he could set me up on a date with a cute redhead from accounting."

Phoebe slugs me. "Ass."

I smirk. "Kidding! Blinker brought some friends back from the Labyrinth. I'm going to head over there and ask them about Roland's world."

"Oh! Well, that's... wonderful news."

Despite her positive words, Phoebe's expression stays neutral. I can make it out even with total darkness in the room.

"Problem?"

"No, no." She pulls herself into a sitting position, and I mimic her movements. Phoebe inhales audibly. "It's just that once again, you're about to face off against that monstrous little girl. After what she did to you... you're still too kind. I know you haven't the heart to kill her."

Oh man... not this talk.

I pull away and sweep my legs off the side of the bed. "I'm a Wordsmith, Phoebe. I have a trillion different ways to handle any situation. I can freeze Amelia in carbonite or something. Violence isn't the only answer."

Phoebe crosses her arms. "Amelia slaughtered Roland's entire homeworld, Jason. All the humans, animals, and plant-life died because of her. She deserves the worst end possible."

"The guillotine?"

"Basically."

I exhale and climb off the bed. "I'll worry about Amelia when the time comes. I don't agree with capital punishment, morally, at least. It doesn't sit right with me. I believe in rehabilitation and redemption, where possible."

Phoebe jumps to her feet. "That's always your reply. If you'll excuse my impudence, I'll come with you and hear what she's been up to."

"Sounds good. Want me to drive?"

Phoebe pulls her socks and boots on. "No, I'll drive. I'll even take it easy since you're all tuckered out."

"Pff. You were snoring like an avalanche when I showed up."

"N-no I wasn't!" Phoebe gawks at me in the dark, then fumbles around. "Can you turn on the lights? I can't find my other boot."

"Sure."

Twenty minutes later, we cruise down the road, and the engine silently hums as the trees glide past us on the left and right. Phoebe, ever the kind soul, hitched a trailer full of supplies and weapons for the Core to her truck. Using it instead of my Ferrari was a good idea.

She hums along to some tune in her head and taps on the wheel. After a few minutes, she asks, "Say, Jason, your Crown allows you to make blueprints for the replicator, right?"

"Mhm." I touch the Crown, self-consciously checking to make sure I'm still wearing it.

"Well, I was thinking.... why not let someone else use the Crown to make blueprints? Then you wouldn't be cooped up in the Rust Bucket all day. You could use your Wordsmithing to make other items or do other things instead."

"Uhh... I don't know about that." My gut squeezes together reflexively. "The Crown is an ancient artifact. It can't be taken off someone's head unless they consent or die. Hell, even when I was comatose, you couldn't take the Crown off, remember? I had a terrible rash after my recovery."

Phoebe nods. "Okay, I understand. Giving it to Hans would be a bad idea, then?"

I chuckle. "Heh, yeah. To say the least. I mean, the guy used to be a Nazi."

"A Not-see? I think you mentioned it once. Oh! When you first met him!"

I fold my arms together. "Yeah. There's a bit of history involved, and it's kinda lengthy. Let's just say the Nazis gave Amelia a run for her money when it came to the business of exterminating human life."

Phoebe's expression darkens, and she turns to stare at me. "What? You can't be serious!"

"Eyes on the road, sweetheart. And yes, I am. They rounded up millions of humans of a different nationality and exterminated them en-masse. It was brutal. Most people didn't find out until a decade had passed."

She cocks her head. "What is 'a different nationality?'"

"Well, uh, think of King Arthur. Surely he had enemies from other nations?"

"The Saxons, yes."

"Alright. Well, imagine that after capturing hundreds of Saxon prisoners, he then suffocated them all, one by one, including their wives and children."

"Oh." Phoebe relaxes slightly. "That doesn't sound as bad as I was expecting."

"What?!" I nearly break my neck swiveling to gape at her.

She looks at me quizzically before turning back to the road. "Well, if you're at war, then killing your enemies is only natural. If you keep them as prisoners, you'll have to feed and keep them alive, and then you'll have to worry about revolts... at least, that was the case for Arthur."

"Okay, that's a fair point, but the difference is that the Nazis killed people who lived among them peacefully. It would be as if Arthur declared that all people with a different eye color were heretics. Do you see the difference?"

A flash of recognition appears in Phoebe's eyes. "Yes, I understand how that could be disconcerting."

"To say the least," I mutter. "Sometimes you worry me, Phoebe. You can be gentle, yet vicious and cold-hearted at the same time."

"I would argue that I'm merely pragmatic," Phoebe replies, while tugging a stray hair into place behind her ear. "You can't save everyone. Sometimes you have to let someone die to save another life, or give up on idealism and finish off your mortal enemy. War is messy, and pragmatists tend to win, not idealists."

I let silence fill the air for a few moments. "So, which was King Arthur? An idealist, or a pragmatist?"

Phoebe shakes her head. "Neither. He was a Hero. Thus, he did what was needed. I wavered, not him."

Her eyes blank out for a moment. "I should have atoned instead of fleeing and falling into Bahamut's trap."

"Then we wouldn't have met," I counter. "I thought you believed in fate, destiny, and all that other mushy stuff?"

Pursing her lips, Phoebe forces a smile. "That's a good point, Jason."

In the distance, the warp-gate comes into view. I lean back in my seat. "Anyway, going back to the original topic, I wouldn't give the Crown away unless it was to someone completely trustworthy. Like you."

"Me?" She cocks an eyebrow. "What would I do with it?"

"Make blueprints for the replicator. Stuff like that. It's not a bad idea. I'd rather you have the Crown than Hans."

Phoebe doesn't reply for nearly a full minute. The gears turn in her head. "I'm not good at creativity, Jason. You come from hundreds of years after me. You can easily think up crazy inventions, but that isn't my forte. Besides, what if I go power-hungry and decide to keep the Crown? You'll have to kill me to get it back."

I snort. "Pfft. Like that'll happen. I'll seduce you into taking it off."

"Just the crown?"

"Maybe a few other things, too."

She winks at me. "Your mind is always in the pig trough."

"Yeah. Anyway, the Crown does all the work. All you need is to think of a problem, like making a weapon that can cut through steel, and the Crown will help you design something suitable. A vivid imagination helps, but you'll do fine."

Phoebe sighs. "I was only suggesting it, but you're acting as if you've already made up your mind. Don't tell me this is all so you can get out of working at the Rust Bucket."

I cross my arms. "I'd be lying if I said that wasn't a part of it."

Phoebe slugs me in the shoulder. "Ass!"

I smile. "Kidding."

Phoebe reminds me of Amelia sometimes. The two of them aren't as different as they think.

Minutes later, we arrive at the warp-gate, and thanks to a vehicle access ramp I constructed, along with enlarging the portal somewhat, I've made it possible for her to drive her supplies straight into the Core.

We pass through the gate, and several monsters quickly shimmy out of the way as Phoebe drives down into the arena below. She slows the truck to a stop. "Special delivery from the Berthold Trucking Company!"

Several orcs walk up to the truck. "Ready to work! Something need doing?"

Phoebe hops out of the driver's side and jerks a thumb to the trailer hitched to the back. "Haul the food and weapons where they're needed."

"Be happy to!" The orcs amble to the back of the rig and start unloading.

Phoebe slams her door shut. She and I walk over to Kar, who I've already spotted. His giant blue form stands out in a crowd. A flicker of heat flits around him, revealing Blinker's presence.

"Kar! Sorry it took me a little while to get here."

I grin at Kar, but he doesn't return the smile. "Ah, Turtle, there you are. I have... bad news."

I stop and stare at him. The look on his face, though hard to make out thanks to his cold blood, is rather ominous. "And that would be?"

"We haven't told Roland yet." Kar gestures to two demons in front of him. "These two are Hernox and Fernox. Go on, tell him."

I examine the demons. They appear to be Scythers; demons who have two massive swords for arms. Their blades are sharp enough to slice through steel. While not the most intelligent Variants, they're great at tearing through the frontline of an enemy army.

The first one, I think Hernox, raises a sharpened limb. "I already told the green-skin what I know. The Council destroyed the Black Queen's hideout. The whole planet."

My jaw drops. "What?! When- no, how did they manage that?"

"We cannot say. All we know is that the planet is gone. They destroyed it entirely."

Phoebe's expression is numb. "Incredible. How... how could anyone..."

A realization dawns on me. "Amelia may have been on the planet. She might be dead."

Fernox leans forward, his beard spilling past his staff. "Rumor has it that there was an awe-inspiring battle. Emperor Diablo sent out his three mightiest Dukes to duel the Black Queen, but alas, she was the victor."

Hernox continues from his brother's words. "Agares, the Duke of Reptiles, died. Barbatos, the Duke of Steel, suffered gruesome wounds. Only Mephisto, the Duke of Mist, was able to escape unscathed. His ghost-form allowed him to evade her attacks."

"Jesus Christ," I cough out painfully. "Amelia battled three Demon Dukes and won? That doesn't sound like the Amelia I know."

Kar clasps his claws together thoughtfully. "The Frilled One consumed a world of human souls. Her power may be greater than that of the Emperors."

Fernox shakes his head. "The Emperors sealed her planet from accessing the Labyrinth and destroyed it. Those are the rumors whispering throughout the gambling dens of late. She is long dead."

It takes me a moment to gather my wits. "Maybe. Let's find out. Locate."

The Scythers stare at me silently for a moment before my eyes seemingly tear from my skull and fly into the sky, then race through a void of blackness. Faster than I've ever traveled before, images of monsters, demons, humans, and far more zip past me as I speed through the Labyrinth. Walls and ceilings don't impede me, and eventually, my eyes slow to a crawl. A portal appears in an unmarked corridor.

Passing through the portal, I appear on the surface of an unknown world. The sun beats down, warming an ocean as it gently washes against a sandy beach. My eyes fly away, over a mountain, through trees, past villages made of wood and straw, and into a clearing where I eventually screech to a stop in front of a familiar face.

Amelia.

I swallow involuntarily.

The child I knew several months ago is gone. She is a fully-grown woman now, one with long white legs, flowing black hair, cherry-red lips, and a torn blue sundress clinging to her skin. The dress is far too small for her, revealing dips and curves where it should hang loose. I smile wryly, realizing that my eyes work. Locate gives me my vision back temporarily.

Seeing her is torture.

She's so beautiful, sensual, in a way that Phoebe isn't. Phoebe's purity is the exact opposite of Amelia's violent sexuality. If Phoebe is the light, then Amelia is the darkness.

Amelia stomps forward and frowns. "Oh, come on! I'll get new clothes later!"

The sword at her side, Dellfingler, chirps happily, "Why wear anything at all? Run free! Clothes are suffocating! Trust me; I'm a sword!"

She swats the weapon. "Idiot! Pervert! You're worse than Jason!"

Hearing her say my name makes my heart catch. I quickly pull away, flying back through the aether to return to my body.

Amelia isn't sexual. She isn't enticing. I can't be a guy... not this time.

She's a monster. I have to kill her.

However, I don't have to like the idea.

Suddenly, I'm back in my body. I stumble slightly and inhale. "She's alive!"

My tone sounds happier than it should. Too late, I notice Phoebe glaring at me. "Don't get all choked up or anything."

Kar shakes his head. "So the Frilled One survived the destruction of the planet. Unfortunate. How could she have done so?"

"A portal." I lean my head back slightly and rub it. "I passed through a portal at some point. She's on a new planet, likely devouring the humans there."

Fernox grumbles. "Perhaps she can open up portals."

Hernox nudges his brother. "Or she has an ally among the Warpers."

"It's unfortunate either way," Phoebe mutters before crossing her arms. "And here I thought we'd been handed a gift on a silver platter. What now? Will you go to face her?"

No need to think of a response. "Not a chance. She defeated three Dukes. I can't hope to beat her as I am now. I need to find that portal. I also need to come up with a way to overcome her new power."

Neil walks over and adds his two cents. "Perhaps you should ally with the demons. Maybe, with the help of an Emperor and Dukes, you could overwhelm her."

"And reveal himself to them? That's suicide!" Phoebe immediately jumps in to shield me. "I won't allow it!"

"Phoebe... that's very sweet of you." I lean over and wrap an arm around her shoulder, pulling her in close. Immediately some of her tension dissolves. Works every time, I think silently. "I can handle myself. Obviously, I'm not going to let the Demon Emperors know of my existence. That would be suicidal."

Silently I pull away from her. An idea occurs to me. "I won't kill demons to raise my energy level. However... if I remember correctly... there may be a way I can increase my combat abilities. Something I saw when I first entered Hell. I... I don't know for certain."

"What are you talking about?" Phoebe asks.

"I could be wrong. I don't know. Phoebe, do you remember what we talked about on the ride over?"

She shrugs. "Death camps?"

"The other thing."

"Pragmatism and idealism?"

I sigh. "The Crown! I'm going to leave the Crown with you. I need to move around the Labyrinth covertly. I can trust you with it. Keep helping humanity out and building new things."

"Jason." Phoebe blushes. "I told you I'm no good at that stuff."

"Well, I think you're wrong." Before she can react, I pluck the Crown from my head and slap it on hers. "You are now temporarily Queen Phoebe! All hail her highness! How's that sound?"

She doesn't respond.

"Uhh, Phoebe?" I wave my hand in front of her face. Only now do I notice the blank expression in her eyes. "Phoebe? Phoebe?!"

Phoebe slumps forward. I catch her. "Aaaahhnnn!!!" She howls in pain, and I suddenly remember my first experience with the Crown. The overwhelming information. The mental agony.

A moment later, she stiffens in my grasp and shakes her head. "Aoouuu... Jason... Jason, it hurts. My head hurts."

"God, I'm sorry. That was thoughtless of me." I rub her scalp gently, but already she's standing up straight again. "Are you better?"

Phoebe nods, and a tear rolls down her face. "You... jerk. I can't believe you. I need a nap now. My brain hurts."

"Sorry. It is pretty overwhelming the first time. You'll get used to it. Probably."

After a few moments, Phoebe blinks hard and waves her hand in front of her face. "Goodness! What is-what is that?! Can you see that?"

"Is it a holographic map of the Labyrinth?"

Phoebe shakes her head violently. "No, no!! It's a map of the-" She pauses, realizing what I said. "Oh, well, yes, I suppose you're right. Is this what you see all the time?"

"You can make it go away. Think really hard about disabling it, and it will vanish."

Neil, Kar, and the two Scythers stare at us silently while I guide Phoebe through the baby steps of using the Crown. Blinker hovers over and lands on my shoulder. "Soooo what's with the Crown? Is it magical or somethin'?"

I nod and explain it to her. The other four listen intently. It occurs to me that I kept its properties secret for a reason, and now these unknown Scythers know about its existence. Damn. The cat's out of the bag. Maybe I should try erasing their memories...

Several minutes later, Phoebe's eyes rove all around as she examines what is likely a series of images relating to chairs. "Wow! So many of them! I've never done wood-work a day in my life, and I feel as though I could become a professional carpenter by daybreak!"

"Imagine how much easier it is with Wordsmithing," I casually remark. "Do you understand now? You can help out humanity in my stead while I leave."

Phoebe pauses. I can immediately tell the heightened intelligence and memory retention the Crown gives is doing its work. "Hey... you didn't know Roland's planet was gone before, yet you must have already been thinking about leaving. What's the big idea?"

"I wanted to go treasure hunting for a while. I can't leave on a dime, though, so ensuring humanity had the Crown would mean you guys weren't defenseless."

"Hmm." Phoebe squints at me, second-guessing my motivations, but doesn't press further. "If you say so, Jason. Oh, also, you should leave Hoarhiim's orb with me."

I glance down at his shining orb in my belt pocket. "Huh? Why?"

"Well, in the darkness of the Labyrinth, you'll draw a lot of attention to yourself. You don't need light anyway, do you?"

"No. Fair point." I reach into my belt and tentatively hand the glowing orb over to her. "Keep him safe... okay? He's a good friend. Even if he is giving me the silent treatment."

"Of course."

Phoebe takes the orb from me, and a feeling of trepidation fills the air. Neil harumphs. "Ahhh, well, this is very sudden! I didn't expect you to leave out of the blue!"

"An occasional change of scenery is a good idea," I say. "Anyway, with the new weapons, turrets, and replicator, you guys can defend yourselves and advance without my presence. When I return, I plan to build a much bigger and better replicator system."

Kar punches his fist. "Damn straight! With several Dukes down, the demons won't know what hit 'em!"

"Strike while the iron is hot," I laugh.

Everyone shares a moment together, but Blinker tugs on my shirt collar and whispers, "Make sure you kiss your girl. She'll miss you TONS while you're gone!"

"Good idea," I whisper, patting the tiny woman on her head. The fairy giggles and flutters away, landing on Kar's shoulder.

Before I leave, I pull Phoebe aside and sweep her off her feet. "A little fairy told me I should."

"Oh, you."

Part 030: Beelzebub's Burning Desire

Rosalia and I stomp down the corridors of the Labyrinth, our footsteps echoing far into the distance. The flame in my hand burns hotter than usual, a result of my rising anger. Judging by the water dripping from the ceiling, I must be close to one of the aquatic areas. I despise water more than anything, given how it stands opposite to fire, but for once, it has little to do with my agitation.

"I'm sure the Dukes didn't mean anything by it, Mister Beelzebub," Rosalia says, as she trots along beside me. Perhaps in an attempt to anger me, she deliberately splashes in every puddle she sees. I'm on the verge of furiously charring her body to a crisp. "The Emperors and Dukes probably-"

"Don't you dare make excuses for them," I hiss. The sound of skeleton feet clinking behind us and orcs stomping along make me acutely aware of my environment. I can't lash out in anger, lest they think less of me. "Agares is dead. I didn't get to kill him and take his place, and even with Barbatos out of commission, they dare say I don't have the qualifications to become a Baron. Outrageous!"

Rosalia fumbles around, poking her fingers together. "You said you contributed greatly to the fight with the Black Queen. Maybe they forgot?"

My gut clenches. I was useless in the fight. I know I was outmatched, but all the Dukes would have to do is give me a few hundred human souls, and I could have handled the wench. She wasn't anything special.

Cheh. The so-called Overlords blew up the planet after sealing the Black Queen there. She's dead, or so they say. Does the Council know that for a fact, or are they guessing? I bet she's still alive. All I have is a hunch to go on, but I can't see her losing so spectacularly, not after revealing her secret weapon.

"The Dukes and Emperors haven't forgotten. They simply don't think I'm worthy. I'll show them."

Adjusting my suit with my free hand, I expand the fireball in my palm a little more, then lob it down the corridor to light the path up. The flame hits a patch of water and evaporates it, fizzling out a moment later. I quickly light another one and grumble silently.

I know what's going on in the Core. The monsters have found a group of humans with advanced weaponry, and they're taking over our warp-gates. Monsters think they can stand up to demons, but they're worthless. If I take back the Core, I'll prove my worthiness to become a Baron. The Council will have to acknowledge my power.

Fire is a symbol of demonic purity. Human myths once imagined Hell as a place of fire and brimstone. By controlling the element most closely associated with our kind, I put myself on a pedestal above my peers.

I deserve my position. I'm not like the rest of the rabble.

Rosalia and I continue to pace down the halls of the Labyrinth, the sound of orcs grumbling to each other at our backs, when she turns to look at me. "Do you miss your teacher? Agares, I mean."

The flame in my palm intensifies. "Of course not. Agares was a stupid old lizard who never stopped speaking in riddles and platitudes. However, I cannot forgive the Black Queen for slaying him. That was my job. I'd sooner-"

I pause mid-sentence and hold my hand out as movement in the distance catches my eye. "Hold. I saw something."

My ability to sense heat and warmth is unparalleled. A figure moves up ahead and ducks behind a corner, but I doubt it's a demon or a monster. They'd have no reason to hide.

"I don't see anything, Mister Beelzebub." Rosalia starts to take a step forward, but I quickly pull her back.

"Idiot. I did. Your eyes haven't half the acuteness mine do. Stay here."

Quietly, I sneak forward, igniting the fire in my palm with more gusto before flinging it at the distant wall. "Show yourself!"

The flame explodes, and for a brief instant, I catch sight of a robed figure illuminated by the fireball, but it pulls away and hides as the light disappears.

A chill goes down my spine as a head peeks around the corner, one with two pure white glowing eyes.

"You weren't supposed to see me."

The voice is masculine. Young, perhaps an evolved demon? No. Demons don't hide from others of our kind. He's much too tall to be an imp playing tricks.

Is he a spy?! Perhaps one of those monsters from the Core is trying to sneak around. But what type? Those glowing eyes are unlike any I've seen before. Hydra eyes can sometimes glow, as can the basilisks, but his humanoid face reveals he isn't one of them.

"Step out of the darkness. If you don't, I'll turn you into ash."

The male slowly rises to a standing position. He's even taller than I first thought, perhaps seven feet in total. He walks around the corner, and I quickly illuminate the area with another flame in my hand. Robes cover his entire body, and all I can see of him are the glowing eyes under his cowl. A massive bulge on his back makes me wonder if he's suffering from a body deformity.

Wait! Those eyes, they remind me of Barbatos! That's right! The Duke of Steel has glowing red eyes, unique even among demons. Is this person one of his servants?

Unlikely. Barbatos is a quiet individual. I heard that he never speaks to anyone, and he barely interacts with his section of the Labyrinth. He has a few of the Lords in the area handle most of the business there.

The stranger takes a step toward me. "I need to pass. Move, and I won't hurt you."

What?! He dares threaten me? The bastard. Of all the days for someone to slight me... I won't let him off the hook now.

"You're a fool. A simple apology would have saved you, but I'm in a terrible mood. Orcs, gut him."

The orcs, half-asleep behind me, snort audibly and wake up, realizing I was referring to them. I step to the side and allow ten of them to rush past me, fan-out, and block the intruder from squeezing through.

"Man-filth! Smells like hooman to me!" One of the orcs bellows.

The stranger's eyes aren't like any human I've ever seen. Still, Orcs have an uncanny sense of smell. If they say he's human, then...

"Please, I don't want to hurt you if I don't have to."

The stranger pleads for his miserable life again. However, something about his voice catches my attention. I've heard it before. I can't recall where from, but it was recent. It has a distinct whine to it, as though it belongs to a spoiled brat.

"Attack!" The monsters charge at him with their swords and axes raised high.

What happens next makes my heart stop. Without moving, the stranger closes his glowing eyes, and all of the orcs lift a foot into the air, then violently smash on the ground. Not once, but three times. WHAM! WHAM! WHAM!

Orcs are far more durable than the average monster, but not even they can withstand the Labyrinth-rattling force of the stranger's telekinesis. The orcs slump to the ground in defeat, and I gawk as the glowing-eyed 'human' opens his eyes.

"I told you to stay back. I've only knocked these fellows unconscious. Let me pass, and nobody else has to get hurt."

"The Hell I will!" My left-hand raises and forms another ball of fire in its palm. "You brazen little shit. I don't know who you are, but I'll find out when I peel the scorched flesh off your bones!"

The man sighs. "Ugh. I knew sneaking around wouldn't be easy. I'll try to be gentle."

C'mon, Beelzebub, don't waste another word on this maggot, I think to myself.

Quickly, I slap the fireballs in my palms together and spin them around rapidly, building up a scorching ball of flame. Its heat hammers my body, warming my blood as it reaches a thousand degrees. Before the stranger can evaluate its properties, I hurl the infernal orb at him, and it sails forty feet down the hall until it explodes and swallows the fool alive!

The flame smashes into the unconscious orcs and incinerates their bodies, killing them all instantly. It briefly lights up the room, and I catch a glimpse of the human's cloak down that side hallway once more.

The bastard! He hid from my attack! Coward!

After the flames subside, the man steps back out. "What the hell?! Those Orcs were your servants! You killed them! How could you do that?"

"A demon cares little for the lives of worms," I reply. "Who are you? Why do your eyes glow?"

"It's a long story," The man replies. "It involves a lot of alcohol and a party trick gone wrong. I knew I shouldn't have swallowed that disco ball."

"Aren't you the clown," I mutter. "I'm intrigued by your sudden appearance. After I kill you, I'll continue to the Labyrinth Core to slay the monsters who have defied the Dukes. It'd be a shame if any of them were your friends."

"You can try, Beelzebub."

I raise an eyebrow. "Oh? How do you know my name?"

"I know all sorts of things," the bastard replies, noncommittally.

"Tell me yours, rat. I don't extend the privilege to any random insect I face, but you intrigue me."

"Oh, how polite of you," The human mutters. "I'm Jason, but you can call me Jason. First name Jason, last name Jason."

"Are you mocking me?"

The human blinks. "I'd never dream of it. Now, let me pass. I'm in a bit of a rush."

The fire in my palms increases in intensity. "Sounds like you have a hot date."

Jason narrows his eyes. "I have no interest in fighting you. My target is Amelia."

My body freezes. Amelia? What? Why would he be after the Black Queen? Who the devil is this human?

"You're after the Black Queen, hmm? I have bad news for you, vermin. She's dead. The Overlords destroyed her planet."

"She isn't," Jason replies calmly. "Amelia survived, and now she's on a different world, devouring all its life. I've spent many weeks preparing to fight her, but for every minute I waste, she grows ever more powerful. I'll have to face her sooner rather than later if I hope to win."

My heart pounds like a war drum in my chest. The Black Queen is alive after all? I... I wasn't wrong! The Council doesn't know, yet!

I calm myself down. "Impossible. How can you be so confident? Every report states that she was trapped on that dead rock when the Overlords destroyed it. How can you know what our greatest Oracles don't?"

Jason crosses his arms. "I have my ways. Now, are you going to let me pass, or will I have to make you kill more of those grunts behind you?"

"You'll regret mocking me, insect," I whisper.

Slowly, deliberately, I reach up and unclasp my jacket, one button at a time. Then, I peel it off and hold it in the air. "Rosalia, take this and fold it. Neatly."

She nods and rushes forward, gently taking it from my grasp.

My long-sleeved black undershirt, of course, looks impeccable. Not like the rags many demons wear, including the Duke of Pain. I smile slightly at the human. "I'll keep the pants. You don't deserve the sight of what's underneath."

Jason smirks. "Wow, you've got quite a sense of humor, Beelzy. I hope you don't expect to beat me with jokes."

My jaw clenches. "What did you call me?"

"Beelzy. It's short for Beelzebub."

A spurt of flame pops out of my mouth as I exhale. "Maggot. I'm going to beat you to a pulp. I won't stop until you're a puddle of blood."

"Darn. And here I thought you'd go easy on me since I'm new to all this."

The man holds his palm out. Suddenly, a cylindrical, metal object leaps from his belt into his hand.

I frown.

What the Devil is that?

Part 031: Loss

"Seven Devils!" The words blurt from my mouth as a blade of light pops out of the human's metal cylinder. I've never seen a weapon like that before!

The weapon hums like a horde of angry bees. My adversary raises it upward, and it faintly illuminates his face. However, I still can't make out his appearance.

"Give up, Beelzy. I'd rather not maim you if I don't have to." Jason lowers into a defensive stance, and the blade illuminates his clothing dramatically. It doesn't escape me that its pure white color matches his glowing eyes.

There must be a connection.

Quickly, I glance back at Rosalia. "Summon the Dukes! I'll fight this worm in the meantime!"

She nods fearfully as her eyes lock onto his light-sword. After a moment, she turns and rushes away, leaving us alone.

"What, are you afraid?" The human smirks, a mocking tone in his voice. "Need backup before we've even fought?"

"Not at all," I murmur, as I gather fire in my palms. "I want the Dukes here to confirm my victory. Beating you will net me a hefty reward in human souls, perhaps enough to become a Baron."

"You talk a lot for someone who's supposedly confident. Are you stalling for time?"

The fire in my hands rapidly heats up to the optimal temperature as I take a step back. "A battle is more than a series of practiced maneuvers, insect. Often, careful preparation will mean a fight is over before it's even begun!"

Instead of hurling a fireball, I aim both palms forward and twist at the same time to summon a cone of flame that instantly expands around the entire hallway. The inferno screams ahead, shrieking like a wild banshee as it races at the human.

He can't evade. Not even his hidey-hole will be any use this time!

Suddenly, as if the gods have decided to mock me, my attack freezes its momentum! The flame halts, almost as if it's hit an invisible barrier, then backfires and reverses its direction back at me. The superheated flames devour my clothing and tear apart the skeletons behind me. The reanimated beings don't stand a chance against my magical flames.

Luckily, fire does nothing to me. Other than my dignity, I suffer no injuries.

Cutting off the fuel, I clasp my hands shut. The wall of flame stops behind me at some point as my clothes transform into ash. Rosalia would kill to see my naked body, I muse.

"You reversed my flames. Only magic could accomplish such a feat," I growl. "Humans can't use magic. What are you?"

Embers crackle and pop on the ceiling, walls, and ground. The insect wipes his nose. "I ask myself that every day. Nephilim, perhaps? The son of an angel and a human?"

"Nephilim?!" I can't stop my jaw from slackening. "Impossible! All the angels should be dead! How stupid do you think I am?!"

Jason raises his light-sword until it touches the ceiling. Sparks appear for a moment, and he pulls away, a pinprick burned above him. "You're not the first Lord I've fought. I've already beaten several others. Are you a one-trick pony? Even your size isn't that impressive."

"My size?" I raise an eyebrow. "I'm taller than the average demon."

"I wasn't talking about your height," Jason remarks with a smile.

"How crude of you."

I can't enter the rat's melee range. His light-sword looks extremely dangerous. However, a cord drapes underneath it and around behind his back to that giant lump. If the sword uses energy, then does that mean it has a power source?

Even if it does, what about the attack he used on the orcs? He may have other weapons. Possibly magic, too. But if that's the case, then when did he perform the hand signs?!

Devils! This human is an aberration, just like the Black Queen! Since when did humans grow to be so-

Oh.

I understand, now.

"I knew I'd seen you before, Jason. You were beside the Black Queen, Amelia, weren't you? She claimed the human at her side was a mighty warrior. Agares thought she was bluffing, but it seems she wasn't. What is your relationship with that wench?"

He bows his head slightly. "My relationship? Amelia... tried to kill me. Or to wound me. After all, I am a Hero. I'm her worst enemy."

"A Hero?" Another shock races through my body. "L-liar! Joan was the final Hero! It's been tens of thousands of years since her death. You claimed to be Nephilim, and now a Hero. I thought Heroes never lied."

"Believe what you will," Jason says, before sighing. "I know you sent your girlfriend to call for backup, so I'd like to get this over with." He disengages his weapon and closes his eyes. Then, he speaks a single word. "Seizure."

"Excuse me? What do you mean by 'Seiz-'"

Before I can finish my sentence, horrible agony erupts in my mind. My skull seemingly shatters and twists, lancing into every part of my brain.

"Aaaauuughhh!"

A vile scream escapes my lips, but I can't control myself. Fire erupts from my mouth and hands. At some point, I end up on the ground, but I don't remember falling. Spots dance all over my vision.

"-should only last an hour or so. Sorry for the trouble," The human says. I can't understand his words.

Oh, Devils, the pain! THE PAIN!

A moment later, I blink — sweat bubbles from every pore in my body. My chest heaves and falls, and my mouth fills with the taste of sand. I need water! Thirsty!!!

"Mister Beelzebub! He's awake!"

Rosalia's irritating voice cuts through the fog obscuring my vision.

"About time," Bael's voice replies. He sounds distant, yet close. I raise my head to look for him, only to realize his feet are inches from my face. The stench of his rotting toe fungus makes me gag. "Face-down and ass-up! Bahaha! What a way to land! Whatever that human did to him, he left the Lord of Fire in the funniest position I've ever-"

"Quiet, Bael," Diablo says, lightly slapping the other's chest. "We don't even know what happened. He's been screaming in pain ever since we arrived. The humans may have developed a new weapon."

Bael grows quiet. "Hmm. A human, huh. Hey! Girly! You sure the intruder you saw was a human? Seems mighty unlikely."

While the Second Emperor and First Duke converse, I pull away from Bael and stagger backward to sit on my butt. My head swoons from the brutal attack the human unleashed on my mind. I can barely focus my thoughts.

I open my mouth to speak, but my voice rasps painfully. "He- hummun, Jay-sun... Heee-ruhhh..."

"Eh? Wassat?" Bael leans in closer and cups a hand to his ear. "Can't talk straight?"

"His throat sounds dry. Here, give him some water," Diablo says, as he reaches into his robes and pulls out a small flask of liquid.

The cool water pours into my mouth. I cough a little but immediately feel life return to me. A moment later, I haggardly pull myself into a sitting position. Rosalia hands me my suit top she took earlier, and I use it to cover my lower regions.

"Sh-shameful. I shall never live this down," I whisper under my breath.

"What happened?" Diablo asks. "We came as soon as Rosalia told us about the light-sword."

I stare at Diablo for a few moments as I try to make sense of the preceding events, but several thoughts bubble up all at once. If I tell Diablo and Bael what befell me; they'll laugh. After getting my posterior handed to me by the Black Queen, I already look unworthy for the position of Baron, let alone Duke. I can't let it appear as if some random human easily beat me. Besides, he spoke one word, and I collapsed! Pathetic!

"It was horrible," I begin. "First, the man pulled out his sword of light. It was a weapon unlike any I'd seen before, seemingly able to slice through everything in its path. I dodged it for as long as I could and struck back with my flames. He kept pulling back and evading my attacks like a coward. As I put him on the defense, I tricked him into revealing his name."

Bael nods, his cockiness from earlier gone. "Whoa. I don't even remember weapons like that during the Energy Wars."

"I've seen a few in my lifetime," Diablo muses. "Continue. Who was he?"

"His name is Jason. He's a Hero!" I blurt the words out quickly, capturing their imaginations with my intricate wordplay. "Agares and I both met him when we first encountered the Black Queen! He was the little runt who stood beside her. She claimed he was a mighty warrior, but Agares didn't believe her, given her past lies."

Diablo's eyes widen. "Ah, yes, Agares told me about the encounter with Amelia. He mentioned she was keeping a human at her side, but Agares thought the boy was just for food."

"Precisely!" I jump to my feet, causing the shirt covering my demonhood to fall to the ground. Rosalia nearly faints at the sight of my oversized meat-log. "He's a Hero! She trained him for the Devil only knows what purpose!"

Diablo glances at Bael, then back at me. "So how did he defeat you?"

I pause, quickly thinking up a brilliant explanation that will win them over with a tale of my bravery. "Jason unleashed a variety of awesome powers on me. We fought for over thirty minutes before he used a psionic attack. My vision blurred, and he knocked me out when my defenses were down. He must have run away in the chaos."

"Wow! I'm glad he didn't kill you, Mister Beelzebub!" Rosalia wipes her forehead, relieved. "You must have scared him good!"

Bael narrows his eyes. "Yeah, I betcha did. Say, why did that human spare you, anyway? He sounds like one tough cookie."

Damn. Bael acts like an idiot, but he can be unusually perceptive when it comes to matters of war.

I pause for a moment, before answering, "He kept mentioning my backup. He must have wanted to leave before you showed up. I don't believe I was out long."

Diablo scratches his chin. "We only got here about five minutes ago. Any idea which way he went?"

I quickly glance up and down the hallways, remembering my positioning. "Well, Jason wanted to pass Rosalia and me. Ah! He said that Amelia was still alive! He said he wished to fight her!"

"The Black Queen is alive?" Diablo chews his upper lip. "This tale grows stranger by the minute. I thought you said he worked for her?"

"Aye. Amelia must have attacked Jason. The two of them had a falling out. I believe he holds a grudge."

"Tch." Bael crosses his arms over his bare chest. "He can't have gone far. Beelzebub, you go 'n find an Oracle. Tell them to contact Diablo 'n me. With the Oracles' help, we'll gather the other Dukes and kill this Hero once and for all. We'll hunt the runt down and find out what he knows about the Black Queen."

My eyes blink reflexively. "You want me to find an oracle? No, I should assist you."

Diablo chuckles. "Haha. You've exerted yourself enough for today, young one. If this human is involved with the Black Queen, then he's too dangerous for you to handle. Besides, you barely survived by the skin of your teeth."

Rosalia nods energetically. "They're right, Mister Beelzebub! I don't want you to get hurt again! You should go to the healing chambers and-"

"I'm fine, woman!" My teeth gnash at her constant annoyance. "You should find the Oracles! I can help the Dukes!"

Bael snickers. "Hehe, you couldn't handle one human, Hero or not. I don't need you draggin' us down, pup. Now hop to it, like a good little imp. This Hero stuff is Duke and Emperor business."

"What he said," Diablo adds. "Come on, then, Bael. Let's track him down. If we're lucky, maybe the Lord of Fire scratched him. A blood trail would make our jobs a lot easier."

Bael scoffs. "Tch. I can smell a fleshbag anywhere in the Labyrinth. Just follow the stench of weakness."

Without waiting for my reply, both demon leaders turn and walk down the path, leaving Rosalia and me together, alone. The last thing I hear is Bael's voice, as he says, "Guh! To think, we might've missed him by just a few minutes! He probably slipped right past us!"

Anger swells in my chest.

Despicable insect. Now humans have shamed me twice! First came the Black Queen, and now the so-called Hero. Thanks to this 'Jason,' the Dukes look down on me even more than they did before!

Curses. How did the human beat me? All he did was say a word! 'Seizure.' Somehow he attacked my mind and rendered me defenseless, yet he didn't kill me. He didn't kill the orcs, either. Perhaps he's soft? He might be someone who believes in peace or some other Skarn droppings. Maybe this is a weakness I can exploit!

A minute passes as I breathe slowly and think about several things. Rosalia clears her throat, interrupting my thoughts. "Um... M-Mister Beelzebub, sir? Shouldn't we do as Diablo ordered?"

"Yes, yes. I know."

The human must be from the Core. There's been too much suspicious activity there. I should continue my original plan to restore my standing. In fact, I need it now more than ever. While I attack the Core, the Dukes will defeat the Hero. It will be a two-pronged attack that will crush the monster insurrection and demonstrate my worthiness for all to see.

"Rosalia, I have plans of my own. You must find an Oracle and pass Diablo's orders along. I will attack the Core just as I originally planned."

She shakes her head. "No! Beelzebub, you'll get in big trouble! Besides, your contingent was wiped out by that human! You can't go to the Core alone!"

"I'll figure something out. Do as I say!" My teeth grind together as I strongly consider backhanding the worthless woman. Just what I need, an underling questioning my orders. Heh, come to think of it, that's what I'm doing to Diablo and Bael. Oh well, it can't be helped. I'm far smarter than either of them.

Turning away, I head the opposite direction that the Duke and Emperor went. "Begone with you, Rosalia!"

She sniffles. "I'm... I'm worried! Fine! I'll do it, but don't expect me to be there for you when you get in trouble!"

She stomps away, her boots echoing off the walls as she leaves.

I smirk. Like I care what a fat, ugly she-orc thinks.

Glancing down at my stripped body and filthy suit top, I sigh.

First, I need new clothes. I refuse to enter a battle in the nude.

Part 032: Specter of Death

I run down the hallways, darting left and right, all the while thinking to myself, that Beelzebub guy was a loon.

Not having the Crown of Solomon was a bad idea at first until I realized I could say 'Map' and have a chart of the Labyrinth appear in my mind. The downside is that it only outlines places and corridors I've been to, but at the same time, it does allow me to keep track of my route.

Sadly, the last two months were for nothing. I found several divine artifacts, but they were worthless. Amelia has grown stronger during all that time, while my gains were sparse.

Keeping in contact with Hero City is easy enough. I can say 'Call,' and speak to Phoebe, Neil, or anyone else as needed.

Despite suffering some setbacks, I'm surprised at how smoothly things have gone. I ran into a Demon Lord, Beelzebub, but the guy was such a pushover that now I'm worried I may be the single person who stands between Amelia planet-level hunger. I've only faced Lords up to now, while Amelia defeated three Dukes at the same time.

If I can't stop her, I don't see how anyone can.

Slowing down, I wipe my forehead, realizing I'm feeling quite tired. "Water."

A jug of icy cold water pops into existence before me, and I plop down for a moment to catch my breath. The liquid of the gods tastes incredible when I'm running around in the Labyrinth. Something about the ambient temperature here is always just a little too warm to be comfortable. I can cool myself down with Wordsmithing, but that unpleasant heat always comes creeping back.

And of course, thinking about the heat gets me wondering about other things too. What produces oxygen in the Labyrinth? I know plants exist, but they're all in the upper and outer sections.

"Pizza," I say, giving myself a slice of pepperoni deep-dish with stuffed crust. Mmm. Pizza on Earth never tasted so perfect. It's cooked exactly the way I like.

As I chow on the food, a thought occurs to me. It's funny how I can use my internal spiritual energy to create food, water, and external sources of power. Then when I rest at night, my spiritual energy completely refills.

The more I think about them, the more I realize how utterly broken my abilities are. If I keep experimenting, I'm sure to find new ways to use my Wordsmithing.

After drinking my fill, I jump to my feet and Wordsmith again. "Vaporize." The jug of water vanishes from existence, leaving no trace behind for anyone to find. Gotta cover my tracks.

I've been reflecting on Amelia a lot, lately. I haven't stopped thinking about how I can put an end to her inhuman rampage since I left the Core. What if I vaporized her with my Wordsmithing? I could kill her, just like that. I could do the same to all the demons.

But... should I? Is it right for me to pass judgment on others?

My power is abnormal. It's not something that should exist. Godlike, incredible potential shouldn't be in the hands of any random human. So why do I have it? Was I chosen for a reason? Am I somehow superior to everyone else? What about Einstein? Wouldn't he have made better use of Wordsmithing if God had given him the ability?

No. It's random luck that I was the one bestowed with Wordsmithing. I may be a Hero, the descendant of mythical warriors, but I don't consider myself legendary. I might be the last hope for humanity, but I feel like a child playing with a gun. My ability is a dangerous thing, something that might backfire and hurt the people I love.

My footsteps echo off the walls as I start walking down the corridor again.

I wonder if Phoebe thinks about me when she sleeps, my mind wanders. I know I like to dream about her, though I can't sleep in the wilds of the Labyrinth.

Indeed, over the past two months, I've not slept even one time, instead choosing to use my slowly depleting mana reserves to keep myself awake. I don't feel any aftereffects, so it must be working, but I can't keep it up forever. Sooner or later I'll need to catch a catnap and hope the demons don't-

What was that?

A noise behind me makes me stop and listen. Is that... clicking?

Moments pass. Nothing. Neither my sonar nor my infrared vision show any blips.

God, I'm getting jumpy. Maybe I should take a nap after all.

A chill goes down my back as I continue walking. There's nobody around, but I feel naked and defenseless. An eye watches me.

One or two minutes pass. The feeling intensifies. A sensation like a finger presses against my back, and I immediately jump forward and spin around. "Who's there?!"

A male voice replies. "Ksss, I was carelesss."

I can't see any part of the man at all. There's no heat, and he doesn't show up in a way that my sonar can detect.

"I've found you, flessshbag. Your glowing eyesss are quite remarkable. I look forward to adding them to my collection."

"What... what the hell are you? A ghost?!"

"Sssomething like that. I am Mephisssto, Duke of Missst. A pleasssure to make your acquaintance, keh keh keh." Mephisto coughs like a chain-smoker. I can only assume he's laughing. "It ssseemsss you're having trouble ssseeing me. Looksss like thossse eyesss are jussst for ssshow."

My heart pounds in my chest. This... thing... is a Duke? It has an entirely different presence from that Beelzebub fellow. The killing intent ripples from it and spills around, creating a sense of dread in the back of my mind.

While the Duke of Mist hisses and titters to himself, I quickly jerk my hand out. My Lightsaber flies off my belt, lands in my palm, and ignites. My backpack's cord attachment snaps onto the lightsaber, and I swing wildly in front of me, trying to hit whoever the hell this new guy is. My slashes cut into the walls on either side, slicing out paths of molten dirt and stone wherever my weapon strikes.

I jump back and stare silently, but I can't tell if my attacks had any effect.

"Oh no, you got me," The Duke of Mist says, a mocking tone in his voice. "Ohh, the pain. It hurtsss, I'm dyiiing." He drags the last syllable out, cranking his sarcasm meter to max levels.

While Mephisto laughs to himself, I send out a wave of telekinetic energy, yanking rocks from the ceiling down and onto where I think he' standing.

Crash! Crash!

The ceiling collapses on Mephisto's position, only for the Duke to laugh even more uproariously.

"Keh keh keh! Good effort, flessshbag. Ssstill, perhapsss Beelzebub wasss telling the truth. You appear to be a Hero, after all."

"I can't hurt you? Not even a little bit?!"

"You may attempt to ssstrike me if you pleassse, but..." The Duke pauses for dramatic effect. "Allow me to ssshow you how it'sss done."

Suddenly, from the point on my back that I felt his touch a minute ago, a violent pain erupts, sending me sprawling to the floor, my lightsaber just barely missing my face by inches. Agony jolts up my spine in waves, as if currents of electricity are coursing through my internal organs.

"Gaahg! Hnnngh! Fuck! Shiiit!"

I nearly bite off my tongue as my body reflexively curls into the fetal position. I can't make the pain stop at all!

After a few moments of writhing, I blink back tears and remember my Wordsmithing. "N-Neutralize! Heal!"

The pain stops. I freeze and shiver on the ground for half a minute as nausea roils around in my stomach. Using my telekinesis, I deactivate my lightsaber so that I don't kill myself by accident.

"Sssussspiciousss." Mephisto's voice holds a note of caution. "Ssstopping my Pain Inducement without making hand sssignsss... very unusssual."

With a force of will that makes my head spin, I leap to my feet and quickly dash away. Jesus Christ! Mephisto isn't fucking around! I can't see him, and I can't hurt him either!

Scarcely have I made it fifty feet, when Mephisto's voice appears in front of me, making me screech to a halt. "Foul flessshbag! I wassn't done ssspeaking! Ssshow ressspect to your new massster!"

"Fuck that!" I yell and wonder how the hell he got in front of me. "Wall!"

The entire Labyrinth shakes as a foot-thick barrier forms between us in less than a second, and I quickly rush back in the direction I just left. I don't want to head back toward Beelzebub, but maybe if I put some distance between myself and Mephisto, there will be a side tunnel or two that-

"Insssolent human!"

Mephisto's voice appears in front of me yet again, making me scream in fright and stumble backward, landing on my ass. This Duke can move through walls?! Who the fuck am I dealing with?!

Before I can get up and run away, an iron fist pounds me in the chest. It knocks the wind out of me and sends me tumbling back head over heels.

My vision spins. The nausea from a few moments ago reappears in violent form, and I vomit all over, only to realize I'm on my back. The bile erupts and lands all over my face, neck, and chest.

"Kuh-clean! Clean!" I belch the words out, and the vomit disappears, leaving me feeling minty fresh, yet still horribly sickened.

I can't see him. I can't sense him. He's a goddamn ghost, able to move faster than me and pass through walls. Compared to Beelzebub's little fire-show, this Duke is unspeakably dangerous. Forget Amelia! If I can't beat the Duke of Mist, I'm done for!

A familiar sound catches my attention. Clicking. The sound I heard before. Staggering to my feet, my jaw drops as a massive wall of skeletons shambles toward me. These aren't like the weak little buggers Beelzebub controlled. Their intricately shaped armor, enormous steel shields, and swords all speak to a level of power I haven't seen before.

Even so, skeletons usually wouldn't be a problem, but with Mephisto lurking around, I can't afford to treat them lightly. They'll distract me while he circles around and jams a knife into my back.

"Keh keh keh... do you like my creationsss? I am the massster of Death in the Labyrinth." Mephisto's voice is still a little ways away. He must have punched me and stayed in his spot. "Reanimation isss trivial for one asss powerful asss I. The other Dukesss don't underssstand the ssskill and danger involved in reanimation, but sssoon they will."

My breath comes in gasps. I need to escape, but the Duke of Mist moves faster than me. I can't hurt him with ordinary attacks, nor can I slow him down with barriers.

Think, Jason, think!

I can't. My head is still spinning from that spinal attack. I'm out of breath, exhausted, and facing a Demon Duke; one of the most powerful beings in the Labyrinth.

Amelia beat him in combat?!

Yes, that's right. She killed that Agares fellow, but Mephisto was one of the other two Dukes that were there. If the Scyther brothers weren't lying, then that means he managed to escape unscathed. Perhaps Amelia couldn't hurt him.

FUCK!

How do I get out of this situation?!

An idea appears. It's worth a shot!

"Speed! Speed! Power! Power! Perception!"

If the Duke of Mist is fast, then I have to be faster!

Spinning on my heel, I dash away, racing toward the fake wall I created. Unlike last time when I was with Amelia and I hyper-speed-dashed into the Great Doors of the Labyrinth Core, this time, my mind manages to keep up with the speed increase.

I pound through the fake wall without stopping, rushing with all my might, occasionally yelling "Heal!" whenever the power threatens to tear my limbs apart.

Minutes pass. I continue tearing down the Labyrinth halls at speeds approaching a hundred miles an hour. Left, right, through this path and that, I ignore my heart screaming in pain. Ultimately, I can't maintain my mad dash and slow to a stop. My body aches as if death is moments away.

Gasping for breath, I speak again, "Normalize," returning my body to its original state.

"Wa… Water."

As the jug of icy water appears in my hand, I lift it to take a drink.

A voice whispers in my ear.

"Oopsss, you almossst lossst me."

Part 033: Stab and Seek!

"How?! How do you keep finding me?!" My head jerks around wildly as I strain to listen for the slightest hint of Mephisto's position. Sometimes I can make out a scraping sound against the wall, but I think he's fucking with me at this point.

Mephisto continues to stand about thirty feet away. He's allowing me to put some distance between us, but any notion of escape is an illusion at this point. "Ksss... My minionsss include not only the dead, the damned, and the decrepit... but the bugsss asss well. While you flee, left and right, through thisss passsage and that... the wallsss part for me. I sssee you, no matter where you run. You will be mine..."

He can communicate with insects?

A quick stomp of my foot illuminates the room around me. Here and there, tiny imperfections on the walls display various bugs crawling around.

Damn! This bastard never lets up! While I run up and down the hallways like a chicken with its head cut off, he can travel through the walls and show up right in front of me!

Okay... okay... if that's the case, then focus! I can escape him! It isn't impossible!

Several ideas appear in my mind. Slay the bugs. Distract him. Fake left, but go right.

However, there's an even better idea. I don't have to kill Mephisto's spies if I can turn them against him.

Under my breath, I whisper, "Mirage. Shimmer. Illusion. Smoke."

All around me, copies of my body appear. They're hallucinations, fake Jasons to distract him. A cloud of smoke erupts, and my clones and I take off, racing away from the Duke. I shift left and right, dashing between each of my copies and shuffling them around.

To my surprise, I hear Mephisto hiss in anger. One of my copies registers a hit as he swings to hit them, his knife passing through their illusory body. I don't look back, but instead smile as I hear him yell, "What?! Foolisssh worm... you can't ssstop me with tricksss! I'll cut all of them to piecesss!"

Each of the mirages shares a mental link with me. When a path split appears up ahead, I run left with several hallucinations, while the others go right. Every time you encounter a junction, break off from each other, I order them.

The mindless incorporeal copies don't respond, but a tingle tells me they understand.

Good. I continue running, and grumble as Mephisto lucks out and follows my crew and not the others. He continues to stab mirages one by one. When the next split appears, I whisper, "Waypoint."

It's only a hunch, but if this works, I might be onto something. Sometimes it's almost funny how the threat of a demon chasing after me can get my almonds rolling.

Wordsmithing has infinite possible effects. Having played many video games in my life, I hypothesize that if I set a waypoint, I might be able to jump back to it. Teleportation is something I've strongly considered, but it also terrifies me. What if I teleport inside a wall and fuse into it? I could die!

But as everyone always says, there's no time like the present. This Demon Duke won't leave me alone!

A split appears a hundred feet ahead. I scowl as the Duke of Mist slashes at yet another of my illusions, dissipating it into nothingness.

I have only a dozen mirages left. He'll hit me soon. I don't want that knife touching me. The sensation of a million volts of electricity slamming into my spine was more than a little unpleasant.

When we split this time, I continue moving with only two clones. For a split-second, Mephisto pauses behind us and curses. "Devilsss... what if thisss isssn't even the right one?!"

He relents a moment later and chases after me, making me grimace. I almost lost him.

One slash, my rear mirage falls. Another slash, the final copy falls.

Under my breath, I choke out, "Waypoint. Return."

Boom.

I vanish while running and reappear at my first checkpoint, slamming against the wall. The change of scenery only disorients me for a moment, and I quickly spot the bugs crawling on the walls. Mephisto will figure out what I did within seconds. There's no time to lose!

"Invisibility. Stealth."

Transforming my body in a way similar to Mephisto's, I take off down the opposite corridor that I first went, heading left toward what I hope is freedom. My shoes become noiseless, neither squeaking nor scuffing the floor as I run. Without my sonar, I have no choice but to rely on my infrared vision to see.

This time, I spend an hour fleeing for my life. Left, right, up, down. Corridors and hallways pass me by the dozens.

I slow down once I enter an area with several puddles splashed across the floor. My mental map tells me this biome is most likely a marine area, one with vast reservoirs of water.

Fireflies buzz about, here and there. The ones in the Labyrinth are significantly brighter than the ones I knew about on Earth, and they illuminate rooms like twenty-watt bulbs. They don't do anything for me with my current vision, but seeing a lot of them means I must be nearing an area with a high monster density. Demons and monsters aren't allowed to eat the fireflies.

Creeping forth, I avoid puddles and squint at the ground, unable to make much out. My shoes produce no noise, and the cool temperature in this marine biome makes my infrared vision nearly worthless. My best bet is to follow the fireflies since they produce a small amount of heat as they buzz around and crawl on the Labyrinth's walls.

"Normalize," I whisper, returning my body to its original loudness level. I keep the invisibility active, just in case. It's slowly draining my energy, which is terrible, but at the same time, I don't want to take any chances. Better to lay low and pray the Duke can't find me.

Using my Telekinesis, I hover over the ground, slowly moving forward without splashing in puddles. Every so often, I grab a rock and tap the walls to light the way, but otherwise, I remain entirely silent.

Splashing sounds in the distance, along with the voices of incredibly cute women, make my heart flutter. Not this time, I think to myself. Sirens can go to hell.

"Oooh, hehehe..." One of the girls coos to someone out of sight. As I draw closer to one walled-off alcove, a large opening reveals a massive demon with hulking armor sitting silently before a pool. Located before him is a giant pool of water, one where dozens of creatures splash around playfully. After a moment of observing them, I realize they aren't sirens, but instead, mermaids.

"Barbatos, sweetie, are you feeling okay?" One of the mermaids pulls herself out of the water and splashes onto the land beside the iron giant. I slow my hovering for a moment to observe their interaction. "You were gone for over a month! Come on, take off all that armor, and we'll show you a good time!"

The demon shifts slightly, his heavy plates of steel grinding together. "No need."

"I heard that nasty Black Witch hurt you! I can't believe it, love! I thought you were invincible!" While the mermaid crows at him, two others swim over and stop at the edge of the pool.

"Defeated. Yes. Agares, dead. I was lucky."

The demon's voice is deep and ominous, yet tinged with sadness and melancholy. Only now do I remember his name.

Barbatos! He's one of the Dukes of Hell! Shit. I can't stay here. I barely escaped the last guy. What the fuck is wrong with me?

Continuing past the entrance, I start to hover away, only to freeze as Barbatos speaks. "Intruder. Reveal yourself."

My heart slams. Fuck that! This guy is the size of a mountain!

I land on my feet and start running, only to gasp in alarm. Without so much as disturbing the air, the metal monster appears in front of me.

Red flag! Danger! My mind screams at me to run, but I hesitate, unsure what my best move is.

Barbatos stands, arms crossed. "Show yourself."

Guilty, I mutter under my breath, "Reveal."

As my body reforms, the Duke's helmet shifts slightly. "Human?"

"If it's a fight you want," I say, raising my tiny fists and striking a pose, "I'll give it to you."

Barbatos is several inches taller than me. His armor adds to his size, making him appear nearly eight feet tall. However, despite his intimidating appearance, the Duke makes no motion to fight. "Sacred place. Leave. Never return."

I stare dumbly. "W-what? You're letting me go?"

"Fighting. War. Unending. Not for me. My creed. Protect friends only."

"Ohhh. O-okay then, big guy. Well, uh, th-thanks."

Slowly, I take a few steps away, careful not to turn my back on him. The Duke doesn't move. Returning from the direction I came, I creep past the mermaid alcove.

Two of the mermaids hiss at me. I ignore them.

Once my spherical vision can no longer make out Barbatos's form in the distance, I turn and quicken my pace, vigilantly ensuring I don't step in and puddles of water.

Never return, echoes Barbatos's voice in my head.

My teeth grind together as I shiver in fear. Hey man, no problem. I'm sorry I bugged ya, pal. Have fun with the mermaids!

Sigh... today is getting worse minute by minute.

"Gwahaha! You lost him?! What an idiot!" Bael roars and slaps his knee while guffawing at Mephisto. I stare Bael down until he realizes his laughter is annoying me. He tapers off and rubs his nose. "Err, sorry, boss."

"Mephisto," I begin, turning away from Bael, "Where did you last see the human?"

The Duke of Mist twitches his boney fingers impatiently. "Ksss. Emperor Diablo, the flessshbag wasss only inchesss in front of me, and then he disssappeared. Hisss copiesss sssplit up and made it difficult for me to follow."

I nod slowly. "So when you say he vanished, you mean you slashed the copy, and then it dissolved like the others?"

Mephisto bows his head. "Nay. The flessshbag vanissshed before I could ssstrike hisss back."

"Teleportation, then, in addition to illusory magic and a blade of light that can cut through anything. This Jason fellow has a veritable grab bag of powers. Damn. I should have questioned Beelzebub more about the human's abilities. Defeating a Lord isn't a small task, even if he is a Hero."

Bael rolls his eyes. "I've seen some weak heroes in my life. Remember that guy with no legs?"

"How could I forget?"

"Dunno."

A moment of silence passes while I contemplate how to capture this newly awakened Hero.

Bael glowers at me. "Hey. Boss. Do... do you think that the sword Beelzebub saw was..."

"Excalibur? Not a chance. If the human possessed Excalibur, we'd know by now. Hell itself could be rent in half if that weapon fell into a Hero's hands."

Bael chuckles slightly. "Hehe. Okay, good. I was a little worried, ya know?"

"So am I," I mutter. "A Hero and the Black Queen. One alone under ordinary circumstances would be an emergency, but both at once..."

Mephisto's head twitches. "I ssshould contact Umi. Ssshe is our bessst Oracle. Ssshe will help us find that flessshbag, and then-"

"No. We have bigger problems to worry about." I hold up a palm to silence Mephisto. "So far, Jason hasn't caused us any problems. I'm much more worried about what he said regarding Amelia. If she's alive and devouring another planet, we may be too late to stop her. We've already lost Agares, and the Overlords won't take kindly to us requesting the destruction of a second planet. They'll think me incompetent."

I pause for a moment to consider my options. "Mephisto, I want you to scour the Labyrinth and find out where that damn Belial is hiding. If she doesn't help us, we'll never defeat Amelia."

Bael's smile melts away, and a look of worry crosses his face. "Say, boss, what if when you fought the little witch, you used-"

"No. Don't even whisper what you're thinking out loud. I'll never unleash that power again."

Mephisto cocks his head curiously, but I don't answer the question in his eyes.

I only used my power once. I damn near killed every other demon in existence. If I lose control like that again, nobody here will be able to stop me.

An Emperor's job is to oversee all the other demons. I have to keep them alive, happy, and healthy... not necessarily in that order. Matters of war should almost always be for the Dukes. Besides, if I die, who will lead? Bael? Belial?

No. A recluse of a First Emperor, a whore of a Second, and an idiot for my First Duke. I'm the only remotely capable demon here.

I wish it didn't have to be that way. Ruling is such a devil-damned pain in the ass.

"You heard me, Mephisto. Find Belial. No second-guessing my orders. Bael and I will hunt that human down. With luck, he'll lead us right to the Black Queen... and checkmate."

"Keh keh keh... asss you command, Emperor Diablo." Mephisto says with a bow. A moment later, he turns around and fades into the wall.

Bael and I start walking down the passageway opposite where the human vanished. He nudges me. "C'mon, boss. If you use your transformation when other demons ain't around, there shouldn't be a problem, right? The Black Bitch will be on a human planet! Nobody will get hurt but her!"

I nod. "I know, Bael. However, that sick taste in my heart was something I never wish to experience again. It's not something I can put into words."

Bael nods, and for once, he takes a moment to think before he speaks.

"Well, if that's the way you feel, ain't no way I'm convincin' ya. Anyway, I can't wait to wrap my hands around the little bitch's neck. Agares owed me three blood pies! Now I'll never get 'em!"

"I'm glad you have your priorities in order," I mutter.

"Thanks, boss."

Sighing, I avert my eyes. If Bael ever ran the Labyrinth; our kind would go extinct within a hundred years.

Count on it.

Part 034: The Sweet Life of Phoebe

I step out of my room and click the door behind me, adjusting my leather chest armor to a better angle. I don't need to wear it around the city, but I always feel exposed without its protection enveloping me.

Stepping outside, I look up into the sky and smile. Snow lightly sprinkles down on the environmental shield above. Thanks to Jason's Crown, I've made a device that stymies the weather from disturbing Tarus II's populace. With Jason gone, we've had to construct new buildings ourselves, and a few people still sleep in tightly packed lodges. At least with the environmental shield, they can sleep on a bench outside without freezing to death.

Saul has been helpful when it comes to planning out the city. It turns out he used to work for a Hero too, just like me! King Solomon, the sort of guy who liked to build big, fabulous things everywhere. I do find it interesting that Saul possesses the opposing tastes of his former king. He prefers drab uniform layouts for buildings. He despises flashy bling and jewelry and deliberately wears the same brown leather clothing every day.

"Oh, hello, Miss Berthold!" A woman yells out my name as I exit the palace. I glance at the building across the street and wave.

"Hi, Debra! Lovely weather out!"

She winks at me. "Oh, you! Haha."

Debra is Hans Wagner's assistant. She usually helps out at the factory. I don't know much about her, but she seems like a nice lady.

"I'm off to the Core. I'll see you later."

"You too, Miss Berthold."

As she enters the store across the street, I step out and head in the opposite direction, toward a newly constructed garage. My heart races with excitement as I spot my truck. Oooh! I can't wait to go driving!

I love driving. I was terrified the first time Jason threw me in his Fur-rawr-ree, but once he apologized, I realized speeding around was incredibly fun! I get to travel faster than a cheetah!

Walking into the garage, I glance past the row of buses toward my truck and wave. "Mister Ogie! Are you here today?"

"Ah! Dammit!" A gruff voice and the sound of a salamander striking his head on the underside of a bus makes me wince. "Dagnabbit, woman! You scared the daylights outta me!"

I glance down at the basket in my hand. "Oh, jeez! I'm sorry. I have these sweet rolls, and I just wanted to offer you one."

From the other side of the bus, the salamander freezes for a moment, then skitters around on his back legs, landing on his front with a thud as he screeches to a stop. "Ohh! Sweet Rolls! I love those! Why didn't ya say so, honey?"

Reaching into the basket, I pull one out and hand it to the ruby-colored lizard. "Here you go. I hope the mate and eggs are doing well."

Ogie's slit-eyes expand as he lunges his tongue forward and snatches the pastry from my grasp, wolfing the whole thing in one bite. "Om-nom. Oh, sacred saints! It's divine! Opening a shop next to you musta been the best decision of my life!"

"Second best," I say, chidingly. "Tell Jeera I said hello. I'm off to the Core to deliver these to our hardworking boys."

He stares longingly at my basket before shaking himself out of his stupor. "Oh, yeah, that reminds me! Truck's fixed. You did a number on the fender and the rear axle, but I got it all bent back into shape for ya. "

"Oh, sweetie, I knew you would." I lean down and give the top of his head a little kiss before walking over and climbing into my truck. "Thanks for all your hard work."

His scales turn violet as he blushes madly and rubs the spot where I kissed him. "Aw, shucks. Anything for you. Hardly any trouble at all. Just don't forget me when you bake something."

"I won't!"

My truck instantly turns on, and I slam the door shut. After waving goodbye to Ogie, I pull out of the garage and go on my way.

Buildings swish past, and pedestrians of varying backgrounds all look up and smile when they see me. My giant truck always turns heads. I wave at several people and monsters I recognize, beaming my happiest grin at a few patrolmen as well.

The situation in Hero City has improved dramatically over the last few months. Armed guards walk our streets, crime is almost nonexistent, and everyone lives in harmony. It's a dream come true.

I'm sometimes surprised by how little conflict we have. In the world I was born, humans attacked each other for the pettiest reasons. Brutal fights broke out in bars, men would rape the wives of their fellow man, and not even King Arthur, with all his heroic powers, could unite humanity for even a few moments at a time.

But Jason did. Whether intentionally or accidentally, he created a stable society, one we steadily seek to improve.

My smile fades. How long will our peaceful coexistence last? Humans and monsters have hardly lived together for half a year. What if winter drains our stores and people grow desperate? What if a fight breaks out and someone says something vile, permanently damaging the community?

Humans aren't stable creatures. We grow bored. We become restless. We seek adventure, expansion, and new horizons. Nothing lasts forever, in my opinion.

I smack my face several times. No, Phoebe! Think positive thoughts! Stop with the pessimism!

Driving down the cliffside and past the border wall for Hero City, I continue through the forest, which now has several huts sprinkled among the trees. Twenty minutes later, I pop out of the woodlands and zip past several military encampments near the warpgate. We've increased our fighting presence dramatically, and the environmental shields are nearly at a point where we can create a protective anti-snow bubble from Hero City all the way to the warpgate.

I slow to a stop as a male Kitsune, (a fox-man) jogs over to a barbed steel gate surrounding the portal. His uniform is pristine and ironed, with a little badge indicating his rank of Lieutenant. Neil's been sure to focus on military discipline a lot these days.

A uniformed human man appears at my window. "Good morning, Miss Berthold! Here on business?" He smiles, and I note that the gate is already cranking open for me.

"Oh no, not particularly, Henry. Say, have you been a good boy lately?"

His change in posture is hilarious! Henry snaps to attention and jerks his hand up to salute. "Yes, ma'am! Reporting for goodies! I mean duty!" I can almost see the drool building up in his mouth.

"Alright, I have two sweet-rolls. One for you, and one for Piper over there. He's always so quick with that gate!"

Piper, the Kitsune fox-man, woofs at me and waggles his tail excitedly. He can probably smell my treats from here. "Oooh, thank yooou Miss Berthooold! You're too goooood for us!" He howls and draws out a few of his words.

Kitsune's are a lot like minotaurs, in that they have fox heads and lower bodies, but human torsos. It allows them to grip weapons and guns with ease, while also giving them cute, pettable heads. I do have to wonder where these strange demihumans come from, since most of Bahamut's demonology books don't go into any detail on their origins.

Handing Henry the two goodies, I wave goodbye again and drive through the gate, up the ramp, and through the portal.

My excursions are well known, and once I arrive in the Core, I drive down into the arena and park my truck in a spot people have made for me. There's a little platform that spins, and it helps me turn around and face the right direction, so I don't have to back into the portal when I leave.

Poking my fingers in my ears, I yawn to make them pop, then jump out of the truck. The sound of heavy footsteps come thudding toward me, and a moment later, Kar pops into view, along with his little fairy assistant, Blinker.

"Hurgh. White-hair, I am always pleased to see you."

I nod politely, then dip into my basket. "Would you like a sweet roll, Kar?"

He shakes his head. "Butterfly insists I go on a diet. My sincerest apologies."

"Darn right I do! This fatty barely leaves the Core!" Blinker flutters around and lands on my shoulder. "I'm always on a diet, but I might cheat today! Can I have some?"

I nod, then tear off a small chunk of the roll. "Here you go."

Despite how small it is, Blinker can barely wrap her tiny arms around it. "Goodness! So generous! This will feed my entire extended family for the rest of winter."

I smile at the tiny woman. She's stunning, though one would only notice if they squinted carefully. Her long, red, flowing locks are the opposite of my short, straight hair. They bounce and curl all over the place. Even better is her taste in clothing. She wears a pretty green satin dress that adheres to her body and shows off her curves.

Blinker grunts and pants, as she flaps hard and flies over to land on Kar's shoulder. I can barely make out any details about her from this distance, but I'm certain she's sweating.

She puffs up her cheeks and glares at Kar. "Hey! Don't say it! I know what you're thinking!"

Kar's lip trembles as he holds in a chuckle. "Hu... huhu... I doubt I'm the only one who needs exercise."

"Kar!!" The fairy jumps to her feet and smacks his scaled face. "Jerk! Ass! I told you not to say anything!"

The Sphinx doesn't feel Blinker's slaps at all. Her body is physically weak, but her enchanting spells are quite formidable. If she went all out with her magic, I don't think Kar would remain unmoved.

An hour later, I plop down beside Neil at his office desk as he adjusts a monocle over his eye and squints to examine a piece of parchment. I don't like to pry, so I won't examine it closely. Knowing Neil, it's probably something related to the military.

A minute passes. Neil flicks his eyes up. "Yes, Phoebe?"

"Is that any way to talk to a friend?"

He smiles. "I'm just kidding. I thought you might pester me if I didn't say anything, but you have the patience of an owl."

"Well, that's one nice thing about me," I muse aloud. "I brought you a sweet roll. Last one!"

"Saving the best for last? Or did the good ones with icing already get picked?"

"Nope! I made sure you would get the drippingest wettest sweetest roll I baked."

Neil raises an eyebrow. "Miss Berthold. Drippingest is not a word. What have I told you about inventing terms?"

"Umm, that it's quirky and cute?"

Neil smirks. "If God wanted that word to exist, he'd have created it."

"That's not how words work."

"Says the absent-minded peasant."

"To the stiff, uptight general."

I try not to laugh as Neil frowns at me. "I-I'm not uptight."

"Of course not. Eat your treat, Neil."

He shrugs, immediately disregards my playful poking, and snatches the roll from my hand. "Mmm. Remind me again why we don't enslave you and put you to work in the bakery all day long?"

"For the same reason that nobody challenges you to a swordfight."

"Because it's dangerous?"

"Because it's dangerous."

Another nod. Neil takes a considerable bite out of the roll and looks away for a moment. "So, are you doing okay, Phoebe?"

"Of course. Why do you ask?"

He takes another bite and chews for several moments before swallowing. "Well, Jason's been gone for two months. I know he occasionally calls and speaks to you with his Wordsmithing, but, surely you're-"

"Oh, Neil. That's sweet of you to wonder, but I'm fine. I'm not a little girl who needs a big strong man around to keep me from bursting into tears."

Slowly, Neil licks his lips, then fans his wavy brown hair further up his forehead. "Well, one of the men told me he saw you staring at a wall with a blank look on your face recently. I just thought... you know..."

"I'm fine, Neil. I was lost in thought, that's all."

"I see." Neil pauses before quickly throwing the rest of the roll in his mouth. Three bites and it's gone, wow, I think to myself. He's unstoppable.

I raise an eyebrow. "Is that all?"

"Yup. If you say you're fine, then you're fine." Neil smacks his hands together and brushes the crumbs off, then adjusts his ponytail. "Those mobile rice replicators were a good idea, Phoebe." He says, changing the subject. "I've heard that many of our soldiers love them. Fairly light on power consumption, too."

I nod. "The miniature fission reactors don't generate much power, but they were enough for my needs."

He continues, "Mind if I make a request, though? I've been thinking about developing a helmet that can see different bands of light. It'll help our exploration efforts immensely if we don't need flashlights."

My nose crinkles. "Mmm. A helmet? Okay. I'll ask Hans. I'll need a few more specifics, though."

From outside the office, an alarm blares. Intruder detected at turret perimeter. Single demon. Rank: Lord. Threat level: Low. Deploying non-lethal countermeasures now.

Neil rolls his eyes. "They never stop trying, do they? How many times are the turrets going to wipe out a platoon of skeletons before the demons wise up?" He sighs, then grabs a paper out from under the one he was reading when I entered. As he pulls it free, I notice it's a drawing made in pen. "I sketched a mockup for Hans. It has the specifications I need for the helmet. Think you can get this to him?"

Slowly I nod. I can't understand the technical aspects, though if I were wearing Jason's Crown, I could. "The design looks simple enough. Shouldn't take more than a day to get a prototype working."

Neil blushes. "Thank you, Phoebe. You're an angel. Honestly, with how hard you work, always making new devices for us, delivering us sweets, visiting the wounded in the hospitals... you should take a vacation."

I flinch inwardly, surprising even myself. "N-no, Neil. That's fine. I like working hard."

Neil sighs. "Ahh, I knew it. C'mon, you can't lie to me. It's written all over your face. You're only working so hard because it takes your mind off Jason."

I shake my head quickly, feeling a tinge of panic as I try to come up with an excuse. "No, no, it's not that, Neil! It's... uh... it's..."

"It isn't that you miss him, right? It's that you're worried he'll get into trouble." Neil nods knowingly. "I understand. You have the same look my wife had before I left to fight in the war. She would always get that anxious look on... on her..." Neil trails off, and a ghostly expression passes over his face. "Though... I suppose she was right to worry."

The memory of what Bahamut took from him turn's Neil's pleasant expression into one of bitterness. "I can't ever see Melia again. Shit. I was worried about you, and now look at me."

Quickly, I reach over and rest my hand on his. "Don't feel bad, Neil. I know you care. That's all that matters to me. Let's drop it, okay?"

Neil uses his free hand and wipes a tear from his eye. "Yes, an excellent idea. Well, I ought to get back to work."

Outside, the alarm blares again. Intruder detected at turret perimeter. Single demon. Rank: Lord. Status: Continuing to engage defensive perimeter. Requesting permission to deploy lethal countermeasures..

"Ugh," Neil groans. "That fella is a persistent one. I might as well escort you to your truck and see what all the fuss-"

BOOM!

A terrific explosion shakes our room, causing the two of us to jump in fright and gasp involuntarily.

"What in the name of God was-" Neil doesn't finish his sentence, instead opting to jump out of his seat. "Ph-Phoebe! Are you all right?"

I nod, my heart racing. "Yes! Let's check on the soldiers!"

By the time we make it to the doorway, the sound of blaster fire and screams of anguish rush to our ears. I gawk and stare as a single demon stands by himself, the Great Doors thrown open, and blasts waves of fire from his palms into the crowd of panicked monsters and humans.

"B-battle stations!" Neil yells. "Form a line! He's using flame abilities! Get the hoses- gwaugh!" A jet of flame races at us, causing Neil to leap back and shove me inside his office. The fire barely nicks his back. He lands on top of me, accidentally slamming his elbow into my stomach and knocking the wind out of me.

Kahk!" I gasp, unable to breathe.

"Phoebe! Oh god, Phoebe! I'm sorr- shit!" Neil leaps to his feet, quickly confirming my injury is anything but fatal.

I croak out, "Guh-go! Lee-heeeave me!"

Neil nods and dashes out the entrance, while I roll around and writhe on the floor, gasping for breath.

All the while, the screams of my friends turning to ash fill me with rage.

Part 035: Battle For The Core; Beelzebub Unleashed!

Recommended Listening

The alarm blares overhead. RED ALERT. ALL SOLDIERS TO COMBAT POSITIONS. ENEMY FORCES HAVE BREACHED THE ENTRANCE. RED ALERT. ALL SOLDIERS TO...

Breathe, Phoebe! Inhale! Get up! What would Arthur say if he saw you in this state?!

My mind shrieks at me as I stagger to my feet. Neil doesn't look like a heavy man, but he exercises regularly. His elbow hit just the right spot to knock me for a loop.

The screams outside rapidly decrease in volume. A horrible cackling fills the air as the demon newcomer laughs maniacally. "Filthy insects! Beg for mercy! This is your comeuppance for humiliating me! Rue the day you crossed my path!"

A second wind hits me, and I dive out of the doorway, landing behind cover. The demon sprays fire from his hand at someone in the opposite direction, so I poke my head out to survey the room. Bodies of humans and monsters lie crumpled in every direction. Despite this, I stare in confusion at the fact that no fires rage anywhere. The entire room should be ablaze with the flames he's putting out, but-

No! That's not it! His flames, rainbow-colored, rapidly shift hues from red, purple, and white to green. Ducking back, I close my eyes for a moment and focus, remembering all those months I spent researching demonology.

Fire that doesn't burn, but kills instantly. Soulfire! That must be it! It's a rare ability that only Emperors should have access to... but... this demon is only a Lord! He's not a high enough rank to wield such a powerful ability!

My eyes spin under my eyelids as I focus and remember the exact text. Soulfire is potent magic. It tears the souls of humans right out of their bodies. A small amount will kill an unprotected human instantly, but against entities with higher magic abilities, such as monsters and angels, it will consume the user's energy and that of the enemy as well.

There's more, though. Soulfire weakens the user if they don't actively hit anyone with it. High risk, high reward.

I quickly look back. The demon, despite his cackling, already appears fatigued. He stops blasting the soulfire for a moment and wipes his forehead. Chance! I can attack!

Suddenly, the demon's body begins to secrete visible red energy. His eyes bulge. He sinks to one knee. The two small horns on the sides of his head slowly grow in size, gaining a few inches. His red skin deepens in hue, and a look of delight spreads across his face.

Mutation?! I didn't know Soulfire could absorb the souls directly into a demon's body!

The alarm, as if hearing my question, pauses for a moment before continuing with a slightly altered message. ALL SOLDIERS TO COMBAT POSITIONS. ENEMY THREAT LEVEL REVISED: BARON-LEVEL DEMON DETECTED. INCREASING ALARM LEVEL TO ALPHA.

The demon jumps to his feet and clenches a fist. "Hahahaha! Yes! That's right! I am Beelzebub, the Baron of Flames! Bow before me, weaklings!"

Beelzebub's horns aren't the only part of his body that changed. Below the black suit, his muscle mass increased dramatically, as well. Not only that, but he grew several inches taller.

Damn! Beelzebub must be a pureblood demon. No wonder he was able to breach our defenses without the help of any other forces. If he has Soulfire, then he might be significantly mightier than an average demon of the same rank.

My eyes swivel around the room. Weapon... I need a weapon! My eyes jerk to a trooper in the middle of the room, his limp corpse resting atop an energy rifle. Beelzebub's eyes swivel to someone else, and I take my opportunity to leap out of cover and dive for the weapon.

My heart catches as the demon turns his gaze toward me. His smile widens, and he snaps his fingers, forming a narrow cone of soulfire. As it shoots at me, my mind yells, don't let it touch you, girl!

I try to grab the gun, but it's wedged under the soldier's body. Rolling to the right, I narrowly avoid Beelzebub's attack as his soulfire explodes on the man's corpse. I pause for a second, then jump back and yank with all my strength, hefting him off the gun and grabbing the weapon.

Beelzebub narrows his eyes and points his full attention at me. "Tch. Aren't you the agile little water-flea? This attack will put you in your place." He raises his thumb, points his index finger, and curls the rest of his fingers together, forming his hand into the shape of a gun.

My pulse quickens as a tiny burst of fire shoots past my head, much faster than anything Beelzebub has used until now. A console explodes behind me, and Beelzebub's smile widens again. "Dance for me, rat!"

I rush forward, ducking and dodging as he fires bullets of flame, each one missing me by inches. Every time he moves his thumb, he shoots another fire-bullet.

Damn! How is Beelzebub shooting at the speed of a machinegun?!

From the other side of the room, Neil yells out, "Foul demon! I won't let you get away with this!" I take cover behind a computer console, even as three more of Beelzebub's bullets impact the side opposite me. The entire panel shakes from the force of his bullets, but the attack stops. Beelzebub turns his attention to Neil.

A high-pitched whine squeals through the hangar, a sound I recognize as one of Hans' prototype experimental weapons. The railgun!

Two seconds later, Neil activates it. A whine fills the air, then a shockwave races around the room as the gun fires a sliver of metal.

PIFF.

When I look back, my eyes widen.

One of Beelzebub's arms tears from his body and drops to the ground. Behind him, a tiny hole in the wall reveals the spot the shrapnel entered. Based on previous tests, the sliver of metal will travel for over a mile before slowing to a stop.

Beelzebub doesn't grunt in pain, and instead ignores his missing limb. He cocks his head and points his finger-gun at Neil. "An admirable effort, human. I see the rumors of human weaponry were true. After I dispose of you, the Council will reward me handsomely."

A moment later, Beelzebub fires one of his bullets. Neil tries to duck behind cover, but screams in pain. "Gaaaugh!"

I can't see what happened, but Beelzebub's shot must have met its mark.

Taking advantage of Neil's distraction, I level my weapon and aim down the sights. "This is for my friends, you despicable bastard."

Ten shots of plasma leave the weapon's barrel, one after the other. FWU-FWU-FWU.

My blood chills. Beelzebub swivels his palm without looking at me and blocks all the bullets- no, that isn't it. He's absorbing the plasma! Shit! Phoebe, you idiot! His elemental affinity is fire. That much is obvious. Superheated plasma won't be any use against him!

"You again," The demon chuckles. "Leave it to a stupid wench to shoot the Baron of Flames with tiny balls of fire."

Beelzebub inhales. A moment later, the stump where his arm used to be trembles. A new limb sprouts from the shredded skin and bone, sending blood spraying over the floor as it reforms. Within five seconds, the arm finishes regenerating, and he smirks. "Oh! What a delightful new ability."

"Graaaah!" A roar shakes the room. Kar leaps from the far side of the chamber, smashes into the ground beside Beelzebub, and slaps the demon's chest. Beelzebub yelps and impacts the wall like a cannonball. Kar forms signs with his claws, causing the wall to transforms into a massive earthen jaw and clamp onto Beelzebub.

I evaluate the ability in an instant — Earth manipulation. Kar can alter the Labyrinth's walls since they're made of densely packed dirt.

"You can do it, Kar!" A little voice squeaks. Blinker floats in the air twenty feet above him, waving her hands and forming magic signs, increasing Kar's strength bit by bit. "Give him the ol' one-two! And the new one-two! Give him all the one-twos!!!"

Kar doesn't reply but seems happy to oblige. He delivers a volley of punches into Beelzebub's trapped form, pounding the defenseless demon without mercy. "Graaahh! Bastard! Honorless scum! I'll make you pay!"

Kar rears back to punch the demon's face, but when he swings his fist, Beelzebub counters. The Baron of Flames unleashes a terrifically bright light like the sun from his body. Spots drown my vision. I stumble back and scream in surprise. Judging by the roar of confusion, it must have stunned Kar too, but I can't see anything!

Fumbling around, I strain to hear what's going on as Beelzebub screams in rage. "Pathetic reptile! You'll never compare to Agares!"

The sound of crackling flames fills the air.

Blinker yelps in fright. "Aaaiiee!"

Gunshots.

Kar howls in pain as something strikes his scales over and over.

By the time my bleary vision comes trickling back, the battle has practically ended. Beelzebub flies in the air by pouring fire through the soles of his boots. He delivers a highly concentrated blazing inferno at Kar's body, pinning the crocodile against the wall. Kar pants frantically as he holds his scaled arms up to defend himself, but the heat is blisteringly intense, to the point I can feel it from here. He's going to die!

"You forgot about me!" Neil staggers out from behind cover, his left arm hanging limp. Blood drips from his mouth as he flops to the ground and uses all his strength to heft the humongous railgun onto his lap. The weapon fires, and Beelzebub gasps, as his entire chest cavity explodes, sending guts everywhere. My eyes follow his form as he falls and- OH NO! Blinker!

The fairy woman lies on the floor beneath him, wheezing in pain. She must have gotten stunned and fell earlier when Beelzebub used his blinding- look out!

Beelzebub's body slams into the ground, crushing her tiny body instantly.

I cry out helplessly. "Blinker! No!"

Kar, his entire body glowing from the heat of Beelzebub's flames, wheezes. He stumbles forward and falls. Hearing me call out Blinker's name, his eyes follow mine, and he connects the dots.

"What... n-no... B-Butter... fly..." Kar gasps for breath and stretches both arms out toward Beelzebub's collapsed form, over thirty feet away.

I quickly rush over to the crocodilian sphinx, wincing as I close the gap. The heat in this area feels like stepping into an oven. Kar must be in agony!

"Hu... hurrgh... White-hair..." Kar's eyes track me as I approach. The visible veins inside his pupils tell me they're bloodshot from the heat. "Butterfly... where..."

I can't touch Kar or get close. He's damn durable, but my body is merely flesh. I nod at him and quickly grab a sword lying on the ground nearby, tossing my gun to the side. "I'll avenge her, Kar."

He nods weakly, then goes still.

I don't know if he's dead. Gods! How powerful is Beelzebub? How can a mere Baron be this unstoppable?!"

Shaking the fear out of my head, I quickly run over to Beelzebub's collapsed body on the ground and swing my foot with all my strength, driving my boot into his face. The impact knocks him off Blinker and rolls him a few feet away. I glance down at the fairy's unmoving form. Her glowing aura is almost gone.

My hands tremble as I scan the room around me. Faces of men and women, friends of mine, all who will never see the light of day ever again, whisper to me. You failed us, Phoebe... just like you failed Arthur.

I glower at Beelzebub. No. He did this.

I squeeze the hilt of my sword, pressing its cold steel against my palm. Beelzebub coughs. Already, the hole in his chest is healing up. His regeneration is overwhelming.

Before the demon can reform his chest, I lunge at him and plunge my sword into his heart. Beelzebub's body spasms uncontrollably. He tries to swipe at me with his hand, but the motion is weak and pathetic. I wrench the sword, twisting it around and opening the hole deeper, then I yank it out and begin swinging. CHOP! CHOP! CHOP!

Over and over, I put my anger into every swing, hacking his worthless, shitty, pathetic, evil body into as many parts as I can. I lop off his arm, bite into his neck, and spray his innards all over my boots. Even so, his wounds continue to close. He stares up at me and smiles, a look of hate in his eyes. Wordlessly, I kick and hack and chop, sending gouts of blood everywhere, only for them to close seconds later.

Minutes pass. Sweat pours down my face.

His regeneration is speeding up!

There were over ten thousand human and monster soldiers in the Core when Beelzebub attacked, but his ambush wiped most of them out! Even as I try to beat Beelzebub's regeneration, a sense of dread overwhelms me.

I can't win! Beelzebub is going to regenerate before we can kill him!

My arms ache. Again and again, I chop. In the distance, I can hear coughs as survivors manage to rally together. I spare a glance back at Kar, but his form continues to lie still. When I return my gaze to Beelzebub, I yelp in fright as his hand lunges out and grabs my ankle. Red-hot agony explodes in my ankle, causing me to jump away. I stumble and fall on my side, unable to walk.

My leg burns. A quick examination reveals a handprint seared into my skin. The flesh bubbles for a few moments as every nerve fizzles in the immediate area.

Then, the real pain hits.

My back seizes as something awful burns in my stomach. The electric, molten sensation courses through my limbs and into my head. By the time it stops, my hand aches from how hard I've gripped my sword.

I flick my gaze to Beelzebub. His suit is in tatters and covered in blood.

The Duke rises to his feet and glares at me. "Satisfied? It's my turn now, wench. I'll take my time peeling you apart. Soulfire is too good for the likes of you."

Beelzebub fires a flame bullet into my arm, tearing it off and sending it flying. "Aaaahhh!" I fall on my back, writhing and trying to push away. The loss of my limb causes pain like I've never imagined in all my life to cripple my mind. I can't think! I can't fight back! I'm powerless!

Beelzebub takes two steps closer, a wicked grin on his face. "You think that hurts?" His voice hisses cold as ice.

FWUMP.

A second bullet blows out my right knee.

The agony threatens to break my mind.

"Foolish woman. You haven't a clue how much your steel bit me. I'll pay you back in spades, mark my words. But first..."

Beelzebub turns to Neil. The commander fumbles with a cartridge, trying to reload the railgun with one arm. Each round is the size of a sword, and quite heavy. Neil panics as the demon looks at him. He drops the cartridge. It rolls down the steps and toward Beelzebub, who smirks.

"Oops. There goes your little toy? Now, then, hold still while I kill you."

Beelzebub raises his finger and points it at Neil's head.

WHUMP

A flash of movement.

Something moves far too quickly for my eyes to follow. Beelzebub's body vanishes.

An impact against the far wall, near where Kar fell, catches my attention. I struggle to turn my head to look.

Beelzebub stands, calmly, his suit fully repaired. At his feet lies... Beelzebub?! What?! There's two of them! The one on the ground has a torn-up suit, but the one standing is good as new.

Who... what's going on?!

The new Beelzebub glares at the beaten-up one. "Greedy child. Had I known someone like you was planning something, I would have stayed in the Core. You will leave, or I will make you go.

A stunned expression fills the injured Beelzebub's face. He tilts his head up to look at his attacker. "Who the devil?!"

"LEAVE!" The new one grabs the old by the neck and hurls him at the Great Doors with such speed and strength that the moment he hits it, dozens of bones break in multiple gruesome ways.

The former Beelzebub struggles on the ground, writhing and gurgling blood. The new one turns his back on his crumpled doppelganger and looks at Kar. "You're fine. Get up." With a motion of his hands, New Beelzebub touches Kar's cooling body, and the lizard gasps, swinging his claws wildly. "Buh-Butterfly! Butterfly!"

After a moment, Kar's confusion wears off. He spins to look at Blinker, then jumps over to her, clearing the fifty-foot gap in a single jump. Ignoring his savior, Kar's claw trembles as he carefully scoops up her tiny lifeless form. "No... no... Butterfly..."

Satisfied with his good deed, New Beelzebub paces to Old Beelzebub and towers over his trembling form. "You've made quite the mess. All I wanted was a little peace and quiet, but you couldn't let me have that, could you?"

Old Beelzebub cranes his neck to stare at his clone. "Who...?"

"The Core is under my protection. If I ever see you here again, I will not spare you. Is that clear?"

Old Beelzebub nods dumbly. "Uh... uh huh..."

I can barely sense the auras of magical beings. What I notice now is the ridiculous difference in the power of their auras. Old Beelzebub, while a roaring fire compared to any human, is a drop in the bucket compared to the new one. If I concentrate my mind, I can't see an aura, but instead, an overwhelming wall of blackness. Measuring the two is like comparing a lizard to a dragon.

Old Beelzebub must see his copy's aura as well. After his body regenerates, he crawls to his feet and hunches over. "Of... of course."

"No." Kar's voice growls out in the air. A sinister rage enters his eyes. "I won't let him leave alive."

"You will," New Beelzebub says. "I've resolved everything."

Delicately, Kar places Blinker on the floor, then rises to a standing position. His eyes turn hollow as his pupils fully expand.

"I said... I won't... let him leave... ALIVE!"

Kar balls his reptilian claws into fists. A heartbeat as loud as a drum booms from his chest. The scales on his body shimmer and melt away. Feathery fur takes their place. His reptilian face and body morph into that of a lion as he eases down onto four limbs. Then, two wings sprout from his back.

The Sphinx. Only twice did I see Bahamut's Super Form. It was considered her ultimate technique, one that transformed her into a lithe killing machine. However, her transformation was nothing compared to Kar's. His already massive body ripples with power, causing him to double in size.

"Easy now, big guy," New Beelzebub says, raising a palm. "Don't do anything you'll regret."

Too late. Kar hunches down and roars, a primal sound that rattles the nearby consoles. "GROOOOH!"

He leaps at one server, then bounces off and pounces at Old Beelzebub. To my surprise, New Beelzebub steps aside and sighs, rolling his eyes. "Men."

Old Beelzebub sees the attack coming, but is far too slow to dodge it. Kar's claw swipes across Beelzebub's chest and eviscerates him, ripping out his innards and throwing them all over the walls. Two more swings later, and Beelzebub can hardly move. The Baron of Flames opens his mouth and chokes out a blast of embers into the lion's face, and Kar howls in pain, recoiling to rub his eyes.

While those two fight, New Beelzebub shuffles over to me but pauses in front of Blinker's limp body. "Oh. She isn't dead." With a motion, he sends a wave of healing energy at the fairy, then walks over to me. "Are you okay, Phoebe?"

I clutch my bloody stump and cough. "Y-you know... my name?"

"We haven't met, but I know who you are. Everyone does." He flippantly makes a few hand signs, and the burning pain in my body fades. A minute later, while Old Beelzebub screeches in pain, New Beelzebub finishes healing everyone nearby, including me. I gasp in amazement as my beaten and battered body returns to pristine condition, mimicking the healing magic I've only ever seen Jason use.

"Heavy losses. Damn. For a Baron, Beelzebub has quite the potential. It'd be a shame for him to go out like this."

New Beelzebub scoops up Blinker, and she winces. "Ow... owwiiee... uwah!" Noticing who's holding her, Blinker scrambles to fly away, but New Beelzebub closes his palm gently, holding her tight. "Don't be frightened. I'm not the one who attacked you. Is that unpleasant crocodile a friend of yours?"

Blinker nods. "Uh.... um... yes! But... aren't you Beelzebub?"

"I'm not. Can you tell your boyfriend to calm down? I'd rather not have to stop him with violence."

Blinker glances over and notices Kar's rampage right as he chomps down and tears off one of Beelzebub's legs. "Why? That demon deserves to die! Didn't you see what he did?!"

"There's been enough killing, today. Tell your boyfriend to stop, or I'll make him. I'm not warning you again."

Blinker nods, a look of trepidation in her eyes. When New Beelzebub uncoils his hand, she quickly flies into the air. "Kar! Kar! Hey, idiot! Stupid! I'm up here, you big lunk!"

Hearing her voice, Kar freezes just before taking Beelzebub's head on the Chomp Chomp Express. "Butter... fly?"

"Yeah! Duh! Of course, it's me! I was resting my eyes for a bit, you big dope!"

Kar entirely disregards Old Beelzebub and immediately bounds over to the tiny fairy as if he were a giant kitty-cat. "Raww! I can't believe it! You're alive! It's a miracle!"

New Beelzebub facepalms. "Yeah, a miracle," He mutters under his breath. "Hey, thanks for saving my life and everyone else's. Yeah, no problem, it was all in a day's work. Anything for a cool dude like you, buddy."

The copycat walks past the two joyfully united friends over to the mangled figure of Old Beelzebub. Beelzebub's regeneration is much slower than before. His spiritual energy must be at its limits.

"Here. I'll heal you. Consider it a freebie. Now beat it, and tell everyone my warning."

Another wave of healing energy passes over Old Beelzebub. This time, New Beelzebub grabs the old one by the neck and lightly flings him outside the Core, then slaps the hundred-ton doors shut. He does it so effortlessly that only now does it dawn on me just how powerful he is.

Those doors weigh several tons each! Not even Kar could open them without help from Jason!

New Beelzebub walks over, and slowly, his face begins to change. The clothes follow, and what's left is... a scantily clad, red-skinned demon woman with long, smooth black hair. Two huge horns erupt from just above her ears, and a cute little tail flicks around suggestively. The black leather strips I'd hardly call clothing manage to cover her private regions, but that's about all.

"Well, after that, it'd be impolite not to introduce myself!" Warmth enters her voice, and she smiles at me sweetly as she bends down. "I'm Samantha!"

I pull myself into a sitting position. "Oh! Uhm, hi, Samantha. We owe you gratitude."

Her smile diminishes. "No. Don't worry about it. I hardly saved anybody."

Slowly, I scan the room filled with dead bodies. Scattered survivors pop up here and there, but they're nothing compared to the mountains of corpses.

"Neither did I."

Carrying dead men and women around shouldn't bother me. Heaven knows I've done it enough in my life. Easing myself down, I heft a bearded soldier down next to a line of other dead men, then stand up, rubbing my sore back. For over an hour now, those who survived Beelzebub's attack and the reserves from Tarus II have been lining up the thousands of dead in the Core wherever we can make room, identifying them, and noting their names down. My lip trembles as I spot a familiar Kitsune, one I spoke to not three hours ago. "Piper... you were a good boy." I sit down next to him and stroke his soft, red fur.

He and Henry must have rushed in when the fighting began. From the reports I've heard, Beelzebub directed his soulfire at the gate when the soldiers started funneling inside, creating a killzone and blocking the path for the rest. Piper was one of the first to run inside. Of course he was, I think, as a tear rolls down my cheek. He was a good boy.

Henry sits nearby, rocking back and forth on his feet. He's one of the younger men, an offworlder who wasn't part of Bahamut's legions. Heck, he's older than Jason, at twenty, but still only a kid.

Just when he thought he had started making friends and getting used to a world without demonic oppression...

Henry meets my gaze but quickly looks away. He chokes awkwardly and tries to pretend he doesn't want to cry. I want to say something, only to hesitate when the succubus, Samantha, appears at his side. Ever since her arrival, I've noticed her walking around and comforting as many soldiers as she can.

"Do you want to talk about anything, sweetie?" She wraps her arm around Henry comfortingly. Henry's eyes dilate as her succubus aura works its way into his mind, but the grief from losing his best friend overpowers any urges he might have.

Henry bites his lip and shakes his head. "I want to cry... but I can't. I can't feel anything. There's a hole."

Samantha kisses his cheek and pulls his head closer, resting it on her shoulder. "I know, little one. Losing the person you love hurts more than anything in the world. Here, let it out. Nobody will judge you."

Henry resists for only three seconds before her aura overpowers him, and finally, he succumbs and buries his face in his hands. "Uwaaah! It's not fair! Piper didn't deserve to die! He never hurt a fly! He was the nicest fox in the whole world!!"

Samantha nods soothingly, and slowly her eyes meet mine. She doesn't say anything at all.

The Kitsune, Felaris, and Wolfkin are some of the most peaceful creatures in the Labyrinth. Comprised of foxes, cats, and wolves, they're animalistic demi-humans often hunted for their fur. While territorial, they only guard and fight in self-defense. They've survived because they remain neutral, no matter what conflict happens. Even so, sometimes vile beings will slaughter and capture their citizens for nefarious purposes.

They're beautiful creatures that don't deserve a senseless death. Nobody does, of course, but especially not them.

Henry's sobbing intensifies. He hiccups and sniffles, all while choking down burning tears. After a while, Samantha pulls away from him, laying him on the ground to curl up in a ball and release his emotions. The poor man is in such anguish that he doesn't even notice her leave.

Samantha slinks over to me and holds out her hand. "Get up. Come with me. Being around all of your dead friends is killing you inside."

I shake my head. "I'm fine."

"Don't lie to an empath," She warns.

After a few moments, I relent. Taking Samantha's hand, I pull myself up and eyeball her. We've barely spoken since the cleanup began. She's been going from man to man, helping out with carrying bodies, usually two and four at a time, while stopping every so often to speak with anyone in distress, including the women.

She's several inches taller than me, perhaps a little over six feet tall. Her horns add to that, making her more imposing and menacing looking, yet somehow, perhaps by virtue of her scant clothing and beautiful smile, she manages to appear smaller and less intimidating than the average demon.

Samantha is incredible, I think to myself, averting my gaze. Better than me. She's nowhere close to the verge of tears.

Samantha rubs her right arm. "Your inner aura is in turmoil. It's been a long time since I met a human so conflicted. Come, leave the rest to the men, they can handle it. You need alone time."

I don't argue, allowing her to lead me off to a far corner of the room. The empty looks in the eyes of many men as they drag and carry former comrades from here to there makes me want to cry, but also to punch something.

Dammit. If only Jason were here, he could have defeated that demon in seconds.

Phoebe, stop! You can't expect Jason to do everything! He can't be everywhere at once!

But what if he wasn't gone? He could have-

"Phoebe? Are you enjoying the view?" Samantha's voice startles me. I look up and realize I'm standing in front of a wall, staring at my shoes, blankly.

"Uh, n-no. Sorry. I have a lot on my mind."

Samantha sighs and plunks down against the wall, crosses her legs, then pats a spot to her right. "Sit here."

"Do I have to?"

"No. But you should."

She has a way with words. Maybe it's her succubus aura, though I don't think it's supposed to work on females. Maybe I want someone to talk to, so I'm just following her orders.

Crouching down, I sit beside Samantha, wrap my arms around my legs, and rest my head on my knees.

Neither of us says anything for a full minute.

My anxiousness gets the better of me. "So... you're a succubus, huh?"

Samantha edges a little closer and wraps her arm around me. "Mhm. I wasn't expecting small talk, but that's decent for a conversation starter."

I smile, in spite of the pain in my chest. "S-sorry. I'm not... I don't know how to handle..."

Samantha surprises me by reaching over and putting a finger to my lips. "Shh. I understand. I've lost those I care about too. I've watched idiot men run off and start war after war, getting themselves killed and leaving me behind. You get used to it after the first hundred times, but it never stops aching."

Her finger on my lips stirs up odd feelings in my chest. I quickly turn my head away to clear my thoughts. "I knew so many of the people who died..."

"Have you ever lost the person closest to you?"

"No. Not really." I pause.

A face appears in my mind.

Percival.

"I lied. Yes."

"I can see the look in your eyes. We're birds of a feather." Samantha strokes my cheek, then pulls away from me, fluffing her hair out and fanning it across her chest. "You're a woman who cares about everyone around her, Phoebe. I've heard rumors of your kindness. It's no wonder the Hero finds you attractive."

"J-Jason? The Hero! You know about him?"

When I turn to look at her, Samantha caresses her lips with the same finger she used to touch mine. "Well, I have been living here for over two months. I'm not especially sociable, nor bright, but I can at least determine who runs the place."

My eyes raise to her horns. "But... you're... a high ranking demon. Certainly higher than Beelzebub..."

"So? Do you hate me because of my skin? My horns?"

I shake my head immediately. "No. Jason always says we can't judge others based on their appearance. He learned that lesson from someone important to him."

"That's wonderful!" Samantha leans against me again, sticking her tongue out and licking my cheek. "I do love those who are open-minded about the world."

I yelp in surprise and fall back. "Wh-what are you doing?"

She smiles coyly and pulls back. "Just having a bit of fun. Sometimes, when things hurt the most, you have to force a smile. Did it bother you?"

Shaking my head, I sit up again. "No. I was- it was a little shocking. A woman's never done something like that to me before."

Samantha folds her arms over her chest. "Ah, I see. I'm sorry, I'm terrible at respecting personal boundaries. When I see someone I like, I take a risk with my heart."

"Someone you... like? Me?"

"Yes. I like you. Do you like me?"

I shake my head, pause, nod, then shake my head again. "I... I don't- you saved us, but I barely know you. As an acquaintance, yes, but- do you mean..."

"As a companion, of course. Nothing more." Samantha rubs her back against the wall. "I'm just teasing, Phoebe. Let's move past my bad manners. The reason I wanted to talk to you... well, erm..."

She pauses and looks away, averting her eyes from mine. I crane my neck to look at her. "What reason?"

Samantha blushes, her red skin deepening noticeably. "Mmm. Well, I've seen you walking around, and there's a tremendous feeling of loneliness emanating from you. Have you slept well, lately?"

The succubus turns to look at me, scrutinizing my expression as I consider my answer. "No. Not very. Some nights are better than others."

"Because of Jason, right? The Hero?"

"Yes. Jason calls me every so often with his power, but we don't talk long. I usually sleep well for a night after, but then insomnia ruins me again. Why are you asking?"

"I have a sense about these things. Phoebe, have you considered visiting him?"

"No." I shake my head. "He's deep in the Labyrinth right now, on a personal mission to... well, it's private."

A thoughtful look crosses Samantha's face. She rocks left and right, resting her arms in her lap as she gazes at the ceiling. "He could have defeated that power-hungry Lord in a snap. How unfortunate he wasn't here."

I nod sullenly. "Yes. Err, you let Beelzebub go... can- can you tell me why? Did you know him?"

Samantha waves a hand. "No. It's more that I hate killing, even if someone else is a mass murderer. Violence has consumed demonkind since our creation. There's only one person I'd ever kill, but I'm satisfied by her punishment."

A question pops into my head. "Who are you referring to? I mean, if you don't mind my asking."

Samantha's smile vanishes. Her face hardens into steel as she lowers her eyes. "The Black Witch, Amelia Greyheart. She brutally murdered the demon I loved. I hate her with every fiber of my being. However, someone locked her away. Forced to scream and cry for all eternity. I'd be happier to flay the skin and meat from her bones, but the current punishment will suffice."

My lips quiver as I stare at Samantha. She doesn't know about Amelia's release! Oh my god! She'll be enraged when she finds out!

Samantha continues before I can interject. "I owe the Hero a lot, you know. 'Twas a Hero who mercilessly attacked and violated Amelia. Joan drove the Black Witch back, pounded, stabbed, and sliced her for days on end before finally freezing her in stone for all eternity. Jason isn't Joan, but... toward him... I feel..."

"...Gratitude?"

"Yes."

I nod slowly. "If... I... well... you should know... about Amelia."

Samantha glances at me. "You know her?"

"Something like that. Ahh. I don't know how to tell you this, Samantha... but she escaped. She isn't in that statue anymore."

I clench my teeth together, not wanting to tell her, and it was Jason who released the Black Witch, through no fault of his own.

Samantha stares at the ground silently. Several long seconds pass, and her hands curl together, tearing her black pantyhose as they scrape against the delicate fabric. "No. No, no, no. You must be lying. She can't- that's..."

"I'm not. Jason is planning to fight and kill her. She devoured an entire planet full of humans."

"She what?!" The succubus whips her head to glare daggers at me. "An entire planet?! Do you know how dangerous she is?!"

"Yes. Amelia maimed and nearly killed Jason."

"Haah... haah..." Samantha's body shakes as she inhales and exhales audibly. Her voice trembles. "I can't believe- I mean... he's going to fight.... can he win? Does he know what he's up against?"

"I believe so," I say. However, in my mind I think, I'm not sure he does.

"I didn't realize things had changed this much." Samantha unclenches her hands, exhales one last time, and releases her anger silently. "I'm something of a free soul. I hate working hard. I don't pay the slightest attention to anything that doesn't interest me: politics, demon rankings, none of those things. Ever since the man I loved died, I haven't cared about much. And now the one who tore him to pieces is roaming free, terrorizing millions."

Without thinking, I throw myself at Samantha, wrapping my arms around her. "I'm sorry. I'm sorry! I didn't mean to hurt you! I didn't-"

Immediately, she reciprocates, twining herself around me. "D-don't apologize, Phoebe. I'm glad. You're kind and honest. You'll tell me the truth, even if it hurts. Living among demons, I rarely have such a luxury."

My hands stroke her long hair as we hold each other. Me, thinking of Jason, and her, thinking of Amelia.

After a minute, we pull apart. Samantha smiles cheerfully, even as a tear rolls down her face. "I haven't cried for several millennia. I don't even know why I'm sad!"

"You're not sad, I say, touching her cheek. "You're happy. Jason is going to tear her apart. I know it!"

She averts her gaze, and the look on her face echoes my thoughts. I only hope Jason is up to the task.

"Neil?"

I whisper as I enter the army commander's office. According to the soldiers, he's in here, but... they said that after carrying all the bodies he wished to be left alone.

Stepping inside, I find him sitting in his chair, laying onto his desk with his head in his arms. Neil doesn't reply to my call.

"Neil? It's me. Phoebe."

Slowly, he raises his head and turns to look at me. "Oh. Phoebe. I see you've finished speaking to that succubus."

His voice has a spiteful edge to it.

"Yes. Her name is Samantha. She's the one who saved us from Beelze-"

"I know who she is... and what she did." Neil snaps. He grinds his teeth together. "She let him go. The one who killed my men. Five thousand and four hundred of them. Good men. Honest men. They wanted nothing more than to be left alone... and Beelzebub slaughtered them like dogs."

Cautiously, I approach him and examine the grief on his face. "I know. They were all my friends too. Samantha had her reasons."

"Reasons? REASONS?!" Neil leaps to his feet, knocking his chair over and startling me. He grabs the desk and flings it to the side, sending mountains of papers and ink flying. "I don't give a damn about her reasons! She let a mass-murdering psychopath walk free! There's no excuse! She's working for THEM!"

I quickly back away. "N-Neil, please. I know you're angry. I'm angry too — but at Beelzebub. Samantha saved us. If it weren't for her, he would have killed you, then me, then-"

"I don't care!" Neil kicks the chair at his feet, sending it flying across the room and into a sword display. The metal weapons inside crash to the floor with a bang. "Where the hell was Jason during all of this?! Where was he when my men died? Why did we have to be at the mercy of a she-devil?! That whore allowed another of her kind to walk free!"

Neil turns away from me. "And there you were, snuggling in a corner with the harlot. She didn't even have the decency to allow Kar to gut Beelzebub. Why did she interfere, I wonder?"

"It's not like that, Neil." I put force into my voice this time. His anger is pissing me off. "Stop misunderstanding. You haven't even talked to her yet. Think of all the men she healed and saved."

"Think of all those she didn't!" Neil spins to face me, clenching his hand into a fist. "She hung back and laughed while Beelzebub tore us to ribbons! I bet she let him in! She laughed and allowed him to escape! That temptress is manipulating you!"

"Neil!" I shout back, resisting an urge to slap him. "That's enough! She wasn't even in the Core! She heard the commotion from our encampment and came as soon as possible! You're making up facts to paint her as the villain!"

The commander glowers at me. "Then why did she let him leave?"

"She hates violence. She didn't want to see anyone else die, not even Beelzebub."

Neil's tongue snakes out of his mouth. "Oh? You're ignorant, Phoebe. She's playing you like a fiddle." He cocks his head. "Tell me, how do demons grow in power? You're the demonologist around these parts. It should be a simple question to answer."

I already see where he's going with this. "U-usually, they have to consume souls."

"I see. And pray, tell me, have you noticed the size of the succubi's horns?"

"Yes."

"And did you notice how easily she defeated Beelzebub? I could see him begging for mercy with just his eyes. She's quite powerful, after all. Wouldn't you agree?"

I lower my eyes. "Y-yes. But..."

"But nothing. Samantha, if that's her real name, is a goddamn Demon Duke. Maybe higher. We have a fucking Duke of Hell in our midst. Do you think a Duke, one who has consumed an order of magnitude more souls than a Lord, is a pacifist?"

I don't reply.

"Give me a break," Neil hisses under his breath. He walks over and swings his desk back into a standing position, slamming it on the floor and making me flinch.

"What... what do you want to do, then, Neil? Kick her out?"

The commander sets his jaw. "No. There isn't anybody, not even Kar, with the power to stand up against a Duke. A single Lord ripped apart our Core forces. All we have left are the reserves. Only Jason, if anyone, could put up a fight against her."

Neil paces back and forth like a mad dog. "That bitch. That fucking bitch. Letting him go. Unforgivable. Now I have to grovel and grin while pretending to thank her. The men think she's a savior. They're all enamored. How convenient that we let a succubus enter our ranks. I wonder how many loyal warriors she's corrupted with her demonic influence? We could have dozens of traitors in our midst, ready to ram a knife in my back."

"If she is our enemy, Neil, then we've already lost. We couldn't beat a single Lord turned Baron. If she wants to destroy us, we're already dead."

"Tch." Neil waves his hand flippantly. "As if. The Duke doesn't want to kill us. Her goal is to frighten us into submission. She'll turn the soldiers to her will and tear us apart from the inside-out. She wishes to restore the status quo; to reduce us to peasants under her boot. I see now that I shouldn't have freely allowed demons to enter our ranks. Monsters are bad enough, but demons are a thousand times worse."

I shake my head slowly, but can't offer a counter-argument. Truthfully, from what I know about Samantha, that isn't who she strikes me as... but Neil could be right. What if he is? Gods... she might be the villain here, but my naivete is blinding me. How do I explain my thoughts?

Twining my fingers together, I look up and meet Neil's gaze. "I'll... I'll keep an eye on her. You make good points, Neil. Succubi cannot use their powers to influence someone of the same gender, so you can trust me if nobody else."

Neil stops pacing and turns to meet my eyes. He says nothing for a few moments, but then his shoulders sag. "Of... of course. God, I'm sorry, Phoebe. I know you're trustworthy. Everyone does. You would never do anything to betray humanity."

The commander takes a step forward and rests his hand on my shoulder. "Be careful. I could be wrong, but I doubt it. If that woman is here to infiltrate and tear us apart, she might even get to me and make me a mindless slave. You wouldn't want that, would you?"

Slowly, I shake my head and rest my hand on his. "No. I wouldn't. I'll... I'll do my best, Neil. I won't let you down."

Neil smiles, and the tension drains from his face. "I know I can count on you."

As I leave the room, my mind twines back to King Arthur. I can't let people down ever again. Everyone's counting on me.

I continue heading to my truck, ready to go home, and I spot Samantha already sitting in the passenger seat. She waves at me. "Hey, Phoebe! Mind if I get a lift back to the city?"

I nod. "Sure."

Neil. I hope you're wrong. I pray you're wrong.

Part 037: Irredeemable Evil, Unlimited Regret

Recommended listening or No-Vocals Version

Laying on my back in the grassy field, I trace my finger against the clouds in the sky. "La la la... la la la..."

A hot, stale breeze blows across the plains. The breeze pulls dried leaves into the air, blowing them past me one by one. Each leaf drifts forward for a while, only to float down and land amidst an endless sea of cracked, dried grass.

A few birds fly overhead. They'll perish by week's end, as will the rest of Polaris's wildlife.

I sit on a barren rock orbiting a star.

This world is dying, and it's all my fault.

Blaarjiim grunts at me. "My queen, you seem gloomier than usual."

I wait a moment before responding.

"Do I?"

Blaarjiim nods. "Aye. You haven't smiled in days."

"He's right! Does that jaw of yours still hurt or what?" Dellfingler pipes up, interrupting my train of thought. "It ain't like you to lay around. Not that I've seen, anyway."

Lowering my arm, I rub my chin thoughtfully. "I don't know. There's a void in my heart. Emptiness. I can't explain it."

"Is that so?" Blaarjiim lays on the grass beside me, appearing in my mind's eye as a blackened mirage. "Perhaps you need a new thrill. Why not find someone worth battling? Use your new power and-"

"No. I don't want that."

My interruption annoys him — Blaarjiim sighs. "Now I know you aren't in your right mind. You're thinking about the mortal, aren't you? Ever since Hoarhiim vanished..."

The mention of Jason makes my throat catch.

"Yes."

"There's no other way, my queen. You'll have to fight the mortal sooner or later. He won't forgive you for leaving him to die. He'll be angry; out for blood."

"I know."

Dellfingler snorts. "Honey, you ain't got nothin' to worry about. You beat him real easy last time, and you're a hundred times stronger now!"

"Sword, please. I'm not in the mood for your comments."

Dellfingler sighs. "Alright, geez, fine. I'm just saying."

Blaarjiim forms in my vision, appearing as a dark, smoky form against the backdrop of the white clouds. "The sword speaks truth, my queen. If I may be so bold... you are moping. The sooner you finish devouring this planet, the sooner we can move to the next-"

"I don't want to."

"Pardon?"

I stare at Blaarjiim's form silently for a few moments before raising my arm and pressing it against my eyes. "When does it end?"

He grunts. "I am not sure what you are referring to."

"The killing. The hunger. When will it end? Am I destined to spend eternity consuming everything in my path?"

It turns out the sword didn't learn his lesson. He chuckles. "Getting cold feet after everyone you've killed? Honey, I may be a weapon designed for bloodshed, but I'd go dull long before I could amass your body count."

"I don't care about the opinion of an object," I mutter.

"You don't? Then why ain't you moving on to the next batch of food?!"

Several moments pass. I sigh. "I liked you better when all you did was hit on me."

"Sweetie, I'm a sword. The only way we'd be an item is if I entered you, and it would be quite painful."

I groan. "Ugh."

Thoughts rage in my mind. The more powerful I grow, the more trapped and unfulfilled I feel. I don't know why this is the case. Has slaughtering the weak and helpless transformed me into a pointless existence? Jason. What would you say if you saw me in this state?

Blaarjiim speaks suddenly, his voice tinged with surprise. "Oh? Well, well, well. Look who showed up."

My heart pounds in my chest. I jerk into a sitting position and gape at the mountain of a man standing in the distance.

Jason.

His eyes glow white, a color not unlike Hoarhiim's orb. He looks the same as when I left him, standing seven feet tall, but his posture seems more confident than before.

Jason walks forward and stops about fifty feet away. "Yo. What's... uh... cracking, Amelia?"

Immediately my elation deflates. His body may change, but the mind stays the same.

I pull myself to my feet and dust grass off the back-side of my black dress. I forced a village to sew it for me, since the blue one was in tatters. They didn't do the best job, but it's serviceable.

I wonder if Jason... likes it?

"I knew you'd show up. When Hoarhiim's orb vanished from my purse, only one culprit came to mind. What's with the eyes?"

He stares at me silently for a few moments. "How many have you killed?"

"I asked a question first."

He continues to stare at me unblinkingly. Something about his hollow gaze makes me uncomfortable. "I don't know why my eyes are like this. After you maimed me, I lay immobile and paralyzed in a bed for a full month. They glowed the whole time."

"You healed yourself." I don't phrase it as a question.

"No thanks to you." Jason's voice has an edge of bitterness to it. "Why, Amelia? Why did you attack me? I never wanted to hurt you. I... toward you... I felt..."

"You felt nothing." I cut him off before he can continue. "You're a Hero. You're my enemy. It's that simple. Angels created demons. Demons razed my birthplace and took my best friend from me. But Heroes? Heroes hurt me, several times. You're all the same."

Jason shakes his head. "I remember a time when I was the one preoccupied with appearances. You're beautiful, Amelia. If you weren't a monster... if you hadn't attacked me and left on that day... I wouldn't be here now, nor would you."

"Where would we be, then? On a beach, sipping lemonade?!"

Jason cocks his head slightly. "Perhaps. There's good in you, Amelia. I'm not just saying that. You can say you healed me twice and that those acts of kindness were part of some nefarious plan to turn me to your side, but you didn't have to become a world-consuming monster. You could have made a different choice. You could have made several different choices."

My right hand slowly curls around Dellfingler. "How dare you judge me. Do you think this world and the one before it were my first time committing genocide? I've devoured millions, Jason. Don't pretend I'm redeemable. Just because you wanted me to dance around in a cute little dress for you doesn't mean-"

"So what if I did?" Jason grits his teeth. "Is there something wrong with only using your powers for good? Healing the sick? Where I come from, there's a saying. Do unto others as you would have them do unto you. When you attack, hurt, maim, and kill everyone in your path, you ask for the same to be done back ten times worse. I gave you a fresh start, Amelia. You could have used your powers positively and helped the universe. Instead, you became a blight. A disease."

"Well, well," Blaarjiim whispers to me, a grin on his face. "Don't those words sound familiar?"

Slowly, I lick my lips. "Yes, Blaarjiim. They do. Self-righteous. Judgemental. I was right about you, Jason. You're like all the other heroes, but you won't admit it to yourself."

"I never wanted us to grow apart." Jason says, raising his palm at me. "Maybe I should thank you. I live in the Labyrinth, now. A place of pain, torture, and death. You hurt me badly enough to shake away some of my naivete. Now, the only thing left is for me to abandon my childish ideals. I have to atone for releasing you and unleashing your evil upon two unsuspecting worlds."

"Oy, oy..." Dellfingler mutters. "Can't you two kiss and make up? Jason, are you planning to kill this beautiful temptress? This sultry goddess? Come on... don't be petty."

"This isn't about revenge. I'm not angry because you hurt me, Amelia." Jason pulls his palm back and touches a scar on his neck. "I know why you did it. I understand the choice you made. It was wrong, but I don't blame you. However, I do blame you for the deaths you've caused to innocents. Compared to you, the demons look like angels."

Jason closes his eyes and inhales. "You're toxic. You're the forbidden fruit. I've found someone better now, someone I love and respect. I loved you once, Amelia. It was childish, immature, and surface-level. I projected my loneliness onto you, hoping you could fill a void in my chest. I sensed we were birds of a feather, two souls who were alone and lost in the world. However, that was not the case. I was wrong. There is no longer anything inside of you; only emptiness and hatred remain."

Something crawls down my cheek. I quickly try to brush it off, only to pause and examine my hand. A tear? Why am I crying? I'm not sad. Jason can say anything he wants. A Hero will say anything to make me lower my guard.

I wipe my eyes angrily. "I don't need you, Jason. I never did. I only spared and healed you because you released me from my prison — not for any other reason. You may have someone you care about, but so do I. Blaarjiim is all I need. Spare me the theatrics. If you think you can kill me, then do it."

Jason's lip quivers. A tear rolls down his face as well. "I don't want to hurt you, Amelia. I never did. It's you who left me no choice. You decided your fate. Now I will make it happen."

My entire body begins to shake. Rage floods my vision. "I won't kill you, Jason. I'll make you my slave. You'll live to regret becoming a Hero. I promise you that."

Jason lowers his arm and stands limply as I draw Dellfingler. "I'm sorry, Amelia. I have failed you. I'm sorry for everything."

A ripple of power pulses from Jason. Pebbles and rocks slowly hover off the ground, and the planet begins to shake.

Then, he speaks a single word.

"Die."

Part 038: Hellfire And Brimstone

The Duke of Pain and I, the Emperor of Annihilation, wait patiently for Mephisto's return. The Duke of Mist left not long ago on a mission to visit the Oracles, beings who possess the means to see all corners of the Labyrinth at once. Bael and I sit at a section of the Labyrinth not far from the River Styx while we await Mephisto's return.

"Come on, Mephisto... come on..." Bael paces back and forth, a look of annoyance etched into his face. Most of the light surrounding us comes from glowstones embedded in the walls. Every so often, Bael's bare arm scrapes against the rocky wall, chipping some of it away. It will regenerate, though. The Labyrinth always heals its wounds.

Satan, the original First Emperor, was the greatest of our species. He formed the Labyrinth as a place to protect demons from humans and angels. Our home, isolated in a pocket dimension, grows as time passes. It leeches minuscule amounts of spiritual energy from all its residents and continually expands its borders. These days, the Labyrinth's size increases so slowly that it's scarcely noticeable. However, long ago, the Labyrinth was an exploding fortress of intricate hallways that confused any who dared to invade it.

Satan was one of my best friends. Together, he and I fought long and hard against not only the angels, but the humans as well.

I miss him.

"COME ON!" Bael punches a wall, sending a wave of pressure flowing throughout the hallway. "Gah! Deebs, it's been weeks! When's that fucking ghost gonna get off his ass and come back! Why I oughta..."

"Calm yourself, Bael," I reply. "Mephisto barely left a day ago. You need a better sense of time. And patience."

The Duke of Pain glowers at me. "I wanna tear that skinny broad apart. How can you be all calm and shit after what she did to Barbatos?! She's gettin' stronger by the second!"

I raise an eyebrow. "Oh? Are you scared? I thought you liked it when women fought back."

Bael rolls his eyes. "You know what I meant." He pauses. "Ehh, come to think of it, maybe you're right. Waitin' around sucks, though. Ain't nothin' happening. We could at least go to the torture pits or the Slaughterseum!"

I curl my lip up in disgust. "That's your fetish, not mine. Mephisto should be back soon. Umi will know where the Black Queen is."

Bael stands up straight, and his horns scrape the ceiling. He crosses his arms and starts pacing back and forth. "Umi, Umi, Umi. How do we know these Oracles are any good? What makes Umi so special?"

"You don't know? I thought I told you about her before."

Bael shrugs and etches a circle into the stone with his finger. "Ehh, you prolly did."

"And you forgot?"

"Maybe."

He did, I sigh internally. A yawn takes me for a moment as I stretch and bump the ceiling with my arms. This damned hallway is too narrow. Maybe Bael has a point. I'd like to relax somewhere rather than stand around waiting.

"Umi is our best Oracle. Her predictions have never failed, and her findings are accurate. Marie assured me of that much."

"Marie? You mean that redheaded bitch?"

"Yes. The redheaded... bitch." My tone frosts over noticeably. I'm not a demon that regards females as inferiors, partially because Belial has flattened me out a few times. Bael, however, isn't sophisticated enough to treat the female demons, let alone humans, with any dignity.

Bael ignores my annoyance. "Big whoopee fuckin' deal. Oh wow, she has an Oracle of her own. We should kill her and use our Oracles instead. You can't trust a human, as they say."

"We can't kill her, even if I wanted to... which I don't. First Emperor's orders."

Bael's attitude worsens. "Oh, sure! The First Emperor! Who does he think he is, anyway?! Some upstart who won't even show his face! That's who he is! He's too scared to come out and reveal himself!"

"Bael. You'd do well to calm yourself." My frosty tone turns to ice. "The Overlords are terrified of the First Emperor. That's enough evidence of his power for me. Any more insubordination, and I'll break your jaw. The last thing I want are rumors floating around that we aren't pleased with his performance. As long as the Overlords aren't increasing their demands-"

I pause suddenly and look down the hallway. "Who's there?"

Bael, confused, turns to follow my gaze. Moments pass with no response. "You going crazy? Ain't nobody-"

"I can sense energy down that hall. Demonic."

From the darkness, someone coughs. A flame ignites, and I immediately recognize Beelzebub's face as he winces and clutches his side. He squints at us. "Ah... Emperor Diablo? Duke of Pain? I'm relieved to see you."

Beelzebub walks toward us with a look of distress etched into his face. His suit, usually in excellent condition, is torn to ribbons. It hangs off his body in strips, barely concealing his demonhood.

Bael snorts. "The fuck happened to you?"

I raise my hand. "Silence, Bael. I'll ask the questions. Beelzebub, where have you been? I sent you to fetch an Oracle. Last time I saw you, you were naked, yet now you wear half a suit."

Beelzebub nods. "I traveled with Rosalia... kah..." He coughs and slows to a stop in front of me. "Out of nowhere, a hundred humans attacked us. I told her to flee, and I took out the wretched filth myself.

During the battle, I captured one of them and forced him to tell me where they were from. He said they were a commando force from the Core."

"The Core?" I rub my chin thoughtfully. "I've heard rumors. Nobody can approach it due to a powerful weapon protecting the Great Doors."

Beelzebub nods. "The human commandos were heavily armed. They had armaments I'd never seen before... like something from the Energy Wars."

Bael smirks. "How would you know about weapons from those ancient times? You're still a whelp."

Beelzebub scowls at Bael. "My mentor taught me a great many things. I listen and learn, unlike you."

"Hey!" Bael starts to clench a fist, but I stop him.

"Easy, Bael. You deserve that." Turning back to Beelzebub, I ask, "What happened next?"

"They had four automated turrets guarding the entrance. I blasted them apart, then smashed the Great Doors off their hinges. Assaulting the Core and wiping out the majority of their reserves was a simple task for one as powerful as I. Even their Energy War weaponry wasn't enough to slow me down."

Bael leans against the wall. "Not bad. A whole bunch of Lords went there a few months back and got torn apart. Only a few survived."

"Yes, Bael is right," I add. "Still, if you had such an easy time, then... why are you so disheveled?"

Beelzebub lowers his gaze. "As I said... everything was going perfectly according to plan. However, out of nowhere, a demon appeared. He assumed my form, copying my looks exactly, and defeated me swiftly. It all happened so fast... I don't know his identity, but he warned me that the Core would be under his protection."

"A shapeshifter?" I stare incredulously at Bael. "And a high-ranking one by the sounds of it. Only a few individuals come to mind."

"You know damn well who it was!" Bael replies, a snarl in his voice. He slams his fist into the wall. "That floozy skank whore! Belial! I knew she'd join the humans! She has no loyalty to our kind!"

"Now, now..." I quickly move to calm Bael down. He's a handful when he gets pissed. "You don't know it was Belial. Even for her, this is stooping a bit low."

Beelzebub rubs his chest and stands up a little straighter. "We're fortunate I entered the Core. Now we know the humans are planning to fight back. If that copycat was Belial, then they have a powerful ally working alongside them."

I nod appreciatively and pat the Lord of Fire on his shoulder. "You did well to bring me this news, Beelzebub. You should go and rest in the Blood Pits. I will have Mephisto deliver a message for Hellga when you arrive, so she knows I'm authorizing your treatment. Entering the lair of the enemy alone is quite remarkable."

"Did sssomeone sssay my name?"

Mephisto's voice hisses from the wall. A moment later, he appears, popping out and floating toward us. "I have ssspoken to the Oraclesss. Asss usssual, Umi hasss provided me with the location of the portal."

"Excellent. Mephisto, you'll need to bring your A-game. I want all of your undead legions there. We'll take no chances against the Black Queen. I've just learned from Beelzebub that Belial won't assist us in this battle."

Mephisto's red eyes jerk to Beelzebub. "At leassst you're wearing more clothesss than lassst time."

"Shut up," Beelzebub replies, glaring at the Duke of Mist. He turns to me. "Diablo. I ask that you allow me to join you. I wish to fight the Black Queen."

Bael smirks. "You did well, little Lord. But taking out a bunch of humans and monsters ain't like fightin' the Black Queen. It ain't a battle for weaklings to get swept up in, not unless you like dying."

Beelzebub bristles. "Weakling? That word no longer describes me. I am a Baron now, on par with President Ose. I have evolved."

It takes me a moment to hide my surprise. Looking up, I notice Beelzebub's horns are slightly bigger than the last time I saw him. "You evolved? When? How? I never authorized you to receive souls from Styx."

Beelzebub chuckles for several moments. "Heh heh heh... You're not dealing with the average demon warrior anymore, Diablo. I've risen beyond the limits of a normal demon. I possess Soulfire, a secret power belonging only to the most legendary purebloods. I used it to reap the souls of humans and monsters as I slew them, and achieved the rank of Baron in a matter of seconds."

Bael and I share another moment as we eyeball each other. He speaks first. "You're too dramatic, kid, but I'm still impressed. Only a few purebloods I've known could summon it. They're all dead, now."

I smile politely at the young demon. Beelzebub is cocky; overconfident. Then again, maybe he deserves to be. Something about him reminds me of Satan. It might be his attitude, his willingness to take risks for the good of demonkind. Charging into the enemy base to gather intel may have been foolhardy, but damn if I'm not impressed.

It would be a shame if we lost him.

"Beelzebub. You're in no condition to fight. If you want to come along, we'll have our hands full battling the Black Queen. We can't protect you."

Beelzebub nods and straightens up. He stops holding his gut, and inhales. "I know. She murdered my mentor. I owe her fire and retribution in response. Besides... I can handle myself."

With that little speech, Beelzebub grabs his left arm's bicep with his right hand, grunts, and tears the limb off without blinking. His shoulder stump erupts into a fountain of blood.

Bael takes a step back. "W-what the hell?! You're crazy! What are you doing, idiot?!"

Beelzebub's expression darkens. Flames erupt from his stump. "I am the Baron of Flames. Born of the primordial inferno, I have unlocked the power of the Phoenix. My strength will only increase as time passes."

Slowly, I inhale.

Seven Devils. It's... it's just like Satan. I can't believe what I'm seeing.

Several moments pass. Beelzebub's stump seals up, and bone and skin begin rapidly expanding from it, forming a new arm.

I stare at his regenerated limb. How many demons have I seen with such an incredible regenerative ability? Too few... not nearly enough. The Archangels wiped them all out. But... without the Archangels around, he might become an invincible warrior.

"Very well. You may follow. I look forward to seeing your performance on the battlefield. Don't die, Beelzebub. Someday, you may end up standing where I am now."

Beelzebub smiles. "I will reach even higher."

Mephisto glares at Beelzebub's back. "Tch. We'll sssee about that."

Part 039: A Forbidden Power Emerges

My heart stops for three seconds. Amelia stares at me silently. The wind sweeps across the plains, blowing dead leaves and grass between us.

"Die?" Amelia asks. "Are you trying to kill me with Wordsmithing?"

One of my fingers twitches. A bead of sweat drips from my forehead to my chin. I yell again. "DIE!!"

The word of power fades into the wind. Amelia draws Dellfingler and loosely holds him at her side. "Well. How about that? The Creator has a sense of humor. It seems whatever godly abilities he gave you; an easy killing word wasn't one of them."

My right foot slides back slowly. What the hell?! It wasn't supposed to be like this! I should have been able to kill her with one word!

Amelia notices the confusion on my face. "Jason, sweetie, I know you're a little baffled, but try to keep your head on straight. After that preachy speech, I didn't expect you to act like a little chicken-shit."

Slowly, I nod, forcing myself to accept the outcome. Raising my palm, I telekinetically-yank my lightsaber to my hand and shift the backpack around to adjust its weight.

I don't know if I can beat her. I wanted to end the battle with one word... but now I have no choice.

Blaarjiim appears in my mind. "I pegged you as many things, mortal. A coward was never one of them. Of course, I can hardly blame you. You are no Joan. You will be unable to beat my Queen in physical combat. When she finishes, she will crush and consume you... forcing you to be her slave for all eternity."

"Slave?" I echo his words. "What's that about?"

Amelia crouches down, bundling power into her legs. "You're about to find out!"

She jumps at me. The fifty-foot gap between us diminishes frighteningly fast! With a twitch of my unencumbered left-hand, I send a telekinetic shockwave down from the sky, smashing her into the ground mid-dash. Amelia's quick yelp of surprise as she swallows dirt gives me enough time to jump back and raise my lightsaber defensively. The blade pops out as she staggers to her feet.

Amelia spits soil and wipes a few blades of grass from her face. "More cowardice. Do better!"

She leaps at me again, but when I send another wave of telekinesis at her, she vanishes, and only Dellfingler's voice yelling, "Look out, kid! From the left!" allows me to dodge right.

Her fist slams into my kidney, sending me sprawling in the opposite direction. I right myself in midair, cushioning my landing with telekinesis and saving myself from a bone-crushing ground-slam, just in time to hear a verbal facepalm as Dellfingler yells out, "No, stupid! MY left!"

You should have specified!! I mentally scream at the sword.

"Above!" Dellfingler yells again, as Amelia slices at me from the sky. I telekinetically shove myself to the right, barely dodging as her attack smashes the ground.

Amelia pauses for a moment to yell at Dellfingler. "Stop telegraphing my attacks, fucker! You're making me hurt him!"

I frown in confusion. What the hell does she mean by that?

Amelia doesn't give me the time to ponder that question. She sheathes Dellfingler and balls up her fists. "Whatever! I don't need a sword anyway!"

I leap to my feet and Wordsmith again. "Speed. Speed. Enhance. Perception." I can't match her with my current speed, but maybe if I enhance my physical abilities, that will change.

Amelia hears me Wordsmithing and scowls. "Finally resorting to Wordsmithing boosts? Maybe now I'll have some fun!"

My ribs are killing me. Where I got punched feels like she jammed a hundred knives inside. I heal myself and grimace as my energy drops a little bit. The damage was extensive.

Amelia hunches down, assuming a new combat stance that keeps her low to the ground. She fakes left, then rushes right, closing the thirty-foot gap in a second. She skitters around like a spider, causing her movements to become erratic and difficult to follow. This time, I send out a telekinetic wave in all directions away from my body, which is weaker but provides me better protection from all sides.

Amelia tries to swing her fist at my right side, but my telekinetic wave knocks her off-balance. I quickly dodge her attack and grab her with my telekinesis, then throw her straight up into the air.

Chance!

I yank Amelia downward, flinging her into the ground with my telekinesis.

Whump!

She strikes the dirt like a sack of potatoes, gasping in surprise as I knock the wind out of her.

I lunge forth; lightsaber aimed downward to drive through her. The blade of holy energy slams into Amelia's stomach, piercing through her and impaling her body into the ground. She opens her mouth to scream, but nothing comes out.

"Whoa, boy! Brutal!" Dellfingler offers a few words of disapproval as I deactivate the lightsaber and hop away. Just in time, too. Amelia's flailing legs miss me by an inch.

She writhes on the ground, clutching her stomach and gasping. "Nnng! Ahh! J-Jason! It... it hurts! Ahh!"

Her pitiful cries nearly wrench my heart in two.

"Imagine how all the humans felt as you tore them apart," I reply, steeling myself.

Amelia isn't my friend. I can't pity her. It's like Michael said: Heroes have to sacrifice their ideals.

Before she can try another trick, I send a continual wave of telekinesis at her, pressing her body against the grass and pinning her in place. My lightsaber activates, and I take a step toward her.

Amelia squirms, trying to stand up, to move, to flee. "Jason! No, p-please! Don't do this!"

I falter, pausing for a moment. "If I don't kill you here, you'll continue ravaging the cosmos."

"I won't! Please! I promise... I'll be a good girl... Jason..."

No. I can't listen. She's... she's trying to manipulate me.

I press a little harder with my telekinesis, easing my body down onto her wriggling form and holding the tip of my lightsaber to her forehead. Amelia goes still and stares up at me. She inhales sharply. "Fine. Do it, then. I knew all along... you're as evil as Joan. All heroes are. You c-can pretend to be righteous agents of justice... but you're no better than me."

"I haven't killed millions, let alone billions," I retort, gritting my teeth. "You have. Don't pretend we're the same."

"I'm a hundred thousand years old, Jason." She doesn't flinch as the energy from my lightsaber nicks her forehead. "You don't know how I've lived. Joan was a mass-murderer. You haven't killed anyone yet... but I'll be your first. And after me, how many more? You think you can stop after killing me?"

My hand twitches. The saber pulls on my arm like an anvil, threatening to fall and impale Amelia's head. I raise it an inch.

Dammit. She's lying. She has to be.

Her body shifts under me. It's distracting. I start thinking about other things and- focus! Even if Amelia is a woman, that doesn't mean...

Amelia's chin trembles. "Why do you hesitate? Do it. Be a Hero. Claim your first victim, just as Joan did. She slew countless demons, telling herself that her actions were in service of God. That's how it always begins. You start off doing the right thing, trying to put an end to evil, but-"

"Shut up, Amelia!" I force my jaw to set, moving the lightsaber close enough that her forehead starts to warm. She whimpers, and a tear rolls down her face.

"Jason... you're hurting me. Why are you so cruel?" Slowly, Amelia raises her hand, trying not to provoke me. She touches my chest. "We don't... have to be enemies."

I can't take it anymore. Rage boils inside of me. With a flourish, I lunge the lightsaber down, chopping off her arm and jumping away. Amelia screams in pain and clutches her stump.

Bile forms in my stomach. I want to vomit. Her touch sickened me. But... I lashed out at her.

"It burns!" Amelia whimpers and clutches her wound. "Stop hurting me! Finish me or leave!"

Fuck. Now it comes down to the wire. I don't want to murder Amelia. I know she's manipulating me. Maybe it's years of conditioning from public school. Don't hit girls, the teacher would always tell the boys. It was drummed into me from kindergarten to adulthood.

No. I'm making excuses. Not only does killing violate my ideals, but I secretly think Amelia doesn't deserve to die. What if she has lived a painful life? What if she's right about Heroes? It isn't my place to pass judgment on her actions.

You can't let her murder anyone else! Another voice yells in my mind. If not you, who will stop her? Who will prevent her from killing millions more?!

Maybe the demons will, I retort. How should I know?!

I can't make up my mind. The voices within me conflict, making it impossible to direct my blade.

Sighing, I press a button and deactivate my lightsaber. It slides back into my belt, and I stare at the girl lying helpless in the grass.

"I can't kill you, Amelia. Nor do I want to maim and torture you, either. I don't know what to do. Regenerate."

Her arm begins growing back, sans a sleeve. To my surprise, the hole in her stomach appears to have already healed. When? No. That doesn't matter.

I hold my hand out. "Are you okay?"

Amelia's face, appearing as a series of colors and heat shapes, forms an expression I don't recognize. "You're healing me?"

"I don't want to hurt you. I don't want to kill you. I don't even want to fight you. When it comes down to it, I don't know if it's my right to deal with you at all. I believe, however, that no matter the awful things you've done... you can redeem yourself."

She stares at me incredulously. "What? How?"

"I don't have an answer, Amelia. If you've devoured ten million souls, then perhaps you need to save ten million others. You're immortal. It... it could be possible."

Scoffing, Amelia pulls herself into a sitting position and rubs her arm, staring at the ground. "You're a hopeless romantic, Jason. Maybe I was wrong about you. You're not like Joan at all."

Dellfingler pipes up. "Aw, wow! This is great. I hoped you two would kiss and make up."

Amelia stares silently at my shoes for a moment. "You know, Jason... when you pulled me out of the statue, I was thrilled. It only lasted a few days, but I enjoyed our relationship. I remembered what Joan did to me, but her torture felt like an eternity past."

A crow cries out across the plain. "Caw! Caw-caw!"

Amelia continues. "That was months ago. In a lifetime of a hundred thousand years, you're a leaf on the wind. Here one second, gone the next."

Something about her tone catches my attention. "What do you mean? Do you think you can't redeem yourself?"

"I'm not you, Jason," Amelia retorts. She looks up at me, and her eyes narrow. "There isn't a shred of goodness in me. Thank Joan for that."

"Amelia... if you-"

The grass behind me shifts. Before I can react, several objects leap up and lance through my backpack, piercing my chest organs all at once.

"Wh...?"

Amelia stands up. "Shadow-bending. A power only those unified with darkness can use. Don't say I didn't warn you."

The invisible objects retract, yanking me onto my back, unable to move. Beneath me, my backpack's power source noticeably cools as the safeguards kick into place, and its fusion cells die off.

I cough blood. P-paralyzed... again?! No... oh no... this can't be happening!

My spherical vision begins to flutter. Something about the shadows sucks the energy right out of me. I'm running low... on... mana...

Amelia draws Dellfingler and points him at my chest. "I know you have feelings for me, Jason. You're too childish to admit it. Luckily, that was a weakness I could exploit. You had me worried for a moment."

"Don't do it!" Dellfingler howls in protest. "You don't have to be evil, darling! Save him! Do the right-"

"Shut up!" Amelia stabs Dellfingler at me, aiming to plunge him into my heart.

"Nooo!" The sword screams in protest.

I close my eyes.

Goddammit, Jason. You're a fucking idiot. Amelia's going to kill you.

Your ideals failed, once again. You shouldn't have opened up your heart.

Michael was right.

With my last ounce of strength, I grind my teeth together.

"CATHERIIINE!!!"

Amelia stops, holding Dellfingler an inch from my heart. The heat drains from her face.

"What... what name... did you say...?"

An object begins to form in my right hand.

I stare at her emotionlessly. My back rapidly heals as energy pours into my body.

"I trusted you, Amelia. You have no-one left to blame but yourself for this."

Her eyes darken. She gazes in horror at my new weapon.

"Im... impossible. That sword... is..."

Part 040: Joan - The Maid of Orleans

1423.

The young girl bows before an altar, prayer beads in hand. She sends her thoughts to the man on the cross above her.

Dear God in Heaven, holiest of the holy... I ask for good fortune upon my family. I ask for your blessing upon my village. I ask that the demons fall back, and that momma and papa love each other, and that...

Nearby, her parents and their local pastor watch her.

"She's a good girl, that one." Father Miles nudges the man next to him. "You're lucky to have such a pious daughter. Little Joan will make a fine wife someday."

Jacques, Joan's father, nods to the pastor. "Prays five times a day, she does. Wish her sister would devote herself to God, but Catherine ain't that kind of girl. Still, Cath's a wonderful child... in her own way."

"Jaq, dear." Isabelle, the mother, lightly pushes his arm. "Don't go comparing our children. Heaven knows the Creator won't like a parent who picks a favorite."

"I'm not, I'm not." Jacques smiles and kisses his wife on the cheek, then turns back to Father Miles. "Say, we've got to go, but tearing Joan away from church is like prying a dog off a bone. Would you mind...?"

Miles chuckles. "Oh, yes. Of course. When she wakes from her trance and wonders where you went, I'll tell the child a bunch of hellhounds carried you off."

"You, men!" Isabelle smiles, despite their crude humor. "Don't scare the poor dear. I'll go home and cook some supper. You're free to share in the meal, if you like, Father Miles. There's always a place for you at our table."

"Oh, no, that's quite all right." Miles rubs his scalp and glances at the girl. "After Joan finishes, I'm going fishing."

The waning midday sun shines through the paned glass at the entrance of the church, casting a shadow of Saint Mary upon the young girl. She doesn't notice.

Jaques nods. "Thank you, Father. I owe you."

Six years later.

"Mother! Catherine is coughing again! She's coughing!" Joan rushes in and grabs her mother's sleeping arm. "Wake up! It's dreadful this time!"

Isabelle's eyes flutter open. After a moment, her adrenaline kicks in. "Catherine? Oh! The tea! I forgot the tea!"

Minutes pass. Joan's mother quickly warms the herbal tea over the fire, crossing her heart as she rushes into her daughter's room. The sound of a cat screaming in pain outside makes her flinch.

Accursed animals. They brought this plague upon us. I pray the Father and the Holy Ghost will cleanse them with fire.

She pulls the sheet back. Her youngest, Catherine, hacks and coughs uncontrollably. In between coughing fits, she whimpers and holds her stomach. "Hurts... m-mother... hurts..."

"I know, love. It's okay... I'm here, now. Drink this tea. Drink it slowly." Isabelle hands the brew to her teenage daughter, glancing behind herself to see Joan standing sullenly in the doorway.

Isabelle forces herself to smile. It will be okay, Joan. The Black Death is survivable. As long as we pray to the Lord, everything will work out. He knows what a good girl you are.

Silently, Isabelle looks out the window. Is Jacques still out in the fields? I hope he comes home soon.

The bitter tea inflames Catherine's throat. She coughs uncontrollably for several seconds. When Isabelle leans over to comfort her daughter, she freezes.

Catherine has three black spots at the bottom of her neck.

Half an hour later, Isabelle shivers as she puts the teenager to bed. She closes the door and forces a smile when she sees Joan's downcast eyes.

"Your sister will be fine, sweetheart. Come sleep with me tonight, okay?"

A tear rolls down Joan's face. "Cath's dying. It's my fault. I only prayed twice yesterday."

Isabelle's hand trembles. She quickly lowers herself to Joan's level. "It's not that at all, beloved child. God giveth, and he taketh away. He puts trials down to strengthen us. When your sister gets better, she will be immune to the plague. That's what Father Miles says."

"She will?" Joan's lip trembles. "But... what if she doesn't get better? What if-?"

"Don't say such things. You must be strong for your sister. God loves you, Joan. You are his precious daughter, just as your sister is. Continue to pray, and he will save Catherine. I know it!"

The young woman nods weakly. She's only seventeen, and already a heavy burden weighs on her heart.

She wipes her tears away and beams at her mother. "Oh... okay! I'll do my best, mother!"

Three months later... 1429.

Father Miles pauses a moment to eyeball the young blonde lady standing at his side. She stands next to her sister's casket, dressed in black. Joan gazes emptily at Catherine's final resting place. Her few dozen friends and family try to offer comforting words, but their platitudes fall on deaf ears.

How tragic, Miles thinks to himself with a sigh.

"We gather here today in memory of the departed..." Miles begins. "Catherine d'Arc, third in line for the d'Arc lineage, passed away just two days ago. She was a wonderful child, one who everyone knew to be courteous, kind, and generous. I remember her first day in Sunday School when she gave all of her food to a less fortunate classmate. The young man was born an orphan, with no family to love him. She always spoke to him kindly and compassionately..."

Miles swivels his eyes around the crowd. Her brother, Pierre, couldn't be here today. I doubt he's heard of Catherine's passing. The lad is off in the military, serving his country like any brave soldier. I hope he doesn't learn of her death during a moment of weakness. It could shatter his mind.

Joan sniffles now and then, but cries no tears.

The Black Death. Nobody understands where it comes from, but I do... not the cats. The Demons. They created the plague. They killed my sister.

Foul monsters. Enemies of God. They sully his world with their evil.

Miles watches while speaking, as the look of grief on Joan's face shifts into a new emotion. Rage.

He nods knowingly to himself. Gabriel. She is ready.

One week later.

Joan kneels before the altar once more; her favorite rosary clutched in her hand. The one that her sister gave her. The one she lost two years prior and spent three weeks searching until she found it.

She mutters quietly under her breath so that only God may hear her words. "Father in Heaven, Holy Ghost, and The Son. Why have you forsaken me? What wrong did Catherine commit? I have prayed since I was old enough to speak. I have given my material possessions. Why did you take my sister? She was blameless. She was innocent."

Joan closes her eyes and listens, but no response meets her ears.

The church, empty on a Saturday, dulls the sounds outside. Lately, however, her hearing has become sharper. She can perceive things she didn't notice before. Her muscles, too, ripple with power. Sometimes, when she gazes at the lake, the reflection staring back at her is that of a stranger's.

Footsteps echo outside.

Joan raises her head and turns to the door. It creaks open, and Father Miles steps inside. He wipes his forehead. The summer heat is much more intense than usual, and it shows in his body language.

"Joan? Ah, of course, it's you. Make sure you don't lose the key, now."

She nods, barely hearing Miles' words. "Father... I have... questions."

Miles closes the door and bars it, then sighs. "I imagined so. I expected them several years sooner."

A curious look spreads across the young woman's face. She rises to a standing position as he passes the pews and climbs the steps to the altar.

"What do you mean, Father?"

Miles chuckles. "Ah, Joan. Before that..." He raises a finger. "Do you believe in Karma?"

The young woman twines a finger through her braided blonde hair. "I... suppose? What is Karma?"

"Karma is a term that means all things have already been set in motion. Nothing is an accident."

Joan swallows quietly. "You're referring to God's plan?"

"Yes."

Slowly, she raises her eyes to stare up at the statue of the Crucifixion. "Was my sister's death in his plan?"

"Perhaps. You are the most pious young woman I know. What do you think?"

Joan nods. "I... yes. I believe in God's Will."

"And why, then, did God take your sister?"

The young woman's lip trembles. "I... I don't know. He wanted another... another angel in Heaven?"

"No." Miles takes a step toward her and wraps his arms around the trembling youth. "God tested you, Joan. He found you exemplary, just as I do. Even now, you have not wavered in your faith."

"I... I can't..." Joan pulls away from Miles' embrace. "I don't understand. I thought he was testing my sister! I thought he would heal her and make her stronger! Why did she have to die?!"

Miles wipes his nose and glances at the sun radiating through the windows. "Joan. Let me ask you a question. If someone prays for strength, do you think God gives them strength? Or does he give them the opportunity to be strong? If they pray for courage, don't you suppose he will give them a chance to show their courageousness?"

Joan nods, tears in her eyes. "W-well, yes."

The Pastor smiles. "It hurts. You've lost your sister. But now that you understand what loss feels like, you will grow more empathetic. You know how people suffer because of the plague."

Realization appears in Joan's eyes. "The Creator allowed my sister to die... to strengthen me? But why?"

"You're special, Joan. You aren't an ordinary human. I've known that since you were just six years old." Father Miles lowers his hand. "There's something I want to show you. The Lord, Jesus, conceals it. Help me move his image."

Joan nods. The two of them take a few steps toward the twenty-foot-tall carved image of the Crucifixion. Sunlight radiates onto Joan's back from the stained-glass windows, as she hefts the statue a few feet to the right. Despite weighing nearly half a ton, it proves no more cumbersome than a pail of water to the teenage girl. Father Miles reaches inside a hidden compartment behind the statue and pulls out a sword and sheath, allowing Joan to return Jesus to his former position.

"What is that?" The young girl meekly crosses her fingers together in front of her as the Pastor holds the weapon flat across both of his palms.

"There are no coincidences, young one. This blade is the Sword of Heaven. A mighty angel once wielded it, one known as... Saint Catherine."

Joan's heart catches. "C-Catherine?! The same name as-"

"Aye. Karma. Do you understand, now? An angel appeared before me on your sixth birthday. Camael, the Archangel of Divination. She spoke of a child who would rise to cleanse the evil from this land. That warrior is you."

Miles extends his arms, holding the sword out to Joan. "You are a Hero. You serve the Gods now. They will favor you and bring blessings to your family."

Joan meets the pastor's eyes. "The Black Plague. The Demons caused it, didn't they?"

"I wonder about that," Miles replies, noncommittally. "You are the Hero, Joan. You will find evil wherever it hides... and exterminate it. That is your divine calling."

The blonde woman pulls the sword from Father Miles' grasp. "I understand. Thank you, pastor. You've given me... hope."

Miles shakes his head and caresses her cheek. "No, Joan. It is you who has given everyone else hope. That is what it means to be a Hero."

"Joan is here! The Hero! Tell Satan! Tell Bael! Tell every- GHAK!"

The fire-type demon sprays across the wall as the young woman lightly backhands him.

Joan takes a few steps into the cave. "Ah, another den of evil. It's my lucky day. Agents of Satan the Devil cannot hide from my Divine Vision."

Joan concentrates, and piercing white light emits from her eyes, shining through dirt and rock as she searches for her prey. "Guard the entrance, men. I'll flush out the fiends who dwell in these foul pits."

A thousand soldiers outside the hidden den nod, raising their weapons. "Aye! Return in one piece, Daughter of God! We're counting on you!"

Joan doesn't respond. She continues hiking further into the crudely dug cave, just big enough for her small frame to fit. Her light-armor rattles as she walks. The sword in her hand glows fiercely whenever a demon draws near, as though it's excited for the meal it will soon enjoy.

Terrified demons rush up to her, weapons both natural and artificial held at the ready, though none wish to be in her path. After all, the Maid of Orleans has yet to suffer a scratch in her year of conquest.

"Filthy fleshbag whore! Your head will roll!" A massive berserker-type howls.

Joan waves her hand, and stone spikes erupt from the earthen walls, lancing through three dozen demons and monsters in her path. The evil fiends perish instantly, unaware of the fate that befell them moments prior. The rest of the demons charge at her.

"Get her! The boss will make us Dukes if we gut this bitch!"

Joan smiles, but she feels no joy. "Aye. If."

She crouches down and delivers a gut-busting punch to one big fellow, tearing the demonic energy from his body and knocking him to the ground. With a flick of Catherine, the sword tears him into hundreds of pieces with its magical abilities.

Several demons burrow into the walls and burst out behind her, hoping to surprise the woman with a sneak attack.

Their efforts fail.

Joan spins on one toe, using her blade to cleave all her assailants at once. Then, using her light manipulation, she begins forming spears of pure Holy Energy and hurls them down the corridor with explosive force, tearing apart everyone in her path. The Divine Javelins erupt into shrapnels of light each time they impact a wall, killing dozens more.

"Sh-she's unstoppable! Fall back! Fall back!!" A demon Duke in the rear howls in fear, but for daring to speak up, he's rewarded with a missing head when Joan dances over to him and lops it off with a single strike.

Minutes later, Joan kneels in the blood of her fallen enemies and prays. "Thank you, Father in Heaven, for this massacre of evildoers. I have purged thy unholy enemies, as always, in your Divine Name. May you bless this world with favor."

Then, she continues moving. Her rampage is nowhere near complete.

"Renounce thy beliefs," Bailiff Massieu hisses. "Sign this paper. Admit you are a heretic. We will banish you from the army, but at least you will be allowed to live."

"Ptuh!" Joan spits at the man, causing the crowd of onlookers to gasp. "I'll never renounce my faith! I was called by God to slay demons, and that is what I've done! You are the servant of evil here!"

Massieu wipes his face. "You're nothing but a witch, a sorceress. The soldiers spoke of your supernatural powers! "

"Given to me by God!"

"An unlikely story!" Massieu hisses. He holds a paper up, one that would allow Joan to survive if she signed it, and tears it in half dramatically. "Consign yourself to the fires of Hell! Let none say that I offered you no mercy!"

The Bailiff smirks as he walks away. "Tie the witch where she stands. Burn her. She will serve as a warning for all who drink from the fountain of demonic power."

Joan stands valiantly, her back to the pyre. Massieu. A demonic collaborator. I trusted in the purity of humanity, but I should have realized that weak-minded men might sink so low as to seek power from our enemies.

A tear rolls down her face. Is this why I fought? To protect those who cared nothing for their people?

From the heavens, a light shines down. A voice appears in Joan's mind.

Young one. I am Raphael, a messenger from the Creator. We cannot save thee in thy time of need, but He has foreseen that thy life will not end here. Thy sword shall protect thee. Thou shalt enter it and someday be called upon once again. When that time comes... thou shalt know what to do.

Joan gazes into the sky. She smiles, as the men approach with torches held high. "I... I understand. I will never doubt you, my Lord. My sister... Catherine? Is she...?"

She is an angel, here in Heaven. Thou hath done well, Hero. Thy sacrifices and struggles will never be forgotten.

Joan's smile radiates like the morning sun, even as flames begin to lick at her feet. "Thank you. Never forget that I served you to the very end."

Jason stares blankly at Amelia as she takes a step back. "You brought this upon yourself."

In his hand, a sword of pure blackness forms. It's a weapon familiar to Amelia, one she saw long ago when Joan tore her to shreds.

Catherine. The Sword From Heaven.

"No! No!!" Amelia shrieks as she backs away even further. "How can you- where did you get that?!"

The Wordsmith rises, and his wounds heal. Dark energy rushes into his skin, and his eyes shift from white to grey to black. "Achilles. Orion. Hermes."

Several pieces of armor appear in midair, wrapping around and encasing his body in darkness. "The Armor of Achilles, the Belt of Orion, and the Boots of Hermes. All legendary treasures from on high, all of them ruined by this godforsaken hell. If I must wear them to defeat you, I will."

The Black Queen raises Dellfingler defensively. Her nervousness and fear threatens to paralyze her. "W-what are these artifacts, Blaarjiim? I've... I've never seen anything like them."

Blaarjiim shakes his head. "Neither have I, my queen. If they're even close to the level of the Sword of Heaven, then this battle won't last-"

Jason leaps at Amelia, screaming with a pitch similar to a minotaur. "GROOAAR!" He swings his sword down, and Amelia barely raises Dellfingler in time to block. The impact of their weapons flattens the grass around them.

"Ow! Oh god, that hurt!" Dellfingler cries out in pain, but barely gets a second's reprieve before Jason's sword turns into a blur of motion. TING-TING-TWANG THUD!

Amelia deflects three of Jason's attacks before dodging the fourth and jumping back. The Wordsmith smashes his sword into the ground, spraying dirt in a wide arc. After a moment, his tongue snakes out. "Where do you think you're going?"

Blaarjiim assesses the situation. "My queen, something about those artifacts is corrupted. They're poisoning the mortal's mind. He's not fighting like he normally does."

Jason cackles evilly. "Hahaha! You don't say! Oh, Amelia! I haven't forgotten what you DID to me!" He stands up straight and aims the sword away from his body, as if lowering his defenses. "For thirty days, I lay in that fucking bed! Paralyzed, unable to speak, barely able to think!"

Jason vanishes, startling Amelia and Blaarjiim with his speed. A moment later, he reappears behind the Black Queen and licks his lips. "I'll make you SUFFER!"

Jason grabs Amelia by the hair. He ignores her scream of fright as he flips her over his head and slams her into the ground. Thanks to Amelia's enhanced body, the attack barely hurts her, but fear still appears in her eyes. She swings Dellfingler and slices the back of Jason's legs, but he doesn't even wince in pain. The Wordsmith releases Amelia for a moment, falls forward, and heals the wound with his Wordsmithing. "Heal."

Dellfingler yells, "W-watch out, honey! He's strong as the Devil himself! That dark energy's messing with his head!"

Amelia dodges another grab as Jason swipes at her. He grows enraged, and his hands turn into the claws of a werewolf. He grips the corrupted Sword of Heaven more tightly and spins to face her. "I released you from that statue, and look at how you repaid me! You split my throat, broke my back, and left me to die!"

Amelia's hand trembles as she grips Dellfingler. "That's not true! I healed you! I even made sure everyone knew you were lying outside the Core!"

"LIAR!" Jason stomps toward her, and his dark energy shifts around him, transforming him from a man into something resembling a Shade. His body becomes slightly fuzzy and indistinct, and then morphs into a shadow of a woman.

Amelia's eyes widen in terror. "N-no! Joan! Stay away!" She takes a step back, fails to notice a rock, and trips. At that moment, Jason lunges forward, clearing the short gap instantaneously.

"My queen!"

The Sword Of Heaven swings up, lops off Amelia's right arm with one movement, then reverses direction and cuts off her other arm. She flops onto her back and screams in pain. "Aaiie! No, Joan, please!! It hurts!!"

Jason grins devilishly, and yanks Dellfingler out of her dismembered hand.

"You'd better stop this right now, you little punk!" Dellfingler roars.

Jason ignores the sword's protests and plunges Dellfingler into Amelia's stomach, then stabs the Sword of Heaven into her heart, pinning Amelia to the ground.

"Aaaah! Uwaaa! It hurts! Hnnngh!"

It takes several seconds before she can do anything other than cry and choke for breath. Jason leans over her body and smirks. "Not so tough now, are you? Fucking bitch. Do you think this ends here?! I've barely begun!"

The Black Queen wiggles and tries to kick Jason, but he wraps his legs around hers, pinning her completely. She whimpers in return. "Joan... please... I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I didn't mean-"

"I'm not Joan! Stop calling me that!" Jason gnashes his teeth. "You hated me because I was weak, but now I'm unstoppable! It takes a monster to kill a monster! Beg for mercy!"

Jason leans imposingly over Amelia's helpless body. His expression changes slightly as his eyes travel from her legs all the way up to her face. "Maybe I've been doing this all wrong. There's a way to get out of your little predicament, Amelia. If you stay by my side and promise to be my whore, I'll make sure nobody hurts you. Not the demons, not Joan... nobody but me. You get to live; we get to be together..."

His face approaches hers. Amelia squirms and glances down at her arm stumps. They still haven't grown back yet. Catherine's holy energy, driven straight into Amelia's heart, prevents her body from regenerating.

Jason caresses Amelia's thighs. Slowly, his werewolf-like claws roam up her body to her breasts, only to come to a stop on her bloody arm stumps. The mortal presses her against the ground, digging into her wounds.

Amelia cries out in pain. "Eeeyahh!!"

Jason softens his voice. "We don't have to hurt each other anymore. Just say you want me, Amelia." He leans down to kiss her, but Amelia wrenches her head away.

"Stay away! You're not Jason. I hate you." Tears form in her eyes as she tries to avoid his touch. "I knew it. You're no better than Joan."

Her voice shakes, despite her attempt to dampen her terror. "I cared about you. For a day or two, maybe it would have worked. But I knew, once I found out you were a Hero, it was over between us. I finally understand what that armor is. It's not making you evil, Jason... it's drawing out your deepest desires."

Jason falters, pulling back a few inches. He scowls. "Lies. The armor is evil, not I."

"No, you are." Amelia turns to face him defiantly, their faces separated by inches. "If I'm wrong, then kill me. Don't turn me into a plaything. Take the sword and cut my head off, then destroy the rest of my body with your Wordsmithing."

The Wordsmith stares at Amelia for several long moments, taking shallow breaths. "I... I don't want to."

A moment passes.

Amelia nods knowingly.

"You said the armor would give you the strength to kill me, but that's not true. The last thing you want is for me to die. You want my body; nothing else. Admit it. The corrupted armor brings out your selfishness, your repressed thoughts. That's all it does. It isn't making you evil, Jason. Those thoughts were there all along."

He jumps off her and takes a few steps back. "Y-you're wrong! All wrong!"

"I'm not!" Amelia doesn't kick or try to stand. Instead, she glances away, across the field and into the distance. "You could have been honest, Jason. If there was even a drop of love in your heart or a pale shadow of empathy for others, you could have told me you loved me."

She inhales painfully, the swords still impaling her feminine form to the ground. "But now you can't. You've done the unforgivable. Look at yourself. You wanted to be a righteous Hero who fought for truth and goodness, but you're as much of a failure as all the previous ones were! It's true, Jason. I wanted to enslave you, make you into a weapon against the Emperors. The difference is that I have no path to redemption. I'm evil. Stained."

"Amelia..." Jason whispers, his eyes downcast. "I... I didn't mean to hurt you."

Amelia stares up at the sky, the sun waning in the distance. "I deserve what you've done to me. But... you were supposed to be better." She chokes and tears up. "You were supposed to be better! You were supposed to be a good man! Why did you have to change?! I hate you! I hate everything about you!!"

Amelia kicks and squirms violently for several seconds, futilely trying to break free of her impalement. She fails.

The Wordsmith says nothing for several moments, as Amelia sobs and gasps. Despite his demonic, monstrous appearance, his aura shrinks until it's no longer recognizable. The intimidating monster fades away, revealing a broken husk of a man.

Jason raises his head and walks to Amelia, then slowly kneels beside her. His voice normalizes as his negative energy fades. "You're... you're right. I can't apologize enough. I don't know what to say."

He reaches over and yanks the swords out of Amelia's heart and stomach, sending blood flying. Then he tosses the weapons to the side. "Heal."

Amelia stares at him silently as he sits beside her. Her arms rapidly regenerate. Despite their battle only a minute before, she lies still and doesn't move to attack him.

"Jason?"

He avoids her gaze. "Don't look at me."

"I'm not mad."

"You should be. I am."

Jason leans over and starts yanking on the Boots of Hermes. He struggles for a solid minute before sighing. "I can't... can't get these fucking things off." His voice cracks as he fights back tears.

Amelia pulls herself into a sitting position. She silently takes Dellfingler and sheathes him inside his scabbard. "Jason. I've never seen you in as much pain as you are right now. Look at me."

He turns away, putting his back to her instead. "I don't want to. Everything you said was right. All your fears... all your suspicions. You were right to hate me."

"That's not what I said," Amelia replies, chewing her lip. "I never hated you, Jason. Not until today. Not until you attacked me. Not until you brought out the evil within yourself. Still... I would be hypocritical if I acted like you were the only one at fault."

His voice is numb. "I suppose."

Amelia pulls herself a little closer and wraps her arms around Jason. "You love me... don't you?"

He doesn't answer.

"You can say it, Jason. Now is the time for honesty."

While she wraps herself around Jason's back, he rubs tears from his eyes and stifles a sob. "I.... I did. I do. Maybe. I don't know. What I did wasn't loving at all. If this armor brings out my inner thoughts, then I'm just a sick, evil man. I'm worse than the demons."

"I wouldn't go that far."

The Black Queen pulls away from Jason. She sits and stares at his back for an entire minute. Already, the waning sun casts long shadows across the plains. She looks up at the darkening sky and sighs.

"Jason. I want you to kill me."

The Wordsmith sniffles, then turns to look at her. "What? I can't. I won't."

"You need to. I'm a mass-murderer. I won't stop until I've devoured the universe."

Another minute passes. Jason strokes the dead, brown grass. "Don't ask me to hurt you."

Amelia narrows her eyes. She climbs to her feet and walks over to Catherine. The sword lies on the ground a dozen feet away.

With a light kick, Amelia sends the sword clattering over to Jason. "Pick it up. This time, finish what you started."

"I won't." Jason turns away again and stares into the distance.

"Pick the fucking sword up."

"No."

Amelia shakes her head. "You almost had me. Goddamnit Jason. I told you to stop hurting me, not to spare my life! There's a difference!"

He doesn't reply for a few moments. "To me, those are the same thing."

"They aren't."

Blaarjiim watches silently, trying to understand his queen's thoughts. Never before have they been so chaotic and disorganized. Confusion and contradictions swirl around in her mind.

"My queen, please, stop and think. Take the Wordsmith's life. Enslave him like we planned. Then, you can-"

Amelia mutters under her breath, "No, Blaarjiim. I won't. I've made up my mind."

"You wish to die? Why?! Don't throw your life away!"

She ignores him. "Goddamn you, Jason. Finish me off. You're a Hero. I'm a monster. It's your destiny. Your job."

He crosses his arms. "Fuck destiny."

Amelia inhales. "Fine. I'll beat you to death. How about that?"

The Wordsmith shrugs and looks away. "Go ahead. I don't care anymore."

His apathy pushes her over the edge. "Argh!! One little failure, and you fall to pieces. Pathetic! If you won't fight me willingly, then I'll make you!"

Amelia unsheathes Dellfingler, then rushes at Jason. She strikes the front of his chest armor, punches his stomach, and sends him careening head over heels several feet away. He lands in a patch of dirt and lays limp.

Jason rolls over and shakes his head, unharmed by her attack. "I won't fight you."

"Bastard! Stop mocking me!" Amelia forces anger into her voice, but her heart isn't in it. She wants to fight him, but only because she doesn't know how to deal with her feelings either.

Jason pulls himself up. "Your attack lacked conviction. Hurry up and kill me, Amelia. I know you want to."

"Ooooh!" She howls in frustration, then stabs Dellfingler into the dirt. "I can't! I can't do it if you won't fight back! Come on! Summon Joan again!"

Jason doesn't reply. His emotions fade away, leaving nothing behind. He becomes little more than a sailor floating atop an ocean of despair.

Amelia sinks to the ground. She buries her head in her hands. "I can't do it, Blaarjiim. I can't kill him. What changed? Why... why?"

Begrudgingly, the orb of darkness offers his opinion. "You wanted honesty from the mortal. Despite the unhealthy way it manifested, you got what you wished for. Haah... perhaps Dellfingler was right. Kiss and make up, or go your separate ways."

Time passes. The young woman and man sit across from each other, a fifty-foot gap separating them. Neither looks the other in the eye.

Amelia blinks and raises her head. "I can't kill Jason. He won't kill me. There's only one thing I can do."

She forms signs with her hand and whispers. Beside her, dark energy coalesces into the form of a familiar red-skinned demon. His short, stocky body, and strangely ill-fitting suit combine to give him something of a comical appearance.

The newcomer yawns. "Aaah, geez. What's the big idea? Why'd you wake me up?"

Jason, hearing the unfamiliar voice, looks up. "A demon...? Who?"

A twinkle of recognition appears in the newcomer's eyes. "Oh? Is this that guy you were telling me about?"

Amelia stares sullenly at the ground. "Yes."

"Great! Might as well introduce myself, then. 'Sup, kid. I'm Satan, the former First Emperor of the demons. You must be the Wordsmith. The Black Queen kept blubbering about you."

Jason jumps to his feet and looks at Amelia in confusion. "The First Emperor? You're allies with him?! But... but he's supposed to be dead! You killed him!"

Satan rubs his muscular bicep. "The reports of my demise have been greatly exaggerated."

The Wordsmith eyes the First Emperor cautiously. While Jason towers over Satan, standing seven-feet tall to the Devil's below-six-foot stature, the demon's stocky body and nonchalant attitude gives him a far more intimidating presence.

Amelia touches Satan's leg. "I can't fight Jason anymore. Please... finish the job. Leave him almost dead so I can-"

Satan rolls his eyes. "Steal his soul. Duh. I know the drill."

The former First Emperor raises his wrist to stare at a strange-looking analog wristwatch, one without any moving parts. Then, he crosses the field, closing the gap between himself and the Wordsmith. "I don't get out often. Give me some fun, chum. If you don't, I'll hurt ya ten times worse than you could ever imagine."

Amelia turns away and closes her eyes.

"I can't watch."

ANDYLEE

Part 042: The Invincible Satan!

Satan. The former First Emperor of demonkind.

I pull myself to my feet shakily. My spherical vision gives me a good look at the Devil as he approaches. Huge, seven-inch horns stick out of his head. A suit similar to Beelzebub's, but unbuttoned and missing a tie, gives him a much more casual and relaxed appearance than the former. His slicked-back hair and general demeanor make him look like an Italian mobster. The suspenders and goatee, however, give him a sleazier aura. I always wondered if the Devil was a cross between a lawyer and a used-car salesman, but I didn't expect to be right.

Satan is also far shorter than other demons I've met, at well under six-feet. Hell, he's only a few inches taller than Amelia in her adult body.

This guy is the most powerful demon who has ever walked the mortal plane? That doesn't seem right at all.

The former First Emperor strides toward me, pulls a cigar out of his pocket, and lights it with a tiny flame from his thumb. After inhaling, he waves his thumb to put out the fire, and his eyes scan me up and down. "Oh? You're a tall one. Enhancement magic, I'd wager. The babyface gives it away."

I glance past him at Amelia. She peeks through her fingers at me, then quickly wraps her arms around her legs, pulling them up to hide her face.

Amelia summoned Satan to fight me. Is that because she hasn't the heart to kill me? I thought she hated me. I assaulted her and nearly... I nearly...

Dammit. How could she hesitate? Why? I don't deserve her mercy, not at a time like this.

Satan stops, ten feet separating us. He looks up at me. "Nothing to say? Just gonna stand there like a piss-ant?"

A female voice appears in the back of my mind. I recognize it as the echo of Joan. Sometimes the Sword from Heaven makes Joan's voice appear in my mind.

Demon. Kill demon. Enemy of God. Kill demon.

A different male voice speaks. Fight. Kill. Kill. Kill.

A third voice wails in pain. Please, god, don't let him live! It hurts! My body hurts!

The same voices were screaming at me only minutes ago, telling me to hurt Amelia. I listened to them then... but maybe I shouldn't now-

FIGHT. KILL DEMON. FIGHT.

Damn, they're getting louder again!

Shaking the voices from my head, I use telekinesis to yank Catherine back to me. I don't want to fight Amelia, but it isn't her standing in front of me; it's a Demon Emperor.

"Satan, is it? You're shorter than I expected."

He sticks his left hand in his suit pocket. "Yeah? I didn't expect anything from you, and I'm still disappointed."

"Sorry I let you down. Are we going to fight, or what?"

"No need to rush to your death, idiot." Satan nods at Catherine. "Nice sword. Know how to use it?"

"I've trained," I reply while thinking to myself, kinda.

Satan inhales and glances down at a stupidly colorful watch on his right wrist, one covered in gems and other tacky bling. As he looks at it, I frown.

Wait, that's not a watch... it's a fucking wrist-mounted sundial.

He evaluates it for three seconds, cocking it around as the sun dips below the horizon. "Never mind; time's running short. Look, I'm a nice guy. If you can land a hit on me in the next five minutes, I won't break every bone in your body before I kill you. I'll handicap myself too. I won't use my arms or my legs to attack or defend. Sound fair?"

My eyes narrow. "What? Are you fucking with me?"

A shrug. "Depends. By the way... that whole dark energy thing? Tacky. You're overcompensating. Like I always say, if your name ain't Valac, put that edgy evil look back."

My mind argues with itself. Is this guy serious? He's weird! But then, maybe he's unthinkably powerful. Or, he could be bluffing! I defeated Amelia with ease. She beat him, so he must be weaker than her, right?

No, dumbass, it's never that easy. You don't know how their battle went. Maybe he was already weakened. Take it slow. Assess him cautiously, then go for a killing blow!

Satan, his eyes still closed, sighs. "Those five minutes started ticking, kid. If you don't hit me by the time this cigar's gone, you're gonna regret it."

Fuck it, attack!

I lunge forward, using my Telekinesis to shove myself to the side, before jumping back at the last second, sword held defensively at the ready.

Satan stands still. He opens his eyes. "The hell was that? Are you dancing? Get a move on, boy!"

A bead of sweat drips down my forehead. He didn't flinch. It's like he knew I was going to play it safe for the first round.

Not bothering to answer, I jump at him again, this time rearing my sword back to slash at him.

My blade swings at Satan's backside.

WHAM!

It stops a millimeter from his skin, as if striking a wall of iron.

"What?!" I quickly pull back again, scanning him to look for damage. There is none. "I hit you!"

Satan rechecks his sundial. "Afraid not. Four and a half minutes left, chum."

"The sun's already dipping past the horizon! A sundial can't tell time if there's no sun!"

Satan shakes his head. "Not with that attitude. My beloved Bertha is never wrong. Better hurry up."

My teeth grind together. If Satan isn't going to attack, and I get four minutes of him only playing defense, I might as well use my advantage.

"Speed. Speed. Strength. Strength. Perception. Stabilize."

I glance down at my boots. The Boots of Hermes allow the wearer to teleport rapidly at short range, and they offer enhanced speed, but they're difficult to control. Orion's Belt already augments my strength, and Achilles' armor protects me from damage, so I should be able to pierce the Devil's defense with ease!

This time, I don't hold back. In an instant, I cross the small gap separating us, delivering a flurry of stabs and jabs, each one striking an invisible barrier surrounding Satan's body. I begin teleporting around him, slashing, stabbing, and sending rocks and pebbles flying at his body with my telekinesis.

My flurry continues unabated for what feels like an eternity. Suddenly, I jump away as Satan pulls his left hand out of his pocket. He raises it to his mouth and... covers a yawn. "Aaahhn... Mmm. Three minutes. Don't go easy on my now, y'hear?"

My breath comes in short gasps, though I stifle the noise, not wanting to look pathetic in front of the Devil himself. I gave it my all. Something invisible surrounds Satan's body, and I can't get past it. A barrier?

Satan glances at Amelia, then back to me. "Look, I know it's poor form to give an opponent tips during a battle, but I feel a bit bad for you. Tell you what, kid. You should probably avoid using melee attacks. Only a few people have ever pierced my Ultimate Defense with a weapon, and their lives ended quite horribly." He sticks his left hand back in his pocket. "I'm trying to help you out, boyo. Oh, and don't forget the timer."

This little fucker, I think to myself. I can't stand his smug grin!

The echo of Joan's voice whispers in my mind. Don't hold back. Use my full power. Catherine knows the Devil's weakness.

My eyes drift to the sword. I've yet to use its secret abilities. I don't want to break my mind again... but... against Satan, holding back would be a bad choice.

I set my jaw and lock my mental vision onto the Devil. Catherine. Give me enough strength to crush this smug asshole!

A shadowy image of Joan's face appears in my mind. She smiles, and her grin grows sinister. Use it.

Suddenly, my body sucks underground. The sword activates, giving me Joan's power of earth manipulation. I burrow rapidly, erupting from under Satan, and the sword twitches with anticipation, dragging me around behind it. One Thousand Cuts, it yells into my mind.

The weapon slashes and slices rapidly, each attack swiftly blocked by Satan, attacking his legs, arms, chest, every part of him all at once. However, Satan takes two steps back and frowns. "Hm?"

My arms bulge with power as Catherine summons strength into my body. While she cuts, I lunge my unencumbered arm out and grab Satan's left leg. To my surprise, I manage to pierce through whatever's protecting him. His eyes bolt down. "What? How?!"

I teleport fifty feet into the sky, then use my momentum to hurl the Demon Emperor down. My suddenly freed hand summons a magical spear of light, one that's nearly four-feet long. Before Satan can hit the ground, I hurl the holy weapon at him. It races forward at the speed of sound and creates a sonic boom when it impacts his body.

BATOOOM!

I teleport to the ground with the power of Hermes' Boots. Unlike before, my breath comes steadily. The dust around Satan settles and...

Shit.

Satan stands in a shallow crater with his lit cigar resting lazily in his mouth.

"Not bad. The grab caught me off-guard, but then, I am a little rusty. A hundred thousand years locked inside the Black Witch's vacant mind will do that to a fella."

"I didn't hurt you?" I ask. "But... the light-spear."

Satan grunts. "Nice touch, that one. The thing is, you're supposed to use a flashy attack like that to finish a target with style, not as a desperate attempt to hurt them. Doesn't look very badass. Two minutes left, by the way."

MOTHER FUCKER! My teeth grind together as I try to assess the situation. If only I had the Crown!

Satan chuckles. "Oh, incidentally, I've been meaning to say... love the boots. Hermes. Great guy. I killed him. Long story."

"You did?"

A nod. "Yup. I didn't want to, but I was young and needed power. He wasn't an Archangel, though I killed a few of those during my heyday as well. Hermes was one of the better messenger angels, and that was back before the telephone and email and a bunch of other human inventions." Satan taps his sundial. "The good old days. Dunno why I'm bringing that stuff up now. Must be my nostalgia gettin' the better of me. Anyway, one-point-five minutes left, lad."

I can't keep letting Satan stall for time! My hands start to shake as I consider my options. I can't kill him with a single word. Maybe I should summon a black hole. However, that would cost a lot of energy, which I don't have. I can't make a gun without the Crown, nor can I make anything else that's mechanically complex...

Catherine whispers to me again. I defeated the Black Witch. Use the secret power. Steal his energy for yourself.

Secret power?

Something clicks in my head. Focusing my mind, I form a giant invisible hand out of telekinesis. The psychic palm reaches out and grabs Satan, pinning him in place. Judging by the surprise on his face, he didn't expect the move.

I lunge forward and activate Blade of a Thousand Cuts. As before, Satan quickly blocks all of Catherine's attacks, but this time, with him pinned in place, I release the sword, teleport behind the Devil, and grab him by the back of the neck.

"Drain!"

Immediately, Satan's demonic energy rushes into my body. The Demon Emperor gasps for breath. The cigar drops from his mouth, and a rush of mana swells in my chest. Before he can take a swing at me, I teleport back, grab Catherine before she hits the ground, and put all my power in an upward strike. The sheer force of my attack cleaves the Demon Emperor in two, but I quickly follow up with a flurry of other attacks, chopping, cutting, and slicing him into a million pieces.

Satan falls to the ground and becomes a puddle of flesh.

I gasp wildly as my vision wavers.

I did it! Holy fucking shit! I can't... I can't believe it!

"Amelia! Did you see that?"

I turn to look at the place she was sitting.

She isn't there anymore. Only a hole in the ground and her two severed arms remain.

Suddenly, the wind begins to hiss around the crimson puddle which used to be the Devil. Blood-colored energy pours from Satan's corpse, dissolves into mist in the air, and the Emperor regenerates atop his remains. His bones appear first. Then, his muscles and skin.

However, unlike before, when he emerges from the bloody mist, all of his clothes are missing.

I gawk in disbelief at the First Emperor. Never, not even in my worst nightmares, did I expect he could return from the dead, and certainly not without a scratch on his skin!

Satan stares down at his exposed self, then gingerly bends over to pick up his sundial before tying it back onto his wrist. "I didn't expect you to mix things up. You're more inventive than I gave you credit for."

"I killed you! How did you survive?!"

He sweeps his hair back with one hand and strikes a pose with the other. "Oh, that? Easy. You see, I've formed contracts with many souls, and each one allows me to regenerate from death exactly once. Unfortunately for you, I have ten thousand, four hundred and sixteen souls banked up."

The blood drains from my face. "No... you're lying. You must be."

He leans forward with a smile. "I hope you've got more of that inventiveness left. Less than a minute left to make me regenerate ten thousand times! Hop to it, pal!"

All my confidence vanishes. Satan's unstoppable. He's invincible. It took everything I had to beat him once. How am I supposed to do it ten thousand times?!

My eyes jump to where Amelia sat. Why did she leave? Where did Amelia go? What's that hole in the ground?!

Not long before.

"The mortal won't last much longer, my queen," Blaarjiim says, a touch of eagerness in his voice. "Why not take a peek? Satan is toying with him."

I've since shifted to wrapping my arms around my legs and burying my face in my knees. "I don't wanna. I've had enough of this day. Once Satan's done, I'll enslave Jason. That's all there is to it. Okay?"

Blaarjiim crosses his arms in my mind's eye. "Come now. Don't be sad. It's obvious you care for him. Soon he'll be with you forever. You can summon him whenever you want. You can make him do anything for you. Think of the fun times you'll-"

"Blaarjiim. Please. Don't." I cut him off before he can continue.

I don't want that kind of relationship with Jason. I don't want to think about it. Using him like he nearly used me would be horrible. Sickening.

Once he's under my control; he won't disobey my orders. Even if he wants to, he won't. But that's awful! I don't mind using my power on the others... they all hurt me in different ways. Jason is different, though! He's different!

The ground shakes, and I force myself not to peek. Blaarjiim turns away. "Ooh, I didn't see that coming! He summoned one of Joan's light-spears!"

"Don't tell me, Blaarjiim. I don't want to listen."

My closest friend in the whole universe sighs and looks at me. "I hate seeing you in this state, my queen. I've seen you weep before, but never to such a degree. I won't enjoy seeing the mortal get torn to shreds at this rate."

"You poor thing," I mutter bitterly. "I'm sorry I ruined your day."

Finally, Blaarjiim becomes more self-conscious. He materializes and lightly touches the back of my skull. He tries to reach out and caress my hair, but his body has no substance. It's all an illusion in my mind.

"I apologize. I should not prod you so. Why do you have feelings for this mortal? He descends from your greatest enemies, after all."

"Dunno," I mumble. "It's not like I can help the way I feel."

Blaarjiim lowers his voice to a whisper. "Once you enslave Jason, he will never hurt you again. If you still hold feelings for him, you will both be able to trust each other in the same way as you do me. Won't that be nice? Please cheer up. Smile."

I shake my head. "I can't. I don't want to. I-"

The ground shifts beneath me again, and I flinch, knowing Jason and Satan are clashing.

Blaarjiim's eyes widen. "My queen! Under you! It's-"

Something erupts from the ground underneath me. Too late, I start pulling my head back from my legs, and a hand wraps around my mouth.

"Mgmm?!" I try to say something, but the hand silences me. Then, ten more appear and grab all of my limbs. They wrap around me, and a second later pull with all their strength, dragging me underground.

Oh god! What the hell?! Get off me!

Blaarjiim yells in alarm as the surface vanishes, and the darkness of the underground world takes me. Tens of tons of dirt and stone envelop my body and crush me, making it impossible to breathe or move. Pitch black darkness surrounds me. I can't even whimper or cry out as they start squeezing my throat.

"They're Ghouls! Undead monsters! Fight! Break free!" Blaarjiim yells frantically, and I struggle to move, but their strength is incredible!

The further the undead creatures drag me underground, the more unbearable the weight of the darkness becomes. No matter how I struggle, I can't break free.

Suddenly, blinding pain erupts through every part of my body. I open my mouth to scream, causing dirt to surge into my mouth, gagging and panicking me.

Shik, Shik, Shik!

Something horrible starts stabbing my stomach, chest, and back. A voice cackles as the ghouls drag me further and further, their hands grabbing and groping every inch of my body.

"Yesss, thisss isss my moment to ssshine!" A phantom face appears before me, as a ghostly figure continues stabbing me over and over.

I can't break free! Jason! Jason!! HELP!!!

Blaarjiim screams into my mind. "Fight! Don't you dare die to a low-level Duke! Use your power! Unleash it!"

The horrible pain continues for several minutes. The Demon Duke of Mist, Mephisto, hovers in front of me, rubbing his hands with glee as his awful monsters bite and chew me all over.

"Now you will sssuffer for your sssinsss, ssshe-beassst! I will hold and torture you here for the ressst of your daysss!"

He continues stabbing, but the pain isn't as unbearable as it was when he first grabbed me. Blaarjiim's energy enters my body. The fear rushes away. Even while the pain blinds and sickens me, I clench my fists.

The hell you will! I don't need Jason to save me! I'll kill you myself!!

"Bleaagghh!" The dirt blasts from my mouth as rage swells within me.

MEPHISTO! I'LL TEAR YOU TO PIECES!

Part 043: Calm Before The Storm

I finish soldering a new component onto the front of my truck right as Samantha bounces over to me. She beams me a smile filled with sunshine and kittens. "Hey, Phoebe! What are you up to?"

Standing on a stool hunched over my truck, I glance through my welding mask at her scantily-clad figure only to quickly avert my eyes a moment later. Lord have mercy.

"I've been working on a new project. Ever since that demon attacked the Core, I realized I needed a way to contact Jason."

Samantha's smile vanishes. "Beelzebub won't bother you again. I made sure of that."

"So you say," I reply. "If it's alright with you though... I need to see Jason. I built a device to monitor his spiritual energy..."

Samantha leans against the truck, standing on her tiptoes to see the Temporal Modulator I've built. "A device? You aren't snooping on him, are you?"

I shake my head and pull Hoarhiim's glowing orb from a bag at my side. "This is his orb-friend. The two of them have a spiritual connection. I'm using Hoarhiim's energy to locate Jason. I have a gadget that can track him anywhere, and see when his spiritual energy levels dip. That should mean he's in a battle, or worse..."

Samantha narrows her eyes. "So you are snooping on him. Can't the man have a little privacy?"

I activate my solder again. "I suppose. I'm... I'm a little worried. I haven't seen Jason in two months. What if demons took him prisoner and all his messages proclaiming his wellbeing were lies? What if he gets in a bad fight and dies? I won't even know!"

Samantha slides her body from the side of the truck over to me, hunched over the hood. "You worry about him a lot. What do you get out of your relationship?"

I pause and hold the soldering iron away from my newest creation. "Um... I don't know. Nothing, I guess?"

Samantha eases a little closer to me and my stool. She reaches up and touches my back. "Nooothing at all? Not even a little fun on the side?"

"Fun? What do you mean?"

Her finger starts tracing a circle on my back, sending a shiver down my spine. "You two are an I-T-E-M, right? Come on, tell me a little about your relationship."

Sighing, I set the solder down and pry my mask off. "Ahh, well... it's a long story. Um. Jason defeated Bahamut, and afterward, when her magic dissipated-"

Immediately, Samantha interrupts me. "Wait, hold on. I thought Kar killed her! Isn't he the Sphinx?"

I wince, wondering if it's okay to tell Samantha what happened.

What if Neil's right? She might be gathering intel. I shouldn't answer all of her questions, should I?

Well, I've already said too much. Can't stop now...

"Kar is the Sphinx, yes, but Jason solved the Sphinx's Riddle. He did it quickly, too. In under a minute."

"I see." Samantha creeps a little closer, wrapping an arm around my legs. Since I'm standing on a stool, she can't reach higher comfortably, but...

"Err, getting a little close, aren't you?"

She winks. "Men are always causing trouble and getting in fights... but we ladies know how to treat each other with compassion and tender loving care. Don't you think so?"

"Uh... um..." I fumble with the soldering iron for a moment. "I'm, uh... I don't really..."

"You don't swing that way? Are you suuure?" Samantha's tail flicks around as she cocks her head questioningly. "How do you know if you've never tried?"

"Nngh... I can't, though. I love Jason."

The succubus pulls away, a sad expression clouding her face. "Oh. It's like that, huh? With a heart as big as yours, I thought maybe you'd have room for two in there."

"Two? A-at once? God forbids polygamy!"

Samantha taps her soft, red lips. "Mmm. I'm a demon, so I don't care what 'God' has to say. Besides, I've met a few 'Gods.' They were nothing special. Neither were the Archangels."

"I beg your pardon?"

Samantha turns and leans back against the truck, crossing her arms. "Aren't you aware? The Gods and Angels were flesh and blood beings. I met several of them. My only impressions were that they were all corrupt and power-hungry."

"I thought there was only one God. No, forget that, even if there were several, how could you meet a god?"

"Unless you're referring to the Creator specifically, several gods existed. Zeus, Cronos, Athena, to name a few. They called themselves Titans, but humans referred to them as gods."

Her words don't register properly in my mind. "But... when I went to church as a little girl, they said-"

"Oh, yes, church. That explains it." Samantha nods knowingly, her smile gone. "Full of liars and con-artists. I met a few Popes in my lifetime. Slept with them, too. Try and disregard anything you ever learned from a church. Most of their crap beliefs were designed to suck you dry - in more ways than one."

Feeling uncomfortable about the topic, I don't bother pressing further. Instead, I grab the blowtorch and lower my faceplate. "Right. Well, I need to finish soldering this modulator. I'm leaving soon."

"Leaving? To where?" Samantha immediately rebounds, smiling sweetly at me. "Going to see your man?"

I nod. "Mhm. Jason's spiritual energy has been fluctuating dramatically over the last few days, and before that, it was on a steady downward decline. I'm worried about him."

Samantha eyes me for a moment. "I'll come with you."

"Huh? Why?"

She waves her hand flippantly. "I don't care at all about this Jason guy, but you're different. If you're going to see him, that means you'll be in the Labyrinth." Samantha lowers her voice. "It's dangerous to go alone, especially for a pretty human woman. You don't know the things a demon will do if he finds you."

My throat cracks. "I can imagine."

"Your imagination isn't good enough." Samantha looks away and fans out her fingernails. "You know... I'm older than almost any other demon alive today. I remember the Ancient Era, the War in Heaven, and the time before that. I've seen things I try not to dwell on."

"Like... like what?"

"Do you want to know?" She quickly turns her head to look at me. "Answer truthfully."

A moment passes. I turn back to my soldering iron and start putting the finishing touches down. "I do."

Samantha shudders and looks away. "Succubi and incubi were and still are the weakest of demons, even pureblood ones like myself. Powerful demons would capture and ravish my friends. Humans, once they began developing more efficient weaponry, would raid demon dens. They would slay any inside... except for succubi."

She pauses. "I remember when we found the body of one incubus. He'd been tied to a table and violated for a month straight by the women of the court. The soldiers gutted him and left him there to rot afterward. He was unlucky, though many females had it worse."

Samantha steels her face as unpleasant memories come flowing from the past, unbidden.

"Sam... I'm sorry. Humans are..."

"Don't say that." Samantha forces a smile. "Humans were hardly the only ones at fault. The demons were just as bad, sometimes worse." She swallows hard. "One thing I'll give the angels and gods, at least they never defiled succubi and incubi as the other sentients did. There's always a silver lining. All you have to do is search carefully."

I don't laugh. Neither does she.

Setting aside my solder, I hop down from the stool and face her. I feel slightly awkward, but eventually, I reach over and wrap my arms around her.

"I'll never hurt you, Sam. If anyone here does, I'll tear them apart. Okay?"

The succubus shudders slightly, but forces a laugh as she embraces me back. "Hah. F-finally. All I had to do to get you in my arms was drudge up all those horrible memories."

I laugh too. "Yeah. Sorry about that."

As we hold each other, a thought sprouts in my mind.

Sam smells nice. Like the salty breeze on the coast, or a field of flowers on a mid-summer day.

Pulling away, I blush. "Say... um. Succubus powers don't work on people of the same sex... do they?"

"Hm. I wonder."

"Sam!"

She shakes her head and smiles innocently. "I don't believe so, Phoebe. I'll let you get back to your truck. Tell me when you're ready to go."

"I will," I reply.

I start to turn away, but she leans over and pecks me on the cheek. "For good luck."

It takes all my willpower not to kiss her back.

God have mercy on me, a sinner.

Part 044: The Devil Wears Ill-Fitting Suits, Surprisingly

Dammit! Why did Amelia leave? Where did she go?

A spark of worry goes through my mind as I warily glance at where she was sitting only a minute before. Where did that giant hole in the ground come from? I'm worried about her.

Satan begins stretching and pops his vertebrae. "Mmm, aah, that's the good stuff right there. Well, I'm a demon of my word, kid. You not only rendered me naked with that ferocious attack, but you even took one of my ten thousand lives. As promised, I won't break every bone in your body. I'll knock you out nice and painlessly."

"Wow, thanks," I grunt. "But I've got more tricks up my sleeve."

"Yeah, sure, tricks. I wonder about that." Satan makes a motion with his hands, and a brand new grey suit and dress shoes appear on his body. At my look of surprise, he adds, "Suit-summoning. It's my most Metro ability."

"I don't care."

Satan shrugs. "I didn't think you would. By the way, not to change the subject or anything, but where did the Black Queen go? Wasn't she sitting around, bawling her eyes out a few minutes ago?"

Satan's attention shifting to Amelia grants me a moment of reprieve. I cough under my breath, "Loca-" But suddenly, the planet shakes, knocking me off balance!

Rumble.

Everything bucks and kicks like a million mad broncos, as if Polaris's moon had fallen into its opposite side. I lose my footing several times, eventually opting to hover with my telekinesis. The cataclysmic earthquake barely affects Satan. He holds steady, not even flinching from all the tremors.

God, I hate him.

"Bit of a bumpy ride today," Satan remarks blandly. He suddenly stiffens. "Oh, shit! That's why!"

Before I can ask what he's talking about, the planet shakes one more time. Hundreds of dark tendrils erupt from the ground and leap toward the sky. A mental warning screeches in my head before an explosion similar to an atom bomb to erupts from beneath the planet's surface. A volcano of black energy sends the Devil and I flying into the air.

The world spins around me. I fight nausea as my body twists in the air, only to realize the ground is rushing at me.

WHUMP.

Every part of me throbs as the sickening impact of flesh against dirt settles into my bones. My corrupted armor rapidly regenerates my torn muscles and broken bones, then finishes with my skin.

Blinking back dizziness, I reorient my spherical vision to find a massive crater where Satan and I stood only moments before.

Amelia leaps out of the pit, along with three strange humanoids wrapped around and chewing her body violently. She shrieks in pain, and lashes out with Dellfingler in her right hand, severing the grotesque monsters from herself in midair. She strikes the ground feet-first and pivots to face the center of the crater.

I cry out, "Amelia! Are you okay? What happened?!"

She ignores me. A moment later, I find out why. Hundreds of undead monsters burst out of the dirt from every inch of the abyss, running and jumping up the sides of the hole toward her. Zombies and ghouls mix together, their decrepit bodies seemingly removing the limiters on their strength and speed. Amelia clenches her fist, then opens it, aiming her palm at the incoming monsters. Rapid-fire lasers of pure blackness shoot out, piercing through dozens of the human-shaped beasts. She grits her teeth and jumps back as the unending torrent of monsters pours over the lip of the crater to rush at her.

A familiar voice makes my skin crawl. "Keh keh keh, no matter how fassst you run, my minionsss are unending."

It's Mephisto! I have to help Amelia! There are too many enemies for her to handle!

Hardly has the thought appeared in my mind before Satan appears in front of me. I jerk back reflexively.

"You don't have time to worry about the Black Queen, Hero. You've still got me to deal with."

I jump to my feet and quickly put some distance between us. "You're Amelia's summoned servant, right?! You should protect her!"

Satan pats his shirt looking for a cigar, only to realize I probably destroyed all the ones he had left. He sighs. "You don't understand how this works, do you, chum? I only have to obey that cunt's direct orders. She told me to beat the living shit out of you, and that's what I'm going to do. I don't give a shit if she dies. Hell, I hope she does. Until she gives me new orders, you're the only thing I care about."

Amelia screams, pulling my attention away for a split-second. Several rotting arms lunge out of the ground and grab her legs, preventing her from moving. A faint shimmer in the air appears behind her, and a stabbing motion follows. Amelia howls in pain and flops forward, landing on her arms. Even more ghoulish limbs grab her and pin her body.

WHAM!

Something hits my head, impacting me with the force of an anvil. My vision blurs for a moment as I stumble and flail around. Shaking myself to my senses, I focus on Satan again. The Emperor stands perfectly still, both hands on his hips.

"I've noticed something about you, Jason. Your eyes. You never track anything with them. You always move your whole head in general directions. If I had to guess, I'd say you were using echolocation to see your surroundings. I'm guessing you're blind."

He leans forward. "How about it? Am I close to the mark?"

"I'd never tell-"

WHAM.

Another invisible object strikes Achilles' armor, catching me off-guard. The powerful strike launches me back and sends me sprawling on my ass.

Satan laughs. "Oh, this oughta be fun! It's been a long time since I fought a Hero who relied entirely on artifacts. Say, why don't you try some of that Wordsmithing on me? Amelia told me all about it."

She did?! What the hell, Amelia?!

I quickly jump to my feet, using my vision to scan around me. Satan keeps beating me with something, but I never see it coming. Whatever it is, it hits like a firetruck-

"Ahhh!" Amelia shrieks again as her body gets dragged underground. A moment later, she bursts out, swinging frantically with Dellfingler to try and kill as many of the monsters as she can. Despite this, they're frighteningly fast and impossibly tough. I don't know how much longer she can last.

I have to defeat Satan! I need to freeze him, or stop him long enough that I can get to Amelia and save her!

Satan cocks and tilts his head around. An ominous smile stretches across his face. "Well, well, well. I can't believe it. Amelia's luck just got ten times worse."

My heart sinks. I turn around and gape at an incredible sight.

I was so busy worrying about Amelia and Satan that I didn't notice other demons had arrived.

Across the field, three of them appear, but I only recognize one. Beelzebub. Based on the horns for the other two though, they're a much higher rank than he is.

Fuck!

"Satan? Satan, izzat you? Holy sweet Lucifer's tits!" The biggest one, a stupid looking troglodyte wearing a codpiece and no shirt, waddles over and stops about twenty feet away. "Mephisto and Barbatos weren't lying! I can't believe you're alive!"

"Master Satan." A shorter demon, but one with much bigger horns and a regal appearance, nods politely. "I had hoped to meet you again, though after what happened to Agares..." His flowing robes and red cloak contrast with the gold chains decorating his body, along with a pentagram pendant on his chest.

He must be a Demon Emperor too. Damn!

"Bael. Diablo. It's a pleasure to see the two of you once again, along with that runty one. I apologize for Agares' fate, but Amelia ordered me to attack. I had no choice," Satan sighs. "I'm keeping this human occupied. Mephisto's over there having a bit of sport with the wench. Why not join in on the fun? It stuns me that the weakest Duke is managing to hold her down, but she'll summon the others eventually."

Bael, the biggest demon, slaps his chest. "I'm glad I don't have to fight you, big man! I'd lose for sure! Gwahaha! Enjoy tearing this little shitstain apart!" He smirks at me and rattles chains wrapped around his body. "Stupid little human. You're dead, and you don't even know it yet."

Diablo, the second biggest newcomer, frowns at me. "You must be the Hero Mephisto spoke of. I'm surprised you managed to evade him, but, unfortunately for you... your time is up. You haven't a chance of defeating Satan. I'm sorry you had to die young, but you won't be the first."

Before the two of them can walk away, Satan grabs Diablo's shirt sleeve. "Say, chum. Do me a favor. Keep the dragon's whore busy for me. Make sure she can't call out my name. I'd rather not put any more friends in caskets."

Diablo nods. "As you command."

Bael and Diablo lumber off, and I study the remaining demon, Beelzebub. He looks different compared to when I fought him. He had smaller horns when I beat him down, but they've grown an inch or two since then. He's taller, too.

Beelzebub adjusts his tie. "Oh, insect, I'm afraid I won't be able to finish you off this time. That honor goes to Satan. However, be at peace, knowing that I took care of most of your forces at the Core. They won't trouble us again. After we eliminate you and the Black Queen, your impact on the Labyrinth will be little more than a smudge on our glorious history."

"You... you attacked the Core?!"

Beelzebub smirks. "All by myself. It was a bloodbath. I think I exterminated every person guarding the portal-gates. They even pulled out some experimental weapons, but those were no match for my power."

"You son of a BITCH!" My blood explodes as the corrupted armor amplifies my rage. "I'LL TEAR YOU TO SHREDS!"

Lunging at Beelzebub, Catherine swipes out, cleaving the Lord's body in half. Before I can execute the Thousand Cuts, Satan's invisible anvil attack pounds into me again, but this time it hits me several times rapidly. WHAM WHAM WHAM!

I stumble and flop, going left to right, as ten attacks smash and batter me from side to side, rendering me unable to retaliate.

After several seconds of ferociously tossing me around like a ragdoll, the attacks stop, and I slam down on my skull, damn-near breaking my neck. The armor rapidly regenerates my body, but it still takes a few moments before I can shake the stupor off.

Amelia screams in the distance, and Bael's laugh follows. I can't focus my mind on her, though; my head is swimming.

Glancing at Beelzebub, my jaw drops as he presses the two halves of his body together and they seal up, healing him as good as new. Beelzebub jumps to his feet and chuckles, dusting off his coat. "I left the place in ruins. And unlike last time, my ascended abilities ensure you won't be picking me off with that wretched weapon of yours. Toodles."

Beelzebub casually strolls away, and I pick myself up again.

I'm getting my ass beat. At this rate, these demon fuckers will kill Amelia, and then they'll come for me. I can barely manage Satan, let alone the rest of them. How the hell am I supposed to win with odds like these?! Should I try creating a thermonuclear bomb and detonating it? No, dammit. Not only will that devour energy I don't have, but I also don't have the Crown. Even if I did, and could, Amelia might get caught in the crossfire!

I eye Satan cautiously. Maybe I should try anyway. What would Michael do? He'd tell me that a Hero never falters. A Hero always self-sacrifices. I have a chance to wipe out all of these top-level demons at once.

My heart pounds. Oh god... Phoebe! Phoebe!! What if Beelzebub killed her? What about Neil and the rest of the forces? Jesus fuck, I haven't contacted the Core in several days! I was so worried about Mephisto finding me that it never crossed my mind!

Satan cracks his knuckles. "I see the marbles rolling around in your noggin, Jason. You're possibly the weakest Hero I've ever faced, so I have to force myself not to pity you. However, I'll give you one warning. My ultimate defense is also my ultimate attack. When I go on the offense, you'll lose instantly. I'm taking it easy on you for some sport."

Gears spin in my mind. This Satan fucker is always telling me something new. Why is he so confident? And what the hell was he using to defend himself? It seemed impervious to damage, but I managed to grab his leg! Was that a fluke? Why am I sometimes able to bypass his defenses, but not others?

Think, Jason! Think!

Satan twitches. A ripple in the air rockets toward me. Before I can dodge, it smashes into Achilles' armor, flinging me against a boulder in the field. The impact of my body shatters the rock and sends me sprawling to the ground.

Think!

All at once, pieces click into place in my head. This armor is weakened! It was corrupted by demons or possibly the Labyrinth itself! But I have Wordsmithing! Maybe I can undo the damage and restore it to full power!

A surge of adrenaline hits me as I jump to my feet. Aiming my mind at Catherine and the rest of the armor, I rapidly Wordsmith. "Purify! Purify! Purify! Purify!"

Satan pauses and raises an eyebrow. The pitch-black demonic energy encapsulating the armor hisses away with the rage of a thousand demons, sucking into the air around me and dissipating into the wind. All at once, light reflects off my armor, causing it to glow golden in the rapidly waning sunlight. Catherine, once a weapon of rage and hatred, glows fiercely with the power of Holy Energy.

A voice appears in my mind. I recognize it immediately.

Joan.

"Jason, I thank thee. You've freed my soul from the clutches of evil. Someone placed a powerful spell on Camael's artifacts, but thanks to your Wordsmithing, the spell is no more. Don't back down in the face of evil! A Hero never surrenders! A Hero always gives their all! No matter how powerful the demon, the divine power of God will prevail!"

Achilles' armor begins to surge with energy, glowing brightly like the midday sun. Satan holds up his hand and staggers a step away. "W-what the Devil? What did you do?!"

I don't answer. Instead, I focus my mind on the chestplate. The energy continues to swell, until...

A cone of light shoots from my chest, blasting Satan with the condensed power of a solar flare. The demon opens his mouth to scream, only to dissipate into mist. The wave of light flies off into the horizon, and at the edge of my spherical vision, I can barely make out the other demons as they turn to stare incredulously at me.

After the light finishes firing, a few moments pass. To my dismay, Satan reforms again, naked as before. This time, however, he's visibly winded.

"Haah... haah... You can manipulate Holy Energy?!"

"I'm a Hero," I growl under my breath. "Divine power from the Gods is mine to use as I see fit!"

Focusing my mind, I aim my palm at him, imagining the power of Holy Magic condensing itself. "FIRE!!"

Another colossal blast of divinity sears Satan's body away, eradicating him from the world of the living. When he reforms again, he stumbles slightly and gasps for breath.

"Lucky... lucky little bastard. I won't go easy-"

"FIRE!!"

Several minutes before.

"Fight, my queen! Do not let these fetid abominations tear you apart!"

The black orb hisses into Amelia's ear as she struggles with all her strength to break free, but still, the Duke of Mist slices, stabs, and carves out chunks of her backside.

"Sssatan won't sssave you thisss time!" Mephisto grabs Amelia by the back of her neck while his ghouls hold the rest of her body in place, parting to allow him access to her spine. Glee fills his undead aethereal body as he stabs her beautiful pale figure repeatedly. He doesn't derive quite as much pleasure from torture and killing as Bael might, but for him, it's personal. After all, she murdered a fellow demon and enslaved the former First Emperor.

Amelia swallows dirt, ignoring his excruciating Pain Inducement ability, an attack designed to ravage the nervous system and make it impossible for his prey to remain cognizant. Amelia's rapid-regeneration allows her to heal after each of his attacks, but she'll still lose mana as he stabs away at her reserves.

Amelia squeezes her eyes shut. Jason can't save me! I have to get out of this myself!

Summoning as much willpower as possible, she forces strength into her rapidly withering arm muscles, ignoring the pain as ghouls chew her flesh to pieces. Bringing her hands together, she forms a simple hand-sign, willing all the energy in her body to condense in her chest.

A few moments later, Mephisto senses her building up power. His eyes widen, and he turns incorporeal, racing away through the ground.

Without his knife plunging into her back, Amelia's mental fortitude returns in a rush. Release the shadows within!

Above-ground, while Jason and Satan face off, the planet rumbles angrily as Amelia's energy transforms her body into a tactical nuke. She explodes with the force of ten monsoons, blasting the dirt and ghouls around her sky-high. Moments later, Amelia leaps out of the crater and heals her wounds. With her free hand, she uses Dellfingler to slice apart three ghouls somehow still wrapped around her and lands superhero-style at the rim of the newly formed crater.

However, her suffering is far from over.

From the abyss below, ghouls burst out of the ground and race up the cliffside. Amelia ignores Jason's cry of alarm, unable to think clearly after the volume of energy she just expended. She aims her palm down and fires a barrage of dark energy, wiping out a hundred ghouls in seconds. Unfortunately for her, Mephisto has spent tens of thousands of years summoning each member of his undead army.

They number in the millions.

She jumps away to get some distance, only to stumble into a trap as even more ghouls lie in wait below the surface, grabbing her legs and holding her in place for the others to arrive. She starts to swipe at them with Dellfingler, but Mephisto appears, slapping his palm against her back and using his severest Pain Inducement yet. Amelia cries out in pain and stumbles forward. More ghouls leap from the ground to grab her arms.

They're going to pull me underground! I can't let that happen! I have to- augh!

Between the stabbing and the grabbing, Amelia can't hold her focus at all. Blaarjiim tries to help her, telling her what attacks to use, but she can barely even hear him. Sometimes her rage returns with a vengeance, but Mephisto swiftly drains it away with his mental pain attack.

"Yesss! Sssuffer in agony!" Mephisto grabs the wretched human by her throat and twists her around, smiling as he eyes her chest. He plunges his knife into her heart, twisting it brutally. "I watched asss you forccced Sssatan to tear apart Agaresss. They were clossse friendsss, but you gave no mercccy. You dessserve every moment of blissstering agony!"

Amelia's eyes widen as she makes out the forms of three demons approaching. She recognizes them instantly.

Diablo, Bael, and that weak one who escaped along with Mephisto. Oh, devils! I can't beat them like I am now!

Blaarjiim clenches his fist in her mind's eye. "My queen! Before it's too late! Summon the others!"

She forces tears down. I can't! I already have Satan summoned! If I summon another, I'll be too weak to counter anyone!

Diablo stops several feet away, melancholy on his face. Watching Mephisto brutalize the Black Witch brings him no glee. Indeed, despite her horrendous crimes against demonkind, he pities her somewhat. Satan killed her closest friend, all those eons ago. I warned him that his callous disregard for life would lead to his death someday. Her berserk rage was unstoppable.

As for Bael, the massive brute salivates at the sight of her torn clothing and pinned form. Unlike the Third Emperor, Bael is a disgusting demon, one who derives great pleasure from the torture of others. That's why they call me the Duke of Pain, he thinks to himself.

And Beelzebub. Fire burns in his blood-red eyes as he grinds his teeth together. He's the first to speak, despite arriving last. "You killed my mentor. That was my goal in life. The four of us will rip you apart. Satan isn't here to protect you anymore, wretched witch."

Bael punches his palm. "Heh, Mephisto. Lemme have a go at her. I'm gonna break her arms and legs one by one. After that, I'll have a little fun with what's left."

Mephisto glares at the First Duke. "I wasss here firssst! Wait your turn!"

"My turn?! Who the hell do you think you are, lowest Duke?! I got seniority, pup!"

Mephisto gnashes his teeth together. "You're a ssslow, fat oaf! I will be Firssst Duke sssomeday! I-"

"Enough!" Beelzebub screams angrily and begins forming a highly concentrated ball of fire in his hands. Already, his ability to generate heat has tripled since he was a Lord. "I won't listen to the two of you bicker! I'll finish her off myself!"

Mephisto's glowing pupils dilate. "No! Beelzebub! Don't! Ssshe'sss immune to-"

Beelzebub ignores his elder's protest and unleashes his hottest flame upon the form of the young woman.

Amelia, however, smiles. Chance! She wraps herself in a thin shield of shadow and allows the superheated flames to wash across her body. Mephisto pulls away before Beelzebub's flames can evaporate his misty-form, and Amelia, suddenly finding herself unencumbered, leaps into the sky.

Amelia takes a deep breath, the first painless one in fifteen minutes, and cackles wildly. "Hahahaha! That pathetic flame was colder than ice! You call yourself a fire-type?! You can't even warm a cup of tea!"

She begins forming seals in midair as she falls to the ground, and Beelzebub snarls. "What?! That filthy rat! How dare she insult my fire! I ought to-"

"Beelzebub!" Diablo roars angrily. "She's immune to fire, you dolt! You'll have to use other attacks to hurt her!"

Beelzebub doesn't get to contemplate his life choices, however. Amelia slaps the ground as she lands, and two demonic pentagrams appear. Her immense energy reserves plummet instantly, draining the remaining mana from her body with frightening speed.

Still, she smiles as she wipes away blood from her mouth. Two figures form in the air before her, gently landing in the field with a thud.

Diablo gasps. "So, this is what Satan meant!"

"Again?!" Bael roars angrily. "You sick, nasty bitch!"

"Mentor!" Beelzebub's rage intensifies as the two figures materialize.

Agares, the former Second Duke of Reptiles, hunches over as he lands. "Nnn. Oh! Diablo. Bael. Beelzebub. Where am I?"

Beside him, however, is a figure that sends shivers down Diablo's back.

Arthur. King of the Celts. The Greatest Sinner.

The Hero King stares ahead blankly, as Amelia pulls his arm behind him and slaps Dellfingler into his grasp. "Arthur. Take this sword. It's no Excalibur, but it will do. You and Agares, battle the demons. I... I need to regain my energy."

The Hero nods emptily, holding the blade without complaint. His eyes blankly examine the demons before him.

Agares turns to look at Amelia. A spark of recognition appears on his face. "Ah. So that's what happened. I should have known, Black Queen. Your desperation has no limits."

"Stuff it, grandpa. I beat you, fair and square. Now, pull out all the stops and protect me. That's an order."

Agares eyes glow for a moment as he receives his command. Sighing, he cricks his neck and turns to face the other demons. "As you wish."

Diablo stares at Agares for only a few moments, but icy sweat forms on his skin when Arthur's empty eyes meet his.

The Legendary Hero King, Arthur Pendragon. He slew a million demons, a thousand Lords, and two Barons with a single attack, ignoring the collateral damage in the human encampment. Merciless. Violent. Psychopathic. Unlike that boy Satan is fighting, Arthur is a seasoned warrior.

Diablo licks his lips. "Beelzebub. You'll have to hold off Agares as long as possible. The rest of us will fight Arthur."

Bael balks. "You think Beelzy can battle a Duke?! The hothead is only a Baron! Mephisto should help him! You and I can handle one Hero!"

Diablo's hand trembles as he closes it into a fist. "You don't understand. We're up against the Hero King. We'll have to change our strategy."

In the rear of the battle, Amelia trembles as her weakened body falters. She slumps to her knees and wheezes for breath.

I summoned three powerful minions at once. My mana is nearly gone, so I'll have to cocoon myself for a bit. H-hopefully these two can at least slow the demon leaders down until I restore some energy.

She flops to the ground, curls into the fetal position, and exhales as a shield of darkness envelops her, solidifying into something with ten times the hardness of diamond.

Blaarjiim nods, and a hint of pride appears in his eyes. Even if the ghouls drag my queen underground, they will only protect her from the battle raging on the surface. She'll be nearly invincible until she exits her cocoon of darkness. The downside is that she won't be able to protect herself and must rely on her summons to do so.

Dellfingler watches as Amelia hardens her defenses. Glancing at the face of his new wielder, he begins to notice strange new energy entering his blade from the hilt. It takes him a moment to recognize the sensation. Holy Magic. So this is the legendary Hero King. Oh boy! I hope he cuts these bastards to pieces! Nobody hurts my girl and gets away with it!

A blast of light surges from the horizon. The Demon Leaders whip their heads back just in time to see Satan's body vaporize as a wave of Holy Magic turns him into a fine, bloody mist.

Diablo clenches his fist. The boy has Holy Magic too? Damn. This situation is turning nasty, quickly. Luckily, that attack won't be enough to stop Satan, but...

All the contenders lean into their fighting stances, weapons at the ready.

Suddenly, Arthur raises two fingers to his forehead.

The Hero King vanishes.

Diablo's eyes widen in surprise as Arthur materializes in front of him an instant later.

Shit!

This is Arthur.

Part 045: Hero-King Unleashed, Battle For Survival

Amelia presses Dellfingler into her summoned vessel's hands. "Arthur. Take this sword. It's no Excalibur, but it will do. You and Agares, battle the demons. I... I need to regain my energy."

Arthur doesn't respond as his blank eyes assess all of his opponents in an instant.

Orders. Protect the Black Queen. Kill all of her enemies.

He raises two fingers to his temple and grips Dellfingler tightly, then transmits at lightspeed from his standing location to the right of the Demon Emperor. Diablo turns his head slightly to gape at the incoming threat, but he's far too slow to react.

Arthur rapidly transmits himself here and there, surrounding the Demon Emperor at blinding speeds. Arthur's lightspeed clones slash Diablo a hundred times in two seconds, then he blasts Diablo with a wave of holy energy.

However, all of Arthur's attacks reflect off a barrier surrounding the Emperor's body.

The Hero-King ignores his failed attack and transmits to the other two Dukes. He appears beside the Duke of Pain and pounds Bael's stomach with ridiculous strength, then transmits behind him, driving Dellfingler's enhanced blade into Bael's back, piercing his lung and slicing open his heart. Bael gasps in surprise and tries to grab at the Hero-King before he yanks the sword back out, but misses.

The King of the Celts transmits to the Duke of Mist and slashes at him several times, but the attacks pass through the Undead King's incorporeal form. Arthur jumps away to a distant hilltop for a few moments to examine the panic on his enemies' faces with his farsighted vision.

Ten miles away, on the battlefield where Arthur had just attacked, Bael staggers forward and drops to a knee. "Huhk- w-what?! He was- where'd that rat go?!"

Diablo sets his jaw. Those attacks didn't pierce my kinetic armor, but if Satan was telling the truth about his battle against the Hero-King all those eons ago, then Arthur has a supernatural ability to intuit his foes' powers.

The Third Emperor blinks and spins around, searching for the Hero-King. Satan couldn't come close to putting a scratch on him when they fought, and I can't follow his movements with my eyes. How in the hell did the Black Queen manage to defeat and enslave him?!

Mephisto glances around uneasily, then swoops over to Diablo and whispers, "What sssort of Hero isss thisss Arthur? He fightsss like a wild animal!"

"I don't know," the Emperor growls, holding his arms up to protect his chest. "Satan never mentioned Arthur was the strong and silent type. Be on your guard. His ability to manipulate Holy Energy is unparall-"

Diablo doesn't get to finish his sentence. Arthur transmits beside him again and rapidly slams his newly powered-up Dellfingler against the Emperor's body with the force of a tornado. WHAM WHAM WHAM!

The weapon, now imbued with Holy Magic, knocks the Emperor to his knees but continues to bounce off his kinetic shield. Mephisto hisses in fright and jumps underground, fearing for his life. Fortunately for the Duke of Mist, the Hero doesn't consider him a threat.

Bael rushes to Diablo's side, but Arthur appears in front of him, temporarily transforming the sword into a ten-foot-tall Warhammer of light. Bael opens his mouth to howl in surprise, but the weapon pounds him into the dirt before he can speak, forming a massive crater. The Hero-King continues pulverizing the Duke of Pain with savage fury, not letting up for five full seconds. Each strike drives the Duke deeper into the planet until Arthur transmits to Diablo once again to continues his onslaught.

The Third Emperor grimaces as the King of the Celts encircles him with lightspeed clones, hammering and bashing him from left to right. Finally, Diablo punches the planet surface, increasing his kinetic force by a factor of fifty while causing an artificial earthquake. Arthur stumbles slightly, and at that moment, Diablo lunges his hand toward the Hero's foot.

Gotcha, bastard!

But no, he misses. Diablo grabs nothing but air as the Hero-King transmits away.

Gasping for breath, Diablo jumps to his feet and looks over at the crater where Bael fell only moments prior. The Duke of Pain bursts from underground and screams in rage. "I'll kill him! I'll fucking tear him apart! Lemme at 'im!"

Diablo wipes dirt from his eye as he quickly spins to try and find the Hero-King. "Hey! Bael! Something's screwy about Arthur's personality! He hasn't said a word!"

"Yeah? Maybe he IS the strong silent type after all!"

Diablo scans the area. "No. Not from what I remember."

Mephisto pokes his head out of the soil, unease written all over his skeletal face. The skin he usually wears is rapidly peeling off, thanks to the frantic battle. "Arthur ssseemsss to lack a sssoul. I sssenssse no tracesss of thought from hisss mind. Hisss movementsss appear ssstilted. There might be a pattern we can exploit."

Bael jumps over to the Third Emperor and wipes a bead of sweat from his forehead. "A pattern? How in the hell're we sposed to see it! The sunnovabitch moves so fast that I can't even follow him!"

Diablo bites his lip. "You two have to find a way to hold him still for a second or two. If I can land one punch, it's over. If he bypasses my kinetic shielding, I don't want to think about what we'll-"

FWISH. Arthur transmits behind Diablo again and stabs down. His sword strikes Diablo's back, and the Emperor instantly reverses the kinetic force, multiplying it by ten and sending the Hero sprawling backward.

"There! Grab-"

The Hero transmits away before even hitting the ground.

"Shit!"

Diablo gnashes his teeth. Almost had you. Let's try that again. I won't miss next time.

Elsewhere, Beelzebub ignites his foot-fire-thrusters and flies into the sky. His mentor, Agares, shifts into his reptilian form. "I'll redeem myself. Prepare to die, Agares!"

The old man below him smirks as the scales finish covering his skin. "You've never come close to scratching me before, child, and today I'm under orders to kill you. Don't expect me to hold back!"

The power concentrated in Agares' form-shifted body ripples together into his legs as he coils down and instantly calculates his jump trajectory. He pounces at his pupil with frightening speed, clearing the two-hundred-foot gap in a second. His three-clawed hands lunge out, swiping at his disciple. He gashes open a chunk of Beelzebub's left side and sails past the youth further into the air.

When Agares checks back over his shoulder, he gasps. Beelzebub doesn't even flinch as his body instantly begins healing. He spins around in midair and forms his hands into the shape of guns, then unleashes a duel stream of Heat Bullets from the tips of his fingers, blasting Agares' exposed backside.

The reptile winces in pain, though the superheated projectiles only sting a little. He plummets to the planet's surface below, lands deftly on his legs, and burrows underground.

Beelzebub touches his side and smiles. I haven't managed to injure Agares before, that much is correct, but I have new abilities. My old master doesn't know about them.

The Duke of Reptiles pounces out from under Polaris's surface, his cheeks bulging. He spits a concentrated jet of water at his fire-affinity student, and Beelzebub ignites heat from his scalp, jet-blasting himself down in midair to duck the attack. Aiming his palm at his mentor, he envisions the fire in his body concentrating in a way it never has before.

Solar Manipulation. The power of the stars!

A flash of light shoots from his hand, hitting Agares in the chest and slamming the old man into the dirt below. However, it deals little damage.

Beelzebub snarls to himself. Damn. Solar power packs a dynamic punch but lacks piercing strength and heat. I'll have to try something else.

Agares grunts and jumps to his feet, popping his back in the process. "Good, good! You've improved! Judging by the size of your horns, you must have reached a higher form!"

"Baron," Beelzebub replies with a smirk. "The difference between us is not as vast as it once was!"

"We'll see, pup." Agares glances behind himself at his posterior and concentrates. His lizard-tail changes and morphs, shifting into a harder, bonier shape. "I never told you why I chose to stay as the Second Duke, did I?"

Beelzebub narrows his eyes. A spiked tail? I thought he could only transform into that lizard form. Can he selectively shift his body in other ways as well?

The Baron of Flames shakes his head. "You did not, Master Agares."

"To ensure weaklings never make it past the rank of Lord!"

Agares clasps his claws together to form a seal, and his body shifts into the same color as the ground, making him indistinct and difficult to see.

Chamelon mimicry? Not as potent as invisibility, but in the heat of a battle... Beelzebub flicks his eyes around, as the Duke of Reptiles dashes back and forth, his body shifting rapidly to blend in with the scenery wherever he moves.

Agares voice appears from here and there as he increases his speed, forming a blur of motion. "I know your lust for power, Beelzebub! If you defeat me today, you will surely merit the rank of Duke! Don't settle for slowing this old man down! Earn your place atop the demon hierarchy!"

A blur leaps at Beelzebub from the ground, and the youngster smiles as a whip made of fire forms in his hands. "That was always my intention, Master."

"FIRE!!"

Jason gulps air desperately as he yells again, feeling the energy in his body diminish once more. Satan screams wordlessly, vanishes into mist, and then reforms. As bad of shape as the Devil is in, Jason feels equally terrible. I can't feel my throat at all!

Satan coughs once his naked body reappears. Blood covers his skin. "You're looking worse for wear, little kitten! Keep it up! I've well over ten thousand lives left!"

"I'm making a dent!" Jason responds defiantly.

"It's a war of attrition, boy! That's my specialty!"

"FIRE!!"

Jason blasts the Demon Emperor with animalistic fury, blowing him out of existence, only for the Devil to reenter the world of the living moments later.

Fuck. Satan's right. At this rate, I'll be lucky to drop him below ten thousand lives before I collapse of exhaustion! There has to be another way.

Joan speaks in the Hero's mind.

Jason, don't give up. You're wasting too much energy on him with that attack. Try a frontal assault.

Jason sets his jaw. That won't work. I can't pierce Satan's invisible barrier. His Ultimate Defense is too strong!

Use the Boots of Hermes. You've enabled their sacred power. Transform yourself into a living weapon. Hurry, before the foul demon regains his stamina!

Jason glances down at his boots, a look of realization on his face. Right.

Focusing his mind, the young Hero increases his energy flowing into the boots. They begin to glow, just as the armor did, and a moment later, he races at Satan.

"Imbue!"

The Sword of Heaven instantly coats in Holy Magic, as Jason transforms himself into a living railgun. He smashes through Satan's so-called Ultimate Defense, piercing the Devil's heart with a single thrust and driving him back toward the edge of Amelia's crater.

Satan smiles. "Gotcha."

Jason's eyes widen in alarm. His arms and legs freeze in place. Then, something grabs him by the throat and shoves him away from Satan.

Jason struggles to move, but whatever has him won't let go. Telekinesis?! No, Satan's using something else! It feels like invisible arms! What is-

WHAM! WHAM! WHAM!

Three powerful attacks strike Jason in the chest at the same time. The sound they make illuminates the world around Jason for a moment, and he catches sight of eight faint trails branching from each of his limbs and neck, originating from behind Satan's spine. Three blurs race at Jason's chest, and he steels himself for what's coming.

WHAMWHAMWHAMWHAM!

A flurry of invisible assailants pounds and bashes every part of Jason's body, each one striking him with the force of a hundred sledgehammers.

"Kah! Guh!" Jason gasps and wheezes as Achilles' Armor strains to protect him from the worst of it, but some of the damage still hits his vital organs, causing his heart to tremble and shudder.

Satan chuckles as he pounds on the helpless human. He plucks Catherine from his heart and tosses the blade to the side. "I don't know what possessed your idiot self to close the distance between us, but my Vectors will tear you apart. I've grown tired of you. I'll end this now."

The Devil pauses his assault for a split second, then slams Jason into the ground. Raising the youth up again, he repeats the attack, over and over.

Jason gasps and wheezes, stumbling in and out of consciousness for moments at a time. His limp body offers no resistance as Satan cackles with glee.

"Now, you see the error of your ways! I'm pleased Amelia brought me back, if only so I could take out one last Hero!"

Satan pauses to lift Jason's body fifteen feet above his head. Blood drips from Jason's mouth onto the demon's skin below. The Emperor shivers slightly as he glances over at the battle in the valley. "Seems it's taking them a while. I can't kill you until Amelia gives the order... shit. Now that I've rendered you helpless, my fun has run out. That's my reward for ending the battle quickly, I suppose."

Satan waggles his finger. "But worry you not, chum. After my troops dispose of Amelia's minions, they'll kill her. After she disappears, I'll be set free... and you know what that means, don't you? You guessed it! The First Emperor will make his glorious return!"

His smile turns sinister. "And... with that wench disposed of, I'll be able to kill you. That Wordsmithing seems quite valuable. It'd be a shame if I didn't take it for myself."

Jason's body slumps as he stares at the Devil below him.

Can't think. Head hurts. Fight back. How? Can I heal and hit him with holy magic? Can't keep that up. Everything hurts. What do I do? Joan? Are you there?

The Maid of New Orleans offers no response.

Fuck. I lost Catherine. Ah, it's over there on the ground. G-gotta get hold of it somehow. Maybe if I use telekines-

WHAM!

Satan pivots around and pounds Jason into the side of the crater Amelia made earlier, then raises him into the air, far above the abyss. "I see those marbles rolling around. Better beat the tar out of you before you get any wise ideas. Hahaha!"

The Emperor laughs triumphantly, but as he does, an odd sound appears behind him.

Fwoomp.

A portal appears in midair, and suddenly a massive monster truck races through, its engine silently puttering.

"What in the name of-?!" Satan whirls to face it, only for the ten-ton vehicle to slam into him, making him lose focus and drop the Wordsmith. The truck drags Satan as it flies over the crater's edge into the abyss below.

Inside the truck, Phoebe's eyes widen. "OH, SHI-!"

BOOM.

The truck smashes into the ground, crushing Satan under ten tons of steel. Phoebe and Samantha slam into their airbags.

Moments pass.

Phoebe coughs weakly, then rubs her head. "O-oh god. I... I think we hit someone."

Samantha winces. "Owie... I didn't see. Are you okay, Phoebe?"

Phoebe rubs her head under Solomon's Crown and mumbles, "Yeah. Jason. Gotta find Jason."

Phoebe looks to her left at her driver's side door. Now missing, the door lays at the bottom of the crater fifty feet away. Pulling herself away from the airbag, Phoebe flops out of the truck and stumbles backward, falling on her ass. She checks to make sure Hoarhiim's orb is still in her bag. Luckily, he is.

Samantha, on the other hand, quickly recovers and kicks the jammed door on her side away, blasting it into the crater wall and embedding it in the dirt. She deftly leaps out and adjusts the thin strips of cloth covering her body. "Where are we?"

The truck shifts slightly, then rockets away as Satan violently flings it into the sky with his Eight Vectors.

Samantha spins on her heel in surprise. "What?! Who did-"

Her breath catches, as she recognizes the demon rising from the dirt. Satan brushes off his exposed body and spots her. "Lilia? Well, I'll be damned."

"Satan? Is that... is that you?! B-but you... you..."

"Died? So I've heard." The Demon Emperor climbs out of his pit and swaggers over to her, summoning his grey suit once again. "I don't know where you came from, but how about a kiss for your old flame?"

Part 046: War For The Labyrinth

"Jason? Oh my gosh! Jason!" Phoebe stumbles away from Samantha's joyful reunion with Satan and over to Jason's limp form. His armor, cracked from Satan's vicious assault, slowly heals his body as the magic inside draws from his mana. She rubs her temple and winces while leaning closer to the man she loves.

Jason blinks his eyes deliriously. "Fuh... feee-beee? Phoebe...?"

Phoebe quickly kneels and elevates his head. "Don't move. Recover your strength. Can you Wordsmith? Try and heal yourself."

On the other side of the crater, fifty feet away, Satan eyefucks his succubus wife for a moment. Her nearly-six-foot form towers multiple inches over him, but he doesn't seem bothered by the size difference. Satan sweeps Belial off her feet with one of his invisible arms and presses his lips against hers.

"Ogmm?!" Belial, surprised by his slick moves, resists only for a moment before returning his passionate embrace. He puts her back on her feet a moment later, leaving her to swoon in surprise.

"You... dead. You were dead! How-?"

Satan winks at Belial and smacks her ass, making her flinch in surprise. "Heh, you'd be surprised what you can live through. That Witch-Bitch tore the soul from my body and enslaved me, but my boys have her all tied up in a fight right now. At least, judging by those sounds in the distance."

Belial cranes her neck to listen. At the top of the crater, the distant echo of swords clanging and muffled shouting barely make their way to her ears.

"Oh. You're fighting Amelia?"

Satan smirks. "Nah. Some punk kid. New upstart hero. Didn't take me long to tear him apart. Forget him; what're you here for?"

Belial ignores his question, turning around to see Jason's sprawled body and his head lying in Phoebe's lap. "Oh- oh no! Satan! You can't! He's Phoebe's fiance!"

The First Emperor raises an eyebrow. "'Scuse me? Who the Hell is Phoebe?" He finally looks over at Jason, noticing the woman beside the Hero. "You mean that white-haired flower lady? The Diva?"

Belial turns and scowls at her lover. "Yes, the 'diva.' Phoebe's a close friend of mine. Why are you battling Jason? What's even going on here?!"

"Hades, guide me," Satan mutters to himself. "Leave it to women to slam you with questions. Look, baby, Amelia told me to, alright? I'm under orders to beat that guy until he's unconscious. I ain't gonna kill him. Can't. Not unless the Witch-Bitch dies first. Of course, when she does, I will."

"You beat him senseless? Satan!" Belial stomps her foot, causing the entire crater to shudder. "Gah! I forgot how vicious you are! You're always getting into fights and starting wars! Can't you come back to life for one day without-"

"Lilia! Sweetie! Lucifer's tits, always with the nagging!" Satan rolls his eyes and glances up at the sky. The darkening horizon rapidly shifts to black as the planet rotates around, hiding the sun from view. Satan sighs and lowers his gaze to his lady's level. "It's like I said; Amelia ordered me to! Even now, there's a lingering impression in my mind telling me to get back to work and beat that little upstart's ass!"

He starts to push past her to walk over to Jason, but Belial hops in front of him again. "Jason is important to Phoebe. Phoebe is important to me. She lives for his sake! I won't let you hurt her or him!"

Satan pauses and stares up into Belial's eyes. Their difference in height has never been a thing he thought about before, but now, seeing her towering over him, several thoughts emerge in his mind.

"Lilia. Are you... are you telling me... 'no?' Me? The one who gave you everything?"

Belial looks away. "It's not like that. You haven't been around for a long time, Satan. The galaxy has changed. I've changed. The days of endless war have been firmly behind us for-"

Satan holds up his right hand to silence her, flicking his eyes to his sundial. "Do you know what time it is?"

She frowns. "Time for you to emerge from the shadows of the past."

The Devil's teeth grind together as he eyes the sweet, lusty succubus before him. Her flesh calls to him, but he closes his eyes and exhales. "No. It's time you remembered your place. I am the First Emperor, the rightful leader of all demons. My authority trumps yours, no matter how much time has passed. You'd better knock off that back-talk, woman."

Belial crosses her arms. Her eyes narrow. "Or what?"

Slowly, Satan rubs his palms together. "The ancient devils know I despise laying a hand on a woman."

"You're... you're threatening me? We finally see each other after a hundred thousand years, and you're gonna pop in here and swing your demonhood around and think I'm okay with it?"

"That's where you're wrong," Satan says, waggling a finger. "I don't care what your opinion is. My word is demon law. Period."

WHAM.

One of Satan's invisible vectors pounds Belial's head. She careens to the left and smashes into the side of the crater, embedding several feet into the hardened side-wall.

Satan reaches for his suspenders and gives them a good tug, thinking to himself, Sometimes a man's gotta teach a mouthy broad a lesson.

The sounds of a raging battle echoes in the distance, and a massive WHUMPH rocks the planet, sending pebbles and rocks flying down into the crater. Satan ignores them.

Jason coughs a word out. "Heal..." His body slowly begins to mend.

Satan wipes his hair back and scowls at the white-haired human woman as she turns around and stares up at him, enraged. "Y-you bastard! You hit Sammy! What- I thought you two were lovers! How could you do that to her?!"

"Love takes many forms," Satan murmurs. "In our case, it takes a slight physical correction. She's hardy. I doubt she even felt it. Now, step aside. I ain't in the mood to slap around some human wench."

Immediately, Phoebe staggers to her feet and draws her sword. Still injured from her truck-crash, she barely manages to keep her footing as she eyes the First Emperor warily. "Like Hell, I will! If you want to get to Jason, you'll have to go through m-me!" Her voice quivers slightly as she examines the short but muscular demon, all while wondering, how did he hit Sammy? I didn't see anything move!

Even as she wonders, her eyes pick up a slight movement behind him. Focusing her spirit with the power of Solomon's Crown, she enhances her aura-reading ability.

Invisible arms. Eight of them. Five fingers each, with sharp claws at the ends. I've never seen anything like them in my life! The Devil must have hit Samantha with those invisible limbs!

Satan holds up his fist and coughs into it. "Kah! Devils. Two stupid dames in one day. Just my luck."

He quickly lunges one of his hands over, intending to bat Phoebe away with a light slap, perhaps even knock her unconscious. Instead, she does the unthinkable.

She dodges it.

Phoebe dives into a roll and slashes at Satan, catching him completely off-guard. Her razor-sharp sword chops into his leg, and Satan yelps in surprise. "Gah! What in the-?!"

Immediately, he jumps from casual confidence to angry suspicion as he limps back a step, using his Vectors to pull himself away. "You... you saw it? My attack?"

Phoebe glances back at Jason as his weak healing magic continues to repair the damage. He mumbles and rubs his eyes.

Soon! I just have to hold out!

Phoebe grits her teeth and taunts the Devil. "Th-that's right! I won't let anyone hurt my friends! If you think that's good, wait until you see the surprise I've got in my pocket!"

Satan narrows his eyes, and Phoebe swallows hard. Shit! I forgot to bring my toolbox! If I'd known I was going to battle a Demon Emperor I'd have at least packed a few flashbangs!

The Devil points at her, slowly, and nods. "I like that fire in your eyes. I was gonna leave you be, but you're a cutie. Perhaps another wallflower for my collection ain't a bad idea."

"I'd sooner die than submit to a demon!" Phoebe slams her foot down, kicking a loose rock at the Devil. The slight movement barely fazes him. One of his vectors bats it away with terrific force, smashing it into the wall of the pit. Satan smiles as she charges at him.

Suddenly, Phoebe's vision blurs. She stumbles slightly and falls to her knees, clutching her head.

Satan doesn't hesitate. One of his vectors lunges over and grabs her by the neck, hoisting her into the air. She swings her sword at it, but the weapon passes through the ghost-limb as if it doesn't exist.

Four more of Satan's vectors lash out, grabbing each of her limbs. He wrenches the sword from her grasp and spreads her out so she can't move. Phoebe chokes and gasps as the Devil examines her body.

"Funny story, I had your boyfriend in this exact pose a few minutes ago. I won't hurt you like I did him. I'll only twist a few bones. It'll hurt a lot, but maybe that'll make the fire in your eyes burn a little hotter."

Jason, finally awake, pulls himself up. "Wh- what?! Phoebe? Satan! Let her go!"

He starts to aim his palm at Satan, but the Devil waggles a finger. "Ah-ah-ah. You picked a bad time to wake up, little Hero. Make one wrong move, and I'll do a little twisty-snappy on this broad's neck."

Rocks crumble away from the side of the pit. The hole Satan sent Belial flying into crumbles away as she leaps out, landing on her feet. However, her appearance has dramatically shifted. Two spindly, leathery wings sprout from her back. Her newly sharpened teeth glint, and her hands, now claws, clench together in rage.

Belial hisses through her teeth. "Hurt a hair on Phoebe's head, and I'll kill you. Put her down."

The succubus balls her hands into fists. In the encroaching darkness, her body, no longer shiny and red like other demons, has morphed into a faded grey color. Scales sprout along her arms and legs, giving her a certain degree of natural body armor.

Something shifts on Satan's face. A look of unease appears. "Pure Succubus Form? Come on, Lilia. You're not one to swing your fists around like a savage."

The succubus growls deep in her throat. "I told you, Satan. It's been a long time. I've changed. Put. Her. Down."

I have nothing to worry about, Satan thinks to himself, as he looks from Belial to the hero and back again. This Jason kid is a pushover. Lilia can't hold a candle to my powers. Admittedly, I've never fought her before, but she's a weak little succubus. Even in her transformed state, I can hold Lilia off with three- no, four Vectors to spare.

Belial takes a step toward him, and Satan hardens his gaze. "Are you challenging me, Lilia? Have you forgotten which of us wears the pants in our relationship?"

The sun creeps ever further below the horizon as night's darkness slithers into the sky.

Satan's raises his voice, a note of warning embedded in his tone. "I am the original demon. Superior. Perfect. If you wanna tussle, don't expect me to hold back."

Belial unsheathes her claws. "Now I remember why I hated the time when the humans ruled. Your bigotry forced us into constant war. Your hatred of humans, your lack of compassion, and worst of all, your inability to use reason, were always your worst qualities. You're a creature of instinct, Satan. You won't learn unless someone beats a lesson into your skull!"

Belial lunges at the Devil. Satan uses two Vectors to yank himself back, sighing dispassionately as her eyes follow their movements. So, Lilia can see them as well. Perhaps, after years of being near me, she learned to pick up the trail of my Vectors. I suppose if it comes down to a battle, I'll have to end things quickly. Despite Lilia's stupidity, I'd prefer not to leave a scratch on her perfect skin.

Belial swipes at the Devil, and he dodges it as if her movements were the slowest thing in the universe. It's been a long time since I used this technique. However, she's thoroughly earned it.

Satan lunges out with two Vectors, grabbing at Belial from behind. Her enhanced speed allows her to dodge toward Satan's body, closing the distance between her and her lover. Satan reacts by slapping her with his right hand, stunning her for a moment.

Perfect, Satan thinks to himself.

His eyes shift in color. The right one turns blue, and the left one green.

He focuses his left eye, creating a localized telekinesis field. While weak, the effect is enough to catch Belial off-guard and make her stumble. Satan chuckles inwardly. I stole this power from Alexander the Great. One of my favorites to break out in a pinch.

Satan's right eye freezes time around the succubus for a second, long enough for his Vectors to lash out and grab her limbs. Satan hoists Belial up in the air in the same way he did to Jason and Phoebe, then smashes her into the ground, stunning her momentarily.

Over and over, Satan balls his Vectors into fists and pounds them against Belial's body. However, each time, she manages to deflect and dodge at the last second.

Eventually, the succubus surprises her lover by shoving herself to the side and diving into the dirt. Like a freakish mole, she burrows into the ground and disappears. Rumbles travel through the crater as she swims through the planet's crust at high speeds.

Suddenly, Belial bursts out from under Satan's feet and swings her fist. She strikes the Devil's face, transforming his head into bloody meat paste and spraying it all over the back of the canyon. Before Satan can react, he perishes.

The Devil's Vectors fade away, causing Phoebe to plummet from teen feet in the air. She screams in fright, but Belial flaps her wings, rushes over, and catches the white-haired woman before she hits the dirt.

"Gotcha."

Phoebe blinks in surprise. "Th-thanks! You saved me. But... your husband... you killed him..."

Belial rolls her eyes. "Trust me, he'll be fine."

Sixty seconds later, Satan's corpse reanimates. His blood swirls into the air and wraps around his neck, transforming into a head and returning him to the realm of the living.

"Gah! Fuckin' Hell!"

Satan curses at Belial. A look of rage appears in his eyes.

"Whose side are you on, lady?! I'm your devil-damned husband! Why are you protecting some stupid human slut?!"

Belial bares her teeth. "That stupid human slut is Phoebe. She's my friend!"

Phoebe backs away. She stands protectively with her back to Jason, but he pulls her aside. "Don't. This is my fight."

"You're badly injured," Phoebe replies. "How much mana do you have left?"

"Not enough," Jason admits. "I kept using it to attack Satan, but he's immortal in the truest sense. Every time I killed him, he came back, just like when that, uh, demon lady did the same. Who is she, anyway?"

"A friend," Phoebe replies. "I'll introduce you after we make it out of here."

Both humans gaze at their succubus protector. Belial stands her ground and doesn't take her eyes off Satan.

"I can do this all day, lover. If you so much as try to harm a hair on Phoebe's head, I'll rip yours off and shove it up your ass."

Satan narrows his eyes. "Somethin' did change about you, Lilia. I ain't stupid. I see it in your eyes. You ain't just protectin' a friend. Who's your new man? Is it him? That runty boy over there? What's he got that I don't?"

Satan gestures toward Jason.

"What, I go missing for a little while, and you find yourself someone else? I didn't realize how little I meant to you."

"How absurd," Belial mutters. "Everything you just said was wrong. I'm not doing this to protect a man, idiot. When did I ever mention Jason?"

Satan blinks in surprise. "Oh. Oh. So it's like that..."

"Yeah. It is."

Hardly has Belial finished speaking, before suddenly, an earth-shattering roar makes everyone jump in fright.

"GRAAAAAAAAUUUURRGGHHH!!!"

A horrible noise, something like a thousand tigers howling at once, explodes in the midday air. Satan and the others jerk their heads toward the top of the crater. In the night sky, an odd, orange light glows in the distance.

That sound came from the direction of the other demons, Satan thinks to himself. What are Diablo, Bael, and Mephisto doing? Why haven't they finished off the Black Queen yet?!

Several minutes earlier.

Agares leaps from the ground, aiming at his pupil. "Earn your place atop the demon hierarchy!"

Beelzebub, flying in the air, forms a whip made of fire. "That was always my intention, master."

Agares narrows his eyes as he rears his claws back to strike. A fire-whip? That's a new ability.

Beelzebub jets to the side, flicking the whip at lightning speed toward his mentor. The edge of it slices down the old man's armored chest with a hiss, cutting deep into his body and boiling Agares' blood.

Agares gasps as sharp pain erupts in his stomach. This time he plows into the dirt below and ends up with a big pile of debris covering him.

Beelzebub lowers the intensity of his flame-boots to hover a little lower. There's no chance that my attack severely wounded Agares. No, the old lizard is resilient. His reptilian-blood gives him a high regenerative factor, especially when he hibernates.

The Baron of Flames steals a quick glance to his right. Half a mile away, Bael and Diablo fight against Arthur's constant flurry of attacks. At one point, Diablo punches the ground so hard that he rumbles the tectonic plates.

What power! Beelzebub thinks.

He quickly turns back to his master, but the mound of dirt is noticeably smaller.

I only looked away for a moment! That damn lizard must have burrowed again! I can't allow myself to be distracted.

Beelzebub considers focusing his eyes on looking for heat underground but quickly realizes the prospect is pointless. After all, lizards are cold-blooded.

Agares doesn't surface. Beelzebub scans the plains in every direction, but nothing happens.

It's hard enough spotting my mentor in the dark of night, but with his camouflage active, he's practically invisible. I should light the fields on fire before it's too late.

Suddenly, a bat flies into Beelzebub's face, startling him. "What the hell?!"

The animal screeches and plummets to the ground a hundred feet below, landing with a thud and dying instantly.

Why would a bat hit me?! The flame should light me up like a beacon in the sky! Don't animals know better than to-

"SQUAW!" A massive fowl, over ten feet wide, screeches and claws at Beelzebub from his blind-side. All at once, he realizes the plains have grown much louder as distant caws fly toward him at alarming speeds.

Animal-calling? Agares can control the minds of birds and other beasts of the field? He must be planning to wear me out. As if a few hundred birds have a chance of-

Beelzebub turns toward the distant sounds of birds cawing, and a chill runs down his back. The sky shifts noticeably as tens of thousands of fowl and bats screech toward him. Their numbers, seemingly infinite, transform from pests into a veritable flood of living weapons.

"COWARD!" Beelzebub bellows at the top of his lungs and begins to summon the aura of fire from within himself, cloaking his body in its essence. Before the birds can strike him, Beelzebub blasts the heat out in every direction. Explosive Fulmination!

The wave of flame shoves the flood of animals back, sending them careening into one another.

Beelzebub laughs maniacally. "Hahahaha! Puny animals are no match for me! Show yourself, old-"

WHUMP.

Agares's lizard form slams into Beelzebub from behind. The old man wraps his claws around the youthful demon, grinning as the extra weight makes Beelzebub lose control and plummet to the ground.

"As you wish, child!"

BOOM.

The two of them slam into the dirt, but Agares ensures his pupil's face absorbs most of the damage. Keeping one claw wrapped around his student, Agares uses the other to stab and tear every organ he can, gutting Beelzebub like a fish for dinner.

"Gah! NEYAUGH!" Beelzebub gasps in pain, writhing desperately to try and fight off the old man's ridiculous strength.

"In a world where people die young, always fear the old man," Agares howls with laughter. "Bahaha! You've still much to learn! Protect your vitals! Stabby-stab-poke!"

Beelzebub, in a moment of desperation, hatches a hasty plan. He drops his flame whip and forms seals with both hands, then unleashes his solar flash, discharging the brightness of the sun from his body.

Agares yelps in surprise, recoiling away as waves of pain surge in his eyes. At that moment, Beelzebub explodes fire outward, expanding the space between himself and his mentor with a wave of heat. He jumps away and sears his wounds shut, then allows his body's natural regeneration to take over. Gasping for breath, Beelzebub immediately holds a palm up and aims it at his former teacher. He inhales deeply and breathes a fiery torrent on the lizard-king.

Still clutching his eyes, Agares spins to put his back to the flame, silently activating his ultimate defense: dermal armor. The thick, cutaneous bones erupt over his backside, protecting him from most of the fire's damage, though not all of it.

Beelzebub grins.

Instead of physically damaging and burning him, these flames are among my new abilities. They'll drain his strength and weaken him every second he stays in their path.

Agares sucks in what precious oxygen surrounds himself, and blinks hard.

No matter how he tries, Agares can only see pure-red all around him. His reptilian eyes, much like Beelzebub's, are attuned to detecting heat. The flames pounding into his back make it impossible to see. After taking Beelzebub's solar flash straight to the face, Agares can't see a damn thing.

Agares wheezes. "Hah... not a bad way to go out... it was a good run... but now the young can take-"

In the distance, a massive WHUMPH shakes the planet. A wave of energy follows a sonic boom. It slams into Beelzebub and Agares, flinging the two of them like rocks across a pond, and halting Beelzebub's fiery assault. The ground and trees tear away and fly into the air as if an atom bomb had exploded.

Both demons tumble and twist across the plains. They land in a field, well over a mile from their starting point. Agares survives thanks to his armor, but it takes Beelzebub a while to heal.

Several minutes pass. The two demons groan simultaneously.

Agares rubs his eyes. Damn. Now I have to keep fighting. There's always someone interfering…

He immediately jumps back, his spiked tail at the ready, and lances it through Beelzebub's heart when the Baron jumps to his feet. The attack catches Beelzebub off-guard, and Agares follows with a dozen more rapid strikes, his tail puncturing and piercing his pupil in various places.

Jumping away, Agares chuckles. "Haha… This tail has a terrible neurotoxin in it… You'll be paralyzed and dead soon, young prodigy. I must kill you, even if I do not wish to. The Black Queen's orders compel me."

Beelzebub slumps to his knees and touches his trembling hands to each of the wounds, one-by-one. "C-constantly, you underestimate me… t-teacher."

"Do I? A Baron hasn't a chance of beating a Duke. I invite you to prove me wrong!"

Beelzebub coughs and glowers at Agares. "Poison has no effect on… on one who descends from the Phoenix. Toxins… begone!"

Slapping his palm against his chest, Beelzebub screams in ecstasy as he boils the blood in his body, killing the toxins in the process and sealing all of his wounds. Moments later, his body regenerates, and he pants like a wild animal, eyeballing his mentor.

"You look awful, Agares."

"And you look like Skarn droppings," the old man replies, his shoulders sagging. "Damn me to Hell… I ain't got nothing left, pupil. Let's get this over with!"

Beelzebub rights himself. Making a quick motion, he summons another whip. "Mentor. I'm… I'm sorry I wasn't able to save you. From the Black Queen, I mean."

Agares raises one of his reptilian eyebrows. "What's this? A moment of introspection? From you?"

Beelzebub grits his teeth. "I was weak. But I will not be forever. I will lead demonkind, someday. We will prosper. I will not forget your teachings."

Agares exhales and closes his eyes. "Perhaps. We shall see. The future has yet to be decided."

The Baron of Flames raises his whip. "You are the only demon I've ever respected. Know that it pains me to do this."

A crocodile tear rolls down Agares' face. "Aye, boy. I know. I always have."

His hand twitches for a slight moment before Beelzebub begins the lashing. Keeping his movements quick and precise, he tears open his mentor's throat, heart, and any other vital organ he can. Within seconds, his armor-cutting whip has ripped the old man to ribbons. He closes his eyes as the crocodile falls to the ground, a look of peace upon his face.

Beelzebub drops the whip. "Damn you. You cheated me. You were holding back the whole time."

Agares gurgles silently as he draws his last breath.

No, my beautiful pupil. I fought well past my limit. You won… fair… and…

Several minutes pass as Beelzebub holds back emotions he didn't know he could feel.

I don't care. Agares was little more than a foolish old man who rushed to his death. He doesn't matter to me at all.

The young demon shakily stands up and looks around at the night sky. He takes a few steps toward Agares' corpse, intending to bury him, only for a horrific, agonizing scream to pierce the night.

"GRAAAAAAAAUUUURRGGHHH!!!"

The monstrous roar shakes the land. Beelzebub spins to face it, and gasps as an ominous orange glow illuminates the blackened sky.

What... what in the name of Satan is that... that THING?!

Several minutes earlier.

"There! Grab-!" Diablo jumps at the apparition of Arthur yet again, his motion appearing slow and clumsy compared to the blinding speed of the Hero-King. The human transmits away, and Mephisto pops out of the ground.

"Emperor Diablo, there isss a way to trap him. He alwaysss targetsss your ssspine. Ssstay ssstill, and I'll grab him!"

Diablo flicks his eyes over to Bael. "Bael! Use that flail of yours. Mephisto has an idea. I want you to bind the Hero with chains the next time he strikes my back!"

The Duke of Pain grunts. "If you say so, boss. But uh... you know Big Bonk's worthless against fast types like Arthur, right?"

Diablo's head darts back and forth as he waits for the attack. "Just do it! And stop calling your flail that dumb name. It's Mjölnir!"

Bael rolls his eyes. "Can't say that word. Too hard. Anyway..." Bael shifts the mass of chains wrapped around his chest and quickly unravels the modified artifact hanging behind himself.

Mjölnir, Camael's divine weapon.

Once an artifact used by the Archangel of Divination, Bael found it during the War in Heaven by chance, repurposing it into a weapon for himself.

The massive spiked head of the weapon, half again as big as Bael's upper body, unjams from his backside as he pulls it out and rubs his spine. "Sss, ahh. Oughta rename Big Bonk to somethin' like Poker. It's always a thorn in my side."

"Enough with the shitty jokes!"

Diablo starts to say something else, but a whiff of movement behind him makes the Emperor steel himself. The always-silent Arthur reappears and slashes at the demon's back again, but this time, Mephisto is ready. A ghoul leaps from the ground and grabs Arthur's legs, pinning the Hero in place.

Mephisto yells, "Diablo! Now!"

"Bael! Now!" Diablo jumps a foot away and pivots on his heel as Bael sends his flail chain spinning around Arthur, then yanks himself over and grapples the Hero, yanking his hand away from his forehead.

Bael crushes the silent Hero with his brutish strength and yells, "Got 'im, boss! Do it!"

Arthur pauses for a few seconds to evaluate his predicament. He tries to raise his hand to transmit away, but Bael holds his arms down, restricting the Hero-King's movement. "Nuh-uh, you little shit! Stay put! It's nap time!"

Dellfingler yelps in surprise. "Wrassle him, Arthur! Come on, fight!"

Unlike his other punches, when he didn't have time to prepare, Diablo spends a full ten seconds increasing his kinetic energy, pouring as much mana as he can spare into his fist. His eyes strain as gravity condenses and spins around him.

Five times... ten times... twenty times... fifty times... one hundred times... five hundred times...! Aaaargh! I'm ready; here it comes!!

Diablo's eyes flash with power. He lunges forward, pulls his arm back, and swings it toward Arthur's chest.

With one punch, he strikes the Hero King with the strength of an atom bomb. He batters Arthur with a thousand times the kinetic force of his unenhanced melee strike. Bael's eyes bulge in panic as the wave of energy instantly passes through Arthur and slams into his body.

A moment later, the Hero and demon vanish, along with the ghoul's arms.

WHAM, SLAM, BAM BAM BAM... WHUMPH!

Bael and Arthur's bodies smash and crash across the landscape, spinning and twirling whenever the ground so much as taps one of the hairs on their heads. They fly for over ten miles before wildly careening into the side of a distant mountain, hitting it with enough force to make a distant volcano blow its top.

A colossal wave of reverse kinetic energy explodes out from their impact point, shooting back toward the exhausted Diablo, as well as Mephisto, and even Beelzebub and Agares a half-mile away. The surge tosses Diablo back, and he collapses onto his rear, ready to vomit blood.

Got... him... hngh.

The Emperor of Annihilation's body screams in fatigue.

It's been so long since I used that much energy... Bael... did Bael survive? Id...iot. He wasn't supposed to grab the Hero. Not even Bael can emerge from a 1,000x multiplied kinetic punch unscathed.

Across the plains, Bael's arms limply wrap around Arthur's body. Several long minutes pass as the Hero and Demon lay against each other in the hundred-foot deep hole.

The Duke mumbles something about drinking tequila by the beach and how fun that would be, but the Hero-King eventually tosses the demon's arms aside and steps out of the rubble, dusting himself off.

A faint white glow surrounds his body.

The Crusader Aura.

An aura that Arthur can extend and retract at will, shielding him from damage so long as he has mana to spare. Arthur's godlike mana reserves put him atop the pyramid of Heroes before and after, growing even more ridiculous when he holds Excalibur in his hand.

His current weapon, Dellfingler, dizzily coughs. "W-whoooaaa partner! You okay? You took that hit like a champ!"

Arthur doesn't respond, instead opting to stare into the distance.

The Demon Emperor's mana is depleted. He will not be able to retaliate.

His eyes glow as he transforms Dellfingler into a warhammer of light once more. Bael stirs and shakes his head, wincing as he struggles to orient himself. He spots Arthur standing and gapes. "Whu- how? You... you're alive? But... that punch..."

Arthur doesn't respond. Instead, he raises two fingers to his temple.

A sudden realization hits Bael. The boss! No way he's still standing after using that much power! If Arthur teleports over there, Deebs is a goner! I've gotta grab this goon...

He leaps from the pit, every bone in his body screaming and cracking in the process, and grabs the Crusader. "Oh no, you don't! Worthless fleshb-"

Arthur transmits to Diablo and flicks Bael to the side effortlessly. The Demon Emperor, flopped on his back, stares emptily at the Hero-King as the human raises his massive warhammer.

No...!

BOOM BOOM BOOM BOOM!

Over and over, Arthur smashes Diablo with his holy warhammer. The Emperor's bones turn to pulp. Diablo barely raises a hand in protest for the first strike, let alone the rest.

"Boss!!!" Bael leaps to his feet and lunges at the Hero, but Arthur pivots to face the incoming threat. He fires a wave of Holy Magic from his free palm, which doesn't hurt Bael, but does violently fling him backward. Arthur then morphs Dellfingler back to his sword form.

"Oh, jeez! Being a different weapon is disorienting! It's like when you forget your car keys, but you have to climb inside a washing machine to get 'em! Great work, though, Arthur! You really showed that bloodskin who's the boss!"

Mephisto sends more undead minions leaping from the ground at Arthur. The Hero-King ignores them and transmits over to Diablo's other side, raising Dellfingler high.

Swish, slash, chop!

Arthur slices and dices skin and muscle, carving up the Emperor's limp corpse to ensure his death.

Bael staggers to his feet and watches in horror as the Hero turns Diablo into mincemeat.

Tears swell in his eyes. Boss. Diablo... no! You were... always there for me. I can't... I can't let this go! I gotta avenge him! I gotta tear that human to pieces!

Anger fills the Duke's mind as he forms hand signs into the only magical seal he can use.

His teeth grind together with enough force to chew steel. I shouldn'a got in the way, Boss. But... I won't let Arthur win. I'll beat this bastard! For you!

Bael's flesh and bones rapidly regenerate as a new, primeval power boils in his body. The power of a Duke. The power of the Ancient Demons. Armor begins to form over and around all the skin on his body. His cherry-red body rapidly fades, and charcoal black replaces it.

Cracks appear in the blackness, and sparks of fire emerge from those cracks. Bael rapidly expands in size, from almost eight feet tall to well over fifteen. His body doubles in size. His horns morph and deform, transforming from upward spikes into forward-facing spears.

Fire explodes in Bael's belly as Arthur turns to face the demon.

"GRAAAAAAAAUUUURRGGHHH!!!"

Bael unleashes a mighty roar, releasing the pent-up power of the hottest Hellfire from his stomach. His mouth erupts with the energy of a volcano, creating a bright enough light that he illuminates the land for miles around.

Mephisto peeks from the ground and shudders.

The Balrog.

Legendsss ssspeak of Bael'sss fearsssome power... his featsss during the Great War in Heaven, where he cemented himself as the mossst powerful Duke without quessstion. They sssay only Diablo hasss ever held back Bael'sss unssstoppable battle power.

Mephisto slowly lowers again, transferring under the surface.

But the Hero-King took Diablo'sss mightiessst attack. Can he be ssso easssily ssstopped, even by Bael'sss ultimate transssformation?

Across the plains, Beelzebub gazes in horror at the monstrosity bellowing on the battlefield. Seven Devils. Whatever that thing is... I'm not willing to fight it. I'll keep my distance, for now.

Bael grabs his massive flail, now an average-sized weapon for a monster of his size, and screams furiously at the human below him.

"PUNY! SMALL! ME CRUSH! ME SMASH!"

Part 047: Balrog VS Hero-King, The Onslaught Begins

I'm tired. I want to sleep forever. I don't want to deal with reality or the fate of the universe. Everything sucks.

* * *

"My queen."

Blaarjiim's voice appears in my mind.

"My queen. It is time. You must awaken."

I don't wanna.

"Your life is in danger, my queen. While you rested, the demons unleashed a fearsome power. Presently your safety might be assured, but I suspect it will not be for long."

Sigh... just five more minutes.

Blaarjiim sighs. "My queen. Despite your... reservations... you must battle the Hero. You must kill him. His power will make you unstoppable."

A tear crawls down my face.

I don't want to be unstoppable, and I don't want to kill. Jason said I could be a good girl. Why can't I live a peaceful life? Why must I walk the path of blood?

"Haah... You make everything difficult. The mortal is young, naive. He has not lived for three thousand years, nor had a powerful enemy seal him inside a stone prison for a hundred thousand more. You've slain many. He is but one among innumerable others."

I know, but I don't want to kill Jason! I don't want to enslave him! He's... important to me.

"You ordered Satan, your mightiest summon, to tear him apart. Whether it was an act of cowardice or a stroke of malevolence, the mortal hasn't a chance of defeating the First Emperor. Do not lie to yourself and claim that you pity him. He is nothing more to you than a false promise of a quiet life. You gave that up long ago."

More tears trickle down my face.

Blaarjiim... when did you become so cruel?

"Cruelty can be a form of compassion. I merely speak the truth. Despite what the mortal may claim, you are irredeemable, the same as all evil beings."

I... I won't. I won't attack Jason. I'll stay here. I'll-

Blaarjiim interrupts me, a hint of anger in his voice. "Yes, lie here and cry. I had worried you might bring out your inner child. Fortunately, I've found a way to motivate you."

Motivate me? W-what do you-?

Blaarjiim's hand draws close to my face. I can almost feel it brush my cheek.

"You lack the strength to finish the job, but not I. Sleep, my queen. I will take over for now."

What? No! Blaarjiim! Don't- ah! Stop! It hurts! You're hurting me!

The last thing I see is a look of dismay on Blaarjiim's face as he shakes his head.

"You will thank me for my kindness later."

Something dark and misty enters my nose, mouth, and ears. I can't breathe. I can't think.

Blaarjiim... he's... hurting me...

"GRAAAH!"

Bael's mighty roar sends a wave of burning force at the Hero below. The heat reaches several hundred degrees, but Arthur doesn't flinch as he stares at the demon towering over him.

"Whoa! Holy moly! Arthur, you better watch out! This guy's off the charts!" Dellfingler yelps in surprise as the Hero makes a sign and forms a shield of light in his grasp.

Bael, the Balrog, launches his attack immediately. His power and agility triple as he unleashes the full might of his flail.

The spiked-ball swings around above his head. The Balrog roars, slamming it onto the ground. Despite aiming for the Hero with perfect precision, the flail misses when Arthur transmits to the side at the last second.

Arthur lunges toward the fifteen-foot tall demon. He drives Dellfingler up, stabbing the ultra-sharp blade inside Bael's chest.

"Ahh! Hot! Hot!" Dellfingler yelps. "It burns!"

The moment Arthur yanks the sword out and prepares to strike again, Bael's left claw swoops down with frightening speed and bats the Hero aside with the power of a two-ton wrecking ball.

Arthur sprawls head over heels for a few hundred feet, bounces off his light-shield, flips in the air, and executes a perfect landing. Luckily, his Crusader Aura absorbs the brunt of the attack.

"Good moves!" Dellfingler yells.

Arthur ignores Dellfingler's cheerleading and opts instead to eyeball the Balrog and size him up, looking for a weakness.

"YOU WEAK! ME STOMP! ME SMASH!"

The First Duke of Pain pauses a moment, gathers intense heat in his chest, then unleashes a torrent of Hellfire, spitting ten-thousand-degree flames at the Hero. Arthur doesn't flinch, instead opting to raise his shield and pour energy into his Crusader Aura.

The fire impacts his aura with the force of a hurricane, grinding his boots into the dirt and liquifying the soil and rocks around him into magma as the Duke stomps ever closer.

For thirty seconds, the Duke of Pain unleashes his Hellfire, but still, Arthur resists with unflinching resolve. He neither complains nor gasps for breath as the heat surrounding him begins to boil him inside his aura.

"W-we gotta get out of here! Bael is too powerful!" Dellfingler says. Unlike Arthur, he feels intense pain as the heat warms his blade near to the melting point.

Finally, Bael pauses to take a breath. Arthur slumps slightly as the fire pauses for just a moment, then he takes his chance, transmitting above the demon and stabbing down into a fiery seam in his back.

Dellfingler screams, "AHH! IT HURTS! PULL ME OUT!" His body, still in pain from the heat only a moment before, reaches its breaking point as his metal form begins to warp.

Arthur pulls the sword out and transmits away, ignoring the roar of the Balrog as Bael swats at the Hero no longer on his back.

Pausing for an instant, Arthur glances at the sword in his hand, now beginning to cool but visibly damaged. Dellfingler wheezes and gasps. "It... burns... pain... agony..."

Discard.

Arthur thinks only one word to himself before tossing the sword aside, letting Dellfingler land in the dirt. The poor, deformed sword offers no protest, as his mind begins to break.

Arthur closes his eyes for a moment and summons a Warhammer of light into his now-freed hand. Once he collects himself, he raises his shield and races over to the Balrog.

"WANT MORE? BAEL GIVE PAIN!"

The Balrog pounds his chest and inhales, and two massive wings of fire erupt from his spine, stretching twenty-feet to each side. Additionally, a clubbed tail appears, both to help balance him, and to assault anyone who tries to attack from behind.

Bael drops his flail and lands on his front claws, assuming a four-legged stance as he scratches the ground and prepares to charge the Hero-King.

Arthur smashes his Warhammer across Bael's face, deflecting a claw with his shield when Bael tries to scratch him, then uppercuts the Balrog's chin as he swings the weapon up. Bael damn-near flips onto his back from the force of the attack, but he rights himself with his newly formed wings.

"YOU KILL BOSS! ME NEVER FORGIVE!"

The two of them trade blows. Arthur batters the Balrog savagely, mostly managing to deflect the massive demon's attacks whenever he counters, while Bael returns the attacks in kind.

Every so often, one of Bael's attacks land, smashing Arthur away and visibly weakening his aura and lowering his mana in the process.

Finally, Arthur coughs and glances down to spot a gash in his armor. Bael must have landed a blow at some point, but the Hero doesn't know when it happened.

Bael stands upright again and laughs maniacally. "HAH HAH HAH! YOU WEAKEN, BUT ME GROW STRONGER! ME BIGGEST, BADDEST DEMON!"

Arthur's eyes rapidly calculate his odds of winning. Even as the Balrog proclaims his inevitable victory, the Hero-King realizes Bael isn't wrong. He'll win if the fight continues.

Suddenly, a dreadful feeling encapsulates Arthur's body. He shivers violently and stumbles to a knee. An ominous, unthinkably dark energy surges across the battlefield. He jerks his head over to the pit where he defeated Diablo, and the Hero-King's eyes widen.

Red mana bubbles from the pit with fiery rage. The ground shakes, and even Bael turns to look at where his Boss fell.

A claw bigger than Bael's entire Balrog form erupts from the abyss and slams into the dirt with the fury of fire and thunder.

Arthur shakily jumps to his feet as his soulless eyes scan the rising cosmic-sized demon.

Chance of total victory: Zero.

Satan stares at the lip of the crater for only a few moments before lowering his gaze. The sounds of a battle ten times more intense than before, complete with blows that make the crater shake, only serve to give everyone in Jason's party anxiety.

The Devil smirks. "By now, the Black Queen should be quite exhausted. It won't be long before she dies, and I walk free."

Jason glowers at the Devil. "You're awfully confident in your minions. I think today will end terribly for you. Amelia isn't as weak as you make her out to be."

Phoebe slides up beside Jason and looks at his face worriedly, but he keeps his eyes fixated on the First Emperor. Belial, in return, takes several steps back and sandwiches Phoebe between the Hero and herself.

Satan chuckles. "Two whores and a boy against the most powerful demon to ever live. And over that ridge are four demon generals against one weak, sobbing woman. Honestly, I couldn't stack the odds in my favor better if I tried."

Jason's spherical vision flicks to the cliff above. The ground shakes again as a battle of the ages continues, but his vision doesn't extend nearly far enough to make out who is fighting or under what circumstances. Still, every ripple makes his heartbeat quicken.

Amelia. Please. Don't die. I believe in you.

As if he had suddenly gained the power to summon people with a thought, Amelia appears atop the cliff within his spherical vision's range. Despite her tattered clothes and disheveled appearance, Amelia exudes a powerful aura as she clutches Blaarjiim's black orb firmly in her hand. She gazes at the group below with a mixture of pity and disgust.

"Oh? Who are the two women? Ah, right. Belial and Flim-flam, as I recall."

Amelia's voice, noticeably deeper than before, echoes inside the bowl. Satan jerks his head up at her. "What? I thought you were fighting my min- err, those demons!"

"No. I summoned King Arthur and Agares to battle them. Arthur is holding up quite well."

Phoebe blinks in surprise. "Arthur? His Majesty? But... but how?!"

Amelia ignores the question and leaps into the crater, sliding down the steep dirt incline and jumping to a stop as she arrives. "You're still fighting them, Satan? I thought you'd have weakened the Hero by now. I can't consume his soul unless he's nearly broken."

Satan scowls at the woman. "He has reinforcements! Besides, you've been-"

"Excuses." Amelia cuts him off, then swivels to face the other three. "Mortal, we meet for the last time. At my queen's request, I will ensure your demise is swift and painless."

Jason blinks. "You're not Amelia? ...Blaarjiim?"

"I see you can put two and two together. My queen and I came to a joint resolution. She lusts for the power of Wordsmithing that you hold in your breast. I will ensure we put it to better use."

"But... but Amelia..." Jason's voice falters. "She said she didn't want to fight me. Why would-"

"Silence! I do not question my queen's orders! I merely obey!" Blaarjiim pours darkness from Amelia's lithe form. "Long has her compassion for you been a thorn in her side. I will please her at any cost. Once she has control of your power, she will be able to use you as she wishes. We will reform this weakened, pathetic Labyrinth into the purest expression of darkness."

Before anyone can respond, the ground begins to tremble and quiver. An earthquake, more concentrated and intense than ever before, rumbles and shakes the planet. Within seconds, the feeling intensifies, as if the world were suddenly furious at the battles taking place on its surface. Even Satan finds it difficult to right himself, and the others stumble and flop around, trying to maintain their footing during the upheaval.

Phoebe loses her footing and gets thrown back and forth, crying out in alarm. Samantha manages to catch her by the wrist, but even the succubus stumbles and trips.

"What the Devil is going on?!" Satan bellows. "Black Queen! Are you responsible for this cataclysm?!"

Blaarjiim growls. "No. Your damn minions must be causing it. What are they doing?"

Jason, still exhausted despite all of the healing, coughs out a word. "Stabilize!"

Immediately, the local area ceases its shaking, though the surrounding planet doesn't. The sudden stop disorients everyone at once, causing all five humans and demons to take a tumble.

Satan quickly rights himself with his Vectors, and the others follow, though it takes Phoebe several moments. He launches himself into the air, grabs the cliff-edge, and pulls himself up to see. He freezes at the top and stares in stunned silence.

"What is it? What's going on?" Belial asks.

"No... no no no..." Satan mutters to himself as a demon of absurd size emerges from the bowels of the planet. "He didn't... he wouldn't..."

It only takes a moment for Satan to regain his bearings. He launches himself at the ground and Belial yelps in fright as he stops right in front of her.

"Lilia. We must take our leave. Diablo has transformed."

Samantha stares at him in disbelief. "What? Transformed?! But- but I thought he promised-!"

Satan reaches forward, grabs her arm forcefully and pulls her close. "We may have our differences, but I love you, Lilia. I won't let you die to his rampage. I'll take us far, far away from here. Then we'll-"

"Not so fast." Blaarjiim's voice rings out in the din. "You're not going anywhere, coward. If your demon leaders have transformed, then you will go and fight them. Assist Arthur. Tear them apart."

"What! No! I refuse!" Satan whirls in rage to face Blaarjiim. "Never again! The last time Diablo transformed, he slew millions of angels and demons! He's unstoppable! I damn-near died myself!"

"It sounds like you have experience fighting him. Perfect. Do it anyway. That's an order." Blaarjiim's eyes turn black for a moment, and Satan releases Belial, falling to the ground as blinding pain wracks his mind.

"Ahh! Nnn! C-curse you! I can't battle the Archdemon! He's too powerful!"

"You couldn't defeat the mortal, either. It seems you can't do much of anything," Blaarjiim says.

The sky starts to glow red like the morning sun. In the distance, the sound of a massive footstep shakes the continent.

Blaarjiim smiles. "Hop to it, slave."

"I... I won't forget this. I'll end you!" Satan snarls viciously and pulls himself to a standing position. Forcing himself to endure the mental pain, he turns to Samantha. "Get out of here, Lilia. Flee. Don't cast your life away. None have the power to defeat Diablo as he is now."

Samantha, despite her anger at Satan from earlier, stares at him longingly. "S-Satan... don't... don't die. Take care! Use your powers! You prepared to battle him in case he ever turned again."

Satan gnashes his teeth. "No matter what... I'll survive. And when I return, I'll rip this worthless Witch-
"

"Go!" Blaarjiim bellows. His amplified voice drives Satan's mental pain to eleven.

Without another word, Satan gnashes his teeth, leaps away, and climbs the crater.

Blaarjiim smiles, his expression tainting Amelia's beautiful face. "Ah, now that the loathsome weakling has left... I will return to business. Jason Hiro... your soul is already mine, as is Satan's; you just don't know it yet. Submit peacefully, and this won't hurt."

Jason clutches his chest armor, wincing as a stabbing pain bubbles in his chest. My broken bones haven't fully mended yet. Satan beat nearly all of the energy out of me.

"D-demon-lady. Take Phoebe and go. I can't fight if I'm protecting both of you."

"Jason, don't!" Phoebe pulls herself to her feet and stands between him and Blaarjiim. "You're too weak! We'll stay and help you!"

The Wordsmith ignores her plea and turns to the succubus. "Please. Protect Phoebe… no matter what."

Samantha glances at the top of the crater, where Satan fled, then back to Jason and Phoebe. "Okay. I won't be gone long, Hero. I owe this bitch a beatdown. Satan may not be the greatest man… but he's mine. She took him from me."

Jason nods. "Go."

The succubus ignores Phoebe's pleas, grabs her, and clears the top of the crater in one jump.

"Jason! Nooo!" Phoebe cries. She watches as the gap between herself and the crater multiplies instantly. Belial leaps skyward, her powerful Demon Emperor body giving her unparalleled agility. The inertia from the ascent makes Phoebe's head swoon.

A minute later, she blinks. Samantha comes to a stop a few miles away.

"Where are we?"

"You're safe now. Look. Over there…"

Samantha points in the distance. When Phoebe follows her finger, she gasps.

"What in the name of Heaven…"

Samantha shivers. "Diablo. It's… it's his Archdemon Form. I wouldn't worry about Jason. We're all doomed now."

Part 048: The Ultimate Battle; The Archdemon Awakens!

Recommended Listening

Arthur and the Balrog cease their battle and turn to gape as a massive, monstrous claw erupts from Polaris's bowels. A hand, the size of a small office building, grabs the ground and lifts.

Awe gives way to horror. Arthur, having never seen such a monstrosity in all his years, begins to shake. Despite his soulless vessel, terror floods his mind.

Impossible... impossible... what ungodly fiend could ever reach such a height...?!

Another limb bursts from the ground, and another, and another. Four huge, clawed arms spread out. Fire and thunder arc from every pore of the Archdemon's body. Diablo flings himself out of the ground with the force of a volcano and thrusts himself into the sky.

His legs, now a mass of one hundred writhing tentacles, beat and batter the landscape around him. Each whip-like tentacle ends in a mouth of razor-sharp teeth, ready to devour beings smaller than the Archdemon in one gulp, transforming them into a puddle of flesh. The Archdemon finishes rising and towers over the specks below him, standing well over five-hundred-feet tall.

Diablo's head, an eyeless aberration, twists and tilts around, as if trying to perceive something unseen. Two massive, curved horns, each over fifty-feet tall, sprout from his skull, as do thousands of spines that cover his body.

"BAAAEEELLL!"

The Archdemon bellows with a volume that rattles the eardrums of everyone nearby.

The Balrog, a tiny, insignificant demon compared to his master, howls in delight. "BIG BOSS! YOU ALIVE! ME WORRIED! ME THINK-"

"SILEEEEENCE!" The supermassive demon lunges one of its clawed palms down and snatches the tiny Balrog up, hoisting the Duke of Pain high into the sky. "That human tore me apart, and all you did was watch!! WORTHLESS BASTAAAARD!"

"BOSS! NO HURT! ME SORRY! ME-"

The Archdemon inhales for a moment, then begins to vomit a fire ten times hotter than what the Balrog spit before, blasting Bael's body with the heat of the sun. Bael writhes and squirms in his master's grip before the temperature makes him pass out and go limp.

Diablo pauses his fiery assault to lift the Duke into the sky. Then, he slams Bael's tiny body into the ground with enough force to shatter the continental plates. Somewhere, on the other side of the planet, an earthquake rips apart several mountains.

Again and again, the Archdemon pounds the Balrog into the dirt. Finally, he flings Bael into the horizon like a baseball. Bael flies over a hundred miles, his body careening helplessly as he sails toward the planet's surface below.

When Bael lands, he crashes into Polaris's crust with the force of a small tactical nuke, blowing away everything in his path and eradicating all life for several miles around.

Diablo turns his unbridled rage to the other specks below him. One glowing white form catches his attention.

"ARTHUUUR!! You won't live to see another day!!"

The Archdemon's tentacles lash out, spin around, and pound the ground where the Hero-King stands. Arthur instantly raises two fingers to his temples and begins transmitting left and right, up and down, all in an effort to evade the Archdemon's attacks. Diablo's transformation more than rivals that of Gabriel, the legendary Archangel whose ultimate ability would only allow him to fight on par with the Archdemon.

Arthur transmits to the Archdemon's chest and adheres to Diablo's body with the power of Holy Magic, then quickly modifies his Warhammer into a ten-foot spear of light. Arthur uses all of his strength to jam the spear deep into the goliath's chest. Then, he activates a pulse of Holy Energy, surging his mana deep into the demon's body.

"You have no power here, HERO!! I'm immune to your so-called Holy Magic!" Three tentacles pounce from the ground and lunge at Arthur, but he increases his Crusader Aura to its maximum level and deflects them without turning back.

Somewhere nearby, Satan trembles in fear. He rushes away from the pit where his mate and the Hero-boy prepare to battle the Black Queen.

Damn you, Blaarjiim! I have to fight Diablo for the second time in my life, only now, I have no backup at all! This time, I'm going to die for good!

Satan comes to a stop and clutches his head. Despite his protests, Blaarjiim's orders force him to obey. Still, he has autonomy over how he will fight back. His eyes follow the Hero-King dashing all around the Archdemon, stabbing and jabbing here and there.

It's at this moment that a face bubbles up from the ground. "Massster Sssatan! Diablo... he'sss... changed! What manner of devilry isss thisss?"

Satan glances down at the aethereal Duke. "Mephisto! Diablo's Archdemon form means the end-times have arrived. He's unstoppable. It took the combined power of the Archangels, myself, and every demon and angel in Heaven to suppress his power long enough for him to deplete his energy and transform into his base form. After he did, though, he went comatose for a hundred years. If we're lucky, the same thing will happen again."

The Devil swallows. "If."

Mephisto hisses. "Isss he truly that powerful? If ssso, then... we mussst flee! Let him rampage and dessstroy the land! We care little for thisss world!"

"If only it were that simple," Satan snarls. He glances back at Blaarjiim's crater. "The Black Queen has ordered me to fight Diablo. I have no choice!"

A thunderous boom blows away every cloud in the sky. Diablo discharges a concentrated stream of fire at Arthur. It misses and instead lasers into the distance, where it obliterates a mountain and sends millions of tons of debris careening into the atmosphere.

Mephisto glances at Satan, then whirls to face the Archdemon. "Ssslow down Diablo asss long asss you can. I have a ssspecial tool for jussst thisss sssituation. Leave it to me."

Satan eyes the King of the Undead for several moments. "I don't care how many servants you have. He'll erase them all. Far be it for me to order a demon to flee, tail tucked between his legs, but... leave. Take Belial and Bael, and go. There's nothing you can do here."

Mephisto raps his fingers together. "I've been sssaving thisss for agesss, massster Sssatan. Asss your greatessst pupil, I will impresss you. I will earn the posssition of Firssst Emperor with thisss feat. At the leassst, I pray you will ressspect me for defeating Diablo."

Satan eyes the young demon for a few seconds before shaking his head. "I've always regarded you with high esteem, Mephisto. If it weren't for you, we'd never have defeated the humans and angels, all those millennia ago."

The Devil turns to stare at Diablo's Archdemon form. "Alright. If you think you can defeat him, don't hold back. Unleash everything you have. Show me how you've grown."

He turns his back on the necromancer and runs toward the Archdemon, leaving the Duke of Mist by himself.

Mephisto's gaze hardens. "Fear not, massster Sssatan. After thisss, nobody will quessstion my powersss ever again."

"My bag! I dropped it!" Phoebe panics and turns away from the Archdemon toward the crater where Jason faces off against the corrupted Amelia. "We have to go back! Oh my god! I'm an idiot! I shouldn't have-"

Samantha pats Phoebe's back gently. "Calm down, Phoebe. A bag hardly matters. Look at me. Will you be okay? If anything happens to you-"

"I'm fine, Sammy! But my bag, it's-" Phoebe is interrupted when the firey Archdemon lights up the night like a miniature sun. His dreadful roar of rage tugs at her attention for a moment. "Never mind. You have to help Jason. He's weak. He can't fight the Black Witch, not as he is now!"

"I know. I'm going back. Stay hidden. The battles currently unfolding are beyond your abilities."

Samantha pauses for a moment, then kisses Phoebe's forehead. Phoebe stares at her in surprise, but the succubus dashes back to the crater without another word.

Inside the crater, Blaarjiim licks his lips. "Make your move, Hero."

Jason nods. "If you and Amelia chose the path of evil, then I'll do what I must. You can't have my ability." Jason aims his palm at the shadowy woman, pausing for a second as a rush of emotions floods his mind.

Amelia... I'm sorry.

"FIRE!!"

A wave of holy magic erupts from his palm and races toward the Black Queen. However, it misses at the last moment. Blaarjiim leaps into the air, and the energy surge smashes against the side of the crater behind him.

Blaarjiim sends a wave of darkness from himself down into the ground, and a second later, hundreds of shadow-lances leap up, stabbing Achilles' armor all over, as well as Jason's arms and legs. The sudden attack stuns the hero as they pierce not bone and flesh, but his mana instead.

Sucking the power from Jason's body, Blaarjiim lands right next to the youth and grabs him by the neck, slamming him against the side of the crater.

"How foolish! You sent away your two allies, and now you haven't the strength to resist!"

Jason tries to raise his arm, but slumps in Blaarjiim's grasp. His energy drains into Blaarjiim's shadow-lances.

Blaarjiim begins punching and pounding Jason, battering the divine armor with all of his strength. Eventually, Achilles's armor and Orion's Belt explode into light, leaving only the Boots of Hermes. Blaarjiim's dark magic tears those off, leaving the Hero defenseless. All Jason wears is his tattered underwear and a torn green T-shirt.

"And now, Hero, you become mine." Blaarjiim presses his hand against Jason's face.

Samantha's voice echoes from the top of the crater. "Not so fast, Witch! I'm still here!"

"Oh?" Blaarjiim immediately diverts his attention, ignores the boy, and drops Jason's limp body to the ground. "So you've returned already? A succubus against the King of Darkness. You should know, I have no qualms about beating a woman senseless. Making the Second Emperor my servant in addition to the First should prove useful."

"I'm nobody's servant," Samantha mutters. She hops into the pit and begins to morph, unleashing her True Succubus form for the second time in an hour.

Blaarjiim crosses his arms and watches as Samantha's body shifts and twists. She grows a spiky tail, leathery wings, and replaces her soft hands with razor-sharp claws.

"You're foolish to transform in front of me. Luckily for you, I am a principled fighter. Beating you in your weakest state would be unsatisfying. The power flooding my veins aches for a challenge."

Samantha finishes morphing and immediately jumps forward, swinging her clawed hand at Blaarjiim. The Dark God leaps to the side and laughs. "You're so slow that I could dodge you in my sleep! You can't even-"

He stops mid-sentence as Belial's talons pound the side of the crater, shake the ground, and sending a flood of rock flying thanks to her Herculean strength.

Immediately, Blaarjiim's attitude changes. Belial is slower than me, true, but her power is fearsome. I will end this before she lands a hit on me.

Spears of darkness bolt out from Blaarjiim's aperture and race toward the succubus. Belial dodges them with ease. She darts between the gaps in the spear's attacks and leaps backward, retreating from the dark god's range.

Blaarjiim retracts his dark energy. "You're like a snake, slithering between the gaps in my attacks. I commend your battle prowess, but it won't be enough to save you."

Belial flicks her eyes to Jason, who lies on the ground next to Phoebe's bag, barely conscious. "Yeah, yeah, save it. I've heard more than my fair share of big, bad, evil speeches from goons like you."

Belial rushes toward Blaarjiim. The two of them continue trading blows, and the Second Emperor's succubus form transforms her from a decent opponent to one with lethal power and precision. While Satan and Arthur unleash a hail of attacks on their Archdemon enemy in the distance, Belial's enhanced speed and power drive Blaarjiim back again and again.

Belial swings her claws toward Blaarjiim's head, and even when the dark god dodges, she still draws blood. One of Belial's claws cuts Blaarjiim's chest, spraying blood all over the dirt.

"Gurk! I'll finish you off! As soon as one of my tendrils hits, you'll-!"

"Too bad they wooon't~!" Samantha cackles, cutting him off. She pushes Blaarjiim back against a wall, then slaps him, sending Amelia's corrupted form flying to the side.

"Uwah!" Blaarjiim slams against the crater with a resounding thud and coughs up blood. One of his ribs jams through his chest. "C-curses..."

"I don't like killing," Belial hisses, rage building in her eyes. "But you took my husband from me. A thousand deaths would be too good for you!"

The succubus raises her claws to land the killing blow, but Blaarjiim raises his voice.

"You fool! If you love Satan, then you should be careful! If you kill me, he will die as well!"

Belial hesitates. Her arm lingers in the air for a split-second. "Y-you're lying."

"Try me."

"RAAAH!" She swings her talons at the dark god, but out of nowhere, a blast of fire slams into the side of her head, catching her off-guard.

Belial flicks her gaze around. "Who did that?!"

"I did," Beelzebub replies from atop the crater.

Belial sweeps her gaze toward him, only to freeze in place.

Beelzebub's right arm wraps around Phoebe's neck. She slumps listlessly in his arms, unable to fight back. "You wouldn't believe who I spotted while I was flying around! Why, you dumped this poor, defenseless human off behind a rock and left her there! How wonderful it is that I showed up to save this insect from all the scary monsters running around!"

The Baron of Flames cackles gleefully. "Hahahaha! I can hardly believe it! The Hero who humiliated me, his fiance, the woman who pounded me to a pulp in Hero City, and the woman who enslaved my master as well! I owe every one of you a blood debt!"

Belial turns white in the face. "Leave Phoebe out of this! She's innocent!"

Blaarjiim sneers. Foolish woman. Belial forgot about me.

With a quick motion of Amelia's hands, Blaarjiim unleashes the full power of his tendrils, spiking fifty energy-sapping spears of darkness through every point in Belial's body.

Shik-shik!

Belial gasps. "Ahh!"

The succubus stumbles forward, unable to retaliate. "Eugh... you... you..."

She flops to the ground and writhes for a moment, then goes still as Blaarjiim's magic does its work. Belial's eyes slowly turn toward Blaarjiim. "C-cow... coward..."

"Only a fool turns her back on an enemy," The Dark God replies.

He lashes out and kicks her limp body with brutal force, sending her sprawling over to the other side of the crater, where she lands near Jason. Her succubus form reverts, causing her wings and claws to retract as she falls unconscious.

Beelzebub smirks. He drops Phoebe off the ledge. Her body spins and rolls, bouncing off fifty feet of hardened dirt until she hits the ground with a sickening crunch. She lands only a short distance away from Belial, but her badly broken arms and legs reveal her arrival at death's door.

"Three down, one to go," The Baron of Flames says.

Blaarjiim cracks his neck. "Oh, do you wish to fight me as well? I drained all the energy in the Second Emperor's body. I'm ready for action again. I suppose a pipsqueak like you will do for a weak servant. Maybe you could fetch the water for my queen's bath, or serve as a footstool when she's tired."

Fire erupts from every pore on Beelzebub's body. "The Hell I will!!"

"What chance do you have, imbecile? I'm immune to fire. In fact, I'd go so far as to say that I'm your worst opponent!"

Beelzebub raises his palm toward Blaarjiim. "We will see."

I'm pathetic. I'm weak.

How long have I hovered at the edge of life and death, already? I couldn't beat Satan. I didn't stand a chance against Amelia. Some Hero I turned out to be.

I thought when Phoebe showed up, everything was going to work out. Seeing her face filled me with life.

My eyes vacantly follow her body falling off a cliff. The woman who cared for me during my paralysis slams into the ground and falls silent.

The succubus demon girl... she's down too.

We've lost.

Amelia said she would reap my soul and turn me into a servant, just as she did with Satan. Maybe I deserve that.

I failed in every conceivable way one could. I never had a chance in the first place.

Today is the greatest failure of my life.

My eyes drift to the side, away from Phoebe. It hurts to see her lying in that position. Her arms and legs are bent unnaturally. Why, Phoebe? Why did you have to come? I didn't want you here. This place... it's awful. You're too kind for the perils of war.

Eventually, my gaze settles on a bag. Ah, it's Phoebe's shoulder-purse. The one she always carries. It seems brighter than usual. Almost as if it's glowing...

All alone.

Somewhere, in the back of my mind, a voice whispers.

No, Jason. You are not alone. I have always been here for you. You merely had to listen.

My eyes widen.

H-Hoarhiim?

"ARTHUR!! Stand still for two seconds, you little rat!"

Diablo pounds his chest and limbs like an angry gorilla. He repeatedly tries to slap the tiny light form dashing around his body, occasionally stabbing and jabbing the Archdemon with spears of light.

At one point, Arthur pauses for a moment and stands still, allowing Diablo to swat at him. When one of the Emperor's claws races at the Hero-King, Arthur jams a spear into the Archdemon's belly, then forms a chain of light and a second spear, attaching the two weapons.

Just as Diablo's attack is about to hit, Arthur impales the Archdemon's palm and transmits away, chaining it to Diablo's gut.

Diablo screams in anger as he tugs and pulls, trying to free his limb. "Coward! Pest! I'll crush you flat!!"

Arthur reappears a mile away inside a small depression in the ground. He evaluates the damage he's dealing and immediately calculates that his offense is insufficient.

I require a new weapon.

With Dellfingler out of commission, Arthur sweeps the battlefield with his piercing gaze. A single sword lying near a crater catches his eye.

Catherine.

Arthur raises his hand and uses the power of holy magic to call the weapon to him. Despite the immense distance, the sword rattles and shakes for a few moments. Then, it leaps into the air and spins like an enraged scythe. Catherine flies across two miles of plains within a few seconds and strikes the flat of Arthur's palm. Arthur wraps his fingers around the blade, examining it for a moment to determine its power level.

Seconds later, something unexpected happens. Arthur staggers as a new voice appears in his mind.

Hero. New Hero? Not the Wordsmith. Someone else? An empty soul. I am Joan of Arc. Who are you...?

Arthur tries to shake the fog from his mind. Joan speaks to him. Fear not, warrior of virtue. Thou lack a soul, so I shall use thy body. Let us smite our enemies on this battlefield with our shared divinity.

Arthur's eyes shift silently. His body trembles as his soulless vessel tries futilely to resist Catherine's power.

The Sword From Heaven shimmers with divine light. Eventually, a brilliant light transfers through Arthur's palm, arm, and chest. Once it reaches his brain, it takes over and engulfs his mind.

Moments later, Arthur jumps to his feet. His stance changes. The King's mind vanishes, replaced by Joan's consciousness.

Joan swivels Arthur's body around and evaluates the battlefield in an instant. "Darkness blankets this land. A servant of evil taller than mountains stands beside his master, the one known as Satan and Devil. Which foe shall I send to an eternal slumber first?"

Across the rising and falling plains, Satan crouches low and stares at Diablo as the enraged Archdemon yanks and tugs at the chain binding his palm to his gut.

Oh, Diablo. Why did you have to transform? I'll have to use attacks I once deemed too dangerous for my health simply to slow you down.

Satan quickly takes inventory of his souls. Ten thousand, one hundred and sixty-one. I can refill my energy to its maximum at the cost of one soul each, or expend several souls at once to temporarily increase my cap. However... my most potent magic will require more than a thousand souls worth of energy to use a single time.

Satan bites his lip. Damn! I wish I could take Lilia away from here and flee! I don't want to waste valuable souls attacking my ally. There must be a way out of this fight.

Diablo's tentacles slam the planet repeatedly like a hurricane of destruction. "Graaah! How dare you snare my arm! I'll make you pay, Hero! YOU'LL PAAAAY!"

A light bulb brightens in Satan's mind. Of course! If Diablo is defeated and the Black Queen gives me no new orders, I'll be free to do as I please! Blaarjiim didn't specify that I had to return to him once I killed the Archdemon, so I won't!

Satan pauses and blinks. He watches Arthur's bright body begin running across the battlefield again, but for some reason, the Hero-King moves much more slowly. He doesn't transmit around as he did before. Given the darkness of night shrouding the planet, his body, glowing with Holy Energy, draws Diablo's attention.

"Aha! The coward shows himself! I won't let you get close this time!"

Diablo sends a flurry of tentacles out, biting at the pinprick of light with feverish intensity. However, Joan of Arc tosses her sword out and uses her advanced control of Catherine to transform it into a whirling buzzsaw. The blade lunges to and fro hungrily, spinning around the massive appendages and severing them two and three at a time.

Metric tons of flesh slam into Polaris's soil. Diablo recoils in pain as ten of his lower limbs vanish. "Gaaah! You worthless human!"

Joan ignores him, recalling her sword and diving underground before he can launch a counter-attack. She burrows furiously, using her powers of earth manipulation to tear through rock and stone at nearly the same speed as she can run.

Arthur, thy powers are formidable. Thy divine energy appears limitless. It shines as bright as the sun. How can one mortal hold such overwhelming reserves? With our powers combined, we shall slay this monstrosity.

Joan lifts her head as she rushes forward. The beast rises above me. Soon, he shall sense my approach. The time to strike is now!

She bursts from the dirt and activates Arthur's spears of light, an ability she once held. Rapidly, Joan summons and hurls a dozen of the partisans into the ground, keeping her eye on the hungry maws of Diablo's tentacles as they lunge at her. She finishes within seconds and forms more chained spears to attach to the ones buried in the earth.

A demon tied down and unable to fight shan't pose any more of a threat than a field hare caught in a trap!

Diablo lunges his remaining three limbs down to grab the Hero, and she uses Arthur's powers of light manipulation to send out the remaining chained spears, lancing through the Archdemon's hands and binding them.

Diablo bellows in rage. "Damn you!! Arthur! Your tricks are pissing me off!!"

Joan dives back underground and burrows over two hundred feet below the planet's surface, then uses Arthur's light manipulation to pull the holy chains with tremendous force, yanking the Archdemon against the earth and onto his belly.

All the while, Satan watches silently.

Is this... Arthur? Up until now, he never demonstrated this much tactical prowess. I find it hard to believe a single Hero is taking on the Archdemon and... and winning!

Diablo's rage subsides as the Third Emperor scowls at his sudden predicament. The five-hundred-foot-tall demon cocks his head left and right, thinking about how to escape the Hero's snares.

Joan emerges from the ground, another spear held at the ready, and rears back to hurl it into the Archdemon's skull.

Suddenly, all of Joan's plans flip upside-down.

Diablo inhales, creating a micro-monsoon as hurricane-force winds suck into his mouth. With one mighty exhale, the demon blasts the surface in front of his face with the full force of his fiery rage. Polaris shakes violently, throwing Joan and Satan around like pizza dough in the hands of a practiced chef. The resulting explosion boils back up from the planet's interior, destroying the chains bound in the dirt and blowing out a massive crater under the Archdemon.

The ejection shoots the Emperor several hundred feet into the sky. He lands with a WHOOMPH half a mile away, his forty remaining tentacles absorbing the brunt of the impact.

Joan lands on her back and jumps to her feet immediately. Mon dieu! This brute is neither slow nor stupid as I first imagined. No matter the era, evil grows without the forces of justice to oppose it.

Satan, still standing over a mile away, nods. Arthur can't stop Diablo, then. Soon, my old friend will begin unleashing his full rage. The madness in his mind has scarcely emerged.

"Satan!" A female voice makes the Devil jump. He turns around to see Lilia running toward him. "I'm here to help!"

Despite his beautiful mate arriving to see him, Satan shakes his head. "Dammit, Lilia! I told you! You are no use against Diablo. Leave, save yourself. I'm going to unleash the Genesis Flood."

The Second Emperor slows to a stop beside him. "What? B-but you said the energy requirement was..."

"Aye, Lilia. It will cost me at least a thousand souls. However, I'm planning to spend more than two thousand. The more souls I burn, the more powerful my magic. You should get to high ground."

Satan starts to turn away, but pauses. "Weren't you going to fight the Black Queen?"

An odd look appears in her eyes. "I was, but I lost. The one fighting her now is... the Wordsmith... but something is very different about him. There's an uncanny look in his eyes."

"Ah." Satan turns back to the Archdemon. "Well, I'm going to unleash my magic now. If you must stay by my side, then assume your Succubus form and prepare to fly. You'll need-"

"I can't." Lilia rubs her back. "I lost to the Black Queen after transforming again. I can barely use any magic, let alone attempt a third transformation."

Satan sighs. "Devils. Fine. After I activate the spell, I'll take you somewhere safe. We can watch the destruction from a distance."

"Satan."

Belial speaks again, but this time, she lowers her voice to a whisper.

"Hm? What's the matter?" Satan asks.

"I... I just want you to know how much I love you. I stayed faithful all this time. I never once looked at another man."

Satan lowers his eyes.

"You're a good woman, Lilia. You deserve better than me. I thought about what you said. You're right. I've always been a murderous psychopath. I got my just desserts when the Black Queen took my soul. After all the souls I devoured, I ended up swallowed by the one who created me. In a way, you could call it poetic justice."

"There is no justice in death," Belial murmurs. "If we get out of this together... I want you to come with me and leave all of this behind. Forget the battles and the strife. Stay by my side, and let us enjoy eternity together."

Satan closes his eyes.

"I'll do what I can, toots. I'll do anything for you."

He turns to face Belial. A smile creeps onto his face.

"And for what it's worth... I'm sorry I left you alone. You deserved better."

Belial blushes. "I'll forgive you, but only if we make it out of here alive."

"Haha!" Satan laughs. "I ain't gonna let Deebs kill us. Come on! We ain't got a moment to waste."

"Alright."

Minutes before.

Once again, Hoarhiim's figure appears in my mind as a vaguely human-shaped apparition of light.

"Jason. We share a life bond. My orb is not far. Reach out and place it in your hand. I can help you, but only if you trust me."

I try to lift my head a fraction of an inch, but fail.

I... can't. Everything hurts. I don't have any strength left.

"You do!" Hoarhiim beckons with both hands. "Come, Jason! Don't let my brother win! Blaarjiim consumed tens of millions of human souls! I know you won't let his evil plans succeed!"

My eyelids droop.

I've already failed. I lost to Satan, and I lost to Blaarjiim. I couldn't convince Amelia to abandon the path of corruption. I'm no Hero. I'm a failure.

Hoarhiim's soft gaze hardens. "Imbecile! When did the Jason I knew become a weakling who gave up because the going got a little too tough?! Look at Phoebe! She's lying facedown in the dirt, breathing her last, weak gasps of air! After everything Phoebe did for you, will you let her die? Will you let her become the victim of a psychopath?!"

My eyes close for a moment. I don't want that... but... I have nothing left. No juice. No batteries. I can't even speak a word to heal her. I'll die soon when Amelia consumes my soul. I deserve-

"Shut up!" Hoarhiim grows uncharacteristically angry. "I won't tolerate another word! Use your telekinesis, boy! Just a little pull, that's all it takes! Yank out my orb! Touch it with a single finger! Do that, and earn your title! Become the Hero you were meant to be!"

Something about Hoarhiim's anger stirs an emotion deep in my chest. Sadness. Anguish.

Beelzebub told me that he attacked the Core. I was terrified at the possibility that he killed Phoebe, yet here she is, alive, but dying. I nearly failed her once, but I can't do that a second time.

Hoarhiim is right. I won't fail her.

I won't fail anyone ever again!

Pain surges through my mind like electricity. The sounds of Beelzebub and Blaarjiim fighting echo through the canyon, lighting up my surroundings. Hoarhiim's orb glows in his bag like a flare in the darkness.

Reaching out with my mind, I pant like a dog as I expend what minuscule amount of energy I have left to tug at Hoarhiim's orb, but it rests deep inside Phoebe's bag, buried under an avalanche of minor trinkets and gadgets.

Releasing my pull, I gulp air desperately. Hoarhiim! I can't budge it! What do I do?!

Hoarhiim makes a pulling motion with his arms. "Flip the bag on its side toward you. My orb should fall out and roll downhill toward your hand."

Gears click into place. Of course! I should have thought of that!

This time, I aim for the whole bag, tugging and pulling and tugging some more. Beelzebub yelps in pain, and Blaarjiim bellows angrily as the two of them trade more blows.

Suddenly, my heart skips a beat. Something I was doing must have worked. Phoebe's bag tilts onto its side, and Hoarhiim's orb drops out, hits the ground without bouncing, and rolls toward my outstretched palm.

The orb comes to a stop a few inches away, and I use all my remaining strength to stretch toward it.

Come on, worthless body! Work! WORK!!!!

My finger touches the orb.

A tingle shoots down my arm.

Power engulfs my body. The orb sucks into my palm as if I'd suddenly gained control over magnetism.

"Well done, Hero," Hoarhiim says with a smile. "It's time to pay my brother back in full."

Beelzebub snaps his fire whip out, lashing it left and right as he attempts to slice through Blaarjiim's shadow shielding. The dark god avoids the majority of the attacks and only deflects when he must. He desperately tries to find a moment to jump up to the lip of the crater.

"Attacking from the high ground... the mark of a coward! Allow me to meet you on equal terms, and you won't live to see the sunrise!"

Beelzebub jerks his whip forward again, then blasts several heat bullets from his finger, battering the female human around. "Not cowardice, but intelligence. Only a fool gives his enemy a fair shake. All is fair when it comes to war, little insect."

Blaarjiim gnashes his teeth and shoots a shadow spike at the demon, but Beelzebub dodges it, letting the dark weapon fly past him harmlessly. The Baron of Flames counters with a concentrated blast of fire, turning the heat up as high as possible as he attempts to cook the dark god inside his shadow-shell.

Unnoticed by them, the Hero makes contact with the orb of light. Hoarhiim's energy instantly floods Jason's body. Jason's wounds regenerate as Hoarhiim yanks the globe into his palm.

Inhaling, the deity of light jumps to his feet and pats his chest.

I made it. Barely.

Hoarhiim trots over to Phoebe and flips her onto her back. "Heal."

Life returns to her body, and Phoebe gasps for air. Hoarhiim stares at her while her broken arm fixes itself. "Examine."

The power of Wordsmithing fills Hoarhiim's mind with tens of trillions of pieces of information regarding Phoebe's physical well-being. Hoarhiim concentrates and stares into the woman's brain, then nods.

As I suspected. Phoebe suffered a head injury at some point. I wondered why she was having such trouble standing and walking. Beelzebub likely didn't knock her unconscious. She must have passed out due to this skull fracture. Not to mention the blood building up in her parietal lobe.

Phoebe's eyes flutter open. "J-Ja...son? What-? Where-?"

"Not Jason. I am Hoarhiim." The deity of light glances over at the two dueling combatants who will surely notice him at any moment. "It is dangerous for you to stay. I will send you somewhere safe."

"Wait!" Phoebe squeaks the interruption out, even as she follows Hoarhiim's gaze to the battle between Beelzebub and Blaarjiim. "If you're Hoarhiim, then where's Jason? Aren't you, well, him?"

"I have taken over Jason's body temporarily, in much the same way as my brother has taken over Amelia's. Jason will be quite alright. I apologize for rushing you, but, Return."

Ignoring Phoebe's protests, the deity of light transfers her body to the Labyrinth in the blink of an eye.

With Phoebe gone, Hoarhiim Wordsmiths again, directing his spell at the Second Emperor. "Heal. Regenerate."

The succubus coughs and shakes her head as life returns to her soul. "Huh? What's going on?"

"I have healed you. Take your leave. Return to your kind. I must deal with my brother now."

The sound of Beelzebub yelping in pain as one of Blaarjiim's shadow lances strikes his arm jars Belial awake. She jerks her head over to stare at the battle in progress. "He... what? I don't understand."

"There's no time to explain. Leave." Hoarhiim uses his telekinesis to hurl the succubus up toward the top of the pit. She yelps in surprise, but rights herself in midair and lands on her hands and feet with catlike grace.

Beelzebub and Amelia look over, having heard Belial's shriek. Blaarjiim's jaw drops. "What? The mortal is moving again?"

Blaarjiim's eyes instantly gravitate to the glowing orb held in Jason's hands. "Hoarhiim? You damned, meddling-!"

Beelzebub, unsure of what's going on, glances warily at the Second Emperor as she pivots to face him. "The devil-whore is up as well? I thought all three were down for the count!"

Belial curls up her lip. "You thought wrong. And I owe you for what you did to Phoebe."

Hoarhiim holds up his left palm. "Belial, leave. I will handle both of-"

"Don't worry. It'll only take me a minute to pound this little man into pulp." Belial smashes her fist into her palm. "Someone didn't learn their lesson the first time around."

Blaarjiim, having already stopped caring about his squabble with the Baron of Flames, pivots to face his brother. "Hoarhiim! It has been many ages since both of us took physical form at the same time! Let the two demons hash out their differences."

"Agreed," Hoarhiim replies. "I warn you, brother... we share a deep bond. The lives you've stolen increased my power as much as they did yours. I tasted their pain within my soul. Our family ties end here and now."

"Haha, I wouldn't have it any other way," Blaarjiim sneers. "Calling a weak-minded simpleton like you a brother has always been my greatest shame."

The two orb-beings and their vessels slowly walk toward each other until they're only twenty feet apart.

Meanwhile, Belial jumps at Beelzebub, shrugs off his fire, and delivers a bone-snapping punch to his chest. He slams into the dirt and grass brutally, breaking many more bones in the process.

Before Beelzebub can regenerate his body, Belial grabs him by his leg and lifts him overhead, then hurls him into the ground with enough force to embed him five feet deep. The planet trembles from the impact.

Unsatisfied with the damage she dealt, Belial stretches her arm out and hurls punches into the shallow pit, smashing the suited demon repeatedly until she's broken every bone in his body ten times over. Belial smacks her palms together and dusts herself off.

"I hope you've learned your lesson this time, regenerating Phoenix-boy."

Sleep takes Beelzebub. The darkness of the shallow grave surrounds him, and Belial leaves.

Hoarhiim stares at his brother stonily, seeing past the soft face of Amelia deep into the corrupted evil of Blaarjiim's mind.

"You are vile. An aberration of nature. An all-consuming plague that annihilates everything it touches. Because of your lust for power, I have been forced to taste the misery of millions. I felt each of their screams as your so-called 'queen' tore them apart one-by-one. The boy does not understand how utterly irredeemable the two of you are... but I do. I know the depths to which you've sunk."

"Spare me your platitudes," Blaarjiim sneers. "Empty words from a vacuous mind. You play the arbiter of justice, the pure and holy crusader of light... but you are as willing to kill as I. The only difference is that you add qualifiers to make yourself feel warm and fuzzy. Murder is only acceptable if the one you must kill is evil. Isn't that right, brother?"

Hoarhiim sighs and opens his free palm. A tower-shield of light appears in his grasp, one that he can summon with a mere thought. "I target those who commit atrocities. You attack wantonly. That is the difference between us. Ready yourself, Blaarjiim. I will unleash the full power of the Wordsmith upon you."

Blaarjiim forms a club of darkness in his free hand, one made of skulls and bones. "I wonder, Hoarhiim... which of us will win?"

"Destiny has already decided," Hoarhiim murmurs.

In the sky overhead, the first traces of sunlight begin to emerge.

Morning is coming.

Part 050: Unstoppable Force, Immovable Object

"Wait! If you're Hoarhiim, then where's Jason? Aren't you... well, him?"

Jason, or rather, not Jason, shakes his head. "I have taken over the Hero's body temporarily, in much the same way as my brother has taken over Amelia's. Jason will be quite alright. I apologize for rushing you, but, Return."

Suddenly, the world shifts around me. The crater and night sky vanishes, replaced by a vacuum of darkness. Air rushes against my face with a whoomph.

I drop half a foot onto my rear, impacting my butt with a dull crack.

Thud.

"Aah!"

An involuntary yelp of fright leaves my mouth. A moment later, I whip my head around to scan my surroundings. I desperately try and figure out where I've traveled, but the power of Wordsmithing disorients me, making it difficult to ascertain where I've landed. The teleportation felt like stepping through the portal to the Core, only so much more sudden and unexpected that I didn't even have time to-

Splash.

What was that?

The dim lighting makes my skin crawl. Somehow, without understanding why, I suddenly realize Hoarhiim must have teleported me inside the Labyrinth. A dim blue glow fills the room, its light so faint that I can barely make anything out. However, the sound of splashing water is unmistakable.

A woman's voice speaks out, chilling my blood. "Hey, Millie, did you hear something? Over there, in the corner."

My vision rapidly adjusts to the dim light. I finally realize that I'm in a vast open room, one with a great lake of water in its center. The lake is illuminated from the bottom, possibly by glowstones or some other natural light source. And in the water... several women are splashing around.

Wait! I know who they are! Mermaids. Why am I near a bunch of mermaids? What in Heaven's name...?

One of them glides over and pops out of the water to squint at me. She's lovely, with long red hair and an innocent face. "Oh! It's a human woman! What's a human doing here?"

"Ahh!" One of the other mermaids screams in fear. "An adventurer! She's here to kill us!"

Suddenly, a massive shape sitting in front of the pool jumps up. I hadn't noticed it until just now, but my eyes instantly lock onto it and realize with a start that it's a tremendous, armored being. And... judging by the horns...

A demon!

The demon turns to face me. Its horrible blood-red eyes glow in the dark.

"Human. You do not belong."

His voice, like a lion chewing on steel, sends pangs of terror into my heart. Where did Hoarhiim send me?! Oh god! I'm right in the heart of enemy territory!!

The demon takes two lumbering steps in my direction, clearing the thirty-foot gap with frightening speed.

"W-wait! I'm not here to hurt anyone! I'm sorry! I don't know how I got here!"

The demon pauses and towers over me. I crawl back against the wall and cower as the monstrous mountain of steel raises its hand to strike me.

"Not belong. Leave."

I nod rapidly. "I... I will! I don't know where I am, though! Oh god, p-please don't hurt me!"

The steel-clad behemoth, a mass of twisting metal and skulls and bones that all taper off into a horned helmet, lowers his gaze slightly to examine my body.

He says nothing for a few long moments. One of the mermaids swims closer and climbs onto dry land. "Oh, Barbatos! Look at her! She's petrified! You told me you'd never frighten an innocent woman!"

The demon, apparently named Barbatos, turns to look at the mermaid. "Did not mean to scare. No intruders allowed."

The mermaid woman flutters her eyes bashfully. "You have to be more careful, sweetie! Nobody understands how kind you are! They only see your scary black armor." She turns to look at me. "Barbatos wouldn't harm a fly! I'm Millie. What's your name?"

I try desperately to swallow my terror. "Ahm, it's... Fuh- Phoebe. I'm Phoebe."

"Human?"

"Yes... I didn't mean to trespass. I-I'm sorry!"

Millie slides a little closer, showing no fear toward me. Her leg-fins slap on the ground to give her a little push. "Our alcove is a bit out of the way, cutie. How does a random woman 'accidentally' end up here?"

Okay, Phoebe. Play it safe. Millie may look sweet and innocent, but she's a monster with a tremendous demon protector. Don't give out too much information.

"Someone teleported me here. I was right in the middle of a battle."

Millie nods consolingly. "I see. With who?"

Dang. I can't just tell a lie...

"Um. My fiance. He's a human too, but he has magic."

The mermaid cocks her head. "A human with magic? Huh. One of those appeared here not long ago. Within the last day or so, come to think of it."

"Was he a young guy? Blonde hair?"

She nods excitedly. "Oh, yes! That's the one! I don't remember his name, though. We all gossiped about him for quite a while. Very handsome. Barbatos scared him off. Our protector is very, erm, protective."

I glance up at the towering wall of metal. "You don't say."

Barbatos kneels slightly, making himself smaller and maybe a little less terrifying, though his horrible red eyes unnerve me, even more so when they're at my eye level.

"Battle. Where?"

I frown. "A planet, but I don't know which one. A bunch of demons were fighting each other, as was my fiance."

Millie rolls her eyes. "Demons are always trying to tear each other apart. Barbatos would never join in on that barbarism. You look tired, Phoebe. Why not come and dip your feet in the water? You don't have a weapon, but we won't hurt you. We're not like the sirens."

I pause, remembering my demonology. Sirens use their beautiful voices to trap and devour men, while mermaids are peaceful creatures that subsist on seaweed and plants. Among monsters, they're considered the weakest, and as such, typically use their beauty to coerce males of other species to protect them.

They're probably the gentlest of all monsters.

A moment later, I shake my head. "I'm sorry, but I can't. I need to return to my fellow humans at the Labyrinth Core. I'd hate to ask for favors... but I don't know where I am. Could someone give me directions?"

Millie's face contorts into confusion, and she glances back at the other mermaids, then shrugs and meets my gaze again. "Ahh... sorry. You're a long distance from the Core, Phoebe. We're near the outskirts of the Labyrinth, mostly so other monsters won't bother us. This area is considered the 'tropical zone.' To return to the Core, you'd have at least a month's hard travel ahead of you."

Seeing the dismay on my face, Millie quickly adds, "Oh! But Barbatos can take you back! He can teleport around and do all sorts of things! Why, he's one of the most powerful Dukes in the Labyrinth!"

My heart trembles. I gaze at the mountain of metal. "You're a Duke?"

Millie answers in Barbatos's stead. "Mhm! But as I said, don't you worry. Barbatos will take you back to your people. Won't you, sweetie?" The mermaid lightly rests her hand on the Duke's leg.

Several moments pass. Barbatos, still crouched down, tilts his head up to the ceiling, then returns his eyes to me. "Battle. Who? What demons?"

I frown. "Sorry. I don't know exactly. I know Satan was there... and Belial. A bunch of other demons were fighting in the distance. I never saw who they were."

The Duke nods. "Acceptable. War. Unpleasant. No winners. Only death."

Millie lowers her head and sighs. "Barbatos lost his brother. He doesn't like war. Neither do we."

"I lost many friends recently too," I admit. "I thought you were scary at first, Mister Barbatos, but you don't seem all that bad, now. Sorry for judging you."

The demon closes his eyes. Without his burning gaze fixated on me, his armor suddenly appears more like a prison encasing his body than an armored suit intended for combat.

"Return you. Stop battle. Prevent death. Come with me, now."

The Demon Duke opens his eyes again and stands, rising to his full height. He begins making motions with his hands, and a portal appears. He beckons for me to step through, and on the other side, I spot several familiar faces turning to gape in horror at the demon on the other side of the portal.

"Go."

I nod quickly. "Um, thank you. Miss Mermaid, and Mister Duke as well."

Millie waves nonchalantly. "Oh, geez, Phoebe, you're a cutie! Drop by anytime!"

Hoarhiim holds up his shield of light and waits for Blaarjiim to slam his bone-club against it. Blaarjiim eagerly rises to the task, sending out spines of darkness to attack his brother while also jumping at the deity of light and trying to score a hit.

"How very like you to always play defense!" Blaarjiim knocks the shield aside for a split-second, and the spines of darkness impale his brother, draining Hoarhiim's energy into the Dark God.

Suddenly, Blaarjiim stumbles forward and collapses to one knee as nausea hits him and Amelia in waves. "Gah! W-what is this... this pain?!"

Hoarhiim grunts as the spines drain his energy. "Our orbs are two sides of the same coin. The energy you stole from millions of souls served to energize me, just as your attacks against me will drain you. Fighting me is like striking a mirror. You'll only hurt yourself in the end, and the woman you care for."

Blaarjiim coughs and retracts his spines. "Dirty tricks. I should have known you'd-"

"No tricks," Hoarhiim calmly replies, cutting his brother off midsentence. "Only truth. Neither of us can win this battle. Either we both give up, or we both die. Which will you choose?"

Diablo unleashes a roar of pain in the distance. Blaarjiim scowls at Hoarhiim. "If I kill you, I can take the power of Wordsmithing for myself. I can spread my darkness to every corner of the galaxy!"

"If you kill me, you will die. You won't spread anything, anywhere," Hoarhiim replies. "I do not wish to die, Blaarjiim, but you leave me little choice. The atrocities you've committed make me wish I'd done something sooner to stamp out our existence from this universe. We don't belong. Even compared to demons and angels, we've always been aberrations of nature."

"Clichés! All you ever spout are proverbs and axioms!" Blaarjiim gnashes his teeth. "War and death are inevitable, Hoarhiim. There is no such thing as peace. Life without death has no meaning. Many must die so that the rest may learn to enjoy living."

"You would prefer that all die so you can rule over a galaxy of corpses," Hoarhiim retorts. "Although you only care about Amelia, you aren't content to live with her in peace and solitude. You always hunger for more. Never satisfied; always anxious."

Hoarhiim slams his orb into Jason's chest, sending a wave of pain from himself into Blaarjiim. The Dark God leans over for a moment and clutches his heart, then regains his breath.

Blaarjiim's anger lessens. "Fine. I can't defeat you without killing myself. So what? What do you expect to prove?"

Hoarhiim's shining white eyes narrow. "I did not awaken for no purpose, brother. While I rested, I came to a decision. I realized that the only way to stop your terror from consuming all sentient life would be for both of us to die."

"A suicide mission?" Blaarjiim slaps his club against his orb. "You plan to play the martyr? You can't kill us both! I know you haven't the heart! After all, you love Amelia too."

Hoarhiim winces. "I do. I always have. It is a shame that she listened to your counsel instead of mine. The pain she felt, the loneliness... she only ever wished to bring back her closest companion, but you took advantage of her sorrow. You turned her into a monster and led her down the path of agony."

"My queen was always a monster! A beautiful, unhinged agent of malice!" Blaarjiim roars, while pacing like a wild animal. "I brought out her rage. I turned it into a fire, one I stoked with logs of fury. You merely rested at her waist and chastised her every move! When Joan attacked, you watched as my queen was sealed away! You liked it."

"I didn't," Hoarhiim replies. "It hurt me as much as you. Nevertheless, we won't ease our conflict with words. The time for debate is long past. I'm sorry, brother. It seems, in the end, that both of us will be the loser in our struggle."

The demonic battle outside the crater intensifies, and the ground begins to rumble. Hoarhiim lowers his shield and raises his palm. "Bind."

Blaarjiim's hands wrench around behind his back, and shackles form on them. A moment later, similar restraints bind his feet together. Blaarjiim trips and falls to the ground. With his weapon still in hand, he struggles and writhes trying to break apart his bindings, but fails.

"I can't get them off! What are these made of?!"

Blaarjiim stares silently for a few moments. "This boy has no understanding yet of the power that Wordsmithing holds... but I do. You do. Ponder my word of power and what effect I may have used."

Blaarjiim stops struggling and stares at the Deity of Light. "You imagined unbreakable metal in your mind, Something that would take incredible force to shatter."

"Yes."

"Gahh!" Blaarjiim struggles again and gasps for breath as he wrenches and rolls, trying desperately to pull the shackles apart. "Binding me in a pit so that you can kill me without a fight! I always knew you were a coward!"

"I haven't the heart to kill you directly," Hoarhiim says. Turning away from his brother, he uses telekinesis to hover out of the pit. In the far distance, toward the ocean, Hoarhiim spots that which causes the earthquake.

"A valiant effort, Satan," The Deity of Light whispers. "But it will ultimately prove fruitless."

Joan forms spears of light in each hand as she rushes the Archdemon. Catherine spins in midair, controlled via Joan's mental link. The sword slices and cuts any of Diablo's tentacles that threaten the Hero, and Joan, in turn, closes the distance between herself and the demon.

"Filthy Hero! I hate you! I hate everything about you!!" Diablo concentrates power in his chest as the Hero leaps into the air. Before Joan can hurl her spears, Diablo unleashes a wave of mana, turning the air around him into a whirlpool of lightning and fire. The typhoon yanks Joan to the side. She yelps in surprise as the intense heat and electrical power pour into her body. Bolts of lightning batter her from all directions, tossing her around like a ragdoll.

Joan tries to right herself in midair, but one of Diablo's tentacles bites onto her leg, making the Hero scream in pain. "Ahh! Gahhh!"

Catherine lunges out to slice the demonic appendage off, but the tentacle bites down hard, severing flesh and bone. When Catherine finally cuts the maw in half, it's already too late.

Joan impacts the ground with the force of a meteor; her descent speed increased to ludicrous levels thanks to the power of Diablo's mana storm. She trembles and grits her teeth as blood pours from her severed leg. Diablo spots her body and licks his lips. "Finally, Arthur! You little worm! Die!"

Across the field, Satan and Belial arrive at the top of a small mountain. Satan drops into a sitting position and folds his legs together, then inhales deeply. "I'm going to regret this, but I have to stop Diablo. At any cost."

Belial sits behind him, wrapping her arms around his chest. "Do your best, love. Bring the pain. Show everyone why you possess the title of First Emperor."

Without another word, Satan begins folding his hands together into a series of increasingly intricate shapes.

Hound. Tiger. Bat. Golem. Trigram. Sword. Lion.

I took this spell from a Titan King many millennia ago. I've never had to use it, but it's unparalleled when it comes to battlefield devastation. I can lay waste to an entire planet with it, so long as I have mana to spare.

Satan trembles as souls begin to vanish from his body, flooding his aperture with godlike amounts of demonic energy. Ten times his maximum capacity, a hundred times, a thousand times...

Higher and higher, Satan's mana surges upward until he exhausts his five-thousandth soul. The Devil trembles. The level of energy in his body nauseates him.

Genesis Flood.

Satan unleashes the full might of his power, summoning all the water from the ocean, fifty miles to the west. As if an earthquake of magnitude eleven had just struck, the coastal tides retreat, then surge inland. A five-hundred-foot wall of water rises from the coast and rushes eastward, devouring everything in its path: trees, boulders, even small mountains.

Belial's eyes widen as she stares at the incoming tsunami. "Seven Hells..."

Satan concentrates all of his willpower and yanks the ocean toward himself. Diablo, about to smite the Hero with a finishing blow, turns around to stare at the oncoming wall of destruction.

"No! NOOOOO!!!"

"A valiant effort, Satan," Hoarhiim whispers. "But ultimately, your struggle will prove fruitless."

A five-hundred-foot wall of water tears across the landscape at over three hundred miles an hour. Hoarhiim glances down at his brother, Blaarjiim, whose limbs are bound together. Blaarjiim rolls around in the crater below, struggling to break free.

"This will not kill you, Blaarjiim... but it will hurt."

Blaarjiim's eyes widen. "Don't leave me here! Hoarhiim! Even for you, this is-"

"Think of it as retribution for the lives you've ended. A little pain won't be the end of you."

"Hoarhiim? HOARHIIM!!"

The Deity of Light ignores his brother's screams of anguish and continues levitating into the sky as the seawall approaches. A flash of movement catches Hoarhiim's eye. An armored figure appears, yanks Beelzebub out of the hole Belial pummeled him into and vanishes, stepping through a portal.

Oh? It seems Barbatos understood after all.

Below Hoarhiim, the seawater rips up the land, floods into the crater, and crushes Blaarjiim and Amelia with unrelenting force. Blaarjiim's screams cut off halfway as tens of millions of gallons of seawater pulverizes him without restraint.

Elsewhere, Joan writhes in agony on the ground as her leg heals, but it regenerates far too slowly for her to save herself from the wall of water. She tucks her body into the fetal position, making herself as small as possible. Catherine stabs into the ground before her, erecting a powerful barrier of Holy Magic around the Hero.

Diablo inhales mightily and unleashes a blast of fire at the oncoming seawall, hoping to slow it down or make it split around him, but the oncoming sea swallows his flames without remorse. At the last second, he jams every tentacle into the ground, intending to root himself like an anchor. Instead, the millions of tons of water tear him away when the sea impacts, yanking him off his feet and pulling him across the plains. The Archdemon tumbles and swirls inside the vortex, spinning his body around several times per second as he's dragged and beaten across the land. Eventually, a massive mountain appears before the Emperor, and he slams into it with enough force to generate a localized earthquake.

Diablo's four main limbs dig into the mountainside as he struggles to hold on for dear life. The seawater pounds him for several minutes, yanking his immense body left and right with the force of a hundred hurricanes.

Eventually, the height of the water begins to dip. Time passes, and it lowers from five-hundred-feet to four hundred, three hundred, and so on.

Half an hour later, the Third Emperor sags to the mud, his strength sapped dry. The tsunami reduces to the depth of a puddle compared to the colossal Archdemon, but Diablo loses his ability to move.

Hoarhiim, flying high in the sky, frowns. Perhaps I was wrong. The Archdemon has nearly been beaten already. I might not have to stop him myself.

The Deity of Light glances at the crater below, now filled with water. His Brother is nowhere to be seen.

"Locate."

Hoarhiim's mind travels across the battlefield, toward the direction the water surged. Twenty miles away, sprawled against a rock, Amelia's body lies in a ditch, Blaarjiim's orb gone from her grasp.

"Teleport."

Hoarhiim transmits the thirty miles in an instant, arriving at Amelia's bound, soaking wet body. Her dress is waterlogged beyond belief, and she gasps for breath, occasionally coughing up fluid as she sputters and wheezes.

"Ja... Jas...on."

Hoarhiim shakes his head. "I am not Jason. Not right now. Where is Blaarjiim?"

Amelia lays still, her wrists still bound behind her back by Hoarhiim's unbreakable shackles.

"G-gone. Kah! Where am... I?"

Hoarhiim aims his palm at her. "Release."

The shackles vanish, and Hoarhiim takes a knee. "Were you working with my brother?"

Amelia's body trembles. She shivers from the cold. "S-s-suh- sorry... I d-didn't want t-to wake up... but he entered my mind. It was awful."

"I did something similar with Jason. I assumed you and Blaarjiim were at odds with each other."

Slowly, Amelia presses her back against the rock. She mops her hair out of her face. "What happened? I don't... I don't know how I got here. Why am I s-soaking wet?"

"Dry. Warm." Hoarhiim aims two words of power at the young woman, and immediately her condition improves. "It seems my brother intended to take over your mind and force you to kill Jason. His desire for power is insatiable."

Amelia pulls herself up and dusts her now-dry clothes off. "I... I see. Um. Hoarhiim?"

"Yes?"

Amelia fiddles with her fingers for a moment.

"Is, err, Jason in there? Is he listening?"

"No. The Hero is dormant, and will stay so until I've finished."

"Okay." Amelia splashes her feet in the muddy ground absentmindedly. "Look... I've done some bad things."

"To say the least," Hoarhiim replies blandly.

"I killed many people. So many that I couldn't count them if I wanted to."

"Blaarjiim's influence, no doubt."

She nods. "Yes, but I was complicit. He didn't force me to become a mass-murderer."

Surprisingly, Hoarhiim smiles. "Agreed. You did that much of your own volition."

Amelia turns away to gaze at the massive Archdemon slowly standing up in the distance. "Jason said I could be forgiven. He said I c-could redeem myself... in spite of what I've-"

"Jason is wrong," Hoarhiim says, cutting her off. "You cannot be redeemed. Once evil, always evil."

Amelia blinks in surprise. "Huh? Wait, I thought you were..."

"Going to forgive you? No. I cannot offer repentance for your life of evil, and neither can Jason. No act of goodness can redeem you for murdering tens of millions. No matter how many you save, no matter how many you heal, no matter how often you pray to gods that no longer exist... you are utterly irredeemable."

Amelia leans back to gaze up at the man towering over her. "H...Hoarhiim? What are you saying? After drying me off, helping me up, and freeing me from those shackles, I thought you'd-"

"You thought wrong. I only freed you because you don't pose a threat to me." Hoarhiim turns away from Amelia and the Archdemon and stares into the distance, his piercing gaze fixating on his brother's orb, over a mile away. Even in the shadow of the rising sun, the light-consuming void of Blaarjiim's orb is unmistakable. "I've made my decision. No apology you make will sway my soul. Go to my brother and-"

Suddenly, from the direction of the Archdemon, a horrible monstrous scream erupts in the din. Something alien and decidedly non-demon howls in rage. Amelia and Hoarhiim both cease their conversation for a moment and gasp.

A gigantic dragon, made entirely of bone and decomposed skin, bursts from the ground and leaps at Diablo. The winged beast, nearly as big as the Third Emperor, rips and tears at Diablo viciously. Atop the dragon rides Mephisto, Duke of Mist.

"Kss! Behold! My mossst prized posssesssion! The corpssse of the lassst dragon! The ultimate weapon to ssslay my enemiesss!"

The undead dragon unleashes a torrent of acrid green balefire upon the Archdemon, draconic breath which melts flesh and bone alike. Diablo roars in rage and blocks the gout of flame with one of his arms. The limb melts into a puddle before him, proving useless against the dragon's breath. Diablo howls angrily and jumps at the dragon.

Diablo grapples the undead behemoth with his three remaining arms, while simultaneously lashing his tentacles out and biting at the monster, only to yank back and hiss in pain as mouthfuls of acid dissolve their teeth away. The tentacles wilt and melt apart, flopping to the ground uselessly.

Amelia's eyes widen. "No! I... I can't believe it!"

Hoarhiim, too, stares in shock. "The last dragon?! But... that means..."

Mephisto cackles gleefully. "Keh keh keh! A torrent of sssoulsss, leap forth from the heart of thisss world!"

Immediately, hundreds of ghouls burst from underground, climbing and covering the Archdemon from head to toe, biting and clawing at him. Diablo releases one arm to try and tear them off, but doing so only frees the dragon's head.

"GRRRROOOOAAARR!"

The undead colossus rears its head back and unloads a torrent of acid-breath right into Diablo's chest. Diablo wheezes and gasps, trying to block the breath, but as his chest melts away, his grip weakens. The ghouls band together and pull him to the ground.

For one moment, Amelia sits beside Hoarhiim. In the next, she vanishes. The young woman explodes in rage and charges toward the battle of the goliaths.

"Leviathan..." Hoarhiim mutters. "You... you were defiled... by the grave-robber. Such sin. Such misery."

Atop the mountains, Satan and Belial watch in stunned silence as Mephisto's ultimate trump card tears Diablo to shreds.

"Mephisto... he..." Satan grapples for words as the Archdemon begins to revert to his base form, all of his energy exhausted. "When did Mephisto get hold of the last dragon?"

Belial shakes her head slowly. "I never knew. I don't think anyone did."

Satan's hand clenches into a fist. "If he wields Leviathan's power, then Mephisto's might exceeds that of any mere Duke. He may even rank higher than an Emperor. Higher than me!"

"Leviathan appears soulless," Belial points out. "He's undead. Perhaps his powers aren't as great as they once were."

Satan calms down noticeably as he spots Amelia racing toward Mephisto. "Hm. Yes. Perhaps. She's quite angry, though."

"Can you blame her?" Belial murmurs. "I doubt she'll be able to rationalize away her pain."

In the fields below, Joan's leg finally finishes regenerating. She pats Catherine and offers a prayer to the gods. "I thank thee for saving my life... sister."

The Hero jumps to her feet, shifting her weight uncomfortably as she adjusts to the regrown limb. Immediately, her eyes lock onto Amelia. "Unbelievable. A mighty demon, a tainted dragon, and the Black Witch. I shan't watch idly as three vile enemies of God battle amongst one another."

It doesn't escape the Hero's notice that the Archdemon is beginning to revert. Indeed, as Joan starts energizing her weapon, she checks him off in her mind, turning her attention instead to the Black Witch.

"The Dragon will have to wait."

Satan leaps off the mountain, racing down it at faster than free-fall speeds as his Eight vectors simultaneously carry Belial and yank into the cliffs, pulling him with incredible force.

He comes to a screeching halt and lowers Belial to the ground.

Suddenly, Barbatos appears in front of them and steps out from a Labyrinth portal. The Duke of Steel stands imposingly over the former First Emperor. "Satan. We leave. No more fighting."

Satan pauses and frowns. "What? Are you giving me an order?"

"Enough death. Enough sorrow. Agares is dead. Beelzebub unconscious. Diablo defeated. The battle is over."

Satan clenches his teeth and looks past Barbatos as Amelia leaps atop the dragon and begins swinging wildly at Mephisto. "Now, you listen here-"

WHAM

Barbatos moves instantly, so fast Satan can't react. A punch with the force of a tactical nuke pounds the First Emperor back against the mountainside, blowing out several metric tons of rock and stone in all directions. Satan instantly dies. His broken corpse rests lifelessly against the cliff's face, sending horror coursing through Belial's veins.

The Duke of Steel points at Belial. "Go. Portal. Take Satan."

Belial stares at him for several seconds with a dumbstruck look etched into every corner of her face. She nods. "Uh... uh huh..."

Barbatos turns away from her without another word and plods across the field to Diablo's shrunken body. The Third Emperor lies comatose in the mud. Mephisto's ghouls leave to focus their attention on the new threat.

Amelia rides the bucking dragon, swinging and punching at Mephisto and screaming incoherently. "I'LL KILL YOU! I'LL FUCKING TEAR YOU APART! HOW DARE YOU!!"

Her attacks pass through his ghostly body over and over, and the cloaked demon cackles. "Keh keh keh! I merely reconssstituted a dead corpssse into sssomething ussseful! You ssshould be happy to sssee your friend one lassst time!"

Tears pour down Amelia's face as hundreds of ghouls begin climbing the dragon to jump and bite at her. Unlike before, however, her wrath boils like lava poured into a pot of water, igniting her latent powers. Thousands of shadow-javelins rush from her body in all directions as she continues to swing at Mephisto. Each partisan impales one ghoul after another. Her mind focuses on nothing but rage as she swings and kicks, yet still, the Duke of Mist stands and laughs maniacally.

Suddenly, a holy spear flies across the field, impaling Amelia's chest. The Black Witch stops mid-swing and gasps. A chain of light yanks her off the dragon with animalistic force.

Amelia sails hundreds of feet away and slams into the mucked-up ground with terrific power, blasting muddy dirt in every direction. She barely catches sight of a massive armored man as the man yanks on the chain again, hurling her body into the air before slamming her into the ground repeatedly.

Mephisto cackles with glee. "Kekekeke! What deliciousss irony that the Black Witch'sss sssummoned warrior hasss turned againssst her!"

Amelia pants and tries to pull the spear of light from her chest. "Ar-Arthur! Stop! I order you to stop!"

The Hero stomps toward Amelia, grabs her by the throat, and lifts her into the air. "I am not Arthur."

The voice, Amelia realizes with a start, is all too familiar.

"J-Joan? No! Nooo!!!"

She tries to kick at the Hero, but Joan slams Amelia into the ground and summons spear after spear, rapidly impaling and stabbing the screaming Black Witch with righteous fury. "Enemy of God! Thy time to live is over! I will send thee to the realm of death wherefore thou belong!"

Amelia screams in terror. "Please!! Nooo!"

Across the plains, Hoarhiim looks away. Sorrow etches into his face. "Such pain. Such ruin. I will transform this planet into a resting place for the damned. I'm sorry, Jason. Amelia, no matter how you care for her, brought this fate upon herself. Perhaps... someday... you will forgive me."

Hoarhiim closes his eyes.

The sun appears over the horizon. Its rays of light warm the land, invigorate the soggy soil, and awaken the planet's creatures.

"That which gives this planet life shall become its reckoning," Hoarhiim mutters softly.

He aims his mind toward the distant sun, tens of millions of miles away. His mind travels across the blackness of space toward the lustrous star which gives the world energy and life.

"I curse this planet... all those who live on it... as well as myself... with death."

"SUPERNOVA!"

Part 052: Everything Into The Void

Joan impales Amelia's throat with a spear. Amelia gags and trembles, unable to speak. Holy energy courses through her body, hitting her with waves of blinding pain. Amelia opens her mouth to beg for mercy, but nothing comes out.

Joan closes her eyes. "In the days of Jesus Christ, son of God, we punished enemies of God with crucifixion. How fitting that you will perish in a manner befitting a sinner. Thy blood will water the land, freeing us from your wickedness. God will judge thee for all thy sins. In the name of the Father... the Son... and the Holy Ghost... I sentence thee to death. You shall be the first human I kill, and thusly, I condemn myself to the fires of Hell as well."

Amelia looks to the side slightly and stares at Hoarhiim.

No, please. Hoarhiim. Jason! Don't let her kill me! I'll be a good girl! I'll be good...

Hoarhiim's glowing eyes close. He speaks a word and vanishes.

Blaarjiim appears in Amelia's mind as little more than a hazy, indistinct face. "My... queen. I... failed you. I couldn't protect you. I even hurt you."

Amelia closes her eyes as Joan begins summoning holy energy to her palm.

Blaarjiim... help me! They took Levvy... they're hurting me! Jason left! Where are you? I can't see anything...

The sky brightens noticeably as the radiant energy from the exploding star approaches the planet.

"I'm too far away, my queen. I cannot aid you. If only I hadn't forced you to walk the path of darkness... perhaps..."

Mephisto watches silently as the Hero prepares to unleash Holy Energy upon the Black Witch's pinned body. "Pity. I wanted to dessstroy her myssself."

"Mephisto." Barbatos's voice catches the Duke of Mist's attention. "Leave now. Danger approaches. Sky."

Without another word, Barbatos creates a portal and steps inside. Mephisto frowns and looks up into the air. Only now does he notice the increasing light in the sky far beyond how the sun might normally shine. "What? The ssstar? Did the Overlordsss...?! No! My dragon! I can't unsssummon it quickly enough!"

He glances at his giant winged beast and screams in rage. "Cursssesss! CURSSSESSS!"

Mephisto leaps into Barbatos's portal, and it seals shut behind him.

Joan ignores the demon and unleashes a holy blast of energy at Amelia, bombarding the Black Witch's body with agonizing pain. Before she can wipe the girl off the face of the planet, the undead dragon leaps at the Hero and slams her into the ground with its powerful claws. The massive monster screams angrily and repeatedly pounds its spiked tail against the Hero's crusader aura.

"Gahhh! Fetid beast! Servant of the damned!" Joan struggles desperately to fight the dragon off, but its balefire tears apart her aura bit by bit, until, with one final attack, the dragon impales the Hero through her chest with one of its massive claws. Joan smacks at the claw uselessly, only to be rewarded with a terrible death as the dragon lurches its head down and tears her torso apart, chewing her into pulp.

Amelia, her body beaten and broken, stares at the dragon and smiles.

Levvy... you... saved me... in the end...

Hundreds of miles away, a single sword lies propped against a rock, having been washed away by the floodwaters only minutes earlier. Dellfingler coughs weakly. "Ah, shucks. I'm done for. So this is how it ends, eh? All alone in a muddy field. Oh well. There're worse ways to go."

Despite his pain, Dellfingler chuckles. "At least I made friends. It was a good life."

The sky burns away in an instant as the exploding star engulfs the planet in apocalyptic heat. The last thing every resident of the dead world sees is a light as bright as Creation itself.

Their souls scorch to ash, leaving nothing behind.

The remaining Council Members stand in a circle with three bodies in the center; those of Bael, Agares, and Diablo. The screams and cries of humans and imps at the River Styx go unnoticed by the leaders of demonkind.

Satan gasps for breath and clutches his chest. He scowls at Barbatos. "Bastard! How dare you strike your leader?! You've made a grave mistake, boy!"

Belial quickly holds him back. "Satan, Satan... please. Calm down. Barbatos would never do such a thing unless he thought it necessary."

Barbatos's imposing form stands over the comatose Diablo, lying in the center of the room beside Agares and Bael. Having traveled around, recovering those he could, Barbatos ignores Satan's raving.

"Enough war."

Satan bites off his anger with a hiss. "No matter your excuse, I won't forget this treachery. The Black Queen was within my grasp! All I had to do was strangle the life out of her, and I'd be free! Now what?! She can unsummon me at any moment! She-"

"Sssatan." Mephisto interrupts the First Emperor's ranting. "Ssshe isss no longer an isssue. You left before ssseeing what happened... but I did not. Arthur unleassshed hisss full might againssst her. Ssshe wasss powerlesss to ssstop him."

Mephisto continues. "Besssidesss... the Overlordsss mussst have intervened. Polarisss'sss ssstar... it detonated."

Satan gapes at the Duke of Mist. "What? It did?"

Barbatos shakes his head. "Not Overlords. Wordsmith. Hoarhiim."

A hush falls over the group.

Belial speaks next, feeling her heart palpitate. "Wait. If... if the sun is exploding, then... won't that kill the Black Queen?"

Someone coughs. Everyone turns their attention to Beelzebub as he strides up, eying Belial warily. The Baron of Flame's suit is nothing but tatters and rags, yet he struts proudly, as though he were adorned in kingly attire.

"She survived once. She might do so again. However, we believe she escaped the first time. If the sun is going to explode, then it's unlikely anyone, even her, could survive it."

Barbatos glares at the young demon. "She will die."

Belial taps Satan's shoulder hesitantly. "Love... if she dies, won't you as well?"

Satan scoffs. "Of course not! I have thousands of souls left! Once she's gone, I'm free. I will return to my position as First Emperor."

"But someone told me... they said that if Amelia died, you would too."

The First Emperor pauses and stares down at Diablo. "Unlikely. I don't know the powers of her magic, but-"

He pauses mid-sentence. "Wh-what?"

Mephisto cocks his head. "Emperor Sssatan?"

"This... this sensation... what is..."

Satan staggers backward. In the middle of the council, Agares' body starts disintegrating into ash. The effect isn't noticeable for a second or two, but within moments his body transforms from flesh and bone into something resembling both sand and rust, disappearing forever.

Belial's eyes widen. "No! Satan! You're going to..."

The First Emperor slumps forward and falls to the ground. His vectors go limp. Belial catches him just before he hits the Labyrinth's floor.

Satan wheezes and gasps as Belial stares at him in horror. "L-Lilia... Lilia... I was wrong... oh, Devils... I didn't know..."

She presses him against her breast. "I knew this would happen! No... I don't want to lose you a second time! You promised me you'd live! You promised me!!"

Tears erupt in Belial's eyes as she stares at Satan's paling face. His breath comes in ragged gasps. Soon his chest begins to melt away, just as Agares' did. "No... no... no..."

Satan exhales one last time, and his body fizzles into ash, scattering all over the floor. Belial shrieks in horror. "NOOOOO!"

Barbatos, Mephisto, and Beelzebub all stiffen and gaze in silence as they watch the hysterical woman frantically grab at their leader's ashes, doing anything she can to try and bring him back.

Mephisto's eyes darken. Even I cannot ressstore one who hasss turned to dussst. Curssse you for an eternity, Black Witch. Even in death, you damn usss with your black magic.

"Hoarhiim? Where are we?"

I ask the question automatically, once I realize that I'm no longer dreaming. Vague memories and emotions appear in my mind, but I can't tell fiction from reality.

The orb in my hand glows silently for a moment until Hoarhiim appears.

"Jason. We're back in the Labyrinth."

"Oh." I stare ahead silently, blinking twice as I notice something surprising. "I can see, again. With my eyes, I mean. What changed?"

Hoarhiim stares at me unsmilingly. "A lot did. Jason... Amelia was irredeemable, as was my brother. They nearly killed Phoebe and her succubus friend. I fought them off as best as I could."

All the memories come rushing back. My battle with Satan. Healing myself, only for Blaarjiim to tear me apart. Allowing Hoarhiim to take over.

"Wait, did Phoebe make it out? Where's Amelia? What's going on?!"

Hoarhiim holds up his hand. "We haven't much time left together, Jason. I need to tell you something important. Please listen carefully."

I nod dumbly, still wondering about Phoebe. "Okay. What is it? What do you mean we don't have much time left together?"

"I unleashed the power of Wordsmithing. You have yet to discover the majority of its applications, but I assure you, Wordsmithing is the most powerful magic that has ever existed. I forced the planet's sun to initiate a supernova. It will engulf the world within minutes."

My heart pounds. "You did?"

"Yes. My brother and I share the same well of power. If one of us dies, the other will as well. When the supernova hits... he will perish."

It doesn't take long for me to connect the dots. "So, you're going to die as well?"

Hoarhiim bows his head. "My brother and Amelia are evil, Jason. However, Amelia used to be a kindhearted girl. My brother tainted her soul over time. In return for taking their lives... giving up mine is a sacrifice I'm willing to make."

He continues. "There's more. I won't be around for much longer. The demons know about your Wordsmithing now. They will find ways to counteract it. Phoebe is safe, but won't stay that way for long.

You must master Wordsmithing and save humanity, Jason. You are the last Hero. If you die, the demons will rule the galaxy until the end of time."

"O... okay. I understand."

A pause follows. Hoarhiim clears his throat. "Ahh... the demons are not the only threat. There exists another entity you must beware. The Overlords. They're powerful beings who-"

Hoarhiim freezes for a moment and clutches his chest. "Ahhh! Gnuh- gah!"

"Hoarhiim? What's wrong?!"

The Deity of Light forces a smile. "It is done. M-my brother... is gone... as is Amelia. I'm sorry, Jason... I had... I had to... to stop them... no matter the-"

Hoarhiim's image freezes in my mind, almost as if someone had paused him mid-sentence.

"No..."

Hoarhiim's body boils away, and his face freezes into a look of agony.

"Hoarhiim... HOARHIIM?!"

His orb begins to shake and tremble in my grasp. Then, it heats up rapidly to a scalding temperature, forcing me to drop it. The moment it hits the floor, it pops like a balloon and dissolves into vapor.

The moment Hoarhiim's orb explodes, his face dissolves from my mind, vanishing from existence.

Silence follows.

I stare ahead blankly at the wall for several moments. Sinking to my knees, I mumble a word. "Locate."

My word of power returns to me after mere moments, revealing nothing.

I can't find Amelia.

I can't find Hoarhiim.

They're all gone. Everyone is dead.

Now, I am truly, completely... alone.

Part 053: The Council Regroups, A New Hierarchy!

"Ohh... grahhh... my head hurts..." Bael mumbles and mutters, blinking his eyes open. The remaining members of the Demon Council, including Beelzebub, stand around Bael and stare at him silently. "Where am I? What happened?"

"Emperor Diablo wiped the floor with you," Mephisto hisses. "Ssso much for the mighty Balrog."

Beelzebub crosses his arms and glares at the Undead King. "You're one to talk. You weren't doing anything for most of the battle, just skulking underground."

"My undead dragon sssaved usss from Diablo'sss wrath!" Mephisto retorts. "Meanwhile, Barbatosss pulled you out of a ditch."

"That he did," Belial remarks blandly. She usually might display rage or anger or even a smirk, but ever since Satan melted to ash in her arms an hour before, she's stood against a wall and stared into the maw of the River Styx.

Beelzebub doesn't reply. He merely glares at Belial for a moment, then averts his eyes.

Bael staggers to his feet and rubs his back. Suddenly, he spots Diablo's slumbering form beside him. "W-whoa! Boss?! What the heck?! I know he likes ta' sleep on the job, but damn!"

"He's not asleep," Belial murmurs. "He's comatose. When Diablo last assumed his Archdemon form, he didn't awaken for over a hundred years. The same will probably happen again."

"At such a terrible time," Beelzebub mutters. "Tch. The humans are growing in power, and this fool has to take a century-long nap."

Bael's dumbfounded expression melts away. A look of malice appears in his eyes. "Hey. Pup. Watch your fucking mouth. Diablo nearly died fighting the Black-Bitch's pet. We were battling King devil-damned Arthur. I bet you don't even know who that is."

Every face in the group turns to look at Beelzebub. He shrugs. "I do not."

Barbatos, ever the silent one, shifts his body, his metal grinding together with a sharp scraping sound. "Hero-King. Legendary."

"Yeah, what Tin-Can said," Bael replies, jerking his thumb toward Barbatos. "I remember the Ancient Times, back when Arthur walked the Earth. We once sent out three legions of demons to track him down. They never came back."

"Maybe he offered them a job," Beelzebub says sardonically. "Whatever. The point is Diablo is out of the game, and so is Agares."

A moment passes. Beelzebub clenches his fist and stares at it. "I killed my mentor during the battle. I always dreamed of overcoming him, but... not like that. Not with his body controlled by a filthy human."

Mephisto's smoldering eyes fixate on Beelzebub. "You defeated the Duke of Reptilesss? Imposssible. He wasss one of the greatessst demon warriorsss of all time."

Bael rubs his back and grumbles to himself for a moment. "Hmph. You beat Agares, eh? Even if the Black Queen's magic sapped the old bat's power, that still ain't bad. Maybe what they say about you ain't true after all."

Beelzebub glares at the Duke of Pain. "What do they say about me?"

"It involves the size of your demonhood," Bael replies with a wink.

Beelzebub growls a curse under his breath. "Fat slob."

Barbatos uses the lull in conversation to speak up. "Wordsmith. Jason Hiro. Very powerful."

Mephisto clenches his fist. "I ssstill cannot fathom what happened. The flessshbag blew up a ssstar. Such power isss on par with the Overlordsss."

Bael blinks. "Uhh, come again? Wait, you mean that little kid? The boy who was fightin' Satan?"

Belial winces at the mention of her lover's name, but Bael doesn't notice. Beelzebub replies instead. "While you took a dirt nap, the Black Queen dueled me. I had her against the ropes until Belial interfered. After Belial launched a sneak attack and caught me off-guard, the Wordsmith-"

"It was a fair fight, not a sneak attack," Belial says, cutting Beelzebub off. "You don't need to lie to hide your insecurity. There wasn't a chance you could beat me, the Second Emperor, even if you tied both of my hands behind my back."

Beelzebub's teeth gnash together. "Why are you even here?! You betrayed the demons! It was you who guarded the humans at the Core when I attacked! You damned turncoat!"

Belial slowly licks her plump red lips. "I have my reasons. I refuse to allow wanton slaughter. Humans have suffered for long enough at the hands of demons."

"As have we at theirs!" Bael joins Beelzebub in facing down the temptress. "You left for ages, and then you popped back up only to cavort with Satan! You stinkin' whore! Where's your demon pride? Where's your sense of obligation to your people?!"

While fumes erupt from Bael's nose, Belial sighs. "I have none. I don't pick a side; I merely oppose war and violence in all its forms... especially against the weak."

"Well spoken," Barbatos mutters.

Bael ignores the Duke of Steel and makes a mouth flapping motion with his hands. "Especially against the weak. Listen to you. Weak. Useless. A dumb broad who cares so little about other demons she helps the enemy! I guess you've forgotten what the humans did to us during the Energy Wars, eh?"

"I didn't forget," Belial says, her voice almost a whisper. "But that was a thousand human generations ago. They don't deserve to suffer for the sins of their ancestors."

"Agree to disssagree," Mephisto interrupts, a note of caution in his voice. "Ceassse this bickering. We have more important mattersss that require dissscusssion."

Bael and Beelzebub glower at the succubus for several seconds before looking away. "Yeah? Like what?"

Mephisto's eyes swivel between Bael and Beelzebub for a moment. "Agaresss isss dead. Diablo isss incapacitated. Belial isss the lassst Emperor left, assside from the reclusssive Firssst."

Belial narrows her eyes at the ghostly apparition. "And?"

"We require a new Emperor... and a new Duke," Beelzebub says, finishing Mephisto's thoughts for him. He turns to Belial. "Unless you're planning to lead for once, your highness."

"Pass," Belial says, rolling her eyes. "I never asked for this job."

"Then it's settled," Beelzebub continues. "Bael, as the First Duke, will become the new Emperor. At least until Diablo awakens. I'll become a Duke to replace Agares, and-"

"Whoa whoa whoa, I'ma hafta stop you right there," Bael says, waggling his finger at the young demon. "You got two things wrong, kid. I ain't smart enough ta' lead. I ain't Emperor material. Someone else has gotta deal with that crap. The other thing is that you ain't gonna become a Duke just like that."

Beelzebub scowls. "I defeated Agares! That proves that I'm qualified to be a Duke!"

Barbatos nods. "He did. I found Agares' body."

"And then it melted into dust. Just... just like Satan's..." Belial hiccups involuntarily. She looks away. "So much pain and death. It's always due to the greed of men."

"Save it for someone who cares," Bael replies. "Look, Beelzy, I'll level with you. We ain't letting some no-name punk who didn't even see the end of the Energy Wars into the ranks of the Dukes, understand? And as for the new Third Emperor..."

Bael slowly turns to stare at the crowd of demons. "Yikes. We got metal-mouth over here, never says a word. Boney-boy with his creepy ghouls, and the pup. Great selection."

"I defeated Diablo!" Mephisto lurches toward Bael. "If you won't asssume the mantle of Emperor, then I will! My powersss ssstopped Diablo during hisss deadly rampage! You didn't lassst ten sssecondsss!"

A drop of drool creeps down Bael's mouth as the fat demon stares blankly at Mephisto. "Uh-huh. Great. I'm first Duke, so you ain't becoming Emperor unless you convince me otherwise." He pauses to look at Belial. "Or the wench, I suppose. Got anything to say? You do outrank me, technically."

She shakes her head. "Not especially. If you don't want to be Emperor, I don't blame you. Barbatos?"

The Duke of Steel tilts his head toward the succubus, the metal grinding together unpleasantly as he does.

"No."

"Excellent. That leaves Mephisto and the scheming fox as your two candidates. Oh, wait, they're both schemers." Belial facepalms. "The future leader of demonkind will be one of two psychopaths. Devils save us-"

Click. Click. Click.

The sound of high heels echoing off the tiled ground around the River Styx catches everyone's attention. Belial pauses mid-sentence, and a look of despair appears on her face.

"Oh, no. Kill me."

A demure female voice breaks out in the din. "Tsk, tsk. I'll be happy to oblige, Belial. Present your neck, and I'll slit your throat post-haste."

Bael slurps up the drool leaking from his mouth, only to slobber even more aggressively. A moment later, a demoness strides up. Her pure white high heels and stockings are the first things to come into view as she rounds the corner.

The white satin covering her legs blends together elegantly with her luscious red skin and perfectly contoured body. While Belial's black fetishy-outfit leaves little to the imagination, the newcomer's white dress and gloves give her a prim and proper look, as if she were a demon princess awaiting her knight. Indeed, the only color she wears is white, to fashion herself uniformly, making her skin pop out wherever it appears.

The succubus doesn't raise her head from her palm as the new woman stops next to the group.

"Ose."

"Belial."

The newcomer, Ose, Baron of Infiltration, flips her long, white, butt-length hair back, adjusting her glasses a moment later. "Forgive me, boys, but I couldn't help overhearing your conversation."

"You weren't anywhere nearby," Beelzebub says, suspicion in his voice.

"Astral projection. I'm a woman of many talents." Ose smiles cutely at the confused man, only to glare at Belial. "Unlike the 'woman of many lovers' over there."

"Your jealousy reeks of desperation," Belial mutters. "Why are you here?"

"Why, to toss my ballot in for the position of Third Emperor, of course!"

Bael immediately straightens himself out. "Wha-? You? A woman? Look, Mephisto ain't the best-looking, but at least he's a Duke. I don't know what makes you think you're fit to lead, Ose, but-"

Ose slides a leg out from one of the slits going up both sides of her dress and presses her voluptuous body against Bael. "Oh, Bael! Surely you don't think just because I'm a woman I'm not qualified for the job! If Belial can be an Emperor, why not meee~?"

She bats her eyes like a butterfly at Bael, but he maintains his resistance. "Yeah, exactly. Look what happened the last time some broad took command."

Ose presses her finger against his chest for a moment, then pulls away. Immediately her attitude shifts, as if she were casually tossing aside a facade. "True enough. Using Belial as my example isn't something I want to do, anyway."

The ice in her voice could freeze a glass of water solid.

Mephisto rises to his full height of just over five feet to stare up at the beauty towering over him. She and Belial, being the same height, stand nearly a foot taller than the small demon.

"Ossse, I am the one who ssshould lead the demonsss. You are but a Baron, while I am a Duke."

Ose stares down at the Undead King icily. "I see. So, Mephisto, you plan to lead demonkind as the Emperor, then? Have you any strategies for the future?"

The Duke of Mist cocks his head curiously. "Hmm? I do not follow."

"The humans. I've been watching them. They're rapidly accelerating their technological growth. I watched the Wordsmith as he built a large-scale Replication factory. Do you know what that is?"

Every other demon shakes their heads at once.

"I thought not. It uses energy induction to power a hypo-compensator with dilithium supplements. This, in turn, folds space to create quantum inductions, forming matter from energy."

Bael nods slowly. The drool makes a roaring comeback. "Uhh... I don't get it."

"It makes big weapons that go boom," Ose says, smiling sweetly once again. "I watched with my projection as the Wordsmith unleashed his frightening powers against the lot of you. You haven't a clue what you're dealing with, but I do. I will make the perfect Emperor until Diablo awakens."

Beelzebub stares at Ose silently, unmoved by her beauty. "You're weak. I've already surpassed you in power. If you deserve to be Emperor, so do I."

Ose reaches up to adjust a red bow set against her white hair. Her smile melts away as she turns to face Beelzebub. "Have you not been listening, child? I am not stating that I deserve to be Emperor, but that I am the best choice. I am older than Mephisto and have fought in numerous wars against humanity. My mother ensured that I was the best equipped to fight humans as their technological limits increased. The only reason I am physically weak is due to the lack of a worthwhile enemy."

Bael rubs his chin thoughtfully. "Make Ose the new Emperor, huh? Well, rumors say you took down an entire Britannian command post all by yourself. That's how you got the nickname 'Ghost.' Still, I dunno. I'm not keen on having two women for Emperors."

Ose shakes her head. "It's more like one since only one of us is going to do her job. Isn't that right, Belial?"

The succubus throws her hands in the air. "Choose whomever you please. I tire of this nonsense. I'll be returning to the humans. Attack them at your peril."

Ose seethes for a moment as Belial starts to walk away. "Nothing worse than a traitor who cavorts with the enemy."

"Nothing worse than a hypocrite," Belial retorts, ignoring any further comments.

The Second Emperor trots away, her black high-heels clicking just as Ose's did. A minute later, she vanishes, leaving Ose alone with all the men.

Barbatos bows his head slightly. "Farewell."

Making a motion with his gauntlets, the Duke of Steel creates a portal to his mermaid lair and steps through, sealing it behind him. Before the portal seals, several mermaids cry his name out in excitement. "Ooooh! Barbatos is back! Yay!"

Afterward, only Bael, Mephisto, Beelzebub, and Ose remain, along with the comatose Diablo.

"Tch. Two backstabbers and a woman. The pickings for Third Emperor are mighty slim these days," Bael grumbles to himself.

"Well, Duke of Pain, there is... one other... one who you might consider a worthy Emperor." Ose bats her eyes innocently at Bael, but it takes him a moment to understand who she means.

"Gressil?! No! Devils, no! I'd sooner castrate myself than appoint that gross monster to lead all of demonkind."

Mephisto shudders visibly. "Even for a demon... he lovesss pain too much. I've never ssseen one who torturesss and maimsss like Gresssil does."

Beelzebub glances between the other three demons quizzically. "Gressil? I believe I've heard of him. Who is he? Why the violent reactions to his name?"

Bael grunts. "I'm the devil-damned Duke of Pain, and I like torment less than he does."

Ose waves her hand flippantly. "Gressil is supposedly the worst demon ever to live. The rumors are all lies."

"You take after your mother," Bael says. "I walked in on one of his victims once. I couldn't have had fun with what was left of her even if I tried."

"Every man has desires," Ose counters. "Gressil's are... more extreme than polite society would like. In any case, if Gressil is out of the count, then I say you promote me. I studied in human colleges for over two hundred years. I know their psychology, the way they think, how they build their machines, and things you can't imagine. I helped design the multiple-world concept for the chattel, and I created the machinery in the Core. It isn't enough to kill humans; you must break their spirit and overwhelm them with sorrow. You have to make them beg for the release of death."

Mephisto meets her gaze evenly. "You are kindred with Gresssil. Your effeminate body beliesss the sssinissster malice within."

"Perhaps," Ose concedes. "The difference is that Gressil tortures and maims for pleasure. For me, it's business. Nothing more, nothing less."

Bael sighs. "Haaah... fine. I'll allow you to become the new Emperor."

"Really? Yay!" Ose bursts with joy and jumps at Bael, hugging and kissing his cheek over and over. "Oh, Bael! You're such a sweetheart! Thankyouthankyouthankyou!"

Bael, seizing an opportunity, reaches down with one hand to cop a quick feel. "Heh, I'm always happy to please-"

A massive bolt of lightning arcs off Ose's posterior, knocking Bael's hand away and jolting his system for a moment.

Ose pulls away from the Duke of Pain. Her expression turns sour. "You just had to get grabby."

"Eh. It's in my blood," Bael says, shaking the numbness out of his palm.

Mephisto broods silently. Cursssesss. I usssed the lassst dragon, my ultimate trump card, but it wasss all for nothing. Thisss worthlesss female ssstole the title of Emperor right from my grasssp!

Several seconds later, Bael turns to Beelzebub. "You know what, pup? I've got an idea. Still wanna be a Duke?"

Beelzebub narrows his eyes. "I do. What do you propose?"

Bael looks away, kneels down, and picks up Diablo's hefty body. "A test. Meet me in the Slaughterseum in three days. If you show up, you can't leave until you pass or die."

"Why? What are you planning?"

Bael smirks. "You'll see. If you don't want to feel agony wrack your body, don't come. I won't blame you."

Beelzebub seethes. "You make me take a test but not... not this woman?! She'll be Emperor!"

"I already took a test," Ose replies. "The skillset an Emperor needs is very different from the one a Duke needs. Emperors lead. Dukes fight. That's the way it's always worked."

She pauses to poke at the cute little black horns on her head. "Speaking of which, I think I should take my fill of souls now, don't you, Bael? Sweetie?"

"Go for it," Bael grunts. He hefts Diablo onto his shoulder and winks at Beelzebub. "I'll be seeing you. Three days."

"Three days," Beelzebub echoes.

As the Duke of Pain and Baron of Flames part ways, Mephisto glares at the woman leaning down to dip her neatly trimmed nails into the River Styx.

You'll regret crosssing me, Ossse...

Part 054: Prepare For Trouble... Make It Double

Hoarhiim... Amelia... Blaarjiiim. They're all dead. I killed them.

My boots clomp against the hardened dirt labyrinth floor, echoing into the distance. My thousand-yard stare makes my eyes burn, but I can't bring myself to blink.

The Crown's mental map says I'll be arriving at the Core, soon. Another few turns, and I'm there. New hallways appear as the Labyrinth shifts around, and now there are more paths to arrive at the Core than ever before.

No. I didn't kill Amelia. Hoarhiim did.

Is there a difference? I touched his orb and allowed him to use my body. I should have understood his intentions.

A different inner voice speaks to me.

You did the right thing. Amelia devoured two worlds worth of humans. She was worse than Hitler, Stalin, and all the other mass-murdering dictators in history put together. Don't beat yourself up.

Maybe. Does taking the life of someone who committed an atrocity justify my actions? Murder is still murder.

True, but there's a difference in degree, and the matter of justice. If you murder someone for a selfish reason, that makes you a criminal, but if you kill someone to protect yourself or others, that makes you a Hero.

Amelia seemed like she didn't want to kill anyone else. What if Blaarjiim was the cause of all her psychopathic tendencies? What if she never killed anyone ever again?

You can't know the future. Whether one day or one millennium from now, she might have returned to her evil ways. It's a good thing she's dead. Besides, eye for an eye, right? The people she murdered would thank you for returning the favor.

Sighing, I round the last corner, and the Great Doors to the Labyrinth Core loom closed before me.

I guess. I still feel sick to my stomach.

You were ready to kill her with Wordsmithing, remember? You opened with a killing spell before doing anything else. Don't be a hypocrite. Accept what happened and move on. If you still feel awful, improve the lives of others. Be a force for positivity.

I slow to a stop in front of the sealed doors and sigh. My head hurts. My body aches. Not because of physical pain, but because of emotional and psychological torment. I've spent the better part of a day trudging through the Labyrinth to arrive at the Core, second-guessing my actions the whole way.

Maybe that second inner voice is right. Accept what happened and move on.

The problem is: I don't know if I can.

Pressing my hand against the door, I pause. Shit. Opening this thing last time nearly killed me. How am I going to get inside? I should have installed a doorbell before I left.

A minute passes, then a light appears in my might. Teleportation. I feel like I've done it before. Did I? The memory seems recent, yet not. Am I going crazy? Well, it might be a bad idea. I wouldn't want to materialize inside of someone and die a horrible chimeric death.

A minute passes as I tap my feet thoughtfully. I could pound on the door violently and hope someone hears. Whoa! What happened to the turrets? They're a burnt mess! Oh... fuck. Beelzebub. That's right. He attacked the Core. Good god, these should have been able to hold him off. He must have brought a massive army.

Using the Crown, I speak two words of power. "Repair. Repair."

The turrets rapidly reconfigure themselves, transforming once again into death-spewing weapons of war. I reconfigure them to add even more firepower before returning my attention to the barrier before me.

I should probably build a hundred more turrets later. I thought with their explosive power that two would be enough, but I suppose I was wrong.

Another lightbulb appears in my head. Aha! I know how I can get inside.

"Visualize."

Using my Wordsmithing, I open my mind up to the universe around me, sending it past the doors to see the inside of the Core. Inside, dozens of humans and monsters mill around, but luckily the area past the doors isn't blocked.

Pulling my mind back, I blink for a moment as a sickening realization hits me. I barely see anyone inside. Usually, there are thousands of people working their feet to the bone... but I barely saw two hundred. How many did Beelzebub kill?! That bastard!

"Teleport."

My body instantly appears on the other side, a faint whoosh of air all that signals my arrival. Nobody notices.

Trudging forward, I spare a few glances around the place. To my left, a small but deep hole in the wall signals the use of that restricted railgun prototype I was working on before I left. Someone must have pulled it out against Beelzebub and his army. I hope it didn't misfire.

Scorch points, black splotches, and severe burns pop out of the usually monotonous scenery here and there. Destroyed equipment, overturned tables, and many other marks of destruction signal a battle that was recently fought, yet hasn't had enough time pass for cleanup to finish.

After fifteen seconds of standing and staring at the devastation, one man notices me. "Hero, sir? Is that you?!"

I nod. "Yeah. Who's- err, where's Phoebe? Neil? Anyone?"

The man's face whitens. "Ah, General Adams. He hasn't felt well since the attack a few days ago. Everyone was worried about you, Mister Hero, sir. I'll tell General Adams that you're here. As for Miss Berthold..." The young man points across the room to a field of body bags, all with tags sticking out. Phoebe stands among them, unzipping one near the head. She winces and looks away from whatever its contents might be, then nods to a man beside her with a clipboard and says something I can't hear.

"What's going on?"

The soldier swallows. "We're still identifying the deceased, sir. Miss Berthold, well, she knows everyone's name. I don't know how, but she does. If it weren't for her, we wouldn't know what to do."

"That's my girl."

I nod at the soldier, and he returns the gesture, then quickly walks away to alert Adams to my presence.

Quietly, I walk over to Phoebe. Once I draw near, I hear her talking to the man with the clipboard as she unzips another bag's head. "Umm. Uhh, Jonas. I think his name is Jonas."

Clipboard Guy jots something down."Last name?"

"Ahh. Mmm. It's right on the tip of my tongue. John... Lidric? I think?"

He pauses for a moment. "John? Didn't you say Jonas?"

"Right, yes. Jonas Lidric."

"Alright. Want me to add John, too, just in case?"

Phoebe sighs and zips the bag up. "I guess. Sorry."

"You've been at this for ten hours, Miss Berthold. Why not take a break? You look exhausted."

I pause a few feet away. Clipboard Guy looks up and sees me, but Phoebe answers him before he can acknowledge my presence. "The sooner we identify these people, the sooner we can give them a proper burial. It's undignified for men to rot inside of bags, especially when they died so honorably."

Clipboard Guy coughs. "Ahm! Uh, yes. Say, Miss Berthold. Can you identify the one standing behind you?"

"Standing? What do you-" She turns and nearly smacks into my chest. "Uwah! Jason? Oh, you're back!! Jason!!"

She leaps into my arms, and a huge smile comes to my face, in spite of all the death surrounding us.

Tears fill Phoebe's eyes. "Oh, god! I was worried about you! First Hoarhiim sent me away and then I was in this big chamber with a bunch of mermaids and this scary-looking demon guy only he wasn't all that scary and he seemed really nice but then I talked to him and the mermaids all said hello and he opened up a portal and sent me here to the Core and then when I got here the place was still a horrible mess so I had to pitch in and help so I've been working nonstop to try and get all the bodies-"

"Whoa, whoa, Phoebe! Haha! Slow down, girl!" I quickly press a finger to her soft pink lips and lower her to the ground. "Sorry I was busy. Um. I uh..."

A moment passes. Phoebe pulls away as I struggle to find the right words. "Well, the battle ended. Hoarhiim destroyed the entire planet. Amelia is dead."

Relief washes over Phoebe's face. "Ah, so it's over. You must be relieved."

My voice cracks as a lump forms in my throat. "Y-yeah. Something like that. Hoarhiim died, too."

Phoebe freezes like a deer caught in the headlights. "W-what? No! Oh, Jason... I'm sorry. I didn't- I mean, he did? When? How?"

Clipboard Guy averts his eyes and quietly nods at me behind Phoebe's back, then walks away.

"When Hoarhiim destroyed the planet and killed Amelia, he destroyed Blaarjiim's orb as well. Since the two of them are linked, Hoarhiim died."

Phoebe rubs her head and winces. "God- I didn't realize. You must be devastated."

Images of Hoarhiim and Amelia appear in my mind. "Yeah. It doesn't look like you're having fun either, though. I wish I'd been here to help fight. Beelzebub brought one hell of an army."

Phoebe reaches over and takes my hand in hers. "It was only one demon, Jason. Beelzebub didn't bring anyone else. Don't blame yourself for our losses. I saw the battle you fought. The Demon Emperors and Dukes were pure insanity. If we couldn't handle one Lord, then it was my fault for not equipping our forces properly."

"What?" I blink in surprise. "Oh, come on, Phoebe. Don't blame yourself. I'm supposed to be the Hero. I should have been here to save humanity."

Phoebe sniffles and shakes her head. "Jason, no matter how powerful you are, you're only one man. You can't be in two places at once. We need to protect ourselves. I had the Crown and spent more time replicating technology to improve life in Hero City rather than improving our armaments. That's why I say it's my fault."

Sighing, I lean down and kiss Phoebe passionately, holding her lips against mine for a few seconds before pulling away. "Let's agree to disagree."

Phoebe blushes. "Sure."

The soldier from earlier comes walking up to us, hesitating for a moment until I look at him. "Ahh, Mister Hero, Miss Berthold. General Adams would like to see the two of you as soon as possible. He's in his office."

"Alright. We'll be right over."

I smile at the lad, but he nods back austerely. Something's got him spooked, but I don't know what.

After he walks away, Phoebe closes the gap between us and presses herself against me, hugging me tightly. "After Beelzebub attacked, I spoke to Neil. I don't know if he was anxious or desperate, but something about him was off."

"People cope with loss differently," I reply, rubbing the back of her soft white hair gently.

"It wasn't that, Jason. He was looking for someone to blame. He blamed you, me... even Samantha. She saved us from Beelzebub, but Neil seemed to think she may have even instigated the ambush."

"Samantha?"

Phoebe pulls away and nods. "Don't you remember? That succubus girl. The one who-" Phoebe's eyes widen. "Oh... oh my god! Is she okay? Is she alive?! When Hoarhiim healed me, she was lying in a pool of blood!"

"She's fine," I say. "Hoarhiim healed her. All of the demons escaped off-planet before the sun exploded. Only Amelia and Hoarhiim died... only them."

Another lump forms in my throat. "Shit. Even Satan got away. Hoarhiim blew up an entire planet to kill one girl. Senseless."

"Satan." Phoebe stares at me meaningfully. "As I recall, Satan is Samantha's lover."

"What? They're an item? But... that means the demoness who saved the Core from Beelzebub was-!"

Phoebe winces. "Jason. Things are never as simple as they seem. Samantha leaped in front of Satan to protect you and me. Don't you remember? She's a good person with a kind heart. Don't judge her just because she's a demon."

"Right. Sorry."

"It's fine." Phoebe waves my apology off. "Neil said something similar. After all, she's the Second Emperor of all demons. Even I feel slightly suspicious of her."

"And you treat everyone wonderfully," I point out.

"Hah. True. Look, let's chat with Neil. I hope he isn't like he was after the attack."

I take Phoebe's hand and start walking away from the bodies toward Neil's office. "Oh? Did something happen?"

Phoebe doesn't meet my gaze. "W-well, he got a little angry. It wasn't anything serious."

"Okay. Like I said, people cope with loss differently. Losing thousands of good soldiers will affect a military man differently than it would you or me."

Phoebe doesn't reply for several seconds.

"Yeah."

A few minutes later, we arrive outside Neil's office. His giant oaken door is already cracked several inches, so I knock lightly on it and press it open.

"Come in!" Neil's voice replies with a high-pitched lilt. As I step inside, he spins to face us in his chair. "Ah! Jason! So glad to see you! Same for you, Phoebe!"

The happiness in his voice catches me by surprise, but I roll with it. "Yeah! I just got back. I uh... I heard about the attack. I wanted to offer my deepest-"

"No, no. Don't worry about that, Jason." Neil waves at me nonchalantly and jumps up to shake my hand. "Everyone's glad you're back. After all, we may have lost soldiers, but we survived in the end, and that's what matters. How are you?"

I glance at Phoebe, trying to beam my thoughts into her mind. Neil looks like he's in a good mood.

"I'm fine, somewhat. I managed to kill the Black Witch. She won't be a threat anymore."

Neil stares at me intently for a few moments before nodding. "Yes, that's great. Wonderful. At least you accomplished something from wandering the Labyrinth. Well, now that you're back, I hope you'll stick around and assist us in shoring up our defenses."

I nod. "One-hundred percent. I'm not going anywhere."

Neil turns away. "Ah, I do owe you an apology, Phoebe. The way I acted before... it was very unkind. I hope you'll someday find it in your heart to forgive me."

The relief on Phoebe's face is palpable. "Oh, my. Of course, I forgive you, Neil. I wasn't mad at you in the first place. It was a terrible moment for everyone, and I can hardly blame you for how you reacted."

Neil mops at his forehead. "Excellent."

The General turns away and sits at his desk, grabs a small pile of papers, and pulls them toward himself. "So, listen, both of you. I've come to learn of several crucial locations in the Labyrinth through varying informants. These areas include slave-holding facilities where the demons torture humans, raise humans for cattle, among other things. There are also various spawning-lairs where imps are whelped and raised, and so on."

Phoebe nods, but her eyebrows lower almost imperceptibly. "What does that have to do with rebuilding the Core's defenses?"

I clench Phoebe's hand in mine just a little bit, but she ignores me. Neil coughs into his fist. "Well, rather than moping around, I came to realize that we have to fight back. We can play defense all we like, but in the end, the demons will overwhelm us. Establishing outposts throughout the Labyrinth and slowly exterminating them is the only way to pay them back in full for what they've done."

Phoebe's earlier relief vanishes, as does mine. "Neil? Why would- I mean... I see your point, but an eye for an eye only leaves two people blind."

Neil exhales slowly. "I am a man of God. Phoebe, you of all people should understand what that means. You are, after all, a Christian, are you not?"

My fiance shifts uneasily. "Yes. But, that doesn't mean-"

"You should understand how God views demons." Neil cuts her off before she can finish. "Jason, you spent quite a while traversing the Labyrinth. Two months, by my count. After that, you had a climactic battle with the demons. I await your debriefing on what happened, but I assume you saw what they were capable of?"

"I did."

The general nods. "Our enemies number in the billions, possibly trillions. We cannot defend forever. We must be proactive. If they so wished, demons could pour against us like an ocean over a fire. No matter how powerful our weapons, we won't withstand a neverending tide of bloodskins crashing against our defenses. Most importantly, they will not allow us to live in peace."

This time it's me who shifts uneasily. "Look, I get what you're saying... but surely you don't mean all demons? What about those who join us? Are you going to hunt them to extinction as well?"

Neil shakes his head. "Of course not. We will accept any who choose to join us without reservation. We might survey them for a while to see if they are agents of the enemy or spies, but once cleared, they will have the same standing as any other citizen. However, don't get your hopes up. Demons are well-known for their lies and skullduggery."

"Perhaps. Still, sending humans and monsters into the Labyrinth to fight demons on their turf... that's dangerous, Neil. I should be there with them."

He nods. "Probably. However, we need you here in the Core. You can't be in two places at once. Anyone who leaves the safety of the Core must accept that their lives could end at any moment."

Their lives could end. You can't save them all.

My inner thoughts mutter and whisper to each other once more.

You can't be everywhere at once. If you could, then that means you might have saved the Core from Beelzebub while also fighting Amelia. Think of how awful you'd feel if that were the case.

I don't care about my feelings. I have to save lives. If Neil goes through with his plan, more demons and humans and monsters will die. There's been enough death already.

Yeah. Like Amelia.

Exactly.

For some reason, I chuckle out loud. "I can't be in two places at once. That's like looking right and left at the same time."

Neil raises an eyebrow. "Exactly. We went over this."

Gears turn in my head. Hold on a minute. That's not right. I'm a Wordsmith. This should be a piece of cake! I'm wearing the solution on my head!

Taking a deep breath, I begin to form my thoughts into a solid object in my mind. I close my eyes, and from a distant place, Phoebe's voice reaches me. "Jason? Is something wrong?"

No, Phoebe. There's nothing wrong. I've solved my biggest problem.

A complete mental image of myself appears in my mind.

"Clone."

Seconds later, a whoomph of air rushes into the other side of Phoebe. Neil nearly jumps out of his seat. "Sweet mercy!"

Phoebe raises an eyebrow, then turns around and squeaks in surprise. "Eep! Jason? Another one?!"

Indeed. On the other side of Phoebe stands a perfect facsimile of me. The other Jason blinks and looks around. "What's with the weird look, Phoebe?"

She gawks at him for a moment before looking back to me. "What's going on? How- why?!"

The other Me speaks up. "I cloned myself. He looks just like me."

I raise an eyebrow. "Uhh, actually, you're the clone."

"I am? Are you sure? I remember cloning you."

"Nope. You're the clone."

Both of us turn to look at Neil. The Frenchman jumps to his feet and adjusts his collar; then, he points at me. "You're the original. The other one is the copy. How did you do that?"

"I used the Crown and copied myself identically, down to the DNA level. Uh. I think New Jason has Wordsmithing too, right?"

New Jason blinks at me in surprise. "God, I hope so. Uh. Light." He holds up his hand, and it brightens noticeably. "Nice."

Phoebe steps away from us toward Neil. I suddenly notice how pale she looks. "Uh. Um. Two Jasons. Uhh... which one do I..."

New Jason scratches his head, and I notice now that he doesn't have a Crown of Solomon. It wasn't copied over, though my clothes were. "This is a little awkward. Yo, other Me, what do we do here? I guess you're the boss?"

"Something like that? I didn't give much thought to rankings. I thought you could help Neil with whatever, while I help build the Core up. That way, I could be in two places at once."

"Nice. I can roll with that." New Jason pauses to look at Phoebe. "Do we share a fiance, though? How's that gonna work?"

My face pales visibly. Now I understand what's going through Phoebe's mind. Before I can reply, she jumps in and forces a smile. "Oh, there's nothing to worry about! I can, um, handle two Jasons! I'm going to need a way to identify you, though..."

"Crap. Call me Jason Two, I guess?" my Doppelganger says.

Neil smirks. "As pleased as I am by this turn of events, that name is a little clunky. We should probably call you something completely different and unique."

New Jason grunts, and his expression sours. "Christ. Now I have to learn a whole new name. Oh well, it comes with the territory. Uh. Maybe something like John? James?"

Phoebe walks back between the two of us and presses both of her hands in one of ours. "Um, yeah, I don't know about that. Ooh! I know! How about something inspirational! Like, we can call you Miracle! It's a Miracle that I have twice as many Jasons to love!"

The other me laughs awkwardly. "Haha... I suppose..."

"Phoebe's on the right track," Neil says. He pokes at his chin a few moments before making an aha face. "How about 'Hope?' You represent the hope of all humanity, after all."

New Jason shrugs. "Sure, whatever. Nice and distinct. It's just a name, in the end."

Phoebe beams sunshine at both of us. "Great! It's settled then! Hope and Jason!" She pauses. "But um, can you maybe put a few moles on your face or something? I can't tell you two apart!"

Hope sighs. "Mole. Mole. There, does that work better for you, beautiful?"

Two little black marks appear under his right eye. Phoebe nods excitedly. "Perfect!"

For me, however, a strange sensation appears in my stomach. Something I've never felt before.

Jealousy.

He's identical to me in every way... and he calls Phoebe 'beautiful'. I know he's me, and I know I'm being a little unfair, but... at the same time, it feels wrong.

I don't want to share my wife with a clone. I only created him to help out with the things I can't manage alone.

No! I can't be selfish and rude. Hope is the same as me. How would I feel if he had the same thoughts? Just because he's a copy doesn't mean he doesn't have thoughts and feelings too.

Hope turns to look at me. "Well, I guess I, or you, had a good idea with this cloning thing. We'll be able to get twice as much work done compared to before!"

I nod and smile.

"Yeah. We sure did."

Part 055: The Puppetmaster

"Mister Beelzebub! Mister Beelzebub! Oh my gosh, you're back!"

Beelzebub steps into his Labyrinthian abode. Immediately, his stomach clenches when he sees the hideous, overweight demoness bouncing up and down excitedly. "Rosalia."

She blushes as her eyes examine his mangled suit. "Are you okay? Th-there's not m-much covering you..."

Beelzebub rolls his eyes. "Thank me for the view later. Fetch me a new suit from the wardrobe. On the double." Beelzebub slams his door shut and sighs. Rosalia nods and rushes a few rooms away without complaint.

His home, a special privilege reserved only for demons of Lord status or higher, is a small but cozy alcove carved into Hell's outskirts. Not far from the Expanding Borders of the ever-growing Labyrinth, it's remote enough that he can get some rest in between his duties as a Lord.

The Baron of Flames sears his suit to ashes and crosses the room fully nude, frowning as he spots an unhealed cut on his arm. Focusing on the wound for just a second, it regenerates immediately.

Hmm. The power of the Phoenix. Legendary regenerative capabilities. Still, that whore of a Second Emperor managed to break me apart twice. I wonder if she will have such luck once I've ascended to Duke... or higher...

Chills go down Beelzebub's back as he steps behind a changing screen and examines the rest of himself. Other than that scratch, nobody could look at me and guess I'd recently been in a battle, let alone had every bone in my body shattered.

Half a minute passes. Beelzebub starts tapping his foot. "Rosalia! Do you know what on the double means?!"

"Y-yes! Coming! Uwah!" A violent thud in the other room makes Beelzebub sigh.

She fell again. Clumsy ogre.

Rosalia quickly picks herself up. The floor shakes with every step she takes as she stomps over. She holds the suit up so Beelzebub can grab it from over the privacy screen. The Baron snatches his clothes from her roughly, then holds them up. "Damn you, pig. You dropped this one on the ground. There's dust on it now."

"I'm sorry..." Rosalia mutters from the other side of the screen. "I didn't mean to."

"Tch. You can't do anything right, can you? Take these back and have them cleaned again. Then fetch me another one- the pin-striped one, in fact. Don't drop it this time or so help me; I'll use my fire on you."

He holds the suit up, and she delicately takes it, then rushes away. Another thud makes Beelzebub grind his teeth.

"This is who the Dukes decided should be my assistant," Beelzebub mutters to himself quietly.

Beelzebub gives himself a quick fire-bath to pass the time, burning away all the smells on his body while he waits.

Two minutes pass. This time, when Rosalia returns, she doesn't fall. "I-I brought your suit, Mister Beelzebub, sir!"

Beelzebub takes it and sighs. "Wonderful. So, dare I ask, did you manage to contact the oracles as I ordered?"

Rosalia nods so vigorously that Beelzebub can almost hear her head move. "Uh-huh! I sure did! And after that, I waited at the River Styx for about ten hours, then I came back here to make sure the place was all tidied up for your arrival, and I pressed your pants, and then I made you some Blood Soup just as you like, and then-"

"Spare me the play-by-play. I was only making conversation," Beelzebub grumbles. "More importantly, I'm surprised you haven't asked about me."

"Oh, yes! I've been dying to know how your battle against the humans went, Mister Beelzebub!"

He hops up and sticks one leg into his pants, then the other. "Ah. The humans. I killed several thousand of them, then got bored and left. I achieved the rank of Baron in doing so."

"Omigosh! I knew your horns looked bigger than before! Eeeee!" Rosalia squeaks excitedly, and Beelzebub flinches at the sound of her awful, nasally voice. "Oh! If you're a Baron, then that means we'll be moving to Hell Harbor soon!"

"We?" Beelzebub pulls his dress shirt on and adjusts his tie. "No, I think not. You and I will part, soon. I will get a bevy of beautiful servants once I move, and you'll stay here, with the rest of the swine."

"Oh, you! Tee-hee!" Rosalia laughs, ignoring his cruel barbs. "You always say the funniest things! You couldn't live without me!"

Beelzebub scowls at his reflection in the mirror. "Yes. Funny."

After fumbling with his tie for a moment, Beelzebub pulls his pinstriped jacket on and quickly combs his flawless hair back. Damn, it feels good to be a Baron.

Stepping out from behind the privacy screen, Beelzebub nearly bumps into Rosalia as she rubs her hands together gleefully. The Baron winces at Rosalia's hideous face and instead fixates his gaze just above her, trying desperately to pretend she's someone much more attractive.

"You look great, Mister Beelzebub! As wonderful as- oh!"

"What?" Beelzebub frowns at her sudden look of concentration. "Is there something wrong with my face?"

"Two hairs out of place, and your tie is three degrees crooked. Also, I see a speck of lint."

"Lint? Where? Get it off." Beelzebub quickly examines his coat, but Rosalia leaps into action. She shifts his tie and nabs the lint in the blink of an eye, but Beelzebub grabs her hand before she can touch his hair. "I don't think so."

"Aw."

Beelzebub quickly warms up his palm and irons his hair back into place. "I should tell you something else. Regarding my new status as a Baron. I'm going to face off against Bael for the right to ascend to Duke at the Slaughterseum."

Rosalia's eyes widen. "Y-you are? But how? You only ascended yesterday, right?"

Beelzebub wipes his nose and casually glances away. "Oh, I didn't say? The entirety of the Demon Council traveled to a world to battle the Black Queen. During that process, I defeated my teacher, Agares. I've earned the right to be Duke by defeating another in mortal combat."

Rosalia gawks for several moments. "In... incredible. Even for you, Mister Beelzebub... you're a prodigy like no other."

"Oh, pish. Praise me more. I also assisted in defeating the Black Queen. Doubtless, the Dukes will soon have to weigh their accomplishments against mine and grow jealous."

Rosalia reaches up and twines her curly brown hair between her fingers. "You're incredible, Mister Beelzebub. I wish I had half the power and good looks you do."

"As do I," Beelzebub grunts. "You're the last thing I like to look at when I get back after a hard day killing humans."

"Ooooh!!!" Rosalia squeaks excitedly. "You look forward to seeing me?! That's so nice of you! I didn't know you cared about me in that way!"

"I don't."

"Hahahaha! You're so bashful sometimes!"

Beelzebub's gaze drifts a thousand yards past Rosalia.

I want to die.

"I'm leaving for a while. It's been ages since I visited the Slaughterseum. I need to come up with a plan for defeating Bael. Stay here and... clean the house. Or something. I don't care."

Rosalia's smile falters. "You're leaving? But what about the Blood Soup? I boiled it nice and thick for you. I haven't even given you your deep-tissue massage yet!"

"And you never will," Beelzebub hisses. "Sometimes, I wonder if you're a succubus trapped in the body of a whale. Absolutely mindless."

"You think I look like a succubus?! Omigosh!!"

Beelzebub pushes past her. "Maybe Bael will kill me. What a mercy that would be."

The door slams behind Beelzebub, and Rosalia stares at it for a moment. Then, she dashes over to the mirror and hops up and down excitedly.

Mister Beelzebub couldn't take his eyes off my new hairdo! I knew he would love it!!

"Alright. I'll, uh, leave you in Neil's capable hands."

Turning away from Hope, I rest my hand on Phoebe's shoulder and leave the clone in Neil's office. Seeing a mirror image of my face staring back at me has yet to stop feeling weird.

"Cool beans! I'll see you guys around!"

Hope waves at Phoebe and me. Phoebe smiles and waves back, then falls into step beside me. A minute later, once we're out of hearing range, Phoebe sighs.

"Oh, Jason. You should have warned Neil and I. You always do the most dramatic things without thinking them through. Now there's another of you running around!"

I chuckle nervously. "Haha... well, look on the bright side. If anything ever happens to me, there's always-"

"Hey!" Phoebe glares daggers at me. "Horrible! Don't even joke about that! Don't you know how broken this poor maiden would feel?"

"Sorry. Just a bad joke."

"Mmm."

I stop for a minute and raise an eyebrow. "Say, I meant to ask you earlier but didn't have time. How did you appear out of nowhere? That is, during the battle. I barely remember anything. Satan was pulverizing me, then I was on the ground, and you were there too."

Phoebe blushes. "Oh, um, you gave me the Crown, remember? I replicated a device that analyzed Hoarhiim's magical energy and um..." She stops and frowns, then rubs her head. "Uh... oh! Right. I created a wormhole thingy with my truck and traveled to you. I thought I had hit you with my truck when I showed up."

"I'm glad you showed up. If you hadn't, Satan probably would have killed me. I'm glad nothing happened to you, though. It was dangerous rushing into an unknown situation out of nowhere."

"I'm glad you're okay, too. It all worked out in the end."

"That it did."

We turn and continue walking. Half a minute passes. The two of us trot over to a familiar monster, one I'm relieved to see still alive. He turns around when he hears Phoebe clear her throat. "Ah! Turtle! You made it back in one piece!"

"Hey, Kar. I'm back."

Kar's fairy assistant pops out from behind his back and lands on his shoulder. "Don't forget about me!"

"I'd never dare, Blinker. How are you two holding up?"

Blinker glances at Kar for a moment, and he coughs. "Hurgh. Well, we are fine. Hotface did a lot of damage, but we can still rebuild. The fallen will serve as a reminder of the danger demons pose."

Phoebe's eyes drift across the rows of computer consoles to the corner where the body bags lay. "I won't forget them," she mutters.

Blinker flutters over and pats Phoebe's head. "Cheer up! Nobody likes to see you sad! Anyway, when are you going to tell Jason the good news?"

"Good news?" I echo her words. "What's she talking about, Phoebe?"

Blinker giggles. "Heehee! I knew it! She didn't tell you! Kar and I are getting married!"

I blink in surprise. "Y-you are? That's great! I, uh... I mean..." Slowly, my eyes drift from the tiny six-inch fairy to the towering ten-foot-tall lizard-Sphinx. "But... how?"

Phoebe's sadness lifts. She chuckles. "Haha, oh, Jason. You know Kar can shrink, right?"

"Oh! Of course! I, ah, shit! I didn't mean-"

Kar roars with laughter. "Bwahaha! You thought I might break this little lassie, didn't you?! Have no fear. I'm more worried about myself than her!"

The four of us share a good laugh.

After chatting for a few more minutes, Phoebe and I wave goodbye to them and head toward the exit gate back to Hero City.

Phoebe loops her arm around mine. "Isn't that great? They're getting married."

"Yeah. It sure is." I blush slightly, remembering my proposal to Phoebe a few months ago. "You're not jealous, are you? I think we could... you know... make it a double-wedding."

"What? Really?!" Phoebe squeaks happily and hops up and down. "I'd be so happy, Jason! Are you serious?"

"Of course, I am." I smile at the woman I love, and a moment later, a sharp pang in my chest makes me look away. "Well. Before that, I... I need to talk to you about something."

We step through the portal and back onto Tarus II, the whoomph of air pressure making our ears pop in the process.

Phoebe cranes her neck and yawns, trying to get the odd sensation out of her ears. "Oh? What's that?"

I hold up a finger. "Let's wait until we've cleared the gate."

"Okay."

We walk past several men and women, each of whom waves at us, and especially at Phoebe. She's popular among everyone and disliked by nobody.

When we arrive at the gate, Phoebe waves at a young guy on the other side. The youth nods back but doesn't smile. "Hello, Miss Berthold."

"Henry! How are you?"

He shrugs. "Fine. Lemme get this open for you."

The soldier marches away and presses a button, opening the gate. Phoebe glances up at me. "Henry is usually a lot more excitable and happy. He lost a good friend during Beelzebub's attack."

"That's awful."

Henry wanders back over. "Alright, there you go, guys. Where's your truck, Miss Berthold?"

"Oh... it's destroyed." Phoebe scrunches up her face. "Yeah, gonna have to get a new one made."

"Next bus is thirty minutes. If you'll give me a minute, I can call a military transport."

I smile at the lad. "Nah, I'll make a new truck for her. Thanks for the offer, champ."

Henry nods and walks away. His downcast attitude makes my heart feel heavy.

Phoebe and I pass through the gate, and it closes behind us. Phoebe looks at me expectantly, but I shake my head. "Let's take a walk for now. It's a nice, sunny day."

And indeed, it is. However, winter is coming. The cold will be here within a month, and snow will probably show up not long after that.

Slowly, Phoebe and I walk down the path, putting distance between ourselves and the portal encampment. She looks up expectantly at me. "What was it you wanted to talk about?"

"It's hard to put into words. I... I don't know how to say it."

"Say whatever's on your mind. I won't judge you."

I nod. "Yeah. You're a saint like that. Look, it's about Amelia. She's dead, you know."

Phoebe nods. "Is this about your attraction to her?"

My heart pounds like a jackhammer. "What?! You knew?"

"Not until just now. I guessed as much though, given how you left in such a hurry."

I bow my head. "Are you mad? I felt a lot of things toward her. Maybe even... love."

"I wouldn't blame you, Jason. You mentioned that she saved your life twice. From what I understand, you woke up in the Labyrinth, scared and confused, and she was the first friendly face you saw. It's only natural to feel attraction."

My face burns up. "Well, I didn't feel anything toward Amelia at first. After all, she looked like a little kid."

"I wondered about that. Haha!" Phoebe giggles to herself. "I saw Amelia as a grown woman for the first time when I showed up to save you. It took me a second to recognize her. She was a beauty... better-looking than me, at least."

Phoebe's voice trails off. I stop walking and kneel so I can look her in the eyes. "Don't say that. You're beautiful and radiant like a star. You're kind, witty, strong, loving. Everyone likes you. Compared to you, Amelia was an evil-"

"Don't say it, Jason." Phoebe holds up her palm, silencing me. "Don't speak ill of the dead. You cared for her. There's nothing wrong about that. Insulting her to try and make me feel better will only hurt you in ways you can't imagine. Besides, everyone has a degree of evil in themselves."

"Not you," I counter. "You're the kindest person I know. You're everything Amelia wasn't. You're-"

Phoebe cuts me off. "-Not the woman you think I am." She stares at me icily. "Jason, while you were fighting, I caught a glimpse of a familiar face. King Arthur. Somehow, he was there on the battlefield. I was too busy helping you to speak to him, and it caved my heart in that I couldn't do so."

She and I stare at each other for a moment. "Did something happen?"

"I failed my king, Jason. I failed him. It's haunted me ever since."

"How?"

Phoebe rubs her arms and averts her gaze. "I... I don't want to talk about it. Besides, we were talking about you. Don't worry about my issues. My past is 100,000 years old. None of it matters anymore."

"Phoebe... that's not true. It still affects you. C'mon, I'm over Amelia. Tell me about you. I want to know what's hurting you, deep down."

Phoebe stares stoically into the distance for several moments. Finally, her lip starts to tremble. "I... I don't know if I can. But I'll try."

"Good, Phoebe. Let it out. I'm here for you."

Recommended Listening.

Hope stares at Phoebe longingly after she and Jason leave, but a few seconds later, he sighs. "Haaah. Okay. Let's get to work, then, Neil."

Neil eyes the clone for a moment. "Are you alright, lad? It looks like there's something on your mind."

Jason's clone chuckles. "Heh, it's probably nothing. I feel a little off-put, you know? Like, I'm him. Jason is me. I was with Phoebe, but now I'm not. It's like I've stepped into a parallel reality where this isn't my life. I suddenly feel alienated despite how everything is the same."

Neil nods. "I can't imagine how that feels. Phoebe didn't even give you a goodbye kiss. It's good to see you taking things in stride."

"I suppose."

Hope shakes his head and Wordsmiths, "Chair." Sitting down, he mops his hair back. "Never mind that. Uhm, what happened to the Core? Mind filling me in? Phoebe told me a bit, but I didn't get the full story yet."

Neil nods and pulls out a paper from the pile. "A demon named Beelzebub attacked. He was only a Lord at first, but he used some unholy fire that instantly killed anyone it so much as grazed. I've never seen anything like it in all my years. Somehow, during the battle, he increased in power and became a Baron. That's when the onslaught intensified."

Hope bows his head. "I should have been there."

"No, Jason should have," Neil says, correcting him. "You're a copy of Jason, not Jason himself. You can make different choices and take a different path."

"I have all of his memories," Hope mutters. "I did all the things he did right up to five minutes ago."

"You can think like that if you wish." Neil stands up and walks over to a keg of wine. He pours out two cups, then walks over to Hope. "Here, have a drink."

Hope smiles. "Ah, thanks. I don't like alcohol."

"You don't?" Neil sits down but continues to hold the cup out. "Or Jason doesn't?"

Hope opens his mouth to respond, but pauses and shrugs. "I guess it's him who doesn't... not me. It won't hurt to try a cup."

"Not to mention you would be impolite to refuse," Neil says chidingly.

He hands the cup to Hope and watches silently as the youth takes a drink and coughs. "Kah! Man, that's bitter! I thought it would taste like sweet grapes."

"Wine has a taste all of its own. Force yourself to drink more. It'll loosen you up a bit. It's a good way to relax after a hard day."

Hope sips the wine slowly, wincing every time it enters his mouth. After a moment, he blinks twice. "Oh. Sweeten."

The next time he takes a sip, Hope smiles. "Much better."

Neil swallows a big gulp. "What? Did you use your Wordsmithing?"

"Yeah. I changed it to taste more like grape juice. Now it's delicious."

The two of them sit in silence for half a minute, finishing their cups. Neil takes Hope's glass and walks over to refill it. "So, Hope. I asked Jason to debrief me on what happened over the last two months. I heard he, and thusly, you, fought the demons. At least, that's what Miss Berthold said."

The wine finishes dripping into the cup, and Neil closes the spout, then walks back over to Hope and hands him the cup.

"Oh. That. The battle... yeah." Hope sweetens his drink once again and drains half the glass before pausing. He wipes at his eyes and yawns. "Um, a lot happened, Neil. I defeated the Black Queen. Hoarhiim did. I was too weak to stand up to the demons."

"I heard Phoebe arrived just in the nick of time."

Hope nods. "Yup. She popped in and saved me. Kinda sad, huh? A regular human woman saved a man with godlike powers. I'm pathetic."

Neil's eyes lower to Hope's wine-glass as the youth looks away.

"Pathetic? Maybe a little. You're not perfect though, Hope. Besides. The only person who has the right to godlike power is God himself in the heavens above."

Neil reaches over and touches a book at the end of his desk. "I found this in Bahamut's library. It's my most precious possession."

Hope's eyes follow Neil's arm. "A Bible?"

"Yes. Growing up, I fought under Napoleon, doing my best to serve my country. I always was a God-fearing man. From what little I know about you, or rather, Jason... you're not much for God."

Hope shakes his head and swirls his wine around. "No, I'm not. Sorry."

"God made the heavens and the Earth. God rules our lives even today. I believe in fate and His will. I don't think it was a coincidence that Bahamut took me and forced me into her slavery. I was reborn today, able to save the future of humanity from the evils of demonkind."

Hope shrugs. "I don't know. That sounds more like a coincidence than fate."

"Possibly." Neil finishes off his glass and sets it on the table. "In any case, don't expect yourself to meet God's greatness. You can't do it. No man is as perfect as He is. Tell me what else happened during your battle."

"Not much." Hope rubs his arm. "Hoarhiim took over. I woke up later to find out he had destroyed the entire planet. Amelia and Blaarjiim died. Hoarhiim did as well. His orb exploded in my hands."

The two of them pause for a few moments. Neil considers Hope's words.

"I'm sorry to hear that," The Commander says, keeping his voice neutral. "I don't know your relationship with the orb, but I imagine he was important to you."

"Yeah. Hoarhiim saved me from Hell itself."

Hope lifts his head and blinks sleepily. "It's... it's Amelia, though. She's the one whose death hurt me the most. I can't stop thinking about her."

"The Black Witch?" Neil raises an eyebrow. "That little girl?"

Hope scratches his head. "Well, she wasn't a little girl when I last saw her. She aged up pretty rapidly. She looked stunning."

"Ah, the trappings of the flesh." Neil takes Hope's empty cup and walks over to refill it. "The Bible has many things to say about seductresses and those who accept power from demons. Why, the demoness who saved us from Beelzebub was a succubus. Can you believe it?"

"A succubus? I think... I think I might know her."

Neil nods. "Oh? Tell me more."

Hope furrows his brow. "When Phoebe arrived on the planet, she had a female demon with her. Horns, tail, and she wasn't wearing much."

"That's the one," Neil replies. He continues to fill Hope's cup and stares at the wall.

"Amazing. So the succubus saved you from Beelzebub, huh? She had a romantic thing going on with Satan, though."

Neil's eyes freeze. He stares at the cup in his hands and closes off the spout, but keeps his back to Hope. "She did? Interesting."

"Yup. He kissed her and got grabby too. I think they might have been husband and wife, or whatever the demonic equivalent is."

The General turns around and hands the cup to Hope. "Here you go. Have a refill."

Hope stares at the glass. "Nah... I think... I think I've had enough."

"Oh, come now. Two glasses of wine? Surely you can hold your liquor."

A few seconds pass. Hope sighs and takes the glass. He doesn't bother sweetening it, opting instead to drink it plain. He doesn't even taste the difference. "Uhmmm... so yeah. What was I saying?"

Neil smiles pleasantly at the now-constantly yawning lad. "You were talking about the succubus and Satan- hm? What's going on? Why are you crying?"

Hope wipes his eyes as two tears run down his face. "Crying? I-I don't know."

After a few seconds, a dam breaks in Hope's mind. He leans over and cries hysterically. "Ohh, God! It's Amelia. I killed her. I let Hoarhiim take over! I can't believe myself! I didn't want her to die!"

Neil stares at the youth for a few moments and raises an eyebrow.

"But she did, as did my men. You've been negligent as of late. You have to do better. You can't keep failing people as Jason did."

Neil continues pushing, and Hope's tears begin to flow more freely. "God, I can't believe myself! Uwaah!!" He drops the half-filled cup, causing the wine to spill all over his clothes. Hope doesn't notice the cold liquid running down his body. "Amelia!! I'm sorry! I can't believe I let you die..."

Neil quickly grabs a cloth beside his chair and steps over to Hope, then kneels to pat the blubbering man dry. "I'm sorry. I shouldn't have pressed so hard — Heaven's sake. You're drunk already. Let me get you to bed."

Hope nods slowly and paws at his eyes. "Failed... failed..."

Neil wraps Hope's arm around his neck and hoists him up, then helps him across the room. "Luckily for you, I sometimes sleep in my office. Here you go, sorry for causing you trouble."

On the opposite side of Neil's office, a door leads to a lavish bedroom with a king-sized bed. He lays Hope down and pulls away to stand and stare.

Hope curls up in the fetal position and continues to weep over and over, though he manages to pause and whisper, "Th-thank you, Neil. I'm sorry... I'm sorry..."

Neil smiles at the clone. "It's no trouble. I'm glad you're letting your emotions out. It will free your mind."

The Commander turns and walks out of the darkened room, leaving the door only slightly cracked. He continues to his desk, plunks down in his chair, and his smile widens.

Everything is going to change.

Part 056: Phoebe's Tortured Past, An Unlikely Connection

"Lady Berthold. The King requires your presence at the Round Table."

The militiaman bows his head as Phoebe, the leader of the Silver Battalion, enters. She, in turn, sheathes her sword. "Thank you, Private. I will leave at once."

Phoebe examines her wooden training dummy to see how deep her strikes have cut. As usual, she's almost at the point where she can chop its head off, but not quite.

My sword arm lacks striking power. Ah, well. Perhaps someday that will change.

Phoebe walks outside. Her boots clomp against the cobblestone streets as she picks up her pace. She heads away from the knight training yard, past the stables, up toward the castle. The hustling and bustling commoners pay her no mind.

Her steel armor glints in the midday sunlight, and her white hair flutters in the breeze. Occasionally, she catches sight of a familiar soldier here and there who nod politely at her, their looks of respect and desire apparent on their faces.

A lady of the court must remain chaste, she reminds herself. Besides, she has no interest in the other knights. Despite several approaching her over the last several years, she always turns them down. The only man she feels anything towards is King Arthur. Naturally, her feelings for him amount to deep respect and admiration, nothing else.

She adjusts her belt fittings and looks up in surprise as one of the Knights of the Round falls into step beside her. "Oh! Sir Percival! How are you faring on this beautiful morning?"

The tall and lanky man smiles kindly. His blonde hair tilts forward as he gives a polite nod. "Lady Berthold. I am quite well. Are you headed to the Round Table as well?"

She smiles. "I am. The King must have summoned both of us. I wonder to what end?"

"Aye." Percival and Phoebe increase their pace. "Summoning us to the Round Table must mean important business."

Minutes pass. The two chat politely about this and that. They step into the castle, and Phoebe lowers her gaze. "Do you think His Majesty will finally assign me a combat task? Until now, he's only directed me to train myself and the other troops."

Percival shrugs. "Anything is possible. The demons have been plotting a major attack on Camelot for quite some time. I imagine His Majesty is feeling anxious."

"As would anyone," Phoebe murmurs.

She and Percival stride into the antechamber of the Round Table and raise their eyebrows as they spot the other ten knights awaiting their arrival.

"Sir Percival. Lady Berthold. Welcome." Lancelot, the King's right-hand knight, nods at them as they enter. His commanding physique, chiseled chin, and piercing eyes make any woman swoon. Indeed, the rumors speak of him being equal to the King when it comes to his conquest of demons and females alike.

"Sir Lancelot." Phoebe takes up her seat a few spots away from him and blushes as once again, she feels the weight of her position at the table. The only female to ever be knighted and appointed to the Round Table. Compared to the others here... I feel unworthy.

The last chair, a golden throne, stands emptily at the opposite side of the table from Phoebe. A chill goes down her arms as she imagines Arthur's handsome face when he enters. Soon, His Majesty will sit across from me, and I will gaze upon his visage.

The King, of course, is widely known to be the noblest man in the land. In addition to his beautiful wife, Guinevere, he has a dozen concubines at any given time, all chosen from the most beautiful women of his court.

Every knight, including Phoebe, bows their heads and folds their hands together on the table to join in prayer. When they finish, they stare at the King's throne in silence and wait for his arrival.

Five minutes later, the far door swings open. The Knights of the Round rise to their feet and turn to face the King as he walks in. "Hello, my paladins. Apologies for running late. Little Morgan wouldn't cease her sobbing. She prefers her mother's touch to mine."

Phoebe smiles. What a devout family man His Majesty is.

Arthur quickly seats himself at the table and nods. "At ease."

The knights smoothly seat themselves. Lancelot touches a few scrolls before him. "I brought intelligence reports from our southern borders. Sightings of demons have increased of late."

"And I bring news of a witch from the north," Sir Gawain remarks. "A villager described a young woman of short height with a lovely and fair complexion. However, we suspect she may be a demon shapeshifter, given her barbarism and power."

"Aye," Sir Kay says. "And just today we've beheaded four traitors to the crown. The ones I spoke of two fortnights past."

Arthur sighs. "Haah... as always, trouble brews. A king's rest never comes. Let's begin with the demon sightings, Sir Lancelot. What are their numbers and military might? Can one of you dispatch them quickly, or must I go there myself?"

The other knights begin discussing their information with the King, but Phoebe stares in silence, twirling her fingers together. Her eyes glaze over, and she looks past the King toward the stained-glass window behind him. It depicts the Virgin Mother as she holds her beloved child, baby Jesus. As Phoebe eyes the window, her thoughts turn inward, toward her own family life.

Minutes pass. Sir Gawain and Percival break out into a minor spat over how to divert resources from one border to the other. Eventually, the King taps the table. "Lady Berthold? Lady Berthold?"

"Huh?" Phoebe blinks, suddenly realizing everyone is staring at her. "O-oh! Sorry! What was the question?"

Arthur smiles pleasantly. "I asked if the newest batch of militiamen were ready to send to the southern border. Do you believe they've trained enough?"

Phoebe swallows. "With all due respect, Your Grace, I believe they require a few more weeks of training. The archers might prove useful in the meantime, but their horsemanship lacks finesse."

"That won't do," Lancelot says, cutting in. "I won't send unprepared young men out to die against the demon hordes. We should transfer our more capable warriors from the palace to the southern border, and put the recruits here."

"B-but..." Phoebe swallows. "That would leave the castle weakened."

"Aye, but it is unlikely that any demons will show up so deep within our borders. We anticipate it will take but a month or so for our troops to crush the demons in the south. Once they finish, they will return post-haste."

Phoebe nods at Sir Lancelot. "Of... of course. That is sensible."

King Arthur examines Phoebe shrewdly with his sparkling blue eyes. "Is there something the matter, Lady Berthold? You've hardly said a word since I arrived."

Blood rushes to Phoebe's cheeks. "Oh, no! Not at all! I- I um, well, I feel a little... um... small."

Several of the knights glance at one another. Arthur rubs his chin. "Hmm. You are the newest paladin here, and a lone woman, to boot. You probably feel somewhat inadequate, seated at this table of legends."

Phoebe's blushing intensifies. "Y-yes."

"I see." Arthur looks away. "Sometimes, I forget how difficult it must feel for you to fit in. Nevertheless, you are a fantastic swordswoman, one who bested Gawain in mock-combat. We vexed him endlessly as a result of his defeat. However, it is not your prowess with the blade that I value, but your ability to intuit the feelings of others. Tell me, how does my kingdom view me?"

Arthur holds up a finger to silence Phoebe. "Gawain, you answer first. How do those living in the less prosperous district of Trost view my reign?"

Gawain shuffles uncomfortably. "W-well, my King... ah... I hardly travel to Trost. The last I heard, they suffered a plague and had to burn the bodies."

"That was three years ago," Arthur mutters. "Lancelot. How about you? What does Trost think of my reign?"

The muscular knight bows his head. "I do not know, my liege. Matters regarding the military always occupy my time."

"But Lady Berthold does," Arthur says with a smile. "She has never visited Trost, yet I guarantee she knows more of their current situation than anyone else at this table. All she needs is to speak with villagers and citizens, and they open up to her in ways you men couldn't imagine. Isn't that right?"

Phoebe twirls a hair around her finger. "Somewhat, Your Grace. After the plague, the citizens of Trost held animosity toward the crown. However, when a voodoo demon appeared in their village, you sent Sir Tristan there to slay the demon. People later went on to blame the bastard for the plague and forgive the crown. Their troubles have lessened noticeably as a result."

Arthur claps his hands together twice. "Good, very good. You see? You have value and intuition that the men here lack. Don't look down on yourself simply because you lack for military conquests. Heaven knows you will someday get the chance. Our enemies never stop plotting against humanity."

Percival reaches over and rests his hand on Phoebe's. "The King is right, Lady Berthold. Everyone here values you. Do not be so eager to stain your sword with blood."

Phoebe relaxes visibly. "Alright. I apologize for my… my lack of conviction."

Arthur returns his gaze to Sir Gawain. "Very good, then. Gawain, tell me more about this beautiful witch that has been attacking our villages."

"Aye, Your Majesty. She is a young woman, perhaps twenty-five years of age. The villagers speak of her long, black hair and blood-red eyes…"

Phoebe turns away from Gawain's debriefing to gaze at Percival, whose hand still rests on hers. He quickly retracts his touch and blushes awkwardly. "Ah… forgive me for my… impropriety."

Phoebe gently reaches around and rubs his back. "There's nothing to forgive."

Two weeks later.

Phoebe watches silently as the captured demons shuffle through the streets, their hands, feet, and necks shackled and bound with powerful restriction magic. Female and male demons of many varieties gaze around at the wall of knights surrounding them on both sides. They whimper in despair as heavily armored soldiers march them to the dungeons.

Gawain stands beside Phoebe and claps his hands eagerly. "Chop chop! Let's get a move on! I want these prisoners ready for interrogation by no later than midday!"

The demons include not only imps, but children, too. Phoebe watches as a little demon girl with white hair shuffles along behind the taller ones silently, emptiness in her eyes.

"Sir Gawain, are you planning to torture all of these demons?"

Gawain shakes his head. "Not I. The court appointee, Sir Gallant the Brave. I lack the finesse required for torture. He will certainly find the locations of their hidden dens."

A horrible rolling pain forms in Phoebe's gut as she watches the last of the demons walk up the street. "Is… is the brutality necessary?"

Gawain glances at her. "Of course. Even if we required no information, they're demons! God demands that all of their kind be broken and slain. Finding out where more of their wicked kin are hiding is but a bonus."

Phoebe clutches her stomach and nods. Gawain walks away to follow the demon convoy.

Eventually, Phoebe slowly turns to walk back to the training stables. How cruel. The demons look similar to us, but with different skin, horns, and pointy ears. Why must we torture them? Is there no better way?

Before entering the training facility, Phoebe slams into someone walking out, falling hard on her rear and wincing in pain. The voice of Sir Percival greets her ears. "Ah! Lady Berthold! I'm so sorry! Forgive me!"

When she looks up at his face, her feelings of discomfort erupt all at once into powerful emotions she can't contain. Tears roll down Phoebe's face. She looks away and tries to control her sobbing, and wipes her eyes furiously.

Percival stares at her in confusion. "O-oh goodness! I wasn't watching where I was going!" He kneels to her level, his hands shaking as he tries to figure out how badly he hurt her. "Are you okay? Shall I call a medic?"

"Hic..." Phoebe rubs her eyes on her arms and trembles. "It's not you! It's me! I'm too weak... I can't even look! Oh god, it hurts to think about!"

Percival opens and closes his mouth several times, trying to parse her emotions. Unfortunately, unlike the other knights, his experience with women is quite limited. Percival can do little more than pray he didn't hurt her too badly.

Eventually, he settles with just staring at Phoebe's feet while she weeps. Three minutes pass before Phoebe can get her emotions under control. She finally looks at Percival, tears staining her face. "I... I'm sorry. I can't control it. The little girl... it's not fair."

"Little girl?" Percival, still baffled, tries to probe Phoebe to find out what's distressing her. "Who?"

Phoebe sniffles. "Th-the demons. We brought back a hundred demon prisoners from the south. They all looked so hopeless and distraught..."

Percival nods. A look of relief passes over his face. "Ah, is that all that's bothering you? Well, they are our enemy. You'll have to get the notion out of your head that they deserve mercy. A little girl demon will eventually mature into a man-eating succubus, or potentially even a wraith. Why, wraiths slew thousands of innocent villagers in the south just last winter!"

Sticking his hand out, Percival offers to help Phoebe to her feet. Instead, she stares at him, a feeling of shame washing over her. "You feel the same way as the other knights, Sir Percival? About demons? Even the children?"

Percival drops his hand to his side and sighs. "That I do. I know you are a kind soul, Lady Berthold, but those damned bloodskins are pure evil. If you respect His Majesty, then you will see that he is a Hero ordained by the gods to rid the world of demonic sin. There is no place for demonkind in a peaceful world."

Phoebe reaches for the doorway and pulls herself up, rubbing her sore butt as she rises. "I can't help but wonder if there isn't a better way. People seem too eager to inflict barbarism and cruelty upon one another just as much as they do the demons."

Sir Percival stands up as well and smiles. "Lady Berthold..." Slowly, he reaches over to caress her face. "You are the kindest woman I know. Your dignity and grace are your greatest assets. I pray you never have to see the horrors of war, nor the punishment we inflict upon those who oppose his majesty. Your heart would break."

Phoebe pulls away from his touch, a chill going down her back. "That would be... ah... I... I will retire for the day. I'm feeling light-headed."

"As you wish." Percival sighs. "If you like, I can manage the training today."

"Yes. Please do," Phoebe whispers. She eyes Percival for a few seconds, then turns and walks away.

Phoebe's quarters, little more than a small hut near the castle, stand not far from the dungeons. As she walks along, she eyes the small stone tower with its stairs that delve deep into Camelot's depths.

She pauses before her home, hesitating to walk inside. Gazing across the field, she swallows hard.

No, Phoebe. Don't look. You shouldn't. Leave it to the men. The King knows best.

She bites her lip, hesitating as she reflects upon her actions.

Finally, she relents. I have to see. I need to know what will happen to them.

Another voice whispers in her head. What will you do if you witness something loathsome?

N-nothing. I'm only... I'm going to take a quick look. Nothing else.

Phoebe turns away from her house and walks across the field, heading for the massive wooden doors which lead to Castle Camelot's dungeons.

A hundred demons stand, their wrists shackled to the ceiling, as they await their demise: men, women, even a child. The guards, having already torn all their clothing off, examine the prisoners.

Maxim, the head guard, paces back and forth, grimacing at the more freakish demons, including a pair of Scythers, whose sword-arms possess the power to slice through thick armor. Maxim's eyes fall on three succubi, and he sneers at them. "You may think your male mind control will work on me, but think again. The Archangel Camael, Lady of the Lake, forged those collars that you whores wear now. She created these artifacts explicitly to render your filth powerless. There is no way out of the Camelot Dungeons."

Maxim continues walking past them, and his eyes lower to the lone little demon girl, her long white hair barely covering her upper body. "A kid, huh? Today will be even more fun than I expected."

Two male demons beside her, somewhat older, shuffle to the side to try and block her from Maxim's view. The older one speaks up. "Keep your eyes off our sister, fleshbag scum!"

"What?! How dare you!" Maxim pales for a moment, then rears back and strikes the one who spoke right in the stomach, making the handsome demon gasp in pain.

"Brother!" The little girl wriggles and tries to do something at all, but her toes barely touch the ground.

Maxim glares nastily at the older demon, then grabs him by the throat. "I don't take lip from blood-skins!"

Whump! Whump! Whump!

Maxim slams his metal-gauntlet fist over and over into the male's stomach until the eldest brother can't make a sound. Blood pours from his mouth.

With a smirk, Maxim gestures to another guard. "Let's have some fun with this tough guy first. Go ahead and strap down two of those succubi for me. I'll have my way with them later. As for these worthless Scythers, kill them. They never talk. Too stupid."

Two muscled guards nod without smiling and draw their swords. The scythers wriggle and try to turn away, but their efforts fail. The swordsmen impale them through the stomach three times, then stab them through the throat.

The succubi scream in terror as the guards manhandle and drag them away by their hair. "Please! Don't hurt us! We don't mean any harm! Pleeease!!!"

After tightly binding the arms of the succubi so they can't fight back, the guards drag them away to a nearby room. Their screams echo throughout the dungeon.

Maxim glowers at the crowd of onlookers. "Drake! Get that male in the iron maiden, and tie the one who gave me lip to a Pain Chair. We'll have a go at the little one after we finish the first batch."

The girl watches in horror as they cart her brother off. "Rahab! No! Don't hurt him, please!"

"Shut your mouth," Maxim says, backhanding her face and knocking her away. Her remaining brother pulls hard at his chains and snarls, but Maxim ignores him.

Leaning down, Maxim grabs the little girl by her chin. "You know what we're gonna do to that handsome devil brother of yours? First, we'll smash his kneecaps. Then we'll break his elbows. Unless someone in this motley crew decides to tell us where more hidden demon dens are, every demon here will suffer the same fate as him. I have a long line of pests to get out of the way, so rest easy that his death will be quick."

Suddenly, a bolt of lightning arcs off the girl's chin and violently shocks Maxim, sending him sprawling back. The girl screams at him, tears in her eyes. "Take that! You awful human!"

Maxim's entire arm shakes and spasms for several seconds before it slows to a tremble. His eyes bulge. "You little bitch. How did you activate your magic?! Ohh, now you're in for it. I've got a special present just for you."

Maxim beckons to another guard. "Bring her brother here. We'll torture him right in front of his siblings. Won't that be fun?"

"Rahab!" The remaining male demon pulls and tugs at his chains, but can't get free. "You bastards! Satan will damn you to Hell! Our kind will tear your children from their mother's arms!"

"Hahaha." Maxim shakes some feeling into his numbed hand. "Tell me where the demon lairs are, and your brother won't suffer. Otherwise, stand there and watch."

The little girl and her brother gaze in terror as their still-coughing older brother is dragged over and strapped to a chair with a thousand small spikes lining it. The guards slap and batter him around. "Wake up! Say goodbye to your fellow cockroaches, worm!"

A guard from the other room walks over; a large nail in one hand and a sledgehammer in the other. He hands the spike to another guard who positions it above Rahab's knee.

Rahab blinks deliriously. His eyes widen when he sees what's coming.

Then the first guard raises the hammer.

The little girl and her brother scream in unison. "No! Stop!"

WHAM.

The nail impales Rahab's kneecap with a sickening crunch. His unearthly howl of pain makes even the guards flinch. "GEEEYAAAUGH!"

The little girl presses her eyes shut and turns away, sobbing uncontrollably. "Uwaaah! No! Rahab...!"

The guard yanks the spike out of Rahab's knee, which only causes him more agony, then places it over the other one.

Maxim smirks and walks over to the girl, not deigning to touch her this time. "You think this is painful? Sir Gallant has a special plan for you. The same one he does for all the cute little bloodskins. Hehehe."

"Uwaaah..." The little girl hiccups and shakes as she forces herself to look away. Rahab's anguished screams ring in her ears as they drive the next nail into his other kneecap.

"Bastards... bastards... bastards..." The remaining brother gnashes his teeth and tugs at his chains as he watches helplessly. "A million curses..."

Maxim stands up and dusts himself off. "Alright, let's break all of his fingers. I don't care about getting information from this one. Show these blood-skins we mean business. Sir Gallant the Brave will be here soon. I'm betting he'll want the child for himself."

"Aye, sir," One of the other guards says.

For the next hour, each guard takes turns breaking various parts of the eldest brother's body, until soon his voice is so hoarse and his mind so numb that he passes out and falls comatose.

The guards wipe their brows. "Whew, gods, that's a hard day of work. Haha."

"Stupid bastard finally croaked," another guard laughs. "Let's haul him to the butcher table and finish him off. I wanna have some fun with that last succubus before Gallant gets here. Once he has his way with her, she'll be too far gone for me to enjoy myself."

The little demon girl whimpers and shivers uncontrollably, partially due to being cold, but mostly because of the hatred and anguish in her body. She cracks her eyes and watches as they take Rahab's limp form away.

"Rahab... brother..."

"It's... it's okay," her other brother mutters. He stands silently now, forcing himself to keep calm. "R-Rahab was valiant to the very end. The Emperors will not forget his fearlessness. He'll... he'll go into the great demon city under the Earth."

Both he and his sister tremble and cry.

Phoebe opens the dungeon door. A young guard at the entrance, perhaps twenty years old, spots her. "Oh! Lady Berthold! A pleasure to see you! What are you doing poking your head into these parts?"

Her stomach clenches as a man's voice howls in agony far in the distance. "I... I need to see someone here."

The guard scratches the back of his head. "Ahh, Sir Gallant just returned a few minutes ago. I've gotta ask him if it's okay for visitors to show up. After all, prison ain't no place for a noble lady like yourself."

A moment passes. Another scream makes Phoebe's skin crawl. "Are you questioning my fortitude? I am one of the Knights of Twelve, young man."

The guard's face whitens. "O-oh, no! Of course not! I meant no disrespect! Would you like me to show you to your destination?"

Yet another shriek tears through the dungeon, this time filled with ten times the raw emotion of the previous scream. Phoebe shakes her head. "No. I think I already know the general direction."

"As you wish."

She pushes past the guard and heads down the spiral staircase three stories into the Earth, where rock and stone and brick all blend to create a gloomy, dark atmosphere.

I've never been down here before. This horrid hellhole is where we keep the prisoners? It's filthy! Barbaric!

Her teeth grind noisily as an even more piercing scream rattles her innards. Still, it tells her to take a left when a two-way junction appears. Only a few torches line the walls, along with a few empty ones meant for lighting and carrying in the darkness. She takes one of the spares, touches it to a lit one, and continues onward.

Eventually, Phoebe arrives at a small room, and her eyes widen. A mixture of disgust and horror floods through her body as she stares at over ninety demons, all chained to the ceiling, their positions calculated so they can barely touch the floor with their toes. Her eyes instantly gravitate to the little girl from earlier, but then she follows the girl's gaze. A demon sits, strapped in a chair, his arms and legs little more than a bloody mush.

The demon male breathes weakly. His tongue lolls out of his mouth, and his head rolls around. He babbles incoherently, his voice a whisper. "Puh... puleese... hurt... stop... pluss... hurtsss..."

One of the guards raises a hammer and slams it down. The demon croaks as the guards smash one of his fingers into pulp. His hoarse voice reminds Phoebe of a donkey braying in pain.

She watches silently, her body trembling more and more as each hammer strikes batter his body. Finally, the guards give up when their hostage stops screaming. His head lolls back, and blood pours from his mouth.

Is that demon dead?! Phoebe's teeth chatter nervously. What is going on in these dungeons?! How could we unleash such wickedness, yet call ourselves agents of God?!

The guards eventually drag the beaten and bloodied prisoner away. For the first time in Phoebe's life, insecurity in herself and others boils up in her chest.

What purpose have I trained for? What side am I on? I thought the demons were the greatest evil in this world... but... but...

"Lady Berthold! We-he-hell, a pleasure to see you!"

A man's voice booms out from behind Phoebe. She nearly shrieks in fright, but instead opts to whirl around and stare at him, her eyes wide as saucers.

"M-mister- I mean, Sir Gallant?"

A fat, repulsive man leers toward her, his body covered in ill-fitting armor and far too much chest hair for anyone's liking. A badly trimmed mustache worms its way across his upper lip, like a corba searching for a meal. "Why, yes ma'am! That's me! Did you come to watch us flog these blood-skins too? I'll be damned. I had no idea you were that kind of lady."

Phoebe swallows hard and forces herself to calm down. "I... I came here... to, ah..."

"Heeey, no need to be shy! Come on in. We like to have good fun down here, if you know what I mean. Haha!"

Gallant walks past her and licks his lips as he stares at the fresh meat lined up against the wall. "Sweet Jesus, look at all these filthy sodding bloodsuckers. Each of 'em looks like a sweet chunk of beef just waiting to be tenderized. Haha!"

Gallant slams his boot into the closest male's genitals, then decks him in the face before the demon can yell out in pain. "Hahaha! Nothing better than defenseless blood-skins to let out a little anger. Wanna have a go? They can't hurt you none, not with those collars on."

Phoebe's eyes avoid the lower regions of the demons as she tries not to look at their exposed bodies too much. "N-no."

Instead, her eyes gravitate toward the collars around their necks. Cursed Necklaces. They sap the energy from demons and leave them unable to fight back. Demons can't remove the collars... only humans can.

Having served on the Round Table for several years, Phoebe knows full well the capabilities of Camael's divine artifacts. However, having never witnessed their usage in person, her stomach churns as she realizes how the prison guards use them.

Gallant continues walking the line before kneeling to stare at the little girl. Phoebe's heart pounds in her chest as he strokes her hair. "Aww. You look terrified, my delectable butterfly. You should be. We're gonna stick you in the Bull. Know what that is? Of course, you don't. It's a hollow metal animal that makes your screams louder. Then we're gonna cook you over a fire. If your pitiful shrieks don't convince everyone here to spill their secrets... hehe... nothing will."

As Sir Gallant strokes her hair, the little girl's older brother suddenly yanks on his chains, lifts himself by his chains, and delivers a kick smack into Gallant's face. The prison-master stumbles back and slams on his back, creating a scene of chaos among the nearby prison guards. He spits and sputters for a moment before hauling his fat ass up.

"Why, y-you piece of FILTH! You won't live to regret that!" He grabs a wooden club from the wall and wipes a drop of blood from his nose. Then, he charges at the girl's brother, but Phoebe suddenly steps in his way and knocks him to the ground yet again.

"Sir Gallant! I-is this how you act when a superior officer is watching?!" Phoebe's voice cracks slightly, but she forces herself to stand dominantly and tower over the man sitting on the floor. "I came here to inspect the dungeons, not to watch you unleash your fantasies on children!"

Gallant stares at her in surprise, then clamber to his feet once again. "I... I beg your pardon? I'm the bloody prison-master! I can do as I please to these filthy monsters! Have you any idea the horrors they committed against our brothers and sisters in the South? The bodies stacked higher than the huts!"

Phoebe falters. "Th-they did?"

Sir Gallant's nostrils flare. "Aye. So, before you let your feminine sensibilities get in the way of your duty, I advise you to remember what fiends you're dealing with."

Doubt appears in Phoebe's mind. However, the sound of the little girl's chains rattling behind her solidifies her convictions.

"I have my orders, Sir Gallant. I'm temporarily relieving you of your duty until we can evaluate your conduct and treatment of the prisoners."

Sir Gallant stares at her and gawks for several agonizing seconds. He clutches the club in his hand a little tighter. "You... you treacherous demon-loving whore... the King will hear of this treason!"

Phoebe swallows hard, but keeps her eyes locked on his. "That he will. Leave."

Snarling like a madman, Sir Gallant eyes Phoebe for a several moments before swearing under his breath and storming out of the room.

"You'll regret crossing me."

Phoebe's hands shake as she forces herself not to think about her actions. Keep moving, Phoebe. No time to waste.

After Sir Gallant the Brave storms away, Phoebe turns to face the little girl. "I'm sorry, child. I'm sorry the bad men treated you like that. Let me get those shackles off..."

Only now does she realize that she hasn't a clue how to do that. Luckily, the girl's brother coughs and nods across the room. "O-over there. The keys. Please, save my sister. Ose is a good girl. She doesn't deserve what those men are going to do to her."

Lady Berthold doesn't waste time in grabbing the keys and walking back over.

As soon as she unshackles the child, the girl slumps and falls into Phoebe's arms. Her tiny little body is weak from exhaustion. Phoebe's heart trembles as she picks the girl up in her arms. Ose whimpers. "Brother... don't leave my brother behind, please..."

Several of the other demons stare at Phoebe longingly. Take us with you, their eyes beg.

The last remaining succubus trembles. "Th-they took my friends. They're torturing Merle and Hana right now! You have to help them... you don't know what the guards do to captured succubi..."

"I can't. I can't." Phoebe glances across the room in the direction of the inner torture chambers. Only now does she recall the horror stories she's heard about nonstop rape and torture in the dungeons. Demon prisoners naturally receive far worse punishments than humans.

She chews her lip into shreds. "I can't save them. But... I'll try and save the women here. I'll do what I can."

Indeed, she glances around at the thirty shackled females and the nearly sixty males. I can't save everyone. If I walk out of the dungeon with all the captured demons, someone will stop me. If it's only the women, perhaps I can make up an excuse.

Nodding to herself, she quickly rushes around, releasing all of the women before pausing in front of the little girl's brother. He shakes his head. "Don't. If you release me, you'll have to release the other men as well. I don't deserve special treatment." Phoebe nods, but jumps onto a stool and unlocks his shackles anyway. He slumps a little but catches himself before falling.

"Hug your sister. Quickly."

The demon nods and takes his little sister from Phoebe. He presses her against his chest. "B-be strong, Ose. I'm sorry. I love you."

The girl weeps in his arms. "I love you too... don't stay... come with us! Come-"

He pushes her away and raises his arms again for Phoebe to shackle him. "No. I stay. The women leave. And to you, human... thank you."

Phoebe nods, as the sound of women screaming in the distance raises several alarm bells in her mind. "Alright. Little one, follow me. Ladies, line up. I have to bind your hands and chain you all together. If I don't, it will draw too much suspicion."

The demonesses glance at each other. We have to trust this human, their eyes say. Fearing the return of the guards, they quickly hustle into the line, with the little girl at the front. Phoebe tosses chains and cuffs to them, then strings the shackles along to their neck collars.

Not a minute later, they leave, their chains clinking as they walk. The little girl stares silently at her brother, and he nods back at her. "Be safe, little sister."

It takes Phoebe more than thirty minutes of walking at agonizingly slow speeds, but she still sighs in relief when the chained demonesses reach the spiral staircase. They climb the steps, forming a strange conga line.

After ten full minutes, Phoebe spies the top of the stairwell. The guard from before watches her pace up the steps, and he cranes his neck to see what's causing all the chain rattling noise. When he sees the line of women, his suspicion immediately rises. "Hey! What's going on here? Where are you taking all the demon whores?!"

Phoebe bites her lip and forces another lie out. "King Arthur's orders. I'm taking them to a different facility."

"Yeah? Did Sir Gallant sign off on this? I'm supposed to know who's coming and going!"

Phoebe rises to her full height, still an inch or two shorter than the lad. "Are you questioning King Arthur's orders? What's your name, guardsman? Perhaps I should tell Arthur you wish to be the new King, since you think your orders supersede his."

The youth's face pales again. "Oh, no! I meant no disrespect, milady. I... I'm just trying to do my job. That's all."

The little girl pushes to Phoebe's side as the guard's gaze fixes on her for a moment. Phoebe reaches back subtly and touches her hair. "Good. If you have a problem, I'll let King Arthur know about your complaint. Open the door for us."

The youth pauses for only a moment, sighing as he eyes the sultry nude red-skinned women. He takes a few steps and throws the door open, standing outside so they can leave. "As you wish."

Phoebe marches outside, the demon ladies in tow. She continues to amble along, so nobody will trip and fall. One woman gasps in surprise, and Phoebe turns back just in time to see the young guard smacking her bottom. "Move it, cutie! They're gonna looove you at the other camp! Haha. Damn shame, I couldn't have a turn before you leave. Maybe I can pay you a visit later, eh?"

Phoebe grits her teeth, but keeps walking. Bear with it. We have a long, long walk ahead of us. I don't know how in the hell we're going to get through town.

Indeed, Phoebe's lack of planning comes rushing to her all at once as she realizes they still have five miles of the village to travel through before she can safely release the women.

The guard stares at the prisoners for a solid twenty seconds before sighing and closing the door behind himself. The demoness closest to Phoebe, right behind the little girl, looks around worriedly. "What now, human? We're right next to the castle. Someone could see us at any moment."

Phoebe inhales, and her hand starts to tremble.

Oh god, oh god, oh god. What do I do? I can't believe myself. All this, and we could end up captured by guardsmen. Every second we spend waiting is another second that doom draws nearer.

Suddenly, from the side of the dungeon tower, a single figure steps out. Phoebe's heart pounds as she hears the heavy footsteps. When she whirls, she gapes in shock at Sir Percival. He stares back silently, first at her, then the demon women all chained together.

"I knew it. Lady Berthold... what are you planning? Why are half of the prisoners out here naked and chained up?"

Phoebe's mouth opens and closes several times as she tries to formulate an answer. "K-king Arthur- he told m-me to..."

"Lies." Percival strides over to Phoebe, and slowly his gaze lowers to the cowering child. "Dammit, Phoebe. Dammit. Now you've stepped in the shit."

Tears begin rolling down Phoebe's face. "P-Percival, please... they're helpless women. The things those men were going to do to them..."

Percival closes his eyes. "They're demons. Temptresses. They beguile men, and now you as well."

Despite the harshness of Percival's voice, something about his behavior strikes Phoebe as odd. She finds out why when he continues speaking. "Alright. I'll help you. Take the women to your house, just across the way. If someone spots you crossing the castle yard, you're on your own. I'll bring a horse and wagon, big enough to fit them all inside. Give me thirty minutes."

Phoebe stares at him in stunned silence for a moment, then nods. "I... thank you, Percival. I don't know why you're helping us, but-"

"I'm not helping the demons," Percival mutters. "I'm doing this for you. You're a kind woman. You will be punished horribly once the King finds out what happened. They might even execute you. The least I can do is make sure that your rescue operation isn't fruitless."

Percival strides away, unable to look Phoebe in the eye. She and the demons watch in stunned silence as he leaves.

The demoness behind Phoebe shakes her chains. "L-let's get a move on, then. We can't stand in front of the dungeon."

Phoebe nods, a sensation of loss looming in the back of her mind. "Right. Let's hurry."

Part 057: Her Country, Or Her Morality?

Phoebe's heart pounds like a thousand galloping stallions. The women quickly shuffle into her house, but only after Phoebe shuts the door does a faint feeling of relief wash over her.

A panic attack immediately follows.

Trembling violently, Phoebe clutches her chest, gasping for breath as sweat and terror drench her body. She shivers and mutters incomprehensibly, before falling to her knees. When she comes to, the demoness at the front of the line is straining to get closer to her, with the one behind her being as accommodating as possible, given the circumstances.

"Fleshbag? Are you okay? What's wrong?"

Phoebe blinks. "I... I'm... scared. I disobeyed the king. We're all going to die. They'll behead me. I'm evil. I betrayed my people."

Phoebe babbles rapidly, releasing her pent-up emotions upon the unwitting demoness. However, the succubus merely nods without passing judgment.

"You're not evil; you're brave. Never thought I'd see the day when a human would save us from other humans."

Phoebe pulls herself up and fumbles for the key she took from the jail cell. She unhooks each demon's bindings but stops short of removing their leg and arm shackles. "I have to keep these on until we leave the city. It won't do to have you all unbound in the back of the wagon. The guards will be suspicious."

The succubus nods. "A sound idea. I'd rather free myself and try to escape now, but I can't repay your kindness with selfishness. Not when those animals still have Merle and Hana locked down in those hellish dungeons."

Phoebe nods. She unlocks the little girl's restraints, then walks over to her closet and grabs a blouse. "I won't parade women nude through the city. We'd be begging for trouble. Everyone, come here and take my clothes. I'll fetch blankets from upstairs for the rest of you."

The small house, barely more than a few rooms, teems with life as the women pass clothing from one to the next, sighing when they can't get any of their arms through the sleeves. Phoebe returns to undo and redo each of the women's bindings one after the other, allowing them to put the shirts and pants on comfortably.

A drop of sweat rolls down her back. Percival... it's been over half an hour. Where are you?

The little girl, Ose, sniffles. "Big brother... they're both gone. I'm... I'm never gonna see them again."

Phoebe walks over and hugs the girl, trying to comfort her. "No. I'll do what I can to help the men. My life is already forfeit at this point. I won't let your brother die, little one."

A sudden pounding at the door makes every person in the cottage jump in fright. Phoebe draws her sword and holds it behind her back, nodding at the women to make them stay out of sight. Only when she cracks open the door and spots Percival standing in the doorway does she relax slightly.

Percival jerks his head from left to right. "Are they all here? Did anyone see you?"

Phoebe nods, then shakes her head. Yes, they are. No... I don't think anyone did. Thank you, Percival. Leave, before anyone sees you here. I don't want you getting involved beyond this. You're a wonderful knight."

"Shut up. Get the whores out here and loaded into the covered wagon. I'm going with you."

Phoebe shakes her head. "No! You can't! My life is already over! Don't throw yours away, too!"

"I'll throw away whatever I damn well please." Percival eyes Phoebe silently for a moment. "I told you. I'm not helping the bloody demons. I'm saving you, Phoebe. After we release these women, I want you to flee with me. I have a relative outside Camelot's borders. He'll take us in."

Phoebe shakes her head. "I won't. I'm going to submit to the crown for my punishment afterward. I can't live with my betrayal of His Majesty."

Percival grits his teeth. "God... damned... woman. Confound you. We don't have time to argue. Ladies! Get out here, on the double. The guard shifts will be changing at high-noon at the border gates. We have to leave before Sir Lorgon arrives. No way he'll let us pass."

Phoebe's face whitens. Sir Lorgon?! I forgot about him. He hates demons more than just about anyone else. He lost his wife and daughter to them.

Phoebe quickly looks back and beckons at the demonesses peeking around the corner. "Come quickly."

The women nod and shuffle out as fast as their feet can move. Phoebe takes the little girl in her arms and hoists her into the wagon parked mere feet from her door, obscuring her house entrance from prying eyes.

Percival helps each woman up, barely giving a passing glance at their ill-fitting and often embarrassingly revealing clothes. Instead, he steals glances at Phoebe now and then.

Once everyone enters the wagon, Percival closes the front and back, hiding the cowering women from prying eyes. "If anyone looks inside, make yourselves look as pitiful and weak as possible. Pretend you've already suffered terribly in the dungeon."

They nod in unison. Simple enough, their eyes say. It wouldn't be a lie.

Percival and Phoebe climb into the wagon's front. Only now does she take the time to look around. Several people are playing horseshoes across the distance, but they don't seem to notice the covered wagon.

"Percival, please. Leave. You've done enough for me already."

"I won't," he says matter-of-factly. "If there are two Knights of the Round, that will legitimize our leaving the castle with thirty demon prisoners. If it's just you, a woman, they might question your sensibilities."

Phoebe blushes. She looks away, unable to meet his gaze. "Th-thank you... Sir Percival. You're too kind."

"No." The man takes the reins, and the horses start walking. "I'm selfish. I'm only doing this because I... toward you... I feel..."

"I must remain chaste," Phoebe says, cutting him off. "We can't. I vowed to the Mother of the Lord."

Percival clamps his mouth shut. He runs a hand through his windswept blonde hair. "So you say."

Both Knights of the Round ride in silence toward the city gate. Minutes pass. Phoebe's anxiety increases as they draw nearer and nearer. It's a trap. It's a trap.

Finally, the city gate appears in the distance. The wall surrounding Camelot, made of stone and steel, stands a mere fifteen-feet tall, but with a wagon-full of chained women, it might as well be a mile high.

"Let me do the talking," Percival mutters. "You look like you're about to have a panic attack."

Phoebe clutches her hands into fists. "Last chance, Percival."

"Mhm."

The man doesn't bat an eye.

The guards up ahead turn and spot the wagon coming. They hold up their spears to stop the horses. "Whoa, whoa! Hey there, Sir Percival, Lady Berthold! You headed somewhere?"

Percival nods, forming his face into steel. "We are. I'm taking a batch of the blood-skins we recently captured to a holding facility just outside of Camelot. Dungeon's too full for them right now."

"Zat so?" The black-haired guard swaggers over to the rear of the cart and flips it open. "Huh. They're all women. Why're you taking all the whores out of the city?"

Percival doesn't bat an eye. "I only do what the King and Sir Gallant ordered. He kept a few of the prettiest ones for himself. You might even get to have a taste if you pop over after your shift."

The guard sucks air through his teeth and glances at the sun. "Oooh, shiet! You're right! It's goddamn near high-noon! I might be able to break some backs and call in a few favors. If these babes are the ugly ones, I can't wait to see the cute ones!"

The succubus flinches as she realizes what his words mean. My sisters...

Closing the rear curtain, the guardsman saunters to the front. "Hokay then! Don't have too much fun on the way over! And for you, Lady Berthold, don't let this scoundrel take any extended breaks, hahaha! Lord only knows the moaning will drive you-"

Percival glares ice at the guardsman. "Are you done belching words yet?"

"Uhh..." The man nods dumbly at the imposing knight decked out in full platemail. "Y-yeah. Sorry." He shuffles awkwardly over to the other guards. "Alright, let 'em through."

The horses clop across the ground as the guards swing open a gate for them. "Take care!"

Phoebe and Percival nod in unison, forcing themselves not to appear relieved.

Only once the gates slam shut behind them, and half a mile passes, do the two knights finally sag their shoulders.

"Heavens." Phoebe shivers. "That was terrifying. How did you keep your calm?"

Percival stares ahead blankly for a few moments. Then, he turns his head toward the white-haired woman. "I pissed myself."

"Y-you did?" Phoebe's eyes slowly lower to his lower region.

"Mhm. I'll need new trousers when we reach my relative's house."

Phoebe turns to gaze ahead, and a moment later, she chuckles. She starts with a quiet snicker but soon erupts into roaring laughter as she slaps her knee and guffaws at the top of her lungs. "Hahahaha!!!"

Percival joins in, and the two of them howl and poke each other cutely, ignoring the demons peeping through the front flaps to see what's so funny.

Two miles pass. Then three. Phoebe glances back and sighs in relief at the distant walls of Camelot. "We'll go on foot from here. It shouldn't take long for the dungeon keepers to alert the city guards."

Percival doesn't slow the horse. "Do you trust these demons? You'll have to remove their collars. You don't know how dangerous demons are, Lady Berthold. You have yet to see what they can do."

Phoebe twirls a few hairs around her finger. "I saved their lives. Do you think they'd stab me in the back now? Have you no faith?"

Percival's gaze lowers. "You're too trusting. Demons are evil. No matter how sweet or innocent they may appear, they are irredeemable."

"And humans are better?" A tinge of anger appears on Phoebe's face. "What I saw in those dungeons was a horror unlike anything else. Demon or not, they look like us, yet we treat them worse than animals. You act as if they're subhumans."

"Tch." Percival pulls on the reins, slowing the horses to a stop. "If you're resolute in your beliefs, release the she-devils. Do what you wish. My life is already forfeit, as is yours."

Phoebe doesn't reply. She pulls open the flap, then climbs inside. The demons look away, having heard the conversation the knights just shared. A sensation of shame and despair washes over the group.

The little girl stares up at Phoebe. "Do you think demons and humans can be friends?"

Phoebe nods, kissing the child on her forehead. "I do, precious one."

"But... but humans took my brothers..."

"Not all humans are like that." Phoebe sighs. "Most are, though. I'm sorry. I wish we could all get along."

The succubus nods. "As do I."

Phoebe unshackles everyone in the cart. They rub their sore wrists and ankles, relieved that their captivity is behind them. Phoebe pauses for a moment, then removes the first Cursed Necklace from the little girl. A small static shock makes her recoil, but she quickly moves on and continues releasing each of the remaining demons. Within a few minutes, she finishes freeing everyone.

Phoebe clambers past the demons to head for the front, but the Succubus grabs her wrist. "Wait. Human. Before we leave, kneel down."

Phoebe eyes the succubus quizzically but does as she's asked. To her surprise, the demoness pulls Phoebe's head in close and plants a passionate kiss on her mouth.

"Mgmm?!" Phoebe pushes away from the demon, a look of surprise on her face. "W-what?! Why? Th-that's forbidden!"

The succubus smiles and rubs her two little horns. "I don't care about your human laws. All I care about is you. You've saved us all, and awoken a passion in me I haven't felt before. I'll see to it that you're welcome among my sisters any time."

Phoebe nods dumbly. "I... I see. Thank you... I... suppose..."

She stumbles forward into the front cabin. Percival raises an eyebrow. "Are you okay? Did they hurt you?"

"No. I don't... think so." Phoebe's eyes lower. "Let's get a move-"

Behind them, in the distance, a horn blows from the city's watchtower.

Bwaaaaaaah.

Phoebe's blood turns to ice. "We have to run! They're pursuing us!"

All the demons leap out of the rear of the cart at once. One of the women gathers the others around and makes a few motions with her hands. "I'm summoning a faint mirage around us. My illusion magic is weak, but it will throw off any hounds. Let's go!"

Phoebe watches as the demon women flee toward the forest a few miles away. Each demon glances at her for only a moment, then they all take off, fleeing for their lives.

Percival leaps into action, loosing two of the horses. "You take the mare. I'll take the stallion. Let's go!"

The white-haired woman doesn't move. Instead, she continues to gaze at the backs of the demon women as they flee for their lives. "No. I told you. I'll submit to my punishment honorably. No matter what His Majesty does to me, I will not walk the path of a coward. What I did was just. I will plead my case."

Percival blanches. "Lady Berthold! If you go back, they won't allow you to plead for anything! We committed treason! It's beheadings or the gallows for both of us!"

A rock forms in Phoebe's throat, one that won't dissolve no matter how hard she swallows. "King Arthur is a just man. He will spare me. I believe in him. He will force me to slave in the fields for the rest of my life, or throw me in the dungeon until I die... but he will not execute me."

Phoebe climbs off the cart and turns her back to Percival. "Farewell, Sir Percival. Leave and save yourself. This is my burden to bear."

"Phoebe..."

Percival's voice cracks. Tears roll down his face.

"Don't go. Please. Please. I beg you."

Phoebe ignores him and begins walking toward the city. Her boots crunch against the loose dirt and twigs lining the well-traveled road. Her eyes gaze ahead, imagining the future.

She smiles. At the least, I succeeded. I released those poor women. God will look upon me favorably. Even if the king punishes me to a life in prison... even if the guards ravage me in place of the demons... I know my choice was correct.

Another voice in her head speaks. Was it? You released demons! They are God's mortal enemy. Your countrymen will hang you... as you deserve.

Something grabs Phoebe's arm. She turns around in surprise to see Percival, tears in his eyes.

"I love you, Phoebe. I won't leave you to die alone. I'll return with you. I'll be honorable and strong... just... just as you are. I won't let you face the gallows by yourself."

Phoebe inhales, seeing the passion in his eyes. "Percival..."

In the distance, horse hooves galloping toward them make the two knights stiffen. Phoebe and Percival turn to face their doom; their faces pale with terror.

"We could still flee," Percival offers, though he can see the riders approaching now.

"No. It's too late. We will accept our fates nobly, Sir Percival."

They stand in silence as the army of a hundred strong draws near, confusion on some of their faces. The cavalry eventually slows to a stop, their horses kicking up dust toward Phoebe and Percival.

A vicious-looking man with a full beard stares down at the two silent warriors. Sir Lorgon. The rage of his face ripples through the air. "Bald-faced traitors! Where are the demon whores?!"

Phoebe doesn't back down. "I released them. The women don't deserve the horrors of the dungeon. We shall return to the castle and allow His Majesty to sentence us for our crimes."

Lorgon's teeth grind together. "You dare humiliate my brother, Sir Gallant the Brave, yet think I'll allow you to live?! Traitors die where they stand!"

He makes a quick motion with his fingers, and two riders raise their bows at Phoebe and Percival.

Percival gasps. "What? No! The King-"

"There is no king here, foolish broad! I have the right to sentence two demon-lovers to death! FIRE!"

Phoebe's eyes widen as the arrows fly from their bows toward her. Time crawls in slow motion as she passively waits for her death to arrive. Instead, something massive shoves her out of the way. A choked wheeze erupts from Percival's lips as he jumps in front of her. An arrow lances into his chest, sentencing him to certain death.

The knight stumbles backward and lands on top of Phoebe, stunned, as his eyes lurch to the arrows in his gut. "G-guh! Muh-hurk!"

Sir Lorgon snarls. "Hah! The brave aristocrat wishes to die protecting his harlot. Give him what he wishes. Fire!"

"Nooo!" Phoebe screams in terror as Percival's body spasms. Two more arrows plunge into his chest. When the archers nock two more, something unexpected happens. All of the horses in the troop begin to buck and whinney in terror.

One of the Privates cries out in alarm. "What in god's name?! Something's got the mares spooked!"

Phoebe stares at the back of Percival's head as he lays on top of her, his arms spread out protectively. Warm blood trickles from his chest, wraps around his body, and spills onto her light, leathery armor. "Percival... Percival..."

"Ph... Phoeb... e..."

From across the field, a blur of motion catches one cavalryman's attention, even as his horse kicks and bucks. "O-over there! In the grass! What is- GWAH!"

A flash of green leaps from the grass, tears the youth from his saddle, and jumps away, dragging the poor bastard into the dense grass on the opposite side of the road.

Lorgon's eyes widen. "To arms! Abandon these damned horses!" He dismounts and lands on the ground, smacking his steed's ass to send it running away before drawing his sword. The other men quickly follow suit.

The screams of their fellow soldier in the field, loud at first, suddenly go silent. A sensation of terror appears in their minds.

The creature, animal, monster, or whatever it is, leaps from the tall grass again.

"Look out!"

A man yells and raises his shield, but the monster, a terrifying human-shaped crocodile, smashes against it, shatters the man's arm in fifteen places, and slams him into the ground. The green-scaled monster whips its bladed tail in a horizontal motion and slices five other men in half before they can react.

"F-form a circle! Attack its weak spots!" Lorgon bellows orders quickly, having more battle experience than the troops from the city, soldiers that Phoebe herself trained not a summer before.

"What weak spots?! AAAUGH!" A man explodes into a puddle of gore as the lizard-like monster roars angrily. "Flee! Flee before the might of Agares!"

On the other side of the men, opposite the Duke of Reptiles, a wolf howls. From the distant forest, a four-legged creature with fifty eyes bolts from its cover, dashing across the fields at speeds one would be hard-pressed to follow with their eyes. The creature, a Hellhound, moves at thrice the speed of a cheetah, tearing up the ground during its mad dash. The flesh-rending razor-sharp teeth in its mouth, capable of tearing apart the finest steel armor in the world, shine menacingly as the horrific monster charges the poorly grouped-up defensive line.

Lorgon's eyes bulge. "Brace for impact!!!"

BOOM. The Hellhound batters the wall of troops, sending them flying. Bones snap, shatter, and twist. Men rain from the sky. Before they can hit the ground, the monster leaps into the air and tears them apart ruthlessly.

Agares laughs. "Excellent work, Lucifer!"

"Shut up! Kill! Tear!" The female hellhound unleashes her ravenous claws upon the defenseless troops, sending them rushing away in a panic. Her claws shred their steel armor like wet paper.

Phoebe stares at the two demons in terror as Percival's eyes flutter shut. She turns to look at him. "P-Percival... stay with me. Stay alive!"

The knight smiles. "Phoebe... won't you say... you love me? Just this once? Just... just this..."

Percival takes his last breath. His soul leaves him, and his body slumps against the woman he loves. Phoebe stares in silent horror. Then, her eyes return to the two demons. When they draw near, she whimpers.

Agares leans down. "White hair. Is she the one?"

The hellhound stalks over to Phoebe, its monstrous face and smoky-black skin sending terror through her body. All fifty of its eyes lock onto her.

Sniff. Sniff. "I smell the scent of our brothers. She is the one the child spoke of. She will take us to our comrades."

Phoebe's lip quivers. "Who...? What?"

"Devil's sake, Lucifer. She's petrified." Agares delivers a bone-crushing kick to a soldier trying to crawl away, flinging the man hundreds of feet. The distant whump of his body impacting the ground signals his demise.

Lucifer's animal body begins to shift and morph. Within moments, she returns to her demonic form, and all Phoebe can do is stare with a mixture of trepidation and awe.

These two are Demon Emperors?!

Lucifer's muscular body and dark red skin contrast with the tight black leather she wears. Hundreds of razor-sharp teeth line her mouth, but Phoebe's eyes stare mostly at four massive breasts, each one the size of a cow's udders. Coupled with her wolverine claw-like hands, the demon woman appears to be a mixture of several species of animals.

When Lucifer turns to look at Phoebe, a third eye emerges on her forehead and locks onto the human. The eye, Phoebe notes, has several circular rings and is shaped like an archery target, with a red pupil smack in the center. "You're lucky, fleshbag. You saved my sisters. Were it not for that; I'd tear you apart like the rest of your kind. Get up!"

The demoness flings Percival to the side and yanks Phoebe up roughly by her arm. Phoebe whimpers at the demon's powerful grip. "Aaaoo! You're hurting me! Let me go! I need to bury-"

"What are you blabbering about?" Lucifer raises her claws to strike Phoebe. "Take us to the dungeon! I will see my brothers freed, or your life will be-"

"Lucifer!" Agares bellows, silencing the woman. "Calm yourself. Save your rage for those worth fighting. Use your nose and eye. What can this weak little girl do for us? We don't need her. We'll save our comrades ourselves."

Lucifer scowls at the reptile, but lowers her claw and releases Phoebe anyway. "Tch. I don't need a Duke to give me orders."

"Got something to say?" Agares hisses, shooting her a look of disdain. "I can't wait to hear it."

Lucifer rolls her eyes. "You always play the sympathy card."

The Demon Emperor of Providence leans toward Phoebe and sniffs like a mad hound. Then, Lucifer grabs the top of Phoebe's head and forces the human to look into her third eye.

An impression of weightlessness envelops Phoebe for a moment, making her feel as though she's starting to float into the air. The sensation vanishes abruptly when Lucifer tosses the human aside like a ragdoll.

Crack.

Phoebe lands fifteen feet away and nearly breaks her arm when she hits the dirt. "Aahhn..."

Lucifer doesn't give the human a passing glance. She turns to look at Agares. "Found them. Our brothers are trapped inside a dungeon adjacent to the castle. You'll have to slow down Arthur and his knights. I'll rescue our men."

Phoebe stares wordlessly as the two demons bicker, ignoring her entirely.

"You expect me to handle the Hero-King?! You're the Third Emperor! You fight him, and I'll rescue the prisoners. Besides, your hellhounds will fare better against his knights."

Lucifer hisses at the lizard. "Fine, scared little frog. Send your critters into the catacombs and rescue our warriors. Time's running short. Based on what I saw, they've already killed at least a few of our kin. I won't let the filthy fleshbags embarrass us, not today!"

Before the two demons move to run away, Lucifer swivels her head and glares bloody daggers at Phoebe. "You've been spared. Should we ever meet again, expect death. I hate the stench of your kind."

Turning away, the demoness morphs once again into her fifty-eyed demonic-dog form and howls. From the forest, a chorus of other animals wail in return.

Phoebe shudders as thirty massive Hellhounds, all shaped like the Demon Emperor, come bursting out of the trees toward her. Lucifer growls at Agares. "Come on, then! Let's go."

She and the lizard-demon dash away, tearing apart a few straggling soldiers in their path.

Many minutes pass.

Eventually, Phoebe turns to stare at Percival's cooling corpse. She crawls over to him and rests his head in her lap. The light in his eyes, now gone, make a chorus of memories wash over her.

She remembers all the times he would rub her muscles after her training, or when he would offer excuses for her tardiness at the Round Table. She remembers the side-glances he gave her when they sat beside each other at the Round Table, as well as the time when he covertly left a rose beside her bed when she fell sick with the flu.

Phoebe weeps uncontrollably. Percival. You always looked out for me. How did I repay you? How did I repay my king? I betrayed you and him both. Now a horde of demons descends on Camelot. What... what am I supposed to do? Everyone put their faith in me... but... but I...

Phoebe buries her face in Percival's neck and sobs for several minutes as she presses him close. Distant screams from the city rattle her mind. So do the horrible howls of the Hellhounds tearing villagers apart.

She eventually pulls herself back together and cradles his head for a few moments longer. Standing up, she lifts his heavy body, exerting her toned muscles with all her strength. She walks a few hundred feet away and lays him on the ground, then draws her sword, hacks at the dirt, and slowly carves out a pit.

Her tears don't stop. She digs and digs and digs until finally she's torn up enough ground to make a shallow grave. Gently, she places her comrade's body in the dirt, staring at him for only a moment before piling the soil on top.

She jams her sword into the ground at the head of his grave, then gets up, and slowly walks over to the wagon and horses.

I have nowhere to go. Nowhere to call home. I'm no knight. I'm a failure. I betrayed my people for the sake of demons.

She unhooks both horses, keeping only one for herself.

I will wander these lands. I will fast until I find death atop a mountain. Death by starvation. A fitting punishment for a sinner such as I.

She rattles the reins and nudges the horse to go forward, hardening herself to the cries behind her.

Survive, Arthur. Never forgive me.

Phoebe doesn't meet my eyes. She stares at the ground for several long moments.

"So, you see, Jason... I failed everyone. That's all I am, nothing but a failure. I've never killed anyone in my entire life, but I stabbed my king and my nation in the back. I couldn't protect everyone from Beelzebub's attack. I'm nothing but a useless, pathetic, weak woman."

I swallow, unsure how to reply. Several moments pass. I decide to hug Phoebe. "You're not a failure. You made a hard decision. The way I see it, those demons would have attacked the city anyway. They were there to free their captured comrades. All you did was save thirty innocents."

Phoebe shakes her head, wiping her face against my chest. She pushes me away. "That's not true, Jason! Don't you see? Percival died because of me! All that happened thanks to my betrayal was death and suffering!"

"I don't think so." I ponder her story and its implications. "Look, the humans were torturing those demons. Your gut told you to save the women because you care about everyone equally. What if you had left them there to die? Would you feel better about respecting your king if it meant such acts of barbarism could continue? You sacrificed your standing with Arthur to save lives."

An odd feeling dawns on me. "Hell... you're better at self-sacrifice than I am. I couldn't surrender my morality to kill Amelia. Hoarhiim had to do it for me. You made an impossible decision. Besides, you don't know that Arthur would have punished you. Maybe he would have been lenient."

"He wouldn't." Phoebe's voice holds a note of finality. "You don't understand how much humans hated demons in those days. How much they still do."

I reach over and take her hand in mine. "Perhaps not. I didn't know the guy, so I can only guess at his thoughts."

Phoebe smiles faintly. "As I said, I saw him during the battle on Polaris. My heart nearly stopped. I wanted to ask him... ask him how he felt, and if he hated me."

"What if he did?" I counter. "Would you have killed yourself? Don't you think that after 100,000 years, you can forgive some of your past? Nobody's perfect, Phoebe. Not you, not Arthur... certainly not me. Compared to Amelia, you're a saint, and I still believe she could have repented for her wickedness..."

My voice trails off as Amelia appears in my mind again. Phoebe notices, of course, and blushes.

"Sorry. I hate that we keep returning to Amelia," I say. "The sadness on your face hurts me as well."

"No, no, it's not your fault. It's mine. I'm telling you to forgive yourself, but here I am still tearing myself apart." Phoebe chuckles. "Haha... to be fair, my past is distant. Yours is recent. You've barely had time to heal. Perhaps we both have something to learn."

"Yeah."

We stare at each other for several moments.

I look away. "So, uh... that Percival guy. Blonde hair and blue eyes. Just like Arthur. Just like me."

I can almost hear the smoke coming from Phoebe's ears as her face turns crimson. "J-just a coincidence."

"Maybe. Someone told me about fate recently. Maybe there are no flukes in nature, you know? Perhaps everything happens for a reason."

When I turn back to Phoebe, her smile is gone. "Did Percival die for a reason, then? Did Arthur?"

Sighing, I pull away from her and aim my mind a short distance away. "I don't know, Phoebe. Sometimes death is senseless. It has no reason or rhyme. People die, and you can't save them, no matter how you try."

The Crown of Solomon activates as I form several mental images. "Truck!"

Before us, an exact copy of Phoebe's ten-ton monster-truck appears in midair, then slams into the ground.

Phoebe smiles. "You remembered."

"Of course, I did. I love you too much to forget."

She sticks her tongue out. "I love you more."

"I know."

She smacks my arm. "That's not what you're supposed to say!"

"I know."

"Jason!"

"Haha, I'm joshing around. C'mon, let's go for a drive."

The two of us walk over and climb in her truck, but before she nudges the accelerator, Phoebe blushes and smiles at me.

"I love you, Jason."

I smile back.

"I love you too. Forever and always."

Part 058: Time Heals All Wounds

I can't believe my eyes. It only took two short months for Hero City to become unrecognizable to me. Buildings ten stories tall loom over areas where small houses and mud huts once stood.

Phoebe drives her new truck along, pointing out various additions to the city.

"...And over here, I made these things I like to call Sidewalk-Water-Spitters. If a building catches fire, we can hook up these long hollow snakes to them and shoot water all over the fire."

"Nice invention, Phoebe. I think the name's a bit convoluted, though. How about calling them Fire Hydrants?"

Phoebe beams an award-winning smile at me. "Great thinking, Jason!"

I lean back in my seat and smile smugly. "I have my moments. How'd you managed to create these buildings so quickly? Normally, you'd need a team of a thousand workers slaving full time around the clock to build a single structure."

Phoebe shakes her head. "Oh, not anymore. I created a device that creates stone and brick out of energy. I still haven't thought of a good name for it, but we can build walls by aiming a gun at them. The Crown is useful! I barely know what I'm doing half the time, and it fills in the gaps!"

I reach up and pluck Solomon's Crown off my head, then stare at it absentmindedly. "Yeah. It's a damn shame we only have one of them."

A minute passes. As Phoebe and I stare at the road, I scratch my head.

"I don't know why I never tried doing this. Copy!"

Solomon's Crown stays in my left hand, but in my right, a second crown materializes, identical to the first.

"I can't tell if I'm smart for thinking to do this, or stupid for not trying it sooner. Oh, well." I stick the new crown on my head and glance around.

Nothing feels different.

Mental Map.

No change.

Phoebe glances at me as she pulls into a garage next to our home. "A second Crown?! That's great!"

"It's... a dud."

My voice flattens as I pull the new crown off my head. "Doesn't work. It looks identical to the original, but it's a useless piece of gold. Fuck. I bet it's because the Crown is a magical artifact."

"Oh. Never mind, then." Phoebe leans back and stretches in her seat. "Aaahn... god, I'm tired, Jason. How about you?"

I hand her the fake crown. "I'm tired too — long day. I can't rest just yet, though. We don't know if demons will attack or not."

The two of us hop out of the truck. Phoebe and I don each of our crowns. She seems disappointed that hers is little more than an ornament, but it makes her look like a queen, so she rolls with it.

"Jason, can we visit the Factory? I want to talk to Hans."

"Sure. I've got nothing better to do, for now."

"Hey, cutie, yer back!" A voice from behind makes me jump in fright. I whirl around to see an odd-looking lizard standing behind me.

Ah, he's a salamander. His red-scales glow under the waning sun.

"Is this yer boyfriend?"

Phoebe walks around the back of her truck and wraps herself around my right arm. "That's right! This is Jason, my fiance. Jason, this prettyy boy here is Ogie. He also has a wife named Jeera."

"Uh, pleased to meet you." I hold my left hand out, and the salamander stares at it with suspicion.

"Wassat? You want a handout, kid? I ain't made of money. Jeez, I thought the Hero would have enough to get by without begging."

"It's a greeting. We're supposed to, uh, shake hands."

"A greeting? But we already did that!"

I retract my hand. "N-never mind."

The salamander smiles at me with an odd look in his eye, then turns to Phoebe's truck. "What the hey? Did you get this thing refurbished by someone? Looks brand stinkin' new!"

"I kinda destroyed my old ride," Phoebe says. "Sorry. Jason built me a new one."

"Ah. No worries, then. I'll fix this lady the same as I did the other. Trucks're all the same to me." Ogie's tongue flicks out. "Saaay, you wouldn't happen to have any of those sweet-rolls left, would ya?"

Phoebe's body sags. "Sorry. I'll make some tomorrow, Ogie."

"No problem! I shouldn't eat so many anyway. Jeera says I'm puttin' on the pounds! Bahaha!" The Salamander rears up to almost my height and rubs his gut. "It's better if I take a couple o' days off the sweets!"

Several minutes later, Phoebe and I stroll down the street, hand in hand. Three Felaris boys bat a ball around with their paws, trying to play kitty-in-the-middle. The unfortunate middle-child swipes at the ball but always comes up short. "No fair! You guys are too fast!"

I gaze around at the gaggle of humans, monsters, and other mythical creatures alike all hanging out and playing together.

"You must have found a lot of monsters willing to join our cause while I was gone."

Phoebe shakes her head. "Not especially. Many of the newcomers lived on human worlds Neil reclaimed. A small number moved out of the Labyrinth at the recommendation of family members already living here."

The Factory, a giant building that takes up an entire city block, rises just ahead. "I take it everything has gone well, then?"

Phoebe doesn't reply for a few seconds. "Aside from Beelzebub's ambush, yes. Perhaps too well. I constantly worry that the peace and harmony we're enjoying won't last."

"You can make anything endure, but you have to struggle and sweat."

"Well, I'm willing to do that much."

We enter the factory through a set of automatic doors at the nearest corner, only to hear someone swearing in a German accent.

"Verdammt! Get off mein vorkbench! Pest!"

A Felaris girl hisses at Hans as he squirts her with a water bottle. "Kss! Jerk! Lemme sleep here! Leave me alone!"

"You're in zee way!" He squirts the cat-woman again, and she swipes at him with her sharp claws.

"Hans!" Phoebe walks over to him, mostly ignoring the cat-person. "What's going on here?"

She's hardly asked the question before the Felaris girl casually bats a nearby beaker filled with blue liquid off the table. Hans' eyes bulge as he tries to catch it, but he's too late. It falls off the desk and crashes to the floor, erupting in a smoky fizzle.

"Gahhh! Zat culture took two weeks to mature! Zees pest is causing me nothing but troubles!"

The felaris girl licks her paw innocently, flicking her tail around. "It was shiny."

"Sandy..." Phoebe rubs her head and sighs. "Can't you go curl up in a corner and let Mr. Wagner work in peace? He's a busy man."

The cat-girl pouts. "I don't wanna! It's warm on the desk!"

Her face is extremely catlike, with a mouth and nose that jut out and eyes like slits. However, her 'paws' resemble human hands with short talons sticking out. A thin layer of fur coats Sandy's body, but she wears human-like clothing. She's a weird amalgamation of human and cat that makes me a little uncomfortable.

Phoebe crosses her arms. "Go home. Don't make me grab a bucket of water."

The Felaris girl meets Phoebe's gaze for a few moments, then hops off the desk and walks past me, groaning all the while. "What a paaaain."

After she leaves, Hans grumbles and curses as he leans down and tries to scoop some of the already-dried liquid into a beaker. He isn't successful. "Shiza. Two weeks of work lost. Verdammt Felaris, always causing me trouble."

The thin, wiry German stands up and suddenly notices my presence. "Oh, Mein Fuhrer, apologies for mein conduct. I wasn't expecting any guests so late in zee day."

"Hans, I told you not to call me that."

He frowns, then waves off my complaint. "Right right, it slipped mein mind. I meant to say Mein Lieber, ja."

"Yeah. Anyway, Phoebe, why'd you want to come here?"

She pauses to look around Hans' workshop. "Where's that new design I had you working on?"

"Oh! Zee new suit! Ja, I made some progress on zee thing, but it was quite difficult to tweak. Zee technology is beyond mein level of expertise."

Hans walks over to a workbench and picks up a circular object with several wires sticking out of it. It's about the same width and circular shape as a compact disc, but with a height of thirty stacked atop one another.

"Zee protective capabilities are limited, but I believe zat with time, it could be a formidable weapon against zee demons."

He places it in Phoebe's outstretched palm. She studies it for a moment, looking everywhere at the seamless object with only a faint groove where the top pops off.

"Hmm. Looks the same as when I left it with you."

"Ja, ja. I have no Crown of Knowledge like you, so I make do with what I have." He walks over and picks up a clipboard with fifty papers stuffed in it, and hands it to Phoebe. "Here are zee new armor designs."

Phoebe stares at the page for three seconds, then shrugs. "Um, Jason... I can't read his language. Not without the Crown, anyway."

It's only now that I realize all the writing on the page is in German. I start to remove the Crown, but pause. Hang on a moment, I could give Phoebe the Crown, but isn't there a better way?

Naturally.

"Languages."

I speak the word, aiming at the three of our minds simultaneously. After a moment, Phoebe blinks and rubs her head. "Aaaaooow... what was that?"

"I think you can read German without the crown now. Give it a shot."

Phoebe nods and glances at the clipboard. "Oh! I can read it perfectly! Wow... Wordsmithing is versatile."

"To say the least."

I scan the documents along with her as she flips the pages. Thankfully, the Crown allows me to read at lightning speed and comprehend the information at levels beyond my brain's usual potential. Otherwise, I'd fall behind my wife. Even without the Crown, she devours the information with ease.

The paper reads:

The Environmental Adaptative Armor is a nano-technology-based suit that can fit a user of any size by forming dermal shielding around their body. It's lightweight and acts as a second skin, protecting the user from physical damage. While the suit has limited power, it's possible to extend the duration of the power cell by placing mobile power transmitters nearby.

I note with interest that its functionality resembles my old, discarded lightsaber design.

I propose that we create different suit variants for different combat units to maximize their warfare capabilities. The demons have hundreds of monster types at their disposal, and so should we. These suits have a secondary advantage in that our soldiers can wear them under their civilian uniforms and activate the armor even during a surprise demon attack.

I continue reading the rest of the report, glancing every so often at Phoebe's face.

I'd never have thought of this. Phoebe, you're smart and beautiful, yet you don't give yourself enough credit for creativity.

Phoebe finishes reading the documents. "Excellent work, Hans. You've outdone yourself. Continue working on the new armor. Do you have anyone working on those Recall Markers?"

"Ja. They're already done."

Hans reaches under his desk and plops a tiny pill-sized piece of metal in Phoebe's hand.

She smiles and hops excitedly. "Oh, Hans! I knew I could count on you!"

"Ja, ja, German engineering is truly something to behold with awe."

Later, Phoebe and I trudge toward our palace, arm in arm. She looks at me for a moment, then looks away, as if she has something to say but doesn't know how to say it.

"What? Felaris got your tongue?"

She glances over to where the three boys were playing. Now they're swinging sticks at each other and pretending they're sword-fighters.

"J-Jason... kids are nice, aren't they?"

"Huh? Oh, sure. Why do you ask?"

A long pause follows.

The wind ripples down the street, colder than when I left. Phoebe shivers and pulls a little closer.

"W-well, you know... kids are... they're innocent and fun, and they remind me of my childhood."

"Uh-huh..."

She's trying to take this conversation somewhere. I don't think I need the Crown of Solomon to follow the dots.

"Say, Phoebe... I was gone for two whole months. I don't suppose you got a new boyfriend or fiance in that time, didja?"

Immediately she recoils in horror. "What?! No! I-I would never!"

"I know. I'm messing around with you."

The palace doors approach. We climb the ten steps toward the doors, but I pause before entering.

"You like kids, huh?"

Phoebe blushes madly. "Sure. Kids are wonderful..."

"Great. Let's get married next week."

Dead silence.

Phoebe's face freezes into a mixture of a thousand different emotions.

"Y-y-you don't mean... next week, next week?!"

"Yeah. As in, seven days from now. I thought about you every day while I was gone. I was all alone in the Labyrinth, and then when I was fighting Satan, and his Demon Council appeared, Beelzebub said he attacked the Core. For a while, I thought... I thought maybe... you'd..."

My voice catches.

I almost lost Phoebe. She worried about me, too. I don't want that feeling, not ever again.

Phoebe swallows hard. "Jason. I love you. I don't want to wait another week."

"Alright. Me neither. Let's get married tomorrow."

She smiles widely. "No, we can put off the marriage until next week. But, tonight. Tonight. Let's make a baby."

Oh.

Oh. That's what she means.

Sometimes I forget that I'm still only an eighteen-year-old guy.

"What about your vow of-"

She presses a finger to my lips. "The Gods are dead. The Church is gone. I persisted in chastity for a hundred thousand years. It's time for me to free myself from the past."

I smile, as Amelia's face appears in my mind. Mentally, I force myself to wipe her away.

"Yeah. Me too."

"Amelia. Amelia."

Hope mutters in his sleep before lurching up in bed, waking up from a deep dream filled with fear and anguish.

"Amelia! She's dead. I killed her. No. Hoarhiim did. Jason did. Why? She didn't need to die. There could have been another way. Wordsmithing. It could change her mind. I could have made her a better person!"

Hope sweeps his feet over the side of the bed and exhales. "She's gone. There's nothing I could have done. Nothing at all."

His gaze wanders across the room to a mirror on the wall, barely visible in the darkness. Only a sliver of light from the doorway illuminates the room.

I don't even know whose face gazes back at me. I'm Hope, not Jason. Jason loses one woman but returns home to another. I get nobody. I don't matter to him. I'm just a copy. A hallucination.

Hope climbs out of bed and wanders over to the doorway, cracking it open. He peeks out to see Neil sleeping on his desk. His hand rests on a freshly written piece of paper. Hope slips out of the room, walks over, and glances at it.

A wall of dead soldier names appears on the left side of the page, along with a few checkmarks for only a small portion of them on the right. At the top of the page, the title reads, List of confirmed dead. Check off if condolences were sent.

Hope looks away from the page and stifles a sigh. Five thousand dead. My failure. Jason's failure. Instead of saving lives, we've only taken them. We tracked Amelia down and murdered her, and in the process, left the people in the Core defenseless. No wonder Neil was angry. Who could blame him?

We should have stayed here. Amelia would have done whatever to the demons, and we could have protected the Core. Hell, I probably led the demons right to her. Ahh! Not me, Jason. Jason did that. I can't keep pretending we're the same person.

Hope slips back into the room and yawns, sitting on the bed in the darkness.

Amelia. I want you back. I made a mistake. I can't live without you. Jason can keep Phoebe, but I want you. There has to be something I can do with Wordsmithing!

Almost immediately, an obvious idea comes to him.

Of course. Wordsmithing is the power of the gods. I can bring her back, just like that.

A confident smile spreads across Hope's face. He aims his mind at the center of the room. Gathering his thoughts, he pictures Amelia, her smile, her adult body, and everything else about her.

"Resurrect."

For a moment, nothing happens. Then, in the darkness, a fwoomph of air rushes in, and a woman's body appears and falls to the ground.

Hope's heart catches.

I... I did it! I did it!!!

"Amelia! Amelia!" He jumps off the bed and rushes over to her. "Hey, wake up! Light!"

The room brightens dramatically, as if he had activated a hundred-watt lightbulb.

When he finally catches sight of Amelia, the color drains from Hope's face. Her frigid body lays limp in his arms.

"No... no no no... Amelia. Wake up. Why are you so cold? Resurrect! RESURRECT!"

He yells again and again, but her body stays still in his arms. Everything about her is identical to the woman in his mind, but still, she slumps unmovingly.

"Hope?" A voice from the doorway makes the clone freeze. Neil steps in, wincing at the bright light. He stops and stares in silence at the woman in Hope's arms. "No. You didn't."

Hope whirls around. Panic spreads across his face.

"I... I needed to t-try! I had to see if I could bring her back! I can't! She's dead!!!" Hope's body shakes as he tries to rub warmth into her skin. "She's so cold, Neil! I thought Wordsmithing had all the answers! I thought it could do anything!!!"

Tears stream down his cheeks. He presses the dead woman against his chest. "Again. I feel like I've lost her again."

After a moment, Neil leans down and rests his hand on Hope's shoulder. "I'm... I'm sorry. I wondered privately if you could bring back the deceased. It seems even you have a limit. Hope... I lost my wife and children to the passage of time. I know what it means to lose someone you love. To want to do anything to see them again, yet lack the power to bring them back."

Hope stares silently at Amelia's face. "She looks peaceful. Like she could wake up at any moment."

"They always do," Neil murmurs. "But they won't. They can't. The ability to bring back the dead is a power reserved only for the Creator."

Neil squats down to Hope's level. "The only way you can save people from death is by protecting them. If you fail at that, with all the power you possess, then you will suffer and wallow in pain for the rest of your life. Just as I have."

"You?" Hope turns to stare at Neil's stoic face. "What do you mean?"

"A General leads his troops to death. Any victory earned without losses is a miracle. He must be willing to lose some of his best men. In that sense, I have killed many. Their passing weighs on my soul. The Creator will judge me when I fade."

Hope nods slowly and looks away. "I don't believe in God. But, then again, maybe I don't know anything about the universe. Maybe you're right."

Neil reaches over and brushes Amelia's hair from her face. "Come now. You were never able to bury her, were you? Dig the hole yourself. Put the dirt over her body. Burn her sleeping image into your mind and never forget. Her memory will give you the strength to protect the others you care about."

A long moment passes. Hope nods.

"Don't you worry. I will never forget the woman I love."

Part 059: Sticks And Bones May Break My Stones- Wait, That's Not Right

Three days have passed. It's time.

Beelzebub rolls his eyes as he and Rosalia walk through the halls of the Labyrinth. The demoness with the appearance deficit prattles on and on about this and that, often shouting excitedly.

"And when we get to Hell Harbor, there'll be servants and cake! Lots of cake! Don't you like cake, Mister Beelzebub?!"

"Cake is a great way to balloon my body," Beelzebub drawls. He glances at the chubby demoness. "Somehow I'm not surprised you enjoy it."

"Aww! Because I'm sweet, right? You always say the nicest things, Mister Beelzebub!" Rosalia skips along as she dances to some tune in her head.

Maybe if Bael hits me hard enough, I'll forget the ogre exists, Beelzebub thinks to himself.

Minutes pass. The sound of a large crowd in the distance echoes down the halls. Rosalia quiets down and lowers her excitement level. "Wow. The Slaughterseum. I've heard rumors... but I've never been there."

Beelzebub smacks his tongue around, trying to get the taste of chalk out of his mouth. "Barbaric. Uncivilized. The only appeal I find is watching filthy insects crushed by merciless demons. Few things satisfy me as much as witnessing a human grovel and beg for his life, only for the light in his eyes to vanish at the end of an orc's spear."

Rosalia nods. "Yeah. I hate humans. They're ugly, and they scare me."

"You're one to talk about ugly." Beelzebub warms his hands and slicks back his hair, perming it once again. Just in case.

The two demons plod along in silence. Eventually, the hallway opens up before them. It widens into an antechamber with booths for placing bets and an opening in the side-walls big enough for Trolls and Ogres to fit. Concession stands sell a mixture of food made from animal and human parts, often obtained from the poor souls who died in the arena earlier that day.

Gnolls, Kobolds, Pureblooded Demons, Lords, even a few Barons stand here and there, chatting amongst one another like best friends. Unlike in other areas of the Labyrinth, the spectators of the Slaughterseum ignore the typical boundaries separating species and rank, given their unified desire to witness bloodshed and carnage. Beelzebub even recognizes a few demons standing in the crowd, though he doesn't bother to say hello.

Nobody pays Beelzebub and Rosalia the slightest attention as they slowly walk among the several hundred monsters milling around. To the left, the massive entrance to the Slaughterseum yawns, beckoning for them to enter. Rosalia flinches as the arena crowd roars in excitement, likely from witnessing a brutal slaughter.

Beelzebub glances left and right, then sighs. "I've just realized that I haven't a clue where Bael is or how we'll meet him."

Rosalia follows his gaze as he scans the crowd for the massive demon. "Bael sticks out. He should be easy to find."

"Should be, yes. However, this is one of several entrances to the Slaughterseum. He could be anywhere."

"Ooohh!" A tiny imp squeaks from the ground at Beelzebub's feet. "Bubblezits? Are you the one who's here to fight Bael?"

"Hey! Stupid imp!" Rosalia delivers a bone-crunching kick to the brat, sending him flying against a wall. "How dare you get Mister Beelzebub's name wrong! You little shithead!"

The imp, stunned but not injured, rubs his head. "Aaaoo... that was mean! Cruel! Nasty!!"

"Thank you, Rosalia. You saved me the trouble." Beelzebub leans down to the imp's level. "Don't get my name wrong again. If you think she's nasty, pray you never anger me. Now tell me, where is Bael?"

The imp looks away for a moment and rubs his arm. The vindictiveness in his eyes hints that he's considering ditching Beelzebub and Rosalia to their devices, but Beelzebub quickly lights a ball of fire in his hand, snuffing that thought out.

"O-oh! His Nastiness, the Duke of Pain! Ehehehe..." The imp eyes the fireball for a moment. "Gate three! He's waiting f-for you at gate three!"

Beelzebub closes his fist, extinguishing his fire. "Get out of my sight."

"Yessir! Right away, sir!"

The imp scampers away, and Beelzebub smiles. When I was an imp, it was the same for me. The ones above you pick, poke, and stab. You're little more to them than vermin. Their sneers and jeers gave me the will to rise above the rest. Now I will complete the circle by stepping on those below me.

He stands up, the smile still plastered across his face. Humans wouldn't understand. It's the demon way. Demons evolve and grow ever stronger, while humans stagnate and weaken. The only chance they have at fighting back is for one powerful individual to take control. But what happens if he should fall?

Beelzebub turns and walks away, heading for the third gate. Once I defeat the Hero, he who destroyed a planet and slew the Black Queen... I will earn my place atop the demon hierarchy. The Black Queen raped Satan's mind and took control of him, so if the Hero killed her, and I kill him, that will prove I am worthy of being not just any Emperor... but the First Emperor.

Rosalia cocks her head. "Mister Beelzebub? Is something funny?"

Beelzebub's smile disappears. "Not especially."

It takes another twenty minutes of circling the Slaughterseum's perimeter before they find the second gate, and another ten to reach the third. As soon as he and Rosalia arrive, Beelzebub's eyes lock onto a quarrel between two werewolves fighting over a dead human woman's body.

"Mine! Stupid bloodhound! I wanted this piece of meat ever since the moment I first saw her!" The first werewolf, a brown-furred variant, howls angrily at his peer.

The other werewolf, one with white fur, leans forward menacingly. "My clansmen slew her! She's mine!"

The fresh corpse, a female human with dozens of gashes and other barbaric wounds inflicted on her corpse, lies in a pool of blood. A few spectators begin to form, including a male harpy and even a shadow-walker, jeering at the two werewolves. "Blood fight! Blood fight!"

"Your clansmen, eh?! I saw an orc land the killing blow! Always knew you white-hairs slept with pigs!"

The white-one rears back, preparing to pounce. "You take that back, shit-fur!"

Suddenly, a massive flail falls from the sky, crushing the corpse between them and shaking the room. In a flash, Bael leaps into the center, lands atop his spiked flail with his bare feet, and violently backhands both of the werewolves. They fly in opposite directions and plow through several bystanders into the walls.

"Shut up! You stupid mutts are giving me a fucking headache!"

Beelzebub sighs. "And there he is."

Bael hops to the ground and coils his flail around his body, then spots Beelzebub. "Bahaha! I thought you wouldn't show. You're an idiot, thinking you can beat me."

Rosalia, usually one to jump to Beelzebub's defense, shies away from talking back to the intimidating Duke.

"I don't know that I can," Beelzebub says. "But if I have even a slight chance to beat some sense into your thick skull, it's worth the effort."

"Hahaha! That's the spirit." Bael stomps the ground, shaking the room. "Mephisto! MEPHISTOOO!"

A few moments later, the Undead King spindles out of the ground. "What isss the problem?"

"You're gonna help me. C'mon, let's get the whelp over to the Den. We're gonna teach him a lesson."

Several minutes later, Beelzebub glances around uneasily as they enter a dark, secluded room not far from the Slaughterseum. "What is this place? I expected to engage in combat."

"Cheh. Nice try." Bael beckons to a nearby female demon. "Gimme your best set of Sticks and Bones." The woman nods, and as she turns to walk away, Bael slaps her butt. "Hehe, perfect ass."

She rolls her eyes and ignores him.

Beelzebub glances around. "Sticks and Bones? Is this a gambling den?"

"Course it is, idiot." Bael lumbers over to a nearby table. Mephisto, Beelzebub, and Rosalia follow behind him. The room rattles when Bael's massive bulk hits the opulent demonstone chair. "You'll be playing Mephisto for the right to become Duke."

Rosalia raises an eyebrow. "I didn't expect that."

"Neither did I," Beelzebub confesses. "Are you joking? I'm not known for my sense of humor."

"I am," Bael counters. "But this ain't no gag. Sit your pasty ass down."

Mephisto sits next to Bael, while the other two sit on the table's opposite side. Rosalia glances around at the seedy room, with its unscrupulous inhabitants smoking on their bone pipes and the scantily clad demonesses serving various food and beverages.

Beelzebub stares silently at Bael as they wait for the hostess to bring their game pieces. Unbelievable. I expected a test of combat, but Bael decided to hinge my rise to Duke on a game of chance. Perhaps he should rename himself to the Duke of Unpredictability, or the Duke of Chaos. No, scratch that, he'd like the latter too much.

A minute passes, but still, the hostess hasn't shown up. Bael itches his bare chest. "You can still back out. You'll be a chicken, but at least you won't be dead."

Beelzebub narrows his eyes. Dead? From a game of Sticks and Bones? What in the blazes does he mean by that?

When the hostess returns, she carries two small wooden boxes, each one embossed with gold and a bloody demonic pentagram on top. "Here you are, sirs. Please consider indulging in our refreshments if you require them."

Bael smirks at her. When she sets the boxes down, he pats his lap. "Come have a sit on my lap, baby. I've got fifteen inches waitin' for ya."

She barely blinks. "I didn't know we measured IQ in inches these days."

Turning around, she walks away without a second thought.

Bael's smirk lessens. "Hey, Mephisto. What'd she mean by that?"

The King of the Undead hisses. "I think ssshe likesss you for your persssonality."

Bael's smile comes roaring back. "Damn right. All the bitches do. Alright, let's get this game started."

He leans forward and winks at Beelzebub. "You know how to play Sticks and Bones, don'tcha, boy?"

Beelzebub nods. "I've watched a few games. You throw the five four-sided wooden Mahja sticks down. This creates a modifier, and you follow up by throwing the bones. The modifier, plus the bones, equals your score."

"Oh, oh! I know, I know!" Rosalia hops in her seat excitedly. "One of my den-brothers used to gamble all the time."

Bael smiles at her. "Zat so? Alright then, cutie, tell Beelzepup the rules he doesn't know."

Beelzebub's body rises a few degrees in temperature at the nickname, but he forces himself to ignore it.

Rosalia, however, beams excitedly. He called me a cutie! Omigosh! All the men are falling in love with me!

She clears her throat. "Ahem. There are four sides to the Mahja sticks. Swords, Fists, Eyes, and Flames. Each one is worth more than the previous point-wise. If you throw the sticks and you get five swords, you instantly lose the round."

Mephisto nods. "Ssswordsss... too human for my tassstesss."

Beelzebub stares at the sticks as Mephisto pulls them out and hands them to him. "Flames, hm? I already know which one I prefer."

"Bahahaha! So predictable!" Bael slaps his knee! "Of course the hothead likes flames! I betcha can't guess my favorite!"

Beelzebub rubs his forehead. "Fists."

Bael's laughter instantly disappears. "Oh. Lucky guess."

Mephisto titters quietly for himself, as he locks his smoldering red eyes on Beelzebub. "Flamesss are worth the mossst pointsss, in any cassse. Who knowsss, you might throw five flamesss and an Ancient Monster..."

Rosalia's eyes widen. "Oooh..."

"What? What is it?" Beelzebub glances at her in confusion. "Is there something special about that combination?"

"It's the Fire Dragon formation," Bael murmurs. "The only thing harder is the Phoenix formation, but don't you worry your pretty little head about getting one of those."

Rosalia shakes her head. "The rules of this game are quite odd."

"That they are," Beelzebub says. "Anyway, it doesn't matter. Everything's up to chance. What is this, best of three rounds?"

"Best of eleven," Bael corrects. "If ya can't win by more than two points, the game continues til' someone takes a two-point lead."

Mephisto nods. "You throw firssst, Beelzebub. New playersss alwaysss go firssst. It isss tradition."

Despite the simplicity of the game, Beelzebub swallows hard. "If I win... I become a Duke?"

Bael stares at him icily. "Yup. And if you lose... we kill ya."

"What?! Well..." Beelzebub rubs his forehead. "Fine. I agree. Good luck succeeding."

"Bahaha! I knew you would! Predictable!"

Tsk.

Beelzebub throws the Mahja sticks down. The five long, rectangular sticks clatter to the table, and Mephisto leans forward to examine them.

"Ksss. A Sssword, Three Fissstsss, and an Eye. No Flamesss for you."

Rosalia touches her chin thoughtfully. "Mister Beelzebub can discard an entire throw twice during a full game, or three individual sticks at any point, right?"

"Yup," Bael replies, adding no extra commentary. "Throw the bones."

Beelzebub reaches into the other box and pulls out a dozen differently-shaped bones. One resembles a snowflake, while another is a spiked-ball, echoing Bael's flail. Others include a curved bone shaped like a boomerang, and even more exotic shapes. One appears to be little more than a bunch of spikes twisting and curling around like a pretzel.

"Alright. Here goes nothing."

Beelzebub tosses the bones, and they clatter loudly on the wooden table.

Mephisto inspects them for a moment. "Kss. Reptile pattern. Newt formation. Four points."

Beelzebub glances at Rosalia. The dejected look on her face tells him the result with a single glance. "Bad?"

"Terrible," Rosalia says. "The most points you can get in a single round is one hundred. That requires a Fire Dragon formation, though."

Bael chuckles. "There's also Hydra, Wyrm, Kraken, Hellhound. You threw a Newt! Bahaha!"

Mephisto doesn't move to grab the sticks and bones. "Care to throw again? The bessst you can get isss a water ssserpent formation. Thirty pointsss."

Rosalia nods. "You should, Mister Beelzebub. Just retry the sword. You might land a Fist. Getting four of the same, let alone five, is worth bonus points. You'll end with twenty points."

Beelzebub curses himself internally. I'm being forced to rely on the counsel of the ogre. Nobody deserves that punishment.

He nods and throws the sword again. It lands on an Eye.

Rosalia breathes a sigh of relief. "Three fists and two eyes, plus the land animal pattern. Not great, but better than four points."

Mephisto scoops up the sticks and bones. "Ksss. Sssalamander formation. Fifteen pointsss. My turn."

Mephisto doesn't hesitate. He deftly throws the sticks. They clatter to the table, and he smirks. "Two ssswordsss, two flamesss, and an eye." When he throws his bones down, his smirk grows into a bony smile. "The Human pattern. I've rolled an Adventurer formation."

Bael stares at the game with rapt attention; his usual loudness pacified by the gambling happening. Unlike how he often acts, he's quieter, paying attention to every result. "Thirty-four points. You gonna re-roll anything?"

The Duke of Mist shakes his head. "I have a sssmall lead. Only a fool throwsss away hisss rollsss at the game ssstart."

Rosalia takes a piece of paper and an ink quill from the Mahja stick box and notes two numbers down. "One token to Mephisto. Subtracting Mister Beelzebub's points from Mephisto's, that leaves nineteen points."

Beelzebub frowns. "I'm still a novice, so I must ask. Why count points if the tokens represent a win for the round?"

Bael clears his throat. "Sometimes the one who wins all the rounds has fewer points. Happens more often than you might think. There are special rules for if that happens."

"Like what?"

"Doesn't matter. Mephisto's the Undead King. Playing with bones is his job."

"Whatever. Suit yourself." Beelzebub slouches in his chair and sulks.

Mephisto, having gone second in the first round, goes first in the next. He throws the sticks out. "One Sssword, two Fissstsss, an Eye, and a Flame."

"Huh. A full spread." Bael mutters under his breath. "Poor showing."

"Full spread?" Beelzebub echoes his words.

Rosalia answers. "It means Mephisto rolled one of every type. Half points."

"Ah."

Beelzebub watches as Mephisto throws the bones down. "Ksss. The Bug pattern. Cockroach formation. Worthlesss."

"I expected better from you," Bael murmurs. "Three points before the full spread, two after. Even if you roll again, you'll top out at ten."

"Passs." Mephisto hands the bones and sticks to Beelzebub. "If you lossse thisss round, I'll kill you myssself."

Beelzebub tosses the bones, and his heart skips a beat. "F-four flames and a fist."

When he tosses the bones down, Rosalia grows excited. "Ooooh! An Elemental Monster pattern! Coupled with the four flames, that means you rolled-"

"A Fire-Hydra formation. Seventy-three points. Impressive." Bael smiles widely. "Your second toss of the bones, too. Tally those points up, little missy."

She does so. "Round two's token goes to Mister Beelzebub. He takes the lead with seventy-one points to Mephisto's nineteen. Wow!!!"

Bael crosses his legs under the table. "Beginner's luck. Don't get all full of yourself."

Beelzebub, however, stares at the sticks on the table. "What if I re-rolled that fist to a flame? What would happen?"

Bael shakes his head. "If you get a sword, the formation drops to a Thunder Hydra. Seventy points. If it becomes a flame, you get an Infernal Hydra. Eighty points."

"Don't do it, Mister Beelzebub. Seven points aren't worth using up a re-roll. You already won the round."

Beelzebub nods. "I know. I'm learning the rules. That's all."

Half an hour passes.

Skeleton Commander. Harpie. Mermaid. Kobold Gang. Demon Duke. The formations come and go, and Beelzebub files their values in the back of his mind for later. He and Mephisto trade tosses, and soon, they enter the ninth round.

Rosalia tallies up the score. "336 versus 294 points in Mephisto's favor. The tokens are tied."

Beelzebub clutches the sticks in his hand. "My turn, huh? I have to win two of the next three rounds to seal my victory, then?"

"Correct."

"Alright."

Beelzebub throws the sticks down. "Three swords and two eyes. Damn." He tosses the bones afterward.

The moment the sticks hit the ground, Bael's eyes widen noticeably. "Whoa. Is that-"

"Demon pattern. Servant formation." Rosalia stares at it for a moment. "The lowest score for a Demon pattern is fifty points. The highest is ninety. It's the second-best pattern you could toss."

Beelzebub gapes. "H-how much is my roll worth?"

"The Servant formation is valued at fifty-three points."

Beelzebub stares at his formation. "I'm going to use one of my discards to re-roll."

Rosalia nods. "Good idea. If you get five swords, though, you instantly lose the round. If you get a full spread, that will halve the value too."

"It's worth the risk."

Beelzebub scoops the sticks up, swallowing hard as Bael eyes him. "Careful, whelp. Fifty-three points is a respectable score. A loss now will give Mephisto a huge advantage."

Without any hesitation, Beelzebub throws his sticks out. They clatter and land, and his heart leaps for joy.

"Yes! Three flames and two eyes! Whoo-hoo!"

Bael laughs. "Gwahaha! You're enjoying yourself now, boy! It's a damn shame I didn't introduce you to gambling when you were younger!"

Rosalia wipes at her forehead. "Impressive, Mister Beelzebub, as always. Lower Demon Emperor formation. Eighty-three points."

"Ksss!" Mephisto grabs the sticks up angrily. "I'll win the next two roundsss for sssure!"

When he throws the sticks, a disappointing showing of two Fists, two Eyes, and a Sword appears. Mephisto follows up with the bones.

A moment of silence falls over the group.

Bael nearly knocks the table over as he jumps out of his chair. "An Ancient Monster pattern? Right after the Demon pattern?! What game am I watching?!"

His voice attracts attention from other gamblers nearby. Several of them turn around to look at the commotion. Bael quickly explains the results, and they drop what they're doing to scramble over to Mephisto.

"Oy, oy!" One kobold eyes the board and snatches the score count from Rosalia. "Ah don't believe it! Mephisto! The runt got a Demon Emperor formation! You've gotta beat him on this one!"

"Yeah!" A salamander adds. "You can't let this lil' upstart beat you!"

Beelzebub gestures toward Mephisto's toss. "I'm guessing this is a good result."

"It certainly is," Rosalia mutters. "Ancient Monster is the most valuable pattern. Mephisto rolled a Rock Troll formation. Seventy-five points. Ancient Monsters include dragons and the Phoenix. The cap is a hundred points, versus ninety for the Demon pattern."

Mephisto nods. "I'll ussse one of my dissscardsss."

"Hell yeah!" Bael thwumps down at the table, slobbering slightly at the possibilities. "Hey, kid, here's a protip. For the Ancient Monster pattern only, if you roll five flames, that's a Fire Dragon. One hundred points. If you want, though, you can roll again for free. If you get five flames again, that's a Phoenix. You get three discards added to your future rounds, five individual stick re-rolls, two tokens, and you instantly win the round."

Rosalia nods. "There is a downside, though. If you decide to try for the Phoenix, but your next roll includes even one sword..."

"You lose the whole game. Bahahaha!" Bael's body trembles. "Oooh, exciting!"

Beelzebub nods. "I see. Rolling a Phoenix is high-risk, high-reward."

"Hahaha, damn right it is!" The kobold hands the stats back to Rosalia. "But that's what makes the game exciting! You guys playin' for stakes, or what? I ain't seen a Phoenix in three hundred and forty-five years!"

Bael nods. "Yeah. If this shrimp wins, we're making him a Demon Duke. If he loses, though, then we're gonna kill him."

"OOOOH!" The crowd of onlookers shrieks with excitement. "Holy skarn-droppings! That's amazing! Everyone, drop your games and check this match out!"

Beelzebub shifts uncomfortably as dozens of demons and monsters crowd around, blowing smoke in the air and congesting the table. He ignites the fire in his hand. "You all may watch, but keep quiet. I'd rather not burn the lot of you to cinders."

They nod, and Mephisto grabs the Mahja sticks. He tosses them down, and Beelzebub's heart sinks.

"Ksss. A Flame, Three Eyesss, and a Sssword."

"An Elder Basilisk. Hell yeah! That's eighty-one points, pal." Bael reaches over to nudge the Duke of Mist playfully, only for his fist to pass through Mephisto's body. "Oh, right."

Mephisto smirks. "I could tosss the ssstickssss one by one... but that wouldn't be sssatisssfying. Inssstead, I'll re-roll."

Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. "Why? If you re-roll the sword, you could get another eye. You'd beat me in this round with the point bonus."

Mephisto smirks. "Yesss, but unlike you, my life doesss not ride on thisss. Look at the crowd sssurrounding usss. It would be dissshonorable of me not to try for a Fire Dragon formation."

Mephisto takes the sticks and throws them again. Beelzebub's stomach flip-flops as the results come up.

"Four Swords. One flame." Rosalia calls the results. "A Gorgon. Seventy-three points."

Mephisto doesn't even blink. "I'll ussse my lassst dissscard." He snatches the Mahja sticks once again and throws them down.

"Five Fists. The Mountain Troll formation. Eighty points."

"Cursssesss!" Mephisto screeches and lowers his head in shame.

Beelzebub leans back and sighs in relief. "83-80. Close round."

"A good effort, Mephisto. Don't beat yourself up." Bael gestures to the hostess. "Let's get some drinks for everyone who watched. On me!" The crowd cheers exuberantly and disperses as the hostess makes the preparations.

Rosalia jots down the new scores. "Mister Beelzebub takes the lead with one token extra. The new score is 336 to 297 in Mephisto's favor, after applying his three points gained. Mephisto is all out of discards for the rest of the game."

Beelzebub sighs. If I wasn't immortal; this game would have shaved a few years off my life.

"Round ten. Mephisto goes first," Rosalia says.

The Duke of Mist bitterly tosses the sticks down. "Two Fissstsss and three Eyesss." He follows up with the bones.

"Human pattern. Prophet formation. Twenty-six points." Rosalia jots some numbers down on her paper.

Mephisto hands the sticks and bones to Beelzebub. "I will not re-roll. Even if you win thisss round, the two-point rule only takesss effect after round eleven."

Beelzebub nods. "Fair enough." He tosses the bones and the sticks.

Rosalia eyes the results. "Two Flames, two Fists, and a Sword. Monster pattern. Lower Cerberus formation. Thirty-eight points. The new score is 336 to 309 in Mephisto's favor."

The Baron of Flames keeps his results. Sweat drips down his back. I'm two tokens ahead and about twenty points behind. One match to go. If Mephisto wins the next one, I'll have to win another round to seize victory... and my rank as Duke.

Beelzebub goes first in the next match. Rosalia eyes his throw. "Two Flames and three Eyes. Undead Monster pattern. Undead Drake of Darkness formation. Sixty points."

Rosalia hesitates for a moment. "If you win this match, you win everything, including your Duke status, Mister Beelzebub. You should use your individual re-rolls to get the best result possible."

Bael nods. "That's for the best. You have one full discard and three individuals left. You could try re-rolling each of the eyes to get five flames, but that's a crapshoot. Five eyes will get you sixty-five points, and you'll only need two retries."

Beelzebub licks his lips slowly. "I can win this or the next one to defeat Mephisto. I'll take a chance when I'm countering him. I don't know what his score is yet."

"Kss. Sssmart choice." Mephisto snatches the playing items up. With a flick of his wrist, he casts the sticks and bones down.

Rosalia's face whitens. "Two Swords, one Eye, two Flames. Elemental Monster pattern. Elder Mermaid formation. S-sixty-two points."

For a long few moments, nobody says anything. Finally, Beelzebub sighs.

"I lost by two measly points. Whatever. I'll beat you in the next round."

"That's the spirit, Mister Beelzebub!"

Bael taps the table. "You're on defense this time. I think you may manage to beat a seasoned Sticks and Bones player!" The Duke of Pain smirks as he reaches into a small pouch hanging on his belt. After a moment, he holds up a tiny marble-sized orb.

"Know what this is, pup?"

Beelzebub shakes his head. "No. What?"

"It's your prize. If you beat Mephisto, I'll give you this soul-stone. It has the souls of over two-hundred thousand humans inside. After you swallow it, you'll blackout and experience the best pleasure of your life. Once you wake up, you'll be a Duke."

Beelzebub's eyes meet Bael's, then lower to the grey marble. Damn! I could almost reach out and grab that stone before this fat bastard reacts! I can't take a chance, though. I'll play this safe.

As Bael sticks the marble back in his pocket, Beelzebub loosens his jacket collar. "T-two-hundred thousand souls, huh? I knew the soul cost of ranking up to Demon Duke was enormous, but..."

"You're a genius to ascend to Baron so quickly, whelp, but you're still at the very bottom of your rank. President Ose possesses far more souls in her body than you. Promoting her to Duke was a cinch."

Beelzebub nods, staring at Bael in silence.

The Duke of Mist casts his pieces out. "One Sssword, One Eye, Three Flamesss. Ancient Monster pattern."

Rosalia and Bael's eyes turn to saucers.

"I don't believe it," The Duke of Pain whispers. "A Dark Dragon formation. That's... that's eighty-seven points."

Mephisto blinks twice. Then he lunges for the Sword Stick. "I ssshall re-roll."

Bael beckons to some nearby patrons. "Another possible Fire Dragon, boys!"

Everyone rushes over again, and curses can be heard as some lament the luck of rolling two Ancient Monster patterns by one player in an eleven round game.

Mephisto tosses the stick. It hits the ground and clanks to a stop.

Flame.

The sounds in the room screech to a halt.

"One Eye, four Flames. E-Eldest Dragon formation. Ninety-seven points." Rosalia stares at the pieces shakily. Even Beelzebub gazes at the board with a thousand-yard stare.

"Four Flames and an Eye on an Ancient Monster roll. Ah can't believe it." The kobold from earlier rubs his paws together. "Ya know, if Mephisto flips a flame, and he decides to roll for a Phoenix... Whatever he rolls'll be his new point total. Not to mention-"

"The sword, yeah. Don't bring that up, Gamcha! It's bad luck!" A second kobold with darker fur slugs his peer. "Shut yer maw and let 'im play!"

Mephisto cautiously takes the Eye Stick, twirling it in his hand for a moment, before flinging it down. The crowd gasps as the stick tinks along and comes to a stop.

Rosalia exhales in relief. "Sword. It's a Sword."

The collective disappointment in the air could drown a demon in an eternity of depression. Mephisto raises his bony finger. "I ssstill have one more single roll left. I will ussse it now."

The crowd goes silent as he picks the stick up again.

This time, when the stick lands, the room explodes into applause.

Flame.

Beelzebub's heart wrenches, as does Rosalia's.

Five flames. It's a Fire Dragon formation.

"Good game," Beelzebub mutters emptily.

Mephisto waves a finger. "Not ssso fassst. I am going to attempt for the Phoenix, asss any ressspectable Mahja gambler ssshould."

The crowd howls excitedly. "Do it! Do it! Do it!"

Bael strokes his chin. "Hey, pup. Wanna hear a fun fact?"

"I suppose so."

"Who do you think was the last demon or monster in the Labyrinth to throw a Fire Dragon and follow up with a Phoenix?"

Beelzebub shrugs. "Like I'd know. Who?"

"Barbatos."

Bael's utterance of the name immediately sends a wave of chills throughout the room. The thunderous applause tapers off.

One male Harpy shudders. "I still remember that match like it was yesterday. Some idiot orc thought it would be funny to challenge the Duke. He never said a word the whole game. He threw the Bug pattern five times in a row. We thought it was hilarious."

The talkative kobold from earlier rubs his long, pointy wolf ears. "Ya! Then came round six! Barbatos threw a perfect Fire Dragon! Five Flames! Then he threw the sticks again, and..."

Bael rubs his arm. "... and he somehow got five more Flames. It shouldn't have been possible."

"The orc gave up on the ssspot, asss I recall." Mephisto lightly traces the Flame pattern on the Mahja stick in his hand. "Nobody blamed him. Barbatosss hasss the luck of the Ancient Devilsss."

"Yeah," Bael mutters bitterly. "Luck."

Mephisto reaches for the sticks again, but this time more slowly, more deliberately. He takes the first one in his hand and tosses it down.

Flame.

Then he tosses the next.

Flame.

The crowd stares silently, watching and wondering what will happen next.

Mephisto tosses the third stick down.

Flame.

"I don't believe it," Bael says.

Then comes the fourth stick.

Sword.

The room goes silent, almost as if everyone is in mourning. Mephisto lowers his head. "Ksss... unfortunate."

Every muscle in Beelzebub's body relaxes simultaneously. He sags in his seat and breathes a sigh of relief. Mephisto rolled a sword. That means he lost the entire game. I won.

Beelzebub smiles, though it's faint. "I didn't want you to roll the Phoenix, but at the same time, I did."

Bael nods. "You win, boy. Still, you could've seen history unfold before your eyes. Damn shame." He pulls out the soul-stone from his pouch.

Everyone shuffles away, leaving the four demons alone at their table. Beelzebub reaches forward to take the stone, but Bael pulls it back. "Ah, ah, ah. Not yet."

Beelzebub scowls. "I knew you weren't going to let me ascend to the rank of Duke that easily."

"No, I will." Bael nods along. "But we ain't doin' it here. This is where the real party starts." He stands up, as does Mephisto. "Come on, hatchling. Let's see what you're made of. You're gonna eat this in the middle of the Slaughterseum."

Beelzebub narrows his eyes and stands up, ignoring the hostess as she puts the pieces back in their boxes. "Why there? Are you planning a sneak attack while I'm mutating?"

"Bahaha! A sneak attack! Didja hear that, Mephisto?!" Bael slaps his knee. "Hahaha! A sneak attack. Aw, shucks. That's a good one."

Mephisto quietly chuckles to himself, trying to force down the bitterness of his loss. "Keh keh keh. Yesss, quite amusssing. Beelzebub, if we wissshed to kill you, you would be dead already. You've won, fair and sssquare."

Rosalia turns to Beelzebub. "I think they're telling the truth, Mister Beelzebub. Let's go! I really want to see you get all-powerful and grow your horns out. Pleaaaaase!"

It takes a minute, but Beelzebub relents. "Fine. Let's get this over with."

The group of demons begins walking toward the exit.

From behind, Beelzebub catches the sound of several monsters muttering. "Let's go check it out. I wanna see what happens to the suited guy."

"Same."

Author Note: This is the full ruleset for Sticks and Bones.

Link to image of the rules.

Sticks and Bones is a game of chance that many demons like to play. It involves throwing five four-sided Mahja sticks onto a table, then throwing out a series of bones.

There are four sides for the Mahja sticks: Swords, Fists, Eyes, Flames.
Each side in that listed order is worth progressively worth more points.You want as many of the high-value sticks as possible, and as few of the lower ranked ones as possible - especially the swords. Swords are 'human' so they often apply point penalties.

Full spread: One of every side. Halves the point value.
Five swords: Instantly lose the round.
Four of any side other than swords: Bonus points.
Five of any side: Major bonus points, especially the eye or flames.

Twelve sticks:
Snowflake, Flail Ball, Boomerang, others are just ???

Sticks form patterns. These patterns have a variance of points they can assign.
Insect, 0-10
Animal, 0-20
Reptile, 0-30
Human, 10-40
Chimera, 10-50
Monster, 20-60
Undead Monster, 30-70
Elemental Monster, 40-80
Demon, 50-90
Ancient Monster, 70-100

Patterns, plus the sticks, create a formation.
Formations are basically the numerical value of the sticks, but given a name. Example, a really high roll in the Elemental Monster pattern might be called a Fire Drake, or something similar. NGL, these are really just random bullshit.

Rolling five Flames on an Ancient Monster gives you a Fire Dragon. Should you choose to roll again, if you roll five flames again, you get a Phoenix. It adds three re-rolls and 5 individual stick re-rolls. However, if you choose to re-roll and get even one sword, you lose the entire GAME. Also, you have to give up your 100 points from the Fire Dragon and keep whatever comes up.

Can discard an entire throw twice during a game. Or three sticks throughout the game individually. Cannot re-throw the bones.

Part 060: Beelzebub's Final Test, The Duke Arises

Beelzebub and Rosalia slowly walk behind Bael and Mephisto. They watch as the massive demon whispers to his undead colleague conspiratorially.

"Mephisto is an interesting Duke," Rosalia murmurs. "He looks like a freaky undead monster, but he has feelings, likes and dislikes, things of that sort. I always thought he was just some creepy necrophiliac."

Beelzebub nods and keeps his voice low. "Master Agares told me a bit about each member of the Dukes and Emperors. Mephisto used to be an ordinary demon, but he was corrupted into a variant demon, and then later into a unique by Lucifer's power."

"Lucifer? Who's he?"

"She. Lucifer is the antithesis of pureblood demons. Most of us grow into purebloods, but Lucifer used her abilities to corrupt many of our people, and later the broodmothers themselves. They became aberrations, often with unusual powers. Master Agares and Mephisto were two such examples."

"Why haven't I ever heard of her, Mister Beelzebub?"

The group of four demons passes through a small crowd of people. They glance upward, toward the Slaughterseum's entrance looming overhead.

"Lucifer died a long time ago. Agares never spoke of why or how she passed, but I sensed it was a matter that temporarily destabilized the upper ranks of the Council. It happened around the time of the Energy Wars, though I couldn't tell if she died before or after."

"Energy Wars?"

Beelzebub, realizing what he said, curses himself silently. "Tch. Never mind. It's nothing a mere servant should concern herself with."

Rosalia asks Beelzebub another question, but his mind closes off to her. A dozen thoughts appear in his mind all at once.

Mephisto. The Undead King. One of the few Variant Demons to successfully morph into a Unique. I saw only a fraction of his skills during the battle against the Black Queen, but what I saw was jaw-dropping. He possesses undead legions that spring from the ground and drag their enemies to a dirt slumber. He summoned an undead dragon and nearly single-handedly slew Emperor Diablo. Unlike Bael, Mephisto is a shrewd and cunning opponent. Were it not for his greed during our match, I might have lost.

The bright light from the Slaughterseum pours through the doorway ahead. The screaming crowd deafens the four demons as they stride toward the field. A steel gate bars the path, and the newcomers slow to a stop before it.

Bael presses a button on the wall, then crosses his arms. "We gotta wait our turn. There's a match going. Look."

Beelzebub walks to Bael's side, his eyes glancing none-too surreptitiously at Bael's pouch, the one with the soul-stone.

Deciding not to make a grab for it, Beelzebub turns his attention to the arena. Half a dozen individual battles take place across the massive field. In total, the Slaughterseum holds up to 300,000 demons in the stands at any given time. The ceiling rises a thousand feet into the air, with goblins crawling all over it to chisel away pieces of the Labyrinth as it tries to reform itself.

The Baron of Flames clenches his fist. The Slaughterseum. It's the ultimate demon entertainment exhibit: An artificial pit carved into the Labyrinth, intended to give demons thrills and gambling and all manner of other perverse entertainment. It's all part of the Emperor's strategy to prevent an uprising among the lower ranks. That's what Master Agares told me.

His eyes jump from one battle to the next.

In one of them, a male human and a woman stand chained together with their backs against a thick pillar. With their arms shackled together, they can do little more than wriggle and kick at the monsters encircling them.

The man screams in terror. "Spare me! Please! Kill her! I'll work my debts off! I'll do anything!"

Three orcs ride atop hellhounds while waving their spears toward the helpless slaves threateningly. Their hounds stand slightly taller than the humans, each one with sharpened claws that can cut through steel, and fifty eyes that swivel and move around independently, giving the fearsome predators excellent eyesight.

"Dumb hoomun! Dishonorable for man beg for mercy!" One of the orcs stabs his spear into the man's leg, cutting deep and shattering his thigh bone before quickly retracting his weapon. The man screams and wails in agony.

"Ahhh! It hurts! Please, no more! No more!!"

One of the other orcs eyes the female slave. "Woman look tasty. Why kill? Tear man-filth arms off, keep slut for fun."

"Can't. Magister order. Kill both. Feed meat to pups. They soil Ose's clothes."

"Bah! Dumb demon woman. She make us waste perfectly good virgin meat!"

The first of the three orcs slaps his hellhound's rump. "Get her!"

Beelzebub watches bemusedly as the hounds rip and tear the screaming woman to pieces. The man follows shortly after.

"Ose sent those slaves here?"

Bael nods. "Yup. She hates humans even more than the average demon. As for me, I like having my way with the women before tossing 'em to the dogs."

Mephisto grins evilly. "Ossse likesss to give her ssslavesss a sssenssse of hope. Ssshe sssaysss ssshe will ssset them free, only to inssstead execute them. Ssshe likesss watching them ssscream in anguisssh."

"Interesting. Personally, I wouldn't waste the effort on a filthy insect. Kill the rat on the spot. Why bother with giving them hope or whatever?"

Bael grunts. "Dunno. Ose knows more about humans than any other demon. She probably has her reasons."

"Oh?"

"Yup. She studied at their, uh... their... what were those things called again?"

Mephisto answer's Bael's question. "Collegesss."

"Right. Those things. Yeah, Ose did a bunch of studying and learned about fleshbag brains or whatever. Most in the Council consider her the smartest demon."

Beelzebub crosses his arms. "Then why didn't you make her an Emperor sooner?"

"Didn't need to. Humans were under control until recently." Bael's eyes harden. "Until that filthy Hero showed up. Damn. I hate Heroes."

Rosalia blinks. "It sounds like you've had some bad experiences, Mister Bael, sir."

"If only you knew," Bael mutters. His eyes lower to the ground for a moment. "I remember when Agares and Lucifer fought the Hero-King. I was surprised they came back in one piece, but they barely made it out alive."

Beelzebub replies, "You mean Arthur? The one you fought on Polaris?"

"Yeah. Him. I remember when we found out he died. It was like a nonstop party in the Demon Dens for a hundred years after. Then the bastard had to come back after all this time. Nearly killed Diablo."

Mephisto shrinks slightly. "Oopsss."

"I don't blame you. You did what you had to. Considering that Word-shit kid destroyed the planet, it's probably better we got outta town. Diablo would've died for real."

Beelzebub returns his gaze to the battles outside. In one of them, three big orcs surround a Hellhound, holding only thick wooden sticks and nets as they try to wrangle the massive animal. The hound leaps around deftly and dodges their pointed branches. Only once it learns their movement patterns does it suddenly lunge forward and attack.

A slight stumble by one of the orcs leads to his demise. The fifty-eyed monster pounces at him and slashes his chest with its claws. Dozens of pounds of bone, blood, and tissue go flying as the animal nearly tears the orc in half. However, the orc's death allows his allies to dive toward the hound and hurl their net over the beast, twisting the net around its legs to trip it up. With a quick motion, the orcs twine the rope around and tie it off, leaving the wolf to chomp futilely at anyone in range.

"Not bad," Beelzebub mutters. "I heard it takes five orcs to catch a Hellhound. Most of the time, as many as three or four of them will die. This lot must be skilled."

Bael nods. "Leadership challenge. You don't see it often. Three of the biggest, meanest orcs get together to take on a Hellhound. It takes balls to try it, so even if one or two of 'em dies, they're honored by their clan. Fun to watch."

Several minutes pass — one by one, all six of the battles in the Slaughterseum end. Eventually, the field clears. Beelzebub watches in silence, a growing suspicion in the back of his mind. "Why aren't more battles starting?"

"I reserved the whole arena for this occasion." Bael smiles innocently. "I mean, it ain't often we get a new Duke."

Beelzebub glares daggers at his older peer. "There's something you're not telling me. You promoted Ose directly to Emperor. I'd expect her to receive a giant ceremony before little old me."

"Oh, she'll get a fancy ceremony, too," Bael promises. "But yours is... a little different."

"Bael. Jussst tell him."

A moment passes. The gate begins to rise.

"Nah. He'll find out soon enough." Bael turns to Rosalia. "You should get in the stands, cutie."

She blushes and nods. "O-okay!"

However, her expression darkens as she realizes his implication.

The demons enter the Arena, and Rosalia splits off to climb the stairs up into the stands. Beelzebub glances back to see the patrons from the gambling den following them. The various monsters and demons walk behind Rosalia, plunking down here and there in the stands.

"Planning on a show?" Beelzebub asks.

The gate they passed through slams shut.

Something like that," Bael replies.

Trodding across the dirt, Beelzebub glances at the ceiling above. Hundreds of torches stay lit thanks to the tireless efforts of the goblins, along with the torches lining the walls and spectator stands. The room is stunningly bright, as though there was a sun directly overhead on a midsummer's day.

Beelzebub's eyes adjust. The two Dukes and newly risen Baron stride into the center of the arena, the former two positioning themselves directly opposite their junior.

"Alright, pup. I admire your patience. You've stayed with me up to now. So this is the final test. If you wanna back out, this is your last chance."

Bael pulls the soul-stone from his pocket and tosses it to Beelzebub.

"If you swallow that stone, you'll consume the souls inside and mutate into a Duke. But... there's one thing you should know."

Beelzebub resists the urge to immediately pop it into his mouth. "Yes?"

"You'll have to fight Mephisto and me. We gotta test ya to see if you're the right guy for the job."

Beelzebub sighs. "Haah... Two against one? You don't play fair. How am I supposed to beat two Dukes at the same time?"

Mephisto chuckles. "Keh keh keh... mossst amusssing. You misssunderssstand, Beelzebub. You can't win againssst usss. Your job isss to sssurvive for thirty minutesss."

Everything clicks in Beelzebub's mind.

Asking me to show up was a test of my resolve. The Sticks and Bones game was meant to test my judgment skills. And this battle... it's going to test my combat capabilities.

Beelzebub pops the soulstone into his mouth. "How many people have ever passed this test?"

Bael smirks. "None."

"Ksss. You're the firssst perssson to take the tessst," Mephisto clarifies.

Beelzebub scowls at Bael as he swallows the soulstone. "You're a real piece of skarn-dropping, Bael."

The Duke of Pain smiles widely but doesn't respond.

A moment later, millions of lightning bolts explode in Beelzebub's stomach as the pill takes effect.

The Baron of Flames doubles over and clutches his gut. His head shakes. His body spasms. He falls to the ground, writhing as a million daggers pierce him from every direction.

DAMN YOU BAEL! YOU SAID THIS WOULD FEEL LIKE ECSTASY! YOU FUCKING LIAR!

Bael chuckles. "Ooh, that looks like it hurts."

Mephisto shakes his head. "Your sssadisssm knowsss no limitsss."

"Fuck off. Pain'll make the brat tougher."

The pain transforms into a roaring fire in Beelzebub's stomach. A short eternity passes as he wavers in and out of consciousness.

Not even a minute after taking the pill, Beelzebub leaps to his feet. A soothing feeling sprouts in his stomach. Bael and Mephisto watch as flames begin burning his skin and sear his clothes to ash. The crowd gawks at the now-naked demon, while Rosalia leans forward intently. Drool spills from her mouth.

The fire grows more intense. Soon, it becomes a roaring blaze, engulfing Beelzebub's whole body in an infernal shroud.

Beelzebub holds his hand up and stares at it.

This power awakening inside me is primeval, primordial. This is unlike anything I've felt in my life. It's almost as if-

Bael lunges forward, laughing haughtily. "Bahaha! Time starts now, boy!"

His fist smashes Beelzebub's chest with astounding force, sending the arisen Duke flying backward. The instant Beelzebub strikes the ground, zombie arms burst out and grab his limbs, violently yanking him into the dirt.

The newly crowned Duke winces at his shattered ribcage. A moment later, he realizes that he doesn't feel any pain at all.

Beelzebub's shattered ribcage heals in less than a second when his enhanced Phoenix Physiology works its magic. He spots Bael leaping at him, and wriggles, trying to free himself. It's only when Big Bonk comes swinging down that Beelzebub's instincts take over.

Barely conscious of what powers he's awakened, Beelzebub's eyes begin to glow. A second before Bael's mace impacts him, Beelzebub blasts a concentrated stream of fire from his eyes, knocking Bael away and making the Duke drop his flail. Big Bonk strikes the ground only a few dozen feet away, making the arena shudder.

Beelzebub inhales and unleashes fire from every pore in his body. The expansion of heat fries the zombies holding him down to ash, and he jumps into the air, igniting flames from his soles to fly nearly a hundred feet into the air.

The crowd cheers and whoops excitedly. Rosalia screams, "Kick their butts, Mister Beelzebub! I believe in you!!"

Beelzebub looks around, scanning the battlefield. Mephisto's gone. He must be hiding underground. His undead should be little more than a nuisance. It's Bael I have to watch out for. He hits like a Hydra.

Bael clutches his chest where Beelzebub shot him. "Aaaaaoooh! The pain! Gaaahhhh!"

Beelzebub flies a little lower. "Maybe I was wrong. It's hard to believe that hurt you."

Bael's pained grimace vanishes. "You're still an imp when it comes to the art of deception."

The Duke of Pain rolls over into a reverse-crab-walking position, revealing his undamaged chest. He smashes both arms and legs into the ground below him, pouncing at the unsuspecting Beelzebub. The newly crowned Duke yelps in surprise and tries to dodge, but Bael's movements are lightning-fast. Without much effort, he rips Beelzebub's arm off, soars past the youngster, and lands next to his flail with a whump.

Beelzebub clutches his arm, but once again, he doesn't feel any pain.

Bael spins around, flail in hand. "Hah! Gotch'err arm, idiot! Now you're in for a world of..."

Beelzebub sprouts a new arm in less than two seconds, causing Bael's taunts to falter.

"Heh, would you look at that? My regeneration is even more potent than before." Beelzebub glances at the arm in Bael's grasp. "Enjoy the souvenir. I've just tapped into one of my newest powers."

Bael glares at the kid. "Regeneration, huh? When'd you get that? Ain't seen a demon with an ability like that since..."

"Since Satan? I've heard a lot of demons comparing him to me lately." Beelzebub holds a hand up. "Say, have you ever played Hot Potato, Bael?"

Bael spits on the ground. "Pteh! Potatoes? Sounds like shitty human food."

Beelzebub targets the arm in Bael's grasp with his mind. "Not quite."

He snaps his fingers.

A moment later, the arm in Bael's grasp begins to shake violently. Bael stares at it dumbly. "What the hell? Why's this thing-"

BOOOOM!

The arm explodes with the force of a small bomb. Bael flies backward, bounding and careening across the arena until he crashes into a wall. The impact leaves a crater ten feet deep in its wake.

The audience goes silent, then applauds excitedly. Beelzebub grins as he stares at the result of his self-detonation.

Suddenly, a voice speaks from right behind Beelzebub.

"You forgot about me," Mephisto whispers.

Beelzebub whirls around in midair just in time to see the aetherial duke plunge a spirit knife into his back, smiling the whole time.

Nothing happens.

Mephisto's wicked grin fades. He stares at the knife in confusion. "What?! I usssed my Pain Inducement! You ssshould be in agony!"

Beelzebub swats at the knife, but his hand passes through it. "Oh. That. I believe one of my new powers is pain immunity. Your skullduggery won't get you far with me."

Mephisto floats away from Beelzebub. Only the screams of goblins above give the young demon any warning. A moment later, one thousand ghouls fall from the ceiling onto Beelzebub, pulling him from the sky and hammering him into the arena floor below. Dirt explodes outward from the force of dozens of tons of flesh and bone.

Beelzebub blinks as the ghouls viciously tear his body apart. Still, he feels no pain.

You want a taste of me? Enjoy.

Summoning the energy from his body, he calls upon his newly realized power of Nuclear Manipulation to agitate the cells in his torn-off limbs.

One of the ghouls raises its head in confusion as its stomach begins to inflate.

The crowd stares at the mass of flesh piled atop the new Duke. Rosalia covers her mouth and tears well up in her eyes. "Oh no... Mister Beelzebub..."

A light like staring directly into the sun erupts from the pile of ghouls, blinding the audience for a moment. Beelzebub's torn-off body parts explode like a hundred tactical warheads, blasting apart the undead atop him and spraying their flesh across the arena. The spectators lean back and cover their faces as black blood and flesh rain down on them, coating their bodies in a foul, fetid stench.

Rosalia ignores the ghoul innards all over her and jumps to her feet, whooping and hollering ecstatically. "Yeahhhh! Whooo! Get 'em! Get 'em!!"

Beelzebub rises, purging the disgusting innards from his body with his Flame Cloak.

Having already recovered from Beelzebub's surprise a minute before, Bael brushes ghoul blood off his chest. "Well, spawn of a Broodmother. Ain't you just the toughest gobby-fucker I've ever seen?"

Mephisto floats over to Bael. "Beelzebub regeneratesss from any wound. Not only that, but hisss body isss a living bomb."

"Yeah, I noticed." Bael shakes a slight stinging pain out of his right hand. "His exploding arm tickled me. Burned real good."

Beelzebub strides over with a huge smile stretched across his face. "Oh, dear, are you okay? I hope I didn't hurt you."

"Tch." Bael grinds his teeth together. "I've felt real pain once before. Barbatos made sure of that."

The Duke of Pain grabs the stick-end of his flail and yanks hard. Big Bonk lurches off the ground and flies across the hundred-foot gap and sails into his outstretched palm. Bael catches it effortlessly, acting as if the spiked-weapon were little more than a softball to him.

Beelzebub notices for the first time that Bael appears smaller than before. No. That isn't it. Mephisto looks shorter, too. It's me. I've grown in size. I must be over seven-feet tall, now.

He sneers. Neither Bael nor Mephisto can hurt me. I'll burn the hordes of undead off my body and tank anything the big guy throws at me. It'll be a cinch. I've never felt more confident in my life.

Mephisto glowers at Bael. "I have a sssolution. We ssshouldn't be humiliated by thisss upssstart."

Bael itches his ass. "Hope you've got an idea. I dunno if pounding his body into mulch will work this time."

"Keep Beelzebub busssy," Mephisto whispers.

The Duke of Mist floats underground, while Beelzebub activates his foot-thrusters to fly into the air. He pulls out his fingers and shapes them like a gun, then rapidly fires his Heat Bullets at the Duke of Pain below.

Bael stares silently as the bullets piff against his body and fizzle into nothingness. "I probably didn't tell you this before, kid, but I'm your worst matchup. Ya see, I'm immune to fire."

Beelzebub stops shooting. "I'm immune to simple idiots punching me over and over."

"Bit of a stalemate we've got, then. Hehehe. Why not fly down here so we can talk this over like gentlemen?"

Slowly, Beelzebub lowers his palm to his waist. A fire-whip forms in his grasp. "How about... no?"

Beelzebub's eyes jerk to a torch about twenty feet behind Bael. A moment later, he vanishes.

Bael stares at the spot where Beelzebub was levitating only an instant before. "Wha-? Where'd that little imp-porker go?"

"Behind you."

Beelzebub lashes his whip out and lashes his solar whip against Bael's back. It instantly cuts through Bael's thick hide, boiling the blood underneath and leaving a horrible, blackened scar.

"Gwaaah!" Bael jumps away and grabs his back. Blood trickles from the gash. "Cheh! You startled me!"

Beelzebub cocks his head. "You don't have the power of regeneration, do you? You're a physical fighter. If I cut you to pieces, you won't heal."

Bael snarls. "Go ahead and try. The burn feels nice. Only a little pansy-ass fears pain. Besides, I got blood that clots real easy."

Beelzebub lashes his whip out again, and it slices a gash across Bael's chest. The Duke doesn't flinch. "Uh oh, the pup isn't paying attention."

The ground shakes under Beelzebub. The young Duke jumps into the air and starts to fly away, but he's too slow. A massive undead hand explodes from the dirt, reaches up, and grabs his whole body.

"What?!" Beelzebub gasps.

A hundred-foot-tall undead monster climbs out of the ground. It makes no noise as it squeezes Beelzebub with all its strength.

Crack. Pop.

Beelzebub's bones and innards snap under the strength contained within the monster's grip. However, not once does Beelzebub feel any pain.

Beelzebub activates his Heat Vision and blasts the giant monster's thumb, but his fire doesn't affect it. Every second, his bones pop and snap some more as the creature squeezes him like a vice.

"Huh. Didn't expect that," Bael murmurs. "What is that thing?"

"A Brute." Mephisto emerges from underground, noticeably tired. "It is elementally resssissstant. I had to consssume a hundred Ghoulsss to mutate it. It will die in two minutesss. Crusssh the boy while we can."

"Hell yeah!"

Bael leaps up to the giant's shoulder, and the crowd watches silently, everyone wondering who will win in this engagement.

Beelzebub strains his head around, but he doesn't feel anything as the silent behemoth grinds his body into pulp. What should I do? My heat vision doesn't work. Should I fire-port away? Can't. I'm pinned. I'll have to detonate my body.

Before Beelzebub can agitate his cells once again, Bael arrives on the Brute's shoulder and swings Big Bonk down. "Special delivery!"

Beelzebub watches helplessly as the flail flies at him. Before he can activate his Heat Vision to knock it aside, the flail meets its target, crushing Beelzebub's skull and ripping the Brute's hand off. The flail careens toward the arena floor below, carrying Beelzebub's body along with it. When Beelzebub's body, the flail, and the Brute's hand hit the dirt, his mind goes blank.

"Shit. You passed. What the hell, man."

Bael stands over Beelzebub's body as the younger demon awakens.

"Huh? What happened?"

He blinks and looks around. The spectator stands are noticeably emptier. About half as many monsters and demons stand around, uninterested in the final result.

"Mister Beelzebub!" Rosalia flops to the ground, bringing her hideous face within inches of his. "Omigosh! I thought you died! Are you okay? Does it hurt anywhere?"

"No. No, it doesn't." Beelzebub rubs his eyes, then stares at his naked body. "The last thing I remember was Bael's flail hitting me."

The body of the Brute rests motionless not far away, its body slowly dissolving into ash.

Mephisto walks up behind Beelzebub. "Bael sssmassshed and pounded you, over and over. No matter how many timesss he crussshed your body, it regenerated. I've never ssseen such incredible recovery powersss in all my yearsss."

Beelzebub pulls himself to his feet. "What does this mean? Did I win?"

Bael shrugs. "Dunno. I'm tired of punching puddles of blood, though. Cripes. You're fuckin' unkillable, kid. I wouldn't say ya won, but'cha didn't lose. Either way... you lasted thirty minutes, so, welcome to the ranks of the Dukes."

Bael pats Beelzebub on the back, sending the younger one stumbling forward a foot or two before he recovers himself. Beelzebub rubs the spot where Bael smacked him. "My... my sense of touch is gone. It isn't pain I'm immune to, but touch all over my body."

Only now does Beelzebub notice the sickening sensation he'd been ignoring during the fight. That's why my movements were so sluggish. I couldn't feel the subtle shifting of wind on my back, nor could I sense when Mephisto slipped his dagger into my gut.

Rosalia touches Beelzebub's arm, something he'd normally yell at her about. However, this time, he doesn't notice at all. "Are you sure, Mister Beelzebub? Can you feel this?"

"Feel what?" He looks at Rosalia, then spots her hand. For once, he doesn't yell at her or tell her to stop touching him. "No. I can't."

"Ksss. Unfortunate." Mephisto shakes his head. "You ssspent all that effort trying to become a Duke, only to lossse sssomething preciousss to you. Remindsss me of myssself."

Beelzebub blinks. "It does?"

"Yup," Bael says, jumping in. "Most of the time, when a demon evolves into a Duke, they lose something important. A piece of themselves."

"Oh? Did you lose anything?"

Bael glowers at him. "Nothin' you need ta know about."

"Fine." Beelzebub yawns. "I'm exhausted. Any more tests? I'd like to take a nap."

Bael shakes his head. "Naw. But uh... you won't be returnin' to your den. Mephisto. Gimme the thing."

Beelzebub and Rosalia watch quizzically as the Duke of Mist reaches into his cloak and procures a small envelope. When he pulls it away from himself, the object becomes corporeal, allowing Bael to grab it.

"The old man wanted you to have this. That is, assuming you ever reached the rank of Duke." Bael hands the envelope to Beelzebub. "You ain't just moving to Hell Harbor, kid. You get Agares' estate. I'd congratulate you, but, given he died and all..."

Beelzebub nods to Rosalia. "Take the note. I don't want to burn it accidentally. I can't control my powers yet."

She nods and accepts the note from Bael.

"Alright." Beelzebub yawns mightily. "Hell Harbor, then? When do we leave?"

Bael stares Beelzebub down. "Now. I've already talked to folks. Everything's waitin' for ya, whelp."

A sensation of satisfaction spreads through Beelzebub's body. "You expected me to pass the test?"

"I hoped ya would. I wasn't gonna take it easy on ya, though, just 'cause I owed the old man a favor or two. Anyway, shut up. We're boring the arena folks."

The four demons laugh and walk away, Beelzebub occasionally staring at the note in Rosalia's hand.

I wonder what it says, he thinks to himself.

The Arena door slams shut behind them, and Bael raises an eyebrow. "Say, now that you're a Duke, what'cha gonna call yourself?"

Beelzebub stares ahead silently for a long minute as he contemplates the question.

"I will be... the Duke of... Inferno. Yes. The Duke of Inferno."

Rosalia claps excitedly. "I love it, Mister Beelzebub! You're the greatest demon ever!"

Part 061: Thanks for the Frienemies

"Welcome to Maiura, Your Majesty," The soldier on the other side of the portal says with a nod.

Hope blushes. "Ah, sorry, you have me confused with Jason. I'm his clone. He's the king."

The guard blinks twice. "Oh, sorry. I couldn't... err..."

"Tell me apart. Right. I get that a lot."

Hope inhales deeply, smelling the fragrance of a delightful pink and green planet. "Officer, can you direct me to Commander Neil?"

The guard scratches his chin uneasily. "Sorry, sir. I don't know where he is off the top of my head. If you give me five minutes, I can ask around and find out."

"No need," Hope replies. "I'll find him myself."

The Wordsmith paces down the steps and glances back at the Core, visible through the portal. This is the 32nd world we've reclaimed since I- no, since Jason first emerged from the Cryopod. It's beautiful.

Hope turns away from the Core and jogs down the steps, taking them two and three at a time. Dozens upon dozens of uniformed men, women, and monsters run around, looks of trepidation on their faces. They're all armed with a mixture of weaponry, and Hope pauses, sensing an aura of fear in the camp.

He continues walking for a minute or two and pauses to stare at the distant vistas of mountains and trees, along with several large animals reminiscent of dinosaurs. However, no matter where he looks, Hope doesn't see Neil.

Hope shrugs. "Locate."

It barely takes ten seconds to discover Neil in a tent half a mile away. The army's commander flails his arms and yells angrily at a group of men and a demon, but Hope pulls away before he can hear what's going on. It's not polite to intrude on conversations with Wordsmithing. At least, not when it comes to my friends.

Not two minutes later, Hope finishes jogging through the makeshift camp and pauses outside Neil's tent. Neil's outraged voice is muffled somewhat by the tent's fabric. What makes Hope pause, though, is a giant cloud of smoke in the distance, which is now much more visible at the edge of the camp where Neil's tent stands.

A forest fire? Hope shakes his head. No, something else. That looks like the direction of this world's capital city.

He lifts open the tent flap and steps inside. A few people glance at Hope, but Neil doesn't notice him. The Commander stands with several men and a familiar-looking demon. Neil gesticulates wildly and points at the demon. "-fault! You didn't tell us the demons would fight back so fiercely! Why are they guarding this world more than they did the others?"

The demon rubs his hands together. "Look, I'm sorry, okay? Demons need human souls. If you guys keep liberating worlds, they're gonna get desperate. It's that simple."

Hope's eyes widen. Ah, I recognize him. Didn't I- err, didn't Jason chat with him a few months back? His name is Paimon. He was part of the assault force that attacked the Core. Jason interrogated and let him go. I didn't even know he returned.

Neil curses. "Shit. We lost thirty soldiers. How long did Lorvos torture those innocents before he killed them?"

Paimon shakes his head. "A while. At least a month. What are you gonna do with him?"

"I'll have to think of a fitting punishment. Many of the bodies we recovered already melted together thanks to his infernal magic."

Neil pauses to take a breath, and one of the men nudges the commander. He turns around and raises an eyebrow at Hope. "I expected you an hour ago. Where the hell have you been?"

"Busy, sorry. There was a cave-in at a mine. I was pulling people out. I didn't realize your message was urgent."

"Tch. It sounds like the messenger boy didn't understand the meaning of an S.O.S! Whatever. You're too late to do anything now."

Hope glances around at the group of people, as well as Paimon. "What happened? What's going on?"

Several of the lower-ranked officers turn away, unable to meet Hope's eyes. Neil replies, "Demonic brutality, of course. I expected to liberate this world quickly, but it turns out the demons anticipated our movements. They were waiting for us."

"Waiting?"

Neil turns to Paimon. "Tell him."

The young demon, still dressed in a smart suit, yet appearing smaller than the first time Hope remembers meeting him, slicks down his black hair. "Hey, Jason. Long time, no see."

Hope smiles. "Wrong guy. I'm Jason's clone. Call me 'Hope.'"

Paimon blinks. "Hope?"

Neil snaps his fingers. "It's a long story. Let's get on with your report. Small talk can come later."

Paimon nods. "Right, sorry. Anyway, I had a few comrades who told me this was an outer rim human world. It's supposed to be one the Council didn't care about, but I think my friends lied to me."

"Why?"

"Dunno."

Paimon hesitates.

"Okay, I do know. I don't wanna say it, though."

Neil crosses his arms. "Paimon is a traitor to his people. A good soldier, willing to join the forces of humanity. The other demons discovered that fact and fed him false intel. They wanted to ambush us on this planet."

"P-pretty much," Paimon says. "Sorry. They played me for a fool."

Neil waves his hand. "It's not your fault. I thought the demons might try something sneaky. That's why I set up camp before we traveled to the city."

Hope waves his hands. "Hold on; I don't understand. What happened? The demons attacked us?"

The Commander and the Demon Lord nod simultaneously. "Aye," Paimon replies. "You're lucky I was there to help. There were fifty-thousand monsters and a bunch of low-level demons, plus a Demon Lord named Lorvos. I managed to knock him out and capture him. We can't return to the city, though."

"Why not?"

Hope's blood chills. He glances at the tent doorway and remembers the smoke in the distance. "Don't tell me the monsters are still there!"

"They outnumber us ten to one," Neil replies, clicking his tongue in exasperation. "Even if we had superior weaponry, which we don't, we couldn't beat them. We had to pull back to the safety of the portal, but I imagine they'll hit us here in the next few hours."

Sweat rolls down Hope's back. "Why the laid-back atmosphere in camp? We need to retreat or attack them now. We can't simply sit around and do nothing!"

One of the other men in the room speaks up, though he and his peers have been quiet until now. "Hope, Paimon captured Lorvos. That means we have a bargaining chip. I think the top-level monsters are waiting to hear our demands."

Hope scoffs. "A bargaining chip? Come on! That can't be all you've got. Demons will abandon one Lord if it means tearing apart humans."

"True," Neil says. "But we have two other sources of protection. The demons are hesitant to attack us directly as of late, likely because Jason destroyed Polaris. Not only that, but as that succubus stated, supposedly we're under her protection."

Hope mentally recalls the succubus's name. "Samantha, you mean? Belial? But she isn't here now."

"They don't have to know that."

"Right."

Neil punches his palm. "It took you an hour to arrive, but now that you're here, I say it's time for a counter-attack. We've been thinking of some ways we can pay the bastards back. Since you're the Wordsmith, maybe you have a few ideas?"

Hope pauses to consider his options.

I haven't used my powers much since Jason created me. The lack of Solomon's Crown is my biggest hindrance compared to him, since the crown allows him to visualize complex machinery and the like. However, in all other respects, my abilities and mana capacity are equal to his.

Hope nods. "I have a few ideas. I can teleport, put people to sleep, read minds, release holy energy, use telekinesis..."

"Excellent. You're an intelligent fighter, Hope. I believe in you." Neil rubs his hands together. "Would you be able to go in and thin the herd a bit? If you can kill half of the demons in the city, that will make things a lot easier for us."

Hope blanches. "W-what? Kill them? Are you sure that's necessary? I could knock them out, put them to sleep, change their allegiances, and all sorts of other-"

Neil scowls. "They're enemy combatants, Hope. If you put them to sleep, they'll wake up. Do you expect us to capture every enemy we meet? We haven't the prison capacity for such an operation."

Paimon squirms in embarrassment. "Neil, Jason converted me to humanity's side with words. Maybe Hope could do the same for these monsters."

Irritation appears on Neil's face. "Do you expect Hope to sit down and have a twenty-minute chat with fifty thousand monsters one at a time?"

"...I suppose not."

Neil waves his hand. "Fantastic. I'm interested in recruiting the strong ones, but the cannon fodder will do little more than devour our food reserves and tax our system. Right now, what we need are humans. They'll ally with us, as the others have before, and won't be a security threat once inside our borders."

Paimon looks away, unable to meet Neil's gaze. The atmosphere in the room turns tense. Several men glance at the Demon Lord, unsure how he'll react. Neil ignores Paimon and focuses on Hope.

"You need to thin the monsters out and save as many humans as possible. Can you do that for me?"

Hope shakes his head. "I won't kill, Neil. I can't. It's not right."

The room goes silent. The bystanders hold their breath. The nearest spectators wince as their emotions wash across their faces.

Hope told the Commander 'no.' Yikes.

Neil glances around. "Would everyone give Hope and me a few minutes of privacy?"

Wordlessly, everyone nods and shuffles out of the room, including Paimon. The demon sends a look of concern toward Hope before he leaves, but Hope holds his ground and shows no anxiety.

After everyone disappears, Neil rubs his face. "Hope. I understand. I know why you think the way you do. You don't want to kill because killing is wrong. Am I correct?"

"Yes. I won't budge on this, Neil."

Neil licks his lips. "Is that you speaking, or Jason?"

"What do you mean? I can be my own person while also sharing a value system with Jason."

The commander folds his hands behind his back and strolls to the center of the lightly furnished tent. Only a few chairs and a table sit on the side opposite the entrance. "Hope. Don't you think that perhaps Jason does things the wrong way, on occasion?"

"I don't follow."

"A lot of people died because Jason was unwilling to kill. He was unwilling to kill Amelia to save humanity, but he was also unwilling to kill demons to protect her as well. When your values contradict themselves by their internal logic, don't you think that's a problem?"

Hope shifts on his feet. "Okay. I... I see your point, somewhat. However, I don't know if I can-"

"You can," Neil says, interrupting him. "We're in the middle of a war, Hope. Jason might run around flitting about with women, but you're better than him. Do you want the demons to tear apart the Core? Do you want us to appear weak?"

"No."

"Well, if you make them take a nap, that's what they'll think. Demons respect strength. You have to set aside your emotions and put them in their place."

"What about Paimon?" Hope counters. "I talked to him and convinced him to join our side."

Neil's lip twitches. "Can you convert trillions of demons to our side? Can you ensure the safety of humanity by talking to our enemies and making them see the error of their ways?"

The Commander takes a few steps forward and lowers his voice. "You don't think I trust Paimon, do you? Have you any idea how many humans he killed before he joined our cause?"

"I don't," Hope says, swallowing hard. "But Paimon was indoctrinated into demonic beliefs and values from birth. He didn't know better."

"You're naive," Neil counters. "There are two types of men in this world: Those who have taken another man's life, and those who haven't. Once you kill someone, no matter who they are, something changes inside you. That's the way humans are. That's the sin we share with demons. Paimon can convert to our side, but how many human souls did he devour to become a Lord?"

Hope opens his mouth, but Neil cuts him off. "At least a thousand. That's how many human souls it takes to mutate into a Lord. How many men do you know who've killed a thousand people, hmm?"

"None," Hope replies, reluctantly.

"Then you understand," Neil says. "Go to the capital, Meldora. It's not far from here. Kill as many enemies as possible with your Wordsmithing. When you finish-"

"No."

Hope stares at the Commander silently. "There's another way. I can wipe their minds. I can make them loyal to us with Wordsmithing."

Neil stares at the Wordsmith for several seconds. "How?"

"I can influence and change their minds with Wordsmithing. Well, I think I can. It's worth a try."

"And if that fails?"

Hope bites his lip. "I guess I'll have to try your plan, then."

The two don't say anything for a long minute. Neil breaks the silence. "Fine. Far be it for a simple man like me to question the mighty Wordsmith. But before you go, why not test your theory on Lorvos? If you can convert him, perhaps you will succeed at turning the rest."

Hope nods. "Good idea."

They turn to walk out of the tent, but Neil hesitates. "If you succeed, then your power will be even more frightening. The ability to take free will, a gift given by God, should not rest in the hands of any man."

"I don't disagree, but if the alternative is killing, wouldn't you agree changing someone's free will is the morally superior option?"

Neil touches his lips. "Is it? I wonder."

Neil and Hope eventually arrive at a tent on the other side of the camp. Paimon and the others stay behind, given the Commander told them it was a private matter. Two guards outside the tent pull its flap open, and Hope steps inside, followed by Neil.

"Here he is," Neil says, gesturing to a bound demon. The big brute, only somewhat smaller than Bael, thrashes around on the floor, grunting through a gag over his mouth. His hands are bound firmly behind his back, and his legs are shackled tightly together. Black hair and a torn-apart set of light, leather armor are all that cover him.

"Wow. Lorvos is massive. How the hell did Paimon beat him?"

"Paimon is a proficient fighter, especially for a Lord. He has command over water and ice. Lorvos is a physical fighter, so Paimon jammed ice all throughout his body. Nearly killed him. The big guy didn't stand a fighting chance. When their boss went down, the enemy monsters didn't dare to stand up to Paimon."

Hope kneels and pulls the gag out of the demon's mouth. The lunkhead scowls at him. "Filthy fleshbag! Take these bloody cuffs off, and I'll tear you apart! I'll shove a thousand maggots up yer arse!"

Hope cocks his head. "You hate humans a lot, don't you?"

"No shit, stupid! Lean a little closer, and I'll bite yer fuckin' ear off!"

Neil curls up his lip. "Quite the foul-mouth, isn't he? Go ahead. Do it."

Hope hesitates. "Lorvos, can't you sit still for a minute? I want to talk."

"Eat my ass! I ain't talkin' with no skarn-droppin' fleshbag!"

"I could kill you right here," Hope warns him. "Do you still want to be feisty?"

Lorvos grins. "Hehehe, tryin'a scare me, eh? I see the weakness in your eyes, you little shit. You ain't got the heart to off me."

Lorvos glances at Neil. "Not like that one over there. He's got a hard edge to 'im. Even if you did kill me, I'd consider it an honor! I died after killin' hundreds of your kind!"

Hope winces. "You did?"

"Course I did. Meldora was ripe for the takin'. Raped a bunch of sows, gutted a few crawlers, and they begged for mercy the whole time. That's what you want me to do, innit? Beg?! As if!"

Hope swallows. "I wanted to talk. Maybe that wasn't the right thing to do. You aren't like Paimon at all. He was reasonable."

Lorvos's smile vanishes. "Paimon. Filthy devil-damned traitor. Turned his back on demons to grovel at the feet of fleshbags, he did. Don't think the rest of us are like 'im. There's always a few weaklings in the crowd. I call 'em arena-droppings, since we feed 'em to the hellhounds. You can spew honeyed words at one or two of us, but the rest'll gut'ya in your sleep."

A moment passes. Neil purses his lips. "Heard enough, yet?"

Hope stands up. "I guess."

"Why are you waiting? Use your Wordsmithing."

Lorvos and Hope stare at each other silently. The former grins evilly, while the latter stares blankly, trying to parse what he's heard.

"You heard the big boss! Smith me with your words... whatever the hell that means."

"Maybe I should kill him," Hope says. "Maybe you're right, after all, Neil. Do I want someone like this on my side?"

"I don't," Neil says. "But you're the Wordsmith. You make the call."

Hope sucks air through his teeth. "I came here to test my Wordsmithing, and that's what I'll do."

He closes his eyes and inhales. "Convert."

Energy travels from his body into Lorvos.

The Demon Lord's evil smile slips away. He blinks. "What was that? What'd you do to me? I felt somethin'... somethin' tickle my head."

His eye twitches. Hope watches intently. "Who do you serve?"

The big demon raises an eyebrow. "Uh, you, of course, dumbass. Why'd you put me in these cuffs, anyway? You testing me or somethin'?"

"You don't remember?"

Lorvos shifts his wrists around and moves his eyes from right to left. He scrunches his forehead together. "Hmm... ahhh... I feel like there was somethin'. I fought another Lord. Lost. Bastard iced me up. Can't remember why, though."

Neil exhales. "It worked."

Hope forces a smile. "Yeah. Lorvos is trying to fit past events into his new persona. He's justifying his past actions in a new light."

Lorvos continues to stare at the humans. "What're you babblin' about? Are you gonna leave me all tied up like this forever? My wrists are killin' me. What's a fella gotta do to get some fresh air around here?"

"Should I release him?" Hope asks.

"You tell me," Neil replies. "Think he's safe?"

Hope reaches out with telekinesis and shatters the bindings on Lorvos's arm, and flinches, waiting for the demon to attack him.

The attack doesn't come.

Lorvos rubs his wrists. "Cripes, my skin's chafed as hell. Next time when you're messin' around, don't make the bindings so tight. And what about my ankles, eh?"

Hope shrugs. He tears the bindings off. "How many humans have you killed?"

Lorvos hops to his feet and stretches. "Humans? Oh, a few thousand. That was a long time ago, though. They were our enemies. Why d'ya ask?"

"You're not going to hurt humans anymore, are you?"

"Of course not, dumbass." Lorvos rolls his eyes. "Humans are friends, not food. New creed. That's how it goes."

"Sure. Whatever you say, Lorvos." Hope stares at the big demon for several seconds, then shakes his head. "Can't believe it worked. Wordsmithing is something else."

"Huh? Whaddya mean?"

"Nothing."

Hope turns to Neil. "Meldora, then. I'll go alone. Let's hope I can convert fifty thousand monsters to my side by the end of today."

Neil nods. "Yes, let's. Still, don't let your guard down. Anything could happen. And I hope for your sake you're ready for whatever you see in that city. I've... heard rumors. Paimon told me some unsettling things."

"I can handle it," Hope retorts. "I'll be back before you know it."

"Godspeed."

Part 062: Hell Harbor

Bael slaps his belly. "Come on, Grigori! What's the holdup? I ain't got all day."

Beelzebub, Rosalia, Mephisto, and Bael all wait impatiently while Diablo's personal Warper creases his brow. "Please, if you'd be so kind, give me another minute or two. Traveling to Hell Harbor isn't like traveling to other worlds. The magic restrictions are quite severe."

The Warper, a purple-skinned fellow, continues to fold his hands together into increasingly complex signs as he summons the gate that will carry them across the cosmos to the World of the Demons. Grigori sweats profusely under his black robes, but he's careful not to complain about his misery. After all, he's a professional, and this is his job.

Mephisto glances around the small inner chamber, a place in the third quadrant where the Warpers live. While their residence may be small, it's out of the way enough that they enjoy the peace and quiet. With their abilities, Warpers can easily travel from one end of Hell to the other in the blink of an eye, so distance never proves a barrier to them.

"Kss. A ssshame we have to travel sssuch a long dissstance sssimply to warp to our home. The filthy flesssbagsss have taken too much from usss already."

Beelzebub glances down at his bare body. "Before we head to Hell Harbor, I'd very much like to get some clothes."

"Heh. You'll have clothes aplenty when you arrive," Bael says. "Ever been there before?"

"No. Master Agares rarely spoke of the place."

Rosalia's eyes occasionally flick to Beelzebub's body, but she forces herself to look away, lest she make him uncomfortable. He pays her little mind.

"Mister Beelzebub, I thought your mentor showed you all the aspects of being a demon leader?"

"Not especially. Agares was never one to brag or lord his title over others. I heard he mostly slept in the Labyrinth, rather than traveling home."

"You heard right," Mephisto mutters. "The codger never ssstayed in his essstate. A ssshame. It'sss one of the lovelier placesss in Hell Harbor."

Beelzebub doesn't reply. Instead, Grigori sighs. "It's ready. Prepare to enter. The portal only lasts for fifteen seconds."

Bael nods. "Yup."

Grigori opens the portal, and everyone steps through as quickly as possible. Grigori seals it behind them and doesn't bother waving goodbye.

Beelzebub and Rosalia examine their surroundings. The four demons stand atop one of several small platforms with a magic pentagram engraved into the soft, red stone beneath their feet.

The outdoor landing area bustles with demons, all ranked at Baron level or higher, aside from their slaves. Humans, demons, and monsters alike all carry out errands for their masters, traveling to and from the Labyrinth, thanks to the one primary warp-gate still open and owned by the demons. A long line extends to the gate, and several demons tap their feet impatiently while they wait for their turn to step through.

"Ever since the humans took the Core, we haven't had many portals open to travel to Hell Harbor," Bael mutters. "Fucking fleshbags."

Beelzebub's gaze drifts past several statues carved in the likenesses of various top-ranking demons, and to the far distance, where trees and mountains give way to a lone tower atop a plateau. It stands out among the other mountains, for the fact that black smoke rises into the red sky above.

Mephisto hisses. "Do you like my home? It catchesss the eye, doesssn't it?"

"You live there?"

"Of courssse. The Undead Monolith hasss been my home for tensss of thousssandsss of yearsss. It housesss excesss energy for me to conduct my experimentsss."

Rosalia swallows. "It... um... sure looks inviting."

Bael points to the right of the tower, in the general direction of a forest. "I live out past the Shrieking Woods. You ever wanna have a good time, come on over to my place. I got lots of ladies there for your enjoyment, kid. I trained 'em well, heh heh."

"Pass." Beelzebub stifles a wave of revulsion. "I've heard of your penchant for human females. I gag at the thought of living with humans."

"Oh? Is that so?" Bael stifles a smirk and nudges Mephisto. "Hear that? He don't like humans."

"Mossst amusssing."

Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. "What? Is something about that funny? Humans disgust many demons."

"No, no, of course not. Anyway, let's get you to your new home. I can't wait to see what you think."

Beelzebub narrows his gaze. "You're planning something."

"Nah. Wouldn't dream of it."

The four demons depart their arrival platform and head into the thick of the crowd. Several pedestrians stare at Beelzebub's nude body, including the women. He scowls at them. "Keep your eyes to yourselves."

"Come on, boy, they're just 'mirin. Not to mention you're a new face around here. Most of us know each other."

Beelzebub bristles. "Soon, they'll learn to respect me. I'm a Duke now. Far above the common rabble."

"There's that big ego. Better get that under control, or me 'n Mephisto will have to teach you a lesson."

"You tried that once, and failed."

Bael goes quiet. "Tch. Whatever you say."

They stop at the exit when a few Orcs nod at them. "Mishter Bael. Muhphishtoe. You go home?"

"Nah, not yet, Grok. Get us a shuttle. We're heading over to the Slithering Spire first. Need to show the newest Duke his estate."

The head Orc grunts at Beelzebub. "No problem. Me call shuh-tul. Take few minutes. Wait here."

Beelzebub rubs his arms. "What's a shuttle? Never heard of it."

Mephisto titters. "Keh keh keh, amusssingly enough, it'sss a flessshbag invention. It floatsss over the ground and can ssseat ssseveral demonsss inssside. It'sss usssed for transssportation from one placcce to the next."

A minute later, a giant vehicle floats up, hovering over the paved ground silently. A goblin inside thumbs toward the back. "All aboard! This one's heading to the Slitherin' Spire!"

The four demons climb inside, with Rosalia and Beelzebub sitting directly across from Bael and Mephisto. Beelzebub leers away from Rosalia, even as she tries to wiggle a little closer to him on the seat. "Confound you, woman. Keep your mitts off me."

Rosalia bats her eyes innocently. "The seat isn't very big, Mister Beelzebub. I can't help myself."

"The seat is plenty wide, but so are you. You take up too much space!"

Bael chuckles. "Calling this cutie fat, huh? You've got bad manners, pup."

"Shut up."

Bael pulls the side-door shut, but when it slams, something gets in the way, causing it to reopen. The Duke of Pain pauses to examine the door. "Err, Beelzy..."

"What?"

"Uh. I slammed the door on your fingers."

Beelzebub glances at his hand. It's broken in several places. He heals it a moment later. "Oh, sorry."

"You didn't feel anything?"

"I did not."

"Mmm."

Time passes. Minutes. Hours. The shuttle drives past houses large and small, all homes belonging to one Baron or another. Most of them are quite large, standing several stories tall with dozens of rooms for servant quarters and anything else the resident requires.

On the car's left, Beelzebub spots an ocean, while on the right, the mountains press against the cliffside. Mephisto touches his fingers to his forehead for a moment and communicates with his undead minions. "We've arrived."

Beelzebub and Rosalia stare out through the wide windows to the right. The mountains peel away, and a lush green meadow appears, filled to the brim with flowers and small animals hopping about. Statues and gargoyles dot the landscape, and a gigantic tower rises into the sky thirty stories above, twisting and turning to form a shape neither of the two younger demons has seen before. Vines fall off the tower at various places, making it blend into the mountain in such a way that one might not see it if they didn't look for it.

Beelzebub's expression turns to disgust a moment later. Dozens, no, hundreds of humans walk around in a field adjoining the meadow, where they pluck fruits and vegetables from trees and plants growing nearby.

"What the hell? This is my home?"

"Mmm. Kinda. Slithering Spire is your old master's place. It's Agares' home, but he asked me to pass it down to you. Lucky break, huh?"

Beelzebub seethes for a few moments as the shuttle enters a gate with two more gargoyles atop and rolls down a long ornately laid brick driveway toward the tower a mile away.

"Humans. Why are there so many of them here? Is this some sort of sick joke?"

Mephisto glances at Bael, then at Beelzebub. "Agaresss wasss fond of flessshbagsss. He sssaved ssseveral thousssand of them during the Energy Warsss. They work asss hisss chattel here in Ssslithering Ssspire."

"Human slaves. Fantastic. Where are the low-ranked demon slaves?"

Bael smirks. "Agares only used humans. It was a rule of his. Never whipped or hurt 'em either. Too soft, in my opinion."

The shuttle pulls up to the tower, and Beelzebub leaps out, igniting fire around his body as he departs. "I won't let filthy rats look at my unclothed form."

"Suit yourself," Bael mutters. The other three demons climb out of the shuttle, and the Goblin leans his seat back.

"Lemme know when you big bosses are ready to head out."

"Sure thing, Grum-Grum," Bael says.

Beelzebub gazes up at the tower for a full minute, examining the intricate winding pattern of the chiseled marble. What a marvel of engineering. I wonder who built it?

Bael claps his hands. "Let's go inside and get you some clothes, whelp. Gettin' pretty tired of looking at your tiny meat all day long."

"I'm not," Rosalia whispers.

"Both of you, shut up."

The group of demons heads toward the front doors. While climbing the steps toward the intricately chiseled marble entrance, the doors swing open, and three humans step through; One dark-skinned man, and two light-skinned women.

The man raises a hand. "Duke of Pain. Duke of Mist. Welcome. I did not expect you here today. How may I be of service?"

Beelzebub sizes him up. Dark skin, bald, wearing a black tuxedo. Big scar going over his right eye. I thought Bael said Master Agares never punished his slaves? Maybe it's an unrelated injury. This fellow carries himself with confidence. Seems taller than he should be, considering he's only a human.

Bael crosses his arms. "Yo, Benjamin, it's been a while. I'm sure you've heard of Agares' return, and his second death."

"Only yesterday," the man says. "We're still preparing for a second funeral. I hear his body disintegrated into ash...?"

"Aye. It did." Bael nudges Mephisto, and the Duke of Mist makes a motion with his hands. In the grass at the bottom of the steps, a zombie emerges from the ground with a ceramic container in its arms. It trudges up the steps and hands the container to Mephisto, then heads back down and goes underground.

Beelzebub shivers. That thing had no face. Horrifying.

Mephisto hands the urn to Bael, and Bael to Benjamin. "Here he is. It's all we could recover."

Ben takes the urn and stares at it for several long moments. "I heard he died fighting the Black Witch. How did he come back to fight again?"

Beelzebub coughs. "Ahem. I can answer that question, insect. I fought and defeated my master when the Black Queen summoned him from the realm of the dead."

The man glances at his two female companions, then back to Beelzebub. "Oh. You must be his pupil. Beelzebub, am I right?"

"You are."

The man nods. "I am Benjamin Brown, the head slave here at the Slithering Spire. Since you are the new master of this residence, I am your humble servant."

Beelzebub gnashes his teeth. "I don't want a human servant. I want demon servants. Why in the Devil's name would Agares have humans working under him?! I thought the old lizard had more sense than that."

Rosalia nods. "Yeah! Why should Mister Beelzebub have humans working under him? Gross. He deserves better than that!"

Benjamin doesn't reply for a few moments. The man rubs his bald head a few times before answering. "Master Agares spoke about you all the time. He mentioned your proclivity toward hating humans, and your tendency to distrust and hate us, irrational though it be. I didn't expect you to look at me with such venom in your eyes, but now I understand what he meant."

"Irrational? I'm far from irrational," Beelzebub counters. "Humans tortured and exterminated demons in the past era before the Energy Wars. Your kind deserves all the pain you've suffered."

Benjamin scratches his thin black facial hair, then looks at Bael. "He doesn't know, does he?"

"Nope."

Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. "I don't know... what?"

Benjamin smiles faintly, then dismisses the two women. After they leave, he clears his throat. "Master Beelzebub, this may come as a surprise to you, but I lived during the Energy Wars."

"Huh? Lies. That's impossible. Your kind barely lives to a hundred, and that's if the demons allow you."

Bael shakes his head. "Ben's telling the truth. He was one of humanity's military commanders. He killed a lot of demons."

Nobody says anything for a few seconds.

Beelzebub's face whitens. "You... slew demons? And Agares allowed you to live?"

"I did, and he did. We had an agreement." Benjamin looks at a watch on his wrist for a moment. "Why not come inside? I'll tell you all about it. We've already prepared dinner for tonight, and everyone here is free to enjoy it."

Beelzebub's body stays tense. "I couldn't care less. I'm not entering a house filled with humans."

Benjamin nods. "I thought you might say that. I think you'll find Agares' last will and testament... enlightening."

Rosalia blinks, then reaches into her clothes to withdraw Agares' envelope from the Slaughterseum. Beelzebub eyes it for a moment. "Rosalia. I'm still having trouble controlling my flames. Hold it out so I can read it."

The plump woman nods, opens the envelope, and pulls out some ancient, faded papers. Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. It looks like Agares wrote this will several hundred years ago.

His eyes scan the page as Rosalia holds it up.

Beelzebub.

If you are reading this, I have perished. I know not how, when, or why, but I assume you will inherit my estate and eventually move in with my family.

Well, you might not think of them as family. After all, to you, they will appear as little more than slaves. Human slaves, at that, and I know how you loathe their kind. You're not one for compassion.

My pupil, I believed in you from the moment I met you. You remember how we met, don't you? I do. I think about it all the time. You were a feisty little imp, one who thought of himself as better than the others. Your body took a beating now and then, but your pride was invulnerable. I respected that about you. I still do.

You're a demon raised among demons. You're young, and thus know little of the galaxy and universe outside the Labyrinth. It's not your fault. We designed the Labyrinth to be an insular system. The Council wished to encourage ignorance among demons regarding their past so that we could look toward the future.

However... I believe we went about everything in the wrong manner.

I don't love humans. I've lost many brothers and sisters to their kind. However, I don't hate them, either. I believe humans and demons have value to each other. I tried to instill those beliefs in you as an upcoming Lord, but I fear I may have failed.

Beelzebub. I bequeath you my estate, but I ask that you do things differently from me. Focus on what went wrong in the past. Demons and humans need not be mortal enemies. We should not have a predator and prey dynamic, but one of cooperation and trust.

Some would say my goal is farfetched, and for an old bat like me, they would be right. However, you are not bound by the past as I am. Look to the future in a way the other demons won't. Lead humanity and the demons toward a horizon where both stand to benefit. If you do not... I fear that war will take us once again.

Life is peaceful now, but I believe it will not stay that way forever.

Be strong, my pupil. Stand up for what is right. Use that pride of yours to resist the honeyed words of the Council. Pressure them to accept-

Beelzebub sighs and stops reading. "Agares always did have a flair for the dramatic."

Bael walks around behind Rosalia. "Eh? What's it say?"

Beelzebub snatches the paper from Rosalia and burns it to ash. "Nothing you need to see. Human, have you read this letter?"

Ben shakes his head. "I have not, but I can hazard a guess regarding its contents."

"Excellent," Beelzebub mutters. "Incredible absurdity from a stupid old man. I regret wasting my time."

Rosalia stares at Beelzebub, having read the letter herself. "I thought the letter was... nice."

Beelzebub rolls his eyes. "I'm shocked you'd think that."

Benjamin gestures inside the Spire. "Well, if that's everything, will you be joining us for dinner, Master Beelzebub?"

The Duke of Inferno glowers at the human for several moments. He sighs. "Fine. Whatever. I don't trust you in the slightest, but at the least, I'd like to put on some clothes."

Ben cocks his head. "Oh. I thought that fire around your waist was what you normally wore."

"No," Beelzebub hisses. "Get me a suit. Black. Trimmed cuffs with a bright red undershirt."

Ben clicks his tongue. "You'll be staying for dinner, then?"

"Don't test me."

Part 063: Inner Monster, Outer Monster - What's The Difference?

The walls of Meldora, little more than low-quality bricks slapped together with mud, stand a mere seven-feet tall. Hope peeks out from the forest and squints at the four-dozen orcs milling about outside the city's gate. Alongside them are several goblins and even a harpy perched on the wall. She doesn't have a good foothold on the soggy bricks, but she clutches them tightly with her foot-claws anyway.

One orc, dressed in slightly more elaborate armor compared to the rest, laughs. "Bahaha! Stupid Lorvos! He think we save him? What idiot! Me no stick neck out for bloodskin!"

"You said it, boss," A goblin laughs. "Hope the fleshbags gut him real good! That's what he gets for getting caught, am I right? Hehehehe!"

Hope frowns. Wow. Tons of security. Shouldn't be a problem to slip by, but if this is the group outside, I can only imagine how many will be inside the walls.

He whispers under his breath, "Invisible." His body becomes transparent, little more than a blur in the wind. He dashes from the tree-cover to the city without being noticed and hops the wall. Using his Wordsmithing, he speaks. "Convert. Convert. Convert. Convert."

Over and over, for each guard outside, Hope says the word. It takes him almost a minute, and he coughs. Aren't there supposed to be 50,000 monsters in this city? Jesus Christ. It'll take me forever to convert them all. There has to be a better way.

Immediately, an idea appears in his head.

If I say the word 'Convert,' it will create an active effect. However, maybe I can make it passive instead. That's what I did with my telekinesis. I might be able to mind-control enemies by looking at them. Hopefully, that will work.

Nodding to himself, Hope utters a word of power. "Conversion."

He slides up against a straw hut. An orc grunts inside the hut, and Hope can barely make out a man's muffled whimpers. Hope's stomach churns as he realizes what the monster is doing to the man. Disgusting. What the hell? Maybe Neil was right about them. Do I want pigs like these on my side?

He aims his mind at the source of the grunting, then slips around and the front and enters the hut. The man is tied down to the table while the orc has his 'fun.'

"Release him."

Hope speaks, and the orc pauses. It pulls away from the man. "Yes, master. Me do as you say."

"Untie and ungag him. Christ. That's horrible. You know what? Go jump in a pool of ice-water. Freeze to death for all I care."

The orc keeps his back to Hope, but nods dumbly. "Yes, master. Me free hooman. Me freeze in water."

Hope watches silently as the orc unties the man, then walks outside. The man lies on the table shivering and whimpering for over a minute. "Hurts... hurts..."

"Heal. Forget." Hope Wordsmiths and gnashes his teeth together. "Maybe if you forget the trauma, you can live a normal life once I clear out this city."

Before leaving, Hope frowns. I shouldn't leave him here. An orc might find him. I can't waste time running him back to the portal either, but maybe I can speed up the process.

Hope speaks a single word. "Return."

The man opens his mouth in surprise and vanishes a moment later.

Hope speaks again. "Locate." His mind travels out of the city and flies over to Neil's camp, where the man appears in the middle of some confused soldiers. The soldiers stare at the man, and he stares at them. Several seconds pass before the soldiers take him to see Neil.

Great. Neil will understand.

Hope pulls away and returns to his body. No time to waste.

He slips outside the tent and glances up at the planet's sun. It beats down on the surface like a vengeful phoenix. The heat must be a hundred degrees out, and it's worse inside the buildings.

The houses on the outskirts of the city are little more than tents and huts, but deeper inside the city; they transform into mud, brick, and stone. One of them, a church, stands taller than all the rest. It's only now that Hope spots the source of the fire from earlier. A massive pile of human bodies sits outside the church, it flames rising dozens of feet into the air. Nearby orcs grab human hostages, bind their limbs together, and hurl them onto the bonfire to burn alive.

The victim's screams send chills down Hope's spine.

"Oh, god. Oh, god. I'm gonna be sick."

Hope watches in horror as a little girl screams and cries. An orc carries her bound body to the flaming heap, and her eyes widen in terror. Several of her friends lie motionless on the mound, their lives long gone.

Neil's words come back to Hope. Demons respect strength.

Hope's stomach trembles. Strength? Is tying up defenseless children and hurling them onto a fire considered strong?! It's cowardly! Pathetic!

The orc grins as he walks toward the fire. "After cook you good, you taste real nice. Burned human meat the best. Kids taste like yum. Hehe."

Hope aims his mind at the orc. You're mine.

The orc pauses in front of the fire. His eyes glaze over. "Uhh... what was doing?"

Hope looks around at the hundreds of orcs standings around, laughing about this and that. One of them glances at his ally with the girl. "Hey! Mulpu! What you wait for? Throw on cook meat and grab next one!"

Hope shivers. Even invisible, I can't walk over there and talk to him to tell him what to do. Oh! I should order him around with my mind!

"Telepathy."

Hope aims his mind at the big orc again. Bring the girl to the green tent, then attack that loudmouth. Tell him you want to keep the little girl for yourself. Call him barf-skin. That should piss him off.

Mulpu nods dumbly. He turns around, walks toward Hope, and sets the crying child down.

The other orcs scowl at him. "What big idea, Mulpu?! Follow order, stupid hog-fucker!"

Mulpu rears up and roars. "Shut up, barf-skin! This girl mine! Me fight for her!"

The other orc cocks his head. "Boorf-skin? What that?"

Hope facepalms. They're so stupid they can't even recognize an insult. Mulpu, tell him his mother was a goblin.

"Your mother a goblin!! She ugly like demon ass!"

The other orc's eyes widen. He yanks a sword out of a nearby barrel and raises it above his head. "How dare you insult mother! Me make rug from your skin!"

The two orcs leap into combat, howling like angry wolves. While they fight, Hope reaches down and picks up the little girl. Her eyes open in terror as the invisible assailant grabs her. "Eee-!"

"Don't speak," Hope whispers. "I'm a friend. I'm here to save you."

Despite the terror on her face, the child nods and stays silent.

Hope turns her invisible as well, and dashes away to a nearby hut. He's relieved to see nobody inside.

"Revert. Revert." He undoes the invisibility on the both of them, then unties her wrists and feet. "Hey there, cutie. What's your name? I'm Hope."

The child, barely seven years old, stares at him silently for several seconds. "M-Marisa..."

"Great. Marisa, who are the people that run the village? Do you know?"

Marisa stares emptily at him. "Mama. They hurt mama. And papa. They put them in the fire."

"I know, sweetheart. I'm sorry. You know what? Never mind the questions. I'm gonna put you somewhere safe, okay? Return."

He sends the little girl back to Neil's tents. "Two down, God knows how many to go."

Hope makes himself invisible once again and slips out of the tent. This time, he walks over to the tallest stone-building in the city.

"Adhere."

With a single word, Hope makes his hands and feet sticky and begins climbing the walls like a spider.

Several seconds pass. Once Hope reaches a decent vantage point, he gazes intently at the city sprawled out beneath him.

Mulpu's body lies motionless. Orcs surround and kick him, battering him left and right. "Stupid shrakh! Fell for a hooman, did ya? Bahaha!"

Hope doesn't blink. He mutters under his breath, "Piece of shit Orc. Fuck him. He deserved to die."

He freezes.

Whoa? Did I say that? That's not me. I shouldn't like death. He's an orc. He doesn't know any better. I sentenced him to death. Even if I didn't kill him myself, I ordered him to die. That's sick. Messed-up.

He doesn't have time to dwell on the thought. Several orcs yell at once. "Oy, Ligna! The tiny one got away! She musta crawled!"

A giant orc with a black ponytail, apparently named Ligna, scowls. "What?! She couldn't have gotten far! Look around! Search the tents! We don't waste little person meat around here!"

Hope scrutinizes the large orc. He must be their commander.

A sound behind Hope makes him shiver. He turns his head and nearly screams. A goblin climbs the wall beside him, sniffing the air. "Human... I smell a human..."

Hope gathers his wits and mind-controls the goblin. Tell me where the human leaders of the city are.

The ugly little monster pauses and blinks. His eyes glaze over. "Leaders. City. Burned alive. Only weak ones left."

What?! That's awful! How many humans are left?

The goblin blinks slowly. "Only a few thousand. Takin' 'em to the fire pit, we are. Not long now. Tasty meat. Lorvos is gone. No reason for us to stay. Return to Labyrinth."

Several people scream. The orcs ready themselves to hurl the next batch of squirming people into the blaze.

"No!" Hope leaps off the building and slows his descent with telekinesis. You, orc. Release her. You, orc. Release him.

Hope quickly sends thoughts and orders to each one. The dozen orcs blink their eyes and yawn. "Huh? Why me burn bodies? No need burn. Put on ground. Save for later."

Ligna spots the new batch of turncoats. "Aw, come on! Not you hound-fuckers too! Put the bodies in the fire! It ain't hard to do."

Hope hardens his eyes. Kill your leader. He's in the way.

The twelve orcs immediately spin and draw their swords, then advance on the commander. His annoyance vanishes, and deadly anger replaces it.

"Hey. What are you shrakh-heads planning? This some kinda mutiny?"

His subordinates charge him, but the commander doesn't raise a weapon. Instead, he drops to one knee, making himself a smaller target. The first orc that draws near gets a fist to the groin. Ligna flings that one behind himself with an expert-level maneuver that would make a martial-arts master weep with joy. The next eight follow similar fates. By the time he gets to the last three, the commander snarls.

"You lot are actin' like you ain't never trained before! Mindless idiots! Who taught you to fight? I'll have his head!"

Hope quickly returns the humans on the ground to Neil's camp while Ligna's busy. Interesting. Their cognitive abilities decrease dramatically once I mind control them. I've seen orcs fight before. These guys are pathetic. I guess mind control isn't the catch-all solution I thought it was.

The commander takes out two of the last three at the same time, then punches the final orc's head so hard it flies off and crashes into the dirt. The headless body collapses, and Ligna stares at it silently.

"Somethin's goin' on here. I don't like it. Smells like magic."

He spots the missing humans. "What? Where'd the tarks go?"

Hope continues to watch from beside the fire-pit. The orc commander, Ligna, is more intelligent than his underlings. He can form full sentences. He took out his minions like they were nothing. I'll control him and see what happens.

A moment later, Hope connects to Ligna's mind. Obey.

The big brute takes a step back and recoils, then winces. "Ohh, head hurts. What the devil?"

Several orcs and goblins come running up from the city entrance where Hope arrived. "Boss! Boss! You okay? Why followers attack?"

Ligna rubs his eyes. "Gah. I hear a voice. In my head. Shrakh. I don't want... to listen..."

Hope frowns. He's resisting my Wordsmithing? He's only an orc. That shouldn't be poss-

Suddenly, Ligna's voice roars in Hope's mind. GET OUT OF MY HEAAAD!!

Hope stumbles back and lands on the ground with a thud, disturbing the dirt. He yelps in surprise, causing several of the newcomers to turn toward him. One goblin yells, "Oy! Did you 'ear that?"

"Hooman voice! Someone's there!"

"I don't see nothin'."

Ligna shakes the fog out of his head. "Idiots! He's hiding! Look for him! Might be trickin' us. Use your noses!"

The goblins sniff the air, and the orcs narrow their eyes as they squint and try to spot him. Hope jumps to his feet, and one of the orcs points. "There! The dirt! It moved!"

"I saw it too! Somethin's movin' in the air!"

Ligna punches his palm. "I knew it. Some tark is tryin'a screw with me. Get him! Don't you shrakh-heads dare let him escape!"

Hope quickly levitates in the air with telekinesis, but in doing so, he spots a horde of orcs approaching the burning pile. Someone must have signaled them.

One of the goblins sniffs. "Something's moving. The air's shaking. I see it... I see the human!"

Hope winces. The monsters begin to converge on his position as the goblin keeps pointing at him. I guess even invisibility isn't infallible. If the goblin's using his nose, though...

"Anosmia. STENCH!"

With two words, Hope seals off his sense of smell and unleashes a vile odor that races around the town like a mad hatter. The entire army crumples to its knees. Even the orcs, who love the smell of dead bodies, can't control themselves. They double over and gag violently, wretching up meals from the last few days all at the same time, which only adds to the horrid stink in the air.

Hope gazes at the crowd of enemies. I feel nothing toward them, and I can't excuse their actions anymore. They deserve all the pain they're suffering. Neil is right.

The Wordsmith begins mind-controlling orcs one-by-one. Fight your fellow orc. Fight. Fight. Kill each other. Do the world a favor and bring an end to your disgusting existences.

Despite the tears in their eyes, each mind-controlled orc stumbles to his feet and draws his sword, then attacks the enemy closest to him. Chaos ensues.

Swords and steel meet flesh and bone. Orcs and goblins alike scream in pain as their limbs end up hacked to pieces and sprayed all over the ground. Their blood mixes with the dirt, creating muddy trenches that suck their feet to the ground. Several orcs slip and fall in the chaos, only for their mind-controlled allies to pounce at them and end their lives.

Hope grimaces at the death occurring all around him. However, a hint of excitement appears in his eyes. Yes. Yes! Tear each other apart. I'll save the humans while you lot suffer and gag.

He hovers higher into the air and uses his Wordsmithing to locate any survivors he can, then teleports them back to Neil's camp. Any time an orc emerges from a tent or stumbles toward the chaotic battle, Hope mind-controls and orders them to fight their former allies.

Hahaha... I'm having fun. Watching disgusting creatures tear each other apart isn't so bad. I was wrong all along. I need to listen to Neil more often. I shouldn't compare orcs to fairies or other cute creatures. They might all be monsters, but some are more monstrous than others.

Several hours pass. Hope eventually rests atop the church and smiles to himself. I saved nearly two thousand humans. Now all that's left is to let these idiots rip each other to shreds. I've left the commander alive. It's fun sending a stream of minions to die at his hand. He's getting pretty tired.

Ligna swings a sword at another orc, chopping deep into the fellow's neck. "Haah... haah... damn you! Stop falling for his tricks! Fight back, idiots! Don't let a damn fleshbag turn us against each other!"

Hope shakes his head. It's pointless to fight back. Even if you kill every orc in the city, you're no match for me. You remind me of old video games where I would kill zombies one after the other. They didn't deserve sympathy, and neither do you. It's a shame I can't trade orc lives for the humans you've killed, but maybe they'll rest in peace knowing I avenged them.

Several minutes pass. Hope chuckles when Ligna kills his final ally and slumps to his knees, gasping for breath. He's long since grown used to the acrid stench in the air.

"Fah... fahking bastard! Where's that tark hiding? C-come out! Coward!"

Hope speaks again. "Purify. Normalize." He hovers to the ground, and Ligna watches without moving.

"So... you're the one... who did this."

"I am."

The orc wipes his forehead. His arm shakes from exhaustion. "Smart human. I dunno how you did it... but turning my warriors against me was clever. Now you can gut me real easy. I'm ready for death."

"Oh? You think I'm going to kill you?"

"Why wouldn't ya? Go on. Do it."

Hope scratches his chin. "I'm considering it. Tell me, though... why do orcs pillage, rape, and plunder? Can't you be less savage?"

The commander shakes his head. "Than what? A filthy tark? As if. You're worse than all of us combined."

Hope narrows his eyes. "What do you mean?"

Ligna chuckles. He beckons toward the hundreds of dead orcs nearby. "Oh, come on. Don't piss in my face, tark. You did this. You might not've killed 'em yourself, but it's all your fault my warriors died."

Hope nods. "True. The difference is that they deserved to die. The humans didn't. The children didn't. I won't apologize. Don't even try and play innocent with me."

Ligna lowers his head. "Pretty words. I don't care. I'm tired. Need sleep. Get it over with."

Hope stares at the commander for over a minute. A question forms in his mind.

Should I kill Ligna?

He sets his jaw and considers his actions over the past several hours. I didn't directly kill anyone, but I might as well have. I can't be a pansy. If I'm going to end this miserable creature's life, I might as well do it now. I can't sit around forever and rest on my laurels. Neil told me that the demons respect power. Jason isn't powerful. He's scared. He's always trying to take the easy way out, to save lives and protect his ideals. We used to be the same person, but I'm not bound to his path anymore.

Yeah, that's right. That's the spirit. Jason let Amelia die. He could have beaten her without Hoarhiim's help, and Satan too. Maybe he could have bound Satan with unbreakable cuffs, then blasted him with holy energy over and over again. Hell, he could have destroyed the planet after taking Amelia away. Jason didn't do any of those things! He's an idiot.

I can't stand it. The guilt I feel is all because of him. Jason is the one who failed humanity, time and time again. He didn't protect the Core. He didn't protect Amelia. He didn't save these humans either... I did! I did!!

Hope raises his chin and stares coldly at the orc kneeling before him.

Humanity isn't battling itself anymore, but demons and monsters. Sometimes, it takes a monster to kill a monster. I'll do what I must to protect everyone, even if they hate me for it. That is my path. I see it now.

Hope raises his hand and aims it at the orc.

"I feel no pity for you. I can only imagine the humans you've raped and tortured. Your barbarism ends here, Ligna, as well as the rest of your species. I won't show mercy for enemies of humanity, no matter what."

Ligna sighs. "Mercy is for the weak. Ain't that right?"

"Yeah. And I'm not weak. Not anymore."

Hope uses his telekinesis to reach into Ligna's chest and constrict the orc's heart. The sudden look of pain on Ligna's face fills Hope with an unfamiliar emotion. It isn't one he can put into words, but it resembles... pleasure.

Ligna gasps and clutches at his chest. Hope crushes the orc's heart with all of his strength, imploding it inside Ligna's ribs. The orc gasps, and falls over a moment later, dead.

Several minutes pass. Hope stares at the orc silently. "Rest in peace. You were my first kill. You won't be the last."

He spins around and trudges away, leaving the bodies behind. "Burn."

An hour later, Hope arrives at the borders of the camp. Immediately, he notices something is amiss. He spots a few soldiers weeping near the outskirts of the tents and walks over to them. "Hey. What's going on? Why are you crying?"

The young man, barely twenty years old, turns to look at Hope. "Oh... oh, god! Wordsmith! You're back! It's terrible! Lorvos went berserk! He attacked us out of nowhere and nearly killed Commander Neil!"

"What? He did?! Where is he? Where's Neil?"

The man shakes his head. "Don't worry. The commander is safe. A demoness appeared and defeated Lorvos before he could kill the commander, then she healed Neil. However, so, so many others were not as lucky..."

The second soldier nods. She forces herself to remain stoic. "S-sir, you should know. Lorvos slew at least a hundred soldiers, and most of the refugees you sent back. His attack was so fast and brutal that it caught us completely off-guard. Among the dead... one of those killed, w-was..."

Hope's telepathy picks up the name before she says it. "Paimon."

She nods. "Yes. I'm sorry, sir. He died when he jumped in front of one of Lorvos's attacks."

Hope's eyes turn hollow. "I... I need to see the situation for myself. Where is- what's the current state of the camp?"

She walks toward the camp, and Hope follows. He looks around and spots several soldiers hauling dead bodies to the middle to line them up for identification. Hope's eyes immediately catch sight of Paimon's limp form.

"Jason?" A woman's voice speaks out. Hope turns and swivels to spot a succubus he's seen before. Samantha. No, Belial.

"I'm not Jason; I'm Hope. I'm his clone."

Melancholy fills Belial's face. She gestures to the bodies. "I hear you mind-controlled Lorvos."

"I did."

She shakes her head. "Mind control doesn't last forever. The stronger a person's will, the faster they will break free. He happened to be in the middle of the mess hall when he escaped his mental prison. You're lucky I showed up when I did, or he'd have killed everyone in camp."

Hope bows his head. "Th-thank you. I'm sorry. I... I didn't realize-"

"You don't have to apologize to me. I healed the commander. Go talk to him."

"Alright. Thanks." Hope turns to head toward the commander's tent, but he pauses. A body catches his eye. It's a little girl, one he saw not even a few hours before.

Marisa.

The child's eyes stare at the sky blankly. A look of horror rests on her face, as if the last thing she saw was something too frightening to put into words.

Hope freezes. He stares at the child for several seconds. Belial follows his gaze.

"Do you know her?"

Hope's chin trembles. "Where... where's Lorvos?"

Belial looks away. "I killed him. I'm sorry. I didn't want to, but he wouldn't stay down. Stubborn bastard."

A tear rolls down the Wordsmith's face.

"No. You did the right thing. Don't apologize."

Hope clenches his fist with enough force to crush steel.

I failed Marisa. I failed everyone. Never again.

Part 064: Dinner With the Demons

Author note: This part was originally going to have a second section, but it's taking too long to write, so I'll split it off for tomorrow's part. Sadly, that takes this part from 20k characters to 12k, but at least tomorrow's part will be super long! Yay!

Four demons and a human sit at the long table in the Slithering Spire. Beelzebub, Rosalia, Bael, Mephisto, and Benjamin Brown, with the two highest-ranked Dukes at the head and end of the table, Beelzebub and Rosalia at the left, and Benjamin opposite them. A beautiful chandelier hangs overhead, and the marbled floors shine brightly enough that one could eat off them. Unlike the humble abodes built within the Labyrinth, the crystal lights above glow with the power of electrical lighting, revealing their human-rooted design.

Beelzebub spears the meat on his plate with a fork and examines it for a moment before placing it in his mouth. The fish-like substance tastes unlike anything he's eaten before. The fish's bitter and salty texture mixes with its spongy flesh to create a satisfying flavor.

Mephisto sits alone with no plate before him, as he cannot eat, nor digest food. His skeletal body lacks any internal organs, and thus, he must sit and watch as the others eat their fill. Rosalia chews on something resembling tofu, while Bael stuffs three-quarters of an entire chicken in his mouth, crushing the bones with violent force. The sound of his lips smacking and the meat sloshing around makes everyone else hesitate to continue eating, but they force themselves to ignore him.

Bael wipes his entire arm across his mouth and smears chicken-meat all over himself in the process. "Eh. Not as good as human flesh, but it's decent."

After a few moments of staring at Bael, Beelzebub places another bite of fish in his mouth. "I'm not one to eat, usually. It isn't necessary for demon survival. Still, I suppose tasting food isn't the worst thing I could be doing right now."

"You said it, Mister Beelzebub. I'm surprised human food tastes this good!" Rosalia smiles cutely at him before drinking the red substance in front of her. According to Benjamin Brown, it's called "Wine," but she's never had it before. The lifestyle low-level demon servants like her experience daily doesn't afford them more than the basics.

Satisfied with himself, and rapidly losing his willingness to eat thanks to Bael's disgusting sounds, Beelzebub pushes his plate away and stares at Benjamin across the table. The human ignores Bael and proceeds to cut apart a stalk of celery with his fork and knife. All the food on his plate consists of vegetables, with no meat in sight. He chews the celery for a few moments before meeting Beelzebub's gaze.

"I presume you will be skipping most meals then, Master Beelzebub?"

Beelzebub places his handkerchief in his suit pocket. "Correct. In fact, I'll be skipping out on most things. I'm not fond of humans, not in the slightest. I don't think I'll loiter around here very often."

Rosalia perks up. "Oh! I know! Why not kick the humans out? Then you and I can have this spire all to ourselves! We can get married, and I'll become a broodmother, and then I'll-"

"Pass," Beelzebub hisses. "I plan to hire several dozen attractive demon servants and press them into my service."

Rosalia blushes. "Thank you for the compliment, m-mister Beelzebub."

"Devils. I wasn't referring to you."

Rosalia sits up a little straighter. A spark of realization appears in her eyes. "Ahh, right, because I'm already your servant! Silly me. It'll be hard for you to find someone you find as enrapturing as me, but I'll do my best to help you out!"

"You'll do your best for another demon lord once I sent you away," Beelzebub says, rolling his eyes. "I won't require your services past next week."

Bael snorts down the last of his chicken and raises a hand. "Hehehe, you're a funny one, pup. Don't you know? Demon servants serve for life. Rosalia ain't goin' nowhere."

Rosalia squeals. "Really?! I didn't know that! That's great news!"

"That's terrible news!" Beelzebub counters. "Since when was that a rule? I've never heard anything so absurd in all my years as a Lord!"

Mephisto's glowing red eyes flick to Bael, as if searching for something, then to Beelzebub. "Oh, yesss. It hasss been a tradition since the ancient timesss. Every great demon hasss a faithful ssservant who will ssstick with them through thick and thin."

Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. "Yeah? Then who's yours? Who's Bael's?"

The big demon chuckles. "I'll introduce you to him sometime."

"Sure you will."

Beelzebub slumps in his seat and scowls at Rosalia. She smiles from ear to ear. "Yay! Nothing can separate us now, Mister Beelzebub!"

"I know. That's why I'm annoyed."

Ben smiles. He sticks another forkful of celery in his mouth. "Young love is really something."

"Mind your tongue, human. No matter how my former master felt, I'll throw you and the rest of your kind out tomorrow if you keep those comments up."

The human looks away. "You will, hm? Why not today? I thought you couldn't stand the sight of me."

"I can't. However, I also feel as though if my master kept you around, he must have had a reason. Why not tell me your talents? I'll decide whether or not to evict you depending on how you answer."

Silence falls over the table.

Ben pops the last bit of celery in his mouth, then glances at Bael. "I thought demons had to be intelligent to become Dukes."

Bael shrugs. "I mean, lookit me."

"True."

Benjamin forks a piece of broccoli but holds it in midair and stares at the vegetable instead of eating it. "How old are you, master Beelzebub? A thousand? Two thousand?"

Beelzebub visibly bristles. "I'm well over ten thousand years old. Why?"

"Just curious." Ben sets the broccoli down and folds his hands. "I'm over a hundred thousand years old, you know. Bael was less than four thousand years old when demons conquered humanity. He may not be one to use big words, but Bael was quite wise when it came to matters of war, as was Mephisto."

The necromancer hisses. "You flatter me ssso."

"Get to the point," Beelzebub mutters. "Assuming you have one."

"I already told you I was, at one point, the leader of Earth's military, did I not?"

Beelzebub's voice tightens. "Yes. So?"

"I fought both of the demons here at this table. I even defeated them a few times. While humanity ultimately lost the war, the reason I lived under Agares in relative peace, along with the humans outside, was part of our peace treaty. A deal, if you will."

Beelzebub smiles. "Oh? You sold your kind out to us, and in exchange, you ended up in a palace fit for a king. The terms worked out quite well for you."

"Mostly correct," Ben says, his voice cracking. "But, I would hardly call it a blessing." He winces and looks away, meeting Bael's eyes. "After all, I knew what came next would be unpleasant. I helped the demons build containment worlds for humanity. I helped them enslave my brethren. I set the terms of our surrender, expecting full well that demons would kill us all after defanging us."

Benjamin continues. "I was surprised when they didn't. Agares was an honorable demon. He ensured that humans would be given worlds to live on, have their memories wiped, and that they would be reverted to a Dark Ages level of civilization. The bare minimum for our survival. In exchange, humans would have to follow requirements, including sacrifices to the demons, and a hundred other things that would surely pain them, but were better than extinction and endless war."

"I see." Beelzebub's smile fades. He stares at the human solemnly for a moment. "So, if I understand correctly, Agares held some level of respect for you."

Bael chuckles. "Heh, I do too. Ben was one tough son of a bitch, and a hell of a general. Sometimes I wish I could give him command of a thousand humans and go all-out on them. I wanna relive the old days."

The dark-skinned man nods. "Aye. I know of the happenings inside the Labyrinth. A newly arisen hero is causing trouble. He's the one responsible for the influx of chaos recently."

At the mention of Jason, Beelzebub sits up straighter in his chair. A flash of rage passes over his face. "Tch. I suppose you're entertaining delusions of grandeur, then? Thinking of joining him?"

Ben reaches for a glass of water and sips from it. "The opposite. I'm old, Beelzebub. We all are. Not you, of course. To me, looking at you is like looking at a coddled child. I see the energy in you. You're bored. You hunger for action. Not me. I put that behind me. Even if humanity wasn't thriving, at least they were living fulfilled lives until recently. Now, thanks to this newcomer, I worry about what will happen. I smell war. It's coming, and it won't be pretty. Millions, if not billions, will die."

"Is that so bad?" Rosalia leans forward and butts into the conversation. "War, I mean. What's happened over the last hundred thousand years, Mister Brown? Nothing. Nobody does anything. Demons like me have to stay servants. Everyone knows it's pointless to try and become Lords, Barons, and Dukes. There's no mobility. Beelzebub is extremely talented to have reached the rank of Duke so quickly, and lucky, too, but few have the opportunities he did."

Beelzebub smiles at his chubby servant. "Rosalia is right. You say that humans were living fulfilling lives, but also that they weren't thriving. Does an endless stalemate strike you as worth pursuing? Does not death give meaning to life? I would argue that it's better to die fighting to achieve something than to live forever yet accomplish nothing."

"I look at things differently from you," Ben replies. "For me, raising a family here at the Slithering Spire gives me meaning. When I first moved, only I, my closest family members, and a few other leaders of humanity lived here. We've exploded into over a thousand people as the millennia passed and eventually slowed our babymaking down once we'd filled the place to capacity several times over. Watching my children grow gave me a sense of fulfillment."

Beelzebub's mood darkens. "Watching humans die is what fulfills me. Tasting their pain and suffering. Bael understands."

"He does, yes," Ben replies. "I am curious, though, why do you enjoy watching humans suffer and die? Is it because you lack a purpose? Is it because you can think of no other way to fill the void inside yourself than to watch others writhe in pain? Have humans done anything to harm you?"

Beelzebub rubs his chin. "I can't say they have. Still, humans are pathetic and weak. Every demon knows that those who are weak deserve to die. It's a simple matter."

"Is that you talking, or your teachers from when you were an imp?"

"Shut up."

The demon and human glower at each other for a moment. Bael claps his hands to interrupt their festive mood. "Alrighty! I've heard enough! Look, Ben, give the kid a chance. And Beelzy, maybe you oughta listen to him. He's a lot smarter'n me, and he might have some ideas about getting the humans back in their cages. Hell, he's worked with Ose several times. Whaddya say? Kiss and make up."

Beelzebub and Ben speak at the same time. "Pass."

Bael's mood instantly sours, and he rolls his eyes. "Tch. Fine. Do what you want. I don't give a shit." He leans forward and points at Beelzebub's half-finished fish. "By the way... you gonna finish that?"

Beelzebub shoves the plate past Rosalia without a second thought. "Eat your heart out."

"Thanks."

After a minute of listening to Bael shlorp fishy chunks down his gullet, Beelzebub rises from his chair. "I'm going out for a walk."

Rosalia leaps up. "Ooh, ooh! I'll go with you! I saw a pond of ducks on the way over! They're super cute, Mister Beelzebub!"

"Oh? Relatives of yours?"

Rosalia blushes. "Is that your way of saying I'm cute?"

"No."

The two young demons stride out of the room. Beelzebub sighs, and Rosalia laughs.

After they leave, Mephisto turns to Ben. "I defeated Diablo during the battle againssst the Black Witch when he went berssserk. Afterwardsss, Bael decided to choossse a new Emperor. Bael picked Ossse to take Diablo'sss place."

Ben raises an eyebrow. "Oh? I thought Bael would be the new Third if Diablo ever fell. Hell, even you'd be the next best candidate, Mephisto."

Bael shifts in his chair. "Ose used her feminine charms on me. I'm a sucker for a nice piece of ass."

Mephisto seethes. "I would make a far better Emperor than her. I ssstill think you made the wrong decisssion."

"Maybe. We'll find out. Ben, you wanna pop in and say hi to Ose sometime? She might need your help to put the humans in line."

Ben nods. "I suppose so. What about the- the, erm, Overlords? Won't they help?"

"We would prefer not to bother them again. They're ssstill ssseething with sssussspicion after we asssked them to dessstroy a planet. Any more, and they will begin asssking troublesssome quessstionsss."

"A wise choice," Ben says. "Well, I guess I can offer. I should warn you two, though... I'm not on speaking terms with Ose. Her old hatred of humans flared up the last time we met. I don't know what I said, but she was quite angry."

"Ose's an odd one," Bael mutters. "But then again, so was her mother. That whole clan of demons is screwy in the head. Never liked any of 'em."

"Yeah," Ben replies. "Can't say I disagree. I don't like her tactics, either. Manipulative. Sociopathic. The only demon worse than her is-"

"Me?" Bael snorts.

"No. Ose's brother."

A chill falls over the table. Mephisto grinds his bony hands together. "Let'sss not ssspeak of sssuch mattersss at the dinner table."

Ben pokes a cooling batch of cheesy lettuce on his plate. His eyes glaze over. "Agreed. I apologize for bringing him up."

Bael shoves his plate away. Horrible memories appear fresh in his mind.

"Cheh. Lost my damn appetite."

Part 065: CENTURION

The whirrs and clicks of machinery around us, while irritating at first, are easy enough to ignore once I tune them out. Hans' laboratory serves as the forefront of humanity's research and development, allowing us to improve and iterate on our technological progress, thus elevating our species by leaps and bounds. He's on a well-earned vacation today, allowing Phoebe and I to mess around with his newest creation.

Phoebe adjusts several leathery straps attached to the gizmo on her chest. "The exosuit's modulator needs some adjustments. It pushes against my breasts and hurts my ribs. A man could wear this comfortably, but women will need a differently-shaped model."

I take a step back and examine the new armor system. The device itself is simple in its design. It consists of a circular metal chassis, small enough to fit in my palm, with two leather straps sticking out of its sides. The straps are designed to wrap across the wearer's chest in an 'X' shape, then loop behind the wearer's shoulders, where they connect at the spine.

I call it the Transforming Replicant Exosuit, or T-REX for short. Phoebe thinks it's a silly nickname, but I can be very persuasive when the situation is urgent.

"It'll have to do, for now, Phoebe. Test the nano-assemblers to see if they work properly."

Phoebe presses the button on her T-REX three times. The device engages, and immediately, liquid metal begins pouring out of the chestpiece. It wraps around the straps fastening the T-REX to her body, then floods across her arms and down her legs. Moments later, the nanites harden into an ultra-light compound resembling Kevlar but more durable than steel.

The device finishes building her armor within six seconds. Phoebe flexes and spins around. I can't see her face behind the helmet covering her head, but I imagine she's grinning hugely. "Wow! I can barely even feel it. Hans is amazing."

"You helped him, didn't you?"

"Mhm. Still, Hans did most of the work. Even without the Crown, he's incredible."

"German engineering is impressive like that."

After a minute, Phoebe turns to face me directly. "Hit me."

"I beg your pardon?"

"Punch me. Right in the chest."

I raise an eyebrow. "Uhh, I'd rather not."

"Why not? Scared you'll break your fingers?"

"No. I'm worried I'll hurt you."

Phoebe waves her hand flippantly. "Jason, the point of this new armor is that it should allow us to fight on equal terms with demons. If one punch from a man can hurt me, the armor is useless."

I consider her point.

"Alright. Here goes. Brace yourself."

I rear back and pause for all of a second. Phoebe takes a wide stance and centers herself. Then, I punch as hard as I can.

CRACK!

I shatter every bone in my hand.

"Ahhhh! Fuck, shit, ass, bitch-tits! GRAAAHHH!!"

I double over and whimper like a baby for a few moments before quickly healing myself. I raise my head to look at Phoebe. She's unharmed.

"Are you okay, Jason?"

"Y-yeah. I'm fine. I healed the damage. Did that hurt you?"

"Nope. The armor has shock-absorbing technology. It can invert a certain amount of force applied to the nanites and expel an equal and opposite amount from the rear. Essentially, when you punched me, the kinetic energy passed through me and exited the rear of the suit."

"That was a lot of technical wording. I'm the one wearing the Crown right now, aren't I?"

"Haha! Ass!" Phoebe slugs my arm lightly, but the suit enhances her punch and turns it into a piledriver that sends me hurtling to the side.

I slam onto my other arm and yelp in surprise. "Gahh! Dammit, Phoebe! Warn me!"

Phoebe presses several invisible buttons in the air that only she can see, and the suit melts away. It retracts inside the shell after a few seconds. Phoebe smiles. "Sorry. I forget how it enhances my strength. I feel like a superhuman when I'm wearing it!"

I heal myself again and jump to my feet. "That's because you are a superhuman. You're like Supergirl or something."

"Who?"

"She's a character from a comic book."

Phoebe detaches the armor piece and hands it to me. "I see. Alright, now it's your turn."

"Really? Don't you need to calibrate it or something?"

"Nope. The T-REX is a one-size-fits-all armor. That's part of the appeal."

"Nice."

I stick my arms through the leather straps and adjust the circular piece across the center of my chest, while Phoebe clips the whole thing together behind me. I glance down at the conspicuous red button on the T-REX. "I'm supposed to push this three times to activate it, right?"

"Mhm. Safety feature. We wouldn't want people activating it by accident."

"Wouldn't that make them extra safe if they did?"

"Oh, you."

I shrug and push the button thrice with my thumb. A second passes. Suddenly a sensation like warm water pours over my body. The nanites rush across me, making me gasp involuntarily. The first two seconds are uncomfortable, but the last three are terrifying. Once the nanobots start crawling up my face and cover my mouth and nose, claustrophobia takes over. I stumble to my knees and gasp like a madman.

The moment passes. After the suit hardens into its metal form, the pure darkness in front of my face vanishes. The helmet turns transparent, allowing me to see a full 180 degrees in front of me. Based on what I saw when Phoebe used the armor, the helmet's outside looks like a solid metal plate, but on the inside, it's as if there's nothing there. I can't even tell I'm wearing a helmet.

A male voice, filled with power, speaks to me. His timbre is deep and gruff. "WELCOME, PILOT ZERO-ZERO-THREE. I AM CENTURION, YOUR ONBOARD NEOMECHANICAL ASSISTANT. STATE YOUR NAME."

"Jason Hiro."

"HELLO, JASON HIRO. I CAN DEBRIEF YOU ON THE ADVANCED FEATURES OF THE TRANSFORMING REPLICANT EXOSUIT. DO YOU WISH TO HEAR THEM?"

"No, not right now. Can Phoebe hear me?"

"PILOT ZERO-ZERO-TWO, PHOEBE BERTHOLD, CANNOT DETECT YOUR VOICE. I WILL ENABLE AUDIO TRANSPARENCY. ENABLED. OMNIDIRECTIONAL AUDIO COMMUNICATION NOW AVAILABLE."

Phoebe waves. "How is it, Jason? I can't see your face."

"It's cool as fuck! This suit is the dopest thing I've ever seen in my life. It's like a hundred different movies I used to watch."

As I speak, the suit begins drawing circles across various parts of Phoebe's body. Her heartbeat appears, along with a lie-detector algorithm and several other sensory readings.

I frown. One of the readings concerns me.

"Hey, Phoebe, the suit shows that your estrogen levels are 250% higher than normal. That doesn't seem-"

My voice catches. No way.

I stare at a bunch of other readings, and lower my head to look toward her stomach.

"Jason? What's wrong?"

My jaw drops. "I... I don't believe it. Ph-Phoebe! You're pregnant! Holy shit!"

"What? I am?!" Phoebe's eyes shoot open. She follows my gaze to her womb and pats herself repeatedly. "That's fantastic! Wow!! We're going to have a child!"

I look to the top right of the suit's visual indicators and spot a series of buttons. Reaching up, I tap on several of them and turn the suit off.

"CENTURION REVERTING TO OFFLINE MODE. GOODBYE, PILOT ZERO-ZERO-THREE."

The suit melts away, returning me to normal. The moment it disappears, I grab Phoebe and hug her hard. "I'm so happy, Phoebe! Wow! And it only took two nights!"

Phoebe turns beet red. "I was hoping we could spend more time as a couple before a baby showed up, but the Creator works in mysterious ways. Do you think it'll be a boy or a girl?"

I smile like an idiot. "I don't even care. If it's a boy, I'll make him a man. If it's a girl, she'll be as beautiful as you."

After a moment, Phoebe pulls away. Her smile lessens. "Jason, um, I have a question."

"What?"

"Well, our child. You have special powers. You're the Hero. Will the baby have powers too?"

"I don't believe he or she will. I'm not one hundred percent on how the Heroic Aura works, but I think I have to die before it transfers to someone else. That's what the Angels told me. They also said that when the angels went extinct, it eliminated the Heroic Aura's transference. That means I'm the last Hero, and will always be."

Phoebe wiggles her nose. "Well, you and Hope."

"Right, yeah. Him, too. I can always ask the angels for clarification if you like."

Phoebe smiles again. "Eh, whatever. It's wonderful news either way. Hey, speaking of Hope, why not tell him about the baby? We can also show Neil the prototype armor. He'll be glad to see how well it works."

I nod. "Good idea. I'm interested to see what Neil and Hope have been up to over the last few days."

Phoebe loops her arm through mine, and we walk toward the door. "What should we name our child? We should think of names for both boys and girls."

"I could use my Wordsmithing to find out the gender."

"Jason! Nooo! That spoils the fun!"

"I know, I know. I'm kidding. How about something like Timothy or Sarah?"

Phoebe cocks her head. "Too plain. Something involving nature would be better."

"What, like Treebeard?"

"Jason!"

"Nah, I took that one already."

Phoebe nestles her head against my shoulder. "Oh, you."

Two hours later, Phoebe and I drive into the Core, along with dozens of new blaster rifles in her truck's bed we replicated over the last few days. She waves at a few people standing nearby. "Special delivery! I bring gifts. New guns!"

The men nearby would usually smile at her, but today they don't. They simply nod. "Okay. Thanks, Phoebe."

Phoebe climbs out of her truck, as do I. "Mark? Henry? What's wrong?"

Henry keeps his expression solemn. "Sorry, Miss Berthold. Maybe you haven't heard yet. Neil and Hope went to liberate Maiura, but there were fifty thousand orcs and a Demon Lord waiting in the capital city, Meldora. We managed to capture the Lord, but he later escaped and killed over a hundred soldiers."

"Oh my god." Phoebe covers her mouth. "That's... that's horrible."

Mark, a young man only three older than Henry, scratches his scalp. "The demon killed Paimon, too. We're lucky the succubus showed up-"

"Paimon?" I interrupt him and storm around the side of the truck. "No, no, you're joking! Isn't he the demon I spoke to after that batch of Lords and their minions assaulted the Core a few months ago?"

Mark and Henry glance at each other. Henry shrugs. "Don't know, Mister Hiro, sir. I only met Paimon two days ago. Barely said five words to him."

"Shit." I look away into the distance, remembering my talk with the demon. It took over an hour to convince him that humans weren't the pathetic weaklings he thought we were. Now he's dead. What the hell?!

Phoebe pats Henry on the shoulder. "Thank you for letting me know. By the way, you mentioned a succubus...?"

"Mhm. Samantha, milady. The same demoness who healed us and saved the Core from Beelzebub."

Phoebe sighs audibly. "Oh, thank the Heavens. I was worried about her."

I speak a word to the wind. "Locate." My mind barely travels a few hundred feet past all the rows of servers to spot Hope staring at a row of bodies. His expression is grim.

I return to my body and grab Phoebe's hand. "Henry, Mark, thanks for the report. My fiance and I need to speak to the Commander and my clone. Excuse us."

"No problem, sir. Have a good day."

A few minutes later, Phoebe and I walk up to Hope. He and Neil stand and stare at the rows of bodies.

Neil shakes his head. "-a good job back there, Hope. Don't beat yourself up. As I said, some casualties are unavoidable."

Hope remains unconvinced about whatever the Commander's saying. "I could have done better. I did my best, but it wasn't good enough. I didn't-"

"Hope?" Phoebe's cautious voice makes my clone pause. He turns to look at her and I. "Oh. Phoebe, Jason. Haven't seen you two in a few days."

"Sorry," I say. "We've been busy. I, uh... I guess you were, too, huh?"

Neil jumps in before Hope can reply. "As I was telling your doppelganger, casualties are an expected part of the war effort. However, there's no need to worry. Hope managed to pacify fifty thousand orcs all by himself. Also, Phoebe, you were right about that demoness. She saved our skin, and mine specifically, a second time. I misjudged her."

Phoebe waves her hand. "It's no big deal, Neil. Don't worry about it. It's only natural you'd be worried about a Demon Emperor in our ranks."

Neil glances at Hope for a moment, then back to Phoebe. "About that. I spoke with Samantha after she saved us. She was happy to provide me with Intel regarding the state of demonkind. Jason, we've been dealt a favorable hand. You won't believe this, but the Third Emperor, Diablo, was defeated by Mephisto. Additionally, the Duke of Reptiles, Agares, died during the battle against the Black Witch. Their ranks are crippled, and the demons are undergoing a power struggle to determine the new noble class."

Phoebe shakes her head. "I don't understand. How is that favorable for us?"

"The demons won't attack the Core again until they repair their power structure," Hope replies. "They have a strict hierarchy, and they'll freeze their military operations until they solve it."

"Alright," I say. "Then you'll love what I'm going to show you today."

I point at the circular imprint underneath my shirt. Neil and Hope look at it and raise their eyebrows. "What's that?"

"It's the new armor system Phoebe and Hans developed. It should allow ordinary humans to go toe-to-toe with demons. Well, at the Lord rank and below. I don't know how it will fare against a Baron, but when facing lower-ranked demons, it'll put us on equal footing."

Neil purses his lips. "How unfortunate we didn't have it on our troops yesterday. We could have saved a hundred lives. Better late than never, I suppose. Care to demonstrate?"

"Sure. Give."

With a single word, I make the T-REX on my chest disappear and reappear atop Neil's uniform. The Commander takes a moment to notice the weight on his chest and gasps. "My god! That startled me!"

"Sorry. I figured it was faster. Press the button in the middle three times to activate the armor."

Hope raises an eyebrow. "What do you mean, 'to activate it'?"

"It's a nanite-based liquid metal compound. Think like Wolverine's Adamantium."

Hope nods. "Or like Colossus?"

"Hell yeah." I smile, glad that at least someone around here can understand my references. I never noticed before, but I'm starving for a fellow connoisseur of pop culture from my time. Does it count if the only person who gets my jokes and nods is my clone?

Oh, god. Sometimes I realize how lame I am and it hurts.

Hesitantly, Neil presses the button thrice. His eyes bolt open as the metal begins crawling across his body like a million angry bees. "W-what? What is this?! Ahh! It's all over me! It's going up my-!"

As it covers Neil's face, his voice cuts off. The Commander scrabbles at his face and claws furiously for a moment, before settling down. His body turns relaxed. A minute later, he speaks out loud. "Hello? Hello? Can you hear me?"

Hope nods. "Yup. Can't see your face, though. Jason, what's the point of a solid metal helmet?"

"It's like a one-way mirror on the inside, Hope. It transfers oxygen, purifies contaminants in the air, and has a screen that displays the entire world outside the helmet."

My clone crosses his arms. "Okay, sure, but it looks ugly as hell. He's wearing a tin can on his head. Can't you do something about the aesthetics?"

"We could," Phoebe says. "But look at it this way. The best method we have to keep demons at bay is to frighten them. When our faceless warriors start taking them down a peg, they'll start to associate us with fear. Demons respect power. If anything, the anonymous nature of the suit may allow us to recruit more demons and monsters who wish to live under us."

Neil turns away and holds his hand up, examining the top of it. "Incredible. I can zoom to the molecular level. This suit has many practical applications outside of combat. It'll help our surgeons too."

Phoebe holds up a hand. "Oh, about that. I couldn't bring it along, but Hans is developing a second prototype. It's a skin-patch that can detect when the user is under stress. The problem is, it's a single-use object, but it can heal most wounds, or at least stop the bleeding for a medic to help them. I'm looking into other practical applications for our battlefield medics as well."

Hope's jaw drops. "Wow, Phoebe. You're incredible. I remember when you could barely understand concepts from my time, and now you sound like a scientist who's spent her whole life researching!"

"I'm nobody remarkable," Phoebe says, blushing from his praise. "I had the Crown for a while, and it helped me learn and understand concepts quickly. Without it, I'd be lost."

Hope raises his eyes to Solomon's Crown on my head. "Err, speaking of which... Jason, I don't want to sound like a beggar or anything, but am I ever going to get to use it? I know I'm just a lowly clone, but-"

My face pales. "Don't say that, Hope. You're more than a clone. I look at you like a twin brother, you know? The problem is, I tried, but I couldn't copy the Crown. We only have this one. I want to let Phoebe and Hans use it where possible, and I need it to visualize infrastructure while Wordsmithing in Hero City."

A few moments pass. Hope lowers his eyes. "I understand. I'll make do without it, I suppose."

"I'm sorry. Look, if you want to borrow it sometime-"

Hope raises his palm. "No, I'm sure you'll do fine. I was just being greedy, that's all. It doesn't matter who has the Crown, as long as they use it for good, right? That's what matters."

"Yeah. E-exactly."

An awkward silence follows. Neil coughs. "Ahem, Jason, how do I get this suit off? I'd rather someone else have it than me. It should go to our best fighter."

"We're going to mass-produce the suit, Neil. Everyone, including you, will have one. But uh, if you want to remove it..."

I spend a few minutes explaining to the Commander how to press buttons inside the display, and while it takes him much longer than it did Phoebe or me, he eventually figures out the correct commands. Sometimes I forget how few people in the Core understand technology.

Phoebe nudges me. "Jason, now's a good time to tell them."

"Tell them?" I blank out for a moment. "Oh! Right!"

Neil unwraps the T-REX straps from around his body and hands it to Hope. "Tell us what?"

While Hope starts to coil the straps around his back, Phoebe smiles wide like the Euphrates River. "I'm pregnant! Jason and I are going to have a baby!"

Hope freezes. Anxiety appears on his face. He smiles, but I immediately sense his distress. "Y-you are? That's... that's good! Great! I'm glad for you!"

Phoebe's excitement lessens. "It's everything I've wanted. Hope, you're not mad, are you?"

My clone lowers his head. "Haah. I'm not mad. It's just... well, I don't know how to explain my feelings, here. I see Jason going around and doing things I used to do, but I can't be a part of those activities anymore. You and Jason love each other, but what about me? I still... I still have feelings for you, Phoebe."

Phoebe and I stare at my clone for several moments. Her happiness vanishes entirely. "I'm sorry, Hope. I didn't think about that. I should have been more considerate."

"Err, Phoebe..." I swallow, realizing how awful what I'm about to say will sound. "H-how about... why don't I clone you? Then Hope won't be alone. He's right. It isn't fair he had to give you up, but I didn't."

Hope raises his head. He meets Phoebe's gaze. Both of them speak to each other with only their eyes.

After a minute, Hope closes his eyes. "No. That isn't right. I know what was on your mind when you made me, Jason. You wanted another Wordsmith to help protect the Core. That's my job. I have to make sacrifices."

Phoebe presses her palms together and twists. "Nnn, I don't know how I'd feel about having another of me running around. Still, I can't be selfish. If you want to clone me, Hope, I'll understand."

Hope opens his eyes and smiles. "Really? You'd do that for me?"

I quickly interject. "Hold on. Won't Phoebe's clone be pregnant if we do it now?"

Immediately, Hope's smile vanishes. He looks at Neil. "Pregnant with Jason's child. That complicates things."

"Technically, we're more identical than twins," I reply. "It'll be your child too."

"I don't know how I feel about that. Never mind. Forget it." Hope waves his hand flippantly. "I'll get a new girlfriend eventually. Don't make any other clones if you don't have to."

I nod. "Okay. That's for the best."

After a moment, Neil and Hope politely laugh. The Commander asks, "If I may be so bold, when is the wedding?"

Phoebe smiles. "Next week. It'll be a private meeting. I'm only inviting our close friends. I was thinking we could get married out near Hero City's forest."

Hope chuckles. "Haha. Sounds fun. I'll attend. You'd better make me the best man, though."

"Of course," I reply. "Who else?"

The four of us share a laugh, and when Phoebe and I leave, she points at someone speaking to Kar. "Look, Jason! Samantha's here."

I glance back at Hope and Neil. They've already returned to examining the bodies.

"Let's say hi, Phoebe. I'm sure she'll be excited to hear the good news."

Part 066: Humanity's Potential

Beelzebub yanks the front door open, releasing a small amount of his frustration on its wooden frame. Unfortunately, the dark-skinned human woman on the other side didn't anticipate his actions. She gets yanked inward and crashes into the Duke of Inferno, knocks him over, and lands on top of him.

Rosalia jumps out of the way. "Oh my gosh! Are you alright, Mister Beelzebub?"

The woman shakes wooziness from her head and climbs off Beelzebub, then pats dust from her white dress. Her deep aquamarine eyes laser onto the Duke, and she snaps at him. "What sort of barbarian barges through a door without checking to see if there's someone on the other side? Did you need to pull it with such force?"

Beelzebub jumps to his feet. He barely registers the woman's poofy dress sleeves or the white bow in her hair. "Vermin. Mind your tongue. You're the one who was lollygagging and holding onto the handle like your life depended on it. Gah! Now my suit is filthy!"

The woman stares at him, her eyes widening every second. "I beg your pardon? I don't care if you're a demon or not, that's no way to speak to another person! Who are you? What's your name?"

Beelzebub smirks. "You damned sow. You're a thick one! Rosalia already said my name. You're speaking to none other than the new master of this estate! Show some respect, or I'll burn out your tongue."

Rosalia whips her head back and forth from Beelzebub to the human woman. Oh dear, this is escalating quickly. One minute we were touring the building to let Mister Beelzebub blow off some steam, and now he's thinking of torturing a woman. His mood changes on a dime!

"You're our new master?" The woman flips her long, pink hair back. "Humpf. I heard we were bringing in a tiny little Baron, but you're even more pathetic than I expected. You must be overcompensating for something with all that bottled up rage."

"Baron? I'm a Duke!" Beelzebub puffs up his chest, rises to his full height, and towers two feet over her. "You're speaking to Beelzebub, Duke of Inferno, and right now, I'm debating whether I should sear your bones to ash."

The woman rests her hands on her hips. "I'm sorry, did someone put poison in your milk this morning? You whine like a baby. Anyway, if you know what's good for you, you'll think twice about laying a hand on my beautiful skin."

Beelzebub sets his jaw. Two small flames ignite in each palm. "I'm the master here. As such, I can do whatever I please to slaves. A little pain might knock some humility into you."

The woman doesn't back down. "My father is Benjamin Brown, the head steward. I'm his second-born daughter. If you hurt me, let alone kill me, a thousand years of torment await you, foolish little demon."

Embers smolder in Beelzebub's eyes. "I've had quite enough of your insults. Words don't work on your type."

He raises his hand and aims his palm at the woman. She flinches slightly. "You wouldn't."

"Apologize," Beelzebub says. A tone of warning appears in his voice. "And make it count. I'm in quite a terrible mood right now. I want to see some groveling."

The fire begins to burn hotter in his hand. She takes a step back. "I'd... I'd sooner die. You're nothing to me."

"Oh? You'd prefer to die, hmm? That can be arranged."

Rosalia cries out in alarm. "Mister Beelzebub! Don't lose your temper!"

The Duke ignores Rosalia. An instant later, he sends a ball of fire at the woman. It flies past her head and slams onto the floor outside, shaking the door from the force of its explosion.

She stares at him in shock for a moment, but her adrenaline quickly wears off. "I-I knew you wouldn't do it. Even you have enough sense to fear my father."

"I hit my target," Beelzebub says with a smirk. "Say, what's that dreadful odor?"

The woman gasps. The stench of burning hair begins to fill the air. She drops into a crouch and swats at her hair quickly. "No, no! Stop! Put it out!!"

Rosalia ignores Beelzebub and steps toward the woman, quickly putting out her blazing hair. "Mister Beelzebub, you need to stop! Picking on some human woman isn't-"

"Shut up!" Beelzebub snarls. "I don't intend to kill her, but some humiliation will put this harlot in her place."

Beelzebub shoves Rosalia aside and grabs the woman by her hair. "Aaaiee! Let me go! What the hell is wrong with you?!"

Beelzebub licks his lips. "I'll start by burning all your clothes off. Then I'll put some marks on your face that makeup can't hide. After that, perhaps some permanent mutilation is in order. I hope you weren't planning to use your arms in the future."

Her eyes widen. "You're sick! Perverted!"

"BEELZEBUB!" A voice roars from across the room, making the Duke flinch. Beelzebub turns his head back and raises an eyebrow when he sees Benjamin Brown standing in the hallway. "Take your hands off Lily!"

Beelzebub doesn't release her. "Shut up, old man. Go back to your dinner. I'm done talking with the likes of you."

Benjamin looks at his daughter for only a moment. Then he returns his gaze to Beelzebub. "I'm tired of your piss-poor attitude, Duke of Inferno. The way Master Agares spoke of you, I expected an inexperienced demon who would light a path for others to follow. All I see now is some worthless punk who preys on the weak and defenseless."

Beelzebub smiles. He hurls Lily to the ground, bashing her head against the tiled floor in the process. "Perhaps I should pick on someone my own size, like you? Hahahaha."

Bael and Mephisto emerge from behind Benjamin. The big demon smacks his lips loudly and stuffs another chicken leg in his face. "Whoa, you gunna fight him, miffter Brown? You're a little old to be tusslin', ain'tcha?"

The bald man takes ten steps toward Beelzebub and stops twenty feet away. He cracks his neck. "It's good that I'm rusty. I wouldn't want to break this buffoon in half too quickly."

Beelzebub's grin widens. "Hahaha! Do you intend to fight me? I'm fine with that, little rat. You and the rest of the humans here seem to think you're the meanest part of the hellhound. How about I knock all of you down a few pegs?"

Ben reaches up and pulls his tuxedo top off, then flicks it to the side. He doesn't say a word.

Suddenly, Beelzebub goes flying to the side. He hits the wall with enough force to break his arm. Whatever hit him moved too fast for his eyes to follow.

Rosalia gasps. "Sweet devils!"

Beelzebub shakes delirious fog from his head. Something grabs him by the back of his suit's neck and flings him across the room opposite the entrance. While flying, he barely catches sight of Benjamin Brown's face. The Duke smashes into a statue of Agares and breaks several more bones, along with a chunk of the statue's base.

He breathes for a moment and heals his body before clambering to his feet. "What are you, an enhanced human?"

Bael chuckles. "Oh, this is gonna be good."

Beelzebub's eyes dart toward the blur of movement rushing at his face. He doesn't bother to dodge. Benjamin piledrives the Duke's head with enough force to shatter concrete, sending Beelzebub skidding across the floor.

"H-hit him, daddy!" Lily's voice echoes through the room. "Make that little shithead pay!" Ben's daughter howls excitedly and pumps her fist.

Rosalia takes a step back. "Hey. Watch your mouth, fleshbag. Mister Beelzebub might have acted poorly, but you're at fault too."

"Stuff it, fatso." Lily shoots a look of disdain at the demon girl. "It doesn't surprise me that you're hanging around with that sourpuss. A lardass like you is probably the best he could get."

"W-what?" Rosalia's face whitens. "Th-that's horrible. You're horrible! Beelzebub was right!"

Rosalia's eyes fly open. She jumps at Lily and starts hitting her. "Stupid bitch! You think you're so pretty, with your fancy clothes and hair! I'll tear your fucking eyes out!"

Lily and Rosalia launch into a catfight, with the human desperately fighting the demon off while the demon rips and tears at her clothes.

However, Beelzebub ignores them entirely. He yawns audibly after healing his body again. "Was that a punch? I didn't feel it at all. Got anything stronger?"

Ben rubs his fist. "Every time I hit you, it's like punching a sack of wet potatoes. I'm guessing you regenerate your body passively. Pain suppression, too."

"Good guess," Beelzebub quips. "I'm glad we're becoming such fast friends."

Benjamin presses his foot into the ground and leaps forward, moving with the speed of a cheetah. This time, Beelzebub dodges, and Ben's fist smashes through a wall and rattles dirt loose from the ceiling above. When he pulls back, he rubs his hand. "Are you getting serious, now?"

Beelzebub's eyes travel from Benjamin's face to his fist. His skin is chunked off, and something catches the Duke of Inferno's eye. "Your fist. It's made of metal?"

"I told you... I'm not like the other humans you've slain and tortured in the Labyrinth. You haven't any clue how scary humans can be, nor the heights we once reached. My metallic endoskeleton is a daily reminder of the lengths humanity will go in their quest for domination."

"Endoskeleton?" Beelzebub rubs his chin. "Explain."

"Nah. I let my fists do the talking."

Ben raises his hand to his eye. Beelzebub's stomach quivers as the human presses his eyeball and pulls his finger away. His iris shifts color to red, and a targeting laser emits, pointing directly at Beelzebub's chest.

"If you want to be the Master of this house, you'll have to beat me first, boy."

Beelzebub takes a step back and raises his right hand, then forms it into the shape of a gun. "Bang."

A bullet of fire shoots out and strikes Benjamin directly in the face. The man gasps involuntarily and staggers backward, but immediately rights himself. His skin melts away, revealing more metal on his skull beneath.

Bael shivers. "Oooh. There it is. 'Member the supersoldiers, Mephisto?"

The Duke of Mist titters to himself. "Keh keh keh. Vanguardsss. Not many humansss sssurvived the bionic attachment processs. Only Missster Brown could ssskip the rejection medicine."

Bael smiles, and a look of admiration appears in his eyes. "Maybe after he finishes with Beelzebub, Ben'll go a round with me."

"Perhapsss."

Beelzebub fires more heat bullets at Ben, but the cyborg ducks and dodges each one as his targeting sensors adapt to the Duke's firing patterns. He pivots left and right, then leaps at Beelzebub, batting away the demon's hand with a violent slap.

Ben stabs his hand forward and jams into Beelzebub's chest. He evaluates the Duke's body for all of two seconds, then tears the Duke's heart out and jumps away.

Beelzebub stumbles for a second, then flops to the ground. He doesn't say anything for a moment, but eventually picks himself up once his heart regenerates. "Great. Now there's a big, bloody hole in my suit."

The human stares at Beelzebub's heart in his hand. "I knew your regeneration was rapid, but that didn't take five seconds. I always thought Satan had the fastest time to full restoration, but you're well above his level."

"Thanks," Beelzebub replies. "By the way, I don't usually apologize, but I'm sorry."

Ben raises his head to scrutinize Beelzebub's face. "About what?"

A moment later, his attention jerks back to the heart as it begins to vibrate. Ben catches Beelzebub off-guard by flinging the beating organ at the Duke. It explodes in Beelzebub's face, blasts him backward, and knocks him on his ass.

"Interesting. Your cells ignited an endothermic reaction. It appears you can manipulate the weak nuclear force. No, the strong nuclear force. Both? Either way, your powers are quite varied. Fire manipulation, nuclear manipulation, and an incredible self-regeneration factor."

Beelzebub lays on the ground for several seconds before hopping to his feet. "Correct. Bael and Mephisto were forced to give up, even after they 'defeated' me. It's impossible to defeat my healing factor."

"Nothing is impossible. Demonic powers come from spiritual energy. The lower your energy, the weaker your powers, and the lower your regeneration. You're not as invincible as you think."

Ben changes his stance. He bends at the knees and aims his palm at Beelzebub. "I have a pretty good idea of your abilities, now."

"Going to put me in my place, are you?"

The old man doesn't reply. Instead, he lunges at Beelzebub and kicks his foot into the floor, sending chunks of tiling at the demon. Beelzebub doesn't flinch, but instead anticipates Ben's movement, dodging a grab at his neck a moment later.

"Your movements seemed fast at first," Beelzebub says, "but I can see through them."

"To see through my attacks, you would have to be enlightened. Sadly, you are ignorant... about a great many things."

Ben hops backward and takes a sword from a weapon rack against the wall, then readies himself to strike.

Beelzebub covers his mouth in a mock display of surprise. "Oh no. An antiquated weapon. Hack all you like. You haven't the stamina to beat me."

The cyborg jumps forward with incredible speed, and Beelzebub watches the sword, waiting for Ben to chop downward. Instead, Ben stabs it at the Duke's foot, making Beelzebub jerk his leg back. Before Beelzebub can regain his footing, Ben grabs the demon's neck and lifts him over his head, then slams him against the floor, shaking the chamber.

"Perhaps you're right, young one. I don't have as much vitality as I did in my youth, but you do."

Beelzebub tugs and pulls at the metal hand gripping his throat, but Ben's grip is like a vice. An unfamiliar sensation comes over the demon, as if he were breathing through his neck. An alarming amount of spiritual energy begins to suck through Benjamin's palm. A moment later, the old man's skin all across his body regenerates, covering his endoskeleton everywhere it's exposed.

"E-energy draining?" Beelzebub's eyes widen. He gags and struggles even more, but his strength begins to slip. "What... kind of... power... is this?"

"There's a reason that even Bael respects me, child. Vanguards were the mightiest infantry corps among humanity's legions, and I was the strongest among them. I'm uniquely suited to battling your kind. Remember when I warned you that your regeneration wasn't infallible? That's because it relies on your spiritual energy. Once I drain it from you, you'll be defenseless."

Beelzebub's mind begins to swim. Damn. I can't get him off me. I... I have to switch tactics!

He closes his eyes, and opens them a moment later. A light as bright as the sun shoots out, bounces around the chamber, and blinds everybody inside. Bael and Mephisto yell in pain. Rosalia screams as well. Then, while Ben is blinded, Beelzebub forms a solar-whip and-

"Ah ah ah," Ben says, interrupting Beelzebub's plan. He smiles, and Beelzebub realizes that Ben didn't even blink from his solar flash. Ben uses his free hand to grab and crush Beelzebub's wrist before he can create his whip. "My vision is augmented. Did you think you could blind me and attack while I was disoriented? Parlor tricks don't work on a Vanguard."

Terror appears in Beelzebub's heart. Boiling rage replaces it immediately afterward. "Stinking filthy RAT! You won't defeat me!"

Deep in Beelzebub's mind, he imagines all his new powers. One appears that he hasn't tested yet, but considering his predicament, now is the perfect moment.

Smoke form.

After forming two signs with his free hand, Beelzebub coughs, and all the oxygen in his body vanishes. Fire engulfs his skin, causing him to explode into smoke.

Ben topples forward, lands on his stomach, and stares in shock. "What the-?!"

Beelzebub pops into existence ten feet away. He gasps for breath and trembles shakily. "Kahaha... I... I hope you enjoyed the taste of my energy, insect. It's time I stopped fooling around."

Hopping to his feet, Ben smiles. "Full of surprises, aren't you? I didn't realize you were taking it easy on this poor old man. It's about time you gave me a challenge."

A hundred thoughts flash through Beelzebub's mind. "Your skin is little more than a fake covering for your outer shell, but you possess human body parts. A brain, for instance. The wonderful thing about the human body is that it melts quite deliciously under the power of fire."

Beelzebub smiles. "Barring that, I'll melt your metal carapace into slag."

Ben shakes his head. "You will try."

Beelzebub inhales, and his body warms a hundred degrees in a single second. Three more seconds pass. Fire surrounds him and envelops him in an infernal cloak. The heat in the room increases in intensity from mildly uncomfortable to painful.

Rosalia, having beaten Lily senseless, wipes her forehead and drags the woman out the door. "Go... get that son of a bitch... Mister Beelzebub."

Bael ignores the heat, given his imperviousness to fire, but Mephisto shrinks back and slinks into the dining room to avoid the heat. Benjamin also retreats a few steps. "Gods."

Beelzebub doesn't let up. As the flames spiral around his body and grow more and more intense, he paces toward Ben. "I thought you were unstoppable. What's the matter? Can't take the heat?"

The cyborg gasps as the flames break a thousand degrees. He activates an energy shield around his body, but it proves useless against the temperature and fizzles out. A popping sound in his body echoes off the walls.

Suddenly, Benjamin stumbles backward. He clutches his stomach and wheezes.

"M-my compensators..."

Beelzebub forms another solar whip. He raises it above his head and lunges it at the human. The tip lashes across Ben's chest and boils away his skin, making a hissing sound like a cobra in the process.

Ben doesn't wince or show any pain, but the next time Beelzebub lashes out the whip, he dives to the side and activates a cloaking device to turn invisible, then dashes away.

Crackling sounds indicate his presence, along with a shimmer of movement rushing through the heat. Beelzebub smiles. "Ah ah ah, don't try to flee through the door. I'm not done with you."

Beelzebub quickly shoots a heat bullet at the entrance, and when the bullet impacts, he fireports over, blocking the exit before Ben can leave. The cyborg's invisible body screeches to a halt. He retreats to try and get some distance from Beelzebub's fire cloak.

"F-fine! I'll admit defeat! You win!"

Ben turns visible once again. Already his skin is beginning to fizzle and bubble while the intense heat melts his insides to mush.

Beelzebub shakes his head. "No. I own this estate. I own you. I won't forgive your insolence. After I cut you apart, I'll turn your daughters and sons to ash, and your wives, and anyone else in my way. I am Beelzebub, the Duke of Inferno. My power is an explosion of rage, and you've infuriated me like no other."

Bael stomps across the hall. "Beelzebub! That's enough!" The massive demon steps in between Beelzebub and Ben, blocking some of the heat from affecting the cyborg. Ben shudders to a stop and slumps over on the ground as his internal compensators overheat.

The Duke of Inferno scowls at Bael. "Get out of my way. I'm through with having you lot tell me what to do."

Bael lifts his chin and peers down at his junior, who has grown to nearly his same height. "Benjamin is an honored guest. There's a treaty. If you wanna fight him, you'll have to go through me."

Beelzebub snerks. "I already proved you couldn't beat me, meathead."

"Yeah? Don't make me turn into a Balrog. You won't like me when I'm angry."

Beelzebub and Bael eye each other for several long seconds.

Finally, Beelzebub exhales. His flames die down, and the heat in the room lowers immediately.

"Very well. I've proven my point. You won't be around forever to protect this human. If Benjamin Brown insults me again, I can't promise his safety."

"Then I can't promise yours."

"Is that a threat?"

"Yup."

The two demons stare each other down for a few moments before the younger one pivots on his heel and heads out the door. "Make your bed with humans, if you please. Someday, I will be Emperor, and I will not forget those who mocked and scorned me."

He slams the door shut.

After Beelzebub leaves, Bael turns and kneels to Ben's level. "Hey, pal, you alive?"

A grinding noise inside Benjamin's body offers the only indication of his continuing life. The cyborg wheezes for breath and his thoughts turn to mush as he tries to understand Bael's question.

"Great. Here, take my energy. We'll get you all fixed up, okay? Sorry I didn't step in sooner. Thought you had 'im playing defense."

Bael lifts Benjamin's palm and places it on his neck, but it takes several seconds for the cyborg's systems to reboot enough that he can drain energy. Once he does, though, life springs back into his eyes. His internal organs repair themselves somewhat, and his biological tissue regenerates, but his metal parts whirr clunkily and click together.

Ben's breath comes in ragged gasps. "G-goddamn. Beelzebub is strong. Was he toying with me the whole time? I thought you said he was inexperienced."

"He is," Bael growls. "Kuh. Can't believe it. Never thought I'd see you go down in a one-on-one matchup, not even against an Emperor. Well, okay, maybe Satan, but that's different."

Benjamin lays motionless on the floor. "I need repairs. That damn Duke screwed up most of my internal systems. Cripes... I'll have to talk to Ose again."

"Uh huh." Bael cocks his head. "What did you say to piss her off?"

"I don't know. Something about the mutual culpability between humans and demons when it came to neverending war."

"Cull-puh-bill-uh-tee? The fuck is that?"

"Never mind." Ben pulls himself into a sitting position and rubs his chest. "I'm glad you saved me, Bael. I nearly died. I'm old as hell and rusty beyond belief. I haven't fought anyone since the end of the Energy Wars."

Bael waves his hand flippantly. "Psh, ain't nothin' to it. That pup's lucky he didn't fight you a hundred thousand years ago. You'd have torn him a new asshole! I'm gonna getcha back into fightin' shape; then you'll stomp him flat. It'll be just like the good old days!"

Ben shakes his head. "No, sorry, friend. I don't feel like fighting anymore. I want to return to tending my garden and keeping the estate clean. That's all."

Several moments pass. Bael lowers his head. "Oh."

Mephisto slinks over from the dining room's doorway. "I'm sssurprisssed you lossst, Missster Brown."

Neither Ben nor Bael reply. Both of them stare silently at the ground. Eventually, Ben speaks, but he ignores Mephisto's statement. "War is coming. If Beelzebub fights, that hothead will destroy everything we've built. I wish he understood the consequences of plunging the Labyrinth into war. He may have power over flames, but if he keeps his antics up, he'll be the one who's burned."

"The Overlordsss..."

Ben looks to his left at Mephisto. "Yeah. The Overlords."

Bael shakes his head. "They're busy with galaxy stuff. That's why I want your help, Ben. We've gotta get this Hero kid under control. If he catches the Overlord's attention..."

"You don't have to tell me twice." Ben says. He struggles to stand, and Bael helps him up. "I'll send a courier to fetch Ose. I hope she isn't too busy to help out little old me. Being the Third Emperor, and all."

Mephisto's eyes glow redder than usual. "If Ossse can't repair you, Marie might have the resssourcesss."

Ben shakes his head. "Pass. We haven't been on speaking terms for ages. Besides, you know Marie. She's probably the one who freed that Hero. Her schemes caused our breakup."

Bael sighs. "Maybe. Dunno. I haven't seen her in a long time."

"Same." Ben fans his face. "It's hot as hell in here. Let's air the Spire out."

"Sure."

When they step outside, Ben's eyes laser onto his unconscious daughter, whose dress was torn to shreds by Rosalia. Her face is black and blue from the demoness's barrage.

Ben stares at her for two seconds. He balls his hand into a fist. "Bastard."

Part 067: Brother, Tormentor - Barbatos Unleashed

Splash, splash.

"Oooh! Hahaha!"

I watch.

Two mermaids, Millie and Karen, splash water at each other.

They are simple creatures. Like me. No desire to fight. No will.

Is there a difference?

I do not know.

My eyes are heavy.

I am tired.

I've used too much mana over the last few months. I want to sleep. I need to.

But I cannot. She waits for me. She always watches.

"Barbatos! Are you okay, sweetie?" Millie, the ever-doting red-haired mermaid, floats over to me and rests her hand on my leg. "You haven't said a word in three days! Even for you, that's a bit extreme."

I swallow. My throat burns. I am always in pain. Anguish. Coarse, festering agony.

"Sorry, Millie. I am tired. I am trying to... stay awake."

"Oh." Millie's face becomes crestfallen. She beckons over to Karen. "Barbatos is tired. We have to keep him awake."

Karen is one of the youngest mermaids. She is scarcely three hundred years old. A child among her sisters. "What? Millie! Let Barbatos take a nap! Don't pester him!"

"No. Millie is right. I mustn't close my eyes. I need-"

A voice speaks inside of me. Her voice. Uriel. My tormentor. The Archangel who has besieged my mind and body for tens of thousands of years.

Oooh, feeling a little tired, are we? Why not lay thy head down for a minute, Barbatos? Think of how good thou shalt feel.

Her nagging voice, like a poorly tuned violin, grates at the back of my skull. I shouldn't have said anything. Now she knows what I am thinking.

"Quiet, Uriel. I won't close my eyes. Never again."

Another voice appears in my mind. My brother, Artorias.

Barbatos. Resist. I can only stave off this bloodsucking creature with your help.

"I know."

Karen cocks her head. "Who is Barbatos talking to?"

Millie answers. "The voices in his head."

"Huh?"

"He's not crazy. It's a long story."

Karen stares at her sister quizzically. "I don't understand. Are the 'voices' why he can't fall asleep?"

"Mhm." Millie looks into my eyes. It hurts to see how much she loves me. She remembers. All of the mermaids do. The Dukes as well, and the Emperors.

They remember.

They know what happens when I lose consciousness.

But I can't. Never again. I won't let Uriel take over.

Thou art such a child, Barbatos. Dost thee expect me to let ye sit and conserve thy energy? As weak as thou art now, I could take over for a moment. Want me to try? I'll crush thy precious little mermaids in an instant. I'll turn them into meat paste.

Her words, like venom, echo in my ears. The longer she talks, the more visible her appearance grows in my mind — a hauntingly beautiful Archangel in a blood-red dress. I can see her curves, her voluptuous body.

She is a siren — an agent of the enemy. Any physical attraction I might feel is nullified by the memories of her past atrocities.

Artorias speaks. Barbatos, hurry and lock yourself away. Bind your arms with as many chains as possible and tell the other Dukes to stand guard. If you fall unconscious around the mermaids, Uriel won't hesitate. She'll kill them all.

Uriel laughs. Hahaha, come now, Artorias. Listen to how thou dost play the doting older brother, even after all this time. Barbatos, if ye rest thy eyes for a moment, I solemnly promise I shan't hurt thy cute little mermaids. After all, 'tis not monsters, but demons I despise. I'm not indiscriminate, like the filthy bloodskins who murdered my people.

My eyes burn. I blink for a moment to moisten them. "Your promises are poison. You will say anything to take control. I won't succumb."

Several mermaids swim over as my voice echoes in the chamber. I don't usually speak this much. It burns. My body always aches. Talking does little more than fatigue me. And the more exhausted I become, the more powerful Uriel grows.

Uriel's long white hair grows visible in my mind. Her moccasin sandals. The six colored rings on her fingers, each one engraved with the initials of her brothers and sisters. Raphael. Michael. Gabriel. Uzziel. Camael. Samael.

The evil woman stretches her hand toward my mind's eye. It grows like a specter of death, dwarfing me with its size. Thou art exhausted, Barbatos. Do as thy brother says. Find a dark, secluded place, somewhere that I won't be able to cause any harm. Oh, that's right, such a location doesn't exist! Haha!

Uriel's light laughter burns my soul. I lower my eyes, unable to look at the mermaids surrounding me.

I am cursed. I deserve this curse. My greed, my desire to become the strongest demon, and my willingness to commit any act that empowered me... they are the reasons I suffer.

Artorias and I knew the rule. No demon shall consume the energy of an angel.

I thought myself invincible, so I ignored Satan's one binding rule.

I was wrong. I paid the price for my indiscretion.

Artorias appears more vividly in my mind. He has the same look that he always did — a slender, muscular Baron of above-average height. Dozens of bones, all taken from humans and angels, wrap around his arms, waist, and neck. His piercing eyes, the eyes of a military commander, gaze upon me with a look of anger.

During my youth, before we merged, I considered my brother a vicious, bloodthirsty killer. He fought Uriel on several occasions but barely escaped with his life. The other demons looked up to him, but not me. I disrespected him. I treated his counsel and guidance as if it was poison. In the end, my mistakes caught up with me.

My brother is a kind soul, one who willingly gave up his life to merge with me. He protected me during those early years. The time when the Archangel's Holy Energy ravaged my body. When the other demons could not bear to look at my deformed skin, or the scars, or any other part, Artorias was always there. He still is.

How many friends have died? How many enemies? I have lost count.

War brings no joy. It brings no victory. Only a slowly increasing trickle of death awaits those who walk the path of violence.

If only I knew as a young Lord, what I know now. If only I had the willpower to resist my bloodlust... perhaps my brother and I would still be together in the flesh. Perhaps I would not suffer under the twisting, burning, endless misery of Uriel's torment.

I hate her. I love her. I hate her more. She has taught me, without intending to, how worthless such notions of 'demon rank' and 'prestige' are.

My eyes droop.

No!

I must remain vigilant.

Before my eyes can shut again, I form a sign with my hands. My armor bends inward and impales my stomach. The awful pain brings me back.

Awake!

I mustn't close my eyes again. It's too dangerous.

Millie spots the blood trickling down my armor. "I'll get a rag, Barbatos."

I rasp out a reply. "Th-thank you, Millie."

Art thou capable of staying awake forever? Uriel asks. She leans toward me and looms even larger in my mind. It matters not if it takes thee one day or one thousand years. Thou shalt close thy eyes. And when ye do...

"I won't. I won't. I won't."

My eyes droop again. The blood loss is making me woozy. Have to... have to cauterize the wound. Fire. Need fire.

I stumble to my feet. My armor grinds together against my skin, sealing in my demonic energy and preventing me from losing too much power. I limp over to a single torch on the wall and pause.

If I remove my armor for a moment, in my current state, I might lose too much mana.

But... if I pass out from blood loss, that will have the same result.

Uriel snickers. Heh, look at the panic on your face. Why not ask every Duke and Emperor to stand guard? Then, when I come out, they can suppress me.

"No. That's... what you... want. You'll kill them- kill everyone. Like you did before."

My words choke out, along with blood. I stabbed the wrong area. Clumsy. There's internal hemorrhaging. Who can heal a wound like this? Not the Blood Pits. It will take too long to get there. Too much energy to open a portal. Belial? She can heal me. Where is she? I don't know.

Brother. Cauterize the wound. It's risky, but you'll have to try.

"Yes, Artorias. I know."

Wincing, I ready myself for the pain. As soon as I form the appropriate magic sign, my magnetism peels the armor away. I grab the torch and jam it against my stomach. Hard.

The pain is no worse than what I experience daily.

A rush of red energy floods out of my body. I close my armor to seal the remainder inside, but weakness hits my legs. My strength gives out, and I flop to the ground.

"Barbatos!!!" Millie leaps from the water and splashes over to me. She drags herself across the ground and stops by my head. "Ancient dragons, give me strength! What's wrong? Are you okay?!"

Millie's tears drip onto my face. I wheeze out words of warning. "Hurts. Hurts. Can't stay awake. Run. Get out. Uriel. She's... she's taking over."

Uriel's voice speaks again, louder than before. Yes. Good, Barbatos, good. Rest easy, knowing I'm in charge.

No! Barbatos! WAKE UP! Don't you dare give up! You're stronger than this! You're stronger than the Archangel!!

I wheeze in pain. "I'm... not... I'm too... too..."

Shut up, Artorias. It's not like thou understand the pain thy little brother feels. Besides, I promised I wouldn't hurt hurt his stupid little mermaids, and I'll keep my word. All I'm going to do is kill a few worthless bloodskins.

Heh heh heh... yes. I have many targets in mind. I wonder how much playtime I'll have? I can't wait to stretch my legs.

Moments pass.

My eyes begin to shut.

I can't take it anymore. I can't resist her power. I can't stay awake.

All I can do now is pray that the others will stop her.

"Millie... get... away..."

Darkness overwhelms me.

"Barbatos? Long time, no- GUHK!"

A flash of movement. The demon explodes and blasts across the walls.

Uriel smiles. "One down. Ten trillion to go."

The hallway where the lone demon was walking falls silent. Uriel listens for a moment but doesn't detect any other demons idling nearby.

Bits and pieces of metal crack and fall from Barbatos's armor, slamming onto the ground. Uriel glances down at the disgusting withered body of her captor. "What a shame that I must stay in such a loathsome form."

Inside her mind, Artorias rages. Accursed Archangel! Stop this madness! Don't you see? Barbatos is trying to live a life of peace! You shouldn't become the monster you once decried-

"Silence." Uriel waves her hand and trudges through the exploded remains of the demon she just killed. "I care little for what thy pathetic brother wants. If demons didn't wish to face my wrath, they shouldn't have slain all of my people. I am the last angel. Even if I am inside the body of a demon, I will kill every single bloodskin in my path."

Barbatos's heavy footsteps echo around the walls.

Whump. Whump. Whump.

Uriel moves her hands to create magical signs. "Dark Form."

Her aura becomes dimmer. The shadows call to her, and the walls become translucent, seemingly vanishing from existence. She looks in every direction and spots a large group of demons laughing about this and that while sloshing drinks around — a gambling den.

More pieces of armor fall off, exposing Barbatos's scarred and deformed body. Patches of white creep over his skin, replacing the demonic red with something holier. Something that demons in the current era haven't seen for tens of thousands of years.

"Oy, Boldor, pass me the bones, will ya!" A shrill voice rings out, and several other demons laugh about some crude joke.

Uriel approaches.

She rounds the corner and steps inside the cantina. Smog fills the air, and a disgusting mix of tobacco and a thousand other chemicals swirl before her nostrils. A demon at the entrance spots her arrival. He raises an eyebrow. "Uh, welcome to the pub. Haven't seen the likes of you around, stranger. What's your name?"

Uriel narrows her burning red eyes. "My name is unimportant. Do you happen to know where I can find Bael? I need to have a word with him."

The demon raises an eyebrow. His tiny horns indicate he isn't a Lord, but probably a grunt. "Ehh, Bael? Ain't seen him in my entire life. This place is a bit outta the way. Say... don't I know you from somewhere?"

Turning away from the demon, Uriel's expression turns nasty. "I ask the questions here. If thou hath no answers, thou art useless to me. Die."

Uriel swings her fist. The demon explodes violently, spattering blood and gore across the room. The roaring laughter and cacophony inside the gambling den instantly falls silent.

Everyone turns to look at the newcomer.

A demon yells in alarm. "W-what the devil?! Ganje?! Hey! Who do you think you are, marchin' in here and killing one of us?!"

Several demons whisper to each other.

"Hold on a second, ain't that fella Barbatos?"

"Yeah. I think he is. Didn't recognize him without the armor. What's going on? Did Ganje get on his bad side?"

Uriel cocks her head. "Someone tell me where I can find Bael."

A bigger demon in the back, one with much longer horns than the rest, stands up. Uriel evaluates him instantly.

A Baron.

"Barbatos? Something's off about you. Why do you need to see- HUWAK!" The demon yanks toward Uriel as she pulls the metal on his body with Barbatos's innate magnetic force. The Baron slams against her fist and slumps to the ground. He chokes weakly for a few seconds. "W-what the..."

"Tell me where Bael is, or die."

Every demon in the room jumps to their feet. Alarm bells ring in their heads. Something ain't right about Barbatos, their eyes say.

The Baron gasps for breath. "H-huh... he's... he's in... Hell Harbor. H-heard he went... went there to... show-"

"I don't care why; I only want to know where. Stupid bloodskins. Thy lips never stop moving."

Uriel flicks her finger. A thousand shards of metal tear from the walls and fly around the room, eviscerating everyone inside. The horrified screams of pain go silent a moment later. One hundred demons fall to pieces, transformed from flesh and bones into bloody puddles on the ground.

The Archangel inhales deeply. "Ahhh. Nothing better than the smell of dead bloodskins. I'll make every last one pay. There isn't a corner of the Labyrinth capable of hiding them."

She smiles wickedly. Her face contorts into a nightmarish expression of pure rage and exhilaration.

"FREE. I'm finally FREE! Hahaha... I won't lose like I did last time. Even if I do, I'm taking all of them with me."

Uriel motions with her hands, and a portal appears at one of the many connecting paths to Hell Harbor.

Artorias growls. They won't let you enter. You'll never make it to Hell Harbor, you damned butcher.

Her vile expression hardens. "Who's going to stop me? Diablo? Heh. He's down for the count. The only one who can beat me now is Bael. That's why I'll take him out first."

The Archangel steps through the portal and closes it behind her.

Silence fills the room. Not even a fly stirs.

Part 068: The White Wedding

I think my heart is going to leap out of my throat. It's beating so hard that if I don't soothe it, It'll jump into orbit.

My entire body shakes for a moment. I quickly Wordsmith under my breath, "Calm."

The jitters vanish. It's cheating, but I hate being in front of a crowd. So much for a small wedding. There must be five hundred people seated and another thousand standing past the chairs. I'm glad I chose an outdoor reception.

A kobold plays the wedding tune on the piano, just like how I taught him. He isn't a master at the piano, nor proficient by any means, but the ability of monsters to pick up and learn new skills within a few days is extraordinary. Several people in the front row, including Neil and Hans, smile at me and give me the thumbs up. The bride is on the way.

My unnatural calmness somehow makes me anxious. I used the same magic on myself that I used on Amelia. Is this what the Calm spell does? I feel like a robot — no emotion at all. I shouldn't feel like this during my wedding, for Christ's sake!

I glance to my right. On the other side of the altar, the number one bridesmaid, Samantha, stands while wearing a beautiful white dress. I'm glad to see her in clothing, for once. Somehow, she looks even more incredible than when she wears skimpy attire.

Due to the unique situation Phoebe and I find ourselves; since neither of us has any living family members, we decided to seat all the men on the right side of the aisle and all the women on the left. Seeing a sea of tuxedos and dresses mixed in with monsters and humans makes me want to chuckle.

To my right stands an altar, along with Kar's tiny, shrunken body perched atop it. The altar has an ornate design, crafted via the Crown's vast reserve of ancient designs. Gold, concrete, and an etching of a beautiful angel atop it all serve to give it a heavenly presence, as if the Creator himself has chosen to wed us today.

Kar and I are both getting married today. It's a double wedding special. The tiny little croco-sphinx adjusts his adorable tuxedo, which I custom made with Wordsmithing. "Turtle, you seem anxious."

"Aren't you?"

He nods. "Only a little. This is my second mating ceremony, after all."

"Ah, right. I pray you and I both have long, successful marriages this time around."

Guilt wells up in my stomach at Kar's words. His first mate died, along with his family. Based on how he and Blinker have been getting along, I think she's the perfect new match for him.

On the other hand, Kar's body weighs the same when he shrinks as when he's enlarged. How are he and Blinker going to...? Never mind. It's none of my business.

The kobold on the piano starts having a little too much fun. He jams out and bangs away at a song that is decidedly not the tune he was instructed to play. A bunch of men nearby laugh at his antics, so I ignore him. I'm not going to be the party-pooper, not today.

Overhead, snow begins to trickle down, but it stops atop Phoebe's environmental barrier. The whiteness of the sleet only serves to brighten the place up even more. Luckily, it's nice and warm inside the environmental shield.

Across the grass, a monster truck tears across the field. The sound, like a thousand angry lions, roars louder and louder as it approaches. Phoebe bounces over a dune, narrowly misses the tree cover to the side, and slams on the brakes, screeching to a stop. Several people in the audience laugh. I facepalm.

Typical Phoebe.

She throws the driver door open and leaps out, tearing her white dress slightly. A little six-inch tall figure flutters behind Phoebe and lands on her left shoulder. Hope, dressed in a tuxedo, exits the passenger side as well.

Phoebe starts to walk toward the crowd, but Hope intercepts her, grabs her hand, and pulls her aside to whisper something. She nods and says something back, but at this distance, I can't make out their words.

Her dress repairs as she walks, and I realize Hope must have fixed it. Good man.

The uneven grass and dirt causes Phoebe to lose her footing once or twice, but Hope holds her arm so that she doesn't fall. Once they make it to the concrete platform, she sighs in relief. Then she begins walking toward me.

Despite calming myself with Wordsmithing, my heart begins to beat again. Phoebe looks fucking gorgeous. I don't know what it is about women in white dresses, but it gets me excited like a kid in a candy shop.

...Maybe that isn't the best allegory.

Blinker, too, wears a tiny Barbie-sized wedding dress. She looks like a mini-Phoebe riding on the big one's shoulder, though her maroon locks stand out from Phoebe's white hair.

As Phoebe strolls down the aisle, she smiles sweetly at people and monsters to her right and left. One male Felaris lets out a wolf-whistle, only to immediately get conked over the head by his brother.

On the opposite side of the altar, our next-door neighbor, Ogie, plays the role of minister. I wasn't sure if it was a good idea making a salamander our clergyman, but Phoebe insisted. I won't refuse her requests.

It takes an agonizingly long time for Phoebe and Hope to reach the front. When she draws near, Hope pulls away from her and winks at me. "All yours, champ."

"Thank you, Hope. I'm glad you were the best man today."

"Psh. Shit, if not me, who?" Hope jokingly nudges my arm and steps to the side.

Phoebe smiles. I smile back. It feels as if I'm gazing into the sun.

I hardly believe I deserve a woman like her.

She starts to reach up and kiss me, but I push her lips away with a finger. "Uh-uh, Phoebe. We have to wait."

Phoebe blushes. "Oh. Um. Sorry. I forgot."

Blinker flies off Phoebe's shoulder and lands in front of Kar. "Oooh! We're finally gonna tie the knot! Exciting!"

Seeing her and him together, I want to laugh at their two-inch height difference. Blinker stands taller than her husband, but only when he shrinks down.

Kar grunts. "Hurgh. You are a rose in full bloom. I am honored to call you my mate."

Phoebe and I move to stand before the altar.

Ogie clears his throat. He stares at Phoebe and me expectantly.

Several moments pass.

The salamander suddenly reddens. "Oh, cripes- I forgot. I'm the one who's 'sposed ta' say something. Err... what were the words again?"

I cough into my fist. "Ah ahem, dearly beloved..."

The salamander nods excitedly. "Oh, I remember now! That's right. Dearly beloved... we break bread here today in remembrance of our savior-"

Blinker stares up at the salamander. "Ogie... that's not right at all! What the heck!"

The salamander stutters and stammers. "O-of course it isn't! I was, ehhh, testing you! Yeah! I wanted ta' make sure you remembered... hehe..."

I groan. We should have had Neil do the ceremony.

Phoebe snorts. "Ogie, don't you remember the rehearsal?"

Several audience members begin to laugh. The salamander scratches his head. "Uhm, of course! AHEM. Dearly beloved... we gather here today ta' tie these four together in the eternal bondage of matrimony... ta'... never look at another with lust... until they die..."

Ogie's wife, Jeera, fumes from the audience. "That dummy," I hear her whisper to someone else. "I bet he's drunk again."

"And, ahh... together these four, Kar, Blinker, Jason Hippo, and Phoebe Berthold shall-"

"It's Hiro," I whisper, correcting him again.

He ignores me. "-shall bring themselves together for all eternity, swearing never ta' look at another person ever again, no matter how good-looking or beautiful."

"You said that already," I grumble under my breath.

"And uhhh..." Ogie trails off. He stares at Phoebe and me for several long, painful seconds. "Uhh... now you kiss."

"Huh?" I blink in surprise. "You skipped over almost everything. What about the vows?"

"Yeah, whatever. That's all a bunch of crap anyway." The salamander waves his hand flippantly and yawns. "Just kiss so we can get to the cake."

By now, several audience members are about to split their guts open from holding in laughter. I sigh. "Oh well. This wedding wasn't going to be orthodox anyway."

Phoebe grins so hard her face turns beet-red. "Whatever! Ogie's right. Kiss me!"

She tugs me down to her level. I lean over and bend my knee slightly, then wrap my arms around her.

Our lips press together, as they have every night for the last week. The knowledge that she has my child, and that soon I'll be a father fills me with a joy I can't put into words.

Phoebe is my wife now. We'll be together forever.

Kar and Blinker pull each other in for an embrace, and she giggles loudly. "Oh, you! You're not supposed to kiss THERE!"

Kar leans back. "Hurgh. Apologies. Couldn't control myself."

The crowd applauds loudly, and several people laugh like hyenas. Hope pats my back. "You did it, Jason."

I smile at him. "Nah. We did it. I'll get you a girl next."

"Thanks, but that isn't necessary." Hope's smile slips ever so slightly. "I'm already working on it. You worry about yourself, okay?"

"Sure. Good for you, man."

His smile returns in full force. "Hell yeah."

Kar, Blinker, Phoebe, and I turn to wave politely at the crowd. Everyone stands up and claps even more enthusiastically. Their thunderous applause makes me feel like someone who won the Nobel Peace Prize. Hell, I'd take Phoebe over something like that any day of the week. She's irreplaceable.

A while later, Phoebe holds the knife over our massive four-tiered wedding cake. I considered wordsmithing one, but she insisted on baking it herself. It took three days to make each section, but Phoebe pulled through. She always does.

I salivate like a dog at the sight of her cake. It has white icing on top, and a delicious strawberry sauce in the middle, along with various berries and fruits atop of the glaze. Phoebe insisted the cake should be at least somewhat healthy for the children, and it still came out delicious. I suppose that's proof healthy food doesn't have to taste bland.

Blinker and Kar both sit on the table together, with her in his lap. A strawberry sits beside them, and they take turns cutting off tiny slivers and feeding each other. It's adorable.

Several elderly humans and monsters line up first, followed by children and the rest of the adults. Phoebe cuts one piece after another and hands them to the next in line.

Samantha walks over to me.

"Hey, Jason."

I turn to smile at her. "Hm?"

She blushes. "Thank you."

"You're welcome. I don't know why you're thanking me, though."

The succubus pulls on her long, black hair. "I told you Satan died, right? It's been... it killed me inside. I'm barely getting by."

Only now do I remember what she told me when Phoebe and I ran into her. Ever since the battle against Amelia, Samantha has suffered immensely.

"I'm sorry."

"Don't be. I'm thanking you. After all, you've made Phoebe happy. That means a lot to me. I'm glad she's smiling. I almost feel as if she's experiencing double the happiness to replace what I've lost."

The succubus folds her hands together and looks at the ground.

"I... I love Phoebe."

Her statement catches me off-guard. "What?"

"I love her. It took me a while to understand. Maybe it's a passing feeling. Fleeting like the wind. I don't know."

I glance at Phoebe, thirty feet away. She hasn't noticed Samantha speaking to me. I don't think there's a jealous bone in her body. She doesn't even care that a succubus is talking to her husband. That's some pretty deep trust.

"I, uh... that's fine, Samantha. I don't blame you for having feelings for my wife."

Samantha wipes her eye. "I love her, Jason. Physically, emotionally. But... she's married to you now. I'm glad for her, I am. But... I... I don't know what to do about my feelings."

"I'm not good with emotional stuff either," I reply. "I don't know what to say. I'm sorry?"

Samantha shakes her head. "No. You don't need to apologize. I can't help the way I feel. That's life."

I fiddle with my jacket's cuffs absent-mindedly. "I'll, uh, talk to Phoebe for you, alright?"

"Thank you," Samantha says, rubbing her shoulders. Her words hold a note of finality, but she doesn't walk away.

I raise an eyebrow. "Is there something else?"

Samantha doesn't meet my gaze. "You killed Amelia. Right?"

"Yes. No. Sort of. It's hard to explain."

"Hoarhiim took over your body, but it was you who killed her."

The line of questioning makes my stomach churn. "Fine, yes. Why?"

Samantha raises her eyes to meet mine. "Satan died because he was the Black Witch's soulbound slave. When you killed her, you killed my husband."

My voice trembles. "O-oh."

"I don't blame you. I couldn't. It isn't like you killed Satan intentionally." Samantha sticks her chin out. "But, at the same time, I also know you blew away my husband several times with Holy Energy. Jason, are you an enemy to demonkind?"

I shake my head. "No. I'm not looking to cause war. I'm trying to bring about peace. I was only defending myself."

"That's what I thought." Samantha smiles slightly, as if confirming a suspicion inside herself. "Your ability... Wordsmithing. I've watched men go mad with power, time and time again. I want Phoebe to be in good hands. You won't turn evil, will you?"

"I hope not, haha."

"Well, nobody can see the future, but I'll take your word for it. Jason... you and Phoebe deserve happiness. As long as you're together-"

Suddenly, someone yells out in surprise, cutting Samantha off. I jerk my head in the direction of the altar. A demon dressed in black robes, flanked by two others, steps through a portal at the altar's base. With his face partially obscured by a hood, all I can see is a flash of a white beard. The demon sweeps his eyes across the crowd and locks onto Samantha. Several men jump away, and from somewhere unseen, Kar leaps into the aisle before them, tearing apart his suit as he enlarges.

The Sphinx towers over the newcomers. "Demons! How did you get inside?"

The lead demon, who, judging by the size of his horns is a Baron, pauses for only a moment. "I'm not here to fight. I need to speak to the Second Emperor, Belial."

Kar's jaw hangs open for a moment. He starts to raise a balled-up fist, but Samantha calls out, "Wait!"

By now, everyone has turned to look at the intruder. Hope slides up next to me as Samantha walks over to them. "What's going on?"

"I don't know. Demons. They want to talk to Samantha."

The entire pavilion goes silent. Samantha approaches the Baron and crosses her arms. "What do you want, Orias?"

Orias glances around, and his eyes lock on to me. He grabs Samantha's arm and pulls her close to whisper something. Before he can speak, I mutter under my breath, "Hearing."

"Lady Belial. The catastrophe has returned. Barbatos has gone berserk! We're summoning all of the Dukes and Emperors to stop him."

Samantha frowns. She matches his volume. "Barbatos? That can only mean Uriel has awoken again."

He nods. "It is as you say. Uriel has already torn apart thousands of demons. She's unstoppable. We've sustained heavy losses. It took us over thirty hours to track you down."

Samantha licks her lips. She doesn't reply for a few moments. "You know my policy. I don't involve myself in demon matters."

Orias's whispered voice takes on a sense of urgency. "Please. My lady! We can't win without everyone's help."

A minute of silence passes. Samantha mulls over his request in her mind. Finally, she sighs. "Damn. Diablo's in a coma. He can't fight like he did last time. I doubt I'll be of much use, but we have to stop Uriel. Fine. I'll go."

"Thank you, thank you so much." The demon bows solemnly. "I'll do anything I can to help."

I undo my Wordsmithing and look at Hope. "There's a-"

He raises a hand. "I know. I read their minds. You stay here. I'll go and help."

I frown. Hope can read minds? Since when? "No, I'll help. You stay here and-"

Hope starts to take a step toward Samantha, but stops. "Jason, this is your wedding day. I'll go. Also... Uriel. Doesn't that name sound familiar to you?"

I meet his gaze for three seconds. "Isn't... isn't that the name of an Archangel?"

"Exactly. My curiosity is piqued. Where's that new armor you made? Time for a field test."

I glance at Hope's tuxedo and shrug. "No time like the present, huh? Summon."

A circular device with two leather straps appears in midair. Hope snatches it before it hits the ground. "I'll be in touch. Stay on the alert."

He dashes toward Samantha without waiting for my reply. When he gets close, he yells, "I'm going with you!"

The color drains from the Baron's face. "No, human. This matter is demon business."

"You came to Tarus II — humanity's stronghold. Your business is my business now. Wear." Hope finishes with a single word, causing the T-REX to wrap around his body.

The Baron stares at Hope in disbelief, but Belial beckons at my clone. "Come along. Frankly, we'll need all the help we can get." She looks at the Baron. "Orias, I don't want to hear any complaints. Jason is my friend. He's coming along."

Hope rubs his head. "Uh. I'm Hope."

Samantha blinks. "Oh, sorry."

"Happens all the time."

The four demons and Hope trudge toward the portal and step through, leaving without another word. After it closes behind them, Phoebe walks over to me. "What's going on, Jason?"

"I don't know, exactly, but Hope is on the case. There's no need to worry."

Silently, I rub the Archangel rings on my fingers.

Uriel? Why would an Archangel be alive? Why show up now, of all times? And what was that about Barbatos?

Something is rotten in the Labyrinth. I don't like it — not one bit.

Beelzebub lounges in a chair suspended between two trees. He picks his teeth clean and frowns. Once again, his flames begin to burn through his suit.

"Bloody hell."

The beautiful gardens surrounding the Slithering Spire teem with magic and wonder. In the distance, two girls and two boys play, swinging sticks like swords at each other. A bird chirps nearby, and the sun warms the planet to the perfect temperature.

Beelzebub glances over at Rosalia. She sits on the ground and picks petals from a flower. "He loves me; he loves me not. He loves me; he loves me not."

Beelzebub leans his head back. "Seven Hells. It's dull as a rock here. Rosalia, fetch me some wine."

"Eeeeh!" Rosalia shrieks, making Beelzebub jump. "I can't believe it!"

"What? What?!" Beelzebub sits up and stares at her. "What's the matter?"

She holds up the flower. "Waaa!!! It says you love me not! How can life be so cruel?!"

Beelzebub narrows his gaze. "I'm beginning to suspect you lack in intelligence. Now fetch my wine."

Tears flow from her eyes. "B-but, how can this be? I thought you loved me! I thought the flowers were always right!!"

"They are. I don't."

"UWAAAA!!!" She leaps to her feet and dashes away, only to trip over a tree root and slam onto her face. "...Oww."

Beelzebub lays back in the chair. "I wonder if demons can die of second-hand embarrassment."

Rosalia sniffles and leaves to fetch Beelzebub his wine.

A minute passes. Two. Three.

The Duke of Inferno yawns. "No, it isn't simply boring, here. It's dreadfully boring. All those years I spent hoping to leave the Labyrinth, and I don't have any beautiful servants yet. Only an ogre and a bunch of disgusting humans."

"Disgusting?" A female voice speaks up. He recognizes it immediately as Lily's voice.

Beelzebub cranes his neck back to stare at Benjamin's daughter. The young woman wears another white dress identical to the one Rosalia tore up before. This time, she keeps her distance. Her battered face still hasn't healed from Rosalia's vicious attack. Bruises line her eyes and cheeks, giving her the appearance of an abused spouse.

"Yes. Disgusting. Are you here to agree, or would you prefer a repeat of last time?"

Lily shrinks away. "N-no. I came to... to um... apologize. I said a lot of nasty things. Daddy taught me the error of my ways."

Beelzebub snorts. "About time. Took you four days, but better late than never."

Lily blushes madly. "You ass! You're supposed to apologize too! You yanked that door so hard that you almost broke my arm!"

"I don't apologize to insects. Maybe your arm shouldn't belong to a frail, pathetic body."

"Rrrrgh!!!" Lily snarls. "I came all this way to atone, and you haven't the decency to hold your tongue for even a minute?! You infuriate me!"

"Poor thing," Beelzebub drawls. "Are you done? Can't I enjoy some peace?"

Lily simmers down. She stares at the demon for half a minute, then crosses her arms. "I want to know something."

"Ugh."

She breathes deeply. "You beat Daddy in a fight. No demon has ever done that. How did you?"

Beelzebub rolls his eyes. "Flesh burns. Metal melts. Fire is a powerful weapon in the hands of someone adept in its use."

"I see. Have you been in many fights before?"

"Thousands. The life of a demon depends on fighting prowess." Beelzebub smiles at the change of topic. Finally, we're talking about me.

"Daddy beat Bael in a fight. He beat Mephisto, too."

"That's nice."

"He and Diablo fought to a standstill."

"Good for him."

The girl raps her fingers against her crossed arms. "Why are you here, Beelzebub?"

The demon doesn't lean back to look at her. "I don't follow."

"Here. The Slithering Spire. You've sat around doing nothing for four days. Don't you have any goals? Anything to work toward?"

Beelzebub shrugs. "My ultimate goal is to become the First Emperor. A few days of relaxation won't make a difference in that regard. Besides, Bael and Mephisto aren't doing anything either."

The woman slowly walks forward until she's standing in front of the demon, but also keeps her distance. "Why do you want to be an Emperor?"

"None of your business."

"I know. I figured you might tell me anyway."

Beelzebub opens his mouth to respond, then closes it. After a moment, he replies. "I want power. I love the Labyrinth, but I hate it, too."

"What do you mean?"

Beelzebub picks his teeth some more. "I'm a talented demon. Lucky, too. Mostly talented. I studied hard, fought with all my strength, and crushed all who stood in my way. Because of that, I'm now a Duke. Still, I'm not a fool. I see the Labyrinth for what it is."

Lily cautiously sits on the ground. "Yeah? What's that?"

"A rat race. Demons suffer and beat one another. We tear each other apart to gain power... but we have no use for our strength."

Beelzebub's voice quivers. "Recently... something happened to me. It changed me. The more I reflect on it, the more I realize its significance. I lost. A human beat me."

Lily rubs her soft, rose-colored lips. "A human? Daddy?"

"No. Not your father. The human I fought is the one who caused all the uproar lately; the Wordsmith. I encountered him unexpectedly, and he crushed me flat. I always expected to lose against a demon of higher rank, but never a damned fleshbag. The Hero, Jason, warmed my insides up and set a burning passion inside of me. He gave me a different purpose."

The girl recoils. "Err, are you in love with him or something?"

"No, you buffoon. That's not what I mean. Jason made me fight for my life. I lost, but he spared me. My goal is no longer to become Emperor simply because I can, but so I can rebuild the Labyrinth."

"Wow. What will you do if you succeed?"

Beelzebub smirks. "Demons seek power for no reason. I'll give us a purpose, and an enemy worth fighting."

Lily's interest drains away. "Whoa, whoa. No. Beelzebub, you can't do that. If humans and demons fight each other on equal footing, billions will die. That's what Daddy says."

"So?" Beelzebub pulls himself into a sitting position. "What's wrong with that? Humans will die eventually. Demons have no purpose without war. I only wish to restore the natural balance of things. Would you prefer that my people and yours rot away and die after living useless existences?"

A moment passes. Lily looks away. "I... I don't know. I wasn't alive for the Energy Wars. Sometimes, I catch Daddy staring into the mirror. He doesn't move. It's as if he's watching a painful memory he can't forget. I don't want people to suffer as he does."

Beelzebub rubs his hands together. He stares at the woman sitting on the ground. Her white dress and dark skin contrast together, drawing his eyes along the seams everywhere both meet.

"You're naive, as expected of an insect. Demons already suffer, as do humans. Humans murder each other in droves, whether we interfere or not. I only suggest that demons and humans meet each other on equal terms. Let's acknowledge who we are and accept our animal instincts."

Lily furrows her brow. "I don't understand. Do you want to see demons die? I can understand you wanting humans to die, but not others of your species."

"Lily, you're a pampered little brat. You haven't a clue what living as an imp for two-thousand years makes you endure. It's horrible. Demons take forever to evolve, these days. There aren't enough human souls to go around. If anything, culling our numbers will allow for a greater percentage of demons to possess smarter, stronger bodies. It would be a blessing not to have to compete with trillions of others for a limited supply of promotions. I even think-"

Beelzebub pauses. He glances past the woman toward the path leading up to the Slithering Spire. A single kobold dashes frantically toward the estate, panic etched into his face. He stumbles slightly but catches himself and continues running.

Lily follows Beelzebub's gaze. "Hm? He seems to be in a rush."

"Indeed. Judging by that fellow's ragged breathing, he's run for tens of miles without stopping. Kobolds are known for their incredible stamina, so it's unusual to see one out of breath."

Beelzebub's eyes flick to two lit torches on the front porch. He fire-ports over to them and materializes at the bottom of the steps. The kobold spots him and screeches to a halt. He wheezes and gasps, clutching his stomach. "Bay- Bayyy- Bael! BAEL! Where is Bael? We need him! It's an emergency!"

"Bael is inside, sleeping, most likely. What's the problem?"

The kobold glances up at Beelzebub's horns. "Yuh- you're a Duke, too?"

"Yes."

"Oh, thank the seven Hells! Aw, geez, it's awful! Barbatos is flippin' out! He tore through the Slaughterseum and killed over two-hundred thousand demons and slaves! You hafta meet up with the other Dukes and Emperors. He's trying to enter Hell Harbor!"

Beelzebub narrows his eyes. "Barbatos? That doesn't sound right. He's a scary-looking one, but Agares told me the Duke of Steel was nonviolent."

"Yeah? Well, I got news for ya, pal. YOU'RE WRONG. I barely escaped with my neck intact! He's killing demons faster than we can send 'em! That son of a broodmother is a demon-killing machine!"

Beelzebub nods. "Very well. Bael is inside, as is Mephisto. I'll go on ahead. One of the servants will show you to their quarters."

The kobold nods vigorously. "Thank you so much!"

The kobold turns and heads inside, barely managing to stumble up the stairs to the Spire's entrance.

Beelzebub inhales and aims toward the sky. Fire ignites beneath his feet. As he takes off, he hears Rosalia's voice.

"Mister Beelzebub?"

He ignores her. Finally, something to alleviate my boredom.

A smile stretches across his face. "Barbatos, hm? I wonder how much of a challenge he'll give me."

As Beelzebub flies away, Rosalia stares up at him longingly. "Aw, rats. What the heck? I brought his wine and everything."

She sighs. "Oh well. Guess it's mine now."

Part 069: D'Archangel

Recommended Listening

The Labyrinth junction reveals a path ahead, as well as to the left and right, forming a plus shape. I sense the bloodskins. I smell their fear, their terror. They lurk at the edges of both hallways, ready to strike. Two Barons stand alongside dozens of grunts, one on each side. I know not their identities.

Nor do I care.

My armored feet, those belonging to Barbatos, shake the ground as I walk. I'm mostly naked, now. Only boots, gauntlets, and a helmet cover my body. Shame? I feel none. This disgusting form is merely a vessel I borrow to exact my revenge — my punishment on those who slew my brothers and sisters.

All bloodskins must die. I will force them to grovel and weep in the moments before I snuff their lives out forever.

I approach the junction. Fifty feet. Forty. Thirty.

One hundred and sixty-four demons burst from their hiding places and charge at me; bloodlust etched onto their faces.

"KILL THE ARCHANGEL! SLAY URIEL!" One of the Barons, a male, bellows triumphantly. His moment of glory is soon to come. He knows he cannot fail.

The other Baron, a female, is not so sure. "Uriel is powerful! Dodge anything she throws at you!"

"Fools," I whisper. "My advance cannot be halted. I am inevitable."

Raising a hand, I summon a wall of Holy Light, sealing off the path before me, just as I did in the Ancient Era when the demons assaulted Heaven's Gate. Both Barons slam against the barrier, followed immediately by several dozen scythers and shadow-walkers. The demons stagger backward and stare at my divine shield in disbelief.

The confusion on the bloodskin's faces would make me laugh if I weren't already furious. My rage is not a simple matter of emotion, nor is it about the loss my people and I have suffered.

I hate demonkind, but I hate myself more. Weak. Useless. I made a mistake, one which ended my life. I can never redeem myself, nor can I bring back my brothers and sisters.

All I can do is bring holy vengeance upon those who wronged us. I have no other reason to live.

That is why I have assumed the title: Archangel of Retribution.

The Barons quickly form hand signs, likely in an attempt to nullify my barrier. Perhaps if they focused their minds for a thousand years, they might manage such a feat. Sadly, only seconds remain.

I raise my other hand. A second wall of light forms behind the contingent of bloodskins, sealing off their escape. Their confusion turns to panic. They swivel on their heels and press against my barriers, but such weak strength will not save them.

"Uriel! You bastard! I haven't forgotten what you did!" The female Baron turns to glower at me. Her eyes burn like embers of flame, scorching the innermost parts of her soul.

"Have we met?"

"No. But I remember you. I was only an imp when you last struck. You killed over ten thousand-"

"I don't care," I reply, cutting her off. "Thy words serve only to slow me down. Perish with the rest of thy kind."

Slowly, I pull my left hand back. The second wall of light behind the attackers begins to press against the first, crushing the demons within. The Baron's eyes widen as she realizes my goal. Immediately, she forms hand signs, teleports through my barrier, and jumps at me, raising two knives to strike.

"Filthy Angel! One thousand years of suffering!!"

A smile caresses my face. One thousand? That's all? If only thou understood.

I tilt my head. Her knives yank to the side. The bloodskin yelps in surprise and slams against the wall. I nod, causing the knives to jump out of her hands and follow my eyes. They float above her for only a moment before plunging down, impaling her into the floor.

"Aaaaiiiee!!!" She squirms and tries to pull away, but her efforts only cause more blood to spill from her wounds.

To amuse myself while I crush her allies, I wiggle the knives back and forth, widening the holes in her heart and stomach. Her movements grow more sluggish. She claws at the ground, trying desperately to free herself. Eventually, the fire in her eyes cools.

The Baron slumps over, dead. Her allies scream in agony as my walls compress them together. They implode from the inside out and melt together into a mass of blood and bone.

Satisfied, I release my barriers. The river of gore splatters across the floor and rushes around my boots.

The smell of bloodskins somehow soothes me. They stink of unwashed dogs, yet knowing that another hundred and sixty-four have died gives me comfort.

A tingling in the back of my mind makes me groan.

You damned monster — servant of the enemy. You could have spared them. I know angels are no better than demons, but I wish you would prove me wrong. Cease the cycle of violence. Barbatos has shirked a life of endless murder, so why can't-

"Silence, Artorias. Thy feeble attempts to dissuade me shall prove useless, as always." A throaty chuckle escapes my mouth. "Hehehe... Thy brother made several mistakes, but going without sleep for forty thousand years was by far the biggest. He weakened himself more and more as time went on. He won't wake up in a few hours, as he did before. This time, I am fully in control."

You underestimate Barbatos's resolve.

Splash. Splash. I stomp through the lake of blood and continue walking down the hallway. "Resolve won't be enough. Not this time."

I pass the junction and continue walking. One mile. Two miles. Three.

Being able to draw upon Barbatos and Artorias's energy reserves in addition to mine is a stroke of luck, but at my current speed, it will take me a thousand years to slay all the bloodskins.

I raise my hand again to form magical signs. Summon. Summon.

Two angels birthed of Holy Energy appear at my side. The faceless creatures stare ahead blankly and await my orders.

"Unit One. Unit Two. We'll enter a population center, soon. One, protect my flank. Two, if any Dukes or Emperors show up, slow them down. I'll finish them myself."

The three of us continue walking. Artorias bubbles up again. What are these creations? I've never seen anything like them before. Certainly not from you.

"Light Constructs. Aren't they beautiful? Compared to the disgusting, malformed look of thy species, these lovelies exude righteous auras befitting my people. They will serve as my agents of justice. I shall take the demonic energy from those I kill and use it to create more allies of light. We will transform this hellhole into a place where humans and angels can live free of bloodskin oppression."

Living weapons. Why am I not surprised? Your idea of freedom is little more than genocide.

"Yes. Bloodskins slew my people. I will return the favor tenfold."

An eye for an eye only makes the world blind.

"Human proverbs mean little to me. They failed to protect those who gave their existence meaning. In my eyes, they share the blame for what happened to the angels and gods."

I raise my head and peer forward. The sound of a multitude of demons catches my attention.

"Ho ho, listen to that. The fools haven't a clue what's coming."

A bloodskin stiffens. He looks around, scanning the dimly lit room. "Did you guys hear somethin'?"

I stifle a laugh. Barbatos's unique power, Dark Form, makes me invisible. It extinguishes my Holy Energy entirely and merges my body into the world of darkness, allowing me to bypass anyone standing in my way.

Silently, I walk past the demons at the entrance to the center of the chamber. It appears to be a slave factory. Barbatos's memory tells me it is the Smeltery, where laborers forge weapons and armors for low-rank demons and monsters.

However, this area also has a Keymaster. If I can catch him, I'll be able to force him to open a portal to Hell Harbor.

And if I make it there...

I stop in the center of the room and look around. My constructs wait for me in the corridor, flattening themselves against the wall so that they won't draw attention.

My eyes lock onto a figure dressed in black robes. It's my lucky day.

Grigori, Diablo's warper, sits at a table reading a book. What is it about? I couldn't care less. I'm lucky this region of the Labyrinth hasn't heard about my approach yet. I can grab him and-

"She's here!"

A squeaky voice shrieks out a warning from the ceiling. I raise my eyes to look in its direction. A goblin with a strange device on his head watches me intently. "The Archangel!"

The walls come alive. Camouflaged shadow-walkers leap into action, jumping at me from every angle. Grigori leaps to his feet to reveal a partially casted magic seal. He creates a portal, allowing hundreds of reinforcements to pour through and rush at me.

Hehe. An ambush. I fell for it.

Fortunately, the bloodskins here are no match for me.

I flick a finger, and a portal of my own appears, allowing my Constructs to leap into action beside me. The appearance of my Constructs causes some of the shadow-walkers to stiffen in surprise as they rush toward me.

Unit One summons a sword and shield of light. He pounces at the shadow-walkers and cuts five of them in half before they can react.

Unit Two creates a hole in her head. She fires several tiny blasts of Holy Energy and blows out the brains of a dozen other shadow-walkers.

The rest of the shadow-walkers fall toward me. I can't block all of them.

Why bother?

I inhale. My Dark Form converts into its polar opposite, Light Form. Holy Energy radiates from my body, blinding the shadow-walkers and burning their skin. They scream in pain and cover their eyes, only to splash against me like a pile of wet rags. I don't flinch as the eighty demons slap my flesh. They fall to the ground and try to scurry away, shrieking like banshees the entire time. My Constructs make short work of the blinded, fleeing bastards.

Holy Energy is the bane of demonkind. The kill switch. Angels created the demons. We gave them life. We formed them from the dust of the Earth to be our servants, and as such, we could end them whenever we pleased.

If only we had done so sooner.

"Thy people art lucky I lost Gungnir and the Gae Bolg, all those years ago. However, I will make do."

Raising both hands, I summon two spears of light into my grasp. The army of demons that poured through Grigori's portal only moments before slows to a crawl. The bloodskins recoil in anguish as my brilliant aura beats upon their faces.

I jump into action. Using my spears, I stab and cut apart shadow-walkers, scythers, grunts, and a variety of monsters as well. Their screams of agony mix with those my Constructs slay, forming a beautiful symphony of death.

A Demon Lord steps out of the crowd and aims his palm at me. He shoots a ball of corrosive acid, but I counter with a Light Wall, making it explode and backfire against him. He's impervious to the acid, but it catches him off-guard enough for me to raise the barrier and slam it down on top of him, flattening him into a puddle of blood.

Horrified looks spread across the faces of the bloodskins.

"W-who in the hell are we dealing with?!"

"Hold your ground! There's only one enemy!"

"We have to slow him down until the Dukes arrive!"

I roll my eyes. The foolish bloodskins always assume I'm a man. If they knew a female Archangel was responsible for their annihilation, they'd probably kill themselves out of embarrassment.

With a flick of my wrist, I gently lob my spear of light into the crowd of bloodskins. It explodes, sending shards of Holy Energy shrapnel flying in all directions. Each of the shards tears through multiple enemies and pivots in midair to fly back and target others. They buzz around like a cloud of wasps, ripping demons and monsters to shreds indiscriminately.

My Constructs walk over to me and nod. Done.

The three of us watch with satisfaction as my shards of light tear apart everyone in their path. I flick my eyes over toward Grigori, who stands alone and trembles as he watches the others fall. When he meets my gaze, he panics and quickly forms signs to make a portal.

He thinks he can escape. That's adorable.

Grigori's belt has an iron engraving of a phoenix on it. I use it to yank him toward me. He screams in fright and tries to undo the belt, but his neck lands neatly in my palm, and I slam him into the ground.

"Hello, Grigori. Remember me?"

The bloodskin grits his teeth. "Uriel. You... you foul..."

"Now now, no time for pet names. Open the portal to Hell Harbor, or I'll rip thee limb from limb."

"You'll do it anyway! Piss off, you damned witch!"

"Correct. Still, I can drag out thy suffering for quite a while before painting the Labyrinth with thy innards. There are other Keymasters out there. Would not thou prefer I attack Hell Harbor, where I'll have to face the fearsome, monstrous Dukes?"

"You can't trick me. I remember what you did last time! Torture me all you please, but I'll never open the gate!!"

The Warper reaches into his robe and yanks out a knife, then stabs it into my arm. "Get off me!!"

I barely feel the blade's edge. Warpers have pitiful combat abilities.

Silently, I squeeze Grigori's neck hard enough to snap a bone. He gasps and squeezes my arm, trying to pull me off. "A-angel... scum... let me..."

I take my remaining spear of Holy Energy and slowly press it against his chest. The energy funnels into his blood, causing him to spasm violently.

"AHHH!! AHHHH!!!!! IT BURNS!! TUH-TAKE IT OUT!!"

"This won't end thy life, Grigori, but it will hurt worse than anything thou hath ever experienced. I'll keep the spear pressed to thy heart until thou summon the portal."

He screams even louder and kicks like a wild minotaur. "OUT!! TAKE IT OOOUT!!!"

A sensation of air rushes past my body. I glance up at where my Holy Shards eviscerated the bloodskins, and cock my head at the sight of a second portal. My eyes widen greedily. That one leads to Hell Harbor. Perfect.

Then, something surprising happens. Someone walks in front of it and steps through.

Beelzebub.

The newly crowned Duke gestures with his hand, and the portal closes.

"Uriel. I've heard rumors about your existence. Release Grigori. I'll be your foe."

I slowly stand up to Barbatos's full height. I'm a few inches taller than the newcomer, and Barbatos's body is far stockier and more muscular than the Duke of Inferno.

Grigori slumps in my grasp. I toss him to Unit One, and he catches the bloodskin with ease.

"Dost thee plan to fight me by thyself?"

Beelzebub undoes his suit collar and peels off his top. He tosses it to the side. "Oh, yes. I will. I'd have come sooner if I could, but I had a date with the warm side of a bench. I hope you don't mind."

Haha. I can't believe my luck. I thought I'd have to fight the Dukes and Emperors all at the same time, but this buffoon wants to fight me one-on-one.

I plant the butt of my spear on the ground. "Oh, I'm going to enjoy this."

Beelzebub's eyes flick over to Grigori's limp body. I step between him and his ally, using Barbatos's bulk to form a wall between them. "Here to save thy little friend?"

The Duke meets my gaze. "Why should I care about some insignificant nobody? Kill him if you like. I'm a little surprised, though. After all the tales Agares spun regarding the might of the Archangels, I never thought you would stoop so low as to torture weaklings."

"Grigori has the key to Hell Harbor. Once he unlocks the gate, I'll kill him. It's only business. He has what I need, so I'll take it."

Beelzebub smirks. "Attacking the weak and defenseless is something I can get behind, but I didn't expect such actions from an angel. Why are you trying to get to Hell Harbor? Shouldn't you be fleeing in the opposite direction? You won't last long against all the Dukes and Emperors."

I bristle at his words. My blood-red eyes threaten to burn a hole in the Duke of Inferno's skull. "Dost thou think the Emperors capable of stopping me? The Dukes? The truth is far from thy imagination, little one. Diablo is out of the picture. Satan is dead. Unless thy precious First Emperor makes a grand appearance, that leaves Belial and the new upstart, Ose, but neither of them can compare to Diablo."

Beelzebub readies two fireballs in each hand. "Regarding that, we agree. However, it won't matter. Your genocide of my people ends here; you bedeviled witch. I'm your worst nightmare. Your nemesis."

"My nemesis?" I scoff. "Hilarious. It took the combined might of four Dukes and Diablo's full power to imprison me the last time I emerged. What can one Duke do alone?"

Beelzebub closes his eyes and inhales. Suddenly, the oxygen in the room sucks toward him. The change in air pressure makes my ears pop. I stand firm as the wind enters his body.

Then, all goes still.

After a moment, I take a knee and clutch my throat. I can't breathe.

He sucked the room bone dry.

I glance up and meet the bloodskin's gaze. Beelzebub's body trembles as he holds in the air.

I can last a while; he can't. The fool is still new to using his powers.

Finally, Beelzebub exhales. A violent maelstrom of oxygen bursts from every pore on his skin, knocking me back a foot or two. I stabilize myself with magnetic control over my metal boots and gauntlets, only to see a wall of flame rushing toward me.

Unit Two jumps in front of Beelzebub's attack. She holds up her hand to summon a wall of light, blocking the flames with ease.

Beelzebub narrows his eyes. "Light Manipulation. Since you're a wielder of Holy Energy, I should have expected as much. I'm surprised you can use it while possessing Barbatos's body."

I stand up straight. "In a way, being devoured by this bloodskin was the best thing that ever happened to me. I possess all of Barbatos's magic, all of mine, and also..."

I smile. Beelzebub doesn't have to know about Artorias.

The bloodskin trapped in my mind appears as a mental image. What's the matter, Uriel? Scared that if he knows too much, this little Duke will beat you? You are a coward, after all.

"Shut up," I murmur. "Beelzebub, thy manipulation of fire is quite impressive. I witnessed thy battle against the Black Queen. Thou must feel confident about thy abilities if ye think defeating me will be a simple task."

Beelzebub smiles. In his hand, another fireball forms. "I'm only feeling you out. I've yet to get serious."

He shoots the ball at me. The superheated flame rushes at my face. I hold my hand up, freezing it in midair.

"Thou are far from being the only one who can control the power of fire, little bloodskin."

"What?!" Beelzebub's smile dissipates. "You, too? But you're an angel! Fire belongs to demonkind!"

I smirk. "When I was an Archangel, my official title was the Archangel of Protection. However, I also had a nickname: The Flame of God. Beautiful, isn't it?"

I clamp my hand shut, and the burning, red ball dissipates. Beelzebub glares at me. "You must think neutralizing my primary power will end me."

"Not especially, but this will." I raise my hand, and a hundred knives tear from the demon bodies lying around us. They sail at Beelzebub and-

He disappears.

The knives crash together and clatter to the ground uselessly.

I quickly scan my surroundings.

Where did he go?

Beelzebub reappears a foot away with a fireball lit in his hand. I jerk my head toward him just in time for the demon to fling it against my chest, exploding it with such power that it sends me flying back. Before I can hit the wall, Unit Two catches me and thumps me onto my feet.

I blink in surprise. "Teleportation? I've never seen thou wield such a power."

The fires from Beelzebub's initial attack earlier continue to burn the bodies of his deceased comrades. He smiles. "Demons gain new abilities when we evolve, stupid Archangel. There's a lot about me you have yet to discover."

The moment he finishes speaking, a light as bright as the sun erupts from his body.

My brain screams in alarm. "GAAAAUGH!"

Every nerve and receptor howls, spins, and tumbles around. Stars dance in my vision. I claw at my eyes futilely, but no matter what I do, I can't see a thing!

Beelzebub gasps. "Confound you, damn winged freak! How can you still see?!"

Despite the burning agony in my eyes, I smile. Unit Two has no eyes.

A scuffle breaks out. Something heavy hits the ground. A wave of heat washes over my legs. Beelzebub laughs. "Hahaha! This little false angel is no match for me!"

A moment later, my connection to Unit Two severs. She dissipates into the ether.

My vision returns, though it's blurry like glass during a snowstorm. I can barely make anything out.

A hazy figure stands amidst a field of flames. "Your toy fell without you to protect it. Now you only have the one left."

"Oh, Beelzebub. How little ye know."

I make a motion with my hands and Unit Two reforms beside me. "Be more careful this time. He's a crafty one."

She nods, and Beelzebub takes a step back. "You rebuilt it?!"

"My Constructs are creations of magic. So long as I possess spiritual energy, I can rebuild them over and over." I gesture to Unit One. "Hand me the Warper. Both of thee, work together to take out this trash. After my vision returns, so will I."

Artorias speaks in my mind. You will fall. I've seen this raw strength only once before in Satan. You underestimate Beelzebub's power. He will overwhelm you.

"Unlikely. One Duke cannot hold a candle to the might of an Archangel. After I slaughter him, I will continue to Hell Harbor and finish off the rest."

Artorias purses his lips. We shall see.

The Duke of Inferno rockets to the ceiling, clearing fifty feet in an instant. He spins in midair, plants his feet, and pushes off with all his strength. Summoning as much firepower as he can, Beelzebub slams into Unit Two, erupting with the wrath of a Phoenix.

Unit Two explodes into a thousand fragments. Uriel summons her again, and Unit One grabs at the Duke while its comrade reforms.

Beelzebub senses the Construct reaching for his shirt collar. The Duke makes a quick hand sign and explodes into smoke, causing Unit One to stumble. Beelzebub reforms behind him and unleashes a river of flames upon the light construct, melting it into particles.

Uriel growls. Damn him. She weaves hand signs, and Unit One reappears. Unit Two opens a hole in her head and fires several shots of Holy Energy, but Beelzebub transforms into smoke once more, allowing the bolts of light magic to pass through himself harmlessly.

The moment he becomes physical, Beelzebub rips off his left arm and flings it between the two constructs. It explodes in midair and blows them to smithereens, forcing Uriel to recreate them.

"Not so fast," Beelzebub says. He fire-ports to a flame three feet from Uriel and jumps at her, batting her hands away before she can finish the signs. With her vision still blurry, Uriel grabs at the hazy figure of Beelzebub but misses him by a few inches.

Beelzebub regenerates his arm and summons two solar-whips. He begins lashing at the Archangel, cutting deep into her flesh. Uriel drops the Warper and holds up her fists to block her face, exposing her stomach and legs in the process. Beelzebub punishes her by striking at her vulnerable areas.

The whips strike her ten times every second, spinning and crossing her body with such fury that the Archangel staggers back. "Impudent shit! When I wrap my hands around thy neck...!"

Beelzebub lets up for a split second and jumps at the Archangel. He slaps his palm against her chest and inhales, absorbing the air around him. He sends the oxygen through his heart and into his hand. A thousand degrees of fire explode inside the Archangel, boiling her blood from the inside out.

Wordlessly, Uriel opens her mouth to let out an empty scream. Her body leaps back of its own accord to smash into the ground. She loses motor control for a few moments and kicks spastically, like an angry infant.

Uriel's natural regeneration activates. She gasps for breath and wheezes, acting as if she's smoked a hundred packs of cigarettes in one sitting.

"Sh-shut thy... mouth... Artorias... thou knoweth... nothing..."

Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. Artorias?

Not wanting to give the Archangel a chance to heal, Beelzebub walks over to her and blasts the Archangel with a constant stream of flames. Fire pours from his body and tears across Uriel like a million angry fire-ants, chewing and biting her skin. Uriel screams in pain and swings at anything she can, but with her vision still blurry, she doesn't land a hit on the Duke.

Beelzebub grins as wide as a Cheshire cat. "Hahaha, look at you — the almighty Archangel. No wonder Barbatos defeated you. You're nothing. If the other Dukes and Emperors had trouble imprisoning you, that only speaks to how weak-"

Shik shik shik!

A hundred pieces of metal slam into Beelzebub's back, cutting him off mid-sentence.

"W-what?!"

The shards embed deep into his spine, severing his motor functions for a moment. His flames cut off, and the Duke flops to the left. His eyes widen. "How did you-?! You couldn't even move!"

Uriel chokes out a pained laugh. "Kah... haha... hahaha... f-fool. I don't need to weave signs... to manipulate metal. Suffer."

She flicks her eyes to the left, causing Beelzebub to tear off the ground and slam against the wall. Knives, rods, and a hundred other implements fly at the Duke, stab him a thousand times, and pin his outspread arms crucifixion-style.

Uriel gasps for breath and slowly pulls herself to her feet.

Beelzebub tries to turn his head, but a dozen knives stab through every extremity and prevent him from moving. He opts to turn one functional eye toward her, given the other was stabbed out.

"Good move. W-what now? I don't feel pain, you wretched beast. You won't be able to kill me, either. I'm immortal."

Uriel raises her eyes. She glares at the Duke pinned to the wall. "I'm waiting for thy last-ditch effort to break free. A trick, perhaps. Show me that confidence. Where did it go?"

Beelzebub tries to swallow, though the discomfort in his throat indicates something is impaling it. "L-like I need to. You're a mess. You're about ready to keel over, stupid little bird."

Uriel motions with her hands. Unit One and Unit Two reappear. She scowls at them. "Worthless! How coulds't thou perish under such weak attacks?!"

Both of the constructs bow their heads contritely.

"Save thy excuses for someone who cares! Unit Two. Blast the Duke with holy energy. Full power. Eradicate every cell of his body. I don't want him coming back."

Beelzebub stares in silence at the winged figure of light that walks up to him. Its face opens.

WHAM!

A laser of holy energy crashes into Beelzebub's head.

Everything goes dark.

Beelzebub's eye opens.

I regenerated?

He blinks. The sight that greets him shakes him to his core. Belial, the Second Emperor of the demons, stands between Uriel and Beelzebub, keeping her back to the Duke and protecting him from the Archangel. Alongside her stands a faceless warrior covered from head to toe in seamless metal. A Baron and two Warpers lurk off to the side, keeping themselves out of Uriel's immediate grabbing range. Beelzebub recognizes the Baron as Orias, the Baron of The Stars.

Beelzebub coughs. "Kuh! B-Belial?"

The demoness in the white dress ignores Beelzebub. She turns to Orias. "Take your Warpers and leave. You'll only slow us down."

The Baron glances at the Archangel. "I can assist you."

"I know, but this isn't your fight. Evacuate the nearby living areas. I'm counting on you."

The Baron of Stars nods. "Very well. As you wish."

One of the Warpers opens a portal, and all three of them step through, vanishing into the ether.

Across from Belial, Uriel stands with her two constructs. However, to Beelzebub's surprise, she is missing an arm. The Archangel makes a motion with her remaining hand, and water forms in midair. It attaches to her stump and slowly transforms into flesh, replacing her lost limb.

Beelzebub narrows his gaze. Water manipulation, in addition to fire and light? No, more importantly, what is Belial doing here? Who is the steel-clad warrior?

Belial nods to the armored man. "Remember. No killing. If we hammer Uriel hard enough, she'll lose power, and Barbatos can resurface."

The man gestures to the piles of burning bodies lying on the ground. "You're asking me to go easy on her? I can't do that. Look at all the demons she's killed."

Uriel glowers at the two figures protecting Beelzebub. "Belial. Thy ambush caught me off-guard, but I'm none the worse for wear. Tricks won't defeat me. I've grown far too powerful for that. And besides... bringing a metal-clad fighter here was a foolish mistake."

Uriel flicks her eyes at the armored warrior, and Beelzebub flinches. He's dead.

Nothing happens.

Uriel hesitates. She furrows her brow and flicks her fingers to no effect.

"By Heaven's name! What manner of metallurgy could create a suit impervious to my magnetism?!"

A moment passes. The warrior shakes his head. "According to Centurion, the Transforming Replicant Exosuit is a hardened plastoid carbon-fiber alloy formed from ultra-dense nanites. It's not metal, Uriel."

The suited figure's words tickle Beelzebub's ear. I've heard his voice before. But where? Who is he?

The Archangel takes a step back. "Tch. Those terms thou uttered are unfamiliar to me. They sound distinctly... human."

"That's because they are," The man replies. "I'm human. My name is Hope."

Hope? Beelzebub digs into his memory. I've never heard of a human named Hope. Who the devil is he? Why is he fighting alongside the Second Emperor?!

Belial holds up her hand. Each finger transforms into razor-sharp blades. "Uriel. I don't want to fight you, but I will if you make me."

Hope nods. "I agree. If you're an Archangel, then there's no reason for us to fight. Calm down. Sit with me. Talk. We can resolve your grievances peacefully."

The Archangel's glowing red eyes brighten dramatically. "PEACE?! Worthless, bloodskin-loving maggot! The demons slew my people! They tortured and killed every last angel! They burned us to the ground! I'm all that remains! I'm the last one! And thou dost believe me capable of listening to reason?! Shove thy words where even the Creator cannot gaze!"

A knife flies from the darkness straight at Hope's back.

Beelzebub sees it coming. "L-look out!"

The weapon slams into the armor at the speed of sound, only to bounce off harmlessly. The smoldering hatred in Uriel's eyes lessens. "That armor is stronger than it looks. Mere steel shouldn't protect thee against such a swift strike. Let's see how Satan's toy performs!"

Her eyes dart to Belial. A dozen knives fly at the Demon Emperor. Belial's body flattens, and she becomes as thin as a twig. Her bladed fingers stretch out and dart at the knives, batting them out of the air effortlessly.

Her mouth appears in midair, connected to the thinnest pieces of flesh. "Not good enough, Uriel. I remember our last fight. I trained to ensure I wouldn't lose again."

The human raises his hand and pokes at the air, as if pressing invisible buttons. His helmet melts away, exposing his head. "Uriel, please. Don't fight us. Don't you see? I'm this era's Hero. We're not enemies, no matter how you might feel about the demons."

Beelzebub's eyes widen. "Jason?!"

The human turns back to look at the demon pinned to the wall. "No. I'm Hope. Think of me as his twin brother. Sit tight. I'll get you off that wall lickety-split, alright?"

Hope turns back to face the Archangel. Uriel eyes him silently. "I remember now. Thou art the Wordsmith. Barbatos observed thy battle versus the Black Queen and Satan from afar. Thou dost possess some modicum of potential... but sadly, thou art misguided."

The Archangel lowers her arms. "Wordsmith. Thy allegiance rests with the wrong species. Why dost ye ally with demons? Forget Satan's whore. Join me. We must work together to rid the galaxy of Hell's taint and oppression. Our goals align perfectly."

Anger builds in Beelzebub's body. How humiliating! I can't believe my saviors are the Hero and the Traitor! I sit here pinned to a wall while they reap the glory of defeating the Archangel! When the other demons hear about this... they'll... they'll...!

Hope and Samantha continue to stare at Uriel, oblivious to Beelzebub's building rage behind them. The man extends a hand toward the Archangel. "You're wrong. I'm not on the side of demons. Neither is Samantha. We're only here because we value peace. More killing and destruction is not the proper way to fix the past!"

The Archangel shakes her head. "I care not about the past. I care about the future. Demons are hateful creatures. They're wretched abominations my people should never have created! We gave them life, and they repaid us with death! They deserve to die!"

Samantha molds her body back into its original, alluring shape. "Hateful? The only hateful one here is you! And what do you mean by 'not caring about the past'? That's all you think about! Besides, I remember history a little differently from you. I was there when the angels tried to quell the imp uprising! I remember the genocide you wrought upon my people!"

Hope holds up a hand. "Now isn't the time to point fingers, Samantha. It doesn't matter who started it-"

"It does!" Uriel takes a menacing step toward the human and demon. "We gave the imps life! They chose to spit in our faces and revolt! The ungrateful little shits deserved all the pain we gave them!"

Samantha's face reddens. "Life?! You birthed us into slavery! We were little more than your chattel! Your puppets to shine your shoes and fetch your wine!"

"All life has a purpose. Thine was to be slaves. Tis' no difficult matter to comprehend!"

Beelzebub's rage boils hotter and hotter inside his mind.

Traitor. Hero. Traitor. Hero. I can't pull myself off this wall. Can't even move a muscle. Humiliation. Defeat.

Beelzebub's eye widens. No. That's it! I know what to do. I'll show them. I'll show them all!

He slowly inhales oxygen, funneling the air into his stomach to boil a fire unlike any other.

The Duke of Inferno twitches and spasms. He flinches on the wall as every cell in his body begins to agitate.

Hope waves his hand at the quarreling women. "Please! Calm down! Yelling at each other won't solve our problems!"

The Duke's eyes open. He gasps for breath. "I win."

Hope suddenly spins to face the Duke as Centurion's nanobots send a message to his earpiece. "WARNING! THERMONUCLEAR DETONATION DETECTED! SEEK COVER!"

"Holy shit! Samantha, look out!!"

Part 071: A New Hope

"WARNING! THERMONUCLEAR DETONATION DETECTED! SEEK COVER!"

Centurion roars in my ear like a tiger howling for blood. My eyes bolt open, and I swivel around to see Beelzebub's entire body convulsing.

"Holy shit! Samantha, look out!"

"FIVE SECONDS TO DETONATION. FOUR. THREE..."

Instinctively, I aim my mind at Samantha. "SHIELD! SHIELD! SHIELD! SHI-"

My mind melts away. A supernova explodes ten feet from my face, and every cell in my body screams in agony.

I open my eyes. Everything is still.

The taste of metal permeates every corner of my mouth. A hundred bells clang in my ears. My vision is little more than a wild splash of colors and images. Cat. Dog. Car. Plane. Cloud. Tree.

I can't move. There's no pain, but invisible anvils crush me against the floor.

Somewhere between one second and one eternity passes. I open my mouth to speak, but whatever comes out, I can't hear it.

Finally, the colors melt away. Black and white flashes of heat replace them, followed by a sensation of burning across my skin.

"Ahhunn..."

I let out a pitiful whimper. At least I can speak.

"-ope? Hope?"

Someone's voice speaks to me.

"...God?"

"No. It's me, Samantha. Are you okay? I healed you as best I could."

I can't see her at all. I blink my eyes. "I'm blind."

"You'll have to fix that. Anything involving a brain is beyond me. I did what I could with the burns and broken bones."

"Heal."

I croak out a word of power, causing my vision to return. The darkness of the Labyrinth replaces the pure black and bright white from before. It takes me several seconds to pick out Samantha's face from the gloom surrounding us.

"Hey, are you okay?"

I reach up to rub my face. My hands scratch my skin, reminding me of pressing sandpaper together. I wince and pull myself up.

"What happened?"

Only now can I fully understand the scene around me. I sit not in a small room like before, but a massive cavern. There are no walls anywhere in sight. The floor around me is pure black and covered in a cross between ash and soot. One look at my body reveals my tuxedo is in tatters, with only a few strips clinging to my skin through static electricity. Similarly, Samantha's white bridesmaid dress is gone, burned to a crisp. She doesn't notice.

Samantha shakes her head. "I think... I think Beelzebub blew himself up. You saved me. I would have died if it weren't for you." She smacks her lips. "Eugh. I'm nauseous. My stomach won't stop turning."

I speak again. "Light."

A bright light appears above me, illuminating the floor around us. A shiver goes down my spine.

I still can't see the walls or the ceiling; only the ground stretching out endlessly into the darkness. Beelzebub is also nowhere to be seen. I think he died.

"Incredible," A deep voice says from behind me. I leap to my feet and spin around to see Barbatos- no, I mean Uriel, the Archangel, standing and staring at the cavern around us. She looks up, down, left, and right. "Such devastation. Thou shoulds't consider thyself lucky I was here to protect thee, young Hero."

"Protect me? I shielded myself."

The Archangel chuckles. "Heh... amusing. I created several Light Walls at the moment of Beelzebub's detonation and enveloped us in their protection. I didn't particularly want to protect Satan's whore, but I knew ye would think better of me if I did."

I glance at Samantha and shrug. "I mean, the Archangel called you a whore, but she did save us, too. Do those cancel out?"

"Uriel didn't save my life out of the kindness of her heart. She isn't good enough to do that." Samantha crosses her arms and glares at the Archangel. "Still, thank you. I would be dead if it weren't for you."

Uriel ignores the succubus. "Tell me, Hero, now that thou hath seen the devastation bloodskins can unleash, will ye stand apart from the demon whore at thy side and join me? If ye striketh down Belial, the temptress of man, thou shalt earn thy place among the legends of times past."

The color drains from my face. "What the hell? After saving Samantha, now you want me to kill her?! Are you insane?"

The Archangel shakes her head. "Hardly. 'Tis a reasonable proposal. Since time immemorial, angels and humans have always walked arm in arm as brothers and sisters. Perhaps after a hundred thousand years, humans may have forgotten, but I have not. I want nothing more than to save thy people from slavery at the hands of the bloodskins."

Samantha rolls her eyes. "Oh, that's rich. You're the ones who enslaved imps in the first place. Slavery wouldn't exist if it weren't for you."

"Quiet, wench. I have little patience for thy silver-tongue."

"What?! You're the liar! All you utter are falsehoods!"

I watch silently as the Archangel and Demon Emperor bicker, each trying to compel me to join their side. Thinking back on what I've witnessed, not once have I seen Samantha kill or injure someone else. On the other hand, Uriel's aura drips with bloodlust and murder. If I had to compare the two of them, I can't see myself sympathizing with the Archangel.

However, Uriel's hatred isn't likely to have sprouted from nowhere. The fact that a Demon Duke, Barbatos, trapped her within his body implies she met some horrible end at his hands. Who can say if her quest for vengeance is unwarranted? I've already realized, unlike Jason, that killing is sometimes necessary.

After all, not even one day ago, I killed hundreds of orcs to save a human village. If Uriel is a monster, then I share a similar stain on my conscience.

One lingering issue, however, is that the Archangel pursues a grievance from a hundred thousand years in the past. None of the demons alive today had anything to do with the murder of the angels. It's not right to judge children for the sins of their ancestors!

No. I'm overlooking something. Samantha is an Emperor. She's old enough to remember the angels and the war, along with their destruction. Surely the other Dukes and Emperors also remember. In that case, Uriel's grievance is legitimate. The same corrupt leaders of demonkind who exterminated the Angels and Gods continue to live today.

I pause for a moment to itch my arms. They tingle every so often, causing me to notice other weird sensations in my body.

While Samantha and Uriel take menacing steps toward each other and yell, I glance down at my arms. With the light illuminating them, I see...

What the hell?

My skin is mottled and gross. Tiny worm-like objects crawl all over my limbs and chest. Bugs? Spiders? No, something else.

* * *

Son of a bitch. That's right. I was wearing the T-REX when Beelzebub exploded. What the hell would a nuclear blast do to nanites?

I slap the button on my chest. Nothing happens.

My armor is destroyed. What if the nanites embedded inside of me?

"Observe."

I speak aloud, making the other two turn to look at me.

My body's status pops up in front of me, detailing my current state via a series of images and diagrams.

Physical Condition: 45%.

Stage 3 Radiation Poisoning detected

Stage 3 Cancer of the kidneys, lungs, heart, and brain detected.

Lymphomatic cells detected within 14% of the bloodstream.

1,603,978,801 defective nanites detected throughout body.

"Holy fuck," I mutter aloud. I turn to Samantha. "Observe."

Her condition comes up.

Physical Condition: 90%.

Stage 1 Radiation Poisoning Detected.

Stage 1 Cancer of the heart detected.

Lymphomatic cells detected throughout 3% of the body.

Samantha raises an eyebrow. "Is something wrong?"

"You're in better condition than me. Beelzebub's attack infected my entire body with cancer. It also did something to my suit, since it embedded over a billion nanites into my bloodstream."

"Are you okay?"

I shake my head. "I don't know how to target something the size of a nanite. Maybe if I had the Crown, things would be different."

Uriel sighs. "I apologize, young Hero. I wish I could have protected thee. Now, the horrors of the bloodskins will affect thee for the rest of thy life, as they have mine."

I rub my head. "Actually, I'm pretty sure once I return to the Core, Jason can heal me."

Uriel's somber expression freezes. "Oh."

The Archangel's eyes shift. I can't see her face, but her expression seems to be something akin to... disappointment? Why that emotion, of all the possibilities? I'd expect her to be glad that I haven't suffered any permanent damage.

Something doesn't add up. I can't bring myself to trust this Archangel. Ever since I first laid my eyes on her, she's acted in her self-interest. She doesn't look at me like a person. She thinks of me as a tool.

Just like Jason does.

But I'm not a tool. I'm a flesh and blood human. I'm sick and tired of people treating me like a nobody, or a servant who must do this and that. Protect the Core, Hope. It's your job, Hope. Do this, Hope. Do that, Hope.

Shut the fuck up, all of you. I barely survived a nuclear blast, and Uriel only looks relieved that she can still use me. She's happy I'm not... defective.

If I'm going to kill any demons, it'll be for my sake, not hers.

I shake my head. "Come on, Samantha. Let's return to the Core. I'm not helping this Archangel. I've heard enough."

Uriel narrows her eyes. "Thou art leaving?"

"Yeah. I am."

Samantha meets my eyes. "Hope, we came here to fight Uriel. We can't leave."

I shake my head. "I'm not interested in dueling an Archangel. She saved my life, after all. Both of you have history, and I'm not going to piece together who started what. However, I'm not going to help her kill anyone either. Her quarrel with demons isn't mine."

The Archangel takes two steps toward me. "Disrespectful child! How dare thou turn down my alliance! Thou art a Hero. Angels created the Heroes. Thy life would be insignificant and worthless, were it not for our sacrifices!"

"I beg your pardon?"

"I speak the truth, boy. Thou art little more than a child who has grown attached to the likes of bloodskins. I know not why or how, but I won't allow thee to walk away. Thy lineage is mine to control! Thy life is mine to use as I see fit."

Samantha pales. "W-what? That's terrible! Even for you-"

"SILENCE!"

Uriel flicks her eyes toward the succubus. The ground shifts under Samantha, and a dozen knives burst out of the Labyrinth's floor to rush at her.

With her body weakened by radiation sickness, Samantha can't react in time. The knives impale her limbs, spin her around in midair, and slam her into the dirt. Samantha coughs up blood. She wriggles to try and free herself, but she can't move.

"Samantha!" I turn to run to her, but an invisible wall blocks my path. "Uriel! Let her go! What's wrong with you?!"

"Hero, thou art a misguided fool. If I cannot change thy mind, then I will at least make certain the bloodskins cannot seize thy power for themselves!"

A warning tingles in the back of my mind. I duck reflexively as a knife sails over the back of my head and lands in Uriel's palm. She frowns. "Impossible. How could a mere human dodge an attack like that?"

A buzzing feeling hisses throughout my body. I jump to the side, duck, and hop two feet into the air to avoid several shards of metal flying at me from my left and right.

As my body moves on its own, a realization strikes me. Something's different. I've never moved like this before, not once in my life. I'm not athletic, even after Wordsmithing my body to be more physically fit.

What's going on?

I don't have time to think. I evade several more shards of metal and aim my mind at my body. "Strength! Speed! Enhance!"

This time, when I sense danger approach my body, I snatch the handle of a knife before it can impale my back.

Uriel's tongue flicks out. "What happened? How have thy movements quickened? How art thou keeping up with my attacks?!"

I shrug. "Dunno."

Before she can say anything else, I aim my palm at her. "FIRE!"

A blast of Holy Energy sprays out and flies at the patchy-skinned demon-angel hybrid. She watches the beam approach and catches it in her palm, absorbing its energy without taking damage.

"Silly boy. I am an angel. Manipulating holy magic is child's play."

I flick my eyes to Samantha. Uriel hasn't paid any attention to the succubus since she engaged in battle with me, and Samantha's been slowly molding and shifting her body to free herself from the knives.

I'll give her more time, then.

"Hey, Uriel. Doesn't it piss you off that you're trapped in that hideous demon body? I bet it's still better looking than your original form."

The Archangel gnashes her teeth. "Impudent shit! When I walked the cosmos, all knew of my name and bowed at my feet! I stood atop a precipice of beauty, surrounded by the likes of the Valkyries and the Earthmother herself! A shriveled little boy like thyself would have counted himself lucky to court someone of my class!"

More danger appears in my mind, but this time I can almost make out a voice, but I don't have time to listen intently to what it says. I duck and dodge several knife attacks, then turn to Uriel.

"You only think of me as a weapon against demonkind. Maybe I'm naive, but I always thought angels sat on clouds and played harps. You're more of a demon than the demons I've met so far."

"Speak not of what ye don't know!" Uriel bellows. She stomps her foot, causing the ground to shake violently, knocking me off my feet. "The damned bloodskins took everything from me! EVERYTHING! If ye choose not to be my ally, then thou art my enemy! Burn in the lake of fire!"

She forms several signs with her hands, and flames surge from her chest, screaming across the short gap toward me. No time to dodge!

I'm dead. I know I'm dead.

I tuck myself into a ball and flinch. Warmth washes over my body.

A moment passes. Two. Three.

Uriel speaks again, her voice softer now. "That fire was over eight hundred degrees. How is he still...?"

I blink and pat myself all over.

She's right. What the hell? How did I survive that?

A voice speaks in my head again.

PILOT AGHSK NNBSSPP.

I recognize the voice as Centurion. Why can I hear him?

He clears up.

PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR, HOPE HIRO. THE TRANSFORMING REPLICANT EXOSUIT WAS DAMAGED DURING THE NUCLEAR ATTACK. ALL SYSTEMS HAVE SWITCHED TO BACKUP MODE. I HAVE ADJUSTED MY OPERATING PARAMETERS ACCORDINGLY.

It takes me a moment to understand Centurion's words. "You... you merged with my body?"

AFFIRMATIVE. CENTURION'S SYSTEMS ARE UNABLE TO CONNECT TO THE EXTERNAL FUSION POWER SOURCE. CENTURION HAS ADJUSTED ITS SYSTEMS TO DERIVE POWER FROM YOUR BIOLOGICAL PROCESSES. EXCESS BODILY WASTE WILL BE EJECTED AS A HARMLESS AEROSOL BYPRODUCT.

I jump to my feet and feel my arms again. Within seconds, the bumpiness on my skin from before vanishes, replaced instead with a clean, metallic texture resembling armor.

A warning signal appears in my mind again. I'm so distracted by my thoughts that I don't move quickly enough. Uriel's knife stabs into my spine, only to bounce off my skin and hit the ground with a clang.

I get it now. Centurion's nanites have merged with my body to form invisible armor.

My vision shifts. Something moves around in front of me. I swat at the air, but quickly realize my eyes themselves are changing.

ADJUSTING OLFACTORY, VISUAL, AND AUDITORY RECEPTORS TO OPTIMUM LEVELS. PROCESS COMPLETE. ENABLING NEURAL CONTROL OF CENTURION'S PRIMARY AND SECONDARY SYSTEMS. ONLINE.

I blink in surprise. Holy shit, does that mean I can control Centurion with my thoughts?

Centurion replies to my mental query. AFFIRMATIVE, PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR. CENTURION'S SYSTEMS AND SUBSYSTEMS ARE NOW CAPABLE OF ACCEPTING MENTAL STIMULI AS COMMANDS.

Uriel scowls. "Thou have yet to activate thy Wordsmithing, yet somehow, thou hath vastly improved thy fighting skills since awakening! How is this possible?!"

What happens next surprises me. Samantha, having shifted her body enough to melt around the knives, leaps from the ground and transforms her arms into two swords. She chops down and hacks off Uriel's right arm. The sudden assault causes the Archangel to scream in pain and retreat several steps while forming an invisible wall to block Samantha's ambush.

Samantha transforms her hands from blades into hammers. She smashes against Uriel's invisible wall, battering it so hard that shockwaves ripple outward, making my insides quiver.

Centurion evaluates the situation. ARCHANGEL-HYBRID DESIGNATED URIEL HAS FORMED A WALL OF SOLID LIGHT. ERROR. THIS EXCEEDS CENTURION'S TECHNICAL PARAMETERS. UNABLE TO EXPLAIN THE PHENOMENA.

"Uriel's using magic," I say. "I don't know how her magic works, but it seems she can control metal, fire, and light."

Uriel staggers back, and Samantha changes her method of attack. She dives into the ground and burrows inside the scorched floor of the Labyrinth. Uriel flicks her gaze to where Samantha disappeared.

"Tch, foolish female." Uriel motions with her hands, and the ground trembles. A moment later, Samantha explodes from the dirt, almost as if something had spit her with incredible force. She sails into the darkness and lands somewhere unseen.

My vision suddenly changes, startling me — the world shifts to hues of red and black.

THERMAL VISION ACTIVATED.

"Uh. Thanks, Centurion."

A blip of red in the darkness catches my eye. Samantha slinks around, careful to stay in the shadows where Uriel can't see her.

The succubus makes a motion with her hands and races at Uriel. Her speed multiplies by a factor of ten. She covers the quarter-mile in under a second and slams against the Archangel's invisible wall, breaking through it as if it's made of glass. She crashes into the Archangel with thunderous strength, causing both women to tumble and roll into one another. Before Uriel can react, Samantha stretches, bends, and twists, wrapping herself around her opponent like Silly String.

Uriel gasps and struggles, trying desperately to unravel the demoness from her body. "Get... off... me!"

Samantha's fist transforms into a hammer again. She smashes it against Uriel's face over and over, pounding and pummeling the Archangel senseless.

Uriel motions with her hands and quickly forms a single magic sign, despite Samantha's intense barrage. Two winged figures of light appear; the same ones that stood beside her before the blast went off.

"Samantha! Look out!"

The blank face of one opens up. A hole appears in its head, and it fires several shots of holy energy at its master.

The bolts slam against Samantha's body. She screams. "Aiieee!!"

The succubus turns to swing her hammer at the winged pseudo-angel, but the other jumps forward and summons a sword of light. It chops off her hand, causing her to scream again.

"Paha, foolish bloodskin! BURN!" Uriel forms another sign to summon fire from her pores. She releases it outward, scorching every inch of the succubus wrapped around her. This time, Samantha's anguished cry churns my stomach. Her pitiful wailing makes me realize she can't hold out much longer.

I've seen enough.

"Remove."

With a single word, I teleport Samantha off Uriel's body and over to me. Her stretched form is covered in blood and burns, making her look like a mass of burned Jello. I can barely tell where her head begins and her legs end.

Samantha slowly twists herself back into a humanoid shape, but her badly burned body makes my stomach lurch. The succubus clutches her severed hand and winces. "Ahh, it burns! Shit... shit..."

"Regenerate. Clothes." I quickly heal her arm and cover her naked body with a simple jumpsuit. Then, I step between her and Uriel. "That's enough. You've both gotten the anger out of your systems. Uriel, if you hurt my friend again, I'll have to get involved."

The Archangel's eyes explode with rage. "No! That's it! I've had it with thy cowardice! I'm done playing nice! Thou hath made thy bed, now sleep in it, forever!"

Uriel forms signs once again. I grimace.

There's no backing down for me, now. I have to fight the Archangel.

I look at Samantha. "Sorry. I can't protect you and fight at the same time. Return."

"Wai-!" Samantha starts to say something, but disappears and returns to the Core.

Centurion booms in my mind. PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR! CENTURION DETECTS A BUILDUP OF ENERGY INSIDE THE ARCHANGEL-HYBRID ENEMY!

"Yeah, I bet you fuckin' do. Let's take this cunt down a peg or two."

Part 072: Crossroads of Fate

Recommended Listening

Two combatants face each other on an empty battlefield. After scorching away every trace of life for several miles in every direction, Beelzebub's attack obliterated a circular cavern the size of a small city, giving Hope and Uriel plenty of space to move around.

The Archangel weaves a dozen hand signs, causing a chunk of the ground behind her to jump into the air. Fragments shoot from it rapid-fire and sail at Hope like an earthen machine gun.

Hope dives to the side, allowing Uriel's dirt bullets to miss him by an inch. "Centurion! I could use a little help, here!"

EVALUATION OF THE ENEMY COMBATANT REQUIRED. PLEASE CONTINUE TO FIGHT SO THAT CENTURION'S ANALYSIS SYSTEMS CAN DEVELOP A STRATEGY TO COUNTER THEIR ATTACK.

"I don't have time for that!" Hope aims his palm at Uriel. "Freeze!"

A wall of ice instantly envelops the Archangel. Hope dashes toward her, but the Archangel shatters her restraints instantly, causing the Wordsmith to retreat. Uriel punches her broken prison, sending a hundred icy shards flying at Hope. The Wordsmith tucks his face between his arms, allowing the ice bullets to explode against his armored limbs.

"That backfired," Hope grunts.

Uriel's light-form angels fly into the air. The female opens her head again and begins firing holy energy at Hope, tracking his movements as he ducks and dodges around. The other angel summons a bow and arrow, then flies around to Hope's backside, flanking him in the process.

WARNING, PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR! THE ENEMY HAS SURROUNDED US!

"No shit!"

Hope aims his mind at Unit Two while still dodging her attacks. He grabs her with telekinesis and yanks hard. She lurches downward and piledrives into the ground, breaking several limbs in the process.

Unit One aims an arrow and fires. It leaves the bow at twice the speed of sound and strikes Hope square in the back, blowing the wind out of his body and sending him sprawling in the dirt.

MINOR DAMAGE SUSTAINED, PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR! BEWARE OF ATTACKS FROM THE REAR!

Hope coughs violently. "Kah... n-no kidding. You think?!"

His eyes shift again. A graphic interface pops up, highlighting several areas on Uriel's body. PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR, I HAVE LOCATED SEVERAL STRESS POINTS ON THE PRIMARY TARGET! STRIKE THEM TO CAUSE SEVERE DAMAGE!

"Finally, something useful."

Hope spins on his heel and bats another of Unit One's arrows out of the air, but he hits it in such a way that it bounces off his hand and slams into Uriel's chest. The Archangel trips and falls on her rear.

"Argh! Unit One! Don't strike me, imbecile!"

Hope teleports atop the Archangel's shoulders, making her jerk her head back in surprise. "What-?!"

The Wordsmith stabs his armored hand down and plunges it deep into her shoulder. "EXPLODE!"

Hope's hand detonates with the force of a stick of dynamite, blasting him up into the air. He careens around wildly and smashes onto his face, twenty feet away.

WARNING! MINOR DAMAGE SUFFERED! DEPLOYING NANITES TO EXPEDITE THE RECOVERY PROCESS!

"Thangs, Senshureeon," Hope drawls. It takes him a moment to shake off the disorientation from his unexpected flight. He claws himself to his feet a moment later and scowls at the Archangel as she stands up and dusts herself off at the same time.

"Thou art an innovative opponent, Wordsmith. I forgot short-range teleportation was one of thy abilities."

Uriel's severed arm, while gruesome, only requires a few moments to heal. Hope watches silently as drops of water fall away, and a new arm regrows itself.

Damn. Uriel can regenerate her wounds using water magic. If I'm not mistaken, that means she has control over light, metal, fire, water, and earth. Ridiculous. I thought most magic users specialized in one or two elements!

Centurion replies. THE ARCHANGEL-TYPE ENEMY POSSESSES A WIDE VARIETY OF ATTACKS AND DEFENSES. IT IS A FORMIDABLE OPPONENT.

Yeah, thanks for that, Captain Obvious.

Uriel narrows her eyes, sending more pieces of metal flying at Hope. He swats them out of the air, batting them away as if he were a pro-Badminton player. "I'm so sick of your bullshit!"

Hope teleports again, this time in front of her. Uriel lunges her hand to grab at his neck, but Hope teleports behind her, making her miss. He slaps his palm against her back. "SEAL!"

The Archangel hops away. "Had ye chosen to listen, I wouldn't have to strike ye dead!" Her eyes dart to more metal on the ground, then back to Hope.

Nothing happens.

Hope takes two steps back and narrows his eyes. "Give me your best shot."

The Archangel pauses for a moment, then forms a hand sign.

Nothing happens.

"My magic. Why can't I use it? My reserves shouldn't be anywhere close to empty."

A smile creeps over Hope's face. "That's what I thought. It only occurred to me a few seconds ago, but I should be able to disable the magic powers of others. You're defenseless."

Uriel stiffens. A bead of sweat trickles down her face. "Shut up, Artorias. This development was not within thy predictions."

Hope cocks his head. "My name is Hope, and I don't recall predicting anything."

"Imbecile, I am not referring to thee," Uriel says. She waves a finger, summoning Unit One to her side, his bow and arrow held at the ready. Unit Two limps toward Uriel as well. The construct motions with her hands and heals herself, repairing her broken limbs within a few seconds.

Hope exhales. "Now that I've taken out your magic, you won't be any trouble at all. How about I beat some sense into you? After what you did to Samantha, I won't forgive you easily."

"Thou art amusing. I need not use magic to defeat thee, Wordsmith." Uriel glances at Unit One. "Summon two spears and pass them to me."

Unit One nods. His bow vanishes, and two spears appear, one in each hand. He gives them to Uriel, and she expertly spins around, twirling each one like an extension of her body.

"I held off a hundred thousand bloodskins all by myself during the War in Heaven. My mighty spears, Gungnir and Gae Bolg, were weapons crafted by Camael, the Archangel of Divination. While I no longer possess my artifacts of power, fake weapons like these will still be enough to display my combat prowess."

"Camael? Never heard of him."

"Her. Camael was my wise sister, the one who gave every Archangel and Hero their soul-bound weapons and items. Perhaps, had thou not evolved into a demon worshipper, ye might possess an artifact of thy own."

Hope shrugs. "Technically, Jason has Solomon's Crown."

The Archangel gurgles unpleasantly, a sound vaguely reminiscent of a laugh. "Were my sister to recommend an artifact for thee, I'd suggest a shovel. That way, I could dig ye a grave!"

Uriel lunges at Hope with frightening speed. Both of her Pseudo-angels fly into the air, getting distance from their creator.

Hope dodges the first spear, but his reflexes aren't fast enough to duck the second. Uriel stabs his stomach with her left-hand spear, then lifts him into the air and slams him into the ground as if he were a hammer.

WARNING, PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR! MODERATE DAMAGE SUSTAIN-

I know!!

Hope's eyes widen. One of Uriel's spears lunges at his mouth as he lies on the ground. He flinches and jerks his head to the side. The spear stabs the ground beside him, rattling his teeth from the force of the blow.

Hope bellows, "PUSH!!"

A wave of energy surges from his body, throwing the Archangel a few feet into the air, just long enough for Hope to press a foot into the dirt and kick away, then backflip off his hands into a standing position.

He wheezes painfully. Uriel's movements are totally different from before! I thought she was a mage-type, but she's a warrior-type too! How can Barbatos's giant body move like that?!

The moment the Archangel hits the ground, she jumps at him again, raising both spears above her head to slam against his body.

"BARRIER!" Hope yells again, creating a wall in front of himself, anything to get a little breathing room. To Hope's surprise, Uriel stabs the wall with a spear and vaults over it, flinging herself into the air like a bat outta hell.

Christ's sake! Did Uriel invent parkour? She's ridiculous!

Uriel falls toward Hope again. This time he steps deftly to the side and slaps Uriel's spear away, catching her off-balance and making her slam onto her shoulder.

"GRAVITY!"

Hope yells again, increasing the gravity around her body by a factor of ten. The Archangel shakes wooziness from her head and climbs to her feet. Her movements slow dramatically.

"Haah... thou art a worthy opponent, little Hero. I applaud thy improvisation skills, at the least."

Hope retreats several steps. "Yeah? Well, you're, uh... really good with spears!"

EXCELLENT RETORT, PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR.

Oh, shut up, Centurion.

Several minutes pass.

The Archangel slowly breathes, as does Hope. Both of them eye each other, sizing up their conditions.

Uriel is the first to break the silence. "When I gaze upon thee, I cannot help but see the mirror image of King Arthur. He was a valiant warrior and the mightiest servant of the gods. Tis' a shame that thou will not change thy mind and abandon thy demonic comrades. Were ye to do so, I could see thy feats eventually eclipsing the Hero King's."

Hope points at the Archangel. "I don't fight because it's my duty or because people tell me I must. I do it because I want to protect those I love. You expect me to commit genocide for a matter unrelated to my life. As long as that is true, I will resist."

"Hmph. Thou mayest think my methods barbaric, but tis' far from the truth. Perhaps ye believe slaughtering trillions of bloodskins to be an unspeakable atrocity?"

Hope nods. "An atrocity. Yeah. That's a pleasant way of phrasing the issue."

"Yet thou dost ignore the billions of humans and angels slaughtered during the Energy Wars. Thy decision is based on ignorance. Undoubtedly, thou must not know the lengths demonkind went to, to eliminate the humans and angels."

Hope shakes his head. "I don't know the details or the number of lives lost, no. It was a war, though. People die during wars. That's why I want to prevent another one. Besides, demons didn't kill us all.

Millions and millions of humans are still alive today. You're proposing something far more extreme than what they did."

Uriel scowls. Her eyes turn into slivers of red beneath her black helmet. "Thou dost believe that the demons did not kill all of thy people, so inevitably, the demons spared humanity out of pity? Nay. The demon leaders were eager to wipe out not only the angels but the humans as well. 'Twas only due to the actions of several key figures that humanity still lives on today."

Uriel continues. "I lived inside this Duke's mind when the great purges occurred. The mind wipes — the cullings. The cowardly human leaders sought out only their own benefits. They sold out the rest of their species to become soul food for the bloodskins. They agreed to imprison their fellow man and woman across a hundred planets. They cozied themselves up inside of ivory towers of riches and opulence and left the other ninety-nine percent of their people to rot under bloodskin rule."

The Archangel lowers her eyes and shakes her head. "Thy people only continue to walk the cosmos because they hold some value for the demon leaders. Souls give demons power. The more of thy people that live, the more power the demons will amass. Thou art little more than food in their eyes. They turn you into spiritual energy so that they can become Lords, Barons, Dukes, and Emperors."

Several moments pass. Hope swallows. "You're talking about... the River Styx."

"Aye. Angels served no purpose to the bloodskins. They killed my people off without batting an eye. The only reason the fiends have yet to rain down upon your pathetic fortress is that they have yet to formulate an efficient method of breaking thy spirit. Eventually, they will. You will all perish, and they will enslave the remnants once more. Is that the future you want?"

Hope hesitates. A thousand questions appear in his mind. "Well... no, but I still don't think you're going about this the right way."

The Archangel nods. "Perhaps not. However, my time is limited. Right now, Barbatos slumbers within me. While he rests, I control his overwhelming power. I must strike a blow, hard and fast, against the filthy bloodskins. I must wipe out their upper ranks, then work my way down. I don't believe I can kill them all, but without leaders, they will present less of a threat to humanity. I must beseech thee to assist me. Failing that... stand aside. Allow me to complete my task at hand."

Hope meets the Archangel's gaze. "You want me to let you go? To allow you to kill them?"

"Aye. Thou need not draw blood, but simply allow me to do so in thy stead. I see the sin trapped within thy gaze. Thou hath done something similar before. Repeat that which ye already know, and soon, the demons will become little more than a faint nightmare in thy past."

"Uriel..." Hope trails off. His throat dries out as he considers her words.

I didn't kill the orcs on Maiura. I only made them kill each other. However, even if I didn't plunge a knife into each one's gut, the result was the same. After everything the demons have done... after all the things Neil has told me... is Uriel correct? Is she right?

Hope relaxes his posture. He aims his mind at Uriel. "Normalize."

The gravity around Uriel returns to normal, and her powers return as well.

"I'm sorry, Uriel. I can't help you. I won't kill if it isn't necessary... but at the same time, I can't deny that you have a point. I'll let you do what you must. Just stay away from my friends. Samantha is not your enemy."

The Archangel evaluates him for a moment. "I apologize, Wordsmith. I misjudged thee. Thou may presently lack some modicum of resolve, but the look of a great Hero rests within thy gaze. As you request, I will accept thy terms. I will not kill Belial, the Second Emperor, unless she gets in my way. However, I have my own request to beg of thee."

"Oh yeah? And what's that?"

Uriel stabs a finger at Hope. "The Temptress of man must be watched by you at all times. She is dangerous, vicious, and a psychopathic monster capable of inflicting incredible harm upon thy resistance. I care not if thou believe she hath turned over a new leaf. I know well the extent of Belial's treachery. Have ye yet witnessed her transformation powers? Her ability to perfectly mimic anyone she wishes?"

"No. I haven't. So, what, Samantha is a shapeshifter or something?"

"Indeed. Belial might be called the Emperor of Passion by her fellow bloodskins, but in my lifetime, we referred to her by another title. The Great Deceiver. Her ability to infiltrate and destroy humans and angels from the inside was unparalleled. The Titans conducted regular drills to determine if she were in their midst. She single-handedly slew hundreds of angels via backstabbing and betrayal."

Uriel stomps toward the human and looms over him. "I will leave the filthy worm alive... but thou must always keep thy gaze trained on her. All bloodskins are equally evil, but some are worse than others."

Hope nods. "Fine. I promise."

"Good," Uriel says with a smile.

Hope turns his back to her and walks a few feet away. The Archangel holds up her hand.

"Wait. I would ask one last favor of thee before ye return to thy people. Thou need not accept if ye find my request troublesome."

Hope tilts his head back. "Oh? What is it?"

"The bloodskins bar entry to Hell Harbor via powerful magic. Beelzebub's attack obliterated Grigori, Diablo's personal Warper. Finding another Keymaster could prove troublesome for me, especially after Beelzebub's attack. Might I trouble thee to open a gate to Hell Harbor via thy Wordsmithing?"

Hope frowns. He pauses for a moment to consider Uriel's request.

"Hell Harbor? I don't know what that place is. I won't be any help."

Uriel touches her chest. "I will provide thee with the planet's location. Use thy magic to search my memories."

"Err... I don't know if I can... do that..." Hope trails off. He turns back to Uriel, a look of curiosity on his face. "...But I suppose I can try."

Several seconds later, the two of them stand two feet apart. Hope presses his hand against the Duke's patchy white and red chest. "Remember."

Immediately, images of an unfamiliar world dance in Hope's mind. Demons and monsters living together in harmony. Beautiful fields, clouds, an off-color sky...

Hope smiles. Found it.

The vision shifts. Hell Harbor vanishes, and something else replaces it.

A different memory. Not something from Barbatos, but a memory from Uriel.

"No, stop. Not that one." Uriel's body twitches. "Don't... don't look at it. Don't look!"

Hope tries to pull away. His body refuses.

"I... I can't! Th-this emotion! It's so raw! It's-"

The world shifts around Hope. Uriel's memory, an awful nightmare from her past, materializes around him physically, almost as if he were living it himself.

A series of words appear in his mind.

The War in Heaven.

Part 073: Face-Off

Recommended Listening.

Winged figures in white robes rush through a narrow, underground passage. Pebbles knock around under their sandals, and small patches of grass poke up to brush their soles. One of them, a woman, stops to grab my arm. "Archangel Uriel! The demons are coming! They're barely twenty seconds behind us!"

I nod, though I don't intend to. I'm experiencing Uriel's memory. It's disorienting, not being in control of my body, but I have no choice except to follow through. I don't know how to leave her consciousness.

Uriel's expression turns grim. "Worry not, sister Hana. Retreat to Heaven's Gate! I'll hold the fiends here."

The woman shakes her head slightly. "I'll stay with thee and render assistance! Tis' impossible to hold them off by thyself! If ye stay here, only death will greet thee!"

Uriel touches her sister's arm. "I am an Archangel. Leave! I need to be alone to demonstrate the fullest extent of my power."

Hana stares at me for two long seconds. The look in her eyes makes my stomach churn. Something about her makes terrible dread fall on my shoulders.

She nods. "Very well, Lady Uriel. Please, fall back to the gate once everyone departs. Take care."

The woman runs past me, her black hair dancing in the stillness of the cavern.

The ground shakes. A few more angels flee to safety behind me. I glance at a puddle on the ground, where ripples of movement bounce around inside. My face, that of a fair woman with white hair and delicate robes, reflects on the surface of the water.

That's me? Uriel?

Her loosely-fitting red gown, earrings, light pink lips, and deep blue eyes make me want to lose myself in her gaze. Uriel's appearance is somehow elegant, yet fierce. She's a warrior first, and a woman, second.

She's stunning.

I look away from the puddle, but only because that's what Uriel's memory commands me to do. I raise both hands to summon four constructs of light.

"Units One and Two, stay at my side. Protect me from any Burrowers. Units Three and Four, guard the gate. Let none slip past."

The faceless constructs nod and jump into position. I recognize the first two as the false angels Uriel summoned to fight me, but the shapes of the other two are far different, resembling tools more than people. Unit Three is a floating orb with circles of energy that spin around and oscillate in various directions. Unit Four is a cube floating in the air. I can't help but wonder why their appearances are so dissimilar from Units One and Two.

Uriel turns to face the entrance. "Wretched bloodskins. There's only one way in, and that's through me. Thou shalt try to bypass me, only to fail and perish."

Thousands of laughs and squeals come roaring around the hallway. I lift my hands again. "Gungnir. Gae Bolg."

Two spears, one red and the other gold, materialize in my hand. The red spear, Gae Bolg, burns with the elemental power of lava. In Uriel's grasp, it becomes a mountain-wrecker, capable of ripping through steel with ease. The other, Gungnir, shines luminously with the power of holy magic. Its purpose is to kill demons, and that's what it does best.

The first ten demons round the corner a hundred feet away and burst out of the darkness. By the looks of them, they consist of a few bladed-arm Scythers, a couple of demon grunts, and a few other types I don't recognize. "Tasty meat! Woman! Get her!!"

"I don't think so," I say. I nod at Unit Two, and two Light Walls appear, barring the path. The demons slam against the first wall and stumble back in surprise. Unit Two slams it down, crushing them into pulp, while maintaining the second wall's position to prevent leakage.

I smile. "First to arrive, first to die."

Uriel's voice is charming and attractive, but also gruff and to the point, even cruel at times. She may look like a princess, but she has the spirit of a warrior.

The rest of the demons leap into view. They stomp through the blood of their fallen comrades, ignoring the fate of those they once considered allies. The ground shifts beneath me, and I hop back lightly, impaling a saggy-skinned demon with Gae Bolg as he leaps at me from below. Gungnir follows its brother, allowing me to bypass his defenses with its holy enchantments. I sever his head and let him drop to the floor.

With a wave of my hand, I manipulate the Earth to seal the hole, then return my attention to the mass of demons before me.

They scrabble and jump and slam against the remaining Light Wall. Over and over, they pound against it. Dozens of strikes per second send electric pain running up my arm and into my heart. The wall, created by Unit Two, is linked directly to my body.

I lift a finger again, and a new Light Wall appears flat across the ceiling. It slams down, pulverizing a hundred demons in the front. Some of them press against it and manage to hold out, but I lift and slam it down again, killing them as well.

"I can keep this up all day," I say, taunting the demons on the other side. "Chokepoints are my specialty. Keep trying to break through! Thy futile actions only serve to amuse me!"

The wall to my left vibrates. Uriel's thoughts appear in my mind as she considers the new threat. Hmm. It seems the demons are about to reach the second layer.

"It's time to get serious, Unit Two. Maintain your wall at the main entrance, and form a second one where the demons emerge next. I'll be on crushing duty. Unit One, keep protecting my backside.

A drop of sweat slides down my face.

"My family members need not worry," I murmur. "I'll kill anyone who threatens them."

The wall explodes outward. A massive troll jumps through, along with hundreds of other, smaller demons. The mass of small demons tries to enter, but the appearance of another Light Wall stymies their efforts, leaving only the giant, twelve-foot troll to face me.

The monster lifts his massive claws above his head and swings them down, intending to crush Unit Two. I leap at him and deflect his fist away with Gungnir. The thin metal pole seems like it should lack striking power, but its density is much higher than its size implies. I easily parry with Gungnir and drive Gae Bolg into the monster's stomach, wrenching hard to tear a hole through his gut.

The troll bellows. "GROOOOAAAR!!" It ignores the pain and backhands me. I flinch, expecting some severe pain, only for the troll's hand to freeze for a moment. A glance to my side reveals Unit Four, the cube, spinning and revolving rapidly in midair. The monster flinches, then falls forward and slams into the ground far harder than I expected, shaking the cavern. I don't hesitate. While it lies on the ground, I impale Gae Bolg into the monster's skull and scorch the fiend's head into mulch with the power of lava.

Minutes pass. Another hole forms as the shriveled monsters and demons tear through the walls. I place a pre-emptive Light Wall to block the new hole, but between myself and Unit Two, we can only form four walls at once, and we're already using three.

I glance back through the hallway behind me. "Units One and Two, on my mark, drop the walls and fall back. Let's hold them off in the next hallway. Camael's enchanted iron surrounds Heaven's Gate. They won't be able to dig through it."

The two constructs nod. As soon as I give the signal, the three of us retreat to the final chokepoint and form a new wall. A smile spreads across my face. "Camael formed these walls herself and enchanted them with Holy Magic. Any devil stupid enough to try and claw through will suffer a painful reminder of why Angels are their masters."

This time, when the demons slam against the first Light Wall, no others dig through the ceiling or floor. After all, they can't.

Minutes pass. I continue to slam down walls and crush the demons as they repeatedly rush to their doom.

"Imbeciles. The definition of stupidity is doing the same thing over and over, expecting a different outcome. My barriers will never falter! Thy advance stops here!"

The circular gate behind me glows blue from the power of transportation magic. A flash of light makes me turn to see what's happening — a single angel steps through, one I recognize immediately.

"Michael? Why hath thou come?"

My white-haired brother stares at me for a moment while rubbing his stubble. "I've received word from Zeus. Fall back. We're going to deactivate the gate. The demons will not be able to reactivate it."

"No! Don't be foolish. I'll hold them off forever if need be. Once the demons take over the entrance to Heaven, we won't have a path back to Earth!"

"We can always make another portal. Come, sister. Let's return."

"Michael, are you daft?" I glance back at the demons before me and slam another wall down, crushing more of them. "I have this under control! If we retreat, the energy we need to make a new portal will cost an incalculable number of lives! I won't accept a loss of that magnitude!"

When I return my gaze to him, Michael's shoulders sag. "Damn. Why won't you follow orders? I'm trying to help you."

The Archangel of Courage gazes at me with the eyes of a stranger. Uriel's thoughts turn suspicious. Something isn't right? Why is Michael acting in such a selfish manner?

Immediately, my thoughts turn to the angel from earlier, Hana. Her expression when she left was identical to Michael's. It's almost as if-

Michael dashes at me. My heart flutters. Adrenaline takes over. "M-Michael? GUHK!!"

His hand transforms into five knives. Before I can react, he pierces my heart and lunges with a swift, precise impaling motion. He grabs me by the throat with his other hand and slams me against the ground, knocking the wind out of me. My constructs quickly move to attack him, but Michael releases his grip on my throat, and that hand becomes a long, stretchy sword. It zips around, slashing and cutting apart each construct like a finger flowing through a brook.

My constructs fall to pieces. Unit Two lasts the longest by creating a light wall, but in the end, even she turns into scattered particles as well.

The demons outside stop their frenzied attacks. They slowly enter the chamber, and their grins beat down on me.

Michael's hand wriggles inside my chest, cutting me even more. I stare in horror as his face, that of a brother I love more than life itself, transforms into... something else. Red skin replaces white. His hair lengthens. His clothing morphs into strips of fabric that barely cover a bulging female chest.

Uriel's thoughts play in my head. Michael is... a demon?! Who is she? Why can she transform into my brother?!

The demoness pulls her hand out. "You left me no choice. I won't kill you, though. My husband has business with you."

"Huh... huh... hus...band?" My body trembles. The gazes of several demons swoop up and down, examining every piece of me.

"Satan. The leader of the demons. I apologize, but it didn't have to end this way."

The woman raises her head to two nearby demons. "Artorias. Come here."

"Aye," A demon adorned in bones says. War paint decorates his body, giving him the appearance of a savage beast. His hawk-like eyes, capable of boring through steel, meet Belial's without a trace of humility. He looks upon the Emperor of Passion as an equal, a fellow general in the army of demons.

"You're in charge of the Archangel. Keep an eye on her. If she moves, stop her. No killing. Satan wants her alive."

More demons creep through the hallway. They grimace when they touch the holy-magic imbued floor, but one of the demons motions with his hands to send dirt spraying out, covering it so he and the others can walk on it safely. Only Artorias ignores the agony coursing through his feet.

The Demon Baron nods. "I won't allow the Archangel to move an inch."

The woman, Samantha, rises to her feet. To my horror, her body changes again. She assumes my form, matching my hair, eyes, skin, clothes, and everything else. She holds up a hand. "I'm going in to help Berith secure the gate. Wait for the signal."

Artorias smiles, an expression of malice mixed with confidence. "Stick to the plan, and the pathetic little birds will fall today."

Samantha turns and steps through the portal. I can't see what's happening on the other side, given it isn't transparent like the ones in the Labyrinth Core. However, I know that whatever Samantha is about to do, it will go down in the history books as a heinous act of backstabbing and treachery.

Several demons walk up and loom over me. One of them punches his palm. "Hey, cutie. You killed a lot of my brothers. Think I'll let'cha off easy? Until Belial gives the signal, you're all ours. Always wondered what it'd be like to have an angel-"

"You won't touch her," Artorias says, a warning tone in his voice. The tall, muscular witch doctor rubs his palms together. "Anyone who so much as eyeballs this Archangel with a bad intention will end up buried fifty feet inside the mountain. I'm only warning you once."

The first demon scoffs. "Hey! The hell?! I just wanna have a taste; not even a bite. I bet this pretty lady hates demons 'cause she ain't ever been with one. I'll turn her into our little toy. Like a puppet, I'll move her mouth with my hand."

A smaller demon dressed in rags and a multi-pocketed belt saddles up beside the first. "Neugh! If you want her, you gotta go through me'n my brother first!" His shrill, nasally voice makes my ears ring.

"You heard my brother," Artorias says, continuing to eye the demon from before with a death-glare. "Leave."

The young demon hesitates, but eventually relents and takes a few steps back. "Tch. Always playin' by the rules, Baron of Earthquakes."

Artorias doesn't respond. He stares the other demon down for several seconds until the latter loses his nerve.

I cough. "S-saving my... kah... my life... won't indebt me to-"

"I didn't save your life, Archangel," Artorias says with a smirk. "Satan wants you alive, and that is what he'll get. You'll soon wish for death over whatever horrors the First Emperor has in mind."

The agony in my chest slowly hurts less and less. Uriel doesn't move a muscle, instead closing her eyes and sending healing energy to her heart, regenerating it slowly.

Uriel thinks to herself again, and I hear her thoughts. If I heal quickly, I can deactivate Heaven's Gate! That will at least protect my brothers and sisters. I don't care what happens to me after that.

I want to smile, but I can't. Uriel is strong. Even with demons towering over her and the threat of unspeakable acts being committed against her helpless, weakened body, she still wishes to fight.

Suddenly, the portal shifts. A white-haired angel's head flies through, detached from its body. The man's face, frozen in horror and shock, echoes the fate of many to come. It slaps onto the ground with a squishy splat.

"That's the signal!" Artorias yells, jabbing his finger toward the gate. "CHARGE!"

All the demons rush past, screaming and cackling. Their bodies transform into a sea of red as they dash through the portal at astonishing speeds.

Artorias grabs my arm and drags me off to the side, then tosses me against the wall. He frowns and stares at my chest. "Oh? Regenerating, are you? Not on my watch."

He weaves a hand sign, and a stone knife appears in his grasp. He lunges it into my heart, sending blinding pain through my mind. Then, he shatters my elbows and knees, making movement impossible. Surprisingly, I don't make a sound. Tears pour down Uriel's face, but she refuses to scream.

Barbatos, a thin, gangly little creature, skulks over to me. His long tongue flicks out. "Heh, she looks tasty, Artorias." His eyes dilate as they follow the blood spilling from my body.

"Don't get any ideas," The older brother says. "Satan forbade us from consuming angels. You know the rule."

Barbatos glares daggers at Artorias. "Yeah? Why should I care? You know what they say about Satan! He's a devil-damned traitor! A selfish, stuck-up glory hog who abandoned us for millennia!"

Artorias sighs. "Satan had his reasons. I do not question the First Emperor; I merely obey."

Barbatos rolls his eyes. "Oh, geez, what a surprise! My brother, the kiss-ass! Use your head, bro! Why do you think Satan wants this bitch alive? He's gonna swallow her and take all her powers for himself!"

"No. I'm sure he wants to question her or something. Stop spinning wild tales. Your delusions never cease to embarrass me."

Artorias looks over at the cavern's entrance. The demons flooding through barely give the two guards and their prisoner a sideways glance. Those in the rear ranks don't even notice her status as an Archangel.

Barbatos leans down. He slowly rubs my thigh, caressing his hand up and down. I try to cough out a weak protest, but the pain is so blinding I can barely think, let alone speak. I've never felt so vulnerable in my life.

"Come on, Artorias! Just one taste! That's all! I promise!"

Artorias frowns. "Stop that. Don't piss me off."

The little demon jumps to his feet. "Nyeh! I see how it is! You plan to watch over this bitch and get a promotion again! All you do is suck up to the Emperors! Just once, why not try'n do your own thing?! If we eat the Archangel, we'll be the new Emperors! We'll be so powerful that nothin' can stop us!!"

Artorias grits his teeth together. His hand lashes out so fast I can barely follow it with my eyes. He backhands Barbatos and sends the little runt slamming against the wall. Barbatos bounces off the enchanted steel like a ping-pong ball before crashing to the ground, sputtering and coughing.

"Damn you, Barbatos! I can't stand your unceasing lust for power and lack of discipline! Think, imbecile! Archangels are the embodiment of holy energy! If you eat her, you'll-!"

Barbatos leaps to his feet, fury etched into his face. He pounces at Artorias like a feral tiger and headbutts the Baron, knocking him backward and interrupting Artorias's lecture. "Screw you! I'm sick of this! I'm sick of you! Of rules! The Archangel is MINE!"

Uriel's eyes widen in astonishment. Barbatos's body begins to bulk up. His scrawny little arms increase in size as they rapidly add muscle mass.

What follows is a fight between two brothers. Artorias, a Baron one full rank higher than Barbatos, begins furiously defending as Barbatos unleashes a hellish fury exceeding his limits. The little Lord charges his elder brother, who, surprisingly, seems unable to do much in retaliation.

Barbatos's fist strikes Artorias's jaw, sending the Baron of Earthquakes flying. He crashes against the wall some thirty feet away, twists in midair, and lands in a crouched position. Artorias motions with his hands to try and summon his magic, but a look of anger rapidly spreads across his face instead. "Gah! Accursed angel-metal! I can't use my magic!"

I don't know what type of magic he's trying to use, but Barbatos does. The little brother laughs like a hyena. "Nyehehe! Not so tough now! I'm done having you tell me what to do! Pissing me off when you ain't got any dirt to fling was a big mistake, moron!"

Barbatos charges Artorias like an enraged bull. Despite Artorias's superior demonic ranking and physique, against his berserk little brother, all he can do is defend passively.

Suddenly, shards of metal leap out of a pouch wrapped around Barbatos's waist. They spin around in the air, guided by the Lord's magic, and rush toward Artorias. The Baron of Earthquakes gasps in surprise as several of them impale his feet, pinning him in place. A second group splits apart clamps onto his wrists, and wrenches his arms behind his back. They magnetically attach, forming crude, makeshift handcuffs.

Defenseless, and unable to move, Artorias can only stand in place and take a beating as Barbatos punches, kicks, and batters his older brother from side to side. With one final hurrah, Barbatos pounds Artorias's head, ripping his feet off the ground and sending him hurtling to the side. Artorias lands in a head not far from me. His body seizes for a moment, then falls still.

Barbatos's long, spindly tongue snakes out of his mouth. "Nyehehe! I won! I beat you, fair and square!"

His eyes flick to me. A bolt of terror shoots through my heart as the Lord's bloodlust strikes my very soul. He dashes over to me, lunges his hand down, and grabs me by the neck.

"Nobody's gonna save you now! Stupid angel bitch! Nyehehehe!"

The last thing I see is his maw rushing at my face.

Everything goes black.

The pain I expected doesn't appear. Instead, I fall into a bottomless abyss. Death. Emptiness. The Void.

Tears fall down my face. Uriel's voice speaks in my mind. I died to a pathetic little Lord. Maybe even a grunt. How shameful. I failed everyone. I let my guard down, and the bloodskins tore me apart for it. Now my family will suffer because of my weakness.

I hate the bloodskins. I hate them all.

But... I hate myself more. For being weak. For trusting in a familiar face.

I... hate...

Suddenly, the world changes. Once again, I appear in the chamber that leads to Heaven's Gate.

But something is different.

It's wrong.

Two red claws hover over my head — demon claws.

They lower and press against my face. Barbatos's shrill voice speaks again.

"Aaaaoooo!!! OH, sweet devils!! Ahh, it burns! It aches! My stomach, it's... it's on fire!! Gwaaaahh!!!"

I roll around randomly, from left to right, grabbing and rubbing every part of my body. The smell of melting flesh floods the air.

Artorias grunts. "Barbatos... you dense... imbecile..."

I hear the sound of metal snapping. A moment later, Artorias's face appears above me as I roll on the ground. The look of resignation on his face tells me everything I need to know.

"Stupid, stupid... your skin is turning white. You won't last much longer. I told you... I warned you!"

My voice comes out again, but it's much more pitiful. "Ahh... kill... me. Hurts. Wrong. I was wrong. Art...or...ias... big brother..."

Several moments pass. My grip begins to lessen. I can feel my mind slipping. That is, Uriel's mind, but also Barbatos's. They've merged.

Uriel's confusion dissipates. Suddenly, her mind snaps back to reality. Barbatos's soul loses partial control of his body, allowing the Archangel to take over.

"Ha... haha! Yes... this is it! My chance! You foolish bloodskins... haha..."

Stop! Get out of my head! Barbatos's inner voice yells. A hint of frantic terror tinges his tone. T-this is my body! Mine!

Not anymore... haha... hahaha... Uriel laughs wickedly. Thou didst bite off more than ye were capable of chewing, worm. Now... suffer the consequences!

Barbatos's arm jerks around erratically, waving from left to right. The little Lord desperately tries to fight off Uriel as she takes over more and more of his body, but compared to the vast ocean of the Archangel's soul, his is little more than a puddle in a desert.

"Broth... brother... she's t-taking... taking over... I can't win... sorry... sorry... kill me... kill me..."

Tears roll down Barbatos's face as he struggles to spit out a warning to his brother. Immediately, Artorias's gaze darkens.

"Damn you. You couldn't just listen, could you? I... I only have one choice."

The older brother weaves signs with his hands. "I'm going to put all of my energy into you. My soul. That's... that's the only way. It's all I can think of. I have to counter the holy power inside your body somehow."

He looks back at the flood of demons passing through, but whatever he searches for, he doesn't find it.

"Kill... me... kill... me..."

"I won't. Stay strong, Barbatos. I'll get you out of this. Your big brother is here for you. I'll never abandon you. Especially not to some damned Archangel's wrath!"

With his arms still bound behind his back by Barbatos's magnetized shackles, Artorias can only slide over to me and press his face against my chest. Immediately, Uriel's takeover begins to falter.

"No. Stay out," The Archangel gasps. "I must take over. Leave! Don't help him! Let Barbatos become mine."

Artorias winces. He closes his eyes and concentrates with all his might. "Damn you, Archangel. I won't retreat. Barbatos is my brother. I love him more than life itself!"

Artorias wheezes and gasps. Sweat pours from his brow onto my chest like a showerhead. His breathing slows as he pours more and more of his soul into Barbatos's chest.

"Damn you... Barbatos. Why... couldn't... you listen-"

Artorias's words come to an abrupt end mid-sentence. He flops to the ground lifelessly.

A minute passes. Two. Three.

Suddenly, Artorias speaks, but within my mind. Barbatos's mind. Our mind.

"I'm... alive?"

Barbatos releases a gasp. He flops onto his back, and our vision turns to the dead Archangel beside us.

Her face is missing.

"Hahh?!" A noise jumps out of my mouth, but it isn't English. I stumble away from the demon-angel hybrid and fall on my ass.

I'm back in the crater. In reality.

Uriel's body sags. She falls to her knees and stares at the ground.

"No... no... those horrible memories..."

Barbatos's husky voice doesn't match the beautiful siren song I heard in the vision. It isn't Uriel's... but she has to use it.

"I'm sorry. It was unintentional."

The massive demon fixates his blood-red eyes on the ground. He shakes his head. "Quiet... Artorias. Thou hath no right to speak."

It takes me a moment to understand her words. "Artorias. Can you hear him? In your thoughts?"

She tilts her head slightly. A nod. "All three of us live in the same mind, but only Barbatos controls the body. I take over when he slumbers. That's how it's always worked."

Chills go down my spine. "Barbatos killed you. He... he tore off your face."

"He did."

"You're trapped inside of your murderer."

"I am."

Moments pass. My body begins to shake.

"That's awful. Horrible. Nauseating. I can't believe it. You had to watch all those years... you had to see..."

Uriel raises her head. Barbatos's head. Tears flow from her blood-red eyes. "The bloodskins tore my people apart. I could only stare, unable to intervene. For all his talk of peace and harmony of late, Barbatos did nothing to stop the bloodshed. That's why... that's why... I must..."

"Avenge them."

"Yes."

The two of us meet each other's gaze.

"Hero. Albeit unwittingly, thou hath seen my history. My sins. Will thou accept my plea? Will thou summon a portal to Hell Harbor?"

Uriel's plea requires all my mental fortitude not to weep like a baby.

Slowly, I nod. "Yes. Of course."

We both rise to our feet. I gaze at the huge, monstrous demon standing before me, but instead see something else in its place. A tortured woman. A prisoner. She lost everything that mattered to her. Her friends, family, and even her freedom. Trapped in the body of her tormentor, she only has a short time left before he reawakens.

She has a job to do. I'll help her however I can.

I aim my mind at her. "Heal. Restore. Energy."

Uriel stares at me silently for a moment, then balls her hand into a fist. "I thank thee. I see now why thy name is Hope. Long has it been since I met someone as compassionate and forgiving as thee."

"There's no need to thank me. I'm a Hero. It's the least I can do."

The Archangel chuckles. "Heh... thou art a better Hero than many others. Thou deserveth the title. I know not what dangers await, but verily, thou shalt overcome them."

I bow and smile at her. "Thank you. I think you're a beautiful, stunning, strong woman. I'm sorry you've lived such a hellish life."

"As am I."

Uriel gestures to the air. I inhale and force myself to remember the images and pictures she showed me of Hell Harbor.

Centurion blares in my mind. PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR, CENTURION IS ABLE TO INTERFACE WITH YOUR NEURAL PATHWAYS TO ASSIST IN THOUGHT RETENTION. WOULD YOU LIKE TO ENABLE MY ASSISTANCE?

I speak to the air between myself and Uriel. "Portal!"

The air trembles for a moment before tearing in half and allowing a circular rip in space to appear. Several dozen demons on the other side spot the Archangel and I. They scream and run away, but I can't hear their words.

Uriel forms two spears of light once again. "I owe thee a debt, Hero. Thou hath done a great service today. Not only for me, but for the long-dead angels, and humanity as well. I will do my best to ensure thy name ends up in the history books."

"It's the least I can do. Give 'em hell, Uriel."

She stares at me for a moment, then leaps into the portal. After a moment, I see her walk around to my side so we can see each other. Her two constructs jump through as well, and I close the portal behind her.

Maybe I should have gone with her.

I don't know. Should I? I could have helped a lot.

...No. My body is still weak from the cancer cells. It's best I return to the Core. I gave Uriel nearly all of my energy. It'll have to do.

I speak again to the air. "Return."

Part 074: Rip And Tear

Dozens of demons walk around us in the entrance to Hell Harbor. Several Barons line up, ready to fight against that evil woman, the Archangel Uriel, but there's a feeling of dread in the air. Everyone is on edge.

I poke the big demon beside me. "Mister Bael, sir? Why are we waiting?"

It takes him a moment to look down at me. "Oh. Sorry, cutie, but we can't. Not till Ose 'n Belial get here."

"But Mister Beelzebub went in there all alone! We have to hurry and help him!"

Mephisto slithers over to me. His bony fingers stretch out and rest on my shoulder. "Beelzebub isss a fool for going againssst the Archangel alone. Our oddsss of defeating Uriel with all the Dukesss and Emperorsss is assstoundingly low. The leassst effective method of defeating her isss to fight her all by ourssselvesss."

Bael rolls his eyes. "Yeah, well, things would be different if the boss were here. He knocked her out with one punch last time they tussled. Without him, looks like I'll hafta do the heavy lifting. If Beelzebub runs out and gets 'imself killed, it proves he's thicker than me."

"What?! No way! Mister Beelzebub can't die! He can regenerate from anything! You crushed his head into pieces, and he still came back!"

"Yeah. Maybe that's true. But I didn't have Holy Energy. Uriel does. No tellin' what that'll do to 'im."

"Holy Energy? What's that...?"

Mephisto rubs his bony fingers together. His voice hisses like ice. "A corrosssive power usssed by the angelsss. Pray it never ssstrikesss you. It will melt the flesssh from your bonesss and cripple your nervousss system. Your pain will be endlesss until the moment you expire."

"Oh... okay."

I start pacing back and forth. Dozens of thoughts swirl in my head. Geez! How can anyone say Mister Beelzebub died? He's fine! I bet he beat that angel all by himself! He's strong, and good-looking, and smart, and cunning, and good-looking, and wise... he can take out an Archangel by himself! Sure he can! He even beat that stupid human and made it look easy! Mister Beelzebub is amaz-

Whoomph.

A rushing of air catches my attention. I turn to the middle of the building's floor and stare at a portal that's appeared. To my surprise, there's a human standing on the other side. I immediately recognize him as the Hero who fought and defeated Beelzebub only a few months ago.

Suddenly, a massive red and white-skinned figure leaps out of the portal and rises to his full height. My eyes widen in horror.

"I-it's Mister Barbatos! I mean, Uriel!"

Several demons nearby leap away in fear. Two winged angels spring out beside her, and the portal closes a moment later. Bael and Mephisto turn to look, only to immediately jump into a defensive position.

"Shit! She made it inside?! What scum-sucking turncoat gave her the key to Hell Harbor?!"

Mephisto yanks out a translucent dagger. "That doesssn't matter! Everyone, get ready! We mussst-"

Before Mephisto can finish speaking, one of the two angels next to Uriel leaps into the air. Its face changes into a hollow hole, and an instant later, bolts of light shoot out, lasering through the heads of several nearby demons. I stumble back in surprise and scramble to get away, as the sounds of chaos erupt around me. Several Barons fall to the ground, dead, in a matter of seconds.

"Rosalia! Get out of here!" Bael bellows. He uncoils a massive chain from around his body and flings it at the angel in the air. I rush to the exit, only for a bigger demon to smash into me and knock me to the side. He tears out the door, screaming in terror, as do several monsters and other creatures.

"Graaah!" Bael jumps at the Archangel and swings his giant flail down. Uriel dodges it, moving too fast for my eyes to follow. The spiked-ball slams into the ground, rattling the building and sending a shockwave throughout its foundations. Tiles fall from the ceiling and crash against the floor, exploding into dust on arrival.

The Archangel laughs wickedly, her voice identical to Mister Barbatos's. "Bahaha! Puny little demons! Tremble before the might of Heaven! Bow before the Creator's judgment!"

"Screw that!" Bael howls. He yanks on his flail's chain and swings it in a wide arc. It passes through Mephisto harmlessly and impacts the Archangel, but stops short upon hitting an invisible barrier. Shockwaves from the impact ripple outward, rattling my teeth and chest. I climb to my feet and toward the exit, but pause and linger outside the door to watch.

"Thou art merely delaying thy death," The Archangel says. "Move with haste and join thy comrade in death's embrace! Today is the day thy filth vanishes from the universe!"

"My comrade?" Bael pauses. He narrows his eyes. "Beelzebub? What did you do to him?!"

An evil look appears in Uriel's eyes. "Nothing. The buffoon blew himself up. My body remained unharmed, rendering his trump card worthless!"

"Even for Beelzebub, that's reckless. Damn him." Bael yanks his flail back and catches it in his hand. "You're many things, but a liar ain't one."

"Angels are the agents of perfection, justice, and cleansing," Uriel says, raising one of her two spears of light. "When I make a promise, I keep it. Dost thee remember my words when last I appeared, Bael?"

The Duke of Pain slowly starts to spin his flail around. "How could I forget? You went out screaming like a little bitch. 'I'll return and kill all of you! Nyeh nyeh nyeh.' You've got a way with words."

The weapon picks up speed in his hand, creating a vortex. The wind slowly rotates around the room at first, but rapidly transforms into a hurricane engulfing the entire building. Chunks of the roof tear off and enter the makeshift tornado, turning into battering rams as they careen around the portal facility and smash against the walls.

Uriel narrows her eyes. "Pah. Dost thee intend to blow me away? A stiff breeze will do nothing against the might of the Archangel of Retribution!"

I glance toward Mephisto, only to realize he's disappeared. A moment later, Uriel shrieks in pain and swats at her back. Mephisto hops away, clutching his transparent knife. He glowers at her. "Now!"

Bael releases his flail. It flies at the Archangel like a mudshark rushing toward its prey. Uriel barely has a moment to glance at its spiked head before it smashes into her face and pounds her through the building's wall. The shock from the impact blasts the portal facility to smithereens, sending debris flying in every direction. I go flying, unable to grab onto something to save myself.

Crack.

I hit the ground violently, and the world turns dark.

Aaaoo... My head hurts.

A few moments pass as I get my bearings. The sounds of a terrific battle not far away make me look toward where the Harbor Annex used to stand. Only a few pieces of metal, tiling, and wood remain, along with the heavily reinforced warp-gates in a semi-circle.

Blood pours from wounds at Uriel's sides. Several undead creatures leap at the Archangel and her two faceless angels. She spins and twirls her spears around, eviscerating them three at a time like an expert in undead butchery. Mephisto hovers in the air twenty feet above, weaving sign after sign frantically.

While Bael rushes the Archangel and slams against her barriers over and over, ravenous creatures leap from the ground and tear at Uriel with huge claws. They look like a cross between hellhounds and demons, but undead. I don't know what they are. I've never seen them before!

"These abominations stand no chance against the Creator's might!" Uriel laughs. She stabs one of the monsters through its head and flings it into the air toward Mephisto. It passes through him harmlessly, but he still pauses his hand motions for a moment and shakes his head.

"Your ssslaughter of my people endsss here, you winged hag!" Mephisto yells.

"Gahhh!!" Bael stumbles back as one of Uriel's constructs hits him in the face with its shield, then stabs him with a sword of light through his stomach. The faceless angel wrenches its weapon in the Duke's chest, drawing blood. Bael swats its head and pounds it to pieces with a single blow, but Uriel reforms it a moment later with her magic.

The Duke of Pain takes a moment to recover and clutches his wound. "Give us back Barbatos, you dirty pig!"

"I'd sooner die," The Archangel replies coldly. She claps her hands together, and a gust of wind explodes from her skin, blowing away Bael and all of Mephisto's undead creatures. Before anyone can recover, she weaves several signs, summoning two new constructs in the mayhem. One of them is shaped like a cube, while the other is an orb of light with energy spinning around it.

The cube rapidly begins to spin and swirl in random directions. My body increases in weight, and I slam to my knees. A moment later, all my strength gives out, and I fall flat on my face. The force of a building presses against my back, threatening to turn me into a puddle of blood.

I can barely see what's happening. Out of the corner of my eye, I spot the orb trembling. A hail of fireballs blasts out of it, flies up into the sky, and slams into the ground, exploding like bombs and pulverizing dirt into mulch.

Bael howls in pain. "Aaaugh!"

I twitch my head just enough to spot him lying in a pool of blood. The fire scorches the ground but doesn't appear to burn him.

What happened?!

After a moment, the Duke of Pain jumps to his feet. He slips in the mud and nearly falls, but manages to keep it together. How he's able to stand escapes me. I'm going to turn into mush in seconds. Everything hurts!!

He inhales, and strength returns to his body. "Alright. I've had it. Enough is enough. I ain't holding back anymore."

Bael's bones begin to morph and shift. His horns increase in length and bend around to face forward like two spears of bone. His muscles triple in size, as does the rest of his body. His back splits apart, allowing scorching flames to pour from the gap.

Every second that passes increases the strain on my delicate feminine frame. My vision starts to darken. The stress on my brain... is... too much.

Suddenly, the pressure vanishes. I take a breath reflexively and wince in pain from all my fractured ribs.

A monstrous howl makes me flinch in fright. "GROOOOAR!!"

I jump to my feet and hide behind a pillar. Bael stands fifteen feet tall now and towers over the tiny little Archangel. She looks like an imp compared to his monstrous size. Black wings sprout from his back, and fire engulfs his skin.

"The Balrog form? Haha... Thou art desperate, little Duke."

Uriel jumps back and forms a barrier barely in the nick of time. Bael bangs his fist against her invisible wall with ten times the power from before. Her constructs go flying from the force of the impact, and the wall shatters into a thousand fragments. He snatches his flail and swings it so fast I can't even see it move.

It smashes against the Archangel and sends her sprawling across the ground. She rolls and flips through the dirt, yet somehow leaps into a standing position and lands unharmed.

Uriel's four summoned creations try to reform, but Bael is too fast. He leaps at the cube and crushes it in his giant palm. "PUNY LITTLE ANGELS! DIE! DIE! CRUSH TO DUST!!"

Uriel's smarmy attitude vanishes. "What in Heaven's name?!" She forms another barrier, but Bael tears through it like it's made of paper. He grabs the Archangel and slams her into the ground over and over, treating her like a wet rag that needs the water beaten out of it. Uriel tries to break free of the Balrog's grasp, but his grip proves inescapable.

One of her angels opens its face and fires bolts of Holy Energy at the rampaging monster. Bael ignores the construct as if it isn't even there. He continues slamming the Archangel against the ground without stopping. "POUND! POUND! DIE! DIE!"

Mephisto watches from the air. Despite Bael's onslaught, Mephisto's expression turns grim. "Bael! You mussst control yourssself! Don't lossse yourssself to rage!"

"SHUT UP! STUPID GHOST! USELESS IDIOT! GROOOARR!!" Bael opens his mouth and blasts a wave of heat at the Duke of Mist. Mephisto flinches, and to my shock, the fire scorches his bones and burns away the rags covering his body. Mephisto falls and hits the ground with a sickening crunch.

I thought nobody could hurt Mephisto! How did Bael-?!

The Balrog continues to pound and smash the Archangel. He eventually holds her up, inhales, and unleashes a massive wave of fire upon her unmoving form.

Uriel doesn't scream. She hangs limply in the monster's grasp as the flames engulf her.

A moment later, Bael grows bored of his unmoving prey. He drops Uriel, then turns his attention to her three remaining constructs. A few seconds later, they explode into fragments as he tears them apart.

My heart trembles. W-we did it! We won! But... why is there this sickening feeling in my stomach?

Immediately, I realize why. Bael aims his head at a village barely visible in the distance and inhales deeply. He spits a ball of flame as big as his head toward the local settlement, decimating several structures in the area and killing Devil knows how many demons and humans.

He's a loose cannon!

I quickly run over, terror in my heart. "Mister Bael! You have to stop! Don't attack other demons!"

Bael whirls around to roar at me. "TINY WOMAN! YOU NO SCARE ME!"

He inhales again. I jump to the side and roll, then run as fast as I can, circling the Balrog. Bael unleashes a wave of fire, spinning to face me as he tries to cook me to a crisp. I roll underneath him and dive into a crater, making myself as small as possible.

The sounds of Bael's flames cease. "WHERE GO?! YOU HIDE, ME FIND!"

After a moment, the Balrog gives up. He forgets about me entirely and turns his attention to the Archangel again. I peek over the crater and watch as he picks her up by the head. "NOT SO BIG NOW!

WEAK ANGEL! PATHETIC!"

Uriel coughs. "B-Bael... it's me... Barbatos. You did it... you beat her. You won. I'm back."

Bael narrows his eyes. "BARBATOS? THAT YOU?"

"Yes... you won. You can... revert now..."

"No! Bael!" Mephisto jumps to his feet. His entire body is only a skeleton without any clothes to cover him. "It'sss a trick! Don't fall for it!"

Bael turns and glowers at the Duke of Mist. "YOU SHUT UP! ME NO LIKE YOU! LITTLE BONEY MAN!"

Uriel's armor, what little she wears, has melted to slag on her hands and feet. I can barely make out a smile underneath her melted helmet. "Bael, Mephisto is your enemy. You have to fight him..."

"FIGHT? BONEY?"

"Yes. Fight Boney. He... he thinks thy demonhood is tiny."

"WHAT?! THAT BASTARD!" Bael flings Uriel against the ground. Several of her bones snap, but she doesn't try to retaliate. Instead, she watches as Bael turns his attention toward the Duke of Mist. "I NEVER LIKED YOU! LITTLE RUNT! NOT FIT TO BE DUKE!"

Mephisto shakes his head. "Oh, for devil'sss sssake..."

The Balrog leaps away from Uriel and slams his fist into the dirt where Mephisto stands. Before he can land his punch, the aetherial Duke floats underground, leaving the Balrog to tear the soil apart while he searches for his prey.

While both Dukes battle, all I can do is hang back and stare in horror.

I can't help.

I'm too weak.

Mister Beelzebub always said so. He called me useless. He called me ugly.

He didn't mean that, did he? Am I useless? I can't walk ten feet without tripping. I can't muster anything beyond the weakest healing magic.

Mister Beelzebub was right. I'm incompetent. All I can do is watch while the remainder of the Council battles against an ancient Goddess for our right to survive.

What purpose do I serve anymore? Without Mister Beelzebub... I'm nothing.

Why? Why did he have to die?

No. That's not right. Uriel said he blew himself up. He must have detonated every cell in his body. He did it, hoping to kill her. It was a brave sacrifice. I know Mister Beelzebub. He would never allow this Archangel to beat him. No matter what, he'd stand up for himself and put his pride on the line.

I cautiously rise to my feet and peer over the crater's edge. Uriel weaves water around herself. Her bloody wounds and broken bones quickly mend. It doesn't take long before she finishes healing herself and cracks her neck. Bael continues to pound and tear at the ground while trying to get to Mephisto. He doesn't see her weaving hand signs again.

She's going to attack him!

I quickly jump over the edge, run up to the massive demon-angel hybrid, and leap at her back.

Something hits me. I don't know what, but it hurts. My vision turns spotty. I hit the dirt, hard.

A voice speaks. "Cannon fodder. How bold for a bloodskin as weak as thee to enter this battlefield. Allow me to grant ye a quick death!"

I open my eyes and blink back tears. Ice rips through my veins as I spot Uriel standing over me, her palm aimed at my face. A ball of light forms in her grasp. "If only thou had fled with the rest of the vermin, ye might have survived today's battle. Now, thou shalt die."

I can't move. I'm scared! Oh devils, what have I done?!

My body shakes uncontrollably. The Archangel smiles. Her blood-red eyes stare into my soul.

Suddenly, Bael appears. He grabs the Archangel and crushes her in his grip, then flings her away, out toward the sea. I follow her with my eyes until she impacts the water. A small tidal wave rushes toward the coast and splashes against the seawall.

The Balrog stares toward the ocean. "That won't be enough to end Uriel's rampage — still, thanks for the distraction. I needed the Archangel to take her eyes off Bael for a moment. You saved me the trouble."

Bael's gravelly voice sounds far more composed than usual.

What the heck?!

"Bael? Is that you?"

He glances down at me. "No. I'm currently possessing the Duke's body. I thought it would be a good way to surprise the Archangel. Luckily, his intelligence drops to negative-three in his Balrog form, so possessing him becomes a simple matter."

"Possessing him? Who are you? Why are you controlling Mister Bael?"

Bael sighs. "I'm Ose. The new Third Emperor. Controlling my subjects is my right, don't you know? Mephisto! Come out!"

Mephisto peeps out of the ground. "Bael?"

"No. Ose. I'm manipulating the dumb one's mind. My physical form is on that mountaintop over there, about fifteen miles away." Ose swings Bael's huge arm to point off in the distance opposite the ocean.

"Oh. Wonderful. Ssso glad you could join usss. What took you ssso long?!"

"The messenger only told me to meet up at Hell Harbor five minutes ago. Luckily, I can travel quickly anywhere I please. Oh. She's back."

A massive wall of water rushes at us. I shriek in fright, but Ose slaps Bael's hands together, summoning a shockwave to slice the miniature tsunami in half. It washes against the ground to either side of us harmlessly.

Uriel flies out of the gap and hits the ground with a WHUMP, sending mud flying. "Deceitful backstabber! How in character for thee to attack me from behind!"

Ose cocks Bael's head. "Oh, sorry. Did I hurt you? Perhaps I should have been more gentle. I'll take your feelings into consideration next time."

The Archangel pauses. "Hm? Who art thou? Certainly not Bael. He's hardly eloquent."

"For the third time, I'm Ose. The new Third Emperor. Soon to be First, after I smear you across the dirt."

"Ose?" Uriel glowers at Mephisto and me. "I see. Thou art controlling Bael."

"Wow. Give this angel a cookie. She pieced it together." Ose claps Bael's palms together slowly. "Bravo. Bravo."

"One Emperor won't change anything. Show thy face, coward."

"I'm not a coward. I'm brilliant. Much smarter than the rest of the rabble." Ose points at her chest. "Bael's transformation gives great power at the cost of intelligence, but by controlling his body, I transform him into an unstoppable juggernaut. It's hardly cowardice to use the best tools at hand."

Uriel motions with her hands. Two spears of light form in her grasp while her four constructs rematerialize. "Thy confidence appears impregnable. However, bloodskin Emperors always think themselves undefeatable. Belial lost to me. Thou shalt, as well."

"I don't think so," Ose says. "You were barely holding on before. No matter how strong you pretend to be, you won't beat my genius. I've planned your defeat ever since the last time I saw you fight."

"Enough talk." Uriel flicks her eyes, and metal from the Annex rushes over to her and encases her body in makeshift armor. "I hate chatting with bloodskins."

"It must kill you to live in the mind of one."

"Damn right!" Uriel swings her spear at the Balrog, and a gust of wind flies out, barely knocking him back an inch. "It's my definition of HELL!!"

Part 075: The Meaning of Pain

Recommended Listening

The Archangel charges at me. My eyes instantly jump around as I gather data about the Balrog's fighting capabilities, as well as the situation around him.

There are five enemies. Uriel is the first. The other four are light constructs. The winged constructs appear to be a melee and caster-type, while the cube is a gravity manipulator and the orb is an artillery bombardment-type.

Hypothesis: Uriel shares her energy between each construct.

Analysis: Unlikely. Uriel has demonstrated the ability to manipulate not only Barbatos's magic but Artorias's as well. However, she can't control more than one element at once. Therefore, her constructs are part of her intent to shore up her weaknesses.

Conclusion: I should eliminate the constructs first, then prevent her from rebuilding them.

Uriel's stabs her spears at my face. I bat them away and lunge Bael's tail out, manipulating his body as if it were my own. My control over his hulking form borders on perfection. His strength, coupled with my intellect, creates a versatile warrior capable of crushing anyone in my path.

My spiked extremity strikes the melee-construct. It deflects with a shield and chops at my tail.

Injuries sustained: None.

Uriel continues to stab and strike at me, weaving the occasional hand sign whenever she dodges to hit me with one of her spells. Bael's Balrog form is immune to many forms of elemental damage, allowing me to ignore the majority of them.

A warning appears in the back of my mind. Incoming metal shards. Danger level: Medium. Actions taken: Duck, deflect, dodge.

As I fight the Archangel, a voice speaks inside my mind; Bael's.

HEY! WHY ME NO MOVE?

I'm in control for a while. Take a nap and let the genius fight.

YOU NOT BELONG! LEAVE HEAD!

Quiet, you. Don't distract me.

I force the Balrog's body to inhale deeply, then immediately blast a concentrated cone of flame to incinerate the melee-type construct. The caster-type tries to protect its comrade with a light wall but moves too slowly. The first dissipates into particles, leaving only three others for me to eliminate.

Uriel notices. She weaves signs to reform the construct, but I won't let her.

I grab her arm and crush it, then fling her at the artillery-type orb construct. It explodes into particles when she hits it.

Uriel winces and jumps to her feet. "Gah! Damned Emperor! How has thy speed reached such a level?!"

"Mental prowess. Becoming an Emperor unlocked my analytic acuity. You wouldn't understand."

Uriel intends to distract me with words. Her attempts are pathetic and futile. I only served a tertiary role the last time she emerged, but this time, things will be different. I will prove the ultimate victor.

Mephisto summons several ghouls. They leap out of the ground and grab Uriel's leg, pinning her for a moment. I didn't ask him to do that. Whatever, I'll use him to my advantage. The Archangel swings her undamaged arm down and smashes one of the ghouls in the face, blowing its empty rotted head across the land. Black blood flies in every direction, spattering the dirt. She kicks it off and starts to roundhouse swing the other off her leg at me.

She is far too slow.

I leap into the air and flap my wings, rushing at her like an arrow whistling through the wind. Bael's massive body plows into the Archangel, and I punch her over and over, dealing crippling damage to her makeshift armor. Several shards of metal break off and embed deep into her skin.

Bael screams again. MY HEAD! NOT YOURS! GET OUT!

Silence! I'm winning a battle you nearly lost.

The moronic Duke continues to push back, but his resistance is futile. I thoroughly command his body. A low IQ individual can't take back his mind from a seasoned psychic prodigy.

Out of nowhere, my body doubles in weight — ah, the gravity cube. I nearly forgot. It hovers twenty feet away and spins rhythmically, trying to suppress my movements. I wave a wing and hit it with a gust of air, disturbing its oscillation for a moment.

Before I can finish the cube off, something impales my stomach. A spear. Damn. I didn't even see Uriel move. She must have-

What?

Before I can register Uriel's attack, the second winged construct forms a Light Wall between the Archangel and myself and throws me into the air. The light barriers are troublesome. Bael can shatter them with a single punch, but they're hard to see and can catch me off-guard. I'll have to make a note.

STUPID WOMAN!! I WANT YOU LEAVE NOW!!

The idiot continues yelling at me. I ignore him. Pivoting in midair, I spin around with Bael's wings and lunge at the remaining winged construct. It forms barrier after barrier, desperately defending against my punches and flames. Every time I shatter a light wall, another appears.

It's making me... angry!!

"You imbecilic little shit! Die!"

I try to swing at it again and go for the kill, but my right arm stops responding — Bael's arm. I can't move it.

MY MIND! NOT YOURS!!

Devil's sake! He's fighting back! How is that possible?

Stop resisting, Bael! You're making my job harder- WAH!

Tendrils of water wrap around each of my limbs, lift me in the air, and slam me against a rock. I try to struggle out of their grip, but my control slips even more. Neither arm will follow my commands.

GET OUT! GET OUT! GET OUT GETOUTGETOUT!!!

Bael's awful screams grow more unbearable every second. With a labored sigh, I retreat from his mind and return to my body, fifteen miles away.

I open my eyes. A beautiful mid-day vista greets me. The mountaintop I sit cross-legged upon overlooks a field of flowers, a forest, a small lake, and three nearby villages. Ordinarily, I wouldn't be able to see the battle against Uriel from this distance.

But I am no longer ordinary.

Now, I possess the powers of an Emperor.

Untold potential rests in my grasp. Finally, I am the one controlling demon society. For too long have I languished under the fist of idiots ruling other idiots. I offered wisdom and council, but none heeded my call.

I am Ose, the Emperor of Infiltration; the greatest mind that demonkind has ever beheld.

And Bael kicked me out of his head!

That absolute idiot! I hate his ignorance, and his thick skull, and his shitty temperament, and every other part of his stupid body!! He's a worthless piece of garbage!!

* * *

Control your emotions, Ose. Subdue them. Bael is simply such an idiot that he beat me with his advanced stupidity. Fools didn't lead demon society for a hundred thousand years by accident. Satan intentionally engineered our civilization to be idiotic.

Breathe. Inhale.

Great. I'm all better, now.

I jump to my feet and smooth my clean, pristine white uniform down. Sometimes I like to wear dresses. Other times, a suit. Given this battle will be pivotal for securing the future of demonkind, military regalia seemed most appropriate.

The Annex, which once stood proudly by itself next to the ocean, is gone. Only the iron portals remain, each one allowing demons to come and go from various points in the Labyrinth.

I aim my mind at the Annex. A thin bolt of lightning shoots from my eyes. It instantly strikes a spot fifty feet from Uriel, causing my body to zap to that position. I materialize in the thick of a battle, as Bael goes berserk and hammers the Archangel and her four constructs. Dammit, I had taken almost all of them down, but she rebuilt them and healed herself again. Thanks, Bael.

The Duke of Pain is a troublesome idiot.

Bael pounds through barrier after barrier, but Uriel keeps her cool and reforms them continuously. Now that Bael's mindless rampage has returned, it will only be a matter of minutes, possibly even seconds, before she figures out his attack pattern and goes in for the kill.

Whatever, I'll use him to my advantage.

While Bael attacks, I weave several signs and conjure up the elemental attribute of lightning within my mind. The dynamic potential of my energy agitates for several seconds as I build up my power. By the time Uriel notices the sparks of electricity arcing off my body, she doesn't have time to react.

Nobody ever does. That's the point of a lightspeed-attack.

KZZAAT!

A multi-pronged energy blast shoots from each finger. Four bolts target each of Uriel's constructs, while the fifth explodes against her metal armor, electrifying her and boiling her insides. The demon-angel hybrid screams in pain as she tumbles backward, narrowly missing Bael's fist in the process. Uriel spins head over heels until she comes to a stop several hundred feet away, half-buried in the mud.

Bael turns to me and snarls. "HEY! YOU THE ONE IN MY HEAD! STUPID WOMAN! ME CRUSH! ME SMASH!"

Devils. I hate the fat bastard so much.

The huge brute charges at me. I zap over to Uriel and leave an electrical afterimage in my wake. That should confuse him for a bit.

As soon as I appear, Uriel smiles. "Eat dirt, little Emperor." The ground explodes underneath me.

I wince, but no shrapnel hits my body. When I blink my eyes, though, I realize I can't see. Uriel blinded me. A light-mine?

Something hits me in the stomach and my face.

Uriel grabs my long hair and swings me around. The disorienting rush of motion and wind against my skin makes it impossible to right myself. I hit the ground with the force of a hurricane, causing stars to dance in my eyes.

The pain doesn't last long. Compared to my durability when I was a Baron, my body has become practically indestructible. Evolving into an Emperor did more than enhance my mental acuity and give me new powers. It also reinforced my defenses substantially.

I weave signs and discharge electricity from every pore in my skin, making Uriel yelp in surprise. I hear her hit the ground to my left.

Gotcha.

Vague shapes become visible in my vision, though they're fuzzy and indistinct. They give me enough detail to see. I can barely make out the contours of Uriel's body as she staggers to her feet.

Zapping behind her, I plant my hand against her back and unload as much electricity as I can muster.

Uriel explodes into particles of light. No, wait. Her construct? Damn! I grabbed the wrong one!

Whump!

A steel rod strikes my back, jarring my vision. This time, pain explodes through every inch of my spine. Uriel grabs my hair again and punches me in the face. Wham! Wham! Wham!

It hurts. More than before, but I've had worse. That's the thing about being born a demon. Our lives are nothing, if not painful.

The next time Uriel's fist strikes my face, I discharge electricity. Her scream of pain is more intense than before. She stumbles back, falls to the ground, and writhes around, trying to shake the sensation of touch back into her electrified palm.

I still can't see properly, but a solution appears in my subconscious. I weave a sign and shock my skull to reset my nervous system. My vision clears up instantly.

Electricity. It's versatile, powerful, and robust. Perfect for a genius like me.

Uriel sets her jaw and clambers to her feet, but her footing is unsteady. "Hack... cough... thy powers should not... not be this formidable..."

"Everyone underestimates me. It's a blessing, in some ways. It means I always outperform their expectations."

Uriel's eyes rove my body, probing for a weakness. A moment of distress. Her arm is probably still tingling, so she isn't able to efficiently weave two-handed magic signs. All four of her constructs are gone, too.

I wonder what she'll do.

She narrows her smoldering red eyes and meets my gaze. "Art thou toying with me, bloodskin?"

"Something like that."

"Thy kind are like rats. Should one perish, a whole swarm will rise to take its place. I see now that killing the council off will barely make a dent." She shakes her hand, desperately fighting to return feeling to it.

"Oh? I assumed you planned to exterminate all the demons. That's what you said the last time you showed your ugly mug."

Uriel's breath slowly evens out. "Nay. Knowing how little time I have before Barbatos awakens, I intended only to take out as many demons at the top of the hierarchy as possible. However, upon witnessing thy battle prowess, I now see my folly. Even a newly arisen Demon Emperor can rise to the level of the ancient devils! I spoke to a child before coming here. He believed that only the old guard from before the Energy Wars were my enemies. He was wrong. All of thy kin must perish to restore balance to the universe."

"Oh, listen to you. Smug. Self-assured. The Archangels always were a bunch of sore losers," I reply, smirking at the heavily-breathing demon-angel hybrid. "Your people considered themselves the arbiters of justice and freedom, but in the end, they were no better than the demons! Now they're dead. You're nothing but a fossil — a relic of a dead era. Eliminating your stench from the galaxy was the best thing Satan ever did."

Uriel jumps to her feet. She doesn't bother attacking. "Dost thou think thyself better than me?! In thy eyes, humans art little more than food for thy river of souls! The angels gave thy people life, but ye repaid us with bloodshed and violence! We protected the humans, but thy barbaric ways only grew more genocidal with time!"

My face twitches. "I saw your protection in action. You enslaved demons, and then you used humans for your gain. Don't pretend we're any worse. Demons only take from humans what we need, while limiting their growth for their own good. Humans who grow in power won't stop at killing us. Once they eliminate all their enemies, they turn on themselves. If you think a universe without demons is ideal, you must be covering your eyes to ignore the horrors humanity and angelkind has committed."

"Filthy bloodskin. Our magic gave thee life."

Uriel clenches her fist, the one I electrocuted, and slowly extends a finger. She shakily points it at me. "I was there when Uzziel created the first imp. She birthed thy people out of love, not malice. All we asked for was for thy kind to serve us. We gave thee a purpose. A reason to live! Spitting in our faces was thy response."

"Love, hm? Is that what you called it? I wasn't alive during those formative years, so I can't say what happened. I only know what I've gleaned from the originators. If you were so kind and forgiving, then why did you attempt to exterminate the imps when they demanded their freedom?"

The Archangel hesitates. A moment of self-reflection appears in her eyes. "I don't know, Ose. That was a long time ago."

"So was the extermination of the angels, yet you seem to relish mentioning that event over and over. Either the past is the past, or you must admit you're a hypocrite. I won't let you have it both ways."

Uriel's fist shakes. She retracts her finger. A smile appears beneath the half-melted section of her helmet. "I do not require thy permission to do anything."

She flicks her other hand. The ground explodes around her, and she sucks underneath it, vanishing into the soil.

I quickly leap back. "Mephisto. Uriel went underground. Where is she?"

The Duke of Mist hovers above me. He glances around warily. "My ghoulsss report ssshe isss burrowing around quickly. We mussst beware. Her Earth Manipulation isss one of her ssstrongessst asssetsss, besssidesss her magnetisssm."

The planet shakes. Uriel bursts back out of the ground, startling me. Her metal armor is gone, replaced instead with dirt all across Barbatos's naked body. I can barely see her eyes through all the debris.

The Archangel jumps at me. I electrically transfer to the side and shoot lightning at her, but she shrugs it off without complaint and summons her constructs again. Again! Every time I destroy them, they come back!

The orb-bombardment-construct begins rotating, sending bolts of water flying at me. I dodge reflexively and dash over four hundred feet away with my electric-jump. The water splashes harmlessly against the ground, but a shiver goes down my spine.

Her new method of attack isn't random. She shed the metal and replaced her armor with electric-conductive soil. Then she followed up with a water-based attack.

She's targeting my elemental weaknesses. I underestimated her.

"LITTLE WOMAN!" Bael's voice behind me makes my heart skip a beat. I turn and look just in time to see a fist swinging down at my head. Luckily, I zip to the side and dodge the attack, making him hit the ground harmlessly. Being able to move at nearly the speed of light saves me more often than I'd like.

"Bael! Get ahold of yourself!" I yell.

"SCREW YOU! NO TAKE ORDERS FROM DUMB WHORE!!"

The demon leaps at me. I spot Uriel out of the corner of my eye. She watches and smiles.

"Nobody... nobody insults me, you stupid baboon." I pop into the air behind Bael and kick as hard as I can, slamming him into the ground. Before the Balrog can recover, I shoot a hundred lightning bolts at him, targeting several points of his nervous system. Each one splashes against his back and explodes.

The moment I land, I know something is off. Bael jumps up without hesitating. He must be damn-near immune to my lightning element.

I can't fight the Archangel and a Balrog at the same time. Not even as an Emperor. If I have a super-form, ultra-form, or omega-form, I have yet to discover it. There hasn't been enough time. Promoting from Baron to Duke is a massive undertaking, but from Baron to Emperor in the same day? It's tearing my power cognizance to shreds.

Mephisto appears at my side. "Ossse, we mussst work together. My undead are ineffective againssst sssingularly ssstrong enemies. I lossst the power of Leviathan, ssso I do not know how bessst to asssissst you."

"Keep Bael busy. Insult him. He can't hurt you. Keep popping out of the ground and play whack-an-imp if you have to. I need him off my back."

Mephisto nods. "I underssstand. Do your bessst. You are our lassst hope againssst the Archangel."

A thought materializes in my mind. No. We still have the First Emperor. Will he show? I doubt it. We're probably on our own.

Mephisto floats over to Bael and stabs the big brute with his knife. Bael mostly ignores the pain, but still swats at Mephisto in annoyance. "STUPID GHOST COME BACK! HE WANT MORE BIG SMACK!"

"Your broodmother sssmellsss like an angel," The Aetherial demon says, cutting deep with his first insult. Hell, even I would be offended under different circumstances.

"HOW DARE YOU! NOBODY INSULTS BROODMOTHER LIKE THAT!"

Bael begins swinging at the Duke of Mist, and I breathe a sigh of relief. Now I can focus on Uriel-

...Wait! Where did she go? She was standing next to the Annex only a few moments ago. Damn!

The ground rumbles beneath me. It's Uriel!

I transmit away at the last second. Uriel bursts from the dirt and grabs my electrical afterimage, which explodes in her grasp. The current does nothing to her.

Uriel pivots in midair to face me. She kicks her foot into the ground, sending a cone of dirt bullets firing in all directions. I throw up an energy shield and deflect them.

This battle is a stalemate. I can't hurt her, and she can't hit me. Hmm. How should the genius change her strategy, I wonder?

Three seconds pass.

Something clicks in my head.

Perfect.

I zap behind the Archangel. She instantly swings to hit me, but this technique is undodgeable.

Body Possession.

My hands weave a dozen signs in a fraction of a second. By the time Uriel's fist is about to connect with my face, I've already finished. I duck her swing and slap my hand against her back.

Transfer.

Our battle ceases. My vision fades to black, then reappears a moment later, staring back at my own beautiful face.

I've done it.

It takes a moment for me to reorient myself. Suddenly, horrific, agonizing pain blazes through my entire body. No, Uriel's body. Barbatos's body.

Agony like nothing I've ever felt in my life.

Lava and ice pour across every one of my cells. Someone douses me in acid, then hurls me into a vat of boiling oil. I can't think, only scream wordlessly.

The pain is so senseless that I age a thousand years in one second, revert, and re-age once more, only for my skin to melt off and reform over and over.

Haha... unbearable, isn't it? This agony is what Barbatos suffers daily.

Uriel's voice speaks to me. It's barely a whisper compared to my unending shrieks.

"MAKE IT STOP!! WHAT'S GOING ON?!"

The combination of demonic and holy energy in one body should be more than anyone can handle, yet Barbatos has lived this unending torture for a hundred thousand years. Thou art a newcomer, so ye haven't a chance of overcoming it.

Uriel's body appears in my vision, in between the blinding flashes of superheated fire in my veins and arctic breeze chilling my skin. Her figure is that of a white-haired woman with fair skin and blood-red robes. It contrasts with Barbatos's disgusting black and white mottled skin.

Haha. How very predictable of thee, Emperor of Infiltration. I wondered if ye might attempt something as foolish as combatting my soul directly. What was thy hope? Did ye intend to strike me down while I was defenseless? To cause me such pain that I would return to my dormant state? How unfortunate. No pain thou art capable of inflicting will ever compare to that which I've suffered for the shorter part of eternity.

My head pounds like a hammer against an anvil. Each beat of my heart sends more fire into my mind.

"H...how... can you... move... with this much... PAIN...?!"

Simple. I adapted to it. We did. Barbatos, Artorias, and I all share our senses.

Another voice appears in my mind. A male voice, one I don't recognize.

I am sorry you had to find out like this, Ose. You cannot stay in our mind. Controlling Barbatos's body will prove impossible to one not attuned to our constant suffering.

"Who are... you?"

Artorias. Barbatos's brother. I sealed myself inside of his body to try and counteract the Archangel's energy. I only partially succeeded. We can barely match her powers if we are both awake. When he sleeps, she takes over. I can't muster the strength to take over.

A moment passes. I blink back a flood of tears.

"So... that means... it takes the power of... two demons... to resist the Archangel?"

Yes.

Uriel's smile evaporates. Planning something, Ose? Dost thee honestly believe thyself capable of incapacitating me?

"Hehehe... maybe. I see, now. You're not invincible. You have a weakness."

Already, I'm growing used to the pain. It's still blinding. I can't move a muscle. But I don't need to. The real battle is here, in Barbatos's mind.

"Artorias... where is... your brother?"

Asleep. Comatose, you might say. Nothing can wake him, now. We must wait until he recovers from forty-thousand years without rest before he can take over again.

"I don't... don't have... forty-thousand years. I don't even have... ahh... forty minutes. I need to wake him now."

Uriel smiles. 'Tis impossible. Demons far smarter than thee have tried. They failed. Thou shalt, as well.

"Haha... that's where... you're wrong. There are no other... demons... smarter than me. I'm the best. A genius. It's already over."

I blink slowly and inhale the pain. Everything hurts, but I must bear it. I'm the only one here who can save demonkind.

"Barbatos. Barbatos... wake up."

A minute passes.

No response.

Uriel laughs. Haha... a valiant effort. If only someone had thought to command the Duke to stop sleeping, perhaps they'd have saved millions of bloodskin lives!

I ignore Uriel's sarcasm.

Opening my eyes, I turn to my body, standing rigidly, its palm held in midair. I look like a mannequin.

It takes me a moment to focus, but I pull out of Uriel's mind and return to mine.

Something hits me across the face. Uriel's fist. She waited for me to leave.

Again and again, she hits me. I can barely perceive my surroundings. The excruciating shock from Barbatos's body lingers like a phantom pain in my mind, turning my movements sluggish.

Uriel continues to batter me against the ground. Surprisingly, I can't feel her fists anymore. It doesn't hurt. She was right. Nothing compares to their shared agony.

The Archangel laughs. "Hahahaha!!! Fall to pieces, bloodskin fiend! What's the matter? Did my agony rip thy soul apart? Can't move a muscle anymore?!"

I smile, even as her fist strikes me again. That's right. It did. I'll never think of pain in the same way again.

Raising a palm, I make a single sign. My body transmits out of Uriel's grasp, and I appear fifty feet away next to a puddle of water. Glancing down, I stare in surprise at my face. Cuts, bruies, and lacerations cover every inch of my once-beautiful figure. The Archangel didn't hold back.

However, my face doesn't hurt. Nothing does. I've lost my ability to perceive pain.

The sound of something rushing at me from behind stirs my instincts. I duck a spear of light as Uriel swings at my neck. Pirouetting on my high-heel, I spin around and grab the Archangel by the face.

"Mgmm?!"

Her word of protest almost makes me laugh. A thousand volts of electricity shoot from my hands into her eye sockets, making her leap back and clutch at her face.

"Ahhh!! Ye damned-"

I interrupt her. "You said nothing hurts you anymore, Uriel. You're wrong. I heard your scream of pain earlier. You're going to all this effort to dissipate my electricity. Why is that, I wonder?"

She clutches her face for several seconds. When she pulls her hands away, I shrink back slightly. Her eyeballs, now completely melted, give her hideous visage an even more frightening appearance than before.

Jackpot! Uriel did have a weak spot after all.

"Nnn... my eyes... I can't see..."

"Electricity isn't like other elements. Your brain uses neuro-transmitters to send signals all across the body. It's your greatest weakness, and you know it."

The Archangel breathes heavily for a few moments. "Haah... haah... thou must think thyself quite the overachiever."

"Yes. I am, but enough small-talk. It's time for Barbatos to return, little miss Archangel. You've controlled him long enough."

Uriel quickly forms signs. Healing water appears in midair. She splashes it into her eyes, and I smile. "That was exactly what you shouldn't have done."

I transmit beside her and grab both sides of her head. Using every ounce of electrical power in my body, I blast apart the soil surrounding her skull and pour electricity into Uriel's brain. Her teeth grind together, and her limbs spasm wildly.

"AHHHHH!!"

Uriel shrieks in agony. She tries to grab me, but her body seizes up, unable to counteract my electricity.

Heat builds between my hands and her skin. The temperature rapidly climbs to several hundred degrees.

"Barbatos! Wake up! WAKE UP!"

I scream into the Duke's ear as loudly as possible. The demon-angel hybrid goes limb in my grip, but I keep the current going for several seconds longer.

Finally, I release her and hop away.

Barbatos's body slumps forward and flops to the ground. His jaw hangs open, and a wave of drool spills out. Smoke pours from his ears, nose, and mouth.

All goes silent.

Swallowing, I kneel to get a better look at the big guy.

I... I think I killed him.

"Uhh."

A sound comes out of his mouth.

"Barbatos? Uriel? Which of you is in there?"

"Muhh..."

Now that Barbatos's eyes have healed, he slowly raises them to look at me.

"Os... Ose..."

I narrow my gaze. "Who are you?"

The demon's two blood-red orbs smolder like coal in a fireplace.

"I'm... Art... Artor... ias."

Darkness. Fire. Hellfire.

An eternity passes. Every piece of myself scatters across the cosmos. I'm no longer an individual, but a million people — a billion.

Where am I?

Who am I?

What is my purpose?

I don't know.

Ah. A light. I see it. It sits in the sky before me, yet its warmth spreads across the cosmos. The heat warms me from the inside out.

I love heat. Warmth. Fire. It giveth life, and it taketh away. Life began in a primordial soup of fire and thunder, yet that same heat can burn it away. Sear it to ash.

The light draws nearer. I reach out and touch it with a hand. My hand. I forgot what a body was. Perhaps, an eternity ago, I was not a scattering of consciousness spread across the cosmos, but an individual — a person.

A demon.

Yes. That's right. Me. A demon. I remember now. Beelzebub. That was my name. Why am I here, in the Void? Am I dead?

The Archangel. Uriel. I intended to kill her. I detonated my body. I regret nothing. I had to kill her, no matter the cost. The other demons will remember me with fondness. "He sacrificed himself to save us," they will say.

Wait. Who's there?

A voice. I hear someone.

Beelzebub.

"Who are you?"

I am the One. The Alpha. The Omega. The Creator.

His voice. Hers. It's rapturous. Sweet and sensual, like honey in my ears.

"Creator. Why can I hear you?"

You can because you must. Your time is not up. You have a task you must perform. There is yet a role you must play.

"I don't understand. What do you mean?"

You devoted your life to selfishness and greed. You were arrogant. Condescending. You treated those around you like dirt. In every meaning of the word... you were a complete and utter asshole.

I stare at the light in surprise. "Wow. You don't hold back, do you?"

I mean, you were the worst. I don't think I've seen many beings more irredeemably terrible and awful than you. Seriously, do you get off on stomping others into the dirt? Have you not a shred of decency in your body?!

"Um."

Ah, sorry. I lost track of my thoughts.

"It's... fine. I get it. You think I'm terrible. You want me to change. That's the condition for my return, right?"

Hm? No! No, heavens no. Haha. No. Definitely not. No.

"I'm confused."

Same. Look, I'm going to keep it real for you, okay? I'll make this nice and simple. You have a part to play. I'm not saying you need to change. It isn't a condition for your return, but you're going to be unhappy and ruin the lives of those around you if you keep your assholery up.

"Uh. Okay."

Yeah. I want you to know, Beelzebub, despite your life and the tribulations you've faced, you're not the same demon you used to be. You're stronger, now. Faster. Smarter. You have a chance to make a difference. Don't make the universe worse than it already is. There are enough assholes out there. It took me a while to get rid of Satan. I don't want to deal with another troublemaker.

I sigh.

"Haah. I understand. So that's how it is. Very well. If you allow me to return to my original form, I'll promise to try and be a better person. Does that work for you?"

Sure does. Fo'shizzle.

"Excuse me?"

Nothing. A slip of the tongue. Oh, by the way, I'm not the one returning you to your body. That was already happening thanks to your powers. I just wanted to say hello. I don't have any magic left anymore. I exhausted it a long time ago.

"What? You tricked me?!"

Yeah, kinda. Anyway, you promised me you'd be a good boy. Sayonara! Have a good one, old buddy old pal!~

"No! Screw you! I can't believe you're the Creator! I hate you! You stupid old-"

Suddenly, the light disappears. A vortex sucks me from the cosmos. Searing, white-hot light pummels every inch of my body.

"AAAAAAAAAAHH!!!!"

I scream into the void.

* * *

"Mister Beelzebub! Mister Beelzebub!"

A woman's voice awakens me. I close my mouth and sit up. Sweat pours down my body.

I'm alive.

Turning to my left, I spot the darkened shadow of Rosalia's face. Tears stream from her eyes. "Oh, my devils! I can't believe it! You finally stopped!!"

"Stuh... stopped? Huh?"

"Stopped screaming! You've been screaming and thrashing for three days straight! It was horrible!!"

I finally turn to take in the scene around me. I'm in a darkened room, lying on a stone cot. The walls press in on both sides. A torch attached to a wall provides the only light, and it barely gives any at all.

Ah. The Healing Chambers. I recognize this room now.

My heart skips a beat. "Ah! Uriel! Where did she-"

I freeze mid-sentence. Horrible, burning pain explodes in my mind. Only now do I notice the pain I've suppressed for the last few seconds. Fire belches from my mouth. "AAAAAAAAAAHHH!!!"

"Oh no! Not again!!" Rosalia ducks a wave of fire as I clutch myself and try to repress the flames boiling in my stomach.

I lower my eyes and gaze in horror at my body. My red skin hangs onto my bones by only a few threads. My arms are misshapen and deformed, as are my legs. My body has regrown, but it belongs to someone else, not me!

I force myself to stay quiet by clamping my jaw shut and pouring fire through my nose.

F-focus. Think. It's only pain. Slow it down. Heal. Regenerate. I... I need to concentrate. That's all!

After several minutes, the pain slows to a crawl. My open wounds begin to seal, and the blood stops flowing from them. My bed, still drenched in a hundred secretions, sticks to my skin and smells something terrible.

Rosalia peeps up from the side of the bed. "Are... are you okay, Mister Beelzebub?"

I close my eyes and slow my breathing. It takes me several minutes to respond, but finally, after resetting my body to its original condition, I slide off the bed and stumble against the wall.

"I'm... I'm fine. Just... had to heal. That's all."

Haha. The Creator must be a practical jokester. Returning me in such a pitiful state. I can't believe people saw me in such a condition. I'll never live it down.

"Yay!" Rosalia jumps to her feet and wraps her arms around me. "You're back! I'm sooo glad! After we found out you exploded yourself we found your body in a giant crater and you were screaming and rolling around on the ground but Ose helped control your powers until we could get you to the Healing Chambers oh and then there was the fight against Uriel it turns out she had another person in her head named Artorias and he's really nice he used healing water to try and heal some of your skin even though you kept exploding anytime he touched you so he had to give up but it was no big deal because he's a cool demon and we're waiting for Barbatos to pop up again but Uriel hasn't shown up at all in his thoughts for over three days so the Labyrinth isn't in crisis anymore ahh I'm so glad you're back though I missed you and didn't sleep at all while I waited for you to come back because-"

"ALRIGHT, ROSALIA!" I quickly shove the woman off me. Fire explodes from my body. "For devil's sake! Stop yammering on with that awful voice of yours! I've barely been awake for ten minutes! You can tell me all that later!"

She smiles at me giddily. "I love you, Mister Beelzebub! I'm so glad you woke up!"

"Yes. You said that ten times already. Now... where are my clothes?"

She cocks her head. "I hung them up yesterday, but you exploded and burned them to ash. Besides, I don't mind if you're... um... naked."

"I do, you damned cow." More flames shoot out of my armpits. I stop and glance at the embers occasionally leaking through my skin. "Hmm. I can't control my magic. It's shooting off randomly."

"Well, you exploded your entire body. It's probably having issues for now, but they'll go away. You'll learn to control the fire again. You always do!"

"Yes, true. Praise me more."

I glance around for something to cover myself. A towel, anything. The only thing I find is an empty bedpan.

It'll have to do.

I grab it and press it against my front. "Come, Rosalia. We're returning to Hell Harbor. I need to find out what happened. Explain to me on the way."

"We? You mean, both of us?"

"Yes. Why? Does that surprise you?"

"You always said you were going to leave me behind, but I knew your heart wasn't in it!"

"Devil's sake. Just shut up and come along."

As I push past her and shove aside the animal-skin covering the doorway, Rosalia falls into step beside me.

"I'm glad you're back, Mister Beelzebub. Really."

I sigh.

"I am, too."

Part 076: Mindgame

"Return."

My body materializes inside the Labyrinth Core. Teleporting often tends to disorient me, but this time is different. I barely notice the difference in air pressure.

The moment I arrive, a Goblin sitting in front of a nearby console turns and gapes at me. "Ah! You're back!"

"Yeah."

"Holy shit! Everyone's been waiting for you! I... I gotta tell 'em! GUYS! GUYS! Hope is back! He made it out alive!!"

The little guy jumps onto the computer's console to get some height. He yells and waves his arms, and within a minute, several hundred monsters and humans rush over to crowd around me.

"Did you beat the Archangel?"

"He doesn't have a scratch on 'im!"

"That's our Hope! He makes it look easy!"

"We gotta tell Neil!"

Goblins, Harpies, and even a few Salamanders chatter excitedly. The humans are less excited but much more relieved. A black-haired youth, Henry, rests his hand on my shoulder. "Samantha appeared in the Core and told us what happened. She's at the hospital and is receiving treatment for radiation sickness if you want to go see her."

I stare at him for a moment. "Yeah, sure, maybe later."

Uriel's vision still lingers in my mind. Samantha's betrayal. A shapeshifter who infiltrated the enemy and tore them apart from the inside-out.

Now she's in our ranks. She claims to be on Phoebe's side, but can we trust her?

I shake the worry out of my head. "Henry, where's Neil? I need to speak to him."

Henry nudges a kobold. "Where's the commander? Is he in his office?"

The kobold shakes his head. "Nah, he's inspecting those new armor thingamajigs. Over at Gate Three."

"Alright, thanks."

Henry and I pull away from the others and head toward the third gate. He looks me up and down. "So you fought the, err, demon... Archangel... person, huh?"

"I did. Our fight was brutal... in many ways. What did Samantha tell you?"

"From what I gathered, Neil grilled her for half an hour. She only shipped off to the hospital ten minutes ago after telling us what she could. How the heck did you survive an atomic explosion?"

"Luck, mostly. I made a barrier to protect us in the nick of time."

"Well, good on you, then."

Our boots rap against the stone floor, and as the third gate comes into view, the sound of lumbering footsteps appear from nowhere. "Rabbit! You're back!"

I turn back and smile at the giant reptile towering over me. "Hey, Kar. I survived. Somehow."

Blinker flutters off his shoulder and zips over to poke my nose. "You're crazy! I can't believe you took on an Archangel all by yourself! Did you win? Lose?"

"Let's just say it ended in a stalemate," I say, keeping my tone diplomatic. "That's why I need to see Neil."

Kar rubs his scaly face. "Hurgh. Butterfly and I had to skip our honeymoon. Turtle and White-hair are working hard to make more of those armor systems. There's no time to rest when the demons are running amok."

"Sorry about the wedding."

Blinker lands on Kar's shoulder. "It's no big deal! I got to eat like FIVE crumbs! Do you know what that will do to my skinny little body?!"

Kar's scales redden slightly. "Nothing I would mind, my little Butterfly."

"Oh, Kar, you're the sweetest!"

I glance away from them, toward the portal. Immediately, I spot Neil wearing a T-REX. He and another officer poke and prod at it, chatting about something I can't make out.

Kar follows my gaze. "The commander was worried about you. He said it was reckless for you to rush off after the succubus without any backup."

"He's not wrong. Some crazy things happened."

"Oh?"

I glance at Henry and Blinker, then back to Kar. "I fought the Archangel to a stalemate. What bugs me is that after I spoke to her, I realized she wasn't in the wrong."

Henry crosses his arms. "What do you mean?"

"Her goal is to eradicate demonkind. She didn't seem to take any issue with monsters, and I quickly realized that she was an ally to humanity. Look, don't tell anyone what I'm about to tell you guys, okay? I need to talk to Neil first."

Kar's expression turns solemn. "I would never tattle on a bosom brother. This little lady here, though..." He pokes Blinker with his thumb.

She swats him back. "Hey! Whaddya mean by that!"

My smile turns anxious. "I don't know how to say this gently, so I'll be blunt. I found out that at the end of the Energy Wars, demonkind killed all of the angels at once. Humans lost the war, and human leaders agreed to enslave our people at the hands of the demons. Someone sold out humanity to our enemies."

Kar doesn't display any emotion. "I've always suspected as much."

Henry, however, looks mildly disturbed. "Someone sold us out?"

"A long time ago, Henry. A hundred thousand years or so. It didn't happen yesterday."

"Wow." Henry wipes sweat from his forehead. "Did... did you learn anything else?"

My memory returns to Samantha. The infiltrator. The shapeshifter.

I can't tell the others about her just yet. Not until I talk to Neil.

I shake my head. "Not much else worth mentioning. Uriel did tell me about how the demons imprisoned her inside of Barbatos's body. She had no way to escape, and could only watch as the demons genocided her people. Frankly, I think she has every right to seek revenge. I didn't help her, but I didn't stop her either."

A flash of anger crosses Henry's face. "Damn right. I'd have done the same. It was a demon who killed Piper. They're all brutal murderers in my eyes."

Kar appears less certain. "I don't know, Rabbit. Many atrocities happen over the course of several lifetimes. Gouging out the eyes from an enemy who takes our vision only leaves both of us blind."

"It sure feels good though," Henry counters. "Fair is fair."

Blinker nods. "I agree. If someone hurts Kar, I'm gonna snap 'em in half! You don't wanna see me when I'm angry! I start shedding dust! It's ugly!"

I thumb toward Neil. "I'm gonna chat with the commander. Thanks for listening."

"Any time, Rabbit."

I frown. "By the way, why that nickname?"

"I call people by titles appropriate to their true selves. Since you are the opposite of Turtle, you are Rabbit."

Kar's explanation doesn't help. I'm even more confused. "How am I his opposite? We're 99% identical, even on a cellular level."

The Sphinx shakes his head. "To me, the differences are as plain as night and day. I can easily tell you apart. Turtle is slow and methodical. You are quick-thinking and a risk-taker. Hundreds of other discrepancies appear if one looks for them. You might be Turtle's clone, but you are an individual who lives his life differently. Don't let others bog you down with physical similarities."

Slowly, I narrow my gaze. "Were you always this eloquent?"

"Perhaps not. Absorbing the power of the Sphinx may have... altered me... somewhat. You appear very different now compared to when you left the wedding. Have you undergone a change, little Rabbit?"

"Nope. I'm the same as ever. Haha..." I let out a quiet laugh, even as I remember the awakening of Centurion inside my body.

It's best I don't tell the others about that, just yet. Maybe I can still get the nanites out.

Kar shrugs. "I am wrong more often than I am right."

"That's for sure," Blinker snarks.

* * *

A minute later, I leave the other three behind and head toward Neil. He swivels on his heel to face me before I can catch his attention. "Hope! You're back!"

"Yeah. Sorry I ran off like that. Super irresponsible of me."

The commander waves away his lieutenant and swaggers over to me. "No problem at all. Frankly, I'm glad you went, rather than Jason."

"Why is that?"

"Because you're a bit more practical than your doppelganger." Neil winks and wraps his arm around my shoulder. The instant he touches me, he frowns and pulls away. "By the gods! What's wrong with your skin? It feels like metal!"

"Uh... it's a bit of a story. Can we talk? Somewhere private."

Neil's smile evaporates. "Did something happen?"

"Yes. Where's Jason?"

"I don't know." Neil rubs his nose. "Last I heard, he was headed to the hospital with Phoebe to see the succubus. Did you need to talk to him?"

"No. I want to avoid Jason for the moment. I don't know how he'll react. Can we go somewhere more private? "

The Commander doesn't hesitate. "Sure. Let's go to my new favorite inn. I'm tired of sitting in my office."

"As long as it's private."

"Trust me. It is."

Trees zip past us as Phoebe cruises down the path toward the Core. While I sit in the passenger seat, Samantha sits directly behind me in the backseat.

"I wonder if Hope is alright?" Samantha asks absentmindedly. I catch a glimpse of her leaning against her window and staring out at the trees via my rearview mirror. "Uriel beat the tar out of me. It's hard to imagine that Hope could deal with her after his armor system broke down."

Phoebe flicks her gaze to Samantha for a moment before returning to the road. "It did?"

"Yeah. He couldn't activate his armor-device again. He mentioned something about nanites."

I stroke my chin. The power of the crown provides a thousand possibilities for what happened. "You said Uriel erected a barrier at the last second, right?"

"Mhm."

"Maybe the radiation from the blast affected the T-REX's electronics. All that matters is Hope is back, and he's alive. I'll heal whatever injuries he has."

The military facility appears not far in the distance as we exit the forest cover, along with the warp-gate to the Core. A few harpies flying overhead wave at us. I wave back.

"Yeah, he mentioned something about radiation. I don't understand it, though."

"Mmm. Are demons bad with technology in general?"

Samantha shifts in her seat. "Yeah. Terrible. I can't operate the toaster you made for me. Too many buttons. A few demons are pretty good with technology, but we mostly rely on the monsters to do that stuff."

"Yeah? Why are monsters good with gadgets and gizmos?"

A long pause follows.

"I don't know, Jason. That's the way it's always worked."

"Fair enough."

We continue onward in silence for a few minutes. Phoebe pulls up to the front gate, and the soldiers wave us through. Several of them nod and smile at her. They always do. Everyone loves Phoebe.

Once we drive through the warp-gate, Phoebe slows her truck to a stop on the newly installed vehicle platform. A device spins us around and moves to the side, out of the way of supply vehicles and pedestrians.

Phoebe looks left and right. "I don't see Hope. Can you use your magic to find him?"

"Sure. Locate."

My mind exits my body and hunts all around the Core for Hope. Within two moments, I frown. He's not here.

After several seconds, I jump through a portal to another world, Maiura. I travel dozens of miles almost instantly, and my mind materializes inside a tavern where Hope and Neil sit off in a corner by themselves. I start to pull away since I don't like intruding on private conversations, but Hope says something that catches my attention.

"Yeah. She's a shape-shifter. She can mimic anyone's appearance. I never realized. How can we trust someone like that?"

I decide to listen.

A waitress walks over and puts two big glass mugs of beer down. Neil grabs one without hesitation and hands the other to Hope. "Here. You need one of these."

Hope stares at it for a moment before shrugging. "Yeah. This time, at least. Christ. How am I going to tell Jason? She stuck the knife in Uriel's back and twisted. Trusting a demon is hard enough, but a shape-shifting succubus?"

My heart flip-flops.

They're talking about... Samantha...?

Neil nods. "Succubi can manipulate the emotions and feelings of the opposite sex. It's like I warned you, Hope. She's twice as dangerous now that you've told me about her past. On top of manipulating my men, she could be plotting to kill me and take over my position. Or you. Or Jason. Hell, even Phoebe."

"I don't know if I'd go that far."

"I know what you're thinking. People can change. Hell, even demons can change. Look at Paimon. Until that bastard, Lorvos, gutted him, Paimon was our guy. I wouldn't want to suspect the demon female just because of some vision from an archangel."

"Right. That's my point. Think of how devastated Phoebe and Jason would feel if we just walked up and said, 'Yo, we think your succubus friend is plotting to take over the Core.' They'd call us conspiracy theorists."

"Mmm." Neil and Hope both pause to swig their beers. I raise an eye at Hope. When did he start drinking alcohol? I hate the taste. If he's my clone, shouldn't he hate it, too?

No, that's not important. It's irrelevant how Hope wants to unwind. The bigger issue is what he said about Samantha. Shit. Now that I've overheard him, how can I bring it up without him realizing I spied on him? It wouldn't be right.

Christ. I'm the worst. I can't keep listening. I should stop.

Neil smiles at Hope. "By the way, I know you were a little depressed at the wedding. It was written all over your face."

"Aw, Neil. It's no big deal. I'm happy for Jason and Phoebe. They deserve each other."

"Sure, sure. But you need to think about yourself. Did I ever introduce you to my assistant, Debra? She sometimes pops over at the Rust Bucket."

"Uh, I dunno. Maybe once or twice."

"Great! Well, she has this cute sister. Single. Why don't you let me introduce you to her sometime? I think you'll like her..."

Feeling uncomfortable with what I'm hearing, I retract my mind to my body.

When I open my eyes, my heart jolts in surprise when I spot Phoebe's face mere inches from mine. She quickly pulls away, blushing. "Oh! You left us for a while! Several minutes! Did you find Hope?"

I blink. "...Yeah. He was... busy."

My eyes travel to my rearview mirror. Samantha's gaze meets mine. "Was Hope okay, Jason?"

"Yup. Fantastic. Looked like the picture of health. Probably healed himself with Wordsmithing. I think it's fine for us to give him some time alone."

Phoebe cocks her head. "Huh? We just got here! I didn't drive for thirty minutes just to waste my time driving back!"

"Phoebe..." I start to protest, only to realize that doing so would mean I'd need to mention what I saw. "Well, okay, fine. Let's jump out and say hi to the Core personnel. Are you okay to walk?"

"I'm only two weeks pregnant. I think I'll manage."

"Right. Sorry."

When we get out of the truck, I turn to Samantha as she slams her door shut. "Say... I had a question..."

"Hmm? About what?"

"It's... well, about the, err..." I pause, unsure how to bring up her ability to shape-shift. What if it isn't true? What if it is? Maybe nobody else knows, yet. I can't just ask her such a random question out of the blue! Crap! Jason, you idiot!

I open and close my mouth for a few moments. Phoebe rounds the truck and grabs my arm. "Jason... stop gawking. She might be a succubus, but you'll make her feel self-conscious if you stare."

"No- I didn't mean anything like that!"

Samantha blushes. "Look, if you're having weird thoughts..."

"I just wanted to ask about your, um, horns!"

"My horns?"

"Yeah. Is it true that demon horns get bigger the more powerful they are?"

Samantha crosses her arms. "Well yeah. It's not exactly a secret. I don't see what that has to do with anything."

"N-never mind."

My face turns beet-red. At least I didn't ask Samantha about the shape-shifting. I'll ask Phoebe about it later. Privately.

A young man approaches us, interrupting my awkward dorkiness. "Hey, uh, Mister and Miss Hiro? Do you guys have a moment?"

It feels weird hearing Phoebe referred to by my last name. I'll have to get used to it.

Phoebe nods. "Oh, sure, Henry. What's the matter?"

"Nothing urgent. I was hoping to wait for the Commander to come back. A kobold tech discovered a bunch of files while he was flipping through the planetary databases. They're locked, and nobody can decrypt them. Not even Kar."

"I thought Bahamut's passwords unlocked everything in the system."

"They did. We can see what the files are, but nobody has any idea what they say. We don't understand the language."

"Okay. I can help with that. Show me." I tap the Crown to emphasize, but the youth doesn't seem to understand. Most people don't know what Solomon's artifact can do.

A minute later, the two ladies, plus Henry and I, all walk over to a large terminal built into the wall. A dozen screens list off numbers, coordinates, and a bunch of other miscellaneous things, but the one at the bottom right catches my attention.

A crudely drawn error message appears onscreen. I only know it's an error message because of the way it's flashing and how it looks like a warning.

Immediately the Crown gets to work. The words appear in my mind.

GHA'NUNG. SHATA RUFTAT A'A 'ATS'UTHSAG SU GIAKA-THFTATT GANUNT U' HUGHA'. IANAIASHU'UCTHAG 'UAGHUNG UT AGAUNTS GANUN FTAGH. L'UTHAAG AS XUIA' UGHN 'UTK.

I can read the words, but I have no idea what they mean. They come off as gibberish.

A moment later, the Crown translates them.

WARNING. THESE FILES ARE RESTRICTED TO DUKE-CLASS DEMONS OR HIGHER. UNAUTHORIZED VIEWING IS AGAINST DEMON LAW. PROCEED AT YOUR OWN RISK.

I rub my eyes. The language hurts my head. It's awful. Nothing on Earth resembles it.

I wonder what language it is?

Someone touches my arm. I glance back to see Samantha staring at me. She doesn't blink. "Jason. Can you read that?"

"Yeah. Why?"

Her eyes widen. "You've gone far enough. You don't need to see anything else."

Instantly, I feel more alert. Warning bells sound in my head. The files are restricted to Duke-class demons or higher. Samantha is an Emperor. Holy shit. She can read the language too.

I keep my tone diplomatic. "You know what this warning is?"

She licks her lips and glances at Phoebe. "I do. Don't pry any further."

"I'm human. Telling me not to look at something makes me want to look even harder."

"I know. That's the best and worst thing about humans. Trust me. I'm not saying this for no reason."

Slowly, I lift my chin and peer down at her. Several memories click into place.

Shapeshifter.

Manipulator.

Backstabber.

Succubus.

Emperor.

Have I been blind? Have I ignored the signs? Samantha is the wife of Satan the Devil. If Hope is correct, then she had something to do with the death of the angels. She can shapeshift and manipulate the minds of men.

"If I decide to look, what will you do?"

Samantha immediately notices the suspicion in my eyes. She takes a step back, as if I've wounded her. "Nothing. I'm not going to fight you over it, Jason. I'm not your enemy. I'm trying to help."

Phoebe pulls on my sleeve. "Jason, what's wrong? You're giving Sammy a weird look."

I set my jaw. "A lot of puzzle pieces seem to be falling into place. Samantha, you can shapeshift, can't you?"

The succubus raises an eyebrow. "Um, yes. Why? What are you getting at?"

"Yeah, Jason. What are you getting at?" Phoebe walks over to Samantha's side and glowers at me. "This isn't like you. Not at all."

"I'm wondering why the Second Emperor of the demons joined us, and what she has to gain. I never questioned her motivations until now. If I'm wrong, then I'll deal with the consequences. But... if I'm right... then we might have one hell of a mole in our midst."

Samantha stares at me in shock for a few moments. "I... I never meant... anything negative. I'm trying to help!"

"Help who? Me? Phoebe? Humanity? Monsters? Demons? Why don't you want me to view these files?"

Phoebe looks at Samantha. Samantha looks away, guilt in her eyes. "I can't say. Jason... demons aren't the biggest threat. They never were. If I say anything else, I'll be breaking a law that has governed our people for a hundred thousand-"

"I don't care about your demon laws," I reply, cutting her off. "Knowledge is power. By saying I shouldn't look at these files, you're denying humanity some level of power against the demons. Whose side are you on?"

"Jason!" Phoebe starts to put her hand on Samantha's shoulder. The succubus pulls away — her lip quivers. A single tear falls down her cheek.

"It's always sides with men. You only think about war! And death! Conquest! I'm on nobody's side; I'm on everyone's side! I... I just wanted peace! Do whatever you want! View the files, then! I don't care!!"

She glares daggers at me, then rushes away, moving so fast that Phoebe trips over her afterimage. My wife stumbles and bangs her knee. "Gah! Hell, Jason! What are you thinking? Samantha's supposed to be our friend! MY friend!"

I rub my face, unsure of what to do. Henry's soft footsteps move a foot or two away. He doesn't want to be near me.

"I don't know, Phoebe! All I know is that Samantha is acting very suspicious. Tears or not, I don't like it when people lie to me."

"There was a better way to confront her if you had issues, Jason. Now, look what you've done. You've hurt an innocent woman's heart."

"I'm not so sure she's innocent."

Phoebe stares at me for a few moments, then turns away. "I'm going to find Sammy."

"Wait, Phoebe. She might be dangerous."

"Piss off. Enjoy whatever's on that computer. I want nothing to do with it."

She staggers to her feet, rubs her knee, and storms off.

A drop of sweat runs down Henry's head. "Um."

"Yes, I'm still going to look at the files, Henry. Don't even ask. After what just happened, I might as well. Hopefully, we'll find something worthwhile."

Turning away, I stare at the screen. My vision shakes slightly, and I wipe a tear away. What kind of idiot yells at his wife's best friend? What the hell is wrong with me?

Ignoring the maelstrom of stupidity swirling around in my head, I return my gaze to the warning message, which has yet to disappear. Hundreds of words sit in the background behind the warning, but at a much smaller font. With the giant red warning obscuring them, I can't make out exactly what they say, but they look interesting.

I lean over and tap on the monitor, but nothing happens. Solomon's Crown activates. A dozen tiny dots scattered across the screen catch my eye, each positioned in a different area. When I look at each one, I notice that they form a star-pattern, and at the center, I spot a slight blemish on the screen.

A button I didn't see before, shaped like a punctuation mark, reveals itself under my intense scrutiny.

I press it.

An entirely new window appears, with a barebones file explorer made of circles and dots. The strange language outlines each file and what it can do.

I press the first one I see. ABERRANT CONTAINMENT.

A message pops up. ERROR. DATA CORRUPTION DETECTED.

"Oh. Isn't that swell."

Henry doesn't say anything. I glance at the next button. ESTABLISHMENT OF THE OVERLORD PROTOCOL.

Looks interesting. I press it. The screen changes again. A massive wall of text appears, along with a bold headline at the top.

DEMON AND VOLGRIM CEASEFIRE AGREEMENT - CIRCA 4417 A.D.

What the fuck is a Volgrim?

Part 077: Treaty, Traitor, Terror

I frown in annoyance. The heater in Neil's SUV isn't working. It's freezing cold outside.

Neil and I drive toward Meldora, the city on Maiura I liberated not even a week ago, and the harsh bite of a snowstorm chews through the rig's steel-clad exterior, chilling the inside of the car. Maiura's weather cycle can be described as chaotic at best, and already we're experiencing its worst days.

I rub my arm as I drive. Centurion speaks to me inside my mind. PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR, YOUR BODILY TEMPERATURE IS FOUR DEGREES BELOW OPTIMAL LEVELS. WOULD YOU LIKE ME TO REDUCE MY THERMAL DAMPENING?

I speak out loud. "You can do that?"

AFFIRMATIVE.

"Don't bother. Warm."

The temperature in the car increases noticeably. Neil glances at me and shivers. "Who are you talking to?"

"It's a long story, Neil. You interrogated Samantha upon her return, right?"

"Mhm."

"Well, I was wearing Phoebe's new nanosuit when Beelzebub detonated his body. I don't know exactly what happened, but the radiation must have embedded the suit's nanites into my bloodstream. I can hear Centurion in my mind."

Neil purses his lips. "I see. So the reason your shoulder felt like steel was..."

"The nanites hardened my skin. It's as if I'm always wearing the suit. It gave me a bunch of other perks too. The downside is that I had to suffer radiation poisoning to wear it."

Centurion replies. NEGATIVE. THIS CENTURION UNIT HAS SCRUBBED ALL CANCEROUS CELLS FROM PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR'S BODY. PILOT ZERO ZERO FOUR IS RUNNING AT 100% EFFICIENCY.

I blink. "Uh. Never mind."

"Never mind, what?"

"Centurion healed me. I thought I'd need Jason and the Crown to purge the radiation from my body. It's my lucky day."

Neil loosens his suit collar. "So you say. How are you holding up? I mean, you fought an Archangel. That couldn't have been easy."

"It wasn't. Uriel nearly beat me several times. I stripped her powers away with my Wordsmithing, and even then, her melee combat skills were ridiculous."

"You can do that? Remove someone's magic?"

"Apparently."

A moment passes. Neil glances out the window at the sea of snow surrounding us. The capital city of Meldora looms in the distance. It's a tiny village compared to Hero City, but still the most populated settlement on Maiura. The torches at its gates signal the watchful eye of its few remaining soldiers.

"Have you told Jason about this newfound aspect of Wordsmithing?"

"Nope. I wanted to talk to you first."

"Good. That's very good." Neil says. He eases back in his seat and smiles. "You're advancing quickly. It wasn't long ago that Jason barely held his own against the First Emperor of the demons and the Black Queen, and now you're beating an Archangel without any help."

"Technically, Samantha was there. She did a bit of damage."

"Sure, but you sent her away to face the enemy alone. That was brave of you."

I hesitate. A few thoughts rustle under the surface, making me wonder how I should respond.

"I only wanted to protect Belial. She might be an Emperor, but the matchup against Uriel's powers was uneven."

"Protecting those weaker than you is admirable as well."

"Thanks."

"Mhm."

Meldora draws ever closer. Soon it's only half a mile away. I can faintly make out the torches of men standing in the snow, peering at our vehicle.

"I let Uriel go."

"Oh? Why?"

"She showed me a vision. An image of the past. Something revolving around the demons and how they attacked Heaven. I believe her grievances were... legitimate."

Neil stares ahead stonily. "Do you think you did the right thing by walking away?"

"Kinda. I don't know. I even opened a portal to Hell Harbor to give her access to the demon homeworld. I didn't know that was even a place until she told me."

"Why didn't you go with her if you thought she was doing the right thing?"

The city gate comes into view, and Meldora's soldiers barely give us a once-over before letting us through. The poor men are freezing alive. As we drive past, I speak a word of power to warm their bones and dry their clothes. The feeling might not last long, but it's the least I can do.

I drive further into the city and slow to a crawl as I scan for people walking in the road. Given the hellish sleet falling from the sky, I'm not surprised by the empty streets as far as the eye can see.

"Like I said. Uriel's grievance seems legitimate... but it isn't mine. The demons didn't do those awful things to me."

Neil's voice softens. "But they did. By annihilating the angels and gods, the demons won the war and enslaved humanity. I think you should have helped her kill as many of the bastards as humanly possible. It's only my opinion, though."

"I don't like killing, Neil. Not unless I have to."

"So you say. Ah, right there. That building." Neil gestures toward a wooden structure covered in snow. Smoke belches from a chimney above, while light shines through the windows. "That's the place."

"Doesn't look like much. Pretty small."

"Yeah, you're not wrong. However, after all the killing those orcs did, Meldora is a bit of a ghost town. We'll have lots of privacy inside."

Neil and I hop out, and the bitter cold plunges through my veins like a hundred daggers. Wind beats my face, and snow batters our car.

I shout over the wind. "Christ! Why couldn't you have picked a pub in a nice, warm, tropical location?!"

"Haha! Because everyone would be there!" Neil replies.

I ignore Centurion's second offer to warm my body. The ten feet to the door takes longer then I'd like, and by the time we step inside, my boots are already waterlogged.

Neil slams the door shut behind us. The pub is empty, save one man sitting at the counter, his legs propped up on the stool beside him. He looks at us as we enter. "Oh? Does ye need a drink in this storm? Be ye humans or demons, laddies?"

"Human. Very, very human," Neil says.

"Take a seat then. I'll have the missus pop over in a jiffy."

"Sure."

Neil gestures to a spot off in the corner. The warmth of the fireplace next to the booth feels amazing. As soon as we sit down, I Wordsmith for Neil and I both. "Dry. Warm. Clean."

Our clothes and bodies flash-clean themselves. Neil glances at his boots, which are now in mint condition. "Damn. Not bad. I could get used to this."

"I find my magic hard to use, sometimes. Too many possibilities. The thought of all the effects my lips can unleash makes my head spin."

"Too many choices?"

"Exactly. I suffer from choice paralysis. There are so many ways I can Wordsmith that I can't wrap my mind around what to say."

"You thought of taking Uriel's powers when you fought her. That was clever."

My gaze wanders to a window behind Neil. From inside the pub, the snow looks almost pleasant, like something I'd see on a Christmas card back home.

"Sure, but I feel stupid for not thinking of it sooner. Or at least, for Jason not thinking of such a thing. It would have made battling Satan and his minions much easier."

"To say the least," Neil replies. "If you remove a demon's magic, they should become weak enough that even a slightly enhanced human can fight them on equal terms. Still, you shouldn't beat yourself up over it. Divorce yourself from Jason's actions and yours. You're two different people who do things uniquely."

"I keep telling myself that."

Both of us sit in silence for a few moments. Eventually, I break the ice. "Neil. Do you remember how I told you I let Uriel go? How she showed me a vision of the past?"

Neil barely reacts. "Sure. What about it?"

"Have you ever heard of the War in Heaven?"

"I have not."

"Me neither. It seems to have been a huge event." I rub my chin thoughtfully. "The demons launched an assault on the angels and gods. Uriel was the frontline soldier. She slew tens of thousands of demons and prevented them from entering a gate to Heaven, one similar to our warp-gates in the Core."

Neil smiles. "She sounds like a brave warrior."

"From what I saw, she was. Uriel stood against the horde all by herself. However... someone attacked her from behind. They, uh, stabbed her in the back and allowed the demons to pour through."

"Who?"

I don't hesitate. "Samantha. She's the one responsible for the demons killing off the angels."

Neil stares at me in surprise. "I expected you to say many names... but now I don't know what to think. That succubus was the backstabber?"

"Yeah. She's a shape-shifter. She can mimic anyone's appearance. I never realized. How can we trust someone like that?"

Before Neil can reply, the bar owner's wife comes over and plunks down two fat mugs of beer. She smiles sweetly at Neil, but he ignores her and continues to stare at me incredulously. The lady rolls her eyes and walks away.

The commander shoves one of the beers at me. "Here. You need one of these."

"Yeah. This time, at least. Christ. How am I going to tell Jason? She stuck the knife in Uriel's back and twisted. Trusting a demon is hard enough, but a shape-shifting succubus?"

Neil sips from his mug and averts his eyes from mine. "Succubi can manipulate the emotions and feelings of the opposite sex. It's like I warned you, Hope. She's twice as dangerous now that you've told me about her past. On top of manipulating my men, she could be plotting to kill me and take over my position. Or you. Or Jason. Hell, even Phoebe."

"I don't know if I'd go that far."

Neil's eyes lower to stare at the table. "I know what you're thinking. People can change. Hell, even demons can change. Look at Paimon. Until that bastard, Lorvos, gutted him, Paimon was our guy. I wouldn't want to suspect the demon female just because of some vision from an Archangel."

"Right. That's my point. Think of how devastated Phoebe and Jason would feel if we just walked up and said, 'Yo, we think your succubus friend is plotting to take over the Core.' They'd call us conspiracy theorists."

"Mmm." Neil and I pause to take a drink. The moment the liquid hits my tongue, a gagging reflex starts to take hold. Centurion yells in my mind. WARNING! INVOLUNTARY EXPULSION REFLEX DETECTED! LIMITING THE EFFECTS OF TOXIC SUBSTANCE K3-11248. TOXIN NEUTRALIZED! NO ILL EFFECTS INCURRED!

I stare at the beer silently. It tastes like water now. Thanks, Centurion.

Neil sets his glass down and smiles at my half-empty cup. "By the way, I know you were a little depressed at the wedding. It was all over your face."

I wave his concerns away. "Aw, Neil. It's no big deal. I'm happy for Jason and Phoebe. They deserve each other."

"Sure, sure. But you need to think about yourself. Did I ever introduce you to my assistant, Debra? She sometimes pops over at the Rust Bucket."

"Uh, I dunno. Maybe once or twice."

"Great! Well, she has this cute sister. Single. Why don't you let me introduce you to her sometime? I think you'll like her. Looks a bit like Amelia. Might help you get over your loss."

I release a long-held breath. "I'm fine, Neil. Thanks. I don't need a woman in my life right now."

"Shut up, you terrible liar, you." Neil laughs, shaking his head. "We ought to play poker sometime. I'd never lose to someone with such a poor poker-face."

"Don't be so sure," I counter. "I can always give myself a royal flush with Wordsmithing."

"Heh, right. If cheating is allowed, I'll have a look at your cards to even the playing field."

We both laugh at his little joke. Afterward, I finish off my beer in one big gulp. Centurion tells me it's nullified the alcohol content, so it appears I can't get drunk anymore. That's either good or bad, but I don't know which.

Neil sets his empty mug down. "Hope, I have to ask you... where do you think we should go from here?"

"I don't follow."

"The demons. They run everything. Holing up in the Core won't last us forever. If your suspicions about the succubus are right, then for all we know, the demons could be plotting to take us out in our sleep. We won't know what hit us."

I rub my chin thoughtfully. "If that was their intention, why wouldn't Samantha have finished us off after Beelzebub's attack?"

"I considered that very thought. But remember, the goal of the demons isn't to kill humans. They need to make an example out of us. We're supposed to be their food and their source of soul energy. If Samantha- well, if Belial decided to kill us, it wouldn't prevent more humans from eventually rising to fight again."

"Sure. But the only reason humans can combat the demons is that Jason freed the best and brightest from Bahamut. He made the weaponry we use to stand half a chance against our oppressors. If she kills him and me, then..."

Suddenly something clicks in my mind.

"Holy shit, Neil. I just realized. If Jason and I die, humanity is doomed. That's not conceit speaking. Without our Wordsmithing, humans can't fight back against the demons."

Neil waggles a finger. "Not true. We can reach a point where humans have the technological prowess to stand against our enemies without assistance. The problem is that while the demons have gained power over a hundred thousand years, we've lost it. It will take a great deal of time to restore a sense of balance between the sides."

"I guess so. I'm not trying to make myself sound ultra-important, but I feel like the demons are going to target us, the Wordsmiths, eventually. If that happens, humanity loses."

"You're not wrong. That will certainly be the case for the forseeable-"

Neil pauses. He frowns and reaches into his pocket to pull out a palm-sized square gadget. The little black box has a screen on it, and reminds me of something from Earth...

Ah. It's a pager. Err, why would Neil have one of those?

The commander glances at the small display on the front. "Son of a bitch. We finally sit down to talk, and someone messages me from camp. I guess we have to go."

"Is that a pager?"

"No clue. I asked Jason to make a device that would allow people to reach me anywhere. He created this. It uses magic to receive short messages."

"So... it's a magical pager."

"I suppose."

Sighing, I climb out of the booth. "Well, okay, then. Nothing to do about it. Let's go see what they want."

Henry and I lean forward and stare at the screen. A video begins to play. The quality is abysmal, with artifacts and glitches present. It's in color, but file degradation has rendered a lot of the information difficult to see.

"Repair."

I speak a word, and instantly the screen clears up.

The scene appears to be a barren, rocky planet. Several massive skyscrapers loom in the distance, but their designs are unlike anything I've seen before, made mostly of glass and metal. They twist into the sky and form several ornate shapes. Very different from the tall rectangles on Earth.

A thousand demons stand, weapons and claws at the ready. Scythers, shadow-walkers, and a dozen other types all stand in a military formation and prepare to attack.

One demon I don't recognize stands in the front. He's a fellow with some facial hair and a nasty scar across his eye, and judging by his horns, he must be a Baron, possibly a Duke. He points toward a solitary hooded figure. "I've heard enough from you, paleskin. I won't allow my people to stay and cower in the Labyrinth for all eternity! I won't allow you to banish us so that you can take over the galaxy for yourselves!"

The figure's hooded face is impossible to make out. However, beneath his hood, I spot six faintly luminous eyes, arranged vertically in two rows across what must be his head.

The hooded figure 'speaks,' but his voice seems to come from everywhere, and not from the place I'd expect his mouth to be.

[Yuia knugh sha 'iaftat, ganun. Wa ha'a a s'aasx.]

The crown translates for me.

You know the rules, demon. We have a treaty.

The young demon takes a menacing step toward the mysterious figure. "I don't give a shit about your treaty. You lied to us! You gave us a few planets as a pittance, and kept the rest of the galaxy to yourselves! The demons and Volgrim were supposed to be allies! Equals!"

[Duat Duaftftu knugh aftuias shut? Aftuias xuia'... untiaftu'gunasuun?]

Does Diablo know about this? About your... insubordination?

Another demon steps out of the crowd. She wears a sultry black robe that presses against her flesh. She slides up to the leader and wraps her arm around his. "We don't care about Diablo, do we, Lempo? Besides. Diablo agreed to the treaty without consulting the rest of our people. We want to rewrite the terms!"

The hooded figure's tone maintains its neutrality. [Tha sa'nt gha'a rau'. Yuia ha'a nu tax un sha nassa'. I ghuftft ru'gu'a shut ft'aathh ur ashutht... ftias unftx untha. Laa'a.]

The terms were fair. You have no say in the matter. I will forgive this breach of ethics... but only once. Leave.

The shrouded one turns his back on the demons and struts away. Lempo, the demon leader, grows noticeably angrier. "Hey!! I didn't say we were finished, you Volgrim filth! If you walk away, I'll consider this a declaration of WAR!!"

The figure pauses. He turns around and raises a hand. His skin is grey and mottled, and the six fingers tell me it doesn't belong to a human.

"Yuia ha'a nu aiashu'usx su gathfta'a gha'. Ir xuia a'a ft'a'a anuiagh su unthia' sha hutsuftusx ur nx laulfta, gha ghuftft 'aun ru'a ialun xuia."

You have no authority to declare war. If you are brave enough to incur the hostility of my people, we will rain fire upon you.

"So that's how it is, then?"

Lempo begins to weave signs with his hand. Before he can finish, a voice yells from the demon force's flank. "Lempo! Stop! What are you doing?"

I recognize the voice as Diablo's. The Emperor of Annihilation strides up, his black and red robes hanging off his body and trailing behind him all the while. Lempo ceases his incantation and quickly bows. "Emperor Diablo! I apologize. I did not mean for you to-"

"To get involved? To learn of your treachery?!" Diablo grabs Lempo by the shirt and slams him into the ground. "You little shit! How dare you stand with claws at the ready against our allies! I would kill you on the spot if it weren't for your rank!"

The younger demon growls. "I'm... I'm only doing what you refuse to! Stupid old man! The Volgrim are taking us for a ride! They scarcely give us a pittance while they take the lion's share of the galaxy! It isn't fair!"

Diablo freezes. He glances at the Volgrim standing thirty feet away. "I apologize for my subordinate's behavior. He doesn't know his place."

The Volgrim slowly places his hands together. [I an nus tu tha'saun. It shut sha ulunuun anung xuia' laulfta? Thas gha ha'a ftaan... ianrau'?]

I am not so certain. Is this the opinion among your people? That we have been... unfair?

"Of course not. The humans have worlds to live on. We have the ever-expanding Labyrinth. We live comfortably."

"Lies!" Lempo struggles in Diablo's grasp. "We live like rats in the darkness, while the Volgrim live in towers of steel and glass! We helped them defeat the fleshbags! We should reap the rewar-"

WHAM.

Diablo slaps the youth's face so hard the ground shakes. He instantly goes limp in Diablo's grip and offers no more resistance.

The Volgrim, however, doesn't miss the exchange. [I taa. Su shut ut sha ulunuun ur nanx un xuia' tuthuasx.]

I see. So this is the opinion of many in your society.

Diablo stands up straight. "No. A vocal minority. I'll take care of them. I'm... I'm sorry for the inconvenience."

The Volgrim bows his head. [An aluftugx utn's anuiagh. Thut ut sha tathung g'uial su thugh ial un sha ftats ru'a xaa't. Ir anusha' allaa't, sha Fuianga't ghuftft saka g'aas urranta.]

An apology isn't enough. This is the second group to show up in the last five years. If another appears, the Founders will take great offense.

A moment later, the female demon who grabbed Lempo earlier clutches her throat. All the demons behind her do as well. Every single one of the two-thousand demons, including Lempo, begin to wheeze and gasp, as though something was choking them with two thousand invisible hands.

Then... their heads explode.

The sounds of two-thousand fleshy balloons detonating makes my stomach churn. Henry grabs his mouth beside me and recoils from the screen in horror.

Their bodies flop to the ground. Only Diablo remains.

The Third Emperor stares silently at the Volgrim. "Damn you. I could have stopped them. You didn't have to use force."

[Anung nx laulfta, guttans ut lianuthag ftx gaash. Onftx shuta ghhu ag'aa ghush sha Fuianga't a'a aftftughag su ftu'a. Ir xuia ghuth su taa ragha' ur xuia' ruftsh gua ftuka shata sugax, shan xuia thuiaftg thuna ial ghush a tuftiasuun.]

Among my people, dissent is punished by death. Only those who agree with the Founders are allowed to live. If you wish to see fewer of your filth die like these today, then you should come up with a solution.

A bead of sweat rolls down Diablo's face. "Of... of course. I apologize for the trouble, Executor Nufaris. It won't happen again. I promise."

The video cuts off.

Henry stares in disgust at the screen. "What the hell was that? I've never seen two thousand heads explode at the same time."

"Can't say I have either. Christ. Whatever these Volgrim are, they're dangerous. Even Diablo looked spooked."

The young man wipes his face with his sleeve. "What was that one guy saying? His words made my head hurt."

"Nothing important. He threatened the demons and said some other stuff. More importantly, one of my biggest questions was answered today."

"Yeah? What's that?"

I tap my lip and turn to look at each of the warp-gates in the Core. "We've scoured the database of known planets. Every single one had humans living on it. If humans are the cattle for demons, then why do demons live inside the Labyrinth? Why don't they take the lush worlds and relegate humans to the dark corridors of Hell?"

"I don't know. Why not?"

"Because of some ancient treaty. The demons must have agreed to something along with these 'Volgrim.' That's the obvious answer. I feel like I'm missing puzzle pieces, though."

Behind me, the screen with the Volgrim video makes a loud BEEP.

I turn to look at it. A message appears onscreen.

UNAIASHU'UCTHAG ATHTHATT GASATHSAG. INRU'NUNG P'ATUGANS OTA.

The Crown translates for me.

UNAUTHORIZED ACCESS DETECTED. INFORMING PRESIDENT OSE.

I blink in surprise. "Err, it says it's contacting... 'President Ose'. Who's that?"

Henry looks at me worriedly. "I don't know. Never heard of him. Maybe we should turn this off. It sounds ominous."

I reach over to turn the computer terminal off. "Yeah. You're probably right. I need to speak to Samantha anyway. Maybe she can tell me what-"

The moment before my finger makes contact with the screen; something leaps out of the monitor and flies into my eyeball. There's no pain for a moment, but a split-second later, I feel a burning, festering agony inside my brain.

"Ahh!! Shit! Something... in my... head!!"

A blur of movement. The floor rushes at me.

"Mister Hiro?! Holy sh-"

Henry's voice fades away. A woman's voice replaces his.

"Ah. I see. So you're the one who opened the forbidden files. I should have known."

Part 078: The Knowledge-Seeker

Bael flops on the floor of the destroyed Hell Harbor Annex. Having recently demorphed from his Balrog form, the Duke of Pain is sapped dry of all his energy. He groans. "Aaaooo... I'm dead inside. You guys go on without me. I can't move a muscle."

I glance from him to the remaining demons — Barbatos, whose body is now controlled by his brother, Artorias, as well as Mephisto and myself.

Not ten minutes ago, I fought for my life against Uriel and eked out a win. Now the body she possessed stands across from me, as much of an ally as if it were Barbatos himself.

It amuses me how quickly the tides of battle can shift.

Artorias touches his chest. "My apologies, Emperor Ose. I was unable to stand against the Archangel. I could only watch as she continued her bloodthirsty rampage."

"Don't blame yourself. Until your brother wakes up, I expect you to take care of his body." I brush my long hair back and walk over to a nearby data terminal. Despite the fact Uriel destroyed its screen, I can still access its data. I touch my hand to the monitor and send a pulse of electricity into it, powering it up. A moment later, my mind interfaces with the machine.

I locate the one I'm looking for: a Baron named Orias. His current location shows up as a bright-red dot somewhere within the Labyrinth.

With my free hand, I weave a magic sign and transmit my mind into the machine, leaving my body to stand behind like a robot on autopilot. I travel through the magic pathways across the barrier sealing Hell Harbor from Hell itself and through a thousand miles of the Labyrinth until I reach my target.

My astral form pops into existence at the Baron of the Stars' right side. "Orias. It's Ose."

Orias sits on the ground with a series of gems spread out before himself. Each one is huge, nearly the size of my fist. Rubies, Diamonds, and Aquamarines mix to create a beautiful array of colors from every part of the rainbow. The Baron of the Stars polishes them quietly, using his fingernails to carve them down to the perfect size for his magic.

When I speak, Orias tilts his head slightly to glance up at me. The giant, multicolored gem embedded in his forehead shines even in the dim lighting, giving him a calm, regal appearance.

"Ose. You don't appear alarmed. Can I assume you've defeated the Archangel, or will you need my help?"

I shake my head. "No, you're fine. I only came to swap information. We defeated Uriel, as you expected."

The white-haired Baron smiles at me. His eyes reflect the tranquility of an ancient demon, one even older than myself. Having awakened alongside Satan and the other Emperors during the Ancient Era, his knowledge of demonkind's history touches back to our first moments of cognizance.

He is not worried about Uriel, nor was he ever.

"Good, I'm glad to hear that," Orias says, returning his attention to the aquamarine gem in his grasp. He continues gliding his nail across its surface, scraping it down to a perfectly symmetrical shape. "I thought I might have to dig into my hoard for once. Too bad. It's been ages since I saw any action."

A hint of guilt passes through my mind. "Sorry. In terms of seniority, rather than me, you should have been the next in line to become an Emperor."

"No, no, we need someone with bright, intelligent eyes like yours to guide us," Orias says, never taking his eyes off the gem in his hand. As he manipulates the beautiful blue jewel, I catch a glimpse of the various gemstones embedded in his wrist and arm when his sleeve retracts for a moment. Unlike the other demons, Orias lacks any innate magical energy. However, by pulling power from minerals dug from planets, he gains incredible abilities far outstripping those of similarly-ranked demons. I can only wonder how powerful he might become if he were to reach the level of Emperor.

"Sigh... I'm too old to be anyone's leader. I'm glad you've decided to take over in Diablo's stead. He'd want that."

Orias pauses.

"That reminds me. Now that I know you were successful, I can call off the reinforcements from the Hidden Alcoves. I'm sure they were feeling incredibly tense, wondering if you would succeed or not."

Orias reaches to his left, where a small heap of tiny, randomly assorted gems rests. He plucks a black onyx gem from the pile, crushes it in his palm, and closes his eyes. A faint burst of energy leaps out of his body, disperses a few feet above his head, and travels in several dozen directions simultaneously.

I watch as Orias completes his magic ritual. Once he finishes, I clear my throat. "I did have a small task to ask of you if you can find the time. I'd like to know how many demons Uriel slew during her latest appearance. If you'd be so kind as to gather the numbers for me..."

"Naturally," Orias says, smiling. He returns his attention to the aquamarine gem in his hand. "You need only ask, Emperor Ose."

"That's what I like about you," I say, turning away from the Baron of Stars. "Your straightforwardness."

With a motion of my hands, my astral body vanishes. A moment later, I reappear in my original form, inhaling reflexively. "Orias is going to count the casualties for us. I'm returning to the Labyrinth to search for survivors. Mephisto... if you're looking for corpses, you should come with me."

The Duke of Mist rubs his bony fingers together. "Yesss, I mussst replenisssh my ghoulsss."

"Fantastic. That's the go-getter spirit I'm looking for." I roll my eyes. "Bael, you stay here. You won't be any help."

"Damn straight," Bael grunts back. "I need to nap for a few months. Going Balrog twice in a row is tiring."

"You poor thing," I say, before beckoning to Artorias. "You're going to help me clean up Uriel's mess. Come along."

"I wanna go, too!" A chubby demon girl jumps out from behind a rock. "I have to find Mister Beelzebub!"

"Who are you? Never mind, I remember. You know Beelzebub is dead, right?"

"No, he can't be! Mister Beelzebub can regenerate from anything!" The girl runs over and grabs Bael's shoulder. He groans in pain, but she ignores him. "Remember? You crushed his head a bunch of times, but he kept coming back!"

Bael weakly swipes at her hand. "Urgh... no touchy... my body hurts. Anyway, sure, that kid can live through anything, but I doubt he'll return this time."

"Nnn!!" The girl kicks Bael's foot, which makes the big lunk howl in pain. "I'll show you! Mister Beelzebub is the bestest demon ever!"

I sigh. I'm surrounded by idiots.

A few minutes later, Artorias weaves several complex magic signs, and we step through his portal into a realm of pure darkness.

"Where is this place?"

I ask the question to nobody in particular. A massive void in all directions, and a floor charred black by a terrific explosion is all I can see in the darkness all around us. I shoot a bolt of electricity into the distance, and it fizzles out before it can hit a wall.

Artorias replies. "We're in the Labyrinth."

"Surely you jest. The Labyrinth has no wide-open spaces like this anywhere. The Slaughterseum is the closest, and this empty expanse dwarfs it."

The chubby young demoness stumbles over a loose rock and bangs her knee. "Oww."

I'm no fan of the darkness. Using my inner electricity, I transform my skin into an electric current, brightening the area around us. Despite my luminescence, we still can't see anything but the floor. No walls or ceiling appear even if I squint.

Mephisto cranes his neck to look in all directions. "Ssso much for corpsssesss. All that isss left isss asssh and dussst."

The Duke of Mist slides over and nudges a block of coal with his foot. "Forget sssurvivorsss. We'll be lucky to find a few ssscattered bonesss."

"Now now, let's not lose our optimism," I say dryly, though I know he's right. "Start poking around. Everyone go in different directions and-"

Suddenly, in the distance, a terrific BANG startles me. A momentary flash of light makes me jerk my head to the right. "What the hell was that?"

The sound of footsteps pattering away catches my attention. I can barely make out the plump demoness, Rosalia, running into the darkness.

"Where are you going?" I ask.

She doesn't answer, which annoys me. She'll probably get herself killed if that was an enemy. Maybe I should let her die. Survival of the fittest is my life philosophy, after all.

Artorias raises a hand. "Do not worry. I will protect her."

"You will?"

Instead of answering me, the Duke weaves a magic sigil with his hands, turning his body into a light-form, not unlike my electricity. He walks after Rosalia while illuminating the darkness. "Rosalia. Stop. Don't run off on your own."

Hearing Uriel speaking through Barbatos's body was unnerving. Her voice dripped with poison. But Artorias is more talkative than his brother and yet much more solemn than the Archangel. I don't know if I'll grow used to it anytime soon.

Mephisto looks at me. "I'll go thisss way." He trudges in the opposite direction. I wonder to myself if he'll hit a wall before Artorias and Rosalia do.

As for myself, I transform into pure lightning and jump into the sky. It barely takes me a split second to reach the ceiling and adhere to it, but when I do, I instantly calculate the maximum reach of the explosion. Beelzebub's detonation created a four-mile in diameter crater, obliterating everything within its radius.

I zip over to a wall at the far end and then to the opposite side to confirm. My calculations prove correct.

The distant sound of a male screaming at the top of his lungs turns my blood from electric to ice. I transmit to the source and arrive right as a small explosion detonates, knocking me back and stunning me.

When I wipe the spots from my eyes, I see a disgusting creature rolling on the ground. Several arms and legs extend from its body in all directions, and its head is misshapen and disgusting. After a moment, I come to the shocking realization that it is none other than Beelzebub himself. I only recognize him by his voice as he screams in pain. "Aaahhhh!!!! Aaauuughhhh!!"

Every few seconds, he grows a new limb and detonates one of the others, blowing the body part to pieces and sending blood and innards all over the place. The stench of rotting and burned innards churns my stomach.

"B-Beelzebub! What's wrong with you?"

He doesn't answer, and instead only continues to scream and wail. "Gahahaaaughhhh!!"

Rosalia comes into view, along with Artorias. Artorias recoils in disgust at Beelzebub's pitiful condition, but Rosalia moves in fearlessly. "Mister Beelzebub! I knew you'd be-"

"Stay back!" I warn her. "He keeps spontaneously exploding! I think he's lost control of his powers."

As I say that, one of his legs explodes even more intensely than the other limbs before it. Rosalia yelps, but Artorias forms a wall of light to protect her from the blast.

Beelzebub continues to flail about helplessly. Rosalia presses against Artorias's wall. "Mister Beelzebub! Get ahold of yourself! You're not supposed to scream and cry! It isn't like you!"

"The Duke isn't himself," I say, taking a step back. "Don't get too close. He's in hysterics. What happened?"

Artorias walks up behind Rosalia and stares uneasily at Beelzebub. "Spawn of the Devil. Give me a moment. I'll do my best to help ease this child's pain."

Before I can ask how Artorias plans to pull that off, the Duke takes three steps toward Beelzebub and shrugs off another explosion. He grabs one of the Duke's bloody arms and winces. Immediately, Beelzebub goes limp and breathes softly for a few moments as he wheezes for breath.

Rosalia leans down beside Artorias. "What's wrong with him? Is Mister Beelzebub going to be alright?"

Artorias wipes sweat from his chest. His breathing appears noticeably more labored. "A-aye. He... should be fine. I'm absorbing his pain into myself. He... he can't control his body right now since his mind is suffering. I don't mind a little extra pain if it helps him."

Rosalia nods and leans in to look at Beelzebub. For the first time, I notice an odd emotion in her eyes. Something very un-demonlike. Love.

I could be wrong, of course, but Rosalia looks at Beelzebub with more adoration than any mere servant should. It's revolting. I turn away and gaze into the darkness.

Love is a human characteristic. Demons shouldn't experience it. All it does is weaken the giver and strengthen the recipient. Demons care only about ourselves. It's what makes us strong, and humans weak. Supporting another demon instead of one's self is antithetical to our identity.

Disgusting. Ah, well, at least Rosalia's sentiments are directed toward a fellow demon, and not a filthy human. That would be where I draw the line.

A smile stretches across my face.

I should bar humans and demons from romanticizing one another. Then, when Belial inevitably breaks my rule, I'll sentence her to death. Now that would be a delicious twist of fate.

"Ose. Emperor Ose!" Artorias yells, interrupting my thoughts.

I turn back to the group of three. "What?"

"I stabilized Beelzebub's condition. However, we need to get him to the Healing Chambers. His body and mind have lost their resonance. It will take him several days to fully recover."

"Fine, fine. Do what you must. I'm going to continue searching for other survivors. Let me know if his condition worsens."

Artorias stares at me. "I doubt it could get worse than this."

Nodding, I pivot on my heel and stride into the darkness.

Several minutes pass. I find a piece of flesh and a few scattered bones, but the chance of finding survivors other than Beelzebub diminishes every step I take. Eventually, I reach the edge of the crater.

Several tunnels that used to connect to our weapon factory line the wall. I don't immediately recognize which ones go where.

A buzzing sensation in the back of my head draws my attention. I close my eyes and connect to the microchip I implanted in my brain dozens of millennia ago. It's a unique device that allows me to use various computer terminals scattered around the Labyrinth remotely, even when in the Reality Dimension.

Several images appear in my head. One of them makes my heart catch. The face of a human appears. I don't recognize him.

Whoever he is, he's trying to access files regarding the Overlords. How would he know about those? Ah, it seems he already unlocked them. He's viewing them right now!

Confound it all. I hate humans who dig into things they shouldn't.

The man covers his mouth in shock and recoils from the screen. When he does, a second human comes into view. A black-haired youth. It appears that both of them have seen files regarding the Overlords. Seven Devils. I bet it was Belial who tipped them off. I knew she was up to no good.

I open my eyes and quickly weave several hand signs. My mind astrally projects outward and leaves my body.

After a minute or so, I fly through walls and race across the Labyrinth at an astonishing speed. Soon, the Core appears as a hotspot of computers and electricity, drawing my gaze. When I arrive, I immediately spot the intruder speaking to his friend. I enter his mind without a moment's notice.

His entire life's history appears before me. Jason Hiro. Human. Male. 18 Years old.

He's the bloody Wordsmith!

"Ah. I see. So you're the one who opened the files. I should have known."

The Hero stumbles around and clutches his head. His thoughts reply to my mental intrusion. What the hell? Who are you?!

"I'm Ose, the new Emperor of the demons. You're Jason Hiro, leader of humanity. I've heard about you in passing once or twice."

Yeah? It's nice to be famous. Get out of my head!

"I can't do that. You accessed files regarding the Overlords. For a demon, that's a death sentence. Your punishment will be far worse."

The human tries to open his mouth to speak, but I stop him from doing so. "Don't get cute with me. I know about your ability. Wordsmithing. You can make anything happen by uttering a single word."

He nods, but his motor control quickly falls into my grip. His movements become noticeably dulled.

Shit. I didn't know a demon like you existed. Leave me alone!

"That option isn't on the table, child. You're going to do as I say. I'll start by having you kill anyone who saw those files; then, we can erase the data. After that, I'll lobotomize you. You won't be a threat to the demons ever again."

I chuckle inwardly. A threat. Adorable. One human, no matter how mighty, can never meaningfully resist the power of demonkind. However, allowing him to agitate the Overlords would be unwise.

Jason struggles for several moments. It annoys me what a fight he's putting up as I try to move his arms and legs. I'm not doing shit, you crazy bitch! Get out of... of my head!

Heroes have access to Holy Energy, but that shouldn't prevent me from controlling him. After all, I've manipulated angels before. No, instead, something unseen fortifies his mind far beyond its natural limits. An artificial barrier of some sort. Perhaps he bolstered his mental defenses with Wordsmithing.

Cunning. I'll give Jason that much, but his feeble efforts will prove useless against my genius.

I weave a few signs with my physical body, and a moment later, the magic travels to my astral form. A bolt of electricity arcs from a nearby computer terminal and shocks Jason's heart. The man gasps and falls on his back, unable to think clearly for a moment.

Perfect. Jason's defenses are down. I'll start by overwriting his personality, then move on to his ego and motor controls. After that, it should be a simple matter of-

Hm? Something's not right. I still can't access his subconscious. Not even a Hero should be able to resist me. It's almost as if there are two minds here.

No... no it can't be. There's a second consciousness inside Jason's body! It's waking up. I must have disturbed it when I...

"Who's there? Where am I?"

The voice speaks. It's masculine. I don't recognize it, but yet, somehow, he sounds familiar.

I try to pull out of Jason's brain, but a barrier forms, sealing me in. What the hell? That shouldn't be possible! I'm in my astral form!

A phantasm of a human male appears in the darkness of Jason's mind. Elaborate robes of purple, gold, and red flow off his body and spill across the ground. A crown with dozens of jewels sits atop his head, and he carries a scepter in his right hand. His aged face, still in its prime, along with his black and grey hair, speaks to his age and experience.

He's a king. A human king. He looks familiar. Have I seen him before?

The man looks me up and down. "Why, hello there, good-looking! How are you on this glorious day?"

A sense of unease sprouts in my stomach. "Who are you?"

"Come now, ye beauteous one! Tis' shameful to ask a question before answering the one who asked first!"

"Ugh. I'm feeling dandy. Now tell me who you are."

The man twirls his scepter and does a little tap-dance. "What, you don't recognize me? I'm King Solomon, the most incredible, brilliant, and accomplished human who has ever lived!"

"Given what I know of humans, that isn't saying much."

Solomon slaps his knee. "Aha! You have a delightful sense of humor!"

"I wasn't joking."

The king stops his dancing. His face turns stern. "I died. I remember it well. The fact I have returned must mean you revived me. My question is, for what nefarious plot?"

"I did no such thing. You just happened to be in this Hero's mind, and you woke up. Release me at once, foolish human, or I will detonate my astral form and fry his mind to ash."

Solomon cocks his head. He stares at me curiously. "Nothing you say makes any sense. What Hero are you referring to?"

I wave my arms around at the void surrounding us. "Jason! You're part of his mind, are you not?"

"Hm. Perhaps I am. He must be the wearer of my Crown. One moment, please." He nods slightly at me. A barrier of light appears around me, sealing me in place. My heart pounds like a sledgehammer as the ancient king vanishes into the void.

A minute passes. Two minutes. Three. I bang against the barrier, but it saps my strength when I touch it. I can't break free.

King Solomon. His name is familiar. Is he another Hero? Why would two Heroes be in the mind of one? How?!

He reappears suddenly, his face as hard as steel. "I spoke to Jason. I understand, now. You don't belong here, 'Ose.' Trying to take over this young one's mind was quite the cowardly move, but luckily I've dealt with your type before. Begone."

The barrier vanishes. A weight I hadn't noticed vanishes from my chest.

But something else appears.

An emotion I haven't felt in ages.

Anger. Rage.

How dare this human make a mockery of me?

Me. Ose. The most brilliant demon who has ever lived. A prodigy far above her peers.

I crafted the Labyrinth into a finely tuned machine. I wrote the treaties that gave us freedom. I subjected the humans to carefully crafted routines that increased their soul output and kept them under our control.

And now... this so-called king thinks he can tell me to leave?!

Nobody... nobody tells me what to do. I make my own choices.

"Listen here, little human. It will be a frigid day in Hell before-"

Solomon holds his hand up, interrupting me. "I see that look in your eyes, but I told you to leave. When I issue a command, you obey. Leave. Now."

A whirlwind of pressure suddenly rushes against my mind. Ten trillion numbers and equations hit me, disorienting me with their relentless onslaught. Images of a hundred thousand animals, bugs, technology

I can't fathom, images of the universe...

Every moment, the pressure increases dramatically. I stagger back and pull away.

My astral form returns to my body a minute later. I stumble forward and fall on my face, sweat drenching every inch of my body.

"Haah... haah..."

I can barely breathe! What the hell? Who... who WAS that human?!

He's powerful. Brilliant. I've never felt so small... so insignificant in my entire life.

* * *

No. That isn't true. I have. Once. When I was a child.

Once, I felt helpless in the presence of a human male.

However, that was a long time ago. I don't want to remember the past.

Slowly, I flip myself around to lie on my back and slow my breathing. My entire body aches. It's as if I haven't slept in a thousand years.

Whoever Solomon is... he's no ordinary human. He's more than a Hero. He's a genuine threat. He'll be the end of demonkind if I don't stop him.

I'm not doing shit, you crazy bitch! Get out of... of my head!

I squeeze my skull hard and roll around on the ground. The pain in my head intensifies as I battle with the woman in my mind. Gahh! It hurts! My head hurts!!

Suddenly, the pain vanishes. I breathe evenly and open my eyes to see Henry's panicked expression a few inches away. "Mister Hiro! Are you okay? What's going on?"

I blink twice to make sure I'm not hallucinating. "Someone entered my mind: a demoness named Ose. She tried to take control of my body, but something happened. I don't hear her voice anymore."

Henry nods. "Right, right. Is she gone, then? Did you force her out?"

"I think she is. Maybe." I sit up and rub my eyes. "Sweet, salty Christ. My head feels like someone dropped an anvil on it."

"Henry holds his hand out. "I'll help you to your feet, Mister Hiro."

I shake my head. "No... there's still something in my head. I feel it. It's like two gnats are buzzing in each ear."

A moment passes.

"Hello? Are you Jason?"

A man's voice speaks to me from my left. I turn and look, but there's nobody there.

Uhh... what?

"Can you hear me? Wakey-wakey."

The voice speaks again, this time to my right. I turn to look in confusion, but there's nobody there.

"I hear you. Who's speaking? Someone invisible?"

The voice replies. "Nope. I'm in your head. But worry not, young Hero! You have not developed schizophrenia! Focus your mind, and behold my wondrous visage!"

I'm getting so tired of people invading my mind. However, unlike the demon lady from before, this man doesn't hurt my head at all. Heck, his voice feels somewhat pleasant, like the warmth of a cozy fire.

I close my eyes. After focusing for a moment, the speaker appears in my mind. To my surprise, he wears Solomon's Crown, along with a bunch of kingly garments.

"Hey! Who are you? Why are you wearing my crown?"

The man stares at me for a few moments before cracking a grin. "Ahaha, a wonderful jest! Your crown, hm? I was not aware that your name was Solomon!"

"It isn't. Wait, hold on a second..."

I stare at him for a few moments.

"Are... are you Solomon?"

"Nailed it! Yahtzee! Goodness, how long have I slumbered? It seems nobody recognizes me these days. I used to be the talk of the world for thousands of years!"

"You did? No, more importantly, why can I see you? Or rather, how?"

Solomon shrugs. "I'm not yet certain. Shouldn't take me long to figure out, though. Nothing ever does! That's the beauty of being the smartest person in existence!"

A few moments pass. Solomon creases his brow. "Hmm. I see. After I sealed the artifacts of power in the Labyrinth, I placed a powerful barrier of Holy Magic around my crown and expired. Then, after some time passed, you came along and found it. Is that about right?"

I nod dumbly. "Uh. Sure. You died?"

"Indeed. It was quite the prolonged and unpleasant death, I might add. I couldn't take a chance that heroic artifacts might fall into the wrong hands, especially mine."

"I'm sorry for your loss."

Solomon waves his hand flippantly. "As Archimedes used to say, nothing lost, nothing gained, am I right? Anyway, let's get back to the topic at hand. I've got this unbelievably beautiful demon woman trapped in your mind. On the one hand, I despise demons, but on the other, I do love me a voluptuous lady. I don't know whether to kill or release her."

"You can kill her?"

"Oh, yes, without a doubt. The worst thing a psychic can do is enter a mind protected by my Crown. In fact, during my conquest of the seventh legion of Hell, there was an entire regiment of psychics I dismantled from the inside out! The poor fools didn't know what hit them."

I open my eyes and see Henry staring at me silently. The kid notices me stirring. "What's going on, Mister Hiro?"

"I developed a second personality," I reply. "No big deal. I've had several of those already. Solomon, get Ose out of my head. No killing, please."

A hazy apparition of Solomon appears before me, as though he's standing next to Henry. However, the youth doesn't see him.

"No killing, huh? Well, aren't you the principled one. If it were my mind, I'd obliterate any intruder ruthlessly. At the least, I'd turn them into a vegetable."

"By all means, make it hurt. Teach Ose a lesson about entering minds she shouldn't. No killing, though."

"Sure, sure. You're the boss."

Solomon flashes me an okay hand-sign and vanishes.

He reappears not fifteen seconds later and spins his scepter around, then does a little dance. "Tadahhh! 'Tis done! She'll be smarting for a while!"

"That didn't take you long."

"Of course not! Don't you know who I am? I'm the Knowledge-Seeker! The mightiest, most brilliant, cunning, dashing Hero who ever lived!"

I flick my eyes to Henry. He continues to stare at me in confusion, likely wondering why in the hell I'm talking to myself and looking to his side.

"Mister Hiro...?"

"Henry, nothing that's happening right now will make the slightest sense to you. Contact Hope for me. I need to chat with him."

The youth fiddles with his fingers. "Oh. I already did that. When you went into convulsions, I sent an emergency message to Neil."

"Perfect. What rank are you?"

"Rank? Do you mean military rank, Mister Hiro?"

"Mhm."

"...Private."

"Nice. You're a lieutenant now. I like you."

Henry's eyes widen. "What? A-are you sure, Mister Hiro?! I'm too young for such an honor!"

"Yeah, well, I'm too young to save the universe. Everyone starts somewhere. Go to the gates and wait for Hope and Neil. Let them know where I am when they get here."

The youth nods excitedly. "Yes! Yes, of course, Mister Hiro! Thank you very much!" He quickly marches away to wait for Neil and Hope, leaving Solomon and me alone.

King Solomon slowly scans the room. "Hideous. Absolutely hideous."

"I beg your pardon?"

He beckons toward the wall of servers. "Warp-gates, computers, men in military uniforms, but no decorations, gah! This appears to be a military center, yet I see no symbols of patriotism, no gold or jewels to draw the eye. How can you lead such a ragtag group of warriors? Where's your sense of heroic pride?!"

"I don't follow. Do you know where you are?"

Solomon rolls his eyes. "Of course. We're in the center of Hell, in the Labyrinth Core. You appear to have taken over the Devil's base from the inside-out. Not bad for a young upstart."

"Uh, thanks, I guess. We've only been here for a few months. We spent most of that time building technology to combat the demons. They could invade at any moment. I haven't had time to focus on the, err, aesthetics of the place."

Solomon groans. "Ugh. Well, lucky for you, I'm awake now. You're probably not aware, but I'm the greatest mind in the universe. I devised tens of thousands of military strategies. With me assisting you, we'll be unstoppable."

"You mentioned your brilliance a few times," I mutter. "Before that, though... I need to ask you a question. Ose appeared in my mind because I discovered a video file I shouldn't have seen. It pertains to the existence of these... these creatures. They look human, but they aren't."

"Alright. Go on." Solomon stares at me expectantly.

"They're called Volgrim. Have you heard of them?"

A moment passes. Cracks appear in the King's smiling facade.

"Volgrim. I hoped never to hear that name again."

"You know who they are?"

"I do."

"Are you going to tell me?"

A long silence follows. Solomon looks away. His expression turns somber.

"They're aliens, Jason. They come from halfway across the galaxy. And... they're... unstoppable."

I observe the King quietly.

"Unstoppable?"

"You haven't a clue."

My eyes drift to the monitor. It now sits on a black screen since we turned it off. The reminder of what I saw a few minutes ago floats in the blackness; that of two thousand demon heads exploding simultaneously.

"Tell me. I need to know what I'm dealing with."

"The truth hurts, Jason. Are you sure you want me to tell you?"

"I am."

Solomon traces a circle on his palm. "So be it."

Part 079: Trust Issues

The hallucination before me, shaped like that of a noble king, begins pacing back and forth. I know he's a mirage, given his ghostly appearance and how only I can see him. Unlike ghosts from old cartoons who wore bedsheets over their heads, Solomon is a man with carefully combed blonde hair and blue eyes. The purple, red, and gold colors across his body give him a stylish, flamboyant appearance capable of turning heads.

Extravagant. That's how I'd classify Solomon's appearance.

Solomon ceases his bravado and self-glorification as he meets my gaze. "The Volgrim were an enemy unlike any other that humanity had fought. Hell, they still are. When they arrived at our doorstep in the year 2139, it took everyone, including me, by surprise."

"2139? That's over a hundred years after I entered the Cryopod."

Solomon cocks his head. "What do you mean? Why did you enter suspended animation?"

He continually surprises me with his knowledge of technical subjects. How in the hell would a king from the friggin' Bronze Age know what a cryopod is?

"It's a long story. I had a troubled life. Saw an opportunity to be of use to science rather than simply... ending it."

"Suicidal thoughts?" Solomon averts his gaze. "Few heroes have ever felt that way. Hell, none that I knew did. I'm surprised."

"I didn't know I was a Hero. I was a kid with no friends living a life in poverty. I considered buying a pistol and ending it all, but the ad requesting a guinea pig for science caught my eye. And then... I ended up a hundred thousand years in the future."

"That's unnerving," Solomon mutters. He resumes his pacing. "Anyway. In 2139, the Volgrim appeared with a massive fleet of Warships. Humanity had already begun to colonize the Moon and Mars, but we had no idea they had been monitoring us for decades, possibly even centuries. The aliens knew everything about us: Our culture, our beliefs, and even our military capabilities. They issued an ultimatum. Either we would bow to their will and accept them as our masters, or they would annihilate us."

I cross my arms. "That's it, huh? That must have started one hell of a war. No way humanity would go down without a fight. I've seen enough alien movies to know that much."

Solomon sighs. "Haah... not quite. The leaders of every country held a vote. They decided unanimously to cooperate with the Volgrim."

"Bullshit. You're lying."

"I am many things, lad, but a deceiver isn't one of them." Solomon stares out at the monsters and humans milling about. I see a question form in his mind, but whatever it is, he decides not to ask. "I don't think you understand the severity of the situation. Ever since the third World War, Britain had taken the lead in military technology. They possessed the most advanced weaponry on Earth, but they were the first to capitulate. Nothing we had compared to Volgrim warp-drives and orbital cannons. To say their technology was a million years more advanced than humanity's would be a gross understatement."

I pull up a chair and sit down. "Okay, forgive me for interrupting your story, Solomon... but how the hell do you know all this? Didn't you live and die around one thousand years before Jesus Christ?"

Solomon smirks. "Heroes never die. Provided one had a legendary artifact gifted to them by Camael, their soul would seal inside of it after their death. I lived on quite comfortably inside my Crown long after my physical body expired."

The ancient king pauses for a moment. "Hm. Of course, heroes could also end up inside ordinary objects, too, depending on how their lives ended, but that's a story for another day."

Slowly, my eyes rove up and down his frame. Solomon's ghostly form is much more transparent near his legs compared to his head and chest. He seems to hover in midair.

"What's that like? Living inside an artifact, I mean."

"It's wonderful. Fantastic. Certainly not boring or dull in the slightest." Solomon rolls his eyes. "Heaven's sake. It's terrible. I lucked out compared to other heroes. My crown was bequeathed to many men and women as the years passed. It tended to stay among the ranks of nobility, and later the church, so I usually had someone to converse with. Heaven knows that any hero trapped inside a melee weapon had a rough time once people began using firearms."

His words make me remember Joan. She exited her sword when Amelia touched it. I wonder if she lived a lonely life filled with boredom as well.

"I think I get it. You ended up inside a Crown, and those are typically worn by nobility, so you at least got to witness the world change as the years passed. That doesn't seem too bad."

A moment passes. Solomon chuckles.

"Heh, that's funny. You're funny. I didn't sit back and passively watch, Jason. Don't you know what my Crown can do? Its special power?"

A sense of astonishment washes over me. "It gives the wearer... nearly unlimited knowledge... oh my god."

"Exactly. Friends in high places knew that anyone who wore my artifact would possess nigh limitless knowledge. Most major innovations in technology were created as a result of someone using me to think up new ways to progress humanity."

"Wow. That's super cool. But... then that must mean, when the Volgrim arrived..."

Solomon snaps his fingers. "Yes! You understand! The Pope of the Transhuman Fundamentalists, Father Clarence Jackson, was my wearer at the time. I never offered my opinion on world events, no matter how dire. However, he believed that the end was near if we allowed the aliens to control Earth."

"Ah, so he must have been the one to lead a crusade against them, right?"

Solomon stares at me silently for a moment. "Jason. You do know what a Pope is, correct?"

"Uh... I suppose a...?"

"A pacifist."

"Right. Duh. I knew that."

Solomon groans. "Anyway. Clarence decided to do something out of the ordinary. He loaned my Crown to a woman named Victoria Rothschild. She used her influence to create an army on short notice-"

I hold my hand up. "Hold on; I need to stop you there. Rothschild? Is that the name I think it is?"

Solomon shrugs. "That depends on what you're thinking. Spell them out for me."

"You know... the wealthy banker family. There are- well, were tons of conspiracies about them. Rumors like how they owned trillions of dollars of wealth..."

"All true, I suppose." Solomon waves his hand flippantly. "After she received my Crown, Victoria built a big army, yadda-yadda, two hundred years of continuous war followed, and eventually humanity lost."

I blink slowly. "That's it? I expected a bigger, grander end to the tale."

"Oh, certainly, many things happened. Much of it was political, some of it military. The most important events occurred at the end of the wars, when the leader of humanity decided to surrender. Given she had lived for over three-hundred years and witnessed many catastrophes, including the destruction of Earth, I was surprised she held out as long as she did."

"I'm surprised humans allowed a single person to lead them. What about the United Nations?"

Solomon smiles. "Marie Becker, the Supreme Commander of Earth, took control of the planet as the result of a 98% popular vote. The only people who didn't want her in charge were the other leaders of Earth. Fortunately for her, the common folk remembered her significant achievements during the war, and she won in a landslide."

"Wow. That sounds impressive."

The king's smile slowly morphs into a smirk. "Marie manipulated the votes, but it was probably for the best. I found her political and military finesse to be ideal for the job."

"What?! She cheated! How can you be okay with that?!"

"Trust me, Jason. If you had lived then, you might understand. That being said, Marie surrendered, but under the condition that humanity would be given several worlds to live on in peace. There were a bunch of technical clauses, but I wasn't around for those."

"You weren't?"

Several moments pass. Solomon looks away, toward the Great Doors separating the Core from the rest of the Labyrinth. Despondency appears in his eyes.

"I emerged from my Crown to perform one last heroic feat. I took as many Holy Artifacts as I could find and hid them throughout the Labyrinth, in the hopes that someday if humanity should stand up against the demons and Volgrim, they might have a fighting chance. Then, I perished. I don't know what happened after that."

Solomon lowers his head. "A hundred thousand years. It passed in the blink of an eye. Honestly, Jason... I haven't yet come to grips with my awakening. I thought I departed this existence forever to be with my loved ones. It's strange. I looked forward to my death, but once I died and came back, I couldn't tell you what it was like."

"You didn't dance on clouds and play the harp with angels?"

"Nope. Nothing like that. I felt my body weaken. A terrible exhaustion took me, and a moment later, I opened my eyes and found myself staring at a beautiful demon woman."

"Ose," I murmur.

"That's the one. Ravishing."

"Mmm."

Solomon smiles again as he reflects on whatever he and Ose discussed. "You're in a hopeless situation, Jason."

His sudden change of topic catches me off-guard. "I beg your pardon?"

"I don't know the universe's present situation. After a hundred thousand years, though, I can only imagine how powerful the demons have become, let alone the Volgrim. Do you have a plan for the future?"

I shake my head. "Nope. I'm trying to avert a war and keep the demons at bay. I can't risk attacking them, or they might send a billion grunts to our doorstep before night falls. Hope and Neil seem more confident about our odds of success, but I don't know."

"Hope? Neil?"

"The commander and, um, my clone."

"Clone?" Solomon blinks in surprise. "You cloned yourself? Even with my Crown in your possession, that must have taken a while."

This time, I'm the one who smiles. "You know I'm a Hero, right?"

"I gathered that much by the Heroic Energy surging in your body."

"My power is called Wordsmithing. Well, I mean, that's what I call it. It might have a more technical name, but I don't know."

Solomon nods. "Interesting. Explain."

And so, I do. For over ten minutes, I explain the events of the past several months to Solomon. My life, arriving in the Cryopod, Hoarhiim's orb, the discovery of my powers, my battles against a monster, a human, and even the First Emperor.

After I finish, Solomon whistles. "Psseew... good lord. That's a lot to take in. You battled Satan and didn't die?"

"Yup. He's dead now. After Amelia died, Satan turned into dust."

A spark appears in Solomon's eye. "Right... you mentioned Samantha... but surely her name is Belial, correct?"

"Mhm."

"The Second Emperor of the demons?"

"...Yes. What's with that tone? You're starting to worry me."

The king shakes his head. "It's probably nothing. I remember a little rumor from the ancient ages regarding Julius Caesar and how he met his unfortunate demise."

"Was she involved?"

"Who can know?"

"I'm alarmed now. Christ. After what Hope said..."

"Your clone? What happened?"

I glance shiftily to the side. "Well, I kinda sorta accidentally but intentionally overheard him mention that Samantha is a shapeshifter, and not long after, I confronted her about it. She stormed away, along with my wife. I feel awful for saying anything, but she saw those Volgrim tapes, and-"

"Slow down. What Volgrim tapes?"

"Well, on the terminal behind me, there's a file regarding something about a treaty, and it also has a very graphic video of a Volgrim leader guy doing... something awful. You don't want to see."

Solomon narrows his eyes. "Don't feign indignation on my behalf. Show me."

"It's gruesome."

"Such is war. I've seen things that would shrivel your stomach into the size of a pea, Jason. I want to see whatever that video is."

I groan and spin my chair around to face the monitor. "Okay, okay. Whatever you say, Your Majesty."

Less than a minute later, I tap around and bring up the file list. Solomon holds his finger up. "Wait."

He scans the files one by one, reading each title carefully. "Overlord Protocol. Brainwashing. Incredible."

He continues to mutter to himself for a few minutes. Occasionally, he has me tap on this file or that. I can read the words, but they're all incredibly stiff and stilted, written almost like Legalese.

Solomon, however, has no such trouble. After a minute, he nods. "I understand now. Fascinating. Play the video."

I comply but look away. Solomon doesn't see the world through my eyes, but through the rubies circling his crown, so he's still able to watch the video.

He winces as the demon heads explode. "Gods. You weren't joking. How grisly! Nufaris has expanded his power since I last saw him. And he's an Executor, now! He shot up the ranks."

"You know him?"

"Sadly. Nufaris was the Elder in charge of monitoring Earth during the decades before the Volgrim assault force arrived in 2139. Given how much he learned about humanity during that time, the Founders gave him the title of Ambassador and later made him a general during the Energy Wars. I'm surprised he rose to the very top of the Volgrim hierarchy."

"Mmm." I nod, pretending to understand what he means. "Any thoughts about these files?"

"Plenty." Solomon rubs the bridge of his nose. "Where to begin, where to begin..."

He doesn't get to answer. Henry's voice rings out, nearly giving me a heart attack. "Mister Hiro! I brought Neil and Hope along, just as you asked!"

I swivel in my chair to face the two newcomers. Hope and Neil's eyes widen as they look at me. My doppelganger is the first to speak. "Jason! Are you okay? Henry says you had trouble standing."

"I'm okay, now. Ose tried to hit me with a mental assault, but Solomon's Crown protected me. After that... uh..." I glance at Solomon's ghostly visage. "Well, I made a new friend."

Hope follows my gaze, but stares right through solomon at the monitor behind him. "...The computer?"

"Not exactly. Solomon's Crown isn't an empty vessel of knowledge. The king is still alive inside of it. I can see him now."

Hope doesn't appear convinced. "So, to be clear, the demon woman attacked your mind, and now you have an invisible friend?"

"When you put it that way, you make me sound a little crazy."

"You said it, not me..." Hope trails off and glances at Neil. "Maybe I should inspect Jason's head. Just in case."

Solomon chuckles. "Heh... Jason, use your Wordsmithing. Speak the word, 'Project' and make my apparition visible to them."

Out loud, I ask, "I can do that?"

"Of course. Once you told me Wordsmithing's premise, I instantly comprehended a million ways you could use it. You've scarcely tapped into its power."

"Oh. Okay. Neat. Project."

To my surprise, Solomon's ghostly body becomes noticeably less transparent. His form shifts, turning him into a halfway flesh-and-blood creature.

Neil's eyes widen. Hope gawks. "Whoa...! You're Solomon?"

The king immediately extends his arms out and makes a sweeping gesture with his scepter. "Indeed, young man! I am none other than he, the wisest, most brilliant, and good-looking man to ever walk the Earth! Women clutch me tightly, men cower in fear, and children line up to hear tales of my accomplishments!"

"Ah. That's... nice," Hope says, looking unimpressed. "...Good to meet you. I guess."

Neil nods. "I'm pleased to have the Wisdom King on our side. I know of your feats, your conquests. Napoleon spoke of his contact with you on many occasions, and Saul mentioned your taste in architecture once or twice."

Solomon's grandiose expression and body language melt away. A look of surprise appears on his face. "Saul? My kingdom's lead architect? My nephew?! Is he alive?"

Neil nods and smiles. "Indeed, Your Majesty. I will tell him you've arisen as soon as possible."

"Please do!" Solomon's expression turns giddy. "Incredible! I thought all the people from my era had perished, but one remains! I can't wait to see him again!"

Hope and I wince simultaneously. The knowledge that everyone we've ever known from Earth is long-dead still keeps us up at night, whether we want to admit it or not.

Solomon laughs, but I sigh.

"Um. Hope, Neil. I need to tell you two something. I, err, screwed up earlier."

I didn't want to come out and say this so awkwardly, but the longer I put it off, the worse it will sting.

Neil, Hope, and Solomon's smiles evaporate. Hope crosses his arms and frowns. "What's wrong?"

I grit my teeth. "Look, uh, the moment Phoebe and I heard you returned from the battle with the Archangel, we drove over to the Core with Samantha. I arrived, but you guys weren't here. So... well, I used my Wordsmithing to find you."

Hope nods slowly. The color begins to drain from his face. "Yes... and?"

"I used the word, 'Locate.' I saw you two sitting at a bar. I was going to leave, but... I overheard something. I shouldn't have listened, but it caught my attention. It's terrible, I know, but-"

Neil interrupts me. "Pause. You spied on us? Listened to our conversation?"

Hope glances at Neil, then at me. His expression looks aghast. "What the hell, Jason! I can't believe you'd do that! I'd never snoop on you!"

"It was an accident," I say quickly. In the back of my mind, I groan. Somewhat of an accident, anyway. "I didn't mean to overhear. You and Neil discussed Samantha, and I heard you saying she was a shapeshifter. That's all. I felt terrible I heard anything at all, but-"

"There's no buts!" Hope yells. "That's messed up! What else did you hear?!"

"Nothing else. Like I said-"

Hope looks away and covers his eyes. "I... I wanted to tell you what Neil and I discussed as soon as I came back, but this is... I can't believe it. What a breach of privacy, Jason."

Neil shakes his head in dismay. "Unbelievable."

A tinge of panic enters my voice. "I only heard the one thing! I swear! Come on, Hope, you and I are identical! You'd never eavesdrop on someone intentionally, and neither would I! You know that!"

Hope shakes his head. Slowly, he pulls his hand away from his face and gazes at it. "Are we, Jason?"

"Are we what?"

"The same person. Kar told me he could tell the two of us apart at a glance. We have the same face, but we're still different. I, for one, would never listen in on a private conversation."

I glance at Solomon, looking for help. The king avoids my gaze. You're on your own, pal, his body language says.

Hope and Neil stay quiet for a few moments. Hope swallows audibly. "Christ. You can say whatever you want, Jason, but that was a huge breach of trust. Imagine if you came home and I was in bed with Phoebe. How would you feel?"

I lower my eyes. "Like a knife in the stomach."

"Exactly. Don't use that 'identical twin' crap on me. We aren't the same. You and I lead different lives. Let's go, Neil. We came here for no reason, after all."

Hope and Neil shake their heads in dismay. I start to open my mouth but think better of it.

Maybe they overreacted… but can I blame them?

As the two walk away, I gaze inward to evaluate my actions. Neil and Hope are rapidly becoming good friends. I don't know Neil very well, but I consider Phoebe to be my best friend. What if Hope listened in on a private conversation between the two of us?

I would feel exactly the same way as he does, now — betrayed. I have to apologize later. I have to fix this.

Solomon whistles. "Pssseew… goodness. You bungled that conversation."

"No kidding. Fuck me, dude. I have to apologize to Samantha, Phoebe, and my fucking clone, now. I'm such an asshole."

Solomon shakes his head. "No. You're a child. You may have the powers of a legendary Hero, but everything I see indicates you have much to learn. Everyone makes mistakes, Jason."

He looks away. His voice tightens. "Everyone."

"Including you?"

Several moments pass before Solomon replies. "Especially me. Heroes live a lonely life. I had many women, the favor of the gods, incredible intelligence, and good looks… and somehow I managed to ruin everything with one careless act. It took me thirty years to correct my blunder. I died before I finished."

"What happened?"

Solomon looks away. "I don't want to talk about it."

"Sorry."

The king glances down at his hands. He sighs. "To err is to be human. Those who possess power also possess the capacity to blunder a thousand times worse than the average man. Be exuberant that you need only apologize to amend your situation. Your feelings now will be nothing compared to those felt when you commit an irreparable error."

Solomon smiles listlessly. "Indeed. Once you commit a cardinal sin, you will no longer be the same person. There's no turning back from a mistake like mine."

Unease creeps from my stomach into my throat, like a wraith reaching up to slowly snuff my life out.

"You know what? I won't wait. I'm going to apologize to my wife and Samantha right now. I won't put it off."

As I stand up, Solomon nods. "A wise choice."

I walk toward the warp-gate to Tarus II, and Solomon floats along beside me.

"Say, Jason, bit of a random question here, but on a scale of 1-10, how attractive would you say your wife is?"

"Eleven or twelve. Why?"

Solomon purses his lips. "You're in luck, my boy. I have a way with the ladies. Leave the talking to the professional."

I nod silently. Inside my mind, I think to myself, this won't end well.

Solomon glares at me. "I heard that."

"Sorry."

This is Solomon.

Part 080: The Next Generation

"Whaddya mean Phoebe left?" I ask, while staring at the guard in disbelief. "She was here only four minutes ago!"

As usual, people mill around us in the Core. A goblin here, a lady there. The man before me shrugs. "They seemed agitated. I didn't want to bother Miss Berthol- I mean, Miss Hiro. She got in her truck and left. Nothing seemed out of the ordinary."

I shake my head and sigh. "Yeah, I know. Christ. I thought she'd go hang out in a corner or something. Now I have to chase her down like a weirdo. Thanks."

"Anytime, Your Majesty."

The soldier nods at me and spares only a passing glance toward Solomon's eerie ghost figure. As he pushes past, the young man seems slightly unnerved. His discomfort at the presence of a half-dead spirit might make me laugh under different circumstances. Sadly, my mind is focused entirely on finding my wife so I can apologize to her and Samantha.

Solomon watches as the soldier walks away. "It's been quite literally thousands of years since someone looked me in the eye. I'm used to staring at people's soul energy, not holding conversations on equal terms with flesh-and-blood beings."

I turn and start walking toward the gate to Tarus II. "How does that work? Staring at, err, 'soul energy,' I mean. When I spoke to you in my mind, I thought we were talking man-to-man."

"Nope. You appeared to me like a shapeless blob of milk floating in the air. The projection you saw was little more than your imagination filling in the blanks for my brilliant countenance. Of course, my Crown did provide a little assistance."

After stepping through the portal, I yawn to pop my eardrums. "Neat. Do you think Phoebe went to Hero City, or elsewhere? Maybe she and Samantha went out for a picnic."

Solomon groans. "Jason. When women are mad at you, they wish to be left alone, but generally, a picnic is not at the top of their itinerary. They'll probably chat with each other for a while, and that will be the end of it. A few boring, sexless weeks await, and you'll move past your differences."

A moment passes. I sweep my gaze around, and Solomon steps in front of me. "Do you love Phoebe?"

"Of course I do. That's a stupid question."

"And she loves you?"

"Uh. Well, yes. I don't want to use a cheesy word like 'soulmate,' but..."

"Then you have no reason to worry!" Solomon laughs while grinning like a Cheshire cat. "I've had a few million quarrels with women. For one thing, having infinite knowledge meant I was always correct, and they didn't want to admit their arguments were vastly inferior to mine. However, I often learned to say I was wrong to put an end to the quibbling. My life became much simpler as a result."

I force myself not to roll my eyes. "At least you're humble about your intelligence."

"Indeed." The king snaps his fingers. "Can't you use your Wordsmithing to find Phoebe? The sooner you apologize and own up to your mistake, the sooner we can move on to more important matters."

I stare into the distance, but I can't see Phoebe's truck anywhere. "I can use my Locate spell to track her, but after what happened with Hope, I'd rather not. I'll go home and pray she's there. It'll have to do."

"Mmm. The spying thing. Even though I barely know you, I can see your heart was in the right place. I'm sure your copycat will accept your apology."

"You're probably right. I dunno."

The two of us walk and float through the warp-gate to Tarus II and down the steps out past the security perimeter. Once I arrive on the paved road, I stand off to the side and exhale. "Man, something's bothering me about what Hope said. I called us identical, and he immediately insisted we were different. I don't understand how that can be true. I cloned him from myself barely a week ago. I could understand a few minor differences, but he acted like he was born on a different planet."

"Wasn't he?" Solomon rests his hands on his hips. "You made him here in the Labyrinth. You were born on Earth. That seems like a different planet to me."

"I mean, okay, sure, but that's nitpicking. My point is that Hope had all of my memories, my looks, my emotions, everything was identical right up to the moment of his creation. What the hell could change in a week?"

"I don't know," Solomon replies. "Not about him specifically, anyway. A person's world can change in five minutes, though. What experiences do you and he share, and what have the two of you lived differently?"

I ponder Solomon's question.

A minute passes.

Two.

Three.

"Well, Hope fought Uriel while I stayed behind. I barely know how that went. I'm married to Phoebe... but he has nobody. Now that you mention it, there are a few other differences. I didn't think they were major at first, but maybe you're onto something."

"Of course I am, you simple-minded child! I'm the bloody Knowledge-Seeker. I'm always right." Solomon groans again and spins on his heel. "Why don't you try looking at things from his perspective? If he really was you until the moment you created him, but you're the one getting married while he isn't, how would you feel if you watched Phoebe get stripped away by another man? Even if that man was technically you?"

"Well, I'd... I'd feel pretty terrible."

"Precisely. Awful, alone, confused. Hope has to reinvent his entire identity. Why, it would be like stepping from one epoch of humanity's timeline into another! A jarring and unwelcome change of scenery that would force one to adapt. Surely you know what I mean."

"I do. You're referring to the Cryopod."

"Indeed. You told me you were frightened and scared when you first emerged. It's a natural sensation when one arrives at an unknown destination. For example, if a man comes home to his faithful wife and sees her in bed with another, his existence will shatter. In an instant, he will call into question every moment they shared, every secret, and deep inside his heart, he will shift into a different person entirely. For Hope, he shares all of your memories, so I imagine that right as he was growing comfortable in his new life, met a nice girl, became a Hero that saved everyone from demons and monsters... he was suddenly torn out of all of that and told he needed to rebuild again. That's two major blows to his psyche in one year, and you're both barely out of your adolescent phases."

I stare ahead numbly, looking not at Solomon, but through him. "Wow. I never thought of that. I've been a terrible friend."

"Simply dreadful."

"I should have put myself in his shoes and talked to him more."

"Agreed."

"Solomon, your snark isn't helping."

"I don't care." The King chuckles to himself about something. "Heh, the first step to solving a problem is to recognize there is one in the first place. Even the wisest sometimes struggle with that."

"Including you?"

"No."

This time it's me who groans. "You're so humble. I'm going to make a vehicle. Gimme a sec."

I take a minute to imagine the inner workings of my Ferrari. Its contours, the engine. Before I finish, Solomon speaks. "Hold on. What are you imagining?"

"A car. I have a Ferrari I like to drive."

"Yes. I can see the image in your head. But a vehicle that drives on wheels will be significantly slower and more dangerous than a hovercraft or even a spaceship. Here, let me assist you."

Solomon closes his eyes. A moment later, his mouth opens.

"SAEN DHA WUSNR UL DHA WERR I LAAN DU RAA DHA FAISCRA AED DHA ELDARUFA FIRD UID DHA FIL ELN SHAARA ELN RAD'R SERR AID E NEIRR."

Solomon speaks a series of unintelligible, screechy sounds that nearly make me yank the Crown off my head. Whatever he's saying, they aren't words. Even the Crown can't translate them for me.

He opens his eyes. "There. I've loaded up a basic template for a miniature spacecraft. With this, you can house a crew of up to four people comfortably."

Solomon's design appears in my mind. The ship looks like something from a sci-fi movie, with a sleek silver hull, a pointed nose, an engine on each wing, and a hyperdrive in the back.

However...

"Why the gold lining and baubles? Why did you design this ship with all these rubies and gems all over the hull? I don't understand Bedazzling the exterior of a spaceship."

Solomon scoffs. "You're the bloody Hero! You need to travel in style! People respect and fawn over those who cover themselves in riches and jewelry. It's only natural for the almighty Hero to make people stop and stare when he flies past."

"I think you're going a little too far."

"Psh. I knew you'd complain. I resisted the urge to make the entire exterior solid-gold, but you still whine like a billy goat."

"I'm not whining."

Solomon rolls his eyes. He flaps his hands at me and says in a mocking voice, "I'm not whining."

I sigh. "Solomon... I don't know if anyone has ever told you this before... but you're an asshole sometimes."

"Only sometimes? It's supposed to be constant."

"At least you don't deny it."

I aim my mind at an empty area of the road and speak aloud. "Ship."

Within five seconds, the spacecraft materializes and gently plunks onto the asphalt. It's much bigger in person compared to my mind, standing twenty feet tall, thirty feet wide, and about eighty-feet long. Considering all of the internal mechanisms, it's probably significantly smaller inside.

The entry platform lowers. I walk over to it and grumble to myself about the stupid rhinestones, rubies, and gems embedded all over the side of the craft. A Bedazzled spacecraft is the opposite of badass.

Solomon follows me. Once inside, I gaze around and take in the sights. It's much roomier than I expected, with a single unbroken hallway leading all the way to the beds in the back, bathrooms in the middle, and an open dining area along the way. I expected something akin to a large RV, but it's more like a small house.

I make my way to the cockpit and sit down. Thanks to the Crown, I know what every button, knob, and dial does, but it still feels very... alien.

Solomon sits in the co-pilot seat. "We should give this beautiful lady a name."

"Like what?"

"Oh, I don't know. Something extravagant and mysterious, exuding warmth and wealth."

"None of those adjectives belong in the same sentence."

"Bloody hell, not this again. Always with the complaining..." Solomon trails off. "Ah, I've got it! How about Esther?"

"You want me to name the ship... Esther?"

"Sure! It's a beautiful name! Esther was one of only two women to have an entire book of the Holy Bible devoted to them. The other was my great-great-grandmother, Ruth."

Solomon pauses for a moment before continuing. "Have you, perchance, ever read the Bible?"

"A bit, but only if one of my foster families dragged me to church. I'm more into ancient Greek and Roman philosophy. The Bible didn't do it for me."

Solomon purses his lips. "So that's how it is, eh?"

"I read about you!"

That satisfies him. "Good. My appearance is the most important part of the entire Bible."

"Okay, now you've gone too far. You're not more important than Jesus."

"Sure, I am."

"Bullshit!"

"It's true."

"Yeah, okay. If you say so."

I turn away from him and activate the ship's thrusters. Several button presses later, it ascends into the sky. A sensation of disorientation hits me as we ascend. The gradual climb is so smooth that looking through the windows outside is more like watching a television screen. I don't feel the movement at all.

Solomon reads my mind. "Inertia dampeners."

"Cool."

By the time Esther has hovered a hundred feet up, my eyes raise to the stars above.

Solomon leans back in his chair. "Let's take a detour, Jason."

I've spent months using my new powers, and never once did I consider venturing into space. Now that I'm here, I can't believe myself. I was an idiot.

Thousands, millions, perhaps billions of specks of light dot the sky. Far in the distance, Tarus II's sun, Vorus, burns radiantly. Its light would usually damage my eyes, but thanks to ultraviolet shielding on Esther's front window, it doesn't.

Two small moons orbit Tarus II. Esther highlights several points of interest in the space around our planet, including a comet and an asteroid caught in orbit.

Solomon rubs his hands together. "Breathtaking, isn't it? I remember my first time leaving Earth's atmosphere. I saw several videos of astronauts and the Moon Landing, but entering space is different compared to watching videos or looking at images."

"Yeah. It's something else. Takes my breath away."

"The Volgrim and the Demons own much, if not all of the galaxy by now. The stars we see are only those nearest us within a thousand light-years or so. I would be surprised if any of them were free of the reach of our enemies."

I slump in my seat. "A hundred thousand years is a long time... but surely there must be some planets they haven't defiled yet? Is it even possible to colonize millions of planets in only tens of thousands of years?"

"Perhaps not thousands," Solomon murmurs. "But the Volgrim are an ancient species, descending from ancestors millions of years older than humanity. They had plenty of time to colonize the galaxy long before they met our species."

Solomon's eyes turn distant. "Humans believed they were alone in the universe for thousands of years. Despite our awareness of angels, beings who once lived among the stars, we arrogantly viewed ourselves as the lone seed of life drifting throughout the infinite void. We were wrong. Even I held incorrect assumptions, as I did not learn of the Volgrim's existence until the rest of my species did."

"The Milky Way is a single speck among billions of other specks. Our pretty little spiral houses tens of thousands of habitable worlds, and the Volgrim have long since laid claim to most, if not all of them. They watched humanity's rise from the primordial soup with the same dispassionate gaze as they did all the other planets teeming with life. It was only once we achieved a certain technological epoch that their worried gazes fell upon us. Thus began the Energy Wars."

"You mentioned the Energy Wars before," I say. "I know we ultimately lost, but did we stand any chance of winning at all?"

"Solomon sighs. "No. We were about as threatening to the Volgrim as an ant to a boot. Even had I joined my intellect with King Arthur's might and Joan of Arc's courage, we would have inevitably lost the war, so powerful was the fist of our oppressors."

"I have Wordsmithing, though," I say. "Maybe you three couldn't have saved humanity, but I could. I should have been able to do something."

"Don't blame yourself, Jason. I suspect you entered the cryopod as part of the Creator's divine will. Had you fought on Earth, you might have perished along with the rest of humanity. Things are not always as they seem."

I sigh. "Maybe so, but I still feel guilty every day. I wish I had done something. I wish I could go back and fix everything."

"Regret is a crucial part of life's adventure," Solomon says, solemnly. "Everyone has regrets. Even me."

A few moments pass. The ancient king sighs. "We've admired the view. Now, let us return home. I thought taking a short break from all your worries to see a purer form of the universe would do you some good. Sadly, duty calls."

Instead of turning the ship back toward Tarus II, I stare at the moon orbiting Tarus II. "Hey, maybe this is a stupid question, but how hospitable would you say Kelkin is? Tarus II's moon, I mean."

Solomon glances at the displays on Esther's scanners, detailing the readouts on the distant grey globe. "It resides in the brown-level Goldilocks zone. While technically colonizable, Kelkin isn't self-sustaining. Given its lack of atmosphere and methane-ice surface, it would take a tremendous amount of effort to terraform."

"Right..." I mutter. "But I have Wordsmithing. The Volgrim and Demons don't."

Solomon stares at me for a moment, then turns to gaze at Kelkin. "Oh. That's an interesting idea. You're smarter than I expected, Jason Hiro."

"Your compliments feel like insults."

"Haha, take my words however you like."

A smile spreads across my face. "That's the trick, Solomon. We might not need to seek out colonizable planets. Maybe I can make my own and expand humanity's borders in a way that even the Volgrim can't."

Solomon taps his chin. "Terraforming is a costly feat the Volgrim only use when a planet is already sufficiently within the Goldilocks zone. A moon like Kelkin would be terrible for their technological capabilities. They could transform it into a habitable world, but it would take centuries and require an enormous amount of resources. If your Wordsmithing is capable of turning barren, desolate worlds into functional Earths, you'll have a huge leg up on the Volgrim."

Solomon leans forward. A huge smile spreads across his face.

"So how about it? Try terraforming the moon."

Immediately, I shake my head. "Sorry, Solomon, but no can do. I don't have a millionth the magical capacity I need to pull off world-scale Wordsmithing. Hell, just trying to create a couple of generic three-story buildings nearly killed me. If I want to terraform Kelkin, it will take me several years, working in tiny increments. The only solution that will speed up the process is a massive boost to my mana capacity."

Solomon's smile disappears. "Oh. I see. I don't yet understand all the intricacies of your life and powers. My apologies. Perhaps I'll spend tonight performing a deep-mind search to see if I can come up with a workaround."

I raise an eyebrow. "What do you mean by 'deep-mind search'? That sounds... invasive."

"You're wearing my crown, Jason," Solomon says, offering a kindly smile. "The moment you put it on, my artifact downloaded all of your memories and knowledge, just as it has with countless other people. Where do you think I obtained my knowledge of theoretical physics, quantum mechanics, and other such complex scientific branches? I combined the experience and memories of countless geniuses to advance my own knowledge of the universe!"

Slowly, I nod. "So... you can see all of my memories? All the embarrassing stuff that's happened to me? All of my, um... private thoughts?"

Solomon facepalms. "Yes, yes. Don't you worry, though, boy. That unflattering moment from when you were fourteen and Lindsey rejected you is a far cry from some of the things I saw in Einstein's memories. Your minor blunders are hardly worth my attention when I've seen things that would make former world leaders blush with shame."

Solomon's words make me lower my eyes. "...Sh-she didn't reject me..."

"No, no, my dear boy. You rejected her. Of course."

Hearing Solomon bring up one of my embarrassing moments from high school makes me want to crawl in a ditch and die.

I tap Esther's controls, turn the ship around, and head back to Tarus II. "...Let's call it a day."

"Haha. Yes, let's."

The atmosphere of Tarus burns around the ship as we begin our rapid descent.

I glance at Solomon. "So, uh... I have a question."

"Hmm?"

"You're the first Hero I've met. In-person, I mean. Can you tell me more about yourself? Your magic?"

Solomon rubs his chin thoughtfully. "I never experimented with my magic. I was lucky to be born during a time of relative peace. I engaged in minor skirmishes against the demons here and there occasionally, but I never needed to exercise my heroic powers on the field of battle."

"Oh? What were your abilities?"

Both of us gaze out at the long reach of a massive ocean as we fly lower and lower into Tarus II's atmosphere. "I don't know. My attributes leaned heavily toward intellect, rather than strength and agility. I think I possessed some ability to conjure holy energy, but I never used it in my day to day life."

"I guess you didn't need to. You know, being a king and all."

"Mmm." Solomon turns his head to look at me. "Say, Jason... something has been bothering me for a while. Regarding your status as a Hero, that is."

"Like what?"

We quickly fly past the ocean and over the mountaintops. Hero City, built on a plateau, grows visible in the distance. Several of Bahamut's pyramids rise in the distance, giving the oddly modern-looking city a hybrid feeling of past-meets-present. It proves quite jarring.

"Heroes typically were men and women of great influence. The Heroic Aura sought out those most likely to use their abilities for the greater good. Commoners rarely gained such power. Therefore, this begs the question of why it would possess you. After all, you are a relatively normal youth. Were your parents wealthy or famous?"

I shake my head. "I don't remember them. I know my mother died before my second birthday. My father gave me up for adoption."

"He did? Strange." Solomon shakes his head. "Do you remember who he was?"

"No. The little I know is because of a few official documents I used to travel with between foster homes. As far as I'm concerned, my parents both died when I was a child."

"Mmm."

My answer seems to satisfy Solomon, and he gazes at the specter of Hero City as we fly closer. While I bring the ship down to land in an empty field, the king nods slowly. "So you didn't know your parents, and you have the Heroic Spirit. Perhaps they knew of your importance. They might have been wealthy aristocrats or descendants of a royal bloodline. That would explain your abilities."

"I suppose that's possible. My father didn't leave me any money though, so I don't think he was wealthy. You might be grasping at straws. Didn't you imply the Heroic Aura sometimes possesses those not born from an important bloodline?"

"I did, but a circumstance like that was scarce. Only a dozen or so cases that I know of."

The ship touches down a hundred feet from the city's perimeter. Forty curious onlookers peep out from behind a building. They must have seen Esther's arrival, and now they're worried we might be enemies.

Solomon chews on his thumb. "You know, Jason... the last time a Hero appeared was around the beginning of the 20th century. I always wondered what happened to his descendants."

"That does sound strange," I say, noncommittally. "I don't know anything about the past Heroes, though. Well, other than Joan and Arthur."

"Those are the ones everyone's heard of, along with me," Solomon says with a wink. "How unfortunate that so many have forgotten the names of Jepthath, Caesar, and Sir Lorent."

Solomon and I both stand up and walk toward the exit hatch. The ramp extends down, and when the crowd of onlookers sees us, a collective sigh of relief fills the air.

A few men, along with one Salamander, wander over. I recognize Ogie immediately.

"Sweet 'n salty walnuts! You scared the stools out of us," the Salamander says. "What in Sam-heck is that flyin' bullet thing?"

"It's a spaceship," I reply, not wanting to go into much detail. I notice several people looking at Solomon questioningly, so I decide to take him down a notch. "This guy is a ghost friend of mine named Solomon. He's nobody important."

The king gawks. "I beg your pardon?!"

"Yeah, you heard me, grandpa. Wave at the townsfolk."

Solomon grumbles something under his breath. I only make out a few choice curses.

Several minutes later, he and I arrive at the front of Bahamut's old palace, now redesignated my official home.

The king curls his lip up. "You're slumming it, then?"

"What? This is the best place in the city! Huge rooms, full course meals, all that good stuff."

"The aesthetic is dreadful. It looks like an average-sized office building. Have you no Heroic pride?"

"We went over this already."

"I don't care. It's still shameful. I'm surprised Saul allowed my spiritual descendant to live in such a horrid environment. When I see him next, I'm going to gouge his useless eyes out."

I cringe at his vivid description. "I don't think you need to go that far."

"Yes, but after all the training I gave him, he's making me look bad. Maybe I'll only flay an inch of skin from his body. Even I can be merciful."

I decide not to comment. We enter my home, and every step becomes unbearable as Solomon comments on this drab ornament or that ugly trinket, or how the lighting isn't complimentary. Multiple times, he begs me to use my Wordsmithing to change the walls to gold and silver. I do my best to tune him out.

We make our way upstairs, and eventually, arrive at my bedroom door. When I open it, I catch the tail end of Phoebe speaking. "-his fault. I think he misunderstood. That's all."

"Yes, but it was hurtful. After everything I've done to help the humans, I just... I thought people would treat me differently. They still act like I'm part of a demon conspiracy to kill-"

Samantha stops talking. She turns around to the doorway as Solomon and I enter. I wince at the tears on her face. "Uh... um... bad time? I can come back later..."

The succubus quickly looks away and wipes her face. "It's fine. I should return to my room anyway."

"Wait, hold on." I hold my hand up. "Samantha- I'm sorry. I came all the way here to say that. I overheard Hope saying something, and I jumped the gun. I shouldn't have accused you of anything. That was wrong of me."

The succubus's tail flicks around nervously. Samantha continues to sit on the bed without making any effort to get up, and stares at her crossed legs. "An apology. I don't know why, but I didn't expect that."

Phoebe stares at me. Her face shows anger, but everything else about her appears contemplative, as though she's spent the better part of twenty minutes playing devil's advocate on my behalf to try and explain my actions.

She's too good for me.

"I'm glad you came, Jason. We were talking about you the whole time."

"I, uh, figured as much."

My wife's eyes look to the ghostly figure standing beside me. "You brought a friend?"

Before I can reply, Samantha turns around to look at me, but she registers Solomon as well. She starts to say something, but pauses a moment before speaking. "Do I know you?"

Solomon shakes his head and beams a grin at her. "I'm Solomon. One of the ancient kings, also known as the smartest being in existence. I doubt we've met, for I could never forget one as beautiful as yourself."

His flattery doesn't affect her. "You're right. I'd remember someone as braggadocious as you. You do look familiar, but it's probably the whole royalty getup. I've known a few kings."

Solomon slides over to the bed and sits down, though his body makes no impression on the covers. "I wish I'd been one of them."

"Smooth." Samantha rolls her eyes and turns back to me, forgetting Solomon exists within the span of two seconds. "Jason. I should have told you I was a shapeshifter. I owe you an apology too. I didn't realize that humans would value appearances so much. If it makes you feel any better, this is my natural body. I don't enhance it in the slightest."

I blink. "Wait... I think there's been a misunderstanding... I wasn't worried about you abusing your, um, sex appeal. It was more of an espionage issue."

"How so?"

A bead of sweat drips down my back.

Come on, Jason! You just apologized, and now you're going to imply she's a shapeshifter who wants to infiltrate us for some nefarious purpose?! Talk about ruining the goodwill you just built!!

...No. I have to tell the truth. I have to tell Samantha what I saw. No more lying.

I lean against the wall. "Here's the deal. I used 'Locate' and overheard Hope and Neil talking. They said that you... that you betrayed Uriel. You killed her or something. I don't know the details. On top of that, you can manipulate the emotions and feelings of those around you, and you can change your appearance. It was wrong of me to jump to conclusions, especially after you saved my life and Phoebe's in our battle against Amelia and Satan. However, surely you can see how combined with not wanting me to see the files about the Volgrim, I might assume you were-"

"You saw the files?" Samantha interrupts me. Her voice turns cold as ice. "After I warned you not to look... you examined them anyway?"

"I did."

Samantha lowers her head. "Jason... you crossed a line you shouldn't have."

"So what if I know about the aliens? What's the big problem?"

Samantha flicks her eyes to Phoebe uneasily. She wants to keep the information about the Volgrim as tight-lipped as possible.

A moment later, she seems to realize I'll tell Phoebe later anyway, so there's no point being secretive.

"The problem is that nobody but the Emperors and Dukes know of the Volgrim's existence. No other demons, no monsters, and certainly no humans... nobody. It's part of our treaty. Due to issues we've had with uprisings in the past, the Volgrim only agreed to a cease-fire under the condition that we keep our arrogant elements in check. The moment word gets out about them and reaches any loose-lipped fellow; their weapons will train on us."

"Alright. I suppose you have a point. I don't really understand, but if that's the case, why let anyone have access to files like we found?"

Samantha pulls on a loose string of hair. "You used that Crown, didn't you? Nobody should be able to decipher the computer files left behind except Ose. She's the one who devised all the systems that keep humans and demons in check. I don't know much about technology, nor do most demons, but she's a genius when it comes to it. Under normal circumstances, nobody I know could decipher those files. You're probably the only person who can."

A slight tinge of pride burns in my heart. Yeah, damn straight! I'm a genius too!

Solomon smirks at me. His thoughts transmit into my mind. Only by using my power.

"Well, Samantha, it's too late now. I saw the files. Oh, and when I did, Ose appeared inside my mind. She tried to take over my body, but she awakened Solomon instead, and he saved me."

A lightbulb pops up above Phoebe's head. She looks from me to my crown and then to Solomon. "Ahh! Solomon! His crown! He's the man who... oh my gosh!"

Solomon snaps his fingers. "Yes! Now you understand! Tis' I, the most incredible, brilliant, and good-looking man who ever lived! I'm surprised it took you this long to realize!"

Phoebe's surprise melts away instantly. "Oh. You're that kind of person."

"What do you mean?"

"Nothing. Never mind."

Solomon might be the most knowledgeable man in existence, but even he doesn't know everything. The thought comforts me.

Samantha shifts on the bed and turns her whole body toward me. Seeing the front of the voluptuous succubus instantly gets my hormones raging, but I immediately suppress them.

"Jason, we both made mistakes. Let's call it even and move on, okay?"

I nod. "That's fair."

In the back of my mind, a nagging concern buzzes like an angry blowfly. Despite my immediate agreement with her words, I pivot on a dime. "Well, one thing. I do have to ask... What happened with Uriel? Can you explain that to me?"

She shrugs. "It was a long time ago. Some people change in a day; some people need a few years. How much would you change if a hundred thousand years passed?"

"A lot, I suppose. I still would like to know what happened, though."

The succubus sighs.

"I did what Satan ordered. Back then, we all did." Samantha grips her leg firmly. A look of unease appears on her face. "It was part of a day in history known as the War in Heaven. Ninety-nine percent of all demons died, as did the majority of all angels. It was a bloodbath unlike any other. My job was to infiltrate and eliminate the forward guard so our forces could enter Heaven. I followed my orders. We made it inside. There isn't much to say otherwise."

"But… you killed Uriel, right?"

Samantha's face turns ashen. "No! I would never do that! I wounded her badly, yes, but I hate killing. I'm a pacifist, Jason. I only fight if it's necessary."

"Sure, but you rushed back to the Labyrinth earlier to battle her as soon as that one Duke guy gave the word."

"He's a Baron, and his name is Orias." Samantha shakes her head in annoyance. "I have obligations to the demons, Jason. More importantly, Uriel is a threat not only to my people but yours as well. She's a dangerous, unhinged lunatic who kills for sport. By the time Hope and I arrived, she had slain nearly a hundred thousand of my people. Would you prefer I let her rampage around unchecked?"

"I suppose not."

"Good." Samantha waves her hand at me, flippantly. "Perhaps you should ask Hope what the battle against her was like. He nearly died, after all."

The succubus seethes for a moment. "I wonder why Hope would say bad things about me after we fought together. Perhaps I should speak to him. The two of you are very aggravating sometimes."

Phoebe smiles and rubs Samantha's shoulder. "Yeah, that's men for you. But he's all mine!"

"Tch. You can keep him," Samantha says. However, despite her words, a trace of a smile appears on her face.

I breathe a sigh of relief. Samantha doesn't hate me after all. Thank god.

Several minutes later, Samantha stands up and adjusts her clothing. "Well, um, sorry for weeping like a child. I'll be heading to my room now, Phoebe."

Phoebe waggles her fingers in the air. "See you around, Sammy. Drop by anytime!"

"Trust me; I will."

Samantha walks past me as I sit on the bed. She stops a few feet away. "Jason, if you don't keep hold of Phoebe, I'll take her for myself."

"What?"

"Ta-ta~!"

She leaves the room and closes the door.

Now only Phoebe, Solomon, and I remain.

My wife glances at the ghostly man sitting beside me on the edge of the bed. "So... how is this going to work?"

"I don't know what you mean."

Her cheeks burn red. "Is Solomon going to follow you everywhere? All the time?"

The king responds before I can think of an answer. "Oh, there won't be any problems. Just pretend I'm not here! I'll stand and watch silently as you two do whatever it is that young newlyweds do!"

Phoebe's expression flattens. "That's not going to happen."

"Why not?"

"I don't like lecherous old men. That's why." Phoebe points at the Crown. "Make sure you take that off, tonight."

"Yeah. I will," I say with a smile. "No way this voyeur's getting a peep show."

Solomon's face turns crestfallen. "B-but Jason! I thought we were friends!! Phoebe is far more beautiful than the fairest lily in the bluest pond! Please, don't take away the only thing this poor old man lives for!"

I lift the crown off my head. Solomon vanishes, leaving Phoebe and me alone.

"Yeah, that sealed the deal."

I set the crown on the dresser beside the bed, then turn to my wife and smile. "A lot of stuff happened today."

"Mhmmm..." Phoebe flops onto her back and traces a circle on her collarbone. "I'm still mad at you for making Sammy cry."

"Aw, c'mon. I apologized!"

"Yes, but you didn't apologize to me."

"I'm sorry."

Phoebe closes her eyes. "Okay. That'll do."

Grinning giddily, I reach for my belt buckle. "Great! Now that we're married, let's get out of these clothes!"

"Somehow, I knew that would be the only thing on your mind."

Inwardly, I wince.

Images of two thousand demon heads exploding appear in my mind.

"No... not the only thing."

Part 081: Like Uncle, Like Nephew

"Gnuh?"

I grunt reflexively as Phoebe yanks the curtains open. I wince and flip over on the bed to put my back to the window, all while squeezing my eyes shut. The wintery sunlight radiating around the room is colored pure white due to the snow on the city's environmental barriers. It's the most blinding light I've seen in ages.

"Guhh... five more minutsh."

Phoebe clears her throat. "Ahem, I don't think so. You have to wake up, Jason. Every time you say 'five more minutes' and I leave you alone, thirty minutes pass, and you fall asleep again. Lazy boy."

"Grr... I don't wannawakeup..."

My eyes droop. A moment later, icy cold hits my body as Phoebe yanks the covers away. "Up! Up! Up!"

"Noooo!" I protest weakly, then sigh. "Awake."

One second later, I bolt up in bed while feeling as if I've been awake for two hours.

"Are you awake now?" Phoebe asks.

"Yeah. I'm good."

I continue to wince from the glare of the sunlight, but it's less pronounced than a few moments ago. My eyes wander toward Phoebe's nude, ripped body, as she grabs her clothes for the day and a towel. Her finely toned abs and muscles give her a sexy, powerful aura. She reminds me of an Amazonian warrior. "I'm going to take a shower. Are you coming?"

"Oh, yes, indeed. In more ways than one."

"Jason!"

"You opened yourself up to that one."

"Yeah? Well, you're immature!"

"Nah, I'm just getting a headstart on dad jokes."

Phoebe smiles and rubs her belly. "Aww, that's sweet. But, um, what are dad jokes?"

"Think of the worst jokes you've ever heard, then multiply them by the power of puns. Those are dad jokes."

"I still don't follow."

"Trust me, you will. Give it time."

I slide out of bed and wrap my arm around Phoebe's shoulder, pulling her in for a passionate kiss before we head into the shower.

Thirty minutes later, I dry myself off with Wordsmithing, then instantly style my hair and clean my breath. To say my body is the pinnacle of health would be an understatement. I used to offer to do the same for Phoebe, but she thinks it 'builds character' to brush her teeth and hair. I don't understand her, sometimes.

I wander back into the bedroom and summon blue jeans and a black sweater, then grab Solomon's Crown off my bedside dresser and set it on my head.

"Rise and shine, Solomon. I hope you had some good sleep."

The king materializes beside me. "I don't sleep, sorry to disappoint."

"Oh. Really? I hope you weren't bored all by yourself."

"Hardly. Your sex was passionate enough to keep me interested. I found your technique lacking, though. A wild woman like Phoebe needs a strong man to tame her. Perhaps I can give you pointers sometime?"

Several seconds pass. I gape at Solomon's ghostly figure.

"Y-y-you watched us?! I thought you couldn't see anything! That's why I took the crown off!!"

Solomon rolls his eyes. "You don't need to get all flustered. I can see everything around my crown, regardless of whether someone wears it or not. In any case, you should thank me. Now that I've seen how you copulate, I can improve your technique and drive that feral lady to new heights of pleasure! If you wear the crown next time, I can even possess your body and-"

"No!! Holy shit, absolutely not!! I can't believe you'd-"

"Jason?" Phoebe's voice speaks out from the bathroom. "Is something wrong?"

My face pales. I haven't wordsmithed Solomon to be visible yet. Phoebe can't hear or see him, only me.

"N-no, it's nothing. I'm just, err, talking to someone on the... the phone."

"Oh, okay~! I'll be out in a few minutes!"

Sweat pours down my back. I glare at Solomon and keep my voice low. "Goddamn you, you pervert. What the hell is wrong with you? Are you a voyeur or something?!"

Solomon's expression flattens. "Jason. I am no longer a flesh and blood being. I have no sexual urges left in my body. I have long ago forgotten what the sensations felt like. I thought you'd appreciate my help. If I bother you that much... I won't watch anymore."

His sudden change in tone calms me down. I lower my eyes and take a few moments to contemplate his position.

Solomon was an ancient king who died and became trapped inside his artifact. He's lived in the crown for well over a hundred thousand years, his only friend the crown's bearer.

Solomon reads my mind. He nods. "It is as you imagine. I have made many friends with those who wore my crown. I watched all of them die. I..."

He trails off and looks away, toward the sunlight outside. "I am lonely. Seeing two young ones in love fills me with much joy... but also sorrow. It reminds me of the past I lost. The wives I loved who I will never see again. The children they bore who grew old and died."

Solomon goes silent for a moment before continuing. "You know, Jason, there is one adversary no man or woman can conquer. Humans, Gods, Angels, Demons, and even the Volgrim pale in comparison to its power. Time. It is relentless. It continues onward, forever, no matter what we wish. Enjoy your life, Jason, and your time with Phoebe. Don't make the mistake I did."

Both of us fall silent. I slump down to sit on the edge of the bed and stare at the wall. "I'm sorry. I don't know you well, and I can be insulting, sometimes, with my assumptions."

"Everyone has faults," Solomon says. He sits beside me. "For example, this old man has forgotten how civilized people interact. I suppose most people don't watch their friends going at it like jackrabbits, eh?"

"N-not usually, no."

"I mean, wow! I was surprised by all that biting! Why must you use your teeth so much? Her breasts aren't going anywhere! You don't need to hold them in place while you deliver the final thrust-"

"Solomon!"

"Hah! Look at you blush!" Solomon laughs. He swats my back, but his hand passes through it. A slight tingle on my spine indicates his touch, but I barely notice the sensation. "Watching you squirm is truly hilarious!"

"Okay, fine, I'll let it slide. Christ, please don't offer any commentary. I'm still learning as I go."

"You'll be an expert in no time with moves like those."

"No commentary!"

"Fine, fine. Spoilsport." Solomon flops back on the bed. "I'll be quiet, for now."

A long minute passes. Phoebe hums to herself in the bathroom, making up some tune in her head as she gets ready for the day. I glance back at Solomon. "Hey, let's go see Saul today. He'll be super excited to see you again!"

Solomon grins from ear to ear. "Ah, yes! I'm looking forward to that! It's been so long since I last saw his face! I wonder how many wrinkles he has! He's probably ancient by now!"

"Nah. Saul looks maybe forty or fifty. No grey hairs at all."

Solomon's smile fades. "Really? That's odd. How has he managed to survive all these years?"

"Bahamut. She used magic to enslave humans and monsters. They gained immortality and lost control of their free will. She forced them to serve under her for the last hundred thousand years. Saul and Phoebe were both her slaves."

"Oh. That's unfortunate."

"Yeah. All of Bahamut's slaves are nearly as old as you. Older, in a few rare cases. You'd be surprised how many humans she used her magic on."

"Indeed. You mentioned Bahamut's riddle magic before, but even I didn't know about the power of the Sphinx. She must have guarded her secret closely."

"Mhm. It's strange that I knew the answer to Bahamut's riddle, though. It was common knowledge in my day. Why wouldn't any potential slaves have guessed the answer?"

"Life is full of mysteries," Solomon replies. "Oh. Phoebe finished."

I lift my head and look toward the Bathroom. Phoebe steps out, wearing a white sundress with long sleeves and a skirt that reaches down to her knees, along with satin gloves and pantyhose. Across her chest and under her dress, I can somewhat make out the unmistakable round lump of the T-REX.

"A dress? I thought you weren't the type?"

Phoebe's face pales. "You don't like it?"

"I do! I'm just surprised to see you wearing one, that's all. You usually prefer wearing leather armor and carrying a sword at your hip."

"Oh. I see." Phoebe quickly smiles to cover up her embarrassment. "Well, Samantha told me recently that I'd look more attractive if I dressed as a woman should. I'm not used to wearing such feminine clothes, but since we have the nanite armor, I can be ready for combat within seconds."

To emphasize her point, Phoebe presses the button under her top three times. A flood of nanites rushes out and covers her body from head to toe. I happen to catch Solomon gawking as he watches in stunned silence.

When the nanites finish, Phoebe holds out her hand, and a sword of nanites forms and hardens. She swings it around expertly and assumes a two-handed pose, before chopping down hard with it and cutting a dresser in half. The razor-sharp blade makes mincemeat of the furniture. When she finishes, Phoebe retracts the sword, and its nanites combine with the rest on her body.

"See? Easy as kicking the dog! Also, fix that dresser for me, will you, sweetheart?"

"Mhm. Repair."

I turn to look at Solomon. He continues to stare and ogle the fully armored woman before him, her faceless helmet evoking a certain sense of danger. "By the Heavens... what manner of creation led to this suit? I never saw any development like this, not even during the Energy Wars! The tensile strength must be off the charts!!"

"Yup. It resists piercing, bludgeoning, bullets, flames, acid, anything you can imagine. It filters out toxins in the air, enhances bodily strength-"

Phoebe cocks her head. "Are you talking to Solomon?"

"Oh, right, yeah. Sorry. Project."

Solomon's body solidifies, somewhat. Phoebe tilts her head slightly. "Good morning, Solomon! How was your sleep?"

Immediately, I scream in my mind, DON'T SAY ANYTHING ABOUT SEX!

Solomon gets the hint. "It was wonderful. You look positively radiant today, with or without that suit of armor."

"Aw, you're such a sweetheart!"

My wife doesn't pick up on Solomon's underlying meaning, but I do. I silently swear to myself that I'll pay him back in spades for spying on us.

Phoebe goes silent for a moment, and her suit begins to melt away, leaving her standing in her dress once again. She walks over and steps into her fur-lined brown boots, and I put my sneakers on.

She beams sunshine at me. "Alright, Jason! What do you want to do first?"

"First? We're going to take this guy to see an old friend. After that... well, I want to see Hope. I still have to apologize to him."

Phoebe's smile dissipates. "Yes, you should get on that as soon as possible. The longer you let the dead air sit between you, the harder apologizing will be."

"I know."

Forty minutes later, Phoebe and I walk down Main Street, arm in arm. The cold of winter presses against the energy shield surrounding Hero City, but heat generators inside keep the chilliness at bay. I can't see the sun above, but its light shines through the snow and amplifies, expanding everywhere and brightening every inch of the city equally. It's somehow worse than if the ground were covered in snow!

Several people wave at Phoebe and me, only to stop and stare at the man floating beside us. One woman stares with eyes as wide as saucers when Solomon floats through a fire hydrant as if it doesn't exist.

Solomon waves at people and says hello to everyone he can, but few offer a reply. He glances around now and then; a question etched into his face. Finally, he vocalizes it. "Where does Saul live? I assume he lives in a unique building that stands out from the crowd, yet all I see are rectangles and squares."

"Saul doesn't live in the city," Phoebe replies. "He's a bit reclusive. He has a home out near the outskirts of town."

"Ahh, that explains it. He would feel ill living around such drab architecture in this city. He must prefer the beauty of nature to the emptiness of this city."

"Yeah... sure. I guess you could say that..."

Phoebe trails off and looks away. The lie in her voice is impossible to miss.

Solomon doesn't notice. "Haha, that scamp! I can't wait to see the look of surprise on his face!"

Phoebe looks at the king again. "By the way, Solomon, if you don't mind me asking, why do you two have such similar names? You know... Saul... Solomon..."

"Didn't I tell you? He's my nephew. My sister named him after me, hoping he would take the throne someday. Of course, that destiny was not in the cards."

Solomon's words get my attention. "Destiny, huh? Do you believe in it?"

"Of course I do, as any God-fearing man should. Our actions are all part of the Creator's master plan. We do only as He plans for us."

"Mmm. I'm an atheist. I don't believe that stuff myself."

Phoebe tugs my arm. "Jason... don't be rude."

"Oh, there's nothing rude about it," Solomon says, waving his hand about. "Let the fools think what they will. Who am I but the Knowledge-Seeker, also said to be the wisest human who ever lived? Surely my thoughts on the matter can be disregarded."

I sigh. "Aw, c'mon. That's not fair. Even smart people can fall for scams."

Solomon stops floating. He turns to look at me seriously. "Scams? Do you think the existence of the Creator is a scam? Do you not realize that angels and gods lived and that I met them?"

Phoebe and I slow to a stop. "Sure, I do. But you've never seen the Creator yourself, have you?"

"I have not, but the angels have. Raphael, specifically. He was one of the original Archangels, the eldest of his people. Do you not wear his ring? He would tell you many stories if you simply asked."

"Yeah... huh. I need to talk to the angels eventually. Been meaning to ask about Uriel."

Solomon stares at me quizzically. "Uriel? I used to believe that she died thousands of years before I walked the Earth. When you mentioned her name so casually, it took me off-guard. I struggle to understand how she lived in demon captivity for a hundred thousand years without anyone knowing."

"I don't know the details. All I know is that somehow, she ended up inside of Barbatos's body."

"Mmm. I see. That only raises more questions."

Several minutes pass as we continue walking toward Hero City's outskirts. The crowds of people dwindle, and soon we only see a few merchants, a bus or two, and birds pecking at the cold ground.

Phoebe points to the edge of a cliff up ahead. "Saul lives over that ridge at the bottom of the bluff."

Solomon shakes his head. "Hm. I never expected him to be the nature-type. You think you know a man..."

It only takes another minute for us to arrive and peer over the edge. Solomon looks down. His face turns to confusion. "I only see a small thatched hut! I thought we were going to Saul's home!"

Phoebe nods. "That's the one."

"Impossible! Surely, you jest."

"I'm not known for my comedic chops."

* * *

I teleport Phoebe and myself to the bottom rather than having us walk down and around the cliff. The moment we arrive, a loud crack sounds off from behind the house. Solomon cranes his neck but can't see the source. "What's going on? What was that noise?"

Phoebe and I shrug at the same time. I stifle a laugh.

We walk around behind the hut and spot a wiry-looking man wearing a fur coat and some animal skins. He raises an axe in the air and slams it onto a plank of wood, chopping it in half.

He splits three logs before Solomon finally speaks. "S-Saul? Is that you?"

"Yes, tis' I-"

Saul turns around to smile at us. The moment he spots Solomon, his eyes widen. A look of horror spreads across his face. "K-K-King S-Solo...mon?!"

"Saul! My nephew! It is great to see you!" Solomon dashes over to his nephew, oblivious to the look of panic on his face. "How have you been, young one? I missed your humorous antics from all those years ago!"

Saul's mouth turns dry and cracked, even as sweat pours off his forehead. "I've- we did- that is to say... how are you alive?! I thought you died!"

"Haha, nay! Nay! I lived long and prospered by sealing my spirit in that crown on Jason's head! Forget those little details; I'm pleased to see you again!"

Saul nods mechanically. "Yes. Yes. I am, as well. I had thought- hoped we might never see each other again."

"Hahaha! Always with the jokes! I remember when you vanished from my court one day, I sent out a legion of my finest to try and find you. I was so certain you were kidnapped for ransom, yet no country came out with a list of demands!"

Saul's voice cracks. "I ran away."

"Yes, yes, good! Fleeing your would-be assassins... just as I expected of my brilliant young nephew! But what is this place you live in, now? Where is your tower of gold? Your silver sword and brass armor?"

Saul's eyes flick to me with an expression that says, help me.

I shake my head. He's on his own.

The bearded man wipes sweat from his brow. "I-I don't enjoy those m-material possessions in the way-"

"Nonsense! Haha! You were the finest architect in all of Israel! Surely you have a good reason for living out in the middle of nowhere in a ramshackle hut!"

Saul frowns. "I quite like my home. It's small, cozy, and I don't usually have any... unwanted visitors."

Solomon freezes up. He takes a step backward. "Oh... oh, heavens... I didn't realize..."

"But now you do." Saul's tone goes cold. "I like my life, now. I thought I would never see you again. Why did you return? Why have you come back to haunt-"

"I understand completely!" Solomon yells, interrupting his nephew. "After your kidnappers tormented you, they must have taken away a part of your humanity! You forgot your love of gold and jewels! It's fortunate that I found you, or you might have wallowed in misery for the rest of your days."

"Ahh, no! That isn't the case at all!" Saul grips his shirt with white knuckles and struggles to put words together. "I don't like gold or jewels or riches! I never did! That's you, not me!"

"Hah, I remember differently, my boy, and my memory is eidetic. It's a steel trap that nothing escapes. Have no fear, for I shall educate you in due time regarding the finer aspects of wealth and luxury. Soon, you will be back to your old self, and we can return to the good old days!"

Saul opens his mouth to protest, but his shoulders slump. He gives up. "Yes... sir. I suppose so."

Phoebe nudges me. "Jason. Say something..."

I don't know what she wants from me. This silly misunderstanding is an issue for the ancient hero and his nephew to settle, not me. Saul appears disconcerted about his uncle's past and their relationship from back then, but I don't know much about either one. I don't think it's my place to interfere, even if Solomon is making his nephew feel isolated and depressed.

I tap the crown, which gets Solomon's attention. "Hey, uh, I still need to talk to Hope. Sorry to cut this short, but..."

"It's no problem at all! I think I understand my nephew's plight." Solomon pats Saul on the back, though his hand makes no physical contact. "I'll be seeing you around, my favorite pupil! Have a great day!"

Saul doesn't meet his uncle's eyes. "Yes... you too."

The three of us walk away, and Solomon whistles jovially, blissfully unaware of how much his nephew can't stand being around him.

It's only now that I realize the mess I've gotten myself into. Solomon isn't simply some random man inside the crown, but a loudmouth who thinks himself infallible. He's cocky, arrogant, and doesn't take no for an answer.

And now I have to live with him as long as I choose to use his artifact of power.

Sigh... I miss when the Crown was a device I used to make myself super smart. Those were the good old days.

Solomon glances into the sky. "Hey, if we're heading to the Core, why not give Esther a call? She can pick us up if you activate her remote signal."

Phoebe raises an eyebrow. "Esther? Who's that?"

"It's the name Solomon gave his spaceship."

"Oh. I like it. Very beautiful."

"Haha! You have wonderful taste, my dear," Solomon laughs.

The ancient king sends me the mental specs to create a control device, and I summon it with Wordsmithing. "Remote."

A gadget with a single button appears in my hand. I press it. One minute later, a distant crack of thunder sounds off, and Esther rushes into view, stopping far more suddenly than I'd expect before slowing to a hover in midair and descending.

Many minutes pass as we board and fly over to the warp-gates. When we arrive and depart, Phoebe pats the ship's hull. "That was interesting. I've never flown before. It felt the same as... not flying."

"Inertia dampeners," Solomon replies without looking at her. "Makes for a nice, smooth ride."

"If you say so."

We head over to the guard outpost. The guard on duty waves us through, and after we cross, I poke a soldier walking past. "Hey, Brian, question... do you know where Neil is? Or Hope?"

The man shakes his head. "Nope, sorry. Last I heard, they asked not to be disturbed."

"They did? Okay. Thanks."

We continue walking. I stop a few other soldiers, but they all give the same line. Hope and Neil wish not to be disturbed.

I pause after stepping inside the Core. "Ugh. Nobody will tell us where they are. Maybe I should use Locate..."

Phoebe quickly dashes my thought against the rocks. "After what happened last time, don't take a chance. Let's check Neil's office first."

"Right. Sounds good."

It only takes a minute for us to walk across the massive stadium to Neil's office in the back corner. When we arrive at the doorway, I hear Neil's voice before I see his body. "-the corridors. If these reports are accurate, then those slaves need to be liberated. We can't leave them in demonic hands."

Hope's voice, or rather, mine, replies. "I don't know, Neil. Even with the T-REX suits, we'll have to fight demons on the way in or out. They won't give up human slaves without a- who's there?"

The three of us enter the room right as Hope spins to face us. "Jason. Phoebe. Christ, here I thought you'd take a hint from the soldiers."

Neil glares at me. "Go away. I'm not interested in talking to you. Neither is Hope."

"I just came here to apologize. That's all. You're right to be angry, which is why-"

"Save it," Hope says, cutting me off. "I already know what you'll say. You'll apologize for spying on us, make a big deal about it, and we'll have to forgive you. Except that isn't going to work, not this time."

My jaw drops. "What? I'm not coming here to start a fight, Hope! I know you're mad, but it was an accident!"

"Yeah? How many more accidents will I have to sit through, Jason? It wasn't a mistake. You wanted to hear what we were talking about and ended up biting off more than you could chew. I know you and how you think."

I'm flabbergasted. I don't understand where Hope's hostility comes from. Solomon helped me to understand the difference between Hope and me, but it doesn't make this sudden confrontation any easier.

Hope growls a few curses under his breath. "Get lost. Neil and I are doing important shit. You go back and manage the colony or whatever. Spy on our conversations if you like."

"I'm not going to do that..."

"Of course, you aren't. It's true what people say, Jason. Trust nobody, not even yourself."

"That's... that's not..."

Phoebe and I stand silently for several long moments, meeting Hope's gaze the whole time. He stands resolute, unflinching, and unwilling to listen.

I can't persuade him. I don't have the right words. Even if I did, he wouldn't listen. I have to let him cool off. This situation isn't going to fade away as quickly as it did for Phoebe and Samantha. Hope's anger is too fierce right now. Backstabbing and betrayal cuts deeper into one's psyche than a simple accusation ever could.

I nod. "Fine. Sorry we bothered you. If you want to contact me... feel free. Any time."

Hope rolls his eyes. "Yeah. I'll get right on that."

The three of us turn and head out the door, and I feel Hope's gaze burning a hole in my back the entire way there.

I pissed him off. Royally. But... there's something else... some undercurrent rippling beneath the surface. I can't put my finger on it. I've stepped on a beehive... but they have yet to sting.

I can only pray my intuition is wrong.

Part 082: End of Chapter One - Birdy

Recommended listening.

Click. Clack. Click. Clack.

Ose's high heels slap against the floor as she strides into the deepest, darkest region of the Labyrinth. While she walks, monsters and demons ogle her with looks of lust and curiosity. I wonder what the newest Emperor is doing down here, their eyes say.

Ose ignores the covetous gazes of grunts. The sounds of prisoners screaming in pain as demons torture, rape, and devour them fill the air, making her quicken her pace.

I can't wait to leave, Ose thinks to herself. One man's cry for pity suddenly cuts off, making her pause in front of a cell before continuing onward. It isn't fear or terror that tugs at Ose's mind, but disgust.

Faith's End, the Labyrinth's sole prison complex, is a mass of tangled rooms and corridors, extending for miles in any given direction. Rats scurry about here and there, while every so often, a goblin will race across the ceiling and duck into a hole. Their kind lives in the bedrock of the Labyrinth.

A pungent odor strikes Ose's nose. She doesn't react visibly, since that would be undignified, but her throat catches nonetheless. Rotting flesh. You'd think these worthless goblins would at least clean up the messes in the cells after a demon has his fun.

Ose's heartbeat slowly increases in tempo as she continues rounding corners. Her destination draws nearer. No rats. No goblins. No signs of life. This way is the correct path. Unfortunately.

The sounds of screams fade away behind Ose. The further she walks down this particular corridor, the quieter the Labyrinth becomes. Where lit torches once lined the walls, maintained by goblins, darkness looms instead. She enters the Forbidden Area, the place where the master of Faith's End lurks.

Silence swallows the world around her. Soon, the clicking of her high heels pound like drums, echoing against the walls while making her hands twitch.

She pauses for a moment to collect herself. There's no reason to be afraid. You're an Emperor now. Calm down. Breathe. Inhale.

I'm not the scared little girl I once was.

Those days were a long, long time ago.

Ose begins walking again. This time, it's her pounding heart, not her heels, that boom in her ears.

A man shrieks in agony up ahead, piercing the silence. Ose flinches instinctively. His cry of pain comes from a door further up the corridor. The door is one of many lining the walls, nondescript in appearance, and seemingly unimportant. However, Ose spots a faint stream of light emanating from a crack at the door's bottom, revealing its occupied status.

Slowly, tentatively, Ose takes one step, then another, carefully pressing her heels down so that she doesn't make a noise.

The man bellows again, his voice hoarse. "Oh, god! Please! NO! NOT THAT! ANYTHING BUT-GAAAAAHH!!!"

Ose winces. Even outside the door, the sound of burning, blistering flesh reaches her ears. The sizzling noise makes her stomach roil.

Ose places her hand on the door handle, inhales, and yanks it open.

"Gressil!"

She speaks a single word while intending to add more, but after saying the warden's name, she loses her nerve.

Inside the room, a fireplace stands lit, causing smoke to fill the air. Given the Labyrinth's lack of chimneys, the gag-inducing black smoke washes across her face, tearing the breath from her chest.

Two round pillars stand in the center of the room, each one as wide as a tree. They rise from the ceiling to the floor, nearly fifteen feet tall in total. A human male and female, each in their 30's, stands chained with their backs to each pillar: the man on the left, and the woman on the right. With their naked bodies covered in blood, cuts, and bruises, the pitiful nature of their torture sends nausea crawling up Ose's stomach.

The man and woman hang limply, their broken arms twisted behind themselves and suspended with chains and shackles to the pillars. The man wheezes and gasps, a fresh burn still festering on his body, while the woman rests motionless against her pillar, dead.

Ose's eyes don't linger on the humans, or the table of torture tools standing between the pillars and the door, but instead, travel toward the prison warden.

The master of the dungeon.

The cruelest, vilest, most despicable demon in the Labyrinth.

Gressil.

The 9-foot tall demon, a two-headed monstrosity with a birdlike-beak on his right head, and a horrifying melted face on his left, turns to face the Emperor.

"Ose. How rude of you not to knock."

Glowing red eyes dot Gressil's four arms, his chest, and legs. Each glowing eyeball swivels and spins in seemingly random directions. Underneath Gressil's flesh, lumps form and disappear, as if something were trying to escape the warden's body. His left head slumps forward, its eyes closed. The eye on its forehead stares ahead blankly and doesn't glow like the others scattered around Gressil's body. The entire head appears to be sleeping, but Ose knows better.

The Emperor of Infiltration swallows slowly and smoothes her uniform. "I... apologize. I didn't mean to... to interrupt your playtime."

Gressil cocks his long, pterodactyl-like head. "Aren't we formal, today. Have you come to join in on the torture?"

The warden's monotone voice never fails to send a spasm of nerves racing down Ose's spine. "N-no. I know you've been busy... brother. You probably haven't heard the news."

Gressil raises his clawed hand to scratch his beak. "You'd be shocked how few people want to talk to me these days."

Ose somehow manages a weak smile. "They're missing out."

A moment passes. Gressil's eyes lower to the table between him and Ose. He slowly brushes a claw across the assortment of bloodied knives and forks sitting atop it as he considers which toy to use next. "Don't keep me in suspense. It's not often I get a visit from my little sister."

"I'd never dream of making you wait."

A trickle of sweat drips down Ose's face.

"I-I'm an Emperor now."

Gressil doesn't meet her gaze. Instead, he plucks a knife from his table, then reaches over and caresses the man's chin. "Is that all?"

"I came to order you- that is, to ask for something. I need a favor."

The human trembles as Gressil's claw digs into the underside of his chin. "No... please... not the knife again... mercy-"

"Quiet. I'm talking to my sister. Don't be rude, or I won't let you die when I'm done."

Gressil's words bring the human's complaints to an instant halt. His desire to pass away overrides all the logic centers of his brain.

Gressil continues to play with the man's chin. "A favor. How strange. Now, what, pray tell, could an almighty Emperor of the demons need from little old me? I'm nothing more than a humble flesh-melder."

"I wouldn't normally, Gressil. I hate to impose. You don't have to. In fact, never mind. This- this was a mistake."

Ose's nerves get the better of her. She starts to step out of the doorway, but Gressil's voice stops her dead in her tracks.

"Why are you leaving?"

Ose stops, one foot primed and ready to drag her out the door. Every fiber of her being screams at her to leave, but her body won't move.

"I... I... I'm not- the demons- there was an accident. Barbatos. Uriel. He fell asleep. There-"

Ose babbles incoherently. Her mind begins to race as a sickening, primal fear seeps into her mind. Nothing scares her more than being in the presence of her disgusting, torturous, barbaric older brother.

Gressil holds up a claw. "Oh. I thought you were going to pester me about something important."

Ose gathers her courage and turns to face Gressil. "It is important. I defeated Uriel... but the Archangel killed half of the Lords, and most of the Barons. Our ranks have been decimated. And on top of that... we still have the humans to deal with."

Gressil's casual demeanor fizzles away, and his expression turns icy. He pulls away from his prisoner and rises to his full height. "Oh? Humans, you say?"

"You know what's going on," Ose growls. "It's your fault we're in this predicament."

Gressil feigns ignorance. "Is it? My memory is quite poor these days."

Ose takes a step toward her brother. "You were supposed to guard the last cryogenic container. How did a human manage to slip past you? That shouldn't be possible!"

Gressil smiles. "Heh... heh heh... amusing. Is that what you think? A little rat skittered by when I turned my back?"

"What?" Ose's breath catches.

The Emperor of Infiltration stares at her brother for a moment. A sinking realization appears in the back of her mind.

"You... you let the human go? Even for you... that's..."

Gressil laughs.

"Haha. Come, now, Ose. Ask yourself: why would I let an insignificant fleshbag slip past me? Isn't the answer obvious?"

The prison warden slowly waggles a finger at Ose.

"...Because I thought it would be fun."

Ose stares, dumbfounded. "Fun? You let a Hero roam around for fun?! He's destroying everything!"

Gressil smiles. "I know. That's the point, sister. All your silly machinations, your little tricks and schemes... they always did annoy me."

Ose lowers her eyes. Rage boils in her mind, but she forces herself to suppress it. Even as a freshly minted Emperor, she hasn't the power to punish her brother for the wrench he tossed into her plans.

"You annoy me, Gressil."

Gressil laughs. "Haha. Is that all you have to say? I find your courage lacking. Stop wasting my time. If you've no more business here, then leave."

"Fine. Far be it for me to keep you from your hobby," Ose says, rolling her eyes. "With the demons decimated, we need new forces. The humans have already begun making advanced technology, and I believe they will soon improve even faster. I would like for you to make me a new demon warrior. Something that can stand up to technologically advanced humans."

Gressil smiles. "Haha. No."

"What? No?! What do you mean?"

He turns to the human male and bends down to wipe the knife on the man's shoulder. "Your request doesn't interest me. I despise your orderliness and the way you treat humans like livestock. They deserve torture and death. Nothing more, nothing less."

Ose calms her nerves. "I agree. I always have. However, I have to be practical. Demons need humans for soul energy. If we kill them all off-"

Gressil suddenly swings his hand around. He backhands the deceased human woman with enough force to rip her head off and send it flying. It smashes against the wall with a tremendous bang and explodes into a mass of bone and gore.

The prison warden clenches his fist and breathes through his nostrils like a mad dog. "There is no if. Demons do not require soul energy to live. Your need for control disgusts me. You have to put everything into a box, don't you, little sister?"

Gressil rises to his full height again, but this time a menacing look appears in his eyes. "You think you're better than the other demons. Better than me. Isn't that right?"

Ose slides back half an inch. "N-no. I didn't say that..."

"You don't have to." Gressil begins walking around the table. He approaches his sister, and any trace of strength leaves her body. The massive monstrosity towers over her. His shadow stretches out like an invisible hand and crushes her spirit with its oppressive weight. "I know your thoughts. I know you better than you do yourself. You require validation — approval from the other demons. You wish to prove that the other Emperors were nothing compared to you. Isn't that right? Answer me. ANSWER ME!"

Any semblance of calmness leaves Gressil's voice. He lunges a hand out with frightening speed and grabs his sister by the throat, then slams her against the wall. Immediately, Ose claws and grabs at him, but no matter how she wriggles, she can't pull his hand away.

"B-brother... you're... hurting me..."

"Good. You deserve to suffer. While you forget your roots, I live them. Every breath I take is a reminder of what the humans did to me. They can never suffer enough." Gressil's tongue flicks out and licks his beak in a circular motion. "I'm a freak — a sick, twisted reminder of what humans do to our people. And you... you want to... to reward them! You want to give them cushy lives so they will spawn more of their brood!"

"No...! That isn't right... kah..." Ose wriggles and tries to kick her brother away, but she can't tap into the electricity inside of her body. Her strength reserves diminish every second, leaving her defenseless before Gressil. "Th-think of the demons... we have to-"

"Forget the demons! They can burn for all I care! I'll throw them into the Lake of Fire myself if that's what it takes!" The eyes on Gressil's body begin swiveling and spinning in a frenzy. Their colors brighten dramatically.

Finally, Ose has enough. She grinds her teeth together. "Gressil... what would... would mother say... if she saw you hurting me like this?"

A moment passes. Gressil's eyes flick to his second head. A moment later, it rises and blinks its eyes. A soothing female voice speaks from its lips. "Gressil... what are you doing to your sister?"

"Mother... mother..." Gressil releases his sister and takes a step back. "No! You filthy bitch! How... how dare you wake mother up!"

Gressil's lower left arm swings up and punches his beak-head with staggering force. He stumbles back and gasps. "Augh!"

"You worm! I take one little nap, and you start strangling your sister?! Some demon you are! You're a failure! A disgrace!!"

Gressil reels around as his second head berates him. "No... no... I didn't mean anything by it, mother. Please... please don't yell..." He presses himself in a corner and covers his head with his hands.

"Don't you call me 'mother,' you pathetic insect! You call me by my name!" The second head screeches like a banshee, berating him mercilessly. "You can't do anything right! Freak! Monster!!"

Ose winces at the cruelty of the second head. "Mother, please don't hurt Gressil. He didn't mean anything by it... you know how he is."

The second head goes quiet. Gressil continues to shrink into a ball and whimper, but the second head takes control of his body and forces him to stand and walk over to Ose. "Oh, my beloved daughter. Why haven't you stopped by recently?"

Gressil peeks through his fingers at Ose, as if to beg her for help. However, Ose locks eyes with his second head. "Sorry, but I've been busy. Um... I'm an Emperor now! Just like you used to be!"

Her mother smiles. "Oh, that's wonderful, darling. It's good to see you devoting yourself to the path of power." Her expression hardens. "Perhaps someday, your incompetent brother will amount to something!"

"Moth- I mean... Lucifer... please..." Gressil whimpers like a beaten dog.

Lucifer ignores his pleas and continues fawning over Ose. "My precious little girl, it is wonderful to see you again. If you ever need anything, be sure and let me know."

A spark appears in Ose's eyes. "Ah. Actually, mother, there is one matter I need assistance with. Gressil said no, though. He doesn't want to help."

"I see. Well, whatever it is, I'll straighten him right up. Don't you worry! Anything for my little genius daughter!"

Ose smiles uneasily. "Mother... don't go overboard, please."

"Gressil will be fine," Lucifer replies. "More importantly, how are you an Emperor, now? Did you finally eliminate that empty-headed dullard, Diablo? Or perhaps Satan's little skank, Belial?"

"No. There was an insurgency among the humans that forced Diablo to use his Omega form. He went into a coma afterward."

"Mmm. So it's only temporary. You'd best finish him off while you can, dear. The last thing I want is my little pumpkin getting demoted! Don't taint my legacy with simple mistakes."

"I'd never dream of it," Ose replies with a smile.

Before she leaves, Ose steals a glance at her brother's cowering face. He continues to mutter words under his breath, but Ose can't make them out. "Gressil? Are you alright?"

The formerly intimidating prison warden doesn't reply. He continues to cower behind his hands, terrified of his second head.

Ose shrugs. She leaves the room and slowly paces down the hallway. The sound of Lucifer screeching at her brother sends pins and needles through her body, but she forces herself to ignore it.

Gressil chose to escalate the situation. I only did what I needed to calm him down. Now that I have what I need, I won't have to talk to him again.

Ose's expression turns to steel.

Besides. Gressil killed our mother. He deserves to suffer.

Recommended listening.

"Aaaooo..." Gressil whimpers and squirms for several long minutes, even when his mother yawns, closes her eyes, and goes to sleep. The memory of her abuse lingers in Gressil's mind.

"Damn you... Ose... waking mother like that. How could you be so cruel?"

Tears stream down the deformed demon's beak and plop onto his shriveled body. He shakes and moans for several seconds before finally pulling himself to his feet.

He stares emptily at the human man, who is now incoherent and muttering quietly to himself. Gressil presses his toothy beak together and glares at his second head. Lucifer's head.

"Callous... vile... despicable..."

Gressil rises to a standing position. "Birdy. I need Birdy. Where is Birdy?"

He walks around the table, grabs the man's head, and tears it off without the slightest effort. Shakily, having done his good deed for the day, Gressil walks over to the wall opposite the door and pulls a rack of keys off a handle.

"Birdy... Birdy... I need Birdy..."

That's right. Birdy isn't like his other prisoners. Birdy is special. Birdy has been his favorite for a very long time.

Birdy always makes Gressil feel better, especially when Mother emerges.

Gressil throws the door open and stumbles out into the darkness. He sniffs the air, feeling apprehensive about the direction Ose went.

Satisfied his sister headed toward the exit, Gressil's eyes flick left and right. He walks in the opposite direction. His two-toed feet, shaped more like a dinosaur's than those of a demon, clomp like horse-hooves against the floor. He leans against the wall as he walks.

"Birdy... Birdy... need Birdy. She'll make me... make me feel good... not like mother... mother only hurts me..."

Gressil glances around to make sure nobody is following him. He eventually stops before one door, among many. It appears unimportant, given it has the same markings as all the others. However, a faint series of scratches above the wooden doorframe reveal a name if one looks closely enough.

Birdy.

Three dozen locks litter the side of the door, as well as the top and bottom, making entry incredibly tricky if one lacks all the keys.

Gressil's anxiousness melts away. He flashes a sinister grin and quickly unbolts the door, then starts releasing one lock after another.

His heart skips several beats. "Birdy is waiting. She hears me unlocking the door. She can't wait to see me!"

A childlike excitement grips the hideous demon as he unhitches the final lock. After suffering all the humiliation from his mother, and after Ose laughed and mocked him... he'll have the final laugh.

Gressil slowly opens the door. It creaks loudly as its rusty hinges grind together.

A pitch-black room awaits. Even Gressil's demonic eyes can't pierce the veil of shadow.

"Birrrrdyyyy..." Gressil steps inside the room. The sound of something scratching the ground catches his attention.

Birdy is awake.

A muted whimper catches his ear. Gressil sighs. "Oh, Birdy. It's been a while, my pretty. I've had the worst day. You wouldn't believe it."

Gressil pushes the door shut. The pitch-blackness of the room swallows up his form. Only his glowing eyes remain, like smoldering embers to light up the night.

The sound of chains clinking excites him. Birdy presses herself against the wall with what little strength she has left.

Keeping his voice low, Gressil leans down and caresses her broken, lacerated leg. She quivers and squeaks in fright.

"We're going to have fun, Birdy. I'll hurt you in ways I've never tried before. You won't forget tonight... not for another ten thousand years."

"Nnn..."

Author note: This concludes Cryopod's first chapter. Well, the first arc. I call it a chapter because it isn't exactly a book... but you get the idea.

This is Gressil.

Here's a Patreon post detailing a bunch of stuff involving him and Lucifer. There were a ton of things that changed for their designs along the way!

Part 083: A Day In The Life...

Dreams of clouds and rabbits and the taste of Snicker bars give way to the sensation of something touching my nose.

Groggily, I swipe at it.

"Fuggin' flies. Go away..."

The thing touches my nose again. I swat at it.

"Fugginnn hell..."

Suddenly an anvil slams onto my stomach, blasting the wind from my body. I jerk up in bed, gasping for breath. The light of a supernova blasts my face thanks to Phoebe opening the goddamn blinds again.

"Wha-?! Kuhhh!"

I choke out a gasp and shield my eyes from the light.

"Wake up, daddy! It's morning! Morning morning morning!!"

The little blonde-haired girl flops off my belly and rolls to the side as I pull myself into a sitting position. I stare at her in annoyance. "Aw, man, can't you lemme nap?"

"Noooo! You promised me the bestest birthday ever!" My daughter reaches up and pokes my cheek. I summon a second wind and breathe a little easier.

The door to my room opens. Phoebe steps inside. "Daisy! What are you doing? I told you to let daddy sleep. He's tired, honey."

Daisy rolls her eyes. "No, he isn't. He can wake up with magic."

I shrug. A smile escapes my lips. "Well, she's not wrong. Awake. Alert."

One minute later, I slide out of bed, my mind as sharp as if I'd slept like Rip Van Winkle. Wordsmithing is life-changing in small ways one couldn't imagine. "Coffee."

A cup of Joe pops into my hand, already the perfect temperature. I summon my clothes and stretch hard, popping my back in the process. Phoebe heads into the bathroom to get ready for her big event.

I'm looking forward to a fun-filled day.

Daisy hops around on the bed. "Come on! What's taking you so long?"

It's my daughter's sixth birthday today. The terrible twos are a distant memory. Honestly, age four was the worst. That was when she started trying to snatch Solomon's Crown off my dresser. If someone wears his crown, I can't take it off without their permission, unless they die. If Daisy ever got ahold of it, I'd never get it back. She won't even share snacks with other kids, let alone a sparkly all-powerful crown of knowledge.

"Unlock." With a single word, I pop open the bedside drawer and snatch his artifact out, then place it on my head. The soundproof dresser was one of Phoebe's ideas. Great for making sure that creepy guy can't listen in while Phoebe and I try our hardest to make another baby.

Solomon materializes beside me. "Good sleep?"

"Eh, can't complain."

Daisy grabs my arm. "Where's uncle Sally? I wanna see hiiim!"

Solomon flinches. "Please don't."

"Aww. But Daisy loves you, Solomon. Project."

His ghostly body materializes beside me, and Daisy squeals in delight. "Eee! Uncle Sally! Uncle Sally! Do you wanna play hopscotch?!"

"No."

"Chess! Let's play chess!!"

"No."

Solomon glares at me. His voice speaks in my mind. I hate it when you do that.

I was surprised when I learned a few years ago that Solomon detests children. I mean, the guy's had several kids of his own, but then again, in the Bible, he suggested cutting a baby apart and giving each half to two women. You'd have to be one hell of a sicko to imagine such a thing.

Daisy pounces on my back and wraps her arms and legs around me. "Piggyback! Piggyback!"

I nod and hold her legs up so she doesn't fall. Predictably, she starts tugging on Solomon's Crown, but it doesn't go anywhere. "I wanna wear Sally's crown! Make me a princess, daddy!"

"Technically, you already are," I reply.

"Yeah, but I want a crown..."

"I'll tell you what, sweetie. When you're ten years old, I'll let you wear Solomon's Crown."

"What?! Really?"

"Yup."

"Promise?"

"Promise."

That satisfies her. She returns to yapping at Solomon about something while he gives me a thousand-yard stare, but my eyes travel elsewhere.

Phoebe steps out of the bathroom dressed in a full track-suit. The skintight black fiber clings to every inch of her body, arousing me like it always does. She stops in the doorway and meets my gaze. "Enjoying the view?"

"Y-yeah. Uh-huh."

"Sometimes, I wonder if you or Solomon are the bigger pervert."

"Me. Definitely me. You look great."

Phoebe opens the door and gestures outside. "After you. Eyes up here, Jason."

Daisy yanks on my hair like a wild animal. "Mommy's big race! Zoom, zoom!"

One hour later.

"Laaadiesss and gentlemen! Boys and girls! Kobolds and salamanders! Welcome to the Superstar Arena Megadrome Shooowdooown!!"

The racetrack announcer bellows into his loudspeaker, sending excitement and cheers through the crowd. Daisy hops around excitedly as the massive trucks in the arena below all begin revving their engines. The roar of a dozen twenty-ton monster trucks is somehow noisier than the loudspeaker above us.

A series of dirt hills and miniature lakes await the challengers. The circular racetrack extends around the entire border of the arena, which itself is three times the size of a football stadium. In the center of the track, every driver has a team of medical experts on call. While I can't see her, I know Phoebe's best friend, Samantha, is watching in case Phoebe gets in a wreck. Of course, I'm also here and can heal Phoebe instantly, but it can't hurt to have a backup.

I rattle a bucket around. "Daisy. Want some popcorn?"

Hundreds of people around me scream and shout excitedly, distracting my daughter. She bounces up and down, trying to see over the head of a Harpie in front of us.

Daisy whines, "Where's mommy's truck? I can't seeeee it!"

Using my telekinesis, I levitate her a foot in the air. It's something I do often enough that she doesn't bat an eye. "She's over there. The third one. It has the lightning bolts on the side."

Daisy flails her finger toward Phoebe's truck. "I see it! I see it! It's the one with the zappers!"

"I just said that..."

Solomon sits beside me. He enjoys being around people, but Phoebe's races don't interest him much. "Children take forever to learn the value of listening."

I stuff popcorn in my mouth. "Yeah. You're telling me."

Phoebe and I conceived the idea of races several years ago. The demons suffered heavy losses thanks to Uriel's vicious attack, and realizing we weren't a threat, they retreated to the Labyrinth. Thanks to the unexpected peace, we've had six straight years without war. It afforded me the time to develop all sorts of defenses for our planet, but also recreational events.

Still, I try to be humble. I always tell people that I might be the Hero, but I'd prefer people didn't treat me like I'm someone overly important. I could have built a special booth in the Megadrome for Daisy, Solomon, and myself, but I don't want my daughter growing up with a royalty complex. We have our giant multi-story house and dozens of servants. That's good enough. And besides, in Hero City, everyone lives like kings. No beggars. No impoverished people. Only a few drunkards and loudmouths. It's all thanks to the power of Wordsmithing.

I'm surprised everything has worked out so well.

Solomon pokes me. His finger feels like a tingle of ice on my skin. "Jason. We have to visit the colony today. I know it's Daisy's birthday, but we need to improve its biodiversity dramatically."

"Right, right. It can wait a day, can't it?"

Daisy ignores us. She continues to screech and point at Phoebe's truck, yelling things like, "Go, mommy! Vroom, vroom!"

"I suppose. Why not frame it like a birthday present? You haven't shown Daisy the colony yet, have you? I bet she'd like it."

I roll my eyes. "Oh, sure. Now you're the expert on children."

"Hey. I've had my share of ankle-biters. That's why I can't stand them!"

"You're just a grumpy, frumpy old man."

Solomon doesn't protest. In the distance, the engines suddenly roar to life.

The announcer yells again. "Alright, everyone! Today, the undefeated twelve-time champion, Phoebe Hiro, is up against her arch-nemesis, the blood-bathed, demon-loving, baby-eating monster! That's right; she's facing off against none other than Ogie, the most despicable salamander to ever hit the dirt!!"

The crowd boos and howls. Daisy joins in. "Boo! Uncle Ogre is a big fat meanie!!"

I snicker. The racing events in Hero City remind me of wrestling from my time. There are tales of triumphs, losses, rivalries, and all sorts of things like that. It's all part of a series of running gags, and everyone's in on it — even a six-year-old girl.

A minotaur at the front line howls violently. "ON YOUR MARRRKS! THREEE! TWOOO! OOONE! GOOOOOO!"

His cry lights a fire under the tires of every truck on the line. The racers accelerate and immediately hit the first bump, sail ten feet into the air and slam the ground with enough force to rattle the racers' teeth. Naturally, all of the trucks have internal momentum compensators to assist the drivers, but Phoebe is such a rabid competitor that she turns hers off. She races for the thrills, and also because she's a bit over-zealous.

If I had known seven years ago what I know now, I'd never have been able to picture Phoebe's transformation into such a sexy badass. She used to be demure and polite, but I suppose looking back, there was always a sparkle of bloodthirst in her eyes.

The first lap goes mostly as planned. The lakes of water on the opposite side of the stadium explode outward when the racers hit them, showering the screaming fans with filthy mud. I usually position myself far away from the tracks, as do the older members of our community. I'm in no mood for a mud bath.

The last-place driver suddenly jerks to the right and slams against the concrete and metal wall. I inspect the damage with my Wordsmithing, which reveals a twisted axle. I quickly repair it and send him a telepathic message. You're good to go, Sam. Don't fall further behind!

Thank you, Your Majesty!

I hate it when people call me that.

Sam reverses and rushes back into the action, but he's already fallen pretty far behind.

Another icy touch on my arm makes me turn to Solomon. "What?"

The king stares at me for a moment. "Have you spoken with Hope lately?"

"Ugh. I'm trying to watch the race."

"Jason..." Solomon trails off. He looks away. "You always dodge the question."

I shrug and ignore him. It doesn't matter if Solomon pesters me. Hope and I barely talk anymore. Hell, it's been three months since I last saw his face. He has a villa on Maiura, and so does Neil. Hope has his life, and I have mine. That's all there is to it.

I exhale slowly, releasing something that isn't quite a sigh. Where did I go wrong with Hope? You'd think a clone of myself would be the easiest person in the universe to get along with. Instead, he's the complete opposite of me.

Eh. Perhaps I should drop by the Core later. It's been a while. I haven't seen Kar for at least a month. Couldn't hurt to say hello.

Phoebe's trucks zooms past, and Daisy cries out. "Mommy! That's mommy! I saw her, daddy!"

"Yes, you did, sweetheart."

Absentmindedly, I check my multi-purpose watch. The race will continue for another thirty minutes. I have a lot to do today, though. Daisy's birthday party... her human and monster friends will be over later... then I have to visit the colony... Wordsmithing training with Solomon...

Jeez. I can't believe I'm thinking about something other than Phoebe's race.

There's so much to do and so little time in the day.

An hour later.

In the back of my mind, a silent dread lurks. It's been there ever since I built Hero City. I'm from a different time, a different world. Earth. A planet inhabited primarily by humans. I come from a world where people once looked down on each other for minor differences — the color of their skin, political affiliations, religion, and a thousand other discrepancies.

But... that isn't the case here, on Tarus II. Humans and monsters live side-by-side in all-but-perfect harmony. Why judge a man for looking a little ugly compared to other humans when beautiful and disgusting-looking monsters surround you?

It's not that differences don't exist. They do. Humans and monsters living on Tarus II know we have a shared enemy living in the Labyrinth. In some form, I believe demons aren't all that bad. Yes, they devour the flesh of humans and absorb souls of the departed to gain power, but they aren't inhuman unthinking freaks. Paimon demonstrated that fact, as does Samantha every day.

But... this dread never escapes me. I'm different. I try not to judge others based on how they look, but it happens unintentionally. What if I pass my biases onto Daisy? What if I let a joke slip that comes off as insensitive or offends people. I'm not some nobody on the street; I'm the figurehead of our society.

That dread hits me in waves as Daisy stares up at the minotaur standing beside us on the bus. The moment she opens her mouth, I know she's going to say something horribly embarrassing.

"Daddy, why do his horns bend all weird like that? He looks different from the other meenaturrs."

Horns, for minotaurs, are a sensitive subject. They have a whole religion about them and how their length and complexity determine the rightful successor to any given clan.

This big fellow's horns bend slightly downward, which is very different from Yamir's, the proud cook at my house. I don't know a lot about what different horn-shapes mean, but taking the bus is usually reserved for those without a vehicle. Nobody in Hero City lives poorly, but those who take the bus tend to have fewer possessions and prestige than their peers.

Solomon's Crown instantly fills in the blanks in my knowledge regarding minotaur culture. Based on his horns, this one is probably an outcast. He's one of the few who came to Hero City freely, not someone who already lived here. He's from the Labyrinth.

The minotaur tilts his head down to stare at my daughter. Then, he looks at me. He must notice the look of panic in my eyes because he merely shrugs. "Human whelps should learn to keep such observations to themselves."

"S-sorry. She didn't mean anything by it. Kids, am I right?"

The half-bull half-man quietly reaches up and touches his horns. "My family cast me out for my deformity. I am six hundred years old. This world is the only place I've found acceptance in my entire life."

I nod. "I'm glad to hear that. Sorry for Daisy's, erm, rudeness."

He turns away and stares out the windows at the massive buildings as we drive toward the northern side of the city. "Were it not for my deformity, I might not have found such a wonderful city. I wonder if perhaps it is a curse that eventually became a blessing."

Solomon, standing across from me, raises his eyebrows. "Do such things exist?"

The other passengers ignore our conversation. Several of them look like they woke up only a few minutes ago.

"If they do, one may go to the grave without knowing."

Solomon nods, satisfied by the minotaur's reply. One common theme I've noticed among their species is their eloquence and intelligence, not only among monsters, but in general. Minotaurs appear brutish and powerful, but physical altercations between them are rarer than a blood-red moon. They prefer to draw, cook, and pursue their hobbies.

Still, their intelligence lacks in some other areas. The whole horn-superstition thing, for one. Oh well, nobody's perfect.

The bus slows to a stop. I breathe a sigh of relief and nod at the minotaur. "See you around."

"You as well, Your Majesty."

I always take the bus to try and keep Daisy as down-to-Tarus as possible. The last thing I want is for her to grow up a snob with communication issues. I don't want her to look down her nose at others. It isn't who I am, or who Phoebe is. It isn't the lifestyle meant for our child.

But, at the same time, I wonder if I'm doing exactly the opposite. Is it normal for kids to make such uncivilized comments? Did she somehow pick up the trait from me?

"Daddy? What's wrong?" The bus drives away, leaving us behind.

I blink and stare at her. "Huh? What do you mean?"

"You look sad."

"Oh. It's nothing. I'm thinking about, uh, how boring your birthday party is going to be! I only invited fifty of your friends over. You probably won't have any fun at all."

Her eyes widen. "You did?! Even Kilva and Ga... Garu... Gaaaruu...?"

Monster names are hard for her.

"Yep, even G'arunth. You ready to see them?" I gesture ahead to the annex I created a few days ago. It has a whole bunch of carnival rides and other things she'll love.

"Oh, yay!! You're the bestest best daddy ever!!"

"I wish that were true."

Part 084: The Bestest Birthday Ever

"I'll see you in a bit, sweetheart."

I wave goodbye to Jason and Daisy. She starts pouting once she realizes I won't be going with her and Jason to her birthday party, but that can't be helped. I'll show up in a bit.

Jason manages to distract Daisy, and she follows him babbling all the while. Knowing Jason, he probably reminded her that a birthday party means candy and cake.

"Phoebe! Are you going to sit up there all day?" Samantha's voice catches my attention. I glance out of my driver-side window at the ground fifteen feet below. "Let's get a move on!"

"Give me a second, Sammy!" I quickly unbuckle the complicated five-lock seatbelt system and grab my gadget bag. After throwing the door open, I hop out, and she catches me before I hit the ground. At this point, it's such a rehearsed maneuver that I don't think about it.

"Great job! First place again." She blushes and flicks her tail around cutely. "You're not fixing these races, are you?"

"Pssh. Never. I can't help my natural talent." I slam the door shut and smack the side of the truck. "Ogie! She's all yours!"

The 'evil' salamander chuckles. "Heh, you hand mah ass ta' me 'n think I'ma fix your car for ya?"

"Mhm!"

"Damn straight." The salamander wipes his red scales down with a towel. They glisten under the light of the midday sun. "You git on over to that little ducky's birthday party. Don'tcha keep her waitin', y'hear?"

"I won't. See you later!"

The soft, moist dirt smushes gently under my shoes as I head toward the opposite end of the stadium. Samantha loops her arm through mine and pulls closer. She's a very hands-on person, and I've had to get used to it over time, but I've also grown to find it endearing.

"Sooo, Phoebe, I haven't seen you in a few days. How are things?"

"Oh, about the same as always. I started teaching Daisy a few basic fencing techniques. She picks them up very quickly."

"Fencing? Isn't that a little dangerous for a five-year-old?"

"We used sticks."

"Ah." Samantha leans her head against me and nuzzles my shoulder. "I wish I could bear a child. It must be wonderful."

"Raising Daisy is a lot of fun, but she can be a handful sometimes."

I keep my reply neutral. Samantha often laments her inability to have children. After all, demons are born via broodmothers. They're similar to ant-queens, in that a broodmother's sole purpose is to birth demons forever. It sounds... unpleasant. No matter how much Samantha wants a child, I doubt she'd go that far.

"You should let me babysit her sometime. I mean, you don't have to..."

I glance down at the thin strips of clothing covering the succubus's body. "You won't teach Daisy anything strange, right?"

"What? No! Of course not!" Samantha covers her mouth in mock surprise. "Why, Phoebe, I can't believe you'd suggest such a thing!"

"Oh, piffle." I wave at a serviceman heading to my truck, taking note of the crowds idling around the amphitheater and chatting idly with each other. "Sure, you can watch Daisy. Heck, why not show her the hospital? She likes talking to sick people."

"The hospital..." Samantha trails off.

A moment passes. We step into the arena exit, and she slows to a stop. "Say, Phoebe, have you been to the hospital lately?"

"No. Why?"

"Well, the thing is, Hope hasn't shown up for his shifts in a few months. When I asked around, the only reply I received was that he was 'busy.' Isn't that strange?"

I scratch my chin. "Do you need help? I can try and speak with Hope. He doesn't avoid me nearly as much as he does Jason."

"Well, you don't need to bother him. It's not like I can't handle a few dozen patients. It barely takes any of my time, given how much mana I possess. Besides, he's busy, so he probably has a good reason."

I roll my eyes. "Yeah, maybe. Hope is Jason's clone at heart. I have to prod Jason to work his shifts too. They're both lazy bums. It isn't fair for you to take care of all the healing work by yourself."

The hospital was an idea created by Jason. While they existed on Earth in his era, ours works differently. People on Earth would wait days, weeks, months, and even years to fully heal. However, thanks to the power of Wordsmithing and Samantha's healing magic, the injured need only a day or so to recover from their wounds.

It's an efficient system, but it works best when all three magical doctors pull their weight.

Samantha squeezes my arm lightly. "Forget it. The least I can do is manage the hospital by myself. Jason's busy working on the colony, Hope's improving the Core... everyone has a role. This is mine."

I lean over and kiss her head. "Alright, if you say so. Anyway, let's get a move on! I need to file a bunch of papers so that I can hurry to Daisy's party."

"You got Daisy a present, right?"

"Of course." I smile, and a feeling of excitement washes over me. "I can't wait to see her face."

My midnight-colored truck rumbles down the road. Its engine, as always, reminds me of a purring lion, one that's only moments away from waking up and tearing apart those who draw too close.

Samantha leans against the passenger door and combs her long, black hair. Her lowered window sends gusts of warm and cool air inside, shifting every time we enter and exit the shadow of buildings and trees. Hero City is unrecognizable compared to how it used to look six years ago. Jason explained to me the concept of 'skyscrapers' and how these ten and fifteen-story buildings were hardly even as big as the ones where Jason grew up. To me, though, they seem enormous. They're taller than the towering spires at the four corners of Arthur's castle.

My mind drifts as I turn right and head down a street.

I still think about Arthur sometimes. My king. I had one opportunity to speak to him during the battle against Amelia and Satan, but I missed it. The Arthur I remember was so powerful that even the Demon Emperors feared him. How did Amelia enslave him, I wonder?

Questions with no answers are poison for the soul. I shouldn't dwell on them.

Samantha raps her fingers on the long, skinny box between us. It's covered in sparkles and glitter, with a neat little bow on top. "Daisy's present, hm? What'd you get her?"

I smile. "You'll see."

"Oh, come on. You can tell me."

"I sure can."

"Phoeeebeee!" Samantha whines noisily. "Don't be like that! I thought we were friends!"

"Haha! We are! And friends don't spoil surprises!"

Samantha puffs out her lip, then grabs the box and shakes it. "It's kinda heavy. No rattling. What kind of toy is this?"

"It's not a toy."

"Really? But she's a little kid."

A distant memory echoes in my mind. "Neither was I when my father gave it to me. You could say it's... it's a family heirloom."

Crossing her arms, Samantha pushes back against her seat. "Alright. Now I'm super curious."

We drive in silence for five minutes, and soon a large square building looms in the distance. It has no special designs on the outside, no sign announcing its function, or any other decorations, giving it an ominous look. Samantha raises an eyebrow. "Is that new? I've never seen it before."

"Jason created it with Wordsmithing a week ago. It's about ten thousand square feet, three stories tall... but the inside's where the fun begins."

As we travel closer and closer, the building continues to expand and take up more of the horizon before us. Samantha whistles. "Pseww... goodness. Jason's going all out."

"You're only six years old once. This is a birthday Daisy will never forget."

We pull to a stop in the mostly empty parking lot, though my space is right next to several dozen vehicles all bunched up in one area. A single wooden door at the front of the pistachio-colored building gives no indication of what's inside. One could be forgiven for thinking this place was little more than another of the five warehouses on the outskirts of Hero City.

The moment we push open the door, the blank exterior gives way to a vibrantly colored interior. The massive, hollowed-out building with dozens of skylights is filled to the brim with various machines my husband tells me are similar to the 'amusement parks' from his era.

Hundreds of children scream and shout excitedly as they ride around on a 'roller coaster.' A machine like a train zips around at high speeds, racing up slopes and in a loop as it circles the perimeter of the building, passes into the middle, and zig-zags back to the building's edge again.

I can't make out Daisy's voice from the other children, but I immediately spot a few hundred adults, including Jason, watching the children frolic and play.

I squeeze Daisy's present tightly. Anxiety hits me. "Wow... The place even more impressive than when I saw it two days ago."

Samantha's eyes are wide as saucers. "Incredible. I've always wanted to go to one of these human attractions. I lost my chance when..."

She trails off. Immediately, a guilty expression crosses her face. "Never mind."

I know what she was going to say. The Volgrim destroyed Earth. I can only imagine what life was like during the Ancient Era, back before the Volgrim attacked. Everything Jason tells me makes it sound like it was a marvelous time to be alive. What's even more incredible is that the world Jason has created here on Tarus II is somehow better than Earth, as far as our quality of life.

Still, my home is gone. Forever. It stings, knowing I'll never see Earth again.

Samantha and I walk underneath the ten-feet-tall roller coaster tracks right as a ride full of children races past. Their shrieks of excitement lighten my mood.

"Phoebe! You made it!" Jason jogs over to us, and I give him a quick kiss. "I was just telling the guys you'd never miss Daisy's birthday party."

I hold out my box. "I brought my... my present for Daisy. Where is she?"

Jason's smile melts away. "Umm... good question. She's around here somewhere. Maybe the carousel? The Spinning Wheel Of Terror? The Lavalanche? The-"

I punch him lightly in the arm. "What do you mean the Spinning Wheel of Terror?! That sounds dangerous!"

Jason chuckles. "Nah, it's no big deal. It spins around really fast and plasters the kids against the wall. Used to be my favorite ride when I went to a carnival. Locate."

Jason finishes with a Word of Power, then tilts his head. "The archery range. Huh. I thought she'd be on one of the rides for sure."

"You gave her a bow and arrow?"

"They're plastic. Perfectly safe. The worst Daisy can do is put someone's eye out, and I'm here, so, no worries."

"I'll go check on her."

Jason holds his hand out to stop me. "Whoa whoa, hun, first you need to tell me what's in the box."

I stick my tongue out. "Bleh. Use your Wordsmithing if you're curious. Or follow along and find out."

He glances at Samantha. "Yeah, okay. Hey Sam. Long time, no chat."

"We spoke last week."

Jason shrugs. "Yeah, but that's a long time in my book."

"Well, maybe when you're a hundred thousand years old, that'll change."

"Probably, haha."

The three of us break away from the crowd of adults and head toward the archery range. I hear Daisy laughing before I see her. When she comes into view, I immediately facepalm. Her face and hands are covered in black ink. She laughs along with a few of her friends from school as they aim arrows with soft black tips at the targets. Interestingly, all her friends are boys. Daisy might be daddy's little princess, but she's also a tomboy.

The six children fire their arrows at the same time. The kobold child misses the mark entirely, while two of the Felaris children manage to hit the edges of the targets. Their claws probably make holding the bowstrings difficult.

Daisy, on the other hand, hits close to the center. Her arrow slams against the board, and the ink on its soft tip leaves a black dot close to the bullseye position.

"Nice job, Daisy!" Samantha claps her hands and catches my daughter's attention. "You're a great shot!"

"Aunt S'matha!" Daisy's tone carries a little surprise, but immediately her eyes lock onto the package in my arms. She drops her bow without a second thought and bounces over to me. "Mommy, what's that?"

"I brought you a present," I say, kneeling to hold it out. Daisy's filthy face makes me want to laugh, but I try to maintain a solemn expression, even as she wipes her inky hands across her cheeks, smearing even more blackness around. "It's a precious item, but I don't know if you're mature enough to treat it well."

Daisy's eyes widen. "I am! I'm machur! What's machur?"

I set the box down. "Ah, never mind that. Open the box."

Daisy nods. She sits down, and several of the boys walk over to see what's going on. As always, Daisy is very careful when she opens the present. She peels off every piece of tape and unfolds it carefully, rather than simply tearing the paper off. On her fourth birthday, she even went so far as to save the wrapping paper because she thought she might have a use for it someday. Now that I think about it, my daughter is a strange child.

By the time she's taken the paper off, some of the boys seem antsy, but a stern look from me prevents them from pushing her aside to open it themselves.

The box is perhaps two-feet long and seven or eight inches wide. Daisy lifts the top off, and Jason groans audibly. "Aw, Phoebe... she's only six."

Daisy pulls out a dull steel sword from the package. She holds it up and stares at it. "Mommy... this is a big knife..."

"It's a sword, sweetheart — my first sword. Your grandfather gave it to me when I was your age. Women weren't allowed to have weapons back then, so I had to keep it secret. It belonged to his father, and his father's father as well. It's the last thing I own from our family. And it's yours now!"

The kobold boy stares at it in awe. "Wow... dude! That's so metal!"

I shoot a glance at Jason. Your favorite words are leaking again.

Jason looks away. Oops.

Daisy acts unusually gentle with the sword. She ignores the chips and dents on its edge, but her eyes fixate on a small carving of a bird etched into the blade, just above the handle. "What's this, mommy?"

"That's a dove. When I was a girl, doves were a sign of peace. Putting a dove on a sword meant the weapon was only allowed to protect the user, not to hurt others. Do you understand?"

She shakes her head. "No..."

"Well, maybe when you're older. Do you remember our practice lessons? There's a sheath and belt in the box. Try them on."

I spend the next minute or so wrestling the belt through Daisy's blue-jean belt-loops. The sword stops an inch or two short of dragging the ground, but it still makes her movement awkward.

Daisy wipes her eye and sniffles. "This is the best... the best present ever... mommy..."

"Aww, sweetheart..." I quickly lean forward and wrap my arms around her. Tears form in my eyes, too, as flashes of my father's face dance in my vision.

Samantha stomps her foot. "Eee! Now I really want a little girl! You two are so precious!"

Not long after, Daisy and one of the boys swing sticks at each other, playing a mock sword-fight while several other kids stand around in a circle and root for one or the other.

Jason wraps his arm around me. "A sword, huh."

"Yep."

"What were you saying about some of these rides being... dangerous?"

"Jason... it's not like-"

I know, I'm only teasing."

We share a moment together, leaning in to kiss each other passionately. My memories float back to when we first met all those years ago.

I love him now as much as I did then. More, even. I'm closer to Jason than I've ever been with anyone else. Perhaps even myself.

We have a child. A wonderful, beautiful little girl. The pride and joy in our lives. She's not only a symbol of our love but proof that humanity can rebuild. We've suffered under the demons and lost innumerable friends and possessions, but as long as we're together, nothing can stand between us.

Samantha walks over to Daisy and starts giving her opponent tips about how to hold his sword and something about a proper stance. He needs Sam's help given how easily Daisy has been besting him.

Jason squeezes my shoulder. "You know, I chatted with Daisy on the way over. She said the darnedest thing to me."

"Yeah? What's that?"

"She told me her birthday wish. She wants a little brother. Think we can do it?"

"We've been trying. Nothing works."

Jason coughs into his fist. "Well, sure, but we haven't tried... you know... Wordsmithing."

"No... that's not right, Jason. You shouldn't use your magic to create life. Let the Creator give us a child."

Jason rolls his eyes. "Phoebe, that's not-"

"Not how biology works, right, right. Biology-shmiology. You always say that. I believe life is a sacred thing. Taking it should never be done in haste, nor should creating it. Besides, if you use your Wordsmithing to make me pregnant, anything could happen."

Jason taps the crown. "I have Solomon. I'm sure it'd be a cinch."

"No."

"But-"

"No."

Jason pulls his arm off my shoulder and swaggers a step away. "Haahhh, fine. Have it your way. I guess Daisy's going to be an only child forever."

I cross my arms and turn up my nose. "If that's what the Creator wishes, then so be it. Hmph."

"Wipe that look off your face. It's too cute."

I can't stay mad at Jason. It's physically impossible.

"We're going to have to try even harder to give her a brother."

Jason raises an eyebrow. "Yeah? And what if after all that exhausting, boring 'work' she gets a sister instead?"

"We'll keep trying."

"Damn. All that exertion, and I don't know if my heart's strong enough." Jason innocently stares up at the skylight and whistles. "Solomon. You keep out of this."

I nudge Jason's arm with my fist. "Stop chatting with your invisible friend, weirdo. And while you're at it, clean the ink off our daughter! She looks hideous!"

Jason smirks. "Yes, ma'am."

Part 085: Ambush

A silent, lumbering mass of bone stomps toward my group of commandos. Its unspeaking jowls open and close as it raises its sword at me.

"Ignite."

With a single word, I unleash hellfire upon the Skeleton Warrior. Its bronze shield and light armor prove useless against my magical flames. The monster's bones snap and crackle as the fire races from its feet to its head. A stench like a burning sewer fills the air, but Centurion immediately filters the odor before I can inhale it.

A dozen armored soldiers stand behind me: two Thundercats and ten Spectres, a formidable strike force.

"We're running out of time, Hope." Henry touches my shoulder. "Neil said-"

"I know. Don't sweat it. The demons can't guard every portion of the Labyrinth... not after the beating we've been giving them lately. I'll squeeze a few more minutes in if it means saving lives."

Unlike the other soldiers, I don't wear a T-REX, but I also don't need one. My body is much more durable than a standard-issue exosuit thanks to Centurion's nanites embedded in my skin. Neil's tests were quite conclusive on that front.

The Labyrinth walls stand at our right and left, while the ceiling and floor seem to press down on us. After growing used to the beauty of Maiura, it never fails to amaze me how dismal the Labyrinth's infinite darkness becomes, the longer I stand inside it.

I hate the Labyrinth. I hate what it stands for, and those it houses. Demons. They're little more than semi-intelligent flesh-eating parasites, and they seek the destruction of any who oppose them.

Most people fear demons. Their minions and moguls dwarf our population by a factor of hundreds.

Not me.

The average demon is neither a Duke, nor a Baron, nor a Lord. Most are grunts, the cannon fodder of demonkind. Despite being marginally stronger than the average human, when a grunt faces an Exosuit-wearing soldier, they don't stand a chance.

The T-REX's are more than a defensive implement. They're the ultimate weapon as well, boasting nearly perfect offense and defense. Enhanced sensory acuity, strength, agility, and an autopilot function are only a handful of the abilities the exosuits grant us.

We aren't invincible. Barons and Dukes are perfectly capable of wiping out a platoon of my best soldiers.

But that's why I'm here.

We continue walking down the pitch-black passage. Occasionally, a poorly-lit torch will flicker up ahead, but the all-consuming darkness swallows its light after we pass.

Few demons live in this area. We cleaned most of them out last month. My goal has stayed true for almost six years: kill the demons, rescue their human slaves, and secure a future for humanity.

Jason lives on Tarus II and leaves the dirty work to me. I accept my duty. I'll do what I have to if it means protecting the loyal humans and monsters serving under me.

Sometimes a man has to stick his hands in the muck if he wants to protect those he loves.

Centurion yells a surprise update into my head. PILOT ZERO-ZERO-FOUR! I AM DETECTING A MASS OF HEAT SIGNATURES ZERO POINT SEVEN MILES IN FRONT OF YOU. PRELIMINARY ANALYSIS SUGGESTS IT MAY BE AN AMBUSH.

"I thought things were a little too quiet around here. Heads up, troops, there's a trap up ahead."

Henry's voice fills with suspicion. "I don't see anything."

He will, soon. Centurion's nanites draw from my spiritual energy to enhance their capabilities. Ordinary exosuits aren't nearly as precise, but they're still leagues beyond human senses.

"Oh." Henry holds up his hand, and the rest of the group stops. "I see them now. Damn. How did you know?"

"I used my Wordsmithing to scout ahead."

"Yeah? I didn't hear you say anything."

"You weren't listening closely enough. Anyway. Let's turn the tables on the demons. Observe."

Instantly, my Wordsmithing analyzes every enemy up ahead. Ten Lords, one Baron, and a hundred grunts await us. They must be confident about their odds of survival.

No, a more likely explanation is that the demons are growing more desperate every day. And why wouldn't they be? We've expanded aggressively over the last six years. Hell, I killed two Lords just last week. Wrong place, wrong time. They never saw their deaths coming.

The demonstone quarries are nearby, and we're sure to meet some stiff resistance when we arrive. Demonstone is the hardest naturally-occurring substance in the universe, even compared to diamond. It takes hundreds of miners chipping away at the same vein for weeks at a time to obtain more than a pound of the stuff, and it's our target today. Well, not the demonstone itself, but the slaves who mine it.

The ten Spectres go silent. Each commando activates their stealth mode, and jump up to adhere to the ceiling and walls. I see them only as outlines floating in the air thanks to Centurion's visual enhancements.

Henry and his comrade, Jenny, activate their energy shields and vibroaxes. The plasmoid blades hum to life, ready to rend demon flesh mercilessly.

They walk past me, and I fade into the background, preparing myself mentally to Wordsmith if they need help. Naturally, I try to conserve my energy where possible. I'll take out the Baron, but my squadmates can easily handle the grunts and Lords.

As the two Thundercats rush down the path, their tower-shields raised to protect themselves with Spectres flanking on all sides, my heart skips a beat. The Baron appears behind their ranks, a spell ready to cast. Before I can shout a warning, the Baron weaves her last hand sign, and a wall of acid rushes at their backs!

Instinctively, I reach out with my telekinesis and press down on the acid, slamming it against the ground. One of the Spectres in the rear turns around just in time for the remnants of the corrosive liquid to splash against his lower body. He hops away, only to scream in pain while swatting his legs. His limbs dissolve into nothingness, along with his nanite-enhanced armor, causing him to slam onto the ground with a sickening thud. "Nnnn-aaahh!!!"

"Regenerate. Heal." I quickly utter two words of power to save the soldier, then charge at the Baron. Henry pulls back and holds up his shield to protect the flank, while Jenny aims hers forward. They each flick a button, and energy bubbles sprout outward and fill the hallway, impeding the approach of the demons in front and the Baron at their backs.

The Baron whips around to face me. Her body, rotting to pieces in various places and covered in rags, gives her a ghastly appearance, almost something like a zombie. She growls at me. "Filthy fleshbag! You're mine!"

"Unlikely," I reply.

She weaves more hand signs, then jumps against the wall and melts inside of it. A split-second later, she appears at my right, having traveled a hundred feet instantly, and leaps out, a blob of acid hovering in front of her hand.

Centurion takes over and slams my heel into the ground, allowing me to backflip and make the Baron strike the wall to my left. The acid bubble splashes and dissolves a chunk of the dirt, making me shudder at the death I narrowly evaded.

I land on my hands and flip to my feet, then prepare myself for whatever she'll use next. This Baron is already several leagues beyond the typical small-fry I fight daily. In the distance, the commandos begin battling her small legion of demons, but it doesn't escape my attention that their leader is singling me out.

Her throat expands. I narrow my eyes. "Shield."

A wall of telekinetic energy forms between us, and just in time too, as the disgusting demon vomits a line of acid at me. It impacts the wall, tears through, and races at my chest.

"Teleport."

I vanish and reappear behind the Baron. The look of surprise on her face makes me grin. A quick punch to her lung cuts off her disgusting stomach juices, and I follow up with another word. "Bind."

Magical ropes wrap around the woman like ten enraged anacondas. Each one's tensile strength is enough to suspend an elephant from the ceiling. They wrap around her and constrict her body fiercely, but a moment later, she melts into a puddle of acid and enters the floor.

She's a slippery devil.

Centurion blares in my mind. WARNING! TWO CASUALTIES SUSTAINED IN STRIKE GROUP SIGMA!

I can't spare a glance back at my squad. The demon resistance must be fierce.

A hand formed from acid lunges from the Labyrinth floor and grabs my leg. It sears into my flesh, causing blinding pain to surge up my spine. The agony is even more painful than if I'd plunged my limb into a vat of boiling water! I barely manage to expel telekinetic energy from all of my pores, then wheeze out, "T-Teleport!"

I land on my stomach a hundred feet ahead, even further from my group than before. The Baron is slowly pulling me further and further away.

A hissing sound erupts from the ground as her body reforms. "Hehehe, you must be Hope, the so-called reincarnation of the Hero-King. The others tell me you've already slain ten thousand demons! When I kill you, the Council will have no choice but to make me a Duke!"

I force a smile. Even with this slippery bitch taunting me, I can't let her see how much her acid hurt me. Besides, I take at least a little pride in how much the demons fear me. They should.

"You haven't beaten me yet, glob-spitter. You're a one-trick pony. I have the power of the Gods on my side."

"The gods are dead. Soon, you will wish you had joined them."

Centurion quickly repairs the damage to my leg. I leap to my feet and aim my mind at the Baron. "I don't know your name, and I don't care. You're nothing but one red rat among many. Immunity."

My body shifts its physiological structure to resist acid, making me impervious to the demoness's attacks. Even with my DNA rewriting itself, I don't feel a thing. I take a wide stance and steady myself as the female weaves another hand sign. "A single isolated word. I know how your power works, Wordsmith! You can't protect yourself!"

To my surprise, the Baron explodes into gas and rapidly expands throughout the corridor. A wave of nausea hits me like a freight train.

I made my body impenetrable to acid, but I didn't... I didn't realize she had a gaseous...

"Kah! Kahh!" I stumble backward. My lungs turn to fire as Centurion rapidly tries to expel the poisonous gas.

WARNING! LEVEL 5 NEUROTOXINS DETECTED! INTERNAL BIOREACTORS COMPROMISED!

Neurotoxins. Shit. This demon isn't an average Baron. She's... handpicked? Someone... expected me... to...

"Ex-expel. Expel."

I speak the words, but I can't focus my mind. Nothing happens.

The ground rushes at me. Everything goes dark.

"That was a close one."

Neil's voice greets me. I blink open my eyes and fight the urge to vomit. "Gnn... burgh... w-what...?"

A woman speaks next. "You're lucky I stopped by when I did. Neil, what did you say happened?"

I wince as a brilliant beam irradiates my face from above. The brightness reminds me of staring directly at the sun. Christ, I hate when people shove a fucking light in my face. I groggily raise my hand to shield my eyes while turning my head to the side. Red skin and a scantily covered pair of breasts greet me. I look up and spot the face of Belial, the Second Emperor of all demons.

Neil keeps his voice neutral. "There was an ambush in the Labyrinth. Hope and a few others went in to try and secure some supplies, but a large group of demons ambushed them."

Belial narrows her eyes. "Is that so? The toxin in Hope's blood is quite rare. I even know the demon who makes it. Vepar, the Baron of Toxicity. She's not someone who would attack humans for pointless reasons."

The succubus glances at me, a frown on her face. When it comes to me, she never smiles. "Four dead Spectres. Considering your opponent, I'm surprised you escaped. Vepar is Ose's hand-picked enforcer. Her job is to capture troublesome demons, alive. She only fights if ordered by a higher authority."

Neil nods. "Well, if that's the case, then we're lucky the recall beacons worked. I don't know who this 'Vepar' is, but I think you're reading into things too much."

"I wonder about that," Belial mutters.

Silently, I pull myself into a sitting position. The small chamber, which we call the Recall Zone, is where we send people injured during missions so I can heal them. Naturally, we don't send Core personnel to the hospital on Tarus... that would garner too much suspicion.

Damn. If only I hadn't been caught off-guard, then Belial wouldn't have found out. She probably doesn't understand our mission yet, but seeing her now is terrible. I can only pray she doesn't tell Phoebe or Jason. That would be disastrous.

"It's nothing, Belial. You know how tenuous our situation is."

The Second Emperor's tail flicks around slowly, back and forth. It's a gesture I've learned over several years that means she's thinking carefully.

"I find it odd that demons haven't attacked the Core in six years. Even considering Uriel's rampage several years ago..."

Neil casually walks around my bed to the same side as Belial. His eyes flick to me, then back to the demoness. He keeps his expression easygoing, but I sense a slight dread lurking beneath his smile. "I hear the demons have a new Emperor. She's running things differently compared to the old days."

"Yes. That's what bothers me." Belial's lip curls up in disgust. "Ose hates humans more than you could ever imagine. Her entire bloodline is filled with sick, twisted examples of demonkind's worst traits. I find it unfathomable she would sit back and allow humans to openly rebel. Especially given the number of worlds you've liberated from demon control."

A bead of sweat trickles down my back. "You know about them?"

"I've heard rumors. I don't oppose human freedom, you know. Nobody asked for my input at the end of the Energy Wars. I thought the punishment humans received as the losers was grotesque. Still, your so-called leaders and wealthy dignitaries accepted the terms. Considering the reward they received, it's easy to see why."

My heart skips a beat. "Reward? What reward?"

Belial fans out her nails. "Ninety-nine percent of all humans became mindless chattel for demon amusement. The rest lived their lives in luxurious opulence at Hell Harbor."

I feel the hairs on the back of my neck slowly raise. "Hell Harbor… isn't that…"

"The place Uriel attacked, yes. You might call it demonkind's new homeworld." Belial closes her hand into a fist. "Don't get any ideas. Dukes and Barons live there. A few upper-ranked Lords, as well. If all of its residents attacked today, you would die."

Belial's voice lowers. "And that's to say nothing of what the Overlords would do."

I open my mouth to ask about them, but Belial raises her hand. "I've said enough. I don't know what you two are doing in the Labyrinth, but you must stop. Poking a hornet's nest is the best way to get stung."

Neil raises an eyebrow. "And what if we're immune to their poison?"

"Don't pick apart the analogy. You know what I mean." Belial looks me up and down one last time. "Stay out of trouble, Hope. It would be nice if you showed up to your shifts at the hospital, too."

"Sorry. I forgot."

"Oh, please. Neither you nor Jason suffers from poor memories. Please stop making excuses. Sick people need assistance, and I'm only one healer."

I bow my head apologetically. "Sorry. I'll pull my weight more."

For once, Belial smiles. When she isn't frowning or putting on a grandiose air, she becomes noticeably more attractive. "Thanks. I'll see you two around."

Her high-heels click toward the door, and a few moments later, she slams it shut behind her.

I release a breath I didn't realize I had been holding. Belial acts very differently around Neil and me compared to Jason and Phoebe. Around them, she's a bubbly, animated person who hops up and down like a kid. Around us, though… she's more like a venomous snake, waiting to strike.

Neil rubs his forehead. "Bloody hell. That was a close one."

"Is Henry okay? Jenny?"

"They're fine. We lost Corbin, Maurice, David, and Pyrrha, though. The enemy used a device that destabilized the nanites in their suits. We're lucky anyone survived."

My jaw drops. "Since when do demons have anything capable of countering a T-REX?!"

"Never. Not that I know of, anyway. Your squadmates activated their beacons and managed to rescue you before the Baron could haul you away, but you'll have to thank Kar for providing a distraction. His group showed up at the last second. They're the only reason you survived."

"I'll be sure and give him a round of beer on me. Christ." I shake my head slowly. A lump of pain bubbles underneath the surface. "Heal." The sensation vanishes.

"You alright?"

"Yeah. Whatever that demon bitch hit me with... it was horrible. I couldn't focus my mind. I tried to Wordsmith, but nothing happened."

Neil slides over and sits on the bed beside me. He pats my back. "Belial was right."

"About what?"

"The demon ambush. It was calculated, not like your other battles. Someone's screwing with us — with you. Think about it. The demons had a nanite-jammer, and they targeted you with something that impaired your Wordsmithing. Someone is trying to capture you... and I can only imagine why."

"They want my power?"

"Maybe. We've been careful to ensure the demons don't know you're a clone. They probably think you and Jason are the same person.

"Maybe. Thanks to Jason's battle against Satan and the other Emperors six years ago, and your incursions against the demons ever since, they've probably gotten a good handle on your powers. With all the soul manipulators running around, it's not unlikely they intend to capture you. If they do, then humanity will have no defense against the bloodskin bastards. Wordsmithing in the hands of the enemy would be a disaster."

"They can't make me use my powers."

Neil shakes his head. "You're wrong. There are several demons with the ability to control minds. Even if they didn't exist, torture is surprisingly effective at making people do what they want."

"Not when a single word could teleport me back to the Core."

A long silence follows. Neil stares at the wall blankly. "The demons are crafty, Hope. They defeated the angels. Even now, while we rescue those we can and execute the strongest demons in our path, they're most likely plotting to destroy us. Never underestimate a demon's animal cunning."

"Sure, but the river of souls is drying up. The demons can't mutate more Barons and Dukes to replace those they've lost."

Neil pulls his hand away from my back and folds his palms together. "Perhaps. However, I worry about... about Ose. We don't know anything about her. She's the leader of our enemies, but we have no intel on how she works, or what her powers are. Doesn't that worry you?"

I nod. "A little. I know what magical acts Diablo, Satan, and Belial can perform. If Ose is an Emperor, she's probably as much of a monster as them."

Silently, I follow Neil's gaze to the stony Labyrinth wall. Memories play in my head from six years ago when I battled Uriel. She was monstrously powerful, and I barely managed to meet her on equal footing.

Eventually, the Demons defeated her. That alone tells me how powerful they are, and they did it without Belial or Diablo's assistance.

Ose had something to do with Uriel's defeat. I don't know what her role was, but anyone who could take out the Archangel is a serious threat to not only myself, but humanity as well.

I don't know her, and she doesn't know me. We are enemies who have never met face to face.

"Neil... why do we kill demons?"

"Because they are evil."

"And are all demons evil?"

"The overwhelming majority are, yes."

I exhale again. "You're probably right. Sometimes I wish I could live in ignorance, blissfully unaware of the evils outside the Great Doors."

Neil pats my knee. "That life is not for men like you and me. Leave it to your doppelganger. We have a higher calling."

I nod, but my heart sinks. "Yeah. I suppose. Uh, incidentally, I've been thinking about this for a while, but now's as good a time as any to bring it up. I need some time for myself. I want to return to my villa for a week or two."

Neil smiles. "Oh, sure. Take some time off. Don't have too much fun, though. If you're still there in a month, I might have to send in a rescue squad."

"No, I'll come back. Don't you worry about that, haha..."

I slide off the bed. "Clothes."

My military uniform pops onto my body, and I slip out of bed to face the Commander.

Neil pats my shoulder. "Go home, Hope. We'll keep the Core running without you for a while. A little R&R never hurt anyone."

"Thanks, Neil. You're the best."

I smile at my friend as a feeling of warmth appears in my heart. Unlike Jason, Neil gives more than he takes. I always feel like I can't pay him back enough for all the advice and help he offers, which only makes me happier to be his friend.

"Return."

With a single word, I vanish from the Labyrinth and appear in front of my mansion on Maiura. A gigantic building the size of a castle greets me, each side surrounded by twenty-foot walls with razor-wire to keep out Maiura's dangerous predators. The Victorian-style mansion, created by me, gives me a sense of old-timey comfort I can't get anywhere else.

Sometimes, after a difficult mission in the Labyrinth, I have to return here. I have to remind myself who I'm fighting for.

I shove the doors open. The sound of wood striking the doorstopper echoes throughout the empty entrance.

A moment passes. Two.

"Jason? You're back!"

A voice calls out. That sense of warmth enters my body once again, and I smile. My eyes immediately swivel toward the speaker, a beautiful woman in a black and red dress.

She quickly dashes over to me and wraps her arms around my waist. "I was sooo lonely! You've been gone for, like, three days!"

I use my telekinesis to close the door. Pulling her toward me, I kiss her slowly and tenderly, allowing my hands to rove.

When we pull away, her smile has already infected me. "Haha... sorry. You wouldn't believe what happened to me today, Amelia."

Part 086: Master of Puppets

"Sure, but the river of souls is drying up. The demons can't mutate more Barons and Dukes to replace those they've lost."

"Perhaps. However, I worry about... about Ose. We don't know anything about her. She's the leader of our enemies, but we have no intel on how she works, or what her powers are. Doesn't that worry you?"

"A little. I know what magical acts Diablo, Satan, and Belial can perform. If Ose is an Emperor, she's probably as much of a monster as them."

The two humans sit on the bed beside one another and hazard weak guesses regarding their recent defeat.

As for me?

I lean against the wall and watch.

My astral form affords me many capabilities that others can only imagine. Reconnaissance. Infiltration. Sabotage. I find the deepest secrets of my enemies and study their machinations from the inside-out.

I am Ose, Third Emperor of all demons.

I am... omniscient.

Well, that might be going a little too far, but the insipid humans cannot comprehend how badly I've already beaten them at their own game. Hope and Neil, the so-called commanders of the human military, are little more than pawns for my entertainment. I know their intentions and their plans.

Jason created Hope using Wordsmithing. His goal was to create a backup for himself in case he should fall. A second Wordsmith, one who could stave off the demons if need be. The humans have gone to great lengths to protect themselves, but their efforts are all for naught. My Astral Form, invisible and undetectable, allows me to watch them plot and plan their next move. Countering their feeble tactics is simpler than beating Bael at a game of Chess.

For six years, I have allowed humanity to stretch its tendrils inside the Labyrinth. I incurred some minor losses, typically grunts and lords who displeased me, but nobody essential to my grand plan. My ultimate goal is to break humanity's spirit; to send them crawling back to their worlds where they will curl up in the fetal position and beg forgiveness for daring to stand against demonkind. In that light, a few casualties are more than acceptable for reaching my ultimate goal.

When humans escaped my mental traps and took a stand against their imprisonment, it was the biggest slap in the face anyone has ever given me. I take insults personally and never forgive a grievance. This time, when I smother the last vestiges of faith from the little rats, I won't give them cushy castles and grain, but mud huts and gruel. The ancient treaties we signed with the leaders of humanity have been long forgotten, anyway. They won't care if those separated from them by a hundred generations live in filth.

Yes, my plans are all coming together now. She who thinks through the ramifications of her actions may lose a battle, but she will inevitably win the war.

I will win the war.

The human commander, Neil, smiles at Hope. "Oh, sure. Take some time off. Don't have too much fun, though. If you're still there in a month, I might have to send in a rescue squad."

"No, I'll come back. Don't you worry about that, haha..."

Hope slides off the bed.

"Clothes."

After speaking a few parting words with his commander, Hope vanishes, leaving Neil behind. The Commander stares ahead listlessly for a long moment. A dumbfounded look slowly stretching across his face makes me chuckle.

"I don't get it... how did they destabilize the nanites...?"

Neil's eyes lower to his feet. "A mole, perhaps?"

My chuckle increases in tempo. "Hahaha..." Soon, I lean against the wall and clutch my stomach. "Hahahaha! HAAAAHAHA!!"

While Neil struggles with the deaths of a few subordinates, I desperately try to retake control of my body, though the laughter won't stop! It's too precious!

A minute passes. Neil stands up and heads to the door. After he leaves, I finally regain my mental faculties and wipe the tears of laughter from my eyes.

"Hoo... goodness! That was fantastic."

A mole, hm? Neil isn't wrong, but his life would be much easier if he only had one double agent inside the Core.

I smooth my white dress down and silently phase through the closed door. The hallway outside bends and twists in different directions, with doors scattered all over for patients recovering from their wounds. I hover forward, expanding my mind to locate the one I seek.

It doesn't take me more than a few seconds. Fifty feet down the hall, Room 7 sits with its door cracked open. I slide inside and swallow bile as I prepare myself for what I must do.

A human male lays in bed, staring up at the ceiling. He and I are the only people here. Gathering myself, I reach out and touch his hand — a tiny spark of electricity arcs off my finger. The man's body stiffens. His eyes shift to me, and he bolts up in bed. "Ah! Miss Oshina!"

I force myself to smile at him. "Henry, my beloved. I'm sorry I haven't spoken to you in weeks. You know how difficult it is for me to reform my spiritual body."

Henry's expression brightens. He nods. "Yes, yes! The afterlife curse. You mentioned it before- no, never mind that! I did what you asked!"

I slide onto the bed beside Henry and caress his hand. All he feels is a slight tingling on his skin, but still, his heartbeat quickens. Like all men, he's a gullible fool — easy to twist around my finger.

"You did? That's wonderful, Henry. I've been lonely, drifting between the world of the dead and that of the living. Being without you was torturous- I hope you will forgive me." I lower my eyes and pretend to pout, which only awakens his chivalrous instincts.

"It isn't your fault, Miss Oshina. It's the demons' fault." Henry balls his left hand into a fist and gnashes his teeth. "They did this to you. Just like they did to Piper."

Sometimes I wonder how I can stop myself from laughing. Henry's idiocy has no limits, though he isn't much dumber than the average human. "I spoke to Piper two days ago. He'll ascend to Heaven soon, my love. It's all because of your good deeds. The Creator was impressed by your feats against demonkind."

The wonderful thing about my Astral Form is that I can change my physical body as I wish. Henry doesn't see my demonic body, but a beautiful human woman instead, someone I've calculated to resemble his ideal mate. I haven't a clue what I look like, but my appearance appeals to Henry, and that's all that matters.

Henry pulls his hand away from mine and wipes his forehead. "It felt wrong, though. Leading everyone into that ambush, I mean. Why did I need to lead Hope to that Vepar lady? Aren't the demons our enemy?"

"They are, my love. Do you remember what I told you the last time we spoke? Hope and Jason are agents of Satan the Devil. Don't you find it strange that they have the same magical powers as the demons, yet claim to be on your side? Humans can't use magic. It goes against the Creator's will."

Henry scratches his chin. "I suppose... it's just- I thought that the Wordsmiths had magical powers like the angels. If they're agents of the demons, why would the demons attack them? Why would we give them to the demons? I don't understand..."

Tch. The young man is confused. How unfortunate. When I manipulate emotions, it typically leads to humans thinking irrationally, which I can use to my advantage. However, there's always the chance that they start asking pesky, annoying questions.

"Henry..." I slide a little closer to him on the bed. "It's all part of the Creator's plan. Jason and Hope have Neil fooled. They're using their Wordsmithing to manipulate the minds of the weak-willed. You're stronger than them, aren't you? Didn't you tell me you could see through the lies of the demons?"

Henry nods, perhaps a little too quickly. "Of course. Of course! I'm sorry. I didn't mean to trouble you. I'll do what the Creator wishes. He must have chosen me for a reason."

I don't like it when men ask questions. Henry is perhaps getting a little too antsy for his own good.

I lean forward and bring my face toward his. Waves of revulsion threaten to yank me away, but I persevere. Being close to a male — a human male, at that — is usually enough to give me conniptions. I close my eyes so that I needn't look at Henry, then press my forehead against his.

It only takes a few moments. Several pulses of electricity overwrite Henry's higher thought processes, shutting down parts of his prefrontal cortex in the process.

This 'treatment' won't last forever, but it should work for a while, similarly to the last one I did. Doing it too often can lead to memory loss and other unwelcome side effects. I wouldn't want to draw the attention of someone with medical knowledge... especially if that person's name is Belial.

I pull away and stifle a sigh of relief. Being close to a human is a lot like sleeping with a hellhound. They're both animals with awful base desires, but at least Hellhounds have soft, pettable fur.

Henry's eyes turn blank for a few moments. He shakes fog from his head and winces. "Ohh... Miss Oshina... I- I have this awful headache all of a sudden."

I roll my eyes and put a cute lilt in my voice. "I'm so sorry, Henry. I didn't mean to hurt your head. I'll leave..."

He quickly forces a smile. "No, no, don't go! Stay a while! Please. I don't want to be alone. Not after what happened earlier."

I echo his smile, though mine is hollow and empty. "Alright. Anything for you, my love."

I hate everything about humans, from their hair to their toes and all the rubbish in-between.

My mind recalls to my body. I awaken with a shiver and rub my arms.

My empty, barren room beckons to me. The sun beams through my window, illuminating a single dresser against the far wall. I sit in my rocking chair, the only other item in my room of importance, and stretch. My back pops, sending a wave of pleasure through my nervous system. Exercise is one of the few things I enjoy in life unrelated to intellectual pursuits.

I stride over to my dresser and pull it open. The top drawer has two dozen identical white uniforms, the middle has two dozen dresses, and the bottom is for undergarments.

Hmm.

I'm in the mood to wear a uniform today.

Sometimes I feel like wearing a dress, but sometimes I don't. I'm not like other women who constantly fret over their appearance. I either wish to maintain a professional appearance, or I wish to utilize my feminine charms. I discovered a long time ago that men don't care about what a woman wears; it's always other women who judge my appearance. With that in mind, maintaining multiple, identical outfits cuts out a lot of wasted time in my daily schedule.

Efficient, resourceful, and contemplative. Those are the words I always use to describe myself. I waste nothing and push all of my resources to their maximum effectiveness.

It only takes me a minute to change my clothes. I always move quickly so as not to waste any time. Before walking away from the desk, I pause and glare at it. A speck of dust catches my eye.

White is the color of purity. It shines brightest in the darkness, but the slightest smudge dirties it beyond repair.

Unacceptable.

"Amy."

My voice is barely a growl, hardly audible even if someone were in the same room as me. Nevertheless, ten seconds later, the door to my room opens, and a human woman steps inside. She bows her head without meeting my gaze.

"There is a smudge on my dresser. Dirt. Scrub this entire room from top to bottom. If I come back and find a speck of lint, expect to find your plate empty for the next three days."

The blonde woman nods quickly and scurries out of the room. She comes back a minute later with an entire toolkit, including rags, chemicals, and wood polish.

Amy never says anything. She can't, as the scars on her throat and her lack of a tongue can attest. I have only a few slaves living at my estate, but all of them are humans. None of them can speak, which is good. I prefer their silence.

I leave Amy to clean every inch of my dresser inside and out. She knows the price of failure. They all do. The demonstone mines are not pleasant this time of year... or ever, for that matter.

I stride out of my room and past a dozen others, all of them empty, doors closed. Amy is the only house-slave, and she doesn't live inside. No, she sleeps in the garden, whether there be rain or snow. I don't know how she's survived for tens of thousands of years, but she has. I suppose the nanobots humans invented during the Energy Wars made her hardier than the average woman.

Perhaps one of these days, I'll kill Amy, and all the other slaves too. I despise humans, but since I can't bear the thought of enslaving a fellow demon, I have no choice but to rely on those I hate the most. How unfortunate that I've ended up trapped in a lose-lose situation.

After a minute of walking, I grow weary of the slow movement and begin transmitting around at the speed of light, moving from here to there to check on various parts of my estate. My inspection concludes uneventfully, and I find no other signs of dirt or grime anywhere. Thank the devils.

Mother always called me a perfectionist. She said I set my sights too high, but there was always a twinkle in her third eye. I believe she admired my perseverance, no matter the odds. There is no such thing as good enough. One can always aspire to reach a new plateau or achieve a new height. Accepting mediocrity is the first step toward heading nowhere in life. Too many demons have fallen into that mental trap, not least of whom was Diablo.

Heh. Six years after the fact, I can't help but feel pleased that Diablo entered a coma. With luck, by the time he awakens in a few hundred years, I'll have transformed the Labyrinth into a perfectly oiled machine. He'll be unable to offer any resistance and will beat his chest in grief as he accepts me as the permanent Third Emperor.

No, that's not right. I'll eliminate Belial and take her place. I'll become the Second Emperor.

...Come to think of it, I've searched for thousands of years, yet I haven't the faintest clue who the First Emperor is. To call him a crafty devil would be an understatement. Diablo swears the First exists, but I have my doubts. Why hasn't the First contacted me in six years? Is he little more than a false conjuration by that lazy oaf to retain power?

No matter. If the First Emperor exists, I will find him. I will make him bend the knee and accept me as the supreme leader of demonkind. If he doesn't, then Belial is the only barrier to my progress.

I can't wait to eliminate her once and for all.

After concluding my inspection of the estate grounds, I leave my residence and transmit hundreds of miles from my mountain plateau to the valleys below in the blink of an eye. I arrive at the Hell Harbor Annex and give it a quick once-over. What used to be a rather uninteresting entrance to our world has now become a miniature fortress encased in stone and steel.

Dozens of Lords and even a few Barons patrol the Annex. A few walk around outside, but the rest stay inside. The moment one of the Lords spots me, he nudges another Lord beside him, and they both stand at attention. "Halt! State your identity and the secret phrase."

I stop before them and cross my arms. "Ose. Third Emperor. I love purple dragons."

"What flower grows on Mount Chilau?"

"Trick question. It's covered in snow."

"How deep does the snowfall average?"

"Nine inches, but it once reached a record-depth of seven feet."

The guard nods. "Welcome, Miss Ose."

I nod back at him. "Keep sharp. Remember, our enemy includes at least one confirmed shapeshifter. I'll rotate the password in three days."

"As you wish, ma'am."

Striding inside the Annex, I spare the briefest of glances at the demonstone-lined room, which is now strong enough to withstand an atomic explosion. After seeing the destruction Beelzebub wreaked several years ago, it's only natural we should prepare for the worst. Unlike the majority of demons alive today, I remember the levels of destruction humans once achieved. I hope we never revisit those dark days.

Hardly have I walked ten steps into the annex before a baroness squirms over to me. The sight of her face fills me with rage, but I contain my emotions.

"Vepar."

The ghoulish-looking demon, with her melted-red skin, bows her head. "Ah, Miss Ose... I bring news regarding the attack on the Hero-"

"You failed. I already know."

She freezes in place. "You... you know?"

"I do. To say I'm disappointed would be the greatest possible understatement I could make. I went to great lengths to deceive the humans, but you botched the job at the last moment."

She shivers visibly. "I... I apologize. The Sphinx appeared. He caught me off-guard, as did his forces. Before I knew it-"

"Stop making excuses. I don't care how powerful the mighty 'Sphinx' is, he's a monster, and you're a demon. A Baron, at that. You know how I treat failures."

Slowly, Vepar raises her head. She sends me a look of pleading. "Please, Emperor Ose, don't do anything rash. Give me another chance. We worked together during the Energy Wars! Surely you remember our promise?"

"I delivered on that promise. You did not. I told you that when I rose through the ranks, I would help you become a Duke alongside me. That was before you ruined six years of planning. The humans know of your existence now and will develop counter-measures. You've put them on high-alert."

Vepar's expression turns sullen. "You... you don't mean..."

"We're no longer partners. You served your purpose, only to falter when I needed you most. I'll find a capable replacement with ease."

The blood drains from Vepar's cheeks. "You... you can't abandon me! I helped you at every opportunity! I praised your leadership and spoke highly of you to Diablo on several-"

I cut her off again. "I can, and I will. In fact, your failure sickens me enough that I'm not simply casting you aside. I'm demoting you. You will rejoin the Lords until you've proven your capabilities again."

Vepar opens and closes her mouth several times as waves of shock race through her body. "Th-th-that's... you... demons can't..."

"Can't be demoted? True, the souls you've consumed will stay inside of you, but consider it a symbolic gesture. We will demolish your residence at Hell Harbor, and you'll stay in the Catacombs once more. Perhaps a reminder of how poor your life once was will strengthen your resolve."

"But-"

"Another word and I'll send you to the mines."

That shuts her up. Vepar trembles. She stuffs rage and anguish deep inside of herself and bows curtly. "Of course. I will reflect on your words of wisdom, Emperor Ose."

Vepar spits my titles out, and I smile. She can protest all she wants, but among demons, power is everything. I have it, and she does not. She can do nothing to me.

I watch as Vepar storms away, trying desperately to fight back tears. I might feel bad for her, but were I placed in her shoes, I would have succeeded.

That is what differentiates me from the other demons. Animal cunning. The ability to size up my opponents in an instant.

Sometimes, I find myself wishing there were another demon like me, one who understood that power is everything. Most of my people crave the influence and prestige afforded by the rank of Emperor, but few understand what it means to wield such authority.

I am a speck of purity floating in a sea of muck.

I am... alone.

A wave of emotion strikes me in the stomach. I take a moment to lean against a wall. The sudden overwhelming loneliness is not an alien feeling. It is something I have experienced too many times to count.

But... today... seeing Vepar walk away, someone I once considered a frien- no, a minion. Seeing her walk away, it hits me once again. I have no close comrades. All I have is one broken monster of a brother.

I wish, desperately, that I didn't feel this way.

Wiping my forehead, I pull away from the wall and smooth my white uniform down. It would be unbecoming of an Emperor to have an emotional breakdown amidst the lower ranks.

"Awww, Mister Beelzebub! Are you suuuuure I can't come along?"

"Positive. Stay here."

A shrill and nasally voice tears me from my thoughts. It's followed by a deep voice, one that commands attention even in a crowded room such as this. I swivel my gaze around to see Beelzebub, the Duke of Inferno, standing beside his hideous assistant demoness. She is positively one of the grossest creatures among my species. If one were to tell me that her lineage came from goblins, I would agree.

Beelzebub's assistant stomps her foot. "But whyyyy? I wanna come along too! You always make me stay at Hell Harbor!"

"Don't you like it here?"

She nods. "Oh, of course! But I like being with youuu even more~"

Beelzebub rubs his chin. "Perhaps I should get you a pet hellhound. Then you can fawn all over it instead of me."

"Eee!! You're going to get me a puppy?! I always knew you cared!!"

Sensing Beelzebub's distress, I stride over to the two. "If you need Hellhounds... well, my mother was the progenitor of their species. I could give you one in return for a small favor."

The pinstripe-suited demon coughs, and a small stream of fire rushes through his hands before evaporating in the air. "Kah. Anything to shut this she-orc up. You hear that, Rosalia? The Third Emperor has a puppy for you."

Rosalia's smile disappears. "I don't want your Hellhound. I want Mister Beelzebub to pick one for me."

Devils. Ungrateful, fat, and ugly. A trifecta of terrible. No wonder Beelzebub can't stand her.

I wave my hand flippantly. "Suit yourself. Beelzebub, what are you doing?"

"I beg your pardon?"

"In the Labyrinth. You're headed there. Why?"

The Duke sniffles, making smoke exhale from his nose. "I hear the humans suffered a grievous blow earlier today. I'm heading to the Core's outskirts to investigate."

Interesting. I hadn't told anyone about the operation yet. I kept it classified in case of leaks. Beelzebub must have built up a decent intelligence network to have learned about my plot already.

"Don't bother. I conducted a covert mission. My goal was to capture the Wordsmith. Unfortunately, the Baron I put in charge failed, allowing the Hero to escape."

Beelzebub tilts his nose up. "That must have put you in a sour mood."

"Somewhat. I've moved past Vepar's failure. I recently put the finishing touches on Operation Stormbringer."

Beelzebub's gaze flicks to Rosalia. "Stormbringer, you say? Rosalia. Leave us."

"What? But whyyy?"

I roll my eyes. "It's top-secret information. Only Dukes and higher are allowed to know."

Rosalia's face sags. "Aww... well, okay, then. I'll go. Bye, Mister Beelzebub! I love-!"

He shoves his hand into her face and pushes her away. "Don't make me vomit."

"Eeee!! You touched my face! We're moving forward in our relationship!!"

Beelzebub's cold, dead eyes meet mine.

We share a moment of solitude together, one which simply says, we're surrounded by idiots.

I gesture to a nearby portal and pull him away from his frumpy, lumpy assistant. Once we're out of earshot and waiting for the portal to open, I mutter, "I don't know what you see in her."

Beelzebub shakes his head. "You know the rules. Rosalia was assigned to be my personal maid. Once a demon receives a servant, they're bound for life."

A minute passes. I stare ahead at the portal while waiting for the Warper on the other side to receive the confirmation code.

"Is that a rule? The servant one, I mean."

"I believe so. Why?"

"Who told you it was a rule?"

"Bael."

Several moments pass. A smirk passes over my face. "He lied."

"Hm? What?!" Beelzebub's expression turns to shock. "No! Surely you jest!"

"I would never. Bael must have been poking fun at you. There is no such rule regarding servants. Not that I've heard."

Beelzebub stares at the side of my face blankly for several moments before turning back to the portal. "Lucifer's tits. I can't believe that fat bastard-"

I immediately hold a finger up. "Don't use that phrase in front of me."

"What phrase? Lucifer's-?"

"Yes. That one."

I grit my teeth and exhale.

"Lucifer was my mother."

Several seconds pass. Beelzebub clams up and folds his hands in front of himself.

"My apologies. I meant no offense."

"None taken. I wish I knew who came up with that dreadful saying all those ages ago so I could take a knife and-"

I stop myself mid-sentence. A smile spreads across my face.

"Never mind. Haha... you're not like the other demons, you know?"

Beelzebub meets my gaze. "How so?"

"I don't know. Something about you seems more familiar than I'm used to. I have a difficult time putting my finger on it."

Beelzebub shrugs. The portal finally opens. As we step through and it closes behind us, I turn to him. "Beelzebub, may I ask you a personal question?"

He sighs, breathing fire once again. "Haah, I suppose. I won't answer if it's too personal, though."

"What is your goal?"

The Duke raises an eyebrow. "My goal? What do you mean?"

"You're the first demon to ascend to the rank of Duke since the Energy Wars. You must have pushed yourself harder than any others. My question is... why? To what end?"

Beelzebub smirks. "To achieve power. Why else? If I have power, I can remake the Labyrinth. I can change how our species lives."

My breath catches. "B-but once you have that power, what would you do with it?"

Instead of immediately responding, Beelzebub looks away. His eyes swivel around the Third Quadrant landing area, nearby the Basilisk Dens. Dozens of goblins and orcs wander around, paying us no heed.

"Demons are inefficient. We fight over scraps rather than focusing our energy toward the future. The Overlords loom above us without our knowledge. Instead of fighting one another, I wish to make us work together to reach the pinnacle of our civilization. The Labyrinth is little more than an ever-expanding tomb. I wish to colonize the entire galaxy and beyond."

I nod along to his words. A smile spreads across my face.

"I assumed I was the only one who thought that way. Hearing you say such things is music to my ears."

Beelzebub meets my gaze. Several seconds pass.

The Duke glares at me. "Stop staring. You're giving me the same look Rosalia does. It's disgusting."

I blink and look away. My cheeks flare-up. "S-sorry. My apologies."

We start walking together toward some unknown destination. Guilt and distress wash over me.

I apologized. To another demon. In my entire life... I've never done that over something so trivial.

It's at this moment I finally understand... I see it now. Beelzebub is like me. Unsatisfied with the status quo. Willing to claw his way to the top to affect change.

Toward Beelzebub, I feel...

Part 087: Birds Of A Feather

Recommended Listening

The prattling and babbling of the women in my life often seems neverending. If it isn't the she-ogre following me around and fawning after me with a vile look in her eyes, it's the she-devil who stands a little too close to me for my liking as we travel the Labyrinth's halls.

Ose, the newest Emperor, and a royal pain in my neck, matches my pace as I head down one of the near-infinite corridors littered throughout the Labyrinth. Like me, her elevated position is a recent gain, given how Bael promoted us at the same time. However, while I defeated Agares in a terrific upset of the ages, Ose did little to earn her title. I can't help but feel jealousy burning in my chest.

The white-haired demoness glances at me for a moment before looking away. Then she does it again.

Revulsion boils up in my stomach, and I shoot a glare at her. "Stop staring. You're giving me the same look Rosalia does. It's disgusting."

Immediately, she averts her gaze and stares at the floor. "S-sorry. My apologies."

We continue walking in silence. The Basilisk dens appear in our sights, and a distinct sensation of annoyance washes over me.

Ose is a stunningly gorgeous woman, even compared to the beauty of Belial, one of the most fawned-after succubi. I might rank Ose as the most physically attractive specimen the demons have to offer. A high compliment, given how I go out of my way to avoid women every day. No matter how pretty they seem, I despise their vapid thoughts, their constant need to maintain appearances, and all the other traits their gender shares.

Despite her ravishing good looks, I feel nothing toward this snake leading my people. She isn't my type. Perhaps it's her hair or the way she carries herself. Bah, who am I kidding? It's her personality. She walks around like a queen and looks down on others beneath her — an admirable trait in a male, but repulsive in the opposite sex. Women belong at the feet of men, licking their boots, among other things.

My ideal mate is a woman who flatters me at every opportunity, perhaps someone who treats me as though I were the highest authority to walk the twelve planes of the physical universe. Sadly, few women have such a personality.

Ose, naturally, acts worse than many other beautiful demonesses. She sees me as little more than a tool — a disposable item to be used and tossed aside. I'm nobody's fool. If she wants me to play a role, so be it. When the time comes, my allegiance will never be to any woman, for I am-

"Beelzebub? Are you alright? You haven't said anything for several minutes."

Ose's voice interrupts my thoughts. I stop myself from sighing. "Yes, I'm fine. Silence is the breeding ground for brilliance. Surely, one as accomplished as you knows that much."

A nod. "Of course. I was merely making conversation."

Silence follows. Ose's high heels click against the ground as the dirt surfaces of the Labyrinth give way to a texture more akin to stone. Glowing rocks appear in the ceiling above, lighting the way.

We're entering the Basilisk caves.

Ose speaks again. "I've heard that you, erm, spend a lot of time with Artorias. Has Barbatos shown any signs of resurfacing?"

At least she's making small talk about things other than makeup and emotions.

"Barbatos is as silent as Diablo. Uriel hasn't spoken to Artorias, either. He's in sole control of his body. Even Uriel's holy energy seems to have receded over the last few years."

"That's wonderful. I've been busy developing the structure for Operation Stormbringer. Artorias will be an essential part of my ultimate plan to defeat humanity. Would you mind telling me a bit about his current state? I haven't had time to speak with him at length."

The Basilisk cave's glowing gems continue to brighten as we walk. Soon, I can see into the distance as easily as if it were daylight outside. The ceiling crystals, reliant on the ambient magical power of the nearest monsters and demons, glow most brightly when nearby denizens cluster together in tightly-knit groups.

The hallway expands outward, and soon we enter a series of large interconnected rooms, each with puddles of water splashed across the floor. A glance to the left and the right reveals massive creatures swimming under the glowing blue lakes, each aquatic monster big enough to swallow ten demons of my stature whole. However, the long, snake-like creatures, while aggressive and territorial, know better than to attack a Duke or Emperor. A hapless orc or grunt on the other hand...

Well, some demons are too stupid to stay away from dangerous areas. It's better they die quickly.

I tilt my head in Ose's direction. "Operation Stormbringer. Will you finish the plans for it soon?"

"Within the month. Mephisto is still locating bodies to revive, but our first attack waves should easily overwhelm the human's defenses."

I pause my walking to stare at the noble creatures swimming in one of the nearby lakes. The crystal-clear water allows me to gaze at their blackened bodies in all their majesty. One of the Basilisks spins around underwater and stops to evaluate me. After a moment, it turns away, seemingly thinking to itself, perhaps these two are not a meal worth dying over.

"Easily? You sound confident. Need I remind you of the Wordsmith? He obliterated a star with a single word. Whatever defenses he conjures will be beyond the scope of your science and experiments."

"Possibly. However, I've been keeping an eye on him for a while. Do you know what my magical repertoire includes?"

"No."

"I can project my body astrally. Using this technique, I have surveyed the humans for the past six years."

"That might be useful, I suppose. What did you discover?"

Ose stares at the side of my head for a moment. I feel her eyes burning a hole in my ear, so I tear my gaze away from the Basilisks.

"Beelzebub, can I trust you?"

Her question catches me off-guard. "What? No. I'm the least trustworthy demon you'll ever meet. I'll stab you in the back the first chance I get."

"Perfect. We're quite alike, in that regard."

A question forms in my mind. I wonder whether Ose or Rosalia is the more aggravating woman?

"I just told you I wasn't trustworthy. Whatever you want to tell me, you should know I'll use it against you at the first possible-" My throat suddenly catches, and I stifle a cough — fire flares from my nostrils. "Kah!! Kah, kah!"

It takes me a moment to regain my breath. "-the first possible opportunity."

Ose cocks her head. "Are you alright?"

"Couldn't be better."

"Ever since you ignited yourself, I've heard you had issues with your abilities. Are they going to present a recurring problem, or-"

"I said I'm fine." I snap at her, putting a tinge of venom in my voice. "Don't question my capabilities. Didn't I wipe out an entire squad of those pesky armored humans a few months ago?"

Ose lowers her eyes. "I only want to be certain your condition is stable. If you say it is, I won't pester you."

"Damn right, you won't." I continue walking forward, and it takes Ose a second to start walking after me. I decide to change the subject. "Tell me more about Vepar's attack. You wanted to capture the Wordsmith. Why did the ambush fail?"

"Vepar claimed it was because the Sphinx showed up. The troublesome lizard-lion-eagle monster put up quite a fight and forced her to retreat."

I snort fire. "Hmpf. Kar, right? I fought him when I first became a Baron. I would have defeated him if Belial hadn't jumped in from out of nowhere. How could he best a seasoned Baron like Vepar?"

Ose raises an eyebrow. "I don't remember hearing about Belial's intervention."

"Must have slipped my mind."

"Mmm. Well, Vepar didn't face him alone, but also a squad of armored troops. I only managed to create one Nanite Destabilizer, and its charges were limited. She drained it on the Wordsmith to bypass his air filters."

The exit to the Basilisk den draws near as we continue walking forward.

I rub my chin. "For such an essential operation, why send a Baron? You should have gone yourself."

Ose's voice lowers. "In hindsight, you are correct. However, Vepar has never failed me before. Doing so now taught me an important lesson."

"And that would be?"

"I need demons I can trust. At the least, I need ones who perform."

A smirk crosses my face. "I already told you I wasn't trustworthy."

The Third Emperor closes her eyes and flips her hair gracefully. "Of course, and I appreciate your honesty. What I need to know is whether you'll fulfill the latter requirement."

"I always win. That's why I'm the first demon to become Duke since the conclusion of the Energy Wars."

"Didn't you lose to the Sphinx and the Wordsmith?"

"Tactical retreats."

"Of course. Haha!" Ose chuckles. I force a smile as well, though her gentle ribbing touches on something of a sore spot for me.

"A few mild defeats from when I first ascended. I'm not the demon I once was. I've crushed the humans several times now. They know to avoid Dukes because of my efforts."

Ose nods cordially and touches her heart. "Oh, of course. Don't mind my teasing. Here's my offer, Beelzebub... I want you to take the front position during Operation Stormbringer."

We slow to a stop just inside the narrowing corridors of the Labyrinth as the Basilisk Den fades behind us. I turn to face the Emperor, and the glint in her eye doesn't escape my notice.

"What about Bael? He's the highest-ranked Duke."

A smile spreads across Ose's face. She leans toward me and presses her finger against my suit. A harmless tingle of electricity passes through to my heart, making my right arm twitch. "Bael lacks... finesse. He can take the rear. I believe Stormbringer should be your moment to shine."

Usually, I protest when someone touches me, but I bite my tongue this time. "And Mephisto?"

"Auxiliary forces. I need a shock troop to level the frontline defenses of the humans. Who better than the regenerating immortal Duke of Inferno? Whatever attacks the humans hit you with, you'll shrug them off. I'll give you a qualified contingent of our best troops as well."

Slowly, I narrow my eyes. "While prestigious, this mission sounds dangerous as well. I could die."

Ose pulls her finger off my suit and slowly sticks it in her mouth, licking it suggestively. The innuendo doesn't evade me. "Aww. Are you afraid?"

"Don't mock me. I only want to know what you'll compensate me with."

She blinks bashfully. "I can be creative with your reward."

"What kind of demon do you take me for?"

Ose's playful expression melts away. "Oh. Well, if you don't swing my way, I'm sure Bael might know an incubi or two who-"

"You're mocking me again."

Ose's smile reappears, brighter than before. "Haha! It's rare for a man to make me laugh. I'll tell you what, Beelzebub. If you reduce humanity's defenses to ashes, and bring me the Wordsmith, alive, I'll give you anything you desire."

Ose slowly rubs her thigh and blushes. I ignore the gesture.

"Make me an Emperor."

Her smile weakens. "Well, that might not be possible. There are protocols we have to follow, after all, such as the Rule of Three. However..."

Ose's eyes fade away for a moment. She gazes not at me, but through me, as if a thought has suddenly occurred to her.

"...However, if there were only two Emperors still alive, then ascending you to the final plane might be possible."

I smile. "Ah, you must mean... Belial."

"That's right. She's in your way, as well as mine. Kill Belial or bring her to me battered and broken, along with the Wordsmith. Do that for me... and anything will be possible."

I raise my chin. "That's an awful lot of responsibility, even if the reward is great. Why do you need the Hero?"

Ose's expression sours. "I created the colonies across the galaxy. Jason undermined a hundred thousand years of psychological conditioning and humiliated me when he liberated all of our feeding worlds. Worse, he did it in only a few short months. I can't simply let him die a quiet death."

The Third Emperor's voice deepens. She clenches a fist at her side. "I'm going to turn Jason into my slave. He will Wordsmith for me and watch as I use his power to enslave all of humanity once more... and after I finish, I will torture him for another hundred thousand years. I may eventually allow him to die, but only once I grow bored of making him dance."

It takes a moment for me to respond. My perception of Ose changes sharply, within a fraction of a second.

I didn't realize she had such a sadistic side.

"This isn't business. It's personal. Correct?"

"Possibly." Ose's voice catches. "I... I experienced the worst of humanity's cruelty during my formative years. I have no compassion for a single one of them."

I nod at her, and a feeling of awe overcomes me. For the first time, Ose has shown me, perhaps unintentionally, a side of her others rarely see.

Maybe she isn't the simple airheaded female I first imagined.

"Ahem. Belial, Jason, and the rest of humanity. I will crush them. For you. For me."

Ose breathes out a whisper. "For us."

"Yes."

We gaze into each other's eyes, a more thorough understanding of each other passing through the air between us.

After a few moments, Ose breaks eye contact. "Ah. Sorry. I shouldn't open myself up like that. It's not becoming of an Emperor."

"Correct, but I appreciate your honesty."

I turn and continue walking down the hall. This time, Ose immediately falls into step beside me. I smile at how we walk in unison. My right and left leg move at the same pace and speed as hers.

"You said before that we were more alike than you previously thought. Perhaps there is truth in that statement."

Ose blushes. "Who can know?"

Several minutes pass as we walk in silence. Ose raises her head when a junction appears, splitting in three directions.

"Ah. I need to visit Faith's End. I'll be going my separate way, now."

I raise an eyebrow. "The prisons? Why?"

"The final piece of Operation Stormbringer. I promised you elite shock troops, and I won't disappoint. My brother has been... experimenting on a new type of minion."

My lip curls up. "Ah. Gressil. I always forget about your relation to him."

If my disgust bothers Ose, she doesn't show it. "I wish I could forget, too. However, you know the saying. Blood runs thicker than water."

My nose twitches. "Do you mind if I... if I ask you a personal question? About Gressil."

Ose swallows audibly. "Sure... but don't expect an answer."

It takes me a second to formulate the question in my head. The sensation of bile in my gut threatens to erupt from my mouth at the thought of speaking the words.

"Is... is it true what they say? About... the souls in his body? The human souls. And the demon ones, too..."

Several moments pass. Ose stares at me stonily. "That depends on what specific rumors you've heard." She shivers. "Well. Whatever tales you've heard, they were probably accurate. Gressil's abilities are... they're... unnatural. Grotesque."

"And what about your mother?"

This time, Ose's entire face contorts. She looks away to hide her expression. "I'm leaving. Good day, Beelzebub."

The Third Emperor clutches her stomach. She hesitates for only a moment before disappearing. She vanishes from existence so quickly that I don't even see her body move. Her fabled lightspeed dash. I may have heard of it, but seeing it in person is another thing entirely.

My tongue snakes out to wet my lips — memories of Gressil's mutilated body dance in my mind. Bael gave me the unfortunate duty of speaking to that demon- no, that monster last year.

I still remember the terror that flowed through my veins, as well as the powerlessness in my body when he grabbed me. Had he snapped my neck, I doubt I would have regenerated.

A shudder runs down my spine. I quickly spin on my heel and head toward yesterday's attack point.

Push the memories away, Beelzebub. Don't think about... that... that thing. The devils know Ose is more courageous than me to head into his lair alone.

Part 088: Cast Aside

Recommended Listening - Rosalia's Theme

Demons and monsters walk past me, clumped together in twos and threes. Some of them gaze at me with looks of disgust, but most ignore me. I sit in silence and kick my feet back and forth, humming a song to pass the time. "Hmm-hm-hmm, hm-hm hm-hm..."

Five minutes pass. Then ten. Soon, an hour crawls by, and a yawn escapes my lips. Boredom threatens to swallow me whole and put me to sleep, but I hold on. I always do if it means I get to see Mister Beelzebub when he returns. The Annex isn't the liveliest place to sit around and wait, but at least I get to people-watch. It's fun!

Ugh. Jeez. I can't believe Mister Beelzebub made me stay behind while he went off with that floozy, Ose. I saw the way she looked at him. Luckily, he's a smart demon who won't fall for her tricks. Beelzebub loves me more than he'll admit. That's one of the things that makes him better than my previous lovers.

Footsteps draw near. I glance to my right and spot a massive pair of tree-trunk sized legs. My eyes follow them up their owner's body until I eventually meet Mister Bael's gaze.

"Heya, cutie. Whatcha doin' sittin' here all by your lonesome?" The Duke of Pain smiles widely and plops down on the demonstone bench beside me. His bulk rattles my teeth, making me smile.

"I'm waiting for Mister Beelzebub to return!"

"Yeah? How long've you been here?"

"Oh... I don't know... maybe an hour?"

Bael turns away to stare at a pair of succubi walking past. His tongue lolls out, and he wets his lips. A moment later, he turns back to me. "That's some real dedication you've got. Beelzebub's a lucky guy. I don't know what you see in him, though."

I cross my arms. "Hmm, I doubt you came here to talk about Beelzebub. You two don't get along."

"Huh? Sure we do! He's a good kid. Proved himself a few months ago. Really surprised me." Bael trails off and puffs out his lips. "Pfaah... I'm bored. Bored, bored, bored. Ain't no fun sittin' around, doin' nothing. Why don't you and I go back to my place, eh?"

I blush and look away. "Sorry, Mister Bael. I'm only interested in Mister Beelzebub."

The big lovable brute grumbles under his breath. "Hmph, whatever. You'll come around eventually. No woman can stay with a guy like him for long. He probably isn't even interested in bitches. I bet he likes sausage."

"No, Mister Beelzebub prefers deviled eggs if he eats anything at all. He usually skips meals."

Bael chuckles. "Hehe. Your mind is innocent, as always. No dirty thoughts boppin' around in there."

"I beg your pardon?"

"Nothin'."

Several seconds pass. I continue to kick my feet back and forth aimlessly. I finally break the silence. "Mister Bael... am I ugly?"

"Don't be stupid. Of course not."

"You always hit on me, but everyone else looks away. I don't know if it's all in my head or not."

Mister Bael sighs. "Haah. Look, cutie, I ain't the best lookin' dude around, right? I'm fat. Always sweating. But women can't resist me. Know why?"

"Why?"

He taps the size of his head. "It's cuz I'm smart."

I try not to stare at him suspiciously. There must be another reason.

When I don't immediately reply, Mister Bael continues. "I figgered it out a long time ago. Bitches love a guy with balls. I'm strong, high-ranking compared to other demons, and command respect. Women can't resist me, despite my looks not being up to snuff."

I nod slowly. "So... are you saying I need to get stronger?"

"Nope. What works for a guy ain't gonna work for a broad. Look at Ose. Sexy and strong, but men avoid her like the plague. Then again, Belial is the same, but she's got guys lining up to beat down the door."

"Isn't Belial a succubus?"

"Mhm. She gamed the system."

"What system?"

Mister Bael scratches his chin. "Uhh... you know... the system..."

"I don't follow."

He hems and haws. "The... uhhhhh..... system..."

"Didn't you say you were smart?"

Bael glares at me. "Hey! Shuddup! I have a condition!"

"I'm kidding, haha!"

He nudges me playfully and starts smiling again. "Whatever. Look, the point is, you shouldn't copy others. You gotta figger it out on your own. Somewhere out there, there's a Duke who'd be perfect for you. Someone who'd treat you right, and-"

"Are you talking about yourself?"

The Duke crosses his arms. "M-maybe."

"Mister Bael..."

I look away from him and blush. Mister Bael is very kind, despite his brutish looks. He's an animal when it comes to fighting, but he has a soft side as well.

Bael grunts under his breath. "Oy. Look who's back. Just when we were gettin' to the good stuff."

His sudden shift in voice tone catches me by surprise. I follow his gaze toward one of the portals, where Mister Beelzebub steps out and adjusts his tie.

"Ah! Mister Beelzebub is back! Yay!" Excitement rushes through my body. I'm so glad to see him again!

Mister Bael rolls his eyes. "Yup. There he is."

I quickly jump up and rub my hands together. "Mister Beelzebub! Yoo-hoo! Over here!"

A look of irritation passes over Mister Beelzebub's face, most likely because he hasn't had me around to care for him for over an hour. No doubt, he daydreamed about me the whole time he was gone!

Beelzebub slowly drags himself over to us. Normally he'd eagerly jump into my waiting arms, but since Bael is here, he's acting coy. That's so like him to think about how he'll make me look.

"Ugh. Rosalia. Bael. The last two people I wanted to see."

I cock my head to the right. "Huh? Mister Bael is only one person though."

"He's big enough to be two."

Ah, so Mister Beelzebub was delivering a fat joke. That's so like him to try and make me laugh!

Bael stands up beside me. "I can't believe you made your servant sit here and wait for an hour."

Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. "I told Rosalia to leave. Don't pin her idiocy on me."

It's adorable how bad his memory is! I clearly remember him telling me to wait for his return with bated breath!

"Now that you're back, Mister Beelzebub, you must be starved! Let's go back to the manor so I can cook you some deviled eggs!"

Mister Beelzebub crinkles his nose. "How many times must I tell you? I detest eggs."

"Oh, don't be silly! You clean your plate every time I make them!"

"Yes. I scorch them to ash and blow the remains out the window."

"You do?"

"Of course! Devils, I've said it ten times now!"

I break out into a giggle. "Haha, that's a wonderful way to sanitize dishes! You're so smart!"

Beelzebub grits his teeth. "Hnn!! Damn you, woman! How do you manage to twist every word-"

Beelzebub stops mid-sentence. He pulls back and exhales fire, coughing once or twice in the process. "Kah! Kah! Never mind that. I learned something exciting during my chat with the Third Emperor."

My eyes widen. "You did? Is it about our wedding-"

"No! Seven hells, no!" Beelzebub slams his eyes shut. "It's about your status as my servant."

A feeling of trepidation enters the back of my mind.

"Are... are you proposing to me?"

"I just said I wasn't. Close your mouth and open your ears, damn it. Ose told me that there is no such thing as a permanent servant." Mister Beelzebub opens his eyes and glares at Bael. "You lied to me. You said Rosalia was bound to me for life!"

Bael whistles innocently. "Oh, did I? Must've slipped my mind."

"I knew it. You always screw with me. Rosalia has been my biggest source of aggravation, and it's all your fault."

I cock my head to the left. "Why are you aggravated? Is it because we aren't intimate enough? My bed is always warm for you, Mister Beelzebub."

Beelzebub's face reddens, likely at the thought of all the shameful things he and I would do if only he could bring himself to think of me in such an indecent manner. His mind is as pure as an angel's.

"Rosalia. This has been a long, long time coming." Mister Beelzebub's expression turns serious.

My heart skips a beat.

"H-here? In front of all these onlookers?! I... I don't know if I'm ready for our relationship to-"

"Rosalia. You're fired."

Mister Beelzebub cuts me off before I can finish.

Several seconds pass. Bael's jaw drops. "Beelzebub! You smarmy little cunt! You can't do that!"

Several hundred thoughts run through my head.

Fired.

Fired.

What does that word mean? He's the Duke of Inferno. He loves fire. Does that mean... toward me... he feels the most heated passion a man can endure? Does his love for me blaze hotter than the stars above?

A tear drips down my face.

"Mister Beelzebub..."

He smiles sweetly, as he stares at me with tender eyes. "Finally. Now you understand."

"I didn't know you loved me that much."

His smile slips. "...What? I don't love you, imbecile. I'm firing you."

Uwaaah!! He said it again! Mister Beelzebub keeps doubling down on his passion!! My entire body warms a thousand degrees as I feel his passionate gaze stripping my clothes away bit by bit. He wants my everything- my all!

Beelzebub chokes. "Kah. Oh, devils. You're misunderstanding me. You're too dense. I can't believe this. What do you THINK I said?!"

I raise a finger to his lips, and he jerks away. "You don't need to say anymore, Mister Beelzebub. Your love burns hotter than the center of the galaxy. Everyone knows it's true, but it took you all this time to finally admit it.

Bael tilts his head in my direction. "Uh... what? I'm confused."

"You are?! I have to live with her! It's torture! Hell!" Beelzebub grits his teeth and grabs my shoulders, staring directly into my soul. The sensation of our minds intertwines, and the heat from his gaze threatens to send me into a lovestruck coma, whereupon he will awaken me with a kiss! Uwaahhh!

Beelzebub screams at the top of his lungs, "Listen here, you sodding fat cow! We're done! I'm letting you go! I never want to speak to you again! You are no longer my servant! I'll never marry you! I hate you! I hate everything about you!! You disgust-"

WHAM.

Mister Bael's hand moves so quickly that I barely catch a glimpse of it. Mister Beelzebub flies away from me and spins head over heels, smashes through the fortified demonstone wall, and blasts out into the world beyond.

Mister Bael balls his hand up into a fist. "That... that does it! You worthless excuse for a Duke! I'll tear you to pieces!"

Beelzebub's words ring in my ear. I grab Mister Bael's arm. "Wait! What did he mean? Why did you hit Mister Beelzebub?"

Bael whips his head toward me. "Huh? You heard what he said! Beelzebub spelled it out, plain as day! He's sendin' you away so he can have a different servant! Doesn't that piss you off?!"

A hollow pit forms in my stomach. "No... no, Mister Bael, you're wrong. Mister Beelzebub would... he would never do that to me! He loves me too much! You heard his confession!"

Bael stares at me for a moment, then looks away. "Dammit, cutie. You can't keep lyin' to yourself. Beelzebub is a worthless piece of trash, at least when it comes to his taste in women. He doesn't love you. He wants you gone."

I'm confused. I don't understand. Beelzebub loves me! He always said so, all the time! He couldn't bring himself to defile my purity, that's why we never consumated our love. Why would that change now, out of nowhere?! It doesn't make any sense!!

My breath slows to a stop.

No. That's wrong. Today, Mister Beelzebub went off with that snow-haired devil, Ose. She did something to him! She must have corrupted his mind. Yes, that's it! And the reason he's acting so cold out of nowhere... it's all her fault!

Beelzebub stumbles through the hole in the side of the building. His left arm hangs limply, while several broken bones stab through the front of his jacket, allowing blood to pour through.

"Oh my gosh! Mister Beelzebub! Are you alright?"

I run over to him and reach for his good arm to help him along, but Beelzebub growls like a feral animal and swats at me. "Get back! You accursed wretch! I've had it with you! You and Bael both... ugly, disgusting animals!"

Several demons and monsters nearby stand and watch. Most of them take a few steps back, frightened by his outrage.

I know how to calm Beelzebub down when he's angry. "Please, you don't need to yell, Mister Beelzebub. I can sing you a song to help you feel better. You'd like that, wouldn't- ahh!" Beelzebub swings his free hand toward me and sends a ball of fire flying at my face!

Something appears out of nowhere and blocks it. Bael's hand! "Now you attack her? Stuck-up little Duke. I thought you'd matured. You're still an imp at heart."

Mister Beelzebub attacked me? No... he wouldn't do something like that. He'd never hurt me. W-would he?

Bael pushes me back. "Cutie, you should leave. I'm gonna beat some sense into this shitstain."

"No... don't hurt Mister Beelzebub. He's just confused. It's Ose's fault! She messed with his head! She-"

"I'm afraid not," Bael says, interrupting me. "Beelzebub's always been like this. Leave. You shouldn't be with a guy like him."

Beelzebub leans past Bael's body. "Yeah! Leave! You heard him!!"

Tears stream down my face. This time, a familiar sensation accompanies them.

Pain. Anguish.

Mister Beelzebub doesn't love me. It's true. Oh, my devils... it's true. I don't understand. What did I do wrong? What did... I... do wrong...?

Slowly, I take a few steps back. A portal opens nearby, and a demon steps into the Annex from the Labyrinth. I quickly dash toward it before it closes. One of the guards spots me. "Hey! No cutting in line, you ugly-"

His words cut off as I leap through, and the portal seals behind me.

The tears continue to rage, but I fight off the urge to bawl like a baby. I can't weep. Mister Beelzebub always says it's ugly when a woman does that. I'm not ugly... I'm... I'm beautiful!

"Hey! Who're you?" A squeaky voice at my feet makes me jump in fright. I glance down to see two imps standing together in the darkened hallway. "We were supposed to send a chump through, not get an orc back!"

I don't know where I am. Quickly, I sniffle and wipe away my tears, then look around. The Labyrinth stretches off into the distance. Torches line the walls, some burnt-out while others sputter enough to give off faint light, but fear enters the back of my mind. This place creeps me out.

"W-where am I?"

The first imp rolls his eyes. "Faith's End. Duh. The sensation of foreboding and terror didn't clue you in?"

The second imp slaps the first. "Ylvusk, knock it off. No reason t' piss off one of the Agents."

I stare at the second imp. "I... I'm sorry, Agents?"

Ylvusk holds up a hand. "No, no, don't ask. If you let Tvoorik run his mouth, he'll never shut up. He always blabs about his dumb conspiracies."

I nod slowly and wipe away the last few tears, only for memories of Beelzebub to make them come rushing back. I flop to the ground and stare ahead dejectedly, crying even more. "Uwahh... it hurts..."

Tvoorik grumbles. "Cripes. Those damn Agents are improving. Now they're using emotional manipulation to lower our defenses." The sound of flesh hitting flesh echoes off the wall. I don't see what happens, because I'm rubbing my eyes, but Tvoorik yelps. "Ow! What'd ya do that for, jackass?"

"You're the jackass! Stop being rude to the orc-lady." Ylvusk growls at his friend. "She's in distress, moron."

Tvoorik goes silent for a few moments, I glance toward them, and he stares at me quizzically. "Hmm. I think she's a demon, not an orc."

"Huh? No way! Look at her face."

"Her skin is red. Have you ever seen a red orc?" Tvoorik goes quiet. "Come to think of it, that might be part of the Emperor's dastardly game. Genetic engineering."

"Jenuh-what? Stop making up words, dumbass."

"I'm not! It's a real thing!"

"Yeah, sure it is."

The two imps bicker with each other, and I watch silently. They talk about me almost as though I'm not sitting beside them. I've never seen anything like it in my life.

I interrupt them after a minute. "S-sorry, I didn't mean to intrude. I just got dumped by the guy I liked... and now I don't know what to do."

Tvoorik glares at me. "I see why. You've got a face only a broodmother would love. Yeesh."

Ylvusk slaps him. "Stop being an asshole!"

Tvoorik rubs his arm. "What? It's the truth! I'm surprised she could get a guy in the first place. It's like I said, man, the overcrowding is all part of the NLO's plot to destabilize us! The women get uglier; there are fewer succubus babes... soon everyone will look like-"

I shake my head. "You're not very nice."

"Of course not. I'm a straight-shooter. I tell the truth even if it imperils my life." Tvoorik glances around shiftily. "Besides, you never know who's listening in. Bloody Oracles, always looking for dissidents. At least if I go missing, it'll prove I was right all along."

"One less annoying mouse in the Labyrinth." Ylvusk leans against the wall and looks at me. "So your guy dumped you, huh? That sucks. Still, coming to the Labyrinth's prison was a mistake. Ain't no place for a lady."

"I didn't mean to come here. I was distraught and ran into the first portal I saw. I'll leave."

Slowly, I stand up and dust myself off. My black dress with its white frills along the edges seems drab and bland compared to how it looked yesterday. Did it change, or did I?

The only thing that changed was Mister Beelzebub. He used to love me until... until t-that floozy lied to him! She messed with his head! I hate Ose!! What does she have that I don't? Nothing! She's a stuck-up snotty bitch! She doesn't care about Mister Beelzebub at all!!

Ylvusk pokes my leg. "You're leaving?"

"Yeah! I don't know where to go, though. Mister Beelzebub won't let me come back to the mansion. It's all Ose's fault!"

"Ose?" Tvoorik pipes up. "The new Emperor?"

"Mhm. She took Mister Beelzebub away and whispered lies in his ear, and now he doesn't love me anymore."

A sudden chill washes down the corridor. Cold air blows across my skin, making me bristle.

Tvoorik and Ylvusk go silent. They turn around and look down the hall.

Ylvusk bites his lip. "Shit. It's the boss. And here we are, standing around twiddling our thumbs!"

Tvoorik looks uneasy. "We should go. Sorry, lady. Hope your boyfriend problems work out, but we gotta bail."

"Uh... uh huh?"

I stare at the demons quizzically. They dash away in the opposite direction of the icy draft. A moment later, the sound of heavy footsteps approaches.

Thud. One, two, three, thud. One, two, three, thud.

A faint red glow at the end of the hallway sends a shiver down my spine. I want to run, but I can't. My body freezes in place. A massive monster emerges from the darkness, its body an amalgamation of horrors. Glowing eyes spread across its arms, legs, and chest. Four arms with razor-sharp talons at the end scrape the walls. Two heads stare at me, one with a birdlike beak, and the other with three eyes. The one on the right lolls about aimlessly, while the one on the left gazes at me with a piercing stare capable of penetrating concrete.

The monster speaks. Its hard, rough voice scrapes my ears like sandpaper. "Did you speak Ose's name? Here... in my prison?"

My eyes widen. Oh, sweet and salty devils... he's the prison-warden; the demon whispered about only in rumors...

"G-Gress...il?"

The horrific abomination slowly stomps toward me. It doesn't take long before he's a mere twenty feet away. A single horn on each head reaches up and scrapes the walls and ceiling, creating a grinding noise that makes me grit my teeth. He positively dwarfs me with his size.

Gressil stops five feet from me. I have to strain my neck to look up at him, but my gaze tears back and forth from his empty gaze to the dozens of eyes twitching around on his body.

"Answer me, little demon. Did you speak my sister's name?"

I squeak out a reply. "Y-yes?"

The Demon Emperor is his sister? I had no idea. Oh, god... he's going to kill me for speaking out against her. I know it. I can't escape. Just one look at him and I know he could kill me effortlessly. Even Mister Beelzebub wouldn't stand a chance!

"What did you say about her? Tell me."

My voice shakes. "I-I said she w-was a very sweet, k-kind, c-caring person... Mister Gressil, sir... Eee!" I cower back as the demon leans toward me.

"You praised my sister?"

"Y-yes! I did! I'm a good girl!"

Gressil narrows his eyes. "I despise liars."

"Okay! I'm s-sorry! Don't hurt me! I shouldn't have lied! Hnn..." I close my eyes and turn away, hoping he'll at least finish me off quickly.

"Ose... my beloved little sister. My worst enemy. It appears you hold a grudge against her. Tell me why."

My body trembles. His worst enemy? What is he talking about? I don't understand!

After a few moments, I swallow bile. My heart threatens to shut down. "S-she told lies to Beelzebub. H-he's the demon I love, and she stole him from me. You're not going to k-kill me, are you?!"

"Far from it. Fascinating." The prison warden rumbles in his throat. "Hmm... I spoke to her not half an hour ago. Ose didn't mention Beelzebub at all. More secrets, as always."

"MORE SECRETS. HAHAHA!" The second head suddenly screams out loud, making me jump out of my skin. "No secrets! Hate them! Hate order!"

I raise my eyes to the three-eyed head. Thin strands of hair roll off it, spilling across Gressil's body. They're caked in dirt, and even with five feet separating us, Gressil's stench washes over me. I fight the urge to gag with all my strength.

"Guh... what do you want from me, Mister Gressil, sir? I didn't mean to come here! I didn't-"

"Quiet." Gressil glares at me, and my mouth slams shut. "I'm thinking."

We stand in silence, the sounds of his labored breathing filling the time.

After a minute, Gressil raises his upper right arm. I flinch, expecting him to attack me, but he merely scratches his head. "You work for Beelzebub?"

"No... he 'fired' me a little while ago. Th-that's why I'm here, now."

"If I let you go... where will you return?"

A spark of hope ignites in my heart. He wants to let me go?! Oh gosh, that's great news! I can't believe it! Am I saved?!

"I-I don't know. Mister Beelzebub threw me out. I think m-maybe the Catacombs?"

An unpleasant gurgle erupts from Gressil's throat. "Hu-hu-hu... I don't think so. You work for me now. Understand?"

A shadow falls across my body. The massive demon takes a menacing step toward me. "Your life was forfeit when you entered my domain. All who arrive uninvited leave only with my permission."

I nod rapidly. "Y-yes sir! Yes sir! I understand!"

Gressil turns his first head toward the second, three-eyed one. "Wake up. It's present time."

"PRESENT TIME! HAHAHAHA!! I LOVE PRESENT TIME!!" The second head screams maniacally, and before I can react, it lunges a hand at my face. A single eyeball embedded in the palm is all I see in the split second before it grabs and slams me against the wall.

Dizziness overtakes me. My body increases in weight, as a thousand anvils begin to compress my chest.

I can't speak. I can't scream. I can't even breathe!

A bloodshot eye appears in the darkness. The freakish specter shakes and trembles as it approaches me.

"Is it friend? Is it foe? Is it mine from head to toe?"

I try to shake my head, but nothing happens. I can't move. All I can do is watch as the eye slowly closes in on my immobile body.

"Do what Gressil says, you will. Make no sound, not even a squeak, then be still."

Something drills into my ear. The piercing agony makes me want to cry, as a creature burrows deeply. I feel it wriggle around and slide through my brain, down my throat, and stop somewhere near my stomach. Terror fills my mind, but I can't fight back.

"A gift we give, be glad you live. For us, you toil, conflict, you embroil."

The eye pulls away. A moment later, the sensation of weight flees my body. Gressil's hand leaves my face, and I flop forward, slamming onto my knees in the process.

It takes a moment for me to move. Everything hurts in a way I've never felt before. It feels as though fire-ants are crawling in my blood.

"You have a little potential, demoness, and now you work for me. Go to the Core."

I cough, causing green fluid to leak from my mouth. "Unnf... wh-what? The... the Core? Where humans live?"

"That's right. They accept weak, pathetic demons like yourself. Go there. Await my orders. In time, you will carry out my will."

Something wriggles around inside me, rubbing my chest bone and sending an electric shock up my spine. I squeeze out a few tears and pull myself up. "Nnn... yes... I'll do it. Just don't hurt me anymore, please..."

Suddenly, Gressil grabs me by my hair and lifts me. His eyes glow brighter than before, and he snarls at me. "I do what I please with my slaves, little wench. Get out of my sight."

A moment later, Gressil flings me through the air. I plummet to the floor and land on my arm. A bone-snapping crack erupts in the darkness. "Aaaiiee!!"

Gressil turns and walks away. A soft gurgle escapes his lips, as he laughs to himself.

"Hu-hu-hu..."

The darkness swallows him whole.

A minute later, I end up shaking and shivering, all by my lonesome.

I pull my beaten body up, sniffling as fresh tears drip down my face.

Ose... it's all her fault. I had everything until she took it from me. Now I'm the slave of an evil monster, and I'm too weak to do anything about it.

A voice whispers in my mind.

That isn't true... you can change. You have the power, now. You don't need anyone else.

I grab my broken arm and wince as I hold it steady. Who's that? Who's speaking?

The voice chuckles.

I'm you... but stronger.

Part 089: Tarus III

Solomon paces back and forth in front of his magical blackboard, a projection I created to assist him in visualizing his teaching concepts. Daisy and I sit on our bed and watch with rapt attention as he taps it. "I want to hear your explanation this time, Jason. Who are the two types of magic users?"

Solomon doesn't allow me to use the Crown's knowledge during our lessons. As he explains it, there may come a time where I need to cast a spell, but I won't have his artifact available. I need to prepare for those edge cases.

"The two types of magic users are Specialists and General Practitioners. Specialists have a core set of abilities, while General Practitioners can pull from a diverse set of powers."

The king nods. He stabs a finger at Daisy. "Young lady, what type of magi is your father?"

Daisy scrunches up her face. "Umm. A jenn-uhh-rull prac-tuh thingy?"

"Right. You'll get the pronunciation down someday. So, Jason, what are the advantages and disadvantages of each style?"

I recite his lessons from memory. "General practitioners, such as me, can use a wide variety of spells and powers, but our abilities aren't as focused as a specialist's would be, and we have to find alternatives to nullify the downsides. Specialists only have a few powers, but they tend to be hyper-focused and thus extremely potent."

"That's the definition, yes. Give me a few examples to illustrate."

Several moments pass as I struggle to come up with an answer. "Uhh, it's like when I tried to use super-speed. The first time I did it, I nearly killed myself."

Solomon turns to draw on the blackboard with his finger. The magical device follows his movements, and within seconds he draws up an image of a stick figure splattering against a wall. "Spot-on. If you want to enhance your speed, you have to realize that your mind won't keep up. A speedster specialist will dramatically outclass you, despite your best efforts. However, mental processing is only one factor involved in accelerating your body's movements."

"Only one? What are the others?"

Solomon clears his throat. "There are many. For example, if you accelerate your body to the speed of sound, the g-forces have a chance to liquefy your innards, especially when you stop. Further, when you travel at such speeds, every particle of dust floating in the air will hit you with the force of an anvil. Those are only a few of the downsides you would need to negate."

Sweat glistens on my neck. "I'm lucky to be alive."

"That you are." Solomon frowns. I follow his gaze to Daisy as she stares out of our ship's window at the approaching moon. "Are you listening, young lady?"

Daisy jerks her head back, a look of guilt on her face. "A-are we there yet? I wanna see the moon houses..."

Solomon chuckles. "Ah, the impatience of youth. We're almost there. It's only a half-hour from Tarus II to the moon."

Sighing, I cross my arms. "We could get there a lot faster if we weren't limited to 98% the speed of light."

"I already told you, Jason..." Solomon says, a note of warning in his voice. "Traveling at such speeds creates a subspace echo. The last thing we want is to draw unwanted attention."

"From the Volgrim?"

"From the Volgrim."

"Mmm."

I flop back on the bed and stare at the ceiling. Solomon taps his board again.

"Let's return to the concept of super-speed. If you speak the word 'Speed' and nothing else, you will probably die the moment you twitch a muscle. You should increase your mental processing power, and then you need to reinforce your body to withstand the g-forces of moving at hypersonic speeds."

"Sounds simple enough."

"It isn't." Solomon snaps, a hint of annoyance in his voice. "Increasing your mental acuity will drain your stamina. Imagine taking the hardest test of your life and how exhausting that would feel. You would suffer that level of mental fatigue in a matter of seconds. If you don't improve your mental fortitude and body's stamina as well, you'll faint before you can unleash hell on your enemies."

Daisy groans. "Uncle Sally, I'm confused..."

Solomon sighs. He leans against the blackboard and rubs his forehead. "This is all a bit much. Let's try some practical applications before we arrive at the colony. Jason, try making yourself invincible."

I blink in surprise. "Invincible? I can do that?"

"I don't know. You might as well try."

My heart flip-flops as I remember all the times an ability like that would have saved my ass. "Invincible."

After speaking the word, a moment passes. Nothing happens.

Solomon clears his throat. "Try and stab your arm."

"What? Seriously?"

"Most would not describe me as a comedian."

I nod. "Okay. Knife."

A metal blade materializes in my hand. The moment it appears, I realize something is wrong. I can't feel it in my hand. At that moment, a feeling of disorientation takes me. I blink my eyes and swoon as dizziness hits me in waves.

"Oh, god... I don't feel so hot."

Solomon raises an eyebrow. "What's the matter?"

"It's... it's as if my sense of touch is gone. I feel like I've encased my body in bedrock."

Solomon gestures to the knife. "Try and cut yourself. Do it gently."

Nodding, I press the blade against my palm. It takes me a moment before I realize it's already touching, but still, I don't feel a thing. I push harder and harder, but nothing happens. After a moment, the tip of the knife begins to bend as I ram it against my skin.

"That's what I thought. Your body has hardened to the point where you can't hurt yourself. Others probably can't hurt you either. It seems there's a downside, though..."

"Yeah. I lost my sense of touch."

"Mhm." Solomon taps the side of his head. "Think about it. Being invincible means not feeling pain or suffering, so it's only reasonable you'd lose your sense of touch. Touch is part of your somatosensory system, so, without it, you lose your sense of proprioception and haptic feedback as well. You'll easily become dizzy and disoriented."

I reach up to rub my head, but nearly poke out my eye instead. My arm feels like it belongs to someone else and they're trying to attack me. This whole situation reminds me of my paralysis, back when Phoebe cared for me.

"Is there a way around its downsides?"

Solomon shrugs. "Perhaps, but perhaps not. You might be able to return your sense of touch via Wordsmithing, but the point of invincibility is that nothing can hurt you. Returning your touch will remove at least one aspect of the invincibility."

I nod. "Normalize." After a few moments, I shake the dizziness from my head. "Maybe augmenting my body is more trouble than it's worth."

"I would assume so," Solomon says. "However, there may be something your Wordsmithing can do that will have few if any downsides."

"Yeah? What's that?"

Solomon smiles. "Creating devices, of course. Thanks to my Crown, you can create complex technology well beyond anything an ordinary human could dream up, and you can form it in seconds. You might be able to enhance the Exosuits using Wordsmithing."

Above us, Centurion's voice blares from the ship's intercom. "PILOT ZERO ZERO THREE, WE WILL ARRIVE AT TARUS III, THE MOON DESIGNATED 'KELKIN,' IN T-MINUS ONE MINUTE AND COUNTING."

I reach over and pat Daisy's head. "We'll worry about that stuff later, Solomon. Daisy, are you ready to see the colony?"

Immediately, my daughter leaps to her feet and bounces on the bed. "Yes! Yes! Let's go, daddy! I'm bored!"

"Alright, alright. Calm down. Follow me to the cockpit. We'll take Esther in for a landing."

I take Daisy's hand in mine, and Solomon follows behind us as we head to the front of the ship. My daughter's eyes light up when she sees all the buttons blinking and the fancy display readouts. She's a sucker for technology. I bet she'd have liked playing video games in my era.

I sit down in the Captain's chair and plop her in the co-pilot's seat beside me. After buckling her seatbelt and mine, I turn my attention to the sphere looming before us. Unlike Luna, Earth's now-destroyed moon, Kelkin is colored white. The snowy hue is caused by the bombardment of solar radiation on its sandy surface every day. In some places, the sand has even turned to glass, giving the moon a shiny appearance up-close.

Daisy reaches for a button, and I hold my hand out. "What do you think you're doing, little lady?"

She smiles innocently. "Pushing the big red button."

"And what happens if I let you push it?"

She shrugs. "You give me candy?"

"Smart-aleck. If you push it, it'll eject you into space."

Her smile vanishes. "It... it will?"

"No. But it could. Don't touch anything without daddy's permission."

"Oh. Okay." She slumps back in her chair, crosses her arms, and pouts.

God, I'm glad she's past the terrible twos. Those were her worst years.

I reach over and flick a few switches. "Centurion, once we're within four light-seconds, slow us to 0.05."

"COMMAND ACCEPTED, PILOT ZERO-ZERO-THREE."

I watch silently as the moon draws ever closer. Ten seconds later, the ship decelerates, and Centurion slows us to a gentle 9,300 miles per second. Even at 5% the speed of light, the moon continues to rush toward us at a breakneck pace.

Numbers tick down on the terminal, and I input a few commands to slow us further and further. It doesn't take long until I spot dozens of sprawling structures on the surface of Tarus III. Steel domes and skyscrapers spread across the moon, along with biospheres for growing food and massive fusion generators as well. Large military-grade vehicles roam the surface in the distance, mining for ore while also tunneling downward for our underground bases.

Daisy moves past her pouting and leans forward. Her eyes sparkle with excitement. "Daddy! What's that?" She points at a towering spire with a large, glass dome on the top.

"That's the observation sphere. We use it for air traffic control, among other things. I'll take you there later."

"Ooh!! And what's that big car?"

"That's a lunar personnel transport."

"Huh?"

"It's a big bus."

"Wow!!"

She jumps out of her seat and presses her face against the glass to look around. I smile, thinking about my love of space when I was her age. I remember wanting to be an astronaut when I grew up, only for that dream to change into something more like a firefighter or a police officer.

Eventually, my dreams faded away. I don't know why. I attended a few semesters of college and felt my passion slowly leak from my soul. My life felt hollow and pointless, and before I knew it, I stopped caring.

Well, that was before I entered the cryopod. Things are different now. My troubled youth seems like a distant memory. I'm just glad I'll never relive those dark days.

Centurion pipes up. "TRANSMITTING LANDING REQUEST TO CONTROL TOWER THREE. REQUEST RECEIVED. INITIATING LANDING PROCEDURES."

All at once, the ship shudders in midair as its nose lifts. Esther slows to a crawl, and it takes more than a minute for us to lower to a landing pad below.

Not long after, I stroll out of the ship, with Daisy riding piggyback to get a better view around us. I duck through the doorway so that she doesn't hit her head, and Solomon follows behind.

The snow-colored surface stretches far into the distance, and as we descend the ramp, Daisy gets her first close-up look at the buildings nearby. Unlike the structures I built on Tarus II, the ones here have no windows, since the radiation from our star beats down more intensely than Sol's did on Earth's Moon. The walls and ceiling surrounding our launch platform, which attaches directly to my ship's exit bay, have a transparent force-field surrounding us so we can see the moon's surface.

Daisy leans against my head. "Daddy, where are all the people?"

A door opens up across from us, and one man quickly walks outside. I squeeze Daisy's leg gently. "There's a person."

I can almost hear her eyes roll. "Yeah, okay, but I mean all the others..."

The man adjusts his tie as he strolls up to me. "Pleasure to see you again, Mister Hiro."

"Same, Peter. By the way, this is my daughter, Daisy."

The black-haired man grins at her. "So you're the King's daughter, eh? You're a cute little princess!"

Daisy turns her nose up. "Hmph. Princesses don't speak to commoners."

"She's joking," I say, interrupting Peter before he gets the wrong idea. "Say hello, Daisy. Don't be rude."

Her tone flattens. "Hi."

Ugh. Kids.

Peter wipes his forehead. "Right. Well, ah, shall we get to business?"

"Yeah, let's."

Peter beckons toward a row of computers inside the Command Center. "The experimental weapons continue to show promise, and our engineers recently completed the Atlas Cannon upgrades. It's online and ready for a defensive strike if the need arises."

Daisy pulls my ear. "Daddy, what's an Att-luss cannon?"

"It's a big satellite that spins around our planet. If demons ever attack, we can protect ourselves with it."

"Are the demons going to hurt us?"

"Not if I can help it."

Peter chuckles. "Heh, the best offense is a good defense."

That's how the rumors go," I murmur. "What about the drone carriers?"

Peter scrunches his face together. "Err, they're still a work in progress. We've had a few setbacks."

"Alright. Solomon and I will have a look."

"Thanks. We appreciate any help you can offer. However, it's the synthetic-farms that are having the biggest issues. Drop by there later if you can."

"Consider it done."

"Thanks, Mister Hiro."

Our conversation concluded, I bounce Daisy on my shoulders as we head to one of the elevators. She continues to look around, pointing at one thing or another, asking what they are and what they do.

"What's that?"

"A computer."

"And that?"

"A robot."

"Oooh, but what's THAT?"

Before we enter the elevator, I stop and follow her gaze. A picture of a large glass dome sticks out from the plain onyx-colored walls in Central Command.

"That's one of the biospheres. If anything ever happens to Hero City, they're our saving grace."

"Ohh..." Daisy trails off. "I don't understand."

"We're going to one now. Wait and see."

I step into the elevator, and Solomon follows behind. I set Daisy down and rub my shoulder to ease its stiffness. My daughter is a lot heavier than she was last year.

As the elevator descends to the lowest floor, I smile. "Daisy, remember how I told you about Washington D.C. last week?"

She holds my hand and stares at the door silently for a few seconds. "Hmm. No...?"

"It's from my homeworld, Earth."

"Oh, oh, right! I remember!"

I've spent many nights telling Daisy stories about Earth and its past to put her to sleep. She especially likes stories about spies and detectives. Something about sneaking around and finding out secrets others wouldn't want her to know piques her curiosity.

"Well, Washington D.C. was the capital of America. Hero City is the capital of humanity's population. The lunar colony is for our protection. We need a backup in case anything bad happens."

Solomon pokes me, his ghostly touch creating a slight sensation of coldness on my arm. "Why are you telling her this?"

"Daisy's a smart kid. The point is that we have to prepare ourselves for anything. Solomon, do you remember what we learned yesterday?"

The ancient king raises an eyebrow. "Regarding...?"

"Hope. He was attacked by demons, along with several other soldiers. The circumstances seem suspicious to me."

Solomon crosses his arms. "How so?"

"You haven't pieced it together? The demons found a way to nullify the T-REX. What's more important is that their goal wasn't to kill a few humans, but to capture Hope. Doesn't that worry you?"

"It does. A Wordsmith in the hands of the demons would spell doom for humanity."

Solomon frowns. A short silence follows before he speaks again.

"Something has been on my mind for a while, Jason. You don't talk with Hope or Neil often, so I haven't had a way to confirm my suspicions."

Daisy watches us silently, ignorant about the meaning of our discussion.

"Yeah? Is something wrong?"

"It could be my imagination. I wonder, though, if the reason the demons haven't attacked in six years is due to more sinister motives."

The elevator dings open, and we step into a hallway, then turn to head toward the bio-dome in the distance.

"You think they're planning an invasion?"

Solomon rolls his eyes. "Of course they are. They're demons. However, what bothers me is that I believe Neil and Hope are lying to you."

This time it's me who raises an eyebrow. "That's a strange accusation to make, Solomon. What gives you that idea?"

"I am the Knowledge-Seeker. I possess advanced perception regarding human psychology. There are various 'tells' that people give off when they lie. I don't get to observe Hope often, but you and he were the same person at one point. He has the same tells as you."

My cheeks turn crimson. "Y-you know when I'm lying?"

"I can read your mind, you dullard. It's easy to pick up your tells when I know what's a lie and what isn't."

"You're the same creepy old man as ever."

"Oh, shut up."

We step into another UV-proof glass tunnel, allowing us to gaze at the moon's surface. Several people pass, but only a few recognize me and wave. The others seem absorbed in papers and documents they're holding.

Solomon clears his throat. "Jason, do you remember my awakening, six years ago?"

"Mhm."

"I revived due to the direct attack on your mental defenses. Something I've thought about recently is in regard to the one who attacked you, Ose."

"Ose? You mean the, uhh, the white-haired demoness?"

"That's right. Had you not been wearing my Crown, I believe she would have taken over your mind."

I slow to a stop and turn to stare at Solomon. "Hold on a second. Are you saying... since Hope doesn't have the Crown... she might be controlling him?!"

"No. I would notice something like that. However, didn't Belial mention that Ose was the new Emperor?"

"Uh-huh. I didn't put much thought into it. Do you know anything about her?"

Solomon crosses his arms. A dark gloom settles across his face. "No. I don't. I know Diablo's powers well, and Belial's, and Satan's... but this Ose is an enigma."

Solomon's eyes flick past me to the bleached planet outside. "I did, however, hear rumors, many eons ago, regarding Ose. She's nearly as old as the rest of the Council."

"You mean from before the Energy Wars."

"Correct. Ose keeps her abilities close to her chest. I remember that during the Energy Wars, she took control of Britannia single-handedly. Nobody knows how she did it, but she managed to oust the entire leadership and deceive the humans into signing a false peace treaty."

"Britannia?"

"After the Volgrim appeared, humanity dissolved their nations and united under one unified world order. Britannia was originally known as Great Britain and served as the capital of Earth's defense forces. Losing it dealt a crippling blow to humanity's morale. The Volgrim defeated us not long after."

I nod. "That sounds serious. You say Ose crushed them all by herself. How?"

"As I said, I don't know, Jason. All I know is that, at the time, she was only a Baron. You have to understand that until Ose's takeover, humanity had a decent chance of winning the war. The Demon Dukes and Emperors couldn't risk an open battle against the might of Britannia. We never anticipated a single Baron bypassing our defenses and striking at our exposed heart."

A chill goes down my spine. "Why didn't you tell me this before?"

"Until yesterday, I didn't put two and two together. I think Hope is lying to you, Jason, because I believe he's attacking the demons on his own. He's provoking them."

I scoff. "I was with you up to now. Hope wouldn't do something so dumb. The only thing Hope and Neil are doing is entering the Labyrinth to rescue human slaves. They keep casualties to a minimum."

"That's what they're saying, but use your head, Jason. You're a pragmatist. You may believe that as long as both sides have something to lose, we won't risk war, but does Hope share that opinion? Do the demons?"

I glance down at Daisy. She shrugs as if to say, don't ask me! I'm only a kid!

Turning back to Solomon, I grimace. "Alright, point taken. What should I do, then? I can't just walk into the Core and call him a liar."

Solomon's palms hang loosely at his side. "I don't know, Jason. You've done a poor job maintaining contact with Hope. Maybe you should eat some crow and apologize, then try and figure out what he's been up to. If he is attacking the demons, he may have a good reason."

"There's no excuse for murder."

"We're in a war," Solomon says, as he waggles his finger. "People die. You have to accept that."

"There's a difference between dying on a battlefield and attacking demons unprovoked. If Hope is doing the latter, there will be hell to pay."

We continue walking again, and the entrance to Biosphere 12 approaches.

Solomon shakes his head. "Even if he is lying, he might have the right idea. I don't agree with your propensity to sympathize with demons, Jason. They're evil. They're enemies of the Creator. If he's attacking them, then, in my opinion, the Angels would be ecstatic. A hundred generations of Heroes were born and raised to slaughter demons. It's you who is avoiding their code."

Under my breath, I grunt, "Yeah, well, the angels are dead. Fat bunch of good their hawkish nature did."

Solomon scowls at me. "I'd wash that heresy out of your mouth if I could. Maybe you ought to ask Gabriel and Raphael what happened if you think they're in the wrong."

"Perhaps I will."

"Good."

"Good."

I roll my eyes. Daisy has gone silent now, perhaps sensing the tension between Solomon and myself. She walks by my side and doesn't utter a word. I feel bad talking about adult things around her, but she lives in a cruel world. Better to get used to things early than for them to catch her unawares later.

Solomon, Daisy and I all enter Biosphere 12. Immediately, one-hundred-degree heat washes over us. Dozens of scientists outfitted in modified T-REX's pace throughout the area, poking at various plants growing in the center and around the edges of the massive glass dome. I Wordsmith quickly, "Cool," and the air around Daisy and I hisses as a barrier forms. The last thing I want is for my daughter to get heat-stroke while looking at plants.

Solomon gazes around the room. "I see they've made a few modifications since we last visited."

"It needs to be self-sustaining," I murmur. "You never know if the worst will happen."

Daisy sniffs a silver-colored plant next to the door. "I don't smell anything, daddy."

"This is a facility for creating edible plants as well as harvestable nanites. I'm afraid they don't have an odor, sweetheart."

One of the scientists walks over to me. Unlike the faceless T-REX's military troops use, his helmet has a glass faceplate, revealing his identity. I can barely make out his beard through the tinted barrier.

"Jason. Solomon. Glad to see you again."

Solomon grins exuberantly. "Why, hello there, Saul! How's my favorite nephew doing?"

The poor guy's shoulders sag. "...Great. I'm just great."

I try not to smile at his distress. "Show us what's new, Saul."

Part 090: Devour! Devour!

Saul rubs his arm as we stroll through the superheated biosphere. "Are you sure you don't need a T-REX, commander? What about the little one?"

"I Wordsmithed protection over us. No sweat."

Daisy gives him a thumbs up. "Daddy's magic is the best!" Her cute smile usually makes most people chuckle, but the miserable glint doesn't leave Saul's eyes.

Solomon wraps his ghostly arm around his nephew as though they were best friends. "My boy, tell us how the crops are yielding!"

"Yes, sir..." Saul flippantly gestures toward a multi-level shelf with a dozen flowers encased in glass. "Uhm, the third generation grows much faster than the previous two, and we've taught it how to shape itself into different forms. Leopold thought it would look more decorative if we had some flowers hanging around..."

Solomon nods enthusiastically. "Hm, hm, yes, I see. So, these are nanite flowers?"

"Yes."

Saul doesn't elaborate. He doesn't need to since we already know the details. Growing self-replicating nanites will quadruple humanity's output of exosuits since our existing replicators can't keep up with the demand.

I nudge Saul with my elbow. "How long does the growing process take?"

He shrugs. "Our current capacity is, uh, maybe five million nanites a day. That's enough for one T-REX at most."

"Can you scale production up to meet demand?"

"We're working on that. The problem is that nanites require organic matter to expedite their growth process. The more, the better, and we don't have enough."

"Oh..." I mutter, while tapping my lip. "I see the problem. I guess you can't go chop down a tree outside."

Saul taps his fingers in the air against invisible buttons only he can see. "If you want accelerated nanite growth, then I'll need a system built for regular deliveries from Tarus II. Plants we grow up here are only enough to sustain the lunar personnel."

Solomon rolls his eyes. "Yes, yes, but enough about the nanites! How are you, dearest nephew? Have you been eating well?" The king's ghostly arm seems to weigh like an anvil on his nephew's shoulders. Saul slumps visibly.

"I'm fine, uncle. Let's stick to important matters."

"Your health is at the top of my priority list!"

"Swell."

Solomon snaps his fingers. "Jason, procure that item for me."

It takes me a minute to remember what he's referring to. "Summon."

A small, ornate box materializes in my hand. I open it to reveal a necklace with gold, jewels, and a big, fat ruby hanging at the end.

Solomon grins eagerly. "A beautiful necklace suited perfectly to your tastes!"

Saul stares at it blankly through his tinted visor. "Ah... aren't necklaces meant for... for women?"

"Psh, nonsense. After six years, you continue to turn down gold and jewelry? Your tormentors must have shattered your mind beyond recognition."

Saul bows his head. "I've always been like this."

The king winks at me and makes a cutting motion across his neck. I shrug and put the jewels back in my infinite storage while Solomon guides his nephew away so the two of them can have a private chat.

Daisy and I stay behind. She turns toward the nanite flowers and pokes the glass container. The vibrations cause them to bend and twist. "Wow, daddy. These flowers are pretty."

I crinkle my nose, but she doesn't notice. "I suppose they look... neat."

To me, they look hideous. Silvery tendrils of metal bend and twist depending on how the sunlight strikes them. If one watches long enough, they might notice the flowers slowly increasing in size as time goes on. Excess nanites get pruned and sent through a tube above the box into a collection facility.

Hmph. The entire production of this biosphere only creates enough nanites to fill one exosuit's reserves. Worse, we don't merely have to develop new T-REX's, but also to repair damaged ones. When demons attack and damage the suits, a percentage of nanites break apart and fizzle into dust, leaving the wearer exposed. The last thing I want is for our troops to have weak points for the demons to strike.

The flower inside the glass bends and twists around. At one point, it mimics Daisy's figure and appears to grow two wings, making her squeal with delight and poke the glass even more. "Eee! Look, daddy, it made me an angel!"

I glance at Solomon and Saul as they chat about something privately a few dozen feet away. "That's right, sweetheart. You're my little angel."

Daisy pouts. "You're not even looking."

I turn back to stare at the flower. "Sure, I am. You're still my angel, though."

That seems to please her. Daisy returns to poking the glass now and then while I wait for Solomon and his nephew to stroll back. Saul sighs heavily. "Alright... give me the necklace."

"Haha, atta boy!" Solomon laughs. "I'll beat your memories back into you if I must!"

Saul holds his palm out. I summon the box back and place it in his hand. "Keep it secret. Keep it safe."

He responds with a quizzical stare. "What?"

"Nothing."

Solomon swaggers back to my side. "Don't lose it now, boy. That's a present from your favorite uncle!"

"And me..." I mutter. "I crafted it with Wordsmithing..."

"Pish, Jason. The craftsmanship was all my design. You were merely the tool I used to form it."

"I'm glad you keep me in such high regards," I snap back. Solomon gives me a thumbs-up in return.

Saul taps more invisible buttons in the air, and a compartment opens on his exosuit. He stuffs the necklace inside and exhales when his suit closes. "Let's return to the other matters. Commander, have you checked the experimental weapons division?"

"Not yet. I only got here a little while ago."

"Right... well, Hans mentioned a new 'nanite bomb' he was working on, as well as a portable healing nanite cocktail for downed soldiers. It could cut fatalities in half, or better."

"Hans is on the moon, too? Since when?"

"Three months ago. Haven't you been up here multiple times? You didn't hear?"

I shake my head. "No. I thought he still worked at the Rust Bucket."

"All our best scientists transferred here. You can't blame the man for following the trail of innovation."

"You're not wrong..." I sigh. "Haah... I prefer to know about major personnel changes. Why didn't anyone tell me?"

"You're a busy leader, Jason." Saul bows his head. "You work hard enough as it is, managing Hero City and the colony. Nobody wanted to bother you over something so trivial. Maybe it's time you made another clone to help out?"

I shake my head vigorously. "No. Absolutely not. My first clone worked out poorly enough. Hope won't even talk to me these days. The last thing I need is another one running around and causing trouble."

Solomon rests his arm on my shoulder. "Especially if my suspicions are correct."

"Yeah, well, I hope you're not."

"As am I."

Daisy reaches up to grab my hand. "Is something wrong, daddy?"

I smile. "Nah, It's probably nothing, sweetheart."

She grins widely. "Dope!"

My smile falters. "Uh... what did you say?"

"Hella dope!"

"Who taught you those words?"

Daisy's grin expands further. "You!"

Solomon rubs his face. "She continues to pick up your verbosity."

I groan under my breath.

In the end, words only have power when people give it to them. If I tell Daisy not to say them, she'll use them anyway, since that's what kids do. It's best I treat words as though they were unimportant.

Heh... words not having power... ironic, coming from a Wordsmith.

I pat Daisy's shoulder. "Alright, sweetheart. Ready to go check out the weapon facility with daddy?"

She shakes her head. "I wanna go home."

"Huh? Why?"

"I'm hungry."

"Oh."

Solomon chuckles. "Let's get her something to eat in the cafeteria. Kids quickly tire of adult talk."

"Aww, Solomon..." I smile sweetly at the king. "I thought you didn't care."

The king swivels his head away. "Hmph. I simply don't want to hear her whine."

"Suuure."

An hour later, Daisy pats her stomach, satisfied with the scrumptious meal served in the cafeteria. Even compared to Yamir's cooking, this place isn't bad at all. The French-style garlic bread tingles on my tongue long after I finish it off.

The three of us travel through an elevator deep into the heart of the moon. Down here, there are dozens of levels of protection in case any experiments go wrong. The top-secret facility, Black Star, is a place I keep as hush-hush as possible, so the demons don't learn its purpose. Solomon's Crown allows me to bypass many limits, but even I am not omnipotent. I have energy restrictions regarding what I can create. Until I find a way to skirt those constraints, making humanity produce what it needs is essential.

The floor number doesn't tick down. The elevator only goes from the first floor to the basement, but the wait time for us to descend into the bowels of the planet takes forever. Daisy hops on one foot to pass the time, and within a few minutes, she loses interest in that too.

"Daddy, how much longer?"

I shrug. "Visualize. Probably three more minutes."

"How long is three minutes?"

"Not long."

That satisfies her. She hops around some more, but not thirty seconds later, she squeezes my pant leg. "How much longer now?"

"Uh..."

Immediately, her annoyance level triples. "Come ooon! Te-puh-lort us!"

"You mean teleport?"

"Yeah!"

"You just want me to use my magic."

"Mhm!!"

I scratch my chin. "Mommy says I shouldn't. Teleporting might result in us getting stuck in a wall."

"Then unstuck us!"

"We'll, uh... die. Instantly."

"Die?"

I glance at Solomon. "How do I explain the concept of death to a little girl?"

A look of brilliance enters Solomon's eye. "Don't worry. I know what to say."

Immediately, I begin to worry.

The king kneels to Daisy's level. "Young one, have you ever slept so soundly that you couldn't wake up?"

Daisy shrugs. "I dunno."

"Well, death is a lot like eternal sleep. People die when they are killed. There's no pain or sadness involved, but you can't ever wake up and see your mother and father again."

Daisy's eyes widen. "I can't?"

"Nope. Death is bad, so you have to do what you can to avoid it."

Solomon rises to his feet. I feel relieved that his description didn't send waves of panic coursing through my daughter's heart. Even so, she wraps her arms around my leg and squeezes. "I don't wanna die!"

I pat Daisy's head. "Alright. Then let's wait patiently for this elevator."

The next two minutes pass quickly. Soon, the door slides open, and we travel down several winding hallways, past various chambers with several guns and such being tested. One includes the modified railgun, which now shoots rapid-fire. I stop with Daisy to watch through a foot of bulletproof glass as an automated system unloads shells at lightspeed that bore through the moon's surface a mile deep, obliterating a test dummy instantly.

Daisy's jaw drops. "Wow... that's hella dope..."

I'm glad she likes guns, I guess.

We continue onward until finally reaching the primary chamber of the facility. Dozens of glass windows reveal military tests with extensive soundproofing to allow observation. I spot Hans immediately, as he swears at a lower-ranked officer. "No, you bloody imbecile! Zees part goes in zere, and zat part goes over zere! Must I do all zee work around here?" He nudges a disassembled gun with his foot and grumbles even more."Who taught you to be an engineer?!"

The younger officer gives him a look of pain. "Ahh... you did, sir. I'm from the liberated colonies. I barely understand this stuff..."

"Well, learn faster! Zee last thing vee need is for our veapons to fail because you blocked zee barrels!"

The wiry German turns to storm away, only to spot my daughter and me standing behind him. He stops mid-stride and stumbles awkwardly. "O-oh! Mister Hiro! I was not expecting you!"

I smile awkwardly. "Yeah. Sorry to interrupt... Saul told me you had something new to report."

Hans sweeps his hands through his combover. His eyes stare at me like a deer in the headlights. Just as quickly as confusion passes over his face, he figures out my meaning. "Ah, yes, zee new bombs! Come, come, you will love zees!"

He beckons, and we follow. Daisy hides behind me as we walk. She doesn't like Hans, since he 'talks and looks funny.' I suppose she has a point, but I hope he isn't offended.

We follow Hans down the path until arriving at a rack filled with metallic black orbs, each with a red button on top. Hans grins hugely and plucks one off the shelf and holds it up like Rafiki with Simba. "Behold! Zee nanite bomb! A weapon of chaos, designed to terrorize zee enemy legions!"

I raise an eyebrow. "That sounds... lethal."

"Indeed, indeed. Zees bomb will chew through organic matter in seconds, evaporating hundreds of demons at once!"

I scratch my head. "That's good, I suppose. I thought I told you to prioritize non-lethal weapons where possible."

"Naturally. However, zees weapon has several modes! Look over here at zee test chamber."

Hans points to my right, inside yet another glass-walled facility. I follow his finger and watch as he pulls out a pad from a bag at his side and taps several buttons. A moment later, the floor opens inside the chamber, and two dummies appear. One has a T-REX wrapped around it, while the other does not.

Hans presses a few more buttons, and a man enters the room from a door in the rear while holding one of the nanite bombs. He activates the orb, which causes it to glow, throws it at the dummies, then quickly exits before the bomb detonates.

A cloud of black 'gas' explodes from the bomb. It moves and twists unnaturally, forming into a giant hand. The hand jerks toward the dummy without a T-REX, and lunges at it, wrapping around like a snake coiling its prey. The nanite swarm hisses and chews at the dummy like a swarm of enraged fire-ants. Within seconds, the false skin erodes and melts away, fizzling into dust on the ground. The swarm intensifies, growing denser after eating the dummy, and begins to circle the room, looking for an escape.

Something about the ferocity of the nanites forms a pit in my stomach. "H-hey, is it done?"

Hans nods eagerly. "Oh, yes! Yes! Did you see? It devoured zee enemy combatant in seconds, leaving nothing behind, not even bone! Think of how many demons vee could kill with zees weapon!"

"Yeah. I am thinking about it. That's the problem."

The swarm lunges around, here and there, before finally slowing to a halt and reforming itself into an orb-like shape. It solidifies once again, and the room entrance opens. I notice uneasily that the orb is now around twenty percent bigger than it was before.

Solomon leans on Hans's shoulder. "Impressive. Humans tried developing something like this during the Energy Wars, but the energy costs were too high."

Hans nods. "Indeed! Developing nanite strands takes gigawatts of energy! Zee most efficient way to grow them is by feeding them organic matter, but even zat takes time. Zee wonderful thing about zees bombs is their versatility! What you saw just now was zee kill mode, but zey also have a mode that only devours spiritual energy, leaving demons unconscious. Vee can capture and interrogate prisoners using zee secondary mode."

Slight relief warms my blood again. "Ah, so the nanites do have non-lethal options. That's good... I guess... but Hans, these nanites seem extremely dangerous. I've read enough sci-fi to know you don't simply unleash self-replicating nanobots against biological worlds. I'm sorry, but I think you should discontinue these. The other weapons are more than good enough."

I turn to look at Hans. His face turns ashen. "W-what? Of course, they're dangerous! Dangerous to our enemies! Have no fear, Jason, for zee nanites ignore humans and anyone wearing an exosuit modulator!"

"I'm not talking about danger to humans, Hans. I'm talking about... about..." Flippantly, I wave my hand at the pile of dust inside the test chamber. "The demons! I couldn't stomach killing anyone in such a horrible way. Besides, if we use biological weaponry against the demons, that might make them even crueler! We need to be better than our enemies. The last thing I want is to stoop to their level."

Solomon sighs. "It's war, Jason. They're demons. You need to get past this idea of singing Kumbaya and-"

Cutting Solomon off, I hold my hand up. "No. I won't. It's not about getting along and treating demons like they're our best friends. It's about de-escalating our conflict and perhaps someday finding a middle ground. Violence begets violence; you know that. If we escalate with weapons like these nanite bombs, that will be the perfect excuse for them to annihilate us. We haven't a chance of standing up against the demons if they get serious."

Silence follows. Solomon averts his gaze from mine. Hans lowers his eyes to stare at the nanite bomb in his hand sullenly. "...If that is how zee commander feels..."

"It is."

The disappointment on Hans's face is immeasurable. He sighs and puts the bomb back on the rack. "Alright. Well, if you could do me a favor and tell zee commander, zat would be wonderful. I don't leave zee station much, so I won't be able to let him know. He won't be happy to hear your verdict."

Stunned, I gawk at Hans. "Neil told you to make these?"

"Indeed. You did not know?"

"No! When did he tell you to make these?"

Hans scratches his scraggly chin-hair. "Hmm... a few months ago? Saul's work on nanite shape-forming was a big boost to mein productivity."

A strange feeling of treachery rings at the back of my mind. I told Hope and Neil about the weapons facility around that time, and then Hans came up here afterward? The timing is too convenient.

"Did, uh, did Neil ask you to work here?"

Hans nods. "Yes, it was mein privilege! You know me! I enjoy tinkering and creating new things."

"I suppose you do. Well, you're our best weapons expert. Just, uh... in the future... let me know what projects you're working on."

Hans strokes his chin. "Ees there a problem? Did I do something wrong?"

"No. You're fine. I have to speak to Neil, though."

"Mmm. Neil, Saul, and I are all good friends. Jason, surely you must know his heart is in zee right place. Zee commander only wants what is best for humanity. You understand, right?"

"Yes, but I also know that what's best for humanity could be interpreted and twisted into a selfish desire for conquest and revenge. An eye for an eye makes the world blind."

Solomon rolls his eyes. "You repeat that axiom all the time, but in my experience, killing your enemies before they kill you leads to a longer life."

"Didn't you live during a time of harmony without war?"

Solomon shakes his head. "Where demons exist, there can be no peace."

"If you say so." I sigh and pat Daisy's head. "Alright Hans, before I go, I'd like to see your other invention. Saul mentioned something about a portable healing solution for our troops?"

The fire reignites in Hans' eyes. "Oh, yes! By injecting nanites into zee bloodstream of downed soldiers, we can repair their bodies within moments, then retrieve them before they die! Come, come, I will show you!"

I nod. "Alright. That invention sounds better than bombs."

Ten minutes later, Daisy, Solomon, and I all step into the elevator and head back to the surface. Nobody says anything for over a minute until Daisy tugs at my pant leg. "Hey... daddy?"

I kneel to her level and notice a look of concern on her face. "Yeah? What's up, sweetheart?"

Daisy wrings her hands together for a moment. "Um... the smoke ate the person, right?"

"Yup. Did it scare you?"

"A little... does it hurt to be eaten?"

I chuckle wryly. "Yeah, I suppose it does. Demons eat people, after all. That's why they're our enemies."

"Oh..." Daisy scrunches up her face. "S-so... if the demons eat people, they die? And that's bad, right?"

"Mhm. Very bad."

"Will demons eat mommy?"

The color drains from my face. "What? No! Of course not. I'd never let that happen."

"Will they eat me?"

"Ahaha... no. If demons ever go near you or mommy, they'll regret it. Daddy's really strong, you know."

Solomon speaks up beside me. "Oh? What will you do if the demons attack your family, Jason? I thought you were a pacifist."

I grab Daisy, lift her onto my shoulders, and smile. "I am. But if demons make the wrong move, I don't know what I'm capable of."

Solomon smiles back. "Interesting."

"What?"

He looks away, and his smile fades. "I thought the same thing once. Jason... I mentioned a terrible mistake in my past. It involved demons and my idealistic fantasies. Much like you, I thought I could reason with them. I was wrong."

Solomon goes silent for a moment before bowing his head and closing his eyes. "You're on a path to despair, my friend. I don't advise their destruction due to an unquenchable bloodlust, but because of the same pragmatism you and I share. Once you make a mistake like mine... there is no turning back. It's best to learn from the errors of your ancestors, rather than to repeat them yourself."

Darkness clouds my vision. Daisy leans against the back of my head and rests her chin on my scalp. The weight of my daughter hangs on my shoulders heavier than ever before.

"Maybe you're right, but you might also be wrong. You've given me an idea, though."

Solomon raises his head. "And what's that?"

"I should stop trying to guess the demon's motivations. I'll seek out the leader of the demons and test the waters. Perhaps this 'Ose' woman will listen to my request for a peace treaty."

"Pft." Solomon scoffs. "That's the dumbest thing you've ever said. Why would she agree to such a thing? The demons outnumber us a thousand, possibly even a hundred-thousand to one. A treaty is to our benefit and their detriment."

I smile. "Because, Solomon... we have weapons beyond their imagination. If they choose to attack us, we will fight back. Both sides will lose countless lives. In the worst-case scenario, I can always retreat to the Core with my Wordsmithing if she tries to backstab me."

Solomon holds up his hand. "I have to stop you there, Jason. Listen. You see other humans in a different light compared to how demons see their brethren. You think of your fellow humans as equal to yourself, brimming with potential. Demons respect power and nothing else. Perhaps you should talk to the angels in your rings if you want to know what happens when you... when you... make a deal with the devil."

Solomon goes silent again, as do I. The two of us stare into each other's eyes, as he flashes images in my mind. Brief, kaleidoscopic still frames of his life appear and disappear.

Half his family murdered.

Jerusalem scorched.

His explosive rage as he launched a campaign against those who betrayed him.

The rebuilding of his city, a thousand times mightier than before.

Solomon's final admonition to his sons on his deathbed.

Never trust a demon.

Solomon's eyes harden. "If you play with fire, it will burn you. Ask the Archangels what happened. You won't like the answer."

Slowly, I rub the rings on my right hand with my left.

"Fine. You've made your point. I'll ask Raphael."

"All I want, Jason, is for you to learn the difference between wisdom and knowledge."

"I will."

Part 091: The Creation Mythos

Author note: I have decided to rewrite Parts 91 to 97. I didn't like the way they were progressing or the perspectives I was using. For more context, please refer to this post.

If anyone wants, they may read the original parts 91-97. I won't be deleting or overwriting them. You guys can be the judge whether my choice to rewrite is an improvement or not.

Parts: 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97.

It shouldn't take me long to rewrite them. I spent 22 days writing them the first time, and most of that time was spent figuring out how to frame them, rather than what would happen during the parts. I think these new versions will be significantly more interesting and that I can post them much quicker.

Please stay tuned!

I ease Daisy onto my ship's bed, tucking her in so she can take a nap. She drowsily mumbles something in her sleep about guns and demons, which I do my best to ignore. After tucking her in, I glance at Solomon. "Thirty minutes until we return to Tarus II."

The king nods. "Mhm. Plenty of time to chat with the Archangels."

"Oh, you weren't joking?"

He shakes his head. "I am not known for my sense of humor."

"You say that a lot."

"Anything worth saying is worth repeating."

"Make that up yourself?"

Solomon leans against the wall. "Stop stalling. For six years, every time I've pushed you to talk to the Archangels, you deflect and avoid me. I don't understand your resistance."

"It's not like that. I'm always busy. I don't have time to talk to long-dead remnants of the past. I already spend too much of my day blabbing at you."

Solomon lightly pounds his fist against his heart. "That hurts. Right here."

"I thought you weren't one for jokes."

Solomon points to a spot on the bed near Daisy's feet. "Shut up, sit down, and focus your mind. You've kept the Archangels waiting long enough."

I roll my eyes and plunk down beside her, then raise an eyebrow. "Hold on; it sounds almost like you've been talking to them."

"Yes, I have. The crown and rings connect through your body's spiritual pathways. Occasionally, we sit together inside your Mind Realm and have a chat. You'd know this if you hadn't chosen to block out the Archangels."

"Well, excuuuse me, kingy. I've had too many damn voices in my head over the last few years. Hoarhiim, Blaarjiim, Ose, the Archangels, you… Christ, my brain is a spook factory."

Solomon chuckles. "Heh, I can understand why that would annoy you. I know you're lying to yourself about your fear of the Archangels, but once you clear the air, everything will make sense."

"Huh? My fear? Why would I be afraid of them?"

Solomon shrugs. "You tell me."

The king speaks in riddles.

I assume a yoga position and fold my hands together. "Alright, whatever. Let's do this."

* * *

A minute passes.

I stare at Solomon blankly. "Hey, it's been a while since I chatted with the Archangels… how do I open up the line?"

Solomon holds his palm over my face. "Close your eyes. I'll guide you through the process."

"You're the boss."

Somewhere between an instant and an eternity passes. When I open my eyes, I find myself sitting on a patch of dirt in front of a roaring bonfire.

To the right side stands Michael, the Archangel of Courage, dressed in knightly splendor, with a sword at his side, heavy boots on his feet, and golden armor adorning his chest. His arms crossed, he stares at me with an intensity that rivals the blazing inferno before him.

To the left stands Gabriel, a fifteen-foot tall Goliath donning white robes and sandals, though he's far smaller compared to when I initially met him. No longer is he Godzilla-sized, but he could still kill me with a single punch. Gabriel's arms hang loosely at his sides, relaxed, as though he has no reason to worry.

Straight across the fire stands Raphael, an old man dressed lavishly in red and gold robes with moccasin shoes, who holds a gnarled staff clutched firmly with his left hand. He leans on it heavily, as though he were bearing the weight of the world on his shoulders.

Finally, Solomon stands beside me. He rests his hand on my shoulder, and it takes me a minute to realize that his touch feels like he's flesh and blood. This place might be an imaginary space, but when I'm inside it, the events here feel as real as those outside.

Michael is the first to speak.

"Six years, Hero. Not once have ye spoken a word to us in all that time."

I scratch the back of my head sheepishly. "Oh, err, yeah. Sorry, guys. Sirs. Your majesties…?"

Raphael waves his hand flippantly. "Bah. Such titles are little more than formalities. Call us whatever thou dost please."

I nod. "Okay. Well, ah... I guess I should tell you all something I've wanted to say since I first found out. Do you know an angel named Uriel?"

Gabriel tilts his head low. "She is our beloved sister, one who died brutally at the hands of a demon. What makes thee wish to bring her up?"

I glance at Raphael and notice the old man tensing up, preparing for the worst news.

"She's... alive."

The eyes of every Archangel expand. Michael's jaw loosens. "Is Uriel safe?"

"I'm afraid not. I don't know the exact details. I learned that a demon named Barbatos imprisoned her inside of his body. I think he's using her energy to increase his power."

A moment passes. Michael's proud attitude weakens. He sags to his knees and wipes his forehead. "I can't believe it. All this time, my beautiful sister has been a prisoner of the demons. How can Barbatos withstand her holy energy? 'Tis poison to a demon's body."

Raphael gazes at his younger brother, an unnerved expression on his face. "Demons already are abominations possessing unnatural powers. Perhaps the reason we lost the war is that they found a way around their weakness to holy energy."

Gabriel shakes his head. "Impossible. Even during our final battle, Zeus and I obliterated millions of demons. There must be a reason they captured our sister. Jason! If the demons control my sister, then she represents another possible ally for thy resistance. If thy military can liberate her from her tormentors-"

I hold my hand up. "I'm sorry, but I have to stop you there. I wanted you all to know of her existence, but I didn't come here to volunteer for a rescue mission. I came to seek your counsel."

Michael relaxes slightly, but in his eyes, I spot a hint of irritation. Now that I've mentioned his sister, he's anxious. Can I blame him? If something happened to Phoebe and someone knew her whereabouts, I might tear their head off if they didn't want to help me.

It's not his fault for becoming emotional, but I have my reasons for moving on.

"Raphael, Gabriel, Michael. I told Solomon an idea I had to speak to the leader of the demons, Ose, and propose a peace treaty. He believes it is a bad idea. I want your opinions."

Immediately, Gabriel averts his eyes. The massive Archangel stares into the distance. "So that is why thou dids't come. Well, if thou dost wish to bargain with the demons, learning their history of backstabbing and betrayal should be thy top priority."

"Yes. I was hoping you could give me the full story. I don't know anything about your people's past, nor the demons'."

Michael steps toward me. He stops only a foot or two away, towering over my seated form on the ground. "Hero, before we speak a word to thee, I wish to know why ye chose to ignore us for six years — no more excuses. I healed thy body and gave thee enough strength to combat thy enemies, yet never did ye think to offer a word of thanks. Our energy is not infinite. It took a great deal of my remaining life-force to assist thee."

I stare up at the white-haired angel silently for a few moments, then look away.

"I'm sorry. I just... I found it hard to talk to you. Every time I thought about doing so, the guilt would hit me, and I would quickly seek out a distraction. I didn't do it out of malice."

Michael's voice softens. "Guilt? What is thy meaning? Explain."

Before I can answer, Raphael hobbles a few steps toward me and taps his staff on the ground. "Mm, I understand. The lad blames himself for our deaths."

Michael scoffs. "Tch, what madness. He has nothing to do with our passing. That is our fault, and ours alone."

Gabriel rumbles from across the fire. "Is it? Perhaps not. The Hero has reason to doubt himself. Had he lived during the Energy Wars, perhaps humanity would have won. Perhaps we would have defeated the demons and the Volgrim. We may have survived those dark days."

I nod. "The more I think about it, the more I'm convinced. It's my fault the Volgrim won. I should have been there to help my people and yours. With the power of Wordsmithing, it isn't unreasonable to believe the war was winnable. Anything is possible with a limitless power like mine. But I wasn't, and so you died."

The Archangels fall silent for a few moments. Michael walks over to my left and takes a knee. "Perhaps 'tis thy fault, Jason, but there's no sense dwelling on the past. We do enough of that ourselves. The only reason one should look to the past is to learn from it so that they may avoid the same mistakes in the future. Dost thee find my words agreeable?"

I barely manage a smile. "I guess."

Solomon squeezes my right shoulder. "Come now, where's your warrior spirit? It won't do to sulk and wallow in self-doubt. Better to forge a new destiny where humans win than to tell yourself failure is inevitable."

Slowly, I uncurl my legs and pull myself to my feet. Michael rises beside me, and for once, gives me a warm smile.

"I apologize for doubting thy conviction, Jason. I did not realize thy chest throbbed in grief. Now that thou hath moved on, allow us to fill thy thoughts with a vision of our past. I promise, thou shalt find it enlightening."

I raise an eyebrow. "What part of your history will I see?"

"All of it," Gabriel mutters. "Our successes, our failures, everything. At the least, someone must exist who knows the legacy of our people. Should we perish, our legacy must rest within thy soul."

I scratch the back of my head. "Uhh... I mean, my spaceship is going to land in about thirty minutes. I don't know if I have time for a play-by-play. Can't you give me the highlights?"

Michael shakes his head. "Nay. 'Tis not enough to know the events. The reasons and motivations for all the key players matter just as much. Thou must know the unfathomable depths of demonic treachery, and how far they will go to wrench the knife in thy heart."

I swallow and take a step toward the fire. The embers crackle and pop, despite nobody fueling it with more wood.

"Tell me, then. Tell me everything."

Michael rests his hand on my shoulder and closes his eyes. The world shifts around us, and the Archangels disappear.

"Long ago, the angels were the sole living beings in the universe. The Creator formed us from the ash of dead stars and gave us one order: Live."

An empty void surrounds me. I appear in space, and ten million stars rapidly appear, one by one. After a moment, I realize they aren't stars at all, but angels. Countless winged beings float around me idly; confusion etched into their faces.

Gabriel speaks. "We had no purpose. We had no identity. We had only a goal; to follow the Creator's orders. However, we could not act on his orders. We didn't know what we didn't know. And so... we merely existed."

Raphael appears before me. "One second became a year, then a thousand years, then a million. Eventually, we tired of our boredom and sought to give meaning and purpose to our lives. We began by creating other life, though our youngest sister, Uzziel, was the only Archangel whose powers gave her the ability to do so."

"She failed many times," Michael says, a hint of bitterness in his voice. "And once Uzziel finally succeeded, the result was tragic."

"Dragons were the first entities she formed. They were nearly the last." Gabriel whispers, and all the angels but one vanish before me. Behind the speck of a winged demi-human floating in space, a colossal monster appears. Its wings dwarf the stars around it, and its head those of the planets. Compared to the dragon, the angel is smaller than a grain of sand.

Gabriel continues. "Jörmungandr. The Mother of all dragons. She began her life as an egg hatched in the darkness of the void, and eventually grew unstoppable as she devoured stars whole. Through her, we learned the meaning of both life and death."

"The Creator's sole order, once a source of turmoil and uncertainty, became a primal instinct. We could not stand idly and watch as the dragon slew us one by one." Michael sweeps his hand across my eyes, and the lone angel vanishes, replaced by the millions from before. "So we fought. We bled. We suffered. We formed new creations, one after the other, desperate for an edge against the tyranny of The Dragon. Still, she continued to slaughter us."

The angels from the vision begin unleashing a bombardment of magical power against the dragon, but it merely grins evilly as the Holy Energy ripples against its body. Jörmungandr inhales, then unleashes a wave of darkness, wiping out thousands of angels at once. They scream wordlessly as their bodies fizzle into ash, returning to the dark energy of the cosmos.

Raphael appears before me, staring calmly into my eyes. "Eventually, we succeeded again. Uzziel created a new form of life, one we came to call the Titan. Monstrous beings, born of rage, with abilities similar to ours. However, the Titans had one special quality, which was their resistance to The Dragon's energy. They turned the tide of battle."

"For a while," Michael says, correcting his senior. "But Jörmungandr surprised us. The Dragon learned our secret of creating life and unleashed a new horror upon us."

For the first time since the angels have started, I feel the urge to speak. "She created... the demons?"

Raphael lowers his gaze. "Nay, Jason. They came later. Much later."

Something about his words instills a sense of dread in me. Why are the Archangels starting with dragons? I wanted to know about the demons! The dragons must be significant somehow to their story.

Michael's voice cracks. "Jörmungandr gained a power none of us possessed. She gained the ability to form life within herself; to give birth. Where before we faced one dragon, everything changed when a second appeared, and a third... and a fourth."

"The dragons swelled their ranks to tens of thousands." Gabriel's form expands, dwarfing the other Archangels as he triples and sextuples in size. Soon, his size nearly matches that of The Dragon. "We adapted to their trickery. This might surprise thee, Jason, but angels cannot procreate. When an angel dies, we lose a brother or a sister forever. Many of our siblings fell before we understood this fact. And when we realized what Jörmungandr had taken from us, we grew enraged."

Michael's grin gains a sinister edge. "The dragons made one costly error, Hero. Every time a new dragon appeared, the energy of all its brethren split amongst one another. They sacrificed their fighting capabilities for raw numbers, while we did the opposite."

"The nine Archangels combined our powers and formed three supreme beings; the Seraphim, Cherubim, and Ophanim."

Michael, Raphael, and Gabriel all stand in a circle and press their palms together. A moment later, a light brighter than the Big Bang erupts between them, blinding me and sending waves of pain coursing through my eyes. When I finally recover, a three-headed angel with six wings and arms stands before me; each palm closed together in a fist.

The supreme being, far mightier than an Archangel, speaks with three voices at once. "I, the Seraphim, unleashed the might of all angelkind. The Dragon was unprepared. For the first time since her creation, Jörmungandr felt fear wash through her body. Finally, she understood what it meant to lose those she loved. While I fought The Dragon, the Cherubim and Ophanim slaughtered her children. The Titans pooled their might together, and we struck a blow against our first creation. The dragons scattered like ash in the breeze, and we won the war."

I stare in awe as The Seraphim lashes out with two swords, two staves, and two spears, slicing open dragons left and right. The beasts bellow in agony as they breathe pitifully weak flames against the winged destroyer. The Seraphim opens all three of its mouths to blast Holy Energy upon Jörmungandr, though the attacks are a thousand times more powerful than before.

After the dragons flee, Raphael, Gabriel, and Michael demorph from their Seraphim form and reappear before me.

I swallow audibly, still feeling a little awed by their power. "So you defeated the dragons. Why do I get the feeling that isn't the end of the story?"

Raphael bows his head. "We suffered heavy losses. The battle was far from one-sided. Every dragon we killed returned its power to the rest. Even after slaying Jörmungandr, her children soon grew to her former power. Following our war with the dragons, the Titans revolted as well. Due to their betrayal, two of the Archangels, Muriel and Cassiel, passed away. That story is more mundane, in many ways. It was little more than a war of attrition."

Gabriel lays one hand on each of his brother's shoulders. "We eventually made peace with the Titans and sought out a home for ourselves. Sadly, Michael and I know little of those days, as part of the peace agreement included wiping our memories of the past."

I blink in confusion. "Hold on, what? You erased your memories? Then how do you know everything you've told me?"

Michael gestures to Raphael. "Our brother, the eldest Archangel, agreed to hold the memories of our past. Everything we know is due to his stories."

I scratch my forehead. "Okay... but Raphael, why erase your brother's memories if you were going to tell them about the past anyway?"

Raphael's gaze narrows. "I had a reason, Jason. We all did. Please, understand that the agreement was made due to everyone, including the Titans, perceiving me as the fairest and least biased of our people. 'Twas not made idly or out of malice."

I nod slowly. "You're not going to tell me the reason, are you?"

"Nay. 'Tis not information any mortal should know." Raphael's eyes darken. "Sometimes, I wish I did not remember our past, nor the bloody acts we performed. 'Tis a stain upon the memory of my people."

Several moments pass.

Raphael clears his throat again. "Ahem. Michael, let us return to the Hero's question from earlier. He wishes to know the origin of the demons."

Michael sighs. Now that the talk of battle has passed, he seems to have lost interest in what comes next. I never used to picture him as a military commander, but something about how his eyes light up when he describes spilled blood makes me think he isn't the same Michael as the one described in the Bible.

"The first thing we did was seek out a world to colonize. Having solidified our alliance with the Titans, we decided to create lesser forms of life, rather than equals. No longer would we create beings such as dragons and titans, but those who could not harm us. We only wished to live in peace."

I stare at Michael as he speaks. Despite his words, I feel he's lying. He doesn't seem the sort of person to enjoy tranquility and a carefree existence. He craves conflict.

"If you don't mind my asking, why bother creating life at all? What did you stand to gain? I certainly appreciate your efforts, since I was eventually born, but I don't see the logic after all the losses you suffered."

Raphael nods. "Jason, angels are not immortal. Given how much time had passed, and the toll two wars took on our bodies, we found ourselves near death. We created life, not to satisfy our idle curiosity, but to sustain our very existence."

Gabriel clears his throat. "Imagine for a moment, young Hero, that all beings have a container inside of themselves to store their spiritual energy. Thine is like a small, metal can. It cannot hold much, but it is relatively stable. When thou dost sleep at night, thy mana refills, allowing thee to unleash thy magic at full power the next day. However, an angel's container is more like a cracked glass jar. Our energy leaks from our bodies slowly as time passes. We created subservient beings to give us mana so that we could restore ours."

I cock my head. "Do you mean humans?"

"Yes," Michael says. "However, humans were not Uzziel's first creation. The demons were."

My jaw drops. "You created the demons?!"

"Uzziel did," Michael replies. "Their story is one which may surprise thee."

"I'm already surprised," I say. "Tell me the full story. I want to hear everything."

"As thou wish."

Part 092: The Archangel of Creation

Solomon appears before me. His expression turns somber as he gestures toward the top of my head. "My Crown is an incredible tool. You've barely tapped into its latent potential. To expedite teaching you about the angels and demons, I'm going to activate a direct mental link."

"Okay," I reply. "What does that mean? Don't I already have that link? I mean, it's sitting on top of my head. That's pretty direct."

The ancient king frowns. "Not quite. My artifact holds a vast array of knowledge, much of which I took from demons, angels, and humans during my prime. I can also pull from the memories of the Archangels here, allowing you to visualize the past as if you were living it yourself."

Before I can reply, Raphael interrupts, a note of alarm in his voice. "Solomon! How dost thee intend to use our memories?"

Solomon pauses. "Ah, sorry, I won't touch yours, Raphael. Michael and Gabriel's recollections will be quite sufficient."

A drop of sweat drips down Raphael's forehead. He quickly dabs at it. "Ah, of course. Good. Good. Carry on."

Once again, a strange suspicion roils in my stomach. Raphael is unusually secretive about the past, specifically regarding what happened before his people wiped their memories. What terrible events must have unfolded for him to be so cautious?

Guardedly returning my attention to Solomon, I nod. "Alright. How will your little vision system work?"

Solomon waves his hand. In the air before him, a holographic display appears with images of hundreds of white-skinned, red-skinned, and dark-skinned beings of many shapes and sizes.

"Anyone who has worn my Crown in life, or anyone I touched while I was still alive, donated their knowledge to me wittingly or unwittingly. In the case of the demons, I even obtained the memories of any souls they had ingested. Quite handy. As I said, my Crown holds the collective knowledge and memories of seven-hundred thousand living and deceased humans, angels, and demons — even a few Volgrim."

I raise an eyebrow. "Oh? I'd like to learn about the Volgrim first."

"No, you don't," Solomon replies, annoyance in his voice. "In due time. Let's bring you up to speed on the others first. I'll begin with the Day of Betrayal."

"That sounds ominous. What happened?"

"You'll see," The ancient king replies. He shoots a glance at Raphael, then back to his holographic display. "I hope this isn't too disorienting for anyone."

He taps a button on the screen. My vision goes black.

Somewhere between one and five seconds later, I blink my eyes open. A sea of colors floods my mind, taking me several moments to adjust.

Green. Red. Yellow. A garden. A forest. Hedges, vines, and trees spread out into the distance before me.

People walking around. Wings. They have wings. Ah, they're angels.

After a moment, I try to move, but my body won't respond. I can't move my hands, or my head, or even adjust my gaze. However, as if a puppeteer is controlling my body, my arm raises to pluck at an instrument, creating a soft sound.

A harp sits before me. I've never played one before, but I recognize it immediately. Several dozen angels sit in a half-circle and gaze at me as I strum the instrument, some on stone benches, others on the ground. One of the men hangs upside-down from a tree branch! Somehow, despite never performing before, I pluck the harp like a seasoned professional, with beauty and grace. The smiles on the faces around me appear light-hearted, as if I could make a dozen mistakes, but nobody would care. My performance is intended to be light-hearted and fun, not a professional show.

My mouth opens. "La la la~ lalala~"

The voice that escapes my lips isn't mine. It's female. Lovely, too, with a lovely lilt and cadence I could listen to all day.

As the woman continues strumming, I glance at her hand and notice her soft, supple skin is noticeably darker than many of the angels nearby. It seems she's younger than the others, perhaps in her twenties.

After several minutes, she finishes her song. The onlookers clap politely. One of the girls sends an enthusiastic grin my way. "That was delightful, Uzziel! How art thou so talented?"

"Lots of practice!" Uzziel replies. The sensation of my mouth moving is uncanny, but I find myself growing used to it as the minutes pass. "Shall I play another?"

The angel hanging from the tree crosses his arms. "Hmm. Thy eyes appear to blink heavily, sister. Do not push thyself unnecessarily."

A yawn escapes my lips. I blink slowly. "Ah, perhaps thou art right, Elphin. Three evenings back-to-back surely aren't good for my health. I'll stop, for now."

The others nod appreciatively. "There is no need to exhaust thyself. Enjoy a good rest, Uzziel."

Standing up, I slip past the harp and stretch the kinks out of my back. The other angels disperse, leaving me alone with Elphin. The angel hops from his tree and lands deftly. I can barely tell him apart from any other male picked at random, save for a thornless rose tucked behind his ear. Elphin's white hair blends with the majority of other angels, but a few of the women have dyed hair in different colors. Uzziel brushes hers to the side, allowing me to catch a glimpse of it. It's a light sea-green color, spilling into curls past her shoulders.

Elphin falls into place beside me as we turn and walk past a large, stone fountain. "Overworking thy body is undesirable, milady. As the Creator orders, we mustn't waste what we can save for another day."

"'Tis no problem," I reply. "A little fatigue is a small price to pay for making my family smile."

"Of course," Elphin says, keeping his voice neutral. "I still think a few days of rest are in order. If you would-"

Elphin pauses mid-sentence and raises his eyes to the sky, as do I. Hundreds of feet above, a single figure soars toward us, decelerating as he draws near. What interests me more is that this place, wherever I am, appears to be illuminated by an all-encompassing source of light. No sun sits suspended in the sky above. Instead, the light comes from all directions at once.

To myself, I ask, where does the light come from?

Solomon's voice replies. You haven't realized yet, but this is the Garden of Eden, one of the most beautiful places in Heaven.

Oh, I mutter. Heaven. That explains a lot.

The winged figure swoops toward us and stalls out at the last second, tilting his wings to freeze thirty feet above. He lands gently in the field, allowing me to get a good look at him.

A golden mask covers the top half of the newcomer's face. It rises several inches above his hair and a few inches to the right and left of his head, tapering off into feather-like protrusions, as if it could leap from his face and fly away whenever it wished — the man's bare, muscular chest ripples with strength. Tattoos of various animals, including a bear, wolf, and lion, dot his chest and arms. The bottom half of a toga is all that covers his waist.

The man approaches me. Before he utters a word, I notice the irritation on his face. His lips curl into a frown. "Uzziel, I require a moment of thy time."

I pause. "Certainly, Samael. What is the matter?"

"It's the imps. The little wretches-" He pauses to look elsewhere and compose himself. "Thy... thy children destroyed one of my experiments."

"Oh, no! That's terrible!" Uzziel's voice lilts in alarm. "Surely, 'twas an accident?"

Samael tosses his right hand flippantly in the air. "Tch. I haven't a clue. I told the little bast- the imps to leave me alone. They always pester and annoy me. That Satan fellow causes problems every damned-"

"Okay, okay," Uzziel says, interrupting Samael. I step toward him and rest a hand on his shoulder. "I apologize, brother. I'll discipline him at once."

Samael meets my gaze for several seconds, then averts his eyes. "Gah. Thy fascination with the red rats perplexes me. They fail the simplest tasks. They trip us underfoot. I wish they would all fall in a pit of-"

"That's enough, brother," Uzziel says. Her tone darkens noticeably. "I don't want to hear another word. The Heated Pond calls for thee. Take a break and relax. I'll handle my children."

Samael licks his lips. He glances at Elphin and sighs. "Very well. I'll leave the matter in thy capable hands."

"Indeed," I say, leaning forward to peck him on the cheek.

Samael runs his fingers through his hair and stomps toward the garden, leaving Elphin and me alone.

Elphin grunts. "Thy brother's words might be unpleasant, but I don't disagree with him. The imps are little more than nuisances."

"They sustain us," I reply. "What fate do they deserve? Shall I smite them dead? The imps are my children. I shall continue to treat them as such."

"Of course. I would never ask thee to commit an act as heinous as genocide. In any case, I'll take my leave now. Camael requested my assistance with testing a new artifact."

I nod, but it feels diplomatic. "Farewell, Elphin."

The male turns and flies off into the distance, leaving me all by myself. I don't know who anyone is, but something about the way Uzziel spoke to Elphin tells me she isn't as close to him as she is Samael. Perhaps he isn't a close relative? Do angels have spouses? In-laws?

Solomon replies in my mind. Uzziel is an Archangel, as is Samael, Camael, Uriel, Raphael, Michael, and Gabriel. Additionally, Cassiel and Muriel used to live among their ranks, but they passed away during the wars against the Dragons and Titans.

Oh, I reply. That sucks.

Indeed. Elphin, however, was a Cherub. Along with the Seraphs and Opaphs, they were considered the defenders of Heaven, ranked above other non-combatants, but below Archangels. Elphin was a renowned warrior during the Dragon War.

He sounds powerful.

In a manner of speaking.

Uzziel continues walking ahead. Birds chirp above, bees buzz past, and as I pass through the gardens, I snatch an apple off the ground and bite into it, relishing the sweet juiciness as it runs down my chin. Solomon's Crown might present this past as only a vision, but my mouth waters from the rich, delectable taste of the fruit. The thoughts of pizza and lasagna and all the other human food I've ever eaten melt away as I swallow the first chunk of it. I want more.

Uzziel bites into it as she walks, savoring every morsel. When she finishes, she stares longingly at the core for a moment before dropping it to the ground.

The fruits and vegetables in Heaven were much purer than anything on Earth, Solomon says. Uzziel infused them with large amounts of spiritual energy. Having tasted one of Heaven's apples during my lifetime, all other fruits became like dust in my mouth. It was a bittersweet moment, knowing I would never taste anything so good for the rest of my life. Eventually, the sensation passed. I forced myself to forget.

I can see why, I reply. This is merely a vision of Heaven's fruit. I can only imagine how the real deal would have tasted.

Angels didn't require sustenance, but they would sometimes eat during formal occasions if necessary. Sadly, only mana-infused fruit held any taste for them. It was a double-edged blade, in my opinion.

An ancient Greek temple arises in the distance. I recognize the stonework immediately, even though I've never been to Greece. Pillars of chiseled rock support an archway hundreds of feet above, towering over the angels milling about on its doorstep. Latin letters etched into it reveal the name of the building. Thanks to the Crown, I'm able to read them.

The Temple of Elderium.

Dozens of other buildings, also Greek-style, litter the city around it. Angels walk and fly from place to place, while some even relax atop various roofs, chatting with one another to pass the time.

Soon, I notice something else. Amidst the angels, tiny little creatures skitter about, ducking and dodging the legs of the giants above. Their red skin and bulbous eyes mark them immediately as imps.

One imp carries several scrolls in his arms. He expertly dodges the angels around him as he runs toward the giant temple. "'Scuse me! Me bad! Sorry!"

Just before the little guy makes it to the stairs, one angel lands directly in front of him at the base of the temple, causing the imp to leap backward in surprise, trip, and spill the scrolls all over the ground.

"No! No! Aw, geez!" The demon scrambles to grab his papers while the angel who landed before him scowls.

"Watch it, fool! I nearly tripped over thy fat head!"

"S-sorry! No mean to! Big accident!"

"Apologies are certainly in order. Ugly rat." The man flips his hair back and strides into the temple.

I walk over to the imp and drop to my knees. "Art thou alright, little one? The skies avail thee! Keep an eye above. Elderium is always a busy place."

The imp glances up at me as he grabs the last scroll. "Oh! Mudder Uzziel! Me work hard! Make happy!"

"Aye," I say, smiling. I lean forward to smooch the little guy on his forehead, then remember a moment later it's Uzziel doing the kissing, and not me. Yuck. Easily the worst part of the vision so far.

The imp scampers inside, leaving me alone. I stand up and sigh, then scan the plaza to look for something.

I spot it. Or rather, Uzziel does. I haven't the faintest clue what she sees, but the Archangel takes off in the opposite direction from the temple toward a statue of a lion clawing toward the sky. As she approaches it, I spot another imp holding onto one of the lion's legs with one hand, while balling his other into a fist and pumping it in the air. He leans away from the statue and suspends himself a few feet above the ground.

"Too much work! Never get sleep! Imps have rights! Big chickens think own us!"

Several angels nearby stare at Satan, whispering to themselves conspiratorially, as if they're trying to figure out what to do with him. At the base of the statue, several of Satan's fellow imps stare up at him, awe in their eyes.

"You said it! Big boss right! Need more food, better beds!"

I stop several feet away, off to their side, and cross my arms. None of the imps notice me until I speak. "Satan! What is the meaning of this? Work should be at the top of thy itinerary, not idle chatter."

Satan's triumphant fist-pumping comes to a screeching halt. His eyes bolt open as he turns his head to face me. "Ah! Mudder! It's mudder Uzziel!"

"Mother..." I say under my breath, correcting his poor linguistic ability. "Get down from there. Thou art causing a disturbance."

A few angels walk by, glance at me, then the imps, and look away, satisfied I seem to be taking care of things. The others from before disperse now that I've arrived. It appears Uzziel is someone respected by her peers. Her title of Archangel isn't for nothing.

Satan lowers his head guiltily and slides down the side of the statue, then stands meekly, waiting for my judgment. "S-sorry, mudder..."

"Sorry doesn't cut it. Not this time." Uzziel snaps each word, biting them off angrily. "Verily, thou dids't destroy one of Samael's experiments! What hath thee to say for thyself?"

"It was ask-i-dent," Satan replies. "Didn't mean break it..."

"When last we spoke, I delivered thee an ultimatum. I wasn't joking. Now I must punish thee, even though it breaks my heart to do so."

The other imps lower their heads contritely. "Satan good boy. No hurt him, please, mudder."

I sigh and tilt my head back to inhale deeply. "Haah... what shall I do? Samael and Michael want thy head on a stake. A beating won't accomplish anything, but since thou dost continue to stir up trouble in Heaven, ye leave me no choice."

Several seconds pass. I lower my head to nod at them. "Alright. Thy punishment shall be... banishment."

Satan raises his eyes. "B-band-ish-mint?"

"That's right. It means ye can no longer live in Heaven, nor can thy comrades. I'll have to banish everyone standing here to Earth."

Satan glances at the imps nearby. "What she mean?"

"Dunno," Another imp replies. "Word too big."

I point my fingers at each imp, one by one, and mutter under my breath, "Agares, Valac, Lucy, Diablo... looks like there are about fifteen of them. How unfortunate."

Uzziel recognizes them. I don't. I keep forgetting she's the one in control. Sometimes I feel as though my mind is on the brink of merging with hers.

Frankly, I don't understand why she wants to banish the demons. What was their crime? Asking for better living conditions? Breaking some random gadget? Being a little annoying?

Something seems fucked-up here. Maybe it's because I come from the 21st century, but I think the angels are treating the imps terribly. The little guys do their best, but the angels have nothing but irrational hatred for them.

Uzziel beckons to the dozen or so imps. "Follow me, please. I'll guide thee to Heaven's Gate."

The imps nod and follow after her. Satan cocks his head. "Big gate? That place go to Earth. We no allowed there."

"Correct," I reply. ""Tis true under normal circumstances. However, I cannot stand the thought of ending thy lives. Thou art my beloved children, after all."

The imp's eyes go wide with fear. Still, they follow after Uzziel. Since she knows all of their identities, fleeing won't do them any favors. They'll never escape her wrath.

How many imps are in Heaven? I wonder to myself.

Far too many, comes the reply. This time, it's Michael who responds. I would estimate there were around thirty-five thousand of the little red bastards running around.

I don't understand your constant hostility. What did the imps ever do to you? It looks to me like they were only slaves at this point.

Don't mind Michael, Raphael chimes in. He never liked the imps from the beginning. I tried to keep my opinion of them in check, but I never came close to Uzziel's enthusiasm. She was the only Archangel who truly cared about their fates. On several occasions, the imps would frenzy about and tear apart priceless scrolls or documents. Some of those held information I considered more precious than my life.

Oh? Why did they do that, then? You make the imps sound like they were little assholes, always on the prowl to cause mischief and mayhem.

That's because they were! Michael snarls. All they wanted was to-

Michael. Calm thyself, Gabriel says. Those were the ancient days. Dwelling on the past will only bring thee grief.

Several moments pass. Uzziel continues to walk away from the city district toward 'Heaven's Gate,' oblivious to my conversation with her brothers.

Ancient. So ye say, Michael says, much more quietly. We've lived for millions, perhaps even billions of years. What is a hundred thousand years compared to the blood of my kin spilling across my chest, or a sister dying in my arms? The so-called Ancient Times ache in my chest today as much as they did then.

All three Archangels go silent. Solomon clears his throat and changes topics. Let's skip ahead, Jason.

Time fast-forwards. Ten miles zip past in an instant, and soon the Temple of Elderium is long behind Uzziel. I can barely make out a great tree far to the East, but Uzziel turns to the West, toward a massive granite obelisk, one with two cherubs parked before it and a glowing gateway at the bottom.

I can't see through the glowing portal. Wherever it leads is a mystery. Uzziel gestures toward it, motioning for the imps to step through.

One of the cherub guards holds up his hand. "Ah, milady Uzziel. By Gabriel's orders, I must stop thee. What is thy business with these imps?"

"I'm banishing them," I reply. "These little ones have caused more mischief than anyone would like. I'm banishing them to Earth where they won't trouble us anymore."

The armored angel tilts his head toward his friend. "Ah..."

His friend shrugs. "Sister Uzziel is an Archangel. 'Tis her prerogative."

The first one turns back to me. "Thou knoweth we must inform Gabriel, correct?"

"No need to bother," I reply. "I'll do so myself. Feel free, though, if ye wish."
