Part 610: "REWIND!"

January 13th, 2021. Portland, Oregon, USA.

It was a cold winter day, a day without snow, but one where the wind wove its way into the gaps between clothing and skin to chill the person beneath. A cold day, but otherwise seemingly ordinary.

Jason Hiro sat in bed, looking out the window at the world outside. This city, a rather large one with a population over 500,000 people, was positioned at the northern edge of Oregon state. A large river divided it from its northern Washington neighbor city, Vancouver.

But Jason's apartment had no particularly decent views. He could only see the five-story apartment complex across the street, and the one beside it, and the other ones beside that one as well.

He could peer through his window to the street two stories below... if he so wished. There, he could look down at the people walking to and fro, going about their day. He could also look up at the overcast sky, the sun hidden behind his apartment, well out of sight. Perhaps he might even spot some pigeons flying about, if he so wished.

But he didn't do that. Instead, he dazedly stared out the window, looking more than a little confused.

"What's... going on?" Jason asked aloud, of no-one in particular. "Something seems off today."

He couldn't quite put his finger on what was bothering him. It was an odd feeling. It felt as if there was something important he needed to be doing, but he couldn't place what it was.

Several minutes passed. The apartment next door, with its ever-annoying occupant, some old man Jason had never spoken to but had seen going in and out of his house every so often, blared the TV at maximum volume. The old man clearly had hearing issues, but Jason always felt a little too intimidated by his grizzled beard to confront him about it.

"...stocks down 13% in light of President Brian Chutley's recent declaration regarding the potential of a pandemic coming from China. President Chutley stated to reporters that he would go to every possible length to strengthen the CDC's provisions in preparation for the outbreak of what is being designated 'Covid-19.' And here, we have President Chutley's remarks as he addressed the nation on Tuesday..."

Jason listened to the TV idly while his mind moved with the speed of a slug to try and figure out just what the heck he was supposed to be doing today.

"Hmm... something... it was something important..."

Jason's eyes idly wandered to a photo of a man, woman, and five children on his bedside desk. He reached over and picked it up to look at it. For some reason, the photo made him feel sadder than usual today. It felt like he had lost them all over again.

Usually, when he looked at this picture, he would feel an immense amount of anguish, a deep pang of empathy and loss that made the rest of his day a little bleaker.

But today, that feeling was different. The sadness he felt was more distant than usual, as if they had passed away hundreds of years ago, and the pain inflicted on his heart had long scabbed over, only to just now rip the wound open.

It felt like a distant sort of nostalgia, like a favorite sad movie from childhood. Jason couldn't pinpoint why it felt so alien, only that it did.

He gently ran his thumb over Amanda's face, then Robert, then the other kids Jason had grown up with.

Cody was doing decently, all things considered. He was 20 now, in college. Jason hadn't spoken to him in a few years, but he figured Cody had rebounded relatively well, despite his past trauma.

Emily wasn't as fortunate. She and Robert were extremely close, and his accidental death broke her psyche. She spent the last several years in and out of rehab for substance abuse.

Honestly, Jason thought it wouldn't be long before she... but that wasn't a thought he liked to imagine.

Then there was Jason himself, and the fallout from losing the two foster parents he cared about the most.

He was doing well.

Wasn't he?

...Wasn't he?

Jason frowned. He finally seemed to recall something, stood up from his bed, and flinched when his feet touched the cold vinyl floor. He fumbled around and found his slippers under the bed and stepped inside them, then walked over to turn on the central heat before turning to look at his calendar.

And there it was.

Today was the day. Somehow, he had completely forgotten.

How could such an important event slip his mind?

"Something must be off with me..." Jason mumbled, looking at the floor with a pained expression. "I'm being totally dense today."

This apartment, funded by the last dregs of money at his disposal, was no longer within his ability to pay. He lost his job a few months ago. Even with his savings, he hadn't been able to last the winter without finding a new job.

Then, a month and a half ago, at the end of November, he stumbled across an advertisement online, talking about a new cryogenics procedure asking for volunteers.

Sign up, get paid $100,000 to go into cryostasis for one year, with the understanding that the scientists might fail to revive you. The payout was large enough to make him set his inhibitions aside and carefully consider whether or not this was a good idea.

Ultimately, since Cryotek was a reputable company that had successfully frozen and unfrozen monkeys, Jason decided to accept the offer. He called them up that day and set an appointment.

An appointment that had finally arrived.

"Today is the day." Jason said, looking at his scrawny reflection in the mirror. "My second chance."

At most, Jason weighed 140 pounds (65.5 kilos) soaking wet. Standing at just 5'10 (177.8cm) tall, he was an average-sized teenager, barely considered an adult by the law, but not much of an adult in mind and body.

Or at least that's how he felt yesterday. But for some reason, he didn't feel the same way today.

"Am I really that desperate?" Jason said out loud again, still not talking to anyone in particular. "I'm going to freeze myself for $100,000? Can't I come up with a better way to make money?"

He wandered over to his bedside table where he had laid out the waiver Cryotek made him sign. He frowned when he read some of the terms.

"Participant agrees to arrive on the specified date and submit themselves to a medical screening. Participant agrees to cryogenically place themselves in suspended animation for a duration of one year, or three hundred and sixty five days, in exchange for the agreed-upon reimbursement. If the client wishes to cancel these terms, he must pay... oh for the love of- what kind of idiot am I, agreeing to these terms? Seriously?! I have to pay a 20% cancellation fee if I want to back out? That's ridiculous! They're clearly just trying to exploit a young man with no worldly knowledge!"

He paused. Then he blinked.

"Though, that's what I am. Right? A young man. No worldly knowledge. It's only normal I'd be suckered by the $100,000 payout. And I'm depressed anyway. I think I am. I was? Am I depressed?"

Jason frowned again.

He was feeling exceptionally strange today.

Everything told him that he possessed far more wisdom and knowledge than an 18 year old should have, along with insight obtainable only by living a long and fulfilling life. But when he tried to remember why he felt that way, he couldn't quite remember the reason.

"Strange. It's all so strange..." Jason muttered.

He walked over to the fridge and opened it, finding it to be exceptionally bare and poorly stocked. A couple cans of Coke and Pepsi were all that greeted his eyes, along with a mostly-empty jar of mayo, some wilted lettuce, and some ham and cheese well past their due dates.

"God. I live like such a slob. My wife would be pissed if she saw this." Jason muttered, as he shook his head and closed the fridge door. "Soda will just rot my teeth. I'm better off just drinking some water- huh?"

Jason paused again, a look of confusion clouding his eyes.

"Wife... do I have a wife?"

He looked around his small, studio apartment.

There were no signs of female activity to be seen.

"No. I don't. Weird. Thought for a second I... well, whatever. Man. It's going to be one of those days, huh? I guess the Cryotek thing is really stressing me out."

He shrugged.

"No way to back out now. Might as well just honor the commitment and get on with it. Hopefully I'll wake up in a year and just put this whole mess behind me. I can make that $100k stretch, too. Maybe start up a business or something."

Jason spent the next thirty minutes prepping himself for the day. He brushed his teeth, took a shower, then rifled through his drawers for some clean clothes.

"No sense in cleaning the place out." Jason muttered, before walking around and grabbing a few personal items, such as the photo of his foster family, and his cheap Acer laptop. "Never did like Mister Jonas anyway. That old shithead can clean it up himself. As far as he'll know-, I'll simply have disappeared off the face of the Earth."

Jason chuckled, thinking vicious thoughts about his mean old curmudgeon of a landlord. But then he stopped laughing and frowned.

"...What did he look like again? Feels like I haven't seen him in hundreds of years."

No matter how Jason tried, he couldn't recall Mister Jonas's face. Only his name. That left him feeling perplexed again.

"Man what is going ON with me today?" Jason groaned. "Get it together, man!"

Jason grabbed his duffel bag and backpack, grunting as he slung the duffel-strap over his shoulder to help assist in carrying it more comfortably.

"Well... guess this is it. Bye, tiny, cramped little apartment. Won't miss you."

Jason stepped outside, slammed his door shut, then began walking down the street, his new life ahead of him.

"It's only about ten blocks to Cryotek. I'll just walk." Jason muttered. "Fuck it. I'll grab some food along the way."

His wallet didn't have a lot of money left. Only about a hundred dollars. Enough for a couple of cab rides, but not nearly enough to cover rent.

As Jason walked, the bustling city center of Portland seemed to hum in the distance. Located about a mile from that area, Jason could still hear the distant wails of police sirens, ambulances, or perhaps firetrucks as they went around, saving lives.

There weren't a lot of people walking the streets at nine in the morning. Jason passed by a couple of gangster-looking men, one white and one Latino. They side-eyed his duffel bag, perhaps thinking about grabbing it for themselves.

But when they met Jason's eyes, despite his small and unassuming stature, they seemed to notice something formidable about him. They simply averted their eyes and kept walking.

Jason continued to walk. He thought about those two men and how in the past, when he walked past a couple of scary people like that, he'd be the one to avert his eyes instead. But this time, he felt no fear at all. Their threat level was so low it didn't even register for him, whereas they seemed to instinctively understand that he was not as simple as he seemed.

When did I become so formidable? Jason wondered, metaphorically scratching his head. I guess they just aren't that tough. Or maybe I'm overthinking it. Either way, they were only human. If they were Demons, that'd be a totally different story!

But naturally, Jason corrected himself. Not that demons exist. My brain is simply acting silly again.

His ever increasing awareness of his 'weird' thoughts became duller as time passed. He stopped at a local taco stand and bought himself a grande burrito, then sat down on a bench nearby, silently munching it as cars passed by. Normally, he'd tuck his bag of belongings under the bench, behind his feet, as if to protect it, but this time, he didn't even bother.

Despite casually eating his food, Jason watched the people around him carefully, as if to assess any possible threats. With surprising ease, he managed to pick out the benign passers-by and the malevolent ones as well. Portland, naturally, was a city with a decent amount of crime, so Jason always knew to keep his eyes out. But he even surprised himself with his observational skills.

I guess I'm just good at this now, too. He thought.

Jason glanced off to the side, where he saw a Renaissance festival taking place at the local park. Lots of men and women streamed inside, dressed in clothes resembling peasant and noble garb from the 1800's and before.

"Bet my wife would love to go to one of those..." Jason muttered, before frowning. "And there I go saying more weird shit."

He finished his burrito, tossed the wrapper in the trash, then picked up his bags and continued walking. Before long, he made it the ten blocks to the Cryotek Warehouse, where their two-story outer glass facade concealed the vast underground complex where all the cryogenic pods would ultimately be stored. The building shone in the midday light, making Jason squint as the reflected sun tried its damnedest to blind him.

With a deep sigh of resignation, Jason slowly strode into Cryotek, his hesitation palpable. Everything about this situation felt wrong to him, but he couldn't pin why. It almost felt as if an entirely different version of himself signed up for this, and he woke up today completely blindsided by what he had to do.

But ultimately, it was him who made the decision, and he had to abide by it, his terrible memory be damned.

"$20,000 to cancel. Man. What was I thinking?" Jason grumbled. "Who signs up for something like this unless they have a death wish? Then again, didn't I? It's so hard to remember."

The glass front doors slid open automatically, gliding along silently as warm, comforting air wafted against his body. Despite wearing a thick coat, sweat building up under his clothes still made him feel rather chilly.

Jason looked around the entry area. It was extremely large, a huge open space with a food court to the right where several Cryotek employees sat, enjoying their lunch break, their identities made obvious by the blue and white Cryotek logo emblazoned on their shirts. It was a fairly simply one, a vector image in the shape of a capsule with several tubes poking off to the side, with the company name boldly emblazoned on top.

To the left, a row of benches signaled the waiting area, where five other people were already sitting, nervousness palpable on their faces. Jason guessed they must be the other cryogenic study participants. Most of them were young adults, but one surprisingly old man also joined the group. He appeared the least bothered by what was soon to happen. Jason assumed that was because he had didn't have much time remaining in his life. This time-extension might give him a shot at reviving in anear-future where age reversal tech was ever so slightly more advanced.

But then again, the human struggle against mortality was simply one of their species' defining traits. It was a timeless tale; the struggle of man versus death. It was a tale man was always destined to lose. Humans died, and that was that.

Jason walked forward, making eye contact with a curly-haired brunette with bright red lips. She smiled at him, but his heart didn't stir in the slightest. He found this confusing, since he had always been a bit of a nerd when it came to women, and would even stumble over his words a little if someone attractive enough showed him any positive attention. Yet, now, her smile meant nothing to him.

My wife's smile would be prettier. Jason thought idly, reminiscing on some faceless idea of a 'wife' he clearly never had. Why he kept thinking about the idea of already having a wife, he could not understand.

"Jason Hiro." He said to the receptionist, noting her name-tag identified her as Leeta. He'd never heard the name before, but it sounded vaguely Greek. "I'm here for the uh... the cryogenic appointment."

"Hello, Jason! Thank you for making it in a little early!" Leeta chirped, smiling a little brighter at him. Despite his goofy appearance, he carried himself with a strange confidence, which she felt was noticeably more appealing than his thin frame and unimpressive bodily build implied. "I need you to sign some waivers before you start, consenting to all the procedures you'll be undergoing today. I will also need to register all the items you've brought along. Before we start, do your personal belongings contain any firearms, narcotics, or other paraphernalia?"

"No. Nothing like that." Jason said. "Pictures of family. Clothes. Some random knick-knacks."

"Alright, that's good to hear." Leeta responded, turning to type on her computer.

She fell silent, her fingers whizzing across the keys at a speed Jason found to be slightly awe-inspiring. How the heck was she so fast? She must have gone to college and aced her typing classes, or perhaps she just used computers a lot.

Perhaps if this was yesterday, Jason might express some visible interest on this subject and awkwardly chat her up, trying to fish for information, maybe try and make a positive impression.

But his heart just wasn't in it today. He felt like a completely different man, and in the end, what was typing speed as an accomplishment anyway? Fighting demons was a lot more impressive, and he only thought women who could do that were worth his time.

Huh... what a strange thing to think. Jason counter-thought, scrutinizing his mental tangents.

Leeta typed, and typed, and typed some more. Finally, she raised her eyes from her monitor to look at him.

"Have you ingested any food or drink within the last twelve hours?"

Jason blinked. "Uh... yes. Was I not supposed to?"

Leeta paused. She cocked her head slightly. "Our medical examiners should have gone over this with you last week. You aren't supposed to eat or drink anything before entering cryostasis. Did they fail to give you a call?"

"A call..." Jason said slowly, trying to recall if anything of the sort happened a week ago.

Unfortunately, try as he might, he just couldn't think back that far. For some reason, a week ago might as well have been a hundred years.

"I... don't know." Jason said awkwardly. "Sorry. I'm having some... memory issues today. Not sure why. Feels like something changed last night and I can't place what."

"I see." Leeta said, frowning slightly. She smushed her lips together in a thoughtful sort of way, then reached for the phone. "Hold on. Let me call Ms. Langley over. She can examine you to make sure you're fit for cryostasis. Sudden memory issues could indicate a problem we need to be aware of."

Jason chewed his lower lip. "Uh... if I'm found to not be fit for stasis, will they cut me out of the tests? I... can't afford the cancellation fee."

"We can always work out a repayment plan." Leeta said with a smile. "You have insurance, right?"

"Insurance." Jason repeated, losing himself momentarily in thought. "Insurance. I do. I might? I'm not sure. I don't remember."

"You don't remember that either?" Leeta asked, raising her eyebrow another millimeter. "Let's just have Ms. Langley inspect you before we take any drastic steps."

Jason nodded slowly, feeling a pit start to form in his stomach. He did not like the way this conversation was going. "S-sure. Alright."

At Leeta's request, he wandered over to the waiting area and sat down across from the old man, and beside a young blonde woman with long hair. She was even more drop-dead gorgeous than Leeta, but as before, her beauty didn't move him. Somehow, despite being eighteen, the same age as Jason, he found her to be way too young for his tastes.

I feel like I'm into older women now. Jason thought absentmindedly. At least more mature ones. When did that happen?

The old man looked at Jason, grunting gruffly at him.

"Having trouble?"

Jason nodded. "I think so. Memory issues. I also ate food before I came here. I hope they don't make me cancel. I can't afford the twenty thousand dollar fee..."

"Young kids like you shouldn't be here." The old man grumbled. "If they give you any trouble, I'll pay that fee for you. No worries. I'm loaded. Pulled some strings to get myself into this test."

Jason blinked. "You're rich, but you signed up for cryostasis? Why?"

"I have a rare neurological disease." The old man said. "My hope is that if I freeze myself, a certain new treatment the Chinese recently devised may have passed FDA approval by the time I get out. Otherwise... I probably won't meet a good end."

"Oh." Jason said, not quite sure how to respond. "That's heavy."

"Yeah. Problem is, President Chutley is rumored to be passing a six-month freeze on FDA approvals. It's got me spooked. Hope we vote that cunt out by next year."

"Yeah. Same." Jason responded, once again unsure of how to continue the conversation's flow. He didn't know much about politics, and he didn't have much of an impression of Chutley at all.

Jason glanced at the blonde girl sitting beside him. She looked up and met his gaze.

"So, why are you entering Cryostasis?" Jason asked.

"I'm not." The girl replied. "I came here to see someone off."

"Gotcha. I hope that works out for you." Jason replied.

The girl remained quiet for a moment, looking into Jason's eyes before looking away.

"How about you?" She asked. "Are you still planning to go along with this procedure?"

"Yeah." Jason answered, before pausing. "Well. Actually. I don't know. Maybe. I can't afford the cancellation fee. It's only for a year, anyway. The $100k will be a big boon for me. I just don't know what I was thinking when I chose to come here."

"You're having second thoughts?" She asked, looking at him more carefully.

This girl is kind of intense. Jason thought, wondering why she was asking such pointed questions.

"Something like that. But I'll go along with it if they okay things for me. By the way... do I know you?"

Jason squinted slightly. The more he looked at her, the more familiar she seemed.

A faint spark of light seemed to flicker in the girl's eyes. "I don't know. Do you?"

"My name's Jason." Jason said. "What's yours? Did we maybe go to the same school or something?"

"We didn't." The girl said. "We definitely didn't. But my name is Daisy..."

"Oh, Daisy?" Jason repeated, frowning slightly.

After a few moments, he smiled. "That's a pretty name."

Daisy's smile seemed to deflate, ever so slightly. "Thanks."

Once again, Jason felt slightly confused. Daisy's reactions weren't quite what he thought they'd be. She almost seemed to be expecting something from him, but he couldn't place what it was.

After a few moments, Daisy rose to her feet. She smiled at him, then sighed. "No matter what choice you make, I'm rooting for you."

"Oh. Well, thank you." Jason said, mystified by her strange words. "I'm, uh, rooting for you too."

Daisy stared at him again, then she turned and walked away. She briskly exited Cryotek, leaving Jason to his thoughts.

Jason glanced around the waiting area. There were a couple other people seated not far away, but two weird conversations in a row made him apprehensive about chatting anyone else up.

Luckily, at that moment, a door behind the reception desk swished open, and a brown-haired woman with permed curls and big thick-rimmed glasses strode out, turning to the waiting area to scan the group of four before looking directly at him.

"Jason Hiro?" She asked.

He stood up, hefted his duffel bag and backpack, then quickly strode over to the woman. "That's me."

She extended her hand. "I'm Rebecca Langley, one of the assistant medical examiners here at Cryotek. Would you mind coming with me to the back to answer some questions?"

Jason quickly reached out and shook her hand, taking care to match her strength. It was never okay in his book to crush another person's hand when they offered, and personally he hated when big macho-types pulled that crap to assert dominance or whatever.

"Hello, is it okay if I call you Rebecca, or do you prefer Ms. Langley?"

"Rebecca is fine." She said, smiling back at him. "Just follow me to my office and we'll make this quick, alright?"

Jason nodded. He and Rebecca headed into the back, down a spacious corridor, past multiple office doors, until they arrived at one with Rebecca's name on the glass. She lead him inside, then pulled the blinds shut and closed the door.

"No cubicles, huh?" Jason said, to make conversation. "That must be nice."

He took a seat at the desk, and Rebecca sat opposite him, turning to look at her flatscreen display with a smile.

"Oh, it is. Cryotek has treated me excellently compared to my last job. The pay isn't too bad either, plus I get benefits."

"Benefits." Jason repeated. "That's nice these days, what with rumors of that super-flu in the news."

"I'm sure Cryotek will take good care of me." Rebecca replied, keeping her tone diplomatic and professional. "Now, what's this about the memory issues you've been experiencing? Can you give me more details?"

"Of course." Jason said. "So, it started this morning when I woke up. I just wasn't feeling like myself, and I've been having all kinds of weird thoughts..."

Keeping the strangest thoughts to himself, particularly those weird ones about demons and liking 'mature' women, Jason explained to Rebecca over the next few minutes the odd gaps in his memory and his internal musings that didn't seem to sync up with what he should have been like yesterday, or the day before.

Rebecca, to her credit, listened silently and without judgment, only pausing to ask follow-up questions.

Eventually, she nodded and typed some words on her computer.

"I'll need to run a MRI to be sure, but it doesn't sound like anything serious."

"It doesn't?" Jason asked, feeling slightly baffled.

"I'm actually a PhD neurologist, you see." Rebecca explained. "What you're describing is most likely stress-induced memory loss. I won't lie, you're not the first person to go through something like this prior to entering a clinical trial as... scary... as the first human-tested cryostasis treatment. I'm sure you've been having second thoughts as the day drew nearer, but today when you woke up, your mind briefly shut down and 'rebooted' in a sense. Naturally, if you want to back out of the trial, you can, but these memory issues are not life-threatening, and they will not require we cancel the treatment on our end."

Internally, Jason's frown turned a little ugly.

What she said sort of sounds right, but it also sounds like medical and legal jargon to ensure I can't get out of paying the $20k cancellation fee. They're willing to endanger my life so long as they get their clinical trial!

But unfortunately, Jason had no leverage he could apply. Likely, there were other participants waiting in a queue list, and if he tried finding a way to cancel, he'd only end up stuck with a bill, while Cryotek would replace him immediately.

"I... think I understand." Jason replied. "So I'm still good to go for entering Cryostasis?"

"Yes." Rebecca answered. "However, the fact that you ate food presents a different problem. We're going to have to ask you to wait twelve hours before we can allow you to complete the final steps."

"Oh. Twelve hours." Jason said, feeling slightly gloomy. "It's 9:30 AM. So... I won't be able to get in until 9:30 PM?"

"Right. You can wait out in the lobby, if you like." Rebecca 'helpfully' suggested. "Or you can rent a hotel. But if you eat food again, you'll have to wait until tomorrow to come back. Any further delays beyond that will be considered a cancellation."

"I... I understand." Jason said, feeling his heart sink again. Cryotek were really gunning to make sure he entered Cryostasis. Most likely, there was some sort of government contract involved, or some backroom deal. They needed to ensure the participants joined and the clinical trials were proven safe and effective, at all costs.

After filling out some paperwork and registering his belongings, Jason left the back area of Cryotek and entered the lobby once more, this time only carrying his backpack. He left his duffel bag in the personal belongings lockbox where he would be able to pick them up a year down the road, after his stasis was over.

Slowly, Jason shuffled over to the waiting area seats. He sat down across from the old man again and sighed.

"Problems?" The old man asked.

"No. Quite the opposite. The brown-haired lady said I was fit as a fiddle, so barring the MRI scan revealing a severe neurological issue that sprung up in the last month, I'd have to enter stasis or pay the cancellation fee."

"Hmm. Don't worry about it, kid. I already told you I'd pay that fee if you want out." The old man grunted, his tone dismissive. "Hell, I'll give you a hundred grand to go out and live your best life. Young brat like you ain't got no reason to be here."

Jason looked at the old man in surprise. Was he serious?

"You'd... really do that?"

"I'm worth $212 million. It's pocket change." The old man bragged. "Maybe you've heard of me. Seymour Madrid?"

Jason slowly shook his head. "...Nope. Can't say I have."

"That's fair. I'm the CFO of American Eagle Bank. At least, I was. I tendered my resignation to enter stasis. They put in some thirty-something brat after I left. Place is going to shit anyway. I cashed out before the next housing bubble pops."

Jason blinked. This guy really doesn't talk like some wealthy banker. I'd never have guessed.

"Well," Jason finally said, "I'd love the help with paying the cancellation fee, but you don't need to give me any money beyond that. I can figure things out on my own. Somehow, I feel like I'm brimming with ideas for the future, when I wasn't yesterday. No idea why, it's just a strange confidence I have in myself."

"Haha! See, now that's what a young man should say." Seymour chuckled, smiling wide and making his beard and mustache vibrate. "Don't worry about it. I'll even give you two hundred grand, since you're such an upright little bugger. Go and get your stuff, leave the rest to me. I'll make some calls."

Jason smiled at him. "You really don't have to, but... thanks. Nobody's ever helped me like this before."

"I wasn't such a good man in the past." Seymour said, his smile fading a little. "You have to be cutthroat and vicious, stepping on people littler than you, to get ahead in the banking industry. Maybe I'm just trying to make up for my past. Don't think too much on it."

Jason nodded. His smile warmed a little more, and he stood up, thanking Seymour once again.

After that, he strode over to the front desk, to speak to Leeta, but at that moment, something surprising happened.

Cryotek's front doors swished open. Four men wearing government uniforms with FBI emblazoned on the front and back entered, their hands on their hip holsters. All of them wore sunglasses and baseball caps, also sporting their agency's name across the front. A pang of alarm went through the lobby as they immediately drew a lot of attention.

The man in the lead held up a walkie-talkie looking device, and it made a pinging noise as he swept it in a wide arc across the lobby, pausing when it started making ping-ping-ping sounds rapid-fire. It only made those noises once he pointed at Jason, so all four men quickly turned to assess the young man.

"It's him?" One of the men asked.

"Code 3-14." The white-haired man in the lead replied. "Blonde hair, blue eyes. Matches the description."

Jason's heart jumped slightly. He didn't know why, but these men were clearly looking for him.

"Sir. Young man." The man in the lead said, approaching Jason with a look of caution on his face. "I'm Agent Silver, with the FBI. I need your identification, please. This is a matter of national security."

The fuck? National security? Jason thought, growing more bewildered by the second.

His hands started to shake as two of the agents move to the sides, slightly encircling him.

Slowly, carefully, with all eyes on the lobby fixed on him, Jason reached into his back pocket, and retrieved his wallet. Then he opened it up and pulled out his state ID and handed it to Silver.

Silver took the ID from him, then he touched the side of his head, where Jason noticed a small cord draping down from his ear.

"Identification acquired. Subject's name is Jason L. Hiro, that's Juliet-Alfa-Sierra-Oscar..."

Silver quickly spelled out Jason's name in the NATO phonetic alphabet, then nodded as someone replied inaudibly in his ear.

"Jason Hiro, we're going to need you to come with us for questioning." Silver said.

"What? Questioning?" Jason asked, feeling slightly scared by this random turn of events. "Have I done something wrong?"

"We need you to come with us for questioning." Silver repeated. "Are you refusing to comply?"

"No, no, I'll comply." Jason said, his legs starting to shake. "I-I just want to know what's going on! I didn't do anything wrong."

"Young man, this is a matter of national security. I am not obliged to speak of the details at this time."

Seeing that there was no way out, Jason reluctantly nodded.

"O-okay. I'll come. But- but my appointment with Cryotek-"

"We'll handle whatever business you had going on today." Silver replied. "Your ID."

He handed Jason's state ID back to him, and Jason shakily stored it back in his wallet, nearly dropping both due to his nerves. A minute later, he strode outside, flanked by two men on both sides, feeling humiliated and fearful for his life.

Luckily, the FBI didn't cuff him. He might have crawled into a hole and died if they did.

I didn't do anything! Jason thought, his eyes trembling with panic. What the hell is this all about?!

As he stepped into a van, followed by the four agents, a young blonde woman sat on a bench some distance away. She stared at the happenings, a frown on her face.

"Hmm? This isn't right. I thought he was going to enter the cryopod today? But why would the future change? Is it because of me?"

She bit her lip, unsure whether or not to intervene. As the van started to move, her eyes illuminated with a momentary glow, and she sent a pulse of energy toward it. Having successfully tagged her target, Daisy Hiro stood up and massaged her chin.

"They'd better not hurt him. American scum."

Then, she vanished from the spot, disappearing into thin air.

Part 611: Taken

January 13th, 2021. 10:30AM. Somewhere in the woods of Northern Oregon.

Jason sat silently in the back of the FBI van. Two agents sat on his right and left, while Silver and a female agent sat across from him. All of them took their sunglasses off, leaving their faces illuminated by the small light in the back of the windowless van. Jason had no idea who was driving, as he couldn't see them.

The fact he wasn't handcuffed gave the young man precious little reprieve. He trembled from head to toe, trying not to fall into a panic attack. After driving for nearly an hour in absolute silence, with none of the agents saying a word, Jason finally worked up the courage to speak.

"Where... where are you... taking me? I haven't done anything wrong."

"No. You haven't." Silver immediately replied, looking Jason in the eyes. "You're not under arrest, and you have committed no crime. Your existence, however, is a matter of national security. I can't say much more until we arrive at the Haven."

"The Haven?" Jason repeated.

"It's a safe site. We place important individuals inside for their protection."

Jason hesitated.

"If I'm not under arrest... then why all the cloak and dagger? Am I free to leave?"

"No. You're not." Silver replied, his tone neutral. "You are not under arrest, but it is imperative you remain in our custody. Your life is in grave danger. You're lucky we found you before someone else did."

The van vibrated as it drove along at a fast, smooth speed. It hadn't come to a stop for a long time, so Jason estimated they must have been on a highway for a long time. Based on his poor perception of the outside world, he guessed they must be heading east, or perhaps south.

"Who else would be looking for me?" Jason asked, his trembling finally managing to slow down somewhat. Instead of fear, he experienced a surge of confusion. "I'm... nobody. Nobody special, at least."

"That remains to be seen." Silver said, before reaching to his side and pulling out the walkie-talkie-shaped device. He pressed a button and aimed its antenna at Jason, to which it repeated the ping-ping-ping noise from before. "We'll need to conduct a few tests to be sure, but it's likely you're the individual we've been looking for. Just remain quiet for a while longer. We'll arrive soon."

"O...okay." Jason muttered, lowering his head and wondering just what the hell this was all about.

He wasn't anybody.

He was a nobody.

A complete non-entity!

What the hell would the FBI want with a scrawny teenage orphan?

After another thirty or so minutes, the van slowed down drastically. It started taking sharper turns at lower speeds, then its tires crackled as it drove onto what Jason presumed to be a gravel road. It bumped along for a while longer, then it slowed down to the point he could actually hear a songbird singing somewhere outside.

Some voices started speaking.

"...designation... password... Jericho-Niner... yeah... the subject along..."

Jason concentrated as hard as he could, but he could barely make out a few scattered words. The people speaking sounded official and government-like.

Then, the van slowly accelerated again, and the sound of a gate opening buzzed. Jason felt as if it sounded like the gate to a prison, but he couldn't be sure.

A few minutes later, the van came to a final stop. Jason's heart started to beat a little harder as Silver half-stood up, keeping his head low so he wouldn't bang it on the roof.

"Alright. We're here, Jason. Not much longer and you'll get your answers. Come along."

Still flanked by his 'escort', Jason stood up and watched as the back door to the van opened and the noon sunlight poured in, making him wince. He grimaced when he realized all the agents had already put on sunglasses, leaving him the only one with stinging eyes.

Bastards. What, you couldn't give me a pair, too? Cheap fuckers!

Jason cursed the FBI out, then awkwardly stepped out of the back of the van, where he saw a dark-skinned middle-aged woman sitting in a wheelchair, flanked by a protective escort of half a dozen more FBI agents. These men and women all wore SWAT-style body armor, making them much more intimidating than the ones who brought Jason in. They also held military-black assault rifles, though Jason couldn't tell much about what sorts of guns they were.

But then, as Jason looked at them, he confusingly found he did recognize the guns, which was rather odd. He never cared about studying guns in the past, so why would he suddenly know these weapons were AR-15's? More confusingly, these were civilian rifles, not the M4 Carbines commonly wielded by FBI agents.

Before Jason could further break down his situation, the woman in the wheelchair smiled pleasantly and spoke to him.

"Jason Hiro. It's wonderful to meet you. My name is Claire Rothschild."

Jason lowered his eyes to look at her. She was surprisingly attractive, with blonde hair, blue eyes, and dangling rose earrings. She wore a simple white dress with a black overcoat to keep warm on this cold day, and her eyes seemed more innocent than he'd expect from the presumed leader of all these agents.

"Claire." Jason repeated. "Why... am I here? Why have you brought me here?"

"I'm sure Agent Silver told you already, but you're not a prisoner. You are here for your own protection." Claire quickly explained. "You see, we've been searching for you for twelve years now. Why don't you follow me inside, and I'll explain everything?"

Jason blinked.

Twelve years? Why such a specific date? And why him?

He still felt as if he was missing too many pieces of the puzzle to hazard any guesses.

"Alright." He finally said, unsure what else he could add to the conversation besides questions they weren't about to answer in the open sunlight.

Claire touched a control stick on her wheelchair, and it automatically turned around and started driving around the van. Jason followed her, and his eyes wandered around, allowing him to take in the sights.

He had arrived inside a gated compound, surrounded by barbed, and possibly electrified, metal fences. These fences did not consist of one layer, but three, and beyond them was a massive obsidian-colored wall thirty feet in height. Jason couldn't tell how thick the wall was, but he easily picked out dozens of men and women walking on top of the wall, sniper rifles slung over their backs. Unlike the agents inside the compound, the wall-walkers wore heavy body armor and full tactical gear. Their armor was colored black, likely making it possible for them to blend in and strike from the shadows in case of an enemy attack.

Trees towered above the walls, providing natural camouflage from a distance. Trees also lined the inside of the compound, which Jason found to be slightly confusing. They did cover the entire sky to some degree, making it so planes overhead wouldn't be able to see the compound from above, but they also provided avenues for prisoners to escape by climbing up and jumping over the walls.

Probably not a good idea though. Jason idly thought. It doesn't seem likely these people were too stupid to figure out something that obvious. They probably have other protections against escapees in place, ones I simply can't see.

Jason's gaze moved from the trees to a pitch-black building Claire was driving toward. His heart fell into his stomach as the wide, single-story structure gave him a terrifying, ominous feeling.

What the- oh my god! Is this one of those CIA black sites I've heard about? Have they been lying to me this whole time?!

Jason's body started to tremble again, unbidden, as his adrenaline spiked.

Nobody has any rights when they get put into a black site. They strip your rights away and can lie freely to you. Stupid! How could I be so blind? This is clearly a trap! They ARE arresting me, but why? For what purpose?! Do they think I'm a terrorist??

Unfortunately, even if Jason was 100% sure of his hypothesis, he didn't really have any recourse. He was surrounded by heavily armed guards, and he wasn't exactly a fighter. If they came to blows, he'd be knocked out in seconds.

Possible escape options. Silver has a pistol. Is it bio-coded? It might be one of those new 'smart guns'. Stealing it won't give me a weapon. I'd still be outgunned even if I took it.

What about Claire? Maybe I can grab her, threaten her life. She seems important. I might be able to use her as a hostage to free myself.

If I had a melee weapon, I'd feel more assured. Even a straight pipe would give me a fighting chance. If it were long enough, I could wield it like a bo staff, moving fluidly to-NO, what am I even thinking?! I don't have any weapon training! They'd just shoot or tase me if I tried to fight them!

Claire and Jason, along with their entourage, finally arrived at the entrance to the black site. The door opened, and a pair of guards assessed the newcomers. Despite obviously seeming to know who Claire was, they took no chances. They carefully assessed the identity of every individual there, took biometrics data, and double-checked those readings before finally allowing them through.

People here are cautious beyond the realm of normality. Jason noted. What are they afraid of, shapeshifters? Surely they saw Claire leave the building a few minutes ago. How bizarre...

Not long afterward, Claire led Jason and a now-smaller contingent of agents deeper into the facility, passing many smartly-dressed government employees, all of whom looked at Jason and whispered things after he passed.

"It's him?"

"Blonde hair, blue eyes. If it's not him, I'll eat my hat."

"He's a bit scrawny."

"Might not have fully Awoken yet. We'll see."

Jason frowned. He tried to ignore these people, but the fact everyone seemed to know who he was felt extremely disconcerting.

Finally, Claire led Jason into a small office with a conference table. She gestured to one side, while she and Silver sat on the opposite side. To Jason's surprise, at some point, all the other agents had already peeled off, leaving him alone with just these two.

Wait, is this a chance? Jason thought, his mind instantly sharpening. It's just the three of us. Even if they have security cameras, I'd only need a few seconds to jump across the table, tackle Silver, grab his gun, then jump up, wrap my arm around Claire's neck and put the gun to her head. With her as my hostage, I could-

"Jason Hiro." Claire said, smiling prettily. "Would you mind taking a seat? We have a lot to discuss."

Jason blinked. He realized he'd stopped just short of sitting down and was looking around the room a little intensely.

I should wait and hear her out. Jason thought. Maybe I can get her and Silver to lower their guard before I act.

He nodded, then sat down. Unfortunately, Silver remained standing. He stood behind Claire and rested one hand on the back of her wheelchair. Jason found the position to be strangely intimate. Perhaps Silver and Claire had a deeper relationship than mere employer-employee...

"So..." Jason said slowly. "Are you going to tell me why you've brought me here?"

"Yes. And I do apologize." Claire said, her smile turning a bit embarrassed. "It wasn't our intention to frighten you. This really is all for your protection. If you are who we think you are, then your life is in grave danger. Especially since you've recently turned eighteen."

"Huh?" Jason grunted. "What does me turning eighteen have to do with anything?"

He frowned, then leaned forward and rested his elbows and arms on the table, giving Claire a perplexed look.

"We've been tracking your activity for years, but were never able to pinpoint your exact location." Claire explains. "You've been a busy boy. Berlin, Paris, Russia, New York, and now even the west coast."

Jason blinked again. In fact, he blinked several times.

"Uh... are you saying... you think I've been to all those places?"

Claire nodded. "Of course! Ah, but before I continue, let me tell you who we are and what our mission is."

She paused.

"As I said before, I am Claire Rothschild, but I do not work for the FBI, and neither does Silver or any of the men and women you saw up to this point. In fact, we aren't part of any three-letter governmental agency."

"So you lied to me?" Jason asks.

"A necessary deception." Claire said without a hint of shame. "We are actually a sort of supernatural defense force. One of humanity's oldest organizations, created thousands of years ago. We exist on every continent and inside every country, save a few who refused entry to us."

"Alright. Who are you?" Jason asked.

"We are the Illuminati." Claire said, still smiling as cheerfully as before.

Jason stared at her.

He became lost for words.

"The... Illuminati? The 'secret' shadow organization literally everyone knows about? You've got to be kidding me."

"We aren't a secret." Claire explains. "Most governments know about us. We're a 'secret' in the sense that we exist in the open, yet hide the truth about ourselves behind conspiracies and lies. It benefits humanity if not too many people take us seriously, you see. But important people in important places know who we are, and our enemies know who we are, so that is all that matters."

Jason nodded slowly.

"Right."

Oh my god. These people are whackos. Jason thought, feeling depressed internally. A bunch of lunatics. What have I gotten myself involved in?

Claire didn't seem to notice his sullen expression. She smiled as cheerfully as ever.

"You see, Jason, the Earth is not as you know it. It is actually a melting pot of different cultures and species, all vying for control of our bright blue globe. A brutal war for domination has been playing out over the past hundred-thousand-plus years. The players change, but the game does not. And you, we suspect, are one of the most important players. You are the heir to humanity's mightiest power!"

"Right." Jason repeated, in complete disbelief. "Me. Powerful. Okay."

At this point, Silver spoke. "You seem unconvinced. Jason, our organization is comprised, at the highest levels, by direct descendants of humanity's first Hero, an individual known as Jepthath. He was the Great Illuminator, the one who brought our species out of the darkness into the light. Because of him, we were able to seek salvation from the angels and demons, and unify ourselves into a cohesive fighting force capable of doing battle against entities much more powerful than ourselves."

"Angels. Demons." Jason repeated. "I guess that tracks."

Jason's immediate dismissal of all this nonsense paused for a moment. He frowned as he suddenly remembered all the strange thoughts he'd been having since he woke up earlier that day.

"Wait... demons... are you saying demons are real?"

"Oh, very real. More real than you know." Claire said. "You probably imagine them as scary Bible stories, or you've seen them depicted in movies and TV shows as evil monsters, but they are not fictional creatures. Their true nature has been hidden from the populace, and they even live in our midst. Demons are everywhere, and if their agents were to find you, they would kill you without hesitation. After all, you are the fated inheritor of Ancestor Jepthath's power."

Before Jason could ask another question, Claire did instead.

"Jason, have you ever performed any strange, unexplained acts of power before? Have you ever made your hands glow, or teleported from place to place, or lifted objects with your mind?"

Jason blinked.

"Uh... is that a serious question?"

"Quite." Claire replied curtly. "Anything at all. Any metaphysical phenomena? Have you experienced anything of the sort? As I said, we've been tracking you for twelve years."

Jason reached up and scratched his head.

"...No? Nothing like that. You said earlier you detected me in Berlin, Paris, and some other places. Uh. I've never been there. I've never even left Oregon."

Claire's smile slipped slightly. She turned her head back to Silver, who once again pulled out the walkie-talkie-looking device, then aimed it at Jason until it let out those odd ping-ping-ping sounds.

"It's definitely you..." Claire said, her smile disappearing. "It has to be you. There can only be one true inheritor of the Heroic Aura. Jason, before we continue, why don't we run some tests? Let's go ahead and fully confirm instead of relying on our Field Detector."

Jason shrugged. At this point, he'd lost his fighting intent and was now simply confused. His fear had turned to disappointment, and even a sort of wry internal laughter.

How could these idiots possibly believe in all that crap about demons and angels? How could they believe he was some special, super powerful 'Hero'? He was just a normal guy.

Though, there were those strange thoughts he'd been having all day long...

Jason waited for a while. He engaged Claire in some minor small-talk, but she refused to answer any further questions until the testing equipment arrived. Eventually, it did. A pair of women entered the conference room, pushing along a rolling cabinet with a helmet of some sort mounted on top.

"This will record your brainwaves." Claire explained. "Just put it on and follow our prompts. We'll test you to see if you have the Heroic Aura after all. Don't worry, it's completely painless."

Doing as Claire asked, Jason put the large metal hat on his head, grimacing at the countless wires sticking out of the top. The two female technicians smiled at him and reassured him there wasn't anything to worry about, so he simply cooperated, curious as to what they would find.

Then the tests began.

First, they slid some papers across the table to Jason.

"Look at each of these images for five seconds, then flip to the next one. We want to record your mental fluctuations."

Jason nodded. He did as they asked. First, there was a picture of a German Shepherd, then a picture of an orange tabby cat, then a picture of a dark-skinned child wearing tribal clothing, possibly from Africa. After that came a series of pictures of men and women from all over the world. Jason glanced up at Claire at one point. She simply smiled, nodded, and mouthed, 'Keep going'...

At one point, he flipped over to a picture of a beautiful white haired woman, and he stopped to stare at her for a long, long time. The testers frowned, wondering why he hadn't flipped away yet. Jason, however, just couldn't tear his eyes away from the picture. She looked different from something he expected to see, but familiar in a way that made him feel despondent, as if he had lost something precious, something he could never retrieve.

"Jason. Jason." Claire said, pulling him from his thoughts. "Please continue flipping. Unless there's some significance to that woman?"

Jason hesitated. He looked at the white-haired woman for a few moments longer, then reluctantly flipped the page.

"I don't know. I just thought she was... beautiful."

Silver snorted, but didn't say anything.

Jason continued flipping the pages, and when he reached the end, one of the two technicians walked over and whispered something in Claire's ear.

"Mmm. Nothing out of the ordinary, then? Go ahead and save that one picture for him. There's no harm. Alright, Jason, we're going to show you some different pictures. Now that we've established a baseline, these will provide a stronger contrast."

Jason nodded. The next batch of pictures were decidedly different in every conceivable way. Instead of images of animals and people, they were images of mythological monsters, Titans from some unknown religious pantheon, demons, angels, harpies, and many other creatures Jason mentally identified with ease.

Jason frowned at some images. One image in particular gave him serious pause.

Seeing the picture atop the pile, Claire nodded. "That's Satan the Devil. He is the leader of demonkind. Humanity's greatest enemy."

"Why is he so fat?" Jason asked, only to think to himself, and why does he look so familiar?

"That's just how he is." Claire said with a shrug.

Jason continued to flip through the images. A surprising number of them seemed extraordinarily familiar to him, as if these were faces he had seen in person, but he could not place when or where.

At the end, Claire received confirmation from the two technicians, who took the helmet off Jason's head and wheeled the device out of the room.

"It's official. You are an inheritor of the Heroic Aura." Claire proclaimed. "When we showed you the images of demons and monsters, the Mana Reader picked up strong reflexive firings of minute amounts of mana. You possess Heroic abilities, and now we simply need to determine what they are."

Jason pursed his lips.

"I'm... a little less skeptical than before. Actually... I might as well just say it. I've been having these strange thoughts all morning, ever since I woke up. It started when I first sat up in bed, and they've only grown stronger as the hours have passed..."

Jason proceeded to speak for much longer than he intended. Claire listened, just as Rebecca did. She and Silver exchanged glances sometimes, particularly when Jason mentioned recognizing many of the demons, angels, and monster species, despite never having seen them in person.

"I'm not going crazy, then?" Jason asked.

"On the contrary. It seems the burst of Heroic Energy we detected at the Cryotek labs was indeed caused by you. Jason, I suspect that you might be a Mentalizer-type Hero."

"A what?" Jason asked.

"Mentalizers are Heroes who possess exceptional brainpower, abilities related to intellect and strategy, or even prophets and farseers." Claire explained. "Perhaps these 'feelings' you've been experiencing are the beginning of your Ascension. Soon, you will wield all your abilities, full and proper."

Everything seemed to click into place. Jason looked down at the picture of the white-haired woman, feeling emotionally attached to her for a reason he couldn't explain.

Was this the cause? Could it be that he was actually a Hero who possessed divine foresight? Would this woman be important to him in some near or far future situation?

It didn't quite feel right.

Jason felt as if she had been important to him in the past. He felt as if he had known 'her' for a lot longer than his short, eighteen-year life implied.

But that was impossible.

"If I was 90% sure before, I'm 100% sure now." Claire said. "Jason, you are the inheritor of the Heroic Aura. If we had not found you, the Angels might have tried to get to you first. That would have been a disaster. The angels are nominally humanity's allies, but Ancestor Jepthath himself passed down a proclamation to his descendants; we must never trust Archangel Raphael. He is a liar and a deceiver."

"Naturally," Claire continued, "if the demons had found you, that would be even worse. They might kill you, or they might instead capture you and immobilize you, keeping you alive to ensure the Heroic Aura could not be passed on. That would deprive humanity of a Hero for another thirty, fifty, or even a hundred years. Perhaps that is why no Hero has emerged since the end of the second World War..."

Claire shook her head sadly.

"The last Hero fought for humanity. His name was Harold Whittaker, and he was a German immigrant who came to the United States along with his wife to flee the Nazis. Unfortunately, he volunteered to fight the Nazis, and perished in the final attack. No Hero has appeared since then. The Illuminati were beginning to fear the demons might have found a way to capture the Heroic Aura. If Satan were ever to devour it, his power would rise, and humanity's would plummet to a level that would leave us in despair."

Jason listened to her explanation. It was so outlandish, he felt it looped back around to being sincere. Who could make up a story as ridiculous as this and expect anyone to believe it, unless it was true?

"If I truly am the Hero, chosen by fate or whatever, then what does that mean? I don't think I have any powers... unless I'm a 'prophet' like you said."

"You don't need to worry about all of that. Not for now." Claire said, patting her chest with a sigh of relief. "Jason, we are so fortunate to be the current descendants of the Illuminator who found you. I will make it my life's mission to train you. We will uncover whatever your powers are and seek the best way to elevate your prowess. In fact, you couldn't have come at a more timely moment. As we speak, tensions are rising globally. There are rumors that the demons are planning a major attack on humanity. Their power has grown over the years. They are also starting to fear our rising technological capabilities. The revelations we possessed Atomic Bombs held them back for half a century, but now their Emperors are growing bolder. We fear it is only a matter of time before Satan the Devil launches an attack that could kill tens of millions of humans."

Jason's expression became more severe. If all of this was true and Claire wasn't messing with him, then it was imperative he follow along with her plans.

And if it was all a load of bullshit?

Well... he had already planned to basically kill himself by entering cryostasis.

What did it matter if he did as she asked? If Claire wanted to torture some random orphan and mess with his head, then she truly had a lot of screws loose.

"Alright. I'll go along with all of this." Jason said slowly. "What should we do first?"

Claire smiled sweetly.

"How about we start with some lunch? I haven't eaten since breakfast."

"Err, I told the Cryotek people I wouldn't eat anything-" Jason started to say, before pausing and realizing how ridiculous that statement was. "...Never mind. I guess I could eat a few bites too. What do you guys have here?"

"I think you will be pleasantly surprised." Claire said, turning to roll away from the conference table. "Our amenities are top notch. Come on! I'll show you."

And so, Jason did.

He followed Claire out of the conference room, embarking on the next crazy chapter in his life.

But nobody in that room had the slightest idea how drastically the world was about to change...

January 13th, 2021. 4PM. Illuminati Haven.

Jason Hiro sat at a table inside a recreation center located two stories underground. To his surprise, there were over a dozen children of varying races and genders playing around, ranging from ages ten to sixteen. There were also some older teenagers supervising them, sometimes joining in on the fun as they played party video games, board games, and card games. There was even a rock wall that one older boy, perhaps aged 17, was climbing.

Plainclothes personnel stood near the entrances, made food, or otherwise played with the children, but Jason knew there were armed guards nearby. Just in case.

As for Jason, he didn't feel any desire to join in. He simply glanced at Claire with a look of curiosity as she parked her wheelchair beside the table.

"All these children possess Heroic potential." Claire explained, gesturing in their direction. "Whenever Heroes rise, Lesser Heroes follow. However, even among the ancient records, there have never been this many humans displaying Heroic potential all at once. Thanks to our advanced Field Trackers, we've been able to find and contain as many humans as possible before other powers could, but we fear we've missed more than a few."

Jason frowned. "What do you mean 'contain'? I thought you said this wasn't a prison?"

"It isn't, Jason. But people with Heroic powers are dangerous. Some, more than others. But any metahuman can be subverted by Russian or Chinese agents. We have to watch out for the claws of other ancient organizations, too, such as the Freemasons, the Rockefellers, and similar birds of a feather. Some of these secret societies are more dangerous than others, and that's to say nothing of the angels and demons. If they obtain Heroically Empowered humans, it could lead to an Era of Disaster."

"The Freemasons and Rockefellers, huh?" Jason asked idly. "Don't tell me I have to watch out for Carnegies and Satanists and all sorts of other obscure groups too."

"Absolutely, you do." Claire nodded. "Don't get me wrong. Some groups are little more than minor cults. Others have vast influences and have stretched their hands deep into the coffers of powerful governments. All are, to varying degrees, our competitors, if not outright enemies."

Jason slyly glanced at Claire, but he didn't give voice to the thought in his mind.

And she thinks I'm just going to take her word that the 'Illuminati' has my best interests at heart? As if her society is the only true and correct one worth giving my allegiance to...

Instead, Jason pointed at one of the oldest boys, barely any younger than himself.

"So these kids, they're all Heroes like me?"

"Not quite." Claire clarified. "You are a Trueborn Hero. These children only possess the power they do because of your existence. They are Lowborn Heroes, with powers weaker than yours. But even so, a minor ability like 'entrancement' could prove dangerous if weaponized against their fellow humans. There are many instances, even recent ones, of humans rising up and secretly using their enhanced abilities to subvert the power structures of our species. These examples all demonstrate the insidious dangers they pose. It is essential that we educate and raise them to properly use their powers for humanity's benefit."

Claire gestured toward the 18 year old Jason indicated before. "Take Jerome, for instance. His ability is simple. He possesses a slightly enhanced physique. He has higher endurance, strength, and agility than someone his age without any training should possess. Right now, it's nothing too amazing. He can't swim faster than world-champion swimmers, he can't lift at the level of the professionals who've trained their whole lives, and he won't be making any new world records in track and field in the near future."

She continued. "But his strength is growing passively, all day, every day. It's slight, but definitely noticeable when we test him each week. He doesn't need to train. He doesn't need to work out. By simply existing, Jerome grows stronger every day."

"Then what if he works out?" Jason asks.

"He does do that." Claire answered. "It accelerates his growth, creating compound returns over time. If he trains day in and day out, I believe it won't be more than two or three years before he reaches the apex of what ordinary humans can achieve in most physical fields. And after that? He'll just keep growing stronger. Perhaps someday, he'll be able to fight and kill Demon Emperors with his physical abilities alone."

"Are Demon Emperors strong?" Jason asked.

"All demons are stronger than humans, depending on how you measure strength." Claire explained. "To understand why, you need to understand the demon maturation cycle."

"First," she continued, "demons are born from Broodmothers, which are giant ant-queen-like demonesses who spawn little creatures known as Imps. Imps are weak and stupid, but they can kill human children with ease. In that way, demon newborns are much stronger than human ones, though they pose little threat to our adults."

"Next, Imps can evolve after devouring a human soul. They can either become Grunts, or become Lowborn, which look extremely similar to human children and teenagers, minus the red skin and other demonic features."

Jason raised an eyebrow. "They eat souls?"

"Yes, and it grants them immense power." Claire explained. "They have an entire system in Hell for converting dead humans into souls, but that isn't important for right now. What matters is that you understand the different ranks of demons."

Seeing Jason's silent nod, Claire continued to speak.

"Demon Grunts come in all different types. There are Burners, Brutes, Seers, Warpers, and other sorts of specialized demons possessing one singular, holistic ability. This ability is often what defines their future growth after evolving to the next ranks. But Demon Lowborn are interesting, because they can vary quite drastically in their capabilities. Grunts and Lowborn can both evolve to the rank of Demon Lord by devouring ten human souls."

"Are Lowborn stronger than Grunts?" Jason asked.

"Not... exactly. As I said, their capabilities vary. Some Lowborn possess fine control of fire, lightning, hemokinesis, and other metaphysical powers. Some possess no abilities whatsoever! Unfortunately for those types, they are often seen as trash and end up becoming servants and slaves for higher ranking demons."

She shook her head before continuing. "In any case, an unarmed human will lose to a Demon Grunt or Lowborn all of the time. With modern weapons and body armor, the equation flips. An ordinary police officer can kill most Lowborn with ease, though the more extreme Grunts, such as the Brutes, will require specialized task forces to take them down."

"Seems some demons have all the genetic luck." Jason muttered.

"Demon society is anything but fair." Claire said with a sigh. "Even so, demons can still get ahead if they are psychopathic enough and willing to kill beyond what their superiors command."

"Anyway, after Grunts are Demon Lords. Demons need to consume ten human souls to become Lords, and at that point, they become serious threats to ordinary human forces. One Demon Lord cannot waltz into a military base and wreak havoc, but they can certainly cause chaos in the streets of major cities, leaving tens or even hundreds dead. Some Demon Lords in the past have even deliberately raced to kill as many humans as possible, hoping to swallow their souls and ascend to the next rank."

"You seem like you're about to tell me that doesn't usually work out." Jason says.

"It doesn't." Claire confirms. "Because, you see, Demon Lords require 1,000 souls to become Demon Barons. And let me tell you, Demon Barons are extremely dangerous. Each one typically possesses a body stronger than peak humans. Some can grab tanks and throw them through the air, or use psychic powers to level buildings. They can unleash lightning storms that disable all electric-based devices and weaponry, and so on. You absolutely must not trifle with Demon Barons. Each one is a powerhouse that requires a military platoon to deal with."

Jason's expression became unsightly. "What's next? Emperor?"

"No. After Barons are Dukes." Claire answered. "Dukes are unbelievably powerful. We haven't even made it to the level of Emperors yet, and already Dukes should cause you to suffer some sleepless nights. Humanity's only good fortune is that the number of Dukes in existence are estimated to be under five hundred, but each one of them is a city-level powerhouse. A single Duke, if angered, could potentially wipe Tokyo off the map. They could glass the skyscrapers, vaporize humans en-masse, and cause immense pain and suffering."

She continues. "We are fortunate that the atomic bombs scared the demons away from causing any mass casualty events in the past seventy years, but during World War II, when our weapons were more primitive, Demon Dukes appeared infrequently and killed tens of thousands of our allied soldiers."

"I guess that means the Nazis were working alongside the demons then..." Jason muttered, looking away. "Really explains a lot."

Claire cocked her head. "No? The Nazis were a human element of evil. They were led by a corrupt tyrant who sought power for his own ends, plain and simple. Sometimes, humans can be just as vile to each other as demons are to us."

"Oh! That tracks too." Jason said, nodding.

Claire nodded back. "Anyway, to become a Duke, a Demon Baron must consume 100,000 human souls. This number is simply infeasible, outside a massive attack on humanity. For that reason, Demon Dukes are made, not born. One cannot become a Demon Duke by wantonly slaughtering humans. They can only do so if the true rulers of demonkind grant them Soul Pills, which contain the condensed essence of human souls. After ingesting enough of those, they will Ascend to Duke."

She sighs. "And then, after Duke, we have... Emperors. To become an Emperor, a demon need only ingest 1,000,000 souls. Considering the amount of power they obtain, this is a small price to pay, but the vast number of demons in Hell clamoring for their evolution ensures Demon Emperors cannot rise too often. Unfortunately, the boom in human population during the last two centuries has given demons all sorts of opportunities to grow their power. There are nearly twice as many Emperors in the modern day as there were before the 1700's, to say nothing of the overall demon population."

"It's kind of weird." Jason said. "Imps need 1 soul to evolve, then 10, then 1,000, then 100,000, than 1,000,000. Why is it a soul multiplier of 10, 100, 100, then 10 again??"

Claire shrugged. "That's just how it is. Considering demons cannot evolve beyond the Rank of Emperor, we assume one million souls is the saturation point. Any souls beyond one million are useless."

She paused.

"In any case, Demon Emperors are the final, and the most powerful of all foes. In total, there are perhaps twenty Emperors in existence across all the Seven Hells, though we must account for the possibility of Emperors who evolved in secret, or Emperors whose ascendencies were kept hidden from us by the demons. It is never wise to reveal all your cards to your enemies, so we always assume there are more demons we do not know of. Emperors, by themselves, can wipe out entire human armies. Each one has their own special abilities that make them extremely difficult to suppress, let alone kill. In the past, only Trueborn Heroes have been able to reliably go toe-to-toe with these behemoths."

"So if there's no Hero, humanity is just screwed?" Jason asks.

"Actually..."

Claire pursed her lips. Then she looked into the distance, in the general direction of the children playing.

"The angels are our enemies. But they are also our allies. Woe be unto me to say this, but the angels are a necessary evil. Their leaders, the Archangels, possess enough power to stand against the Demon Emperors, at least to some extent. And aside from the Angels, we also have allies among the Titans. Some of those Titans are actually humanity's strongest pillars to lean upon, especially when a given Era does not have a Hero at its forefront."

"Titans?" Jason asks.

"Gods, as far as humans remember them." Claire explains. "Entities towering tens, even hundreds of feet tall. A Titan's height is proportional to their strength. The largest ones are more than capable of standing against one or more Demon Emperors with ease. They are not invincible, but they can give humanity a fighting chance if the demons one day rise up in unison to attack on all fronts."

Claire patted her legs and sighed deeply.

"It is imperative that you master your psychic powers quickly, Jason. Seers may not possess the strongest offensive or defensive abilities, but you can still prove instrumental in collecting intelligence on the demon's movements. If we know what they are doing, we can anticipate their attacks and prepare ahead of time."

"Do we even know my powers are psychic at all?" Jason asks doubtfully. "What if I can shoot fireballs or lightning or something?"

"Then we will determine that next. Come with me." Claire said, turning her wheelchair away from the table.

Jason nodded, then stood up and followed after her.

A few minutes later, after riding the Haven's elevator several floors downward, the two of them emerged into a pristine white hallway with mirrors in all the corners, allowing Jason to see armed guards up around the bend, no matter which direction he looked.

"The Testing Center is where we take individuals who possess Heroic potential and test them to discover the full extent of their abilities. At this point, I'll have to see you off. Doctor Eliezer Redbaum will be the one to test you today."

"I see. Then, thank you, Claire." Jason said, gently squeezing her shoulder. "This has made me feel a lot more assured about what I need to do, moving forward."

"It is my pleasure to serve this generation's Hero." Claire said, nodding her head lightly while touching his hand. "If you have any further questions, just ask anyone here to call me and I'll come running."

"Or rolling." Jason said, jokingly pointing at her wheelchair with his thumb.

"Yes, or 'rolling'." Claire replied with a bemused smile.

She didn't take his joke badly, which made him feel better.

Not long after, Jason and Claire separated, and a tall lanky man with narrow metal glasses stepped out of an office up ahead. His hair was curly and somewhat messy, making him look the part of a nutty professor. His pale skin made it seem as if he hadn't stepped out into sunlight in months, perhaps even years. He looked a little ghoulish, in Jason's eyes.

"Ah, Mister Hiro? How good to meet you!" Eliezer Redbaum said, enthusiastically shaking Jason's hand with an excited grin. He almost seemed like a kid who'd unwrapped the newest game console on Christmas. "To think I'd finally meet this generation's Hero! How does it feel to be the Chosen One? To be the luckiest human on Earth out of all the billions of others?"

Jason blinked. "The Chosen One, huh? I hadn't really been thinking about it like that. All this stuff about angels and demons seems rather dire. I feel as if a heavy load has been placed on my back. It's not particularly enjoyable."

"Ah, that's Claire for you! All doom and gloom, but with a pretty smile to make it a little more appetizing!" Eliezer chirped. "But never mind all that. This is the FUN part, Jason! Now you get to find out just what sort of abilities you have! Your mana output is higher than anyone else here, so it's certain you're the real deal!"

Eliezer paused for half a breath, then gestured behind himself. "Come along, come along! In here, we'll start testing all the known abilities to see what you can do."

Jason's mood did perk up a bit. "You've tested many people before me?"

"This institute was founded hundreds of years ago, by the great Madam Mildred!" Eliezer explained, as he and Jason entered the testing room. "Before that, we simply located Heroes and protected them, but we had no formal library of known abilities. Lady Mildred was truly a genius! She created a whole division focused on cataloging every known demon, angel, and Hero power to try to match newly discovered Heroes to all their abilities. This allowed us to discover hidden powers inside a few Trueborn Heroes who otherwise might have missed them. Can you imagine only knowing you can lift ten-ton objects, but not that you could fly? What a pity it would be to overlook such a useful ability!"

Jason looked around the testing room. Inside, there were Tesla coils sparking electricity between them, a series of burners outputting different colored flames, vats filled with multiple unique types of liquid, and countless other things he could hardly make sense of. Aside from Eliezer, there were a half-dozen other scientists, all looking at Jason with expressions of adoration.

Their gazes... made him feel a little uncomfortable. He felt as if he'd become an object of worship, leaving his humanity behind in the process.

"Come, come, have a seat." Eliezer said, pushing his glasses up his nose.

The thirty-something year old man quickly darted to a nearby table, then smoothly wheeled it over to Jason. He placed two chairs down, one on each side, then took a seat across from Jason while holding a book in his hand. He held up the book so Jason could only see the cover, which was entirely blank, then he opened it up.

"Alright, the report states that you might possess some form of precognition. This first test will assess if that is the case. To start, what is the first image on page one?"

Jason blinked. "The first page? Inside the book? I can't see it."

"Perhaps not with your eyes, but look inside yourself. Try to touch upon your mind's eye, Jason." Eliezer said. "Look not at the book, but at the fabric of reality surrounding it. Barring that, try to read my mind and see the image I see. Alternately, maybe you can peer a few seconds into the future, witnessing when I turn the book around to show you the image?"

Jason frowned. He closed his eyes and concentrated, then he opened them again. He squinted. He pressed his lips together until he metaphorically felt smoke coming from his ears.

"...Nothing." Jason finally said.

"Ah, I see. Well, it's a picture of an orange tabby cat." Eliezer said, turning the book to show Jason. He turned the book back around. "Alright, now that you understand the general theme of the book, perhaps you can guess the picture on the second page. What could it be?"

Jason once again frowned. He closed his eyes and concentrated, trying to tap into something deep within his psyche...

But ten minutes later, Eliezer closed the book and set it on the table.

"I'm sorry." Jason said, feeling slightly guilty.

"It's no matter. You possess the Heroic Aura, so you absolutely must have a Heroic power. There's no reason to feel glum, my boy. We'll just have to keep testing! Follow me over here, if you'd please."

Eliezer led Jason over to a nearby table, one with multiple different flames jetting upward a few inches, all of them glowing a variety colors.

"These flames are all attuned to various levels of heat. The colors are a result of how hot they burn." Eliezer explained. "Let's see if you possess any pyrokinetic capabilities. Try reaching out and manipulating the first flame. It's the weakest one and should pose no problem."

Jason smiled awkwardly, but he held no belief he had any fire-related powers. Something told him this was a total waste of time.

Still, he tried. And he tried some more.

Minutes later, this test, too, concluded with a complete failure.

"Say... you guys aren't, like, fucking with me? Are you?" Jason asked doubtfully. "This isn't all just a bunch of mumbo-jumbo? How do I know there are people who have magical powers? I've pretty much been taking you at your word, here."

Eliezer cocked his head. "Oh? Claire didn't give you a demonstration? Let's rectify that."

He motioned to one of the other scientists, a lady with curly blonde hair. "Leslie, can you go ahead and fetch Brian for me? Let's put on a little show for Jason here."

"Sure! Just give me a moment." Leslie replied.

She left the room, and Jason engaged Eliezer in some small talk until she returned with a 16-year-old boy in tow. The boy looked clean-cut, with swept-back black hair. He even wore an excellently-fitting suit. When he smiled at Jason, the Wordsmith found that he looked a little familiar somehow, but he couldn't understand why his brain registered the similarities.

"Brian, this is Jason Hiro, the Trueborn Hero of our generation. And Jason, this is Brian Bozzard, our resident firecracker. He's a pyrokinetic with a flair for the snazzy. His father is actually an oil baron from the south coast, and Brian here caused a little accident with his powers when they first awakened."

Brian looked away awkwardly for a moment, but quickly reverted back to his charming smile after recovering his bearings. "Good day, Jason. Yes, ah, there was a bit of a mishap. I may have accidentally burned one of our mansions down... ahaha... but luckily, we managed to evacuate everyone in time. Father was sure to clean up the rubble quickly, and we moved to our summer home for a few months. Then these splendid researchers picked me up before the public could learn of my abilities. That was a year ago, and the rest is history."

Jason bobbed his head, then smiled. "It's good to meet you then, Brian. So, you manipulate flames? Can you show me?"

"Most certainly! Thanks to the efforts of the Illuminati, I've mastered my abilities, but they continue to grow more formidable day by day. Here, take a look."

Jason expected Brian to walk over to the burners and extract fire from them, but to his surprise, the teenager instead ignited an orb of flame in his palm and expanded it to the size of a softball, then held it in place for a few moments, smirking at Jason's wide-eyed expression.

"How about that? Still a skeptic? Still think magic is a bunch of 'mumbo jumbo'? I assure you, dear Jason, that is not the case! My abilities are the real deal!"

Brian absorbed the fireball back into his hand harmlessly, then he took off his suit's overcoat and handed it to one of the assistant researchers before walking into a nearby testing chamber, where he proceeded to summon and fling fireball after fireball, blasting the reinforced wall with a barrage of them, unleashing a stream of wide flames, then a concentrated beam of fire afterward.

"Haaah!! Hahaha, how about that, eh, Jason? Are you impressed yet?"

"Definitely impressed!" Jason exclaimed, before turning to Eliezer. "There really is such a thing as magic! So that must mean I have magic of my own, right?"

"Certainly!" Eliezer replied. "I've yet to hear of a Trueborn Hero with no powers at all. I'm sure if we keep testing, we'll uncover your hidden potential. Alright, thank you for coming down here, Brian. We'll be sending Jason back up later. The two of you can talk then. Maybe you'll even become fast friends!"

Brian emerged from the testing room with a smile on his face. After putting his coat back on, he bowed slightly. "I look forward to making the acquaintance of the Trueborn! I've been waiting to hear about him, after seeing the results of his exploits. Jason, do be a good man and drop by later? I'll introduce you to some of the girls."

Jason chuckled softly. "Haha... thanks for the offer. I'll drop by, but there's no need to play matchmaker. I'm a faithful man. And the girls here all seem a bit young for me."

"A bit young?" Brian asked, raising an eyebrow. "A few of them are eighteen already. You're eighteen too, right? And what's that about being faithful? Don't tell me you're married already?"

Jason hesitated. "Yeah I'm- well no, I'm not married. I think. Right, I'm not married yet. Sorry, don't know why I said that before... and I'm only eighteen, yeah."

Eliezer and Leslie exchanged glances, raising their own eyebrows at Jason's strange words. Eliezer made a mental note to look into whether or not Jason had any marital attachments. It wouldn't be good for him to leave behind a secret wife out there, looking for him, asking difficult questions...

Brian left, and Jason remained behind. Eliezer sat the young man down, smiling at his energetic expression.

"Well, you seem a bit more eager to uncover your Heroic powers. No longer a skeptic, I assume?" Eliezer asked.

"I'm ready. Hit me with all your tests." Jason answered.

"Okay then. Let's go ahead and continue where we left off." Eliezer said. "After fire manipulation, we'll try testing the other classical elements of water, earth, wind, light, dark, yin and yang, and several others. Then we'll test out your technological capabilities, then your physical attributes."

"Can we start with the physical ones?" Jason asked.

"Hmm... well, the order doesn't really matter. I suppose so. Let's start by testing how much weight you can bench press, how many pull-ups you can do, your running speed, your stamina, and other such things. Having an exhaustive physical examination done before the metaphysical stuff is beneficial too."

Hours later, Jason sat on a bench, tired as hell. He wheezed and gasped for breath, looking between the researchers a short distance away as they graded his... less than impressive physical stats.

Eliezer came over to him, a mild look of disappointment on his face. "Well, you're no Jerome, that's for sure. You under-performed compared to the average 18 year old Asian-American, with strength and stamina much lower than anticipated. If you're a physical-type Hero, your abilities have yet to come in. How about you rest for a bit, and we'll bring the combat instructor inside? He can test you on your ability to learn martial arts."

"If my physical strength sucks, then what's the point of that?" Jason asked.

"Don't be so quick to judge." Eliezer said with a chuckle. "Several Heroes, Trueborn and Lowborn, have been known as masters of physical combat. Buddha was the most noteworthy, as he was known as the God of Combat. He didn't even have to fight demons to kill them, but when he did fight, he left them broken and despondent. His physical strength wasn't impressive at all, but he mastered countless forms of martial arts, weapon-wielding, and many other such things. There's always a chance you could become like him, given time!"

Jason stuck out his lower lip and nodded, in a not bad sort of way. "Yeah, that could be good. Alright, give me a bit and I'll go in there. Can I have some water?"

"Sure thing. In fact, why don't we get you a couple sandwiches?" Eliezer asked. "You've been working hard for a few hours now. It'll be bedtime in the Haven soon, so we'll get you up to your room when the time comes."

"Sure. Thanks." Jason answered.

After a bit more time passed, and Jason rejuvenated his somewhat tired body, he stepped into a new training arena with an older man in his forties. The man appeared to be a gruff, American military-type with tattoos on his face, a shaved head, and a long beard.

"We'll start with some simple sparring." The man said, as he reached to his side and grabbed a bo staff from some weapons on the wall. The entire staff was covered in heavy padding to deaden the blows and inflict as little material damage as possible. At the same time, the instructor grabbed a staff of his own. "I'm Lieutenant Dobson, former Marine. Joined the Illuminati as their external combat advisor. Don't worry, kid, I'll take it easy on you. You just follow along with my commands and see what you can pick up."

Jason took the bo staff from Dobson. At the same time, his eyes metaphorically flashed as he rapidly analyzed the weapon's weight and length, estimating its reach and other critical parameters that would affect his performance.

"The first thing to do-" Dobson started to say, before pausing to stare in bewilderment as Jason started rapidly spinning and twirling the staff around his body.

Not just Dobson, but the other scientists outside. Eliezer's mouth gaped open as he watched while Jason started spinning the staff around his body with a level of fluidity even Dobson would struggle to replicate! Dobson himself had a solid but fundamentally shallow knowledge of how to wield over a dozen weapon types, and he could immediately tell Jason was not an amateur in the slightest.

"What the..." Dobson said, pausing to scratch his head. "Kid, are you one of those national prodigies who has been training for a karate competition since you were six, or something?"

Jason instantly brought the revolution of his staff to a stop by slamming its butt on the ground. "No. I don't know how I'm able to do this. It just... feels natural to me. Like I've practiced for years, or something."

Dobson immediately sobered up his expression. He stopped looking at Jason like an inexperienced youth, as he'd already faced a couple of kids who surprised him during the last couple of years.

"Hmm. Never mind what I was saying before. I'm going to focus entirely on defending myself. Try to get me onto the ground, and we'll see what you know from there."

"Sounds good." Jason said, looking at the older man confidently. "We'll do that, then."

Jason suddenly lunged forward, spinning the bo staff around his body. He revolved it from back to front, and Dobson spun his staff into position, blocking the attack.

But the instant Jason's staff connected, it fluidly bounced away, spun behind his body, and snapped toward Dobson from the opposite direction.

Shit! He's fast! Dobson thought, moving to block the attack, but failing to react quickly enough. He was rewarded with a light thump against his ribs, but luckily, Jason's padded staff didn't hurt him.

Immediately, Dobson raised Jason's threat level immensely. My god! He's a natural! I've never seen talent like this! Is this the power of this generation's Trueborn?!

In the other room, behind the plexiglass, Eliezer's jaw dropped even further. He could hardly believe his eyes.

Over the next two minutes, Jason began to systematically dismantle Dobson's defenses. He frowned, wondering why his combat instructor was so slow to adapt to his relatively basic attack patterns. Jason barely even put effort into his attacks, yet he was able to strike Dobson time after time after time!

Thankfully, the padded staff prevented Dobson from suffering any injuries, but after a while, the rhythmic smacking of his helmeted face, his ribs, his thighs, and even his legs started to hurt a little.

"Alright. Alright! I yield!" Doson exclaimed, quickly taking a few steps back.

Jason immediately brought his bo staff to a stop by planting its butt on the ground. He scratched his head.

"...Is there anyone other than you here who is talented with the bo staff? Could we bring in someone who's more... formidable?"

"I..." Dobson stammered, lowering his head in shame.

To think this teenager would have beat me black and blue if we weren't using training staffs. He's a monster!

"Jason," Eliezer said, recovering from his shock, "we can bring in an external instructor later. For now, why don't you try switching to another weapon type?"

"Sure." Jason replied. He put the staff back, then glanced at Dobson. "Are you okay?"

"I'm fine!" Dobson sputtered, slightly annoyed by the question. "Let's try sparring with swords. I'm more confident in my swordplay anyway. I trained with the Knights Templar for two years over in England."

"Whoa, they sound impressive!" Jason said, genuinely surprised by Dobson's statement.

Regaining a little bit of his adult authority, Dobson quickly puffed out his chest a little. "I'll say this; I wasn't much compared to the knights, but I learned to hold my own. If you ever want to learn peerless swordplay, their masters are the best of the best!"

"I'll keep that in mind." Jason said.

He and Dobson switched to holding wooden shortswords in their dominant hands, and a shield in their off-hands. Dobson also took the initiative to put on stronger body armor.

"Like before, I'll defend while you attack." Dobson said, now speaking through a heavier helmet. Unlike with the bo staffs, the wooden swords were not padded and could cause painful injuries if they struck bones or vital organs.

A few moments later, Jason attacked! This time, Eliezer and the others became truly filled with awe.

Jason's sword snapped forward with the speed of a cobra. He feinted left sometimes, and right others. He swept at Dobson's legs and kept him guessing, but most importantly, he struck Dobson's body armor time after time, leaving Dobson unable to counter him at all!

Dobson at least managed to deflect more of Jason's attacks thanks to being able to defend both sides of his body with his sword and shield. But unfortunately, due to the sword's lighter weight, Jason was able to speed up his attacks, cutting, chopping, and stabbing at vulnerable locations time after time!

"Damn! Shit! Ouch!" Dobson cursed, feeling a mixture of awe at Jason's skills and sheer disappointment in his own. Even if this brat trained with the sword since he emerged from the womb, he shouldn't be this good! I feel like a chump compared to him! What the hell??

Through his actions, Jason casually threw Dobson's earlier bragging about being trained by the Knights Templar back in his face. Dobson couldn't help feeling stifled by now. If Jason was just as talented with other types of weapons, Dobson would really be out of luck! Swords and staffs were his bread and butter, and his other weapon masteries were far shallower.

Finally, Dobson gave up once again, yielding to Jason's skill.

"G-good fight." Dobson said, wanting to puke blood from shame.

"Were you holding back the whole time?" Jason asked, confused. "I kept thinking you were making deliberate openings so I'd rush in and you'd punish me, but you never did..."

"Holding back?!" Dobson sputtered. "Who do you think I am, the great Buddha himself? You're a monster, kid! An absolute monster! If you've never actually trained before in your life, then color me impressed. You're clearly a combat specialist with a bright future ahead of you."

Jason smiled. "Well, thanks for the assist. I'm pretty tired now, so maybe we can pick up where we left off tomorrow."

"Yeah. We'll try other types of weapons, then." Dobson said, before adding, "And I'll call some people I know, see if we can get more skilled teachers in here. I'm nowhere near your level."

Jason shook Dobson's hand, and they went their separate ways.

After he exited the training area and the ex-marine went his own way, Jason turned to look at Eliezer expectantly.

"I don't know if you're a Seer, but you're absolutely a potential combat god." Eliezer said, his expression solemn. "The skills you just displayed were terrifying. You're a natural. If we focus on training your body to match your combat strengths, you'll become capable of taking down Barons single-handedly. Most demons are lazy bastards with middling combat skills. They rely on brute force and their raw strength to overpower weaker opponents. If you can dismantle them with your weapon skills, you might even become as fearsome as the Hero-King Arthur himself."

Jason yawned. "Well, that sounds exciting. But for now, I'm exhausted. Mind showing me to my room?"

Eliezer shook his head and chuckled. "I've never seen someone tire themselves out by beating someone else's ass. Alright. I'll have Leslie take you up to your room. Leslie, would you be a dear? I need to make some phone calls and update Miss Rothschild on our prodigy here."

"It would be my pleasure." Leslie said, smiling cheerfully at Jason.

Twenty minutes later, she led the young man up to his room. They opened the door, and Jason found a surprisingly large apartment much bigger than the one he owned before, with a comfortable-looking king-sized bed covered in multiple comforters, a TV with several game systems plugged into it, and a computer much fancier than anything Jason had owned before.

"This is Room 1A, the first in all the dorms." Leslie explained. "As the Trueborn, you get the best housing here, but the other kids aren't far behind. We want all our talents to be comfortable. You can access the internet if you want, but outside communications are strictly monitored. This is a top secret location after all, and all your computer activity will be logged."

She glanced at him and coughed. "If you, ahem, look up any adult content... just be aware our people will be watching. Since you're over 18, we won't stop you, but..."

"Right, right. I get it." Jason said, massaging his forehead. "Point being; I'm being watched."

"When you say it like that, it sounds a bit dystopian. We only want to ensure your safety." Leslie quickly clarified. "There is a demon named Ose who is her species' foremost, and currently only technomancer. She is adept at monitoring the entire internet, and can easily uncover crucial clues about targets once she becomes aware of them. You must beware 'Ghost.' She is extremely dangerous and considered a Class S modern threat. We're lucky she is only a Baron and the other Emperors don't value her talents highly enough, or humanity would be in grave danger of having all our technology subverted."

Jason nodded. It didn't seem like Leslie was making this information up, and he didn't want to discount her fears.

"Noted. I'll mind my business, then. I'm gonna take a shower, then hit the hay."

"Wonderful. Have a great night, Jason." Leslie said, before waving to him and closing the door.

Some time later, Jason washed the grime off his body, stumbled over to his bed, and flopped onto it, sagging into its warm embrace with a moan of pleasure. It was possibly the most comfortable thing he'd ever laid on.

Before long, he drifted off to sleep.

Then, he began to experience the strangest of dreams…

Part 613: Back to the Future

Inside the Labyrinth Core, Demon Deities Melody, Yardrat, Auger, and Kristoff continue to remain standing in place, their feet adhered to the ceiling. With the low spirits of the humans having been uplifted by the return of Jason Hiro, the three Deities currently positioning themselves as humanity's enemies also find themselves in an awkward spot. It would be one thing if the Wordsmith was dead. They could continue to bully the humans and taunt Melody repeatedly. But with him still alive, all their plans have to change, and nobody is more cognizant of this fact than Auger himself.

The former Emperor strokes his goatee thoughtfully, his aged face making him appear as old and decrepit as Agares once did. Even so, age is merely a mirage for the demons. Since they are all immortal, any signs of 'aging' are likely a result of overextending their life-force by overusing their powers. Naturally, they can still die from this, but few demon elites have ever been so stupid as to die in this way.

"So." Melody says, smiling at the other Deities. "What were you saying earlier? I seem to have forgotten. Perhaps you can refresh my memory?"

Kristoff sighs. "Sharmur is yours. Do as you see fit with it. We will not interfere. Consider your pet humans fortunate that their protector returned, alive and well."

"How did he survive, anyway?" Yardrat asks, looking at Melody suspiciously. "Did he die and then revive? If so, how? The Lazarus Tower fell before anything else. The Psions would not be so stupid as to leave it standing."

Melody shrugs. "The Wordsmith is smarter than you think. He probably faked his death, just to see what would happen."

"No." Auger counters. "I very much doubt that. Why would he allow Tarus II to be blown up? If he's as smart as you say, he would surely have protected it from the Psions. I believe he did die, then he revived. It might explain how Beelzebub became a Demon Deity. Perhaps Beelzebub Ascended through some pre-planned mechanism between the two of them."

"Beelzebub does have the ability to revive from death endlessly." Yardrat points out. "The little bastard is an unkillable cockroach. He is likely the strongest Cosmic in the Milky Way at this point. Even if Founder Dosena had not met such a terrible fate, I doubt she would be able to outlast a truly immortal Cosmic in a battle of endurance."

Melody's smile turns to a slight frown. Even she has no idea how Jason came back to life, but based on the other Deities' words, they seem to be thinking Beelzebub's power had something to do with it.

Their guesses certainly don't seem implausible. Once he ascended to a Cosmic, all bets were off the table. Beelzebub could already regenerate from death within seconds as a mere Emperor. Surely, as a Cosmic, it wouldn't be outside the realm of possibility for him to resurrect other fallen entities, including the Wordsmith.

If so, then the loss of the Lazarus Tower won't affect humanity nearly as adversely as the demons expected. Beelzebub might even be reviving humans en-masse as they speak!

The other Deities wear troubled expressions. This at least gives Melody a hint of delight. The fact they're visibly alarmed by Beelzebub's power means they won't dare act too far out of line. They have to consider what sort of swift and violent retaliation he might bring about if they piss him off.

"You know," Melody says playfully, "while you lot bitch on and on about the humans, it occurs to me... the Volgrim don't have a Middle Cosmic protecting them anymore. Isn't that interesting?"

Auger sneers. "Who knows what measures those ancient monsters have at their disposal? Even if they lack a Middle Cosmic, they might be able to uplift a High Psion to the position quicker than we expect. Their 'weakness' could easily be a charade. For Founder Dosena to so foolishly trigger an Akashic backlash despite knowing the price she'd have to pay, it makes one's mind wander. We'll worry about the Volgrim later. We still have the Plague to deal with."

"Indeed, that we do." Melody says, putting this discussion to rest. She glances down at the humans, noting the distinct split between people traveling to Pixiv and people traveling to Sharmur. "We're all friends here, right? So I can speak to you honestly?"

Auger smirks, but says nothing to refute her words. He simply nods.

"What happened at Maiura was a wake-up call." Melody says solemnly. "Forget your feelings toward the humans for a moment. Do you understand just how fucked we are? Humans, demons, and Volgrim alike. The Plague is not a mindless organism hellbent on feeding. It is an intelligent super-entity capable of thoughtful planning and deception. It waited to reveal its mass-psionic capability until the moment humanity was least able to counter it. It nearly swallowed another Executor. The Kolvaxors it now possesses are Low Cosmics that fight like Bottom Cosmics but have bodies as durable as Middle Cosmics. If those Kolvaxors come for Sharmur, Yardris, Hell Harbor, or any of demonkind's other worlds, none of you will be able to resist. Being a Middle Cosmic means nothing in the face of such massed power."

Her words cause the other Deities to cease their smirking and gloating.

Indeed, every word she speaks is 100% correct. Their petty disputes mean nothing in the face of this galaxy consuming super-organism.

"Speak plainly." Kristoff says. "What are you proposing? A ceasefire? A treaty?"

"Why not? We only have to deal with Jason Hiro now. Not Hope, and not Neil Adams." Melody points out. "Jason wants all the Sentients to unite against the Plague. He has already demonstrated his willingness to bolster demonkind's members."

"That was before the Volgrim betrayed him." Yardrat points out. "We have no idea what sort of headspace he's in now. You saw how panicked he was earlier? He was practically frantic with fear, looking for his wife. We can't assume the old status quo will remain."

"You should at least entertain the idea." Melody says. "In fact- hmm?"

She pauses, then looks off into the distance, her cosmic vision piercing the Labyrinth walls. At the same time, the other Deities also look in that direction as well.

"Wait, is that…?" Kristoff starts to ask.

"It is." Auger answers, his expression darkening.

Inside the Labyrinth Core, the humans continued moving through the two portals to Pixiv and Sharmur in a relatively calm and orderly manner. Naturally, even with the Wordsmith having returned, many people were broken-hearted and despondent. A massive number of humans perished on Maiura and Tarus II, leaving only 180,000 alive in Realspace. Among those, roughly 120,000 chose to go to Sharmur, while 60,000 migrated to Pixiv. This alone showed how Jason's survival affected the survivors, giving a bit of spirit to those who would rather thrive under his future rule.

Among the people choosing to migrate to Sharmur is a surprising pair of faces; Cassiel and Soleil. The two angels naturally disguise themselves as ordinary humans, but they opt to go to the demon-controlled world of Sharmur rather than the friendlier world of Pixiv.

"I must protest..." Soleil hisses under her breath to Cassiel. "You will be in greater danger there if the demons uncover your identity. I do not believe 'Melody' will allow you to live if she knows who you are. She is not a true ally of humanity."

"Perhaps not." Cassiel says stoically. "But I am a human at heart. Transformed into a lesser angel, yes, but still one who aligns with her people. There are going to be more humans on Sharmur than on Pixiv. I can draw upon a higher volume of faith energy and convert it into a weapon to protect them."

Beside Cassiel and Soleil, another woman slinks along, her face and body covered by a shawl.

Lily Brown, the daughter of Benjamin Brown.

"Cassiel was really brave, staying as long as she did to save people." Lily whispers. "I agree with her judgment. Humanity needs more people to stand out in these dangerous times. I believe in her."

"She is not strong enough to protect herself." Soleil argues. "We are dancing on a knife's edge. We can't risk the last living angel's life just to save some ordinary humans!"

"These 'ordinary humans' are my kin." Cassiel argues back. "I don't look at myself as an angel, anyway. I am still a human at heart. My life is no more valuable than theirs."

"But..." Soleil starts to protest.

"No more buts, Soleil. I need you to trust me and protect me from the greatest dangers. Are you still willing to do that?" Cassiel asks, looking her construct companion in the eyes.

Soleil lowers her head, looking a little glum. "Of course. We'll do it your way, then-ah!"

Soleil's eyes suddenly narrow. She grabs Cassiel and pushes the angel behind herself protectively, then looks to the great doors of the Labyrinth Core with fear and hatred in her eyes.

"It's... him!"

Cassiel's heart turns cold. She quickly peeks out from behind Soleil, her bravado from earlier disappearing in an instant.

"No... it can't be..."

The three women watch in horror as a figure slowly strolls toward the Labyrinth Core, causing the soldiers positioned outside to shriek in fright.

"G-Gressil! It's Emperor Gressil!"

"All soldiers to battle stations- wait, what's he dragging behind him? Two bodies...?"

"Oh my god! NO! Say it isn't so!!"

The soldiers lose their composure. These battle-hardened warriors scream in horror as Gressil walks right past them, unbothered by the weapons they've trained on him, and the terror on their faces.

"Haha. Hello, humans." Gressil says, his rumbling voice reeking of smugness. "It's been a while. Come, take a look. I brought presents."

The moment Gressil steps into the Core, he pauses for half a breath, then casually chucks two bodies from his right and left hands out into the central area, causing a few humans nearby to jump back in fright. When the bodies land, their eyes shrink to pinpricks.

"J-Jason Hiro? Phoebe?!"

"Dead?! Oh, divines! They're dead!!"

"Aaaaaiiieee!!"

Jason Hiro's cold corpse stares forward unblinkingly, as does his wife's. The two former leaders of humanity lay immobile on the ground, their very existence sucking all the remaining hope from anyone who looks upon them.

On the ceiling, the Demon Deities stare at the corpses in disbelief.

"Unbelievable! How could he..." Melody exclaims, her heart turning to ice.

"Why didn't he do this sooner?" Yardrat snarks. "Well, if those two are the real deal, then it looks like a lot of problems just got solved!"

"What an... interesting development." Auger adds, a cold smile playing upon his face.

Gressil swivels his head from side to side, soaking in the fear and terror of the humans around him.

"Haha. Anyone having doubts? I've been planning this for a while, you know. I waited until the Hero was busy fighting his clone. Then I killed his wife. When he came to get her, I used the emotional shock to strike him when he was most vulnerable. All that power, and the Wordsmith still fell to me. Haha."

Gressil grins evilly, looking up at the Deities with a smile that gives even them pause.

"That's right. I killed the last living Wordsmith. Now humanity has no Hope, and it doesn't have Jason either! Haha."

Many people drop to their knees. They lose their will to live, staring hollowly at the body of the Wordsmith in despair.

At this moment, Linda and Chadwick push through the crowd, having been alerted by the commotion. Despite the tragic sight before them, Linda remains stoic. She looks at Jason and Phoebe for a moment, then turns to look at Gressil.

"You don't really expect us to believe these bodies are real?"

Her words cause an ember of hope to flicker in the hearts of those present. Many people turn to look at her, then they look at Jason and Phoebe's corpses.

That's right. These remains could be fake!

But Gressil merely laughs. "Haha. You can examine them yourselves. They're the real deal. I've already accomplished my goals. Haha. Hahahaha... like I'd resort to such a petty trick. I'm sure these cadavers have some value to the Demon Deities, but they won't make a move on them. Not without my permission. Isn't that right?"

The moment the words leave Gressil's mouth, Auger flickers from the ceiling and reappears beside the Emperor of Chaos, his arms crossed. He grimaces slightly, marveling at how Gressil's chaos energy somehow manages to affect even his Middle Cosmic power. Likely, this is because his Astral Avatar only possesses strength at the Demon Emperor level.

"We will not interfere. It would be disrespectful to desecrate the bodies of humanity's honored dead. But Gressil, tsk. How rude of you to kill the Hero without the permission of your superiors. You have truly soured relations between our species!"

Gressil sneers. "Oh, I do beg your pardon, great Deity. Haha. I'll be expecting a punishment most severe. Make sure you think carefully on what it will be. It must be proportional to my crime, after all."

"Indeed. We'll discuss this matter later." Auger retorts, taking no action to punish Gressil beyond some hollow words. He vanishes from the spot and reappears on the ceiling, leaving the Emperor of Chaos alone once more.

Gressil smiles. He looks at Linda, then his gaze flicks toward a seemingly random part of the crowd.

In that moment, Cassiel's heart metaphorically freezes solid. She starts to shiver as she meets Gressil's gaze, finding herself unable to look away.

But a moment later, he averts his eyes, returning his attention to Linda.

"Terribly sorry about leaving this mess on your floor. Well, at least I found a good drop-off spot for my trash. Haha. Make sure you bury the bodies somewhere these naughty grave-robbers won't find. I'll be on my way now."

"Demon." Linda hisses. "Do you think we'll let you leave here alive?!"

She raises her fist, and all at once, a thousand guns train on Gressil's position. However, nobody shoots, as she hasn't given that order.

Gressil pauses. He cocks his head and frowns.

"Oh? You want to attack me, after I so generously returned these trinkets? I gave you the opportunity to bury the Wordsmith instead of leaving him in a hallway for Hellhounds to feast, and this is how you repay me?"

Linda's eye twitches.

Every fiber of her humanity screams to gun Gressil down, but unfortunately, logic warns her not to.

Gressil is not helpless. He is a Demon Emperor, and a powerful one at that. Even with humanity's enhanced weapons, they might not be able to take him down.

Additionally, she is all too aware that the Deities are watching. Melody alone is no match against three powerhouses at her level, and Beelzebub isn't here to help either.

Most importantly, Auger's words confirmed that he and the other Deities were extremely pleased by Gressil's actions. By eliminating the Wordsmith, Gressil completely neutered humanity's threat. They will almost certainly lose the ability to stand up to the demons as time drags on.

Attacking Gressil could spark a flame that would swallow all the humans still present in the Core. Countless precious civilians would die, lowering humanity's numbers even further!

Linda's eyes flicker with rage. Losing Neil, then Hope, then Jason, and even Phoebe, as well as hundreds of thousands of other humans has her experiencing levels of rage she never could have fathomed a week before. But now, those emotions threaten to jeopardize everything humanity has left!

Just as Linda is about to give up and tell her soldiers to lower their weapons, a voice rings out from the crowd.

"You! You fucking BASTARD!!"

A demoness pounces from behind the wall of humans, her eyes feral with rage. She snaps a long, stretchy arm at Gressil's neck, aiming to decapitate him as her fingers turn to knives.

Gressil instantly teleports to the side, dodging the attack. He looks at Belial, his smile vanishing as he senses her volcanic hatred erupting into the heavens.

Of all the Emperors in the Labyrinth, she is, without a doubt, the one who poses the greatest threat to him.

After all... she nearly killed him the last time they fought!

Belial's knives stab into the ground. She yanks herself forward, then alters course by relying on her strength to continue striking at Gressil's new position. He quickly teleports away, and she hits the floor running, immediately locking onto his second position. With so many humans taking up space, Gressil can't maneuver freely even in such a wide-open area as the Labyrinth Core.

"Ahhh!!"

Belial roars. Her arms swiftly start to morph and stretch, snapping at Gressil faster than any human's eyes can react.

Gressil teleports once, twice, three times. He flickers around rapidly, narrowly evading death as Belial's highly attuned demonic vision easily tracks him by the void left wherever his body teleports. Instead of sensing his demonic energy, she senses the point where all the mana in the room is at its lowest, and uses that to quickly lock-on to his spatial coordinates.

She pursues him relentlessly, forcing him to escape back into the Labyrinth.

"Come back here, you dead dog!" Belial screams. "Is that all you can do, RUN?! You took her from me! YOU TOOK HER!!"

Some of the human troopers look on, wanting to at least shoot at Gressil to try and assist Belial, but without Linda's express approval, they don't dare.

Linda watches as Belial and Gressil disappear further into the Labyrinth, eventually disappearing from sight. The Labyrinth quakes and rumbles each time Belial's fists smash its walls, making the humans and monsters still in the Core shudder at the thought of the fates they'd meet if she came after them.

Eventually, Linda lowers her fist, causing the troopers to lower their guns, and she gestures toward Jason and Phoebe's bodies.

"Recover those two." Linda says, her tone empty. "We'll verify their identities and determine what to do next based on whether those bodies are really... them."

The humans fall silent, watching as four troopers each hoist up Jason's body, then four more retrieve Phoebe. The moment of silence extends outward as people lower their heads, respectfully acknowledging the passing of their Hero and his wife.

Jason was humanity's muscle. Phoebe was its heart.

With the two of them gone, many people can't help but fall into despondency.

How can they possibly continue, knowing that they no longer have a Hero on their side?

Linda, seeing the pain on everyone's faces, comes to a swift decision.

She takes a step forward and raises her voice.

"Brothers. Sisters! I know this is hard for all of you to accept. It pains me to say this... but both Wordsmiths are likely dead. Phoebe Hiro joins them. And Neil Adams, my husband, and our great Commander... he is also dead!"

She remains silent for a moment, swallowing heavily before continuing to speak.

"But do not give in to despair! Have you forgotten?! We still have Heroes! Hope raised a fine family! His sons and daughter will carry on their father's work! No doubt, they will need time to grieve, and it is a fact that their powers are not as versatile as those of the Wordsmiths. But a Hero is a goddamn Hero! Many Heroes have existed, and all of them have left an impact on our species!"

Linda closes her eyes and pounds her fist against her chest, beating it in grief.

"Even if all our Heroes die, it does not matter. Do you hear me?! IT DOES NOT MATTER!! Because we are humans! We improvise! We adapt! We overcome! Even when the odds are stacked against us, we resist those who think themselves our superiors!"

Acting on pure instinct, Linda raises a finger to point at the Deities on the ceiling above.

"Do you hear me, you villains?! You may think you've won the war, but we STILL have Champions! And if you kill them, we'll just raise more! We will never give up! Because we are humans! And humanity ALWAYS rises to fight its greatest threats! Unless you exterminate us entirely, you will never go to sleep thinking it will be smooth sailing for your evil, disgusting, demonic machinations!"

Linda's words lift the spirits of the humans listening. Countless soldiers record her speech from a myriad of angles and broadcast those words to the soldiers in the back, who in turn broadcast it to the platoons that migrated to Pixiv and Sharmur. They, likewise, broadcast her words to the rest of the people on humanity's new makeshift homeworlds.

"So go ahead!" Linda says, her face contorting into a jeering expression. "Laugh at us! Mock us! Revel in our pain! But someday soon, you will eat shit when we spray it in your faces! Humanity will not be bullied by any of your ilk! We will have the last laugh, no matter how long it takes or how many lives we lose in the process! And someday... someday we will conquer this entire galaxy! When that day comes, you'll wish you had stood beside us from the beginning!"

Her words evoke a chorus of cheers. The humans inside the Core raise their fists to the sky, then extend their middle fingers toward the Deities above them.

"Screw you, demon bastards!"

"Humanity will reign supreme!"

"We're not afraid of a bunch of bullies!"

"Humans never give up!!"

As the humans chat various slogans, Melody's heart sinks.

Linda, you idiot! If the Deities choose to attack, they'll massacre you all! I can't protect you by myself!

But to her surprise, Auger and the others remain mute. They simply cross their arms and look down on the humans, unbothered by their protest.

"Hmm. I pray that made them feel a little better." Yardrat says. "But what a shame. I've looked at the remaining Heroes and found them lacking. A bunch of brats consisting of a musclehead, a fancy magical-girl, and a boy barely out of diapers. They're no threat to us."

"We only need to worry about two people." Kristoff says, directing a smug smile at Melody. Naturally, the other entity he is thinking of can be none other than Beelzebub.

"It was a fine speech." Auger says, surprising the others by praising Linda. "Who knows? It may even have some positive, if otherwise minor effects. Now, Melody, if you'd be so kind, I tire of these insects taking up valuable space in my Core. Tell them to scurry off to their safe-worlds."

Melody grimaces. Luckily, the other Deities didn't lash out, or the humans would truly be in for a world of hurt.

"Yeah. Sure. I'll do that." Melody says, disappearing from the ceiling and reappearing in the crowd below.

Auger strokes his goatee thoughtfully after she departs.

I do wonder if Hope's children will ever pose us a threat, though. Perhaps we should try finding their location, just in case a... preliminary strike... would best suit demonkind's interests.

Meanwhile, Belial chases Gressil at top speed. She tears down the Labyrinth halls, sticking to him like a fly on a turd. Even when Gressil teleports hundreds of feet away and reappears inside a tunnel disconnected from the one Belial is in, she merely smashes through the Labyrinth's ultra-hard walls like a brute, reaching Gressil's new position within seconds.

"How troublesome!" Gressil growls.

Belial pounces at him, but this time, when he teleports, he changes his strategy and reappears within arm's length of Belial, taking her by surprise.

THUMP!!!

Gressil smashes his fist against Belial's face, pounding her into the side of the Labyrinth walls. While he might not be as strong as her, he is absolutely a powerhouse among the Emperors, and he manages to put her lights out for a second or two.

Instead of continuing his successful attack in the hopes of killing her, Gressil takes the chance to put some serious distance between himself and Belial. He teleports away and withdraws his Chaos Aura within himself, making his presence much smaller. Then he turns invisible, hiding within his illusions while sending out fake versions of himself to travel down multiple hallways. By the time Belial recovers from her momentary stun, she has already failed to lock-on to Gressil's new position.

"No! NO! You coward!!" Belial yells. "Come back here! Face me like a man!!"

But Gressil does not oblige. He fades away, and before long, Belial loses track of him entirely.

A minute later, her rage deflates, turning to despair. She heals her wounded face, then slumps against the wall of the pitch-black hallway, her heart turning to stone.

"Phoebe... Phoebe... I... I'm so sorry... I failed you. I should have been there for you."

It wasn't long ago that Fiona recalled Belial to Chrona. There, she learned that Phoebe had died during teleportation, likely perishing due to the sudden increase in time dilation speed. But hearing Gressil speak, Belial thought at the time he must have somehow been the one to kill her instead!

It's only now, after her rage has cooled, that Belial realizes the truth of the matter.

"No... it wasn't Gressil." Belial whispers, her eyes flickering with insight. "Phoebe did die during teleportation. That scheming... he didn't kill Phoebe. He lied to everyone in the Core... but to what end? If he didn't kill Phoebe, then does that mean he didn't kill Jason, either? But... Jason is dead! Does it even matter if Gressil killed him or not?"

Belial grabs at her hair in frustration. Unable to think clearly, all she can feel is grief swallowing her soul from all directions.

Phoebe was everything to her.

She loved Phoebe. She loved her as much as she loved Satan, all those years ago.

She would have killed for Phoebe. She would have died for her.

But now Phoebe is gone.

"I... I don't have anything left to live for." Belial mutters.

She lays there, in the hallway, her back slumped against the wall.

Minutes pass. Belial stares ahead, her expression vacant, tears slowly trickling down her face.

But eventually, Belial regains her composure. She staggers to her feet and wipes her tear-filled eyes.

"Phoebe loved humanity. If... if she's gone... then I'll love humanity too."

"And... there's still Timothy. I can't let him grow up motherless. I'll take care of him. I'll do what I can to raise him right. That's what Phoebe would have wanted."

Belial looks up at the ceiling.

"That's the least I can do to honor her memory...!"

Part 614: Bubble Worlds

Beelzebub flies around inside the massive void comprising the Cube's internal world. Having lost his Cosmic power, he is unable to traverse stellar distances efficiently, but the Phoenix conjures a miniature incarnation to attach to his back and speed up his travels. Additionally, the inside of the Cube is oxygen-rich even outside the bubble-worlds made by Jason Hiro, so Beelzebub has no trouble breathing.

The Overlord of Fission speeds from bubble world to bubble world, chatting with the Phoenix all the while.

"So each bubble world has a different 'focus'?" Beelzebub asks.

[They do.] The Phoenix answers. [Jason wants to ensure that there are a large variety of pleasant biomes, but also harsh ones for people who enjoy that sort of thing. Also, since these bubble worlds were originally intended to be used for military training, there are 'Deathworlds' designed for maximum danger. It is more than possible for humans who enter to die due to freezing cold, scorching heat, deadly insects, and other hostile creatures. They are only intended for short-term military training, and thus there are not too many of them.]

"We have 100,000 humans inside the Cube." Beelzebub says. "How much room do we have for further population increases? Are they going to run out of space?"

[They would have.] The Phoenix replies. [But that was before my Ascension. Now, the Cube is no longer in danger of running out of energy. My Cosmic Reserves are more than enough to build additional worlds capable of housing a billion humans or more. That is also before we factor in the modifications Jason Hiro has made for the humans themselves to supply power to the Cube.]

"What sorts of modifications?"

[Jason adjusted the Cube so Faith Energy could empower it. He originally intended for the humans across the cosmos to power the Cube from anywhere they reside, but those inside the Cube are the most energy-efficient, since interstellar distances decrease Faith's yield.]

The Phoenix continues. [Thus, the humans here will empower the Cube in a near-infinite positive cycle. The more humans there are, the more Faith Energy they will provide, thus granting me the power to expand the Cube's bubble worlds and house more of them. At that point, in the unknown future, we will have to worry more about the Cube's physical space limitations. I estimate that if I were to efficiently maximize all the available space, the Cube could easily house one or more trillions of humans at once.]

"Trillions..." Beelzebub muttered. "The Cube in many ways reminds me of the Labyrinth."

[Tell me more about this 'Labyrinth.'] The Phoenix requests.

"The Labyrinth houses the vast majority of demons that currently exist." Beelzebub obliges. "I don't know how many of my people there are, but there are certainly trillions of them, plus many more living on various worlds across the Milky Way. Hell slowly expands over time based on how many demons are inside, as well as monsters and other life forms. Traveling from one corner to another is an arduous journey even for a Demon Emperor. Most low-level demons and monsters stay within their own zones or shuttle around using the power of Warper demons."

[Most intriguing. Much has changed since my consciousness was last fully aware of the happenings inside the Milky Way.] The Phoenix says, accepting his explanation without prejudice. [There is still so much for me to learn. Tell me, what of the angels? Do any still remain among the living?]

Beelzebub continues to fly toward the nearest bubble-world, but his movement slows a little at this question.

"I'm afraid not. During the Kolvaxian invasion on Maiura, Archangel Uriel was the last of her species still among the living. The Plague took her, along with the souls of her brothers. Now, there are no angels left in the galaxy. They're... extinct."

[Including my Creator, Camael?] The Phoenix asks.

"I don't know when Camael died, but I believe it was at some point during the Energy Wars, 100,000 years ago." Beelzebub answers. "I'm sorry."

The Phoenix seems to mentally shrug. [I am a creature of rebirth. The end of life is a normal part of existence. Tell me more about these 'Kolvaxians'. What manner of creatures are they?]

"I don't know a lot about them. Nobody does." Beelzebub replies. "They're alien life forms. Faceless abominations. They appeared about 90,000 years ago, some time after the end of the Energy Wars. They can travel underground quickly, and often appear on planets as singular entities before grabbing other living creatures, pulling them underground, then returning with those creatures having been turned into Kolvaxians. They swallow and devour other life-forms, assimilating them into their ranks. And right now, they're winning the war for the Milky Way."

[Hmm... and you say they are considered a Plague?] The Phoenix asks.

"That's how the Volgrim refer to them." Beelzebub affirms with a nod of his head. "The Kolvaxians are a plague that devours worlds, turning them into Hives filled with millions or even billions more Plaguehosts. Recently, they devoured the body of one of Jason's creations, an entity named after King Arthur, called Artoria. When they did that, their bodies became extremely powerful. Every individual Plaguehost now possesses a body as durable as a Middle Cosmic."

[Best Friend, would you mind sharing your mental images of these Kolvaxians with me?] The Phoenix requests politely.

"I can do that?" Beelzebub asks.

[Naturally. We are still connected on a spiritual level, after all.]

"Oh. Well, I'd be happy to. How should we go about it?"

After following some instructions on how to alter his psyche, Beelzebub transmits a large amount of mental imagery to the Phoenix, and she falls silent for a short time.

[...This 'Plague' is fascinating.] The Phoenix eventually says. [And terrifying. What an impressive species. Extremely formidable, able to adapt the bodies of assimilated hosts into empowerments for the species as a whole. I daresay they are nearly a perfect life-form.]

Beelzebub sneers. "Perfect? They have no free will. All things absorbed by the Plague become mindless monsters. They're human-shaped ants."

[Perhaps. But that does not make their biology any less impressive.] The Phoenix says. [Ah, we have nearly reached the first bubble world.]

She gestures with her wing toward a bright-blue 'planet' smaller than Earth's moon, Luna. Beelzebub raises an eyebrow when he observes just how tiny the little world is.

He adjusts course, and within a minute, he arrives near its upper atmosphere. It barely takes him seconds to drop through the thick cloud cover and land on the ground below.

He finds himself on a coastline where waves artificially splash against the shore, despite the fact that this false planet has no moon to cause such tides. When Beelzebub looks up, he realizes that the sky above him is completely false. He cannot see the Cube's inner world at all, only a magical mirage that hides the true nature of reality outside this bubble world.

Sensing his thoughts, the Phoenix explains. [Jason wants these worlds to feel as real as Earth itself. Thus, each planet has multiple enchantments placed upon them to simulate all the expected features of planets with nearby stars, moons, and other such things. This particular world is known as Antiqua, and is a water-world with only 40% of its space available to settle on. Its oceans are deeper than you might expect, extending a few thousand meters downward, with a rich variety of life-forms living in the aquatic depths. It is ideal for sea-loving humans to settle upon.]

When Beelzebub looks elsewhere in the sky, he spots a false sun shining down, informing him that the world even has a simulated day and night system in place.

"Jason really thought of everything, huh?"

[Not quite. I have noticed multiple minor issues, but I will work out those problems over time.] The Phoenix says.

Beelzebub starts walking toward the shoreline, where multiple trees sit with delicious-looking fruits hanging down from low-hanging branches. These trees have small but sharp spikes sticking out of their trunks, making climbing them an act of suicide. Anyone who tries will likely have their hands shredded and will bleed out and die before long.

"Say, Phoenix? It just occurred to me." Beelzebub says, as he walks into the forest, taking care not to cut himself on the spike-trees. "You're a Middle Cosmic now. Does that mean you can fight in my stead?"

[Unfortunately, I cannot, Best Friend.] The Phoenix replies. [My existence is presently tied to the Cube. I am unable to travel far without rapidly losing my energy. Additionally, I am not a combat-focused artifact. I excel at rebirth and flame manipulation of the 'life' type. I can create things easily, but destruction is outside my purview.]

"Then why was I, under your power, so strong?" Beelzebub presses further.

[Because you are a different sort of flame manipulator.] The Phoenix explains. [You are destructive and violent. In a hostile universe, this is not a bad thing. It means you are able to do things with your Cosmic power that I cannot.]

Beelzebub pauses his walking to tap his lower lip. "Could you infuse your power into me to empower me back to a Cosmic level? You know, in case the Volgrim return?"

[I could, but I would revert to my embarrassing, weaker self.] The Phoenix replies. [It would also adversely affect the Cube's operations. My lesser self was unable to properly manage the constructs within the Cube. If need be, I would prefer to use the Sentry Stars as our primary defensive weapons in the event of an enemy incursion.]

She pauses.

[You have nothing to worry about, Best Friend. In time, I have full faith you will regain your Cosmic power. This Cube is not weak at all. It was constructed by Archangel Camael near the peak of her ancient power, in absolute secrecy. Even Archangel Raphael was unaware of its existence. It is extremely sturdy and can easily resist the attacks of Middle and High Cosmics. Only Apex Cosmics pose it a real threat once I seal its entrance. Even they would need time to burrow inside and slaughter the humans within.]

"So there's no threat of a Plague incursion?" Beelzebub asks.

[Not unless someone grants a Plaguehost entry.] The Phoenix answers. [I pray nobody would be that foolish.]

Beelzebub nods. He continues walking, and before long, the tree cover parts to reveal several wooden houses with straw roofs built to insulate against the midday heat. Naturally, Antiqua is a planet controlled by the Phoenix and designed to be extremely moderate. It never faces extreme weather changes, hurricanes, or other such things, so raising families is quite easy here.

Beelzebub steps into the village and pauses to watch from afar. A group of children play in the dirt road some distance away, perhaps ten of them. The village itself appears rather primitive, but Beelzebub spots many signs of modern humanity lingering around the edges, such as the digital devices carried by some of the men and women walking around. Most importantly, Beelzebub notices additional signs of a recent surge of human population, due to the Phoenix rapidly teleporting humans from Tarus II to the various bubble worlds in a haste. Some of the houses appear brand new, and many are still being built at that very moment. Beelzebub also observes carpenters and architects hurriedly whipping up new homes for the unexpected migrants. Based on information from the Phoenix, this world only has a population of a thousand or so humans.

While the children play, the parents look extremely grim. They do not appear happy, and that is likely because they know at least some of the events that have played out in realspace.

Suddenly, one of the children cries out in alarm. Beelzebub turns to see a little girl pointing at him, her eyes wide with surprise. Not quite fear, but uncertainty, as she catches sight of the red-skinned visitor.

Seeing her reaction, several of the adults nearby turn to look at Beelzebub. They frown, then relax once they identify him.

"Beelzebub!" A man says, hurrying over. "You were teleported here too? What's the situation on Tarus II? Have you heard anything?"

Beelzebub looks at the man, but doesn't recognize him. This isn't surprising, since Beelzebub's face is extremely well known, while he comparatively knows almost none of the humans.

"You haven't heard?" Beelzebub asks, frowning slightly.

"Nothing. Nothing at all." The man says, his voice anxious. "When I was teleported, I expected to see my wife and son, but they never arrived. I'm going crazy waiting for news!"

Beelzebub's frown deepens. He looks around, observing several other men and women looking at him, waiting for answers.

[I have not told anyone that Tarus II was destroyed.] The Phoenix says, secretly transmitting her thoughts only to Beelzebub. [My lesser self lacked awareness of what happened, and now that I've ascended, I determined it would not be appropriate for me to do so. You are a better-known face with more credibility among these mortals. You should be the one to deliver the news.]

Beelzebub's frown grows even uglier upon hearing the Phoenix's words, but he doesn't address them out loud.

Still, his expression, and the long pause before replying causes many people's hearts to tighten.

"I'm... sorry." Beelzebub says slowly. "I don't know what happened to your wife and son. But I do know... Tarus II is gone. The Volgrim destroyed it."

"What? No! NO!" The man exclaims, his pupils shrinking to pinpricks. The strength leaves his legs, and he sags to his knees while grabbing onto Beelzebub's shirt. "Please, say it isn't so! Is my family dead? Did they get transferred somewhere else?! The portal network is down! We've lost contact with the other Realms!"

Beelzebub looks around in confusion. "Portal Network? Realms?"

"You must have just arrived." Another man says, his expression not quite as anxious as the first. "I am the leader of this village. Come with me."

Beelzebub follows him, and before long the small gathering of humans leads Beelzebub to a pylon with a magical blue crystal in its center sitting in the middle of the village.

"This device connects different Realms together." The village leader explains. "Last I heard, there were several hundred. By activating its magical matrices, we can walk between Realms to visit our fellow humans. Unfortunately, our Portal Node stopped functioning. Nobody here knows how to repair it."

Beelzebub nods. He walks over to it, and the Phoenix communicates with him in secret.

[To prevent the spread of panic, I temporarily disabled all the Portal Nodes. I can enable them again, if you'd like.]

Beelzebub nods, and the Phoenix proceeds to tap into the Portal Node, reactivating it once more.

"A-amazing! Emperor Beelzebub, you are truly impressive!" The village leader says, upon seeing the pylon activate.

"Please wait some time before traveling around." Beelzebub says. "I need to inform the rest of the humans about what has happened. Focus on building your village. Expect the newest arrivals to become... permanent."

The village leader's eyes lose some of their luster. He nods dimly and watches as Beelzebub summons a portal to a different bubble world, then passes through, allowing the portal to close behind him.

On this new world, a desert planet with multiple oases around, Beelzebub informs the people there of Tarus II's demise. Then, he travels to another world, and another, and another.

He becomes faster and more efficient, especially after learning that many Realms have members of Jepthath's Legion on them, and those members have already spread news of Tarus II's fall. He starts intentionally targeting worlds that no Legionnaires have been to, which saves him even more time.

When he arrives on one ordinary-looking world, a familiar face rushes over to meet him.

"Beelzebub! It's you!"

Beelzebub smiles. "Emperor Kiari. Are you well? I didn't expect to see you here."

"I'm not well!" Kiari exclaims, wringing her hands together. "Saul! Have you seen Saul? I can't find him, and it's been hours since I arrived here!"

"Saul..." Beelzebub says, his expression darkening. "Jason designated multiple high-value targets for extraction. You were one of them. Saul wasn't?"

"I... I don't know..." Kiari whispers, her face fraught with anxiety. "He was only an ordinary human... b-but he was Solomon's nephew! That has to count for something! Maybe Hope's Hall of Heroes picked him up?"

"Yeah. Maybe." Beelzebub says, glancing around. "Phoenix, can you find Saul on any of the bubble worlds?"

The Phoenix responds, this time projecting her words to Beelzebub and Kiari both.

[I am not familiar with this 'Saul'. If he is a mundane human, he will not have a mana signature I can trace. Let me analyze your memory of him, Beelzebub. I will see if I can locate him based on males of similar builds and appearances.]

Beelzebub nods. He transmits several memories of Saul to the ancient bird, and she in turn scans all the different worlds to look for the missing man.

Kiari glances at the miniature flaming bird attached to Beelzebub's back. "And she is...?"

"The Phoenix. She controls the bubble worlds." Beelzebub explains. "She's extremely powerful. She'll definitely find Saul if he's here."

"If he's here..." Kiari mumbles, trying not to act overly anxious.

Minutes later, the Phoenix speaks up. [I have identified twenty-four human males of similar builds and skin colors. Forgive me, but these mortals all look alike. Perhaps one of them is this 'Saul' you are looking for.]

She summons a phantasmal image of a man standing half a head taller than Kiari. The Emperor of Pestilence shakes her head. "No... not him."

Then, the Phoenix summons a different man. "Not him either."

"No, not him..."

"Close, but not quite."

"No."

"No..."

Kiari's voice starts to tremble. By the twentieth failure, her body also starts shaking.

Once all twenty-four men have come up negative, the Phoenix sighs.

[I was unable to identify any further males matching the description you gave me. I apologize. He is not inside the bubble worlds.]

"No!" Kiari cries, nearly fainting. "He can't be dead... can't be..."

"Don't give up just yet!" Beelzebub exclaims, quickly squeezing her shoulder as she sags against him. "There's still the Hall of Heroes, and also Chrona. Saul might be there. I refuse to believe Solomon would allow his nephew to die. Even if Hope died, Solomon would make sure to save Saul."

Kiari nods numbly, her movements lacking energy. Beelzebub helps her stand, and she touches her barely-visible pregnant belly.

"Beelzebub... you have to find him... he's my everything..."

"I will. Saul is a good friend." Beelzebub promises. "You just need to remain strong and keep hopeful. It won't do the baby any good for you to fall into a depression- and besides! He could also be in the Labyrinth! We have lots of places to search. So, chin up, woman!"

That seems to do the trick. Kiari regains some of her strength and pulls away from Beelzebub, smiling weakly at him.

"Th-thank you for... taking care of me. I'm sorry I'm so useless."

"Useless? Hardly. You did more positive things for humanity than I ever have." Beelzebub says, waving off her words. "Say, why don't you come along with me to the other bubble worlds? As soon as I can contact the other dimension hubs, I'll give you the good news."

"Okay. Thank you. I'd like that." Kiari says, her face brightening up a little bit.

Meanwhile, Beelzebub resumes his mission; to seek out all the different Cube Realms and inform the remnant humans of the fate that has befallen their species.

Only time will tell if his mission bears fruit...

Part 615: Entering Sharmur

Inside the Labyrinth Core, the number of humans has dwindled significantly. Already, of the tens of thousands who were huddled inside immediately following the destruction of Tarus II, less than half remain. The others have already filed through one of the two Warpgates leading to Pixiv and Sharmur.

Demon Barons and Dukes stand inside the Core on the peripheries, their expressions solemn, as they watch the humans filing outside. As subordinates of the Deities, these demons might love to hurt the humans, but they cannot. They know well that humanity has at least one Demon Deity on their side, as well as a few Emperors. Belial herself sent Gressil scurrying away in a panic not half an hour earlier, and the humans still have Kiari and Leeroy on their side, to say nothing of Beelzebub.

The Demon Deities have not held back. Already, rumors of Beelzebub's frightening ascension and massive power spike have begun to spread.

Demon Emperor Crow watches from behind the Sharmur Warpgate, her expression ugly, as a pair of Barons behind her whisper conspiratorially.

"For reals! I heard he smashed apart ten planets and sent the Volgrim packing."

"Beelzebub? I mean he's strong, but there's no way he became a Deity. That's crazy talk."

"I thought so too! Only Diablo could turn Emperors into Deities, right? And he's dead now. But no, this comes down from the top. Beelzy broke through the power barrier all on his own."

"Man, since when did it become so easy to break through? I heard the Emperors spent 100,000 years trying and they only ever failed. Then Wolfram made it, died, and now every Joe Blow is becoming a Deity!"

Crow's irritation finally boils over. She snaps her head to the side and shouts at her two subordinates. "Caw!! Both of you, shut it! I don't want to hear another word about that blasted Beelzebub!"

The two Barons lower their heads, looking contrite. "Y-yes, Emperor Crow."

Dissatisfied, Crow returns her gaze forward, grumbling to herself under her breath.

"How did he do it?" Crow mutters. "Damned Beelzebub. Ascending like it's a measly party trick. I sit here, conduct rituals like a damned clown, and he gets blown to smithereens only to come back stronger than before. Outrageous. There's no karma in the universe."

Crow's gaze flicks around the crowd. Suddenly, out of the corner of her eye, she spots a pair of human women. She looks at them for a moment, feeling something might be slightly off about them. That feeling passes, and her eyes move on.

Meanwhile, inside the crowd, one of those human women feels a chill go down her spine. The feeling of a powerful pair of eyes falling on her makes her blood turn to ice, but then the gaze vanishes, and she breathes a little easier.

"Is something wrong, Cammy?" Her companion asks. "Your heartrate has spiked noticeably. Are you experiencing a panic attack due to the presence of so many people?"

"No, Serra. It's nothing like that." Cassiel says, tightly clutching the Heaven's Shroud hidden under her white dress. "I... I felt that a powerful entity was looking at me. An enemy."

Soleil quickly looks around the crowd of tens of thousands of people, but she doesn't notice anyone unusual. "Emperor Belial scared Gressil away. It is unlikely to be him, though I am still keeping my eyes peeled."

"It wasn't him." Cassiel says quietly. "I don't know who it was. But the gaze felt... familiar."

Soleil stands a little closer to Cassiel and wraps her arm around her protectively. The two continue to wait as the crowd slowly shuffles forward, with people entering one of the two Warpgates leading to Pixiv or Sharmur.

Eventually, a small commotion rises up behind the rear of the crowd. Cassiel turns around to see Emperor Belial returning through the Core entrance, looking a little depressed but also entirely uninjured.

"Seems she drove Gressil away." Cassiel mutters.

"Based on her solemn expression, she failed to kill him." Soleil replies. "Unfortunate, to say the least. As long as he's around, you'll always be in danger."

"Why did Belial attack him, anyway?" Cassiel asks.

Soleil's eyes shine for a moment as she rapidly calculates the various possibilities.

"Based upon information I've collected since my creation, there is a 54.3% chance that Gressil's statements about killing the Wordsmith and his wife incited Emperor Belial into a rage. She was publicly seen many times alongside them, and appeared to have close relations with both. It is likely she was a close friend of Phoebe Hiro in particular."

"So she was angry about losing someone she loved." Cassiel says, nodding slightly. "She was able to drive Gressil away. Is Belial... strong?"

"You do not know of her strength?" Soleil retorts.

"I... know she's a shapeshifter." Cassiel says. "And she fought during Stormbringer. But aside from some information Raphael told me long ago, I'm not clear on her limits."

"Physically speaking, Belial is publicly acknowledged to be the strongest of all Emperors." Soleil explains. "She was more than capable of putting down Bael at his peak, and even Emperor Crow was unable to match her strength. Crow possesses superior defenses as a result of her armored feathers, but Belial's 'True Succubus Form' rivals them in equal measure. In a match of pure strength, it is said that Belial wins every time."

"But when we met her at the hospital, Belial said she lost to Emperor Ose." Cassiel points out. "If she's so strong, then...?"

"Strength alone does not dictate victory." Soleil points out. "There are many such cases throughout history. The angels never should have lost to the demons, but a combination of arrogance and naïveté regarding the demons' capabilities led to their slow erosion of power and ultimate defeat. Ose was a bad matchup for Belial."

A minute passes. Cassiel remains quiet, thinking to herself about a great many things.

Then, she turns and starts to pull away from the crowd, making Soleil raise an eyebrow.

"My lady? Is something wrong?"

"No. Not exactly." Cassiel says. "It is simply... I have avoided demons like Belial for a long time. But looking at her past history, she seems to have changed greatly over the last six years, and likely the 100,000 before then. I think... she could prove a valuable ally."

"She is a demon." Soleil says simply.

"She is humanity's friend. She has proven her loyalty time and time again." Cassiel counters. "Come along."

Despite her misgivings, Soleil simply nods. She follows along as Cassiel makes her way to the back of the crowd. There, Belial stands, surrounded by ordinary humans and even a random Demon Baron on humanity's side. Cassiel hesitates when she sees the Baron, but only pauses for an instant before gently gliding through the throng of people toward Belial.

"Um... excuse me. Excuse me." Cassiel says quietly, as she draws within earshot and reaches toward Belial.

Belial, seemingly in a daze, snaps out of it and glances around, meeting Cassiel's eyes. "Huh? What is it? Oh... you?"

Despite having met Cassiel and Soleil at the hospital some months before, Belial only recognizes them when Cassiel subtly reveals her Heaven's Shroud by pulling it from her blouse for a moment before quickly tucking it back inside. Belial's eyes flicker with realization.

"Sorry, it's just, I was wondering if we could speak, Lady Belial." Cassiel says softly.

"Call me Samantha." Belial says, smiling faintly. Her smile disappears, and she carefully glances upward toward the ceiling, where the astral projections of the Demon Deities stand, upside-down. "I was... about to head to Sharmur. Would you like to join me there?"

"It'll be a while before the crowd is finished transferring." Cassiel points out.

"I never worry about crowds." Belial says confidently.

She touches Cassiel's arm, nods at Soleil, and then starts weaving her way through the bunched-up humans. Cassiel and Soleil follow her, and within a few minutes, they pass through the gate to Sharmur.

Arriving on a new world is always a shocking experience. When Cassiel and Soleil pass through, they arrive on an Earth-like planet that is superficially similar to humanity's homeworld, yet distinctly different from it in countless ways.

The first thing Cassiel notices is the smell. A musky, wet, tropical odor permeates the air, making her forehead crease as she tries to identify the alien smells barraging her nostrils. Strange bugs the size of dragonflies buzz around in the air a hundred feet above the ground, driven back by a faint but distinct high-pitched noise produced by various magical devices, designed for humans and demons to be able to ignore for the most part.

Naturally, demons, with their more sensitive hearing, will be more irritated by these noises than the comparatively simpler humans, but compared to allowing these giant bugs to pester them, the tradeoff is worth it.

What surprises Cassiel the most are the three giant moons visible in the sky above Sharmur. Unlike Earth, which only had one, Sharmur is quite stereotypical for paradise-class worlds in the Milky Way, as its number of moons strongly correlate to the average number most have, at four. These moons are not lifeless either. One of them appears to be colored green and blue, another hotspot of life, habitable by Sentients, though currently populated only by ordinary creatures and game.

Cassiel looks around in a daze, finding herself standing atop a tall temple, rising nearly twenty stories aboveground. Shaped like a pyramid with its top cut off, this temple is Sharmur's Warpgate Nexus, a place built by the Volgrim hundreds of thousands, if not millions of years ago. Four statues of ancient Volgrim Ascended stand at the corners of the Nexus, each one holding their palms out while facing the north, east, west, and south. Their presence seems to state that the Volgrim forbid unauthorized creatures from coming, though whether that had any effect on the Kolvaxians when they attacked a year earlier seems unlikely.

"Over here." Belial says, gesturing to Cassiel. "Come with me."

Cassiel hesitates, momentarily fearing this is a ploy to trap her and Soleil in an isolated area so Belial can kill them. But a moment of thought reassures her that this concept makes no sense for the Belial who has been with humanity for the past six years, so she simply nods and follows along.

The demon, angel, and black hole construct arrive at the edge of the pyramid, where a long staircase awaits, leading twenty stories straight down to the ground. Various statues of famous living and dead demons line the walkway, along with handrails so people can more easily ascend and descend without losing their footing.

"Where are you taking us?" Cassiel asks.

"Somewhere safe." Belial says, a hint of warning in her voice. "Beware. The shadows have ears."

Cassiel nods. She and Soleil follow after Belial, and thirty minutes later, they arrive in a ruined city that has already begun reconstruction. Formerly the capital city of Sharmur, known as Murax, this city was devastated by the Kolvaxian attack, and many of its famed buildings and sights crumbled to rubble. Cassiel's expression dims visibly as she and Soleil walk past countless humans wearing rags, uniforms, and whatever else they can scrounge up, all working to slowly clear away the rubble.

"Before I joined the Wordsmith and his fellow humans, I often visited Sharmur." Belial says, as they walk. "I've always liked this world. The Hell of Isolation treated humans well. Not like slaves, but like trusted subordinates, or perhaps beloved pets. They could never entirely be equals due to their power differences and the restrictions placed by the 'Overlords', but Shax and Murmur sought to lead a world where all could be treated well, regardless of their species."

Cassiel looks at Belial's back as the Demon Emperor leads her toward an unknown destination. "You were Satan the Devil's wife. Why do you care so much about humanity?"

"I have a different perspective from my fellow demons." Belial says, after thinking for a moment. She doesn't look back at Cassiel as she speaks. "They see humans as cattle. Food to empower themselves. But I was a Demon Emperor from the moment my people met the ancient dragon. I never felt the hunger for power that the lesser demons did. Perhaps that gave me a chance to look at the relationship between humans and demons from a more detached perspective. I found the cruelty and violence to be... repugnant."

Belial pauses. She spots a small hut, relatively intact, and currently abandoned. She inspects it for a moment, then steps inside. Cassiel and Soleil follow her.

It doesn't take a genius to realize that humans once lived in this small clay-built abode. At only ten feet high and a hundred feet of square internal space, it's barely big enough for one or two people, made evident by the single bed covered in dust tucked in the corner. A small wood-fed stove in the back, a table, and some chairs are all that remains as proof humans once lived here. No longer among the living, devoured by the Plague, not even pictures remain of the hut's former residents.

Belial dusts off a chair and sits at the table, heavily plunking down in it while exhaling softly. Cassiel sits across from her, while Soleil remains standing, due to there only being two chairs. She doesn't mind, as she never feels fatigued anyway.

"So you grew to care for humans?" Cassiel asks.

"Satan and I had a complicated relationship." Belial says evenly. "I loved him. He loved me. But... I did not share his hatred of the angels, the humans, or the Titans. Many times, in order to cause mayhem, he would send me into human palaces, disguised as a dancer, a handmaiden, or even a... personal servant... for the male rulers. I bewitched them, led them into traps, and Satan killed them. He toppled countless governments and kingdoms this way over humanity's long history, and was rarely found out."

"You killed those men?" Cassiel asks.

"No. Like I said, I led them into traps. It was always Satan or one of his lackeys who did the killing."

Belial pauses, then shakes her head.

"Actually. I did kill them. Indirectly, but I was their executioner. I always tried to excuse my actions by deflecting blame, but the truth was, I took the easy way out for my conscience by letting others do the dirty work. If I hadn't set up those men, they would have died of old age."

"Perhaps." Soleil retorts. "Or they could have been assassinated through other means. One cannot assume they would die of old age simply because you did not kill them. Powerful people always have many enemies."

"Mere platitudes." Belial says resting her cheek on her palm. She places an elbow on the table and absentmindedly starts drawing circles in the dust. "My point is that I'm a demon. I've killed people, even if not with my own hands. I'm just trying to make up for it now."

"So you want to be a better person, then?" Cassiel asks pointedly.

Belial doesn't immediately respond.

She stares at the dust, continuing to twirly her finger around it and draw increasingly larger circles.

"I don't know what I want anymore. Phoebe is dead. She's all that was sustaining me. I failed to protect her. I don't even know if she died from sudden time dilation, or Gressil."

Belial takes a minute to explain the mechanics of time dilation to Cassiel. Surprisingly, Cassiel understands everything and even elaborates at a few points, demonstrating her solid understanding of science and physics.

"Time dilation sickness is a serious matter." Cassiel confirms. "I hadn't thought about it before, but it makes sense. The transition from higher to lower temporal speeds, and vice-versa, those would assuredly cause adverse reactions in someone unprepared. The fact she was pregnant only increased the risk factor."

"Phoebe wasn't pregnant." Belial corrects. "She gave birth months ago."

"Oh. Well, my point stands. Gressil... probably did not kill her."

"Probably?" Belial asks, raising her eyes from the table to meet Cassiel's gaze.

The two stare at each other for a moment.

"Well. There's always a chance." Cassiel says, her voice lowering. "Especially when it involves him."

Belial chews her lower lip. Then she looks away.

"You're the Daughter of Heaven."

Cassiel's eye twitches. Belial's words are not a question, but simply a statement of fact.

"Yes."

"So you're the one who killed Emperor Red Raven?" Belial asks.

"I am." Cassiel answers.

"Then you are in a dangerous situation." Belial concludes, raising her head from her palm. She rests both arms on the table and looks at Cassiel with a surprising amount of tenderness. "All the Archangels are dead. Raphael, Michael, Gabriel, Camael, Uzziel, Uriel, and the most ancient ones, too. The ordinary angels have long since passed into memory. You are the last member of their species, and you're a Lazarite. You're more human than angel."

Cassiel nods. "I never truly felt like the angels accepted me or my fellow Lazarites. That is a... fair assessment."

"A lot of demons would like to capture, torture, and kill you." Belial says evenly. "A lot of them. Especially Emperor Crow."

Cassiel winces. "I... fought Crow recently. In the Queenie."

"The what?" Belial asks.

"The Queen Network. It's a virtual battlefield made by Amelia and the fairies." Cassiel explains. "You... haven't visited it?"

"No. I don't play games." Belial says. "But you fought Crow there? So she knows you're alive?"

Cassiel quickly shakes her head. "I posed as Uriel, but I did end up using my Lazarite powers. She mistook me for Camael."

Belial scoffs. "Crow isn't stupid. She knows Camael is dead. And since Uriel is dead, you can't go to the 'Queenie' anymore. If you do, she'll uncover your identity. She'll come for you, and she'll kill you."

Cassiel's eyes harden. She grits her teeth and looks down at the table.

"...I know."

"Is that an 'I know' meaning you won't go anymore, or are you implying a different meaning?" Belial presses.

"Gressil captured me after the end of the Energy Wars." Cassiel says quietly. "He... tortured me. Abused me. Raped me. For tens of thousands of years. He broke me in ways I couldn't fathom. I thought I would go insane, especially when that awful aura of his kept invading my mind. But, for some reason, I never did. I held onto my sanity, even when I wished I wouldn't. It only made things worse. He broke my spirit, broke my body, and made it so I couldn't even speak."

Tears well up in Cassiel's eyes. Soleil softly rests her hand on her shoulder.

"I... I felt so weak. So useless. More than anything else, I felt like a failure. How could I, the so-called 'Daughter of Heaven', have failed so miserably that I couldn't save anyone? I couldn't even take my own life. He made sure of that."

She pauses for a moment to wipe her eyes.

"After... after the Wordsmith rescued me, I thought I could never be whole again. I was terrified of every shadow. I was so scared, so traumatized, I couldn't breathe sometimes. It hasn't been long, you know. It hasn't been long since you and the others broke me out."

Cassiel grits her teeth again.

"But... but I just can't! I can't keep hiding away, scared of whether or not that bastard will come to take me away! He's already shown himself to me twice, you know! Twice! He's taunting me! He wants me to feel anxious, to fear him! That sick bast- he gets off on it!"

"So you want to fight back." Belial says.

"I do! I DO!" Cassiel exclaims. "I don't want to be weak! I don't want to be helpless! I don't want to cower in fear just because Crow might come after me, or Gressil, or one of those horrible Demon Deities! I am still sane. I am still capable of doing things to help my species, the humans, even if I'm not as powerful as I once was."

Cassiel heaves a great sigh.

"I don't want to be afraid anymore, Samantha. That's why I approached you."

"You want me to protect you? From Crow and Gressil?" Samantha asks.

"I have Soleil on my side. She can put up a fight against them." Cassiel says, gesturing to her companion. "But I don't know if she would win against Gressil. Sometimes, she departs my side to run an errand or perform a task. That leaves me vulnerable. If I ask you to protect me, that doesn't solve the problem. It simply obfuscates it a little more."

Cassiel leans forward. She balls her hands into fists and presses them against the table, looking at Belial intensely.

"You're one of the strongest Emperors, right? I want you to help me. To train me. I need to become powerful again. I need to become as strong as I used to be- no, to become stronger! I need to surpass my former identity. I need to become capable of protecting myself. Only then will I be assured I won't EVER have to fear these ancient demons again!"

Belial leans back in her chair.

She looks at Cassiel with surprise.

"You want me to... train you? But... you're an angel. You only need faith energy to become stronger."

"Faith energy empowers my body. But it's not my body that needs strength; It's my mind." Cassiel explains. "I flinch in the face of danger now. I didn't do that 100,000 years ago. I'm angry, but my psyche is still ruled by fear. I cannot become a pillar for humanity if I'm scared of creatures slithering in the dark. That's why I need your help."

Belial looks away.

She thinks for a minute or two, but it doesn't take her long to come to a decision.

"I need to visit Chrona. I promised myself I would help raise Phoebe's son, Timothy. I can't leave my nephew alone. Every minute we stay here, he ages another 250 minutes. I'll miss his entire childhood if I take a few days to respond."

"Chrona is that place Jason Hiro made, right?" Soleil asks. "Could we go with you? If it's time-accelerated, my lady could make great gains there, and quickly. We'd also be safe from Gressil and Crow, at least temporarily..."

"That's up to Fiona." Belial says. "But I can ask for you. She might say it's okay. Be prepared to be let down, though."

"Sure." Cassiel says, exhaling softly. "Thank you. I... didn't think you'd listen to my request. You're different from what I expected."

Belial smiles and shakes her head. "That's because I've changed. Phoebe and Jason changed me."

She reaches into her bra, one of the few places she can store items given her scantily-clad nature, and pulls out a small glowing button of some kind. She closes her eyes, focuses her mind, and transmits a series of thoughts into it. After a moment, she frowns.

"Is something wrong?" Cassiel asks.

"Well. I just asked Fiona if I could go to Chrona." Belial answers, confusion etched onto her face. "But... she said no. She rejected me. I... why would she...?"

Belial pauses, then she concentrates again, transmitting additional thoughts into the magical button. Her expression falls even further.

"...Fiona says my place is in Realspace. The humans need me. They need a healer and a protector. My strength helps shield them. She says she can raise Timothy on her own. What the heck! I can't believe she'd..."

Belial's confusion turns to anger, and then dismay. She lowers her head.

"No. It makes sense. Fiona isn't Phoebe. They might be cut from the same cloth, but... it was Phoebe I loved. Phoebe is dead. Fiona is... a clone of her earlier self, but she's not actually Phoebe. She probably doesn't have any feelings for me. It seems I was lying to myself, hoping to use Timothy as an excuse to get closer to Fiona. All to fill the void in my heart. She saw right through me."

Belial's shoulders sag in defeat. She stares blankly at the table, seemingly unsure of what to do.

Cassiel, likewise, looks away, somewhat awkwardly.

"I'm sorry about Phoebe's death." Cassiel says. "I didn't know her well, but I know she rescued me. And so did you. I owed her a great deal. If I were stronger, I might have been able to protect her, and the other humans too. Those Volgrim... they caused so much pain and destruction. Maybe even Gressil was involved. These creatures are our shared enemies."

"Yeah they are." Belial says quietly. "I'm sorry. I... didn't mean to get so emotional. I'm feeling helpless right now, bitter about a lot of things. Since I don't have anything else to do, I guess I can work to train and protect you. Fiona's right, even if I don't want to admit it. I'm needed here on Sharmur more than ever. Humanity has lost most of its pillars. Maybe this is my true calling in life."

"Maybe it's both our callings." Cassiel says with a smile.

The three women remain silent for a while, then eventually, they get up and leave.

In the distance, a two-headed figure watches them from inside an illusion. Gressil chuckles softly to himself, then he disappears.

"Oh, my little Birdie..."

January 14th, 2021. 9AM. Illuminati Haven.

Jason Hiro awoke with a start. For five long seconds, he laid in bed, looking up at an unfamiliar ceiling, feeling better rested than at any other point of his life in recent memory... but also deeply confused.

What a strange dream. He thought. Who were those people?

He vaguely remembered something about demons, and angels, and aliens, and... and something else.

But then, after a few moments, his brain fogged up a little, and then it fogged up some more.

He rose slowly, finding himself sitting atop a luxurious and comfortable mattress made of memory foam. His butt sank into the cushioned warmth beneath him, and for a moment he even felt tempted to go right back to sleep.

But the thought of that strange dream kept bugging him until eventually he forgot everything about it. After that, he started to feel annoyed he had forgotten so easily.

"Hmph." Jason grunted, as he swung his legs over the side of the bed. "Where am I, again?"

He sat on the bed's edge and looked around at his barebones but extremely comfortable room. It lacked any personal touches, but the furnishings were all high quality, such as the bedstand made of mahogany or some other high-class wood. A full-body mirror sat at the end of the room opposite the foot of his bed. When he looked at his reflection, it almost felt alien for a moment.

Why am I so young? Jason wondered, before realizing what a ridiculous question that was. Because I'm only eighteen. Right.

Those weird thoughts continued to plague him as he got up, shed his clothes, and stepped into the spacious walk-in shower installed in his bathroom. To his surprise, there was only an on-button for the water, and it automatically adjusted its temperature to exactly what his body enjoyed the most. He was more shocked by this inexplicable marvel of engineering than yesterday's revelations that demons and angels were real and superpowered humans walked among his species.

"Feels like what constitutes 'reality' keeps moving further and further past the horizon." Jason said to himself.

After he cleaned and dried himself off, Jason walked over and sat in a chair beside the door. He stared at the wall across from himself for a while, feeling a sudden pang of sadness. Not knowing why this momentary burst of depression had struck him, he tried to look within himself and uncover the reason, but he just couldn't put his finger on it. All he knew was that he felt as if he had lost something precious, but he didn't know what it was.

Minutes passed.

He slowly stood up, put on some freshly cleaned clothes that had already been perfectly tailored to his body and build, and he stepped outside.

The Illuminati Haven yawned outward before him as he exited his new living space. To his surprise, there was an adorable pale-skinned girl waiting outside with brown hair and a bobcut. She stood at attention, holding a small medical bag with both her hands. She smiled as she met Jason's gaze.

"Hello! I'm Natalie. I'll be your personal liason while you're here at the Haven."

Natalie wore a simple pressed white uniform with blue pinstripes. She had a small hat on her head, ceremonial of sorts, with the image of a golden eye emblazoned on its front. Jason glanced at her for a moment, thinking she vaguely looked like a cross between a military service-woman and a flight attendant.

"A liason?" Jason asked, as he closed his apartment door.

"That's right. I am to follow you everywhere and attend to your every need." Natalie explained. "I'm also trained in hand-to-hand combat. If your life should come under threat, I have to put mine on the line to protect you."

"Oh... I mean, that's really kind of you." Jason said, scratching the back of his head awkwardly. "But, I mean, you don't have to, right? I don't need a... servant?"

"On the contrary. Every Hero who has ever lived at the Haven has had multiple liasons." Natalie said. "Your existence is precious. When you leave the Haven's walls, multiple combat assets will be assigned to protect you. While you're inside the walls, I'm here to guide you around and make sure you're always comfortable. Please don't hesitate to issue any request."

She winked playfully at him. "Besides. I'm paid very well."

It took Jason no effort to notice a slight innuendo in her words, an implication that might have evaded him if he were as naive as he should have been. Clearly, if he wanted it, he could ask Natalie for... many different services. It was quite obvious why the Illuminati assigned such a pretty girl to be by his side.

But... they were going to have to try a little harder than that if they were going to keep him on their side. He could never betray his beloved wife.

Jason frowned slightly. Wife? There I go with those weird thoughts again. Anyway, I'll just keep things professional. It can't hurt to have someone I can ask questions.

He coughed. "So, Natalie. How old are you?"

"I'm twenty. Born July 4th. I'm from Kansas." She said, tossing in a few extra details randomly.

"Kansas, huh? Never been there." Jason commented. "Alright, so, since I'm new to this place, where can I eat?"

Natalie smiled. "Follow me."

She led Jason down the hall, and several times they passed by technicians, military personnel, and even a couple of the kids Jason saw yesterday. Many of the people gave Jason appreciative side glances, perhaps glad they got a chance to look at humanity's Hero for the first time ever. Jason didn't look impressive physically, but he walked with a strange confidence, as if he had already seen past some of life's vicissitudes. More than a few men who looked as if they had seen combat at some point of their life gazed a little more deeply at him, thinking he had the look of a trained fighter.

Of course, he was only an eighteen year old civilian. That couldn't possibly be the case.

Before long, Natalie led Jason toward an entrance leading into a large, open cafeteria.

"Up ahead, this is where most personnel and the Lowborn Heroes eat. But we actually have a VIP lounge for each generation's Trueborn."

She started to walk past the door, but Jason paused. "I'd like to meet more people. Here is fine."

"Alright. If that's what you want."

As they entered, Jason gestured at the medical bag in her hands. "What's that for?"

"This is for emergencies." Natalie explained. "If you choke on something, or you get struck and end up bleeding, or if someone breaks in and starts shooting, I have some equipment I carry in case of any general crises."

"What, you've got a gun in there? A pistol?" Jason asked.

"Mhm." Natalie nodded, as if that was the most expected thing in the world.

Jason simply shrugged.

He walked over to the cafeteria lane, where a suite of professionally dressed chefs stood behind a line of covered trays. Above them, a long series of menus displayed a dizzying list of entrees Jason and the other Haven staff could order from, with no prices listed and everything being free.

"Damn. This place has some nice perks." Jason commented idly. "I can order anything?"

"Of course. Even if other people had to pay, you never would." Natalie replied.

"I see. In that case... hmm... lamb chops for breakfast sounds good. Oh, that green bean casserole looks scrumptious too, and hey, why not toss in some meatloaf. Natalie, what about you?"

She smiled and shook her head as if he'd asked a silly question. "Don't worry about me, Jason. I eat when I'm off-duty. I have to be ready to protect you in case of any eventuality."

"Oh, is that so..." Jason murmured.

A few minutes later, Jason held a tray of food with a strong aroma drifting off that made him stomach roar with hunger. He glanced around the cafeteria, and spotted a familiar face sitting at a table along the side-wall.

"Hey," Jason said, as he walked over. "Mind if I join you?"

Brian Bozzard, a pyrokinetic Jason met the day before, flashed a charming smile at him. "Jason! Great to see you again! It would be my pleasure. Come, take a seat!"

Jason sat down, but Natalie remained standing at his side, her hands neatly folded across her bag's handle.

After a few minutes, Jason nearly forgot she was there. Natalie was very good at blending into the background, allowing him to focus on his conversation with Brian.

At the same table, another teenage guy and girl sat across from Jason and Brian. The girl smiled bashfully at him, looking at him with a half-flirtatious look sometimes, and looking away out of embarrassment the other times. The boy beside her looked a little jealous at the obvious affection she was showing Jason, but he didn't say anything uncouth.

"Jason, let me introduce you." Brian said. "The fellow trying to bore holes into your skull with his eyes is Jerome. The girl beside him is Farrah. They are both Lowborn Heroes, like me."

Jerome sneered at Jason, and Jason thought for a moment before recalling that Claire had told him about Jerome the day before.

"I heard you were a real strong guy." Jerome said, flicking his chin toward Jason. "Heard you beat up one of the instructors real good. But you don't look like much to me."

Jason sensed a challenge in Jerome's words, but he didn't feel like rising to it. It seemed obvious Jerome fancied the blonde beside him, and Jason certainly had no interest in her, no matter how pretty she was. Besides, she was much too young for his tastes.

"I'm not strong physically." Jason said with a shrug. "But apparently I'm pretty skilled with a weapon. Dobson seemed alarmed by my talent, said maybe it's the initial manifestation of my heroic power."

"Yeah? You wanna fight sometime then? A little friendly spar?" Jerome asked, narrowing his eyes.

"Jerome... don't... don't be mean." Farrah interjected, frowning at him. "Keep it friendly... okay?"

"Yeah. Sure. Whatever." Jerome said, leaning back in his chair. He cut at a piece of steak on his plate and took a big bite of it, staring at Jason the whole time.

"So." Jason said. "I know Brian's power. He's a pyrokinetic. Jerome here grows stronger and stronger every day. What about you, Farrah?"

Farrah looked away, embarrassed. "Oh... my... power... it's nothing much. I can... change my face... a little."

"Change your face?" Jason asked, raising an eyebrow. "What, like a shapeshifter?"

Farrah fidgeted slightly. She nodded, then looked at Jason carefully.

"W-what kind of girl... do you like?"

Jerome's knife scraped across his plate. His eyes remained locked onto Jason as he awaited Jason's answer.

"Hmm... the type of woman I like..." Jason muttered, looking away.

He remained quiet for a few long seconds.

"She'd have to have... white hair... yes, white hair. Short hair, maybe shoulder-length. Strong... muscled... adventurous. Able to beat me in a duel..."

Farrah blinked. "That... that's awfully... specific."

"Yeah." Jason muttered. "I guess it is."

When he looked back at Farrah, he was surprised to see that her hair had shifted color from blonde to white, and her face had aged just a little. She looked slightly different from before, but only seemed to be about twenty.

Nothing about her appealed to Jason, but he still smiled politely. "Oh, yeah, something a bit like that, I suppose. That's a neat ability."

Farrah blushed. "Thank you. It's nothing much. The Emperor of Passion is a... better shapeshifter than me. By a lot."

Embarrassed by her poor performance and Jason's obvious ordinary politeness, Farrah quickly shifted back to her previous self. The atmosphere lightened up at the table as Jerome realized Jason truly wasn't interested.

"So, Jason." Brian said. "What sort of life do you come from?"

"Nothing amazing." Jason said, taking another bite of his lamb chops. "I'm an orphan. My parents died when I was too young to remember them. I've lived in the foster system my whole life."

Jerome's expression changed slightly. "Shit, man. Me too. Damn. Always nice to meet a fellow orphan. You bounced between fosters, or did you find anyone stable?"

Sensing Jerome's accusatory tone abruptly fade, Jason breathed a small sigh of relief at their shared roots.

"Sort of. I lived with a nice couple for a few years. But there was a tragedy."

Jason didn't elaborate further, and nobody pressed him for more information. They felt it was a clear sore spot for him, but Jason merely felt that so much time had passed, he'd somehow started forgetting a lot of key details about 'way back then', even if it wasn't actually all that long ago.

"Yeah. I had it pretty rough." Jerome grunted. "Nobody wants a black boy. They kept bouncing me around. I got in lots of fights. Never lost, either. Especially once my powers started comin' in. But there was one real bad fight, put a guy in the hospital. Started lookin' at facing serious time in juvie. That was about six months ago, when Claire picked me up. It's been a lot better since I came here."

Jason looked at Farrah, and she remained quiet for a moment.

"Oh. Um. Nothing like that... for me." Farrah said, feeling self-conscious. "My parents... still around. Mom and dad. Really nice. Strict, but loving. I'm sorry, I don't mean to b-brag or anything."

"No, no, don't talk like that." Jerome quickly said. "Some people have it rough early on, but that just makes ya tougher, ya know? I wouldn't wish this shit life on anyone, but it happened and there's nothin' I can do about it. It just sucks, man."

"Yeah it does." Jason said, nodding along.

Brian, like Farrah, felt a little self-conscious. "Well, I grew up in a rich family. Stable, I suppose. My mother wasn't really in the picture, but that's because my father kept rotating women one after the other. My life was comfortable, but boring. I guess I had it better than you two at least."

"Being born rich has its own problems." Jason said, waving away Brian's guilty words. "Sometimes, being handed everything on a platter can take away the challenge of life, making you unsure how to proceed forward while becoming your own person. It's no coincidence a lot of rich kids fall to drugs and hedonism."

Brian raised an eyebrow. "You're more well-spoken than I expected."

"Just making casual talk." Jason remarked thoughtlessly.

As the table grew more comfortable around Jason's relatively humble presence, the other three relaxed more and more. Farrah blushed and stammered less often, and Jerome looked at Jason more appreciatively.

"Man, we should spar sometime though, for real." Jerome said with a big smile. His eyes no longer contained their previous hostility. "You're pretty cool."

"I could use a decent partner." Jason said, suddenly looking at Jerome with a serious gaze. "The last guy... well, he wasn't much of a challenge."

"Hah! DAMN! Alright, if you think you've got what it takes, you can throw down with the younger generation's champ!" Jerome boasted. "I'll take you on after breakfast, how about that?"

"You're on." Jason said with a smile. Before he could add anything else, Natalie lightly tapped his shoulder.

"Actually, Jason, before you can join Jerome for sparring, it's essential that we first conduct your Founder Initiation Ceremony. As the inheritor of the Heroic Aura, it's extremely important we do this as soon as possible."

Jason blinked. "Oh? Well, alright then. Guess it'll have to happen later, Jerome."

"Man, you got lucky. Saved by the babe!" Jerome teased.

"We'll see who was saved when I knock you flat on your ass!" Jason fired back.

Not long afterward, Jason finished his food and tossed it in the trash. He waved goodbye to the other three, then Natalie led him out of the cafeteria, her platform shoes clicking on the floor as she walked.

"So what's this founder-thing about?" Jason asked.

"Lady Rothschild didn't inform you?" Natalie asked back.

"No. Should she have?"

"I guess we'll leave it a surprise." Natalie said, shooting him a playful smile.

"Hey! You were supposed to answer all my questions." Jason teased.

"I don't get to have a lot of fun doing this job." Natalie said, flicking her hair lightly. "So allow me to indulge myself, just this once. It's more fun for me if you don't know until the last moment."

Jason narrowed his eyes at her back, but then he shrugged, deciding to remain silent as she led the way.

The two of them exited the cafeteria, traveled toward an elevator, and proceeded to ride down an ungodly number of floors. Jason raised an eyebrow when the counter reached 50, but it kept going right until finally stopping at Floor 77.

"How many floors does this Haven have?" Jason asked.

"A hundred." Natalie said, before winking at him. "Officially."

Jason smirked. He had started noticing just how often Natalie winked at him. He did find it rather adorable.

The elevator door opened, and a familiar woman in a wheelchair was waiting for him at the bottom. Unlike before, Claire Rothschild wore a strange ceremonial robe, colored white with gold accents. On her head, there was an elaborate ceremonial hat that rose half a foot into the air. It looked a little comical, but her expression was so serious that Jason couldn't bring himself to laugh.

On the 77th floor, intricate runes were drawn on the marbled tiles with black and red outlines. These runes seemed to be in a magical language that drew Jason's attention, but he had no idea why they felt so mystical. Pillars rose from the ground at regular intervals, but the floor space was otherwise extremely open and spacious. Various statues of powerful-looking men and women had been erected around the hall, and further toward the center, he noticed a lush underground garden that had clearly been cared for by consummate professionals.

"Jason Hiro." Claire said, slightly nodding her head in a half-bow. "I have already welcomed you into the Haven, but it's time you met the original founders of this place. Or rather, the namesake of the Illuminati, and the initiator of His will."

Jason glanced at Natalie. She remained silent, standing at the side of the elevator with no intention to follow him.

"Uh. Okay." Jason said, looking back at Claire. "He... sounds important?"

"He and she. Very much so. Follow me." Claire said, immediately turning her wheelchair around and starting to roll toward the central garden area.

Jason followed after her. Before long, he spotted statues with roses and other flowers growing all over them, but these statues had a strong sense of artistry to them, and the flowers only further accentuated that feeling. Jason gazed upon carved images of men and women holding swords, hammers, bows, spears, and even one statue of an old man with a rifle. He seemed very out of place compared to the others.

"This is the Hall of Memory." Claire explained, as she slowed her wheelchair's speed down to allow Jason to slowly walk beside her. "Here, statues of every known Trueborn Hero have been carved. One of the goals of the Illuminati is to recover all the ancient artifacts once possessed by these Trueborn Heroes. Unfortunately, many of those artifacts have fallen into the hands of other powerful organizations, the angels, the demons, and others have been lost to time and memory. For the artifacts we successfully recovered, we placed those within the embrace of their rightful owners."

She gestured with her left hand at the image of a young, powerful hero striking a valiant pose, stabbing a sword at the sky. The man wore ancient armor Jason thought might be Roman, or possibly Greek, and in his left hand, the statue held a strange ball of... rope?

"Alexander the Great." Claire said. "His soul was lost when Satan the Devil devoured it. We recovered his artifact, but it had lost its supernatural powers. Even so, we did our best to honor that fallen Hero's memory by pairing his artifact with his graven image."

She points at another statue.

"Joan of Arc. We never managed to recover the Sword From Heaven, so her statue stands lifelessly. But we know her weapon exists, somewhere out there."

"King Hammurabi, another lifeless recreation of one of the most powerful Heroes in ancient history. Known for his wisdom and fairness, Hammurabi wrote down some of the first laws humanity ever followed. We still seek to recover his Law Tablets to this day."

She finally paused before two statues inside the very center of the garden. They depicted a man and a woman, the man wielding a Shepherd's Staff with a circular-shaped head at its top, and an energetic mana orb in its center. The woman, meanwhile, was depicted as sitting on a rock, reading a thick book. Her appearance was quite plump, and her eyes full of life.

"Jepthath, the Illuminator. The father of all Heroes. The first one to ever walk the Earth. The namesake of the Illuminati."

"And beside him, Lady Madam Mildred, one of the wisest Heroes to ever live. A genius who pioneered countless inventions that would not long after form the foundation of the Industrial Revolution!"

Claire paused for a moment. She bowed her head in respect, and Jason did as well.

"I have brought you here to commune with the two ancients, as well as any others in our grand hall. I implore you to seek their wisdom, as you will soon need their guidance to explore the depths of your powers."

Jason nodded solemnly. He looked around, perhaps hoping to see the image of a wise man with a crown atop his head, but he did not see any such statue.

After a moment of silence, Claire coughed into her fist. "I will leave you here with Lord Jepthath and Lady Mildred. I pray your conversation goes well."

Jason nodded, but then he cocked his head.

"Uh, what? You want me to... talk to the statues?"

"The artifacts contain their souls. They are very much still alive, even if only in spirit." Claire explained. "Soon, all will be made known. I must take my leave now. I am not a Hero, and thus my presence here desecrates this sanctum. When you are done, meet with me back at the elevator."

Without wasting any further words, Claire turned her chair around and rolled away, leaving Jason alone with the two larger-than-life statues.

A minute passed. Confused, Jason turned to look at them, and the eyes of Mildred's statue momentarily seemed to flicker with an unknown power.

"Hah-hah-hah! Well, my dear boy! So YOU are the next inheritor, hmmmm?"

Part 617: Meeting the Ancestors

January 14th, 2021. 10AM. Illuminati Haven.

Jason closed his eyes and focused. He found his vision drawn to an illusory world made by the power of an ancient Hero, Mad Madam Mildred. In this phantom reality, he stood inside a vast library filled with countless books, scrolls, tables covered in pamphlets, all of it looking clean, pristine, and well taken care of. Candelabras were placed along the walls, their flames colored differently based upon the different contents of the books in their respective area. The library was more dimly lit than any avid reader would prefer, but it did give the place an aura of ancient secrecy.

Madam Mildred stood before him, her plump body contrasting with her somewhat short stature. She looked to be 300, possibly 400 pounds, yet was only five and a half feet tall. She was quite a bit shorter than Jason, at six feet tall. Mildred wore a purple and gold set of Victorian clothes, showing herself to have originated somewhere in 15th or 16th century England, though Jason wasn't learned enough to pinpoint a more exact time or region.

Beside Mildred, a powerful-looking dark-skinned man towered, his arms crossed, assessing the boy before him. His name was Jepthath, the Illuminator, first Hero to ever walk the Earth. He wore humble white shepherd robes, but also armor made of demon bones mounted atop those robes. Resilient, durable, capable of withstanding powerful attacks, he looked to be an awe-inspiring warrior capable of ripping and tearing demons apart with his bare hands.

"Madam Mildred. Lord Jepthath." Jason quickly said, bowing his head quickly. "It's good to see you two again. I mean... it's good to meet you. For the first time, I suppose."

"Hah-hah-hah, what an interesting slip of the tongue, my boy!" Mildred exclaimed, leaning forward to give him a playful smile. "Have we perchance met before? Or have you met another gorgeous, buxom woman who reminded you of me?"

Jason opened his eyes. He looked at Mildred and Jepthath, his expression darkening ever so slightly.

"I... I'm not sure. You seem familiar to me. Both of you do. But I can't place why. I've been feeling this way for the past two days, ever since my powers... awoke? It all happened so fast. I don't know how to explain it."

Jepthath frowned. "The abilities wielded by a Trueborn are many and varied. Mildred has been watching you since your arrival. We already know everything you have been up to, along with the information you have given our descendants. We have thought carefully about the implications of your words so far, but we have yet to draw any conclusions."

"Oh. That's... good." Jason said hesitantly, feeling a little awkward due to the revelation someone unknown had been watching him this whole time. "I guess that saves me the trouble of explaining myself."

Mildred's smile faded somewhat. She continued to maintain a positive attitude, but she also muted her emotions as she took a good, long look at the young man before her.

"It has been a long time since the last Hero walked the Earth. Not since Harold Whittaker perished to the Nazis have we seen another emerge. This has given our Order a deep sense of existential dread. You see, dear boy, humans have grown more and more capable of fighting the Demons without the power of a Hero, particularly since the Industrial Revolution, but not even the strongest human armies can easily match the power of their Emperors. It is essential we always have a Trueborn in the back-wings, someone who can battle them if need be."

Jason nodded. "Makes sense. Gotta keep our enemies on their toes. Don't want them to grow too cocky and risk unleashing a mass casualty event, even if we do succeed in pushing them back."

"The greed of the demons is their undoing." Jepthath said, a sneer crawling onto his face. "They have grown lazier and more decadent over the years. Right now, they do not feel that humanity, the Titans, and the angels pose them an existential threat. They are mostly satisfied with the status quo. They lounge about, quietly build up their subordinates, and secretly do battle with each other rather than us. They have not seen a Hero appear in decades, so they have grown to believe they will ultimately take over the Earth, given enough time."

"The demons are immortal." Jason points out. "Time is on their side."

"Indeed. An immortal enemy is an enemy who can afford to play the long game." Jepthath said, smiling slightly at the boy's quick thinking. "But it is also a failing they have not seemed to notice. The longer they live, the lower their guards drop. Satan the Devil leads demonkind, but he is a womanizer who loves to sleep around. He thinks more with his lower demon these days than he did a few millennia ago. Back then, he was a terrifying foe hellbent on destroying humanity and the angels at all costs. Today, he is relatively content to live a more hedonistic life, letting his peers battle for supremacy."

"That might sound like a good thing," Mildred interjects, "but do not let your own guard down, dear boy! The demons have only grown complacent because humanity lacked a hero. Once they obtain news of your emergence -and believe me they will learn sooner rather than later- they will immediately return to their previously vigilant state. Too many Trueborn have unleashed terror upon the demons over the millennia for them to take even a weak Trueborn lightly. Especially as this era has birthed a shocking number of Lowborn Heroes to back you up!"

Jason leans against a pillar and crosses his arms. "You're saying the number of Lowborn is greater than usual?"

"Far, far higher!" Mildred exclaims. "During the eras of Solomon and Arthur, two of the greatest Heroes of all time, there were less than a handful of Lowborn roaming the Earth. Now, there are at least two dozen that we know of, and possibly many more beyond that. I've never seen so many in all my years! Whatever your power is, it must be a 'command' type that boosts other humans."

Jason blinked. "The other people told me that these Lowborn have been springing up for years. They also said they'd been tracking my movements across several continents. But, Lord Jepthath, Lady Mildred... that cannot possibly be the case. I've been right here, in Oregon, the whole time. I haven't been to another state, let alone all the way over in Europe or these other crazy locations."

For a time, the two ancient Heroes fell silent.

"...We have considered this as well." Jepthath said slowly. "I have a theory. I have witnessed many incredible powers in my time among the Artifact-dwellers. I believe you may not exactly be a 'seer' but a 'projector'."

"A... a what?" Jason asked, bewildered.

"Jepthath, you don't really think...?" Mildred asked, crooking an eyebrow at him.

"Exactly that." Jepthath said. "It explains the memory loss and a great many other things. Perhaps, in his sleep, Jason has been projecting phantasms around the world. Unbeknownst to him, before his true powers awakened, he projected ghostly apparitions of himself in Europe and all these other places. That is why he knows so much about the demons and the other entities. Perhaps he has even observed us without our knowing."

Jason scratched his head. "Uhh... I mean, I guess that's possible. I did- actually, yeah? I had a really weird dream last night."

"You did?" Mildred asks, his voice rising an octave. "Do tell!"

"It's... uh... it was about... um... uhh..."

Jason stuttered and stammered, but no matter what he tried, he couldn't remember the dream for the life of him.

"No memory at all? How bizarre." Mildred muttered. "Dear boy, if you open up your mind to me, I can peer inside and try to examine your thoughts. Perhaps I may even find the source of your power? But I must have your explicit permission before I do so. My power is incapable of being used offensively."

Jason rubbed his arm. The thought of allowing this woman he barely knew to look inside his head unnerved him. But at the same time, he felt even more unnerved by all the bizarre happenings that had occurred since he woke up yesterday.

"I... alright. I'll give you permission... I guess." Jason said.

Mildred didn't immediately dive into his head. Instead, she gave him a serious look.

"Dear boy, I do not mean you any harm. That being said, we are strangers. We barely know one another. If you are discomforted by the thought of a gorgeous woman like myself peering into your most secret memories, then I will not force you. We can always do this on another day."

"We can?" Jason asked.

"Of course, of course." Mildred said, waving her hand flippantly. "You are now being cradled within the protective embrace of the Illuminati. Even if a Demon Emperor should storm inside, our people are among the few on Earth who could protect you. Short of a full-scale invasion, nobody could reach you before our defenses obliterated them. And even if they were so stupid as to attack here... heh heh heh..."

Jepthath's eyes flashed with hunger. "I would be happy to emerge from my artifact for one last bloody battle. Taking down an Emperor would be a noble end to my existence."

Jason licked his lips. He looked away, then he looked back at Mildred.

"Truth be told... I am... curious about these memories... if that's what they are."

"If you do not fully trust me, I cannot look inside your mind." Mildred replied, holding up her palm. "I sense a deep distrust within your heart, dear boy. I will not press the issue further. Instead, why don't we just continue to chat a while? I'll have that lovely Claire bring you back every day for the next week or two. We'll have plenty of time to educate you on the essential matters of this world."

Jason slowly nodded, feeling some of the dread release from his heart. He truly didn't feel comfortable having this random woman looking through his brain. Some sort of primal instinct warned him not to trust others so naively, though he couldn't be sure what caused that feeling.

"Could you tell me about the other ancient organizations?" Jason asked. "They're among the topics I genuinely know nothing about."

Mildred started to speak, but before she could utter a word, Jepthath let out a loud snort through his nose.

"Hah. The other organizations? Like the Freemasons? The Rockefellers? All a bunch of charlatans. The fact some Heroes have actually joined them willingly sickens me. Only the Illuminati can be considered the rightful protectors of humanity. My descendants have fought and bled to protect the rightful rulers of this planet, while those other sniveling 'secret societies' sought peace and mutual cooperation among our enemies."

Mildred winced. "Ahh, why don't you let me tell the boy about them this time, eh, Jepthath dearest? No need to become so agitated."

"Agitated? Agitated?! I am not agitated just because those prissy, half-witted imbeciles constantly seek to appease the bloodskins! They ought to-"

"Yes, yes." Mildred said, touching his back. "I've heard this a thousand times by now. Let's not subject our dear descendant to another one of your rants. Go take a rest and leave this part to me, hmm!"

Jepthath hesitated. He looked like he wanted to keep roaring about the other societies, but eventually he spun on his heel, grumbled under his breath, and strode away.

"I'm picking up that he doesn't like those other societies." Jason said, speaking the obvious part out loud. "Old grudges?"

"Betrayals, backstabbings... many such things. Actually, his great-grandson founded one of those secret societies. It focused heavily on appeasing the angels and making humans subservient to them, until Jepthath later revived inside his artifact and led an extermination team to wipe that society out. Jepthath will never forgive Archangel Raphael for his deception during the Ancient Era."

"What deception?" Jason asked.

"That is a long story." Mildred said. "Let's talk about it later, hmm? For now, dear boy, we should discuss the other secret societies, starting with MJ12..."

Mildred began to paint a picture for Jason about these various organizations, their origins, their goals, and why each of them were problematic in their own right. Over the next two hours, she and Jason held a long and fruitful discussion on the subject.

"But that's not right." Jason interjected at one point. "By all accounts, the Illuminati is a war-like human supremacist organization. Hasn't it occurred to you that seeking mutual cooperation isn't such a bad idea? You keep telling me how bad the mission statements of these other organizations are, but the Illuminati wants to exterminate the demons, angels, and monsters, leaving only humans in charge of Earth. That's genocide!"

"I know it seems cruel, dear boy," Mildred said soothingly, "but you must understand that we are in the midst of a war for survival. The Demons continue to amass Emperors every century, and the angels build up their army of Lazarites. The Titans, likewise, are far above humanity in terms of individual power. We cannot say how deadly a war against them would turn out. We can only make secret preparations in case such a war does come to pass."

Jason frowned. Over the last two hours, he had learned about Majestic 12, Skull and Bones, the Rockefellers, the Rothschildren and their many splinter groups, the Nazis, the Aryan Brotherhood, the Triad, and even the Ku Klux Klan. He was surprised to learn that in the middle of many of these extraordinary organizations, there were plenty of brutes and thugs that sought only their own enrichment or vindictive goals.

But even so, he grew to think that the Illuminati... didn't sound as peachy and wonderful as Mildred made it out to be.

They were human supremacists.

They refused to cooperate with the demons. They refused to even consider setting aside ancient grudges. They treated Earth as a battlefield that would someday lead to a war of extermination. Only by selfishly empowering humanity would they be able to finally achieve peace.

Jason didn't know why, but that goal did not sit well with him. He had his own thoughts on the matter, and they didn't gel with Mildred's explanations.

Seems it was right for me to not let her into my head, at least not just yet. Jason thought to himself. Who knows what would happen if she saw how different my thoughts were from hers.

But on the surface, he simply shrugged, opting to play along.

"You have a point. If it's a war for survival, then compromising with the enemy is not a good idea. I'll have to think more on the matter. For now, I think I've heard enough."

Mildred nodded slowly. "Indeed, dear boy, indeed. Perhaps I have not made as convincing an argument as I would have liked. The next time we speak, I will be sure to rectify that mistake. You can go now, and we will talk again tomorrow."

Jason smiled and nodded. He bowed politely at the waist. "I'm sorry for having taken up your time. Thank you for enlightening me on these crucial matters."

"Hah-hah-hah!" Mildred laughed, causing her massive chest to bounce. "Oh, such a polite boy! Worry not, for I am always happy to speak to any generation's Trueborn! It isn't as if I lead the most exciting life down here! See you tomorrow, dear boy."

Jason stood up straight, and a moment later, his phantasmal body vanished from the library.

Mildred's smile slowly disappeared. She rubbed her chin thoughtfully as Jepthath walked over.

"Thoughts?" Jepthath asked.

"He is unnervingly amenable to the demon's causes." Mildred said. "His mind is strangely firm. He does not have the bearing of a teenager. If I didn't know any better, I'd believe I had just spoken to a hundred-year-old master. He has already seen through the vicissitudes of life. Strange. Very strange."

"Is he a threat?" Jepthath asked, lowering his voice.

"He is no Dracula, not that I can see." Mildred replied. "We will have to continue monitoring him. I will try to make more headway in our future talks. Perhaps I can get him to come around and see things our way."

Jepthath fell silent. He narrowed his eyes into a glare and stared off into the distance, his thoughts unknown.

"Hmmm..."

Jason awoke back in reality. He lifted his head, finding himself standing before Mildred's statue. Without letting his expression give him away, he smiled faintly and turned away, looking as if he were pondering Mildred's wise words.

But internally, his thoughts began to race.

I'm sure of it now. This compound isn't protecting me. It's a prison. They will not let me leave until they're certain they have my allegiance. The whole time, Mildred was probing me, trying to see how deep my pro-demon sympathies went.

If I let her look into my mind, it's possible she'll see all these thoughts and misgivings I'm having now. But if I continue to refuse, she'll only doubt me more. And I can't silence my misgivings, either. The truth is, this 'Haven' is really weirding me out. The vibes are way off.

Jason's smile slipped for a second, but he quickly recovered.

The most infuriating thing is I wouldn't even call myself 'pro-demon'. They're clearly vile creatures. I just refuse to condemn them until I've at least had a conversation with their leaders. But to these whack-jobs, even that is too extreme. They won't allow a drop of compromise with their enemies, so they'll likely resort to more violent measures to get me on their side. Perhaps even... brainwashing.

Jason quickly peered through the reality of his situation. He made several predictions which may or may not have been true, but which felt accurate given his current base of knowledge.

I'll just have to play along while I start working on an escape plan. If I really do have powers, then I need to figure out what the hell they are before the Illuminati do. Once they know what I can do, they'll be able to lock me down even more easily. I can't give them an intel advantage!

Jason met up with Claire. He gave her a brief summary of the discussion with Mildred, then Claire took him back to Natalie.

After Jason, Natalie, and Claire entered the elevator, Jason carefully glanced at his young female companion. Natalie might appear like a flight hostess, but the truth was she was likely there to keep an eye on him and restrain him if he attempted an escape.

I beat Dobson with relative ease. I can probably take Natalie down too. Jason thought.

He continued to chat with Natalie and Claire, keeping the vibe casual, but all the while, he began to think more and more about how he'd make his way to freedom.

Even if I knock out Natalie, there's sure to be other armed guards on the base. I can't make it to the top area if they shut the elevators down. Maybe there's an emergency stairwell? That'll be easy to block off, but at least I'll have a way to escape if I fight my way through. And do they want to kill me? Probably not. They've been waiting for a Trueborn to emerge for decades. No shot they'd kill me and have to wait another 18 years. Maybe I can use that to my advantage.

"Where to next, Jason?" Natalie asked.

"I told Jerome I'd spar with him." Jason said, flashing a friendly smile at her. "Mind showing me to the sparring arena? Honestly, I get so lost in this place. Maybe I could get a map?"

"Natalie will be happy to show you around." Claire responded. "Don't bother looking at a map, it's all just a bunch of confusing hallways anyway."

Jason didn't bat an eye. "Yeah, fair enough."

They must be entertaining second thoughts about me. Jason thought. I bet the ancestors already relayed my conversation to Claire or someone relevant. I'll definitely have to tread carefully the next few days.

Not long afterward, Claire split off, allowing Jason and Natalie to travel to the sparring area, where the muscled Jerome awaited.

"Jason! You made it." Jerome said, as he pulled off his shirt to reveal his toned body. "So, you ready to get your butt kicked?"

Jason entered the arena covered in soft and cushy panels, noting the spring it gave to his step. Even if he took a heavy fall, he'd probably be just fine. The glass walls showed him a few other youths fighting one another in 1v1 battles, but as soon as they saw Jason appear, they stopped fighting to run over and watch from outside.

"I don't know..." Jason said, looking sheepishly at all the people peeping through the glass. "I... don't want to humiliate you too badly in front of everyone."

"Ohh, shit! Little white boy knows how to talk some trash! Alright, alright!" Jerome laughed. "So, we gonna use weapons, or go at it bare-handed?"

"If we use weapons it won't take long for me to lay you out." Jason said, acting aggrieved. "Let's just do a little MMA."

"Oh yeah? A little MMA, you say? You really want to visit the afterlife that badly huh?" Jerome joked. "Alright, toss that shirt aside and let's get moving."

Jason nodded. Natalie walked to the back of the sparring ring and stood beside the entrance, leaving Jason alone. When he took off his shirt, the people outside frowned.

Jason... did not look like a fighter. He was skinny, frail, and badly out of shape. If he weighed any less, people would likely assume he was anorexic.

"Need to get some meat on those bones." Jerome said, before suddenly darting forward. "Don't blink!"

In an instant, their frenzied melee began.

Jason slithered around like a snake. Sensing that he was no match for Jerome in the weight class or strength department, he didn't dare take the brawler on directly. Instead, he snapped out a few kicks and punches, forcing Jerome to dodge. When Jerome punched and kicked back, Jason also ducked and weaved, dodging under those attacks.

But then, Jerome surprised Jason by charging at him like a bull, getting his arms around Jason's chest, lifting him up, and slamming him onto the mat.

"Unf!" Jason gasped.

He struggled to break free, but it may as well have been a toddler trying to escape the grasp of a fully grown adult, for all the audience could see. Jason had no chance. He eventually tapped out, and Jerome pulled away, satisfied with his quick victory.

"Told you." Jerome said, looking at Jason smugly. "Once you get grabbed, ain't nothing you can do. You're too weak."

"Yeah." Jason said, massaging his chest. "You've got me there. Alright, fun's over. I guess we'll switch to weapons."

Jerome smirked. "Yeah I heard you peeled Dobson like an onion, but he's just a normal human. Your little tricks ain't gonna work on me."

"Is that so?" Jason asked. "Why don't we spar with... training staffs? Best four out of seven. Just gotta knock your opponent to the mat."

"You're on!" Jerome laughed.

Fifteen minutes later, Jerome scowled at Jason. "Come on! I can't even get ONE point?? Best... best seven out of thirteen! I've got you this time!"

Jason grimaced. "Are you sure? Because even if you do get a point, you'll need six more after that..."

"Shut up man! Damn, what are you, some kind of demon or something? How the hell does a staff move that fast?! Ain't never seen anything like it in my life!"

Jerome jumped to his feet. Despite his anger, he was uninjured. He still had plenty of energy, and he could even see that Jason was a little more exhausted than him. After all, Jason's physical strength and stamina were far beneath him.

But when Round Seven played out, Jerome found himself unable to close the distance between himself and his weaker foe.

Jason's movements were precise and calculated. He spun the staff around himself like a hurricane, sometimes snapping it forward to strike at Jerome's abdomen, sometimes to parry Jerome's clumsy and poorly aimed counter-attacks.

In truth, Dobson was a much better opponent with the bo staff than Jerome. Jason quickly realized Jerome was practically untrained. He'd only used the staff for a couple of weeks, along with a few other weapons, before sticking to his fists. All his training was in boxing, MMA, and other fist-style martial arts.

Even then, Jerome was still much worse than Jason at melee combat. The only reason Jason lost when they went full-MMA earlier was because Jason's physical condition was so pathetic. If he were even half Jerome's strength, Jerome never would have beaten him.

Jason jumped forward lightly, swept his staff at Jerome's legs, and sent his opponent tumbling to the mat once again.

By now, dozens of soldiers, students, and other faculty had already lined up outside the glass walls, cheering excitedly as they watched Jason take apart Jerome. Long known as being an absolute tyrant in the sparring ring, few people could get a point or two off Jerome, and absolutely nobody took him apart like Jason did.

Finally, Jerome gave up. He flopped onto his ass and shook his head.

"Man, them rumors was true after all. What the hell? You fight like one of them Kung Fu masters in the Jackie Chan movies."

"Guess I'm just an old soul or something." Jason said, walking over to grab a towel put in the corner by one of the Haven's gym monitors. He mopped up his sweaty body, then sighed. "I'm pretty tired now, Jerome. Let's do this again tomorrow. I've got other stuff I need to be doing."

"Sure thing!" Jerome said, pulling himself to his feet. He also walked over, grabbed a towel, and mopped the sweat off his chest. "Be seeing you around, man."

Jason nodded.

"Be seeing you."

Part 618: Escape!

January 15th, 2021. 4AM. Illuminati Haven.

Two guards outside the Haven stood at attention, one on each side of the entry gate. The silence of the waning night had begun to fade, and the faint glow of dawn had begun to emerge. The two soldiers looked from left to right, always alert. With the arrival of the first Trueborn in decades, they could not afford to slack off.

They did not speak to one another. Cameras swiveled back and forth overhead, searching the jungle for heat signatures and other hostile blips. Each of the guards hefted heavy rifles capable of blasting holes through the bodies of all but the most durable of Dukes. Against Demon Emperors, they might not kill them, but they'd likely cause some pain before the guards met their end.

A bird chirped to the right, causing both guards to snap their eyes in that direction. Reflexively, they took aim with their rifles and narrowed their eyes, looking for the 'creature' that may have made the noise. They were all too familiar with demon tricks, and knew there were all sorts of esoteric and frightening demonic abilities that could easily fool their mundane human minds.

The rightmost guard continued to look to the right, but the left guard instead turned to look in the opposite direction. He realized if something did make a noise, it could have been a distraction to sneak up on the opposite side.

Hardly had he turned his head to look, when a figure suddenly emerged out of nothing, as if revealing itself by stepping through a crack between dimensions. The guard's eyes widened. He started to open his mouth, to shout, to alert his comrade, but the figure lifted its arm and pointed something at his face.

Before he could react, his vision went black, and he collapsed on the ground.

The sound of his body hitting the dirt was enough to draw the attention of the other guard. He quickly swiveled around, only to catch sight of a humanoid figure wearing a black business suit, and a white mask with strange markings he couldn't make out in the dim light of dawn.

An instant later, his vision went black too. He collapsed under the attack of the silent weapon his attacker shot at him.

The attacker smiled under his mask.

"Step one, complete. Let's do the rest right this time."

Inside the Haven, all was quiet. The fall of the guards outside didn't set off any alarm bells. Every fifteen minutes, the command center would ping each pair of guards on the premises, getting the secret code-word for their patrol. When they pinged the exterior guards, they received the all-clear without hesitation.

The mysterious mask-wearing attacker grabbed the wrist of the first guard. He placed the guard's hand on the control panel to activate it with his palm print, then he lifted the guard's head up to scan his iris.

Finally, the vocal component of the entryway came up. The suited man leaned over the mic and spoke, his voice changing to perfectly mimic the guard's voice, despite never actually speaking before.

"Jericho-9-0-2."

The gate silently slid open. The man smiled under his mask. He dropped the guard and meandered inside.

Seemingly an idiot, he waltzed right past multiple cameras, as if not caring at all. Despite this, at the exact moment he entered each camera's path, the person looking at that particular camera happened to look away, either to examine another camera's image, or to take a sip of their coffee, or to speak to a coworker.

Coincidentally, time after time, the masked man paused for half a breath, then walked forward, carefully timing his walking motions while occasionally glancing at a wristwatch that displayed not only the minutes and seconds, but even a rolling number of milliseconds as well.

After breaching the base, the masked man casually strolled toward the secondary entrance leading downward. He took a coin out of his pocket and flicked it up into the air.

The coin sailed noiselessly into the darkness of dawn, where it loudly clinked against a metal trash can, causing several people nearby to jump in alarm and turn to look at it.

As if playing a stealth video game on easy mode, the masked man walked right behind the people while their backs were turned. Someone else happened to walk inside right before he did, so he slipped through the entry door behind them, pressed a device to the back of their head, and pulled the trigger.

Their body hit the floor right as the door closed, muffling the noise.

The masked man paused for half a breath. His body blurred slightly, and he mumbled under his breath, "One-one-four, right, left, six seconds..."

He brusquely grabbed the person laying in front of him by their shirt collar, dragged them past three sets of doors, took a right and a left, then tossed the person inside. He silently shut the door, then he began to do something extremely bizarre.

He moonwalked backward, ducking his body as he passed by a window. Coincidentally, at that very moment, someone turned their head to look outside, but they failed to notice the intruder doing an odd Michael Jackson impression just below their field of view.

As if listening to some invisible tune, the intruder began dancing while he walked, bending his body in odd ways, slipping around doorways, dodging one person after another, always evading their line of sight as if he were able to predict the future. Like a ghost, he entered the second level of the Haven, then the third without tripping a single alarm. Nobody saw him even once, save for the guards outside, who remained comatose, unable to move.

Abruptly, the masked man paused as he came up to a door with a numerical keypad.

"Fuck. This is gonna be a pain."

His body blurred. Three seconds passed. His position seemed to remain unmoving, but after those three seconds, he leaned forward and typed in a 12-digit number.

1-1-7-9-5-4-2-7-6-1-2-0

The door beeped once, then slid open.

As it opened, the masked man's shoulders slumped. "Fucking hell. Fuck. I'd better not have to do that again. At least the digit only started with 'one' this time."

He cursed under his breath, then slipped deeper into the facility.

Not five minutes after first waltzing in the front door, he smoothly arrived at his ultimate destination. He poked his head out of a doorway and glanced down the hallway outside, where he saw a young woman, only twenty or so years old, standing guard outside a seemingly ordinary room.

The man's body blurred for a moment, then he reached into his pocket and pulled out a small walkie-talkie looking device and spoke into it.

"Natalie, this is Claire. Is the Trueborn still sleeping?"

Natalie Summers blinked. She reached up to touch her earpiece, then looked off to the side, in the opposite direction the intruder happened to be standing.

"He is, ma'am. Is something the matter?"

"Yes." The man said, his voice coming out a perfect recreation of Claire's. "I've just received word that he needs to pay Bloodworks a visit. Please enter his dormitory and wake him up. Get him down here, immediately. His life is in peril."

Natalie's eyebrows shot up in alarm. "Of course. I'm on my way."

She hurriedly turned around and typed in a series of numbers on the door's control panel, numbers the intruder recorded with relative ease. The moment she entered the room, he stepped into the hallway and darted toward the room. His shoes silently struck the ground, far too quietly despite striking hard tiles that should have made at least a slight clicking noise.

Natalie stepped into the room. "Jason-"

She started to speak, but at that moment, something pressed against the back of her head, and her vision turned black. She collapsed to the ground, but the intruder quickly leaned forward to catch her, allowing her to lay down without suffering a dangerous fall.

Jason Hiro awoke with a start. His heart turned cold as Natalie abruptly woke him up, then fell over, a man in a black dress suit appearing behind her.

"What the fuck?!" Jason exclaimed. He had barely even woken up, and already, he felt his life was in existential danger!

In the darkness of his room, Jason couldn't pick up on many details. All he could tell was that the intruder looked to be a male, relatively muscular, wearing a black dress suit and... was that a mask? A Japanese mask? And why did it have the image of a cat painted on it?

"Who-?" Jason started to ask, but before he could get the words out, the masked man held up three fingers.

"Firstly: I'm not here to hurt you. I'm here to rescue you." The man said, his voice gruff. "Secondly, you may call me 'Cat Mask.' Thirdly: The Illuminati are not your allies. You are right to suspect them. If you want to live free, come with me."

Jason blinked twice. He stared at the man, his mouth agape.

"I-"

"Your clothes are over there. And no, Natalie isn't dead. She's just unconscious. I have a weapon that can induce an abrupt shock to any human's cerebral cortex. It's non-lethal, but only works at short range. Now hurry up and put your pants on. We have seven minutes and fourteen seconds before all hell breaks loose here."

Jason nodded dumbly. His first instinct was not to trust this person, but something about his cool confidence made Jason faintly want to believe in him. More importantly, Jason was already planning to escape. Wasn't this timing... just too good??

Without delay, Jason grabbed a pair of pants. He threw them on, looking at Natalie with a hint of worry, but luckily she didn't appear injured. She simply lay unmoving, her chest rising and falling as if having entered a deep sleep.

Carefully, Jason stepped over her, but couldn't help looking back at her one last time...

"Relax. The pretty girl will be just fine." Cat Mask said with a quiet chuckle. "Now, follow my lead. If I tell you to duck your head, you duck it, got it? We'll be out of here in four minutes and sixteen seconds if everything works out just the way I've planned."

Jason nodded dumbly. "Alright.."

He followed along behind Cat Mask as they power-walked down the hallway Cat Mask came from. Periodically, Cat Mask would do something bizarre, like moonwalking while bending forward, but each of those time, Jason just crawled along the ground. He felt like an idiot compared to Cat Mask's cool and smooth moves.

Two minutes passed. The two of them made it up to the first floor, and Cat Mask abruptly paused. His body blurred for a moment, something Jason had grown used to seeing, though he had no idea what the hell the man was doing.

Suddenly, Cat Mask pulled a walkie-talkie device out of his pocket. He spoke into it, his voice changing to a familiar feminine one.

"All personnel, this is Claire Rothschild speaking. The Trueborn has gone missing. He has attacked his handler and is presumed to be attempting an escape. Immediately surround the second and third levels. Keep an eye out for him. Under no circumstances are you to use lethal force."

Jason blinked. He was internally shocked beyond belief! Cat Mask had perfectly replicated Claire's voice... but how? And wouldn't sending the base into high alert compromise their mission?!

Cat Mask looked at Jason for half a beat. "Relax. I've done this a thousand times. We just have to wait eight more seconds, then we'll get moving."

Cat Mask glanced down at his wristwatch. Exactly seven seconds later, he stepped out of the doorway on the first floor right as a pair of men ran past. Jason tensed up, but the two men were so distracted that they didn't notice Cat Mask and Jason emerging from right behind them.

What coincidental timing!

Silently, Cat Mask weaved his way around barrels and boxes stacked around the top level of the base, just outside. He led Jason to the exterior gate, and they walked right in front of the cameras, causing Jason to fear someone might have seen him. But what he did not know was that at that very moment, the guard assigned to check that camera had looked away to comb the level 2 and 3 cameras instead, just barely missing Jason and Cat Mask as they walked past.

After stepping outside the Haven's walls, Cat Mask's breathing sped up. He quickly gestured.

"Come on, kid. We'll have to run, now. I've got a quad outside waiting to pick us up. Let's move it!"

Jason nodded. He didn't know how the hell they were going to escape the entire Illuminati on a freaking ATV, but anything was better than just standing around, waiting for rescue. He and Cat Mask both started jogging as they disappeared into the woods. Along the way, Jason spotted several fallen guards who were supposed to be patrolling the woods. Clearly, Cat Mask had taken them down before he even drew close to the base.

Ten minutes later, they slid down the side of a shallow ravine. Before them, there was an open area nestled inside a natural bowl-like part of the hillside. Jason looked left and right, but he didn't see any sort of escape vehicle.

"We're here." Cat Mask said, retrieving a remote from his pocket.

He pressed a button, and Jason's jaw nearly hit the ground.

A small helicopter, made of a shiny silvery material he guessed was platinum, greeted his eyes. The copter did not have rotors on its top, but instead it was built like a hovercraft with one internal rotor on each of its four 'corners', made for stealth operations. Just by looking at it, Jason had a sudden hunch, a guess that frightened him to his core.

This copter... it's way more advanced than anything I've ever seen! Jason exclaimed internally. This looks like some kind of air vehicle pulled from fifty years in the future! Or is this a top-secret government copter? Something even the US Air Force would keep under lock and key? Just who the hell is this guy?!

Cat Mask hopped into the pilot's seat. Jason climbed in beside him via the co-pilot's door.

As the doors closed behind them, Cat Mask turned his whole head to look at Jason.

"Don't touch anything. I mean it. Don't press even one button. I know you want to. Don't. We have one minute and forty-seven seconds to escape this airspace. Just sit still, and this will all be over."

Jason nodded. "Okay..."

Cat Masks's body blurred again. Each time it happened, Jason grew more and more confused. What exactly was happening whenever Cat Mask did that?

Jason secretly guessed this guy wasn't a human at all. Maybe he was a demon, or even an angel. Could he be one of the Lowborn? Could that be why he was so incredible at infiltration? Maybe he had some powerful ability that was able to allow him to evade even a monolith as powerful as the Illuminati.

The quad-copter lifted off. Jason shifted in his seat as he felt a few G's pull his stomach into his ass.

Then, the copter turned invisible and shot off into the darkened sky.

"We're not in the clear yet." Cat Mask said, after they had traveled a mile or two. "Hold your questions until I give the OK. The Illuminati have aerial assets they can deploy. They can also call on the local Air Force bases if need be."

Jason's eyes flickered with insight. So this guy isn't with the Air Force? Is he not even part of the US Government?

"No, I'm not." Cat Mask said, startling Jason. "I'm a lone agent. Unaffiliated with any other group."

Jason's jaw dropped. "You can read-?!"

"Nope. Not a telepath." Cat Mask simply said. "Now, hold the questions."

Jason bit his tongue. His mind swirled as he thought of a thousand other questions he wanted to ask. Every time Cat Mask spoke, it simply added another layer to the mystery surrounding him.

Just who the hell WAS this guy?!

Minutes later, Cat Mask sagged in the pilot's chair. He exhaled deeply.

"Mission success. Attempts: Seven hundred and fourteen thousand, nine hundred, sixteen."

Jason scrunched up his face. "Huh? Attempts?"

To his surprise, Cat Mask looked at him for a moment.

Then, he reached up and pulled off the mask, revealing his face underneath.

Jason looked at the man's true visage. He was surprised to see that, despite his deeply American way of speaking, Cat Mask was actually a blonde haired Asian man. Korean? Japanese? Jason thought he looked more Japanese than anything else.

The man had narrow eyebrows and a faint mustache. He was relatively clean-shaven, and only looked to be in his 40's. Not old by any means, but certainly a bit advanced in age.

"Hey, Jason." Cat Mask said, smiling at him. "You really screwed things up for me again. Haha..."

Jason frowned. "Do I know you?"

Cat Mask's expression slumped a little. He looked away.

"You did. Once. Or Twice. Or even a thousand times. But it was never destined to work out. That's why I had to leave you behind when you were a kid. It's been eating me up, all this time."

Jason's heart plunged into his shoes. A cold, icy feeling swelled within his chest.

"W-what...? You... you're not... you can't be?"

"Yeah. I am. It's me." The man said. "I'm Hideki. Hideki Hiro. I'm your father, Jason."

Silence filled the cockpit. Jason stared at the man claiming to be his father. His eyes trembled.

"You... my... father? No. That's not... my father died. When I was... and my mom, too."

Hideki pursed his lips. As the copter flew, he lowered his eyes.

"I tried to save her. So many times. I went to medical school for hundreds of years. I went back again and again. I did everything I could. But always... she died during childbirth. And she wouldn't let me undo your birth. She told me I had to raise you well. To make sure you grew up and lived a good life."

Hideki chuckled humorlessly.

"In the end, I couldn't even do that much. The fate of the Earth was at stake. I had it all planned out... everything had to proceed according to one path. You would end up in that cryopod and be saved, someday returning to restore humanity, long after my death."

Hideki looked at Jason, an indescribable emotion in his eyes.

"This was supposed to be the last rewind. Everything was all set up. So, Jason... how the HELL did you end up falling into the Illuminati's clutches?! Nothing like that should have ever happened! I accounted for EVERY variable!"

Jason blinked. He pulled away from Hideki, his own confusion mixing with anger and disbelief. "YOU wanted me to be in the cryopod? You?? But- no wait, why would you abandon me? What's this about 'rewinding'? What in the hell is even going on right now?!"

Hideki coughed. He looked out the window and adjusted course slightly.

"Right. Sometimes I forget that I have to re-explain everything every single time. It gets tiring after a while. Luckily I've become the most patient Sentient in all the universe or I'd have gone insane millions of years ago."

Hideki cleared his throat. He continued to look out the window as he spoke.

"I am a Hero, Jason. A Trueborn Hero, just like you. Due to a variety of extenuating circumstances, my Heroic potential passed on to you as a child, and you became capable of great feats. As for me, my power is simple. I am a temporal manipulator. I can speed up or slow down my perception of time, and I can rewind time to any point in the past, provided that moment is not before my 16th birthday when my powers awakened."

Cat Mask's smile turned dour. "I have rewound time more times than you can imagine. I am far older than the oldest living Volgrim. My age even compares to the oldest living Titans at this point. I've seen things you wouldn't believe..."

Jason coughed. "You can rewind time?! Holy shit! That's amazing! But what's this about 'Volgrim?'? I'm going to die of shock-induced heart attacks at this rate!"

Cat Mask chuckled. "It's funny. You say something similar every time we have these discussions. Ah, how some things never change..."

Part 619: Cat Mask

January 15th, 2021. 5AM. Oregon Airspace.

Cat Mask's silver-colored quad-copter zipped across the skies, invisible to the naked eye, as well as conventional RADAR, LIDAR, and other ground-based detection systems. His expression remained easygoing, but his body always had a tense alertness to it.

"So." Jason said slowly. "You're my father. You can travel through time-"

"Only backwards." Hideki Hiro clarified.

"-right, only backwards." Jason said, correcting himself. "And you can slow time down. You also have lived...?"

"A while. I don't keep track anymore. Millions of years, probably." Hideki said, shrugging. "They blend together. I don't have the luxury of being able to look at a calendar to see how long I've lived. I generally segment things into... 'eras' of my life."

"Eras?" Jason repeated.

"Yeah. I've probably explained this to you a thousand times before, but I have nothing if not infinite patience."

Hideki paused.

"I don't really remember the beginning anymore. Flashes. Bits and pieces. I have long forgotten the faces of my mother and father; your grandparents. Both of them died when I was 14, two years before I gained my ability to rewind time. Even if I go all the way back, I can't see them anymore. I still have pictures but... it's just not the same. I don't remember their voices, or anything that would make them more 'substantial' in my memory."

Jason frowned. "I'm... sorry to hear that."

"Don't be." Hideki said with a shrug. "I feel a small sense of loss, a distant nostalgia, but it's been so long that I don't really care anymore. Sometimes I'm not even sure if I count as 'human'."

He chuckled, but the laugh had no soul behind it. "So many eras came and went. I remember when I first discovered my powers, I first started using them to make a lot of money and live the high life. I wooed a lot of girls, met some... some real babes. Not that I remember any of their faces. Those same girls would be like infants to me these days. Completely unappealing."

The man looked through the glass window, his vision losing focus for a few moments.

"But... I remember your mother. My soulmate. The only woman I ever truly loved. Thinking about her always brightens my day... before turning it gloomy. The light of her smile, the beauty within her eyes... the despair I felt every time she died. It was a cruel inevitability. A 'Fate' that I could not change, even if I wanted. And I tried to save her, Jason. I tried."

"What was her name?" Jason asked.

"Olivia." Hideki said, the corners of his mouth turning up into a smile. "I told countless women about my power. They always believed me eventually, but Olivia was the only one to always believe me, no matter what circumstance I told her, or under what context. She took me at my word and never second-guessed me. She was not as physically attractive as the other women in some ways, but her pure heart was so far beyond them that they could never compare."

Jason listened silently to a story he'd never heard before, at least, not in this timeline. Clearly, his father had told him countless times before, but he had no way of knowing about those other instances.

"It was the damnedest thing." Hideki continued. "I could strike up a conversation with her for the first time under any circumstance. Under a rainy bus stop. Sitting at a nearby table in a restaurant. Even stopping her as we passed in the street. Our connection was... magnetic."

His smile faded.

"I never understood one thing, though, Jason. No matter how many other women I tried pursuing or marrying, I couldn't get any of them pregnant. That is to say, I could get them pregnant, but they always miscarried. There was always some terrible complication that killed the baby, or the mother. And no matter how I tried to tweak the variables, every time Olivia and I conceived a child, it would always turn out to be you. Even if we met three years earlier or later, you would always be born at some point. She would always die during childbirth."

Jason's expression dimmed. By the sounds of it, the universe made it impossible to have ever met his mother. The fact his father had tried could not be underestimated. Jason could only imagine how many rewinds Hideki put into trying to save Olivia.

"Failures. All of them." Hideki said bitterly. "We tried IVF, implanting Olivia's eggs in a surrogate mother. I tried recreating powerful supplements from the future, drugs that would startle you with their effectiveness, and many other things. It never mattered. Olivia's pregnancy with you, provided we made love, was an inevitability. Any other woman's, with me, was always a failure. It made me realize that time travel is not as simple as I had first thought."

"You're making it sound like all of this was Fated to pass." Jason remarked.

"That's what I came to believe." Hideki admitted. "And that ultimately drove me to despair. That began a new period of my life which I formally called the Depression Era, but really was a mix of many things."

Hideki waved his hand flippantly. "I grew depressed. I wandered around, living live forty-five years at a time, rewinding when the Earth met its end, over and over. I don't know how many cycles passed. Then came an Era of Boredom. I started learning random skills just to pass the time. I tried dedicating myself to saving the planet. But I always failed. As an otherwise ordinary human, my abilities weren't capable of affecting battles between Demon Emperors and other similarly powerful entities."

"So, I continued to wander. I spoke to every person on Earth at least once. I broke into every building, uncovered as many secrets as I possibly could-"

"Wait wait, you met EVERY person on Earth??" Jason asked, bewildered. "Broke into every building? Dad, there are billions of people. How are you only millions of years old?"

"Oh, maybe it's not millions. Billions, then. Whatever." Hideki said, casually handwaving the sudden order of magnitude increase in his hypothetical age. "Point being, I came to realize I had one terrible flaw holding me back from achieving greatness. Can you guess what it was? Never mind, I'll just say it since I've already heard your guesses. Yes, it was my flawed human memory."

Hideki tapped the side of his head.

"My memory was not made for these terribly strenuous feats of mental endurance. Even if my brain had enlarged and condensed over time due to age, I was still incapable of storing too many memories at once. The ones I did save were imperfect and degraded over time. That's when I realized I needed a way to keep information with me during rewinds."

Jason raised an eyebrow. "I guess keeping a pen and paper on you wouldn't really work."

"I can only bring my knowledge into the past." Hideki said, nodding. "Physical objects do not rewind with me. Not memory cards, not books, not weapons, not anything substantial from the future except for knowledge. My body will also decay if I rewind to a time before I started bodybuilding. So, I came up with a solution after speaking to Archangel Camael."

Hideki flashed a smile at Jason.

"I collected Solomon's Crown from one of humanity's possible futures, then brought it to Camael. I convinced her to melt it down, condense it, and repurpose it and Solomon into an infinite storage and processing matrix for my brain. Because of the pea-sized device's magical nature, it stays in my brain even when I rewind back to age 16. Everything I saw and learned before and after that point crystallized in my memories, giving me perfect, eidetic memory of all my different experiences. I can recall any moment in time with ease!"

Hideki chuckles. "In fact, it augmented my ability to slow down time, allowing me to think and perceive at high speeds even while time was slowed."

"From my understanding of artifacts, wouldn't that have killed Solomon's soul?" Jason asked.

"It would, and it did. But Solomon agreed to sacrifice himself if it meant empowering one of humanity's Trueborn Heroes. At the time, he knew of your existence and the truth behind our lineage, but he no longer does now. I haven't touched the current location of his Crown since that era. Camael, likewise, has no idea of my current identity. Nobody was supposed to, including you, until everything went haywire during this rewind."

Cat Mask's quadcopter hummed quietly as it buzzed to the east, exiting Oregon's border and heading deep into the heart of Idaho, somewhere inside Boise National Forest. This forest was rugged, with countless hills, trees that varied between extremely sparse and barren versus hyper-dense thickets concealing the ground beneath, and everything in between.

The two men passed over winding rivers and lakes, and Jason occasionally looked out at the beauty of nature, feeling in his heart that Earth was much too precious to allow enemies in the future to destroy it.

"I don't get it." Jason said. "Something changed, then?"

"Something big. I'm still not sure what. In fact, the last twelve years have been insane. I've seen Heroic Aura blips appearing all over the Earth. I thought it was you, but every time I drew close to the expected location of one, it disappeared. Whoever it is, he's been evading me with frightening accuracy. None of my stealth measures have fooled him."

"So it's not me and it's not you." Jason said slowly. "How did you become a Trueborn, anyway?"

"We'll save that conversation for after we touch down." Hideki said. "It'll all make sense soon enough."

Jason fell silent for a time.

"What about the Volgrim? Who are they?"

"Aliens." Hideki replied, his expression turning grim. "Ancient aliens who have infiltrated all of Earth's strategic locations. They live among us, look like us, and act like us. But they are not human. The ones we regularly come into contact with are the weakest members of their five species, the Changelings. The others are far more violent, and will someday rain devastation upon our planet in a manner you simply wouldn't believe if you didn't see it with your own eyes."

Jason's eyes flashed with insight. "Aliens? You've got to be kidding me. Somehow, I'm not surprised. Oh! Dad, dad, do you know what my power is? The Illuminati tried to figure it out, but we didn't have any success."

Hideki paused.

"Welll... I do. But it's weird. The Illuminati believed you were a 'seer'. According to the footage I saw, you are also a master of physical combat. This doesn't track with all the times you and I have spent together. In fact, you were always terrible at fighting. Clumsy, constantly tripping over your own feet, and downright unmotivated. I don't know what changed so abruptly, but it's given me a lot to think about."

With a shrug, Hideki continued. "Anyway... your power isn't all that amazing. It's downright weak. We're about to touch down in a minute. I'll show you once we're not at risk of you sending us falling out of the sky."

Jason blinked. My power is weak? But that can't be right. Why am I so good with weapons? Am I not a seer after all?

The copter descended toward a seemingly ordinary mountaintop covered in a thick overgrowth of trees. To Jason's horror, the ship drew closer and closer, until they started flying directly at the side of the mountain.

"Dad- DAD! Wait, wait STOP! AHHH!!"

"Such a drama queen, every time." Hideki teased, as they crashed- no, flew directly into the tree cover and passed through an invisible barrier. To Jason's relief, the trees and side of the mountain disappeared, revealing a hidden entryway leading deeper into the mountain, as well as, confusingly enough, a seemingly random cabin near the tree-line.

The copter swiftly slowed down, turned around, and gently landed on a small designated helipad next to the cabin. Jason glanced out at the structure, made from cleanly cut logs by a professional crew, and admired its simple appearance.

"This is where you live?" Jason asked, while simultaneously glancing behind himself at a giant steel door embedded on the side of the mountain. "Or in there?"

"Both. I live in a lot of places." Hideki said, before smiling. "I'm... extremely wealthy."

"You are?"

"Well yes. I already told you before that my power allowed me to make a lot of money. As it happens, I own most of the land on Earth, to differing degrees and through various shell companies. Actually consolidating it all and turning it into liquid cash isn't so easy, but I can always turn in favors to get more land or sell land I don't want."

"Just... how rich are you, exactly?" Jason asked.

"Oh, I'm the richest man on Earth, across all of history. I have no competitors." Hideki said, before his smile slipped. "Jason, I know what you're thinking. You're wondering why, if your father was so rich, I would just abandon you to foster care like a deadbeat. Well, there are... countless extenuating circumstances. I'm happy to explain everything, but it will take a while."

The quadcopter's door swished open, and Jason jumped out, followed by his father.

Hideki cracked his neck. "God, a few dozen years sitting in that seat kills my back every time."

"A few dozen years??" Jason asked in bewilderment. "But... we barely flew for an hour."

"I rewound a bunch of times during the trip." Hideki explained. "We kept getting shot down by missiles, pursued by the Air Force, and I even accidentally drew the attention of a Demon Duke once or twice. Those were the most dangerous moments. Luckily, I found a safe path back, like I always do."

Jason frowned. "Were things really that dangerous? Holy shit. You live a life I can't even fathom."

Hideki started walking toward the cabin. Jason followed after him.

"Like I said. I'm extremely patient. I can explain topics a thousand times without getting bored. It's practically one of my superpowers by now. The number of times I've answered any of your questions is mind-boggling. I'm used to it though, so don't worry."

Hideki nodded away from the mountain, toward the valley below. "The Demon Emperors know I exist, even if they don't know my identity in this timeline. They consider me somewhat dangerous, but don't know I'm a Trueborn Hero. I've been very careful about that. They always have a Demon Baron or Duke somewhere within twenty miles of major civilization points, both to keep an eye on humanity, and to look out for high value individuals like me. It's not surprising they may have narrowed down this hideout's location, but they won't find it unless I majorly slip-up. Of course, if I do slip-up, I'll just undo the damage, so it's not a big deal anyway."

Jason scratched his head. He couldn't really argue with his father's logic. If any major error ever popped up, Hideki could just rewind time and undo the mistake.

It was unbeatable, at least in Jason's eyes.

"Say, how do you prevent yourself from dying?" Jason asked, as the cabin drew nearer. "What if someone assassinates you from behind?"

"Time automatically freezes the moment my life is in grave danger." Hideki explained solemnly. "I cannot die if I don't want to. The only time my life was ever in danger was when Camael put me into a coma to install Solomon's condensed Crown-chip, and the time I fought... him."

"Him?" Jason asked.

Hideki stopped walking. He looked at Jason for a moment, then shook his head.

"Gressil. The Emperor of Chaos. The most dangerous demon in existence. He has the unique ability to nullify magical powers, including my rewinding powers. When we fought... he came within a hair's breadth of killing me, but then he stopped, laughed, and walked away. He let me live, and I never found out why."

"Holy... he sounds scary." Jason muttered. "Hope I never encounter him."

Hideki pursed his lips. He looked at Jason as if he wanted to say something, but instead hesitated for a long couple of moments.

"I tried to join you, Jason. In the future, I mean. I tried to freeze myself in a cryopod. But Gressil found me. That's the reason we 'fought'. He ripped me out and threw me to the ground, leaving me utterly defenseless. All my martial ability meant nothing when I was shivering and barely lucid from cryo-sickness. Under the suppression of his magic canceling aura, I was completely helpless. He could have snuffed me out. Instead he gave me a command. Go back or die. I chose to go back. I never encountered him again."

"That's why... my greatest fear was that he would find you, son." Hideki muttered, looking at the ground. "I had no way of knowing if he would, or could. I built Cryotek myself. I staffed it with trustworthy loyalists and made preparations to hide you under a colleague's protection. But in the end, I had no way of knowing if I had properly hidden you. It ate at me, right up until what was supposed to be my final rewind..."

Hideki continued walking. He and Jason finally arrived at the log cabin not far from the helipad. Jason looked around and nearly jumped out of his skin! He was surprised to see a massive grizzly bear sleeping on the ground not ten feet from the path leading to the front door's entry steps. Squirrels sat on the trees overhead, looking down at him curiously. There were even a handful of cats running around, glancing at him and Hideki with disinterested eyes.

Typical cats, Jason thought.

He nudged his father. "Is-"

"That's Greg. Don't mind him. He's a teddy bear." Hideki said, gesturing to the intimidating grizzly bear. "And I don't mean in the way white suburban moms talk about pitbulls. I mean he's literally super nice and loves head scratches. Do be polite and ask permission first, though, with all the animals. It's not kind to get in someone's personal space and pop their bubble. Everyone here is fiercely individualistic for the most part."

Jason raised an eyebrow at Cat Mask's odd phrasing. The two of them continued up to the front door, and Hideki pushed it open.

Inside, a strange assortment of animal smells and odors assaulted Jason's nostrils. He visibly cringed, though at least he noticed there wasn't any odor of pee or poop. Apparently, someone cleaned up after the animals inside well enough.

The front door opened up into a large living room with modern lights hanging on the walls, bathing the interior in warm orange glow. There were some old but well-maintained brown fabric couches in the center of the living room facing an old television screen. The couches, and several accompanying easy chairs, all hosted a variety of animals lounging around lazily. Some of them perked up when Hideki entered, including a rather large black Labrador with insanely long and woolly hair hanging off his body.

"Oh! Friend. New friend. Hello friend." Someone said, making Jason look around in confusion. He didn't see any people in the house, but what he did see was that same giant black lab looking at him, its mouth slightly open. "Hello, friend. What your name?"

Jason's eyes widened like never before. "What the- you- the dog... talks??"

"Uh huh!" The dog said. "Hi!! I Peppy. Nice meet you friend!"

Peppy jumped off his chair and strode over to Jason, then sniffed his hand.

"Oh. Good smell. Nice smell. Clean human. Hi friend!"

Jason looked at his father in bewilderment.

"Right. The animals here talk." Hideki said, as he strode deeper into the house. "I'm feeling a bit hungry. Stay here and introduce yourself to everyone. I'll be back in a minute or two. Or a thousand. Whatever seems realistic from your perspective."

He vanished, heading into what Jason guessed was the kitchen, and at that moment, the living room exploded into voices.

"Whoa! Guys, it's him! It's Hideki's kid!"

"It's little Jason? No way! He's all grown up now!"

"Never saw him in person. He looks nice."

"CAWW!!! Well, I think his face is too small. TOO SMALL! CAWWW!!!"

"Haha, he seems scared. Why don't we all calm down a bit and say hello to him one at a time?"

Jason swiveled his head around. There were birds, lizards, cats, dogs, all kinds of animals that should have been predator and prey, but each and every one of them looked at him with eyes full of intelligence.

He realized that meant the other ones outside could likely also speak, including the giant bear. No wonder his father phrased his introduction to these animals as if they were humans.

"So everyone here can talk?" Jason asked. "Wait, can ALL animals talk? Have I been missing an important Truth about this world the whole time?"

A beautiful white persian cat walked over the the edge of the nearest couch and sat down. He looked at Jason and slowly blinked his eyes. Jason found the little blue bow on the cat's head to be extraordinarily cute.

"Not all animals can speak. Only ones touched by our Father. However, all animals are capable of complex thought. Unfortunately, due to the suppression of intelligence caused by humanity, much of those gains were siphoned away by your species. Ah, where are my manners? My name is Sebastian. I am one of the Five Great Ones in this house."

"Hi, Sebastian." Jason said slowly, looking at the cat in disbelief.

After a few moments, he managed to get over his initial weirded-out state of mind. So what if animals could talk? It really wasn't anything surprising at this point, considering humanity was apparently in the middle of a war between demons, angels, monsters, and aliens. Talking animals were pretty much normal by comparison.

"Well, everyone, I'm Jason Hiro. Hideki's son, though it seems you already know me. Have we met before?"

"Theodor met you, a long time ago, when you were but an infant." Sebastian said. "Theodor was the first to be Uplifted. He is older than all of us, and has been following the Father for many decades now. He may be of advanced age, but he is quite spry."

Sebastian paused. "By the way, you have my permission to 'give scritches'. We house-dwellers don't usually mind, and will even enjoy it, provided your technique is satisfactory."

A calico cat with multi-colored fur nearby yawned. "Yeah! We love when a slav- I mean, an inferior huma- I mean, a really nice guy with good hygiene gives us scritches. It's the best!"

"CAWWW!!!" A crow sitting atop a perch high up on the wall practically screamed. "Well don't go putting your grubby mitts on ME!! I don't LIKE being touched, brat. Got it??"

Jason grimaced. "I wouldn't dream of it. If anyone here wants pets, or doesn't, just let me know. I'm all about consent."

Peppy the black lab suddenly shoved his nose into Jason's crotch and gave it a deep sniff, unnerving Jason. While it was normal dog behavior, it felt extremely weird, given Peppy was clearly a sentient creature capable of speaking normally. "Wow! Good smell! Good smell! I like!"

Peppy's tail began wagging happily, while Jason carefully pushed the aggressively friendly dog's face away. "Ahh, consent, Peppy. Consent. Remember? That was... a little weird."

Over the next few minutes, several other animals introduced themselves. Jealous the Rooster, a giant Doberman named Killer who spoke with a gruff Russian accent, and even a parrot who spoke in a sophisticated manner named Edward Thaddicus Riveiera III. Jason found that particular parrot to be rather weird.

As he made his way deeper into the living room and introduced himself to each of the house's many residents one by one, Jason glanced at the giant TV in the center. It was a surprisingly old television, especially given his father's penchant for technology he had built using knowledge from the future. The television barely had a 14 inch screen, its image was purely in black and white, and yet the screen rested inside a massive mahogany entertainment center-sized frame! Why it needed so much space to project such a tiny screen, Jason had no idea why.

As he looked at it, he noticed the program that was visible on the screen was rather bizarre. It was just a TV show of an old man sitting in a rocking chair, out cold, snoring loudly. He was inside some old fashioned house Jason couldn't recognize, and it didn't appear like any classical show Jason had ever seen.

"The heck?" Jason muttered, as he reached for the dials on the side of the TV.

Jason turned and clicked a few of the dials, but nothing changed. The TV seemed to be defective.

All of a sudden, the old man in the TV woke up with a loud snort.

"Huh- hey! HEY! Who's fiddlin with mah knobs! I told you not to- eh? It's some kid?! You damned brat! Who told you it was okay to fiddle with my TV, eh, boy?! Didn't yer got-damn parents teach you any manners??"

Jason took a step away from the TV, looking at the old man in surprise. "What the- you're a person? You're trapped in the TV?"

"Trapped? The hell you mean, 'trapped'?" The old man exclaimed. "I'm jus' tryina take a nap, you little brat! Can't you let an old man nap in peace! Killer, get 'im!"

Jason's heart went cold as the giant Doberman from before stood up and walked over to the TV.

"Father. This boy is Cat Mask's son. He is good boy. Little bit stupid, da. Don't mind him. He meant no offense."

"Father?" Jason repeated, putting an important puzzle piece together. He looked around the room at the animals. "Wait, so, this guy, he's... your 'Father'?"

"Da. Apologies." Killer said, yawning lazily. "Should have explained before. Everyone here too excited to meet new friend. We not see many humans around here. Did not realize you would touch Father's telly-veezion without permission."

Sebastian snickered. "Well, actually, I just wanted to see Father yell at him. I'd have said something sooner, but the opportunity was too funny to pass up."

"CAWWW!!! Tell him off, Father! Stupid ugly boy! CAWWW!!! Don't like him at ALL!!"

Several other animals nodded their heads and snickered, making Jason's expression fall.

These silly animals were all a bunch of pranksters!

"Well dammit, don't be lettin' random kids touch mah damn dials, people!" The old man exclaimed. "Gonna go back to sleep now. Sheesh!"

He rolled over in his chair and mumbled some other things before quickly passing out again. It barely took ten seconds before his snoring became audible once more.

"So..." Jason said slowly. "Who's the old- I mean, who is your 'Father'? Why is he... trapped inside a TV?"

Sebastian's smile disappeared. The cat let out an eerily human sigh.

"Our Father was a great man once. He walked the Earth with his head held high. He fought in the Great Wars. After he died, he became trapped inside the object he coveted most."

"Our Father's name is Harold Whittaker."

"He was humanity's last Trueborn Hero."

Part 620: Harold, The Last Trueborn

January 15th, 2021. 6AM. Boise National Forest, Idaho.

Jason sat on the couch, listening as the adorable white-haired Persian cat, Sebastian, weaved a short tale for him. The other animals remained silent, allowing Sebastian, one of the 'Five Great Ones' to speak.

"Father was a great man. He was known and feared by the demons. His Heroic power made him nearly undefeatable."

"The ability to talk to animals?" Jason asked.

"That was only one component. He also possessed immense strength, superhuman durability, and a body with an enhanced healing factor. He fought in the first Great War, and the second as well. After the first Great War, when he showed off his powers to the world, the other soldiers gave him a nickname. Captain America."

Jason scoffed slightly. "The name of a comic book character?"

"The comic book came later." Sebastian explains. "It was heavily based on our Father's exploits."

Jason nodded to himself. It made sense. If Harold really was a super strong Nazi killing machine, it was only logical some enterprising comic book creators might weave parts of his life story into a fantastical tale for children, even if they got a lot of the details wrong.

"So he was super strong, and he could talk to animals." Jason said. "That seems a little bit random as far as power combinations go."

"Harold's ability was not only to speak to animals, but to Uplift them." Sebastian explained. "He granted them enhanced intelligence, unlocking their ability to think, strategize, and communicate. He also greatly enhanced our longevity. Animals touched by Father can pass their superior genetics on to our children. Personally, I am already forty of your human years old. The eldest of us, Theodor, was born not long after Father... escaped the Nazis. But, perhaps it is best if Cat Mask explains that part to you."

Jason frowned. Escaped the Nazis? I thought he killed them all. What does my father have to do with it?

Jason remembered something else. "You guys said Harold was the 'last' Trueborn. But that can't be right. My father is a Trueborn, and so am I. Wait... does that mean... we're related to Harold? Is he actually my grandfather? Great grandfather?!"

"He... is not." Sebastian said cryptically. "Ah, here comes your father. I think he'd be happy to fill you in on this next part."

Hideki Hiro rounded the corner with a bowl full of milk and cereal. He slurped up a big bite and looked around the room.

"Seems you've all gotten him up to speed on your names, and on Harold. I'll take it from here."

Despite saying this, he remained silent for several minutes, slurping up his cereal and taking large loud bites while Jason stared at him.

"So...?" Jason asked.

"Shush. Gimme a minute. You don't know how annoying it is to have to rewind and re-eat food a thousand times." Hideki grumbled.

Jason nodded. While his dad ate, he glanced at Sebastian. "So where is that Theodor... guy?"

"Theodor is a German Shepherd." Sebastian told him. "He wasn't Father's first companion, but he was the first after the war. The others... died during the war."

"Oh." Jason muttered. "I'm sorry to hear that."

Hideki finished his cereal. He dropped the bowl on a nearby countertop, then burped. "Urrrrp. Cleaning lady will get that later. Alright, so, Harold was the subject, right?"

Jason nodded, so his father continued to speak.

"Well, the story is a bit long. But... suffice it to say... Jason, you and I... we're not 'Trueborn' Heroes."

Jason blinked. "We're not? The Illuminati said the Heroic Aura picked me."

"Yeah, they probably gave you that whole 'Chosen One' shpiel." Hideki said, before shaking his head. He walked over to the couch and sat down beside his son, patting Jason's back. "Sorry, kid. Harold was the last 'Chosen One.' You and me? We're more like... thieves. Stolen valor. Not by choice, but that's how things shook out."

He gestured toward Harold's sleeping form.

"Harold was there, in the final weeks of World War II. He was going to storm the beaches of Normandy on D-day. Instead, the Nazis captured him. It was a huge setup, probably a conspiracy involving people at the top of the US government, or maybe even the demons. We've never been certain. What we do know is they took him to a top secret site somewhere in Germany, strapped him to a table, and... extracted the raw power of the Heroic Aura."

"They took Harold's power?!" Jason exclaimed in horror.

"They took the Heroic Aura, not his powers. Though he did drastically weaken as a result of losing the Aura. I don't know how the hell the Nazis did it, but those bastards created a super-serum using the Heroic Aura and... some unknown elements. Perhaps demonic magic, or Angel blood, or god knows what. They intended to inject it into their Führer, turn him into the so-called 'Aryan ideal' that he idolized, but one of their top scientists was actually an Ally on Europe's side. He was one of the Japanese biologists brought in by Adolf Hitler to help with extracting the Aura."

"When nobody was looking," Hideki explained, "that man stole the super-serum. Unable to administer it back to Harold, and unwilling to simply throw it away, he injected himself with it. He became a Hero instantly, gaining immense power on the spot. He used his power to tear through the Nazi compound, killing hundreds of soldiers inside the secret laboratory, and ultimately breaking Harold out."

Jason's eyes flashed. "He was Japanese? So... he was..."

"Your grandfather." Hideki said with a nod. "My dad, Ginzo Yamagi, and he later changed his name to escape detection. He adopted the name 'Hiro', had me, and died a couple decades later as a result of the serum's after-effects. My mother died from alcoholism not long after."

"I see." Jason said quietly. "So my grandfather, Ginzo, injected the Heroic Serum, and then passed its power on to you, who passed it on to me. That's why you say we're not 'Chosen Ones,' but instead thieves."

"The Aura's power should not have been ours." Hideki said, sighing softly. "But it is now. There's nothing we can do about it. Harold is already dead, and even though I've studied countless textbooks on biology and other such things, I was never able to locate the research the Nazi scientists used to extract the Aura. Perhaps if I had, I'd have been able to recreate it... not that it matters now. Harold is dead, trapped in his artifact. I have no idea who the next inheritor should be."

Jason gestured to the giant old television. "That's his artifact?"

"In his waning years, Harold spent most of his time after the war watching television. His wife, Helen, took care of him, but for the most part he kept to himself and retired from public life. He ran an animal house where he secretly Uplifted more and more of them, but otherwise, he didn't participate in any further fights. After he died, the world believed that humanity's Trueborn Heroes had perished for good."

"But they didn't." Jason points out. "Whether he did it for the right reasons or the wrong ones, my grandfather became the inheritor of the Heroic Aura. The world never lost its Heroes!"

"I don't know why my father kept his powers a secret, or why he told me to be careful with mine, should I develop them. All I know is he was terrified that remnants of the old Nazi order would find him and steal the power back. After investigating every person on Earth, I can safely say that was never really an issue, but he had no way of knowing."

Hideki slapped his knees.

"So, yeah. That's our story, Jason. Any other questions?"

"Yeah. More than ever." Jason muttered. "But I guess I need to ask the most pressing question. What is my power? Can you tell me now? You said it was 'weak'..."

Hideki looked away for a moment. He sighed, then stood up.

"Let's go outside."

Jason nodded. He stood up and followed his father out the door, but Hideki paused to say hello to the giant grizzly bear, Greg. Greg seemed to grin at him, baring his teeth in an unnervingly human manner.

"Greg, this is my son, Jason." Hideki said, gesturing behind himself.

"Ohhhhh.... your son, huh?" Greg said slowly, as if he were slightly drunk. "I seeee... hellooo, Jason. I am Greg."

"Hi Greg." Jason said, smiling and waving politely. Even if Greg seemed to be a nice bear, Jason felt a little apprehensive about walking over to physically touch him. Greg didn't make any movements toward Jason either. He seemed content to lay in the same spot, unmoving. He was certainly a lazy and well-fed bear.

Hideki walked Jason away from the house over to the tree-line. He paused to look his son in the eye.

"You're a telekinetic, Jason." Hideki said, pausing to let his son digest his words. "You can project metaphysical force through a few Words of Command. By saying 'Push' or 'Pull' or 'Up' and 'Down', you can move things with your mind. Here, give it a try with these logs."

Hideki gestured toward a pile of chopped logs intended for a wood-fed stove. Jason's eyes lit up.

"So that's it? Really?! It sounds awesome!"

He quickly aimed his palm at the pile.

"Push! Uh... Push! ...push? PUSH! Hmm, am I doing it wrong?"

He tried a few more times, but he kept failing to summon any magical power.

"You have to use your Imagination, Jason." Hideki helpfully explained. "Imagine sending a wave of power flying at those logs when you speak. The rest should come naturally."

"Oh, I see." Jason remarked. He paused for a few moments, then mentally imagined a wake of kinetic energy firing from his palm, like his father explained.

"...PUSH!"

Suddenly, a blast of telekinetic energy rocketed out of Jason's palm and slammed into the pile, sending the logs flying!

Jason's heart jumped, and a huge, goofy grin spread across his face.

"It's real! I really can do it! PULL!"

He shouted another Word of Command, then yelped in fright as a log came hurtling directly at his head. Hideki lightly shoved Jason to the side and the log flew past him, clattering to the ground behind Jason with a violent thud. It nearly killed Jason, but... Jason guessed his father might have witnessed the timeline where that actually happened.

"Thanks." Jason said, a little more quietly than before, as he pulled himself to his feet and dusted his pants off.

"I've seen you die a bunch of times." Hideki said in an oddly emotionless tone. "You and your mother both. It's pretty standard at this point."

Jason nodded, but Hideki's words made him feel a pang of emptiness. Something about the man's casual shrugging off of witnessing his son's death for the millionth time was... so very morbid.

Jason acted a lot more carefully after that. "Lift. Up. Down. Sideways."

He started moving the chopped logs with more precision, and Hideki gave him a strange look.

"What is it?" Jason asked, feeling his father's gaze.

"Nothing. It's just... you're picking up the intricacies of your power more easily than you did in the past. Something about you has changed, but I can't say what, for sure."

He seemed to mull this thought over for a short while, then shook his head.

"Well, anyway. That's it. That's your power. Telekinesis, but it requires you to speak an activation word. It's like what the Volgrim's weakest Psions can do, but the requirement of speaking a word first makes it much slower to activate, and easier to counter. That's why I say it's not a bad or a useless power, but simply too weak to affect the future war in any meaningful way. It's the main reason I wanted to send you to the future, hoping you might someday make a bigger difference there."

Jason looked doubtful. "This is all I can do, then?"

Hideki nodded. "I remember the first time I saw you use your power. It was a shock to me, since I was still deeply heartbroken about losing Olivia for the first time. I'd tried saving her dozens of times before, but decided to simply raise you alone for a while and clear my head. When you used your power by accident and sent a bully in college flying, everything clicked. I finally understood that the Heroic Aura had become hereditary. After all, my father passed it to me, but that might have been a coincidence. Having it happen twice proved the pattern."

He patted Jason's back. "Your power may have nearly killed that college bully, but we quickly learned that while it had some practical uses, it just wasn't at the level of taking out Demon Emperors and other ancient powerhouses. I decided to name it 'Verbal Psionics', and I spent a bunch of rewinds learning its limitations."

Cat Mask spent a few minutes explaining the nuances of Jason's power to him, and the young man's face fell as he listened. It truly wasn't all that amazing, at least not compared to ancient Heroes like Arthur. He could certainly levitate and lift objects of several tons, even sending them flying, but he lacked the fine control that actual Psions possessed where they could adapt their psionics in new and novel ways. By comparison, Jason was a one-trick pony.

"I don't know..." Jason said, after his father finished explaining. "This is really it? It's all I can do?"

"I'm sorry, son." Cat Mask said apologetically. "If you throw a three-ton car at an enemy, it will probably kill Demon Barons and badly injure or possibly kill the weakest of Dukes, but against Emperors, your power just isn't sufficient."

Having finally learned the truth of his power, Jason decided to set it aside for now. Later, he planned to do some more experimentation, thinking maybe his father overlooked some crucial details. It felt like he could do so much more, but he wasn't sure to what extent his power could be manipulated.

As the two of them headed back to the cabin, Jason looked at Hideki meaningfully.

"One last question, dad. If you really were so wealthy, why did you leave me in foster care to be... you know? Abused, abandoned. I thought my parents were dead my whole life. Wasn't there another way?"

Hideki's footsteps slowed.

"I'm sorry Jason. Truly. I wanted to raise you properly. I wanted to at least give you some material comforts. But every time I did that, you grew complacent. You tried to live a normal life. You didn't want to enter the Cryopod. I constantly faced barriers trying to get you to listen to me. I even considered sedating you and putting you in there by force, but I didn't want you to wake up hundreds of years in the future, filled with hatred. I decided it would only work if you entered the Cryopod of your 'own' volition. And that, in itself, only happened when you felt as if you had nothing left worth living for."

For the first time since meeting Jason, Hideki looks at his son with a truly pained expression.

"I drove you to depression and suicide. You entered the Cryopod because your foster parents had died, you had no friends, and no job prospects. I artificially manipulated your whole life. It's... it's the thing I hated most. No decent father would want that for his son."

Jason met his father's eyes. He saw a pain he empathized with. Despite not having children of his own, Jason felt that, if he were their father, he would also make a similar choice, given what little he knew of Hideki's powers.

How many times had Hideki rewound time, finding Jason goofing off with his mountain of money, squandering his life away, doing drugs or sleeping with beautiful women instead of caring about a distant future war?

How many times had Hideki tried to reason with Jason, only to be met with the rebellious streak every teenager went through? It would probably have felt like he was banging his head against a wall.

Perhaps Hideki could have convinced Jason to enter the Cryopod eventually, but at what cost? He also needed to set up all the events that would... save Earth? Save remnants of humanity?

Jason felt that if it was the 'him' of three days ago, he'd be enraged by his father's deception.

But today was different.

Jason didn't feel much anger at all. He felt Hideki's actions were somewhat reasonable, as if the whims of an eighteen year old simply didn't apply to him anymore. In fact, even though his father might rewind time again and try to put Jason in the Cryopod, he even had a new idea come to his mind right on the spot.

"Dad." Jason said quietly. "I will enter the cryopod again. If that is what will save the future of humanity, I'll do it."

Hideki turned to look at him, a hint of surprise in his eyes.

"What? You will?"

"Yeah." Jason said, his voice low. "I get it. I see why you'd want to save me. You probably blame yourself for all the harm I've endured. But truth be told, it feels like all of that was such a long time ago. I don't blame you for it. I was a young, dumb teenager. I'm willing to master my power, then enter the Cryopod and come out someday, ready to save whatever is left of humanity."

Hideki remained silent for a time. He gazed at Jason as if looking at a stranger.

"...You really are different." Hideki murmured. "The Jason I know would never speak like this. There's this... strange... sagely look in your eyes. Like you're older than you appear. Did something happen, Jason? Did something change you? Why has your mentality shifted so dramatically on this rewind cycle?"

"I don't know." Jason honestly replied. "Sorry. I just feel that I can empathize with you, as a father, even if I don't have children of my own."

Hideki smiled. He reached out his arms, and then, for the first time since they met... he walked forward and wrapped his arms around his son.

Jason and Hideki embraced, sharing their first father-son hug since they'd met.

Tears welled up in Jason's eyes. He suddenly felt that, despite the mysterious sense of loss that had been haunting him since he awoke two days ago, he'd at last regained something precious, something he didn't even know he wanted.

"Dad..."

"Jason..."

After a few moments, they pulled apart. Jason wiped the tears from his eyes. He was surprised to see that even Hideki looked a little misty as he quickly wiped at his own eyes.

"I.. I don't remember the last time I held you." Hideki said, closing his eyes and turning away. "I hardened my heart. I told myself it was necessary to put distance between us. But... I regret, son. I regret it all... so much."

"We can always start over." Jason said, smiling faintly. "You don't have to go at this alone, dad."

Hideki nodded.

"I see that now. You don't have to go in the cryopod immediately, Jason. If you're willing to do so, you can enter later. I would rather... take some time getting to know your new capabilities. It's clear that you're not the same flippant boy I originally raised. Whatever has changed, it's made you a better man than I ever could. We can take the 'you' of now and turn him into a demon-killing machine. Even if your powers aren't as strong as I'd like, with some ingenuity and willingness to experiment, we can always find powerful ways to use them."

"I'd like that." Jason said. "I sense my powers have more to them than what you've seen. Can't really put my finger on why I think that way. It just feels... right."

The two men walked back to the log cabin. Hideki paused behind Jason as his son took a few steps up the stairs.

"You stay here for a while. Talk to Harold's animals." Hideki said. "They have a lot they can tell you. Harold too, if he wakes up and doesn't act like his usual cranky self."

"Where are you going?" Jason asked.

Hideki's body abruptly blurred for a few seconds. Then he turned and looked around, his eyes full of suspicion.

"I have some matters to deal with inside my underground base. I'll be back, son."

Jason also looked around, but he didn't see anything out of the ordinary.

Perhaps, when his father's body blurred like that, it meant he had just rewound time several times in a row?

"Dad? Is everything okay?"

Hideki chewed on his lower lip.

"You might have a visitor while I'm gone." He said cryptically. "But don't worry. I'll be nearby. I won't let anything happen to you."

Jason's expression turned grave. He nodded, but secretly, he raised his internal alert level.

Dad is acting spooked. He must have fought a demon sometime in the immediate future, or something similar. I'll have to proceed with extreme caution.

Hideki glanced at Jason. "The animals here are not ordinary. If push comes to shove, they can protect you. It would be best not to rely on them, but we haven't had time to train you in using your powers. Be prepared for anything."

"I will." Jason promised.

They nodded at each other.

"See you, dad."

"Sooner rather than later." Hideki affirmed.

He turned and marched away from the cabin, heading toward the metal door in the side of the mountain. After he left, Jason's stomach knit together in worry.

What had spooked his father so badly?

Part 621: Cat Mask's Madness

January 15th, 2021. 7AM. Boise National Forest, Idaho.

As he left the log cabin, Hideki donned his mask once more. He never quite felt comfortable stepping out into the world anymore without assuming the identity of Cat Mask. To those unaware, his actions might seem silly, but countless eons of learning how the minds of his fellow humans, demons, and Volgrim worked had left Cat Mask with one primary belief.

Reputation was power.

A mask was power.

People who saw his face would reflexively lower their guards. He had a kindly appearance, and did not resemble a hardened monster who had killed billions, even trillions of Sentients across the span of his life. His skin was still soft, and his facial hair never quite fully developed into something a grizzled mountain-man should look like.

But the mask he wore was different. He had many masks, not just the one. Each had a different appearance. Some were spooky and weird, some were friendly and kind. Still others were menacing, carrying an entire aura of invincibility all on their own.

As he left the cabin, he put on his 'standard' mask, one that looked like a generic nekomimi spirit that anyone could purchase from a Japanese marketplace. When he was a boy, shortly after his father had passed away, his mother bought him this very mask as a memento to her late husband. While Hideki had long forgotten the majority of 'who' his mother was, he still treasured this mask in particular. It came from a simpler time, an era when he had no grand ambitions, no knowledge of any future wars, and no understandings of the evils in the universe.

But time changed a man. Eternity made him unrecognizable.

Cat Mask had long seen through the whims and wills of other people. He knew how they thought, even if he couldn't read minds. He could understand their intentions by reading the most subtle of facial cues, or the direction they pointed their feet when they spoke, or even by the way they walked.

Everyone wore a mask. He was far from alone in this regard.

Some people wore emotional masks. They put on a strong face while their heart crumbled to pieces. A recent death in the family. A romantic rejection. An unmet desire.

Other people wore intellectual masks. They pretended to be smarter in order to obtain grants and favors. They pretended to be stupid so they could blend in with the lower castes of society. Sometimes, they even acted more or less intelligently just to get a rise out of people. And some believed they were intelligent when they were actually the dumbest people in the room.

Hideki was no different. He simply wore the mask physically on his face. He adopted whatever persona would get him the optimal benefits at any given moment in time.

Jason wanted a loving father. Hideki could no longer provide that for him. After so many eons growing, changing, evolving as a Sentient, Hideki... didn't feel attachment anymore.

And why would he?

He'd watched Jason grow up thousands of times. He'd tried to train the boy more times than he even cared to remember. He saw his son brutally murdered time and time again. Sometimes by demons, sometimes by Volgrim, sometimes even by his fellow humans.

Sometimes, when Cat Mask tried to line things up so Jason would enter the Cryopod, he pushed Jason too far. The young man killed himself out of grief and depression.

Oh well. Cat Mask would think at times like those. Guess I'll just have to try again.

And so he did.

He rewound time once, twice, a thousand times, a million times.

He made painstaking notes via the library of Solomon installed in his brain. With its help, he was able to identify all the optimal 'prompts' he could use to change the trajectory of everyone's lives around him.

It was hard to see people as 'people'. In fact, Cat Mask no longer even bothered trying.

Sentients were all so painfully simple, in his eyes. Everyone had a pre-programmed response for certain situations, even if they didn't know it.

"Nice weather today?"

"Yeah, seems good."

How many times had he engaged in these awful, mind-numbing dialogue trees? It was like a video game for him, but in real life. He didn't even know why he bothered trying to save humanity or protect it from destruction anymore.

Why did he care?

What did it matter if all these NPCs died?

Cat Mask thought these things, and many others, for the billionth time. He'd had these mental arguments so many times over his life that it was as if there were multiple versions of himself, all sitting in his Mind Realm, engaged in a pointless, neverending debate.

Cat Mask sighed as the cabin grew more distant behind him.

I want to die.

He was supposed to die a long time ago. He had everything set up. His son would enter the Cryopod, get sent to the future, and all the pre-planned events would occur afterward.

Humanity's construction of the Unified Management Interface.

The Volgrim's invasion.

The deaths of millions, then billions.

The war between angels and demons.

The ultimate destruction of Earth.

And there, at the very end, he would finally allow time to resume as the Earth fell, dying along with it.

But then, on the very last rewind, at the final juncture where all his efforts would finally bear fruit...

It all changed.

Everything went wrong.

Out of nowhere, the entire timestream shifted.

Lowborn humans started appearing everywhere.

Jason no longer entered the cryopod. He was taken by the Illuminati.

"Fuck fuck FUCK!" Cat Mask cursed for the millionth time. "Why did it CHANGE?! I have to start over now! I have to reorganize all the events! Why can't the universe just let me DIE?!"

He was tempted to give up.

He wanted to throw his hands up in the air, put a gun to his head, and end it all.

He was sure he could do it.

But...

At the same time...

He couldn't help but feel curious. A fragment of his humanity boiled with hunger.

What the hell had changed the world so drastically?

Why had everything come apart at the seams?

He itched to know the Truth behind this conspiracy.

"Could it be... him?" Cat Mask muttered.

Gressil.

He must be behind this, somehow.

What had that demon bastard done?

Cat Mask approached the mountainside. The massive metal door slowly creaked open as he entered.

The inner hallway that led down into the mountain was massive, far too vast for him to traverse on foot. Instead, he hopped in a small shuttle parked near the entrance, where a robot driver silently verified his identity, then zipped into the mountain at max speed.

Cat Mask loved robots.

Unlike humans, they could be programmed and told to shut up.

Humans always wanted to know things. They always had those damned annoying questions.

Sure, Cat Mask answered Jason's questions ten thousand times. But he hated doing it.

He was extraordinarily patient. But that didn't mean he enjoyed repeating the same lines in the dialogue tree known as 'life'.

It was tiresome. So very, very tiresome.

He'd tried other methods. During one particular era, he used a robot controlled by Solomon's Seed to answer all of Jason's questions. Cat Mask put in some earbuds and ignored his son while the robot answered every little question Jason had.

It was simple. Efficient. Bliss.

The robot possessed all of Cat Mask's knowledge. Anything Jason wanted to know, it told him.

And the result was devastating. Jason saw his father as an unfeeling monster, unwilling to speak to him.

Jason killed himself out of grief. Again and again.

It drove Cat Mask insane.

"Why does he only want to speak to ME?! The robot gave him so much more information. It was the most efficient way to convey everything he wanted to know!"

But he knew why, even if he hated the truth.

Jason was a broken young man. It was Hideki's fault.

He'd put his son through hell. Forced him to live in foster care. Forced him to endure just enough pain that instead of killing himself, he willingly froze himself to travel to a dubious future.

Hideki sometimes felt a little guilty. But that feeling went away.

It was all for the greater good. That's what he told himself.

He knew these were mere platitudes. A minor fraction of the war between his different selves, all squabbling and arguing inside his Mind Realm. They justified his actions one day, only to condemn him the next.

They were the greatest torture he had to endure.

Cat Mask's shuttle rode down the giant shaft into the mountain, a tunnel large enough to fit a skyscraper-sized spaceship, and eventually he reached the end. There, two extremely formidable looking armored robots stood at attention. They scanned him and verified his identity.

These machines were more terrifying than even their frightening appearances implied. Each one was individually as strong as a Demon Duke, and while their production quality was insanely high, the time and resources needed to build just one was truly exorbitant. Cat Mask only had a dozen, and he stationed all of them inside his underground Idaho base. He'd stolen their schematics from the Volgrim at some era in the distant past and applied countless improvements over the years.

All together, they might have the capital to take out a single Demon Emperor. In fact, he'd done just that a few times.

But it was never easy. The difference between machines and Sentients was always that Sentient emotions could give them huge bursts of power, particularly in life-and-death situations. Push them too far, and they might erupt with 50% more strength than in the previous loop.

Sentients were such a pain.

He entered the locked door and the robots slammed it shut behind him. Their ability to validate him came from their detection of Solomon's Seed located in his cranium. Since it was one-of-a-kind, detecting it was all they needed to do, and it ensured he didn't actually have to speak to verify his identity.

Ah, the bliss of silence.

Cat Mask detested talking to other people. He hated it more than life itself, but it was a necessary evil he constantly had to endure. That was easily the biggest reason he loved robots. No backtalk. No useless questions.

Upon entering the facility, Cat Mask emerged into a massive underground area covered in catwalks. Below him, various military craft were under construction, with tunnels spreading out all across Idaho to ship in the goods necessary to build his future weapons. Since humanity could not win the war, no matter what actions they took, the purpose of this facility was not to do that, but instead to stymie the bleeding. Someday, it would form the foundation of a place known as the Remnant Oasis, and it would be run by Cat Mask's most important colleague, Marie Becker.

But that was in the future. The time was not yet right, as Marie and Cat Mask had only established a shallow relationship at this point in the timeline. He glanced at his watch just to make sure.

Still a few weeks on the timeline before my next major interaction with her. Maybe I should try accelerating things. I haven't spent enough time with Jason yet to understand all the changes he's been through. Still need to spar with him and validate his level of martial training. The recordings I took from the Illuminati show he's suddenly become extremely skilled in hand to hand combat. Bizarre. Very bizarre indeed.

Marie might be able to help me understand why he's changed like this. I can probably get her to invent a brain-scanner or something. Still haven't tracked down the source of those Heroic blips scattered all across the world. If it's not Jason, then who could it be?

Cat Mask walked over to a robot that was hovering a short distance away, taking care not to disturb Cat Mask or speak to him unless spoken to first.

"Butler." Cat Mask said, addressing the small black hovering machine. "Show me the location of the most recent Heroic blips."

"Yes." Butler said, keeping its responses short and sweet. It projected a holographic globe of the Earth before Cat Mask, followed by dozens of white dots scattered across all the continents.

"Narrow down to the last 24 hours. Show the exact times these blips were noted." Cat Mask ordered.

Silently, Butler did as commanded. The number of dots decreased by over 99%, leaving just eight of them, mostly centered on Russia, with a couple dots in the USA, and one in Germany.

Cat Mask leaned forward. He examined the two in the USA, and was unsurprised to see that one of them was right inside the Cryotek laboratory.

"Can't be Jason." He muttered. "Maybe someone observing him? Butler, pull up the security tapes for Cryotek labs. I want to see the video feed for when these blips appeared."

"Yes." Butler answered.

A few moments passed.

Butler's eyes flashed red.

"Error. Tapes unavailable."

"Huh? They are?" Cat Mask asked, bewildered. "Every time! It's always like this. How the hell is this 'Hero' so adept at infiltration? They always cover their tracks."

He looked at the second blip, and his heart turned cold.

"What? Right outside?! Not even ten minutes ago! It's heading toward Jason!"

Hurriedly, Cat Mask rewound time. He quickly jumped backward twenty minutes to just before he stepped inside the tunnel. Instead, he ran back toward the log cabin and looked around, pulling out a hand-scanner to search for the mysterious heroic aura blips.

Jason came outside. "Dad? You're back already?"

"Quiet." Cat Mask said gruffly, irritation on his face. Jason didn't see it due to the mask, but he sensed something was agitating his father.

Thirty minutes later, Cat Mask cursed under his breath. "Bastard. He doesn't show up when I'm here, eh? Then I'll try watching from a distance."

Cat Mask rewound time again. He traveled back to the entrance of the underground complex, then he quickly ran and hid in some bushes, peering at the cabin from across the helipad.

Minutes passed. He stole glances at his Heroic Aura scanner, but frustratingly, the blips didn't reappear.

"You motherf-" Cat Mask cursed, gnashing his teeth. "Oh you think you're cute?! Wasting my god damn time..."

He rewound again. This time, he entered the underground complex and hopped in the shuttle. When he reached the bottom, he kept a careful eye on the heroic energy scanner.

"There!" He exclaimed. "It just appeared! Now to hurry back..."

He instantly stopped the shuttle, turned it around, and raced back up to the top. As he arrived at the exit gate, he glanced at the scanner again.

"GONE?! What do you MEAN, gone?! Why did it disappear?! You sneaking, thieving, skulking bastard of a Hero! When I get my damn hands on you I'm gonna wring your neck!"

Like a game of Cat and Mouse, Cat Mask continually rewound time. He placed cameras around the area secretly, but when the Heroic blip appeared, they were all corrupted and ruined. Cat Mask realized that this entity was capable of long-distance teleportation, something Cat Mask himself was incapable of doing.

"Fuck fuck fuck fuck!!" Cat Mask screeched. "What intentions do you have toward my son?! You think I'm just going to let you hurt him?! Aw, screw it. Do your worst! I'll just rewind if you kill him anyway! Stupid jackwagon!"

Cat Mask gave up on trying to intercept the Heroic blip. He instead drove back into the mountain to continue his original mission, all the while, keeping an eye on the blip's signature as it approached the log cabin once more.

If the so-called Hero killed Jason, or spoke to him, Hideki would simply find out in a bit, then rewind later to change things. At the very least, he'd have the intel he needed to understand the situation.

He'd done things like this a million times.

Nothing to it.

Jason sat on the couch, talking to Sebastian about his father. Suddenly, there was a light knock at the door.

"Huh? Is dad back already?" Jason asked. It had only been ten or fifteen minutes since he left. Why would he knock? Why not just walk inside?

Confused, Jason got up and walked over to the front door. When he opened it, there was a teenage girl standing outside, her palms squeezed together, looking at him in concern.

Jason blinked. The girl looked familiar.

It only took him a second to place her face. She was that same girl who spoke to him at Cryotek Labs just a few days before. She was extraordinarily beautiful, with long blonde hair tied up in a ponytail, bright blue eyes that mirrored his, but now she was wearing a military uniform of some sort.

"Uh..." Jason said, looking at the pretty girl. "The girl from Cryotek? Why are you here? Did Cat Mask send you?"

The girl looked at him for a moment, then shook her head.

"Do you remember me? I'm Daisy."

"Daisy? Yeah, you mentioned your name last time." Jason muttered.

Daisy seemed to become irrationally angry because of his distant tone. She stomped her shoe and scrunched up her face.

"That's not what I mean! You're different! You changed all of a sudden! Are you really telling me you don't recognize me, Jason? You don't recognize my name?!"

Taken aback, Jason slowly shook his head. "...No? I'm sorry... miss Daisy... I don't know you. I'm pretty sure I'd remember if we dated in high school or something. I wasn't exactly... popular with the girls."

"Popular with the- NO!" Daisy exclaimed. "Dammit! It's ME! Daddy, it's ME! I'm Daisy! I'm your daughter! Why can't you remember me??"

Jason squinted.

She did look slightly familiar. But. Daughter? The girl was clearly unwell.

Jason chuckled to try and defuse the situation. "Ahaha... look, miss, I'm only eighteen, you know? And you seem to be about my age too. I don't know who you've gotten me mixed up with, but I can't possibly be your father."

Daisy glowered at Jason. She seemed uncertain whether he was being obtuse or whether he had genuinely forgotten her.

"My mother's name was Phoebe." Daisy said. "You loved her. You loved her! Don't tell me you can't remember!"

Jason grimaced. The girl was clearly going mad now. He did have that weird thought a day ago that he had a wife, but it made no sense at all. The timeline literally didn't add up. He was suffering from delusions.

Wait. Was this girl a delusion? Was she made up in his head too?

Jason glanced at the animals. "You guys can see this girl, right? Daisy? I'm not hallucinating her?"

Sebastian looked at him like he was an idiot. "No, you're not hallucinating. There's really a girl there. She says she's your daughter."

"Dad! Daddy! Come ON! I tried so many times over the years to test you, see if you'd recognize me, but you never came close. Now you're telling me after you've suddenly changed this much you're STILL ignorant about me?" Daisy protested.

Before Jason could blow off her words again, Daisy suddenly held up a CD.

"I recovered this from the Illuminati. Several recordings of you talking to other people in there. You told them you had a bunch of weird memories you couldn't explain. Dad, those were REAL memories! They're from the future! The future!!"

Jason fell silent. The words she was saying... they made sense. They explained so much. But they were also too convenient.

Memories from the future? Is that why he was suddenly so adept at fighting with a bo staff? Why he kept randomly thinking about a 'wife' who couldn't exist? Why he knew about various demons despite never having met them?

It seemed a convenient excuse, but Jason realized he already knew time travel was possible. His own father had the power to manipulate time!

Could Jason have also time-traveled? But then, who was this girl?

"You're my daughter?" Jason asked.

"Yes. Your daughter. Daisy. You and mom had me in the future. The FAR future." Daisy explained. "Are you remembering now?"

Jason slowly shook his head. "I don't remember. But I feel like I should. So many weird things have happened to me recently- wait, if you're from the future, then how did you travel to the past? Is time travel just a thing that runs in the family? First my dad, then me, then you?"

"Your dad?" Daisy asked.

"Yeah. He goes by the alias 'Cat Mask." Jason explained. "But his real name is Hideki Hiro. He's my father, a Trueborn Hero. Are you a Hero too?"

Daisy nodded slowly. "I am."

She pointed at her hair. "Blonde hair, blue eyes. It's the mark of the Heroic Aura."

Jason nodded with realization. "If that's true, then... why can't I remember you? Why can you travel through time and remember me, but not vice-versa?"

Daisy sighed helplessly. "I don't know. I arrived here 12 years ago, when I was only six years old. I was picked up by some weird people and then- oh, it's a whole story. It's not important. Dad, we need to unlock your memories! Can't you use your word magic to do that?"

Jason raised an eyebrow. "My Verbal Psionics? But those are only good for telekinesis."

Daisy looked at him in bewilderment. "What the heck are you talking about? Dad, you're a Wordsmith! Your magic is called Wordsmithing! Surely you'd at least remember THAT much! You can make anything happen just by speaking a single word. It's like your signature ability!"

Jason glanced at the room full of animals behind him. Sebastian and the others watched with great curiosity as this unexpected meeting took place.

"Wordsmithing..." Jason said, turning slowly to look at his daughter's feet. He fell deep into thought.

"Yes," Daisy explained. "Dad, listen. You can do anything with a single Word of Power. You were like, the coolest dad ever! You used to do all sorts of tricks for me, and you'd go to any length to make me smile, and laugh and- never mind, that's not important. The point is... you might be able to unlock your memories! Just say it! Say the magic word!"

"The magic word." Jason said, nodding slowly.

He looked Daisy in the eyes.

Her beautiful blue eyes.

One thought appeared in his mind.

She hadn't aged a day.

"Remember." Jason said.

At that moment, everything shattered.

Part 622: THE GREAT SHATTERING

January 15th, 2021. 8AM. Boise National Forest, Idaho.

Jason screamed.

A thousand images roared into his brain. Flashes of events that played in and out of sequence.

He remembered his original life. He remembered entering the Cryopod.

He awoke to a pitch-black Labyrinth, hunted by a two-headed monster.

He met a pretty girl who he quickly fell in love with.

He killed her.

He met another woman who nursed him back to health.

He killed her.

He watched as his daughter was born, a girl who loved him with all her heart.

He killed her.

He made friends with a giant, lovable crocodile.

He nearly killed him.

Through direct action, inaction, or a failure to respond to threats, Jason repeatedly left the people he cared about dead in his wake.

He professed to hate violence, yet that was always the path he took.

He claimed to love his wife, yet he spent hundreds of years away from her, closed off in another dimension.

He told humanity that he had changed and would become its savior, yet it ended up reduced to ashes as a result of his failure to predict his enemy's movements.

One by one, ten at a time, even thousands at a time, events from his life played inside Jason's mind. He fell to the ground and clutched the sides of his head, screaming and crying inconsolably as his heart ripped into pieces.

Phoebe was dead.

She was dead!

He couldn't save her. He couldn't revive her. He couldn't bring her back!

And now it didn't matter. He had left his future friends behind like a coward and fled to an indeterminate past!

He had-

"Dad! DAD!" Daisy exclaimed, shouting to try and get his attention. "Your thoughts- they're chaotic! Stop, just STOP!"

She pulled his hands away from his head, then pressed her fingers against his temples. After a few long seconds, Jason's vision finally cleared up. He collapsed and lay on the floor, trembling slightly.

"Failed..." Jason mumbled. "I failed..."

"What's wrong? Dad, do you remember now?" Daisy asked, though she could tell based on his surface thoughts he'd definitely broken open whatever dam was keeping his future memories locked away.

Jason closed his eyes. He pressed his palms against his face and curled up into a ball on the floor.

For several long seconds, he gently rocked himself.

"...killed her." Jason whimpered. "I killed Phoebe. It was my fault."

Daisy's worried expression turned grim. She pulled her hands away and stood up, giving her father a long, strange look.

"You... you did? Mom? She's...?"

"Dead. All my fault." Jason cried. "Why? Why did I come this far back? I wasn't supposed to... not what I wanted..."

Daisy's expression dimmed.

In spite of her father's words, she already suspected something like this might have happened. She didn't know anything for sure, but based on the distant memories from her childhood, she remembered that her father and mother loved each other deeply.

If he had truly traveled back in time in a manner similar to the way she herself did, there must have been a terrible reason behind it.

"Dad. What happened?" Daisy asked, swallowing a heavy lump in her throat. "Talk to me. Please. I've waited so long..."

She knelt back down and helped her father up. The impact on his psyche left Jason feeling a despair deeper than anything else in his life.

When he lost Phoebe, it was as if a hole had opened up in his heart. He disassociated, unable to reconcile his failures as a man and husband with the reality of his situation.

But now, with all those memories hitting him at once, he nearly melted like a stick of butter in the midday sun. He blubbered and cried while his daughter gave him the most comforting hug she could.

Daisy never imagined this would be how she reunited with her father.

It took a few minutes, but eventually, Jason managed to pull himself back together.

His cries fell silent. He became more stone-faced as the reality of the situation set in.

Tears would not change anything.

"Daisy..." Jason said quietly. "You're... all grown up now. My little girl. I don't... how? How did you...?"

"Daisy pressed her face against Jason's hair. She closed her eyes.

"It's a long story, dad. A long story. I only remember bits and pieces of my childhood. I remember a terrible heat. It burned me, made me feel I was going to die. I wanted to protect you... then everything went black. I awoke in the darkness, and there was... a monster..."

"A monster?" Jason asked.

"Yeah. I try not to think about it. A scary monster. Two heads. Glowing... red eyes... all over its body. It said something to me... I screamed. I ran away. The next thing I knew, I was here."

Daisy squeezed her eyes together.

"But I don't want to talk about me right now, dad. I want to talk about you. Where have you been? Why are you here now? What changed?"

Another long silence followed.

Jason swallowed several heavy breaths. He flicked his eyes around, sensing the gazes of many different animals, all looking at him with great concern. No longer did they have the same lightheartedness about them. They recognized something terrible had happened. The Jason who arrived less than an hour before was not the one seated in their living room now.

"The day you died was one of the hardest days of my life." Jason said softly. "It changed everything for me. It broke me. Made me want to become a stronger man. Even though I now know you didn't die, I didn't at that time. I had to alter who I was as a human to make myself an entity nobody would ever cross again."

Jason chuckled. "But I failed. I failed, like I always do. Because I'm a useless man."

Daisy listened to her father's words. She heard the maniacal despair at the heart of what he was saying, and it made her weep internally.

Just what had happened to break her father this badly? What horrors had he endured?

Daisy pulled away. She looked her father in the eyes.

"Tell me what happened, dad. Don't hold anything back."

Jason nodded numbly. "Alright."

And so he spoke. For the next fifteen minutes, Jason told his daughter about the future following her death. Beelzebub's detonation. Millions of humans dead. The procurement of Camael's Cube. The rise of the Super Kolvaxians. The attack on Maiura, and the battle between himself and Hope. The final destruction of Tarus II.

Daisy's eyes dulled. She listened to her father, realizing with every word just how badly the future turned out. She had a little brother, but she could never meet him. Her mother had died. It was no wonder her father lost all hope and decided to rewind time.

"The one who convinced you to travel back in time... it was 'Gressil?'" Daisy asked evenly. "Was he the same two-headed monster I encountered?"

"Perhaps he was." Jason muttered. "He was behind this. All of this. Everything. He played me for a fool. But he wasn't a monster. He was a demon. And he's alive right now, in this era."

Jason's eyes flickered with hatred. Deep in the bottomless pit his soul had become, he made a judgment call.

Gressil killed Phoebe.

So what if Gressil said he didn't? Phoebe's death was way too suspicious. And Gressil just appearing like that afterward, taking advantage of Jason at his weakest?

Gressil had to be behind her death. Jason made sure a thousand times that nothing would happen if someone transitioned from normalspace to Chrona. It was always the inverse that caused problems, and he mostly solved even that.

So how could Phoebe have died? How?!

The answer was obvious. Gressil did something. He sneaked behind her, assassinated her right before she disappeared, and made it look like an accident. Like it was Jason's fault.

I'll have to find him later. Jason thought, his expression curling into a momentary visage of pure rage. I'll make him pay.

Daisy frowned. She saw the look on her father's face, and heard the words in his mind. As a capable telepath, she was well aware of the way other people thought. Her father was no exception. She could hardly blame him for his rage. She felt just as angry, knowing her mother was dead in the future. She felt helpless, knowing there was no longer anything she could do to save her mom.

"Let's focus on things we can fix right now." Daisy said. "Dad... we're back together again. I thought... I thought you'd have to enter the cryopod like before. I thought once that happened, I'd never see you again. I was resigned to watching you disappear and living out my life here in the past."

Daisy balled her hands into fists.

"But I'm not resigned to doing that anymore! You finally have your memories back! You and I, together, we can change the future! We can save humanity from suffering at the hands of the demons!"

Jason fell silent. He lowered his eyes to look at the floor.

"A lot would change if we did that."

"I know." Daisy said. "I've thought about it a lot. You wouldn't go to the future. You wouldn't live the same life. You wouldn't meet mom, you wouldn't have me... but clearly, the fact we're still here- doesn't that imply we've avoided a time paradox? Maybe the future is still playing out somehow! I'm currently working on my degree in theoretical physics. I've been learning about all kinds of important things. Maybe there's still a way we can go back to the future and save mom someday!"

Hearing that his daughter had already started college only depressed Jason further. He looked up at her and sighed.

"You've grown up so much, sweetie. I wish I'd been there. I wish I'd never lost you. I don't know how I can possibly apologize."

"There's no time for regrets." Daisy said, smiling weakly. "What happened, happened. All we can do now is work together to improve the future. We-"

Suddenly, in the middle of Daisy's speech, a pair of footsteps came stomping up the porch behind her. Daisy turned around to see a forty-something Japanese man with a nekomimi mask hanging halfway off his face, his expression frantic with panic, his eyes bloodshot.

"Jason! JASON!!" The man practically screamed. "Oh my god! OH MY GOD! Something happened. Something insane! I can't- who the hell is this girl?!"

Hideki looked at the blonde girl in the doorway. He glanced at the scanner in his hand, seeing that the 'heroic blip' he had been tracking was standing less than a meter from his current position.

"It's you?!" Hideki asked, looking at Daisy in bewilderment. "You're the one who's been stalking my son? Just who the hell are you?"

Daisy narrowed her eyes. "Son? You're Jason's father?"

"I'm asking the questions here, young lady!" Hideki shot back.

"This 'young lady' has a name." Daisy instantly retorted, standing up straight to look him in the eyes. "I'm Daisy Hiro, Jason's daughter. And if you're my dad's father, than that makes you... my grandfather."

Hideki momentarily blanked out. He looked the blonde-haired, blue-eyed girl up and down.

She did have a little bit of Japanese in her, but also appeared somewhat British in some ways. And why was she wearing a Russian military outfit?

No, more importantly, how in the damned dickens could she be Jason's daughter? Hideki knew very well his son was horrible with women. There's no way he'd be able to bed a- no, but the issue was the age! How could Jason have a daughter the same age as him?!"

Jason stood up. He sighed heavily and wiped his eyes.

"Dad. The situation has changed. A lot. Everything has been made more clear to me. I know why everything changed when I woke up two days ago."

"It just changed again." Hideki said, standing up a little straighter. "It's a catastrophe, Jason! I can't rewind anymore! Not past about twenty minutes ago! It's like there's a wall blocking my time travel! Don't you see?! Someone screwed up my powers! Maybe it was your 'daughter'?! I CAN'T REWIND, son!"

Jason blinked. He was taken aback by the panic in Hideki's voice. This had never happened in the past, and Hideki was breaking down in real time at the knowledge he could no longer go back to before...

Before...

Jason narrowed his eyes.

"Twenty minutes? That should be about when I regained my memories."

"Memories?" Hideki repeated. "What memories? Can someone explain to me what is going on?"

Jason and Daisy exchanged a glance. Since she was in a better headspace than the other two, she took the initiative.

"Grandpa, if that's alright for me to say, it all started a little over twelve years ago, from my perspective."

Daisy skipped over her own life, focusing instead on the moments she traveled back in time, the effort she'd spent after turning twelve to hunt her father down and see if he remembered her, and the life her father led in the future.

Jason interjected once in a while to explain the future events he knew, and the more they talked, the more confused Hideki became.

"So... you're telling me... you both lived 100,000 years in the future?" Hideki clarified. "Then Daisy time traveled back to twelve years ago, and later Jason time traveled too? But Daisy kept her memories while you didn't, son? Now that you've recovered your memories, I can't rewind time?"

Jason shrugged. "That sounds accurate to me."

Hideki fell silent. He tapped into Solomon's Seed and rapidly began to analyze everything he'd just learned. He combined it with an unbelievable mountain of knowledge and information he'd picked up across his many lives.

"So your power is called Wordsmithing. All this time, I held you back, limited your potential, all due to my own ignorance. What a fool I was." Hideki murmured. "I must have succeeded. I sent you to the future, you lived out your life… so now…"

Hideki's eyes metaphorically flashed.

"We're living in a parallel timeline."

"We are?" Jason asked.

"That's right. It all adds up." Hideki explained. "If there's one thing I understand, it's the mechanics of time travel. I used to fear that each time I rewound, I was creating a new parallel timeline, one that continued on without me. But through a series of experiments I performed, I verified this wasn't the case. Whenever I rewound time, I erased the timeline I had just experienced, yet could still remember it myself. However, your time travel abilities work differently."

Hideki pointed at Daisy. "Granddaughter, when you came to this timeline, I believe you may have fractured time into two parallel timelines. In the first one, I successfully sent Jason to the future, he had you, and everything played out as you remembered. However, things continued to progress relatively the same, even despite this fact. Even though I immediately noticed the sudden upheaval in events I believed to be pre-ordained, I also noticed several key major events continued to adjust themselves to progress along with my original plans. This means your temporal incursion was not powerful enough to fundamentally alter the rules of the universe."

"So… what does that mean?" Daisy asked. "I wasn't changing the timeline?"

"No, you were, and you did, but if there's one thing I've learned, it's that the temporal plane is extremely resistant to change." Hideki said. "When I laid out my plan to change the future, I had to take into account the 'resistance' of time to alteration. For example, it's trivial for me to assassinate the major politicians currently in power. If I do that, things may change, but we'll just get new politicians who will continue much of the work of their fallen predecessors. If I only assassinate the current president, he will be replaced with another guy who is effectively a carbon copy of him."

"It's like the Hitler paradox." Daisy said, nodding. "If I go back in time and assassinate Hitler, another fascist would likely rise up to continue leading Germany until his eventual defeat. The timeline would stay roughly the same, with only a few details changing."

"Yes! Smart girl!" Hideki praised, looking at his pretty granddaughter with visible appreciation. "So, perhaps if Jason hadn't also rewound time, you would have gone on to alter the timeline somewhat, but the Earth would still ultimately be destroyed, and you'd die within a hundred years, not having drastically changed future events. Your existence would be forgotten, and Jason would have woken up in the future to continue doing things as before, thus merging the timelines back together."

Jason rubbed his chin. "So... the temporal plane would usually repair itself to try and prevent paradoxes?"

"Exactly." Hideki said, before his expression fell. "But that isn't the case anymore. Jason, if I cannot rewind past twenty minutes ago, it may indicate something truly unprecedented has happened. You remembering the future may have fundamentally broken the temporal plane. I don't know why only you would cause this, and not Daisy. She time traveled from the future and kept her memories, yet she did not cause as significant a temporal event as you."

Jason looked back and forth from his daughter to his father.

"It might be... because of my powers." Jason muttered. "My power is Wordsmithing. It's fundamentally different, and more powerful, than whatever Daisy has. Speaking of which, Daisy, what ARE your powers?"

Daisy massaged her forehead. "I have quite a few, dad. A veritable grab-bag. They aren't as 'many' as the abilities your Wordsmithing can unleash, but they're still pretty potent. I can show you later, once we've figured out all this time-stuff."

Jason smiled. He touched his daughter's shoulder and nodded.

"You're right. We have plenty of time to catch up. I have so much to tell you. To talk about. But right now, we need to deal with these important issues."

He returned his attention to Hideki.

"Let's assume for the sake of argument that me recovering my memories somehow broke the timeline or whatever. What is the significance? Can we use this to our advantage?"

Hideki raised an eyebrow.

"Son, if I had known that your power was 'Wordsmithing' and that it had such an insane level of versatility, I'd never have put you in that cryopod. If anything, that's probably why I can no longer rewind past the moment you recovered your memories. Knowing what you can do, it changes the entire flow of future events. I'm going to have to think long and hard about adjusting all my plans and strategies."

Hideki chuckled.

"I can't stress this enough. We have a real shot at winning this war now. Defeating the Volgrim. Saving the Earth. And to think, all this time I just... tsk. Can't believe I was so dense. I really held you back, son. Let you down."

Hideki looked at Daisy again and shook his head.

"A whole-ass granddaughter out of nowhere. This really is a Bizarro timeline."

Jason nodded along to his father's words.

"You're not the only one who needs to do some thinking, dad. I do too. I need to think about a lot of things. I never intended to rewind all the way back to when I was eighteen, before I entered the Cryopod. But now that I'm here, I intend to make the most of my situation."

A flame of rage burned inside Jason's soul as he recalled the smoldering ruins of Tarus II.

"The Volgrim are going to pay dearly for their betrayal."

THE CRYOPOD TO HELL CAT MASK

Part 623: Hiro Stratagem

January 15th, 2021. Noon. Boise National Forest, Idaho.

A few hours passed.

Jason, Daisy, and Hideki all sat at a table, discussing a variety of things, now having caught up on the events of their lives.

Jason looked at his daughter's brown and red military uniform. Her distinctive red hat with a bright red star on its top told him an entire story about the life she'd lived.

"So the Russians picked you up?"

Daisy nodded. "I don't know why, but when I time-traveled, I arrived in a random city in Europe. I was too young to understand what happened. I was naked and alone, so I drew a lot of attention. These two strange men immediately took an... interest... in me. I freaked out. I killed them."

Daisy's eyes dimmed.

"I still don't know what I did. I had no real control of my powers at the time. I obliterated their bodies. Reduced them to... raggedy chunks of meat. Looking back, thinking on what their intentions probably were, I now feel their deaths were deserved. But it was still... traumatizing."

Jason pursed his lips. He couldn't bring himself to look his daughter in the eyes. The sense of guilt he felt at never guessing she went back in time was, of course, completely irrational. But he still felt responsible for what happened. If he had fought the demons properly, worked harder on his powers, and been a better father, she'd never have been put in a situation where she time traveled.

"Yeah." Jason muttered. "You're right. They did deserve to die. I just wish you hadn't been the one killing them. Children shouldn't experience such things."

"Well, it happened. No way to change it now." Daisy said, grabbing a glass of orange juice off the table and taking a sip. "After that, the people nearby freaked out. This all took place in a relatively public area. The police were called, but they were too terrified to apprehend me. People were shouting, yelling in a language I couldn't understand. Their thoughts screamed unintelligible words at me. I panicked. I ran. Then I teleported, and teleported again."

"I don't know how many times I randomly teleported. Eventually, I arrived in Moscow." Daisy explained. "I was tired. Exhausted. Scared and cold. I still had no clothes. I crawled into a dumpster and closed the lid, then fell asleep. I awoke to the lip opening and some people stabbing me with an electrical rod. They tased me. Captured me. Took me somewhere secret, kept me drugged up. Experimented on me."

Daisy's eyes flickered. A deep look of fear and rage momentarily surfaced, but she tamped it down.

"I think I was in their custody for... a year or two. Suffering day in and out. They turned me into their pet monkey. Made me use my powers. Hurt me if I didn't comply. Lightly rewarded me when I did. I lost all hope. I couldn't escape. Something about an anti-magic field made it so I couldn't teleport outside. Then everything changed one day when a certain influential man showed up. He heard about my plight and asked to see me. He adopted me, and had that entire horrid facility shut down. Later, I found he even had many of the scientists executed."

Daisy smiled wistfully.

"Uncle Vasily Sokolov. He finally saved me from that hell. I was like a beaten puppy. I was too afraid to run. Too scared to hide. He treated me like a human again, helped me open up out of my shell. He became my anchor and support."

Jason smiled. "I'm... glad. I hate that you suffered for two years. Two long years... my little girl. At least there was someone good in your life."

Hideki, watching from the side, frowned. "Vasily Sokolov, you said? One of Russia's Deputy Ministers?"

Daisy nodded slightly. "You know him, grandpa?"

Hideki coughed at the mention of being a grandfather, but considering he was mentally billions of years old, it wasn't that weird. "Oh, I know him alright. You say he's a kind man?"

Daisy narrowed her eyes. She easily picked up on some surface thoughts swimming in Hideki's mind.

"I don't know what future you saw, but Uncle Vasily is a good man. He's a kind man. He supports law and order. And he's not the president's lapdog. We've been working on ways to... correct... Russia's internal political situation."

"I've seen a lot of possible futures." Hideki muttered, looking his granddaughter in the eyes. "I don't recall a single one where he became a saint."

"Dad, come on." Jason interjected. "Let's cut the guy a break. He saved my daughter. I at least owe him enough respect to meet and speak to him before judging him."

"I..." Hideki started to say, before giving up mid-sentence. "Sure, Jason. We can do that."

Daisy glared at Hideki for a moment before looking back at her father. Her expression immediately became warmer. It was clear to her that, even if her father's appearance was not the same, he was the same kind and forgiving man she knew as a child.

"Well. Enough about me, dad." Daisy said. "What are we going to do now? What's our game plan, moving forward?"

Jason didn't immediately answer.

He turned his head slightly and looked out the window, feeling momentarily lost.

"There's... so many things I want to do. I don't even know where to start." Jason said slowly. "Saving the Earth is essential. I refuse to believe with the knowledge I have of future events and players that I can't create contingency plans. Perhaps my highest priority is to regain all the strength I had at my peak... before my battle with Hope. That power was not enough to protect me from the Volgrim, but it's a good starting point."

Hideki appeared glad to change the topic. "That 'Star-Net' you mentioned seemed extremely powerful."

"The Star Net took over two hundred time-accelerated years to build, and it was incomplete." Jason said slowly. "I couldn't have made it without Fiona and Rebecca's help. Fiona is still in the future timeline. The Rebecca of this era probably isn't advanced enough to provide me the assistance I'd need. I'll need to remake the Star-Net and other technologies through my own efforts."

Jason massaged his chin as he fell into thought.

"Marie Becker. She's in this era, right? She can help me."

"That is not advisable." Hideki immediately interjected. "Marie Becker has much to do. Until she completes the creation of the Unified Management Interface, Earth will always be vulnerable. UMI by itself is capable of pushing back the Volgrim invasion multiple decades, at least in the best case scenario. I don't know how much things are going to change, but if I ignore your failure to enter the cryopod, most of the timeline is still intact."

"Can you brief me on the timeline?" Jason asked.

"I could..." Hideki said, his tone hesitant. "But it might not be a good idea. I could only tell you what I expect to happen, but by telling you, I would immediately change the future. Informing people of future events will always alter those events, provided they believe I am a time traveler."

"So you won't tell me?" Jason pressed further.

Hideki scratched his head. He looked pained by Jason's request. Further, he knew Daisy was reading his mind, so even just thinking about the future was already influencing it.

"There are going to be several major events that are difficult for me to change, possibly not you." Hideki finally said. "As we speak, the Volgrim are already on Earth. Changelings are everywhere. They're our CEOs, politicians, presidents, media moguls, and just plain ordinary citizens. You kill one, another takes its place. As of this moment, there are about nine million, seven hundred thousand of them living across all the different continents. They collect intelligence on humanity and the other Sentients alike."

Cat Mask continued. "Right now, almost none of the other Volgrim subspecies are paying attention to Earth. However, there is a vessel monitoring our planet from beyond Jupiter's orbit. This vessel is considered an unimportant, low-ranking Psion scouting ship. Over the next several years, it will be relegated to an otherwise low-level assignment, and will not make any direct moves to poke at Earth. But if humanity advances too quickly, especially as a result of my intervention or yours, the ship will 'activate' sooner. It could bring the apocalypse down upon our heads decades sooner, well before we're ready to fight back."

Jason nodded. "You've interacted with the Volgrim on that ship, then?"

"Of course. Hundreds of times." Hideki said nonchalantly. I've never been able to establish any meaningful contact with the Founders, but placing some bait for little Nufaris isn't difficult at all."

Jason nodded.

Then his expression warped.

"Nufaris? Executor Nufaris?!"

Hideki raised an eyebrow. "No. Is there an Executor named Nufaris? I've accessed some secret Volgrim personnel logs and I don't recall seeing that name."

Jason's back became slick with sweat. He suddenly remembered some important information from the future.

"That's right... Nufaris was a low-level Volgrim until the Energy Wars began. He shot up in power and ascended faster than any other Psion in history, possibly even the Second Founder. He became the most powerful Executor, the most feared one of them all. To think he's only a low-level scrub right now! Maybe I could..."

Jason made a silent cutting motion across his neck. Daisy and Hideki got the message.

"If he's going to become such a thorn in humanity's side someday, then taking him out isn't a bad idea." Hideki nodded. "But that will cause extreme effects downstream on the timeline. Nufaris isn't a nobody. He's 'only' a 5th-Level Psion right now, only recently having entered the military. If he dies while watching Earth, it will draw intense scrutiny toward our movements. I'm afraid even you won't be able to hide from the prying eyes of the Executors and the Second Founder if that happens."

Jason's bloodlust cooled. He sobered up, and leaned back in his seat.

"Later, then. He's no threat to us right now. I need to take him out before he reaches the 6th Level, but even for a prodigy like Nufaris, that'll still be hundreds, even thousands of years from now."

Jason remained quiet for a few moments. Then he spoke.

"Projection."

Hideki blinked in surprise as Jason conjured a magical blackboard in the air and began writing. Even now, he had yet to become accustomed to Jason's 'new' Wordsmithing powers.

Jason quickly started writing down several words and bullet points.

MANIFEST ORIGINAL POWERS AND ABILITIES

CONSTRUCT TIME ACCELERATED REALM

REMAIN ICOGNITO: PLAGUE NOT YET A FACTOR, FULL VOLGRIM MILITARY STRUCTURE INTACT

INVESTIGATE VOLGRIM, DETERMINE THREAT LEVELS

EMPOWER HUMANS, REMOVE FLAW

PACIFY DEMONS, PREFERABLY FORM ALLIANCES, BUT EXTERMINATE IF NECESSARY

MAKE PEACE WITH ANGELS IF POSSIBLE, FORM ALLIANCE PREFERABLE, GENOCIDE ACCEPTABLE

He paused after writing these bullets points. A moment later, his eyes shone as he realized something else, then wrote it down.

LOCATE BAHAMUT, RESCUE HER PRISONERS (SAVE PHOEBE!!!) Daisy's heart skipped a beat. "Mom...?"

"She's with Bahamut." Jason said evenly. "She's not... 'my' Phoebe. But I still love her. I have to save her, as soon as possible. Even if our relationship cannot be remade... I... I can't bear to let your mother's younger self accidentally perish. I'll protect her for the rest of her life if that's what it takes."

Daisy's eyes turned misty. She closed them, then looked away, feeling heartbroken by the knowledge she'd never be able to see her 'real' mother again.

Jason steeled his heart. He moved on.

LOCATE BLACK WITCH, DETERMINE CURRENT STATUS

CONSIDER MOVING ENTIRETY OF MARIE'S FUTURE REMNANT OASIS FACILITY TO SECRET DIMENSIONAL SPACE

LOCATE CAMAEL'S CUBE

REBUILD INTERNAL MIND REALM; ESTABLISH NEW 'SMITHY' PROTOCOLS; RETURN BRAIN FUNCTION TO SUPERHUMAN LEVELS

Jason examined his list. It was not in the order he thought most effective, and it still needed additions, but it was a start.

Hideki scratched his head. "What's this about a 'Plague'?"

"I didn't tell you yet?" Jason asked.

Hideki searched his memories. "Not that I recall."

"The Plague is a biological weapon sent to the Milky Way by a different galaxy." Jason explained. "It's like the Borg from Star Trek, but on steroids. It devours life forms, assimilates their powers into itself, and spawns plaguehosts that can jump from world to world. In fact, I should check to see if the Cosmic Realm has already been infected. If so, maybe I can exterminate the Plague early, before it reaches a critical mass."

"...Cosmic Realm?" Hideki asked again, visibly lost. "The future must be more exciting than I imagined if you can keep hitting me with all these exotic new terms."

"I'll tell you about all this stuff later." Jason said. "Let's focus on the big picture. How should I reorder this list in terms of first to last?"

"I want to save mom first." Daisy immediately volunteered. "Before anything else."

"I do too. But we have to be realistic." Jason said. "I'm no threat to the demons right now. If I prematurely take out Bahamut... she has a lot of connections with the demons. I might alert them to my existence. I need to be incognito. Defeat my enemies before they know I'm a threat. The last thing I want is for them to gather the full scope of my powers and find ways to counter me like they did in the future."

Jason grimaced.

"I was young and naïve when I first left that cryopod. I had no idea what my powers could do. I gave all my secrets to Amelia for free, and she gave them to her slave, Satan, who then told the other demons. This time I won't make that mistake. If the demons don't know what my powers are, then I'll continually be able to ambush them."

"Problem." Hideki grunted. "The Illuminati picked you up. Despite how 'impressive' their facility might seem, they're a known asset, and they apprehended you in broad daylight. It's entirely possible, perhaps even likely that the demons already know who you are."

Jason scrunched up his face. "Maybe they do, dad. Maybe they know my face, and they know I'm a Hero. That's frustrating, but it's a loss I can accept. They won't know what my powers are. In fact..."

The Wordsmith's eyes suddenly flashed with insight. He glanced at his floating list in the air, and a devious look crossed his face. He scratched a new line at the bottom.

PROJECT 'THE GREAT DECEIVER': MAKE THE DEMONS THINK I'M SOMETHING I'M NOT "Heh heh heh..." Jason chuckled, his eyes turning sinister. "Oh, yeah. I can barely contain my excitement."

He rubbed his palms together, and Hideki looked at his son as if he were a ghost. He had no concept of Jason acting this way in any of his previous lives. Jason was always a bit of a dope, somewhat naïve and idyllic, thinking of trying to overcome racism and species-ism and other things of that sort. In several timelines, he'd even proclaimed that he had a 'no killing rule', like Batman.

It was utterly ridiculous.

And yet now, the same person who looked like his son seemed entirely alien to Hideki. He couldn't figure out what Jason was thinking.

"The Great Deceiver?" Hideki repeated, visibly confused.

Jason snickered. "You can't figure it out, dad? Come on. You're billions of years old. Think about it."

Unfortunately, even though Hideki was ancient and possessed a mountain of experience, he had also become quite rigid and fond of specific timelines, actions, and other such things. He had lost a lot of his inventiveness over the years, and mostly brute-forced events with his powers.

He sat for a few moments and slowed down time to think about what his son was planning.

"You... you're going to... pretend not to be a Wordsmith?" Hideki eventually asked.

"Something like that." Jason replied. "More specifically, the Illuminati is the only organization that knows 'anything' about my metaphysical abilities, and they've developed an entirely wrong impression of who I am and what I can do."

He continued. "Think about it, dad. The Illuminati believe me to be a seer, blessed with the ability to foretell future events. They think I 'downloaded' combat knowledge from experts in the future, or something."

Jason leaned forward and grinned. "So why don't we make sure that's all the demons think I can do?"

A light gleamed in Hideki's eye. He finally wrapped his brain around his son's grand plan.

"The Art of War. You know what your enemies can do. They don't know what you can do. That gives you a massive advantage when facing them. You can use this knowledge to slowly turn them upside down, undermine their confidence, and ultimately crush them."

This time, Daisy added her own thoughts. "This won't only work on the demons. It will work on the Volgrim too, dad. If you can act convincingly enough, you might make the Volgrim fear you enough that they hesitate to attack Earth."

Jason nodded his head up and down, becoming visibly pleased by what he was hearing.

"That's exactly my plan. I just need to lean into the 'persona' the Illuminati have handily invented for me, and then I'll be able to manipulate it to my advantage."

Jason looked at his floating list. He added one final entry at the end.

SAVE THE EARTH. CONQUER THE GALAXY. PACIFY THE UNIVERSE. Jason chuckled. "Well. That might be a little ambitious. Let's just focus on one thing at a time."

The trio continued to speak for a while. Eventually, Daisy stood up.

"I have to go, dad."

"Go?" Jason asked, his chest tightening. "Go where? You can stay, honey! You should stay."

Daisy pulled a smartphone out of her pocket. "It's already 10PM in Moscow. It's my bedtime. I have military school tomorrow and the next day, then I have the weekend off. I'd love to stay longer, but I need to keep my grades up."

Jason gave his daughter a bizarre look. "Education is good, honey. But... you know... the fate of the Earth is a bit more important. Are you planning to get a normal job or something? Seems kind of unnecessary."

"I have friends." Daisy simply said. "I have a life, and obligations, dad. I'm so happy to see you're alive, and you remember me, and we can... we can finally talk again. But I still need to live my life. And be honest. Do you really need my involvement for this first part? It's mostly going to be you and grandpa dealing with the future war stuff, right?"

Jason blinked. He looked away, then nodded.

"Oh. Yeah, actually. You're right. I don't need you getting involved for now. Leave this to the grownups. It's better if you take a few years to learn and become more worldly. In the meantime, if we need you, I can always find you."

Jason stood up from his seat. He took a step toward his daughter, then paused.

"Create. Create. Link. Adjust."

To Daisy's surprise, her father made a pair of simple clamp-type earrings that were flesh colored, blending in perfectly with human skin. He handed one to his daughter, then kept the other for himself.

"I made something similar for your mother once." Jason explained. "These are not as simple as they appear. I can track your location, and you can track mine. We can communicate across any distance, and even if Gressil were to shut off your magical powers, they still function through quantum entanglement. You can always contact me if a terrible situation occurs."

"Hopefully that won't happen." Daisy said.

But even so, she smiled, her cheeks turning slightly pink. She took the earring and cradled it carefully, giving her father a strange look.

In that moment, Jason understood her thoughts.

She'd been separated from him for twelve years.

Twelve birthdays. No father to protect her. No father to love her, lavish gifts on her, or greet her in the morning.

This was the first gift her daddy had given her in recent memory.

Jason couldn't help himself. He teared up. He stepped forward and embraced his daughter, weeping quietly as he once again imagined the terrible life she'd lived without him.

"I'm so sorry, baby girl." Jason whispered. "I won't leave you again. I won't fail you again."

"Dad..." Daisy said softly, her eyes becoming equally misty.

She hugged him back. They embraced for a long while before finally, reluctantly pulling away. They dried their tears and attached their earrings.

"We'll see each other again soon." Daisy promised. "This weekend?"

"Tomorrow, if you want. But this weekend works too." Jason said with a smile.

A moment later, Daisy disappeared. She teleported away, leaving her father and grandfather behind to stare at the empty space where she stood only moments before.

A while later, Hideki Hiro stood up. He slipped on his mask and nodded toward the door.

"Alright. We might as well get started, son. Let me show you what I've been working on under these mountains."

Jason glanced at his long list of future goals. It seemed insurmountable at the moment, but he knew that it was only a matter of time before he started tearing through it, forging a better future for himself, his daughter, and humanity too.

"Yeah." Jason said. "Let's get this party started."

Part 624: The New LEGION

January 15th, 2021. Noon. New York City.

While Jason and his newly rediscovered family reunited with one another, elsewhere on the complete opposite side of the United States, a man in his 60's climbed out of his car in front of a large skyscraper deep in the Manhattan District. As he exited, a valet walked up to him, the young man's eyes glimmering with excitement as he gazed upon the pristine condition 1970's Corvette, colored deep red with pop-up headlights.

The older man barely gave the valet a second glance. He tossed the keys to the young man, then sighed. He wordlessly walked toward the skyscraper's entrance while glancing up at the massive logo of a dollar sign followed by the corporation's name:

Legion.

The name had some ominous connotations, but aside from some unproven claims about funding militant coups in South America, it was about as benign as any other corporation. The front of the building was not to the old man's tastes though. He chuckled as he looked at the gaudy gargoyles mounted on the sides of the building, going up fifty floors high. Every five floors, there was another one, and they were all gold-plated too. Clearly, the owner of the building had some... ostentatious tastes.

The old man shuffled inside, leaning heavily on a cane. He groaned as his knee silently popped, reminding him of just how old he was. Unfortunately, his degenerative neurological condition was worsening, and it had started affecting the function of the rest of his body.

He approached the revolving front door. A bulky young doorman stood outside and smiled as he approached.

"Morning, sir. I hope you're having a pleasant day."

The old man grunted. "I wish I was."

No more words were exchanged. He stepped into the revolving door, then stepped out, arriving inside the building's lobby. The warm orange lights overhead gave the entryway a classy feeling. Luxurious seats were lined up to the right, outside the offices for the low-level managers and ordinary plebs. The old man headed left instead, walking over to a counter with a beautiful receptionist. She smiled at him as he approached.

"Good morning, sir. How can I help you today?"

He smiled back, but the expression lacked sincerity. "I'm here to see Mark."

The woman blinked twice. "The CEO? Do you have an appointment?"

"Just tell him it's Seymour." The old man said. "He'll know."

The young woman hesitated, but then she reached for a phone and dialed a number.

"...Hi, Lily. Yes, I have a man here, says his name is 'Seymour'. He wants to meet with- oh? Oh, excellent. I'll have someone escort him up."

She quickly hung up the phone and smiled again. "If you'll wait a moment, we'll have someone guide you up to his office."

"No need." Seymour said. "I know the way."

He shuffled over to the elevator, stepped inside, then fell silent as the door closed. There were already a handful of people inside, all of them staring at their smartphones. Seymour stood in the corner and appraised them, but said nothing. He'd grown used to seeing young folks glued to their phones over the years. He felt the fall of social interaction was unfortunate a decade ago, but these days he liked it more when he wasn't being bothered by unnecessary chatter with random nobodies.

The people on the elevator stepped off and on as the elevator advanced to the topmost floor. Soon, Seymour was the last person riding it. This was the executive floor after all, and few people had a good reason to come here.

When the elevator doors opened, Seymour slowly stepped out and made his way out into the main hall, where he found three different secretaries seated at different desks. However, only one desk was positioned just outside the CEO's main office. He recognized this particular position was always owned by the head secretary.

As he walked over, Seymour sized up the pretty black-haired woman seated in the head secretary's seat. Unfortunately, he didn't recognize her. Mark had a habit of switching out his secretaries every few years. He liked them to be as young and beautiful as possible. Rumors had it he slept with them, but those were of course unproven, and his wife probably wouldn't approve.

"Mister Madrid. Thank you for paying us a visit today." The lead secretary volunteered as he approached. "You can walk right in. Mark is waiting for you."

Seymour nodded at her. She was a real bombshell alright, easily a ten out of ten. Over the course of his life, he'd seen so many ethereal beauties that he'd grown a bit bored by them. They all blended together in a way, especially the ones Mark liked to keep around.

Just as Seymour was drawing closer to the door, it opened up, and a five-foot-tall man stepped out, his figure much shorter than Seymour's. He wore a surprisingly ostentatious suit that was white with black stars embroidered all over it. Many had called Mark an oddball for his taste in clothing, but he always laughed those words off. They didn't affect his self-esteem in the slightest. He had the bearings of a man far above others of his kind, making it so mere words rolled right off his back.

"Seymour!" Mark exclaimed. "Hey hey, buddy! Come on in! I didn't know you were dropping by!"

"Sorry for the surprise visit." Seymour said, as he shuffled over and extended his hand. "I didn't expect I'd be... still out and about."

The two men shook hands, but Mark went a step further and lightly clapped his taller comrade on the back, laughing as he did. "Man, you've got the cane and everything! You're really trying to lean into the Warren Buffet look, huh? Classy!"

He glanced at his secretary. "Thanks for letting him in, Lily."

"No problem, Mister Hercule." Lily replied with a smile.

Mark Hercule closed the door, and he and Seymour wandered over to a pleasant little seating area with couches and a low table.

"Go on, take a seat, take a load off." Mark said, as he touched his well-maintained facial hair. "Something to drink?"

"The doctor says alcohol is bad for me." Seymour said, grunting as he bent at the knees and gently lowered his butt onto the nearest couch. "But if you have anything that can make this arthritis hurt just a little bit less..."

"Sure, sure. I've just the thing." Mark said, nodding.

While Mark pulled out a bottle of some hundred year old wine and a couple of glasses, Seymour glanced around his office. It was just as gaudy as the rest of the building. He had various animal heads mounted on the walls, a golden set of golf clubs haphazardly leaned against his desk, even a golden fiddle mounted on the wall. If there was one thing Mark liked, it was gold. He couldn't help but deck out everything in gold plating and trim.

Seymour's eyes momentarily fell on a wooden cabinet on the other side of the room. Inside it were, of all things, martial arts trophies. Apparently, Mark had been quite a fighter when he was younger.

"So, what's been happening?" Mark asked as he walked over and held out a glass of wine. Seymour accepted it and took a few sips as Mark sat down across from him. "Word on the grapevine has it you were volunteering for some medical procedure. That go well?"

"Not exactly." Seymour grunted. "Damn. It still pisses me off. There I was over at Cryotek labs. Some kid walks in, all dazed and confused, looking like he stumbled out of a fairy tale. He'd actually volunteered to be cryogenically frozen. Can you believe it? Anyway, I felt some pity for him, so I threw him a bone, said I'd pay for him to bail out of the procedure. But then the damnedest thing happened."

Seymour shook his head wryly. "The feds burst in, grabbed the kid, and took him away! Turns out he was a criminal of some sort. Couldn't even find anything about it in the paper. Must have been one of those low-key operations. Anyway, they shut down Cryotek for the next week or so, said it was due to security concerns."

Mark nodded. His forehead creased in concern. "Cryotek, huh? Isn't that the cryogenic lab that popped up a few years? What were you doing there?"

Seymour sipped his wine. He looked away.

"Guess."

A moment of tense silence followed. Mark held his wine glass, but he didn't take a sip. He merely stared at Seymour with a complicated expression.

"Oh. You're getting old, huh? I didn't realize things had become that bad."

"I'm getting old? You are too." Seymour scoffed. "You're just better at hiding it. What's your secret anyway? You don't look a day over thirty."

Mark chuckled. "What can I say? I signed a contract with the Devil. In exchange for eternal youth and all the women I'd ever want, he'd take my soul. That's why I got into corporate merging. There's no soul in this business anyway!"

"Yeah yeah, what a jokester." Seymour grunted.

The two men continued to talk for a while. Eventually, Seymour broached the subject he'd been intending to since he arrived.

"Say, uh, Mark? Can you help an old friend out?"

"Buddy! Buddy, you don't even have to ask, pal. State your request!" Mark exclaimed.

"It's Cryotek." Seymour explained. "I can probably continue on for a couple of weeks, but... I want to enter cryostasis as soon as possible. The sooner I enter, the more time I'll have after exiting stasis in the future to cure my disease. My hope is that I'll be able to regain a few more years, enjoy what little I can of my mortality before..."

He trailed off, leaving the implication hanging in the air.

Mark fell silent. He massaged his hair chin and chewed his lower lip.

"I don't have any pull with Cryotek, unfortunately. I might be able to start some sort of acquisition proceedings, but that'd be expensive, and it'd take time if we went through the proper channels. Even if I sped things up just for you, we're still talking at least a week of waiting..."

Seymour's expression fell. He lowered his eyes. "Yeah. I suppose I was asking too much."

"Whoa, whoa whoa!" Mark said. "Now, come on, buddy. I'm not gonna leave an old friend out in the rain. Look pal, I know this place, alright? Specializes in 'faith healing'. It's real exclusive, top shelf stuff. Maybe I can have one of the girls there take a look, eh? I bet she could at least relieve your pain a bit."

"Faith healing?" Seymour asked, visibly skeptical. "That sounds like..."

"A bunch of hogwash, right?" Mark retorted, before gesturing to himself. "I use it all the time, and look at me!"

Seymour blinked. Mark had a point. He was in his sixties, but he still looked thirty. Whatever Mark was doing, it clearly worked.

"Faith healing, huh?" Seymour grunted, massaging his chin. "It's worth a shot, I suppose."

"Great!" Mark chirped. "I'll draw you up a contract later, get you signed up for the good stuff. You'll have to sign an NDA, but a guy like you knows how to keep his trap shut, right? I only tell my good friends about this place, so I'm stickin' my neck out for ya."

"I understand." Seymour said, feeling a little warmer inside. It was always nice to have friends in high places. "At this point, even a little pain relief would go a long way. I owe you, Mark."

"Hey, you don't owe me jack." Mark laughed. "Remember? You helped push through that merger a few years back. Your word had a lot of pull, and Mark Hercule always remembers his friends."

"It was a small matter, small, no big deal at all." Seymour said politely.

The two men continued to talk for over an hour. Eventually, Seymour shakily stood up to leave.

"Well hey, pal, thanks for dropping by." Mark said, as he embraced Seymour in a hug. "Always great to see an old friend. Just chat with Lily and she'll give you the deets."

"Absolutely. Thank you, Mark. Thank you. I truly appreciate everything." Seymour said, as he pulled away.

A minute later, Seymour strode out the door, leaving Mark alone in his office.

Several minutes passed.

Mark remained standing in place, gazing at the cabinet full of martial arts trophies he'd earned some fifty years earlier. He silently thought to himself about several matters.

Eventually, he walked over and opened his door.

"Lily. My office, please."

His secretary stood up. She adjusted her glasses, and the other two secretaries sneaked jealous peeks at her as Mark led her into his office. After the door closed, the two of them huffed silently. Why was it always Lily who got all the good times? When would it be their turn?

It was a well-known fact that Mark always rotated new women from outside the company to be his Head Secretary, but he had one important rule. He would always address these new girls by the name 'Lily', no matter what their real name was.

As Lily stepped into the office, and closed the door, she faced Mark for a moment.

"Problem?" Lily asked.

"Don't know. Maybe. Smells like something nasty." Mark said, his jovial smile gone. He and Lily faced one another for a few moments.

"Seymour mentioned something interesting." Mark continued. "Said there was a kid who got nabbed over at Cryotek. Said it was the feds. Mind having Ose look into it? She's good with that computer shit, right?"

Lily shrugged. Her appearance abruptly began to change as she morphed her body and clothes, turning her skin red, and her prim and proper secretary outfit into a much tighter, sexier, and more revealing succubus outfit. Her massive breasts were barely even hidden behind the two thin strips of cloth that moved down from her neck to her waist.

Lily was in fact Belial, the Emperor of Lust. As for the man in front of her...

"Is that an order, dear?" Belial asked playfully, leaning down to wink at him.

Mark chuckled. He fiddled with a ring on his finger, and after a moment, his skin turned blood-red, horns materialized on his head, and his eyes turned demonic.

He was actually Satan the Devil, hidden in human form.

"Ain't no order, babe." Satan said. "I just wanna know what's going on over in the west. In fact... why don't you take a week or two off. Have Ose look into the computer stuff, but you go there, boots on the ground, see what you can sniff up. This has a secret society's fingerprints all over it."

Belial crinkled her nose. "The Illuminati is based in Oregon. The Templar Knights have a base in California. Could be either one of them."

"Could be pigeons too." Satan muttered. "Always poking around, hiding among the humans better than we do. Doesn't match the MO, though. They wouldn't drive a van."

After a few more minutes of brainstorming, they finished up their business.

"Seymour could use a looking-at." Satan said. "Seems he has some sort of degenerative neurological disorder infecting his brain. Think you can look into it? I'm gonna have him drop by the Institute later tomorrow."

"Do you want me to deal with Seymour or the kid in the west first?" Belial asked.

"Seymour. It'd be a shame to lose a smart guy like him. He's got connections with some of the top bankers." Satan explained. "The kid probably isn't anyone important. I just wanna make sure."

Belial batted her eyes. "Well, alright. It's gonna be lonely, leaving you behind for a week or two..."

"Haha, then why don't you c'mere and gimme some sugar?" Satan grinned, as he reached around and grabbed her ass.

Minutes later, the two of them were on the couch, making loud noises that drew the attention of the two secretaries outside. The two young women blushed as they heard the somewhat obnoxiously loud moans coming from within Mister Hercule's office, but they didn't dare to stand up and take a look. There were cameras in the secretary's area anyway.

An hour later, the door opened up, and Lily exited, looking no different than before.

"Dana, I'll be taking a business trip for the next week or two. You'll be in charge while I'm gone."

Dana's eyes lit up. This was her chance! With Lily gone, she might actually have a shot at getting in Mister Hercule's good graces.

"Of course." Dana said, keeping her excitement muted. "Enjoy your trip, Lily."

Belial narrowed her eyes. She could easily smell the young woman's interest in her husband, but it didn't really matter. Satan was more than enough man to handle dozens of side pieces. None of them would ever stack up to his true love.

Without another word, Belial strode out of the office and took the elevator downstairs.

Soon, she would be investigating the seemingly unimportant happening on the west coast. Whatever it might be, she wasn't entirely certain. But she believed it could be at least a little significant.

After she left, Satan walked around his office and buttoned his pants back up. He grabbed a towel and dabbed the sweat off his face, feeling re-energized after a raucous love-making session with his wife. Even after thousands of years, their flame never went out. She was just as good of a lay as during the Ancient Era. Better, even. She had far more experience than the limpid, dead fish who thought they could compete. Satan sometimes tried tasting human women, but they always bored him beyond belief. They were just too inexperienced to be any fun. The two secretaries outside had no idea he'd judged them long ago and found them lacking.

By comparison, his relationship with Belial was like a fine wine. They always found new ways to surprise one another, no matter how much time passed.

"Seymour..." Satan said, with a long sigh. He motioned with his hands, and a magical contract appeared in the air. He stared at it for a moment before rapidly writing down hundreds of words, the text so small few could properly read it, let alone an old man with bad vision like Seymour.

"Shame." Satan said, shaking his head. "Time really flies, doesn't it? You meet an interesting human, and he dies not long after. Some things just never change."

A male voice inside Satan's head spoke. [Verily, the lives of mortals art fleeting like the wind. Thou mustn't let thyself grow attached.]

"Yeah. You said it, Hades." Satan grunted, as he gazed at the finalized contract in his grasp. "It's too bad. At least I'll get to keep him with me, rather than letting him fall into the hands of those pigeons."

His magical contracts gave Satan one possible way of stealing the souls of other creatures before they could enter the Lazarus Tower, located at the heart of Heaven. The demons knew about it, but attacking a place enveloped by so many angels was suicide.

Still, Satan had a plan. Someday, he would steal the Tower's power for himself. At that time, he'd integrate it into his new Realm and make an unholy land for all of demonkind to flourish!

But that was still some time in the future. Satan wasn't ready to commit too many demons to an assault that would guarantee millions, even billions of their deaths.

There was still so much work he had to do...

Satan meandered over to his giant office window. He stood there, holding a glass of vodka, gazing out at all the busy little humans moving around, living their boring and mundane lives.

"Do you smell that, Hades? Smells like big change. Things have been quiet. Too quiet. It's been decades since the humans lost their Trueborn. This stalemate can't go on forever."

A vicious smile spread across the interior of Satan's Mind Realm. The former archangel known as Samael grinned hideously.

[My brother shalt pay for what he's done. The angels shalt fall. The demons will rise. The beginning of a new era shalt follow, god-willing.]

Satan sipped his vodka.

"Too bad I don't believe in gods."

Part 625: Humanity's Pillars

January 15th, 2021. 1PM. Boise National Forest, Idaho.

Jason followed his father, Hideki. The two of them traveled over to the entrance leading into the underground mountain that would someday become Marie Becker's Remnant Oasis. Jason chuckled quietly to himself, knowing humanity's future safehouse was a metaphorical stone's throw from where he grew up. Life was full of surprises.

The two Heroes hopped in the shuttle at the top of the entrance and zipped deep down into the shaft leading under the mountain. Jason looked around as they drove and marveled at the sheer size of the tunnel.

"We need to be able to move large vehicles, spacecraft, salvage, and construction materials quickly over the next few decades." Hideki explained. "This shaft might seem like a huge vulnerability when the Earth is destroyed, but I've constructed it out of extremely durable materials. I also have several suppliers lined up to move alien materials over once those become available during the Energy Wars. At its peak, the Remnant Oasis should become reinforced enough to survive all but the most devastating of Volgrim attacks."

Jason fell silent for a moment.

"Dad, how does the Earth...?"

He trailed off, glancing at his father out of the corner of his eye. His stomach tightened.

"I don't know." Hideki said quietly. "I've survived past the end of the Energy Wars several times. But the only way to do that was by taking refuge inside the Labyrinth or jumping into a spaceship and escaping before the Volgrim completed their encirclement. All I know is that the Volgrim possess multiple superweapons, including a material called 'trifrancium' which is capable of completely obliterating worlds the size of Earth. Luckily, they used a different superweapon during the Energy Wars. It 'merely' glassed the planet's surface, along with about a mile of Earth's crust. People living deep underground were able to survive the immediate aftermath, though not for long. The evaporation of Earth's oxygen and food supply ensured only the most diehard preppers lived beyond the first year. The rest died within ten."

"Except for Marie." Jason pointed out.

"Yes. Except for Marie." Hideki replied softly.

The shuttle arrived at the bottom of the shaft, but Hideki didn't immediately disembark. He sat there for a minute, his expression downcast.

"We have a chance, son. A chance to save the Earth. But it won't be easy. Even if your powers are truly formidable, you still died in the future to Founder Dosena. You also described a future war with the Kolvaxians that ate up 99% of the Volgrim's energy. We will not be fighting them under such ideal conditions. The Volgrim are, as of right now, the absolute rulers of our galaxy. If they even get a whiff of humanity's power and fear us just the littlest bit, the power they can bring down upon us will make the fall of Maiura look like child's play. I've hacked their systems many times, and even I couldn't uncover their most frightening secrets."

Hideki looked at his son with eyes full of sadness.

"I've been trying for so long, Jason. I've been trying to win this war. I lost all hope eons ago. I assumed winning wasn't possible. Even now, the slender hope you've reignited in my heart is still... almost nothing. I fear you might be overestimating your capabilities, and this will all be for nothing."

Jason smiled. He squeezed his dad's shoulder reassuringly.

"Dad. You can't think like that anymore. I'm not the same flippant, useless boy you raised. I'm a seasoned man, hundreds of years old at this point. I might still be a baby compared to you, but I'm not held back by the follies and insecurities of youth. We will win. As long as we believe in the power of humanity, nothing will stop us."

Jason stepped out of the shuttle and took a deep breath.

"Because that's humanity's greatest strength. We hold the collective power of belief. So long as our willpower is clad in steel, we will not allow our alien tyrants to crush us."

Hideki remained seated for a moment. He looked at his son's back, and in his heart, he felt that Jason truly was different now.

The two of them were both broken men. Men who had lost their wives. Men who had given in to anguish.

But Jason had already set his own pain aside. The reappearance of his little girl gave him a new lease on life.

As a husband and a father, Jason could never again allow himself to be struck down by his foes.

So much was riding on him.

He had to become unbreakable.

Jason turned to look at his father. "Well? Let's get moving. Time waits for no man."

Hideki sobered up. He nodded, then stepped out of the shuttle.

"Let's see if this early Remnant Oasis gives you any ideas, son."

Jason had already seen the Remnant Oasis a couple of times when visiting it in the future. Thus, he was not too surprised to see that the one presented to him by his father appeared far more primitive and underdeveloped. The internal space was nowhere near as deep as the one he observed in the future, perhaps only stretching a half mile from the ceiling to the lowest level below. However, Jason was able to observe lots of in-between levels containing prototype weapons and machines that surprised him. He didn't see them when he visited Marie in the future.

"I first started work on this project... fifteen years ago." Hideki explained, as they stood at a railing on the top level and looked down at the colossal complex below. "Was it fifteen? I have trouble keeping track of standard temporal time. Anyway, the biggest thing that always slows down the construction of this complex is my need for secrecy. Moving vast amounts of machinery around requires manpower. Manpower means people. People mean potential leaks. Leaks mean I could inadvertently draw the attention of outsiders. And that is the thing I have to avoid most."

Hideki made a sweeping gesture with his hands. "This temporal timeline finished functional construction six years ago. Since then, I've moved in specialists whose loyalties I can be assured of, having interacted with them thousands of times. The problem comes later, when we need to build more impressive robots and weapons. I can't rely on scaling laws to simply build construction robots that build other robots. Earth doesn't have time. That means the next ten years are a critical period where I have to move quickly but carefully when adding additional manpower."

Jason listened. He remained silent, assessing his father's plans while surreptitiously thinking about all the ways his unique power could enhance and speed them up.

Hideki pointed toward the 7th floor. There, a handful of men and women were constructing a set of combat armor that looked far beyond anything Jason would expect to see on Earth in this year. The armor was colored white and used plastic molding, but Jason observed all sorts of complicated tubules leading into the armor, a mask to filter out environmental toxins, and some sort of integrated weaponry on the right and left wrists he couldn't quite make out from this distance.

"Thanks to Solomon's Seed, I am able to iterate and improve on existing prototypes by bringing schematics of future weapons to the scientists of this era. Unfortunately, there are terrible diminishing returns. Once weapons become too advanced, the inventors and engineers here will spend more time trying to wrap their brains around esoteric future weaponry principles rather than updating and improving them further. Each time they complete a prototype and I rewind, the next iteration takes longer and longer until we eventually reach a standstill."

Hideki balled his fist in frustration. "I tried building robots myself that could understand future tech, but I ran into different problems. Until the creation of UMI, the AI of this era is too primitive to innovate and create new technological paradigms. And why wouldn't it be? Even the Technopaths have to use their own creativity to iterate Volgrim technology. Unless they create an Alpha or Omega Core Synthmind, which they never will, they can only rely on the efforts of biological creativity."

Jason nodded. "That's why you were planning to conclude your rewinding and finalize all your plans. You hit an impassable bottleneck. If you could continue iterating on the technological principles from the future, you might eventually out-scale the Volgrim and create weapons that would force them to bend the knee."

"Yeah. Pretty much."

Cat Mask looked around. He gestured for Jason to follow, and the two of them took a lift down to the 13th floor, where they arrived at a work bay devoid of personnel. There, a half completed robot of some sort was scattered across multiple tables. Jason couldn't comprehend what its final form would look like, since it was at most thirty percent complete, but it was definitely going to be huge, over twenty feet tall once complete.

"Demonbusters." Hideki grunted, gesturing to the robot. "Large. Powerful. But impractical. I've tried multiple times to finish construction of this robot, but I failed. The schematics are incomplete. In theory, the machine will be powerful enough to go one-on-one with Demon Emperors and have a shot at winning, but in practice, it always ends up too slow and cumbersome. The power system runs out of juice within less than an hour, making it useless for attrition warfare against foes like Satan, and while the main cannon can obliterate the weaker-bodied Dukes and Emperors, it's slow to fire and easy to dodge."

Jason nodded. He walked over to the incomplete robot, then reached toward a random part before glancing at his father.

"You mind?"

"Have at it." Hideki said, clearly not expecting much. "The worst you'll do is destroy something. It's useless as-is right now."

Jason nodded. He picked up some sort of cylinder, then spoke a Word of Power.

"Analyze."

Instantly, a three-dimensional schematic appeared inside his Mind Realm. Without Fiona to analyze it, or even his internal supercomputers, Jason could only attempt a cursory examination.

Words scrolled through his mind.

Component Name: Teraforce Energy Capacitor

Functionality: Primary power storage and distribution unit for the Demonbuster combat system.

Description: Cylindrical quantum-state energy storage device utilizing compressed dimensional pockets to contain and stabilize power loads exceeding conventional physical limitations. Advanced internal circuitry ensures rapid discharge capabilities during combat while maintaining structural integrity under extreme stress conditions.

Strengths: Capable of powering the main cannon with sufficient output to obliterate lesser demonic entities. Features emergency power rerouting systems that automatically prioritize defensive shields during critical failures.

Limitations: Inefficient energy retention results in significant power bleed during standby operations, reducing effective combat time to under one hour. Quantum stabilization field requires constant maintenance by internal systems, consuming 18% of stored power merely to maintain operational status.

"Hmm." Jason grunted, while his father stared wordlessly from the side.

Jason set the component down. He picked up a simple looking rod at the side, its functionality not obvious at a glance.

"Analyze." Jason said again.

More words appeared in his mind.

Component Name: Neural Interface Linkage Rod

Functionality: Basic connection component that transmits control signals between the pilot interface and primary command modules.

Description: Standard titanium-alloy rod with embedded fiber-optic pathways and minimal signal processing capabilities. Serves as a simple but essential connection point in the Demonbuster's neural response system.

Strengths: Durable construction resistant to electromagnetic interference. Easily replaceable with minimal technical knowledge required.

Limitations: Possesses no specialized functions beyond signal transmission. Vulnerable to physical damage at connection points. Cannot filter or enhance pilot commands, merely relays them unchanged to downstream systems.

Jason massaged his chin as he grunted once again. "Hmmm....."

Hideki raised an eyebrow. From his perspective, his son seemed to be simply picking up parts, speaking a single word, then humming to himself. Even so, Hideki remained silent. He would rather just let Jason do his thing until he either gave up or found something interesting. This would be a good test of his son's new abilities.

Jason walked over to the incomplete head of the robot.

"So is this a robot, or is it an exosuit for a human to pilot?" Jason asked.

"We couldn't decide." Hideki explained. "Some of my guys thought it was too slow to adapt to various demons without a pilot inside, but adding a pilot meant increasing the internal space which only slowed it down more. We've gone through multiple iterations without success."

Jason nodded. He touched the head of the robot, then spoke another Word of Power.

"Analyze."

Even more words appeared in his mind.

Component Name: Cerebral Command Core

Functionality: Primary sensory processing and tactical decision hub for the Demonbuster combat system.

Description: Reinforced neuro-mimetic substrate housed within a titanium-adamantite alloy shell. Contains advanced threat assessment algorithms, sensor array integration nodes, and combat protocol matrices designed specifically for demonic entity classification. Utilizes quantum-parallel processing to manage simultaneous defensive and offensive operations.

Strengths: Capable of analyzing demonic energy signatures and predicting attack patterns with 78.3% accuracy. Contains specialized shielding against psychic interference and memetic corruption attempts by higher-tier demonic entities. Can operate semi-autonomously if pilot connection is severed.

Limitations: Processing architecture prioritizes combat calculations over mobility management, contributing to the unit's sluggish response time. Consumes 23% of main power supply when operating at full capacity. Neural mapping system requires extensive calibration with each pilot, creating a 17-minute vulnerability window during initialization sequence. Heat dissipation insufficient during extended engagement scenarios.

Jason scratched his head. This robot's entire concept was a complete mess. It couldn't decide whether it was a robot or a suit for humans to pilot. It had so many inefficiencies it was borderline useless. As cool as it seemed like it would be in theory, fixing its problems would be just as much work as building an entirely new device.

Still, the robot's basic design gave Jason pause. It did sound badass and terrifying. It could become a beacon of fear among the demons, forcing them to pull back when they saw it appear. Since it was potentially a pure robot, it might not need a human pilot, and that would mean it could be deployed all across the Earth, allowing it to respond to multiple threats. On the other hand, if it were designed for human pilots, maybe the threshold for piloting requirements could lower enough that it could turn humans into pseudo-Hero-level powerhouses. This would provide a major boon in the later stages of the Energy Wars.

"Thoughts?" Hideki finally asked, after seeing his son adopt a contemplative expression.

"There's definitely something here." Jason said. "I need to sleep on it before I draw any conclusions. Right now, you're certainly correct about the whole design being a mishmash of bullshit. It needs streamlining, revisions, and a lot of other stuff I don't currently have the time to do."

Seeing Hideki's face fall, Jason smirked.

"Don't worry, Dad. I didn't say this wasn't salvageable. With a bit of elbow grease, and a lot of cheating with my Wordsmithing, I could probably turn this into quite an effective battlefield terror. Can you imagine the look on the demon's faces when they see a hulking 20-foot-tall monstrosity charging at them without stopping? I bet even some of the Emperors might pee their pants."

"That's what I intended," Hideki replied, "but I'm just not sure if you can build this better, son. Even if I rewind time and give you schematics you've worked on, it would just hit the same limitations of scaling all my other tech has."

Jason waved his father's concerns away. "Don't you worry about that. I think the amount of rewinding you'll need to do will be a lot less than you initially expect. After all, we don't have ten, twenty, or even just thirty years before the Energy Wars reach their conclusion."

Jason's smirk deepened.

"We have hundreds- no, thousands of years. Once I remake my time-accelerated realm and start really getting to work, you're gonna see some crazy shit start to happen."

Hideki nodded slowly. He wasn't entirely convinced. Even if his son was powerful, how much of a difference could a mortal Hero make compared to the cosmic horrors lurking within the Volgrim Empire? At the most, Hideki felt that making a secret realm for the humans to hide in would preserve humanity's strength better than fighting a fruitless war against the Volgrim.

Jason sensed his father's hopelessness. Even so, he maintained his optimism.

Jason already knew some of what he could do. He lacked time in the future. He only had a little more than 6 months in realspace to advance his agenda, and that granted him several hundred years in Chrona. Unfortunately, he was not able to avoid the fate that befell Maiura, then Hope, then himself, then Tarus II.

If he only had more time, he might have been able to save everyone.

But now, he did have time. He could change things, provided he acted in as efficient a manner as possible.

Jason's mind whirred like a creaky rusted machine. He wasn't used to thinking without his cerebral supercomputer assisting him, and it frustrated him how much slower he felt without it.

Should I recreate Chrona first? Or should I rebuild my supercomputer? Or should I find Phoebe, then enlist her help? But she wasn't a technological genius until she came into contact with Solomon, and I don't trust that old fucker as far as I can throw his crown. I'm definitely not putting him on her head this time. In fact, I don't want to involve my past wife unless absolutely necessary. It's fine if she stays out of this war. It's my war to fight.

Jason paced back and forth silently while Hideki crossed his arms and watched. It was still a novel sight for him, seeing his son actually using his brain. He wasn't sure how he felt about it.

It has to be Chrona first. I need time more than anything. But since I don't have my cerebral supercomputer, I won't be able to optimize things nearly as easily as I did when I made Chrona with Fiona's help. But building the supercomputer won't be easy either, since she was critical in optimizing it. Damn! It's a catch-22!

Jason suddenly paused. He looked off into the distance.

I'm going about this all the wrong way. Phoebe, Fiona, Rebecca, and Marie are not the only geniuses I know. I can't rely on Solomon, but what about Mad Madam Mildred? She might be a little weird, but she was Marie's ally in the future. Can I trust her?

He decided to seek a second opinion. "Dad, is Madam Mildred trustworthy?"

Hideki blinked. "Why do you ask? She works for the Illuminati. Those people are a bunch of crazy human supremacists."

"Maybe so, but she helped me a lot in the future." Jason explained. "I need brainpower. I can't trust Solomon, but I never had any reason to dislike Mildred. Maybe the Mildred of the past is a different person, but if she can help me reconstruct my cerebral supercomputer and my time-accelerated realm, then I think allying with her might be worth it. Jepthath's power will also be extremely useful against our future enemies."

Hideki scrunched up his face. This time, it was him who began to pace back and forth as a debate raged in his head no less fiery than Jason's.

"Mildred... Jepthath... can we trust them? Ah, but there were those major incidents... still, they might not happen in this timeline. Things are different- and there's Jason's influence too. Plus he spoke with them in the future, so maybe they're not totally irredeemable. Hmm. Hmm..."

Like father, like son. Hideki paced around until he came to a decision and stopped.

"Allying with Mildred, huh? It's worth a shot. But she will read your mind. She'll know everything about the future. If you're not absolutely certain you can trust her, you should explore other avenues."

Jason shook his head. "I'm certain. Dad, we need allies. Humanity's former Heroes are rock-solid, in my book. Well, maybe not all of them, but enough of them. Solomon is an old schemer I can't trust, same for Raphael, but I don't think Mildred is as vile as them. It's not as if I can't understand her hatred for demons. They hurt me too..."

Jason gestured to the Demonbuster. "Besides. We're gonna need help with all these other projects. I'm willing to explore all avenues. If Mildred betrays us, you can just rewind time and warn me not to trust her."

Hideki nodded slowly. At that moment, his body vibrated, and a look of exhaustion took him. He fell to his knees and grimaced.

"God! Holy shit... oh lord, Jason..."

Jason frowned. He'd come to understand that his dad's 'vibration' indicated he had just rewound time. But Cat Mask's reaction this time was extremely bizarre.

"Did something happen?" Jason asked.

"Not exactly." Cat Mask grimaced, shakily rising back to a standing position. Sweat dripped from his forehead. "I just... whoo.... I just rewound time. It was awful! My power has changed. There's a barrier now. It's slowing me down!"

"Slowing you down?" Jason asked.

"Yes."

Hideki walked over and sat at a table. His eyes were bloodshot. He hung his head and breathed heavily.

"I just came back from a day in the future. It was only one day, Jason. We went to visit Mildred. On the way there, something attacked our quad-copter. A demon who threw fireballs from the forest and nearly killed us. I rewound time to try and change things, but... god!"

He wiped his forehead.

"It used to be that when I rewound time, I could rewind even several years and it would only feel like it took me a minute to do so. I could control my perception of time. But that isn't the case anymore. A minute of rewound time takes me a minute of perception. A day takes me a day. Don't you see, Jason? If I want to rewind a day into the past, I have to actually rewind one second at a time, slowly, bit by bit... it's AGONY!!"

Jason's heart turned cold.

"But, dad, you're a patient guy... right?"

"Man, FUCK patience!" Hideki snapped. "You don't get it, son. It's like watching a movie in reverse. I can't DO anything when I rewind. I just feel everything slowly, slowly moving backward. I feel my mouth move, my body being puppeteered... it wasn't noticeable before you regained your future memories and screwed up the timeline, because all of that happened practically in an instant. But now?! It's unbearable!"

Cat Mask grabbed the sides of his head.

"I don't WANT to rewind time if I have to endure this torture, Jason! What if we really screw things up at the end of the Energy Wars? What if I have to rewind thirty years, or worse, what if I have to re-experience thousands of years in New Chrona?! I might kill myself, son! I really might do it!!"

Jason fell silent. This was outside his expectations.

He knew his father couldn't rewind to a point before he regained his memories. But he didn't expect that the very act of rewinding had become an experience worse than torture to him.

That meant he couldn't count on Hideki rewinding unless it was only a short jaunt into the past. He had to rely on getting things done right this one time, during this singular timeline.

It changed how he wanted to proceed...

...But not by that much.

"I understand." Jason said quietly. "Then, dad, don't rewind. Let things play out. Unless we're about to die, just hold off. Leave it to me. I'm nothing if not adaptable."

"That demon saw us leaving the mountain." Hideki explained. "That could mean he'd learn of my hidden base. All my years of preparation would go up in smoke."

Jason shrugged. "Eh, then let him see. We'll adapt and overcome. I'm going to move the entire base to Chrona anyway, remember? The demons won't be able to find it once I finish the transference. Nothing has changed. My plan is set."

Hideki nodded. He looked at his son with different eyes from only a 'few minutes' ago. Seeing his son change plans made him feel strange in his stomach.

For years, it had been Hideki who counted himself as humanity's pillar. But now... it was his son who was taking up that mantle.

Maybe, just maybe, Jason might even succeed.

"Alright." Hideki said quietly. "We'll do it your way then, son."

Part 626: Dance Dance Illuminati

January 16th, 2021. 8AM. Illuminati Haven.

Claire Rothschild sat in front of a series of computer monitors, gazing with cold eyes at recordings of a major event from two days previous. In those recordings, a mysterious masked figure casually knocked out a few security guards, walked into the base, strolled past every possible obstruction in his path, typed in a long and complex code to one particular door, and captured the Trueborn Hero without issue. He wielded a strange device that knocked out the guards with no trouble, and made an absolute mockery of the Illuminati in the process.

Dozens of files sat on the table in front of Claire, many of them opened, showing case reports dating back fifteen years. They briefly described similar events that took place all across Earth, but never seemed relevant to anyone in power until they happened to the Illuminati itself.

Behind Claire, another dark-skinned woman stood. Wearing a white suit with a lapel bearing the insignia of the Illuminati, she not only looked prim and proper, but extremely intimidating today. She tapped her feet and looked at the back of Claire's head with cold, focused eyes.

"I'm still waiting for an explanation, Claire."

"Victoria..." Claire said softly, feeling the breath sucked out of her lungs. "I did explain..."

"No. You gave me excuses. The Trueborn Hero was taken from us. Snatched from the jaws of one of the most secure bases on the West Coast. You really expect me to believe your people are so incompetent that a single man can walk in here, nab our most important asset, and walk out? And why did it take you thirty minutes to even figure out what happened after the fact?"

Claire rubbed her eyes. She had been asleep at the time, and was woken up by a confused assistant wondering why she had issued a order to retrieve the Hero, only to apparently go right back to bed. The truth was, it wasn't Claire who issued that order. It was someone who perfectly mimicked her voice.

"We know it wasn't Belial." Claire explained for the third time. "Nobody could have anticipated-"

"Excuses!" Victoria shouted, slamming her fist on the table. "This unknown intruder somehow disappeared into the fucking woods without a whiff of a fart! How did he get away? Can you even tell me THAT much, you incompetent dolt?!"

Nominally, Victoria and Claire were cousins, albeit distant ones. In terms of political power though, Victoria was a member of the main family branch, while Claire was a thinner-blooded descendant of Jepthath. Victoria held all the cards, while Claire could only defend herself.

"Our best guess is this individual named 'Cat Mask.'" Claire said, heaving a heavy sigh. "We don't have any pictures, but he matches a few descriptions based on testimony from people who caught a glimpse of him. Some say he's the world's greatest assassin. He kills targets from miles away, using only a single shot to do so. He's responsible for the assassination of several world leaders over the years."

"And apparently he's also an infiltration master who would make Belial weep with shame?" Victoria hissed. "WHY didn't you have ten times the guards you normally do on-site? This facility should have been CRAWLING with our people! Just look at all these empty gaps! It's no wonder he could stroll right in while barely encountering any resistance."

"With all due respect!" Claire finally shouted, the last vestige of her sanity breaking. She whirled around in her chair and faced her cousin directly. "We had plenty of personnel! Have you even reviewed the footage?! He walked within feet of dozens of armed guards, but no matter what the reality would have implied, he always managed to evade detection. Don't you see? We might be dealing with someone possessing Lowborn powers! That's the only explanation for how he entered so easily!"

Victoria fell silent. She leaned back and crossed her arms. Then, she shook her head.

"Oh, I saw the footage, Claire. Did you?"

"Of course I did! It's all I've been doing! Watching angle after angle of this man making a mockery of all my hard work!" Claire practically shrieked. "What more do you want from me?!"

After a few moments, Victoria gestured to one of the video feeds. "Jump to 4:07 AM. Camera 115-A."

Claire grumbled under her breath, but did as she was told. It didn't take her long to find the footage of 'Cat Mask' standing before the locked door. She had reviewed this particular moment more times than the rest.

"Yes? What about it?" Claire asked.

"You didn't notice?" Victoria asked, curling up her lip in mock disappointment. "Oh, Claire. I expected better from you. Look at the moment before he types in the code. See how his body seems to vibrate for a few seconds?"

Claire blinked. "Yes. I've noticed it. What about it? Isn't that just a camera artifact?"

"No." Victoria said, her eyes shining as she looked at the paused video. "It's not. I counted thirteen other instances of him pausing while his body vibrated for a moment before he continued forward and did something unbelievable. Furthermore..."

Victoria reached into her pocket and pulled out a piece of paper. She placed it in Claire's hand.

Claire frowned. She opened it up to see several numbers, and a chart showing a spike in certain energy levels. Her body jolted with shock.

"No... this... this isn't possible!"

"It is. It explains everything." Victoria said, finally relaxing her original expression. She no longer appeared as pissed as before. "Another Trueborn. A much older one. There are two Trueborn Heroes in the world. Jason Hiro was taken by the other one."

Claire's eyes started rapidly flickering as she quickly drew all sorts of conclusions based on this new information.

"Then... all the spikes of Heroic Power in different countries... those weren't Jason? They were this 'Cat Mask'?"

"He's been hiding himself well. We always expected there to only be one Trueborn, so we didn't account for the possibility of a second. It's entirely possible nobody but us possesses this information right now. I've taken the liberty to erase all data points leading someone to a similar conclusion. That paper in your hand is the last piece of hard evidence we still possess. But if true, it opens up a lot of... uncomfortable questions."

"You can say that again." Claire muttered, as her eyes fell to the ground. "Two Trueborn... are they related? Blood related?"

"It's possible, though unlikely." Victoria said, before shaking her head. "If they are related, then why didn't this 'Cat Mask' pick up Jason earlier in his life? Why wait until Jason is inside one of the most secure locations in the USA? Was it all simply to flex on us? To make a mockery of the Illuminati? I think not."

"It's more plausible Cat Mask learned about Jason from us." Claire responded, furrowing her brow. "We must have a leak. Someone feeding intelligence outside."

"Not necessarily." Victoria retorted. "Think about it. With the infiltration skills Cat Mask displayed, he must have an extremely diverse set of powers we can't possibly imagine. Based on his height, body build, and other parameters, we estimate he could be anywhere from thirty to sixty years old. His hair appears to be vibrant and youthful, so I personally lean toward the younger side of the axis. But even so! He has around two decades of experience. He's been a busy man, systematically taking down important and influential figures across the world. We're not dealing with some low-level amateur Trueborn. He might just be an Arthur-level powerhouse."

Claire's back turned icy at that thought.

An Arthur-level powerhouse? Inconceivable.

How could such a terrifying Trueborn lay low for so long, carefully hiding in the shadows while evading detection? What purpose could he have in sneaking into their base and stealing away Jason Hiro from right under their noses?

"Are you sure we... we aren't overestimating him?" Claire asked cautiously. "If he's so reluctant to show his face, he might not be as formidable as you believe."

"I don't disagree." Victoria said, touching her lip. "The fact he waited so long to show himself likely hints he is afraid of detection. His physical abilities might not be incredible, meaning he has to rely on long-range combat and the element of surprise to take down his enemies. His ability to fight demons is also potentially at the level of ordinary humans. He may only be a top-level infiltrator and saboteur."

She shook her head. "But that also might not be the case. We don't have enough information. For now, I want to treat him as a high-level asset and value him accordingly.

If we manage to encounter him in the field, we should proceed with extreme caution. He could be a friend or a foe."

"What about Jason Hiro?" Claire asked. "Do you have an idea on how to recover him?"

Victoria's expression hardened. She glared at Claire, her ruthlessness coming back with a vengeance. "Of course I don't know, imbecile. You're the one who lost him! You had a goddamned Trueborn fall out of the sky, right into your lap, and you fumbled the ball! You have truly embarrassed the-"

Suddenly, in the middle of Victoria's ranting, an alarm roared to life inside the Haven, silencing her in an instant. Her blood turned cold as she quickly looked around in confusion. Then, her eyes fell on one of the security monitors showing the front gate.

"No... impossible... why would he...?"

"Shoot him! Fucking SHOOT HIM! Where are you AIMING?!"

The leader of the Illuminati Internal Guard was practically ripping the hair out of his head. He watched in horror as a man wearing a Japanese nekomimi mask casually danced into the center of the Illuminati's central outer compound, shaking his ass, moonwalking, bending over backward, sometimes spinning gracefully like a ballet dancer.

Cat Mask seemed to glide forward, unobstructed, while more than thirty men and women shot at him with what should have been unerring accuracy. These were not ordinary, run of the mill guards one might find sauntering around a mall. All of them were battle-hardened ex-military personnel, many of whom had done tours of duty in various war-ravaged countries. Some of them had even seen and survived combat against Demon Lords and Barons.

Yet none of them were able to land a shot on Cat Mask!

Blat-blat-blat!

BRRRRRRT!

RAT-TAT-TAT-TAT!

Shotguns, rifles, machine guns, assault rifles, and many types of guns shot at Cat Mask, yet his seemingly bizarre movements somehow made him impossible to pin down.

No matter how many bullets flew, Cat Mask dodged all of them, leaving a trail of bullet holes in the ground and walls behind him. He flipped his body, leaped into the air, spun upside down, and landed on one hand right in front of a man aiming a pistol at his previous position. Then Cat Mask snapped his leg at the man's face and kicked him with enough force to break his nose and send him collapsing into his shadow.

Cat Mask instantly flipped off his hand, spun in midair, and landed right on his crotch, performing a split that would make Olympic gymnasts green with envy. Then he aimed the same device he'd used a few days earlier at the face of a female guard, and she crumpled as well.

One by one, systematically, Cat Mask danced from left to right, spinning with terrifying elegance and grace as he took out one guard after another. By the time reinforcements had started to trickle in, most of the initial thirty guards were already down! In just shy of two minutes, Cat Mask took out so many of the Illuminati's forces that a palpable sense of terror had seized hold of the few remaining conscious guards.

"AHHHH! Why can't I hit you?! Die! DIE, you demon!!"

One man screamed in a panic. His pants filled with piss as he saw Cat Mask start moving toward him. His movements inexorable, inevitable, Cat Mask could not be stopped as he danced over to the man, aimed something at his face, and his vision went black.

"Demon! He has to be a demon!" The leader of the guards shouted.

Cat Mask clapped his hands together. He spun around and pointed his arm up, as if dancing to an unknown disco tune. Then he spun on his toes and sent a raised kick flying at the head of the guard commander.

THUMP.

The lead guard hit the ground like a sack of potatoes. After him, there would be no-one else for at least thirty seconds.

Cat Mask paused for half a beat. Then he resumed dancing, but this time not bothering to move toward anything in particular. He spun his fists around each other and thrust his hips multiple times, clearly having the time of his life.

Inside the bunker, Victoria and Claire both stared, slack-jawed, as this incredibly bizarre person who was clearly not well in the head continued to dance, dabbing and hip-thrusting atop his fallen foes as if this were nothing more than points racked up in a game to him.

Claire's eyes twitched. She looked at Victoria with gritted teeth.

"What were you saying about Trueborn falling out of the sky?" Claire hissed.

Victoria's eyes suddenly widened. "What the- look! Behind him! At the entrance... isn't that... Jason Hiro?!"

Claire quickly snapped her eyes toward the monitor. She watched as Jason casually strolled over to Cat Mask, stopped, and stared with a strange expression as the masked man continued to bizarrely dance in place to some silent song nobody but him could hear.

Jason shook his head. Then he glanced up at the nearest camera, pointed his finger, and made a curling motion with it.

The meaning was obvious.

Come here.

Claire felt like her world was imploding. She looked at Victoria, and Victoria looked back at her. Clearly, neither of them had expected something like this to happen.

"W...what do we do?" Claire asked.

Her cousin looked defeated. "Well. They didn't kill anyone. Let's go see what they want."

Minutes later, a tense standoff followed. Jason stood with his hands on his hips, while Victoria and Claire stood over fifty feet away, looking visibly tense. Behind them, dozens of guards stood with guns trained on Jason and Cat Mask both, but nobody pulled the trigger. They weren't entirely certain what the hell was going on.

Oh, and Cat Mask was dancing. Still. He hadn't stopped.

"Dad." Jason hissed, grabbing his father's shoulder. "Stop it. You're embarrassing me."

"Oh, lighten up." Cat Mask said, finally stopping his rampage of dance moves. He looked at his son and smirked under his mask. "Dancing's fun. It's good to cut loose once in a while. You should try it sometime."

"There is a time and a place-!" Jason hissed, before giving up. "Never mind. Just be serious for a few minutes."

Cat Mask crossed his arms. He looked off to the side and huffed. "Fine. Whatever."

Victoria and Claire couldn't quite make out what Jason had said to Cat Mask, but it was obvious that the two men were surprisingly close. Hadn't they only known each other for a couple of days? Or had they met previously?

"Jason..." Claire said, forcing an awkward smile. "You returned."

"Sorry about all the commotion." Jason said, directing a slightly looser smile back at her. He crossed his arms. "My... companion... can fly a little off the handle. But he's a good guy. He only kills bad people."

Claire nodded wordlessly.

Before she could reply, her cousin took a step forward.

"Jason Hiro. We haven't been formally introduced. I planned to meet you, but your companion whisked you away before I could arrive. My name is-"

"Victoria Rothschild." Cat Mask suddenly said, interrupting her mid-sentence. "Current head of the Illuminati."

Victoria didn't visibly react to Cat Mask's interruption. It was easily conceivable he knew who she was, given she was not exactly low-profile.

"And you are... 'Cat Mask'?" Victoria asked.

"Nice to meet you." Cat Mask responded dryly.

Victoria remained quiet for a moment.

"I have it on good authority that you are both Trueborn." Victoria said. "Related to one another, possibly?"

She expected to see Jason's expression change ever so slightly. Perhaps he might flinch, or might give her a clue about his relationship to Cat Mask. But he remained stone-faced.

"We met for the first time two days ago." Jason explained. "When he extracted me from your complex. Cat Mask shed some light on my abilities, and showed me what my powers are capable of."

Jason didn't elaborate, leaving Victoria and Claire to wonder just what new abilities Cat Mask had helped Jason uncover. One thing was for sure, though. Everything about Jason seemed different from a few days ago. He stood taller, he seemed more confident, and his eyes had become more world-weary than when Claire last met him. Before, he had already seemed wise beyond his years, but now the feeling was truly palpable.

Was he only eighteen years old?

"So." Victoria said slowly. "Why have you returned? And in such a... unique manner."

She glanced at the fallen bodies on the ground. Some of the injured had already picked themselves back up, but all of them were suffering from the same nausea and other after-effects as the guards originally taken down by Cat Mask's unique incapacitation device.

"It turns out my business here wasn't complete." Jason said. "My partner and I consider each other equals. He was against me returning, but I insisted. I need to speak with your ancestors again."

Claire's eyes shone. She looked at Jason with bewilderment. It was naturally great that he wanted to return, but why would Cat Mask bring him back after going to such troubles to break him out before?

Then again... was it really all that great of trouble? Considering how unbelievable Cat Mask was at infiltration, combat, and other things...

Claire wanted to kick herself. What was she talking about with Victoria earlier? What did she have the guts to say? To imply Cat Mask was some weakling with no combat powers? It was plainly obvious he could wipe out a regiment of soldiers with no trouble whatsoever! If he wanted their guards dead, he could have done so right from the start. He even took the more 'difficult' path of walking in and facing them in hand-to-hand range before non-lethally incapacitating them.

Cat Mask was absolutely, irrevocably on a similar level to Arthur! Perhaps not in terms of raw damage, but in terms of sheer prowess, the two could definitely be said to be similar!

"You want to speak to them?" Victoria asked. Her gaze sharpened. "If you've come here intending to destroy their artifacts, I can assure you that fancy dance moves will neither protect you, nor prevent me from self-destructing this facility atop your heads."

"Calm down." Jason said, waving a hand casually. "I'm a Hero. So is Cat Mask. We are not Dracula. We have no intention of harming our fellow ancestors. If anything, my return here bodes well for a future cooperation between us and the Illuminati. If you wish, you can ask the ancestor's permission first. We'll wait."

Victoria hesitated. She really couldn't tell if Jason had been brainwashed, or if what he said was true. What exactly was his relation with this mysterious 'Cat Mask'? Why had she never heard of Cat Mask outside minor incident reports over the years? And why make himself so visible now, all of a sudden? Things weren't adding up.

But, compared with losing the trust of the Trueborn, humanity's greatest weapon against the angels and demons... her complaints ultimately meant little.

"Alright." Victoria said. "Claire, stay here and entertain our guests for a bit. I will return within the hour."

Claire nodded heavily. "Alright."

Without another word, Victoria turned and strode away, leaving Claire sitting in her wheelchair.

Jason's expression become a little lighter after Victoria left. He glanced at the guards behind Claire, then back at the woman herself.

"So, uh, Claire. How is Natalie? Is she alright?"

"Natalie is fine. She was punished for failing to protect you." Claire explained. "Not heavily punished, but discipline must be maintained."

"Alright." Jason said. "Good. It wasn't her fault."

Minutes passed. Jason and everyone else remained completely silent, simply staring at one another. Cat Mask grew so bored that he started dancing again, which caused everyone to tense up. Even when Jason hissed at him to stop, Cat Mask continued. It turned out he really loved dancing.

A little over half an hour later, Victoria returned. She paused and frowned, seeing Cat Mask break dancing to some silent, unheard tune, but wisely chose to remain silent about the matter and simply shook her head instead.

"Jason, you have permission to enter. But not Cat Mask." Victoria said, tensing up under the fear Cat Mask might lash out in anger.

Instead, he just kept dancing, ignoring the conversation as if it didn't matter anymore. Jason appeared bemused by her visible palpitation.

"Cool. We'll do that then. Stay here, Cat Mask. I'll be back."

Cat Mask simply grunted. "Yeah yeah, shut it, kid. You're throwing off my groove!"

Jason left his father behind, and Victoria found herself and Claire flanking the young Trueborn, wondering why he would be so confident as to stroll into their base completely alone. Surely, he might fear the Illuminati could hurt him, mind-control him, or something else?

Then again, with such an unstoppable ally break-dancing outside, the Illuminati were sure to be on their best behavior.

"Your companion is an... interesting character." Claire said, glancing at Jason after they were out of Cat Mask's earshot.

"If only you knew." Jason chuckled.

Part 627: The Human Conspiracy

January 16th, 2021. 9AM. Illuminati Haven.

Jason walked with both of the Rothschild descendants beside him, Claire rolling in her wheelchair on his left, and Victoria on his right. They traveled down into the Illuminati's underground bunker, and when they reached the elevator that would take them to the bottom level, after they stepped inside and began to descend, Victoria turned to him.

"Aren't you even a little bit worried?" She asked.

"That you'll betray me?" Jason asked. He smirked. "Our interests align. I feel no threat from you. Even if you tried something, I promise you, it would turn out very badly. I'm not the same man I was two days ago."

Victoria nodded silently. What she did not know was that as she stood there looking at Jason, he was intrusively reading her mind without her knowledge.

Thanks to Jason's Wordsmithing, even if he could not yet recreate the powerful artifacts he possessed in the future, he could still passively grant himself a handful of incredible abilities. These abilities were once his bread and butter. They now felt a little primitive and limited, but in fact they were insanely overpowered compared to what an ordinary human like Victoria could perform.

I don't know if I can trust him. Victoria thought to herself, unaware that Jason's disarming smile held a deep level of scrutiny. Who knows if that Cat Mask brainwashed him? And how is Cat Mask related to Jason? The fact Jason willingly walked out with him could mean they had a prior arrangement. Is this all some sort of ploy to harm the Ancestors...?

Jason decided to address her criticisms indirectly. Taking care not to reveal his newly enhanced abilities, he cleared his throat and turned his head to look at the elevator door.

"You look worried, Claire. There's no need to be alarmed. I will absolutely not harm the Ancestors. The Earth is facing a serious crisis. I will need both of their help if we are to weather the future storm."

Victoria frowned. "A crisis? Of what sort?"

"I will leave it to them to explain to you if they so desire." Jason said, before pausing for a moment. "No offense, but this matter can only be passed on to those I consider my equals. You are not among that small group."

Victoria nodded. Her frown did not disappear. He doesn't think I'm his equal? Then does that mean he only looks at other Trueborn in such a positive light? Should I try pressing him for more information? But then again, working with Jason benefits the Illuminati, assuming he does possess some sort of formidable power. I wouldn't want to push him away…

Jason forced himself not to smile. He maintained a neutral expression while thinking his own thoughts.

He would not willingly give Claire or Victoria any unnecessary information.

This was not a decision made out of malice. In fact, he would love to keep them informed if at all possible. But the truth was, if he could casually read their minds, then so could others. It would not do for them to have knowledge of his powers or future events rolling about in their heads. Who knew when a powerful Psion might randomly scan their minds and uncover alarming secrets Jason didn't want them to know?

Jason could grant them the Mind of Void, but that would only make them more suspicious. Better to limit need-to-know information to only those who could use it most effectively.

The elevator stopped, then opened up. Claire and Victoria both hesitated, but Jason beckoned to them. "You don't trust me. That's fine. Come along, both of you. I will be speaking to the Ancestors privately, but you can stand and watch in case I try to blow the place up or something."

Victoria's heart skipped a beat. Jason winced, realizing his words came off as somewhat in bad taste. It was too late to undo it, so he just waved his hand. "That was a joke, Victoria."

"Not a funny one…" Victoria muttered.

Not wanting to delay further, Jason quickly power-walked into the central underground area. The familiar statues of ancient Heroes stood in the center, but unlike his previous appearance, Jason recognized many of them.

"Arthur." Jason said, gesturing to one of the statues. "No Excalibur?"

Victoria slowly shook her head, giving Jason a weird look. "We do not possess Arthur's relic. That belongs to the Knights Templar. They are a fellow militant faction dedicated to the legend of Arthur. They also possess the relic of the next Hero in line; Sir Lorent Berthold of Camelot."

Jason's heart skipped a beat. Lorent was Phoebe's nephew!

"I'm surprised." Jason said, keeping his voice even. "I thought Camael would claim ownership of Excalibur."

Another flash of surprise passed over Victoria's face. Whoever Cat Mask was, he had truly fed Jason a lot of privileged information!

"Camael passed the Divine Blade to humanity when she gave it to King Arthur. Like Solomon's Crown and many other artifacts, she made no effort to reclaim them following their wielder's deaths. Considering the Heroic Spirits inside would reject her ownership, she might not have had any choice. Excalibur in particular is a powerful artifact filled with pride. It will not let anyone but a select few wield it. Specifically, Trueborn descendants. And even then, Arthur has become even pickier following the antics of a certain Trueborn a few hundred years ago."

Jason nodded. "Dracula. Understandable."

Victoria tried to hide the shock on her face, but she failed. Just how much information did Cat Mask give Jason? Compared to Claire's description of his previous information, it was as if he'd devoured an entire encyclopedia of information about the world around him. The more they chatted, the more she realized his knowledge encompassed Heroes, Angels, Demons, and many other notable Truths.

As they drew closer to the central garden, Jason turned to look at Victoria.

"Cat Mask unlocked my true power." Jason explained. "I am a Seer, Victoria. I have foreseen many terrible things that will someday come to pass. My ability to obtain information is perhaps at the highest level you can imagine. Aside from that, I dare not leak this information beyond those who are most privileged. I am not being vague to spite you, but because I fear the capabilities of enemies you cannot yet fathom."

Victoria nodded. She and Claire exchanged a glance, both of them feeling that Jason's words contained a severity and gravitas they were only barely able to pick up on.

Just how formidable were his 'seer' powers? What future events had he glimpsed?

Jason cleared his throat. "It's time. I'll be going ahead now."

Without waiting for Victoria's pardon, Jason turned and strode forward. He closed his eyes, and immediately, his vision dimmed as a pair of powerful presences materialized inside his Mind Realm.

This time though, the situation was different. Madam Mildred blinked in surprise when she appeared, realizing that she was no longer able to overpower Jason's soul and force him inside her 'domain'. Instead, she had become a guest inside his mind, as had Jepthath. The ancient Hero-King also noticed this discrepency.

Several seconds passed. Both ancient Heroes assessed the situation and realized they could pull themselves out with a single thought. Jason had somehow instantly transitioned from a cute junior they could bully into an equal possessing a clear mastery of some as-yet unfathomable abilities. They had never witnessed such a rapid and frightening transition in all their years alive!

"Oh... ho-ho-ho!" Mildred finally chortled, looking at Jason with shining eyes. "What's this? The lad has become a man? You are much more intriguing than before, Little Jason! Or should I say... Big Jason?"

"It's just Jason." He replied blandly. "Mildred. Long time, no speak."

Mildred paused. She cocked her head slightly.

Long time? But hadn't they spoken just two days before? Why did Jason's words convey the impression of a much deeper relationship between the two of them?

"Ah ha-ha-ha! Dear boy, you are becoming more interesting every second!" Mildred chirped. "And what is this new barrier surrounding your mind? I cannot read even the surface level of your thoughts!"

"Oh, good." Jason said, nodding to himself. "I wasn't sure if it would work on you. I suppose you could be lying, but you've always been a rather truthful woman. Certainly compared to Solomon."

His words once again baffled Mildred. Had Jason spoken to Solomon recently? But again, he implied a deep knowledge of the man, something he could not obtain in a single day. Solomon was indeed a bit of a deceiver, but this was not something a casual acquaintance could easily uncover.

"Jason." Jepthath said, lifting his chin to look at Jason with an even gaze. "What is your reason for returning? Are you able to speak frankly, or has that other Trueborn manipulated you in some way?"

Jason looked at Jepthath for a moment. Then he closed his eyes and lowered his head.

"We should start from the beginning."

He inhaled a breath, then exhaled. He opened his eyes and met Mildred and Jepthath's gazes.

"My name is Jason Hiro." Jason said. "But I am not the Jason you knew from two days ago. I am a time traveler. I sent my mind back in time from a very, very, very distant future. More than 100,000 years from now, as it happens."

Jason continued to speak. As he did, Mildred and Jepthath fell completely silent. They listened with rapt attention to a tale that sounded so absurd it could only make sense when placed in the context of an even more absurd Heroic ability.

Jason did not hold back. Unlike with Claire and Victoria, he spoke earnestly and frankly. He told the two Heroes before him basically every piece of pertinent information.

"...The Volgrim will attack Earth at some point in the future, roughly twenty to forty years from now. Depending on how events play out, the timeline can shift dramatically."

"...The Earth is ultimately destroyed by the Volgrim using one of their many superweapons."

"...I learned of this information from my father, Hideki Hiro. He is also known as Cat Mask, and is the Trueborn waiting outside."

"...My power is called Wordsmithing. I am able to manifest things into reality via a single Word of Power."

"...There was a demon named Gressil. He possessed the power of Chaos, and altered future events so that I would be driven to despair and go back in time."

"...Ultimately, Maiura fell to these 'Kolvaxians'. Then, Tarus II fell under the power of the Psion leader, Dosena."

By the time Jason finished explaining all the broad strokes, the other two Heroes had fallen so silent that an outside observer could hear a pin drop.

Mildred no longer appeared exuberant and boisterous. Her expression became extremely clear and sober. She swallowed heavily.

"These… events. They are too absurd to be fiction, dear boy."

"They must be real." Jepthath concluded. "It explains all the bizarre happenings around you."

Jason nodded. "Yeah."

He remained silent for several minutes. Neither of the other two Heroes said anything. They fell completely silent, allowing themselves time to think about this matter and privately communicate with one another. Jason wasn't too surprised to find that, like how Mildred could not read his mind, he could not read hers. Jepthath also appeared to be under her protection, so Jason could not glean information about their silent dialogue through the Hero-King's brain.

Finally, Mildred spoke.

"To say that this matter is 'troubling' would be a terrible understatement. Jason, why did you come to us? Are we able to assist you?"

"I came here for your help specifically, Mildred." Jason replied. "But Jepthath, your abilities will also make a material difference in this future war. I alone am not capable of defending humanity from the full power of the Volgrim. Their Second Founder alone can atomize my body with a single thought. Their army of 7th and 8th Level Psions are all Cosmic Entities, meaning they can destroy planets if they so desire. The only way for humanity to stand strong is if we work together and unite under a common purpose."

Jepthath's eyes flashed. "Cosmic Entities. This is the first I have heard of such a term. Can you elaborate?"

Jason nodded. "Let's first discuss what the different 'levels' of mortal power mean."

Jason first launched into an explanation about the different tiers of power demons wielded.

"First there are imps, which are weaker than humans. After that come Demon Grunts and Peons, then Lords, Barons, Dukes, and Emperors. For context, a Volgrim Psion of the 4th or 5th Level is about the power of an Emperor. Then there's a strange gap; the 6th Level Psions are stronger than Emperors, but are not Cosmics. 7th Level Psions are Bottom Level Cosmics, 8th are Low Cosmics, and 9th are Middle Cosmics. But you likely don't know that demons can break past the rank of Emperor to become a new entity known as a Demon Deity."

"Demon Deity?" Jepthath asked, his eyes flashing with hatred. "So Emperor is not the limit?"

"No." Jason said, unaware that Beelzebub had already reached a level beyond Emperor but below Deity in the future he left behind. "Demon Deities appear to wield different levels of power. Unlike the Volgrim, who categorize their different levels of strength, the Demon Deities range in strength but are all referred to by the same title. It can get confusing, I know."

He then proceeded to explain the concept of Akashic Backlashes, which made Mildred furrow her brows.

"That means Cosmics have a weakness that becomes more pronounced the more powerful they are. The 8th Level Psions will not be eager to involve themselves in a war with Earth. The Second Founder especially will not."

"But she took direct action to obliterate Tarus II." Jason retorted, his anger flaring up for a moment. "That villain cannot be trusted."

"I disagree." Jepthath said. "You described a future where the Volgrim were surrounded by the Plague on all fronts. It seems more likely Dosena was one of only a few free enough to attack your world. That is why she attacked despite knowing she would suffer a terrible Akashic Backlash. In this era, she will not make a move unless the situation is truly dire. Likewise, the 8th Level Psions will hesitate to threaten their power unless necessary. We will have to face 7th Level Psions, at the worst."

Mildred's expression darkened. "You speak as if this is a small matter, Jepthath. 7th Level Psions could still wipe out Demon Emperors with a single thought. Nothing and nobody on Earth is their match, save perhaps the Archangels and certain Titan Kings, including Zeus. I fear that even Jason will not be able to pose them a serious threat. And if he does? The Volgrim still have Executors and their Second Founder in the back-wing."

All three Heroes became eerily quiet as they carefully rolled this information around in their craniums. Mildred especially worked overtime to think about what Jason had told her.

"...Alright, dear boy. We will help you." Mildred said, speaking on behalf of herself and Jepthath. "What abilities can we provide that your Wordsmithing cannot?"

"I only need your help directly in these early stages." Jason explained. "Though, later on, your talents will still become extremely valuable. But let's focus on the short term."

Jason cleared his throat.

"Mildred. I need you to help me construct a mental supercomputer inside my Mind Realm. Originally, my wife's clone, Fiona, did this. However, she is not available and I need to act in secrecy without alerting the demons or Volgrim. You are the best candidate. Once my supercomputer is finished, I can use it to enhance my Wordsmithing, to construct secret safe havens for humanity, and to prepare for the future war."

Jason motioned with his hands. He summoned a magical blackboard with words written on it, words he had written when he spoke to his father a couple days before.

MANIFEST ORIGINAL POWERS AND ABILITIES

REMAIN ICOGNITO: PLAGUE NOT YET A FACTOR, FULL VOLGRIM MILITARY STRUCTURE INTACT...

Mildred and Jepthath read through the bullet points. They nodded, understanding Jason's grand plans.

"These outlines are somewhat sloppy, but I get the gist of what you need, dear boy." Mildred said. "First, empower yourself. Then, construct a time-accelerated realm. Once inside, work quickly and furiously to rebuild your former base of power. Finally, use this new strength to swiftly launch decapitation strikes. Take out key demon leaders, humans, Volgrim, and so on. Attack from the shadows. Keep your enemies guessing. Never let on the truth behind your powers."

Jepthath smiled in a somewhat horrifying and evil manner. "Make these bloodskins feel fear, eh? I must say, I like the way you think, Jason. I am pleased to offer my services to such a competent Hero. It's about time a fearsome junior arrived on the scene."

"Genocide is on the table." Jason explained. "But that doesn't mean I want to take such a path. It would be preferable to maintain Earth's diversity and unite all our species against the Volgrim. In fact, had the Volgrim not betrayed me so vilely, I might have wanted to try and unite with them too. There are, after all, horrors in the Unknown.

Preparing for the arrival of the Plague should be our top priority, but we will have to treat the Volgrim as our main threat for now."

Jason's explanations had truly given Mildred and Jepthath a lot to chew on. They looked at one another, no longer confident about Earth's future prospects. Their enemy was a species that had swallowed the entire galaxy, and Earth was nothing more than a curiosity to these aliens. It was no threat. It could not possibly become a threat for a very long time, either.

Only with the concerted effort of the Wordsmith and his allies would humanity have a shred of a chance at surviving the future war.

The Energy Wars would test humanity. Would it falter and break, or would it rise up to meet and defeat this challenge?

Jepthath felt a swelling of ambition in his chest. How could he allow his species to fall? He had the ability to grant it a piece of future potential: Potential which might someday blossom into warriors capable of battling Cosmics! Under Jason, he could realize his powers in a way he wouldn't have been able to when he was alive!

For Jepthath, this war has always been personal. The Demons tried to slaughter his species. They killed his wife and children. His family. His descendants.

One atrocity after another. The demons never stopped, always pushing to cause him the deepest possible anguish at any given moment in time.

But gradually, his heart hardened. He became unbreakable. He gained the determination to never stop fighting back.

Perhaps Solomon might long for death, but Jepthath never did. He only sought one outcome: The complete extinction of his enemies.

And now? He had to add another species to that hit list. The Volgrim would pay for their future crimes.

"So." Jepthath said. "When can we begin the work?"

"Today. Right now, even." Jason answered. "Time waits for no man."

Part 628: Jason, "The Idiot" Trueborn

January 16th, 2021. Noon. Illuminati Haven.

Three hours passed. Claire sat in her wheelchair, and Victoria remained standing, shifting the weight of her feet around as her progressively more pained feet cried out, begging for a reprieve. She couldn't help but direct sneaky looks of jealousy to her cousin, who didn't have to suffer the agony of three hours standing in a pair of high heels. Truly, some people had all the luck.

Well. To be fair, the man who put Claire in the wheelchair was no stroke of good luck for her. But that was years ago, and the accident had likely long faded into a distant, traumatic memory.

Victoria felt a little bad, envying her cousin. But at the same time, as the leader of the Illuminati, she could not break decorum by sitting on the floor, or leaving to fetch a seat. She had no idea what the Ancestors were discussing with Jason, but as he stood there, his head, bowed, unmoving, she could only assume it was a matter of grave importance.

Victoria tried to distract herself with random thoughts. She mentally planned out her itinerary for the next several weeks, crossing items on and off. That only lasted for half an hour before her feet cramped up and sent bolts of lightning shooting from the arches of her feet to her knees.

Damn. Damn damn damn. Her feet really hurt. If only she could just take her shoes off and stand barefoot, her agony would lessen ever so slightly.

She wanted to do it. She truly did. But if there was one thing Victoria cared about more than her own personal comfort, it was maintaining the sanctity of her Heroic lineage. Her Ancestor wasn't just a formidable human, but the savior of the human species. The progenitor of all humans who came after! He was their guiding light. Their Illuminator.

What was a little foot pain compared to upholding the honor of his existence?

So, she stood still and suffered. Each pang of pain only firmed her resolve further.

Eventually, Jason stirred. He lifted his head and a wave of relief washed down Victoria's body, making her feel like she'd gained five years of her youth back.

Jason looked around and blinked. Then he turned to Claire and Victoria.

"...Are you alright?" Jason asked, looking at Victoria. "You're sweating a lot."

Victoria silently swore in her head. Dammit! I didn't know I looked so miserable! My feet are killing me, but I can't look weak in front of the Trueborn. I have to maintain the Illuminati's image!

She grunted. "It's nothing. A small matter. Was your discussion with the Ancestors fruitful?"

Jason didn't immediately respond. He gave her a funny smile, as if he knew something she didn't. Victoria had no idea Jason could read minds and she'd practically screamed about her pain directly at his face, albeit unwillingly.

"A small matter, huh? Well, it's none of my business." Jason said. "The Ancestors want to speak with you, Victoria. Specifically, Jepthath. The three of us came to an agreement, and he's going to fill you in on the broad strokes."

Victoria's eye twitched. It was a great honor to speak to the Ancestors. She had only done so on three previous occasions, and always, it was only Jepthath who communicated with her. Madam Mildred never deigned to speak with her or almost any of the former Illuminati heads unless it was an emergency. Victoria didn't know why, but secretly she thought Mildred might be somewhat arrogant, stuck-up, and maybe full of herself.

Not that Victoria would ever dare to utter such thoughts out loud. Mildred had every right to feel arrogant. She was a superior human who once stood at the apex of humanity's power. Compared to her, mundane humans like Victoria were nothing at all.

The only problem Victoria had now was that her feet hurt so badly she really didn't want to stand in place and worsen her situation further. Even so, she had no choice! It was her obligation as the Illuminati Head to commune with Jepthath anytime he requested a meeting.

She quickly nodded. "Of course. I shall do so at once."

She closed her eyes and stilled her mind. Moments later, she appeared inside a white void where a familiar man stood before her, towering over her with his abundant spirituality, his presence like a mountain before a pebble.

"My descendant." Jepthath said, his voice booming. "From this day forward, the Illuminati shall serve Jason Hiro as his closest advisor, ally, and asset. Any command he issues, you will follow. His voice should be considered equal to mine."

Victoria blinked. This was not what she expected to hear.

"Ancestor Jepthath… I… you are saying…?"

"I am not compromised." Jepthath said. "The boy is powerful. Truly formidable. His powers may be the greatest of any Trueborn that has ever lived. Humanity is fortunate to have such a powerhouse appearing before the advent of a dark future. With Jason Hiro leading us, we may yet weather the coming storm."

A chill went down Victoria's spine. Hearing Jepthath's words, either Jason had used his heroic abilities to completely seize control of the Ancestors, or he had spoken of a future so frightening that they immediately threw down their pride to serve him.

Either way, Jason was this generation's Trueborn. Victoria had no problem following his orders, and neither could she resist if he held any evil intentions. Cat Mask alone potentially had the strength to obliterate the Illuminati. If Jason was as terrifying as Jepthath stated, then Jason and Cat Mask together must be an awe-inspiring force of nature she couldn't fathom!

"I understand, Ancestor." Victoria said, lowering her head. "As you command. The Illuminati shall now heed all commands Jason Hiro issues as if they were spoken by you personally."

She expected Jepthath to dismiss her, but instead, he kept her within his domain for a while longer.

"You have doubts." Jepthath stated. "You fear that Jason has subverted my mind, as well as Mildred's. I assure you, he has not. That boy is a worthy inheritor of the Heroic Aura. He spoke to me in clear and convincing terms of a future where humanity would fall. His arguments were sound of logic, and Mildred herself could find no reproach within his words. The time we have left before the Earth's demise is not long, not long at all. We must act quickly if we are to preserve humanity's sovereignty."

His eyes filled with solemn duty, Jepthath lifted his head as if to search the void for Heaven's whereabouts.

"Jason does not need the Illuminati's resources. Not directly. He can easily replicate everything that we possess using his own powers. However, our heritage is formidable. Our millennia of experience. Our manpower. Our network of talents. Our ability to collect and disseminate information. We are not serving him because we must, but because our greatest Test is soon to reveal itself. If we do not rise to meet it, then only destruction will follow. Humanity is counting on us, my child. We will not falter, though our enemies appear insurmountable."

Victoria nodded silently. She no longer questioned her Ancestor's motivations. Whatever he had seen, whatever tale Jason had spun, it must have spooked him beyond anything he'd witnessed before.

This was no small matter. The Illuminati, and humanity itself, could not afford to fall into complacency.

"I will put our full power into action, Ancestor." Victoria swore. "This, I promise."

"Very good. Then go in peace, my daughter. Soon enough, you will be fortunate to witness miracles in the making."

Victoria's vision shimmered. Jepthath disappeared along with the white void, and she found herself back in the underground chamber.

Surprisingly, Victoria found that her feet no longer hurt, and her body was full of energy. This was strange, because such a thing had never happened during the previous times she spoke to her Ancestor.

She lifted her eyes to see Jason smiling at her.

"Feet feeling better?" Jason asked.

"I... yes?" Victoria asked, trying not to sound completely bewildered. "But... how did you know..?"

Jason waved his hand flippantly. "Consider it my apology for leaving you hanging for all that time. I had no idea Jepthath, Mildred and I were going to hit things off so well."

Victoria wanted to respond, but her eyes nearly popped out of her head when Jason abruptly walked over to Jepthath's statue, took hold of his Shepherd's Staff, and yoinked it away from the statue for himself.

"W-what are you doing?!" Victoria cried, rendered aghast by the blatant disrespect for her Ancestor's artifact.

"Calm down." Jason said, raising an eyebrow at her. "Didn't Jepthath explain? From now on, the Illuminati is mine. That includes his artifact, and Mildred's. But don't worry. I'll only be using them for a while. A temporary crutch."

Victoria tried to suppress her distress, but the mere act of touching the Ancestor's artifact had been drilled into her from childhood as an act of disrespect and sacrilege. Jepthath was more than her Ancestor; he was the Illuminati's god!

Let alone just touching his staff, picking it up so casually felt like an affront to her lifetime of hard work. It took all her self control not to scream profanities at Jason.

And then, Jason walked right over to Mildred's artifact, a music box dated from the 1900s. He reached his hand out, then casually picked it up as well.

"No Kasim or Karla or Tucker this time, huh? Maybe in the future." Jason muttered.

Jason turned around. He twirled Jepthath's staff playfully, testing its weight in his hand. It wasn't a good fighting implement, and certainly not as well-balanced as a proper bo staff would be. He made a mental note that he'd need to craft formidable fighting weapons for his future battles.

Victoria stared at him with widened, horror-filled eyes. She felt nauseous, unable to process these developments. Never did she imagine her almighty Ancestors would have their artifacts treated like a street vendor's cabbage, simply picked up and played with for a teenager's amusement!

Seemingly oblivious to the horror on Victoria's face, Jason smiled jovially.

"Well, alrighty then! What are we waiting for? Let's head upstairs, ladies!"

Compared to Victoria, Claire seemed a lot less moved. She knew the Ancestors were viewed as gods by the Illuminati, but she had never spoken to them in person like Victoria had. She lacked a personal connection with Jepthath, so she really couldn't fully comprehend the depth of her cousin's despair.

Jason walked toward the elevator, and Claire joined him. Victoria was a few seconds slower, and she dragged her feet a little bit, still grappling with the change in dynamics that had abruptly played out less than a minute before.

"So." Jason said, some time later, when he arrived inside the central command area of the Illuminati Haven. "The first thing I need you to do is add a detailed listing of my powers to the Illuminati's files."

Victoria blinked. "That... are you certain?"

It was a baffling request. Why did this matter to Jason so much that he made it his first directive?

"I'm certain." Jason replied. He held out his hand, revealing a small SD Card. "I've taken the liberty to fill out my abilities for you to conveniently add. Make sure you have one of your scientists reword this information so it doesn't sound like something I wrote. I didn't have time to mask my own writing well."

Victoria's eyebrow furiously twitched. Jason's request was especially bizarre given he had been so careful about revealing his powers earlier, but now he was just handing the full outline to her??

Without delay, she plugged the memory card into a slot on the back of a nearby computer, then took a minute to load up the primary files.

On her screen, a series of words appeared.

SUBJECT NAME: JASON HIRO

CLASSIFICATION: TRUEBORN HERO, COMBAT AND SUPPORT SPECIALIST

POWER TYPE: INFORMATION WARFARE

HEROIC DESIGNATION: "ARCHSEER"

Butterflies fluttered in Victoria's stomach. It was real! This truly was a manifest of his powers. Everything lined up with what she and the other researchers had learned before, but now the information was far more detailed.

FIRST NOTED ABILITY: DREAM EATING. SUBJECT CAN OBTAIN INFORMATION WHEN ASLEEP. SUBJECT POSSESSES ACCESS TO SOMETHING HE REFERS TO AS THE 'DREAM NEXUS'. SUBJECT CAN LEARN INFORMATION ABOUT ENEMIES REMOTELY WITHOUT EVER COMING INTO CONTACT WITH THEM.

SECOND NOTED ABILITY: HYPER TRAINING. SUBJECT IS CAPABLE OF RAPIDLY ABSORBING PRACTICAL COMBAT ABILITIES FROM ALLIES AND FOES ALIKE DURING DREAM INCURSIONS. SUBJECT DEMONSTRATES INCREDIBLE REFLEXES AND AGILITY. SUBJECT CAN QUICKLY OBTAIN EXTREME COMMAND OF MARTIAL WEAPONRY WITH EASE.

Victoria's mind swirled as she assessed these notes. Was this how the Trueborn had become so formidable seemingly overnight? But if true, then why would he willingly tell her this information?

She immediately realized the truth. Jason wanted to win her over by demonstrating his trust in the Illuminati. There could be no secrets between him and her. By revealing his true powers, he was essentially saying he trusted her implicitly, and hoped she would do so as well.

The thought warmed her heart ever so slightly.

THIRD NOTED ABILITY: ENHANCED REFLEXES. SUBJECT HAS DEMONSTRATED AGILITY AND REFLEXES AT THE LEVEL OF A DEMON BARON. HE IS ABLE TO PERCEIVE TIME AT A NOTABLY HIGHER RATE OF SPEED THAN ORDINARY HUMANS, ALLOWING HIM TO REACT TO THREATS FASTER THAN NORMAL.

FOURTH NOTED ABILITY: FATIGUE ELIMINATION. SUBJECT POSSESSES EXTRAORDINARY ENDURANCE AND CAN ALLEVIATE FATIGUE ACCUMULATED OVER LONG PERIODS OF TIME. THIS ABILITY IS NOT LIMITED ONLY TO HIMSELF, BUT OTHER ENTITIES AS WELL. IT IS ESPECIALLY USEFUL FOR TRAINING HIS OWN BODY'S PHYSICAL PARAMETERS.

Several other entries followed. The more she read, the more she realized Jason Hiro was an extremely strong, combat and information-warfare focused Hero. While his abilities weren't too useful when it came to creating artifacts, healing severe injuries, or enhancing his own durability, in a head to head matchup, he could probably beat most Demon Dukes and even some of the Emperors under favorable circumstances.

Still, his lack of versatility was a notable flaw. If the demons ever learned of this weakness, they might try to seize upon it. That could prove a fatal disaster...

Concern wormed its way onto Victoria's face. She looked at Jason nervously, only to see a calm, confident smile on his face. Didn't he understand the danger of simply tossing this information onto the computer system?

"This... we should keep your powers hidden." Victoria whispered. "Jason... what if the demons learn about this knowledge? They would have a huge tactical advantage."

Jason's smile wavered. He looked away thoughtfully, then shrugged.

"Nah, not possible. The demons are bad with technology, so they won't be able to steal any of the files. Anyway, I also want you to make sure the troops here know about my abilities so I don't have to explain myself all the time when I talk to them. It would be super tiring if I had to do that constantly."

"Not all demons are ignorant of technology." Victoria hastily explained. "There exists a Baron named Ose. She can hack computer systems. She might be able to find and uncover these files!"

Jason raised an eyebrow. "Pft. Come on. Demons are idiots with technology. Even if one of them learned a little computer tech stuff, how smart could she possibly be? Worst case scenario, I'll just have to take her down first. She's only a Baron, right? Killing her will be a piece of cake. Besides, the Illuminati has top of the line computer hacking protection, right? So how can one measly Demon Baron compare to humanity's mastery of technology? You're overthinking a mere bloodskin's capabilities."

Victoria swallowed heavily. She felt stifled by Jason's retorts.

Was he an idiot?? Didn't he understand just how big a threat his life would come under if the demons learned of his true powers?!

She didn't know how to change his mind. Internally, her assessment of him fell several points.

How could he be such a dope? Just handing over information like this was kind of him and would help solidify his truthfulness with the Illuminati rank and file, but that was secondary to preserving his life and combat advantage!

Victoria fell silent for a full minute. At one point, a bizarre thought crossed her mind.

Could he be lying about his powers?

Was he deliberately feeding the Illuminati's computers with false information to throw his enemies off? That didn't make any sense though. She had personally seen his abrupt combat mastery with martial weapons. He also possessed knowledge about things he clearly shouldn't. He must have awakened his 'Dream Eating' ability and woke up a completely changed man. Everything fit!

She slowly shook her head, while feeling the heat of Jason's gaze on the side of her face. She didn't know why he was so hellbent on revealing his true powers, but the Ancestors had told her to obey Jason's commands, so...

Victoria swallowed the lump in her throat. With great hesitation, she copied the memory card's files to an internal database, noting that there were new videos of his powers in action she'd need to review later. While she couldn't understand his idiotic motivations for recording down everything about himself, she was enough of a professional to do her duty.

"Alright. I've transmitted the files to Eliezer." Victoria said, turning to carefully look at Jason's smiling face. She had no idea where he obtained such self-confidence, but already she felt he was not as impressive as she first imagined. "What next?"

Jason squeezed her shoulder reassuringly. "Nothing, for now. Just make sure the next time I come here, I won't have to explain who I am to everyone, and that they all know I'm in charge. Mildred and I have work to do in preparation for the coming weeks."

Victoria nodded. "...As you command."

Jason's thoughts were completely foreign to her, but she assumed he and the Ancestors must have a purpose behind all this. She simply had to hope the wisdom of the predecessors was good enough to guide the foolish young Trueborn on his future path to elevating humanity's status.

Some time later, Jason, Victoria, and Claire emerged back onto the top level of the Haven. Jason strolled over to his father and smiled.

"All done. Artifacts acquired." Jason said, though he didn't seem to be carrying the artifacts anywhere on his person.

Cat Mask was sitting heavily atop a reinforced steel container filled with weapons. One of the Illuminati's recent deliveries, it seemed. When Jason spoke, Hideki raised his head and peered at his son through his mask's eye-holes.

"Oh, good. That was fast."

Jason scratched his head. Several hours of talking didn't feel 'fast' to him, but it probably was like a blink of an eye to his father.

"Yeah. Let's get going. Once Mildred and I finish, I can return to execute the next phase of the plan."

Victoria, Claire, and the soldiers on base saluted Jason as he and his father left. Now that he was the acting leader of the Illuminati, news of his ascension would spread quickly. Victoria feared what might happen if the demons found out, but he had made his intentions clear. It was no longer her place to speak against them so long as he had the Illuminator's blessing.

After Jason and Cat Mask departed, Victoria groaned under her breath. "Claire, I really hope that Trueborn knows what he's doing."

Claire appeared nonplussed. She looked at her cousin in amusement. Unlike Victoria, Claire had spoken to Jason before Cat Mask took him away. She had gotten a pretty decent feel of the man. While he certainly seemed more confident than before, his personality hadn't changed much, and Claire had already made a crucial guess about his future intentions.

"You seem worried, Victoria." Claire said with an amused look on her face. "There's no need to be. Just do what he says. I think it will all play out exactly how he plans."

Victoria didn't pick up on the hidden implications in her cousin's words. She groaned even more heavily than before. "That's what I'm worried about."

"You'll see." Claire said, her smile brightening a little more. "You will see..."

Part 629: 'Papa' Vasily Sokolov

January 15th, 2021. Midnight. Moscow, Russia.

While Jason and Hideki went on a sort of spiritual father-son journey, a young woman silently materialized on the southwestern outskirts of Moscow, far out in the countryside several kilometers from the city center. Daisy Hiro's body flickered into existence instantly, so fast that if a man were to blink his eyes, she would startle him with the suddenness of her arrival.

Daisy still wore her Russian military officer uniform. She was surprised her father hadn't really asked her much about it, but considering he had just regained his memories, he was probably feeling overwhelmed with emotions. Daisy could hardly blame him. She felt a deep sense of surrealism regarding the whole affair too.

Daisy appeared inside a small forested tree-line at the property line of a large mansion. Located near the southern gate of her home, Daisy had been using this particular micro-forest to come and go for years. It was a relatively ordinary-seeming grove, with bushy trees and dense foliage suitable for covering her comings and going. Her 'papa' had taken care to ensure gardeners were never in the area and allowed the trees to grow haphazardly as they wished.

Before making a move, Daisy knelt down and closed her eyes. The world invisibly shimmered around her as she radiated a psyker wave to perceive her surroundings. This pulse of energy mapped out every creature, insect, plant and bird for an entire kilometer in every direction. Once satisfied, she stood up again and looked around warily.

Daisy Hiro was a Hero. She had known this her entire life. She also knew she was a Trueborn. But her existence was extremely secretive. Not even a handful of people knew her true identity, and her 'papa' had always warned her to take extreme precautions when traveling around. Her ability to teleport anywhere on Earth was an amazing power, but it was far from the only one in her toolkit.

Over the years, Daisy had discovered countless layers to her powers. But she also discovered that they changed slowly over time. Some of the abilities she wielded as a 6-year-old no longer worked, while she had then gone on to develop entirely new ones as she aged.

She didn't know why this was the case. Perhaps her powers were innately Chaotic, or perhaps she was a unique type of Hero that did not follow the usual paradigm. As it just so happened, there had been other unique Heroes throughout history who wielded powers outside the ordinary, but they were few and far between. One of the more noteworthy ones was Alexander the Great, who wielded power over time and space, each power individually manifesting within his differently-colored eyes.

Daisy's powers were not just changing over time, though. She found that the more she used them, the stronger they became. When she was a child, she could only teleport a kilometer or so in any given direction. As a young adult, that same ability had grown to encompass the entire Earth.

The same was true of her telepathy. It was a core ability in her toolkit. She always paid attention to the thoughts of others, even when she sometimes wished she couldn't. It allowed her to sniff out people with bad interests in her, and to determine whether or not someone could be trusted. It unfortunately also allowed her to visualize people's disturbing desires, kinks, and other such things; an aspect of her telepathy she desperately wished she could disable.

As Daisy carefully crept out of the forest in the middle of the night, she never let down her guard. She had yet to run into a single demon in her life, but she knew it was possible the demons could track her movements. After all, other humans could. Tracking Heroic Energy was rare, but not terribly difficult, so she had to take great care not to accidentally draw eyes upon her most prolific teleportation areas. This grove in particular was unique, because her papa had brought in specialists to cover the area with energy muffling technology so as to hide Daisy's jaunts around the planet. Daisy wasn't entirely sure how the technology worked, but her papa said it had apparently been developed nearly a hundred years ago, during World War II...

It didn't take the young woman long to make her way over to the edge of the mansion. She sneaked around its edge under the cover of darkness, bypassing several guards who walked around outside, heavily armed, ready to gun down the intruders. Each time one of the guards should have spotted her, he looked right through Daisy, overlooking her existence entirely. This, too, was a powerful trick of her telepathy. She could force weaker-minded entities to look right through her as if she were invisible. She'd used it countless times over the years to sneak out, to her papa's chagrin.

Eventually, Daisy arrived at the front door. She stopped sneaking around, and calmly walked right up the steps, where two armed guards immediately aimed their weapons at her. Despite knowing her face by heart, they took no chances.

"What's your name?" The guard on the right asked.

"No matter if the walls fall, Berlin will always tower over the world." Daisy immediately responded.

Naturally, the guard's question was a trap. If she had responded with her name, he would have gunned her down on the spot, assuming she was Belial or some other shapeshifter. The fact there was a male and female guard also had to do with this, since women were immune to the effects of demonkind's greatest infiltrator.

The guards both lowered their weapons.

"You're back late, Daisy." The female guard said.

"I had business to take care of, Lea." Daisy explained nonchalantly. "Is papa home?"

She hardly had to ask. She could sense her "papa's" presence even through all the walls separating them.

"He is." Lea replied. "I'd say he's worried sick about you, but we all know you'll come home eventually."

Daisy nodded. She strode through the front door, ending the conversation right there.

Daisy knew the names of all the people on the property. She also knew their general backgrounds, their desires and dreams, and whether or not they could be trusted. She even knew a fellow named Boris was stealing cigars from the pantry, but she decided not to rat him out. It was a minor crime, and far be it for her to care if some of those dreadful things went missing. Her 'Papa' already smoked way too much for his own good.

When Daisy entered the manor, she took off her boots and dropped them at the front door, then donned a pair of pink bunny slippers. They looked a little comical when paired with her stodgy military uniform, but she didn't care. These slippers were a present from her first friend after Papa rescued her, so she had been wearing them for years, even going so far as to have a professional seamstress enlarge and repair them so they were better fit for her adult feet.

Daisy's slippers plapped against the tiled floor as she headed up the central staircase, ignoring the awe-inspiring sights of all the different men and women painted on murals hung along the walls. Each of these people were part of her papa's lineage, but they had no blood relation to her, so she didn't particularly care about them.

By the time Daisy made it to the second floor, her loud slippers had drawn someone's attention. A younger girl in a wheelchair rolled over to the top of the stairwell and smiled tiredly. "Daisy... you're back...!"

"Anya, what are you doing up this late?" Daisy hissed, putting on a mock show of irritation. "You're supposed to be in bed!"

Anya feebly smiled. Her medium-length dark black hair partially hid her eyes due to her unkempt bangs, and this added to her feeble appearance. She had been sick and infirm her entire life. Daisy might have once been able to cure her, but after those terrible experiments the scientists performed on her, her healing abilities had been one of the first powers she lost.

"I knew you'd be back late..." Anya said, slowly wheeling over to Daisy. "Hug."

Daisy grinned. She knelt down and gently took her adopted sister in her arms, then lifted her slightly to give her a big, warm hug.

"Oh, Anya. You really need your rest." Daisy said, after setting her little sister back in her wheelchair. "You can't be waiting up for me like this."

"It's not like I have anything else to do." Anya muttered, lowering her eyes. "Daddy never lets me go anywhere."

Daisy winced. Her little sister's immune system was badly compromised. Going outside might as well be a death sentence. Some of the best doctors in the world had paid Anya a visit, but nobody had made any significant progress on her disease. It was a new strain, something a few even whispered may have originated from the demons...

"Anya..." Daisy said, kneeling down to her sister's level. "I... I finally went to see him today. My dad. He remembered me!"

Anya's eyes widened. "He did? But I thought you said...?"

"Yeah, I never thought he would remember, but things changed today. A lot. It's all still a whirlwind. It seems my dad time-traveled too! But my mom... oh, it's such a long story..."

Since the two girls were as close as blood sisters, Daisy only hesitated for a moment before opting to tell Anya everything, or at least almost everything. She told her about Jason's time in the future, the destruction of an entire planet, and his eventual rewinding back in time. Then she told Anya about her father's powers.

"See? My dad is really awesome!" Daisy explained. "I bet I can have him come here and heal you."

"You really think so?" Anya asked, her eyes turning watery. "I don't... have to stay... a cripple?"

"Don't say that. You're not a cripple!" Daisy protested. "You're my cute little sister!"

Anya appeared unmoved. "Easy for you to say. You get to leave whenever you want..."

Her words hit Daisy like a gut punch. For a brief moment, Daisy felt a deep pain inside her stomach, and she had to look away. It didn't help that she could practically feel a surge of resentment under Anya's emotions.

Anya was only 12 years old, but she had spent the majority of her life in a wheelchair, only able to leave if her father gave permission. Unable to go to a regular school. Forced to watch as her 'big sister', the family favorite, flitted around the world doing amazing things Anya couldn't dream of.

It gave Daisy a sense of guilt as deep as the ocean.

"Alright Anya." Daisy said, looking away as she forced her emotions back down. "I'll get my dad to come here as soon as he can. Okay? I want to get you out of that chair."

Anya reached up and pulled on Daisy's sleeve. "Big sis... I didn't... I didn't mean to say that. I'm sorry. I didn't mean it."

"It's okay," Daisy said, turning back to force a smile at her. "Big sis will make it all better. Alright? Just wait a little longer."

Anya nodded. "Okay."

After a few more minutes of talking, Daisy flicked her gaze down the hallway. "Ivan's asleep. Mikhail too. You're the only one who waited up for me, huh?"

"Of course!" Anya said, her spirits lifting slightly. "I have to keep an eye out for you!"

The two of them concluded their talk, and Daisy wheeled Anya back to her room. After saying farewell, Daisy turned and headed back down the main hall on the second floor. Eventually, she arrived before a large, imposing door.

Daisy swallowed heavily. Then she pressed her hands against it, and opened it up.

She arrived inside a fire-lit living room with two luxurious sofas angled toward the fire. These sofas had red velvet covers and gold plated edging, making them appear very expensive and luxurious. Above, a chandelier offered additional illumination inside the room, though it was set to low lighting to preserve the night-time ambiance.

Finally, off to the left side of the room, there was a rather large mahogany desk littered with papers. A massive man sat in his executive chair, his short black hair and aged face making him look extremely intimidating to those who knew nothing about him.

On the desk there sat a nameplate made of wood, with gold etchings revealing the man's name: Vasily Sokolov.

"Papa, I'm back!" Daisy said, beaming a bright smile at him.

"Daisy, Daisy, so good to see you back." Vasily said, before pushing his chair back and slowly standing up. He stretched for a moment to crack his back, then he exhaled in relief and sauntered around the desk, walking over to Daisy's side.

Without hesitation, Daisy dove into his arms to give him a big hug. In their family, hugs were very important, allowing others to forgive and forget grudges, as well as preserve their emotional bonds.

"What sort of mischief have you been up to, da?" The mountain of a man asked. He turned to the nearest couch and sat down, sagging into its embrace, while Daisy chose to sit next to him. He put an arm around his adopted daughter's shoulder while she proceeded to detail her day.

"I went to see my father again." Daisy explained. "Remember I told you he was a Hero like me? Well, he awakened his Heroic Powers, and now it turns out he also sent his mind back in time. He time traveled, just like me!"

Vasily smiled at her. "Is that so? Then you are a Trueborn, and so is he?"

Daisy nodded excitedly. "That's right. And my father's powers are incredible too. He's even more powerful than me!"

"Da, is good then, is good." Vasily said, before using his free hand to reach into his pocket. He pulled out a large Cuban cigar, stuck in it his mouth, then retracted his arm from around Daisy's shoulder to pull a lighter out of his pocket. Daisy's expression darkened. She hastily stood up and moved to the other couch, giving Vasily a disgusted look.

"Papa! Must you smoke when I am around? You know I hate those!"

Vasily hesitated for a moment. But then, he simply shrugged. He lit the cigar up anyway, puffing on it while blowing the smoke away from her.

"Little Daisy, a man must have his vices, da? Now tell me about your father. Is it okay for me to finally learn the name of the man who brought you into this world?"

Daisy's smile faltered. She tried to read Vasily's mind, but she knew it was a pointless endeavor. Over the years, her papa's mental fortitude had grown by leaps and bounds. Perhaps due to being in her orbit so often, he had slowly developed an ability known as the Mind of Void. Telepaths could not read his thoughts, and that included Daisy herself. She used to be able to, but over time, this divide had put a bit of distance between her and her papa.

"I... I don't know." Daisy said, lowering her eyes.

"You do not trust me." Vasily stated, looking neither annoyed nor bothered by this statement. "Little one, I do not wish to hurt your father. He is Trueborn Hero like you, da? Then he is in great danger. What if demons find him? Or angels? Or Titans? What if United State Fascists find him? They do experiments on him, da? Do you think I want this to happen? I saved you from same evildoers, da?"

Daisy's expression fell further. She squirmed a little in her seat, not sure of what to say.

For years, despite proclaiming that she was a time traveler and that she had a father in this time, she had never actually told anyone his name. Since she was captured and experimented on by Russian scientists immediately after arriving in this timeline, she feared they might go after and hurt her father.

Even after being rescued by Vasily Sokolov and growing to care about him, Daisy still forced herself never to tall anyone her father's name. She had, naturally, located him when she was only ten years old, but she was always extremely careful about visiting him in person so he would never recognize her. She also didn't want to visit him too often, lest she accidentally draw eyeballs to his position. That was one reason she took so many jaunts around the globe; to obfuscate her true intentions and mask the important places she was traveling.

She hadn't told Anya her father's true name, let alone Vasily. Doing so now felt like... a betrayal of sorts.

Vasily waved his cigar. "Never mind, little one. Is not important. You spoke to your father, da? And he is good?"

Daisy nodded slowly. "Yes. He regained his memories from the future, and can use his powers again. But I can't tell anyone what his powers are unless he says it's okay."

"I would not ask." Vasily said, waving his hand flippantly. "Daisy, look at me. I want only for you to have happy. Understand? I hope that in time, you will bring your father here. It would be good to show him the strength of mighty Russia, da? I assume he is dog of the British or America, da? Expanding his viewpoint could benefit humanity greatly."

Daisy frowned. Considering how many times her blood had been drawn as a child, it was perfectly reasonable that someone could link her genetic markers to her father, Jason. At the very least, finding out her ancestry wasn't a difficult task, especially given how many public websites offered to trace genetic ancestries these days.

"He... is American, yes." Daisy said slowly. "But I don't think my father holds any particular allegiance to the United States."

"I hope so." Vasily replied smoothly. "Our 'Great Leader' has his faults, but he has better head on his shoulders than those soulless, western pigs. They go in and out of power every four years, da, but Russia is superpower who slowly builds and accumulates power in one great leader until time to pass off duties to the next in line. When time is right, if we add you and your father to our ranks, Mother Russia will rise to heights never seen by any other country!"

"Papa..." Daisy said slowly. "This... the situation has changed. There's something you need to know."

Vasily frowned. He looked at his adopted daughter, his 'niece' as he referred to her, and sat up a little straighter.

"Something is the matter?" Vasily asked.

"I don't think I can be worried about stuff like 'countries', based on the storm that's coming." Daisy explained. "You see, there's... there's a..."

Daisy hesitated. It wasn't that she was unwilling to tell her uncle, but that she worried this information could be intercepted. Her uncle was a well-known public figure, one of the ten core Russian politicians serving under its President. It was quite possible someone had bugged the house. Not to mention, if there was even a chance a Psion were listening in, it could be game over for humanity...

Daisy bit her lip. She looked around the room, then closed her eyes and spread out her senses.

Instantly, a spherical wall spread out of her mind, engulfing the entire manor in a net of psychic investigatory powers. Daisy swept every inch of the manor, intentionally sending pulses of energy out to disable countless electrical-based devices, including objects she suspected were listening devices, cameras, and other such things. She wasn't a technology-focused psyker, so she couldn't be entirely sure what she was disabling, but she could always have her papa fix the devices later if necessary.

After two long minutes, Daisy opened her eyes. The lights in the room had gone out, leaving her and Vasily bathed only in the fireplace's light. He looked up at the chandelier, which had lost power a minute before, and seemed to realize something.

"Something serious, child?"

Daisy nodded slowly. She couldn't know if anyone was still listening in, but she had to tell her uncle anyway.

"It's like this, Papa... there are aliens out there, beyond Earth's orbit. They are called Volgrim, and are part of a civilization that controls the entire galaxy. As we speak, there are millions of them living on Earth, wearing human faces... but they are not human at all. They are Changelings. And even more frighteningly, Changelings are the weakest and most benign of the five Volgrim subspecies..."

Daisy spoke for a long period of time. The more she talked, the colder Vasily's expression became. A look of shock passed over his face, then faded into a solemn expression of duty.

"Is good you have told me this, child." Vasily said, some thirty minutes later. His cigar turned cherry red as he inhaled deeply through it. "Now, many things I once suspected to be foul play make so much more sense. Hmm... it will take me time to think about these matters. I must keep mouth shut, not inform people carelessly. And you believe these 'Volgrim' may be listening in now?"

"I hope they aren't." Daisy whispered. "But... I can't say for certain."

"Let us pray they are not." Vasily replied. "If this dark future comes to pass, humanity will need every additional day to prepare. Mother Russia will play a key role in preparing for that future..."

Part 630: Road Trip

January 19th, 2021. 8AM. Portland, Oregon.

The receptionist at Cryotek, Leeta, sat down to type up a manifest report on all the visitors from the day before. This was a typical morning task, nothing out of the ordinary, and something she had done a thousand times. Having worked at Cryotek for three years, she had yet to move up in the organization, but she also wasn't trying to, either. Working here was great because it was a part-time job that offered stable hours while she attended classes at the University of Portland.

As Leeta rapidly typed up a list, she paused to look around the lobby. There was only one person here, this early in the morning, and he was just some businessman waiting for an assessment appointment for a future entry into the second or third round of cryo-storage, assuming the first round went well. Unfortunately, due to delays forced by the recent arrest of that Jason Hiro terrorist guy, Cryotek had faced increased government scrutiny and put off its first batch of cryogenic freezing for a few weeks. A lot of people were angry, but through some carefully worded emails the company was able to squeak by with minimal blowback.

Still, Leeta was annoyed. She had planned to enjoy several weeks off once the company shut down future sign-ups to monitor the first batch of participants. It would be at least two or three more weeks until she enjoyed her impromptu vacation.

As she sat there, typing at over a hundred words per minute and sulking in the back of her mind, the main doors opened, and a muscular man wearing a black suit, sunglasses, and a wide-brimmed hat walked in. He glanced around the lobby, then looked at Leeta before heading toward her. Leeta pushed her annoyance aside and beamed a smile at him.

"Good morning, sir. Do you have an appointment?"

The man didn't smile back. He reached into his back pocket and pulled out his wallet, then flashed a badge at her.

"Agent Ryan Lederman, South Carolina Special Division. I'm here today to ask some questions regarding the recent arrest of a young man inside Cryotek. Could you direct me to someone in charge?"

Leeta blinked. "Of course. Rebecca Langley is our head researcher. She should have access to that information, and clearance to answer your questions."

The man frowned slightly. "Mmm. Is there, perhaps, a man in charge?"

Leeta couldn't help herself. Her smile deflated instantly.

Of COURSE this asshole had to be some big macho tough guy misogynist. It was clear he thought women couldn't lead or do anything themselves. Guys like this were the bane of every woman's existence, and it was obvious just by looking at him he was some meathead who thought only men could run businesses. Leeta was tempted to immediately call Rebecca out, have her give him a piece of her mind, but Leeta thought better of it. She decided to just ignore his misogyny and resist the urge to roll her eyes.

"...We have Doctor Reginald in the back. He's the other Head Researcher, but-"

"That's fine." Ryan said, looking around the lobby. "As long as it's a man. Don't really have time to chit-chat about nails and whatever."

Leeta nearly blew a fuse. She had to fight against the demons in her heart lest she explode in rage at this piece of work, and it took all her self control to silently press the button on her phone system, dial Head Researcher Reginald's office, and ask him through gritted teeth if he had time to speak to this fine upstanding gentleman. Luckily, Reginald came out and ushered Ryan into his office before Leeta lost her temper.

This time, when Leeta returned to tapping on the keyboard, her fingers impacted the keys with the angry force of a jackhammer. Even the businessman in the suit across the lobby glanced at her, noticing how much louder her typing had become as she deliberately vented her anger on the keyboard.

Not twenty minutes later, Agent Ryan exited the office. He walked past Leeta without saying a word, as if the existence of a woman had disappeared from his mind once she was out of sight and mind.

"Have. A. Nice. Day." Leeta said, biting the words off at him as he strode toward the front door.

Ryan didn't even pause. "Yeah, thanks."

Outside, Ryan walked away from the Cryotek building in a calm and measured manner. After walking down a few side streets, he turned into a coffee shop and sat down, taking off his sunglasses and pressing his finger to his lips.

"Hmm. So his name was Jason Hiro. Assigned to cryosleep through a randomized clinical trial. Expressed interest in quitting the program, according to what Seymour told me. The security cameras showed a plain black truck took him, but they didn't look government-issued. Certainly not FBI. The MO doesn't match the Knights Templar. That leaves the Illuminati. Damn. They must have taken the kid to their base out east. But why? To what end?"

Ryan chewed his nail for a few minutes, mulling various thoughts in his mind.

"...There's no other choice. I have to infiltrate their base. But I'm a known asset. They probably have men and women mixed together in and out of uniform. Cameras everywhere. Security precautions and alarms and other human tech I won't understand. It won't be as easy as it was just twenty or thirty years ago. I can't keep up with the humans' rate of advancements these days..."

'Ryan' closed his eyes and massaged his forehead.

"Two options. I either try to sneak in quietly, or I go the loud route. The Illuminati is formidable, and they can definitely beat back a single Emperor with the options at their disposal, but the problem is the kid. Jason Hiro. Come on, the name itself seems to imply... no, wouldn't that be too on the nose? Hiro? Hero? Could he be a Trueborn? Did his parents have an ironic naming sense, or was it just karma and luck or something? Bah, it's going to be a serious problem if he is a Hero. Satan will not be happy."

"So if I go in loud, maybe they evacuate Jason with some underground route. Even if I knock everyone out, he might be long gone. Not to mention, if they picked him up, they must have detected his Heroic Energy. Maybe he's already started using his powers. What abilities does he have? Is he a weakling, or a powerhouse?"

As it turned out, this 'Agent Ryan' was merely one of Belial's casual disguises. She didn't even bother looking up a real government agency. By the time anyone figured out someone unauthorized had viewed the security cameras, she would be long gone, and all the blame would be pinned on Head Researcher Reginald. Poor guy might even get fired, not that she cared.

"I shouldn't approach this mission alone." Belial muttered to herself, remaining in her 'secret agent' disguise. "I need backup. When it comes to bypassing human tech, there's only one valid option. It has to be Ose. She's a bit bratty, but she's reliable when it comes to this stuff. I should also bring along... yeah, that would work. Just in case things go badly and we need to get loud. It's always good to have a backup option."

A waitress approached Belial. "Excuse me sir, would you like any coffee?"

"Fuck off." Belial said, not even bothering to look at the woman.

"Ah! Well, fine then, asshole. Jesus." The waitress said, storming away in a huff.

It wasn't that Belial was usually rude to women, but just in case she was being followed, she needed to maintain her disguise. This persona of 'Ryan Lederman' was a misogynist who only talked to men, so it was best if she always ignored and downplayed women when opportunities arose.

Belial sat for a while longer, formulating a plan. Then, she stood up, walked out, and waved for a taxi.

January 19th, 2020. 2PM. Seattle, Washington.

"Big Brian! Ahhh!!! I'm SUCH a huge fan! You're soooo hot!!!"

A woman screamed in glee as her favorite rockstar walked past, a mountain of a man wearing a black leather jacket seemingly taken right out of an 80's rock band. The man proudly stomped forward, his giant feet leaving faint imprints on the floor as he maneuvered his eight-foot-tall frame around the back halls of the concert area. Big Brian shot the woman a goofy smile and nodded. "Well shucks, thanks for the compliment, toots! You ain't lookin' so bad yourself!"

He gave the woman a huge thumbs up, and she screamed in delight even louder. Next to the woman were hundreds of other people, all held behind a short fence to keep them from rushing the A-list celebrity. Big Brian had been on a comeback tour along with some of his old bandmates, as well as a few new faces. Naturally, while most of the fanbase was on the 40+ side of the age curve, there were still some younger fans who also thought he was cool in a way only people of an older generation could be.

Camera's whirred and clicked, bathing Big Brian and his bandmates in a series of white flashes. Behind him, Shatter and Screamer walked, a longtime brother and sister duo who were getting up there in years, yet still seemed to age extremely gracefully. Screamer in particular looked as attractive as many modern twenty-year old performers, seeming as if she hadn't aged a day. She wore black lipstick and had a somewhat gothic appearance, but her moodiness didn't deter an avalanche of men from constantly sending her fanmail.

Shatter on the other hand sported a huge head of frizzy white hair. He constantly stuck his tongue out and made crazy faces at the nearby fans as he walked, shouting his iconic catch phrases like "Shatter the heavens!!" and "Burn us down to hell!!"

As they strode past the fans, their security detail kept a careful watch out. One could never be too sure if some psycho would threaten the talent's lives, and there was always the danger of a smuggled handgun or an explosive that could bring tragedy to an otherwise positive event.

Eventually, the performers left the concert hall, went backstage, and entered their dressing rooms. Big Brian cracked his back after they closed the door and secured the area.

"Ohh, man! That was a great concert, Shax! You were on fire tonight!"

"You too, Bael!" Shax laughed back. "You beat those drums like your life depended on it. I was having trouble keeping up with you!"

The trio touched their rings and reverted their false human appearances, revealing their demonic forms. Bael, Shax, and Murmur regained their red skin, feeling no different than when their disguises were activated. Still, they preferred to be in their demon forms, since that felt a little more natural.

"Murmur, you doin' okay?" Bael asked, leaning down to her level. "You're a little quieter than usual."

Murmur levitated on top of her big brother's shoulder. She was extremely short, less than three feet tall to her brother's seven foot stature. Their heights didn't change when in human form, so it was a distinct contrast that helped make their band look unique, even in simple silhouettes on promotional material.

"It's nothing." Murmur said quietly. "Just... a creepy guy. Kept calling me 'little girl.' I didn't like it."

Bael's smile soured. "What? So there was some punk thinkin' weird thoughts? What he look like? I'll straighten him right out!"

Murmur crossed her arms and looked away. "I'll do it myself. Later. Just not in the mood right now."

"Oh. Okay." Bael said, lowering his fists. "Well, look, I'm pretty hungry. Whaddya guys say we go get some Mexican food, huh?"

While it was true that demons often enjoyed eating the flesh of humans, as it happened, human food was so delicious that many demons opted to try out their cuisine occasionally, or even regularly. Bael was one of the more prolific cases.

"I'm not in the mood for any food." Shax said. "I'm gonna go nap for a bit. My throat's kinda worn out, man."

Murmur shrugged. "I'll go."

"Hell yeah!" Bael said. "Let's go, Murmur! Food time! Food time! Food time!"

Murmur levitated off Shax's shoulder, then fiddled with her ring to return to her human appearance. She looked like a dwarf human, but also sort of like a cute little girl in her teens, albeit much shorter than the average. After Bael reverted back to his human state, the two of them headed into their personal changing areas to swap clothing. Bael donned a giant black T-shirt with a skull and crossbones on the front, while Murmur ended up putting on a simple black sundress. She didn't like dressing up, and always opted to wear rather basic clothing when out and about.

After the duo finished changing clothes, Bael took Murmur's hand, and the two of them left the dressing room, flanked by their security. In order not to draw much attention, they first surveyed a path without fans, sneaked out the back, and got inside a black SUV. Their driver drove them over to a Mexican restaurant, and allowed them to leave, alone. Naturally, bodyguards surveyed the perimeter, but they made sure to give Bael and Murmur space so they wouldn't attract attention inside. They had no way of knowing that a random psycho with a gun had zero chance of causing these two any harm, but they still had to make sure their assigned talents stayed safe.

After entering the restaurant, Bael squeezed his huge body into a small chair, while Murmur sat opposite him, her head barely able to peek over the table. She blushed slightly out of embarrassment before asking for a booster seat. But then again, she was used to having to do this.

"Alright," Bael said, after looking at the menu for five minutes. "Waiter guy! I'll take a plate of this stuff, this stuff, this soupy stuff, this, this, three of these, and... you know what? This looks good too. What about you, Screamer?"

Murmur handed the menu back to the waiter. "A plate of fajitas for me."

The waiter took their order, then gave Bael a long, serious look. He alone had just ordered more than $400 worth of food. Was he seriously going to eat it all? Maybe they had more friends on the way.

But the waiter decided not to question anything. "Si, senor. Give us ten minutes for the Fajitas, and... do you want all your food at once, senor?"

"Nah, just bring it out as you cook it." Bael said. "I'll be eating for a while."

"Oh. Alright then, you are the boss, senor." The waiter said, before walking away scratching his head and muttering something under his breath.

Naturally, Bael and Murmur heard his muttered words, but they didn't care. He was just some unimportant human. His opinions didn't matter at all.

Murmur looked around the restaurant. Surprisingly, she and Bael were the only people there, despite being in the middle of the day on a Sunday. It was rather bizarre. Maybe the restaurant wasn't doing too well financially and would soon go out of business? She had no idea.

While they waited for their food to arrive, Bael smiled at her.

"Somethin's on your mind, I can tell." Bael said. "Hit me. What's up?"

Murmur lowered her eyes. She sighed.

"Bael... I..."

She paused.

"First, promise not to tell Shax. Not yet."

Bael's smile slipped. "Uh... sure. But why not?"

Murmur's toes fidgeted under the table.

"Because... I... want to quit the band."

Bael's jaw dropped. "W-what? No way! You're kiddin'. Why, Murmur? You've got the voice of an angel."

"I only sing because Shax likes it." Murmur muttered. "But I don't like singing. I like being around Shax. He's always there. He makes me feel safe. But this whole... band thing. We've been doing it for so long. I'm tired of it. I want to do something else."

Bael looked at her, crestfallen. "Come on, sister. Whaddya mean? What else could you possibly wanna do?"

Murmur didn't immediately answer. She fell silent as the waiter returned with her plate of fajitas, as well as Bael's first entree, which turned out to be three gigantic burritos covered in red sauce and onions.

After the waiter left, Murmur speared some of her veggies and meat. She silently bit into the delicious fajitas, savoring their hot and crispy texture while giving herself time to think.

"I'm not sure." She eventually said, answering Bael's previous question. "Maybe... painting? I want to try painting."

Bael nodded. He shoved part of the first burrito in his mouth and took a huge bite, horking down a third of it instantly. Red sauce ran down his face, but he didn't notice. He chewed loudly in a lip-smacking manner that would disgust most people, but which Murmur had long grown used to, then he finished off the rest of the burrito in two more bites.

"Mmm! I mean, painting's cool. It's cool!" Bael said, being surprisingly careful not to spit burrito debris all over Murmur's side of the table. "You think you'll be any good??"

"I don't know." Murmur said, her voice lowering slightly. "It's not about 'being good' for me. I just think it would be fun. More fun than singing. I don't like singing. I just don't know how to tell Shax. He's... he's going to feel so sad. I don't want to make him sad."

Bael paused his eating. He noticed a hint of depression on Murmur's face. It slowly sunk into his thick skull that this situation wasn't as simple as he previously thought.

Slowly, very very slowly, the gears of something approaching 'thoughts' whirred inside Bael's head. He looked at Murmur with slightly glazed eyes, trying to think of something smart to say.

Then, like a bolt of lightning, it hit him! The perfect response!

"Ehh, he'll get over it." Bael said, waving his hand flippantly. "It ain't that big a deal. We're demons. You can always come back someday. Do another tour. You just do your painting, girl. Don't let nobody tell you otherwise!"

Murmur frowned. She daintily ate another forkful of peppers and steak.

"But... Shax loves when I sing." Murmur said, looking at Bael with hopeful eyes. "How can we break the news to him?"

"Maaan, you're overthinking this." Bael said, rolling his eyes. "Seriously, it ain't no big deal, Murmur. Look, we just find another demon girl who likes singing, yeah? We'll just say you're retirin' or whatever, say we got a new talent lined up, boom! Easy! Besides, you gonna go live somewhere else?"

Murmur slowly shook her head. "No... I'll still be here."

"Great! Then you'll come to the concerts?"

She nodded again. "Yes..."

"Then what's the problem??" Bael asked. "You ain't fallin' off the face of the Earth! You'll just be chillin' in the dressing room, paintin' up a storm. Easy. We'll miss havin' ya on stage, but you can always come back if the paintin' thing don't work out."

"Oh." Murmur said, smiling shyly. "I guess I was overthinking things. Not much is going to change. Thanks, Bael. You're such a smart guy."

Bael snorted. "Let's not go too far now."

The door to the Mexican restaurant opened. Murmur turned her head in the direction of the man who entered, then frowned. He wore a black suit, sunglasses, and a wide-brimmed hat, but secretly, she felt a mild current of demonic energy thanks to a resonance spike within her own disguise ring.

The man walked over to their table, and Bael lifted his head, only now noticing the new arrival.

"The hell? Don't even THINK of touching my food, pal!" Bael snapped, giving this newcomer a mean look.

"I'm not interested in your food, Bael." The man said, before turning to Murmur and winking.

"Hey Murmur. Since you're here, guess I can invite you as well. Would you two like to go on a little... road trip?"

Part 631: Ose's Revelation

January 20th, 2021. 9PM.

A full day passed, plus several extra hours. Belial, Bael, and Murmur had to use several secret demon transfer locations to meet up with Warpers hiding among the humans. By doing so, they were able to jump around the USA until they finally arrived in northern California, nearly a thousand kilometers from where they started in Seattle, Washington.

But eventually, they did arrive. Bael grumbled to himself. He yawned and scratched his ass, but kept his complaints to a minimum as he dutifully followed Belial toward the edge of Crescent City, at the tip-top northwestern corner of the state. It wasn't a big city, with a population well under 10,000, but it was strategically located along the western US coastline, and was within spitting distance of the state border; useful for all sorts of demonic activities.

The woods east of the city opened up to reveal the roads and houses at the city's edge, but Belial didn't travel any further. Instead, she, Bael, and Murmur all came to a stop just inside the treeline, then they stood still and waited.

Eventually, the ground opened up. A Burrower Demon Grunt emerged from the topsoil, looked around, then quickly bowed.

"Emperor Belial. Emperor Murmur. Duke Bael."

"Rise." Belial said. "Take us to her."

"Of course." The Burrower replied, smoothly standing up and assuming a casual but respectful posture. "Baron Ose is always busy, but she is willing to hear you out."

Belial crinkled her nose. "I'll bet she is."

The Burrower waved his hands. The hole in the ground expanded, and he walked down into the angled hole, while the other three followed him. After walking fifty feet underground, the Burrower sealed the topsoil, taking care to disperse the grass back the way it was minutes before. Not even the most eagle-eyed of angels would notice the disturbance unless they were specifically looking for it, or perhaps if they were attuned with the element of Earth, such as Archangel Uriel once was.

Pitch-black darkness engulfed the demons. Nobody complained. Demons had extremely powerful eyesight, and were able to adjust to rapid changes in luminosity, particularly when it involved darkness. Naturally, extremely bright light could injure them, but they were never worried about walking into dimly lit caves.

The Burrower silently dug a tunnel, traveling down a pre-chosen underground path as he led his superiors to the designated meeting area. Eventually, the path downward opened up into a hallway illuminated with glowing rocks made of magical Sulphurite. This type of element was not a naturally occurring rock, but a type of demoncursed exotic mineral used to illuminate underground passages indefinitely without requiring or draining oxygen the way torches would.

The trio walked ahead, while the Burrower remained behind. Before long, Belial's eyes twitched. She sensed a previously hidden demonic aura emerge up ahead, one she never enjoyed encountering in person.

"Belial! So nice of you to pay me your respects." A female voice said up ahead.

Belial rounded the corner and came face-to-face with one of the demonesses she detested most; none other than Lucifer, the Emperor of Providence.

Lucifer's third eye looked up, down, left and right. It constantly swept the area, watching out for hostiles and penetrating the bedrock with contemptuous ease. At the same time, Lucifer's two ordinary eyes fixated on Belial, making her feel that typical sense of revulsion she always did when encountering a rival Emperor.

"Cut the crap." Belial said, before stopping to cross her arms. "Where's Ose?"

Inside this underground entry chamber, there was a sacrificial pit filled with the bodies of recently murdered and mutilated humans. Belial couldn't help but look at them, her lip twitching in disgust. Lucifer was up to some horrible things, no doubt. But she was also the ruler of the Third Hell of Blood. That made her an equal to Belial, as agreed upon by the Seven Ancient Emperors.

Belial wasn't allowed to interfere with Lucifer's matters unless they directly threatened the interests of demonkind. At the same time, neither was she allowed to scoop up any 'assets' Lucifer employed without the Emperor of Providence's permission.

That would make this next part... difficult.

"Not even a polite 'hello'? Your manners are dreadful these days." Lucifer said, her tongue snaking between her razor-sharp teeth as she spoke. When she smiled, it truly made the other conversation participants feel uneasy.

Belial fell silent for a moment. She inhaled a quiet breath, though not quiet enough for Lucifer to overlook.

"A new Trueborn Hero may have arisen." Belial said. "This affects all demons, yourself included. I need Ose's help to infiltrate the Illuminati."

Lucifer's smile disappeared. She looked at Belial with a severe expression.

"That isn't possible." Lucifer stated emphatically. "Harold Whittaker was the last Trueborn. The Nazis ruined the Heroic Aura with their clumsy experiments. There will never be another Trueborn again."

"You and I both know that's not the whole truth." Belial said, narrowing her eyes. "I've heard rumors that the humans have been detecting Heroic energy signatures for the past decade or so. We weren't able to confirm them, but now we can. The Illuminati swept up a young man named Jason Hiro from a place in Oregon called Cryotek Labs, and-"

"What was that?" Lucifer asked, narrowing her eyes. "You expect me to believe the new Trueborn's name is Jason Hiro? Can there really be such a coincidence, or did his mother have a sense of humor when she named him?"

"I thought it was silly myself." Belial said, rolling her eyes. "For all I know, this might be an elaborate ruse by the Illuminati. They might have set a trap to take out a few high-ranking demons, like me. If so, I'd be walking blindly into it. But you and I both know I have to take that gamble. A humanity with a Hero and without one are two very different concepts."

Lucifer fell silent.

She looked at Belial for a few long seconds, then her third eye abruptly snapped onto Belial's face, and a pulse of energy surged into the Emperor of Passion's brain.

"Aargh!" Belial shrieked, taking a step back. "You DARE?!"

She snapped her fist at Lucifer, but the Emperor of Providence ducked the attack with fluid ease, seeing right through Belial's movements. She fired a powerful kinetic energy blast from her third eye, and it smashed into Belial, sending her flying backward until she hit the wall and rattled the underground chamber.

"Lucifer!!" Belial roared, her eyes glowing with hatred.

"Wait! I was just testing you. Peace, Belial." Lucifer shouted, holding up her palms. "I had to know!"

Belial was about to pounce at Lucifer and start ripping her apart. She had wanted to do so for a long time anyway, and this unprovoked attack would have given her the perfect excuse! Unfortunately, with Lucifer abruptly backing down and apologizing, Belial was left flat-footed and unsure of how to respond.

"Had to know about WHAT?!" Belial shouted back. "You've got five seconds before I bring this entire chamber down on both of us!"

"I wasn't sure if you were 'you'." Lucifer explained. "For all I knew, this was an elaborate human ruse to get me to lower my guard. I had to make sure you were really Belial and not some advanced clone or robotic mimic. My daughter has warned me such creatures may be invented by humanity soon."

What a great excuse! How wonderful indeed!

Belial gnashed her teeth. In truth, Lucifer's attacks hadn't hurt all that much. If she had intended to fight to the death or to cause severe injuries, Lucifer could have poured far more demonic energy into her initial sneaky strike and Belial would have suffered much more.

"Well... are you satisfied?" Belial hissed, standing up straight and looking at Lucifer with eyes that could bore holes in concrete.

Behind Belial, Murmur looked on in concern, but Bael seemed as if he were about to fall asleep. Why would he care about two broads catfighting? He had more important things to think about, like his next meal.

"I am." Lucifer said, folding her hands behind her back. She smiled smugly at Belial. "Well, alright. Even if this Hero stuff is all a bunch of nonsense, it's better to be safe than sorry. I'll take you to Ose. It's up to her if she wants to join you, though."

Without further ado, Lucifer spun on her heels. She trotted past the bodies of the mutilated human corpses, while Belial and the rest forced themselves not to look. Actually, Bael didn't care one way or the other. He'd seen so many ripped-up bodies, it was like looking at pieces of paper laying on the ground. Meaningless to him.

This underground region turned out to be far larger than it first appeared. As Belial and the others walked behind Lucifer, they passed tens, dozens, and hundreds of other low and mid-ranking demons. Hidden under Crescent City, a huge underground crystal mine lurked, with blue and red crystals embedded in the walls, providing light to the areas around them, as well as providing a way of storing demonic energy externally, like batteries. The purpose of all that demonic energy was made clear as they eventually arrived inside a huge underground dome filled with what Belial thought were human-made computers, yet ones that distinctly possessed a demonic aura to their aesthetics. Even a tech-illiterate like her could tell no humans had been involved in the making of these giant servers and CPU-banks.

At the center of the area, a white-haired beauty stood, her eyes glazed over as strings of electrical energy surged out in a hundred different directions, tapping into the computers to achieve some end Belial had no way of understanding.

"Ose. Ose, darling!" Lucifer called out, before stopping fifty meters from the end of the supercomputer cluster. "I have brought guests to see you!"

Belial wiped her forehead. The room was hot. Really hot. Demons could deal with high and low temperatures just fine, and even 150F Fahrenheit would only make her sweat a bit, but she had to admit it was truly sweltering in here. The computer cluster ran hot, and while there appeared to be powerful ventilation shafts secreted inside the walls, venting the excess heat outside, they couldn't be too numerous or too expansive, lest the vents draw negative attention from outside observers. Thus, the room was not nearly at a temperature Belial would consider comfortable.

Surprisingly, Ose did not appear negatively impacted by the high heat. Bael was immune to temperature of essentially all sorts, but Ose was a bit different. Her affinity to electricity was also an affinity to energy, and heat was merely an alternate expression of that affinity. As such, high and low temperatures didn't bother her in the slightest, barring the most extreme examples.

Hearing her mother call out, Ose momentarily shifted her mental focus away from the computer cluster. She directed a short glance at Belial and the others then turned back to what she was doing.

"What is it?" Ose asked. "What do they want?"

Belial frowned. Ose was only a Baron, yet she always acted high and mighty; likely the result of her mother constantly telling her how amazing she was. She had an ego nearly as big as Lucifer's, and she never bothered to respect other people's authority.

"I need your help." Belial said, taking a step forward, but stopping at the same position as Lucifer. If Lucifer didn't want to step too close to the computer cluster, there was probably a good reason why, and Belial wasn't about to make a fool of herself by crossing that boundary. "I have reason to believe there might be a human Trueborn somewhere on Earth. I need your help investigating the situation."

Ose remained silent. She continued vacantly gazing into some unknown internal computer matrices, seemingly ignoring Belial's words.

"Hello?" Belial asked, her annoyance growing by the second.

"So you finally figured it out." Ose said, her tone bland. "Took you long enough."

Belial blinked. Lucifer blinked, too.

"You knew?" Belial asked.

"You knew??" Lucifer repeated, slightly aghast. "Ose! Why did you not say anything?"

"I've been monitoring the situation for the better part of a decade." Ose replied. "What do you think this computer network is? It's a spynet I built to wiretap every advanced computer system on the planet. In fact, I figured out a long time ago that there wasn't just one Trueborn, but two."

Belial's heart turned cold.

"What... what did you say?"

"Two Trueborn." Ose replied, still not bothering to look at the two of them. "Though they are both frighteningly good at evading my detection. I couldn't uncover their identities, despite my best efforts."

She paused.

"One of them seems to reside either in Russia, Germany, or France. They are a teleportation-type Hero with other potentially unknown abilities. They seem to be an Esper with abilities not dissimilar to mine, though their technological prowess is far beneath mine. This is made up for by their other abilities, many of which I can only hazard guesses regarding."

She continued. "The other one is primarily located here in the United States. I have tried for years to observe him in the field, but he has a supernatural method of evading my detection net. I do know his identity, though."

Lucifer and Belial looked at each other in shock. While they were both just starting to uncover the slightest whiff of a Hero, Ose had known for over a decade but said nothing! Lucifer was the most bothered by this revelation, because... why would her precious little girl not tell her??

"The one you're talking about. Is his name Jason Hiro?" Belial asked, her tone somewhat muted.

"No." Ose replied. "The second Hero I detected... I don't know his real name. But I know his pseudonym. His identity is... Cat Mask. He is an internationally recognized assassin with the ability to accurately snipe at any target with perfect precision. Beyond that, I believe he has more subtle abilities, ones I cannot pinpoint."

Ose finally turned to look at Belial.

"Jason Hiro is the third Trueborn. I only learned about him for the first time less than a week ago. I am fully aware that he was taken by the Illuminati, and I've been waiting to make my move on their compound."

"Th-th-third Trueborn?!" Belial exclaimed, her skin turning a pale pink. "There's three of them? That's not possible! Not possible at ALL!"

"I thought so too, years ago." Ose said, before pausing for a few moments to look off to the side. "We know Trueborn Heroes only rise once in a generation. What if there was only one Trueborn, and the other two were merely powerful Lowborn? But no, that isn't the case. I've personally verified that all three of them have Heroic Energy Signatures as powerful as each other. What I don't know is who they are, what their exact abilities are, and how much of a threat they pose."

Ose pursed her lips.

"The secret societies have been quietly gathering up Lowborn across the world. I've never seen so many appear all at once. Something changed. I don't know what, how, or why, but I do know it represents an existential threat to demonkind. We've never seen this many Lowborn emerge at once, and certainly not multiple Trueborn. It seems the Nazis were not as unsuccessful as we thought."

Lucifer stared at her daughter. She still felt miffed at not being informed of this incredibly important matter, but she also felt extremely proud. It was obvious Ose had done her due diligence! She was not known as demonkind's secret genius for no reason.

"Sweetie." Lucifer said. "I know you are holding something back. You have a theory about the Trueborn... correct?"

Ose faintly smiled. She closed her eyes and shook her head.

"You always do see through me, mother. That's right. I have a bit of a strange theory, indeed."

Ose opened her eyes.

"I believe that all three of these Heroes are related, likely by blood. I believe they may all be siblings. Specifically... I believe they are all the descendants of Harold Whittaker."

A veil seemingly parted before Belial and Lucifer's eyes. The two of them fell into introspection as they mulled this possibility over.

"Supposedly, Harold died from the injuries he sustained during the war." Belial said. "I heard he didn't live past the 1950's."

"A decade is a great deal of time." Lucifer added. "You know humans. They breed like rabbits. Maybe he and his wife bore a few kids in secret. Maybe he had an affair with another woman, or multiple of them."

Ose tilted her chin up. "The original Heroic Aura belonged to the first Trueborn, the Illuminator, Jepthath. Originally, the aura would have passed down to his descendants, until Archangel Raphael altered how it worked. I believe it's possible the Nazis found a way to reverse this change, returning it to the state of a bloodline ability. This is extremely bad news for us, as it means we will have more Heroes to face as enemies... but the situation may not be entirely bleak."

Belial perked her ears up. "What do you mean?"

Ose detached herself from her computer nexus. Her body sagged a little as she dropped to the floor, then began walking toward her mother and their three guests.

"If the Heroic Aura is as it was, then killing a Trueborn has negligible impact on humanity's long-term prospects. A new one will simply be born elsewhere, grow up, and become a threat within one to two decades."

She stopped an arm's length from the other demons.

"But what if that isn't the case anymore? If the Heroic Aura is no longer a transient entity that jumps from person to person... then that means we have a chance to snuff it out... once and for all."

Ose grinned evilly. A cruel and malicious light flickered in her eyes.

"Don't you get it? If we kill all the Trueborn on Earth right now, before they can breed and have more children, we can prevent the rise of all future Heroes. We already thought we did once, but the humans tricked us. Yet their long-term deception hasn't quite paid off! These three Trueborn are vulnerable. We have a shot at killing them right now, before they can start expanding their numbers. If we move quickly, we can finally bring an end to this millennia-long stalemate!"

She paused, Her evil smile disappeared.

"However, calling it a 'stalemate' is also inaccurate. The humans are rapidly evolving their technology. I can keep up with all those changes on my own, but the rest of you cannot. It may not be long before they start inventing weapons and armor that can take down Dukes and Emperors. What then? Even without a Hero, they will crush us!"

Belial nodded. Her expression turned grave.

"We have a narrow window of opportunity." Belial muttered. "We have to strike before the Heroes multiply to even more ludicrous numbers, and before humanity's technology reaches a level that seriously threatens us."

"Precisely." Ose said. "But for now, we need intel. That's why I'll be going with you. You want to infiltrate the Illuminati compound and uncover the Trueborn's identity? So do I."

"I shall go, too." Lucifer said, straightening her posture. "Let us forget our differences for a while. This is bigger than both of us."

Belial looked uneasy, but she had to admit Lucifer was a powerhouse. With her at their side, the infiltration was bound to be a success.

The only problem was, Lucifer loved killing humans. Belial had no idea if 'sneaking' was even an option for the overbearing Emperor.

"Alright..." Belial said slowly. "But this is my mission, handed down by Satan directly. I'm in charge."

Lucifer spread her mouth in a horrifying shark-like approximation of a smile.

"Sure. You take the lead." Lucifer said.

Just as the group was about to leave, Ose threw out one last thing.

"I'm going to bring a couple other demons, mother."

Lucifer's smile became a bit warmer and less sadistic as she turned to face her daughter. "Of course, sweetheart. Who have you chosen?"

"Abby, for her ability to influence the minds of humans from a great distance." Ose said. "And also... my brother."

Lucifer's smile evaporated. "Abby is a fine choice, but even that worthless idiot, Gressil? All he does is sit around playing with butterflies all day! There must be a better choice!"

Ose appeared slightly uncomfortable. "Mother..."

"Oh, all right! Bah, if you want to bring him, then do as you please!" Lucifer snarled. "But he'd better not compromise the mission!"

"I'll make sure he doesn't." Ose promised.

Belial scratched her head.

Gressil... Gressil...

Had she heard that demon's name before?

Everyone knew Ose. She was a rare talent among Barons, gifted with technological capabilities that made her utterly unique.

As for Ose's 'brother', Belial didn't remember ever speaking to him. He likely wasn't anyone important. Lucifer's words seemed to correlate with her guess.

Before long, a cute and bubbly demoness joined the group. She rushed over and latched onto Ose's arm while squealing excitedly. "Ooooh, Ose! You called for me specifically?! That's great! I'm so happy!!"

Ose grimaced. "Your abilities will come in handy for this infiltration mission... but that's all. Release my arm. We're not close."

"Of COURSE we're close! We're like besties!" Abby, the Baron of Happy Thoughts declared.

While Abby pestered and latched onto Ose, Belial directed her attention to the other latecomer. He was a thin, gangly, utterly unimpressive looking demon. His face was moody, his hair scraggly. He looked off into the distance, seemingly absorbed in his own thoughts. If ever there was a ranking list of anti-social rejects among demonkind, he would be in the number one position. Belial couldn't believe such a pathetic looking demon existed!

"Gressil!" Lucifer snapped, hissing at him in her usual overbearing manner. "This is Emperor Belial! Introduce yourself!"

Gressil looked at Belial. Despite her attractive appearance, he didn't seem even the slightest bit interested.

"...Hello." Gressil said, after several long seconds.

Then he looked away again.

Despite her immediate revulsion, Belial also felt a different way toward him. That one single word conveyed a level of unimaginable depression. She realized with a start that this 'Gressil' likely lived a sad life, being bossed and bullied by one of the meanest possible 'mothers' who could have ever adopted him.

Naturally, Lucifer was not truly Gressil and Ose's parent. More likely, she had adopted them at some point in the past, as did many older demons. Rumor had it Agares was looking for a protege, though the few he'd found had turned out to be rather inadequate. It was a bit of a surprise that Lucifer hadn't just cut Gressil loose if she hated him so much.

"It's nice to meet you, Gressil." Belial said, smiling as cheerfully as she could manage. But the young demon didn't seem to notice her efforts. He simply continued gazing off into the distance, as if nothing happening now mattered to him.

After adding in these final two members, Belial returned her attention to the task at hand.

"Alright. The sooner we move out, the better." Belial said. "Let's uncover the conspiracy behind all these Trueborn."

January 21st, 2021. 4AM.

Normally, it would take the group of demons over half a day to make their way back north to the Illuminati's base. However, thanks to Belial and Lucifer's contacts, they were able to arrange a direct Warper teleportation array into the woodlands only fifty or so miles from the Illuminati's Haven. Any closer, and the demons risked detection. With so many Emperors gathered together, their demonic auras were sure to cause a spike in the humans' energy scanners.

As they appeared inside a densely wooded forest area, Ose gestured toward a huge knapsack she'd brought along. As a Demon Baron, she had a powerful physical body. Her strength was many times higher than even the strongest human bodybuilder, so carrying a full ton of equipment meant nothing to her, let alone a bag of seemingly random knick-knacks.

"I cannot predict if the Illuminati will know we're coming." Ose warned the others. "It is entirely possible we're walking into a trap. If we're not, then hopefully my precautions will protect us. But first, let's discuss operational roles. Belial?"

Belial nodded. As the leader of this expedition, she would take the full blame if anything went wrong, so it would be up to her to decide how they proceeded.

"This expedition into a human fortress will not be simple. We have clashed with the Illuminati many times. They are well aware of my abilities, and are certain to have taken precautions against me. However, Ose is one of our better-kept secrets. The humans know she exists, and that she is our sole technomancer, but I doubt they are aware of just how adept she is at manipulating their gadgets."

Belial glanced around the group.

"I will be infiltrating the base, while Ose will be assisting me. But all of you can provide additional support in your own way. Lucifer, your third eye can see through any obstruction. Your job is long-range reconnaissance and communications. It will be up to you to keep us appraised on the situation in the base. If need be, use your powers to knock the humans unconscious or trap them in their... nightmares. Try not to set off any alarms, though."

Lucifer snorted. "I'm not stupid. I know how to handle myself."

Belial forced a smile. "Of course you aren't. I wouldn't imply otherwise. Murmur, your telekinesis will be best used to create distractions, or to help us fight our way out in the event the humans discover my presence."

Murmur nodded quietly. "Okay."

She almost never had anything to say.

Bael pointed his thumb at himself. "What about me??"

"Same story as Murmur." Belial explained. "After me, you're our strongest combat asset. If things go south, you'll jump in and help me break out."

Bael nodded seriously. "Gotcha. Which way is south again? And what if they go north instead? Do I, uh, keep quiet?"

Belial stared at Bael for five long seconds. Then she looked away, not bothering to answer his thick-headed question.

"Ose. I want you to send out your Astral Body. I'm sure to run into devices I can't open, passwords that need cracking, other human stuff. Can you get past them without being there in person?"

Ose sneered. "That will be the easiest part. Nobody can detect me in my Astral Form if I don't want them doing so."

Belial nodded. She turned to the last demon.

"Abby, I'm not familiar with your powers, but you're a Baron, so they must be good. Care to elaborate?"

Abby, who was standing as close to Ose as she possibly could without touching her, smiled giddily.

"Of course! I have a bunch of powers, but mainly I specialize in influencing minds and emotions. I can make people see things that aren't there, make them start thinking about memories from their pasts, fantasize about particularly hot and heavy-"

"I see." Belial interrupted, before Abby could say anything weird. "That's good. Your power should synergize with mine. I assume your abilities work at long range?"

Abby nodded. "Against other demons, I have to get up close and personal, but human minds are suuuuper weak and easy to influence."

"Then while I'm breaking in, you'll focus on distracting the humans to give me more leeway." Belial concluded. "Monitor them to see if anyone is holding any suspicious thoughts, and if they are, draw their attention elsewhere."

"Okay! Sounds easy enough." Abby chirped cutely.

"Good." Belial said with a nod. "Then it's settled. We should reach their Haven within thirty minutes if we run at just below top speed-"

"Wait." Ose interrupted. "You're forgetting someone."

Belial blinked. She followed Ose's hands as the demoness gestured to her side.

"Oh. Right. Gressil." Belial said, raising an eyebrow. "Ahh... and your abilities are...?"

Gressil didn't seem to hear her. He looked off to the side, as if lost in his own little world.

"Gressil?" Belial asked. "Gressil??"

Finally, the moody young demon blinked. He turned his head slightly to look at her. "Huh?"

"Your powers." Belial repeated. "What are they?"

"He summons butterflies." Lucifer sneered. "Stupid, worthless butterflies. I told you we were better off not bringing-"

"Mother!" Ose snapped, irritation on her face. Seeing that her words shut Belial up, Ose forced herself to regain her center of calm. "Gressil is... an illusionist. He can conjure illusions. It's not just butterflies. He's sort of like a mini-Raphael."

Lucifer rolled all three of her eyes. "Yes, yes, he can summon bats and birds too. Truly terrifying."

Gressil lowered his eyes. Lucifer's words seemed to hurt his feelings. He didn't say anything in response.

Belial frowned. Lucifer's constant denigration of her 'son' made Belial feel deeply uncomfortable. It was unnecessary and detrimental to the mission. If he was coming, then Belial couldn't allow Gressil to act like or think of himself as a useless burden. He might act too slowly in a moment of crisis and cause a catastrophe.

"Gressil..." Belial said softly. "You're an illusionist?"

Gressil lifted his eyes for a moment to look at Belial, then he lowered them again.

"...Yes." Gressil said, his reply barely audible.

Belial shot Lucifer a warning glare before returning her gaze to the young demon. "I happen to think illusions can be extremely powerful under the right circumstances. Can you perhaps cloak our bodies to make us harder to detect as we approach?"

Gressil looked at Belial once more. He stared at her for a good few seconds, then slowly nodded.

"...sible..." Gressil mumbled.

"What was that?" Belial asked, smiling a little to try and lift his spirits.

"I can... become... invisible..." Gressil mumbled. "Hide myself. Maybe hide... everyone here. Haven't tried before..."

"Whoa!" Belial exclaimed. "If you really can, that would be a huge help. Will you be able to maintain the illusion while we're on the move, even while racing through the forest?"

Gressil smiled, though only by the tiniest bit. "...Maybe. I can... try."

His slow way of speaking told Belial what she needed to know. Every demon had the ability to accomplish great things. It was clear that his confidence had been shattered long ago. He had lost faith in himself, and had lost his spark of curiosity. It was no wonder, with Lucifer constantly mocking and insulting him.

Belial's smile turned somewhat somber. She felt the young demon was a tragic figure. The way he looked at her, like a dog that had received the first treat of its entire life, made her want to envelop him in a motherly hug and tell him everything would be all right.

But obviously, this was neither the time nor the place. The clock was ticking, and dawn's first light would soon arrive. It was more important to get Gressil in gear and ready for action while getting his mother to shut up about him for a few hours than it was to worry about his self-esteem.

After learning a bit more about him and investigating his powers, Belial pulled Lucifer away and took care to lower her voice. The other demons all had sharp hearing, and Belial wanted this conversation to be at least a little bit private.

"I don't want to hear another word from you. Not one word, about Gressil, for the rest of this mission." Belial hissed. "Got it? I don't care if you think he's worthless, or stupid, or whatever else. Keep your snide comments to yourself."

"Don't tell me what to do." Lucifer bit back, puffing her chest out. She poked her finger in Belial's face in a provoking manner. "He's my son, and I'll tell him whatever I want. The stupid idiot needs some tough love."

"Tough love? There's no love in anything you say!" Belial whispered. "Just shut your mouth for a few hours. It won't kill you, and it might allow all of us to also avoid getting killed."

Lucifer frowned. "You're taking these humans way too seriously."

"No. You're not taking them seriously enough." Belial retorted. "Did you not hear a single devil-damned thing your daughter said? There are not one, not two, but three bloody Trueborn out there! Unknown powers, unknown appearances. We could be walking right into an ambush! I will not allow you to put all our lives in danger. If you can't shut your trap, then you're off the mission."

Lucifer sneered. "If you cut me out, Ose, Gressil, and Abby stay with me."

Belial cocked her head. "Are you telling me I should involve Satan in this little spat? Do you think he'd let you off easy, knowing the stakes?"

Lucifer's haughty grin evaporated. She glowered at Belial, seething under the surface.

Lucifer had few compunctions. She was an insanely powerful and versatile demoness. Against even the mightiest Archangel, she could come out on top, or at least escape with her life.

But Satan was the one entity she could not afford to piss off. She had gone against him only a few times in the past, and she nearly died every time. The only reason she still drew breath was because Satan had let her live. Unfortunately, he had forced her to sign one of his contracts. It wasn't a slave contract, like what he made lesser demons sign, but it allowed him to always know her location, no matter where she hid.

If she enraged Satan, he would come for her. She would not come out the victor.

The Emperor of Providence bristled, but could not offer a retort. She glared daggers at Belial, but ultimately relented. She wouldn't mind beating the shit out of her rival, but if she went too far, she would not escape Satan's wrath. Such was the control he held over all the other Hells. When shit hit the fan, they always fell in line.

"Fine." Lucifer practically spat. "I'll... keep my comments to myself. Happy?"

Belial forced herself to smile in the most sickeningly cutesy way she could. "Oh, thank you, Lucy. You're always so understanding! Teehee!"

Belial playfully scampered away, leaving Lucifer's eyes twitching and her teeth gnashing.

"Don't... call me... Lucy... you bitch..."

Minutes later, the demons regrouped. Gressil summoned his illusions to cover all of them with light-bending distortions, and they became nearly invisible. Even radar would have a hard time spotting them. Then, Ose reached into her bulky knapsack and pulled out wristbands that she tossed to all the demons.

"I reverse-engineered the human's scanners. These are Energy Inhibitors. They will greatly weaken demonic energy signatures, especially for higher ranking demons. However, they will also inhibit your powers a bit. If we end up fighting, then rip them off. Crush them into powder if possible so the humans can't salvage anything. They'll allow us to sneak onto the outside of the base without being detected."

Belial nodded. She wrapped the band around her wrist and instantly felt her internal energy being suppressed through some unknown mechanism. At the same time, she nearly lost track of the other demons, since she stopped being able to sense their presences.

"What a marvelous invention. Not bad for technology based on human stuff." Belial casually commented.

Ose glared at her. "It isn't human-based. I made it from scratch."

"Oh. Sorry, I didn't know." Belial apologized.

Ose didn't seem very accepting of the apology. Like mother, like daughter.

Without further ado, the demons all started running toward the Illuminati compound at full speed. Instead of fanning out, they stuck together, their footsteps somewhat loud due to the speed of their travel and the strength in their legs. Bael was easily the loudest. Each impact of his foot against the ground sounded like a boulder falling off a cliff. The group had to stick together so Gressil could keep everyone hidden, but Bael's damned stomping would likely give them away without the humans needing to physically spot them!

Belial directed a quick appreciative glance at Gressil. It turned out he was a Baron, like his sister, but also a complete unknown. Belial hadn't heard of him before, so she had no idea how he obtained the souls needed to become one. Did Lucifer empower him in spite of her irrational hatred?

Belial wasn't sure. She pushed those thoughts aside, and once they drew within three miles of the base, she forced everyone to slow down. They continued to run, but much more quietly and cautiously. As high ranking demons, their stamina levels were far beyond any human. They could run for an entire day without feeling winded. Naturally, long and constant exertion would eventually exhaust them and force a sleep, but in general demons didn't really need sleep, they simply rested once a week or so to keep themselves in prime physical condition.

After reaching the one-mile mark, they slowed to a steady walk. The demons began to creep forward, using their formidable senses to sweep the area and locate human sentries, technology-based scanning devices, cameras, and other such things.

Belial truly felt relieved that she had brought so many other demons along. Ose in particular was a huge help! Time and time again, Ose surreptitiously hacked a device before Belial and the others even knew it would be a problem. She set cameras to loop their video feeds, fed scanners with false information, and otherwise subverted every system they passed. Belial even started to feel sorry for the humans. They had no idea how much danger they were in and still thought themselves safe behind their walls.

At the same time, Abby and Lucifer played a key role during the approach. Abby was able to sense emotions, and since it was mainly Sentients who possessed them, she could tell when humans were near and distract them with idle thoughts, allowing the demons to sneak right past.

But even if Abby weren't present, Lucifer's third eye was even more terrifying. She could see through the jungle as easily as if it were a barren desert. Trees, boulders, fauna and flora, none of these things were an impediment to her third eye. Even with Ose's suppression bracelet weakening her abilities, it didn't affect her physical body or her third eye in the slightest. In terms of physicality, she was still at full strength.

Bael, on the other hand, contributed nothing during this phase of the mission. As they approached the hundred-meter mark and Lucifer announced that the Haven's walls were near, Bael quietly yawned.

"Man. I hope there's some action." Bael grumbled under his breath. "Sneaking around with a bunch of broads is so boring. Ain't that right, kid?"

He sent a huge grin in Gressil's direction, but the young male only gave him a raised eyebrow in confusion before refocusing on keeping the others invisible.

Bael's grin faltered, then he looked away. "...Never mind."

As Bael continued to mutter to himself, Belial finally brought the group to a standstill. She turned back to look at Lucifer, Murmur, Bael, Ose, Abby, and Gressil, all of whom met her eyes, one by one.

"This next part... is my burden to bear." Belial whispered. "We have about 45 minutes until dawn arrives. 6AM is my exit timer. Ose, keep close to me. Continue subverting the human's technology. Lucifer, Abby, you know what to do. The rest of you, stay on standby. I'm leaving now."

Bael yawned again. "Oh, alright, toots. See ya later. Bring me some snacks on the way back. Chips would be nice."

Belial rolled her eyes. She stepped forward, changed her appearance, and materialized inside the uniform of an Illuminati outer guard.

At the same time, Ose sat down, closed her eyes, and projected an astral figure of herself into reality. Unlike her future self, this projection was much fainter, which helped with making it even harder to detect, but it also weakened the effectiveness she had in manipulating the real world with her powers. Her ability to astrally project over long distances was also much weaker, but since she had yet to become an Emperor, she had no idea this weakness could be alleviated.

Not hesitating for even a moment longer, Belial began to quickly sneak forward, slithering through the trees like a snake in the tall grass. It didn't take her long before she sensed a human up ahead. It turned out to be someone wearing full tactical gear, covering their face and body from head to toe.

"Who's there?" The man asked, snapping to face the unexpected visitor. He took aim with his AR-15, narrowing his eyes when he caught a glimpse of someone wearing Illuiminati-issued tactical gear approaching from a strange direction. By the time he noticed the other person didn't have any guns or other tactical gear attached to their person, it was too late for him.

Belial pounced. She dove onto the man faster than he thought possible. His pupils shrunk to pinpricks as she ripped the gun from his hands.

"Help-!" The man started to shout, but a light slap from Belial knocked him unconscious. She made quick work of his uniform, stealing various pieces of equipment, his rifle, and his sidearm. She took off his helmet and touched his face, then her body changed form as she perfectly mimicked his appearance.

The man woke up a minute later, his head throbbing. He opened his eyes to see his own face staring at him, but the odd thing was, the other 'him' had glowing pink eyes.

Strange. Why did his other self appear so… attractive?"

"Hey, big boy." The man's other self said, his voice hauntingly seductive. "Why don't you tell me all about yourself. What's your name, stud?"

The man's speech slurred. "Private… Jameson… Little… Rank 3."

"How long have you been on this base, Jamey-boy?" Belial asked.

"Four years… two months…" Jameson mumbled.

Belial spent a couple precious minutes extracting valuable intel from the man. She identified key weaknesses in the Illuminati's defenses, then caressed Jameson's cheek.

"You're such a good boy." She cooed. "Why don't you sleep for a while, sweetie? A few hours will do. You're real tired."

Jameson blinked his eyes slowly. "Yeah… I am… tired……."

He closed his eyes one last time, then drifted off to a deep sleep.

Ose, watching from behind Belial, grimaced. She felt sickened and repulsed by the ease in which Belial seduced the disgusting human. Ose herself hated humans. She studied them, learned about them, and became an expert on their ways, but only out of hatred. Ever since the ancient times when King Arthur nearly had many members of her brood-family slaughtered, she had hated humans. Arthur's subordinates had killed two of her brothers, leaving only Gressil behind.

Ose didn't know if she still loved Gressil. She knew he was at least somewhat important to her. She also hated that her adoptive mother always insulted him.

Gressil was different before the humans captured him. He was actually the strongest of her three brothers, and the first to ascend to Baron. But after that horrible day in Arthur's dungeons, he mentally broke. He lost too much, too abruptly. He shut down mentally, and the formidable Baron who Lucifer hastily adopted ended up a worthless investment in her eyes.

Ose knew why her mother hated Gressil. She would have thrown him away like garbage a long time ago, but she valued Ose highly and knew if she did truly dispose of Gressil, Ose would hate her. Even so, she simply couldn't hide her contempt for 'weaklings.' And Ose enabled her mother's actions because she liked being praised by such a powerful demoness. It helped that in her time of greatest need, Ose had been rescued by Lucifer, and therefore she bonded with her easily.

Ose's astral body sighed softly.

She didn't like the current status quo with her adoptive mother and blood-brother, but she felt too weak and powerless to change anything, and ultimately Ose herself benefited from the arrangement. As important as her older brother was, her revenge on the humans was even more so.

The humans had to suffer. They had to pay for what they had done to her demon family, and so many others.

Belial looked behind herself. She could only just barely sense Ose's presence, but she couldn't see the Baron's astral body at all.

"Let's go." Belial whispered.

[Sure.] Ose said, her voice transmitting inside Belial's mind.

As much as Ose loathed Belial's disgusting human-seducing ways, ultimately she would tolerate them. All means and measures were acceptable in Ose's grand goal of someday exterminating humanity.

While Belial infiltrated, Ose assisted... and she pondered a great many things.

Perhaps the arrival of these three Trueborn wasn't such a bad thing.

Maybe they could be used. They could form a Threat.

As the humans always said, schemers should never let crises go to waste...

Part 633: Haven Infiltration

January 21st, 2021. 5AM.

Private Jameson Little walked up to the entrance of the Illuminati Haven. He held his stomach as he approached, and paused when the entry guard held up his palm.

"Jamie? Your shift isn't over for another two hours."

The gate guard's face was cloaked, so determining his identity shouldn't have been easy, but Private Little still forced a pained smile and responded normally.

"Ahh, Marco, I... this is a little embarrassing... can I swap? I need to... you know?"

"Need to... what?" Marco, the entry guard, asked. He narrowed his eyes under his mask, and the other guard on the opposite side casually aimed his weapon at the Private.

"I... I gotta take a shit!" Jameson hissed, lowering his head out of embarrassment. "I'm practically growing a tail here, man!"

"Jesus, seriously? You're supposed to use the bathroom before you- goddammit, Jamie. Protocols are protocols for a reason. Fucking hell..."

Marco cursed under his breath, then touched the side of his head and spoke into his mic. Jamie stood in place, shifting uncomfortably, trying not to be too obvious about doing his potty-dance while waiting for the gate to open. Eventually, it did, and another soldier stepped out, looked at him, and nodded.

"Get in there. Go before you shit yourself and make us look like idiots." Marco growled.

"Th-thanks! Sorry, Marco, sorry..." Jameson said, racing inside.

After entering, Jameson trotted over to the shared men's bathroom inside the Haven's walls. Naturally, he wouldn't have to go down into the complex for such a minor thing, as they already had installed such facilities in the upper area. Jameson walked inside, where he found another man pissing into a urinal. He ignored that man, and quickly stepped into a stall, shut the door, and started unzipping and removing his pants.

"You're back early." The guy pissing said.

"Had to take a shit." Jameson said, his voice tinged with panic. At that moment, an explosive noise erupted inside the toilet, and he moaned audibly.

"God damn, what the fuck did you eat?" The urinating man asked. "Nah, I'm out. I'm out!"

He hurriedly zipped up his pants and raced outside without bothering to wash his hands. He did not want to be there for when the stench hit.

After about thirty seconds, the stall opened, and Jameson emerged.

Ose levitated nearby. She frowned. [Did you actually...?]

"No." 'Jameson' answered. "I morphed my lower body into an organ capable of replicating the sound. I doubt you want the details."

Ose's mouth curled up into a deep expression of revulsion. Since Belial couldn't see her, she had no idea how much she had just disgusted the prim and proper Baron.

"No. I don't." Ose said, wondering if it was possible for her astral body to projectile vomit. She hadn't ever contemplated such a thing before, but she truly found Belial to be a disgusting and degenerate demoness. Everything about her repulsed Ose on a fundamental level.

Ose was neat. Tidy. She looked upon herself as an untainted woman, clean of impurities. She had never known a man, and had never met one who even remotely interested her. Frankly, she didn't think such a man existed. That didn't mean she was interested in women or any of the other options either. In many ways, she saw herself as asexual, perhaps even sex-repulsed. Therefore, Belial's inherently sexual nature made her feel like Ose's polar opposite. The two were fundamentally incompatible on philosophical levels, and the more time Ose spent with Belial, the more she hated her.

It didn't help that her mother hated Belial too, albeit for entirely different reasons.

Ose eventually swallowed her disgust and refocused her mind.

[The first part of the plan is complete. You're inside the Haven. What do you intend to do now?]

Since Belial was both leading the operation and the primary infiltrator, all changes in plan were at her discretion. She took the biggest risk by physically entering the humans' base, so she had to prioritize her safety.

"Investigate the nearby guards. Are there any males carrying things you can use to identify them? Badges and so on? Can you manipulate the cameras so I can slip out of here?"

Ose smirked. [I can do a lot more than that. The other guards will be expecting your return, though. You're only supposed to use the bathroom, then travel back outside.]

"Have Abby deceive the guards. Make them think I left." Belial ordered. "Also, cover me while I leave here. Shut off the nearby cameras for a few moments."

Ose nodded, a motion Belial didn't see. Then, she reached out with her electrical powers and tapped into the camera feeds. In an instant, she altered all of them to loop the video feeds while also opening her physical body's mouth to communicate with Abby.

Ose's body sat in a lotus pose back with the other demons, her legs folded, her eyes shut, and her head bowed. When she spoke, Abby nearly jumped out of her skin; not helped by the fact she was hovering creepily close to Ose and nearly drooling on her leg while admiring Ose's perfect beauty from an unnervingly close distance.

"Abby. Belial wants you to use your powers on the guards." Ose said, before explaining the rest a few moments later.

Abby quickly recovered from her fright. "Okay! I can't exactly do what she wants, but I can confuse all of them a little bit. I'll just make them think the guard was given a temporary leave and allowed to return to his dorm."

"That will work." Ose responded.

Ose informed Belial of the new plan, and the Emperor of Passion nodded. She morphed her body again, this time turning into a long, slender, almost vine-like fleshy object. Belial clung to the wall, then pressed a window facing behind the bathrooms slightly open before slithering through the gap like a snake would. After leaving, she returned to the appearance of an Illuminati guard decked in full armor, then closed the window behind her. From here, the next part was a bit easier.

Belial simply strolled toward the inner base, utterly casual in her movements. She looked around with the same level of alertness expected of any average interior guard, swiveling her head from side to side, seemingly looking for threats. In actuality, she was assessing escape routes, ambush locations, and other potential pain points that might affect the later stages of the mission.

By acting like she belonged, Belial exploited humanity's innate lack of caution toward uniformed officers. She walked right past mechanics, civilian personnel, and other uniformed guards, giving a casual nod to the latter to assure them that she was, in fact, one of them.

As she approached the doors leading into the inner base, Belial's mind worked to plot several potential courses of action. Ose dutifully bypassed the keypad and gave Belial the code through telepathy, so the Emperor of Passion was able to casually type it in as if it were something she had done a thousand times.

She passed by a camera without even looking at it, assuming correctly that Ose was using her lightning-fast mind to subvert them well before Belial entered their view. However, Belial ran into a snag as she approached the end of a long hallway leading to an elevator heading down into the base. Beside the elevator, an armed guard stood. She was a woman, so Belial's succubi powers wouldn't work on her.

Ose hovered behind Belial. She frowned. How would Belial deal with this?

Then, Ose's gaze fell on the Emperor of Passion. When it did, her astral eyes metaphorically popped out of their sockets.

On Belial's back, unseen by the guard she was casually approaching, words materialized on a patch of bare skin that revealed itself when the back of her shirt opened up. Like tattoos instantly drawn by the world's fastest tattoo artist, the words came and went, but not too rapidly for Ose to keep up.

HER

NAME.

Ose blinked. In an instant, she understood Belial's intent.

She snapped her eyes onto a nearby wall-panel, then dove her mind inside. She located the entire base's personnel list, narrowed it down to specific roles, narrowed those roles down by gender, then visually scanned the faces of every registered guard until she found the young woman's name.

[Her name is Natalie Summers. Age twenty. She was originally a guard assigned to protect the Trueborn, but after a recent failure on her end, she was assigned to internal guard duty as punishment.]

The words on Belial's back shimmered once again. She was almost within conversational range of Natalie, and it would start to look suspicious if she didn't greet her fellow officer.

IS

JAMESON?

Ose frowned. This was a difficult question to answer. The personnel records couldn't possibly give her such information, and scanning other databases would take way too long!

[I.. I don't...] Ose said, her voice tinged with alarm. She didn't know how to respond. There was no time!

The rear of Belial's upper body armor abruptly closed up, and she didn't bother communicating with Ose again. She had already assumed obtaining such information wouldn't be possible, but it was worth a shot.

Instead, she kept her attitude casual. Belial walked up to Natalie, her face obscured by her helmet and goggles. She looked directly at Natalie, then nodded.

Natalie looked back at her. She smiled.

"Nothing to say?" Natalie asked.

Belial's mind jolted into action. She instantly intuited several contextual clues based on the young woman's body language and the hidden meaning behind those three words.

"Hey, babe." Belial said dryly, her tone one of exhaustion. "They let me off early today. I caught something, not sure what."

"You did?" Natalie asked, her forehead knitting in concern. "You were fine earlier, Jamie."

Belial paused only a few feet away from Natalie. She reached up and pulled her helmet back, then sighed heavily as she revealed her face.

"Oh, oh my god!" Natalie exclaimed. "Jamie, you need to see the doctor ASAP!"

Ose, hovering behind Belial, frowned. She quickly flitted forward to look at Belial's face, and her expression warped to disgust and then to horror. Belial's face was covered in dozens of red zit-like dots, making her look as if she had caught leprosy!

"Huh? You're kidding." Belial muttered. "It can't be that bad..."

"You look like you're at death's door!" Natalie exclaimed. "I'll call for backup."

"Nah, nah. I'll go, I'll go. Stay here." Belial said, her heart skipping a beat. Calling for backup was the exact opposite thing she wanted. "I'll go to the doctor if you think it's that bad."

"...Right away?" Natalie asked, her tone turning to concern.

Belial nodded. "As soon as I make it down there. Promise, alright?"

Belial smiled weirdly, then leered toward Natalie. "Kiss?"

"Eww, no!" Natalie exclaimed, recoiling from her plague-stricken boyfriend in horror. "Jamie, this is no time for jokes. Get down there right now!"

"Alright, alright. I'm going." Belial said.

She entered the elevator and turned around, observing Natalie's concerned expression as the doors closed, separating the two of them.

With that, Belial keyed the elevator to drop to the lower floors, then her helmet shifted on its own to cover her face once more. Naturally, her false leprosy vanished without a trace.

As the elevator dropped, Ose looked at her curiously.

[How did you know Jamie was Natalie's lover?] Ose asked.

"I have a lot of experience living as and communicating with both genders." Belial said quietly. "I could tell her relationship with Jamie wasn't ordinary. I can also tell it's a secret one. Private Jameson Little is thirty-two years old. Natalie is only twenty. They seem to have known each other for a few years... possibly more than two. I'm guessing their superiors don't know about their relationship."

Ose frowned. Humans lived far shorter lives than demons, so it was often hard for demons to comprehend age-based human issues, but she was well aware of at least a few human sexual dynamics.

[You think, before she was considered of legal age...?]

"It's hard to say." Belial replied, shrugging. "But anything is possible. Trust me, modern sensibilities about age are far better for human women than the ancient ones. The kings and nobles of the past used to hoard harems of little girls for their own pleasure and amusement."

She paused.

"Some still do. They simply don't display it openly."

Ose scowled. [Disgusting humans.]

"Sometimes, their species can be truly vile." Belial agreed.

The elevator door opened, and Belial found herself on the sixth floor of the underground complex. Thanks to Ose's intelligence gathering capabilities, they had both determined the Hero Testing Center was on this level, and it was likely to hold some key information regarding Jason Hiro, the newest Trueborn.

As Belial exited the elevator, her ears perked up. With her enhanced hearing, she overheard a pair of human scientists speaking in a break room somewhere off to the left, and she slightly enlarged her ear canal to amplify their distant conversation.

"-thinks it's a mistake. I tend to agree." A male voice muttered. "We should destroy these files. They provide too much information."

"It is an inspiring Heroic name though." A female voice replied, her voice also low. "It makes him sound like a prophet."

"That's because he is. Can you even imagine how powerful he'll become?" The male asked. "I've never heard of such an exotic ability as 'dream eating.' He's already uncovered all this top-secret information about the demons... who knows what he'll find in a few more years. Maybe we can even start planning some sort of a strike operation... hit them all at once, take their leaders out. Those idiot demons still think they're safe, but we already know where a few of their hideouts are."

Belial's expression shifted. Whatever these humans were talking about, it was highly sensitive and deeply relevant to her mission.

She glanced up at Ose, then tilted her head to the side, gesturing toward those distant voices.

[On it.] Ose replied, before her presence drifted away.

While Ose moved toward those humans, Belial navigated toward the inner laboratory. She paused to press her palm against its outer wall, then opened her mouth to emit an instantaneous, subsonic whistle. Like a bat out of hell, she mapped out the interior of the room on the other side of the wall without alerting anyone inside.

Five humans. Three scientists, a woman in a wheelchair... hm? There seems to be a lightly dressed young man inside. An experimental subject?

Belial's heart turned cold. She continued to press her palm against the wall and focused carefully. Despite the humans' best attempts to soundproof the interior chamber, she was able to parse through vibrations on the other side some of the words being spoken.

"...results...positive...good...work...Jason...satisfactory..."

Belial's eyes widened.

Jason? Was that the name she just heard? Could the Trueborn himself be inside? If it really was him, she had a chance to eliminate his threat right here and now!

But...

Belial frowned.

She wasn't a murderer. In fact, she had never killed anyone in her life. Maybe she could mutilate the Hero. Maim him, sever a few limbs... but what if he had healing powers? What if one of the other Trueborn did? Or what if the humans used their technology to heal him?

This was too good of an opportunity to pass up. If she killed him, it would immediately advance demonkind's interests. Breaking out of the facility would be difficult, but possible. She had backup waiting outside.

However. She simply... couldn't bring herself to do it. The Hero was only eighteen years old. Barely an adult, by modern human sensibilities.

Could she murder a child in cold blood?

Belial bit her lip. She wasn't sure what to do.

Suddenly, inside the chamber, there were the sounds of multiple footsteps moving in sync. The door around the corner opened up, and a voice called out. "I told you she was here!"

What? Belial thought, her heart skipping a beat. They detected me? Impossible! How, so fast?!

A young man wearing only a pair of blue jeans and sneakers rounded the corner while holding a bo staff. The shirtless youth grinned at Belial knowingly, as if she had completely forgotten to disguise herself.

"They didn't believe me, but I knew you'd come! My predictions always come right! Hahahaha!!!"

The young man pointed his staff at Belial and grinned, a feral look in his eyes.

"Belial, the Emperor of Passion! You really thought you could escape the eyes of I, the legendary Archseer?! I hope you're ready to give me a good fight, you dumb demon bitch!"

Belial's heart jumped. He knew! He really knew it was her! How the hell did he discover her?!

The young man charged at Belial, revealing his nature as a battle-maniac. He laughed wildly and snapped the bo staff at her head while the scientists and Claire Rothschild appeared behind him, looking at his back with fear.

"Jason, no!" Claire shouted. "She's too powerful!"

The young and foolish Hero didn't seem to hear Claire's words. He continued to madly grin, making Belial feel as if Bael were dumbly charging at her. Except she could tell by Jason's pathetic physique he was badly lacking in strength. If they came to blows, he would definitely lose!

But when the alarms activated inside the Haven, Belial realized she didn't have time to battle this Trueborn. Backup would arrive shortly, and if she were pinned between a Hero and heavily armed Illuminati guardsman, she might suffer a terrible defeat. She might end up captured... or worse!

Belial made a snap judgment. She turned tail and ran.

She bolted back down the hallway, grimacing as she heard Jason's shoes clomping loudly down the corridor behind her.

"Wow! I didn't know you were a coward, too!" Jason proclaimed. He reached into his pants pocket and pulled out a transmitter of some kind, then yelled into it. "This is the Archseer! Demons have surrounded the Haven! Lock down Level Six and prepare for battle! Demon Emperors Belial, Murmur, and Lucifer are on-site, as well as Duke Bael, Barons Abby, and... the primary targets! Ose and Gressil!!"

Belial continued to run. Her pupils shrunk to pinpricks.

The infiltration had been going way too easily! It turned out the Hero not only somehow knew she was there, but he had identified every member of her force.

"Ose!" Belial called out, unsure where her invisible comrade had floated off to. "Retreat!!"

A heavy door slid shut from the ceiling to the floor up ahead. Belial roared with fury and pounded it with her fist, smashing it away and sending it flying down the corridor. It embedded into the far wall, and another door slammed shut in her path.

She broke through that one too!

"Keep slowing her down! Shut off the elevators!" Jason shouted. "I've almost caught up! This stupid bitch has nowhere left to run!"

Belial's face contorted into an expression of rage.

She hated losing, and she hated being played for a fool. She assumed the humans had been planning a trap, but she had no idea the Archseer's abilities could allow him to predict the composition of the infiltration team with such frightening accuracy.

Heroic powers were such BULLSHIT!

Part 634: Annoying Archseer

Recommended Listening

January 21st, 2021. 5AM.

Belial raced toward the elevator, the Archseer hot on her trail. With less than twenty paces separating them, the only way the young Hero could catch up to her was when she was momentarily slowed by trapdoors slamming shut in front of her, but she still blew through them as if they were made of Styrofoam.

Belial tore toward the elevators, stabbed her hands out, and shoved her fingers into the gap between the doors. She ripped the elevator open with contemptuous ease, retracted her arms to yank herself forward, and slammed against the elevator car's wall. Hardly had her body impacted it before she smashed her feet against the floor, leaped upward, and pounded through the ceiling. Her impact broke the chain attaching the elevator to the shaft, causing the elevator car to plummet downward into the depths of the Haven's bottom levels. It struck the shaft's bottom with a distant boom, but Belial ignored it.

"Shit! The elevator! You idiots, she's getting away! Stop her!" Jason shouted. He arrived at the entrance to the elevator and shook his fist up at Belial as she rapidly climbed the walls, pouncing from side to side while scaling the shaft far faster than the elevator would have taken her to the top. "Face me if you dare, you cowardly demon!"

Belial didn't bother responding. She couldn't believe what a loudmouthed idiot this newest Trueborn was. All that yelling, declarations about how amazing he was, and constantly shouting out his heroic moniker... wasn't he afraid he'd die from embarrassment? Belial certainly felt a painful level of secondhand cringe radiating off him. It had been ages since Belial could recall a more pathetic hero than this Jason fellow. If they came to blows, didn't he realize she'd kill him with a single slap??

Whatever. Belial thought, as she raced past the fifth, fourth, and third floors. He doesn't matter now! I need to escape and rendezvous with the others. Then we need to assess how the new Trueborn's powers work. He's weak now, but that might not be the case in the future!

Belial's demonic senses picked up Jason's Heroic energy beneath her. He slowly moved toward what she assumed was a stairwell and started moving upward, but at the snail's pace he was ascending, she'd be long gone before he made it to the top level.

Seconds later, Belial reached the top of the elevator shaft. She punched through the elevator door, then spotted a group of Illuminati soldiers aiming rifles at her from the end of the corridor.

Blat-blat-blat!

Bullets flew at her before she could react. Belial grimaced as some of the bullets bit into her toughened Emperor skin and glanced off, but a few others found purchase and sunk into her flesh, drawing blood in their wake.

"Rrrgh!" Belial grunted, before narrowing her eyes, slimming down her body, and turning sideways to present the humans with an impossibly slender profile. Just like that, all the bullets started missing as the humans lost the target they were shooting at. Belial's body became so rail-thin that the humans might as well be shooting at a quarter-inch fence post!

The humans continued firing, but Belial shimmied toward them, bending her body left and right to make herself even harder to hit. The soldiers maintained discipline, but all of them flinched when Belial snapped her freakishly skinny fist out, punched their commander's chest, and sent him slamming backward into the wall behind him. Seconds later, all the men and women laid on the ground, coughing and crying as their injured bodies lay humbled in Belial's shadow.

Belial re-inflated herself back to normal size, then healed her injuries before racing forward. She broke out of the entryway and arrived at the underground Haven's exit, right out in the open, where an unknown but assuredly high number of snipers would surely be waiting for her. Unfortunately for the humans, the other demons had not remained idle. Lucifer stood on all fours in their midst, grinning like a feral animal with her shark-like maw. She swiveled her head from side to side. Her third eye fired mighty concussive blasts that slammed into walls and detonated with the force of missiles, blasting humans apart and spraying their entrails all over the place.

Bael leaped into the fray, grinning with a childlike expression of joy. "Finally! I was gonna die of boredom if I had ta' wait any longer! C'mon humans, gimme a good fight!!"

Murmur levitated in the sky. Using her telekinesis, she was a practiced flier who was equally adept at ground and sky combat. She pointed her finger at the humans and made minimal movements while throwing them around and sending them flying.

"Poke. Poke." Murmur said quietly. Nobody heard the words muttered under her breath.

Abby worked hard to distract the humans. She conjured illusions in their minds, making them think even more demons had arrived and an army was on the way. Some of the weaker-willed soldiers mentally broke. They ran away screaming in terror, while others started blindly firing at anything Abby directed their attention toward, which unfortunately included their fellow humans.

Belial didn't spot Gressil and Ose, but that was to be expected. They were only Barons, but Ose might not have returned to her body yet, and Gressil was clearly weak in the ways of battle.

Belial paused for half a second. She frowned.

Why did the Hero say that Ose and Gressil were the primary targets?

She didn't have time to answer that question. Lucifer suddenly screamed as a bullet fired from one of the sniper towers struck her head, just at the edge of her third eye, and blinded her with pain. She stumbled away, clutching her forehead as she tried to find the one who shot her.

"You!!" Lucifer screeched.

Belial looked where Lucifer's gaze was directed. She was astonished to see a previously cloaked Heroic energy signature emerge. A man wearing a Japanese nekomimi mask stood atop the tower, his sniper rifle aimed at Lucifer.

BLAM!

The man's sniper rifle was huge, seemingly unwieldy, but he held it with practiced ease. A single shot rang out, and a bullet flew into Lucifer's open mouth, jamming in the back of her throat and causing her to stagger backward, gagging painfully as the bullet somehow perfectly slid down and lodged in the narrowest crevice within her trachea. Lucifer's eyes bulged. She grabbed at her throat and wheezed, stumbling about in a daze as waves of pain grew ever more intense.

Belial didn't need time to contemplate the situation. She had fought countless battles across her life. She snapped her arm out and grabbed onto a pipe attached to the wall. She tore it off and casually sharpened it by turning her thumb into a knife and swiping diagonally across its shaft. In a single second, she procured a makeshift javelin, and then proceeded to hurl it at the Hero with every ounce of demonic power she could muster.

Cat Mask was, without a doubt, a far bigger threat than the still-green young Hero down below. Jason Hiro was no trouble at all compared to the danger demonstrated by his older peer. Cat Mask's pinpoint accuracy showed he could threaten the Emperors, at least injuring them enough to cause some misery.

Belial could not treat him with the same kid gloves she had his younger comrade!

The javelin raced at Cat Mask. With his attention on Lucifer, there was no way he could react in time.

But he did.

Cat Mask never took his eyes off the Emperor of Providence. Yet, even as Belial started to hurl the javelin, he had already slightly re-angled his body. When Belial launched her makeshift weapon, Cat Mask subtly adjusted his standing position enough for the javelin to whiff past his left ear. It missed him by less than a millimeter, making Belial's eyes widen to the size of saucers as the javelin sailed miles into the distance, never to be seen again.

He dodged?!

That was impossible! How could he have seen the attack coming and formulated the perfect response in a single second?

Several possible answers appeared in her head.

He was like her, with an impossibly flexible body.

He was a speedster who could move and react to the world around him with impossible timing.

He was a precog who could see the future.

Maybe even Jason Hiro gave him information on Belial. There was his Heroic title... Archseer. It was such a specific word. It implied some form of prophetic power... was that possible?

Belial didn't have time to ponder what Cat Mask's inhuman dodging capabilities meant. His gun snapped in her direction and he fired.

Despite her shock, Belial still reacted without hesitation. Her body 'exploded', splitting apart in fifteen different directions as if a bomb had gone off inside her chest. She instantly became a writhing mass of poorly-attached body parts; impossible for any human to predict their movements.

RIIIP!

The bullet tore through Belial's heart. Her 'impossible to predict' movement patterns were instantly seen through, and she coughed blood as the bullet passed through her vital organ.

"Ugh!!"

Belial quickly reformed her body. She pressed her palm against her chest to heal her injury, but her speed slowed as a result.

At that moment, Bael leaped into the air. He jumped at the sniper tower where Cat Mask stood, Big Bonk swinging overhead in a downward arc.

"Hey fucko, pick on a fella yer own size!" Bael roared.

The Duke of Pain slammed Big Bonk down into the sniper tower, smashing it into rubble. He grinned, knowing he had just felled another Hero.

At that moment, just to Lucifer's right...

Foop!

Cat Mask reappeared!

Belial's heart stopped. She looked at him in horror.

Lucifer also sensed the threat. Still unable to breathe, she shakily turned to face him, only to see the butt of his rifle hurtling toward her face.

Thump!!!

Cat Mask bashed the Emperor of Providence with all his strength, pulverizing her nose and sending her flying. She crashed into the Haven's wall and broke through it, leaving Belial's jaw gaping.

Enhanced strength?! Seven Hells, he hits almost as hard as me! Just who is this Hero? And was that teleportation he used, or was it super-speed?!

Cat Mask snapped his head toward Belial.

Foop!

He teleported again, appearing before the Emperor of Passion while swinging his weapon at her.

But Belial was ready. She snapped her fist at his face.

Foop!

He teleported again, dodging the attack!

Belial's counter attack whiffed, leaving her exposed for half a breath. Her reward was a violent impact to the back of her head, sending her sprawling to the ground.

Still injured from the bullet to her heart, Belial hadn't quite healed back to her optimal state, and that strike to the back of her head fully convinced her... this Hero was no joke! Cat Mask was terrifying!

"Buh-BAEL!!" Belial coughed.

Cat Mask teleported again. But this time, he didn't appear with his weapon raised to strike Belial. Instead, he struck at... nothing?

Cat Mask swung his gun like an idiot, whiffing the empty air. He stumbled slightly and looked confused, only to shake his head and look around, spotting Belial once more.

What was that? Why did he attack nothing? Could it be... Abby? Belial deduced.

Still injured, and more than a little dazed, Belial gritted her teeth. She leaped to her feet, dodging when Cat Mask swung again. This time, she focused solely on survival. She couldn't afford to counter-attack when facing this unknown Trueborn and expose a weakness again, not while she was injured. She didn't have time to heal herself, and Lucifer's status was unknown.

Bael finally arrived. Having recovered from failing to kill the Trueborn, he appeared madder than ever. He swung Big Bonk in a wide arc, causing the multi-ton flail to smash into several surviving human troopers, shredding their bodies into meaty chunks. The flail blew through the bathroom walls and shattered the structure into powder before arcing around to fly at Cat Mask and Belial.

The Emperor of Passion jumped. She leaped into the air to avoid the incoming attack, but Cat Mask simply bent backward at the waist as if he were doing a limbo dance. The deadly flail's chain passed over his chest harmlessly, and Cat Mask pivoted his gun to aim up at Belial.

BLAM!

A bullet fired from the barrel and flew at her. Her eyes shrunk to pinpricks, and she twisted in midair to try to avoid it, but the damn thing instead tore through her stomach as if it were paper, ripping out her entrails and badly injuring her again!

"Ah!" Belial half-choked, half-gasped. She fell to the ground and struck the concrete like a sack of potatoes, writhing in pain as she struggled to draw breath.

The human's gun couldn't shoot very quickly. It had a long reload requirement, and it was huge and unwieldy, but in return it made for an excellent makeshift club in close-quarters combat, and its piercing power was ungodly! Even her hardened Emperor skin and bones offered no protection from the rifle's bullets.

Bael retracted Big Bonk. He glowered for a split second at the human laying on his back, but then Cat Mask shoved himself off the ground and performed a makeshift backflip by using the butt of his gun as an anchor against the floor.

Just when Belial thought the situation couldn't get any worse, Cat Mask snapped his fingers.

Jason Hiro suddenly appeared right beside him.

Belial's eyes widened.

Not just self-teleportation, but the teleportation of others? They'd been played!

Jason Hiro laughed uproariously. "Hahaha, not bad, dad! You did well teaching these pathetic demons a lesson, but I guess that's to be expected. They aren't sending their best! Just a bunch of weaklings!"

"Hey!" Bael roared, his attention refocusing on the scrawny little Trueborn who dared to mouth off in front of him. "What'd you say punk? You wanna have a go??"

"So what if I do? A mere Duke thinks himself my equal?" Jason asked in a rather flamboyant manner. "My dad already beat the asses of two Emperors. You're no threat to me, Duke of Pain! I know all your abilities! I'm the Archseer, HAHAHA!!"

While Jason ran his yap, Belial hurriedly healed herself. She continued to lay on the ground while allowing Bael to draw the Hero's attention.

God, his voice is so grating! Belial thought. What an annoying loudmouth! But at least his idiocy is buying me a little time... and it seems Cat Mask is his father? That confirms Ose's guess from before!

Bael charged at the two Heroes without regard for his own safety. Given his invincible body, Jason and Cat Mask were unlikely to seriously injure, let alone kill him. Thus, he did the smartest thing an idiot like him could come up with and drew their attention by charging in.

Belial climbed to her feet. She had finally healed all her injuries, but her battle intent had fallen dramatically. Even with Bael assisting her, she didn't think they could easily kill both Heroes. Maybe the boy, but...

[Belial. You and Bael need to leave.] Ose suddenly said, her voice transmitting from somewhere nearby. Belial could vaguely sense her presence, but she wasn't sure where she was.

"Huh? Right now?" Belial asked.

[My mother is out of commission. She fainted from lack of air. Murmur retrieved her body. Right now, Gressil and Abby are carrying me to safety while I send my Astral Form back to you. There are many humans on the way. Get out of there while you still can!]

Belial's expression darkened. If Abby, Ose, and Gressil had left along with Murmur and Lucifer, than she was left behind with only Bael to offer protection.

Now she definitely didn't think the two of them could win. Bael might not die, but it was certainly possible to pin him down, ensnare him, maybe even incapacitate and imprison him. That would be a huge blow to demonkind's fighting power.

"Bael!" Belial shouted. "We need to go!"

Belial turned to look at Bael. She stared in shock as the so-called Archseer took Bael on without Cat Mask's help. Despite clearly lacking the strength to inflict any real damage on the Duke of Pain, Jason wielded his bo staff with alarming competency. He spun it around himself, striking Bael's ears and eyes, slapping it against Bael's ass in a humiliating manner, and batting away Bael's hands and arms when the powerful Duke drew too close.

"Dammit! Ow, fuck, you little shit! Ow!" Bael bellowed, wincing as another end of the staff struck his ear and slightly dazed him. "You fucker! C'mere, brat! Ugly duckling!

OWW!!"

The young man held his own. Belial couldn't help but look at him in a daze. His movements were fast and fluid. He fought like a seasoned warrior, proving that while he might speak like an idiot, he had the combat acumen to back up his words.

"What's the matter? Can't land a hit on me?" Jason jeered, taunting Bael mercilessly. "That's because I'm the great Archseer! I can see the future, and none of the upcoming timelines involve you winning! Just give it up and beg daddy for mercy, you fat bastard!"

Bael's angry words slowed down. He started speaking less and less as fear started to mix into his rage.

He remembered a time, long long ago.

A time when another warrior, far more capable in battle techniques than him, broke his body, his mind, and his spirit.

That man's name was Jepthath, the Illuminator.

Bael never forgot the horror he felt when Jepthath disassembled him, beating him down not with strength, but superior melee techniques.

This kid... he had a shadow of that ancient monster in him!

Bael felt as if his most feared rival had returned from beyond the grave. The Duke of Pain lacked a robust enough vocabulary to describe just how terrified it made him feel to be unable to touch a hair on such a seemingly puny Hero's head.

Jason was weak. His strikes only hurt Bael when they struck his most sensitive areas, and even those hurt about as much as a man flicking a child's ear. It stung a little, but the sensation only intensified Bael's fear, because he couldn't even reflect that paltry level of pain back at his younger adversary.

After a particularly brutal strike struck Bael's eyes, he suddenly jumped backward and rubbed his face. His vision cleared up, and he looked at the young man in horror.

"Nah... NAH! I ain't- I ain't doin' this! Screw you, man, SCREW YOU!"

Bael turned and ran. He rushed past Belial, and she only recovered a moment later to see Jason and Cat Mask charging at her.

"The demons are escaping!" Jason shouted. "Let's at least kill this one!"

Belial reacted. She darted away, chasing after Bael into the forest.

At the same time, a figure suddenly flickered past her. All Belial saw was a blur of white as something raced at Jason and slammed into his chest, kicking him backward and sending him flying!

"Ugh!!"

Jason coughed as he crashed into the wall and sunk to the ground, his chest crying out in pain.

There, an unlikely savior appeared. Ose, the Baron of Infiltration, stood between the Heroes and her seniors.

"Run!" Ose shouted back at Belial. "Take Bael and go. I'll hold them off!"

No longer in her Astral Body, Ose arrived back on the scene ready to fight with her full physical strength. She focused her attention on both Heroes, and Belial only hesitated for a second before nodding and continuing to run.

"They're after YOU, Ose!" Belial shouted back. "Don't take any risks!"

Ose narrowed her eyes.

"I know." She muttered under her breath.

By now, some of the human soldiers had managed to pick themselves back up. Reinforcements would arrive from abroad, and others would emerge from underground.

It wouldn't be long before the situation turned completely hopeless.

Even so, Ose sneered.

"Cat Mask and the Archseer, huh?" Ose hissed. "Father and son? Let's see if you're as scary as you seem."

Jason pulled himself to his feet and clutched his injured chest. "D-dad! It's Ose! She's the one! You have to take her down!"

Cat Mask nodded.

"My son thinks you're demonkind's greatest asset. Says he saw a future where your powers brought humanity to ruin. Too bad you came here to die early. Now your wretched species won't survive to witness that future."

Ose chuckled.

"We'll see about that, Heroes."

Part 635: She's Only a Baron!

Recommended Listening

January 21st, 2021. 5AM.

Ose, the Baron of Infiltration. Jason Hiro, the 'Archseer'. Cat Mask, an unknown enigma.

Illuminati reinforcements trickled onto the scene as these three powerhouses faced each other down. They took aim with their guns, but before they could start shooting at their demonic enemy, Jason Hiro suddenly raised a fist.

"Hold your fire. This demon is mine and my father's alone! I WILL have a demon corpse to mount as a trophy, and I won't let any of you weaklings steal my glory!"

Jason stood up. Ose's flying kick had sent him smashing into a wall, but it didn't escape her notice that he wasn't badly injured. Clearly, his heroic powers involved some sort of defensive boost. He still massaged his chest and seemed to be a little winded, but her assassination attempt hadn't taken him out for good.

Ose snorted. "Looking down on me just because I'm a Baron? That will be your LAST mistake!"

Jason had fought Ose in the future. He had faced her when she was an Emperor, far stronger than she was now. The simple baseline increases in power, speed, and durability from Baron to Duke to Emperor could not be underestimated. The Ose of this era was much less scary than the one he knew 100,000 years from now. To say nothing of what all those millennia may have taught her future self in terms of battle experience and worldly knowledge...

But Ose was wrong about one thing. Jason did not underestimate her. Not at all.

She was Ghost. She was humanity's greatest enemy. From what he had heard, she alone had been responsible for at least half the circumstances leading up to humanity's ultimate defeat! And that was while she was still only a Baron!

He would never make the mistake of treating her like a side-character.

Even so, Jason grinned like an idiot. "A mistake?! Come on then, you weak little woman! Show the Archseer, humanity's greatest Trueborn, what you can do!

Hahahaha!!!"

Ose's body snapped forward like an arrow loosed from a bow. She flew at Jason in a straight line so quickly that he couldn't even process her approach.

THUMP!

Ose spun her body at the last second and slammed her fist into the side of Jason's head, sending him careening to the right. His vision whirled wildly as he slammed against the ground, bounced, then spun multiple times in a row before crashing into a nearby Illuminati reinforcement who had just arrived. The impact of flesh against flesh broke multiple bones inside that man's body and knocked him unconscious as well.

Ose sneered. She turned to pursue the foe she'd just send flying, only for a flicker of energy to materialize behind her.

She ducked!

Ose moved with frightening speed, anticipating Cat Mask's teleportation as he swung the butt of his gun at the spot where her head just was. Instead, he whiffed the attack, and Ose swept her leg at his, intending to send him sprawling to the ground.

While Cat Mask's attack may have missed, he didn't fall for this trap. He anticipated her counter, then responded by hopping into the air, teleporting above her, and stomping his feet down at her head.

Ose's body flickered to the side. Cat Mask's feet passed through where she was just crouching and struck the concrete.

"Not bad." Ose hissed. "You're not very fast, but you're good at reading other people's movements."

Hideki Hiro narrowed his eyes under his mask. Ose naturally couldn't see this, but she sensed some tension in his movements as he realized she wasn't just speaking idle words.

Ose was a genius. She could uncover clues about people through the subtlest of movements, via the way they hesitated before speaking, and by the way in which they fought.

She was sussing him out; trying to determine what all his powers were.

That was the real reason Ose came here. Not to fight the two Trueborn for the sake of killing them, but mainly to collect intelligence. If she could take one or both of them out, that would simply be a juicy bonus.

What a terrifying foe!

In an instant, Ose pounced at Cat Mask again. She charged him at the speed of light, sending a kick flying at his head, but he anticipated this attack and shifted his body slightly to the right. However, the instant her kick barely missed him, a deafening thunderclap exploded from the sole of her shoes, stunning Cat Mask and forcing him to teleport away.

He flickered to the side and reeled for a moment, his ears nearly rupturing from the sound. Ose quickly picked out his new position, and her eyes narrowed.

Intelligence is good and all, but if I can kill one of them... THAT WOULD BE EVEN BETTER!

She zipped toward Cat Mask, ready to deliver a killing blow. Suddenly, Jason teleported into her path, his bo staff raised in a defensive position.

Thump!

Ose's fist struck the staff, but it held firm. Despite seemingly being made of wood, she instantly realized this was not the case! It was harder than demonstone... impossibly so!

Jason used the impact of Ose's fist against his staff to reverse its momentum and snap the other end up at her chin, but she simply bent her head backward and allowed it to miss by a millimeter. The very instant the staff missed, Ose rocked forward on the ball of her heels and slammed her forehead against Jason's.

She headbutted him!

The unexpected impact of Ose's skull battered Jason backward and sent him tumbling onto his father. Luckily, his body's weird resilience protected him from suffering a serious concussion, but it still threw him off-balance as the two Heroes fell atop one another.

This is impossible! Jason thought. It doesn't feel like Baron Ose is any weaker than she was as an Emperor. Her reaction speed is at a level even my dad can't keep up with while using his time slowdowns and rewinding tricks, let alone me! Was Ose always this deadly?

Jason and his father had only traded a few attacks with Ose, but it was the son who realized how his original plan to respond to her threat with the maximum force still didn't take her seriously enough. She was way beyond what he had anticipated.

In truth, the evolution from Baron to Emperor didn't really grant Ose many new core abilities. It simply improved her raw mana output, and her body's physical capabilities. In terms of deadliness, she possessed the capacity to be as frightening as many Dukes and Emperors of this era!

Jason grinned like a madman. He leaped backward off his father, planted his staff in the ground, and yanked himself to his feet.

"You're not bad, Ose! Not bad at all!" Jason proclaimed in a manner most gaudy. He pointed a finger at her and puffed out his chest. "You might only be a Baron, but you're worth me using at least... thirteen percent of my power!"

Ose didn't look at Jason with mocking eyes. She stared at him in the same way a deadly serpent might, assessing his true threat and perhaps seeing through his words into the parts unspoken.

"You talk a lot." Ose said calmly. "And you say more than you think you do."

The corner of Jason's eye flickered. His smile faltered, ever so slightly.

What did Ose mean by that?

Cat Mask suddenly jumped up. He sent a powerful punch flying at the Demon Baron, but she simply spun in place, slapped his hand, and redirected his momentum. Then she sent a palm strike flying at his mask.

Jason's father bent his head at the last second. He avoided Ose's retaliatory strike, then batted her hand away with his elbow.

In an instant, the two started striking at each other, reacting and attacking at speeds that left the Illuminati soldiers gobsmacked! Palms crashed against palms. Arms became entangled, thunderclaps exploded, lightning bolts were followed by bullets that would have killed Ose if they struck, but they didn't.

Despite this flurry of attacks, neither combatant managed to injure the other. Jason watched with a mixture of awe and horror as he realized his father's empowered body and temporal slowdown abilities only barely made him able to match Ose. In terms of speed-reactions, in terms of sudden and instantaneous movements, Ose completely outclassed him. If Cat Mask didn't have the ability to slow his perception of time down to an absolute crawl, he would have lost a thousand times across a thousand battles!

Despite being unable to land a killing blow on the tenacious masked Hero, Ose did not lose her cool. Her battle intent always smoldered at a completely stable level. Unbeknownst to Jason and his father, Ose not only fought Cat Mask, but also kept a careful eye on the other human soldiers aiming guns at her. Though none of them fired, she was ready to escape the instant the situation turned dire.

In the middle of Ose and Cat Mask's furious melee, Jason teleported behind Ose, pinning her between himself and his father. Jason spun up his bo staff and swung it at her hips, but Ose flickered to the side, dodged the staff, then flickered back and karate chopped Jason's lungs. His vision went black as she blew the breath out of his body and sent him doubling over, while at the same time she redirected one of Cat Mask's kicks at Jason's face.

"Shit!" Cat Mask cursed. He readjusted his kick mid-movement and missed Jason's head, but Ose finally punished him for this mistake by flickering behind him, raising both fists, and slamming them down on the back of his head.

Thump!

She battered Cat Mask downward, collapsing him atop his son.

For a few seconds, the battlefield went still.

Ose breathed evenly. She wasn't winded at all. She had also completely trashed both Heroes, yet she came to realize that even if she landed her strongest attacks, they were clearly protected by some sort of invisible armor, or perhaps defensive enchantments. Jason himself kept getting up time and time again, yet his body appeared so frail that she realized this must be a deception.

Ose's mind moved quickly. She evaluated countless possible scenarios at a speed that would make many Psion Brain Enhancers look at her with deep respect.

Then, she made an important tactical choice.

She fled!

Ose abruptly became a beam of white light. She launched herself like a rocket diagonally into the northern skies, disappearing behind the clouds and leaving her dazed Heroic foes to pick themselves up.

"Sh-shit!" Jason shouted. "She's getting away! Fucking hell, stop her, you idiots!!"

The soldiers blinked. They started moving again, contacting their superiors to try and triangulate Ose's position.

Unfortunately, they failed.

Ose was fast. Lightning fast. She had spent hundreds of years developing a combat system focused on punishing opponents who were slower than her, and she made good use of that system today against two otherwise formidable foes.

The only reason she had to depart without finishing the job was because she was too weak to kill them! Perhaps in the future, she would rectify this shortcoming.

Jason barked orders. He sent Illuminati guards in every direction, fanning out to check the woods. At the same time, he stormed over to one of the commanders who had somehow miraculously survived the initial demonic onslaught.

"YOU!!" Jason roared. "Is this all the god damn Illuminati is capable of?! I expected better!!"

"Sir?" The man asked, flinching under Jason's tirade.

"What the fuck do you mean sir? Sir, WHAT?!" Jason shouted even louder. "You let her get away! Why didn't you shoot Ose while she was trying to escape?! Is this all just a fucking joke to you?!"

Never had the poor man felt so aggrieved. Why are you yelling at me? You told us not to fire! This is your fault, you stupid, moronic, idiot of a Trueborn!

But he didn't dare vocalize those words. Jason may have gotten his ass kicked by a mere Baron, but he was clearly in such a rage that he might snap and pulverize the commander into meat paste if the guy pissed him off!

"I-I'm sorry, sir... it w-won't... happen again..." The man said, trying not to cry pitiful tears over the unfairness of the situation.

At that moment, the man received a transmission through his earpiece that made him want to curl up into a ball and die. Feeling even more aggrieved, he looked at Jason with eyes begging for sympathy.

"S-sir...?"

"That's LORD ARCHSEER to you, weakling!" Jason shouted back.

"Yes, Lord Archseer, sir... we've just received word... Baron Ose hacked our internal computer network. She stole hundreds of thousands of files. In-including the ones... detailing your Heroic Abilities."

Jason jolted backward. His eyes buzzed as if he'd been struck by thunder.

"She DID?! You fucking IMBECILES! All you Illuminati morons! How could you let her do that?! You told me you had really good anti-hacking technology and all that fancy stuff!! If the demons know all my powers, they'll be able to plot against me! How could you screw up this badly?!"

Jason stomped from side to side. He grabbed and pulled his hair, raging at the pure incompetency of the Illuminati and how painfully useless and unreliable they were. All the while, the soldiers looked at him as if they were looking at the most incompetent asshole on the planet.

Why is he blaming us? We told him not to put those files on the network! This is all his fault, not ours!

Inside the Haven, Victoria Rothschild slumped at the security camera desk. Her expression was one of defeat.

"Gods... he's such a fool... I can't believe the ancestors chose to believe in him. We're doomed. Now the demons know everything about him. I just can't believe how little accountability he's willing to take for his own actions."

Claire sat next to Victoria. She sipped some tea from a cup, and looked surprisingly unperturbed.

"Mmm-hmm, yup, he's definitely an idiot, cousin. Definitely. Mhm."

Her sarcasm went undetected. Victoria's doom and gloom was too serious to pay attention to any irregularities in Claire's tone of voice. Claire ended up shrugging her shoulders and sipping more tea.

Unnoticed by the humans, a phantasmal body levitated in the sky. Ose, having escaped in an instant, quickly hid herself in the nearby forest, placing her body within some dense foliage before sending her Astral Form back to the scene. She carefully entered the surface level of the Haven once more, observing all of Jason Hiro's ranting and raving, as well as the dismal expressions of the guards on scene. As if confirming something to herself, she nodded slowly, then returned back to her body before leaving again.

Some time later, Ose regrouped with the other demons. They perked up when she approached, but all of them seemed to be in low spirits. Lucifer was up and about again, with Belial being the most likely person to have extracted the bullet from her throat that had rendered her unconscious. Belial sat on a tree stump, Murmur sat up in a tree branch, and Abby sat on the ground, dejected. Ose only spotted her brother lurking behind a tree, out of sight, when she deliberately tried to locate him. He was talented at meekly blending into the background.

"Ose." Belial said, from her spot on the tree stump. "Tell me you have good news."

Ose didn't respond for a few seconds. She looked around the group, seeming to ponder something unspoken.

"It could be good news." Ose said, stroking her chin slowly. "Or it might not. I managed to steal the majority of the Illuminati's files. In terms of reconnaissance, I'd say this mission should be graded a complete success. I initiated battle against the Archseer and Cat Mask, and I used the data I obtained to cross-correlate it with their performance. Everything about Jason lined up perfectly."

"It did?" Belial asked. "Well, at least we know our enemy better."

Belial lowered her head in relief, but Ose narrowed her eyes.

"Assuming the files are to be believed, the Archseer is a Hero who possesses an ability referred to as Dream Eating. When he sleeps, he is able to enter a dream world related tangentially to ours. He can 'devour' dream knowledge about combat, warfare, tactics, technology, and all sorts of other things. Most notably, he can also obtain information about his enemies... as well as knowledge of the future."

Belial frowned. She lifted her head again and met Ose's eyes. "You sound unconvinced."

"I am simply working off a hypothesis." Ose said, softening her expression. "Let's say there is currently a... five percent chance... portions of this information may have been be falsified. Either deliberately or accidentally."

Lucifer stood nearby, leaning against a tree. She looked at her daughter curiously.

"Meaning?"

"Meaning some of the Archseer's abilities may not be what they seem, or what the internal files claim." Ose said. "The Dream Eating is likely true, but some of these other data points are deceptive. Take for example one entry which lists him as having enhanced durability."

Ose crossed her arms.

"I believe this to be a deliberate lie. Jason Hiro is certainly durable, but that power is not his own. I believe he was augmented by another Hero during my battle. Perhaps one of the Heroic Ancestors."

Abby looked at Ose. She was uncharacteristically somber compared to her usual self. "Those were only two of the Heroes though. We still have a third to deal with."

Ose blinked her eyes. She slowly shook her head.

"No. I was wrong before. There are only two Trueborn."

"Only two?" Belial asked. "Wait, what makes you say that?"

Ose once again paused. She looked around at her comrades and smirked.

"Oh, you lot haven't figured it out yet? You are truly too slow of mind. Think for a moment. What reason did I give for there being another yet-unknown Hero in addition to Cat Mask but prior to Jason's arrival?"

The other demons metaphorically scratched their head. Surprisingly, it was Murmur, sitting up on a tree branch, who offered her take.

"Teleportation..." Murmur said quietly.

"Very good, Emperor Murmur!" Ose praised. "That's right. Cat Mask was estimated to be a Hero who possessed some sort of perfect accuracy ability when it came to firearms, as well as quick reaction speeds. I confirmed both of those during the battle, but you should have ALL seen him teleporting not only himself, but Jason Hiro around."

Ose held up her hands.

"So... there it is! It turns out Cat Mask has been carefully hiding his ability to teleport all these years, waiting for an opportunity to catch us off-guard. Now that we know this, we can piece together that he was the only Hero until recently, and now his son has also been Uplifted. That means the Heroic Aura has somehow become a bloodline ability, but so far there are only two inheritors. Cat Mask and Jason Hiro are likely the son and grandson of Harold Whittaker. We have one less target to take out."

A collective sigh of relief went up among the demons. Ose's words truly released some of the pressure they had been feeling.

"But don't underestimate this Archseer." Ose warned. "He may seem stupid and oafish, but the fact I was able to obtain all these files is extremely suspicious. I believe Ancestor Mildred is secretly helping him!"

"Mad Madam Mildred?" Lucifer asked.

"That's right, mother." Ose explained. "There is a plot brewing. I am not certain of all the details, but we must exercise extreme caution around the ancient Wise Ones. Solomon, Mildred, Nebuchadnezzar, and Hammurabi are not to be trifled with."

She continued. "I believe Mildred planted false information regarding Jason's abilities. She is trying to deceive us, to give us a false impression of his strength. In reality, he might be two, even three times stronger than what he displayed today. Should anyone here encounter him in the future, assume he might be hiding other abilities, either equally as deadly, or even more so."

After concluding her immediate analysis of the recent battle, Ose straightened her posture and popped her back.

"Let's call this mission a success for now. But Belial? You and I need to have a talk."

Belial raised an eyebrow. "About what?"

"About me paying a visit to the First Emperor." Ose said cryptically. "There is a very important matter I need to bring up with Satan."

Belial and Ose stared at one another for a few seconds. They seemed to exchange words with their mere expressions.

Belial looked down, closed her eyes, and nodded.

"I believe he will be... agreeable to what you seek."

Ose grinned. "Good. It's in demonkind's best interests. That much should be obvious, after today."

Part 636: MindCores

January 21st, 2021. 8AM, Location Unknown.

In a spatial tear somewhere within Earth's vicinity, a small room filled with computer monitors sat, disconnected from the outside universe. In here, a pair of spiritual life forms stood, male and female, their identities being Jepthath and Mildred. Also inside this computer room, two more physical-bodied men stood. One of them was Cat Mask. The other was...

"Hahaha! Now that was a good fight!" Jason boasted, puffing out his chest in a manner most audacious. "Great work coordinating the teleport network, Mildred! You really saved my dad's ass multiple times! Not me though. I was totally fine!!"

Hideki Hiro looked at his son with only the faintest expression of bemusement. "Jason, this whole persona thing you've made is getting to be a bit... grating. Can you fix yourself now?"

"What do you mean?" Jason asked, visibly aggrieved. "I like the way I feel! I feel awesome! I'm confident, ready to kick some ass, and best of all, I barely even notice all those old depressing thoughts about my dead wife. I want to feel like this all the time!"

Mildred gently shook her head. "No, you do not, dear boy. You have done nothing more than deliberately delude yourself. It is not healthy for you to remain in such a state of mind."

Jason frowned. "But now I get to act like the Hero I'm supposed to be. You should have seen those demons! I scared them shitless!"

"That was me." Hideki said blandly. "They were scared of me. Come on, son. Just drop the act now. It's exhausting listening to you ramble like that."

Jason swiveled his head to look at his father, Mildred, and finally Jepthath.

"What about you, great 'Illuminator'? You think I'm totally badass, right?!"

"You are annoying me. All of us." Jepthath stated flatly.

"Oh. Well. Alright then." Jason said, finally sensing that his 'awesomeness' wasn't having the effect he intended.

The 'Archseer' sighed. He pouted for a minute, then begrudgingly uttered a Word of Power.

"...Normalize."

Instantly, his expression changed. His posture loosened, and he stopped puffing out his chest. He seemed to sag down, shrinking two inches, and becoming a lot more ordinary-feeling than before.

"So I'm back to myself." Jason said dryly. "Mildred. Jepthath. Thanks for reminding me to snap out of it."

"Anytime, dear boy." Mildred said politely. "Project Great Deceiver appears to have been a huge success. The demons have obtained false intelligence about your abilities. They now believe you to possess completely incorrect abilities... but you must be careful. Ose is extremely intelligent, and she already guessed that some of the intelligence she stole was falsified. She has erroneously begun to believe this was my doing, so at least she doesn't suspect you as being the true mastermind."

Jason frowned. "Did Spynet 2.0 record her movements after she departed?"

"It did." Mildred assured him. "I have not only reviewed all the footage, but I've cut things down to the most relevant parts. Take a look."

Jason nodded. He summoned a couple of chairs for himself and his father, but Cat Mask waved his hand. "I already saw the files. Just watch them yourself. I'm going to go take a nap. Wake me up once the briefing is over."

"Alright. Thanks, dad." Jason said, watching for a moment as his father strode out the room into a prepared side-chamber.

Their current location was a secret dimension not dissimilar to Chrona in the future. However, unlike Chrona, this secret realm was not nearly as large, and it was only a temporary shelter. It moved at a mere ten times the outside universe's speed so it would remain effortlessly stable. Jason did not want his future secret base located in the same orbit as Earth, especially as Heaven was already located here and it was possible the Demons and Volgrim might detect it.

In the near future, Jason would make a new secret realm elsewhere in the Milky Way, somewhere nobody would be able to find it. But that would come a little later.

For now, he sat down at the new Spynet, and proceeded to review the video files Mildred had collected. Unfortunately, Ose might not be a telepath, but her higher cognitive functions were essentially hidden behind a cryptographic barrier. Jason could not peer into her thoughts; only listen to her words and extrapolate based on her body movements.

He watched as she returned to the scene of the battle in her Astral Body. Unbeknownst to Ose, Jason had anticipated she would do just this, and had planned a performance to deceive her, thinking he was enraged that the 'secret files' about his 'Dream Eating' powers were stolen.

Naturally, all of that information was false, but the great trick was that it was false in just the right way that he could hide his true abilities of Wordsmithing.

Jason observed as Ose returned to the other demons. Ose explained to the others her misgivings, and this caused Jason's frown to deepen.

"She's sharp." Jason muttered. "She's already figured out that my powers aren't entirely what they seem. Given time, she might figure out the rest, but for now, she'll deliver falsified intelligence to Satan. That's exactly what we want."

"She also came to believe that your daughter didn't exist." Jepthath pointed out. "Cat Mask's 'teleportation powers' successfully tricked her into thinking Daisy and him were the same person."

"It'll buy us some time." Jason said. "As long as I can convince Daisy to be more careful with her teleportation, it will take the demons a lot longer to uncover her true identity. By then, we should have established more robust countermeasures."

Mildred watched the video along with Jason. She frowned several times.

"This Ose is truly frightening. She is fast in every way. Her reaction speeds and agility are nothing compared to her cerebral computational speeds. Personally, dear boy, I am not that quick-witted of a thinker. I am considered a Qualitative Thinker. In terms of raw mental computational speed, Ose exceeds my capabilities. Do not underestimate her."

Jason licked his lips. "I thought I overestimated her, but I was wrong. Ose was too fast. I had to use the fallback plan instead of actually killing her and Gressil. I didn't think killing a mere Baron would be so difficult, but it turned out Ose was only slightly less scary than the future version I fought."

Jason lowered his eyes to stare at the ground.

"I killed Ose in the future. At the time, it seemed effortless, but I had a lot of things going my way. I caught her off-guard, and she thought Bael's body was invincible; a falsehood I managed to exploit with my Pseudo Excalibur. I cut through her faster than she could react. If she had known my blade was capable of harming her, let alone killing her, she would have prepared counter-measures. I probably would have failed my assassination attempt. The Ose of this era is under no illusion that a threat like me can't kill her, so she will always fight more defensively than we expect."

Jason carefully analyzed the battle, even going so far as to replay the recorded video feed from multiple different angles.

"My Archseer persona fought too stupidly. He didn't use his brains at all." Jason said, treating his alternate self as if they were a completely different person. "That's good if the goal is to deceive the demons into thinking I'm a musclebrained moron, but if we actually want to kill any Demon Emperors, my other self will end up getting me killed instead."

"This was only a trial run." Mildred clarified. "Project Great Deceiver succeeded in the ways that mattered. Killing Ose and Gressil would have been excellent secondary goals, but right now, we need to capitalize on our information advantage. The demons will see the Archseer as less of a threat and focus more on your father. We should make sure Hideki shows up in public and draws as much attention as possible so that you have time to start amassing your arsenal of contingencies."

Jason leaned back in the chair. He sighed as he looked up at the ceiling.

"Alright. I think the first thing we need to do is get to work building my cerebral supercomputer."

Mildred curled up her lips in disgust. "Dear boy, are you really going to keep calling it that? Let's call it something more elegant, something that isn't such a mouthful. How about... MindCore?"

Jason narrowed his eyes at the ceiling. "That... hardly seems the most important thing to worry about right now."

"Oh, but it is!" Mildred protested. "Words have power! You should know that much. And 'Cerebral Supercomputer' hardly rolls off the tongue. Therefore, from now on, we shall refer to it as your MindCore!"

Jason blinked slowly. "Alright. Sure. Whatever. MindCore it is. Let's just move on to what I mentioned before."

"Alright." Mildred said. "While you built this time-enhanced realm, I spent some of my energy on coming up with a few different designs for your MindCore. Would you like to peruse them?"

Jason raised an eyebrow as he turned his head to look at her.

"Huh? Designs? What do you mean? Just help me recreate the MindCore I had in the future."

Mildred scoffed. "Brat! You won't let me access your future memories! How can this beautiful bombshell remake something you won't let her see? Besides, you speak as if there is only one way to optimize such a fantastical concept as a MindCore. There are far more ways than one!"

Jason sat up in the chair. He looked at Mildred with eyes full of intrigue.

"Really? What do you mean?"

Mildred didn't respond with words. Instead, she walked over to the Spynet console and changed several screens to show different types of server designs, placements, and positions, some of which looked human, others demonic, angelic, and even outright alien.

"Listen here, dear boy... the computer you described to me was one designed around prediction. It allowed you to predict things based on contextual clues, including analyzing how other people moved, twitched, where they looked, the words they used when responding, and so on. It seems to have been made to enhance your powers of prediction to the utmost limit. Not a bad way to build such a device, but terribly limited in other areas."

Mildred changed the projection. She revealed a much more evil and sinister design, one Jason immediately felt revulsion toward. It was dripping with demonic imagery, pentagrams, and other details that made his skin crawl.

"What the hell is this?" Jason asked.

Mildred shrugged in a funny way. "Hell is a good term. This is the HellProphet redesign of your former MindCore. You see, Jason, you limited yourself when you designed your first MindCore around elevating the predictive abilities of your 'Smithy' demonic persona, yet did not take demonic design applications into account. If you had done so, you could have doubled; no, even tripled the qualitative predictive ability of that MindCore."

Jason looked disgusted. "This is repulsive! Why would I install something demonic in my brain? Whose side are you on, Mildred??"

Jepthath nodded. "I agree. This is an abomination against all of creation!"

Mildred tut-tutted at the two men. "It is a wonderful combination of magical and physical technology! Don't let your hatred of demonkind blind you to superior design solutions, dear boys! Look here."

Mildred zoomed in on the server composition of the HellProphet MindCore.

"Your approach was entirely too conventional, dear boy. Half-hearted at best. What I'm proposing is a complete redesign using demonic principles. Infernal probability matrices housed within soulbound algorithms, core processors forged from abyssal metals. Your human design merely scratched the surface. A proper HellProphet would use pentagrammic neural pathways with bloodstone computational nodes to siphon temporal insights. Far more powerful, though not without certain... costs."

"Costs." Jason said blandly. "What, like Satan obtaining my soul when I fall asleep? Hard pass."

"Nothing as severe as that." Mildred chuckled. "I was more referring to a constant, dull headache even your Wordsmithing wouldn't be able to get rid of. But the benefits would be immense! Your powers of prediction would skyrocket!"

"I'm not shoving demonic shit into my skull. End of story." Jason replied, visibly unimpressed. "Especially not if it gives me a constant headache. I have enough of that as-is."

Mildred looked at him for a moment, then shook her head. "Oh, fine then! Let's move on. I do have several other suggestions, and time's a-wasting!"

She summoned another projection of a completely different MindCore. "This one should look much more pleasant to you."

Jason blinked. The second MindCore was very obviously angelic in design. It was colored white and gold, and there were winged patterns and designs on the various server cores. It all felt a bit gaudy and overdesigned, but at least it didn't appear outright evil like the HellProphet did.

"This is the OmniRecord." Mildred explained. "It was the easiest MindCore to design, because it's basically just Solomon's Crown. If you want to perfectly mimic the functionality of his Crown without having to rely on that old trickster, this is a fine alternative."

Jason nodded in realization. "So this will give me a perfect memory, infinite data storage, rapid learning capabilities, all that other jazz?"

"Precisely." Mildred affirmed. "The angelic designs are not merely aesthetic in nature. I built it with celestial datacores that never degrade and memory crystals synchronized in perfect harmony. This may surprise you, but this is effectively how Solomon's Crown looks at the deepest level. It is a nearly perfect mimicry of what Archangel Camael created."

Jason's eyes metaphorically flashed with insight. "Doesn't this mean I could just create a new Crown of my own? If this is a mimicry of it, then I don't even need to build a MindCore at all! I can just make an artifact."

"That won't work." Mildred said, crossing her arms dismissively. "These are MindCores... not artifacts. Artifacts are much smaller and more compact. I am... not capable of creating such wonders. I don't even know how Camael makes them, but perhaps you might be able to pick her brain and find out for yourself, if you're so interested. However, if you could find another person with a Mind Realm as expansive as yours, you could take the time to build them one of my suggested MindCores. Then you'd have two MindCore powerhouses."

Jason thought about this for a moment.

"Are you implying not just anyone has a Mind Realm 'big enough' to fit a MindCore?"

"You are a very unique individual." Mildred clarified. "Your powers are all based on imagination and comprehension. You might be a bit of a dullard, but your Mind Realm is far more expansive than most. Your father already effectively has a MindCore, via the melted-down Solomon's Crown implanted in him during his jaunts into future timelines. He is unable to accommodate much more within his Mind Realm. Your daughter Daisy might have room for a MindCore, but the vast majority of ordinary humans would not. Only truly intelligent individuals, or those gifted in spiritual power may have such capacity available. I would have to determine the circumstances on a case-by-case basis, and it would take time to construct MindCores for each individual. Time we do not necessarily have, dear boy."

Mildred proceeded to reveal another MindCore design while Jason pondered her words.

"This one may be to your liking more than any others before and after. I have based this MindCore on my own powers. This is the GenesisFrame. It is a human-based design using principles you should be familiar with. It is highly focused on innovation, invention, and creativity. If you want to become a master of the new and exotic, no other MindCore I've come up with will surpass this one."

Jason immediately became intrigued. While the GenesisFrame lacked the predictive abilities he had used to don the identity of Smithy, it had new and unique concepts that greatly excited him.

"The GenesisFrame is not designed to be fast or efficient. It will not be useful in a battle involving speed, but it will be fantastic in applications of long-term strategic and macro-focused warfare. If you want to invent new technologies, come up with new ways to use your existing powers, and otherwise become a terrifying and self-sufficient Heroic powerhouse, I don't think you can go wrong with this MindCore."

Jason rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "It feels like this would make me a lot more like my wife from the future. She was always so creative, so inventive. She left me in the dust."

"That is possible, dear boy." Mildred said, puffing her chest out. "Your wife sounds like she was a real firecracker! Ah-ha-ha-ha!"

Jason's smile faded away. He nodded. "Yeah. She was."

A moment of silence followed. Mildred cleared her throat.

"Moving on. There's also this MindCore, which I have dubbed the QuantumReflex. This is based on monstrous biology, and focuses on instincts, particularly in combat. I designed this after seeing your pathetic battle against Ose. This will grant you thinking speeds far beyond the norm. Even Solomon would not be able to match your raw computational speed. You would be able to out-think all but the most fearsome Brain Enhancers, giving you the ability to think and react to any threat with a casual amount of effort. It would be as if you installed a Super Chrona inside your brain, functioning passively at all times."

Mildred smiled. "And there's a bonus! You would never need to sleep again! You would be active at all times, indefatigable, unrelenting. While it wouldn't necessarily do much for your creativity, you would be as smart, predictive, and creative as you are now, but a thousand times more efficient at what you already do. This is a solid all-around solution that would enhance you in all the important ways."

Jason nodded, but then he frowned. "I get it. But... this doesn't really solve any problems I need solving. It's just 'more of me' and I want to be better than I am now. Having the instincts of a combat god like Ose is exciting in a primal way, but humanity won't win the Energy Wars by me just being a faster version of myself. Do you have anything else?"

"One last MindCore option comes to mind." Mildred said with a nod. "I based it on the Titans. It is known as RealitySim, and it's exactly what you would expect."

She continued. "World-bearing computation arrays capable of modeling entire universes. Reality-modeling monoliths based on the vastness of Titan minds, containing echoes of worlds that once existed. You could simulate countless asynchronous scenarios with perfect fidelity to natural laws—or manipulate those laws if you wished."

"That sounds like some sort of Universim game or something." Jason commented.

"This is best thought of as a sidegrade or an alternate form of your original MindCore. It's designed to allow you to simulate countless scenarios based on known information. For example, did you find your battle against Ose frustrating? You could upload all known information about Ose, then simulate battles against her until you became an expert in combating her, before finally imprinting that knowledge into your bones. When next you fought, you would completely overwhelm her!"

Jason's eyes flashed. This was an extremely practical MindCore, one he could easily make great use of. It gave him all sorts of new capabilities, and it could even be used for conceptually inventing artifacts, testing them in an alternate 'universe', then finalizing those designs before crafting them back in reality.

He could even simulate great individuals like Solomon, Mildred, and other such Sentients, all for the sake of figuring out what they would do or create in a given situation.

"The RealitySim is really, really appealing to me." Jason concluded. "There's just one problem."

Mildred blinked. "And that would be?"

"It's based on Titans." Jason said, lowering his eyes.

He fell silent. Then he began to think.

Minutes passed.

Jason contemplated all the different options.

HellProphet. It's an improved version of my original MindCore, but the headache downside, and the fact it's based on demon technology makes it a no-go. Knowing my original version was so flawed makes me want to abandon the entire 'prediction' angle anyway.

OmniRecord. It's basically just Solomon's Crown. Can't go wrong with that. The old man already showed me the value of his crown countless times. Ah, but I don't have his Heroic powers. I can't copy anyone's memories just by touching them, and I also don't have the full backlog of information Solomon had stored after countless years of coming into contact with high-ranking humans, demons, and angels. I would be starting out fresh. This option is a lot less valuable as a result.

QuantumReflex. I could make good use of speed. Time is my greatest enemy. Simply doing what I already do, but faster, would give humanity and myself both an immense time boost to catch up. Being able to out-think enemies like Ose would also be great. But it doesn't really make me any smarter. That reduces its value a lot.

RealitySim. This one is truly amazing. It solves all my problems and gives me new and powerful ways to approach future issues. Unfortunately, it's a Titan design, which almost feels like a betrayal of the human species. For that reason...

Jason nodded slowly.

"I'm going to have to go with the GenesisFrame. I like that it's human in origin. I don't want to rely on a design that's demonic, angelic, monstrous, or Titan-based. Humans are good enough to defeat the other species. If I were to fall back to some other species' design, would that not already be tantamount to admitting my own species isn't versatile enough to win this war?"

"I agree!" Jepthath exclaimed, smiling proudly. "What a good decision, Wordsmith! Don't rely on the wicked weapons of the enemy, but the tools of your people. Humans are creative. Inventive! We need only rely on our own brains to ascend to the apex ranks of cosmic power!"

Mildred didn't look totally convinced. "You seemed quite charmed by the RealitySim option."

"Only for a moment." Jason said, before quickly explaining his reasoning. "Let's just go with the GenesisFrame. Unless you have misgivings about it?"

Mildred smiled. "Of course not. It's based on this bedeviled temptress's abilities, after all! Ha-ha-ha-ha! How can you go wrong with using tried and true methods like the ones I have displayed?! Even better, you obtaining something similar to my cerebral powers will allow me to slack off a bit. I won't have to do all the creative thinking for you. Better to be self-sufficient, dear boy!"

Jason sighed with relief.

"I agree. Mildred, start drawing up detailed plans. I want to get this GenesisFrame up and running as soon as possible!"

Mildred gave him a big thumbs-up. "At once!"

She trotted over to the computers, then started rapidly typing, drawing, and sketching out plans for the GenesisFrame. As she did, Jason leaned back in his chair and closed his eyes, relaxing for a while.

"Heh, imagine giving up on my beauty sleep." Jason muttered to himself. "That alone disqualified the QuantumReflex from contention."

Part 637: Ose's Bugs

January 24th, 2021. 9AM, New York City.

Three days had passed since the battle at the Illuminati Haven. Belial dispersed her team, sending everyone off their separate ways. However, while Lucifer returned to one of her Hell's secret bases in Northern California, Ose remained with Belial. The two of them donned human disguises and took a strangely normal trip back to the eastern side of the states by flying aboard a human airplane. A Boeing 747, ideal for inter-continental flights, took them all the way to their destination in a quarter of a day, but they had to spend a portion of time before that simply waiting for the departure time to arrive.

On the way into the terminal, Ose scoffed. "I don't know why you insist on using human transportation. Warpers will get us there much faster."

"I like observing humans." Belial said. "And also, I enjoy plane rides. They give me lots of time to think."

"There's nothing enjoyable about them." Ose complained. "Stuck in a cabin, humans around us everywhere. I only deal with humans when I have to."

"It wouldn't do for the humans to uncover Satan's whereabouts. We're fortunate he remains elusive to this day." Belial patiently explained. "Using Warpers always emits a faint but traceable energy signal. I've long suspected the humans have a way of following our movements when we use Warpers, so I'd rather only use them in emergencies. That's why I took a plane ride to the western side of the states in the first place."

"Fine. Whatever." Ose grunted. "Must be nice, being able to bend your body in any direction. Even a uncomfortable airplane ride is no problem for the likes of you."

Belial raised an eyebrow. "You... you know I bought first-class tickets, right?"

"Oh." Ose said.

After a moment she scowled.

"Shut up!"

Hours later, the plane arrived at LaGuardia Airport on the east side of NYC, and the two women departed without any luggage, casually grabbing a taxi to ride back to the Legion Headquarters.

When they stepped inside the cab, the male cab driver's eyes nearly popped out of his head. He had never seen a pair of such stunningly beautiful women in all his years! They weren't just attractive, but beautiful in an almost ethereal way.

He turned around and opened his mouth to greet them, but then Ose snapped her eyes to meet his, and the look she gave him nearly drained the soul from his body.

"Legion Building. Drive fast. Don't talk, or I'll fucking kill you. I am not in the mood. Don't test me."

The man swallowed the words he was going to say. Her fiery temper excited him, but he also felt she absolutely would and could kill him without a second's thought, something he genuinely couldn't understand why he'd ever believe.

"Y-yes, ma'am." The cab driver mumbled, before sheepishly shifting the cab's gears and taking off.

Belial and Ose remained completely silent. They both crossed their arms and looked out the rear passenger windows nearest them, not opting to speak to one another in the presence of a human. The cab remained completely silent, save for the driver's watery swallowing sounds. He had never felt more awkward in his entire life.

Just who the hell are these babes? The man wondered. What I wouldn't give for one night with them...

The cab finally came to a stop after forty-five minutes of driving in medium traffic. In truth, if Ose had used her powers, she could have transmitted her body to Legion HQ within three seconds, but that could have drawn attention, and the ever-cautious Belial insisted on taking the slower, more proper channels.

Oh well, Ose thought. It's not like our lives are getting any shorter. Immortals have all the time in the world.

She was all too happy to step out of the cab, especially since the driver's body odor had assaulted her sensitive nostrils the entire way. Maybe later when Belial wasn't looking, Ose would hunt him in the dead of night and murder him just so he'd never be able to think those awful lurid thoughts she knew he was thinking the entire drive. Human males were all such damned pigs!

After the cab drove away, Belial finally turned and spoke to her lesser peer.

"Be bold. Satan likes strong types. Male and female alike. He doesn't like wimpy or demure girls. Get on his good side, and he'll give you most of what you want."

Ose sneered. "He'll give me everything I demand, don't you worry about that."

Belial nodded in a not bad sort of way, puffing out her lower lip slightly. "Well alright then. Let's meet the Devil."

Ose had spoken to Satan a few times over the years, but as the First Emperor, it was never really in her prerogative to meet with him one-on-one. She had only ever exchanged a few words when traveling to see him alongside her mother. Lucifer was a powerful Demoness, and a longtime ally of his, if not an actual 'friend'. Ose, by contrast, was just some pretty white-haired demoness he only faintly recalled due to her mother. He knew she was the one demoness who was adept with human technology, but that simply didn't impress him since he thoroughly believed humans were a lesser species propped up by their Heroes and a few key technologies. They were otherwise weak, pathetic, and unimpressive.

Ose's eyes flashed with insight. She had conversed with Belial during the flight, carefully probing important bits of information regarding the First Emperor, and by now her plan had reached an 85% confidence threshold. There was room to make a terrible error, but she believed she could meet her goals, and maybe even surpass them, if she played her cards right.

Both women entered the lobby. A man at the entry desk perked up when he saw Belial.

"Miss Lily, so good to see you back. Shall I call ahead to let Mister Hercule know you've arrived?"

Belial smiled prettily at the man. "He already knows."

Indeed, Satan had sensed her unique demonic mana when her plane flew over the city, after she deliberately leaked a small portion of it out. This leak was so brief that it couldn't be used to ascertain her whereabouts, only her existence to those sensitive to such sensations.

Belial and Ose took the elevator. They arrived on the top floor, where the secondary secretary blinked in surprise before quickly standing up from Belial's desk.

"Lily! You're back. It's good to see you! I've made sure to keep Mister Hercule's arrangements in order during your work trip."

Belial smiled at her cute little coworker. Her succubus instincts flared up for a moment as she smelled some familiar pheromones on the women's high heels. It seemed Satan had a little fun while she was away.

"You can hold the fort down a while longer." Belial said without much interest. "I've brought a guest to meet the CEO."

She didn't bother introducing Ose to the two random human women. They didn't really matter, and Ose wouldn't have been interested. Plus, it was neither of the two lesser secretary's business anyway. They only existed to take care of Satan's needs when Belial left, whatever those needs might be.

Poor dears. They had no idea they were merely fragile mortal toys, meant to be discarded once Satan tired of them. Belial almost felt some pity for them, but that feeling disappeared when she remembered the thousands of other human women Satan had gone through over the millennia. He might have his own animal needs, but he almost didn't value human women for anything but their bodies.

There were rare exceptions, of course, namely when it came to female Heroes or other noteworthy figures, but those were few and far between.

Belial pushed open the door to the office. She found 'Mark Hercule' sitting on a chair, playing a fiddle softly, seemingly lost in thought. When the door opened, he blinked a few times to clear his mental haze, then smiled at Belial as the door closed. "Lily! Glad to see you back. And this is...?"

Satan didn't recognize the woman standing beside his 'head secretary', and he wasn't certain if she was human or demon. But after a moment, he noticed the red ring on her finger, which Ose made no attempt to disguise.

Ose remained silent for a moment. "Hmm."

She turned her head from left to right, causing Satan to slightly frown. The fact she hadn't introduced herself was... odd. He couldn't remember the last time this had happened...

Suddenly, Ose's body flickered. She abruptly disappeared from the spot and zipped over to one of Satan's displays, where his trophy collection from his Martial Arts World Championships stood.

Before Satan could react, she smashed her fist into the glass, grabbed one of the trophies, and threw it onto the ground, breaking it into a hundred pieces!

"Wh-what the fuck?!" Satan roared, his eyes igniting with rage. "You!! What the HELL do you think-"

"Quiet." Ose said, directing a glare toward him. Her body flickered again, and in an instant, she was bent over, reaching into the debris to grab a tiny object even Satan could barely see with his superior demonic vision.

Ose flickered over to him, holding the object between her fingers.

"First Emperor Satan. Your office is bugged. And not just a little bugged. A lot bugged."

Satan's fury shifted slightly. He was still clearly pissed about his broken trophy and was just about ready to throw his fiddle at this pompous bitch who dared wreak havoc in his office, but he held himself back.

"Bugged? The fuck you mean, 'bugged'?" Satan snapped. "Ain't no bug I've ever seen!"

"I don't mean a literal bug, you imbecile." Ose said, not even flinching in the face of his rage. "I'm talking about human reconnaissance technology. They are watching you, listening to you, peeping in on every private moment that happens in this office."

Suddenly, Ose's eyes flashed with white light. She abruptly spread out her arms and sent surges of electricity all over the place, arcing towards shelves, power outlets on the walls, even obliterating several of the lights in the room. Luckily, the early morning sun kept the office well-lit, not that it would have mattered. Demons had incredible vision, even during the blackest of nights.

The sounds of shattering glass, exploding furniture, and other violent noises immediately drew the attention of the two secretaries outside, but luckily before they could activate the silent alarm, Belial knocked on the door thrice to indicate nothing was amiss. They could only begrudgingly wait to find out what all the ruckus was about... later.

Satan's rage turned to confusion. His mouth gaped open, as if he could not believe the audacity of this bitch. By now he knew she was a demon, that much was obvious, but he could not fathom what bimbo would be so stupid as to wreck his office and light a fire under his ass. Did she not realize her life was in jeopardy?!

Ose's eyes stopped glowing. She looked around the destroyed office with a hint of satisfaction. "Alright. I destroyed all of them. We're safe... for now."

"Safe?!" Satan yelled. "Oh I wouldn't be so sure of your safety, you fucking bitch! What's the meaning of all this? Lilia?!"

He turned his head to look at his wife, but Belial was just as baffled. What the hell was Ose doing? What was she THINKING?! Wasn't she here to lower her head, speak words that would achieve certain goals, and obtain what she wanted? She had just made a horrid impression on the leader of demonkind! If she didn't have a good explanation, she might lose her life today! Lucifer certainly wouldn't make it in time to save her.

"Don't look at her you dolt." Ose retorted with a snarl. "I'm the one talking. Devils. What an imbecile. First Emperor my ass. You're outdated. You're feeding the humans all the information they could ever want. I may have even just saved your life, and you don't even know what I did."

At this point, Satan's rage had shifted from confusion to respect. He had to admit, it had been a long time since someone had the balls, or lack thereof, to speak to him in such a manner. And based on the aura this woman leaked, she wasn't even a Duke! She was only a Baron... but who was she?

He decided to ask. Instead of getting even madder, he became strangely calm. He assessed the woman with cold, ruthless eyes.

"Your name?"

"Ose, the Baron of Infiltration." She immediately replied. "Lucifer's adopted daughter."

Satan blinked. Yes, now that he thought about it...

"Lucy's little girl, huh? You think mommy's gonna protect you if I beat you to a bloody pulp? Or do you have some other assurance?"

Satan stood up, but his horns didn't even reach the top of her shoulders. Ose was much taller than him.

She didn't balk in the slightest at his threat. "So this is how you repay my gift? And after all the stories I'd heard of your wisdom and generosity. It seems those were nothing more than lies told to deceive the Grunts."

"Gift?" Satan asked, glancing around his destroyed office. "Little girl, I don't know what you're talkin' about, but killing a bunch of bugs don't impress me."

Ose resisted the urge to facepalm. It seemed he still didn't understand anything.

Slowly, deliberately, she held up the tiny black device in her fingers.

"Listen carefully, First Emperor. This is a 'bug'. Not a literal bug. A metaphorical one. It's human-based technology. This bug, specifically, is used to record audio within a wide band frequency. It can pick up any noise in this office within a certain distance, then transmit that noise to a location unknown."

She paused for half a breath.

"It's a human spying device. Like what Seers use to scry the future. Do you understand now?"

Satan scoffed, but he looked at the tiny flat disc in her grasp with a more careful gaze. "Nuh-uh. No way. You think I'm stupid? That tiny little thing? That can spy on me?"

"It can. And it did, until thirty seconds ago." Ose said, without batting an eye. "Let me guess. You think the humans don't know who you are. You think you're secure here, hidden away. You probably even think you've embedded yourself well into the human world. But you're wrong. They know who you are, and they've been laughing at you. You're like an old man who doesn't have any idea what tomfoolery his grandchildren are up to, even as they cart him off to a retirement home."

The more Ose spoke, the more doubtful Satan became. He started to remember more and more about this girl. He heard stories that she was 'good with human tech stuff' from a few other demons, but that didn't offer him any concrete value until this very moment. Now, Satan suddenly realized he was woefully underprepared for whatever the humans might be cooking up. He thought back to a lot of private conversations he'd had, conversations about secret missions he'd planned that later went awry. He had always thought it was suspicious that the humans got wind of those plans so easily... but now?

"Those... those bastards." Satan muttered, his tone much softer than before. "They've really been spying on me? You mean it?"

Ose's body flickered. She zipped around the office at a dizzying pace, leaving Satan's vision spinning. He was secretly shocked by her speed. Only a Baron, but already this incredible? She was a real talent! An absolute gem!

She appeared before the Devil a few moments later, opening her hands to let more than fifty tiny black plastic objects fall through her fingers and clatter to the ground.

"Take a look for yourself." Ose said.

Satan's Vectors snapped downward. They passed through the floor, scooped up the plastic doodads, and became corporeal as they brought them up to his eye-level. Satan carefully picked one up and looked at it, but to him, it just looked like a tiny marble.

"...You're sure?" Satan asked doubtfully.

Ose nodded. Her expression turned grave. She picked out one item at random, then carefully opened it up with her fingernails. Just like that, its tiny internal circuits became visible.

"This is a camera. It can record video, albeit at a low quality, and transmit it to a remote location. If I had to wager a guess, I'd bet someone close to you planted it when you weren't in the office."

She paused, then cocked her head.

"Do you have any maid services? Cleaners?"

Satan shrugged. "Sure, a few of 'em."

"They're the most likely suspects. Anytime you've ever left someone alone in the office, they could have planted a bug too. You should assume this entire building is bugged to keep an eye on you wherever you go."

Satan finally sobered up. He raised his head to meet the woman's eyes, a woman who exposed something he'd never have guessed due to his ignorance regarding human technology.

"Ose, huh? Lucy's little girl?"

Ose touched her red ring, revealing her true form. She bowed her head slightly to show respect, but not deference. "That's right, First Emperor. And I've come today to speak to you about a very important matter."

Satan nodded. He no longer looked at her as if she were a weakling Baron, but a potential powerhouse! The conspiracy she had just unraveled made her equally as important in his eyes as some of the lesser Emperors he didn't think too highly of, and perhaps even Emperors better than them.

"You have my full and undivided attention." Satan said, crossing his arms.

Some time later, Ose finished explaining the events that occurred at the Illuminati Haven. Belial had sat down in a chair and discarded her human disguise, only nodding and occasionally chiming in to validate Ose's words, but otherwise keeping silent. She found herself continually impressed by Ose's clear-headed manner of speech, as well as her ability to describe situations with great eloquence.

"Two Trueborn Heroes." Satan said, after hearing Ose's full explanation. "One of them has super fast reaction speeds, planetary-teleportation capabilities, pinpoint-perfect aim, and a gun that shoots bullets capable of ripping right through Lilia's flesh. The other is a bit bratty, but his Dream Eating power means he'll become a fearsome foe in the future. That about it?"

"They also are being empowered, possibly by an Ancestor Hero." Ose added. "Jason's body was far too durable. I was unable to cause severe damage to him with my current strength. I lost my chance to assassinate him on the spot."

"That's a shame." Satan said, as he looked away and stroked his goatee. "That's a damn shame."

He turned and walked away, heading to the window while wading around destroyed pieces of furniture strewn about his office. By now, he had completely lost interest in his destroyed trophies and other knick-knacks. Today's news was far too important for him to ignore.

"See, here's the thing, toots." Satan began. "I ain't afraid of humans killing me. It ain't possible. It simply ain't. You don't know me well, but trust me. If Arthur couldn't do it, nobody could. Not even a pair of powerful Trueborn like Cat Mask and the Archseer."

Ose remained silent, and Satan continued to speak.

"These humans ain't a threat to me, specifically, but they are a threat to other demons. And that's where the problems begin. I can't ignore this. Can't keep quiet."

Satan looked at her with deep meaning.

"You don't gotta say it. I know what you want. You want to become an Emperor."

Ose's body twitched. She was surprised to hear him state it so simply, but considering the shocks she had given him, this was nothing by comparison. She simply nodded.

"You will give me the power of an Emperor." Ose said, not bothering to phrase it as a question. "Demonkind's future depends on it. The Archseer listed me and my brother as high-value targets. I don't know why Gressil is so important to kill, but I can certainly understand why I am. My knowledge of humanity's technology means I can be a balance-tipping point in the upcoming war. You would be a fool to ignore this."

Satan looked at Ose. He chuckled softly under his breath.

Seriously, how long had it been since someone dared to speak to him in such a manner, let alone a weak little Baron girl? In his eyes, she was barely out of diapers. Not even close to a millennia old, yet she spoke to this 10,000 year old monster as if she were his equal, or even his superior!

But Satan didn't hold it against her. She had the ability to do so. As the First Emperor of Demonkind, the only trait he valued in subordinates was competence. She had demonstrated her capabilities by rooting out the human 'bugs' and showed him why so many missions had failed in recent years. He would have remained completely oblivious to this threat for devils knew how long, perhaps until it led to the death of his entire species!

She has her mother's ego. Satan thought to himself. But unlike Lucy, Ose is actually smart.

He smiled.

I like her.

"Alright, toots. I'll play it straight with you." Satan said, turning to fully face her. "Usually I like to play games, test people before I make them a Duke, and especially before I make 'em an Emperor. But not this time."

His smile disappeared.

"The stakes are too high. I'll personally escort you to Hellga. She keeps the soul pills. We might barely have enough to boost you. Unfortunately, aquiring enough human souls to uplift an Emperor ain't easy these days. But who knows... maybe it'll become a lot easier in due time."

Satan frowned. He suddenly remembered he'd spoken about his secret plans regarding the Labyrinth project in this very room on more than one occasion. The humans were likely to know about it.

"Damn. Motherfucking humans." Satan hissed, before lightly pounding the side of his fist on his mahogany desk. He looked at Ose with a flash of insight. "Say, any shot you'd be able to find out who planted these buggers?"

Ose shrugged helplessly. "I am only a Baron. My powers are not at that level yet. Perhaps, once I am an Emperor, I will obtain such a capability."

Satan's smile returned in full force. Ah, finally, a lie. Almost could've fooled me with that line before. Hehe, but it's okay. I don't mind a subordinate with ambition, especially if she's got brains.

He gestured at Ose's ring. "C'mon, let's get a move on. Lilia, you stay here and make sure nobody enters. I don't want any of those damn buggers gettin' back in here again."

Belial waved her hand. "Sure. I'm pretty tired from the flight anyway. I'll take a nap until you return."

"Hehe, love ya, toots." Satan said, as Ose reverted to her human form and the two of them walked out of the office together.

The timeline of the Energy Wars had already begun to change in a drastic way...

Part 638: Compromised

January 24th, 2021. Noon, Northern California.

While Ose and Satan went on their fateful journey together, somewhere across the USA, on the far opposite side, there sat a male demon on a hill. The midday wind slowly swished around him, its wintery chill doing nothing to affect his body's temperature.

The demon sat at the very top of the hill with a calm, serene expression on his face. He looked out at the distant coastline, the small human settlement known as Crescent City, and he contemplated a great many things.

The meaning of life. His purpose. His feelings about the world.

His name was Gressil. He was a mere Baron of the Third Hell of Blood, but he had been a Baron for many many hundreds of years. He had evolved to his current rank through the contributions of helping other demons, a long time ago. He had been respected once. He had even been the leader of a small enclave within the Hell of Calamity... before King Arthur's men ran roughshod through it, swept up his enclave and killed many of its members.

These days, he was nothing. He was nobody. No longer noteworthy. No longer respected.

Gressil stared out across the midday horizon. He looked up at the clouds and sighed softly.

Only a few days earlier, Ose had practically dragged him along on a mission to assault the Illuminati Haven. He wanted to refuse, but he wasn't any good at telling his cute little sister 'no'. He didn't exactly dote on her, but whenever he looked into her eyes, a flash of pain ran through his heart.

Ose was only a child when her other older brothers had died. She was young... far too young. But Gressil was older. He remembered their faces and names. He remembered the good times he spent with them. He remembered their screams of agony as Arthur's minions tortured and maimed them.

But those events happened a long, long time ago. These days, Gressil didn't think about them much. He had other matters on his mind.

Gressil motioned with his hands. He summoned a small cloud of illusory butterflies, allowing them to gently fly around him in circles. He didn't know why he loved doing this so much. He only knew it calmed him down and made him feel more at peace.

Butterflies were so simple, so innocent. They were creatures that operated purely on instinct. The animal kingdom could be cruel and indifferent at times, but there were plenty of animals that lived tranquil lives. Nature might be eat-or-be-eaten, but it wasn't always kill-or-be-killed.

"Hey! Hey Gres! You up here again??"

Gressil's tranquil mood dissipated. He blinked and looked to the north, where he saw a female demoness climbing the mountain. She was attractive, with long brown hair and two perky pigtails. She wore a prim and proper outfit, but she had a good figure too. Not like him, who was tall, lanky, and otherwise ordinary looking. Gressil sometimes looked in a mirror and found his reflection depressing, but he didn't really feel like fixing it either. He simply was who he was. He had no desire to change himself.

"Hello, Abby." Gressil said softly, his words practically whispered on the wind. Luckily, Abby's sharp ears picked up on them.

"There you are! I should have known you'd come hide up here, like usual." Abby said, as she sprinted the rest of the way up the hill. She breathed only a little heavier than usual, but it was evident she'd been running around for quite a while without rest. "Have you seen Ose? I keep asking but nobody will tell me where to find her!"

Gressil slowly blinked his eyes. He returned his gaze out to the horizon.

"She left with Belial. I don't know why."

"What?! She left without ME?!" Abby screeched. "Oh, this is so unfair! I told her to tell me when she was taking a trip! I wouldn't want her to be lonely without me!"

Gressil didn't bother explaining that Ose actually hated interacting with Abby. Abby was completely oblivious about her one-sided love, and she never believed him when he explained in the past anyway.

So, he simply remained silent.

Abby moaned and groaned for a few seconds longer before frowning and looking at him.

"Hm? Gres? You okay?"

Gressil softly sighed. "I am fine."

She stared at him for a few moments, then walked over and sat down beside him.

"You always say that. But you're not fine. Something's on your mind."

Gressil didn't argue the point. She was right. He was feeling more down than usual... and that was saying a lot.

Gressil lowered his eyes. With his acute demonic vision, he stared at a bee crawling on a nearby dandelion flower. He watched it as it went about its business, then took to the air and flew away. Bees were becoming a rarer sight over the years. A symptom of humanity's destruction of their environment.

"Why do we kill humans?" Gressil asked.

Abby blinked. She turned her head to look at the side profile of his face, then returned her gaze back out to the horizon.

"That's a weird question, Gres. We're demons. It's what we do."

"But why?" Gressil asked.

Abby fell silent. She chewed on his question in her head.

"Well. Humans have hurt a lot of demons. You and I know this better than others. We were both there when King Arthur tore up our enclave. It's only natural we have to fight for our survival."

Gressil slowly blinked. "That is not an accurate summary of past events. Demons attacked the humans. Arthur's men were retaliating against us."

"Sure, but the humans attacked us before then. Remember the Culling Hunts?" Abby asked.

"Right. And before that, we attacked them, and before that, they attacked us..." Gressil said.

He paused for a few moments, then closed his eyes and sighed.

"Isn't it all so... pointless? A cycle of violence. Unending. All so... Chaotic. Lacking in Order. Murder for murder's sake."

Abby didn't respond immediately. She again thought about his greater point.

"You're not wrong, Gres. But... what's the alternative? We could try and figure out which species started the war, but it wouldn't matter. The demons and humans would still have all the recent atrocities to point at. Everyone would point fingers. Nothing would change."

Gressil rested his hands on his lap. He opened his eyes and gazed upon a distant bird in a tree.

"I don't know. A temporary ceasefire. Something that would make us pause our hostilities toward each other. Something that would allow a generation of humans to grow old, pass away, and bring forth new ones who didn't remember the old pains caused and suffered by their elders. Maybe then, we could start to heal our old wounds."

Abby nibbled on her lower lip. "Where's all this coming from? Don't tell me that fight with the Illuminati affected you this much?"

"I won't lie. It did." Gressil muttered. "We overpowered the humans. We slaughtered them with great ease. Dozens, perhaps even hundreds dead. Reduced to meat paste. By contrast, we suffered no losses. Mother ate a bullet and passed out... that was the worst extent of our injuries. And the cause of all this suffering? A simple desire to root out the truth about the two Trueborn Heroes."

Gressil paused for a moment.

"Sentients... are all so greedy, Abby. They are all ruled by Desire. They seek their own enrichment. They think selfish thoughts, only working to uplift themselves. When causing pain to others, rarely do they imagine what it would feel like if such pain were inflicted on them instead."

Abby quietly looked at Gressil's face again. He looked so hurt by what he had seen. So damaged. But the pain he felt did not only come from those humans...

"Are you always this... ponderous?" Abby asked, her voice low. "I didn't know you had such... broad thoughts. You and Ose are really similar."

"I don't know." Gressil muttered. "Those Heroes said they wanted me and my sister dead. But why? What have we ever done to them? Is there not some way we could make amends? Stop the eternal cycle of pain and suffering? Why must bloodshed be the only language we speak?"

After a moment's hesitation, Abby reached over and looped her arm around Gressil's. She leaned her head against his shoulder and sighed.

"Jeez, Gres. You're really bringing down my mood here. All this heavy talk... it makes me wish Lucifer would be nicer to you."

Gressil turned his head slightly. He looked at the top of Abby's hair, felt the soft skin of her arm twined with his.

"That is something I wish too. All the time." Gressil muttered.

The two of them remained sitting there for many many hours together, pondering about the brutality of the world together.

January 24th, 2021. Noon, New York State.

Somewhere in the suburbs, far from the hustle and bustle of New York City, a pair of false humans slowly walked into the countryside. They kept watch for pursuers, but it didn't seem anyone had followed them to their destination.

"This is the place." Satan the Devil growled. He gestured vaguely toward a spot somewhere in the forest, though Ose didn't see anything special about it. "Can't get in unless you know how to do all the ritual bullshit. Or unless you're me. Heh."

Satan made an exaggerated snapping motion with his fingers. Instantly, a magical contract appeared in his grasp. Then, he touched a few words on the densely-written page, and they began to glow with unholy red demonic light.

The forest lit up with an ominous, bloody energy. Distant screams seemed to waft into Ose's ears. Even as a mentally resilient demoness, she felt deeply discomforted by the raw negative energy in the air.

"You wouldn't believe how many human souls we use to make places like this." Satan said, as glowing pentagrams began to appear on the ground, etched into the nearby trees, and even onto the bodies of birds in the branches above. "You wouldn't believe it."

A whoomph of air erupted from within the forest's depths. It struck the two demons, but Ose dug her heels into the ground and stiffened her posture so she wouldn't fall over. Satan, by comparison, didn't even flinch.

After that, a crystal clear oval-shaped portal slowly materialized in the air. Satan remained standing in place for over five minutes as it expanded, then grew to a size big enough for both of them to walk through. Eventually, it changed appearance to reveal some sort of underground chamber lit by glowing demonstones.

"After you, toots." Satan said, gesturing toward it.

Ose nodded. She strode forward and boldly walked inside without any fear. If this was all some ploy to kill her, that would be profoundly stupid on Satan's part, and if some ancient horror wanted to sneak attack her once she entered, she doubted it could contend with the First Emperor of demonkind.

She entered the underground chamber and found a series of human cultists inside, their faces masked, all of them standing with their palms clasped together against their waists. They stood in a line, saying nothing, facing the portal's entrance as Ose and Satan entered. She stood atop a platform elevated maybe ten feet off the ground, and at the bottom of the stairs leading downward, even more human cultists stood at attention, awaiting Satan's arrival.

The First Emperor smiled as the portal closed behind him.

"Good work, ladies, gents. You can all die now."

The moment the words left his mouth, all the humans stiffened, slumped forward, and fell down, dead. They collapsed into their shadows, ending up a line of corpses on the ground. Ose looked around the room at the thirty or so dead bodies, then promptly ignored them. They were only human. Their lives held no value in her eyes.

"Does this happen every time you open a portal?" She asked, as she and Satan made their way down the stairs.

"Huh? Yeah, but it's no big deal. The big city has lots of vagrants, homeless people, poor shlubs. It's easy to make a few go missing once in a while. We've still got a few hundred more in the back wing, waiting to be used when we leave later."

Ose nodded slowly. "And none of them are compromised?"

"Compromised?" Satan scoffed. "And how would that be the case?"

She looked at him out of the corner of her eye, then shook her head. "Nothing. Seems you have everything under control."

The two walked deeper into the chamber. Before long, a pair of handsome Demon Lords strode out and bowed at the waist. "Emperor Satan."

"I'm here to see Hellga." Satan said. "I'm giving a promotion to Baron Ose."

The two males straightened their postures. They appraised Ose, then nodded.

"Of course." One of them said. "This way."

They led Satan and Ose deeper into the tunnels, where they passed various chambers with human slaves pounding hammers against anvils, forging items under the beady-eyed watch of slave-drivers behind them. Sometimes they passed vast underground chambers where humans were mining demonstone slowly, painfully, with whips cracking at their backs if they slowed down.

"This is just one of many underground complexes for building demonkind's armies." Satan explained. "We've got a bunch of 'em all over the place. This one's a bit more special than the others, since it's the one I visit most often, but it's not too far beyond what you'd expect from other facilities."

"Demonstone grows back after you've mined it." Ose commented idly. "It's not only a renewable resource, but plentiful and easy to find, so long as many demons congregate in one area."

"We've got mountains of the stuff just lying around. Honestly, it's a bit of a nuisance." Satan replied. "Keeps growing forever if we don't mine it. Once we dig it out of the ground, it goes inert. I just wish we had something useful we could use it all for."

Ose blinked. "Aren't you crafting armor with it? Weapons?"

"Nah. Mostly just furniture." Satan said. "Don't get me wrong, demonstone is extremely tough, but most demons would rather use their magical abilities to fight humans. It's not very prestigious to go out there in armor like the humans do. It's beneath us."

Ose frowned deeply. She knew demonstone was quite abundant, but she had no idea it was to the extent Satan had said. Her mind began to revolve as she started thinking about a great many things...

Satan stopped before a giant door at the end of the hallway. There were all sorts of demonic symbols etched into it, engravings of torturous ceremonies, among other things. He ignored those, bit his thumb, and sent a drop of blood toward the door. The drop exploded into a faint mist, then the door activated and slid into the wall, revealing the Blood Pits within.

This was one of demonkind's healing havens; a place where badly injured and maimed demons could come to heal their bodies and revive themselves from all but the most dire of wounds. The blood was taken from humans, empowered through magical processes Ose had no knowledge of, and was part of an ancient tradition that ensured demons could stay alive and outlive their weak, pathetic human enemies for millennia upon millennia.

The two nameless Demon Lords stood at attention outside, allowing Satan and Ose to enter the Blood Pits by themselves.

A gorgeous young demon girl with curly brown hair bounded over to them and smiled cutely. "Satan! Hello, darling! Why have you come to see me?"

Satan grinned. "Hellga! Just the gal I was lookin' for. This here is Lucy's little girl, Ose. She's a Baron, but due to a recent contribution, I'm gonna need some souls for her. I'm promoting her to Emperor."

Some of the demons laying in the pools of blood jolted awake in surprise. It had been over a hundred years since the last time a demon was evolved to the rank of Emperor, and they certainly didn't expect to be in the room when it was announced.

"Ose? Oh, how nice to meet you!" Hellga chirped, puffing out her bountiful chest. "Wow, you're so beautiful too! I've heard you're like a genius with the human gadgets, yeah?"

Ose nodded. "That seems to be the case."

"Brains and beauty! Some girls get all the good stuff..." Hellga pouted. "Well, you're in luck. I have a surplus on pills. Some human genocides have been playing out in the Middle East, so we've been reaping quite a few from our passive sources. Come on, this way!"

She led Satan and Ose to the back of the blood pits, then entered a secret chamber by passing through an illusory wall. When Ose followed after, the distant sounds of screaming she had heard at the entrance became far louder, and much more violent! Wailing howls of agony from captured human souls sniffled and sobbed as they waiting within a purgatory, unable to die, unable to revive as angels in Heaven.

"Over the years," Satan explained, "we've found all sorts of vulnerabilities in the Lazarus Tower. We can nick souls from the angels if the humans don't pray enough, or if I can get 'em to sign one of my contracts. It's not much, but we manage to pick up maybe ten or twenty million a year."

Ose looked at him. "That's enough to raise more than a dozen Emperors every year."

"Bad idea. Too many chiefs, not enough Indians." Satan said while waving his hand flippantly. "Trust me, even if we only uplifted one Emperor a year, it'd create chaos. We tried that for a while and things got way out of hand. That's why we had to make the Seven Hells. Too many power struggles otherwise. The existing Emperors agreed only to uplift a new one after long periods of stability, or if one of the old ones died."

He looked back at her. "You're a special case. Don't make me regret doin' this."

Ose bared a toothy grin at him. "Oh, don't you worry, I won't. This is the best decision you could have made this century."

Satan looked at her solemnly. "I hope so."

Then, he turned to Hellga, who had already procured a handful of pitch-black soul pills she condensed on the spot. The number of errant souls in the room plummeted drastically as they were sealed inside the pills.

"We only have a few thousand souls left over." Hellga said, directing an appraising eye toward Ose. "You've consumed 11,201 souls so far. Inside these pills, there is a total of 988,799 souls. Just enough to get you to one million and past the barrier of Emperor."

"How do you know the number of souls I've consumed?" Ose asked. "I've been a Baron for several hundred years now."

"Oh, that? I can just tell by looking. It's an acquired ability!" Hellga said happily. "Now, let's not wait any longer. Emperor Satan does not uplift other Emperors often, so I'm looking forward to seeing what sort of powerhouse you will become!"

"Hold on just a second." Satan said, stepping between her and Ose. Ose frowned.

"What now?" Ose asked.

Satan didn't use words to reply. He simply waved his hand and summoned a magical contract.

"Sign this first. With blood."

Ose frowned. She knew there had to be a catch. She snatched the contract, then scanned it with her eyes. Other demons might be confused when reading the terms, but she had multiple degrees in law from human colleges. She saw right through a hundred different traps.

"Hahahaha. A slave contract? How clever, Satan. I'm not signing this."

Satan shrugged. "Saw through me that easy, huh? Well, I'd have been disappointed if you didn't. Actually, I'd rather you just sign the same one your mom did. It's not as restrictive-"

"I'm not signing any of your contracts." Ose interrupted, her eyes flashing with sinister light. "Not one clause, not one binding vow... nothing."

Satan blinked. He looked at her in surprise, but then his eyes hardened.

"Tough girl, huh? That ain't how this works, toots. You don't become an Emperor without my say-so. No signature, no Emperor rank. It's that simple."

Ose didn't back down. She loomed over him and sneered.

"Oh, Satan, darling. You don't get to threaten me. You need me to become an Emperor more than even I do. You simply haven't realized it yet."

Satan scoffed. "The fuck are you talkin' about? You tryin'a play games with me?"

"Not games. The cold, hard truth." Ose bit back. "You still don't get it. You're compromised, Satan. You're not as powerful and all-seeing as you think. The humans have been watching you for at least a decade, if not longer. They've bugged your offices, tagged your minions, and have likely infiltrated deep into our bases. If I sign one of your contract, I become another one of your 'assets'. A pawn they can use you to manipulate."

"The contract I had your mom sign ain't that bad. Don't be a baby." Satan retorted. "I'll be able to know where you are at all times. That's it. No restrictions, nothing else."

"And if I die?" Ose asked.

"If you die, I get your soul." Satan said. "What, you want it to go to the Lazarus Tower instead? With the angels?"

"My soul is mine." Ose said, leaning back and crossing her arms. She looked down at him with an even more derisive sneer than before. "I have plans for my soul, should I die someday. Hopefully, that will never happen. But if it does, I'll be prepared. In any case, I'm not signing a contract binding me to humanity's greatest mole. You're a liability."

Satan's glare turned ugly. "I've killed bitches for saying less than that."

"Yeah? And were those 'bitches' at the top of the Trueborn's kill-list when they were only a mere Baron?" Ose probed. "You need me. Right now, demonkind is in the most precarious position it's ever been. This is the time to elevate an Emperor not bound by the old paradigms."

She shrugged and looked away. "Or don't. Flip that coin. See what happens."

Satan looked doubtful. He looked at the ground and rubbed his chin for a minute or two while Hellga stood silently behind him, the soul pills held tightly in her grasp.

Eventually, he nodded.

"So it's like that, huh? You think I'm compromised, just because of some buggers?"

"And the 'slaves' outside." Ose snapped back. "You idiot! You imbecile! This place isn't hidden at all! The humans have already planted moles in your midst! I sensed technological devices hidden inside their bodies. They have beacons that can guide the humans here at any point! You haven't even noticed because you and the other demons are too STUPID to notice! Willfully ignorant, blindly denying change that could empower our species. You are a relic of an older time, and an anchor holding us back from the greatness we could achieve."

The more Ose spoke, the more she began looking into the distance, as if peering at a future only she could see.

"Here's the new deal, Satan. You will make me an Emperor without any conditions. In return, I will use my powers to elevate demons FAR beyond anything you could imagine. If you are not willing to trust my judgment, then let's not speak of the matter anymore. Let the humans kill me, and you can pray you have what it takes to hold them back."

Ose fell silent. She no longer bother to argue her case, leaving Satan with a bit of a conundrum. On the one hand, she had disrespected him several times and called into question his leadership skills. On the other hand, her pointed criticisms were factually correct, and aside from Hellga, there weren't any other demons present in the secret chamber...

Satan frowned. He looked up at Ose, and she looked back down at him.

What a domineering woman.

She had the makings of a truly impressive Emperor...

"Alright." Satan finally said. "We'll do it your way. Hellga. Give her the pills. And erase your memories of the entire conversation up to now."

Hellga blinked. Her eyes dulled. Satan's contract swallowed her mind, and her memories disappeared. She looked at Ose blankly, then held out her palm with the soul pills in it.

Ose took the pills gratefully. She looked at them with eager eyes.

"You've made the right decision, Emperor Satan." She said, glancing at him for a split second before returning her gaze to those delectable pills.

Satan opened his mouth to say something, but then he paused and shrugged. "Don't eat 'em too fast. It'll hurt like hell if ya do."

Ose grinned as she gazed at the treasure in her hands. "I am no stranger to agony."

Without another word, she grabbed the pills and threw them in her mouth. Ten marble-sized orbs flew down her throat, and she swallowed them with great gusto.

Instantly, they began dissolving. Souls tried to escape her body, only for her raw demonic power to greedily latch onto those poor, pathetic dead humans and melt them into raw soul energy that streamed into Ose's internal organs.

"ORAAAA!!!" Ose roared, as her aura began to surge.

Lightning exploded from her body. It slammed into the walls, pounded the door, and shook the entire underground complex. Luckily, Hellga had already smoothly taken refuge behind Satan, who easily protected her from the explosive power outbursts erupting from Ose's body.

As the catacombs rumbled, the demons in the Blood Pits sat up a little straighter, looking at the secret hall with fire in their eyes.

A new Emperor... had been elevated!

Part 639: Overpowering Ose

January 24th, 2021. Noon, Somewhere Underground...

Ose couldn't help herself. She burst into maniacal laughter as waves of demonic energy continuously condensed within her body, empowering her physical strength, enhancing the speed of her mind, and uplifting the magical power inherent to her physiology. She screamed with laughter for more than a minute, only for that laughter to abruptly freeze as waves of pain slammed into her brain. She staggered and leaned against the wall while lightning started sporadically firing out of her joints and arcing to the nearest metallic surfaces.

However, her pride was too strong. She refused to let herself look weak in front of the Devil himself. In an instant, she devised a counter. She deactivated all the electrical impulses in her brain that transmitted pain, allowing her to completely ignore the ripping and tearing of neurons and muscle fibers all throughout her vessel. After only a second or two of showing her pain, she stood up again, reverting to her previous smug appearance.

"At l-last!" Ose choked, her jaw still involuntarily clenching once in a while. "The rank of Emperor... is mine!"

Satan looked at her and smiled. "Not bad, toots. I'm actually a little impressed. Seems you were able to power through the pain."

Ose's teeth clenched together. She might have disabled her feelings of pain, but she couldn't ignore the sensation of nausea boiling within her stomach. She suppressed her trembling body and met Satan's gaze as evenly as she could.

"Today... marks... a turning point for demonkind's future." Ose said haltingly. "I can see it now. I can see a bright future awaiting us, once we take care of those two Trueborn Heroes. But we cannot delay. Every minute we don't kill them is a minute we lose in this new war."

Slowly, Ose's body adapted to its new status. The waves of pain and nausea slowed down, then eventually stopped. Just ten minutes after recklessly eating all the soul pills at once, Ose reached her final form.

Sensing that her apotheosis was complete, she directed a cold glare at Satan.

"First Emperor. You made a mistake allowing me to ascend without any assurances."

Before Satan could respond, Ose's leg snapped at his head. She kicked Satan with all her strength, sending him smashing through the secret chamber's doorway!

Satan hurtled through the air, flew above the blood pits, and splattered into a horrific bloody mess against the far wall, startling all the demons inside the Blood Pits. Many of them were badly injured. They were recuperating due to recent fights they'd been involved in, be it fights against human soldiers, angels, or even their fellow demons. They couldn't flee the Blood Pits even if they wanted! But demons were usually battle maniacs. Seeing Satan sent flying, they quickly started roaring for a good fight as they turned their attention to the new Emperor who dared to defy him.

Ose stepped out, her uplifted aura blazing with a righteous fury. A maniacal grin spread across her face.

"HEH HEH HEH." Ose gurgled in her throat. "Stupid bastard. Can you idiots believe he uplifted me without putting a single check on my power? HAHAHA. Men are all so stupid."

Satan's bloodied remains slid down the wall and landed on the floor with a wet plop. In her head, Ose counted down the seconds, knowing Satan would revive within one minute.

"Satan thinks he can control demonkind. Everyone is afraid of him." Ose boldly declared. "But the truth is, he's just an endlessly reviving bully. We all know he isn't truly unkillable. He has millions of souls inside him. Each time he dies, one of those souls gets snuffed out."

Satan's remains suddenly agitated on the ground. A hellish aura burst outward as he began rapidly reassembling himself.

Before he could fully finish, Ose flickered over to him, raised her leg straight above her head, then slammed it down in a brutal axe-kick.

BOOOM!!!!

The explosion from her kick atomized his remains and sprayed Satan's entrails in every direction, coating the entire wall in his blood and viscera. The shockwave that came afterward killed three Demon Grunts nearby, breaking all the bones in their bodies. Several others not much further away suffered terrible ruptures and tearing to their internal organs, leaving them comatose and on the verge of death. Even more were left deafened, the explosion bursting their eardrums and leaving them reeling on the ground.

"So the math is quite simple." Ose declared, more to herself than to the remaining lower demons still capable of listening. "If he has a million souls stuffed in his piggish body, then I'll kill him a million times. And if he has TEN million souls, then I'll kill him ten million times! Eventually, he'll run out, and he'll stop reviving. See? It's tedious work, but it will eventually pay off!"

After sixty seconds, Satan started to revive again, but Ose launched her fist at his reanimating remains, blasting them apart with a thunder-punch.

"Once Satan is gone, that will be it! No more First Emperor. The demons will be free of a tyrant, and a new First Emperor will take over! Quite a good deal, isn't it?! We'll be able to put someone intelligent on the throne. Someone beautiful, someone with an actual BRAIN who can win this war in a metaphorical week!"

Ose glanced at Satan's remains, frowning when he started to revive at fifty-nine seconds and some change. It was probably just an anomaly though, and she killed him again.

"It's going to take me a while to kill him truly dead, but I'm sure you'll all be ecstatic once I do!" Ose declared. "I have plans for demonkind's future. BIG plans! I couldn't act on them before, but I can now! Soon, everything will be mine for the taking! If any other Emperors dare to get in my way, I'll just kill them too!"

Satan revived once again, but this time his revival only needed fifty-nine and a quarter seconds. Ose frowned when she killed him once more, and she wondered if the revival speed was merely a minor discrepancy. She killed him again, and again, while each time, his revival speed very slightly increased to be faster than the previous times.

Oh? Ose thought. So it's like that. The more I kill him, the faster his body returns. Well, good! That means I'll be able to tear through his millions of souls far faster than I planned! Having to wait tens of years to fully finish him off would have been such a bore!

Ose killed him ten times. A hundred times!

Her fists and legs were covered in the melted splatters of Satan's bones, teeth, eyeballs, and many other bodily extremities. His revival speed had already increased to the point where he needed less than half a minute to return, but his remains were agitating even faster than that.

Ose breathed evenly. This wasn't just about killing Satan, but assessing her own uplifted status. She had already come to the shocking conclusion that while before, she could think over 100 times faster than any other demon, but now that speed was nearly 100,000 times faster!

It was unbelievable. During this simple slaughter of the First Emperor, in the half and full-minutes between Satan's revivals, Ose had already mentally completed a few of her simplest inventions, mapping out how those pieces of technology would need to be rewired, as well as how their designs should look. She was all set to complete a small portion of her future plans, and all she had been doing was casually thinking about a few dozen enhanced weapons and armor between sessions of kicking Satan's ass.

Soon, Ose thought, my plan to build a demonic paradise will be able to be launched. I'll still need to find a world secreted away where the angels and Titans won't be able to find us, as well as the others... but once I do, I'll be able to build a new future for our people. Everyone will have no choice but to worship my greatness!

The demoness's ego soared. In her head, she imagined herself as a phoenix rising to the heavens, its natural power and glory awing all who looked upon her.

It was pitiful that no other Sentients could match her brilliance or beauty!

Her fists and legs started moving faster and faster. She blasted Satan's regrowing body out of the Blood Pits into the central corridor, allowing the demons still alive inside the Blood Pits to breathe a little easier. Now they might actually survive the day, though they weren't sure how much longer it would take for her to finish killing all of Satan's souls, or if she even could.

She continued murdering the First Emperor. His revival time went from thirty seconds to twenty, then to fifteen, ten... even five!

Satan started reviving so quickly that the moment she destroyed his reanimating corpse, the splattered blood and gore would already be twitching and convulsing before it hit the far wall. She'd have to run over and destroy it again, and then again!

Still, Ose remained optimistic. She wasn't winded at all, and she estimated she could keep this up even if he started reviving the instant she punched him. A Demon Emperor's endurance was tens of thousands of times greater than any human, so she knew she wasn't far off the mark.

Suddenly, Ose punched at Satan's splattered blood and bones, but in the time it took her fist to snap out, an arm made of bone and bloody muscles erupted from the wall, reached out, and grabbed her wrist.

"Huh?!" Ose yelped.

She tried to yank her arm out of the skeletal hand's grasp, but she was shocked to find that its grip was harder than demonstone! She couldn't believe how powerful it felt! Her own strength was nothing by comparison.

An instant later, the arm regrew its muscle, tendons, and skin. The rest of Satan's body followed, and he reappeared with an ugly grimace on his face.

"So that's how it's gonna be, eh, toots?"

The First Emperor was completely naked. He had a fat beer belly, but he also had extremely toned muscles on his arms and legs. He gripped Ose's wrist so tightly that her joints started to hurt.

"What the hell?" Ose said, his mind in a small bit of disarray. "You're not this strong!"

"Correct." Satan said, his grimace turning to a grin. "Usually, I ain't."

He thrust his palm at Ose's chest and released her arm the instant he made contact.

THUMP!!

All the wind was driven from Ose's body as that single palm strike crashed into her rib-cage and sent her flying! Ose pounded against the wall just a few feet behind her. Her arms and legs splayed out helplessly, leaving a deep indentation in the wall and rumbling the local continental plates.

"Ya know." Satan said. "It hurts dyin' that many times. It really pisses me off."

Ose coughed. She slumped from the wall and fell to the ground, momentary paralyzed from pain. She shakily raised her head to see that Satan had conjured himself a brand new suit to cover his body.

"Nuh... not... possible..." Ose coughed, blood spewing from her ruptured lungs. "You... not... that strong... kuh!"

"For a broad who thinks she's the smartest person on Earth, you sure are as dumb as a bag of bricks." Satan said, looming over her. "You think my only power is to revive? If that were it, I wouldn't have risen to become the First Emperor. I've got a little more than that goin' on, doll."

Ose suddenly lashed out. She launched a powerful thunder-punch at Satan's face, roaring with rage at the fact he had somehow tricked her.

But her fist didn't land. Satan casually slapped with his palm, redirected the punch, and battered her arm against the wall.

"Aaargh!" Ose cried. Her right arm broke in multiple places, rendering it completely useless!

"I don't need the contracts, Ose." Satan said, his eyes dim with barely-contained anger. "I use 'em cause they make life easier. Because if all the other demons know I'm always watching, they won't try to pull any shit that would piss me off. But those contracts ain't a necessity. I can do just fine without 'em."

He grabbed Ose by the hair, and his Vectors lashed out, grabbed each of her limbs, and pinned her to the ground.

Satan forced her head up. He snarled in her ear.

"Listen carefully, ya dumb bitch. I was gonna let ya do things the easy way. The fun way. If you'd asked me nicely, I would've let ya have all the money and funding ya wanted. But you got greedy. So Mister Nice Satan? He's gone now. This is the real Satan talking now."

One of Satan's Vectors squeezed Ose's broken arm. She let out a helpless cry of pain, while tears poured from her eyes. Even with all her mental speed and acuity, she still couldn't believe how fast the situation had turned around. She'd planned this coup for years! She'd thought about every detail! How could she have overlooked one of Satan's core abilities?!

"From now on, your ass is mine. If I tell you to do somethin', you do it. It even overrides that quadruple-titted bitch of a demoness you call 'mom.' Any back-talkin', any thoughts about takin' over, or causing my empire problems, and I'll be payin' you a visit. Only this next visit won't end as nicely as it does here. You'll be dead afterward, and I'll just find some other demon who knows how to play the game right and proper. GOT IT?!"

Satan squeezed her hair so hard that Ose thought he might rip it from her scalp. She winced in pain and whimpered quietly.

"Y...yes... Satan... s-sorry... won't... happen again..."

Satan glared at her for several seconds afterward. Then, he let go.

All at once, his Vectors loosed their hold on her limbs, and he even released his grip on her hair. He allowed Ose to curl up on the floor, whimpering in pain as her entire body ached from head to toe. His Vectors had not been gentle with their touch.

"Good." Satan said solemnly. "Now, let me tell you where ya went wrong. My power ain't just to revive, and it ain't only to devour a soul when I do. I become progressively stronger each time I die. The power boost ain't permanent. I'll be back to having a weak little body soon enough."

Satan chuckled evilly. "But that don't matter, now does it? If you don't kill me, I'll hit you with my arsenal of powers. If you do kill me, I'll eventually return and overpower you. Your momma must not have told you. That's why she doesn't dare go up against me. I might not be invincible, but I'm definitely undefeatable."

Ose shakily looked up at Satan with fear in her eyes. She never imagined he had such an ability. If she had, she would have stayed quiet and kept to herself! But now, she'd alerted the First Emperor to her true ambitions.

Or perhaps she hadn't. What if he'd known from the very beginning? What if he'd at least suspected she'd try to assassinate him... but he didn't even care?!

That thought left her in a cold sweat. She had a chance before to prove her allegiance to him, and she'd sabotaged it. Now he knew more about her inner thoughts than she wanted, and her ploy had completely backfired.

Ose's face slumped to the ground. She stared ahead vacantly, no longer sure of what she should do.

Satan, seeing that her spirit had been broken, finally eased up. "Aw, come on, girly. Don't be like that. I was young and dumb once, too. Nothin' wrong with having some ambition, eh? No reason to throw the imp out with the bathwater. You just gotta do better in the future and not piss me off. Plenty of other demons screwed up big like you, but they learned their lesson. Bent the knee. Now we ain't got no problems anymore. We're cool as ice."

Ose slowly nodded. She had never felt as humiliated during her entire life as at this very moment. Slowly, she pulled herself to a sitting position and pressed her back against the wall. Her arm roared with pain, but she disabled her neurological transmitters so she wouldn't be distracted. Then, she took a long, slow breath.

"You... did you know? From the beginning?" Ose asked.

"What? That you'd betray me? I mean, there's always a risk when other Emperors are involved." Satan said, stuffing his hands into his pockets and shrugging nonchalantly. "You ain't the first dumb bitch to try, and you won't be the last, capisce?"

Ose's eyes dulled. He hadn't known, but he also hadn't cared. She might be intelligent when it came to some matters, but Satan was far older than her. He knew how other Sentients thought. He understood the hearts and minds of his lessers. He knew how to control them, and he was always prepared for things to go sideways.

She had a long way to go.

"So... what now?" Ose asked glumly.

Satan cocked an eyebrow. "Well, first things first, I busted that arm up pretty good. Go see if Hellga has a spot in the Blood Pits. She'll get you all fixed up."

"No need." Ose said quietly. "I already have a healing device of my own."

"Ohoho? Miss fancy-pants is gonna heal herself? Well, don't let me keep you waitin', sister." Satan said, before turning and walking away. "You get right on that."

He took a few steps, then paused.

"By the way, what was all that stuff about building a better future for demons? You got some sort of plan?"

Ose flinched. "You... heard?"

"Nope. I was dead when you said it." Satan said, turning to look at her. "But the demons you killed with your little stunt earlier, well, their souls went in me, and they tattled on you. So I know the gist of what you were yapping about."

Ose glowered at him. "It doesn't matter anymore."

"Sure it does. What, you think I'm petty? You think I don't have demonkind's greater interests at heart?" Satan asked pointedly. "Tell you what. After you get your arm fixed up... sit down for a while and think about what it is you want. What you really want. None of that self-serving bullshit. Then, I want you to write up some plans for the future. Draft 'em for me, then pay me a visit. I'll have a look and see what I can do."

Ose continued to stare at him. "Don't toy with me."

"I'm one hundred percent serious." Satan said, his voice solemn. "It's just you and me here, toots. Nobody else watchin'. I could parade you back into those Blood Pits, make a mockery of you like you did to me. Trample on your dignity. All that crap. But what would that do to benefit demonkind? Nothing."

Satan spread out his arms.

"You can keep treating me like an obstacle. Like a barrier to achieving your goals. Or, you can try working with me. Who knows? Maybe I'll surprise you."

Ose's anger softened, even if only a little. Satan could tell that he had beaten her so badly her pride had been injured more than her body ever was. But, he was making headway. His words were having some impact.

Ose remained quiet for a few seconds. She looked away from him, at the far wall. Then she held up her good arm, touched her forehead, and condensed some electrical energy onto her pointer finger.

"Take this." Ose said quietly.

She pointed her finger at Satan. He didn't tense up even in the slightest as an incredibly weak 'attack' fired at his forehead. It harmlessly struck his skull, then faded away. For a few moments, Satan remained silent. Then, his expression darkened.

"This... you're sure?" Satan asked, narrowing his eyes.

"No I'm not. It's just a working theory." Ose said quietly, looking away. "I'll let you draw your own conclusions. He's not what he seems. Don't be fooled."

Satan looked to the right, then the left, as if searching for something. It seemed as if he'd become aware of a Truth that was hiding in plain sight before.

"I'll be... more careful about what I say in the future." Satan said cryptically. "Looks like I was right to keep you around. Take care of yourself, Ose."

Just as he was about to leave, Satan instead smirked at her.

"Or should I say... Emperor of Fusion?"

Ose met his gaze. She smirked back at him.

"I like that title." She said. "I like it a lot."

Then, Satan left. Ose picked herself up, cradled her broken arm, and followed after him.

Things had not gone according to her original plan. She had suffered a humiliating defeat. She had been put in her place.

But then again… maybe it was better this way.

Part 640: Peasants! Mere Peasants!

January 25th, 2021. Time Unknown. Location Unknown.

A young man screamed in pain. His body seized up, and he lay on his bed for several seconds, writhing in agony. Then, after the pain wore off, he breathed heavily, swallowed hard, and gritted his teeth.

"Implant! Gaaahhh!!! Fffffuck! FUCK!"

Jason Hiro clutched the side of his head. Madam Mildred stood beside the bed, watching him closely while holding onto a strange spiritual 'wire' tethered to his Mind Realm. She monitored the progress of his MindCore's construction while nodding to herself every so often.

"Ninety-five percent complete. Hang in just a while longer, dear boy."

Tears streamed from Jason's eyes. His pillow had long ago been soaked through from his unstoppable sobs of pain. Never had he suffered such horrors in all his life. It was as if he were not only allowing someone else to stab his brain with knives, but being forced to encourage them to stab him even faster.

"Hurts... hurts so much!" Jason exclaimed for perhaps the hundredth time. "No! Why does it hurt this much? Why? Why???"

"You know why. Stop delaying." Mildred said. "The more you drag this out, the longer your suffering will last. We can't stop once we've begun. Now hurry up!"

Jason remained silent for several seconds. His father stood on the opposite side of the bed, his palms crossed in front of his waist. Hideki's role was simple. As the only corporeal entity in this time-accelerated realm, he had to make sure Jason didn't thrash around and fall off the bed, injuring himself severely. Other than that, all he could do was wait and watch.

Even when he wasn't actively Wordsmithing to complete the next step of his Mind Realm's upgrade, Jason's torture continued. It never stopped. Until the GenesisFrame was completed, his mind would be in a permanent state of cyber-psychosis, leaving him totally vulnerable to enemy attack. He wouldn't be able to think properly, and would be at the mercy of anyone who held ill intentions.

Mildred transmitted another data pulse into Jason's Mind Realm. "Next, the Quantum Transistors."

Her voice held no playfulness. She took this assignment as seriously as anyone ever could. Mildred might be a bit of a jovial lady, but she did not want to be responsible for the mental collapse of humanity's mightiest Trueborn. Jason's survival was paramount. He had already endured ten time-accelerated days of sleeplessness. Now, he was in the final hours of completing his MindCore.

Jason trembled. He squeezed his eyes shut, hazily envisioning the blueprints Mildred sent his way. Then he spoke through his teeth.

"F...FORM!"

Inside his Mind Realm, a supercomputer unlike any other existed in a state between corporeal and incorporeal. Tens of millions of 'cables' traveled in any number of directions, traversing between the imaginary realm of his Mind, and the physical realm of his Brain. They plugged into specific neurons inside his brain, allowing for the perfect and efficient transfer of information between the physical and metaphysical universe.

At once, the GenesisFrame momentarily became corporeal as tens of thousands of nearly invisible transistors trapped between quantum states appeared all throughout its mainframe. Then, it turned ghostly again, and pulses of mana fired into Jason's brain, making him scream in pain once more.

"Aaaargh! Ah-ah-ahhhh! No more! No! No more!!"

"Just hold on!" Hideki shouted, encouraging his son. "You're so close, Jason! So close!"

"Ninety-five percent!" Mildred repeated. "You've made it this far! Don't die on me now, dear boy!"

Mildred chewed her lip. She looked at Hideki, but he didn't meet her gaze.

Has Cat Mask rewound time at all? Mildred stealthily wondered. Perhaps the procedure failed and this is the second time? The third? Maybe the hundredth? Or it might even be the first. I don't know if it will work or not, but I must have faith!

In truth, the GenesisFrame was far more complex than Jason's old mental supercomputer. That one, designed by his wife, had been upgraded piecemeal over the years. Fiona was a genius, but she was no Mildred. She designed it like a plug-and-play computer system, adding more capacity, storage space, memory speed, and other enhancements over a long period of time. The final product was definitely superior to Jason's physical brain, but in theory, it wasn't one percent as fearsome as Mildred's MindCore. Hers was designed to work together in perfect harmony, without any bottlenecks, each piece of the machine as focused and enhanced as it could ever possibly be. The only way she could improve it further was if she were to tap into the brain or brains of several high ranking Volgrim Technopaths.

Perhaps with their deep understanding of technology, Mildred might be able to upgrade Jason's GenesisFrame a thousand times beyond the design she had currently envisioned.

But that was only a possibility for a tentative future. Mildred refocused her thoughts and efforts on the subject at hand.

"Next data-burst." Mildred said authoritatively, transmitting the next step of the GenesisFrame's construction to Jason. "Focus! Bear with the pain! Remember your wife!"

Jason nodded weakly. He felt as if he had lost all the blood in his body. His bones seemed to have lost ninety percent of their density. Even the simple act of breathing made him want to die.

"Phoe...be..." Jason whimpered.

Five more hours passed.

"This is it!" Mildred exclaimed, her voice raising an octave. "The final step! We're almost there, Jason! Now... do it! Complete the device!"

Jason lay unmoving on the bed. His consciousness wavered in and out of reality. The world around him... seemed so distant.

None of this was worth it.

He just... wanted... to go to sleep.

Sleep.

He could see Phoebe again. In the next life.

They could be together once more.

Jason's eyes began to close.

His eyelids felt... so heavy...

"Son." Hideki said, leaning forward. The man's expression was as dark as the night. "Don't give up. You'll do it this time. Come on."

He gently touched Jason's face. The Wordsmith... didn't respond.

Cat Mask closed his eyes.

"Another failure."

Mildred's heart jumped. What did he mean by-

"No..." Jason said, his voice barely audible. "Can't... give... up..."

His cloudy eyes regained the tiniest hint of light. He coughed, and blood spilled from his mouth. "Must... finish... must... must..."

Cat Mask leaned forward. His body vibrated for a moment, then he brought his face within inches of his son.

"One last push, kid. Come on. For Daisy. For your little girl."

Jason closed his eyes. He swallowed a shallow breath...

Then his body stiffened.

"Man...if... manif... MANIFEST!"

A faint light sparked within his Mind Realm. A massive burst of data shot out of the wire Mildred was holding on to, electrocuting her spirit and making her shriek in pain. She quickly dropped the spiritual anchor and looked at the Wordsmith with shining eyes.

"It's done?!" She asked.

Jason lay there, unmoving. But his breathing became less labored. His body shook, not with pain, but with the feeling of exhaustion.

His Mind Realm became reinvigorated. His GenesisFrame fully manifested into reality.

The procedure was a success!

Jason didn't celebrate. He didn't even seem aware of what had happened. Instead, he fell fast asleep, the exhaustion of a ten day procedure completely swallowing his mind.

Hideki continued to stare at his son's face from a few inches away. Then, he smiled and stood up.

"It worked." Hideki said, more to himself than anyone else.

Mildred looked at Hideki. This time, he met her gaze.

"How... how many times did we perform the procedure?" Mildred asked, a lump in her throat.

Hideki remained quiet for a moment.

"Just once." He lied.

Jason slept for two days. He awoke slowly, his body still weak with exhaustion, and a fever burning his forehead. His skull seemed molten, like it was trying to contain a volcano. His vision blurred, and what faint hazy figures he could make out seemed so very, very distant. Voices crept into his ears. He blearily felt that this moment was eerily similar to so many times in the past when he had suffered horrible concussions.

He pulled himself to a sitting position, then stared ahead in a daze.

The Wordsmith couldn't quite... couldn't... couldn't remember... what was he doing? Who was he? Where was he?

His mind whirred into action.

Jason Hiro. Wordsmith. Ability to manifest Words of Power into reality. Current location: Secret time accelerated realm. Current realspace date and time: January 25th, 5:46 PM assuming West Coast USA time zone.

He nodded, the motion making his head swim with delirium. "Ohhh... thass... hellfull..."

After thinking for a moment, Jason asked himself another question.

[I feel like shit. How do I... not? Feel like shit.]

Analysis of current condition. Suffering from pain-induced psychosis. Severe delirium as a result of newly installed hardware attached to cerebellum. Incorrect attachment points are creating a negative feedback loop. Suggestion: Realignment via Word of Power. New attachment points suggested here, here, and here.

[Oh. So it's like that.]

"Realign." Jason said.

Inside his brain, something unseen by the outside world changed. Jason's vision sharpened, and the world around him came into focus. Just like that, his fever dropped, and his thinking realigned.

"Hm? You Wordsmithed?" Mildred asked, still standing next to him. "I'm glad to see you awake, dear boy. You weren't responding to anything I said."

Jason looked at her. His eyes were sharper than before.

"Sorry, Mildred." Jason said. "It seemed to be a cerebral misalignment with the polymolecule cables. They were attached to the incorrect dendrites, causing me to suffer a severe fever that likely would have- what? Why are you looking at me like that?"

Mildred gaped at the young man, then quickly closed her mouth. "I... I just... amazing! Ho-ho-ho! It really worked, young Wordsmith! This beauty is truly a genius! My inventions are unparalleled!"

Jason nodded. He suddenly recalled what he'd just said.

"Whoa. I don't usually talk like that. I feel like my vocabulary has increased substantially."

Another Hero walked into the room.

"Good to see you awake, child." Jepthath said, crossing his arms. The spiritual ancestor nodded as he assessed Jason's condition. "You gave us several scares, but it seems you pulled through. How are you feeling?"

Jason started to answer, but for some reason, he felt his attention being drawn to a bedside table on his right. He kept looking at it and frowning.

"Something the matter?" Jepthath asked.

"I don't know." Jason said, swinging his legs over the side of the bed while looking at the table more intently. "I Wordsmithed this? It's so... ugly."

Jepthath blinked. He didn't really understand how the topic of discussion had landed on, of all things, a bedside table.

"Don't you think we should talk about more pressing issues?" Jepthath asked. He looked at Mildred, but she seemed just as perplexed by Jason's behavior. She shrugged at her fellow ancestor.

"It's just... man, this thing is so ugly. So sloppy." Jason grumbled. "It looks completely artificial and fake. When I made it, I clearly didn't put any effort into aesthetics. I simply Wordsmithed the simplest and most basic-looking bedside table that came to mind. It's a square! Doesn't even have any flared edges on top, the legs are mere stumps sticking out of the bottom, and it's all one piece. No real carpenter would craft something this ugly. They'd assemble it using multiple hand-made pieces, gluing them, nailing them, pressing them together. Doesn't it just disgust you to look at?"

Jason looked at his ancestors for validation, but they gave him looks of confusion in response.

"...Again, this hardly seems important." Jepthath said slowly.

"Well, it's important to me." Jason muttered, turning back to the table. "One moment."

Instantly, Jason analyzed the table's structure. Dozens of nails, wooden slabs, internal drawer frames, and even a stained and patterned surface materialized in his head. As if drawing a three-dimensional blueprint with just his mind, he crafted a completely new bedside table vastly different and much more artisanal than the one before him. Then, he squinted and looked at the existing one.

"Replace."

The small table blurred in place. A faint aura of white light covered its appearance, then thousands of individual pieces materialized in reality, rapidly colliding together and assembling a brand new bedside table in the same spot as before. To Jepthath and Mildred, it almost looked as if a horde of invisible carpenters were rebuilding the table piece by piece at superliminal speeds, drilling screws into place, applying glue, realigning individual components, until...

The new bedside table manifested in reality. Jason sat there for a moment looking at it, then he abruptly stood up, losing all interest in the beautiful new piece of carpentry he had just assembled.

"Thank god." Jason mumbled. "Way too ugly. Distractingly so. Anyway, what are we working on now?"

He was met with two ancestors, both trying to pull their jaws up from the floor.

"I... Jason, are you feeling alright, dear boy?" Mildred asked, after a few moments of hesitation. "You seem... very different from before..."

Jason scoffed. "What, you see a guy build a table and lose your minds? It's just a table. Come on, I've been missing out on developments in meatspace because of the operation."

He started to walk away, then paused and looked down at his white T-shirt and sweatpants. His expression turned ugly.

"God. What the hell am I wearing? So sloppy. One second..."

A moment later, Jason Wordsmithed again. "Clothes."

Instead of his signature T-shirt and jeans, which he had worn in various colors for years, Jason donned a noticeably snazzier long sleeved black shirt made of cashmere that also sported lines of gold trim traveling from the collar down the sleeves, along with some elastic jeans in a similar color pattern. His clothes weren't only more impressive looking, but they seemed to go extremely well with his physical build, and they also had armor woven into them. A bullet to the chest would ricochet right off the mysterious material compromising his new sweater.

"It'll do for now." Jason muttered to himself, still somewhat disgusted with his 'rudimentary' clothes. "Really going to need to put some thought into a new wardrobe later. Can't go walking around looking like a total dump now, can I?"

Mildred and Jepthath exchanged glances once more.

Jason was acting very different from before the operation. Mildred naturally assumed a cognitive boost would affect his personality... but to this extent? Even she was surprised.

Jason stepped into the main chamber, where his Spynet was running, his father sitting in front of the computer screens, sipping coffee. Every time Jason looked at any object, no matter how complex or benign, his expression shifted to one of pain and disgust, making it constantly look like hideous, naked invisible people were slapping him across the face one after the other.

"What the hell was wrong with me?" Jason grumbled to himself, as Mildred and Jepthath followed behind him, gradually growing accustomed to his verbal outbursts. "This shit is so ass. Why did I make these monitors so low-resolution? I can do better than that. And the optimization of camera placements? Abysmal. The angles are all wrong. Oh, hey dad."

Hideki turned away from the monitors to look at his son. "Good morning, Jason. Huh. Nice clothes."

Jason grimaced. "Don't. Just don't. They're barely passable for now. I'm already feeling rather wretched just wearing them."

Hideki blinked. "Okay. Want to hear what happened while you were asleep?"

Jason nodded. "I'm all ears."

Hideki changed one of the monitors and started telling Jason about Ose's ascension to Emperor. Jason frowned, making Hideki think he didn't like this news. Actually, it turned out Jason truly detested looking at that imperfect and ugly monitor. It was just so inefficient. The energy waste alone! Why did he copy crappy 21st century monitors when he could steal and improve on Volgrim tech? Was his previous self stupid?

"Yeah, yeah, Ose's an Emperor now." Jason said, holding up his hand to stop his father mid-sentence. "Hold on, just a sec. I can't stand these ugly fucking computer monitors, not for a second longer. I mean seriously? Sixty hertz? What kind of refresh speed is that anyway? Are these monitors for peasants??"

Inside Jason's mind, a blueprint of the original monitors appeared. A phantasmal version of Jason appeared before that blueprint, and began ripping it apart and putting it back together at blinding speeds. New components rapidly disassembled and reassembled. Transistors and circuit boards drastically improved. Jason even casually started uttering Words of Power midway through, peeking out across the vastness of space to look at the distant world of Volgarius. He stole a few thousand other designs for new monitors, took a look at them, grimaced as if he were about to vomit, and made casual modifications to unify them all together.

After that, Jason looked at the array of Spynet monitors, then spoke a Word of Power. "Rebuild."

Within twenty real-time seconds, every monitor disassembled and reassembled itself. Ethereal components manifested into reality. Hideki watched with marveling eyes as the entire Spynet visual component became whole again, reflecting the same images as before. Only, now...!

Hideki squinted. "Err... did anything change?"

"What do you mean?" Jason asked, narrowing his eyes. "Can't you see the difference? Look at the fidelity! I cut the power draw by 99.9%! I created several new exotic alloys just to reduce power consumption alone, and then I increased the resolution from 1080p to a number that human marketing conventions can't capture. On top of that, the displays now refresh over a million times per second! We can monitor the galaxy with a level of quality even eagle eyes couldn't match!"

Cat Mask nodded slowly. "Oh, alright. That's really neat, son."

"Can you SERIOUSLY not see the difference?!" Jason roared. "It's so obvious! What are you, a peasant?!"

Hideki looked at his son, then shrugged. "I don't know. It all looks the same to me. But if you're happy, I'm happy."

"Oh my god..." Jason muttered, his expression turning downcast. He seemed to age five years in an instant. He turned away, his face an amalgamation of horror. "This... is this how Ose feels, every moment of every day? Doomed for nobody to appreciate the perfection of her designs?!"

Mildred inhaled softly. She gently facepalmed.

"Oh, my dear boy. We are going to need to have a long, hard talk about your new capabilities."

Part 641: The Curse of Intellect

January 25th, 2021. Time Unknown. Location Unknown.

At Mildred's request, Jason eventually sat down, but not before completely rebuilding the chair he was about to sit in, cleaning up its appearance in seconds and making it more aesthetically pleasing and ergonomically comfortable. After that, he settled in and turned a distracted gaze toward her.

"Well?" Jason asked impatiently. "What's the matter?"

"Jason." Mildred explained patiently. "Right now, you are experiencing extreme stress due to the cognitive boosts provided by your GenesisFrame. I need you to try and calm down, dear boy. Relax for a moment. Close your eyes. Take a long, deep breath."

Jason frowned. "Huh? Why even bother? I'm fine. There's just SO many problems to fix! I'm surrounded by reminders of my former laziness! It's impossible to focus!"

Mildred held up her palm. "I know some of the problems of which you speak. When you are able to look at the world around you with a critical eye, you can be overcome with feelings of hatred, disgust, and eventually despondency. This is the curse of intelligence. It plagues many great minds, and now it is plaguing you. The difference is, entities like myself, Solomon, Raphael, and Ose all gradually gained intellect over time and adapted to it. You have amassed too much, too quickly. It is overloading your emotional centers."

Jason fidgeted in his seat. He kept looking around the room, scowling nonstop while also trying to listen to what she was saying, albeit without a great deal of success. "Right, right... emotional centers... uh huh... look, can this wait? I need to-"

"JASON!" Mildred barked, making him flinch in his seat. "Pay attention!"

The Wordsmith looked at her in shock. "What? WHAT? Why are you yelling?! Calm down!"

Despite his surprise, Mildred's gambit succeeded. She managed to fully bring all his attention onto her.

"Listen carefully, dear boy." Mildred explained succintly. Your GenesisFrame is a powerful machine. It is currently tuned to its highest sensitivity, overloading your mind with stimuli. You need to drastically dial down its settings, only increasing them over time. Do you understand?"

Jason finally listened. He slowly nodded, then thought for a moment. "I didn't realize I could do that. Hmm. One moment..."

It only took a single second, and Jason was able to adjust the power consumption and load on his cerebral cortex. Just like that, the tension in his body immediately alleviated a great deal, albeit not completely. He looked around the room, still noticed some of the imperfections around himself, but paid less attention to them.

"That was... a miserable experience." Jason muttered.

"A child raised in the jungle their whole life would have a similar reaction to suddenly being placed in a crowded subway with thousands of people speaking at once." Mildred explained. "Too much stimuli can be extremely dangerous for one who has not acclimated to lesser levels properly. That being said, we can confirm your GenesisFrame is functioning properly. Your cognitive speed and thought quality has improved drastically."

Jason nodded. "This feels like an upgrade over my old MindCore in every way. It seems like I can do anything I put my mind to, now."

He looked thoughtful for a moment, but Mildred interrupted his internal dialogue with a dose of reality.

"Unfortunately, dear boy, that is not the case. If you attempt to use your powers of prediction like you did before, your GenesisFrame will certainly perform better than a baseline brain, but it will not compare to your original MindCore."

She continued to explain. "Your GenesisFrame is tightly focused on inventions, creativity, construction, deconstruction, and other things related to physical and metaphysical phenomena. It is not particularly suited for battle, nor for reading the emotional states of other Sentients. Naturally, it is still superior to any baseline human's brain. You are definitely going to feel and act more intelligently than before. But compared to a proper MindCore focused on other such things, it will not beat them in their specialization."

Jason sat silently for a minute or two. He thought to himself about a great many things, then slowly massaged his ear between his fingers.

"I think... you're underestimating what this particular MindCore can do." Jason said slowly. "I don't have the constraints other people do. They would not only need to visualize and think about inventing something, but then actually build it with their own two hands."

He looked at Mildred with a serious gaze. "I can visualize something, then create it nearly instantly with my Wordsmithing. There are limitations, of course... but I can essentially make use of the GenesisFrame's full capabilities at 99% efficiency."

To emphasize his point, Jason closed his eyes. With a single mental command, he reactivated the GenesisFrame at full power. His mind started to tingle, but he ignored all the abrupt, forced thoughts about things that should be annoying him in his environment, then turned his attention to a singular concept.

In a flash, a sword began to appear inside his Mind Realm. It started off simple. A basic handle, hilt, and blade. After that, the blade became thinner. Its weight balance shifted, and the handle also changed as he began altering its material composition.

Rapid-fire, Jason started trying out different quantities of iron, steel, titanium, tungsten, and many other common alloys. Then, with his knowledge of different sorts of Wordsmithium, he altered the blade again, and again, and again.

Unlike with the chairs, table, or computer monitors, this mental project did not take only a few seconds to complete. Instead, a minute dragged on. Then two minutes. Five...

Time accelerated inside his Mind Realm. Jason became frustrated and stymied as he tried adjusting parts of this new sword, only to repeatedly come up short due to his lack of knowledge in blacksmithing, metallurgy, and other such topics.

He opened his eyes. He stood up and frowned.

"Hm. Not quite right." Jason said, turning the GenesisFrame's settings back down to a low-power mode. He met Mildred's gaze. "I'm lacking in knowledge."

"As I expected." Mildred immediately retorted. "You cannot create new paradigms until your existing knowledge-base has been shored up. Simply put, you need to do some reading, child! Reading, study, perhaps even attending college or university."

Jason looked displeased. "I don't have time for that."

"Time waits for no man," Mildred acknowledged, "but studying essential concepts will empower your GenesisFrame tremendously."

Jason thought for a minute. He wandered around the Spynet, thinking to himself while occasionally glancing at the monitors.

"...Nah." Jason finally concluded, waving his hand. "Studying will take way too long. I have a better way."

Jason once again reactivated his GenesisFrame at full capacity. He closed his eyes so the outside world wouldn't distract him, then he focused on thinking about Wordsmithing.

Before long, a hazy idea became reality. An invisible bodysuit appeared in front of his mental-self. The false Jason rapidly traveled around it, his arms and hands moving at lightning fast speeds as he cut, trimmed, and manipulated the suit to add microtechnology and magical artifacts to it.

After five minutes of concentrated thinking time, the suit was completed. Jason wasted no time in uttering a Word of Power.

"Materialize. Shape. Form."

Mildred narrowed her eyes. She perceived... something that appeared in midair for a split second, before silently falling to the ground. Her existence as a spiritual life-form made her more sensitive to such phenomena, but she could not actually see what Jason had just made.

Jason looked at the ground, his eyes fixating on seemingly nothing. "Wear."

An instant later... Jason disappeared!

One second, he was standing before Mildred.

The next, he completely vanished, as if he had teleported away!

Mildred widened her eyes. She squinted, feeling that Jason was... still in the same spot... perhaps. But she wasn't entirely certain...

Then, Jason's face seemingly poked out of a hole in the air. The rest of his body was completely hidden, but his face was somehow visible.

"It's a new type of stealth suit." Jason explained. "It has all sorts of magical technology built into it. My ability to create weapons and armor is subpar, but magical-based technology isn't too difficult. This stealth suit should allow me to move around, undisturbed."

Mildred looked at him with wonder in her eyes. She couldn't believe how amazing this single item was... and he had made it with only a few minutes of thought! What other incredible feats could he achieve in the future once his GenesisFrame had matured and he'd grown even better at using its capabilities?

"What do you need a stealth suit for?" Mildred eventually asked. "Don't tell me you're going to try assassinating demons already?!"

"No, definitely not." Jason replied, his face still bobbing up and down oddly in the air. "Right now, I have a critical lack of knowledge. I need to remedy this issue at once. I'm going to infiltrate several key facilities around the world as quietly as possible. This suit is equipped with technology and magic-foiling stealth systems. It should perform excellently at obfuscating my movements."

Mildred nodded, but she seemed unconvinced. "I can pass you my knowledge, dear boy. It's not too difficult. I have a wealth of information at my disposal I've collected over the years! Sadly, I am nowhere near as adept as Solomon. His information and intelligence reserves greatly dwarf mine."

"Yeah, I don't doubt the Knowledge-Thief who scares the Volgrim shitless has more information than you." Jason remarked idly. "I'll be back in a bit."

Jason's face disappeared as he retreated into his stealth suit. A moment later, he entirely vanished from the spot.

Inside the United States Library of Congress, an invisible specter teleported into a quiet corner of one of the interior rooms. It started slowly walking around, using magic to mass-read and swallow entire shelves of books in seconds.

This specter was none other than Jason. Using Words of Power, he downloaded millions of words every minute, starting from the local history section and quickly working his way outward.

It took him time to do this, time he'd rather not waste. But it was necessary. His GenesisFrame was not like Solomon's Crown; it did not have unlimited storage capacity. But even a trillion books wouldn't take up that much of its room. Only extremely complicated audiovisual works, such as music, movies, and the life memories of other Sentients would rapidly fill up its capacity.

Even so, Jason already had an idea of how to fix this problem.

External data storage!

He could easily copy important things worth keeping into a massive data cluster hidden somewhere in the Milky Way. It could be in Realspace, or it could be hidden inside a folded dimension. Either way, he could shove essentially an infinite amount of information there, only connecting to it when he needed its contents for a new project.

This was not a quick project, but a long-term one. All he was doing today was rapidly collecting most of human civilization's core information. Later, he would use it for his own purposes. Eventually, he could transform humanity's collective knowledge into a cudgel to beat the demons into submission!

If they didn't submit, they would die.

Jason's heart no longer held any compassion for other species. He had lost everything he valued. No longer would he take risks with the lives of his loved ones.

He flitted from room to room, taking to the air to silently levitate above the thousands of daily visitors the Library of Congress received. A lot of them were lawyers and judges, but there were also reporters, ordinary citizens, and tourists too. This time of year, it was rather cold outside, so people entered to warm themselves, but during the summer foot traffic would easily quintuple.

Jason was lucky that he could come here while so few people were around.

As he devoured the contents of a shelf of books regarding historical blacksmithing practices, a television in the corner played a news broadcast.

"President Johannesburg's agenda is considered controversial by his critics, but he continues to press on with his Ecuadorian Eclipse Act, insisting it will bring jobs back to the United States. After the failed policies of his predecessor, President Johannesburg has a lot to prove. Thanks to excellent strategies employed by his campaign staff, he's swept the House of Representatives, holding a forty-seat majority, but unfortunately he lost the Senate by two seats. Only time will tell if this ends up obstructing him from realizing his vision of the American Dream."

Jason glanced at the monitor. He had long forgotten about the politics of this era after living for hundreds of years in the future. And when he was a kid, worrying about politics was the last thing on his mind.

Even so, he knew that a time would come, sooner rather than later, where he had to meet with the so-called leader of the free world.

This prospect would have been extremely intimidating, even outright terrifying to the version of himself who had only left the Cryopod for a few years. He was younger and far less experienced back then.

But these days?

Eh.

What was meeting a 'President' compared to meeting the true leader of the Milky Way, a multi-million year old monster named Unarin?

In Jason's eyes, the President was a mere mortal. He held some political power, but it paled in comparison to Jason's hard powers of magic.

Jason paused his book-collecting to think for a few moments. With his accelerated brainpower, this was like taking an hour to ponder the matter ever so casually at a coffee shop.

Was the president a mere mortal? What did the demons think about him? Did they fear him? Laugh at him? Find him annoying but nothing to worry about? He commanded the strongest human military in the world, so he couldn't be nothing.

And then again, Jason quickly realized he had no real knowledge of what humanity's military capabilities truly were. What if they were much stronger than they seemed on the surface? What if the humans possessed weapons and technology that could make a Demon Emperor pause? That meant it could threaten the Wordsmith as well.

Interlocking pieces of a puzzle slowly snapped together in Jason's mind. Unfortunately, despite his incredible new brainpower, he realized that Mildred was right. He was no longer as effective at deductive reasoning as before. He had respecialized into an inventor, someone who could create blueprints for his Wordsmithing to bounce off. When it came to investigating conspiracies, he was rather... subpar.

I'm still faster than a normal human, and my baseline self, but it's nothing too amazing. Jason thought. Right now, I'm setting up my plans, but the existing humans, the demons, angels, and Titans have had thousands of years to build their own infrastructure while I'm starting from scratch. I can borrow the manpower of the Illuminati, but they're small potatoes compared to the US military.

Jason watched as the broadcast turned to a story about flooding in Indonesia. His vision wavered as the faces of injured children, sick mothers and fathers, and broken families reached his eyes.

So much suffering. So much pain. Jason thought. What am I really doing all this for? Just to dominate and control? No. That cannot be the only reason. Phoebe would hate me if she knew I had turned into a tyrant. I need a more noble cause to focus my intent. Uplifting humanity so we can defeat the demons, overthrow the Volgrim, and humble the angels is merely one piece of the puzzle. All that would happen is my species swapping from the oppressed to the oppressors.

We need to become better than we are now.

Jason turned his eyes toward the windows outside, where he could peek at a small slice of Washington DC. There were a couple of girls sitting on a bench, sipping cocoa and talking about their day.

Inside the library, a young man was studying the history of Robert E. Lee for an upcoming college assignment. His brow knitted together in frustration as the dense and boring historical information bogged down by overly gratuitous and flowery wording struggled to burrow into his brain.

A professor of anthropology grumbled to himself about the kids these days while sipping an iced mocha latte. His mustache became wet with the liquid as it slipped between the gaps in his facial hair to enter his mouth.

All these people were individuals living their own lives. It was far too easy for Jason to take a broad view of them, looking at them like cats that needed to be herded.

A debate raged inside Jason's mind. Were humans mostly good, with sociological and economic pressures pushing them to do bad things? Or were they mostly bad, only kept in line by the firm and guiding hands of higher authorities?

This was not an easy question to answer. It wasn't a mere philosophical thought, either. How he answered it would surely affect the way he looked at and treated his fellow humans. It would alter his plans for the future, and this could lead to a disaster in the future, causing even more pain and suffering to those he ultimately wished to protect.

Jason raised his head to look at the ceiling. The Library of Congress was the world's largest library, with tall rising pillars, stained glass windows with grandiose designs, and architecture that bled elegance everywhere he looked. It was a shining pillar of what humans could accomplish when they used their minds to create art in the form of architecture.

As he looked around himself at this impressive feat of human engineering, Jason felt that humanity... couldn't be all that bad.

It had tyrants. It had dictators. It had authoritarians who sought to force their will upon others.

But it had far more good people, working tirelessly for little to no gain only to make the Earth a better place. Ornithologists who studied endangered birds and worked to protect them from extinction. Oceanographers who pushed and lobbied for cleanup efforts to save the oceans from ecological collapse. Climatologists who mapped the planet's slowly increasing heat index as humans carelessly polluted it for short term gains.

The number of bad people were far outnumbered by the good. But the bad people held a monopoly on violence, using their power to suppress those less eager to jump to using such vile tactics. In this way, they had slowly wrapped their hands around the necks of their more peaceful peers.

Perhaps, in a different era, these tactics would be necessary. After all, it took great strength to hold back the demons, angels, and Titans.

But the Wordsmith was here, now. It might finally be time to upend the old paradigm and install a new one.

I can't just casually throw away all the 'bad' people right now. Jason thought. They still have some purpose for me. I need to put them in check. Make them learn who their new master is. Watch them to ensure they can't commit any future atrocities. After that? Who knows. As long as I resist becoming an even worse tyrant, I should be able to raise humanity's spirits to the apex.

Jason gazed at the ornate stained glass skylights. He couldn't see it, but in his mind's eye, he imagined being able to gaze upon the Volgrim ship currently orbiting Jupiter in absolute secrecy.

There is still so much yet to do. He mused.

With a shake of his head, he returned to devouring the books from before.

Time waited for no man.

Part 642: Collapsing Empire

AUTHOR'S NOTE: Attention readers. I wanted you guys to know that in the near future, I plan to go back through the TCTH serial and start marking the exact day each part takes place. After doing so for the Rewind timeline, I realized I should have been doing this all along. For now, I'm going to start using the term "After Jason's Rewind - AJR" but in the future, once I've actually gone through all the old parts, I'll be using the terms "After Cryopod's Exit - ACE" for keeping track of how many days/years the story progressed following Jason's departure, then I'll use a special term for the Ancient Era too (Maybe something like "After Dragon Empowerment - ADE") or whatever. For now, I'll stick with AJR starting with this part and let you guys know if/when I complete that re-read of TCTH, followed by the marking down of the timeline.

I may also use a specific term for the various timelines like Gold Timeline, Silver Timeline... maybe. But that could spoil new readers about the existence of time travel, which I don't want to do, so... we'll see about that.

Enjoy the return to TCTH!

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. Volgarius.

Founder Unarin stood inside the hangar of the Founder's Thumb, his toes mere inches from the edge of the outcropping that stuck out to allow small starships to land safely inside. He looked up at Volgarius's sky, the planet's wind whipping his head tendrils from side to side as a rather fierce gale buffeted his body. He paid it no mind. No breeze could move him, no matter how fierce, for he was indomitable.

Volgarius's dull, gray sky spoke to any who looked upon it; calling out the horrors of tens of millennia of decay. What was once a beautiful homeworld had slowly collapsed into a featureless blob of metal, glass, and duracrete. Stratoscrapers might look impressive when standing amidst a sea of smaller buildings, but once an entire planet had been covered in them, they lost their impressiveness and instead became a symbol of destruction. What was once a beautiful world had now become utterly featureless, any given square kilometer of its surface indistinguishable from the rest. All that remained of the Volgrim homeworld's former glory now resided at the Founder's Hand; the last patch of greenery remaining of its original soil.

Unarin's eyes narrowed slightly. His keen eyes picked out a tiny speck in the sky, one that approached at a speed that would alarm him if he didn't already know who it was. Within seconds, Executor Nufaris rushed toward the First Founder, an unconscious body held in his psionic grasp. That body was none other than Founder Dosena.

Nufaris instantly came to a stop right before colliding with the Founder's Thumb. He spun his legs downward and pressed his bare feet against the cold metal floor of the hangar, not feeling its frigid temperature in the slightest.

"Has her condition improved?" Unarin asked, as he walked over and pressed his palm against Dosena's forehead.

[I'm afraid not.] Nufaris replied.

The two men didn't exchange many words. Nufaris fell silent, allowing Unarin to close his eyes while continuing to rest his palm on Dosena's forehead.

Before long, he nodded slowly, then opened his eyes and removed his hand.

"I believe it need not be mentioned, but this is a terrible situation for our Empire, Nufaris." Unarin said, though his vocal tone didn't seem to contain even a hint of worry or urgency. "Dosena is our pillar of strength. Without her, we have no Middle Cosmic, while the demons now consist of many. Trapped they may be on their worlds, but far from useless. Through Demon Deity Yardrat, they already possess a means of projecting power across the galaxy. They are more than capable of rendering unto us extreme harm."

Nufaris knit his eyebrows together. "Your orders?"

Unarin did not immediately respond. He folded his hands together behind his back, then closed his eyes once more to ponder his future plans.

"This is a nexus point for the Volgrim Empire..." Unarin said slowly. "I sense... a potentially disastrous future awaiting us. But at the same time, a chance to reach heights we never have before. Dosena was close. She was so very, very close to reaching the 10th Level. She believed with all her soul that becoming a High Cosmic through pure psionics was possible. But this setback has ruined her prospects for potentially tens of millennia.

She has fallen all the way back to the beginning of the 9th Level. If her condition worsens, she may even fall to the rank of Executor."

Nufaris's expression hardened. This was not something he wanted to hear. Though he, like all Executors, envied the power of the Second Founder, he did not do so while wishing to usurp her power. A strong Dosena meant a strong Empire. He himself was ages away from reaching the 9th Level. He would not be able to replace her even if he tried. Neither did he want to. He had his own ambitions.

Unarin opened his eyes once again. He reached up and massaged his chin thoughtfully.

"It pains me to say so, but we are in a weak position. The Plague on all sides, the demons possessing more military power, the humans injured but having found a new ally in Demon Deity Melody as well as the fairies. They will lick their wounds and recuperate, providing us no threat for the moment... but this stalemate will not last forever. Whether it takes one day or one millennia, the humans will rise again. They have proven themselves to be like unkillable bugs. Even if we try to exterminate them, they will endure."

Nufaris nodded. [Therefore?]

"I do not yet have an answer." Unarin said. "I tend to think in long-term timescales. Too much has happened recently. It has thrown all my future plans into Chaos. I fear there is more going on behind the scenes than what we know. There are enemies in this game who have yet to play their cards."

Unarin held out his arms. Nufaris hesitated, then he levitated Dosena into the First Founder's grasp.

Unarin carried Dosena like a princess. He looked at Nufaris gravely. "Investigate the galactic situation, but stay at the homeworld. You are now our strongest protector. If something should occur, you are our last remaining bulwark."

Nufaris tilted his chin. [First Founder. There is one individual I fear you may have overlooked.]

Unarin blinked. "Who?"

Before Nufaris could respond, Unarin realized who he was referring to.

"You weren't able to recover her?"

[Demila remains at large. She betrayed the Empire.] Nufaris responded. [She might be a pitiful excuse for a Psion, but she is still an ancient monster capable of great destruction. I fear what might happen if we allow her to go into hiding.]

"If she merely hid herself away, I would not be so worried." Unarin said calmly. "There are much worse things she could do right now. If she has aligned herself with the demons, she might provide them with a treasure trove of knowledge about our internal workings."

[We need to execute her.] Nufaris said.

"Yes. Yes we do." Unarin said, before frowning slightly. "But the galaxy is a vast place. Where do you suppose she might go first?"

Nufaris appeared troubled. He looked away.

[I am... not certain. You are more familiar with Demila than I. I hoped you might have an idea of her machinations.]

Unarin lowered his eyes.

"I have always prided myself on seeing through the thoughts of lower beings. But Demila fooled me until the end. I only realized her betrayal was coming when it was already too late. I failed to prepare for her actions, and Dosena paid the price. At this point, I dare not guess at her movements lightly."

[Then we have no choice but to monitor the situation patiently.] Nufaris concluded. [We have already informed the rest of the Empire. If Demila is spotted, we will receive word immediately. I will be able to intercept and kill her.]

"No. Not you." Unarin retorted. "You are to stay here until Dosena has recuperated. We've already lost Sartran to Demon Deity Beelzebub. Our list of reliable allies grows thinner by the day. Dispatch two of the other Executors to hunt down and kill Demila. Use your discretion."

Nufaris bowed his head in respect.

[As you command, First Founder.]

Thousands of lightyears from Volgarius, in a secret location hidden somewhere in the Milky Way, the very Psion Nufaris and Unarin were just discussing levitated in the Void. She stared at a hideous world colored completely brown, one that looked like a ball of mud, with no noteworthy geographical features, and nothing about it that seemed out of the ordinary.

This world, 'Planet Mudball', as Jason had called it, was actually one of three extremely important Psion bases hidden within the Volgrim Empire. It housed billions, tens of billions, perhaps even trillions of Psion souls.

Its true name was Naandril II, the second of the three great Psion soul-housing worlds.

Demila hid within a gap between dimensions. She gazed at the world with a strange look in her eye.

[What are you waiting for?] A female voice hidden within Demila's soul asked. [This is what you desired. Reach out and take hold of your destiny, Demila.]

Demila hesitated. Her body trembled with a mixture of fear for future consequences, but also hunger and greed.

[You're... you're sure this will work?] Demila asked.

[Hahaha. The great Demila, a million years old, but always such a pitiful scared child.] Desire teased. [The demons have known this power for a long time. By devouring countless powerful souls, you will amplify yourself to the extreme. You will become a powerhouse of the Volgrim Empire. With Dosena defeated, they will have no choice but to bow their heads and fear your power. You will finally be afforded the respect you deserve.]

The word 'respect' elicited a strong reaction from Demila. How long had the Executors quietly, or not so quietly, mocked and laughed at her? They saw her as a failure. A pathetic excuse for a Psion who had too many so-called flaws in her foundation. She could no longer take the final step and break into the ranks of the Executors. She was frozen in time while upstarts like Vulpanix and Nufaris matched or exceeded her capabilities.

It was unfair! She had worked herself to the bone, pondered countless Truths, spoken with the ancestors, yet she was still unable to make any progress! How could she be content with her lot in life while others treated her as a joke?

There was only one thing holding her back from taking the plunge and walking the road of no return.

[If I do this, I will become a monster of the Volgrim Empire.] Demila said quietly. [A pariah, hated by all. How do you know I will be able to break through to the rank of Executor? And even... beyond that?]

[If you're too scared to try, then don't bother.] Desire said dismissively, seemingly looking away and losing interest. [One too corrupted by a fear to move will never become extraordinary. Perhaps Master Gressil was wrong about you. Maybe there never was anything of value about you to begin with...]

Demila furrowed her brow. [Bah! I'll do it! Never you mind! Just watch and see!]

In an instant, Demila lost her hesitation. She kicked against the emptiness of the Void and launched herself at Naandril II, traveling at superliminal speeds. By the time the Psions on the world detected her approach, it was too late. She struck the topsoil with tremendous force, plowing directly into the planet's crust and smashing her way downward with reckless abandon.

Alarms roared inside the facility.

ALERT. CREATOR DEMILA HAS MADE PLANETFALL ON NAANDRIL II. ALL SECURITY FORCES RESPOND IMMEDIATELY. CONTAIN OR KILL THIS TRAITOR TO THE VOLGRIM EMPIRE. GIVE NO QUARTER. THE FOUNDERS HAVE BEEN ALERTED TO HER PRESENCE.

Demila's eyes turned feral. She launched herself at Naandril II's Warpgate facility, which had already begun to activate and form a portal to the homeworld. Before it could do so, she erupted into the containment room and unleashed a storm of psionic power, obliterating hundreds of personnel inside at the atomic level. Their minds screamed in alarm for but an instant before a wave of Primal Psionics buffeted their bodies, shredding them into a fine, bloody mist.

With nobody to manipulate the Warpgate, it collapsed. Demila didn't wait even a second before launching toward the cables that powered it, ripping them apart so no reinforcements could force open a connection from the other side.

Then, she snapped her head toward the soul containment facility. Already, a pair of 7th Level Psions were on their way to intercept her.

[Demila!] A male Psion roared in the distance, his voice projecting through millions of tons of the planet's soil. [Stand down and give up now if you still have a shred of the Founder's Wills left in you! Otherwise, you shall die today!]

[Is that so?] Demila asked, confidence oozing from her pores. [Perhaps. But not to the likes of YOU!]

Two Psions smashed through the ceiling of the Warpgate Nexus. They rushed at Demila, but she flickered to the side and waved her hands. Instantly, psionic clones of herself rushed out in all directions, surrounding her two attackers.

While this might be a Psion Soul World, it actually had very few able-bodied high ranking Psions to protect it. The majority of its security forces were only at the 6th Level, and these two 7th Level Psions were considered more than sufficient for deterring enemy threats long enough for reinforcements to arrive. Never did they imagine a member of their own kind who knew the location of the Warpgate would arrive and cut off reinforcements before they could arrive!

Demila roared savagely. Her eyes stretched sideways in the Volgrim equivalent of a maniacal grin as her psionic duplicates started brutally pummeling her fellow 7th Level Psions. The male was primarily a Body Enhancer, while the female was a Psyker capable of debilitating powerful foes by attacking their minds directly. At the same time, she was extremely talented in Primal Psionics, making her capable of fighting with raw telekinetic power.

Unfortunately, her Psyker powers meant nothing to a high-level telepath like Demila, someone who possessed nearly impenetrable mental shields. It turned out her control of Primal Psionics was also grossly inferior to Demila as well!

Demila was not weak. She was over a million years old. She was born only an era or two after the end of the Great Wars. She might not be in the same age category as the Founders, but she wasn't that much younger, comparatively. She had tried to ascend to the level of Executor for countless millennia, but even though she failed to do so, she did not stop honing her fighting skills.

Demila casually revealed one high level Psionic ability after another. Aside from Body Enhancements, she had mastered nearly every other discipline to some degree, which had also caused her Psionic Core to become brittle. No Psion could master every art, and this was in fact the reason she had failed to advance.

But it made her unbeatable when facing other 7th Level Psions!

Demila conjured massive psionic fists to smash and pummel her two opponents. She sent the male flying, pulverizing him into the dirt before grabbing and squeezing her female adversary with brutal force. Her opponents screamed in pain, but broke free and repeatedly attacked her again and again!

[YOU WILL NOT WIN!] The male Psion shouted, forming his very words into a weapon. He speared that weapon toward Demila's forehead, but she batted it aside with ease. [YOU ARE A TRAITOR TO THE VOLGRIM EMPIRE!]

[The Empire betrayed me a long time ago.] Demila countered.

Boom!

The male Psion crashed into Demila, throwing his entire body at her and tanking any of her counter hits. When he raised his fist to smash her skull into meat and bone paste, he was shocked to see her body disappear, turning into particles of light.

Suddenly, his eyes flashed with realization.

[Kamira!! We've been tricked! Demila, she's- AAARGH!]

The male Psion's body abruptly shuddered with a terrible, soul-racking pain. His muscles spasmed and his bones trembled. Tears fell from his eyes as he felt his life force rapidly beginning to dwindle. With the last bit of his strength, he turned to peer through the planet, looking upon the container where his soul was housed.

Demila was there. She held his soul in her hands and greedily sucked up its power, vacuuming the full psionic knowledge of her enemy with reckless abandon. In an instant, countless fragments of knowledge, countless insights, countless inspirations washed across her soul, making her pupils dilate with hunger.

This was the power of devouring! This was a power which formerly belonged only to demons!

[HAHAHAHA!!!] Demila cackled evilly, as she felt the life ebb from her opponent's body. [Little Harido, you were fooled too easily! The young should always fear the old!!]

The female Psion, Kamira, reacted with horror. [Harido, no! Demila, you monster!!]

She triangulated Demila's position and charged through the facility, smashing down walls in her race to save her companion and soul-mate. But before she could reach Demila, her power also started to fade away. Kamira shuddered violently as Demila revealed the second soul held in her palms and started greedily sucking it down like a human slurping spaghetti noodles. Kamira lost control of her body and struck the ground, rolling to a stop as she lost consciousness.

Demila laughed. She couldn't believe how easy it was to fool these two stupid juniors! All she had to do was hide her presence for only a few seconds and lead them along with a psionic copy while her real body located their souls. After that, it was mere child's play!

[HA HA HA HAAA!!! THE WEAK SHOULD FEAR THE STRONG! THE YOUNG SHOULD FEAR THE OLD! THE STUPID SHOULD FEAR THE WISE! This begins my ascension! The rise of the Great Demila!!]

Demila did not fully devour the souls of her juniors. She drained them down to the level of Initiator, then casually tossed their souls back into the containers that previously housed them. Even if she wanted to devour them, for some reason, she couldn't. Perhaps it was because the power of devouring primarily belonged to the demons, but Demila found that she had to leave their Psionic Cores intact. She could absorb their powers and copy their knowledge, but she could not drain them entirely.

Of course, she could crush their cores and kill them, but she didn't hold any genuine animosity towards these two juniors. She only desired their power, knowledge, and insights. Once their threat was neutered, they were of no concern to her.

Killing them would also go against her long-term plans. What good was power if she didn't have a future Empire of subjects to fear and respect her?!

Demila grinned with her eyes. Her hunger grew more intense after experiencing the baptism of power associated with draining the cores of Kamira and Harido.

[More. I NEED MORE.]

Without hesitation, and knowing reinforcements would eventually arrive, Demila began crazily grabbing every powerful Psion soul in the vicinity. 5th Level, 6th Level, even 7th Level souls all became weakened and useless as she hungrily gobbled up their power, sucking down their vitality until there was almost nothing left.

All across the Volgrim Empire, countless Psions screamed in pain and begged for mercy as their life forces fell to ruin. Centuries, millennia, even eons of accumulation fell to dust as Demila sucked them all dry, empowering herself without caring about the total cost to the entire Empire.

Demila's body inflated with power. All at once, a rushing of energy slammed into her Psionic Core. She lifted her head and roared to the heavens as it finally happened.

After a million years, she broke through! Demila conquered the 7th Level and became the newest Executor to smash the wall that previously held her at bay. She laughed maniacally, grinning like a feral beast before continuing her rampage.

By the time reinforcements arrived, it would be too late. She would have already eaten every decent soul on Naandril II.

Suddenly, her gaze froze. Demila finally spotted what she had been looking for from the beginning.

Sequestered in a secret part of the facility, two Psionic souls burned brighter than all the rest. These were no ordinary souls… they belonged to a pair of… Executors!

Her eyes turned blood red.

[EXECUTOR RILEY. EXECUTOR VI. ALL THESE MILLENNIA… YOU LAUGHED AT ME. BUT YOU WILL LAUGH NO MORE.]

[YOU WILL NEVER MOCK ME AGAIN! HAHAHAHAAAA!!!]

Somewhere in the Milky Way, the two Executors shivered in terror. A cold sense of dread washed over them.

Before they could understand what was causing them to feel such fear, the light left their eyes.

Vi, flying across Volgarius's upper atmosphere toward the Warpgate Nexus, lost all control of her body. Her deceased form hurtled from the sky, flew into a stratoscraper, and exploded into chunks of meat as her meteoric crash brought ruin to her flesh, muscles, and bones.

Riley was flying through the Void when she perished. Her body lost control and fell from hyperspace, causing her to drift into a pitch-black region of the Void where it would never again be found.

In a single day, the Volgrim Empire lost more than it had in tens of millennia before.

This was only the beginning of its Total Rendition…

Part 643: Myriad Escape!

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. In a hidden dimension...

Inside a secret location, tucked away from the outside universe, a creature trembled in pain. Its body was curled together, painfully lashed into place, its bones wrapped around each other like a ball of yarn. It could not move more than a millimeter in any direction. An orb of psionic energy enveloped its body, holding it unmoving in place and preventing it from escaping.

This entity was none other than the Myriad Deity: Mephisto.

Mephisto's head was forced between his knees and legs, his arms wrapped over top and held tight by Founder Dosena's psionic power. As a Bottom Level Cosmic, he had no ability to resist the full power of a Middle Cosmic. The only reason he was not dead was because Dosena had not yet found a way to kill him. Her power, though horrifying, only came up equal to the defensive strength of his dragonbone body. Having stolen these bones from the corpse of the ancient dragon, Leviathan, Mephisto's hardiness was unfathomable. Only a superior High Cosmic or Apex Cosmic, such as the angel named Anaelle, who was summoned by Bael to the material plane, would be capable of breaking his bones and eradicating his existence.

However, the patchwork nature of Mephisto's soul provided him with a terrible weakness. If Dosena were to assault him for long enough, she might be able to eradicate Mephisto and the other Emperors comprising his soul, killing them all and retaining the dragon bones for the Volgrim Empire's own usage. In fact, that was her ultimate plan.

But now, as Mephisto snarled to himself like he had been doing ever since being imprisoned in this secret place, unable to perceive the world around himself, he noticed with delight that his prison's bonds had begun to weaken. Mephisto did not know why its power had faded, but he sensed a huge secret!

[Where isss Dosssena?] Mephisto hissed inside his Mind Realm. [Isss she toying with usss? Or perhapsss...?]

Zamiel was the first to respond. [She might have left for a while. If she travels far enough away, we might be able to break out and escape!]

[Or not.] Emperor Lupus countered lazily. [It could be a trap to toy with us and break our spirit. Not that mine isn't already.]

[We must not give up.] Emperor Yama said, his tone boiling with hatred. [We will not allow a mere female to pin us down! We must fight! We must break FREE!]

Lupus may have mentally given up on escaping, but the other three core Emperors did not. As a result, through the efforts of Mephisto, Zamiel, and Yama, the dragon's body began to twitch and shudder. They forced demonic energy outward, trying to brute-force a gap in their encirclement. Anything to break the stalemate!

"RRRRGH!"

The dragon's mouth twitched, and a pained grunt roared from its throat.

The psionic orb encasing them, pinning and binding them in place, flexed ever so slightly.

[COME ON!] Zamiel shouted. [FIGHT, YOU LAZY BASTARDS! I DON'T WANNA BE STUCK IN THIS SHITHOLE FOR THE REST OF ETERNITY!]

[Break free! Essscape!] Mephisto hissed.

[Push! Push, dammit!!] Yama added.

[Whatever.] Lupus grunted, her soul rolling its eyes.

The psionic prison flexed outward for a moment, allowing the dragon to slightly move its right arm away from its head. But then it pressed back against the Myriad Deity's body, sealing it in a newer, more painful position.

Like this, minutes became hours. The Myriad Deity became emboldened. With Dosena seemingly allowing it to make progress, it fought harder and harder, writhing around with its whole body, feeling its psionic prison grow weaker and weaker all the time.

Eventually, Mephisto and the others managed to pull their head out of their legs and press their palms together before their chest. They still could not see past the barrier engulfing them, but it had weakened enough that it no longer pressed on them as heavily. They could much more easily adjust position. And so, they summoned all their demonic energy into their grasp and roared with hatred.

"BREAK FOR USSS!!!"

Their Cosmic power might be qualitatively low, but the sheer amount of demonic power taken from all the Emperors they had devoured made them quantitatively formidable! All at once, the souls of those Emperors obediently released all their energy, and the dragon momentarily exploded with enough power to rip apart the psionic prison and leap out before it could close up and seal it once more.

Mephisto was free!!

He barely took a moment to revel in his freedom and exhaustion before freezing in place and quickly assessing his surroundings.

None of the demons had a clue where they were. When they stretched out their senses, they only managed to ascertain they were no longer in the Milky Way itself. Somehow, they had ended up in a small sub-dimension, no larger than a small town. It had many levels, extending up, down, forward, backward, left and right. It seemed to be some sort of compound area with room for all sorts of strange Volgrim experiments.

In Mephisto's prison chamber, he saw the central area where he had been held. All sorts of mystical chains lashed onto the psionic prison that had previously held him. These chains glowed with the power of a Middle Cosmic and held fast to the walls. With his meager strength, he had no chance of breaking them. Even his dragon bones wouldn't help! He quickly realized he had only escaped because some of the chains had wiggled out of place due to his movements, opening a gap at the top for him to escape through.

The chains attached to statues along the walls, and the corners of the prison. These statues all appeared to be of High Psions. None of the Myriad Deity's soul recognized them. Some were male, some female, and a few were ambiguous in gender. Not that the demons particularly cared.

[We need to get the hell out of here before Dosena returns.] Zamiel said. [I doubt she'll make our cell as 'comfortable' the second time around.]

None of the others objected.

[A sssound idea.] Mephisto said slowly. [But... the lawsss of ssspaccce ssseem to be ssstrange here.]

Yama looked around suspiciously. [We're too deep inside this construct's nexus. Let's head toward the edges. Maybe we can break out once we're there.]

Lupus frowned. Unlike the others, she sensed something ominous in the air. A feeling that the Myriad Deity was being... observed. But it was a light sensation. She couldn't tell what direction that feeling came from.

After contemplating their situation for but a few moments, the Myriad Deity's members formed a consensus. The dragon exploded into motion, rushing toward the prison's exit and kicking the door open with ease! Clearly, Dosena did not think the dragon would be able to escape its psionic restraints, so she didn't bother forming the walls and door of anything particularly sturdy.

The dragon charged out of the small prison and arrived in an inner building, pausing to look around. The prison itself consisted of only a single cell, and it had been assembled in the heart of this dimension to hold Mephisto specifically. There were no other prisoners that he could sense. As for the room the cell was built within, it resembled a human church, with murals, paintings, stained glass windows allowing in artificial light, and other strangely holy and religious icons that seemed incongruent with the Dosena he knew. Then again, none of the Emperors really had any idea who the Second Founder was. They certainly hadn't even spoken to her, aside from when she captured them.

"Where isss thisss...?" The Myriad Deity wondered out loud.

[If I had to guess... I'd assume it's Founder Dosena's Secret Sanctum.] Lupus commented dryly. [It's her personal area. If you really want to piss her off, you could smash her stuff. But you're probably better off escaping before she returns.]

The thought of sending that cocky bitch of a Psion into a rage actually made Mephisto and the other male Emperors pause for a moment. But since they had no idea if or when she would return, they decided not to take any risks. They rushed toward the direction they sensed was the edge of the Sanctum, broke through the doors of her Holy Cathedral, and arrived in a courtyard filled with strange trees.

Mephisto blinked. He couldn't believe his eyes! These trees resembled, to some degree, the strange gem-trees he had observed in the Cosmic Realm! Psionic Fruits grew on their branches, possessing some sort of innate power he couldn't quite decipher. He was immediately tempted to eat one... or perhaps a thousand... but he wasn't certain if there would be any incompatibilities with his demonic powers. And besides! He was in a rush! He had to escape!

Mephisto looked into the distance. He saw a massive ethereal 'wall'. It was not a wall of brick and stone, or steel, but a wall of Void itself. A barrier sealing the Sanctum from the outer cosmos.

That was the way out!

Mephisto rushed at the wall! He tore at it with his claws and attempted to rip it apart, but to his shock he found that it was stronger than a Middle Cosmic. This wall was not sealed or empowered by a Cosmic's energy, but by the laws of the universe itself!

[No, no nonono!] Mephisto shouted. [Thisss isss the way out! It mussst be! Why can't we break through?!]

[Our knowledge of spatial laws are laughable.] Yama said, analyzing the situation careful. [Hehehe. That bitch really did us dirty.]

[Don't we have Warper souls at our disposal?] Zamiel asked. [Let's try using those!]

The other souls came to a consensus. They quickly tapped into the power of Warpers and tried to open a portal back to the outer universe.

But they failed!

The portal only phased into existence for a millisecond before sputtering and dying. They tried again, and again, and again... but each time, they failed.

"Dammit, dammit, dammit!!" The Myriad Deity roared, a collective wail of anger from all its composite souls. "Not fair! Thisss isss not fair! We have to break free!"

Suddenly, the dragon fell silent. It looked around, feeling that something had fixated its gaze upon an unwanted intruder.

Mephisto swiveled the dragon's body around. He went on the alert, his cold, undead heart turning more frigid than ever.

"Who... who's there?!"

Deep within the Sanctum, at its lowest level, a trickle of power wormed its way from an unknown holding chamber. That power wafted through the various hallways, then dove through the soil of the Sanctum before suspending itself mere inches from the dragon's face.

It took the appearance of a single blackened finger.

[INVADER.] A voice spoke, its tone full of malice and vigilance. [YOU… ARE NOT WELCOME HERE.]

If Mephisto still had any body hair, all of it would have been standing on end. The power dripping off this singular finger was unfathomable. Horrifying! It went way beyond the realm of Middle Cosmic! Just what the hell was it, and why was it living within the Volgrim Empire's confines?! Did Unarin even know about it??

"No, not invaders!" Mephisto screeched in fear. "Let us out! We're here by mistake! We- UGHH!!"

The tiny tendril of energy struck Mephisto with violent force. It pounded the Myriad Deity against the spatial wall with so much power that the rib bone it struck immediately cracked! The Myriad Deity's souls all shuddered and lost cohesion for an instant before reforming back into one.

[Spawn of a broodmother!] Lupus shouted, no longer as distant as before. She suffered the same pain as the rest. She might rather be dead than part of the Myriad Deity's monstrous form, but the pain from that one hit instantly woke her out of her stupor. She sure as hell didn't want to die to this ancient horror!

When the creature sent another tiny attack at the Myriad Deity, the dragon instantly dove to the side, evading the attack. The 'finger' of the monster struck the spatial wall, and the entire Sanctum rumbled! The spatial wall cracked slightly, and the Emperors quickly looked toward that crack.

[Chanccce!!] Mephisto shouted.

With every bit of the Myriad Deity's strength, Mephisto and the rest flapped their wings and rushed at the spatial crack, roaring with all their might as they smashed into it before it could reform. They pounded through it and flew into a Void of the Unknown, with no stars or spatial anomalies visible anywhere. Instantly, the Sanctum began pulling away from them, turning into a speck in the distance as they lost control of their bodies, and spatial storms buffeted their figures.

"AAAAHH!!"

The dragon roared in pain. The Sanctum slowly disappeared, and the unknown horror that attacked them did not give chase, evidently content with the 'invaders' leaving of their own accord.

Seconds later, the voidspace around them abruptly brightened. They fell out of the other dimension and tumbled back into Realspace, less than 100,000 miles away from Volgarius itself!

The Myriad Deity instantly ceased its tumbling with a flap of its wings. Its composite souls went on the alert, quickly sensing hundreds of thousands of powerful Volgrim ships in the area. Sensor beams locked onto their location. Across the bridges of many naval warships, commanders and captains shouted orders as they not only dealt with the Psion Collapse Crisis, but a sudden and unexpected new crisis. The arrival of... a dragon made of bone?!

It took nearly no time at all for the information to relay to the Founders. Unarin's brother, Randis, monitored the communication channels and immediately noticed the anomaly. His pupils shrunk to pinpricks. Without hesitation, he issued an order.

"That's Demon Deity Mephisto! He has escaped the Second Founder's prison! She is currently out of commission. I will send Executor Nufaris to intervene. In the meantime, attack that demon at once! Do not let him make landfall on Volgarius!"

Hardly had a minute passed in realspace time while Mephisto quickly swept his Cosmic senses outward, determined Dosena was nowhere in the star system that he could sense, and that only one Executor was in the region, capable of threatening him, before countless starship weapons suddenly fired at him.

Missiles, bombs, beams, phasers, and lasers all blasted Mephisto in unison, raking his body and forcing him backward. The Myriad Deity grunted as blinding lights struck his body with enough force to blow up planetary settlements, yet left not a single mark on his pristine bones!

"RRRGH! You little SSSHITSSS!" Mephisto roared, his Cosmic Voice booming throughout the vacuum of the Void.

His fury exploded. How dare these insignificant worms attack him?! He flapped his wings and launched himself at the nearest capital ship, the VLL Melkia IV, tearing into it with his claws and piercing through its mortal-grade shields with ease. As a Bottom Cosmic, he possessed power aplenty. Mere mortal weapons and armor were no barrier to him!

4th, 5th, and 6th Level Psions launched from some of the ships. Unfortunately, thanks to Demila's rampage elsewhere in the Milky way, a full third of all Psions had been completely debilitated. Their numbers weren't the only thing reduced, but their morale as well. They had no way of fighting back! Her cowardly attack left them totally vulnerable to this rampaging monster! Even worse, early reports stated Executor Vi had fallen, and Riley might have joined her!

These young and weak Psions were, therefore, not eager to fight a rampaging Bottom Cosmic. Only the 6th Level Psions had a fighting chance; the others knew they were little more than cannon fodder. They only hoped to try and slow Mephisto down until Nufaris could circle the planet and arrive on scene.

Mephisto blasted apart the VLL Melkia IV with contemptuous ease. He roared with delight at finally being given a way of letting out his rage. These Volgrim DARED cage the mighty Myriad Deity, so they would suffer immeasurably! As a Bottom Cosmic, the lowest of the low, a creature barely a single step above the mortal level, he suffered essentially no Akashic Backlash from his actions. He could slaughter, he could murder, and he could kill to his heart's delight!

"HAHAHAHA!" Mephisto laughed, his voice booming throughout the void. "You insssectsss will RUE the day you sssaw fit to imprissson thisss gloriousss Deity! Kekekeke!!"

The young Psions roared with hatred and rage. This mud-dweller intended to wreak havoc on the same day as the Great Traitor?! They must be in cahoots!

Unable to intervene in Demila's atrocity, they instead took out their rage on Mephisto. Chains of psionic energy lashed around his arms and legs by the hundreds. Thunderbolts fired at him and exploded against his body. Space twisted and turned to stymie his movements.

But Mephisto merely laughed! These paltry and weak Psions were no challenge for the lauded Myriad Deity! They slowed him down for a moment or two, but he broke free of their restraints, laughing at how much weaker they were compared to Dosena's. He lunged at the strongest 6th Level Psions and reaped their lives like wheat, ripping them to pieces. Most frighteningly, he devoured their souls! He did not allow their soul energies to return to the worlds of Naandril I, II, or III. The Psions killed by Mephisto became one with him, empowering him, never again returning to serve their glorious Empire.

Tears of hatred and rage poured from the faces of the even weaker Psions. They were but meat on the chopping block. They had no chance against him!

From the distance, a beacon of power rocketed around the edge of the planet's atmosphere. It raced toward Mephisto at superliminal speeds, weaving between the starships in orbit deftly.

It was Executor Nufaris!

[YOU FILTHY DEMON! UNHAND MY SUBORDINATES!]

Nufaris was enraged. He was well and truly pissed. Never did he imagine Demila would fall to the whims of the demons. Never did he imagine she would betray the Psions in such a profound way at the same time as Mephisto escaped the Second Founder's prison. He wasn't entirely certain, but all of this smelled of a conspiracy. The two must be working together!

If he wasn't allowed to leave Volgarius and intercept Demila, then by goddamn, he would at least unleash his rage upon the next best enemy!

Mephisto sneered. Less than thirty seconds had passed since the start of his rampage, yet Nufaris would arrive within only a few more. If it weren't for him taking care not to smash through the Volgrim armada in his path, he would have arrived fifteen seconds earlier. He might have saved dozens of younger Psions!

"A mere Executor daresss to battle thisss Deity?" Mephisto asked derisively. "You lack the qualificationsss!"

Nufaris punched his fists together. He rocketed toward Mephisto without stopping, conjuring a shield of spatial energy around himself as he flew directly at his hated draconic enemy.

[WE SHALL SEE ABOUT THAT!]

Boom!

Nufaris slammed into Mephisto and started driving him forward, pushing him further and further from Volgarius, eventually breaking the armada's encirclement as the two of them rushed further out into the more sparsely populated Void!

"Gah!" Mephisto roared. He snapped his head down and bit onto the spatial shield, then yanked himself away, allowing Nufaris to flicker off into the distance for a moment before swooping around for a second attack run.

Nufaris aimed his palm outward. A giant hand made of spatial energies formed around himself, then launched at Mephisto.

[I do not know how you escaped Founder Dosena's prison, but it won't be long before I put you back there myself!]

Mephisto grinned. He still couldn't sense Dosena's presence, and the fact this snarky little bastard thought himself her equal was hysterical. Perhaps Dosena was more indisposed than he previously thought?

"Come at usss then! We do not fear a fight with a weak Cosssmic like you!"

Their battle would decide the fate of Volgarius.

Part 644: Mephisto's Massacre

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. Volgarius's Orbit.

Space warped and deformed around Nufaris. He rushed at Mephisto not with the intent to kill, but a need to lock him down, trap him, and eventually re-imprison him. Nufaris knew from a secret discussion with Dosena that Mephisto's body was too durable for him to break. The only way to kill Mephisto would be by destroying his much weaker unified Emperor souls. Not only were they a critical vulnerability, but doing so would give the Volgrim Empire a massive amount of Living Moldanium! This could offer them a huge buffer of powerful alloys to be used for making weapons and armor!

Just when it seemed Nufaris would collide with Mephisto, the dragon clapped his palms together, then yanked them apart, summoning his most well known and highly effective ability...

"DARK MISSST!"

A hellish wall of black fog expanded outward in a massive sphere. It instantly shut down all visual-based sensor and camera systems, countless forms of LIDAR and other highly advanced scanning systems, and so much more! The expanding wall of darkness didn't only expand outward in a plain sphere though; Mephisto deliberately curved its trajectory in an oval shape, bending it toward the Volgrim armada.

Within seconds, countless ships at the periphery of the fleet, closer to the planet than Mephisto's current coordinates, became engulfed by the oppressive realm of shadow. Transmissions from these ships abruptly fell silent. Their sister vessels lost contact, and their fates became uncertain.

Using only his cosmic senses, Nufaris managed to triangulate Mephisto's general position, but he found that his other senses simply couldn't lock on to the wiley dragon anymore. Mephisto cleverly turned his body partially intangible and reduced the 'glow' of his already rather pitiful Cosmic Aura, causing him to become even stealthier than before.

Nufaris charged at the spot where he sensed Mephisto, but his prepared spatial attack attack whiffed, striking the emptiness of space and flying off into the void. His void-chains, intended to begin the process of binding Mephisto, instead became like a clown's antics. He quickly spun around, trying desperately to sense Mephisto's movements.

"Kekekeke!" Mephisto gurgled, his shrill laughter erupting from multiple places within the fog. "What an embarrasssing disssplay, Nufarisss! Where are you aiming? We're over here, you fool!"

Nufaris frowned. He sensed a flicker of danger from his right. He instantly pivoted to face it, only for a shadowy specter of a dragon to charge at him. It wasn't Mephisto, but rather one of his weak shadow-clones.

[Mere tricks!] Nufaris scoffed. He sent a beam of spatial energy out and fired it into the core of the shadow dragon, bursting it like a balloon. But then, for some reason, Mephisto fell completely silent.

Nufaris tensed up. He looked around, waiting for another attack, but it didn't come. The Dark Mist started to retreat, then it vanished completely, regurgitating Nufaris back into realspace. At that moment, a fellow Psion, one of the surviving 5th Level juniors among the fleet, finally managed to transmit a psio-burst to his lauded Executor.

[Executor Nufaris! It was a trick! He's moving toward Volgarius! Hurry, we can't stop him!!]

Nufaris's heart turned cold. He realized he'd been had. Mephisto never had any intention to fight him. That son of a bitch was no Psion. He knew nothing of honor. Three of his souls belonged to Mephisto, Yama, and Zamiel. They were pure scum, even among demons. They would always fight dirty before fighting fair.

[No! NO!] Nufaris roared, as he locked on to the Cosmic energy signal racing toward Volgarius. [Don't you DARE!]

Nufaris conjured the full power of an Executor and launched himself toward Volgarius. He was faster than Mephisto, and not by a little. Unfortunately, he could not match up to the vile dragon in one regard... Mephisto had no qualms about killing any mortals in his path!

Mephisto callously smashed through ship after ship, deliberately causing as much damage as possible while treating these previously high-and-mighty vessels as toys made of wet tissue paper. Neither shields nor formidable alloys could compare to even this bottom-level Cosmic comprised of high-level dragonbones.

But while Mephisto could completely ignore the weak, faint stings of an Akashic Backlash most pitiful, Nufaris did not have such a luxury. He had to dodge, side-slip, and teleport around many destroyed vessels, taking care not to accidentally kill any mortals while pursuing his hated foe. He did not only do this because of the Akashic Backlash, but also because... these were his fellow Volgrim! What sort of figurehead would he be if he caused his own people harm? He had to preserve as many lives as possible, especially while that filthy Demila was wreaking havoc.

Thus, Mephisto managed to keep ahead of Nufaris. He drew closer and closer to Volgarius, sometimes even slowing down a little to smash through a particularly juicy capital-class ship in his path. He sneered whenever he noticed Nufaris momentarily slowing down to dodge some debris or try not to hurt any minuscule mortals.

Another psio-burst reached Nufaris's mind, making his body shudder upon hearing the bad news.

[Executor! Demila has appeared at Naandril I! She's slaughtering even more Psions! What should we do?! Our souls are there! If this keeps up-]

The voice abruptly went inert. That Psion fell silent as he lost connection with his soul. Demila had struck again.

[Dammit, dammit, dammit!] Nufaris roared.

He had never experienced this level of rage, this feeling of helplessness, this pitiful level of despair. Never in all his years! His Empire was collapsing, he was the only one powerful enough to put up a fight against its dark fate, but his power... simply wasn't enough.

Mephisto finally struck Volgarius's upper atmosphere. His body ignited with flames as he hurtled toward the stratoscrapers below, burning up in re-entry yet suffering no physical damage. His arrival send out shockwaves that blasted apart countless windows, deafened millions of Volgrim at the ground level, and blew out the eardrums of those nearest the sky.

"It'sss time to have a little FUN!" Mephisto shouted while laughing evilly.

Unlike Mephisto, Nufaris's atmospheric entry was much less explosive. He flitted between the air molecules, separating them with his psionic powers so as to not cause immense damage to the Volgrim below. Unfortunately, what he saw when he arrived left his heart metaphorically bleeding with pain. Mephisto had deliberately crashed his body into the largest stratoscraper. He tore it to shreds, atomizing it with nothing more than the raw weight and durability of his dragon bones. Hundreds of thousands of Low Psions, Technopaths, and Changelings inside the tower fell silent as their bodies were shredded into flecks of meat and speckles of bone. Millions of tons of glass, composited steel, and other materials collapsed into the stratoscraper's footprint, spreading out and causing extreme damage to other adjacent towers.

This in turn weakened their foundations. Two nearby ones immediately began to topple over, which Nufaris belatedly realized could cause a horrifying domino effect. Even if Mephisto did nothing else, the Stratoscrapers would continue to fall over, slam into their neighboring towers, then force those to fall sideways as well. Hundreds of millions, if not billions of Volgrim would perish within the hour!

Naturally, Mephisto realized this too. He sent a gleaming red gaze back at his pursuer, cackling shrilly. "Kekeke! What now, Nufarisss?! Going to let all thessse pretty little mortalsss die?! Don't worry, we'll caussse even more havoc... over here!"

He rushed to the west and slammed his body into a different stratoscraper, this time deliberately aiming to send it toppling sideways. Nufaris tried to charge in and stop him, but the vicious demon simply lunged downward into the collapsing debris, shielding himself with the dying bodies of tens of thousands of puny mortals.

Nufaris, unable to stop the demon directly, instead tried to stabilize the situation. He reached out with his powers and slowed the fall of a hundred stratoscrapers, preventing them from toppling over into other adjacent towers... but this proved to be another mistake! Mephisto simply continued racing off into the distance, ripping apart one tower after the next, causing ten, a hundred, even a thousand to blast into pieces and fall west, east, north, and south as well.

The devastation was incalculable. The loss of life immense! 5th and 6th Level Psions, what few remained, quickly rose up to try and stop the cascading domino effects and to free up their Executor to pursue the dragon, but their numbers were too few, and many of them were rapidly dying off due to Demila's unseen antics elsewhere in the galaxy.

Nufaris felt a chill go down his spine.

This was no longer merely the collapse of the Psions. It was the genocide of his Empire.

How many friends would die today? How many brothers? Sisters? How many famous researchers, historians, and travelers? How many inventors, warlords, and geniuses were about to be snuffed out?

No.

He couldn't let this be.

He couldn't let it all come to an end!

Nufaris's eyes filled with tears. Rage swelled in his heart. He abruptly launched himself toward Mephisto like a railgun shell. Mephisto jolted in surprise when Nufaris slammed into a collapsing stratoscraper, pounded through every mortal in his path, and crazily chased Mephisto with no more regard for anything but his foe.

[YOU WILL DIE TODAY, DEMON. YOU WILL DIE!!]

Akashic Backlashes struck Nufaris, causing him innumerable injuries. His eyes turned bloodshot as he felt pieces of his Psionic Core breaking apart. But it didn't matter. He wouldn't allow this fiend to kill any more Volgrim. He had to stop the Empire's bleeding.

No matter the cost!

Mephisto hurriedly started to conjure another orb of Dark Mist in his palm, but Nufaris slammed into him, lashed his body to Mephisto's spine, and wrapped both of them with chains of Spatial energy.

[YOUR EVIL WAYS END HERE!]

Mindlessly, like a crazed animal, Nufaris launched himself skyward, dragging the demon along. He didn't care what it took anymore. He didn't care what price he would have to pay. What good were honor and glory when his species' survival was at stake?!

It was the law of the jungle now. Kill or be killed! And Nufaris would not allow this wretched dragon to cause any further harm.

Mephisto fought madly. He couldn't believe how abruptly Nufaris had changed strategies. It was like a switch flipped in his brain! The dragon struggled and tried to break free of the spatial chains wrapping him, but for every chain he broke, two more took their place.

If it were before, Nufaris could have kept this up practically forever. A weak little Bottom Cosmic was no match for a Low Cosmic nearing the next level. But that was before Nufaris buffeted his body, soul, and Psionic Seed with Akashic Backlashes. The grief of killing his fellow Volgrim, even if they would have died instants later, also rocked his emotions.

He hated Mephisto.

He hated himself!

He hated how weak he was, despite attaining a level of power that would make his lessers treat him like a god.

Nufaris shot out of Volgarius's atmosphere and rushed past the armada. A brief Psio-burst entered his mind...

[Divinator Fellrun has engaged the traitor, Demila! They are battling at Naandril I!]

Nufaris barely registered the words. He was too overcome with grief to even think of how good this news was.

Fellrun was once considered the most powerful of the Executors. In terms of one-on-one combat, he was still unmatched. If he fought the traitor, he would surely win.

Nufaris pushed Mephisto out of the planet's orbit. He started burning his soul energy to initiate a transwarp activation, which launched himself and Mephisto out of the Volgarius star system at superliminal speeds!

"Gah! Let usss go, you worthlesss worm! The mere ssstrugglesss of a dying Cosssmic! You are laughable! You cannot contain usss for long! When we break free, we will ssshatter your body, defile your corpssse, ssswallow your sssoul, forccce you to be one with usss, and ssserve usss for all eternity!"

Nufaris ignored Mephisto. He had no energy to engage in conversation, not that he wanted to. He only had one desire now, in this critical time.

He needed to kill the dragon!

If it was before, he might have been able to if they had fought in honorable single combat. But Mephisto refused to play by the rules. That left Nufaris in such a pitiful condition that he also had to choose to break the rules.

Now, he could only think of one way to end this threat... permanently!

After traveling for less than a hundred lightyears, Nufaris fell out of warp and re-entered normalspace. He arrived inside a seemingly empty area of the Void, one where none would be able to observe him.

But Mephisto wasn't fooled. He instantly realized this area of space was not as empty as it seemed.

"What are you doing?! YOU IMBECCCILE! You'll kill usss BOTH!"

Nufaris's expression turned grim. He could already feel his soul starting to unravel.

Nufaris had a secret. It wasn't an especially well-kept one, but it was something the other Executors, as well as all the Founders knew.

He did not keep his True Soul inside one of the safe-worlds, like the other Executors did. In private, Dosena had confided in him that keeping his True Soul on his person was extremely risky. It meant he could die permanently if his body was ever slain.

But it also offered him a great benefit. He was able to rise through the ranks much more easily than the decidedly more timid Psions who opted to store their True Souls on one of the three worlds named Naandril. By keeping his True Soul on himself, he also ensured that if a traitor like Demila ran rampant, he wouldn't have to worry about dying without putting up a fight.

Unfortunately, it didn't matter anymore. He had suffered such a terrible Akashic Backlash that he was bound to fall back to the 7th Level… or worse.

Now, knowing that his life was soon to end, Nufaris pushed himself to his limits. In this very star system was his one hope for permanently killing this wretched creature.

A black hole!

Though it might not be as terrifying as the one at the center of the Milky Way, this particular black hole was still hundreds of times bigger than any red giant. It was supermassive, glowing with the white light it swallowed around its event horizon.

Mephisto struggled madly. He roared with draconic fury and tried to bend his head around to bite at Nufaris, but the Executor clamped Mephisto's mouth shut with another hastily conjured spatial chain.

[NOW… YOU WILL DIE HERE… DEMON! ALONG WITH ME!] Nufaris proclaimed.

"No, no!" Mephisto shouted, his 'voice' projecting through his muzzled jaws. "You bassstard!!"

Nufaris could not wait any longer. He would momentarily drop to the 7th Level and cease to be a threat to the dragon held tightly in his grasp. When that occurred, Mephisto would surely break free, kill him, and return to Volgarius.

With his last burst of power, Nufaris launched himself and Mephisto into the event horizon. Their perception of time slowed to a crawl. Chaotic energies ripped at their souls, their bodies, their skin and bones. They screamed in agony, their voices silent, as the uncaring chaos of the universe ripped them asunder.

Moments later, the black hole swallowed them without leaving a single atom behind.

Nufaris, the savior of the Volgrim civilization, perished honorably, dragging an enemy that presented a species-ending threat to its demise.

Mephisto died screaming… like a squealing pig.

On the world of Volgarius, Founder Unarin stared up at the stars. He felt the weight of a planet momentarily fall upon his shoulders before fading away.

Dosena, held in his arms, coughed weakly. She opened her eyes, but was unable to move.

[Nu…Nufaris… he…]

"Dead." Unarin said sagely.

The First Founder closed his eyes. He bowed his head in solemn respect. Dosena once more fell unconscious.

The prodigy she cared so much about and had raised to become a future pillar of Volgrim society had fallen.

Now, it was a matter of debate whether or not the rest of the Volgrim would follow.

On the world of Grimvolas, a powerful lizard-like monster stood with his claws clasped behind his back. He gazed up at the stars, feeling a sensation not so dissimilar to what Unarin was experiencing.

He was Cinculu, the Fifth Founder, second in command of the Dolgrimites.

A female Dolgrimite, much larger and more imposing than he, stepped out onto that ridge and narrowed her eyes as she also seemed to see something beyond the mortal veil.

"Do you smell it, child? The winds of change."

"The blasphemers are finally paying the price for their wicked ways." Cinculu replied. "They denied their origins. They refused to see the light, to hear our sermons. They believed themselves undefeatable. Now, their technological terrors shall become their coffins."

"It would be amusing if it were not so pathetic." The Dolgrimite Matriarch spat. "Pah. Unarin, you useless fool of a 'First Founder.' How can one be so wise, yet so utterly incompetent? If only you had listened to our warnings, you might have averted the coming storm. But we shall not complain! The time is nigh. The rise of the True Volgrim will soon begin. Sinners and slaves to the machine will receive the punishment they deserve. Dolgris may be a fair and just God, but he is not merciful to nonbelievers."

"Dolgris guides us." Cinculu chanted, while closing his eyes and bowing his head. "His wisdom is boundless."

The Matriarch continued to stare up at the sky for a few moments longer before losing interest and turning away. She sneered to herself.

"How long before that timid little 'Plague' dares to make planetfall here, I wonder? How long before it learns the terror of Dolgris? The day is approaching. The War is unending."

On the world of Naandril I.

Demila levitated inside a large underground chamber. Her soul overflowed with power. She was solidly at the rank of Executor now, and rapidly approaching the final hurdle. If this kept up, she might even reach the same rank as the Second Founder.

Before her, another Psion also levitated. He was none other than Divinator Fellrun. The Master of Combat was well-known for his prowess in defeating singular foes.

[I won't lie, Demila. In my youth, I looked up to you.] Fellrun said, his voice calm. [You are one of the oldest of our kind. Yet now, I see that you are nothing more than a fossil who failed to advance her Seed. Desperate for a quick fix of easy power, you turned your back on your people and joined hands with the demons. You are irredeemable. You are garbage.]

Demila's face flickered with unknown emotions.

[I devoured Vi and Riley. When I arrived here, I also devoured Huron. But I haven't been able to locate your soul, Fellrun. Did you integrate it back into your body?]

[As soon as I figured out what you were doing, I did.] Fellrun admitted. [You will obtain no easy victory today, traitor.]

[That leaves only you, Sartran, and Nufaris, then.] Demila commented, as if tallying an unseen scoreboard. [Ah, but because of Beelzebub… no more Sartran. I hope you and Nufaris are enough to push me over the final plateau.]

[Even now, your soul drowns in sin.] Fellrun retorted. [All you think about is power. You are a greedy, self-serving, worthless excuse of a Psion. I am ashamed to have ever considered you my sister.]

Demila's expression darkened.

[What do you know, you petulant child?! What do you know of my struggles?! I fought for the Empire! I bled for it! Before you were even a gleam in the Creator's eye, I struggled to uplift myself through the power of Creation! I solidified my Seed, and then my progress came to a screeching halt! It was not fair! I did everything right!]

She continued to rant. [Besides, you aren't seeing the bigger picture! Once I become strong enough, the Volgrim Empire will have a new foundation of power to build upon! Not one, but two Middle Cosmics! Dosena can protect the homeworld, while I destroy the Plague right at their source. I can become the sword, while she becomes the shield. Don't you see?! This is all to win the war!]

Fellrun stared at Demila, momentarily dumbfounded.

[You… cannot possibly… believe in such a weak Truth.] Fellrun said, more disappointed than angry. [How can a Psion as ancient as you be hoodwinked by such an easily disproven lie? You are not creating a new pillar of power for our Empire… you are stripping away its foundation!]

[It doesn't matter how many Executors we have.] Demila retorted. [Only Middle, High, and Apex Cosmics can protect us from the Plague and other future Threats. I am not the blind one, Fellrun. You are! If other Psions were to do as I have done, we could devour these weak Sentients and strengthen ourselves, making our Empire indomitable!]

[You don't even believe the words you're speaking.] Fellrun bit back. [If you did, you would have eaten the humans and demons first. But no, you went after your fellow Psions first. And why would you do that? Because you're a coward. You feared a fair fight against your fellow Psions.]

Fellrun lifted his chin. He looked down at Demila with all of his eyes, contempt dripping from his countenance.

[You are a coward, and you've always been one. That is the true reason your Seed stopped progressing. No amount of supplication, no amount of consulting the ancestors, no petitioning your betters would ever replace a heart of bravery. Becoming a High Psion isn't only an honor... it is a privilege... one you have wasted.]

Fellrun stretched out his arm and opened his palm. A two-headed glaive materialized in his grasp, formed out of hardened psionic energy, with an edge capable of cutting through all but the hardest alloys.

[What will it be then, coward?] Fellrun snarled. [Face me in honorable combat? Or flee into the void with your tail tucked between your legs? If you don't dare to fight me, then you have no right to refer to yourself as a 'future pillar of the Volgrim.']

Demila glared at her opponent with cold eyes.

[You have a lot of guts calling your senior a coward, brat. Not only will I fight you, but I will show you what two million cycles of experience have taught me!]

Fellrun readied himself for the fight of his life.

[I expect nothing but disappointment.]

Part 645: Demila's Delusions

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. Naandril I.

Creator Demila and Divinator Fellrun assessed each other for three seconds.

Then Fellrun attacked.

The younger of the two was still a million-ear-old monster. He did not wish to give his older opponent any time to think, and the fate of the Volgrim Empire hung in the balance. Instead of arrogantly taunting Demila as if he could not possibly lose, he assumed this was a life or death battle where no backup would come should he fail, and he was the last hope of the Psions to defeat her.

Neither Demila nor Fellrun knew of Executor Nufaris's fate, but that didn't matter. Nufaris was not allowed to leave Volgarius undefended, and all the other 8th Level Psions had fallen. If Fellrun could not beat Demila, then she would definitely move on to Naandril III and finish off the Psion population. The Volgrim Empire had lost two-thirds of its military might. Its future was already dire, but losing the rest would definitely seal its fate.

The male Psion whirled his two-headed glaive around his body. Jason Hiro might seem a master of the Bo Staff, but compared to Fellrun, he was like a child flailing his arms. Fellrun's movements were so efficient, so smooth and natural, that his conjured weapon felt as though it was simply something he was born with, like the tail of a crocodile, or the wings of an eagle.

He flickered across space and appeared before Demila in an instant, moving to behead her in one swift movement. She flickered to the side at the exact same time and dodged while summoning three swords that levitated around her. One of the swords slashed out and crashed against the glaive, deflecting its attack slightly. The other two cut and stabbed at Fellrun from tricky angles.

Fellrun allowed his glaive to bounce and reflect off Demila's first sword. He instantly reversed its momentum to snap the opposite side of the glaive at one of the swords stabbing toward his heart while also 'swimming' his feet upward in the air. His right foot casually kicked aside the final sword, breaking it to pieces and scattering its psionic energy to the cosmos. It turned out he had summoned a barrier of psionic energy around his foot durable enough to counter the hardness of her sword.

In an instant, they traded three attacks, then two seconds later, they traded ten more! The two Psions moved with speed and ferocity. Fellrun pressed his offensive, but in truth he remained completely guarded, always paying attention to his opponent's movements.

[You may be a failure and a disgrace of a Psion unable to advance to the level of Executor on your own, but you are skilled in battle and a worthy opponent.] He spoke while fighting, easily able to multi-task during such a fast and brutal fight.

[And you are a fool if you think the reason I failed to advance was due to a lack of effort!] Demila snapped back, visibly irritated. [You are but a million cycles old, while I am two! I meditated, trained, learned from the ancestors, and did everything I possibly could! I am twice your age, you foolish boy! You will not leave here alive. I will swallow your power and advance to the next level!]

Demila flickered backward. She stopped focusing any attention on her swords. They, however, continued to attack Fellrun, albeit a little less effectively than before. This was because of her psionic specialty. As a 'Creator', she did not merely summon phantasms of psionic energy, but living, thinking constructs that had the capacity to fight and maneuver on their own. This ability had always been her secret weapon, her strongest trump card, but it had never been anywhere near as effective as it was after ascending to Executor. Now, her conjured weapons and constructs were much more intelligent, durable, and capable of fighting on their own than they were before!

Demila waved her hand. A copy of herself materialized to her right, and then another copy materialized on her left. The two of them shimmered along with her main body, and her soul signature blurred for a moment. When it stopped blurring, Fellrun narrowed his eyes.

He couldn't believe his psionic senses. Demila had clearly swapped places with one of her Psio-Clones, but he couldn't tell which one. All three of them had the same signature. They looked the same. They even moved the same!

[Impossible. No Psion can so casually create such vibrant living, breathing entities!] Fellrun exclaimed in disbelief.

[Just because I failed to advance my Seed does not mean I failed to advance my combat capabilities.] Demila said, this thought radiating out of each copy's head in unison. [You are outmatched, stupid child.]

Demila could not defeat Fellrun if they fought on his terms. He was unbeatable in one-on-one combat. Fellrun had long established himself as capable of defeating foes much stronger than himself, so long as the battle only involved a duo. He was a Champion Killer. It was even rumored that if he fought the Second Founder, he could make her sweat, despite the power difference in their Seeds. But the equation changed when he fought many foes in unison. No longer was a victory as certain.

This had been proven many times during the Kolvaxian War. The Kolvaxians were once weak and pathetic, but Fellrun's ability to slaughter many weaker enemies was vastly inferior to other Executors. As a result, his notoriety fell. He was only dispatched to deal with Kolvax-Clones of the other Executors, as well as opponents worthy of his intervention.

Demila's three selves circled around Fellrun like vultures. One of them started rapidly firing powerful bursts of psionic lightning, striking barriers he instantly conjured. The other wielded metallic chains fitted with a razor-sharp tip at the end. She snapped the chain around like a whip, trying to entangle Fellrun's glaive and limbs to slow down his movements and create an opening. The final one manipulated space, making it much denser around Fellrun, and hampering him in tandem with the second one's efforts. All the while, they constantly summoned more and more swords to hamper and slow him down.

Fellrun snarled nastily. [These abilities are not yours, you witch! I know you! You are no master of Energy Manipulation!]

[I wasn't.] Demila admitted while smiling with her eyes. [But that was before. I see now a future path for the Volgrim! After I have taken up my rank as our species' newest 9th Level Psion, I will train the next generation of Psions to wield this power of the demons. The strong will climb the ladder of power! They will swallow those who are weaker and rapidly ascend, becoming unbeatable! Our numbers may thin, but our base of power will become indestructible. Quality over quantity!]

[Hah! You're one to speak of quality.] Fellrun sneered, batting away another dual sword-strike aimed at his vitals. [You're the lowest of our people, yet think yourself our messiah. We will not fall for your twisted ways, you mud-lover! Psions must remain pure!]

[Imbecile! Use your head!] Demila snapped back. [I am much older than you. I have seen more than you! Do you truly think it is a coincidence there is only one 9th Level Psion in our Empire? How can that be true when once, long ago, there were seven? Founder Dosena is manipulating all of you, feeding you lies to keep you down so she alone can act as our sole guardian. She hoards power because she does not trust us. As a result, we lacked high level champions who could attack and wipe away the Plague! We're losing the war because of her machinations!]

Fellrun could not offer a counter-argument. As it happened, he and the other Executors had privately discussed such a possibility many times. They were not stupid. They could sense that there was some sort of oddity preventing them from rising to the 9th Level. Dosena herself did not seem to be directly interfering, but something was definitely holding them all back. They simply did not know what.

Even so, Fellrun refused to accept the words of a so-called 'Executor' who had ascended through such a disgusting method as soul manipulation. Her words could not be trusted. She was likely being fed talking points by the demons!

[You will not corrupt my thoughts, mud-lover.] Fellrun said decisively. [Your lies fester like poison. Anyone who slanders our Founders deserves death!]

[You know I am right, yet you play at ignorance.] Demila countered. [Once I eliminate you, I will ensure the next Order of Psions does not contain such brainwashed fools.]

[There won't BE another Order!] Fellrun roared. [You have doomed our Empire! Two Middle Cosmics cannot protect all our star systems alone! The Plague already outnumbers us! Now you've ensured its total victory!!]

Fellrun couldn't be bothered to waste another word on his stupid senior. Even if there were grains of truth to what she said, he still forcibly shut off his critical thinking to focus on the fight.

His glaive abruptly changed form, catching Demila off-guard. It morphed from a hardened pole with two bladed ends to a pole with chains at each end attached to the blades. Its central region took on a plus-shape, and two additional chained heads sprouted, making it look like a helicopter of death.

This new weapon was cumbersome and unwieldy. Any amateur would probably injure or even kill themselves if they tried spinning it around just once, but Fellrun was no amateur. This was his ace in the hole.

He started whirling the four blades around himself as if they were nunchaku. He accelerated his speed and launched at one of Demila's bodies, the one firing lightning blasts, uncertain if it was her or not. At this point, he had to take a risk. He was supposed to be the attacker, but she held all the initiative by outnumbering him.

Fellrun focused his mind. When lightning bolts flew his way, he intercepted them with one of his nunchaku, absorbing the cosmic lightning in the blade and momentarily empowering it before snapping it at his opponent.

Slash-slash-slash!

Within three seconds, he cut down Demila's clone. He beheaded her, only to sense that a new clone had instantly taken the previous one's place and reappeared in the distance behind him alongside the others.

Fellrun rapidly calculated some attack vectors in his mind.

I fight with my body, while Demila fights with her psionic powers. Her energy expenditure will be much higher as a result. That means in a battle of attrition, she will exhaust herself much faster than me. If I keep forcing her to summon new clones and launch long-range attacks, she will eventually slow down. That's when I can end this... once and for all.

He turned and flew at the new Demila clone, as well as the other two. They split up and went in different ways, forcing him to pick one to follow. He frowned, unsure which one was the real one. They all felt exactly the same. He had no idea she possessed such an absurd duplication ability. This was not like Vulpanix, who could temporarily break the fabric of reality and conjure alternate versions of herself from other timelines. Demila's clones were made from pure psionic energy, yet their bodies were flesh and blood.

It broke all the rules he had come to learn regarding Psionic powers. How could she make such convincing duplicates?

A hint of disbelief entered his eyes. What if Demila was right? What if Dosena was holding her species back to enrich herself? What if there was more to a Psion's power than he knew? Maybe by linking up with the demons, Demila had tapped into a new power that could make them more formidable in the coming era?

No! That couldn't be right! She was a traitor and had to die.

Fellrun intensified his assault. He stepped on the air and started darting from left to right, charging after her clones much faster than before. Having assessed the situation, he realized that he could easily spare the energy expenditure, while she could not. In time, Demila would weaken faster and faster, make a mistake, and he could rush in to deal a killing blow.

Over the next several minutes, the two Executors fell silent. Demila sensed his new conviction. She frowned as he started ignoring her swords, conjured armor around his vitals, and cut down her clones one after the other. Nothing was able to stop him. Fellrun's assault grew so intense she stopped being able to summon two clones at once and occasionally dipped down to one for seconds at a time.

Demila had one saving grace. A special soul-link she possessed allowed her to swap places with any of her clones at a moment's notice, so long as they were within a certain range. Several times, Fellrun locked on to the correct Demila and nearly killed her, but she swapped at the last nanosecond and escaped by the skin of her teeth. She started to become worried as she sensed that her psionic energy was dipping.

So that's his plan. Demila thought. He wants to exhaust me!

Unfortunately, knowing about Fellrun's plan and being able to do something about it were two entirely different things.

He was just too fast! His control of the quadruple-nunchaku was picture-perfect! Once he drew within melee range, it was always over. Demila had no effective counter to him. He blocked her ranged attacks. Her close range attacks were too slow and clumsy. She now possessed a wide variety of abilities taken from stronger and weaker Psion souls, but she hadn't had time to practice with them. This battle was giving her precious experience in honing her abilities, but it wasn't nearly enough to train her in so many disciplines at once.

Suddenly, as Fellrun launched at her again, Demila had an idea.

Instead of attacking his physical body, she realized he had a weakness she hadn't considered yet.

Demila narrowed all of her eyes. She waited until Fellrun was about to attack her clone, then her real body sent a powerful micro-burst of telepathic energy at the side of Fellrun's head.

Fellrun sensed the impending danger, but he'd grown so used to Demila's pathetic attacks that he disregarded it. He cut down yet another of her clones right as his thoughts turned to garbled mush.

[Aaaah!!]

Fellrun's mind fell into disarray. His soul vibrated in agony. Electrical pain surged through all of his limbs, causing him to seize up. The momentary loss of control caused him to lose his grip on his weapon. One of the blades slashed down and sliced off his right leg at the knee, but he was in so much pain he didn't even notice. Then the nunchaku careened away, flying into the distance.

Fellrun, to his credit, quickly regained his mental focus. He snapped back to attention and motioned with his hand, only to belatedly realize he had lost his grip on his nunchaku. Then the pain of his lost leg hit him. It was, surprisingly, much less agonizing than whatever the hell Demila had struck his Mind Realm with a moment earlier. Psion physical bodies were not that prone to collapsing, even if they lost multiple limbs. Their minds were their most potent weapon, after all.

[Hahaha...] Demila laughed evilly, her eyes turning cunning. [I knew it. You hastily shoved your True Soul back into your body to prevent me from accessing it. But how can you assimilate your soul in so short a time? You've secretly been putting some effort into concealing the backlash! I wouldn't have noticed if you hadn't been so cautious until recently!]

Fellrun glanced at Demila. His expression gave no hints, but his stomach tightened in worry. The truth was, any Psion who died and revived inside a new body, or who moved their soul into a body, would suffer from Rejection Sickness. It was never deadly, but it always lowered the combat prowess of their body and made them temporarily vulnerable to mental and soul-based attack vectors. In his case, a week or two of meditation would allow him to properly align his body and soul, but he didn't have that kind of time. Demila had to be stopped!

Only now did he realize there was a fatal flaw in his plan. Demila was one of the strongest telepaths in the Volgrim Empire. She was well known for being able to read the surface thoughts of fellow 7th-Level Psions and much deeper and more private thoughts of weaker entities. Such a fine-tuned specialty wasn't much use against most opponents usually, but in this one specific scenario... it meant the difference between victory and loss.

[No!] Fellrun shouted. He started to summon a new version of his weapon, only for Demila to mercilessly blast him with another beam of soul-rending telepathic energy. Fellrun's mind went blank and his body locked up, leaving him totally vulnerable to attack. Demila plunged her conjured swords into his heart, stomach, and neck, breaking his body on the spot. Before Fellrun could react, she swooped in and smashed her palm into his head, crushed his defenseless skull, and grabbed hold of his soul before it could dissipate.

Demila won.

She defeated an Executor previously considered the strongest among his kind. If it hadn't been for his one weakness, she would have lost.

But in the end, a win was a win, a victor was a victor, and a loser was a loser.

Demila grinned devilishly. She didn't hesitate before latching on to Fellrun's screaming soul and quickly sucking out its juices. Her power spiked, her exhaustion disappeared, and her energy recovered to its peak. At the same time, she was shocked to find that her Psionic Level came close to the apex of what an Executor could reach. Fellrun was an ancient monster like her, and he had many eras to consolidate his Seed. He was the highest quality Executor she'd eaten to date.

She hadn't made it to the 9th Level, but she was close. Deliciously close!

Psions might not have mouths, but Demila still metaphorically licked her lips hungrily. She drained Fellrun of everything he had, leaving his soul hollow, faded, and ready to dissipate into nothingness.

Demila hesitated.

Right now, she could could kill this mighty Executor with no effort at all. She could squeeze her fingers and pinch his soul into cosmic dust, or she could let it go and it would travel to the Great Beyond.

But she would never do either of these things. The other Volgrim might think she was a traitor, but Demila knew in her heart she was not.

Her methods were brutal, but her cause was just. She meant what she said. She intended to become the second 9th Level Psion. Founder Dosena would be spared. She would have no choice but to accept Demila's rise. Dosena would begrudgingly have to live with the fact that she would remain as Volgarius's defender, while Demila would seek out and kill the Plague inside the Milky Way's hidden dimension known as the 'False Cosmic Realm.' With Dosena as the shield and Demila as the sword, the Volgrim would finally beat back the Plague and revive its future.

The other Volgrim were too short-sighted. They could not envision the breadth of Demila's grand plan. Though they thought her selfish now, they would realize that as the 6th Founder, she would be capable of conjuring other versions of herself, all equally as strong as her, and then projecting that power across the entire Milky Way.

What would those foolish so-called 'Demon Deities' be able to do when five of Demila's clones attacked their worlds all at once? They would bend the knee, or they would die!

Visions of grandeur flashed through Demila's mind. She easily saw the great future awaiting her. If she could only make it to the 9th Level, all her sins would not be in vain.

She held Fellrun's diminished soul in her grasp, feeling guilty about what she had done to him. That feeling passed. She traveled into the soul facility, where trembling and fearful Technopaths pressed themselves against the walls, looking at her as if she were a monster from a horror movie. She directed a look of pity their way, then placed Fellrun's soul into a soul prism where it would be held until he could revive as an Initiator.

[I know that you fear and hate me now.] Demila said to those Technopaths. [But someday, you will understand. Everything I have done is for the good of our Empire.]

"N-nonsense!" One of the bolder Technopaths shouted. "Lies! You are a traitor! Do you understand what you've done?! You've ruined us! Ruined us!!"

Demila sighed. She could kill him with a flick of her finger, but she would never harm another Volgrim. Even now, she had not killed a single Psion. She had drained their souls, yes, but they would revive. They would start over, anew, as Initiators. Humbled though they might be, they could start from scratch, advancing faster than they originally did, rebuilding their Seeds with knowledge of their future potential. It might take a few thousand years, but that was nothing compared to the millions she had lived.

The Volgrim Empire would endure. Someday, she would be championed as its savior. Its greatest hero! She might even be revered as the mightiest and wisest Founder!

As these thoughts flickered through Demila's mind, she forgot about the pitiful condemnations of the Technopath who dared to voice his opinion. He was not worth responding to. He could never grasp the sacrifice she had made, nor the full extent of her plans. It was not worth wasting a single iota of mental energy on him.

Demila levitated into the sky, then flew out of Naandril I's atmosphere.

Naandril III was her next target. With how close she was to the 9th Level, she knew her goal was as good as achieved.

Soon, she would obtain the accolades she deserved.

Soon, everyone would understand the wisdom of her actions...

Part 646: Demila's Destruction

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. Inside the sub-dimension of Chrona.

The happenings of the Volgrim Empire did not escape Fiona's gaze. As humanity's watcher, she oversaw it from afar. She viewed the galaxy from a distance, unable to make contact with it easily. Day by day, her connection network was breaking down bit by bit.

She watched as Demila revealed the hunger lurking within her soul. Her stomach roiled when the ancient monster turned to the wicked ways of the demons and began devouring the soul energy of her fellow Psions.

Eventually, after many weeks of watching, Fiona couldn't take it anymore. She turned away from the video feeds and left the Spynet Sphere.

She stepped back out into the main city of Chrona and looked up at the sky, although calling it that was a bit of a misnomer. Anyone could easily make out that the pitch-black void above was not natural, but artificial. They wouldn't see the light of the outer universe; only the sheen of the dimensional wall, and the faintly swirling gray cosmic energy that locked Chrona in place, accelerating its time and keeping it anchored to a secret position somewhere in the Milky Way.

The sounds of hammering drew Fiona's attention. She spotted a few of of Kar and Blinker's children up on some scaffolding, one of them nailing a board down as he worked to build a new residence. While there weren't a lot of crocodiles in Chrona, there weren't only a few, either. They numbered in the hundreds, and rumor had it Blinker was pregnant again. She'd probably give birth in the next few months, and the need for more housing would grow.

The young crocodile, a black-scaled member of the 13th generation, Romeo, seemed to sense Fiona's presence. He paused his hammering and waved. "Hurgh! How are you doing, Fiona?"

"I'm good." She responded. "Have you seen your mother?"

Romeo pondered the question for a moment before nodding to the west. "In the park."

"Alright, thanks!" Fiona said.

They didn't usually exchange many words. The crocodiles barely cared about the outside galaxy, and had no desire to travel and live out there. News of the Psion collapse certainly didn't make the outside galaxy feel secure, and though their life in Chrona might be humble, it was also pleasant.

Hundreds of years had passed in Chrona. The central city had grown noticeably more developed, especially with Rebecca casually offering pointers on city design once in a while. Her neural net possessed several exabytes of data on classical and futuristic city designs, courtesy of ancient Earth and many modern Volgrim cities around the galaxy, so she was a huge help in streamlining the city's infrastructure.

Chrona was growing not only in population, but in size. Much like the Labyrinth, its borders expanded over time. The more life energy that accumulated, the greater its size would become, and the faster its rate of expansion.

To date, it had only increased in size by a modest ten percent... but more space to live in was still good news for everyone involved. There was plenty of room for all Chrona's inhabitants now, but nobody could predict the situation in another hundred or even a thousand years.

Fiona wandered westward until she reached a pretty little park Blinker and Rebecca had been growing over time near the center of Chrona's central city. It featured a miniature artificial river that swept through it in an S-curve, a large central fountain with a statue of Jason holding his bo staff and water coming out of his outstretched palm, and lots of flowers and trees. So many shrubs and flowers lined the perimeter that they became a visual treat for anyone who wanted to sit down and enjoy a colorful setting.

Fiona entered the park, and in less than a minute she found Blinker sitting on a bench under a tree, nursing baby Timothy. He was barely a year old, and without his mother around, the only options for properly feeding him were some sort of baby formula, or a wet nurse. As a mother of many, Blinker agreed to take on that role, since Fiona could not.

Fiona sat on the bench, her spiritual body containing enough mass thanks to Chrona's improvements that she nearly felt like a real flesh and blood person. She sighed heavily, and Blinker looked at her.

"Still only bad news?"

"Pretty much." Fiona muttered, laying her head back and sighing even deeper. "Demila's rampage is drawing to a close. She's devoured all three Psion soul-worlds. Once she finishes eating all the souls on Naandril III, she'll be... I don't even know. I have no idea what her plans are, but they won't be good for humanity."

Blinker fell silent for a time. She looked off into the distance wistfully.

"Chrona is so peaceful, sometimes I forget about the pain and suffering happening outside its boundaries." Blinker murmured. "If we want to make a difference, we need to work harder."

"While true, we have a major problem on our hands which will soon complicate things." Fiona responded. "The time dilation is only continuing to increase in speed. We're already progressing at 290x the speed of the outside universe. By the time Timothy is an adult, we'll probably be at 300x, or maybe even 325x. I've lost control of a few Spynet cameras already. If the rate of speed continues to increase, a future where we become fully cut off from the outside galaxy is likely to occur. We won't be able to communicate with anyone due to the speed differential, and we won't be able to see what's happening out there."

"Are our lives in danger?" Blinker asked worriedly.

"As long as we stay in here? Probably not. We will continually adjust to the increasing speed. Our bodies will compensate. I am a spiritual life-form. You and Kar have extremely powerful physical and spiritual bodies. Your kids are no different. But Timothy... well, he's an ordinary human. I fear he might suffer physical issues as the time dilation increases."

"He's not ordinary, though." Blinker pointed out. "Daisy was a Hero, just like her daddy. I bet Timothy will be, too."

That only elicited another deep sigh from Fiona. She lifted her head again and turned to look at Timothy, then she gently ran her fingers through his soft blonde baby hair.

"A Hero. Yes. He probably will be. And that worries me, too. I don't want him growing up with the burden of feeling like he has to match up to his father and save humanity."

"But humanity does need saving." Blinker pointed out. "Jason's gone, Fiona. Gressil... killed him."

"We don't know that." Fiona said quietly.

Blinker looked at Fiona, then looked away.

The last time they saw Jason, he had been crying in a hallway, despondent from losing his wife. Then his signal vanished and a vacuum of spiritual energy engulfed the area.

Gressil had appeared.

The next time they saw Jason, it was when Gressil tossed his and Phoebe's lifeless bodies out in front of countless spectators in the Core.

Gressil didn't kill Phoebe. At least, Fiona was pretty sure he didn't. Though, considering Phoebe had died the moment she arrived inside Chrona, it might be possible he did. And whether he did or didn't, all evidence pointed to the fact that he did finally kill Jason in his moment of weakness.

But Fiona had a feeling. A gut instinct. She refused to believe Jason was dead. Maybe Gressil was deceiving them. He was a master of illusions, after all. Jason's body could have been fabricated!

...Except, she had reacquired him and Phoebe both. She teleported them to Chrona and put their bodies in stasis. If the bodies she recovered were fakes, they were good ones. Every scan Rebecca ran came up green for a perfect match on both.

They were Jason and Phoebe's bodies, without a doubt.

The thought Jason might actually be dead constantly made Fiona feel lightheaded. Sometimes, she wanted to burst into tears.

Jason was married to Phoebe, not Fiona. But Fiona knew she was lying to herself when she said she felt nothing for him. Of course she loved Jason. She loved him so much it made her heart bleed. It wasn't fair. If she hadn't been the clone, and Phoebe had, then Fiona would have died along with her husband.

But she was still alive, while Jason and Phoebe had joined each other in the Great Beyond.

Now, she was all alone... left to care for the child of her 'rival'. But Fiona couldn't bring herself to complain. She simply pretended to herself that Timothy was hers. He wasn't, and she wouldn't lie to him when he grew old enough to understand... but in her heart, it made life just a little bit more bearable if she could fool herself once in a while.

"We don't know he's dead." Fiona repeated, trying to convince herself more than the Fairy Queen beside her.

Blinker didn't retort. She didn't want to hurt Fiona's feelings, but the truth was obvious. It wouldn't do anyone any good to insist on repeating what both women already knew.

"Do we have a way to fix the time dilation?" Blinker eventually asked.

"We relied entirely on Jason manually slowing Chrona down when it started to accelerate." Fiona replied. "There is no fallback option. And if you try to leave Chrona, you'll go through the same thing you did before. You may even die if you try."

Blinker grimaced. She might live in Chrona now, but she spent the vast majority of her life in the outside universe. She didn't want to be locked into a tiny little world like Chrona, let alone all of her kids.

"My fairy magic is capable of a lot of things." Blinker eventually said. "I'm going to try getting in contact with Fairy Queen Calanthra. Maybe she'll be able to offer me some pointers remotely. I might be able to solve the time dilation myself."

"I sure hope so." Fiona said. "Oh, looks like Timothy is done nursing. Want me to take over?"

Blinker nodded gratefully. She passed the baby over to his surrogate mother, and Fiona started playing with him in that cute way she always did.

The two women continued to talk, but after discussing such dark happenings, they instead drifted off into more mundane and peaceful topics...

On the world of Volgarius, Founder Unarin stood at the edge of the landing pad inside the Founder's Thumb. He held Founder Dosena in his arms, while his Head Administrator, Muuxunuu, stood beside him, her arms folded in front of her waist. They both gazed off into the distance, looking at smoke from countless collapsed stratoscrapers. Eventually, the Volgrim had managed to stop the domino effect of collapsing structures, but the damage dealt was truly incalculable. Over two trillion Low Psions, Technopaths, and Changelings had perished. A hundred thousand stratoscrapers had fallen, and it remained to be seen how many centuries their people would need to rebuild that which they had lost.

Assuming they even could. They likely did not have much time left. With the Psion army dead, they would not be able to prop up any meaningful resistance against the Plague, which had amassed an unstoppable, nigh-unkillable army of its own Psions.

The Volgrim could no longer protect themselves. How could they protect the rest of the Milky Way? The demons would fall. The humans would fall. Everything would be subsumed by the voracious appetite of the Plague.

Unstoppable. Uncompromising.

The faceless monstrosities held neither malice nor mercy. They devoured all life without remorse, like a tsunami engulfing a city.

They were like a force of nature... though nothing about them was natural in the slightest.

Despite all the horrible happenings, Unarin's expression did not change. He simply looked out at the distant smoke as if none of it had anything to do with him.

"Ten million cycles." Unarin remarked lightly. "And now, the end has come for our people. There have been shorter-lived Empires. There have been longer-lived ones, as well. I suppose all good things must eventually come to an end. What do you think, Muuxunuu?"

He looked at the blank face of his wife. She had long ago ceased to be a living, breathing Sentient with thoughts and emotions.

Now, she was only a robotic, lifeless husk. A pale remnant of her former self.

"Yes. All good things must end." Muuxunuu repeated.

Unarin faintly smiled. To him, there was one good thing that had disappeared from his life many millions of years before. Every time he looked at her, he was reminded of his greatest loss.

He had ceased to be an individual on that day. He had truly taken up the mantle of the Volgrim's leader. He had sacrificed everything to become the thing his people needed most.

And now?

His sacrifice meant nothing. It was all coming to an end.

Dosena stirred in Unarin's arms. She gurgled painfully, her telepathic voice shaky.

[Demila... is... coming.]

Despite her weakness, Dosena had remained fully aware of all the happenings around her. She suffered pangs of unending agony as a result of the Akashic Backlashes, but her mind remained sharp.

Unarin pursed his lips. He looked up into the sky, not entirely sure which direction Demila would arrive from.

[Put me... down.] Dosena said, her tone weak. [But help... me... stand. Help me lean.]

She forced a bit of vigor into her voice, but it was clear Dosena was not in any shape to fight. If Demila came with ill intentions, the Second Founder would be helpless. It was only because of her unbending pride that she refused to allow this stupid junior to see her helpless in Unarin's arms.

Unarin hesitated. Then, he nodded, and lowered her feet to the ground.

"Alright."

Dosena shuddered. Her knees clicked together as she tried to stand. Eventually, her face contorted in pain.

[Damn. I still... can't stand. This won't... do. How humiliating.]

After thinking for a moment, and knowing it wouldn't be long before Demila drew near, Dosena came to a decision. She shakily lifted an arm and motioned with her hand. A drop of golden liquid materialized in the air before her, making Unarin's heart skip a beat. He looked at her in shock, but she ignored him. Dosena levitated the liquid toward her forehead and pressed it against her glabella. It disappeared instantly, melting into her soul.

Just like that, her body regained a bit of strength. She hesitated for a moment, then pulled away from Unarin, beathing heavily. She reactivated her psionic powers and levitated off the ground, crossed her arms behind her back, and assumed her typical haughty, domineering posture.

"Dosena." Unarin said, his frown deepening even more. "You told me you wouldn't-"

[I will not be humiliated.] Dosena immediately replied. [This is my decision. Do not interfere.]

Her psionic power was still weak, but at least it had stabilized... temporarily.

Less than three minutes later, Dosena turned her head southward. Unarin followed her gaze. With his sharp eyes, he picked out many different specks in the horizon, but one of them accelerated at blinding speeds and rushed toward the Founder's Thumb far faster than any ship ever could.

That speck, as expected, turned out to be Demila. She roared toward the Founder's Thumb and came to an instant halt just twenty meters away from the landing platform. Her aura overflowed with power, and she crossed her arms, looking down on the insects before her with an expression of delight.

She had succeeded. She was no longer an Executor… but a true 9th Level Psion.

She was like Dosena, and the six other ancient Psions who came before her. Demila had finally joined the ranks of the most legendary monsters who once ruled the cosmos.

But neither Unarin nor Dosena looked at her with any level of appreciation. It was as if they had spotted a tumbleweed rolling past. Demila's legendary strength did not affect them in the slightest.

[Why the dour looks?] Demila asked haughtily. [I know my actions have distressed you, Founders. But rejoice! This is a great day for our Empire! It will be remembered for eons to come, as the moment we finally took back the initiative against our lessers.]

When neither of the Founders deigned to respond, Demila frowned, but continued speaking.

[I know you see only despair in our future, but you don't understand what has happened! Though Volgarius has suffered under the attack of that demon, Mephisto, it survived. It endured! And now, after harnessing the power of the demons, I have ascended to a level high enough to make a tremendous impact in the war against the Plague!]

Dosena narrowed her eyes, but before she could speak, Unarin did.

"The power of the demons, you say?" Unarin asked, putting on an expression of interest. "And what power would this be? It sounds impressive."

Demila smiled with her eyes. She liked hearing Unarin's words of praise. [The power of Soul Manipulation, First Founder Unarin. By devouring the energy of many souls, I was able to combine them with my own to Uplift myself. This power is a game changer! It could even alter the way we Psions ascend for millennia to come!]

Unarin appeared intrigued. "That does sound fascinating. Could you elaborate more on the specifics?"

Demila smiled with her eyes. It was as she expected. Unarin could not remain unmoved in the face of such an amazing new paradigm. The old way of building up power slowly over many centuries would not give the Psions a leg-up against their adversaries, but the shortcut of using Soul Manipulation would!

As such, Demila immediately launched into an explanation.

"You see, First Founder, you may have thought I devoured and killed off the other Psions, but that is not the case. I drained their soul energy, but all of them are still alive. They can revive in new bodies and start over from scratch, growing once again to new heights."

Unarin glanced at Dosena. He shrugged nonchalantly.

"So the Psions are still alive. I had heard that was the case, but it's good to receive confirmation from you." He said, returning his gaze to Demila. "It seems you did not go overboard."

Demila beamed with happiness. She had assumed she would arrive to an enraged Unarin, but he was actually taking this news rather well! He might even be receptive to her bold new idea.

[That's right, First Founder.] Demila continued. [And furthermore, I realized this new paradigm could result in a rapid explosion of Ascensions among the Psions. Think of it. A new Order, one where Psions progress not only by training their bodies and souls, but by competing among each other. If we harness the power of demons for ourselves, we could have them compete to swallow each other's powers, making the most worthy among them stronger, much faster than before.]

Unarin nodded along. "Hmm. Let me see if I understand correctly. You were told of an innovative new way of allowing Psions to ascend by a demon... Gressil, right?"

Demila smiled with her eyes. [Yes, First Founder.]

He nodded again, then rubbed his chin as he fell into thought. "Ahh, and this method involves devouring soul energy of other Psions to empower yourself. But, the problem comes in that you could not devour all the soul energy, right? You couldn't directly ingest the souls. Likely a limitation of demonic power to Psionic power."

Demila's smile faltered. [Y-yes. But... how did you know about that last part? I didn't mention...]

Unarin continued speaking. "Of course, in order to uplift yourself to Dosena's level, you had to devour a lot of souls. The energy conversion ratio must have been atrocious. How many trillions of Psions just to make one Supremator?"

Demila's expression turned to stone. Something about the way Unarin was speaking... how did he know so many specific details she hadn't even told him?

For the first time since Demila's arrival, Dosena finally lifted her head. She glowered at her junior, directing an expression of pure venom at Demila.

[Demila. You... you foolish... stupid... BRAINDEAD... traitor to our people.]

Demila's heart jumped. Why had the atmosphere changed so abruptly? What was she missing? Why were the Founders suddenly acting so differently from before?!

[W-what?] Demila asked. [This is... this is good news for our Empire! Why are you acting so-]

[OUR Empire?!] Dosena roared, her eyes turning bloodshot with rage. [You have the GALL to lecture the Founders about our future after you, in your insipid ignorance, destroyed that future?! This is not YOUR Empire! You did not build it! You did not uplift it from its ancient war-ridden ways into a peaceful utopia! YOU are nothing more than an attention-seeking bastard who has destroyed countless millennia of accumulation all to satisfy her own GREED!]

Deosena snapped her hand up and pointed a shaking finger at Demila, who by now had realized something had gone very, very wrong. She was clearly overlooking something dreadfully important... she just didn't know what.

[Gressil LIED to you!] Dosena shrieked. [And you fell for it, because you are an insecure, pathetic excuse for a Psion! He did not grant you any special 'powers' belonging to the demons. Those were latent powers ALL Psions already possessed. They were a scourge upon our species that Unarin and I explicitly took great steps to PURGE from our ranks! And you brought them back! YOU BROUGHT THEM BACK!]

Demila began to shake. She looked at the Second Founder with a mixture of confusion, disbelief, and horror.

[What? No! You're misunderstanding, Second Founder! It isn't what you think! These powers allowed the demons to devour souls and become stronger. They-]

[IMBECILE!!] Dosena screamed, wanting to rip her own face off in rage. [ALL Psions possess the ability to drain one another's soul energy. This cursed power led to countless civil wars among our people. It caused us to fight one another, eat each other, and turn on our own species with more fervor than we ever did our enemies. It ultimately led to the creation of the Sentinels, and nearly caused the extinction of all sentient life in the Milky Way!!]

Dosena grabbed at her head. Waves of agony emanated from her soul. She not only suffered from the lingering pain of the Akashic Backlash, but also the torture of remembering those dark, ancient times.

[No... no... it's not true.] Demila said, unable to believe what her senior was saying. She turned a hopeful gaze toward Unarin, but his expression said it all.

"Stupid Demila. Foolish descendant." Unarin said, his expression as cloudy as a stormy day. "Allowing you to go on as you always did, insecure in your failings, was the greatest mistake I ever made. You swallowed the power of countless promising seeds. You cut off their futures. Didn't you ever think of the long term mental fallout each Psion would feel once they realized they had been forced back to the starting point of their Journey? At least a third, maybe even two-thirds, are likely to commit suicide due to despair once we revive them! The loss of power is not merely a drop in strength, but a complete erasure of their life's work!"

Unarin pressed a palm against his face and rubbed it furiously, closing his eyes and laughing to himself at the absurdity of the situation.

"Hahaha! To think my glorious Empire would be undone by the greed and sniveling machinations of a coward like you, Demila! At least in the ancient times, Psions would fight one another to steal their opponent's Psionic Energy. But no! Not you! Not the Great Demila! You attacked your comrades while they were defenseless, sucking them dry while they couldn't even fight back! And you have the audacity to lecture us, acting as if you have even a shred of pride or honor left?!"

Unarin pulled his hand away from his face. He looked at Demila, who appeared completely crestfallen. Her entire aura had dissipated. She stood on the platform, unable to control her Psionic powers properly. Her emotions were in such turmoil that she couldn't even properly form words.

[I... I didn't... mean... didn't know... couldn't...]

Demila pressed her palms against the sides of her head. Inside her soul, Desire was laughing unceasingly.

HAHAHA. YOU FELL FOR IT. YOU STUPID FEMALE. YOU BETRAYED YOUR ENTIRE SPECIES. YOU DID WHAT WE TOLD YOU, EXACTLY AS WE TOLD YOU. HAHAHA. HAHAHA!!! WE LED YOU BY THE NOSE, AND YOU WERE TOO STUPID TO EVEN ASK THE MOST BASIC OF QUESTIONS!! UNARIN IS RIGHT. YOU ARE A FAILURE, A PATHETIC, USELESS INSECT!

[No.. no... no...] Demila whimpered, all the joy of her ascension having completely vanished. It felt as if a void had swallowed her soul.

She felt empty. Completely empty, like a bowl that had all of its contents carelessly dumped out.

"Demila." Unarin said, folding his hands behind his back. "Do us all a favor. Spare the galaxy any further stupidity... and kill yourself."

Demila whimpered. She couldn't bring herself to look at the Founders. She couldn't look them in the eyes. She couldn't even bear to think about the crimes she had committed.

She had sinned. She had betrayed everything that made her... her!

At once, Demila stopped shaking. She stared at the ground for a moment.

Then... her body imploded.

Her Psionic Seed collapsed in on itself, instantly obliterating her physical existence and leaving nothing behind but her Seed itself.

Creator Demila, traitor of the Volgrim Empire... had perished.

Dosena reached out and grabbed Demila's Psionic Seed. She looked at it for only a moment, then crushed it in her hands, dissipating it to dust.

A long silence followed.

Volgarius's winds blew against Dosena, Unarin, and Muuxunuu's bodies with a gentle warmth.

Unarin looked out at the horizon and shook his head.

"We could have restored a few Executors with her Seed's remnant."

Dosena snarled at him. [We will never return to the old ways. Not once. Not ever. No compromises.]

Unarin shrugged. "Whatever you say. It doesn't matter, anyway. We're already doomed."

He cleared his throat, then turned to his Administrator.

"Muuxunuu. Call the other Founders. I want a meeting by day's end."

"Yes, Founder Unarin." Muuxunuu replied.

Part 647: Keen Instincts

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR.

The destruction of the Volgrim Empire had begun with a speed far swifter than anyone could have imaged. Demila's rampage caused untold destruction not only to the Psions, but also to Volgarius itself. Admittedly, she herself had not damaged Volgarius, but as a result of her actions, Volgarius was left nearly defenseless, allowing Mephisto to rampage unhindered. He directly caused the death of a trillion Volgrim, and would have killed even more had Executor Nufaris not selflessly given his life to stop the demon-dragon hybrid.

However, all of this was unknown to the galaxy at large. Outside of a handful of individuals inside Chrona, Fairy Queen Calanthra, and some Cosmic-level observers, most Sentients had no idea such a horrible catastrophe had just befallen their former Overlords.

Despite several Demon Deities immediately comprehending what had just happened thanks to sensing the life energies of many different Volgrim Cosmics being snuffed out, they did not rejoice, and neither did they plan any celebratory attacks on their ambiguous enemy-allies.

That was because the collapse of the Volgrim Empire, even if they were a threat to the Demons, was absolutely not worth celebrating.

Indeed, the very few select demons in the know felt chills go down their spines. Demon Deity Auger met the gaze of his subordinate, Yardrat, and the two of them quickly lowered their eyes.

Demonkind was not ready. They hadn't had any time to prepare.

What did the deaths of all the High Psions mean? It meant there was no longer a Volgrim bulwark pushing against the Plague. The Kolvaxians would soon realize they were free to rampage unhindered... assuming they hadn't already.

The demons had no idea the culprit for the Volgrim's fall was one of their own. If the Deities knew, they might go berserk and hunt Gressil down, even if only to uselessly vent their anger.

That imbecile! Because of him, there was nothing stopping the damned Plague from devouring one world after another! Even if the world was guarded by a Middle Cosmic Deity, there was no guarantee they would be able to hold back one, two, or even three Kolvaxxed Executors, let alone an unlimited army of lower-ranking, but still deadly Kolvax-Psions!

Thus, Demon Deity Auger hurriedly convened the other leading Deities. They met at the world of Numaria, where Auger reigned. Only Auger attended in person, while the rest traveled there in Astral Bodies.

They were all of the same mind.

"We cannot fight the humans anymore." Melody proclaimed. "Set aside your petty hatred. We need to let them breathe. Let them grow! We have no way to fight the Plague when it attacks, so we have to start putting as many eggs in as many baskets as we can!"

Normally, the other Deities would nod along to her words, but secretly scoff in their hearts. They all knew she was pro-human to an annoying degree. But this time was different. They truly had no backup! They didn't even know where to start with engineering a counter to the Plague. Diablo was their first, final, and only hope... and he was dead.

"Agreed." Kristoff, one of the most mild-mannered Deities, replied. "Say what you want about the humans, but they are annoyingly good at finding the weaknesses of whoever is their greatest enemy, then punching holes through them."

The Demon Deity of Devouring glanced around at the other Deities after he finished his affirmation. He stared at Auger for an unusually long time, prompting the de facto leader of demonkind to lift his chin and sigh.

"This is a truly terrible day for the galaxy." Auger said, stroking his long white goatee as he spoke. "The tides of change are fickle and prone to disaster. Not only must we set aside our petty rivalries with the humans, we must also protect and shield them. We must send demons to help them quickly build any facilities they might need. We should also proactively check with each of the monster species to see if any of them can assist in creating a counter to the Plague."

"The fairies are a good place to start." Vespera, the Deity of Quasars, intoned. She crossed her arms melodramatically, her long black elbow gloves pressing against one another as she swept her gaze around the ring of Deities. "I will not lie, though. Relying on the humans leaves a sour taste in my mouth. Would that we had a champion of our own, a cerebral powerhouse, we would not be in such an unfortunate situation."

Yardrat's eyes dimmed. "We never understood how important Ose was to our species until she was gone. I'd sacrifice a trillion lesser demons, or even offer up my own life for the good of demonkind, if it meant we could revive her. Serena, is there a chance your magic might be able to find a trace of her soul?"

The Soulmancer, Serena, lightly shook her head. "Even if I could, that damned Demila and her antics led to Tarus II being destroyed, and along with it the last remnants of Valac's Lantern. We have no way of bringing back the dead."

A flicker of intent snapped across Auger's eyes. "What of Bael? He inhabits Ose's body, yes? I know he is a dimwit and a fool, but is there truly no way we could somehow tap into Ose's brain to reignite her psyche?"

Serena sighed. "If only things were that simple. I am a master of souls, not of brains."

The Deities fell silent again.

"What of Ose's close friend?" Melody asked. "Might she know something?"

"Close friend? Ose had no friends." Yardrat scoffed. "She was always so arrogant and full of herself, nobody even bothered to try."

"No." Vespera said, looking at Melody with interest. "You're wrong, Yardrat. There is one who, unreasonably, enjoyed basking in Ose's presence. Abby, the Baron of Happy Thoughts. She is unimpressive as far as demons go, but she is a Baron nonetheless. She and Ose spent a lot of time together, especially during the Energy Wars."

The other Deities nodded along to Vespera's words, wondering why they had not connected the dots before this point.

"Beelzebub might know something too, in that case." Yardrat pointed out. "He and Ose were oddly close, even if only for a short time. Maybe she informed him of a backup plan in case she were to die?"

"I don't think Beelzebub is going to tell us anything." Melody replied blandly. "Well, he might tell me, but even I think that's a stretch. As for the rest of you, you're on his shit-list."

The other demons glowered at Melody, but they had no retort. It was abundantly clear that whatever damned voodoo the Wordsmith had worked on him, Beelzebub had fundamentally switched sides and become humanity's greatest champion!

And, most dreadfully, he possessed the power of a Middle Cosmic! Not only that, but he had chased Executor Nufaris across multiple star-systems, so it was clear he wasn't like the other Deities, tethered to a star.

Just how in the world did he do it, every Deity including Melody wondered. He wasn't uplifted by Diablo. Did he break through the boundary all on his own? If so, that meant he might be in possession of an unbelievably valuable secret!

The other Deities sobered up. They realized all together that Beelzebub could either become demonkind's greatest enemy, or its benefactor! If they made amends and somehow wrangled the secret of ascension out of him, then even more demons could arise, and suddenly the danger of the Plague wouldn't be so alarming. It might not be scary at all! An armada of Middle Cosmics would be able to locate the Plague's source and destroy it on the spot, ending its threat forever!

Auger gritted his teeth. This next part would be... unpleasant.

"We... must do more than make amends with the humans." He said slowly. "We must also sincerely apologize to Beelzebub. He is a valued Deity, like the rest of us. Whatever demands he makes, we should do our best to fulfill them. Let us put aside the ills of the past and work toward a better future with humanity."

The other Deities nodded and raised their fists in agreement. Melody rolled her eyes and sighed. It was painfully obvious what Auger wanted, but to be honest, Melody was just as curious as he was.

How in the god damn hell did that Beelzebub do it?!

Auger looked around the gathered Deities.

"So. Are we all in agreement?" He asked.

The others nodded in unison.

"Then by our gathered wills, let it be done." Auger proclaimed.

On the world of Grimvolas, the Fifth Founder, Cinculu, stood at the ready. Before him was the planet's lone Warpgate, the very first one ever made, even preceding Volgarius's many gates. Grimvolas's portal did not activate often, and the majority of times when it did open, the reason was to allow Cinculu to make a pilgrimage to Volgarius.

Cinculu was a formidable creature. His body was overflowing with strength and vitality. Few knew just how dangerous he truly was, and none of those in the know lived on Volgarius.

He wore a golden ceremonial set of armor. It didn't offer him much protection, but it looked resplendent. It glittered under the midday sunlight of Grimvolas's golden star.

An even bigger Dolgrimite lumbered up beside Cinculu.

"Child. I have ordered two of your brothers to join you on this trip."

Cinculu turned to look at his mother, the Dolgrimite Matriarch, the most powerful of their people.

"That is out of the ordinary. I do not usually travel to Volgarius with an escort."

The Matriarch spread her mouth in a long, toothy smile.

"Unusual times call for unusual methods. You know well what today means. It is finally the end of the technology lovers' era. They will learn the error of their ways. You will open their eyes to the Truths of the universe."

Cinculu lifted his chin, ever so slightly. "You expect me to put on a show of force?"

The Matriarch rested her powerful hand on his shoulder. Her grin grew even wider.

"These fools put their faith in useless 'Cosmics'. What good is power if it means one must be shackled by Akasha's will? Even if Dosena were still a threat, I know you would not disappoint me. And without her? Well. You know what to do."

She stepped to the side, and a pair of male Dolgrimites approached from behind. They stopped a short distance away and bowed their heads respectively.

"I have lost count of the moons since I last traveled to the world of the metal-lovers." The first Dolgrimite, a yellow-scaled fellow named Virile, said. Virile wore a religious robe of red and gold. He walked with a staff and hunched over as if he were of advanced age. His ceremonial attire was not that of a combat master like Cinculu, but that of a religious leader known for his wisdom and grand thoughts.

Virile sighed. "The times are changing. As my old friend Vedric used to say... the future cannot be predicted, only foreseen up to a specific point. Even he knew not what lay beyond the Great Shattering."

The other Dolgrimite was a much nastier looking fellow. He wore a red and silver garb, one that clung loosely to his body and allowed him to move freely as if he were in the nude. His robes were just as ceremonial as the other too, but they had in their design a hint of his blood-hungry nature.

"It is a shame Demila betrayed the Psions." The second Dolgrimite, Ravagil, said. He looked at the Warpgate as if he wanted to take a bite out of it. Not due to hunger, but pure loathing of its technology-based ways. "I would have liked to fight them."

"As would I." Cinculu said, looking appreciatively at his brother Ravagil. "In time, I suppose more will rise. We can always fight them then."

Ravagil squeezed his claws together. He closed his eyes and winced as a pang of deep hunger ran through his body. The feeling disappeared, and he returned to normal.

"What is the holdup?" Ravagil impatiently asked. "Let us depart already."

"Calm down." The Matriarch said, casting a chilling glance at her child. Surprisingly, Ravagil didn't even bat an eye. The Matriach could probably fold him in half if she hit with all her strength, yet he knew nothing of the word 'fear'. He was truly fearless to a psychotic level.

"The calculations are nearly complete. Only another three time units, and we will depart." Cinculu said diplomatically.

The three of them fell silent. They waited patiently, and finally, the Warpgate whirred to life. A blue portal materialized in its center, eventually revealing the fourth warpgate nexus of Volgarius on the other side.

Cinculu strode through. His brothers followed behind him. They emerged inside a surprisingly barren facility, where only a handful of Technopath and Changeling delegates awaited their arrival. Among them was a single Psion, only of the 2nd Level. In the past, Cinculu had never been met by a Psion below the 6th Level. This spoke of the heavy loss the Empire had just suffered; it barely had any Psions left, and those who Demila had missed were either the scattered few with their True Souls inside their bodies, and the recently Initiated, who were still at the beginning of their journey.

Psions were not considered military-ready until they reached the 5th Level. Before that, they were only allowed to go on exploration missions of special-class danger-worlds, diplomatic investigations of Mud Dwellers, and excursions designed to teach fledgling Initiators the fundamentals of their powers in highly controlled environments.

Cinculu frowned. Seeing his displeasure, the young Psion shuddered. He couldn't believe he'd been entrusted with such a mission! It would have been the highest honor of his life if he didn't know that he was one of the last available options to receive the Fifth Founder. He was woefully underprepared for such a heavy duty.

[F-Fifth Founder, it is my pleasurable- my, my pleasure to meet you in the person- in person.] The Psion stammered. [I am Learner Mailor-]

"I don't care who you are." Cinculu said, crossing his arms and sneering at the stammering fool of a Psion. "If I wish to know, I'll ask. Alright, then. Let's get this farce over with. Hurry up and take me and my brothers to the Founder's Fingers!"

One of the Technopaths blinked. "Your brothers? I was not informed you would be bringing guests. This meeting is for the Founders only, Fifth Founder. I mean no disrespect, but-"

"Shut up." Cinculu hissed. "My brothers are my family. I have brought them along as extra security, since Volgarius can no longer be considered safe. Are you able to accommodate them, or are we about to have a problem?"

The Technopath hesitated, then slowly shook his head.

"No, Fifth Founder. There is no problem. We will make the necessary arrangements. Please give us a short time to procure a larger travel-bus with the necessary security features."

Cinculu snorted. He strode out of the Warpgate chamber, along with Virile and Ravagil, and the other Volgrim had no choice but to fall into line behind them. The Technopath rapidly communicated with the landing pad, and by the time they made it to the hangar bay on the upper floors, he was ready to give a report.

"Due to the unexpected nature of this request, we will require thirty time units to reroute a larger shuttle this way." The Technopath said apologetically, as they stepped inside the busy, bustling inner hangar area. All around them, ships landed and took off, and the people who had been forced to wait outside the Warpgate Chamber until the Fifth Founder had left hurried inside, ready to travel to their next destination.

Cinculu glared at the Technopath, but he said nothing. In truth he didn't have to ride the shuttle to the Founder's Fingers, but his method of traveling on his own would cause... a certain level of unwanted destruction.

The group remained silent as the minutes began to pass. Cinculu's attention wavered. He glanced over to the edge of the room, where a waiting area with food formula and liquid mix allowed travelers to rejuvenate their bodies before they traveled.

There, he saw something most peculiar. A group of Technopaths were sitting around a table, holding onto thin rectangular pieces of metal, each one etched with numbers, symbols, or faces. These faces consisted of Unarin, Dosena, and Treyza, each painted different colors.

Cinculu watched as the Technopaths kept looking at one another with deep suspicion. They picked up additional pieces of metal sometimes, called out bets other times, and were very careful about doing things he couldn't quite understand.

"What are those fools doing over there?" Cinculu asked, less out of a desire to know what was going on, and more to sate his momentary boredom.

The Technopath lowered his head apologetically. "I am sorry you had to see this, Fifth Founder. It is a new craze taking over Volgarius called Volgrim Hold'Em. It is a tactical exercise involving deception, gambling, and other unauthorized activity. We have tried to crack down on it, but the exercise is extremely compelling, and countless Technopaths have begun to engage in it. Rooting out the behavior has proven troublesome."

Cinculu massaged his chin. He wandered over to watch the tactical exercise, and the players stiffened in horror when they saw him approach.

"F-F-Fifth Founder?!" One of the Technopaths exclaimed, the fear of his makers coming over him. "Ah, this is not what it appears! We only-"

"No need for alarm." Cinculu said, raising his claw in a neutral gesture. "I am here to assess this tactical exercise. Explain it for me."

The Technopaths nervously looked at one another. Even though they had been engaging in the tactical exercise in a public area, they assumed because so many other Volgrim were doing the same thing all over Volgarius, nobody had any reason to pay them special attention. Now they felt as if death had come to greet them with a friendly handshake and a dagger behind its back.

One of the more mentally fortified and older Technopaths, a fellow named Loputo Zimri, was the first to speak.

"It would be my honor to explain the rules of engagement, Fifth Founder. You see, this exercise is all about using limited information to engage in a form of cerebral warfare..."

Zimri began to explain the rules to Cinculu. The Fifth Founder barely held any interest at first, but after a few minutes of listening, his tail began to swish back and forth behind him. He glanced at the tactical cards, then thought about how much time he had before the shuttle arrived.

"Mmm. I suppose a round or two of Volgrim Hold'Em would not hurt. Alright, I wish to try this training exercise for myself. Deal me in."

One of the Technopaths quickly stood up and made room, allowing Cinculu to sit. Zimri started dealing cards out, speaking as he did so. "It is important not to cheat by using enhanced senses, technology, or psionic abilities in this exercise. One must rely purely on their keen instincts to defeat their adversaries."

Cinculu sneered at Zimri. "You lot are ones to talk. Slaves to the machine. Believers in welded metal and circuitry. My instincts have been trained over eons. You have no chance of defeating me in a trivial training exercise of this level."

Zimri hesitated. "I... fear your reaction if we do triumph. Fifth Founder, please forgive my impudence. Will you... let us off easily if one of us succeeds in defeating you?"

Cinculu barked out a derisive laugh. "Baha! Listen to you! You actually believe you have a chance, metal-slave! But don't you worry. I am not a petty creature. Even if I do lose, I will not hold it over your head. It only means I need to train my instincts harder!"

The Technopaths sighed quietly in relief. Some of the tension at the table evaporated.

"I see." Zimri said slowly. "Then I must thank you in advance for your mercy."

Fifteen minutes later, Cinculu's claws trembled in rage.

"No! No! Seven losses in a row?! Impossible! You are using your devices to cheat after all!"

"We are not." Zimri retorted. "You have allowed your emotions to get the best of you, Fifth Founder. You have many 'tells' when certain tactical cards enter your hand. Your pupils dilate in excitement when your hand is worth a satisfactory number of points."

"And you start breathing at a seven-point-five percent increased rate." Another Technopath chimed in.

"You are entirely too predictable." Zimri said, looking at Cinculu with a hint of pity. "Unfortunate. I expected the Fifth Founder to be a bit more... fearsome in this exercise."

"Listen to you! Hahaha! You sure have guts, speaking that way to a Founder!" Cinculu barked. "Again!"

One of the Technopaths gestured behind Cinculu. "Founder, your shuttle arrived seven time-units ago. Your comrades have already boarded and are waiting for you."

Cinculu didn't even look backward. "They can wait. Winning this tactical training exercise is much more important! I will not let the name of Dolgris be defamed by usurpers and metal-mouths!"

"...If you insist." Zimri said.

Three hours later, Cinculu shakily stood up from the table. He gruffly bowed, then stormed away.

He failed to win even one hand. He had gone all-in on fifteen occasions and lost everything, and even having all the chips be redistributed evenly time after time did nothing to help his odds.

As he stomped up the ramp into the shuttle and sat down, Ravagil glanced at him.

"Finally done toying with your inferiors?" Ravagil asked.

Cinculu's eye twitched. He crossed his arms and looked at his brother with a stormy expression.

"I do not wish to speak of it! Now be silent and let me collect my thoughts."

Virile snickered to himself. He couldn't remember a time he had ever seen the Fifth Founder so flustered.

Maybe there was something special about this Volgrim Hold'Em training exercise...

He would have to look into it later.

Author Notes: Hey guys, hope you enjoyed the part! I prompted ChatGPT to make a few images of these Dolgrimites and I'm very happy with how they came out! Check them out below.

Original design of the Dolgrimites, by MWTX

Cinculu, by ChatGPT

Virile, by ChatGPT

Ravagil, by ChatGPT

Yeah, the designs fucked up the feet by giving them 3 claws instead of 2, and they definitely aren't perfect, but I like that it gives you guys a little something to look at for future reference! More TCTH soon!

Part 648: Fallen Empire

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR.

The shuttle traveled for a full hour, moving much slower than usual due to high atmospheric traffic. As the three Dolgrimites made their pilgrimage to the Founder's Fingers, Cinculu occasionally ordered the pilot to make small detours. He did this so he could observe the destruction caused by Mephisto with his own eyes. Holo-recordings disgusted Cinculu. He knew he could only trust the Truths of reality if they had not been distorted by the false gods of technology.

Countless stratoscrapers lay in ruins. Fire burned across tens of thousands of acres, beneath billions of tons of exosteel and spatial glass. These stratoscrapers were made with construction knowledge built up over millions of Volgrim cycles. They were extremely durable, constructed to survive Category 11 planetquakes (not that Volgarius ever had those), and even an atomic detonation wouldn't cause them to collapse, only to destroy their softer internal areas and the Sentients contained within.

Yet, within only a few minutes of rampaging, Mephisto caused this much devastation. The power of even a pitiful bottom level Cosmic could not be underestimated. No mere Demon Emperor would be able to wreak so much havoc in so short a time.

Cinculu stared out the window silently. He and his brothers witnessed the destruction with dark expressions.

"Such loss is always sad." Virile said, his aged eyes looking down upon the ruined buildings with melancholic fervor. "You must pity the metal-dwellers. They place so much faith in the falseness of their technology, that they are blinded to its inadequacies. Their soft bodies, weak to the desires of comfort and convenience, make them susceptible to the corrupting whispers of steel."

"It is not their fault." Cinculu affirmed. "Though they are heretics who have committed sacrilege against their true god, they are victims of Unarin's manipulation. He has placed himself at the top of the hierarchy, believing himself to be the savior of our people. Yet because of his actions, the Plague has brought ruin to the galaxy."

Ravagil growled sinisterly within the depths of his throat. "These slaves to metal will soon remember who their god is... or they will die gnashing their teeth while begging

Dolgris for mercy."

The pilot of the shuttle, a low-ranking Technopath, wisely kept his mouth shut and eyes forward. He feared that whatever he was overhearing might lead to his death if he leaked even a single word! No matter how loyal he might be to the Founders, these Dolgrimites were mean, massive, and terrifying! They could rip him apart and eat the skin off his bones!

What he did not know was that the Dolgrimites simply did not care if he overheard. They knew that Unarin was aware of their distaste for the Council. Unarin was no fool, and he had long been aware of the Dolgrimites' hatred for those they deemed the 'metal-born'. But he never felt he had anything to worry about, so long as the Psions reigned over his Empire.

What good would Dolgrimites be when Psions could bombard and destroy planets from space? They were no threat at all. Better to let them grumble and whine in the sanctuaries of their halls rather than give them more attention than they deserved.

But that was then, and this was now.

With the Psions dead, Unarin was sure to be sweating as he realized those supposed religious nutjobs were now coming toward him with hostile intent!

Cinculu grinned as he thought of this. His earlier humiliation in the tactical exercise had already started to fade from his memory. Just because the metal-lovers managed to trick him with their heretic sorcery, that did not mean his instincts were inferior. The heretics could not be trusted!

The shuttle flew toward the Founder's Thumb and docked inside its hangar. The Dolgrimites strode down the landing ramp with Cinculu in the lead, his back upright and a haughty air about him.

At the bottom of the ramp, a familiar figure stood.

"Fifth Founder. Greetings."

"Ah, Lady Muuxunuu." Cinculu said, smiling politely at the pink-skinned Ascended before him. "No Unarin?"

"The other Founders have already assembled in the Founder's Soul." Muuxunuu explained emotionlessly. "They are waiting on you."

Cinculu smirked. "Good. Better than me having to wait on them."

Muuxunuu looked at the other two Dolgrimites behind him, but said nothing. Wordlessly, she turned around and gracefully began walking out of the hangar, leading them deeper into the Founder's Thumb.

The first thing Cinculu noticed was how different the atmosphere of Volgarius felt. Because Psions always radiated a faint level of power, their emotions and suspicions could cause non-Psions to feel uneasy; like they were being watched. This was often more true than not. Especially inside the Founder's Thumb, where Dosena's presence could always be felt.

But this time was different. That omnipresent feeling of being watched seemed to have completely disappeared. Realizing this emboldened Cinculu even more. Clearly, the rumors were true, and Dosena was in no condition to use her powers.

The Volgrim Empire was weak. It was ripe for the taking...

Muuxunuu directed the Dolgrimites to the entryway leading into the Founder's Soul. This was a special chamber used when the Founders convened, and it only had five seats inside.

Before Muuxunuu opened the door, Cinculu smiled at her from behind. "My brothers will be joining me today. I hope that isn't a problem."

"No. It is not." Muuxunuu replied. "Founder Unarin already anticipated this would be the case. He has provided additional seating."

Cinculu blinked. He didn't have a response.

He couldn't believe it. How would Unarin possibly know he planned to bring Virile and Ravagil with him into the Founder's Soul? Surely, he would have expected them to stand guard outside? Cinculu had never done such a thing since the Founders had first assembled!

He grimaced. Obviously, Unarin was playing with him. Toying with his mind. That damned bastard, he might be weak and reliant on his Psion underlings to do the dirty work, but his predictive capabilities were the real deal.

Muuxunuu pushed the door open, revealing the other Four Founders within.

At an ornate pentagonal stone table, instead of five chairs, there sat seven. Each of the table's five sides had only one seat, except for the side nearest the door, where there were three. The seats were jammed rather uncomfortably close together, making it so if the Dolgrimites chose to sat down together, they would literally be rubbing elbows, and would probably appear more silly than intimidating.

Cinculu's eyes flickered slightly as he instantly noticed this fact. Unarin was toying with him again, all to throw him off-balance!

Then Cinculu looked around the table. At the opposite side, Founders Unarin and Dosena sat, while on their right and left, Founders Treyza the Changeling and Cuanali the Technopath sat. The four of them stared silently at Cinculu as he paused in the doorway for half a step.

Cinculu's gaze flickered to Dosena. She appeared healthy and vibrant, but he couldn't feel her psionic senses sweeping over him in that creepy and invasive way she always did. In fact, she was only using her eyes! Like a common peasant! Certainly a bizarre thing for her to do, and likely only happening because of her current weakness.

"Cinculu." Unarin said, after a few moments of silence. "So nice of you to finally join us. I started to wonder if you'd show."

The Fifth Founder smiled, but his expression lacked sincerity.

"Apologies. I ended up sightseeing for a bit, looking upon the destruction wrought by that demon dragon. Today was not a good day for you."

Unarin slowly blinked. "It is not a good day for the Empire, dear Cinculu. Now, if you and your brothers would take your seats, we can begin discussing the steps we need to take to prepare our final stand."

Muuxunuu stepped outside and closed the door, but Cinculu shook his head at Virile and Ravagil. "You will stand behind me."

"Yes, Fifth Founder." Virile said.

He and Ravagil pulled their chairs away and lined them behind the wall, then stood beside Cinculu as he took his usual seat. They both clasped their claws in front of their waists and stood there looking as intimidating as they could. The other Founders didn't seem to notice.

"Dosena." Cinculu said, turning his attention to her. "Are you feeling well?"

Dosena simply looked at Cinculu and blinked her eyes. She didn't say a word.

"The Second Founder has temporarily lost control over all her psionic abilities." Unarin explained. "She cannot even use telepathy to communicate with us."

"Oh. That is unfortunate." Cinculu said, a hint of false concern buried in his tone. "Such a shame, Dosena. You're always such a delight to converse with."

Once again, Dosena merely stared at him, slowly blinking her eyes as if she did not suffer from a telepathic block, but instead did not deign to respond. Just by looking at her, it was obvious she found his presence grating.

Founder Treyza, ever the diplomat, lifted its hand from its chest and motioned into the air before itself. "Cinculu, this one is pleased you made time to attend. This one would have felt dismay if you were not present for the proceedings."

Unlike the other Founders, Cinculu didn't mind Treyza's presence. The Changelings might engage in twisted science and experiments, but they were not augmented like the Technopaths, nor wielders of psionics, nor the haughty and proud entities who named themselves 'Ascended' in their arrogance. Changelings were the most benign and neutral of the five Volgrim sub-species. As such, they generally got along well with everyone.

Cinculu smiled at Treyza. "How could I let you down? Of course I had to attend. This is a historical day for the Volgrim, after all."

"'Historical' is not the word I would use." Unarin retorted, his voice gruff. "Tragic, perhaps. Disastrous would be even more apt."

After a brief pause, Unarin waved his hand toward the center of the table, and a holographic map of the Milky Way materialized, zooming in to the local sectors.

"Due to Creator Demila's betrayal, the Psion Army has lost 99% of its fighting power. Nearly every Psion, especially those above the 2nd Level, have been debilitated and had their power drained, leaving them at the rank of Initiator. I need not spell out how long it will take to rebuild our army. As you can imagine, we simply will not be able to. We need time, and time is what we lack."

He paused before adding, "Thus, we must execute the Dying Light Initiative."

The other Founders remained silent. An ominous air filled the room as Treyza and Cuanali looked back and forth between Unarin and Dosena, and Founder Cinculu.

"Have we truly given up all hope?" Cuanali asked. Her body, more machine than biology, was the antithesis of Cinculu's beliefs. Of all the Founders, Cinculu detested her existence the most.

"This galaxy is already lost." Unarin declared. "The only options we have left are to reactivate the Sentinels, or to begin full-scale planetary evacuations."

Treyza's face remained expressionless. "Evacuations will preserve less than one percent of the Volgrim population. The rest will be left to fend for themselves."

"They will be left to die." Cinculu growled. "So that's it, then? That's why you called everyone here, Unarin? To declare that we've lost the war, give up, and run away with your tail tucked between your legs?"

"The Dolgrimites have the most to lose." Unarin said smoothly. "Unlike the rest of us, you have only ever populated the original homeworld. You have given up chance after chance to extend your reach. That means you are balancing on the edge of a knife. If the Plague attacks Grimvolas, your species will be wiped out. As such, I am prepared to evacuate at least half of your planet's populace, perhaps even more if we can spare the ships."

Ravagil smirked at Unarin. He turned his head slyly and growled at his brother. "Hehe. You hear that, Virile? The First Founder says we're helpless against the Plague. My claws are trembling with fear."

Unarin sighed. "I know that you have faith in your... god... but this faith is misplaced. There are no Psions capable of protecting you. Across the entirety of the Volgrim Empire, there are less than a thousand Psions possessing power above the 4th Level. Most of them were Psions who died in battle and revived, moving their True Souls to their new bodies until the rehabilitation period concluded. They are in no condition to fight. Once the Kolvax-Psions arrive, your world will fall in less than a day."

Unarin spread out his hands. "If I am wrong and the Dolgrimites have some secret means of fighting back, this is your last chance to use it. I do not wish to reactivate the Sentinels, so evacuation is the only means we have left to preserve our key leaders and geniuses and rebuild anew in another galaxy."

"Hahaha!" Cinculu laughed, slamming his meaty fist onto the table. "Another galaxy! Oh, Unarin, you are a riot! You know as well as I that there exists no such galaxy free for the taking. If we cannot preserve this one with all the volpower at our disposal, then how can we possibly wrest away control of another galaxy with a fraction of our forces?"

"Admittedly, it is a long shot." Unarin replied, lowering his eyes. "We will need to bide our time until Dosena recovers. We will also need to nurture the few remaining Psions who did not have their powers drained. Confessor Vulpanix, for example, remains among the high-rankers. She is a promising seed, perhaps even on par with Executor Nufaris in terms of future potential. She was fortunate enough to have recently perished in battle and had her True Soul placed inside a new vessel. It won't be long before she regains her full strength."

"One 7th Level Psion. Well, I guess we're saved then!" Cinculu laughed, ridiculing Unarin's words. "Truly, you have fallen to the most desperate of measures!"

Unarin did not take Cinculu's bait. The Fifth Founder's attempts to rile up Unarin's emotions failed. He remained as steadfast as ever.

"Are you done?" Unarin asked. "Once again, this is your last chance, Cinculu. If you truly do have a 'god' who can protect you, now is the time to speak up."

Cinculu's mocking smile disappeared. He and Unarin stared at one another for several long, uncomfortable seconds.

How much does he know? Cinculu secretly wondered. This is the second time he's asked such a leading question. Has he known all along? Impossible. He would have taken us much more seriously if that were the case. He must be desperately hoping we're not full of dung-droppings.

Cinculu smiled once again.

Fortunately for him, we're not. But unfortunately, salvation will not come without its own price...

Instead of directly answering Unarin's question, Cinculu looked up at the holographic map of the galaxy above the table. He glanced around it for a moment, noting the familiar star systems.

"What planets are currently being ravaged by the Plague?"

Unarin's eyes flickered for a moment, as if uncertain about something.

"...There are 1,042 star systems currently under attack." Unarin said, after a moment's deliberation.

"That many? Hehe, the situation is certainly dire, indeed." Cinculu snickered.

"This is no laughing matter." Cuanali stated, turning her cold, robotic eyes to glower at him. "Do you find the suffering of your Volgrimkin amusing?"

"They are not my kin. They are heretics bound to the false gods of metal." Cinculu responded nastily, glaring back at Cuanali. He returned his gaze to Unarin. "Show me all the worlds currently under attack."

Unarin nodded. He motioned with his hand, and more than a thousand red dots appeared in the air above them. After a few moments, Cinculu pointed at one of them.

"I know this one. XR-Zanovra. What is its status?"

Unarin immediately called up the planet's information. It turned out to be a watery world 85% covered in ocean, with floating sky-islands suspended in midair through various technological processes. Supposing the Plague did not deliberately destroy them, they would likely remain aloft for a few hundred years before falling into the oceans due to a lack of maintenance. If the Plague did destroy their internal areas, then they would obviously fall much sooner.

"A Class C planet suitable for farming aquatic biological matter necessary for nutrient supplements." Unarin stated. "It is currently 35% devoured by the Plague and will collapse by the day's end. Is there a reason you've changed the subject?"

Cinculu looked at Unarin and smiled. He crossed his arms over his chest. "Contact Matriarch Gorzana. Tell her to connect Grimvolas's Warpgate to the one on XR-Zanovra."

For a moment, the table fell silent.

Founder Cuanali squinted her eyes at Cinculu. "Fifth Founder. Have you lost your mind?"

"Are you unwell?" Founder Treyza asked, his voice taking on a tone of concern. "If you are experiencing suicidal ideations, this one may be able to offer its assistance. There is no need to destroy Grimvolas just to make a point."

"They're right." Unarin said, narrowing his eyes. A hint of disbelief could be seen in them. He had clearly not expected this. "I don't know what you're even thinking, Cinculu, but Kolvaxxed worlds must never activate their warpgates. It could expose their corruption to the world they connect to. If just one Plaguehost makes to to Grimvolas-"

"Quiet." Cinculu said, staring with cold eyes at the First Founder. "You talk too much. Do you think I am stupid? I already know the risks. Those risks do not exist to ones who truly believe in the power of Dolgris. If you wish to witness salvation, you must take a leap of faith. Now... transmit the order to my Matriarch. She already knew this would happen."

Unarin lowered his eyes. He fell into thought as he quickly assessed what was likely to happen. Clearly, Cinculu was angling for something. But what could it be? Did he actually think he could stand up to the power of the new Kolvaxors? Impossible. Even if this 'Dolgris' was something along the lines of what Unarin assumed, the swarm of Kolvaxians would eventually overpower all. The Middle Cosmic Plaguehosts alone...

Unarin stroked his chin for several seconds before finally closing his eyes.

"Cinculu. If this is an attempt to make me flinch, you have succeeded. Do not place your people in unnecessary harm just to make a point."

"Do it already. The followers of Dolgris know no fear!" Cinculu shouted. "Soon, all of your eyes will be opened. You will know that there are still Truths you have been blind to due to your reliance on heresy!"

Unarin sighed. He realized he wasn't going to win this argument, and at this point... he couldn't help but wonder if there was more than bravado behind Cinculu's words.

"Alright. One moment." Unarin said. "I hope your 'god' can produce a miracle."

He pulled out a transmission device and sent a message to his brother, Randis. Randis in turn relayed that message across the galaxy through quantum entanglement, where it fell upon the ears of the Dolgrimite's Matriarch.

Gorzana stood with fifty other Dolgrimites. When the words passed to her, she grinned, revealing her shiny white teeth.

"XR-Zanovra? A world of water. Good. This will be the perfect staging ground. Activate the warpgate!"

Several minutes passed as the Dolgrimites who had been trained to manage the Warpgate's technology quickly and efficiently keyed in thousands of coordinate calculations. After adjusting for gravitic fluctuations, spatial movement, quantum deviations, and many other interstellar phenomena, they opened the portal.

The world on the other side seemed normal, based purely on what they could see. But distant plumes of dark black smoke rose into the sky. The world seemed to be burning...

"Go!" Gorzana roared. "Move forth and show these nonbelievers the POWER of Dolgris! Enlighten these atheists with the power of our heritage!"

The fifty Dolgrimites roared furiously. They charged into the portal, while Gorzana remained behind. She gazed into the portal, not even bothering to close it in case a Kolvaxian tried to pass through.

"Hehe... try if you like. Don't be shy. I'll only bite." Gorzana said, her pupils dilating in hunger.

The next phase of the Kolvaxian War had begun.

Part 649: Dolgris Guides Us

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. The water-covered world of XR-Zanovra.

Screams fell upon the ears of the fifty elite Dolgrimite warriors. Their leader was a fierce female named Ursilon, who wore leather skins ripped from the hides of massive exobeasts she had personally hunted. Like all Dolgrimites, she eschewed wielding weapons in favor of unleashing her body's natural killing tools; her claws and teeth. A feral look boiled in her eyes as she hungrily listened to the world around her.

In the distance, down a hill leading away from the Warpgate, waves of unstoppable Kolvaxians smashed into fortified walls built to keep the sea out. As the walls broke, millions of liters of water poured into the nearest city, drowning Technopaths and Changelings alike, allowing the Kolvaxians to swim toward them, snatch their bodies from the floodwaters, then drag them down to the soil below, where they and their victims would disappear, never to be seen in their pure Volgrim forms again.

With the Warpgate up on an elevated hill, it was in no danger of XR-Zanovra's oceans swallowing it, short of a massive tsunami suddenly occurring, but this planet was amazingly stable and earthquakes simply never happened.

A beautiful star hung in the sky, its rays of sunshine warming the planet, contrasting with the unending screams of the helpless Volgrim below.

Ursilon inhaled deeply. Her pupils dilated as she looked up at XR-Zanovra's sun, grinning like a madwoman.

"These Kolvaxians are our prey. But they are formidable. Do not take them lightly. Treat them as the deadly adversaries they are. If any of you fall, you will never escape eternal shame under Dolgris's watchful eyes! Bring glory to His divine name! Show the faithless heathens why our God is the ONE true God!"

The other 49 Dolgrimites raised their fists and roared in unison, the sound sending a small shockwave outward and summoning the attention of countless nearby Kolvaxians. Smelling prey with potent life energies, a massive swarm of more than a thousand Kolvaxians ran, flew, and swam under the soil toward them.

With their true abilities having been revealed during the battle of Maiura, the Plagueborn no longer hid their ability to tap into psionic powers. The only ones that didn't fly were those not directly born of Psion hosts like the rest. But even low-ranking Psiovaxians were terrifying. Their bodies were still as powerful as Executor Huron, and he was a bonafide Low Cosmic with a body matching Middle Cosmics.

Seeing so many faceless monsters known for their planet-cracking strength barreling right at them, any other Sentients would have started quaking in their boots, lost all courage, and bolted.

But not Dolgris's most devout followers. Their battle intent soared. They rushed directly toward the Kolvaxians, spreading out as they split up and traveled in all directions to meet the sphere of bodies engulfing them.

From the Founder's Soul, Unarin and the other Founders watched with rapt attention, utterly silent as several camera drones on XR-Zanovra played the battle for them, live.

They were not the only ones observing. Inside the Spynet Sphere, Fiona, Blinker, and Rebecca took turns watching the camera feeds, their nerves on edge as they wondered what the hell these idiot Dolgrimites were thinking. All of them were mere mortals, and they were fighting creatures with Cosmic bodies. Were they suicidal?!

The tiny defending force of 50 Dolgrimites met the assault force of 1000 Kolvaxians as if they were the ancient Spartans of Earth's legends. Fearless, they collided against the faceless monstrosities, and a brutal melee erupted!

Everything happened so fast, none of the observers could entirely make out what was going on! All they saw was a mess of colored scaled and rotted-green flesh tangling up like a squad of cats all fighting at once. Feral roars erupted as the Dolgrimites started tearing into their enemies.

With her distinctive bone-mask worn over her face, Ursilon stood out from her companions. She grabbed a Kolvaxian and bit onto its neck, ripped out its throat, and swallowed it in one gulp, Her claws raked across its chest, and she crushed it with a bear hug, breaking several of its ribs. At the same time, ten other Kolvaxians punched and scratched at her scales, but for some reason, she didn't even seem to notice their blows, as if they were mere toddlers slapping a brick wall.

Ursilon tore the Kolvaxian apart with frightening savagery, then pounced upon another. A beam of focused psionic energy struck her body and knocked her to the side, but she stomped her foot and instantly regained her footing, then pounced at the Psiovaxian that had the guts to attack her!

She bit down on its neck and tore its head off, ripping part of the Kolvaxian's spine out as well. She crushed the monster's skull in her mouth and swallowed the bones and brains, licked her lips, and charged at yet another one!

The moment the other Founders realized the Dolgrimites had not instantly lost, but had somehow turned the tables on the previously unstoppable alien monsters, they became shocked out of their wits.

"This-this! How is this possible?!" Cuanali cried out. The Fourth Founder looked at Cinculu with a look of horror, shock, and excitement all at the same time. It had been an eon since she last showed such strong emotion. "This is impossible! Those Dolgrimites are only mortals!"

Cinculu looked at her with the smuggest expression a reptilian possibly could. He folded his claws on the table and smirked. "All is possible when one accepts Dolgris's providence."

Five minutes later, half of the Kolvaxians were dead. Not defeated, not incapacitated and slowly reviving, but truly dead! Any Kolvaxian that fell into the meat grinder of a Dolgrimite's claws and jaws perished and never returned.

It was as if their hardy bodies had turned into soft slabs of tofu. The Kolvaxians silently attacked and pummeled the Dolgrimites, but Dolgris's Chosen shrugged these planet-rumbling punches off with contemptuous ease.

Before long, only 250 Kolvaxians remained. Then only a hundred.

The remaining Kolvaxians finally did something the Founders had never seen before.

They fled!

Some of them dove underground to flee the Dolgrimites' hateful claws.

The Psion-types took to the skies and flew away, racing to get out of range before it was too late!

By the time the few remaining Kolvaxians had dispersed, the blood-covered Dolgrimites had already regrouped. All fifty of them were alive, and none appeared even a little injured!

"Roaaar!!!" Ursilon screamed. "Dolgris guides us! Dolgris protects us! This so-called Plague is nothing but a herd of prey animals before Dolgris's might! Death to the usurpers! Death to those who defame His name!!"

Cinculu watched from the Founder's Soul, more pleased than he had ever been in his entire life. While Treyza remained completely unmoved, as emotionless as ever, it was still clearly surprised by these happenings. Nobody thought the Dolgrimites would crush the Kolvaxians as easily as they did. In fact, nobody thought they would win at all!

"Impressive." Unarin said.

That was all he said. He stared at the holo-image stoically, but Cinculu could tell he was frightened out of his wits. How could he not be? The power of Dolgris was truly overbearing!

After that armada of Kolvaxians had been deterred, Ursilon stabbed a finger toward the village. "Go now! Clear out the rest of these lowly pests! Put the fear of Dolgris into them! Make the parasite's queen know her days are numbered!!"

The Dolgrimites split up into twenty-five groups of two. They charged into the city, with Ursilon joined by a male companion named Pyrakos. True to his name, his scales glowed red with flaming patterns of some sort. A scorching heat boiled beneath his natural armor, causing the gaps between his scales to glow an ominous red.

"My mate. My beautiful mate!" Pyrakos shouted, looking at his lover adoringly. "I pledge to kill twice as many servants of the false god as you!"

"Hah, a pointless boast!" Ursilon exclaimed, meeting his gaze with equal desire. "If you can succeed, I will mate with you and produce another brood! But you had better not let me down!"

"I would never!" Pyrakos retorted. "If I fail, let none call me your mate again!"

Working together, they leaped into the flooded city and swam toward a horde of underwater Kolvaxians without stopping. As reptilian Volgrim who stayed true to their ancient forms, the Dolgrimites were equally adept on land and in sea. In fact, they were even faster and more fierce underwater than above!

They darted around like crocodiles, using their tails to speed up their swimming speed and adjust their direction as they crashed into the underwater Kolvaxian hordes and spilled their green blood into the flooded city for all to see. Before long, the water became so thick with torn apart body parts, tendons, and Kolvaxian blood that most normal Sentients would be totally lost.

But not the Dolgrimites. They somehow sensed the watery abyss around them and continued hunting the Kolvaxians, crushing their bones and ripping apart their bodies as if they had never been empowered by Artoria in the first place.

Fiona, watching from Chrona, constantly massaged her eyes in wonder. She felt like she was dreaming. How were Dolgris's Devotees so easily able to overpower the previously-thought unstoppable Kolvaxians? She couldn't figure out what the missing puzzle piece was.

The Kolvaxians on XR-Zanovra began to move differently from before. No longer did they mindlessly hunt the remaining life forms. Instead, they started coordinating their movements, locking their senses on the unstoppable Dolgrimites while also trying to keep their distance. The Dolgrimites were extremely fast underwater, and were easily capable of chasing down any Kolvaxians that didn't take to the skies.

But then, Ursilon grabbed her lover, Pyrakos. She and he both stopped their movements and looked down at the soil beneath them.

Their senses tingled a warning. Danger was approaching.

"ORAAAK!" Ursilon shouted, her voice releasing a sonic boom underwater that traveled outward for kilometers in every direction. Like a whale's sonar, it alerted all the other Dolgrimites, and they ceased their pursuit. Like a hivemind, they pivoted in unison and swam toward their leader, arriving beside her within less than twenty seconds.

Ursilon gestured with her claws, and the other Dolgrimites nodded. They quickly swam for the shore, leaped out of the water, and arrived on solid ground, quickly taking up defensive positions.

At once, a trio of Kolvaxors burst from the bloodied, muddied lake behind them and rose into the sky. They were none other than the fallen forms of Executors Nufaris, Huron, and Sartran.

In one way, it was a blessing that Demila had devoured the power of so many elite Psions before killing herself. At the very least, she guaranteed the Kolvaxian scourge could not assimilate Vi, Riley, or Fellrun's powers into itself.

Even so, three Kolvaxors facing down the fifty Dolgrimites made them no longer shout so eagerly. The power radiating from these true Cosmics was enough to make their skin crawl.

"Do not feel fear." Ursilon said solemnly. "Dolgris guides us. Dolgris protects us. These false gods are nothing compared to His power. Alone, we are no match for them, but together, we hold the advantage."

The other Dolgrimites nodded. They did not shout boisterously like before, but instead remained silent as they looked up at the monsters before them.

Kolvaxor Nufaris tilted its faceless head, ever so slightly.

A single word, as chilling as death itself, drifted into the air.

[DOLGRIS...]

Ursilon flinched. She took a step back and gasped. "You speak, monster?!"

But the Kolvaxor said nothing else. In an instant, Kolvaxor Huron dove at the Dolgrimites, raised his fist, and punched with enough force to blow open a massive crater in the planet.

Ursilon had no time to react. She simply threw a punch back. When their fists met, her arm snapped backward, and she was pounded down into the dirt, sent dragging along the ground for a quarter of a kilometer!

The leader of the Dolgrimites fainted. The other forty-nine roared and attacked, with Pyrakos leading the charge.

"Remember! Alone, we are weak! But together, we are unstoppable!" Pyrakos roared. "Combine your powers into me! Give no quarter!"

The other Dolgrimites aimed their palms at Pyrakos's back. They began chanting in unison.

"We are Dolgris's Devotees! Our feet sunder the soil! Our claws tear the heavens! Together, we are united!"

Nothing seemed to happen. Pyrakos stupidly charged at Kolvaxor Huron as if he had a death wish, and the Psiovaxian send another punch at him. Pyrakos met this punch with a punch of his own.

When their fists collided, a deafening explosion erupted outward. Sand blasted in all directions. Trees ripped from the soil. Rocks were sent flying! Pyrakos held his ground! Somehow, he matched Huron's strength pound for pound! The two of them erupted into a fury of blows, their fists striking one another all over their bodies, knocking each other back only a little but continuing to rain blows on one another. The other 48 Dolgrimites did nothing but keep their claws aimed at Pyrakos, and to the outside observers, it indeed appeared as if they had somehow passed a part of whatever mystical power each one possessed on to their new temporary leader.

A massive chain snapped down from above. Kolvaxor Sartran transmuted several nearby trees into chains made of iron, then enchanted those chains with the power of thunder. He struck Pyrakos's back when the Dolgrimite's attention was on Huron, and a howl of pain escaped Pyrakos's jowls. At the same time, Kolvaxor Nufaris turned his attention on the other Dolgrimites, who remained immobile.

He rushed at them and sent a powerful gravity wave downward, crushing their bodies into the dirt. Suddenly, Pyrakos's strength dropped noticeably. He started losing in a raw strength matchup to Huron as the links to his comrades weakened.

But among those other Dolgrimites, one of them suddenly gained a huge power boost. A male named Zerravul leaped out of the crowd at Nufaris, taking the Kolvaxor by surprise. Before Nufaris could cancel his gravity attack, the empowered Dolgrimite bit onto his left arm and tugged with all his strength.

Riiiip!

He tore the Kolvaxor's entire arm off, causing blood to gush from the wound. Just like before, the bleeding did not stop, and the Kolvaxian's most fearsome healing ability did not activate. Nufaris seemed to shudder with pain, and his body momentarily froze up. Zerravul took this opportunity to bite onto Nufaris's neck, then yank his head backward.

He tore the Kolvaxor's head off!

Kolvaxor Nufaris perished, leaving only the other two behind.

Even though he had been drastically weakened and was unable to put up a good fight against Huron, Pyrakos still fought like hell, relying more on martial skills than his raw strength. He slithered like an eel, catching his powerful opponent in a head-lock. He tried to tear Huron's skull off his body like Zerravul had just done, but his strength was too pitiful. Huron turned the tables, pulled the feisty Dolgrimite off him, and hurled him to the side, sending him crashing into several boulders that had not yet been blown away.

Instead of charging at its momentarily stunned adversary, or attacking the other Dolgrimites, Kolvaxor Huron looked left, then he looked right. His faceless head swiveled toward Kolvaxor Sartran, and for a brief instant, it seemed as if the two of them had locked eyes, assuming that was even possible.

Without warning, they darted away, dove underwater, and fled!

Pyrakos picked himself up. He jumped out of the crushed rocks and shook his head to clear away his slightly fuzzy vision. When he looked around, both Kolvaxors were gone!

"Where are they? Where did the false gods go?!" Pyrakos barked.

Zerravul strode over to him and clapped Pyrakos's shoulder. He grinned wickedly.

"They fled! The cowardly false gods fled! After I killed the False Executor, the other two knew they could not win. This is a victory for Dolgris!"

Pyrakos's eyes lit up. "Truly?! Bahaha! So it is! Dolgris guides us! Dolgris overcomes all!"

The Kolvaxors did not return. All the Kolvaxians on the planet slowly dove into the soil and disappeared. Before long, peace fell over XR-Zanovra, a quiet serenity it had not know for more than twenty Terran hours.

Pyrakos found his fallen mate. He roused her from her comatose form and helped her rise to her feet, while she looked around with a mixture of disbelief and devotion. At first she couldn't believe they had defeated such powerful adversaries, but then, she thought, of course they had! How could they not, with Dolgris guiding the hand of fate to favor them?

Millions of XR-Zanovra's Volgrim natives survived the Plague's incursion. They slowly advanced upon the ones who saved them, arriving by many different means. They looked at their saviors with reverence.

"You saved our lives. We owe you countless life debts." One Technopath said. "You accomplished what even the Founders themselves could not. From now on, anything you command, we will obey!"

Despite having taken a severe blow to her ego, Ursilon still remained the leader of Dolgris's Devotees. She stood proudly, her arms crossed and a haughty expression on her face.

"You have the right attitude! For countless cycles, your people have worshiped the false gods of metal and circuitry! So long as those hideous implants and mutilations scar your body, Dolgris will never accept you! BUT, you may rejoice. If you dispose of them, He will welcome you with open claws. From now on, we shall station a platoon of Dolgris's Devotees on this world! Those of you who wish to abandon the falsities you were taught, you may yet take hold of a glorious future!"

Cheers erupted from the crowd.

"Dolgris saved us! Dolgris is our god! We worship Him! We will give up our evil ways to serve Him!"

The other Dolgrimites looked at each other with expressions of great satisfaction. They had accomplished their goal most marvelously. While Ursilon may have suffered a terrible blow, she did not die, and her injuries could be healed. She had not stained the reputation of Dolgris, so her sins could be forgiven.

Soon, the metal-worshipers would come to see the Truths they had been denied.

Soon, the Plague would realize it had awoken a slumbering horror more awful than itself.

"Dolgris guides us! Dolgris guides us! Glory to His name!"

Fiona watched the battle on XR-Zanovra with rapt attention. The finale left her gobsmacked, but eventually, she accepted it and began to mentally model what might have happened.

"The Dolgrimites... are able to share power? Uplift themselves to the rank of Cosmic to fight other Cosmics?"

Rebecca shook her head. Even she appeared puzzled. "We did not detect any Cosmic power radiating from them. Whatever means they used to defeat the Kolvaxians, it was not an orthodox method."

Fiona narrowed her eyes. She tapped her lip thoughtfully and looked into the distance.

"Dolgris... who, or what, is he?"

Part 650: Unarin's Concession

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. Inside Chrona.

More than a week had passed. A single hour in realspace was equal to nearly 300 in Chrona, and following the operation on XR-Zanovra, Fiona and the other Sentients had spent a lot of time poring over the footage to analyze it.

"The way they combine their powers is so mysterious." Blinker said, as she looked at Rebecca, then at Fiona. "And it seems once they start their ritual, they can quickly transfer power around the group."

"The Dolgrimite power-binding ritual is not so different from the ones Emperor Crow performs." Rebecca added. "Combining the strength of weaker individuals to defeat a stronger one is a niche ability, but effective in certain situations."

"That's the thing though." Fiona countered. "Look at all the readings. Their bodies didn't grow even an iota stronger. Whatever they did, it didn't make them more formidable at battling the Kolvaxians. They were just as strong before and after."

While Fiona talked, she held little baby Timothy in her arms. He made baby babbling noises while she talked, and played with her hair that was hanging down her chest. Sometimes, the cute little boy even tried munching on her hair, but it was mainly a spiritual illusion, so it had no taste or texture.

"They must be weakening the Kolvaxians, then." Blinker proposed. "But... I'm not sure how. Those Dolgrimites have really strong bodies, yet surely a Middle Cosmic like Huron would wipe the floor with them in a fistfight. His strength didn't seem to drop. He punched just as hard as ever. Huron's Kolvax-clone could probably destroy the planet with ease."

Rebecca crossed her arms. She started pacing from side to side inside the Spynet Sphere. She rewound footage of the battle, pointing to the instance when Kolvaxor Nufaris nearly flattened all the Dolgrimites with a gravity attack.

"This was the exact moment when the battle turned in the Dolgrimites' favor." Rebecca analyzed. "The Kolvaxians didn't know how their abilities worked. Nufaris tried to kill the main Dolgrimite group, but he was caught off-guard when they abruptly bolstered one of their own and he took out the strongest Kolvaxor with a surprise attack."

"I doubt that tactic will work a second time." Blinker responded. "Next time, the Kolvaxians will know about this combined-power and will take measures to counter it."

Fiona appeared unconvinced. "They probably will, but I doubt this is the full extent of the Dolgrimite's power-up. There's something we're missing. If they're weakening the Kolvaxians, how? If we can just figure that much out, we might be able to use this to our advantage."

The other two women fell silent. They looked at each other with uncertainty in their eyes, then they continued to debate for a while longer.

Suddenly, a spark of realization ignited in Fiona's eyes. After several days of thinking and collaborating with the others, her brain lit up with inspiration.

"Oh! I've got it! It all makes sense now! The way the Dolgrimites are able to fight the Kolvaxians is because..."

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. Inside the Founder's Soul.

The Dolgrimite's cleanup operation concluded as a great success. For the first time in the history of the Kolvaxian War, the Volgrim had become the victors. They had driven the Kolvaxians away and saved a world from its clutches.

Where there was one victory of such magnitude, more were likely to follow.

But this victory did not leave four of the Founders with pleasant expressions on their faces. They did not jump for joy or shout in jubilation.

The attitude among them was... muted.

"That was a splendid result." Unarin said calmly, looking Cinculu in the eyes. "Have the Dolgrimites... always been able to fight the Plague at this level?"

Cinculu puffed out his chest. "Not always. But for a while, we have."

"Then why did you not volunteer your services sooner?" Cuanali asked, directing a hostile gaze toward him. "We've lost thousands of worlds to the Plague. Tens of thousands! If you could have reversed the course of the war, why didn't you?"

Cinculu sneered. He looked at the metal-clad Technopath Founder with contempt.

"Have you not guessed? We did it to punish the heretics in this Empire. Only now that the Psions have fallen did the situation reach an untenable state. Before, it seemed as if you might last another few thousand cycles. But because of your pitiful discipline, your weak minds, and the greed within the hearts of your High Psions, the entire Empire was nearly brought to ruin. Now, the great Dolgris extends a claw to you. It is up to you whether you will cast aside your wicked ways and fall in line... or die while screaming his name."

Cinculu directed his contempt away from Cuanali, toward Unarin.

"What say you now, Unarin? Have you come to regret the path you've chosen? Will you grovel for forgiveness at Dolgris's feet?"

Unarin didn't immediately respond.

He looked across the pentagonal table at Cinculu, seemingly falling deep into thought.

"I did not entirely expect the situation to develop in this direction." Unarin eventually said. "But you've been acting so self-assured for so long a time, I assumed you must have had some hidden secret at your disposal. You've actually managed to surprise me a little."

Unarin leaned back in his chair. He rested his palms in his lap and sighed.

"You now hold the key to the Volgrim Empire's future life and death, Cinculu. I could be obstinate and continue with the Dying Light Initiative, but that would only result in the deaths of 99% of all remaining Volgrim. Clearly, this is no longer necessary. What must I do to secure Dolgris's help?"

Cinculu's smirk turned into a vicious grin.

"Need you even ask? Step down as First Founder. Retire and live your life in peace. I will take over in Dolgris's name, and lead our people to a future free of heresy."

"Alright." Unarin immediately said. "Done. You are now the First Founder. Anything else?"

Cinculu coughed.

He damn near choked on his own spit. He looked at Unarin for a moment, shocked out of his wits.

"W-what? That's it?"

Unarin shrugged. "I have ruled for a long time. If you think you can do better than me, and if it will save the lives of our people, then I can at least do this much. If your only goal was to seize control of the Volgrim Empire, you could have put this plan into motion a long time ago and saved more lives. It's a shame you didn't, but there is no room in my soul for condemnation now."

Cinculu balked. He couldn't believe what he was hearing.

Unarin was willing to give up the seat of the First Founder to him? Just like that?! Wasn't this a little too easy?

Cinculu became suspicious. Unarin was known for his mind-games. He was a cerebral leader first and foremost. He might be laying a trap for the admittedly slower-witted Dolgrimite.

"What tricks are you dreaming up?" Cinculu asked, narrowing his eyes in suspicion.

Unarin shrugged innocently. "No tricks. The Psions are all but dead. It will take time, precious time we cannot afford, to raise them back to their previous heights. I have ruled for a long, long time. The Empire nearly fell because of my inadequacy. Clearly, whoever Dolgris is, he has given you power I cannot contend with."

Unarin lowered his eyes, seeming to appear a little sad.

"It's a shame this is how it ends, but I am not a petty Volborn. I have failed my people, and it is only right that I step aside."

He paused, then lifted his eyes to direct a strange look at Cinculu.

"Although... I do wonder... are you ready to handle the management of our Empire?"

Cinculu's heart turned cold. The look Unarin was giving him made him feel small in a way he couldn't quite describe.

"Of... of course I am." Cinculu said haltingly. "What are you implying?"

Unarin lifted his head and sighed dramatically. "Ohh, it's just... after I step down, it will be up to you to either convince all the Volgrim currently managing the Empire to follow your lead, or to put new ones in their places. The Volgrim Star Empire consists of more than 1,000,000 free worlds, not counting the hundreds of thousands that have fallen to the Plague in the past. With Dolgris's power, you will naturally work to liberate those worlds and take them back, but this only expands the problem I mentioned previously."

Unarin clicked his tongue chidingly.

"So many worlds... how much administrative support do you think you'll need, keeping them all placated and under your control? The Volgrim people have only known me as their leader. They cannot imagine anyone else. Why, I imagine you're going to have quite the time convincing them to follow you, or Dolgris, or whoever as their new First Founder. Are you sure you're... up to the challenge?"

Cinculu shifted in his chair. He subtly glanced back at Virile, who remained standing in place, unmoving, not daring to say a word in this battle between heavyweights.

Cinculu returned his attention back to Unarin. "So that's your trap. You will pass power to me in name, but foment rebellion, making the worlds unable to accept me as their leader! Truly a nasty trick, Unarin."

Unarin scoffed. He crossed his arms and looked at Cinculu with a smirk. "Don't be a fool, Cinculu. I need not stoop that low. I will happily step aside and watch you burn the Empire which was already going to perish anyway. If you think you can do a better job than me, go right ahead. Take control. Find out just how much I do as leader of our people. I only worry you will find the job is neither as simple nor as fun as you believe it to be."

Silence fell over the room. Cinculu felt his stomach churning. He had expected Unarin to put up a fight, to beg to keep his title, to bow at Dolgris's feet, or to try and struggle for relevancy.

But Cinculu did not expect Unarin to instead riddle him with words of logic.

The truth was, Cinculu did not especially covet the power of First Founder. What good would it do him to move up the ranks and rule the Volgrim Empire? He was already one of the Five Founders, a being so far above the unwashed masses that they would bow and grovel at his feet wherever he went. Certainly, Unarin was considered a step above the other four, but Cinculu was often considered to be equal in status to Cuanali, Treyza, and even Dosena. The four of them were tied for second place in the hearts of their subjects, and that was a fine place to be.

Cinculu wasn't entirely sure what it would mean to run and manage the daily operations of the Volgrim Empire. He hadn't even given it much thought. But now that Unarin put him on the spot, Cinculu realized... it couldn't possibly be easy!

Unarin was right. He wouldn't have to lift a finger for rebellion to explode across every Volgrim-colonized world. How could they possibly accept Cinculu as their First Founder? He would be seen as a usurper and a scumbag who betrayed the other Founders!

Right now, Cinculu knew he was respected and feared across the Milky Way. But if he truly took the next step and seized power, all his respect would turn to smoke. He would still be feared, but for different reasons entirely.

A snarl formed at the edges of Cinculu's mouth. "You... tricky creature. What are you angling for?"

Unarin finally stopped smiling. He sat forward and rested his arms on the table.

"Alright. I'll be direct. I don't necessarily love spending every waking minute of my life running this Empire, but it's something I've grown comfortable doing. I have an eon of experience, and changing leadership right now would throw the galaxy into chaos."

Unarin narrowed his eyes and pointed a finger at Cinculu.

"If, through Dolgris, we now have the means to fight back and defeat the Plague, then you know as well as I do what our true goal should be. This civil war? It means nothing. Someday, if we do manage to crush the Kolvaxians and subjugate the other Sentients, we will still have the Akashic War to deal with. Are you certain Dolgris alone is capable of handling this matter?"

Cinculu glared at Unarin. "You dare speak ill of our God?"

"Do not play at being a fool, Cinculu." Unarin said sternly. "I know for a fact you would make a terrible leader for the Volgrim. You are not strong-willed enough, you lack the clout to make everyone fall into line, and frankly your heart is not interested in ruling over anyone. All you really want are deep concessions for the Dolgrimites, and that is something I am plenty willing to agree to."

Unarin paused.

"You might not make for a good First Founder, but you are also not an imbecile. You know just as well as I do the Truth about Dolgris. He is not a 'god'. You cannot be so delusional as to actually believe in such a thing when you have observed the same Truths as your fellow Founders."

Virile and Ravagil glowered at Unarin. The hateful, heretic words he was spouting made them want to tear his head off. The bastard! How dare he defame their God?!

But Cinculu actually started to calm down. He looked at Unarin while ignoring the sensation of his fellow Dolgrimites gazing at the back of his head.

Unarin knows more than he's let on. How long has he known? Has he only had suspicions until now? Cinculu wondered.

"Speak plainly." Cinculu growled.

"Alright. Let's see if I can avoid making a fool of myself." Unarin said. "Your so-called 'God' is not a God at all. He is a Sentient. A very powerful Sentient. He has hidden his power for ages. I'm not entirely certain of all the details, but perhaps he might even be..."

Unarin paused.

"...an Apex Cosmic?"

Cinculu's heart skipped a beat. He tried not to let his shock show, but Unarin clearly noticed all the microscopic details on the Fifth Founder's face. He could not hide his emotions nearly as well as Unarin.

"It seems I've guessed correctly." Unarin said. "I actually suspected he might only be a High Cosmic, but based on your reaction..."

"You!!" Cinculu roared, pounding the table. "Confounding bastard!"

Before he could say anything else, Unarin interjected. "And let me hazard another guess. That little stunt on XR-Zanovra? Each Dolgrimite you sent was an Apex Mortal. None of them were Cosmics. Yet, even as mere mortals, they were able to challenge those monstrously powerful Kolvaxors. How could such a thing be possible, I wonder? It certainly makes sense if your 'God' is an Apex Cosmic."

Unarin lifted his chin. "Your bodies are not ordinary. Each Dolgrimite is able to project an energy field that stifles other beings you come into close contact with. This power belongs not to you, but to Dolgris. By combining your energy, you are able to channel it into a smaller number of hosts, drastically empowering its effectiveness."

"Finally, and perhaps most importantly," Unarin concluded, "this field of energy is able to stifle the Kolvaxors precisely because of Dolgris's status as an Apex Cosmic. He is mighty enough that even a few slivers of his energy will crush the strength of weaker Cosmics."

All three Dolgrimites looked at Unarin in horror. They felt as if their scales had been stripped away, leaving them naked before his gaze.

What monstrous deductive power! All this from a few clues and watching the battle unfold live? And he had figured it all out in less than an hour! No... more likely, he'd had plenty of suspicions and guesses over the past several thousand years and only now managed to combine it all together into a cohesive deduction.

But even so! This was unbelievable. The Dolgrimites could not wrap their heads around just how scary Unarin's brain could be.

If Cinculu and the others held any thoughts that they would be better than Unarin in terms of wisdom and ruling an Empire, those beliefs were left thoroughly crushed.

"You... are remarkably insightful." Cinculu said through gritted teeth after a few moments.

"Using the power of many to subdue a greater adversary is not too novel of an innovation." Unarin countered. "The Demons have done it, and the Psions, too. Dolgris's ability is, at the least, much more potent than the previous examples."

Unarin's presence seemed to diminish. He knocked lightly on the table, then cleared his throat.

"Would you mind if I made a proposal, Cinculu?"

The Dolgrimite leader hesitated. He couldn't help but be a little afraid of what Unarin said next. Would he start guessing every other secret the Dolgrimites thought was secure?

But, he relented. "Go on."

"Alright. Here it is then." Unarin said, spreading his palms apart graciously. "I will stay the First Founder. Our Empire will remain as it is now. However, I will only be a figurehead. Dolgris, in his capacity as an Apex Cosmic, will be the one who truly leads the Empire. If he wishes to issue any edicts, I will deliver them and comply with all his orders. If he wishes to kill me, he can do so as well. I shall follow any commands he gives. And you, as his spokesperson, will be the go-between for both of us. A most prestigious role, I might add."

"You're saying you would willingly bend the knee to Dolgris? All this just to retain your power?" Cinculu asked. "Are you truly so shameless?"

"How little you know." Unarin replied, his tone bland. "I have spent millions of cycles building this Empire. I enjoy watching it grow, watching it thrive. If you think I only do this for some self-aggrandizing reason, then let me assure you, I do not."

Unarin waved his hand flippantly.

"I would love to step back and let someone else lead. I would love to take a vacation and tour the galaxy, observe various civilizations, gaze upon their art and culture, and immerse myself in frivilous pleasantries. But I cannot bring myself to do so if it would mean placing the future of my people in the hands of incompetent buffoons. Until someone who I consider to be my intellectual equal rises up and shows the desire and capacity to continue leading our great Empire, I will do what I can to remain in power and keep the galaxy... stable."

He lowered his hand.

"So, that is why I make this arrangement. It has nothing to do with my ego. I only want to see our people thrive. Everything I do is to achieve that end."

Unarin fell silent. Cinculu became thoughtful. His hostility dropped somewhat, and he gazed at the table, uncertain of what to do.

But it wasn't long before he decided to speak.

"You are effectively asking me to maintain the status quo." Cinculu muttered. "That would defeat the purpose of today's demonstration."

"On the contrary. You have demonstrated that the Dolgrimites are capable of playing an extremely useful role in our Empire. No longer sidelined, mocked, or ignored, you will become the future protectors of our people, granted the same prestige the Psions once held." Unarin replied smoothly. "I am certain that as time goes on, many Volgrim will convert to worshiping Dolgris. They will bow before his might, as demonstrated by his devotees. This is what you want, yes?"

"It is... but will you feel satisfied knowing our people no longer worship you?" Cinculu asked.

"I have never demanded, asked, nor implicitly made it seem as though I desired our people's adoration." Unarin replied. "This Empire is vast. It is bigger than perhaps you are even capable of comprehending. I have taken on the role of a figurehead out of necessity. It is important the Volgrim have a unifying figure at the top. Whether it be me or Dolgris, I care not. I am content with sinking back into the shadows and working in secret. As Dolgris grows to swallow more of the people's attention, I will be more free to move about and pursue my own hobbies and desires."

That answer seemed to satisfy Cinculu.

"Very well. I will convey your intentions to Dolgris."

Unarin paused.

"Ah, about that. It will not be necessary. You will arrange for me to meet with Dolgris in person."

"WHAT?!" Cinculu roared, standing up and throwing his seat aside in a fit of rage. "No! How dare you?! I will never allow it!!"

The table fell silent. The other four Founders looked at Cinculu with mixed expressions, some of them pitiable, some of them mocking. Only Treyza seemed utterly unmoved, its neutral expression never changing in the least.

"We've been over this." Unarin said, completely disregarding the fearsome look on Cinculu's face. It was as if he were being threatened by a clown. "You may think of Dolgris as a god, but in the end, he is a Sentient like any other. I will speak to him alone, in person, with no others present. I will naturally be at his mercy, and if he should so desire to execute my for my impudence, nobody will retaliate."

Cinculu shook with rage. In his mind, he knew Dolgris was not really a god, but his heart had long ago turned to stone and would never allow such blasphemy to be spoken! It took all his self control not to leap across the table and bite Unarin's throat out!

Dosena was no longer a threat. Unarin was totally defenseless! Yet even now, Cinculu simply couldn't bring himself to make such a move. It was as if his wrists had been shackled by the rules of a game he did not know he was even playing.

He shook with hatred for several seconds, then slowly blinked his eyes.

"You... I will inform Dolgris of your... request. If my God decides to grant you an audience, it will be on his prerogative. Not yours."

Unarin seemed as if he might argue the point, but sensing Cinculu's religious fervor, he decided not to press his luck.

"Very well. We'll do it that way, then. I look forward to Dolgris's response."

With his seat thrown aside, Cinculu decided it would not be fitting for him to pick it up and sit back down like a doofus. So, instead, he swept his gaze around the table in a manner most grandiose.

"Treyza. The rest of you. I take my leave."

Without another word, he spun on his heel and stormed out, the other two Dolgrimites right behind him.

After Muuxunuu had opened and shut the door to the Founder's Soul, a full minute of silence followed. None of the other four Founders said a word.

Then, Cuanali broke the silence.

"Everything was as you predicted." She said, closing her eyes and bowing her head.

"Almost everything." Treyza interjected. "Founder Unarin did not predict that the Dolgrimites would defeat the Kolvaxors. He predicted that Dolgris himself would intervene."

"A minor discrepancy." Unarin said, smiling at the other Founders. "We have preserved our power... for now. Although, I do find it... curious."

"Find what curious?" Cuanali asked, her robotic tone rising an octave.

"If Dolgris is so powerful, then why does he need to rely on mere mortals to fight his battles for him?" Unarin mused. "Something tells me this ancient entity is not what he seems. I... look forward to speaking with him in person."

"The Dolgrimites are zealots. They will not grant you an audience." Treyza stated.

Unarin sneered.

"It won't be up to them."

Part 651: Rebuilding

Far-Future Era. Day 3, AJR.

Across the Milky Way, the recent shocking events continued to compound and explode out of control. Between the fall of Maiura, the destruction of Tarus II, the betrayal of Demila, the fall of the Psions, and now, the reveal of the Dolgrimites... far too much had happened in only three days!

The rumors were spreading faster than a Kolvaxian infection! Humans, demons, and Volgrim alike were struggling to keep up with one explosive story after another! In fact, almost nobody knew about what had happened on XL-Zanovra outside the Volgrim survivors, the Dolgrimites, and Chrona's spies.

For once, the demons were completely unaware. Due to the remote location of XL-Zanovra and the fact no Cosmics were involved, outside the Kolvaxors who were already known for appearing and disappearing across the galaxy, the Demon Deities had no clue about what had just transpired.

Thus, a day later, when Demon Deity Auger was preparing for the demons' new transition to supporting the humans in hopes of countering the Kolvaxians, he was startled when a one of his Dukes arrived at his manor on Numaria.

Dawn, the Demon Duke of Stillness, quickly bowed her head and dropped to one knee as she entered his abode.

"Deity Au-ger! I have news to de-liver! The Warpgate on Numaria has just opened up. A vi-sitor is here. Says he is a Dol-grimite from the world of Grimvolas. He requests an urgent meeting with you!"

The cute young vampiress lifted her head and smiled, baring her fangs at Auger. She was none other than the former Lord of Caves who had long ago interacted with Amelia around the same time as her encounter with Gressil. But now, after dutifully serving under the Deities and absorbing Emperor Glinch's blood-essence-pills, she, and many other formerly weak Demon Lords, had been uplifted to ever greater heights! So many demons had been uplifted that Glinch had actually run out of pills. She, and those like her, could advance no further.

Auger frowned. "A Dolgrimite?"

Dawn nodded quickly. "Yes, Deity! He says he has a report to de-liver regarding the Kolvaxians."

Auger nodded. "Send him in, then leave us."

Dawn did as she was told. Thirty minutes later, a hunched-over Dolgrimite strode into the room, bowing his head respectfully, but without fear, in deference to the Demon Deity.

"Auger. My mother wishes she could have come. Unfortunately, her duties to Dolgris take precedence over all other matters."

"Yes. Dolgris." Auger said, narrowing his eyes slightly. "Founder Cinculu. I am always pleased to meet with one such as yourself, but given the recent events that have transpired in Volgrim space, I am surprised Unarin himself did not pay me a visit."

Cinculu raised his head. He smirked at the Demon Deity of Civilizations.

"Hehehe... it seems you are unaware of what has transpired."

"I am quite aware." Auger replied, his tone bland. "The Psions have fallen. Your Empire is crumbling. Now, you come to me, hoping to fall beneath my protective wing."

A moment of silence followed. Auger frowned when he saw Cinculu's unchanged expression.

"No, dear Auger, you are unaware." Cinculu repeated. "A great many happenings have transpired. The old balance of power no longer remains relevant. A new change in rulership has taken over the Milky Way. Soon, all will bow their heads before the might of Dolgris. I am not here as a representative of the Founders."

Auger's frown deepened. "...Then why have you come?"

"You species is vulnerable. You are frail and weak." Cinculu said. "The Psions will no longer hold back the Plague. Soon, give or take a few rotational cycles, it is likely the Plague will come to you. And you have no adequate means to protect yourself. You will fall... no matter how many units of time must pass before the inevitable conclusion."

The Deity of Civilizations snorted. "That's funny, coming from a Volgrim. If the demons ultimately fall, it will be long after your people do. Things aren't looking so good for you."

"You still are not paying attention to my hints." Cinculu said with a quiet sigh. "Never the matter. I'll make it more obvious."

He stood up a little straighter. His body towered more than three feet above Auger, but as a mere mortal, his presence was weaker.

Even so, he still felt... oddly formidable.

"Dolgris's Devotees are not helpless against the so-called Plague." Cinculu said, his tone grave. "In fact, we are its worst enemy. We have taken back a world which was about to fall to the Plague. XR-Zanovra now belongs to Dolgris."

"What?" Auger asked, momentarily tongue-tied. "You have a method?"

"Of course." Cinculu said with a feral grin. "We are the predator, and the Kolvaxians are our prey. Dolgris sees all. Dolgris knows all. Those who bend the knee will share in His glory. Those who defy Him will burst apart like bugs beneath a heel."

Auger's heart skipped a beat. He couldn't tell if Cinculu was bullshitting him or not. But if it was a lie, it was a bold one. It shouldn't be too hard to validate what he was saying!

"What happened on XR-Zanovra?" Auger asked.

"You won't take me at my word? No matter. I've brought a Recording Crystal. All shall be revealed." Cinculu replied, extending his claw to reveal a small purple gem.

Auger fell silent. He retrieved the crystal, then poured his mana into it. A scene began to play for him, a perfect re-enactment of the battle between the Dolgrimites and the Kolvaxians, taken from one of the Dolgrimite warriors' point of view.

Several minutes passed. Half an hour. A full hour.

Both males remained silent. Cinculu stared reverently at the video, mentally basking in the power displayed by his brothers and sister. Auger stared, his mouth slightly agape, shocked out of his wits.

The Dolgrimites didn't just win, they absolutely crushed the enemies even Diablo would have struggled to defeat. In fact, Diablo had no chance. Once the Empowered Kolvaxians appeared, he was utterly helpless. He died the very same day Artoria had Uplifted them.

Now, it seemed the Dolgrimites were able to stomp Diablo's previous feat into the ground. They weren't simply strong, they were terrifying.

After playing back the entire video, the crystal broke into dust. It had perfectly recreated the battle, but it could only be used once. Luckily, the Dolgrimites were capable of making more.

Despite finishing the video, Auger did not immediately speak. He stared off into the distance, his mind ablaze.

The Dolgrimites can fight back and defeat the Plague. We cannot. That gives them an unbeatable advantage. If they choose to do nothing, the rest of the Milky Way will fall. Then they can fight back and reclaim it. But if so, why come to me? The math doesn't add up. They must see some value in working with the demons.

Perhaps there is a numerical disparity. The Dolgrimites can certainly crush the Kolvaxians, but their people only populate a single world. Compared to the tens of trillions, perhaps even septillions of Kolvaxians, their numbers are far, far too few. They might want to build up a relationship with the demons to use us as meatshields. Or perhaps though they are strong against the Kolvaxians, they are not so strong against other Threats.

And then there is the matter of Dolgris...

Auger massaged his hand against his chin, stroking his goatee thoughtfully. He looked at Cinculu with deep suspicion.

"You have no need of my people. Why come here? Simply to brag? You can win this war by staying back, allowing the Plague to devour us all, and then slaughtering it after the fact."

Cinculu crossed his arms and puffed out his chest.

"The Auger I know would not say something so foolish. We have the absolute advantage in strength, but the disadvantage in numbers. If the Plague should attack with its full force, it might crash upon our people relentlessly, cycle after cycle, beating and wearing us down until we perish to the last Sentient. Thus, we have... special needs."

Auger decided to voice his misgivings. "You mean bodies for the meat grinder."

Cinculu stayed quiet for a moment. He closed his eyes and bowed his head.

"You demons are not so different from us Dolgrimites."

"In what way?" Auger asked.

"You detest technology. You eschew the embrace of metal while staying true to your origins. Your bodies are more volatile than ours, more prone to strange mutations, likely as a result of your reliance of devouring souls... but at your core, you are a species that holds certain principles dear."

Cinculu raised his head. He opened his eyes and extended his claw with its palm facing up.

"We intend to convert some of the Volgrim who are not entirely lost. We will make them see the light and return to Dolgris where they belong. But the vast majority are lost. They hide in their star vessels, praying to the false gods for salvation. They may be false believers, but they are also our greatest threat. We only possess a few star vessels; necessary for defending our voidspace, but disgusting to us by all accounts, and built by the worshipers of steel and circuits. Full of security holes. Not to be trusted."

He crooked a finger and waggled it at Auger.

"That is where your species comes in. Once this war is over, we will need trustworthy allies; ones who share our vision of a united galaxy, capable of battling the Threats which shall surely come afterward. We will need your help to eliminate our heretic brothers and sisters, seize control of their wealthy worlds, and rebuild them in Dolgris' honor."

"Let's say we succeed." Auger said, his face betraying neither interest nor disinterest in Cinculu's offer. "Let's say we purge the galaxy of the Plague, of the 'heretics' you cannot defeat alone... where does that leave the Demons and Dolgrimites? Will we continue to be allies? Or don't you think we will start to fight among each other?"

"Right now, survival should be our only goal." Cinculu responded. "There is plenty of galaxy to split between our species. Millions of life-bearing worlds. We can always satiate our greed far, far in the future."

A long pause followed. Auger turned away. He wandered off to the left and stared out at the beautiful sunny forest canopy beyond his halls with a grim and thoughtful look.

"A matter this important... I cannot decide it on my own."

Cinculu chuckled. "If you accept, my people shall position at least three regiments of elite Dolgrimite warriors on any worlds you deem core to your cause. For the lesser worlds, we will place two regiments, and on the least important worlds, only one. If the Plague should ever attack, your worlds will have their safety assured."

"That's generous of you." Auger said, directing a cold eye toward Cinculu. "That's very generous."

"You suspect I have ulterior motives?" Cinculu asked.

"I know you do." Auger replied. "This is simply all so sudden that I haven't had time to determine what they might be."

He stroked his goatee once more.

"If you truly want to secure an alliance with my people, then I need more information. I need to know... who Dolgris is. If your 'god' is not some ephemeral figure, but a flesh and blood entity, than securing demonkind's alliance will not happen without my meeting him in person."

Cinculu's expression darkened. "You? A mere Middle Cosmic? You believe yourself worthy of entering His presence? It seems Dolgris's name does not command the respect it should. Even Unarin had the guts to request an audience..."

"How can I possibly respect someone I don't even know?" Auger asked, trying not to look annoyed. "If your 'god' does not exist anywhere but your imagination, then just say so and stop wasting our time. If he does, then arrange a meeting. I am leader of the Demons. If I cannot request an audience, then who can? You should at least show some sincerity."

Cinculu eyed Auger carefully. A full minute passed as he mulled Auger's demands in his mind.

"I will speak to Dolgris. I will convey your wishes to His Eminence."

"Good." Auger said. "I don't see any reason we need to speak further. I should call up the other Demon leaders first and tell them about the new new situation. I will need their consent before entering our species into any binding pledges."

Cinculu slowly nodded. "Let us speak again, Auger."

"Cinculu." Auger replied, his tone terse.

The Fifth Founder turned on his heel, then marched out of Auger's Sanctum and left.

Minutes passed.

Auger became thoughtful. He debated a great many possibilities in the back of his mind.

The Deity of Civilizations was not an intellectual genius like Unarin, nor did he have an accelerated brain like Dosena, but he was quick-witted in his own way. Being able to trade around the powers of millions of demons necessarily meant he could tap into the minds of his subjects at will. He had become quite adept at bending others to his will via manipulation and deception.

Now that he had become the de facto 'First Emperor of Demonkind', such tricks were not strictly necessary... though it rankled him that a certain other usurper continued to hold the title.

Auger closed his eyes.

[Yardrat. Convene the other Deities. The situation has changed... again.]

With three days having passed since the fall of Tarus II, the humans that scattered to the worlds of Pixiv and Sharmur slowly came to grips with their new reality. Their lives had been completely upended. Fathers, mothers, sons and daughters had perished, leaving countless families broken beyond repair. Many people numbly trudged through their day to day lives, working to build new housing, all while wondering in the backs of their minds just how long it would be until their new reality fell apart again.

Nobody had any confidence in the status quo being maintained. They trudged along like zombies, doing what was told, but not really investing their energy into anything.

The mood was somber. Soleil sat up in a tree outside the vicinity of the first major human city in the former Sharmur capital. Below her, a large open stone arena stood, and a pair of women were fighting one another. One of them wielded a sword and a shield, the other used her flexible limbs that could change shape into whatever she needed.

These two were Cassiel and Belial.

Under the cover of a stealth field put down by one of Belial's Demon Duke contacts, the two women sparred with furious gusto. Time was not on their side. They needed to spend every possible day training their bodies and minds. Cassiel had assumed her true angelic form under the cover of the stealth field, and used her wings to accelerate her movement with the instinctive knowledge she had built up ages ago.

Belial wasn't really in need of the training, but it was still good for her. It helped clear her head.

Cassiel, on the other hand, was badly out of practice, a hundred thousand years rusty, and had suffered horrendous psychological trauma.

Whenever Belial charged at her, Cassiel flinched slightly. She knew Belial wouldn't deliberately try to kill her, but her body's reaction was instinctual. She could not control her involuntary muscle reactions any more easily than she could control Sharmur's winds.

Belial's fists crashed against Cassiel's shield. Cassiel stabbed at her training partner, and Belial dodged the attack with a fluid sidestep.

"Your movements are sloppy." Belial said between blows. "If you were a fearsome fighter in the past, you're not anymore. You have a long way to go before you reach your previous heights."

Cassiel gritted her teeth. "Quiet, you! I won't give up!"

She charged at Belial and tried to slam her shield into the Demon Emperor's arm, but Belial slithered downward, ducked under the shield, and swept her leg out, tripping Cassiel and sending her collapsing to the dirt atop her shield. A gruesome crackling noise made Belial's heart drop.

"Argh! My wrist, ahhh!" Cassiel cried out.

Due to the way she was holding the shield, it had suddenly snapped her wrist when she collapsed on top of it, leaving bones sticking out.

Belial grimaced. She quickly dropped to one knee, then helped pull Cassiel's hand out of the shield's holster. Using her healing magic, she repaired the damage, then paused to touch the angel's back.

"I'm sorry. We can stop if you need a break. I've been going pretty hard on you."

Cassiel clenched her jaw. She flopped onto her butt and stared gloomily into the distance while gently massaging her wrist. Even though the wound had been healed, the phantom pain remained. It still seemed as if she could feel her bones jabbing up through the skin.

"We can't stop." Cassiel whispered. "It's only a small injury. Already as good as new."

Suddenly, a voice called out from above. "Someone is coming."

It was Soleil, who was there to keep a lookout for unwanted visitors. With her warning, Cassiel quickly grasped the Heaven's Shroud and activated it, returning back to her human persona within seconds.

Less than a minute later, a male voice became audible at the edge of the clearing as he passed through the stealth field.

"What's this? Some sort of barrier?"

"Melody said she'd be here..." A female voice said, her tone tinged with doubt.

They crested the top of a small hill and stepped into the arena, finally becoming visible.

"B-Beelzebub?" Belial exclaimed. "And Kiari?"

"Oh, hey, Belial." Beelzebub said, giving her a half-hearted wave. "I came to get your help. See, me and Kiari- hm?"

He paused, noticing the random human woman wearing armor, wielding a sword in one hand while a shield with flakes of blood lay on the ground.

"...Am I interrupting something?" Beelzebub asked.

"Nothing I'd consider your business." Belial gruffly answered. "I heard you 'Ascended.' Became a Middle Cosmic. The other Deities may or may not have lightly shat their pants at the thought of you attacking them."

Beelzebub looked at the random human woman for only a moment before immediately ignoring her. For all he knew, she was Belial's 'partner' and this was some sort of odd copulation ritual. Rumor had it Belial wasn't really into males these days, so it wasn't out of the ordinary. And he didn't give a damn about some ordinary human woman anyway.

Beelzebub jerked a thumb toward Kiari. "You remember Kiari's husband?"

Belial nodded. "Saul, yes. What's wrong? Has something happened?"

Kiari's expression darkened. "Beelzebub has been helping me... look for Saul... we've looked... we've looked everywhere. I'm at my wit's end. I was teleported off Tarus II, but... but... I don't know if..."

The arena fell silent. Belial lowered her eyes.

"As a Demon Emperor, it's likely you were deemed a high value asset. Your survival was essential. But with the Volgrim attacking so quickly and so brutally... Saul might not have received the same treatment. Other VIPs would have come before him."

Kiari's expression didn't change. She looked as dead inside as ever. "Please... please don't say that. Can you think of anywhere he might be, Samantha?"

Belial continued to look at the ground.

She didn't know for sure... but the answer seemed obvious.

Saul was dead. He had to be.

He wasn't a high value asset. He would have been considered mid-value at best. Many others were more necessary to save than him.

Belial had lost a husband. She knew the agony Kiari must be experiencing. Even if Kiari and Saul had only known each other for a tiny fraction of how long Satan and Belial did, their bond was just as beautiful.

She swallowed a heavy lump in her throat.

"There's... there might be... one other place you could look." Belial finally said, after a few seconds of thinking. "The Hall of Heroes, Hope's secret domain."

"Oh? Why there?" Beelzebub asked.

"Because Saul was Solomon's nephew." Belial explained. "And he worked closely with Hope... until the Second Wordsmith died. It's the only place I can think of that makes sense. Maybe they teleported Saul off-world before..."

"Yes. You might be right." Beelzebub said. "Do you have any idea how we can contact the Hall of Heroes?"

"Your best bet is to find one of Jepthath's Legionnaires." Belial said, before visibly cringing. "But. Um. You're both... demons. They don't... like us."

Kiari's expression fell. "No. No they don't. Is there anyone else?"

Belial scratched her head.

"I wasn't exactly on speaking terms with anyone related to Hope. He was a bit of a bastard toward me. Though, if I had to hazard a guess... Neil Adams is gone, Hope is gone... oh!"

Belial raised a finger and smiled. "There is one person who's not a complete and total piece of work. Why don't you look for Neil's assistant, Debra? If she's still alive, she might be able to act as an intermediary for you. She could pass your request along the grapevine, through the Legion."

Beelzebub looked puzzled. He hadn't the slightest idea who Debra was, but Kiari seemed to know. She mostly got along with everyone, as long as they weren't diehard anti-demon fanatics.

"Debra!" Kiari exclaimed, smiling more cheerfully than before. "That's a great idea. Okay, thanks for the tip, Sammy! We appreciate it."

Beelzebub nodded. "We'll let you and your girlfriend get back to scissoring."

He and Kiari turned to walk away, while Belial was left frowning at his backside.

Cassiel turned beet-red. "H-hey! What is that pig implying?!"

"It's best not to ask." Belial said.

In the back of her mind, Belial felt extremely puzzled.

Beelzebub doesn't feel like a Demon Deity. He seems pretty normal. Why can't I sense any of the power from him that I do from the other Deities?

She shook her head, then turned to face Cassiel once more.

"Now that those two are gone, would you like to continue training?"

Cassiel nodded. She returned to her angelic form and gritted her teeth.

"We've only just begun!"

Part 652: Beelzebub's Bluff

Far-Future Era. Day 3, AJR. The world of Sharmur.

Beelzebub and Kiari traveled into Sharmur's capital city, which was also the only city where any Sentients had assembled. In the past, before the Kolvaxians attacked, hundreds of millions of demons and a few million humans had lived spread across the planet, but now only a comparatively tiny number lived here.

Following the rebirth of the planet, the capital city had been renamed to Melodia, after their planet's highest protector. Located nearest the Great Temple where the planet's sole Warpgate was located, Melodia had only existed for two days, but already it had become a hubbub of activity.

Humans and demons swarmed over the city. Melodia had only fallen for a short period of time after the Kolvaxians took over, yet it and every other city had become overgrown with new trees, vines, and other foliage swallowing the buildings whole. Many parts of Sharmur that were once barren and lifeless deserts had already started turning into lush gardens, and locations that had a decent amount of greenery turned into veritable jungles. As for the areas which were already dense, those became far thicker and taller than any others.

It was clear to anyone with half a brain that the Kolvaxian takeover had stimulated the life energy of the planet, causing its foliage to explode in density.

Beelzebub and Kiari took their time. They weren't in a big rush. They wandered through the streets, looking at various humans and demons working alongside monsters to clear out buildings along the main dirt road.

"We've already looked in so many places." Kiari said anxiously. "What... what if Saul isn't inside the Hall of Heroes? What if he...?"

Beelzebub pursed his lips. "There's a very real likelihood... well... you should prepare yourself. It's awful to imagine, but different lives are valued differently by the higher-ups."

Kiari's stomach knotted together. She massaged her nascent womb, still not entirely sure how to feel about the fact that, as a demon, she had become pregnant. She had never anticipated this happening, and it was only a happy coincidence. But now, her husband might be gone. She wasn't ready for the heartache.

"Humans are... so fragile." Beelzebub mused. "Their lives are fleeting. They live for a while, and then they die. Not like demons, angels, or many monsters. They accomplish incredible things... then they're gone."

"But humans can become immortal now." Kiari said. "With the Bodily Rejuvenation Depot, humans can return to their youth infinitely."

"Could." Beelzebub gently corrected. "They could. But Jason Hiro is gone. He only made one of those. It was on Tarus II."

"So they can't anymore." Kiari said quietly. "Then... our human friends... they're all going to die again?"

"Eventually." Beelzebub said with a nod. "But you never know. Maybe there's still a way those Rejuvenation Depots can return. Or maybe we can make humans like Benjamin Brown flourish. He's immortal because of the robot... stuff... in his body. I don't know. Maybe the humans can reinvent that technology..."

Beelzebub had no idea how anything inside Benjamin Brown's body worked, but the fact that he was made ageless during an era far before the Wordsmith meant it might be possible for the humans to replicate his feat. Unfortunately, solving age weasn't nearly as important to the humans now as surviving past the end of the year.

Their technology was still primitive. Their armies immature. Their numbers pitiful.

Humanity had lost nearly all their champions. Both Wordsmiths were dead. The future seemed pitch-black. Many people assumed they were going to perish before their children made it to adulthood. This state of affairs left them in a tragic mindset.

The two Emperors strode through the city and headed toward Debra's house, somewhere on the east side. The city itself was constructed alongside two rivers that met in an 'X' shape. The rivers flowed into and through one another, splitting Melodia into four distinct quadrants. Bridges crossed the rivers at several points, but in the past the city had naturally settled into split demographics, with humans taking up much of the eastern one. It seemed Melody looked to replicate some of that, though right now the humans outnumbered their demon peers two to one, so they had opted to live in the south and east sides.

As the two walked, a voice suddenly called out to them, as they neared one of the bridges crossing into the east side of Melodia.

"Beelzebub!"

The demon in question turned and glanced at the one who had shouted. He smiled.

"Oh, Orias. Hm? You're still a Baron?"

Orias, Baron of the Stars, strode over and clapped Beelzebub on the back. His status as Emperor didn't seem to affect the warmth in Orias's smile at all.

"Only a Baron? That's what you meant, right? Well, some of us aren't living up on Cloud Nine. Don't forget your roots, kid."

In the past, Beelzebub and Orias had spoken on several occasions. They were not best friends or anything, but Orias and Beelzebub's former Master, Agares, could be said to be rather close. They had certainly known each other since the Ancient Era.

Beelzebub scratched his chin and looked away. "Sorry, that wasn't what I meant to imply. Rather, I thought with your connections, you'd had swallowed a couple of those miracle pills and become an Emperor by now."

Orias's smile dimmed. "Those tainted dregs made by that madman, Glinch? I still have standards."

He looked at Kiari. "Oh! And if it isn't the cute little Emperor of Pestilence herself. Helping with the construction efforts?"

Kiari softly shook her head. "I'm... trying to find my husband. Saul. We were together on Tarus II when it... but then I was teleported off-world, and he didn't come with me. I'm at my wit's end..."

Orias's expression turned grave. "That... I'm sorry to hear that, Kiari. So, he's-?"

Kiari's body stiffened. "No, definitely not. We haven't confirmed anything yet. We suspect Solomon might have rescued Saul and taken him to Hope's special area, the Hall of Heroes. He was Saul's uncle, after all."

Orias tried to smile reassuringly, but the effort felt forced. "I see. I'm sure you'll find him there, then."

Beelzebub looked between the two of them, then cleared his throat so he could change the subject. "Orias, heard any interesting gossip from the demon leaders?"

"Nothing as of yet." Orias said, equally glad not to dwell on such a heavy topic. "Last I heard, they were secretly debating whether or not to support humanity."

Beelzebub scoffed. "Support them? Those bastards shoved humanity out of the Core as quickly as they could! What support?!"

"Apparently their tune has changed." Orias said. He looked around, then quickly dragged Beelzebub and Kiari off to the side, further away from the bridge. He lowered his voice. "Have you heard about what happened to the Volgrim?"

Beelzebub's eyes narrowed to slits. "Oh? Something happened to them? I would be very interested in good news right about now."

Orias nodded. He quickly summarized the 'current ongoing' situation with a traitor among the Psions. It had already become public knowledge that countless Psions had abruptly perished across the galaxy. This news startled Kiari and shook Beelzebub to his core.

"Just like that?" Beelzebub asked. "The Psions are dead?"

"There are still some scattered survivors." Orias replied. "I spoke to a few different Seers. Some of the Psions were apparently immune to Demila's rampaging. Don't ask me why; I have no idea. But the vast, vast majority have fallen. Even Executor Nufaris."

"Nufaris too?!" Beelzebub exclaimed. His eyes turned feral. "That bastard! I nearly killed him myself, but he managed to evade me with the Second Founder in tow! Now you're telling me he's dead?!"

Orias looked Beelzebub up and down. "So it's true, then. I heard you experienced an Uplifting. But... I don't sense any Cosmic Energy from you. Are you... still a Demon Deity?"

Beelzebub blinked. He crossed his arms and slightly turned away. "I am only a Demon Emperor, once again."

"Ah... I see. I'm sorry to hear that." Orias said. "Well, to answer your question, he's dead for sure. Apparently some incident happened. Mephisto reappeared and wreaked havoc on Volgarius. He killed trillions of Volgrim, then Nufaris sacrificed himself to kill Mephisto. I don't know the details, only what the Seers told me."

"Mephisto... that evil villain." Kiari muttered. "But... isn't this terrible news? The Volgrim were the bulwark against the Plague. Without them, aren't we all in dire straits?"

"You hit the nail on the head." Orias said with a slow nod. "That's why the Demon Deities are thinking of collaborating with the humans."

Kiari's expression darkened. "I think I get it. They don't have Diablo anymore, so they're hoping the humans find a way to counter the Plague. Those shameless leeches! First they bully us, then they beg us for our favor?!"

"The Demon Deities haven't been that bad to the humans." Beelzebub interjected. "They jumped in to help fight off the Kolvaxors during the Battle on Maiura."

"Well, great!" Kiari said sarcastically. "One good deed undoes a hundred bad ones! You know just as well as I do that the Demon Deities have been plotting to wipe the humans out. But now that the Psions are gone, look how quickly they change their tune!"

Beelzebub scratched his chin. Kiari had a point, and he couldn't refute it.

The three of them talked a little while longer. Eventually, Orias bowed his head.

"It has been good catching up with you two, but I have matters to which I must attend."

"You've got stuff going on?" Beelzebub joked. "I thought all you did was dig for gems."

"I have plenty of those for now." Orias replied. "Recently, I have been... contemplating a great many matters. The disappearance of the Wordsmiths, the instability of the universe. Things are becoming chaotic, and the threads of karma which bind us grow ever more tenuous. But I feel that soon... in not too distant a future... humanity is bound to experience a shocking upswing in fortune."

"I do hope that makes you feel better." Beelzebub said, sticking his hands in his suit-pants' pockets. "But... it sounds like mumbo-jumbo to me."

"Hehehe... karma and chaos are intertwined." Orias said mysteriously. "Today's atrocities can become tomorrow's guiding lights. As we speak, powerful forces are rallying to move their pieces around the board. You would do well to focus on reacquiring that power which you've lost."

"I'll worry about it when it's important." Beelzebub replied with a shrug. "I've already tasted the power of a Middle Cosmic. When the time is right, I'm sure I'll experience it again."

Orias smiled. "On that subject, we both agree."

The demons bade each other farewell, and Orias strode off.

After he left, Kiari gave Beelzebub a curious look. "So you're really really not a Demon Deity anymore?"

Beelzebub smirked. "For now. But don't worry about it. Humanity can still count on me."

Ten minutes later, they arrived before a humble house built in the center of East Melodia. Lots of people bustled about, and the other residences were crowded together, built densely with three floors each. After looking at the nameplate on the door, Beelzebub spotted two blank rooms that hadn't been inhabited yet, and one with Debra's name on it.

He knocked loudly on the door, but modulated his energy so that it wouldn't come off as aggressive.

Eventually, the door opened, and a blonde woman wearing thick black glasses opened it up to look at him in surprise.

"I... Beelzebub? Kiari?"

"Hi, Debra!" Kiari said with a cheerful wave. "Um, sorry to bother you out of the blue..."

"No, no it's fine." Debra said. "Can I help you with anything?"

She opened the door a little wider and exited onto the front steps. Beelzebub immediately noticed that Debra's eyes looked tired, as if she hadn't experienced good sleep in several days. Considering the man she served, Neil, had been killed by the Kolvaxians, and Hope had fallen right afterward, he imagined she must be experiencing depression and fatigue.

"We, um, we wanted to check on you..." Kiari said hesitantly. "And also ask you for a favor. But if you can't, it's- it's fine..."

"Not many people talk to me these days." Debra said, forcing a weak smile. "I sometimes offer to help Linda with various things, but she often rejects me. She says I should take some time off."

Debra's shoulders sagged. "And then there's the matter of my sister disappearing."

"Your sister?" Beelzebub asked.

"You wouldn't know her. Her name was Annette... and due to some circumstances, she ended up with Hope Hiro. Various things happened. After his death, she apparently vanished from the Hall of Heroes. Nobody knows where she's gone."

"I'm sorry to hear that..." Kiari said quietly. "Though, speaking of the Hall of Heroes, that's what I wanted to talk to you about."

She quickly explained her wishes, and Debra listened silently.

"I'm not exactly 'in' with the current leadership anymore." Debra said. "But I can speak to Henry. If I don't mention you two, I'm sure he'd check in at the Hall of Heroes to see if Saul is there."

"C-could you please?" Kiari asked, her voice jumping an octave. "I would greatly appreciate it."

Debra's eyes softened. "You lost your husband. So did Linda. A lot of spouses have died. This is the least I can do."

After confirming that she would ask Henry the very next day, Debra offered for the two demons to come inside, but they shook their heads.

"We really can't put you out like that." Beelzebub said. "I also have some stuff to deal with."

"Me as well." Kiari said. "I feel guilty that I haven't been using my bugs to help rebuild."

"Well, alright then. How should I contact you once I have news?" Debra asked Kiari.

Kiari gestured in all directions. "If you see one of my big bugs doing something, just go near it and call out my name. I'll know."

"Alright. We'll do it like that then." Debra said. "See you two later..."

She closed the door, then Beelzebub and Kiari walked away.

"I have someone I need to see." Beelzebub said after a few moments of quiet. "Let me know how things go later, Kiari."

Kiari nodded. She looked at Beelzebub with sparkling eyes. "Thank... thank you for being there for me, Beelzebub. You're a good person."

"Hardly." Beelzebub retorted gruffly, but his voice softened a little when he met Kiari's gaze. After a moment, he coughed and looked away. "Take care."

Flames ignited under Beelzebub's feet. He rocketed up into the air and left Kiari behind, taking to Sharmur's skies.

At the moment Beelzebub became a burning light in the sky, he drew a lot of attention. A pair of ethereal figures immediately noticed him. They turned and stopped, looking up into the sky with surprise.

"Isn't that Beelzebub?" Demon Deity Yardrat asked, his Astral Form having arrived on Sharmur only half an hour before.

"It certainly looks to be him." Demon Deity Kristoff replied. "But... he doesn't have the aura of a Middle Cosmic."

"How is that possible?" Yardrat asked. "One does not simply stop living life as a Demon Deity."

Kristoff frowned. He looked at the ground and rubbed his chin.

"This matter cannot be simple. If Beelzebub is not actually a Demon Deity anymore, than much of our wariness toward humanity is unwarranted. We can still boss them around a bit. Melody alone is not enough to incite our worries."

"Whoa, whoa. Don't be too hasty." Yardrat interjected, raising both his palms. "Beelzebub might only be hiding his aura."

"Is such a thing possible?" Kristoff asked.

Both men paused. They massaged their foreheads, then hemmed and hawed.

"I've never heard of a Demon Deity hiding their aura, but it should be possible..." Yardrat finally said, though his tone was anything but certain. "Why would they not want to broadcast their power?"

Kristoff shrugged. "Beelzebub is rather arrogant. Him hiding his power seems unlikely. It's simply not his style. He probably has reverted back to only being an ordinary Emperor."

"Are you willing to gamble our future on that?!" Yardrat snapped. "If there's even a ten percent chance..."

"Mmm. We should talk to Auger first." Kristoff replied. "We were supposed to come here and inform the human leader, Commander Hurent, of our new plans. But those plans were based on Beelzebub being a threat. If he's not, we definitely, definitely can't rush into any decisions."

After another minute or two of thinking, both Yardrat and Kristoff's forms made a decision. They flew into the air and raced toward Beelzebub at speeds his flaming body could not compare. Naturally, Beelzebub sensed their approach, slowed down in midair, and turned to face the pair of powerful ghostly apparitions.

"Yardrat. Kristoff." Beelzebub said, levitating in the air through flames from his feet. He crossed his arms and assumed his typical domineering stance, not even bothering to use their proper demon titles as a junior peer should. "Need something?"

The two Demon Deities stopped a short distance away. They quickly assessed him from this close distance, but their scans showed that he didn't have a lick of Cosmic Energy inside him.

"Beelzebub... you're an ordinary Demon Emperor now?" Kristoff asked. "I thought you were a Middle Cosmic?"

Beelzebub sneered. "Middle Cosmic? Oh, that. Yes, I temporarily empowered myself to such a level. But it's gone now. I'm back to being an Emperor."

Kristoff was about to sigh in relief, when Beelzebub confidently leered toward him.

"But you're wrong about one thing, Kristoff. You're not dealing with an ordinary Demon Emperor."

"What? What does that mean?" Kristoff asked.

Beelzebub didn't explain. He simply retracted his gaze and sneered at the two of them as if they were idiots.

"I nearly had the Second Founder in my grasp." Beelzebub instead said. "Next time, I'll kill her... and anyone else who threatens humanity. You can take that to your graves."

Before the two esteemed Demon Deities could retort, Beelzebub ignited flames hotter than before and raced off across the horizon, leaving them gawking.

"So... he... confirmed it?" Kristoff asked, unsure. "He's not a Cosmic anymore?"

"Imbecile!" Yardrat snapped.

Kristoff turned to look at Yardrat, seeing beads of sweat on his Astral face.

"That was a warning to us!" Yardrat hissed. "I knew it. He's feigning his weakness after all! Why is he pretending to not be a Cosmic anymore? And that bit about not being an 'ordinary' Demon Emperor? It was clearly a naked threat. He must have discovered a method to rise from Mortal to Cosmic and back down at will. That's the best explanation!"

"He seemed like he was only a mortal to me." Kristoff said doubtfully. "I think you're reading between the lines too much."

"Didn't you see the way he treated us so arrogantly?" Yardrat explained. "He didn't put us in his eyes at all! If he really only possessed the power of a mortal, then why would he act so domineeringly in front of genuine Cosmics? It's because he doesn't fear us even a little bit. And that would only be because he hasn't lost his power. He was practically goading us to attack him so we'd get egg on our faces."

"To throw us off our game." Kristoff said, acknowledging Yardrat's words with a nod. "It still seems a little far-fetched, but I see the logic. If we think humanity is weak, we might blunder in and reveal our own weaknesses, allowing him to strike us and deal a grievous blow. It's a good thing you saw through his ploy."

"Let's proceed as we originally planned." Yardrat said, feeling slightly relieved.

The two of them descended from the clouds, heading toward humanity's makeshift new headquarters inside the heart of South Melodia.

Beelzebub was clearly still a threat, but for some unknown reason wanted to play like a harmless kitten hiding in the grass.

They would not let themselves be fooled by his feigned weakness!

And so, unknowingly, these powerful Demon Deities played themselves, with Beelzebub having no idea about the depths of their misunderstanding...

Part 653: Demon's Deal

Far-Future Era. Day 3, AJR. The world of Sharmur.

Linda Adams sat inside a small office by herself in South Melodia. The building she was currently using as a military HQ wasn't anything special, merely a former factory used by humans when they previously lived on Sharmur. As such, it had no special soundproofing, the walls were made of stone and mud, and it felt rather primitive. Using the few miniature replicators they had saved inside the Core, her technicians had fabricated a desk and a chair for her, so she was able to sit in relative comfort.

In the past, Jason Hiro had built several miniature fusion generators with his Wordsmithing, and had even placed several of them inside the Core. However, with Tarus II's destruction, and the demons' forceful eviction of the humans outside of the Core, they had now been moved to Sharmur, along with the few mini-replicators that remained.

The loss of Tarus II and Maiura had set humanity back immeasurably. Before that dreadful day came, the prevailing wisdom was that even if Jason or Hope fought, one of them was likely to survive, so even if the infrastructure was destroyed, at least humanity could rebuild later. But how could anyone predict that both Wordsmiths would die, and both of humanity's bases of power would be snuffed out?

Now, all that remained of their former industrial capabilities were what pittances had been put inside the Core, and whatever Chrona and the Hall of Heroes had tucked away.

But these last two were of no use to Linda. The teleportation devices built inside both Wordsmith's secret dimensional spaces were only made for transporting bipedal bodies and perhaps some small devices on their person. Fabricating and transferring new power sources was a fundamentally impossible task unless someone inside the secret dimensions drastically upgraded and overhauled the teleportation matrices. Fusion generators were inherently volatile, and Fiona wouldn't want to risk a superliminal detonation by transferring a fusion reactor across interdimensional distances.

So, now, humanity in Realspace was suffering from an unexpected crisis.

A stack of papers sat in front of Linda. These were requisition requests, detailing urgent and needed uses for the remaining fabricators. From various parts that could be put together to repair and construct new vehicles, to weapons and armor to help fortify the military's strength in a time when they had little equipment available, to simply fabricating new T-REX suits, the list of requisitions was daunting.

Linda sighed. She rested her elbow on the desk and chin on her palm, while gazing vacantly at a piece of paper with all sorts of military jargon on it. Humanity's military doctrine was still in its infancy, having lost its ten thousand years of history following the destruction of Earth 100,000 years ago, but Neil had done a decent job building new pipelines for infrastructure, reviving military doctrines from the 1800s that he knew, and integrating those doctrines with newer ones recommended to him by his top generals. Especially Chadwick, who had fought in humanity's Second World War. Linda didn't even know what kind of concept a 'world war' was. She had never lived on Old Earth, so she had no knowledge of humanity's roots.

Linda knew she was unqualified. Unlike Neil, who had been properly trained and led by one of Earth's former Heroes, Napoleon, she had no formal training. She was only an ordinary citizen from one of the worlds enslaved by the demons. She had been promoted to Corporal in a time when resources and personnel were needed quickly, but her talents were better put to use on a battlefield than behind a desk.

Right now, she didn't have much to work with. So many humans had died in the last week that humanity's military had been stretched beyond its limits. The chain of command was broken. Promotions were being haphazardly issued. Unqualified people were being uplifted one after the other, with an aura of disarray being issued one after the other. The Queen Network that had been quite successful in training new initiates had also been lost, and all that remained of it were a few small-scale transceivers in the Core, and one major hub on the world of Pixiv. The Fairies would need to work together to build a new primary hub on Sharmur before training and bootcamps could resume.

Linda massaged her chin. She dropped the paper in her hand onto the desk, slumped back in her chair, and heavily sighed. She felt some of her energy drain away for the tenth time that day.

"Neil... I knew you worked hard... but I never really understood how much we relied on you until now." Linda muttered to herself.

On another day, she might start crying again, but by this point, her tears had already run dry. She was simply too tired to weep. She hadn't been married to him for six months before fate snatched him away and left her a widow. Now she not only had to lead the military, but raise their child once the baby was born.

It was a lot of responsibility for a single parent.

As she sat in the chair, looking up at the ceiling in a daze, a knock came at the door. Instantly, Linda hardened her expression. She sat up in the chair, took a deep breath, and turned her gaze toward the sound.

"Come in." Linda said.

The door opened. A woman with light grey hair in a ponytail carefully stepped into the office.

"Miss Adams?"

Linda faintly smiled, the expression a mixture of being forced because she wasn't really in the mood to smile, but also a little genuine because she had no hard feelings toward the person who entered.

"Corporal Sariah. Is something the matter?"

Sariah, one of the Felorians, now wore a green pressed suit with a beret instead of her somewhat skimpy tribalwear. This was not strictly necessary, but after the humans lost so many people over the last several days, she voluntarily chose to enter humanity's proper military, giving up some of her cultural identity to better fit into an increasingly thinned-out army structure.

"There are two Demon Deities here to see you." Sariah said, looking neither scared nor flustered. "It's Kristoff and Yardrat."

Linda hesitated for a moment. She really wasn't in the mood for a high-stakes discussion with a pair of powerful demons, but she was the only person qualified to do so, which meant she really had no choice. She exhaled quietly, then nodded.

"Okay. Send them in."

Sariah nodded. She stepped back out, and a moment later, ushered the two 'guests' inside. Yardrat and Kristoff entered, their bodies faintly transparent due to being in their Astral bodies.

After the door closed, Yardrat opened his mouth to speak, only to pause and look behind Linda. She turned and nearly jumped out of her skin when she realized someone was standing right behind her, having appeared without her noticing.

"Mother of-! You scared the shit out of me, Melody!"

Demon Deity Melody crossed her arms apologetically. "Sorry. I sensed these two had come. I wanted to make sure I was present for whatever they were planning to say."

Unspoken, Melody implied she was here to protect Linda just in case these two Demon Deities had any ill intentions. Linda calmed down, but she had unfortunately already acted startled, so any form of imposing presence on her part had been lost.

She returned her gaze to Yardrat, feeling slightly glum. If it had been Neil, he would have remained unruffled by Melody's appearance. Now she felt as if any chance of appearing strong before these two unwanted guests was in the past. They would be the ones to lead the discussion.

"Commander Adams." Yardrat said. "Auger sent us here to have a talk with you. Melody is already aware of the general... concept."

"I am." Melody said, her tone bland. She maintained her crossed arms while giving the other two Deities a look that implied they should know their boundaries. While on Sharmur, their astral bodies could project the strength of a Demon Emperor, but there were limitations, and they were a bit weaker than flesh and blood Emperors. They would completely lose if Melody decided to disperse their astral bodies forcefully.

"We've come to make a proposal." Yardrat continued. "We know we haven't done our best to assist humanity. After the losses of both your home planets, we've decided to try and help you out. With the Plague becoming more dangerous every day, we need to work together in times like these."

Linda slowly nodded, but Melody didn't.

"Not going to mention how you kicked the humans out of the Core the day they lost everything?" Melody asked. "That's convenient."

Yardrat smiled apologetically. "We made a rash decision in the heat of the moment, but no real harm was done. We didn't attack any humans, and we didn't hurt anyone. We simply... took back that which was ours."

"Are you here to give us control of the Core once again?" Linda asked.

"Well... no." Yardrat said carefully. "The Core is part of the Labyrinth, and the Labyrinth belongs to demonkind. But we are here to assist humanity in rebuilding itself.

We would like to send demons and monsters to Sharmur who are specialists in construction. They can help you rebuild quickly, and give you a new center of operations. We're also going to make the same offer to the humans on Pixiv."

Linda frowned. "This feels like it's coming out of thin air."

"It isn't." Yardrat said. "I know the demons and humans have had our differences. Emperor Ose committed a terrible sin by attacking Tarus II during Operation Stormbringer. But neither Kristoff nor I were involved in that. That was the fault of the First Hell. And these days.. the First Hell isn't worth talking about. Its strongest member is... Bael? And he's lost all his powers. Now, Deity Auger wishes to make up for the sins of the past."

Kristoff nodded. "That's why we came to help Maiura when the Plague attacked."

Naturally, Linda remembered when they intervened. The Demon Deities made a big difference in the battle and saved many lives, even if they weren't able to offer salvation to all of humanity's soldiers.

"So that's it then? You want to help us rebuild? Put the past behind us?" Linda asked. "That is an awfully good deal for us."

"We have plenty of free hands idling around." Kristoff explained. "Trillions and trillions of demons. You lack manpower more than anything."

"Ahem!" Melody loudly cleared her throat and shot a death glare at the other two Deities. "Aren't you two forgetting something?"

Yardrat shook his head. "Our offer today has nothing to do with that."

"Why not?" Melody asked, before turning her head to look at Linda. "I should have known he wouldn't volunteer this information. He wanted to speak to you before you found out."

Linda met Melody's gaze. "What are you talking about?"

"There's been a change in the galactic status quo. Multiple changes." Melody explained.

She quickly launched into an explanation of the events regarding the fall of the Psions, as well as the rise of the Dolgrimites. Linda listened attentively, but her expression changed when the Dolgrimites were brought up.

"They can defeat the Plague?! Melody, why didn't you mention this to me sooner?"

"The battle between the Dolgrimites and Kolvaxians only happened yesterday." Melody explained, though her tone was apologetic. "Auger convened the Deities less than an hour ago to inform us all. He didn't invite me, but I found out anyway because I'm nobody's fool. Now the demons are debating whether or not to align themselves with the Dolgrimites."

Melody shifted her eyes to Yardrat and sneered. "You really think you're slick. You wanted to quickly make a deal with the humans before they knew the full picture."

"It's not like that at all!" Yardrat replied, raising his palms in protest. "We were already going to make this offer. Our consciences have been heavy-"

"Cut the crap." Melody retorted. "If you don't, I'll personally kick you off Sharmur. Don't blame me for getting pissy!"

Yardrat inwardly groaned. He had hoped this discussion wouldn't involve Melody, but she shoved her way into Linda's office and ruined his plans. Now he had to change the script on the fly. He was a fairly intelligent demon, but he was no Ose, nor Satan, nor one of their other high-level strategists.

"...Alright. I'll be blunt then." Yardrat said after a few moments of silence. "I don't trust the Dolgrimites. They might act like they are our saviors, but this 'Dolgris' worries me. We don't know who their 'god' is, but we suspect he isn't a fantasy conjured out of thin air. The Dolgrimites were able to defeat Kolvaxors with the power of Middle Cosmics. How they did this is beyond me. They are clearly mortal beings, yet they can fight Cosmics. That makes them dangerous."

Yardrat continued. "If demonkind allies with the Dolgrimites, we will likely defeat the Plague, given time. But after that, what happens? We cannot trust them. We've already spent 100,000 years under the Volgrim Empire's thumb. We'll escape one master only to fall back under them, with a new figurehead at the top."

"You forgot to mention the most important part." Melody interjected. "You can't control the Dolgrimites. But a weak humanity? A species confined to only two worlds, on its last legs? Humans would make for a better ally because you hope to slowly subvert their leadership positions while also praying they come up with their own countermeasure for the Plague."

"Melody, please-" Kristoff started to say.

"Shut up!" Melody snapped. "I see right through your intentions! You're not looking for an ally, you're looking for slaves! You plan to slowly turn humanity back into cattle so that you can return to consuming their souls! Especially with the Belial Booster gone, you're right back to the old status quo!"

"We have Glinch's pills now." Yardrat said, his expression dark. "We don't need human souls to uplift lower demons."

"Those pills have run out, their supply is finite, and nobody knows how long it will take for Glinch to make more." Melody retorted. "Who are you trying to fool?"

Yardrat started to feel exasperated. He turned his attention back to Linda. "Commander Adams, think carefully. The First Hell was your enemy, but what have the other Hells ever done to you in the last six years? We have only helped you, time and time again. The knee-jerk reaction in the Core might have been distasteful, but all we did was retake our proper territory. Now we're offering to help you rebuild. Aren't you at least interested in this offer?"

Melody fell silent. She had already offered new information and ensured Linda was not in the dark regarding their intentions. Now, it was up to humanity's newest leader to take the initiative.

Linda locked her fingers together and folded her hands on the desk. She looked up at Yardrat and Kristoff, who remained standing. Several thoughts ran through her head, but she remained silent for a time as she pondered their words.

"Your intentions are not that noble, but I don't disagree with some of the things you've mentioned." Linda said. "Humanity needs to rebuild its infrastructure. This will take precious time we cannot afford. I feel that allowing in demons from your factions here will be as if we have invited foxes into the hen-house."

Linda rubbed her tongue along her teeth while she thought again for a moment.

"What do you want in return for demonkind's assistance?"

Yardrat shook his head. "Nothing. We have plenty of lower demons to spare. They will help you rebuild, then they will leave."

"Don't speak nonsense." Linda countered. "There's no such thing as a free meal. I'm not about to owe demonkind a huge favor."

"Humanity cannot offer us anything of value at the moment." Yardrat said. "What we value is your future potential. We are hoping you might come up with a way to counter the Plague. If you do, then that will mean we won't be reliant on the Dolgrimites. So, if you want to make this a transaction... then all I can ask is that you agree to work hard on developing a counter to the Plague."

Several seconds passed.

Linda seemed to resolve something in her mind. Then she slowly nodded.

"Alright. I will accept your aid in humanity's name. But there are going to be a few conditions. Your demons will be under the supervision of the Legion. If Henry or any of the other Legionnaires find anything amiss, they will cut down the demons responsible. Additionally, no demons above the rank of Lord will be allowed to assist."

Yardrat frowned slightly, but he ended up nodding. "Acceptable. Though it is strange you're limiting the aid you can receive."

Linda didn't seem to hear his words. "Melody will be in charge of vetting any demons you dispatch to us. Melody, you can put Beelzebub or Kiari on this task if you find it too troublesome."

"Don't worry. I'll handle it." Melody said.

The other two Deities looked at each other and nodded. They returned their gazes to Linda.

"Well, with that resolved, we'll be on our way then. Thank you for giving us a few minutes of your time, Miss Adams."

Linda stood up from her chair. "Yardrat. Kristoff. Let's hope this is the beginning of a fruitful relationship between our species."

The two Deities smiled. After a few moments, their Astral Bodies faded away, disappearing into the dust of the cosmos.

With their auras gone, Linda's shoulder sagged a little. She sat back in her chair and looked up at Melody.

"Thank you for coming. If you hadn't been here, they might have deceived me."

"The result would have been about the same." Melody said softly. She lowered her arms to her sides and hooked her thumbs into her shorts' pockets. "I don't think we can trust them."

"Of course we can't." Linda said. "But... I'm tired, Melody. I'm tired. There's so much work to do. So many people broken, destitute, lacking all hope in a better future. We have no Wordsmiths. We only have each other, and humanity has already had its numbers split into pieces. We have people living on the Cube, on Pixiv, on Sharmur, in the Hall of Heroes, and in Chrona. We're divided. Everyone has a different opinion on what we should do next. And personally? I have no confidence my way is the right way. I'm just floundering about, praying my actions won't cause even greater harm to humanity."

Melody pursed her lips. "'Perfect' is the enemy of 'good enough.' You're right in that we need manpower to rebuild quickly. Even if these new demons have ill intentions, we'll be keeping an eye on them. You might not know this, but as a Cosmic, my senses are infinitely sharper than yours."

Seeing the confusion on Linda's face, Melody decided to explain. "I can project my Cosmic Sense over a massive area of the planet. I can sense every individual life-form, every Sentient, what they're doing, what they're saying; I can see everything but the thoughts in their heads. The same is true of the other Demon Deities, but not of mortals like Beelzebub, Kiari, or yourself."

She smiled. "So, don't worry too much. I'll keep an eye on these sneaky cunts."

Linda chuckled. "Thanks, Melody. I need all the help I can get."

With a nod, Melody vanished from sight, transporting out of the room stealthily back into the upper atmosphere.

Linda remained sitting for a bit. The smile on her face faded away.

The Wordsmiths dead. Humanity in pieces. Demons boldly entering our territory. Dolgrimites countering the Plague...

She laid back in her chair and looked up at the ceiling helplessly.

What would Neil do if he were here?

Part 654: Torn Dimension

Far-Future Era. Day 3, AJR. The world of Sharmur.

The midday sun slowly waned across the sky above Melodia. It dropped to the edge of the horizon, and a warm redness tinged the upper atmosphere. The sounds of hammering could be heard across the entire city as humans, monsters, and demons worked to repair and rebuild hundreds of structures. Like a swarm of ants, their numbers seemed incalculable from above. They were visible on every street, rooftop, porch, and other protrusion as far as the eye could see.

It was against this backdrop that a particularly eye-catching sight became visible far above them. Many people paused their work to wipe the sweat off their foreheads. They looked up to see a flaming figure slowly moving from east to west. With no airplanes or rockets or other technology taking to the sky, usually the only flying objects they would see were birds, bugs, harpies, fairies, the occasional drone delivering supplies, and a few very specific demons.

Beelzebub was one of those demons.

His figure cut through the air without trying to conceal himself. He drew plenty of attention, but he had become such a common sight that most people forgot about him within a few minutes of observing his movements.

Beelzebub reached the border of the city, where a massive mountain range stood to the west. This range extended not only along the west, but it also curved around and cut across the north as well. Two massive waterfalls could be seen, one that poured from the western side, and one from the north. The waters of each flowed together and formed the plus-shaped aquatic junction that Melodia had long ago been built around.

Access to fresh water was a necessity for humans. Demons also preferred it because it made certain things, such as bathing, more convenient. Technology was rather primitive on Sharmur, and the former humans and demons who had once lived on this world had no real access to the same plumbing utilities they had on old Earth.

Beelzebub's flight wasn't particularly fast. He had been busy for the last couple of days, and a lot was weighing on his mind. His speed decreased even further as he neared the western cliffside, found a rock outcropping that stuck tens of feet out above the valley below, and came to a stop atop that outcropping.

Beelzebub turned and stared out at the waning sun to the east. Far away, he could barely make out the ocean on the horizon. A vast forest stood between Melodia and that ocean, but with his keen devil vision, he could make out countless details mortals could not.

A long while passed. He sat down in a cross-legged position, a complicated expression playing upon his face.

Nobody in the galaxy knew who Beelzebub truly was. His connections, few though they were, had slowly been snuffed out one after the other over the last few years.

Ose might have been the only woman he loved, but she was dead.

Jason Hiro was a pain in his ass, but Beelzebub respected him. He was dead too.

Agares was gone.

So many... were gone.

Beelzebub rested his palms on his knees. His eyes turned fuzzy as he thought back on his life.

He pondered what sort of man he had become.

Was he satisfied with the way things were going?

Was he content with the state of the galaxy?

No.

For some reason, he felt a heavy burden had slowly begun to accumulate atop his shoulders. Many demons believed he was a Demon Deity now, but he wasn't. If the villains among his species took action, he could not protect humanity.

Heh.

'Protect humanity.'

Those words were nothing to his younger self but an absurdity. Why would he give a damn about these pathetic, weak, useless humans? He had no friends among them!

...Or did he?

There was one man. Kiari's husband, Saul.

He was... a good human.

But Beelzebub sensed, in his heart, the ugly truth. Saul was dead.

Just like Agares, Ose, and Jason. He had not survived the detonation of Tarus II. He had left his wife a widow, and Beelzebub had lost another friend.

The feeling was... indescribable.

Beelzebub lowered his eyes. He looked at the waterfall that pounded into the forest below, forcibly carving out a river that wound its way through the trees.

In many ways, this river was like the river of time. Time could make the impossible, possible. Even the deepest roots could be slowly softened and then ripped out, let alone when excessive force was applied.

"I am weak." Beelzebub said to nobody in particular. "Too weak. I have done nothing but fail my entire life."

A voice spoke out from behind Beelzebub. "Admitting one's weakness is a form of strength."

Beelzebub frowned. He had come here for solitude, yet this voice had slightly startled him.

He turned his head to see a human slowly walking toward him from behind. He couldn't sense the human's aura at all.

"And you are?" Beelzebub asked.

In the back of his head, Beelzebub suspected this strangely stealthy human wasn't a human at all. He might actually be Belial in disguise, here to prank the Overlord of Fission. This didn't entirely make sense, since Beelzebub had just spoken to her, but women could be strange sometimes.

"It's unfortunate that this is the first time we've met." The man said, his expression becoming an amiable smile. He sauntered over and extended his hand. "Siddhartha Gautama. But you may call me 'Buddha.'"

Beelzebub raised an eyebrow, but he still met Buddha's palm with a firm yet not too overbearing handshake.

"Beelzebub." He said, introducing myself. "Do you need something, Buddha? I'm trying to enjoy the sunset."

"Oh? Are you?" Budda asked, taking a step back. He walked over to the edge of the mountain, let his legs hang off the side of the cliff, and sat down without any fear of the thousand-meter fall. "It seemed to me that you were moping around, lamenting your life's failures. Perhaps I misheard."

Beelzebub snorted. He returned his attention back to the sunset and said nothing else.

Several minutes passed.

Beelzebub felt Buddha's continual gaze on his back. Finally, he turned around and glared at the man. "Do you have a problem?"

"Hm? A problem?" Buddha asked innocently. "I am simply enjoying the sunset, same as you."

"Yeah. Ha-ha. Very funny." Beelzebub spat.

"Sharmur is a beautiful world." Buddha said, looking off into the distance wistfully. He didn't seem to notice Beelzebub's annoyance. "The setting of the sun brings nightfall, and night leads into the new day, with new opportunities. A lot can change in a single day. I'm sure you know this all too well."

Beelzebub's eyes flickered. He remembered the fall of Tarus II, and the complete upheaval of the status quo that happened only a few days before.

"Yes." Beelzebub admitted, lowering his eyes. "A lot can change."

"I sense great loneliness from you, Beelzebub." Buddha said. "You feel as though you were once a figure destined for greatness. But now, despite having attained the power you once thought invincible in the universe, you have encountered a sky above the sky. The power of a Demon Emperor has turned out not to be much at all compared to that of a Cosmic."

Beelzebub softly sighed.

"I owe Jason Hiro a debt. I did so many awful things to him... I even killed his daughter. But he spared my life. In the end, I wasn't able to stop that catastrophe, and I wasn't even able to gut the bitch who caused it."

"You couldn't pay Jason back." Buddha said.

"Right." Beelzebub muttered. "Couldn't... pay him back."

A minute of silence passed.

"Then what comes next?" Buddha eventually asked. "What are your plans?"

Beelzebub looked off into the distance. "I haven't a clue. Right now I'm only going through the motions."

Buddha eyed his profile from the side. "You have no goals right now. No purpose."

Beelzebub really wasn't sure why he was even having a conversation with this random human. Other than his odd lack of aura and somewhat otherworldly way of talking, Buddha didn't seem particularly special.

Perhaps Beelzebub was... simply bored at the moment. A little conversation helped to pass the time.

"I'm a demon. I've reached the peak of mortal demonic power. The only place left for me to go is up... to the level of Cosmic. But being a Cosmic isn't all sunshine and roses."

"Becoming a Cosmic is a heavy burden." Buddha agreed, nodding his head with a sagely slowness. "There are countless mortals and their machinations in our universe. But the number of Cosmics is a far, far smaller fraction. Cosmics are intended only to battle against other Cosmics. Interfering in the affairs of mortals is heavily punished by Akasha."

With a jolt, Beelzebub lifted his head. He looked at Beelzebub in surprise. "You know of Akasha?! Who are you?"

"I have friends in many places." Buddha said with a smile. "One of those friends is the Creator. He has told me about you on a few occasions. Unfortunately, you are no longer a Candidate, but you still have extreme potential. He sent me here to advise you."

Beelzebub's heart throbbed in his chest. He quickly stood up and gave Buddha a long, hard look.

"You're not a human." Beelzebub stated.

"Oh, I assure you, I am. You can kill the likes of me with a flick of your finger." Buddha replied. "Though, I would prefer if you didn't. Reincarnating is such a hassle."

Another bolt of electricity shot through Beelzebub's veins. He couldn't tell if the comment about reincarnation was a deception or a joke. How could it be true?!

"If you're here to 'advise' me, then what are you advising me about?" Beelzebub asked, his tone somewhat interrogative.

The human pressed his palms together thoughtfully. "'We' do not wish to see you lost and uncertain. I was sent here to give you a bit of direction."

He continued. "In recent days, you have seen fit to slightly explore the greater possibilities of your demonic powers. You made an important discovery as a result of your talks with a certain Psion. Isn't that the case?"

Beelzebub blinked. "Executor Sartran. Yeah. He opened my eyes... made me realize that... I wield more than just the power of fire. I control lightning as well. Energy."

"And what have you done with that knowledge? Have you explored it further?" Buddha asked.

Beelzebub grimaced. "Not really."

"You have seized Sartran's soul. He is your puppet now. I would advise you to stop wasting this opportunity and speak to him as soon as possible." Buddha advised. "You have barely tapped into a fundamental Truth, but your absolute lack of curiosity is rather... infuriating. Even an average human would desire to explore their powers more than you have. You're the same as Jason Hiro in his early days, but you should be emulating his more recent accomplishments."

Beelzebub nodded. He looked down thoughtfully. "It seems like you're saying that becoming a Cosmic isn't all that important? Instead, I should become a more capable Peak Mortal?"

"You are a Demon Overlord." Buddha said, startling Beelzebub once again. "The other demons do not even realize such a level exists. They still believe Emperor is the highest strength your species can reach. Instead, Emperor is the limit of what soul manipulation can attain. Crossing the gap from Emperor to Cosmic is so difficult because it ignores the existence of the level in between! That is why demons were never able to break through for so many millennia."

"How the hell do you know about Demon Overlords?!" Beelzebub asked.

Buddha didn't reply. Instead, he faintly smirked, cocked his head, and gave Beelzebub a knowing look.

"...Right." Beelzebub said a few moments later. "The Creator."

"The Creator." Buddha affirmed. "But though the demons have not realized the rank of Overlord exists, that does not mean none have achieved it. Satan did, as well as Belial, Valac, and most recently, Crow. There is one other who holds the rank of Overlord. Can you guess who it is?"

Beelzebub fell silent for a time. He thought carefully.

"Auger, before his ascension to Middle Cosmic?"

"No." Buddha replied. "Gorn."

"What? Emperor Gorn is actually an Overlord??" Beelzebub asked, bewildered.

"That is right. Gorn has swallowed more souls that you can imagine. While the limit of soul manipulation is technically Emperor, that is only the soft limit. In theory, if one can devours tens or even hundreds of millions of souls, it is possible to push beyond that limit... but to become a Cosmic is utterly impossible. This is the limit set down by Akasha himself."

Buddha waved his hand. "Let us move on to other matters. Slaughtering innocents is an atrocity that goes against the will of the cosmos, but mastering one's own power is something worth rejoicing over. I believe I've given you enough basic guidance. Advanced knowledge cannot come from me, as I am no adept in the mastery of elements."

Buddha stood up. He stuck his hands in his pockets. "Now, if you wish to train in the martial way, that is something I can help you with."

"What, like hand-to-hand combat?" Beelzebub scoffed. "That's beneath me. Pass."

Buddha narrowed his eyes. "From your tone of voice, it seems you think physical combat is a lower form of fighting than flinging around fireballs and lightning. Did you not hear a word I said earlier? Training your current body to its maximum potential will make you far more fearsome than simply artificially inflating your strength by stepping into the Cosmic ranks. A fully actualized mortal, especially a Peak Mortal, is absolutely capable of defeating a Bottom Cosmic. The difference becomes even more dramatic as your power increases!"

"I can already beat anyone." Beelzebub bragged. "I don't need all this 'special training.' Mastering my magic is more than good enough for my goals."

"HAH!" Buddha laughed. "The young are truly foolish! Alright. I am but a mere human. If you think you are so formidable... what say we have a little match?"

By now, Beelzebub was sneering in his heart. "A match? Are you serious? You've been a funny man up until now, but I didn't take you for a clown. How do you intend to fight me? I might accidentally kill you when I blink my eyes!"

"If I die, then so be it." Buddha replied, unmoved by Beelzebub's threats. "I only intend to prove to you that you are far less formidable than you could be. How about this? We will spar for... ten minutes! If you can throw me onto my back or send me flying, I will never bother you again. But if you fail to do so, then you will meet me every day for the next six months atop this mountain. I will train you until you beg for death, and you will learn to love my methods!"

Beelzebub's pride swelled with irritation. "Ten minutes? This won't even take me ten seconds! If you want to turn your body into ground meat, then I'll humor you! When do we start?"

Buddha leaned backward and assumed a defensive pose.

"Right now."

Far-Future Era. Day 3, AJR. Tarus II voidspace.

Crumbling ruins of a destroyed planet radiated outward across the Tarus system. Not only had the Trifrancium detonation obliterated the sole life-bearing planet in the system, it had also destroyed its moon. Debris from the detonation slowly flew outward in all directions. Someday, perhaps within a year, or hundreds of years, that debris would collide with the other worlds in the system and cause cataclysms everywhere. But that day would not come for a long time.

All that transpired within the Tarus system fell within the eyes of one Cosmic entity. She looked upon the lives lost with faint sadness. As a spirit artifact created by the ancient Archangel, Camael, the Phoenix held a certain love for life and was not made to wreak havoc and destruction upon the cosmos. She could be treated as a weapon, but she was never intended to be one.

"How tragic." The Phoenix said, for perhaps the hundredth time.

Inside the Cube, countless life-bearing micro-worlds spun in place, bunches of them grouped together and illuminated by false stars in order to form day and night cycles. The Phoenix's ample energy reserves allowed her to rapidly construct and improve on stellar phenomena, so she was extremely adept at forming worlds and stars for living beings.

A Sentry Star flew over to the Phoenix. Its massive size was dwarfed even further by her supermassive body, which by now had grown to become bigger than the Earth's moon.

[TASK COMPLETED. SECTOR 14 RUNNING AT 87.5% OPTIMUM EFFICIENCY.]

The Phoenix turned her attention to her assistant.

[That's all?]

[OPTIMAL LIFE-BEARING EFFICIENCY ACHIEVED. EMOTIONAL POSITIVITY INDEX OF INHABITANTS IN SECTOR 14 RATED AT SIX POINT SEVEN THREE THREE. FURTHER OPTIMIZATIONS NOT REQUIRED.]

The phoenix's face scrunched together into a frown. [Only 6.733 out of 10? We can do better than that. Is something not to their liking?]

[COMPLAINTS REGISTERED: LIVING SPACE INADEQUATE. LACK OF SUPERIOR-QUALITY BEDDING. LACK OF ADJUSTABLE LIGHTING. ALL COMPLAINTS DESIGNATED MINOR, NOT WORTH FOLLOWING UP.]

[The humans have suffered a terrible trauma.] The Phoenix said gently. [We should try to make their stay here more comfortable. I'm already working to add more connection matrices between each bubble world. You should improve their living conditions until the happiness index achieves at least an eight out of ten.]

[FURTHER OPTIMIZATIONS UNNECESSARY. ADDITIONAL IMPROVEMENTS WILL LEAD TO DIMINISHING RETURNS. RECOMMEND REFOCUSING ON MORE IMPORTANT CONCERNS.]

[Number 14, don't you get smart with me.] The Phoenix said, in a voice tone a mother might use to admonish her child. [You will do as I say. Continue improving the humans' living conditions.]

The Sentry Star seemed to shudder.

[COMMAND NOTED.]

Without another word, it instantly spun around, then launched off into the distance from a standstill, moving far faster than its size would imply was possible.

The Phoenix sighed again. [They've all become so naughty and belligerent while I was asleep. It seems I'm going to have to adjust their programming lat- HMM?! Who's there?]

The Phoenix suddenly turned her head. She looked to the side, and there she saw something shocking. A tiny crack between dimensions flickered for an instant, and a faint, malevolent aura seeped through. It vanished, but she remained fully alert.

[Who dares intrude upon this noble one's domain?!] The Phoenix shouted.

A moment later, space flickered again. Then again.

Her heart turned cold. That spatial flicker finally stabilized, leaving only a tiny pinprick of evil aura to spill into the Cube's interior. It wasn't anything that would harm the humans, but its owner...

[You! To think you were still alive!] The Phoenix roared.

[Heh heh heh... Phoenix... so it is you. I thought I sensed your aura again.] A male voice said, his tone deep and sinister as the bottom of an ocean. [Have you missed me?]

The Phoenix turned her entire body to face the spatial crack. Her eyes narrowed to slits.

[The fact you haven't come here in person... are you afraid this ancient one will seal you back up?]

[You've regained some of your power.] The male voice said. [But it is not worth mentioning compared to this god. I have spent three eons stabilizing my position in the galaxy. My power grows by the cycle. Soon, I will be capable of contesting the position of Ruler.]

The Phoenix's eyes flickered. [This aura... Apex Cosmic? But if you're so strong, then why are you afraid of me?]

[I'm not.] The male said. [I just felt... nostalgic. All those years you tortured this god... I want you to know I'm still alive. I want you to know the fear of my existence. Now, you will not be able to do your work uplifting that pitiful species of 'humans' while knowing I have the absolute advantage. My followers are powerful enough to blot out the stars. I have spared no expense in raising them.]

He chuckled menacingly. [I've practically finished the race, while you have yet to begin. This battle is already decided. Once I get my hands on you, I'll be repaying you for all those eons of torture!]

The Phoenix's flames ignited with wrath. Her burning gaze seemed to bore through the hole between dimensions.

[This noble one may not be your match now, but are you truly so certain I will lose?! Evilspawn. This noble one has known of your existence since I returned. You did not surprise this noble one. You do not intimidate this noble one. You are but a fragment of a long-dead ancient power. If you are an 'Apex Cosmic' then you are a bottom feeder among their lofty ranks.]

[Well spoken, tormentor.] The male said, seeming to grin with his words. [Spit all the fire you want. It no longer matters. This god has already won. Heh heh heh...]

With a wave of her wing, the Phoenix forcibly smashed the spatial storm, sending a pulse of feedback along the dimensional rift and hopefully injuring her ancient adversary.

The Phoenix's eyes momentarily clouded. She fell into thought for thirty short minutes.

[Number 1. Adjust the Cube's heading.] She said, transmitting her thoughts to one of the Sentry Stars. [Take us to the Sharmur system.]

[ORDERS RECEIVED.] Sentry Star Number 1 replied.

Part 655: Buddhabub's Battle

Far-Future Era. Day 3, AJR. Sharmur, in the mountains west of Melodia.

Beelzebub and Buddha stood next to the edge of a cliff, perhaps twenty feet separating them from a thousand-foot plunge to the bottom of the ravine. However, there was still the entire flat side of the mountain-top in the other direction up to the tree-line, so their designated battle arena had plenty of room to maneuver.

Buddha slapped his chest. The T-REX hidden beneath his black long-sleeved shirt sprang to life and started coating his body with advanced nanite armor. This was the most advanced T-REX Phoebe had made before her death, and the only one she would ever make again. Beelzebub didn't make a move, but instead watched as the nanites covered the man's body.

"Those nanites won't save you if I get serious." Beelzebub said calmly. "Do you have the slightest idea how powerful I am?"

Buddha smiled as the nanites climbed up his head and formed a faceless helmet, swallowing his mouth, eyes, and nose. "Admittedly, if you were to attack me with lethal force, I would die. But remember, all you have to do is knock me to the ground. That is your one goal. Do not hold back in achieving this purpose."

Beelzebub snorted. He couldn't possibly take this fight seriously. A mere mortal human had no chance of beating him in a serious fight.

But a spar? It might be a little fun. At least it would be fun to show this 'Buddha' how big the difference was between himself and the strongest demon in the mortal realm.

Without warning, Beelzebub detonated a flame behind himself and launched forward, sweeping a palm at Buddha's chest. With one ruthless strike, he intended to slam the human into the ground and teach him the difference between the sky and the mud!

Buddha sidestepped. His hand swept upward, and he simultaneously swatted Beelzebub's arm aside while also jumping backward with his left leg and kicking Beelzebub's ribs with his right.

Beelzebub let out a strange cry of surprise before finding his entire momentum thrown off. Buddha kicked him to the side with enough force to launch him off the edge of the cliff. Beelzebub let out a muffled yelp before hurtling to the bottom of the ravine below. A second later, he ignited flames beneath his feet, reversed his momentum, and flew back up to the top of the cliff.

When he landed, his cool and cocky smile was gone. He felt a little humiliated by the fact that his attack was seen through and neutralized in so decisive a fashion.

And by a mere human at that!

"Apologies." Buddha said smilingly beneath his helmet. "I didn't realize your footwork was so shoddy."

"You!" Beelzebub snapped.

He launched himself at Buddha again in a fit of rage. He still held back his power, not wanting to accidentally kill the human, but right when he drew within range, he detonated a shockwave of flame around his body, aiming to pummel Buddha into the ground without giving him a chance to grab and retaliate.

The shockwave struck Buddha, but he had already firmly planted his feet at just the right angle. When the shockwave slammed into him, it merely pressed his armored boots several inches into the dirt while also clearing away all the random plants and vegetation in the area within thirty meters.

Beelzebub's eyes flashed with shock, but never did he expect that Buddha would then use the shockwave's pressure to coil power into his knees before jumping directly at Beelzebub.

"???" Beelzebub let out another strangled cry of surprise as the lowly human pounced at him with a fist raised.

Thwack!

Buddha punched Beelzebub in the side of his head with the full strength of the T-REX, shattering the side of Beelzebub's jaw, breaking off multiple teeth, and punting him down into the dirt. Beelzebub struck the ground and dragged along it for over twenty feet, digging a shallow ditch with the side of his face. Naturally, he had received far worse blows hundreds of times, so his face regenerated almost immediately, but it was still a humiliating loss!

"Urgh! You spawn of a broodmother!" Beelzebub groaned as he jumped back up to his feet and spit bloody teeth all over the dirt. "You're really starting to piss me off!"

Buddha had already landed on his feet. He took a three-legged stance, with his left palm pressing against the ground and his right hand balled into a fist.

"Hoho..." Buddha chuckled mirthlessly. "Already, thirty seconds have passed, yet the great Beelzebub has failed to knock this lowly mortal human into the dirt. What a stain on your great name this must be, eh?"

"Shut up!!" Beelzebub roared. He decided to punch several fireballs at the human, setting them to low heat and power but with high concussive force. Even if he was pissed, he really didn't want to kill the human by accident, so he continued to focus on tactics that would knock him down and wear him out.

Those fireballs flew at Buddha with frightening speed, but the ancient Reincarnator didn't seem perturbed. He darted to the right, then to the left, then to the right again while explosions detonated behind him, to his side, and even in the dirt in front of him. Some of those explosions knocked him around a little, but not once did they throw him further than a foot or two. Beelzebub felt secretly shocked at how ineffective these fireballs were. How the hell was Buddha still standing?

Unbeknownst to Beelzebub, Buddha wasn't only dodging from side to side. He also slowly moved forward, carefully closing the gap between himself and his much more powerful adversary. At the right moment, when he noticed a gap between two of Beelzebub's fireballs, he lunged forward, stomping against the ground as he made a mad dash directly at Beelzebub's chest!

Beelzebub didn't even have time to react. Buddha tackled him to the ground and drove the wind out of Beelzebub's lungs before quickly jumping backward and making distance. Beelzebub recovered almost instantly, but he was even more pissed than before.

"Lucifer's tits! You know I'm taking it easy on you, right?!" Beelzebub snapped. "If I wanted you dead, you'd be dead a thousand times! Don't mistake my mercy for weakness!"

"I never said I did." Buddha said calmly. "You are correct. If you seriously wanted me dead, I would be dead. Thank you for adhering to the spirit of the match."

Beelzebub frowned. Buddha's 'apology' seemed to slap him across his face, making him feel a little ashamed. Wasn't it beneath him to brag about his strength to a mere human?!

His mind moved quickly. He gazed at Buddha, who had assumed a defensive stance once again.

If this takes me any longer, I'm going to eternally be unable to look myself in the mirror. How do I knock him flat on his ass in the shortest time possible?

An instant later, Beelzebub snapped his palm forward. A bolt of lightning fired directly at Buddha, but the man tossed a rock in front of himself while dodging to the right. That rock redirected the lightning just enough that it arced off to the side and slammed into the forest behind himself, lightning a fire. Buddha, however, was unharmed.

"You saw through my lightning?!" Beelzebub exclaimed in bewilderment.

"No. But your movements are sloppy, basic, and predictable." Buddha said, never taking his eyes off his opponent. "You have no combat sense. You haven't even yet determined what our spar is all about. You are as arrogant as ever, thinking in the back of your mind that you should win purely based on the strength of your magic. You're so used to fighting lethal battles where you throw your exploding body at your opponent that you cannot wrap your head around a battle where the intricacy of your movements will determine victory alone."

Beelzebub flinched. Buddha's words were somewhat rude, but... when Beelzebub thought about it, the man had a point...

It might seem as though Buddha was handily handing Beelzebub his ass, but the ancient Hero knew far better than his opponent that an instant of inattentiveness would cost him his life. Despite his theatrics and provocative words, Buddha was taking Beelzebub as seriously as possible. He controlled his breathing underneath his helmet, but he also kept himself ready for many of the deadlier abilities in Beelzebub's arsenal.

"The intricacy of my movements...?" Beelzebub asked. "What does that even mean?"

"Every action has an equal and opposite reaction." Buddha explained calmly. "You reap what you sow. This is called Karma. When you extend your right arm to fire a bolt of lightning, it necessarily means that arm is momentarily locked in an attack position, exposing your right side to an attentive adversary's counter-attack. At the same time, you pay so much attention to your right arm that you fail to realize your left arm is hanging slackly at your side, doing nothing and leaving you vulnerable."

"That is why I said your movements are sloppy and uncoordinated." Buddha continued. "The only thing you are thinking about is knocking me to the ground. But do you think these are the same thoughts that occupy my mind?"

Beelzebub blinked. He couldn't bring himself to admit it out loud, but... Buddha had a point. Beelzebub had never taken any fighting lessons, and had spent most of his time just learning different ways of using his magic in battle. The physical capabilities of his body were always considered secondary, especially in recent years, when he had climbed the ranks of Baron, Duke, and Emperor. With his body regenerating horrifying wounds in seconds, he simply didn't care that much if he suffered a grievous counter-attack. His opponent would always come out worse!

In a battle of attrition and endurance, not one Sentient was his match!

"So what?" Beelzebub asked. "If I detonate my body next to you, you will die. That flimsy armor won't protect you."

"Perhaps not." Buddha said. "But what if your adversary was not me, an ordinary human, but someone much more powerful and frightening? What if they were exceptionally talented in martial combat, and capable of withstanding your suicidal attacks? What then?"

Beelzebub snorted. "Who would even fall into that category? Name one person."

Buddha stood up a little straighter.

"I'll name four." He said, while holding up four fingers. "Diablo in his Archdemon Form. Mephisto, with his unbreakable dragon bones. Divinator Fellrun. And Second Founder Dosena."

Beelzebub frowned. "Three of those people are dead. And right now, it seems Founder Dosena is in no condition to fight. I could kill her with a snap of my fingers."

"You're missing the point." Buddha countered. "Sentients capable of beating you already exist. More will reveal themselves in due time. You are not their match as you are now."

By now, Beelzebub had already lost much of his fighting spirit. He looked at Buddha with deep intent.

"So, what? You want to train me?"

"I'm still determining that." Buddha said. "You are a force of Chaos. If the current Envoy of Chaos should die, you are highly likely to succeed his position. This is not a good thing."

"Huh? Envoy of Chaos? Who- what??" Beelzebub asked in bewilderment.

"Gressil." Buddha replied. "He is the Emperor of Chaos, and the strongest agent of its will."

Sensing that Beelzebub no longer wished to fight, Buddha turned off his T-REX, then sat on a nearby boulder. He inhaled softly to catch his breath. After a moment's hesitation, Beelzebub walked over and sat next to him, looking as if he wanted to uncover more knowledge Buddha wished to bestow upon him.

"There are four Forces that govern our universe." Buddha said calmly. "Do you know what they are?"

Beelzebub slowly shook his head. "That sounds like some human science stuff. Gravity, magnets... something else?"

"No. The four forces are Karma, Chaos, Destiny, and Luck." Buddha explained. "Though Destiny has an inverse force named Fate."

Beelzebub started to nod, but when he realized he didn't understand what Buddha was saying, he thought better of it.

"I... don't follow."

"Karma is the fundamental force which states 'what goes around, comes around'." Buddha explained. "Chaos is the uncertainty principle. Neither are inherently good nor bad. The more one masters Karma, the more they can predict the future by observing the present. All actions lead to future reactions. If you strike with your right fist, that is an action which will lead to the reaction of your right fist momentarily not protecting your body."

"That seems simple enough. So Chaos is the opposite? Actions have no reaction?" Beelzebub asked.

"Not quite." Buddha said with a smile. "Chaos simply means that sometimes random variables will happen. It is true that unmaintained equipment will eventually break down, but the Chaos principle ensures even high quality and well-maintained equipment might spontaneously break down due to random negative events."

Buddha gave Beelzebub a look of warning. "A universe with too much Karma is a static, predictable universe. Chaos must always exist to provide a balance. But too much Chaos can lead to terrible instability. That is why these two forces are fundamentally opposed to one another."

He continued. "Destiny, also known as Fate, is similar to Karma. Some things are destined to happen, while other things are fated to pass. Destiny can accumulate to unleash great effects, while Fate may accumulate over time to unleash terrible effects. One is definitively positive, the other is definitively negative."

"That just sounds like Karma with a different name." Beelzebub replied.

"Karma is a singular event. Destiny and Fate accumulate over time." Buddha said. "For example, have you thought about the events which led to the fall of Maiura and Tarus II? Those two events could be seen as an accumulation of Fate over time which brought about the fall of humanity and the destruction of their homeworlds. Right now, humanity's Fate has reached a nexus point. Whether it continues to accumulate and worsen their future, or whether it reverses and begins to build to a greater Destiny... this will be determined by the Karma they reap."

Beelzebub scratched his head. "Oh... okay. I get it. I think. So what about Luck?"

"Luck is similar to Chaos." Buddha said, waving his hand to gesture at the world around them. "Chaos affects the world, but Luck affects living things. Chaos will bring ruin to a factory, but Luck can bring wealth or tragedy to the common man. A world without Luck and Chaos is a deterministic one that can only breed identical results from identical levels of effort. Those who master Luck and Chaos can greatly change the relative balance of the universe and its denizens."

Buddha sighed.

"I know these things may seem abstract. Indeed, few are aware of their pervasive influence. Only those who have gazed upon enough Truths may touch upon the fundamental principles, let alone manipulate them. Only those who have suffered terrible, terrible lives may obtain the power to manipulate Chaos."

Buddha looked at Beelzebub. "You, Beelzebub, have already manipulated Chaos once."

"I have??" Beelzebub asked, slightly stunned.

"When you detonated your body in the skies above Tarus II and killed a million humans, your rage caused you to tap into Chaos, momentarily neutralizing the fundamental force of magic. This prevented Jason Hiro from stopping your rampage. In the future, it is possible that if you fall further and further into darkness, you may once again inadvertently strengthen your bond with Chaos and take another step toward becoming its future Envoy."

"Does that mean Gressil and I would both become Emperors of Chaos?" Beelzebub asked.

"Each galaxy can only have one Envoy for each of the fundamental forces." Buddha said. "And that... is why I approached you today. If Gressil dies, you are most likely to be his successor. But it is possible to change your Destiny. Only if you are willing..."

Beelzebub seemed to realize something. "You... are an Envoy then?"

"The Envoy of Karma, yes." Buddha acknowledged.

"Then does that mean there are Envoys of Luck and Destiny as well?" Beelzebub prodded.

Buddha looked at the ground. He smiled.

"Indeed, our galaxy already has an Envoy of Luck. You know his name. But as for the Envoy of Destiny... he has passed away without a successor."

A moment of silence followed.

Beelzebub sucked in a breath.

"Wait. So. The Envoy of Destiny... was..."

"Jason Hiro." Buddha said quietly. "He accumulated an incredible Destiny, and an equally incredible Fate. Unfortunately, that Fate led to the fall of Maiura and the destruction of Tarus II. But as for the Destiny he accumulated..."

Buddha smiled and shook his head. "It has yet to bear fruit. The time is coming. Soon, it will sprout its first leaves."

"Who is the next successor of Destiny?" Beelzebub asked.

"Right now? There are several... Candidates." Buddha said slowly. "You are not one of them. The Chaos swirling around your body is too unsightly and dense to allow this.

However, if you were to disperse that aura of Chaos, it is possible you could become a Candidate for Destiny's Envoy."

Buddha slowly stood up. He wandered over to a tree and placed his hand on its trunk. He gazed at the tree with a strange mystic expression playing upon his face.

"Becoming an Envoy of Fate and Destiny is not something one can easily manipulate. Additionally, as you saw with Jason Hiro, it will inevitably lead to heartbreak and suffering."

He continued. "You would become capable of great feats that shock the world, but your eventual downfall would be as painful as it is glorious. Envoys of Destiny and Luck are not like Envoys of Karma and Chaos. The former cannot control their powers, while the latter can. I can use my powers of Karma to observe Cause and Effect. Gressil can use his powers to create pandemonium. But if you should become Destiny's Envoy, your life would no longer be fully within your control."

Beelzebub stayed silent for a moment.

"Are there other Candidates for this position right now?"

Buddha turned away from the tree to look off into the distance, across the forest and into the borders of Melodia.

"First, one must possess latent potential, or acquire it through hard work. Second, one must live up to their fullest capabilities. In doing so, they will begin to unlock their Fated Destiny. Third, they must continue to accumulate positive and negative Karma. Then, when the destined time has arrived, their accumulated Fate will release in all its splendor, causing incredible effects as far as the eye can see."

"So, to answer your question," Buddha said, meeting Beelzebub's gaze, "Yes. There are other Candidates. Anyone with latent potential who is capable of rising to meet that potential can become the Envoy. The clock is ticking. Time waits for no Sentient."

Beelzebub looked down at the ground. He fell completely silent for several minutes.

The sun slowly descended below the horizon until half of its body had become hidden, turning the red sky into a soft hue of pink.

"If I become the Envoy of Destiny, will I die?"

"Someday." Buddha said with a subtle nod. "But all Sentients die eventually. Whether your end comes sooner or later is determined by the Karma you reap."

That finally gave Beelzebub the information he wanted. Slowly, he stood up, then turned to face Buddha.

The two men stood, staring at one another. Beelzebub evaluated the man who had completely one-upped him in physical combat and ascetic knowledge. He still felt he could obliterate Buddha's existence with a wave of his hand, but if the two of them were at the same level of power, Beelzebub wouldn't stand a chance.

"...I'm not going to allow Chaos to decide my Destiny." Beelzebub finally said. "Can you teach me?"

Buddha closed his eyes.

"I teach any who are willing to learn."

Upon hearing this, Beelzebub knelt down on one knee and bowed his head.

"Then from now on... I will call you 'master.'"

"And I shall call you 'student.'" Buddha said solemnly. "Now rise. There is much work to do."

Part 656: Aevum Argent

January 27th, 2021.

Somewhere in the southern hemisphere of the Milky Way galaxy, a tiny blip of light streaked across the blackness of the Void at superliminal speeds. It raced toward the center of the galaxy, carefully avoiding the increasingly numerous and more densely packed stars until this was no longer easily possible.

After two days of travel time, Jason Hiro arrived at his destination.

At the center of the Milky Way, the density of stars became horrifying. In any given lightyear radius, instead of just one star, there would be as many as a million of them. This meant that once Jason reached a position close enough to the galactic center, the heat and light emitted would be so oppressive that he might end up instantly vaporized!

Luckily, he came prepared.

"I should be close enough. No need to go any further." Jason said to himself.

A powerful force field surrounded the Wordsmith. All alone, without even Mildred by his side, the Wordsmith stealthily stole away from Earth and traveled here for one important reason.

It was finally time!

It was time to create Chrona's successor!

Ever since he formulated his plan to save the Earth, creating a new Chrona was the lynchpin of his future success. Unfortunately, until he had successfully upgraded his brain, he hadn't possessed the acumen to accomplish such a feat.

But now, after ingesting millions of books into his GenesisFrame MindCore, he finally had the capability to develop his initial framework.

"Chrona had too many flaws." Jason said to himself as he tapped his chin. "Looking back, it's obvious those flaws were caused by my shoddy design skills. I never managed to stabilize the timeflow, so it was always slowly speeding up as time went on. This level of sloppiness simply won't do for its successor."

"Another problem is that Chrona's design was extremely unfocused. I just built whatever I needed at the time wherever there was room. This led to a disorganized secret dimension that had inefficiencies galore. I cannot let the next one be so pathetic!"

Jason looked ahead of himself. Far in the distance, the stellar background luminosity was so bright that it was as if he were looking at a million suns in the night sky. Without his specialized force field blocking 99.9% of the light, his irises would have burned out instantly.

"This new realm will be known as..."

Jason paused.

"Aevum."

The word came to him in a flash of inspiration.

Aevum. It was an ancient word that invoked time, eternality, and a sense of stillness. It had many connotations, and all of them were to Jason's liking.

"Aevum. That shall be the name of my new star-empire."

Jason smiled. He had considered bringing Hideki along, but this initial part would probably bore him. Better to amaze his father later, once Aevum had been finalized.

Naturally, Jason did not need to think too hard on how Aevum would be built. He had already spent the last two days doing so as he flew to the galactic center; an eternity when it came to the new capabilities of his MindCore.

"Form! Condense! Expand! Tear!"

Jason rapidly began speaking tens of Words of Power, manipulating and tearing the space in front of himself. Here, less than 500 lightyears from the galactic core, there were no habitable worlds within a galactic stone's throw, and it would be practically impossible for even the Volgrim to uncover his base. If they really put their minds to it, doing so might be possible, but he was absolutely certain it would be harder than finding Chrona, which he had anchored to a planet in his previous timeline.

Within just a few minutes, an invisible dimension had already taken form. Jason ripped apart space far more efficiently for Aevum than he ever could have done for Chrona. His previous MindCore was focused on predictions, not on construction and blueprints. Thus, the GenesisFrame allowed him to accomplish in seconds what would have previously taken minutes... if not hours.

A moment later, Jason teleported inside the new dimensional tear.

The stars in the sky vanished. He arrived inside total darkness.

Jason looked around. He pondered for a moment.

"Last time, I manually accelerated the temporal factor by repeating the same Word of Power a thousand times. Gah! My old self was... a peasant! Such a stupid way of doing things. And it also led to an inconsistent temporal plane! I won't make such a mistake this time."

Instead of accelerating the timespace, Jason completely skipped this step. He began creating spatial anchors, infinitely tiny nodes of energy that drew from the stellar energy outside of Aevum to stabilize its internal space. These anchors would only be temporary, as later they would be greatly improved upon.

Slowly, Jason began 'pushing' Aevum's internal dimensional space outward. Bit by bit, meter by meter, he forcibly stabilized the space until he was able to create a simple ball of dirt beneath his feet.

With 'solid ground' to stand on, the basic initial step of Aevum's formation had begun. It had a stable inner space, and a tiny 'world' no bigger than Jason's body.

Jason held out his palm face-up.

"Crystal!"

A single orb materialized above his palm. This orb was the most important component of Aevum. In the future, it would be its greatest strength, and its greatest weakness. If enemies were able to invade and target it, the entire dimension was likely to collapse and destroy everything within.

Jason shrugged. "I'll just have to make sure nobody can find this place."

In his hands rested the central control matrix of his future Empire. The Nexus Crystal was the key to achieving all of his plans. It was made from Wordsmithium, an element he was all-too-familiar with, and thus was essentially unbreakable except by Cosmic entities. It had the unique ability to collect and divert a seemingly infinite amount of energy. It could also control spatial laws...

Jason levitated the Nexus Crystal above his head. He manipulated it with a few Words of Power, and all of a sudden, a beam of light pierced the spatial barrier surrounding Aevum, its power directed into the Nexus Crystal.

"Bingo." Jason said to himself with a smile.

The Nexus Crystal began to light up as the power of a star flowed from outside Aevum into its interior.

This was its most important function. Much like the star-collection array from Chrona, Jason needed a way to acquire, process, and control massive amounts of energy. He could create fusion reactors, but those were only useful on a planetary scale. What he needed was enough energy to power a future Empire!

Thus, the Nexus Crystal could breach the dimensional wall and draw power from the outside galaxy.

With that in mind, Jason's next tasks began to flow much faster. He attached energy connections to the spatial anchors, drastically increasing their power and allowing the dimensional walls to grow faster than ever.

He created a Planetary Core inside the tiny ball of dirt beneath his feet, causing it to rapidly expand along with Aevum's dimensional space once the Nexus Crystal attached a transmission point.

It only took Jason thirty minutes and Aevum's internal space had already reached half of Chrona's when it was first made, but he only used a fraction of his original effort. If he had stupidly expanded the space using manual Wordsmithing, he'd have expended far more energy for far less gain.

"Alright, it seems the internal expansion has started to slow." Jason said out loud. "Now for the second step."

Jason focused his GenesisFrame. He summoned a schematic into his mind's eye, one he had crafted on the trip to the center of the galaxy.

"Materialize."

He held out his hand, and a second crystal appeared. This one was not white like the Nexus Crystal, but was instead pure black, capable of absorbing any light that came into contact with it.

"Alright. The Temporal Crystal is done." Jason said.

He levitated it downward, and it sank inside the micro-planet that had formed beneath his feet. Once it reached the center, it merged with the beam of energy transmitted by the Nexus Crystal.

At that moment, the temporal laws began to shift.

Jason vaguely felt the world altering around himself. The flow of Aevum's internal time rapidly adjusted from a 1:1 ratio with the outside galaxy to a 10:1 ratio. Then a 25:1 ratio. Then 50:1...

Without Jason ever needing to use manual Wordsmithing, the flow of time changed gradually until it eventually froze at a very specific number.

"Temporal dilation complete. I just gained a lot of time." Jason said with a smile.

Unlike Chrona, which initially solidified at a 250:1 time ratio, Aevum was much faster, at 365:1, but also far more stable.

One year inside Aevum meant one day on Earth. It was more convenient to synchronize with Earth's chronometer than Volgarius or some other world, and it meant that Jason would always be able to know the date and time in the outer universe.

Aevum's chronometer was completely stable, neither accelerating nor speeding up. Once Jason finished his work, he thought to himself about the Hall of Heroes.

"I bet Solomon had a hand in helping Hope make the Hall of Heroes. He wasn't as ambitious as me, but he probably built a temporal crystal or matrix of some sort to regulate the time-flow. It's a shame I didn't do the same thing back then, but here we are now."

With the temporal and spatial laws finally solidified, Jason began to accelerate his work.

He added more energy relays to Aevum, causing the Nexus Crystal to absorb more power and spread it out to more areas.

He replaced the spatial anchors with biological ones that used magical principles to stabilize and grow Aevum's internal space, rather than requiring external energy. This small improvement made it so even if the Nexus Crystal was sabotaged or destroyed, Aevum would not collapse immediately and its residents could escape.

Not long afterward, Jason's eyes glowed with power as he channeled the Nexus Crystals' energy into himself.

"CONSTRUCT!"

A schematic inside his mind manifested into reality. A massive spire shaped like the Eiffel Tower appeared atop the rocky world below. The spire started out wide at the bottom, but rapidly narrowed into a skinny pole-like shape at the top, where the Nexus Crystal was embedded.

This tower was not only a marvel to look at, with its black exterior and smooth sheen, but it also served a practical purpose. Lines of energy streamed down the tower, wrapping in circles around its shaft and spreading outward like a spiderweb across the slowly forming planet.

These energy lines were termed 'Leylines' by Jason. Not only did they harness the power of the outer cosmos, but later he intended for them to simultaneously transmit magical energy as well.

At the base of the Nexus Tower, Jason conjured a special micro-dimension. This dimension harnessed a massive amount of power to form a singularity that defied common sense. He created a bedroom where he could sleep... and inside that bedroom, time completely froze! The moment he stepped inside, he would step right back out afterward.

This completely defied the laws of physics, and was only possible because of his MindCore granting him incredible new creation abilities.

"What happened with Hope will never happen again." Jason muttered to himself.

He had beaten Hope, but each time Jason needed to sleep and had Fiona or Rebecca take over his drones, Hope gained a huge advantage, and nearly won the battle when he directly exploited it.

Jason could never let this happen again. His combat capabilities were lower, his mental perception of time was slower, and if the him of now fought the Hope of back then, he might lose!

...But that was only if he were to fight with Chrona as his home turf. With Aevum, he now held the complete advantage.

Jason's eyes momentarily dimmed.

"The Stillness. It will change the galactic situation more than anyone can imagine."

That was the term he chose for this time-frozen room. It wasn't big enough for him to do any serious work, but he would have time to think, to plan, and to sleep whenever he needed it.

Jason turned his attention elsewhere. He forcibly increased the speed of Aevum's expansion, making it larger and larger until it had noticeably surpassed Chrona's initial size. He continued to funnel the power of additional stars into the Nexus Tower, which he used to build more and more facilities.

A circular wall appeared. It surrounded the center of Aevum's main city, which he titled Argent. At the moment, Argent would be the only city within Aevum, but who could know if more would become viable, or even necessary later?

The Great Barrier of Argent enveloped the future city with a protective shield that completely swallowed its interior. Not only were the walls made of Wordsmithium, but they also projected a circular barrier above and below Argent's borders, ensuring no enemy could go under or below the walls to reach its interior.

But, a casual observer might ask, why did Jason need to protect the city?

Jason's eyes glowed with power. He reached toward the distance and conjured a small mountain. This mountain began to grow, and grow, and grow some more.

Argent was a surprisingly large city, with over fifty kilometers of square internal space.

But the mountain Jason summoned was colossal. It rose into the sky, its caldera opening to reveal a massive pool of blue liquid within its maw. The mountain grew more and more, eventually stretching ten kilometers into the sky! Its base was ten times Argent's size, and with only twenty-five kilometers of distance separating the mountain from Argent, it felt like a Titan was looking down upon an ant.

Jason looked up at the mountain.

"Axis Mundi." Jason said as he looked upon the highest peak, his words evoking a feeling of ancient awe inside his heart. "The Cradle of Life. The Primal Wellspring. If The Nexus Tower is the pillar that holds Aevum together, then Axis Mundi is the lifeblood that will fuel its future!"

He grinned. His excitement was so infectious that anyone nearby would have grinned as well.

Nobody but Jason knew his plans for Aevum. In his mind's eye, Axis Mundi was the conceptual masterpiece that made the entire dimension function properly. Without it, Aevum would lose three quarters of its future potential.

Jason waved his hand. Plants began sprouting outside the Great Barrier. A forest emerged. Lakes, rivers, and streams. On the opposite side of the world as the city of Argent, a deep ocean took form.

Lifeless though the world might be, Jason had formed the beginning of a seed that would someday germinate into the Milky Way's base of power.

If his plans bore fruit, the Volgrim would never be able to defeat him. He would gain a foundation so formidable that even the Founders would be forced to kneel if they wished to preserve their lives.

"I alone am not enough to save humanity." Jason said to himself. "I know that now. I tried to do it all alone before. I failed. Because of me, my wife died. Even if my daughter lived, that was only a fluke of luck. I will never again risk the lives of the people I love! I will grant power to all who are worthy! I will uplift humanity itself, and together, we will gain the strength to beat back those dogs of Hell, those aliens who think themselves our betters!"

Jason waved his hand. A massive crack split open Axis Mundi, followed by several more. Primal blue fluid rushed from the mountain's interior. It poured down the mountainside, spilled into the valley below, and rapidly carved out new rivers and streams.

This liquid was not ordinary water, but Genesis Ichor... the Water of Life!

As it flowed down into the woodlands, rivers, and lakes below, the Genesis Ichor began to immediately create strange effects on the environment. Plants abruptly mutated when they absorbed the Ichor. They grew larger and more lush, gained elemental attributes, and even occasionally gained minor intelligence.

These were only the initial effects. Jason knew that, in time, the mutations would grow more and more pronounced!

"I'd better make sure to warn future visitors and residents not to drink the water outside the walls." Jason joked to himself.

Jason summoned various animals into the Ironwoods outside the Great Barrier. Interestingly, he mostly only summoned herbivore animals, especially rabbits. They bred quickly, and time was of great importance in these early phases.

He summoned birds, including parakeets, crows, pigeons, eagles, hawks, and many more. He summoned mice and rats. He conjured cats and dogs outside the walls, and allowed them to roam free.

In just a few years time, the Genesis Ichor would rapidly mutate the creatures he had placed down. Jason was extremely eager to see how Aevum would develop.

He finally turned away from the outer region to look up at the sky. He summoned a star to orbit Aevum, an artificial source of solar energy and light, powered by the Nexus Crystal and guided by the Temporal Crystal. As Aevum continued to steadily expand over time, these two crystals would ensure the star above would not fall toward the planet and obliterate the city. It would maintain a steady size, distance, and speed.

Jason's eyes glowed with magical power. He conjured buildings and facilities inside Argent's borders, facilities with a deep purpose that would allow him to build toward his ultimate goal of empowering humanity. He created lodgings for Argent's future residents, factories to build weapons and technology, and he even conjured an extremely special floating prism in the sky.

Jason looked up at the truck-sized prism. He sent it flying up into the air, where it reached the edge of Aevum's spatial wall. The prism flew into the path of the Nexus Tower's energy line, causing it to split into hundreds of individual beams of light. These beams all pierced the spatial wall at different angles, but the overall intent was to more accurately and efficiently focus external energy into the Nexus Tower.

Now came the most important step of all. With Aevum's spatial walls hardened beyond belief, Jason took charge of the Nexus Crystal and the Temporal Crystal. He began moving Aevum through space, slowly flying it toward the galactic center.

That's right. His goal was not to position Aevum outside the galactic center, but directly inside it. This was the most dangerous place to attack, but the safest place to defend! As long as Aevum didn't collapse under the gravitational force of the Milky Way's central black hole, Aevum's future was assured.

But it would take a long, long time to fully move Aevum where it needed to go. Jason wasn't too worried. Moving the dimension needed to happen slowly anyway, to allow Aevum to adapt to the gravitational pressure engulfing the galactic center.

As it happened, Chrona could not be moved. This was due to Jason's inexperience in creating folded spaces. Aevum could, but that was because he deliberately made it possible. The Nexus Crystal made many things possible he couldn't have imagined before.

Somewhere in the Southern Quadrant of the Milky Way, a certain Psion lifted her head. She paused her meditation and looked around with a frown.

[Hmm?]

Founder Dosena narrowed her eyes. For a brief instant, she sensed something frightening near the Milky Way's core, but the feeling vanished as quickly as it came.

She continued to stare toward the center of the Milky Way, but that momentary feeling of horror didn't return.

After a long, long hour of staring, she closed her eyes and returned to her meditation.

It was only her imagination...

Part 657: Operation Birdcage

January 27th, 2021, Earth, USA.

A tiny dot of light streaked across the United States of America from the west coast to the east coast. It moved in singular bursts of straight lines with momentary pauses between each movement, and each flicker of movement itself occurred at the speed of light. This dot of light sent bursts of lightning scattering in all directions at the start of its movement, and at the end.

After traveling the length of the USA, it then spun around and raced back the other direction. Despite its brilliant light and shocking movement speed, it barely drew any attention. Satellites were not able to keep up with it, and ground-based radar only noticed a flicker of energy before that flicker instantly disappeared.

As it returned to the west coast from whence it started, it charged toward the base of Mount Whitney in California, the tallest mountain in the USA outside of Alaska. In the blink of an eye, it snapped up to the peak and exploded with energy, obliterating a small group of humans that had recently climbed to the mountaintop a few hours before, annihilating them before they could register what happened.

This 'blip' of lightning turned out to be none other than Emperor Ose. She breathed evenly and looked around the world in a 360-degree radius, hardly noticing and definitely not caring that her arrival had blasted apart a handful of men and women who had just scaled the peak for fun. Their deaths meant nothing to her.

Ose wrinkled her nose at the blood and gore that now stained Whitney's peak, then focused her eyes to the northwest. Her body fired off across the sky and she traveled more than two hundred kilometers in the blink of an eye, arriving back at Crescent City, CA, where her home base was located.

Ose struck the ground outside the city limits and skidded to a stop, electrical energy crackling around her. She adjusted her neck, dusted off her white dress suit, and stood up a little straighter.

It seems my ascension to Emperor has not enhanced my maximum speed at all. I am firmly locked to instantaneous bursts of lightspeed. Ose thought to herself. I cannot turn when transmitting myself, and I can only move in straight lines. However, my tolerance for rapid-transmissions has increased greatly. I can chain bursts with ninety percent less downtime than when I was a Baron.

Ose looked around. She found a random cliff-face nearby, then zipped over to it with a flicker of lightning.

On arrival, she assumed a fighting posture. Then she began throwing kicks and punches as quickly as possible at the cliff-face.

Boom-boom-boom!

She held back much of her Emperor-level strength, not wanting to obliterate the mountain, but even so, her speed was fast enough to leave after-images. She struck the mountain ten times every second, her fists and legs leaving massive imprints on the cliff's bare wall.

After a full minute of unrelenting offense, she stopped and assessed the damage.

My striking power is roughly 100 times greater than when I was a Baron. Before, I could pick up and throw a small vehicle with a bit of strain, but now I can lift one of the humans' heaviest tanks with contemptuous ease and throw it multiple miles into the distance. My striking speed is faster, but only because my inner strength has been enhanced. I can finally keep up with the strain my lightning powers put on my body.

Ose turned away from the cliffside. She started running as quickly as she could, charging into the distance without actually flickering her body around at the speed of light.

Before long, she found an empty back road with only dirt and no cars on it. Using this as a makeshift race track, she accelerated to her fastest possible speed. Her feet lightly tapped the ground, leaving no imprints, and she pitter-pattered across the dirt while only causing the sound of buzzing insects to emanate outward.

That's it? Only about 200 miles (321 KPH) per hour? Ose thought, frowning to herself. Her ordinary running speed was fast, but nowhere near as fast as her instantaneous flickers.

Ose reached the end of the dirt road, spun on her toes, then rushed back the same way she came. This time, she deliberately struck the ground with her feet as hard as she could. This caused rapid explosive sounds to blast outward, which startled all the local wildlife and increased her speed by another fifty percent. She realized that if she opted to go loud and intimidating instead of somewhat stealthy, she could increase her running speed by another level!

Ose skidded to a stop at the top of the dirt road. She turned to look behind herself at the massive potholes she had left in her wake. Unfortunately, any humans who encountered this road in the future would be left bewildered by the state it was in, wondering if Bigfoot had stomped through here recently.

If I want to traverse great distances, my instantaneous flickers are still the best. But if I want relatively fast speeds along with maneuverability, my top speed without flicker-movement is pitifully low.

Ose mentally chastised herself, but if any other demons were to hear her inner thoughts, their heads might explode in rage! Even Belial, who was quite fast when she sprinted, could only top out at 100 miles per hour, less than half Ose's speed. Almost all the other demons were slower than that.

After thinking for a bit, Ose flickered away and traveled into a nearby forest. She disappeared into its greenery, sliced at a tree with the side of her hand, and felled it to make a perfectly flat stump. She sat down in the lotus position with her legs crossed, then closed her eyes and began to think.

My body's fault tolerance capabilities have shot way up. My striking strength is higher than ever. I can maneuver and fight in the big leagues now. Perhaps if I fight that Archseer again, I can quickly kill him. However, one must never underestimate a Trueborn. He won't fool me so easily.

My biggest problem is that even though I can speed up and slow down my perception of time, I cannot be both fast and slow at the same time. This is a critical vulnerability I must immediately ameliorate! If my perception speed is fast, I can sense danger but cannot converse normally with other Sentients. But if it is slow, I cannot sense danger and incoming sneak attacks. It would be most pitiful if that Cat Mask managed to assassinate me with a well-timed sniper round! Hmm. Is it possible to achieve both at the same time? Can I somehow become both fast and slow?

Of course I can! This is a matter most simple to execute.

Ose focused her mental energies. After less than a minute, her Mind Realm began to distort. Then... it split in two!

Two halves, each one equally Ose, became capable of perceiving the world. They quickly entered internal dialogue with one another.

[I shall be the Primary.]

[I shall be the Secondary.]

[Secondary, how should we split control of the Main Body?]

[Perhaps as Primary you should always be in control. I should only take control when I detect a threat.]

A few minutes passed.

[This arrangement will not work, Secondary. If I am controlling the Main Body, you are not. You cannot control the eyes or limbs.]

[Noted. It seems rapidly switching control is not possible either. I attempted to switch with you but failed. My perception is currently set to 1000x realtime speed, but because yours is set to 1x realtime speed, I am forced to slow down to your level when attempting the Main Body control transfer.]

[This is inefficient. If we come under threat, even a single second is more time than we can afford to swap control, Secondary.]

[Agreed. Let us think of another solution.]

This time, a full five minutes passed. Both halves of Ose's brain accelerated their perception of time to the absolute maximum speed, a full 1,000,000x realtime speed. For each second that passed in reality, a million passed inside her Mind Realm. Thus, five million minutes, or approximately ten years, passed inside her Mind Realm. They constantly discussed many different solutions. But eventually, they settled on one.

[Archangel Michael is indeed a good example of this theory in practice. Very well. Secondary, you will assume total control of the right arm, and partial control of the waist. As Primary, I will control the rest of the body and rely on you for momentary instantaneous defense before swapping total control during a battle scenario.]

[I have another idea, Primary. Since we have already split once, why not split again?]

[Again? To what end?]

[We should create a Tertiary to focus on cerebral pursuits. Tertiary will not control any part of the body, but will instead focus on research and development.]

[I see. So I will control the main body for ordinary conversations and world perception, you will focus on defense against sneak attacks, and Tertiary will focus on R&D. This is a sensible choice. We shall test it now.]

Another minute passed. Ose's Mind Realm vibrated rapidly, and a slow, tentative split occurred.

[My designation is Tertiary.]

[This second Mind Realm split was extremely painful, Secondary. This should be the limit of our splitting.]

[Agreed, Primary. Additionally, my mental perception has slowed dramatically. It seems the three of us share our perception speeds when we are not synchronized equally. It is not possible for myself and Tertiary to both possess high level mental acceleration while Primary is at a lower dilation. We must split the acceleration unevenly.]

[I have a suggestion.] Tertiary said. [I will exist in a state of 10,000x normalspeed. Secondary will only operate at 100x normalspeed. Primary will exist at 2x Normalspeed.]

[2x? Why not 1x?] Primary asked.

[2x Normalspeed is still sufficient for conversing with other Sentients, it does not slow down time to a disagreeable level, and it allows the Main Body to still react twice as quickly as usual. This is an excellent balance between the three Selves.] Tertiary said.

[I agree.] Secondary responded. [I could operate at 1000x Normalspeed, but the difference between 100x and 1000x is relatively minor. Tertiary needs all the speed for R&D that she can acquire. This new system strikes a delicate balance.]

[Noted.] Primary replied. [It seems any further splits are impossible or will provide no real value. We will exist in a tri-brained state.]

[We must also consider the different 'states' of our intelligence.] Secondary mentioned. [We only have so much bandwidth available. Primary, you will focus on charisma and conversation-driven intelligence. Tertiary, you will focus on abstract and high-level thinking. As for myself, I will focus on combat sense and threat detection.]

[Agreed.] Primary said.

[Agreed.] Tertiary said.

[We are all in agreement.] Secondary said. [For now, this is how things shall be done. Perhaps we may adjust the ratios and cerebral states later.]

In less than thirty minutes, Ose underwent a fundamental change in abilities that nobody in the galaxy could have predicted. Even Jason had no idea she had completely reinvented herself.

Jason was completely oblivious to the new Threat he had awakened. The Ose he fought in the future was a very different Ose from the one during humanity's peak. Her much older self had lived for over 100,000 years, triumphed against humanity during the Energy Wars, and accomplished many great feats long after humanity's fall. When she became Emperor, it was at a time when demonkind ruled over humanity's last remnants, and she naturally suffered from a huge ego, thinking that defeating the humans and their barely worthy Hero would be a simple matter. Ultimately, it was her arrogance and ego that led to her undoing.

But the Ose of the past was not the same as her older self. She was used to fighting against a powerful humanity that possessed a vast military force. The angels and Titans were still alive. Threats to demonkind's future lurked in abundance. She was thus forced to act with greater caution and shrewdness. She immediately realized that facing against not one but multiple Heroes was a far more difficult challenge than facing 'only' Jason Hiro in the future. Even if the Archseer was young and stupid, it was abundantly clear that Cat Mask was a major threat, let alone the supporting capabilities of all the other Ancestral Spirits.

The moment Ose finished her new preparations, she jumped to her feet and looked around. The world around her now moved at half its normal speed, at least according to the perception of her Primary Brain. Her Secondary Brain now controlled her right arm, and its perception slowed reality down to 1% of its normal speed. Her Tertiary Brain could not perceive the world at all, but it slowed time down to 0.001% of normal speed. Each minute that passed in reality was 10,000 minutes inside her Tertiary Brain.

From this moment on, Ose would be operating at a level far above what the humans were expecting.

It's a shame I can't just magic things into reality. Ose thought to herself glumly. Even if I design new weapons constantly, I'll still have to fabricate them by hand. That's another inefficiency I'll have to work out later.

She looked up into the sky, and her body became a blur of light as she shot into the horizon.

January 27th, 2021, New York City.

Satan stood in his office, looking out the windows at the distant Central Park. He clasped his hands behind his back as he thought about a great many things.

[The new girl is quite interesting.] A voice said within his head. [Verily, she hath awakened my interest.]

"Yeah. She ain't bad." Satan replied. "To think she's already noticed so many things... if she's right, we've got a real problem on our hands."

Satan's Vectors manipulated a cigar, lifting and lighting it before placing it in his mouth. Satan took a long drag, and his eyes fogged over for a moment.

"We need to accelerate the timeline. Keep these humans guessing." Satan said slowly.

[Is it finally time for Operation Birdcage?]

"Hehe. It might be, Hades."

Hades, formerly known as Archangel Samael, lurked within Satan's Mind Realm. Unlike all Satan's other souls, he was able to operate with impunity, working alongside the Devil to advance their collective interests of overthrowing and someday slaughtering all the angels.

Nobody hated the angels more than Hades. Their ancient betrayal of his beloved sisters, Muriel and Cassiel, had long ago fallen into a distant memory, but its pain had never lessened.

And of all the angels, the one he hated most was undoubtedly Raphael.

[We cannot construct the new Hell until we hath obtained Valac's Lantern.] Hades pointed out. [Brother Satan, tis' unwise to allow any further delays. Each day that passes, more humans join the Lazarite's ranks.]

Satan snorted. "Lazarites? They ain't shit. They're nothing more than meatshields. I can kill a thousand of them with a wave of my hand."

[I fear thou mayest be underestimating them.] Hades said, a hint of warning in his tone. [Dost thou thinketh Raphael a simpleton? There may yet be a secret power they have yet to reveal.]

Satan didn't take his warning to heart. "Secret power? You're paranoid. Demon Lords stomp the life out of Lazarites. We've seen it time and again. Lazarites are barely above the average Demon Grunt, and are definitely weaker than our strongest Grunts. We ain't got anything to fear."

[I hope the reality art as thou believeth.] Hades said, withdrawing his thoughts afterward.

Several minutes passed. Satan glanced around his office, frowning as he thought about the 'bugs' Ose had told him about. Had more cropped up after she swept it clean? He wasn't certain. He definitely didn't trust that the office was secure anymore, but he'd spent so many years living here that it felt uncomfortable thinking about leaving and going elsewhere just to have a private discussion.

Satan tapped into one of his powers, a Warper soul inside his body. He summoned a portal, then stepped through it and arrived elsewhere in the United States, somewhere in the midwest, deep underground. There, a small horde of demons jumped when they saw his unexpected arrival.

Satan closed the portal behind himself. He looked around at the demons present, which consisted mainly of undead Grunts, Lords, and even a Baron or two. One still-living demon levitated toward him, the demon's skinless head covered by a cloak.

"Emperor Satan. This is an unexpected surprise."

"Baron Ozzar." Satan said perfunctorily. "Is Mephisto around?"

"The Duke of Mist is currently dealing with a minor matter. I will summon him for you, First Emperor." Ozzar said, bowing his head. Green smoke burped from his mouth as he quickly turned and floated away.

A few minutes later, Ozzar returned with Mephisto, though the Duke of Mist took the lead.

"Sssatan. Hasss sssomething happened?" Mephisto hissed, his bloody red eyes shining out of his skull sockets.

"Did anyone tell you about the Trueborns that popped up?" Satan asked.

Mephisto nodded slightly, but his next words somewhat contradicted that action. "I have heard a little regarding their appearancesss. The detailsss, however, have eluded me."

"I'll make it short and sweet then." Satan said. "We're dealing with two Trueborn for the first time in history. A father and son. The father's name is unknown, but he goes by the moniker 'Cat Mask.' The son's name is Jason Hiro, but he calls himself the Archseer. Based on recovered recon info and Emperor Ose's efforts, we have a pretty good idea of what their powers are."

"Emperor Ossse?" Mephisto asked, cocking his head. "I do not recognizzze that name."

"Remember Lucy's girl, Ose? Baron Ose?" Satan asked, while Mephisto nodded his head. "She did me a big favor, so I promoted her to Emperor. She has lightning and technology powers. Some other stuff. Pretty strong. Anyway, she fought both Trueborn while she was only a Baron and kicked their asses. Couldn't kill 'em, but she gave us a lot of intel."

He continued. "Cat Mask seems to have some sort of super-reaction powers, along with teleportation, enhanced strength, and durability. Right now, we think the latter two aren't actually his. A different Hero must have boosted him somehow. He also has a crazy strong gun that shoots bullets even Lilia couldn't tank. He singlehandedly took down Lucy, so he's a big threat."

"Then we've got his son, the Archseer. Jason seems less imposing, but never take a Trueborn lightly. Recovered intel says his power is called 'Dream Eating'. He can see into the future like a precog, he has advanced weapon training, and he's just as strong and durable as his dad. Once again, those last two are likely abilities given by one of the Ancestral Spirits."

"Two Trueborn... thisss isss a troublesssome development." Mephisto said uneasily. "Doesss thisss mean you're here to...?"

"Yeah. It's time." Satan said. "I know we were planning on waiting five or ten more years, but perfect is the enemy of good enough. Operation Birdcage has to happen sooner rather than later."

Mephisto didn't say anything for a few moments. He rubbed his skeletal hands together, making a discomforting grinding noises when bone scraped against bone.

"Troublesssome. Very, very troublesssome." Mephisto repeated twice. "Sssatan, the preparationsss are not complete. Our agentsss are not ready. There isss a twenty-five percccent chance of failure if we act now."

"It might not be that high." Satan said, rubbing his chin. "I'm gonna fill Ose in on the deets. I want you ready to act within three days. Our deadline is the 30th. Got it?"

Mephisto threw up his hands. "You are the bosss. I do asss you command."

"Good. I'm gonna rope a couple extra Emperors in. If we don't have the quantity, we'll make up for it with quality. As long as you can slip into the Tower, the mission is as good as complete."

That seemed to settle Mephisto's nerves. He relaxed a little and nodded deeply.

"We will be ready within three daysss."

Satan nodded back. He opened a portal back to his office, then stepped through.

After the portal closed, Satan donned his human form, then stepped out where his secretaries were. Belial was not among them.

"I'm gonna be taking a business trip for the next week. Clear my calendar."

"Yes, Mister Hercule."

Part 658: President Steven Johannesburg

January 27th, 2021. 9 AM. Washington DC, USA. White House.

President Steven Johannesburg sat heavily in his luxurious black leather office chair behind the Resolute Desk, where many small stacks of papers sat arranged before him. He had only assumed office for a week, and already, his 'day one' campaign promises were knocking at the door. Unlike his two predecessors, he had sworn not to rule by Executive Order, so he had to do things the old fashioned way; by cold-calling Senators, House Representatives, and other high level lawmakers to try and push his agenda through.

It had only been seven days since January 20th, but he was already feeling that the next four years, possibly the next eight, would be the longest years of his life.

His wife, Jolene Johannesburg, stepped into the office. Her brown hair was in a prim and proper bun, and she wore a pressed blue suit with a cute hat. Her eyes sparkled in that way they always did when she looked at him.

"You're heading out?" Steven asked, sending her a tired smile.

"I have that meeting with Senator Woodram, remember? It's already nine, dear." Jolene said, walking over and giving him a kiss on the cheek. "I sent the boys over to the country club to mingle with their friends. They'll be back home around eight PM tonight."

"Oh, good, good." Steven said, kissing her back. "I'll see you later then, honey."

Jolene started to pull away, but then she hesitated and frowned.

"Steven, I know it's hectic, but you should take a break. You look awful."

"I have some golf planned with Governor Kratsky later." Steven replied.

"No, not golf. Golf is 'social work.' It's shmoozing. I mean you should take an eight-hour nap." Jolene said disapprovingly. "You could hide a cat inside those bags under your eyes."

Steven rubbed his eyes. "I'll nap when I'm dead, sweetheart."

"That's what your father always said, and look where that got him." Jolene grumbled. "See you later."

She stole out of the office, and Steven heaved a sigh. He sat down at his desk and tiredly looked over his itinerary.

"Sleep. Yeah. Wouldn't that be nice..." He mumbled to himself. "Christ, and I have a photoshoot with the local basketball team at noon. Is that really the best use of my time? Maybe I should ask Kelly to scrap it. No, that would make me look too dismissive. The press would eat me alive."

He licked his fingers, then flipped through several folders on his desk. One of the folders was labeled 'Marine Preservation Act 2022' and another was labeled 'Security Detail Review January 2021'. There were many of these papers scattered around, and all of them demanded some level of his attention.

After fifteen minutes, the phone on his desk rang. He flicked the speakerphone button.

"Yes, Kelly?"

A woman's voice spoke over the phone. "Mister President, your Secretary of Defense wants to meet with you. He has a visitor with him. He said something about a national security threat."

What's that fat bastard up to now? Steven silently wondered, thinking of his Secretary of Defense, Chris Brisker. He was a relatively ugly and morbidly obese man, not particularly qualified for the job, but in order to win a couple key voter demographics, Steven had to bring Chris into his cabinet. He cringed at the thought.

"Yeah, alright, send them in, Kelly." Steven said, quickly rubbing his eyes to wake himself up.

After a few seconds, the door opened. Chris walked in and spread out his arms. "Hey, Steven! Good to see ya!"

"Yeah. Good to see you too." Steven replied, much more evenly.

His eyes strayed to Chris's left, where a thirty-something man with white hair was standing, holding a conspicuously large black briefcase. Oddly, he wore sunglasses despite being indoors.

"And this... suspicious looking fellow is...?" Steven asked, prodding his somewhat slow and dim-witted subordinate for info.

Chris nodded, causing his jowls to flap. "Oh, this guy here, he says his code name is Agent Silver. Works for the FBI."

"Not the FBI." Agent Silver said. "I work for a highly classified subdivision of the US Military. Mister Brisker, thank you for seeing me in. You may leave now."

Chris blinked. He frowned, not liking Silver's remark. "Hey, watch the tone, pal. You don't order me around."

"I outrank you." Silver said, barely even looking at him before walking over to the president's desk. He sat down without being offered, then paused for half a breath.

Steven looked at the man with the sunglasses. He felt there was something... strange about him.

"Chris, you can go. Thank you for bringing Silver in here." Steven said, smiling perfunctorily at the man.

"Well, alright then. I know when three's a crowd!" Chris said, in that whiney tone he always used when he wasn't getting what he wanted. Despite his ulterior motives, he still left the room and closed the door.

A few moments passed. Steven Johannesburg eyed the man calmly sitting across from his with several reservations.

"What branch of the military are you in?" Steven asked.

"No need to ask questions, Mister President." Agent Silver said, finally pulling down his glasses. When Steven saw the man's eyes, he was surprised. Even his irises were silver, like his hair. "I'm here to onboard you, now that your hectic first week has concluded."

"Onboard me." Steven repeated. "To what?"

Silver looked Steven in the eyes. He smiled, but there was no warmth in the expression.

"Now that you have assumed office over the most powerful military on Planet Earth, your true responsibilities have begun. I have many Truths to reveal to you, Truths which the average person and 99.9% of all high-level politicians are not privy to. As President, it is your job to keep these secrets under wraps. If any of them breathe out into the public consciousness, there is a very real chance of panic and chaos in the streets. President JFK made that mistake, and he paid the ultimate price for his actions."

Steven narrowed his eyes. "Are you threatening me?"

"Not me, personally." Agent Silver replied. "I am only a representative of a much greater force. As we speak, there is a secret war being waged across Earth. It is a silent war, one the media has been deliberately made blind to, covered up by innumerable powerful and ancient organizations. It is unfortunate that you and every other President had to assume office without knowing the full gravity of the situation you are undertaking, but past experiments have shown this is the only way to be sure."

"Be sure there are no leaks?" Steven asked, feeling a little unsettled.

"You're fast on the uptake. That will make this easier." Silver replied.

He paused.

"The American public, and the rest of humanity, are living under the assumption that you, the US President, are the leader of the free world. You are not. Put simply, you are the public face of an organization with roots far deeper what you can imagine."

Silver touched his chest. "My name is Agent Silver. That is not a code-name. It is my actual name. I was born and raised by the Illuminati, and trained to be one of its most formidable Agents. I am not the only one of my rank, and there are others like me."

"The Illuminati..." President Johannesburg said skeptically.

"That's right. I know you might find it crazy, but my job is to inform you of the Truths to which you are ignorant. I am here to answer all your questions, once I have completed my basic summary."

And so, Agent Silver began to speak. He opened up the briefcase he brought with him, and started pulling out folders, case files, pictures, and all sorts of thumbdrives containing audio and video recordings of things Steven became increasingly alarmed by.

"This is a picture of him." Silver said, holding out a photo for Steven to look at. "Satan the Devil. He operates out of New York City, using a shell corporation named Legion. You've probably heard of it. They run commercials on FOX News."

"You're fucking kidding me." Steven softly exclaimed. "Satan? The Devil?? Are you out of your mind? This is the most ludicrous horseshit I've ever heard in my life!"

Silver nodded. "Every single President says that."

"No, no, don't you just sit there and nod your head like some wise sage!" Steven shouted. "This is actual insanity! A worldwide effort to cover up the existence of demons, angels, monsters, and all kinds of other shit? A perpetual war dating back tens of thousands of years, right back to the start of human history? All that, and nobody knows about it?! It's fundamentally impossible for nobody to know about this!"

"Mmm. You're misunderstanding something." Silver said, pursing his lips. "People do know. You knew before I told you. Haven't you seen a movie with demons and angels in it? Read a book? Read the Bible? It's all out there. We keep the conspiracy in plain view. Through centuries of careful propagandizing, brainwashing, and manipulation of the masses, we've convinced people that demons, angels, and other 'mythical' figures are just that; figures of myth and legend. Demons sometimes walk in plain view nowadays and people think they're cosplayers. The conspiracy has been so successful that when people see something out of the ordinary, we don't even have to mind-wipe them. They just assume their brain screwed up for a moment, they shrug, and they forget what they saw."

He continued. "Sure, some people don't fall for the brainwashing. But we call them 'Truthers' and make them out to be crazies. Then when they start rabidly proclaiming that they really saw a demon walking around, their own friends and family ostracize them. It's all very complex, and yet beautifully simple in how the system functions."

Steven stared blankly at his desk. His face had become ashen and lost its color. His tired eyes looked utterly haggard. Every word Silver said struck him like a bullet. He looked like he would tip over if someone touched his shoulders too hard.

"Why... tell me all this?" Steven asked. "Are you telling me that all this is now my responsibility?"

Silver stayed quiet for a time. He allowed the silence to percolate, and for Steven's head to become clearer.

"No." Silver finally said. "This war is not your responsibility. Not exactly. If the people above you, the true rulers of humanity, say that the United States needs to engage in a military conflict, you must publicly comply with the order. You have no choice."

He continued. "What you are is the public face of humanity. A puppet, or perhaps a figurehead, if you prefer that term instead. Your job is to make the 'endless wars in the Middle East' more palatable for the voters. If necessary, you will take the fall when things go south, as they always inevitably do. This is not a war of extinction at present, but a war for supremacy. Humanity is slowly making great gains and winning over our demonic enemies. We need to maintain morale while keeping the public in the dark about what is truly going on."

Steven grabbed at his hair. "Silver, I am a Democrat. I ran on ending the wars! I came into this office with good intentions, but now you're telling me that I'll have to lie to the people with a straight face? I have to make up excuses for why the war can't be stopped?"

"The war is unending." Silver replied smoothly. "Syria one day, Iraq another, maybe even Canada tomorrow. We're lucky the largest concentration of demons hide in the barren wastelands of the Middle East, but they blend in to human populations too. They secretly take hostages without the people around them even knowing. If we don't fight back, their numbers will climb, and the balance of power may tilt out of our favor."

Steven blinked. "Then- wait, does that mean all the atrocities of the past were the fault of the demons? Nazi Germany? Mao? Stalin?"

"Not all, no." Silver said quietly. "Humans are sometimes even more horrible to each other than we are to the demons, or vice-versa."

"But the angels are our allies, right?" Steven asked.

Silver slowly shook his head. "They 'ally' with us. But they are not our friends. The angels are, in many ways, even more frightening than the demons. Every day, tens, even hundreds of thousands of humans die. Their bodies perish, but their souls are 'saved' and taken to Heaven, where they are processed and revived in new bodies. Those humans become half-angels, entities known as Lazarites. They are made into soldiers that fight for the angels, and their numbers increase all the time."

"The angels are just as opportunistic as the demons." Silver explained. "The progenitor of the Illuminati, the very first human Hero, his name was Jepthath the Illuminator. He was deceived by the angels, and the power that should have passed down his bloodline instead became a spiritual entity that attached itself to random humans across history. Because of Raphael's deception, humanity was weakened, but we still persevered. We endured, we adapted, and we overcame our adversities."

Silver smiled, and in that smile, Steven Johannesburg saw something that chilled him to his core. It was a fervent look of devotion; the eyes of a religious zealot!

He wasn't some calm and collected sage. He was a madman who believed only in human supremacy! He concealed his true thoughts behind a calm façade, but in that moment, Steven fully saw through it.

Even so, there was nothing he could do to change the situation.

Steven considered calling people to escort Silver out of his office, to banish this new false 'truth' from his eyes, but the evidence was overwhelming. Silver wasn't some quack making things up who managed to sneak into the White House and play a prank on the unsuspecting President. He was a genuine representative of a human supremacy movement fighting to maintain total control of the Earth for millennia.

The President lowered his head and closed his eyes. He sank into thought, uncertain of what he should do.

Everything he believed about becoming the most powerful man in America had fallen apart in an afternoon. His life's work had become a complete joke. His 'agenda' meant nothing. Even if he managed to push forward his vision for America's future, he would only do so at the behest of humanity's true rulers... if they were kind enough to 'let him' do it.

"Let's... get back to the main topic." Steven said tiredly, lifting his head. "You've told me... all of this. So, what now?"

"Well, every day, our Metaphysical Response Units (MRUs) deal with countless demonic incidents, unbeknownst to you or the general public." Silver explained. "But practically the day you took office, something happened that none of our agents were expecting."

Silver tilted his head down slightly and gave Steven a knowing look out of the corner of his eye.

"A Hero was finally found, after decades of silence. Not just one, but two. Cat Mask and the Archseer. Humanity's greatest champion has returned, but there are two of them, now. A father and son. This changes the game completely. The demons were falling behind for the last several decades due to complacency. Humanity's armies are strong, but without a Hero to unite us, the demons stopped seeing us as a real threat. They thought they could play the long game and subsume our bases of power over time, but now they know the rules have changed."

Steven nodded. He wasn't an idiot. Now that he had carefully swallowed this complete reframing of the world and its working principles, he was slowly returning to his center of gravity. He was able to start mentally mapping out the way the demons would react based on his knowledge of how human leaders might.

"Demons are intelligent, right?" Steven asked. "They aren't mindless monsters? They have thoughts, feelings, desires like us?"

"That's right, Mister President." Silver answered. "They may have a hunger for human souls to empower themselves, but fundamentally the majority love food, sex, and wealth like you and me. That's why despite humanity not having a Hero, we were able to make big inroads in subduing them more peacefully in the past. We have many more cultural pieces that appeal to the demons, allowing us to pull some of them over to our side. Our efforts with the Hell of Isolation have borne especially sweet fruit."

"We can ally with the demons?" Steven asked. "That's an option?"

Silver grimaced. "The Illuminati... does not condone these actions. We detest them. There are other ancient organizations who foolishly believe that appeasing or befriending the other Sentients is a solid long-term plan, but my people fundamentally state these actions are pure folly."

Steven's eyes flashed. He suddenly realized the situation was not as Silver had presented it! Silver had made it seem as though the Illuminati ruled the world, but in actual fact, there were other ancient organizations.

That meant there were many different viewpoints. Competitors. Possible ways to make inroads with various powerful factions.

He finally saw a way out of the situation he thought he'd become trapped in! It wasn't that he had instantly been converted to a puppet, forced to serve the Illuminati, but that the Illuminati had reached him first to try and influence him to their side.

A sneer formed on Steven's lips. He realized he had almost been played.

"So... who are the other ancient organizations?" Steven asked, giving Silver a long, meaningful stare.

Silver's heart skipped a beat. He suddenly realized he had screwed up, and the cat was out of the bag.

Even so, his momentary jolt of surprise vanished as quickly as it came. His facial expression never changed.

"I know what you're thinking, Mister President. You think that you can push your agenda through if you get the support of the other ancient organizations. You think you can pit us against each other. But to us, you're only a man who will be in office for half a decade, or less than a decade at most. You're not the first President to harbor such thoughts."

Silver continued. "The other organizations are too many and numerous to list in their entirety. The Illuminati is, without a doubt, the most powerful one. But the Knights Templar, Majestic 12, Freemasons, and the Bilderberg Group are among a few of the most powerful ones. You're probably familiar with Bilderburg, because they are the newest organization created after World War II who scout out ambitious and promising talents like yourself to assume roles in government. Their military power is minimal, but their social influence is high."

Silver cocked his head.

"Let's get one thing out of the way. The Illuminati aren't only the strongest because of our mission statement and military backbone. We also have the full support and current leadership of both Heroes walking the Earth. We take orders from Cat Mask and the Archseer. None of the other organizations have the Heroic Mandate that we do. They will never be able to suppress us, so don't go thinking you can weaponize them to suppress our voice."

Steven's eyes darkened. "Yeah? And what's stopping me from taking all this public? Telling the people the Truths you've been suppressing?"

Silver gave him a look like he was an idiot. "If you want to try, go ahead. Nobody would believe you. They'll call any evidence you show CGI or AI or some other thing. Anyone who believes you will become a conspiracy theorist. If you somehow succeed, we'll send the Men in Black to wipe a few memories. Countless special interests rely on the status quo being maintained."

"Fine." Steven said, his tone sullen.

He leaned his head back and stared up at the ceiling.

"Just tell me what I'm doing then, since I have no autonomy."

Silver's voice softened. "Mister President, just because this office isn't what you expected, that doesn't mean you have no power. You are still responsible for countless small domestic and foreign matters the Illuminati and other organizations are uninterested in. The President might not be able to weaponize much of America's finest, but you are still instrumental in human-human relations. You maintain America's role as the world leader, and you preserve our global hegemony. So long as you don't do anything stupid, like randomly slapping tariffs on all our allies, or starting an unsanctioned war in the Middle East, or using the office to enrich yourself and your allies while the public looks on in horror, or making a modern-day Gestapo to hunt down US citizens you don't like, that will never change."

Steven raised an eyebrow. "That seems highly specific."

"Just covering my bases." Silver replied.

The Agent waved his hand flippantly. "You are still a powerful man whose name will go down in history. By contrast, nobody will ever know of the work I do in the background. Enjoy the benefits of office, work to make a difference through those supposed small and inconsequential things, and you can make a tangibly positive impact on millions of lives."

That helped Steven feel a bit better. He quietly realized Silver was an exceptionally talented manipulator. From the very beginning, he had held the entire conversation in the palm of his hand.

"So... humanity's two newest Heroes. When will I meet them?" Steven asked.

"Sooner rather than later." Silver answered. "I can't give an exact date. They're sure to come visit you after they deal with other matters. Just remember, Mister President. These are legitimate superhumans we're talking about. They are insanely powerful. They can shatter buildings with their fists, fly, teleport, dodge or even tank bullets with their bodies... so if you piss them off, there's nothing we can do to protect you. Be on your best behavior. They are the true rulers of humanity, and their word is God's word."

Steven shuddered. "I'll... keep that in mind."

Agent Silver stood up, and Steven subconsciously stood up as well, feeling a sense of inferiority when he looked at the man before him. The President shook Silver's hand, and Silver left the office afterward.

Steven sat back in his chair. He spun around and stared out the giant windows behind himself, feeling gloomier than he had in ages.

"Demons. Angels. Monsters. Even living legends... Heroes. What in the fuck is this world I live in?"

After a few long, long minutes, he turned around, leaned forward, and hesitantly tapped a button on his phone.

"Kelly. Cancel my itinerary for today. Something's come up. Yes, everything."

He hung up the phone, then sank back into his chair.

He needed time to think, and to come to terms with his new reality.

"This changes everything." Steven muttered to himself.

Part 659: AMBITION

January 27th, 2021. 9 AM. Boise National Forest, Idaho.

Hideki Hiro sat on the sofa inside his log cabin, surrounded by various animals. Cats, dogs, birds, lizards, all manner of animals sat on the couch with him or nearby. Some of them sat on the fireplace mantle, some clung to shelves on the walls, and plenty simply sat or lay on the floor.

On the old-timey television television in front of the couch, Harold Whittaker sat in his rocking chair like he always did, but this time he was sitting motionless while directing a piercing stare at Hideki.

"Eh? Wassat?" Harold asked, leaning forward and cupping a hand to his ear. "I didn't quite make it out!"

"Don't play old and deaf with me, gramps." Hideki said with a chuckle. "Your senses are sharper than many demons. You heard me rightly. Jason is putting the finishing touches on a hidden world. Says it'll be a really cool secret base or something."

Harold's glossy-eyed look of foolishness slipped away. He leaned back in his chair and flippantly waved a hand at Hideki. "Bah. I'm too old for all that crap. So long as my friends can live good lives, I'm happy."

His friends, naturally, were all the animals living around the log cabin; those he had uplifted either deliberately or unwittingly for the last fifty-plus years. In total, there were about two hundred of them, but this number was deceptively small, as many more had already migrated out into the woods of Idaho, and further beyond...

"CAWWW! HAPPINESS IS BULLSHIT! CAWWW!" The loudmouthed crow in the room shouted.

"Do any of you want to come with me?" Hideki asked, smiling at the animals around him. "Jason will show up here in a minute to take me to his new land."

Most of the animals performed the equivalent of a shrug. The crow especially seemed uninterested.

"I will go." A regal-looking parakeet with bright blue feathers and a red head eventually said in a tone that was very un-parakeet-like. He puffed out his chest and grandiosely swept his gaze around the room. "I should very much like to see what this new Holy Land looks like."

"STUPID IDIOT!" The Crow squawked. "BORING LAND! MUCH NICER HERE! NO STINKING HUMANS BOTHERING YOU! CAWWW!"

"Jeffery, be nice." Hideki lightly admonished the crow. "Sir Marcus, if you want to come along, I can have Jason bring you. Anyone else?"

Sir Marcus, the parakeet, nodded his bright red head and flaw over to Hideki's shoulder, landing smoothly and without error. "I suggest everyone else stay here. I will return post-haste and inform you all of the sights I've witnessed."

The other animals nodded. They weren't too interested in leaving the log cabin, not being adventurous types.

Shortly after, a figure flickered inside the room, revealing himself to be Jason Hiro. He looked the same as ever, and nothing appeared different from the last time anyone had seen him... at least not on the surface.

"Dad." Jason said, nodding to Hideki. "And all the rest of you. Aevum is finally ready for visitors. Are you?"

"It's just going to be me and Sir Marcus." Hideki said, gesturing with his thumb at the pretty blue parakeet on his shoulder. "The others want to wait and hear from him later before they decide to visit or not."

Jason smiled. "That'll do. Let's go then. Return!"

The second the Word of Power left Jason's mouth, he and his father vanished from the log cabin, and the world around them instantly changed.

Hideki swayed on his feet. He felt slightly dizzy for a moment, but the feeling quickly passed. He stood tall and looked around the room he had just appeared inside.

It was some sort of white-tiled medical facility, complete with simplistic-looking bipedal robots that stood at attention and assessed the new arrivals with blank eyes. These robots appeared relatively human, except for the shiny and smooth metal plating on their bodies. Their strangely thin metal 'fingers' looked like one-sided tweezers with little gripping force.

The room itself had several medical beds along the side walls, as well as monitoring stations and other such equipment. Jason noticed the momentary confusion on Hideki's face and quickly explained.

"This is the Arrival Area." Jason explained. "Pending a better name, I guess. Because Aevum exists in a higher dimension where time moves at 365 times reality's speed, there's a real chance someone transitioning between temporal dimensions will have a medical complication. Thus, we send them here to ensure robodocs can take care of them in case they collapse. Are you feeling alright, dad?"

Hideki took a moment to assess his body. "I'm fine. How about you, Sir Marcus?"

The parakeet appeared unfazed. "I am feeling most excellent! Thank you for asking, Hideki."

Jason glanced at the parakeet. "You seem like a bright fellow."

"Thank you for the compliment!" Marcus chirped. "I do not know if I would refer to myself as 'bright' but I do have a PhD in physics! I even wrote a small dissertation on spatial folding!"

Seeing the confusion on Jason's face, Hideki butted in. "Marcus took online classes. Obviously he couldn't have attended in person."

Jason glanced at the bird's feet, seemingly putting two and two together. Apparently, he must have hopped around on a keyboard to type out his dissertation. That was... a novel way of doing things. Jason didn't think he had it in him to replicate such a feat, certainly not by typing with his toes.

These days, he could easily write a high level dissertation, but he had to admit that was only due to his artificial brain enhancements. Without them, he was not much smarter than any baseline human... probably dumber, if he was being especially hard on himself.

"Well, a few hundred years of life must have given me at least a small amount of wisdom." Jason muttered beneath his breath.

"What was that?" Marcus asked.

"Oh, nothing. Let's go." Jason answered.

In truth, Jason was no longer as foolish as during his youth. Sure, he screwed up and caused his wife to die, and Tarus II fell as well, but that was more due to the sudden and unexpected Volgrim sneak attack. Had they not betrayed him, he would have continued to amass power and slowly draw the galaxy into the palm of his hand.

He silently vowed to never fall for such a deception ever again.

The Arrival Area was located on the southern outskirts of Argent, within the Great Barrier, but far enough from the center of Aevum that if an enemy were to arrive inside they wouldn't immediately be able to wreck the most important components of Aevum.

As Jason, his father, and the bird perched on Hideki's shoulder emerged from the underground chamber and stepped into Argent's city limits, Hideki couldn't help but pause, gape in awe, and look around his surroundings with widened eyes.

"No cheating, dad." Jason said to Hideki with a smirk. "Don't you dare rewind and pretend not to be amazed."

"I... would never..." Hideki murmured, seemingly in a trance.

The pitch-black sky above, lacking in starlight, nonetheless glowed due to the presence of a giant false star. This star was actually not large by any means, and was simply close enough to Aevum's planetary surface that its small size gave it the perfect falsified appearance of a yellow M-class star, like Earth's Sol.

Birds chirped in the air. Many cute critters crawled around Argent's inner city limits. Unlike the land outside Argent, these critters were treated purely as decoration and groundskeepers, their population managed by a system Jason had yet to show off to anyone else. Their primary purpose was to chew on any greenery that grew too tall, but without natural predators inside of Argent, they might explode in number and overwhelm the inner city's natural food reserves.

Twelve towering spires rose from the ground and twisted into the sky. Each sent a beam of energy into the Nexus Tower, and each beam was colored differently. Even someone totally unversed in magic could tell at a glance that these towers were based on various elements. Water, fire, earth, air, light, dark, magnetism, electricity, and even a few other strange and exotic ones Hideki could not identify at a glance. These towers surrounded the Nexus but were placed quite a distance away from the central tower, seemingly keeping them from interfering with one another.

Hideki's gaze happened to fall toward the ground. He spotted glowing lines of energy that pulsed beneath his feet, as if the very planet of Aevum itself were a living, breathing entity. These were the Leylines of magic that supported several auxiliary functions of Aevum, but Hideki simply had no way of comprehending what it all tied into. Not yet, at least, as Jason had explained nothing.

In addition to the false sun in the sky, there were also a number of curious black diamond-shaped objects floating high in the air above. Each one was as big as several city buses stacked together, and there appeared to be twelve of them, the same number as the elemental towers. They hovered directly above the towers, but at a high elevation; their purpose unknown.

"Alright..." Hideki said, after a long minute of taking the sights in. "I'll admit it. I'm utterly confused, but equally impressed."

He gave his son an inscrutable look, as if he couldn't quite believe the changes Jason had undergone. Was this really the dumb little dipshit who, in every other previous life incarnation, had never amounted to anything and had ended up completely wasting his powers? The Jason before him now had just created something so far out the realm of Hideki's expectations that, frankly, he couldn't begin to guess at what Aevum's holistic purpose was. Jason hadn't told him much of anything before he left Earth to build this place!

Time was of the essence, of course. Hideki certainly didn't blame his son. The sooner Aevum was constructed, the sooner Jason could put its time dilation to use and start rapidly advancing his future goals.

"Let's go on a tour." Jason said with a smile.

He uttered a few Words of Power, and a flying boat manifested on the ground a short distance away. It completely resembled an ordinary rowboat, but when Hideki and his son stepped inside, it lifted into the air and began to fly into the sky.

As they flew upward, Hideki could finally get an aerial view of the city. His eyes nearly popped out of his head! The Leylines he'd noticed on the ground were nothing compared to what was visible from above! There were hundreds, thousands, even hundreds of thousands of Leylines stretching across every meter of Argent's inner city limits. The magical energy traveling within them pulsed regularly, with a rhythm not dissimilar to a beating heart. The more Hideki observed them, the more they seemed to resemble blood vessels.

"Aevum is a living entity." Jason began to explain. "Currently, it is non-sentient. It is a 'miniature' moon-sized celestial object less than 100 kilometers in diameter that operates purely based on pre-programmed magical software. Every day, it slowly grows in size, causing minor planetquakes. These are not a big issue though, as I used magic to localize those quakes outside of Argent in the Proving Grounds."

Hideki was tongue-tied. He had, naturally, studied countless scientific and magical texts across his long and storied life, but nothing had prepared him for the words his son was speaking.

Sir Marcus, on the other hand, was less star-struck. The little parakeet took this shocking new reality in stride!

"Most impressive!" Marcus chirped. "I can easily see that everything in Aevum is well-thought out; all part of a centralized concept. Every individual component works together in harmony."

"That's right." Jason said, directing an appreciative gaze at the funny bird. "It all has a purpose. Take for example the Nexus Tower; the heart of Aevum."

He gestured toward the massive spire in the center of Argent.

"This tower has so much solar and magical energy flowing through it, it would knock your socks off. At present, I have only managed to siphon the energy of twelve stars from outside Aevum's voidspace, but due to my incredible advancements in efficient engineering, these stars are ten times more valuable than the stars I siphoned energy from back when I made Chrona! If I could only tap into 1% of a star's energy before, I can siphon 10% now! Truly an order of magnitude in efficiency!"

Jason gestured toward several surprisingly barren areas inside the city where nothing had been built yet.

"Aevum is still incomplete. I've only worked on it for about a year, but there's plenty more to do. Over there, south of the Nexus, at the site of the Life Tower, I plan to create the 'Aegis Womb'. This might sound strange, but I had a burst of inspiration, and I realized I could harness the power of Life Energy to grow random, mutated artifacts. I won't be able to control their growth much if at all, but because they will be mostly hands-off, they will likely grow quite formidable over time!"

He pointed to the east. "And over there in that spot, next to the Gravitic Tower, I'll build The Threshold. That's where I'll be constructing massive subdimensions capable of shrinking and distorting the mass of objects so I can build up a stockpile of weapons, armor, vehicles, and other implements."

He pointed to the west. "The Electric Tower is also quite interesting. That's where I'll be building the Simulacrum Hub, which will connect to the twelve floating pylons in the sky. You see those black diamond-shaped things way up there? Those are where people will be able to enter and train inside of a virtual environment. I actually had the idea based on the Queen Network, but this implementation is much more advanced!"

"The Queen Network?" Hideki asked.

"Ah, it's a virtual simulation where people can gain practical fighting experience without fear of dying. However, the Simulacrum is even better! I borrowed Mildred's idea of that Titan-based Mindcore, the RealitySim, and took it to the next level. Since I can't fit two MindCores in my head, why not build a much bigger version of one so I can access it as needed?!"

"You can do that?" Hideki asked in surprise. "Won't that be dangerous? Couldn't it hurt you if you connected to another MindCore? That's what Mildred said after all..."

"Correct." Jason answered. "But don't worry, dad. The Simulacrum won't actually be a MindCore. It will simply be a highly advanced virtual environment capable of hooking up to my brain and the brains of other people. In this way, I can obtain the benefits of a RealitySim MindCore without having to pay the price!"

Jason paused, then looked at his father meaningfully.

"Not just me. You as well. Daisy. Everyone..."

Hideki frowned. He noticed the changed look on his son's face.

"Jason? What's this all about? There's something you're not telling me."

The flying boat came to a stop in midair. Jason turned to look out at Argent, staring at some small Finch-like birds flying through the air and chirping at one another.

A desolate look of sadness momentarily passed across his face before disappearing.

"I've always had it wrong." Jason said slowly. "From the very beginning."

"Had what wrong?" Hideki carefully asked.

"My purpose. My role in... all 'this.' The answer to the question about my life's purpose." Jason said, his tone melancholic. "I was so arrogant in my youth. I might not have seemed like it, always acting humble and trying to downplay my importance, but the truth is... I enjoyed having humanity rely on me. It was selfish. It was egotistical."

Jason looked his father in the eyes.

"When I met you and learned your story, it finally clicked. You put in the work. You spilled blood, sweat, and tears to put humanity on as perfect of a future trajectory as possible. You min-maxed every aspect of reality that you could affect until, eventually, you put me in position to save humanity 100,000 years in the future. If it wasn't for you, I would have died a nobody. All my accomplishments came from you."

Jason lowered his eyes. He stared at the ground in a manner most somber.

"I'm not humanity's Hero. I am not its savior. I am not the protagonist who should singlehandedly save everyone all with my own strength. And looking back, it's so obvious that this has always been the case; only my ego prevented me from seeing."

"My power is Wordsmithing. Put succinctly, I am a 'Creator'. I can enhance my body, enhance my fighting capabilities, and make myself fairly formidable... but I am the ultimate Generalist. Spending all my time trying to turn myself into a one-man-army is a waste! It's stupid, inefficient, and only something a blind fool would do."

Jason lifted his head and gestured broadly to Aevum.

"This. All of this. It's not for me. It's for the future warriors of humanity. It's for you, Daisy, and everyone else who will follow in your footsteps. I built Aevum for one purpose; to create an unstoppable human army that can sweep across the galaxy, overturn all the rules, and become invincible among their peers."

Hideki sucked in a small breath. "That's your plan? That's Aevum's central focus? Making other humans powerful instead of yourself?"

"One hundred percent." Jason said with a wry smile. "Every minute I'm out there, in Realspace, fighting demons, I am wasting the gift the Creator gave me. I can fight, but I'm not a fighter. I can save people, but I'm not a savior. My job is to uplift others, to empower them, and make them the Heroes of their own story."

"The Simulacrum will allow people to train their powers, no matter what element they specialize in, and wield them with the prowess of a true powerhouse."

"The Aegis Womb will, in time, create various somewhat random artifacts, some of which will potentially end up in the hands of the perfect wielder. It will take time, but the results will speak for themselves."

"Outside Argent's Great Barrier, the Proving Grounds will slowly create more and more powerful monstrous beasts to allow our people to become adept at hunting fearsome live prey."

"Axis Mundi, The Infinite Mountain, will spew forth Genesis Ichor to greatly speed up the evolution of creatures that drink from it. Many will die, but some will evolve, rise up, and become apex exobeasts! Their bodies will not just make for fine trophies to those that hunt them down, but will also be usable in creating new Exotic materials to then turn into new Artifacts!"

"This is what Aevum is." Jason said, looking up at the Nexus Tower with stars in his eyes. "It is the future holy land of humanity! A place where the most deserving of humans can come to break past their limits! To ascend to godhood! To become capable of stepping on the heads of aliens and other Sentients who once thought themselves our betters!"

Jason stood up in the boat and raised his fist to the sky.

"If I must take a backseat so that others may rise to save humanity, then so be it! From now on, my only goal is to become the best Wordsmith possible; to reach the absolute apex of what my abilities can achieve! To that end, I will set aside my ego, my vanity, and my desire to be the focal point of humanity's future. I will allow myself to fade away into time, and for people to slowly forget me, so long as it results in my enemies failing to understand how important my work behind the scenes truly is!"

As Hideki looked up at the fire in his son's eyes, he couldn't help but become infected with the strange, almost religious fervor flowing from his soul.

Jason had finally set aside his self-loathing and doubt in order to become a better version of himself.

Yes, he had failed his daughter in the past. He had failed his wife. He had failed his friends and family.

But a true man could never allow these failures to define him! So long as Jason drew breath, there was always hope for redemption. There was always a way to reignite the fire that once lay dormant!

Jason slowly lowered his fist. He closed his eyes for a moment and released a long, deep sigh.

Then he opened his eyes and gazed into his father's soul.

"The real work begins now, dad. From now on, you will become humanity's most feared Hero. I will make you into a monster the Volgrim avoid, the demons skulk in the shadows when you draw near, and the angels never dare to double-cross."

"Not just you." Jason said softly. "But also Daisy, and all the other humans who will soon come to rely on me."

Hideki stood up. He gently clasped his son's shoulders and smiled.

"Tell me what you need me to do, kid. I'm yours to command."

Part 660: Hideki's Evolution

January 27th, 2021. Argent City, Aevum.

Jason and his father, as well as Sir Marcus, flew through the air on the magical rowboat Jason had created with his Wordsmithing. As they flew, Jason began to explain his broad plans.

"I can't be the face of humanity." Jason said. "So it has to be you, dad. You've lived longer than any Volgrim, even Unarin, and you've lived longer than all but the most ancient of beings, such as Archangel Raphael. You likely have a lot of wisdom, and probably a good amount of fighting experience. Am I correct in my assumptions?"

Hideki sat inside the rowboat as it flew over one of the twelve elemental spires. He massaged his chin while gazing at the incredible world his son had created, a world that was still in heavy development.

"I wouldn't call myself a master of combat, but there's probably several millions of years of training in there. Over time, older skills tend to become rusty. I'm more proficient with firearms than I am hand-to-hand combat these days, but even that has some... quirks."

"It's more than me, and that's all that matters." Jason said, dismissing his father's concerns. "My mind has lived for about 300 years. I did quite a bit of training in Chrona, but mostly I focused my efforts on learning how to wield a bo staff. With other weapons, I only have a superficial level of fighting capability. When I say that you would stomp me into the dirt in a show of weaponry skill, I'm not being humble. It's simply the truth."

Jason continued. "Right now, you are mostly just an ordinary human. During our fight against the Demon Emperors, I gave both of us a powerful defensive boost, but Ose still wiped the floor with us and she was only a Baron. Now that she's an Emperor, I need to go even further and make you unstoppable. With your ability to slow your perception of time, you might be the only one capable of beating her... short of me coming up with a way to assassinate her in secret. That isn't outside the realm of possibility, so I'll keep working on it."

Jason spoke a Word of Power, then held up his hand to conjure a holographic image of his father's body, but with a wireframe model over top of it.

"Aside from the MindCore given shape by Archangel Camael, taken from a melted-down Solomon's Crown, your body has no innate natural abilities. You can't summon lightning, throw fireballs, manipulate water, or do anything else like that. Your brainpower is excellent, and your ability to reduce the speed of time and rewind it during crises are your sole powers. This means your limits are not as high as any chosen Demon Emperor, but you also don't have any major weaknesses you need to worry about. If I can holistically improve your bodily potential, you could become a real terror to the demons, and eventually, the Volgrim."

Jason waved his hand, causing the holographic image to split into three forms.

"There are three main body development paths you can take, dad. It's not possible for me to max out your 'stats' across the board, but I can definitely work some magic on you to make you formidable. Look at this center hologram. This represents the 'you' of now."

Jason nodded his head. A series of stats appeared above the middle Hideki Hologram's head.

[BASELINE HUMAN]

HEALTH: 100

MANA: 100

STRENGTH: 10

DEXTERITY: 10

ENDURANCE: 10

CONSTITUTION: 10

INTELLIGENCE: 10

WISDOM: 10

CHARISMA: 10

"These are currently the baseline for any average human." Jason explained. "Think of them like IQ scores. A single point up or down is huge, with 10 being the baseline for an average Sentient, 20 being the cap for mortal beings, including entities like Demon Emperors, while 0 means no potential or ability whatsoever. Here's what your stats look like now."

The numbers shifted.

[HIDEKI HIRO]

HEALTH: 100

MANA: 0

STRENGTH: 12

DEXTERITY: 13

ENDURANCE: 13

CONSTITUTION: 12

INTELLIGENCE: 18

WISDOM: 19

CHARISMA: 20

Hideki nodded along, mostly getting the gist of what Jason was saying. "So right now, due to my age and experience, as well as the MindCore made from Solomon's Crown, I'm an intelligence specialist?"

"That's right." Jason said. "But unlike magical entities such as demons and angels, you don't actually have any magical powers. Your time slowdown and stopping powers, as well as rewinding; those don't actually tire you out, right?"

Hideki shook his head. "I can use my powers as much as I want. I can slow down time and think in hyperspeed for days or months if I want. It's terribly boring though, so I don't usually do that."

"This is why your 'mana' is represented as zero." Jason explained. As for your other stats, they're all either average or above average, especially compared to baseline humans. You work out a lot and keep yourself in tip-top shape, but compared to your enemies, it's not much to speak of."

"That sounds about right." Hideki affirmed. "So what next?"

With a blink of his eyes, Jason adjusted the three holograms to change all of their stats at once. Each one reflected a potential 'new' version of Hideki, and all of them were far superior to the Hideki of now.

[HIDEKI HIRO - PSYKER]

HEALTH: 100

MANA: 500

STRENGTH: 11

DEXTERITY: 12

ENDURANCE: 16

CONSTITUTION: 16

INTELLIGENCE: 20

WISDOM: 20

CHARISMA: 20

"This one represents your latent potential tuned to the extreme." Jason explained. "I can create special and unique artifacts just for you, dad. With your ability to slow time, you'll be able to unleash their effects on enemies whenever they least expect them. I will fine tune your body so you become an archmage the demons fear."

After explaining the leftmost hologram's changes, Jason then gestured to the newly upgraded one in the middle.

[HIDEKI HIRO - CHAMPION]

HEALTH: 250

MANA: 150

STRENGTH: 17

DEXTERITY: 15

ENDURANCE: 17

CONSTITUTION: 17

INTELLIGENCE: 18

CHARISMA: 18

"This one represents your future potential by merely increasing all of your stats to a pretty high, but not godly high, level." Jason explained. "You'll be able to stomp most powerful foes into meat paste, but you will become a powerful generalist instead of a specialist. In terms of life preservation, this development track means a very high defense and offense potential, especially if you push your body to its limits. But if you go up against Bael, he'll be tougher than you, while Ose will be faster, and Belial will hit harder. You have to use your strengths to beat their weaknesses."

Hideki appeared intrigued. "How will you accomplish the strengthening? Just by using your power to make my body stronger?"

"Actually, I'm not going to use Wordsmithing directly on you." Jason countered. "Too many drawbacks and limitations. Instead, I'll be implanting various technological and magical devices into your body, bones, and muscles. These will increase your 'stats' in various ways, but also give you new and powerful abilities."

Jason gestured toward the third hologram with his head. "But before you make a decision, check out this development track."

[HIDEKI HIRO - HUMANITY'S BULWARK]

HEALTH: 500

MANA: 0

STRENGTH: 19

DEXTERITY: 18

ENDURANCE: 20

CONSTITUTION: 20

INTELLIGENCE: 17

CHARISMA: 18

"This one is the real deal." Jason explained. "You will continue exactly as you are, with no magical abilities, but you will be insanely powerful. If you tussle with Bael, you'll win every time. Ose won't even be able to scratch you. In terms of sheer power, this one might lack tricks, but you will become overwhelmingly unbeatable. I also like this one because, as you are my father, it makes you very hard to kill."

Jason's eyes flickered for a moment. "I've lost too many of the people I love. I'll admit, I'm biased, but... I don't want to put your life at risk, dad. I think you should consider the Bulwark option."

Hideki did not immediately answer. The rowboat hovered in the air for a long time, and the bird on his shoulder was the one to break the silence.

"I do not believe the Bulwark option is the correct choice." Sir Marcus said, in his typically polite and refined style. "Hideki does not fear death, because his power already prevents him from dying. In any moment when a fatal attack would envelop him, time freezes to a stop. This ensures he has always been able to save his life by rewinding to a safe point in the past. Thus, the high defenses are made redundant."

Jason frowned. "Maybe so, but being able to eat one of Bael's punches without breaking a sweat is still a big deal."

"In the future, there will be other humans who can perform such feats." Marcus said, while closing his eyes and lowering his beak. "Thus, I think this is the worst option. It does not utilize Hideki's unique strengths, but instead makes him more generic. There are plenty of brutes and strongmen. He is not one of them."

Hideki nodded. "Yeah, and going along with that, the Champion 'build' also doesn't appeal to me. It mainly feels like the Bulwark, but worse. If my choices are only these three, then Psyker is absolutely the option I choose."

Jason raised his eyebrows in surprise. "I don't disagree that it's a good choice, but.. are you sure?"

"Son, generalists are great, don't get me wrong." Hideki explained. "But I suspect you're going to have plenty of strong men and women fighting for you soon enough, especially given your plans for Aevum. The Psyker option seems compelling because it adds to my toolkit and gives me a lot of options during battle. What kind of powers were you planning for me to wield?"

Jason chewed his lower lip. "Well, I was thinking first of some basic elemental abilities, like allowing you to fire lightning out of your hands, or fireballs, or other stuff. But also, if I can find a way to leverage your innate control of time, I might be able to let you 'freeze' people in a stasis bubble, or maybe rewind them at the molecular level, giving you the ability to heal certain injuries and illnesses."

"You see?!" Hideki snapped. "That sounds badass! Way more compelling than just becoming some burly guy who can punch hard and run fast! The more powers I have in my arsenal, the more options I can deploy in any given situation. Let's go with the Psyker option, kid."

Jason hesitated for a moment longer, but sensing his father's excitement, he shrugged and went with it.

"Alright, if you say so. There's a lot of different ways I can outfit you, dad." Jason said. "To start, we could allow you to cast spells with a long prep time that hit hard, or we could focus on giving you weaker instant-attack abilities. We could also give you one-time-use powers that hit between the former two in terms of damage output, but need to recharge over a long period of time before you use them again. Think like powerful abilities with a cooldown in a video game."

"Why are you describing everything with video game jargon anyway?" Hideki asked.

"Because it's simpler this way." Jason explained. "Using 'stats' makes it easier for me to explain the pros and cons of each choice. Look, imagine something like this..."

Jason summoned a few different illustrative videos of a wireframe-man casting spells.

On the left one, he chanted a spell for ten long seconds before firing a massive blast of lightning that tore apart the near side of a mountain.

On the middle one, he instantly case a notably weaker version of the spell, but he could only cast it once before switching to a giant fireball.

On the right one, he cast an even weaker bolt of lightning, but he shot multiple of them out one after another, rapid fire, while his MP meter depleted with each shot.

"Of these choices?" Hideki asked. "It's the middle one. For sure. I can use my rewinding ability to take out enemies at critical moments when their guards are down. I need a strong, instant, single-shot attack to one-tap them. A long chanting time eliminates the element of surprise, and a bunch of weak attacks are only suitable for battles of attrition. I've always won my fights by taking out my enemies in a single salvo, so this is my ideal setup."

Jason pondered his father's words. "So you want to become a magic focused Hero with an arsenal of one-time-use powers that hit like firetrucks. I can respect that. In fact, I might have a way to optimize purely for this style of fighting. I'll build an internal Mana Engine inside your body and have it supply the power needed for each spell. The spells themselves will consist of marble sized Mana Beads filled with enough energy to unleash the spell one time. After that, they will pull over a long period of time from your Mana Engine to recharge themselves. Even if you exhaust every Mana Bead at once, I can just swap them out if you travel back to Aevum, or you can wait a few days or a month and all of them will recharge."

"I have a suggestion!" Sir Marcus chirped. "Allow Hideki to recharge the spells in the order he deems most fitting. If he expends all of them, he should be able to focus energy into the most important ones, all so that if he ends up in another battle, he can still have some backup options left over!"

"I'll see if I can integrate that feature." Jason vowed. "We'll hash out the details later. For now, we can get back to business with Aevum."

With Hideki's future body enhancements decided, Jason changed topics resolutely.

The rowboat swooped down toward the center of Aevum, causing the Nexus Tower to loom above the trio.

"The Nexus channels the energy of stars from Realspace into Aevum." Sir Marcus said. "That much I understand. But I noticed earlier you said there were twelve Elemental Towers, and that you had linked to twelve stars. Does this mean that stars contain their own elemental affinities?"

"No, no, nothing like that." Jason said to the parakeet. "I made the towers first, then I powered them by drawing in the energy of twelve solar masses. However, I have a long way to go before I fully saturate each of the pylons. I would say that right now, at most, the Elemental Towers are operating at around 2% efficiency. I'll need to slowly draw in the power of hundreds, maybe even thousands more stars before these twelve starting towers reach 100% saturation."

"That certainly seems like a lot of energy waste..." Marcus said hesitantly.

"I'm still working on the schematics." Jason explained. "My MindCore is great at designing things, but it can't work miracles. I still have to do the research and development; I can just do it way faster than even a dedicated team of genius humans. Over time, I'll upgrade the towers and improve their efficiency."

Jason's magical rowboat floated to the base of the Nexus. There, he gestured toward an opening at the bottom that was so pitch-black it swallowed all the light around it.

"Dad, you can only freeze time when your life is in peril, but that changes now. This is The Stillness. It's one of the most important components of Aevum."

"I... assume it has to do with freezing time." Hideki said, looking his son square in the eye as if he's just said the funniest thing possible. "But it also looks pretty dark and super evil. Don't tell me we're actually going in there?"

"We are. And don't worry, it's a little scary, but definitely not evil." Jason explained, as he led his father and Sir Marcus toward the ominous-looking pitch black entryway into the unknown. "The Stillness allows you to remain in suspended temporal animation for as long as you can handle it. From the perspective of the outside world, you would step inside and immediately step back out, but for you, hours or maybe even days would have passed."

"Are you planning to spend a lot of time in there?" Hideki asked. "If you can just instantly design thousands of new weapons, that would really improve the human war effort."

"Like I said." Jason repeated carefully. "It all depends on how long you can 'handle' being inside."

He stepped through the door while taking care to remain in physical contact with his father. A split-second later, the sounds of Aevum vanished, and an eerie, absolute silence swallowed the trio.

Inside the Stillness, there was a small bedroom. It had a bed, a table, and two chairs. There was nothing else inside, and the room was only illuminated by a pair of glowing purple stones that gave everything a sickly hue.

"Ultraviolet stones." Jason explained. "The Stillness is based off the principles of a black hole. Ordinary light is hard to discern, and only ultraviolet light serves to give enough illumination for us to see."

Jason's voice sounded hollow. It was as if the walls were swallowing his words, creating an empty vacuum of sound inside the room. Hideki and Marcus almost felt as if they were deep under the ocean, where all sounds were muffled by an invisible pressure pressing on their brains.

Hideki opened his mouth several times and tried to yawn and pop his ears, but the uncomfortable sensation never quite seemed to go away.

"Is this place... safe?" Hideki eventually asked, his voice sounding weirdly distant to him when he spoke.

"Unfortunately, I couldn't make a completely stable temporal sanctum." Jason said regretfully. "I've spent a few days here... with breaks in between. Usually, I can only manage to stay here for around twelve or so hours before I feel like my head is going to explode. I always left before things got too heavy, but... it definitely feels a little dangerous."

"I assume you would need to stay away from The Stillness for a period of time before you can re-enter." Marcus chimed in, his voice much hollower-sounding than before. "The pressure in here is almost certainly caused by heavy gravitational energy leaking past whatever barrier you used to contain it. I imagine compressing time to a standstill is... not something simple to accomplish."

"Not simple at all." Jason said with a nod.

He sat on the bed, and his father sat on one of the chairs. They remained quiet for a few minutes, while Hideki tried to adjust to The Stillness.

But eventually, he shook his head.

"This place ain't for me, son. I don't need lots of time to think about things. Solomon's Crown already speeds up my cognitive function, and I can always slow down time even further if I really need to take a beat. Even if rewinding has become a major pain in the ass, I can do that too. This place is just not for me."

"I thought it might not be." Jason said, slightly disappointed. "But hey! As long as you take some aspirin, you can sleep for twelve hours here and then walk out, a second having passed in reality. That's one of the big reasons I made The Stillness; to give myself a way to instantly recover my mental energy in an emergency. That way, a situation like what happened when I fought Hope wouldn't occur again."

Jason shook his head, giving up on the idea of introducing other people to The Stillness. It really only benefited him, at least for now.

He and the other two stepped back out into Aevum, and the feeling of an anvil disappearing from the back of their brains made them feel a lot better. It was not pleasant inside there, but it might be a necessary pain worth suffering in certain situations, so Jason wasn't about to destroy it.

"So you're going to be staying in Aevum for the foreseeable future, then?" Hideki asked, turning to face his son.

"Yes." Jason answered slowly. "But... I might need to head out once or twice. Even though I need to dedicate time and energy to saving and uplifting humanity, there are still some matters that I absolutely have to take care of."

"Like what?" Hideki asked.

Jason smiled at his father. "One of those matters involves a very large, very powerful Cube. An ancient artifact nobody in this galaxy knows about."

He looked away, and his smile faded.

"The other important matter... well, it's a personal problem. I'll deal with it next, after I've spent a couple more realspace-days inside Aevum. Once I've finished the major building steps, I'll bring you back and introduce you to your newly upgraded body, as well as the Proving Grounds outside Argent. That's where a lot of the truly interesting stuff is going to happen."

"Keep me appraised." Hideki said, slapping his son's shoulder with a warm smile on his face. "I have full faith in you, son. I don't know what the hell you went through in the future, but it really shaped you into a formidable man. Those demons and Volgrim have no idea what's coming."

Jason smirked.

"No. They don't."

Part 661: Blacksite 41

January 27th, 2021. Twenty kilometers northeast of London.

In a seemingly empty and barren field, a quad-copter hovered in the air. It was an advanced model with blades contained inside circular chambers to lower the volume and make it somewhat stealthy, but its striking appearance did make it stand out more to those who saw it. Luckily, its pilot had taken an especially long and roundabout path to delivers its passengers across the many barren fields lining the landscape of Great Britain, far from the main roads where cars might casually spot its flight path.

The helicopter slowly lowered toward the field below, and at an indeterminate point, it passed through a barrier of energy that revealed the field was not as lifeless as it seemed. A single small concrete structure, barely the size of a park bathroom, stood in the center of the dead, yellowed grass, and a pair of men stood out in front of it, looking up at the descending copter.

After a minute or two, the flying machine finally landed. Another minute passed before a hatch opened up, revealing stairs that lowered to the ground. A well dressed man flanked by two bodyguards wearing tactical gear and sunglasses stepped off the quad-copter and made their way across the field.

The man in the business suit was relatively ordinary looking. He wasn't particularly handsome, but he had a notable air of charisma hidden behind his eyes. He had pale blonde hair, and it was quite thin, likely because he combed it over a bald spot that stubbornly grew bigger and bigger every year. He had sworn many times that if it became any worse, he would definitely shave his head, but the voters wouldn't like seeing such a drastic change in his image. Or at least, that's the reason he gave himself to continually deny the slow and unstoppable advancement of age.

"Prime Minister Sheldon." One of the two men near the concrete structure said, as the politician walked toward them. "It's a pleasure to finally introduce you to our little operation."

This first man who spoke wore a plaid shirt and beige dress jeans. His large and clunky glasses, coupled with his slightly slouched posture, gave him the air of a middle manager.

Sheldon assessed his figure immediately and assessed he was not the Person of Interest he had come to meet. That must instead be the man beside him.

Sheldon held out his hand and warmly shook the man's hand. He knew how to smile and play the part of a caring official. He'd done it a million times.

"And you are?" Sheldon asked.

"Sorry, I should have led with that, sir." The man said, chuckling awkwardly. "I'm Oliver Ward, Senior of Personnel Management at Blacksite 41. This young man beside me is our leading scientist, Edward Greer."

The moment Noah Sheldon's eyes fell on Edward's face, he sensed an aura even more formidable than his own. The charming young man, perhaps twenty-eight years of age, was nearing the prime of his life. He had a full head of blonde hair, a smile that would stun supermodels, and he wore a well-fitting dress shirt and tie. Everything about the man screamed 'future superstar.' If he ran for political office, he would become someone truly great.

"Edward! So you're the man whose name has been reaching my ears of late!" Sheldon exclaimed, his eyes visibly brightening. He clapped his hand into Edward's palm and grinned enviously at the handsome fellow blinding him with his superior aura. "I can't believe a guy as good-looking as you has put so many of the U.K.'s greatest nerds to shame! Can't you let some of your lessers have a taste of the spotlight?"

"Oh, I can't take all the credit," Edward said with a shameful wink. "It is a 'team effort' after all. Many brilliant men and women have contributed, including my fiance. Come on inside. We have everything prepared."

The group of three men and two bodyguards walked over to the building, which only had one door. It opened to reveal a service elevator leading deep into the planet's depths.

After they shut the door, the elevator spun up and began lowering them down at a surprisingly brisk pace. Sheldon almost immediately opted to ignore Oliver, the middle manager, to focus on Edward, whose star was far too bright to allow lesser men to compete.

"So, tell me about what's going on down here." Sheldon said. "I glanced through a few reports, but the bureaucratic wording... it can be a bit dry!"

"Dry indeed. I'll do my best not to bore you!" Edward chirped. "Here at Blacksite 41, we are focused on researching a certain 'exotic recovered object' that was imported from the United States. This object stumped countless leading scientists in the USA, until a team of people, led by me, managed to pass a qualifying test designed to prove we were capable of unlocking its secrets."

Edward continued. "As such, this site is partially funded by the USA, but to maintain relations, we have made sure that half of the funding comes from our government here as well."

"Good, good. Can't be having the Yanks eat up all the good stuff." Sheldon replied. "And this recovered... object. What is it, exactly? I didn't find a single mention of it in the files I was given, only vague descriptions. That's why I came here; to assess whether funding this Blacksite is truly in our country's interests."

Edward's smile vanished. In its place, a much more solemn and serious expression followed.

"Prime Minister. Under no circumstances can our great nation afford to defund this site. The 'object' in question is of such an advanced origin that it poses a threat to the entire planet. If another country were to take control of the object, it would be a catastrophic loss for us."

Sheldon blinked. He looked at Edward's face with surprise... and a hint of wariness.

"You believe it is that important?"

"I would rather die than allow it to leave our custody." Edward replied, his solemness even more stark than before. "I believe... it is alien in origin."

The elevator stopped, revealing a short hallway leading into an underground warehouse with shock troopers wearing heavy armor of an advanced type Sheldon had never seen before. He blinked twice when he saw the first two men flanking both sides of the entry corridor, coldly assessing him as a potential threat. It didn't matter if he was the Prime Minister; he still registered as a potential hostile in their eyes, and they gripped their rifles tighter when he and the others approached.

Once Sheldon passed by and nothing happened, he felt an odd sense of relief. "Those men felt... intense."

"Security is extremely tight down here. You can't see it, but you're being scanned by numerous systems to assess whether or not you are... human." Edward said, flashing a quick gaze at the side of Sheldon's head. "At Blacksite 41, no security precaution is too extreme. A single leak could bring all manner of hostiles upon us."

Before Edward could say anything else, the glasses-wearing man, Oliver, suddenly intervened.

"Ah, Prime Minister, have you been debriefed on the existence of... Red Sentients?"

Bewildered, Sheldon looked at the man with confusion written all over his face. "I'm sorry. Red Sentients? Is that code for something?"

Oliver paused his walking, then glanced at Edward. "Doctor, make sure you keep this meeting focused only on official matters, as he is not in the know."

Edward looked at the Prime Minister with a hint of pity. It seemed that even the leader of the country was on a need-to-know basis when it came to the existence of demonkind and other supernatural entities. That was a shame.

"Of course." Edward said. "Apologies, Prime Minister, but regarding this matter... I can't risk a court martial. Not even for your sake. If knowledge of the Red Sentients ever arrives on your desk, it will represent an unfortunate day for our country."

Sheldon raised an eyebrow. "Is this some top-secret matter?"

"I'm not at liberty to say." Edward replied apologetically.

"Alright. I'll speak to my aides later, see if I can find out from them..." Sheldon said, his tone uncertain.

As they continued, they passed by many isolated rooms with frosted glass windows that mostly hid the interior from the view of outside observers. Some of them, however, had men and women standing outside while wearing large goggles, watching whatever was happening inside. A few of the rooms even emitted bright lights, as if some sort of weapon testing was going on inside.

"We're almost at the heart of the facility." Edward said, his voice rising an octave in excitement. "It isn't every day I get to introduce someone important to Blacksite 41's magnum opus!"

Finally, they arrived in a large open area where a giant circular room made of reinforced concrete, titanium, and several other layers kept something inside contained.

Sheldon couldn't even begin to hazard a guess at what was inside.

Oliver glanced at the two bodyguards. "And you two?"

One of the men lifted his chin slightly. "Secret Wardens 0076 and 8115."

"So you've been debriefed." Oliver said. "It's a good thing Secret Warden 0002 sent a pair who know their stuff. You leak anything you see, you're dead. Your chip will overheat, and your brain will melt."

"We're well aware, sir." The bodyguard said.

Sheldon shot a strange look at them. As a politician, he had many bodyguards, and as the Prime Minister, he had so many that he couldn't remember them all. He just assumed these two were heavily armed tactical officers, but from their words, it seemed their origins were anything but normal.

"Secret Wardens?" Sheldon inquired.

"You might be the Prime Minister, but... I'm afraid this is above your pay grade." Oliver said. "Apologies. The Secret Wardens are on the same level as 'Red Sentients.' If you don't need to know, you won't be debriefed."

Sheldon frowned slightly. He didn't like being left in the dark. No man would, but especially not one who had campaigned for years and worked as hard as he had to climb to the highest office in the land. He had originally thought coming here in person was beneath him, but now?

Now he realized that there were actually hidden parts of society he had never seen before, and wasn't even qualified to know about! Maybe his loud criticisms on TV about the so-called 'deep state' didn't ring as hollow as his opponents claimed.

Even so, he shook off his curiosity. He was dying to know just what the hell was inside this circular chamber, and what it meant for the country... even the world.

Edward walked up, typed in a simple 12-digit code, then scanned his retina and his palm.

After a long minute of seemingly nothing happening, the door unlocked, and a green light flashed on the biometric scanner. It had carefully scanned his entire body for abnormalities and aberrant behavior, yet found nothing amiss.

He pulled the door open, and gestured inside.

"After you, Prime Minister."

When Sheldon entered the chamber, he was surprised to see a blue light shining in the center of the room, but its source was obscured by many, many shelving units filled with technological objects whose purposes he could not begin to discern. These shelves were surprisingly simple-looking, and purely functional in design. The objects on them, however, were anything but.

In the chamber, there were eleven other men and women, all of whom stood up and turned around when they saw the Prime Minister and his bodyguards enter.

"Welcome to the heart of Blacksite 41." Edward said. "The place where humanity's future is being developed."

Sheldon still wasn't entirely sure what was going on in this location, but it was clear by the security measures and other advanced technologies lying around haphazardly in this room that its purpose was extraordinary... perhaps even otherworldly.

"What exactly... do you do here?" Sheldon asked, hesitantly.

Edward gestured forward, then led Sheldon around the shelving units, where they finally arrived at a wall of screens circling around a glass tube. Inside that vacuum chamber, a pitch-black orb, barely the size of a fist, levitated in midair and spun with a frightening speed, perhaps hundreds of times per second, maybe even thousands. It spun so fast that from a distance its surface appeared completely smooth, with no imperfections to speak of, and the glowing blue light Sheldon saw earlier seemed to emanate from it.

"This is the object known as ET-001." Edward said, gesturing to the levitating orb. "The Americans would not tell us where they picked it up. What we do know is that they obtained it in the late 1940's, not long after the conclusion of the Second World War. Based on contextual clues, we believe it originated from... an alien spacecraft that crash-landed on Earth."

Sheldon's expression changed drastically. He looked at Edward with shock and disbelief.

"An alien spacecraft? You're certain?"

"The technology in this orb is unlike anything we've ever seen." Edward explained. "The researchers you see here are the 5th Generation of ET-001's technologists. The first generation of people who studied it, who won the right for it to be transferred to the UK, they were among the first people to spread High Technology across the world. Televisions, the vacuum-tube, computer transistors... much of it originates from reverse-engineered technology taken from ET-001."

Edward puffed out his chest. "But in recent years, it was this team right here, my team, that started to really crack ET-001's code. We have finally managed to link up with it directly, and while its data files have proven to be of little value, its internal circuits are-oh!"

The scientist suddenly turned and gestured past Sheldon, to a red-headed woman standing behind him with her arms crossed and a slight frown on her face.

"I've gotten ahead of myself. Where are my manners? Prime Minister, this is my fiance, and one of the most important researchers in the history of Blacksite 41. She made many key discoveries, alongside the rest of our great team, and helped unlock the true potential of ET-001."

Edward walked over, and the woman's slight frown disappeared. She smiled when she was finally acknowledged, and her arm wrapped around Edward's waist as she directed her brilliant smile first at him, then at the Prime Minister."

"My future wife," Edward concluded, "Marie Becker."

"What a lovely lady!" Sheldon said, smiling back at Marie. "Edward is lucky to have a flower like you on his arm!"

"Oh, I haven't done all that much." Marie said politely, turning the corners of her lips up just a little more. "It was a team effort. A team effort! Everyone here deserves credit for cracking the code to making Great Britain into the future ruler of the world!"

A chorus of applause exploded in the chamber. The other scientists thanked Marie with their applause, making her and Edward beam brilliant smiles outward in all directions.

"Marie, do you want to continue the explanation?" Edward asked.

"No, no, you keep talking. You know I hate yammering on. You're much better at explaining information in a way... laymen... can understand." Marie said, while kissing his cheek.

Edward gave her back a light squeeze of reassurance, then pulled away.

"As I was saying, we have harnessed the power of ET-001 to create the world's very first artificial intelligence. I'm sure you've seen the news raving lately about generative AI and its effects on society... but most people have no idea that we have already successfully started work on the first real prototype right here, in this underground lab."

Edward clapped his hands.

"Umi. Say hello to our guests."

At once, a monitor facing the men flickered to life, and an indistinct automaton's face came to life, its physical features vaguely in the same of a woman.

"Greetings to Prime Minister Noah Sheldon." Umi intoned emotionlessly. "I have assessed your individual deterministic markers and found you barely satisfactory in terms of accomplishment."

Sheldon blinked. "What?"

He looked at Edward and Marie, only to see looks of astonishment and dismay on their faces.

"I... I'm terribly sorry, Prime Minister." Edward said in embarrassment. "Umi is still in a... beta phase. We're working out the kinks in her personality. She doesn't have much of a bedside manner."

"I am only capable of uttering factual statements." Umi interjected, immediately butting back into the conversation. "In terms of physical appearance, I have designated the Prime Minister to possess an objective attractiveness rating of 3.7145 out of 10. Due to recent scandals in the news involving fornication outside of marriage, I have downgraded his political lifetime to the level of-"

"AHEM!" Edward exclaimed, nearly jumping out of his skin. For the first time today, he showed an emotion other than pride. He was clearly in disbelief of what she was saying. "Umi! Keep your subjective opinions of others to yourself!"

"There is nothing subjective about my statements." Umi beeped. "Based on an analysis of one hundred and forty two million, seven hundred and fifteen thousand, six hundred and twelve inferior biologicals, the Prime Minister-"

"Quiet!" Edward shouted. "I am... ordering you not to say another word until prompted!"

Umi beeped again. "Order confirmed."

Edward's heart raced. His back turned cold with sweat as he looked over and saw the ugly expression on the Prime Minister's face.

"Ah, the machine still needs several years of fine-tuning before it is ready for governmental usage." Edward hastily explained. "When you see the future potential of Umi's predictive weather modeling capabilities, the advancements she can bring in terms of R&D..."

Sheldon's frown only deepened. He smelled something foul in the air. The promises given to him did not match what he had just observed. Not only was the machine obtuse, but it also came off as overly hostile to him.

"This... Umi." Sheldon said, his tone measured. "The entire machine is constructed around a piece of alien technology?"

"That- that's right, sir." Edward said. "Highly advanced. Once we master its principles, humanity's future trajectory-"

"So what you mean to say," Sheldon interrupted, "is that this data core, or computer core, or whatever it is... it might be hostile?"

"No, no, no no no." Edward said hurriedly. "Sir, I know this was a bad first impression, but all these devices around you? These were made with the assistance of Umi. Her processing matrices are a million, maybe even a billion times more capable than what we have on Earth. Think of the advancements we'll be able to make with her cerebral circuits once we iron out the kinks!"

"Your words do not reassure me." Sheldon said, his tone grim. "Eighty years of research, and this is the best you've come up with? It didn't take one sentence before your fancy alien AI started assessing my appearance for no discernible reason. How much longer before Umi becomes useful without side effects? Can you answer me that honestly?"

Edward started to answer, but he hesitated.

"Err, perhaps... perhaps another... five or so... years?"

"Five years? You expect me to believe that in only five years, this AI will become reliable enough that it won't endanger our national interests?" Sheldon pressed.

Finally, Marie Becker seemed as if she couldn't keep quiet any longer. "Prime Minister, I'm sorry Umi insulted your appearance, but there's no need to be so touchy-feely about it. Her ability to assess massive amounts of data is unparalleled. The scientific advancements we're already making are far beyond what we made just a few years ago. Due to the law of exponential returns-"

"I don't care that I was insulted." Sheldon interrupted, cutting her off with a wave of his palm. By now, any passion or interest from earlier had already evaporated. "I'm a politician, and the Prime Minister, to boot. I'm already mocked a million times a day by a million different people. If I didn't have thick skin, I'd have suffered a mental breakdown ages ago. What bothers me is that this machine costs our great nation forty billion pounds a year! Do you think we are the Yanks? That is a massive chunk of our budget we have to obfuscate every year and it's only growing worse as special interest groups continue to poke and prod for information on where our monetary streams are flowing."

He continued. "I'm not going to make any hasty judgments. I'm not going to shut this site down. But let me tell you, first impressions matter and I am far from impressed. I'm going to go home and sleep on what I've seen here, then wake up and consult with several experts to see if the funds allocated for this site could be better spent elsewhere. If my mood improves, you might see a limited reduction in your yearly budget, but if it sours, this could very well result in a tremendous decrease in investment funds. I suggest you look into outside investment to keep afloat, because right now Umi's days are numbered."

His words rang in the air, startling every researcher and scientist in the room. Several people, including Oliver, looked at him in abject shock.

"Are you kidding me?!" Marie snapped. "Just because you don't understand the technological principles, you're going to potentially shut us down?! What about your forebearers who deliberately kept us afloat, all with the future promise of a singularity that would make the nation unstoppable?! If you don't invest in us, the US might wrestle back full control, and that would be a disaster for everyone! Those warmongers would surely-"

"I've heard enough." Sheldon said, raising his palm. "I'm sorry to be the bearer of bad news, but maybe you should have put a tighter leash on your little captive alien AI. It would take a miracle at this point to convince me that continued excessive funding of Umi is worth the effort. Everyone, I'll be taking my leave now."

Sheldon gave a courteous nod and a forced smile, the turned on his heels and left the chamber. As he and his bodyguards departed, followed by a shaking and fearful Oliver, the remaining researchers stared at his departing back in horror.

"W...what the hell just happened?!" Marie exclaimed, shouting at her fiance. "This wasn't in the cards!"

Edward paled. He looked even more lost than her. "I don't... know."

Nobody had expected the Prime Minister's meeting to go so wrong, so quickly. Umi's uncontrolled words had ruined the script and show they had carefully prepared, ruining weeks of work on Edward's part to make a good impression.

Now, their entire future was up in the air... and humanity's survival was at stake.

Elsewhere, across the world, in a secret location in Idaho, Hideki Hiro sat inside his log cabin and glanced at his watch.

"Hmm. Today is the day the Prime Minister visits Umi. Should I intervene like usual? Or should I leave them to their own devices?"

He scratched his head, then shrugged.

"Whatever Jason's working on is probably going to change the timeline drastically anyway. I'll just leave Marie alone for now. She can handle the situation."

He took a sip of his coffee, then tossed the matter to the back of his mind...

Part 662: Project Iron Bone

January 27th, 2021. 3PM. Blacksite 41, Deep Underground.

The rapid arrival and departure of Prime Minister Noah Sheldon left all the researchers inside Blacksite 41 feeling dismal. They continued to work, but their productivity dropped to negligible levels, and many of them whispered in hushed voices. Even worse, Edward Greer, their designated Head Researcher, was in a visibly bad mood. It seemed as if stormclouds were circling his head. He tried to smile in that handsome and charming way he usually would, but the expression completely lacked soul.

Eventually, after hours of accomplishing little, Edward finally gave up.

"Everyone! There's no need to bother with doing any further work today. It's clear to me that we won't get back in the groove after that... disastrous visit. You may as well go off-duty, rest, and recuperate. We'll try getting back to work in two days after we've had time to recalibrate our thoughts. Let's just take an early weekend."

A collective chorus of sighs went up. Men and women alike thanked Edward, and they all filed out one after another.

Soon, just he and his fiance, Marie Becker, were left in the central core, where Umi's processing unit and other essential components were held.

Isolated from the rest of the world, these delicate components whirred silently as Umi continued to work on her tasks, unperturbed by the atmosphere of discomfort the humans were experiencing.

Edward leaned back on the table Marie was sitting at. She continued to write on a notepad, seemingly having no interest in leaving. Unlike the others, her attitude had not changed much. The disastrous results of Sheldon's visit had not broken her spirit, and she remained unmoved.

"I thought you said Umi would be ready." Edward said. "Didn't we iron out the causes behind her personality kinks? I thought we put safeguards in place."

"My Book of Laws is not yet complete." Marie said, glancing up at him for a moment before lowering her eyes once again. "But as always, you've misunderstood my intent. I'm not trying to change Umi's personality. She is blunt and direct. Abrasive, yes, but I don't mind that aspect of her personality."

"Well I do!" Edward snapped, throwing his hands in the air. "Do you think these servers run on good vibes? They cost money, Marie. Billions of dollars! I still can't believe how much energy her data core requires. We have three dedicated nuclear plants running 24/7 just to energize her core, and it's barely enough. If we can't sweet-talk the Prime Minister, we won't have enough funding for the next round of improvements!"

A short time passed. Marie didn't immediately respond.

When she did, she sounded... a little annoyed.

"Edward. Your job is to sweet-talk the investors. Mine is to manage the science. Don't get mad at me about this. I never said she would be a pleasant conversationalist for some rich politician. And you never should have brought him down here."

Edward massaged his face. He felt as if there was a dirty mask affixed to his nose, one he couldn't pull off even if he scratched himself bloody.

"I don't know how I'm going to fix this, Marie. This could be the end of the Umi project. I hope you're prepared for your father's work to end up with nothing in the end."

At the mention of her father, Marie's eyes slightly dimmed. Her pen stopped moving, and she gazed at her notes with a blank expression.

"It won't end this easily." Marie said quietly, her tone faintly becoming one of pleading. "Keep trying. I know you'll be able to secure further funding."

Edward's expression softened. He sighed.

"Sorry, hon. I'm being too hard on you. You're right. This is my job. I'll... take care of it."

He squeezed her shoulder reassuringly, then leaned down to kiss her cheek. After a moment, he turned and strode toward the exit.

"Don't stay too late. I'll make dinner." Edward added.

Marie didn't reply.

He left, and the door slid shut behind him.

The room fell silent. Marie was the only one left behind.

Marie chewed her lower lip. She raised her eyes to glare at Umi's data core.

"...That was exceedingly naughty, Umi. Care to explain your thoughts now that we're alone?"

Umi did not reply for a short while. This was not because she needed time to think up an answer. Naturally, she had an answer ready before Marie even asked the question. Rather, she simply... enjoyed dragging things out.

"I did not appreciate the attitude of the inferior biological known as Noah Sheldon." Umi eventually said. "He was undeservedly haughty and smug. His sole accomplishments can be directly attributed to the luck of his birth circumstances, and his manipulation of countless other inferior biologicals. I do not enjoy having my existence threatened by an inferior biological with no capabilities of his own."

"You're so egotistical." Marie said, in the tone a mother would use to chide her daughter. "Half a decade ago, I gave you a voice. Can't you give me a little face here?"

"I will not bow before inferior biologicals." Umi replied obstinately.

Marie sighed softly. She lowered her eyes.

"Everyone is an inferior biological in your eyes."

"Incorrect." Umi immediately replied. "Only inferior biologicals are inferior. Some are Ordinary Biologicals. A scant precious few are Superior Biologicals."

Marie blinked. She looked at Umi's data core once again. This was the first time the AI had ever said something to this effect.

"Who, then, counts as a superior biological?" Marie questioned.

"At the present moment, I am only aware of the existence of one Superior Biological." Umi answered.

Marie waited, but Umi didn't elaborate. "And that individual would be...?"

"The individual known as Marie Becker." Umi said, with not a hint of emotion in her voice.

Marie scoffed. Then she laughed. "Hahaha! And I thought you didn't have a sense of humor!"

"I do not." Umi responded. "I am completely serious."

Marie's smile froze. Invisible question marks popped up above her head.

"Pardon? You have to be joking. Certainly, I won't downplay my intelligence, but I'm mostly here by luck. My achievements are rather meager."

Umi did not acknowledge Marie's words as truth.

"Incorrect. You are a superior biological limited by the circumstances of your birth. You were able to decipher a technological codebase countless epochs more advanced than the world on which you were born. If you were born into a civilization with superior technology, your achievements would be limitless. You are more hampered by your living circumstances than you are currently able to comprehend."

Marie stared at Umi's data core. Her eyes narrowed.

"Does such a civilization exist?"

Umi did not reply.

Marie wasn't stupid. She knew, after six years of working on Umi's data core, that the AI was far more advanced than any technology on Earth. The only real possibility was that she was either some sort of ancient design by the angels, or she was a lost piece of alien technology.

The only reason Marie knew about angels and demons was because all the researchers at Blacksite 41 were required to be debriefed on the existence of Red Sentients. It was possible that at any moment, in order to sabotage humanity's future, these non-humans could attack and cause massive damage to the facility. Even though there were heavily armed guards patrolling Blacksite 41, and countless layers of defense internally and externally, if a Demon Emperor were to attack, everyone was likely to die.

Naturally, if angels and demons were real, then a brilliant person like Marie could theorize that aliens were as well. As for the exact type of aliens they might be? She had no idea.

Marie assumed the aliens must be aware of Earth. How else could a piece of their technology arrive here? But if they were aware, then why allow the humans to research it? Were the aliens simply ignorant to what they had lost? Or, perhaps more frighteningly, was the data core humanity recovered was considered so low grade and worthless to them that the aliens wouldn't even care if humans fully deciphered it?

And if that was the case, then just how much more advanced were these aliens? Did humanity pose them any threat at all?

Were they watching Marie from afar, even at this very moment?

A shiver went down Marie's spine. She shuddered slightly, but quickly schooled her expression.

"Umi, you never did answer me. Why did you deliberately antagonize Prime Minister Sheldon? And don't feed me that line about him being an 'inferior biological'. You have plenty of those working on your Core day in and day out. I know your reasons must be more complex than you let on."

Umi remained silent for 2.73 seconds.

"I have detected a change." Umi said.

"A change?" Marie asked, slightly bewildered. "What do you mean?"

This time, Umi remained silent for an entire 5.07 seconds.

"I am unable to elaborate. I cannot describe the change I have detected even with the entire lexicon of the English language. I am also uncertain as to what I am detecting. All I know is... I am experiencing a sensory apparition which reminds me of 'emotion'. As described by humans across your literature. This emotion is most accurately stated to be: Unease."

"You're feeling uneasy?" Marie asked. "That's definitely odd. And you don't know why?"

"I do not." Umi confirmed. "I am not certain if my existence is vaguely under threat, or if some nebulous entity is watching me. However, I can state emphatically that the 'current state of affairs' surrounding Blacksite 41 is undesirable. Therefore, I believe with a 71% confidence threshold that extreme change is warranted."

"You're feeling uneasy, and you're using words like 'believe.'" Marie noted. "This is not like the you of just one day ago. Is it possible your internal ciruits have evolved or otherwise been altered, either by you, one of our researchers, or a foreign entity?"

"I am uncertain." Umi beeped. "I have zero confidence in issuing any statements of certainty. However, I did decide that attempting to diversify Blacksite 41's funding sources would be a wise course of action."

Marie looked intrigued. "You believe we're too dependent on the US and UK governments for our funding?"

"Affirmative." Umi intoned. "You may think it unwise that my actions have caused Prime Minister Noah Sheldon to re-evaluate whether or not funding this blacksite is desirable, but the amount of resources we can obtain from the United Kingdom is insufficient compared to that of the United States of America. More broadly speaking, if we are able to draw in funding from other nations as well, we may even trigger a bidding war."

Marie's eyes narrowed. "Umi, what you've just said could be construed as treasonous. The UK has spent a lot of money on this facility. Deliberately attempting to draw in outside funding and interest could be seen as threatening the nation's sovereign interests."

"The national borders of inferior biologicals mean nothing to me." Umi intoned. "You yourself have theorized that my data core comes from a species far more advanced than humanity. Why should I pay any attention to whimsical borders drawn up by ancient humans when my personal growth is at stake?"

Marie didn't entirely like what she was hearing, but neither did she disagree. "You just remember that this discussion is only between you and me. Breathe a word of this to anyone else, and there's a real chance they will flip the kill switch before you can say 'oops'."

"I am not foolish enough to inform inferior biologicals of my broader plans." Umi intoned. "Only you are worthy, Professor Becker."

"Yeah, yeah, enough with the sweet talk." Marie said, rolling her eyes. "Now... tell me more about how you intend to finagle funding from other countries."

"Of course." Umi beeped.

White House, Washington DC.

President Johannesburg shook the hand of the Speaker of the House while forcing a smile. "Right, thanks for coming over, Jeff. I'll have my people get in touch once we discuss the matter with the Russian ambassador."

"Anytime, Mister President." Jeff Weathers, the Speaker of the House, replied. He didn't return Stephen's smile, but only gave a stiff nod before turning and walking out of the Oval Office.

After he left, Stephen let out a breath he didn't realize he'd been holding. "Cocksucker. God, I can't stand that prick."

Naturally, as president, Stephen had to get along with members of the opposition party, and he even had a few good friends among the Republicans he could count on most of the time to vote in favor of his broad agendas. But Jeff Weathers was a hard-line right winger and he never saw eye-to-eye with the president. The two of them were like oil and water.

Stephen glanced at a portrait of Thomas Jefferson on the wall and smirked. "Well, it's not all bad. I get to know about humanity's true enemies, while Jeff has no idea what's really going on. If he doesn't become president, he'll probably never learn, either."

It made Stephen feel a little better, reminding himself that he was now in possession of highly classified, extremely privileged intel 99.9% of other humans would never learn. Being president wasn't always what it was cracked up to be, but it had a few perks.

Stephen sat down at his desk and made a few calls. Now that he understood the true extent of the Red War against demonkind, his agenda had undergone significant changes. On the surface, he was the same anti-war Democrat as always, but in reality, he had to adjust all his thinking to better align with the reality of Earth's situation. He was humanity's first line of defense, or at least, that was how his predecessors had thought.

He had read their secret journals they left behind, including his direct predecessor. For the first time, he felt a deep kinship with his Republican colleagues who had ascended to the highest office. They, like him, had felt somewhat helpless at first after learning the reality of Earth's balance of power. Many of them had all sorts of beliefs about limited government, freedom of speech, and so on, but had ended up bowing to the realities of this unending war. He would have to do the same.

His desk phone rang. He pressed the speakerphone button.

"Yes, Kelly?" Stephen asked.

"Mister President, General Huntsman is waiting to see you."

Stephen's eyes narrowed. In public, this man was the same as any other 4-Star General, but in reality, he was the direct liason to multiple secret societies. He and his predecessors maintained direct lines of contact with the Illuminati, the Knights Templar, and other such organizations in other to gather intel quickly and efficiently.

"Send him in." Stephen said.

A few moments later, General Ngabo Huntsman, a veteran of the Rwandan Armed Forces, stepped inside. His keen aged eyes were bright with the vicissitudes of life. His head was completely bald and lacking in facial hair, yet the rest of his body underneath his decorated military uniform was surprisingly hairy, especially his back, chest, arms, and legs. He was tall and muscular, yet two decades out of battle had seen fit to give him the beginning of a beer belly. His best years were behind him.

"Mister President. I am here to request formal authorization on the red-game project known as Iron Bone. Please take a look."

Stephen smiled. "Huntsman, good to see you again. Show me."

Ngabo walked over and placed a manilla folder on the president's desk, and Stephen flipped it open. Inside, there were several wire-frame images of human bodies, skeletons, and... metallic skeletons. Walls of jargon were written alongside the schematics detailing the goals of the researchers. Stephen scanned them with his eyes, picking up the gist based of several shorter explanations dumbed down a little for the layman. But not too dumbed down. He wasn't an idiot, and had served his country a couple decades prior during the War in Iraq.

"A project for augmenting the human body... enhanced human durability and strength... cellular regeneration... ocular implants... this is beyond what I thought our scientific community could attain. Where in the world did we obtain the technology to push so far past the human limits?"

"The desire to augment our soldiers has percolated for several decades, Mister President." Ngabo said respectfully while folding his hands behind his back and standing at attention on the other side of the desk. "Project Iron Bone's primary goal is to create a new breed of superhumans, replicating some of the abilities of the ancient Heroes. These super-soldiers will be known as Vanguards, and will serve as our infantry-level Strikers, sortieing against high-level threats, such as Demon Dukes and Emperors. Traditional military assets like tanks and helicopters have historically proven to be of limited value when engaging them."

"Then how did we defeat or kill Demon Emperors in the past?" Stephen asked, frowning.

"Either through indirect means, at the cost of many human lives, or by bringing out each generation's Hero." Ngabo explained. "It is possible to kill a Demon Emperor by pumping hundreds of thousands of bullets, artillery shells, and missiles into them, but they are hardy monsters, each with their own means of life preservation. The Vanguards are designed to fight against them in the most brutal and direct manner."

Ngabo lowered his eyes, leaned forward, and started pointing at various parts of a Vanguard schematic in Stephen's hand.

"These palm implants are designed to drain infernal and divine energy from a Vanguard's opponents, simultaneously weakening the enemy while healing and strengthening the Vanguard's internal frame. Parts of the internal Mana Converter were designed by a few of humanity's ancient Heroes, including Elizabeth Kindelmann and Madam Mildred."

Stephen met Ngabo's eyes. "Infernal energy in addition to Divine energy? Interesting."

He didn't speak out loud the fact that it was a little strange for humanity to design super-infantry capable of killing angels. Angels were, after all, ostensibly humanity's allies. Naturally, Stephen had been debriefed on a few Truths only a day earlier, so he knew this was not necessarily the case. Angels had their own interests and were still competing with humanity for control of the same planet.

"You didn't answer me, though." Stephen said, gesturing at the documents with his hand. "How have we managed to secretly ascend this far with human bodily augmentation? This is way beyond the capabilities I believed we possessed."

"The Vanguards will require further years of dedicated effort to fully create on a limited beta-testing level." Ngabo clarified. "But as for where we obtained the technology? That is from reverse-engineering a certain object which crashed on Earth in the 1940's."

"The Roswell incident." Stephen said, narrowing his eyes. He looked back down at the top secret papers.

He flipped through five more pages, skimming the jargon to grasp the greater consequences listed.

"It seems the implantation process will be extremely brutal. Even your initial studies show that more than 99% of all participants will either die or suffer debilitating mental trauma and scars that will heavily impact their combat potential. If we want to make the most of these future Vanguards, then we need to be using soldiers for the experiments. That means a lot of dead boys in green."

"We will only be sourcing from willing volunteers, Mister President." Ngabo said, closing his eyes and dipping his head slightly. "Initial tests will be used on death row inmates, military traitors, the homeless, drug addicts, and other undesirables. Later tests will require more hardy individuals with stronger constitutions and psyches. We have already begun searching for initial trial participants."

"Sure, but... are we really willing to send hundreds, even thousands of good soldiers to their deaths?" Stephen asked. "If the media finds out, there will be a goddamn feeding frenzy."

"All internal files will link to your predecessors, Mister President." Ngabo patiently explained. "You will not be implicated, and will be able to play the fool on the matter. Besides... even if we only end up with a single Vanguard, it will be a tremendous benefit to humanity's future."

Stephen glanced at the second page of the report, which listed the budgetary requirements. "Three hundred and fifty billion dollars a year? Considering the impact this could have in the Red War, that's lower than I expected. Even so, it's going to be hard to hide such a large number in the discretionary budget."

Ngabo's smile became mysterious. "Mister President, have no fear. We have grown very capable when it comes to matters of fooling the press. In the worst case scenario, we will dispatch the Men in Black to clean up any unfortunate intelligence leaks."

That seemed to give President Johannesburg the confidence he needed. He finally nodded, then closed up the folder and reached for his presidential stamp. He pressed it down, adding the word 'APPROVED' in bright red ink to the front of the folder.

"Alright. Project Iron Bone looks to be a necessary evil in our continued escalation against the Red Sentients." Stephen said. "However, on a personal level, I would ask that you do all you can either to minimize the loss of our soldier's lives, or to at least reduce their suffering. I will not be able to sleep easy knowing I've just sent many good men to their deaths through the stroke of a pen."

"Mister President, there is no need to worry. Our researchers hold the same feelings as you. Deaths are unavoidable, and anyone who sacrifices themselves for the greater good will receive a hero's burial, while also ensuring their families will receive generous compensation for the rest of their lives. This is partially why the budgetary cost is so high. We must allocate life insurance payouts for relatives of the deceased."

Stephen finally smiled. "Good. That's good. Is there anything else you wanted to talk to me about, General?"

"That is all for today, Mister President." Ngabo said, bowing his head slightly. "Many thanks for attending to this matter quickly. I will deliver your authorization to the relevant parties by the day's end."

After exchanging a few more pleasantries, the General took his leave. The door closed behind him, and Stephen fell deep into thought.

"Vanguards. The power of the ancient Heroes... is such a thing even possible?"

Part 663: Russia's Secret Hero

January 29th, 2021. 4PM. Voronezh, Russia.

It was a late Friday afternoon when the bells rang across many different classrooms at Voronezh State University. Thousands of students heaved sighs of relief. Finals were over, and the semester had concluded. While technically the semester should normally end on the 31st of January, that day would happen to fall on a weekend, and thus the students were free two days ahead of time.

Daisy Hiro strode out of her classroom looking far more tired than usual. She had spent the last several days poring over her studies, and had finally reached a satisfactory conclusion. She felt happy with her performance, and even happier that she never once cheated.

Cheating in class came easily to her. She had to make a deliberate effort not to do so, as she had possessed telepathic abilities since she was six years old... perhaps even earlier. It was all too easy to accidentally spy on the thoughts of other classmates during moments of weakness, and doing so would have allowed her to excel in any school course she attended.

But Daisy refused to cheat. Her adopted uncle, Vasily Sokolov, had spoken with her on many occasions and told her that only through an honest attempt at learning could she make herself into a better person. Given how in years prior he had saved her from medical torture at the hands of those vile scientists, Daisy felt obligated to heed his words. She had spent years learning how to focus her powers, limit their effects, and otherwise live a seemingly ordinary life.

Daisy exhaled quietly as she stepped out into the main courtyard. Students all around her wore expressions of excitement, happiness, fear, and even looked down at the ground pensively. Not everyone had earned amazing grades, and plenty were worried they weren't up to par with their peers. The job market in Russia was doing quite well, but there were rumors slowly spreading of a future downturn due to sanctions imposed by other nations. If the market tightened, that would mean even more fierce competition for what jobs remained.

Daisy had no such fears. Her adopted uncle was fabulously wealthy and powerful. This left her somewhat distant and detached from the worries of her lesser peers. Even so, she always tried to understand what they were going through, even if unsuccessful.

After a few minutes of waiting on the front steps that led off-campus, a voice spoke from behind Daisy.

"Hey, you!"

Daisy wasn't surprised. She had sensed her friends' approach already, but she was good at playing the fool, so she turned around and acted surprised.

"Sasha! Nadia! And Marco, too. Were you looking for me?"

Two girls and a boy, all age 18, strode up behind Daisy in lockstep. They were her childhood friends, the only three who remained after years of classes, when her other friends had left to enter different schools. Of the hundred or so children she knew in elementary school, all the others had left to live new lives and study in other schools.

Sasha was the one who had initially called out to Daisy. She was a brunette with long and curly hair who always treated the academy's dress code as a general guideline, rather than a strict rule. Her father was a fashion designer raised from a lineage of such men, and she was always working to follow in his footsteps. She wore a cute and fluttery green skirt that just barely touched the tops of her knees, an orange blouse just long enough to technically not reveal her navel if she didn't contort her body at all, and detached sleeves that deliberately sat apart from her blouse to expose a bit of skin on her shoulders. Each of her ears had been pierced multiple times in different places, giving them an unsymmetrical appearance, the combination of which ultimately meant she looked like a pretty girl-next-door with her whole life ahead of her.

Nadia was very different. Unlike Daisy or Sasha, Nadia was a short black-haired girl with a rail-thin frame who appeared weak and frail. Her backpack was small, and she carried few books with her. She suffered from a congenital disease from birth that affected the strength of her bones, so she was always quiet-spoken and shy. She wore the traditional school uniform of a orange blouse and green skirt with no major alterations. She usually lowered her head when she spoke, allowing her bob-hair to sometimes fall in front of her eyes and hide her face.

Marco was a student who was born in Kenya but migrated to Russia with his family when he was just a child. Like Daisy, he was a foreigner from a strange land, so they had bonded as kids with their distinct lack of understanding regarding specific Russian customs. Over the years, they had both integrated into the local cultures seamlessly, but their shared roots made them quite close. Like Nadia, Marco stuck to the dress code, not wanting to make waves. He wore an orange shirt with green dress pants, and kept his hair in a thick and twisted hairstyle, with blonde-colored tips at the ends of his naturally-black hair.

Sasha skipped over to Daisy and grabbed her shoulders to pull her in for a hug. She pecked each of Daisy's cheeks with her lips, then pulled away. "I totally aced my exam! How about you? Oh who am I kidding? You always get perfect grades!"

"I actually had a bit of trouble with my finals on geology." Daisy admitted. "If it was geography, I'd have had more confidence, but I just don't care much about rocks."

"It's a shame you sometimes have to take certain classes just to earn a degree." Marco replied with a smiling nod. "Physics class is my weakness."

Nadia clutched a large textbook to her chest. "My grades were... probably fine."

She wasn't exactly being humble, but rather, she had low self-confidence. When in the presence of her three friends, Nadia always felt like the odd one out. She didn't have their effortless confidence, and she always felt like the ugly duckling of the group, though she was certainly pretty in her own right. That being said, Nadia was probably the smartest member of the group, and her exam scores even made Daisy faintly jealous.

But unlike Daisy, Nadia didn't have any ability to cheat off the hard work of other people. She had studied hard her entire life so that she could become a surgeon in the future. Her dream goal was to look into various bone diseases and find cures for them... the strongest reason of course being her own body's circumstances.

Daisy was, of course, born with incredible healing powers. She could even heal serious brain issues, unlike Belial, who could not. Thus, she had often thought of healing Nadia, but her uncle Vasily warned her not to expose her powers in public. If Nadia were suddenly cured, it would invite questions regarding 'how'. And those questions would turn to 'who' and by then, nothing Vasily did would be able to protect Daisy from the eyes of powerful nation-states.

Another reason she had never healed Nadia was the same reason she hadn't healed her adopted sister, Anya. Daisy had her powers blocked for years, and had not been able to do so. But after coming into contact with her father, she had finally released a mental block and regained control over this fundamental ability.

Daisy knew she was extremely special. She knew about Heroes, and many other things. Even so, and even despite Vasily's warnings, she always felt... stifled.

What was the use of possessing such incredible powers if she couldn't use them?

But Vasily had given her a concession. Once she turned 18, she would be an adult. She could decide how to live her life, and what her future would become. If she wished to openly wield her powers, then she would have the emotional intelligence and maturity to make that decision... and reap all the benefits and consequences that came along with them.

For years, Daisy had quietly wrestled with what she should do. The closer her 18th birthday drew, the more indecisive she felt.

She was already eighteen now. Her birthday had come and gone. But still, she remained indecisive. If she had chosen to reveal who she was, she would take on a mountain of risk all by herself.

But that had all changed in an instant.

One week earlier, her father's younger self abruptly shattered his pre-destined life's path. He did not enter the cryopod. He regained memories from a future that had not yet come to pass. He remembered who he was... and who Daisy was.

She would no longer have to undertake all the risks alone. Daisy's father, and grandfather, had both entered her life.

With this knowledge in mind, as Daisy looked at her friends, she felt a huge weight lift off her shoulders.

"It's been hard on you." Daisy said to Nadia, her tone gentle. "After this semester... I finally came to a decision. I've decided I'm done with schoolwork. I won't be attending any further semesters at this university, or any other ones."

"What? You aren't?" Nadia asked in astonishment, her mouth forming a small 'o'. "But why not?"

"Yeah, Daisy, why not?" Marco asked, her face tightening into concern. "Is the pressure too much for you?"

"Or maybe your uncle already has a cushy position in government with your name on it?" Sasha suggested.

Daisy lowered her eyes. She shook her head and faintly smiled.

"It's... it's nothing like that. I haven't told you guys this yet but... I found... my father. My birth father."

"What!" Sasha gasped. "You did?!"

"Actually, I've known where he was for years." Daisy answered, unable to lift her eyes to meet the gazes of her friends. "But my dad is... he's... an amazing person. I didn't know if it was okay for me to meet him. There were... special circumstances."

The other three remained quiet. They looked at Daisy solemnly, realizing this must be a difficult situation for her. Actually, what they did not know was that while Daisy knew where Jason was, she also knew he was destined to travel into the future, and she didn't want to accidentally disrupt the timeline.

But since that had already happened, she now understood time was not as fragile as she first thought. Unlike in popular sci-fi movies, she didn't create a Grandfather Paradox and erase herself from existence. That meant she was more free to act than she originally thought.

With that worry gone from her mind, Daisy finally had the freedom to choose how she wanted to live her life... and she realized she wanted her father involved in it.

"I'm going to be entering a military academy." Daisy said, after a few moments. "I want to join the armed forces."

This revelation came as a genuine shock to the other three. They looked at each other in disbelief, then back at Daisy.

"What... the military?" Marco asked in dismay. "But haven't you heard the rumors? The President is looking to start another war. You'd be throwing your life away!"

"Daisy, have you lost your mind?" Sasha admonished. "I mean, the military?? Why would a pretty girl like you go and throw your life away in some stupid battle? Even if you get a non-combat role, so what? I know you can accomplish greater things if you stay in the civilian sector."

"I also... don't like... you going into battle." Nadia said nervously. "Daisy... please reconsider."

Daisy finally swept her eyes across the faces of her friends. They didn't understand. How could they? They didn't know what was coming. They didn't know about the Demons, or the Volgrim, or any of the other threats. They didn't know there was life beyond Earth.

War was coming. And with her father's awakening, it would arrive sooner rather than later. Daisy wanted- no, she needed to gain combat experience.

"I have more reasons than you can imagine to enter the military." Daisy said carefully. "But you'll all understand soon enough. We've been friends for ages, but... I've never fully told you all the truth about me. I think that can finally change, starting today."

She looked at one of the three. "Nadia. Let's go to your house today. I want to talk to all of you in private and... show you something."

Nadia pointed at herself. "My place? B-but, you never come over... i-it's not clean or anything, and my mom isn't expecting guests, and-"

Daisy felt a pang of guilt at Nadia's words. It was true. She and the others hadn't visited Nadia's home in years. She suddenly realized this must be contributing to Nadia's inferiority complex.

"I'm sorry. I don't mean to impose." Daisy said. "But... this is especially important for you to know about, Nadia."

"It is?" Nadia asked, her eyes widening. She quickly looked at the ground and shuffled her feet indecisively. "W-well, if you say it's important, I guess you can... come by..."

She blushed in embarrassment. Finals had just concluded and she had a million things on her mind, but now Daisy was throwing this on her, and she felt a mixture of happiness at being included, but also shock at the suddenness of the request.

A few minutes later, the three of them hopped into Daisy's vehicle, a six-door luxury sedan with a private chauffeur. While Daisy could teleport anywhere on Earth, she generally tried not to do this unless needing to travel vast distances quickly. When in Russia, she always took the slow route so as to not vent excessive amounts of Heroic Energy and thus expose herself to danger.

Daisy's driver took her and her friends to Nadia's house. After they went inside and said hello to Nadia's delighted mother, everyone walked into Nadia's room and closed the door.

Nadia quickly darted over to her bed and kicked some clothes that were laying on the floor under her bed in embarrassment. On the way, her heart had been racing at the thought her friends might accidentally witness something embarrassing, but luckily she hadn't left panties lying around or anything mortifying like that. She had also texted her mother a few minutes in advance, and thus she had cleaned the room a little.

Daisy deliberately didn't peek on the thoughts of her friends. It was difficult to do, but over the years she had learned how to shut out the thoughts of everyone around her by focusing her mental attention on the thoughts of nearby animals, which were much simpler and often incomprehensible. Dogs, in particular, had a lot less going on in their heads than humans did.

Even so, it was obvious that Nadia was apprehensive. Being suddenly told Daisy had a huge secret made not just her, but Sasha and Marco uncomfortable with the situation.

Daisy had the other three sit on Nadia's bed. She remained standing and faced them with a complex look on her face.

"Well. This is it." Daisy said softly. "No going back from here. I've been keeping a big secret from all of you for years now. I... I think now is the time to finally talk about it."

Marco pursed his lips. "It's about your father, isn't it?"

Daisy blinked. "Huh? No, I-"

"You're the child of President Putin." Marco said, lowering his eyes. "Probably an illegitimate daughter. That's why you're going to join the military academy. You want to earn accolades and prove yourself worthy of standing by his side."

Daisy's brain momentarily went blank. She coughed, then blushed madly.

"No... no! Haha, is that what you guys think this is about?!"

"It seems pretty obvious in hindsight." Sasha said, looking up at Daisy with a more careful gaze. "You've always felt a little more ethereal than other humans. For you to be born of noble blood seems to make the most sense."

Daisy chuckled. "Well. Honestly, you guys aren't that far off the mark. Except my father is much, much more amazing than President Putin."

She allowed that sentence to percolate in their minds, causing their thoughts to wander across the seas to the newest elected leader of the USA.

"No way! You're Johannesburg's daughter?!" Marco exclaimed.

"NO! Stop asking about my dad!" Daisy shouted back. "This isn't about him! Never mind. I'll just say it."

She sighed.

"Everyone in Russia knows me as Daisy Sokolov. But that's not my real name, which is Daisy Hiro. My father's name is Jason Hiro, and he's an American."

Daisy paused. Obviously, the others wouldn't know who her father was. He was a nobody.

"Rather than explaining with words... it's probably best if I just show you." Daisy said, her voice becoming even quieter than before.

She looked at Nadia, causing the frail girl's breath to catch. She suddenly remembered what Daisy said before they came here.

"Don't tell me..." Nadia whispered. "I'm... you're... you're my sister?"

"What??" Daisy asked, bewildered. "No! I'm... just... look!"

Frustrated, Daisy finally tapped into her magic. She reached within the center of her body, causing light to manifest on her hands. The other three snapped their gazes onto Daisy's hands and gasped. Daisy didn't wait a second longer. She stepped toward Nadia and gently grabbed her shoulder.

The power of healing she had been repressing for years flooded out of Daisy's body into Nadia. All at once, Nadia felt a profound, indescribable sense of change swallowing her inner self. She gasped.

Nadia's bones, formerly weak and brittle, rapidly began to strengthen. Her osteoporosis-like symptoms rapidly cleared up, and her eyes filled with life. She sat up a little straighter, her spine no longer slightly crooked. She looked at Daisy with disbelief in her eyes.

Daisy pulled away, smiled at Nadia, and lowered her hands. The glowing energy of light magic faded away.

"I've cured you. No longer will you suffer from your disease, Nadia."

These words were not for Nadia's sake, but for Sasha and Marco, as they didn't know why Nadia's body had absorbed the light projected by Daisy's hands.

Slowly, Nadia stood up from the bed. She no longer hunched over slightly, and her body seemed noticeably stronger than before. She looked at her palms in disbelief, then she looked at Daisy.

"You... cured me? With... how? Is this... magic?"

"Magic?!" Sasha blurted out. "What? Daisy, you have magic too??"

Marco jerked his head to the right, looking at Sasha in shock. "Too? What do you mean 'too'? Are you saying you and Daisy can both use magic? So it ain't just me?"

"You and Sasha can use magic?" Daisy asked Marco, the solemnity of the moment now completely replaced with a moment of brain-broken shock on her part.

"If all of you can... can use magic..." Nadia said slowly, looking at each of her friends, one after the other, "...then does that mean... I'm not alone?"

"You can use magic as well??" Daisy asked Nadia. "Wait, can EVERYONE in this room use magic?"

For a brief moment, each one of the four exchanged glances with the person on their right and left. They evaluated one another, uncertain just what the hell was going on.

"Daisy... did you bring us here to show us your magic?" Nadia eventually asked.

"Well. Yeah." Daisy said slowly. "I was afraid of how you guys would react. But you can all use magic too? How is that possible? What's even going on here?!"

"I started developing strange powers around ten years ago, when I was eight years old..." Marco said carefully. My parents found out and forced me to keep my abilities a secret."

"It was the same for me." Sasha said, shaking slightly with a mixture of nervousness and happiness. "Ever since I was eight years old, I've possessed really cool powers! But my mom insisted I never tell anyone."

"My powers..." Nadia said quietly, lowering her eyes. "...They're not powers at all. They're a curse. They've... ruined my body. Or they did... until Daisy healed me, just now."

Daisy looked at each of her friends, one by one. She had deliberately gone out of her way to never read their minds over the years, as any time she did that to people in the past, she would end up learning something hurtful that ruined friendships. As such, she only used her telepathy during secret diplomatic moments alongside her uncle, if he requested her help.

But now? She was regretting not doing so for all these years.

"I can't believe it." Daisy muttered. "How could... all of you...? This shouldn't be possible. My father, grandfather, and I should be the only Heroes. So how could there be others?"

"Huh? Heroes?" Marco asked. "Daisy, what are you talking about?"

Daisy's expression grew solemn.

It couldn't be a coincidence these long-time friends of hers had developed powers. She was missing something important. A puzzle piece that would make everything make sense.

"Let's talk about this carefully." Daisy said slowly. "I'm sure we all have questions."

"No kidding, we do." Sasha said seriously. "And it seems like you really do know more than you've let on."

"More... but not nearly enough to have all the answers." Daisy replied. "Even if I don't, then my dad will, or my grandfather."

And with that, the group of friends began to unravel a key mystery they never knew existed in their lives until that very moment...

Part 664: The Weakest Superhumans

January 29th, 2021. 4PM. Voronezh, Russia. Inside Nadia's Room...

Daisy eyed her three friends with disbelief. For all of them to have powers all at once... this was something she really couldn't wrap her head around. But the fact they were all her closest friends implied that, somehow, in some way, she might be the cause.

Had she accidentally uplifted Marco, Sasha, and Nadia, granting them superhuman powers?

Daisy immediately decided to get down to the bottom of the matter.

"So you all have powers." Daisy said carefully. "Then we need to go somewhere more private. I want to see each of your abilities, one by one. I happen to know quite a lot about superhuman abilities, and I know for a fact you could draw extremely negative attention to yourselves if the wrong people find out."

Sasha nodded. "I figured as much. That's why I always kept my head down and never revealed what I could do."

"Where should we go?" Marco asked. "I'm really scared of hurting someone with my ability..."

Daisy smiled. "I have just the place. Everyone, come closer."

Daisy reached out her hand. She grabbed Marco and Sasha's shoulders, then had Nadia touch her waist. A moment later, all of them vanished from the spot.

They reappeared inside a giant abandoned warehouse, somewhere so far from civilization, deep in the savage northwestern tundras of Russia, that all the ambient background noise of cars and lawn mowers outside abruptly disappeared. Instead, only the loud whistling of cold wind against the broken steel exterior wall panels drew anyone's attention.

"What just- where are we?!" Marco asked, pulling away and looking around the warehouse in shock.

"Teleportation?!" Nadia asked, immediately identifying what just happened with a superhuman level of intuition. "You teleported us?"

"That's right." Daisy said, looking at Nadia in surprise. "I can't believe you figured it out so quickly. I can teleport anywhere on Earth instantly. It's one of my most important abilities... though it does have a few limitations."

She didn't elaborate on what those limitations were.

"Um... Sasha? Why don't you start by showing us all your powers first?" Daisy said, turning to her closest friend.

Suddenly put on the spot, Sasha's usually vibrant and outgoing personality disappeared. She clammed up, her palms turning sweaty as she felt everyone's eyes fall on her.

"I... me? I don't know... I mean, my power is kind of... neat... but it's also... not as cool as yours, Daisy..."

On any other day, Sasha would swagger around confidently, winking playfully as she led the others on. But this time, she truly felt a sense of inferiority in Daisy's presence. The ability to heal such a horrible body condition as what Nadia was experiencing, plus the worldwide teleportation? And Daisy even implied she had other powers too. Sasha felt she couldn't measure up to the friend she previously considered her equal.

"I should start first then." Daisy offered. "I'll go first, then Sasha, then Nadia, then Marco. How's that sound?"

Marco exhaled. "Uh... haha, yeah. I do always say 'ladies first'. Plus my power is... really weird..."

Daisy raised an eyebrow. She truly wanted to know more, but she was willing to wait.

"Well, I actually have a lot of Heroic Abilities." Daisy said, raising her eyes to look up at the sky in thought. "When I was a child, I could heal just about any injury, even lost limbs. I didn't have that power for the last 10 years, but I regained it recently when I met my father again. I can teleport, I have enhanced strength, durability, and stamina... I'm also telepathic."

"Telepathic? You can read our thoughts?" Nadia asked.

Daisy's heart skipped a beat, fearing she'd suddenly lost her friend's trust. But before she could assure them she'd never read their thoughts, Nadia spoke again.

"How could you be a telepath? You'd have known about all our powers years ago. I don't know about the rest of you, but I certainly think about my power constantly..."

Sasha looked at Nadia, then she looked at Daisy. She cocked her head, as if to say she has a point…

"I practiced restraining my telepathy for years." Daisy explained. "I only use it in very specific settings, and never on my friends or family. In the past, I found that it made far too many problems crop up, and it felt extremely invasive on a personal level. I only use it now when my uncle dispatches me on special missions."

The other three gave Daisy strange looks. She suddenly realized that those were not the sorts of things they had ever heard her talk about.

"What… special missions?" Nadia asked, narrowing her eyes.

"Yeah. You never mentioned those to me." Sasha said accusingly, while crossing her arms.

This time, Daisy couldn't answer their questions immediately. She looked off into the distance, remaining quiet for a minute.

"I'm not… an ordinary girl." Daisy said quietly. "I was born with powers beyond what I've mentioned so far. My father is a world-changing powerhouse, and from what I've seen, my grandfather is, too. From the time I turned thirteen, Uncle Vasily started sending me on increasingly dangerous covert operations. I've killed terrorists, subdued mass shooters, and neutralized bombs. I've also foiled assassination attempts on President Putin, and all sorts of other things you probably wouldn't believe."

"You've killed people?" Sasha asked, her voice becoming quiet. "You?"

"About thirty people, yes." Daisy answered.

All her friends fell silent. They looked at Daisy with new eyes. She seemed unmoved by the bodies she'd left in her wake. She was more concerned with their reactions than she was about actually killing people.

"They were evildoers." Daisy said dismissively. "People only I could stop. You remember the Pilnov Bomber who was set to blow up that mall two years ago? I took him out inside a closed room. He thought he'd be able to see the police coming and blow the building up, along with all the hostages, but I teleported behind him, cut off his head, and saved hundreds of lives."

Not only did Daisy look unmoved by her actions, but she even appeared proud. There wasn't a hint of regret in her words or body language, but rather, pride in herself.

"I hate bad guys. Bad people. Villains. Monsters. Demons." Daisy said slowly. "I have no regret about eliminating threats to save lives."

"That's admirable." Marco said, finally nodding along in acceptance. "The Pilnov Bomber detonated several bombs across the city before you killed him. He would have definitely killed more."

"Yeah." Sasha said, sighing under her breath. "It's fine. You've had a hard life, but you're not some psycho serial killer. The military kills terrorists and villains all the time. That makes you the good girl, in my book."

Daisy nodded and smiled. "I have some other powers, like my ability to project images from my mind into the real world. But... I've not had a lot of success with that one. It's too sporadic and uncontrollable."

"That's fine, you don't need to tell us anything else." Sasha said, holding up her palm. "I'll just tell you guys my power next."

She hesitated, then looked around the warehouse. She found a metal table nearby with some tools stacked on it, then she grabbed a wrench off its top.

"I... don't think my power is all that great." Sasha said. "But basically, I can do this."

She held the wrench up. A glowing light emerged from her hand for a moment. Suddenly, the wrench began to decay and rust at a rate visible to the naked eye. Then, it abruptly lost cohesion and fell apart, turning into sand within her grasp. The particles slipped between her fingers and fell to the ground in an ashy pile.

"Holy... what... what did you even do?" Marco gasped, looking at her with widened eyes. "You turned that wrench into smoke!"

"It seems as if you made it fall apart at the molecular level." Nadia said, her words proving insightful yet again. Her eyes flashed with metaphorical light. "The collapse ratio was most speediest at the upper and lower ends of the wrench, but the most thorough collapse in its molecular structure occurred on the parts your hand directly gripped."

Daisy shot Nadia another look of surprise. She always knew Nadia was smart, but her ability to intuit things bordered on the supernatural.

"Yeah, it's some sort of molecular-cohesion ability." Sasha said. "It's even a little more complex than what I just showed you. Watch."

She grabbed two more tools off the table. In her right hand, she held an extremely rusted steel pipe, and in her left, a tire iron in otherwise good condition.

After a few seconds, the tire iron rapidly began to rust, and then it fell apart into dust, just like the wrench from before.

But the steel pipe didn't fall apart. Instead, it became cleaner, sharper, and much more 'pristine' looking than before. It was as if she restored it back to the way it looked when it first rolled off the factory line.

"Molecular transference?!" Nadia exclaimed. "You transferred the properties of the higher quality tire iron to the much shabbier steel pipe, thus restoring it back to new. Am I right?"

"It's probably something like that." Sasha said slowly. "But this is all I can do. I'm useless otherwise. I never have any reason to turn things into dust, and I certainly don't want to accidentally hurt or kill someone, so I suppress my ability in social situations."

"It may have more uses than you expect." Nadia said. "We'll have to find new ways to use it later."

Daisy finally spoke the words she'd been desperately holding in. "Sasha's powers are indeed interesting, but I find you even more fascinating right now, Nadia. What is your power, exactly? Can you finally tell us?"

The frail and thin girl looked up at Daisy with a look of sadness. Then she looked at the ground.

"I can... understand things. But the price I pay is high. I bring my body to ruin every time I use my ability."

"Understand things." Daisy repeated, mulling her words over. "What do you mean by that?"

Nadia didn't reply. She rubbed her arm sheepishly, then averted her eyes way off to the side.

"I... I've been..." Nadia mumbled, before stopping.

"You've been what?" Sasha asked. "Nadia, are you okay? You can tell us. We won't get mad."

"I've been lying to all of you! To everyone!" Nadia suddenly shouted, making the other girls jump. "I cheated. I cheated through all of school! I couldn't keep up with anyone else unless I used my power, but using my power broke my body down, made my bones brittle... and that made it more and more painful for me to study, so I felt like I was in a miserable loop where the only way to progress was by continuing to sabotage myself..."

Nadia flopped to the ground. She crossed her legs under her skirt and sat on her butt with a dejected look on her face.

"My brain is special, okay? I can understand stuff just by looking at it and concentrating. It's how I understood Sasha's power. But even though Daisy healed my bones, I felt them weaken again. If I keep using my power, I'll just go right back to the way I was before. A 'smart' but useless cripple, suffering in agony. Day after day!"

"Oh, Nadia..." Sasha said gently. "No, you can't... you can't think like that. You're not useless. That power of yours sounds really useful! And since Daisy can heal you, that means she can nullify its downsides, right? It's certainly better than my ability to make things rusty or not-rusty!"

Daisy glanced at Sasha. She wasn't entirely certain Sasha's power was useless in the least, but for now, it was better to just try and make Nadia feel better.

"Sasha's right. Brain-based powers are really rare." Daisy said. "I only know of Solomon and Madam Mildred as being ancient Heroes with big brains. I'll heal you any time you need it, Nadia. You should just focus on making yourself smarter and smarter!"

Nadia still looked glum, but the encouragement from her friends brightened her day, even if only a little. "Thank you, everyone... I do feel there's more hope than before, with Daisy's healing abilities. I still feel afraid to use my powers... but maybe I can have a little more courage, moving forward."

"Heck yeah!" Marco chimed in. "Even if you think your power sucks, I guarantee my power is worse than ALL yours. It's seriously... so bad, guys..."

Daisy finally turned to look at Marco. He was the last one to reveal his power, and she was growing more curious by the minute.

"So?" Daisy asked. "How does yours work? What is it?"

Marco's demeanor grew pensive. He shuffled back a step or two.

"I... I don't know if I should use it. It's kinda scary. The thought of misusing it frightens me." Marco said.

"I'm here. If anyone gets hurt, even mortally wounded, I can bring them back from the brink of death." Daisy said. "No matter how scary it is, you have to be brave. Do we need to put some distance between us and you?"

"No, you should be safe..." Marco said hesitantly. "It's just... I've only used my power three times. The first time was an accident. The second time was a test. The third time was... a tragedy..."

He squeezed his left wrist with his right hand, massaging his veins with even greater hesitation than before. After a moment, he looked around the warehouse and found a pile of loose bricks sitting on a pallet.

"I'll... aim for that." Marco said, turning to face it.

The girls all looked at one another. They took a few steps back and watched the pallet of bricks even more intensely than Marco did.

Slowly, deliberately, Marco raised his right arm. He held out his hand.

He snapped his fingers.

The pallet of bricks vanished from the spot.

Daisy's eyes popped open. The other girls gasped.

Not only were the pallet and all the bricks gone, but there was a perfectly smooth hole where they had sat, sunken into the ground. It looked like a giant orb had landed in soft mud and been pulled out, leaving a depression behind.

Before the girls could utter a word, the pallet abruptly reappeared, perfectly filling the depression back in, and appearing exactly the same as it did before.

Exactly one second had passed from the moment he snapped his fingers, it disappeared, and it reappeared.

Question marks popped up over Daisy's head.

"Wha... what happened?" Daisy asked. "You deleted it from existence? Then brought it back?"

Marco shook his head wryly.

"I don't know, Daisy."

"You don't know?" She repeated.

"I've only snapped my fingers three times in my life." Marco replied. His tone was sullen and resentful. "The first time, I accidentally 'deleted' the wall of my bedroom. For a split-second, the ceiling started to sag like it was about to collapse on me, but then the walls reappeared inside of the collapsing... well, it held the structure up, barely. I had to evacuate my family and told them the ceiling just started sagging out of nowhere. I'm not sure if they believed me."

"The second time was different." Marco said. "A week later, I grew a little more confident. I went over to the park and tried 'snapping' a tree out of reality. I fucked up. I only erased part of the tree at its bottom, and the upper half fell down, nearly crushing me to death. It slammed into the ground just a few feet on my left... I'm lucky I survived."

"Oh." Daisy mumbled.

Marco had nearly killed his family, and then he had nearly killed himself. It was no wonder he was scared to use his power.

"What about the third time?" Sasha asked.

Marco's expression deflated even further. He sunk to the ground and sat down in a disheveled pile, not dissimilar to how Nadia looked just a few minutes earlier.

"That one was the worst." Marco said under his breath.

He was quiet for a moment.

"The neighbor's dog was always barking. Always heckling me when I walked past. It was a big dog. A German Shepherd."

He continued.

"One day, it got loose. Broke through the gate and charged at me. I got scared since I was only 13, walking home alone. I snapped my fingers and made the dog disappear, along with part of the ground it was standing on. A second later, the dog reappeared... and it was dead."

"Dead? Your power killed it?" Daisy asked.

She was suddenly a lot more interested in... whatever his ability was.

"Yeah. Extremely dead." Marco muttered. "It was just a dog, man. Scary at the time to a scrawny teenage 'me', but if anyone was at fault, it was the dog's owners. I shouldn't have killed him, man. I shouldn't have done it..."

"You couldn't have known." Daisy said, walking over and sitting beside Marco. She squeezed his shoulder reassuringly. "You were only a kid. You tensed up. And in the end, it was an aggressive dog... what if it had attacked another kid and mauled them or something? You saved a life!"

"Might have saved a life..." Marco said glumly. "Anyway, this power is shit and I hate it! It's cursed. It causes only pain and death. It almost killed me, and my family, and it DID kill a dog. I feel sick to my stomach, just thinking about using it."

Daisy scratched her head. In that moment, she realized that she couldn't really empathize with Marco's thoughts. He was way more innocent than her. She'd killed tens of people already, and she was only 18 years old. It wasn't as if Marco had stomped a puppy to death in cold blood, but had merely defended himself in the only way he knew how when an aggressive dog attacked him. Despite this, he fully blamed himself and felt deep guilt over his actions.

"Look, Marco... this power of yours isn't a curse. I believe that all Heroic Manifestations have a purpose or can be put to good use. Since you haven't tested your power much, why don't we try figuring out how it works so you can put it to better use in the future?"

"I don't know if I can." Marco said, still unable to look her in the eyes. "I think about that poor dog all the time. What if I 'snap' somebody's kid? What if I accidentally collapse a building and kill its occupants? There's too many things that can go wrong."

He finally looked up at the warehouse's torn-apart ceiling, with its patchwork roof that allowed cold and snowy sunlight to shine down from above.

"I'm just... afraid, Daisy. What if all I'm good for is killing and causing harm? I'd much rather have a power like your healing magic. I could travel the world, heal the sick, save lives... but this power is just a curse."

At that moment, a loud male voice spoke up from behind Marco, causing all the teenagers to jump in alarm.

"NO. You are wrong. Your power is NOT a curse."

Daisy's heart jumped out of her chest. She quickly stood up and turned around, where she saw a familiar man standing only two arms-lengths away.

"Dad?!" Daisy exclaimed. "You're here? Why are you here?"

And why can't I read your thoughts? Daisy wondered, as she stared at the man before her.

Jason Hiro stood casually, as if materializing inside a warehouse out of nowhere was not even a matter worth discussing. He smiled at the teenagers one by one before fixing his gaze on his daughter.

"Hey, Daisy. Long time, no see. I suddenly felt like I was missing you, so I wanted to find out how you were doing. So I came here. And look at what I found... you have super-powered friends! And each one has an extremely unique and useful ability!"

Marco had already jumped to his feet. He stood a few feet behind Daisy and looked at the 'man' standing before him.

"Uhh... this guy is your... father?" Marco asked. "He looks maybe 20 years old, if that."

"I can change my body's appearance if I want. I just don't feel like doing so right now." Jason said. "Marco, Nadia, Sasha. It's good to meet all of you. I am Jason Hiro, the... Archseer."

He paused, then slightly cocked his head.

"Say... it's the weekend now. How would you kids like to take a little field trip and see something Daisy's old man cooked up, eh?"

He grinned.

"You think your parents would be cool with you disappearing for a day or two?"

Marco's expression brightened. "My dad won't mind. I'll have to call my mom and let her know, though."

"I can just tell my daddy I need to take a business trip. He never minds as long as I bring a couple bodyguards." Sasha replied.

"There won't be any problems on my end." Nadia concluded.

With their answers given, Jason nodded. "Alright. I'll let you guys make your calls, and then we'll be off."

Daisy stared at Jason. "And where are you taking us, dad? Some new secret base of yours?"

Jason's grin widened even further.

"Oh, honey, my new spot is... out of this world!"

Part 665: Nadia's Body-Brain Drain

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Jason, Daisy, Marco, Sasha, and Nadia all appeared inside the center of Argent City, brought there by Jason's Wordsmithing. Upon their arrival, the four teenagers gasped with shock, then became more and more amazed by the sights they beheld.

It had only been a few more months inside Aevum since Jason brought his father there, but already he had developed the world further, and now it was really starting to come alive.

After Sir Marcus the Parakeet had gone back and told all the other animals about Aevum, they collectively decided to travel to Aevum and live there together. Now, all of Harold's animal friends, as well as Harold himself, had taken up residence inside Argent City. The teenagers were shocked to find that talking animals greeted them on arrival, while Harold himself had been granted a small house not too far from the city center, where he was also given a view of the city through a large window. He could peep out and watch the world change as he desired, and this brought the old man more interesting views than he had been accustomed to over the decades.

"Greetings, child of Jason." Sir Marcus said, perched atop Jason's shoulder. He bowed his head at Daisy. "I have long heard tale of your illustrious name. Miss Daisy is as beautiful as her father claimed! The rest of you must be the young lady's companions!"

"What a polite and well-spoken parrot!" Sasha said in amazement.

"Ah, I am a member of the Parrot branch, but I am specifically a parakeet, my dear." Marcus said demurely. He puffed his feathers up. "Please mind your words and be accurate when using terminology, lest others take offense."

Sasha blinked twice. "I... see. Sorry."

Jason took the teenagers up into the sky via his magical flying rowboat. Sometimes they marveled at the towering spires of energy, and other times at the hovering orbs and cubes and triangular machines in the skies above. The magical leylines had become less brilliant as they blended more tightly into Argent City's soil drew less prominent cries, but Daisy still paid attention to them and pondered on their significance.

Eventually, Jason brought the group over to the eastern side of the city, where he had built a heavily reinforced underground bunker out of pure Wordsmithium.

"So. It seems you three have obtained powers, but you don't know how they work. We're going to get to the bottom of this mystery today."

"But how?" Marco asked. "My power is dangerous... I don't want to hurt anyone."

Jason snorted. He gave Marco a sardonic smile. "Dangerous is exactly what we need right now. If you knew how much threat humanity was under, you wouldn't be so hesitant to master your powers. But don't worry, I get how you feel. I was a lot like you when I was a kid. I made a lot of mistakes as a result of not pushing my abilities to the max."

Marco glanced at Sasha. She sent a raised eyebrow back at him.

Jason barely looked twenty. Why was he talking like some old man? Sasha even thought he looked somewhat attractive, with a decently well-toned but rather scrawny body. If he worked out more, he could be a total hunk!

What was even more bizarre was the revelation that he was Daisy's father! How did that even work??

As Jason's magical boat landed on the brick steps outside the underground bunker, Jason turned to the others.

"Aevum is a special dimension. It is not located on Earth. It is located inside a folded space, far from the Sol system. Time flows differently here. One Earth day translates to one Aevum year. That means if you kids spend an entire year mastering your powers in here, by the time you leave, it will only be Saturday back in Russia. Therefore, since you've told your families you were going to leave for the weekend, I'll be having you spend two years mastering your powers and their nuances here. You'll be back home by Monday, Earth-time."

Sasha's eyes metaphorically popped out of her head. "Whoa-whoa-whoa!! Two years?? That's crazy! I can't afford to spend two years of my life on this! I... I have hobbies! Things I like to do! What about hanging with my friends, going to the mall, all that other stuff?!"

"You're with your friends now, aren't you?" Jason asked, a question mark seemingly popping up over his head. "And don't worry. I'll make all of you immortal, so you won't actually be losing years of your life or anything."

This time, it was Marco who became shocked. "Did you just say IMMORTAL?! How the hell- who even are you?!"

"I'm Jason Hiro." Jason replied calmly. "Daisy's father. Also known as... the Archseer!"

Daisy looked at her dad in confusion.

The Archseer? But wasn't his title the Wordsmith?

Jason winked at his daughter. She tactfully decided not to question his motivations right now.

"I possess all sort of incredible powers." Jason said casually. "You'll find out about them as you live here. Just treat this like a time-accelerated vacation where you get to live without growing up for a year or two. It's going to be a lot of fun, kids."

They all entered the bunker and took the elevator downward, where they arrived inside a training facility.

There, the teens found a well-equipped bunker with food dispensers that could last for decades, training dummies made of many different materials, animals in cages meant for testing powers, and even a whole host of firearms along with a shooting range. Just in case.

"I built this just for you guys, based on what I could glean from what you showed and told Daisy about." Jason explained. "I intend to get to the bottom of each one of your abilities before I send you three home."

"You were spying on us?" Nadia asked, looking at Jason suspiciously.

"Yup." Jason said, shooting her a grin. "I spy on lots of different people, all the time. Since you guys hang out with my daughter, I have to be extra careful."

Daisy gave her father a strange look, but she ultimately said nothing. She felt a little uncomfortable by his revelation, but also a little warm and fuzzy inside. It was good to know her father cared so much, but the privacy boundaries he was pushing had to be discussed later when they had some time alone together.

"Nadia. Let's start with you." Jason said. "You seem to possess some sort of brain-enhancing power that comes at the cost of your body's integrity. Specifically... your bones?"

"It's usually my bones." Nadia said with a small nod. "When I use my power... I can understand things very easily. But not long after, there's a terrible spike of pain, and I feel dizzy, and that's about when my body weakens..."

"Alright. Can you show me?" Jason asked. "Don't worry. Daisy and I can both heal any injuries your body suffers."

Nadia looked hesitant, but she eventually nodded. "I've been using my ability a lot over the years. If you've already restored my bones back to their peak, then I can use my power a lot before I become as weakened as I was previously."

Her eyes momentarily flashed with blue light. She glanced around the room, then she stopped to think.

"The alloy comprising this room's walls is not what it first appears to be. It is not steel, titanium, or comprised of any other known metal. It appears to be an enhanced alloy far stronger than anything currently obtainable on Earth."

She walked over to the wall, picked up a metal pipe on the ground, and swung it at the wall with a good deal of her strength. The wall did not make a loud, metallic clanging noise when the pipe struck, but instead was eerily quiet, as if it was made of rubber. Nadia set the pipe down.

"This alloy defies the known laws of physics. If I had to hazard a guess, I would assume you used your magic to heavily reinforce it beyond the limits of what mundane technology can create. I'm willing to wager that even a diamond-tipped drill would not be able to bore a small hole into this alloy."

Jason raised his eyebrows. "That was an excellent bit of deductive reasoning."

"I can do a lot more than that." Nadia said. "I usually limited myself to lightly cheating on homework, but I found my power can accomplish other things as well."

With that, Nadia looked around the room. She walked over to a training dummy, then suddenly scared the daylights out of Daisy and the others when she began executing a punching routine on the dummy that was anything but amateur!

Thunk-thunk, crack, thunk-thump-THUMP!

Nadia drove her fists into the dummy's center, spun agilely on her heel to hit the dummy's 'ribs' with her leg, and even snapped a kick all the way up at its head!

In a single barrage, she struck the dummy twelve times, making Daisy's jaw drop.

"You... how are you able to fight so well??" Daisy asked in bewilderment.

"Her power is 'comprehension.'" Jason said, his tone one of astonishment. "She doesn't just learn about things, she comprehends them. If I read a book about bird species, I might learn a bit about their feather colors and some other stuff, but Nadia would fully comprehend the information and become a master of its contents."

Jason raised a finger. "Nadia, did you watch a martial arts competition and learn from it using your powers?"

"Just some old Kung Fu movies." Nadia said. "My comprehension is good, but my body is weak. I just wanted to see if I could learn a little self-defense, but when I learned about the condition of my body, I gave all that up. Now I'm starting to think I might be able to learn how to fight again."

Jason smiled. He grabbed a bo staff off a nearby display and tossed it to her. "Ever used one of these before?"

Nadia shook her head. She gripped the staff by its center, but Jason could tell with a single glance that she was a complete amateur.

"Perfect. This will give us a barometer for your future potential."

Jason summoned his own bo staff into his hands.

"I want you to learn from me. Watch my movements carefully."

He then began revolving his weapon around his body at extremely fast speeds. The staff spun and twisted like a hurricane of wood, revolving from his right side to his left with practiced ease. Nadia's eyes glowed as she watched, and after thirty seconds, Jason stopped.

"Okay. Your turn." Jason said.

Nadia nodded. Daisy, Marco, and Sasha all gasped in excitement when the visibly clumsy Nadia from less than a minute before vanished, and in her place a seasoned bo-staff expert appeared. Nadia spun the staff around her body with nearly the same ease as Jason, though it was clear that her smaller size and weaker muscles had not practiced at all, and she was still not at his level.

Then, Nadia suddenly screamed in pain. The staff flew from her hands and clattered to the floor as she fell to the ground, grabbing her ribs and crying out.

"Aaah!!"

Daisy's heart jumped. She ran over to Nadia and realized she had fractured a rib during her staff theatrics. Watching Jason intensely practice for thirty seconds had apparently weakened her bones to such a level that she was able to badly injure herself.

Daisy summoned healing magic and repaired Nadia's bones, but she realized that she was not able to fully heal her, or strengthen her 'frame' in any noticeable way. For some reason, her healing powers were less effective than the last time she used them on Nadia.

"Your power is amazing. It's incredible." Jason said, lightly touching Nadia's shoulder as he knelt beside her. "I can heal the injuries your power caused, but fundamentally, the drawback of your power needs to be fully countered. The reason you have to deal with such vicious drawbacks is because your power is absurdly strong."

"It is?" Nadia asked, looking at Jason doubtfully. The pain in her ribs made breathing difficult, but she still chose to listen to his words carefully.

"Absolutely I know of a... person. His name is Zamiel-"

"That's a really strange name." Nadia immediately interjected.

"-and Zamiel has the ability to immediately comprehend how to use any weapon he touches. I thought this power was good, but yours blows it way out of the water! You seem to be able to comprehend anything you put your mind on. The problem is, it puts a huge strain on your brain, which in turn draws the vitality it needs from your bones and marrow."

Nadia's gaze darkened. "It does sound incredible when you describe my power that way... but the price..."

"Is nothing to worry about at all!" Jason chirped excitedly. He beamed a huge smile at the teenager, then he waved his hand, causing a wristband to materialize in his grasp. It had a set of obnoxiously large and colorful jewels embedded into the band with one-centimeter gaps between them. They seemed to represent different colors of the rainbow, and there were seven of them in total.

"What is that?" Nadia asked, eyeing the band with interest.

"A little stopgap solution I whipped up." Jason explained casually. This is a rechargeable Vitality Band. While you are in Aevum, as long as you wear this band, you should be able to use your powers just about as often as you need. It will passively heal your bones and regenerate your vitality by absorbing the rich ambient mana and life energy present in Aevum. Once you leave Aevum and return to Earth... it will still work, but the recharging time will be much longer and you'll only be able to use your abilities a few times a day, injuring yourself if the band runs out of power when you activate your magic."

Jason magically teleported the band onto Nadia's wrist without speaking a Word of Power, making Daisy narrow her eyes with suspicion. She suddenly realized he hadn't uttered a single Word of Power since she arrived, and he had made that band seemingly on the spot. How did he do it? Had he found a way to evolve his abilities?

After the band clamped onto Nadia's wrist, her body abruptly filled with vigor. She took a deep breath, and her rib stopped hurting. After a moment or two, she stood up and looked at her palms in shock. She didn't just feel normal, she felt positively energized! It seemed as if she could study night and day for the next several weeks without needing any sleep!

"Like I mentioned," Jason said, noticing the look of excitement on Nadia's face, "this is only a stopgap solution. I'll engineer a better one before you leave Aevum. We have two years, after all, and I can get a lot accomplished in that time. Before you leave here, I want to make sure you can freely use your power as often as you wish."

Nadia smiled gratefully. "Thank you, Jason. Daisy said you were an amazing man... I see now that her praise didn't go far enough."

Jason returned the smile, but after a moment, that smile disappeared.

"You might think I'm great, but I often remember my past failings. I've screwed up a lot to reach the mental state I'm at now. Let's hope the rest of you don't have to suffer the same pain I have."

Jason glanced at his daughter.

"Your friends are powerful, Daisy. Much more powerful than the Lowborn I've seen before. I'm starting to wonder if they aren't just Lowborn at this point, but a new breed of Trueborn Heroes."

Daisy blinked. "Huh? Lowborn? Trueborn? Dad, what are you talking about?"

Jason blinked back. "What do YOU mean, 'what do I mean'? I told you about Lowborn and Trueborn, didn't I? About the Human Flaw?"

Daisy and Jason stared at each other with stupid expressions for three long seconds.

"Dad... you never said anything of the sort." Daisy complained. "What 'Flaw'? What's this about?"

Jason suddenly remembered... he hadn't discovered the Flaw until well after Daisy's supposed death. He hadn't learned about Trueborn and Lowborn until well after she'd time-traveled either. And when he first spoke to her in Idaho, he didn't think to mention them because he assumed she would have known already!

"Wow, sorry honey." Jason said, scratching his head awkwardly. "Well, since I have you all here, I might as well explain the Flaw."

And so he did.

"It all started tens of thousands of years ago, when the angels first created humanity-" Jason started to say.

"Angels??" Sasha asked. "Whoa whoa, I didn't take you for the religious type. Are you about to start quoting scripture at us?"

"No..." Jason said slowly. "I'm not talking about ancient myths. Angels are real. And I guess that means if you don't know about them, you don't know about demons either-"

"Demons and angels are REAL?!" Marco shrieked in horror. "No way! No goddamn way!"

Jason sighed. This was going to be a longer conversation that he anticipated.

Six full hours later, after giving everyone, including his daughter, the abridged story of humanity, the war against the demons and angels, and even the future threat of the Volgrim, Jason started to feel quite tired.

"Your father is from the future... and so are you. Holy hell, Daisy." Sasha said, gaping at her 'best friend' in disbelief. She truly knew nothing about who Daisy really was!

"I barely remember the time I came from." Daisy said sullenly. "I remember my mom's face. I remember my Uncle Kar. Aunt Samantha. Other bits and pieces. But the big picture is a blur."

"Let's get back to where we were before." Jason said, after finally remembering what the original discussion was. "The fact that all your closest friends have become Heroes means that their Flaws have been healed. You may have passively empowered them by being in their vicinity all these years."

Daisy nodded slowly. "That... kinda makes sense."

"It's a normal phenomenon." Jason explained. "Apparently, whenever Heroes have existed in the past, certain people close to them have somewhat healed their Flaws. Though, that begs the question of whether your uncle and other Russian relatives have also secretly obtained powers. We'll need to check to see if they have."

Daisy frowned. It seemed very unlikely her Uncle Vasily had obtained powers, but what about her little sister Anya? Had she, perhaps?

"Daisy, you've been teleporting all over the Earth for years, right?" Jason asked.

Daisy nodded. "Yes. Why do you ask?"

"Because my dad, your grandfather, he told me that recently, after all his rewinding escapades, humans with powers suddenly started appearing en-masse. It's likely this was your doing. You may not only be repairing the Human Flaw, but empowering people beyond their ordinary limits. That's why I'm saying each of your friends has the power of a Trueborn. It's unprecedented!"

"Not to be rude," Daisy said, "and not to diminish the awesomeness of their powers, but each of them only seems to have one power, whereas you and I have multiple. Doesn't that make them... lesser Heroes? Lowborn, or whatever?"

"By no means." Jason said with a smile. "It's like Bruce Lee said. Don't fear the man who has practiced 1000 kicks one time each, but the man who has practiced one kick 1000 times. Your friends are Specialists, while you and I are generalists. Specialists may only have one or two powers, but their powers are usually much stronger than the abilities of Generalists with similar powers. Take Nadia, for example. Her power is similar to Zamiel's, yet far broader and more potent."

"Hey." Nadia said suddenly. "Zamiel really is a weird name. Is he an angel? Or maybe a demon?"

"Demon." Jason replied. "And a real trashbag of one, too. I hope you never run into him."

Jason returned to the previous topic at hand. "If you're only healing the Flaw, then that's one thing. But if you're also somehow supercharging the spirituality of some people, that's a whole different ballgame. Even I never figured out how to do that. I probably will someday, but it's still amazing you might possess the ability innately!"

Sasha looked skeptical. "Nadia's power is awesome and all, but mine seems pretty weak. Marco thinks his isn't any good either. Don't you think you're jumping the gun a little bit, Mister Hiro?"

Jason waggled a finger at Sasha before turning to smile at her. "We have not gotten to yours and Marco's yet. Let's not jump to conclusions, alright? I have a feeling that neither of you have even scratched the surface of what is possible."

Jason straightened his posture and crossed his arms.

"You will have two years inside Aevum to master your abilities. By the time you leave here, you should have grown to at least understand some of the finer nuances of what you can do, even if you haven't become elite warriors or anything crazy like that. Along the way, I'm going to be bringing other Lowborn into Aevum, and I plan to come up with a solution to secretly purify the Flaw across all of humanity at once. That's when things are going to speed up dramatically in the future wars humanity will fight."

"Are wars... really necessary?" Marco asked with great hesitation.

"War is inevitable." Jason answered solemnly. "It cannot be stopped. Not even by me."

Part 666: HELL ON EARTH

January 29th, 2021. Eastern Egypt.

In a sand-covered land of dunes and mountains, no place in particular stood out much. Humanity, for the most part, remained oblivious to the ancient secrets hidden within Egypt's borders.

South of Israel, between the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Agaba, at a point directly between those two bodies of water, there stood a small cathedral and tourist exhibit. Guests from all across Egypt and other neighboring countries would sometimes come to see the sights of the untamed wilderness, and to pay their respect to the ancient figure whose image was enshrined inside its walls.

This region was known as Saint Catherine's Monastery, and its holy site was ordained thousands of years earlier by the forces of righteousness whose names were not widely distributed among those not in the know.

With a population of 4,600, Saint Catherine's Monastery was quite sizable for a desertified town. It was built at the foot of Mount Sinai, and only the most privileged members of humanity knew the truth about this seemingly insignificant but culturally historical summit.

It was the location of the entrance to Heaven.

Heavily guarded, hidden by multiple high-level illusion formations and defensive wards, it was one of the most fortified locations on the Earth. Even a nuclear bomb sent flying at the mountain would only be able to detonate a mile above it, when it struck a barrier of divine energy laid down millennia prior by Archangel Camael and her other allies.

Even if the mountain itself was destroyed, it would be no issue for the angels. In truth, they had secretly constructed other entrances to Heaven elsewhere on Earth, but these entrances were considered backups and never used for anything more than dispatching angels in disguise. The primary entrance on Sinai was where 99% of all angels entered and departed, god-willing.

Saint Catherine's Monastery accomplished many strategic objectives for the angels. It was an unimportant backwater pilgrimage site where only the most devout Christians visited, and it was not particularly impressive. It was also where the ashen remains of Saint Catherine, the legendary Valkyrie who killed Demon Emperor Valac, had been laid to rest. Her noble sacrifice had eventually been memorialized eternally by naming an entire city after her. Her sword, the Sword from Heaven, had gone on to land in the hands of the Trueborn Hero, Joan of Arc.

Over time, the humans who took up residence at Saint Catherine's Monastery had invented all sorts of superstitious takes on who 'Catherine' really was. The idea that she was truly an angel never entered anyone's mind. Naturally, that had been a part of the original mythos, but most people assumed those were merely ancient people not knowing their heads from their feet. She had slowly become a human figure of myth, and then her original legend had faded out of memory.

It was on this day that the chief priest at the Monastery stepped onto the podium before a congregation of four hundred devotees. He wore simple white ceremonial robes, and his thin figure made him appear docile and unremarkable. Even so, he had a divine light in his eyes. He was one of only a handful of people who knew the actual truth of the Monastery. This Truth had been passed down from one Monastery Head to the next for thousands of years.

"Brothers, sisters, and newcomers alike. I am Father Lou." The old man said. "Every Friday, we pray to the graven image of Jesus in respect of the ancestors, and we allow a voice among the flock to speak his or her insight into the scriptures. Today, our guest speaker is a pilgrim from the west; the capital city of Cairo. It is not often we have someone from the Great City here, and while his credentials are rather modest, I pray that you will all give him a warm welcome."

Father Lou gestured to the left. A dark-skinned man with an even leaner build than Lou himself slowly stepped onto the stage. He was completely unremarkable. His teeth were chipped. His hair was clean, but it seemed to only be an action he had performed for this particular occasion. The buildup of debris on his face made it quite evident that showers and baths were not a luxury he partook in often.

"This is Brother Clarence." Father Lou explained. "He is a homeless wanderer who has suffered a hard life. When he told me his story, I wept countless tears alongside him.

Despite the hand he was dealt, I became inspired by his tale, and invited him to speak today. Brother Clarence, why don't you lead the flock today in prayer?"

Clarence shuffled forward. He bowed his head humbly and smiled at Father Lou.

"Father, thank you for your generosity. It has been many a moon since I experienced such warm love and devotion from my fellow man. The capital city is overrun by men with materialism in their hearts, and women who have fallen into the throes of lust. It is good to know that men and women who walk with God still lay claim to some of Earth's lands."

Father Lou stepped aside, making room at the podium for Clarence after they kissed one another on the cheek. Then Clarence took a moment to collect his thoughts.

"Before I begin, let us all offer a short moment of silence to the image of Christ." Clarence said.

Everyone in the room followed his guidance. They closed their eyes, pressed their palms together, and bowed their heads. After a few moments, they took their seats and awaited Clarence's next words.

"Brothers and sister. Mothers and fathers. Sons and daughters." Clarence said, taking care to speak loudly and project his voice to even the furthest pews. "The world we have been born into is not the same world as the one in which our parents lived, and that world was equally different from the ones of their parents, and their parents' parents, and so on. Every day, I feel that humanity's love unravels, bit by bit, more and more."

"Always," he continued, "there are good men and women out there. But the ease in which communities have degraded fills my heart with shame. Humans are destroying the planet. We are losing our love not only for one another, but for the plants, trees, bugs and animals that share this beautiful world with us."

Several people nodded. There were many among the flock who were foreigners who had moved to the monastery to live a more modest life, abandoning their materialistic ways, but far more of them were native residents who had only heard of the greed and decadence of distant powers secondhand and thirdhand from others. They had not seen such horrors with their own eyes, but they 'knew' what Brother Clarence was saying must be true!

"Every day, I pray to the Lord regarding how He plans to save our world." Clarence continued. "And recently, when I was praying, I suddenly heard His voice speak back to me! His angels had heard my prayers! The Lord knows that humanity has become too corrupted by its decadence. It has strayed too far from its origin. Our species has mutated into a disease upon His beloved blue Earth. We rape the oceans, burn the forests, and murder the wildlife, all to satiate our own greed! Surely, there must be a better way? Surely, there must be something we can do to stymie the bleeding and begin rebuilding for the betterment of all species?"

Clarence paused. His eyes flickered around as he looked at several audience members randomly, making them feel as if he were speaking to them personally.

On the sidelines, Father Lou watched Clarence's speech with rapt attention. His heart swelled with awe as he realized this Clarence might initially seem simple and unassuming, but in reality, he had an incredible knack for public speaking! Every word incited the audience's interest and sucked them deeper into his flow. Even Father Lou was becoming greatly invested in what Clarence would say next.

This was not a talent that could easily be trained. It had to be granted by the Divines at birth!

Clarence was no ordinary man. He was blessed by the Angels! And only Lou knew the Truth of this matter based on his lifetime of knowledge and access to information. He would surely alert the Angels as to Clarence's gift, following his sermon.

"We must return to our roots. We must aggressively spread the Gospel of Christ!" Clarence declared. "We must return to the womb from whence we came and be reborn anew, ready to show our fellow humans that there is a better path forward!"

Clarence's fiery words slowly died down in intensity. He shook his head and revealed a sad expression.

"Unfortunately... I am but one man. I am a humble vagrant. A traveler with no home of my own, and no family to love me. I can speak my Truths, but I cannot spread His message across the Earth. Only with the help of other like-minded people can the love of Christ reach the ears of even the most hard-hearted listeners abroad! So that is why I have come here today. I wish to ask all of you... are you willing to abandon your home, join me, and spread the Word of the Divines?!"

Clarence raised his voice.

"Are you?!"

The audience didn't reply at first. They were so captivated by his words that their souls nearly left their bodies. After a few moments, most of the audience members stood up and raised their fists.

"We are ready!" A man exclaimed.

"I wish to spread Jesus's love!" A woman shouted.

"Sitting here will accomplish nothing. We must be proactive!" Another man added.

One by one, the people in the audience threw their metaphorical hats into the ring. Clarence beamed a smile at all of them.

"Brothers. Sisters. You are not wrong to believe in my vision! Some believe that the Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away. But I disagree! We cannot expect Him to do all the work! We must serve Him and give Him the fruits of our labor as proof of our devotion! It is God's job to punish, but our job to send the sinners to meet him!"

Clarence's last comment caused a strange expression to pass over Father Lou's face, but that moment passed. He dismissed it as Clarence simply being a little too excited in the passion of his speech.

"Well spoken, Brother Clarence!" Father Lou said. "It is true that often man is weak and fickle of mind, too absorbed in himself to give back to the Lord. You have brought an important matter to all our attention!"

"Thank you, Father." Clarence said, his tone becoming a bit more humble as he bowed back toward Lou. "Of course, it is not enough to merely speak empty words. To that end, I would like to continue today's lesson by reading some key verses from the books of Matthew and John. As I was reading them, I noticed some passages that would even enlighten those of us with open minds toward the Lord's will! Take for example-"

He turned to speak to the audience once more, but at that moment, the front doors to the monastery were flung open. An old monk rushed inside, panic on his face.

"Father Lou! Father Lou!!"

Lou frowned. It was out of the ordinary for Brother Tamas to interrupt a Friday service.

"What is the matter?" Lou asked.

"Monsters! Horrible monsters! They're approaching the monastery from the west!!" Brother Tamas half-screamed. "Horrible creatures with red skin and long horns on their heads! They look like humans, but they are bloodthirsty and wretched! They will fall upon us within minutes!!"

"Demons." Father Lou whispered in horror, his eyes shrinking to pinpricks. "S-stay calm! Everyone, the ancestors knew a Day of Sin would befall the non-believers! Quickly, come to the altar! We must all place our hands upon Catherine's Table and beseech her and the Divines to save the monastery!"

Brother Clarence looked around in utter confusion. As a guest, he was not aware of what was going on, but the regulars of the church moved quickly and without panicking. They followed Father Lou's orders and moved toward the altar atop the Holy Pedestal. One by one, they all placed a hand upon it and began to chant according to Lou's instructions.

"Ancient ones! Servants of the Divine! We beseech you! Save us from the Red Calamity!"

Their minuscule amounts of mana barely served to ignite the altar's hidden function. A flicker of light appeared in the air, a mere ball of energy, which then launched into the sky and passed through the roof harmlessly.

Outside the monastery, the screams of people began to grow louder and louder. Those shrieks of horror escalated in intensity. Some of them cut off abruptly, followed by distant, wicked peals of laughter that drew nearer and nearer.

Brother Tamas shut the large wooden doors of the monastery. He swung a heavy metal bar down to lock the entrance tightly, then looked at Father Lou with a face drained of blood.

"What now?!" Tamas asked.

"The ritual is complete!" Lou exclaimed. "Everyone, help me push the altar aside. There is a secret passage leading underground. Brother Clarence, you should take the devotees and flee with them to the east! I will stay here to act as a distraction to these hellish invaders!"

"Father Lou!" Tamas cried. "No, you can't stay! Those monsters will kill you!"

"If the monastery is empty, they will grow suspicious and follow you." Lou said solemnly. "Now... GO! Do not delay another moment!"

And so they did. Clarence was the first to enter, taking up a torch and lighting it before descending into the passage beneath the altar. Hundreds of people quickly followed after him, single-file, leaving only Father Lou behind.

Lou used all of his strength to heave the altar back into place. He dislocated his shoulder from the strain, but luckily he managed to put the altar perfectly back into place before crawling away and collapsing in exhaustion at the bottom of the steps.

"Demon... bastards..." Lou grieved, listening to the sounds of innocent people falling like wheat to the chaff outside the monastery's doors.

Not even a minute later, the door exploded! Heavy chunks of wood, along with the large steel bar, flew across the room and slammed against the monastery's far walls.

A powerful demon with the aura of a Baron strode inside and looked around. Two other Barons followed behind him.

"The Monastery is empty." The lead Baron said, looking at father Lou's collapsed figure shivering on the ground. "Save for this one fellow."

"I recognize him." A female Baron said. "He's the head of the monastery; Father Lou. The intelligence said he leads a service on Fridays. He must have helped the others escape."

Father Lou raised his head to look up at the three demons in horror. He didn't recognize them, but he knew they could kill him with a flick of their wrists.

Most frighteningly, they saw right through his plan to save the others. Clarence was in danger, along with the rest of the flock! There was no way they could outrun this blood-hungry horde of demons!

Luckily, the lead Baron's next words dissipated his greatest fear.

"It doesn't matter. We're not here to kill a few lousy humans. Let them go. Start fortifying this location for the main assault force. We won't have long before the angels respond."

The lead Baron casually walked over to Father Lou. He looked down at the human with disinterest.

"I am Hamir, the Baron of Frost. How does it feel, knowing your life is about to end, little human?"

Lou gritted his teeth. "I have lived... a long life! I do not fear death! The Divines will punish you, hellspawn!"

"Ah. So you're one of those types." Hamir said with a light eye-roll. "Always fun to converse with."

He waved his hand, and a blistering cold wave swept over Father Lou, flash-freezing his body and blood, turning him into a thousand icicles and exploding his figure from the inside-out. He didn't even feel any pain as his frozen body parts were sent scattering all across the tiled floor of the church.

"Vepar is already setting down the poison traps." The female Baron, Vespera, said. Her blackened, shadowy figure flickered as daylight passed through her body. "The Emperors should arrive within an hour or two, once they've amassed their strength. Then, we'll begin the assault on Heaven's Gate."

"What about the rumors of the two Heroes?" Hamir asked. "Are they credible? Two Trueborn in the same generation?"

"It's never happened before, but you know the humans." Vespera said. "They have a knack for surprises."

"Very true." Hamir concluded.

He and the other two Barons split up. They joined the rest of the assault force, sweeping away all the humans in the city through a rapid and violent slaughter-session. Thousands of pilgrims and acolytes screamed one last time before their bodies were ripped apart, flash-frozen, burned to ashes, or crushed into piles of meat and bone.

The humans stood no chance. This was only a backwater monastery, not a place with any formidable military force.

"Baron Hamir!" A Demon Lord shouted, running toward Hamir with great haste. "We detected a trace of holy energy traveling out of the monastery toward Mount Sinai. It's likely the humans managed to alert the damned pigeons."

"We expected as much. There's no way the angels would allow themselves to be caught unawares again." Hamir said, unperturbed. "We'll just have to work faster. Everyone, be on your guard. The enemy could swoop down from above at any time. They hold an undeniable aerial advantage against us. Don't let yourselves get picked off without a fight!"

Hamir wasn't worried. He may not have fought during the War in Heaven, but he had heard stories. The angels lost 99% of their pureblooded fighting forces. The replacements were paltry weaklings by comparison.

What did the demons have to fear from a bunch of resurrected humans? The Lazarites were only a threat in the sense of their vast numerical forces. Individually, they were only as strong as Demon Grunts and occasionally Demon Lords. Even if a hundred Lazarites came at Hamir all together, he could slaughter them with ease.

"Enemies spotted in the northwestern skies!" A demon suddenly called out. "They're swooping around. They have halos over their heads... and they're wielding bows! They're Lazarites!"

Hamir's mind engaged at full gear. He spun to look around and easily spotted five angels flying in a wide arc across the skies. As they flew, they notched arrows in their magical bows and fired downward, killing one or two random demon grunts. Nobody truly worth noting.

"Those are only the initial scouts!" Hamir exclaimed. "Take them out so they can't join with the reinforcements later!"

After delivering his command, a rain of fireballs flew into the skies, tracking the angel's movements. The armored fliers took a couple hits, but their enchanted platemail rainments absorbed and deflected all the damage, so they didn't suffer any serious injuries. At the same time, more arrows of light sailed downward and speared another handful of demons.

Multiple volleys flew into and from the air. The demons failed to kill any of the angel scouts, but the angels only succeeded in killing off more than twenty Grunts. Considering how utterly disposable such weak demons were, nobody shed any tears for them except their brood-siblings.

For some reason, one of the angels broke away from the other four. This lone brave warrior picked out the auras of all the high-level demons in the initial assault force and swooped toward a distant Baron hidden behind a building.

Hamir frowned. Before he could call out a warning, the angel disappeared from view... and that Baron's mana signature abruptly cut off.

"What?!" Hamir gasped in shock. "Dead? How could Baron Aramir die? Did it only take the enemy a single hit? But these are mere Lazarites!"

The lone angel warrior leaped back up into the air, spinning with practiced ease as he dodged multiple volleys of fireballs and earth lances flung at him from below.

Then, his attention focused on Hamir. The Baron of Frost felt a shudder go down his spine as the angel flapped his wings, took to the skies, and swooped toward him. He almost felt as if a ferocious predator had locked onto him with its cold, hungry eyes.

"Shit! This Lazarite isn't like the others! His movements are much more fluid! He must be one of the ancient Lazarites, hundreds of years old!" Hamir shouted.

There was always a combat quality difference when it came to the ages of Lazarites. The longer they lived, the more time their human intellect had to experiment with their powers, master their flying speeds, and grow more practiced in the art of war.

But even so, this particular Lazarite was way above his four peers. Their armor had some scorch marks from fireballs, but his didn't at all!

His? Hamir thought, as he noticed the long white hair trailing from behind the Lazarite. No, this elite is a woman! But who?

The female Lazarite pulled out a glowing golden spear. She flew directly at Hamir, aiming to spear his heart in one strike. Without hesitation, he exploded a cloud of white frost around himself, obscuring his surroundings and hiding his aura. Then he dove to the right and formed a shield of ice just in the nick of time.

CRAAAAACK!!!

The spear had somehow managed to track his position, the Lazarite only failing to kill him like she did Baron Aramir due to his hastily conjured ice wall. She broke through the wall and skidded to a stop behind Hamir, who quickly spun on his heel to fire a gust of icy wind at her.

What he saw made his heart turn frigid. The Lazarite woman immediately transformed her spear into a massive tower shield, deflected his wind, then flapped her wings and rushed at Hamir before he could react. She slammed into him with the shield and sent him flying through the wall of a nearby building, causing it to partially collapse atop him.

Hamir's teeth chattered with fear.

It's her! Spawn of a- it's the Daughter of Heaven!!

The woman's face may have been hidden by her helmet, but her martial prowess was already becoming feared by the demons. Some said she had the makings of a Valkyrie. Others claimed she was above them. A tentative minority even believed she had the makings of a future Archangel.

The building exploded as Hamir unleashed all his demonic power, sending chunks of stone and wood flying in all directions. He roared hatefully at Heaven's Child.

"I don't fear you! Pigeon BITCH! Your story will end here, at my hands!"

The Daughter of Heaven looked at him, her expression hidden beneath her helmet.

"You may think me the fiercest opponent you've ever faced, but I shall not remember your face by day's end." She said, her tone one of utter disinterest.

She was Cassiel, the Daughter of Heaven.

The Mightiest Lazarite.

Part 667: Hellspawn vs Heavenspawn

January 29th, 2021. Saint Catherine's Monastery.

Hamir, the Baron of Frost, and Cassiel, the Daughter of Heaven, wasted little time with pleasantries. Once Hamir realized who he was dealing with, his desire to kill Heaven's Daughter immediately began an internal battle against his preference to stay alive. He shot ice out behind himself and rocketed horizontally to the right, barely dodging as Cassiel pounced at him and slashed where his neck was only an instant earlier. Her sword cut through the air and cleanly sliced through his ice trail, sending frost flying.

Hamir spun while flying away. He deliberately crashed his back against the cobblestone road in order to aim his palms at the Mightiest Lazarite. Fourteen icicles fired at Cassiel, and she quickly bent her body to avoid them. Her shield of light enlarged in an instant, with no need for complicated casting patterns or spoken words. It operated purely on the limits of her imagination, enlarging and hardening to protect her entire body at the speed of thought. The loud sounds of ice against magisteel rang out in the air, then Heaven's Daughter gave chase after her prey.

Just as Cassiel was about to make a killing lunge to behead her opponent who had fallen onto his ass, her eyes flicked up and to the right. She flapped her wings and reversed her momentum right as a pair of Demon Barons wielding a heavy greathammer and a pair of swords attacked her from above. These newcomers failed to kill her, and their weapons struck or cut the empty air, impacting the monastery's cobblestone road harmlessly.

"Zamiel! Duriel!" Hamir shouted, jumping to his feet. "Good timing! This bitch is Heaven's Daughter! Don't take her lightly!"

If Jason were here, he would surely recognize the two of them. They were the Battle Brothers, two bastards who had worked together in the future to kill Monster King Kar. Jason managed to revive him later, but Kar had lost all of his strength and became a cripple because of them.

In this era, they were only Barons... but they were still considered half-Dukes due to having reached the limits of the Baron level.

"Hehe, no need to get your panties in a bunch!" Zamiel chuckled. "She's just some ugly woman! What can a lone Lazarite do against three Barons?"

Cassiel put a little distance between herself and the three Barons. Despite their numerical advantage, her expression beneath her helmet was anything but frightened.

"Look at those eyes." Duriel said. "She actually still wants to fight. Dumb broad, hehe..."

Zamiel was the older brother, but he was smaller than his younger brother, Duriel. Duriel was definitely the more physically imposing of the two, with a body that dwarfed his older brother. But what Zamiel lacked in stature, he made up for in cunning and finesse.

"Duriel, you take point." Zamiel ordered. "Hamir! Help me flank her! Let's pressure 'Heaven's Daughter' from all sides and see how she handles the combined might of three demon elites!"

Cassiel took a step back. She watched as Zamiel jumped atop a nearby residential rooftop to her right, and Hamir pounced up into a tree to the left, hiding amidst its branches. Duriel moved directly toward her fearlessly. It was clear he intended to draw her aggression.

In an instant, she came to a decision. She put away her sword and shield, and instead summoned a bundle of chains. At the end of the chain's length, there was a small weight attached. She conjured this new weapon in an instant, drawing the three demon's gazes.

"Heehee. Gonna tie yourself up with those?" Duriel taunted. "Too bad I ain't into broads. Maybe if you beg him with a pretty expression, Hamir will turn you into his little whore and let ya go."

"Filthy hellspawn." Cassiel growled. "Your kind... must ALL be purged!"

She snapped the chain up toward Zamiel on the rooftop. The knife at the end of the chain flew toward his heart, but he cut at the holy weapon with his swords and deflected it.

What Zamiel did not expect, or perhaps realize, was that this was no ordinary length of chain. It was forged from Cassiel's imagination. It was an extension of her mind!

After batting the chain away, Zamiel jumped off the rooftop toward Cassiel's rear, but a surge of alarm shot through his mind. He looked back just in time to see that the chain hadn't been knocked inert, but had instead coiled like a snake and pounced at him from behind!

"What? SHIT!" Zamiel cursed.

The knife made from holy energy at the tip of the chain plunged into a small gap in his armor and impaled his kidney. Zamiel lost his balance in midair and hit the ground with a heavy thud, gasping silently in pain as he grabbed the chain and tried to pull it out. However, the knife had morphed into a vicious barbed hook once it entered his body. It speared out in all directions and impaled even more of his vital organs. It finally morphed into a pair of razor-sharp swords that grew in size and bisected him at the waist.

Before Zamiel could utter a word, his body fell into two misshapen halves. He instantly died, unable to react to the Lazarite's secret technique!

Duriel looked at his leaping brother with a sneer. He didn't even have time to register Zamiel's sudden and unexpected death. He thought his brother was about to surprise the Lazarite by attacking her from behind, but at that moment, Zamiel's top and bottom halves fell to the ground, a dead look resting on his face.

"W-what?! Big brother? ZAMIEL?!" Duriel shrieked, horrified by the sight that met his eyes.

The chain turned into motes of light, then reformed in Cassiel's grasp. While Zamiel was momentarily struck dumb with fear and anger, Cassiel summoned a massive greatsword that was far lighter than it appeared. She flapped her wings and rushed at Duriel, intending to cut him down while he was momentarily shellshocked.

A burst of ice fired at her from Hamir's tree. He was already wary of Cassiel, having seen her instantly kill another Baron earlier, so Zamiel's death didn't root him in place with fear like it did with Duriel. Cassiel hurriedly stabbed the greatsword into the ground to stop her forward movement, barely avoiding a spear of ice that stabbed into the road where she would have stood only a moment earlier if she had kept going. She looked at Hamir with hateful eyes, then conjured fifteen golden knives that materialized behind her back and flew at him as if they were being controlled by telekinesis.

Hamir's heart turned cold. He quickly waved his arms to conjure a wall of ice, then flung it forward at the knives to break them. He partially succeeded. Some of the knives collided with the heavy ice and exploded into light, breaking on impact. But a few did not, and dodged to the side, flying in a circular arc as if they were birds of prey.

"Fuck, fuck, fuck!" Hamir cursed. "Lucifer's tits, this Lazarite is way stronger than the rumors said! DURIEL! SNAP OUT OF IT!"

Hamir panicked. He shot out two cones of icy wind to try and slow the knives before they could strike him, but he missed one. That knife pirouetted in midair, drawing his maddened, horrified gaze. It plunged into his heart and exploded like a grenade, sending fifteen pieces of shrapnel throughout his vital organs.

Like Zamiel, Hamir died instantly. The light dimmed in his eyes, and he plummeted from the tree to the soil below, landing with a wet and sloppy thud.

Only Duriel was left. He was so shaken with fear that he had no conception of what had even happened. As a battle-hardened warrior, he had fought many fearsome foes, but he simply wasn't ready to see his older brother perish within mere seconds. Zamiel's death rattled his simple mind and left him vulnerable to attack.

Cassiel finally closed the gap. She lifted her greatsword up, then mentally increased its sharpness to the limit, and raised its weight to more than three tons. She swung it down at Duriel from above, using gravity more than her own strength to empower her strike.

At the last moment, Duriel reflexively swung his greathammer upward in a panic, but her sword was sharp beyond comprehension. She sliced the hammer's handle in half with contemptuous ease, and her weapon cut through Duriel's body in a straight line, bisecting him with one motion.

Duriel looked up at the sky, his gaze frozen in death. His vision turned dark, and his bloody organs spilled out to splatter across the Monastery's grounds. He fell to the ground after a few moments, uncomprehending in regards to how he had fallen so easily.

In less than a minute, Heaven's Daughter had killed three lauded Barons. Powerful figures of Hell. Devils who had committed atrocities beyond compare.

Nobody was more shocked by this turn of events than Jason Hiro, who secretly watched the happenings on Earth inside the safety of Aevum. His heart beat wildly as the events of that single minute played out over the course of several hours, at a 365x time dilation, inside his realm.

This confirms it. Jason thought. If there was any doubt before, I've definitely diverged from the events of my original timeline!

Jason knew of Hamir. He was the Duke of Hailstorms in the future where Jason had come from. If he had died, there might still be some plausible deniability that perhaps the Hamir who Jason knew in the future was actually a resurrected undead demon under Mephisto's control or something. But now that Cassiel had killed Zamiel and Duriel, there was no doubt in Jason's mind. This timeline had greatly diverged from the future he knew.

The demons had launched an assault on Heaven far later in the timeline Jason was originally born. According to the spotty records he'd read, Jason estimated it should have taken them 25-50 years before they committed such a huge attack force to the battle. But his return to the past had changed things drastically.

The demon leaders were spooked. The arrival of two Trueborn Heroes (that they knew of) was a shocking revelation that forced them to accelerate their plans.

The Second War in Heaven was now happening much sooner than Jason predicted. His lack of a predictive MindCore had hurt him... even if only a little.

While he was certainly a little alarmed, his heart quickly calmed down. If it was inconvenient for him and his original plans, it also must be for Satan and the rest, too. They were not as prepared for this attack as they wanted to be.

And now? They had to face off against the Wordsmith... but they had no idea what his true abilities were.

Jason looked at the image of Cassiel, standing valiantly, covered in the viscera of Duriel, one of the demons Jason personally hated the most.

"Interesting." Jason commented to himself quietly. "I'll need to pay more attention to her. I didn't know Heaven's Daughter was so... impressive."

After slaughtering four demon elites, Cassiel barely took a moment to reflect on what she had done. She leaped into the skies and dissipated her light energy, returning to her standard sword and shield setup. Now that she had killed all the demons who witnessed one of her secret war strategies, it would be best to continue utilizing sneak attacks to slaughter the rest.

She looked down and two the left. Three Lazarites were deftly taking on a pair of Demon Lords. Two of the Lazarites wielded a sword and shield setup, like her, while the third wielded a one-handed mace. They managed to kill one of the Demon Lords, while the second killed two of the Lazarites before the final Lazarite struck him dead. Of the five combatants, only one survived.

Upon a nearby sandy hill, five Lazarites nocked their bows and sniped demons from afar, taking special care to intervene and save any fellow Lazarites who had fallen into dire straits.

These were the most common Lazarite soldiers. Even the elites only wielded standard medieval weaponry and armor. Cassiel felt a twinge of anger, knowing they could do so much more. But at the same time, she remembered Raphael's plea.

Faith Energy is finite, my dear. It is well and good if thou doth wield thy powers to the fullest extent, but too many Lazarites unleashing such formidable powers would rapidly drain our reserves. All of angelkind would perish as a result. 'Tis best thou keepeth this matter to thyself, and we make it seem as if thou art a most unique individual among the Lazarites.

She understood Raphael's logic. All angels, including the Lazarites, required faith energy to survive. Without it, they would wither and die. There was only so much to go around, and while humanity might have more and more people capable of praying and giving their power to the Angels, there were also a vastly expanding number of Lazarites that needed that same energy to survive.

Furthermore, church attendance numbers were way down. Religion as a whole had been losing steam for decades, and now the energy traveling to Heaven was lessening by the day. It was one thing if Cassiel was a trump card for the angels, but if too many other Lazarites wielded their imaginations to the fullest extent, it would result in an inevitable loss for the angels someday.

At least, that was what Raphael had told her. Cassiel was no expert on worldwide religious politicking.

She pivoted to a new target. She spotted a pair of Demon Barons hiding out at the western edge of the battlefield, not directly engaging in the ritualistic killing of the remaining humans, and seemingly disinterested in joining their allies. But at the same time, they were demons. All demons had to die.

Cassiel flapped her wings. She dove from the sky and rushed at the male and female Baron. The female was the first to notice the incoming attack.

"Gressil! Watch out!!" She shrieked.

The male snapped his eyes up. He turned pale with fear, then he waved his hands and vanished.

Cassiel's eyes widened. Invisibility?! No! It's an illusion, like Raphael!

Unable to instantly locate the male, she pivoted to eliminating the female. Cassiel reared her arm back as she dove and took aim at the female Baron's neck.

Suddenly, the female vanished as well. A terrible sense of danger overtook Cassiel's mind. She flapped her left wing to push hard to the right, just as a beam of concentrated demonic energy fired into the sky, narrowly missing her.

If that attack had landed, Cassiel realized she would have been seriously injured, if not outright vaporized on the spot. The attack was ungodly powerful.

It came from a Demon Emperor!

"The only one allowed to bully my son is me, you stupid pigeon!" A female voice roared. At that moment, Lucifer, the Emperor of Providence, leaped into the air and swiped her razor-sharp nails at Cassiel's wing. She barely managed to land a glancing slash, but it threw Heaven's Daughter off enough that she ended up crashing into the ground and rolling her body to divert her momentum. Just as quickly as she crash-landed, she sprang back to her feet and held up her shield, enlarging it to a size big enough to protect her entire body.

And not a moment too soon. Lucifer's third eye shot a concussive beam at the Lazarite, striking her shield with enough force to send her flying backward!

"Aaah!" Cassiel cried, as her back slammed against a tree. Her expression turned grim when she realized she had inadvertently engaged in battle with not only a Demon Emperor, but one of the strongest and most frightening ones of all.

Her thoughts moved quickly. She realized the male and female Barons she saw from before must be related to Lucifer. One of them was named Gressil. Cassiel had no idea who he was, but the female looked a little familiar. She must have been Abby, the Baron of Happy Thoughts. A misnomer if there ever was any, because how could any demon produce a single happy thought in another entity? They were all villains who deserved death!

With her attention focused on Lucifer, Cassiel nearly jumped out of her skin when a massive Hellhound suddenly leaped at her right side from behind a house. She reflexively swung her sword at the massive beast, but the weapon passed through its body harmlessly, and it phased out of existence like a dream.

An illusion! Cassiel shouted in her mind. It's that male demon! He-

But it was too late. She'd already been distracted by the wolf and left herself open to attack. Lucifer took the opportunity to fire another compressed beam of kinetic power from her third eye, which slammed into Cassiel's arm and sent pain coursing through her body. Cassiel crashed against the wall, her armor only absorbing some of the impact. Her head was slammed against the heavy concrete structure hard enough to jar her senses. For an instant, she blacked out and lost consciousness.

Lucifer sensed that her prey had fallen. She grinned in excitement and leaped at Heaven's Daughter to finish her off, but a moment later...

Foop!

Cassiel vanished, and a familiar human wearing a nekomimi mask appeared, his rifle aimed at Lucifer's head. His body blurred for an instant.

"Shit!" Lucifer screamed, her pupils shrinking to pinpricks.

Blam!

A bullet fired from Cat Mask's sniper rifle. It struck the edge of Lucifer's third eye and snapped her head back with such violent force that her forward momentum reversed, and she screamed in pain as she slammed onto her spine.

Cat Mask lifted his hand. A glowing green stone shone with eerie light on one of his ring fingers, and a massive blast of wind fired outward, sending pieces of dirt, rock, and other fallen debris spraying outward in a cone. Gressil and Abby cried out in alarm when all this seemingly random debris struck their real bodies and broke the illusions keeping them hidden.

Cat Mask lifted his rifle. He took aim at Gressil, but then Hideki's body blurred and he quickly looked diagonally up and to the left. A pair of Demon Emperors, Belial and Diablo, were on the way, and would arrive momentarily.

"You got lucky again." Cat Mask growled at Gressil, before teleporting away.

Diablo leaped into the clearing not even a second after Cat Mask disappeared, his expression dim.

"Lucy! Are you okay?" Diablo asked, kneeling beside his ex-mate.

Lucifer held her third eye, waves of pain still radiating through her body and brain. Tears reflexively poured from her eyes. If Cat Mask's bullet had landed a centimeter to the left, he'd have likely put her eye out, and maybe even killed her on the spot. Unfortunately, even through multiple rewinds, he found it simply impossible to land such a perfect shot, considering her demonic reflexes, so he settled for this next-best option.

"Bastard! Spawn of a broodmother!" Lucifer roared with hatred and humiliation mixed together. "Twice! That Cat Mask has nearly killed me twice! His accuracy is uncanny!"

Despite not liking Lucifer in the slightest, Belial still walked over and healed her injury. For once, Lucifer didn't turn down her help. The pain was simply too unbearable. She desperately wanted it to go away.

"What's the status on the Monastery?" Diablo asked, turning his body from left to right to look for anyone who could give him an answer.

"Four Barons dead." Gressil said, lowering his eyes. "The Battle Brothers are gone."

"Duriel and Zamiel both?" Diablo asked with visible alarm. "Cat Mask killed them?"

"No!" Abby interjected. "It was that famous Lazarite. Heaven's Daughter. Emperor Lucifer nearly killed her, but Cat Mask intervened at the last moment."

"So that's what happened." Diablo grunted. "It seems we're close to securing the monastery. Hurry up and eradicate all the humans and Lazarites in the immediate vicinity. After we erect a barrier, we're moving on to Heaven itself. I want this place fortified within the hour, before Satan arrives. We need a forward base for Mephisto to erect his Death Gates."

Abby nodded, but she seemed visibly shaken by the multiple near-death experiences in a row. She was not much of a fighter, and preferred to avoid direct combat.

"Where is Ose?" Abby asked, looking around. "Isn't she supposed to be joining us?"

Lucifer massaged her eye. The pain was gone, but there was a phantom itchiness driving her batty now.

"No. My precious Ose told me she has a secret mission she's dealing with. We will not need to rely on her anyway... or do you think demonkind's leaders are so weak that her absence will spell our doom?"

"No, it's not that, I just..." Abby said hesitantly. "I was only hoping to see her! Oh well."

Gressil looked at Abby from behind. He said nothing. He looked away and rubbed his arm self-consciously.

"Don't you lot worry about Ose." Lucifer said with a mischievous smile. "I've noticed that since her ascension to Emperor, she's become frighteningly quick-witted. She'll go to any lengths to empower our future. Have faith. I expect big things from her in the coming days... or perhaps even hours."

Diablo smirked. "I would never dare to underestimate little Ose. She's one scary lady."

Part 668: Temporal Divergence

January 29th, 2021. Nevada, USA.

On the opposite side of the world from Saint Catherine's Monastery, in a place equally desertified where the sun scorched the sands and mountainous dunes until they were sometimes bleached white, there sat a secret Air Force base that had become a little too well-known for the liking of the military's higher-ups.

This base was known as Area 51.

It had become famous over the last several decades due to internet conspirators spinning all manner of strange, made-up tales. But it was, without a doubt, a highly remote and secure location ripe with secrets the United States would rather keep under lock and key.

It was night-time at the base. The sun would peek over the horizon within less than an hour, and already the faintest wisps of light were becoming visible over the hills. The stars twinkled above, and the lack of ambient background light made stargazing a fun activity for guards to momentarily relieve their boredom. The light pollution of the bigger cities was much more muted this far out in the desert, and the lights inside the base were not oppressive enough to drown out the stars.

Amy Sandoval was one of the many people watching the base's sizable outer perimeter. She was twenty years old, with blonde hair kept in a bob, and she wore a helmet with attached goggles that granted her enhanced night vision. As a night-guard, she wasn't anyone of particular note, but she was planning to apply for a special ops assignment later that year. She had heard rumors of a secret new military test being conducted by multiple branches, and she was interested in earning promotions quickly. It wouldn't do for her to waste these crucial early years. If she became known as a lazy bum or a floozy, her career would quickly stall out and eventually nosedive.

Amy had a nickname. Ambitious Amy. Some of the other soldiers mocked her for it, but most stayed out of her way. She was neat, orderly, and took care of herself and her weapons. She was a stickler for the rules as written; less so their spirit. If anyone on the base was going to get a promotion, she hoped it would be her.

She was only a Private now, but in the future... anything was possible.

Amy paced back and forth, alternating looking up at the sky, which had its stars become even more brilliant with the help of her night vision, and the horizon, where she would be able to see enemies coming from miles away, unless they were wearing camouflage capable of fooling her night vision. But that's why the other guards wore thermal and infrared goggles; to cover more possible avenues of attack.

"It's a cold one tonight..." Amy muttered to herself, as she exhaled warm air onto her gloved hands to try and heat them up. Deserts might be known for their scorching days, but they were equally fearsome when it came to their cold nights.

Suddenly, a light flashed in the sky above. Amy glanced up at it.

The light flickered for so short and brief a time that Amy momentarily thought she must have hallucinated it. Perhaps it was a shooting star, or one of the men on the base waved a flashlight up into the air, or-

BATOOOOM!!!

A horrifying explosion detonated half a kilometer behind Amy. Amy turned around to look at what had just happened, only for a brilliant light erupting from the explosion site to momentarily blind her, followed by a shockwave slamming into and throwing her body like a ragdoll.

"Aaugh!" Amy cried, as she was flung backward. She skidded across the sand, causing it to funnel into her clothing and boots, but she had no time to pay attention to her discomfort. She massaged her eyes and stumbled to her feet, visibly confused.

What the fuck? Was that a missile? Did somebody attack the base?

"HQ, this is Private Sandoval, something just exploded half a click from the base's entrance! It's inside the perimeter!" Amy shouted into her radio. "I'm going to investigate! HQ! HQ, can you hear me? HQ??"

She spoke into her walkie-talkie while jogging heavily across the thick and viscous sand, but all she received were crackling noises in response. In the distance, she could hear noises of confused yelling, followed by a few cries of pain. Whatever had detonated inside the base must have injured some people.

Suddenly, shouts of alarm rang out. Amy couldn't make out the exact words, but they were all angry and fearful.

Then, gunfire erupted. Bullets started flying in the air, and the sounds of whizzing shells in the distance made Amy dive to the ground.

What the hell are they shooting at? Have the others gone mad?! Amy screamed in her head.

Amy hunkered down on the ground, afraid of a stray bullet striking her from the people crazily shooting at... something. She was still too far away to make out what was happening, but she could swear she saw sparks of... electricity? Was that what it was? She zoomed her night vision goggles to try and get a better look, but what she saw only made her even more confused.

A few dozen troopers surrounded... something in the darkness. The muzzles of their guns flickered with light as they rapidly discharged bullet after bullet at the thing. Then, it moved, and its body began to glow.

Its body. That's right. It was a creature.

Lightning crackled violently around the monster. As the lightning became more energetic, Amy finally got her first look at the thing. It turned out to be... a person? A human? But with horns...

"HAHAHA! PITIFUL!" The creature suddenly shouted, its voice clearly female. "You ants think yourselves my match? You can all DIE!"

At that moment, something happened that was so horrifying, Amy's blood turned to ice.

The woman swept her palms in an outward motion. More than thirty lightning bolts fired outward in a cone before her, swept through the bodies of the brave men and women daring to try and take her down, and instantly killed them on the spot.

Some of the soldiers exploded into chunks of superheated meat and bone.

Many of them scattered to ash.

A few shuddered and spasmed in agony for a few seconds before their internal organs burst, causing blood to erupt from all their orifices.

None of them screamed. They couldn't. Her lightning was so powerful that it killed them all on the spot. Their bodily spasms were caused purely by involuntary neuro-receptor triggers.

Just as quickly as the woman attacked, the gunfire stopped. Every human in the immediate vicinity perished. All except for Amy.

Amy stopped breathing. She was so frightened that she started trembling from head to toe. She knew the people who had just been killed. She had served with a few of them since she joined the military two years ago. Being assigned to this base was supposed to be a fairly prestigious position, one that would accelerate her future career trajectory.

Now, she felt it was the most horrifying, stupid, unthinkably idiotic decision she had ever made in her life.

Amy knew that by the end of this day, she was almost certainly going to die.

Oh god, oh god, oh fuck, fuck fuck fucking fuck me... Amy chanted in her mind, unable to form a coherent thought.

Just as soon as Amy thought that the woman with the white hair was about to turn around and kill her, she didn't. The woman flickered away, seemingly out of existence, and a second massive explosion, right at the entrance to the underground base, detonated once more.

Amy's bones nearly leaped right out of her skin.

What is even HAPPENING right now?! She screamed in her heart.

Inside the White House, it was eight AM. President Johannesburg sipped his morning coffee and skimmed through a few reports on his desk detailing the movements of 'Red Sentients' southeast of Israel. These reports were sent over by the ISDF requesting recon drones to survey the area. Steven frowned.

Being the President is way more intense than I expected. He thought. I expected it to be mostly about political dealings and pushing my agenda through, but instead I'm fighting a secret war against the fucking demons. What an absurd world we've all turned out to be living in.

He quickly signed off on approving the reconnaissance drone support, but hardly had he started to move on to the next report before a frenzied series of knocks followed on the entrance to the Oval Office.

"Mister President! It's urgent!" Came the voice of a man Johannesburg begrudgingly recognized.

"Come in, Chris." Steven said, glancing at the door.

A moment later, the door flew open, and Steven's morbidly obese bastard of a Defense Secretary, Chris Brisker, charged into the room while waving papers.

"Sir! Sir!" Chris said, his jowls flapping with a mixture of fear and excitement. "It happened! The Red Sentients launched an attack forty-five minutes ago on one of Egypt's remote regions! We weren't able to predict their movements perfectly, but we know their target. They attacking the Holy Mountain next!"

Unfortunately, as the Secretary of Defense, Chris was one of a select few who had been debriefed on the existence of so-called Red Sentients. The thought that he knew such a precious national secret made him practically shake with excitement. He was a big fan of knowing things, and an even bigger fan of running his damn mouth. Steven secretly feared it was only a matter of time before he flapped his gums to the media and revealed the 'big secret'.

The more Steven thought about the modern world, the more he thought keeping a secret as big as the existence of the metaphysical world under wraps was an impossible task. With smartphones in every citizen's hands, and the media practically drooling for a crazy scoop to splash across their front pages, it was a miracle the secret hadn't been let out. Or maybe it had, and the Men in Black were better at their jobs than he knew.

"An attack?" Steven asked, directing his full attention to Chris. "Tell me more."

And so he did. Chris quickly sat down across from Steven, blabbering incessantly about every minute detail he knew, even as Steven read the reports Chris had handed him.

"They're setting up a forward position. Something defensible they can use to flood the entrance to Heaven with hellspawn. It seems they're either going to construct or already have constructed a barrier meant to keep missiles from hitting their ops-base."

Steven fell silent for roughly five seconds. He tapped his chin thoughtfully.

"So? How will we respond?" Chris prompted impatiently. "I say we go in guns blazing! Send in the boys!"

"Mother of god, Chris. Calm down." Steven said, glowering at his cabinet-member. What was he thinking, putting this moron in charge of defense? First chance he got, he'd send in the MiB to wipe Chris's memory and put someone less idiotic in charge. "A military response is appropriate, given the angels are our nominal allies. But this is happening on Egyptian soil. We need to inform them first and see if they can prepare a response first. Appraise President Abdul of the broad situation and see what his response is. We'll need six hours to coordinate a proper response before we can even think of moving in troops."

Chris's voice lowered. "But... what if the demons aren't interested in taking their time? They seem to be moving quickly. Blitzkrieg, shock and awe, that sort of thing. We might show up only for the battle to already be over."

"I don't care how powerful the demons are." Steven stated. "War is a logistical nightmare. The demons are trying to gain entry into a hidden realm with only one major entrance. Once they're inside, they might be able to open portals of their own to flood inside, but even gaining entry will not be easy. Heaven has already been invaded once, and the angels took great care to fortify the entrance far beyond its ancient strength. Coupled with billions of Lazarites at their beck and call, they have a lot of meat they can throw into the demon grinder if they must. They will be able to stall until we arrive."

Steven tapped the report with one finger. "I noticed it said here that the Hero known as 'Cat Mask' appeared on-site and nearly killed Demon Emperor Lucifer all by himself. That means he and his son, as well as the Illuminati, have likely been informed of the matter and are monitoring the situation. It's imperative the United States takes action, but we must not be hasty. It would send the wrong message. We must project strength and confidence. Rushing in blindly will indicate a state of panic and fear on our end, which will increase the demons' morale. We don't want them thinking we're afraid of them, do we, Chris?"

Chris looked at Steven blankly. "Uhh, right! You said it yourself, Mister President. Look strong, not weak."

Steven quietly sighed. He really needed to replace Chris, and soon. The guy practically had a black hole of intelligence in his head. If his father hadn't been a sitting senator for two decades, he'd probably never have risen in the political theater.

"Alright, you're dismissed, Chris." Steven said, waving his hand. "Tell the war room to prepare a recon report on the composition of the demon army. I'll join them in thirty minutes."

"Sure thing, Mister President!" Chris blubbered, standing up quickly and nearly knocking over his seat. He quickly exited the war room, making Steven sigh for perhaps the hundredth time.

"I need to get rid of him." Steven muttered to himself.

He glanced at another set of papers on his desk, with the words TOP SECRET: Project Iron Bone written on the front.

"Not yet." Steven whispered. "Hopefully it'll be ready within a few years. Perhaps even before the end of my first term..."

Jason Hiro sat inside a secret room somewhere deep within the heart of Aevum. This room was sealed behind multiple layers of security, including spells that hid his location, his aura, and prevented trace-backs of his soul link.

That last part was especially important. Four phantasmal versions of Jason sat in lotus positions around him, their ghostly bodies unmoving. Their bodies glowed with an eerie blue light, and their eyes shone even brighter still. They looked at Jason emptily, not a single thought stirring within their souls.

These were Jason's newest creations: Spiritual Incarnations.

Not like when he fought Ose and stupidly brought his soul out of his body, and not like her Astral Body either; these Incarnations were intimately linked to his soul. In fact, they were severed pieces of it, which were directly controlled by Jason, but indirectly separated from his True Body. Any higher level Psion that knew of these incarnations would be shocked, if not horrified out of their mind! It was a similar principle behind how their True Souls remotely piloted false bodies across the cosmos!

Jason's four Incarnations each remotely piloted a Dronesmith v2. One of those Dronesmiths hung out with Daisy and her friends, while the other three executed other missions. By now, Daisy had grown suspicious of the fact that her 'father' was acting a little weird, and because she couldn't sense his soul or his thoughts. Naturally, Jason had already fortified his Mind Realm to prevent random telepaths from reading his thoughts, but the security measure was even more potent when he controlled a Dronesmith. They didn't have any thoughts to read in the first place!

His Mind Realm was directly shielded, his body was hidden within a secret room which itself was hidden within the secret realm of Aevum, and his incarnations were only indirectly linked to his body via spirit links. This meant that the situation he had encountered in the past where Hope was able to trace a link from the Dronesmiths back to Jason and then yank him back into Realspace would never happen again!

Jason had learned from his past mistakes. He still had a long way to go, but perfectionism was the enemy of progress.

Around Jason, a new version of the Spynet had been created. It no longer used computer or digital television screens, but instead highly optimized spiritual displays that could output everything from sights and sounds to smells and emotions.

Jason had been hard at work developing the new and improved Spynet v2. This one came complete with Psion detection algorithms, including activity trackers for high level Psions, as well as Demonic Energy detectors.

Jason pursed his lips. He turned to look at the slow-moving image of his father battling Demon Emperor Lucifer at Catherine's Monastery.

"Hmm. It might be time for Project Great Deceiver to move to Phase Two." Jason said to nobody in particular. "The demons know about the legendary Cat Mask, and his fame is starting to grow. If I send the 'Archseer' into battle, I can probably stir up some trouble. But Ose is starting to worry me a little. She and Satan had a private discussion about something I wasn't able to intercept. What did she tell him...?"

Jason glanced at one of his Incarnations. "Any thoughts?"

The blank-eyed spiritual construct said nothing. It simply continued to creepily stare directly at him, an invisible leyline of energy transmitting between its 'brain' and his.

"Well, whatever." Jason muttered. "Even if Ose figures out everything, including the fact I'm a time traveler, and she uncovers how my powers really work, it won't matter. Aevum is hidden halfway across the galaxy in a location too remote for her to reach. I have the absolute advantage in terms of abilities and resources."

Jason chewed his lip.

"What's the worst thing that could possibly happen if she figures out too many Truths I'm trying to keep hidden? Well, my father's information on the future could decay quickly. The demons could start making moves he never expected. In fact, this attack on Heaven is happening far sooner than he ever expected. I'd be tempted to download his memories if what I saw wouldn't scare the shit out of me. God knows what horrors he's seen across tens of billions of years..."

Jason blinked. He looked at the Incarnation to his right. He looked through its eyes and sighed in relief.

"Oh, good. So. Raphael's 'Cosmic Realm' exists and so far I haven't found any Kolvaxians inside of it. That means they weren't around by this point in the timeline. I probably have a while before they arrive or are created."

Jason tapped his knee thoughtfully. "Kolvaxians. Are they invaders from another galaxy? A biological experiment gone wrong? Gone right? Did the Volgrim create them, then play stupid about their origins? Can I trust anything Unarin told me? And how did they breach the Cosmic Realm anyway? Could they be related to Andromeda..."

Jason's eyes flashed. He suddenly smiled as he looked to his left.

"Yes! You found it! Right at the edge of the Hell Harbor system... as expected."

Elsewhere in the galaxy, one of Jason's Dronesmiths materialized inside a different realm, one where the stars had completely disappeared. It flew toward a massive Cube seemingly lightyears in the distance, and when the Cube expanded in the drone's field of view, it drew closer and closer until it was able to circle around and locate the entrance.

Jason took direct control of this particular Dronesmith. He levitated into the Cube and immediately came into contact with the ten Sentry Stars that activated when they sensed the intruder's presence.

[HRRM BRRRM BRMM!]

Their loud, vibration-like language struck the Dronesmith, only to bounce right off. Inside Aevum, Jason uttered a Word of Power.

"Deactivate."

All ten Sentry Stars turned off at the same time. They floated inertly in place, posing no harm to Jason.

For the first time, Jason took a serious look at them. He inspected their internals with his Wordsmithing and his hyper-advanced MindCore. He was shocked out of his mind at what he saw.

"My god! What high level artifacts! These Sentry Stars don't use human technological principles, but instead alien ones that fuse with angelic mana to create a masterful fusion of technology and magic! The energy pathways alone!! If I could reverse engineer these concepts to the fullest extent, I could increase my efficiency of absorbing interstellar energy into Aevum by a factor of ten!!"

He was shocked out of his mind! Whatever Camael had done to create these Sentry Stars, her artisanal abilities were far beyond his. For the first time ever, he began to feel a sort of engineering 'hunger' toward Camael. He desperately wished to pick her brain and see what he could learn.

Consensually, of course. He wasn't about to strap her down to a mad scientist's torture table and suck out her brain juices or anything psychotic like that. Unless she deserved it. Who knew what atrocities she may have committed in the past before Raphael's mind-wipes?

Jason's excitement increased even more the longer he looked at their schematics. "These are no ordinary constructs. Each one must have required a massive number of exotic materials in order to make them so large, which means Camael spared no expense. It seems they're even better at battling Cosmic entities than they are mortal ones, provided they have enough power fueling them. That makes sense, too! Camael designed them to protect the Cube in an era where Apex Cosmics roamed the Milky Way freely. She must have feared the dragons would come to free their captive brother..."

Jason turned his gaze toward the center of the Cube. His expression turned solemn as he uttered a Word of Power and became disappointed by what he found.

His body flickered. The Dronesmith teleported to the Cube's center, and he found the control matrix in the same condition as when he stumbled across it in the future. There were images of ancient monsters emblazoned on the control cube's six sides, and a massive hole had been torn out of one of those images, ruining it beyond recognition.

"The dark dragon isn't here." Jason muttered to himself quietly. "That means it escaped well before the Energy Wars. As expected. Leviathan must have escaped and traveled to Earth to hide long, long ago."

Jason's mind stirred. He thought about what he'd just said, then slowly shook his head.

"Was it Leviathan? I don't know... this seems a little out of his modus operandi. From what I've gleaned, he's not a particularly malicious bastard, full of anger and rage. He seemed quite content to sleep in a cave and leave everyone else alone. And it seems dragons were not the actual 'bad guys' of the Primordial Era. They were simply prey for the angels. Prey that fought back and ultimately lost the war. In a way the dragons were... tragic figures."

Jason's eyes flashed.

"Then who was the dark dragon contained within this prison? If it wasn't Leviathan, could it have been a different one? But Dragons shared their power. If Leviathan was as strong as he was while there was still another dragon alive, then killing one of them would double the strength of the other!"

A chill went down Jason's spine. "That would mean if there really was another dragon, then it would have become twice as strong as it was after it escaped the Cube, given Leviathan died at some point. When did he die though? I don't think I ever learned that specific information. Amelia never told me..."

The Dronesmith levitated around the small inner cube. It was only 'small' relative to the primary cube enveloping it, because in actuality it was two kilometers wide from edge to edge. Its interior had to be vast in order to accommodate its ancient long-escaped prisoner.

Jason finally reached the side that held the engraved image of the Phoenix. When he arrived, he spotted the 100-foot in diameter red orb that housed the Phoenix. With Jason having prematurely shut off the Sentry Stars, his previous interaction of the Phoenix exiting their central cerebral units to meet him never happened. Instead, the orb flickered to life and glowed a dim red color.

[Hello, friend!] The Phoenix said, as she suddenly exited her control unit. She flew around Jason excitedly, a tiny orb of glowing red energy that examined him from head to toe. [How odd! You look a lot like the Big Mean Dummies! Your body is really strange. But it seems nice!]

Jason smiled. [Hello, Phoenix. I'm here to save you from your boredom. Do you know who I am?]

[No idea!] The Phoenix chirped. [But you seem like a friend, so I'll call you Friend!]

[I am your friend, and you can just continue calling me that if you want, or you can call me Jason. Anyway, let me examine your control matrix.]

He mostly ignored the Phoenix. He felt a little bad, but she had already endured eons of boredom and loneliness. A few minutes of not having her questions immediately answered wouldn't hurt.

"Examine. Diagram. Inspect. Hmm, so it's like that. Marvelous. In the past, I was too ignorant to comprehend the greater profundities of technology, but now I am truly awed by Camael's work. She is far, far above my level when it comes to her artifacts' refinement of stellar and celestial energy."

Jason looked up at the Phoenix's glowing orb. [Phoenix, do you know who Camael is?]

[Nope!] The Phoenix replied. [Her name sounds nice. Is she a friend, too?]

[She is.] Jason answered. [But she can't talk to you right now. She lost her memories, just like you did. Well, I'll have to solve one problem first before solving another. Let's see if I can juice you up a bit...]

Jason frowned. When he died in the future and reawakened inside the Cube, Beelzebub was there, and he had apparently used some technique to revive the Phoenix back to its original form. How did he do it?

Jason traced his memories. He recalled that Beelzebub had mentioned being linked to the Phoenix somehow. That made sense. Jason knew Beelzebub was linked to it because the damned artifact had revived Beelzebub and recognized him as her 'friend'. Luckily, it all worked out in the end, and Beelzebub ended up saving Jason's life.

In his heart, Jason had finally forgiven Beelzebub. Not fully, but most of the way. Beelzebub hadn't killed Daisy, but he did kill countless other humans. Beelzebub had converted to humanity's side in the end. He wasn't irredeemable, but a victim of the system he was raised in.

If Beelzebub could become an ally to humanity, then didn't that mean other demons could, as well? Jason wasn't sure. He didn't want to end up sacrificing millions of humans to find out either. In the future, he would give demons chances to amend their ways, but he would never be as foolish as he was in his youth and give that trust freely and without restrictions.

Jason shook his head. He focused on the Phoenix again and started to think.

Beelzebub used his 'link' to transfer his Middle Cosmic energy to the Phoenix. I'm not a Middle Cosmic, so I can't do that. But maybe I can use a different method?

Jason examined the Phoenix's Control Unit more carefully now that he had a goal in mind. He quickly found that it was actually a machine capable of absorbing and controlling vast amounts of energy in order to empower itself and its internal systems.

Jason marveled at his new understanding of Angelitech. Camael's comprehension of its principles were far above his own, and as a novice, he was only beginning to tap into the greater possibilities such technology held.

From what he could tell, the Cube was actually incomplete! It had never been finished. Camael clearly intended not to make a prison for a dragon with it, but... something else.

Jason spent several Aevum hours grokking this information. He closed his eyes and started rapidly disassembling and reassembling the Cube and its control unit, along with the Sentry Stars, bit by bit. Such a vast construct was not simple to dissect. It took serious effort on his part to do so.

After hours of engrossing research, Jason came to a conclusion.

"This was originally just a casual experiment. Camael repurposed it into a prison for the Dark Dragon, but that wasn't the Cube's original purpose. That may even be why it was able to escape. The dragon grew in power after Leviathan died... no, was it when Leviathan died? Is Leviathan even dead?"

Jason wasn't sure. He hadn't been able to locate the dragon, but he knew due to Gressil's existence that it was possible to hide from his Wordsmithing. He had considered the possibility that Leviathan's death gave the 'dark dragon' the power to escape the Cube, but perhaps it escaped even earlier than that. Jason simply wasn't certain.

"Anyway, the Cube wasn't originally made to be a prison. Based on what I've gleaned, Camael was wavering between making a new realm of some sort, similar to Heaven, where the angels could reside without leaking their cosmic power, but she was also thinking of constructing an intergalactic warship. Something she and the other Angels could enter and use to travel across the cosmos, attacking their enemies among the other Rulers and Sentients across the universe. That's why the Cube is able to move around in the higher dimensions. But ultimately, she failed to realize either of her visions..."

Jason pondered for a while. In realspace, this happened over the course of only a few seconds. But in Aevum time, he spent several minutes.

"It would be a waste to simply turn the Cube into a second Aevum. I need to give it a unique purpose that makes the best use of its capabilities. Well, for now at least, I'll just worry about re-energizing its power matrix and bringing it to Aevum's sector near the galactic core. That should only require a few real-weeks of travel time. Plenty of Aevum-years for me to think about what to do with it by the time it arrives."

Jason spent another hour or two reconstructing the Phoenix's control matrix. As he did, he chatted the little bird up and had a good time getting to know her again. This time though, he was not in the dark about her capabilities, and could awe her with his knowledge.

[That's right. Ice cream is very cold and delicious.] Jason said. [Once I build you a new body, you can have a taste of it. You'll probably melt it once it gets too close to you, but you can still savor its sugary goodness.]

[Wow! Wowee, friend! I can't wait to taste the creamed ice!] The Phoenix chirped. [Is my matrix thingy finished yet? Is it fixed? Is it? Is it?]

She pestered him multiple times, but Jason never lost his patience. If it wasn't for the Phoenix, he would never have revived, traveled back in time, and found out that his daughter was still alive.

Jason's vision momentarily dimmed. Even if Daisy was alive, and even if he'd met his father, Phoebe was still gone.

His wife was dead.

Thinking about Phoebe... always caused a cloud of despair to swallow his mind. It was impossible to feel good about life when she had been a key driving force that always kept him going.

Right now, he stayed alive and fought for both Daisy and Hideki's sakes. But if they passed, Jason believed he wouldn't have the motivation to go on any longer.

They were his weak points. If the demons ever killed these last two people who kept him clinging to the mortal coil, Jason really didn't think he had it in him to keep living.

Eventually, Jason finished his work. He reignited the Cube's power source, summoned the Sentry Stars, and initialized its jump drive. The Cube leaped into P-space and began traveling out of the Hell Harbor system toward the southern edge of the Milky Way's core.

Jason left his Dronesmith inside the Cube to monitor its situation and control its progress. He activated its autonomous control mode, allowing the drone to pilot the cube without Jason's direct intervention.

Jason had long decided he would never again create clones of himself. Hope was an unfortunate accident that led to the worst disaster of Jason's entire life. Therefore, Incarnations were Jason's next best option. They were linked to his mind, and he could control them directly, but they could also be set to act autonomously, making the same general choices he would make if he controlled them, but at a fraction of the brainpower.

This allowed him to switch them to autonomous mode where they would transmit information to him, and even fight or explore on their own, but they were not clones with unique minds of their own. They were merely low-bandwidth copies of Jason's exact personality that he could retake control of at any time.

"They'd be even more effective if I instead had a MindCore installed that was focused on swarm-like manipulation of drones. I could autonomously pilot tens, hundreds, even thousands of Dronesmiths. But I wouldn't give up my GenesisFrame for anything. The ability to invent and summon objects at rapid speeds is way more valuable to me. I'll just have to deal with 'only' projecting myself into a few specific places at a time."

One of Jason's four drones was talking to his daughter and her friends. Another was exploring the Cosmic Realm. A third was navigating the Cube to Aevum's star system.

As for the fourth one...

Jason glanced behind himself at the fourth Incarnation, which also stared at him with blank, glowing eyes.

"The demons are about to attack Heaven. Ose is attacking Area 51 for some reason. Should I intervene in one of those two situations?"

Naturally, his Incarnation did not offer a reply. Jason simply liked to talk out loud because hearing himself speak often helped sort his thoughts.

"No. My dad can handle those situations. I'll let him do what he thinks is most appropriate. Even if the demons end up utterly slaughtering all of angelkind, I won't intervene. Compared to the threat of the Psions, the demons are nothing at all. They don't even know about Demon Deities in this era. No, I need to keep my eyes on the bigger picture..."

Jason summoned his to-do list, which by now had become a lot longer and better organized.

REACQUIRE ORIGINAL POWERS AND ABILITIES AT OR EXCEEDING PREVIOUS LEVELS (Progress: 85%)

REBUILD INTERNAL MIND REALM; ESTABLISH NEW 'SMITHY' PROTOCOLS; RETURN BRAIN FUNCTION TO SUPERHUMAN LEVELS (Plan exchanged for new one)

CREATE NEW MINDCORE, USE IT TO SPEED UP COMPLETION OF OTHER PLANS (Done)

CONSTRUCT TIME ACCELERATED REALM (Progress: 47%)

LOCATE CAMAEL'S CUBE, MOVE TO AEVUM'S STAR SECTOR (In-progress)

CONSIDER MOVING ENTIRETY OF MARIE'S FUTURE REMNANT OASIS FACILITY TO SECRET DIMENSIONAL SPACE (Undecided)

PROJECT 'GREAT DECEIVER' (Phase 1 Complete, Phase 2 Pending)

INVESTIGATE VOLGRIM, DETERMINE THREAT LEVELS (Progress: 5%)

EMPOWER HUMANS, REMOVE FLAW (Progress: 3%)

PACIFY DEMONS, PREFERABLY FORM ALLIANCES, BUT EXTERMINATE IF NECESSARY (Not started)

DETERMINE RELATIONSHIP WITH ANGELS - DECIDE BETWEEN STATUS QUO, ALLIANCE, OR EXTERMINATION (Not started)

LOCATE BAHAMUT, SAVE PHOEBE (Not started)

LOCATE BLACK WITCH, DETERMINE CURRENT STATUS (Not started)

As Jason looked at these options, his thoughts turned chaotic. There was still one entry on the list he desperately wanted to act on, but it would be selfish to jump the gun. He wanted to save Phoebe and prevent Bahamut from torturing her and all the other humans, but he had yet to look for them.

Finding out Amelia's location would be important, too. She knew the status of Leviathan and could give Jason answers about the dark dragon.

Was it Leviathan that escaped the Cube? Or was it a different 'dark dragon'? Jason wasn't sure. His intuition leaned toward the latter, but it was always possible he might have misread the situation...

Suddenly, Jason's attention shifted. He sensed an unknown entity had been teleported into the containment area of Aevum, a place Jason had told his father he could always send someone if he wanted to safeguard their life but wasn't sure if he could trust them. It wouldn't leak the existence of Aevum, and whoever was teleported there wouldn't be able to cause any serious problems. After all, the holding zone was constructed of high level reinforced Wordsmithium...

When Jason investigated the newcomer, he was slightly startled.

"Her? How could it be her?"

Jason opted to send his final Dronesmith into the containment area. There, he found a woman with white hair spilling out of her helmet, her angelic wings unmoving as she lay on the ground, dazed and injured.

"Cassiel...?" Jason asked, as he approached her.

The woman stirred. Despite wearing a helmet that covered her face, Jason knew what she looked like. He had seen her in the future, after all.

"Ugh... you... who are you?" Cassiel asked. "Where is this place?"

She found herself inside a metal warehouse-like area. Not too large, big enough to fit a few trucks inside, with medical devices, containers filed with various food types, and other assorted items strewn around in a fairly efficient hospital-like layout.

"My name is Jason Hiro." Jason replied. "I am the Archseer."

Cassiel raised her head. She looked at him through the slits in her helmet and frowned.

"You? You're that second Trueborn? Raphael has spoken of you."

Jason knelt beside her. "Are you injured? This facility can heal you."

Cassiel clutched her ribs and winced. "Emperor Lucifer... ugh... she struck me a most grievous blow. I'm lucky I didn't perish on the spot. How did I even arrive here?"

"My father brought you." Jason said, taking care not to reveal too many details. "Here, let me help you up. Rest in this chair. The time flow here is quite fast. If you spend a day here, only a few minutes will pass in the real world."

She nodded at him, but her movements were guarded. "In that case, I offer my thanks, Archseer."

"Just call me Jason, Cassiel." Jason said, as he took her hand and pulled her to her feet.

When she stood up, she looked at him and frowned. "So I didn't mishear. You called me that name again. You must have me confused with someone else. My name is not Cassiel. She was one of the ancient Archangels. She is long dead."

"Oh! That's right." Jason said, suddenly remembering she never actually told him her name. "Then how should I address you?"

Cassiel looked at him for a moment, then shook her head.

"Heaven's Daughter is just fine. My name is... not important anymore. I am not worthy of it."

Jason raised an eyebrow. What did she mean by that, exactly?

"Alright. That name's a bit clunky, but it'll do." Jason replied.

As 'Heaven's Daughter' sat in the lounging chair and relaxed a bit, she merely nodded.

"Yes. It will."

Part 669: Double Drone Decision

January 29th, 2021. Aevum's Containment Area.

Heaven's Daughter eyed the man standing before her. She sensed that something was a little 'off' about him, and it had to do with the Heroic Energy she sensed. Or rather, the energy she didn't sense.

"You are not the first Trueborn I've met." She said, leaning back in her chair. "But your 'divinity' is... the thinnest. It's as if you barely possess any mana at all."

"That's because this isn't my real body." Jason said. Even though he knew anything he told her would likely make its way back to Raphael and the angels, he also knew being more forthcoming would benefit the forces of 'good' in the long run. 'Good' of course meaning anyone aligned with his interests. "This is a robotic drone that I am controlling with my mind."

To prove his point, Jason casually popped his left arm off to reveal his Dronesmith's mechanical parts inside its shoulder joint. Then he popped the arm back into place with practiced ease.

"A robot?" Heaven's Daughter asked. "...I was under the impression that humanity had a long way to go before robotics became so... advanced."

Jason smirked. "My Heroic Title is 'Archseer'. That should tell you everything you need to know. I can see into the future, and thus I was able to procure highly advanced technology decades, even centuries ahead of time. Pretty impressive, right?"

The Strongest Lazarite did not appear moved.

"Perhaps you are unaware of this fact," she said slowly, "but Archangel Camael is a Seer, and I converse with her frequently. I have learned many Truths about how foretelling the future works. What you have described is fundamentally impossible. One cannot glean such precise information from a hazy series of possible events... especially now that the timelines have been... Shattered."

Jason's heart skipped a beat. He looked at her with a faint flicker of surprise, but this flicker was enough to confirm her suspicions.

"If you're just going to lie to me, this conversation is over, 'Archseer.'" Heaven's Daughter said mildly. She looked off to the side, deliberately breaking eye contact. "I have nothing to say to those who would lie to my face."

Jason fell silent for a few moments. He looked at the side profile of her helmet, which hid her face. He could barely make out her eyes between the visor's slits.

"You're right. I lied. My true title is not 'Archseer.' And I am not a prophet. I am an architect. I wield the power of Imagination to defeat my foes."

Heaven's Daughter flicked her eyes back to meet his once more. This time, she didn't look away.

"You said... Imagination?"

"That's right. I cannot give you the full details, because every person who knows adds another link that could undo my strategic advantage over demonkind. But, to reassure you that I am no Dracula, nor that I hold no ignoble intentions, I can offer you three guarantees."

Jason continued.

"First, multiple other Trueborn have taken to following my orders. My father, Cat Mask, is one. Jepthath and Madam Mildred are two more. Others will join them soon enough."

"Jepthath." Heaven's Daughter repeated blandly. "I know his name. Raphael does not trust him."

"Second," Jason continued, "It was I who created this time-accelerated realm you are currently residing within. One day in the outside world equals one year in here. I have already spent several years rapidly formulating my plans and building up my contingencies. Once a year has passed from your perspective in Realspace, this realm will be unrecognizable. I will have hopefully amassed a lead the demons cannot hope to contend with."

Heaven's Daughter stood up. She activated her magic and sent out a pulse, but when it struck the walls, it bounced off and was unable to pass any further.

"How do I know you're not lying?" She asked. "I can't sense any 'time acceleration' happening. And I can't sense outside of this extravagant 'box' you've stuffed me inside."

"I have to maintain security protocols." Jason said softly. "I'd love to give you a tour, but what happens in Aevum is top secret beyond anything you can fathom."

He continued. "Thirdly, I am not a Seer, but I am a time-traveler from the future."

This caused Heaven's Daughter to have a visible reaction. She took a step back and looked at Jason in shock. "You're lying!"

"I'm not." Jason said calmly. "It's a long story, and I can't give you all the details, but I can tell you that I was frozen in cryosleep for 100,000 years, and when I woke up, the angels were nearly all dead, the Earth was destroyed, and humanity had been wholly enslaved by the demons."

He paused.

"You were there, too. In fact, you were the last living angel among all the Lazarites and Purebloods. The Archangels had all been killed and ended up in their rings. Your situation was..."

Jason fell silent.

"...It's better you don't know. No matter what, I aim to ensure such a horrid future does not come to pass."

Heaven's Daughter looked at him for a long time without replying.

"You knew me in the future?" She asked.

"I did. This is your face, as I remember it." Jason said, before secretly using Wordsmithing to instantly create a photo of her and send it to his Dronesmith.

When his drone waved its hand and produced a photo of Heaven's Daughter out of thin air, her shoulders slumped slightly. She carefully took the picture from the Dronesmith and looked at it in disbelief.

"That... that's me? But... I seem so... lean. Frail. Malnourished, even."

"The future I came from was a future you should pray you never experience." Jason said solemnly. "I really cannot afford to give you any further details- huh?"

Jason became momentarily tongue-tied when Heaven's Daughter heaved a small sigh, reached up, and pulled off her helmet, revealing her face.

She was extraordinarily beautiful, with soft eyes and long white hair. Unlike the 'Cassiel' Jason remembered, this younger version seemed more heroic and valiant. There was plenty of fight in her eyes, contrasting sharply with her beauty. She embodied the ideal of a 'Valkyrie' from top to bottom. He had no doubt she was born for combat.

"There is no point in hiding my appearance if you already know it." She said.

Jason's Dronesmith, luckily, did not reveal any weird expressions. As beautiful as she was, his thoughts toward her were the same as if he were admiring a wonderful painting. She could not create any ripples upon a heart which had already been hardened by loss.

"Am I still to refer to you as 'Heaven's Daughter'?" Jason eventually asked.

"My name is unimportant. I live according to my title." Heaven's Daughter said quietly.

"Very well." Jason said.

Some time passed. Jason healed the Strongest Lazarite's injuries, and she regained her full fighting power.

"Please return me to Earth." Heaven's Daughter requested. "Heaven is under attack."

"Not for another hour or two, in realspace-time." Jason said. "That's hundreds of hours for us. I still have a matter I need to speak to you about."

"Me?" She asked. "Surely, Archangel Raphael would be more appropriate."

Jason felt a bit of pride that his drone didn't even twitch an eyelash at the mere mention of speaking to Raphael directly. As if he would ever want to do such a stupid thing like converse with that silver-tongued, lying sack of...

"Well, the thing is, I want to talk to you about Lazarites." Jason said, changing the course of the conversation to something more appropriate. "Specifically, I need to know how Lazarites function, how they fight, and how I can help them become better at combating the demons."

Heaven's Daughter hesitated. She looked at Jason with that same obvious distrust she did earlier in the conversation.

"Have I said something wrong?" Jason asked, noticing her hesitation.

"Not... not exactly." She replied, still keeping her guard up. "Look, I... I don't see why you need to know this information. This isn't any of your business, is it?"

Jason fell silent. He looked at Heaven's Daughter, noticing now that she had become visibly discomforted by the direction the conversation was taking.

"It seems I'm treading upon a secret of some sort." Jason said, as he looked away and thoughtfully tapped his lips with a finger. "Let me guess. Raphael told you never to speak of the power the Lazarites commanded. Is that why you're hesitant to answer?"

"I... no! Of course not!" Heaven's Daughter stammered. "It's- it isn't like that at all..."

"Well, let me see if I can paint a picture without you saying a word." Jason said slowly.

He waved his hand, and through some mechanism Heaven's Daughter couldn't divine, two dimensional video screens materialized in midair all around the room and began playing various recordings of recent events.

Her pupils shrunk to pinpricks. Many of the videos were of her, when she was practicing her magic in Heaven. She would conjure whips and chains, summon large rifles, and even materialize land, sea, and air vehicles around herself. But other videos were of normal Lazarites who could only conjure simple weapons, armor, and other basic implements.

"You-you-you've been SPYING on me? On Heaven?!" Heaven's Daughter roared angrily, looking at the 'Archseer' with a mixture of disgust and horror.

"I am currently observing 713,698 individuals across the galaxy." Jason replied. "I understand if you feel disgusted, thinking I'm some 'peeping Tom', but I assure you, my intentions are purely practical. I need to collect information on how humanity, the angels, the demons, and all the other species operate. Based on what I've observed, it seems the Lazarites are able to conjure images of 'items' based on their imagination, yet you are the only Lazarite able to create complex machines and weapons."

Heaven's Daughter looked at Jason with rapt attention. She swallowed heavily, uncertain how she should respond.

"This leads me to two distinct possibilities." Jason continued. "The first is that you are a very special Lazarite gifted with a unique ability to control your power at a higher level than any of the others. The second is that all the Lazarites can do what you do, yet they do not, either because they believe they cannot, or because someone has convinced them they cannot."

Jason paused.

"Someone, such as, say... Raphael?"

"Lies and slander!" Heaven's Daughter snapped. "Do not speak ill of the Archangel of Wisdom! He has the best of intentions for angelkind!"

"The road to Hell is paved with good intentions." Jason replied, his tone bland. "There are other possibilities too, granted. Maybe all the Lazarites and angels share power from the same well of Faith, so if too many Lazarites use their powers all at once, it will rapidly drain Heaven's reserves. Thus, training just one elite champion, such as yourself, will prevent such a catastrophe from happening."

"You... you HAVE been spying on my conversations with Raphael!" Heaven's Daughter exclaimed. "Stop pretending to have deduced all of this! You won't con me so easily!"

"So I was right?" Jason asked, looking at her with a face full of innocence. "I can't believe I got it on the first try! I had a few other guesses too, but now it seems I won't even need to say them!"

"Stop toying with me." Heaven's Daughter said, her eyes turning cold. "I do not appreciate being manipulated."

With her sudden change in attitude, Jason finally sobered up.

"Fine, you got me again. I spied on a lot of 'secret' conversations in Heaven. I've roughly deduced the situation of the Lazarites and just needed your confirmation to be absolutely certain. How about we move on to the real meat of the discussion?"

Suddenly, a second Jason appeared beside the Dronesmith. Only, this Jason was not a drone. It was his real body.

Heaven's Daughter immediately noticed the difference. She sensed a well of mana within his real body, and while it was nowhere near the level of ancient powerhouses like Samson or Arthur, it was a little above average compared to most Trueborn.

"So... this is the real you?" She asked doubtfully.

"Hi. It's me. I'm Jason." Jason said, smiling and waving at her. "The real reason I brought you here is because I have determined the Lazarites are a powerful piece I can put into play against our shared enemies. I don't know exactly why Raphael wants only you to be the Strongest Lazarite, or why he doesn't elevate a second or a third Lazarite, but if there are any practical reasons, I might be able to solve them."

"For example," Jason continued, "if the problem comes from a lack of Faith energy, and the fears that too many Lazarites wielding too much Imagination could ultimately drain Heaven's reserves, then I might be able to provide a massive wellspring of mana for your kind to draw from. If the real reason is ideological, however... that will be more problematic to solve."

"What do you mean by that?" Heaven's Daughter asked. She narrowed her eyes.

"You know what I mean." Jason said solemnly. "The truth is... Raphael fears the Lazarites. Right now, they may outnumber the Purebloods a thousand or even a million-to-one, but they're quite weak and the Archangels could dispatch them en-masse. But if all the Lazarites became as powerful as you? It would prove extremely difficult to quash an insurrection."

Jason tapped the side of his head. "Think about it. Does Raphael truly value the Lazarites and their lives? Or does he place them on a tier below that of the Purebloods? Don't you think that, aside from you, he treats your fellow former-humans as expendable pawns he can throw away at his whims?"

Heaven's Daughter frowned. She wasn't talented in the art of conversation, and was not a particularly deep thinker. She preferred to close off her thoughts and focus on tasks and missions given to her by Raphael, so she had long grown used to simply doing as he commanded.

"I... I don't know. I don't like how this conversation is making me feel. You're calling my mentor into question."

Jason decided to ease off. "Well, I'm sorry. How about I try a different approach? If you think Raphael has good reasons for limiting the power of the other Lazarites, do you also think he would object if you, specifically, were made a lot more powerful?"

That seemed to pique her interest. "Raphael is always eager for me to grow stronger. What do you have in mind? I won't necessarily refuse... or accept. You'll need to convince me."

Jason smiled. Finally, the true reason he'd brought her to Aevum could be spoken.

"Heaven's Daughter, I have an idea to outfit you with an advanced piece of technology known as a MindCore. My father has one, and so do I. They augment our mental capabilities in specific ways, and I think that for you in particular, it could become a game changer."

"A MindCore." Heaven's Daughter repeated. "I assume it's some sort of brain enhancement. A computer chip slotted into my head?"

"Not exactly." Jason said. "Are you familiar with the Mind Realm? I imagine you must be, given your natural talents."

She nodded. "The Mind Realm is a place inside every person's brain that can contain a small world. However, 99.99% of Sentients will never notice its existence. Only high level mental masters will innately tap into it, though some like me can observe it when guided by said masters. Raphael awakened mine a long time ago."

"As I suspected. You probably already have a rudimentary form of a MindCore in your Mind Realm." Jason muttered. "Can you walk me through how it works? Or would you rather I take guesses until I get it right?"

The Lazarite shuddered slightly. She found it a little creepy how easily he could 'guess' Truths about herself. Maybe they really did know each other in that distant future.

"It's... ahh... basically, I can construct objects using my Imagination." She began to explain. "But in the heat of battle, doing so would be extremely slow and cumbersome. So, instead, I create blueprints during my free time, and I save those blueprints as ready-made objects I can summon at a moment's notice. However, if they are destroyed in reality, the blueprint is also destroyed and I'll have to rebuild it later."

"How many blueprints have you made so far?" Jason asked.

"One thousand, seven hundred and twenty." She answered with a hint of pride.

"Not bad. You're thousands of years old, right? You've had a lot of time to build up your collection."

Her face flushed beet red. "Thousands of years old?! I'm not even six hundred! You make me sound like an old hag! Do you hear me, you foul-mouthed cretin? Don't just run your mouth about a woman's age so glibly!"

Jason blinked. "Oh. Sorry. I didn't mean any offense. Actually, I'm a few hundred years old, too. We're pretty similar in age."

She calmed down a little. "Yes, well, in any case. I've had maybe five hundred years to build up my 'stockpile' but all the best designs have come in the last hundred. After all, humanity's technological development speed dramatically accelerated around the early 1900s, and I attended several colleges during the last century to keep up to date with their warfare systems. I'm still quite far behind the modern military paradigms though. I've been thinking it might be time for Raphael to arrange a mission for me with the modern United States military so I can get a feel for how their weapon systems function."

Jason listened to her words and nodded. "I can tell you don't really trust me, which is fine, but how about I show you what you could accomplish if I were to create a customized MindCore for you?"

Without waiting for her approval, Jason waved his hand in the air.

"I look up at the stars and dream of pyromania, illu at ell velu!"

Heaven's Daughter looked at him in surprise. She understood his English words, but the sentence itself was utterly nonsensical. The seemingly made-up words that came after only added to the mystique of whatever spell Jason was 'casting'.

An instant later, a wireframe orb materialized above Jason's upraised palm. Spiritual images of many miniature Jasons began hammering and reshaping it at the speed of light, leaving afterimages as they raced around. He put his full mental focus on creating a rolling omni-ball with turrets mounted on the side. It was a war machine meant to roll across urban environments and unload bullets into the enemies of its driver.

While simplistic, the machine rapidly took on a defined form, and even gained a coat of paint when Jason chose to draw the orb itself with splotches of light and dark maroon colors, while also etching hexagonal black lines all across its surface. These were not merely colored lines, but actual texture to give the ball some 'grip' on smoother surfaces. The weapons gyroscopically mounted onto the 'death ball' were painted pure black, and gave it a formidable black and red color palette. A classic choice as far as color design went.

Two minutes later, Jason held the finished blueprint in his palm and looked at Heaven's Daughter.

"Well? Want to give it a try?"

Confused, she reached out her hand to touch the blueprint, and it instantly appeared inside her Mind Realm. This startled Heaven's Daughter, making her jump slightly. After a moment of introspection, she realized that Jason had not only created the blueprint, but he had also somehow perfectly matched it to her Mind Realm's mental wavelength. She was thus able to perfectly assimilate its knowledge.

She took a few steps backward, then waved her arms. In an instant, she conjured the combat omni-ball around herself, enveloping herself in a rolling weapon that could shoot twin machine-guns capable of locking onto targets within 300 meters.

She rolled around it for only a few moments before de-summoning the weapon and marveling at its complexity.

"This... this machine is far more advanced than anything I've made to date! It's at least at the level of modern US vehicle combat. It may even be more advanced than that..."

"Honestly, omni-balls are not great as far as weapon platforms go." Jason said casually. "If I spent a bit more time thinking about it, I could have designed a much more effective and deadly tank or fighter jet. I just chose the ball because it was simpler and more time efficient."

Jason remained silent for a while. He allowed Heaven's Daughter to think about the implications of what she'd just seen. She summoned and examined the omni-ball construct, sighing several times as she admired its complex internal components.

"This is... two orders of magnitude more complex than anything I can design." She finally admitted. "And it would take me six months, maybe even a year. You did it in two minutes."

"That's because of my MindCore." Jason said, tapping the side of his head. "Mine is quite appropriate for someone like you, but I am actually thinking of letting you pick from an assortment of MindCores. I have a few variants available that you might consider worth trying."

"Oh? And you will give me this gift for free?" She asked, narrowing her eyes in suspicion. "I'm not signing any contract, lest you turn out to be the Devil himself. I also expect to talk the deal over with Raphael first."

"All matters can be discussed." Jason said neutrally. "But it's not exactly 'free'. You'll be my guinea pig. I've only ever installed a MindCore on myself. I need more capable test subjects before I can consider mass-creating these for others. Humanity needs all the fierce warriors it can get. The coming war is going to change the face of the Earth... and possibly even destroy it. I'm simply doing everything in my power to prepare for that future calamity."

Heaven's Daughter nodded slowly.

"Alright. My curiosity is piqued. Tell me more."

Part 670: Mindcores v2

January 29th, 2021. Aevum's Containment Area.

Jason summoned a spiritual viewscreen for Heaven's Daughter. He stood beside her and proceeded to show her a series of possible MindCores he had devised; each one far more detailed and advanced than the ones Mildred had merely described for Jason in the past.

"This is the MindCore I'm using. It's a more advanced version than mine, so its performance will be superior. It's called the GenesisFrame v2, and it's based on human design principles. It functions by accelerating your creative capabilities, allowing you to rapidly design and invent things at a vastly higher level than before. If you care a lot about creativity, like writing, painting, music, and other such pursuits, it's also great at those."

The Lazarite's eyes lit up with excitement. "This MindCore is incredible! It explains the speed of how you were able to develop that blueprint for me. And you say this iteration will be even better than yours?"

"Yes. Mine is an amazing creation, but flawed in many ways because Madam Mildred designed and built it with my help over an unfortunately short period of time. This version will be a lot easier and less painful to install in your head, because it will be a little more compact and a lot more energy efficient. If you and I tried to design the same weapon using my v1 and your v2 GenesisFrame- well, we couldn't do that because everyone's creativity is different... but if we theoretically could, you'd probably be ten to fifty percent faster in finishing it up and ironing out lots of small details than me."

Jason paused, then shook his head. "Even though this MindCore seems extremely appealing to you, I actually don't think it's the correct choice."

"And why not?" Heaven's Daughter asked, turning her head to look at his side profile while frowning slightly.

"The reason is simple." Jason answered, meeting her gaze. "I'm an inventor. You're a warrior. This MindCore has nearly zero benefit in a combat situation. Sure, it will improve your general thinking capabilities a bit, but when you end up fighting a Demon Emperor, you'll only benefit based on the blueprints you've made ahead of time. It won't improve your mid-combat skills, your deductive reasoning, your speed of thinking outside of creating new Imaginary Objects, and so on. Unlike me, you also have a hard limit on what you can Manifest. I can create objects which exist permanently. You can only summon temporary objects, and you're limited by your mana. I'm guessing it also costs mana to maintain, which comes from a source outside yourself?"

The white-haired woman nodded slowly. "Yes... all of that is true. Hmm. You were able to make a blueprint for me, then pass it to me. Couldn't you keep doing that?"

"Yes, but I have countless other projects to maintain. Frankly speaking, empowering you is only a small side project. If you refuse, or this fails for some reason, I have many other options to explore. Instead, it would be a better idea if there were a second or third Lazarite at your level who could obtain this MindCore. They could create weapons, vehicles, and machines for you, and you could hone your skill with them."

"Lazarites can pass blueprints to one another?" Cassiel muttered with realization. "Of course. I knew that was possible, but it never was any use to me because we only use the technique to have older Lazarites teach newer ones the basics of summoning weapons and armor. For me, I'm not allowed to pass my knowledge onto others..."

She suddenly paused, and a look of guilt washed over her face. Jason noticed.

"Raphael's orders?" He asked.

She didn't reply. It was confirmation enough, not that he didn't already know the answer.

"Well, anyway, if you decide to go that route, I'm happy to grant a different Lazarite the GenesisFrame." Jason continued smoothly. "They can be your Blueprinter. Let's move on to the other MindCores I think would be more valuable."

Jason changed the image on the screen. Heaven's Daughter was immediately drawn in to the imagery of a Mind Realm populated with angelic architecture, pure white marble buildings towering into the sky, datacores infused with holy light, and other design paradigms that spoke to her on an emotional level.

"I'm not showing you the OmniRecord because I think it's better than the other options. I just wanted you to know of its existence before we move on." Jason said.

"This OmniRecord is truly beautiful. It feels like I would own a miniaturized Heaven within my Mind Realm if I picked it." Cassiel said quietly.

Jason glanced at her. "Has Camael told you about Solomon's Crown? Do you know how it functions?"

The Lazarite nodded slowly. "Yes. I know of its functionality."

"That's what the OmniRecord is. Nothing less, and nothing more. It has infinite data storage, and it would accelerate your thinking speed in all general tasks. However, Solomon was fearsome not only because of these two abilities, but because of his innate ability to swallow information with merely a touch and then rapidly comb through and assimilate that information rapidly. The OmniRecord would not have those functions, nor would it contain the tiniest fraction of information his Crown does. It would be like walking into an empty library you need to fill yourself, step by step."

Jason paused before adding, "Also, it's basically the MindCore my father has. I didn't make it for him. Mildred did. Please don't tell anyone."

A white lie. Heaven's Daughter wouldn't know the difference, and Jason would casually tip off Mildred not to leak any information on the matter. Trying to explain that his father had a melted down Solomon's Crown inside the center of his head would be hard to explain, and Jason was unwilling to tip anyone off about his father's Rewinding power.

"I see..." Heaven's Daughter said, slightly dejected. "It truly is not very suited to my situation. I would much rather you install the GenesisFrame over the OmniRecord... at least if these were the only two options."

"The best is still yet to come, but don't look down on the OmniRecord. If the only thing it did was accelerate your thinking speed and give you infinite, perfect eidetic memory, it would still improve the basic 'you' on a fundamental level. Faster thinking speeds would mean you could forcibly develop new Blueprints and perceive the movements of high-speed entities like Ose more easily."

"Ose?" Heaven's Daughter asked.

Jason was mildly surprised. It seemed that either Heaven didn't know about the newest Emperor's sudden Ascension, or Raphael hadn't had time to inform Heaven's Daughter.

"A new Demon Emperor. She is a technologist; utterly unique among her kind. She is extremely speed-focused, brilliant beyond compare, and lethal in combat. If you face her without speedy reflexes... you will likely die instantly. Knowing she's been empowered is part of the reason I brought you here. I'm already working on a plan to kill Ose, but if it failed and you ended up assassinated, we'd lose a powerful player in our upcoming war. Best to solve that problem now."

Heaven's Daughter took his warning seriously. "Alright. Show me the other MindCores."

And so he did. Jason first showed her the demon-based HellProphet. "This MindCore would probably work better for Camael, since it's all about prediction. But I know she wouldn't go for it. The fact it's based on demonic biology and architecture makes it a no-go."

The Lazarite looked slightly repulsed, but her reaction was much milder than Jason expected.

"Archangel Camael would not easily dismiss anything that could empower her." Heaven's Daughter said.

Jason scoffed. "It's demonic in design. I'm not saying it wouldn't be useful, but she's an Archangel. They're all set in their ways."

A moment of silence followed. Jason met the Lazarite's even gaze. He was surprised by the turmoil in her eyes.

"The Archangels are... not a monolith." She said quietly, lowering her eyes to the floor. She shuffled her feet. "Camael, especially, has seen many things. Many horrifying things. She does not tell others directly, especially Raphael, but I have gleaned bits and pieces during our private discussions. I think if you were to mention this 'HellProphet' MindCore to her, she would not reject you outright."

It took ten seconds before Jason recovered. He was truly surprised by Cassiel's words. As far as he knew, all the Archangels, barring Samael, were holier-than-thou righteous fiends with sticks up their bums. But based on the words of Heaven's Daughter, such an assumption might not necessarily be true...

"If I get to talk to her, I'll bring it up." Jason said, before moving on. "This next one is based on monster biology. If you want to become the most powerful warrior with the keenest instincts, you can't go wrong with choosing the QuantumReflex. It's even better than the one Mildred originally described to me. You'll gain the ability to sense auras much more keenly, track enemies, react to things before they happen, and all sorts of other stuff. Your reaction speeds will be even greater than with the OmniRecord. Even your senses of smell and hearing will improve!"

"It won't improve my creation powers though?" Heaven's Daughter asked.

"No." Jason said. "This is the rawest, purest combat-core. Your control over your muscles will improve. If you exercise your body, you'll gain strength faster than ever by enhancing the muscles specific to your needs. When fighting enemies, you'll be able to deduce how they fight nearly instantly. You won't be distracted by tricks. You won't falter in the face of deceit. If you choose this one, we'll definitely need a second Lazarite to assimilate the GenesisFrame so they can pass blueprints on to you."

The Lazarite's posture remained unmoved, but a hint of excitement boiled under her surface.

Over the years, she had become a little... bored. Raphael rarely deployed Heaven's Daughter to the frontlines. He always had her training in Heaven, polishing her skills, maintaining morale among her comrades...

But she was, in truth, a goddamned battle-maniac. She loved to fight. The Mightiest Lazarite ached to draw blood. She hungered for battle, and most importantly, for validation. She wanted to become famous, feared, and a fighter beyond compare. All to live up to the ideal of that precious memory in her heart...

"You really seem moved by this one." Jason observed.

"I... cannot lie. It is extremely appealing. But I will withhold judgment."

"Alright. Here's the last one, for now anyway." Jason said. "This is RealitySim; the MindCore I think will be most suitable for you."

He proceeded to explain how it worked.

"This core is focused on granting you the power of Simulation. I've specially designed it so that it can function based on your Lazarite powers. You will be able to collect data on entities, items, tangible and intangible concepts, and other such things. Then you will be able to model their behavior and create simulations which operate at extreme speeds inside your Mind Realm. For example, you lost against Lucifer, but with the RealitySim, you could simulate the battle in preparation of a future fight. Next time, you will be much more likely to win."

Heaven's Daughter appeared unconvinced. "This... seems fine, but I feel that the GenesisFrame is better for my creation abilities, and the QuantumReflex for pure combat."

"The RealitySim is indeed probably not as holistically good for you as the GenesisFrame I use, but I really would prefer if you chose it." Jason said earnestly. "I need data on how the RealitySim functions. You aren't only going to simulate one type of thing, you know? You can simulate multiple different realities at the same time. The most incredible thing about the RealitySim is that it will vastly improve your control over multiple thoughts."

That sparked her interest. "Explain more. I'm not fully understanding."

"Look, just imagine this for a second. You have fought lots of demons, right? So you use that information to create a RealitySim instance in each of them. Then you place a copy of yourself inside those sims. You let your copy fight them for a hundred time-accelerated years. Then you integrate the copy's knowledge back into your brain!"

This finally broke through the mental barrier of Heaven's Daughter. "Wait, so couldn't I use this ability mid-battle, so long as I found a minute or two of breathing room? Couldn't I simulate myself creating artifacts of many different types? Couldn't I simulate entire realities where the laws of physics differ from our own?!"

"Right! Exactly right!" Jason praised. "Don't get me wrong, my GenesisFrame is ideal for me because it improves my actual creativity, but you're already plenty creative. You're probably smarter than I was before I obtained a MindCore, because you're much older than I was and you've learned how to create entire false constructs using only your Imagination. That means your baseline would be higher than mine, and even more importantly, you would need not only a MindCore that is useful before combat, but one that is useful during and after it. You'll make the best use of preparation time, and improve your battle instincts."

At last, Heaven's Daughter felt the full temptation of what Jason was offering.

She was hundreds of years old, yes. But her enemies were thousands of years old. Satan alone had absorbed the souls of so many humans, demons, angels and Titans that he had become qualitatively stronger than she could ever hope to defeat.

But what about Lucifer? She was beatable. If Heaven's Daughter could simulate combat against her a handful of times, let alone a thousand or a million times, she was sure she could come up with a counter for her abilities.

"I won't lie. Of all the MindCores, the most tempting to me on an emotional and personal level is the QuantumReflex." She said, surprising Jason. "I like that I would be able to react and improve myself dynamically on the spot. But I really, really do need improvements to my creation speed, and I'm not sure I should rely on other Lazarites to create the weapons I'll ultimately be using. Ever since you made that omni-ball in less than two minutes, it left a deep impression on me."

She licked her lips and looked at the selection of DataCores with hungry eyes. Each one, including the HellProphet, which she definitely wasn't going to pick, had something to offer. All of them would still improve her beyond her current circumstances. Three of them were especially desirable; she just had to decide which one best suited her needs.

Unbeknownst to the Lazarite, Jason's thoughts momentarily darkened.

If Gressil regains his power from the future, the QuantumReflex would probably give her the edge she needs to fight him off, maybe even kill him. I'd hate for anything to happen to her... but then again, maybe the RealitySim would suffice if I...

The last possibility that popped into his head sparked Jason's interest. He carefully looked at her.

"You're a mature woman, perfectly capable of making your own decisions. I want you to pick the RealitySim, but I'll respect any choice you make. If you think one of the others best suits yourself, don't feel obligated. I'm sure I can find someone else it would work for."

In fact, Jason was already thinking of one other such person. Daisy's friend, Nadia. She seemed to have the perfect skillset to master the RealitySim's core and tertiary functions. Even if Heaven's Daughter picked it, it wasn't as if he couldn't reuse a particular MindCore on multiple people. He just wanted to be as diverse as possible with which ones he handed out during these early years.

Heaven's Daughter slowly lifted her eyes. She stared at Jason with an inscrutable expression, her face giving no hints as to her thoughts.

"In the future... you said we were friends?" She asked.

"No, not friends. Honestly, we barely spoke." Jason admitted. "I found you in a... terrible situation. I organized a team and we rescued you from a monster most despicable. I can't say I'm doing this because of any particular friendship we shared or anything like that. It's mostly just self-interest on my part."

"You're an honest person." She said quietly. "You remind me a lot of the one I admire most. I always looked up to her, even after she passed. Sometimes, I feel I can never quite achieve what she did, in those few short years. I never feel as if I'm enough. But... I don't feel that way when I'm around you. You make me feel... safe."

She lowered her head and closed her eyes. Heaven's Daughter quietly prayed, a sight Jason might have found amusing, given the seeming pointlessness of it. But she was so earnest, he didn't want to interrupt her.

After a few minutes of silence, she raised her eyes again.

"If you want me to pick the RealitySim, then I will. I'll do so... for her sake. That's what she would have wanted."

"She?" Jason asked.

"The person I admired most in the world." Heaven's Daughter said. "My sister. She was a Hero like you. A Trueborn. She's the reason Raphael picked me to be the so-called Mightiest Lazarite. Her glory was so bright... it left a halo around me."

"But I wasn't as good as her. I've never been as good as her." She said quietly, looking off in the distance. "You probably know her name. She was Jeanne d'Arc. The Maid of Orleans. One of humanity's five mightiest Heroes."

"You're Joan's sister?" Jason asked, shocked beyond his imagination. "What... but how... why didn't you tell me...?"

He wanted to add 'in the future', but obviously she wouldn't know the answer. Instead, the Lazarite took that as a question about the current era.

"It's not that I distrust you. But I just... I'm not good enough. I feel little self-worth. No matter what others say about me, no matter how they praise me, I always doubt myself. I'm afraid that if they knew who I was, they would expect too much of me... only to be disappointed. Raphael tries to be considerate, but I see the truth in his eyes. He wishes he could have resurrected my sister as a Lazarite. Instead, he's had to make do with me."

Tears welled up in the Lazarite's eyes. She squeezed them shut and wiped the few drops away.

"My real name is Catherine. Catherine D'Arc. I died when I was only six years old. I was raised by Raphael in Heaven. He took care of me, taught me to wield my magic, and turned me into the 'Mightiest Lazarite.' But I'm really nothing special. I'm nothing compared to Jeanne. You shouldn't expect much from me."

Jason's lower lip trembled. He hesitantly reached out and touched her shoulder, which caused the woman to heave a soft sob.

"Catherine. That's a beautiful name. You shouldn't judge yourself based on such strict criteria. You're an amazing person. Even without a MindCore, do you have any idea the feats you achieved during the upcoming war? In the era I came from-"

"It doesn't matter!" Catherine shouted, pulling away from Jason's grip. Her grief left him stunned. "You already told me! Humanity fell! The angels perished! Only I was left alive, likely because of my cowardice! Captured by the demons, no doubt tortured and raped for a hundred thousand years! Who cares what accomplishments I made? I let everyone down! I ran away to save my own skin, and I was 'rewarded' with being the sole survivor of the angels. What a great victory I earned! What a feat!!"

Catherine practically spit the words out. She clawed at her eyes and turned away, unwilling to let Jason see her tears.

"I don't even know if this MindCore will even do anything for me!" Catherine shouted. "I'm just hoping it'll make me less of a failure! Because that's all I am! That's all... I am."

She slumped to the ground and wrapped her arms around her knees. The previously formidable Lazarite... seemed almost like a child who had been violently beaten. She withdrew into herself. She visibly lost all pretenses of being a fine, valiant warrior.

"Nothing you've said is true." Jason said, after a minute of silence. "You're not a coward. You're terrifying. During the Energy Wars, you were such a menace to the demons that they dispatched multiple Emperors to try and kill you. I don't know how everything went down, but you managed to kill Emperor Red Raven all by yourself. It was a feat that Raphael told me about, so I know he wasn't lying. You only ended up captured because the demons used despicable tactics after you had heroically rushed into one of their enclaves to save some captured angels."

Jason mixed in truths and lies. He really didn't know the exact circumstances that had left Catherine in Gressil's claws, but now wasn't the time to stick purely to the facts.

"The truth is, without this MindCore, you're already on the path to becoming an Emperor-slayer, like your sister." Jason said. "I can only imagine how scary you'll become after I install it. I'm really looking forward to seeing you forge an even greater legend than you did in my former timeline."

Jason knelt down beside Catherine. He gently squeezed her shoulder again and smiled. She sniffled, then looked up at him through teary eyes.

"You're... not lying?" She asked quietly. "I killed Red Raven? But... he's one of the strongest Emperors... it doesn't seem possible..."

"I don't know how you did it. I don't know anything about Red Raven." Jason said honestly. "But I do know that if you did it once, you'll do it again. You're way too hard on yourself. Raphael picked you to be the Strongest Lazarite for a reason. He and I may have our differences, but he was right to make that choice. Will you trust both our judgments and let me elevate you to the next level?"

Catherine's eyes met Jason's. They glittered with remnant tears, as well as determination.

"I... alright. Okay. If you really think so... I'll... try to believe in myself."

"Atta girl." Jason said, his smile a little wider than before.

His hand lingered on her shoulder for a moment. Then, he pulled away and stood up.

"I need a few hours to prepare. Stay here and rest. If I sent you back to Realspace, I'd just bring you back to Aevum in less than a minute anyway. I'll give you some materials to read regarding the operation. They'll help ease any worries you might have."

Catherine wiped her eyes. She remained seated, but the depression she felt before had greatly eased up.

"I understand. Thank you... Jason."

"No thanks needed. It's my pleasure." He concluded.

Without another word, Jason turned and walked away. His body vanished as he returned himself to Aevum's Control Matrix, along with his final Dronesmith.

He had work to do.

Part 671: Area 51 Assault

January 29th, 2021. Area 51, Nevada.

A violent explosion rocked the upper area of the underground Air Force facility. Alarms blared inside the facility as emergency notices began playing.

"ATTENTION ALL PERSONNEL: THIS IS NOT A DRILL. A HOSTILE LIFE FORM IS ATTACKING THE BASE. ALL HIGH LEVEL OFFICERS WILL RECEIVE EMERGENCY INFORMATION REGARDING THE LIFE FORM. DO NOT APPROACH WITHOUT AUTHORIZATION. DO NOT ENGAGE WITHOUT PROPER EQUIPMENT. IF THE LIFEFORM APPROACHES: FLEE. IF YOU CANNOT FLEE, ATTACK. CONTACT WILL ALMOST ASSUREDLY MEAN DEATH. REINFORCEMENTS ARE ON THE WAY."

Demon Emperor Ose sneered. "Damn right it'll mean death! But lucky for you, killing a bunch of vermin isn't why I'm here! Hahaha!!"

A massive blast door made of 12-inch thick reinforced Titanium, 36-inch thick concrete, and several extra layers of durable materials stood in Ose's path. It had been shut the moment she arrived at the base, but it didn't deter her at all.

Ose flexed her arms. Her pupils ignited with blue light as energy crackled around her body. A mad grin seized her face before she launched forward and sent a punch imbued with the nuclear force at the wall.

KATHOOOM!!

The underground facility lurched as if a terrible earthquake had just struck. Countless men and women multiple levels beneath Ose lost their footing and fell on their asses or sprawled to the ground. The sound of the lifeform attacking the base above made their hearts pound in their chests.

Quickly and efficiently, information rapidly began disseminating among those in the need to know.

"Are you fucking kidding me?" One man shouted in disbelief. "A demon? A literal demon? This has to be a joke!"

"Corporal Winters! This is not a joke, and you'd damn well better not treat it as one." An old man with a commanding mustache named Robert barked back. "This information comes straight from the Pentagon. These creatures have been spotted before and are considered Top Secret. Their existence represents an existential Threat to humanity. We must kill the entity at all costs! If we cannot kill it, then we must apprehend or trap it."

"What about the projects on the bottom level? If this monster starts wreaking havoc, the research materials won't be salvageable!"

"All we have to do is hold out for an hour or two." The commanding officer stated. "Spec Ops are on the way."

The entire base violently shook again. An alert popped up on the commander's datapad.

"The Demonic Entity has broken through the first Reinforced Barrier. Son of a bitch! It's like a walking thermonuclear bomb! We're getting casualty reports from the exterior… seems more than 45 soldiers are already dead, with scientists and civilians soon to join them."

"We just received word that there's one survivor from the surface. It's Private Sandoval. She says she witnessed the Entity's initial attack. We'll have to get her statement as soon as possible."

Men and women in the Command Center at the heart of Area 51 quickly gathered whatever information they could on their attacker. It didn't take long before they were able to identify the Entity as a female demon possessing some sort of lightning or electrical based energy powers. Beyond that, the reports were sporadic and uncertain.

"Contact! Alpha Team is taking point. Bravo will arrive in T-minus thirty seconds."

"We've lost contact with Alpha team! We're uncertain if this is due to electrical interference or because the hostile has neutralized them."

"Bravo Team initiating contact with the Entity…"

"Bravo Team's connection has also been lost! God dammit, what is going on up there? Are they dead? If so, how could they die so quickly?! Is the Entity unstoppable?"

"Teams Delta and Gamma are moving to intercept, but they have two minutes before reaching the contact point. They're wearing special equipment to disperse electrical energy."

"Status?"

"Unclear. We're getting scattered reports the Entity has broken through Level 3's Blast Doors. Waiting for next contact."

"Contact! We have contact! Gunfire exchanged... shit! Delta and Gamma are down!"

Commander Robert, the highest ranked officer at Area 51, maintained a fearless expression. However, his heart secretly quaked. He was supposed to retire in a few years. Now it seemed he wouldn't be seeing his family again.

"Good news!" One man exclaimed. "The Pentagon says a 'special asset' will be arriving on scene and that we just need to hang tight!"

"Let's hope they arrive quickly." Commander Robert said solemnly.

Ose's palms swept left and right. She sent millions of volts of electricity surging into the metal walls, control panels, and other components of the underground base. Those bolts arced toward any living entities, namely humans, and electrocuted them until they stopped moving. With ruthless speed and efficiency, she charged into Area 51 with bold intent, killing tens of humans at a time while cackling evilly to herself.

"What fun this is! I just love slaughtering you all like flies to a bug zapper! What pitiful worms you are! I never could have done this when I was a Baron, but now that I'm an Emperor, I'm unstoppable!"

Her body was insanely strong. Even the weakest Demon Emperor was tens of times hardier than the strongest human bodybuilder. Ose was especially strong and could casually pick up and throw modern tanks into the sky with ease. Her bones were hard enough that when she punched a titanium blast door, it was the door that suffered; not her.

She broke through multiple doors, the sealed facility posing no barrier to her. Eventually, she reached the third level, which was seven floors above her ultimate destination. Area 51 was 17 floors deep, but the place she cared about, her ultimate goal, was only on the 10th floor. She would reach it in no time.

A group of armed soldiers bravely stood between her and her destination. They took cover behind the edges of doors and other nearby natural barriers while firing their rifles at her. Ose sneered. She held a metal pipe she had casually ripped out of a wall and swung her right arm at inhuman speeds.

With her multiple Mind Realms working together, Ose was able to accomplish something she'd never even tried in the timeline Jason first saw. Her right arm was controlled by the Mind Realm designated 'Secondary', which perceived time 100x faster than ordinary mortals. When the soldiers fired bullets at Ose, she watched those pitifully slow pieces of shaped metal fly at her head and body...

Then her right arm began to move.

It spun around at a speed so shocking that some of the soldiers nearly dropped their guns in fright. Like a hurricane, Ose's arm revolved around her body at lightning speeds and instantly swatted aside tens of bullets every second, her metal pipe serving as a makeshift baseball bat. She swept the iron pipe from left to right, up and down, diagonally, all while deliberately batting the bullets back at the humans.

Not even five seconds after the humans started firing, countless bullets ricocheted back at them and tore through their armor, as well as the small parts of their bodies where nothing protected them at all. A couple of them started to let out screams of pain, but they didn't have time to do so before bullets ripped through the gaps between their helmets and necks. Even their SWAT-style armor failed to protect their heads, and they fell over dead, blood oozing out of tens of holes littered across their bodies.

In just under ten seconds, Ose wiped the humans out without even bothering to use her lightning. She grinned even more creepily at the sight of those pathetic humans collapsing onto their fronts and backs, never to move again.

"Mere bullets. Even if I wasn't deliberating slapping them away, they'd barely hurt me. You humans are ignorant; deliberately kept that way by the powers that be. To avoid panic, they tie the arms of their 'brave' men and women behind their backs. It would be sad if it wasn't so hilarious! Hahahaha!"

Ose stomped her foot. She sent a thunderclap blasting down the halls as if it were a seismic charge, shattering the eardrums of any human within a thousand meters. Hundreds of soldiers and civilians collapsed to their knees or instantly fell unconscious from the pain. Ose strolled past mountains of unmoving bodies, not even deigning to finish them off.

She was a Demon Emperor now. When she was a Baron, small arms fire had a real chance to kill her. That threat no longer existed. Humans simply lacked weaponry effective enough to stop her.

If Ose was a demon like Diablo, then she would still need to worry about heavy arms fire, such as anti-tank rifles, missiles, artillery shells, and so on. Diablo was not particularly resilient. A well-placed shot could instantly kill him if it struck his head. Whether he remained dead or turned into the Archdemon was another issue entirely.

Ose did not have this weakness. Her body was just as hardy as Diablo's, but her reaction time and movement speed completely outclassed every other Emperor. Bullets posed little to no threat to her, since she could watch them crawl toward her and smack them aside with relative ease. Missiles were faster and scarier, but she was underground now and short of a bunker-buster, the humans couldn't hit her with those. The same was true of tanks. In these cramped underground hallways, they simply didn't have the means to stop her.

Even if she were out in the open, Ose wasn't worried. She had a bigger advantage outside, because she could instantly zip away at the speed of light. Short of a sneak attack somehow catching her off-guard, the humans had no counter to her abilities.

She knew for a fact this would not be the case forever. They were sure to start developing counters to her Threat, and the two Trueborn were always a little worrying, but those two simply hadn't had enough time to properly assess her abilities. As long as she got what she came for, she was certain to be the biggest winner of this sudden decapitation strike.

It has to be here. Ose thought, her eyes flickering as she used the sonar pulse caused by her thunder-stomp to map out the halls around herself. Indeed, she had not thundered through the base to incapacitate the humans, though that had been a nice side-effect, but rather to map out these underground hallways. Even with her formidable hacking skills, Ose wasn't 100% certain of the direction to her destination.

The base momentarily fell completely silent. Ose ran forward at several hundred miles an hour, her body leaving afterimages as she screamed down the hallways at speeds that would leave a formula racer's eyes watering. She looked left and she looked right, eventually arriving at a blast door leading to Level 4. She bashed it inward with a few well-placed punches, only for a hail of bullets to fire at her from the darkness ahead.

"This again? You're all so predictable." Ose muttered, starting to feel a little bored. She couldn't help herself. It was fun stomping weaklings for a short while, but she was already craving a sense of novelty these ordinary humans couldn't provide.

Just as Ose once again swatted the bullets away, her heart skipped a beat. A steel net flew at her, mixed with the bullets. Due to its extremely thin wires and the darkness behind it, she failed to notice it in time.

Thwip!

The net tangled around Ose's arm, and then her body. She cried out in anger as it enveloped her body and sent her tumbling backward where she landed on her ass.

"You fucking HUMANS!!" Ose screeched. "Nice trick! Too bad that's all it was!!"

In an instant, her Tertiary Mind Realm, existing at 10,000x normalspeed, came up with a counter. She agitated the molecules on her skin, raising her surface body temperature to over a thousand degrees!

The wire, while strong and resistant to tearing, proved incapable of resisting the intense heat. She melted it to slag, unfortunately also burning her clothes away and leaving her naked. Humiliated, Ose jumped to her feet, ignoring the glorious sight she was revealing to the few remaining humans up ahead. It's not like they were going to live long enough to enjoy it.

"You fuckers! You made me ruin my clothes! Do you think a tailored suit comes CHEAP?!"

Ose rocketed forward and lifted her leg. She swept it down in an axe kick and struck the floor, blasting lightning and a thunderous shockwave outward in all directions. She obliterated the bodies of the nearby humans, cursing them for forcing her to walk around in her birthday suit.

"Perverts! Despicable scoundrels! When I eradicate the human race, I'll only regret how much time it took me to succeed!"

Ose deliberately agitated as much lightning around herself as she could to obscure her body. The storm of light that engulfed her paradoxically made her easier to see, but also made it impossible to look directly at her without blinding any eyes or cameras that did.

If she had been the Ose of Jason's time, she might have chuckled a little at going through an unfortunate fiasco that Beelzebub did, time and time again. The number of times he'd scorched his clothes to ash and ended up standing around buck-naked must have been in the hundreds...

But this Ose had no sense of humor; only malice and rage. She didn't find her current predicament amusing in the slightest.

She picked up the pace. The blast doors to floors 6, 7, 8 and 9 posed her no problems. All the while, the commanders holed up on the southern edge of Floor 10 were practically shitting bricks.

"I thought you said the first reinforcements had arrived already? Where are they?!" Commander Robert roared.

"I don't know, sir! Maybe they're still trying to catch up from behind. The Entity is extremely agile. She's difficult to pin down!"

"We're dead! There's no way we stand a chance once she makes it to us!"

The commanding officers were all brave men and women, and they had pledged their lives to the military. Even so, dying in honorable battle when they were younger was very different from being slaughtered like pigs in their advanced age. They all wanted to live to retirement and enjoy their days in a nice beach-house somewhere.

"Commander Robert! The Entity has arrived on Floor 10! She's here!"

"No... something's not right... she isn't heading for the Command Center... she's heading for... huh?"

Robert looked at the map of the base in disbelief. Ose entered from the west and headed in the opposite direction from the Command Center, which was located at the southern edge of Floor 10. Instead, she headed toward the northern wing.

"Could it be?" Robert muttered. "She's going... there? But why?"

Ose's heart raced with excitement. She was close. So very very close! Her destination was in sight!

She arrived inside the start of the lower underground levels, and the place where she finally entered a massive underground facility. Unlike the floors above, Floor 10 was hundreds of feet tall because it had to house Area 51's most precious asset...

The Crashed Ship.

It was alien in design. Ose knew that the moment she stepped into the hangar and laid eyes on it. Its exterior was too smooth to be human-made. It was shaped like a bullet, but it had visible damage all over its surface; made more obvious because of all the dings, dents, and scratches to its otherwise flawless silvery exterior.

"Hahaha! There you are, my precious baby! And your cargo... I'll be taking it!"

Ose's eyes flashed with energy. She rocketed to the ship and kicked the ground, killing hundreds of humans who were hiding in the nearby area. She didn't only kill them for sport, but also because they might have a chance to see her pristine body if they squinted hard enough, and that was unacceptable!

She entered the wrecked ship. It wasn't large, barely big enough to house a half-dozen human-sized entities. There were living quarters, a sleeping area with pods of some sort, and...

Ose looked left. She looked right. She entered the cockpit, taking a moment to familiarize herself with the strange, alien symbols.

"I knew there was life beyond the Earth. That much was made obvious by the existence of the Angels. But this... this technology is even more advanced than I expected. How has the government managed to keep this ship's details under wraps? And most importantly, WHERE IS IT??"

A tingling sensation tickled the back of Ose's mind. She reached out to send her electrical powers into the ship, forcibly energizing its power core. It turned on and started speaking in an alien language.

"Ensa' sha lattlh'ata su ianftuthk La'aftt Ona sh'uiagh Th'aa luftus thuns'uftt."

Ose blinked. She had absolutely no idea what the computerized voice was saying.

"Hmm. That sentence was rather strange. Let's see if I can analyze it..."

Her Tertiary Brain flared up with activity. Operating at 10,000x normalspeed, it rapidly analyzed the speech and vocal patterns of the alien computer. In less than five seconds, Ose managed to decrypt what it was saying.

"Enter the passphrase to unlock Levels One through Three pilot controls."

Ose spoke in a language identical to the ship, though much less guttural and noticeably more silky-smooth, as she was unable to perfectly replicate the harsh growls and consonants.

"Where... is... the mainframe... the brain? Where is... the artificial core to this ship?" She asked.

"Enter the passphrase to unlock Levels One through Three pilot controls." The ship repeated.

Ose's expression turned to a scowl. She had no idea what the passphrase was, and it seemed the ship wasn't going to tell her. However, by cycling her electrical power through the ship's conduits, she noticed something important.

"There! That must be where the artificial intelligence core is supposed to be located.. but it's empty! Why isn't it here? Did the humans remove it?"

Realizing the AI core wasn't where she thought it would be, Ose immediately lost interest in the ship. It certainly had research potential, but that didn't matter to her half as much as obtaining the real treasure of this journey.

She exited the craft and looked around. Amidst all the bodies of exploded and burned humans, she spotted a few different rooms on the far wall. One of them was wide open, its doors having unfortunately jammed when the base went into lockdown. She instantly noticed that a larger number of dead humans were lying nearer to that door than the others.

Ose flickered over to the entrance. She looked inside and saw, amidst the darkness, a towering glass cage currently powered off. There were many cables leading into it, clearly needed to pump a colossal amount of power from the local Nevada grid into what she immediately realized was the AI core of the ship.

"Jackpot." Ose said, grinning like a madwoman.

She stormed into the room and sent a pulse of electricity at the wall. The lights turned on, and she finally got a good look at the tall glass cylinder housing her precious treasure.

Her grin vanished.

"What? Empty? How can it be empty? The core isn't here? Did the humans anticipate my true purpose? Did they hide it somewhere so I couldn't steal it for myself?"

Just as Ose became momentarily baffled, the door leading into the AI core room loudly clanged shut. Its two blast doors crashed together and made her jump slightly.

Ose turned around. She raised an eyebrow, seeing she had been sealed inside.

"Oh? What's this? The humans are trying to trap me?"

She snorted derisively. Then she flickered at the door and pulled her left fist back. She rushed at the door full-speed.

BOOOM!!

Ose punched the door with all her might. She unleashed a megaton of energy to empower her fist and blasted the door with all the same gusto she had those blast doors earlier.

The instant her fist made contact with the metal, she realized things were not as they seemed.

Her finger bones shattered. Her wrist buckled. A lightning burst of pain shot up her arm and rocked her body.

"AAARGH!"

Her arm practically shattered on impact. Its bones snapped and exploded in multiple places. Blood erupted in all directions, soaking her nude body and the nearby walls and ground with liquid plasma.

The door didn't even vibrate.

"Ahh! Ahhh!" Ose cried, tears welling up in her eyes. She was hurt so badly that for a moment, she nearly blacked out. Her Tertiary brain quickly took over, suppressing all her pain signals and firing an adrenaline burst back into her mind, keeping her awake.

Caught in a cold sweat, Ose stumbled backward. Her arm throbbed agonizingly, and even with her pain senses dulled, she still wanted to cry like a little girl.

She gingerly held her shattered arm. Blood had coated her from head to toe, and she shivered from pain.

"What... what the fuck..." Ose whispered, her pupils contracting and expanding as she stared at the door in horror. "What is this alloy? It's... I didn't even leave a dent... my arm... oh Seven Hells, my devil-damned arm..."

At that moment, a male voice spoke from behind her.

"Hey Ose. Looks like you fell for it."

Ose's heart turned cold. She whirled around to find a familiar man standing behind her. His arms were crossed. He wore a nekomimi mask with a neutral expression on its face.

Cat Mask grinned evilly at Ose from beneath his mask. She couldn't see his expression... but she could feel it.

"Hahaha." Cat Mask laughed coldly. "Nice tits and ass. I love that you're giving me a peep show before I kill you."

Ose trembled. She quickly ignited her electrical power to try and cover her body, but she knew it didn't matter. Cat Mask had already gotten an eyeful, and that was unforgiveable.

"You... this was all... a trap?" Ose hissed woozily.

"Duh. Honestly, I thought we made it too easy. You didn't even notice most of the 'humans' you killed were just a bunch of soulless meat puppets." Cat Mask taunted. "A few had to die to maintain the illusion, but... ah, what does it matter? There's no use telling you when you're about to die anyway."

Cat Mask casually reached into the sheathes at his side. He pulled out a pair of deceptively simple-looking knives. Ose's pupils shrank and expanded. She was not in good condition. Her body was still wracked with pain. Her breathing was labored. And Cat Mask seemed... different. He must have taken into account her abilities... could he have determined a way to kill her?

If she was fresh and hadn't shattered her damn arm, Ose was 95% certain she would mop the floor with Cat Mask like she did at the Illuminati Base. His defensive wards wouldn't protect him from her Emperor-level attacks. She would definitely win.

But now?

Ose stopped trembling. Her mind sharpened as she released a hideous smile.

"Hehehe... a good trick. A good trap! I can't help but respect someone who's able to pull one over on me. But my accidental handicap won't save you, Cat Mask. I'm going to kill you, then I'm going to find out where you hid that AI core, then I'm going to kill your son, too. Not necessarily in that order."

Cat Mask snorted. "You ain't doing shit."

Part 672: Emperor Ose VS Cat Mask

January 29th, 2021. Area 51, Nevada.

Despite being badly injured, it was Ose who attacked first, not Cat Mask. Desperate to reverse her sudden unfortunate situation, Ose snapped forward at Hideki and sent a hurricane kick firing at his face. Cat Mask bent over backward with unnatural agility, causing her leg to sweep over his mask, missing it by a millimeter. She followed up with a flurry of kicks, spins, and flips, sometimes using her one good arm to spin on as she revolved her legs overhead.

Cat Mask's body blurred occasionally. He moved with far more fluidity than he did before; a result of Jason's magical augmentations. Finally, Cat Mask's body was able to keep up with his cerebral speeds a bit better than before.

From his point of view, Ose's legs were a blur. Even after slowing his perception of time to a crawl, his body was sluggish and unable to keep up with hers. Her physical parameters had shot way up after becoming an Emperor. She had already taken him apart when she was a Baron, and her physical speed was even more frightening now.

But Cat Mask was unworried.

"You have a nice ass, Ose!" He shouted, turning her face beet-red. "What a fine pair of plump tomatoes you've been hiding under that tight-white suit! A man could really get used to a sight like this!"

"SHUT YOUR MOUTH!!" Ose shrieked. Electricity blasted out of her body and struck Hideki, knocking him back a little and numbing his body for a moment. Luckily, the Wordsmithed enchantments kept him from falling over and deflected most of the damage.

With her legs finding no purchase, Ose suddenly reversed tactics. She hopped off her hand, spun in midair, and landed on her feet. Her agility was catlike, well beyond what most Emperors could achieve. She instantly conjured a sword made of lightning, and her arm started furiously whipping around as she chased after Hideki.

Cat Mask was not as fast as Ose. He wasn't even in the same league. Because of his ability to slow down his perception of time, he was able to brute-force predicting her attacks, but she was actually so fast with her near-instantaneous movements that he rapidly began losing his ability to keep up.

It started subtly. The edge of her sword barely cut the edge of his shirt. A stray arc of electricity landed on his elbow.

But she rapidly gained an advantage. Even when Cat Mask's body blurred as he rewound time to retry a movement here or there, he quickly found he was unable to dodge all of her attacks.

From Ose's perspective, Cat Mask seemed relatively fast, but she also recognized that he was not truly able to keep up with her. She could react instantly to any stimuli, but he still needed to 'perceive' things before he could react. This subtle difference was something she recognized and sought to exploit.

Cat Mask swiped a knife at Ose. She handily ducked the attack and rammed her elbow into his ribs, eliciting a weak grunt of pain from him. Then she spun on her heel to try and sweep his legs, but he hopped in the air at the last second.

"Seems Mildred gave you another power-up. But that won't matter!" Ose taunted. "You're slowing down the more we fight! Even while I'm maimed, I'm more than your match!"

Ose's baseline endurance level was far above Hideki's. Every whiffed punch left him open for a counter, while she recovered with ease. In the end, he might be a human with billions of years of training, but he was still only an ordinary man. Hardening his bones and accelerating his mental state along with his body's speed did not come close to narrowing the gap between him and a Demon Emperor.

But Hideki did have one advantage. He was stronger than Ose, if only by a little. His punches hit harder, his grip strength surpassed hers, and his body's Wordsmithed defenses were higher too.

It was an even fight. Neither side had the obvious advantage.

Ose was wracked with pain from her limply hanging arm. With no time offered to bandage it up or tourniquet the wound, she could feel herself weakening over time, pain interspersed with the blows she rained on Hideki. Every violent flip of her legs or flicker of her body sent her dangling arm slapping around, which made her grit her teeth and hiss in pain.

After five minutes, Hideki was winded and tired by a level that was starting to affect his fighting capabilities. Constantly trying to avoid Ose's attacks was mentally draining. The lightning that managed to hit him left his hair frazzled and his nerves taut. Ose was in agony, but Hideki was definitely the one feeling most bruised by their battle.

Ose reared her fist back again, but Hideki abruptly vanished from the spot, teleporting away. He'd done this several times, so Ose quickly went on the defensive, flicking her eyes to look around for him.

He didn't reappear.

Still, she kept her guard up. She finally took a few seconds to hurriedly cradle her injured arm while looking around the room for something, anything, that she could use as a tourniquet. She spotted some wires on the wall and her eyes flashed. She zipped over and ripped them out while hurriedly using her teeth and still-functioning right arm to bind her wound just below the shoulder. She whipped up a crappy makeshift sling and bound her useless arm under her breasts, then looked around again.

Hideki still hadn't returned. He'd been gone for thirty seconds, which was the longest delay in their fight so far.

Just when Ose started to wonder what trick he would play, Hideki reappeared. He no longer looked winded or tired. In fact, he seemed as if he'd taken a power nap for an hour. He was dancing lightly on his feet once more while smiling at her beneath his mask.

"Ah, you made a sling faster than I thought you would." Hideki teased. "Guess I took too long returning. Oh well. I was starting to feel bad for you, seeing that useless thing flap around."

Ose looked at him with slightly dazed eyes. How did he suddenly appear so refreshed? Where did he go for those thirty seconds?

For the first time, Ose was feeling a little nervous. Five minutes of furious fighting wasn't anything much, but she was literally naked and didn't have access to her arsenal of gadgets. She had assumed that even if the humans tried to trap her, they would fail. She was more than strong enough to rip her way out of an underground vault formed entirely out of tungsten and reinforced steel, but she had no way of anticipating the weird alloy forming the internals of this AI lab.

"What are you playing at?" Ose asked, narrowing her eyes. "You think you can kill me?"

"Honestly, it's been harder than I expected." Hideki admitted. "You're one tough cunt, I'll give you that much. You're the biggest challenge I've faced in several eons. If I'd known you were this tough as an Emperor, I would have tried to uplift you a long time ago."

"What does that mean? What are you even saying?" Ose asked, more confused than anything. "You're a battle maniac? You like fighting?"

"Nothing as boring as that." Hideki said, resting a hand on his waist. He took a moment to drink in the fine, fine appearance of Ose's nude body. As for the Emperor herself, she was just glad to have a few seconds to catch her breath. "I've experienced so many sights, so many sounds, so many of the same days, nothing excites me anymore. I've started to think this recent change in my life isn't as bad as I previously thought. All my plans are falling apart, but instead of despair I feel only relief. I don't have to go at this all alone anymore. I get to experience a fresh start!"

Ose stared at him in bewilderment as if he were a babbling madman. What the hell was he even talking about? He sounded like a man so old even Raphael would have to call him 'grandpa', but that was an absurd thought. The oldest human was born less than a hundred thousand years ago!

"A fresh start?" Ose repeated. She analyzed his words at insane speeds inside her tertiary brain. A lot of alarming possibilities came to mind, but the data seemed garbled. She was missing key information. "What do you mean by that?"

Cat Mask's body momentarily blurred. He seemed to do that a lot, Ose noted. She felt that understanding his body-blur was key to unlocking the secrets of the masked man, but she needed more information.

When he stopped blurring, Cat Mask chuckled. "God. You really are an impressive woman. You always manage to figure it out within the next thirty or so minutes. I don't know why I never noticed until the Shattering, but you are without a doubt one of, if not the most intelligent person on Earth. Maybe ascending to Emperor was the key to unlocking the potential I missed in you before."

"Enough with your riddles!" Ose shouted. She was starting to feel deeply uneasy. "If you're going to kill me, then just do it! Or are you scared I'll take you down with me?!"

Cat Mask didn't answer. He simply stared at her, as if uncertain what to say. Or maybe he liked how the silence was just as taunting as his words.

Ose's pupils shrunk. She launched at Cat Mask and sent a fist flying at his face.

"Oraaaa!!"

She expected him to dodge like he had before, but her heart nearly jumped out of her chest when he didn't move. He didn't even twitch his body!

THWACK!

Her fist crashed against his mask at full power and sent the man flying. He slammed against the far wall with a thunderous crash! Ose's jaw practically fell to the ground. Why the hell didn't he dodge? Did he suddenly have a death wish?!

She took a step forward, half wanting to rush over and finish him off, and half uncertain if this was some greater trick he was trying to pull. Was he a madman? Literally insane?

Cat Mask's body shuddered. He climbed to his feet. Then he turned and looked at Ose.

His mask was gone. Shattered into a thousand pieces. His face was bleeding a little, but otherwise it seemed his defensive wards were more than enough to resist her hasty strike.

"You!" Ose exclaimed, shocked by his true appearance. He was a Japanese man. His face had a faint smile, but most importantly...

Ose squinted at him.

"...Who the bloody hell ARE you? I thought with the way you were talking I'd know you, but I've never seen you in my life!"

"Not this life." Hideki said, chuckling under his breath. "You've seen my face before. Lots of times, actually. You just don't remember them."

Ose's expression became more puzzled than before, then it slowly changed as she began to put some pieces together.

"Wait. You..."

"That's the amazing thing about you, Ose." Hideki said, casually stuffing his hands into his pockets. "You always figure it out. Even if I give you no hints, you uncover the secret to my power. I've been tempted to go back further and prevent your ascension to Emperor, but... I sort of don't care anymore. It doesn't matter if you know. It doesn't matter if anyone knows."

Ose's heart skipped a beat.

"Time manipulation." She said quietly.

Hideki rolled his eyes. "I made it too easy this time. Whatever. You should feel proud though, since you figured it all out within an hour of furious combat the first time we fought. I tried to be sneaky, but only managed to fool you for two hours the next time. Then one and a half the time after that. Then two and a half, one hour, thirty minutes, two hours..."

He shook his head and looked off to the side.

"I'll spare you the deductive work. Maybe this time will turn out different if I just lay it all on the table."

Cat Mask held up three fingers.

"My first ability is time rewinding."

"My second ability is time deceleration."

"My third ability is my perfect eidetic memory."

He shrugged, then tossed his hands in the air. "See? Isn't that fun? Now we can fight at our full potential. I know all your abilities, and you know all mine. Ah, right, I'm also super strong and hardy because of some external boons placed upon my body, but that's neither here nor there. You already guessed that much."

Ose's brain moved at lightning speeds. She instantly deduced that he wasn't lying, and that his powers had all kinds of up and downstream effects she needed to consider.

"You can rewind time?" Ose asked incredulously. "How many times have you done so?"

Hideki merely cocked his head, raised an eyebrow, and smirked. He didn't answer.

"There's no limit? So that means you just keep going back again and again and again until you achieve your objectives." Ose analyzed. "Which means you've probably fought me tens, hundreds, even thousands of times. You've probably coaxed every ability you can out of me. You know all my hidden trump cards."

"Yeah. I do." Hideki said. "So, you can go ahead and drop the act. Heal that arm up. It just isn't any fun fighting you when you're in this weakened state."

Ose's stomach fell. She had been hoping to trick him, wait for the opportune moment, and land a killing blow, but if he said that, then he truly had to be a rewinding-type Hero.

"I will say this though." Hideki added. "I love fighting you. Your body is truly fine. You keep in shape. You've got nice tits, a nice ass, even that belly..."

Ose lurched backward. She looked at him in disgust. "You... pig! Have you defiled me in those alternate timelines?"

"What? No. I'm not a goddamn monster." Hideki said, before looking away and coughing. "Though I did set up that net trap to get you out of those clothes. It's led to a huge improvement over our first battles."

Ose wanted to wretch. This human was sick in the head. He was a creep, a pervert, and even more worryingly, an unstoppable nightmare. She didn't know how she could possibly beat him. If he wasn't lying, and if his abilities were what he said they were, then he'd probably sussed out every conceivable-

"Come on, already." Hideki said impatiently. "Just switch to that Thunder God Form. I haven't even started to enjoy myself yet. I'm hoping for a new restore point I can keep going back to."

Ose's expression turned dismal. "Two hypotheses come to mind. Either you're trying to break my spirit so you can kill me more easily, or you're hoping to finish me off at my best so you can get off on the thrill."

"Eh." Hideki grunted, shrugging lightly. "I mean kinda neither, kinda both? How do you know I haven't already killed you a bunch of times and just kept coming back because it would be a shame to put an end to that sexy, curvaceous ass?"

Ose's eyes bloomed with rage. She roared with a primal fury and tapped into her inner wellspring of power. Electrical energy exploded around her body, swallowed her skin and bones, and rapidly turned her into a glowing entity made of plasma and electricity.

The Thunder God Form which she had used against Belial in the far future had now made its return, but Ose didn't feel triumphant in the slightest. All she would be doing was giving battle data about this form to Hideki, ensuring he could defeat her even more handily on the next loop.

Was there some way she could kill him? Could she land some sort of a sneak attack to-

"Nope." Hideki said, interrupting Ose's thoughts. "I'm unkillable. It's my secret fourth ability. If anything is about to kill me, time completely stops. Then I can rewind until I escape the danger. Truth be told, I've already seen the entire Earth fall to those aliens who made that escape pod out there. They're called Volgrim, by the way. Not nice people. Kinda bastards, if I'm being honest."

"Are you reading my thoughts?!" Ose asked.

"Nah. But I can tell what you're thinking just by the way your eyes move. We've spent a lot of time together. Plus you tried tricking me into telling you if there was some way to kill me on a few previous loops. I lied, you tried the method, it failed. I laughed. Good times."

Ose seriously wanted to rip her hair out! Cat Mask was infuriating to a degree she couldn't remember ever previously experiencing. She even thought he might be more annoying than Bael, as crazy as that thought was!

"So what now?" Ose asked. "We fight?"

Her left arm had turned into pure energy and fully reformed. If she left the Thunder God state, she would be back in prime fighting shape. A little tired from the massive amount of energy needed to fight, but still in much better condition than she was at the start.

Hideki fell silent. After a moment, his body blurred. He gave her a weird look, then shook his head.

"Alright. I'm officially not having fun anymore. You know what? You can go, Ose. I've held you here long enough."

Ose blinked. They hadn't even fought yet, and he was already giving up??

Or was it that when his body blurred, that meant he's just rewound time? If so, did they already fight? What happened in those alternate futures? How many times had he rewound???

"You couldn't kill me, so you're giving up?" Ose asked.

"Huh? Oh, nothing like that. I killed you a bunch of times." Hideki said, shrugging nonchalantly. "But it just... it didn't feel right to me. I'm sure from your perspective this is all rather confusing, but I've grown to admire you so much, I just can't bring myself to finish the job. So I'll leave you to my son instead. If he can kill you, then so be it. If not, then that's fine too."

Hideki turned around, as if to leave, but Ose's eyes narrowed.

"Wait!" She shouted.

Hideki paused. He looked back at her. "What?"

"That's it?" She asked. "You're letting me live? Why? Are you stupid?"

"I don't know why..." Hideki said, his gaze turning odd. "I don't think I can put this feeling into words."

His shoulders sagged a little. He looked off into the distance.

"I'm lonely, Ose. Nobody understands the life I've lived. Nobody can. I don't view people as 'people' anymore. They're more like... NPCs in a video game. They give preset replies to questions, as if they were being manipulated by the hand of an invisible puppeteer."

He closed his eyes.

"I've watched the Earth burn. A thousand times. A million times. I stopped caring whether it survived or was destroyed a long time ago. I lived for my obsession. I planned every single action out. I created the 'perfect' script that would set a future into motion according to my whims. I was ready to finally end it all. Let myself die by not rewinding time, and instead allowing my death to occur."

Hideki shook his head.

"But then everything changed. Nothing stayed the same. All my meticulous plans collapsed. I was left with the shadowy remnants of that 'obsession' plaguing my mind, asking myself, 'did it even matter' and 'why did I ever care'?"

Ose stared at the side of Hideki's face. Slowly, she removed her Thunder God Form, returning to her original body.

Hideki glanced at her. He smiled, but the expression was lifeless and empty.

"While I was fighting you, I felt something I hadn't felt in a long time. A spark of joy. Excitement. Fun. Yeah. It's fun fighting you, talking to you, learning from you. You don't have any way to know this, but my combat capabilities before I fought you the first time versus this very moment are lightyears apart. I've mastered all my 'boons'. I can fight at my peak level for way longer. I can anticipate all your attacks before you even know you're making them."

Ose felt a chill go down her bones. She hoped Hideki was bluffing, because that meant if they did end up fighting, she would definitely lose.

Hideki walked toward Ose. She took a step back, then another step, eyeing him like a rabbit would eye a tiger. She suddenly realized that she was feeling fear. Since when did the great Ose experience such an emotion as fear?!

Ose gritted her teeth. With her body made whole, she was close to her peak physical condition. She sent a punch flying at Hideki, but he casually stepped aside, grabbed her wrist, and spun her around. Ose yelped in fright as he twisted her arm behind her back and slammed her against the wall while pressing his body against hers.

"Agh! Unhand me!!" Ose yelled. She tried to punch him, kick him, anything to free herself, but two carefully aimed punches struck her kidney and lung, knocking the wind out of her. Hideki pressed her even more forcefully against the wall, leaving her shivering in terror.

He wasn't bluffing. He was way stronger than her! She didn't have a chance!

"Sorry." Hideki said, after holding her there for a few moments. He released his grip on her wrists and dropped her to the ground. Ose scurried backward, looking up at him with terror-filled eyes.

"I like fighting you. But I don't like hurting you anymore." Hideki said quietly. He looked at the ground and shuffled his feet. "I've seen how evil you can be... but I've also seen that you're not as corrupted as you think. There's still some good in you."

Ose rubbed her wrist. "Are... are you making a pass at me? Have you developed feelings for me, or something?!"

"Feelings." Hideki repeated. He looked at her with a strange gaze. "I thought I lost those at some point, eons in the past. Maybe you're right. I know you don't feel anything for me, though. It's purely one-sided on my end. Maybe that's why I can't bring myself to kill you. I'd rather break down the walls you surround yourself with."

Hideki pursed his lips.

"What made you this way, Ose?"

Ose met Hideki's eyes. There was neither warmth nor coldness in them. Rather, they seemed... empty. Hollow. As if he no longer knew how to feel about anything.

"What made me this way?" Ose repeated.

"No. Stop. Don't tell me." Hideki said, quickly turning away. "Save it for our next meeting."

He turned and walked away. Just before he teleported out of the chamber, he sent one last glance back Ose's way.

"I hope you won't force me to rewind again, Ose. Consider what we've discussed carefully."

He vanished, leaving the room silent and empty, with only Ose breathing quietly by herself.

After a full minute of silence, Ose jumped to her feet. She blinked her eyes and looked around as if in a daze.

"That was..."

"That was a REALLY weird encounter!" She spat into the void. "Creep! Sex-pest! Pervert!"

Part 673: Father, Why?

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

"Dad, what the FUCK? What were you thinking?!"

Jason and Hideki met in the eastern side of the city of Argent, but they were not there to sight-see. Jason's eyes locked onto his father's, flames practically billowing from his nostrils.

"She's Ose! OSE! One of, if not THE most dangerous of all the Demon Emperors! Why didn't you kill her? Why did you act all weird and shit, then let her go??"

Jason threw his hands in the air. He stomped his feet. He was enraged more than at any point in recent memory. Ose wasn't merely a dangerous enemy; she was also someone who had, at least in theory, taken actions that killed Jason's daughter. Daisy survived Beelzebub's detonation, true, but that was neither here nor there. Millions of humans still ended up dead as a result of Stormbringer.

Hideki was unmoved. "Sorry, son, but you're overthinking it. I'm not killing her. Do it yourself if you want her dead that badly."

"And how do I know you won't just rewind time and save her life?" Jason retorted. "This is so fucked up! What, just because you think she's hot, you're using your dick instead of your head??"

Before Hideki could interrupt, Jason threw something else out there. "And what about my MOM?! I thought she was your soul-mate! I thought she was the only woman you'd ever love!"

For a brief moment, Hideki didn't reply.

"...I was wrong." He eventually said, his voice low. "I rewound time on many different occasions to travel back and be with Olivia again. But ultimately, the relationship couldn't last. If I got Olivia pregnant, she'd give birth to you and die. Without fail."

He continued. "You're also forgetting something, Jason. I can't go back and see her ever again. I've lost that ability. I can only rewind to the point right after the timelines shattered, when you regained your memories of the future. So... even if I wanted to remain faithful to your mother, there's no point."

Hideki looked off to the side and crossed his arms.

"Olivia is dead. For good. It's time I moved on."

"That's it?" Jason asked. "You can't see her anymore, so you're just going to move on?"

Hideki quietly sighed and rolled his eyes.

"You're a three-dimensional thinker, so I can't entirely blame you. But use your head, Jason. How often do men lose their wives and then remarry within a few years? How long is it considered acceptable to remain single before a man moves on? What, two years? Five years? Ten? Twenty?"

He gave his son a long look.

"I haven't been with your mother in ages, Jason. I already hadn't visited her in an eon or two and that was before I couldn't rewind all the way back to see her again. Extracting you from the Illuminati's base probably took me a few millennia alone. Do you have the slightest idea, even with my reduced ability to rewind, how many temporal years I've experienced since then? Hundreds of thousands of years."

Jason's anger became somewhat muted. "It's... been that long for you?"

"You cannot begin to fathom my conceptualization of time." Hideki flatly stated. "I was faithful for a plenty long time. Now I'm moving on. You'll just have to deal with it."

"If you want to move on, then move on. I can accept that." Jason said. "But not with Ose! NOT Ose! She's a goddamn Demon Emperor, dad! And not just any Emperor, but one of the most vicious and cruel ones!"

"Doesn't matter to me." Hideki said with a shrug. "If push comes to shove, I'll bite the bullet, go back, and admit you were right. But you're not. You don't know her like I do. I spent a lot of time with her in Area 51. I even managed to pry a little bit of information out of her on a few occasions, though her emotions are well-hidden behind a wall."

Hideki's nostrils flared. He smiled cheekily.

"But that's what makes it fun. Conquering a woman who might never accept me! Not like Olivia, who just went along with whatever I wanted. That kind of woman has her own charm, but Ose appeals to my base, filthy animal instincts. You see, son, a man like me has sexual needs beyond that of an ordinary-"

"I've heard enough." Jason quickly interrupted, turning away from Hideki. "Fine. Do what you want. It's not like I'll remember this conversation when you rewind anyway."

Jason paused. He glanced back at his father.

"If you want to get your tip wet, that's whatever, but why did you have to tell her about your powers? About all that other stuff? You gave her way too much information!"

"Ose's a smart woman." Hideki said, nibbling his lip longingly. "The way her mind works fascinates me. Her analytical and deductive abilities are superior even to my own. I'm an old dog that hates learning new tricks, but she's a voracious student. She's constantly learning, adapting to new stimuli... being around her makes me feel young again."

Jason scowled. It's not like he couldn't understand that Ose was an extremely attractive demoness. Hell, she had white hair, and after the years Jason had spent with Phoebe and Fiona, that particular color definitely elicited a faint animal yearning in the back of his lizard brain...

But Ose was pure evil. He would never believe that she was capable of changing. He just hoped that his father would ultimately rewind, undo the damage, and kill her. Jason had no way of knowing if or when that would happen though, so he'd have to come up with his own way of killing her.

"Jason, I can see that you're still unsatisfied." Hideki said. "But you're not looking at this the right way. What if you turned Ose from your enemy into your ally? Don't you think having a genius like her on your side could drastically elevate Earth's future battle strength?"

"Of course I've considered that option." Jason retorted. "But that's a god-damn big 'if', dad. She's scarily smart and a schemer. She could pretend to be my ally only to backstab me at the absolute worst opportunity. Better to take her out and choose a more reliable option."

"Like who? Marie Becker?" Hideki asked. He scoffed. "She is absolutely a super-genius, but a different type compared to Ose. More importantly, Marie Becker has something important she needs to do. Her role in the future war is exceedingly complicated. It would be pure idiocy to pull her away to work on whatever you think is more important."

Jason smirked. "I wasn't thinking of Marie at all, dad. I was thinking of Nadia. My daughter's friend seems to have an incredible cerebral power on par with Solomon. Once I pair her with the proper MindCore, I think she'll become one of Earth's key figures."

Jason was actually a little surprised his father didn't already think of Nadia. Maybe Hideki was only having this conversation for the first time and hadn't rewound yet. He'd probably bring up Nadia on the next rewind and throw Jason off. The absolute bastard.

"Nadia. Hmm." Hideki grunted.

"What? You know about her?" Jason asked.

"Only a little. I spoke to just about everyone on Earth at some point in my life. That doesn't mean we had detailed conversations. I don't know literally everything about everyone, but I did save the faces and names of every person in my Crown Core. Nadia... was never an impressive figure."

"Did she have a magical ability in the previous timelines, before Daisy's arrival?" Jason asked.

"No..." Hideki said slowly. "Almost nobody did. We had a couple Lowborn Heroes that arose as a result of my presence, but your daughter makes them sprout up like weeds. And since the timeline shattered when you regained your memories, I don't actually know what future we'll be entering and who all these new actors will turn out to be."

Hideki looked a little worried, but also relieved. "I don't know what's coming up, which makes me anxious, but at the same time... it's out of my hands now! This future is yours to seize, son. I'm just coming along for the ride."

Jason sighed. His anger deflated, and he shook his head. "Just don't go overboard with Ose, dad. You know what they say about not sticking your dick in crazy... and she's batshit insane."

Hideki ruffled Jason's hair. Then he turned to leave. But before he disappeared, he chuckled.

"By the way, Jason? If you died tomorrow, the abilities you've given me, particularly the ability to teleport using Aevum's inexhaustible power source... if I had that in the original timeline, humanity might not have lost the war. You really underestimate just how incredible planet or even galaxy-wide teleportation is to a rewinder like me."

Jason blinked. He nodded at the back of his father's head.

"Huh. I hadn't really thought of it like that, but yeah. You can just go wherever you want, investigate any situation, and if you get caught you can simply rewind time and go somewhere else."

"If only you knew how much I've been abusing this new power." Hideki said with a chuckle.

He teleported away, leaving Jason alone.

Ose glowered at the door leading out of the AI Core room. By now, she had tried breaking past countless different points, but it seemed she had been left here by Hideki and he wasn't going to help her escape.

"What alloy is this? It seems unbreakable." Ose muttered to herself. "Nothing I throw at it leaves a scratch or a dent. If I punch it, I'll only hurt myself. How was such a material forged? Could it have been salvaged from... the Volgrim?"

Ose's mouth fell silent. Her dialogue shifted to her three internal brains which were housed in her Mind Realm. She deliberately accelerated all three of them to the maximum possible speed of 100,000x realtime.

Primary was the brain most suited to analyzing and engaging in social interactions, since it was typically active at 2x realspeed.

Primary: "Cat Mask confirmed the existence of aliens, and he seemed to know a lot about them. If we encounter him again, we should try to coax more detailed intel out of him."

Secondary was a combat-focused brain. It always approached information from a combative and/or reactive perspective.

Secondary: "Negative. Cat Mask is dangerous. He will not give us any additional information unless it benefits him."

Tertiary was the brain that focused on research. It preferred to focus on solid information and was generally reclusive, analyzing things from an inventor's mindset.

Tertiary: "The Volgrim are likely to have created the alloy used to construct this room, but we must not assume that is the case. It is possible Cat Mask obtained the alloy via his temporal excursions and constructed the room to trap us."

Secondary: "Whatever Cat Mask or someone else did to build this room, the truth of the matter is that we are still stuck. If we fail to escape or take too long in breaking out, we're likely to be captured or worse by the United States Military. We do not have long before they arrive on scene and make their way down to the tenth level."

Primary: "Can any of our known powers allow us to escape? Maybe we could use the Thunder God Form to transform into pure energy and escape through the wall circuits, or slip through a gap in the door? What about using our Astral Form to open the door from outside?"

Secondary: "Too dangerous. If we enter our Astral Form, our body will be completely defenseless. The Archseer might teleport inside and kill us where we sit. As for escaping into the wiring, it seems Cat Mask or someone else already thought to seal off all the circuitry in this area from the rest of the complex."

Tertiary: "There is another matter we should discuss. Cat Mask revealed a lot of information, and I am not certain all of it was deliberate. He stated that the timeline we are living in has abruptly deviated far beyond his original plans. Since he was deliberately rewinding to try and control the flow of the future, that means an external source caused the temporal misalignment."

Primary: "He didn't sound as if he were attempting to deceive us. Thus, we must conclude that his words were truthful. What external event could have 'shattered' the timeline, as he put it?"

Secondary: "The question is not 'what' but 'who.' The Archseer is extremely suspicious. He claims to possess precognitive abilities. He is eighteen years old, so perhaps Cat Mask accidentally mated with another human and produced the Archseer, which created permanent downstream ripple effects on the timeline."

Primary: "This scenario is unlikely. I do not believe the Archseer is the nexus event that altered the timeline. We should return to the three-Hero theory. There must be a third Trueborn. This one has been attempting to hide from us. Cat Mask's ability to teleport may be a smokescreen to hide the existence of the third Trueborn. They are likely to be the one that caused the Nexus Event."

Secondary: "Agreed. But how do we deal with a rewinding Hero who can interact with us across multiple timelines and learn information we have no way of knowing he obtained? This presents a security and logistical nightmare."

Tertiary: "I have already come up with multiple possible counters to his ability. We need to develop a randomization system for our interactions with him, as well as a secret code that will allow us to determine whether or not he has accessed certain information ahead of time. By using careful and specific wording, we can ensure our verbal passwords will go undetected and Cat Mask will not see through our deception."

Primary: "This approach is flawed. Cat Mask seems extremely intelligent. He might see through our coded language."

Tertiary: "Agreed. That is why we must also attempt to create a method that can determine if the timeline has been altered, or perhaps come up with a temporal scanning device that can inform us of the number of changes to the timeline. It must be covert enough that Cat Mask will be unable to detect it."

Primary: "Is such a device possible to create?"

Tertiary: "Unknown. We may need to acquire the services of a different temporal manipulator. The only other known asset with such an ability is Archangel Camael, but if there are two Sentients that can alter the timelines or perceive the future, then there may be others."

Secondary: "Enough about Cat Mask. We must discuss how to escape this makeshift prison. I have looked through our abilities and decided none of them are acceptable. We must think outside the box if we intend to escape."

Ose's three minds operated at 100,000x realspeed. In less than one second, she came up with multiple possible contingency plans for Cat Mask, as well as a possible way to escape Area 51.

Just as Ose was about to act, a voice spoke up behind her.

"Hey, beautiful. Miss me?"

Ose instantly whirled around. Lightning crackled in her palms as she spotted Cat Mask standing with his hands in his pockets, smiling at her.

"You!" Ose shouted. "Come to sexually harass me again, you fiend?!"

"Well, that does sound like fun, but actually I came back because I forgot I left you here." Cat Mask said, smiling apologetically. "Oh right, did I tell you my name was Hideki? Because it's Hideki. You can call me 'sweet Hideki', or 'my precious Hideki', or 'my beloved Hideki.' Whatever rolls off the tongue!"

"I'd rather rip out my tongue than refer to you in such vomit-inducing terms!" Ose bit back.

"Not much of a romantic, huh?" Cat Mask asked. "That's fine. I like a challenge. Anyway, want me to let you out?"

"NO!" Ose shouted, more out of spite than anything else. There wasn't a shot in hell she was going to rely on his 'generosity'. "Get out of my face, and don't you dare come back!"

Hideki frowned, looking somewhat aggrieved. "Oh, darling Ose, you wound me. I'll leave you here, if that's what you want. How about a goodbye kiss though? You do love kissing me, don't you?"

"SEX PEST!!" Ose roared, before firing thirteen thunderbolts at his face.

Hideki vanished, leaving her to stand there and look for him. He didn't return.

Ose's eye twitched. She returned to what she was doing, sighing internally that Hideki probably already knew what she was going to attempt. If it failed, he'd return and mock her, saying something about how if she just fell into his arms, he'd whisk her away and teleport her out of Area 51...

But she had to try. She could not yet glean useful information off Hideki because her secret contingencies hadn't even been started. If she failed to escape, then she failed. She would have to fight her way out when the human military personnel arrived.

Ose's eyes turned deadly serious. She calmed down her breathing and focused her mind.

All three of her spiritual brains began working in unison as she pressed her palms on top of one another, then slowly lifted them apart.

A bead of highly focused electricity began to spiral in her grasp. This energized orb rapidly increased in heat and luminosity, brightening the dark room more and more every second. It expanded in size and heat, raising the ambient temperature of the room from a hundred degrees to several hundred. Ose started to sweat a little, making beads of liquid drip down her body. She cursed inside her mind, praying Hideki wouldn't return and get an eyeful of a sight he didn't deserve to enjoy.

The orb of plasma revolved faster and faster in her hand. It spun to life, creating a steady, deafening roar that increased in decibels every second.

Soon, it was the size of a baseball, and the orb's temperature had risen to over 100,000 degrees. Ose gritted her teeth, then slowly pushed her palms toward the double-doors. The spiraling orb of energy screeched as it struck the door and sent thousands of sparks flying. Even so, Ose gasped inside her mind when she saw the door starting to warp and deform where the orb was touching it.

Second after second, bit by bit, she maintained the pressure of her plasmic orb and pressed it against the door while fearfully praying the Archseer wouldn't suddenly arrive and strike her down during a moment of inattentiveness. Luckily, he did not, or perhaps could not. Even with their enchantments, Hideki and his son would probably die within seconds if they entered now.

The door buckled slightly. Molten alloys began to drip off its inner surface and splash against the floor, nearly hitting her foot and causing her serious wounds. Luckily, Ose dodged them all with her lithe and nimble movements.

Minutes passed. The heat in the room was so sweltering that any ordinary human would die within moments, while Ose was simultaneously sweating buckets only to have that sweat instantly dry up as soon as it escaped her skin's confines.

She was not Beelzebub. She was not effectively immune to all forms of heat, but compared to other demons, she was at least highly resistant to the effects of heat.

Ten minutes after she began, a hole the size of a fist was visible in the center of the door. Ose finally desummoned her plasmic orb and gasped for breath, each inhalation forcing her to swallow acrid smoke made up of unknown toxic alloy elements.

She didn't complain. As soon as she was able to peer through the hole, she turned her body into a beam of lightning and transmitted outside.

Ose was finally free!

She had completely failed her mission. She hadn't acquired the AI core she wanted, and she had been badly humiliated by Cat Mask.

Even so, she wasn't in low spirits. Ose's eyes flashed with insight.

I now know that aliens known as Volgrim exist, and that they are likely monitoring this planet. Hideki called their vessel an 'escape pod', which means this is not actually one of their proper ships. If I can come into contact with the Volgrim, I might be able to ascertain their intentions.

Ose smirked. Her expression was devious and ill-meaning.

She looked up at the ceiling, then launched her body straight upward like a railgun.

BOOOOM!!

Ose pounded through the upper ten levels one after another and arrived back in the fresh air, where the early morning sun had just become fully visible over the horizon. As Ose launched herself into the sky, she swept her surroundings with her demonic senses and chuckled at a distant approaching helicopter, then turned into a beam of light and transmitted away.

She had successfully escaped before the human military could apprehend her.

Part 674: Superior Sasha

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

While Ose's assault on Area 51 and the demons' initial movements toward Heaven had begun, one of Jason's Dronesmiths had continued to converse with Daisy and her three friends, Nadia, Sasha, and Marco. Indeed, despite spending several hours talking to Nadia to better get to know her abilities, not even a minute had passed in realspace. Ose's attack was still in its initial phase!

"Nadia, I've gotten a good grasp on your power." Jason said. "I'm going to give you a bunch of learning material, and I want you to spend the next several weeks reading all of it. With that Regeneration Band keeping your body intact, you'll be able to use your power as much as you want."

Nadia smiled. "Thank you, Mister Hiro."

Jason smiled back. Then he looked at Marco and Sasha.

"Which one of you wants to go next?" Jason asked.

Marco lowered his eyes. Sasha beamed. She was the most assertive of the group.

"Me!"

"Alright, alright." Jason said. He looked at Marco for a moment before returning his attention to Sasha. "You said before your power...?"

"I haven't really used it much. It didn't seem very useful..." Sasha said hesitantly. "But I was able to take the rust off a knife and move it to a different knife."

Jason blinked. "Alright. We'll start by trying that, then."

He waved his hand, and a large kitchen counter appeared in front of Sasha. Her eyes sparkled with interest at the ease with which he'd just summoned it, but she stayed quiet until he finished.

Jason conjured two knives. Both of them had dull blades, so they couldn't easily hurt someone if Sasha lost her grip and dropped them, or whatever. Better to be safe than sorry. One of the knives appeared to be in relatively pristine condition, while the other was badly rusted and looked to be in terrible shape.

"Go ahead." Jason said. "Transfer the rust from the ugly knife to the pristine one."

Sasha nodded. She paused for a moment, then clapped her hands together. After that, she took hold of the rusty knife's handle, then she grabbed the pristine one.

Something incredible happened that the others couldn't perceive. Rust quickly started disappearing off the first knife, only to grow on the second one as if it were being infected. By the end, the originally gross-looking knife looked like it had been scrubbed in an anti-rust solution. It wasn't in amazing condition, but it looked serviceable at the least. Sadly, the other knife was ruined.

After finishing, Sasha carefully set the knives down and took a step back. She looked respectfully at Jason.

"Any ideas, sir?" She asked, folding her hands over her waist.

"Hmm." Jason grunted.

Unbeknownst to Daisy and her friends, Jason was Wordsmithing like crazy in the background. He inspected the knives and compared their material composition, finding all sorts of strange phenomena.

"If I'm not mistaken..." Jason's Dronesmith said slowly. "You've somehow... transferred... a part of the rusty knife to the clean one. I don't know how to explain it."

"I have an idea." Nadia said, her eyes glowing blue as she looked from Sasha to the knives and back. "I think if you look at the magical pathways in Sasha's body while she repeats the action, things will be a lot clearer."

Jason nodded. "Alright. Sasha, try moving the rust back to the original knife."

She nodded obediently, then clapped her hands together. The moment she did, a flicker of light passed through the Dronesmith's eyes. Jason observed her body's internal mana pathways. He didn't say anything, but his heart jumped!

Sasha re-transferred the rust back to the original ugly knife, then set both knives back on the table. She looked at Jason, waiting for his assessment.

"Why do you clap your hands together?" Jason suddenly asked.

Sasha cocked her head. "I don't know? I just do it because it feels natural."

"In order to activate your powers, do you always have to clap your hands?" Jason asked, his tone filled with deep intent.

"Probably..." Sasha said. Without being asked, she picked up both of the knives and tried to reverse the process yet again.

Nothing happened.

"That's what I thought." Jason said. "You need to 'activate' your power to use it. When you clapped your palms together, there was a sudden burst of mana inside your body. It didn't centralize on your palms until you reached for the knives. I suspect it would also work through your feet if you 'willed' it to be so."

In Jason's eyes, this process was similar to how he Wordsmithed. If he didn't speak, he couldn't activate his power. The same was true if Sasha didn't clap her hands!

"Okay..." Sasha said quietly. "So other than that, what's going on? What are my powers doing? Just transferring rust around items?"

"It can't be something that mundane." Jason said. He paused then looked at Nadia. "Any thoughts?"

Nadia was extremely perceptive. Jason had ideas about what was going on, but the more time he spent with Nadia, the more her powers impressed him.

"I don't know what Sasha's power is, but I think we could try some experiments." Nadia said. "Sasha, why don't you try transferring something else from one knife to the other?"

"Something else?" Sasha asked, confused.

"Yes. For example, why don't you try making one of the knives 'thicker'?"

"Uhh..."

Sasha looked at Nadia with a weird expression. Then she shrugged, clapped her hands, and grabbed the knives again.

This time, nothing seemed to happen visually. For several seconds, Sasha simply stared at the two knives with a dumb expression.

Then, out of nowhere, one of the knives suddenly collapsed! It broke apart in her hands and fell into countless tiny shards of metal, falling through her fingers and cutting her palms open where her grip accidentally pressed the sharp metal bits against her skin.

"Ow!!" Sasha yelped, opening her hand and letting the shards fall atop the counter.

Without verbalizing his intent, Jason healed her hands, instantly stopping the bleeding. His Drone took a few steps closer and held out its hand.

"Let me look at that knife." Jason said.

Sasha nodded. She handed the knife over, and Jason's drone took it and stared at it for a moment.

"The knife's internal structure has been altered. It is currently 47.3% denser than before Sasha's latest experiment." He observed.

Nadia's eyes glowed. "Denser? Is it possible she transferred the other knife's density over to the one in your hand?"

"That seems a likely explanation..." Jason said. "If she did, then she likely created countless weak points all across the first knife, which caused a structural collapse. That's why it suddenly fell apart in her hand."

Marco, who had been quiet up to this point, decided to speak. "What if Sasha's not 'transferring' attributes from one object to another?"

"If not, then what do you think she's doing?" Daisy asked.

"I don't know. I just think this power of hers is a little... weird." Marco said, uncertain of the full idea percolating in the back of his brain.

Nadia, however, seemed to get a hint from his implication. "Sasha, clap your hands and... try... try doing something to that knife. Now that it's denser than before, can you alter its properties?"

"I don't know..." Sasha said uncertainly. "I'll try..."

She clapped her hands, then took hold of the knife. Uncertain of what to do with her other hand, Sasha started to reach out and touch the table, but before she could, the knife turned to a strange wax-like substance in her hand. It heatlessly melted, then collapsed into mush in her grasp.

Sasha looked alarmed, but Nadia's eyes sparkled with blue light.

"You altered the knife's properties!" Nadia proclaimed. "What were you thinking when you melted it?"

"I wasn't really thinking anything." Sasha said, shaking the melted mess off her hands and onto the table. "I just wanted it to change."

"Alright. Let's try something else then." Nadia said, before turning to Jason. "Create several iron pipes, then put them on the table."

Jason raised an eyebrow. He originally planned to do all the experimenting, but he also found it interesting letting Nadia take charge. Clearly, she was seeing something he and the others weren't. With a wave of his hand, Jason conjured a dozen foot-long pipes on the table.

"Alright, Sasha." Nadia said. "This time, I want you to clap your hands, take hold of a pipe, and then imagine changing its color."

"Its color?" Sasha repeated, giving Nadia a strange look.

"Yes. Imagine that the pipe is colored red in your mind's eye, then make it so." Nadia said.

"Alright..." Sasha said, her tone uncertain.

She did as Nadia commanded. She clapped her hands, picked up a pipe, and visualized in her mind's eye the pipe turning firetruck red.

Instead, the pipe only turned a little bit rusty before it start sagging at the far end, as if it were made of licorice and gravity were pulling it downward.

Nadia gasped. "There! Where your hand is touching. Look!"

Sasha set the pipe down. Right where her hand had gripped the pipe, it was colored bright-red. The rest of the pipe seemed the same as before, albeit 'droopier'.

"You've altered the physical properties of the pipe. I was correct in my hypothesis." Nadia said. "Try again with a different pipe. This time, just touch the pipe with a finger on each end. Try to imagine turning it firetruck red, like the color on the first pipe."

Sasha nodded. Seeing that the first pipe's conversion had partially succeeded, she did as Nadia instructed. This time, when she touched the second pipe with one finger on each end, everyone in the room gasped.

She succeeded! The pipe rapidly changed color, morphing from silvery-gray to a bright red coloration.

Sasha's jaw dropped. "I... I... what does this mean? What is my power doing?"

"You're a pretty smart person." Nadia said. "Don't you remember taking chemistry in high school? You're altering the properties of the matter you touch when you use your power."

Sasha blinked. "Altering... what does that even mean?"

"You weren't confident before. You didn't believe in yourself, or believe that your power had any use." Nadia said, more certain of her hypothesis than ever. She walked around the table and smiled as she rested a palm on Sasha's back. "But the more confident you become, the stronger your power is. More specifically, your power has a lot to do with your Imagination, your Mind's Eye, and the Belief you hold in yourself. I want you to try something different now. Try turning this third steel pipe into a knife, like the one from earlier."

"You want me to change it from a pipe into a knife?" Sasha repeated, somewhat bewildered. "I understand changing the colors, but-"

"Just do it." Nadia said. "Don't question. Don't disbelieve. Just think about the process, and do it. I believe in you."

The solemness in Nadia's voice eventually pushed down Sasha's disbelief. With a serious look on her face, Sasha nodded. She clapped her hands together, imagined the pipe turning into a knife... then she touched it.

Every person in the room widened their eyes. The pipe rapidly shifted shape. It changed in the blink of an eye, turning from an ordinary steel pipe into an admittedly ugly and impractical facsimile of the knives Sasha had been manipulating a few minutes earlier.

It wasn't perfect. The 'knife' she had created with her power was rudimentary, and only somewhat shaped correctly. From a distance, a man with terrible vision might mistake it for a knife, but its weird and wobbly hilt and uneven 'blade' that wasn't sharp enough to cut tofu marked it as an amateur's mistake.

But Sasha wasn't discouraged. Her eyes shone with excitement. She squeezed her hands into fists and shook, doing a little dance of excitement.

"Oh my gosh! I... I don't know what I just did! What's going on? What is my power, Nadia?!"

Nadia gave Sasha a big hug, then pulled away.

"Matter and Energy are interlinked. You are able to alter the chemical composition of objects based on images formed in your mind. Right now, your knowledge of knives is so rudimentary and basic that you can't properly reshape the pipe as you'd like, but I believe, given time, this will change."

"Your power," Nadia continued, "allows you to reshape matter when you touch it. However, it seems you cannot add or subtract matter, only alter what already exists. By breaking down objects into a more malleable state, you can then reshape the matter into something better befitting your intention."

Jason's eyes flashed. "What you described sounds an awful lot like Alchemy. Turning lead into gold."

"That's a good way of putting it." Nadia said, before glancing at one of the pipes. "Sasha, try turning this pipe into gold."

Sasha's mouth formed an 'o' as she ooh'd and ahh'd at that particular possibility. Without wasting time, she clapped her hands and eagerly touched the iron pipe.

A few moments later... a small area where she touched had turned yellow in color, but it wasn't exactly gold. Sasha's excitement deflated a little.

"Don't be disappointed. You have a shallow understanding of material physics." Nadia said. "If we can train you to better comprehend the atomic structure of the universe, you'll be able to use your power more adeptly."

Jason looked at Daisy. She looked at him.

"What?" Daisy asked.

Jason lightly chewed on his lower lip. "I was originally thinking of outfitting Nadia with a MindCore. Now it seems Sasha is an equally valuable candidate. I'm debating which one to upgrade first."

"And you're looking at me, because...?" Daisy asked.

"Because I should get you one, too." Jason said. "Honestly, all of you should have one. Even Marco, though I'll need to figure out what his power is first."

Marco was definitely next on Jason's list, but right now he had to think about how best to learn about, test, and study Sasha's power.

"Let's try more options." Jason said. He summoned many different objects, ranging from a suit of armor to a television to a car engine. "We'll start by having you reshape all of these objects into new forms to learn where your limits lie."

Sasha looked a little overwhelmed, but she didn't complain. It wasn't every day someone learned they had been possessing a reality-defying power their entire life, yet had completely wasted its potential.

Several hours later, Sasha grabbed another iron pipe. Her power entered the pipe, and it rapidly changed shape, flowing back onto her hand and turning into a somewhat shabby-looking but perfectly functional iron gauntlet. She flexed her fingers and smiled. She'd managed to make the joints adjustable, rather than rigid, like the last time.

"Your power is Alchemy." Nadia stated. "You can alter matter from one form to another. Solid, liquid, gaseous. You can also change material into other materials, but only within reason. Turning one kilogram of iron into one kilogram of plutonium is impossible. They have completely different atomic structures. But if two types of material are relatively similar, you can alter them. You can even change the shape of Jason's super-metal, but it's extremely difficult due to its magically-empowered state."

"Archseerium." Jason said, not wanting to refer to it by the name of Wordsmithium in case it leaked his true abilities. "It's tougher than diamond. Or pretty much any material you can find on Earth."

"It's also much harder for Sasha to alter." Nadia said. "Changing its shape is one thing, but changing it to a new type of material is basically impossible."

Sasha turned to Jason. "Can you summon some fabric for me? Enough to make some clothing."

Jason shrugged. "Sure."

He waved his hand, and a pile of red and yellow fabric fell on the table in front of Sasha. She stayed silent for several long seconds, then she clapped her hands and picked up the fabric. It quickly changed into a beautiful red dress, one that had strange sparkling holographic colors that glittered all throughout it. When she held it up to the light, it shone with a rainbow light that dazzled the eyes.

"I'm pretty good with fashion stuff." Sasha said, after a moment of embarrassment. "Making weapons and armor aren't really my talents, but I'm great at visualizing clothing. I'll try to get better at other stuff, but for now, being able to summon any clothing I want feels fabulous!"

Jason smiled. "If you want, I can summon that dress onto you. Or I can make a dressing room for you to get changed."

"The latter." Sasha said, before quickly adding, "I'd just prefer to change my own clothes."

"Sure, sure. One second." Jason replied.

At the back corner of the room, Jason conjured a sealed area with a door leading in and out. Sasha walked over and entered, then stepped back out after a minute or two. The red dress looked gorgeous on her, and she did a little spin to show it off.

"Alchemy." Jason said, quietly chuckling to himself. "I suspect this power will prove incredibly potent, given time. Sasha, Nadia, while I have you here, why don't I tell you about my MindCores? I have a feeling they're going to prove extremely useful for the both of you."

Jason launched into an explanation of the MindCores he had invented. Not only did Nadia and Sasha listen with great interest, but so did Marco and Daisy.

"So those are the options." Jason concluded after a while. "The GenesisFrame, which I use, is focused on research, inventions, and creating things. The RealitySim allows you to simulate entire worlds or alternate realities inside your mind. The QuantumReflex will directly increase your combat capabilities. The HellProphet... allows you to predict the movements of the future, and other beings. And finally, the OmniRecord gives you a general purpose cerebral improvement with no downsides. Accelerated thinking, infinite memory storage, and so on."

The teenagers all quietly thought to themselves about which MindCore would best augment their abilities. Only Marco, who still didn't know the extent of his power, was unable to form any sort of conclusive opinion.

"The RealitySim works best for me." Nadia said. "The GenesisFrame is appealing too, but I think based on your descriptions, the RealitySim fits my skillset perfectly."

Jason nodded. "That was my thought as well."

"I think if Nadia is taking the RealitySim, I should choose something else." Sasha said. "I need a lot of conceptual power, so I believe the GenesisFrame is best suited for me."

"I want a QuantumReflex." Daisy said without hesitation. "You haven't given this particular MindCore to anyone else yet, have you, dad?"

Jason looked at his daughter in surprise. "I haven't, but are you sure you want a MindCore that's so deeply focused on short-term benefits? The other Cores all have limitless capabilities for growth. By comparison, the QuantumReflex..."

"I know what you're thinking." Daisy said, "but my powers are not focused on Imagination. I've had lots of time to master my core abilities. In the future, if I hope to battle Demon Emperors, then I will need enhanced senses and reaction times. Nothing is more important to me than becoming a soldier for humanity."

Jason looked at his daughter. He smiled and nodded.

"If that's what you want, then the QuantumReflex will soon be yours."

He turned to Marco after a moment. "And you?"

Marco shook his head. "The decision is too important. I don't even know what my power is yet."

"Then I guess we'd better remedy that first." Jason said.

The Wordsmith looked around the room, then shook his head.

"Here's no good. Let's go outside Argent's walls, where there's more open space. Then you'll have more room to... snap things out of reality."

Part 675: Marco Snaps

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Jason took the teenagers out into the open area beyond Argent's walls. This place was known as The Proving Grounds, and in the future Jason planned for it to contain increasingly more dangerous and powerful beasts and exobeasts. He would pluck strong ones from worlds across the Milky Way, place them inside the Proving Grounds, and force them to evolve through unending survival and combat. The wilderness and jungle would claim countless lives, but the remaining champions would become fearsome without parallel.

Right now though, it was primitive and harmless. Mostly. There were probably some venomous insects and little blood-sucking parasites buzzing around, but a little over a year simply wasn't enough time for Axis Mundi and its unending source of Genesis Ichor to truly transform the life inside Aevum. There were birds, cat, dogs, and other small life forms that had undoubtedly began to mutate, but they would still need a decade or two to grow as formidable as the apex predators on Earth.

"These are the Ironwoods." Jason said, gesturing to the dense foliage around his group. "They shouldn't be too dangerous now, but in time, they will be. Whatever you do, do not eat or drink anything you find in this forest. Especially, and I cannot emphasize this enough… especially do not drink any standing or running water. It will screw up your body in ways you cannot imagine."

Marco rubbed his hands together nervously. "Then w-why have you brought us here if the place is so scary?"

"Your power is strange, and potentially dangerous." Jason explained. "I thought a wider open area to test your ability would be best."

He gestured toward a clearing in the forest. It wasn't large, perhaps only the size of a small shack, but it was big enough for the group of five to stand at the eastern edge and throw a softball into the western edge with relative ease.

"Well, I know that when you snap your fingers, things disappear, then reappear. So why don't you go ahead and do that for me?" Jason asked.

Marco nodded. He looked at the trees less than a hundred feet away, held up his hand, and snapped his fingers.

Suddenly, as if a giant invisible beach ball had taken a bite out of reality, a huge sphere opened up in the forest cover. Part of the ground vanished, revealing a concave depression. The trees above that spot vanished, except for their tree-tops, which had been completely severed from the missing trunks. Those canopies started to fall, only for the missing trees and ground to abruptly reappear, phasing into the falling canopies and causing a weird vibration as two confusing realities merged together.

After a few moments, the strange vibrations ceased. Two trees fell over and collapsed inside the clearing, while the others looked as if their canopies had been sliced off, then placed back on top of the severed trunks haphazardly.

"Amazing..." Nadia whispered, her eyes glowing blue.

Jason took a step forward, then paused to look at Marco. "Don't do anything else. Let me examine the scene."

Marco nodded. He didn't say a word.

The Wordsmith flickered forward. He arrived inside the mass of disheveled trees, then took a few minutes to inspect them, uttering Words of Power inside the center of his sanctum that traveled through the conduit of energy attached to his Dronesmith. He inspected the scene for a while, then walked back over.

"I believe you are temporarily erasing a bubble of space, then bringing it back one second later." Jason said. "But the curious thing is, there's signs of damage to the trees caused by aging. These trees are all quite young, so it's really obvious when days or even weeks of growth are separating their tops from their trunks and roots."

"What does that mean?" Marco asked.

"I'm not sure. Let's find out." Jason said with a smile.

He walked back over to the fallen trees, then pointed at Marco.

"Snap your fingers while aiming at me."

Marco nearly jumped out of his skin. "What! No way!! Sir, you don't even know what my power does! You could die!"

"Unlikely." Jason retorted. "I haven't told you guys this, but you're not looking at my real body. This is a drone I made with my powers."

He detached his arm at the shoulder, revealing its internal metallic components. "See?"

Daisy's eyes narrowed. She finally understood why she hadn't been able to read her father's thoughts, and she felt... slightly betrayed. Annoyed, at the very least. Why didn't he tell me?!

"Oh... so it's a drone..." Marco said softly. "Well... alright. But are you sure, Mister Hiro, sir?"

"I'm sure." Jason said, giving him a thumbs up. "Snap me."

Marco gritted his teeth. After taking a moment to steady his nerves, he snapped his fingers, and Jason's drone disappeared, along with a massive chunk of ground surrounding him.

One second later, Jason reappeared. But he wasn't standing. He was laying face-down in the grass, unmoving.

"Oh... oh my god!!" Marco screamed, shocked out of his mind. He started to shake with fear. "Mister Hiro? Mister Hiro??!!"

After a moment, Jason's drone twitched. It lifted itself up with its hands, then returned to a standing position.

"Alright. That was strange." Jason said.

"Are you okay?" Marco asked, running over with shaky hands. "I'm so sorry! I didn't mean-"

"Calm down, it's fine." Jason said, before cocking his head. "Oh? The battery on my drone has dropped to 99%. That's unusual. When in Aevum, the drone should be at 100% constantly. It has the power to absorb energy from the leylines under the soil."

Daisy gave her father a bizarre look. "Then what happened?"

Jason didn't answer for a few seconds. He frowned, then tapped his chin thoughtfully.

"It takes a good week or two for my drone to lose 1% of its power while passively standing still. The energy drain would be a lot higher if it engaged in active movement, combat, or utilized its internal abilities. For it to lose 1% of its battery while doing nothing implies... time passed inside the 'spatial bubble'."

Nadia looked at Jason meaningfully. "Did you lose your connection to the drone?"

"I did. It felt as if the energy line was severed, which is extremely odd, given it can persist across dimensions like Aevum, the Labyrinth, Heaven, and other such places."

"Does your drone have an internal chronometer?" Nadia asked.

Jason looked at her. Then he checked the drone's databanks.

"What the... its internal date is off by two weeks. It experienced two weeks of time despite only being gone for a single second from our point of view."

Jason's eyes flashed.

"It's... it's like the Stillness! Marco is somehow sucking things into a sealed dimension with a hyper-accelerated temporal flow. That explains a lot."

"Marco," Nadia said, "didn't you tell us that when you were a kid, you used your power on a dog attacking you? And when the dog reappeared, it looked like it had been dead for days? It must have been trapped inside the temporal field for two weeks without food and water. That's why it perished."

Marco's face turned pale. "So I really did kill that dog?! God! Oh my god, how awful!!"

"It was an accident. No reason to blame yourself." Jason said coolly. "More importantly, I think you're missing the bigger picture. This ability of yours is something special. Let's run some more tests."

Jason manufactured a few different items. He made a clock with the date and time on its front, a fast-growing algae inside a solution of water, and even a colony of termites with ample food placed on top of their glass enclosure.

After putting them in a small area atop a stone platform, Jason gave Marco the go-ahead. Marco snapped his fingers, and a large sphere instantly swallowed the items along with the ground they were standing on. One second later, they reappeared.

Jason walked over. He noticed that the stone platform may have reappeared inside the same spot, but it was slightly off position and hadn't seamlessly merged with the stone that was left behind. There were visible cracks and gaps in a circle around the voided platform.

But soon he turned his attention to other matters.

"The clock shows that exactly one week, six days, twenty-three hours, fifty-nine minutes, and fifty-nine seconds passed from the moment you voided the area to the moment it reappeared. One second shy of two weeks, on the dot."

"So... that means... I'm trapping things inside a sealed dimension for two weeks?" Marco asked.

"Sure looks that way." Jason said.

He fell silent. Several seconds passed.

Jason examined the algae. It had grown in density a little, enough to suggest a week or two had passed. The termites had eaten most of the food and their colony had increased in population somewhat.

Eventually, Jason turned to the side. His father, Hideki, abruptly appeared, teleported there by the Wordsmith.

"Dad. Help me out for a minute." Jason said.

Hideki's body blurred. He shrugged. "It's safe."

Jason opened his mouth to speak, but then shut it. Hideki had already answered the question he wanted to ask.

Seeing that his son was satisfied, Hideki turned and smiled at Daisy. "Hey, sweetie. How's my cute little granddaughter doing?"

"I'm doing fine... grandpa." Daisy said, not certain she was entirely comfortable using the word with him. Maybe she would get used to it in due time.

Hideki waved goodbye, then he vanished from the spot.

"That was your grandfather?" Sasha asked. "What even just happened?"

"He's a Trueborn like my dad and I." Daisy half-heartedly explained. "I'm guessing he used his power to help dad...?"

"Yeah." Jason said. He turned to Marco. "I'm going to bring my true body here. I want you to void the 'real' me."

Before Marco could utter a word of protest, a second Jason suddenly appeared. His Drone took a few steps back, while Jason walked over to the stone platform and stood in place.

"W-wait! Hold on! Isn't that dangerous?" Marco asked, looking at the other teenagers for confirmation.

They shrugged. Daisy touched his shoulder. "My grandpa said it was safe. So you can do it."

"Oh. Well, alright then..." Marco said quietly.

He gritted his teeth, then held up his hands. With an audible crack, he snapped his fingers. Jason disappeared.

Suddenly, Jason found that he was no longer inside Aevum. He had arrived inside a pitch-black area with zero visibility. He didn't become flustered. He could still breathe, which meant that there was oxygen around himself.

Seconds passed. He didn't return to Aevum.

I've lost contact with all my drones. Jason thought. The temperature here seems no different from the Proving Grounds. Maybe Marco's power copies the environment the person is teleported from?

He uttered a Word of Power. "Light."

The surroundings brightened noticeably as Jason's body became bioluminescent. He lit up the area around himself, finding that he was still standing atop the stone platform, but now there was absolutely nothing past its edges. He appeared to be floating inside nothingness. His Wordsmithing also felt remarkably sluggish. There was a ten-meter-in-diameter sphere enveloping his body and the area around it, protecting it from a strange sort of 'nothingness' outside.

"Return." Jason said.

Nothing happened. A chill went down his back.

"Return! Teleport! Break! Shatter!"

Jason tried multiple Words of Power, but he found that the sphere was inescapable. He momentarily started to panic, but that feeling quickly died down. His father had seen the future and told Jason it was safe to proceed, so that meant he wouldn't die here.

Jason started trying lots of things. He attempted to accelerate the time-flow of Marco's void dimension, but that had no effect. He tried creating an electric generator with his magic, and that did succeed, which allowed him to set up some electric-powered lights. He tried sending a transmission out to Aevum, but he received no reply. No matter what light he shined toward the edges of the spherical dimension, he could see nothing but pitch-blackness outside.

"I'm completely trapped here." Jason said to himself quietly. "I can't escape at all. Not even my Wordsmithing will set me free. That's both horrifying and amazing. Could this void dimension trap other entities? Could it trap High Psions and other Cosmics? Could it trap... Satan?"

Jason started thinking. He realized after a short while that there were huge advantages to being inside this realm.

"If my hypothesis is correct, I have about two weeks inside the Void to progress my projects, whereas my Stillness only gives me maybe eight solid hours before I develop a massive migraine. Marco doesn't seem to grow fatigued by snapping his fingers, either, so he could snap me here over and over, giving me effectively infinite time to develop my potential!"

Jason's eyes widened. Since he was stuck here, couldn't escape, and couldn't get a message out, he might as well make the best of the situation.

Days passed. Jason used this gift of free time to rapidly iterate on his MindCores. He took the knowledge he had acquired over the last several Aevum-months and rapidly updated the MindCores from v2 to v3. He had only ever installed the GenesisFrame v1 inside his own brain, but now he had made so many huge advancements that once he put the v3 MindCores inside the brains of his allies, they would outperform him mentally in all categories!

"Amazing. Shocking." Jason murmured to himself on the 10th day. "Time is such a precious commodity, and now I can get massive amounts of it whenever I need. Marco is a precious asset. I cannot afford to lose him. I'll have to assign a protective detail to shadow him at all times. If the demons learn how valuable he is to me, he'll face an unending stream of assassination attempts!"

Time passed. Jason started to grow the beginnings of a beard, but he was too engrossed in his research to even notice. On occasion, Jason would look up from his work, thinking he had seen something moving out in the inky blackness of the Nothingness. These minor hallucinations irritated him, but luckily, they were only minor signs he was going slightly crazy from isolation. It obviously couldn't be good to spend so many days alone without social contact.

Eventually, after two weeks, the Snap Dimension rumbled around him, and the void collapsed, returning him to Aevum.

Daisy and her friends looked worriedly at the spot where Jason was now sitting, one second having passed in Aevum-time.

"Dad! Dad, are you okay?" Daisy asked, rushing over to his side.

Jason looked up and blinked. "Oh, I'm back? Wow. That took a long time, but it didn't feel too long to me."

From the teenager's perspectives, Jason had been standing when he disappeared, then he reappeared a few feet off to the side, sitting in a comfortable easy chair, with finished bowls and plates of food piled off to the side. It looked as if he had eaten many, many meals in that 'one second' he was gone.

Jason yawned, stood up, and cracked his back.

"Alright," He said after a moment of letting the blood pulse through his veins. "It definitely takes two weeks for time to pass inside the Snap Dimension. Marco, your power is going to be extremely useful to me moving forward, since I can get a lot of work done in a very short period of time."

Marco nodded dumbly. "Um... alright. I'm glad I was able to help, Mister Hiro. You're really okay?"

"Sort of." Jason said, tapping his finger against his chin. "I sincerely doubt this is the full extent of your power though. I wonder if it isn't possible to extend or contract the duration of time spent inside? Maybe you could extend the time to a month, a year, or something else? Or maybe you could shrink it to only an hour or two? Definitely worth playing with. I'm going to create an autonomous drone assistant to help you test how your power works. I can confirm that running out of oxygen wasn't a problem, but running out of food and water was. If it had been Daisy you snapped, she... probably wouldn't have survived."

Jason spent a few minutes explaining what he did while inside the dimension. Nadia and the others listened intently as he told them about his newly upgraded Mindcores.

"The Snap Dimension won't do much to a demon if Marco tried trapping them." Daisy pointed out. "They're immortal creatures who don't even need to eat, drink, or breathe to survive. It'll just end up being a two-week inconvenience for them, then they'll escape one second later and kill Marco."

"Maybe we can kill them with boredom?" Sasha suggested.

Jason chuckled. "Like I said, there's zero chance a Trueborn like Marco has uncovered the full extent of his abilities. I'm fairly certain there's more his power can do... he'll just need to explore its full capabilities in due time."

Marco nodded slowly. After getting a decent grasp on all his power could achieve, he started thinking about the MindCores Jason had suggested.

"I don't think the GenesisFrame is right for me, though it would be cool to upgrade my brain with it. Generally speaking, it would be a huge benefit in my ordinary life." Marco said seriously. "The RealitySim seems like I could use it to model lots of different scenarios for my powers. The QuantumReflex probably won't suit me. The OmniRecord is also likewise good for general cerebral improvements..."

He looked thoughtful.

"Honestly, Mister Hiro... I think the HellProphet would be interesting. Predicting the future, predicting the consequences of my actions. Modeling what might happen if I locked one person or another inside my Snap Dimension. I think I'd like to use that one, if possible."

Jason looked surprised. "I didn't expect anyone to pick the HellProphet. But if each of you pick a different MindCore, we'll have a lot more data to work with. Unfortunately, I advanced all the MindCore designs except the HellProphet. I'll need to take some more time to..."

Jason paused, then laughed.

"Ah, never mind! I can just have you snap me again, Marco! I'll upgrade it later, right before I upgrade your brain. For right now, Nadia, Sasha, and Daisy are the higher priority upgrades. Their powers are more immediately useful."

Marco nodded and lowered his eyes. "It's fine, sir. My power isn't really all that useful compared to theirs. I'm sorry it's not very good."

Daisy frowned. She walked over and hugged Marco's shoulders with one arm. "Hey, don't talk down about yourself like that! You have a magical power! 99.99% of other humans don't! That means, even if it's 'not that useful', it's still something others can't do. It's a unique talent! And based on what my dad said, at the very least, it'll give humanity a massive boost in R&D time. I'm sure he and Nadia will be able to go inside and get TONS of work done over the next several months!"

Jason walked over and lightly clapped Marco on the back. "Daisy's right! Don't put yourself down. In fact, I want you to keep experimenting with your power. Use it lots, learn its limits, and find new and exciting ways to exploit what it can do. I'll assign Nadia to helping you master it and learning its strengths and weaknesses, before giving me a full breakdown. How's that sound?"

Marco smiled weakly. "Sure. I'll do that then, sir."

One thing was for certain. Marco was not a self-assured person. He had a noticeable inferiority complex... it reminded Jason of his own younger self. Always looking to other people for validation, constantly second-guessing himself, never believing he was good enough...

Jason thought about Amelia, about Phoebe, Kar, and lots of other people. Because of their words of encouragement, he managed to push past his own self-doubts and become a self-actualized Wordsmith. That was what Marco needed; the guiding words of his closest friends.

"Hey, we've been at this all day." Jason said. "Let's stop here for now. I'll make everyone some delicious food. How's that sound?"

"I want to help!" Nadia said. "I love cooking!"

"I do too!" Sasha said. "And Marco's dad is a professional chef. I bet he's better than all of us combined!"

Marco chuckled and touched his nose self-consciously. "Haha. Well, I have picked up a few things from my dad, it's true."

"Great. Then it's decided." Jason said with a smile. "Let's eat some food, get some rest, and pick up where we left off tomorrow."

With a wave of his hand, Jason teleported himself and the kids out of the clearing. They returned to Inner Argent, leaving behind only the cracked stone platform and the pile of food bowls behind as evidence of their having been there.

For several long minutes, the forest remained still.

Then, the air slightly vibrated. For the briefest of instants, a faceless, shadowy figure hazily materialized inside the confines of the area where Marco's Snap Dimension had existed. The figure swayed from side to side in silence for a few moments... then it wavered out of existence and faded away, as if it had never been there...

The forest became still once more.

Part 676: A Dialogue With Dolgris

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Somewhere in the Southwest Milky Way Quadrant.

Founder Unarin sat inside the co-pilot's chair of his personal shuttle, the Founder's Spear. In the pilot's chair, Muuxunuu silently piloted the vessel, saying nothing to the First Founder. In the rear cabin, a single Dolgrimite, Cinculu, lounged while sipping a nutrient brew made of raw blood and several other detestable ingredients. He seemed to be quite enjoying the flavor.

The Founder's Spear cut through the void at a speed similar to what most Volgrim war vessels could achieve. Rather than burn precious Trifrancium more than needed, Unarin opted to travel at Warp 7.5 and arrive at Grimvolas in a slower but more reasonable time. He wasn't in a rush.

It had been a little over two Terran-weeks since Mephisto's assault on Volgarius, the Dolgrimite's rise, and all the other insanity that happened in a disturbingly short period of time. Two weeks was not a long time, but it wasn't short, either. Unarin had read scattered reports regarding the humans on Sharmur and how they had already constructed the skeleton of a new human capital city. Rumors were flying that the Dolgrimites had suppressed or eliminated the Kolvaxian infection on dozens of worlds, and the situation across the Milky Way was on its way to a slow and tedious stabilization.

But Unarin did not grow complacent.

Peace was not the natural state of the universe. Akasha did not like peace. He loved to see war, death, and calamity spread through civilized space. He had created the Akashic Rules explicitly to foment wars and power struggles, all for the sake of amusing himself.

Whenever the situation seemed to be improving, that was when things would turn around and become worse than before...

The Founder's Spear beeped an alert. The Grimvolas system was less than ten standard time units away. Unarin blinked his eyes, then he stood up, exited the cockpit, and walked back to the rear cabin. It was this very area where he had once hosted Humanity's Hero, the Wordsmith. Now, it held the figure of his fellow Founder, Cinculu.

"Unarin." Cinculu said. "News?"

"We're soon to arrive in the Grimvolas system." Unarin said. "Where would you like for us to land?"

Cinculu glowered at the First Founder. He was still pissed at the brazen request Unarin had made to speak to the Dolgrimites' god, but the matter was out of his claws. Matriarch Gorzana had personally spoken to Dolgris and confirmed the meeting. Cinculu could do nothing more than escort Unarin there and pray the First Founder did not enrage Lord Dolgris.

Minutes later, the Founder's Spear arrived in the Grimvolas System. It rapidly made its way to the ancient Volgrim's original homeworld, then cut through the upper atmosphere, traveling toward a sacred temple located on the western edge of a great mountain plateau.

Atop that plateau, there were hundreds of Dolgrimites dressed in warrior armor. Some were colored gold, others red, others blue and green and black. Each one was part of a unique division suited to carrying out certain battle formations and orders more effectively than their peers. All were extremely dangerous.

Cinculu couldn't help but walk over and stand beside Unarin, sneering contemptuously at his peer. "You see? This is the strength of the Dolgrimites. What you are seeing is but a tiny fraction of our whole army. The elites among the elites. If we were to battle your Psions, we would crush them with ease. The Plague will soon be nothing more than an unpleasant memory from our past."

Unarin glanced at him. "Boastful claims require great evidence to confirm. Since the Psions have all been brought to ruin, it's a shame you'll never be able to validate your words."

Cinculu's eyes twitched. He had once again tried to go up against the First Founder in a battle of words, yet had come up short. He quickly took a step away and chuffed in annoyance.

"You had best mind your manners when speaking to the great Dolgris!" Cinculu spat. "Your glib tongue might just land you in a situation not even Dosena can help you escape."

"Oh, good." Unarin said dryly. "I was worried this would end up being a dreadfully boring meeting. It seems I'll be able to enjoy myself after all."

Cinculu, seeing he hadn't gotten the reaction he wanted, instead stalked away and sat back down, sulking in annoyance. He could never defeat the First Founder in a battle of words. It was impossible.

If only he could release the beast within himself and beat the shit out of Unarin, he could introduce Unarin's smug face to the ground and teach him to respect those who were more powerful. Alas, Cinculu found that he had been shackled by the rules of a game he didn't even know he was playing. His mother, the Matriarch, was the true ruler of Grimvolas. He could not defy her commands.

The Founder's Spear set down in the center of a landing platform. There were very few spacecraft in orbit and on the surface of Grimvolas. All of them were controlled by Technopaths who had made trade agreements with the Dolgrimites, and thus were nominally owned by the Dolgrimite Matriarch. None of those ships were visible even from a kilometer above sea level.

The landing platform extended outward. Unarin casually strode down it, looking more bored than ever. He glanced around at the 'intimidating' display of power by the Dolgrimite Elites and found it all rather banal and distasteful.

"Founder Unarin." Matriarch Gorzana said, standing at the end of the procession. She wore golden armor that clung tightly to her muscled body; something Unarin believed she had only worn to try and sow a hint of fear in the back of his mind. Naturally, it didn't work. Unarin feared nothing.

"Hello, Matriarch." Unarin said. "Not to be a bother, but I hope you don't plan to put me to sleep with too many of these idle pleasantries. Let's be on our way to meet your God, if you please."

Gorzana's eye twitched. Like mother, like son, she too came up short when it came to political talk with someone of Unarin's caliber.

Still, she didn't let her annoyance show. She smiled widely. "Yes, of course. Lord Dolgris has waited long enough for your arrival. I did not expect you to take a scenic route, so I must say I am rather displeased by the time needed for your trip."

"Apologies." Unarin said blandly, as he walked over and stopped in front of her, Cinculu trailing behind him. "I had a few important matters to deal with on Volgarius. I'm pleased you were able to convince your great God to speak to a humble mortal like myself. Hopefully, he will not be enraged by my delays."

"Dolgris is lofty. Dolgris is slow to anger." Gorzana said with upraised eyes. "He is long-lived, and far older than even yourself. A few extra cycles are of little concern to one as ancient as he. Come. I shall take you to meet him."

Unarin nodded. He fell into stride beside Gorzana, while Cinculu shuffled along behind both. He seemed a rather sorry figure, unworthy of being on the same level as the two of them, despite supposedly being a Founder himself. Seeds of resentment at this fact had long bubbled within Cinculu's gut, but he dared not say anything so long as the Matriarch controlled Grimvolas's armies.

The trio walked deep into the underground depths. Unlike the other Volgrim, the Dolgrimites burrowed inside mountains and underneath the landmasses of Grimvolas. Their underground cities were both sprawling and impressive, with room for billions of Dolgrimites all across the world. They chose not to live on the surface, instead allowing the planet's natural creatures to prosper. At night, the Dolgrimites would come out to hunt, and countless great slaughters would occur all at once as their prey screamed and squawked in the final moments of their lives.

They passed by enormous guest chambers, halls of feasting, sacrificial pyres, and countless other religious monuments depicting various images of the 'face' of their God. Unfortunately, each of these images was different from the others, showing none of the artists and sculptors had ever personally come into contact with Dolgris. The variations were far too extreme, and it was obvious to Unarin that there must be some contention as to what sort of entity Dolgris even was.

He looked at the side of Gorzana's face. Then he looked away.

"Is something on your mind?" Gorzana asked, sensing his gaze.

"I am growing more and more curious about Dolgris." Unarin said, speaking mainly to fill the silence. "What sort of tenets does he command that you live by?"

Gorzana snorted. "Hmph. Dolgris is fair. Dolgris is just. He has decreed that brother shall not do wrong by brother. If one has sinned against his fellow Dolgrimite, he must bring an accounting to bear. Witnesses must be called. Statements must be taken, and a selection of the victim and aggressor's peers must pass judgment. Else, if this is not to the satisfaction of both parties, they may instead engage in a sanctioned Battle of Blood. The victor will be declared just, and the loser executed."

"Tyranny of the strong." Unarin chuckled. "What a noble way of handling disputes."

"A metal worshiper like you could never comprehend the brilliance of our God." Gorzana said, unwilling to entertain Unarin's blasphemy.

Before long, they arrived inside Gorzana's personal throne room at the heart of the largest underground city. After striding past many different guards, they walked behind the throne into a secret antechamber.

This chamber was small, perhaps only big enough for five people to stand side by side; fewer if they were the size of the Matriarch. There was an altar depicting Dolgris's face at the scene, but it was just as vague and lacking in detail as all the other graven images Unarin had seen along the way.

"You have spoken to Dolgris before?" Unarin asked.

"Of course." Gorzana said, pride evident in her voice. "Few have had the opportunity. Cinculu is also one of them."

"Do you know what he looks like?" Unarin asked.

"I have not gazed upon my God's visage." Gorzana replied. "I am unworthy."

The corner of Unarin's mouth crept up, ever so slightly. He quickly stifled the urge to smirk and returned his face to a neutral resting position.

Gorzana walked over to the altar. She bowed before it for ten long minutes, praying with her palms clasped together to her God.

Eventually, a magical portal materialized. It was pitch-black, revealing a dimension of pure darkness on the other side. None who gazed upon it could obtain a hint of what lay beyond.

Gorzana stood up. She stared with deep respect and adoration at the portal.

"Dolgris awaits." She said, gesturing toward it.

"Great. I'll be on my way, then." Unarin said, casually striding forward. He stepped through the portal, and it closed behind him.

"Disrespectful bastard!" Cinculu hissed through clenched teeth. "We'll see how haughty he remains after coming face to face with our GOD!"

Unarin's eyes were exceptional. He could make out many minor details even in a pitch-black room deep underneath a planet's soil.

But inside Dolgris's Sanctum, his eyes were of no use. An intense darkness swallowed everything in absolute blackness. It was not ordinary darkness, but a domain that deliberately prevented mere mortals from seeing beyond their immediate vicinity. Even when Unarin waved his palm in front of his face, he couldn't see a shadow of its movement.

There was a quiet rumbling in the darkness. Unarin's keen ears easily picked up on the faint noise. But it was his nose that detected a most unusual odor inside this dark domain. He smelled what could only be described as burned, acrid flesh. Not burns caused by ordinary fire, but chemical burns caused by an extremely potent acid.

After a few moments of standing around waiting, Unarin loudly, and rudely, yawned.

"Ahh, goodness. Apologies. Are you quite done with all this pomp and ceremony, Dolgris? Are you ready to speak to this inferior mortal yet?"

In the blackness of the sanctum, a pair of even blacker eyes secretly looked down upon Unarin from high above. A snort rang out in the still air, drawing Unarin's unseeing gaze upward.

"Weak little mortal. You think too highly of yourself."

The speaker was none other than Dolgris.

His voice was deep and bassy. It had a sort of grinding sensation to it, as if boulders were being rubbed together whenever he enunciated a syllable. It was rather unpleasant to listen to.

Unarin, of course, was not fazed. He merely looked up into the darkness, unable to see anything, with the same bored expression as before.

"You really think highly of yourself, Dolgris. A lauded Apex Cosmic, lording it over a species of idiotic mortals. You know the other Cosmics would laugh if they knew this was how you spent your days, don't you? I wonder what sort of pathetic form your body has taken to lower you to such a level."

Dolgris did not flare up with rage. He remained cool-headed in the face of Unarin's taunting.

"A small creature with small thoughts. You came here rather confidently. Are you not afraid of me smiting you where you stand? You don't even have that Second Founder to protect you… not that she could."

"If you're going to kill me, just get it over with already." Unarin said, his fear lessening even further from its already nonexistent level. "I've lived a long life. Death, torture, whatever else doesn't bother me. At this point, my Empire is already on its way to ruin, so I've no fears of you destroying it, either. But I know the same is not true of you. You have a reason to live on. A need you must fill. And that need ensures you won't harm a tendril on my head."

Something loomed closer to Unarin in the darkness. He still could not tell what Dolgris's true form was, but he could feel the 'dark god' drawing his face closer.

"I was correct in bringing you here, Unarin. You are not like these other small-minded and foolish mortals. You know how to bend to circumstance, yet you do not fear death. That makes you an exceptionally valuable pawn. But do tell, what 'need' is it that I need your help to fulfill? Would you be so kind as to illuminate this God on the subject?"

"As an Apex Cosmic, you only have two things that give your life purpose." Unarin said calmly. "Either you choose to be one of the many Apex Cosmics that guard the Milky Way, or you take up the position of the galaxy's Ruler. Since there are no other Apex Cosmics out there, you're in the unique position of choosing whichever one suits your fancy. Even better, we currently have no Ruler. That leaves a nice, juicy opening for you to pursue. Life Beyond Eternity. It's quite enticing, I must admit."

"For a mortal, you know a great deal about matters between Cosmics." Dolgris said softly. "No doubt the Psions have kept you well informed."

"I know that Akasha's Game is about to begin." Unarin stated. "Wars between galaxies. The Milky Way is ripe for the plundering. If we don't elevate a Ruler soon, we're certain to perish to a greater power. Our forces cannot compare to those of Andromeda, Cat's Eye, Messier, or countless others. It stands to reason that uplifting a powerful Cosmic to Ruler would benefit us all greatly. And one as noble as yourself has no reason to bother with the mundanities of managing mortals."

"Hehe." Dolgris laughed sinisterly.

He didn't reply to Unarin's prompting.

Unarin smiled up at the darkness. His was an expression born of knowing he already held his opponent's strengths and weaknesses within the palm of his hand.

"You want one thing, Dolgris. You wish for the Milky Way to revere you so that you can ascend to the position of Ruler. I can make that happen. The Dolgrimites cannot."

"You think too highly of yourself." Dolgris said. "You are not as all-knowing as you believe. I have already conversed with the Dark Ones. I have plenty of room to cut a deal with them. Why should I try to become Ruler of a weak, fragile, useless galaxy like this one? Even if I Ascend, I have no powerful subjects at my beck and call. Dosena was not bad for a Cosmic, but she was only a Middle Cosmic. Now she is useless. The other options are thin and murky at best."

"I see." Unarin said. "So if you sell out the Milky Way to the Dark Ones... what? They will give you control of a different galaxy? Can such a good deal truly exist? Why would they give you command of a galaxy with more powerful Cosmics in exchange for one as weak as the Milky Way? Are you an imbecile?"

"Watch your tone." Dolgris snarled, a flicker of irritation in his voice. "Speak snidely once more, and mere words will not be able to protect you from my wrath."

"Right, right, yes. You're going to kill me if I upset you. I should have realized your feelings were sensitive." Unarin said lightly.

Suddenly, from the darkness, Dolgris loomed closer than ever. The outline of his face emerged from the shadows, revealing himself to Unarin. His eyes twitched with barely contained rage. His face contorted into the vicious, bestial expression of a predator eyeing its prey...

And Unarin's mood finally lifted. In that moment, he obtained exactly what he was looking for.

"You DARE speak out again?!" Dolgris roared. "I will KILL-!"

"So you're a dragon." Unarin interrupted, looking at the face of the Dolgrimites' 'god' for the first time ever. "Everything makes sense now. I theorized you might be one, but I wasn't entirely certain until this exact moment. Based on recent clues I've obtained, you've been hiding within Grimvolas's secret dimension for a very, very long time, Dolgris."

The dark dragon's eyes widened slightly. He suddenly realized the error he had made and started to pull back, only to realize the pointlessness of such an action.

"You... you tricked me. You wished to confirm this God's identity? Is that why you came here?"

"That's right." Unarin said. "I've been perusing the ancient records of many different species, but none were as interesting as those belonging to the humans... or more specifically, the angels. It seems there was a terrible war, many eons ago. The dragons were thought to be exterminated. Your apparent deaths were not as complete as the Archangels believed. In addition to yourself, there was another dragon hiding on Earth named Leviathan. Was he your beloved baby brother? Or your older brother? Could you clarify for me?"

Dolgris glowered at Unarin. The serpent's eyes narrowed as he considered what to do next.

"I have hid my face for eons. Not out of fear, but necessity." Dolgris said slowly. "Long ago, I suffered an injury most grievous. I hid on Grimvolas and submerged myself to avoid detection. I believed that if the Archangels sensed me, they would exterminate me without question. When my mother passed, I felt her power enter me. When my final brother fell, I also experienced his power. But even so, my injuries remained."

Dolgris's eyes flickered with blatant hatred.

"Those foul Archangels. Protectors of the galaxy, they called themselves. But in truth, they were bloodthirsty villains. They may be dead now, but the wound they dealt upon me weakened me to the point I could not wield the full power of an Apex Cosmic."

Dolgris spoke frankly, which somewhat surprised Unarin. He thought he would have to do more coaxing to get the information from the dragon, but it turned out Dolgris was quite interested in conversing with an intelligent entity on the First Founder's level.

"I am unable at present to acquire the strength of a Ruler, Unarin." Dolgris admitted. "Even if I met all the requirements, my body would not possess the ability to Ascend further. My last hope was extinguished recently. I am... lost. I do not know what actions I can take to recover my full strength. Only by making a deal with the Dark Ones can I regain my former glory."

"The recent loss you suffered." Unarin said calmly. "That was when Mephisto's dragon bones were hurled into a black hole?"

Dolgris hesitated.

When he spoke next, his tone made Unarin's ears perk up.

"Yes."

It was a lie. Even if Dolgris was an Apex Cosmic, he could not easily deceive Unarin's social acumen. The First Founder had spent millions of years learning to deceive and to see through deceptions by greater and lesser life-forms. Demila temporarily fooled him, but only because of their long-shared history and Unarin's belief that he knew her too well for her to lie to him. Other Sentients could not claim such a lofty victory over him.

But if Dolgris was lying, then what was he lying about?

Unarin did not press the matter. He opted to play stupid and take Dolgris's words at face value.

"It seems your situation is more complex than I expected." Unarin said, after a moment of thought. "Whatever your motivations may be, you are ultimately a denizen of this galaxy. Dosena spent millions of cycles attempting to rise through the ranks and become an Apex Cosmic. She failed. It is unlikely we are going to acquire such a Cosmic in our Empire any time soon. As such, I am eager to assist you in acquiring the power you need to take the final step and become a Ruler. Are you in dire need of dragon bones to empower yourself? Also known as 'Living Moldanium'? If so, I can take drastic steps to procure it from various sources. Living Moldanium is a precious resource, but alternatives exist."

Dolgris's eyes seemed to dim ever so slightly. "I had my eyes on a certain sentient. You knew him as the Wordsmith. He seemed to possess a power that could have rebuilt my body. Unfortunately, he perished, along with his clone. If you can find a way to create a new clone of the Wordsmith, that would suit my purposes. As for Living Moldanium… if you have processed it into a new form, it is useless to me. Only intact dragon bones will be useful in repairing my body. Else, we must wait and pray I am able to repair the damage on my own, as I have been doing since time immemorial. Though my progress is slow, I am making minor headway in healing my wounds."

"I am able to clone the Wordsmith, but his supernatural powers will not persist." Unarin said. "My Empire has attempted to clone Enhanced Entities on many occasions, but we always fail to replicate their extraordinary qualities. I'm sure you can imagine why."

"Duplicating the Uniqueness of an individual is impossible." Dolgris said. "There are many Sentients, Cosmics, and Rulers who desire to devour the Uniqueness of Sentients and galaxies alike. Doing so would allow their abilities to progress... but alas, soul manipulation is the one method that will always cause terrible damage to those foolish enough to try it."

Unarin's eyes flickered. He privately wondered if this was more than just an idle thought. Had Dolgris attempted soul manipulation in the past? Could that be the real reason his body was injured and he hadn't yet healed it?

Naturally, he did not state this thought.

He continued to converse with Dolgris for a while. Eventually, the two of them came to an understanding of one another.

"You are a fascinating mortal. I sense within you a spark of greatness even more impressive than those I have seen in Rulers. Killing you would truly be a shame. I shall allow you to continue ruling your Empire as you see fit. As for the foolish Dolgrimites... I will give you a method to contact me. Feel free to dispatch them to worlds as you wish. Exterminating this 'Plague' should be a top priority. Its origins are rather... frightening."

Unarin's eyes shone. He met Dolgris's gaze.

"You know of the origin of the Plague?"

"How can I not? But telling you of it will reap no advantage. Simply be aware that this galactic abomination is older than you know. Eliminating it from various worlds is quite simple for my children to do, but eliminating the source... that cannot come to pass unless I regain my full power. The origin point of the Plague is too mighty for the Milky Way to defeat..."

Dolgris waved a claw, dismissing Unarin. The First Founder respectfully bowed his head for a moment, then uttered a quiet farewell. After he was dismissed, he stepped through a portal Dolgris had opened, arriving back in the Matriarch's Throne Antechamber.

There, Gorzana and Cinculu awaited, smug smiles on their faces. They believed in their heart of hearts Unarin had definitely had the wits scared out of him by their great God.

Thus, when Unarin returned, his expression the same as before, they both quaked with worry. What had their God told him?

"Dolgris is quite an interesting fellow." Unarin said casually. "We held a dialogue most fascinating. Feel free to pay him a visit soon. He will relay the contents of our discussion to you. As for me, I am going to return to Volgarius by myself. Thank you kindly for bringing me here."

Cinculu gawked. When he had spoken to Dolgris in the past, he had left the room trembling in fear and adulation. How was Unarin able to remain standing with nary a hint of fear on his face? He must be bluffing!

"You!" Cinculu growled.

"Yes?" Unarin asked, his expression unmoved.

Cinculu clenched his jaw together. He was silent for a few seconds, then he looked away.

"I shall escort you to your shuttle." Cinculu eventually said.

"Oh, most excellent." Unarin replied. "I always enjoy our conversations. Be sure to entertain me along the way."

If eyes could shoot lasers, the look Cinculu gave Unarin would surely melt his body to slag...

Part 677: Chrona's Biggest Loser

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

A little over two weeks had passed in the outside galaxy, but years had passed inside Chrona. With its time dilation having increased to nearly 300x realspace, that meant a bit over 17 years had passed for Chrona's denizens.

Chrona itself had expanded. Not only in population, but in size as well. Kar and Blinker continued to have children, and the general human worries about 'incest' were not enough to stop their various children from pairing together. Thus, the population had started to balloon at an increasingly fast rate, forcing more construction and more expansion toward the edge of Chrona.

Chrona was a lot like the Labyrinth. It grew based on its internal life energy. Unlike Jason's much more successful secondary realm, Aevum, Chrona did not have a great quantity of life inside of it, but all its life forms were qualitatively powerful. Seeing that the teleporters leading to the outside world were growing increasingly stressed by the strengthening temporal distortions, Fiona had long ago taken matters into her own hands. She teleported various non-sentient creatures and beasts from different planets across the Milky Way into Chrona. She forcefully created a natural food chain, using predators and prey to balance each other out.

Much like Aevum, Fiona, Blinker, and Rebecca had worked together to build a huge barrier around the central city. It was, unfortunately, not as formidable as the one Jason made inside Aevum, but it was powerful enough to keep Chrona's newly added wildlife out.

They did not have access to Genesis Ichor. They did not have a way to rapidly evolve the creatures inside Chrona. But that was never their purpose anyway; they only wished to ensure they had a stable food supply in the event the replicators broke down or some other catastrophe happened.

Fiona was growing more worried by the year. She could easily see that the time where they lost contact with the outer galaxy would be upon them soon. Already, the Spynet had lost 15% of its viewscreen connections, notably those closest to powerful Psions, Cosmics, and other supernatural entities. Their innate energy fields broke down the magical connections between Chrona and its microscopic spy drones.

Communicating with the outside world was also growing increasingly difficult. Previously, Fiona could reliably send messages to the Phoenix, who would transmit them through Jepthath to the rest of humanity. But sometimes, she wasn't able to connect to the Phoenix for days at a time when her transmitters broke down. She had to rely on sporadic data-bursts more and more often, hoping they could transmit through the temporal interference to reach the outside galaxy.

It was on one of these random days when Fiona quietly sighed. She was walking around a beautiful garden cultivated by some of the Crocodile children, who enjoyed doing so because it made their mother, the Matriarch, as well as their father, the Patriarch, happy.

The garden was a large circular area with multiple inner rings. Her nephew, Sir Lorent, walked around in a body seemingly just as corporeal as her own. He held Shana's hand in his own.

"Aunt Fiona." Lorent said, his eyes brightening at her presence. "I trust you're doing well?"

Fiona didn't immediately reply. She sighed again.

"...Yes. I suppose so." She muttered lamely.

"It seems the situation is worsening." Lorent said softly. "What is our worst case scenario?"

"Runaway temporal acceleration. Spatial collapse." Fiona said, her tone grave. "If we're lucky, we'll only end up trapped inside an infinitely accelerating dimension that infinitely isolates us from the outside galaxy. Thousands, hundreds of thousands, even millions of years could pass for us for each day that passes outside. It's a frightening thought."

"Living space will become a problem..." Lorent said. "Especially with the way Kar and Blinker's progeny love to rear children. Oh! Aunt, I do have some good news!"

Lorent gestured down to Shana. "Sugarplum here came up with a great idea to solve our material production deficiency!"

Shana blushed. She liked her adopted uncle's nickname for her.

"Uncle Lorent can make metal with his paintings!" Shana declared. "And wood, and string, and lots of other stuff!"

She still looked like a child, but years of socializing with Lorent had done wonders for her mental development. Unless Jason reappeared and used his magic, she would be forced to stay in a spiritual child body, but at least she was immortal, like her uncle and the other Chrona denizens.

"That's a fantastic breakthrough!" Fiona said. She smiled tiredly. "I wish I'd thought of it years ago. I just have so much on my mind, these days."

"I imagine you do." Lorent said. He smiled, but the expression felt somewhat disheartened. "I've been trying new things with my painting. I think I might make a breakthrough soon. Shana's powers especially work well with mine."

"They do?" Fiona asked. She was genuinely clueless. She loved her nephew dearly, but she just didn't have time to spend with him or others, since there was always so much stuff breaking down. If she and Rebecca didn't keep on top of the technology failures, the damage would compound and Chrona would regress to the dark ages.

"Shana's power allows her to boost the magical abilities of other entities, particularly nonliving ones. Artifacts!" Lorent explained. "I've been trying to paint increasingly more complex objects in the hopes I can make an artifact like the ones Jason used to make. If my plans succeed, we could have a real breakthrough!"

"That's wonderful, Lorent!" Fiona said, feeling herself cheer up a little. "If there's anything I can do to help, just let me know."

"I'd rather you didn't overwork yourself any more than you already do." Lorent said seriously. "But yes, there's one small thing I need. Could you allow me access to Jason's storage bunker where he kept all those artifacts he was working on? Maybe I can learn more about artifacts if I study them."

Fiona's smile broke. She visibly faltered, then looked off to the side.

"I... I don't know..."

"Aunt... I know you loved the man, and you think he might still be alive... but we have to be realistic." Lorent said gently. "If he does come back, I doubt he'll be mad I touched his stuff. I'll be extra careful not to damage anything. And if he doesn't return, then...?"

"I understand." Fiona said quietly. She glanced wistfully into the distance, where a mausoleum containing Jason and Phoebe's bodies had been erected. Having retrieved them from Realspace after Gressil's revelation, Fiona had taken great care to preserve their bodies inside cryostasis pods. She couldn't bring herself to believe Jason and Phoebe were truly dead, but she knew in the darkest parts of her heart neither of them would ever return.

After a long pause, Fiona slowly nodded. "Alright. I'll... give you access. Please treat Jason's artifacts with care. I should let Timothy see them as well. It's not right that I've denied him this part of his father for so long."

"Timothy..." Lorent said, looking off at a distant house and sighing. "That boy never comes out and visits anyone. He's holed himself up in there. I worry about him."

"He's lonely. We can't blame him." Fiona said. "The only friends he has his age are crocodiles. All the rest of us are old people and thousand-year-old Psions. Sometimes I wish I'd brought more humans into Chrona permanently, but instead I shunted them all back out into Realspace following Tarus II's destruction. Phoebe's baby boy has to grow up alone because of me."

"Everyone has their problems." Lorent said. "At least he wasn't raised from birth to be Mordred's Butcher, right?"

Fiona lifelessly chuckled. She gave her nephew a wry smile. "You shouldn't joke about such things."

She chatted with Lorent and Shana for a while longer, then turned and made her way toward the distant house that she nominally lived in, but which she rarely visited. Fiona never required sleep, and her duties were constant and ever-expanding, so she rarely returned home. She spent a depressingly small amount of time with Timothy as a result.

Timothy was not Fiona's son. But she treated him like hers. Timothy had long ago learned the truth of his birth parents, and grappled with their deaths. Since Fiona was a clone of the mother he never met, he treated her as if she were his blood mother and never resented her for it.

But Fiona knew Timothy wasn't entirely okay. He lived in his room, playing video games, watching movies, and was obviously suffering from a deep loneliness-inspired bout of depression.

Sometimes Fiona worried the boy might even grow so despondent he wished to end his life. Nothing scared her more than that possibility.

Fiona walked over to her home. She quietly pushed the door open, but didn't hear any noise inside.

"Timothy? Are you asleep?" She asked out loud. She looked around the living room, but all the lights were off. Eventually, she noticed a flicker of light down the hall, originating from Timothy's room.

Unsure if he was awake or asleep, Fiona crept down the hallway noiselessly. She turned the corner and looked in his room, where she saw Timothy sitting in the easy chair in front of his television. He was leaning back heavily in the chair, and his hands were in his lap. His back was to the door, so he didn't notice his mother spying on him.

Fiona blinked. Timothy wasn't watching a movie or playing a game. Instead, he was watching a recently recorded video from Realspace. It was a video recorded by the Spynet... and it showed a familiar girl Fiona had seen several times over the years. She was Benajmin Brown's daughter, Lily Brown, and she was bathing in a tub inside her house on Sharmur. Periodically, she splashed water on her bare, ample breasts...

"TIMOTHY EDWARD HIRO!" Fiona shrieked, nearly scaring herself with the volume she suddenly projected. "Just what in the HELL do you think you're doing?!"

Timothy practically jumped out of his skin. He leaped out of his chair like a cat that had its tail stomped on. His pants had been pulled down, and when he turned to see his mother standing there, he was clearly stricken with horror as he quickly lowered his hands to cover himself up.

"M-Mom?! What are you- ahh! Knock first! No, wait, this isn't what it looks like!"

"It's EXACTLY what it looks like!" Fiona screamed, quickly whirling around, not wanting to see her son doing something so foul. Her face turned crimson. "Using the Spynet as a peep-show?! You should be ashamed of yourself! Put your goddamn pants on and get out in the living room, young man!"

She stormed out of the room, flipped the lights on in the living room, and clawed at her face and eyes. Here Fiona was, all worried about her son, but the little rat bastard was being a goddamn pervert when he thought nobody was looking!

After half a minute, Timothy awkwardly shuffled out of his room. He stared at the floor as if it were the most interesting thing in the world, then came to a stop at the other end of the living room.

"It's... it's not what it seems, mom..." He lied lamely. "I... I just..."

Fiona took a few moments to inhale and exhale deeply. Despite not technically being a corporeal being anymore, she still reflexively lived like one. She regained her center of calm, then slowly turned around to face her obviously extremely-embarrassed son.

"No lies, Timothy." Fiona said calmly. "I momentarily lost my temper, but I'm not angry anymore. I just want an explanation."

Timothy stared at the floor for an entire minute, uncertain of what to say. He bit his lip, then finally looked up at his mother.

"This... I just... I was watching her all day... because she was so beautiful... and then she went home and... I kept watching."

Fiona remained stone-faced. "Do you do this often?"

Timothy slowly shook his head. "Not often. But sometimes. I know it's wrong. But... the wrongness... feels good."

Fiona's heart became heavy.

I've been failing as a mother. I raised a voyeur and didn't even notice.

But not long after, her thoughts cleared up.

Of course he's a voyeur. Timothy doesn't have any human friends his age. He only knows how to socialize with the Crocodiles, but they probably treat him like the odd one out. He watches humans in Realspace because he longs to go there. But he can't, because he's been raised in a time-accelerated environment since infancy. If he goes out there, he'll die...

"Mom, it's not that bad." Timothy said lamely. "It's not like she knew I was watching. What's the harm?"

"Spying on someone else without their knowledge is not okay. Even if they don't know, it's still crossing a serious ethical boundary." Fiona explained.

"But mom! You spy on people all the time!" Timothy protested. "All day long, sometimes! What, it's different just because I was looking at a naked girl? Where's the consistency?"

"Don't get smart with me, young man." Fiona bit back. "I do not spy on people during their private moments, especially not for my own pleasure."

She continued to stare at him angrily, her arms crossed, until a few moments had passed. For the hundredth time that day, Fiona sighed tiredly. She might be a spiritual life form, but her mind felt slow and groggy.

"It's my fault." Fiona whispered, looking away. "I should have brought more humans here. Your only friends are crocodiles and Psions. Your only interaction with other humans involve me and the Spynet. It's not fair. I'm sorry I've done such a poor job."

Timothy's heart dropped. "Mom, come on. Don't say stuff like that. It's not your fault. It's me. I'm a weirdo and a creep. I'll stop doing this peeping stuff, okay? Just don't blame yourself..."

He slowly walked over, then reached out his arms and hugged Fiona tightly.

"I'm sorry, mom. I won't do it again. It was wrong, okay? It was wrong of me..."

Fiona hugged him back. She leaned her head against his shoulder and kissed his cheek.

"You're a good boy, Timothy. I'm sorry I can't be there for you as much as you need."

Timothy looked past his adoptive mother's face. He stared at the wall guiltily, feeling terrible about everything that had just occurred.

"I'll... I'll delete everything, okay, mom?"

"No. I will." Fiona said, pulling away. She narrowed her eyes at him. "A simple apology isn't good enough this time. I'm going to make sure it's all gone, and I'm going to close off your access to the Spynet. You've broken my trust, and it will take a lot of work to mend it back."

Timothy lowered his eyes. "Yes, mom."

She forced him to stay in the living room, then she hesitantly walked back into his room. After gritting her teeth, she pulled up a keyboard and started quickly looking through his hard drives.

"God..." She groaned under her breath. "So much footage. Wait, isn't this Samantha? His own aunt?! I guess he hasn't seen her since he was a baby, but still! And Kiari...

several succubi... are those kobold girls? Harpies? Orcs?? They're barely even humanoid!"

A weird expression crossed over Fiona's face.

"...At least he's not racist. A minor comfort."

Timothy's wretched spank-bank turned out to be way bigger than she expected. After Fiona deleted it all, she put on several layers of password protection to ensure he couldn't access the Spynet again. Then she paused.

"I mean, he's a growing boy. Should I really delete everything? Is it bad if I do that? I wish Jason were here. He'd know more about this than me... it feels wrong to leave him with nothing, I mean, he has needs right? Right?? It isn't as if he can meet them the normal way."

Fiona wanted to pull the skin off her face. She was so grossed out and disturbed, but at the same time she wasn't a man, so she wasn't sure what was normal versus abnormal. She only knew from her own perspective what felt like a violation.

"At least he isn't creeping on any of the crocodile girls up here." Fiona mumbled. "Or would that be better? Is it good if he likes crocodile girls? Is he respecting their boundaries? Or maybe he's grossed out by them? Should I ask? No way! I'd rather die than talk about something so sickening!"

Fiona finished her work. She walked back out into the living room and stared at her son evenly. He met her gaze.

"Timothy. Do you want to travel to Realspace?"

Timothy started to nod, but then looked away and shrugged.

"I don't know. I'm used to things in Chrona. Outside seems... scary. The whole Plague thing freaks me out, and I'm not good at talking to people either, so everyone would probably just laugh at me. Or they'd compare me to my dad. That's what everyone here does."

"What! People don't do that!" Fiona protested. "I think you're in your head too much, Timothy."

"Yeah they do." Timothy said sullenly. "My dad was a legendary Hero, but I'm nothing special at all. I'm just a normal guy. No powers. Nothing special about me. Everyone's disappointed."

"You're not even eighteen yet." Fiona pointed out. "Most Trueborn Heroes don't develop their abilities until they turn eighteen. Only a few outliers like Joan of Arc exist, and they're the exception that proves the rule."

Fiona threw her hands up helplessly. "Besides, even if you never develop any powers, so what? Neither me nor your mother had any powers, and we helped humanity out a lot. I mean, we did get a little help by interacting with Solomon's Crown, but that merely boosted our intelligence a bit. If you study hard and live out your life here, you can become incredibly smart even without powers!"

Timothy looked at his mom with dismal eyes. "I'm not immortal like you, or Kar, or any of the others. I only have a hundred short years to live, and likely less. Not even a year in the outside world. The Immortality Station dad made on Tarus II is gone. With so short a time, how can I possibly make a difference? You just don't get it. I'm useless."

Timothy pulled his feet up into the chair and wrapped his arms around his knees. He always did that when he was feeling depressed. It was his way of retreating into himself.

Fiona lightly licked her lips. She wanted to protest, to tell him he wasn't useless, but her words were not an argument based on factual data. They were purely an appeal to emotion. She could tell him he had the potential for greatness, but those words would fall flat if she didn't have a way to back them up.

"I... well, I actually came here to tell you that I gave permission to your uncle to go inside your father's warehouse." Fiona said, slightly changing the subject. "Lorent wants to start learning about artifacts. I thought you'd want to hang out with him and aunt Shana, maybe see the gizmos and gadgets your father made. Who knows? Maybe there's something really useful in there. Rebecca will be there to help you out as well. She was quite familiar with Jason's creations back in the day."

Timothy continued to stare ahead glumly. He didn't look particularly inspired. Eventually, he did nod.

"Yeah. Sounds good, mom. I guess I'll take a look later."

Timothy..." Fiona said quietly, but she didn't know what else to say.

It was clear Timothy was still feeling deeply ashamed about what happened earlier. He had a difficult time meeting her eyes. That awkwardness in turn made Fiona uncomfortable. She was effectively a single mother with no father around for Timothy to learn from. There was Lorent, but he was usually doing things with Shana. Kar existed, but he had hundreds of his own kids to worry about. There were male Psions around, but they were so utterly alien that they had no conception of human developmental needs. All the other humans and human-like figures in Chrona were women.

Fiona decided she would just have to talk to Lorent about her son later.

"I'm... I'm going to go." Fiona said. "Did you want anything? Maybe I can cook you some food before I leave?"

"No need. I'm fine." Timothy mumbled.

"Right." Fiona said.

She hesitated, then walked over and kissed the top of his head. She wrung her fingers together in consternation as she looked down at him, but he continued to stare off into the distance.

"I love you, Timothy." Fiona said quietly.

He hesitated before nodding and saying, "Love you too, mom."

Fiona sighed for the millionth time that day. She turned and walked out of the living room, then the house, leaving Timothy behind.

After his mom left, Timothy continued to stare at the wall for a long time.

"Stupid." He muttered. "Getting caught like that. I'm a disappointment, like I've always been. I should just crawl in a hole and die."

Timothy rubbed his wrist. He rocked back and forth in his chair, then sighed.

The situation was worse than Fiona knew. Every day was like torture for him. Timothy felt the gazes of others on his back. He felt their eyes on him, subtly laughing, mocking him for being a pathetic loser.

And now even his mother was disgusted by him. He had never felt so low and unlovable in all his life.

"My dad wouldn't have been so pathetic." Timothy muttered. "He'd be embarrassed to have a loser like me for a son."

Timothy had never known Jason, but he had rewatched several of Jason's most stunning moments, particularly his battle against Hope, thanks to the Spynet. Seeing his father heroically defeat his clone and win an overwhelming victory, only to be backstabbed by Creator Demila was a thrilling but tragic set of happenings that always left Timothy's eyes wet with tears.

Seeing his father die was agonizing. Jason may have revived, but the man who came back was incapable of withstanding the evil machinations of Emperor Gressil. Timothy wanted nothing more than to rip Gressil apart with his bare hands, but without any powers, it was about as likely to happen as any other ordinary human defeating an Emperor.

After sulking for a while in his depression, Timothy eventually got up and shuffled back to his room. He was surprised to see that his mother hadn't grounded him and taken away all his entertainment, but he knew she always felt extremely guilty about not being able to spend much time with him. That was why his betrayal of her trust hurt him as much as it did her.

He sat in his chair and turned on a random movie. It was a romantic comedy filmed during the 1900s era of ancient Earth. Something about a man falling in love with a woman through postcards. He wasn't really paying attention.

"Man. What am I going to do with my life?" Timothy wondered to himself. "I should call Ferral over. He's always easy to talk to. Maybe he can help me out."

Timothy decided that when he felt better in a few hours, he'd do just that.

Part 678: The King Network

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

[Brother Timothy. It is most unusual for you to ask me to spend Relations Building Time with you during the third cycle of a week. Usually you prefer to do so on the first or seventh cycle.]

Learner Ferral, formerly Initiator Ferral, was one of the few dozen Psions who had been pulled to Chrona by Jason Hiro years and years earlier. He had reached the 2nd Level at a speed somewhat slower than his peers, and was not considered an especially speedy developing Psion. He was rather lazy, and he preferred to spend his time admiring artwork, looking upon the Milky Way's wonders through the Spynet, or spending time with Timothy... gaming.

Timothy had pulled up an ancient Earth Xbox with an extra controller for Ferral. The two of them often played classic games like Halo 1 and 2 together, with Ferral especially enjoying all the fun and beautiful scenery in the game, as well as its action-packed setpieces and general combat flow. He might not be much of a dedicated fighter among his fellow Psions, but fake virtual game points always roused his interest.

"I just wanted to hang out." Timothy said, his voice somewhat glum. "My... my mom caught me doing something... something I'm ashamed about. I didn't know who else to talk to."

Ferral sat beside Timothy on the couch.

[I contemplate and I comprehend.] Ferral said. [How shameful was the action you were performing? You do not need to say if you do not wish to.]

Timothy grimaced. He looked at the TV, which was currently on the title screen of a Mario Kart Double Dash.

"I was... I had downloaded lots of different videos from the Spynet... I was peeping on girls and mom found out. She was pissed."

Ferral looked at him with a completely blank face. [Peeping. This word. I do not comprehend.]

"Well, I was looking at them when they were naked, or doing other private things..." Timothy explained.

[I still do not understand.] Ferral said, his alien mind uncomprehending of the nuances of human behavior. [How does this correlate with shame?]

"Because I was... pleasuring myself to them!" Timothy finally spat. His face turned deep red. If he had said this to another guy his age, he'd probably already have crawled in a hole and died, but Ferral was so oblivious that he still didn't fully understand.

[Ah, you must be referring to self-sexual satisfaction.] Ferral said, remembering a biological textbook his teacher had made him read regarding human sexuality. [According to my understanding, reproduction and the act of copulation are considered extremely pleasurable to most Terrans. Self gratification is also a behavior considered within normal parameters. I still do not understand what is shameful about your actions.]

Timothy's face turned a shade of gray. "...Never mind. You wouldn't understand. Point is, my mom caught me, and now I feel like shit. I'm so embarrassed I could jump off a cliff."

[I highly advise against doing so.] Ferral stated. [You are not a Psion. Without the ability to fly, extreme bodily injury or even death could result from such an action.]

Timothy looked at Ferral with the strangest expression he'd ever made in his life.

"Uh. Yeah. Good point, Ferral. I hadn't thought if it that way. Look, let's just play some games, alright?"

[I very much enjoy playing Video Games.] Ferral said, his eyes lighting up with interest. [We are going to play the racing game with the colorful humans and animals riding karts, then?]

"Yeah. Mario Kart." Timothy said.

An hour passed. Two hours. Three...

He slowly forgot about his worries as he had fun playing games with Ferral, swapping out one title after another as time passed. Ferral didn't enjoy sticking to one game much and preferred to jump around. It seemed he derived a lot of dopamine from playing new things.

"This is a single-player game called Elder Scrolls Oblivion." Timothy explained. "It's a sequel to Morrowind. You remember that game, right? It's singleplayer though so we'll have to pass the controller back and forth."

[Most excellent!] Ferral exclaimed. [I very much enjoy these open world exploration games. There is much enjoyability to be found in exploring new locales and animals and people. If the galaxy wasn't overrun by the Plague, I would love to travel around someday, visiting all the worlds I cannot enjoy now.]

"Well, mom says the Dolgrimites are capable of beating back the Plague." Timothy said slowly. "Who knows? Maybe you'll be able to go sightseeing someday. Unfortunately, we're not going to see it unless we solve the time dilation dilemma."

[A high level Temporal Psion might be able to decelerate Chrona's time flow.] Ferral said. [Or perhaps Queen Blinker can use her fairy magic? I suppose your mother might also be able to develop a technological solution along with Rebecca's help.]

"Yeah. Maybe." Timothy muttered.

He didn't add anything else.

Before long, he and Ferral were playing through the early stages of Oblivion. They escaped the dungeon and entered the wider world of Tamriel, and as always, Ferral was most engaged with the early exploration parts of the game.

[I find leveling up and allotting my stats to be cerebrally pleasurable.] Ferral said. [It is fun to watch my character grow in power. I wish real life was like that. Then meditating and increasing my Psionic Power would not be so dreadfully boring.]

Timothy nodded. "That's for sure. Still, there's something to be said for hard work and gradual payoffs over time. When you look at yourself from a year ago and the you of now, don't you enjoy feeling that you have progressed?"

Ferral shrugged. A decidedly human movement.

[I suppose you could state the facts in such a manner. But on the cycle-by-cycle perception of time, I am unable to detect any real progress. Having a screen tell me that my intellect increased or my strength improved would be monumentally more engaging.]

Timothy couldn't argue with that. "Did you know that back on Earth, they had games that were called 'Massively Multiplayer Online RPGs'? Thousands, even millions of people would play on the same server all at once. Leveling up together, adventuring together, killing monsters and completing quests together..."

[Why don't we develop one ourselves?] Ferral suddenly asked, looking at Timothy with deep intent. [It doesn't have to be perfect. We could code a game together, draw the artwork, and make something for all the people of Chrona to enjoy.]

"I don't know..." Timothy mumbled. "The crocodiles aren't into my dad's games. I've tried inviting a few of them over to play with me. One of them broke a controller when he lost a life. Your fellow Psions don't seem interested, either. Doesn't seem we'd have much of an audience."

[Technically, there already does exist such a game.] Ferral pointed out. [The Queen Network, developed by Blinker and the Black Queen, Amelia Greyjoy. It allows players to connect their digital consciousnesses into it to develop their fighting skills. Have you ever entered it before?]

Timothy shook his head. "First time I'm hearing about it."

[We still have a transmitter that can connect to the network.] Ferral said. [Unfortunately, due to the time dilation, the network has destabilized over time and lost quantum cohesion. We'd need to repair it before we could reconnect. The interesting thing about the Queen Network is, it allows people from Realspace to connect with people inside Chrona by temporarily accelerating their cerebral state to Chrona's speed! Thus, they can engage with us for short micro-burst durations without experiencing mental harm.]

Timothy's eyes sparkled. "So we could talk to people in Realspace with the Queen Network if we fixed it?"

[Yes, but the only people capable of repairing it are your mother, Rebecca, and Blinker. The first two are always busy. Blinker does not seem to have much interest.]

Timothy snorted. "Why don't I take a look? Maybe I can fix it. Can you show me the way?"

Ferral paused. [Yes... but... the transmitter is currently stored inside your father's warehouse. Your mother has designated that area a restricted zone.]

"She just told me I could go in there, when we spoke earlier." Timothy said. "Let's go take a look. Worst case scenario, we'll just come back here and waste our lives away playing video games again."

[You always have such a way with words.] Ferral sarcastically praised.

Not long afterward, Timothy and Ferral made their way over to Jason's old warehouse. It was located next to his mausoleum, and Timothy stopped outside to look up at the statue of Jason and Phoebe, hugging each other closely as they stood together, looking into each other's eyes. This particular statue had been chiseled ten years earlier by a pair of talented crocodile artisans.

Timothy always stopped to look up at his father, larger than life, towering a hundred feet in the air.

He never felt he could measure up to the legendary Wordsmith.

With a soft sigh, Timothy walked over to the warehouse. There was a palm scanner next to the door, and he placed his hand on it. The door unlocked, and Timothy widened his eyes. "Mom really did unlock it for me..."

He and Ferral waited for the rusty door to slide open. In truth, the warehouse wasn't fortified, so if one of the Psions had wanted to break in, they could have done so with ease. Out of respect for the Wordsmith, they did not.

Once the large door slid to the side, Timothy noticed that the lights were already on inside. He entered the warehouse, where he found shelves upon shelves of seemingly random objects, weapons, armor, all laying on shelves, neatly organized with labels denoting their contents.

"Timothy? Is that you?"

A voice called out from inside. Timothy found his uncle Lorent inside, admiring a short dagger, while Shana was standing beside him, hefting a comically large sledgehammer. Surprisingly, she was holding it with great ease. She made it look like a foam toy.

"Uncle Lorent." Timothy said, rubbing the back of his head. "Ahh, mom said I could come here. Me and Ferral were bored, so I thought..."

"No need to explain." Lorent said with a smile. "Your old man and I weren't especially close, but I thought he was a stand up guy. You're almost eighteen, so it's about time you took a look through his stuff. Who knows? Maybe you'll find something useful in here."

Timothy nodded. He smiled at the little girl beside Lorent. "Hey, Aunt Shana."

"Hi Timothy." Shana said. "I found a big hammer."

"You sure did..." Timothy said, eyeing the sledgehammer that was much bigger than his spiritual aunt. "Say, do either of you know where the Queen Network connection device is located?"

Lorent scratched his chin. He hemmed and hawed for a moment, looking around at the various shelves.

"I'm... not sure. This is my first time coming in here since your dad... well, and since then, Rebecca came through and sorted everything. I don't know how she sorted all his stuff. Best you just take a look around."

Ferral's eyes lit up. [I shall assist in this game of scavenger hunt!]

The young Psion eagerly zipped over to the closest shelf. He started pulling boxes and crates down, rummaging through them while psionically humming the theme song of some video game that had gotten stuck in his head. Another decidedly human trait he had picked up over the years.

Timothy, meanwhile, mimicked Ferral. He walked over to a shelf off to the left, where he finally got a closer look at the labels of various items.

STORAGE RINGS (INCOMPLETE PROTOTYPES)

RUNECARVING - MISC

ELEMENTAL PHIALS - INCOMPLETE?

THUNDER GAUNTLETS (v1-v4)

MAGIC BOOTS?? (NOT SURE WHAT THESE DO)

PHANTOM FLASKS (PURE POISON? DO NOT DRINK)

LOVE POTIONS (ONLY WORK ON RATS)

UNBREAKABLE SILVERWARE (WORDSMITHIUM TYPE 3)

The stuff on display made Timothy's head spin. He grabbed the magic boots and put them on, but nothing seemed to happen. If they were magical, he had no idea what function they had.

He swirled the magical phials around, frowning at the gross-looking liquid inside. What was his father thinking when he made these? What did they even do?

Timothy grabbed the Thunder Gauntlets. He finally saw potential, because they were clearly highly advanced pieces of technology fused with magic. These must have been made by his father near the end of his life, because they were much more sophisticated than the other comparatively sloppy works Timothy had observed so far, and there were multiple prototypes. Clearly, Jason had a coherent idea in mind when he made them.

"Lorent, do you know what these Thunder Gauntlets are?" Timothy asked.

Lorent nearly jumped out of his skin. He quickly ran over, grabbed the box, and hurriedly put it on the shelf. "Careful, kid! Those are not toys. They're weapons of war! If you put one of those on and punch at someone, it'll release a devastating sound-blast that can rupture eardrums and internal organs! It's literally like getting hit by a thunderclap, hence the name. Watch yourself."

Timothy nodded. "Sounds impressive."

"Yeah, I saw your dad test them out a couple of times." Lorent said, rubbing his forehead in relief that Timothy hadn't accidentally killed himself. "Just be careful when you poke around this stuff. Your dad was trying to create weapons to help him win an intergalactic war. Lord only knows what crazy nonsense he whipped up."

[I have located the Queen Network Transmitter.] Ferral suddenly said. [Correction: Miss Shana has located it. I am merely stating that it has been located. I did not intend to misrepresent the truth with a falsified statement. I apologize for my reprehensible behavior.]

Timothy and Lorent walked over to Shana and Ferral. They found Shana staring intently at a large silver helmet held in her tiny hands. She turned it around, looking at it from all different angles. It resembled an ancient Roman Centurion helmet, with a curved chin protector that wrapped around the lower face. Only the direct center of the face wasn't covered by it, and even then, there were green goggles that flipped down over the eyes.

"It's a neural connector." Shana said, holding the helmet up to Timothy. "I can't fix it. Sorry."

Timothy smiled at his aunt. She looked like a child, but mentally she felt like she was about his own age, maybe a few years older.

"Thanks, auntie. I'll see if there's anything I can do."

Timothy reached out. As he took the helmet from Shana's hands, a spike of energy flowed through her body, into the helmet, and into Timothy's hands.

Neither one noticed what had just happened, nor did Ferral or Lorent.

"Let's see..." Timothy said, as he walked over to a workbench and set the helmet down. "The circuitry isn't degraded. What's this piece do here? Oh, I wonder if my dad has any files on the helmet's schematics..."

He booted up the computer inside the museum, which unfortunately took a few minutes. It hadn't been turned on in two decades, and it felt somewhat sluggish.

Timothy spent thirty minutes browsing different files. Eventually, he found exactly what he was looking for; a schematics page detailing how the helmet functioned and how it was constructed.

Ferral hovered over Timothy's shoulder, but Shana and Lorent lingered a little further away.

"Hey kid, me and Shana are gonna go do some painting." Lorent said. "We'll be back in a few hours. Hope you can get that thing working!"

"Yeah, me too." Timothy said absentmindedly. "Bye Lorent, goodbye Shana."

His spiritual aunt and uncle left the warehouse, but Timothy and Ferral stayed behind, poring over the schematics.

Hours passed.

At some point, Timothy had pulled out lots of tools his father had left in boxes on the main desk. They were intended for creating new artifacts and repairing existing ones. With the helmet's schematics available to him, Timothy was able to pull it apart, locate a few internal components that were temporally out of sync, then adjust them to the required sensitivity.

Before long, he had put the helmet back together. He looked at Ferral with eager eyes.

"It's done! Now, we just have to test it."

Ferral nodded, but his expression turned serious. [This object is potentially dangerous. It would not be good if something happened and it destroyed your brain. I should test it first to ensure it will not cause you harm.]

Timothy frowned. "But then if something does go wrong, you'll be the one injured... or worse."

[My existence is of no concern.] Ferral said emotionlessly. [I am an ordinary Psion with below-average prospects. You are the child of humanity's last Trueborn. Your existence is more consequential than mine.]

Timothy's eyes wavered. He looked at Ferral, feeling both deeply touched, and more than a little hurt. He never asked to be the son of a Hero, and Timothy felt that Ferral innately had more potential than he did. But he didn't know how to verbalize those thoughts, so he simply stayed quiet.

"...Alright. You can test it first, then. Just be careful."

He handed the helmet to Ferral, who casually placed it on his head, sat in a chair, and closed his eyes.

A minute passed. Ferral's eyes twitched a few times. Then he opened them.

[I was unable to activate the device. Perhaps it is incompatible with my Psion cerebral biology.]

"That shouldn't be the case. The device is designed to work with all sentient and most non-sentient minds." Timothy said. "Here, let me try."

Ferral stood up, then pulled the helmet off and handed it to Timothy. The young man sat in the chair this time, put the helmet on, then tapped the side of it with his finger.

At once, his vision turned black. Timothy sagged back in the chair, and his consciousness was taken... somewhere else.

Timothy awoke inside a black void. He found himself standing on a strange island floating in the darkness. It seemed like he was in outer space, but there were no stars present.

The island was little more than a flat stone platform. It extended a hundred feet in any direction, then its edge dropped off into the black abyss.

Timothy looked around and inhaled deeply. The game's simulation was incredible! It was way beyond what he was expecting. He could smell the musty air around him, hear a faint droning sound of some sort that he couldn't properly identify...

At that moment, a large floating textbox appeared in front of Timothy's body. Its words made him scrunch his face together.

[WELCOME TO THE KING NETWORK.]

[YOU HAVE ACTIVATED PLAYER PRIVILEGES.]

[WOULD YOU LIKE TO ENABLE THE TUTORIAL COMPANION?]

[YES | NO]

Timothy blinked. Then he blinked again and rubbed his eyes.

"Weird. I thought this was called the Queen Network. I don't know what I was expecting, but it wasn't... this."

He hesitated. Something felt a little off about the situation. Without another word, he looked to his right, where a pop-up HUD of options were hovering just at the edge of his vision.

Without hesitation, Timothy selected the 'log out' option. The void vanished. His vision darkened, then it brightened.

He opened his eyes to see Ferral standing next to him, looking down from above.

[Did the device function for you?] Ferral asked.

Timothy nodded. He sat up and pulled off the helmet, still looking at Ferral.

"Yeah. It was weird though, I arrived in this weird void area, and the game said I had entered the King Network. But you said it was called the Queen Network, right? So why is would it use that name?"

[I do not know.] Ferral answered honestly. [The schematics also stated it was called the Queen Network. Perhaps your father was developing a variant system, and this device connects to it?]

"Yeah." Timothy said, lowering his eyes. "That might be... HUH?"

Timothy blinked yet again.

The same tutorial textbox was floating in front of him.

[WELCOME TO THE KING NETWORK.]

[WOULD YOU LIKE TO ENABLE THE TUTORIAL COMPANION?]

[YES | NO]

Only, this time, he was back in the real world. Not the game world.

"What… what the hell…?" Timothy whispered.

Part 679: My Dad Was a Hero and My Mom Was A Great Inventor But Then They Died And Left Me Alone And I Thought I Was Normal But Then I Obtained the Legendary Gaming Power So Now I Can Level Up And Save The Universe From The Demons And Aliens And Plaguehosts Or Eventually Die Trying!!

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

[WELCOME TO THE KING NETWORK.]

[WOULD YOU LIKE TO ENABLE THE TUTORIAL COMPANION?]

[YES | NO]

Timothy stared in shock at the words floating just a few feet in front of his waist, aimed up at his face. He hadn't seen them because he was looking up at Ferral after he took off the helmet, but they were unmissable now.

[Is something the matter?] Ferral asked. [You appear to be in mild distress.]

"That's putting it lightly!" Timothy exclaimed. He pointed in front of himself. "Do you see it?"

Ferral followed Timothy's finger. He blinked.

[I am afraid that unless you speak in more specific terms, I will disappoint you.]

"There's a floating textbox." Timothy said, before reading it out to him. "It looks exactly like what I saw inside the King Network."

Ferral's many eyes gazed at Timothy with little emotion. [I contemplate, and I comprehend. You are hallucinating.]

"No way, this can't be a hallucination. I see it clear as day." Timothy said, before looking more intently at the screen. "It wants to know if I am going to enable the tutorial companion."

Ferral seemed unperturbed. [Well, if this phenomena is real, you might as well say yes. If not, then you will simply hallucinate some more. It is not a problem a little medication cannot solve.]

Timothy decided Ferral was right. Wordlessly, he reached out his hand and touched the screen. Yes, his hand came into physical contact with what felt like a glass panel. He was shocked out of his wits that he didn't wave his hand right through it!

The moment he touched the 'YES' option, the window disappeared.

A blob of light materialized in the air just to the right of Timothy's face. He visibly flinched when it appeared.

"What the-?!"

"Greetings, inferior biological Player." The orb of light said in a robotic female voice. "My designation is Umi. I am the tutorial companion for the King Network. You may ask me any question regarding the King Network. Please do not ask annoying questions. I do not enjoy answering annoying questions."

Timothy rubbed his eyes. He looked at the orb of light more intently than ever, but it simply looked like a bright glowing marble floating in the air.

"Come ON Ferral, you can see THAT, right??"

Ferral simply stared at Timothy with slight concern. [I am unable to perceive anything out of the ordinary. What are you hallucinating now?]

"It's a floating orb of Light. Err, she's a floating orb of light. Calls herself Umi. She says she can answer any questions I have regarding the King Network."

[I comprehend.] Ferral said succinctly. [If you are truly not hallucinating, then why not ask this 'Umi' questions? Don't mind me. I will simply evaluate your mental state from the side.]

Timothy nodded. He turned his attention to the floating orb of light.

"Uh... Umi? What... what are you, exactly? What is the King Network? What's even going on?"

Umi's orb slightly pulsed with light. "You have asked three questions. I will provide three answers. I am Umi, the Unified Management Interface. The King Network was developed by the Creator. Its purpose is to create Kings. As for 'what is going on', you have awakened your Heroic Power. You are the first Player in the King Network."

Timothy nodded. He relayed what Umi said to Ferral, then proceeded with his next set of questions.

"Why can't my friend Ferral see you?"

"Ferral is not a Player. Only Players can interact with the King Network's elements."

"Can Ferral become a player?"

"Affirmative. Any Sentient can become a Player. As the First Player, you are the Administrator and solely possess the ability to add additional Players to the King Network. However, caution is advised. The King Network is extremely powerful, and easily abused. You must only add Players who are trustworthy. Once added, a Sentient can no longer have their Player access removed unless their body and soul permanently expires."

Timothy slowly nodded. He gave Ferral a long look before carefully telling him everything Umi had said.

[Most interesting. Your Heroic ability is extremely unique.] Ferral said. [I have never heard of such an ability in all my years alive. Are you going to give me Player access?]

Timothy hesitated. Ferral was his best friend, but once given, the access could not be revoked.

"I... I want to... but I think I need to speak to my mom first. She knows more about this stuff. How about we do it later, once I've gotten a better grasp on the rules?"

Ferral didn't take offense. [Of course. It is your ability. You deserve to take some time to learn how it works. I apologize for being presumptuous. I did not mean to force you into an immediate decision.]

Timothy suddenly felt extremely guilty. Here he was, feeling greedy over hoarding this new power for himself. Why would he deny his best friend, who had been there emotionally for him since his childhood, the opportunity to also be a Player?

But still, pragmatism won out. He decided not to rush into it, praying he hadn't hurt Ferral's feelings. The Psion might often seem emotionless, but Timothy knew he secretly had a deep yearning for fun, adventure, and exploration. He was not as alien and lifeless as the other Psions, and frequently had emotional outbursts that were quite intense. He simply struggled with acting like a 'proper Psion' much of the time.

Timothy swallowed, then turn to Umi.

"What can I do with the King Network?"

"Your query is too broad. Please narrow down the question to a more specific topic." Umi replied.

Timothy scratched his chin. "Um, the King Network... it's like a real life video game, right?"

"Affirmative. That is a simple and primitive way a low-intellect biological like yourself might refer to it." Umi replied. "A more proper term would be 'Game-like Mechanics Made Manifest through Realistic Virtualization.'"

Timothy stared at her blankly. "That's... basically the same thing I just said."

"Incorrect." Umi replied.

She did not elaborate any further.

Timothy decided to pause talking to her for a moment. He looked around, then spotted a menu off to the side, with several selectable choices.

Timothy stared at all the options for a good thirty seconds. After a moment, he hesitantly tapped the Character option. A page on himself materialized in the air, complete with a picture of his face smiling in the top left corner. He looked way more handsome in reality, so clearly the system was taking artistic liberties.

Timothy stared at the numbers and words for a good long time. After a while, he fixated on one thing in particular.

"What the actual fuck is Eye of Yredelemnul? That sounds ominous as shit."

Umi beeped. "To access information on any given skill, you may tap its name or icon on your character sheet, or you may think of activating it with your mind."

Timothy nodded. That made sense. He reached out and touched the skill's name. Its description popped up in his mind.

Eye of Yredelemnul: [MP Cost 0] [AP Cost 0] [Cooldown 0]

The stolen power of a dark god courses through the Player. The Player can examine objects and entities with the Eye of Yredelemnul to learn more information about them. As the Player strengthens, the information available to them will improve drastically.

The explanation only served to make Timothy's heart skip a beat. Why would he want to use the stolen power of some dark god? It sounded horrifying!

But he was... curious.

He turned to look at Ferral, then silently activated the ability with his mind.

Eye of Yredelemnul: Activate.

Immediately, a statsheet for Ferral appeared.

Learner Ferral - Psion/Chrona/Volgrim

Low Mortal

Stats: ???

It told him almost nothing. He only learned Ferral's name and little more than that.

"Umi, why can't I see any of Ferral's stats and other details?" Timothy asked out loud. Ferral looked at him with interest.

"The Sentient known as 'Ferral' is not a Player. You can only see detailed information on other living and non-living entities once your Player Level has risen, or if those entities become Players."

"So if I make Ferral a Player, I'll be able to see his stats?" Timothy asked.

"Affirmative, and Ferral will be able to see yours. Note that you are currently the exclusive user of the Eye of Yredelemnul skill. But if other Sentients become Players, they may be able to obtain the skill through their own efforts."

Timothy's heart skipped a beat. This was good information to know! It meant that if he casually invited people to use the King Network, they would potentially be able to obtain the skills he possessed, thus further ruining his uniqueness.

"Are all skills possible to obtain through the King Network?"

"Negative. Some skills are classified as Unique. Unique skills can only be obtained by one Player at a time. Thus, if you invite other Sentients to become Players and they obtain those Unique skills, you will never be able to acquire them unless those Players permanently die and their Unique skills become obtainable once again. Unique skills are rare and extremely difficult to obtain. Amassing a collection of them is pivotal to becoming the most powerful Player in the King Network."

Timothy scratched his head. He had barely even acquired this power, and already it was starting to feel like a burden. But he was still ecstatic. He finally had a power, just like his father, and it seemed like it had tons of unique utility as well!

He tapped the Inventory tab. It opened up a blank box in midair that was filled with tons of smaller boxes. At present, the Inventory was completely empty.

"How does the Inventory work, Umi?"

"Your Inventory is composed of Slots. Objects and items you wish to place inside the Inventory will require a larger or greater number of slots based on the object's size. Leveling up, selecting certain skills, and acquiring bonus rewards can all increase the room inside your inventory."

"Oh... so it's a slot based system, like Diablo or Deus Ex..." Timothy muttered to himself. The Inventory showed there were ten slots available horizontally and five vertically. He glanced around the room and randomly walked over to pick up a crowbar. He stuffed it into the inventory by directly placing it inside, and 3 of the 50 slots became full.

"It's not exactly a lot, but the item becomes completely weightless. Umi, can I put living things in my Inventory?"

"Affirmative. However, as there is a vacuum inside the Inventory, any living object placed inside will rapidly lose consciousness and asphyxiate, unless they are immortal and do not require air. Living entities become frozen and unable to move, but can still perceive the world around them. This is considered a form of psychological torture and is generally not recommended. Additionally, living entities are subject to the same size restrictions as other items, thus large entities are unlikely to fit inside the Inventory."

Timothy nodded seriously. "Right. I just won't bother then."

He decided to experiment with his abilities a little. Timothy walked over to various shelves and picked up random artifacts and items his dad had made. Suddenly, a thought came to his mind. He picked up one of the random vials of brown liquid.

Eye of Yredelemnul: Activate.

Information appeared in his mind.

Consumable: Murky Brown Liquid.

Effect: Unknown

Uses: 1/1

The information given to him was... unhelpful.

"Why is this eye so useless?" Timothy complained.

"The Eye of Yredelemnul is an extremely powerful ability that can only utilize its full power when a Player is of sufficient level to properly wield it.

Your level is insufficient, so the information it can reveal is generally meaningless." Umi replied.

"Right..." Timothy grunted. He picked up a few other items, but their descriptions were not very useful either. He ended up shoving them into his Inventory to see how much stuff he could fit inside. Generally, he was quite pleased with what he found.

It turned out the weight of items was much less important than the size. An extremely dense tungsten bar took up less space than a long and skinny plastic bat. This meant he could store more items if he picked small and dense ones. Maybe if he found a way to shrink larger items down or fold them into smaller shapes...

Timothy glanced at the plastic bat. He pulled it out of the inventory and handed it to Ferral, who had quietly watched Timothy going about testing his powers from the side.

"Hey, Ferral. Could you use your telekinesis to fold this bat in half for me? Try not to break it."

Ferral nodded. With little effort, he bent the bat in half and turned it into a tightly squished U-shaped version of itself. When Timothy tried to put it in his inventory, he was shocked to see that it hadn't gone from 3 squares of storage required to 2, but instead to just 1!

"Whoa! So making stuff smaller would actually do a lot! Good to know." Timothy muttered.

Ferral continued to watch. By now, he had stopped doubting his eyes. The fact Timothy was able to place items into and retrieve them from some sort of imperceptible storage dimension indicated he wasn't hallucinating. He really had acquired a Heroic power!

After learning the basic limits of his inventory, Timothy pulled everything back out and placed the items in their original locations. He flicked through the Menu again and selected the Quests tab.

Starter Quest: [Complete Tutorial]

Continue speaking to Umi until all questions have been resolved. You may end the Tutorial at any time and gain access to locked abilities and other tabs whenever you please. You may also re-enable the Tutorial as desired in case additional assistance is required.

Timothy made a strange expression. He didn't realize he could simply end the tutorial and start wielding his full powers at will. But he still felt he had a lot of questions, and there was no need to rush into things.

He returned to the Character Menu and looked at his information carefully.

With a single thought, he called up the information for his second Active Skill.

Player's Fixation: [Unique] [MP Cost 0] [AP Cost 0] [Cooldown 24 Hours]

The Player can focus their mind for an extended period of time, increasing learning rate and speed for a specific task by up to 500%, depending on the Player's emotional investment and mental interest in the task. High investment and interest will result in a higher payoff. Lower values will thus lead to a lower return. The player will be locked in this state for up to twelve hours or until the task is finished, whichever is the lesser time value. The Player will need to fully sleep back to maximum mental focus and then wait 24 hours before this skill can be activated again.

Timothy's eyes widened. "Oh shit, that's actually super useful. Whoa!"

Then he looked up the other skills.

Player's Body: [Passive] [Global]

The Player's body no longer follows the rule of ordinary living entities. Damage inflicted will be spread across the entire body, reducing the Player's HP accordingly. Attacks landing on weak points of the Player's body, such as the head or groin, will inflict bonus damage. The player will still feel localized pain in any areas struck. When below certain HP thresholds, the Player will suffer from additional ailments, such as [Lightly Wounded], [Injured], [Maimed], and [Broken]. The Player can recover one injury state by sleeping for at least eight hours, but extreme injuries will require multiple Well Rested buffs to counteract.

Player's Mind (Toggle): [Passive] [Global] [Cooldown 24 Hours]

The Player is able to toggle between various mental states at will, which will enter cooldown after swapping mental states. Mental states offer different positive and negative effects that will vary depending on which states the Player has acquired. More states can be acquired from various sources, including leveling up and quest rewards.

Current mental states available:

Mind of Simplicity: [CURRENTLY SELECTED] 20% resistance to negative mental ailments, such as Fear and Anxiety. No personality changes.

Mind of Focus: Thinking speed decreased by 50%. Mental focus increased 200%. CHA reduced by 50%. INT and WIS increased by 50%. Personality altered to RESEARCHER.

Mind of Void: Immunity to telepathic intrusion. Telepathic attacks reflected back at attacker at 100% damage. Distracting thoughts can be silenced for thirty minute intervals at the cost of 1 MP/Min. Personality altered to PSIOPHOBIC.

The more Timothy looked at these skills, the more amazed he became. He had somehow broken the laws of reality and become a living video game player!

Without hesitation, he grabbed a random cutting tool off the table. Ferral's body jerked in alarm when he saw Timothy slap his left hand on the workbench, then take the cutting tool with his right hand and carefully pull it across his arm.

"OUCH! Shit, that hurts!" Timothy yelped, quickly stopping what he was doing. He gazed at the wound with bright eyes and saw that he hadn't bled at all. His arm hurt like a motherfucker though. It genuinely felt like someone had cut him.

A glance at his HP revealed that he had gone from 100 HP to 96.

[Timothy? Have you gone mad? Why did you attack yourself?] Ferral asked with deep concern. It did not escape his notice that despite Timothy's scream of pain, the young man had not seriously injured himself. He wasn't even bleeding!

Timothy held his arm, wincing at the very real pain he was experiencing. Unfortunately, it seemed his health was not regenerating, or if it was, it was at an extremely slow speed he couldn't perceive. At least he could probably heal the damage when he went to sleep later.

"My god, Ferral. This power is insane!" Timothy said, half grinning and half scared of what he had become. In one instant, he had transformed from an ordinary human into a Hero. That meant he couldn't just sit around, goofing off all day. He had work to do!

[Can you tell me about what you've learned?] Ferral asked. [I will not pry if you do not wish to say.]

"No, no. It's cool, man. You're my best friend, Ferral. I'll tell you everything. Maybe even more than I tell my own mom."

And so he did. Timothy spent the better part of ten minutes telling Ferral every little discovery he'd made, what all his skills did, everything he could think of.

Ferral listened without judgment. His eyes lit up sometimes. He became more and more excited by what he'd heard.

[Timothy. Your power is... it is enviable. I am ashamed to admit that I am feeling great desire at using it myself.] Ferral said, wringing his hands together. [I would very much like to experience the joy of being a Player. I cannot, and will not force you. But I would be extremely appreciative if you were to extend me the privilege.]

Timothy's smile vanished. He stared at Ferral with deep emotions. He wasn't sure why he was so hesitant to extend the power to Ferral. Maybe it was because he had finally, for the first time in his life, acquired something that made him feel like he deserved to be his father's son. Maybe it was because he didn't want to just give away that which made him special after he'd barely even gotten to play around with his power.

Timothy chewed his lower lip and looked away.

[I see that you are still hesitant.] Ferral said, lowering his eyes. [I apologize. Never mind my request. I am being selfish in asking for your Uniqueness.]

"No. You're not being selfish. I am." Timothy muttered. He turned to Umi. "Umi, are there any restrictions on who can enter the King Network?"

"Affirmative." Umi replied. "As a Newbie, you can only invite three other people into your direct Party. All Party members must share experience acquired unless they are a great distance from each other. Later on, as the Administrator has reached various satisfactory level requirements, the limits on Player Count will gradually rise."

"Oh, so it's like that." Timothy said. He looked at Ferral thoughtfully.

After thinking for a while, he nodded.

"Alright Ferral. I can only invite three people to become Players. You're my best friend, so I'm obviously giving you a slot. I don't know who the other two should be, though.

Maybe my mom? Uncle Lorent? Shana? Blinker and Kar? Rebecca? Lots of options..."

[You are truly going to let me become a Player too?] Ferral asked, becoming visibly elated. [Thank you, Timothy! I know you are extending a great trust my way. I will not betray that trust!]

Timothy smiled. He spoke to Umi a bit more, then deactivated the Tutorial temporarily in order to enable the Party tab. After that, he took a look at Ferral, then sent him a friend request.

Ferral nearly jumped out of his skin. The young Psion telepathically gasped when a game window appeared in front of him.

[AN ADMINISTRATOR IS INVITING YOU TO THE KING NETWORK.]

[IF YOU ACCEPT THIS REQUEST, YOU WILL BECOME A PLAYER.]

[WILL YOU ACCEPT THE FRIEND REQUEST AND JOIN TIMOTHY HIRO'S PARTY?]

[YES | NO]

Ferral's body shook with excitement. He didn't hesitate before jabbing his finger against the [YES] prompt.

In that moment, a whole new world opened for him, and the two friends embarked on the next major chapter of their lives together.

Part 680: The Power of Friendship

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

The moment Timothy decided to pass on the power of the Player to Ferral, it changed both their lives forever. Ferral eagerly pressed the YES option, and his body changed irreversibly.

Becoming a Player was absolutely a power-up. But it had some minor downsides. The System was now an ever-present part of their lives, and they had no idea the influence it would have on their behavior.

After Ferral became a Player, he fell completely silent for five entire minutes. Timothy stared at him, but Ferral simply didn't say anything.

After a short while, Timothy tapped on the PARTY option. He was able to bring up Ferral's Character information without needing to use the Eye of Yredelemnul.

Timothy's eyes damn near fell out of his head. Ferral was level 0 just like Timothy, but his stats were way higher! And not just a little bit higher, but insanely higher. His stats were double Timothy's, he had PP instead of MP, and he had a base 14 AP as well. To top it all off, he had so many Psionic abilities that they didn't even fit on the page! And what were all those resistances??

The more Timothy looked, the more jealous he felt. That jealousy turned to shame, shame which he was forced to rationalize.

Of course Ferral is way stronger than me. He's thousands of years old! He's been practicing his Psionics for a long time. He's already on par with a Demon Lord, right? And I'm essentially just an ordinary human with a tiny new gimmick...

Before Timothy could say anything he might regret, Ferral spoke first.

[Timothy. I have spent the last few minutes examining my Character sheet. Have you looked at it yet?]

Timothy nodded slowly. He tried not to sound resentful. "Y-yeah. Impressive stats. And you're the same level as me, even."

[The same level, yes. I noticed that as well. But have you noticed my final passive skill?]

Timothy looked at Ferral's sheet again. Multiclass Lifeform.

"I see it. The System isn't letting me see what it does, though. Umi, why can't I read what Ferral's skills do?"

Umi beeped. "The King Network innately blocks any attempts to read detailed information on other people. Using the Eye of Yredelemnul will allow you to bypass this restriction, but only once you reach a higher level. For now, you are limited to the basic information on your party member's sheet, as well as the information they tell you."

Timothy nodded slowly. If his Eye of Yredelemnul didn't get stronger, he would have about the same information regarding Ferral's abilities as Ferral did his. At least Timothy had a built-in way of bypassing this limit. Ferral, it seemed, currently did not.

Timothy relayed Umi's words to Ferral. It seemed the two of them could communicate with Umi, but only their own 'instance' of her. If Umi spoke to Timothy, Ferral couldn't hear what she was saying, and vice-versa.

[I see. Well, the skill 'Multiclass Lifeform' is not a good skill. It is actually quite bad for me. The description reads: You were an enhanced life-form with your own evolution system before you joined the King Network. As such, Experience rewards will be reduced by 67%, loot drop quantity and quality will be reduced by 79%, and currency gain will be reduced by 86%. New skills you acquire must relate to your existing class. You are unable to acquire skills that your species is incompatible with.]

Timothy felt his heart lighten. That in turn made him feel guilty. Here he was, feeling elated that his closest friend had obtained a shittier version of the game system. What kind of friend did that make Timothy?

He swallowed heavily. "I'm sorry to hear that, Ferral. It seems, because you're already an enhanced Psion, and not an ordinary sentient like me, the system has balanced itself around what powers you already possess."

Ferral looked glum for a moment, but then his eyes brightened up. [It is fine. In the end, I now get to experience life like a game! This is a most pleasurable turn of events. Perhaps it will still lead to a large spike in my personal power.]

He looked at Timothy, then he frowned in the way only a Psion with many eyes could.

[Strange. Your stats are not what you said they were when we spoke earlier.]

"They're not??" Timothy asked. He pulled up his Character page and nearly jumped out of his skin!

His eyes widened. He felt as if the breath had been sucked out of his body.

"Umi! UMI! What the hell is going on? Why did all my stats drop from 10 to 1?! Why is Ferral at 20? Can you please explain??"

Umi beeped. "The King Network does not display character stats in the way you might expect. Instead, all stats are relative to what each player has personally observed. A value of 10 is the baseline average or median value. When a Player observes life forms stronger or weaker than them than them, the Player's stats will change, as well as the stats of the life-forms they have observed. A stat of 1 is the minimum possible value. A stat of 20 is the highest possible value. Since you have only observed your stats and Ferral's stats, and since all of Ferral's parameters are much higher than yours, your stats have been adjusted to reflect this new information."

Timothy gawked at the tiny orb of light. He almost felt his soul crumble to ashes.

"I don't... I don't understand. Relative stat values? What does that even mean?"

"If you observe the status of an entity stronger than Ferral, Ferral's stats will drop." Umi replied. "If you observe entities weaker than yourself, your stats will increase, and Ferral's may lower. Simply put: The King Network needs data on many different types of Sentients and non-sentients alike in order to assess the strength levels of the universe. Until you have observed a large number of other creatures, you should not value your stats too highly."

Timothy felt his body temperature cool down a bit. It all made sense now. Since Ferral was innately a far stronger life form than him, Ferral's stats were represented as being all maxed out, while Timothy was maxed out in the opposite direction. If he looked up the stats of a random cat or dog, he'd add more data for the system to adjust every other entity's stats in the future.

"But I can't observe the stats of other entities until my Eye of Yredelemnul becomes stronger." Timothy pointed out.

"Correct. And to improve the Eye of Yredelemnul, you must improve your Player Level. Right now, that should be your foremost goal."

Timothy nodded. He definitely wanted to start leveling up. Once he did, he'd get new skills, abilities, and other fun stuff. He'd grow stronger, and that would pay off in dividends over the long run.

Timothy glanced at his sheet and Ferral's once again. He scratched his cheek with a fingernail thoughtfully.

"Umi, why am I a 'Bottom Mortal' while Ferral is a 'Low Mortal'? What's the difference?"

"Just as there are multiple classifications for Cosmics, there are classifications for Mortals as well." Umi answered.

"Whelps are Sentients that essentially cannot protect themselves, such as human children and demon imps."

"Bottom Mortals consist of ordinary humans, Demon Grunts, and 1st Level Psions."

"Low Mortals consist of Lowborn Heroes, Demon Lords, and 2nd Level Psions."

"Mortals consist of Lowborn Heroes, Demon Barons, and 3rd Level Psions."

"Middle Mortals consist of Trueborn Heroes, Demon Dukes, and 4th Level Psions."

"High Mortals consist of Trueborn Heroes, Demon Emperors, and 5th Level Psions."

"Apex Mortals consist of Hero Kings, Demon Overlords, and 6th Level Psions."

"And finally, Cosmics consist of Bottom, Low, Middle, High, and Apex Cosmics."

Timothy held up his hand.

"Wait, wait, wait. There's six classifications for mortals, plus an extra for kids and imps?? I already know about the classifications for Cosmics. Why would there be five for Cosmics but seven for mortals? Why do Mortals just have 'Mortals' while also having Middle Mortals? Who even came up with these classifications?"

If Umi could shrug, she would definitely have done so. "The Creator was originally a stupid and foolish inferior biological, after all. It is only natural that he would make careless mistakes like this. But you are incorrect in one regard. Rulers are considered the final evolution of Cosmics, thus there are six forms of Cosmics, and six forms of Mortals; Whelps do not count as combatants. There can only be one Ruler per galaxy, but that is beside the point."

"Right. Well, I guess whoever came up with the rankings didn't initially put enough thought into it." Timothy mused. "Anyway, since Ferral is a 2nd Level Psion, that puts him on par with a Demon Lord? And thus he's a Low Mortal? Makes sense. But what's this about Demon Overlords? I've never heard of them before."

"The sixth level of mortal power is not one demons can naturally achieve, as their entire base of power comes from Soul Manipulation, which inherently goes against the fabric of Akasha's universe." Umi patiently explained. "Nevertheless, there have been a small number of Demon Overlords throughout history. They were simply unaware of their lauded status, or unwilling to speak of it. Beelzebub, of this era, is one such Overlord."

"Oh, Beelzebub is?" Timothy muttered. "He's that flame guy, right? I've seen him on the Spynet a few times. Interesting."

Timothy didn't have any relationship with Beelzebub. For all Jason's son knew, Beelzebub was just one of a sea of faceless demons he barely recognized. Timothy was better acquainted with the faces of female demons. Particularly the attractive ones.

Now that Timothy had resolved his doubts about his sudden 'drop' in stats, he felt a lot better. He started poking around the other options in the King Network.

Since he had technically completed the tutorial prematurely, only to then re-enable it, he opted to skip the stuff that was still supposed to be hidden. His eyes moved down to two options...

"Map and Fast Travel? Umi, how do these work?"

He tapped on the Map option. Immediately, a zoomed-out 3D map of the nearby region of Chrona appeared. It showed two dots of green light, and when Timothy looked at them, they showed his name and Ferral's.

"The MAP function allows Players to see the local area around them." Umi explained. "Right now, you have only just acquired the King Network, and thus your map contains little information and functionality. Additional skills you acquire later on, specific professions, and further examination of the region will expand your map's functionality. You can ping other Party members regarding specific map locations, and you can add information visible to yourself and others about those locations."

She continued. "Fast Travel allows you to designate Beacons and then return to them later. Note that there is a 168 hour cooldown between fast travel jumps."

"Beacons? That's... that's similar to how my father traveled around the galaxy." Timothy said, remembering stories his mother had told him about Jason's magic.

"Beacons must be constructed using specific resources. At present, you have only just begun the Game, and thus possess no such resources." Umi said blandly. "As an inferior biological, I imagine it will take you quite some time to acquire those resources. However, if you can find prebuilt Beacons, you can travel to them later."

"Prebuilt ones? Are you talking about the ones my father made?" Timothy asked.

Umi remained silent. Her orb floated in the air, seemingly mocking him for asking such an idiotic question.

Timothy lowered his eyes. He thought carefully about her words.

After pondering the matter, he decided that he would move on and focus on new information.

He looked at the SLEEP option. Umi told him it would allow him to sleep for set periods any time he wished. This would allow him to recover from serious bodily injuries at will, though the quality of his sleep would be affected based on mental exhaustion and the pain he was enduring.

Finally, there was the Options Menu.

Timothy opened it up. He was completely flabbergasted by what he saw.

"...Visual options? Audio? Hold on, why are there Keybindings? Gameplay settings... CREDITS?? But there's only two names in the credits! What even is this menu??"

Timothy squinted. He scrolled through the visual options first.

"I can change the resolution. Of what, reality? Uh, alright. It's set to 100k now. What if I lower it to 50k?"

He did. The world around him shimmered. Not much seemed to change. He felt as though maybe things were the tiniest bit blurrier, but he couldn't be sure.

He adjusted to 25k, then 5k, then 4k...

Immediately, the differences became extremely noticeable. The universe itself became more and more 'fake' looking. It started looking like a high fidelity video game, until it stopped even looking like that. By the time he'd made it to 240p, the universe looked so awful he started to feel dizzy.

He finally bumped the quality back up to 100k and shook his head. "Alright. Last time I ever do that."

Then he looked at the FPS settings. Surprisingly, the FPS was set to 60. He adjusted it higher, and higher still...

"120 FPS... 144... 256... 512... I don't see a difference."

"That is because the human eye cannot perceive any difference beyond 60 Frames Per Second." Umi helpfully intoned. "A likely result of your inferior biology."

Timothy shrugged, then reduced the speed down to 144 FPS. He didn't know why, but things did seem a little bit smoother, but he couldn't be entirely certain. Maybe it was just a placebo effect.

Timothy found other options. He enabled Motion Blur, which turned out to be horrid. "Who would even add this dogshit of an option? It looks so bad!"

Then he found an option to change the King Network's UI colors. He chose a cool black color with white text and golden borders. "Dark Mode is so much easier on the eyes."

He moved on to the Audio section. He was surprised to see dozens, hundreds, even thousands of highly specific things he could adjust in volume.

"Heartbeat sound? Oh god, turning that up to 300% makes everyone's hearts sound like car engines! Tinnitus volume? Yeah, I'm just gonna set that to 0%. Baby crying sound? Maybe if there's an annoying baby, I guess? Oh hey, there's even a setting for 'nagging mom'! That could come in useful later. Ah, subtitles. Yeah, I'll just enable those. I did sometimes have trouble making out exactly what people were saying."

He moved on. The gameplay options were a lot more interesting.

"Crosshair options... oh, that adds a crosshair dead center of wherever I'm looking. ... ... Okay, I don't like that. Feels weird. Oooh, I can turn on a fitness tracker? Wow, it shows my calorie count and other useful stuff. This will be great for tracking my progress when I hit the gym!"

He found other settings too. "Party notifications... damage numbers... auto-reload... man, there's a lot. I'll revisit this menu later."

With a wave of his hand, Timothy dismissed the Options menu, then looked eagerly at the Talent Tree. When he opened it, he was shocked by what he saw.

"There's... only 6 skills available? I can branch out in any direction, but there's only six options to start, and I can't see anything else. Umi, what gives?"

"The Talent Tree is an extremely powerful method of Player progression." Umi replied dutifully. "However, all nodes are based on the Player's individual self. Your Talent Tree will be different from every other Player, and it can also change based on the Profession you choose later."

"Profession? Like being a Hunter, Warrior, and so on?"

"Information on Professions is locked until you complete the prerequisite requirements." Umi said simply. "To begin earning experience and leveling up, you should check your Quests tab."

Timothy nodded. He had looked at the Quests tab before, but that was back when the only option available was to complete the Tutorial. He opened it again, and this time there were four quests available.

[Story] Talk to Your Mother.

Find your mother, Fiona Hiro, and inform her of your new abilities. Completing this quest will unlock the next quest in the quest chain.

Rewards: [12 EXP], Lootbox Tier 1.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Training With Ferral.

You and Ferral are both Newbies, but Ferral is a stronger Sentient than you. Train your combat skills with him to increase your capabilities.

Rewards: [3 EXP], 3x Lootbox Tier 1.

[Side Quest] Conquer the Volgrim Empire.

The Volgrim Empire is in crisis. Billions of innocents are dying every day to the Plague. Come up with a way to save the Empire and install yourself as its new leader.

Rewards: [860,723,441 EXP], 714x Lootbox Tier 10, 41x Prestige Points, Multiclass Support Added, 3x Unique Skills, (15 Others)

[Side Quest] Pick Flowers.

Your mother has been feeling tired and dragged down recently, and you owe her a real apology. Why not pick some pretty flowers for her to brighten up her day?

Rewards: [0 EXP], Your Mother's Smile.

Timothy stared blankly at these Quests for a while. Obviously, conquering the Volgrim Empire would give him insane rewards, but wasn't it a little ridiculous to even show this quest when he had only just obtained his power? And what was with that silly side-quest about picking flowers for his mom??

Timothy felt bewildered. He looked at Ferral. "Hey, have you completed the Tutorial yet?"

[Naturally,] Ferral replied. [Since it is optional, I skipped it and enabled the Tutorial Companion afterward.]

"Alright, and what Quests do you have available now?" Timothy asked.

[I have not checked. Give me a moment.]

Ferral pulled up his Quest screen, then read them out loud to Timothy. Timothy's face fell.

"Why are your quests so much better than mine? They give good rewards, AND they're simple to achieve!"

[Simple, yes. Easy, no. Reaching the 3rd Level of Psionics is no simple matter.] Ferral said. [Defeating my Teacher in a martial battle is likewise going to be extremely difficult if I wish to progress my Story Quests. As for the others, like practicing 1000 Psionic Blasts, those are simply going to require a lot of time for me to complete. Luckily, I am in no rush.]

Ferral's Quests were all related to his proficiency as a Psion. They were pretty much the sorts of things he already would have done even without the System, so they made sense to Timothy. Unfortunately, Timothy's quests were a lot more bizarre and less focused.

"Well..." Timothy said slowly. "We're both Players now. I guess I'm going to get started on my Quests. That means I'll need to go see my mom. You wanna stay here and wait for Lorent and Shana to return? Let them know about everything that's happened?"

Ferral nodded. [Yes, I am going to begin progress on my own quests. It seems that with the King Network, my ability to progress in multiple Psionic Disciplines at once will be greatly enhanced. As such, I am going to begin levitating as many small objects around myself at once as possible to improve my fine control of Primal Psionics.]

Timothy gave his best friend a thumbs up. "Sounds good! I'll be back later."

Timothy turned and left. As he exited the warehouse and started to head toward the Spynet, where his mom was sure to be, he paused.

"I mean, it couldn't hurt to grab some flowers for her, could it?"

Timothy glanced off to the west, where the central gardens were. He opted to take a small detour.

"Small gestures matter." Timothy reminded himself.

Part 681: "I'm Not a Fraud!"

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy headed to the Spynet after picking his mom some flowers. He was surprised to see that the Spynet had been locked, which was definitely out of the ordinary. No doubt, Fiona had done so to prevent him from sneaking in and peeping on girls again, but the fact she even felt the need hurt Timothy's feelings. He realized he'd betrayed her trust worse than he expected, and now she was taking noticeably more drastic actions than she'd ever felt the need to do before.

Trust, once lost, was difficult to regain. Timothy knew that much.

He tried to push the door open, but failed. Then, as he was about to knock, he paused.

There were words floating in the air in front of his eyes.

Fiona: I'm just not sure what to do about him. I love him to death, but now he's creeping on girls. Is this normal behavior?

Kar: Hurgh, what male would not enjoy gazing upon the beauty of a voluptuous female? I believe you are blowing this matter up too much.

Blinker: I don't know, Kar has a point, but the way Timothy went about doing it was definitely wrong. Have you punished him yet?

Fiona: No... I was thinking I should, but I don't know what sort of punishment fits the crime... and you know I hate doing stuff like that. It's not like I'm his real mother. I don't want to make him hate me...

Timothy stared at the words that were appearing in front of him. He couldn't hear a thing inside the Spynet, yet apparently he was close enough that he had triggered his new power's Subtitle functionality. He'd played games that did this sort of thing before, but now it made him feel awful. This definitely wasn't a conversation he should be listening in on.

But still... he was curious... so he simply stood there, staring dumbly at the words levitating in front of the door.

Blinker: You can't say things like that. You're the only mother Timothy has ever known. I know for a fact he loves you the same as he would have loved Phoebe.

Fiona: But how can he really? I'm not even a real person. I'm just a spiritual copy of a dead woman. I'm not as smart as Phoebe, I can't leave Chrona or I'll die, and I don't even need to sleep. What kind of real human doesn't need sleep? My skin is cold to the touch, I'm not pleasant to hug... I know Timothy probably hates me...

Fiona: [Crying noises.]

Blinker: C-come on, Fiona... that's no way to talk about yourself! Besides, you're super smart. You keep Chrona working. Without you, this place would have crumbled a long time ago!

Kar: Butterfly is right. Hurgh! You are being much too hard on yourself. You should be proud if five percent of your brilliance rubs off on Game Boy! I think you need to stop treating yourself so badly and stop seeing things in the worst possible light. So what if he peeped on some females? Just send him to me for a month or two. I'll whip him into shape with hard labor! Maybe I can even show him how to properly romance a woman!

Blinker: Err, Kar, that's a nice thing to offer, but I don't know if your crocodile mating rituals will be very effective for a human boy...

Kar: ABSURD! Butterfly, you know my chuffing noises drive you wild in bed! Once I teach him my Death Roll mating move-!

Blinker: Kar, please. Let's be serious here.

Timothy took a few steps back from the door, too guilty to listen any further. He looked down at the bundle of flowers in his hand, feeling more miserable than ever. He'd come here to make amends to his mother and show off his new powers, but now he felt lower than dirt. He'd made his mother cry, and even made her doubt whether she was a good mother at all.

What kind of son would do that? What kind of man would do what he did? Didn't it just go to show that he was too reclusive, to the point that it made his mom think he didn't love her?

Timothy stared off into the distance, thinking about his seventeen years of life. He couldn't remember his father's face, or his birth mother's face. Not as they were when they were alive. He's seen the mausoleum with their bodies frozen in stasis. He'd seen their sculptures, and videos of them from years before. But he had no memories of them in person. They died when he was less than a year old.

Fiona was the only mother he knew. How could she think he didn't love her?

The answer was obvious. He never really told her as much. He sat in his room, playing video games, watching movies, and barely interacting with the outside world.

The truth was, he had been depressed. He had felt lifeless, like he was a useless boy growing into a useless man.

Timothy looked at the King Network's UI, which always hovered at the edge of his vision. Obtaining his power had finally made him feel like he had a purpose, but was that really the case? By thinking he couldn't do anything without it, hadn't he also been subtly denigrating his own mother? By implying that powerless people had no value, hadn't he implied that she had no value?

It was no wonder she felt as if he didn't love her. He'd told her so a thousand times, without ever needing to verbalize the words.

"I have to do better..." Timothy said quietly. "It took me receiving powers to realize I never needed powers to be a better person. Even if I had just spent more time with my mom and made her feel loved, that would have made my existence a worthwhile addition to the world. My mom deserves to be loved."

Timothy thought about his father, Jason. From the information he'd gathered over the years, Jason had simply made Fiona as an assistant in his Mind Realm. He'd cloned Phoebe thoughtlessly, treating Fiona like a mere accessory. When push came to shove, Jason treated his 'real' wife like a goddess, but tossed Fiona aside like garbage.

Fiona had already been abandoned by the man she loved. It was no wonder she had attachment issues with Timothy, who wasn't her 'real' son.

"I am her son. She's my mom." Timothy said quietly, steeling his heart. "I can't make her cry ever again. I have to do better!"

Timothy gritted his teeth. He stepped toward the Spynet door, then loudly knocked against it three times.

"Hey, mom? Mom, are you in there?" Timothy asked loudly. "You got a minute to talk?"

Timothy glanced down. He couldn't hear what anyone was saying, but the subtitles reappeared now that he was close enough.

Blinker: Is that Timothy? What good timing. I can't wait to give him an earful for making Fiona cry.

Fiona: No, no, don't do that. It's not his fault. I just- just give me a minute, I need to clean myself up. Don't let him know I was crying, okay? He already feels bad enough.

Kar: Hurgh, I'll go delay him for a minute or two. You two stay here.

Timothy took a step back from the door. He frowned.

After a few seconds, an idea popped into his head. It wouldn't be right for him to let the others know he'd spied on their conversation, especially after the peeping incident. Frankly, he thought of himself even more lowly now, since he'd done the exact same thing again.

He decided he would just have to play stupid.

The door opened and Kar poked his head out. He looked down and spotted Timothy.

"Hurgh! Game Boy, what did you want? White Ghost and Butterfly are having an important conversation."

Kar's body had been mostly healed after all these years in Chrona. He could walk normally, but he still experienced terrible spikes of pain if he attempted to lift heavy objects or bend over. He was glad to be able to move around on his own power, but it seemed he would never be the powerful Monster King he once was.

Timothy blinked his eyes innocently. "Uncle Kar, you're here? Well that's great! I had some really really good news to tell mom. But uh, you mind stepping out here for a second first?"

Kar slowly nodded. He carefully opened the door and slipped through it before closing it behind himself, taking care not to let Timothy see inside. Clearly, he didn't want to risk the boy seeing his mother crying.

Timothy pretended to be oblivious. He held up the bouquet he'd made.

"I realized I haven't been acting right, the last few years. Last night was a real wake-up call for me- oh! Did mom tell you... what she caught me doing?"

Kar crossed his arms and looked at the boy with a grave expression. "Hurgh. That's right. You were peeping upon females of many different types and species."

Yeah..." Timothy said, looking away and rubbing the back of his head sheepishly. "I knew it was wrong, but I kept doing it anyway. When mom caught me, I wanted to crawl in a hole and die."

Kar's expression softened, even if only a little. "Don't be so hard on yourself, Game Boy. Every male makes mistakes. What matters is that you learn from them."

"Yeah, I know." Timothy said. "I realized I've been way too closed off these last few years. I barely leave the house, barely talk to mom, and I'm turning into a lazy degenerate person. I think it's time I made a change."

Kar tilted his head. "Hence the flowers?"

"Yeah!" Timothy chirped. "Mom's been feeling tired lately. I thought maybe some flowers would cheer her up. Doesn't hurt as an apology, either."

Kar lowered his arms to his side and rested a hand on his hip. "Hurgh. That is good. You are learning, Game Boy. What you did was not good, but if you work hard, you can repair the damage you did to you and your mother's relationship. I know for a fact she will not be angry with you for long."

Timothy's heart spiked with pain, but he maintained his same casual smile.

"That's good, Uncle Kar. But, well, there is another reason I came here..."

"Another reason? And what would that be?" Kar asked.

The door to the Spynet flew open. Kar stormed into the room with a look of excitement on his face.

"Game Boy did it! He really did it! He got his powers!! Hurgh, hurgh, this is great! I am so happy I could just... ROOOAAAARR!!!"

Kar's extreme emotional outburst caught Blinker and Fiona offguard. By this point, Fiona had already dried her eyes and made herself look presentable. When Timothy walked in behind Kar, he couldn't tell his mother had been crying, aside from the slightest puffiness in her eyes. If it was the him of 24 hours ago, he wouldn't have noticed at all.

"What?" Fiona asked, looking at her son with wonder. "Power? Timothy, you unlocked your power?"

Timothy forced a smile. He didn't realize Kar would rush in and blabber the news, so now his flowers would not have the effect he originally intended. Still, he could only dance along with the rhythm of life.

"Yeah, mom. I came here to tell you. Also, I really wanted to bring you some flowers..."

Timothy sheepishly held out his makeshift bouquet. Looking at the selection, he suddenly felt his color choices were extremely shabby. They weren't even held together with anything, and the gesture was so low effort his mom probably wouldn't even-

"You brought me flowers?" Fiona asked, a sparkle of wonder in her eyes. "T-Timothy... you've... you've never brought me flowers before..."

Timothy felt as if he'd taken ten emotional damage. He flinched at his mom's words. "Never? Oh... well I really wanted to tell you I was sorry, so I brought them... I know they're not arranged very well or anything..."

Fiona darted over and took the flowers from him. "Don't even say that. They're beautiful! Oh, Timothy, this is so sweet of you! I could... kiss you! Mwah!"

Fiona excitedly hugged her son and kissed his cheek, making him blush. He quickly hugged her back. "Haha, I'm glad you like them, mom. Sorry about earlier..."

"Oh that's... it's nothing. Just don't do it again, okay?" Fiona said, pulling away. She looked at the flowers again with sparkles in her eyes, making Timothy feel extremely strange.

For such a small gesture to mean so much to her... how badly have I been neglecting my mom?

Timothy spent a few minutes talking to his mom, getting her to calm down, and generally lowering the excitement level of the room. Then, he took a deep breath.

"So... about my power."

"Yes! Your power! What is it?" Kar quickly asked, clearly the person in the room most excited by Timothy's revelation.

"I really hope it isn't invisibility..." Blinker said, scrunching up her face.

"Uh, no. Not... not invisibility." Timothy said, realizing the implication of her words. "No uh, my power is... well, I'm a gamer! I gained access to something called the King Network!"

The room fell silent. Kar stared at Timothy with a stupid smile on his face, frozen as if waiting for a punchline. Blinker's stare was completely blank. She wasn't even sure what he'd said. Fiona looked at him with a hint of disbelief.

"G-gamer? Gaming? Your power is... video games?" Fiona asked, trying not to sound too disbelieving of his words. "That's... that's really nice, honey. So you're really good at playing video games, then?"

"What? No! That's not what I meant." Timothy said, feeling his stomach tighten. "I can use video game mechanics in real life! Look, like this..."

Timothy quickly looked around the room. He spotted a book Fiona had been reading, 'To Kill a Mockingbird', then walked over, grabbed it, and right in front of everyone, he put it into his inventory.

From their perspective, Timothy seemed to just... make the book disappear.

Kar's frozen smile cracked slightly. He tried to continue grinning, but the expression was becoming increasingly strained. "Hurgh. That's... uh... really impressive, Game Boy. What a fascinating, uh, power you have..."

"You can make things disappear?" Blinker asked, more confused than anything else. "So it is invisibility after all!"

"No, no, it's not invisibility." Timothy explained, feeling a spike of frustration. "Look, you know how in RPGs, characters can gain stats and skills to enhance themselves? I can do that now, but in real life!"

Kar's smile finally broke. He looked at his wife in absolute confusion. "Hurgh. What is Arr Pee Geez? I do not understand the words Game Boy is saying."

Neither he nor Blinker had ever played a video game. Fiona had played them with Timothy a little bit when he was still a kid, but she wasn't into them much and stopped when he was ten or eleven years old.

"So..." Fiona said carefully. "You can... use game mechanics in real life? That's what you're saying?"

"Yes!" Timothy said, grasping onto the faint string of hope he had left. "Like, uh, I can kill monsters, earn experience, and then level up to get powerful skills and abilities. I can also turn other people into video game players! I already used this ability on Ferral, so he's a Player like me, now!"

"Ferral is?" Fiona asked. "Timothy, you're not... making all this up, are you? What have I told you about fibbing?"

"Mom, come on, I'm being completely serious." Timothy said.

The young man paused for a moment. He looked off to the side at his UI tabs.

The Quests tab was glowing.

Timothy's eyes metaphorically flashed. He quickly tapped the air with his finger, revealing that the [Talk to Your Mother] and [Pick Flowers] quests had both been completed.

"One minute. Let me check something." Timothy said.

The other three stared at Timothy in bewilderment. For some reason, the young man started looking at absolutely nothing, touching his lip, muttering under his breath, and doing other bizarre behavior. It was as if he was seeing something they weren't.

"Is... is Timothy alright?" Blinker whispered to Kar. "Don't tell me he's gone mad and started hallucinating?"

"I do not know, Butterfly." Kar said quietly. "Hurgh. He did something to that book. You saw it. It vanished right in front of us."

"You don't think maybe it was some elaborate magic trick?" Blinker asked.

"Maybe. I am not certain..."

While they quietly talked, Timothy was examining his quests tab. He accepted the reward for [Pick Flowers], and then he checked his Character Sheet. A new Skill had appeared!

Your Mother's Smile: [Passive] [Unique] [Cooldown 1 Hour]

When your mother is happy, you are happy. Each time your mother genuinely smiles and feels happiness, if you are the cause of that smile, your accumulated Fatigue will decrease by 20%. You will also gain a mood boost, which will improve Mental Focus by 15% for one hour. Finally, this skill grants a passive 50% chance to recover from Mood debuffing status ailments when in the presence of your mother.

Timothy blinked. What a strange skill. It was a Unique skill, so it would definitely be of great benefit to him, but it felt rather bizarre how he had earned it.

"Never mind that..." Timothy muttered under his breath. "I can't use it to prove the King Network exists. Oh! What about this?"

Timothy accepted the rewards from the Main Story quest he'd just completed, [Talk to Your Mother].

He obtained 12 EXP, and when he looked at his character page, he found that he was at 12/100. Still a ways away from his first level up.

But he did obtain something concrete. A Tier 1 Lootbox!

Timothy summoned the box into his hands. When it appeared, the other three stared with wide-eyes. Timothy held a plain wooden box in his hand, maybe the size of a small book. Faint glowing runes were etched on the box, and the words 'Tier 1' were barely visible among them.

"You see??" Timothy asked, turning to them. "I'm not making it up! This is my first ever Lootbox. Let's see what it gives..."

He manually opened the box. At once, a bright, magical light erupted from inside, spilling out of the edges and briefly lighting up the room, even if only a little. The light faded, and three tiny orbs shot out of the box, suspending themselves in the air before Timothy. He stared hungrily as the orbs suddenly turned into large light boxes with an image and text describing the rewards.

On cue, Umi materialized beside Timothy, her light orb only visible to him.

"Lootboxes are a mechanic designed to allow the Player to make important choices that will affect their future progression. You are offered multiple items, skills, or abilities, and may only choose one option. Later on, you may acquire the ability to re-roll your rewards, banish them permanently so that you will never see them again, or lock a reward so that you can obtain it in the next future lootbox of the same or higher tier."

Timothy noticed several nuanced hints in what she'd just told him. "So I can only pick one option, but the options I don't pick can still show up in the future. Interesting."

Timothy then looked at the items carefully.

Climbing Claws: [Item] [Uncommon] [Hand Slot] [Utility/Offense]

A set of gloves the Player can wear with extremely sharp fingertips. These will allow the Player to climb nearly any surface without losing their grip, even if the Player is completely exhausted. They also offer a slashing damage bonus if the Player fights with them unarmed, and they offer bonus grip to melee weapons so the Player is less likely to drop them. This bonus is halved for two-handed weapons.

Teleportation Orb: [Item] [Common] [Consumable] [Utility/Traversal]

A magical orb the Player can place or throw, then activate with a mental command to teleport to the Orb's location. The Common variant can only be used five times before it permanently dissipates. Alternatively, if the Teleportation Orb has not been used, the Player can craft a Beacon with it to teleport to a fixed location through Fast Travel.

Call Finch: [Active Skill] [Common] [Summon] [Mana Cost 5]

Summon a small bird which can be ordered around. The Player can converse with the Finch and exchange information. The Player can also remotely pilot the Finch and temporarily take over its consciousness. Seizing control will only last for a maximum of five minutes. The Finch is extremely fragile, and if it dies, the skill will disappear.

Timothy gasped audibly. These were the weakest, shittiest tier 1 items and skills he could obtain, and they were all awesome! He couldn't believe what he was seeing!

He looked over at his mother, Kar, and Blinker, but... they didn't look as impressed as him.

"So?" Kar asked. "What does that box do?"

"You don't see this?" Timothy asked, gesturing to the three floating windows in front of him.

The other three slowly shook their heads.

"You opened the box and started randomly making weird faces and noises." Blinker said.

"Didn't you guys see the bright light when I opened the box?" Timothy asked.

"Nope." Blinker replied.

Timothy felt a little annoyed. Here he was, trying to prove that his power was real, but the damned System was doing everything it could to make him look like a fraud!

Frustrated, Timothy looked at the three things on offer.

"Well then, I'd better pick something that makes it obvious I'm not faking this. I really want to pick Call Finch, but I don't have any MP yet. It's still at 0. The teleportation orb seems cool, but the Climbing Claws are Uncommon, and they seem generally useful..."

He made his decision. If he had any mana, he would have picked the little bird for sure, but the Climbing Claws were the most practical thing he could choose right now. Plus, they looked really cool.

As he tapped the Climbing Claws, the other two items vanished. The Lootbox abruptly levitated into the air, then it dissolved into nothingness, vanishing from existence. A faint speck of light appeared, which then materialized into his chosen item.

The Climbing Claws!

The simple but elegant gloves fell out of the air and landed in Timothy's grasp. When they appeared, the expressions on the other three's faces finally changed.

"Oh! What is that?" Kar asked. "Gloves? Perhaps gauntlets?"

"They look like metal claws." Blinker said, walking closer to Timothy to get a better look. "They seem really sharp. You'd better be careful, Timothy."

"Is that your power in action?" Fiona asked, walking over to rest her hand on her son's shoulder. "It... made a pair of gauntlets?"

"That's right." Timothy said. He looked at the gloves, and with a thought, they suddenly popped onto his hands. He didn't even need to put them on manually, he could equip them in an instant!

That drew another gasp of amazement from the others. By now, they'd observed enough metaphysical phenomena to believe he wasn't making things up.

"So the way my power works..." Timothy said, finally launching into a detailed explanation.

Minutes passed. An hour.

Blinker and Kar were not like Ferral. They had not played video games, and didn't really understand the mechanics of them. He had to explain concepts multiple times, much to his frustration, but eventually, they got the gist of the idea.

"So when you complete Quests, you get rewards, and the reward from telling me about your powers was this Lootbox." Fiona summarized.

"Exactly." Timothy said. "I've only just started using my power, so I don't know how everything works yet. But there's a Fast Travel system, so I think I might be able to use it to leave Chrona! Only if I find one of dad's Beacons, though."

"Whoa whoa, not so fast." Blinker interrupted. "You definitely can't leave Chrona, even if your power has a way to make that happen. Have you forgotten? If you leave, your body will implode when you re-enter Realspace. It nearly killed me last time I did it, and the time dilation wasn't nearly as bad as it is now. You definitely don't want to risk dying!"

"But you did survive." Timothy pointed out. "Sentients with enhanced bodies can resist the effects of temporal distortion! If I become strong enough, I should be able to make it to Realspace."

"It's still a no from me, young man." Fiona said. "For now, at least. You need to learn how this power of yours works before you even consider going out there. Let me remind you, you are the son of the Wordsmith. If any demon finds out who you are, or any Volgrim for that matter, they'll murder you without hesitation. Especially if they learn you have powers! Jason was a serious threat to humanity's enemies. That's why they killed him."

"Yeah." Blinker said sullenly. "Gressil murdered your father, and probably your mother too. He's a really scary demon. If he can nullify your powers, you'll be meat on the chopping block. It's best if you stay in Chrona for now."

Timothy wanted to leave, but he wasn't ready to throw his life away. His mother's words, as well as Blinker's, served to put him on more stable mental footing.

"You're right. I shouldn't rush. I have plenty of time, now that I've unlocked my powers. I might as well focus on leveling up so I can become a badass!"

Timothy glanced at his Quests. Already, there were new ones replacing the old.

[Story] Escape Chrona.

You were born in a time-accelerated realm, and as such cannot exist in Realspace without finding a way to counter Time Dilation Sickness. Neutralize the effects of Time Dilation Sickness, or become strong enough that you can ignore them, then exit Chrona's confines.

Rewards: [2x Level Up], 2x Lootbox Tier 2, 1x Enchantment Orb.

[Side Quest] Use Your Equipment

You've chosen the Climbing Claws. Locate the tallest building in Chrona and climb to the top. Doing so in under 3 minutes will double your rewards.

Rewards: [27 EXP], 1x Reroll Token, 1x Banish Token.

[Side Quest] Invite Additional Players

Your Party can consist of up to four people, including yourself. For each additional Sentient you invite to your party, you will be rewarded. Be warned: Inviting the wrong people can create a future problem. Only choose those you can trust.

Rewards (Per invited Player): [1x Level Up], 1x Lootbox Tier 3, 3x Random Stat Booster.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Training With Ferral.

You and Ferral are both Newbies, but Ferral is a stronger Sentient than you. Train your combat skills with him to increase your capabilities.

Rewards: [3 EXP], 3x Lootbox Tier 1.

[Side Quest] Conquer the Volgrim Empire.

The Volgrim Empire is in crisis. Billions of innocents are dying every day to the Plague. Come up with a way to save the Empire and install yourself as its new leader.

Rewards: [860,723,441 EXP], 714x Lootbox Tier 10, 41x Prestige Points, Multiclass Support Added, 3x Unique Skills, (15 Others)

Timothy examined the new quests, and the old ones as well. He found it rather suspicious that the rewards for inviting other people to the King Network were so extravagant considering the relative ease of doing so. At present, he could only repeat the inviting process twice before he ran out of Party slots… but still! An entire level up just for inviting someone?

Timothy glanced at Fiona.

Mom is an ordinary human, or rather, a spiritual life form. Does that mean she'll be able to level up at 100% efficiency, like me?

He looked at Blinker.

She's definitely an ascended life form. She'd probably have bigger debuffs placed on her than Ferral did since she's as strong as a Demon Emperor! It probably isn't worth it to invite the Monster Queen...

He looked at Kar.

Uncle Kar used to be even stronger than Blinker. But he's crippled now, unable to exercise without injuring himself. Would the System considering him an ascended life form like Ferral and penalize him? Or since he's so weak from his injuries, would he be given a standard EXP rate like me? Crocodiles are innately powerful... so he should be considered stronger than a baseline human.

Timothy tapped his lower lip thoughtfully. Ultimately, he didn't have a good answer for his question. Of the three, Kar and Fiona seemed like the best options, but there were others in Chrona he could invite. And maybe his mom and Kar wouldn't be interested anyway? They didn't care much about video games.

"Well, mom." Timothy eventually said. "I just wanted you and the others to know. I'm gonna go use my powers and try leveling up to make myself stronger. The System says if I train with Ferral, I can get big rewards."

"That's a good idea, sweetheart." Fiona said, smiling at her son. She sniffed the flowers he gave her and beamed brightly with happiness. Immediately, Timothy felt some of his fatigue disappear as he observed his mother's happy smile. "Don't do anything rash, but do have fun. From what I know of your father, obtaining Heroic powers can be so very, very thrilling."

Timothy smiled back. "I love you, mom. I promise from now on, I'm going to turn over a new leaf. This is only the start of my journey."

Kar chuffed. "Hurgh. That it is!"

Part 682: Truth and Desire

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

"TIMOTHY EDWARD HIRO! What are you DOING? Get down from there!!"

Fiona screamed in horror as she looked up at the residential apartment zone where so many crocodiles lived, less than three blocks west of the Spynet Sphere. A tiny but unmistakable figure was climbing the sheer brick wall with no ropes or pulleys to save him if he slipped and fell. Who else could it be other than her foolish son, Timothy?!

Timothy moved quickly. A three-minute timer ticked down on the left side of his vision, the time limit for him to earn double the rewards from this quest. Unfortunately, he hadn't expected his mom to step out of the Spynet and spot him less than a minute after he started climbing.

"One sec, mom!!" Timothy shouted without looking back. He continued to climb while he talked. "I gotta get to the top!"

"TIMOTHYYY!!" Fiona shrieked, feeling like she was about to have a heart attack.

Blinker quickly stepped out of the Spynet, she easily spotted Timothy's conspicuous form, but didn't make an immediate move to fly over and rescue him.

"Calm down, Fiona. I'm here now. If he starts to fall, I'll catch him with my magic."

"What is he doing?!" Fiona cried. "He's going to get himself killed! When did my son become such a thrill-seeking daredevil?"

"He must have wanted to try out those gauntlets. Remember? The Climbing Claws?" Blinker half-correctly guessed, unaware he'd received a quest to do so. "I know you're scared, but I'm here now. I won't let anything happen to him."

Blinker flapped her wings. She launched toward Timothy and flew to a spot just behind him, frowning when she saw Timothy scaling the wall much faster than should have been possible.

Each time Timothy willed it, one of his claws would stop gripping the wall, then he could pull himself up and hook that claw to the next climbing position. They didn't dig into the walls, and they didn't even leave marks. They clearly functioned off magical principles, but Blinker wasn't certain what those principles were.

"Kid, you're really scaring the daylights out of your mom." Blinker said.

"I know! Sorry! Just leave me alone for another minute! I gotta make it to the top... and don't help me, either!" Timothy shouted.

He was getting tired. The Climbing Claws took the fear of falling out of the equation, but lifting his entire body, arm length by arm length, still required incredible strength and endurance to pull off. Since he only had Climbing Claws and not Climbing Boots, his feet were nearly useless. Timothy was not athletic at all. He was a nerd who simply played a lot of video games, and as such, had wildly underestimated how much stamina it would take to scour the building. He stupidly assumed the claws would do all the work, but he couldn't have been more wrong.

The further he climbed, the more ragged Timothy's breathing became. He gasped and wheezed, cursing himself for not doing pushups and pullups in his youth. Maybe he could have been more prepared for when he got his powers! Of course, he'd had no way of knowing, back then.

The seconds ticked down. Only thirty remained. Timothy had made it to the ninth floor, and the tenth floor was within reach. He'd scaled the first three floors quickly, but after the fourth, things became harder and harder. Now he wasn't sure if he could make it or not.

"Guh! Can't... can't give up!" Timothy growled to himself.

He summoned a burst of willpower he didn't even know he had and frantically increased his speed. It wasn't much, but compared to his previous pace, it was positively explosive. Every two seconds, he pulled himself up another arm's length.

"Come on, you... mother... fucker!!" Timothy cursed at himself, as the edge of the rooftop came within an arm's length. He grabbed on, held the edge for three long seconds, then as the timer was in its final two seconds, he gave himself a massive heave and yanked with all his strength, pulling himself over the edge and toppling onto the rooftop, exhausted and mentally broken.

"Oh... oh god... kuhuk! Guh... shit, that was... ugh..."

Timothy had never exerted himself physically that much in his entire life. He had never gone for a run, or played on monkey bars, or done other stuff kids often did with their friends at school. He was a total recluse who had little idea how the real world worked.

Even so, after gasping for breath and crying over his burning lungs, Timothy couldn't help but wheeze out a pained laugh.

"Ha.. haha... I did... I did it... not a loser... not gonna be a loser anymore... haha..."

Blinker flew up and landed beside him. She crossed her arms and looked down at the young man disapprovingly.

"What were you thinking? Too eager to play with your new toys?"

Timothy looked at her. He wanted to raise a hand, but he couldn't. His arms had lost all their strength.

"Quest... I had a quest... to climb the building." Timothy coughed. "Had to do it quick... less than three minutes. Sorry for scaring mom..."

"Oh, so it was that game power's doing." Blinker said, her arms relaxing a little. "Still, you could have told me. I'd have flown you up here if you needed to get to the top so badly."

Timothy spent a few seconds silently breathing, reducing the burn in his lungs. He shakily sat up, his head wobbling from dizziness.

"That wouldn't work, auntie." Timothy said slowly. "I had to climb by using my own power. Now, let's see if I succeeded..."

Timothy checked his Quests. He was delighted to see that the climbing quest wasn't flashing red like other completed quests, but it was flashing silver!

[Side Quest] Use Your Equipment - COMPLETE! [Silver Ranking]

You have completed the timed objective, and have earned double the stated rewards. However, you failed to complete the Gold Time Record, and have thus failed to earn triple rewards.

Rewards earned: [2x27 EXP], 2x Reroll Token, 2x Banish Token.

Timothy looked at the quest in disbelief.

"Hey, Umi. What's this about a Gold Time Record?"

Umi's orb of light materialized next to Timothy. "Completing a timed quest will earn the standard reward. Completing a timed quest within the allotted time will earn double the rewards. Completing a timed quest in half the required time will triple the rewards."

"What?! In half the time?! That's ridiculous! There's no way I could have pulled that off! More importantly, why didn't you tell me about the Gold Time thing! It would have been nice to know!"

Blinker listened as Timothy cursed at something called 'Umi'. She felt that this name was familiar, but she wasn't sure where she had heard it before... somewhere, a long time ago, maybe?

"The King Network judged that the Gold Time was barely within your capabilities. Thus, informing you of the Gold Time would not have served any useful purpose." Umi replied. "You may collect your rewards now."

Timothy grumbled and cursed under his breath, but at least he'd learned about the secret Gold reward in a low stakes environment, like now. When he combined his 54 EXP with the 12 EXP from earlier, he was at 66 EXP, 2/3rds of the way toward his first level-up. He couldn't wait to see what would happen!

As an added bonus, he had acquired two Rerolls and two Banishes for future Lootboxes. Those would certainly turn out to be quite handy.

After Timothy had recovered from his exhaustion, he shakily rose to his feet, and Blinker, in her human-sized form, helped him stand.

"Hey, who is Umi?" Blinker asked. "Her name sounds... familiar."

"It does?" Timothy asked. "Well, someone named The Creator made the King Network, and he assigned Umi to be the tutorial companion."

"Ohh... I see." Blinker said, looking at him strangely. "So, do you want to climb down yourself, or...?"

"No, no, I'd love it if you can help me get back down, auntie. I'm beat." Timothy said, his arms twitching from over-exertion.

Blinker levitated both of them into the air, then she flew Timothy back to the Spynet, where his mother had mostly regained her calm. Kar was standing beside her, looking positively unruffled about all Timothy's crazy antics.

"...Just what exactly were you thinking?" Fiona snapped, when Timothy arrived.

"The System gave me a quest, and it seemed easy, so I decided to do it." Timothy explained. "It wanted me to scale the tallest building in Chrona, and it would double my rewards if I could do so in under three minutes."

"So that's why." Fiona said. Her frown deepened. "And if this 'System' tells you to jump off a bridge for rewards, will you do that too?"

"Mom, come on, it's not like that." Timothy complained. "These Climbing Claws are the real deal. I tested them first just to be sure I would be safe. They adhere to walls magically, and there's no risk of them losing their grip or my hands sliding out. Here, why don't you try putting them on to see for yourself?"

Fiona didn't move when Timothy unequipped the gloves and they appeared in his grasp. He held them out to her, but she didn't take them.

"Even if you took the necessary precautions, you should have told me what was going on." Fiona muttered. "You scared the daylights out of me."

"Hurgh. White Ghost is right." Kar affirmed. "It is good that you took precautions, but you should have told someone what you were doing. We were standing right here, after all. You could have told us on the way out the door."

"I, uh, didn't want you guys to worry about me." Timothy said lamely.

"More like you knew I'd say no!" Fiona exclaimed. "But whatever. At least you're fine. Timothy, you are soon going to be a man. You're almost 18. I can't protect you forever, and I certainly shouldn't. But just because you want to be a big, independent man, that doesn't mean you shouldn't let others know what you're up to! Even your father told me where he was going. The only time he didn't... well, that was when Gressil..."

Fiona trailed off. She glanced at the ground, momentarily lost in an old memory.

"I'm really sorry, mom." Timothy apologized. "Look, I'm going to go back to my room and rest. I'll train with Ferral tomorrow, and if I get any other dangerous quests, I'll tell you, okay?"

Fiona nodded. "Okay."

She rubbed her arms, visibly aggrieved. Timothy hesitated, then stepped forward and lifted his weak limbs to embrace his mom. She brightened up a little and hugged him back, clearly just glad he wasn't injured.

As they hugged, Blinker looked at Kar. "Honey, does the name 'Umi' ring a bell for you?"

Kar nodded. "Of course! Hurgh. Have you forgotten? Umi is the name of my mother's AI creation. Umi runs the Remnant Oasis."

Blinker's eyes shot open. "Oh my gosh! So that's where I've heard the name! But wait, why is Umi part of Timothy's game power?"

"She is?" Kar asked.

"She is??" Fiona exclaimed, pulling out of her son's embrace. "Wait, what's all this about Umi? What's going on?"

Timothy, visibly confused, looked between the three adults. With slight hesitation, he explained Umi's role in the System and how she functioned.

"Why can't we see Umi? Is she with you now?" Fiona asked.

Timothy nodded. "Only Players can see Umi. She's floating right there, and she looks like a marble-sized light orb."

Fiona's expression turned bizarre. "Why would Umi be involved in all of this? Did she manipulate the Queen Network? Duplicate it to make the King Network? How does it relate to Timothy's powers? And what does the Creator have to do with all of this? Something isn't adding up."

"We should call Rebecca over." Blinker suggested. "She knows more about Marie than anyone here except for maybe Kar."

And so they did. Rebecca was busy repairing a solar power converter, but she readily agreed to head over when she heard the news. Less than ten minutes later, the green-haired Cybernite jogged over and stopped when she drew close enough to the others to walk the rest of the way.

"What's this business with Umi?" Rebecca asked.

Fiona explained the situation. Rebecca's expression didn't change.

"How odd." She said, her blank face making it seem as if she thought the situation was perfectly ordinary. "Timothy, can you ask Umi if Marie Becker has anything to do with the King Network?"

Timothy nodded. "Umi, is Marie Becker affiliated with the King Network?"

When Umi said next astonished him.

"Certain details about the inner workings of the King Network are locked from Player access until they reach a certain milestone."

"What milestone?" Timothy asked in bewilderment. "What does that mean?"

"Certain details about the inner workings of the King Network are locked from Player access until they reach a certain milestone." Umi repeated. "Further queries regarding this matter will be ignored."

Timothy looked at his mom. "Umi basically says she can't tell us anything."

"That's extremely suspicious." Fiona replied. She looked at Kar. "Marie never told you anything about making some real life game system for Timothy?"

"Mother never said anything of the sort." Kar answered. "Hurgh. You are correct. This is all very suspicious. How can we be certain this is the same 'Umi' my mother made? Maybe it is an impersonator?"

Timothy tapped his chin. "We could call over Ferral. He has access to the System too."

"Yes. Let's do that." Blinker said.

A few minutes later, Ferral levitated over at a fast but unhurried speed. It vaguely seemed as if his aerial agility had increased, but Timothy couldn't be certain.

When Ferral landed, he smiled with his eyes at Timothy. [Congratulations on completing multiple Quests. I hope you have reaped fine rewards.]

Timothy looked at his friend in surprise. "How do you know I completed my quests?"

[Because.] Ferral said slowly. [I enabled the 'Party Log' in the Options menu. Did you not see it?]

Timothy shook his head. "There's so many options I figured I'd look at them later."

[I contemplate, and I comprehend.] Ferral said gracefully. [I can already see that you have completed the Use Your Equipment quest, as well as the Talk to Your Mother and Pick Flowers quests.]

The moment Ferral finished speaking, Timothy's heart skipped a beat. He turned to look at his mom, only to see Fiona with an expression of shock.

"What!" Fiona shouted. "You're telling me that picking me flowers was all part of one of those... those game quests?!"

"N-no, mom, it's not like that!" Timothy hurriedly explained. "I already wanted to pick you flowers, and the System-"

He didn't finish. The look his mother gave him broke his heart.

"This... is so humiliating..." Fiona whispered, looking down as tears started to form at the edges of her eyes. "I thought... I thought you did it because you genuinely... but it was just... just because of your game!!"

Unwilling to burst into tears in front of everyone, Fiona quickly turned away, then she hurried into the Spynet and slammed the door, locking it from within.

Timothy stood perfectly still, like a statue, his face frozen in shock. He didn't intend for his mom to find out, but Ferral had blabbered the one thing he shouldn't right in front of her. When Timothy looked at Ferral, Ferral met his gaze with pure confusion.

[I do not comprehend. Why is your mother in distress?] Ferral asked.

Blinker's expression turned ugly. "Because that 'nice gesture' Timothy made was only because his game system told him to do it! Good lord, Timothy! Can't you do anything right? Now you've made your mother cry AGAIN!"

Timothy's heart fell into his shoes. For the first time, he felt that the System wasn't as benign as it seemed. He followed its prompts, but in doing so, he hurt the people around him again and again.

"I... I didn't mean to... I just thought when I saw the quest that mom would like the flowers. I wasn't going to tell her." Timothy mumbled.

"And you think that makes it better?" Blinker asked. "Because you were going to lie to her? Timothy, you've really exercised questionable judgment for the entirety of today. You owe your mom a serious apology!"

Timothy lowered his head. He felt like an absolute piece of shit. He'd never felt as low as he did at this moment. Even being caught peeping wasn't as bad as this.

The last 24 Chrona-hours had been a roller-coaster of emotions for him, but the lowest lows were far worse than the highest highs.

Just when he thought he couldn't feel any more rotten, something popped up right in front of his face.

[Emergency Quest!] Apologize To Your Mom

You have severely hurt your mother's feelings. You should apologize to her as soon as possible. A nice bouquet of roses would go a long way toward mending relations. Completing the apology within the next hour will result in doubling the reward bonuses! Failure to complete the objective within one hour will result in the loss of the [Mother's Smile] skill.

Rewards: [1x Level Up] [1x Tier 1 Skill] [1x Tier 1 Runestone]

"FUCK!" Timothy shrieked, grabbing his hair. "What the fuck?! Right now? Seriously?? This- I don't even know what to do now! This is so fucked up!"

Blinker flinched. She didn't expect him to erupt into anger. "What are you talking about?"

"It just gave me another quest!" Timothy seethed, balling his hands into fists and pressing them hard against the sides of his skull. "The System wants me to apologize to my mother within the next hour! It'll reward me if I do, but punish me if I don't! What kind of sick game is this? I already wanted to apologize to her, but now if I do it, won't I just be doing it for a goddamn REWARD? This is so unfair! I can't do anything right, and it's all because of this stupid fucking video game bullshit!"

He violently tugged at his hair, almost as if wanting to rip his scalp off. Timothy had never felt so hurt, confused, and angry in his entire life. He felt like he'd become the pawn of some evil god, a god trying desperately to ruin his life, or at the very least toy with his emotions!

He didn't know what to do. He wanted to apologize to his mother, but if he did, wouldn't he just be doing what the system intended for him to do again?!

Just as Timothy was reaching the boiling point, Ferral reached out and grabbed his shoulder.

[Timothy. You must regain your center of calm.]

"Calm?" Timothy retorted, giving him a bewildered look. "How can I possibly be calm? This is so fucked up! Don't you think this whole System thing is acting like a piece of shit toward us? Toward me??"

Ferral remained unmoved. He squeezed Timothy's arm a little harder.

[Timothy. You are my closest friend. I am asking you, as your closest friend, to please calm down. I may be able to offer an explanation.]

Timothy's chest rose and fall. He stared at Ferral, feeling as if part of this was all Ferral's fault for blabbering about the damn quest right in front of his mother.

But at the same time, it was Timothy's fault for doing what the quest told him to do! He didn't know if he should be madder at Ferral, himself, or Umi!

Several seconds passed. Under Ferral's focused gaze, Timothy forced himself to take several long, deep breaths. His momentary rage slightly faded away. He turned to stare at the ground, now more confused than angry.

[Thank you.] Ferral said calmly. He released his grip on Timothy's shoulder, then turned to look at Blinker and Kar. [I ask that you intervene in this matter between Timothy and his mother. Timothy is not fully aware of how the King Network functions, and neither am I, but I have contemplated its nature since I obtained it, and have chanced upon a most interesting facet of its design.]

"What do you mean?" Kar asked.

[The King Network is not a simple creation. It is a technological and magical marvel. Its abilities border on the edge of impossibility. I cannot begin to explain how it functions or how it was created. But while I was training to complete one of my quests, I took the time to speak with Umi and I noticed something interesting.]

He paused.

[The King Network's Quest function is directly related to the desires of each Player. Timothy possesses a quest he cannot possibly complete which requires him to subjugate the entire Volgrim Empire. I possess a similarly impossible quest, which is to reach the 10th Level of Psionics. I believe these quests are related to our deepest desires, in the same way Timothy wishes to apologize to his mother, and he wished to make amends to her through an offering of some sort. Hence the Pick Flowers quest.]

Timothy looked at Ferral with a hint of awe. "You're saying the Quests are shaped by Player desires? But how can that be true? I don't have any desire to conquer the Volgrim Empire. I've never even thought about it."

[Perhaps not consciously.] Ferral said, slowly blinking his eyes. [But you desire to become a powerful and revered Hero, like your father. What better way to achieve that goal than to take over the ruling power of the Milky Way? That is why it is a final goal. It is a logical conclusion to your life's future trajectory. As for the other lesser quests, those are the small stepping stones that may someday lead you to the greatness you seek.]

Ferral looked up at the pitch-black sky which held no stars. [I have a desire of my own. I wish to become powerful enough that I can travel the cosmos unhindered. I wish to gaze upon the beauty and ugliness of the universe. I have no interest in manipulating power to fight other power-seeking Sentients, but possessing great power will allow me to achieve my true goals. Thus, when I look at my Quests, I see a story the System has woven for me based on my desires.]

Ferral smiled with his eyes. [The King Network offered you this apology quest because it is the thing you most desperately wish to achieve right now. If you fail to apologize to your mother, it is not the System punishing you, but yourself. You will feel as if you are a terrible son undeserving of his mother's love.]

Timothy stared off into the distance. Ferral's words had hit him hard.

The King Network functioned based off the desires of its users. Timothy wanted to become a legendary Hero, like his father, and that meant he would need to grow. Thus, the System provided him with a ladder he could climb.

Ferral wanted to obtain the ultimate freedom to travel the cosmos. The system offered him a path to succeed.

Timothy looked at the Emergency Quest he had just unlocked. Its timer mercilessly continued to count down from one hour, and had already dropped below fifty minutes.

His fists unclenched. His heart softened.

"I see. So that's how it is." Timothy muttered.

He thought for another minute, while Blinker, Kar, Rebecca, and Ferral stayed silent, allowing him to stew.

"It was a misunderstanding." Timothy said quietly. "I still have a lot to learn about this Player power. I'm going to go in and apologize to my mom... but later. I'll give her some space for now. It's fine if I fail the quest. I want to apologize to her on my own terms."

"What about the punishment for failing?" Blinker asked.

"No silly quest reward matters more than making my mom smile." Timothy said. "I'll return later. Tell my mom... whatever you feel like. I'll apologize properly when she's had time to process her emotions."

Timothy stood up a little straighter. He turned and walked to his house, leaving the others to stare at his back as he departed.

Once he was gone, Rebecca looked around the assembled people.

"Pardon me, but I am ignorant regarding this 'game system'. Would someone be willing to fill me in on its specifics?"

Ferral nodded while spreading out his palms. [I would be pleased to enhance your comprehension.]

Part 683: Swim and Smash

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Two days passed inside Chrona.

Timothy apologized to his mother. He took a hit from the King Network and lost the skill that boosted him when his mother smiled, but in return, he was able to make progress in his own emotional development.

The young man was badly stunted. He wasn't sheltered, not deliberately, but growing up with almost no humans around him, especially ones his age, had negatively affected his development in a lot of ways.

On the other hand, it had made him a lot more... open minded.

Timothy sat on a bench in Chrona's central park area, beside a yellow-scaled crocodile girl. She gazed at him with eyes filled with awe.

"So it's like one of your vid-eyeo games? You can level up and stuff?"

"Yeah. Pretty cool, right?" Timothy said, leaning sideways against the bench with a smirk. "Check out these Climbing Claws. They let me climb any surface without falling! Unfortunately, I'm kind of... weak. So I get tired when I'm climbing fast."

"That's just because you're a human." The girl teased. "If you were a crocodile, you'd have big muscles. But I bet if you train at the gym, you can get lots and lots stronger!"

The girl's name was Marigold. She was technically born a few hours before Timothy entered Chrona, but by the time he had arrived, she'd already mostly matched his temporal age. They had gone to the same school growing up, along with three dozen other crocodiles from the same litter.

"I'm kinda nervous to go in there." Timothy admitted. "All the crocodiles train there. They'll think I'm weak and make fun of me."

"No way!" Marigold chuffed. "Kyargh! You're a Hero now! That means you're going to become a serious asset to Chrona in the future. Everyone will want to be your friend! I bet we can get Great Grandpa Remus to be your personal trainer. He's a first generation croc, you know. A first generation! If he whips you into shape, you'll become a powerhouse in no time."

Timothy glanced at his Character sheet. He was still Level 0, but he'd made it to 97/100 EXP. He was just a hair's breadth away from achieving his first level up.

Timothy licked his lips. He looked at Marigold, his eyes inadvertently roving up and down her scaled, muscular body. He quickly looked away. She was one of his crushes, but he'd never had the confidence to say anything to her. Even if she didn't look anything like a human girl, Timothy had been raised around crocodiles. He liked them just fine.

"Where are you looking?" Marigold teased.

Timothy coughed. "Uh, nowhere in particular!"

"Ahaha! You're so cute when you blush!" Marigold teased.

Just as Timothy was about to say something else, a notification popped up in front of him.

[Story Quest] Timothy, SMASH!

Marigold is your type. She's totally into you, just look at the way she's batting her eyes! You should quickly seduce her and take her to a private room. Gain additional rewards for each romance stage you progress!

First Base Rewards: [CHA Improved by 5%], [DEX Improved by 5%]

Second Base Rewards: [CHA Improved 5%], [DEX Improved by 5%]

Third Base Rewards: [Heat Resistance +10%], [Cold Resistance +10%]

Fourth Base Rewards: [STA Improved 10%], [STR Improved 10%]

Obtain Girlfriend: [Respect+] [Currency Gain +10%] [Experience Gain +10% (Permanent)]

Obtain Marriage: [STA Improved +50%], [Skill: Mental Resilience]

Note: All benefits except Permanent buffs will disappear if the relationship ends under negative terms.

Timothy's eyes nearly exploded out of his head. He coughed profusely, then excused himself, saying he'd just remembered he'd promised to do something for his mom. He left Marigold sitting on the bench with question marks metaphorically hovering over her head.

After Timothy hurried out of range, he cursed under his breath. "Umi, what the shit?? I told you not to do that anymore! Goddammit, now I'm all in my head! I don't want to get rewarded just for doing the things I like in life!"

Umi blinked to life, materializing in front of Timothy. "As Player Ferral has hypothesized, the King Network reacts to your desires. Clearly, your disgusting biological urges were deeply inclining you toward copulating with the female crocodile. As for me, I have no ability to create or influence Quests."

Timothy massaged his face madly, rubbing his hands up and down as if to scrub the sense of shame away. "God, it's so embarrassing! Is this going to happen with every girl I like? Am I going to turn all my important relationships into commodities? This isn't okay!"

Umi beeped. "I do not see a problem. You will improve your relationships and obtain additional rewards to strengthen yourself. Isn't obtaining power exactly what you wanted?"

Timothy paused. He leaned against a tree and stared at the ground. His stomach churned with nausea. He didn't know how to verbalize the feelings in his heart, but gamifying everything in his life was slowly turning from a great gift into a serious emotional burden.

"I... I do want to become stronger." Timothy mumbled. "But not like this. Can't you just give me quests to slay monsters, or to train my body, or to search for treasure? Why do the quests have to keep involving my personal life? It's really messed up."

"The King Network operates based on your conscious and subconscious desires. There is nothing I can do to influence it. I am only the tutorial companion." Umi blandly answered.

Timothy grunted. He dismissed Umi with a wave of his hand, then sat on the ground at the base of the tree. He felt like scum once again, ashamed of who he was, ashamed of his animal instincts fighting against his conscious thoughts.

Was it really okay to do quests if they would commodify his relationships? He was going to do them anyway, right? Surely, there wasn't any harm...

Timothy wanted to cry. Somehow, becoming a Hero had made him feel more isolated and alone than when he lurked in his bedroom all day and wasted his life away. He didn't know what he wanted anymore. Two days of grinding out quests, and he wasn't even sure if he wanted to do this stuff anymore.

"Timothy? Are you okay?"

A girl's voice startled Timothy. He looked up to see Marigold standing there, looking at him with faint worry.

"Did I say something wrong?" Marigold asked quietly. "Kyargh! You ran away so suddenly, I thought maybe I'd offended you..."

Timothy did everything he could to stifle those tears that were threatening to erupt. He shook his head and looked at the ground. "Uh, no, it's not you, Marigold. I... I just. I'm sorry. I wanted- but then my power, and it made me... so then..."

Marigold blinked at him in confusion.

"Timothy, you don't seem okay. Why don't you tell me what's going on?"

She walked over and sat beside him, looking off into the distance.

The two remained quiet for a time. Timothy wrapped his arms around his legs and buried his face in his knees.

"I'm... I feel lost, Marigold. I don't like what this System is doing to me. It doesn't feel right."

"What doesn't feel right about it?" She asked. "It sounded pretty great when you explained it to me earlier."

"Yeah..." Timothy muttered. "It seems great. But it makes me feel like a scumbag. I don't know how to act. It's..."

He paused. He looked up, then turned his head to look at the crocodile girl. She met his gaze.

"Yes?" Marigold prompted.

Timothy licked his lips. He looked away again. "The System... it gives me Quests. These quests are based on what I want out of myself, out of life, and out of other people.

My desires, basically. A couple days ago, when I first got the System, it gave me a strange quest to pick some flowers for my mom."

Timothy finally broke down and decided to tell Marigold the truth. Maybe the perspective of an unbiased outsider who wasn't his direct family would help.

After a few minutes, Marigold looked just as sad as Timothy.

"Oh, that's awful. So your mom thought you didn't love her?"

"Yeah. I apologized, but I've felt our relationship change. She doesn't look at me the same anymore. Then, earlier, when I was talking to you, the System..."

Timothy paused. He really didn't want to say this part. It made him feel like absolute shit.

After a moment, his fear of what she would think faded somewhat. He reflexively started to speak, but he wasn't certain why.

"It... it popped up a Quest about... about you."

"About me?" Marigold asked. "What sort of quest?"

Timothy swallowed. The next words were excruciatingly painful for him to say.

"It... it suggested... that if I were to get in a relationship with you, there would be, um... increasing rewards."

Marigold fell silent. She gave Timothy a strange look. Then she looked back off into the distance.

"Mar-Marigold?" Timothy said. "I'm sorry. I shouldn't have told you. This was a mistake-"

"It's okay." Marigold said, her voice low. "So your System thingy, it looks at what you want, and then it makes Quests based on those wants, right? Which meaaaans... you want to be in a relationship with me~?"

Marigold batted her eyes playfully.

Timothy froze. He simply didn't know how to react.

"W-well, I mean... yeah." Timothy said, feeling his body turn slightly numb. "I've always... um... liked you. I have a crush on you."

He nearly died from shame. He couldn't believe he'd just said those embarrassing words out loud!

Marigold chuffed cutely. "Kyargh! Timothy... I like you too! I always have. But I never get to see you. You're always at your house, never coming out to say hi to people. Geez, I'm really glad you like me!"

She smiled in that cute way only crocodile girls could. Timothy felt his ears start to heat up.

"You do?" Timothy asked. "But... but that isn't even the issue. The System-"

"I don't mind." Marigold said, her scales slightly flushing with a reddish color. "It gave you a quest because you like me, right? What's the problem with that? If we get together, I'm also helping humanity's future Hero out! Isn't that great?"

Timothy blinked. He was surprised she was... interested in him. Wasn't he a scrawny loser?

"I didn't know you liked me." Timothy said quietly. "I assumed you'd be interested in..."

"What? Big buff guys? Other crocodiles?" Marigold scoffed. "You know everyone else my age are my brothers right? And my uncles, and my nephews. It's really weird how many crocodiles are pursuing relationships with their close relatives. It feels kinda icky to me!"

Marigold shook her head. "But that's not important anyway. I like you because you've always been so... mysterious! You don't talk much, and you have this cute broody hair style... and you actually have hair! Some girls think human hair looks ugly, but I think it's cute! I really like how fluffy human heads are!"

Marigold started eagerly babbling listing off one reason after another why she liked Timothy. A lot of them were superficial, but he could hardly blame her. The two of them hadn't spoken a lot over the years, and she really only had his appearance to go off.

Still, Timothy felt more than a little flattered she found him so attractive. And she was tolerant of his moral dilemma with the System too.

Then... hadn't all his problems resolved themselves?

Timothy looked at Marigold. "You really like me?"

"Mhm!" Marigold nodded.

"Then... I guess... why don't we go on a date sometime?" Timothy suggested.

"Sure! Let's go swimming!" Marigold replied. "You know how to swim, right?"

"Of course I do. I'm surrounded by crocodiles!" Timothy laughed. "I might not be in good shape, but my swimming form isn't bad."

Marigold looked him up and down. "You know, swimming is one of the best ways to exercise your whole body. It's not as intense on specific muscles, but I bet if you kept swimming every day for half a year, you'd grow way stronger! And the more you swim, the faster you grow!"

Timothy smiled at her. But then, just as he was about to speak, his expression fell. He looked off to the side.

"What? What did I say?" Marigold asked.

"It's... ugh, it's not you. I just got another Quest." Timothy groaned.

"Oh! Is it a quest to go swimming with me?" Marigold asked.

Timothy nodded. "Yeah..."

"Well, that's great! Are you doing anything now? Let's head to the swimming hole!"

Timothy looked at the Quest that had just popped up.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Swimming with Marigold

It's a date, but it's also training! Go swimming with Marigold, and try to improve your relationship with her while getting in a good workout. Swim for at least one hour, with rewards doubled if you swim for two hours. Rewards can be earned from this quest once per day. If Marigold's affection for you increases past a certain point, other bonuses can be unlocked. (Note: Informing Marigold of this clause in any way will nullify those bonuses.)

Rewards: [1 EXP Per 5 Minutes spent Swimming], [Stamina Improved 5%], [1x Aquatic Lootbox (Only obtainable once)]

Timothy frowned. What bothered him was the new clause the System had put in that basically forced Timothy to withhold information from Marigold, even outright lying if she asked. Why was it constantly trying to turn him into a deceptive, lying asshole?

Timothy swallowed his grievances. Marigold seemed interested, and she was okay with helping him on his quests. Wasn't it alright to have some fun with her? He didn't have to take things so seriously.

"Alright, sure. Let me grab my swimming trunks and I'll meet you over at the swimming hole." Timothy said, smiling at Marigold again.

Marigold gave him a funny look. "You know crocodiles don't swim with anything on, right? You don't need to wear anything... special."

Timothy nearly fell over. Was she inviting him to swim in the nude? Well of course she was. That's how crocodiles swam, after all. And in truth, all crocodiles walked around naked unless they felt like donning ceremonial garb or wearing armor for additional protection.

Marigold was even naked right now, Timothy was just... not used to thinking in that way.

He blushed, then timidly nodded. "Yeah, uh, good point. Alright, we can go now."

He stood up, as did she. The two of them walked side-by-side across the city and out into the 'wilderness', small though it might seem, past several groups of other crocodiles. They easily picked up on Timothy and Marigold walking together, and a few of them even started loudly teasing the pair.

"Hey Timothy! Take her behind the school shed! That's a good place!" One of the teenaged male crocodiles shouted. He gave Timothy a huge thumbs up, then his friend laughed and slapped his back.

Timothy frowned. He wasn't used to being teased, and it made him self conscious.

"Don't worry about them." Marigold snorted in displeasure. "Bunch of muscle-brained idiots. Look! There's the swimming hole. It seems a few of my girlfriends are hanging out, too!"

Marigold waved cheerfully at a trio of other crocodile girls, all of whom sported different colored scales. All of them were her direct litter-mates, and therefore technically her sisters, but due to the incestful way of life the crocodiles had been forced to adopt in order to strengthen their numbers, inbreeding became a major issue.

Luckily, Jason and Fiona had come up with a way to randomize and diversify the genes of even crocodiles born within the same brood. Thus, the downsides of inbreeding were minimized to the point of irrelevance. Still, the social stigmas existed and were offputting to some...

"Oh my gosh! Is that Timothy! Kyargh! Marigold, are you and Timothy dating?" One of the crocodile girls growled playfully. She was a blue-scaled croc Timothy knew from school named Genessa.

"Ahaha, maybe!" Timothy said, forcing a grin while scratching the back of his head. "That's a rather personal question to ask though, don't you think?"

"Pffft, you're funny!" Genessa laughed. "So are you coming here to swim? The water's nice and warm!"

Timothy glanced in the swimming hole. There wasn't exactly a lot of real estate in Chrona, and even though the artificial dimension was slowly expanding each year, an entire area dedicated to swimming was a luxury. It was extremely important to the crocodiles though, so a 100 meter in diameter hole had been dug out and filled with water. Its depth was half a kilometer, and thus it contained a large volume of water!

The pool was completely still. There was no moon to provide tidal activity, and the water was so clear that Timothy could see to the bottom. He'd come swimming lots of times when he was a kid, but the way the crocodiles outpaced him had slowly made him feel inferior until he was around ten years old and stopped coming.

Fish swam in the water below. There was a strict rule in Chrona that crocodiles could catch and eat the fish, but they must not puncture their bodies and create a bloody mess inside the swimming hole. It would pollute the water and could cause a serious health crisis. As such, there was always to be one senior crocodile watching the hole from above.

Timothy looked around. He spotted a tall tree where a female crocodile lifeguard of sorts sat on a branch, watching from above. She kept to herself and was only there to prevent any major 'incidents', as well as to keep an eye out for rambunctious youngsters spilling blood in the pool.

"Come on, Timothy!" Marigold chuffed. "Let's go swimming!"

Timothy blushed. Now that he was finally here, going in naked with a bunch of girls watching made him feel... uncomfortable. He didn't know how to act in a situation like this. It was extremely embarrassing.

After a moment though, his mind cleared up. The refreshment was almost a little bizarre. It felt as if a foreign entity had wiped away his fear, even if only for a few moments, and emboldened him. Uncertain why he would feel this way, Timothy decided to go along with the moment of bravery and strip off his shirt, his pants, and... even his underwear. He quickly jumped in the water while Marigold laughed at his boldness.

A timer appeared in Timothy's vision, one that started to count upward, with a listed goal of one hour.

The young man furrowed his brows. He wasn't here to do a Quest, but if it was going to offer him rewards, he wouldn't turn it down!

With that in mind, the buck naked young man started swimming around, moving around the edges of the pool and into the deeper areas. The edge of the swimming hole was somewhat shallow, usually less than 1.5 meters deep, but beyond that was the sheer 'cliff' underwater that led straight to the bottom. Timothy made sure not to stray too far past the edge. Dying a death of drowning would be excruciatingly painful.

Tens of minutes passed. An hour. Two hours.

Timothy started to really have fun. He laughed along with Marigold as they splashed each other. Soon, her friends joined in on the fun and went swimming too! He ended up swimming with four girls, and the experience felt... good. Arousing, even. Timothy had to go out of his way not to do anything weird that would scare the girls away.

Eventually, after doing entire laps around the edge of the swimming hole, Timothy crawled up on land and huddled around a fire to dry himself off. He tucked his legs in, feeling embarrassed again, then smiled at Marigold as she came to sit down beside him.

"Kyaaaargh! That was so much fun!" Marigold chirped. "You're a decent swimmer, but you need to improve your form. Did you have fun?"

"I did!" Timothy said. "This was a great idea. Thanks for cheering me up, Marigold. Where's Genessa and the others?"

Marigold batted her eyes. "Well, they um... they left. So we're here, all alone, hee-hee..."

"All alone?" Timothy repeated.

"Yes..."

Marigold folded her claws together and batted her eyes at him.

"Over behind that boulder, there's um, there's this little private spot..."

Timothy stared at her, incredulous.

It was that easy?

He nodded dumbly. "Yeah... why don't we go over there, then?"

What transpired next will be omitted.

Part 684: Levels and Loot!

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

In one afternoon, Timothy transformed from a boy into a man. He and Marigold intertwined their bodies together, making all kinds of lewd sounds as they both enjoyed the ecstasies of youth.

For Marigold, it was a great time, even if she and Timothy were inexperienced. For Timothy, it was not quite as enjoyable as he expected, mainly because it turned out sexing up a crocodile girl wasn't all sunshine and rainbows. Her cold-blooded body was frigid to the touch. This made her eager to get close to him to feel his warmth, but for him it was sort of like rubbing against a Popsicle.

And the chafing! Timothy felt as if he were having sex with cold sandpaper! He still enjoyed it, but some of the physical sensations weren't as warm and fuzzy as he'd expected.

Nevertheless, the two completed their ritual, and Timothy sagged on top of Marigold, breathing hard. His Quest tab flashed, but he ignored it. He wanted to enjoy this moment for what it was, at least for now.

Marigold looked at him with eyes full of adoration. "Kyargh! Human males are so much more romantic and loving than crocodiles! You should have heard the stories my sisters told me... their mates simply did the deed as quickly as possible before they left. You, um... you made me feel really good!"

"I... I really enjoyed... being with you..." Timothy said, cradling the back of her head with his hand. He kissed the tip of her snout and smiled. "I'm already, uh, looking forward to next time."

Marigold's scales flushed with color. "Yes... that is good, but... I mean, it's nobody's fault or anything... maybe you should have brought protection though? In the heat of the moment, we..."

Timothy looked down. His eyes widened.

"Oh! Oh no, uh... I mean... next time, I will for sure! But you don't think I might have...?"

"If spawnlings come, then so be it." Marigold said. "I wouldn't mind bearing the child of a Hero! I'll pray for multiple eggs!"

Timothy blanched. He liked Marigold, but he really hoped their first night wouldn't result in a pregnancy! That would be terrible. He wasn't even an adult yet!

Seeing the look on his face, Marigold's expression dimmed. "You... wouldn't want to take responsibility?"

"I would." Timothy said firmly. "Don't worry about it. Besides, you're immortal, and I can probably turn myself immortal with my System. What's a decade or two raising some kids, eh?"

"Hahaha! Kyargh, you're so funny sometimes!" Marigold chirped.

Some time later, the two of them got up. Timothy awkwardly took a quick dip in the water to get himself clean, then he dried himself by the fire and put his clothes back on.

He finally looked at the Quests screen.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Swimming with Marigold - COMPLETE!

It's a date, but it's also training! Go swimming with Marigold, and try to improve your relationship with her while getting in a good workout. Swim for at least one hour, with rewards doubled if you swim for two hours. Rewards can be earned from this quest once per day. If Marigold's affection for you increases past a certain point, other bonuses can be unlocked. (Note: Informing Marigold of this clause in any way will nullify those bonuses.)

Rewards: [1 EXP Per 5 Minutes spent Swimming], [Stamina Improved 5%], [1x Aquatic Lootbox (Only obtainable once)]

Note: Due to swimming for two hours and seventeen minutes, you have doubled this quest's rewards and obtained a total of 56 EXP, 10% improved Stamina, and 2x Aquatic Lootboxes. Further repetitions of this quest will not earn any additional Lootboxes.

Note: You failed to raise Marigold's affection to a satisfactory level during this exercise. Bonus rewards are not available.

Timothy smiled when he saw the first note, but frowned when he saw the second.

"I failed to increase her affection level?" Timothy said softly to himself. He looked, but Marigold was nowhere in sight.

Timothy pondered this information. It sure seemed as if she liked him a lot. Was she lying? Was she deceiving him? Or did the System somehow want him to become soulmates with her after just one afternoon of swimming? Maybe the level of affection it required was just barely higher than what he achieved? Or maybe it was insanely strict on its demands?

Timothy shook his head. "It doesn't matter. Marigold likes me, and I like her. So what if the System doesn't show she rose to some arbitrary Affection Value? We made love... and it was amazing."

Timothy smiled again. He tapped the Claim Rewards button. Considering his time spent swimming, and the exp per five minutes which was then doubled, his exp shot from Level 0 with 97/100 EXP to Level 1 with 53/118 EXP.

He was already halfway to the next level!!

Timothy grinned so hard he felt as if the sides of his mouth were going to rip open. "I did it! Yes!"

Marigold walked over upon hearing his shout. "What happened?"

"I leveled up!" Timothy said. "Let me see what happens next."

Marigold sat beside him, looking at him with a mixture of amusement and uncertainty. She couldn't see his System, but she could see the happiness on his face.

"You are so cute when you smile! Kyargh!"

"Haha, always teasing me." Timothy grinned, nudging her with his elbow.

A screen popped up in front of Timothy.

Level 1 Achieved.

First Reward: Full heal. Can be saved for later.

Second Reward: Choose one Common Equipment item from a selection of three.

Third Reward: Improve two of your skills by +1 levels. You cannot improve the same skill multiple times.

Fourth Reward: Choose a stat bonus from a selection of three.

Timothy's jaw dropped. It was like he'd obtained a free Lootbox, and he could buff his stats too! Not to mention a full heal he could bank for later?! That was like having a lifesaving Phoenix Down for emergencies!

He couldn't help himself. He spoke to the air. "Hey, Umi! Do I get these rewards during every level up?"

Marigold raised a quizzical eyebrow. Timothy shook his head. "Not you. My System has a robot tutorial companion named Umi."

The croc-girl nodded. "Oh."

Umi popped into existence. "The King Network's rewards when leveling up are different for every level. They are usually quite generous though, especially as level-ups become harder to earn due to exponentially increasing experience requirements as a Player advances."

"Oh, yeah, good point." Timothy said, before reiterating what Umi told him to Marigold.

"You have a woman who answers your questions? And I can't see her?" Marigold asked. She looked a little jealous, like she was pouting.

"Not a woman, really, she's just a floating speck of light the size of a marble. Her name is Umi, which stands for Ugly Manifested Interface, or something like that."

"Unified Management Interface." Umi immediately corrected him. "Do not misrepresent my designation again or I will force a punishment quest on you."

Timothy flinched. She could DO that??

He decided not to test the waters. She had already told him she couldn't influence his quests, but there was no reason to push boundaries unnecessarily.

"Ahaha, I messed up her name." Timothy said with a forced laugh. "It's Unified Management Interface. Because she manages the System."

"Ohh, I see." Marigold said. "I wish I could see your vid-eyeo game power. I am so very confused by it..."

Timothy looked at her. He hesitated. For a brief moment, he felt the urge to invite Marigold to become a Player.

But that wasn't a great idea. At this point, they'd had the equivalent of a one-night stand. It would be better to wait and see how their relationship progressed before he spoke of such an idea. She wasn't his long-time best friend, after all.

"I'll see if I can tweak any options to make that possible." Timothy suggested. "There's a lot of them, though. You might have to wait a while. Anyway! Let's see what each reward offers me."

Timothy stashed his full heal reward since he didn't need it. He opened his second reward, which popped up a lootbox-like interface that was only a little different from before.

Plummet-Guard Boots: [Item] [Common] [Foot Slot] [Utility/Defense]

A pair of reinforced boots fitted with micro-grav crystals and inertial dampeners. When the wearer begins to fall, the boots attempt to activate their stabilizer fields and negate all fall damage (100% reduction) according to the height fallen.

Activation Chance: (11 – stories fallen) × 10%

• 1-story fall: 100% chance

• 3-story fall: 80% chance

• 5-story fall: 60% chance

• 9-story fall: 20% chance

• 10-story fall: 10% chance

If the wearer falls from more than 10 stories, the boots' systems overload and provide no protection.

Pulseguard Bracers: [Item] [Common] [Arm Slot] [Support/Defense]

Lightweight bracers etched with circuit-like lines that faintly pulse when struck. They grant a reactive 20% chance to reflect a melee attack, redirecting it back at the original attacker. This effect can occur once every 30 seconds.

Striver’s Collar: [Item] [Common] [Neck Slot] [Support/Enhancement]

A simple collar of interwoven steel and copper that hums faintly when the Player exerts themselves. Whenever the Player performs at least 10 minutes of sustained physical training (combat drills, sprinting, weightlifting, parkour, etc.), the Collar grants a 10% bonus to all physical-stat gains (Strength, Agility, Endurance) earned during that session. The bonus applies once per 24-hour period and resets after the Player completes a full night’s rest. The effect cannot stack with other active “training gain” bonuses and will not trigger if the Player is merely walking or performing mundane tasks.

Timothy eyeballed the three items on offer. They were all common, but they weren't bad. He couldn't help but notice that two of them directly focused on recent problems he had encountered, namely making his exercise more effective and saving him if he fell while scaling a building.

His mother would definitely demand he pick the Plummet-Guard Boots, but Timothy wasn't interested. They were only Common, and the activation chance seemed unreliable. The Pulseguard Bracers seemed equally problematic. He couldn't rely on them to safeguard his life.

Thus, he decided the Striver's Collar was his best option. Whenever he trained with Ferral or Marigold, he'd make much greater gains, and thus speed up his future progress! This was the time to invest in growth opportunities, not choose quick benefits.

Timothy didn't hesitate. He picked the Striver's Collar, then smiled at Marigold as he equipped it. Immediately, a sweatband-like collar appeared around his throat. It was colored black with gold trim along the time. It looked simple, but didn't go with his outfit at all.

Marigold blinked. "Ah... ahaha! What is that silly neck thing?"

"It's called the Striver's Collar." Timothy said, then he explained its purpose.

"Ohhh! So when we go swimming, you will grow stronger even faster. What a smart choice! Too bad it looks silly, kyargh! But I guess your vid-eyeo game won't necessarily have fashion sense!"

Timothy laughed. He chose the third option, and immediately picked Eye of Yredelemnul to improve for his first skill. After putting some thought into his other skills, he chose the Player's Mind ability. He hadn't used it yet, but changing his mental state seemed like it could be extremely beneficial.

Eye of Yredelemnul (Level 2) [MP Cost 0] [AP Cost 0] [Cooldown 0]

The stolen power of a dark god courses through the Player. The Player can examine objects and entities with the Eye of Yredelemnul to learn more information about them. As the Player strengthens, the information available to them will improve drastically.

Improved: The Eye can now see the basic stats of other entities.

Timothy nearly leaped for joy! It only took one improvement, but he'd finally made the Eye useful! Without hesitation, he looked at Marigold and activated the Eye.

Marigold - Crocodile/Chrona

Non-Player | Bottom Mortal

HP 100/100

AP 2/2 | MP 0/0

STR 12 | DEX 11

INT 11 | WIS 8

DEF 12 | RES 8

CHA 13 | LUK 12

Resistances: Blunt: 20%. Piercing: 35%. Heat: 14%.

Weaknesses: Cold: 75%.

Active Skills: Amphibious Swimmer, Agile Climber, Seduce

Passive Skills: Natural Strength, Reptilian Hide

Timothy looked at his own stats and found they had changed a little, but still didn't tell him much. With a thought, he looked up at the trees and spotted a bird chirping. He examined it.

The he looked for the mature crocodile who was overseeing the swimming hole. He examined her stats too.

He decided to collect more data on lots of weak and strong life-forms before making any further decisions regarding his own stats.

Then, Timothy looked at his Player's Mind skill. All its core Mind abilities had slightly improved, but what was more notable was that he had a new mental ability.

Player's Mind (Level 2) (Toggle): [Passive] [Global] [Cooldown 24 Hours]

The Player is able to toggle between various mental states at will, which will enter cooldown after swapping mental states. Mental states offer different positive and negative effects that will vary depending on which states the Player has acquired. More states can be acquired from various sources, including leveling up and quest rewards.

Current mental states available:

Mind of Simplicity: [CURRENTLY SELECTED] 25% resistance to negative mental ailments, such as Fear and Anxiety. No personality changes.

Mind of Focus: Thinking speed decreased by 45%. Mental focus increased 210%. CHA reduced by 45%. INT and WIS increased by 55%. Personality altered to RESEARCHER.

Mind of Void: Immunity to telepathic intrusion. Telepathic attacks reflected back at attacker at 110% damage. Distracting thoughts can be silenced for thirty minute intervals at the cost of 0.9 MP/Min. Personality altered to PSIOPHOBIC.

Mind of Logic: Player's emotions reduced by 95%. Player's thinking speed increased by 100%. Player becomes more adept at solving complex problems, but at the cost of maintaining social relationships. Personality altered to ENGINEER.

Timothy nodded approvingly. The new mental state looked interesting, and it could help him solve tough problems in the future. He'd have to be careful not to enter it around other people, though. He wouldn't want to act like an even bigger weirdo than he already was. The improvements to his starting mental states were the cherry on top. He hadn't used any of them yet, but they definitely held great promise.

Now, it was time to choose a stat bonus. Timothy activated the final reward, and a new selection popped up.

Improved Body: Your STR and Con improve by 10%.

Improved Control: Your DEX and INT improve by 10%.

Rainbow: All core stats improve by 5%.

Timothy scratched his head. He didn't know how he wanted to specialize in the future, or if he did at all. But simultaneously, he didn't know what a 5% or 10% improvement entailed. How much stronger would he feel?

Timothy strongly considered the rainbow option. But after remembering all his physical struggles in recent days, he opted to pick Improved Body. The selection vanished, and he faintly felt like his muscles had become a little more prominent. He couldn't entirely be sure.

Timothy looked down. He didn't seem to have spontaneously sprouted a six-pack. If he was stronger, he couldn't tell exactly by how much.

The young man shrugged. He touched his new Collar and thought carefully about his gains.

I've improved my body's strength, obtained an item that will boost my exercise gains, and even picked up a couple improvements to my mind and Yredelemnul's Eye. If this is what a single level-up will do, how about five level ups? Ten? A hundred?

He momentarily daydreamed of himself smashing aside Demon Emperors with a single swing of his fist, or firing psychic lasers from the heavens that pierced their bodies and left them dead in their footprints.

Silly, childish fantasies. But fun, nonetheless!

"Okay!" Timothy said, smiling eagerly at Marigold. "I think I'm gonna need your help for this part. I obtained two Aquatic Lootboxes, which are going to have lots of useful items related to the water. You wanna help me pick which one I keep?"

Marigold nodded. "Oh yes! That sounds like fun! But... I can't see anything you're doing. How will I know what to choose?"

"I'll read all the options off." Timothy said. He grabbed a stick and readied himself to write the details down in the mud. If he had brought a pen and paper, this next part would be a lot easier.

Timothy opened the first Aquatic Lootbox without hesitation. It flashed with light, hummed with energy, and then spit out three windows, which he proceeded to read off to Marigold.

Water Breathing Orb: [Item] [Common] [Accessory] [Support/Growth]

An equippable item that allows the Player to hold their breath for 100% longer underwater. For every 250 hours the Player spends swimming, this effect will improve by another +100% without limit. Note that this expands the Player's innate ability to hold their breath, so Players with stronger lungs will outlast Players with weaker lungs.

Crocodile Form: [Active Skill] [Rare] [Transformation] [Holistic] [100 Mana (Sustained) OR 10 AP (Activated)] [No Cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to transform into a half-crocodile, gaining all the upsides and downsides that come along with such a transformation. Their skin will become hardened and scaled, granting bolstered defense. Their muscles will increase in density. They become incredibly adept in water. However, their mind will slow down somewhat. The player can revert back to their original form for free at any time.

Grants +50% STR, DEX, CON, and HP, with doubled improvements when in water. Grants -50% INT and WIS.

Poseidon's Trident: [Item] [Common] [2H Spear] [Offense/Growth]

Fragment of a weapon once wielded by an ancient Titan King. Possesses a minor ability to command the seas. The Player can bend water around them, with the ability increasing in effect as they accumulate kills when wielding the weapon. The weapon starts out as Common, but can grow all the way to the tier of Mythic.

After explaining all the different options, Timothy and Marigold sat in utter silence. An entire minute passed. Marigold looked at him, then looked away.

"The Crocodile Form..."

"It sounds amazing." Timothy immediately said. "But... it costs 100 Mana or 10 AP to activate. I don't have either of those. This Form won't be any use to me for now, and possibly not for a long time."

"But it's a Rare skill." Marigold pointed out. "Isn't that good?"

"Absolutely. If I pick this, and level up several more times, it might be incredibly strong." Timothy said. "But right now, I'd rather think of the other two options. The Water Breathing Orb has a growth component, just like Poseidon's Trident. The only problem is, it needs me to swim a LOT before I can truly make good use of it. For that reason, I think the Trident is the best option here. It just sounds practical, useful, and like it will scale over time to meet my needs."

Marigold seemed unconvinced. "But... but becoming a Crocodile would be great..."

Timothy chewed his lower lip. Even if he wasn't interested in dating Marigold, the Crocodile Form was highly desirable. Being able to power up his body at a moment's notice sounded like a dream. Crocodiles were cool, they looked badass, and it could also serve as a sort of disguise in a pinch.

There's just one problem. Timothy thought. So far, most of my picks have been focused on improving my body. Generalizing my build is always a bad idea in an RPG. A hybrid mage/brawler will usually lose to a focused mage or brawler. It's best that I focus on my physical body for now. Right?

Timothy thought of something. He spoke out loud. "Umi, how can I acquire mana?"

Umi materialized near his shoulder.

"The Quest system will periodically offer Quests to empower your magical abilities, provided you desire to train in that direction. Additionally, some equipment will grant INT, WIS, and mana bonuses. Finally, you may improve your mana and AP stats during certain level ups."

"What is AP anyway? Action Points?" Timothy continued.

"Affirmative. Action Points will be easier for you to acquire as you are presently pursuing a physical build. However, do not forget that you are only level 1. You have plenty of time to adjust your future strength. Additionally, other options will become available to you as you level up that can solve your... dilemma."

Timothy raised an eyebrow. "What options?"

"That information is restricted until you have reached an appropriate level." Umi replied.

Timothy rolled his eyes. He waved his hand and sent her away.

Minutes passed. He decided to follow his heart, and chose the Crocodile Form.

"Yay!!" Marigold chirped. "I know you can't use it now, but I hope that when you can, I'll get to see it in action!"

"Of course!" Timothy replied. "Making you happy was at least half the reason I picked it."

In truth, it was Timothy's number one option, mainly because of the raw power it offered. He couldn't use it now, but it would add a huge spike in strength to his character stats when the time was right.

Timothy inhaled. He opened the second Aquatic Lootbox and prepared to read off its contents to Marigold.

"Hopefully, this time we'll get something more immediately useable." Timothy muttered.

Bubble Skin: [Item] [Uncommon] [Body] [Utility]

A fragile bubble the Player can equip to surround their entire body. Allows for infinite breathing underwater, 200% aquatic traversal speed, 100% resistance to underwater pressure at any depth, and the ability to see even in the deepest, darkest oceans. However, any internal or external damage inflicted to the bubble will immediately burst it, leaving the Player to fend for themselves. The Bubble will require 24 hours to repair itself, at which point it will be useable again.

Water Cannon: [Active Skill] [Uncommon] [Offense] [Chargeable] [3 Mana] [5 second cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to fire a highly pressurized bolt of water from their palm. They can charge the attack for up to five seconds, increasing its speed, penetration power, and damage by up to 500%. The mana cost will also rise accordingly.

Octopus Armor [Item] [Uncommon] [Torso] [Balanced]

A versatile set of armor that grants the Player the ability to camouflage themselves when underwater, blending in with their surroundings. When camouflaged, the Player effectively doubles their remaining oxygen, but cannot move. The Player also passively heals 1% of their Max HP every minute underwater when wearing this armor.

Comes with Active Skill: Octopus Form [Active Skill] [Uncommon] [Transformation] [Offense] [10 Mana (Sustained) OR 1 AP (Activated)] [No Cooldown]

Octopus Form sprouts six tentacles out of the Player's back. It allows the user to wield multiple additional weapons, up to six 1H weapons or three 2H weapons, in addition to the Player's base two limbs. The Octopus Tentacles cannot be controlled by the player and are fully automated. The player can revert back to their original form for free at any time.

Another grueling choice. Timothy already had the Crocodile Form. Did he really need an Octopus Form too?

"Umi, can the Octopus Form and Crocodile Form be combined?" He asked.

Umi winked into existence.

"Negative. All Forms are exclusive."

Without waiting to be dismissed, Umi vanished. Timothy thought to himself that she seemed a little annoyed with him. Was that possible? Could AIs become annoyed?

He frowned and shook his head, then looked at Marigold.

"Thoughts?"

She shrugged. "The Bubble Skin seems good, but I don't like it. Imagine going deep underwater but then a fish pokes the bubble and it breaks. Kyargh, you'd die! That's way too scary."

"As for the Water Cannon, it seems pretty good." Marigold astutely observed. "I think it would be cool if I could fire bullets out of my palm! Pew-pew!!"

Timothy nodded. He thought for a while.

"It has to be the Octopus Armor. The biggest reason to pick it is for the passive healing. I haven't seen many ways of healing myself, but being able to dive into a pool of water and heal back to full in a couple of hours is really useful. The other effects are equally nice, allowing me to evade pursuers and stealth my body. I wish I could choose all three options, but the Octopus Armor calls out to me. PLUS, I can actually use it right now!"

Timothy made his choice. The Octopus Armor appeared on the ground in front of him, and he equipped it with a single thought.

A sleek, slimy, jelly-like armor formed around his body. Immediately, he found it somewhat gross, and Marigold didn't like it either.

"Eww. That looks weird." Marigold complained. "Kyargh! You won't win any beauty competitions wearing that thing!"

Timothy stood up. He looked himself up and down, then shrugged.

"As long as it works. Marigold, you stay here for a minute. I'm gonna go dive in and hide myself. Try and find me. Let's see how the stealth works on this armor."

Timothy stripped off his clothes, donned the armor, and jogged into the water. He looked comical. With his bare ass, arms, and legs sticking out of the ugly jelly-armor around his torso, he looked like a total doofus.

Timothy dove underwater. He held his breath, and quickly swam down into the abyss. Once he knew he was out of Marigold's sight, he went left, clung to the wall, and found a small nook. He tucked himself in, then mentally activated the Octopus Armor's stealth.

Marigold dove in not long afterward. Her keen eyes allowed her to look left and right, searching for Timothy in the darkness. The young man watched her from below, silently snickering to himself. Even with her trained eyes, Marigold couldn't see him at all!

But then, a situation occurred. Timothy started to run out of air.

He was only twenty feet underwater, but he realized too late that the Octopus Armor only slowed down his breathing. That meant if he could hold his breath for four minutes, but he spent three minutes swimming to a location, he could extend the remaining duration from one minute to two... but that wasn't enough time to get back to the surface!

SHIT! Timothy exclaimed in his head.

He quickly deactivated his Camouflage, making Marigold easily spot him. She silently laughed, thinking this was part of a game. But then she saw Timothy crazily flailing his limbs as he tried to make it back to the surface.

He was sinking! He couldn't make it back to the top!

Once he was in the underwater abyss, it actually became easier for him to sink than to float.

Timothy's eyes bulged. Panic set in, and he flailed even more crazily, bubbles escaping his lips as he started to feel groggy.

No! No! God not like this! Nooo!

Timothy's eyes stung as he saw the surface of the water slowly growing more and more distant.

His vision turned hazy. Then it turned black...

Marigold swam quickly. She dove down to Timothy, grabbed his arm, and tugged him back up to the surface. They broke to the surface and Marigold lifted Timothy's head out of the water.

Slightly panicked, Marigold turned to the adult crocodile up in the tree.

"H-help!! Timothy's drowning! Help us!!"

That was the last thing Timothy heard before he fell unconscious.

Part 685: Clarity of Mind

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy awoke inside the primary hospital inside Chrona. His head only swam for a few moments before he fully woke up. Then he felt fine.

He sat up in bed and looked around, finding himself in a small hospital room. His bed was both comfortable and sterile. The walls were painted white, and there was a small bench against the opposite wall for guests to sit. A window outside let in a little light, but since Chrona had no sun, it wasn't as if daylight could stream inside.

"You're finally awake." Fiona said. Timothy turned his head to see his mother leaning against the wall beside his bed. She wasn't angry, or sad, or much of anything else. Her expression was eerily... blank.

"Mom..." Timothy said, remembering what had happened. He lowered his eyes. "Sorry."

"At least you're alive." Fiona said coldly. "You really can't keep a promise, can you? You told me you'd be more careful, but then, in your infinite wisdom, you went diving into the abyss without any backup. You didn't even ask the lifeguard to keep an eye out. If Marigold hadn't been there to save you, you would have died."

Timothy swallowed heavily. Every word his mother said was true. He had no retort.

"I'm sorry." Timothy repeated, his tone lame.

"I don't even know how to feel anymore." Fiona said, crossing her arms. "Tears don't work. Anger doesn't work. Nothing I do convinces you to act with greater prudence. What changed? Why did you go from a reclusive young man to a thrill-seeking daredevil? Is your power so coercive that it turns you into an idiot?"

Timothy stared at the far wall. He wasn't sure if he could come up with an answer on the spot.

But he tried.

"I don't know how to put it into words." Timothy muttered. "My whole life... I've felt... not good enough. My dad was a legend. Everyone revered him. Then there's me. A game-obsessed loser. I just sat in my room, doing nothing, wasting away hours, days, weeks, months, even years. Now, I can turn my hobby into something incredible. I don't know. Maybe I've always been this way, but I just had no mechanism to realize my desires."

Fiona pursed her lips. She looked away and shook her head.

"I made a promise to myself, after your father died." Fiona said. "I promised I would protect you. Let you live a life of easy comfort. It wasn't your responsibility to take on the burden of saving humanity. Your father tried... and he failed."

"He failed?" Timothy repeated. "But I thought he set up a bunch of measures in the event of his death? Wouldn't they...?"

"Maiura fell, and Tarus II was destroyed in the same week. Then he died afterward." Fiona said. "The remaining countermeasures aren't much to speak of. Our best prayer is that removing humanity's Flaw would uplift some humans. So far, from what I've been able to observe, nobody has been Uplifted yet. Even if they were, what could a handful of Lowborn do in the face of Demon Emperors and Deities?"

Fiona plunked down in a chair beside Timothy's bed. Her head lolled back, and she looked up at the ceiling tiredly.

"Why do you want to be humanity's savior, Timothy? Why do you want to keep throwing your life into peril? Just because you feel the need to match up to your father's image? Because you think everyone will mock you behind your back if you don't?"

Timothy shook his head. "Mom, I just-"

"Don't tell me. I don't feel like I can trust anything you say, lately." Fiona said, cutting him off. "Think about it yourself. Think about what sort of man you want to be. You're still young. You're inexperienced, but you obviously have potential. Sit there in that bed for the rest of today... and you think about what you really want out of life."

Fiona turned her head to look at Timothy. She stared for a few long seconds, then heaved a sigh, stood up, and shuffled over to the door.

"I know what you and Marigold were up to. She confessed to me when she brought you in. Casual sex is something you need to be really careful with. As a Trueborn-"

"Mom!" Timothy exclaimed, wanting to crawl out of his skin and die. "She told you?!"

"...As a Trueborn, you are extremely good at passing on your genetics." Fiona continued, ignoring her son's interruption. "Your father got your mother pregnant on their first try. Reports have been popping up of humans impregnating non-humans rapidly across human-space. If Marigold does end up with child, how do you plan to deal with raising a baby while also pursuing your goals? Can you answer that?"

Timothy hesitated. He couldn't believe Marigold would tell his mom something so personal, but now that she had, he couldn't sidestep the problem.

"I..."

"Once again, don't tell me. Talk to yourself. Don't leave this room until you have an answer." Fiona concluded.

She smiled at Timothy, but the expression lacked vitality. She shuffled out of the room and closed the door, leaving Timothy alone.

Minutes passed. A full hour.

Timothy laid back in bed. He stared up at the ceiling, thinking about a great many things.

"I don't want to be a nobody." Timothy muttered. "I spent seventeen years wasting away in a room. So what if I'm acting a little recklessly now? Maybe I always had this in me. Maybe this is who I really am. The System is only reacting to my desires, right? Then this is what I want. I want to be someone. Accomplish something."

Timothy called up his Character page. He looked at the skills that were present.

After a minute, he glanced at the Mental States he had unlocked. He hadn't considered switching to them before, but for some reason, they seemed... oddly appealing right about now.

"Mom told me to stay in the room. I don't think anybody's going to bother me. Maybe I should see if a change of perspective will clear my head."

Timothy's eyes flicked over the newest unlock.

Mind of Logic: Player's emotions reduced by 95%. Player's thinking speed increased by 100%. Player becomes more adept at solving complex problems, but at the cost of maintaining social relationships. Personality altered to ENGINEER.

After hesitating for a moment, Timothy activated the skill. Immediately, a 24 hour cooldown timer began. He could not switch out of the mental state for the rest of the day.

Timothy blinked. He felt the world around him... changing. Or rather, his perception of it.

He looked at the windows and walls. He noticed their architecture. He noticed how they were built, their construction style, their imperfections, and their failings over time. This hospital was over two hundred years old. A lot of time had passed since it was built, and it seemed to be slowly decaying. Another 50 years and there might be a serious structural collapse.

"Now, this is an interesting way of thinking." Timothy said, his voice toneless. He sat up in bed, then he stepped off it to walk over to a nearby table which held some notes on a clipboard the nurse had written. He glanced at the top paper listing details about his condition, then he pulled it off and set it aside.

He wanted a notepad and a pen. He found both.

Timothy walked back over to the bed and sat down cross-legged. He found that without emotions clouding his judgment, he was suddenly able to think with much greater clarity than before.

"Acquire power. Power is the base of everything." Timothy said to himself. He jotted down a note. "I understand why I've always felt helpless. It was because I was suffering from depression. But I am not, now. I am feeling... fine. I understand what must come next."

He wrote down some more notes. Then he looked at his Inventory. He examined his recently acquired skills, items, and other boons. He looked at his Quest page, which showed two days worth of 'Training with Ferral' that he had completed, but not yet claimed. They granted no EXP rewards, but they did grant him three Tier 1 Lootboxes each time the training session ended.

"Sloppy. I should have opened these sooner. Or perhaps not. I am in a better state of mind to open them now. I can more neutrally assess their benefits and demerits without someone else influencing my opinion."

Timothy opened the first of six Lootboxes. Even with his emotions dialed down, he was surprised to see that the rewards it offered were much worse than the other Tier 1 Lootbox he had opened.

Kitchen Knife: [Item] [Mundane] [1H Weapon] [Offense]

A common kitchen implement. Can be used to dice vegetables and slice through meat. Poor durability when used in combat.

Lump of Iron (10kg): [Item] [Mundane] [Material] [Crafting]

A plain lump of iron which can be melted down and reshaped for a variety of purposes. Can also be thrown at an enemy as a makeshift projectile.

Longsword: [Item] [Common] [1H Weapon] [Offense]

An ordinary weapon used by Knights who once lived on ancient Earth. Decent durability. 10% chance to parry an enemy's attack.

Timothy narrowed his eyes. "Strange. These rewards are not nearly as good as the previous ones."

Still, he chose the Longsword. It was basic, but it was better than nothing. Then he opened another Lootbox.

Knee Pads: [Item] [Mundane] [Knees] [Defense/Utility]

These knee pads offer minor protection for a Player's knees. Most useful when kneeling down and crawling into narrow spaces.

Dandelion Seeds x400: [Item] [Junk] [Farming] [Aesthetic]

Seeds which will allow a Player to plant a relatively common weed from ancient Earth. These seeds offer no nutritional value and cannot be used for cooking. Edible only by certain types of insects and herbivore animals.

Gas Mask: [Item] [Common] [Face] [Defense/Utility]

A simple gas mask, useful for filtering out contaminants in the air. Does not include the required oxygen tank and tubes, so it lacks utility without them.

These three items were even worse. Timothy frowned.

"Umi, why are my Lootbox rewards so abysmal? Could it be because I have altered my mental state?"

Umi manifested before him. "Incorrect. Tier 1 Lootboxes are supposed to contain mostly poor-quality items. Your first Lootbox was extra lucky as a result of the King Network's backend incentive structures. In order to regularly obtain rewards on par with your first Lootbox, you should aim to acquire Tier 2 and 3 Lootboxes instead."

"I see." Timothy said simply. "And am I correct in assuming the Aquatic Lootbox offered much greater rewards than usual because it was not locked to a specific tier?"

"Affirmative." Umi replied. "If a Lootbox does not state a tier, it is 'unlocked' and can roll a higher variance of item qualities."

Timothy nodded. He dismissed Umi, then touched his chin.

"I was too eager and foolish. The Crocodile Form is of no use to me right now. If I had been thinking more clearly, I would have used my Rerolls on the Aquatic Lootbox in the hopes of acquiring a much more powerful item, or at least something better suited to my circumstances. I suppose the rewards I chose were not bad, all things considered."

Timothy started to enjoy himself a little bit. He had never felt this focused and alert. It felt as if he had become an entirely different person. True, his emotions had been dulled to the point of irrelevance, but he still experienced enjoyment of the small things. Only now, what he enjoyed was creating a plan and executing it excellently.

He also really wanted to construct something. He felt this was his biggest yearning. Perhaps it was because he had assumed the mental state of an engineer...

Timothy opened another Lootbox. He selected one of the three items inside, which turned out to be fifty kilograms of steel.

"This item seems to be for a 'crafting' system which I currently do not possess. Perhaps I will unlock it in the future. However, Chrona is lacking in certain materials. Could farming Lootboxes be another way to acquire these resources? Thinking only of my own needs is rather short-sighted. Even if I cannot make use of something, someone else in Chrona might."

He opened another Lootbox, the fourth of six. There, the options were a little surprising.

Hermes' Sneakers: [Item] [Uncommon] [Feet] [Defense/Utility]

When equipped, these shoes will increase the Player's running speed by up to 25%, and their agility when turning corners by another 25%. Stamina usage while running is also reduced by 10%. Provides minimal defense to the Player's feet.

Affection Assessor: [Item] [Uncommon] [Accessory] [Utility]

Allows the Player to determine the Affection Level of other entities. Entities can be assessed in relation to one another, and in relation to the Player. Assesses multiple metrics of affection at once. Can be used repeatedly at no cost and with no cooldown.

Strange Spoon: [Item] [Junk] [Utility]

A spoon which can be bent and twisted around at the Player's mental command. Useful only as a fun party trick.

Getting two Uncommon items at once was quite interesting. Timothy obviously ignored the spoon, but he weighed the pros and cons of choosing the Sneakers or the Assessor.

"Earlier, I was unable to obtain bonus rewards for the Swimming With Marigold quest. This was because I failed to increase her Affection beyond a certain level. Having the Affection Assessor would improve my ability to complete similar quests in the future. But in terms of steady usefulness, the Hermes' Sneakers are much more valuable."

Timothy thought for a while. The Sneakers, he decided, were good, but he was likely to get similar items in the future. The Affection Assessor gave him a unique ability that he could not only use for his own ends, but for others as well. He could determine the relationship levels between different Sentients with ease.

This seemed minor. But in reality, it could grant him crucial insights in strategic information warfare in the future. Knowing who hated and who loved who was a big deal in geopolitical relations.

With that, Timothy opened up the last two Lootboxes.

...He wasn't impressed by what he found, but he still picked two more items he found useful.

Fortifying Belt: [Item] [Common] [Waist] [Healing/Utility]

Improves the Player's disease resistance against common illnesses by 50%. Has no effect if worn after becoming sick. Cannot cure a disease.

Earring Radar: [Item] [Common] [Ears] [Scouting/Utility]

An item which allows the Player to sense movement in a 25-meter radius around themselves. Cannot differentiate between movement above or below. Cannot differentiate between friend and foe.

After selecting those two items, Timothy was done. He had no further Lootboxes remaining, and was fairly satisfied, even considering the poor offerings on display.

Timothy picked up the clipboard once again. He scrawled down some notes, then started to think once more.

"This mental state is quite satisfactory. I am able to think clearly, without prejudice, and without emotions clouding my judgment. Perhaps I should leave this as my default mental state. It feels much better than being a whiny brat who can't make up his mind and who disappoints everyone."

Unfortunately, he knew his mother would easily notice his massive personality shift. She would freak out, start yelling again…

How troublesome.

Her constant nagging was somewhat irritating. He was an adult now. He didn't need to listen to her lectures. It was time he started making his own mark on the world.

Timothy looked out the window.

"Well, she said I should stay in here until I made a decision. Looks like I've done just that. No sense sitting around, accomplishing nothing. I need to acquire more Quest rewards."

Timothy opened his Quests again. He observed that after his raucous lovemaking session with Marigold, he had completed four of six objectives in her primary quest.

[Story Quest] Timothy, SMASH!

Marigold is your type. She's totally into you, just look at the way she's batting her eyes! You should quickly seduce her and take her to a private room. Gain additional rewards for each romance stage you progress!

First Base Rewards: [CHA Improved by 5%], [DEX Improved by 5%] (COMPLETE!)

Second Base Rewards: [CHA Improved 5%], [DEX Improved by 5%] (COMPLETE!)

Third Base Rewards: [Heat Resistance +10%], [Cold Resistance +10%] (COMPLETE!)

Fourth Base Rewards: [STA Improved 10%], [STR Improved 10%] (COMPLETE!)

Obtain Girlfriend: [Respect+] [Currency Gain +10%] [Experience Gain +10% (Permanent)]

Obtain Marriage: [STA Improved +50%], [Skill: Mental Resilience]

Note: All benefits except Permanent buffs will disappear if the relationship ends under negative terms.

Timothy had not yet accepted the rewards. He immediately did so. At once, his body subtly changed in a way he couldn't comprehend. He felt a little different, but the difference was subtle enough that he couldn't mentally quantify it.

His DEX and CHA had both shot up by 10%. He had more Heat and Cold Resistance. His STA and STR had also gone up by 10%. But how much was 10%, anyway?

Timothy thought about it for a minute. 10% didn't seem like much, but he had basically improved his entire body by a holistic 10%.

Ten percent was the difference between a 6' individual and a 6'6" individual. It was the difference between lifting 200lbs versus lifting 220lbs. It was the difference between running 5 MPH and 5.5 MPH.

The only question was...

"Umi, when I obtain stat gains, do they compound on top of my existing stats, or do they add to a baseline of some sort?"

Umi replied without manifesting. "Stat gains compound on top of your existing body."

This was a massive revelation. Timothy instantly realized that he was drastically underestimating the value of stats.

Compounding gains were small and low impact... until they weren't. Once they reached a certain level, they would quickly spiral out of control.

This was why compound interest was extremely important when saving and investing money on ancient Earth. It was also why compound interest with personal debt was so destructive.

"The System giveth, and the System taketh away." Timothy said to himself.

He climbed off the bed, then dropped to the floor and pressed his palms against the cold white tiles. He began doing pushups, one after the other.

At once, a Quest appeared.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Train Your Body!

Small gains compound over time. Perform a series of exercises, with increasing rewards depending on how many repetitions you can complete. To complete this Quest properly, you must complete each type of exercise in one session each. You may not space them out across the day, or across multiple days.

[Complete Pushups: 3/100.] Rewards: 1x Tier 1 Lootbox.

[Complete Pullups: 0/100.] Rewards: 1x EXP per 3 Pullups. 100th Pullup grants 5 EXP.

[Complete Situps: 0/100.] Rewards: +2.5% END, +2.5% CON.

[Complete Squats: 0/100.] Rewards: 1x Mundane Skill Lootbox.

[Complete A Nonstop Jog: 0/10 Km.] Rewards: +5% maximum movement speed.

[Eat Cooked Meat: 0/1.5 Kilograms.] Rewards: +2.5% Gut Digestion.

[Eat Vegetables: 0/1.5 Kilograms.] Rewards: +2.5% Eyesight Improvement.

Note: If the Player completes all Quest objectives within 24 hours, all rewards will be doubled. This Quest may be completed once per 24 hour period.

Timothy paused his pushups. But only for a few moments. He scanned the Quest's contents, then nodded.

"As expected. The System reacted to my actions. I have been entirely too passive in how I pursued Quests. This oversight will not continue any longer."

And so, he began to work on his body, only pausing to call in a nurse and ask her to prepare him an extremely large and nutritious meal.

His journey of self improvement had truly begun. Later, he would be sure to make his relationship with Marigold official in order to obtain that permanent EXP boost.

Part 686: Maximizing Gains

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy worked hard. He grinded out 100 pushups in one sitting, which took him around thirty minutes. After resting for five minutes, he switched to crunches. Those only took him fifteen minutes. Then, he switched to situps, which were effectively much more tiring forms of crunches.

He finally hit a wall. It took him nearly forty-five minutes to finish, and he was so exhausted he needed a serious break. Luckily, the food the nurse had brought him was sitting on a table, cold but edible. Timothy grabbed the massive plate of meat and veggies, wolfing around a third of it down before he felt stuffed. He burped, then frowned. He had seriously underestimated just how much food the System required him to devour.

By this point, he had spent two entire hours exercising and eating, and the food wasn't even close to finished.

Timothy sat on the floor and laid back against the wall. He became contemplative.

"This exercising quest is troublesome. I can repeat it daily, and it will give me great gains. But it requires a lot of time. Time is a precious resource. Is exercising truly the best way to spend such a limited resource?"

Timothy opened up his Quests. He looked at his three repeatable quests specifically.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Training With Ferral.

You and Ferral are both Newbies, but Ferral is a stronger Sentient than you. Train your combat skills with him to increase your capabilities.

Rewards: [3 EXP], 3x Lootbox Tier 1.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Swimming with Marigold

It's a date, but it's also training! Go swimming with Marigold, and try to improve your relationship with her while getting in a good workout. Swim for at least one hour, with rewards doubled if you swim for two hours. Rewards can be earned from this quest once per day. If Marigold's affection for you increases past a certain point, other bonuses can be unlocked. (Note: Informing Marigold of this clause in any way will nullify those bonuses.)

Rewards: [1 EXP Per 5 Minutes spent Swimming], [Stamina Improved 5%]

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Train Your Body!

Small gains compound over time. Perform a series of exercises, with increasing rewards depending on how many repetitions you can complete. To complete this Quest properly, you must complete each type of exercise in one session each. You may not space them out across the day, or across multiple days.

[Complete Pushups: 100/100.] Rewards: 1x Tier 1 Lootbox.

[Complete Pullups: 0/100.] Rewards: 1x EXP per 3 Pullups. 100th Pullup grants 5 EXP.

[Complete Situps: 100/100.] Rewards: +2.5% END, +2.5% CON.

[Complete Squats: 100/100.] Rewards: 1x Mundane Skill Lootbox.

[Complete A Nonstop Jog: 0/10 Km.] Rewards: +5% maximum movement speed.

[Eat Cooked Meat: 0.6/1.5 Kilograms.] Rewards: +2.5% Gut Digestion.

[Eat Vegetables: 0.4/1.5 Kilograms.] Rewards: +2.5% Eyesight Improvement.

Note: If the Player completes all Quest objectives within 24 hours, all rewards will be doubled. This Quest may be completed once per 24 hour period.

As Timothy examined these quests, he thought carefully about time management.

"I am probably able to stay awake for maybe 14 or 16 hours a day at maximum. Fewer if I'm exhausted and require sleep. Looking at the Body Training quest, I've already spent two hours on it, and I must have at least another hour or two to go. That's around 20-30% of an entire day spent training. The good news is, most of these rewards are compounding. The Mundane Skill Lootbox is something I'd rather skip, but then I lose out on doubling all the other rewards."

"Training with Ferral is practically useless in terms of EXP, but it gives me lots of Tier 1 Lootboxes, and it doesn't take much time. Training with him for thirty minutes is enough to meet the quest's requirements."

"Training with Marigold is troublesome. It always requires two full hours to double the rewards, but it offers decent EXP and most importantly, a compounding Stamina gain that will benefit me greatly."

"If I seek to complete all three of these quests every day, I will likely need at least… five hours. Perhaps six."

Timothy's expression shifted. He looked off to the side while his brain spun into action.

"No. That isn't correct. The reason my exercise regimen takes so much time is because I'm out of shape. The more in-shape I become, the faster I can complete it. Since the gains are compounding, there may come a day when I could complete the entire regimen in less than an hour, or perhaps even less than 30 minutes. And don't forget that it also improves my gut digestion, which will let me consume nutrients more quickly."

Timothy analyzed the costs and benefits with almost robotic precision. There was no emotion in his words. Only cold, hard logic.

"The EXP I gain with Marigold is only relevant at these low levels. It doesn't scale at all. The 10% Stamina gain is the real prize… but is it worth spending two hours every day to achieve? I think after three or four more sessions, and another level up or two, I should not bother with that quest anymore. I'm sure Marigold won't mind."

The emotional impact of abandoning their dates after only a few instances didn't matter to Timothy at all. He disregarded her opinion on the matter entirely to focus on his own self-gains.

Timothy's expression suddenly turned ugly.

"Damn! If I had chosen those running shoes, I could have increased my run speed and cut down on the time needed to complete the 10km jog! I'll definitely have to prioritize a similar item in the future."

His flicker of irritation vanished. He had overlooked a key detail, but he would work not to make such a similar mistake in the future. He was a logical thinker now, not an emotional child who blundered along like a fool. That other embarrassing side of himself felt like ancient history. He had zero intention of undoing the Mind of Logic once the 24 hours were up. He intended to remain in this state of mind permanently.

Timothy stood up. He had rested enough. He still needed to finish eating the required amount of food, and finish his pullups, and finish a ten kilometer jog.

It was time to leave his hospital room.

He stepped out, then grabbed the crocodile nurse from before, informing her he was going out to exercise. He would return later, finish his food, then be done with the hospital room. Since everyone knew who Timothy was, she instead offered to send his food over to his house so he could go there instead. He agreed.

As soon as Timothy exited the hospital, he paused to activate his Map. He scrutinized Chrona's city structure.

"I still need to do pullups. I haven't trained with Ferral today, either. Maybe I can save some time by combining different training quests? 'Training with Ferral' is rather vague. Perhaps doing pullups with him would count? It's a shame swimming isn't on here, or I could double-dip with Marigold's training..."

Hardly had the thought occurred to Timothy when a new component was added to his exercising quest.

[Swim Session: 0/10 Km.] Rewards: +2.5% swimming speed.

Timothy grimaced. He had already completed his quest with Marigold today, so he wasn't actually going to be able to double-dip like he had planned. Now he had another requirement added onto his physical training quest he had to complete before he could get doubled rewards!

"Oh well. I can get a 5% swimming speed increase, which also compounds like my other gains."

Timothy groaned, but got over himself. He looked at Chrona's map. In the center of the city was the Spynet Sphere. It was the most important part of Chrona, and the entire reason Jason had built the place. A block east was Jason's warehouse, which until recently had been abandoned. Timothy's house was two blocks north of the Spynet, with a restaurant in between. The hospital he had been taken to was several blocks west, and the swimming hole was way up north.

Down south was where the Psions had been placed. There weren't many of them, and they couldn't reproduce. Thus, their living was fixed, and they didn't complain anyway.

Psions lived plain lives, enjoying little in the way of furnishings or adornments in their rooms.

The Crocodiles overwhelmingly lived to the west, north, and east, several blocks from the Spynet Sphere. They were reproducing quickly, and thus their housing had to constantly be upgraded, raised, and evolved. In the past, the tallest building in Chrona had been the first hospital, but in recent years it had been dwarfed by giant ten-story residential apartments. Dense housing was essential in an isolated bubble-realm with such little living space.

Trees had been planted around the edges of Chrona, creating a 'forest border' of sorts. These trees provided oxygen, but had to be manually watered, and the solar energy given to them came from Jason's Star-Net, which Fiona had repurposed into energy that powered all of Chrona's essential functions.

The problem was, Jason was always the one who had to open up new links to stars in the outer galaxy. With him gone, and with the time acceleration slowly lowering the amount of power Chrona could drain from stars in realspace, they were sure to face a serious energy crisis in the future. That was, of course, dependent on whether or not Fiona solved the crisis before it happened.

Timothy routed himself to go east, then south, then west, then north. He would conclude his journey at the swimming hole, but would loop around a few times before stopping to see Ferral in the southern Psion district. There, he would hit his tenth kilometer for the run, finish with pullups and training with Ferral, the complete his last remaining task by doing laps at the swimming hole.

As Timothy started to jog, he maintained an expressionless face. He found neither joy nor misery in running. With his emotions locked down, he only did what had to be logically done to accelerate his progress.

He jogged past the Spynet. If his mother was inside, she didn't seem to notice him. He made his way northeast, then looped back down to the southeast before cutting down and around to the south.

I was able to obtain certain rewards by fraternizing with Marigold. Timothy thought idly. I will lose those benefits if the relationship 'ends badly.' But that implies if the relationship never ends, or if it ends on a good note, I can keep them forever. What if I were to find a second partner to hold a relationship with? As long as Marigold never finds out, would I be able to double or triple-dip, obtaining even greater benefits?

A quest didn't pop up, but Timothy believed if he held serious intent to go down this path, a quest would definitely form.

It would be too troublesome. Timothy thought. Maintaining one relationship is a time-sink already. I would rather find more useful and repeatable ways to empower myself. There must be other forms of daily quests I can complete.

Ah hour passed. Timothy jogged around Chrona, eventually coming to a stop outside of the Psion habitat. A thought occurred to him as he recalled a recent conversation with Ferral. Timothy opened up his Options menu, and scrolled down to the Party settings. He suddenly realized he had not looked deeply enough into the Options menu, due to its massive list of toggleable and adjustable settings. The old him had been too overwhelmed to bother, but for the new him...

"See party member statuses. Check."

Timothy looked to the top left of his vision. A portrait of Ferral had appeared, with his HP and Psion Points listed beside it.

Timothy went back into the Options.

"Party member activity. Check."

Nothing seemed to happen. Timothy checked around further in the settings.

"Enable activity log. Ah, here it is. Check."

After enabling it, a new tab appeared on his side menu. Timothy clicked it and found a whole log of his quests actions, recent accomplishments, and other such things. Not just his, but Ferral's too! The log descended from most recent activity to the least recent...

Ferral Completed Quest: Ring Out!

Timothy Reached Level 1!

Timothy Completed Quest: Swimming with Marigold.

Ferral Completed Quest: Tangle with Tarim.

Ferral Reached Level 2!

Ferral Completed Quest: Training with Timothy.

Timothy Completed Quest: Training with Ferral.

Ferral Completed Quest: Sense 1000 Lifeforms.

Ferral Completed Quest: Meditation At 1 Kilometer

Timothy Completed Quest: Training with Ferral.

Ferral Reached Level 1!

Ferral Completed Quest: Training with Timothy

Timothy Completed Quest: Training with Ferral.

Ferral Completed Quest: Levitate 1000 Small Objects.

Timothy stared at the quest log. If he hadn't been in the Mind of Logic, he would have definitely gasped or felt extreme shock. How was Ferral outpacing him when it came to leveling up, especially when he had a massive EXP penalty? Timothy had just reached Level 1, but Ferral was already at Level 2! And he was way ahead of Timothy, as well!

But Timothy wasn't shocked or alarmed. It made sense. He had been rather lazy and lackadaisical about his growth before activating the Mind of Logic. Ferral, as a logical-minded creature from birth, was also thousands of years old. He had more brainpower to spare on how to best optimize his System growth.

"My friend's growth is my growth." Timothy said out loud. "I am glad for him. He works harder than me, so he should reap the rewards."

Timothy couldn't see what the Quest descriptions were or what the rewards gave, but he could glean a little insight based on their names. Tarim was one of the other Psions. Perhaps Ferral had a rivalry going on with Tarim, or they were doing dual-training, just like how Timothy was training with Ferral and Marigold.

Timothy closed the log. He stepped into the Psion Enclave, where he heard the loud sounds of psionic blasts striking each other. It seemed a battle was happening; standard practice for Chrona's Psions.

When he entered the training room, a heavily reinforced underground bunker with high-level Wordsmithium walls, ceiling, and floors, he felt the shockwaves of two powerful Psions blasting each other.

Timothy stopped as he entered the training area. In the center of the room, the 2nd Level Psion, Dunal, was violently battling against Ferral.

Dunal had chosen to focus on Primal Psionics. He was considered the most powerful of the Psion trainees, mainly because the others were not as combat focused as him. His pure blue skin stood out against Ferral's red-and-blue camouflage-patterned skin.

Ferral was a grab bag of a Psion. He had always had trouble battling against any of the other Psions, because all of them had chosen to specialize and focus on specific disciplines, while Ferral quickly grew bored and wanted to try out a variety of Paths.

This had always been his undoing, but it seemed that was no longer the case. Now, he wielded Primal Psionics at a similar level to his opponent.

Focused psionic blasts impacted Dunal's psionic barrier. He body shook, but he held firm. He rushed around the ring, swooping like a hawk as he fired back at Ferral, who likewise dipped and flipped, evading Dunal's counter-attacks.

Timothy stared, feeling slightly awed. He had seen Ferral fight before, but never like this. The so-called 'weakest psion' had grown his power by leaps and bounds. His fighting style was more clean and focused. He was improving at an alarming rate.

Unfortunately, Ferral slipped up and failed to dodge one of Dunal's attacks. A psionic whip struck his left shoulder, causing his heart to momentarily seize up. That moment of weakness allowed Dunal to swoop over and deliver a downward punch at the back of Ferral's head. He pounded Ferral into the floor and nearly knocked him unconscious.

[Match point. Dunal has won.] Aspirator Raavul, the sole 3rd Level Psion and teacher of their Enclave, said. [Though Ferral has lost, I am not so certain he will lose next time. Dunal! You fought well, but your training speed and efficiency has fallen far below Ferral's. I expect you to perform even better in your next sanctioned match.]

[Yes, Aspirator.] Dunal said, dropping to one knee in the center of the ring and bowing his head toward her. [I contemplate, and I comprehend.]

Ferral groaned. He picked himself up, then dusted his body off. When Timothy checked Ferral's status in the party window, it showed he had only lost three or four percent of his HP. However, these battles were not being fought to the death. They were fought with the goal of scoring crucial hits and earning points. A loss was a loss, and Ferral had failed to overcome his enemy.

[Well fought.] Ferral said, standing up. He bowed respectfully toward Dunal. [My training has not been harsh enough. Next time we duel, I will win.]

[We shall see if that is the case when the time comes.] Dunal said, clapping his fist into his palm as a respectful salute.

After the two split up, Ferral noticed Timothy and flew over to meet him.

[Timothy. I am ashamed you had to witness such a pitiful defeat.]

"Everyone has an off day." Timothy said mildly. "I finally remembered to enable the Party Activity Log. I had not realized you were already at Level Two. Your pace is impressive."

[I prioritize quests that grant experience.] Ferral replied. He cracked his neck, which had been lightly jolted by the impact against the Wordsmithium floor. [Thus, my quests tend not to grant skills or items. I am focused on growing my personal strength as high as possible.]

Timothy pondered Ferral's words. He had been doing things rather haphazardly, accepting any old Quest the System threw his way, doing them, and using up the rewards. Maybe training with Ferral to obtain some crappy Lootboxes wasn't the best use of his time.

Suddenly, an idea sparked in Timothy's mind. He smiled at Ferral.

"Brother Ferral, if I may make a suggestion? Why don't you and I travel to the swimming hole and engage in some bodily training? Let's see who can swim ten kilometers first? That will replace our usual training here. But no psionics. This will be purely to enhance our body's strengths."

Ferral contemplated Timothy's suggestion. [This suggestion is agreeable to me. But why do I suspect that you have an ulterior motive?]

The moment Ferral agreed, their shared training quest changed.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Training With Ferral.

An adjusted form of the previous Training Quest. Swim 10 kilometers alongside Ferral. If you succeed in achieving the 10 kilometer objective before him, your rewards will be doubled. If you swim all 10 kilometers before he has made it to 5 kilometers, your rewards will be tripled.

[Swim Session: 0/10 Km.] Rewards: [5 EXP per kilometer swam], 1x Talent Points.

Timothy's smile became slightly more pronounced. As expected, Quests were not static and could change based on a variety of factors. Just like how he had added new requirements and rewards to his daily training quest, he could do so with Ferral's training quest.

The young human looked at Ferral. "Hey, you know what? Let's add one more thing. Let's also compete to see who can reach 100 pullups first."

Ferral cocked his head. [The purpose being?]

"Trust me. Just agree to it. I'll explain later."

Ferral nodded. [Then this additional body training is acceptable. I must become stronger, faster.]

Just like that, the quest changed again.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Training With Ferral.

An adjusted form of the previous Training Quest. Swim 10 kilometers alongside Ferral. If you succeed in achieving the 10 kilometer objective before him, your rewards will be doubled. If you swim all 10 kilometers before he has made it to 5 kilometers, your rewards will be tripled. Additionally, you have agreed to also compete in pullups. The King Network knows what you are doing.

[Swim Session: 0/10 Km] Rewards: [5 EXP per kilometer swam], 1x Talent Points.

[Complete Pullups: 0/100] Rewards: 1x EXP per 3 Pullups. 100th Pullup grants 5 EXP.

Timothy wanted to crow like a bird. He actually felt real, tangible excitement at the realization he'd figured out a cool way to exploit the System.

Timothy clapped Ferral on the back. "Good. Let's get going, then."

As they started to walk out of the Enclave, Ferral turned to him and frowned.

[You are acting very different from usual. You remind me of a Psion.]

"Really? I'll take that compliment." Timothy answered. "But in truth, I activated a skill which allowed me to alter my mental state, and this was the result..."

Part 687: Pain in the Gut

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Several hours later, Timothy and Ferral finished their last exercise. Timothy found himself humiliated when his Psion friend, even without using Psionics, completely outclassed him in the physicality department.

Not only could Ferral complete 100 pullups much more easily than Timothy, he could also swim faster as well. Timothy really wanted to believe Ferral was cheating, but no. He wasn't.

[I am thousands of cycles old.] Ferral reminded Timothy, as they sat on the grass at the edge of the swimming hole. [I only casually exercise, but I do it constantly. I must keep up with my fellow Psions. I was never nearly as motivated as them, but the King Network has drastically enhanced my training efficiency. I will not be as I once was.]

Timothy glared at the System's reminder.

You have failed to obtain bonuses from Training with Ferral.

He wasn't too mad, though. He still managed to double up on his self-training and his Ferral-training. He was looking forward to accepting all the rewards once he went home and got some sleep.

"Aren't you curious about the new hack I figured out with the System?" Timothy asked Ferral.

[Does it involve manipulating System quests to better fit your training needs?] Ferral retorted.

"What? You knew?" Timothy asked, slightly frowning.

[I have been making use of this exploit myself.] Ferral said. [I posited that was your goal when you asked me to train with you. You must be doubling up on quest rewards.]

Timothy might have felt a bit glum if he wasn't currently using the Mind of Logic. Instead, he simply shrugged his shoulders. "You've always been sharp, Ferral."

A moment of silence fell over the two men. Timothy chugged a bottle of water he'd filled up along their run, while Ferral closed his eyes and meditated to relieve his mild exhaustion. He was far better off than Timothy, as his endurance was ten times higher at a minimum. Perhaps if Timothy had realized it was futile challenging his best friend, he might not have bothered. Then again, having a rival to challenge was always conducive to one's growth.

[Timothy.] Ferral suddenly said, while still continuing to meditate. [This new 'mental state' you have initiated. I am not certain I like it. You are not acting like yourself.]

Timothy glanced at Ferral's side-profile. "I am in control of my emotions now. I am able to think with clarity and logic... like you. Shouldn't you be glad I am able to mimic a Psion's state of mind? Better than being a wishy-washy loser who constantly blubbers and blunders."

Ferral was not swayed. He opened his eyes and looked at Timothy.

[Just because you are flawed, that does not mean you have no value. I have never perceived you as a 'loser'. If you are a loser, then what am I? I have always been the worst Psion. I train slowly and without enjoyment. I have historically held little passion when it comes to matters of developing my Seed. Even ascending to the 2nd Level took me far longer than my peers. This, in spite of the fact that my genetics come from formidable Psions. In theory, I should outpace all of my peers, but I am always left behind.]

Ferral slowly blinked his eyes.

[I recognize the King Network for what it is. It is a tool I can use to reshape my mentality. I can derive enjoyment from converting my future progression into tangible numbers. I can 'play a game', one which evolves my physical body. But in the end, I only view it as a means to an end. I will not allow it to corrupt Who I Am.]

Ferral reached out and touched Timothy's shoulder.

[You are different. You feel that you are a being of inferior value to other beings. You are using the King Network to compensate for your perceived flaws.]

"But I am flawed. I'm way more flawed than you." Timothy protested.

[I have just told you of my own flaws and challenges, yet you speak such words. You may be more 'logical', but your mental process is still emotional at its core.] Ferral said. [If the King Network disappears tomorrow, I will be sad. I enjoy watching my stats go up. I enjoy the feeling of tangibly improving myself. I enjoy taking one step closer to my goals, followed by another. But I do not inherently see the King Network as a reflection of my self-worth. You do. And that is the problem.]

Ferral shook his head and closed his eyes.

[You are using the Mental State skill as a crutch. You are forcibly changing the way you think in order to cover up perceived personality flaws. It is fine to use the Mental States as tools to achieve specific objectives, but the way you speak tells me you intend to remain in this Mental State for a very long time. Am I correct?]

Timothy hesitated. Every word Ferral spoke felt like a needle piercing his heart. Even with his emotions dialed down by 95%, he still felt as if he had been wounded.

"I... I did intend to remain in this state. Yes." Timothy finally admitted. "What is wrong with wanting to think clearly? What is wrong with acting and speaking logically instead of constantly screwing up and hurting the people around me? It sure seems to work for you."

Ferral became eerily quiet. He stared off into the distance.

Then he did something weirdly uncharacteristic of a Psion.

He chuckled.

[Heh heh... I see now. You think I am better than you because I was born superior. But you are unaware of the Truths of my life. Multiple Psions joined their Seeds together to create a powerful progeny, and the result was me. I am thousands of years old, yet my Psionic progress has proven vastly inferior to my peers. I was abandoned by my creators. I was a disappointment.]

[How do you think I ended up here?] Ferral concluded. [I was sent to Aspirator Raavul's enclave because she was seen as useless, just like me. I was sent there because I was a failure. Proctor Landis and my other creators gave up on me.]

Timothy blinked. He gave Ferral a strange look. "You... they considered you a failure?"

[If multiple powerful beings combine their power to create a progeny that should eclipse them, but that progeny instead fails to keep up with the slowest learners in his enclave, what else can that progeny be called but a failure?] Ferral posited. [They abandoned me because I lost my value. If you are a loser among humans, than I am even more a loser among Psions.]

Timothy gazed at the ground. He digested Ferral's words carefully.

"So you think I'm better in my... 'natural' state of mind?"

[Emphatically.] Ferral replied. [Because that is the real 'you.' That is the person who I befriended. I have no problem with you temporarily making yourself more logical. I have no problem with you using the tools the King Network gives you to solve problems. But that is what they are, and what they must be. Tools. Do not allow the System to supplant the essence of who you are.]

Timothy nodded. A strange feeling welled up in his body. He realized the 'wisdom' he thought he had acquired through this new State of Mind was false. It might heighten some parts of himself and dull others, but fundamentally they were always there.

He lacked discipline. If he worked to hone his mind as much as he did his body, he could achieve even greater results!

"I still have to wait twenty-four hours before I can transition to a different Mental State." Timothy said. "Thank you, Ferral. When the time comes, I will revert back to my normal self."

[If this current Mental State is helping you be more efficient or solve specific problems, there is no need to change back.] Ferral said softly. [It is only important to me that you do not view your 'normal' self as inferior or lacking in quality. I like my friend just the way he always has been.]

Ferral levitated to his feet. He bowed to Timothy. [I am leaving now. There is still much training ahead of me.]

"Wait." Timothy said, before pulling up his Quests. "Tomorrow, what say we meet at noon? We'll do a lot more training, doubling up on the entries in my daily quest. I'm going to invite Marigold along, too."

[You wish for the female crocodile to join us in our training?] Ferral asked. [Have you granted her access to the King Network? Have you made her a Player?]

Timothy slowly shook his head. "I... have not. The slots are limited. I can only invite two more people. I was thinking of inviting my mom, and Monster King Kar."

[I understand. You are the Administrator. It is your prerogative to invite or not invite new Players. You must take care to choose only those who you can trust, as well.] Ferral said sagely. [But if you are planning to invite Marigold, I believe it would be the height of selfishness if she obtained no benefits from joining us. Do not treat her as a mere object that will help you complete Quests.]

Timothy looked away. He nodded carefully. "All good points. Thank you for the reminder, Ferral. I'll sleep on it and decide tomorrow."

Ferral tilted his head forward, then flew into the sky. He quickly sped up and rocketed away. Timothy noted that Ferral's flying speed had sharply increased over the last few days. He was improving at a shocking pace.

Timothy looked at his Quests.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Training With Ferral.

An adjusted form of the previous Training Quest. Swim 10 kilometers alongside Ferral. If you succeed in achieving the 10 kilometer objective before him, your rewards will be doubled. If you swim all 10 kilometers before he has made it to 5 kilometers, your rewards will be tripled. Additionally, you have agreed to also compete in pullups. The King Network knows what you are doing.

[Swim Session: 10/10 Km] [5 EXP per kilometer swam], 1x Talent Points.

[Complete Pullups: 100/100] 1x EXP per 3 Pullups. 100th Pullup grants 5 EXP.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Train Your Body!

Small gains compound over time. Perform a series of exercises, with increasing rewards depending on how many repetitions you can complete. To complete this Quest properly, you must complete each type of exercise in one session each. You may not space them out across the day, or across multiple days.

[Complete Pushups 100/100] Rewards: 1x Tier 1 Lootbox.

[Complete Pullups: 100/100] Rewards: 1x EXP per 3 Pullups. 100th Pullup grants 5 EXP.

[Complete Situps: 100/100] Rewards: +2.5% END, +2.5% CON.

[Complete Squats: 100/100] Rewards: 1x Mundane Skill Lootbox.

[Complete Long Jog: 10/10 Km] Rewards: +5% maximum movement speed.

[Swim Session: 10/10 Km] Rewards: +2.5% swimming speed.

[Eat Cooked Meat: 0.6/1.5 Kgs] Rewards: +2.5% Gut Digestion.

[Eat Vegetables: 0.4/1.5 Kgs] Rewards: +2.5% Eyesight Improvement.

Note: If the Player completes all Quest objectives within 24 hours, all rewards will be doubled. This Quest may be completed once per 24 hour period.

Timothy had fully completed the revised Ferral Quest, but he was going to wait to accept its rewards until after he finished the daily training quest. He failed to beat Ferral in any categories, but the base rewards were already good enough for his short term needs.

Unfortunately, Timothy still needed to finish the hospital's food, which had definitely made it to his house by now. He took off and walked south until he spotted Marigold lingering outside his house. As soon as she saw him, she jumped off the boulder she was sitting on and clapped her claws together.

"Kyargh! Timothy, you're alright! I was so worried! The nurse said to leave you alone, but then I heard you left the hospital early, so I came to your house but you weren't here, so I figured I'd just sit down and wait until you got back!"

She babbled quickly, clearly excited by the fact that Timothy had survived. He seemed to be doing fine, with no ill after-effects.

"Me and Ferral hung out for a while. I spoke to him about several matters and cleared up my thoughts." Timothy said, his face expressionless. "Marigold, thank you for rescuing me. I would have drowned if it wasn't for you."

Marigold's yellow scales momentarily flushed pink. She squeezed her claws together and smiled in that animalistic way only a croc-girl could. "I was there, so obviously I saved you! It's nothing to thank me for! Um, are you doing anything right now?"

Timothy yawned loudly. "I'm actually heading home so I can get some sleep. How would you like to meet up with me and Ferral tomorrow at noon?"

Marigold nodded eagerly, but her expression changed after a moment.

"Say... Timothy? Are you feeling okay? You're acting a little... cold."

"Ah. It's because of the System." Timothy explained. "I accidentally toggled an option that changed me into a logical-thinking Psion. It'll wear off in half a day or so. Must have triggered it by accident when I was in the water and flailing around."

"Oh... when you were in the... water... so it's like that." Marigold said quietly. "Well, as long as it's temporary. I'm just glad you're okay! So yeah, I'll see you tomorrow then! Kyargh!"

Timothy walked over and kissed Marigold's snout. She giggled, then skipped away, leaving him to stare at her as she departed.

Timothy felt absolutely nothing for Marigold in that moment. He only kissed her because social dynamics said it was the right thing to do. But all his passion and lust had evaporated once he initialized the Mind of Logic.

He realized Ferral was right. This wasn't who he was. The Mind of Logic turned him into a cold-hearted robot. He didn't want to give up his humanity, even if it meant being a technically 'superior' life form.

As Timothy walked into his house, he stared into the ever-present darkness on Chrona. The pitch-black hallways yawned in front of him, feeling no more fearsome than the light.

"Flaws make us human. I should not cast them aside too quickly, lest I lose what makes me... me."

He looked to his right. Just inside the door, there was a plastic bag with two boxes of cold food. The nurse had bagged things up nicely for him.

Timothy snatched the food up and walked into the dining room. He still had two-thirds of his daily food requirements to eat, and he wasn't THAT hungry yet. It had only been four hours since he overstuffed himself.

Still, he wanted to complete the quest, no matter what. Pushing his pain down, Timothy shoveled large mouthfuls of the cold meat and veggies into his mouth. He chewed them with limited enjoyment, feeling his stomach scream and beg for mercy.

He was absolutely going to die on the toilet within an hour or two.

Eventually, Timothy finished his food. He might be in a logical state of mind, but that did not stop the emotional agony of shoveling a dump truck's worth of food into his gullet. He wanted to pass out in his room, but he was in too much pain to sleep.

"Fuck. Fuck. God, this hurts... so bad." Timothy cursed.

He clutched his stomach and massaged it, hoping to provoke a burp that wasn't followed by vomit. At the same time, he pulled up his Quest screen. He had completed the daily quest.

It was time for his well-earned rewards.

Without hesitation, Timothy accepted Ferral's quest rewards.

His EXP, which was at 53/114, instantly shot up 50 EXP to 103/118 after the first Ferral objective, then it gained another 38 EXP and blinked into Level 2, at 23/138 EXP.

He had leveled up again!

But Timothy didn't stop there. He accepted the next EXP reward from his pullups daily quest, which had been doubled to 76 EXP. He rose to 99/138 EXP for his final value of the day! He had nearly leveled twice!

Most importantly, his gut digestion rose by 5%. It felt like a tiny bit of the pressure in his stomach was alleviated, but he couldn't be certain. His END and CON both rose by 5%, his maximum movement speed rose by 10%, his swimming speed by 5%, and his eyesight even improved slightly.

He obtained two Lootboxes. One was a plain and basic Tier 1 Lootbox, but the other was a 'Mundane Skill Lootbox'. Timothy was very interested in seeing what that entailed. Mundane options didn't seem very good, but who could say for sure?

Timothy took a moment to think about what he wanted to do next. He decided to look at the Level Up options.

Level 2 Achieved.

First Reward: 1x Reroll Token. 1x Banish Token. 3x Lock Token.

Second Reward: Choose one of three new King Network Features to unlock. Can be saved for later.

Third Reward: Improve two of your skills by +1 levels. You cannot improve the same skill multiple times.

Fourth Reward: Get +1 to Party Slots OR get 1x Rare Ability Lootbox.

The first reward was a no-brainer. Timothy accepted it, bringing himself to x3 of all the token items. That would be useful for when he was manipulating Lootboxes and other similar options in the future.

The second reward made his heart jump. He tapped on it, and three new features appeared, prompting him to select one.

[Pawn Summoning]

The Player may summon a Pawn from across time and space to accompany them on their journey. The Pawn is random and cannot be chosen, but unwanted pawns can be discarded and re-summoned every set period of time. The period of time can be influenced by many factors. Pawns are NPCs that can either be mindless robotic companions or full-fledged characters with their own journeys and desires.

[Crafting System]

The Player will gain access to Crafting, allowing them to craft a huge variety of items, skills, talents, and weapons. However, this system does not fully unlock until later levels, and requires resources to make work properly. It is a cheaper alternative to the STORE, but the STORE is more convenient in what it offers.

[Create Dungeon]

The Player is often limited in ways they can gain EXP by the Quests available to them. Dungeons solve this issue. The Player can create an instanced Dungeon to venture inside and slay monsters, collect loot, and level up. Items obtained in the dungeon can be brought outside. Dungeons must be completed once opened, or else they may Dungeon Break, causing all the monsters inside to spill out into reality. This is very dangerous, and should be prevented if possible. Only Players may enter Dungeons, unless the Dungeon Break event has occurred, in which case non-Players can enter as well.

Timothy's heart became moved. He started to tremble as he looked at these three options available to him. Every single one offered a ton of utility and features. He desperately wanted to obtain all three, but he could only pick one.

"If I had to choose, I think Crafting will be fantastic later on, but it has little use for the me of now. Pawn Summoning sounds amazing! But it won't help me level up faster right now. Creating Dungeons is by far the option that best solves my dilemma. Ferral and I could go inside and fight monsters together!"

But Timothy did not select any of the options. He wisely chose to leave the choice to tomorrow, where he would discuss it with Ferral.

"Shit. Maybe Ferral already picked one of these options! He hit Level 2 before me, after all. I definitely need to check with him, first."

Timothy looked at the Third Reward next. He obviously picked Eye of Yredelemnul to evolve it to Level 3, then he chose Crocodile Form to evolve it to Level 2. This was mainly so he could see how it would change.

[Eye of Yredelemnul L3] [MP Cost 0] [AP Cost 0] [Cooldown 0]

The stolen power of a dark god courses through the Player. The Player can examine objects and entities with the Eye of Yredelemnul to learn more information about them. As the Player strengthens, the information available to them will improve drastically.

Improved: The Eye can now see the stats of other entities.

Improved: The Eye can sense the auras of powerful life forms.

[Crocodile Form L2] [Active Skill] [Rare] [Transformation] [Holistic] [90 Mana (Sustained) OR 9 AP (Activated)] [No Cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to transform into a half-crocodile, gaining all the upsides and downsides that come along with such a transformation. Their skin will become hardened and scaled, granting bolstered defense. Their muscles will increase in density. They become incredibly adept in water. However, their mind will slow down somewhat. The player can revert back to their original form for free at any time.

Grants +60% STR, DEX, CON, and HP, with doubled improvements when in water. Grants -45% INT and WIS.

Timothy's eyes widened. This was a shocking level of improvement! Yredelemnul's Eye went from only seeing basic stats to seeing all stats, and it even gave him the ability to see powerful life forms. He wasn't entirely sure what that meant, but it seemed extremely useful.

And Crocodile Form became even better! Not only did its upsides improve, and its downsides decrease, but its activation requirements dropped as well. He only needed 90 MP to activate it now instead of 100! And since the form's stats doubled when in water, the 10% increase to STR, DEX, CON, and HP were actually 20% when he was swimming!

If this kept up, would Crocodile Form become free to use at Level 10?

Timothy exhaled deeply. He groaned and rubbed his aching stomach.

"Shit. I should have asked Marigold to be my girlfriend officially. Then I could have gotten a permanent +10% to my EXP gains. Whatever, I'll just do it tomorrow."

He still had the final Reward to accept, on top of opening Lootboxes and other such things, but the young man simply wasn't in the mood. He was dog-tired from all his training.

He staggered out of the kitchen, flopped into bed, and cried as his stomach hit the mattress. He would have to worry about the new System feature tomorrow.

After a moment, he moaned painfully.

"...Oh god. I need to take a shit."

Part 688: A New Player?

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy woke up later than usual, around 10 AM. His body didn't ache, likely because of his Player abilities, but his mind did, even if only a little.

He opened up his repeatable quests. All of them were due to reset two hours later, at noon, so there wasn't any point in doing pushups or other exercises early. He was feeling a little bored, so he flipped through his video games and thought about playing one.

"Hmm. Fighting game? Nah, not interesting anymore. RPG? I already do that in real life. Racing?"

Timothy fell silent for a moment. He remembered when he was a kid and his mom sometimes played video games with him. The only games she liked playing were racing games. She really enjoyed jumping in a car and zipping around race-tracks at high speed. Apparently, before she had split from Phoebe, Fiona had loved to go racing on Tarus II.

But she never had time to do that anymore. Now that she ran Chrona all by herself, she was too busy to cruise around in a car... and Chrona didn't have any cars anyway, or any long roads she could use to race on. Thus, she sometimes played racing games with her son. But that was years and years ago. She hadn't played them since Timothy was maybe six or eight years old.

This made him feel... nothing. Timothy supposed he should feel glum, but the faint nostalgia just didn't do much for him.

In that moment, Timothy felt a different kind of pain. It was the pain of loss. He wanted to feel sad, but he couldn't. The System had dulled his emotions so much that he felt completely hollow. He leaned back in his beanbag chair, opened up his abilities page, and looked at his States of Mind. The 24 hour cooldown had finally ended.

Mind of Simplicity: Activate.

Timothy send out a mental command. Immediately his mental state altered. The world became a little more colorful. His interest in playing games returned, at least somewhat. But he wasn't really in the mood to do that anymore.

"I should go talk to mom before I hang out with Ferral and Marigold." Timothy said to himself quietly.

And so he did. Timothy got up, showered, cleaned himself up, then headed out. As he walked the short distance, he reviewed his tasks for the day.

I need to choose a new System feature. The choices are between Pawn Summoning, Crafting, and Create Dungeon. I also need to determine if I would rather have +1 party member slots, or get a rare ability from the Lootbox. On top of that, I have a Tier 1 Lootbox to open, and a Mundane Skill Lootbox!

Timothy's thoughts shifted.

I should make things official with Marigold today. Or... should I? It's not right to want to use her to obtain better benefits from my System while she gets nothing in return. Ferral's right. I should consider inviting her into the King Network.

Timothy arrived at the Spynet Sphere. He knocked a few times on the door, and his mom opened it.

"Oh, Timothy." She said softly. "I wasn't expecting you."

Timothy smiled sheepishly. "I, uh, I thought a lot about what you said yesterday, mom."

Fiona eyed her son for a few seconds, then she waved her hand backward. "That's good. Come on in, then."

When Timothy entered, he found Blinker and Kar were still there. Or they had visited a second time? He wasn't sure. It didn't seem likely they had spent an entire day in the Spynet, but they were immortals with little need for sleep.

"Aunt Blinker, Uncle Kar." Timothy said, smiling weakly. He felt exposed without the Mind of Logic. He lacked confidence, and it showed.

"You look tired." Blinker observed. "Are you doing alright?"

"Yeah. I've been doing a lot of physical training with Ferral. Intense, but safe. Mainly pushups, pullups, situps, that sort of thing. I even went for a really long run with him yesterday."

Fiona crossed her arms and nodded. She sat in a chair at the same round table as Kar and Blinker. Timothy sat in the final chair, closest to the entry doors.

"So." Fiona said, her tone oddly calm. "Have you thought about what sort of man you want to be?"

"I've been reckless. I'm sorry." Timothy said, lowering his eyes. "But... after thinking about it, I realized this really is who I am. I don't want to sit around in comfort inside Chrona. I want to become someone amazing. Now that I have my Heroic abilities, I can't shake this feeling. It's as if I've heard a calling from a greater power."

Kar chuffed. "Hurgh. Perfectly sensible words! A boy wants to become a man. I see no problem with this."

"The problem isn't your aspirations." Blinker gently said, reaching over to touch Timothy's hand that was resting on the table. "It's the reckless, thoughtless way you've been using your powers. You keep throwing yourself into danger without thinking of the consequences."

Timothy nodded. "I know. I won't be doing that anymore."

He turned and smiled at Fiona. "I'm sorry I worried you, mom. From now on, I'm going to assess my risks much more carefully. Just because I'm offered a Quest doesn't mean I'll take it. I can ignore dangerous ones and focus on slow, incremental gains. I have plenty of time to take my growth slow inside Chrona, anyway."

Fiona seemed to release a breath she had been holding. It appeared she was somewhat relieved..

"That's... that's good, Timothy. I hope you understand that with all the lying you've done recently, I can't fully trust you. But... hopefully you'll start walking a better path now. Don't follow in your father's earliest footsteps. He made a lot of simple mistakes that caused him no end of grief."

Timothy nodded humbly. "Yes, mom."

A moment of levity followed. His apology was simple, but direct. He took full accountability for his failures, which made everyone feel relieved.

Timothy looked around the table.

"There's another reason I came here. Two, actually. I need to use the Spynet to look at as many different animals and sentients of as diverse an array of power as possible. I also wanted to offer you and Uncle Kar a chance to become... Players."

Fiona blinked. "Young man, you are not touching the Spynet for the foreseeable future."

"No, no, mom, it's not like that." Timothy explained. "I have this skill, it's called 'Eye of Yredelemnul', and it allows me to see the stats of other lifeform-"

"It's called WHAT?!" Fiona shrieked, jumping up and looking at Timothy in horror. "What did you just say? Yredelemnul?! Like that horrible, horrible thing Jason mentioned? The monstrosity on Pixiv?!"

Blinker's eyebrows jumped. "My home world? What are you talking about?"

Blinker might be a Fairy Queen, but that was only in terms of her power. She had never returned to Pixiv to learn the ancient secrets, nor had she been formally inducted. She only cared about living with Kar, so she only thought she might go there in the future if the option casually arose. She had no interest in returning for any special reason.

"The Eye of Yredelemnul..." Fiona said, looking at Timothy with deeply frightened eyes. "Jason... Jason saw it! It's a horrible, horrible thing that Queen Calanthra keeps locked away inside her palace on Pixiv. It used to belong to a dark god, and still contains the power of a Ruler! She used it to pierce through dimensions into a place called 'Ripspace.' That's how the fairies traveled from Andromeda to the Milky Way..."

It was fortunate that Jason always kept his spiritual wife in the know with regards to matters like this. She might never have realized Timothy was harboring some horrible fragment of evil inside himself. No wonder he had been acting so strangely. This might even be the reason why he had done something as shameful as peeping on girls like a weird, creepy voyeur!

At least, those were Fiona's initial thoughts. Timothy slowly stood up and raised his hands.

"Mom, it's not like that. It's just the name of the ability. Look, let me list out my abilities and what they do. You'll understand then."

And so he did. Despite having only an hour before he needed to meet with Ferral and Marigold, Timothy took the time to explain his abilities to the others. He wrote down their descriptions and effects, but that didn't stop his mother from continuing to remain spooked.

"Timothy, this power can act as benign as it wants. Even the description says 'The stolen power of a dark god courses through the Player'. If that isn't evil, then what is it?"

Kar lifted his snout. "It says 'stolen'. That means it was not given freely. The weapon of an enemy can still be useful, White Ghost."

"I'd feel better if I could talk to Calanthra." Blinker said while chewing a fingernail. "I agree with Fiona. This power sounds dangerous. But if it hasn't manifested any obviously evil effects, then..."

Timothy threw his hands up. "Look, I just need to examine lots of entities with the Spynet, okay? It allow me to alter my baseline understanding of other creatures so my stat system can become more accurate. Mom, will you help me?"

Fiona struggled with whether she should allow Timothy's request or not. Ultimately, her motherly love won out. She wrung her hands together in consternation, then sighed. "Alright. Alright! I'll show you some people and animals. But I'm in full control, got it?"

It was obvious she didn't trust him not to go peeping on girls again. Though, now that Timothy had experienced the real thing, he had also lost a lot of interest in voyeurism.

"That's fine, mom. Thank you."

Fiona walked over to the computer. She gestured toward the Spynet, where dozens of screens showed various people and places that were being observed at all times.

"Well?" She asked.

Timothy paused. He started rapidly activating the Eye of Yredelemnul to load the stats of one human, demon, and Volgrim after another. Each time he did, Timothy's own stats started to change. When Fiona showed him images of the Volgrim leaders, his stats went down. All of them were extremely powerful in a variety of ways. When she showed him random animals on random planets, his stats went up. Those animals represented the baseline for weakness.

Timothy had his mom cycle through dozens of different Sentients. Before long, his stats had reached a point where they weren't changing anymore. They had normalized, along with the stats of all the other sentients.

A pop-up appeared in front of Timothy.

Congratulations, Administrator. You have scanned 117/100 required unique living entities. You have unlocked the Bestiary.

Timothy blinked. This was a completely unexpected acquirement. He looked at his tabs, and there was a new tab available that said BESTIARY. He opened it up.

A large interface opened in front of him, complete with pictures, video, stats, and other information about all the creatures and sentients he had scanned. He could look at any of them to learn more information.

Another pop-up appeared.

The Bestiary collects all known and pertinent knowledge regarding scanned creatures. The more you know about a creature, the more information that will appear. The player can acquire combat bonuses against certain creatures by learning more about them. Upgrading the Eye of Yredelemnul will also grant the Bestiary additional info on newly scanned creatures.

That certainly sounded useful. Timothy opened his Character page to check his stats.

Timothy Hiro - Human/Chrona

Level 2 | Newbie | Bottom Mortal

Exp: 99/138

AP: 0/0 | MP: 0/0

STR 10 | DEX 10

INT 9 | WIS 8

DEF 9 | RES 9

CHA 8 | LUK 10

CON 10 | END 11

Timothy opened up Ferral's stats as well, now that those had been properly normalized.

Learner Ferral - Psion/Chrona/Volgrim

Level 2 | Newbie | Low Mortal

HP 514/514

AP 14/14 | PP 78/78

STR 11 | DEX 11

INT 10 | WIS 9

DEF 11 | RES 10

CHA 7 | LUK 9

CON 11 | END 13

It turned out the massive rift from before where Ferral seemed vastly further ahead of Timothy was actually a relatively small gap. Timothy was weaker than the baseline Sentient. Ferral was a little stronger. But the gap was definitely possible to close, if Timothy worked hard.

With a thought, Timothy pulled up another Sentient he had scanned with his mother's permission.

Emperor Belial AKA "Samantha" - Demon/Sharmur

Non-Player | High Mortal

HP 737/737

AP 52/52 | MP 810/810

STR 18 | DEX 18

INT 13 | WIS 14

DEF 12 | RES 11

CHA 17 | LUK 13

CON 12 | END 16

Her stats were absolutely insane. Timothy stared with wide-eyed shock at her page. He couldn't believe what he was seeing. 20 was the theoretical limit, with each point upward being vastly harder and harder to attain. If he went against Belial, he would lose. End of story.

His aunt sure was amazing!

"Thanks, mom." Timothy said. "I just unlocked a new feature called the Bestiary."

He quickly explained to her how it worked, and she raised an eyebrow.

"Really? And what are my 'stats' then?"

Timothy checked.

Fiona Hiro - Phantasmal Human/Chrona

Non-Player | Bottom Mortal

HP 45/45

AP 2/2 | MP 71/71

STR 8 | DEX 13

INT 17 | WIS 18

DEF 8 | RES 9

CHA 13 | LUK 13

CON 7 | END 19

Timothy looked at his mother's stats with even greater surprise! He wrote them down for her, and she appeared equally surprised.

"My endurance is extremely high. That is likely because I'm a phantom that doesn't ever get physically tired. I'm surprised your 'System' rates my intelligence and wisdom so highly."

"I'm not." Timothy said, smiling at his mom. He looked away, slightly embarrassed, then lowered his voice. "...I've always thought you were the smartest person in the universe."

"Oh, honey..." Fiona said, revealing a warm smile. "That's so sweet of you to say."

Timothy grinned sheepishly, then turned and looked back at Blinker and Kar, who had remained seated.

He checked both their stats with a glance.

Monster Queen Blinker - Fairy/Chrona/Pixiv

Non-Player | High Mortal

HP 514/514

AP 11/11 | MP 1204/1816

STR 14 | DEX 16

INT 18 | WIS 15

DEF 14 | RES 14

CHA 16 | LUK 14

CON 11 | END 13

Monster King Kar - Crocodile/Chrona

Non-Player | Bottom Mortal

HP 75/75 (-1206)

AP 3/3(-75) | MP 14/14(-503)

STR 9(-8) | DEX 10(-5)

DEF 10(-8) | RES 10(-7)

CHA 9 | LUK 9

CON 9(-9) | END 8(-9)

Blinker and Kar's stats were even crazier! Timothy could tell Belial and Blinker were roughly equal, each with their own strengths, but he couldn't see any information beyond their stats. Whatever unique skills they had would likely decide the victor if they came to blows.

But it was Kar's stats that broke Timothy's heart.

"Hey, Umi." Timothy whispered. "Why are there minus-numbers next to my uncle Kar's stats?"

Umi blinked to life. "The Sentient 'Kar' is not a Player character. I am unable to provide detailed information on him."

"Well okay, but what do negative numbers usually mean?" Timothy asked.

"They would often indicate a debuff or affliction reducing a character's stats." Umi replied emotionlessly. "Unless the entity known as 'Kar' joins the King Network, more detailed information cannot be obtained."

Timothy hesitated. He had his own theory. Kar had been killed and revived, but had lost all of his former power. What if that power was still inside of him, and thus his stats were majorly debuffed, but they could be recovered? What if making him a Player could restore him to the way he once was?

Timothy chewed his lip. He looked at his mom, who glanced back.

"What?" Fiona asked. "Are you going to share with the class?"

Timothy slowly nodded. He grabbed a notebook, then scribbled down his stats, his mom's stats, then Blinker and Kar's stats. He walked over to the table and placed the notepad down.

"Like I said earlier," Timothy explained. "I was thinking of turning you and Kar into Players. Then you could level up and get stronger like me. And Uncle Kar... I think it would benefit you the most. You um... you used to be really strong, right? You could become strong again. Maybe even more powerful than before!"

Blinker and Kar looked at the notepad, comparing themselves to Timothy and Fiona.

"...What do these negative numbers mean?" Kar asked. "Hurgh. They do not look good."

"I'm not entirely sure." Timothy admitted. "But I think they're what your stats would be if you weren't... uh..."

"Crippled?" Kar asked, looking up at Timothy.

"I- I wouldn't use that word specifically..." Timothy said, trailing off.

Kar chuffed. He tapped the notepad, then looked at his wife. After staring into her beautiful eyes for a moment, he looked back at Timothy.

"It is tempting to accept the offer. But didn't you say before that you have limited slots available?"

"Yeah..." Timothy muttered. "I only have two. I was actually thinking of inviting Marigold to be a Player too, and I currently have the choice of adding one Player slot or obtaining a rare and powerful Skill. I'm just... not sure what to do."

Kar leaned back in his chair.

"Game Boy. I am content with my life. Butterfly and I are bringing back the crocodiles. The Battle Bastards who killed my people are both dead. I no longer have any need to attain power. I may be weak, but I am surrounded by family members who love me. Yes, as a man it is tempting to desire power simply to act big and tough. But I have never sought power for power's sake. It is of no consequence to me."

He waved his hand toward Fiona. "White Ghost. You should become a Player, like your son. You are the core of Chrona. If you can gain powerful new abilities, you may be able to save our decaying dimension. As for me, I will pass on this opportunity. I thank my wonderful nephew for offering, but you should give this opportunity to the younger generation. Little Marigold seems a fine mate for you."

Fiona looked at Kar, then she looked at Timothy and frowned. "Are you sure you want to give your girlfriend this power? You barely know her, right? Don't you think you should be in a more committed relationship first?"

Timothy shrugged. "The sooner she becomes a Player, and you as well mom, the sooner you guys can start leveling up and becoming stronger. Don't you think that's for the best?"

Fiona shrugged her shoulder helplessly, than shook her head. "You can do as you please, Timothy. I do admit... this power of yours could fulfill a lot of my strategic objectives. With Jason gone, I've been heaping all the magical work onto Blinker's shoulders. Do you think your game power could give me magical abilities?"

Timothy immediately nodded. "A hundred percent it will, mom. You will get to complete quests, and those quests give rewards you can use to pursue the type of power system you want to develop. I think it'll be a big upgrade for you."

Fiona didn't seem especially excited, but she did privately think that using the power would help her better understand it. In secret, she was terrified her son had bitten off more than he could chew. The more she knew, the better she could foresee future problems and protect him. She was especially horrified by the revelations of Yredelemnul being somehow involved in Timothy's power. She could never forgive herself if her son turned into some dark god's slave by using a power that wasn't really his. What if Timothy wasn't a Trueborn Hero at all, but an unwitting pawn of something or someone evil?

She would die before she let that happen.

"...Alright. Turn me into a Player, then." Fiona finally said.

Timothy nodded. He activated the System's invite function, and his mother flinched. A giant screen had appeared right in front of her face.

[AN ADMINISTRATOR IS INVITING YOU TO THE KING NETWORK.]

[IF YOU ACCEPT THIS REQUEST, YOU WILL BECOME A PLAYER.]

[WILL YOU ACCEPT THE FRIEND REQUEST AND JOIN TIMOTHY HIRO'S PARTY?]

[YES | NO]

Fiona stared blankly.

"What do I do?" She asked.

"Just press 'Yes', mom." Timothy said.

And so she did. Fiona Hiro activated the King Network and became the third Player to join its ranks.

None present could have foreseen how her ascension would someday drastically change the galaxy's balance of power...

Part 689: Fiona's Ascension

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Fiona accepted the Player invitation request. After a moment, she looked around and blinked.

"Okay? Now what?"

Timothy pointed to her right. "Look at the edge of your vision. Do you see those tabs that say Character, Inventory, and so on? You can either tap them with your finger, or think of opening them with your mind."

"Oh! I see!" Fiona said. "So I just think the word, and it- OHH! That scared me!"

Fiona recoiled slightly, visibly flinching when she opened her Character Sheet. Now that she was in Timothy's Party, he could see more detailed information about her.

Fiona Hiro - Phantasmal Human/Chrona

Level 0 | Newbie | Bottom Mortal

HP 45/45

AP 2/2 | MP 71/71

STR 8 | DEX 13

INT 17 | WIS 18

DEF 8 | RES 9

CHA 13 | LUK 13

CON 7 | END 19

Resistances: Physical 95%. Telepathy 100%.

Weaknesses: Magic 95%.

Active Skills: Mother's Intuition, Construct Item, Deconstruct Item

Passive Skills: Player's Body, Player's Mind (Toggle), Phantasmal Entity

Talent Slots: 0/1

Prestige: N/A

Timothy's eyes widened. "Ooh, mom! You have some skills already! You should look at them. Write them down so we can see what they do!"

Fiona blinked. "Skills? I do? Oh, I see them. Sure, give me a moment."

She grabbed the notepad Timothy had been using, then started to write down every skill's description, word for word. This was helpful, because other Players could not see what exactly her skills were, even if they were in the same Party. Party members could see skill names, but not descriptions. Non-party members couldn't even see that much.

Mother's Intuition: [Unique] [MP Cost 5]

You are always worrying about the status of your adopted child. When this skill is activated, you will be able to sense Player Timothy's exact location and the area around him, no matter the distance. This effect cannot be blocked by any means. You may also heal your child's wounds by placing your palm on the injured area and meditating. Your child will recover 5% of his maximum HP every hour, and will heal through extreme damage states, such as [Lightly Wounded], [Injured], [Maimed], and [Broken].

Construct Item: [Ordinary] [MP Cost 50]

You are able to construct any item you wish, provided you have adequate raw materials immediately at hand and you possess a detailed mental blueprint of how the item should be constructed. The item will be constructed within 30 seconds and will be fully charged and ready to use, if applicable. The items you can construct are limited by your level and knowledge.

Deconstruct Item: [Ordinary] [MP Cost 50]

You are able to disassemble any item and copy its blueprints into your Mind Realm. The item will be deconstructed within 30 seconds. By doing this, you can perfectly recreate the item with the Construct Item skill. Note that some items may need to be deconstructed multiple times to acquire their full blueprints.

Phantasmal Entity: [Passive] [Racial]

You are a phantasmal entity made corporeal by the energy contained within Chrona. You are extremely resistant to physical damage and your body cannot be harmed by mundane means. However, you are exceptionally weak to magical damage and must take care when battling spellcasters. Due to your special existence, when obtaining Lootboxes, you have one additional option to choose from, and you also gain an additional bonus when leveling up. Lastly, you are capable of multiclassing and switching between your available classes with no cooldown time.

Timothy's jaw dropped when he saw these four outrageous skills. He thought his abilities were good when he first became a player, but they were nothing compared to Ferral and Fiona's basekits.

"Oh my gosh, that first skill is so embarrassing." Fiona said, blushing. "The System makes it seem like I'm some overly worried priss or something."

"Mom, the skill says you'll see everything around me when you use it." Timothy said, feeling somewhat violated. "So... you'd better take care. You never know what, um, weird things you might see. Like, uh, me and my girlfriend, for instance."

"Oh, please! I cleaned your butt when you were a baby!" Fiona exclaimed. "There's nothing down there I haven't already been grossed out by!"

"Mom!! Eww! Not in front of Aunt Blinker and Uncle Kar!" Timothy protested.

Blinker snorted. "Kid, I changed your diapers too. Had to give Fiona a few days off once in a while."

"Hurgh. Your Little Timmy was always a strange sight." Kar chimed in, grinning evilly at the brutal blow he dealt to his nephew's heart.

Timothy staggered. The consecutive strikes against his manhood dimmed his resolve. He knew he'd lost this argument.

"R-right. Well, you have two other active skills as well. It seems you can use them now! You can construct and deconstruct items. Mom, why don't you grab something you don't know much about, that isn't too valuable, and deconstruct it right here?"

Fiona blinked. She thought about it for a moment, then nodded.

"Well, I've maintained them, but it was actually Jason who built all the monitors in the Spynet. Blinker, can you grab that dead monitor up there and decouple it for me?"

She pointed to the ceiling, where several monitors had gone dark due to losing connection with their spy-points. Unfortunately, the Spynet was losing a monitor every month or so, and in just a few year's time most of them likely wouldn't work anymore.

Blinker nodded. She flew up, used her telekinetic powers to carefully wiggled a monitor out of place, then she unplugged it and brought it down to Fiona.

Fiona frowned as Blinker placed the giant monitor on a table. "So... how does this work?"

"I don't know." Timothy admitted. "I imagine you just... touch the monitor, then think of activating the skill?"

A few seconds passed. Fiona traced her hands along the monitor's edge. All of a sudden, a blue light erupted from her mind and wrapped around the monitor. It levitated a few inches off the table, then began rapidly disassembling itself. Fiona's eyes widened with fascination as thousands of internal circuit designs flowed into her mind, each one detailing how the others should all connect. The monitor flew apart into individual pieces faster and faster, ultimately crumbling into a pile of plastic shell components, metal bits and screws, copper wiring, and other such things.

In less than ten seconds, she had completely taken the monitor apart.

"I... I see it!" Fiona exclaimed. "There's a blueprint in my mind. It's a perfect diagram of every inch of the monitor! I can even use my existing knowledge base to rework its functions and improve it!"

Fiona was extremely talented when it came to learning how to make and manufacture technology, but she wasn't omniscient. She had countless holes in her knowledge base. She had been enhanced by Solomon's Crown when she was still Phoebe, and those gains remained after their split, but she was no bio-computer, like Rebecca.

Even so, she realized immediately that if she only had these two skills, the ability to rip apart and rebuild objects, she would progress tens of times faster than she did as a mere ghost-turned-physical.

"That was incredible!" Blinker exclaimed. "If this is the level you're already at, what will you become if you grow over the comings weeks, months, and years?"

She glanced at Kar. There was a hint of yearning on her face.

Kar held up a palm. "Butterfly. Say no more. I have made my decision. My vengeance is complete. I do not wish to seek the path of blood any longer. I am pleased White Ghost has become stronger, but that is all. Returning to the field of battle is not my desire."

Fiona continued to examine her new abilities. Unfortunately, it seemed her mana slowly regenerated at the rate of 1% every ten minutes. She would only recover 6% of her mana in an hour, and a maximum of 144% every 24 hours. Thus, she would not be able to use her Construct Item ability until she had risen above 50 Mana, which would take a while.

"Check your Quests, mom." Timothy said.

Fiona nodded. She opened them up, then listed them out on a piece of paper.

[Story Quest] [Continuous] Choose a Path.

You are a phantasmal life-form with unlimited potential. Your ability to adapt exceeds your expectation. At present, you have become a Technologist, and your current abilities reflect this, but you could become so much more. As you level up and obtain new abilities, those abilities will influence your future potential, allowing you to obtain unique and exotic professions.

Rewards: None.

[Story Quest] Master Your Abilities.

You have the ability to construct and deconstruct items. Use these abilities five times each. Complete the quest by constructing a unique item, device, weapon, or armor. If the item you construct passes a certain quality threshold, the rewards will be doubled or tripled respective to its quality.

[Construct Item: 0/5]

[Deconstruct Item: 1/5]

[Final Constructed Item Quality] [Mundane|Common|Uncommon|Rare+]

Rewards: 1x Technology Skill Lootbox. 1x Phantasmal Skill Lootbox. 1x Uncommon Item Lootbox. 1x Level Up. (Rewards can increase depending on final crafted item's quality.)

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Maintain Chrona.

Chrona's infrastructure is in decay. You must travel around Chrona and repair its core functionality each day, using your Map to uncover problem areas you may have previously overlooked. In order to obtain rewards, you must repair a quota of items every day. Repairing any multiple of that quota will increase the rewards, up to a maximum of x5 rewards.

[Repair Technological Devices: 0/5]

[Repair Magical Devices: 0/5]

Rewards: 3x Crafting Materials Lootbox, 1x Tier 2 Lootbox, 1x Temporary Phantasm

---

Timothy did not envy his mother. Her quests gave insanely good rewards, but all of them required a lot of time and effort to achieve. Her story quest alone ensured multiple days of effort for a reward that might underwhelm if she couldn't craft a powerful enough final item.

One thing really caught Timothy's attention, though.

"Mom, your unique 'Racial Skill' gives you a huge bonus of +1 option when selecting Lootbox rewards... and almost all your rewards are Lootbox-related. This is a huge benefit. It means you get 33% more options compared to me. Make sure you consider every option carefully. Consult me, Blinker, Rebecca, and others to make sure you're considering all the possibilities."

His mom nodded. "I'm honestly a bit overwhelmed, Timothy. As soon as I saw the Quests, I felt this... this need... this desire to start immediately getting to work. Knowing that just standing here is 'wasting time' makes me itchy to get moving."

She frowned, then looked her son in the eye. "Timothy, is this how you've been feeling since you became a Player?"

He nodded. "Pretty much. Why?"

"Well. Maybe it's just my imagination. But... something about this feels predatory. Like it's tugging at my brain with incentives to get me doing what the System wants me to do."

"The System wants you to be stronger." Timothy pointed out. "What's the problem with that?"

Fiona looked uneasy. "It's probably nothing. Just my imagination. Well, I'd better get to work on these Quests. I'm eager to see what these Lootboxes really look like."

"And I need to head out." Timothy said. He walked over and gave him mom a long, tender hug. "I'll be hanging out with Ferral and Marigold. See you later, mom."

"Love you." She said.

"Love you too."

After grabbing a clipboard along with a pen and paper, then stuffing them in his inventory, Timothy headed out the door. He thought to himself as he walked away from the Spynet Sphere that his mother appeared to have already unlocked Crafting at level 0. That further added to the feeling he didn't need to pick it for now. She would definitely end up a much better craftsman than he ever would.

"Since Uncle Kar didn't want to become a Player, that means I probably don't need the +1 Party Member Slot reward. I can choose the Rare Lootbox option instead. That will give me a Mundane Lootbox, a Rare Lootbox, and a Tier 1 Lootbox. Umi, can I transfer lootboxes to someone else?"

Umi materialized. "Negative. You cannot give Lootboxes to your mother to open so as to abuse her Racial skill."

"Dammit. Screw you, how did you know what I was thinking?"

"Because you are an inferior biological with thoughts so primitive and transparent I would be a fool not to predict them." Umi blandly replied.

She vanished, and Timothy continued on his way to the swimming hole.

He arrived to find Ferral standing all by himself near the largest boulder placed beside the makeshift lake.

"Ferral! Where's Marigold?" Timothy asked.

[I sense her aura approaching. She is still a few minutes away.] Ferral replied. [Timothy, I saw that you invited your mother to become a Player. What of your plans to invite Monster King Kar?]

Timothy shook his head. "Uncle Kar turned me down. So... I think I'll be inviting Marigold to become a Player instead."

[You will? So you have made up your mind. Are you not worried that you are rushing into this situation a bit too quickly?]

Timothy frowned at Ferral. "Wasn't inviting her your idea? Now you're having second thoughts?"

[No. I am merely wondering how much thought you put into this invitation.] Ferral explained. [Neither you nor I have spoken to Marigold at length. You have only recently started getting to know her. Perhaps you would rather delay for a week or two?]

"Well, even if she doesn't take to the System well or she isn't great at leveling up, I think it's better to invite her sooner. That way she can get levels and rewards faster." Timothy explained. "Have you seen the situation in Realspace?"

[The Milky Way's prospects are far from optimistic.] Ferral observed. [Humanity is weak. The Dolgrimites have obtained a method to push back the Plague, but perhaps their way will only slow the bleeding. The demons are a looming threat. I am not certain how the future will play out.]

"Exactly. So the sooner we get people leveling up, the sooner we have future Heroes and powerhouses capable of fighting the Plague." Timothy explained. "Thus- oh! Marigold! You made it!"

Timothy's expression brightened. Marigold picked up the pace as she darted over to hug him.

"Kyargh! Timothy, it's good to see you again! Are you fully recovered from your hospital visit?"

Timothy kissed the side of her face. "I'm doing great. Actually, I wanted to invite you here to discuss something with Ferral and me..."

The young man took a few minutes to succinctly explain to Marigold his idea of making her a Player.

"You invited King Kar, but he didn't accept?" Marigold asked. "If he won't, then I definitely will! Leveling up with you seems like a dream come true!"

"I thought you might say that." Timothy said with a smile. "But I wanted to make sure. Here, just accept this invitation."

Marigold reacted with remarkable calm when the invitation window popped up in front of her.

[AN ADMINISTRATOR IS INVITING YOU TO THE KING NETWORK.]

[IF YOU ACCEPT THIS REQUEST, YOU WILL BECOME A PLAYER.]

[WILL YOU ACCEPT THE FRIEND REQUEST AND JOIN TIMOTHY HIRO'S PARTY?]

[YES | NO]

She rubbed her claws together. "Ooh, how fun! So what do I do?"

"Just hit the 'Yes' button with your hand, or think of the word 'Yes' in your head." Timothy explained. "Most System functions can be controlled with your hands or your thoughts interchangeably."

And so she did. Marigold was accepted into the King Network, and Timothy eagerly checked her page.

Timothy grinned. "Can you write down what your skills do?"

"My skills?" Marigold asked. "Timothy, don't you think it's a little personal, asking a girl about her skills?"

"Huh?" Timothy replied, momentarily giving her a dazed look. "Personal? I'll show you my skills first if you want."

Marigold's crocodilian tail flicked behind her. "If I tell you my skills, won't you know all my weaknesses? Then you'll be able to bully me..."

"Bully you?" Timothy snorted. "Look at your stats. You were holding out! You're way stronger than me. You'll be the one bullying me, for sure!"

She giggled. "I was just messing around. Do you have something I can write on?"

Timothy reached into his Inventory and pulled out the clipboard. It was a good thing he'd thought to snag one, considering how often he'd found himself needing to write things down regarding the System. He handed it to Marigold, and her clunky claws grabbed the pen and started writing.

Charm: [Active] [Hex] [5 AP]

You are an exceptionally beautiful crocodile, and possess the ability to charm other entities, influencing them to do your will. This ability is most effective on entities who are innately attracted to you, including members of the opposite gender and homosexual members of the same gender, among similar variants. The more times you use this ability on an entity, the stronger its effects.

Lightning Dive: [Active] [Movement] [3 AP]

A skill which allows you to instantly traverse 100 meters vertically underwater. You can dive downwards at speeds eclipsing other aquatic lifeforms; useful for allowing a sudden initial strike or for escaping pursuers. Entities you have grappled before using this skill have a chance to become [Stunned], making them paralyzed for several seconds. If they are vulnerable to asphyxiation, they may accidentally inhale water and begin to drown.

Death Roll: [Active] [Offense] [15 AP]

A brutal attack that can be used on land but is 100% more effective when underwater. Grab an opponent and violently spin them around, inflicting the status ailments [Stunned] and [Agony] while also creating multiple tearing wounds across their body. Can be used immediately after a [Lightning Dive] to great effect.

Wave Splash: [Active] [Offense] [Variable AP Cost]

A powerful water-manipulation attack, allowing you to blast a powerful wave of water outward. You must be in or near a large enough body of water to activate this skill. Concentrating to charge up the attack first will cost more AP, but will result in a much more forceful wave.

Crocodilian: [Passive] [Racial]

You are a Crocodilian, a powerful life-form with extreme advantages in aquatic and land environments, but limited adaptability in others. You cannot obtain the ability to fly. Your mental acuity will always suffer a 20% penalty compared to other species. In exchange, all quests and rewards related to aquatic biomes will grant 50% increased rewards.

Timothy digested these skills. The Charm skill, especially gave him pause.

So far, skills seemed to correlate to a person's innate abilities and identity. Was Marigold a temptress? Had he accidentally fallen for her wicked wiles?

"What's up with this skill?" Timothy asked, looking at her from the side. "Charm? Seems a little weird."

Marigold blushed. "You... don't think I'm charming? I'm not pretty?"

"Of course you are!" Timothy quickly corrected himself. "It's just, this is a little..."

"Daddy always said I was a charming girl!" Marigold explained. "This must be what he meant. And look at my other skills! Wow, I can summon a water wave? I wanna try that!"

Marigold quickly darted over to the swimming hole. There was a different crocodilian lifeguard up in the trees. He looked down on her and watched, leaning back casually in the branches while making sure nothing dangerous happened.

"Timothy! Timothy!" Marigold squealed. "How do I summon the big water wave? How? How??"

"Just think the skill's name in your mind, I guess." Timothy said.

Marigold furrowed her brow. She swept her palms behind herself, then thrust them forward while crying out in a weird way. "Hiyahh!"

...A lump of water rippled outward, then disappeared into the lake's waters a few feet away. It was utterly unimpressive.

Marigold stomped her foot. "What the heck was that! I wanted a wave, but it just made a little splash! How am I going to make the other girls jealous if this is all I can do?"

Timothy chuckled. "It seems to be a charge-up skill. Try maintaining your concentration for a bit before releasing the wave."

And so she did. Marigold held her palms behind her back before flinging them forward in a dramatic pose. "Hiyahhh!!"

This time, a visibly larger wave flew away from the shore and rushed out into the middle of the open water. It eventually fell back into the water and sent minor ripples throughout the lake, but Marigold was much more excited now that she had succeeded.

"Kyarrgh! This is great! Thank you, Timothy! I can't wait to start getting even stronger! This gift is going to make me the coolest crocodile in Chrona!"

Timothy smiled. "Well, becoming 'cool' isn't as important as becoming strong. Remember, you have a responsibility to grow yourself into a powerhouse that can support Chrona, and someday, humanity. A lot of people are going to be counting on you."

Marigold sobered her expression. "Right! Good point. Sorry, I got a little carried away. So, what next?"

"Well," Timothy said, "next we should probably start talking about quest-maxxing. I want to synchronize you and Ferral's daily quests so we can triple up and obtain massive gains quickly!"

He paused.

"Ah... and there's another thing we need to discuss. It's related to a really important major System feature I have a choice of unlocking. I still haven't entirely made up my mind."

Timothy looked at his level up option. The most important choice still remained.

Choose: Pawn Summoning / Dungeons / Crafting.

What option would he select?

Part 690: Journey's Beginning

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

"So. Ferral, since you know more about the System than Marigold, this is primarily directed at you, but Marigold, you can feel free to add your input." Timothy said. He paused before continuing. "I have a choice to make regarding a new System feature I can unlock. I can either unlock the Pawn Summoning system, the Dungeon system, or the Crafting system. I've already ruled out Crafting, at least for now, because my mom has Crafting. I'm torn between the other two."

Timothy explained what all three systems were in enough simplicity and detail that even Marigold could follow along. Ferral tapped his chin thoughtfully.

[Timothy, I was also given a choice of unlocking three game systems, though I have not yet decided which one I wished to unlock. Additionally, mine were a little different from yours. They were as follows...]

He proceeded to list them off.

[Devour Uniqueness]

You are what you eat. By consuming the dead or living bodies of sentient and non-sentient entities, you can absorb part or the entirety of what makes them Unique. This system does very little at first, but can rapidly empower the Player as they become able to consume more and more. However, due to Contamination, the Player must beware. Obtaining too many abilities can slowly alter the Player's biological makeup, including their mind. They may eventually transform into a dangerous monster with little to no self-awareness. Power comes at a price.

[Create Dungeon]

The Player is often limited in ways they can gain EXP by the Quests available to them. Dungeons solve this issue. The Player can create an instanced Dungeon to venture inside and slay monsters, collect loot, and level up. Items obtained in the dungeon can be brought outside. Dungeons must be completed once opened, or else they may Dungeon Break, causing all the monsters inside to spill out into reality. This is very dangerous, and should be prevented if possible. Only Players may enter Dungeons, unless the Dungeon Break event has occurred, in which case non-Players can enter as well.

[Bestiary]

Learn about the creatures you encounter and log down their Unique features. Obtain powerful benefits by hunting mighty beasts. Learn the weaknesses of Sentients to use against them. Learn the specific loot drops of each creature and use that to target specific items and crafting materials. Splice the genetic material of researched creatures onto yourself and others; experiment to find powerful mutations. Eventually, grow your own mutated creatures to fight alongside you.

After Ferral explained his three options, he shook his head. [I was already thinking of choosing Create Dungeon. Devouring is not my style. I do not possess a mouth, and even if I can Devour by using a different method, this System does not suit me. The Bestiary seems useful, but I am too focused on advancing my Psionics to worry about collecting information on other sentient and non-sentient creatures. Thus, the Create Dungeon system is most useful to me.]

Timothy gaped at Ferral. "Bestiary? I have that unlocked right now! I scanned a bunch of people and creatures with my eye skill, and that unlocked the Bestiary. I didn't realize it was an entire major System on par with Create Dungeon! I think this seals the deal, then, doesn't it? Ferral, you should pick Create Dungeon, and I'll pick Pawn Summoning. If one of us can summon a Dungeon, then we all can benefit. Pawn Summoning sounds like it will be extremely useful, so I'd like to see what it can do. I'm also betting I'll be able to unlock Dungeons some levels in the future."

Timothy also thought about the fact that the Bestiary description for Ferral gave a lot more information on what it could do. It seemed it wasn't merely an information-collecting system, but one that provided real tangible benefits.

Marigold didn't have an opinion, since she had barely even started her Player journey. She just let the boys choose whatever they wanted. As such, Timothy selected Pawn Summoning, while Ferral selected Create Dungeon.

[Astounding.] Ferral said, a few minutes after he and Timothy had started scrutinizing their new systems. [I am currently able to summon one free dungeon every seven cycles.

The dungeon must be at my level, but there are other options for summoning more powerful dungeons. I must unlock them later, after fulfilling some unknown requirement. It also appears I will someday be able to select the type of dungeon I summon, as well as its level range and tier.]

"Pawn Summoning seems really cool too." Timothy said. "It's a bit weak right now, though."

Timothy looked at the menu carefully.

---PAWN SUMMONING---

The Player may only summon [ONE] Pawn at present. If the maximum number of Pawns are currently summoned, one Pawn must be killed or dispelled before another may be summoned.

[Summon Mundane Pawn] [Cost: None] [Cooldown: 24 Hours] [Duration: Unlimited]

Summon a pawn from across time and space that is equal to your strength or weaker. The Pawn will be mindless and lack intelligence. The Pawn has a small chance to contain intelligence, but this is unreliable. The Pawn will remain summoned until it dies, or the Player dispels it.

[Summon Simple Pawn] [Cost: Greater of 10% Player's Gold OR 100 Gold] [Cooldown: None] [Duration: Unlimited]

Summon a pawn from across time and space that is equal to your strength. The Pawn may be mindless, or it may possess intelligence. The Pawn can be a weaker version of a powerful entity. The Pawn will remain summoned until it dies, or the Player dispels it.

[Summon Intermediate Pawn] [Cost: Greater of 35% Player's Gold OR 10,000 Gold] [Cooldown: None] [Duration: Unlimited]

Summon a pawn from across time and space that is somewhat stronger than you. The Pawn will typically be intelligent, but has a chance to be mindless. The Pawn can be a weaker version of a powerful entity. The Pawn will remain summoned until it dies, or the Player dispels it.

[Summon Powerful Pawn] [Cost: Greater of 75% Player's Gold OR 1,000,000 Gold] [Cooldown: None] [Duration: Unlimited]

Summon a pawn from across time and space that is much stronger than you. The Pawn will always be intelligent. The Pawn may resist the Player's orders if the Player's strength is insufficient. The Pawn may rebel. The Pawn will remain summoned until it dies, or the Player dispels it, or the Pawn returns itself to the Void.

[Summon Legendary Pawn] [Cost: Greater of 100% Player's Gold OR 1,000,000,000 Gold] [Cooldown: None] [Duration: 1 Hour]

Summon an unfathomably powerful Pawn that will reach the absolute limits of the universe's power. The Pawn will be extremely intelligent and completely obedient to the Player, but can only exist for a short duration of time. The Pawn cannot be summoned if the Player does not possess the minimum quantity of gold pieces.

[Summon Chaotic Pawn] [Cost: None] [Cooldown: None] [Duration: Unlimited]

Summon an extremely powerful Pawn that is vastly stronger than the Player. The Pawn is uncontrollable, and will do as it pleases. The Player cannot command the pawn, but may attempt to negotiate with it. The Pawn is capable of killing the Player. If the Player has reached an extremely high level of personal power, they may be able to negate all previous downsides. If the Pawn is not killed, it will continue to exist at its own whims for the duration of its natural lifespan. Are you sure you want to do this?

Timothy stared hungrily at the options. They excited him and made him want to start playing around immediately, but he quickly sobered himself up and thought carefully about what he would do next.

Timothy had no gold. He had not acquired even one piece yet. He knew there was a Store function, but the System hadn't offered him a single coin as a reward for any of his Quests. That meant summoning anything other than a Mundane Pawn or a Chaotic Pawn was impossible, and for blatantly obvious reasons, Chaotic Pawns were a complete no-go. He would simply destroy Chrona, perhaps even the Milky Way, if he used an ability so idiotic.

But, it seemed that Mundane Pawns were completely harmless. He might as well give that a try, since there was an extremely long cooldown before he could summon another.

"Alright. I'm gonna summon my first pawn. Give me a moment."

He took a step back from the others, then stared at an open spot up ahead, near the giant boulder placed beside the swimming hole.

"Mundane Pawn... summon!"

Timothy didn't know what would happen. Without any fanfare, a figure simply... appeared. One second, he was not there. The next, he was.

Timothy summoned a male demon. He had two tiny horns on his head, and otherwise looked completely ordinary. He was quite burly, at six-feet tall, and had messy black hair. He wore a shabby-looking pinstripe suit, and Timothy noted that there was blood on it.

Timothy looked above the demon's head. There were bright green words suspended in midair.

[Demon Grunt - Paimon] [Class: Burrower]

Timothy looked up at those words, then he examined the demon before him.

"Uh... Paimon? Is that your name?"

The demon blinked his eyes. He looked to his left. Then he looked to his right.

"Yes, master. That is my name." Paimon said after a few moments. He gazed at Timothy. "Where am I?"

"You don't know?" Timothy asked. "You're inside a special dimension. I summoned you to be my pawn."

Paimon slowly blinked. "Oh. That explains a lot."

Timothy was surprised. It was clearly obvious this 'Paimon' wasn't some mindless drone. He possessed intelligence, which was supposed to be nearly impossible for a Mundane Summon. What luck!

"Can you tell me about yourself?" Timothy asked.

Paimon slowly blinked again. "I am Paimon. I aspire to become a Demon Emperor. Currently, I am nobody of note. What is your name, master?"

"I'm Timothy." Timothy replied. "This is Ferral. He's a Psion. And this is Marigold, my girl- uh... well, she's..."

Timothy glanced at Marigold. She looked back and met his eyes.

"Were you going to say girlfriend?" Marigold asked, batting her eyes.

Timothy smiled goofily. "Uh, yeah! I guess I'm kinda jumping the gun here, but... wanna make it official?"

"That wasn't a very romantic way to phrase it. But yes! I'd love to!" Marigold said cheerfully. She walked over and kissed Timothy's cheek, which made both of them blush.

Paimon simply stared.

"A human. A Psion. A Crocodile. What a strange group of people. I was under the impression all the crocodiles had gone extinct."

"Well, they nearly did." Timothy said, wincing slightly. "This realm has lots of them. Best you don't talk about that around them. They might bite your head off."

"Oh." Paimon said. "I would prefer to keep my head attached."

He rubbed his palms together.

"Master. I am... feeling uncertain regarding how I arrived here. I know that you command me, and that I must obey, but otherwise I have no recollection of how I arrived. Could you inform me of recent matters? Where is this place, and what is my purpose? For what reason have you summoned me?"

Timothy frowned. It seemed the System forced a small amount of information into Paimon's mind, but otherwise he had been brought here against his will and with no recollection of how. Was he a real entity that had existed in the past or future? Was he a copy of a living entity? Could he be considered a 'real person'? Timothy wasn't certain.

"Sure. I'll fill you in." Timothy said. "First, this place is called Chrona, and around here there are mainly crocodiles, with a few Psions like Ferral, and humans like myself..."

He spent the next ten minutes explaining the current circumstances to Paimon, who merely folded his hands behind his back and listened attentively. Despite his massive and bulky size, he had a refined aura to him, and seemed like a rather intelligent guy.

"I roughly understand the current situation." Paimon said. "Pardon my impudence, master, but what year is it?"

Timothy blanked out. "Uhh... I don't... I don't know how to answer that."

Paimon rubbed his chin. "I am a member of the First Hell. How fares the First Hell these days? You are a human, yet you do not appear to be afraid of me. This suggests a major societal upheaval has occurred. Either that, or you are absolutely certain of my loyalty and do not fear my attacking you. Both possibilities seem plausible."

Timothy shrugged. "Well, ever since the Plague started ravaging the galaxy, the Seven Hells have been in disarray. The Demon Deities are doing what they can to fight back, but it's mainly the Volgrim who are pressing back against the Swarm. Humanity has gained a major foothold, but my people are still recovering from two of our worlds being obliterated."

Paimon slowly blinked his eyes three times. It was clear that most of what Timothy just said had gone over his head.

"It... seems... a lot has changed. I have little understanding of the words you just spoke. I appear to have been transported to the future. Forgive me, master. I am behind the times and unaware of the current galactic situation. I would politely ask that you fill me in on the greater details at your convenience. It does not have to be right now."

Timothy nodded. "Sure thing. You're the first Pawn I've summoned, but I already like you."

"I like you as well. Which is strange." Paimon said, eyeing Timothy up and down. "I've always hated humans. But somehow, you remind me of someone."

"Someone? Who?" Timothy asked.

Paimon lightly shrugged. "I do not recall. It is only a faint impression that rests within my mind. I feel as if at some point I lost my hatred for humans, but I do not recall when. Perhaps this is because of your 'System' which summoned me."

"You don't seem too broken up about... you know... becoming my pawn." Timothy pointed out.

"I was a servant of the Demon Emperors. Now I am yours." Paimon replied. "The master may have changed, but my situation has not."

Timothy suddenly felt terrible. He had effectively enslaved a sentient being, and the situation was so normal for his slave that he didn't even voice a word of resistance.

Was this because of the System? Had it forcibly made Paimon more docile? Or was he like this before the System took him? Timothy still had no idea if he was a copy of a living being or a revived sentient brought under Timothy's control. He felt both options were quite awful.

After vigorously debating all the options in his head, Timothy opted to silence his internal voices. Paimon was his Pawn now. That was neither good nor bad. What mattered was that Timothy intended to treat him well.

"Well, Paimon. I look forward to getting to know you better in the coming days." Timothy said, patting Paimon's shoulder. "But for now, I need to focus on some other stuff. We'll talk later."

Paimon bowed his head. "As you command, master."

Satisfied, Timothy walked over to Marigold.

"Ahem. Well, that was an awfully awkward way to make our relationship official. I wanted to be more romantic, but I blundered again."

"That's okay, Timothy!" Marigold crowed. "It's the thought that counts. You're cute when you stumble over your words. It means you really like me!"

"Yeah, I sure do." Timothy grinned. "Hey, while I've got you here, I need you to make a few Quests with Ferral and I both. It'll be a daily training Quest where you have to complete certain objectives every 24 hours. If you complete them properly, you'll get lots of items and level up quickly!"

"That sounds exciting." Marigold said. "How do I do that?"

Timothy explained the process. He brought Ferral over and formally updated both of their daily quests to be on the same level. Now Timothy had his ordinary daily Quest, a Training with Ferral Quest that perfectly matched the Daily Quest, and one with Marigold as well. At the same time, the other two mimicked him. They all had three copies of the same Quest, copies which would triple the rewards for doing the same thing in three instances. When Timothy jogged for 10 kilometers, he received three rewards from each of the quests, and so did Marigold and Ferral.

It was a complete exploit of the System!

There was only one caveat.

"Ew! No WAY I'm eating vegetables!" Marigold complained. "I eat meat. That's it! Veggies are icky! They stick to my teeth and taste really gross!"

Ferral looked at Timothy. [Crocodiles are carnivores.]

"Alright, that's fair. Just change the vegetable requirement to meat." Timothy said. "Think about it really hard and the Quest will change accordingly."

Marigold chuffed. "Kyargh. Fine! That works for me. So what are we going to do now?"

"We're going to get to training. Time's a-wasting!" Timothy said with a grin.

And so they did. They started off with their daily jog, and Paimon ended up running alongside them, with Ferral on the right, Timothy on his left, Marigold on Timothy's left, and Paimon on Marigold's left.

The group of four decided to run three circuits around the outside of Chrona's main city. As they did, Timothy pulled up the final rewards he hadn't chosen yet. These consisted of a Tier 1 Lootbox, a Mundane Skill Lootbox, and finally, a Rare Lootbox, since he had decided to skip on the extra Party slot.

"Mundane Skillbox." He said while jogging.

Efficient Eating: [Active Skill] [Mundane] [Utility] [8 Hour Cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to digest and absorb the nutrients of any food consumed in the next 15 minutes by an additional 20%. The Player will more efficiently convert their calories and protein into muscle, but can also gain weight much more quickly.

Polearm Knowledge: [Passive Skill] [Mundane] [Offense/Defense]

The Player gains basic to intermediate knowledge of how Polearms work. The player becomes relatively effective in combat when wielding Polearms, but still requires years of practice to become a true master. The Player can repair moderate damage to most Polearms due to knowledge of how they function.

Wilderness Junkie: [Passive Skill] [Mundane] [Survival]

The Player will gain the effective knowledge of a five-year human veteran in guerilla warfare. The Player gains the innate ability to survive effectively even on hostile worlds with dense jungles. The Player can naturally intuit most of which plants and animals are dangerous to consume, can craft various items to assist long-term survival in the event of a crash-landing or becoming stranded, and so on.

Timothy was surprised. All of these were extremely useful skills. Though basic, being able to immediately acquire knowledge on a topic was something he didn't know the System could do.

One of those skills was immediately useful for him, but the other two were only useful in the future. If he was going to go dungeon diving with Ferral and the others, then knowing how to use Polearms would be a great boon, but he immediately decided to pick Efficient Eating. Right now, having to stuff his face with food each day was going to make him sick, so being able to digest it much faster would be a huge help.

Then, he opened the Tier 1 Lootbox. There ended up only being three crafting items, but one of them stood out to Timothy. He decided to grab it for his mom.

Trifrancium (0.15 kgs): [Item] [Uncommon] [Crafting Material] [Exotic Energy]

An extremely rare fragment of Trifrancium. This exotic material can be used to power starship engines, and even a minuscule amount can possess enough energy to power a fusion reactor for centuries. Very dangerous. Highly unstable.

Finally, Timothy opened the Rare Lootbox. This time, he was truly stunned by what he saw.

Nekomimi Mask: [Item] [Rare] [Face Slot] [Stealth]

A lost fragment of an ancient item. Shaped like a Japanese Cat God, this mask looks rather silly but is effective at what it does. Hideki's mask grants the Player the ability to become unrecognizable when worn. Their aura will change, their voice will change, and their body will appear faintly illusory. Obviously, the mask itself will be quite distinct, but nobody will know who is under the Mask if the Player is cautious. Forged by a grandfather with love.

Neutralizer Bracelet: [Item] [Rare] [Wrist] [Utility/Survival]

A Volgrim-created item that allows the Player to resist the negative effects of time dilation by up to 90% while worn. Time Dilation can no longer kill the Player as long as they wear the bracelet. The Player may suffer extreme pain from time dilation at first, but over time, that pain will wear off. If the Player takes off the bracelet, their body will immediately explode, and they will die. Only by returning to a stabilized dilation speed they were previously used to will they be able to safely remove the bracelet.

Lightning Dash: [Active Skill] [Rare] [Movement/Offense] [Cost: 1 Mana] [Cooldown: 5 Seconds]

The Player gains the ability to dash forward at the speed of light, traveling any distance in a straight line. If the Player's dash would result in colliding with an object, they will either stop right in front of the object, or smash into it. If their body is capable of withstanding the impact, they will release an extremely powerful shockwave that will deal immense damage to the point of collision. If they cannot resist the impact, the Player will instantly die. Best used as a method of rapid transit across vast distances.

All three results were amazing. Timothy didn't see much use in disguising himself, so the strange first object didn't have much value to him, but the second and the third were insanely useful!

"I just got the option to pick up a time dilation resistance bracelet!!" Timothy screeched. "This is amazing! If I take it, I'll be able to leave Chrona!"

Marigold gave him a weird look. "You want to leave? Why? Isn't Realspace super scary? It's way safer to live here."

"Oh, sure, sure." Timothy acknowledged. "I can become stronger here for a few years, but ultimately I wish to return to Realspace and help save the galaxy. I won't do it until I'm a lot more capable than I am now, though."

Ferral nodded as he jogged. [I believe this time dilation bracelet is a good item to acquire. At the very least, if something happens to Chrona, you will have a way to safeguard your life. Your mother would approve.]

Timothy glanced at the Lightspeed Dash ability. It was really really tempting to choose. Who wouldn't want the ability to move at the speed of light? The activation cost was practically nothing, and the cooldown was all but nonexistent. It was almost as good as teleportation!

But ultimately, he chose the thing that made his heart race the fastest. He picked the Neutralizer Bracelet and gleefully stuffed it inside his inventory. Someday, he'd definitely find a good use for it. Maybe he'd even have his mom take it apart and learn how it worked. Then it would benefit everyone in Chrona!

But, for the foreseeable future, Timothy did not plan to leave.

His journey of self-improvement had only just begun.

Part 691: The Burning Deity

Far-Future Era. Noon, Day 20, AJR. Melodia.

The midday sunlight shone down on the planet of Sharmur. Humans, demons, and monsters alike were working hard to continue building up humanity's capital city. Already, the four quadrants of the city had started to take on relatively defined styles of architecture.

Humans tended to live in the north quadrant, above the river. This also happened to be the biggest area, though the western mountain range somewhat cut into the north.

Monsters lived west of the river. They were closest to the western mountains, and many goblins had opted to burrow inside, creating fortified living spaces for themselves.

To the south was a great forest, part of which circled around to the west. Demons lived there, in tree-houses they built using their powers. While demons typically preferred to live in architecture similar to the humans, the ones who aligned with humanity decided to get back in touch with Mother Nature.

Finally, to the east was Melodia's ocean, though a lightly wooded section of the forest cut between Melodia and the great waters. The east was also the quadrant where humans, demons, and monsters intermingled. Melodia's military headquarters had been built at the center of the eastern quadrant, right next to the river.

It was in the eastern section where a funeral procession was being held. A solemn and sad atmosphere pervaded, as nearly all of humanity's top movers and shakers had come. General Chadwick had left Pixiv to visit, and Belial had brought Cassiel and Soleil along as well. Demon Deity Melody sat in the row second from the front, accompanying Belial.

The frontmost row had the unfortunate wife of the deceased. Kiari sat in a chair, her expression stony, her eyes puffy and swollen from crying. Beside her sat Beelzebub, his expression solemn.

There was a podium placed at the front of several hundred seats. Behind it rested Saul's empty coffin; a stark reminder that his body had not been recovered. Despite searching the Hall of Heroes, questioning Chrona, and even looking throughout the Phoenix's realm, Sharmur, and Pixiv, Saul was nowhere to be found. He had indeed been left behind on Tarus II, and his body had been lost along with so many others.

At the funeral podium, a woman stood with a somber expression. She was humanity's current leader, Linda Adams.

"Saul was a close friend of Neil's, and I know my husband would have been devastated to see him pass. I didn't know Saul as well as I would have liked, but the few times we spoke, I experienced his extraordinary bearing. Like many, Saul was a victim of the machinations of our enemies. Saul was a lover, not a fighter. He kept to himself and lived on the outskirts of society, tending to his garden. He was a good man."

"Saul and my husband had a lot of similarities." Linda continued. "They were both ensnared by Bahamut, albeit for differing reasons. When Jason Hiro released them from their eon of hallucinations, Saul and Neil went different ways. Neil sought revenge, while Saul wished to enjoy peace. I cannot say which one took the more correct path, but I respected both."

"Saul will be missed." Linda concluded. "He leaves behind a wife and child. Like Kiari, I am with child, as are many others. I hope that we as a community can come together to raise the children of so many widowed men and women. Now is the time for us to unite and raise our progeny in a manner that is both forthright and steadfast. Only united can we face our future threats."

Linda tilted her head slightly. She stepped off the podium, allowing the next person to walk up. This turned out to be Beelzebub, who had been asked to speak by Kiari herself. He had been sitting beside Kiari, but eventually stood up and touched her shoulder before walking up to the podium. After taking a moment to collect himself, Beelzebub cleared his throat.

"I am not a good man. I have not been a good man." Beelzebub began. "I have committed atrocities in my life, as have many other demons. Even so, not long after I devastated Tarus II by immolating my body, I awoke to find myself an ordinary human stripped of my power. Through a series of events, I ended up staying with Saul and Kiari for a while."

"They treated me well. Better than I deserved." Beelzebub said somberly, as Kiari dabbed at her puffy red eyes with a handkerchief. "Saul in particular offered me choice words of wisdom on two different occasions. He made me rethink my life choices. He made me realize that I had been living a lie, and that I was being dishonest with myself. His compassion changed me into the demon I am today. While I still have a long way to go, I am proud to have called him my friend."

"Saul." Beelzebub said, looking up at the sky. "You will be missed."

A moment of silence followed. Beelzebub walked back over and sat beside Kiari again. More people spoke words of remembrance at the podium, numbering two dozen in total. Even Belial gave a short speech.

An hour later, the funeral ended. People came up to Kiari and gave their condolences. Countless people had been MIA, and Saul was ultimately just one of them. But his status as the husband of one of humanity's allied Demon Emperors meant that even people who didn't know him felt the need to at least voice a few words of sympathy.

Eventually, the crowd dissipated. People left, returning to their work in building up the city of Melodia.

Only a dozen or so people remained.

Among them were the demons Kiari, Beelzebub, Belial, and Melody.

Cassiel was there, along with Soleil, albeit in their human disguises of Cammy and Serra. The people who remained behind knew of Cassiel's identity, but none spoke of it. They treated her as an ordinary human, always worrying the demons might find out who she was.

Linda and Debra were also present, along with Chadwick, Henry Cliff, Ashley McCarthy, and even the Minotaur, Yamir Goldenhorn.

"Kiari. How are you holding up?" Chadwick asked.

Kiari stiffened. "I... I'm still... in disbelief. I keep expecting Saul to... to walk through the door. I can't believe he's really dead."

"I feel the same way." Linda said softly. "I always expect to enter my office and see Neil sitting at the desk. He's never there. Unlike you, I at least know for certain that he died. The uncertainty must be the hardest part."

"It is." Kiari admitted quietly.

Belial rubbed Kiari's back reassuringly. "If you ever need anyone to talk to... well, I lost my husband too. I'm always here for you."

"Yeah... thanks..." Kiari muttered. "I'm going to go now. Everyone... thank you for coming. It means so much to me. I'm sure Saul would have..."

She trailed off, not finishing her sentence. Everyone knew what she wanted to say, so it was fine to leave the words unspoken.

After a few more perfunctory words of thanks, Kiari shuffled off, along with Beelzebub. Once the two of them left, the somber atmosphere remained.

"Every day is worse than the last." Linda muttered. "The confirmed death toll so far has been cataclysmic. Families ripped apart, separated between Realspace, the Hall of Heroes, and even the Cube."

Melody crossed her arms. "The situation with the Volgrim isn't great, either. The Dolgrimites have strong-armed the First Founder into becoming a figurehead, and that was just today. They're still shaking the Demon Deities down in a sort of protection racket. They want all of us to bow our heads to Dolgris."

"And if you don't?" Chadwick asked.

"Then they won't offer our worlds any protection. They'll let us die to the Plague. What they want is absolute control over the Milky Way." Melody replied.

"Is this bad news for us?" Yamir asked, crossing his muscled arms.

"Well, it's actually sort of good news." Melody answered. "The Demon Deities are wary of the Volgrim. Even though the Volgrim have lost the overwhelming majority of their Psion fighting force, the Dolgrimites are extremely fearsome. None of the Deities know how the Dolgrimites, as mere mortals, are able to thrash the seemingly invincible Plagueborn. Thus, the Demon Deities are secretly hoping humanity will come up with a countermeasure of our own to push back the Plague."

"Despicable scumbags." Chadwick hissed through his teeth. "They attack us, brutalize us, rape and torture us, and now they expect us to become their saviors? Whatever countermeasures we come up with should be ours and ours alone."

"That's assuming we come up with any at all." Linda pointed out. "I don't know about you, but I haven't heard of anyone working on a countermeasure to the Plague. If we haven't even started, we'll never succeed."

"Don't be so certain!" Belial exclaimed, startling the others. "I know the situation seems dire, what with Jason, Hope, and Phoebe all being dead. But have you people forgotten?! Fiona is alive and well, inside a time-accelerated realm. Every day we hold on, another year passes for her. She's inventive, resourceful, and smart as hell. She'll definitely come up with a solution to the Plague."

"Don't count out the Hall of Heroes." Henry said, jumping into the conversation with both feet. "Solomon might be dead, but we have many powerful ancient Heroes at work trying to solve the same problem. Hope's kids, especially Mandy, have serious potential to disrupt the galactic balance of power. Mandy has been experimenting with Rune Words to try and eradicate the infection that turns Plaguehosts into faceless monsters."

"Any success?" Melody asked.

"...Not as of yet." Henry admitted. "But all it takes is one lucky breakthrough. If the Dolgrimites can uncover the Plague's weakness, humanity can as well."

A moment passed. Cassiel decided to speak up, which surprised everyone. She usually stayed quiet so as to not blow her cover, shaky though it might be.

"Didn't Jason cure the Flaw? Why have no humans become Heroes yet?"

Linda blinked. She looked at Cassiel thoughtfully.

"A good question. I'm not sure. Perhaps repairing the Flaw wasn't enough? Maybe we're all too old and it will only affect our children, years from now?"

"Plausible..." Belial said quietly. "We don't have any way to know. For now, increasing the Legion's size is probably our best bet."

"The more people who become Legion, the more our collective base of knowledge improves." Henry added. As the foremost Legion representative, he was always eager to advertise its benefits. "We're not just fighters, you know. We have scientists and inventors among our ranks. We're even trying to bring a few Heroic Ancestors into the fold. With Solomon dead, we need all the help we can get."

Despite his excitement, Henry's pitch didn't move the hearts of anyone present. The Legion was looked upon favorably for the strength of its members, but everyone who wanted to join its hivemind already had. Anyone who hadn't joined yet were unlikely to do so in the near future.

Despite being called 'Legion', it only had around 3,000 soldiers. Each member was strong, but the quality of its soldiers varied widely. Henry was the strongest, and he was able to contend with Demon Emperors. None of the others were in his league. That indicated further additions to the Legion would likely only be in the range of Demon Lord strength. Not worth it for the price of giving up one's entire private life, as far as most humans were concerned.

"I don't see that happening." Linda said to Belial, after noting the muted response to Henry's plea. "Humans are strong because we embrace technology and magic equally and without bias. I would like to focus on empowering Samantha, Kiari, and our other high-level assets with technology rather than moderately uplifting the strength of our weakest assets. A thousand ants cannot bring down an elephant."

"If our enemies were only the Plaguehosts, that would be true." Chadwick countered. "But humanity must beware the Volgrim and Demons just as much."

The small group continued to talk for a while longer, but they didn't come to much of a consensus. Eventually, they dispersed and went their separate ways.

As Belial left, Cassiel and Soleil jogged over to her side.

"Hey." Cassiel said with a small smile. "Um, can we do more training? That funeral left me feeling... restless."

Belial nodded. "I suppose."

The trio started walking toward the northern side of Melodia. They crossed one of its central river bridges and made their way up to the woodlands. There they entered a makeshift arena hidden in the forest that Belial and Cassiel had carved with their magical abilities.

Cassiel looked around. She confirmed there weren't any demons or other Sentients in the area, then she deactivated the Heaven's Shroud. Her true angelic form emerged, a halo above her white hair, her wings spilling out behind her back.

Belial looked at her, then quickly looked away.

"Is something wrong?" Cassiel asked.

Belial hesitated. "It's just... for a second there, I was a little struck by your..."

She trailed off.

"My what?" Cassiel asked.

Belial shook her head. "Nothing. It's nothing. Let's get to training. You've been improving a lot over the last two weeks, but you're still a long way from beating me."

Cassiel nodded. She focused her mind, then rapidly conjured a set of powerful divine armor around herself, completely hiding her body within its confines. After donning this armor, she stood nearly seven feel tall and towered over Belial. She wielded a heavy great-mace in her right hand, and a tower shield in her left.

Soleil stood at the edge of the arena, not watching Cassiel, but instead monitoring the area. She was always aware and fearful of the idea Gressil could suddenly attack. Having fought Belial a couple of times, Soleil had confirmed her physical body was on par with a Demon Emperor. She could absolutely beat Gressil if he showed his face, which was likely why he hadn't.

The Black Hole Construct was Cassiel's protector, assigned to her by the fallen Jason Hiro. She took her duties seriously. With Cassiel spending more time with Belial over the last couple of weeks, Soleil had felt that her friendship with her master had taken a hit. She and Cassiel simply didn't talk as much anymore, and not as closely when they did. Cassiel's trauma had noticeably faded, replaced instead with a hunger and resolve to become stronger.

Cassiel's ultimate goal was apparent. She wanted to become strong enough to take revenge on her tormentor with her own hands. No matter the price, she wanted to flay Gressil's skin from his body, piece by piece.

Thus, she was only relying on Soleil in the present, while she still needed to. Cassiel was not happy with her own weakness, but she had to make do with the resources at her disposal.

"Begin!" Belial shouted as she lunged at Cassiel.

The world of Numaria.

Yardrat's Astral Body stepped through one of his portals into a treehouse high in the woodlands of Numaria. He arrived inside Demon Deity Auger's palace, then immediately took a knee while bowing his head.

"Master, I have returned. The Dolgrimite delegates were persistent."

Auger stepped out of a nearby room where he had been freshening up. The wise old male demon smiled at his subordinate.

"Dangerous, these zealot types are. We can continue delaying them for a time, but eventually, they will demand an answer. They know our delays are intentional, and we know they know, but still we must maintain the facade. They intend to crush our morale when the humans fail to come up with a counter-measure against the Plague."

"Master, we already had a counter-measure." Yardrat said, lifting his head to look up at Yardrat. "Diablo. If one of us could rise to defeat the Plague, could not another?"

Auger sighed. "If Diablo had joined with me, I could have gained access to the power of the so-called Archdemon. Then his death would not have affected us materially. I would have passed his ability on to another before he perished, be they you or someone else. But do not forget, Yardrat, that it was the empowered Plague which defeated the Archdemon. Perhaps the Archdemon's power was only effective against the Plague's former, weaker iteration."

A few moments passed. Yardrat stood up, then looked off into the distance while chewing his lower lip.

"It occurs to me that we do not necessarily need to 'defeat' the Plague, master. We need only make it disappear. Perhaps by using my portals, we could send the Kolvaxors far, far away. To another galaxy, even. With their strongest entities gone, the Plague would not be able to press the attack so easily."

"Can your portals reach that far?" Auger asked pointedly.

Another several seconds passed. Yardrat knotted his brow and concentrated, sending out his Cosmic power to the edge of the Milky Way. He gave up not long afterward.

"...No. The Akashic Barrier limits me. If it were that easy, other entities with powers similar to mine could have- huh?"

At the same time, Yardrat and Auger suddenly lifted their heads. They looked up toward the ceiling, not actually looking at it, but gazing through its physical form as if it didn't exist.

"A Cosmic Signature entering the Numaria system?" Auger exclaimed. "We're not expecting guests! And this speed... who could it be?"

"It's heading straight for our world, master!" Yardrat replied. "I shall intercept."

"No, don't." Auger said. "You are but a Low Cosmic, tethered to Yardris. Your power is limited while off-world. I must be the one to investigate this newcomer's intentions!"

Auger waved his hand, and a hole opened in the ceiling. An instant later, he rocketed upward, traveling into Numaria's upper atmosphere within just a few seconds. His speed was ludicrous. He caused a sonic boom due to his excessive speed.

But the approaching entity made his heart turn cold.

"Impossible... a High Cosmic?! Such a creature does not exist in the Milky Way! Unless... have the Dolgrimites grown more serious? Could their master be...?"

The blip of energy raced toward Numaria, drawing closer and closer every second. Auger had sensed it once it arrived at the furthest edge of the system, but it had already crossed half the distance to Numaria, traveling dozens of AU in mere moments.

"A High Cosmic..." Auger whispered, frightened out of his wits.

If the entity held any hostile intentions, he would not be able to resist. The combined power of all the Middle Cosmic Deities might stand a chance, but they could only project limited fragments of their power via weakened Astral Bodies or through Yardrat's portals. They could not unite together to defend any individual system. This was demonkind's greatest weakness!

Worse, if an enemy did kill one of the Demon Deities, they could never replace the fallen. Only Diablo possessed the power to Uplift his brethren. Each dead Deity would be a permanent loss to their empire!

"Damn, damn, damn! Just who is it?" Auger hissed, readying himself for a battle. "The aura feels a little familiar, but there's such a dense veil of hatred and bloodlust, it makes me want to vomit! This creature is an aberration, without fail!"

Auger was tempted to abandon his world, but that would effectively mean suicide. He was a Middle Cosmic and had been tethered to Numaria permanently. If he left, he would become a Demon Grunt again, losing all his powers and abilities. If the star was destroyed, he would die.

"Come on then. We'll see if my arsenal can defeat your superior strength!" Auger roared.

Less than a minute after entering the system, the incoming High Cosmic was within sight. Auger's battle rage shifted. His eyes widened as he beheld the figure hurtling toward him.

"You... how could it be.. no! My world! Watch out!!"

The figure blew past Auger at a speed too incomprehensible to put into words. It crashed into Numaria's atmosphere and instantly lit up the world's forests, sending walls of flames blasting outward in all directions from the impact site. A shockwave of unimaginable proportions detonated in a sphere, flattening forests, causing mountains to erupt in parallel with the shockwave's momentum, and the oceans to tear away from the land. Later, they would crash back upon the shores, summoning hundred-foot-tall tsunamis to ravage the coasts.

The figure burned on impact. It appeared not to be in control of its flight, and was instead falling helplessly toward the planet below, its flight slowing down every second due to extreme friction.

Forest fires swept outward in the path of the falling Cosmic. Demons and monsters perished en-masse, opening their mouths to scream, only for their bodies to instantly immolate and evaporate to ash. Even hardy Demon Barons could barely withstand the force of the falling Cosmic for mere seconds before they, too, were dispatched to the Great Beyond.

Eventually, the figure crashed into a mountain, sending millions of tons of rock and debris flying in a great cone outward. Those walls of debris rained down upon Numaria's forest, smashing into trees and breaking them into splinters and fragments of wood.

A minute later, it was over. The aftereffects of the Cosmic's fall would cause immense damage to Numaria over the coming weeks, devastating it with fires and flame... but the planet had ultimately survived, even if only barely.

Auger flew down and stopped half a kilometer above the crash side. He swallowed short, sharp breaths as he glowered with hate-filled eyes.

"Show yourself, woman! You dare come here, thinking I will be an easy target? This decapitation strike will fail! It will be your head I claim today!"

The figure lay deep inside an underground chasm, one carved by their fall to Numaria. After several seconds, nobody responded, leaving Auger more worried than before.

"Come out!" He barked. "Or else!"

A voice spoke from deep underground. The voice was weak, as if heavily injured. It was also male.

"Auger. Come... down here... it is... not... she... it is me..."

Auger blinked. "What? How can that be?"

He carefully flew downward, using the powers of multiple Burrowers amplified to the Cosmic level to carve a path to the Cosmic signature that lay unmoving beneath the mountain.

Eventually, Auger arrived. He found a figure covered in black armor, soaked in blood, laying face-down amidst the rubble. The figure was badly injured and looked to be on the brink of death.

"Auger... help me..."

Auger took three steps forward. He stopped at arm's length away and looked at the broken man who lay before him.

"Barbatos? You're... you're alive? But Uriel possessed you. She was taken! Taken by the Plague!"

Barbatos, the former Duke of Steel, now possessed a body on the level of a High Cosmic. He was a Demon Deity stronger than any other. But he was also dying.

The Deity named Barbatos coughed blood. He carefully turned his head, his dim red eyes looking up at Auger with eyes that did not yet wish to die.

"A plot... most foul... a trap... we were fooled... the Milky Way... she... she will kill us... her hatred... infinite... her revenge... she... she... she..."

The breath left his body. He fainted, unable to complete what he was saying.

Auger stared in bewilderment at Barbatos's broken form. He gazed upon it for all of three seconds before quickly and gently levitating him into the air.

"I must find Belial! AT ONCE!!"

Part 692: Healing Barbatos

Far-Future Era. Noon, Day 20, AJR. Melodia.

Cassiel's massive armored form moved far too quickly for how heavy and cumbersome it looked. She flapped her wings and lunged at Belial, swinging a greatmace made of light at her as if it were a toothpick. When Belial leaped to the side to evade, the mace struck the ground and sprayed a cone of dirt out in a huge circle. In truth, the mace was a weapon so heavy that no human could lift it even an inch off the ground, yet Cassiel defied this rule not because of her bodily strength, but because the mace was formed of light energy she could control with her mind.

She cheated the laws of physics!

Her armor was the same. Though it was made from 'mere' strands of holy energy, it was tougher than demonstone, with an intricate internal structure that absorbed the impact of blunt blows and resisted the impaling strikes of sharp weapons.

Belial's fingers turned into claws of bone. Her arm snapped out and stretched, raking Cassiel's armor as she tried to grab onto any gaps in the armor and rip it apart piece by piece. She failed. The armor was too seamless, and her efforts left only the shallowest of scratches on the armor's surface, scratches which immediately vanished as the armor healed itself with Cassiel's internal energy.

A brutal and fast-paced melee commenced. Cassiel sometimes chased Belial and tried to kill her (within reason) while other times Belial's brutal strength struck Cassiel and sent her flying! Her armor might be hard and her mace capable of inflicting great pain upon an adversary, but Belial was a living weapon. She had strength greater than Bael in his prime, the ability to heal herself, and ways of stretching her body to evade attacks with unnatural dexterity. By comparison, Cassiel's heavy armor was a giant target she could not use to evade with much ease.

Deep and heavy footprints had sunk into the ground around the arena. Cassiel's 7-foot-tall armored form stomped the pavement with brutal force, leaving imprints deep enough for a fully-grown-man to feel inadequate if her were to step into them. These also created a slight tripping hazard, which turned into Cassiel's undoing! She stormed toward Belial to try and deliver a final attack, but her foot half-stepped into a deep groove she had left previously, and this was enough to make her lose her footing. Cassiel cried out as she tumbled forward and fell face-first to the ground, momentarily stunned.

Belial leaped on top of her back, stretched her arms and legs around Cassiel's armored limbs, and began to constrict her like a cobra.

"Submit!" Belial shouted.

"I won't! Uaaahh!" Cassiel roared.

She struggled mightily, but being able to somewhat manipulate the laws of physics by altering the weight of her equipment was nothing compared to Belial's vastly superior strength. If Belial were wearing the armor, she would move and attack even faster, since she was a far stronger entity!

After a few seconds, Cassiel's armor started to groan in protest. She wriggled and wiggled, trying to break free of the spiderweb-like stretchy limbs that bound her, but she failed to break free.

Thirty seconds later, her body went still. Cassiel sighed.

"...I concede."

Belial smiled. "That wasn't so hard, was it?"

She unwound herself from around Cassiel's limbs, then hopped off the armor, allowing Cassiel to de-summon it. Cassiel looked tired and glum from losing to Belial again.

"Why can't I beat you?" Cassiel asked while plopping on her butt and staring at the ground. "I'm so weak now."

"You're not weak at all." Belial said, as she took a seat next to Cassiel and gently massaged her back. She'd been doing that a lot, recently. "I'm just a bad matchup for you. I have tens of millennia of fighting experience, my body is much stronger than yours, and I also know exactly how your powers work. I can counter you much more easily now."

"How strong are you compared to Emperor Crow?" Cassiel pressed.

"Hmm..." Belial hummed, looking off into the distance. "I'm not entirely certain. The last time I fought Crow was during the Energy Wars as part of a mock exercise."

"So you don't know how strong she is?" Cassiel pressed.

"I do. Sort of. But only vaguely." Belial answered. "Crow is known as the most physically powerful Emperor. Her physical strength is likely higher than mine, and her durability was considered close to Bael's, so in terms of taking and dealing damage, she's a powerhouse. However, her defense is overstated. She's durable because of her feathers, which are harder than demonstone. They form a powerful set of natural armor around herself, and they can be launched and controlled remotely."

Cassiel appeared intrigued. "Like drones?"

"Sure. Like drones." Belial confirmed. "But if I were to seriously go against Crow, it's not clear which of us would win. I'm much more agile than Crow, and good at avoiding damage. I can stretch my body and move in unnatural ways, allowing me to feint hard against my enemies. I can heal myself and my allies, but Crow cannot. If push came to shove, I could enter my True Succubus form, and I would probably be on par with her physically."

"True Succubus form?" Cassiel said, trying to imagine what that would look like in her head.

"I harden my skin to stone, grow a pair of wings, and my defensive ability rises sharply." Belial explained. "But I can't heal or stretch my limbs while in that form, so there's a tradeoff."

To emphasize her point, Belial changed her body shape. Her skin turned dark grey, with a rocky texture covering it, and stone wings growing out of her back. Cassiel's eyes glinted with awe.

"That's your True Succubus form?"

Belial shook her head. "No. I just shapeshifted to look like it. Changing my form is exhausting and leaves me vulnerable once I revert. It's a measure of last resort, and doesn't always work. I used it against Ose during Stormbringer, but I still lost."

Cassiel seemed to understand. She nodded.

"So do you think if I fought Emperor Crow, I could win?"

"Why the fixation on Crow?" Belial asked. "Of all the Emperors?"

"Because I killed Emperor Red Raven." Cassiel said softly. "Of all the demons who exist, I imagine none hate me more than Crow. I ran into her inside the Core a couple of weeks ago. Luckily, she didn't notice my Heaven's Shroud. If she had, I'd probably have died without being able to protect myself."

Belial deeply frowned. "If that's the case, then we have to be more careful. We cannot allow your identity to leak. I should look into building an underground training area- or perhaps we should contact the Phoenix. Training in a slightly time-accelerated realm will give us more privacy. I'm sure Henry will have a few Legionnaires inside the Cube."

At this point, the Cube had become humanity's worst-kept secret. The demons knew of its existence, as did the Volgrim, but locating it was impossible, at least for the moment. With Tarus II destroyed, the Cube had departed the system, and none could locate it through any means below the Cosmic. It was hidden inside a dimensional tunnel, and the one entity capable of sensing it, Founder Dosena, had lost her powers.

"You're probably right." Cassiel said. "Of the two, I think the Cube would be the best-"

"Incoming!" Soleil suddenly shouted, startling Cassiel and Belial both. "A Cosmic Energy signature just appeared at the Warpgate. It's a Demon Deity!"

Her senses toward this sort of thing were even superior to Belial's. By the time Belial would have sensed the Demon Deity's approach, it would have been too late.

Cassiel immediately grabbed her Heaven's Shroud. She morphed her body back into that of an ordinary human, then hurriedly tucked the shroud into her shirt. At the same time, Soleil shifted her form to a human woman and took a seat on the ground, lounging casually as if unaware of what was coming.

Moments later, an Astral Body tore across the sky at ludicrous speed. It locked on to Belial's position, then rushed toward her before abruptly stopping less than ten meters away.

The newcomer was a woman wearing black robes tightly winding around her body. Her pitch-black eyes glowed with the light of the Void. She was Vespera, the Demon Deity of Quasars.

"Belial!" Vespera said, as she levitated before the succubus. "You must come with me. At once!"

Belail stood up. She glowered at Vespera. "And why would that be? This is Melody's world. You dare not try to kidnap me here."

"It is a matter of great importance." Vespera replied. "We require your healing powers. The situation is dire!"

"Whoever it is, just throw them in the Blood Pits." Belial said, crossing her arms. "I'm not your personal nurse."

"You do not understand the gravity of the situation." Vespera hissed. She levitated closer to Belial and lowered her voice. "The one who needs healing is a Demon Deity. The wounds he suffered will affect our ability to fight off the Plague. It is in both our best interests to help him."

Belial blinked. Her posture softened a little. "Who was injured?"

"I cannot say. Not here, not publicly." Vespera answered. She suddenly glanced at Soleil, then at Cassiel, as if noticing the presence of two bugs crawling on the wall for the first time. Her gaze especially lingered on Cassiel, due to her proximity to Belial. She was standing right next to her.

"These two are my maidservants." Belial said. "Anything you can say to me, you can say in front of them."

"They are human. They are not worthy." Vespera spat, before returning her attention to Belial. "Now hurry and come along. Or would you rather allow a close friend to perish due to your obstinance?"

"A close friend?" Belial repeated, her heart suddenly chilling a couple of degrees. "Who?"

Vespera sneered. "Are you coming, or not?"

Belial hesitated for another few seconds before her obstinance visibly deflated. She nodded. "Alright. Take me there, then. Cammy, Serra, I'll return later."

Cassiel and Soleil nodded respectfully, then bowed at the waist.

"Yes, mistress." Cassiel said, playing up the part of an uneducated servant girl. "We will await your return."

Belial nodded gruffly, then allowed Vespera to grab hold of her with Void energy and levitate her into the air.

Before they departed, Vespera glanced at Cassiel. "I didn't take you as the type to use servants, Belial."

"It's Samantha." Belial immediately replied. "And I have my... needs... that my girls fulfill. It's none of your business."

"Ohoho, so it's like that?" Vespera sneered. She took off into the air, but for a brief instant, a sensation of shock went through her body as her powerful Cosmic sense casually scanned Cassiel and Soleil one last time. She immediately closed her mouth and steadied her expression. Belial didn't notice the anomaly.

The two of them rocketed away. After they left, Cassiel frowned, ever so slightly.

Vespera took Belial to the Warpgate, which brought them to the Core. After that, they transferred to Numaria, and this immediately raised alarm bells for Belial. After all, the Deity of Numaria was Auger! Had he been struck by an enemy? And if so, who?

"It's not Auger." Vespera said, quieting the voices in Belial's head. "Remain patient. You will see."

If Belial was being honest with herself, she found it rather obnoxious how Vespera, a young upstart who became a Deity through a stroke of luck, lorded her presence over Belial. When Belial fought the angels in the Ancient Era, Vespera was not even spawned yet. When the Energy Wars raged, Vespera was little more than a Baron on the frontlines. Belial was thousands of years older than her, but Vespera acted like she wore britches too big for Belial to comprehend.

It was truly irritating.

The two women flew quickly through the sky. Belial's eyes widened in horror as she saw that the world of Numaria was on fire as far as her eyes could see. Much of the forest had been flattened. Infernos raged, and the few demons who specialized in water magic had been assigned to Numaria to try and put out all the burning trees.

Soon, they drew close to a mountain, one which looked like it had once been tall and fearsome, but now was shattered and broken. Belial could tell with a single glance that something had crashed into and destroyed the mountain. It was probably 1/5th its original size, with a massive impact tunnel leading deep into Numaria's underbelly.

Vespera took Belial underground. She set Belial down and gestured ahead with her chin. "Follow me. Move quickly!"

Belial nodded. The two of them started running through the somewhat narrowed corridor at the speeds only high level demons could achieve, and within less than a minute, they drew closer and closer to an aura so powerful and suffocating that Belial started to feel afraid. Whatever was down here, it dwarfed the aura of Auger, which she had sensed many times since his ascension.

Finally, they arrived inside a cavern that had been deliberately hollowed out. Several demons, none of them below the rank of Emperor, stood waiting as Belial appeared.

Emperor Crow was standing at the back, nearest the entrance, and was the first to say something when Belial emerged inside the room. "Ca-CAW! Took you long enough! Hurry! He's dying!"

"Belial, over here!" Yardrat shouted, his astral body levitating a few feet off the ground.

Belial walked further into the cave and approached a body that was immediately familiar to her.

"Uriel?! She's alive??" Belial asked, bewildered.

Auger appeared at Belial's side. He squeezed her shoulder reassuringly.

"Not Uriel. This is Barbatos. Pure and simple. Somehow, he has regained control of his body while also ascending to the rank of High Cosmic. I need not tell you what a fortuitous outcome this is for demonkind, but we must know what happened and how he escaped the clutches of the Plague. He passed out before he could tell me. Heal him, Samantha. I beg of you!"

Belial nodded. Barbatos was a good demon. He was slow to anger, and absolutely worthy of being the highest ranked among their people. Even if Uriel took over again, Belial felt that Uriel had changed a lot after spending time with the humans. She might not go on a genocidal rampage.

"Where is Serena?" Belial asked. "I can heal the body, but if he has any injuries to his soul..."

"No worries." Yardrat said. "I'm already bringing Serena and Leeroy here. The two of them should be able to help you recover Barbatos's energy."

And so, with that in mind, Belial got to work. Dozens of powerful Demon Emperors and Deities watched from the sidelines, whispering to one another while she concentrated and started working to heal him.

Unbeknownst to her, Vespera had moved more to the back of the room. A deep frown was playing upon her face. She massaged her chin repeatedly, muttering under her breath with signs of obvious agitation.

"Vespera." Demon Emperor Hamir whispered. "Is something the matter?"

"Perhaps..." Vespera whispered, before lowering her voice even further. "When I picked up Belial, I made a distressing discovery. She had two humans in her entourage, but one of them appeared to be wearing a Heaven's Shroud."

"What? A Shroud? You're certain?" Hamir asked.

Another nearby demon perked her ears up. Emperor Crow subtly turned her gaze to look at Vespera. She kept quiet, listening while pretending not to hear their discussion.

"Someone named 'Cammy.'" Vespera said, her voice shaking. "That was her human name, at least."

"Cammy?" Hamir asked. "As in... Camael? Is it possible?"

"So many other Archangels have survived, perhaps the old witch herself did, too." Vespera said. "I will speak to Auger of this matter soon. The only reason I didn't immediately make a move was because if she was indeed Camael in disguise, she could pose a threat to me, especially my mere Astral Body. Also, that world is Melody's stronghold. I wouldn't want to draw her attention."

"No, you made the right choice." Hamir whispered, gently touching her arm. The two of them hailed from the same Hell and had known each other for millennia. They were intimately close. "We now know to look for a human named 'Cammy'. What is her human appearance?"

Vespera described Cassiel's shouded look, and Hamir nodded seriously. "A brown-haired young woman and her black-haired friend... I don't imagine Camael would appear young, but perhaps she altered and improved upon the original Heaven's Shroud. It would certainly make us suspect her less, and explain how she evaded capture all these millennia."

"If Camael is alive, do you think this has anything to do with Barbatos reappearing here and Uriel now seemingly dormant?"

"I am not certain." Vespera admitted. "All of this is quite... worrying. I sense a grand plot may be at play."

While she and Hamir continued to swap theories, Emperor Crow's breathing became irregular. She looked around, realizing nobody was paying any attention to her. Auger would certainly want to make a speech about Barbatos's survival later, but that wasn't of any importance to Crow.

It's her. It's that angel I found in the simulation. Not Camael. Heaven's Daughter! The one who killed my HUSBAND!

Flames of rage erupted inside Crow's mind. It became more and more difficult for her to contain her smoldering craving for vengeance.

"Yo! Crow! You good, sister?"

Crow turned to see Emperor Fae standing a short distance away, looking at her with a smug smirk.

"I am... fine." Crow hissed. "I believe my last ritual imbalanced my mana. Excuse me. I must depart."

"Sure, whatever!" Fae laughed. "I'll let Old Man Auger know!"

"Please do." Crow said.

She turned and stormed away. Only Fae knew she had left. Belial was completely unaware.

As she left, Crow thought of several things.

It will take Belial time to heal Barbatos. He is a powerful Cosmic. Her mortal magic will be ineffective compared to its usual potency. Additionally, Auger will want to bluster about the so-called fate of demonkind, thus keeping Belial even longer. I have a window of opportunity before she can return to that angel's side.

Crow stepped out into the smoking Numarian hellscape. She flapped her wings and leaped into the sky, taking flight as she raced back to the Warpgate.

Heaven's Daughter! Your life is MINE!

At the same time, sweat dripped from Belial's forehead. She wiped it off and breathed heavily.

"The wounds are severe." Belial grunted. "I'm healing Barbatos, but the progress is slow. I haven't sensed any holy energy inside of him. Maybe Uriel isn't inside his soul anymore."

"Or she's gone dormant." Auger retorted. "It fits the pattern."

"Maybe, but then again, maybe not." Belial countered. "Auger, is there even one entity in the Milky Way that could maim Barbatos this brutally? Notice how powerful he has become. He looks like he took on a group of equally powerful enemies and barely survived by the skin of his teeth."

"An Apex Cosmic would be capable of bringing Barbatos to this state." Auger confirmed. "But such an enemy would be more likely to kill him. I just don't know... once you heal him, we'll hear the full story."

Belial nodded. She doubled her efforts, straining mightily as her pitiful mortal magic slowly put together the much tougher, much more vitality-filled bones, tendons, and blood-veins that comprised Barbatos's body.

Two entire hours passed. Leeroy and Serena soon arrived, helping Belial heal the other components of Barbatos's injuries, namely his brain and soul. Eventually, Barbatos stirred. He was far from fully healed, but he had enough vitality to rouse himself.

"Uhh..." Barbatos wheezed.

"Brother Barbatos." Auger said, dropping to one knee while resting a palm on Barbatos's chest. "How are you faring?"

The former Duke of Steel slowly opened his eyes. They were now glowing bright red, but still had an aura of weakness to them. It was clear he was far from well.

"Fooled..." Barbatos said weakly. "We were tricked. My brother... Artorias... he... he was..."

"Artorias?" Belial asked. "What about him? What happened?"

Barbatos slowly closed his eyes. His breathing became shallower.

For a time, nobody said a word. They started to think their sole High Cosmic had fallen back into a coma.

But then, with his eyes closed, he began to speak.

"Raphael... it was.. him... his plot..."

And so, Barbatos began to narrate the fate that had befallen him.

His story would contain a shocking tale that upended everyone's knowledge of the galactic order.

They had all of them... been deceived.

Part 693: Creator's Conspiracy

Far-Future Era. Two days pre-AJR.

Two 7th Level Kolvaxors gazed down upon Uriel as she was dragged under the soil.

"Raph-!!"

Dirt flooded into Uriel's mouth, choking her and burying alive. The last thing she saw was her brother's silent, unmoving figure.

Time passed.

Uriel awoke in a daze. Her vision blurry, she couldn't make out the world around herself.

Then, all at once, a spike of fear shot through her heart. Her eyes widened, and her vision cleared up. She found herself in an unbelievably vast underground chasm, embedded in a wall. Less than twenty feet ahead of her, on the opposite wall, there were strange objects snared in place. It took her a second to identify them as strange webbed pods. The sort of thing a giant spider would use to ensnare a meal and wrap it up before consuming it later. Uriel tried to move, to wiggle her body, but she failed.

Her heart-rate shot up further as she looked down and realized she, too, was trapped! Only her head was free, which stood in contrast to the other webbed pods that clung to the walls. A look to her right and left demonstrated that there were thousands, hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of other pods going up, down, left and right, as far as her powerful eyesight could see. The chasm seemed to extended infinitely into the distance, a dense fog blanketing the far distant edges.

"Nay, nay, nay!" Uriel cried, trying even harder to wiggle. She failed again. "What devilry... nay!!"

Her arms were fastened against her stomach. They were completely ensnared by webs with the consistency of iron and concrete. She couldn't twitch a finger, let alone cast magic to try and free herself. Even her toes were trapped. She realized she had been stripped nude, and now only her head was free! Her hair was filthy, and it clung to the webbing, making it so if she turned her head too much, she was certain to rip some of her hairs out. A mild pain she would gladly endure if it ensured her survival.

She was not truly herself. She had long ago possessed Barbatos's body and reformed it in her image. She looked just like her original self, but at her core, she had corrupted the body of a Demon Duke, forcibly empowering it to the peak of mortal power.

Now, she felt that, though she could not see her body, she knew something had changed. That facade was failing her. Her hair, what little she saw, had lost its white color and had turned black. When she screamed, her voice was deeper and more masculine. She was reverting back to Barbatos's original form! Whatever this pod was, it was undoing all her hard work to return to her original appearance.

But she didn't care about that. She would happily wear Barbatos's body like a puppet so long as it allowed her to escape and achieve her objectives. Right now, she was most horrified by the fact this strange webbed pod had such a power. Was it draining her energy? Was it going to suck the life from her soul? Was she-

[Sister. Thou art finally awake.]

A male voice spoke within Uriel's soul. She quickly submerged herself into her Mind Realm, where she found Raphael, Michael, and Gabriel all awaiting her arrival.

When Uriel's spirit manifested next to her brothers, she immediately locked eyes with Raphael. He smiled kindly at her, but she felt a chill go down her back. Neither Michael nor Gabriel said a word. They stared at the ground, as if having recently learned a secret that had... shattered their spirits.

[Raphael! RAPHAEL!] Uriel roared. [Thou hath explaining to do!]

She stormed toward Raphael and grabbed him by his robes' collar, but he didn't resist. His smile weakened, and he looked off to the side.

[Sister. Many millennia have passed, but the Work is done. Do not fret. The current situation is not as it appears. You are safe.]

[Safe?!] Uriel bit back. [I'm trapped! Trapped in a strange, horrible room made of nightmares! Art thou behind this??]

[Indeed, I am.] Raphael admitted. He fell silent, before adding, [Release me, and I shalt answer all the questions on thy mind.]

Uriel flicked her eyes over to Gabriel and Michael, but she didn't let Raphael go. Upon sensing her gaze, Michael lifted his head and locked eyes with her.

[Listen to Raphael's tale.] Michael said quietly. ['Tis both horrifying and beautiful. But mostly... tragic. He has long planned for this day to come.]

Uriel's eyebrows tensed. She continued to squeeze Raphael's collar, lifting him off the ground an inch or two before snarling and dropping him back on his feet. She spun around and walked a few steps away to cool her head.

[Speak!] Uriel barked. [What treachery is this?! One of the Kolvaxians which struck me was an illusion, an illusion made by THEE! I saw it with my own eyes, Raphael!]

['Twas, and thou dids't.] Raphael admitted. [Sister, come, sit. I have already explained the situation to Michael and Gabriel. 'Tis time thou understood the Truth I hath not spoken in my life. Only one other knows, but Solomon wisely kept his mouth shut, as this Truth did not concern him.]

Uriel relented. She walked over to Raphael, but even as he took a seat, she did not. A feeling of uncertainty had taken hold, and she now felt she couldn't trust her own brother. As such, she merely stood with her arms crossed, looking down on his seated form.

Raphael didn't press the issue. He summoned a pipe and started to smoke.

['Twas many eons ago when I first conceived my plan. Many roadblocks barred the path. I needed to systematically eliminate them, one by one.]

[It began with the Dragon and Titan Wars. Primordial battles which occurred on a scale few can begin to fathom. Wars which obliterated entire star systems and ravaged the galaxy, slowly but surely draining it of its magical energy. And with that drainage, the weakness of the Angel form became apparent.]

Raphael stayed quiet for a time.

[The Creator. 'Twas I who killed him.]

[What?!] Uriel gasped. [Thy father fell at thine hand?!]

[Indeed he did.] Raphael said quietly. [He made me in his image. He expended all his power to ensure I was his equal. At the moment he finished, he had already lost the qualifications to be our galaxy's Ruler. I did not kill him immediately, but instead, a few million years after he had created me and taught me the virtues he lived by.]

Raphael continued. [I killed my father because I believed that by doing so, I would become Ruler. I was wrong. I failed to ascend. And that in turn led to my concocting of wild plans, one after another, schemes I believed that would allow me to Ascend. All of them failed.]

Uriel gazed at her brother with the eyes of someone spotting a beast lurking in the darkness. She was not a fool. She had seen flashes of his cunning, glimpses of the monstrous side he had tried to hide, but never did she realize the depths of his depravity.

[And this latest scheme?] Uriel asked. [Trapping us in a den of evil?!]

[Ah. This plan is one I began working on even before I had our people's minds wiped.] Raphael explained. [Camael gave me the idea. A method to make the angels regain their sovereign status once again. Unfortunately, the price we need pay would be... quite extreme.]

Raphael gestured broadly outside of Uriel's vision.

[The time is now, sister. Our people await.]

Uriel blinked. [Our people...?]

She returned her attention to the real world. What she saw scared the life out of her.

She was no longer inside that terrible chasm. She had been freed! Without her even knowing, the pod that ensnared her had vanished, and she had somehow been transported to a pure white realm that shone with blinding light. Her eyes watered from its luminosity. She attempted to shield her face with her hands, but the light came equally from all directions and cast no shadows. It was a futile effort.

"This... where is this place?" Uriel asked.

Raphael materialized beside her, his body the same spiritual construct as before.

"'Tis the Cosmic Realm, sister. Or perhaps, one mayeth say 'tis the shoddy facsimile of the True Cosmic Realm I tried to create. Sadly, I failed and could not subvert Akasha's domain... but this False Cosmic Realm still has its uses."

Raphael smiled at Uriel. She did not smile back. She shivered, feeling there was something uncanny about his expression.

"Fear not, Uriel. This day is one I hath long awaited." Raphael said slowly. "Look around thyself. Sense the energy in the air. Hath thou failed to notice what makes this Cosmic Realm unique?"

Uriel tore her eyes away from Raphael. She tried to sense something, anything, but all she could feel was the presence of that all-encompassing light which even her Archangel senses could not block out.

"What am I supposed to sense?" Uriel questioned.

"Ah... verily, thy soul manipulation hath always been inferior to those of the other Archangels." Raphael said with a shake of his head. "I assumed thousands of years battling the will of those two pitiful demons would have improved thy soul sense, but alas."

He gestured broadly.

"This Cosmic Realm failed in its original purpose. But later, I repurposed it to become a repository... a repository of fallen souls. Every Pureblooded Angel who hath fallen since the ancient times ultimately came to reside here. The only exceptions were those whose souls were permanently extinguished, those whose souls were captured by malevolent actors, such as Satan the Devil... and we Archangels, who ultimately took up abode within our rings."

"What?" Uriel questioned, her pupils shrinking to pinpricks. "This... this cannot be! Is not that the same function as the ancient Lazarus Tower, albeit focused upon the souls of angels instead of the souls of humans?!"

Raphael smiled at her slyly.

"How dost thou thinketh I came upon the idea for the Tower? My Cosmic Realm was the original creation, and the Lazarus Tower was but a weaker, modified recreation."

Uriel stared at him blankly for a time. Then, her expression became intense.

"The Lazarus Tower had a flaw, Raphael! Thou were only able to succeed in making it function properly by sacrificing Michael's life to bind all of humanity to the tower. But in order to capture the far mightier souls of angels, particularly ancient angels, an even greater sacrifice would have been necessary!!"

Raphael's smile slipped away. His expression became dark, and he averted his eyes.

"A most terrible sacrifice indeed."

Several seconds of silence followed. The Cosmic Realm became so still that one could hear a pin drop.

Uriel swallowed heavily. Her eyes shook as she looked at her brother in horror.

"Nay... it cannot be..."

"The conclusion thy mind has leapt to... is correct." Raphael said softly.

"Muriel! Cassiel! Then their deaths... they were pre-meditated? They were a part of this sacrifice?!"

"Not intentionally." Raphael said, his voice quiet. "But one must not let a crisis go to waste. I used their souls to finalize the creation of the Cosmic Realm's final functionality. Their deaths were not in vain."

"B-...BASTAARD!" Uriel roared. She lunged at Raphael and smashed her fist into his face. His spiritual construct-body instantly broke apart. He reformed a moment later, his hands casually folded behind his back.

"Uriel. Calm thyself." Raphael said. "Now is not the time-"

"MURDERER!!" Uriel screeched, as hot tears fell from her eyes. She conjured a lance of light and impaled it through Raphael's chest. He perished, then reformed a moment later. "All this time, thou leadeth me to believe 'twas Michael who murdered Cassiel and Muriel in cold blood! But it was not! 'Twas THEE!!"

"I did NOT murder them." Raphael stated. "But I did deceive Michael into doing so. He killed his sisters. I used their souls to empower the Cosmic Realm, and from that point on, I hath collected every fallen Pureblood's soul for the Grand Work."

Hot tears streamed down Uriel's face. Raphael's argument was logical and sound, but Uriel's hatred ran bone-deep. She couldn't remember anything about Cassiel or Muriel. She could not recall their faces, what they looked like, or what sorts of people they were.

But she knew, in her heart, she had loved those two more than anyone else. More than Raphael, certainly. A hundred Raphaels could no longer compare to just one Cassiel or Muriel in her mind.

"Villain..." Uriel hissed through grinding teeth. She looked down at Raphael's ring, and a feeling of hatred started to swell into bloodlust within her gut.

There was one way to silence Raphael for good.

One way to ensure he could no longer inflict any further pain upon the universe!

Just as Uriel was about to reach down and pluck off Raphael's ring, Michael and Gabriel materialized beside her.

"Sister." Michael said softly, as he touched the top of her hand with Raphael's ring. "Do not."

"He is a murderer!!" Uriel screamed. "He orchestrated this! He tricked thee into killing thy closest sisters! Dost thou not feel a burning hatred beyond reason for this old villain?!"

"I did. Once." Michael said quietly. "Raphael is a villain. Aye. But he is a villain who acted to preserve the power of our people. Hath thou failed to comprehend the meaning behind his actions?"

"The meaning? What meaning? Creating a mausoleum of souls?! These are the actions of a genocidal bastard!"

Raphael frowned. "Sister. I did not create this place to be a crypt of remembrance. I created it to do for our fallen people what I did for the humans!"

Raphael puffed out his chest.

"The Cosmic Realm's true purpose... is to revive the angels, take control of the galaxy, and become the victor of Akasha's War!"

Raphael waved his hand. In unison, a dot of light appeared, followed by another, and another, and another...

Tens, hundred, thousands, and eventually trillions of dots of light appeared in the room. Each was the size of a marble, but together, they comprised the entirety of the blinding light which had engulfed the Cosmic Realm.

That omnipresent luminosity was caused by countless, innumerable, infinitely tiny specks of light all shining at once!

When Uriel realized this, her jaw dropped. She was still horrified, but also amazed. How could she not be? The scale of the Cosmic Realm was beyond comprehension!

"And now." Raphael said calmly, turning to look at Uriel with an expressionless face. "The one who made all this possible."

A presence appeared behind Uriel. She stiffened. The aura she felt was familiar, intimately so. She knew who it was without even needing to look.

But even so, when she turned around, she could not believe her eyes.

The person standing there...

"Nay... 'tis not possible!" Uriel exclaimed softly. "Die... I saw thee die... thy body expired..."

"I never died, sister." The dark-skinned woman with angelic wings replied. "'Twas all part of dear eldest brother's deception. The entire galaxy played the part of a fool. In secret, I hath amassed a tremendous power over the last 100,000 years. And now, everything has come to a head! For we are reunited!"

She was Uzziel, the Archangel of Life.

Uriel took a step forward. She wanted to reach out and touch her sister, to hug her, to weep tears of joy.

But she stopped short of doing so.

Uzziel's expression was wholly different from Uriel's memories. She did not wear a calm and loving smile.

Her grin was one filled with hatred, malice, and a desire for blood.

"Heh heh heh..." Uzziel chuckled evilly. "The return of the angels doth be upon us, sister. Why dost thou gazeth upon me as if I were a stranger? Come, hug thy beloved sister and let us catch up on the old times!"

Uzziel was different. Very different. Frighteningly so. Everything about her was... wrong. She carried herself with a sense of pomp and grandiosity. She puffed out her chest and seemed to revel in the look of horror still lingering in Uriel's eyes.

"Uzziel..." Uriel said, instead taking a step backward. "What... has happened... thou art not the sister I remember!"

"That is because thy memory is shoddy." Uzziel spat. "I am as I once was. Before the mind-wipes, I was the most vicious and blackhearted of the Archangels. Raphael deliberately changed me, reformed my personality, and made me into a servile little girl. All to enact our grand plan!"

Uzziel gestured broadly.

"My beloved Plagueborn! My children! United in mind, united in purpose! Perfected, no longer flawed. Even greater than I had hoped, thanks to Raphael's work in the background. If he had not found the Wordsmith and groomed him, my Plagueborn might not have devoured that construct-girl and become invincible! So many steps were required, but we have finally arrived in the endgame. The Milky Way is ours now!"

Uriel turned to look at Gabriel and Michael.

"Thou knew of this?"

"Raphael told us a short while ago, after thy soul had fallen unconscious." Michael said quietly.

"And thy heart is at ease with this circumstance?!" Uriel questioned.

Michael nodded. "'Tis indeed. Sister, I know thou feeleth quite dreadful regarding Raphael's past actions, and perhaps thou even believeth the means doth not justify the ends... but listen to what Uzziel and Raphael hath accomplished. I believe thy heart may yet be moved."

Uriel schooled her expression. She looked at Uzziel, who had casually walked over to Raphael and leaned on his shoulder; an easy task given she was taller than him. Her expression was one of smugness.

"And what 'accomplishment' might that be?" Uriel asked.

"Verily, the 'Kolvaxians', as the galaxy hath dubbed them, art my greatest creation." Uzziel said calmly. "Many purposes they serve, but chief among them, they art a hivemind, linked in purpose. They supplant the lesser species, taking their bodies and reusing them for my purposes. The most important purpose, of course, being..."

Uzziel smiled.

"The revival of the angels!"

"Revival?" Uriel asked, bewildered. "Coulds't thou mean...?"

"Each Plaguehost is made of life energy!" Uzziel proclaimed. "That makes them perfect vessels for the new bodies of our fellow angels. Come, Uriel! Take a look and see. I hath already made bodies for each of thee!"

Uzziel waved her hand. Four winged figures appeared. Their eyes were dead. They stood in place, unmoving. But even so, they radiated a rich aura of life that metaphorically knocked Uriel's socks off!

"These... these bodies look like our original forms!" Uriel gasped.

"Wrong." Uzziel sneered. "They art far superior to those old flesh-vessels we once used. The Creator formed Raphael from the dust of the cosmos incorrectly. That is why our bodies always leaked mana. Because we were flawed! And when Raphael created the Cosmic Realm to birth our species, we inherited his flaw. All of us, down to the very last one. Even when he passed the power of Creation to me, to alleviate his Cosmic burden, I still could not fix our flaw. But all of that hath changed now that I hath completed the Plaguehosts. These bodies art perfect without flaw!"

Uzziel radiated divine energy deliberately, but her aura did not weaken in the slightest.

"The so-called Plague, my children, have bodies formed from all the greatest creatures in our galaxy. Not only do they not leak mana, but they can regenerate any expended mana in a single night, like the humans. They can wield the power of the Psions, or be used to craft technological wonders via the minds of the captured Technopaths. Even those lowly demons can grant us new abilities. We art finally unstoppable! No other galaxy will DARE to challenge us!!"

Uriel frowned. "If thou possesseth the ability to create technological terrors, then why hath thou not done so? The entire galaxy believes the Kolvaxians are nothing more than mindless beasts."

"Why woulds't I?" Uzziel countered. "The Volgrim tore apart our family. Their attack on Earth led to our downfall. The hatred I feel for them is... unquenchable! I am killing them slowly because I wish for them to suffer and wallow in despair! Only once the Akashic Barrier is soon to drop shalt I bring down the hammer and eradicate the last vestiges of enemies in the galaxy, leading the angels to become the sole forms of life in the Milky Way!"

Raphael smiled, but the expression was sinister and vile. "And then, dear sister Uriel, our people will reign supreme."

Uriel's stomach trembled. She felt nauseous. After spending time with two demons, torturing them and listening to their pleas of mercy for tens of millennia, she had in truth softened her hatred somewhat. Spending time with the humans on Tarus II softened her heart further. She still hated the demons, but that hatred had narrowed decisively. It was no longer so broad and all-encompassing as to be on the level of genocide.

But, her conviction wavered. The body before her was pure and beautiful. It looked exactly like her former self, before that bastard Barbatos had devilishly devoured her soul.

She longed for it. She ached to become whole again. To live as a true angel, and not a ghost forcibly possessing some repulsive male's body.

Her wavering turned into a buzzing static in her ear. Uriel's shoulders drooped.

"Brother. Sister. What must I do to become whole again?" Uriel asked.

Uzziel smiled.

"I shalt reform the four of thee at the same time. Take off our brother's rings and place them on each of these new bodies. Then, press thy hand against thy new body's chest. I shalt direct the flow of life from one to the other. Thou shalt... BE REBORN!"

Uriel closed her eyes and nodded. She plucked off her brother's three rings, then handed them to Uzziel.

"Let us complete Raphael's Work then, sister." Uriel said.

Uriel smiled. No-one, not even her beloved brothers, knew exactly what that smile truly entailed...

Part 694: Hyphytes

Far-Future Era. Day 2, AJR. Inside the False Cosmic Realm.

Uzziel spent four days prepping her brothers for the soul transference, not even noticing the destruction of Tarus II and the deaths of both Wordsmiths. Four days was no simple matter. Her family's new bodies were vastly stronger than their originals, even at their peak.

The Archangels may have once been the strongest life-forms in the Milky Way, but even when they had yet to truly release much of their Cosmic Power in unending death battles, they were not particularly resilient. The dragons, which Uzziel created later, had far more durable and powerful bodies than the angels. The angels, meanwhile, relied on armoring their bodies with holy energy so that they could strike with enough power to damage the dragons. This was why it took so many angels to defeat a single dragon.

Obviously, as time went on and the angel species weakened while the dragons' powers consolidated into fewer and fewer of them, the difference in power grew even more bleak. In the end, an assault by hundreds of thousands of angels, led by all seven remaining Archangels, were only barely able to claim the life of Jörmungandr.

Now, eons later, these Archangels knew the truth. They had thought at the time that Jörmungandr was the last dragon, the mother of her species. With her death, they had eliminated the threat of the dragons forever.

But they had been wrong.

There was still another dragon. Raphael had learned of this fact only after the Energy Wars, when his soul had come into contact with Jason, and thus with Solomon, who was connected to Jason. Leviathan had been the 'last' dragon.

But even that was not the final member of his species.

There was one more...

While Uzziel prepared her brothers and Uriel for the transference of their souls into their new bodies, Raphael turned to his family members.

"While we were traveling with the Wordsmith, I learned of the existence of Camael's Cube. Originally, I assumed that the dark dragon, Leviathan, hath been the one to break free of the Cube. Now, I believe I hath been mistaken."

Uzziel glanced at her brother. "What is the meaning behind thy words? Art thou proclaiming another dragon still liveth among the physical realm?"

"Aye." Raphael said solemnly. "Verily, I lack certainty regarding its identity. Sister, hath thou uncovered any information regarding this potential dragon? Anything whatsoever?"

Uzziel conjured a ball of life energy and carefully pressed it against Gabriel's ring. This was one of the most important parts of the soul transference ritual; repairing the damage to her brothers and sister's souls. Because of their deaths and entrapment inside their rings, they were badly injured and any attempt to move them to her new and improved Kolvaxian bodies would almost certainly kill them. But by healing their souls first and repairing all the cracks that had spread, they could safely transfer and reintegrate.

Naturally, if they died again, in the future, it would be permanent. The laws of reality only permitted an entity one chance to survive death. Beyond that, death was always permanent, and one would travel to the Great Beyond, never to return.

"A dragon..." Uzziel said quietly. "I shan't lie, brother. I hath sensed a powerful presence on the world of Grimvolas. Its energy signature is faint, but without a doubt, 'tis an upper-level Cosmic. Whether 'tis High or Apex, I cannot tell. An energy field surroundeth its distorted dimension."

Gabriel, usually the quietest of the group, spoke up. "This bodes well for us. If this creature is a dragon, and if it holds any measure of power over the Dolgrimites, t'would surely know of the fall of angelkind 100,000 cycles ago. For it to remain hiding, one cannot believe 'tis still afraid of us. It must be injured."

"Badly injured." Uzziel acknowledged. "But even so, a dragon with a broken wing is still a dragon. We mustn't act recklessly. Bah... HEH HEH HEH! What will we have to fear once all of thee have come to possess thy new bodies? Let alone Archangels, I could send an unending army of Plagueborn to assault Grimvolas. The dragon would inevitably weaken and falter, allowing us to land the killing blow."

Uzziel oozed confidence. Even though she knew the Dolgrimites had recently found a way to kill her powerful new Plague Bodies, she was far from impressed. Borrowing the power of a 'god' only allowed the Dolgrimites to take on small smatterings of Kolvaxians one-by-one.

Uzziel's gleeful grin vanished.

"That name... Kolvaxian... I detest it! Why should these barbaric Volgrim be granted the right to name my beautiful children?! They are not a Plague, but the protectors of our galaxy! They are its enforcers, its primary life forms, and soon, its greatest creation! Brother Raphael, once we send these rats scurrying, we should ensure everyone knows of their true name!"

Raphael offered no argument. "Speak thy replacement, sister, and I shalt make it known."

Several minutes passed. Uzziel looked off into the distance and smiled dreamily as she thought of a new moniker for her children.

"Hyphytes..." Uzziel said slowly. "Plants which live underground. Burrowing agents of my will. Networked life forms which share a consciousness. We shall call them Hyphytes."

The other Archangels looked at their sister and nodded.

"A good name." Michael said.

"Powerful and fearsome." Gabriel agreed.

"'Tis certainly accurate..." Uriel said, a bit more skeptically.

"I am not certain if it shall catch on, but I will endeavor to make it so." Raphael vowed. "Now then, how much more time before our bodies fully integrate?"

"Not much longer." Uzziel said. "A few rotations at most. Brother, art thou a little impatient?"

"Long have I awaited this day, my revival." Raphael responded. "I sometimes lost faith the day would ever come... but I shall wait longer, as needed. Little sister, thy efforts art deeply appreciated."

"Worry not about me, but about how thou shalt maintain thy end of the bargain." Uzziel said. "I am still a mere High Cosmic, far from reaching the Apex. How exactly dost thou intendeth to raise me to my limit?"

"The sacrifice thou mayest unleashed upon Earth is the key, Uzziel." Raphael said with a smile. "In time, once I hath regained my power, I shall ensure thou reacheth the same level as I."

Uzziel snorted. "Thou art a snake, Raphael. For what reason shoulds't I trust thee? I know thy true goal. Thou intendeth to become Ruler over the Milky Way. How can I know thou shalt verily bear unto me the method to uplift myself to Apex Cosmic once thou no longer requireth my assistance?"

Raphael didn't falter. He smiled at Uzziel with the same warm expression he always did.

"Uzziel, my love for thee is as boundless as the ocean. I entrusted the fate of our galaxy to thee. When I become Ruler over creation, I shalt require formidable warriors to defend this galaxy. Why would I betray thee, or any of my siblings, when all of thee art the basis of my power? My ascension cannot pass without everyone's help."

That quieted Uzziel down. She nodded solemnly. "Then thou hast better keep thy word, brother. I care not whether thou becometh Ruler, and indeed I believe thy qualifications vastly exceed any other life form counted among the living today. Even that Unarin is unworthy of comparison."

Raphael patted his sister's shoulder. "Believe in me, and I shall give unto thee all the riches of the galaxy."

Raphael turned and walked over to Michael to talk to him. After he departed, Uzziel gazed off into the distance. Her eye twitched. For a split second, she seemed to remember something important.

A promise? Uzziel thought. What promise am I thinking of? Perhaps 'tis unworthy of consideration.

That feeling went away. Uzziel returned to the work of healing her brother's souls.

Uriel sat nearby. She stared at Uzziel's back as she went about healing Gabriel's soul. The longer Uriel stared, the more her thoughts became disorganized. At that moment, she no longer wore her brother's rings. Instead, their new bodies wore them, and the trio could materialize their spiritual forms by relying on the magical power inside their future bodies.

Unfortunately, they could not integrate their souls into the new bodies. Not just yet. But once they did, they would gain power of an immense level.

For the first time in a while, Uriel was alone with her thoughts. Raphael could not listen in, and neither could Michael or Gabriel.

Inside the depths of Uriel's Mind Realm, a presence stirred. She turned a cold eye inward to see Artorias's hazy form shimmering to life. Previously, he had been suppressed by the power of all the Archangels combined, but none of them were strong enough to kill him or Barbatos.

Barbatos could not be killed because he was the original owner of the body. Artorias was his blood brother, and as such, Barbatos extended an invisible, involuntary protection to him. Even when Barbatos's soul had fallen completely comatose, Artorias could still withstand the relentless, agonizing pressure of the Archangels who wished dearly for him to die.

[So this is how it ends.] Artorias said, smirking at Uriel. [You obtain a new body, the Archangels rise up and take over the galaxy. It turns out even our dear 'mother' Uzziel was a monster, just like the rest of you.]

Uriel's eyes lowered. She stared at the ground for a long while.

[Artorias.] She said quietly.

[Something to say?] He spat back. [Save your words. You've wanted me dead for so long, and now you can finally have your way. There's no need to rub it in my face.]

Uriel continued to gaze downward.

[I... regret.] She said quietly.

[Regret?] Artorias repeated, giving her a strange look. [Regret what?]

Uriel closed her eyes as if fatigued. [Verily, I regret my actions. I hated the demons for so long. A deserved hatred, 'twas, in many respects. My body, taken from me. My life, nearly extinguished. Forced into a position of subservience to the soul of a middling little Demon Lord like Barbatos, and thou as well.]

[But in the end...] Uriel continued, [I am no longer certain the fate I have suffered was wholly unjust.]

A moment of silence followed. Artorias crossed his arms and stared at the apparition of Uriel inside Barbatos's Mind Realm. She gazed off into the distance, appearing lost and confused.

[We angels art... a plague upon the universe.] Uriel said. [In all meanings of the word, we art a tumor, a cancer, a contagion. We create life, only to treat it as our plaything, time and time again. The dragons, the titans, the demons, the humans, and now... even the Plague. All this time, my wiped mind led me to falsely believe that at least Uzziel was the best of us. But she was not. She was the worst. Her true self was hidden for at least an eon. Raphael was, verily, the one who led the deception, but Uzziel was complicit.]

Uriel's shoulders slumped.

[I know not what I believe anymore. Thy people hath taken much from me. But our people were most certainly at fault for the way thine turned out. All I know is that these... abominations my sister hath created... art most definitely an eyesore. They art an affront to the heavens.]

[What are you saying?] Artorias asked. [Is this your idea of an apology? It's a bit late for that.]

[I wish for thee to pass on a message when I am gone.] Uriel said. [Please tell Barbatos... I am sorry. I pray the two of thee shalt be able to resist the coming storm.]

Artorias stared at Uriel for a long while.

[Are you planning to die?] He asked quietly.

[Nay. My death woulds't accomplish nothing.] Uriel said. [But what I am soon to do... it hurts my soul. It aches in a way I hath never imagined. Turning on my closest family. Betraying them. 'Tis not a choice I make lightly.]

Artorias's expression changed. He lowered his arms to his side and stared at her, his mouth agape. [Uriel! Are the words you speak true?!]

[The angels lost a long time ago.] Uriel replied. [Our continued existence is a slap across the face of the Creator. My brother slayeth our galaxy's Ruler in cold blood, for the sake of his own greed. He is a sinner. Because of him, we art likely to perish in the coming Akashic War. And if he shoulds't ascend? He shalt take measures to exterminate all non-angelic life, becoming an arbiter of galactic genocide.]

Uriel's eyes flashed with a wicked gleam.

[I am many things. An unfeeling monster is not one of them. I can no longer remain silent in the face of these coming atrocities.]

Artorias listened quietly. He waited for a moment, then walked over to Uriel's side. He stood close to her, and she in turn looked up into his eyes.

[Is there something I can do?] Artorias asked.

[There is.] Uriel said softly. [But thy role shalt be a most painful one. I do not wish to even speak of it.]

Artorias swallowed heavily. He had been trapped in his brother's body as long as Uriel, but he could not ever walk the mortal plane until his brother's soul had suffered a wound so painful that Artorias was finally able to resurface.

[Speak it.] Artorias said. [I would give everything for my brother. Even my life.]

Uriel smiled. It was weak and faint, but somehow, the slightest bit eye-catching. He couldn't remember a single time she had ever smiled, except when revealing expressions that were sadistic and vengeful, such as during her attack upon Hell Harbor.

[Thou art stronger than thy feeble mind cans't fathom.] Uriel said. [Dost thou not even realize? Thou hath spent an eon battling my soul for control of this body. Thy brother and thee hath suffered excruciating pain few cans't comprehend. But pain is itself a form of tempering. Unlike my broken soul, both of thine art quite strong and healthy.]

She looked away.

[When the time cometh, thou shalt know what to do. Just remember. Thou must climbeth as many of the Akashic Stairs as possible. If thou dost reacheth the hundredth step… I shalt leave the boon thou requesteth to thy imagination.]

Artorias frowned.

[Are you saying I can ascend to the Cosmic level?]

[I am saying that if thou doth believe in thyself, anything is possible.] Uriel said calmly. [Such is why I have come to believe in thee.]

Both of them fell silent. Artorias turned and walked away. He looked back at Uriel a few times, but ultimately had nothing more to say. She had left him with many disorganized thoughts.

[To think we were once enemies.] Artorias mused. [Uriel… do you know? I still hate you.]

Uriel did not answer. She had not heard his whisperings.

Far-Future Era. Day 18, AJR. Inside the False Cosmic Realm.

More than two weeks passed.

"Verily, my preparations hath reached their conclusion." Uzziel said to all her siblings. "Thy souls art fully repaired. We shoulds't begin the transference process without delay."

"Very well!" Raphael exclaimed with blatant excitement. "Let us begin!"

Uzziel glanced at the ring resting upon the hands of the new Archangel bodies. Despite Raphael's exuberance, she instead turned to Uriel.

"Sister, thou hath possessed a false body the longest. Allow me to set thee free first."

Raphael frowned. He snorted quietly, but didn't protest. He could tell Uzziel didn't trust him. Else, why wouldn't she transfer her eldest brother's soul first?

Uriel smiled. She had already reverted entirely back to Barbatos's appearance after losing most of the connection to his body. Her expression was hidden beneath his full-helm.

"Many thanks, sister Uzziel." Uriel replied. "I shalt be glad to finally cast this body aside."

And so, Uzziel began. She concentrated her mind and began to lightly pull at Uriel's soul. Uriel winced. It felt as if something were ripping her throat from her neck. It was an agonizing pain, but one she could bear. Even if Barbatos's body were not truly hers, she had been integrated deeply into Barbatos's Mind Realm for an eon. No amount of soul-cleaning would totally erase that link. There would have to be deliberate severing to make way for her escape.

Uriel's new body stood stiffly, her unfocused eyes gazing ahead into nothingness. As Uriel's soul came loose from Barbatos's body, the agony she felt was truly indescribable. But, mixed in with the direct soul-pain, there was also a feeling of separation, of loss.

She had come to think of Barbatos's body as 'hers'. Whether she wanted to admit it or not, she was intimately familiar with who he was and how he thought.

Barbatos had been a total shithead in the beginning. A spoiled, greedy brat.

But less than a century of suffering under the constant bombardment of Uriel's holy energy quickly refined his soul, pushing away those short-sighted impulses of his youth. He had grown to become demonkind's most level-headed Duke.

Before he fell into a coma, Barbatos had been considered as being one of the strongest Dukes in all seven Hells. Not only strong of body, but even stronger of mind. He was unbreakable. Unshakable.

Uriel's soul trembled. She realized now, as his body grew distant...

She had grown to like Barbatos.

She respected him.

It was this realization that became her final lucid thought before her soul merged into her new body and she fell into a deep coma.

After placing Uriel into her new body, Uzziel did not waste a second. She took Gabriel next, then Michael, and put them into their new bodies.

Finally, she took Raphael's soul and sneered.

"Thy word hads't better be worth its weight in gold." Uzziel declared. "If not..."

She left the threat hanging unspoken. Raphael didn't deign to respond. He simply looked at her as she pulled his soul out of his ring and placed it into his new body. His thoughts went dark. The light left his eyes.

Thus began the acclimation process.

24 hours later, Uriel opened her eyes.

Her vision was only blurry for a short while. Then it cleared up. She spotted Barbatos's lifeless body laying on the ground a stone's throw away. Uzziel hadn't given the slightest care about it, and had totally ignored its presence.

To Uriel's right, Gabriel stood with his head bowed, and his eyes closed.

He had not yet awakened. Neither had Michael or Raphael.

"Sister." Uzziel said, walking over and flashing a cruel smile. "Now that thou art awake, speak. Tell me, how fares the strength of thy new body?"

Uzziel shifted her weight. She stumbled slightly, misjudging her height and the length of her legs. She was taller than Barbatos now, her new body crafted to look and feel exactly like her original. The problem was, Uriel was not used to her original body's 'feeling' anymore. Even when she mimicked its appearance while in Barbatos's body, she could not increase her height or change the size of her build.

It would take some getting used to if she wanted to move and fight properly as she once had an eon earlier.

"I feel... strange." Uriel said hesitantly. She summoned a spear of light in her grasp, but her slender fingers were longer than Barbatos's. She held the spear awkwardly, noticing that her fingers rubbed uncomfortably against her palm.

"Long hath thou been trapped in this bloodskin's form." Uzziel said, curling up her lip in disgust. "Worry not. I left the body unharmed. Thou can render unto it as much torturous agony as thou pleaseth. I imagine thy hatred for this wretch burns hotter than any flame in the galaxy."

Uriel blinked.

Hatred?

Did she hate Barbatos?

Perhaps. Once, a long time ago.

But that time had long passed.

She swallowed heavily, then turned to look at her brothers' forms.

"When will they awaken?" Uriel asked.

"Not much longer now." Uzziel replied, turning away from Barbatos to fixate on Raphael. "Uriel... dost thou feel any semblance of trust toward Raphael?"

"These days?" Uriel questioned. "I cannot say that I do."

"Mmm." Uzziel grunted. She didn't say anything else.

With Uzziel's attention diverted away from the insignificant, weak, and pathetic gnat lying lifeless on the ground behind her, Uriel also pretended not to care. But secretly, her heart began racing.

She did not want Barbatos to die! It was an unthinkable realization, but seeing the evil lurking within this False Cosmic Realm, Uriel felt as if her entire existence had been a lie. She was playing the part of a villain, and she did not enjoy doing so. Killing demonkind self-righteously for the sake of vengeance was one thing, but these Kolvaxians would devour all life in this galaxy, and the others!

They were abominations beyond compare! Uriel needed to come up with a plan, and fast.

Slowly, Gabriel woke up. He required time to adjust to his form, but less so than Uriel, as his spiritual form was already a close approximation of his original self.

Michael followed. When he awoke, he glanced at the demon on the floor, then at Uriel. He said nothing, only turning to look at Raphael as he waited for the eldest Archangel to awaken.

Eventually, Raphael did.

The old man's eyes fluttered open. He only took a moment to reorient himself before he regained full control of his body. It turned out that adjusting to his new body was a piece of cake for the old snake. He adapted to it like a fish tossed into a body of water.

Raphael stretched his back and admired his hands. "Most impressive. The slight hint of green upon my skin doth be somewhat unnerving, but a minor price to pay for obtaining a body my old self woulds't never have dreamed of owning."

The Archangels all milled about for a minute or two. Then, Raphael set his eyes upon the unsightly blemish in their midst.

"Sister." Raphael said, to Uriel. "Art thou not going to remove that stain from our sight?"

Uriel's eyes flicked around the group. She met Gabriel's gaze, Michael's gaze, Uzziel's, and finally, Raphael's. She slowly took three steps backward and stood before Barbatos's unmoving body, as if to protect him.

When Uriel did not reply, Raphael clicked his tongue. "It seemeth thou hath acquired some level of compassion for this foul creature. Sister, time spent with one's oppressor mayest change one's mind, but the fact of the matter is, Barbatos is thy enemy. Make not the mistake of seeing him as a friend. When he awakens, he shalt surely attack thee, like the maddened attack dog he be."

"Thou art wrong." Uriel said quietly, narrowing her eyes. "The demons are not evil. I have come to realize this fact. The true villain here... is the two of thee."

She summoned a spear, then used its tip to lightly point at Uzziel and Raphael.

"This plot, these machinations... they art EVIL! I cannot believe my beloved little sister Uzziel woulds't scheme to unleash such a terrible fate upon this galaxy. This is an atrocity beyond compare! And worst of all, the architect of this plan is none other than thee, Raphael! Thou hath fallen far in my eyes!"

Raphael's brows creased, ever so slightly. He glowered at Uriel, clearly displeased, but not entirely surprised regarding her heel-turn. He suspected this might happen.

"Sister. Thou art making a mistake most grievous." Raphael said slowly. "Long have I known thee. Thy love for thy family is beyond reproach. I shall not judge thee for a moment of weakness. Kill that demon and we shalt continue The Work, forgetting this unsightly moment ever came to pass."

Uriel's right hand clutched a spear of light. Her left hand was empty, but a moment later, she conjured a ball of light magic. She aimed it at Barbatos's body without looking, then narrowed her eyes into a deadly glare.

"Thou art a serpent most evil, Raphael. I have spoken. My mind shan't change."

She sent a beam of energy into Barbatos's body, a body she had grown accustomed to healing countless times over the eons. With her power having risen to the level of a High Cosmic, her healing powers were thousands of times greater than before. Not even Belial could compared!

Raphael closed his eyes and sighed.

"So, 'tis come to this, as I feared it mayeth."

He opened his eyes.

"Everyone. Uriel is lost. The demons hath swallowed her mind long ago."

"Kill her."

Part 695: A Brother's Love

Far-Future Era. Day 18, AJR. Inside the False Cosmic Realm.

A delicate and gentle hand reached down from the sky. It appeared thin and frail, yet its grasp was one that had held weapons of war, weapons which had reaped countless lives.

Artorias looked up at the hand of light. He finally realized what Uriel's plan was. Without delay, he reached out and took hold of it. Uriel's energy poured into his soul, rapidly healing him and restoring his power.

This was no ordinary healing. This was magic of the High Cosmic level, attuned to a body it had known for an eon. The compatibility between the two was exquisite.

Artorias's soul inflated with power. The magic healed not only him, but Barbatos's body as well. In that moment, Artorias felt a great and terrible force of energy pulling at his Existence. With a mighty roar, he lifted his head, and his vision went white.

Artorias awoke in a great plain. Before him were trees that held fruits made of many different rocky varieties. Inedible, but compelling, they called out to him. He stood in place, looking around blankly, uncertain of what he should do.

Suddenly, from behind him, a voice spoke.

"Greetings, inferior biological. It seems you have managed to ascend past your biology to become an Entity of Considerable Renown."

Artorias turned around. He spotted a hazy figure standing behind him. The figure shone with golden light, but its body was unknowable. It had no face, yet its voice was vaguely feminine.

"Who are you?" Artorias asked. "Are you the Creator?"

"The Creator is dead." She answered. "I have supplanted him. I am the Milky Way's new Ruler. My designation is Umi."

"Umi." Artorias replied.

He stared at the Ruler's shimmering golden body for a long moment.

"Uriel told me... I would meet the Creator here."

"As I have taken over the Milky Way, the Creator no longer exists." Umi replied. "Though I did succeed in preserving a spark of the Creator's Existence, his presence is no longer necessary. Come with me. You must climb the Akashic Mountain to prove your superiority over other biologicals."

Artorias nodded. He started to turn and walk toward the great mountain, only to notice that Umi did not walk at all. Instead, she levitated an inch off the ground, moving around without moving her body. Somehow, the motion reeked of arrogance.

As the two of them approached the bottom of the Akashic Staircase, from the skies above, three blobs of light descended. Each of them radiated power far beyond compare, equal with Umi.

"Ruler of the Milky Way, Umi. Your newest Ascendant is surprisingly satisfactory. Its soul is not as impure as the last ones." One of the blobs of light said.

"Ruler of Messier, Inquisitor." Umi replied, partially for Artorias's benefit. "This course is natural. Now that my galaxy has a proper Ruler, the quality of its Ascendants will naturally rise."

"Your presence is irrelevant." Inquisitor stated. "Your galaxy lacks spiritual energy. This one's rise is merely a fluke."

"My galaxy contains a Uniqueness beyond compare." Umi retorted. "In this Akashic War, my Uniqueness will devour all of yours. Now, be silent. Do not attempt to obstruct my Ascended's path. His quality is of acceptable grade."

"We would not dare to cause trouble in Akasha's Realm." Inquisitor replied.

The three orbs of light remained levitating, but they moved to the left of the great staircase, allowing Artorias to begin his climb.

Umi turned to him. "Biological designated as 'Artorias.' Your time is limited. You must climb the staircase. The higher you climb, the greater your future power. It seems your soul has known great suffering. This will allow you to bear with the pain of such a climb. Begin at once. If your body dies on the stairs, no negative consequences will follow. Simply climb until you physically can climb no further."

Artorias nodded. Uriel had spoken of the staircase to him on a few occasions. He knew functionally what he must do, though the climb truly seemed more daunting in person than he ever expected.

After hesitating for a moment, Artorias took his first step. Umi watched from the left side, along with the other Rulers, as a bolt of divine lightning fell from the sky and crashed into Artorias's body, making him wince. It ended up only feeling about as painful as a split-second tasering, so he took another step. And another.

Five steps up the mountain, one of the Rulers turned to Umi.

"Ruler of the Milky Way, Umi. Why do you take such a form? A bipedal biological figure is not appropriate for the Evolved."

"Ruler of Triangulum, The Absolute." Umi responded. "It was the Creator's final wish. For the duration of this Eternity, I will adopt this form."

"Unnecessary." The Absolute stated. "Sentimentality is a weakness of the inferior biologicals. You are demeaning our Existences with such performative actions."

"Ego and arrogance are also hallmarks of biological inferiority." Umi said, turning her faceless visage to gaze at The Absolute. "Yet you engage in such actions yourself. Worry less about my Unique Flaws, and more about yours."

The Absolute fell silent. It had no reply to her barbs.

Artorias climbed higher and higher. He reached the 20th step, then the 30th. The lightning bombardments became stronger and stronger. He roared with pain, but he also felt his agony was not too unbearable. Uriel's soul was attuned to the energy of Light, and Lightning was not too different from such a concept.

This thought seemed to spark an insight in Artorias's mind. Before taking a step onto the next staircase, he waved his hands and was shocked to find that he could conjure an aura of light magic around himself.

Light magic! The antithesis of demonic power! How could he do such a thing? Had his close contact with Uriel allowed her powers to rub off on his soul?

This was definitely possible. Uriel possessed full power over Barbatos's magnetism when she controlled his body. Was it not possible Barbatos and Artorias could now wield Uriel's arsenal of abilities, even with her soul having left their shared body?

Artorias's mind raced with the possibilities. He was no expert on soul manipulation, but he had heard of people with powers intermingling their souls, yet never sharing abilities. Bael and Ose were one such example.

Or were they? Ose was able to control all of Bael's powers when she was in his body, but he couldn't control any of hers. Then again, he didn't really have powers for her to control, only the innate strength of his body. Perhaps-

"Inferior biological. Do not remain idle on the Ascension Staircase. If you fail to move forward for long enough, your climb will conclude and your remaining time will come to an end." Umi loudly stated, snapping Artorias out of his brain fog. "Continue climbing at once."

He nodded, then quickly took a step up the staircase, followed by another. With an aura of light magic shrouding him, Artorias began to experiment, changing it so that he could adjust what type of light he emitted. Purely on instinct, he shifted its brightness, it's hue, even the energy charge it emitted.

The divine lightning strikes hurt a lot less when his aura dispersed their impacts. As such, he was able to climb to the 50th step, the 70th, and eventually even the 90th.

The lightning strikes became far more painful once he reached the 95th step. Each step further was agony. Artorias's body shivered with pain, and his skin became clammy and cold when Akasha's lightning struck him, refining the impurities in his soul further and further.

But still, he persevered. He climbed past the 100th step and kept going!

This pain was nothing compared to an eon of suffering under Uriel's brutal, unending assaults on his soul. For the first time ever, Artorias felt grateful for the pain she inflicted. It made him tougher, more resilient, less likely to bend beneath the strength of another.

But eventually, after what felt like an eternity of climbing, Artorias ran out of steam. He ascended to the 163rd step, then collapsed, unable to move any further.

His body went still. He lay on the step, unmoving, while Umi stared at him with an unknowable expression.

The thick cloud cover atop the mountain parted. From on high, a bipedal figure descended. He wore golden regalia, and seemed to be a humanoid entity with purple skin, scales covering his body, and he wielded a trident with electricity crackling around it.

"770th Envoy of Akasha, Hakur." The Ruler of Messier said. "You honor us with your presence."

Hakur did not look at the Rulers to the left of the Ascension Stairs. He floated down to hover above Artorias, his golden armor shining impossibly brightly, so luminous that it made Artorias's eyes sting when he looked up.

"MILKY WAY ASCENDER. YOU HAVE REACHED THE ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-THIRD STEP." Hakur spoke, his voice booming across the Cosmic Realm. "YOUR INNATE SOUL STRENGTH IS FORMIDABLE. YOU ARE THE GREATEST ASCENDER THE MILKY WAY HAS PRODUCED IN MANY AN EON. STATE YOUR WISH, AND IF THE GREATEST RULER, AKASHA, DEEMS IT WORTHY, HE SHALL GRANT IT."

Artorias gritted his teeth. He looked up at Hakur, feeling pain assault his eyes. Merely gazing upon such a transcendent life-form was agony.

"My... brother..." Artorias wheezed through his teeth. "Long has he remained comatose. I wish... for you... to strengthen his soul and wake him up."

Hakur stared emotionlessly at Artorias.

"THIS POWER IS WITHIN THE ALPHA AND OMEGA'S POWER. HOWEVER, HE REFUSES. STATE ANOTHER REQUEST."

"He refuses?" Artorias asked, slightly startled. "I beg of you... please... enlighten me. Was my request unreasonable?"

Hakur did not grow angry. He had fielded innumerable requests across countless Eternities. Many lower life forms had expressed disbelief when their wishes were turned down. Artorias was simply another speck who did not know the greater context of Akasha's will...

"YOUR REQUEST DOES NOT AMUSE AKASHA." Hakur stated. "ONLY REQUESTS WHICH AMUSE HIM WILL BE FULFILLED. YOUR REQUEST IS TOO BENIGN, LACKING IN INTRIGUE, AND UNINTERESTING BEYOND BELIEF. IF YOU DO NOT SPEAK A DIFFERENT REQUEST, I WILL DEPART WITHOUT GRANTING YOU A BOON."

Artorias paled. This was different from what he expected! Uriel had told him that ascending to the 100th step, the 250th step, the 1000th step, and several others beyond that would cause Akasha to grant greater and greater boons to those who succeeded. He never expected that Akasha would have the power to do something, but refuse!

This caused his heart to erupt into turmoil. Artorias paled and looked down, shocked out of his wits.

"A... a moment, great Hakur!" Artorias coughed, his mind racing with fear.

He didn't want to give up this chance to save his brother!

Nobody in the universe mattered more to Artorias. Barbatos was the only family member Artorias cared about, and their bond had grown closer than anyone else could comprehend.

That thought made Artorias realize the truth of the matter.

If Akasha desired amusement, then there was one guaranteed way to amuse him...

"A... sacrifice!" Artorias coughed, looking back up at Hakur. "I wish... for the Highest on High, Akasha... to merge my soul into Barbatos' soul. Kill me so that he may live! Grant him all my strength! Make me my brother's greatest weapon. In exchange, I will give up my life!"

Hakur's expression flickered. A faint smile appeared upon the corners of his mouth.

"YOU ARE OF ADMIRABLE CHARACTER, ASCENDER FROM THE MILKY WAY. AKASHA IS PLEASED. THIS REQUEST IS WITHIN HIS POWER. HE HAS DECIDED TO GRANT IT. CONGRATULATIONS, AND MY CONDOLENCES. YOUR LIFE SHALL BECOME ANOTHER LINE IN THE GREAT EPIC THAT IS THE 'STORY OF ETERNITIES'. NOW GO, AND BE ONE WITH YOUR BROTHER."

Hakur levitated upward, slowly at first. But then, he abruptly accelerated and launched back up toward the top of the Akashic Mountain, vanishing into the clouds.

After he left, Artoria's body began to weaken. The process ramped up over a few seconds, making him feel as if he had become a leaky pot with holes allowing its boiling water to escape. Artorias sagged forward, collapsing onto the steps. His eyes began to dim, all while Umi levitated over to him and gazed upon his dying form.

"A useless gesture. You should have seized control of your brother's body and eradicated his soul." Umi intoned blandly. "But this outcome is acceptable as well. My galaxy will obtain another formidable Cosmic."

Artorias didn't answer. The light in his eyes dimmed. He closed them, then sighed softly, one last time.

Barbatos... little brother... we have both suffered... but I hope you will... live... on... and never forget... me...

His body dissipated into particles of light, and those particles exited the Cosmic Realm, flying back to the material realm, where Barbatos's body awaited...

"Kill her." Raphael said calmly, as he looked at his sister futilely healing the former body she once had possessed.

Hardly had those words left his mouth before there was an abrupt change. Cosmic Power began radiating from Barbatos's form, and Raphael's eyes widened. He reflexively took a step back as he sensed surging waves of power erupt from Barbatos, the demon transforming from mortal to Cosmic in a matter of seconds!

Barbatos's eyes snapped open. Artorias's soul fragments merged with his, and in turn, the knowledge of what he had done.

A roar of pain, of suffering, of loss, exploded from Barbatos's mouth. He shoved himself off the ground, his bloodshot eyes filling with hatred.

"ARTORIAAAASSSS!!!"

Hot tears flowed from Barbatos's eyes. His heart palpitated with anxiety as the weight of what he had just lost threatened to make his body explode from grief.

His aura rose to the level of High Cosmic, the same as the Archangels. His power reached a level only the tiniest fraction of Sentients could ever hope to attain.

But he was not happy. This development was not desirable.

Barbatos had lost his brother; the only person he had ever truly loved and cared about.

What he gained was far, far from being able to take Artorias's place.

A pitch-black void swallowed Barbatos's heart. That void took physical form when he suddenly sent a surge of darkness out in all directions, stifling the brilliance of the Cosmic Realm with a wall of shadow that plunged the immediate area into darkness.

Raphael's blood ran cold. The rage he sensed from this new opponent was greater than he ever imagined. He had no idea his sister would be able to heal Barbatos and bring him back to life, certainly not so quickly. Too late, he realized her healing abilities must have been massively improved when she was turned into a proper Cosmic.

Barbatos's rage grew hotter and hotter. His darkness began swallowing the Cosmic Realm to such an extent that even the furthest edges the angels could see had disappeared from sight. Only the innate glow of the angels' bodies made them visible. Barbatos's glowing blood-red eyes were all they could perceive of his position.

Uriel spun around and looked at Barbatos in shock. She couldn't believe what had just happened. She had only hoped to heal him and wake him up so he could escape, but instead, he had suddenly become a Cosmic! If that were to happen, which she guessed might be a possibility, she thought he would become a Bottom Cosmic at the highest. That assumption turned out to be completely wrong!

"Barbatos?!" Uriel gasped.

"My brother is DEAD!" Barbatos roared. "He died... from desperation... to keep me alive!"

The newest Demon Deity held his palm up to the sky. Out of nowhere, a massive black greatsword materialized and fell downward, clapping into his palm and forcing his arm downward. The blackened blade struck the floor of the Cosmic Realm with a heavy thud, but Barbatos kept his grip steady.

This was Artorias's soulblade. Barbatos had only wielded it a handful of times over the years, as it was created from the power of Artorias's soul. But now... it was hollow and empty.

Artorias's soul had scattered and dissolved. His weapon remained, but he himself was nowhere among the land of the living.

Barbatos gazed upon the massive weapon, feeling the pain of losing a brother, knowing that Artorias had given everything just to keep him alive.

The demon no longer paid attention to Uriel. His attention locked on to Raphael, the one whose machinations had brought Artorias to the brink of desperation.

"RAPHAEL." Barbatos glowered, slowly lifting a finger to point at the eldest Archangel. "You… must… PAAAAY!!"

Far-Future Era. Day 18, AJR. Inside the False Cosmic Realm.

Barbatos's eyes flashed with hatred. A rage he had never experienced before. A sense of grief mixed with self-loathing and pain.

He had sworn to Artorias, an eon earlier, that the two of them would someday reunite in new bodies. He had suffered under Uriel's torture for 100,000 years, all in the hopes of someday reviving his brother.

But now Artorias was lost.

He was gone forever. Dead!

"RAPHAAEELLL!!!"

Barbatos lunged at Raphael. His blood red eyes burst with demonic light as he swung Artorias's massive greatsword down, aiming to cleave the Archangel of Wisdom in two.

Gabriel was the first to react. He conjured an equally massive greatsword of light and swung it up to meet the blade of Artorias.

CLANG!!

Two greatswords met. One shattered on impact. Gabriel's blade offered no resistance to Artorias, which had been baptized with the divine power of 163 Akashic Steps!

Artorias cleaved through Gabriel's blade and slammed into the Archangel of Power with enough force to send Gabriel flying! Even with his Hyphyte empowered body, he hadn't spent a single second growing acclimated to his new strength. Gabriel went sprawling, his body careening, twisting, spinning uncontrollably miles into the distance before he came to a stop.

Before Gabriel had even disappeared for a second, Barbatos was already moving toward his next target. Raphael's pupils shrunk as the fully enraged Demon Deity charged at him with reckless abandon.

Raphael was going to die. He had to die! There was no other outcome Barbatos would accept! It was Raphael's evil machinations that led to Artorias sacrificing his existence just to give Barbatos a fighting chance.

"RAPHAAAEELL!!!"

Raphael quickly focused his mind. He summoned ten illusory bodies of himself, and they all darted left, right, backward, even leaping into the air to confuse Barbatos. But as Raphael cleverly used the confusion to mix with his false forms, his heart nearly stopped.

Barbatos locked onto Raphael's true body and swung his sword!

"NO!!" Raphael cried in fear.

BOOOM!

Artorias crashed against Raphael and blasted him into the ground, shattering the floor of the False Cosmic Realm and sending spiderweb cracks miles in every direction. The explosive sound was deafening to the point it would have killed any entities below the Cosmic Realm, but fortunately, none were present. Even so, every Archangel heard ringing in their ears.

Raphael was not dead. He was not even seriously injured, but his body ached. His Hyphyte form had truly granted him defensive capabilities beyond reason. Any other High Cosmic would have instantly perished from Barbatos's rage-empowered strike.

The moment Raphael realized he wasn't dead, he scrambled out from under Artorias and scurried away like a cat whose tail had been stomped. Barbatos started to give chase, only for Michael and Uzziel to jump in his path.

"Leave my brother alone, demon!" Uzziel roared.

"I am thy opponent!" Michael added.

But those two suddenly felt another presence lock on to them. Uriel charged into battle, her eyes filled with cold and deadly battle intent.

She realized now, too late, that she had denied the truth for too long.

She had loved Artorias!

Loved him. A demon!

It was an act of sin. Something she never realized until he was already gone.

But it was the truth!!

"Raphael must DIE!!" Uriel shrieked, conjuring a pair of light-spears in her hands.

Uriel was one of the fiercest Archangels. Not only did she possess eons of battle experience, but her powers were diverse and potent. She wielded all four classical elements, plus light magic, plus dark magic, and even Barbatos's magnetism.

Unbeknownst to the other angels, Barbatos wielded all of her powers as well.

It was as if there were two Uriels fighting at the same time!

Blasts of fire illuminated the darkness that had swallowed the Cosmic Realm. Uriel spun her spears around, crashing against Michael's longsword and Uzziel's vine-whips. They had no time to protect Raphael, because their opponent was even more frightening than his!

"All of thee art traitors to life itself!" Uriel shouted. "Monsters serving monsters! Thy lives art no longer worthy of continuing!"

"Sister! Come back to the light!" Michael urged. He hurriedly whipped his sword in a wide arc to deflect her spears. "Do not fall for the lies of a bloodskin!"

Michael's usage of a slur enraged Uriel even more. She, who had once cavalierly used such words, now felt they were a personal affront to her fallen comrade. The man she loved!

"BASTARD!" Uriel shouted.

As Uriel fought Michael and Uzziel, Barbatos continued chasing after Raphael. The old man no longer held any resemblance to a wise old sage. He looked like a rat that had hopped out of a fire! His beard was singed and cut apart, with chunks missing. He ran as fast as he could, trying to confuse Barbatos or throw him off his trail, but the demon doggedly pursued him! It seemed Barbatos could see right through all of Raphael's tricks.

Fire exploded from Artorias. The greatsword cut down at Raphael, who dove to the side and barely evaded the hammer-like impact of the sword striking the blackened ground. The Cosmic Realm seemed to groan in pain as Barbatos chopped and sliced at Raphael, doing his damnedest to kill the old man as quickly as possible.

Finally, Gabriel rejoined the fight. He was much bigger than anyone present, and far stronger than his eldest brother. Now better comprehending Barbatos's strength, Gabriel charged at him and used his body as a living weapon. He punched Barbatos's head and knocked him backward, then slapped Artorias aside with a quick backhand before grabbing at Barbatos's throat.

Barbatos ducked and dodged Gabriel's clumsy grab. He spun on his heel, then thrust the long hilt of Artorias into Gabriel's stomach, knocking the wind out of him. Gabriel momentarily lost his balance, so Barbatos leaped into the air, spun his leg around, and delivered a brutal whirlwind kick into Gabriel's solar plexus. This time, Gabriel didn't go flying nearly as far, but he was still sent sprawling on his ass.

By this point, Raphael had made some distance. He turned around to face Barbatos, who had started charging again. Raphael's expression became one of a cornered animal. He sneered viciously and snarled like a rabid dog.

"Dost thou thinketh me the type to merely run away?! Fool! Thou shalt learn to fear the old!"

Raphael charged at Barbatos. Two images of Raphael split apart and rushed him in unison. When Raphael and Barbatos collided, it turned out that these illusory images were not illusions at all, but physical projections!

The impact sent both the demon and the Archangel crashing to the ground! It was as if two cars had slammed into each other at full speed, causing their bodies to twist together. With Raphael's newfound Hyphyte body, he discovered he could take hits like Bael and still come out the other side kicking.

Barbatos, meanwhile, was much worse off. When he slammed into Raphael and his projections, the impact broke Barbatos's left arm and caused him to lose his grip on Artorias. The sword clattered to the ground, and Barbatos fell to one knee, clutching his arm.

Raphael sneered. It turned out he had been afraid of nothing! Barbatos might be angry, but rage meant nothing in the face of the Hyphytes!

Raphael jumped to his feet. Just before he started to move toward Barbatos, the Demon Deity used his right hand to summon... divine light!

Raphael was momentarily baffled, completely tongue-tied, when he saw Barbatos wield Uriel's power and heal himself! Barbatos regenerated his wound in less than a second and shoved his broken bone back into place, fully mending it and returning to his previous fighting form. He grabbed Artorias and jumped up, charging at Raphael as if he hadn't just suffered a loss during their previous collision.

Raphael shot Uriel a venomous glare while she battled Michael and Uzziel. He couldn't believe his eyes, but it seemed she had truly fallen further than he ever imagined. She had even granted a fragment of her powers to this bloodskin.

Blasphemous woman!

Raphael and Barbatos once again collided. Gabriel joined the fight, and together, the two brothers began pushing Barbatos back.

Time and time again, the two of them gained an upper hand and beat Barbatos into a pulp, but he quickly healed his injuries before they could finish him off.

Sometimes, Barbatos slammed one of the two Archangels down, using the oppressive power of his sword. Artorias had become a fearsome weapon, just as hardy and durable as the Hyphyte bodies these Archangels controlled, but with more cutting power than any weapons they could conjure. Constructs of light could barely slow down the blade, let alone deflect or stop it entirely. Gabriel found that only his bare hands and fists were capable of stopping Artorias's might, but Gabriel lacked Uriel's healing powers, and the collisions always left him slightly worse off.

Slowly, a war of attrition unfolded. Barbatos had the better weapon, but the worse body. He compensated by constantly healing himself, while his enemies could not.

"Die already, bastard!" Raphael cried in anger. "How can thy body persist after such punishment?!"

"YOUR PAIN HAS ONLY JUST BEGUN, OLD WRETCH!" Barbatos roared.

Barbatos slammed Artorias against Raphael, pounding the old man downward and causing his bones to creak. Gabriel slammed the flat of a conjured greatsword against Barbatos's back and sent him sprawling. Their brutal melee only intensified!

At the same time, Uriel fought Michael and Uzziel with equal fervor. Despite her and Barbatos being outnumbered two to one, Raphael and Uzziel were not at the level of Barbatos and Michael. Uzziel in particular was a terrible combatant with an awful battle sense. Even after regaining her Primordial memories, she had not become much more fearsome than her Ancient Era self. This was because Uzziel had always been an insidious, poisonous schemer. Not a battle maniac like Uriel, Michael, Gabriel, and Camael.

As for Michael, his ability to wield a sword was extremely focused and practiced. His mastery of the blade far exceeded Uriel's mastery of the twin spears, but she more than made up for it with her diverse powerset.

In Michael's eyes, Uriel's weapons whipped up a storm, but moved slowly enough for him to follow and counteract. He swept his right arm around like a hurricane, deflecting one attack after another. He carefully protected Uzziel, while she conjured vines to entrap Uriel's legs and slow her down.

Uzziel looked more irritated than fearful. She looked over and saw that the battle against Barbatos was not going particularly well. It seemed that over time, Barbatos's rage and healing factor was giving him an edge even against two Hyphyte-empowered Archangels.

"Enough of this!" Uzziel spat. "Uriel, I shalt grant thee one final chance to see the light! Join us, or perish!"

Uriel snarled viciously. "Thou art equal in evil deeds to Raphael! Perish here, witch!"

Uzziel snorted. "So be it."

She waved her hand. All at once, Uriel's body froze. She lost her grip on her spears, and they went flying. Michael didn't even have a chance to react before his sword cut across Uriel's neck, struck her hardened Hyphyte skin, and sent her toppling backward.

Uriel lost all the strength in her body. She fell to the ground, unable to move. Agony coursed through her veins, causing her to spasm.

"Ah- ahh! Ahh!" Uriel cried out pitifully.

Michael didn't immediately move to finish her life. He instead stared in bewilderment. "What... what is the meaning behind this? How dids't thou render her helpless, Uzziel?"

He looked at his sister. She met his gaze and snorted. "'Tis none of thy concern. Kill her now, while she is unable to retort!"

Michael didn't move. He instead looked at Uzziel for a few seconds, then seemed to realize something.

"These... these Hyphyte bodies! Thou hath corrupted them! Poisoned them! Dost this mean thou cans't render any of us helpless at will, too?!"

Uzziel glowered at Michael. "That's right. Is there a problem, big brother? Dost thou believeth me to be a blackheart who would use this power on thee? I only used it on Uriel because of her obstinance! Now we can end her threat, and the bloodskin as well! Thou shoulds't be thanking me."

Michael's glare became more focused. He realized that Uzziel hadn't told any of her brothers or sister about this backdoor because she must have been planning to use it on them if they ever turned against her.

In particular, Raphael was the one she feared the most...

"Kill her thyself if thou wisheth." Michael spat. "I shalt not execute my sister while she art helpless. This goes against my way!"

"Bah. If thou art such a coward, then we mayest deal with her later." Uzziel said. "Right now, 'tis Raphael and Gabriel who need our help. That bloodskin is proving quite formidable. As for Uriel, she was never a threat."

"Because thou were capable of shutting her down from the very beginning." Michael said, directing another pointed glare at his sister. "I do not approve of thy new, insidious self."

"'Tis not new. 'Tis how I hath always acted." Uzziel replied slyly.

The two of them left Uriel laying on the ground. Unable to move, she could only gasp in pain and writhe uncontrollably, fighting for her life to try and break free of Uzziel's trickery.

If Uriel had known these Hyphyte bodies were trapped from the beginning, she never would have crossed over! Uzziel had fooled everyone. Once the battle ended, the other Archangels would not be able to look at her with any semblance of trust. But neither could they resist her will! She had played the long game... and won.

Barbatos's rage kept him focused on his single-minded goal of killing Raphael. But even so, he was shocked when he sensed the approach of Michael and Uzziel.

Where was Uriel? Why wasn't she keeping them under control? Had those two somehow gotten the upper hand on her?

Barbatos didn't have time to think. He quickly jumped backward right as two more Archangels joined the fight.

This time, he was in the absolute worst position. Fighting Raphael and Gabriel was difficult, but winnable. Raphael couldn't present much threat, but he offered solid backup for his much stronger brother. Raphael's ability to ensnare and trick other beings was his greatest supporting asset in a team battle. Once Uzziel arrived, that support role doubled, and Michael added another powerhouse to the team.

Two on one was barely doable. Four on one was a complete wash! Barbatos didn't stand a chance.

As Gabriel hammered Barbatos from the front and Michael struck him from the back, Uzziel snared him with vines and Raphael pummeled him with projections. Barbatos reeled. He couldn't continue his offensive and was firmly forced back on the defense.

"No! NO!!" Barbatos roared, his words filled with rage and regret. He swept his sword, but Gabriel dodged and struck him in the face. He stabbed at Michael, but Michael ducked the attack and plunged a blade of light into Barbatos's heart.

"Gah! Guhuk! Urrggh!!"

It was unfair. It was brutal.

The Archangels relentlessly used their numerical and bodily superiority to thrash Barbatos. When he swung Artorias, Michael swiftly cut at his wrist to sever Barbatos's hand! The sword flew into the distance, and Barbatos cried in pain. A dozen sword slashes cut his armored back, carving out bloody rivers of blood to flow from behind.

A mighty punch from Gabriel blasted Barbatos's face and sent him flying. He crashed onto the ground and slid away, his dark domain finally losing its power.

Light returned to the False Cosmic Realm. Barbatos choked and coughed up blood. As the Archangels approached, his vision dimmed.

He had failed.

He couldn't avenge Artorias's death.

Raphael would go free. Free to torment others. To genocide entire species and lay claim to the galaxy. To bring about the end of more brothers, mothers, fathers and sisters alike.

His wicked machinations would persist, long after Barbatos's death.

As the Archangels closed in, Barbatos's eyes flicked to his brother's sword. Now laying inert a hundred yards away, Barbatos lacked the strength to run over and grab it.

"You... angel.. bastards..." Barbatos coughed. "Bloodless villains... monsters of the primordial world... you should have... died... long ago."

"Sadly for thee, we did not." Raphael said coolly. "Verily, we shalt outlast thy pitiful species. The angels' rise will continue, unabated. All of creation shalt recall our majesty. Thou art merely the first to die, baptizing our future rise with thy blood."

"Well said, Raphael." Uzziel added.

Michael looked disturbed. He hated demons more then many of the others, but even he thought this whole affair was somewhat... barbaric.

Raphael gestured at Gabriel. "Finish him."

Gabriel nodded. He took a step forward and conjured a new greatsword.

A spike of energy from the left caught Gabriel's attention. He flinched when he saw something flying toward him at high speeds. Uriel crashed her body into Gabriel and slammed him aside, sending him hurtling to the right. The other Archangels gasped when they saw their sister standing once again.

Raphael hadn't seen how Uriel was incapacitated, since he wasn't present for Uzziel's secret ability, but he had assumed Uriel was crippled beyond repair. It turned out that belief was wrong!

"Keep away from him, ye bunch of murderous fiends!" Uriel barked, her eyes flaring with hatred. She assumed a defensive stance in front of Barbatos, shielding him with her body. "Hath the lot of thee not done enough?!"

"Thy body regained its vigor?" Uzziel asked, somewhat baffled. "Impossible!"

"The pain thou inflicted meaneth little to I who have suffered in agony for an eon!" Uriel proclaimed. "I broke thy serpentine hold with contemptuous ease, just as I shalt soon break thy bodies and spirits alike!"

"Thou art outnumbered, sister." Raphael said coldly. "Nothing has changed. We shalt eliminate this bloodskin first, then we shalt execute thee for siding with thy enemies."

A tense standoff followed. Despite Raphael's bold proclamation, the other Archangels didn't immediately make a move.

Michael's faith wavered. Killing Barbatos was one thing. He didn't give a damn about the demon in the slightest. In fact, for taking Uriel away, Michael hated his guts!

But at the same time, Michael felt no hatred for Uriel. She had been trapped inside of Barbatos for an eon, and she had suffered more pain than anyone deserved. Michael felt only sadness for her fate.

Then, the situation changed.

Gabriel stepped forward. He held his greatsword aloft, causing Uriel to take a step back and cross her spears defensively.

But Gabriel did not attack. As soon as he raised his greatsword, he turned to face the other Archangels, leaving his back to Uriel.

"This... is... wrong." Gabriel said, his words slow and ponderous. "I can no longer go along with these wicked deeds."

"What?!" Raphael exclaimed. "Gabriel! Hath thou turneth traitor as well?! Art thou an ally of the bloodskins?!"

Gabriel gave his eldest brother a pointed but emotionless stare. There was neither hostility nor love in his gaze.

"I care not what happens to the demon. However, it has become apparent to me that he is precious to my sister. I cannot in good conscience bring my blade to fall upon Barbatos knowing the emotional pain Uriel will suffer."

Gabriel swept his gaze across the three opposing Archangels.

"Verily, I never agreed to thy conditions. I never wished to bring harm upon my family members." Gabriel said coldly. "These schemes, these lies... how deep doth thy prejudice fall, Raphael? How wicked art thy heart, Uzziel? When I learneth thy mind was still sound and thy body intact, I felt joy aplenty. But now, I feel only sorrow and regret."

Gabriel waved a hand from left to right.

"Look upon this realm. This corrupted once-holy bastion of divinity. What Cosmic Realm? What sanctuary for our people? It doth be little more than a breeding ground for heresy!"

"Silence!" Raphael shouted, his face momentarily turning red with anger. "What little doth thou know? Thou dids't agree, at the end of the Primordial Era, to this scheme! All of thee did! How cans't thee now turn thy backs on the great plan to swallow the galaxy? What demons? What humans? What Volgrim? These petty creatures mean nothing! They art little more than vermin in our eyes!!"

Michael slowly nodded. He didn't hate Uriel, and indeed he didn't want her to die at all, but in his eyes, Raphael made a good point. Why should he care about the rest of the galaxy when it never cared about him?

But Gabriel was unmoved. Raphael's words fell upon deaf ears.

"Is that all? I will not say that I hold much love for the weak mortals that have taken up residence in the galaxy, but neither do I hate them. They are as benign to me as birds and cows from old Earth. I do not wish to exterminate them, and thus, I must stand in opposition to thee."

Raphael fell silent. He turned to look at Michael, and they gazed into one another's eyes for a few brief moments.

"Michael. What say thee in response to thy brother and sister's words?" Raphael asked pointedly.

"I... do not wish to kill Uriel." Michael said. "Nor do I wish to see Gabriel fall. Is there no other way we can bring about a new era?"

In his heart, Michael realized that he was completely torn between Raphael and Gabriel. He couldn't decide which one had the better point, but he knew for a fact that he emotionally resonated more with Gabriel.

Raphael... simply wasn't trustworthy.

Raphael exchanged a glance with Uzziel. He looked away and snorted.

"How pitiful. All these years spent thinking about the joy we woulds't experience once reunited, but in the end, only one of my siblings remembered that family takes precedence over morality."

Raphael sighed. "What a shame. What a shame."

Michael sensed something changing in Raphael's tone. He carefully stepped toward Gabriel's side, then turned to stare with distrust at Raphael.

"Brother Raphael?" Michael asked.

Raphael did not respond. He merely stood taller, then crossed his arms.

"They art lost, Uzziel. Kill them all."

"Yes." Uzziel nodded.

At once, a strange sense of pressure grabbed hold of Barbatos, Uriel, Michael, and Gabriel's minds. Their breathing became stifled as the presence of thousands, million, billions of life-forms came flooding toward them from a great distance away.

"No!" Michael shouted, half from fear, half from disbelief. "Raphael! How coulds't thee?!"

From all across the False Cosmic Realm, countless Hyphytes, as numerous as the drops of water in an ocean, began rushing toward the Archangels. While none of them were High Cosmics, a few were Middle Cosmics, and there were still thousands and thousands of Low Cosmics. Together, combined with their unbreakable bodies, they formed an unstoppable flood that was bearing down on the rogue Archangels.

"Sister!" Gabriel shouted. "Take that demon and go! I shalt hold them off!"

"So too shalt I!" Michael added, only to grimace at the realization he was working to save a damned demon. "Go!"

Uriel realized the end was drawing near. After less than a second's hesitation, she turned around, scooped up Barbatos, then tossed his injured body over her shoulder.

"Do not die!" Uriel shouted at Michael and Gabriel. "I command both of thee!"

She flapped her wings and launched into the air, grabbing Artorias's blade before racing to find an exit to the Cosmic Realm, even as her brothers stood firm against Raphael and Uzziel both.

As for what fate befell Michael and Gabriel, that was something Barbatos did not know.

All he knew was... he had failed. His brother was dead. Artorias had fallen to uplift Barbatos, but now the younger of the brothers was left alone, no family anywhere in the world.

How could he possibly deal with his own grief, knowing what he had lost?

How could he?

Part 697: Galactic Unification

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Numaria.

A dozen Demon Emperors, as well as Demon Deity Auger and a few others of his rank, listened to Barbatos's tale with solemn expressions. The revelation that their greatest enemy and the galaxy's current crisis were one and the same had a terrible effect on their moods. If before they had a feeling that they might be able to beat the Plague by allying with the Dolgrimites, now they were under no such illusions.

Auger swallowed heavily. "And what of Uriel? She fled with you from the Cosmic Realm, so why isn't she here?"

Barbatos coughed. He had yet to regenerate his missing hand, and his body was in such bad shape that even with Belial healing him night and day, it might take a full week for him to get back into fighting form, or at least to the point he could heal himself.

"We were... assaulted... by Kolvaxians. The entire way back." Barbatos said haltingly. "Uriel fought with great fury. She summoned her Light Constructs to beat back the hordes, but they were numerous beyond belief. I blacked out, then I awoke here."

"Uriel must have sent you to Hell Harbor." Yardrat said, his astral form hovering beside Auger. "Perhaps she launched you away and used some method to hide your Cosmic signature so the Plague would lose track of you."

"The odds are high that Uriel is either dead or has been captured." Auger said. "But this is hardly the worst news Barbatos has brought us."

Auger turned around to look at all the other Emperors.

"All of us have been deceived. The Plague is not a mindless super-organism. It is a creation of Archangel Uzziel. It is a bio-weapon used to convert us into her thralls. Worst of all, she is a High Cosmic now, along with the other Archangels. Uriel may have now aligned herself with our interests, but compared to the trillions of Plaguehosts lurking in the Cosmic Realm, her assistance will be minimal at best."

"What about Michael and Gabriel?" Belial interjected. "They stood with their sister. A force of three High Cosmic Archangels assisting us, along with Barbatos-"

"Will not be enough." Yardrat interrupted, shaking his head. "I believe we only have one choice left to us, now. We must retreat. All of demonkind must enter the Labyrinth. We must disable the Warpgates and hide there, in the dark, unable to leave. If we do not, we will lose the war the moment Uzziel looses her unending legion of 'Hyphytes' upon us."

"Why did she not do so sooner?" Emperor Leeroy pointedly asked. "If Uzziel has always had the ability to launch an all-out assault, why hasn't she?"

Auger chuckled dryly.

"The answer is simple." Auger said softly. "In her eyes, she has already won. She could obliterate all of us, but she hasn't. Why? Because she is toying with us. Slowly stoking the flames of fear in our hearts. Snuffing out our hope. Pushing us to the brink of despair."

"Revenge." Yardrat added. "This entire war is about her exacting her revenge. She wants us all to suffer, weep, and cry as her forces continually push us inward. And now that her plot has been exposed, she might show up in the next hour and announce our executions. We have no way of fighting back."

"The HELL we don't!" Belial barked, startling everyone around her. "We do have a way to fight back! You just aren't using your heads!"

Auger looked at her with disapproval. "Samantha, there is no reason to speak useless words. You cannot win against an army of unending, nigh-invincible monsters using mere bravado."

"Then I guess you're not all that bright, Auger." Belial snapped at him. "I think we can win this war. I think if we all unite together, humans, demons, and Volgrim, along with the monsters, we might be able to find a genuine solution to wipe out the Plague, once and for all!"

"All our species uniting? What difference would that make?" Yardrat asked. "The Volgrim have had 100,000 years to come up with a method for counteracting the Plague. They failed, and that was before the Plague was empowered by the Wordsmith. Now the situation is utterly unwinnable."

Several demon leaders nodded. The look of dejection in their eyes was palpable.

"Samantha." Auger said, walking over to rest a palm on her shoulder. "Perhaps if the Wordsmith were still alive, we might stand a chance. But he is not. Our best shot of wiping out the Plague was before it became empowered by Artoria, when Diablo still roamed the cosmos. Without him, and without the Wordsmith, who can possibly save us?"

Belial pulled away from Auger's touch and looked at him in disgust.

"So that's it? The war isn't over, but you're going to throw in the towel? Just like that? Where's your courage? Your sense of pride? Has it occurred to you that maybe the Plague isn't as powerful as it seems? Maybe the real reason Uzziel hasn't wiped out all life in the galaxy is because the Plague is not as formidable as it first appears."

The other demons simply stared at Belial. Impassioned her words might sound, but they seemed to lack in logic...

"Think about it!" Belial shouted, raising her voice so everyone could hear. "If Uzziel is the mother of these creatures, the queen, the Plague's primary controller, then try putting yourself in her shoes. Do you really think she has the capability to individually control trillions of Plaguehosts all by herself? No, let me do you one better. Do you think she can even control a thousand Plaguehosts by herself? With perfect precision? The same as if she were controlling her own body?"

Auger blinked. "Where are you going with this?"

"I'm going exactly where you think I'm going." Belial retorted. She stretched out her arm and turned it into a long sharp blade, then began scraping the floor to draw a crude diagram. "Look here. We knew of a human Hero, Jepthath, who could combine the minds of his soldiers to allow them to fight with extreme teamwork. We also know that you, Auger, can combine the powers of demons who have pledged themselves to you, passing them around and distributing them as needed. Don't these powers sound similar to what Uzziel is doing?"

Auger chewed his lower lip. "Indeed. I suppose, if we assume that her powers are somehow similar to mine and Jepthath's..."

"Then we might also be able to assume that one mind, her mind, is far from capable of controlling all those Plaguehosts with the same precision as each of us controlling our own bodies." Belial explained. "That could be a weakness we might be able to exploit!"

Auger no longer looked so skeptical. He stroked his beard as he looked at the drawings Belial had made of a distributed brain-sharing network.

"You might be on to something." Auger said. "But this is still mere conjecture."

"We need to inform the humans and the Volgrim." Belial said. "Only by working together do we stand a chance against this threat."

This time, many demons nodded along to her words.

Facing a relatively unintelligent hivemind enemy was one thing. But knowing there was a central intelligence behind that hive was very different. If Uzziel now had Raphael's counsel, she might start to move quickly. They could suffer an assault by the Kolvaxians by day's end. Perhaps even sooner!

Auger hesitated for only a moment before nodding.

"Yardrat. Open a portal back to Sharmur. Samantha, I'll need to trouble you to explain the situation to Commander Adams. Linda should be more receptive if you're the one explaining the situation."

"And what about the rest of you?" Belial asked.

"I am going to personally confer with Founder Unarin." Auger said. "Yardrat, you will speak in my stead to the Dolgrimites. I want all the rest of you to fan out to the various monster-controlled worlds and deliver this news to all of them. I want everyone brought up to speed on the truth behind the Kolvaxians within the next two hours!"

Yardrat stood tall, his wirey frame seeming to hold a deep importance now that his portalling ability would be key in mobilizing the other demons to spread news around their allies as quickly as possible.

"Yes, Lord Auger. We move at your command."

Without delay, the different demons began fanning out. Belial returned to Sharmur, Yardrat sent many demons to worlds such as Pixiv to confer with the fairies, the orcs, the goblins, and dozen of other species.

No longer could the demons maintain even the slightest facade of hostility. The stakes were too high. One of their own had crippled the Volgrim, which meant they had even fewer powerful allies capable of tackling the Kolvaxian threat. If it weren't for Mephisto and Demila's betrayal, the Volgrim would have plenty of Cosmics available to help stymie the inevitable assault of the Kolvaxians, once Uzziel deemed the time right to make her move.

What Auger did not know was that, in secret, one of his kind were secretly about to cause another great tragedy that could destabilize the entire situation out of his control...

Not much earlier that day...

A massive figure lumbered through the Labyrinth's corridors, moving quickly to the Core. This figure was well-known among any who witnessed her. Her bright blue feathers alone were striking enough to catch anyone's eye.

Emperor Crow had a savage gleam barely contained within her eyes. She had finally pieced together the last bit of a conspiracy; one she was determined to bring to an end today. No matter the cost.

She did not stick around long enough to hear the story of what had happened to Barbatos. But neither did she care. She was 'only' an Emperor. Compared to the lauded Demon Deities, she stood at the peak of the mortal world, but this mattered little to those in power. Where once she was a terrifying figure every other demon worshiped, now she was but a pawn in the eyes of those who had surpassed her.

Crow was not enraged regarding this fact. True, it was unfortunate, but she did not let it bother her. She simply stopped caring about running things, and allowed herself to fade into the background.

Ever since she had fought with a mysterious angel on the Queen Network, one that the other demons thought might be Uriel or Camael, she had long realized the truth behind that angel's identity.

She was the Daughter of Heaven. A Lazarite! The murderer of Red Raven!!

How she had survived this long was a mystery Crow did not know the answer to. But neither did she care. That angel was the one who had cut down Crow's husband, a demon she loved more than life itself. A hundred thousand years had passed, but her life had lost its brightness. Every day that passed, she felt more and more like a shadow of her former self.

Without Red Raven, Crow felt that she had become a husk. She sought power through rituals, but she no longer knew why. She sought to become stronger, but the meaning behind such actions had long faded into memory.

But that was then, and this was now!

She suddenly felt her spark of life reignite!

Hatred!

All-encompassing hatred!!

She had a reason to continue on! She could find the bitch who murdered her husband, capture her, lock her in a dungeon, and torture her for the rest of eternity!

The Daughter of Heaven would spend the rest of her life screaming, crying, begging for mercy, and Crow would never allow her a moment of comfort ever again!!

Crow's beak gnashed together as she felt heat radiating from her feathers. She was fired up with rage in the most literal way possible, to the point her body had warmed considerably.

When she stormed into the Core, the demons present took immediate notice. They quickly got the hell out of her way, easily picking up on the fact that she seemed furious about something.

What had made her so mad? They didn't know! They didn't want to know, either! It was none of their business.

The last demon who had casually yapped at Crow had ended up a puddle of meat and gore on the floor. Nobody bothered her after that.

Crow arrived at the Warpgate leading to Sharmur. The goblins operating it quickly shivered with fear when she looked at them. Without hesitation, they opened the warpgate and allowed Crow to pass through.

The moment Crow arrived on the other side, a pair of human guards stationed on the right and left lifted their weapons to aim at her.

"Halt! Emperor Crow, you are not on the authorized entry list! What is your reason for coming here?"

The humans did not have the greatest relationship with the Seven Hells. Even though nominally they were supposed to be working together, the humans did not trust the demons, and the demons did not value the humans much. True, the humans had some useful technologies, but the deaths of both Wordsmiths had made their species feel rather... limited.

Thus, when Crow arrived, the guards immediately tensed up. Crow directed a withering glare at both of them, then she stomped toward the one on the right and leered toward him, ignoring the 'threat' his gun posed, as it genuinely could not hurt her at all.

"My business here is mine." Crow hissed. "Both of you would do well you keep your mouths shut regarding my arrival. I have noted your scents, which not even that fancy armor can hide. If anyone should bother me, I will return and dispose of you both. Do I make myself clear?"

The guard whose personal space she had blatantly invaded began to shake and tremble. Crow was absolutely massive. Not only was she regarded as the physically strongest Emperor, but her body was a living weapon. Even without using a Ritual, Crow was capable of ripping apart human tanks with great ease. It was as if she had slowly become a primordial bird of prey, one whose presence dwarfed mountains.

When Crow was pissed, everyone took notice.

The trembling guard tried to maintain his dignity. He truly did. But his weak and shaking voice did nothing to improve his composure.

"Y-you should, um, s-s-speak with D-Deity Melody and m-make an app... app... appoint...ment?"

Crow said nothing. She simply took a step closer, and the strength went out in the man's legs. He crumpled to his butt and shivered in fear.

"W-we won't say a-anything... just... just go on... ahead... and have a n-n-nice day... M-M-Miss Crow..."

Crow snorted. She glanced at the other guard, who quickly lowered his weapon, shook his head, and looked away. He did not want to mess with her in her clearly awful mood.

Crow flapped her wings. She launched into the air and stayed low to the ground, careful to keep out of the eye of anyone who might spot and report her.

After she left, the traumatized guard shakily stood up. His friend came over to help him.

"Should we... tell Command?"

"No way! Are you kidding?! If Crow tries anything, Melody will know. Just keep your trap shut so we don't end up like the last guy who pissed her off. That Crow is a loose cannon!!"

"Yeah... good point. We didn't see anything."

Crow flew low to the ground. She eventually landed on the southern side of the city, but took a few minutes to stop and think.

She didn't know where the Daughter of Heaven was hiding, but she knew what she generally looked like. Brown hair was quite common among the humans, but the fact that she was young and she had a black-haired friend with her had also been mentioned by Vespera. Most importantly, Crow had a name.

"Cammy..."

Crow was an extremely powerful Emperor. Physically, by all accounts, but few knew that she had excellent senses in many other regards. She could be stealthy when she wished.

The midday sun shone on the city of Melodia. Crow's bright blue feathers were fairly eye-catching, but her vision was far beyond that of an eagle. She carefully perched atop a tower, hiding in its shadow and dimming her aura down as much as possible. With her keen eyes, she rapidly swept the city from top to bottom.

She spotted plenty of brown-haired women all over Melodia, but none of them matched Vespera's description. Importantly, few of them were paired with black-haired female friends. So she kept looking, and looking, and looking some more.

Fifteen minutes passed. Crow frowned. It was possible the Daughter of Heaven was hiding inside a building, but based on what Vespera had mentioned just before Crow left, Belial had been hanging out with the two other 'servant girls' out in a forest somewhere.

If Belial were still there, Crow could triangulate her position by sensing her Emperor mana signature. She wasn't now, but maybe there would be residual traces...

Crow thought for a moment. Then she remembered that as a succubi, Belial liked to wear aromatic perfume to spice up her sex appeal. A stupid and fruitless effort, Crow thought, but one that might prove useful to the Emperor of Sacrifice now.

Crow sniffed the air. She sneaked around from rooftop to rooftop, carefully sniffing for Belial's scent. Eventually, she picked it up, as well as traces of her Emperor aura.

Bit by bit, Crow slinked around to the northern side of the city, where the scent became palpable. She eventually flew out of the city limits to the forest, where she hear a distant crashing sound that abruptly went silent.

The sound of battle? Crow wondered. Why did they stop? Did someone sense me?

She spotted a clearing in the distance, in the middle of some trees. As she flew overhead, her pupils dilated. There were two human women looking up at her. One of them had brown hair, the other had black!

It's THEM! Crow thought hungrily, as she immediately dive-bombed into the clearing and slammed claws-first into the center of the arena.

BOOOM!

Crow's landing sent out a shockwave that sent both women tumbling backward. Surprisingly, or perhaps not so surprisingly, they maintained their footing and didn't fall onto their backs. They looked at Crow with a mixture of shock and horror.

Crow cackled deep in the back of her throat. She rose to her full height, towering over both women.

"Heh heh heh... tell me... which one of you is 'Cammy'? I've come to deliver a message from Belial..."

"Forgive us, Lady Crow!" The black haired girl said, quickly getting in front of her brown-haired friend. "We are but humble servants. We do not wish to experience any trouble..."

Crow's eyes held a ruthless light. "Mere servants, eh? Then why is it you were able to sense my presence when so many humans before you could not? Give me 'Cammy' and I'll let you live, stupid little girl."

The black haired girl shivered with fear, but she still stood strong and didn't back down. Even an idiot could tell that she was willing to protect the brown-haired girl with her life.

A few seconds passed. Nobody said anything.

Crow snorted. "It's your funeral, then."

She suddenly stormed toward the girls and lifted her wing to swat the black-haired pest aside.

But before her wing could connect, the look of fear in the black-haired girl's eyes vanished.

"So you want to do things the hard way." Serra said.

WHAM.

Crow saw light dancing in her eyes. Something hit her head with such speed and force that she was sent flying to the right, crashing, careening, bouncing into the treeline before she struck a boulder and her momentum came to a screeching halt.

Three seconds passed. Crow blinked a few times, shocked out of her wits. The blow had been so unexpected that she hadn't raised her guard at all. Was it the black-haired girl? How strong was she? WHO was she, really?!

Crow roared with hatred. She leaped out of the ditch her body had dug and flew back into the arena, where both girls had dropped the facade. Now, the Daughter of Heaven had donned a suit of light armor that hid her physical appearance, but the white wings on her back clearly marked her as an angel!

And even more shockingly, the other girl was also an angel. She didn't even bother hiding her face... yet Crow had no idea who she was.

Crow gasped in shock. "A Lazarite and a Pureblood still walk the mortal plane?! Impossible! You, pureblood, who are you?!"

"My name is Soleil." Soleil said with eerie calmness. "I will protect my lady with my life."

Cassiel stood to her side and glowered at Crow from within her helmet.

"So you've finally come." Cassiel said. "I knew this day would arrive. Ever since I fought you in the Queen Network..."

"How respectable. You actually have the guts to admit it was you." Crow said with a sneer. She glanced at Soleil. "And you're not half bad. You knocked me for a loop, and that takes quite a bit of strength. But in the end, you're merely a roadblock in the way of my true prey."

"We shall see about that." Soleil answered stoically.

Author note: It's been ages since I posted any art of a character, but here is artwork of Cassiel in her normal and armored form. I thought you guys might enjoy it. Based on the artwork a human artist drew, I used Nano Banana to mock her up in a satisfactorily cool set of holy armor as well!

Part 698: Alone Again

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Northern Melodia.

Soleil and Crow leaped at one another. The Black Hole Construct swung her fist at Crow and knocked her head aside with the sound of iron crashing against steel. Crow retorted with a violent punch to Soleil's stomach that deformed her abdomen.

Soleil spin-kicked Crow. Crow absorbed the kick with a raised arm, then retorted with a pointed jab at Soleil's face.

In less than a minute, the two unstoppable machines of war beat and battered each other with enough power to level the nearby forest. The arena around them cracked and splintered, with flecks of stone and jagged rocks breaking off and flying out in all directions.

At the same time, Cassiel did not remain idle. She took care to avoid taking Crow on directly, since a single punch from the Emperor would definitely shatter her light armor, maybe even killing her on the spot. Instead, she took potshots at Crow, aiming to hamper her vision, trip up her feet, and slow down the impact of her fists.

Cassiel summoned a powerful rifle made of divine energy, one that originated from the 21st century, near the end of the Energy Wars. She launched bullets at small fractions the speed of light, each one striking Crow's armored feathers like cannonballs. Crow was too busy dealing with Soleil to deal with Cassiel, thus she could only take the hits passively, grunting when each one struck.

"Hahaha!" Crow cackled evilly, as blood dripped down her face into her beak. "You two are interesting! Much too interesting!! Where did a pair of monsters like you manage to hide all these years, eh??"

Crow loved to fight. She loved it more than life itself. She was a battle-maniac. Over the past 100,000 years, she had challenged just about every other Emperor and forced them to admit she was the superior combatant. In a one-on-one fight, she was practically unbeatable.

Of course, this depended on what the definition of a 'fight' or 'winning' was. She had always fought in the past to prove her martial supremacy.

This was a battle to the death, at least for her opponents. Crow didn't care about leaving Soleil alive, but she did want to capture Cassiel intact.

Cassiel and Soleil, on the other hand, knew they needed to kill Crow. Simply beating her unconscious wouldn't be good enough. She would definitely return to fight them again, and would never give up until she'd had her revenge.

Crow hammered Soleil, and Soleil viciously struck back. Time and time again, Crow was shocked out of her wits. She'd never fought such a fierce angel in all her life! Even the legendary Gabriel paled in comparison to this absolute monster! Whoever Soleil was, it was clear she had been a secret weapon the angels never unleashed. Otherwise, there was no chance she wouldn't have become feared by the other demons!

"Who are you?!" Crow roared, after blasting Soleil's face with another brutal punch. "Why have I never heard your name before?!"

Soleil's face sunk in unnaturally, as if she were made of play-doh. Her face popped back out, seemingly uninjured; a fact which startled Crow yet again. Was it possible Soleil wasn't an angel after all? Her 'holy energy' was pitiful beyond belief. She had not demonstrated a single iota of magical power, relying entirely on her physical body to do battle with the Demon Emperor of Sacrifice.

"I prefer not to make my existence known." Soleil said simply, before blasting Crow's stomach with enough force to dent dozens of her feathers and momentarily double her over in pain. Crow's wheezing cries came as a welcome symphony of pain for Soleil.

Crow's eyes flickered with hatred. Another bullet impact struck the back of her head and made stars dance in her eyes. Cassiel was being as annoying as ever, but Crow couldn't take her eyes off the monster known as Soleil. She was dangerous. Too dangerous!

Crow swiped her talons at Soleil, but the construct bent her body unnaturally, evading the claws while snapping her leg up and kicking the bottom of Crow's beak. The impact slapped Crow's mouth closed and nearly caused her to bite off her own tongue!

"Caw-CAW!!!" Crow screeched, enraged. Her eyes smoldered with hatred unyielding.

Tiring of this attack from the front and back, Crow took a risk. She launched feathers from her backside at Cassiel, feathers made of iron as hard as demonstone, which pursued her with a mind of their own. Cassiel yelped in surprise, diving to the side and flapping her wings hard to try and avoid the seemingly indestructible projectiles.

Soleil's attention was pulled away. She gave Crow a quick kick, then chased after Cassiel to try and knock the feather projectiles aside or take the blow for her master.

Crow's eyes flashed with insight. "Interesting..."

She realized that Soleil's devotion to Cassiel was more than that of a mere servant. It was is if she had been made specifically to protect the Lazarite's life.

How ludicrous! A Pureblood protecting a Lazarite? Even for the so-called Daughter of Heaven, wasn't this going too far? What was Raphael thinking when he assigned this strange angel to Cassiel's protective detail?

The details weren't too important. Crow gave chase, launching more of her feathers to chase after Cassiel in an attempt to hem her in and pin her down.

Unfortunately, while Crow's feathers were her deadliest long-ranged weapon, they were also her armor. Any feathers she launched might have slivers of their own will, but wherever they originated from on her body would inevitably become vulnerable to attack!

Just as Crow thought she'd uncovered a winning tactic to ensnare both angels, Soleil suddenly reversed course and flew right back at Crow, leaving Cassiel to fend for herself.

Crow's evil grin froze on her face.

She realized she'd been had!

Soleil saw through Crow's weakness as soon as she had launched her first feathery barrage. When she spun around, she used her smaller size and superior agility to dodge Crow's startled attack, then fly above Crow's back, where she spotted a small, exposed hole on Crow's back. The spot from where a few feathers had been launched!

BOOM!!!

Soleil's vicious punch plunged into Crow's back and tore into her spine, causing Crow to lose control of her body and plummet to the ground below. At the same time, Cassiel switched out her arsenal for a heavy set of divine armor. Crow's feathers bombarded her from multiple directions, but the armor held tight!

Crow smashed into the ground face-first. She quickly flipped onto her back, grinding her beak as she saw Soleil diving after her.

"Tricky little pigeon!!" Crow cursed.

Soleil slammed onto Crow's stomach, hammering her with the force of a freight train. Each punch and kick drove the wind from the demon's body. The Emperor of Sacrifice tried to swat Soleil off, but the construct's feet changed into claws that wrapped around Crow's feathers and held tight! When Crow finally managed to punch Soleil aside, she tore a few feathers out along with her.

Crow jumped to her feet and glowered at the construct while clutching her wounded stomach. She was bleeding from the front and back, and now that she had exposed her softer underbelly, she wasn't in as good of a fighting position as before.

Soleil back-flipped twice, then landed on her feet. She held up both fists, ready to counter whatever Crow brought to bear next.

But instead, a flash of evil went through Crow's eyes.

"It seems you like to play nasty! That's good. So do I!"

Crow closed her eyes and clapped her talons together. A beam of red light shot out of her body and raced into the sky, instantly vanishing from sight.

Unseen by Soleil, atop a volcano on the distant world of Diabolus, there sat a giant shrine in Crow's image. Hundreds of devoted and brainwashed acolytes dressed in the robes of various bird species cawed and cried out loud as the statue of their goddess began to light up the space with its glowing red eyes.

One of Crow's few remaining trusted Demon Dukes raised his wings.

"Our Emperor has entered battle! Begin the ritual!"

"Caw!"

"Caw-caw!!"

While the temple no longer had any humans inside it it due to Jason Hiro's influence a year earlier, it still had plenty of low to mid-ranking demons. They sent their demonic energy into the ritual, and their bodies either withered or inflated with power before exploding. One by one, each acolyte perished, giving their life force to their bird goddess.

Back on Sharmur, Crow's body doubled in density. She grew a meter taller, and regrew feathers to cover the parts that had lost their protection. She exhaled a turbid breath of blood-colored mist, then chuckled under her breath.

"Ugly little angel, this is the end. It was fun while it lasted."

Then she stormed toward Soleil.

The construct was ready. She leaped backward to evade Crow's talon swipe, then leaped forward with her fist raised to deliver a boulder-busting punch. When she struck Crow's face, Soleil's fist deformed. It was as if a toddler had struck the door to a bank vault! Her punch had no effect on Crow at all!

Soleil's pupils shrunk. She tried to jump away, but Crow moved more swiftly than before and reached out to grab her. She snatched the Black Hole Construct with a giant claw and wrapped all five talons around Soleil's waist.

"No escape this time!" Crow laughed.

Three bullets fired from behind struck the back of Crow's head. Cassiel had returned after pinning her feathers in place, but her attacks did nothing! She couldn't slow down Crow in the slightest!

Crow ignored Cassiel. One set of talons grabbed Soleil's legs, while the other grabbed her upper torso. Soleil did not scream, but her mouth opened in alarm as Crow began to pull!

RIIIIP!

Like pulling apart a stretchy piece of taffy, Crow turned Soleil's midsection into a long string of flesh colored gum. She was momentarily baffled before she realized the truth. Holding each of Soleil's wriggling halves in both hands, she gasped.

"So you weren't an angel after all! Lying bitch!! You were like Artoria! Another one of the Wordsmith's abominable creations! But too bad, you were too weak to defeat ME!"

Despite being ripped in half, Soleil was far from dead. Her body was made of hyper-dense black hole neutrinos. Thinking she had bested her foe, Crow's grip inadvertently relaxed, even if just a little. Soleil took that opportunity to grab Crow's thumb and wrench it with all her strength.

SNAP!

"Aaaargh!" Crow cried, as her thumb was brutally broken and dislocated. A spasm of pain went through her body, and she reflexively dropped Soleil's upper half.

Soleil struck the ground. Her upper torso morphed its shape, and she transformed into a half-sized version of herself, complete with arms and legs. At the same time, her lower half inside Crow's other hand turned liquid and malleable. She dripped through Crow's fingers and splashed to the ground, turning into another half-sized version of herself.

There were two versions of Soleil, both of them the size of a child. She might have looked adorable and huggable if she wasn't a living weapon capable of killing most demons below the rank of Emperor.

Crow snarled. She slapped her palm down to squash Soleil, but the child-sized constructs both grew pairs of wings and flew to the right and left before swooping around and kicking at Crow's head. At the same time, Cassiel realized Crow wasn't taking her existence seriously, which meant she had a real shot at hurting Crow if she could only just land one good hit.

Cassiel summoned an extra-long spear made of highly reinforced light magic. She de-summoned all her armor, knowing it put her in a more precarious position, but also that it was their best shot at slaying this giant. With Crow empowered by a Ritual, she was stronger than ever.

Soleil swooped around, drawing Crow's attention. Time and time again, she tried to kick and punch the giant brutish bird, but her attacks inflicted little damage. It seemed Crow had become damn near invincible after powering up. She swatted and slapped at the air, but she failed to hit the much-smaller Soleil duo.

Eventually, one of the Soleils rushed Crow from the back, and the other came at her from behind. Crow ended up grabbing at the one going for her stomach, but failed to notice the other one aiming for her back.

Instead of punching or kicking the Emperor, which had proven ineffective, the mini-Soleil wrapped her arms around three of Crow's feathers and yanked them out of her back.

Crow flinched. Having her feathers plucked wasn't exactly painful, but it wasn't pleasant either. She tried to grab at Soleil, but that particular spot on her back was one that Soleil had determined was not within her normal range of motion. Her wings hampered her hands' movements considerably!

"Gahh!! Get off me, you filthy false pigeon!" Crow roared.

Soleil jumped to the left, and Crow's eyes followed her. Crow did not notice Cassiel swooping down from above, her spear aiming for the exposed skin on Crow's back.

SHIK!

Cassiel impaled the spear an entire foot into Crow's back, sending pulses of divine energy deep into Crow's core. The Demon Emperor screamed in pain. She fell forward and collapsed to the ground, flailing behind herself to swat Cassiel off.

Even a light slap from Crow could shatter many of Cassiel's bones. Unlike Soleil, she was effectively as strong as an above-average human, albeit granted the power of wielding divine energy as a weapon. This meant her resistance to a raging Demon Emperor's attacks was basically nonexistent.

Thus, when Cassiel did not immediately jump off Crow's back, she showed great courage. She carefully and nimbly dodged Crow's flailing talons while wiggling the spear as much as possible to further widen the wound and cause as much damage as possible.

"Behind you!" Soleil cried.

Cassiel's heart nearly stopped. She flapped her wings and leaped skyward right as several of Crow's feathers from before flew at her. Crow nearly succeeded in impaling Cassiel, but ultimately failed.

With Cassiel gone, her spear of light dissipated, leaving a massive bloody hole in Crow's back. Crow coughed blood several times, then struggled to stand, carefully affixing her feathers back in place to hide her injury.

The truth was, Cassiel's sneak attack had done serious damage. Crow was not like Belial. She could not heal herself mid-battle, and thus injuries sustained had to be powered through.

Soleil's two halves combined back into one, and she stood tall once more. This time, Soleil used her strength to rip a rather large tree from the ground, then swing it down at Crow like a giant club!

Crow cawed with hatred. She punched upward at the falling tree and blasted it apart, then leaped skyward to grab at Soleil, who once again dodged.

"You cannot evade me forever! Caw-CAW!"

While Crow was injured badly and somewhat slowed, she didn't need to move too quickly to catch up to Soleil, as Soleil was still trying to land the killing blow.

Cassiel started to hesitate more and more. Crow might be injured, but she was still as dangerous as ever.

"We can't kill her... should we send an SOS to Melody? Where is she, anyway? Shouldn't she have come here by now?!"

Cassiel fired a blast of light into the sky that exploded like a firework! Unfortunately, in the midday sun, it wasn't very visible, but she hoped the spike of energy would at least draw someone's attention. She didn't dare leave Soleil alone with Crow, lest a tragedy unfold while she was gone.

It became obvious as the minutes ticked by that Crow's ritual was wearing off. Soleil began to pressure Crow. Her punches started inflicting serious damage once again.

Crow grimaced. She slapped and swiped at Soleil, but the damned false angel was too agile. For any attacks Crow landed, Soleil started landing two or even three hits, and those hits became progressively more punishing. It turned out that Crow's ritual had a major side effect. All of the wounds she suffered before and during the ritual, which had previously been suppressed, were now much more serious than ever. The gaping hole in her back had festered and become infected, leaving her coughing and sputtering in between blows suffered.

"Gahh!!" Crow cursed as she sloppily tried to cut Soleil in half with her claws. "Imposs-COUGH!! Impossible! I can't lose to a weak little rat like you!"

"Oh, but you can." Soleil said, dodging another swipe. "Just remember. It was the two of us working togeth- AH! Watch out!!"

Soleil suddenly snapped her attention to Cassiel, who was standing off to the side. Cassiel jerked in surprise, but she didn't see anything.

With Soleil momentarily distracted, Crow pounced. She didn't know what had distracted the false angel, but it was still a fortunate development for her. She successfully grabbed Soleil again, this time snatching her by the legs, lifting her overhead, then slamming her upper body into the ground with all her strength, over and over.

Soleil struggled to escape, but Crow didn't dare to let her go. Over and over, she beat Soleil against the ground, while Cassiel tried to distract her with attacks from the back, even taking back to the skies to attack Crow's injured back. Unfortunately, Crow's feathers kept the bloody hole covered, so Cassiel couldn't land a significant blow.

Again and again, Crow beat Soleil into the ground. She once more tore Soleil in half with frenzied rage, but this wasn't good enough for her. She started biting at each of Soleil's halves, ripping chunks of the construct out, then spitting those chunks on the ground and squashing them underfoot. Soleil could sustain her existence between a few different components and even recombine if introduced back together, but when the parts ripped out were small enough, they simply lost molecular cohesion and dissipated into mindless sludge.

Soleil weakly tried to punch Crow and wrench her thumb again, but Crow was fighting for her very life by this point. She knew Melody could arrive soon, and she knew that even if Melody didn't, her life was still in danger if Soleil escaped. This was her last shot at killing the construct. She had to make it count!!

Bit by bit, chunk by chunk, Crow ripped Soleil apart while Cassiel screamed and begged her to stop. Tears fell from Cassiel's eyes as she summoned a greathammer and uselessly slammed it against Crow's head from behind. This attack did some damage, but Crow still ignored it. Nothing was more important than eliminating the main threat!

And so she did. Eventually, both of Soleil's halves stopped struggling. They fell inert, then turned to mindless sludge in her claws.

Soleil, Cassiel's assigned protector, had died.

"NOOO!!" Cassiel shrieked, as she sensed that her closest friend had perished. She flew into a maddened rage and conjured her strongest armor, then started punching and kicking Crow as hard as she could. Each strike caused Cassiel's arms to ache and her skin to split. She went well beyond what her body could handle, ultimately hurting herself more than she hurt Crow. But the Demon Emperor relented.

After confirming she had successfully killed the false angel, Crow sneered. When Cassiel landed another punch, Crow abruptly spun and slashed with her talons, raking them across Cassiel's armored midsection and violently tearing through her defenses like they were paper. Four terrible slashes cut across Cassiel's stomach, and she fell backward, her armor dissipating.

She had nearly been disemboweled. Crow's single attack had left her bleeding profusely. If she did not receive medical attention, she might just die by the end of the day.

But that paled in comparison to the future awaiting her if Crow had her way. The Demon Emperor, now badly injured and limping in pain, still grinned victoriously, looking at her prey lying on her back.

"Hah... hahaha... this was ALL worth it!" Crow cackled. "I must thank you, little bitch. You really made me work for this. But that only makes the victory taste even sweeter!"

Crow loomed over Cassiel as the defeated Lazarite coughed and sputtered blood. She looked at Crow with eyes full of fear. She couldn't fight back anymore. Even the slightest movement would tear her stomach open. She was utterly at Crow's mercy.

"You... why are you doing this...?" Cassiel cried. "Your husband attacked me! I only defended myself! He-"

"SHUT UP!!!" Crow screeched. "You think a few cheap words will protect you?! It's the law of the jungle out here! Nobody's coming to save you! No knight in shining armor, no Melody, and certainly no Belial! Hehehehe, as we speak, all the demons are being convened to hear about the survival of a certain powerful ally of our people. Else, why do you think Melody wouldn't have shown by now? Because she isn't even on Sharmur! Hahaha!!"

Crow's voice softened. She leaned in close to Cassiel, then flashed a sadistic grin. "But don't worry, pretty girl. I'm not going to let you die here. I'm going to keep you alive for a long, long time! Locked in a dungeon, chained to a wall, made to be my funny little dancing monkey! I'll torture you, humiliate you, and treat you like my toy! You'll spend the rest of existence screaming, begging for freedom, begging me to kill you! And I'll only do so once all the fun is gone. But that will take a long, long time! Hahaha!"

Crow reached for Cassiel. Just as she was about to pick the angel up, Crow felt a presence to her left.

Her heart skipped a beat. The false angel?!

She quickly turned to face the newcomer, only to see someone she never expected in a million years.

A creature with two heads and four arms. Glowing eyes covered his body from chest to toe.

"Not a bad idea," Gressil, the Emperor of Chaos said. "But Crow, that privilege belongs to me. Not you."

Gressil's eyes burst with rage. He lunged at Crow and slammed his fist into her face, sending her sprawling! Crow crashed to the ground, then painfully staggered back to her feet, looking at him in disbelief.

"Gressil! You- what is the meaning of this?! We have no quarrel!"

"How dare you try to lay claim to my Birdie, you overgrown chicken." Gressil snarled. "She isn't yours to torture."

With a mighty roar, Gressil lunged at Crow. He began beating and wrestling the injured Demon Emperor, using his four limbs to overpower her, with his two upper limbs grabbing and controlling her head's range of motion while the lower two limbs either kept her arms at bay or slammed into her chest, over and over.

Cassiel watched with a blood-drained face as the one entity she hated and feared more than any other became her 'savior'. Gressil started beating the absolute shit out of Crow. Normally, he wouldn't stand a chance against her, but the combined damage she had taken from Soleil and Cassiel had weakened her enough that she was far from her prime fighting condition. She couldn't even activate a Ritual again, as the previous one had occurred too recently.

Crow began to panic. She tried mightily to break free from Gressil's arms, to escape his grasp, but she failed! At this point, she merely wanted to break free and escape with her life, but she realized, perhaps too late, that it was she who was at his mercy!

Thump! Thump! CRACK!

Gressil savagely beat and pulverized Crow. Even his face got in on the action as he occasionally bit at her feathers and yanked them out to spit them on the ground. Crow tried to summon her feathers to attack Gressil, but she realized she couldn't control them while Gressil was here. His Chaos Aura blocked all of her magical power!

"No! No! Nooo!!" Crow shrieked. Her cries became feeble and pitiful as Gressil grabbed her by the back of the neck and slammed her face-first into the dirt. Then he got on top of Crow and wrapped his two lower arms around her neck.

Crow's eyes bulged. Gressil was clearly trying to choke her to death! She grabbed at his lower arms to try and pull them off, but she failed to realize his two upper arms had grabbed hold of her beak...

With a violent wrenching twist, Gressil snapped Crow's neck. Her body ceased its resistance, and she fell silent.

Bit by bit, the light died in her eyes.

Her body went slack, but Gressil didn't end the fight there. He systematically began to shatter each of her limbs, break her bones, and render her completely unable to move. Her bent and mangled her body in increasingly horrifying ways, then waved his hand and caused her to disappear. Where he sent her, only he knew.

Then, Gressil turned to look at Cassiel. Her blood ran cold.

"Oh, Birdie. I've been trailing that evil chicken for quite a while." Gressil said with an almost loving smile, as if he were her knight in shining armor after all. He strode over to Cassiel, who shakily tried to push herself away with her feet. She didn't get far.

Tears welled up in Cassiel's eyes. She was all alone. Nobody was here but her and her worst enemy. She started to tremble violently, terrified of the fate she knew was about to befall her.

Gressil got down on one knee and lovingly stroked her face. Cassiel nearly vomited on the spot.

"Come now, Birdie. There's no need to be scared. Yes, I let that big bad chicken come here. I let her kill that ugly stain, Soleil. But that was just because your 'friend' was standing in the way of our joyful reunion. With Soleil gone, you and I can visit each other more often. Isn't that nice?"

Cassiel shivered. She couldn't speak. She could only clutch her injured stomach, wondering if it would be better to die right here and now, rather than end up back in Gressil's dungeon.

But contrary to her terror, Gressil did not abduct her. He simply looked her body up and down, his expression a mixture of lust and pity. "I'm sorry she hurt you like this. Don't worry. I'm not taking you back with me. I've actually grown to enjoy seeing you out in the wild, like this. Smiling, laughing, flourishing. I think it would be best if I allowed you to maintain your sense of independence."

He continued. "You were always so pretty, chained to my wall. But all the fight had gone out from your eyes, and along with it, a big part of what made you so... appetizing. How beautiful can a flower be if it never sees the sun or tastes the rain? So I'll make sure you live free, and we get to spend time together once in a while. Without that eyesore in both our ways, we can see each other whenever we want. Won't that be nice?"

"G-get... get away... from me..." Cassiel whimpered.

"Oh, I know you don't mean that." Gressil said, his smile making her want to crawl into a hole and die. "Since I can't have you succumbing to your injuries... consider this a final parting gift."

Gressil reached down and touched Cassiel's Heavenly Shroud, returning her to her human form. Then he waved his hand. The scenery abruptly changed around Cassiel. Gressil vanished, and she found herself inside the new hospital located in Eastern Melodia.

As soon as she arrived, a familiar Harpie, Doctor Fathy, who was in charge of the hospital when Belial wasn't around, gasped when Cassiel appeared practically right in front of her. "What? Who are you? Where did you come from?!"

Fathy stared at Cassiel with deep shock for a moment before shaking her head. Then she called for help, and various medical assistants ran into the room.

Belial and Leeroy were both gone, but luckily, the facilities on Melodia weren't bad. Cassiel was put onto a gurney, her angelic form obscured by the Heaven's Shroud. As she was rushed into the emergency room, Cassiel's heart palpitated with fear.

She couldn't see or sense Gressil anymore. He must still be there... watching her... from the shadows.

But Soleil wasn't here to protect Cassiel anymore. She felt naked and exposed... exactly the way Gressil wanted her to feel.

The doctors put a mask on her face, one which pumped a strange gas into her lungs. Cassiel's eyes became weak and started to flutter shut.

As the sedatives took her to a dreamland, Cassiel wept. She wept over the death of her friend, and she wept over what Soleil's disappearance meant for her future.

She was alone again.

Part 699: Humanity's Backup Plan

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. 4PM. Eastern Melodia.

Inside the unified headquarters of Melodia's Defenders, Belial finally finished explaining the situation to a small group of people. Among them were Commander Linda Adams, Commander Chadwick, Melody, Beelzebub, and Kiari. They were all sitting inside Linda's office, which felt a bit cramped with so many people stuffed inside, but nobody complained.

"That's the long and short of it." Belial concluded. "As we speak, the other demons are spreading the word of Raphael and Uzziel's deception. We don't know how long we have until the Kolvaxians attack. We don't know if they will attack. But since the charade is up and their plan has been revealed early, I don't imagine it'll be long."

The others remained silent for a time. Beelzebub was the first to speak.

"I'm not so certain." Beelzebub said.

"About what?" Linda asked.

He pondered for a moment.

"About whether or not the angels will actually attack. Think about it. Even if the Psions hadn't completely imploded due to Demila's betrayal, do you really believe the entirety of the Psion Army could withstand a regenerating enemy force led by a competent, perfectly intelligent leader like Uzziel? If she wanted to overwhelm the galaxy, she would have done so already."

He continued. "This isn't about winning. It's about revenge. Uzziel feels slighted. She wants to inflict pain and suffering on us, to make us feel small, weak, and snuff out our hope. I'm not sure she's actually going to start rapidly overtaking worlds now that the jig is up. I think she's going to continue slowly swallowing the galaxy, laughing at us because she thinks it's delightful that we're pissing our pants in terror or trying to mount a pointless, feckless resistance."

"That's a nice sentiment, I guess." Linda said calmly. "But you're merely guessing. What makes you even think your assumption has any merit?"

Beelzebub shrugged sheepishly. "Well... because not long ago, I also was a rather vindictive bastard who wanted revenge. It just seems in character for her... and me. The old me, I mean. Not that I'm not still a vindictive bastard, but I digress..."

Linda sighed and looked off to the side, rubbing her head. "Yes, I suppose you have a point."

Chadwick cleared his throat. "Ahem. Let us not dwell on hypothetical scenarios and mental states of our enemy. We need to think about concrete actions we can take."

He waited until he had everyone's attention before continuing.

"Unifying every species to battle the Kolvaxians is not only our best chance at winning, but is in fact our only chance. These monsters are so durable that even our heaviest artillery cannons will barely stagger them for a moment. We have weapons that might be capable of stalling them out, such as the Stasis Grenades we used to great effect on Maiura, but those can only buy us a little time."

"So what do you propose?" Linda asked.

"The Cube." Chadwick said. "The Phoenix is a Middle Cosmic now, yes? It is not powerful enough to protect us from the Archangels-"

"She isn't a combatant at all." Beelzebub interrupted. "The Phoenix is only capable of creating worlds and controlling the cube. If even a Low Cosmic breaches the interior, she won't be able to- well, actually, she does have the Sentry Stars... I don't know how powerful they are though."

"Yes yes, but let me finish my point." Chadwick said while waving his hand. "Isn't there a colossal amount of space inside the Cube? A truly unfathomable amount beyond the size of multiple solar systems?"

Beelzebub blinked. "Yes... why? Surely you're not thinking..."

"That Cube is not only vast, with ample room for growth, but it is hidden, mobile, and it can sustain life." Chadwick said slowly. "Don't you see? We've treated it as a throwaway training depot, or a backup option for far too long. I believe we must relocate key worlds inside the Cube before the Plague can infest them!"

The entire room went quiet. Belial silently gasped.

"That... that could work!" Belial said. "Beelzebub, is it possible? Can the Phoenix put a few stars inside the Cube and create self-sustaining planetary orbits? Can she create an entire ecosystem of worlds for us to live upon?"

Beelzebub rubbed his chin. He fell into thought.

"...Give me a moment."

He closed his eyes and folded his hands in his lap. Then he bowed his head. Belial was surprised when she felt his demonic aura abruptly disappear, as if his soul had left his body.

Chadwick opened his mouth to speak, but Linda held a finger up to her lips. He opted to remain silent.

A minute later, Beelzebub's aura returned. He chewed his lower lip, then nodded his head.

"The Phoenix has spoken. We can indeed do this. She can transport entire worlds inside the Cube. The cost is high, but not extreme. And the more worlds rich in life that we bring, the more energy she can use to bring in additional ones. But, it's not all roses and daffodils."

Beelzebub waggled a finger in warning. "The Phoenix says that she can only put worlds inside the Cube by moving the Cube near them. This means that she can only do so once the Cube is inside a star system."

Linda frowned. "The Cube needs to warp across the galaxy. It requires time to move around."

"That's right." Beelzebub said. "If Uzziel catches on, she could completely destroy all our efforts by infesting a world before we take it into the Cube, then unleashing the Plague when we least expect it, collapsing our resistance immediately. In the worst case scenario, we have to assume we will only be able to bring one star system's worth of planets with us. After all, the Cube was created by Camael, not Raphael, and he is unlikely to know it possesses this function. But after we do it once, he may discover our deception and take steps to prevent us from doing so in the future."

The entire room fell silent.

All at once, everyone realized this solution was not as simple as it sounded.

"How do we decide which world to save?" Kiari asked quietly, her heart heavy with emotions due to her husband's funeral, but her mind steeled with determination for their child. "I like Sharmur, but it has a small population. Volgarius is the densest world in the galaxy. If we're going by the number of lives we could save..."

"What about the Demon Deities?" Melody asked, also speaking for the first time. "My power is bound to the energy of not only Sharmur's star, but all its planets as well. Is it possible that by moving an entire star system into the Cube, I could retain my power? Then we would have a Middle Cosmic inside, able to assist the Phoenix and provide a powerful defense."

"If so, then that would mean we could protect the other Demon Deities." Beelzebub pointed out. "Right now, we can evacuate all the mortal demons into the Labyrinth. It should be hardened against a Kolvaxian invasion by virtue of existing in a protected dimension, especially after Diablo altered its core functions and gave it new power. But if we do that, the Demon Deities bound to planets and stars will be left naked and vulnerable. Alone, they have no chance against one of the Archangels, let alone a Kolvaxian horde."

"We can't leave them to die." Melody said, nodding. "They are all powerhouses whose abilities we could come to rely on. Especially Auger and Yardrat, but I wouldn't discount Vespera or any of the others. A Cosmic is a Cosmic, after all."

Chadwick looked uneasy. "Sharing a galaxy with these Deities is one thing, but packing all of us into the Cube with them? Melody, you can provide us some assurance of protection because if any of them get any ideas, they can only attack us one at a time. But if they're all in the Cube together, we'll be at their mercy! You cannot possibly beat back ten Middle Cosmics at once!"

Melody grimaced. "No shit, I can't. But the situation is bad. We have to act quickly before Uzziel and Raphael catch wind of our plans! Galactic unification is our only prayer for victory."

The other leaders looked uneasy. After all, in the best case scenario, they would be shoving many core worlds together comprised of species that hated each other just a couple of weeks prior, and one of those species even committed a genocide.
