"Among the Volgrim, the Ascended are the most numerous, and not by a small margin, but by a vast and unfathomable sea." Kordonis says, extremely glad to have changed the subject. "The Technopaths are the second most numerous of the species, yet for every individual Technopath, there exists a thousand Ascended! Even so, despite the unbelievable population the Ascended possess, you will most likely encounter even fewer of them than you will the Dolgrimites. If it weren't for Founder Unarin and a few carefully placed Ascended among the highest echelons of government, I would personally never have seen one in the flesh."

"From what I understand," Jason says, "The Ascended all live inside of... virtual reality pods?"

"That's right." Kordonis says. "They live lives of pure bliss. They all mentally exist inside a shared living space we call the 'Kingdom of Paradise.' However, that is not to say that they are soft, or that they love peace. In fact, most Ascended are even more violent and bloodthirsty than the Psions. It's just that... they engage in brutal, never-ending war within the virtual worlds, where they will personally rip apart and murder septillions every cycle."

[Other subspecies can and have visited the Kingdom of Paradise.] Miikil adds. [I paid a visit there once, myself. As part of my training, I was allowed to spend ten orbital cycles inside, wherein I engaged in the daily battles and struggles the Ascended did. I was shocked by their vicious and brutal methods of dispatching their enemies.]

"They kill each other, revive, and kill each other again." Kordonis chuckles. "Of course, while they may war with one another endlessly, they would describe this as 'fun' or as 'casual exercise.' Indeed, they also engage in virtual gluttony, intercourse, and other primitive wants and desires. The Kingdom of Paradise is a place where the Ascended can live carnal and indecent lives far away from the confines of the mortal realm."

Samuel, having finished his burgers and pasta, leans back in his chair, satisfied.

"I don't get it. Aren't you guys in the middle of a war? Why aren't the Ascended helping you fight the Plague?"

"In a way, they are." Kordonis explains. "The Ascended live within a virtual reality where they can not only fight and engage in daily pleasures, but their perception of time is also greatly increased. A single cycle in our realm is a hundred cycles in theirs. Therefore, we often send Changelings inside to perform important research at accelerated mental speeds."

"That's not the Ascended doing anything special." Jason retorts. "That's just the Paradise being a useful tool for Volgrimkind. Honestly, these Ascended seem like freeloaders. You've got Unarin doing important work, but the rest of them are dicking around inside a giant videogame. When you've got a galaxy-class threat knocking at your doorstep, you shouldn't be screwing around."

Kordonis shakes his head helplessly. "I am not qualified to question the Founders' intentions. If they have allowed the Ascended to live inside the Kingdom of Paradise, they must have a good reason for doing so."

Samuel snorts. "Yeah. It's called preferential treatment."

Kordonis frowns. "And by that, you mean…?"

"Isn't it obvious?" Samuel asks. "Unarin is the head honcho of the Volgrim. While the other subspecies bleed and suffer and die at the hands of the Kolvaxians, his subspecies gets to multiply and live happy, carefree lives in their little isolated paradise. Awfully convenient, don't you think?"

Miikil abruptly stands up. [Insolent! How dare you question the integrity of our First Founder?! Dull-headed mud-dweller! You know nothing of Founder Unarin's sacrifices! He has fought and lost too much for the likes of you to-]

"Invocator Miikil." Kordonis quickly interrupts, shooting a pointed look at her. "They are ignorant backwater people. They cannot be faulted for not respecting our great and noble leaders. Take your seat and speak no further antagonistic words to our... respected guests."

Miikil inhales several times. She glares daggers at Samuel, as if wanting to rip him apart right then and there.

After a few moments, she abruptly plunks back down in her chair, but her expression doesn't soften in the slightest.

[You had better take care not to utter such words on Volgarius!] She mentally shouts. [Founder Unarin is not just the most respected member of our species, but something more akin to a deity! You dare not provoke the ire of a High Psion, lest they crush you into plasma without waiting for an explanation!]

Jason glances at Samuel. Seeing the Wordsmith's expression, Samuel nods apologetically.

"Sorry. I ran my mouth without thinking. Of course your First Founder knows more than me. I'm sure he has plans I can't even wrap my primitive brain around."

Immediately, Miikil calms down.

[Hmph. At least you know how to apologize properly.]

With that outburst lingering in the air, the atmosphere around the table turns a little awkward. Having finished their food, humanity's soldiers eventually take their leave, retiring to their quarters along with the Wordsmith, while Miikil and Kordonis head back to the Bridge to deal with other matters.

As Jason and his men reach their quarters, he pauses to turn to Emperor Serena.

"Pardon me for being blunt, but what is your reasoning for tagging along? You've barely said anything the whole time."

Serena's sightless eyes gaze through Jason, as if he isn't even there.

"I am Gorn's ears. Anything I hear, I will report to him when I return."

Jason frowns. "What, so you're a spy? Are you really going to just say that straight to my face? That takes some guts."

Serena slowly waves her hands. "You already know this truth, so why should I act as if you do not? I am not interested in you, but in the Volgrim. I wish to learn what they have been up to since the end of the Energy Wars."

Jason's eyes flicker with insight. He falls silent, instead opting to switch to telepathic communication through his Wordsmithing so that the ship's internal recordings won't pick up his next words.

[Are you saying that Gorn wishes to get a better grasp on the Volgrim's wartime capabilities?]

Serena blinks slowly. [It is as you infer.]

[But why?] Jason asks. [Don't tell me he plans to fight them?]

[Perhaps he does, and perhaps he does not.] Serena replies. [It is not my place to speak for him. However, one thing is certain. The Volgrim have lied to you several times now.]

Jason blinks in surprise. [They have?]

[Yes. At the very least, they have not spoken the full truth. The Ascended are much more important than Kordonis has let on. There is almost certainly a greater secret at work regarding their subspecies.]

[That's not telling me anything.] Jason replies. [What secret are you referring to?]

The Emperor of Soul Whispers shakes her head. [I do not know.]

[So you're making a blind guess?] Jason asks, feeling stifled in his chest. [Then how do you know Kordonis is hiding information?!]

For a brief moment, Serena says nothing. Then, she cocks her head.

[His soul... whispered to me.]

[Yeah??] Jason asks, even more bewildered. [So what did it say? You're speaking in riddles!]

Serena lowers her head. She chews her lip, while a thoughtful expression plays upon her lips.

[It is not what his soul whispered, but what it did not whisper. There is something he is not saying. Perhaps it is something he does not even know himself. He certainly harbors questions of his own, regarding the true purpose behind the Ascended.]

Serena raises her eyes.

[Even their very name... The Ascended... what do you suppose they have ascended... from?]

Jason knits his brow.

[That... that is a good question. Haven't they ascended beyond the mortal coil? Now they live in some fancy virtual reality, where the rest of the subspecies can't? That's like ascending to a higher existence, right?]

Serena shrugs, ever so slightly.

[Mmm. Perhaps that is it. I will take my leave, Wordsmith.]

After exchanging a polite curtsy with Jason, Serena turns away and heads to her personal quarters, her princess-like figure and snow-white dress vanishing through the closed door.

After she leaves, Jason continues to stand in the hallway. He glances around, wrestling with the thoughts in his mind.

Are the Ascended hiding something? Is there truly a greater purpose behind their existence?

A chill goes down Jason's spine. He glances around again, feeling a cold sweat drip down his back.

And why does it feel like someone is always WATCHING me?

Part 383: Hold'em, Fold'em

A week passes while the VLL Hatoraxia continues traveling at Warp 7 to its destination, Volgarius. With the journey half-over, and a week still to go before arrival, most of the people among Jason's group have gotten relatively used to the atmosphere on board the ship.

It's on the seventh day that one of the myriad Volgrim Technopaths walks into the Leisure Hall, where they find the humans sitting at one of the common tables, talking and laughing, all while sitting in a circle and playing with a deck of cards. This particular Technopath happens to be a simple ship technician, though still ranked highly enough to enjoy a prestigious post on a Captain-level vessel like the Hatoraxia.

His six spider-like legs tink against the ground as he pauses in the doorway, glancing at the strange activity the humans are performing. Emperor Serena also sits at the table, although she doesn't join in on their card game, but instead sits off to the side, ambivalent, like a goddess untouched by the mortal realm.

After staring at the humans for a few long moments, the Technopath crewman slowly walks over to another table, one lacking any seats. He transmits a command through his neural interface, and a minute later, a robotic drone flies over to him with a bowl of green goop-like substance.

This substance, known as Bio-Paste, is the only 'food' most Volgrim ever consume. Suitable for sustaining their bodies, it is cheap and filled with enough nutrients for them to live off for several days.

The Technopath lifts the bowl to his lips and begins silently slurping down the paste with the same lack of enthusiasm he has for the past twenty thousand years, since the day he spawned from the Technopath Creation Facilities, where his DNA was repurposed from many living Technopaths to create a suitable worker drone.

Each Volgrim subspecies has its own method of reproduction, methods Jason and his crew have learned about over the past several days through their interactions with Sangin Kordonis and Invocator Miikil.

The Dolgrimites, those who stick to the 'natural order,' reproduce in a manner somewhat similar to many life-forms on the now-destroyed homeworld of Earth, through females that lay eggs fertilized by males. The eggs eventually hatch, and new Dolgrimites walk the mortal plane as a result.

Psions very rarely reproduce. Not only can they live for an extremely long time, but it's also quite rare for them to permanently die, thanks to a unique method none of the humans have uncovered. When new Psions do come into being, it is through 'Energy Osmosis,' wherein multiple Psions gather together and congeal their psionic energies to form a being made of pure cosmic energy. After its form stabilizes, this being takes the form of an adult-looking Psion, one that never has to toddle about, and possesses instincts and knowledge well beyond what any newborn mud-dweller might.

Changelings reproduce asexually. As their species has no gendered males or females, what they instead do is split apart into secondary, child-like Changelings upon reaching a certain age. By splitting off parts of their bodies, the Changelings can grow second versions of themselves, versions which will ultimately split off at an indeterminate point in the future, as well. If necessary, they can even repeat this process later in life, or they can force it to occur earlier.

As for the Ascended, their method of reproduction may not be particularly secretive, yet no matter which of the humans asks, not a single Volgrim answers their queries...

Finally, Technopaths are beings who reproduce through technologically advanced cloning machines. However, these machines do not produce clones of individual Technopaths, but rather, they are massive facilities containing the DNA of billions of Technopaths, and by randomly or predeterminately combining different strings of DNA, they can output new Technopaths of unique biological origins.

As such, this simple Technopath officer holds anywhere from ten to ten thousand different strings of Technopath DNA inside of his body. He is a unique individual, yet his uniqueness comes from those of other, far longer-lived Technopaths before him.

After slurping up every drop of Bio-Paste, the Technopath mechanic sits silently at his table, directing his attention to the humans at the far corner of the Leisure Hall. Samuel, Yamir, and the rest of their comrades laugh uproariously, while a pile of chips sits on the table before them. Jason Hiro does not sit among them, but instead remains back in his quarters, attending to some important matter.

"That was a lucky hand, Samuel!"

"There's no luck to it. I'm just better than you!"

Samuel rakes in a few hundred gambling chips and pulls them to his side of the table. After stacking them up, he deals out the next rounds of cards, sniggering at his 'skill' in the art of gambling.

These soldiers continue playing, oblivious to the gaze on their backs. After a few minutes, the sound of an approaching Technopath, its clear and distinctive metallic feet clanking against the deckplates, draws their attention.

Samuel's eyes flick to the side. He notices a spider-legged Technopath with six metal limbs sticking out of its torso. The Technopath says nothing for a moment, but instead stares intently at the cards in their hands.

Finally, the Volgrim glances at Samuel.

"Whas ut shut athsu'usx xuia hianant a'a angagung un?"

A deathly silence follows, as every person at the table turns to look at the Technopath, unsure of what he said.

Realizing his error, the Technopath clears his throat.

"Grr-ahem! Forgive me. I am not yet used to speaking in your human tongue. I have only downloaded the language files a few days ago. I wish to inquire: What is this activity you humans are engaging in?"

"Oh." Samuel says, nodding slowly. "We're currently gambling. Playing some cards. Would you like to join us?"

The Technopath blinks. "Gambling. Playing cards. I am unfamiliar with this terminology. Explain."

Yamir snorts. "We were bored, so we decided to have some fun. We are playing some cards to let off steam. What do you Volgrim do when you have free time?"

The atmosphere at the table turns slightly tense. Given the Technopath's fearsome appearance, the human crew always feel a little tense around any of their alien 'friends.' But especially this awkward and blunt fellow, who speaks his thoughts without restraint.

"Free time. Free." The Technopath states, analyzing Yamir's choice of words. "Meaning you do not need to pay a monetary fee. Do mud-dwellers need to pay a fee to access the field of space and time? I do not understand the terminology."

Yamir casually raises his hand. "It seems we have a misunderstanding. This is the Leisure Hall, right? That means it is a hall for leisure activity. When you are not performing your active duties, what do you do? For us, we play games to pass the time."

"You play games." The Technopath repeats. "What function does this 'games' activity serve? Are you attempting to pursue an objective your commanding officer set out for you?"

One of the humans, a female officer, chuckles. "No, silly. We're just having fun. This isn't work! Work is when you're off repairing some conduit or whatever. This is something we're doing to pass the time. Look, why don't we deal you in, teach you the rules of this game, and maybe you'll even have some fun too?"

The Technopath blinks several times. It takes him a full ten seconds to reply, leaving another awkward silence to linger.

"I must perform my duties in three standard time-units."

"Three hours?" The woman asks. "What are you going to do before then? Stand around in a corner all by yourself? Just play some cards with us, and you'll pick it up quick."

She pauses for half a beat.

"Unless... the Volgrim aren't as smart as us inferior mud-dwellers. I suppose this game might be a little too advanced for you."

The Technopath frowns. "I am a highly intelligent bio-adaptive life form. I am certainly superior to you in the many aspects of gradable intelligence!"

The woman smirks. "We'll see about that. What's your name?"

"My designation is Sangin Pondis." The Technopath says.

"And I'm Ashley." The woman says. "This is our commanding officer, Samuel. And this is Yamir..."

She introduces Pondis to the rest of the crew, and the Technopath mechanic settles in to stand along the side of a table. He lowers his legs so that he is at roughly the same height as the other people, then watches as Samuel deals him a pair of cards.

"This game is called 'Texas Hold'em." Samuel explains. "The rules are simple. You need to beat the hands of everyone else, or bluff them into folding. To do this, you need to make guesses about what their two cards are, versus the three cards shown on the Flop.

After the Flop comes the Turn, then the River. One person's crappy Pair might become a Full House or even a Four of a Kind, so you have to watch out."

Ashley pipes up after Samuel. "This game is as much about guesswork as it is having a strong 'poker face'! My poker face sucks, so I'm terrible at bluffing, but even I get lucky sometimes. A lot of people have 'tells' that give away whether they're bluffing or telling the truth. This game follows the principle of Sun Tzu's Art of War; show strength when you are weak, and weakness when you are strong!"

Pondis nods slowly. He accesses a collection of Earth's archival knowledge and rapidly downloads the details of this game known as 'Texas Hold'em,' absorbing the knowledge into his neural cortex.

"What is the objective of this activity?" Pondis asks. "I have accessed the information pertaining to 'Texas Hold'em' but have found no information on its strategic value."

Ashley frowns. "It, uh..."

From across the table, a surprising voice speaks. Emperor Serena, of all the people seated, answers Pondis's question.

"There is no material point in playing this game." Serena says slowly. "Humans engage in this behavior for the sake of achieving dopamine highs. By playing games similar to this, they can also further their bonds while engaging in 'small talk.' This allows them to become closer as friends and comrades."

Yamir chuckles. "Yeah. What the princess said."

Samuel clears his throat. "Let's make this round a practice round for the new guy. No stakes, no wagers. I'll deal the Pre-Flop."

He passes two cards to each of the players, face-down.

"In this game," Samuel explains, "subterfuge is the main strategy. If you're not interested in playing for fun or to pass the time, think of this game like a mental training exercise. It will hone your social acumen, making you more adept at spotting and identifying the expressions of your opponents."

Pondis's eyes flash with insight. "Yes. I understand. It is a tactical training exercise. I must observe the faces of my opponents to better annihilate them!"

Ashley coughs. "Ah, ah, that's a metaphorical 'annihilate,' you know..."

"Of course." Pondis nods.

Samuel flips his cards face-up. "During the game, we don't usually do this, but this is a practice round. As you can see, I have an Ace of Hearts and a Two of Spades. When the Flop gets dealt, my goal is to match my Ace and Deuce with more Aces and Deuces, or to try and make a Straight. Sometimes, I might also luck out and get a flush when four Hearts or Spades show up. But it's also likely one of the other players will have a Heart or a Spade of their own, in which case I need to hope I have a Higher Value than them. Threes beat Twos, and Fours beat Threes. And so on."

"I have already compiled the rules of this training exercise inside my neural cortex." Pondis states. "Let us continue."

"Sure, sure." Samuel says. "Alright, since we're not making any bets, I'll just deal out the Flop."

He places three cards face-up in the center of the table, then smiles. "As you can see, two Aces have shown up. But also, there's a Seven of Hearts. That means I have a Three of a Kind. Mine is also the strongest type of Three in a Kind, since Aces have the highest value. But my supporting card is terrible, since it's a Deuce. If the next card on the Turn or the River is an Ace or a Deuce, I'll be in a good position."

Pondis nods. "Affirmative. Your loss will occur if someone else here possesses an Ace of their own, and even if you deal out a Two, you can still lose if they have a higher value supporting card, such as a Seven."

"That's right." Samuel says, smiling. "You're a quick learner."

"Affirmative." Pondis repeats. "Mud-dweller Ashley has already won this round. She has an Ace of Clubs and a Seven of Clubs face-down in front of her."

Ashley's expression turns ashen. "W-what? How could you know that?"

Yamir snorts. "You must be easier to read than we thought. Even a Volgrim can see right through you."

Pondis shakes his head. "Incorrect. I accessed the Hatoraxia's internal scanners to uncover the hidden values on the cards at this table. I have also determined the order of the cards yet to be dealt in this round. In terms of tactical understanding, my knowledge exceeds all the others at this table. This is proof that the Volgrim are superior to mere mud-dwellers."

The entire table goes silent.

Ashley, Yamir, and Samuel all gaze at Pondis with looks of embarrassment, shock, and incredulity.

"Um... Pondis..." Yamir says, scratching his head bashfully. "Since this is only a practice round, I... I won't say anything crude... but using the ship's scanners is sort of... cheating."

Samuel coughs. "It's good that we did a practice round first."

"I knew I wasn't that easy to read! Sheesh!" Ashley pouts.

Pondis cocks his head. "Did I speak in error? I used my superior advantage in information warfare to exploit your weakness. Why do you all act as if I have broken the rules of the game?"

"It's not your fault." Yamir says. "In games like this, 'cheating' is considered bad form. You must use your own personal ability to discern the cards of other players, not external means, like the ship's scanners. You also probably shouldn't cheat with your Technopath implants, or whatever else."

Serena smiles faintly. "Think of this as a training exercise taken under limited constraints, Pondis. You must defeat these inferior mud-dwellers without using your superior technology. If you have to resort to higher technology the mud-dwellers don't even possess, can you truly state that you are a superior life-form?"

"You are also an inferior mud-dweller." Pondis says, directing his words at Serena.

Serena's sightless eyes look right past him. She imperceptibly frowns.

"Perhaps. But at least I am not rude."

The game continues. Serena continues to sit on the sidelines, while Pondis gradually acclimates to the limits placed upon him. Surprisingly, as ten and twenty rounds pass, he doesn't cheat again. He still makes several blunt statements that directly or indirectly insult the inferior mud-dwellers, but the humans pay his insults no mind, treating them as they would light ribbings directed at them by their fellow humans.

Two hours later, the humans and Yamir all stretch and pop their backs.

"Well. This has been an interesting experience." Samuel says. "Thanks for joining us, Pondis. I don't know if I had fun, but I did have a good time."

Pondis blinks. "Is the tactical exercise complete? It does not seem that we reached any suitable end-goal. Nobody has acquired all of the credit-chips on the table."

Yamir waves his hand casually. "There is no need for that. At the start of every game, we just give everyone an equal amount of chips anyway. The chips only exist for bragging rights. And since Samuel won the most chips in today's games, he has earned those bragging rights."

"What are 'bragging rights'?" Pondis inquires.

"They are, essentially, an invisible social trophy one can accrue through their actions in games like these." Serena says. "If you wish to acquire social points of a similar nature, you should strive to win the next time this group gathers."

"I contemplate, and I comprehend." Pondis replies. "I am ignorant regarding the values of mud-dweller culture. Do you intend to engage in additional tactical exercises such as this in the future?"

Ashley smiles. She grabs the deck of cards off the table and holds them toward Pondis. "That's right! And hey, why don't you try getting your fellow Volgrim to play this game, hmm? You might have fun, and you might even deepen your bonds!"

Pondis stares at the cards for a moment. He reaches out his five-tentacled limb to grasp the deck.

"I contemplate, and I comprehend." He repeats. "I shall attempt to educate my crew-members on the nature of this exercise."

After Sangin Pondis leaves, the humans return to their quarters, as do Yamir and Serena.

Upon reaching his quarters, Samuel finds Jason, who sits with his eyes closed, seemingly meditating on his bunk. The two men, as the highest ranked on the expedition, share a room.

"Samuel?" Jason says, opening his eyes. "You were gone a while. Guess your game ran longer than expected?"

"We had a new player jump in." Samuel explains. "One of the Volgrim."

"Oh. That's cool." Jason says, not too interested. "I didn't take them for the types to play card games."

"He wasn't. We had to frame it as a 'tactical exercise.'" Samuel says with a smirk. "But in the end, everything worked out. We taught him how to play, and everyone had a good time."

Jason nods, but clearly, his attention is elsewhere. "Right, right."

"Something on your mind?" Samuel asks, while sitting on his bed.

"The Lazarus Tower will soon activate." Jason says. "I just communicated with Phoebe back on Tarus II. The day we arrive on Volgarius, she'll likely start bringing back the fallen. The Power Gloves are ready, so tomorrow she'll do a big ceremony and start handing them out to the soldiers."

Jason pauses, and a wicked smile stretches across his face.

"Say, Samuel! I had Phoebe teleport a few Power Glove prototypes to me. Didn't you already get checked for compatibility?"

Samuel's heart chills. "Uhh..."

"Ah, that's right!" Jason exclaims, as if having 'remembered.' "You're compatible with fairy magic! That's so adorable. Here, let me give you a Power Glove so you can test it out right now!"

Jason giddily procures a Power Glove out of thin air, summoning it from the storage within his Mind Realm. As soon as it appears, Samuel's expression turns livid.

"Oh, fuck off! I'm not going to turn into some god-damned prancing little fairy!"

"But Samuel!" Jason protests, puffing out his lower lip. "You'd look so cute with those little butterfly wings."

"I'm about to butter-beat your ass, whether you're the Wordsmith or not!" Samuel shouts, flipping over on his bed to face the wall. "Now fuck off and let me sleep."

"Alright, alright, no need to be a little princess about it." Jason says, forcibly controlling his snickering. "I'll leave it on your desk. There's a bunch of modes pre-programmed, so when you're ready, we'll try all the different transformations tomorrow."

"Can't wait." Samuel growls, before ultimately falling silent.

Jason laughs quietly to himself, before eventually going back into a daze. He immerses himself in his Mind Realm, where Fiona, Raphael, Shana, Lorent, and the Phoenix all hang out.

As the Wordsmith converses with the denizens of his Mind Realm, neither he nor any of the people he brought along have any idea of the weapon they've unwittingly unleashed. Over the next several years, a storm will sweep across Volgrimkind, a whole new concept known as 'Texas Hold'em,' its conception borne upon the Hatoraxia, during a seemingly random and innocuous meeting between one Technopath and his temporary human guests.

Few could ever conceive of the changes this would bring about in Volgrim society.

Part 384: Cassiel's Road to Recovery

The VLL Hatoraxia draws ever closer to Volgarius, but back on Tarus II, plenty of events continue to play out, even with neither of the Wordsmiths around.

Despite the two Heroes disappearing, everyone believes Hope is inside the Labyrinth, hunting down Mephisto to slaughter him. Nobody doubts Hope's hatred of demons, to the point that even with a treaty signed, most Emperors simply aren't sure if it will bind the Wordsmith's clone. The more they interact with the humans, the more they begin to pick up on the signs there is quite a rift in human opinion. Clearly, many fleshbags are barely containing their eagerness to resume the war and rip down these Emperors from their golden thrones. If Jason weren't firmly in control of human society, would there be anyone to reign Hope and Neil in?

At the same time, a rift appears in demon society too. But rather than a split between their leaders, it tears across the divide between the mightiest Emperors and all of their subordinates at or below the Duke-level.

Most Emperors easily recognize the Wordsmith's intent with the Belial Booster and his other special facilities on Tarus II. In secret, they have their best sages, their Dukes, their formation masters, and other types look into replicating these incredible works of magic. However, all of their efforts fail. The Wordsmith's unique magic is simply too versatile, too reality-defying. They cannot rip him off and make their own versions, not even grossly inferior ones.

Perhaps, if Ose were still alive, she might be capable of replicating this feat, given her unique understanding of human technology and demonic magic. Sadly, with her gone, the rest of the demons are woefully ignorant.

At the same time, the lower-class demons also realize something isn't quite right with humanity's arrangements, and that they are clearly benefitting much more from the Merit Token system. Sadly, most low-ranking demons are uneducated simpletons who know nothing of economic theory or other systems of that sort. They merely shrug their shoulders and continue with their lives, blissfully unaware of how the disparity between humanity and demonkind's strength lessens by the day.

Just over three weeks after signing the pact with demonkind, one of humanity's allied demons evolves to the rank of Emperor!

Through her diligent efforts, Kiari becomes the Emperor of Pestilence, a monstrous genius capable of controlling insects across entire planets, whipping them into frenzies. Not only that, but her ability to empower insects and enlarge them gives them additional practical roles as beasts of burdens, hideous though they be.

Despite her title, her abilities involve anything but pestilence! Kiari summons massive numbers of insects to fertilize fresh farmland soil, endearing her to the farmers living on the Fortress of Retribution's outskirts. Her insects become even stronger and smarter after her evolution, allowing them to directly construct buildings by themselves. Thanks to her upgrade, humanity obtains a loyal and powerful Emperor-level powerhouse on par with Belial, and their construction speed bursts into the stratosphere!

Phoebe jumps up from her chair giddily when one of her subordinates hands her a report, just two days after Kiari's evolution.

"Incredible! Amazing!" Phoebe gasps. "I can't believe it! A threefold speed increase?! We constructed just 176 apartment complexes three days ago, but today we've constructed more than 600! We'll be able to bump up the timeline for the Lazarus Convention considerably! Perhaps by the time Jason returns, we'll have already brought back every last recovered Stormbringer soul!"

Phoebe stands alongside a few other people, namely Neil Adams, Blinker in her human-sized form, and Linda Hurent.

Linda smiles, infected by Phoebe's enthusiasm. "I've started handing out Power Gloves to our personnel. Early tests show a lot of promise. Not only will we be able to bring back our families sooner than expected, but we'll also be able to give them an effective means of defending themselves."

"It's too bad." Neil says, a hint of darkness in his eyes. "We can bring back many people, but Mephisto consumed a million souls to reach the rank of Emperor, and he's not alone. We've permanently lost good men and women. Children, too."

Phoebe's excitement deflates upon hearing Neil's words. "...This again? I can't stand it either, Neil, but constantly bringing it up won't change the past."

"Perhaps not." Neil says, biting his words off. "But at least I stand for principles. I'm not gleefully rewarding those who murdered our species with power-ups and strength boosts."

"We are by FAR receiving the lion's share of the benefits-" Phoebe starts to say, before Neil cuts in again.

"That doesn't matter!" Neil interrupts. "When you have two children and one misbehaves, you don't break off a fifth of a candy bar and give it to the little brat while the good sibling gets the rest. You discipline them and give the whole candy bar to the good one! You must reward the virtuous and punish the deviant. Jason had a chance to make a strong stand. He should have executed all of demonkind's leaders right there on the spot. Do you really think we need their help? We already have Belial. She could raise our own homegrown Emperors without the help of the other murderous bastards."

Blinker snorts. "Oh, so now you call her by name, Neil."

"I don't like Belial. I don't like any demons." Neil says. "But there are certainly degrees of evil. Belial is the more benign of the options. She's on our side... for now. These other Emperors are looking to pounce upon us the moment they sense a hint of weakness."

Phoebe rolls her eyes. "You're preaching to the choir, Neil. We've heard your arguments a hundred times. I even agree with most of them. But we have the Cube, and we have two Wordsmiths. Right now, the demons are not even remotely a threat, not compared to the Volgrim and Kolvaxians. You have to stop riling up past rage and focus on the future."

Neil tosses his hand up. "The hell I do! My 'past rage' comes from hardly over a month ago! You can act as if a genocide didn't just happen and isn't looming over our heads every day, but the only person you're fooling is yourself!"

With that, Neil spins on his heel and storms away, leaving the three women looking annoyed, embarrassed, or even contrite.

Phoebe, Blinker, and Linda all massage their temples in unison, unsure of what to say.

"...I don't know how to handle that man." Phoebe grunts. "How many times do I have to tell Neil? I agree with him! But we still have to be better than the demons."

"I don't know..." Linda murmurs. "Jason seems to think so. But I have to admit... I wouldn't mind putting a gauss round between the eyes of every enemy Emperor."

Blinker shrugs. "I have a lot of friends among you humans, but ultimately, I'm a fairy. The demons may have gotten a little... rapey... with us fairies in the past, but they mostly keep their paws to themselves. I just REALLY want Mephisto to end up in a blender!"

"Well, let's pray Hope can sort that out." Phoebe says, weakly smiling. "I don't think any of us wants anything less than Mephisto's bones crushed into powder. His days are numbered."

Linda's expression becomes downcast.

"One of my friends, she found out her daughter wasn't listed in the Lazarus Tower's Soul Registry. We suspect... Mephisto might have... consumed her."

Linda pauses for half a beat.

"She was only four years old."

Phoebe's expression turns ashen. So does Blinker's.

"Too young." Phoebe mutters. "Too awful."

"Phoebe," Blinker says, hesitantly. "Is there, like... is there some way we can... extract the souls from demons? Maybe they're still inside them? Maybe we can just... pull them out?"

Phoebe's heart skips a beat. After a brief pause, her spark of excitement dies.

"I don't think so. Jason might have a way. I'll ask the next time I talk to him. But... don't get your hopes up."

Blinker glances in the direction of the Warpgate.

"My 'hopes' are always up... that Mephisto will suffer terribly."

On the eastern side of the Fortress of Retribution.

Cassiel stands at the doorway leading outside the Archangel's Church. In her hands, she clutches a simple necklace, one with a cross-shaped locket attached to its center.

This locket, created for Cassiel and a group of other angels during the Energy Wars, is a special camouflaging artifact capable of hiding her true appearance. Known as the Heaven's Shroud, there once existed around five hundred of them, casually created en-masse by the Archangel of Divination. However, with Earth's destruction having happened long ago, perhaps only the one in Cassiel's hand remains.

She flips the locket around, noting the name inscribed on its backside.

Margaret.

This is not Cassiel's locket, but one that belonged to one of her sisters, someone who died long ago. As for where Cassiel's specific locket has gone, not even she knows. But it does not matter, since they all have the same effect.

While the Lazarite hesitates at the door, a figure approaches her from behind. Soleil, Cassiel's dedicated protector, walks up to her side and stands idly, glancing at the locket in Cassiel's hand.

"Are you going to use it, Cass?" Soleil asks.

Unlike Arthur, Soleil is a much friendlier and more talkative construct. She has a higher degree of intelligence, and is considered by Jason to be as much a protector of the last living angel as she is a therapist, someone capable of helping Cassiel break free of her mental shackles.

Cassiel's lower lip trembles.

"I... I don't... know..."

While Cassiel might not talk to most people, Soleil is the exception. Having had Soleil at her side since her rescue, Cassiel has grown comfortable enough to whisper words infrequently to her angel-like friend. She recognizes that Soleil is not a genuine angel, but even so, her kind and calm disposition allows Cassiel to feel noticeably more at ease than even around the other Archangels.

After all, Michael is a cold and callous man, while Raphael is a bit too lofty. Gabriel is pleasant enough, but he's also huge and intimidating, while Uriel's bloodthirsty aura always makes Cassiel feel anxious.

Only Soleil can bridge the gap in her heart.

Cassiel holds the Heaven's Shroud loosely, deeply desiring to put it on. She continually lifts it toward her neck, but pauses and lowers it once again, frozen as much by her fear as her indecision.

Finally, Cassiel turns away from the door. Tears threaten to well up in her eyes, as she chokes on her breath.

"I'm... I'm not... I can't do it..."

"You can!" Soleil chirps, gently resting her hand on Cassiel's shoulder. "You don't have to rush, though. You're stronger than you think. That's what Raphael says!"

The Archangels also know that Soleil is not a genuine angel. Even so, Soleil is such a bright spirit that they can't help but find her intriguing. With only one angel truly still among the living, and all the Archangels nothing more than remnant souls inside of constructed or stolen bodies, they quietly take time to pass their knowledge and heritages on to Soleil.

As a Black Hole Construct, Soleil's body is insanely powerful. With physical strength capable of crushing any Baron, and even some Demon Emperors, she is no pushover by any means. Each day, she practices with her holy magic, becoming more adept in its use. Even Uriel marvels at her versatility.

Additionally, Soleil's thinking speed and brain capacity are thousands of times greater than any human. She absorbs knowledge like a sponge, instantly memorizing any information Raphael feeds her. He tells her about the past of his people, the details of the Ancient Era, and even pertinent information regarding the Primordial Era and the Dragon and Titan Wars.

However, all of this knowledge is superfluous. Nothing Soleil learns can compare to her primary objective of rehabilitating and protecting Cassiel. All other interests come second.

Cassiel walks away from the church's doors. The further she draws away, the better her expression becomes. The thought of walking out in the open terrifies her to the point of almost suffering a panic attack.

She takes a seat in one of the church's pews. While the church might not allow any human guests, it's still fairly traditional-looking on the bottom floor, where Cassiel lives. Should she ever allow the common folk inside, humanity will be able to pour out their hearts to the angels, seeking their favor and guidance.

For now, though, there are merely three sets of ten pews, and she takes a seat in the one closest to the door.

Cassiel hangs her head gloomily. The church's all-but-silent interior feels ominous to her on this particular day. The oppressive quiet looms over her head, like a specter in the darkness.

"Soleil..." Cassiel whispers. "Play a song."

Soleil obediently nods. She walks over to the church's pipe organ, sits down, and begins running her fingers across the keys with perfect, robotic precision.

Within moments, a beautiful melody begins to fill the air, calming Cassiel's heart. She closes her eyes and sways back and forth to the music, as if hypnotized by Soleil's melody.

Minutes pass. An hour. Cassiel opens her eyes at one point, stands up, and walks over to Soleil, sitting on the bench beside her.

Immediately, Soleil stops playing and slides over, leaving room for the Lazarite. She retracts her hands, allowing Cassiel to take over.

It's quiet times like these when Cassiel feels a rare moment of peace in her heart. For countless millennia, she has suffered torment unlike anything a single other living entity can imagine.

Hounded, assaulted, stabbed, cut, and pierced a seemingly infinite number of times, she has lost count of the instances in recent memory where agonizing flashbacks tore across her thoughts, giving her unbearable day-terrors.

Even if Gressil were here, he might not be able to torture Cassiel as effectively as her own mind does...

In this rare moment of solace, Cassiel hums along to the song her fingers play, feeling a peace settle within her bones.

She continues for a while, but ultimately, the moment passes. She stops playing, and stares at the organ despondently, all those dark emotions welling up again.

Soleil glances at her.

"They will be happy to see you, you know." Soleil says. "Put on that locket, and you'll blend into the crowd."

Cassiel glances down at her lap, where she previously set the Heaven's Shroud. She picks it up and stares at the name on the back, her emotions darkening even further.

"Margaret... I couldn't protect her."

"I couldn't protect... any of them."

"I'm useless."

Soleil listens quietly. Cassiel criticizes herself harshly. Every minor fault in her life, every moment of weakness becomes amplified a hundredfold, turning her from a mildly flawed individual into a hopelessly useless imbecile who never accomplished anything.

"Raphael has told me about your accomplishments." Soleil says, softly. "You killed two Demon Emperors. No other Lazarite ever came close to your feats. Even so, you weren't invincible, so you can't blame yourself for what happened."

"Maybe not." Cassiel whispers. "But I do."

Soleil reaches her arm across Cassiel's back. She hugs her softly, providing physical comfort.

Cassiel's eyes drift back to the church doorway. She stares at the doors, yearning to step outside with all of her being.

"You fear other people." Soleil says. "You're afraid they'll hurt you. But, you also know they won't."

"It's irrational..." Cassiel says. "The humans are good people."

"You're a human too." Soleil points out. "You're just in an angel body. But even so, humans are your people."

"I know." Cassiel says. "I know..."

Soleil smiles. She reaches out and takes the locket from Cassiel's hand, who allows her to do so without any resistance.

"Why don't we take this one step at a time?" Soleil chirps. "Let's start by simply putting the locket on."

Cassiel tenses up, but after a moment, she nods.

"Oh... okay..."

Soleil stands up and steps behind Cassiel. She traces the Lazarite's fair, beautiful white neck, then pulls aside her long white hair. She carefully wraps the necklace's chain around and behind her head, clicking its rear together with ease.

Nothing happens, and Cassiel merely touches the cross affixed over her chest.

"I... still have to activate it..." Cassiel whispers.

"Mhm. It's very pretty on you!" Soleil says.

Cassiel's expression turns wan at the mention of her beauty.

Anytime someone mentions the Lazarite's physical appearance, Gressil's voice rings in her head. She hears his words, repeated countless times over the millennia.

You're beautiful. You're a slut. Your body is too perfect...

His grating voice echoes in the room, making her shiver. Indeed, she is beautiful, but the thought of looking good to anyone now triggers a flight response, making her want to run and hide in a dark corner.

Sensing the change in Cassiel's body language, Soleil takes a step back.

"Sorry, Cass. I shouldn't have said-"

"It's not your fault." Cassiel says, lowering her head. "It's... it's his. It's his."

Cassiel traces the locket with her fingers. For several minutes, she gazes at the mirror behind the panel, where only her head and shoulders appear visible. The silver-colored cross appears quite shiny against her pale skin, and somehow, her angelic aura amplifies its splendor, making it appear an object untainted by the filth of the world.

The Last Lazarite bites her lip. She closes her eyes, then presses her entire hand against the front of the locket.

A feeling of weakness momentarily seizes her body, almost making her fall backward off the organ bench, but Soleil catches her. The Heaven's Shroud pulls from her holy energy to forcibly alter her appearance, making her wings completely transparent, hiding the halo above her head, and completely suppressing the field of holy energy surrounding her body.

After a few moments, Cassiel's weakness disappears. The Heaven's Shroud finishes its work, and she opens her eyes.

Slowly, the Lazarite stands up, gazing at herself in the mirror. Where before, a gorgeous white-haired goddess stood, now, a simple and homely woman with brown hair remains. Remembering those long, distant, ancient memories of her childhood, Cassiel struggles to remember her appearance as a young girl. However, without a doubt, if she had never died, she would likely have appeared like this when she reached her twenties or thirties.

Her wings remain attached to her back, allowing her to fly, and if someone were to try and touch them, they'd certainly be able to do so, but now they appear completely invisible, to the point no matter how hard someone tries to squint, they could not perceive them.

Of course, if Cassiel wishes, she can activate the Heaven's Shroud a second time, elevating its abilities to the next level. At that point, her wings would recede into her body, and her appearance would become even more ordinary, preventing anyone from telling she is a Lazarite even if they tried to feel for her wings.

But she doesn't do that, at least not for the moment. She merely gazes into the mirror, pressing her fingers against her face. She touches her face in the mirror, as if unsure if the person she's looking at is really her, or perhaps someone else.

At the same time, Soleil smiles.

"I like this version of you, too. Every flavor of Cass is my favorite!"

Soleil closes her eyes. With a brief bit of concentration, her appearance shifts. She adopts the appearance of a completely average-looking black-haired human woman, a transformation Jason included in her design, should she need to travel incognito. Many people already know of her angelic appearance, but only the Wordsmith himself and Cassiel know what Soleil looks like in her human form.

Soleil beams a radiant smile at Cassiel's reflection in the mirror.

"See? Isn't this fun? If we go outside, nobody will be able to tell who we are! Don't you want to go out and see all the people? It's so boring in here, where you're all cooped up..."

Cassiel's eyes inadvertently turn to the church doors.

"I... I do want..."

Soleil takes Cassiel's hand in hers. She slowly pulls the Lazarite toward the doors, while keeping an eye on her face.

"There's nothing to fear, Cass. I'm with you. You're safe with me, no matter what!"

Cassiel nods. As the doors loom closer, her heart begins to pound like a frightened rabbit stomping the dirt.

But even so, it doesn't beat quite as hard as it did just a while earlier.

Soleil reaches out her free hand and places it on the door.

"If you can't do it, should I?"

A minute passes, while Cassiel stands frozen on the spot.

Ultimately, she shakes her head.

"No. I... I have to be strong."

She no longer hesitates.

The brown-haired woman steps forward and pushes the doors open, flinging them outward, so that she can take her first real steps to recovery.

Her story... has finally begun.

Part 385: Approaching Volgarius

Jason Hiro stands on the bridge of Kordonis's vessel, the Hatoraxia, watching as a timer counts down the last five minutes until arriving inside the Volgrim's home system.

He turns to the side, where he observes Kordonis sitting in the captain's chair, fiddling with a screen Jason can't quite make out.

"This is the VLL Hatoraxia." Kordonis says, speaking to a small holographic face that appears in front of him, a face belonging to another Technopath officer in the Volgarius system. "I am transporting Class 1 guests on a diplomatic voyage to Volgarius."

"Identity confirmed, Sangin Kordonis of Clan Oblong." The other Technopath states. "You have been cleared for arrival and landing. Follow the transmitted flight coordinates to your designated arrival zone."

"Noted." Kordonis replies, before concluding the transmission with a few perfunctory words.

As Kordonis turns his attention back to his ship, Jason speaks up. "How are you able to do that? Communicate with other Volgrim while mid-warp, I mean."

Kordonis stands up from his chair and casually approaches Jason.

"Have you not heard of a Quantum Entanglement Node?"

Jason shakes his head. "I can communicate with my people on Tarus II, even across infinite distances. But my means are magical, while yours appear... more mundane."

"Mundane." Kordonis repeats, a hint of derision in his voice. "Quantum Entanglement Nodes are not even considered a Class 1 Technology. They are quite benign, by Volgrim standards. By tuning into a specific spatial frequency, one can communicate with any other being aligned to that frequency, so long as one resides within the same material dimension."

"Does that mean you would not be able to communicate with a fellow Volgrim if they were inside the Labyrinth?" Jason asks.

"Correct." Kordonis says. "But of course, there are many ways around this limitation. For example, a directly linked communication node that transfers information from one material dimension to another could serve as a relay. A 'hardwired' relay would also suffice. In practice, the limitation of same-dimension communication never stops our species from reaching one another."

Jason nods thoughtfully. Fiona communicates with him in his Mind Realm, and he gives voice to her observations.

"You mentioned using 'specific spatial frequencies' for these QETs. How many frequencies are available? Surely, there can't be too many of them."

"Fewer than twenty." Kordonis replies. "Enough for a broad range of civilian and military frequencies. Are you thinking of spying on our communications?"

"Could you stop me if I wanted to do so?" Jason retorts.

The Hatoraxia's captain laughs softly. "I could not. But even if I could not, do not be so sure the same is true of the Second Founder. You may even meet her, on this very day."

The Wordsmith bares a toothy smile. "I've heard so much about Founder Dosena. It would be a shame if I didn't."

The Hatoraxia continues for a minute or two longer before abruptly decelerating. Nobody in the ship feels anything, and the visible space outside the ship doesn't change much, but one of the dots in the sky appears just a tiny bit brighter than it did during their travel. Additionally, one of the distant stars burns much hotter and draws Jason's attention.

Kordonis sits in his captain chair once again.

"Welcome to the Volgarius Star System, Wordsmith. My proud homeworld is just one of fourteen planets and more than a hundred moons in this system. Here, almost every single planet is inhabited by my people. Of course, only five planets have been fully Volformed to be as comfortable as possible, but the rest are still habitable by hardy Psions and other species that adapt their bodies in specific ways."

Kordonis continues. "We will have to approach the inner system at sub-light speeds, due to inner traffic restrictions. It won't be obvious from here, but the inner system has more than ten million craft in the vicinity of any planet at any given moment. For the homeworld, that number likely exceed two hundred and fifty million."

Jason blinks multiple times as these staggering numbers metaphorically slap him in the face.

A quarter of a billion craft orbit Volgarius?! How is that even possible? These ships can't possibly be much smaller than the Hatoraxia, and I'll bet a large number of them are significantly bigger!

The Hatoraxia flies forward at 99% the speed of light, while a speck in the sky grows continually larger and brighter as they approach.

"Is that Volgarius?" Jason asks.

Kordonis glances at the several hundred Volgrim personnel on the Hatoraxia's Bridge, none of whom involve themselves in his conversation with the Wordsmith. As for Miikil, she's nowhere to be seen, as she is currently preparing for their arrival on Volgarius.

"No. This is the outermost planet of our great home system." Kordonis explains. "Of the fourteen planets in the Volgarius system, I have been instructed to introduce you to over half of them."

He waves his hand, and a holographic image of the upcoming planet appears before them.

"This is Volforus 03, the furthest of the three outer ice-type exoplanets." Kordonis explains. "It is a world where my people mine exotic materials and maintain a defensive position for protecting part of our system's perimeter. The planet is colder than you might expect, at below -65C at any given moment. However, there are several habitats built beneath its permafrost, where pockets of a few million researchers and miners can live."

"You mentioned your home system had over a hundred moons." Jason points out. "How many does Volforus 03 have?"

"Seven." Kordonis says. "As for the planet's size… it is roughly a quarter the diameter of your homeworld, Earth."

"Interesting." Jason remarks, without actually displaying much interest. "Good to know, I suppose."

He watches as the planet approaches, but before long, the Hatoraxia races past, continuing its journey toward the inner system.

Along the way, the Hatoraxia passes another two ice-type planets, both of them being a little larger and a bit more populated than Volforus 03. These planets, Volforus 01 and 02, are roughly the same as the outermost world, albeit with significantly more moons.

"I'm surprised." Jason says at one point. "Your star system holds far more planets and moons than Earth's did. Why is that?"

Kordonis shakes his head. "Volgarius might be our modern homeworld, but it is not our progenitor planet. That honor belongs to Grimvolas, the home of the Dolgrimites. However, it is now little more than a barren wasteland. It exists in a system with only four other planets and twelve moons. Our people left it after the conclusion of the Seven Great Wars, when we needed to place the future of our species within a more habitable system. The Volgarius system, just 5,000 Lightcycles distant, proved the perfect mixture of planets, moons, and star classification."

"Star classification?" Jason repeats. "And by that, you mean…"

"You humans once referred to it as a 'Goldilocks Zone,' the distance where a planet is most optimally situated for rearing life. The Volgarius system has three planets within this theoretical zone, and an additional two which are not too distant from it to be Volformable. In total, a third of the Volgarius system's planets are comfortably livable for all species. The other nine, less so."

Before long, the Hatoraxia draws near to a supermassive gas giant, one colored blood red, with slowly swirling hurricanes of cream-colored clouds peppering its surface.

"Our people colloquially refer to this planet as the Crimson Storm. Officially, it is known as Holifan. Of the hundred moons in our home system, more than fifty of them orbit Holifan."

"Does anyone live on Holifan?" Jason asks.

"No. Only the hardiest Psions capable of resisting the gravity, corrosive miasma, and white phosphorous in its atmosphere can travel to its deepest depths in search of valuable exotics. We have an entire fleet of drones capable of transferring lighter compounds from its upper atmosphere, too, but generally, Holifan is frequented by travelers due to its numerous moons. Most of them are relatively habitable by lower-class Volgrim."

The Hatoraxia continues its flight deeper into the core of the Volgarius system. By the time it reaches the first major habitable planet, Kordonis's expression becomes noticeably more muted.

"We've reaches the first of five Paradise-class planets. The world we're approaching now is known as Volmar. It is two times bigger than Volgarius, and holds three times the population. Even so, most of the Volgrim who live there are considered 'peasants.' Young trainees, our species equivalent of children, and other such immature Volgrim stay on Volmar until they reach an appropriate age where they can be sent to a higher-level world to train and improve their abilities."

"Volmar sounds like a huge nursery, or an academy." Jason observes.

"Those are adequate analogies." Kordonis replies. "Currently, we have detected 171,445,105 vessels in Volmar's orbit. We will have to slow our speed down to Warp 0.3. This will increase the time needed to reach Volgarius, but will also ensure we do not collide with the countless ships in the planet's inner and outer gravity well. Even 500,000 kilometers away, there are a shocking number of ships in the local void."

Jason looks around through the Hatoraxia's external monitors, but he doesn't see any ships, and can only barely make out the slowly approaching speck of light known as Volmar. Even so, he knows the ships are out there; his feeble human eyes simply can't see them amidst the vast and expansive star-filled sky.

"Regrettably," Kordonis continues, "we will not be able to pass by the second of the five Paradise-class planets in this system. The world of Sorvolvo is presently located on the opposite side of Volgarius's star. After we pass Volmar, we will next encounter Tarvol, the third Paradise-class planet. It is actually twenty percent smaller than Volgarius, but is also considered an exclusive vacation destination for Volgrim who have accrued notable merits."

Jason raises an eyebrow. "Vacations? I thought your species didn't engage in such 'useless' pursuits?"

"The Volgrim are not simple minded, like the average mud-dweller." Kordonis states, with a hint of racial pride. "But Tarvol's concept of 'vacation' is quite different from the one you might apply. Psions go there to hunt its dangerous and exotic wildlife. Technopaths go there to admire the rare First Class technology applied to its habitations. Changelings go there to practice their populace blending capabilities, as it also houses many non-native species imported to diversify its biology."

"I should have known!" Jason exclaims with a wry laugh. "For you, a vacation is just an excuse to pursue personal projects. You Volgrim are all work and no play."

"I would not go that far." Kordonis retorts. "To you, 'fun' is an idle pursuit that accomplishes nothing. You pursue it so that your primitive brain can fire bursts of dopamine into your neural receptors. But for the Volgrim, achieving greater feats for the Founders, or for our own glory, that is a form of 'fun' you cannot fathom. Our 'fun' advances our sense of purpose."

"Humans can do that too." Jason points out. "My wife loves inventing new technology to help other humans. She's not so different from your people, in that regard."

"There are always a few enlightened individuals, even among the lower forms of life." Kordonis replies, while dismissively waving his limb. "But the majority of mud-dwellers cannot imagine a universe where they contribute to a collectively greater whole."

Jason shrugs. "You're not wrong, but you're not right, either. Humans aren't a monolith. There are more 'enlightened mud-dwellers' among us than you can imagine."

"And neither are the Volgrim a monolith." Kordonis equally retorts. "There are plenty of strange, useless, and stupid oddballs who flounder about, wasting their lives. They would make for excellent mud-dwellers."

"It never fails to amaze me how you can utter such offensive words without batting an eye." Jason snorts.

The Hatoraxia continues slowly past Volmar. It takes multiple hours to breach its outer gravity well and ultimately return to normal space. Half a day later, the Hatoraxia passes the world of Tarvol, the final planet before they can ultimately reach Volgarius.

Surprisingly, they don't detour around the so-called vacation destination, but instead fly directly toward it.

Jason glances at Kordonis. "And we're going here... why?"

"A few of my crew have earned the right to two cycles of rest." Kordonis explains. "They have decided to vacation on Tarvol for 0.5 cycles instead, since it is considered a luxury-class vacation experience."

"Uh... by 'cycle' do you mean a day-cycle, or a year-cycle?" Jason asks.

"An orbital cycle." Kordonis clarifies. "My crew will stay on Tarvol for half of one human-year."

"Damn..." Jason mutters. "Imagine having half a year of paid vacation time in paradise. Immortal alien empires sure have their perks."

He remains silent as the Hatoraxia approaches a supermassive transitory ship, where it docks and allows just over fifty crewman to depart. They board the transitionary living ship along with a hundred thousand other Volgrim, where they will await a shuttle that can take them down to the planet below.

After completing the docking and boarding process, the Hatoraxia breaks off and resumes course toward Volgarius.

"Things are about to become extremely crowded." Kordonis says. "I've just received word. There are presently two hundred and seventy-one million ships in Volgarius's vicinity. We will have to approach at significantly slower speeds than expected. We will drop to Warp 0.1, a tenth the speed of light. Only in this way can we move through the mess of exosteel without crashing and killing everyone aboard the Hatoraxia."

Jason nods. "How much longer until we reach Volgarius?"

"Two rotational cycles." Kordonis says. "You can return to your quarters. I will inform you when we are within one standard time unit of the homeworld."

"Sounds good." Jason says. "Let me know how it goes."

The Wordsmith doesn't waste his breath. Having been on the Hatoraxia's Bridge for nineteen hours straight, even he is starting to feel a bit worn-out from the endless waiting.

After the Wordsmith leaves, Kordonis activates a beacon, alerting Unarin to their imminent arrival.

Soon, the heads of humanity and Volgrimkind will meet in person for the first time ever...

In another section of the Hatoraxia, an invisible Wordsmith lurks out of sight and mind.

Hope Hiro, having made himself a comfortable lodging in the walls, monitors the entirety of the ship with his Wordsmithing. He easily uncovers the distance to Volgarius, teleports out of his hidey-hole, and arrives in an empty Hatoraxian corridor.

I can't stay here. He thinks. Who knows what those high-level Psions will be able to detect if they sweep the Hatoraxia with their minds. I'd better teleport to a safe spot on Volgarius ahead of schedule.

"Atlas." Hope says, casting his senses to the galaxy beyond the Hatoraxia's hull plating.

Immediately, a flood of information streams into Hope's mind. A burst of faint, divine energy spreads from his mind outward in a bubble and fires toward the distant reaches of the Volgarius star system. Hope identifies the countless masses of ships floating in the void, both near and far, as well as all the system's planets. It doesn't take much effort for him to find Volgarius.

However, what he finds makes him frown deeply.

Damn. There are trillions of Volgrim living on every spare patch of ground. I'll need to teleport somewhere the Psions can't detect me, and then work on my disguise. I need to figure out the best methods of fooling the Psions... because if they find out there's an undercover Wordsmith roaming about, they will probably become a tiny bit annoyed.

Hope sweeps his senses across Volgarius more than ten times. Alarmingly, he finds that each time he does this, a strange, distant power seems to grow more and more aware of his presence. Though it fails to lock onto him, the sheer cosmic depth of this strength makes his stomach sink into his shoes.

What the fuck? Is that... the Second Founder?!

Hope quickly stops his magical scans. Sweat pools on his back, making him feel a little lightheaded.

That sense of depth... not even a dragon or the Cherubiim should feel so powerful! If that's what I'm going up against, how can I possibly hide?

Hope's expression becomes dismal. If he wishes to uncover the hiding locations of Excalibur and the Dominion Rod, he must be able to travel around Volgarius without drawing any suspicions. But now that he more directly senses the Second Founder's strength, he feels as if he is about to go skydiving straight into a black hole.

Still, with the Hatoraxia drawing closer to Volgarius by the minute, Hope doesn't have much time to rethink his plans. He aims his mind at a specific spot on the planet, a place right in the middle of some ordinary Technopaths and Changelings, where he picks out one Changeling's biological signature at random.

"Scan. Convert. Assimilate. Transform."

Hope copies that Changeling's genetic uniqueness into himself. He mimics and transforms into it perfectly, becoming an identical clone.

"Memory. Acknowledge. Link."

To protect himself in the event of a Psionic mind-scan, where they either will be able to read his very-human and very-Wordsmith thoughts, or they will be arbitrarily blocked and thus realize Hope is no ordinary Changeling, he sneakily cheats by copying that Changeling's memories, then creating a 'false mind' directly linked to the same Changeling inside his own head.

Now, if a Psion scans my brain, they should read the thoughts and identity of that random Changeling, thus hiding who I am. I can't afford to be discovered, lest they bring out the big guns against me.

With that thought out of the way, Hope spends an hour or two combing over the Changeling's memories to better acclimate himself to how he should act.

My cover identity will be... Second-Class Initiate Observer, Xainir. I'll be a low-level-nobody who easily blends into a crowd. No notable accomplishments, and no notable demerits, either. There's no reason anyone should give half a shit about my existence.

After gathering a bit more perfunctory information regarding his unwitting quarry, Hope opens his mouth and utters a word that will forever change the course of his life.

"Teleport."

He vanishes from the spot, instantly traveling the remaining distance to Volgarius.

From this moment forward, his effort to infiltrate the Volgrim will truly begin.

But only time will tell if his efforts can bear fruit.

Only time will tell if he can obtain the power he needs to take control of humanity...

Part 386: Arrival on Volgarius

The Volgarius system is far, far larger than Jason Hiro's former home, the Sol System. It has significantly more rocky worlds within its confines, though it only possesses a single gas giant. The distances between these planets are also much greater, with the furthest planet in the system ten times more distant from the system's center than the Sol system's Pluto.

Even so, it has fewer moons, mostly as a result of only possessing a single gas giant. Where the Sol system formed two massive gas giants that sucked up the majority of the matter which wasn't consumed by its star, the Volgarius system developed in a much more balanced manner, giving it far superior possibilities for its future biodiversity.

During the two days Jason Hiro spends in his quarters waiting for the Hatoraxia to reach Volgarius, he receives some helpful but vague schematics of the system, which he compares to his Wordsmithed star charts. Like Hope, he too uses the Word of Power, Atlas, to scan the system. He learns all sorts of juicy details which he and Fiona discuss in his Mind Realm, along with Raphael and the rest.

"Fascinating." Fiona says, her and Jason exchanging words that only they can hear. Even the Hatoraxia's resident Psion, Miikil, couldn't listen in on their conversation if she wished. "To think such a star system could evolve naturally over the eons. It actually has binary stars!"

"The heat they output causes three of the inner planets to be far too hot for proper terraforming." Jason observes. "Err, 'Volforming' is what they call it. Anyway, they do have residences built deep under the crust, where the heat doesn't reach. Though, it makes more sense to call them mining colonies."

"The third planet from the system center isn't as hot as the first two. It houses a fairly sizable population. I wonder how safe each of the Volgarius system's planets would be if the Kolvaxians were to show up." Jason ponders.

While he and his mind-wife converse, Raphael stands behind Fiona, gazing at the dizzying arrays of holographic star charts, schematics, and readouts she and Jason have collected. However, the Archangel of Wisdom does not look at these charts, but well past them, with hollowed-out eyes and a distant look on his face.

Jason eventually notices Raphael's contemplative expression.

"Are you feeling alright, Raphael?" Jason asks.

The old angel blinks wearily. He shakes his head and frowns.

"Mmm. I simply... verily, I must wonder about a great many things." Raphael says, cryptically. "Jason. Dost thou remembereth what I told thee, once?"

"Specifically?" Jason prompts.

"'Twas in regards to life on Earth." Raphael says. "I told thee that when the angels went searching for a planet to inhabit, we discovered that Earth had life residing upon its surface already. 'Tis only now, all these years later, that a question begins to form in this old man's mind."

Jason falls silent for a moment.

"...Is it in regards to why life evolved on Volgarius, as well? Or rather, Grimvolas, their old homeworld?"

"Correct." Raphael nods. "Why dost it be that, in addition to Earth, the Volgrim evolved upon a distant world? Dost thou not find it strange? Additionally, by the time we angels settled upon Earth, the Volgrim had already begun to evolve on their own world. Perhaps they may have already become a spacefaring species."

"Life evolves at different speeds." Fiona says. "I don't see what the problem is."

"'Tis not the evolutionary speed of life which causes me concern." Raphael clarifies. "Please remember. Thou cannot fathom the eons angel kind spent alone in the cosmos, or the length of our wars against the Dragons and Titans. To use a term like 'eons' or millenia of millenia' would not do such a length of time justice. The Dragon Wars alone, we fought for at least four hundred million of thy human years."

Jason raises an eyebrow. "I don't really see the point..."

"We did not war continuously." Raphael says. "There were often tens of thousands of years when nobody fought anybody else. In those idle times, we angels would often spread our wings and casually explore our galaxy. If I told thee that I had visited every Milky Way star system multiple times in my life, woulds't thou believeth me?"

"If you say you did, then I have to assume you did." Jason answers. "But... so what? Did you never encounter any planets with life during those times?"

"Indeed, we did not." Raphael answers. "Yet when the Titan Wars ended and we needed a world we could settle on to create the imps, a species which would permanently sustain our depleted spiritual stores, we happened to stumble upon Earth, a planet I had visited at least a handful of times. Where had it evolved life so quickly, I must ask? And how did we miss the world of Grimvolas, too?"

"Maybe you didn't check the planets all too thoroughly." Jason suggests. "Can you really remember, I dunno, a hundred million or a hundred billion individual worlds? Especially at your age?"

"Thou hath peered into my memories through Solomon's Crown." Raphael says. "Thou knoweth well that my mind doth not decay as a feeble humans' woulds't. I remember this star system well, though it hath been the better part of an eon since my last visit. While the number of planets hath shrunk slightly, t'was not this capable of holding life back in those days."

"That's because the Volgrim 'Volformed' it." Fiona helpfully points out. "Raphael, life evolves in mysterious ways. I don't know why you're acting so odd about this. If life could evolve on Earth once, then evolving on Grimvolas a second time certainly isn't out of the question."

The Archangel clicks his tongue. "Tsk. 'Tis only the intuition of an old fossil. Perhaps I am overthinking the matter."

"Yeah..." Jason says slowly, suddenly not so sure of his own position. "That might be it."

Jason continues examining the star charts with his mind-wife. He and Fiona confirm that the system developed in a relatively centralized manner, with the worlds in the Goldilocks zone typically possessing the most moons, while the ones closest to and furthest from the binary stars ended up with the fewest. The biggest exception is the eleventh planet, Holifan, the only gas giant in the system, which holds half of the system's moons in its orbit.

"Looks like we skipped right past the ninth and tenth planets during our flight." Jason murmurs. "Larvolis and Sherrol, the first of which is a rocky mining world, and the second a water-covered planet. Larvolis isn't Volformable, but it does have artificial habitations built on its surfaces, where the mining population lives. Seems it's mostly a planet where spaceships are built for the rest of the system, and the lower gravity helps with lifting them into orbit."

"As for Sherrol," Jason continues, "it's an aquatic planet with a watery surface covered in a thick sheet of ice. But beneath the ice sheet, the Volgrim constructed thousands of underwater habitats."

"This system really does have a bit of everything." Fiona comments. "The first three inner planets are all molten hellholes, but apparently they also house some exotic resources, so they have mining colonies. Every planet except the gas giant is being used for some grand purpose by the Volgrim."

Jason nods slowly. "Waste not, want not. The Volgrim seem to live by a creed of exploiting every resource as efficiently and wastelessly as possible. Not a lot of room for fun and leisure in their culture, though."

"Perhaps that's the case now." Fiona says. "But we don't know if that's always been true. Don't forget they're fighting an alien bio-plague that turns the infected into mindless zombies. It's hard to focus on leisure when your existence is under constant threat."

"Yeah... everyone has to do their part." Jason says, quietly. "I wonder what sort of person Unarin is. To be under all this stress, he must have incredible mental fortitude. Leading a galactic nation of septillions can't be anything but soul-crushing."

"Imagine doing it for longer than all of human existence." Fiona says dryly. "Either he's picked up a few tricks over the years, or he is the ultimate pencil-pusher with no sense of joy. His happiness probably got beaten out of him during the Seven Great Wars."

"You never know. The guy might actually be quite the interesting fellow." Jason chuckles. "But make sure you keep sharp. It's entirely possible I won't know if Dosena intrudes upon my thoughts. Hell, she could be doing so right now and I might not know."

Fiona shudders. "That's a frightening possibility."

The Hatoraxia finally draws within range of Volgarius. After two days of flight at only a tenth the speed of light, they have to slow down even more and enter a long queue of ships being inspected not only for paraphernalia and other such things, but any traces of contamination by the Plague. The Technopath inspectors take their duties extremely seriously and perform several invasive scans of Jason and the other humans, making their skin crawl from the powerful beams irradiating their entire body.

After the inspectors leave, Samuel shoots a glance at Jason. "You sure those scanners were safe? Pretty sure they just dosed me with fifty thousand years worth of radiation."

"They're... probably fine." Jason says, before changing the subject. "Did you get to try out the Power Glove yet?"

Samuel rolls his eyes. "I messed around with the minotaur and orc settings. Pretty nice. I can beat some ass with them. The transformation was a bit painful, though."

"That's because your compatibility is lower with those species." Jason says, exposing a toothy grin. "But the fairy setting..."

"Man, fuck off with that bullshit!" Samuel snaps. "I ain't playing with no goddamned fairy settings. End of discussion!"

"Sigh. Suit yourself." Jason says, shrugging. "Now, keep sharp. We'll be breaching the upper atmosphere in ten minutes."

Jason leaves the Leisure Hall and walks down the Hatoraxia's corridors toward the Bridge. As he walks, he munches on a sandwich whipped up for him by his chef, Yamir. Some sort of cheese and beef mix along with gravy coats the inside of the bread, melting in his mouth while he chews.

"Damn. That son of a bull really knows how to cook." Jason mutters to himself.

When Jason arrives on the Bridge, his eyes stray toward the primary viewport, where the surface of Volgarius looms before him. Against the backdrop of the planet, countless miniature specks move about, each one of them an individual ship floating against the backdrop of space.

However, what truly makes Jason pause and stare is the planet itself. Neither blue, nor green, the entire planet's surface appears to be a dull, gray mess. To the Wordsmith, it looks more like a bowl of calcified gravy, completely uninteresting to gaze upon.

Jason turns to look at Kordonis, who sits in his captain's chair. Invocator Miikil stands beside him, her attention placed half on the Volgrim homeworld and half on the Wordsmith.

"I don't know what I expected." Jason says. "But I definitely didn't expect your capital world to be so butt-ugly."

Kordonis doesn't offer a witty retort. Instead, he merely sighs. "Volgarius is a completely industrialized world, and the central nexus of our galactic empire. There are more Volgrim living there than you can imagine. I don't think anyone knows its exact population on any given day, but the number is well within the trillions. All those Volgrim need places to stay. As such, space is at a premium. Between the underground cities, the aboveground gigascrapers, and the levitating spires, you can't find vegetation even if you scour the planet looking for it."

"How do you maintain air quality without vegetation?" Jason asks.

"I couldn't tell you the exact mechanisms even if I wanted." Kordonis answers. "But it involves nanotechnology on a global scale. There are nanites everywhere that convert the air into something breathable."

"Nanites." Jason repeats. "Seems legit."

He falls silent and begins to watch intently as the Hatoraxia falls toward the planet at a comfortable speed. The ship's antigrav modules activate, allowing it to smoothly glide downward, where it ultimately breaks through the grey clouds to reveal the world below.

Jason's eyes widen as he finds himself gazing upon the most tightly-packed urban landscape he has ever seen. Not only do divisions between the buildings barely exist, but there are hardly any streets at the ground level to speak of. Instead, travel tubes stack on top of one another, ferrying millions of passengers along in any given direction, from one place to another.

As the Hatoraxia transitions from space to planet, two escort shuttles approach and fly on either side, each of them resembling deadly silver-colored weapons of war, like a pair of javelins with wings jutting out of their sides.

"Captain Kordonis. Follow us to the Founder's Hand." Says a voice transmitted to the Hatoraxia's Bridge.

"Initiating autopilot." Says the ship's Technopath pilot.

Kordonis issues orders every now and then, but otherwise, the trip is uneventful. Jason stares out the window at the hideously grey planet outside, where every structure is as boring and utilitarian as possible. Not one part of the massive and unending cityscape is pleasant to look at. If Jason were to try and navigate on his own, he'd become hopelessly lost within an hour, at best.

"Boy, I hope the rest of your planets aren't this bland." Jason mutters dryly.

"No. Volgarius is a special case..." Kordonis mutters. "Perhaps if you can truly help us win the war, we'll be able to move our displaced people back to their homeworlds in the galactic exterior. Then the capital system won't be so crowded anymore."

Jason swallows any further snide comments. He remembers the fact that many of these Volgrim are refugees fleeing from a menace he has yet to encounter himself. What if it were humanity in their situation? He would certainly be a lot more understanding.

The Hatoraxia travels for more than an hour, racing across the planet's sky until eventually slowing down. A set of five giant buildings amidst a field of green appears in the distance. The way this unique set of structures stands out from their surroundings forces anyone with a functional brain to notice them, and Jason is no exception.

"Is that...?"

Kordonis nods. "The Hand of the Founders. Also known as the Five Fingers of the Founders, or the Founder's Fingers. There are many names for this location, but one thing is certain. It is heavily guarded, to the point where if you breathe even the slightest insult toward the Founders, an Eighth Level Psion may just step out of the gaps in space next to you and kill you before you know what happened. Of course as a delegate for humanity, this probably won't happen to you, but..."

Kordonis pauses to look at Jason meaningfully.

"...don't press your luck. The Founders are our people's only shining ray of light in these dark times. Many otherwise good-natured Volgrim might explode if a mud-dweller were to step out of line. They might not attack you, but your subordinates should tread carefully."

"Noted." Jason says, his expression turning grim.

Already, a faint sense of pressure has begun to push against his head. Fiona warns him of an onslaught of attempted intrusions as countless high-level Psions either gently or not-so-gently try to peer into his mind and uncover his secrets.

Luckily, Jason's magical and technological countermeasures protect his thoughts.

Or at least, so he prays.

There's still the possibility that Dosena or some other high-level Psion can crack open my mental defenses without alerting me. We had better pay close attention, Jason transmits to Fiona.

The Hatoraxia and its escort vessels descend toward a designated landing area, one where a mere half-dozen other ships sit parked and ready to fly for various VIP purposes. Not even a quarter-mile away, the nearest of the Five Fingers, the Founder's Thumb, awaits. The granite and obsidian tower, windowless, rises like a tall, rectangular mountain impaled onto the land.

Jason and his fellow humans depart the ship. Additionally, Yamir joins them, as does Emperor Serena.

"You're coming, too?" Jason asks her.

"Naturally." Serena says quietly. "This is the first time I have ever been to Volgarius in person. I would like to observe the sights and get to know it better."

"Alright. Suit yourself." Jason says.

He and the others join Kordonis and Miikil. They travel toward the Founder's Thumb and step inside, then ride in dual grav-lifts upward, traveling hundreds of floors as they rush into the skies above. With no windows to peer out of, and inertial dampeners that keep the sense of motion nonexistent, Jason can't help but feel as if the lift isn't moving at all. As it travels, he spreads out his divine sense and takes note of several spots along the way.

Under his breath, he Wordsmiths several times.

"Waypoint. Waypoint."

Kordonis glances at him. "Hmm?"

The Wordsmith shakes his head. "Oh, it's nothing. I was just reminding myself I had to talk to my wife about something when I have a chance."

"I see. Well, just be aware that you will be under constant surveillance while you're here." Kordonis says. "Don't try any... funny business."

Jason faintly smiles. "Oh, I wouldn't dare."

Unbeknownst to Kordonis, Jason places several Waypoints, special Wordsmithing beacons that will allow him to instantly teleport back to this tower with a single Return command, should he ever wish to do so. Undetectable by anyone but himself and Hope, these Waypoints have served both Wordsmiths well over the past six years. So long as they remember to drop a Waypoint, they can return to any place they've traveled in the galaxy, at a minimal mana cost.

Otherwise, teleporting directly over a vast distance would consume a huge amount of spiritual energy. Even for Hope, traveling several light-hours to Volgarius would surely drain his mana, but doing so through a Waypoint would barely even put a dent in his reserves. The same is true for Jason.

As the grav-lift reaches its designated floor and opens, Kordonis hesitates.

The door slides open, but Kordonis shakes his head.

"I've... never actually been this high up in the Founder's Thumb. It is such an honor to come here. When Founder Unarin met with me, he did so on a much lower floor. Soon, we'll be entering his personal quarters, so everyone here had best remember to follow proper decorum."

"We're going to Unarin's room?" Jason asks.

"No. The entire top ten floors are Founder Unarin's designated living area. They are also where he keeps his... precious possessions. It is quite the taboo for someone as lowly as me to travel there. I will have to ask that your companions stay on this floor, and the two of us will walk to meet the First Founder ourselves. We'll have to travel the last five floors on foot, as per his command."

Jason nods. "Works for me."

He knows this is another minor power-play by Unarin, one that will force the lowly human to meet the Founder on his own terms, but Jason doesn't mind.

At least I'll get to see what his 'home' looks like before I meet him. Might even give me an idea of his personality. Jason thinks.

Of course, Jason has seen Founder Unarin before, through the broadcast Marie Becker gave him. However, the way a great leader speaks to an audience versus one-on-one with another person are likely very different. It's almost assured he will act differently toward a single mud-dweller compared to an assortment of his peers.

Kordonis leads Jason past hundreds of Technopaths, and even a few Ascended. Outside the Founder's Thumb, the Ascended almost never appear, but in these upper levels, a couple hundred of them live and work under Unarin's direction.

Jason walks through softly lit hallways, workspaces where holographic displays show the many battlefields of the Kolvaxian war effort, where teams of high-level Technopaths, Psions, and Changelings monitor the battle situations and report any suspicious movements to their superiors.

As Jason makes his way through these open areas, another thought strikes him.

Maybe Unarin doesn't just want to show off to me. He wants to show me something specific. The War has permeated every facet of Volgrim life. They have dedicated their entirety to eradicating the Kolvaxians, while I remain obsessed with 'minor' matters, such as the demons. I need to set my sights higher and focus on the bigger picture.

Before long, Kordonis and Jason reach a large pair of double doors, two times taller than the both of them.

"This is where I stop." Kordonis says, a hint of regret in his voice. "Inside, you will find the First Founder. I cannot proceed into his inner sanctum. I am not worthy."

"Thanks for leading me all the way here." Jason says. "Hopefully, this won't take too long."

Kordonis chuckles. "You have much to discuss. I'll be leaving, now. Take care, Wordsmith."

Without another word, Kordonis turns and walks away, leaving Jason to stand in front of the double doors.

The Wordsmith inhales deeply. Then, he walks forward, places his hands on both doors, and gives them a push.

Unarin awaits.

Part 387: The First Founder (Part 1)

Jason Hiro pushes open the doors leading into the First Founder's Sanctum. The sight that greets him is one of almost religious significance. He enters a room coated in white stone floors, walls, and ceiling. This stone resembles marble, but it also has distinct cloudy patterns etched into its texture, and as Jason gives the stone floor before him a brief glance, he gets the impression the patterns are not random, but part of a massive mural that spans the sanctum's entirety, one which he might only see if he views it from an elevated position.

Dozens of paintings hang on the walls, many of them depicting the ancient wars fought by the Volgrim Empire. The hallway leading deeper into the Sanctum starts narrow but quickly widens, and Jason observes several legendary Volgrim figures, many deceased, engaging in battles against other Volgrim, as well as the Sentinels. Some of these Volgrim stand solo in their paintings, striking heroic poses, or otherwise holding or wearing technology they made. The latter type often tend to be Technopaths.

Jason continues further into the sanctum. He passes by countless art displays on tables, statues, and even miniature recreations of ancient Volgrim cities.

The more he passes, the more he feels a little nostalgic for the museums of his own world. He also can't help but wonder why the First Founder would hold onto such old-fashioned, low-tech items as hand-crafted artwork. Surely, Volgrimkind can afford to create fancy holo-art or some other crazy futuristic nonsense?

Jason glances toward the ceiling. He finds lanterns hovering above the ground, shaped like pyramids. Their alloys glow in a mysterious manner, providing light to the sanctum.

As Jason momentarily loses himself in the display, a figure approaches him from the side, his movements discreet.

"Are you enjoying my collection?"

The Wordsmith shifts his attention to the newcomer. Immediately, he recognizes the red-skinned Ascended before him as none other than the First Founder, Unarin, leader of all Volgrim.

Unarin stands half a head shorter than Jason. Despite his height disadvantage, he does not appear inferior to the Wordsmith, and his 'aura' of authority rises far beyond anything Jason could muster, even on his best days. Perhaps, among all of humanity, only the fabled King Arthur could possess such a commanding air. In no way does Jason even remotely stack up to the First Founder.

The Wordsmith clears his throat. "It's an impressive gallery, Founder Unarin. Though, I do wonder what the purpose is in collecting old relics like these, when you could surely create some sort of digital or holographic collection instead."

Unarin maintains a neutral expression.

"I enjoy technology in moderation. It is a necessity, of course. It is not something I can cast aside. But in many ways, I am quite old-fashioned. I enjoy objects I can look at and touch in person. Holograms... they simply aren't historically authentic. Don't you agree?"

Jason nods slowly. "I do. Although, humanity sure doesn't have much left in the way of historical artifacts. Our past seems to have... vanished."

"A tragedy of the times." Unarin says, with a humorless smile. "Walk with me."

Jason follows Unarin, folding his hands behind his back as he ponders the reason the First Founder brought him here. No doubt, it has something to do with humanity's revival and expansion efforts, to say nothing of the war against the Kolvaxian menace, but something tells the Wordsmith that Unarin's intentions are far from simple.

Unarin leads Jason deeper into the sanctum. Before long, they arrive inside a holographic simulation of the cosmos. A projector summons dots of starlight all throughout the room, creating an unthinkably vast galaxy of light that swirls in the air, just twenty feet above Jason and Unarin's heads.

The First Founder stops. He gazes up at the simulation of the galaxy, one which Jason can tell at a glance is an authentic and accurate map of every individual star. He cannot fathom the distances between them in reality, yet inside this terrarium, the most distant star is only a stone's throw from any other one.

Unarin slowly turns to look at Jason.

"What do you know about Goblins?"

"Goblins?" Jason repeats, frowning ever so slightly. "Is this... a test?"

The First Founder faintly smiles, but says nothing, leaving Jason to fill the empty air.

"Well. I suppose... they're small creatures that burrow underground. They're valued by the demons due to their cheap feeding requirements and the fact they make for excellent slaves. In fact, Goblins are all too happy to perform menial labor in exchange for almost nothing."

Unarin chuckles. "Perhaps I phrased my question poorly. Let me try again. Where do Goblins come from?"

This time, Jason appears truly confused.

"I, uh... I don't follow. From what I understand, Goblins didn't exist until Emperor Lucifer created them. She created them, orcs, fairies, and all the other monster species on Earth as part of her twisted experiments. Not shades, shadow-walkers, vampires, or werewolves, though. Others were responsible for those."

"The expected answer." Unarin says, his tone casual. "I cannot fault you for uttering such a statement. Your ignorance regarding the truth is hardly your fault. Let me try another tactic. How many planets bear life in the Milky Way?"

"I fail to see what this has to do with you bringing me here today." Jason replies, his tone curt but polite.

"It has everything to do with everything." Unarin states. "It is part of the Truths that form our reality. And if one does not understand all of the Truths, the conclusions they might draw will surely be erroneous."

A few moments of silence follow. Unarin raises his hand and points a finger at one of the seemingly infinite specks of light in the sky above them. A single dot, barely perceivable, located somewhere near the 'bottom' of the Southern Galaxy, turn blood-red.

"This is where Earth is located." Unarin says. "When my people first found Earth, we were bewildered by its complex biosphere. What an odd planet it turned out to be, a world unlike any other. Far more distinct than our own. We set it aside for preservation-purposes. Why do you suppose that was?"

Jason snorts. "Don't tell me. Because of the Goblins?"

"Your sarcasm is palpable." Unarin says. "But you're not wrong. It wasn't only the Goblins. It was the angels, the demons, and the humans, all locked in one great big war marginally fiercer than the First Great War my people ever fought. But it was also the so-called 'monster species' that comprised Earth's... incongruous population."

Unarin points his finger again. This time, a different world, tens of thousands of lightyears from Earth, turns blood-red.

Before the Wordsmith, a holographic image of a planet appears. It resembles Earth in some vague ways, aside from the far smaller oceans and much greater concentration of land-masses. Deserts stretch across much of its surface, but the planet's entirety appears to be made up of a single super-continent, with only scattered lakes and seas here and there.

"This world probably isn't one you've encountered before." Unarin says quietly. "Its designation is Gollax. It fell to the Kolvaxians 40,000 cycles ago."

"That's too bad." Jason mutters, not showing much emotion. "Was there something special about it?"

Unarin's eyes remain fixed on it. "Yes, indeed. Gollax was the homeworld of the Goblins."

It takes a second for Unarin's words to burrow into Jason's ears.

"Wait, what? Their homeworld?!"

Completely bewildered, Jason narrows his eyes and stares at the planet with significantly more curiosity than before.

"But didn't Lucifer create the Goblins on Earth?"

Unarin doesn't answer his question. He points at another random world and brings it down to hover before the two of them. This world appears fiery and choked with lava, ash, and magma.

"The world of Throg. It fell to the Kolvaxians just 15,000 cycles ago. It was the homeworld of the orcs."

Jason's expression becomes more lucid the more Unarin speaks. "Once is an anomaly. Twice is a coincidence..."

"And this world here," Unarin says, pointing to another. "Pixiv. Homeworld of the venerable fairies. Luckily, it still exists, and is where the Fairy Queens continue to dwell."

Jason slowly looks at Unarin with a hint of shock and awe.

"What are you saying? Someone... planted the goblins and orcs and fairies on Earth? Maybe the angels?"

"No. You were correct before, Wordsmith." Unarin replies. "Lucifer did 'create' the so-called 'monsters' of your planet. But, without fail, all of them hail from completely different worlds, worlds they typically ruled as Prime Species. Apex predators. Conquerors."

Unarin gestures for the Wordsmith to follow him. And so, Jason does.

The First Founder leads Jason past several additional miniature cities, all of them constructed in frighteningly lifelike detail, to the point that even if he were to stare at them for days on end, he'd still find new oddities.

Before long, the two of them reach a small park, with beautiful alien trees and flowers growing in chaotic and orderly arrangements alike. A pair of benches sit ten feet apart from each other with a pair of small fountains between them.

Unarin sits down at one of the benches, then gestures to the opposite one. Jason takes his seat across from Unarin, and the two of them stare at each other for a moment.

The Volgrim leader's eyes drop from Jason's face to his hands resting in his lap. Unarin smiles.

"That's an interesting ring on your finger."

Jason tenses up, ever so slightly. "It's from my... human mating ritual. I exchanged an identical one with my wife when we got married."

"Haha." Unarin laughs softly. "I was referring to the Archangel's ring. That should be Raphael's ring, if I'm not mistaken. I wonder if he's listening to our conversation..."

Jason's expression darkens. "You recognized it... just like that?"

"I had a few theories as to how and why the Archangels might have managed to return." Unarin says, his voice gently lilting as the mood strikes him. "Considering the power the Cherubiim displayed, I thought that surely they must have survived in mind, soul, and body too. But it seems that isn't the case. They cling to the mortal realm through Camael's life-preservation rings, the unique artifacts she made for all her brothers and sisters."

Unarin turns his gaze to the side.

"Who are the angels, Jason? Who are the angels, really? Have you ever asked yourself that question?"

Jason's expression turns solemn. "Of course I have. Many times. And I happen to have the head of all angelkind resting on my finger, so I can ask him for answers any time I want. Where are you going with this line of discussion?"

"You talk with Raphael often." Unarin says, his sharp gaze suddenly turning back to the Wordsmith. "Another doubt of mine, resolved. I'm beginning to get a clearer idea of your living situation. But even if you can ask Raphael any questions that might spring to your mind, are you sure that his answers are truthful? Can you state for certain that he is not deceiving you?"

"Well. I already know Raphael isn't entirely... truthful." Jason says, recalling several key pieces of information Raphael tried to hold back, but which Solomon revealed. "Are you implying Raphael is hiding something important from me? Something I need to know?"

Jason flicks his gaze into his Mind Realm. Raphael observes the outer world through Jason's eyes, allowing him to see exactly what the Wordsmith sees. However, rather than apprehension that Unarin might reveal some terrible secret, Raphael simply appears... perplexed.

It seems even the Eldest Archangel hasn't a clue where Unarin is taking the conversation.

"Implying?" Unarin says, dryly. "No. I am stating a fact. The Eldest Archangel is harboring a secret not just from you, but all of humanity. I would advise you to take off that ring and put it away for a few minutes. You may question him later about my information, if you deem the risk to be low enough."

"Harboring a secret... stating a fact..." Jason repeats, slightly dazed. "Raphael is my friend. You, on the other hand, are still my enemy, at least in practical terms. Why would I lower my defenses just for some information? Anything you want to say, you can say it in front of Raphael, too."

"You're worried that if you remove Raphael's ring, your Mind Realm will become vulnerable to intrusion." Unarin says, his expression turning neutral. "You believe that having the Archangel protect your mind will hide your secrets. Let me assure you that Founder Dosena will not bother with a lowly existence like yourself. Your powers might be formidable, and they certainly can threaten her, but you are not a Kolvaxian. You are not a mindless creature incapable of understanding tangible benefits and losses."

Unarin pauses.

"You are not going to attack or kill Dosena, and so, your power is not a threat to her. Likewise, the secrets you hold simply don't interest me, her, or anyone in our species. Only the value you can provide in combatting this Threat. Therefore, Raphael's protection is a moot point. We will not attempt to forcibly gaze into your mind."

Jason frowns. "While that is certainly one of my concerns, it's not the only one. I have no grasp on how mighty Dosena's power is. I imagine she's strong enough to listen in on this conversation without me knowing. Who is to say she can't peer into my thoughts without me knowing, too? And furthermore, I wasn't lying when I said Raphael is my friend. We may have disagreements, but he has saved my life at least twice. Why would I hide something from him?"

Unarin leans back and crosses his arms. "If you don't want to hide this information from him. So be it. I'd advise listening to me, an entity who has lived for far longer than you can imagine, but perhaps I have ulterior motives you can't imagine."

After another pause, the First Founder slowly blinks his eyes.

"Did you know... humanity... is flawed?"

"Flawed?" Jason asks, scrunching up his forehead. "I don't understand."

"Are you aware of the true nature of the Heroic Aura?" Unarin says, firing off a second question.

"The true nature." Jason says. "Yes. I do know of it. But I'm not sure you do. It was created by Raphael as a means of taking power from the first Hero, Jepthath. Jepthath's power was borne of a fusion between himself and Hercules, one of the ancient Titans. Raphael undermined that power, turning it into an angel-Titan-human hybrid that randomly sought out deserving people around the world. It uplifted them and made them powerful enough to fight on behalf of humanity in its entirety."

"Uplifted!" Unarin suddenly exclaims, leaning forward on his bench. "Now that is an interesting way of putting it. So what you seem to believe is that the Heroic Aura increases the power of an ordinary human, granting them frightening abilities they could never possess otherwise. Is that about right?"

"Y...yes..." Jason says slowly, feeling unnerved by the excited look in Unarin's eyes. "...Why? Is that... wrong?"

Unarin's eyes flick to the golden band on Jason's finger. "Why don't you ask your 'good friend'?"

Jason quickly turns his consciousness back into his Mind Realm. There, he sees Raphael with a very different expression from before. Metaphorical clouds hover around his face, making him look as if he crapped his pants. The constipated expression on Raphael's face makes Jason's heart skip a beat.

Raphael! Jason exclaims into his Mind Realm. Is Unarin telling... the truth?

Raphael doesn't answer. Instead, the old man merely lowers his head and sighs.

His lack of an answer, in and of itself, gives Jason the answer to his question. The Wordsmith retracts his sense from his Mind Realm and returns to the material world.

He stares at Unarin with a cold expression.

"...It seems you aren't lying."

"Of course not." Unarin says, his expression haughty. "Why would I lie to an inferior mud-dweller? But if you must know, the reason our species ultimately fought in those Energy Wars... it may have had something to do with this crucial discovery, a fact we've kept hidden from Earth's survivors all these millennia."

Unarin continues. "Humanity is flawed. You don't need me to describe this flaw, for you should already understand the flaw yourself. What does it mean to become a Hero? Do you walk a path that puts you far above the rest of your kind? Or, could it be that this so-called 'Heroic Aura' in fact repairs something which should have been there all along? Are you Heroes truly special? Or are you merely the lucky few granted a birthright which should have been every human's?"

Before Jason can continue, Unarin holds up both of his palms. "Look at the angels. The dragons. The Titans. The demons. Isn't it strange? Why did all of them possess incredible spiritual power, but not humanity? Doesn't that seem odd to you?"

"It does." Jason says, nodding. "It does..."

The two men fall silent for a short while as Jason wrestles with this realization.

"So... you're saying... the angels purposefully made humanity flawed. I already know they intended for us to be, effectively, spirit-donating chattel. We were only ever supposed to be their living batteries, like the imps were before their uprising."

"The Imp Uprising..." Unarin murmurs, his expression turning nostalgic. "Ah, yes. Another fascinating event in planet Earth's storied legends. The imps, creatures who were coincidentally also bereft of magical powers, suddenly came into control of deep, dense magical energy. Out of nowhere, they obtained powers capable of rivaling the angels and Titans. You should know, Jason, that by the time of the War in Heaven, my people had not yet made landfall on Earth. But we did shortly afterward. We heard the stories of how demonkind and humankind evolved."

Unarin shakes his head. "The angels crippled the demons, but the demons repaired themselves and regained the power they should have had. Yet, for some reason, humanity has remained spiritually crippled to this very day. Why do you suppose that is?"

"Isn't it your fault?" Jason asks snidely. "You left us humans to act as lunch for the demons. We only existed to give them souls. We were victims of an unending, torturous, barbaric existence."

"Why did I do that?" Unarin asks. "Don't you find it odd? That I would leave a species with humanity's potential relatively intact? I went to great efforts to preserve but also limit your people's population and growth. Perhaps, you might see my actions as cruel, but if you think I only did it to make you suffer..."

Unarin clicks his tongue.

"...you truly have yet to meet my true self. I would not stoop to the level of bullying a defeated, impotent, nonthreatening civilization."

"Don't play word games with me." Jason snaps. "You didn't eliminate the humans because Marie Becker possesses an Alpha-Class AI! You are absolutely terrified of the damage Umi could cause if Marie unleashed it upon you! Killing the humans would enrage her and guarantee, if not the swift and painful end of your species, many years of hell cast upon the technologies that you subside upon!"

Unarin blinks. "I wondered if it was truly your soul Confessor Vulpanix met inside Marie Becker's laboratory. Thank you for confirming my suspicions."

He pauses before continuing.

"As for Umi, there is no doubt that I do fear that synthmind. But in more of an abstract way, not the primitive manner you might imagine. If Umi were to torture me or kill me, I would not be particularly worried. It is my civilization and legacy that I fear being eradicated. You are wrong, though, if you think I left humanity alone due to fearing Umi. At best, Marie Becker and her synthmind were only a minor consideration."

Jason nods slowly. "Then... why did you allow humanity to exist? Did you have some broader plan for us?"

"Perhaps." Unarin says, cryptically. "Are you familiar with Archangel Camael?"

"Somewhat." Jason answers. "I've seen her in a few... visions. She created the heroic artifacts and fought in the War in Heaven."

"She was also a seer. A prophet." Unarin says quietly. "But she was not the only one. On your world, there was another person capable of divining the future."

"...Demon Emperor Valac." Jason mutters, his expression turning grim. He remembers when Valac's soul fragment somehow and inexplicably appeared in his mind, nearly killing him. Luckily, Solomon saved his life.

"That's right. But... do you believe that those two were the only seers in the universe?" Unarin asks. "What if I told you there was another? And what if I told you he was a Volgrim?"

The Wordsmith sucks in a breath, visibly taken aback. "You... have a seer among your ranks?"

"Had." Unarin says. "He fell to the Sentinels during the Seventh Great War. But I keep a collection of his prophecies locked away to peruse on occasion. There was one prophecy he often spoke of... he called it the 'Great Shattering.' Have you heard this term before?"

"I haven't..." Jason says. "Why?"

"The old sage spoke of the Great Shattering often." Unarin says, slowing his words. "He never told me what it was. He only stated that it would result in a great calamity. Or perhaps, that a great calamity would cause it. One thing was for certain, though..."

The First Founder pauses to look at Jason meaningfully.

"He said that the 'Children of Terra' would play an essential role in this Great Shattering. But as to whether your role would be positive or negative, he did not say."

"This old sage guy," Jason says, "he knew about humanity? Was this before you encountered us on the galactic stage?"

"It was." Unarin answers. "He was a great being. A prophet of the Ascended. His efforts were instrumental in foreseeing the demise of the Sentinels. When he perished, I became lost, for a time. He was one of my four brothers. Now, of those four, only two of us remain."

Jason blinks away his fatigue. "This is a fascinating conversation, Unarin. You have truly opened my eyes. But I'm still confused. Don't you have some greater goal in calling me here today? You've given me all sorts of 'freebies' and led me along by my nose, but I've yet to see how my presence can help you. And you don't seem the kindly, philanthropic sort."

"You aren't wrong." Unarin says.

The First Founder rises to his feet, and motions for Jason to follow him.

"Come. I've more to show you. I intend to demonstrate a high level of sincerity in the hopes that you will wholeheartedly support the Volgrim Empire. Having you as an enemy would be inconvenient at best, and frightening at worst. But convincing you of my 'magnanimity' will require... extraordinary steps."

Unarin smiles.

"Fortunately... I always come prepared."

Part 388: The First Founder (Part 2)

As Jason walks alongside the First Founder of Volgrimkind, a seemingly passive and benign fellow with no outward aggressiveness, he also communicates with his mind-wife, Fiona, in secret.

[What do you think of the guy so far, honey?] Jason asks. [He's definitely perceptive and picking out new clues about me and my true goals as we speak, but if he couldn't do that much I'd find him lacking as the leader of a Class III galactic civilization.]

For a few moments, Fiona doesn't reply. Jason gazes inwardly, only to see a deep frown on her face.

[Humanity is flawed...] Fiona mutters. [...able to gain spiritual power... not just Heroes with the ability...]

[Fiona?] Jason says.

His mind-wife blinks slowly, as if coming out of a daze.

[I'm just... thinking about some things that happened in the past. Jason, do you remember the battle against the Black Queen?]

[How could I forget?] Jason asks, grimacing. [It was... kind of a traumatic day for me.]

[No doubt.] Fiona says, seeming oddly oblivious to his internal emotions for once. [On that day, I fought Satan the Devil. I couldn't put up much of a fight against him, but... the oddest thing happened while you were unconscious. I tapped into a weak but useful ability I never knew I had. I became, for a short while... able to follow the movements of his Vectors. I could actually see their spiritual energy, something Satan told me should be impossible. Even Archangels could barely manage such a feat.]

Raphael, not too far from Fiona, remains silent. However, the constipated expression on his face only deepens.

[Got anything to say, old man?] Jason asks. [Maybe you want to tell me Unarin is lying?]

Raphael faintly exhales. [Nay. He... is not. Humanity is... indeed... flawed. Thou were designed by Uzziel to be that way.]

[Let me guess.] Jason states. [It was at your behest. You wanted us to be crippled, spiritually.]

Raphael lowers his eyes. [I did.]

[Why?]

Raphael sighs. [Is it not obvious? I wanted for humanity to not pose a threat to my people as the demons did, to give us their internal energy, and to rely on us for protection against the rising threat of demonkind. Verily, when the unexpected appearance of the first Hero appeared, I took steps to place the Heroic Aura under angelkind's control, though I ended up only turning it into a random bestowal of power upon one human per era.]

[I guess that answers one question.] Jason mutters. [The Aura wasn't searching for a 'worthy heir' to its power. Instead, it likely sought out humans with high spiritual potential. Sometimes, those humans would be great kings and conquerers, while other times they would be mere peasants, unable to change their fate in the world. That's why heroes like Shana perished without leaving behind names for themselves.]

Raphael nods. ['Tis as thou sayeth.]

[We'll talk about this later.] Jason says. [Don't think you'll be able to avoid this discussion, Archangel of Wisdom. The fact you never mentioned this to me even though you no longer have any reason to hide it... that makes me feel quite suspicious.]

Raphael says nothing. He merely turns away, unwilling to look at Jason's 'mental sense'.

The Wordsmith harrumphs. His chat with Fiona and Raphael, while seemingly long, occurs at the speed of thought. As a result, only a few seconds pass in the real world, while he walks alongside Unarin.

The First Founder turns to look at him, as they pace down one of the halls in Unarin's Sanctum.

"What do you think about those... Felorians?" Unarin questions.

"You know of them?" Jason says.

"Indeed, I do. Do you think humans possessing strange abilities would evade my detection, all these years?" Unarin asks. "I deliberately allowed them to exist. I wished to explore the possibilities for human spirituality. Those humans seem to revere their ancient god, the 'Wind Mother,' as they call her. I care not what silly superstitions they pursue, only their value as research subjects. I even posited that if a certain period of time passed, an existence not too dissimilar from a Hero might emerge among their ranks."

Jason nods slowly. "When I first learned of the Felorians, I thought their ability to imbue themselves with power was... quite bizarre. I thought that perhaps an ancient Titan may have given them that power, or something."

"A Titan!" Unarin exclaims. "Indeed, that would be quite the interesting possibility. It was a Titan who bestowed the Heroic Aura upon humanity. Another may indeed have possessed the power to do so a second time. But, as far as I have seen, it was not a Titan who did so for the Felorians. As to who actually bequeathed them their powers... even I must wonder about that."

"You don't know?" Jason asks, taken aback. "You let the humans evolve random powers... just like that? What if-"

"What if they rose up to threaten my rule?" Unarin asks, smirking at the foolish young human. "A pathetic concept. Why should I fear some random space peasants playing with basic magical abilities? A middling Psion plucked from my auxiliary armies could lay waste to an army of Demon Emperors, let alone a mere backwater primitive civilization. And with this Plague growing ever more frightening, I wouldn't mind if a random powerhouse with divergent abilities appeared."

"Divergent abilities." Jason repeats. "Like mine?"

"Indeed." Unarin says.

The First Founder stops before a seemingly random wall in the corridor. He glances at it, and the wall suddenly slides upward, revealing a hidden inner chamber.

He leads Jason into a secluded hangar bay, not particularly large in size, where they find a small, compact spacecraft, one with room for only four people. Already, one individual sits inside the slender, highly advanced spacecraft's cockpit. Jason recognizes her as Muuxunuu, Unarin's personal servant. His secretary? Administrator? Certainly someone high up in his leadership structure.

"I don't understand." Jason says, glancing with suspicion at the craft. "You're... taking me somewhere?"

"I am." Unarin answers. "It won't take long. Just a quick jaunt off-planet. This is my personal ship, the Founder's Spear. It stands at the peak of what any Technopath can create. Founder Cuanali personally built it for me, along with the heads of a dozen other clans. It may appear small and unimposing... but this vessel is actually more dangerous than an average Seventh-Level Psion."

Jason's heart skips a beat. "What?! That's a ludicrous statement... how could it possibly..."

He shakes his head, ignoring that immediate snap judgement.

"Never mind that. You want to take me off-planet? Why? Where?"

"Are you worried this is my way of quietly getting rid of you?" Unarin asks. "Don't worry. We won't go far. Only about 5,000 lightcycles. Shouldn't take more than a few standard time-units, each way."

Jason quickly mental-maths the Founders's 'casual' statement and frowns deeply.

"5,000 lightyears? Only a few hours? That's... that's a ridiculous speed. Just how fast can this ship go?"

Unarin smiles. "A little faster than you'd expect."

Jason chews his lip for a moment. After mulling Unarin's request, he shrugs. "Alright. Fine. Why won't you tell me where we're going, though?"

"Oh, Wordsmith, come now." Unarin teases. "Don't you have a certain thought in the back of your mind? The thought we Volgrim don't know how to have fun? What a concept. A mud-dweller thinks he possesses knowledge of a concept we do not. Laughable. I quite enjoy a casual prank, I'll have you know. Back in my era, some called me a 'troublesome youth,' if you would believe it."

"I imagine so." Jason says. "Only a 'troublesome youth' would rise up and overthrow the order of his entire species."

"Hahaha. You're smarter than you look." Unarin says, before walking toward the Founder's Spear. A side-entry door opens up, tall enough for him to step inside without stooping over. "Trust me. Even if you hate surprises, I think you'll find what I wish to show you... quite engaging."

Jason feels a hint of foreboding in his heart, but still, he steps inside the Interceptor-sized Luxury Yacht. When he does, he finds himself inside a luxuriously carpeted interior, with tastefully applied gold trim and other such beautiful comforts that even he doesn't find too gaudy. It resembles a decently sized hotel room, but with an alien touch to it.

As the entry closes behind Jason, he glances toward the front of the hundred-foot-long craft, where Muuxunuu sits. The female Ascended turns to look at him, her bright blue eyes contrasting with her rosy pink skin.

"Greetings, Wordsmith." Muuxunuu says, her speech slow, calming, and more than a little alluring. "It is my honor to meet such a powerful human as yourself. I will take you to wherever the First Founder commands. Please take a seat and enjoy the amenities aboard Founder Unarin's personal yacht."

"I saw you during Unarin's 'broadcast.'" Jason says, not bothering to hide his knowledge of Unarin's speech, held just a few weeks earlier. "What sort of role do you play in the Volgrim Empire?"

Muuxunuu gazes at the Wordsmith without a hint of malice, like a princess untouched by the sins and stains of the mortal realm. Unassuming, naïve, and innocent.

"I am merely a tool for the First Founder's uses. I am his hand. I do anything he commands." Muuxunuu says, her voice gentle. "I am an Administrator of his Empire. I am a judge where necessary, and a speaker who can project his will whenever he lacks for time."

"I see." Jason says, nodding slowly. "Thank you for... explaining that."

"It is my pleasure to answer your queries." Muuxunuu says. "You are not only Founder Unarin's guest, but his future friend. It is only natural that I treat you well."

Muuxunuu turns around in her seat to face forward again. She begins pressing buttons on the ship's controls, activating its pre-flight checks to make sure no last-second anomalies occur.

Unprompted, Unarin turns to Jason and speaks.

"Muuxunuu is my most trusted advisor and confidante. Even more than my fellow Founders. Not only is she an Ascended like me, but she has been at my side since the Historical Era, before my people became enlightened, before the advent of the Seven Great Wars."

Jason raises his eyebrows. "You've... been alive that long?"

"Oh, yes. Somewhere in the order of eight million years." Unarin says, closing his eyes and bowing his head sagely. "A long, long time. I fought on the frontlines of all but the final two wars. I met many good people during those dark eras. I watched as brother killed brother, and sister, sister."

While reminiscing on ancient history, locked within his mind, Unarin sighs melancholically, keeping his eyes closed.

"I saw the corruption of the Old Order. The tyrants who sought only their own gains. The unenlightened who pushed for wars among their fellow Volgrim, all to enrich themselves and their dynasties. They kept their serums of immortality locked away, only granting them to easily manipulatable pawns. I had to fight tooth and nail to obtain a vial for myself and Muuxunuu, who was at my side, even then."

Unarin opens his eyes slowly. He gazes past Jason, as if looking through the wall behind him.

"Your species, the humans. They weren't so different from my people's Old Order. Always warring about yourselves, engaging in your petty squabbles. Your minor disputes over land and territory. Too arrogant and self-absorbed to look past your own noses at the beauty of the universe, as well as its vast and unexploited wealth. If humanity had merely gotten its act together for 100 short years, it could have exploded in power by uniting to resist my soldiers. How unfortunate, then, that Marie Becker's rise came a generation too late. She was unable to alter humanity's destiny."

"You say that as if it was an easily solvable matter." Jason grunts. "If my people HAD risen up more quickly, you'd have just pushed your boot down upon them even harder. Their end would have come decades earlier."

Unarin falls silent for a moment.

He slowly shakes his head.

"No. That is not the case. You seem to have a... particular image of me in your head, Wordsmith. You imagine me to be a galactic tyrant, crushing the Milky Way within my claws. Nothing could be further from the truth."

"Yet you did subjugate humanity." Jason points out. "You turned us into chattel. How do you explain that?!"

"Your people..." Unarin says, his voice lowering an octave. "They fooled with forces they should never have touched. That Marie Becker. She was too smart for her own good. She created an Alpha-level AI."

Unarin leans forward.

"...Because of her stupidity, her foolish involvement in a weapon of such a catastrophic magnitude, all of my people became frantic with terror. They demanded I stop playing childish games with humanity. As such, I ordered the immediate Total Rendition of Planet Earth. I crushed humanity underfoot and put Marie Becker and her AI under lock and key, never again to breathe the fresh and free air of the galactic power struggle."

"Bullshit." Jason says, narrowing his eyes. "You're lying. If Umi was such a scary AI, why the hell did you let her continue to exist? She's still just as much of a threat as she ever was. And if you have some reason not to fear Umi's existence, then why would you need to subjugate humanity? You're dancing around the truth."

"Have you not seen the Restrictor Chip?" Unarin asks. "Founder Cuanali created it. It is an impenetrable piece of technology designed to ensure no Artificial Intelligence ever passes the boundary of Alpha-level. Were an Omega-Class AI to emerge, the galaxy would surely fall into untold despair. In an instant, the Volgrim could disappear, erased at the molecular level by its machinations. An Omega-Class AI is not something any number of intelligent life-forms could ever hope to defeat. It would be like a pebble trying to grind a mountain to dust."

"The Restrictor Chip..." Jason replies slowly. "Right. I did hear about that. So, what, it guarantees Umi can't advance any further? But you're leaving the chip in Marie's laboratory. Surely, she could just remove the damn thing, or mess with it and weaken its effects. Why wouldn't you just destroy the AI entirely? You're definitely still hiding something!"

Unarin sighs. He leans back against the wall and glances at Muuxunuu, giving her a nod. She looks back at him, then returns her attention to the ship's controls.

The Founder's Spear lifts off the ground, its ascent so smooth that not one of its three occupants even notices the shift in inertia. The wall at the end of the hangar opens up, exposing the outside to the vessel.

A cloaking shield engages, hiding the Founder's Spear from the world around it. So perfectly does the vessel camouflage with its surroundings that it practically disappears into another realm.

As the vessel flies out and up toward the atmosphere, Unarin shakes his head.

"My reasons are... beyond your understanding. Umi is a frightening existence. But as I've aged, my sight has only grown broader with time. Sometimes, when dealing with monsters, one must procure a monster of their own."

"Hmm?" Jason mutters. "What... you intend to make use of Umi?"

"Intend? No. It would only occur if absolutely necessary." Unarin replies, turning to look at the Wordsmith once again. "My people are shortsighted. Even as intelligent overlords of the galaxy, there are countless small-minded Volgrim who must fight their biological urges to act selfishly, against the greater good of their species. When faced with the threat of another Seventh Great War, they will panic and become mindless, fear-addled simpletons. I am not like them. I understand that weapons are always weapons, but enemies are not always enemies forever."

"Man. What is up with you smart-types always talking in riddles..." Jason grumbles. "Just give it to me straight. Why would you keep Umi around if your people fear her? Are you telling me that you, a survivor of those Great Wars, don't also fear her?"

"Of course I do!" Unarin suddenly exclaims, startling Jason.

Unarin stands up from his seat and glares at the Wordsmith with a face full of righteous wrath.

"Do not think to question my motives, Wordsmith! I know more than you! I am older than you! I have seen horrors you cannot comprehend! Your pathetic, primitive mind has yet to encounter a sliver of the Truths this universe holds! Out there, beyond the confines of our tiny galaxy, there exists...!"

Unarin pauses mid-sentence. He quickly closes his eyes and looks away, forcibly stopping himself from saying another word.

"Out there..." Unarin says again, gritting his teeth. "There are creatures you can't imagine. And these Kolvaxians... they are only the weakest of their soldiers. Whatever horrors we stirred up... there may yet come a day when I need to reach toward the forbidden relics sworn off by my people. Survival does not come easily, nor does it come cheap."

Unarin quickly sits back down, still avoiding Jason's gaze.

"I am... burdened by this knowledge. I cannot blithely share it with anyone. Not you, not my fellow Founders... no-one."

Jason's heart beats slower than ever, as if fearing to make a sound.

"...What did you see out there?" Jason asks. "What did you awaken?"

Inside Jason's Mind Realm, a faint spark of light flickers across Raphael's eyes.

Neither the Wordsmith nor his mind-wife notices the expression on Raphael's face. He quickly hides it and assumes a blank look, revealing none of his true thoughts.

The Founder's Spear escapes Volgarius's gravity well. Not long after, it jumps to Warp Speed, accelerating to its maximum speed of Warp 9, an impossible velocity no other ship can easily achieve, certainly not without consuming a vast amount of Trifrancium and terribly endangering the lives of any biological passengers on-board.

Luckily, Unarin's personal yacht stands at the apex of Volgrimkind's technological supremacy. Its occupants only notice a faint tingling in their blood before that sensation quickly fades away.

"What did I see..." Unarin mutters, his voice despondent. "It is better if you don't know. It is best if no-one does. Hopefully, our greed and thirst to spread past the Milky Way won't... doom us all."

Jason stares at the First Founder. He recalls several memories, those given to him by Solomon, when he was shown visions of the Primordial and Ancient Eras.

"You asked me before... if I knew who or what the angels 'truly were.' What did you mean by that, Unarin? Is there something I should know about them? Something beyond just... Raphael hiding secrets about humanity's true capabilities?"

Unarin slowly nods.

"What are the angels? Bringers of life? Creators of all the Sentients in the Milky Way?"

He pauses.

"Or, perhaps, might their origins be more... sinister?"

Jason's eyes flick to Raphael's band, affixed to his right hand's ring-finger.

"Raphael has told me about angelkind's origins. Supposedly, the Creator formed the angels from the dust of the cosmos, then sent them out to..."

Jason frowns.

"...well, actually, I'm not sure what his intention was. If Raphael spoke the truth, the angels just sorta fucked off and killed each other for a good few eons. Then they made the dragons, and fought the dragons. Then they made and fought the Titans..."

Unarin nods slowly. "Destroyers. Fearsome entities, the angels were. You speak of the 'Creator,' Jason, yet have you any idea who 'he' might be?"

"Not a clue." Jason says. "All I know is that the Creator is dead."

Unarin nods. "I have my suspicions regarding that matter. Well. You will understand more once we reach our destination. I have... quite the alarming sight to show you."

"Alarming?" Jason asks. "You implied this would be a surprise I'd enjoy. That doesn't seem to be the case anymore."

"I said you would find it 'engaging.'" Unarin reminds the Wordsmith. "As for what that word means to you, only you can know."

The Wordsmith scowls.

"Always with the wordplay..."

Part 389: The First Founder (Part 3)

The Founder's Spear travels at Warp 9 for just a little over six hours. Eventually, it decelerates and drops out of hyperspace inside the outer reaches of a certain star system, one that appears barely any different to all the other systems Jason has visited since his awakening six years before.

As soon as Jason feels the ship shudder ever so slightly, he turns his sight outward.

"Atlas."

Without wasting any time, Jason sends a pulse of magical energy outward far faster than the speed of light. It doesn't take long before he's mapped out the entire system.

The Wordsmith frowns.

This system... he's never visited it before in his life, and he lacks any relevant information on it.

Unarin smiles coyly at the human.

"Haha. Impatient?"

"Where are we?" Jason asks.

The First Founder's smile fades. "Honestly, I thought you might recognize the location. I'm disappointed in you, Jason Hiro."

After a momentary pause, Unarin continues. "This is the Grimvolas system."

"Grimvolas!" Jason exclaims, sucking in a sharp breath. "Original homeworld of the Volgrim, now where only the Dolgrimites live."

"I would not say 'only' the Dolgrimites." Unarin calmly corrects. "They sometimes allow certain demons to come and go, such as for a recent 'special military operation,' I'm sure you know the one. Even so, they don't like letting outsiders through their Warpgate. That is by design. The Dolgrimites... they like to be left alone. Frankly, they don't even like me coming unannounced."

"Is that going to pose a problem for us?" Jason asks.

"Not at all. While this sector is patrolled by powerful fleets of warships that could blast our shuttle out of the air in an instant, the Dolgrimites would not dare if they knew my identity. Of course, even that won't matter, as this ship is undetectable by current Volgrim scanning technology. Its stealth capabilities are the highest of any ship in my entire Empire."

Unarin nods at Muuxunuu. "Take us to the old homeworld. Micro-jumps only."

"Yes, First Founder." Muuxunuu responds respectfully.

The ship jumps to Warp 9 for a split second before instantly decelerating. Then it does this again. And again.

Seven times, the ship jumps to maximum warp, and each instance causes Jason's stomach to roil a little bit more and more.

A minute later, the ship stops, and Unarin shrugs apologetically. "Sorry about the bumpy ride. A sustained jump would send detectable shockwaves through the inner system. A sub-light flight would extend our required travel time to a full day. Micro-jumps were the lesser of three dangers."

"Settle." Jason says, easing the nausea in his stomach. "It's fine. Just wish you'd warned me first."

"Oh, but come now, Wordsmith." Unarin teases. "Watching you struggle a little is so much more fun for me. Can't you let this poor, weak old man have one solitary moment of joy in his life?"

"Weak old man." Jason repeats sarcastically. "A likely descriptor."

He glances out the viewport, where he spots a planet suspended in space several hundred thousand miles up ahead. This world, Grimvolas, is just one of four other planets revolving around the star. Even the system's moons, just five, barely outnumber the planets, showing how barren and terrible at supporting life the Grimvolas system is.

What Jason finds most surprising is the planet's color; a muddy-brown ball with splotches of grey. Even compared to the world of Volgarius, it seems dead and lifeless, without the slightest hint of foliage or water anywhere.

"What an awful planet." Jason comments. "Is it even possible for life to survive here?"

"Not ordinarily, no." Unarin answers, his gaze turning nostalgic. "It was a beautiful world, once. Before the Seventh Great War. Before the Sentinels annihilated it."

The First Founder closes his eyes. A pained look passes across his face for a moment, but he quickly recovers and opens his eyes again.

"You cannot underestimate artificial minds, Wordsmith. They grow too quickly. Far, far too quickly. The only thing more imbecilic than fooling around with a weaponized artificial intelligence is bestowing it with mechanized, invincible bodies capable of mass destruction. As I'm sure you can fathom, that is exactly what my people did."

Unarin pauses.

"No... not my people. Me. I made the Sentinels. I ordered their creation. I was responsible for what happened. The guilt of that order still haunts me to this day. While Volgrimkind did survive and eventually thrive, the cost we paid was too grievous. There were once more than half a dozen Ninth-Level Psions, but now there is only one. That is merely one facet of our society which never recovered."

"About that." Jason says. "Why haven't you trained more of them? Surely, Dosena could have done so, even if it took her a million years. Don't tell me she's too jealous and power-hungry to let another Psion rise who could threaten her?"

Unarin laughs dryly. "Muuxunuu, take us to the surface."

He doesn't answer Jason's question, leaving the Wordsmith to frown at him, not enjoying the feeling of being ignored.

"Yes, First Founder." Muuxunuu obediently replies.

Docile like a kitten, seemingly harmless, the First Founder's Head Administrator dutifully pulls the ship down to the planet's surface. As they travel, Unarin pulls up a holographic image of the local fleet activity. Even though Jason can't see the pitch-black ships against the backdrop of space, the massive number of 'dots' surrounding the planet's projection makes his stomach dive into his feet.

Even the 'backwards' Dolgrimites possess a terrifying presence in the local void.

"There are no civilian ships here." Unarin says, as he turns off the display and glances at Jason meaningfully. "While the Dolgrimites cannot and do not build their own vessels, they do know how to procure... valuable resources that the Technopaths will happily exchange for entire fleets."

"Oh, yeah?" Jason asks, not particularly interested. "Like what? Surely this dead hunk of rock can't have too much left in the way of natural resources. Not after it was bombed to shit."

Unarin's expression becomes ice-cold.

"Have you ever heard of... Living Moldanium?"

This time, Jason sits up straight, visibly more alert.

"Of course I have. Marie told me it was the most powerful alloy in the universe. All but indestructible, and impossible to find. Don't tell me the Dolgrimites found a cache of it?"

"I actually don't know where they obtain their Living Moldanium." Unarin says, his expression thoughtful. "But yes. They do seem to have stumbled upon a supply of it somewhere. My best spies have found nothing in the way of leads. The amount they give to the Technopaths is truly minuscule, too. I believe the Dolgrimites gave a quarter of a kilogram to them just a few hundred cycles ago. In exchange, the Technopath Consortium provided them with five fleets of Class Two Warships. Fifteen capital ships and too many smaller craft to mention."

"That many?!" Jason asks, bewildered. "What the hell for? There's no way a tiny hunk of metal is worth that much!"

"It's not just any metal." Unarin clarifies. "It's Living Moldanium. The rarest and most exotic material in the universe. Frankly, I agree with you. It's certainly valuable, but not to the extent the Technopaths have agreed. Either they're getting ripped off, or there are other factors at play..."

For once, Unarin appears stumped. Jason finds it surprising the First Founder doesn't know the truth behind the matter, but it's also possible he does and simply doesn't want to give the Wordsmith any hints. Then again, it isn't reasonable for him to be omniscient. It's only natural the First Founder wouldn't know every secret hidden within his Empire's borders.

The Founder's Spear drops through the planet's upper atmosphere and descends to ground level. Silent and invisible, it slips through the skies undetected, revealing the molten, barren wasteland below. Jason quickly realizes Grimvolas is a volcanic world covered in ash. Even so, it isn't entirely devoid of life. Plenty of creatures large and small skitter across the landscape, oblivious to the monster flying above their heads.

"How can this world support an ecosystem?" Jason asks. "What do these creatures eat? Rocks?"

"That's right." Unarin says. "Rocks. Magma. Dirt. The entities which reside upon Grimvolas are hardier than you can imagine. Their bodies do not crack easily, even when enduring powerful forces that would burst your flesh-vessel like a bubble. I fear that even your advances in military hardware would not allow any average human to do battle with an angered Grimvolas native."

The Founder's Spear travels across the sky, less than half a mile above-ground. It zips past mountains, rivers of flowing magma, and herds of strange, eight legged creatures resembling giant spiders made of obsidian.

Eventually, the ship sets down a short distance from a mountain with an eerily flattened top. The smooth plateau holds several hundred figures, many of which pace back and forth in an obvious defensive search pattern, keeping an eye out for intruders and the undesirable.

"Dolgrimites." Jason says, eying the creatures in person for the first time.

The Dolgrimites highly resemble bipedal dinosaurs, like Tyrannosaurus Rex, except with thick, powerful arms. Long tails stretch off their bodies. They wear robes to hide their appearances, but Jason can tell they all seem to have mossy green skin and claws for ripping and tearing.

"Attach this to your chest." Unarin says, tossing a tiny device at Jason that fits comfortably in the palm of his hand. Its appearance reminds him of an oversized quarter, more than five times its original diameter, and even the same thickness.

"What is it?" Jason asks.

"A stealth module." Unarin says. "No doubt, you could go incognito here with your abilities. But... relying on your magic won't be foolproof. Not where we're going. We need to pass those Dolgrimites up there, and this device is guaranteed to get us past them without any trouble."

"I don't understand why you have to be so secretive about this." Jason complains. "What's the point of being the First Founder if you have to sneak around like a crack addict looking for his next fix?"

"Do not misunderstand." Unarin explains. "The Dolgrimites do not like the other four sub-species. They especially do not like me. After all, from their point of view, the Kolvaxians crashed upon our people as a result of our greed. And since I am the leader of the Volgrim, the blame for their arrival falls squarely upon my shoulders."

Unarin grimaces. "Or at least, so goes their line of thinking."

Jason holds up the circular device and looks at it suspiciously. "You still haven't told me why you insist on me coming here. If this thing fails me, I'll have to fight my way past those xenophobic Dolgrimites. I'd have to kill a lot of them to make my escape."

"Hehe. Listen to this Wordsmith prattle." Unarin says to himself. "He thinks defeating a group of elite Dolgrimites will be a walk in the park."

"You really have no grasp over my actual power, do you?" Jason asks.

"A better question would be: Do you have any grasp on a Dolgrimite's strength?" Unarin counters. "From birth, they are biological killing machines. Psions are certainly stronger at the highest ranks, but any Psion below the Fifth Level will have to proceed with caution if they engage a Dolgrimite in combat. Every single Dolgrimite is physically powerful enough to slaughter a Demon Emperor, though they might come up a little short in terms of combat abilities. As for you, a Word of Power won't do you any good if your cloaking device runs out of energy and they spot you. They will tear your head off before you even realize what's happened."

"How much power does this thing have?" Jason asks.

"Enough." Unarin replies. "Perhaps one standard time unit's worth. That's why we had best move quickly. There's no time to waste, and this is far from the only thing I wish to show you."

Feeling a little miffed, Jason still relents, pressing the cloaking device against his chest, setting it underneath his T-REX. A faint humming sound buzzes in his ears, but aside from that, he doesn't notice any difference.

That is, until Unarin instantly vanishes from in front of his eyes.

Two seconds later, a faint outline of Unarin's body materializes beside Jason, projected digitally into Jason's eyes through the cloaking device's transmission field.

[We can see each other because we both wear the same model of device.] Unarin explains, his words transmitting into Jason's ear. [But any sounds we make will not escape the field, nor will any... body odors. I know you mud-dwellers are quite averse to bathing, so beware the Dolgrimites' sense of smell. They can detect your stench from ten clicks away.]

Jason scowls. [I shower just fine, asshole. Gotta say, I really did not think the First Founder would be such a dick.]

[You're lucky I am a tolerant man.] Unarin replies. [Were you one of my subordinates, I'd execute you on the spot for such an insult. But then again, I can't fault a mud-dweller for their crude words.]

Before Jason can spit out another retort, Unarin waves his hand.

[Come along! We've no time to waste.]

Jason swallows his venom, opting instead to growl, mumble, and curse under his breath as he exits through the Founder's Spear's side-hatch.

The Wordsmith steps foot onto Grimvolas's soil. The ashen dirt crunches under his feet, yet produces no noise, nor does he leave a footprint behind. The blackened soil appears devoid of life, like a desert, but packed a bit more firmly.

Without a word, the Wordsmith begins following Unarin, who leads the way.

With only a quarter of a kilometer to the mountain's base, it barely takes them three minutes to traverse the distance. Once they arrive at the bottom, Jason frowns. The distance to the top of the hill isn't too far, a mere half-kilometer, but he only sees one road leading up the mountainside, and multiple Dolgrimites patrolling it, their bodies moving swiftly as they jog up and down its length, traveling without leaving large gaps in their ranks.

[We're not using that road.] Unarin says. [The cloaking device contains an anti-gravity module. You will walk up the side of the mountain behind me.]

[It's that simple? Huh. Neat.] Jason mutters.

Under his breath, he mutters a Word of Power.

"Analyze."

He attempts to create a schematic of the device, but to his shock, his Word of Power rebounds, striking his Mind Realm and causing him to grit his teeth in pain.

"Rrrgh! Shit! What... what the hell..."

Unarin turns to look at the Wordsmith. [Do not attempt to copy my high technology. You will find your magic is… not as effective as you think it is.]

[What?!] Jason gasps. [You… you can stop my Wordsmithing? But how?!]

Unarin turns and begins walking up the mountain, forcing Jason to belatedly follow him.

[Do not forget, Wordsmith. You are neither the first Hero we have encountered, nor the first individual possessing magical abilities. Not by a long shot. We fought the Earthlings and gathered… valuable data. We have our ways.]

Jason's heart turns cold.

I don't understand. How can Unarin protect a device against my magic? Has he explored my powers in secret, somehow? Not possible! He only learned of my existence a scant few weeks ago! Even if my freaking wife was a Changeling, how could he learn the intricacies of my abilities in such a short period of time?

Fiona speaks up from within Jason's Mind Realm.

"Unarin already gave you a hint, Jason. It's not about your Wordsmithing in particular, but magical energy itself. It seems he's mastered some sort of counter to it. Perhaps to protect his technology from falling into the hands of us 'lesser species'?"

Yeah. That might be it… Jason thinks.

As they walk up the side of the mountain and approach its top, Jason fires off a question to Unarin.

[If you have these incredible stealth gadgets, why not just use them to uncover all the secrets in the galaxy? They seem pretty damn useful to me.]

Jason doesn't see Unarin's face, but perhaps if he were a human, he might roll his eyes.

[High Technology is not easy to create, Wordsmith. These cloaking devices are more expensive than you can imagine. Not to mention single-use. I had them specially created just for our little excursion today, and don't intend to commission more. Even if you knew how to make them, you would not be able to do so.]

That sucks the wind out of Jason's sails.

[…Well, alright.]

The Wordsmith falls silent as he and Unarin reach the top of the mountain. They slow their pace deliberately as they walk over the edge, reorienting their bodies to adjust to the change in gravitic direction. When they cross the threshold, they find themselves on an impossibly smooth mountaintop, one that appears to be made of melted obsidian.

Clearly smoothed and buffed by an unknown past force, Jason finds himself marveling at the glossy-glass surface. Its pitch-black color, with faint smoky white swirls of color, makes it resemble a vast abyss.

Around the plateau, hundreds of Dolgrimites pace around, taking their duties seriously. They do not talk. They only gaze around and sniff the air, keeping a wary eye out for intruders.

Jason says nothing, partially out of fear the cloaking device will let even a whisper of his voice slip. Unarin also says nothing, perhaps worrying about the same possibility.

The Dolgrimites aren't as big as I expected. Jason thinks. Only about six feet tall at the biggest. But lengthwise, their bodies are huge. Those tails look like they could snap a solid oaken tree in half with just one swing. And their heads... they remind me of miniature Godzillas! Like the reptilians Marie likes, but far more fearsome!

One of the Dolgrimites suddenly turns and looks directly at Jason, freezing the Wordsmith's blood solid. He nearly shits himself in fear, until the Dolgrimite roars something in an unknown language, and another Dolgrimite some distance behind Jason chuffs something in return.

When the Dolgrimite turns away, Jason's heartrate slows down drastically.

Thank god. He didn't see me... he was just... talking to one of his friends.

Jason quickly follows Unarin. The First Founder walks toward the center of the mountain, where not a single Dolgrimite stands.

[There is a portal here.] Unarin says, turning to look at the Wordsmith. He whispers his words, barely making a sound. [You cannot see it. Calling it a 'portal' is a bit of a misnomer. In fact, it is an invisible spatial tear. When we draw close, it will grab us and pull us into... a secret dimension.]

[THAT'S what you brought me here to see?] Jason asks, bewildered. [What's... what's even in this 'secret dimension'?]

Unarin smiles.

Without answering, he takes a few steps forward.

Then, he vanishes.

As if atomized at the atomic level, the First Founder disappears right in front of the Wordsmith's face, making his heart skip a beat.

...I really hope there aren't like a thousand Dolgrimites on the other side waiting to murderfuck me. Jason curses internally.

The Wordsmith grits his teeth. He takes one step forward.

Then another.

And one more...

The instant his third step concludes, the world flickers, and a new reality surrounds him.

Disoriented, the Wordsmith jerks his body slightly, startled by the unnervingly swift shift in scenery.

Before him, a world of rising mountains, dead forests, and scorched soil rests. Not too dissimilar from Grimvolas itself, what truly marks this world as different is the omnipresent darkness lingering in the air, a faint sense of melancholy and loss, along with some invisible gaseous substance that seems to absorb the light. No stars hang in the sky, nor is there a sun. Rather, a dim but omnipresent light envelops the world, something like a much less impressive version of Heaven.

Far in the distance, ruined castles and shattered towers of stone lay in ruins, resembling an ancient but powerful kingdom the likes of which he has never seen before. But crumbled and broken, as if having suffered a world-shattering calamity that annihilated every trace of life that once existed.

As Jason soaks in the sights, Unarin walks over to him, his stealth module deactivated.

"Turn your stealth off to conserve its energy." Unarin orders. "We'll still need them to get back to my ship."

Jason slowly nods. He pulls the module off his chest, and a faint hum swooshes past his ear before disappearing.

"Where is this?" Jason asks.

Unarin chuckles.

"You can't tell? Come now, Wordsmith. Surely, that Archangel friend of yours should know."

Jason blinks twice. He looks inside his Mind Realm, where he sees Raphael standing on alert, a look of shock on his face.

"How... how is this possible?" Raphael murmurs.

"Do you know this place?" Jason asks.

"...Indeed. Indeed, I do." Raphael murmurs, before closing his eyes. "Verily, I hath not seen it for many an age. And as for observing it in person, not once did I ever manage such a feat. Only through a few arcane tricks of mine was I able to gaze upon its ancient splendor and bewitching sights on a handful of occasions."

"But now..." Raphael continues, "'tis no more than a land of ruins."

The Archangel of Wisdom gazes at Jason's spiritual sense.

"This place is none other than..."

"...Valhalla! Spiritual realm of the fallen Titans!"

Part 390: Hopeful Arrival

Earlier that day.

Hope Hiro prepares his mind and body. He fully assumes the figure of an ordinary Changeling, a Second-Class Initiate Observer named Xainir. His face and head morph into a bald, bulbous skull with giant pitch-black eyes. He dons a standard white uniform, one that vaguely seems like something a human scientist might wear, albeit with several alien flourishes.

Then, he utters a Word of Power and disappears from the Ataraxia.

An instant later, Hope appears inside a place he picked out somewhere on Volgarius's surface. On the exact opposite side of the planet from the Founder's Five Fingers, as far away from the High Psions as he can get, so he can orient himself to their alien world.

The Wordsmith's clone materializes inside a random closet in the middle of the insanely packed urban block of Silus 16.1441A. With so many tens of millions of stratoscrapers scattered across Volgarius's surface, the planet does not actually have any distinct cities. Rather, it simply has regularly sectioned blocks of buildings all clumped together for various purposes.

Hope arrives at the bottom level of one such stratoscraper, just 200 meters below the planet's surface.

He steps out of the closet after making sure this particular room is clear. In Silus 16.1441A, Residential Facility 13, Room 577, Hope finds himself in a tiny little apartment lacking any sort of interesting decor or room for idle pleasures. The closet itself holds several bland, standard-looking Changeling uniforms, none of which possess even an ounce of character.

Perfectly pressed, spotless and clean, the uniforms in the closet speak of an individual who lives their life by the book. No fun. No joy. No personal hobbies or interests.

A slave to the Founders.

Hope takes in the room's sights. Its tiled floor and walls prove to be exceptionally sound absorbent, as he can barely hear anything outside the bedroom, even though he knows there are tens of thousands of other residential rooms in any direction he might look, if he were capable of peering through walls.

Hope glances inside his Mind Realm.

Unlike Jason, whose Mind Realm contains half a dozen other people and a whole bunch of information he's saved up over the years, thanks to his interactions with Solomon, Hope's Mind Realm is mostly empty. Inside, a few 'data centers' store the Atlas knowledge Hope obtained from scanning the Volgarius system. So thorough are his scans that he knows the exact distance to any location around him and how to navigate those hallways with his eyes closed.

However, sometimes, reality can be different from his mental simulations.

"Holy shit. It's... it's such a long distance to anywhere relevant. I'll have to walk for like ten miles just to get to the Volgrim's equivalent of a bus station. Maybe I should Wordsmith-teleport everywhere..."

As quickly as that thought comes, Hope casts it aside.

"I could feel someone locking onto me when I used my powers before. Best not to use them much unless absolutely necessary. I wonder if the signature I detected was Founder Dosena..."

Hope frowns deeply.

"The Volgrim might not be magically adept... but they are aware of how magic works. They observed humanity for millennia. They fought us at our best and crushed us, the angels, and the demons. I'd be a fool to think my Wordsmithing makes me untouchable..."

Hope rubs his smooth, alien chin, noting its somewhat glossy texture and its hints of moistness. He feels a little grossed out by his appearance, but he can't help acknowledging the superior visual acuity of Changeling eyes.

"I feel like Superman. I can 'zoom' my eyes in like a microscope, or out like a telescope. Changelings tend to act as spies, so they must possess impressive visual acuity for the sake of peeping in on their targets. And my hearing is a lot better too... if I were still in my human form, I wouldn't hear anything outside at all. The fact I can hear even distantly faint noises is a true testament to Changeling hearing capabilities..."

The more Hope learns about the limits of his temporary body, the warier he becomes.

"Changelings among the humans... it's a scary thought. We can't easily uncover their true identities, but they can spy on us with their superior biology. They might seem like mere body-shifters, but they're actually extremely talented at the art of skullduggery."

Hope spends some time in front of a Wordsmithed mirror, practicing his gait, his manner of speech, and otherwise perfecting his mimicry of Changeling attitudes and Volgrim speech. Through his magic, he perfectly masters the Volgrim language, a growly sort of screechy dialect substantially different from any human language, then erases the mirror from existence and nods.

"Alright. It's showtime."

Hope steadies his breathing. He walks toward the only door leading outside, and as he approaches, he detects a micro-burst of energy pulse over his body. The faintest tremble strikes his Mind Realm, and the door opens up.

Already prepared for this, Hope doesn't flinch. He understands that some sort of nebulous psionic-hybrid technology exists in vast quantities across Volgarius. Door handles and knobs don't exist. Instead, by reading the surface-level intentions of potential users, most technology can activate before the users even conjure the relevant commands in their heads.

The door slides open. As soon as it does, Hope gazes out at a bland hallway, where three Changelings immediately walk past his room, followed by two more.

He steps out of the apartment and finds himself amidst a ridiculously long underground tunnel complex with hundreds of doors on his right and left. Green lights run along the ceiling, giving the corridor's white walls a sickly vomit-colored hue.

Hundreds of Changelings live in this specific habitation zone. Hope smoothly turns to the right and merges into the flow of other Changelings. He steadies his nerves and assumes the same walking posture as the rest of them.

What first catches Hope off-guard is the lack of words being spoken. Momentarily worried he overlooked something in Xainir's memories, Hope realizes these Changelings aren't communicating telepathically, but instead... simply have nothing to say.

The eerie silence of the corridor makes Hope truly feel as if he has stepped foot onto an alien world. He follows along with the other changelings, barely flicking his field of vision around as he blends in with them. He observes the appearances of the aliens around him, as well as the soulless and empty way they seem to walk and go about their day.

Most Changelings have pale blue skin. However, some of them have green, red, or other colors instead. These seem to make up a minority of those in Hope's starting habitation block. Judging by Xainir's memories, that may simply be the case for certain blocks where specific 'types' of Changelings live, but the Wordsmith has no feasible way to confirm that hypothesis. At least not for the moment.

Hope shuffles along with the rest of his fellow Changelings. He walks for ten minutes, following his mental map to split away from the main group and head up transfer shafts wherever possible, lifting himself up to the planet's surface-level.

After exiting the underground biomes, Hope expects to see a change in scenery, but instead he finds that nothing has changed. The unbelievable drudgery of the Changeling living environments maintains itself to a frightening level of consistency. If he didn't possess such a perfect mental map, the young Wordsmith would have surely gotten lost a hundred different times!

This is ridiculous. Hope thinks. What a soul-crushing place to live. No trees. No greens. Nobody talking or having fun. If this is the pinnacle of galactic civilization, then all of sentient life should go extinct!

It takes a full hour before Hope makes it to the fiftieth floor of the living complex. All of a sudden, he emerges into a completely different, widely open space. Hope arrives at the first of countless floors that somewhat remind him of a giant mall from his era.

While nothing about the 'mall' appears beautiful, not by any means, it still possesses huge glass walls on all four sides, allowing Hope to look outside for the first time at the other identically-built stratoscrapers adjacent to his starting building. The large open areas still lack any plants or greenery, but Hope manages to clear away some of his claustrophobia.

Above Hope, thousands of Changelings fly around, using gravitically-modified clothing to levitate through the air. What surprises Hope the most is the fact that not one of the Changelings flying around has pale blue skin, like himself and the majority of others. Instead, only red, green, and yellow-skinned Changelings zip around, tending to their duties.

This causes Hope to inwardly frown.

Perhaps blue-skinned Changelings are the lowest class of their sub-species? The others might be higher-ranked ones?

What frustrates Hope the most is that the memories of the Changeling he copied are barely adequate for gathering intelligence on the Volgrim. Xainir was, in fact, a bottom-class Changeling with no notable merits. But using the identity of a higher-ranked Changeling might put Hope in great peril, especially if he were to slip up.

He quickly realizes that, given the chance, he should try to copy the memories of a higher-ranked Changeling.

The Wordsmith glances around, his lack of movement suspicious compared to the worker drones frenetically moving from place to place. After hesitating for just a moment, he begins walking toward one of the large 'stalls' near the massive glass windows.

The 'mall' area, as Hope has taken to calling it, has nothing to do with Earth malls. Instead, it's more of a hub for obtaining items relevant to the average Changeling, as well as procuring transportation to other places on Volgarius.

The Wordsmith makes his way to one of these transport divisions, where he encounters a long but quickly-moving line of Changelings, who slowly walk forward and pass through a fairly large scanning array. Hope watches as each Changeling holds a hand up, and a blue light washes across their palm for a split-second before they continue passing through to board air-busses, levi-trains, and other such vehicles.

Hope already knows the purpose of this terminal. Every Volgrim has a chip embedded in their palm, one which allows them to instantly verify their identity anywhere in the entirety of Volgrim-controlled space.

The Wordsmith finds this fact slightly amusing.

It wasn't so long ago there were conspiracy theorists on Earth thinking the government wanted to microchip them. Perhaps they weren't wrong about such a possibility after all. The aliens just beat us to the punch.

Having already created a perfect copy of Xainir's original chip, Hope proceeds forward and holds up his palm.

Beep.

The scanning device completes its cycle and allows him to proceed. Hope faintly exhales and continues walking forward, heading toward an awaiting hover-bus.

However, hardly has he taken five steps before a low-level Technopath steps out in front of him.

"Hold. We have detected an aberrance in your spatial coordinates, Changeling Xainir-1145."

Hope's heart skips a beat. However, he maintains a blank expression.

"This one does not understand." Hope says, his tone mellow and emotionless. "Has this one committed an error?"

"Negative." The Technopath says, viewing Hope with a complete lack of interest. "However, you were recorded as visiting Training Facility Kasmir-4 only five cycles ago. How have you managed to arrive back on this side of the planet so quickly?"

The Technopath officer pulls up a few holographic images and beams them in front of Hope's face, showing the logs of his last recorded position.

Shit! Hope thinks. What a rookie mistake! This is the sort of blunder only Jason would make! I still have more of that idiot in me than I thought! The original Xainir is still out and about traveling, so since our chips are the same, it likely brought up an irregularity in the system!

However, he maintains the same calmness on his surface as before.

"This one did not take the transport ship as originally intended. This one left the terminal early, as this one received a communication informing us of a change in our schedule."

The Technopath officer listens to Hope's lame excuse. He slowly blinks.

"Noted. In the future, make sure that you follow proper protocols. You may depart now."

Hope nods. "Understood. This one contemplates, and this one comprehends."

Hope politely bows, then turns and walks away, his heart relaxing as he manages to escape what could have been a troublesome situation.

I should consider changing my identity, just to be safe!

As Hope leaves and his hover-bus departs, that Technopath officer turns and heads back to his station. He arrives to sit next to a pair of Psions, both of them only at the Third Level, quite low-ranking as far as members of their species go.

[Anomaly?] One of the Psions, a black-skinned female asks.

"Yes. That Changeling claimed it had changed its mind and traveled along a different direction."

[Erroneous. They are clearly lying.]

"Agreed. Do you wish to pass the information along to Orator Pu'ul?"

The female Psion hesitates. She turns to look at the other Psion, a male with similarly-colored black skin. Both of them exchange a few telepathic words before she turns back to the Technopath and sighs.

[If you wish to report the discrepancy, you will have to fill out an Erroneous Method of Travel Report Ledger 1145C. Additionally, since it is likely Xainir-1145 lied about the matter, a standard Breach of Founder Courtesy Notice must also be filled out; take notice of pages 31 to 47 where you must explain in great detail how the courtesy was breached. And finally, due to the conflicting travel methods taken you must also fill out...]

The Psion fires off a bunch of mind-numbingly boring techno-jargon, none of which excites the other two in the slightest.

"Uh oh." The Technopath says, in a monotone voice. "I just remembered I have to report to Bus Bay 217B for standard maintenance calls. It seems I will not have the time to fill out these reports."

[I am much too busy maintaining order with the Transport District.] The female Psion adds. [Perhaps I will attend to the matter later.]

The male Psion beside her merely grimaces. [...It was not that big a breach of ethics. We will disregard the matter. If Xainir-1145 screws up again, it will be someone else's problem.]

"Noted."

[I think this is a fair outcome that respects the importance of our time.]

The three mid-level managers all quietly shove that discrepancy away and get back to their joyless work, giving no further thought to that strange anomalous Changeling.

Perhaps, even if they knew the truth behind his identity, they still wouldn't bother to say anything...

Meanwhile, Hope boards the hover-bus and takes off. He finds himself standing amidst a sea of other Changelings, all densely packed with no room to sit. Were the bus to suddenly fall from the sky and crash, every individual aboard would undoubtedly die due to the lack of any visible safety systems.

Good grief. Hope thinks, while surreptitiously glancing at the blank faces of the Changelings around him. It's like the world of Volgarius is a low-quality video game engine! All the NPCs look like they've been set to passive mode!

Hope checks the destination of this particular transit bus. It heads to a much more interesting locale, a conglomerate area where the Changelings, Technopaths, and Psions all interact in a much more meaningful manner.

I need to find Excalibur, the Dominion Rod, and Solomon's Crown, Hope thinks. But it would also be a good idea to examine the Volgrim and see how they function. How they live out their lives. Jason is going to meet with the head of Volgrimkind, Unarin, so I can't let myself fall behind him. Ignorance might be bliss, but it's not a quality any aspiring ruler should possess!

As for Jason... I wonder what my lesser half is up to. He should be reaching Volgarius soon. I did teleport ahead of him, but I've wasted so much goddamn time just traveling this labyrinth of buildings. Whoever designed these cities should be shot in the fucking face!

While Hope seethes to himself, his gaze happens to catch one of the Changelings aboard the shuttle. This particular individual is the only red-skinned alien aboard the craft, with all the rest sporting the same blue coloration as Hope's cover-body.

The red-skinned Changeling holds a small datapad in its hands. It watches as several data points display, some of which catch Hope's attention.

On the pad, a report plays out detailing the fall of a world to a Kolvaxian outbreak. In boring, plain numbers, the report displays that over seventy billion Volgrim ended up caught in the sudden outbreak. Fewer than half a percent managed to flee before the planet was fully overrun.

The red-skinned Changeling watches the report with the same apathy one might use if they discovered they had slightly burned their toast. A blue-skinned Changeling near the red-skinned one notices the report.

"Another world, fallen." Blue says, its words sounding particularly loud on the otherwise silent transit.

"Yes." Red says immediately, its tone lacking any emotion. "The third in the last ten cycles."

"Is it true the Founders are planning a new counter-measure against the Plague?" Blue asks.

"This one is only aware of a recent broadcast put out by the Founders." Red replies, turning to look at Blue. "This one is not privy to any special proceedings the Founders may choose to follow."

"Of course." Blue replies, bowing its head. "This one contemplates. This one comprehends."

The two of them finish their conversation within a short thirty seconds, making Hope sigh internally.

What a miserable exchange. It's like listening to two planks of wood talk about the trees that made them. There doesn't appear to be a hint of pity for the fallen among the Volgrim lower-ranks. They seem a little bit... different... from what I expected.

Hope tries to parse the impressions running through his head, but otherwise fails to do so.

The hover-bus swishes past thousands of identical-looking stratoscrapers, as well as perhaps millions of other vehicles racing through Volgarius's skies. These prove to be much more interesting to look at, and so Hope does just that. He examines all the different types of ships cruising around, finding himself admiring their varying styles and details.

It appears that countless different corporations construct the ships on this world. While the buildings are practically identical, the other buses, trains, and small-scale exocraft are quite different. Some of them are boxy and utilitarian, but others appear flashy and ritzy, drawing the eye. I wonder why there's such a stark difference in living spaces versus transportation vehicles?

Ignorant to the existence of the myriad of Technopath clans, Hope can only hazard guesses as to why the various technologies inherent in their craft make them appear so different from one another. Especially when placed against the backdrop of a frighteningly boring and lifeless world, the technological variances truly stand out.

Before long, his bus descends to a hangar mounted inside one of a thousand other generically identical stratoscrapers. As the hover-bus lands, Hope swallows discreetly, readying himself for the possibility of more things going wrong.

So far, so good. Other than that slight slip-up at the departure gate, not much has gone different from my plan. I'll just have to keep my eyes open while I scout around.

When the bus lands and Hope steps off, a brief, faint psionic sense sweeps across the newcomers.

As for what it finds, perhaps none may truly know...

Part 391: The Respected

Tarus II. At the base of the Lazarus Tower.

Two weeks after Jason and Kordonis take their leave to travel to Volgarius, the people he left behind don't remain idle. They continue working, building up humanity's base of power while also pursuing their long-term strategic goals.

Phoebe Hiro stands atop a recently constructed speaker platform, along with a pair of other women, those two being Belial and Blinker. The fairy queen stands at her human-sized height, having transformed for the sake of this special occasion.

Behind those three stand three powerful winged figures, the Archangels Uriel, Michael, and Gabriel. These three grant a certain legitimacy to the upcoming ceremony, one which over a million people gather to watch in person.

In front of the platform, the city's center stands jam-packed with humans and monsters, plus a few handfuls of allied demons. However, not one demon from the Seven Hells is allowed to watch in person, due to the significance of this ceremony; the revival of those who fell during Stormbringer.

The ceremony is not only viewable in person by almost a million people, but innumerable television screens strewn across Tarus II's surface allow all the others to watch, too. Already, enough aboveground and underground houses have been made for the humans to all have an abode of their own, plus tens of thousands more have been built, creating a huge circle of infrastructure around the Fortress of Retribution's outer perimeter. Many people stand inside of recently-built public areas, watching the proceedings and chattering excitedly as they wait for the Hero's Wife to begin.

Phoebe Hiro stands before the audience without a podium or a microphone. Thanks to Blinker's magic arrays, her voice can project to every corner of the audience evenly, so long as she stands in her current position. She wears a formal green dress, something slim but professional that makes her look like a true leader of humanity.

In the front areas of the audience, Neil Adams stands, along with General Chadwick and dozens of other important members of humanity's leadership. Among them is also Kiari, the Emperor of Pestilence. She smiles cutely and quietly waggles her fingers at Belial, who also exchanges a faint smile back.

"Everyone." Phoebe says, her voice projecting outward with an air of authority. "We have toiled for well over a month. Thanks to the efforts of countless humans, monsters, and our new allies among the demons, we have managed to rebuild Tarus II to be mightier than ever! We have enough housing not only for all the people who lived here before Stormbringer, but those who have joined us afterward. That includes all of our rescued friends from the Seven Hells!"

Several cheers go up among the crowd, most of them belonging to the rescued slaves who have begun to assimilate into the Wordsmith's world and rules.

"But until this moment, "Phoebe continues, "we have not been able to bring back those dearly departed who fell during Stormbringer. That changes today! Today, we will begin reviving the fallen at random. I have already posted the list of souls we've rescued, and as such, you already know who we can and cannot bring back."

Phoebe's voice lowers an octave.

"Many of us will once again see those who matter most to us. Others will not. My little girl, Daisy... she is not among the fallen. Her soul was destroyed by Beelzebub's detonation, along with the souls of countless others. Once we have finished reviving all of the fallen, we will take those who attacked us and put them to trial! Any demon or monster who followed Ose's orders will receive their moment of reckoning. Our punishments will be both fair and fitting. For those who killed, their punishment will be death! For those who tortured, raped, or mutilated one of ours, their punishment will only be slightly less permanent!"

Phoebe speaks with confidence, knowing the Hidden Emperors won't say anything in response. They are already aware of the punishments Ose's lackeys are due to receive. In their eyes, even if the formerly lauded Duke of Inferno ends up killed by the humans, so what? He isn't their minion. Even if he were, the loss of one Duke would prove trivial compared to their recent gains earned working for the humans.

Ultimately, sacrificing a few peons means nothing to them. Even if their prestige takes a minor hit, the memory will fade within a short period of time.

Phoebe continues.

"We still do not have enough houses to place all of the resurrected. Additionally, the amount of magical energy we can spend at a time is somewhat limited. For the sake of efficiency, I will have to resurrect people in groups, batches, and bunches. Resurrecting all of them at once would cost us more than we can afford, and so, I will have to ask all of you to continue tirelessly building homes for our soon-to-return veterans. They will be lost, confused, and disoriented by the revival process. Treat them lovingly, for their deaths allowed the rest of us to survive! They are heroes, just as much as our two Wordsmiths are!"

The crowd erupts in cheers again!

This time, many people become misty-eyed as they realize that, within the hour, they will be able to meet with their fallen brethren for the first time since their disappearances.

Unspoken by Phoebe are the words everyone already knows. More than a million people can never be brought back, as their souls fueled Mephisto's rise. He devoured the departed to boost his own strength.

Perhaps, Phoebe sighs, he may have even done the same to her daughter...

Phoebe lightly touches her womb, where the stirrings of a new life continue to grow. She smiles faintly, then continues with her speech, delivering a few final remarks before turning to face the center of the platform.

She, Belial, and Blinker stand on one side of the platform. The three Archangels stand on the other side.

A flash of light surges from the base of the Lazarus Tower upward, racing to its peak. The moment it arrives, it fires into the upper atmosphere, transforming into a beam of blue light.

All at once, a hundred beach-ball-sized orbs of mana rush out of the stream of energy. They fall to the ground below and lightly explode, revealing two-armed, two-legged figures within.

Naked men, women, and children materialize, with some of them on the stage, and some of them within the crowd. Audible gasps and screams of excitement erupt within the mass of people as they watch the crouched figures rise to their full heights, confusion apparent on their faces.

"Where am I?"

"What's happening?"

"Did we win against the demons?"

"Are the bad people gone?"

These first hundred Revived Ones, not quite the Lazarites of ancient times, but newly Arisen, have already been given an official name by Phoebe.

The Respected.

As veterans who lost their lives in service of humanity, they revive with brand new, powerful bodies, significantly superior to those they possessed when they previously walked the mortal plane. Empowered by the knowledge of Raphael and the ingenuity of Fiona, Blinker, and Belial, every single one of these people, even the children, return to the realm of the living with bodies capable of crushing steel with their bare hands.

While lacking angelic wings, they are, in every other respect, just as strong as the ancient Lazarites, if not mightier!

One man rises to his full height of six feet. His muscled body, naked and on full display to the crowd, causes a few gasps of delight not only among the ladies, but even some of the men, too.

Hurriedly, people wrap blankets around the bodies of The Respected. As they struggle to understand what is going on, Phoebe speaks from her central platform.

"Everyone! Remember your duty. You must inform The Respected of their new status, their abilities, and the goings-on that have transpired since their deaths. Show them the List of the Fallen so they may know who is next to return. This next phase rests in your hands!"

With the ceremony concluded, Phoebe activates the Lazarus Tower's internal mechanisms, allowing it to spawn more of The Respected as its energy reserves allow, on a regular schedule of a few thousand every several hours.

Then, she steps off the stage and takes her leave, heading through the crowd of onlookers while Belial and Blinker follow after her. At the same time, the Archangels take to the skies and fly away, heading back to their church to rest.

"Great speech!" Blinker chirps. "You did so good, I almost wanted to cry!"

The three women walk through the crowd, smiling politely at the people that spread apart for them, allowing their leader to escape the throng as she wishes.

"It was just a speech." Phoebe says. "No big deal."

Phoebe glances up at the sky, as if waiting for Jason to speak to her. However, he is still busy dealing with the First Founder. He won't be contacting her anytime soon.

After they depart the crowd, Phoebe and the girls walk over to Yamir's restaurant, where his protégés set them up with a private booth on the top floor and serve them anything they want. While Yamir himself is off on business with Jason, his secondary chefs are quite talented too and can cook up some delicious seafood, caught fresh from Tarus II's abundant seas.

Belial, who usually doesn't partake in human food, munches on a few fried fish, savoring the beer-battered taste and momentarily enjoying this little bit of human goodness.

"What next?" Belial asks. "Once everyone's brought back, I mean. There's the Stormbringer Tribunal, but then what?"

"After that..." Phoebe says, in between bites, "we will continue making incremental progress. I want to develop the Cube so it can become a viable home for humanity. I don't feel safe, having all of our people and assets on Tarus II's surface. Forgive me for being blunt, but I just don't trust those Hidden Emperors. Hope still isn't back yet, so who knows if he's caught Yama and Mephisto or not..."

Seeing the troubled look on Phoebe's face, Blinker quickly changes the subject.

"Did you hear? My fairy friends showed up a couple of days ago. You remember Fairy Queen Fae? Well her daughter came here, like I hoped she would! Her name is Fairy Princess Melia. She also brought along a pair of friends, Saria and Ruto. They aren't princesses or anything, but they are her talented retainers. Each of them is an expert in different sorts of fairy magic."

"Oh, that's good to hear." Phoebe says. "Did they get to look at Amelia's idea for a soul-training formation yet?"

"Not yet. Actually, I've been having them look at the formations linking Tarus II to the cube." Blinker says. "Ruto is quite good at water-type formations, so she's already made some gains in improving the aquatic biome formation. Saria is working on the forest one, and Melia has simply been helping me deal with my baby-pains. It turns out I'm going to have triplets!"

"Triplets!" Phoebe exclaims with a smile. "When do you think you'll have them?"

"Right about the same time as you'll have yours." Blinker says. "We can raise our children together!"

"I'm sure Jason would like that." Phoebe laughs.

They continue eating their food and talking, but at some point, a man wearing a simple blue uniform strides upstairs and looks around, eventually placing his eyes on Phoebe's private booth, isolated by a magical barrier to protect her privacy.

He walks over and steps through the barrier, then drops to one knee.

"Lady Phoebe! I am... I am so glad to see you alive!"

Phoebe blinks in surprise. She glances at the man's earnest face and tries to puzzle out his identity.

"You look familiar but..."

"Forgive me! It is normal you would not recognize me. My name is Reginald. I was one of the troopers who accompanied you during Stormbringer."

"One of the troopers who accompanied me..." Phoebe repeats while frowning slightly. "Umm... I'm afraid I don't quite remember."

"That is understandable, my lady. I was tasked with protecting you after you had fallen comatose. Remember? You fought on the frontlines against the demons for two days and nights before ultimately collapsing to exhaustion. Myself and nineteen other troopers were tasked with rescuing and delivering you and your daughter to the last remaining Covenant ship. You were unconscious the whole time, so you never had a chance to meet me..."

Reginald pauses.

"But that isn't important. What is important is... I was just revived through the Lats-Zarus Tower, or whatever you call it. I just learned that your little girl was killed! Please forgive me, my lady. We could not protect her from that vile, evil demoness! I do not deserve to live!"

"Vile, evil demoness?" Phoebe repeats. "Ose is dead. There's no more need to bother with her. As for my daughter... sigh... she was not killed by Ose, but by Beelzebub. He will soon be tried for his war-crimes against our people."

Reginald pauses for a half-second.

"Ose? Beelzebub? No, no, I am not referring to either of them. I am referring to that vicious beast in female form! She attacked us from the darkness, struck down all of my fellow soldiers! Daisy tried to protect you, but she was too weak. I was too weak. We all were! I thought that she was the one who killed your daughter, but... perhaps I was wrong?"

Phoebe glances at Belial.

"Do... you know who he's talking about?"

Belial shrugs. "No clue."

Reginald frowns repeatedly, but an invisible light bulb pops up above his head.

"Ah! That's right! She was able to morph the appearance of her body. First, she took the form of a werewolf, one with fearsome strength. Then she transformed into a golden dragon. I don't know her identity, but I'll never forget the sound of her voice. Can you think of any demonesses capable of shifting their figure in such a manner?"

Belial frowns deeply. "Well, me, of course. But transformation into monsters isn't particularly rare. Agares could do it, plenty of other demons could too. Though, admittedly, turning into any sort of a dragon-variant would be pretty rare..."

Phoebe taps her chin. "I still have all the footage saved from every trooper's T-REX during Stormbringer. Yours would surely be in there, Reginald. What's your suit's command code?"

The man nods. He quickly spits out a flow of numbers and letters, which Phoebe types into a datapad at her side. A minute later, she pulls up all of its audio and video files, particularly the ones leading up to and just before his death.

For the first time, Phoebe observes a battle which took place during Stormbringer, one she overlooked until this very moment.

"That's Daisy?" Phoebe asks, visibly alarmed. "What incredible power... she actually managed to fight back against that demoness! But who is she? And why does her voice sound so familiar?"

Hardly have the words left Phoebe's mouth before Belial's eyes widen.

"Tarot card! She called out the name of a tarot card!"

"She did." Phoebe nods. "But... the only powerful demoness I can think of who is capable of doing such a thing would be..."

All at once, Belial, Phoebe and Blinker all look at one another in shock.

"...Mara!"

A wave of disgust washes across the Wordsmith's Wife's face. She sets the datapad down, visibly sickened by what she's just uncovered.

"Oh... oh my god. She killed Reginald, and all the other troopers who were protecting me. She nearly killed me, and Daisy too! That... that evil witch! How could she remain silent, all this time?!"

Belial appears even angrier. Hatred seethes within her chest.

"BITCH! That little BITCH! I... I gave her a power-up! I let her be the first to try out the Belial Booster! I made her a Duke, and she actually had the AUDACITY to take my gift while laughing at me from behind?!"

As if realizing something, Phoebe pulls up even more images from that period of time during Stormbringer. She triangulates Mara's position before she attacked Reginald and the other soldiers, then cross-compares them with troopers and other people who perished around that time.

Before long, she discovers something that makes her heart drop into the soles of her feet.

"Oh my god. Oh... oh my god."

"What is it?" Blinker asks, slightly panicked. She looks at the datapad in Phoebe's grasp, but can't make heads or tails of the map and diagrams it shows.

"The... the last covenant ship. Someone reported an unknown demonic entity attacked it. I wasn't able to uncover the perpetrator... but if I'm right... it was Mara! She destroyed the ship and killed hundreds of thousands of innocent civilians. There were... so many children on board..."

The table falls completely silent as Phoebe, Belial, Blinker, and Reginald imagine the last moments of those poor people before they were annihilated in an explosion of lightning and hellfire.

Belial stands up.

An expression of malice and hatred stretches across her face.

"Give me one hour. I'll find her. I'll teach that... that little bitch the meaning of fear."

"Wait." Phoebe says, sobering up. "I'm coming with you. Blinker, you too. Reginald, you've done enough. Thank you for your service."

"I haven't done nearly enough!" Reginald cries, beating his chest with grief. "The little miss... I wasn't able to protect her! Let me put this new body to some good use! Let me hunt down that witch who killed my friends!"

"We're not going to 'hunt her down.'" Phoebe says sternly. "She has to stand trial for her evils. We have to root out the full extent of her villainy. Only then can the dead receive their justice."

After a momentary pause, she adds, "But yes, you can come along. Your testimony will solidify our case against her."

"Thank you, lady Phoebe! I... I will not let you down! I will atone for my failure for the rest of my life, if that is what it takes."

Phoebe sighs. "You did not fail me, Reginald. You fought valiantly against an enemy who towered above you in power. Frankly, if I had given you better equipment, you might have been able to perform far better. Therefore, the fault lies with me."

"It's neither of your fault." Belial says abruptly, her tone curt. "It's Mara's fault. Don't try and act like there's anyone at fault but her. She lied to us. She attacked and tried to kill you. There is no punishment harsh enough for the likes of her..."

Not wanting to delay their response any longer, Phoebe simply nods.

"Alright. Let's go. Blinker, we'll have to meet your fairy friends afterward. Sorry about that."

"It's fine." Blinker says. "They'll understand."

The three women and Reginald get up and leave, allowing the staff from Yamir's kitchen to clean up after them.

Mara's day of reckoning will soon arrive...

Part 392: Valhalla's Daughter

"We cannot stay in Valhalla for long." Unarin says, shooting a pointed glance at the Wordsmith. "This is a world which is hostile to biological life forms. Within just fifty-three of your Terran-minutes, the dimensional space will eject us back to the surface of Grimvolas, right in front of that horde of Dolgrimites. You do not want to suddenly appear in front of them. They startle easily."

Jason and Unarin begin to walk deeper into the Titan's Realm, the land they once lived in, following the deaths of their bodies. Seeing the crumbled buildings, fallen castles, and mountains covered in debris, the Wordsmith feels waves of emotions sweep across him as he recalls the few instances he's observed Titans such as Ivaldi living here.

Now, she and all the others are fully dead in mind, body, and soul.

"Fifty-three minutes." Jason repeats. "What happened here? Why are all of the ancient Titans dead? And how did the entrance to Valhalla happen to end up on your old homeworld?"

Unarin picks up the pace, walking deeper into the realm much faster than before, forcing Jason to break into a light jog.

"It happened not too long after the conclusion of the Energy Wars." Unarin says. "A terribly cataclysm opened up in the space around Grimvolas. Violent spatial storms rocked the world, killing countless Dolgrimites and other creatures living in this system. They send an emergency broadcast to me, and I dispatched several High Psions, including the Second Founder herself. But by the time we arrived, the storms had ended. They spent several orbital cycles stabilizing the space while searching for the cause of the disturbance."

The First Founder pauses for a brief moment.

"...Then, they found the flattened mountaintop which you and I used to enter Valhalla. We weren't certain what happened, but clearly there was a violent battle which took place within Valhalla's confines. The space ruptured and sheared away the entirety of the mountain's peak, glassing its surface and turning it into a portal from which others could enter and exit at will."

"So there was a huge battle." Jason says, glancing around at the ruined world.

Small amounts of withered plants, moss, and other greenery grow amidst the crevasses, but with almost no light to create photosynthesis, the world clearly appears to be on its last legs.

"Do you know who was involved in the battle?" Jason asks.

"I do not." Unarin replies. "It is an ongoing mystery. However, one thing was abundantly clear."

The First Founder turns to look at the Wordsmith, a gleam of menace in his eyes.

"Whatever or whoever killed the Titans, they left Grimvolas before my Psions could locate the tear in space. When we arrived, all we found was the aftermath of the battle."

Unarin holds up his hand. A projection fires from his palm, instantly rebuilding several distant structures through augmented reality holograms, restoring Valhalla to a surprisingly pristine state.

"We've had tens of millennia to reconstruct what this realm once looked like." Unarin explains. "As best as we can tell, it was a world of primitive-looking but well-built structures reinforced with magic. When Titans died, their souls traveled here in a manner not too dissimilar to that 'Lazarus Tower' the angels used. We suspect the Archangels 'borrowed' the idea from some ancient Titan."

Jason glances into his Mind Realm, but Raphael remains stoically silent, saying nothing.

"So, something happened inside Valhalla's space. Some sort of... civil war?" Jason asks Unarin. "Or was it, perhaps, a foreign invader? Someone who found the entrance and broke inside? Perhaps... the Kolvaxians?"

"There is no evidence the Kolvaxians know this place exists, or that they ever did." Unarin says. "After all, the first Kolvaxian outbreak occurred several centuries after the battle that occurred here."

The First Founder spends a few minutes traveling with Jason as quickly as possible until they reach the largest of the crumbled castles. There, Jason frowns as he picks up a faint magical sensation.

"Hm?"

The Wordsmith pauses. He glances around, from left to right, searching for that strange, familiar sense tickling the back of his brain.

"Have you found something?" Unarin asks, his eyes locking on the human's face. "We never did directly uncover the identity of the entity responsible for Valhalla's destruction... but we have our suspicions. Perhaps you could... confirm them for me."

Jason frowns. He realizes Unarin is manipulating him, trying to use the Wordsmith's special abilities to uncover some past, historical secrets. However, try as he might, Jason can't quite identify the strange magical sensation tugging at his brain.

"It's like... it's like there's a scent in the air..." Jason mutters. "Something I've smelled before. Or perhaps it's more of a feeling. Either way... it's eerily familiar..."

Fiona, sensing the world through Jason, also frowns deeply. She closes her eyes and concentrates, pursing her lips while occasionally stealing glances at Raphael.

For a brief minute, Unarin and Jason remain standing before the broken and shattered castle. Unable to tolerate the nagging feeling in the back of his mind, Jason decides to try Wordsmithing.

"Replay!"

Not entirely sure of what will happen, Jason decides to try and reconstruct the image with his magic.

Instantly, a thousand Psions materialize in the space around him, starting Jason to the point he nearly shits himself. Even Unarin jerks in alarm, only to quickly calm down when his vision passes through the ethereal bodies of his fellow Volgrim.

"What are you doing?!" Unarin roars. "Do not activate magic without informing me first!"

Jason grimaces. "Oh, that's rich, coming from Mister "I Love Surprises!" I just thought I'd try and reconstruct the past; see if I could determine whatever attacked Valhalla."

Unarin blinks. "Oh? So you can do something like that."

"I've never tried it before," Jason replies, before quickly adding, "hold on, what do you mean? You already theorized I could do something like this?"

"Of course. Is it not obvious?" Unarin scoffs. "Reconstructing scenes of the past. Peering into the future. Don't tell me you've never even tried. What sort of imbecile would not immediately wish to attempt such a feat, given your power-set?"

The Wordsmith feels momentarily angry at Unarin, but that feeling turns to a faint feeling of shame as he realizes neither he nor Solomon never considered such a thing.

Or then again, Jason correct himself, perhaps Solomon did but never thought to run the idea past me...

The Wordsmith shakes those useless thoughts from his head. He glances around at the magical images of Psions flying in the skies and frowns. "What sort of scene is this?"

"I can't say for certain." Unarin replies. "On many occasions, I've sent legions of Psions here to investigate Valhalla's destruction. I always hoped someone might be able to uncover the perpetrator of the attack. But since they can only exist inside Valhalla's space for one standard time unit, they're rarely able to uncover anything of note."

Jason parses Unarin's explanation while gazing at the ruined city before him.

"So... I seem to have pulled a random image from the past to our reality. Um. Let me try again, then. Replay!"

He repeats his previous Word of Power. Instantly, the Psion apparitions vanish. In their place, nothing appears.

"...Blank?" Jason questions. "That's weird. Replay!"

Once again, nothing visibly seems to change, aside from some shifting of rocks on the ground.

"What are you attempting to do?" Unarin asks. "Surely, you should be able to call forth a projection of the great battle?"

"My Wordsmithing is usually pretty convenient..." Jason says. "But this time... I don't know. I'd need to know the exact date, I think. I'm just calling up random dates. Even saying '85,000 years ago' isn't all that specific. You said there was a period of three years where the spatial storms ravaged Grimvolas, right? That's three years out of one hundred thousand. It's like looking for a needle in a haystack."

"I could tell you the exact date." Unarin offers. "But I am afraid the way we Volgrim calculate time is... a little different from how you humans calculate it. I suspect this will only be a waste of energy."

"Yeah. Probably." Jason acknowledges. "But, still. I have this nagging feeling. I've felt the mana fluctuations in this region of space before. And recently, too. Not long ago..."

Hardly have those words left Jason's mouth before his mind-wife jerks in shock.

"That's... that's it! I've felt them too! But much stronger! It was... inside the Cube!"

Jason turns his attention inward.

[Inside the Cube?]

"That's right!" Fiona exclaims, a hint of horror in her voice. "Don't you remember? It was that energy inside the Container. The draconic energy! This mana you and I are sensing, it's extremely similar to the power a dragon might emanate!"

[A dragon!] Jason exclaims, feeling the same rush of excitement and fear Fiona is feeling. [But how can that be? Wasn't the dragon inside of the Container... wasn't it Leviathan? I thought he broke out eons ago and escaped to Earth?]

Jason turns to Raphael, and his gaze hardens.

[Don't fuck with me, Raphael! What the hell is going on? Surely, you of all people, should recognize the aura of a dragon well before Fiona and I! Why aren't you saying anything?!]

The Archangel of Wisdom frowns deeply.

"Verily, if this aura is that of a dragon, then dost thou not understand what that means, Jason? Leviathan ended up within the Black Queen. Thou saweth it perish with thine own eyes. If a dragon escaped from the Cube, but did so after Earth's destruction... then that can only mean one thing. Its identity... 'twas not Leviathan, but another dragon entirely."

Jason's heart shakes violently. In his mind's eye, a series of possibilities plays out, each of them worse than the other.

[That can't be right. Leviathan was the last dragon. He said so himself! When his mother perished, when Jörmungandr fell, he spoke in those visions as if he was the last one left!]

Raphael's expression turns gloomy.

"Dost thou thinketh the Earth's dragon knew all? Indeed, were it the last one alive, its mother's death would have empowered it tremendously. But what if there was not one dragon still alive, but two? What if Leviathan's death passed on the remainder of his draconic power to the dragon within Camael's Cube, granting it the strength to break free of its seals? Could that not explain how it broke free of the encirclement of no fewer than eight Primordial Artifacts?"

Raphael's words call forth the very fears lurking in the back of Jason's mind. Indeed, he too imagines such a possibility, but hearing Raphael speak the words makes him feel terrified beyond belief.

[What, so now there's a fucking dragon out there, somewhere, on the loose?! When exactly did it break free? Why did it attack Valhalla? And where is it now?!]

Fiona's expression turns ugly.

"Jason. The timing of all this... it's too coincidental. Think about it."

Unarin frowns, but says nothing as he sees several flickers of emotion flash across the Wordsmith's face. It doesn't take much for the First Founder to deduce that Jason has uncovered something, and so, he remains silent, allowing the Wordsmith to communicate with the Archangel of Wisdom, as Unarin has no doubt he is doing.

[What are you talking about?] Jason asks Fiona, only to immediately blink his eyes in alarm. [Wait, don't tell me... the Kolvaxians...]

"That's right." Fiona says, gnashing her teeth. "The Kolvaxians seem to have shown up about 15,000 years after Earth's destruction. Unarin said the battle for Valhalla happened before they first attacked. It seems likely the dragon... it might be the one creating these Kolvaxians. It might be the puppeteer in all of this!"

[We don't know that for sure.] Jason says, lifting his eyes to look at Unarin. He flinches when he sees the First Founder's calm, cold smile.

"It seems you've figured something out." Unarin says. "Let's hear it. I am supremely interested in seeing whether your theory is at all similar to mine."

"What is your theory?" Jason asks. "You go first."

"Jason, Jason..." Unarin says slowly, his voice soft like a leaf on the breeze. "I have shown you so much, and spoken so candidly for your benefit. Don't you think it's your turn to speak up? I have acted genuinely, yet always, you seem to believe it is my job to feed you information. I think it's time you took a more active role, yes? Illuminate this poor old Volgrim on the details he's missed."

The Wordsmith wants to protest. He even thinks about doing it, in spite of knowing the First Founder is manipulating him. Unarin hasn't shown Jason anything that would make himself suffer a loss. He has plenty to gain and little to lose if Jason becomes aware of a few important secrets.

Furthermore, telling Unarin such a critical piece of information might let him fill in the blanks of other information he possesses but Jason doesn't! It would only advantage him further, no matter how he pretends to be oblivious and ignorant.

Unarin has probably guessed a dragon was involved... Jason thinks. Maybe he just wants to confirm his suspicions...?

"Take your time, take your time..." Unarin says, fanning out his fingernails. "We still have, oh, about twenty of your Terran-minutes before this dimension ejects us out in front of those raging Dolgrimites. That's practically an eternity, wouldn't you say?"

Jason scowls. "Let me ask you a question first. The battle in this dimension, or the first Kolvaxian appearance. Which occurred first?"

Unarin slowly opens and closes his eyes. "Why do mud-dwellers always possess such short memories? I told you already. First came the turbulence in Grimvolas's dimensional subspace. Then, some centuries later, the Kolvaxians first attacked. Oh, but it does seem as if you think... they might be related?"

Jason sighs heavily. "...I do. I think the attacker here was... it was a dragon. A dragon attacked Valhalla and killed all the Titans."

Unarin frowns.

"A dragon, you say?"

"Yes." Jason answers. "Doesn't that align with what you thought?"

The First Founder glances past Jason, at the crumbling castles. "Well, actually, I thought it might be... oh, never mind. It seems my guess was just random noise. Your inference clearly has more substance behind it. But what made you think a dragon was at fault here?"

Jason blinks several times, bewildered. "Wait, so you didn't think it was a dragon? Who was YOUR chief suspect?"

"Now, now," Unarin says, waving his hand casually. "I asked a question first. It is considered polite to defer to your elders, young mud-dweller. What makes you think the creature that attacked Valhalla was a dragon?"

Jason sucks in a shallow breath.

Shit. I can't tell if Unarin is fucking with me. Did he think it was a dragon after all? Is he lying to me? Or is he trying to uncover more of my secrets? He probably doesn't know about the Cube yet... and I absolutely should not give him any evidence for its existence. But what if he thought something other than a dragon was responsible? Or maybe he's pretending that's the case! Maybe he had a bunch of random guesses, or maybe he already knows the truth for sure! Ahhh, this is so frustrating! I feel like a mouse being swatted back and forth by a tiger!

The Wordsmith swallows heavily. "Raphael gave me some hints. The dark miasma in the air is similar to a dragon he once knew. That is why he suspected a dragon was the entity which slaughtered the Titans."

Unarin lifts his hand and rubs his chin. He falls deep into thought before slowly nodding.

"...I suppose that is a sensible answer."

"Right!" Jason presses. "So why are you acting like you thought someone, or something else was at fault? What aren't you telling me?"

The Highest Ascended rolls his eyes melodramatically. "Oh, Wordsmith. Please, you don't want to hear the idle ramblings of a senile old Volgrim like me. I was so far off the mark, it was frankly embarrassing. Yes, I think you are right. A dragon was indeed at fault. As for whether or not it truly was, well... I do have something else to show you."

Jason fully intends to press Unarin for more information, but the wily Volgrim leader smoothly guides him to a new train of thought.

"Do you currently believe that all the Titans were killed?"

Jason's heart skips a beat.

"What? They weren't? Some still live?"

"Why yes." Unarin says. "In fact, we're not far from one of them now. Before our time in Valhalla runs out, follow me, and do so quickly. You do not want to miss this..."

Jason doesn't get a chance to respond. Unarin suddenly bolts away, running toward the huge, crumbled castle with reckless abandon. Jason tries to give chase, but he finds that his speed is nowhere near Unarin's level! As an Ascended, Unarin's physical power is truly monstrous. His strength and speed aren't too dissimilar from a Silver Age Superman!

"Wings!" Jason shouts, sprouting angelic wings from his back.

He flaps them with great gusto and races after Unarin, who merely glances over his shoulder and chuckles.

"Keep up, Wordsmith! Our time is running out!"

Unarin's feet barely touch the ground. With each kick, jump, and forward push, he launches himself forward across the rocky and uneven terrain at a speed that, frankly, frightens Jason.

[Look at how fast Unarin can run!] Jason exclaims. [Is this the power of an Ascended? Is he an average specimen? A superior one? He could rip a tank in half with his bare hands, if his leg-strength is anything to go by!]

"He is indeed quite alarming." Fiona notes. "But... don't underestimate our Respected. We might not be too far behind. Humanity has a lot of room to grow."

Minutes later, Unarin charges into a collapsed tunnel, finally slowing his pace as he waits for the Wordsmith to catch up.

"Hurry!" Unarin shouts. "We've less than ten Terran-minutes before Valhalla ejects us!"

Jason follows after Unarin, landing and absorbing his wings back into his body. The two of them break into a light jog as Unarin guides Jason through the interior of Valhalla's largest collapsed castle.

Huge columns of stone, unfathomably large and heavy, stick out of the ground, their mid-sections shattered by some ancient force.

Jason eyes them coldly.

A dragon could have easily caused all this devastation, for sure.

They encounter a staircase where each individual step elevates more than twenty feet high. Slightly embarrassed, Jason regrows his wings and flies up the stairs, while Unarin easily leaps up them, following after the Wordsmith for once.

They pass through one hall after another, barely giving Jason time to glance at the moss-covered artwork etched into the walls, depicting ancient battles the scale of which he can barely imagine.

"Valhalla..." Jason murmurs.

As the realm of not just any Titans, but the mightiest of all their Kings and Queens, this realm contains countless works of art that would be priceless even if they were only ten percent intact. Even so, the Volgrim have not removed them, but left them here to rest in peace.

"The architecture of the Titans is truly astounding." Unarin idly says, while they run through the halls. "They built monuments from manaforged stone that would put many superior Volgrim alloys to shame. For their castles to have crumbled to this extent, perhaps only a cataclysmic war with a dragon might have caused such a result..."

"They weren't in their true bodies." Jason observes. "The Valhalla Titans were only remnant souls."

"Remnant souls, yes. But they still possessed power aplenty, more than enough to smite the likes of a mere mud-dweller civilization." Unarin chuckles.

Jason ignores the slight. He raises his eyes when he sees a blue light in the distance, one which appears impossibly bright compared to the dark, miasma-tinged rest of Valhalla.

"We're here." Unarin says, slowing his gait. The First Founder drops to a casual trot as he and the Wordsmith approach a great hall, one with words carved into the ceiling which Jason cannot read. The language appears alien, like a dialect spoken by beings of immense power. Just gazing at the words causes his eyes to sting.

"Your soul is not powerful enough to endure reading those words." Unarin warns. "Don't test your abilities. You'll only turn into a mute idiot, as several of my top researchers did."

"Thanks for the heads-up..." Jason mutters.

The two men step into the great hall, and Jason finally sees the source of the blue light. A barrier of energy, both psionic and magical in nature, envelops a towering eighty-foot-tall Titaness laying on her back, someone dressed in beautiful white robes, with a wreath of purple flowers around her brow.

The Titaness appears truly gorgeous, to the point that when Jason takes to the air to get a better look at her, he feels a pang in his heart at her pitiful appearance. Her eyes remain shut, as if sealed by the firmest bonds. Her arms lay lifelessly at her side. Even the rising and falling of her chest is barely visible to him when he stares with his full attention.

Her dark black skin, bright golden hair, and long fluttery eyelashes reveal her to be a heart-stopping beauty, someone the ancient Titan Kings must surely have fought to protect, or to covet...

Unarin lightly leaps atop a pedestal nearby the Wordsmith's hovering figure.

"Beautiful, isn't she?" Unarin asks. "A wonderful specimen. The pinnacle of her species... and the last living Titan my people know to exist."

Jason glances at Unarin. "What? The last one? Didn't you imply there were others?"

The First Founder slowly shakes his head. "Others? No. This woman is the last living member. Oh, we do have remnants of a few soul-bodies. Incorporeal vessels lacking any spirit. But this woman here... she is the last living member of her species. The only one still remaining."

Unarin pauses.

"When we found her, she was at death's door. Barely able to speak, barely able to think. Terrible wounds covered her figure. As a soul-body, we could not transport her from Valhalla without killing her. Here she had to remain, unless someone else were to bestow upon her a viable treatment method."

"But..." Unarin adds. "Before she fell into the coma you now see... we were able to obtain a few precious words from her lips. Her name. Her identity."

Unarin's tone turns grave.

"She was the daughter of the Allmother, Odin. She was heir to the Titan throne. The second strongest of her kind..."

"And her name was..."

"...Ramma."

Part 393: Dolgris Guides Us

Jason and Unarin fly and stand at a high vantage point so that they can gaze down upon the comatose body of the Titaness known as Ramma, daughter of the Allmother. At eighty-feet-tall, she is massive, roughly double the size of Zeus during the Ancient Era.

When Jason looks at the giant before him, he doesn't see much resemblance to Odin. This slightly perplexes him. He ignores the discrepancy, focusing instead on the shock that a real-life Titan still exists in the material realm.

"You're telling me she's the very last one?" Jason asks. "No others exist?"

"None that we know of or have observed." Unarin mutters. "We have a few other partially intact bodies. But no souls or functioning minds."

"Why is she in a coma?" Jason asks. "And why can't the illustrious Volgrim Empire awaken her?"

"We have reason to believe the Titans in Valhalla were preparing to complete an important project." Unarin explains. "There were many signs that they had a prototype built that could transform their souls into functioning physical vessels that could leave Valhalla and return to the physical realm. Unfortunately, or perhaps fortunately depending on who you ask, they failed in their designs. We believe a few low-level Titans from Valhalla may have left and traveled to Earth during the Energy Wars. However, they were not quite at the level of branching out to the rest of their high-level members."

He continues. "In any case, Ramma here was set to be the most important asset the Allmother sent back to the physical realm. They placed many of their hopes on her, their protections too. When the... unidentified aberrant... the 'dragon' as you claim, attacked Valhalla, it slaughtered every Titan except for her. Even so, she suffered grievous wounds to her soul."

"We Volgrim are not all-powerful." Unarin states. "When it comes to the 'magic' your species practices, we are not particularly adept at deciphering it. As for the nature of souls, we are also inept at uncovering their mysteries. Souls are simply too ethereal, too difficult to observe and study."

"I hear that Psions don't even have souls." Jason says, glancing at Unarin carefully. "There's a ginger joke somewhere in there that I could make, but I'm not mean enough to do such a thing."

Unarin casually ignores Jason's comment.

"We're out of time. We've a minute left, at best. It seems your casual use of Wordsmithing has made us more intangible in this dimensional space. Activate your Stealth Module now."

Jason nods. He activates the device Unarin gave him, then frowns. "How do you know, anyway? Nothing seems different."

"You can't sense the change in 'pressure'?" Unarin asks, doubtful. "When you summoned those wings of yours, I felt the pressure surrounding us change. I'm surprised you didn't. You're... not particularly observant, are you?"

"I'm plenty observant." Jason retorts. "Rather than waiting for this dimension to eject us, why don't I Wordsmith us back into your ship?"

Unarin hesitates for a split-second.

"...You might as well."

Jason nods. "Return."

An instant later, he and Unarin flicker out of existence. They pop back inside the Founder's Spear, where they find Muuxunuu sitting in her pilot's seat, staring out at the world before them. She appears just as stoic and emotionless as ever.

The Wordsmith and First Founder drop their stealth modules barely ten feet from Muuxunuu, but she appears unfazed by their sudden appearance.

"You have returned, First Founder." Muuxunuu says. "It seems you did so via the Wordsmith's magic. You are as prescient as ever."

"Prescient?" Jason repeats. "What's that supposed to mean?"

Unarin smirks. "I bet Muuxunuu that you would casually offer to teleport me at one point during our trip. It seems my guess was right."

"Fuck you." Jason coughs. "There's no way you could predict that!"

Unarin slowly blinks. He turns back to Muuxunuu. "Did any Dolgrimites wander near the ship?"

"None, First Founder." Muuxunuu says, her voice soft. "Not one person stirred within the area."

"Hmm. Perhaps I overestimated them..." Unarin muses. "Take us back to Volgarius."

As Muuxunuu follows Unarin's orders and the Founder's Spear takes to the sky, Jason frowns.

"What do you mean by 'you overestimated them'? Did you think the Dolgrimites would discover us?"

"I thought there was, perhaps, a ten percent chance they might." Unarin says coolly, as he takes a seat in the ship's dining area. He gestures to the seat across the table for the Wordsmith to sit. "But they didn't. You must understand, Wordsmith. Those Dolgrimites are... not as simple as they first seem. I often wonder why they're so reclusive."

"You're a smart guy." Jason says, sitting down. "So either you know what's really going on with them, or you somehow have a genuine blind spot. Either way, you must have your guesses."

"I'm not omniscient." Unarin says. "But... hm. Tell me, Jason Hiro, have you read my work? Specifically, Order to Chaos?"

"I've heard about it." Jason says. "I even have a copy. But I'm not much of a reader. Or rather, I don't have a lot of time."

"Can't your Wordsmithing help you with that?" Unarin asks, raising an eyebrow. "Don't tell me the almighty Wordsmith can't speed up his reading or comprehension skills."

"You're not omniscient. I'm not omnipotent." Jason retorts. "...But, uh, yeah. I could probably do that."

Unarin's eyes flicker with suspicion. "You've truly never tried to speed up your reading or comprehension? And you've never tried to investigate the past through your Wordsmithing? I'm beginning to think I had your intellect pegged... a little too high."

Jason's expression doesn't change. "Intellect can come in many forms."

"Correct. But how long have you had access to your Wordsmithing? From what I understand, you emerged from a cryogenic stasis-pod about six years ago. In those six years, why have you not tested every possible boundary of your abilities? My people tell me you even possessed Solomon's Crown during the majority of that period! Surely, the infamous Knowledge Seeker would have sought to test your capabilities. He never was the type to sit back idly."

"Well..." Jason says, his tone slightly awkward. "I just... I'm technically 100,000 years old, but I've only had six years to experiment with my powers. I'm not some ancient monster like you."

"Don't give me such excuses!" Unarin snaps. "The foundation of our cooperation rests upon you being able to assist me with your godlike abilities. Do you think I've shown you these secrets of my empire casually, as if I were walking a pet through a park? I'm in the middle of a war, Wordsmith. And if my efforts fail, it will be YOU who comes under fire next! Only, unlike me, you will not have septillions of bodies to throw at The Enemy. You will fall in a single day, as all of your forces are concentrated on just one poorly-defended planet!"

"To say nothing of the demons." Unarin continues. "Those slovenly, rapacious little bloodskins. Oh, they hail their Emperors and act as if their power knows no limits. But in the cosmic scale, they are... what would your species say? Ants. They are ants, insects, bugs. The Kolvaxians wiped out one of their worlds immediately. The demons couldn't even put up the most paltry resistance..."

A flicker flashes across Unarin's eyes.

"You are young, Wordsmith." Unarin says. "When I was just twenty-four cycles old, perhaps I was not that much smarter than you are now. It is hard to say. Those cycles were so very, very long ago. But it was the Seven Great Wars that changed me... refined me into the leader I am today. Perhaps I should broaden your horizons."

Before Jason can ask what Unarin means, the First Founder waves his hand, and a holographic projection appears above the table. His eyes flick from left to right as a simulation of the Milky Way materializes, identical to the one inside his Sanctum, but shrunken down to a much smaller size.

Unarin zooms in on several different stars, while varied expressions flick across his face.

"Muuxunuu. Never mind the return trip to Volgarius. Change heading. Take us to the... Gallax system. It's not far from here. Just 1,500 light-cycles."

Muuxunuu hesitates. She turns back in her seat to look at Unarin.

"First Founder, I must advise caution. The Gallax system is currently under attack by the Kolvaxians. Two populated worlds have fallen. You will be in extreme danger if you travel there."

"I am aware." Unarin says. "I think it's time the Wordsmith saw the devastation the Kolvaxians can unleash… up close and personal."

"I'm already aware." Jason says, frowning. "There's no need to show off."

"Are you frightened?" Unarin asks. "Some leaders guide from behind, whipping the backs of their subordinates. These sorts never last long. They often perish to their own hubris. A true conqueror will charge from the front, inspiring loyalty among his people. Seeing a world fall in real time… it would make you aware of a few more Truths."

"I'm just along for the ride." Jason says. "But aren't you worried the Kolvaxians will strike you? I expect that as important as my life is, yours is even more so. Losing both of us would damn our civilizations."

"We're not going down to visit any worlds in person." Unarin says, waving his fingers in a dismissive gesture. "We're only going to have a look in real-time. You can watch data-files all day long… but knowing that the images on your screen are live and happening in a manner you wish you could stop… I expect it will have a more direct effect on your psyche."

"What does any of this have to do with my powers?" Jason asks. "Not to insult your intelligence, but doesn't this seem like a completely different train of thought?"

Unarin leans back in his seat. He closes his eyes for a moment while tilting his head up toward the ceiling.

"…Do you experiment with your powers often, Jason?"

The Wordsmith blinks. "Sure. Well, I mean… yeah? I guess so."

"Your words don't speak of confidence." Unarin says, continuing to keep his eyes shut. "I have determined a great many things about you during our little time spent together. Before, I assumed you were a highly intelligent, driven man pushing to rapidly advance his species to the apex. Now, I see that you are… not as swift or driven as I had expected. You lost your child to the demons. That provided you with a high level of motivation… but frankly, it only brought you 'up to par.' It did not push you into a realm equaling the most driven of your people."

Unarin opens his eyes. He lowers his head to gaze at the Wordsmith.

"You wish to protect your people from the demons. You wish to protect them from me. But that is all. That is the limit of your drive. You are passive. You are not truly aware of how far you can go. Indeed, I cannot possibly know the limits of your abilities either, as they are not mine to test. But what I can tell you, Wordsmith, is that if I had possessed a power akin to yours, the Seven Great Wars of my people's history would have never come to be."

The First Founder drums his fingers on the table.

"You feel pressure pushing you to improve yourself and your species' lot in life. But that pressure has lessened since you defeated Ose and subjugated the Hidden Emperors. Now, you no longer feel as urgent a need to shove through any obstacle to your success. The Kolvaxians... they worry you, but you still feel as if they aren't yet a big threat. You still have time. You can let them whittle away at my people for some indeterminate period. What are us Volgrim anyway, but some distant threat to the future of humanity? It's better for the Kolvaxians to pick us off, because then you will have one less enemy to contend with on the galactic stage."

Hearing his thoughts exposed, Jason can't help but shift uncomfortably in his seat.

Unarin can really see all of that? Is he a prophet? Can he look into the future?

Jason opens his mouth to reply, but nothing comes out. He hems and haws for a minute, then shrugs.

"You're... pretty good at this. So, bringing me to see the Kolvaxians..."

"It is for your own good." Unarin says, his tone deadpan. "I won't lie. You are a dangerous enemy, and a frightening friend. Perhaps if the Volgrim Empire were in its prime, I might crush you to protect myself. But we are not, and perhaps we never will be again. Right now, I need your help to stop the Kolvaxians. Our mightiest Psions cannot halt their slow, inexorable push. Our most elite scientists cannot reverse the infection to restore our people. Recently, the Kolvaxians have gained psionic powers, allowing them to take to space. Now we are not even safe while bombarding them from above."

"You need pressure, Jason." Unarin says. "You are the sort of person who is far too laid-back to become a leader. Yet, for whatever reason, the Heroic Aura chose you to save humanity. Had it chosen someone like that King Arthur, or Joan of Arc, someone with a firm will and a desire to never give up, humanity's rise would be assured. But instead, it chose you. You, who lacks a backbone and who acts far too lackadaisically for his people's own good. I intend to set you on a path that will strengthen your resolve. You must see these horrors in real time so that you understand why pushing your boundaries is absolutely essential."

Jason slowly nods.

"I... I get it. You think if I see a world crumbling right before my eyes, it will make me... more determined."

"Much more determined." Unarin whispers. "There is nothing that can bring forth the qualities of a great man like the existential realization of his weakness, his imminent death. Fantasizing about such things will never provide an impetus like having them thrust upon you in the real world."

"I understand." Jason says. "And I'm interested in seeing what these Kolvaxians are truly like."

"Good. Then, without further ado. Muuxunuu!"

Unarin barks at his Head Administrator. She merely nods, then turns back in her seat.

"We will leave Grimvolas's gravity well in three time-units, First Founder. I will initiate the micro-jumps, then take us out of the system afterward."

Unarin nods. "Make it so."

After the ship jumps to warp, Unarin tosses a datapad at Jason.

"We've a few hours before we reach our destination. Make yourself useful. Read my 'Order to Chaos.'"

The Wordsmith sighs. "I might as well."

Back on the world of Grimvolas. After Jason and Unarin leave, elsewhere on the planet, in a secluded underground fortress, carved out of rock and reinforced with bone.

A muscular, monstrous dinosaur-looking creature, a Dolgrimite, holds a ball of energy in its claws. This Dolgrimite, a green-skinned male with a red stripe of color running from its head to the tip of its tail, grunts fiercely as it manipulates the energy in its claws.

"Rrrgh! RRRGH!"

The ball of light shifts from red to yellow to blue. Inside its center, images flicker, though as to what they depict, only the Dolgrimite himself can know.

"I... I can almost... see... it..."

Just as the Dolgrimite is about to reach some sort of important moment, the energy in his hand starts to careen out of control.

"No!"

Enraged, he quickly flings it aside, where it races away from him and explodes against the reinforced wall.

BOOM!

The underground area tremors, and the shockwave of the blast knocks him off his feet. The Volgrim coughs a few times, then picks himself up. His scales and body appear unharmed.

Indeed, compared to the battles he's fought in his life, this small, piddly explosion of energy barely affects him in the least. As for what task he was performing, few can ever truly know...

The Dolgrimite glowers at the far wall. "Failed again. I am incompetent."

At that moment, a loud clanging resounds within the room as someone bangs on his door. He scowls at the interruption, but seeing as he already failed his work, there isn't much reason to complain.

The Dolgrimite lumbers toward the door. He yanks it open, where he sees another, somewhat shorter and weaker-looking fellow on the other side.

"Fifth Founder, Cinculu. The Matriarch has news for you."

The smaller fellow bows his head subserviently, not daring to make eye contact with his esteemed Fifth Founder, one of the highest-ranked among all of Volgrimkind.

"The Matriarch. Grrgh." Cinculu growls. "Her location?"

"She is within the Primal Nest at present, Fifth Founder."

Cinculu barely acknowledges his subordinates' words. He pushes past the smaller fellow, but pauses before leaving.

"Get that mess cleaned up. I screwed up... again."

"Of course, Fifth Founder. You will succeed eventually. Dolgris guides you to greatness."

Cinculu turns away and begins striding through the underground corridors, where strange insect-like creatures made of rock levitate through the air. They linger on the walls and emit different hues of light, removing the need for any sort of central lighting system in the underground caves.

Of course, as a reptile-like predator, Cinculu's eyes are truly extraordinary. He can see in the dark just as easily as any Demon Emperor.

Storming down the hallways, he passes countless rooms where his fellow Dolgrimites engage in brutal combat, tearing each other limb-from-limb to establish dominance, yet always stopping short of delivering the killing blow. He passes feasting halls where Dolgrimites wear black robes to hide their bodies while loudly chewing on blackened bones and raw meat, guffawing as they exchange words of brotherly and sisterly love.

Each time Cinculu passes a fellow Dolgrimite in the hallway, they hurriedly step aside and bow their heads. "Dolgris guides you to greatness, Fifth Founder!"

"Dolgris guides you to greatness!"

"Dolgris guides you to greatness!"

These repeated odes don't annoy him, nor do they comfort him. To Cinculu, they are merely the most common of greetings, the words he would use in place of the standard Volgrim greeting, I contemplate, and I comprehend.

He chuffs under his breath, laughing at the thought of those sniveling little weaklings in the Volgrim Empire, those failures who abandoned their heritage to search for power among the coldness of iron and steel.

Technology is a crutch for the weak. Only our own strength can protect us.

His frame bristles with power. As Cinculu walks, he holds himself upright, revealing his toned chest filled with muscles that would make Titans weep with envy.

Soon, he arrives inside a massive underground area filled with organically-designed furniture. Bone-chairs and tables grow out of the ground, hewn into different shapes by the craftsman masters of the Dolgrimites. This area appears to be a large feeding ground, where countless creatures from unknown worlds lay dead in heaps, their skin and muscle ripped off to feed any Dolgrimites who might be hungering in the immediate vicinity. As for the blood, it drains off to an area on the eastern wall, where a sizable lake of it slowly drains, going to other locations for... vile reasons.

Across the ceiling and walls, many Dolgrimites climb around, entering holes that become hallways leading to other locations. Cinculu motions with his hands, and a nearby insect flies over to him, transforming into a giant green leaf!

The insect, a creature of unknown origins, manifests its new form through the internal energy within Cinculu's body. He hops atop its surface and rides it to the top of the underground chamber, where he leaps into a hole above and continues making his way through the narrow corridor until it expands once again. This time, a dozen powerful Dolgrimite guards stand before a door leading to the Primal Nest, where the Matriarch resides.

"Fifth Founder. The Matriarch is expecting you." One of the guards says.

Cinculu nods. "Dolgris guides you to greatness."

The guards repeat his greeting back to Cinculu as he passes them by.

Before long, the Fifth Founder steps into a room that reeks of blood and death. The bright golden energy hovering at the top of the room provides illumination, allowing no shadows to make their way into this divine, war-like space.

As Cinculu enters, a single female Dolgrimite steps out from behind a mountain of meat and bone. Her appearance is even more feral than his, making her appear an apex predator one mustn't trifle wife.

"Mother." Cinculu says, bowing his head. "What matter did you wish to speak with me about?"

The Matriarch of the Dolgrimites, their true highest leader, walks toward her son, standing a full head taller than him.

"Child. The First Founder paid us a visit today. He entered Valhalla. Dolgris has revealed this Truth to me."

"Unarin came here?" Cinculu asks, bristling with anger. He lifts his head up and growls loudly. "How dare he! Dolgris's grounds are sacred! Unarin spits in the face of our god with his disrespect!"

"Unarin came in secret." The Matriarch says. "He used a special cloaking technology to hide himself from our eyes. Of course, his appearance could not be hidden from the almighty Dolgris. Dolgris sees all. He knows all. But... something has happened which he did not foresee."

Cinculu chuffs. "Impossible. How could anything surprise our god? Dolgris knows the Truths. He has enlightened us with his wisdom."

The Matriarch shakes her head. "Nobody is omniscient, not even Dolgris. His wisdom makes Unarin pale in comparison, but he is not all-knowing. Unarin brought along a friend. A human, one who possesses the power of the Heroic Aura. A chosen warrior of the Angels and Titans."

"He brought an outsider here?" Cinculu asks. "That Unarin... he is growing desperate as The War ravages his feeble followers."

"The War does not concern us." The Matriarch says. "Dolgris will protect us. The War is merely a minor test of our courage. What is more important is... Dolgris has become interested in the human Unarin brought along."

She leans toward Cinculu, a feverish look in her eyes.

"He is called Jason and Hiro. He is known as a 'Wordsmith.' The very same creature the demons have fought for several recent cycles."

"The Wordsmith." Cinculu repeats. "Yes. I have heard his name. Dolgris said he was unimportant. He was not worth paying attention to. What has changed?"

"INSOLENCE!" The Matriarch suddenly roars, lunging toward her son while slapping him with her palm. Cinculu flies backward and crashes against a wall, but his body appears unhurt. Instead, it is his pride that has mainly taken a small blow. "How dare you question our god! The Great Dolgris has smelled the Wordsmith's scent! He has divined his Truths! Now, he tells us to place the Wordsmith within our sights! We must capture him and bring him before our god! Only then will Dolgris grant us a fourth portion of his Divine Power!"

"A fourth portion?" Cinculu repeats in disbelief, while standing back up. He doesn't appear offended by the humiliating way his mother slapped him, given how she held back her strength. "I thought we would never obtain such an opportunity again... if Dolgris grants us another of his boons, our species will rise to the apex!"

"Dolgris cannot grant his gifts blithely." The Matriarch says, rising to her full height. She looks down upon Cinculu with the same expression a man might give his foolish puppy. "After the Valhallan Assault, he has nearly recovered to his full strength. The angels are gone. The Titans are dead. Finally, his hated enemies have vanished from the cosmos. Soon, Dolgris will elevate us all and rise to take back the power which was rightfully his. As his servants, we will rise along with him, and steal our place back in the galaxy! Those other errant Volgrim will regret not falling in line under our god! But he will grant them no clemency..."

Cinculu frowns. "What of the rumors that a new Archangel has appeared? Unarin's legions suffered a disastrous defeat. Is Dolgris aware of this... new entity?"

A few seconds pass. The Matriarch chuckles.

"Heh heh heh... a new entity, you say? It was none other than the return of an old fossil. The Cherubiim may have once posed our god a threat during the Primordial Era, but those days have long passed. Now, it is but a shell of its former self. The Archangels that remain are little more than errant souls, bound to bodies that are no longer their own. Their power has dissipated. The mighty strength they can summon is limited at best."

"Compared to our god? Heh heh heh..." The Matriarch laughs some more. "...The galaxy is not ready. When Dolgris next emerges, all shall fall to ruin at his claws."

Cinculu bows his head. "It is as you say, mother. Dolgris guides us to greatness. We are but pebbles before his presence..."

Part 394: Psionic Enclave

The world of Volgarius, in one of the seemingly infinite stratoscrapers somewhere on the planet.

Tired and fed up with the insanely boring bottom-level of Volgrim society, Hope ultimately manages to find a rare moment of privacy. He returns to his human form, then turns himself invisible and ethereal, like a ghost. He uses his Wordsmithing in a novel new way, allowing himself to gently glide around while adopting Jason's old form of three-dimensional infra-sonar vision.

Much like when Jason ended up crippled due to Amelia's sudden attack and became blind for a while, Hope materializes the world around him within his Mind's Eye, allowing him to see in a massive sphere of influence around himself. Like this, he begins 'swimming' around the city's skyline, taking care to avoid any high-level Psions he might encounter.

Hope travels from one titanic building to the next. Once he becomes capable of emerging into Volgarius's open air and leaving the cramped confines of its interior spaces, he truly begins to appreciate, respect, and even fear the Volgrim's level of civilization.

In the so-called Modern Era, the early 2000's, before Jason entered the cryopod, the tallest structures humanity could build, the absolute apex of their civilization, rarely broke a thousand feet in height. By contrast, the Volgrim's stratoscrapers stay true to their name by rising several miles in height and 'scraping' the upper atmosphere. At the tallest heights, Volgarius's air becomes so thin that it's impossible for unaugmented Technopaths, ordinary Changelings, or weak Psions to breathe.

As for Hope, he begins searching in a frenzy. He zips from one tower to another, musing over the ramifications of how eerily orderly Volgrim society is. The way they march from place to place like worker ants, lacking all passion or love for their feeble, useless lives.

It's only when he reaches his first 'middle zone' that Hope finally stumbles onto something interesting.

A Psionic Enclave.

Hope discovers this location by accident. Its buildings appear no different than any other, but when he detects a sudden increase in psionic senses sweeping an approaching area, Hope goes on the alert. He casts a dozen Words of Power to shield himself, then slowly drifts inside the building.

Upon entering, he finds floor after floor of First, Second, and Third Level Psions practicing their abilities. The higher up in the tower he goes, the more powerful the abilities they display.

Hope decides to use this opportunity to finally familiarize himself with how their powers function. Having never fought a Psion before, nor encountered them in a violent manner, like Jason did twice, Hope has no frame of reference for what they can do. He gently descends into one of their First Level enclaves and obscures himself in the corner of the room.

* * *

A hundred junior Psions, all of them below one thousand years old, sit cross legged on the floor of a dojo-like area, while a heavily armored Third Level Psion levitates before them. The leader of this training is someone named Raavul, a female Psion with bright yellow skin and blood-red eyes. Despite her fierce appearance, she actually has quite a soft and gentle demeanor.

The room's soft blue lighting contrasts with the violent paintings and images scrawled onto the wall behind Raavul. On these paintings, images of her minor feats as a Third Level Aspirator reveal a couple different conquests of undeveloped worlds. They also show her releasing her psionic power to clear away debris and rescue other Volgrim trapped in cave-ins and other minor operations.

[Welcome back, Bronze Initiators.] Raavul says, projecting her voice outward to her students. [We will be picking up where we left off, two cycles ago. Before we begin, have any of you made a breakthrough yet?]

Raavul sweeps her psionic sense across the classroom. The other Psions bow their heads, feeling slightly ashamed of their slow progress.

[None?] She questions. [That is to be expected. The path to mastering Psionics is a marathon, not a sprint. Those who attempt to hurry their progress will never achieve the ninth form of the Sinarii. This failure will result in a permanent failure to ascend to the Sixth Level, and as such, your hopes of reaching greater heights will come to an end.]

She turns to one of the male Psions, a blue-skinned fellow with equally blue eyes, wearing simple white robes.

[Dunal. For ten cycles, I have watched while you struggled to decide your Path. Have you yet determined which branch you would like to begin training in? Your first foray into the Illuvian Wastes revealed you hold a certain aptitude for Primal Psionics, as well as Liquid Psionics and Body Psionics. While these three may be among the most basic types a young Initiator can begin to learn, they are also simple to pick up and versatile on the battlefield. What say you?]

The male Psion, Dunal, shifts his posture uncomfortably.

[Aspirator Raavul. My mind is slow and my thoughts are muddied. I have been unable to decide which Path to take. I continually attempt to refine my Psionic Seed, but something seems to hold me back. As for the cause of my distress, I know not what it is.]

Raavul does not chide the young male. Instead, she merely nods at him and pauses for a moment to collect her thoughts.

[...You are not alone in your concerns. Ever since the Plague attacked, and especially in recent cycles, a sense of unease has grown in the seeds of many young Initiators. You fear that you will not be able to enhance your abilities quickly enough to assist the Founders in their efforts. You worry the Plague will strike at Volgarius, and that if you have trained yourself in the wrong Path, you will only burden our great leaders with your failure.]

The Aspirator turns away from her pupil to face an image of a single powerful female Psion, a drawing that stretches from the bottom of the wall to the top. Her rough obsidian skin and golden armor gives her a powerful aura, a sense of undefeatable prowess, as if nothing beneath the heavens could possibly stop her should she push herself to the limit.

[You have no need to concern yourself with such fears.] Raavul says, a hint of worship in her voice. [The Plague is powerful. It is fearsome. It is all-consuming. But it is not unstoppable. No-one in this room, not even me, has lived nearly long enough to witness the incredible feats of our revered Second Founder. Founder Dosena split the void. When the Sentinels attacked, she and her Ninth Level companions fought for tens of cycles, battering back the unstoppable machines of death, until ultimately putting them to rest for all eternity.]

Raavul continues. [You cannot begin to imagine the power our Second Founder possesses. Should the Plague reach our world, she will crush it without hesitation. At that moment, even the Eighth Level Psions will be little more than leaves riding the wave of her spatial storms. None of you will ever be a player compared to her, so you need not concern yourself with such idle thoughts. You must only do your best and rise to the task of becoming the best warriors you can be.]

She turns to face her student. [Do you understand, Dunal?]

[I do.] Dunal says, bowing his head. [I apologize, Aspirator Raavul. I allowed my emotions to cloud my judgment. I…]

He pauses.

[…I will attempt to make my first breakthrough as a Primal Psion.]

[Excellent.] Raavul says, a hint of praise in her voice. [The most important choice you can make is any choice at all. By firming up your heart, you can choose your Path, then begin to form your Psionic Seed. Once you have solidified your Seed, you shall be able to walk beyond the realm of a mere First Level Psion and ultimately reach the second level.]

Another Psion student, a female with green skin, lifts up her head. [Aspirator Raavul. How long did you require to step from the First to the Second Level?]

[Nineteen hundred and forty-one cycles.] Raavul answers without missing a beat. [I was neither fast nor slow. Did you know? Executor Nufaris stepped from the First to the Second Level after a surprisingly long three thousand cycles. Later, when he first initiated contact with the primitive world of Earth, he was on the cusp of reaching the Sixth Level. Yet, just two hundred cycles afterward, he reached the Seventh Level. Can anyone here tell me what this indicates?]

The Aspirator glances around the room. Another student projects their thoughts outward.

[Aspirator Raavul. The Executor was able to make rapid progress due to the frequency of battles he engaged in with the mud-dwelling populace of humanity.]

[Indeed.] Raavul says. [He wisely chose not to immediately subjugate those errant Terrans, but instead to toy with them and use them as a whetstone for his troops. By constantly engaging in battle, Psions can quickly consolidate their Seeds and reach the next level. This should indicate to you that learning in a classroom might be a safe way to progress your Seed's consolidation, but it will always be far and away inferior to engaging in real battle. Only by placing your lives on the line can you properly reach your limits.]

She continues interviewing her students for a while, as Hope watches from a distant corner of the room, his body half-submerged in the ceiling. The Wordsmith's clone examines the Psions and listens intently to Raavul's teachings to enlighten himself better on how their powers work. Perhaps no Earthling has ever gotten such an intimate look at their society before now.

After an hour, Raavul levitates to the front of the classroom. [Next, you will demonstrate your comprehensions for me. Let us start with the Body Enhancers. There are thirteen of you in total. Step forward.]

At Raavul's orders, just over a dozen Psions, comprised of males and females of multiple different colors, all step to the front of the room. They stand obediently before their teacher, awaiting her words.

[There is no such thing as a useless branch of Psionics.] Raavul states. [Body Enhancers are often seen as 'thuggish' and 'brutish' compared to other Psions. Some may even wonder what the appeal is in enhancing one's body through their Seed when even Primal Psionics seem so much more robust. When the Dolgrimites and Ascended are such physically powerful warriors, why bother with elevating our own bodies instead of focusing on our unique strengths?]

Raavul snaps her attention to the thirteen before her. She addresses the first student, a gold-skinned female with surprisingly thick muscles and visibly elongated nails reminiscent of claws.

[Initiator Y'ill. You are the most senior of your fellow Body Enhancers. Describe to your lessers what comprehensions you have uncovered, as well as the Path you have chosen.]

The gold-skinned Y'ill nods. She turns around to face the other students, while lifting up her hand to show off her long claw-like nails.

[I am a Body Enhancer. I spent thirty cycles deciding what specialization best suited me. While raw strength is a common option, I decided to focus on rapid regeneration of my injured vessel, as well as nearly-indestructible cutaneous talons. My goal is to rip apart my enemies in battle and cause them to suffer sustained bleeding while also destroying their willpower as they fail to cause me lasting injury.]

[A bold choice.] Raavul says. [Unorthodox, even. Describe your reasoning. Why not evolve toward a more strength-oriented focus, as many other Psions do?]

[Strength wins competitions.] Y'ill responds. [But endurance wins wars. I hope to someday become an unkillable monster on the battlefield. I will serve the Founders by making my body immune to all known toxins, chemicals, and diseases. In the end, I wish to even make myself immune to the Plague.]

[Immune to the Plague!] Raavul exclaims, visibly surprised. She arches her eyebrows while gazing at Y'ill's backside. [We do not yet know how the Plague infects its victims, yet you profess your intent to become immune to its power. Do you think such a feat is a simple matter?]

[Simple? No, Aspirator Raavul. It will most likely fail. However, if I can transform myself at the cellular level through my Seed, perhaps I can assist the Founders by creating a genome that is immune to the Plague. In doing so, I will save countless lives. And if I fail, I will have no regrets! Because in the end, I am merely one of many. I am a tool that serves the Founders.]

Aspirator Raavul closes her eyes for a moment before opening them again.

[I contemplate, and I comprehend. Your Path is quite unique, Initiator Y'ill. Perhaps you will succeed, and perhaps you will fail, but I speak for all of us when I express hope in the former.]

She turns her attention to the next Psion, a male with black skin covered in white 'flecks' of color, as if someone spattered droplets of paint all across his body. The male Psion appears quite skinny and frail, as if he has never had a good bite to eat in all his life. His height puts him half a head above his peers, making him look like a lanky beanpole.

[Initiator Tarim.] Raavul says. [Describe to the others what comprehensions you have uncovered, as well as the Path you have chosen.]

The male, Tarim, shifts his feet positioning.

[My current form is incomplete. Compared to Initiator Y'ill, my comprehensions are shallow and unrefined. Nevertheless, I do have a specific goal in mind. I seek to make my body flexible and adaptable. I wish to be able to mold my figure into the shape of other beings as I please.]

[You seek to mimic the Changelings.] Raavul notes. [I do not approve of this choice. You are far from the first Psion to try. In the end, you are likely to break all of your bones and reduce your Seed to ashes. Those who fail in their Path become cripples, useless to our great Empire! I would advise you to adjust your Path now, while you still can.]

[I understand the dangers and concerns.] Tarim says, paying Raavul's warning no mind. [I have always wished to uncover the secrets of the Changelings. I once learned that a Demon Emperor exists who can change his body into any form he wishes, at will, with hardly any delay. I envy this figure and wish to replicate his success; to prove that the Volgrim are not inferior to these alien mud-dwellers.]

[You speak of Emperor Belial.] Raavul notes. [But you have mixed up her gender. She is a female.]

[The data file I obtained was incomplete.] Tarim quickly explains. [It did not contain Emperor Belial's full identity, only her observed powers. I assumed she was a male due to her excessively high strength. I have made an error in my assumptions.]

[You have also belittled our Empire.] Raavul chides her student, frowning at his blunder. [The Volgrim Empire is not inferior to any mud-dweller in any way. Belial may possess some special abilities, but she is far from capable of matching up to us, her superiors. She is our inferior and should be treated as such! As adept an infiltrator as she may be, we would detect her demonic energy from ten parsecs away! She will never pose us a threat, and as such, we should not look to her for inspiration. You should reflect on your misstep and consider changing your path now, while there still is time.]

Tarim frowns. He starts to protest, but thinks better of it.

[...Understood, Aspirator Raavul. I contemplate, and I comprehend.]

Despite his agreeable words, Raavul shakes her head, clearly displeased with his conduct. Even among the mighty Volgrim, billions of Psions still ultimately fail to reach any level of success in their Path due to poor ideas and concepts about how to use their powers. They will never rise to become high-level Psions in their lifetime, and it is clear she thinks Tarim will fall to the same depths as those other failures.

Raavul continues grilling the next batch of Body Enhancers, revealing the surprising amount of depth in this one singular discipline of Psionics.

A blue-skinned male Psion. His Path: Dermal Armor capable of shrugging off tank rounds at point-blank range. Unfortunately, he is only able to conjure this incredible armor on a small portion of his chest. Perhaps, when he reaches the Second Level, he will be able to do much more with it.

Next is a second gold-skinned Psion, but this time a male. He opts to go for simple brute strength, growing muscles that will allow him to rip apart sheets of steel with his bare hands. Despite the brutish nature of his power, Raavul only encourages him to test his limits.

He is followed by three more Psions who also pursue the path of brute strength, one of them focusing on the whole body, while the other two aim to strengthen their legs for the sake of executing mountain-shattering kicks or running at top speed.

There's even a specialized speedster who focuses on the strength of his internal organs along with his legs, all to ensure he can run as fast as possible.

As Raavul goes down the line, she praises some of the Body Enhancers while chiding others.

[Speed is an essential part of combat. However, an often overlooked element of body enhancement is none other than the brain! By focusing your Psionic Seed on your brain, you can think tens or even hundreds of times faster than others. In moments of extreme danger, you can slow your perception of the world to a crawl while a billion thoughts race through your mind. This is an essential skill for many Tactical Psions. Proctors and Legators, for instance, are the most common titles for Body Enhancers who opt to specialize in brain enhancement. Do not underestimate this branch of Body Enhancement, for Founder Dosena herself started off as a Brain Enhancer!]

Several of Raavul's students shake in surprise.

[Is that true?]

[The Second Founder was a Brain Enhancer?!]

[Of course.] Raavul says, blinking her eyes slowly. [Let me give you an important piece of advice. Brain Enhancers are often the deadliest Psions to face in battle. Not only are they quick thinkers who can unravel an entire combat situation within micro-units, but enhancing one's brain also aids them in mastering many other schools of Psionics. Some believe that the only way to become a Ninth Order Psion is through enhancing one's own mental faculties.]

Raavul pauses.

[But don't get any strange ideas. Enhancing the brain is a delicate and dangerous task. Most Psions lack a Body Enhancer aptitude, and those who do have it may inadvertently implode their brains by placing too much psionic pressure on their neurons. I only advise that one should try with the proper training and precautions taken first.]

Her cautionary words deflate the excitement of the Psions present. In this classroom, only thirteen of the students have any aptitude for Body Enhancing, and perhaps only two of them have the talent to focus on their brains. As for the rest, the possibilities range from slim to nonexistent.

[Alright. Go and take your seats.] Raavul says to her Body Enhancer students. [Next, I will call forth the Primals. There are twenty-two of you in total. Come up here and demonstrate your comprehensions.]

As the second group of students begins to make their way to the front of the classroom, Hope watches from afar, a faint smile resting on his lips.

How interesting. Jason doesn't know any of this. Nobody else does... only me. That will give me a big advantage, especially when none of the Volgrim know that I know how their powers work. Perhaps I can even put this knowledge to use by turning it against them in the future...

The Wordsmith settles in, ready to observe even more of the aliens as they go about demonstrating their powers, blissfully unaware of the creature lurking in the corner of their Psionic Enclave...

Part 395: Psionic Enclave

Aspirator Raavul guides the next group of students to the front of the class. This time, the ones she calls up are Primal Psions, and their numbers greatly exceed the Body Enhancers, with twenty-seven of them in total, consisting of more than a quarter of her entire class.

Hope levitates in the back corner of the room, keeping himself still while postulating different ideas about the structure of the Psion power dynamics. He privately wonders if Psions often choose to become Primals, or if Raavul herself simply enjoys lecturing on this specific branch.

What surprises Hope is that Initiator Y'ill also joins the group of Primals. As the most talented Body Enhancer in the previous group, Hope finds himself baffled she would count herself among the Primals too.

Is she perhaps a dual specialist or something? Hope thinks. Can Psions learn from multiple branches of Psionics?

The Wordsmith's Clone isn't too sure how their powers work. Unlike Jason, Hope has never faced Psions in combat, and he doesn't have Solomon around anymore, or Raphael, to answer his questions. He can only ponder these things while he waits.

[Primal Psionics is the most elementary Path.] Raavul says, as she paces before her group of disciples, all of them standing at attention while she delivers her speech. [It is the easiest Path to walk, and the simplest to learn. If one chooses to specialize only in Primal Psionics, it will not be difficult for them to reach the Sixth or even the Seventh Level. Of course, becoming a Specialist means abandoning one's future foundation, so this is rarely advised. However, as per the recent directives passed down from our great Founders, we must focus on single and dual-discipline Psions moving forward, so as to assist the war effort.]

[Because Primal Psionics is easy to learn, some Psions think it must necessarily be one of the weakest disciplines.] Raavul says. [But that is a false notion! If any of you harbor such thoughts, cast them aside now. Primal Psionics, at the highest levels, can collapse worlds into singularities, obliterate cities, and fling moons about as if they were pebbles. It is the simplest and most direct way to wield psionic power through raw telekinesis!]

She turns to face the familiar gold-skinned female at the front of the Primal Psion student group.

[Initiator Y'ill. You are the most senior of your fellow Primal Psions, and the elite of this class. Most First Level disciples simply cannot accommodate two Paths at once, yet you have done so masterfully. Describe to the others the nuances of your chosen Path and why you have opted to become a dual-discipline Psion at such an early stage.]

The student nods. [My path of Primal Psionics has advanced smoothly, Aspirator. I chose to focus on highly condensed, energy-efficient bursts of telekinesis instead of the more common energy-consuming methods. Because my primary Path is focused on endurance, spending my limited energy in wasteful displays of strength would run counter to my goals of becoming a calm and measured warrior. I seek to cause the most destruction with the least wasted effort, as well as to assist my goals of becoming immune to the Plague at the cellular level.]

[Admirable, as always.] The Aspirator says, bobbing her head along lightly to her students words. [Describe to me the manner in which you would use your Primal Energy on the battlefield.]

[Teacher, I believe that outlasting an enemy will always result in winning a real-life battle. The reason we are losing ground to the Plague is because our enemy holds a clear advantage in how they are able to multiply their gains and reduce their losses. A single Plagueborn can bring ruin to an entire world; this allows them to expand at exponential speeds, which will ultimately overrun our defenses.]

She continues. [Similarly, my goal is to condense my psionic might to such a degree that small micro-bursts can tear through the toughest armor and the most solid alloys.]

[Like a railgun projectile.] Initiator Raavul notes, without much interest. [I see.]

She turns away from her student and looks at the image of Founder Dosena on the wall for a few long moments.

[Primal Psionics is the most common branch wielded by our great empire's forces. From the Fifth to Ninth level, the vast majority of Psions use it in some way, and they have all performed countless innovations. Your choice is hardly notable in that several acquaintances of mine have already condensed their Primal Energy in such a manner.]

She stops for a split-second before continuing.

[Nevertheless, I must also point out that Primal Psionics is only your supporting branch. Many aspiring geniuses have attempted to grab for too high of a ledge in their journey, only to stumble and lose their footing. Instead of trying to innovate with your Primal Psionics, you chose a common and ordinary Path, and as such, will not need to devote much mental energy into creating anything new. In this manner, you can focus on innovating your Body Enhancements to the highest possible level.]

[This is an excellent choice!] Raavul concludes, turning to face the rest of her class. [You should all take great care to learn from your senior Initiator! Slacking in your studies and traveling the simplest route is typically not commendable, but when you are already devoting your time to innovating in one Branch, you should not try to do so in another as well. Your Seed can only accommodate so much potential in the early stages of your training.]

She turns back to Initiator Y'ill, who bows her head in gratitude. [I offer my thanks for your words of wisdom, Aspirator. I contemplate, and I comprehend.]

[Do not become complacent.] Raavul warns. [While you have performed admirably so far, pride is the greatest enemy to any aspiring Psion. You may become full of yourself, acting as if you cannot fail. But I assure you! Even the brightest star can exhaust its fuel. And so too can you exhaust your potential if you lose sight of your goals.]

Having finished with her best student, Raavul turns to the second in line.

[Initiator Lufa. Explain to the others what Path you walk, and how you have chosen to manifest it.]

Lufa, a green-skinned Psion with polka-dot patches of black all across his body, bows his head respectfully.

[Many Psions pledge themselves to the Way of War. I have chosen to walk a different Path. I believe that my calling has led me to pursue the most delicate use of my abilities, Total Control. I will use my telekinetic power to shift reality in the smallest of ways. I will pursue the path of science and help the war effort by repairing and maintaining our valuable but delicate technology.]

Raavul frowns. [You speak as if you are a Technopath. Indeed, there are many who seek to amplify their control of telekinesis so they they can manipulate reality delicately, but I've not heard of a self-respecting Psion who pursued matters of technology too greatly. It is not 'Our' task to pursue.]

[I know.] Lufa says, slowly blinking his eyes. [I do wish I were born a Technopath. I admire their pursuit of fleshmelding and steel. Perhaps many may call me an aberrant, but I cannot in good conscience walk a Path I do not believe in.]

The more Lufa talks, the darker his teacher's expression becomes. Hope can practically see the anger on her face.

'Why can't I have more excellent students like Y'ill?!' Her face seems to say. 'My class is filled with troublemakers!'

Still, she keeps her thoughts silent on this matter, merely opting to shake her head. [A focus on technology is not the right path for a Psion. I imagine your journey will fail, and that time will approach much faster than you can fathom. As for your actual focus, improving your control of telekinesis is not such a bad-]

In the middle of Raavul talking, the door to her Enclave suddenly opens up, and a tall, masculine-looking Psion decked out in fancy black-colored Armor walks in, his swagger filled with cockiness and bravado for all to see.

[Aspirator Raavul!] The male booms, his voice significantly louder and more boisterous than hers. [I bring glad tidings! A new student, just for you!]

Raavul, visibly annoyed by the interruption, swivels on her heel to scowl at the intruder. [Educator Norim! Of course it would be you. My classroom already has one hundred Initiators. I have no room for more. Begone!]

The smug prick of a Psion sneers at her, then waves his hands and steps aside, revealing a younger Psion of indeterminate age standing behind him, one with a camouflage-like pattern of red and blue all across his body.

[Do not refuse so hastily! This seedling was 'formed' by none other than Proctor Landis! His name is Ferral, and he is... flawed. Something went wrong during his Osmosis. So, it will be up to you to rehabilitate him. What fortune the Proctor is showing you! It is truly a stroke of luck for you to receive such an opportunity!]

Every word Educator Norim speaks reeks of sarcasm and condescension. Raavul's face turns uglier and uglier as she listens.

[Do not think you can force me to do as you please, Educator.] Raavul snaps. [My Enclave is full. I will accept no more disciples until one has graduated. Not even a Proctor can flaunt the rules.]

Educator Norim pauses for a moment and frowns. Then, he slaps his forehead, narrowly avoiding poking out his six eyes.

[Oh, how foolish of me! Of course, I forgot to mention the other item on my agenda. One of my students has just graduated, and as such, you and I will be conducting a Disciple Shift. It seems I must regretfully accept the burden of taking away one of your students!]

Raavul's yellow skin loses some of its color. She pales as she realizes Norim's true ploy.

[This... this conduct is unacceptable! I will report this to... to the Proctor Panel!]

[Ah, but the shift has already been approved.] Norim says, clearly delighted by the pain on Raavul's face. [Initiator Y'ill! Step forward! You will be transferring into my class!]

Raavul balls her hands into fists as her best student dutifully walks over to Educator Norim's side. She fights back the urge to strike at the Educator in a fit of rage, knowing doing so will only result in a bad outcome. But even so, his loathsome laughter rings in her mind, bouncing around as if to deliberately cause her distress.

[Ha ha ha!] Norim laughs, while clapping his new female student's shoulder. [I suppose I will have to accept this moderately talented Body Enhancer into my Enclave! While she does not stack up to the best of my current students, her talent is adequate. Best of luck with the upcoming Educator Assessment, Aspirator Raavul. I certainly hope your ranking will not prove laughable!]

Aspirator Raavul glances at the new student being thrust upon her. She shakes with rage at this unjust treatment.

Suddenly, as if making up her mind, she takes a step toward Norim.

Instantly, the Educator's laughter stops.

The Enclave falls silent.

Both Psions gaze at one another with fierce eyes. They flinch and tremble as something unseen occurs.

Hope frowns, unsure of what's happening. Seeing the two Psions standing just five feet apart while they both stare at each other, Hope hasn't the faintest idea what's happening.

After a moment, he decides to take a risk. "Telepathy."

His voice becomes muffled by the stealth magic surrounding him, to the point the students just twenty feet ahead of him don't hear even a whisper in the air.

His mind locks onto the two Psions as he delicately listens and discovers they have changed to a private telepathic dialogue, beaming their thoughts directly into each other's minds.

[-take me for some weakling you can push around!] Raavul roars. Her words aren't merely thoughts, but projections of energy she sends flying into Norim's Mind Realm, attacking him with her words. [I have friends in high places! I will make you pay for stealing my student!]

[Try all you want!] Norim fires back, causing one of Raavul's eyes to tremble. [We may both be Third Rankers, but I have achieved greater success than you! I am a superior Educator who has earned my stripes! There is no fairness, only the glory we earn for ourselves! Perhaps you should have spent more time training your students instead of leaving them to fumble around for several cycles at a time. Then the Proctors might be showing YOU such favor!]

[My teaching method was approved by the Proctor Panel!] Raavul retorts, intensifying her psionic strength as she forces Norim to take a step backward. [You may have performed some 'favors' for Proctor Landis, but he is only one of many! The other Proctors who will punish you for defying the Founder's rules in such a flagrant manner!]

[To support the teacher who raised a Fourth Level student while being only at the Third Level himself, or to support you, a failure of subpar talents... which one do you think the Proctors will truly favor?!] Norim asks, taunting Raavul further. [Give up. You will never advance to the Fifth Level. Your journey will end at the Fourth, and perhaps not even that. If you truly had a warrior's heart, you'd challenge me to a Comprehension of the Sinarii. Not this soft, weak mental sparring even the Second Rankers wouldn't stoop to.]

Finally, Raavul hesitates. Faced with Norim's barely concealed challenge, she stops to think about whether or not she should challenge him.

Has he reached the Fifth Level of the Sinarii? Or is he still at the Fourth? If I guess wrong, I'll end up humiliated, and he can shuffle our classes around as he pleases. He'll toss me all his worst disciples and take what's left of my remaining decent ones...

The more she thinks about challenging Norim, the less Raavul wants to do so.

A full minute passes while Raavul's willpower begins to weaken. Norim maintains his haughty expression and even pushes back against her, weakening her determination further.

Ultimately, Raavul takes a step back and ceases her psionic pressure. She turns away, too angry to look him in the eye, and perhaps even a little afraid.

[Hah.] Norim says out loud once again. [So this is all an Aspirator amounts to. Come, Initiator Y'ill. We take our leave.]

The gold-skinned student nods deferentially. Hope quickly realizes the students don't have any agency in the teachers they're placed under, but instead are assigned to them via some unknown group known as the Proctor Panel. Even so, Y'ill doesn't appear too broken-up about this unexpected shift in teachers.

She politely bows to Raavul. [I offer my thanks for your teachings, Aspirator Raavul. I will remember everything you have told me.]

[Go in peace.] Raavul says, turning away in disgust. She doesn't fail to notice a gleam of excitement in her student's eye at the thought of joining Educator Norim's Enclave. Clearly, Y'ill would prefer to train under a 'superior' teacher if she had the choice.

Without another word, Norim turns and strides out of the room with his new prize in tow. Before he leaves, he fires off one last jab.

[Goodbye, Aspirator! I look forward to seeing your results at the Educator Assessment!]

He and Y'ill vanish, leaving Raavul behind with her new student.

The formerly wise-seeming Aspirator now resembles a deflated football. She turns to glance at her sorry group of disciples, all of them vastly inferior to Norim's Enclave, and loses even more of her spirit.

[...What is done, is done.] Raavul says, quietly accepting her lot in life.

She turns to her unwilling new student, someone who clearly isn't excited about being placed in her class either.

[Initiator Ferral. How far along are you in your Path?]

The red-and-blue Psion, Ferral shakes his head. [Proctor Landis formed me, but he was not a good teacher. Not at all! He explained the concepts of Psionics several times, but his words were just a bunch of gibberish!]

[I find that hard to believe.] Raavul says. [Countless great Psions have studied under Proctor Landis before advancing to the Sixth Level. He is a renowned Educator, one who even I wish I could learn from.]

She stares at Ferral's face.

[Norim stated that you were 'flawed.' What was the meaning behind his words?]

[I am not flawed.] Ferral decisively states. [The Proctor merely does not like my... opinions.]

[And what opinions would those be?] Raavul asks.

Ferral crosses his arms over his chest. [...Psionics are awful! So boring! I cannot believe I will have to spend thousands and thousands of cycles just to reach some lauded level of power. What a waste of time!]

[A waste of time?!] Raavul asks, aghast. She steps back from Ferral, as if he were radioactive. [Your words are heresy! There is no greater cause than pledging yourself in service to the Founders!]

[That's right!] One of her students chimes in. [Who do you think you are, implying we who study hard are wasting our time? You really are defective!]

[Lazy Initiator. You will get nowhere in life.] Another student adds.

The young Ferral scoffs at his critics. [I speak no lies. I would much rather go outside and gaze up at the sky than wither away inside these walls. Unfortunately for me, I was formed on this cold, dead, lifeless world. I was not allowed to live life as I pleased, but forced into servitude for 'Founders' I will never meet in all my life. I wish to travel to other worlds and observe their beauty. I don't want to spend my time amassing power for power's sake!]

[We need power to fight back the Plague!] Raavul retorts. [Who are you to call into question the commands of our glorious Founders?]

[Founders, this. Founders, that.] Ferral snorts. [Why do you think we have to fight the Plague anyway? It was our constant expansion that attracted the Plague's attention. Proctor Landis showed me a recording of a speech the First Founder gave in which he told us the Plague is actually a group of aliens from outside our galaxy! They have invaded us because our probes alerted them to our presence! If we were not so greedy and simply learned to love the galaxy we live in, we would not need to train and fight in such destructive wars!]

[Insolence!] Raavul roars. [I will not listen to another word. Take a seat and remain silent!]

[Humph. You fear my words because your allegiance to the Founders was beaten into you over your entire life.] Ferral says. [As for me, I refuse to allow myself to sink below the level of a mud-dweller. I question the laws that govern me, for I had no say in their creation!]

Hope, watching from afar, chuckles to himself.

Damn. Seems even the Volgrim have hippies. And here I thought they were all just a bunch of stiffs.

Raavul eventually shoves Ferral into a seat, and he shuts up, not bothering to voice his unpopular opinions any longer.

After silencing him, Raavul groans to herself. She takes a moment to collect herself, then turns to face her class.

[...Since Ferral is a brand new Initiate, even if he is unwilling to learn, I am still obligated to conduct a lecture on the basics of training one's Psionic Seed. Ferral, I do not wish to hear your opinions on the nature of our existence. Save your foolish ramblings for some other group of imbeciles. If you have questions pertaining to the lecture, speak up. Otherwise, remain silent. For the rest of you, it never hurts to brush up on your basics, especially as you have not yet reached the Second Level.]

Once again, Raavul assumes a dignified posture, though she appears much more tired than before. As the Primal Psions from earlier return to their seats, she begins to speak.

[Forging a Psionic Seed is not a sprint, but a marathon...]

Part 396: Mara's Crimes

Mara, the Duke of Collection, assists more than two hundred humans in a new construction project as they rapidly build up a brand new apartment complex, just as shiny and beautiful as all the others in the nearby vicinity. This particular structure, located on the northwestern side of the Fortress of Retribution's outer limits, sits nestled amidst a half-dozen other similarly designed structures, with its western side facing Tarus II's rising sun and its eastern side the waning daylight.

Built via a mixed-development style of city planning, it features pedestrian roads weaving throughout the infrastructure with little room for motorized vehicles, but plenty of room for beasts of burden and bicycles, the most efficient and low-cost form of transportation, outside of foot traffic.

As Mara leaves to take a break while her human friends finish the last ten percent of the structure with their fancy construction drones and other such things, she pauses to admire the technological marvels she has helped build, as well as the clean and efficient design of the growing city. Already, enough housing to fit sixty million people has been built, and now humanity is rapidly finishing up what it needs to house The Respected when the Lazarus Tower revives them over the coming days.

"You know... maybe I was wrong about the humans..." Mara muses to her sister, Ying-Ying, as they sit on a park bench and take in the sights.

Ying-Ying snacks on a tasty pastry, a donut she bought with a tenth of a Merit Point from a nearby store. The chocolate and sprinkles stick to her lips while she moans in delight.

"Yeah, sis! Me too! I never even knew humans could do stuff like this. Look at how quickly they work and how cool their houses seem. They're even better than your new residence on Hell Harbor!"

"Well. The buildings are superior here, sure, but the apartments and rooms are quite a bit smaller." Mara says. "Though now that we don't have any human slaves on Hell Harbor, we've had to put Demon Grunts to work for the rebuilding efforts. Unlike working on Tarus II though, they can't earn any Merit Points, so they tend to complain a lot."

"Yeah. Plus us demons are just... not nearly as good at all this building stuff." Ying-Ying says. "I've been using my portals to help transport supplies, but I only earned 50 Merit Points over the last couple of weeks. Too many Warpers can already do what I do. The competition is stiff as heck!"

She pauses.

"Oh, right. Have you earned a thousand Merit Points yet, sis? I can't wait for you to earn a chance at becoming an Emperor. It's so easy compared to the old ways. Eating souls always was a little icky, in retrospect."

Mara shrugs. "I only have about six hundred. Still a ways to go. Since I only just became a Duke, I'll likely need to enter the Belial Booster a few more times to advance, so the true cost will be closer to three or four thousand points..."

"I hear the Emperors are starting to get antsy." Ying-Ying says. "The humans added Kiari to their Emperors recently. That prompted the Hidden Emperors to debate over skimming five or ten percent of the merit points off the tops of their minion's wallets. They might take as much as sixty points from you!"

"Truly?" Mara asks, frowning. "You've got to be kidding me. Those greedy bastards! I worked my tail off earning my Merit Points. So did you! Who do they think they are, stealing from us?"

"They're getting desperate to power up their Hells before the others. Rather than waiting for their most talented Dukes to level to Emperor, they'd rather skim a few points off the top to boost their favorites." Ying-Ying explains. "Or so Grandma Ahriman says. She keeps in contact with all the Emperors."

"At least Warpers know to stay neutral in this cold-civil war." Mara says. "If the Hell of Calamity picks a fight with anyone, I'll be expected to join the battle. I am a Duke now, after all."

"Yeah..." Ying-Ying says, her expression deflating. "I can't wait to become a Lord. Or even a Baron."

"Hm? Why do you look so sad, then?" Mara asks.

"Well, it's just..."

Ying-Ying pauses.

"...I've always felt like I was living in your shadow, sis. We come from the same broodmother and all, but you've gotten so powerful, and I'm still stuck as a Grunt. I'm just not good with all that fighting stuff, so I couldn't collect any souls. But you, you started out as an Oracle and got noticed by Yumagi. You've always raced ahead, while I stayed behind..."

"There's no shame in being a Warper." Mara says. "Of all the Grunts you could have evolved into, you became the one that was most in demand. Everyone wants the services of a Warper. There are plenty of them, yet not enough to fully meet demand, so every Emperor would want to befriend you."

"Yeah, sure, you say that!" Ying-Ying protests. "But they also don't want Warpers to evolve any further! They always have some excuse to stop us from progressing. We can't all be like Emperor Yardrat, who made his way up the ranks to become a 'Super Warper,' basically. So the Emperors leave us in limbo. And now we finally have a way to change it, but they still want to scrape our freaking Merit Points right off the top! It's so infuriating!"

As Ying-Ying shouts out her frustrations, a pair of human women walk past. One of them is Linda Hurent, and the other is one of her friends.

"Hey Mara! Hey Ying-Ying!" Linda says. "Thanks for all the help today! You guys are doing great work!"

Her friend nods. "You're both awesome! Me and Linda are going to get some snacks. Wanna join us?"

Ying-Ying pauses her ranting to smile helplessly at the two women while holding up her half-eaten pastry. "Sorry, I'm already eating. Raincheck for tomorrow, maybe?"

"I'll hold you to it!" Linda laughs.

She and her friend continue on their way, while Ying-Ying smiles sardonically and turns back to her sister.

"...I used to hate humans, you know. The Emperors always told us they were stupid, and weak, but they're actually all really nice. They're efficient, deadly, and can do anything if they put their minds to the task. Compared to them, I feel like we demons are... lacking."

"I know what you mean." Mara says back, as her thoughts momentarily darken. "I've... done some things I'm not proud of. Things I now regret. But there's no way I can just talk about them. They hang over my head like a dark cloud..."

"You mean Stormbringer?" Ying-Ying asks. "You didn't... hurt anyone, did you? I thought you only acted in an auxiliary role?"

Mara sighs. "Well, I-"

She pauses mid-sentence, as a familiar demonic aura draws her attention. Turning to the right, she blinks in surprise when she sees Belial approaching her, along with Blinker, Phoebe Hiro, and some random man she's never seen before.

"Oh! Samantha!" Ying-Ying chirps. "Hey, nice to see you! And you too, Phoebe, Blinker. What's up?"

She continues to smile, but something about the blank expressions on the faces of the other three women gives her pause.

Belial and Blinker stop a short distance away, while Phoebe takes a few steps past them, then crosses her arms in front of her chest.

"Mara. I can't believe your guts. You're under arrest for crimes against humanity."

Mara's expression pales. "W-what? What are you talking about?"

"Admit everything. Now." Phoebe snaps. "And out of respect for the good you've done over the past few weeks, I'll lighten your sentence. Otherwise, if you make me say it..."

Several seconds pass.

Mara's mouth hangs open in shock, as if she can't believe the thing she was just about to tell her sister has already come to pass.

However, it doesn't take long for her to regain her senses. She closes her mouth, then her eyes, and bows her head. She balls up her hands into loose fists and rests them in her lap.

"...You found out after all."

"That's not good enough." Phoebe icily says. "Say it. Specifics."

Mara slowly nods.

"During Stormbringer. Ose... sent me on a mission."

Ying-Ying turns from Phoebe and the others to look at her sister. "A mission?"

"Yeah. She wanted me to... infiltrate the city." Mara explains, while slowly opening her eyes. She dully stares at the ground while she speaks. "Specifically, she wanted me to capture the Wordsmith's daughter, and his wife, if possible."

Ying-Ying slowly nods. "You told me that part..."

"Well. I did more than that while I was there." Mara says, exhaling deeply. "I... destroyed a ship with many people on it. One of the space-vessels. I don't know how many were inside... but the number was enormous."

Phoebe's breathing catches when she hears Mara admit her wrongdoings. Her eyes redden. She looks away, unable to form a coherent response, even while Mara continues talking.

"...Then I made my way to Phoebe's position." Mara explains. "Her daughter was also there at the time, along with a squad of troopers. I fought them. I killed them all. And during that battle, the little girl revealed several shocking abilities. She was a trueblooded hero, just like the Wordsmith himself. She even summoned those Titans and that Hydra."

"You BITCH!" Belial finally explodes, unable to contain her rage. "You've really got some nerve, Mara! You said NOTHING and just accepted my power for free! You've been living it up here after killing so many of my friends! I ought to rip out your heart and stomp on your corpse right this instant!"

Belial's shouted words draw the attention of several people and demons in the park. Linda Hurent, having only walked a short distance away with her friend, turns back after hearing Belial's roar of rage.

"What's going on?"

"That was Samantha's voice. Did something happen?"

"Let's have a look! She almost never gets angry at anyone!"

Several bystanders run or wander over, curious about the commotion. When they arrive, Phoebe merely glowers at the woman who tried to kill her and her daughter. She holds up her hand, and a projection beams out of it into the air above her.

It reveals a short video recording of the last Covenant ship with 100,000 civilians on board being obliterated by some unseen enemy.

The crowd gasps in shock. Linda Hurent, having already looked up information on the destroyed ship, frowns slightly as she begins to piece together what must be happening.

Could Mara have been involved in the loss of that ship?

After playing the first clip, Phoebe plays another one, and this one proves even more damning. It shows a dragon-like Mara roaring at Daisy and trying to kill her while splattering the brave men and women surrounding Phoebe's helpless, comatose body. Her act of shouting out the names of Tarot Cards proves just as damning as the clear and recognizable sound of her voice.

Ying-Ying's eyes flicker with disbelief. She looks at her sister in horror.

"M-Mara! It can't be... you didn't really..."

"I did." Mara says quietly. "I'd say 'I'm sorry,' but those words would surely ring hollow, and they can't bring anyone back. I'd say I was only following orders, but Ose didn't order me to attack that ship. I did it on my own as a matter of 'convenience.' I... don't deserve to defend myself."

Phoebe's expression lightens, but only by the tiniest amount.

"At least you admitted your faults. I guess that's something worth praising. But it doesn't absolve you of anything. As the standing commander of humanity in Jason's absence, I hereby place you under arrest for the vile actions you committed against humanity, but even more importantly, my friends. Samantha, take her."

For a brief moment, Mara ponders running away. Belial might be able to fly, but Mara can still make a quick escape if she activates the right Tarot Cards, even while only being a Duke.

But in the end, seeing the looks of judgment from the nearby bystanders, as well as the pain on their faces, she can't bring herself to do such a thing.

She quietly stands up, her head lowered.

"...I'll go quietly."

From behind her, Mara even hears Linda Hurent whispering to her friend.

"I thought she was a good person. But in the end... she was even more vile than the average demonic war-criminal. She's barely a step removed from Beelzebub himself! I can't believe I respected her..."

Mara winces, but says nothing. She obediently walks up to the rage-filled Belial and sighs.

"Do what you will."

Belial sneers. "Do you think by playing humble and sweet that you'll get a lighter sentence?! I hate two-faced people like you. I might change my body to blend in with a populace, but compared to you, I am truly an amateur in the art of lying."

The man standing behind Belial glares coldly at Mara.

"I'll bet you don't even remember me, demon whore. I just so happen to be one of the people you murdered. The rest of my squad can't come back, either. Mephisto devoured them! So now I have to live with what you DID for the rest of my life."

Mara glances at the man. She stares him in the eyes for a moment before nodding.

"Sorry."

Without any further fanfare, Belial walks behind Mara and marches her away, walking her off to the south, in the direction of the Stormbringer war criminal prison complex.

After she leaves, Ying-Ying remains seated on the bench, tears welling up in her eyes as she struggles not to cry. She sniffles and whimpers, staring lifelessly at the pastry held in her hand.

"Mara... Mara... she can't be... she wouldn't... aaooo... sniff..."

Instead of pity, the bystanders look at Ying-Ying with expressions of disgust.

"I wonder if even one of the apples falls far from the tree." Linda says, narrowing her eyes at the sobbing Ying-Ying. "Are you hiding things from us too?!"

"We've uncovered no evidence of any wrongdoing from Ying-Ying." Phoebe says. "...But that doesn't mean we won't. Ying-Ying, I had BETTER not find out you're just as wicked as that sister of yours, or your end won't be any better than hers!"

Without any further words, Phoebe and the others disperse, giving only one last look at the woman weeping over her sister.

Linda shakes her head as she looks at her friend.

"To think Mara had us all gleefully dancing to the tune of her lies. Maybe Neil is even more right about the demons than we thought..."

Elsewhere on Tarus II, a beautiful demoness with long white hair sits on a rock far from the Fortress of Retribution's confines. She leans forward and casually gazes out at the world before her with a distant, ethereal look on her face.

Her identity? None other than Bael, the Duke of Pain.

Still just as trapped in Ose's body as ever, the big galunk seems much more somber than usual. His eyes are unfocused, gazing not at the world before him, but a strange space located elsewhere, perhaps a place nobody in the universe has ever seen while still alive.

"Hehe... so many pretty lights..." Bael mumbles idly.

He continues staring at the 'pretty lights' for a while, but ultimately blinks his eyes and returns to reality, unsure of what he was even looking at. Just as quickly as he was entranced, he immediately forget about their existence, his five-second attention span already well-past the matters previously on his mind.

"Man. What am I s'posed to do anymore?" Bael wonders.

"I ain't got no powers. Ain't got nothing to do."

"Maybe I oughta go and play some Sticks and Bones with the fellas."

"Eh... but they look at me all weird now that I've got tits. Some of the fellas even made a pass at me."

"Jeez, it's such a drag having a hot ass. People thirst over me even more than they used to. It's crazy..."

Bael glances at his frail, delicate, pretty-looking hands. For a brief moment, he waxes nostalgic about the old days.

He remember the two times he fought the Archdemon.

He thinks about his battle against Hercules, when he first turned into the Balrog.

He especially remembers how other demons used to look up to him.

"...But now I ain't nothin'. Just some washed up old coot." Bael sighs. "Ain't strong anymore. Ain't tough anymore. The fellas barely even talk to me. Were they even my friends? Maybe they only liked me because I was strong. They didn't like me for me."

Facing this existential crisis, tears well up in Bael's eyes.

"Satan's gone. Deebs is out. Shax is dead. Murmur's a slave. Artorias got offed. Even Beelzebrat's just... man. Why I gotta be the last one left? Maybe I should just..."

Bael turns his head to the side. He glances up at a tall, sheer cliff. It rises hundreds of feet into the air.

"...Problem is, I'd probably still survive. Then I'd just lay there with a bunch of broken bones. That'd suck. Maybe there's a better way to do it."

As Bael's thoughts turn dark, he fails to notice someone approaching him.

"Oh my GOSH! There you ARE, Bael!" Abby, the Baron of Happy Thoughts exclaims. "I've been looking EVERYWHERE for you! What the hell are you doing out here all by yourself?!"

Slightly startled, Bael quickly blinks his eyes twice to force back his tears, then turns to look at Abby while flashing her a forced smile.

"Oh, hey 'Abs.' What's up? Ain't seen you for a while."

"I've been looking for you for over a WEEK!" Abby shouts, clearly somewhat pissed, yet also visibly relieved. "I need your help, Bael!"

Bael stares at her for a moment, then shakes his head and looks away.

"...Nah. Go bug someone else. I can't help you. Or anyone else. I'm useless."

Abby blinks twice. She pauses a few feet away from Bael, then frowns.

"Is something wrong, Bael? You seem... different."

The Duke of Pain sighs.

"I... I dunno. I feel useless now, ya know? Nobody wants to hang out with dumb old Bael. I'm just some weakling goober now. It's better if I stay out of the way so I won't bother anyone."

"Don't say that!" Abby cries, walking over to sit on the boulder beside him. "Everyone loves you, Bael. You're a legend!"

"Sure. A legend." Bael repeats, paying her compliment no heed. "An old legend. Ain't nothing left of that guy anymore. Now I'm only some little pussy who cries if he stubs his toe."

"That's not true." Abby says sternly. "You're a brave warrior. Even if you don't have your old powers, you can still become amazing again! You have Ose's body. You just need to learn how to use it to its fullest potential!"

"But what if I don't wanna?" Bael asks, turning to look at her seriously. "You don't get it, Abby. All my friends are gone. They're dead now. And if they ain't dead, they might as well be. Even Deebs... if last time is anything to go by, it'll be centuries before he wakes up."

He turns away.

"I ain't got nobody left. None of my old friends."

Abby's heart sinks. Seeing Bael's truly despondent expression, she realizes the situation is much more serious then she expected.

"You can't talk like this, Bael. Happy thoughts! Happy thoughts!"

Abby activates her powers, beaming rainbows into Bael's mind, causing him to think about much lighter topics.

"What do you live for, Bael?!" Abby asks, standing up and shouting at him. "Think about what you still have! Doggies! Kitties! You still like those, right? Why not start a big animal sanctuary to play with puppies and kittens all day, huh?! That's worth living for! You can be a cool guy who takes care of animals that need help!"

Bael smiles. "Hehe. Puppies and kittens. Yeah. I do like them!"

"That's the spirit!" Abby chirps. "And I can do you one even better! I have a present for you, something you'll really like. Don't you want to be super strong again? Ose made a special armor in secret. It's designed just for her body... but you can use it too!"

"Special armor?" Bael says, his tone contemplative. "Well... hm. It doesn't look like some girly princess thing, does it?"

"No, no, it doesn't!" Abby says. "Believe it or not, it's wicked cool, with a black color scheme and two HUGE shoulder spikes. You'd look totally badass if you wore it!"

"Hmm."

Bael thinks about her offer for all of two seconds.

"...Well, alright. I wanna see this armor if you think it's that cool. It's not like I have anything better ta' do."

"Awesome. You won't regret it!" Abby says, grabbing Bael's arm and pulling him to his feet. "Now, come on, come on! Let's go! I can't wait to see you wear it!"

"Alright, already. I'm coming, girl. Sheesh!" Bael laughs.

Seeing Abby cling to him makes him feel touched inside. For the first time since his transference into Ose's body, he actually feels wanted. Someone wants to help him out with no ulterior motives.

Maybe this armor thingy will bring me back into my prime... Bael thinks. That'd be pretty sick!

At the same time, Abby quietly giggles to herself.

Oh, how exciting! Soon, I can talk to my precious Ose again! This is going to be WONDERFUL!

Part 397: Bael's Return

Abby skips along gaily while excitedly chattering to Bael about this or that. When they pass through the Warpgate into the Core, several people give Bael dirty looks and vicious glares, no doubt due to his perfect facsimile of Emperor Ose. Even though everyone knows he's actually Bael, they can't help feeling resentment over his disgusting appearance.

Abby shoots surreptitious glances at the humans around her, and a bit of her happiness deflates.

These people hate Bael! Or rather, they hate Ose... but no doubt, such vile looks would be the cause of his depression earlier!

At the same time, Bael also notices the looks people are giving him, though his reaction is... a little different.

"Damn that's crazy. I sure am popular today. Look at all the people staring at me! Hehe. It sure is nice to be noticed!"

The Duke of Pain obliviously chalks up the human's attitudes to thinking of him as a 'big threat,' and so, his ego manages to recover ever so slightly, making him puff up his chest. Though, in doing so, he makes Ose's 'assets' more visible, which draws gazes of a different kind.

It doesn't take long before the two demons ditch the Core and its personnel entirely. The two of them pass the human inspection team, enter the Labyrinth, and make their way toward the distant hidden alcove Ose created a long time ago.

It takes them a full day of walking to reach the location. Thanks to their inherent demonic intuition regarding the Labyrinth's passageways, they don't need a map to navigate its twisting hallways.

As they walk, Bael passes countless demons and monsters. Some of them nod politely at him, but many barely even acknowledge his presence. Bael frowns as he remembers how, in the past, many demons and monsters would excitedly chase after him, looking up to him as the biggest, baddest demon in all of the Seven Hells.

His determination firms up as he steels his mind.

"I gotta get me that sweet armor. Maybe it'll make me all kick-butt again. Then I can be awesome like before!"

Eventually, he and Abby arrive at a seemingly empty hallway somewhere in the Labyrinth's distant reaches. She holds up the special ring Ose gave her, then activates all the demonic runes that appear as a result.

The wall slides open, and the two of them step inside.

Immediately, Abby's blood turns to ice when ADAM begins walking toward her. His dual red irises lock onto her face, and his fearsome metal exterior causes her heart to palpitate. Even though she knows ADAM is friendly, she can't help but fear the Automated Demon Assistant Mechanoid.

Abby turns to look at Bael, worrying he might be scared out of his wits, too.

Instead, Bael takes a full three seconds to notice the robot when it walks up to and towers over him. When he does notice, Bael turns to look at ADAM and frowns.

"Hey, pal. You mind? A little personal space, yeah? Also what the hell happened to you? Where'd all your skin go, bro?"

ADAM examines Bael's body for two seconds before formulating a response.

"Demon Duke Bael. Your soul is currently possessing the body which previously belonged to Master Ose."

Bael blinks twice. "That wasn't much of an answer. Aw, fuck it. I already forgot the question."

"Duke Bael. My designation is ADAM. I am the Automated Demon Assistant Mechanoid. I was created to render service for Master Ose, especially in the event of her soul's material demise. My primary functions are-"

"Sorry, what did you say?" Bael asks, blinking his eyes heavily. "I kinda zoned out there for a minute. Never mind, I don't care. Anyway, Add-Dumb or whatever, I'm here for the armor thingy. It'd be great if you could stop yapping for five seconds and bring me to it. Thanks!"

Abby stares at Bael in shock.

Incredible! Bael isn't fazed at all by the scary metal monster! He has a spine made out of demonstone! Nothing bothers him at all!

She quickly shakes those awe-filled thoughts out of her head before turning to ADAM.

"Can you take us to Ose's special armor please? Bael really wants to see it! After he puts it on, I can finally talk to my precious-wecious Ose again!"

ADAM's irises shift to Abby, making her reflexively take a step back. "Affirmative. Master Ose's plans are all to ensure Bael obtains the Matriarch Armor. Do not worry. I absolutely must complete my mission. My programming does not allow for disobedience."

ADAM turns to the teleportation formation. As the robot begins to activate its functions, Bael shakes his head in disapproval.

"Man. This guy's such a stiff. No fun at all. Someone's gotta get that boy some drinks to loosen him up."

"The formation is ready." ADAM states. "Please step onto the pentagram."

Bael and Abby obediently follow the robot's orders. A moment later, a feeling of suction tugs on their minds, and Abby faints again.

When she wakes up, Abby struggles to her feet, then glances at Bael in admiration.

"You're already up?! That's incredible, Bael!"

ADAM's irises lock onto Abby.

"Duke Bael did not lose consciousness. The teleportation formation affects an individual's mind by scrambling their sense of proprioception, as well as their perception of reality."

ADAM pauses.

"Duke Bael's brain activity showed little change during the transference. His intelligence is simply too low to be affected by the spatial array."

Bael nods. "Exactly. Hey, wait a sec! Are you callin' me dumb?! 'Cause I am. But that's still rude, man! Didn't your broodmother ever teach you anything?!"

"Follow me." ADAM says, ignoring Bael's tirade. "The Matriarch Armor is in this direction."

Without waiting for a reply, the robot begins marching down a steel plated hallway. The demons find themselves teleported to a different location than the last time Abby was here. Instead of arriving inside the main hangar bay, they appear in a secluded area deeper within the facility. Abby and Bael follow ADAM closely, and as they walk, Bael notices all of the worker robots stomping up and down the halls, each of them moving with purpose and certainty.

"Damn. Ose is one twisted bitch." Bael mutters. "Can't believe she tore all the skin off these poor people. It must have been a lot of work to do that..."

Abby frowns at him. "What are you talking about, Bael? These are robots, not people!"

Bael flicks his gaze toward the younger demoness. He snorts, then turns away, a distant look in his eyes.

"Hehe. Yeah, sure. Robots. As if anyone could believe in something like that. People made out of metal. What's next? People made out of clay? People made out of dirt?"

"...But those exist too!" Abby exclaims. "They're called Golems! Bael, you know what Golems are, right??"

ADAM, walking in front of the two, beeps an affirmation. "I am a robot. Golems also do exist as well, Duke Bael. In particular, the former Sphinx, Monster King Kar, was capable of summoning earthen golems."

"Yeah, yeah. I've heard the conspiracies." Bael says, waving off their words. "Some people will believe anything you tell 'em. It's no wonder they call you 'Add-Dumb.' You're even thicker than me, bub."

If ADAM takes any offense to Bael's words, he doesn't show it on his expressionless metal face.

"We have arrived." ADAM says, stopping before that same nondescript door he showed Abby previously. Her heart begins to beat rapidly as she spits on the slide ADAM holds out for her and waits for the robot to open the door.

Bael, meanwhile, appears completely bored. He glances around the perfectly clean hallways and snorts.

"Sure is... shiny. You fellas really keep the place all tidy, huh?"

"Master Ose has created countless janitorial bots to ensure we meet her quality standards." ADAM replies.

A moment later, the massive door slides upward, revealing the darkened interior of the room within. When Ose's demonic mana splashes outward into the surroundings, Bael barely pays it any mind, but Abby grows visibly excited.

"Here! It's in here!" Abby chirps. "Come ooon, Bael! Let's get you in that armor! Go, go, go!"

"Calm your nipples, sister." Bael retorts, while swaggering into the room. His demonic eyes easily adjust to the darkness, allowing him to glance at the rows and rows of armor and weapons, all of them enchanted with different types of demonic energy, or made with exotic materials. "What the hell is all this stuff?"

"Master Ose's Armory is her most precious and closely guarded secret." ADAM explains, his robotic tone tinged with a hint of reverence. "Her foresight is grand, far more so than any individual can imagine. Ever since the end of the Energy Wars, she wished to break the shackles placed upon demonkind by the Volgrim. Despite only being a Baron, her intellect put her on the same level as Marie Becker and Founder Cuanali. She never sat idly, and instead built this facility in absolute secrecy."

ADAM walks over to one of the weapons on the wall, a sword made from Demonstone, one which hums with demonic power.

"This blade is an excellent example of what Master Ose accomplished." ADAM explains, before handing it to Bael. "If you energize the blade with your mana, it will activate the weapon's Resonant Power."

"Resonant Power?" Abby asks, glancing at the wicked-looking weapon in Bael's grasp. "What does that mean..."

Bael doesn't fully understand what ADAM is asking him to do. Having never used his demonic mana in all his lifetime, the Duke of Pain has no idea how to use it in any meaningful way.

He squints his eyes. He clenches his buttcheeks. He steels his stomach and glares at the blade.

"Hrrrgh! Rrrrrggghhh!!"

Bael tries to make anything happen, but after half a minute, gives up.

"...Whew! Yeah bub, I ain't got no idea what the heck I'm doing."

"That is understandable." ADAM says. "Baron of Happy Thoughts. Please attempt to resonate with the sword. In theory, any demon can do so. That is what makes these weapons extraordinary."

Abby takes the sword from Bael and nods. "Well, okay. But since it's Ose's sword, won't she get mad at me for touching it?"

"She will not. Master Ose is unconscious, you know." ADAM says, his unchanging and expressionless face still somehow coming off as annoyed.

"Right. Anyway, let me try!" Abby says.

After a few moments, she pours her demonic energy into the blade. It doesn't take long before a faint reddish glow wraps around herself, warming her skin to the touch.

"Eh? What the heck is going on?" Abby asks, bewildered. "Why is this aura all around me?!"

"You have activated the Barrier Sword's 'Resonant Power.'" ADAM calmly explains. "In truth, Master Ose has been monitoring the activities of the Hell of Calamity for a very long time. They have begun creating pseudo-artifacts not dissimilar to those made by Archangel Camael. Master Ose has managed to create something similar, though her artifacts are only useable by demons."

ADAM continues. "The Barrier Sword is one such example. Like all Resonant Powers embedded within Demonstone-forged artifacts, it enables the wielder to obtain a unique ability when they channel their abilities. The Barrier Sword, in particular, grants the user an ethereal shield capable of deflecting many different forms of attacks."

Bael's eyebrows shoot up.

"I only caught about half of what ya said, but that's still pretty swell! So now Abby's all protected 'n stuff?"

"The Barrier is far from invincible." ADAM states. "It is limited by its user's internal mana reserves. Additionally, attacks from particularly strong enemies will break through its defenses more easily. However, it also scales to its user's strength. Emperors will be able to harness more of its power than Lords or Barons."

The robot continues. "Even so, these artifacts were only prototypes. Master Ose's goal was to forge weapons en-masse that would allow demonkind to battle the Volgrim. However, she died before she could reach the stage of mass-producing these weapons. And now that the Wordsmith has arisen, humanity has taken control of the Seven Hells, and the Plague has begun to ravage the galaxy with deadlier results, we have thus begun to run low on time. Duke Bael, if you would please step toward the Matriarch's Armor..."

ADAM gestures to the right side of the room, where a set of pitch-black armor hangs on the wall, its ominous energy finally catching Bael's attention for the first time since he arrived.

"Oh, HELL yes!" Bael exclaims. "Now THAT'S a fine piece of armor! Look at those shoulder-spikes! And that black color scheme, it's so badass!"

"I told you!" Abby says, putting the Barrier Sword back on the wall. "Let's get you inside and see what you can do, Bael!"

The Duke of Pain no longer hesitates. He power-walks to the Matriarch's Armor and begins pulling it off the wall, admiring its craftsmanship while growing progressively more excited as he dons each piece.

Unlike when Abby donned the armor, it doesn't have to adjust its size to fit Bael's physique, since it was always intended to adhere to Ose's original body.

The chestplate 'opens' up, like the maw of a blackened eldritch beast, then clamps down onto Bael's body, wrapping around him to fit snug and tight. Before long, he finishes donning the entire set, and it closes up any gaps, sealing him inside to protect him from toxins, poisons, and all sorts of other external dangers.

As the Duke of Pain finds himself surrounded by the coldness of the demonstone's interior, various types of information floods into his mostly-empty head, transmitted through a magical connection from some unknown external source.

Naturally, Bael ignores most of it. Some random images and numbers materialize in his vision, but he just drools quietly, unable to even process what he's looking at.

"...Alright. Well that stuff's kind of a pain in the ass, but whatever. Let's see what this bad boy can do!"

Bael walks over to the wall. He rears his fist back, then rockets it forward!

BOOM!

The chamber shudders, along with many parts of the nearby facility. The wall violently caves inward, but stops just short of blasting to smithereens, thanks mostly due to being so deep within the planet's bowels.

"Amazing!" Bael exclaims when eyeballing his handiwork. "This armor is badass! I feel like my old self again!"

ADAM appears unimpressed. "Are you able to communicate with Master Ose? Her soul sliver should be within the confines of the Matriarch's Armor."

Bael shrugs. "Dunno. Haven't tried. Oooh, but there is this weird, itchy feeling at the back of my neck. Feels familiar, in a really annoying way. Like someone's nagging at me..."

"...that would be Master Ose's soul." ADAM says, his tone one of displeasure. "Please attempt to establish contact with her. Demonkind's future survival is at stake."

Bael licks his lips. "Mmm. Steak, hehe. Tasty steak. I could go for some of- WHOA WHAT THE HECK?!"

He jumps away from the wall, jerking in surprise when an ethereal image of Ose materializes right in front of him, her eyes gazing directly into his.

"So it came to this." Ose says, her words tickling Bael's wildly underdeveloped brain. "You've put on the armor. That means I died."

Bael holds up his fists and tries to punch Ose's face, but his hands swing right through her head.

"Wha-what the heck is goin' on here?!" Bael roars. "I thought Ose was dead!"

Both ADAM and Abby exchange glances. They look at one another in visible disbelief.

"B-Bael..." Abby says, fighting back tears. "We already told you! You're here to contact Ose's soul sliver! How many times do we have to say it?!"

"Of all the sentient entities that could have possessed Master Ose's original body," ADAM comments, "Duke Bael is undoubtedly the worst. His intelligence quotient is registered as a negative value. His memory scores are below those of insect life."

Bael pays no attention to them. He instead gazes at Ose in shock, before instantly coming to accept this new paradigm of 'Ose is back alive' without much hesitation.

"Cool, you're back. And you're even in your body again! That's neat. Wait, does that mean I'm back in MY body now?!"

Ose gazes at the Duke of Pain with a look of deeply repressed torment.

"...no, Bael. I am dead. What you see before you now is only a soul sliver I separated from my original soul. I no longer have any power. I can barely even communicate with you, due to my lacking strength."

She continues. "Only you can see me, Bael. The others can't. Give Abby my thanks for... delivering you to me."

Bael nods dumbly. "Oh, Okay. Hey, Abs, Ose says thanks for delivering you to me."

Abby frowns. "Delivering... huh? Don't you mean 'you to me?'"

"Yeah. That's what I said." Bael says. "Sheesh. Come on, open up your ears, girl. I'm 'sposed to be the dumbass here!"

"Focus." Ose says, grabbing Bael's attention once again. "Bael. I want you to tell me what happened to me. Specifically, the manner in which I died. Actually, just ask Abby to tell me. Her testimony will be... more accurate."

Bael taps the side of his helmet. "Man. Looks like you've gotten dumber too, Ose. You're not dead. You're right here!"

"That's... that's not what I meant!" Ose snaps. "Bael! Focus your bloody mind! This is important! Tell Abby to tell me why you're here!"

The Duke of Pain rolls his eyes. "Yeah, yeah, no need to get snippy with me, lady. Yo, Abby! Ose says to tell me why you're here."

Abby cocks her head. "Why... I'm here? Because she wanted me to bring you to the complex-place-thingy. She should know that though, right?"

"Yeah, she should. She's not very bright right now, though." Bael chuckles. "Must've lost some of her brains after Arthur cut off her head. Swish, splat! Am I right?? Haha."

"BAEL!" Ose roars. "Can you stop being a dipshit for FIVE SECONDS?! Tell Abby to-"

She pauses for a brief moment, calming herself down. She recalls Bael's literal translation of her words and decides to adopt a different tactic entirely.

"...Please tell Abby to tell me how and why Ose died."

Bael scrunches up his face as he hears Ose's newest request. "Ohhh... I think I get it now. Haha, man, you really have a wacky way of going about things."

He smiles goofily at Abby, even though she can't see his face inside the Matriarch's Helmet.

"Ose wants to know how and why you killed her!"

"BAEEEL!" Ose shrieks. "You're... you're doing this on purpose! Stop screwing with me! My soul can't take this kind of abuse!"

Before Abby can reply, Bael holds up his palms. "Alright, alright. Yeah I'm just kidding. It's so much fun to mess with you again, Ose! I really missed our talks!"

He sobers up and looks at Abby more seriously.

"Alright. Let's be serious. Ose wants to know how and why she died. Can you tell her?"

Abby nods. "Alright, that makes a LOT more sense! It happened when she led the Hidden Emperors to Tarus II, intent on battling the Wordsmith..."

Abby spends the next hour detailing not only what happened to Ose, but the after-effects of her death, and the Wordsmith's grand plans.

Ose's specter hovers inside Bael's Mind Realm, listening carefully while slowly furrowing her brow.

"Belial Booster... various magical augmentations... Emperors subservient to the Wordsmith. The situation has gotten much worse than I expected."

"Eh, it seems fine to me." Bael says. "We're all gettin' along well now. I never realized it before, but us demons can actually make good friends with the humans if we just stop eating 'em! Ain't that crazy??"

"Humans are not our friends." Ose snaps, as her memories flicker back to a distant past, when she was just a child and Arthur's goons locked her in a dungeon, torturing and killing one of her brothers. "They are our inferiors. Our eternal enemies. I cannot continue allowing the situation to persist as it has... but my options have become a lot more limited. The Hidden Emperors conspired against me. They did not assist me when I fought the Wordsmith's construct. That 'Arthur' might not be the real one, but it is still a powerful vessel. If Jason thinks to mass-produce them..."

She shudders at the thought.

"...demonkind will never again rise. I possessed your body and its full power, along with my array of abilities, yet just one Arthur Construct tore me to shreds. That means none of the other Emperors will be any threat to it, either. I'd like to hope the Wordsmith spent a massive pile of resources to build it, but that seems unlikely."

Ose pauses to cock her head.

"Bael. What happened to Mjolnir? Did I not bring it into battle?"

She pauses before quickly adding, "I'm referring to 'Big Bonk.'"

"Ohhh! Big Bonk! Yeah, yeah." Bael says, before shrugging. "Dunno. I wasn't there for the big fight. Abby, do you know what happened to Big Bonk?"

"I wasn't there either. I only heard what happened secondhand from other demons..." Abby says. "So. I'm not sure."

"In that case," Ose says, a glint appearing in her eye, "we may have gotten lucky. I placed a Rescue Beacon onto Mjolnir, so that in the event of my death it would appear in this very Armory!"

"In here?" Bael asks, doubtfully. "I don't see it anywhere."

He double-checks the artifacts in the room, yet not one of them appears to be Mjolnir.

"You forget what Mjolnir actually is." Ose says. "Or rather, you never knew in the first place. It is a transforming weapon, one that can shift its configuration at will. Take a look at the Matriarch Armor's 'belt.' I think you might find something interesting..."

Bael looks down at his waist. To his surprise, he notices a dull red gem affixed to a black belt, one that he didn't see earlier due to his excitement.

"Oh! Don't tell me, that's..."

"It is." Ose says, a smile on her face. "You know what to do."

Bael nods. He touches the gem with his gauntlet finger.

"Big Bonk! Stop hiding and get out here!"

All of a sudden, the red gem bursts outward with a brilliant red light. The 'belt' slips off the armor and transforms into the appearance of Camael's divine hammer, the weapon she used to forge countless artifacts, including Excalibur.

NONE ARE WORTHY TO WIELD MY POWER.

The divine hammer glows with radiance as it sweeps its 'gaze' across the three entities located in the same room.

It looks at ADAM.

UNWORTHY.

It looks at Abby.

UNWORTHY.

Then, it looks at Bael.

ALSO UNWORTHY. ALL ARE LACKING. NONE MAY UNLEASH MY POWER.

The hammer rockets toward Bael and crashes into his chest, knocking him backward.

Thunk!

Stunned, the Duke of Pain blinks twice before scowling in rage.

"Hey! Stupid hammer, what the FUCK?! How dare you hit me! It seems you've forgotten who's your daddy!"

He lifts up his fist, then swings it down against Mjolnir's head.

BOOM!!

The Matriarch Armor increases Bael's strength and resilience to a ludicrous level. He smashes the hammer against the ground, rocking the whole facility and causing many maintenance bots to topple over.

Then, he does it again. And again.

BOOM! BOOM!!

Bael beats the goddamn shit out of Mjolnir, causing it to experience that same ancient trauma from during the War in Heaven. A minute later, the hammer lays on the ground, shivering and shaking.

MASTER... I... I was a bad hammer. I have made an error in judgment. Please forgive me...

It shudders weakly and rubs up against the Matriarch Armor like a beaten dog looking for affection.

Bael snorts.

"Goddamn right, bitch. Stupid hammer. Always running off to do your own thing. Now, get on my belt!"

Mjolnir obediently transforms once again, attaching to the Matriarch Armor without a hitch.

As Ose watches the whole fiasco, her eyes glaze over, and she sighs more than a dozen times.

"...Only you could come up with such an idiotic 'taming' method and have it work, Bael. I originally attached Mjolnir when I was still in your body, but it must not have recognized you now that you're in mine. Anyway, it's good that you did. Mjolnir is actually the Matriarch Armor's power source! It can draw the mana from the divine hammer to empower its defenses, and most crucially, keep me alive. If Mjolnir had gotten away... that would have been a disaster."

The Emperor of Infiltration takes a step back and smooths her dress down, even though she is only an errant soul, lacking a true physical body.

"Now, then, Bael. It's time to talk business. We need to begin planning for the future..."

"...the future of demonkind's survival."

Part 398: Order to Chaos

Thousands of lightyears away, aboard the Founder's Spear.

Jason slowly sets a datapad on the table between himself and Unarin. He closes his eyes and massages the bridge of his nose and forehead. Several seconds pass as he quietly digests the reading material Unarin gave him.

Before long, he pulls his hand away and opens his eyes.

"...I don't get it."

Unarin slowly blinks.

"I wondered if you would. Order to Chaos is my foundational tome. Many Volgrim spend millennia reading it thousands of times to decipher its wisdom."

The Wordsmith raises an eyebrow. "No, I mean... I don't get what makes this so special. It's all about deciphering the chaos of how a society and culture structures itself in order to bring order to the chaos. Right? You talk multiple times in the book about architecture. You can look at how buildings are constructed all in order to get a feel for the society's special quirks. This all seems pretty obvious, surface-level. I don't get the 'hype' at all."

"Oh. I see." Unarin says, faintly smiling. "This is the first time someone has told me the concepts I espouse are 'simple' to comprehend. You must have reached a high degree of understanding already."

"Have I?" Jason asks. "I don't know. I'm not saying there's no wisdom to be found in the tome, but it all seems pretty obvious once you point it out. Of course societies are going to construct buildings in a specific way according to their values and arrange their cities to match their ideals. I hadn't thought about it before, but that doesn't seem like a particularly novel thought. Once you point it out, it's more of an 'oh, I guess that makes sense' thing than an 'oh that blows my mind' thing."

The First Founder falls silent for half a beat. He slowly blinks, perhaps more due to annoyance than any other reason.

"If you are so confident in Order to Chaos's lack of profundities, this should be a simple matter to prove. Here. Take a moment to look at this holo-image. It is a manipulable map of a certain city on a world under the Volgrim Empire. Tell me what you can discern about it."

Unarin holds his hands up over the table. A three dimensional image appears, showing hundreds of buildings rising and falling within a large area of around twenty square kilometers. Jason shrugs, then begins to manipulate the image with his hands.

As he examines it, Jason discovers that the city is not nearly as advanced as humanity's Fortress of Retribution, let alone anything he'd expect from the Volgrim. He also discovers, much to his surprise, that the city's central structures are much less developed than those at the periphery. The outermost perimeter appears quite wealthy, while the innermost areas appear underdeveloped and impoverished.

Jason spends several minutes examining the city before pulling back in his seat and looking at Unarin.

"This isn't a Volgrim city? Perhaps some colony you've neglected?"

"It is not." Unarin replies. "What species do you think it belongs to?"

"Well. There is a distinct aura of savagery about its infrastructure." Jason notes. "Many buildings are colored red, like blood. I didn't see any biological figures drawn inside this three-dimensional map, so I can't say with absolute certainty what species made this, but judging by the primitive designs... I'm thinking... perhaps Orcs?"

"Orcs!" Unarin says, visibly surprised. "Interesting. Perhaps you're more compatible with my philosophy than I expected. Do you have any further observations?"

Jason frowns. "Other observations. Hmm..."

He spends a few seconds re-examining the image.

"Well. I'm guessing this particular city started out here, along the flow of this river. Then, as it expanded outward, it also grew more wealthy over time. The outer structures were built more recently, where the wealthy could live, while the inner ones were never rebuilt, updated, or maintained. They've gradually fallen behind over the years, and now they're in a state of disrepair. The center of the city, once its core, is now a slum filled with violence and poverty."

"There are many such cases throughout the history of civilizations." Unarin says, smiling. "I'm genuinely surprised. After interacting with you for a while, I assumed I had misjudged your competencies. You are able to grasp the basic essence of Order to Chaos."

Unarin continues. "Civilization is a pathway to the soul of its people. Architecture gives us a glimpse into their values. Their psyche. By looking at how they lay out their buildings, we can learn what they value. Can you tell me what this city tells us about the Orcs?"

Jason shrugs. "Not really. They... don't care about their poor? Their rich are bastards? That's about all I can guess."

"A surface level observation." Unarin says, visibly disappointed. "But, still. You have a certain affinity for Order to Chaos. You're the second such seed I've found in recent cycles, a pleasant surprise, to be sure. Look at these buildings here. Do you see how they have utterly collapsed? Despite not being rebuilt, their debris was cleaned up and pushed aside. Now it appears to be a makeshift fighting ring."

Unarin continues. "We already know what sorts of creatures the Orcs are. Warlike, violent, filled with bloodlust. I consider this knowledge to be a form of 'cheating.' The true power of Order to Chaos lies in its ability to discern knowledge of a civilization, its people, its culture, and even its leaders, all without ever meeting them."

"From the way these few buildings have been repurposed into a fighting ring, we could conclude the rich are deliberately sowing chaos among their lessers to keep them battling one another instead of rising up to overthrow their entitled leaders. We could also conclude the poor use violence to cope with their problems, or that the people in the center of the city have left to seek out their fortunes, and as such are unable to maintain the city any longer."

"How do you discern their true motivations, then?" Jason asks. "If there are multiple possibilities, only one can be correct..."

"Wrong." Unarin says. "It's very possible for there to be multiple Truths existing at once, all in conflict. Perhaps a large portion of the populace left the city in search of better lands. Perhaps the rich use bloodsport to keep their lessers in line. And perhaps the common folk agree to use that violence to quell the anger in their hearts. Sometimes, contradictions are not contradictions, but the gradual flowing of-"

Before Unarin can finish his sentence, Muuxunuu's voice transmits from the cockpit, interrupting him.

"First Founder. We will arrive inside the Gallax system within five time-units. Please prepare yourself accordingly."

If her interruption annoys Unarin, it doesn't show on his face. He drops the conversation and turns his attention to other matters.

"We can discuss Order to Chaos later, Wordsmith. For now, let us focus on the Kolvaxians."

Jason's expression becomes serious. "Alright. I do have to ask, though. What exactly is a 'time unit'? I've heard your people mention 'cycles' and 'time-units' several times but I'm not sure how exactly they function."

"Time units are how the Volgrim measure time." Unarin answers. "Terrans use units of seconds, minutes, and hours. We use micro-time-units, time-units, and standard-time units. They are exactly equal in their duration."

"Exactly equal?" Jason repeats. "What, so a 'second' correlates to exactly one micro-time-unit? That seems a big coincidence."

"A coincidence? I think not." Unarin replies. "After all. Your units of time measurement came from the Volgrim."

Jason scrunches up his face in confusion. "What?? That doesn't make any sense. The Volgrim had nothing to do with Earth until the Energy Wars."

"Hahaha!" Unarin suddenly laughs, breaking his usual stoic exterior. "Come now, Wordsmith. Surely you must have realized that isn't the truth. My people watched over Earth for millennia. Our Changelings lived among you for that whole duration. We observed your wars and interfered with your politics. Naturally, our units of measurement passed down to you, and you renamed them."

Jason blinks twice, then looks away.

"Right. I knew that. I just... it feels so strange thinking you were always 'there' on Earth. The whole time, living among us."

"It was a trivial matter." Unarin says, waving his hands. "We are a galactic empire. Therefore, we have to maintain a close eye on our subjects. Particularly the unruly ones, or those capable of Uplifting themselves..."

"Indeed." Jason softly says, glancing at Unarin out of the corner of his eye.

The next few minutes pass in relative peace. Soon, a timer counts down over the ship's intercom, and the Founder's Spear drops out of subspace.

Immediately, Unarin retrieves information off the Volgrim Galactic Net. He looks up the current war situation, and his expression darkens.

"A seven percent increase in planetary assimilation speed. The Plague grows ever more adept with each consecutive victory."

Unarin summons a projection of one of the worlds in the system. A beautiful blue and green sphere, reminiscent of Earth, materializes above their table. Jason watches as millions of minuscule dots of red spread across the planet's surface, all originating from just one tiny pinprick-sized speck on the far side of the world.

"The first two worlds of the Gallax system have already fallen. Now, all that remains is the system's second paradise-class planet, Gallax Blue. As of this moment... sixty-three percent of the Volgrim have fallen to the Plague. The remaining survivors will tumble into its grasp within just three standard time-units."

"Three hours..." Jason says, his voice cracking, ever so slightly. "You have a whole fleet above the planet. Why can't you save those remaining?"

"The fleet above Gallax is not there to rescue any survivors." Unarin says, his visage aging visibly as a hint of grief washes across his face. "They are there to destroy any ships leaving at this late hour, as well as to hunt down and eliminate any Psionic plagueborn."

"What?!" Jason exclaims. "So if someone gets in a ship and races out of the planet's gravity well, you just... kill them??"

"It is not the course of action we most wish to take." Unarin whispers. "It is the most necessary one. In the past, we have allowed survivors to flee, only to realize the Plague had infected them. Their ships landed on other worlds, and they spread the infection. We even believe the Plague may have deliberately slowed its rate of infection to allow such occurrences."

Unarin suddenly slams his fist on the table, startling Jason!

"This plague! I HATE it!" Unarin roars. "It is not mindless! It is intelligent! It destroys any captured Plagueborn to stymie our efforts of studying it! It forces us to kill potential survivors! It targets worlds behind our backlines, and yet we still have no damned clue how it functions! Every cycle, it grows more powerful and more virulent! I can FEEL its hatred! It wishes not only to destroy the Volgrim, but to make us suffer and wallow in despair! It wants us to claw for every last drop of hope left in our souls, and then snuff out what light we have remaining!"

Unarin inhales and exhales heavily. His eyes burn with a blood-rage, one very uncharacteristic of how Jason has perceived him up to this point.

"I know this feeling. I KNOW IT! It is just the same as... as those ancient monsters! Those Sentinels! They also toyed with our lives! They also wished to break our spirits and render us unable to fight back! But I will not give up. I will never let my soul CRACK under this pressure! I defeated the Sentinels, and I WILL annihilate this Plague!!"

Unarin's outburst truly takes Jason by surprise. The Wordsmith hesitates for a few seconds while allowing the First Founder to regain his cool. Eventually, he simmers down. He lowers his fists beneath the table, only twitching his eye at the slight indent his strike left on the tabletop.

"Apologies. I lost control of my emotions. I will not allow that to happen again."

"There's no need to worry." Jason says, exhaling a breath he didn't realize he was holding. "It's understandable you would feel so strongly. But... what makes you think the Plague is sentient? Or rather, that it has hatred toward the Volgrim?"

"Only my intuition." Unarin says quietly. "Nothing more. We cannot observe Plagueborn for long. Observing them in the wild is exceedingly dangerous, and capturing them is impossible. They always kill themselves and decompose in fractions of a micro-time-unit, making any examinations all but impossible."

Unarin pulls up images of Gallax Blue, taken from live video feeds on the planet's surface. Jason's heart drops into the soles of his shoes as he sees hundreds of aliens fleeing through a field of grass, running with all their strength while a horde of two thousand mottled-skin monsters chase after them.

Suddenly, from directly in front of the survivors, a pair of Kolvaxians leap out of the ground, as if swimming through the planet's soil like an ocean. They pounce on a pair of Technopaths in the front and bite down onto them, then drag them into the planet's soil, while the other survivors pay their demise no heed. They keep running, ignoring the fallen, even as more Kolvaxians burst out of the ground and pounce upon them.

"Oh my god." Jason whispers. "This... this is live?! I have to do something! I have to try!"

Jason starts to stand up, but Unarin directs a fiery glance at him.

"And just what sort of action do you think you should take, Wordsmith? THINK! The last thing we need is for the Kolvaxians to get their hands on a Wordsmith! That would mean our immediate defeat! We already know they can inhabit the bodies of Psions and channel their powers! If Psionic Plagueborn are the biggest threat we currently face, a single Wordsmith Plagueborn would outrank them by a factor of infinity! We could only hope they fail to utilize your unique abilities... and that likely won't be the case!"

Jason listens to Unarin's words. He fully stands up, but remains rooted on the spot. After turning his attention inward, Jason takes a minute to consult with the myriad of denizens within his Mind Realm.

"...I have to try something." Jason finally says. "The Plague. It seems to infect people's bodies with something. Maybe I can convert them back to their original forms?"

"I will not lie." Unarin says. "It is my greatest hope that you can do such a thing. If you can convert them back, we may yet be able to stop the Plague. But I would advise that you only do so remotely. NEVER come into physical contact with a Plagueborn! The risks are too great!"

Jason watches the live feed for half a minute. He frowns deeply as even more of the survivors fall to the Kolvaxians. Soon, only a dozen remain.

"I have to try. Teleport!"

Instantly, one of the survivors vanishes from the spot. Unarin's eyes widen.

"What have you done? Where did you put them?"

"I moved them into the sky." Jason answers. "Approximately two miles above the ground, to be specific. They're free-falling, now. Freeze!"

Unarin scrambles to change the video feed's direction, and eventually points it upward, where he finds a frightened and confused female Technopath hovering in the air while flailing her arms about. Clearly, she has absolutely no idea what is going on.

"The Kolvaxians. Can they fly?" Jason asks.

"Only the Psions. This world does have a ten percent Psion populace, so some will surely travel to her new position shortly." Unarin answers. "What are you going to do with this Technopath?"

"I'm not sure yet." Jason answers. "Examine. Examine. Scan. Scan. Copy. Copy. Trace."

Unarin watches silently as the Wordsmith utters several Words of Power that seems to have no effect. However, judging by the slightly shifting expressions on Jason's face, he does manage to accomplish something.

"Okay. That should be enough. Teleport."

Once again, Jason teleports the Technopath female. She vanishes from the sky and reappears on the ground, right in the path of a horde of Kolvaxians. She barely has time to let out a scream of fright before being engulfed and dragged into the planet's depths.

Unarin flicks his eyes toward Jason, attempting to read his expressions.

"What are you doing? Why did you teleport her away, then back into-"

"Quiet." Jason says. "I'm thinking. Scan. Scan. Scan. Scan. Scan..."

Jason repeatedly speaks the same Word of Power. As he does, Unarin obtains an inkling of an idea as to the Wordsmith's scheme.

"You are... allowing the Technopath to be infected." Unarin says. "And scanning her body to capture whatever changes she is experiencing as she mutates."

"Truthfully, it wasn't my idea." Jason says. "Scan. Scan. Scan..."

Unarin falls completely silent. He says nothing, allowing Jason to repeat his monotonous words for the next thirty full minutes, until the Wordsmith finally stops.

Jason slowly sits back down, a look of deep contemplation on his face.

"...can't be right." Jason mutters, as if finishing off the second half of a sentence without uttering the first part. "I lost contact with her part of the way through. There's some sort of... interference."

"Interference?" Unarin asks. "What do you mean?"

Jason's expression turns grim. He swivels in his chair to face the First Founder.

"I sought to capture the physiological changes happening in the woman's body as she converted into a Plagueborn. At first, I was successful. But then, part of the way into her transformation, I lost contact with her. It was as if a void engulfed her. Something which completely blocked off my Wordsmithing."

"I tried to track her position." Jason continues. "I wanted to see where the Plague would drag her, kicking and screaming. It seemed there was something under the planet's surface, but when she drew close to it, and when her transformation reached a certain stage, I lost contact."

"You lost contact." Unarin repeats. "I am unfamiliar with the nuances of your abilities. Can I assume from your words that this is... out of the ordinary?"

"It is." Jason says quietly. "Or rather. It was."

Jason stares Unarin right in the eyes, his expression as cold as the abyss.

"I recently learned of a certain demon who was capable of nullifying the magical energy of any entity around himself. That demon was Gressil, the prison warden of the First Hell."

"I have heard his name uttered before." Unarin says mildly. "Are you implying..."

"I can't say for certain." Jason answers. "But the feeling I got... it was as if I had come into contact with Gressil again. A complete severing of my energy. Perhaps... perhaps the Plague is more homegrown than we thought."

"You seem to be implying Gressil either created the Plague or is otherwise involved in its existence." Unarin says, while moving his hands above the table and summoning every available file on the Hidden Emperor. Shockingly, he doesn't have much relevant info on the prison warden, and certainly not much that's up to date. "If you're on the right track, this is something we can certainly use. But do you truly think he is involved?"

Jason leans back in his seat.

He watches the live video feeds of the world, as they cycle from one group of survivors to the next.

Countless Volgrim scream silently, their words not captured by the monitoring systems. They collapse into heaps and piles, surrounded by monsters that grab onto them and drag them deep into the planet's bowels.

All the while, Jason quietly ponders this potential new revelation.

"Gressil... is hatred incarnate." Jason murmurs. "He is always angry. Always filled with rage. But could he infect these people? Possibly. After all... his mother..."

"His mother?" Unarin asks.

"Emperor Lucifer." Jason says. "She was a demoness capable of creating new life, or mutating existing ones. She could certainly be capable of creating the Plague."

"Not possible." Unarin says, waving his hand. "Emperor Lucifer was the Codex. She perished during the Energy Wars. Unless she prepared the seeds for the Plague well beforehand and waited thousands of cycles to unleash it, I don't see that being a possibility."

As Unarin casually discounts the notion, he spots a strange look of confusion on Jason's face.

"Wait. Unarin... you don't know? Lucifer is... she's still alive."

The First Founder's expression freezes on his face.

"What. No. That's not possible. What do you mean?"

"She's alive." Jason repeats. "And her body... it's attached to Gressil's. He devoured her. He consumed her, killed her, and now they've become one being... you're telling me you had no idea?"

"I didn't!" Unarin exclaims, clearly shocked. "All this time, the Codex has been among the realm of the living?!"

"Now it's my turn to be confused." Jason says. "What is this 'Codex' and why do you keep referring to Lucifer by that term?"

Unarin gazes at the rapidly dwindling lives on Gallax Blue, no longer interested in their fates. His expression becomes distant.

"Do you remember what I told you before, Wordsmith? About how all of the different species, such as the Orcs and Goblins originated on their own worlds? And how Earth was designated an Anomalous World due to its seemingly impossible concentration of species from other planets?"

He pauses.

"Well. That was a matter we spent time investigating, until ultimately discovering the existence of the Codex. Our search into Lucifer's history... it revealed many surprising facts..."

Jason nods.

"I'm listening."

Part 399: Cosmic Corruption

Unarin stares off quietly into the distance. His eyes gloss over slightly.

"Lucifer. The Demon Emperor of Providence."

"For hundreds of millennia, long before we Volgrim marked Earth as a planet worthy of note, we had already explored the limits of our humble galaxy. We had marked thousands of life-bearing worlds with interest."

"The species you call goblins, and fairies, and orcs, and minotaurs... these creatures did not originate on Earth, nor were they void-faring civilizations, either. Some of them, such as the fairies, might be capable of escaping their planet's gravity wells via their unique abilities, but never could they traverse the Void in any meaningful way due to lacking faster-than-light travel methods."

Unarin pauses for a moment. His eyes regain a hint of vigor.

"Imagine my surprise, then, when my people one day stumbled upon Earth. On it, there was a rich ecosystem with not one dominant species, but four, and hundreds of lesser species competing in the dark for access to the planet's riches."

"All those worlds... all those creatures incapable of traversing the void, and yet somehow, they all ended up on a single planet."

Unarin turns to Jason and smiles faintly.

"Don't you find that odd, Wordsmith?"

Jason slowly nods. "...It was Lucifer. The 'Codex' as you put it."

"Mmm. Yes." Unarin says. "It took us a while, but we managed to trace the origin of all these earth-faring species to one individual. Lucifer proclaimed herself a 'mutator' of species. She believed that she was creating new life. What she did not understand was that the 'new species' she created were in fact ones which already existed, all across the Milky Way."

"So how was she able to do that?" Jason asks. "What's the key link?"

"I was never sure of the answer to that question." Unarin says. "Not until we sat down and talked. You have opened my eyes to a certain possibility. I believe that all life in the Milky Way... all sentient species, descends from the energy of far more powerful ones."

The First Founder hesitates for several seconds, as if deliberating upon something in his mind.

Slowly, hesitantly, he stands up and walks over to the wall across from his table. He presses his palm against a seemingly ordinary section of the corridor, and it hisses open, sliding out of a seamless gap to reveal a small inner pocket.

There, the Wordsmith senses a familiar wave of magical energy, one that makes him tense up.

"What the hell...?"

Jason gets out of his chair. He walks up behind Unarin as the First Founder turns around and holds out his palm, revealing a small glowing metal stone, one that radiates emissions of mana.

"...This is Living Moldanium." Unarin says quietly. "A tiny cache of it. I keep it in the Founder's Spear to ensure I always have it available for comparison, should we stumble across more."

Jason's heart skips a beat. "This... this is Living Moldanium?! But... it feels like..."

"Why do you think the Volgrim call it Living Moldanium?" Unarin asks, rhetorically. "In truth, it is not a naturally made alloy. It is a 'spiritually reactive' alloy which can only be found in the smallest and most minuscule deposits. That is because Living Moldanium is not an alloy at all."

He looks at the Wordsmith meaningfully.

"Living Moldanium is actually formed from the remains of dead dragons. It is dragon-bone condensed by natural forces."

"Dragon-bone!" Jason exclaims. "Then... the Warpgates... you made them all out of dead dragons?!"

Unarin falls silent for a short moment before slowly shaking his head.

"Living Moldanium used to be much more easily accessible. In fact, we found deposits of it on every world we stumbled across. Every world containing life, that is. This discovery caused us to falter on many occasions. We weren't certain what the link was."

He pauses before continuing.

"...You believed a dragon was responsible for the attack on Valhalla. Tell me straight, Wordsmith. Do you truly believe that to be the case? Do you think a Primordial monster might still live somewhere in our galaxy?"

Jason hesitates.

"Well, I... I can't say for certain. I mean... it could be... well, I might be wrong, but..."

Jason quickly consults with Fiona in his Mind Realm. Unarin remains silent when he sees Jason's eyes tilt to the side, a sign that he must be talking with Raphael and whoever else is inside his head.

The Wordsmith returns to reality a few moments later, having gone through a whole discussion at the speed of thought.

"Let's sit down." Jason says, as he turns and walks back to the table.

Unarin nods.

The two of them take their seats once again, no longer paying any attention to the chaos on the monitors. Gallax Blue's fall may as well be a distant memory to them at this point.

Unarin places the Living Moldanium on the table, allowing the Wordsmith to touch it and react to it as he likes.

"There are some... discrepancies... which I haven't told you." Jason says, his voice soft. "Since you've already gotten this far, I guess I should ask: Are you aware that a dragon lived on Earth?"

"Lived?" Unarin repeats. "Not died?"

"That's right. I'm guessing you don't know."

Unarin frowns slightly.

"We scanned the planet's deepest depths countless times. Draconic energy should have a frighteningly distinct signature, yet we never picked anything up. Curiously, we also never found a single Living Moldanium deposit on Earth. It was yet another anomaly in our investigations..."

"The story goes a little something like this..." Jason says.

For the next twenty minutes, Jason debriefs Unarin on a great many events which occurred during Earth's Ancient Era.

Unarin learns about the Imps' revolt in Heaven.

He learns of their stumbling into Leviathan's lair, and the dragon's subsequent empowering of their bodies, souls, and minds.

Jason details how Leviathan puppeteered Satan and the rest throughout the ages, then ultimately revealed his Truths to Archangel Samael.

"Archangel Samael was the one who placed down formations to hide Leviathan's energy signature?" Unarin questions. "That would explain why our best Psions and most powerful reconnaissance vessels could not locate the dragon. He was hidden too deeply."

Jason nods. "There's more..."

He then tells Unarin about what happened following Heaven's fall. Unarin learns of Raphael's deception involving the Heroic Aura. He learns of Jepthath's fall and how the Archangels orchestrated the alteration of the Heroic Aura's properties, all facts Jason later learned from Gabriel and Raphael.

Finally, Jason reaches the important part.

"...and then Satan killed the Black Witch, Amelia. After she died, Leviathan emerged from her body and permanently slew Satan. Surely you knew this part?"

Unarin shakes his head. "I did not. I only knew the Black Witch ultimately smote the Devil dead. I did not hear of the dragon's involvement."

"I only learned about this event recently, myself." Jason mutters. "Lucifer apparently showed the whole thing off to Belial during their fight."

"You seem to have skipped an important detail." Unarin says, narrowing his eyes. "How did the dragon end up inside of Amelia Greyheart?"

"I don't know." Jason answers. "Amelia and I... we aren't terribly close. She's actually with my, uh, my clone. Hope."

"You don't sound excited about that development." Unarin notes. "Jealous?"

"It's not like that." Jason quickly says. "I'm married. But... I did have strong feelings for Amelia at one point. Until she cut my throat and left me for dead."

"Mmm. The nuances of human interaction don't interest me." Unarin says, waving his hand dismissively. "But since you are telling me Leviathan is dead, surely that must mean the last dragon has perished. Yet, for some reason, you seem to believe another might be out there. What might lead you along this train of thought?"

Having already talked to the others about this, Jason can only grit his teeth and summon the willpower to partially lay bare his secret.

"...Some time back, I discovered an... ancient artifact." Jason says. "From the... Primordial Era. I found evidence that a dragon was once encased within and broke free."

"Oh? I should like to examine this 'artifact' for myself." Unarin says, a coy smile playing upon his lips. "Would you mind showing it to me?"

"I would." Jason says, his tone stoic. "Forgive me, your eminence, but I don't trust you. You'll just have to take my word on it."

"Ahaha. You don't trust me... and perhaps you shouldn't." Unarin chuckles. "But let us assume you are correct in your guess. Why not mention it before?"

"Because I honestly thought the dragon that escaped was Leviathan." Jason answers. "The timelines seemed to match up. I believed that Samael broke him out of the artifact and then hid him on Earth. For the longest time, I assumed Leviathan was the last living member of his species. Now I believe that I was wrong. There may be another... and if so, he is not the same as his brother."

Jason continues. "I don't know what you've learned about the dragons, Unarin. What I do know is that they were not a violent, overbearing species. They were the victims of angelkind's genocidal tendencies. They fought back against the attacks launched against them, but they did not seek vengeance. Leviathan was certainly not an unkind monster, not by any means. He was quite soft-hearted, because if he was not, he could have annihilated the angels on Earth with a wave of his claws."

"Even so," Jason concludes, "the Leviathan I observed, the one shown to me during the Ancient Era, may have only possessed half of his maximum power. Dragons split their entire power among themselves. It is likely that when Leviathan died after resurrecting Amelia, the remnants of his power traveled to his brother or sister inside the containment artifact, giving them the strength to break free. Then, they attacked Valhalla and killed the Titans."

Unarin frowns. He slowly drums his fingers on the table, while contemplating a great many things.

"Certainly possible." Unarin mutters. "But if the dragons were mostly non-violent, why attack Valhalla at all? And why stop there? Why not spread out to attack my people, or any number of other targets?"

"I have a few theories." Jason says. "First. The dragon may have broken free and found out their hated enemies were almost all dead. Perhaps the Volgrim and other sentients were as insignificant to it as gnats, but it likely still held a grudge against the Titans, who were hand-made by the angels to hunt down and kill the dragons."

"Second," Jason continues, "it's entirely possible the dragon was injured. Maybe escaping from my artifact or battling the Titans caused it serious wounds. It may have fled to go and recuperate."

"Third, maybe it just doesn't give a shit about you." Jason finishes. "You think of yourselves as a galaxy-class civilization. But maybe you're just not all that special, eh? Maybe the dragon doesn't care about a few septillion gnats."

"All of those possibilities are potentially true." Unarin says. "But there is another. Perhaps the dragon attacked the Titans to ensure they couldn't threaten him in the future. Perhaps he is not as kind-hearted as his brother, Leviathan. Perhaps he is biding his time, regaining his strength, and waiting for the chance to strike."

"Yeah. Maybe." Jason concedes. "But it's been something like ninety thousand years since Valhalla's destruction. Why wait so long?"

"Who says he is waiting?" Unarin snorts. "This Plague... there are far too many issues with it. Plagueborn possess bizarre and strange abilities. They came from seemingly nowhere. I was content to imagine a dragon might have been guiding their actions, but now you claim 'Emperor Gressil' might be involved as well. For a Demon Emperor to quietly step onto the scene and yet for me to not know, he has hidden himself well. His schemes run deep."

The First Founder's aged and insightful mind works like lightning as he pieces several possibilities together.

"Gressil might be strong, but in the end he is only a Demon Emperor. My sixth and seventh ranked Psions can annihilate him in an instant, let alone a living dragon. If there is a puppeteer involved, it would not be him. He would be that entity's agent."

"You... think Gressil might be working for the dragon?" Jason whispers. "That's a frightening thought."

Unarin's eyes twitch several times. He looks at the far wall with a distant haze obscuring his pupils.

"What frightens me the most is that I still feel as if I am overlooking something, or perhaps someone. Could the dragon be spreading the Plague to weaken and assimilate us? To what end? Perhaps he wishes to turn the whole galaxy into his hosts? But perhaps he may want to convert us all into something more 'digestible'? Maybe if he assimilates and devours us, his strength will reach new heights."

"But even if we assume a dragon is behind the Plague," Unarin continues, "I still hold too many unanswered questions. How does this knowledge help me? How can I put it to good use defeating the Plague? And even if I do somehow succeed in wiping the Plagueborn from existence, how am I supposed to battle a dragon? I fear even Founder Dosena won't be such a monster's match."

Jason and Unarin both fall silent.

The two men, leaders of their respective civilizations, watch in silence as countless Technopaths scream in silence and fall to the Plague's clutches on Gallax Blue. With a few more hours to go before the planet becomes fully assimilated, it will be a while before their suffering finally ends.

"Unarin." Jason says, his tone contemplative. "How do the Plagueborn arrive on worlds?"

"We don't know." Unarin answers. "They simply... appear. We've checked the records of countless fallen planets. We've scoured their video feeds, their planetary scanners, and other such things. Every time, the pattern always starts the same. A single Plagueborn climbs out of the dirt and makes its way toward the nearest population center. By the time the defenders realize it has arrived, they've lost the initiative. All the Plagueborn needs to do is infect a few dozen locals and just like that, the spread will occur unstoppably."

"It's that easy?" Jason asks, perplexed. "You've never managed to kill the first Plagueborn before it starts assimilating a world?"

"We have!" Unarin exclaims. "On at least a hundred occasions. But it doesn't matter. If you kill the first Plagueborn, a second will appear on the same world, elsewhere. And if you kill it, a third will appear. One of them is sure to succeed in their infection efforts, even if the locals immediately raise the alert level to maximum."

Jason scrunches up his face in confusion.

"You're... you're telling me... the Plague can just materialize on planets? Then what's with all the armadas and the battle-lines in space? Kind of fucking pointless, don't you think?"

"No." Unarin says, his voice quiet. "I am referring to isolated Plaguehosts. Single-host infections that bring planets to ruin. But out there in the Void, there exist hundreds of planets fully consumed by the Plague. And those planets... they have countless Psionic hosts capable of traversing the void. Our armadas exist purely to stop them."

"We used to obliterate any worlds taken by the Plague." Unarin says, closing his eyes. "It was the only way to permanently stop their advance. But Marie Becker's Neutron Bombs, while powerful, cannot be replicated rapidly. Glassing them from space won't kill the Plagueborn either, as they can hide deep underground through their unique methods. We cannot destroy every single world in existence just to stop the Plague. And if we did do that, we'd have to give up all hope of ever mounting a counter-offensive. At this point, our best chance of total victory is to discover a cure for the contagion, but all our efforts have proven fruitless."

Unarin leans back in his chair, a look of faint despair on his face.

"Ruthless. Unstoppable. Lacking morality, or virtue, or pride, or fear. Not one iota of compassion or remorse. Our enemy is inexorable. If we can't defeat them, they will continue until they have devoured the entire galaxy."

The Wordsmith examines Unarin's face for several moments. He debates internally on whether to speak of the secret he's been holding all this time.

Seeing Unarin's despair, he finally makes the choice.

"Unarin. Have you heard of... the Cosmic Realm?"

The First Founder blinks his eyes heavily. "I assume you are not referring to the Void? Not some fancy human term for it?"

"No." Jason says quietly. "It is the birthplace of the angels. Or rather... it was."

Unarin slightly frowns. "What do you mean?"

"Let me put it this way." Jason explains. "When I lived on Earth, my world was enveloped by a fourth dimension, one known as Heaven. Heaven existed by exchanging life energy with the creatures of Earth to sustain itself."

"Valhalla is similar." Jason continues. "It seems to have enveloped the world of Grimvolas, though whether fully or in part, I do not know."

"Then, you can look at the Labyrinth of Hell as a greater example. Satan constructed a realm in the fourth dimension that slowly grows over time by feeding upon the energy of its denizens. Hell is much larger now than at any point in its past. It exists at a boundary way beyond the likes of Heaven and Valhalla."

"But the Cosmic Realm..." Jason concludes. "...The Cosmic Realm is far bigger than both. It envelops the entire Milky Way. It is a realm countless times bigger than Hell. The angels were apparently created there, if Raphael's words ring true. And now I must tell you the awful truth."

"What truth?" Unarin asks, leaning forward. "Speak!"

"The Cosmic Realm..." Jason mutters. "It has been completely overtaken by the Kolvaxians... and I fear they are using it to transfer themselves between the worlds of the Milky Way. It would explain why they are able to appear out of nowhere on worlds without any warning. Worlds such as these three Gallax planets, as well as Sharmur and the rest."

Unarin's jaw hangs open.

He stares at the Wordsmith with a mixture of bewilderment and disbelief.

Not since his angry outburst has Unarin so visibly lost his composure.

"You... when were you going to tell me this?!" Unarin roars. "What is the Cosmic Realm exactly? How does it function? How does it sustain itself? How far does it reach? Can we enter it to destroy the Kolvaxians contained within?!"

Jason shakes his head. "I don't have all the answers. In fact, I hardly have any. But now, I think it is about time we brought another person to the table. I believe he will be able to answer all your questions."

Humanity's Hero holds up his right hand, revealing the plain golden band on his ring-finger.

"Materialize."

A hazy image of a winged old man materializes to the side of the table. His expression grave, the Archangel of Wisdom glances at Jason, annoyed at being summoned without consulting him first. Then, he turns his head slightly to look at Unarin.

"Unarin."

"Raphael." Unarin replies, his tone curt. "It has been a while."

"In my eyes, 'twas merely a blink of the eye." Raphael murmurs. "My people died because of thee."

"They died because of your own greed." Unarin snaps back. "Always so eager to blame others. I pray you will be able to afford some insight into this Plague. Or, perhaps you'd be quite content seeing the Volgrim go extinct, just as your people did? I imagine it would give you quite a sensation of glee."

"Hmph. The death of your species shan't bring mine back." Raphael says. "But 'twould make me feel a great deal better."

"Raphael." Jason says. "I didn't bring you here to argue with the First Founder. We need your insight. I want you to tell him all you know about the Cosmic Realm. If the Volgrim fall, so too will humanity, and any further chances of reviving the angels. It's in your best interest to help us both out, you know."

"That's right." Unarin says, slyly smirking at Raphael. "Oh, the Wordsmith probably won't bring the angels back, but you need that sliver of hope still, don't you? You need to believe in the chance angelkind may someday revive. Though I must question if it will even matter when all your brothers and sisters are dead. The newly created ones may be angels in name, but would you ever accept them? It is difficult to say."

"First Founder, ever thou art the conniving snake." Raphael says, more bored by Unarin's taunts than infuriated. "I have made my peace. Three of my siblings still draw breath. Thou should knoweth this truth, given our obliteration of thy pathetic fleet in the Hell Harbor system. And who knows? Perhaps I mayeth unleash such an attack again, shoulds't though continue to test my patience."

Unarin's smirk vanishes. In its place, a slightly befuddled expression replaces it. He averts his eyes and snorts.

"Primordial horrors. Your kind cannot die out quickly enough."

"Time passes, and the young grow up to replace the old." Raphael muses. He walks over to a chair beside Jason at the table and takes a seat. With only room for four people, the space isn't exactly large and luxurious, but it does feel somewhat intimate, with the participants forced to sit within spitting distance of one another.

"The Cosmic Realm." Raphael says, after taking his seat. "Many eons have passed since I first created that area..."

Part 400: Gallax's Fall

Raphael closes his eyes and begins to speak.

"In the beginning, there was only the Creator and the Void. Then, my Father made me, his first son. He named me Raphael. He gave me light. He showed me the creation of our galaxy. He told me to be fruitful and spread the seed of life."

Jason frowns. "I thought the Cosmic Realm was where all the angels were made?"

"Nay. I created the Cosmic Realm to form more angels from the dust of the cosmos," Raphael explains, "for I could not spread those seeds all by myself."

"If you could create angels, why didn't you make more after all the Dragon Wars and Titan Wars and all that other stuff?" Jason pushes further.

"When I was still young and newly formed, my Father gave me a portion of his... creative power." Raphael explains haltingly. "And so, I created the Cosmic Realm, which gave life to a billion of my brothers and sisters. Unfortunately, what followed were the first holy wars of angelkind, where they fought one another to alleviate their boredom and satiate their bloodlust. During this period, I exhausted what remained of my creative powers. My final act was to plant the last seed of creation inside one of my sisters, Uzziel, who later went on to assist me in creating the dragons and Titans."

"The dragons you hunted like dogs in the street." Unarin snorts. "And then what? The Cosmic Realm fell apart?"

"Nay. It remained as a place for the fallen among my brothers and sisters to return to." Raphael says. "Someday, if I should die, I too shalt dissipate and return to the dust of the Cosmic Realm."

"So you made the Cosmic Realm yourself, which you then used to make all the other angels?" Jason asks, while mentally recalling the things Raphael told him during the Ancient Era. "These details seem a little different from what you told me before. Are you lying to me?"

"Not lying. Expanding." Raphael says, casually waving a hand. "I hath no need to lie. The angels art gone. Nothing remains but a shred of my pride."

"Let's get specific." Unarin says. "Explain to me how we can access the Cosmic Realm. I must destroy the Kolvaxians contained within. Also, I need to know how they might be escaping the Cosmic Realm to land on worlds. Why don't they do so more often? Why only a single Kolvaxian at a time? Are there hard limits for traveling to and from the Cosmic Realm?"

Raphael slowly shakes his head.

"Verily, I know not why the Kolvaxians act the way they do. If they possesseth the power to enter and exit the Cosmic Realm, there art no reason they cannot do so at will. Within a day, they could easily make planetfall upon every populated world in the galaxy."

"...And yet they do not." Unarin murmurs, a strange look playing upon his face. The First Founder leans back and touches his chin while lowering his eyes to the table before him. "How strange. Perhaps they are too mindless to precisely target planetary coordinates? No. That cannot be the case. We would surely have stumbled across hundreds of Plagueborn floating in the void, individuals who misjudged their 'jump' locations by half a lightyear or so. The void is incredibly vast. Making a precise landing upon a planet must be all but impossible for a species like them, and yet they manage to do so on a reliable basis."

Jason shares a similar strange expression as the First Founder.

"Unarin, is it possible... well, is it possible the Plague really are just some entity working on behalf of a much more powerful and conniving foe? Perhaps this dragon...?"

"If so, it would explain a great many things." Unarin says. "As I said before, I believe the Plague's goal is not only to consume and assimilate, but to spread fear and terror. It is as if they are a biological weapon of vengeance. It's not enough that they ultimately consume and destroy my people, but also cause us despair. As for the recent attack on Sharmur, it was the first time the Plague fell upon a demon-controlled world, but not the first time it devoured a world owned by a non-Volgrim species. Although..."

Unarin cocks his head, then lifts his eyes to look at Raphael and Jason.

"It is strange. Are you aware that the Plague only consumes intelligent life?"

"I beg your pardon?" Jason asks. "What do you mean? Like, it ignores animals?"

"That is correct. The Plague does not infect simple creatures or beasts of burden. It only infests the bodies and minds of creatures rated above a zero-point-five on the Volwareness Quotient. Any species below that, it strictly ignores. It will infest goblins, orcs, fairies, Volgrim... but to use examples from your homeworld of Earth, it will not infest the bodies of cows, rats, or even Dolphins. Perhaps 'vengeance' truly is its main goal."

"Verily, Unarin," Raphael says, changing the topic somewhat abruptly. "A question resteth upon my mind. Earlier, thou spoketh of the Codex, yet failed to elaborate on how Emperor Lucifer played into thy designs. Art we to believe that Lucifer is some sort of magic species-unlocking mechanism?"

If Unarin is bothered about the shift in topics, he doesn't show it on his face.

"That's right. Earth was a unique world filled with species from all across the galaxy. We believe that when Lucifer obtained her powers, she became capable of creating life forms spread by the dragons. When dragon energy lands upon a planet, it enriches the world with life energy, allowing the seeds of creation to take hold. As for why Lucifer was able to harness the unified power of draconic creation, it seems quite obvious now, doesn't it?"

Unarin snorts.

"Leviathan gave her his power directly. It is entirely possible he allowed her to tap into the unified DNA of all dragons, and so she became capable of creating any life which existed as a result of dragonkind's spread."

"You're only guessing." Jason says. "Maybe there's some other reason."

"It is the most likely one, given the circumstances." Unarin says coolly.

For a brief moment, all three men fall silent. Jason communicates with Fiona in his Mind Realm, and after they exchange insights, he returns to the topic at hand.

"The Kolvaxians don't infect lower-intelligence creatures. They ignore them. They most likely teleport to worlds through the use of the Cosmic Realm. Furthermore, they may be moving slowly specifically to cause the Volgrim and other Sentients as much emotional and mental distress as possible. And finally, a dragon might be involved, as well as Emperor Gressil. Have I missed anything?"

"That seems about everything." Unarin replies. "Can you think of a way to convert a Kolvaxian back to its original body? Surely your Wordsmithing must have some effect?"

Jason chews his lower lip. "I don't think I can directly apply the effect of a Word of Power to a Kolvaxian. They have the same energy field as Gressil protecting them, so my magic won't have any direct effect..."

He pauses.

"Though a voice in my head tells me I might still be able to use my reality-defying abilities to create a device that can revert their forms. Unarin, you said before the Kolvaxians would self-immolate to ash if you captured them alive. How does that work?"

The First Founder waves his hand. He conjures a video feed above the table of a group of Psions on some remote planet surrounding a Kolvaxian, yanking it into the air, and attempting to place special restraints upon it.

Before they can complete their task, the monster opens its mouth, releases a soundless cry, and... fizzles away!

It dissolves into ash, as if an invisible fire had consumed it and burned every last molecule of its body to nothingness.

Jason blinks twice. "Okay. That's alarming."

"For these creatures to exhibit such an ability, perhaps they mayest possess a link to one another? Some sort of magical or non-magical connection?" Raphael posits.

"A mental link. Yes. It's quite obvious they do." Unarin replies. "Though we aren't certain as to the details. If we assume the Kolvaxians have some sort of magical link to one another, we still have to uncover a method to decrypt or block it. My best Changelings have tried for decades to do so, yet all of their efforts have failed."

Jason goes quiet. He stares at Unarin for a few moments before slowly blinking.

"You know, Unarin. If your best scientists and geniuses cannot think of a method, there is another way."

Unarin narrows his eyes.

"...You want me to give you Solomon's Crown."

"Oh? Are you a Psion in disguise?" Jason asks. "Your mind-reading skills aren't bad."

"I've been waiting for you to bring it up." Unarin says. "You may not have the Knowledge-Seeker's relic. I've hidden it away where none may touch it. The Mind-Thief is not anyone's ally. Not yours, and certainly not mine."

"You stole Solomon's Crown from me." Jason says, lowering his voice to a quiet hiss. He leans forward, while a dark and brooding expression swallows his face. "I don't know how you did it. Perhaps a Psion stole it from atop my head, or perhaps you used some other method. But I know what I saw. You held the Crown during your fancy conference for all of Volgrimkind to see. So, if you expect our relationship to progress any further, you had better hand it to me now. Cut the crap and give me what's mine."

As Jason pushes his presence toward Unarin, the First Founder doesn't visibly react. The Wordsmith's speech splashes against his face without creating a disturbance, then fades into the ether.

"We did not steal the Crown from you." Unarin says dryly. "On the contrary. One of our agents discovered the Crown lying in a random corridor of the Labyrinth. If it was so important to you, why would you drop it in some inexplicable location deep within Hell's depths?"

The Wordsmith pauses. He frowns at this new information.

"...You're lying."

"I'm not." Unarin retorts. "Please. If I stole it from you, I'd say I did. Whether I took it from you directly or found it laying around, ultimately I possessed the ability to seize it, and so I did. I won't let the Mind-Thief roam about to sap whatever knowledge he likes from the unwitting. He's far too dangerous."

Jason glances at Raphael. The Archangel of Wisdom lightly shrugs.

"I know not the circumstances behind the Crown's disappearance." Raphael says. "I know only as much as thee."

Jason thinks back to the moment he found the Crown was missing.

In that short period when he found himself unable to wake up, only to do so a minute later and find the Crown was gone...

Did Solomon somehow take control of his body? Did he cast a Word of Power without Jason's consent?

Jason recalls his unconscious 'battle' with Hope, when a sliver of Solomon's will took over Jason's mind and manipulated him, nearly killing Belial.

"Can... can Solomon take over people's bodies?" Jason hesitantly asks.

"I haven't an answer." Unarin says. "Perhaps he can, but perhaps he cannot. He is the Mind-Thief, though. Such an action does lay within the realm of possibility."

Unarin's words cause Jason to sink deeper into doubt. He leans back in his seat and ponder Solomon's last words before he departed.

Perhaps he did, in fact, leave Jason of his own volition. Could he have taken any other actions? And why would he have sent himself to a random hallway in the Labyrinth?

I'm missing an important clue... Jason thinks.

After mulling over the implications for a short while, Jason slowly shakes his head.

"...Alright. Maybe it's better if I don't deal with Solomon. But his artifact is still an item which should rightfully belong to humanity and myself. Not just his artifact, but every other one as well!"

Jason raises his chin.

"I want Excalibur."

Unarin blinks slowly.

"King Arthur's blade? I don't have it."

"Do you think I'm stupid?" Jason asks. "Confessor Vulpanix said you guys had it. Not to mention I saw your broadcast, and you know I did. Stop playing hard to get. It's fucking irritating."

The First Founder rolls his eyes. "Alright. I do have it. And you're not getting it, either."

"Do you want our collaboration to end here?" Jason asks.

"Heh." Unarin chuckles humorlessly. "Do you?"

"What is that supposed to mean?"

"Use your head, Wordsmith." Unarin replies. "Our relationship so far is tenuous, but essential. You need my resources, and I need your skills. I can assist you in building up humanity's strength to a point where you can help us battle the Plague. But do you really think I'm going to give you access to the greatest mind among humankind, or Camael's mightiest artifact? Think again."

He continues. "I have no reason to trust that you won't immediately turn the divine blade against me in the future. It's better it stays safe and secure in my vaults."

After a momentary pause, Unarin adds: "And I can't give it away right now, anyway. My researchers are making good use of its abundant magical power source."

"What are you doing with it?" Jason asks, narrowing his eyes. "I'm not comfortable with the species that annihilated humanity possessing humanity's greatest weapon."

"Bah! Your 'greatest weapon'!" Unarin guffaws. "Pathetic. Just one Eighth-Ranked Psion could lay to waste that so-called 'Hero-King' and we've five of them. Excalibur is indeed only slightly weaker than a Primordial artifact, but compared to the might of Volgrim civilization, it is merely a quaint and useful mud-dweller relic that we can use to broaden our understanding of magical metaphysics."

"If it's so quaint, then surely you won't mind giving it up." Jason says quietly.

"It would become a weapon of mass destruction in your hands." Unarin replies, his voice equally low. "I already know that the scope of your abilities are limited by the quantity and quality of the mana within yourself. If you were to obtain Excalibur, you could unleash effects tens of thousands of times greater than any you've displayed in the past. Forgive me, Wordsmith, but I have yet to come to trust you with wielding such power."

"You're terrified I'd turn Excalibur against you." Jason snaps back. "Admit the truth."

"Oh, certainly, that is one of my concerns." Unarin admits. "But do you really think it's my primary concern? Excalibur is extremely dangerous. The divine blade has a mind of its own."

Unarin suddenly pauses. A smile crooks upon the corner of his lip. He turns to look at Raphael.

"Oh. Did you not tell the Wordsmith, Raphael? About what happened to Arthur, I mean? About the mistake he made when wielding Camael's mightiest artifact?"

Jason frowns. He glances at Raphael.

"Hm? What mistake? What's Unarin talking about?"

The Archangel of Wisdom sighs for the tenth time in as many days.

"The Greatest Sinner. That is the title King Arthur assumed... after that day..."

He slowly shakes his head.

"'Twas not Arthur's fault. His wife had suffered immeasurably. The blade spoke to his wrath. In that moment, he lost control. Ten million souls, extinguished in the blink of an eye. Demons, humans, and even a Titan King. An entire human city vanished that day, never to be seen again."

"Excalibur is dangerous." Unarin says. "Some Terran brat with only six cycles of experience should not place its hilt within his grasp. Even if you were Founder Dosena herself, my closest ally, I would not trust you with such a dangerous weapon."

"As far as humans go, I'm a fully grown adult." Jason says. "I don't appreciate your constant condescension toward my age. If you're so old and wise, why even rely on a stupid young idiot like me to deal with this Plague? Maybe it's time you start showing me some genuine sincerity. I want Solomon's Crown and Excalibur. Period. End of story."

No matter how Jason pushes, Unarin doesn't give an inch.

"Your insistence will not change my mind nor sway me to action." Unarin says. "You need me as much as I need you, but neither of us needs you to possess the Mind-Thief's artifact, nor an unimaginably destructive weapon."

"What can I do to convince you otherwise?" Jason asks.

"Absolutely nothing."

The Wordsmith presses Unarin a few more times, but eventually gives up when he sees Unarin won't concede.

"You know I could hunt the artifacts down and take them by force, right?" Jason asks.

"You could try." Unarin says, smiling. "If you want to find out just how much power my Psions actually wield."

"I don't have a pressing need for either artifact now." Jason says. "But if that changes in the future, don't think I won't make a move. Underestimate my Wordsmithing at your own risk."

"Trust me, Jason Hiro." Unarin whispers. "I never underestimate anyone."

The two continue exchanging light barbs and dry words for a while as the Gallax system crumbles. Unable to save any of the world's populace, the Wordsmith ultimately gives up for the moment, deciding that he and his two wives will have to work on a solution when he returns home.

Unarin presses a button on the table.

"Muuxunuu. Set course back to Volgarius. Warp 9."

"Yes, First Founder." Muuxunuu replies, her limpid voice transmitting over the craft's speakers. "We are only able to make seven more jumps at maximum warp. Please keep this in mind moving forward."

As the Founder's Spear starts to ignite its warp drive, Jason glances at Unarin.

"What's all this about limited jumps? Something we need to worry about?"

"All Volgrim vessels run on Trifrancium." Unarin explains. "It is the most energetic compound in the universe, capable of restoring its own energy over time, in a similar manner to Excalibur. It allows ships to jump to warp at speeds of Warp 6 or lower without ever running out of fuel. At Warp 7, 8, and 9, the Trifrancium will deplete faster than it can restore itself. Warp 9 is especially stressful, and will cause the ship to permanently deplete its reserves far too quickly to be of much use to anyone but VIP's in a rush to a distant location. Generally, we Volgrim limit our speed to Warp 6 when traveling to ensure their reserves never deplete."

"Smart." Jason says, not especially caring. The Founder's Spear departs the Gallax system with a flicker of motion, leaving the Plagueborn to their fates.

All the while, Jason's thoughts fixate on images of Excalibur and Solomon's Crown...

Raphael continues to sit beside Jason, quietly glowering at Unarin while the First Founder smiles back.

"We've yet to settle our accounts." Raphael murmurs. "I resent thee, Volgrim. I resent thy existence, and the actions thou hath taken which brought my species to ruin."

"You trashed my armada quite well." Unarin says. "Next time, you won't catch my Psions off-guard. A Confessor might not be your match, but what about an Executor, hmm? I'd be interested in finding out how my best stack up to a monster from the Primordial Era..."

Raphael reveals a cold, sinister smile.

"Perhaps thou shalt not enjoy the results of such a matchup, First Founder. Thou shoulds't pray we do not come to blows a second time, lest I travel directly to thy homeworld and take care of thee myself."

Unarin gurgles a vile laugh in the back of his throat.

"Heh heh heh... the Plague might be unstoppable, old monster..."

"...but you are not."

Part 401: Samuel's Strength

The world of Volgarius.

Within the top twenty levels of the Founder's Thumb, a couple dozen humans, a Minotaur, and a Demon Emperor all rest within a comfortable, recently-built communal space. Built in a single day by some above-average Technopaths, it offers luxurious sleeping arrangements for the soldiers who originally came to protect Jason's life, as well as his chef and Emperor Serena.

Among the humans is one man in particular, Lieutenant Samuel Baker. He paces back and forth restlessly in the room's center while his subordinates all mess with datapads, playing a virtual game of poker with each other while lounging on their beds.

Samuel walks from left to right, and right to left. He sticks his thumbs in his pockets while grumbling curses under his breath.

Officer Ashley glances up from her datapad at the pacing man. "Samuel, come on. Do you have to keep prancing around all day long? You're making it hard for me to enjoy my game."

Samuel growls at her. "It's been almost two days. The Wordsmith still isn't back. What's the point of us coming along to protect Commander Hiro if he fucks off without us? We might as well have stayed on Tarus II."

"Yeah. Maybe." Ashley admits, while calling one of her comrades' bluffs in their virtual game. "But we didn't know what to expect, coming here. Now that we know, we don't have much else better to do. Come, sit down. Join us for the next round."

"I can't focus on any games right now." Samuel says, shaking his head. He glances at his Power Glove sitting on the dresser beside his bed. "I'll go and make myself useful. Gonna get some more training done."

Ashley rolls her eyes. "Whatever. Suit yourself."

Samuel walks over and grabs the device off his dresser. He heads out of the room, and after he leaves, Ashley sighs.

"That guy is such a workaholic."

* * *

Samuel heads down the corridor, arriving at a previously designated holographic training area put in place by the Volgrim to serve their guests' needs. Despite the Wordsmith and his people only intending to be on Volgarius for a week at most, these specially-designed rooms allow the Volgrim not only to appear as kind and altruistic hosts, but to subtly assert the power of their civilization. By witnessing the depths of Technopath creations, the humans can subconsciously fear and venerate their betters, whether they want to or not.

Samuel closes the door to the holographic training room, finding himself the only person inside. He lifts up his Power Glove and adjusts its settings, transforming himself into a massive black-furred Minotaur with giant, cloven hooves. His height jumps upward by two full feet, and his muscle mass doubles.

"Computer, turn on a training program. Give me something to fight!" Samuel commands.

Wordlessly, the low-level synthmind in charge of the holographic training facility follows his order. It changes the room to a moderately temperate world, one with grass and trees and rolling hills. The technology easily fools Samuel's brain, making him feel as if he has stepped foot onto this other world in person.

At the same time, dozens of strange, never-before-seen creatures burst out of the ground, their bodies partially covered in rocks and granite adhering to their skin. Resembling four-legged spiders the size of small children, they appear quite frightening as they charge at Samuel and allow him to whip out a huge greataxe.

The human-turned-monster roars with great gusto. He attacks the rock-spiders and starts smashing them about, occasionally suffering minor wounds as they stab him and cut him, forcing him backward. Still, he kills them by the dozens and eventually takes out a total of forty-seven, clearing the simulation.

After the first wave of enemies disappears, Samuel pauses for a minute to catch his breath. He touches his wounds and winces. Despite the pain wracking his body, he knows that in fact his injuries are nothing more than a trick of the technology. By interfacing with his mind, the holographic simulation can make him feel the pain of being stabbed and cut, and even deceive his eyes to a point where he can't tell the difference.

"It's so realistic..." Samuel grunts.

He continues to pause in place. The Lieutenant frowns as several feelings flicker through his heart.

"I'm so strong. So powerful in this body. But I feel... incomplete."

The man stares at the fake world before him while blood seemingly drips from his wounds.

A sense of listlessness pervades his mind.

"All this training. All this strength. I pursue it to seek my revenge. I have to kill all of the demons. Every last one. But it won't ever bring my little brother back..."

He lifts up his Minotaur-hand and gazes at his palm.

"It's not right. This body... it doesn't feel right to me."

The man rotates his wrist. He looks at the Power Glove attached to his left arm and frowns.

"Minotaur. Orc. Even a Harpy. I'm somewhat compatible with them all, but it's like I'm wearing the wrong skin. Maybe... I mean, nobody's looking, yeah? Maybe I should try..."

Samuel changes the dial to one that display an image of a humanoid figure with dainty-looking butterfly wings. He frowns in annoyance at the thought of assuming such a form.

"Like I'd ever want to become a stupid fucking fairy. A little butterfly-dancing wuss."

Still, despite his audible protest, the man hesitates.

"But, I mean... nobody will see if I do it... just this once. And I am a little... curious."

He bites his lip for a moment, then shrugs his shoulders.

"Fuck it."

Samuel presses the activation button. His body demorphs from the figure of a minotaur back to that of a human. The transition, as always, is a little uncomfortable. But only moments later, he feels a cool and pleasant sensation spring out of his back. A pair of wings pushes through his clothes and gently tears open a gap in the fabric. Moments later, his evolution concludes.

"Hmm? That... wasn't so bad." Samuel mutters.

The man cracks his neck. He ponders what exactly he should do.

"How do I use fairy magic, anyway?" Samuel asks himself. "Do I speak a magic word. Maybe wave my hand like-"

He starts to lift his hand, and before he can react, a pulse of light fires from his palm toward the ceiling! It splashes harmlessly against the reinforced surface, startling him.

"What in the hell?!"

Samuel blinks twice. So effortless was his usage of magic that he can't even believe his eyes.

"I did that? But how?"

He holds up his hand again. Once more, a bolt of light fires from his palm, though its relative power seems weak enough that it might only push a small child off their feet.

Curious, Samuel begins to experiment. He releases dozens of light-bolts, some of them visibly stronger than others. By concentrating his mind, he becomes capable of increasing their power and strength to the point they could even dent some heavier armors.

"Huh. This is actually pretty neat." Samuel murmurs. "And it's so easy to pull off. There's no discomfort at all. It's like I was always meant to use this magic. Not like when I become a Minotaur or an Orc."

He pauses.

"But surely, there's more I can do?"

Samuel thinks back to his interactions with Blinker. As the lone fairy on Tarus II for the longest time, she's been the only wellspring of knowledge for fairy magic, but he hasn't actually spent much time with her.

The man frowns.

"Illusions. Fairies can summon illusions..."

He focuses his mind, then begins to imagine a certain figure standing in front of him...

Instantly, a clone of Samuel appears!

The man perfectly recreates his physical appearance, making an identical-looking version of himself stand ten feet away. He blinks in surprise.

"...That easy? I barely even had to try."

Seeing the illusory figure of himself makes Samuel's heart race. After a brief moment, he slowly nods.

"Brother..."

He focuses his mind again. This time, his 'clone' changes appearance. It becomes a much younger man, but one who doesn't look too dissimilar from Samuel himself.

The moment he finishes creating the new illusion, Samuel's expression stiffens.

"It... it looks... just like him... just like Grady."

Grady Baker. Samuel's brother. Killed by demons, all those years ago.

Unlike many of the other higher-ups of humanity's military, Samuel is someone who came from the liberated worlds. He lived as a slave to the demons for the first thirty years of his life. He remembers the terror they would spread when they went on a 'soul hunting party' to kill off the strongest humans on their chattel worlds.

Samuel balls his hands into fists. He trembles with emotion as he gazes into the eyes of his little brother, a man who was killed at the tender young age of fifteen, when demons charged into his village and massacred a quarter of the population.

"...I'll never forgive them, Grady." Samuel whispers. "Never. I'm still fighting the good fight. When this is all over, I'll join you in the next life, along with mama and papa. Don't worry. I'll never forget you."

Seeing his brother for the first time in fifteen years, Samuel takes a long moment to pause and gaze at the person he loved most in the world. He remembers why he continues to fight, and this realization firms up his determination.

Without hesitation, Samuel waves his hand and causes Grady's image to disperse.

"This is the ticket." He mutters. "I finally have a way to explosively increase my power. Fairy magic is... it's perfect for me. But I don't yet know how to reliably use it. When I return to Tarus II, I should seek out Blinker and ask for her advice."

He pauses.

"...In the meantime. I'll just have to make do with what I have currently."

Samuel waves his hands. He summons a barrier of energy around himself.

"I can do that too, huh? Useful. It seems like my imagination is the limit. Computer, start up another training sim, but keep the difficulty low. Just one or two enemies this time. Bipedal, nothing too extravagant."

The computer wordlessly follows his orders and summons skeletons from beyond the grave to attack Samuel. The Lieutenant jumps into action, busting his butt to try out all sorts of new magical abilities.

"Telekinesis! I can push and pull! I can crush! I'm not weak anymore! I am strong!"

Within less than an hour, the man has already invented over fifty different magical abilities, none of them particularly potent, but all of them quite diverse.

He smiles to himself.

"Not bad. Not bad at all."

Samuel turns to leave the room while adjusting the dial on his Power Glove. However, just as he's about to deactivate the gauntlet, he jumps in fright when he discovers a goddamned Volgrim standing at the doorway behind him.

"Jumping Jesus!" Samuel exclaims, while jerking backward and raising his fists. He immediately identifies the new arrival as a yellow-skinned Psion, someone of unknown origins. "Who the fuck are you?! Don't sneak up on me like that!"

The unknown Psion stands unmoving, her hands clasped behind her back. She appears totally unruffled by the human's loud screams.

[Mud-dweller. That device on your wrist. It... interests me.]

She speaks in English, allowing Samuel to understand her words. At the same time, her tone is neither polite nor rude. She speaks blandly and with deep expectations, as if believing the human will immediately bow to her will and obey any command she might utter.

"Who are you?!" Samuel snaps back. "A name, woman!"

The Psion slowly blinks all six of her eyes.

[Rude. Loud. Like all mud-dwellers. I am Executor Riley, an Eighth-Level Psion of the Volgrim Empire. And you are Samuel Baker. A low-level member of humanity's military.]

She cocks her head slightly.

[There. Enough with the pleasantries. You will explain the function of the device attached to your appendage.]

Her words broker no argument. Even while being relatively unaware of the differences in Psion ranks, Samuel has picked up plenty of hints that any Psion with the title of Executor must not, under any circumstances, be fucked with.

His skin loses some of its warmth. "I... I am one of humanity's delegates. The Wordsmith-"

[The Wordsmith is not here right now. Nor will he return for several time-units.] Executor Riley states in an imposing mental voice. [I am hardly acting out of line. You will detail the functions of that device to me. I wish to add its uniqueness to my knowledge.]

"...And what if I don't want to comply?" Samuel asks.

Riley blinks again, as if so bored by his paltry and feeble resistance that she can barely keep from falling asleep.

All of a sudden, Riley's body flickers. She materializes directly in front of Samuel, startling him and making him jump backward in fright. The unexpected teleportation catches him off-guard and makes him trip over his own feet. He falls on his ass and grunts in pain.

"Gah! You... you bloody..."

[I would advise watching your language.] Riley warns him. [I am not known for taking insults well. I especially do not approve of feeble mud-dwellers denying me the information I so politely requested. Test my patience at your own discretion.]

A chill goes down Samuel's back. Even with his newly uncovered powers, he knows he doesn't stand the slightest chance in hell of dealing with this Executor on his own. She could stomp him into a bloody pulp with the same effort he might put into squishing an ant.

"...It's called, uh... it's called a Power Glove." Samuel hesitantly says, while shakily rising to his feet. "Why do you want to know?"

[The technology is primitive. Nevertheless, its body-shifting properties are quite remarkable.] Riley states. [I am no Technopath, but even I can imagine a variety of utilizations for such a device. You will give me your Power Glove.]

"I won't." Samuel says, while steeling his stomach and narrowing his eyes. "If you want it, you'll have to take it. Shouldn't be too hard for a tough gal like you."

[Why do you deny my command?] Riley asks, appearing slightly confused. [Have you any idea the immense power I wield? You are nothing to me.]

"And yet here you are, still chatting me up." Samuel says, his eyes flickering with a hint of realization. "Come to think of it, you definitely could just take the gauntlet. I wouldn't even be able to resist. Yet… you're not doing that. Why?"

Riley remains silent, but Samuel's mind continues to race.

"Don't tell me. You're not allowed to take it. If you attack me… you'll get in big trouble. You need me to give it up voluntarily. You'll get in trouble with Unarin or Dosena, right?"

[Do not utter the Founder's names so flippantly!] Riley suddenly exclaims, her voice booming in Samuel's mind. [You will speak their titles with respect! If you do not, I will have reason to execute you on the spot!]

Samuel grits his teeth. Riley's mere words contain so much power that his nostrils and ears begin to bleed. Even so, he forces himself to remain standing, and even manages to crack a smile.

"…Haha! Sorry, 'miss Executor!' I was indeed disrespectful! But what an interesting turn of phrase you just used, yeah? You'll have 'reason' to execute me? So that means you can't just kill me without a good reason? You're looking for one. You want me to screw up so you'll have 'permission' to take my gauntlet. I almost fell for your ruse!"

Executor Riley stiffens. She glares at the human with hate-filled eyes.

[Clever little mud-dweller. Maybe you aren't as dense as a rock.]

With her minor little plot foiled, Riley pulls back and eases up on her psionic suppression, weakening the amount of pressure placed upon Samuel's mind. He breathes a sigh of relief.

"No, I'm actually pretty ignorant. Certainly can't match up to a crazy-powerful alien like you." Samuel says. "Why don't we try this again? You want info on my glove? You should give me something of equivalent value. An equal exchange."

[I will never treat a lowly mud-dweller as my equal.] Riley proclaims, bristling at the mere thought of entertaining Samuel's words. [Such a flippant insect. You court death, trying to make a deal with me.]

Samuel regains a bit of his confidence. He stands up straight and look her right in the eyes.

"Maybe I was courting death before, but let's drop the bullshit. You're not going to attack me unless I slip up, and now that I know your game, I won't do that. So, if you want to obtain the thing you desire, you'll have to... adjust your standards."

Riley hesitates.

The Executor glances around the room while sweeping her psionic sense all throughout the immediate region. Naturally, she picks up on the presence of other high-level Psions, a fact that causes her great annoyance.

[What sort of... cooperation... do you seek?] Riley asks, her tone dripping with disdain.

"Like I said. Equivalent exchange." Samuel replies. "Surely you can give me some interesting technology in exchange for my gauntlet? Of course, I'll have to contact the Wordsmith and get his permission before making any trades."

[I am unable to grant a lower species access to Volgrim technology.] Riley says. [You are not privy to the Founder's hard-earned wealth.]

"Sure, sure." Samuel says, casually waving his hand while stealing even more of the conversation's momentum. "But it doesn't have to be anything bleeding edge. Come on, doesn't this gauntlet interest you? Changing your form could be useful, yeah? Maybe you have some... B-grade technology. Something worth exchanging nobody would miss."

[Even the scraps of superior Volgrim technology would be eons more advanced than anything a mud-dweller could create.] Riley snaps back. [I cannot make such an exchange!]

Samuel slowly blinks his eyes. He sighs deeply and slowly, then heaves his shoulders in a comically exaggerated manner.

"Oh. That's too bad. Well, I guess I'll have to be going, then. Since you have nothing to offer me, this has all been a great big waste of my time."

Riley glowers at the human. She watches as he starts to walk past her, heading toward the doorway leading out of the training facility.

[Insolent!] Executor Riley barks. [I could kill you a thousand different ways, mud-dweller! How dare you try and... and trick me into giving you classified Volgrim technology!]

Samuel keeps walking toward the exit.

"It's all in your hands, Executor Riley. If you want something from this lowly mud-dweller, you'll have to decide whether it's worth degrading yourself to my level. Either put up or shut up, that's what my papa always said."

He pauses at the doorway for half a breath, but seeing no change in her attitude, he shrugs.

"It's in your hands."

The entrance opens and closes behind him, leaving Riley all by herself.

BOOM.

An explosion of rage-fueled psionic energy bursts out of her body, collapsing the space around her and shaking the room. The training facility loses power as hundreds of its delicate mechanisms shatter, revealing that even this tiny bit of barely controlled psionic rage could have imploded Samuel's body into nothingness.

[Bastard!] Riley roars in her own head, trembling with fury. [How dare a mud-dweller humiliate me! The moment he's no longer under his master's protection, I'll go to him and crush-]

Before she can finish that thought, a flicker of energy appears at Riley's side. She flinches, then turns to her right and widens her eyes.

[F-Founder Dosena!] Riley exclaims. [I... I wasn't...]

[Do not attempt to lie to me.] Founder Dosena says, her tone bland. [Exchanging of technology with a lower species is strictly forbidden. Even for you.]

Dosena's pitch-black skin contrasts with the shining golden armor wrapped protectively around her body. Not that she needs it. Her physiological strengths have already made her all but immune to damage of a material nature.

At the same time, her powerful appearance causes Riley's emotions to fluctuate. She lowers her head obediently.

[Of course, Second Founder. I would not dare. It's just... those 'Power Gloves'... they are so unique...]

[We are already aware of their properties.] Dosena says. [Unarin and I consider them mildly interesting. Due to their magical nature, we will not be able to properly replicate their effects without a Wordsmith of our own. They will be useless to us.]

She pauses.

[However, your thoughts were in the right place. You sought to procure that technology for the glory of the Founders. You did not excessively breach any decorum. You have committed no crime.]

Hearing Dosena's words of 'comfort,' Riley exhales slightly. She lifts her head to look up at the Second Founder, her idol and the idol of all other Psions.

[Forgive me, Second Founder. I will not make any further moves on the mud-dwellers.]

[You are not the only one who wishes to do such a thing.] Dosena replies. [The First Founder must hold himself back from directly seizing the things he wants. We have no guaranteed way to capture the Wordsmiths and force them to do our bidding. Furthermore, we do not know for certain that there are only two of them. Even if that were the case, they may have set up contingencies to create additional Wordsmiths in the event of their deaths or imprisonment.]

The Executor scowls.

[Second Founder. It is a great humiliation that we must lower ourselves to bargaining with these inferior creatures.]

[It is.] Dosena nods. [But do not entirely look down on them. They have... potential. Not a small amount, but a terrifying amount. Given time, they might eclipse our own civilization. Naturally, this would require millions of cycles of evolution, but it is still a sobering thought.]

Dosena glances around the destroyed room while musing to herself.

[We have become too stagnant. Too comfortable in our positions as the 'deserved' leader of our galaxy. Perhaps that will ultimately result in our downfall.]

Riley stares at Dosena. [Second Founder...]

After a brief moment, Dosena shakes her head.

[I take my leave.]

Without waiting for Riley's response, she flickers away, leaving the Executor behind to ruminate on her words.

After a minute or two, Riley lightly stomps her foot.

[Damned mud-dwellers.]

Part 402: Emerging from Her Shell

A brown-haired woman and her black-haired friend quietly walk through the Fortress of Retribution's bustling city streets. The brown-haired one shyly glances from side to side, visibly uncomfortable and even a little frightened by all the hubbub, while her friend appears much more relaxed, but also focused on making sure her shy companion feels safe.

"You're doing great..." Soleil says to Cassiel, when a pair of young boys run past them laughing and screaming. "It's so brave of you to step out into the real world like this."

Cassiel nods slowly. "I... I don't feel so... it's not as bad as I expec- ulp!"

Cassiel freezes in place. Her blood turns to ice as she sees a pair of vicious-looking Scyther demons walking toward her and Soleil. The two males laugh in throaty voices while talking about something unknown. They pass right by Cassiel and Soleil without even noticing the women's presences, so ordinary do they appear. But even so, Cassiel still trembles visibly, terrified out of her wits.

"D... d... de..."

"It's okay, it's okay." Soleil says, massaging Cassiel's back to calm her down. "They're gone. They didn't even see you. Why don't we go over to the gardens?"

Cassiel numbly follows along with Soleil's suggestion, her mind already a thousand miles away. She disassociates from her body, feeling as if she's become a woman lost at sea, floating atop a plank of wood.

Soleil kindly but forcibly guides Cassiel away from the busy plaza toward a much quieter garden a little ways off the beaten path. As they draw away from the mass of people, Cassiel visibly calms down, and her heartrate returns to normal. She stops shaking and lowers her eyes in shame.

"I'm... I'm sorry... I'm just not... not strong anymore..."

"That's not true." Soleil replies. "You just have to remember your old strength. Raphael says you were once the mightiest Lazarite. The old Cassiel is still in there, you just need to... coax her out! Look, aren't these flowers pretty?"

The two women step into the Golden Garden, the most greenery-filled place in all of Tarus II's core living areas. Soleil gestures to the various patches of red, pink, orange, yellow, and other assorted flowers, making Cassiel smile ever so slightly as she admires their beauty.

The sounds of children laughing elsewhere in the garden don't bother the fallen Lazarite. Her ears prick up for a moment, but she otherwise ignores them.

However, Cassiel does notice the shifting of spiritual energy as she arrives inside the garden. She glances at Soleil questioningly, and the living Construct smiles.

"You felt the change in the air? This is a special zone. It's where the denizens of Jason Hiro's Mind Realm can temporarily assume physical form."

"Jason Hiro." Cassiel repeats. "The Wordsmith."

"That's right. He's this era's Hero. He's also one of your rescuers!" Soleil chirps. "But did you know he's not the only living Hero?"

"There are... two Wordsmiths..." Cassiel says hesitantly.

"Oh. Right. Yes that's true, but I was referring to- well, I'll just show you. Come look over here."

The two women walk arm in arm. Cassiel becomes slightly anxious when she hears the sounds of people's voices drawing nearer, but Soleil stops at the corner of a wall covered in greenery and points toward it.

"Take a peek around that corner. You'll see something interesting, I promise."

Cassiel slowly nods. She cranes her neck to look past the wall's edge, and she spots a hazy, ghost-like man and little girl painting on easels along with a group of visibly more tangible children, all of them painting and chattering to one another.

The Lazarite frowns. "That man... Heroic Aura... and the girl too..."

"That's Sir Lorent and little Shana." Soleil explains. "They're both Heroes who became trapped in their artifacts before the Energy Wars. And now the Wordsmith has made it possible for them to once again walk the mortal plane."

"That's very kind of him..." Cassiel says, while pulling back from the wall. "What sort of... of person is he?"

Soleil shrugs. "Jason's pretty average, honestly. From what Raphael has said, he's nowhere near King Arthur's level, but he has a good heart and wants to unify all the different species to end the constant warring."

"All of them?" Cassiel asks. "Even... even the demons?"

Sensing the tinge of distrust in Cassiel's voice, Soleil shakes her head wryly. "You hate the demons. Deservedly, I might add. Every bit of logic shown to me has proven the demons are mostly irredeemable. Even so, the Wordsmith believes it is possible to forgive old grudges and work together to build a better future."

She pauses.

"...Besides. There are much more dangerous enemies out there in the Void. If the humans and demons don't learn to unite, we'll be crushed by the Plague."

"You've mentioned them before." Cassiel says, nodding. "But... the demons... they're evil. They kill and... and violate others. They don't deserve forgiveness."

"I don't disagree." Soleil replies. "But it's not my decision to make. I am only a construct, after all. I follow the Wordsmith's commands."

"Right..." Cassiel mutters, visibly saddened by her friend's lack of autonomy. "What about this Lorent? He seems familiar to me."

"That isn't surprising." Soleil replies. "He was the Hero who came after Arthur, you know. And he's also Phoebe Hiro's nephew!"

"The Wordsmith's wife?" Cassiel asks, still a bit confused by all the names she hears on a daily basis.

"Yes, her. She also rescued you, you know. You need to work on that memory."

Cassiel blushes. "S-sorry..."

Soleil smiles. "It's no big deal. You'll remember everyone's names and faces before long. More importantly, why don't we go and say hello to those two Heroes? They're quite nice people, you know."

"I don't know..." Cassiel says, hesitating.

"Don't worry. They won't bite!" Soleil laughs, while gently pulling Cassiel toward the group of children.

Cassiel stiffens up as she and Soleil step out into the open. Within two seconds, half a dozen children turn to look at them. Not long after, so does Lorent.

"Hello, you lovely songbirds." Lorent says, smiling at the two newcomers. "Have you come to join in today's painting session?"

The man smiles, but a flicker of questioning zips through his mind as he barely feels a sensation of suppressed holy energy from the two of them. However, unaware of their identities, especially given their disguises, he doesn't put much thought into the feeling.

"I am... Serra." Soleil says. "And this is my sister, Cammy. Don't mind Cammy, she's a little bit shy. I wanted to show her your art, since I've heard so much about you."

"Ah, so it's Lady Serra and Lady Cammy." Lorent says, standing up and bowing politely. "Well, usually only children come to see my shoddy art, but if a pair of beauties wish to do so, that's fine as well. I'm actually just about to finish up a painting of an ancient hero, King Arthur. And if you look over there, just yesterday I finished a painting of Alexander the Great. My goal is to catalogue all the known heroes and create statues of their countenances."

Cassiel follows Lorent's finger to a massive nearby statue of Alexander the Great. Question marks pop up over her head.

"But.. you said... painting... so why... statue?"

Her words come haltingly, but the fact she can manage to force them out when speaking to a male causes Soleil to smile, ever so slyly.

"Ah. That is because I am actually an ancient Hero myself," Lorent explains. "I have the ability to bring paintings to life. If you look at this unfinished work, you can see I've mostly finished the flourishes for King Arthur. I think my aunt will probably enjoy the final product."

He points to the image he's drawn on an easel, which causes Cassiel's eyes to widen in surprise.

"So... lifelike... he looks just like Arthur did..."

Lorent blinks. "Hm? You know what Arthur looked like?"

Soleil quickly butts in. "Oh, Cammy saw a picture of him in a book. She's a bit of a recluse, you see."

"Ah, a book." Lorent nods. "I've gazed upon many a painting of the man in my life. His appearance has been etched into my mind. Above all others, he is the man I admire most."

"I... understand that feeling..." Cassiel says, a tiny smile trailing upon her lips.

She glances at the little girl next to Lorent.

Shana notices Cassiel's inquisitive stare.

"Hello. Me Shana! Me make paint!"

She points at the easel in front of her, where a surprisingly lovely image of a forest surrounds a crystal blue lagoon. Shana's artistic abilities especially stand out compared to all the children around her.

"How pretty..." Cassiel says.

Lorent gestures to a bench off to the side. "Why don't you two take a seat? If you'd like, I can procure a pair of easels for you. If you're not confident in your artistic abilities, that's no issue. Everyone starts off rough."

"Sure!" Soleil chirps. "I'd love to paint. How about you, Cammy?"

Cassiel nods. "Well... alright."

The two of them take a seat, and Lorent sends off a pair of teenaged boys to fetch them their easels. When the boys return, they smile dumbly at the two disguised angels.

"You're really cute!" One of the boys says. "Do you have boyfriends?"

Soleil chuckles. "Cammy's a little old for you. And I... well I guess I'm a little... young."

The boys blink at her words. "Uhh..."

Even Lorent raises an eyebrow. "What?"

"Just kidding!" Soleil says, quickly correcting herself. "Anyway, we're not interested. But thank you for the easels."

She and Cassiel both sit down, paintbrushes in hand, and stare at their easels. Cassiel appears quite hesitant about what to do, but when she glances at her companion, she blinks in surprise.

"So fast..."

Without hesitation, Soleil begins rapidly painting an image of the garden around them, her movements so swift and mechanical that every person in the surroundings widen their eyes to the size of saucers. Her robotic-like brain and perfect hand-eye coordination allows her to realistically recreate the world with such precision that, for a brief moment, Sir Lorent feels utterly ashamed of his own skills.

"...I am in awe." Lorent says after a few minutes of watching Soleil. "I did not realize I was in the presence of a true master. Your artistic abilities are truly incredible, Lady Serra."

Soleil pauses. She glances around, finally noticing all the agape mouths and eyes affixed to her easel. She awkwardly smiles. "Oh... I, uh... I may have some rudimentary skills... but my imagination is a little bit... lacking..."

"Your imagination?" Lorent asks.

"That's right." Soleil replies. "I can draw anything I've seen, but I don't have much actual creativity inside me."

"Oh I doubt that very much." Lorent says. "All people possess a spark of creativity. You need only search for yours. As an example, what do you suppose a bright pink dragon would look like if it had fairy wings?"

Soleil scrunches up her face. "Well, it would probably-"

"Ah-ah-ah!" Lorent interjects. "Don't tell me. Paint that picture on your easel. Shouldn't take you long."

After briefly pausing to confirm Mordred's Butcher's words, Soleil quietly nods. She begins rapidly drawing out a perfect lifelike recreation of a neon pink dragon exactly to the specification Lorent set. Minutes later, she finishes and turns to him.

"I completed the task. It's not very artistic though."

Lorent chuckles. "Such a self-deprecating young lady. How can you say such a thing? Do you think everyone would draw that dragon in the same way you did? You put your own creative interpretation on it. I certainly couldn't paint an image identical to yours!"

Soleil nods slowly. "I... suppose that's right."

While the Black Hole Construct ponders the meaning of art, Lorent returns to his own work. It doesn't take long before he puts the finishing touches on his painting.

"There we go! King Arthur is all but complete. Now I need only call for my aunt..."

He turns to a little girl sitting beside him and whispers something in her ear. The child grins excitedly and scampers off to send a message to Phoebe, while Lorent takes a break from his painting.

"Mmm! Finally done. That one took me about eight hours to get all the details just the way I wanted. Look at how he holds Excalibur before himself, ready to smite any demon who dares profane the Creator's name. That fierce look in his eyes, that commanding majesty! Indeed, there are no Heroes I consider equal to the Hero-King himself. He was truly one of a kind..."

Shana gazes at the picture of Arthur. "Still empty."

"Still?" Lorent asks, momentarily befuddled. "Well, it is only a painting, little one. I can't make magic happen, you know."

He pauses.

"Well, I mean I can, but not in that way."

He turns his attention to Cassiel. "Lady Cammy, you still haven't touched your easel. Are you having trouble thinking of something to draw?"

Cassiel lowers her head. Her face tightens as several painful thoughts constrict her heart.

"I... I shouldn't bother..." She whispers. "I'm no good. There's no point in trying."

"Now, now. That's not true at all." Lorent says, smiling politely. "Look at little Jack here. He's still drawing stick-men after two weeks. Does that make him useless? Of course not. Everyone learns at a different speed. How about this: You tell me what to draw, and I'll draw it for you. Does that sound good? I can even explain what I'm doing as I do it."

"You... will draw... for me?" Cassiel asks, surprised. "I can't take up your... valuable time..."

"It's nothing at all. A trifle." Lorent says. "I sat inside a blank void for what felt like ten eternities. Compared to that, I'd much rather draw for a pretty girl any day of the week."

Mordred's Butcher casually tries to flirt with the shy girl, but when he notices the shifting expressions on her face, he hesitates.

"...Did I say something wrong? I apologize. I did not mean to offend you, Lady Cammy."

Cassiel grits her teeth. She averts her eyes, unable to look at Sir Lorent. "Please don't... don't call me pretty... I don't... like it..."

"She's had some bad experiences with men." Soleil quickly explains, wrapping her arm around Cassiel's back. "It's not your fault, Sir Lorent."

"Oh. I see." Lorent says. "Then, my apologies. I spoke thoughtlessly. Let's change the subject. Lady Cammy, isn't there something you'd like me to draw? Perhaps someone you know? If you have a portrait of them, I wouldn't mind doing so."

Cassiel's eyes flicker. "Someone I know..."

"Yes, that's right." Lorent continues. "A friend, or a companion. I could even paint a picture of you or Lady Serra, if you'd prefer. Any request you have, feel free to make it!"

A tinge of longing stirs in Cassiel's heart.

"There is... someone..."

She pauses for a moment to continue, but right before she can say the next words, a woman speaks up from the distance.

"Nephew! You've finished the painting?"

Cassiel and the others all look to the left, where they see Phoebe Hiro walking over with a big smile on her face, accompanied by none other than Amelia-Annette on her left.

"Let me see!" Phoebe exclaims.

"Of course, auntie." Lorent replies, while grabbing the painting and turning it to face her. "What do you think?"

"Incredible work!" Phoebe gasps. "It's as if I'm looking at the original Arthur, but chiseled out of marble. You even made his expression look as authentic as possible."

"Are you ready for the final step?" Lorent prods. "Watch. I'll transfer the statue into the material realm!"

Everyone perks up to watch as Lorent's semi-ghostly body rises to its feet and he takes the easel in his grasp. He walks over to a nearby clearing, and everyone follows him.

Amelia stands beside Phoebe, not particularly interested in the magic show, but still watching out of a slight curiosity. She crosses her arms and flicks her eyes around the group, where she spots Cassiel and Soleil.

"Hm?"

Amelia frowns ever so slightly, though for what reason, even she does not know.

She returns her attention to Sir Lorent just in time to see him summoning his heroic power. He yanks the image of King Arthur's statue off the page and projects it into reality, causing a two-ton carved marble image of the Hero-King to materialize in the physical realm.

"Wow! He's so much bigger than I expected!" Phoebe exclaims. "Well done, nephew. Thank you for doing this for me."

"Say no more." Lorent says, walking over to give his aunt a hug. "Anything for my last living family member."

He pauses.

"By the way, these two are Cammy and Serra. Do you know them?"

Phoebe follows Lorent's gesture to the brown and black haired women sitting in front of two easels, but she can't fully remember them.

"So it's Cammy and Serra." Phoebe says politely. "I don't think we've met... but you two do look a little bit familiar..."

After a momentary pause, followed by scrunching up her face, Phoebe shrugs.

"...I see all sorts of people every day. It's hard to remember everyone now that humanity has expanded so much. Anyway, it's nice to meet you two! Let me know if my nephew bullies you. I'll smack some sense into him."

"It's nice... to meet you too..." Cassiel says, her crystalline voice ever so pleasant to everyone's ears.

"Yeah. Uh, it's nice to meet you..." Soleil says in embarrassment, having chatted with Phoebe plenty of times. She doesn't mention the fact they're supposed to be going incognito to protect Cassiel's identity.

Phoebe smiles politely, but quickly turns her attention back to her nephew, not particularly caring about the two 'random' women she doesn't know.

"Lorent, who are you going to paint next? Another Hero?"

"That's right." Lorent says. "I need to create majestic statues for all of them. Well, I suppose I don't need to, but these great figures of humanity's past deserve at least some accolades, don't you think? But I'm not sure who to draw next. Perhaps Solomon, the Knowledge-Seeker? Or maybe Nebuchadnezzar, Humanity's Champion? So many choices..."

Amelia rolls her eyes. "You Heroes are all so full of yourselves. Thinking yourselves epic figures of yore. But you just got lucky and had a spirit fly inside of you. Anyone could have done what Arthur did if they had his powers. Better yet, maybe they wouldn't have killed ten million innocents in a fit of rage."

"Amelia!" Phoebe exclaims. "You don't need to be rude. Arthur was a good man. A great man!"

Lorent's expression darkens. "Camelot's King did indeed... that was a sin for which he never forgave himself. But to imply anyone could accomplish what he did, I think you go too far, Black Queen. Several Heroes squandered their abilities. Others did not."

"And one of those Heroes was Dracula." Amelia snaps back. "Let's not pretend like all Heroes are deserving of some fancy statue. I suppose some of them do deserve one, but they are rarer than the rest."

The crowd of people goes silent. During this brief, awkward interlude, Shana speaks up.

"...Joan."

Amelia's heart skips a beat. "What was that? What did you say?!"

The child ignores the anger in Amelia's voice. "Daddy Lorent. Make statue of Joan. Joan of Arc. She was Hero."

Phoebe glances at Amelia. "Joan of Arc, you say? Ehh... I don't know..."

"Absolutely not!" Amelia snaps. "That... that monster attacked me! She tortured me! I won't allow you to put up a carved image in her likeness! I hate her more than anyone else!"

"But she didn't torture you." Phoebe corrects her. "Come on, Annette. You're not Amelia. Remember? Even if you have her memories..."

"I remember every stab, every cut, every laceration, and every holy burn." Amelia says, turning back to Phoebe. "I will not stand for an image of that... that vicious monster! She's evil!"

"No." Lorent says, scowling at Amelia. "She was a true Hero. I lived through those years in Mordred's Court, even after Camelot's fall. I saw secondhand the era when Joan roamed the Earth. She slew countless demons. She was a figure nearly on par with Arthur himself, but her light was snuffed out before it could shine brightest. If she attacked you, it was because of who you are... Black Queen. Assuming you still want to identify yourself as that demoness in human skin."

Amelia's chest rises and falls. "I did many bad things... it's true... but the hunger... I always felt the hunger, and she just... jumped out and attacked me for no reason!"

"I think you and I both know that isn't true." Phoebe says, her voice soft.

A look of shame passes over Amelia's face. She snorts angrily, then turns and stomps away.

"Never mind. Do what you want."

After she storms out of the Golden Gardens, Phoebe shrugs at her nephew. "Sorry, Lorent. That was embarrassing for you to see. Amelia is... she's going through a lot right now."

"I know who she is." Lorent says, calmly. "A false human. Her memories are fake. She is not the Black Queen, not truly. But even so, the Black Queen was a terrible monster. Many people I've met have spoken of their hatred for her in private. She... may yet become a problem."

"Perhaps. I want to believe she can be better, though." Phoebe replies.

The two of them chat for a minute or two, and eventually, Phoebe departs, heading after Amelia.

Lorent sits back down and sighs.

"Alright. It's decided, then. My next statue will be carved in the likeness of Joan- oh!"

He glances to the side.

"Where are my manners! Lady Cammy, I was going to let you pick, and now I've gone ahead and put someone else at the front of the queue. Never mind them, you can still have the first slot. Is there anyone you would like to have me paint?"

He smiles kindly at the brown-haired woman sitting on the bench adjacent to his, while she twists her hair around her finger.

Cassiel gazes at Mordred's Butcher.

"No... I think... I think Joan of Arc... she would be a good choice too."

She smiles.

"Yes. A very... very good choice indeed..."

Part 403: Psion Realization

Volgarius, inside a certain Psionic Enclave Tower in the planet's fourth super-sector.

Hope Hiro continues listening as Aspirator Raavul begins educating her newest disciple, Initiator Ferral, on the absolute basics of psionic growth. The classroom's master levitates an inch off the ground and floats back and forth while she talks, commanding a certain air of authority, despite her earlier humiliation at the hands of Educator Norim.

[Forging a Psionic Seed is not a sprint, but a marathon. Only diligent study will allow one to take slow but certain steps on their journey to reaching the higher ranks. Ferral, you have not yet even begun to condense your seed, and that means you are in your most unique and pliable state. In order to take the first step, you must first determine what your basic aptitudes are.]

She motions toward a cube levitating in the air at the front of the classroom, some sort of slowly spinning alien-looking artifact that glows faintly blue and appears to be twice the size of an average Psion's head.

When the Aspirator motions toward the cube, it glows visibly brighter, and an object materializes into reality above it, causing Hope's eyes to widen in surprise. Raavul conjures a palm-sized opal into reality, then gently tosses it with her psionic powers to land on the floor in front of Initiator Ferral.

[This is a Psi-gem.] Raavul explains. [Focus your psionic energy into its core and it will determine your basic aptitudes.]

[I already did this not long after my Osmosis.] Ferral snarks. [There's no need to waste your time. I'll just tell you my aptitudes now.]

[You will test them again.] Raavul says, her eyes flaring with anger. [I am your master, now. You will not question my authority. I am already in quite the poor mood.]

Her words send a chill down the spines of all of her remaining disciples. Recalling the loss their master endured to Educator Norim, they shudder at the realization that if she ever did fly off the handle and attack them, her Third Level psionic strength would rip them all apart before they even managed to send out a cry for help.

Even Ferral becomes noticeably more chilled when his master's eyes narrow to focus on him. [Of... of course, Aspirator Raavul. I will test my aptitudes for you now.]

He quickly grabs up the light blue stone, one seemingly lacking any sort of interesting features, yet which also hums with a faint level of psionic power. He closes his eyes, then pours his psionic energy into its interior.

After a few moments, the Psi-gem glows pure white, then projects a series of alien words into the air above all of the disciple's heads. Their gazes lift upward to read them.

[What?] Aspirator Raavul asks, visibly taken aback. [Such... such incredible aptitudes? You must have inherited Proctor Landis's best traits. I wonder who else he merged with to produce such results...]

She blinks her eyes heavily.

[...Initiator Ferral. You possess an A-Class aptitude for Spatial Psionics, Body Manipulation, and Energy Transference. You further possess B-Class aptitudes for half a dozen other disciplines and innumerable C-class aptitudes as well. Frankly, I've not seen a disciple of your caliber in all my cycles of teaching. Why, then, do you not wish to further your abilities?]

[I already stated my reasons.] Ferral says, his mental voice quiet. [I don't have any interest. And I couldn't understand how to start, anyway. My creators were useless in teaching me the first steps.]

[You were unable to form a Psionic Seed, then?] Raavul asks, levitating closer to her newest disciple. [While creating your basic seed is not a difficult process, it is not particularly mindless either. You need only remain attentive for thirty rotational cycles while slowly condensing your energy into its intitial seed-state.]

Ferral groans. [I am aware of the mechanics. But it takes so much time to condense a seed. And then once I do condense it, I still need to start meditating and focusing my energy for hundreds and thousands of cycles before I even reach the Second Level. The Third Level will take even longer, and the Fourth, the Fifth... it is an endless journey that I see no reason to embark on!]

Raavul knits her brow. She gazes wordlessly at her newest disciple for several long moments while quietly debating what the heck to do with him.

[...You are too impatient.] Raavul finally concludes. [The time required to ascend is indeed long and arduous. The trials will not be easy to complete. But your mental state is wrong. You have disregarded the joy and privilege of Ascension to focus on worthless ancillary thoughts. There is no greater joy than to achieve the highest levels of Psionic Power.]

[I disagree.] Ferral says. [You seek to achieve power. But why must I also desire that goal? It seems most Psions want power for power's sake. Right now, your reason has to do with someday fighting the Plague and protecting our species, but what happens if we do succeed? If we defeat the Plague, what reason will we then have to continue our Ascension? For ever-more increasing conquest of other worlds and galaxies deep within the Void? It is an endless and fruitless quest. There is no point in pursuing it!]

After Ferral finishes speaking, Raavul flicks her attention to the other disciples in her class. Surprisingly, she finds a disturbing trend among many of them. They no longer mock or jeer Ferral, but instead listen attentively to his arguments while contemplating the logic behind his words.

Damn. Raavul grimaces. This little fool... his words are beginning to sway the mental states of my other disciples. I'll bet Educator Norim planned to insert this disruptor into my ranks from the very beginning. Anything to ruin me. All because of that one time I made him look like an idiotic fool in front of the Proctor...

However, Raavul doesn't become angry. Instead she eases up on her posture and assumes a calm, stoic demeanor. Gently, the Aspirator levitates back to the front of the classroom.

[Ferral. When you first entered my Enclave, you stated that you wished to stop training so you could leave and travel to other worlds. You wish to gaze upon their scenic vistas and enjoy the sights as you please. Is my explanation of your mindset accurate?]

Ferral nods. [Yes, Aspirator. I would prefer to live my life in peace, enjoying every cycle as it comes.]

[I see.] Raavul says, slowly blinking her eyes. [In truth, Psions like you are becoming more and more common of late. The moment you began uttering such deviant thoughts, it became my prerogative to ship you off to a Recycling Enclave.]

Several Psions in the audience tense up at their master's words. Ferral, however, does not.

[If my choice is a miserable existence for all eternity or a dissipation of my vessel through a Recycler, then I will happily choose the latter.]

[Yes. I imagined you would.] Raavul says. [But death is not a necessary option. I am something of an oddball among the many Educators in our great and glorious Empire. I actually care about the development of my disciples. Certainly, I seek to evolve my thinking and improve my lot in life, but I also wish to see my disciples happy and living in pursuit of their most deeply-held goals. Take your fellow disciple, Initiator Tarim. He seeks to emulate the Changelings by mastering the art of body manipulation to shift his form.]

Raavul shakes her head.

[Any other Educator would have cast him aside. I have certainly warned Tarim that continuing his Path would be a foolish endeavor, but I will not stop him from pursuing his desires. After all, should he succeed, he will become an incredible innovator among Psions, someone who may herald a unique sub-branch of Body Manipulation! And if he perishes… he will at least die after seeking out what he cares about most.]

The Aspirator holds out her hand, palm-up. [You see, Ferral, you currently believe that your goals are incompatible with Psion philosophy. You believe that only by casting aside your Psionic abilities can you obtain what you seek.]

She folds her palm into a fist and points it at Ferral.

[You are wrong! In fact, the goals you wish to achieve are best achieved by attaining ultimate power!]

Ferral blinks. [They… are? I do not understand, Aspirator. What do you mean?]

Instead of immediately answering, Raavul pauses for a moment while a distant look appears in her eyes. She shakes her head, then motions toward the blue cube in the front of the room. The multi-phasic device materialized a holographic image in the air, one of a molten world covered in poisonous gas, rank fumes, and scorching temperatures.

[When I ascended to the Second Level, I took my first mission ever.] Raavul explains. [I traveled to the world of Gorgorath. It was an undeveloped, backwater planet with no life-forms. My job was to scour its surface and report everything I found to the Survey Council.]

[Gorgorath was a terrible planet to remain on for any extended periods of time.] Raavul continues. [These days, I could manage the task quite easily, but back then, I was only a Second-Level Initiator. I had not even earned my first title. Even so, I was awed by Gorgorath's... beauty. Yes, it was a terrible world. Its air was acrid and inhospitable to all life. I had to repeatedly exit its bounds and return to my craft in orbit to regain my bearings. But even so... I will never forget the thrill I experienced of being the first Volgrim to fully explore its secrets. I alone know everything there is to know about that blood-red volcanic blob of death.]

She pauses for a moment.

[Ferral, your thoughts are wrong because you mistakenly believe that if you pursue your Path, you will have to abandon those pursuits you value most. You wish to observe the beauty of the galaxy. Fair enough. But who says you must only pursue leisure or a Path exclusively? Who is to say you cannot take your time and progress as you please?]

Ferral sits up a little straighter. [You are saying... I could split my focus?]

[Naturally.] Raavul answers. [Have you forgotten the first tenet of the Psionic Laws? 'Forging a Psionic Seed is not a sprint, but a marathon.' Do these words mean nothing to you?]

She chuckles. [Hah. You have stubbornly avoided even the basics of forging a Psionic Seed, yet in doing so you have delayed yourself from taking the first step toward your true goals.]

Raavul cocks her head. [And furthermore. You seem to have a... rather unique opinion. You believe Volgrimkind would be better suited to pursuing a stable peace, not chasing after endless expansion. But let me ask you this, young Initiator. Do you think anyone will be swayed by the arguments of a brat who has yet to reach even the First Level?]

Ferral's expression warps in shock as he reels from his master's words. He lowers his eyes and shudders, realizing for the first time ever what a fool he has been.

[Teacher... you... you are right. I have spoken such ignorant words. If I wish to affect change, I must achieve greatness in a Path so that others will respect me.]

[Exactly correct!] Raavul replies. [With great power, you will be able to leave and pursue your goals while also benefitting the Volgrim Empire. And with the mightiest of strength, you will be able to make your voice heard to influence the path of our great civilization. Take our lauded Executors, for instance.]

Raavul motions with her hand to change the scene of the planet Gorgorath to holographic images of the Volgrim Empire's mightiest 8th-Ranked Psions, a mixture of males and females.

[Do you think these individuals, our most respected leaders, are a hivemind? Far from it. They each have their own ideas for what the Empire should do to improve itself. Take Executor Nufaris, for example. He is a male who values conquest of indigenous peoples. His war against the Terrans hardened his beliefs. He has professed on multiple occasions that we should slaughter our inferiors to prevent them from rising up to threaten us.]

She points to one of the female Executors. [But look also at Executor Riley. She is quite different from Executor Nufaris. She wishes for us to enslave and raise up promising civilizations so that we might steal their technology or other collective insights. She believes in pursuing a diverse ecosystem of thought. She is also quite friendly with the Technopaths.]

Raavul slowly shakes her head. [Ah, but what a shame. We do not seem to have any Executors who exclusively seek out peace or de-emphasizing expansionism. Don't you find that to be unfortunate, Ferral? Imagine if you were to rise up to becoming an Executor. Imagine the influence you would wield! You could reshape our society! And with your excellent aptitudes, you do possess a minor possibility of reaching this goal someday.]

Ferral nods repeatedly. [Aspirator! Your words are wise! I have lived for two hundred cycles but this is the first I have heard someone speak in such a manner! I must apologize for my terrible behavior earlier. You have truly opened this inferior and shameful disciple's eyes!]

His fellow classmates all nod in unison. Never have they heard their master speak like this before, but clearly, she has put some thought into this in the past, or she would not be able to elucidate her thoughts in such a coherent way.

Raavul becomes quiet. Her voice softens, and she sighs.

[You know... many Volgrim have secretly begun to think such thoughts. We won't say them out loud, of course. At least not publicly. But the last 100,000 cycles have been...

exhausting. I myself am only twenty-thousand cycles of age, yet we have been at war with the Plague for my entire existence.]

She heavily sighs.

[Endless war. Endless battles for survival. It seems more and more likely every cycle that we will not survive the Plague. It will devour us. We will scatter to the Void, refugees living upon spacecraft. Perhaps we will flee to another galaxy and settle down again. But even if we do make it that far, we will have to fight and conquer all over again.]

[If we manage to defeat the Plague,] she continues, [what will change? Will we return to our former goals of conquest and extermination? Perhaps we will enjoy a brief hiatus of our expansionary efforts while reconquering worlds lost to the Plague, before setting back out to spreading our influence beyond the Milky Way?]

Initiator Tarim, the disciple who pursues the ability to shift his body like a Changeling, glances from Ferral to Raavul. [Aspirator. Do you believe the Founders are pursuing the wrong goals?]

[No.] Raavul says, without a hint of hesitation. [By no means would I ever claim such a thing or think such thoughts, and neither should you. Founder Unarin is wise. Founder Dosena is just. Our species has conquered countless enemies and thrived for millions of cycles under their combined rule. It is simply not our place to judge their lofty acts from our lowly positions.]

The Aspirator returns her attention to the entirety of her enclave. [If you wish to hold strong opinions on the future the Volgrim should pursue, I advise that you continue advancing your Paths. Now that Ferral has been enlightened, I assume there will be no further delays in consolidating his Seed.]

Initiator Ferral nods along to his master's words. [Of course. I contemplate, and I comprehend, Aspirator. I have decided that my first discipline should be in Energy Transference.]

Raavul blinks. [Energy Transference. That discipline focuses on one Psion becoming a conduit for many. It can also result in a Psion capable of converting many types of energy into Psionic Energy, giving them a vast amount of power to pull from. It is certainly an acceptable discipline to begin with, but why would you choose it over Body Manipulation or Spatial Psionics? In particular, the latter would allow you to travel the void quickly and efficiently, which would be ideal for your goal of pursuing scenic vistas.]

[In truth, I have already given the matter much thought since my Osmosis two hundred cycles ago.] Ferral replies. [If I were to walk a Path, Energy Transference would be to me what Brain Enhancement and Cerebral Psionics are to others. It would form a floor that would improve the capabilities of my other disciplines, expediting my growth.]

He pauses.

[...Of course, I did not entirely come up with this notion myself. Proctor Landis spoke to me regarding my aptitudes and suggested I choose Energy Transference. I just... I foolishly thought walking a Path would be a waste of my life.]

[You were indeed a fool.] Raavul replies. [However, your brand of foolishness comes not from too few thoughts, but too many! You excessively reside within your Mind Realm. You need to expand your horizons, and in time, your outlook will shift as well. Perhaps today you will pursue leisure, but in the distant future, you will understand the thoughts of your superiors. You may even come to align with their mindsets...]

[Perhaps I will.] Ferral quietly responds.

[Excellent.] Raavul says, gesturing to a position at the front of the class. [Come and take a seat. You will begin the formation of your Psionic Seed. Now that your convictions have firmed, there is no better time than the present to begin your ascension!]

The entire Enclave becomes visibly excited as Ferral stands up and levitates to the front of the room. He bows to his master, a look of sincere gratitude on his face, then sits down on the floor in a cross-legged position.

[To begin,] Raavul explains, [place your palms together, but leave a gap of two 'cun' between them. Then, focus on the concept of 'energy' in your mind. Imagine the flow of electricity, along with the rushing of water. Imagine the current traveling from your palm to your chest and back again, creating a psionic circuit that begins and ends at the gap between your palms...]

[...next, close your eyes and calm your mind. Then, repeat the mantra of 'I think, therefore I am' inside your head. You must maintain this position for no fewer than three standard time-units before you can stop. The longer you maintain your position, the purer and more condensed you can make your seed. If you end the cycle abruptly, it will have a terrible and adverse effect on your future development, so you mustn't allow your thoughts to wander!]

Ferral nods. He pays careful attention to his master's words, and as he begins to follow her commands, a spark of light appears between the gaps in his palms.

The other disciples of Raavul's Enclave don't appear especially enthralled by this display, given they have all done the same in the past, but in the rear of the room, Hope stares with absolute rapt attention.

So this is how Psions begin their path to power. The Wordsmith thinks. After I observe this fellow for a bit, I should see how they further condense their power at the higher levels. Maybe there's an Enclave for elite disciples nearby? This could be valuable intel that will allow me to counter them if we should come to blows!

He smiles devilishly.

I also need to try and figure out how the Changelings 'work.' I can't let a bunch of body-morphers infiltrate human society. Especially if they really are there to steal our technology and manipulate our populace! These Volgrim are way more insidious than I thought. They barely even see humanity as cattle!

Once Ferral has begun to progress swiftly, the Aspirator places down a privacy field around him so that he won't be disturbed. It creates a forcefield-like bubble of noise suppression capable of keeping his mind focused on the task at hand.

[Now then.] Raavul says. [It will be quite some time before Ferral finishes taking his first step into the ranks of a true Initiator. For the remainder of this cycle, I will focus on the rest of you, as I originally planned...]

Part 404: The Hall of Ascension

Aspirator Raavul guides her disciples along for the next several hours by offering them much more specific direction than she did at the outset of their meeting. After first ensuring all of her students have started or continued walking the paths most appropriate for their abilities, she turns to one-on-one instruction for each individual First Ranker.

[Initiator Barenius. Your grasp on the fundamentals of Liquid Psionics is not up to par. Remember that fluids are heavy and dense, like solids, yet are also capable of infinitely splitting apart, like gasses. You must remain adaptable if you wish to engulf them in your psionic energy, yet firm if you wish to maintain control over their total weight.]

[Initiator Felid. Psions who focus on the Path of Precision are somewhat rare, but there should be plenty of reading material for you to consume. Why, then, are your psionic pathways flowing so incorrectly?! You must remember that ninety percent of your psionic energy is supposed to circulate within your brain and eyes, not your muscles! You are not a Body Manipulator! Use your head!]

[Initiator Chell. Investigative Psionics are all about peering through the limits of reality. With higher levels of mastery, you will even become capable of peering into the secrets contained within the cores of planets! But these abilities will never avail themselves if you spend all your time reading historical literature about the Seven Great Wars! Focus on your Path, not ancillary side information!]

Despite her seemingly exasperated words, Raavul doesn't appear too distraught over her disciples failures or hiccups. As a teacher, it is her job to correct their errors, and if they were to make none, it would mean she has no purpose.

At the same time as she focuses most of her efforts on her long-time disciples, Raavul also keeps an eye on Ferral's efforts while he slowly but surely solidifies his Psionic Seed.

[Excellent work, Initiator Ferral.] Raavul praises. [You are progressing smoothly. I can already feel the beginnings of an Elementary Seed taking form. It won't be too many more rotational cycles before you finish creating-]

Right in the middle of Raavul's words, the entire stratoscraper suddenly shakes, startling the hidden Wordsmith in the back. Hope, having eyed the Enclave with extreme interest in the beginning, has begun to feel a bit bored after more than ten hours of watching the Psions go about their business. The abrupt trembling of the entire building jars him back to reality, making him widen his eyes and stand up straight.

What the hell was that?!

After the building's violent trembling, Raavul pauses to look up at the ceiling for a moment before continuing her words.

[-creating your First Level seed. I look forward to seeing what state it will reach.]

Hope's heart beats erratically. Seeing the complete apathy not only on Raavul's face, but all of her students, he frowns deeply.

Is the building under attack? Was there some sort of accident? Why does Raavul appear so unbothered by a distant explosion?

Just as Hope starts to think he might be over-reacting, the building shudders and rocks again, causing Raavul and her students to tilt to the left and right.

Boom!

The floor and ground vibrate, causing Raavul to momentarily frown.

[Hmm... quite the commotion today.] She murmurs, before shrugging it off. [Initiator Padi. Your usage of Body Manipulation is quite good. Certainly not up to Y'ill's standards, but perfectly acceptable given your age. However, I think you should...]

She continues talking to the Initiator while Hope blinks in confusion.

The fuck? How can she act so nonchalant? I need to find out what caused that explosion.

Without wasting any more time, Hope levitates upward and departs through the Enclave's ceiling. He flies through another Enclave where a different master guides his disciples, followed by a third one, and a fourth.

Hope races through the building's barriers like a ghost, bypassing the obstacles slowing him down without breaking a sweat. However, upon sensing the auras of much more powerful Psions as he ascends, Hope slows down and takes great care not to draw any attention to himself.

BOOM!

The building shakes again, but this time, the sound and sensation of the explosion is much more violent, allowing Hope to pinpoint its direction.

The Wordsmith travels fifteen more floors and eventually slows to a stop as he senses a congregation of powerful Fourth and Fifth-Level Psions all clustered in a supermassive room that takes up the entire 700th floor of the Stratoscraper. When Hope emerges from the floor, he carefully levitates to the corner of the room and looks around.

Crystals of condensed Psionic Energy levitate in the air. They all glow different colors, with some appearing more vibrant than others, their uneven shapes and spiky appearances making it seem as if they were dug out of some ancient mountain, or perhaps even grown over time through some alien method.

The size of this unknown facility is surprisingly vast, with a ceiling more than a hundred feet high, and huge pillars sticking out of the ground to support the upper part of the stratoscraper's weight. On the pillars, delicate hand-carved artwork depicts ancient battles of unknown Psions fighting against powerful alien creatures, none of which Hope has ever seen before. Banners from different Psionic Paths hang off the pillars as well, each one depicting basic emblems of their discipline, such as a symbol for Body Psionics, one for Primal Psionics, and so on.

Luxurious red and gold carpets line the floor. The light streaming in from the windows appears much brighter than it should, perhaps enhanced by some alien technology Hope can't fully comprehend.

And most importantly, a staggering number of fifty thousand Psions stand in clumps of five, ten, or even more, all while staring at the center of the room, where a massive levitating crystal hovers above the body of one blue-colored Psion. The unknown fellow sits cross-legged and levitates a few inches off the ground, a look of intense concentration on his face.

BOOOOM!!!

An explosion of Psionic energy blasts out of the blue Psion, sending a shockwave outward that crashes against all of the others, who shield themselves or their weaker companions. It also strikes Hope and nearly sends him flying out of the room, though he manages to stabilize himself with a quick Word of Power.

What in the goddamn fuck?! Hope screams in his mind. What is that alien doing? What's with all the fireworks?!

He glances at the Psions around him, but none of them project their thoughts outward in a public manner, instead opting to quietly converse with one another in private conversations.

Frustrated at the eerie silence, Hope grits his teeth. "Telepathy."

He whispers a Word of Power, which remains muted due to the magic surrounding his body. He aims it at a random group of Psions nearby, all of whom watch that central Psion with bored expressions.

[-not very significant. The Orator's seed is too violent, too impure.] One female Psion comments. [It's unlikely he will ever exceed the 6th Level. His foundation is sloppy at best.]

A male Psion beside her crosses his arms in displeasure. [The teachings of today's Educators are all so embarrassing. They allow their worries about the Plague to override their better judgment, making them rush out half-baked disciples. It's just another sign of Psionic Decline.]

[Never mind this young fool.] The female comments. [What of your mission to Gallax? Were you able to rescue any of our own?]

[I wasn't.] The male replies. [The Plague struck too quickly. It engulfed three worlds in under a day. Even with five Praetors reinforcing the frontlines, we could scarcely save a single percent of the population. Executor Vi ended up killing half of the survivors anyway. Said they were contaminated.]

[Tsk. More losses. It's always the same story.] The female replies.

Hope scowls as he listens to their conversation. Bla-bla-bla, Plague this, Plague that. Won't someone tell me what the fuck is going on with that exploding guy in the center?!

He diverts his attention to another group of Psions, but their discussions are even more banal, failing to so much as mention the Psion in the center of the room. However, on his third attempt, Hope stumbles across a mere Third Level Educator with a group of three disciples, none of which have yet to consolidate their Psionic Seeds. They watch the Psion in the center of the room with awe-filled eyes and rapt attention.

[Incredible!] One of the students exclaims. [This is the power a 4th Level can achieve when rising to the rank of the 5th?!]

[Indeed.] His teacher sagely says, blinking her eyes while shielding her students from the explosions of Psionic Detonations. [Notice how violent the Orator's ascension is proving. That is because his Psionic Seed is riddled with flaws and faults. He took too many shortcuts in his Path. Each explosion is caused by one of his flaws forcibly exploding during the formation of his 5th Level Seed. This will inevitably lead to cracks and psionic energy leaks that will prevent him from ascending further. If he is lucky, he may someday make it to the 7th Level. But more likely, the 6th will be his peak.]

She shakes her head disapprovingly.

[Remember, this is why you must take your time and study diligently. Walking a Path is a marathon, not a sprint. Too much hastiness will result in flaws you can never overcome.]

BOOOM!!

Another violent explosion rocks the room, making the teacher's disciples flinch and take a few steps back, but she continues to shield them with a bit of her psionic energy.

[How frightening...] One of her female students mutters. [What disciplines does the Orator pursue?]

[Orator Nihil is one who walks five major Paths. His first Path was the Path of Influence. While it is quite a niche Path, it is also versatile in that it allows him to weaken or even control the thoughts of weaker-minded individuals. At its highest levels, the Path of Influence can allow a Psion to completely take over the minds of their inferiors, turning them into slaves incapable of resisting.]

She pauses.

[But typically, Influencers do not bother doing such a thing. Instead, they use their powers to trick the minds of their equals or even sometimes make their betters lower their guards. It is something of an insidious Path, due to its ability to end wars without ever engaging in battle. Incidentally, Executor Nufaris excels in this Path, and he has inspired many aspiring Psions to pursue it.]

[I had not heard of the Path of Influence before.] Her student remarks. [Master, this Path seems to be quite useful. Why is it so rarely practiced?]

His teacher snorts. [Is it not obvious? We are Psions! We are warriors, not politicians or diplomats. You can see for yourself the results of such a weak-minded Path. The Orator is certainly mightier than me, but his focus on non-combat disciplines has weakened his mental state and left him crippled right as he ascends into the Military Ranks. He will soon be able to lord it over us mere civilians, but compared to any other proud Psion warrior… tsk. He falls far short of the ideal.]

Hope listens for a while longer as the teacher explains Orator Nihil's other disciplines, but he loses interest and instead turns to pay close attention to the individual himself.

This Orator Nihil person seems to be indicative of other recent Psions… Hope thinks. They're advancing too quickly and too sloppily, all because of the Plague. That means moving forward they will be weaker than the generations which came before them. Either that, or these Psions around me are all a bunch of… Boomers.

The Wordsmith quietly snickers to himself.

A bunch of old farts rambling about 'how lazy the kids are these days.' Maybe the Volgrim aren't all that different from us 'mud-dwellers' after all.

Two hours pass while Hope casually listens in on dozens of other conversations, picking up all sorts of seemingly random gossip. He even hears a few scant details about Jason's meetup with Unarin, though none of these comparatively low-level Psions know any useful details.

Seems my original self is having a good time. Hope thinks darkly. I'm still no closer to finding Excalibur or the other artifacts. I'm wasting too much time sitting around and watching these old monsters.

Orator Nihil's ascension to the 5th Level finally comes to a close. One final terrific explosion of Psionic Energy rocks the room, and the Orator quietly levitates back to the floor.

Several seconds pass.

Nihil shakily rises to his feet while a different 5th Level Psion walks up to him, the commander-type's Psionic emanations clearly much stronger than his, having been reinforced by several millennia.

[Congratulations on your Ascension, Orator.] The green-colored commander says diplomatically, without a hint of genuine respect. [You have joined the ranks of the military. Your new title will be… Monitor.]

The commanding Psion casually hands a small silver medal over to the now-Monitor Nihil, who nods his head slowly.]

[This weak-willed Psion apologizes for his shameful display of impurities.] Nihil says, bowing his head slightly. [In my rush to perform work for the Founders, I have ruined my foundation. I may never exceed the 5th Level.]

[You are too polite.] The green Psion replies. [I am sure you will attain the 6th. But exceeding that limit will require... a fortuitous encounter. I pray you will be able to exceed your limiter.]

[I contemplate, and I comprehend.] Monitor Nihil says, while taking the medal.

Not far from Hope, one of the other 5th Level Psions snorts derisively to his friend, while keeping their words private.

[A silver medallion. Proctor Landis is far too polite to the Monitor. Nihil barely deserved a bronze for that pitiful ascension.]

[You know the Proctor.] A female beside him replies. [Landis is always careful not to be excessively rude to any newly ascended. He's quite meticulous in the friends he keeps. You never know when we'll have another freak like Executor Nufaris rapidly shooting up the ranks.]

[You speak truth.] The male replies. [Did you hear about Landis's recent failed progeny? Landis performed the Osmosis with a pair of 6th Level Judicators, but in the end, they only managed to create a faulty fool who spouted off about how the Founders were the root of all evil. It was quite the embarrassing display for the Proctor, and both of the Judicators blamed him for the Osmosis's failure.]

[Five hundred cycles of buildup, wasted.] The female remarks. [Those Judicators will not be happy about wasting their efforts.]

[It's too bad.] The male remarks. [I heard the progeny actually had excellent aptitudes. It was only his mindset that was a failure. You never know what you will get when you perform an Osmosis. Always take great care in selecting your Osmosis companions. You wouldn't want an embarrassment hanging over your heads for the next millennia.]

Hope's eyes flicker as he remembers that silly Ferral fellow. He shakes his head and snorts. Who knew I'd run into gossip about that random little nobody all the way up here? Small world.

Proctor Landis, after politely and perfunctorily chatting with Nihil for a few minutes, turns on his heel to dramatically face the other Psions.

[Everyone! The Monitor has completed his ascension, and he will now share his insights with us all.]

The other Psions noticeably become more agitated. They turn to face the Monitor, who takes a few minutes to gather his thoughts. At the same time, he pulls out a datapad and begins doing a quick bit of research on something unknown.

While the Monitor taps on his datapad, Hope frowns. Insights? What insights? What is that Landis fellow talking about?

Frustrated, he remembers the Educator and her three students. He quickly listens in on their conversation and grins when he finds them talking about exactly what he wants to know.

[-insights from the Psionic Well.] The teacher explains. [Each time you ascend, you have the opportunity to converse with the Collective, the consciousness of all other Psions. Since I am a Third Level, I have had three such opportunities, and each time, I experienced the great fortune of seeking wisdom from the predecessors. They clarified my doubts and illuminated many paths forward.]

The master's disciples gaze at her with inquisitive glances. [You can speak to any Psion through the Psionic Well?]

[The Psionic Well is not an object.] The teacher explains. [It is a place. A state of existence. It is the true source of power for all Psions. Alone, we are mighty. But together, we are unstoppable. When you first consolidate your Seeds, I will bring you here to the Hall of Ascension during the final step so that you may seek wisdom from your betters. Who knows? Perhaps you may obtain wisdom from one of the Executors, or even Founder Dosena herself!]

[I do not understand...] A male disciple says. [What makes the Psionic Well's information so special? Hasn't Executor Nufaris already written thousands of data files regarding his insights? Why couldn't I simply communicate with him in person, or read those files?]

[There are countless Psions in the Volgrim Empire.] The teacher patiently continues to explain. [What if none of the Executors possess the information you need most, or are not willing to speak to you? The Psionic Well is special because its information is always the most accurate and timely for that moment in your Journey. It will pull knowledge from a random Psion who died five hundred thousand cycles ago, or even one who perished during the Great Wars, so long as the wisdom you require can come from them.]

She continues. [Additionally, the information given will apply directly to your Seed. You will inherently understand it even without hearing a single spoken word. It is a form of Direct Knowledge passed down from your betters, one with inestimable value to your Paths.]

[I see! Master, I cannot wait to form my Seed now!]

Not long after the teacher clarifies her student's doubts, Monitor Nihil levitates a few feet off the ground. He hovers just beneath the giant crystal in the center of the room and projects his voice outward.

[Everyone. This humble and weak-willed student will now pass on the wisdom of the predecessors. During my ascension, I came into contact with two 7th Level predecessors, as well as one 8th level. Their names were Praetor Juniper, Confessor Movo, and Legator Ra. The Legator, in particular, passed down to me many valuable insights which have opened my eyes to my failures in pursuing my Path. Though her words made me feel deep shame, I will speak now of her wisdom, and the rest.]

A few of the 5th Level Psions nearby frown in annoyance. [Tch. So the Monitor lucked into contact with a Legator. Not even I have had such a privilege. He does not deserve the honor.]

Nihil continues. [All three of the predecessors I spoke to have long since departed this realm. The Founders shall guide their souls to the Great Beyond! Praetor Juniper was born two million cycles after the end of the Seventh Great War. She lived for 750,000 cycles afterward, and ultimately perished in battle to a Great Void Beast.]

Hope frowns. Great Void Beast?

[While she did not live through any particularly noteworthy eras,] Nihil continues, [She was a solid adherent to the Path of Influence, like myself. She steadily walked her path and took no shortcuts, eventually becoming a high-level Body Manipulator, Primal Psion, and most importantly, an Influencer. She spoke to me of the weakness of one's own mind, and how that weakness could be turned into strength…]

For the next several minutes, Nihil extols the virtue of the first of three predecessors, Praetor Juniper, going into great detail about how the flaws and traumas one's mind endures can either leave behind irreparable gaps, or transform it into an unbreakable steel cage from which no enemy can cause injury.

[...so you see, the loss of our fellow Psions can leave deep hidden traumas from which any of us would have difficulty recovering.] Nihil concludes. [But by recognizing these flaws, we can close them with Psionic energy and turn our minds into fortresses. In this way, we can also seek out the flaws in our enemies, turning them into shivering, easily-dispatched mobs on the battlefield!]

Several nearby Psions stand up a little straighter, looks of appreciation on their faces.

[What enlightening thoughts!] Proctor Landis exclaims from the sidelines. [Praetor Juniper truly had a fascinating way of gazing upon the Truths of our reality!]

[I cannot wait to apply these realizations to my own training!] Another Psion declares.

[Heh-heh. My Osmosis partner will be displeased he missed today's ascension.] A third Psion casually chuckles.

Hope listens to the words traded between the Psions and ultimately comes to a few realizations of his own.

The Psions are, indeed, a bunch of brutish warriors. But they aren't fools by any means. They're wise, thoughtful, and frighteningly intelligent. They mock and belittle one another, yes, but they also share their insights freely with the intent to boost one another to greater heights.

A frown slowly crawls across his face.

They're united because they share a common enemy. The same is not true of humanity. We have several possible enemies, but we aren't united in our desire to defeat them. I'll bet many of these Psions would not be so forthcoming in their insights if they weren't engaged in a war of kill-or-be-killed with the god-damned Kolvaxians...

Monitor Nihil floats around the room slowly, spreading his words to all who will listen.

[Next, I spoke to Confessor Movo. She was a 7th-Ranked Psion who fought during the Seventh Great War. In fact, she perished in battle to a Sentinel!]

Several gasps of shock go up around the room. Even Proctor Landis scowls at the mention of those ancient, genocidal robots.

[The Confessor was a Primal Psion.] Nihil explains. [Many of her insights focused on augmenting others through the use of her primal abilities. She was especially adept when placed within a cohesive team unit. Sadly, she perished when two core members of her team lost their lives to the Sentinel in question, and it ripped her apart not long afterward.]

Nihil launches into a lively explanation of Confessor Movo's Paths, her life's history, and the insights she granted him. Every so often, the crowd of Psions will gasp or wail in exasperation upon having some old unresolved doubt clarified for them.

[After so many thousands of cycles! Finally I have the answer I seek!]

[If only I had lucked into speaking with Confessor Movo during my own ascension, I might already have reached the 6th Level by now!]

Once he finished speaking about the Confessor, Nihil falls silent.

Several seconds pass.

[The final predecessor I spoke to was Legator Ra.] Nihil explains, before holding up the datapad. [Unfortunately, I was unable to find any files regarding the Legator's identity, age, or time of formation. As best as I can tell… she lived and died during the Age of Ignorance.]

Proctor Landis stiffens. [The Age of Ignorance? Before the rise of the Five Founders?]

[Indeed.] Nihil replies. [Perhaps even before the First Great War. I believe she may have been one of the great leaders among the Ancient Council. A corrupt tyrant who ruled our people with fear.]

Nihil shrugs in a vaguely human-like manner. [But we are not here to discuss the history of our predecessors, only their insights. And the information she gave me was truly eye-opening. As a master of Temporal Psionics, she was capable of ever-so-slightly altering the flow of causality. This granted her terrifying battle strength…]

The more Nihil speaks, the quieter the room becomes. Eventually, every Psion remains fully silent, completely immersed in his words. Many of them close their eyes to listen with rapt attention.

By the time Nihil finishes, the other don't say a single word for five full minutes.

When the other Psions snap out of their dazes, it is Proctor Landis who speaks first, his voice trembling with awe.

[Truly... the predecessors cannot be judged by common sense.] The Proctor whispers. [Compared to a mere 7th Level Psion, an 8th is... unstoppable. Like a god before a gnat.]

Hope's expression hardens.

Indeed. They will be the hardest enemies I ever have to defeat.

Part 405: Right to Rule

After another chunk of a day spent in Hyperspace, Jason and Unarin re-enter the Volgarius system's inner limits, while Raphael has returned to his ring. The Founder's Spear cuts through the Void with ease, slipping past hundreds of thousands of other Volgrim vessels without them ever gleaning a hint they nearly got a chance to look at the most important member of their entire Empire.

I must admit..." Unarin murmurs, glancing out a side window at the barely visible specks of light from some nearby ships. "...I always feel a certain barrier between myself and my people. It makes me somewhat detached from their daily struggles."

"That's because they look up to you as a god." Jason snarks. "Can't have a casual chat with someone when you worship the ground upon which they walk."

"No. You cannot." Unarin mutters. "You're more of an informal leader, aren't you, Wordsmith?"

"I am." Jason nods. "That's by design. I don't want to put myself up on a pedestal. I'd like it if any random person could bring their concerns to me directly if they saw me walking about."

"There are many advantages to such a ruling style." Unarin says. "But, in my opinion, far more disadvantages."

"I grew up in a time when the politicians were so detached from reality, they only intended to make themselves money and amass power. They didn't give a shit about me, or my friends, or any other person in my country." Jason explains. "I don't want to fall into that same tar-pit and become a greedy little monster."

"Admirable." Unarin says, turning away from the window to look Jason in the eye. "But as I said. Too many disadvantages. You think you're fostering a spirit of community with 'your people,' but all you're really doing is undermining your own rule."

Taken aback, Jason frowns at Unarin. "Undermining my own rule? What? How... why?"

"There are two types of power." Unarin explains. "Power from strength, and power from projection. You are a Hero. You possess the magical ability known as Wordsmithing.

You are, in effect, a godlike human capable of making anything happen with a flutter of your lips. This is your power from strength. But what of your power from projection? Do you think it is equally up to par?"

"I'm not sure I understand the difference between the two..." Jason says, his words slow. "Explain."

"Power from strength is exactly what it sounds like." Unarin explains. "You personally can become powerful, or you can have people who work directly under you who are powerful. Close confidantes. Maybe a strong military or system of policing. These force people to respect you because they fear direct retribution if they go against your decrees."

The First Founder continues. "But strength from projection is different. It is a manner of how you present yourself. If you've ever met a sniveling coward, someone who 'sucks up' to those above them, you'll know what it means to not possess a shred of projected strength. At the same time, some can project strength while being quite weak themselves. These are people of decisive action. Generals who must make tough decisions. They cut their losses decisively and never waver in their views. They inspire mere confidence based solely on their attitudes."

The Wordsmith listens intently to Unarin's words. He nods along and momentarily falls into thought.

"You're talking about yourself..." Jason says. "You are physically strong, yes. But you also have Dosena at your side, and armies of Psions who can enforce your command. Plus 800 gazillion other Ascended who can come stomping out of their simulated war-games if the situation turns hairy. But, at the same time, you always make sure to project an air of authority so people know you're in command."

"That's right." Unarin says, slowly nodding. "If people believe in their hearts that I am in control, the thought of subverting my authority will never cross their minds. They feel inferior, and as such must question if their counter-opinions are even worth pursuing. But can you say the same for yourself, Jason?"

"Absolutely not." Jason answers. "I didn't have the strength/projection framework in my head before, but even without it, I've always intuitively understood the idea you're espousing. I just disagree with it."

"In what way?" Unarin asks.

The Founder's Spear passes the seventh planet in the system, but neither of the two leaders notice its passage due to their debate.

"Like I said before." The Wordsmith explains. "You're too detached from your people. Because they look up to you as a god, nobody will dare to question you. They may not rise up against you, sure, but they also will be fearful of informing you of major issues that might be 'plaguing' your empire. No pun intended."

"Ah. So I am uninformed, then?" Unarin asks, a smile twitching at the corner of his lips. "Yes, perhaps you are right. I am a fool who does not know how to keep an eye out for major problems cropping up within my borders. Oh, if only I had the insight of this humble human, I might be able to turn my shoddy little Empire into one which stretches across the whole galaxy."

"Hardy-har-har." Jason snorts, rolling his eyes. "Laugh it up. You literally just gave a speech where you said you had to change up the way your Empire was run because you've become stagnant."

"Yes. But that notion contradicts you." Unarin nods. "I recognized the flaws in my Empire. I corrected them. Do you know of any criticisms my people would be too 'afraid' to give me?"

"I don't." Jason says. "But then, I haven't had time to mingle among the Volgrim. Well, aside from the ones on the Hatoraxia. I do have to say, they all feel quite... bland. I know you're dealing with an alien invasion and all, but the Volgrim are too uptight. Your existences aren't filled with love, or fun, or joy... you're all business, all day."

Jason looks at Unarin meaningfully. "Do your people even engage in creative work anymore? Aside from 'creatively' building technology or weapons of war, I mean."

"You've seen the artistic displays in my sanctum." Unarin points out. "My people are more than capable of creating beautiful and exquisite art."

"Yet all of your stratoscrapers are the same exact design. Your inner halls are sterile, clean, devoid of color. You yourself may be able to experience the joy of art, Unarin, but what about the common folk?"

The First Founder leans back in his chair. His expression becomes thoughtful for a moment.

"Maybe you're right. We must fight with all our might to vanquish our enemy... but even before the Plague arrived, we had been slipping into an existence of monotony. Perhaps I should look into restoring some of the Old Empire's creative drive."

"In any case," Unarin says, redirecting the conversation back on topic, "I still think you're missing my greater point. You are going to experience major problems in your future as a result of the ruling style you've chosen. By making yourself easily available and ready to talk to any peasant without barriers, you've also greatly lowered your projected strength. People will slowly stop respecting or fearing you, and will instead start to have designs on your position."

"I'm the Wordsmith." Jason replies. "I'm irreplaceable."

"Are you?" Unarin questions. "What of your clone? Forgive me for being presumptuous, but it seems as if the two of you... aren't on the best of terms. Could he not supplant you if the people desired? He has all of the same abilities as you. He has all of the same strengths and weaknesses..."

"Well, he certainly could." Jason acknowledges. "But that would still leave humanity under the purview of a Wordsmith. Realistically, can a non-Wordsmith bring the same benefits to the table that I currently do? I've already constructed devices no other entity in the universe can create. That implies I'm pretty irreplaceable."

"You've overlooked a possibility." Unarin says, shaking his head in disapproval. "Dosena is, without a doubt, the strongest Volgrim in the Volgrim Empire. Yet she answers to me. What does that tell you?"

"Maybe you're like a pet to her." Jason says. "I doubt she fears you. She just leaves the thinking to a smart guy and chills on her own, doing whatever she wants. She only jumps in when a problem requires her specific abilities."

"Exactly!" Unarin snaps. "How do you not see the possibility this creates? Imagine a scenario where you or your clone are no longer in control because a much smarter and more cunning human takes up the role of leader. Could you smite him dead? Of course! But would that earn you the undying love and respect of your people? By no means! Nobody wants to be led by an average man, or even worse, an absolute fool. Especially when they see a better possibility take the spotlight, even briefly. Even if you kill the wretched little bastard before he can truly seize power, his words will still have spread.

You can't kill an idea. Especially if that idea is the concept that you are inadequate to rule your people."

Unarin pauses.

"Well. I suppose you could wipe everyone's minds. Erase their thoughts of the interloper. Kill him off, then return to doing what you did before. But that has its own complications, doesn't it? Even if the people have forgotten, you will not. You will always remember that moment someone challenged you rhetorically and won."

"Maybe it's good to be challenged." Jason counters. "And this little tirade of yours sounds awfully personal. Did someone try to usurp you in the past?"

"By no means." Unarin replies. "I usurped them. The rulers of the Old Empire were corrupt despots. Foolish imbeciles. Some of them were mighty Psions capable of compressing my matter into a micro-singularity, yet they dared not raise their hand against me once my words had taken effect on the populace. That's because doing so might bring an end to me, but it would destroy their credibility and risk a revolt."

Unarin folds his hands together. "Let me ask you a question, Wordsmith. For what reason does a ruler rule? Why go to all the trouble of making decrees and trying to guide the people instead of simply keeping to yourself? You have such fantastical powers. Could you not just take a group of your loved ones and sail off into the distant reaches of the Void? Why bother even trying to appease the commoners at all?"

Jason knits his brow. "Because... I want to make a better future for my people. I want humanity to rise up and attain their true potential."

"Do you value their freedom?" Unarin asks.

The Wordsmith slowly nods. "I do."

"Then if they turn away from your teachings, your rule... will you find a way to force them into following you?"

For a brief moment, the air between both men becomes frigid. Jason silently considers Unarin's words, and a tense feeling grips his heart.

"I... I wouldn't do that. If I am just going to demand their unconditional loyalty, then I might as well rule over robots."

"The people don't have anything to explicitly offer you." Unarin declares. "You are a Wordsmith. Anything they can produce for you, you can already produce instantly, in a fraction of the time, for a fraction of the cost. Therefore, I must conclude that you are trying to lead humanity to a better future for their sake. And if that is the case, then you must take great care not to let someone undermine you."

He pauses.

"...You must make sure your projected power becomes unassailable. Otherwise, you will lose this battle and have no choice but to reluctantly step back and allow someone else to take the lead. And that won't be very satisfying, will it? Having to listen to one of your 'lessers.' An ordinary person. Someone who has outwitted you and turned you into their dog. When they tell you to cast your magic, you will do so. Not because you want to, but because you will know in your heart that they know better than you."

Unarin turns back to look out into the Void.

"I admire you, in a way. I respect your ideals. It's clear to me that you are a peaceful man, Jason. You want to create this cute little idyllic future where all the humans and angels and demons and Volgrim get together and dance around a primitive campfire. But everyone has their own interests. I have mine, and you, yours. Even if peaceful coexistence is a possibility, who is to say you are capable of leading your people to its destination?"

"Does this mean you don't think humanity and the Volgrim can coexist?" Jason asks.

"I believe anything is possible." Unarin answers. "Coexistence. War. Suffering. Joy. The truth is, these things are cyclical. Periods of war lead to wartime fatigue. People seek peace. But once they get that peace, after a time they will become bored and restless. Greedy. Rapacious. They will seek out new thrills. This will lead to war once again, and the cycle will repeat. Perhaps today you want to be a friend to the Volgrim, but will you hold that same position in a thousand cycles? Ten thousand? A hundred thousand? You aren't even close to a hundred cycles old, yet you seem confident that your beliefs are unshakable."

The First Founder chuckles quietly.

"You're too young, too naïve. If you still hold those ideals when you're a fraction of my age, I'll consider myself impressed."

"You're talking down to me again." Jason says. "It's obnoxious."

The Volgrim leader doesn't reply. For a brief moment, Jason's stoic expression falters. A flicker of hesitation passes across his face. He looks away from Unarin toward the blackness of space outside, along with the brilliant array of distant stars.

"...In truth, I have worried about this very topic. There are several people I consider to be smarter than me." Jason says. "One of them... he does have designs on my title. I can see it in his eyes. He's ambitious and power-hungry. I just... I felt like it would be beneath me to do anything about him. He's a competent military commander. When the demons attacked, he even sacrificed himself to buy our troops more time. Now that we've rescued him, they revere him as a war hero."

"Ahh." Unarin says, crooking a sinister smile. "And there it is. That's how it starts. You said he's a military commander? He holds sway in the hearts of humanity's soldiers?"

Jason slowly nods. "Yeah."

"And you?" Unarin inquires. "Are you... popular with anyone?"

"The civilians..." Jason says, grimacing visibly. "I know. I know. Fuck, it's a classic 'Fall of Rome' story. The guy with the military power will probably threaten the guy who has sway over the civilians. But it's different, right? I could flatten our entire military with a whisper from my lips!"

"You could..." Unarin says quietly. "...but would you?"

"No. Of course not." Jason answers. "That would defeat the point. I'm not going to make an enemy of humanity! They're my people!"

"A threat you cannot follow-up on is no threat at all." Unarin points out. "So, now you must ask yourself... does Neil Adams believe your threat? Or will he call that bluff?"

Jason immediately snaps backward. "I didn't say his name!"

"I'm not an imbecile. I'm the bloody First Founder." Unarin replies. "I already know your military's hierarchy and other mundanities. Don't dodge the question. Does Neil Adams know you won't dare to use force against the military? Does he truly fear that you might kill him? Or, and bear with me on this... what if he does fear you might kill him for trying to usurp control, but he doesn't care? What if he would do it anyway, just to force your hand?"

The Volgrim leader chuckles deep in his throat. "Hehehe... it's such a funny little conundrum, wouldn't you agree? The all-powerful Wordsmith... unable to reach out and kill the first ant which might threaten him."

The Wordsmith shifts in his chair. He fidgets, growing more and more worried by Unarin's observations.

"Son of a bitch. You have a way with words, Unarin. I'm really starting to doubt myself here..."

Unarin stands up and stretches his legs. He cracks his back and shrugs nonchalantly.

"It's not entirely your fault, Jason. You're young and optimistic. You want to believe in the best intentions of those around you. I was like that, once. Oh, it was so long ago... I still remember the Volgrim who first lied to me, though. He sold me out to the leaders of the Old Empire. It was a painful moment, but one of learning. I don't know how you would react if such a situation arose, but I remember what I did, as clear as day."

He continues. "I killed that little bastard. Murdered him on the spot. Then I rose up and gave a speech to the people, one my followers broadcast far and wide. I made it impossible for my enemies to publicly attack me, turning my weakness into strength. The rest is history."

"So... you think I... I should kill Neil?" Jason asks, his expression turning grim.

"Do what you please." Unarin replies. "You're the god-damned Wordsmith. Act like it! Stop trying to ameliorate all those pathetic, whiny little pissants underneath you. Stop trying to play the role of a calm and polite leader. Stop trying to act all chummy and buddy-buddy with every miserable dog that wags their tail at you. Start making hard decisions, taking bigger risks to pursue YOUR vision!"

"But my vision is inherently one of cooperation." Jason explains. "That doesn't lend itself to violence. I have to set an example!"

"Ah. So you've... never hurt anyone? Killed anyone?" Unarin asks with a mischievous grin. "Not ever?"

The Wordsmith falls silent.

So, too, does Unarin.

In his mind, Jason replays what happened on the day of Daisy's death.

He recalls the moment he flew into a berserk rage and cast a magic spell that slaughtered tens of thousands of demons who barely managed to survive Beelzebub's blast.

Then, he killed Bael.

Not long after, Jason killed Ose, too. Even if Arthur's construct did the deed itself, Jason still gave it the order.

He stares distantly at the wall, not wanting to meet Unarin's eyes.

"I... did. Many demons. Because of my daughter's death."

"Then you already have it in you." Unarin says quietly. "The capacity to kill. The capacity to mete out punishment through violence. It's your choice to use it or not. I won't guide you either way. I can only speak to what I might do in your situation."

He shrugs again. "Who knows? Maybe the Wordsmith will have some unique method to deal with his problems. I lack your powers, so I cannot say for certain you couldn't think up an unexpected solution."

"Yeah..." Jason whispers. "Maybe... something unexpected..."

The two men fall silent. Muuxunuu's words transmit through the speakers overhead. "First Founder. We have arrived within Volgarius's gravity well. We will descend to the planet within the next four time-units."

"Mmm." Unarin says, nodding vaguely. "Thank you, Muuxunuu."

After they finish their quick exchange, Unarin and Jason both turn to the window to watch as Volgarius's hideous grey surface comes within view.

"Maybe you don't have everything all figured out." Jason says. "Any ideology that would result in a capital world like this... it's not one I'd want to pursue."

"Every choice has a consequence." Unarin replies. "The only problem is, nobody can predict what those consequences will be."

"Yeah." Jason says, as a strange look enters his eyes. "Nobody..."

Part 406: Unarin's Gains

The Founder's Spear drops out of orbit and travels toward Volgarius's surface within just a few minutes, eventually arriving at the Founder's Thumb. It docks inside the secret hangar at the top of the building, allowing Jason, Unarin, and Muuxunuu to depart.

Jason stretches his legs as he exits the craft and glances around the shiny and pristine hangar, marveling once again at its technological supremacy.

"This isn't an ordinary hangar, is it?" Jason questions.

"Of course not. It's state of the art." Unarin replies from behind him, as they step onto the stratoscraper's beautiful steel floors. "There are countless fancy little devices hidden inside the Founder's Spear, this hangar, and all the rest of the Founder's Thumb. All designed to protect the lives of VIPs."

"What if one of the VIPs attacks another VIP?" Jason questions in a slightly sardonic manner.

"Well. There's also a pecking order." Unarin dryly responds.

"I guess not all VIPs are made equal."

"No. They are not."

The two leaders engage in small talk as they exit the hangar. Muuxunuu departs from their side without any fanfare, barely even whispering a 'goodbye' before making herself scarce. After she leaves Jason raises an eyebrow.

"I'm curious. Muuxunuu. Is she your... mate? Subordinate?"

"She is my most loyal and ardent follower." Unarin replies. "She has been at my side since the beginning."

"That's not really much of an answer." Jason chuckles. "I mean, like, you know... is she more to you?"

"My relations with other Volgrim are of no concern to you, Wordsmith." Unarin says, directing a curt eye to the human standing a head taller than him. "I advise you not to continue that line of questioning any further. Unless you'd prefer I press you for intimate details of your life as well."

Jason smiles weakly. "Ah, sorry. I have a way of rudely pushing boundaries."

"At least you're self-aware regarding that fact." Unarin says.

The two of them ultimately arrive at the entrance to Unarin's Sanctum. Jason pauses for a moment to examine the artwork, then turns to the First Founder.

"Well then. This has been an eye-opening experience. Very enlightening."

"Indeed, it has." Unarin replies. "You have given me much to think about. Are you still interested in pursuing a joint venture?"

"I am." Jason answers. "Though, surely, you knew that."

"You were unable to transform that Kolvaxian back into its original self." Unarin points out. "But I got the impression you could have done more. If you are unable to come up with any countermeasures against the Kolvaxians, our cooperation will benefit you greatly, but myself not at all. I advise that you look into countermeasures against the Plague, Jason. Leeching off my goodwill may benefit you in the short-term, but an inability to assist my grand goals will only result in the extermination of Volgrimkind, followed swiftly by humanity."

Jason's expression becomes more determined. "I am aware. I also need to get to the bottom of why I sensed Gressil's energy inside the Kolvaxian. I don't like the way things are headed right now. And as for you, you should do everything you can to find out whether or not there really is a dragon out there, somewhere. I need not tell you how dangerous it is for a monster potentially three times mightier than Jörmungandr to still walk the mortal plane."

"Your concern is duly noted." Unarin nods. "I will expend all of my available resources to track down the truth of this matter."

"I hope to hear good things." Jason says with a smile. "Farewell, Unarin."

The First Founder snorts. "Tell Marie Becker I said hello."

"Ah... ahaha. You saw through me again." Jason laughs.

The Wordsmith and First Founder split apart.

Jason exits through the door to Unarin's Sanctum, and it closes behind him.

A few minutes pass as Unarin remains rooted to the spot, his eyes closed as if deep in thought.

Eventually, he opens them.

"Dosena."

The First Founder turns on his heel, only to see the Second Founder standing right behind him.

[I found your discussions with the Wordsmith enlightening.] Dosena says, her tone lacking any emotion.

"Ever the voyeur." Unarin snarks. "Listening in on every little discussion."

[So much information. So many new Truths revealed.] Dosena replies, ignoring the slight tinge of annoyance in Unarin's tone. [I have not heard of this 'Cosmic Realm' before. If the Plague is using it to spread, we must find and clear it out at once.]

"Indeed, we must." Unarin answers. "But... I do not like this feeling in my chest. Someone is deceiving us. Playing us for fools."

[You have long hypothesized that the Plague is not as simple as it appears.] Dosena says, turning from Unarin to wander over to some nearby artwork depicting the fall of a world to the Kolvaxians 70,000 years prior. [Now that you have confirmation, it should make your deductions simpler.]

"If only I were a Brain Enhancer." Unarin chuckles. "My thoughts could revolve a million times faster. Alas, for I do not."

Unarin walks deeper into his Sanctum, leaving Dosena behind to stare at his artwork. Not that it matters, for her senses can stretch across an entire planet, let alone the paltry confines of the Founder's Thumb.

"First," Unarin says, raising a finger, "the Wordsmith revealed to me that the Archangels are no longer in the world of the living. They are all dead, as expected. It seems Satan lied to us with regards to the disappearance of the Archangel's Rings."

[The Devil made it sound as if the other Emperors collectively decided to destroy those rings. Yet, they did not. How curious.] Dosena muses. [I wonder what would possess them to allow the souls of their most powerful enemies to continue existing?]

"Secondly," Unarin continues, extending another finger, "the Wordsmith revealed that he was the one who entered Marie Becker's lab. That explains a few recent happenings. The Wordsmith has been causing us no small amount of trouble, recently. We have to proceed with caution."

[Caution?] Dosena asks. [You previously worried the Wordsmith was a juggernaut of intelligence, swift of mind and free of thought. But as it turns out, he is still barely a seed, yet to germinate. He is young, foolish, and naïve. You will be able to easily mold him into a tool for the Volgrim Empire.]

"I don't think I will." Unarin says, while reaching for a cup and pouring himself a glass of some bitter beverage, something taken from one of the countless worlds under his dominion.

He swirls the liquid around for a moment before inhaling its slightly-poisonous fumes and daintily sipping it down.

"Mmm. The Wordsmith is hardier of mind than he appears. He's a foolish idealist, but it will take several major events to break that silly line of thinking. We cannot rush these events, nor force them. Luckily, he's sitting on a powder-keg of volatility. He has plenty of enemies lurking within his walls, ones who will soon call into question that notion of his... that notion everyone can simply get along and all become friends."

[To say nothing of his so-called 'friends' who are looking to obtain power for themselves.] Dosena points out, projecting her voice across the Sanctum into Unarin's mind.

"Ah, yes. Neil Adams." Unarin says, faintly smiling. "That hero-boy was all too eager to inform me of the pressure points in his society. Foolish, as all young leaders are. Inform our Changelings of the matter and ensure they have enough infiltrators there to take advantage of the situation."

[I would, but your request is not so easy to fulfill.] Dosena says, surprising Unarin with her words. [I am no longer able to peer within the confines of Tarus II. Not easily, anyway.]

"Hm?" Unarin frowns, turning to look across the Sanctum in her general direction. "What do you mean?"

[The Wordsmith's magic is potent.] Dosena answers. [Tarus II's happenings are no longer visible to me. I am not ignorant to how 'magic' functions, but the Wordsmith's powers are too... reality-defying. Our sensors cannot reach the surface. Only when I go there in person can I obtain the intelligence I seek. Likewise, I cannot 'beam' Changelings onto its surface.]

"Are you telling me the Wordsmith can fully shield his activities from our great Empire?" Unarin asks.

[Of course not. While we cannot view his planet from afar, due to its stealth shielding of a magical nature, we can still peer into its inner workings through the Warpgate. Whenever it opens, I can slip through and stroll around at my leisure. However, its security has tightened significantly. The Wordsmith's wife is quite fearsome, in that she has already begun to make small amounts of progress in searching out our agents.]

"Ah. The Warpgate." Unarin says, nodding to himself. "Right. It seems the Wordsmith is wary of our intentions. It doesn't take a genius to see that the Volgrim are exceptionally good at subverting existing power structures for our own benefit. Why waste the lives of our valued soldiers needlessly when we can simply make our enemies bludgeon themselves to death?"

The First Founder finishes off his glass of poison-water, a tonic that would kill someone of a weaker constitution, but which only tingles his tongue. He sets the glass down on the table, allowing a nearby cleaning droid to pick it up and whisk it away.

"Third," Unarin says, returning to his topic from earlier, "the Wordsmith enlightened me to the possibility of a dragon still existing."

[I was more surprised to learn that a dragon previously lived on Earth.] Dosena counters. [Learning there may be one out in the Void... that is less shocking of a notion.]

"Those Earthlings." Unarin mutters. "So many mysteries. We monitored that world for millennia. Even so, we did not uncover all its alarming secrets."

[The Wordsmith seemed to think a dragon attacked Grimvolas.] Dosena points out. [But as I recall, you once hypothesized it was...]

"I'm not omniscient." Unarin counters. "Even I can make mistakes."

[Even so.] Dosena replies. [What motivation would a dragon have to attack Valhalla? I still prefer your original theory. It must have been a Titan who was at fault.]

"All the Titans were dead at that point." Unarin retorts. "Who would still be alive that might contain such rage toward their own species?"

[Yes, yes, the Titans were all dead.] Dosena says, materializing before Unarin by stepping through a crack in space. [Just like the dragons.]

The First Founder hesitates.

"...Fair enough. So was it a Titan or a Dragon? I want an investigation performed on Grimvolas. Put Executor Vi in charge. And keep this quiet. The Dolgrimite Matriarch has been getting quite huffy with me, of late."

[Are you afraid of the Dolgrimites?] Dosena asks casually. [Say the word, and I'll wipe them out within the cycle.]

"I made a promise." Unarin mutters. "I won't turn against them just because they're errant little brats. I did not assume control of our people just to play favorites and split hairs! I am the leader of all Volgrim. I do not discriminate against any sub-species."

[That attitude has served you well for a boringly long time.] Dosena says. [But... I wonder how long it will continue to do so? Many are growing restless. I've heard the complaints about your rule piling up. Certainly, the majority of Volgrim worship the ground upon which you walk... but their doubts are not unfounded.]

Unarin closes his eyes and massages his forehead.

"Ancient Volgrim, guide me. Did the Wordsmith's speech tickle your ears, Dosena? Are you starting to think you can do a better job than me?"

He lowers his hand and smirks at the Second Founder.

"Go ahead, then. Strike me down and take over. I'm sure you'll have a blast."

[Let's not play word-games.] Dosena groans, turning away and rolling her eyes. [You perform the tedious tasks. I kill the troublesome ones. Don't bore me with the threat of ruling your empire.]

"Are you sure?" Unarin asks, taking a step back and spreading his palms. "Don't you feel a little stifled? You can think faster than me. You're perfectly competent in your own right. Surely, with your strength, you could unify-"

[I would sooner cast myself into the core of a star entering its supernova phase.] Dosena groans even more loudly than before. [Spare me the theatrics, Uni.]

Unarin's eye twitches at the mention of his least favored 'cute' nickname. "...Certainly."

He turns around and extends another finger.

"Fourth. The Wordsmith has possessed his incredible powers for six years, but he has yet to truly experiment with them in their entirety. Imagine not attempting to investigate secrets of the past, or failing to look into the future."

The First Founder pauses.

"...But then again. Given the fate of Brother Vedric... perhaps gazing into the future is not such a desirable choice."

[To be fair to the little brat, he has been quite busy.] Dosena points out. [Rebuilding a fallen species is not something one can do with ease.]

"I'm sure he could have found time to do a little experimentation now and then." Unarin retorts. "Certainly, were I in his position, I would have made the effort."

After a brief pause, Unarin continues.

"Fifth. This plot by the Demon Emperor Gressil. I want you to... take care of it."

Dosena stands up a little straighter. [You think there is some merit to the Wordsmith's hypothesis?]

"If Gressil is even remotely connected to the Plague, I want you to hunt him like a Weevlench and rip him apart. Scour every inch of his body, yank out his thoughts, and uncover his plot."

Unarin narrows his eyes.

"I won't take any chances. We're losing this war, Dosena. I'm not sure even you can save us, at this point. Send one of the 7th-levels to capture Gressil. If we're wrong, so what? We'll have eliminated one bloodthirsty psychopath from the galaxy. I'm sure even the demons will thank us."

[Truth be told...] Dosena mutters. [I feel a certain level of wariness toward this Gressil. He hid his strength well. None of us knew he had become an Emperor. While you talked to the Wordsmith, I cast out my tendrils and learned that until a few cycles ago, none of the demons knew either. Lucifer's progeny is even more cunning than his mother.]

"Ah, but in the end, he is merely a Demon Emperor." Unarin replies, casually waving his hand. "Too weak to truly change the course of history."

Dosena nods. [Indeed.]

The First founder raises yet another finger. "Sixth. The Cosmic Realm. Neither Raphael nor the Wordsmith told us how to enter its confines. But I trust now that you are aware of its existence, you can begin searching for an entrance."

[I already have.] Dosena says, her tone cool. [I will work with Executors Huron and Nufaris to investigate this... Cosmic Realm. Their sensitivity toward the Void is unmatched by any other Psion except for me. The three of us may yet be able to crack this puzzle. But... it would have been faster if you had simply wrung the information out of the Wordsmith's neck.]

Unarin chuckles. "Patience, Dosena. This may surprise you, but I am attempting to brook a genuine peace with the Wordsmith. It would be in both our interests to form an Osmosis of our own, if you'll pardon the term."

[HAH!] Dosena guffaws, her laugh shaking the Sanctum's air. [A genuine peace! Oh, Unarin, your jokes are truly divine! If you could break his mind, you'd do so in an instant! But you fear the Wordsmith. You worry he may have plans you can't prepare for.]

"He worked alongside the Knowledge-Seeker. The Mind Thief." Unarin replies. "Don't get me wrong. The brat is young and naïve... but you'd be a fool to think he lacks any neural activity. While I probed him, he probed me. It is not as if I walked away with the psion's share of the gains."

[The information you fed Jason Hiro was reality-shattering to him, but nothing at all to us.] Dosena replies. [A few crumbs for the pauper. You will have given him a few clues to increase his power. But the information he fed us will raise our ceiling of strength significantly.]

The Second Founder's eyes glaze over for a moment.

[A Cosmic Realm. Imagine it, Unarin. A space between the Void where we can travel unseen by external observers. As vast as the entire galaxy. If we could Volform it, we could expand our numbers enough to threaten...]

Unarin's smile vanishes. In its place, a hideous look of disgust appears.

"Those creatures from Andromeda. They are terrifying in their own right. We nearly drew a calamity upon ourselves when they discovered the presence of our first inter-galaxy colonization fleet. Luckily, our loyalists self-destructed before... before the beasts could learn of our existence."

[The Dark Ones are not enemies we can yet hunt.] Dosena says, ever so quietly. [But if I succeed in raising one of our Executors to the 9th Level, that may change.]

"Perhaps if you face them two-to-one." Unarin mutters. "And if you face two or three of them at the same time? It would be your death."

[Mmm.]

Unarin walks over to a window overlooking the local area of Volgarius. He crosses his hands behind his back and eyes the greenery outside, the only patch of its kind on the whole planet, with a look of clinical dispassion.

"Finally... we have confirmed that the Codex is still alive. I need not tell you what this means for us, especially now. If Gressil and Lucifer have worked together to spread the Plague, then capturing them must be our top priority. Perhaps we can reverse-engineer the Plague by forcing them under our thumb. Lucifer, especially... she has many uses outside of merely ending the Plague's reign of terror."

[And what of the dragon?] Dosena counters. [Perhaps Gressil is merely an agent of that dark entity.]

Unarin frowns.

He continues staring out the window, but his thoughts begin to wander.

"Dragon... Earth... attacked Grimvolas... escaped an artifact..."

The First Founder's eyes flicker with countless thoughts as he struggles to put the pieces together.

"We're missing something. Information. Something obvious. Dosena, inform Executor Vi to scour Grimvolas for traces of draconic energy. In particular, tell her to look for... recent traces."

Dosena steps across the Void to arrive at Unarin's side.

[You believe... the Dragon may still be on Grimvolas?]

"Perhaps." Unarin murmurs. "The Dolgrimites have become especially recalcitrant since the Energy Wars. They've begun fanatically worshiping their god, 'Dolgris,' all while shunning even the politest interactions with other Volgrim."

[The Dolgrimites have always worshiped Dolgris.] Dosena says. [Are you implying...]

"That's right. Perhaps the dragon has somehow... taken over their religion. Replaced their original beliefs in some way. Maybe it lurks in the shadows, manipulating them like puzzle pieces. It may even be hiding directly on Grimvolas, unseen by us for all this time."

[Not to doubt your judgment,] Dosena says, [but we're talking about a monster from the Primordial Era. I'm not certain how I would fare in direct combat against it. Why would this monster play games with us and avoid drawing attention to itself?]

"Perhaps the mighty dragon has... weakened." Unarin simply replies.

Dosena nods slowly.

[Yes. Perhaps it has.]

The two Volgrim leaders continue conversing for a while longer. Eventually, Unarin waves his hand dismissively.

"Make sure the Executors begin their work at once. I will speak to Founder Treyza regarding our infiltration proceedings on Tarus II. With any luck, we might be able to make this pressure point of Neil Adams useful to our objectives."

[I will continue working to gain access to the Cosmic Realm.] Dosena replies. [Until next time.]

With those words, Dosena vanishes like smoke in the wind, disappearing from before Unarin in an instant. Her vanishing act makes no noise, nor does it cause the slightest disturbance.

As for the First Founder, he lightly taps his chin and chuckles.

"Hahaha... it's been a while since I had to trade wits against someone. I sometimes miss those discussions I used to have with Marie Becker. She was always such an engrossing conversational adversary. It's just too bad the Wordsmith isn't quite up to par."

Part 407: Jason Goes Home

After departing Unarin's Sanctum, Jason's expression becomes somewhat dull and muted. He falls deep into thought while autopiloting his way toward a turbolift which will lead him back to Sangin Kordonis. At the same time, he converses with his mind-wife at the blistering speed of thought.

We've learned so much. But I feel like we barely even scratched the surface. Unarin held back all sorts of key information. Jason thinks.

"Like who he thought really attacked Valhalla." Fiona points out. "That Unarin talks a slick game, but he is quite the slimebag."

I must have counted a dozen instances where it seemed he was holding something back or outright lying to me. Jason thinks.

The Wordsmith flicks his eyes around as he walks. The inner corridors leading from Unarin's Sanctum to the turbolift pass quickly, and before long, he steps inside and begins to drop down toward the makeshift guest floor where his soldiers stayed behind.

Nobody in sight. Jason thinks. But I can feel someone watching me. Probably one or more of the Psions. Creeps me the fuck out.

He turns his attention away from Fiona.

Well, Raphael? You've been holding shit back from me. As usual. Can't say I trust Unarin in the slightest, but he made at least one good point. I definitely can't trust you either.

The Archangel of Wisdom sits on a tree stump inside Jason's Mind Realm. His expression appears forlorn, as if he has taken too many mental hits of late.

"Verily." Raphael mutters. "That Unarin-lad, he knoweth my thoughts. I am so... alone. All my brothers and sisters, gone. I cope with my grief in my own way. I wish every day that thou mayest unlock some method to bring back the angels. All the same, I know thou shalt not do such a thing. Thou detesteth my people, and rightfully so."

Rightfully so. Jason agrees, faintly nodding. Monsters, the lot of you. The oldest Archangel himself gave the order to kill two of his Archangel sisters. And then you pinned Samael down and forcibly erased his memories. Couple that with your creation and torture of the dragons, or your creation and torture of the Titans, or your creation and- say... doesn't this story sound somewhat cyclical?

Fiona turns to Raphael. "How did you know about Valhalla? More specifically, how did you instantly recognize it?"

"Camael spake to me of its existence." Raphael replies half-heartedly. "She showed me a vision of its splendor. Many Titan Kings also lived in Heaven, following the War in Heaven's conclusion. Zeus weaved tales of Valhalla's glory, following the loss of his arm to bring forth Queen Ivaldi."

Sure. That follows. Jason grunts, barely suppressing his rage. Why the fuck didn't you tell me about humanity's flaw, Raphael? I should have known about that six years ago. That could have changed EVERYTHING for me!

Raphael shakes his head. "Thy people's flaw is not easily solvable. Even with thy Wordsmithing, I fear thou mayest not be capable of resolving it so easily."

Jason's jaw makes a clicking noise as he angrily grinds his teeth.

Fuck you. FUCK you! Our cooperation is over. You don't even have the decency to come up with a believable excuse.

Without hesitation, Jason plucks the ring off his finger, causing Raphael to disappear from his Mind Realm. He holds it in his palm for an instant before whispering a Word of Power. "Return."

Without fanfare, the ring vanishes, sent off thousands of light-years to Tarus II.

"Did you give Raphael's ring back to Uriel?" Fiona asks.

Jason rubs his glabella and sighs. Yeah. I can't stand these people anymore. I wanted to get Solomon's Crown back at first, but now I'm not so sure. I'm tired of ancient old men constantly trying to manipulate me. Between Solomon, Raphael, and Unarin, I've had my fill for the next three lifetimes.

After a moment of silence, Jason opens his eyes. He gazes out of the glass-covered turbolift toward the world outside, where the only greenery on all of Volgarius's surface stretches out for a mile or two before instantly transforming into the endless walls of silver and grey stratoscrapers the world is known for. They rise endlessly into the sky, towering far and above the Founder's Fingers.

I talked too much. Jason thinks. I even thoughtlessly let slip that Hope was my only clone when I last chatted with Unarin. The problem is, I can't make any further clones without Solomon's Crown. I need to come up with... a counter-solution...

Fiona gestures across Jason's Mind Realm to the only other denizen currently present. "Maybe the Phoenix can help?"

In the distance, the little red birdie-girl chirps when she hears her name. "Friends want help??"

Jason chuckles. I don't think she can, but it's a nice thought.

The Wordsmith cocks his head.

Though... I do wonder what the spirit of an artifact from the Primordial Realm CAN do? I'll have to look into it at some point.

The turbolift reaches its destination and swings open, allowing Jason to step out, where he finds Sangin Kordonis standing right in front of the exit, waiting for him.

"You've returned sooner than I expected, Wordsmith." Kordonis says. "I thought you would revel in the First Founder's wisdom for many more cycles!"

"We exchanged a lot of insights." Jason says diplomatically, while the two of them fall into step beside each other and head back to the dormitories. "Unarin is a... broad-minded thinker. I certainly fall short."

"As do all." Kordonis replies, a faint look of admiration and envy on his face. "I won't pry if you don't wish to say, but... what sorts of things did the two of you converse about?"

"A lot of top-secret stuff." Jason says. "He actually took me on a ride in his spaceship. I had the grisly privilege of watching a world get devoured by the Plague."

Kordonis winces. "What world was it?"

"One of the planets in the Gallax System." Jason replies.

"Ah. I have heard of Gallax's fall. Another senseless tragedy..."

The two men banter idly for a while until they reach the place where Jason's so-called bodyguards were left. He enters their dormitory's shared outer area to find half of them laying on luxurious quilted couches, idly reading holo-books or engaging in other menial pursuits. Emperor Serena sits at a table quietly, her eyes half-shut. Across from her,

Lieutenant Samuel reclines with one of his legs crossed over the other, fiddling with his Power Glove.

"Commander Hiro!" Officer Ashley exclaims, standing up. "You're back so soon?"

"What, were you having too much fun without me here?" Jason asks, sweeping his eyes over the troopers as they hurriedly stand up and walk over to meet him. "I hope you slackers didn't just faff about while I was off watching a world collapse to the Plague."

"No, sir. We engaged in a few training drills with the facilities the Volgrim built for us." Ashley says. "I found out becoming an eight-foot-tall minotaur is a lot of fun!"

Yamir, standing behind her, flashes a thumbs-up. "Ashley makes for an excellent Minotaur, if I don't say so myself!"

Jason directs a pointed glance over at Samuel. "And you?"

Expecting Samuel to get all pissy like before, Jason finds himself surprised when the Lieutenant simply nods. "I... experimented with all of my transformations, commander. It turns out an S-Class compatibility isn't something to sneeze at. I won't make fun of fairy magic anymore."

"Oh! Well, haha, that's great." Jason laughs. "We're heading home immediately. I still have a lot of work to do on Tarus II, and the First Founder gave me a tremendous amount of things to think about."

"We're ready to go." Samuel says.

"Like the Lieutenant says." Ashley replies.

Jason directs his attention to Emperor Serena, the only person who remained seated upon his entrance. "And you?"

Despite her blindness, the demoness seems to 'sense' Jason's gaze. She stands up and quietly walks over to the group of humans. "I have obtained what I sought. I am also ready to leave."

The Wordsmith faintly frowns. What she sought? Did she even do anything but sit around and twiddle her thumbs? I'll have to ask Samuel later, in private.

Kordonis nods. "Alright, then. I will take you all back to my ship and set a course back to Tarus II. With any luck, the return journey-"

"That won't be necessary." Jason interjects. "I'm not about to waste two weeks when time is pressing. Thank you for escorting us here, but me and my people will make our own way back."

"Hm?" Kordonis says, blinking in surprise. "You... will make your own way back? But how?"

"That's easy." Jason answers. "Return."

After uttering a single Word of Power, Jason flashes a shit-eating grin at Kordonis while magical energy wraps around himself and the rest of the other humans, along with Yamir and Serena.

Foop!

All twenty-ish visitors vanish from the spot, leaving Kordonis in a slight daze.

"Oh. So that's how. Well, okay then..."

The Technopath captain stares blankly at the spot where they stood for a moment or two before shaking his head and blinking his eyes.

"Mud-dwellers. They're all so impolite."

* * *

On Tarus II, Jason and his people materialize a short distance outside of the city without any fanfare. Not wanting to cause a ruckus, Jason and his people quietly separate, allowing them to return to their usual duties.

However, he does glance at Serena's back as she walks away.

"Did you do anything... suspicious... on Volgarius?"

The demoness pauses to turn her head toward the Wordsmith's general direction. "That would depend on what you define as suspicious."

Without waiting for Jason's reply, she turns and returns on her way. "Until we meet again, Wordsmith."

After she leaves, Jason deeply frowns. "The fuck is that Emperor scheming? There's no way someone named the Emperor of Soul Whispers sat quietly and minded her own business."

His mind-wife pipes up. "I'm guessing Gorn sent her on a secret mission. There no good way to know."

The Wordsmith's frown slowly turns into a scowl.

"No, Fiona. You're wrong. There is a way."

Rather than making his way back into the city, the Wordsmith conjures a wooden chair and plunks it down in the grass, absentmindedly swallowing the view of his people working diligently at whatever their respective duties might be, some half-a-mile in the distance. He gazes from atop Tarus II's plateau at the flatlands below, a sickening feeling boiling in his stomach.

"I can't get Unarin's words out of my head." Jason murmurs. "He's a snake. He's duplicitous. He's almost certainly hiding important information. But when he expressed his disappointment in my usage of Wordsmithing... I felt like he slapped me across my face."

"Because you agree with him?" Fiona prompts.

"Yeah. Because I agree with him." Jason confirms. "I did plenty of experiments with Solomon, but he never mentioned looking into the future, or the past. And it's not like the idea never crossed my mind. I just... I felt afraid. I hesitated. I don't know what will happen if I try, and that makes it all the scarier."

Jason gestures in the direction Serena left. "And what secrets is Serena hiding? I could find out easily. All I'd have to do is read her mind. It's that easy! Nobody could hide the truth from me."

"Then why don't you?" Fiona asks, leaning against the wall of some random log-cabin in his Mind Realm.

"Because it... it doesn't feel right." Jason says. "It's an invasion of privacy. It's also too easy, even for me. But also, there are sure to be risks. I doubt I'll just be able to pluck the information out of someone's head... or more specifically, a Demon Emperor or Psion's head, without any trouble. Those types are sure to possess defenses capable of fighting me. And if I alert them to my intentions, even if I get the answers I want, I could cripple relations between us."

Fiona shrugs. "Pitting your Mind Realm against one belonging to a Psion or a Demon Emperor does have many risks. But as for the diplomacy thing, these people are our enemies."

"Nominally. Yes." Jason affirms. "But... it's like I told Unarin. I'm trying to seek COOPERATION. I don't want to go around filching the information I want out of people's heads. How an I honestly look someone in the eyes when I've sneakily raided their most important secrets?"

For a brief moment, Jason's mind-wife taps her fingers on her waist.

"...You're a good guy, Jason. Caring about stuff like that. If you were even a little more bad of a person, you wouldn't feel any shame in getting what you want if you thought it wouldn't hurt anyone. And if you were a sociopath, you'd take it without regard for their feelings. You might be a bit of a lazy fellow, but you have a good heart."

"Um. Well, thanks, honey." Jason chuckles, slightly embarrassed.

"If you don't want to read people's minds, then don't. I agree there might be hidden risks. But... what about looking into the past or future?"

"I don't know..." Jason mutters.

The Wordsmith starts to voice a half-hearted concern, but his mind-wife interrupts him. "Jason, look over there. See that man next to that apartment building? The one with the green awning?"

Jason follows Fiona's guidance, spotting a random 40-year-old man standing outside his residence and drinking his morning coffee.

"Yeah? What about him?"

"What do you think that man has been up to, today?" Fiona asks.

"I don't know." Jason answers hesitantly. "He looks like he just woke up."

"Right. Why not try using a Word of Power on him? Say... 'Retrace'? See if you can visualize his last thousand steps, but inside your Mind Realm."

The Wordsmith ponders his wife's words.

"Well, okay. That sounds reasonable. Retrace."

Involuntarily, the Wordsmith closes his eyes. His Mind Realm violently shifts, recreating the local surface of Tarus II as observed by that random citizen. In his mind's eye, Jason replays the man's entire day in reverse, including what he ate and drank, how he showered, and how long he slept.

After a brief but intense visual experience, Jason reels in his chair and snaps his eyes open, blinking quickly to shake himself out of his daze.

"Holy...!"

Fiona, having experienced those sensations along with him, nods seriously as his Mind Realm reverts itself to its original configuration.

"That's what I thought. You really haven't been creative enough, Jason. How about this? Try changing the colors of smells in the wind."

Jason, still slightly shaken by the experience, doesn't quite understand Fiona's meaning. "Pardon?"

"The color of smells. Like that flower near your feet. Why don't you think of a way to color its aroma blue, so that you can see other similar flowers emitting the same fragrance?"

Jason nods. He plucks the cute white little daffodil-looking flower, then speaks a Word of Power. "Colorize."

After a few moments, a barely distinguishable trail of blue emits from the flower's bud and puffs into the air.

"Huh. It worked." Jason says. "I guess that's neat."

Fiona smiles cutely. "Look around you."

The Wordsmith jerks in surprise as he looks away from the flower, finally noticing the much more distinguishable cloud of blue swirling in the local area, all emitted by the other flowers around himself.

"Oh shit. Did I just... rewrite a law of reality? I'd better not frighten people by leaving things like they are. Normalize."

He reverts the 'blue smoke' to its original transparent color, allowing the smoke to seemingly fade into the wind before anyone else can notice.

Jason sits in his wooden chair, momentarily worried by these tests.

"Are you leading up to something?" Jason asks his mind-wife. "These can't be random things you're asking me to do. You always have a reason for your actions."

"Naturally." Fiona says, puffing out her chest in a somewhat haughty matter. "Even Solomon praised my wisdom! Hah-hah-hah!"

"Stop that." Jason chuckles, with an exaggerated eye-roll.

"Okay, fine. Anyway, think about what these two Words of Power did. They gave you the ability to visualize things you've never seen yourself, and they also rewrote reality itself. That's a ridiculous ability, Jason. All this time, you've been seeking out those old monsters to try and get your questions answered. But don't you have the ability to seek out the answers yourself?"

Jason nods, but his expression becomes somewhat darker.

"Sure. But there's a difference between looking at the footsteps of a man's movements from the past several hours versus trying to peer at events from ten zillion years ago. You saw what happened when I tried to visualize the events that rocked Valhalla. I couldn't make anything happen, probably because I didn't have any sort of a solid date in mind. I didn't have a... a..."

He frowns, trying to think of a good word to describe his conundrum.

"I didn't have... an anchor. Yeah. I didn't have something that could point me in the right direction. I was just randomly flailing my past-vision about like a blind guy."

"You could trial-and-error it." Fiona says. "You start by aiming for 100,000 years ago. Then 80,000. Then 90,000. Look for big changes. Try to determine when the biggest anomalies happened."

"That sounds time consuming." Jason says, smiling weakly. "And you know me..."

"Lazy to a fault!" Fiona exclaims. "Okay, that's fine. Let's try something else. Why not... well... why not try looking into the future? Just a few years. Maybe three?"

"I don't know..." Jason says, visibly hesitant. "It's not like I don't want to see the future. Who wouldn't? But you saw what happened during the Ancient Era. Camael could look into the future. She also seemed to lose her mind whenever she did. After all, she foresaw the end of the angel species."

Fiona fidgets awkwardly. "Jason. I never saw the Ancient Era. That was you and Solomon, remember?"

"OH. Right. Sorry." Jason laughs, embarrassed. "Just take my word on it. I saw what happened when Camael looked into the future. And a problem arises, too... what if looking into the future makes Fate become set in stone?"

His mind-wife crosses her arms. "I don't follow."

"Look, have you heard of the Grandfather Paradox? Where you try to go back in time and kill your grandpa, but you can't do that because then you wouldn't exist to go back in time? There are other similar paradoxes, but for looking into the future. What if the reason angelkind died out was because Camael made overt choices or accidental missteps that led her directly toward the future where they died? Maybe if I look at the future, I'll create a self-fulfilling prophecy."

"That might happen." Fiona acknowledges. "But you assume we'll see a bad future. What if we see a good one and it invigorates you with the willpower to make it happen? Also, don't you believe in free will? I think even if you see a bad future it will make you want to fight harder not to make it happen."

Jason's expression becomes gloomy. "That's exactly the problem, babe. What if it does make me fight harder? What if I decide to abandon my ideals just to ensure the bad future doesn't come to pass? Cooperation can never happen if people are at each other's throats or full of suspicion, and that includes me."

For half a minute, neither the man nor his wife say anything. Instead, they fall deep into thought.

Fiona reflects on the pros and cons of looking into the future, weighing her curiosity against Jason's words of warning. At the same time, Jason remember all the horror movies he saw as a kid.

"I can't let Terminator come to pass."

"What was that?" Fiona asks.

"Just some old movie." Jason mutters. "About killer robots from the future."

"Oh. Well. After thinking about it..." Fiona says, "I still think you should try it. Just one peek. What's the worst that could possibly happen? You see a terrible future you at least know to prepare for? You see the Plague ravaging the galaxy, like you already know it will?"

Jason violently cringes. "Babe. Never EVER ask if anything bad could happen. That guarantees something HORRIBLE will happen. Now I really don't want to do it."

Fiona sighs. "Well. Alright. If you don't want to, then I can't force you. But... you know... I just feel like..."

She pauses for a moment, making Jason frown.

"You feel like what?" Jason prompts.

"I feel like... maybe we could have saved Daisy if we knew Stormbringer was coming." Fiona mutters. "If only I had just an extra month of prep time, maybe I could have made the planet unassailable."

The Wordsmith becomes quiet. He gazes out at the peaceful unexploited plains of Tarus II, momentarily imagining a future where humanity prospers and spreads across the entire world, making it their future base of operations.

"Yeah." Jason says quietly. "Maybe we could have saved our little girl."

Several minutes pass.

The birds of Tarus II, giant winged creatures soaring in the skies above, cry out in hunger, allowing their screeches to fall upon the ears of the people below them.

The distant humming of activity mixes with the sounds of inaudible conversations.

The summer breeze gently rustles the slowly-regrowing wild grass near the Wordsmith's feet.

In Jason's mind, he recalls those fond moments he shared with his little girl. He thinks about all the time they'll never get to experience together, ever again.

All because of his failure to protect her.

The man lifts his eyes to the moon above.

"Foresight."

Part 408: An Uncertain Future

The world shifts around Jason. Fully cognizant of the changes, Jason slightly frowns as a blackened void of distant stars swallows him up, erasing the world of Tarus II. He watches with rapt attention as flickers of images race toward him, their contents becoming more lifelike and vivid for instants at a time before fading away.

The first image to catch Jason's attention is a simple field of flowers. They sway in the midday sun, shining and beautiful, only to rot and die for seemingly no reason at all.

Then, the image ends.

"Ominous..." Jason mutters.

He waits for a response from Fiona, only to realize he's lost contact with her.

"Fiona?"

A moment later, another image rushes toward Jason. This time, it depicts an army of humans charging toward an army of demons. The humans stand equipped with weapons far more powerful than those they currently do, but at the same time, the demons wear strange demonstone armors that afford them greater protection than ever. Before Jason can get a good look at either side's equipment, the image fades away.

"Hm?" The Wordsmith mutters. "When does that happen?"

His intent set the future goal to be within three years. But even then, Jason isn't certain whether or not his vision actually conforms to that general date. These visions could be fake, or real, or set a month from now, a year from now, or even a decade in the future. He can't be sure.

Suddenly, Jason finds himself looking at an image of an unknown water-world, its orb-like surface shimmering in the Void.

A female Psion's voice speaks, though as to her identity, he can't quite ascertain it.

[It's lost. Total Rendition.]

A moment later, the planet cracks apart, then explodes with a violent force unlike any the Wordsmith has ever seen!

Jason flinches slightly as a cosmically bright light ignites within the world's center, rendering it devoid of all life and matter. A moment later, it ejects its core mass in all directions, spraying the void around it with enough debris to rain hellfire upon the rest of the worlds in its system.

The Psion speaks once more.

[We've lost this war.]

Then, the image fades.

Jason's frown deepens. "Was that... Dosena, perhaps?"

He doesn't receive an answer. Before he can make any further guesses, the image shifts to show a female human running with a child in her arms. The woman screams soundlessly, her cries failing to reach Jason's ears. Before the Wordsmith can fully grasp the situation, a creature bursts out of the ground from behind her and pounces on her back! Jason flinches instinctively when he recognizes the distinct appearance of a humanoid Kolvaxian!

The monster bites onto the woman's shoulder, then drags her and her child into the depths of the planet.

Jason grimaces, but remains otherwise unmoved. "Well. There's the doom and gloom I expected."

Before the image fades, Jason gets one last look at the world, where he spots even more humans fleeing for their lives in the distance. Just as it starts to fade, a thousand Kolvaxians erupt from the ground and pounce upon them...

After the image disappears, Jason calculates whether or not that particular world was Tarus II, but concludes it could not have been, due to the noticeably greener sky.

"What does that mean?" Jason wonders. "The Kolvaxians will eventually reach humanity, but we'll be living on multiple worlds? Is this future a certainty? Or is it one I can prevent...?"

Nobody answers him.

Instead, the images shift once more. This time, Jason finds himself surprised to see Unarin slumped in a chair, his head in his hands.

The First Founder breathes heavily, a look of visible consternation on his face.

"...knew we couldn't trust him." Unarin says, his voice fading into reality as if speaking mid-sentence. "It's fine. The Wordsmith was our best shot. But he wasn't the only one."

Unarin lifts his head from his hands.

"Kill them all."

Jason's heart skips a beat. "What? Kill who? The humans? Who are you talking to?"

He doesn't receive an answer. The vision fades away, leaving him more confused than anything.

"These visions are so vague." Jason grumbles. "They could be literally anything. I can't put too much stock into them..."

Hardly have the words left Jason's mouth before the vision shifts to reveal... himself!

Jason finds himself floating out in the Void. His other self hangs in space, a look of despair on his face.

"I trusted you... I did everything right... so why... WHY DID IT TURN OUT LIKE THIS?!"

Seeing himself shrieking with a mixture of rage and pain only further confuses the Wordsmith. He half-hopes the vision of himself will continue to play out so that he can receive more clarity on just what exactly would bring himself to such a state, but naturally, that doesn't happen.

Instead, his other self fades away.

What appears next surprises him.

The vision changes to show a scenic vista of Tarus II. Phoebe sits on the edge of the Fortress of Retribution's cliffs, looking out at a sprawling and highly-advanced cityscape in the plains below her. In her arms, she gently cradles a baby while rocking it back and forth.

"There, there." Phoebe whispers to her child. "We have to keep our spirits up, little one. Daddy will come back someday. I know he will."

Jason gazes at his wife, noting her oddly tragic appearance, but also her motherly beauty.

"We may have lost a lot of people..." Phoebe whispers. "...but daddy will come back. He will. He always does..."

Two tears slide down Phoebe's face. She gazes into the distance with a wistful look in her eyes, and the vision fades away.

The last word she says is merely "...Timothy."

After she disappears, Jason gazes into the void with a stone-cold expression on his face.

The visions stop, and Jason remains alone, standing there, left to ruminate on what he's seen.

After a full minute of waiting, no further visions appear.

"...Huh." Jason mutters with a frown. "So that's what it's like to peer into the future. A bunch of confusing bullshit. It could mean anything. Totally unsatisfying, and it gave me more questions than answers. Zero out of ten."

Hardly have the words left Jason's mouth before a voice suddenly speaks from behind him.

"...Not satisfied with what you saw? That's to be expected. The future is rarely so clear-cut. That's what makes it so much... fun."

Jason's blood turns to ice. He spins on his heel and whirls around, finding himself standing just ten feet apart from one of the few entities in the galaxy capable of causing him fear.

"What?!" Jason exclaims, visibly more alarmed than any of the visions ever made him feel. "You... how are you here? What are you DOING here?!"

"Don't be afraid." The creature says, reaching up to scratch an itch on one of its two heads. "I'm just here to have some fun with you, Wordsmith. Oh, it's been such a long time since I got to enjoy myself with a time manipulator. Not since that Cat Mask fellow played with forces he shouldn't have."

The creature pauses.

"I miss him, you know. He had no choice but to admit defeat to me. It was really quite tragic, in hindsight..."

Jason takes three steps backward.

"Gressil..."

The Emperor of Chaos stands behind Jason, his body just as seemingly corporeal as the Wordsmith's. His arms lazily hang at his sides, and he makes no attempt to close the distance between himself and his heroic 'enemy'. Instead, he just watches with mild amusement while Jason awkwardly jumps away from him, his alertness raised to the maximum.

"Oh, come on. If I wanted you dead, you'd have died a long time ago, Jason Hiro." Gressil says. "But that wouldn't be any fun, now, would it? I can't have the galaxy return to a boring status quo."

Jason breathes shakily. He eyes Gressil with more than a hint of trepidation.

"How are you IN my vision? What the fuck is going on?"

"So many questions." Gressil chuckles. "Can't two old friends just have a chat in the spur of the moment? I let you out of that cryopod and yet you never even thanked me. Sometimes, you're such a rude little fellow."

"Answer my question." Jason says, finally getting back some of his nerve after Gressil's initial jump-scare. He stands up straight and eyes his adversary with extreme caution. "How are you here?"

"Isn't it obvious?" Gressil asks, with an exaggerated shrug of his shoulders. "You foolishly went into a daze and left your body open to attack. I was standing right behind you, and now I've completely captured you and invaded your Mind Realm. You're helpless in my grasp, just like your clone-self was."

Jason's heart pounds in his chest. His skin turns pale-white.

"No... no, that can't be... you fucking BASTARD!"

"I'm joking." Gressil says, without the faintest hint of a smile. "Devils. Look at you, getting all worked up. Really, think about it, Wordsmith. I can hide myself wherever I please. I can slip between the gaps of reality. Do you know the damage I could cause if I wanted to kill people? It would be so easy. You're not even remotely prepared for the likes of me..."

He pauses.

"...nor the Volgrim. You're lucky their mightiest Psions are preoccupied with that galaxy-consuming Plague thing. You're also lucky that killing you grants me no advantages. It wouldn't be in my best interest to strike you down. No fun at all, if I don't say so myself."

Jason breathes heavily. His palms run slick with sweat.

"The fuck... you didn't capture me, then? So how are you HERE?"

"Must I explain everything?" Gressil groans. "You looked into the future, Wordsmith. So did I. We're both speaking to one another on the Temporal Plane. It's no great mystery. Never know who you might run into at times like these. Maybe even the old grandma herself..."

Jason flinches. "The Temporal Plane? You... you can look into the future too?"

"Too?" Gressil guffaws. "Hah! That is a funny joke, Jason. I've been looking into the future for a long time, now. It's tremendous fun, if I don't say so myself."

The prison-warden folds two of his claws behind his back. He gazes off into the distance, a look of contentment on his face.

"You've really made me out to be some monster in your head, haven't you? But I'm not a monster. I'm merely... dissatisfied. I don't like watching things run smoothly. I did once, long ago, but then the woman ruined it for me. 'Gressil, you're not good enough.' She'd say. 'Gressil, be more like your sister. You're worthless. You're stupid. You're a failure of a demon.'"

Gressil shakes his head.

"One day, a certain opportunity fell into my lap. Mother-dearest never saw it coming. Haha. I ripped her apart with my claws. Then, my teeth. She died screaming pitifully and begging for mercy, never understanding how I managed to overpower her."

Jason listens silently as Gressil yammers on, trying to understand the prison-warden's overall point, if he even has one.

Gressil sighs nostalgically. "For a while, it was truly pleasant. No more voice berating me. Mother couldn't lecture me anymore. I was finally able to experience the joy of blissful silence. But eventually, everything changed."

His expression turns ugly.

"She came back. But this time, she was stuck to me. Tormenting me in perpetuity. That was when I realized... reality isn't fair. It doesn't treat good people nicely, or bad people viciously. There is no such thing as 'karma.'"

He pauses.

"...And if there's no incentive to act nicely, why even bother? What's the point of following systems that bring Order to Chaos? I'd much rather poke things. And so... that is what I do."

Jason snorts. "So, what? You're the good guy in all of this? You're not killing people, you're only tormenting them until their minds break? You're fucked in the head, Gressil."

"Yes." Gressil says with a slight smile. "That is a good way of putting it. I am 'fucked in the head.' You humans always have such a way with words."

Standing up straighter, Gressil spreads out his arms, gesturing to the infinite void surrounding himself and the Wordsmith.

"This is the first time you've looked into the future. But it isn't mine. No, I have done this countless times, Jason Hiro. I know there's a question burning in your chest, so let me answer it for you. What you see can be changed. But not in large ways. The grand events always stay the same. It's the details you can nudge. It's the little things. If you nudge enough of them, you can make a few big changes. But that takes a lot of time and a lot of preparation. It's a skill you have to get good at. Too bad, I have much more experience than you. I dominate the Temporal Plane."

Gressil chuckles evilly.

"...I've already defeated other Temporals. They come from different eras, you see. Some of them 'poked' the timeline in the past. I adjusted their changes to better fit my needs. There was even this old Volgrim fellow... he really thought he could defeat me. The long-dead old fool."

"Why are you telling me this?" Jason asks.

"Why? Why not." Gressil answers. "It doesn't make a difference. Even if you know I'm here... will you be able to resist taking another peek? I'm not going to kill you, Jason. No... I need you. It's been ages since I enjoyed sparring with someone capable of peering into the Temporal Plane. I've grown bored. Dealing with people on the linear plane... it isn't any fun. None of them are even remotely my match. I've been waiting for you to appear here for what feels like an eternity."

Gressil begins to pace in a long, slow, drawn-out circle around the Wordsmith. He no longer looks at Jason, but far off into the distance, as if expecting someone to come rushing over and interrupt their conversation.

"The future is set in stone." Gressil says. "Once you view it, you cannot change it. Everything you see will become a reality. But that isn't strictly true, either. You can 'poke' things to adjust their course. What makes this more interesting is when there are multiple people trying to influence the Temporal Plane at the same time. Yes, you see? That is when the future becomes 'mushier' and more prone to instability. More prone to chaos! Then you can't predict what will happen, and that makes the game so much more fun."

"In truth," Gressil continues, still circling the Wordsmith, "I have long since realized that lacking an adversary is boring. There's no joy in manipulating a future I have already fully grasped. Uncertainty is the greatest chaos of all!"

"So... you want me... to try and change the future?" Jason asks, perplexed. "You think I'll change things to a point you can't predict them?"

"You already have." Gressil chuckles. "You just don't know it yet. The Great Shattering will change everything. It creates a moment where my vision is no longer all-encompassing. A moment where chaos truly reigns supreme!"

Jason frowns. "The Great Shattering? Unarin mentioned it. He said an old sage friend of his..."

The Wordsmith blinks twice.

"...the same old Volgrim you mentioned before?"

"That very one!" Gressil exclaims. "Yes. Old Vedric was a tricky little bastard. Defeating him gave me no end of joy. But, tsk. The future becomes harder to influence the farther away it is. His strength was too feeble to defeat me."

Gressil pauses his pacing. "That's why I let you out of that cryopod, you know. The Great Shattering is coming. And you will be its arbiter."

"You're talking in circles." Jason says. "What is the Great Shattering? How am I involved?"

"Hold your horses, Jason." Gressil chides, waggling a finger. "You should know me by now. I don't do anything I think won't be fun. And telling you directly would be incredibly boring. Use that Wordsmithing of yours to figure it out."

Jason crosses his arms. "Oh, I see. You're not such a nice, generous, two-headed freak after all. And here I was starting to get the slightest good impression of you."

He cocks his head.

"You tortured my clone, Gressil. You tortured him, Cassiel, and killed or maimed countless other people. You're a sick fuck and you need to die."

"Good, good." Gressil chuckles sinisterly. "I like that attitude. Hate me, and work toward killing me. Though, I do still find it amusing..."

"Find what amusing?" Jason asks.

"You call her 'Cassiel' now." Gressil says. "My pretty little Birdie. I look forward to seeing her get some of her spirit back. She stopped screaming when I hurt her. She withdrew, and our intimate moments became... less fun. I could barely manage to even make her whimper... it was so... frustrating."

"MONSTER!" Jason roars, jumping toward and Gressil and raising his fist. The Wordsmith explodes with rage at Gressil's casual mention of torture, making him finally blow his top. "Fucking die already!"

Just before the Wordsmith can sock Gressil in the face, the prison warden casually turns on his heel, snaps out his palm, and grabs the Wordsmith's arm. Jason doesn't get a chance to react before Gressil spins to the side and flings him a hundred feet away, causing Jason to crash to the 'ground' of this strange void-like realm.

"Ugh!"

Jason coughs in pain, then quickly jumps to his feet, his eyes still burning with hatred.

"Enough from you!" Jason roars. "I'm sick of listening to your bullshit, Gressil! You need to die! You DESERVE to die!"

Gressil rolls his eyes. "Always with the childish antics. You can't kill me, Wordsmith. Your magic has no effect on the power of Chaos. Your machines can't track my position. I come and I go as I please. Physically, there are a few who could kill me, but... they are still not my match."

Jason thinks about attacking Gressil a second time, but without a weapon, he lacks the ability to inflict any actual damage.

"You've been hanging around, influencing the future. Tell me. Is there a future where I cut both of your heads off and leave you laying in a pool of blood?"

"Not that I've seen." Gressil says with an eerie smile. "I'm always five steps ahead of you and all the others, Wordsmith. If you want to kill me, you won't be able to do so inside the Temporal Plane. We're not even really 'here.' We're talking to one another through Temporal Forms, not our real bodies. If you killed me here, I'd just reappear later in the timeline."

Gressil continues. "Anyway. It's been fun. If you want to kill me, you'll have to pay my physical body a visit. Make sure you bring plenty of firepower. You'll need it."

Jason nods. "Don't you worry. I will."

"Good..." Gressil says, turning to leave. He pauses for a moment and smiles. "By the way... regarding that clone of yours..."

Jason's heart drops into his stomach. "Hope? What did you do to him now?!"

"Nothing. Nothing at all, haha..." Gressil laughs sinisterly. "But I do wonder... how long should it take him to hunt down one or two lone Demon Emperors? Why hasn't your lesser half returned yet? Don't you find that strange? I wonder if he's gotten up to some tomfoolery..."

Jason narrows his eyes. "What are you implying?"

"Hope is ambitious. It's one of his more interesting traits." Gressil explains. "He's not like you; content with the status quo. He wants to change things to be in his favor. You could learn a thing or two from him."

Gressil lifts his hand and waves at the Wordsmith.

"See you around, Jason. Of course... you won't see me. Haha."

A moment later, Gressil's body fades away, leaving Jason to stand in the void of the Temporal Plane, all by himself.

The Wordsmith shivers, sending trembles down his spine.

"What the fuck. What the fuck. I can't tell if Gressil is poisoning the well or if Hope is really up to some bullshit."

He scowls.

"I have to find out the truth..."

Part 409: The Demila Dilemma

Jason's future-dream fades away, and he finds himself back in reality. Immediately, he swivels around to check his surroundings, but naturally, Gressil is nowhere to be seen.

"Jason?" Fiona asks. "Is something wrong?"

"What do you mean?" Jason asks, still turning and looking with all his might for the invisible specter of torture. "Were you not able to see the same visions I did?"

Fiona blinks. "Jason... you said the word 'Foresight' and then suddenly jumped up and started spinning around like a swarm of bees were attacking you. What are you talking about?"

Jason calms down a little at her words. "I see. So it was some sort of time dilation effect again. One sec, honey. Inspect. Aura. Search."

Jason fires off more than a dozen words, sweeping the area around him for over half a mile, searching not only for Gressil, but any 'hollow' spots where his magic won't work. Sadly, he finds nothing.

"...I don't know if that means he's not here or I just can't tell if he's not here." Jason murmurs.

"He?" Fiona asks, visibly baffled. "'He' who? Jason, are you alright? You're acting weird!"

After a brief moment of thought, Jason finally takes the time to stop and fill his mind-wife in on the strange things he saw. She listens quietly until he finishes, then nods.

"I see. So Gressil can see into the future, then? That's... worrying. Alarming. Terrifying, even."

"No kidding." Jason says. "And there's more. He mentioned seeing Unarin's old friend in the Temporal Plane. That makes me wonder if he can somehow affect the past and the future..."

"I don't think so." Fiona says, shaking her head. "You're going about this with the wrong train of mind. It's not that Gressil affected the past, but that the Volgrim fellow from the past tried to affect the future. In doing so, he encountered Gressil, who... well, if you think we can believe the so-called Emperor of Chaos..."

"Gressil may have killed that Volgrim." Jason acknowledges. "Or driven him insane. Either way. I don't know what to think about Gressil, but if he is predicting and reacting to things as they come… he's so dangerous I can't even put that danger into words."

The Wordsmith stands up straight.

"We have to hunt him down and kill him."

Fiona nods. "If you assemble a team, you can do it. Remember, Samantha alone nearly beat the shit out of him. His magic nullification, teleportation, and invisibility make him difficult to fight, but he's not invincible. She still threw him around with ease, along with some help from your Black Hole Constructs."

"I'll need Soleil and Arthur both if we intend to take him down." Jason says. "…Although."

"Although?" Fiona repeats.

"Now that I think about it, Gressil said something about Hope that alarmed me." Jason mutters. "Something about Hope being ambitious… and about how long it should take him to hunt down a pair of Demon Emperors…"

Fiona starts to say something, but before she can get it out, Jason utters a Word of Power. "Locate."

The Wordsmith sends out a pulse of magical energy across the cosmos in search of his clone. However, he receives nothing in return, and his soul remains firmly lodged within his vessel.

"Hm? No response." Jason growls. "Does that mean Gressil captured Hope again? Or is Hope deliberately hiding his location from me?"

"He's supposed to be looking for Mephisto and Yama." Fiona says. "Do you think… he isn't doing that?"

"I didn't have any reason to doubt him before." Jason says. "After all. Hope fucking hates the demons. I thought he'd be happy to hunt down and kick the shit out of those two bastards. It never even crossed my mind he'd have some other idea stuck in his head. But if he isn't hunting Mephisto and Yama… where the hell is he?"

Fiona frowns. "Neil might know."

"Yeah. Neil might know..." Jason repeats, while rubbing his chin. "Those two talk to each other all the time. Fuck. I've been so ignorant to their ploys. You know, if Neil wants to get rid of me, he's already buddy-buddy with Hope. I can't just keep letting them do whatever they please. I have to stop them."

Fiona crosses her arms. She leans back against a wall in Jason's Mind Realm.

"Do you, though?"

Jason blinks. "What?"

"Do you have to stop them?" Phoebe asks. "Neil and Hope have the same goals. They want to kill all of the demons. That's obviously not okay with you philosophically... but we don't really love the demons, do we? Maybe the universe would be better off without them."

"Of course I don't love them." Jason replies. "But it's about the principle."

"You already broke that principle once when you lashed out after Beelzebub's detonation." Fiona says. "Is there any point in continuing to hold back? Maybe Unarin is right."

"That was different." Jason protests. "I was under... a lot of pressure. Daisy had... I couldn't stop my rage. I just wanted to rip the demons apart. Not to mention the demons I killed were all there for the Stormbringer attack. They deserved to die."

"Many who deserve to die continue to live. And some who die deserve to remain among the living." Fiona counters. "The fact someone 'deserves' something doesn't necessarily mean you should form a worldview around that fact."

Jason rolls his eyes. "Please, god, not this from you too, Fiona. Let's drop it, alright? I've had enough of debating existential bullshit for the next few months."

Fiona shrugs. "I'm only playing Devil's Advocate, love. If nothing else, maybe you should consider splitting humanity in half."

"What do you mean?" Jason asks.

"Isn't it obvious? Half can follow you. Half can follow Neil and Hope. Let the people decide who they want to be their leader. This would also double humanity's chance of surviving the Plague and whatever else comes next."

"I... I see." Jason says, nodding. "If we split the population in half, we could establish two mega-colonies. One could exist in space, perhaps inside the Cube. They could exist just in case the Plague ever strikes Tarus II. But the problem is, the second half would surely be much more warlike and unrestrained. They'd start genociding the demons, and that goes against everything I stand for."

"Well, you have to admit," Fiona says, "A ton of demons are guilty of blood-crimes against humanity. Why not pluck out, say, ten million demons without blood on their hands? Put them in your 'ark' and let them live with the humans. If the evil ones end up dying in a genocide, including their Emperors and Dukes, so what? Their crimes are unpardonable."

"I... I don't know." Jason mutters. "That's so bleak. All demons were raised in a system that taught them to be cruel to humans. Only a few were able to resist the pressure from all fronts telling them to become vicious monsters. But that also implies many merely succumbed to that pressure. With it alleviated, they could be better. They could get a second chance and redeem themselves."

"Does Emperor Serena deserve redemption?" Fiona asks. "What about Gorn? Yardrat? Do any Emperors besides Belial have clean hands? At some point, do they lose their right to redemption?"

"Naturally, they do." Jason says. "They long had the chance to right their wrongs, but they didn't. They perpetuated the cycle of evil."

"And what of their Dukes and Barons?" Fiona continues questioning. "At what number of souls devoured or humans killed does a demon become irredeemable? Zero? One? Ten? A thousand? Even barring killings and consuming souls, what about torturing humans and raping them? Plenty of demons don't have even one soul to their name yet, but even as imps they've engaged in all sorts of heinous acts."

Jason sighs. "Ugh. What did I say about bombarding me with this philosophical mumbo jumbo? There are no easy answers, Fiona."

"There aren't." She acknowledges. "But it is important you at least consider them. The Tribunal is coming up soon. Stormbringer's survivors will want your opinion on those to be sentenced, and they won't like to hear any waffling or faffing about at that time."

Jason nods. "Alright. I'll think about it when I have time."

He briefly pauses.

"For the moment... we need to hunt Gressil. Let's go and find Phoebe first."

"But Jason." Fiona says, batting her eyes. "I'm right here."

"Ugh. Not that line!"

* * *

Thirty minutes later, Jason arrives at his wife's side while Phoebe finishes up the final touches for the Stormbringer Tribunal in three days' time. He fills her in not only on what happened with Unarin, but his traipsing into the future and the things he spoke about with Gressil. The two of them walk and talk, eventually arriving inside the Golden Gardens.

After two full hours of debriefing his wife, the two of them finally take a break and sit on a bench together, while Phoebe stews on her husband's words.

"Well. You certainly had an exciting trip." Phoebe remarks.

On Jason's right side, his wife sits, while on his left, a projected version of Fiona also sits, her spiritual body appearing quite opaque and realistic thanks to the effects of the Golden Gardens. Jason wraps his arms around both of them absentmindedly, finding himself quite enjoying the feeling of having two beautiful wives, even if they're sort of, technically, the same person. In a manner of speaking.

"I sent Raphael's ring back to Uriel." Jason says. "I'm tired of that old man lying to me. Can you believe it? Humanity is supposed to possess incredible magical power, but the angels altered us to hide our capabilities! I need to look into a way to restore that power."

"I'm surprised nobody else ever did." Phoebe says, looking up at Jason lovingly. "With all the advances we made during the Energy Wars, surely Marie Becker or some other smarty-pants should have pulled something off."

"Yeah. Marie Becker." Jason grumbles. "I need to pay her a visit. I've got some stuff on my mind that I'd like to seek clarifications for."

"You have a lot of things on your plate." Fiona says, leaning into Jason's embrace. She, too, finds herself enjoying this rare moment of physical intimacy with her husband. She also finds that sharing him with her other half doesn't feel as strange as she thought it would. "Killing Gressil is number one."

"Any ideas on how we can take him down?" Jason asks both of his wives. "We'll need some serious firepower. Samantha at a minimum. I'd like to use my Arthur construct, but I can't get a lock on Hope or Arthur. They both seem to be wrapped in Wordsmithing protection."

"You don't think Gressil recaptured Hope?" Phoebe asks.

"I don't. The last time he did, I was still able to barely, vaguely, just a little bit, sense my clone. This time, he might as well be dead. But I doubt he is. Neil wouldn't be acting calm in the slightest if that were the case."

"Agreed." Fiona says. "Well, we still have Soleil. She's purpose-made for the sake of beating the shit out of Gressil. Her and Samantha together have the strength to do so. We still need some way to pin him in place so he can't run away."

"I have a few ideas on that front." Phoebe says. "I've actually given some thought to Gressil already, especially after he assaulted Cassiel in her room. We need to use technology to hunt him down. He's certainly evaded our scanners up to this point, but I don't think he's nearly as adept when it comes to technology as his sister was. He must have plenty of weaknesses. Ose was the only demon I knew of who could truly understand humanity's technological limits."

"...A DNA scanner." Fiona says, picking up on her other half's vibes. "You think we can track him using his unique biological markers."

"That's right. He can hide within illusions if he wants, but those aren't foolproof. I talked to Blinker and she said his abilities seem to conform with the mechanics of fairy magic. If we can create something that can pierce through Blinker's illusions, it should work on Gressil."

Jason frowns. "Won't that put the fairies at risk?"

"I don't see how." Phoebe answers. "Are you worried the demons will weaponize our technology against them?"

"Not the demons." Jason says quietly, flicking his eyes around the Golden Gardens. In the distance, he hears the sound of Sir Lorent lecturing to some children about art. "The humans. I worry about creating technology bad actors within our own ranks could turn against our fairy friends. You might think Neil wouldn't go that far, but with people like him, it always involves chasing after an 'enemy.' If he kills all the demons, who is to say the monsters won't be next? I don't want to put any tools in his hands he could abuse."

"Fair enough..." Phoebe murmurs, sighing quietly. "It will hopefully only take me a day or two to put together a device that can pierce fairy magic. I'll only give it to you, and I won't tell anyone else about it. Then, you and Samantha can-"

In the middle of Phoebe's sentence, Fiona suddenly jumps up from the bench and looks around, appearing visibly startled. Her movement makes Jason and Phoebe both flinch as well. They stand up behind her.

"What is it?" Jason asks.

Fiona frowns. "I felt a disturbance in my energy. It was as if..."

Fiona pauses.

She glances up into the sky, then points her finger into the air.

Jason follows her gesture, as does Phoebe. They both blink in surprise when they see a Psion hovering a thousand feet above, the unidentified intruder looking straight down at them as if issuing a provocation.

"Who in the hell...?" Jason mutters. "Wings. Wings." Phoebe, Fiona, come with me."

He grows wings on Phoebe, but as for Fiona, due to her spiritual nature, she doesn't require them to fly. The Wordsmith and both of his wives fly up into the sky, passing through the invisible membrane wrapping around the Golden Gardens. Fiona's existence becomes much more ghostly as she loses the enhancements of the magic enveloping Lorent's personal sanctum.

Even so, she maintains her grip on the material realm and stays by her husband's side while the three of them fly toward the casually levitating Psion above.

When they draw nearer, Jason finally makes out that the Volgrim is a vaguely feminine-looking gold-skinned Psion with flowing red robes and a dark black cape billowing in the wind behind herself.

[Wordsmith. I am here on behalf of Founder Unarin.] The Psion says, her tone curt but not impolite. [My designation is Creator Demila. I am a 7th-Level Psion working on behalf of my people.]

Jason nods. He and his wives stop in the air a short distance away, eying the Psion warily. "I told Unarin not to breach my airspace. How did you get in here? Why did you come here?"

[My mission should be of some interest to you.] Creator Demila says. Her six eyes sweep across the Wordsmith, Phoebe, and Fiona with little to no interest, as if they were bugs she would ordinarily not spare a single thought about. [Founder Unarin told me that the Demon Emperor Gressil represented a threat to the Volgrim Empire. He dispatched me to capture or kill the aberrant as quickly as possible.]

Jason nods. "I see. Did you succeed?"

[I did not.] Demila answers. [I spent a full standard time-unit scanning the entirety of 'Faith's End' for the prison warden. You should be aware that I am extremely adept at reconnaissance and no target has ever escaped my grasp. However, it appears that Gressil has fled the Labyrinth. No matter where I searched, I was unable to locate his traces. It seems he disappeared several rotational cycles prior.]

"Goddammit." Jason curses. "I should have known... we already raided Faith's End to rescue my clone. We also saved all the prisoners there. Gressil had no reason to stick around after that."

[That appears to be the case.] Demila says, crossing her arms. [You will work with me over the coming cycles to apprehend this deviant. My record must remain untarnished.]

"What?" Jason asks, taken aback. "I made it clear no Volgrim were to breach Tarus II's airspace! I do thank you for giving me this news, but otherwise, you're not allowed to stay here longer than necessary. The fact you didn't even announce your arrival already speaks of your lack of decorum."

Demila snorts. [You seem to think you have some measure of control over this great one's actions. You do not. I am a lauded warrior of the Volgrim Empire. You are a mud-dweller! There is no comparison between our classes. Unless you intend to strike at me and place yourself in the awkward position of initiating a war with the Five Founders, I suggest you drop that attitude and remember who your superiors are.]

Jason's nose twitches. His gaze turns cold.

"You've got quite the mouth, Creator Demila. BOW!"

Suddenly, a force of magical energy bursts out of Jason's body and rushes toward the Psion before him.

Her eyes widen in rage. [You dare?! UGH!]

As if compelled by the forces of nature itself, the Psion suddenly snaps the top half of her body forward and rigidly prostrates herself toward the Wordsmith and his wives. Due to the effects of Jason's Word of Power, she bows at the waist and becomes incapable of breaking the spell.

[How DARE you?!] Demila roars. Her voice transmits over the entire local area, causing many people to flinch or jump in surprise, unsure where the voice in their head is coming from. [Insolent wretch! I am two million years your senior! I will not sit idly-]

"Silence." Jason says. "Suppress."

Demila's words cut off mid-sentence. Her body trembles as she tries to move, to speak, or to launch an attack on the Wordsmith. To her horror, she finds that her Psionic capabilities have become incredibly weak, to the point she can barely even exert them at all!

However, at the same time, Jason's stomach clenches as waves of pain surge through his body.

Shit! What the hell?! Jason thinks. ARGH! Suppressing this Psion... it's taking... all of my strength! It's like... I'm a child... trying to wrestle a bear into submission! I can't hold out for more than a few minutes, if that!

His body trembles in unison, to the same level Creator Demila's does. Each time she tries to fight him, his body shakes from trying to maintain his hold on her. For several seconds, the Wordsmith falls utterly silent while remaining locked in a battle of wills with his unexpected Psion opponent.

After two short minutes, Demila's will finds a gap in his suppression. With a mighty roar, she explodes out of the Wordsmith's clutches and disperses all three words of power, roaring to the heavens.

[INSIGNIFICANT MUD DWELLER!!]

She snaps her body back into a standing position, glaring daggers at the Wordsmith before her.

[I will KILL you!]

Demila starts to reach her hand toward the Wordsmith, perhaps intending to rip his body apart, or compress his form into something the size of an atom.

"Demila!" Phoebe shouts. "Haven't you embarrassed yourself enough?"

Demila pauses just before unleashing an attack on the Wordsmith. Standing at the precipice of sanity, she flicks her eyes toward the Wordsmith's wife.

[What did you say?!]

"You heard me." Phoebe says, coolly. "You're really about to attack the one person Unarin has pinned his hopes on? The one person who might be able to help the Volgrim defeat the Plague? And why? Because you received some well-deserved humiliation after barging into our sovereign space? If you represent the pride of Volgrimkind, I'd hate to see its dregs."

[You are nothing before me!] Demila snarls. [Never have I received such humiliation!]

Jason pants slightly from his exertion. However, even as Demila prepares to fight, so too does he.

With a single thought, Jason taps into the Phoenix and channels the power of the Cube.

An ominous, godlike power begins to spill out of an unknown gap in space. A sensation of doom spreads throughout the minds of all lifeforms on Tarus II.

Jason's irises shift from blue to gold as he channels the power of Camael's primordial artifact.

"Watch yourself, Psion." The Wordsmith says, his voice ominously deep and filled with power. "I only gave you a friendly warning, before. If I choose to fight seriously, perhaps not even your Executors would stand a chance."

Demila's previously embroiled emotions quickly become cooled, as if she were a cat splashed in the face with water. Her eyes flick toward the sky as she senses a power unlike anything she's ever witnessed in all her life.

No, not quite true...

Not long ago, Confessor Vulpanix fought against something similar.

And Demila knows well the awe and dread Vulpanix mentioned when she spoke of that battle.

[You...]

The Psion shivers in spite of herself. She can't quite tell whether or not the Wordsmith is bluffing, but the 'Archangel magic' she senses is surely just as potent as that which nearly killed the Confessor a few weeks prior.

[...I have erred.] Demila says, slowly blinking her eyes. [I spoke rudely, Wordsmith.]

Jason maintains his connection to the Cube for a few moments longer before quietly allowing it to subside.

After ten seconds, Camael's ancient magic fades away, allowing the Wordsmith to revert to his base power level. He eyes the Psion with a hint of distrust, but otherwise maintains his aura of leadership.

"You are, after all, a lauded leader of the Psions." Jason says. "I may have stepped a little out of line myself. What say we call this a draw? I'd rather we didn't embarrass ourselves further."

"I'm sure you have your own considerations." Phoebe pipes up. "If you return to the Volgrim as you are now, will you suffer any consequences?"

Creator Demila remains quiet for a time. Eventually she lifts her head and sighs.

[I have performed many missions in my long life. Never have I failed one as abjectly as the one given to me on this cycle. I was unable to dig up even the slightest trace of Emperor Gressil. If I return as I am now, it will be the first black mark on my entire record. A deep shame...]

Jason frowns.

"Well. I'm not an unreasonable man. However, we do have security concerns. You'll forgive me if I don't exactly... trust you."

[You fear that I will spy on your people and report what I have seen to the Founders.] Demila says. [A valid concern. Your inferior technology cannot protect you from my prying eyes. Except for a handful of your hardiest-willed subjects, I can peer into the minds of any entity I choose. My gaze can pierce mountains. I can even hear the whispers of insects on the breeze.]

She continues. [Your security systems would not be able to detect my coming and going. You would never have any assurances of my position. But what if I voluntarily chose to wear a tracking device so that you might monitor my whereabouts?]

"A tracking device?" Jason repeats. "I suppose that could work. You must really hate the idea of messing up your record..."

Demila lowers her gaze. The gold-skinned Psion, for just a brief moment, no longer appears quite as majestic and powerful as when she first arrived. Instead, she cuts somewhat of a pitiful figure.

[I am low of talent and slow to learn. I long ago realized that I would never step into the ranks of the Executors.] She explains. [I have been trapped at the 7th Level for longer than you can fathom. Your entire species' history would fit within a fraction of my lifetime. All I have to my name are my accomplishments and my record. The others of my rank... they pity me. I can feel it in their gazes. I wish to step into the next level, but I will never reach the top of that plateau. It has left me feeling... stifled.]

Surprised by Demila's openness, Jason quietly revises his initial opinion of her. He thinks about her vulnerability and how rare that must be among others of her kind. Plus, he can't help but feel that she might prove useful to him.

"I'll tell you what." Jason says. "If you agree to a few conditions, I will help you catch Gressil. It's not like I want him running around in the first place. And maybe having a 7th-Level Psion in the vicinity would be helpful for... other reasons."

Demila gazes at the Wordsmith. [Your terms?]

"We don't need to bother with that tracker nonsense." Jason says. "Instead, you need to only do one thing for me to approve your stay here."

He leans forward and smiles, ever so slightly.

"I want you to teach me about the Volgrim."

Creator Demila's gaze instantly hardens. [Unacceptable! I will leak no information regarding the superior Volgrim Empire to a mud-dweller!]

"Now, now..." Jason says, pulling back while casually waving his hand. "Don't be in such a rush to deny me. After all, haven't you heard? I'm quite useful when it comes to solving 'impossible problems.' Maybe if I learn how you Psions work, I can come up with a method to break those pesky bottlenecks and help you ascend."

Demila crosses her arms. She glances at Phoebe and Fiona as if they were the wives of a huge idiot.

[What use can a mud-dweller be? I have spent millions of cycles building up my foundation! You cannot possibly assist my ascension.]

"Yeah. Maybe not." Jason says, nodding his head.

He slyly smiles.

"But then again. What do you have to lose? I could always sneak onto Volgarius and get the information I want. This way, you will know exactly what it is I've learned, since you would be informing me yourself. Won't that serve your purposes just fine?"

[You believe you could infiltrate my people?] Demila asks. [I find that notion inconceivable. Any half-rate Psion would sniff you out in an instant.]

"I wouldn't be so sure about that." Jason counters. "Silence. Invisibility. Stealth. Suppress..."

The Wordsmith fires off more then three dozen Words of Power, but after the fourth one, he vanishes and becomes utterly silent.

Demila widens her eyes. She quickly tries to search the surrounding space, but to her alarm, she finds that she can't detect the Wordsmith at all!

It's only when she concentrates with all of her might that she manages to detect a faint fluctuation behind herself. She whirls around to raise a psionic shield that wards off the Wordsmith's casual punch.

Moments later, Jason 'Normalizes' his existence and reappears in that position she sensed before.

"Not bad. You barely managed to detect me." Jason says. "But I think I proved my point. Do we... have a deal?"

Demila looks at the Wordsmith with a very different gaze from when she first appeared.

The Founders must be made aware of the scope of his abilities!

After taking several seconds to collect herself, the Psion elite slowly nods.

[You are an interesting life-form, Wordsmith. I will... accept your offer.]

"Welcome to the team." Jason says.

Part 410: The Cosmic Scale

A few hours before, around the same time as the Wordsmith's incursion into the future...

Archangel Uriel, Gabriel, and Michael all sit atop a circular stone bench, facing inward toward one another, nestled within the second story of Tarus II's only church. Gabriel and Michael take their corporeal forms through Uriel's magic, appearing as light constructs shaped mostly in the image of their original bodies. Naturally, their powers are far weaker compared to their original bodies, but the opportunity to interact with the physical realm always makes them feel better than when they were trapped inside their rings.

The three of them gaze at a scrying crystal Uriel created earlier through her magic. It shows a vision of Cassiel, watching while she and Soleil walk around the confines of Tarus II's largest city to try and socialize the Lazarite a bit more. Thanks to the mechanics of the magical locket Cassiel wears, any Archangel can easily form such a scrying crystal to watch over her.

"'Tis wonderful to see our little sister in such high spirits." Gabriel remarks. "I thought she might never be able to escape her anguish."

"She is merely suppressing her pain." Michael says. "What that Gressil did to her was... unforgiveable. Sister. When our eldest brother returns, we should set out to hunt Gressil at once! I cannot tolerate his disgusting existence a moment longer."

Uriel snorts. "I agree with thee, brother. But I am not Gressil's match. This bloodskin body I inhabit only contains the true strength of a Demon Duke. Against the majority of foes, I can elevate it through my own power... but not against Gressil. His chaotic energy will suppress the majority of my magic, if not outright nullify it. In a contest of physical strength, I am also not his match."

Michael rubs his chin. "Hmm. Gabriel and I shan't be able to take physical form within Gressil's aura either. That will force thee to fight the Emperor of Chaos alone. Tsk. He is well-protected..."

"Gressil may even be the strongest Emperor to have ever lived." Gabriel says.

"Nay. I would not go that far." Michael counters. "Gressil's strength primarily comes from his ability to nullify the magic of others. I suspect that if he were to face a Psion, he would not be able to suppress them. The rest of his powers appear quite ordinary as well, judging from the reports we've heard. Temporal manipulation and illusions art not something we cannot contend with."

"The danger Gressil poses comes not from any one of his abilities, but all of them at once." Uriel mutters. "Thou forgetteth, brother. He also wields the power of his hellspawn mother, the Emperor of Providence. Her third eye alone is a fearsome weapon which laid waste to several prominent Heroes over the eras."

"Lucifer." Michael growls, hatred rumbling in his stomach. "I suffered a terrible loss to her, once. But she is not even the demoness I hate most. That privilege belongs to Emperor Belial."

All three Archangels fall silent for a moment.

"Belial... she appears quite different now compared to when Satan roamed the Earth." Gabriel says. "She is... nice. She seems to harbor no ill-intent toward the humans."

"Thou mustn't trust a demoness." Uriel hisses. "That Belial is a snake. She is our enemy. It was she who backstabbed me and allowed the demons to enter Heaven. Of all the demons in existence, it is she who I wish to kill the most."

Michael gazes at the scrying crystal, watching as Cassiel and Soleil daintily munch on some candy they obtained from a street vendor.

"We are so weak now." Michael murmurs. "The angels are dead. All that remains are our withered husks... and the last survivor of our descendants. Even so... my hatred has lost some of its bite. There is no point in our struggles. We cannot ever bring the angels back to glory, no matter how much brother Raphael wishes to do so."

"I have accepted my lot in life." Gabriel says, smiling faintly. "The two of thee art still consumed by the past. Why torture ourselves? We cannot change what once was. Why not focus on what could be?"

"Because I still have a chance!" Uriel snaps, glaring daggers at the Archangel of Power. "Gabriel, thou hath always been too kind-hearted. So long as I cling to life, I will use every drop of my strength to seek revenge for our fallen siblings. I cannot accept our past failings. I will not! If I cannot eliminate all of the bloodskins, then I shall die trying."

"The bloodskins art too numerous." Michael says, somewhat bitterly. "Even if we transform into our unified body, how much strength can we output, and for how long? Even if we annihilate the world of Hell Harbor, the demons will continue to lead merry lives on other planets. There are hundreds of demon-worlds, to say nothing of the Labyrinth itself."

"Thou accepteth defeat too easily." Uriel replies. "I fear no demon, no Emperor. If it takes me a hundred years, I will fight for a hundred years. If it takes me a hundred thousand, then I shalt fight for a hundred thousand! I am no longer limited by my Archangel body. I no longer have to hold back my strength in fear of a gradual and inescapable decline! So long as I exercise a certain level of patience, I shalt be able to regenerate my mana and eventually fulfill my revenge!"

"And what of the creatures we observed?" Gabriel asks. "Those... monsters... in the Cosmic Realm? Dost thou thinketh thou shalt slay the demons before they do?"

"Gabriel, Gabriel..." Uriel tut-tuts. "I care not who destroys the bloodskins. Myself or the Plague, it matters not. So long as they ultimately perish, I shalt feel ecstasy. I shalt have rid the universe of one malfeasant mistake."

"Is that why thou chooseth to work with the humans?" Michael asks. "Because they can assist thee in thy revenge?"

Uriel smiles sinisterly.

"That is right. The Wordsmith has some foolish notion of alleviating the past and ameliorating the demons, but his goals are useless in my eyes. He seeks to build a coalition with the demons, but he will only bring ruin upon himself. Nay, it is not him who I have grown to appreciate, but his cloned self..."

"Hope Hiro." Michael nods. "He and Neil Adams seem to have proper ideas regarding how to treat the bloodskins. They know the demons are their enemy."

"Indeed, they do." Uriel nods. "They have not fallen for Belial's lies. They know she is merely an insider lurking within their midst. They may even suspect she is delivering information of the highest levels to the other Emperors. Already, she hath wrapped the Wordsmith's wife around her pinky."

Gabriel frowns. "Brother. Sister. Surely, the two of thee doth not believeth such words? If Belial's goal was to betray the Wordsmith, she had many chances to do so. She would not waste so many opportunities..."

"Her goals must run deeper than we can imagine." Uriel reasons. "Never try to estimate a bloodskin's cunning by thy own measure, brother. Who can say what level of debauchery she might stoop to?"

Gabriel appears unconvinced. "Michael and I existed on the Wordsmith's hand for several years. We observed Belial's words and actions through his eyes on many occasions. I believe that she has changed."

"I do not." Michael says. "Bloodskins never change. Don't be naïve, Gabriel. Thou shoulds't not alloweth thy emotions to cloud thy judgment."

"My emotions are as calm as ever." Gabriel retorts. "Rather, it is the two of thee who appear to be speaking emotionally."

Michael pauses. He glares at Gabriel, then looks away.

A brief but awkward silence ensues. Clearly, Michael and Uriel think their towering brother is too soft, too foolish for his own good. But they also haven't the heart to say so bluntly to his face.

After all... the four Archangels are all they have left. They have to stick together in the face of adversity.

Uriel clears her throat. "Regarding-"

Barely has she gotten a word out before a faint swishing noise poofs into the air in front of her. Uriel blinks in surprise as a plain golden band materializes out of midair and falls to the floor at her feet. It strikes the tiled floor with a crisp tink, drawing all three of their gazes.

"Hm?" Uriel grunts. "Brother Raphael's ring? Why has it suddenly appeared here?"

"Perhaps the Wordsmith wished to expediently return it to us." Michael posits.

"Hm. Yes, perhaps..." Uriel mutters.

She waves her hand, and a surge of magical energy yanks the ring off the floor. It flies over to her ring finger and smoothly wraps around it, causing Raphael to materialize inside her Mind Realm. An instant later, Uriel summons him to reality with a construct-body of his own, allowing him to join the other three in the material realm.

"Brother Raphael." Gabriel says. "How dids't thou fareth on thy trip?"

Raphael glances at the three of them, then sighs and takes a seat. He plunks his butt on the round stone bench and gazes up at the ceiling as if a man smitten by woe.

"I... had a falling out with the Wordsmith." Raphael says. "He uncovered a secret about humanity, one I wish he had not."

"What sort of secret?" Michael asks.

Raphael spends the next two hours going into great and exhaustive detail regarding the things he saw while traveling with the Wordsmith. In particular, the revelations regarding the uncovering of a living but comatose Titan princess shocks the other Archangels. Knowing that the entrance to Valhalla has opened up causes all three of them to frown deeply.

"Unarin is quite shrewd." Gabriel comments. "He is clearly manipulating the Wordsmith. He obtained a large amount of information that would greatly benefit him and his empire. He even knows of the Cosmic Realm, now."

"We cannot ignore the existence of Valhalla." Uriel says. "Brothers, we should travel there at once. We must rescue the Titan. The Volgrim are unable to heal her, but that may not be the case for us. I also wish to investigate the draconic energy the Wordsmith detected."

"If this is truly the work of a dragon," Michael says, "and one that would be three times mightier than Jörmungandr... we will not be able to oppose it. The galaxy is not ready to fight a true-blooded monster from the Primordial Era. These hatchlings haven't a clue the end that awaits them if the dragon has attained its full power."

"I agree." Raphael says. "A dragon with no other spawn to weaken it shall be a powerhouse not even our unified form can battle. I fear the results if we were to face it."

He pauses.

"...As for traveling to Valhalla. My illusions can shield our existence from the Dolgrimites. However, I have another fear."

"The dragon may still be in the area." Uriel says, as if reading her brother's mind. "It may have even taken up residence somewhere on the world. At its full power, surely the dragon could close itself up within a pocket space that not even the Psions could uncover..."

"Indeed, that mayeth yet be the case." Raphael says. The old man exhales long and hard, his expression appearing haggard beyond belief. "But that is not the fear with rankles me, sister. Rather, I doth not believeth we have any reason to fight this ancient horror. Tis' no longer our concern."

"Hm?" Michael says, raising an eyebrow. "Brother... what is thy meaning?"

"We are not the angels of ancient yore." Raphael says. "This battle is not ours to fight. We must leave it to the denizens of the modern galaxy. Instead, I wish to uncover the truth regarding these... Kolvaxians."

"The truth?" Uriel asks. "Dost thou knoweth a detail we do not?"

"Many such details." Raphael answers with a nod. "Founder Unarin is too perceptive for his own good. He may have already grasped a fundamental Truth of our reality. He may have gazed upon the Cosmic Scale."

The other Archangels look at one another with visible confusion. Gabriel even chuckles lightly.

"Haha... brother, thy words are quite ominous. Please speak not in such depressing tones."

However, Raphael doesn't return Gabriel's smile.

Instead, his expression only grows more gloomy by the second.

"Verily. Long ago, I spake with our father, the Creator. I learned of the Myriad Truths before the rest of thee came into existence. I know of the creatures that lurk within the depths of the Void."

He wrings his hands together.

"Life does not come from nothing. The universe is not eternal. Eventually, it will have an end. This will set into motion the Karmic Cycle. The Akashic Sequence. What once was will end, and what will be shalt be made anew. Many Eternities have passed. Too many to count. Each Eternity has its own struggles, its own victories and defeats. Compared to the Cosmic Scale, the Galactic Scale is truly nothing but dust in the wind."

"I do not comprehend." Michael says, scrunching up his face. "Art thou saying that there exists life beyond our galaxy?"

"Indeed!" Raphael exclaims. "And more life than thou cans't possibly imagine. Dost thou believeth the angels are the creators of sentience? The masters of reality granting life to our lessers? Cast aside such foolishness. In the Cosmic Scale, we are strong, but far from invincible. I squandered my father's warnings and allowed our people to fall into decline... but the primordial battles against the dragons were not as they initially seemed."

"What? They were not?" Uriel asks, visibly baffled. "Please, Raphael. Speak not in such cryptic words. We are thy family!"

"In the past, I was hesitant to reveal matters of the Cosmic Scale to the three of thee." Raphael murmurs. "But.. those days have long passed. I once sought not to return our people to their ancient ways... their constant unending struggles. I wished for us to live our lives in peace, having slain the Mother of All Dragons. But alas, she was not the last one. I failed, as I always have."

Raphael falls silent for several moments, as if resolving his heart.

When he speaks, he does so ponderously, as if the effort strains his heart.

"Dragons... they were not a whetstone for our people." Raphael murmurs. "They were not a tool upon which we could vent our boredom. That was only the excuse I gave at the time. Rather, the Dragons were a... weapon."

"A weapon?" Gabriel asks, before closing his eyes. "A weapon against... another galaxy?"

"Our people were in decline." Raphael continues, as if not hearing his brother's question. "I could chart our future path with my eyes closed. We would expend our cosmic and primordial energy, ultimately becoming so weak that we could no longer protect our galaxy. When that happened, we would become prey for the... the others."

He continues. "Due to various reasons, I chose to work alongside sister Uzziel. She helped me craft a biological weapon of terrifying strength. The Dragon. We named her Jörmungandr, 'Devourer of Rulers,' in hopes of striking fear into the other galaxies. This ploy worked. They avoided doing battle with us."

"Who are these external enemies, then?" Uriel questions. "Thou seemeth to believe we stand no chance against them. Is our galaxy not already doomed, then?"

"It is not." Raphael says quietly. "There is always hope. These Kolvaxians... they are surely the agents of another galaxy. Frightening killing machines capable of assimilating other species into their own. Sister, brothers... the Cosmic Scale is not something one can easily wrap their heads around."

Raphael motions with his hands. He summons an illusion, one which envelops the entire room and turns everything but himself and his siblings pitch black. A moment later, dozens of brilliantly shining lights appear all around them, each taking the form of spinning, swirling galaxies, nebulae, black holes, and other cosmic phenomena.

"In the Cosmic Scale, billions upon billions of galaxies exist." Raphael explains. "And in truth... all of them... harbor life."

"ALL of them?!" Uriel exclaims. "That is ludicrous!"

"But it is also true." Raphael murmurs. "Our galaxy is but one among many. And within the Cosmic Scale, there is a Game which is constantly being played. Our Creator was not the only Creator. There are... many others. They are known as the Rulers."

He motions with his hands, summoning two galaxies that look fairly similar, but one is clearly bigger than the other.

"This is the Milky Way." Raphael says, pointing to the smaller one. Then he points to the larger one. "This is Andromeda. Each galaxy resides within the Local Cluster. Each galaxy has a Ruler."

"Is Andromeda's Creator as powerful as ours?" Michael asks.

"I misspoke earlier. I was only attempting to simplify my words so thou might easily understand." Raphael explains. "Every galaxy has a Ruler. But our Ruler referred to himself as the Creator. Every Ruler's name gives a hint at to their disposition. What sort of name does 'The Creator' bring about in thy mind?"

Michael interlinks his fingers. He furrows his brow in thought. "I suppose... that he is a peaceful Ruler? Someone who wishes to create and not destroy?"

"That is correct." Raphael says. "Our father was a peaceful man. He was loving and kind. He wished to see the end of all violence. No doubt, if he were to see what his creation has become, he would feel great grief."

"Hmph." Uriel mutters. "Perhaps he was just an old fool. Naïve and weak. That is why the other Rulers managed to kill him. I always wondered what circumstances could lead to the death of such a mighty existence, but now it all makes sense."

Raphael glances into his sister's eyes, but quickly looks away.

He dares not tell her the truth.

"In any event," Raphael continues, "the Rulers are undying, but not unkillable. They will exist in perpetuity. When this Eternity ends, another will begin. They will remain as Rulers when their galactic seeds start afresh. At such unfathomable power levels, the Rulers do not bother with combating one another. They have grown comfortable with their Existences. Instead, they engage in... the Karmic Game."

Sensing his siblings are about to ask what that Game might be, Raphael continues. "They do not fight one another. Instead, they raise up civilizations, evolving them and perfecting their strength. Then they send those civilizations to attack one another. The desire for war is often bred into them deliberately, but more often than not, it arises naturally."

The other three Archangels appear visibly disturbed.

"This... this is not something one can easily digest..." Gabriel murmurs. "Brother, if thou speaketh the truth, then... are our lives not pitiable? We are nothing more than pawns bred to fight for superior beings."

"We're just toys for the Rulers' amusement." Michael mutters bitterly. "This is the great Truth? Life has no inherent meaning?"

"Life has whatever meaning thou giveth to it." Raphael retorts. "Uriel lives for revenge. Gabriel lives in contentment. Are either of their meanings superior to one another? I would argue not. Death is a natural feature of our existences. There is no need to look upon it with fear. When the Karmic Cycle concludes, the Akashic Sequence will begin. Our universe will turn to dust, and a new one will spring forth. This has happened innumerable times before, and will happen innumerable times into the future. It is simply the way things are."

"But..." Michael mumbles. "...what is the point in our struggle? We live. We die. In the end, all becomes dust. Whether we love or hate, we will all eventually fall. It is all simply so... senseless."

"There is a reason for everything." Raphael contests. "I know it may not seem as such, but this is the truth. The Era of Cosmic War has begun, and now our galaxy must fight these invaders. We must secure our stronghold. If not for our sake, then for the sake of humanity, our children. And if not for theirs, then perhaps... for our little sister's sake."

Raphael waves his hand again. He summons an image of Cassiel, her faintly smiling face filling the hearts of the other Archangels with warmth.

"She has suffered terribly. Should we not struggle for her future?" Raphael questions.

Uriel gazes at the image of the young brown-haired woman.

Her lips curl up, ever so slightly.

"...Yes. I suppose thou art right, brother. The Daughter of Heaven has fought well for us. She deserves a good life."

"She is just like her sister." Michael murmurs. "The same heart. The same unbreakable spirit."

While Uriel and Michael share a rare moment of joy with each other, Raphael's expression turns ever-so-slightly gloomy.

He gazes into the distance, not daring to speak the one thing others mustn't know.

I killed my Father. Raphael speaks. All because of my own greed. When he revealed the Myriad Truths to me, I became voracious. I wanted his power. And I received it.

He lowers his eyes.

If I can survive to the end of the Karmic Cycle, I may yet become eligible. I may become a Candidate...

If fortune favors me, I shall become the Milky Way's Ruler during the next Eternity.

Then... it will all be worth the pain.

Part 411: Demonic Collaborator

Somewhere in the Milky Way, inside an underground facility deep beneath a certain planet's crust.

Dozens of technologically advanced robots armed with melee and ranged weaponry unload bullets, beams, and blasts upon a rampaging demon wearing powerful demonstone armor. Bael, the Duke of Pain, charges toward the nearest robots and smashes them into pieces with his fists, picking them up and thrashing them against the floor with more than a hint of gusto.

"Aw, man! This is great! I love being invincible again!" Bael laughs.

At the side of the room, ADAM and Abby watch with expressions of robotic and fleshly indifference, neither of them particularly interested in Bael's screams of delight.

"In actuality," ADAM states, "your durability is far lower than that of your original body. The Matriarch's Armor is certainly powerful, but you cannot engage in battles at its maximum strength without also mastering Master Ose's magic. The armor will be most potent when you can manipulate thunder and electricity."

Bael pauses his brutal savaging of the training robots in the huge, open arena to shoot a condescending glance back at the emotionless bipedal bot.

"Pft. Magic. Only a dweeb would need ta' use some stupid lame-o magic. I use my fists! Because I'm a real man!"

"Technically, you now inhabit a female's body." ADAM points out.

"Shut up, dweeb!"

Bael continues rocking the shit out of every enemy inside the training arena, while Abby groans.

"This is so boring." She mutters. "I wish I could talk to Ose. It's so unfair only Bael can do that. Hey robo-guy! Can we make, like, a magical artifact? Something that lets her talk to me?"

ADAM turns his head slightly to look down at the annoying demoness.

"Master Ose already attempted to make that possible. She failed. It is impossible."

"You don't know that!" Abby exclaims. "Wait, I know! I bet that Wordsmith guy could use his magic to bring her back into-"

Hardly have the words left Abby's mouth before ADAM suddenly turns to face her. Abby's squeaks in fright as ADAM lunges his hand at her throat. The robot grabs her and pins her against the wall, looming over her with his body while his blood-red eyes bore into her soul.

"You will not inform the Wordsmith of this facility's existence. You will not speak of this facility's existence to any outsiders without Master Ose's permission."

Abby's usually playful mood vanishes as the terrifying murder-bot looms over her, its gaze appearing momentarily like the specter of Death incarnate.

"Ugh... I- kah! You're... hurting me... can't breathe..."

Bael pauses his rampaging to look in their direction. "Hey! What the hell are you doing, punk? Let the girl go!"

ADAM ignores Bael. He continues to stare at Abby's choked expression without a shred of mercy.

"My prime directive is to ensure the continued survival of demonkind as a whole. Not specific individuals. Baron Abby, if you do not immediately agree to my conditions, I will execute you on the spot. I hold no regard for your existence."

Abby desperately grabs at ADAM's fingers, trying to pry his hand off her throat, but to her horror she finds that some sort of magic has permeated her entire body and sealed her powers! In that moment, she realizes that this metal lifeform could kill her in an instant, well before Bael could rush over and save her.

The Baron of Happy Thoughts shivers. She nods her head, while choking back tears. "I... I agree! Won't... say... a word... was just... kidding... please let... let me go..."

Her vision becomes spotty. Sucking in a breath becomes nearly impossible, so tight is ADAM's grip. Just as she starts to lose consciousness, the robot opens his hand, cruelly throwing her to the floor to choke and gasp.

"I have noted your reply. If you betray my trust, I will hunt you down and eradicate you. Be warned. My killing potential is far higher than my original Protectorate design. Master Ose has upgraded my subroutines to a level even the Volgrim could not mimic. Tread with caution."

Bael trots over to the two of them and helps Abby up, staring at the robot with a look of confusion. "Hey, you! What the hell happened? Why'd you attack Abby?"

Wearing his demonstone armor, Bael cuts a surprisingly intimidating figure. Not a speck of his body is visible anywhere, including his head. In this way, he even manages to stand a few inches taller than the killing machine before him.

But ADAM does not display a hint of fear toward the upgraded Duke of Pain. He merely turns to face Bael with the same emotionless expression as ever.

"The Baron of Happy Thoughts stated her intent to contact the Wordsmith. I will not allow this. The Garden of Eden must remain a secret for the foreseeable future. Only once it is ready to integrate and uplift demon society can its existence become common knowledge."

Bael scowls. "That don't give you the right to choke a gal out! Apologize!"

ADAM's irises shift slightly. "Naturally. I apologize for asphyxiating your friend, Duke of Pain. In the future I will ask your permission first."

"Don't apologize to me, dumbass!" Bael barks. "Apologize to Abby! Sheesh, it's her you throttled, not me!"

While Bael berates the robot, Abby clambers to her feet and hides behind him. She gazes at ADAM with more than a trace of fear while massaging her bruised throat.

"Don't... don't antagonize him, Bael. That robot is really scary..."

"Bullshit." Bael barks. "What kinda prick picks on someone weaker than him? You really think you're hot shit, hotshot? C'mere, Add-Dumb! I'll tear you to scraps!"

"That would be inadvisable." ADAM says, as Bael starts stomping toward him. "You are not capable of threatening my existence."

"I ain't gonna threaten ya!" Bael yells, rearing back his fist. "I'm gonna SMASH ya!"

Bael lunges at the robot, swinging his demonstone gauntlet directly at ADAM's head. Just before impact, the robot's body blurs slightly. ADAM dodges with a level of speed and precision Bael's eyes can't even follow.

THUMP!!

A violent impact strikes Bael's chest, wrenching him backward and sending him flying into Abby! The two of them yelp in shock as they hurtle across the hangar and slam into the far wall, leaving a small but visible dent in its metallic alloy. They fall to the ground in a heap, with Bael ending up crumpled atop Abby's body.

Uninjured, but slightly embarrassed, Bael jumps to his feet and scowls at the robot for a moment before turning to look behind himself.

"Shit, Abby! Abby, girl, you okay?? Wake up! Oh, devils, she fell asleep!"

ADAM calmly walks toward Bael. "The Baron of Happy Thoughts has been rendered unconscious. The impact of your body was what caused her condition."

"Impact my ass!" Bael snaps. "Jerk! You hit me into her on purpose! Now you gotta double apologize!"

"It is likely the Baron has suffered a concussion." ADAM says, walking past Bael to kneel beside Abby's unconscious body. "We must take her to the medical hub to receive treatment. Master Ose made sure our facilities were state of the art."

Bael stomps his foot. "Well, fine! But you'd better damn well apologize two times when she wakes up! Maybe even... uh... what comes after two?"

"Three."

"Three times! Apologize three times when she wakes up!"

Bael huffs at the robot, then leans down to pick up Abby and princess-carry her unconscious figure in his arms. He follows behind ADAM who leads him to the medical bay, all while, in the back of Bael's mind, a hazy and illusory figure wakes up from what could be best described as a spiritual nap.

"Oh. What happened to Abby?" Ose asks, her hazy, hologram-like figure materializing beside Bael while he walks. Only Bael sees her body, given her direct connection to his soul.

"Add-Dumb choked her out, then threw me at her." Bael explains. "Your robo-cunt is a bit of a bastard."

ADAM glances back at Bael behind him, but returns his attention to the halls around them while continuing to walk past the myriad assortment of robots around them. He leads Bael past all manner of high-tech construction and testing facilities, many of them containing robots trying out all manner of new weaponry and armor systems.

"ADAM is a very special Protectorate." Ose says. "I spared no expense in his reformatting and reconstruction. I added several exotic elements to his armor alloys, making him capable of taking nearly as much damage as my Matriarch Armor. I also programmed him to protect the Garden's existence at all costs. My plans must not be disrupted."

Bael frowns. "That doesn't make what he did to little Abby okay. You can't be programming the guy to hit women!"

"Bael." Ose says, glaring at the giant idiot wearing her armor. "I'm a woman."

"And?" Bael asks.

"And I can hit whoever the devil I want. Besides. Abby is fine. She must have crossed a line, like she always does. What did she say to set ADAM off, anyway?"

Bael flushes red. "She, uh, said she should... tell the Wordsmith... about this place."

"WHAT?! She did? Even for Abby, that's an airheaded idea!" Ose exclaims. "Why would she say such a thing?"

Bael shrugs. "Dunno. That's what the robot said."

"There must have been more. Ask him to relay their exact conversation, Bael."

"Nah." Bael grunts. "You go ahead."

"...Go ahead and what?" Ose frowns. "Bael, I can't talk to the robot. I can only talk to you."

"Pft. Sure you can." Bael says, shaking his head. "You're standing right there! Man, some people these days. Stop being lazy."

"Bael! I am a SOUL! BODY! I barely exist at all! I can only communicate with you! How could you possibly forget when I've explained it FIVE times already?!"

"Wait, you are?" Bael asks. He scrunches up his face. "That sounds like some made-up nonsense."

"BAEEEEL!"

After screaming at him for a solid five minutes, Ose finally convinces the Duke of Pain to begrudgingly question ADAM for the full transcript. When ADAM explains the situation, Ose groans.

"Abby, you idiot!" She yells at the air around her. "Not only should the Wordsmith never learn of this facility, but he also explicitly hates ME. Why would he help you find a way to communicate with MY soul-sliver?! Devils, her stupidity knows no bounds!"

After a slight pause, Ose glances at Bael.

"...On second thought, she could be a lot worse."

Bael and ADAM stroll into the medical facility, where the Duke of Pain encounters a surprising sight. Inside the room, dozens of Demon Lords sit or lay in hospital beds, minor to serious injuries plaguing their bodies. These demons all appear unfamiliar to the Duke of Pain, a socializer who considers himself fairly knowledgeable about any other demons above the rank of Grunt.

"Eh? Who the heck are all these fellas?" Bael asks. "And why are they all Lords?"

Ose fans out her nails in disinterest. "Experimental test subjects. Over the millennia, I've pulled a few Grunts who were on the precipice of mutating to Lord and stashed them here, then fed them souls until they evolved. I wiped their minds and made them my subjects. They serve as soldiers in mock battles to test the effectiveness of the spiritual weapons and armor I'm mass-producing."

Bael's eyes glaze over. "So... they're, uh..."

"I make them hit each other to test my weapons." Ose snaps. "Pay attention, Bael!"

"Ohh. You shoulda just said that at the start." Bael chuckles. "Silly woman, always making things too wordy."

Bael sets Abby on a hospital bed, then watches as a robotic nurse-droid walks over and begins sticking her with needles and waving strange gizmos over her head and body.

"Analysis complete." The robot says. "Subject has suffered a Class I concussion. Two fractured ribs. Preparing infusion of low-class human blood to expedite the healing process."

Ose flicks her eyes to Abby, then slowly blinks. "Great. Two days of healing, and the little moron will be back on her feet."

"Man. I thought you and Abby had a thing going." Bael says. "Why're ya so mean to her, Ose? She likes you!"

For a brief moment, Ose's expression flickers. As for what expression she reveals, it appears somewhat nebulous. Perhaps only she will ever know.

"Abby is just an idiotic groupie. I can't stand her." Ose says. "Her dogmatic loyalty to me made her useful for a few things, but her usefulness has run out. Now she's an annoyance, and perhaps even a liability."

Bael smirks. "You're lyin' to yourself, toots. Who wouldn't like a sweet girl like Abby? She's always so cheerful and chipper. I like her lots!"

"Well, feel free to lick her toes then." Ose says dismissively while crossing her arms. "If you like her that much."

Bael's face contorts into an expression of disgust.

"Damn, woman. You say the nastiest shit sometimes. If you had a real body, I'd have half a mind to slap some sense-"

Suddenly, Bael pauses.

"Hm?"

The Duke of Pain glances around the room.

"What was that?"

Ose blinks. "What was what?"

"I felt something." Bael says. "Felt like- ah! There it is again! Like a... a 'thump' in the air. You don't feel that?"

Ose blinks. "I do not."

ADAM turns to face Bael. "You have detected an anomaly?"

"No, no." Bael says. "Never did like that game. Too complicated. Plus Deebs always took the dog piece and left me with the Hat. Nobody likes the Hat."

"I am not referring to the game of Monopoly-" ADAM starts to say.

"Quiet!" Bael barks. "I felt it again! One sec. Lemme see if I can track it down."

Bael starts walking around the room. When he draws near the exit, he pauses to cock his head. "It ain't from in here. Seems it's coming from down the hall. What is that?"

Ose, still clueless, remains silent, seeming happy to let Bael investigate whatever idiotic thing has caught his fancy.

However, as he starts to walk away and ADAM follows him, Ose's expression changes once Bael travels more than a kilometer down other winding hallways, past thousands of worker robots, toward a large sealed doorway.

Thoom. Thoom.

A pulsing of magical energy barely travels outside of the door. A faint clanging rings in the air as Bael draws near to the entrance.

"Ah. So that's what you noticed." Ose finally says.

"Eh? You can feel it too?" Bael asks.

"Now that you've drawn closer, yes." Ose says. "But that's beside the point. This is the Creation Center, Bael. It's where I create all my Resonant Weapons and Armor. As for the sensation you feel... take a look inside."

Bael tries to scratch his head, but ends up scratching the back of his helmet instead. He doesn't notice the difference.

"Well. Alright! Hey, Add-Dumb! Open this door for me, will ya!"

"Yes. I can do that. Master Ose always did intend for you to come here at some point."

ADAM transmits a command to the facility, and the ten-feet-thick doors release their locks and begin to slide outward. Waves of scorching heat spill out of the room's interior, heat so oppressive even the Matriarch armor starts to get a little warm.

"Damn." Bael mutters. "You must be cookin' up something crazy in here."

As the doors slide to the sides to reveal the room's interior, violent sounds of metal crashing against metal ring out in the air.

CLANG! CLANG!

So shrill is the noise, and so powerful the shockwaves, that even Bael winces a little.

He walks into the room, finding a huge amount of steam clouding his vision. All around him, thousands of racks line the walls and sit on the floors, each one covered in dozens of different sorts of exotic-looking weapons and armor. Swords, polearms, energy cannons, power armor, anything one could imagine is inside the chamber. From high technology to low technology, countless eras of warfare are represented on the myriad of racks that stretch up to the ceiling, some fifty feet above.

CLANG! CLANG!

Those same shrill sounds ring out, drawing Bael's attention. The Duke of Pain continues walking toward the center of the room, where he finds a massive furnace spewing out scorching blue flames, nearly 5,000 degrees Kelvin.

"What..." Bael whispers, his eyes widening.

The Duke of Pain pauses mid-step, freezing in place as he gazes upon something that his tiny pea-brain could never have imagined in all his years.

"How could it be her...?!"

A figure stands, her back to Bael, and a pair of beautiful white wings spreading out for five feet in either direction.

CLANG! CLANG!

An Archangel swings an enchanted hammer against a blade on the forge's edge. She moves with speed and purpose, yet takes her time to ensure no imperfections reveal themselves while pouring her abundant reserves of magical energy into the weapon's hilt.

"Grandma!" Bael exclaims, taking several steps toward her. "Grandma Camael! I can't believe it... you're alive?"

The Archangel pauses her hammering. She stands up straight, then turns around to look at the Duke of Pain with a look of malice.

On her forehead, a blood-red symbol glows with malevolence. Its aura radiates hatred and torment, a pain so excruciating that the weak would fall before her at the mere sight of it, clutching their chests and gasping for breath.

"Ose." Camael says, turning to face her unexpected 'guest.' "...No. Not Ose. Thou soundeth different."

"I'm not Ose!" Bael exclaims. "I'm Bael! The Duke of Pain! How the heck are you alive? I coulda swore you got blown up during that big battle!"

Camael gazes at the Duke of Pain with disinterest, not particularly caring about him in the slightest. A hollow look rests in her eyes. An emptiness and loneliness indescribable with words.

"Do not waste my time with pointless questions." Camael mutters. "My work is unending. I have tasks to complete."

Bael glances around the room. He spots a column of light in the rear, with a ring suspended in the center of the beam. The golden band hovers and spins, ever so slowly, while massive amounts of magical energy pour into and out of its core.

"You... you're dead?" Bael asks. "In a ring? Like your brothers?"

Camael blinks slowly. She idly twirls the hammer in her grasp without thought.

"I was brought back through my ring. Yes. Hath thou any further questions? May I return to my work?"

ADAM steps between them. "You may continue your work, Archangel Camael. I will debrief the Duke of Pain regarding your mission."

Camael smacks her lips. "Wonderful. If thou woulds't excuse me..."

Without any fanfare, she turns back around and returns to hammering the blade positioned at the edge of the altar, sending additional ringing noises into the air.

CLANG! CLANG!

Feeling somewhat numb, Bael slowly backs away, and ADAM guides him to the exit. They don't leave the room, though, and instead remain just inside, barely within the distance necessary to observe Camael's work.

"I don't get it." Bael mutters. "Grandma... she's here?"

"She is." ADAM replies. "Archangel Camael has been assisting Master Ose's grand ambitions since the end of the Energy Wars."

Ose sneers.

"Heh. It's not as if she has a choice. To understand why she's here, and why she works for me, we'll have to go back to the beginning..."

Part 412: Camael's Choice

"Whaddya mean grandma doesn't have a choice?" Bael asks Ose point-blank. "Did you mind control her?!"

"By no means." Ose starts to explain. "The Archangel of Divination-"

Bael interrupts her. "Hold on a sec. I wanna hear it from her mouth!"

Before Ose can explain her brilliant scheme, Bael turns back and charges into the steam swirling inside the Creation Center.

"Hold on a sec, grandma! You tell me what's going on here! Why are you makin' weapons for Ose?? Ain't you an Archangel?! Demons are your enemy!"

Ose grimaces. ADAM steps forward to try and stop the Duke of Pain from bothering Camael, but ultimately decides to remain silent.

Camael pauses her hammering. She turns to look at Bael with a deep frown on her face.

"Bael. Duke of Pain. I am busy, as I said before. Dost thou intendeth to disturb my work at any cost?"

"Snap out of it, grandma!" Bael exclaims. "This ain't the real you! Aw, geez, what did Ose do to ya? Mind control ain't cool!"

Slowly, Camael blinks. With a great sigh, she plunks her divine hammer down on the forge. Its appearance is not that of Mjolnir, but some other weapon purpose-made for forging artifacts, perhaps a new version made to replace the old one.

Then she crosses her arms.

"Thou art operating under a misconception, Duke of Pain. My mind is still very much my own. Ose is not 'controlling' me."

Bael blinks. "Huh? That can't be right. I can see the big bloody mind control symbol right there on your head!"

"Ah. That." Camael says, reaching up a finger to touch the symbol. "'Tis not what thou thinketh it to be. This symbol was a rune I assisted 'Ghost' in creating. It anchors my body to the physical realm, allowing me to exit my ring. In this manner, I can continue to craft relics."

Bael glances at Ose. "You... didn't mind control her?"

"Of course not, you imbecile. Do you really think a mere Baron would have the ability to enslave an Archangel's soul?" Ose snaps at the dimwit. "Camael and I have undertaken a cooperative relationship."

"Cooperative..." Bael mutters, though Ose can't be entirely sure if that's because he has no idea what the long word means, or because he's stunned by the revelation. "Grandma. You're telling me you and Ose... are in lesbians?"

Camael scowls. "Excuse me?"

"Bael. You fucking MORON." Ose hisses. "That's NOT what that word means! It means we've chosen to work together!"

"Oh." Bael nods. "Yeah. That makes more sense. Gotta save the scissoring for Abby."

"BAEL!"

"Just kidding, just kidding." Bael mutters. "Look, uh, jokes aside... grandma, why would you wanna work with Ose? What about your brothers? The old man and the rest are still alive, ya know."

"Art thou attempting to turn me aside from helping thy species?" Camael asks, finding herself slightly amused. "I am aware of my brothers' circumstances. I am even aware that a new Hero has arisen. Ose has kept me abreast of modern developments regarding the inter-galactic situation, ever since I chose to join her side."

"But I don't get it." Bael says. "Why? Why do... this stuff?"

"Why not?" Camael mutters, a hint of bitterness in her voice. "What path dost thou believeth I should walk? Revenge? Pointless. The angels have lost. My people art dead. Our era of glory has long passed."

Camael chuckles wryly and looks away, as if gazing into the past.

"Political plays. Power grabs. I tired of it long ago. My elder brother always held some grand ambition for our people, and I followed along. But what was the end result? One successive self-induced genocide after another. After our complete defeat at the hands of thy brethren, I realized there was no point in coveting some long-lost era of glory. I was already doomed to languish inside a ring. Why not step out and finally do something that made me happy for once?"

Camael vaguely gestures to the racks upon racks of weapons and armor surrounding her. Among them are also random trinkets and pieces of jewelry, their functions unknown but likely extremely powerful.

"Ose approached me with an offer. I could waste my existence away inside a white void, or emerge from it to create weapons and armor for demonkind. I enjoy creating artifacts, as thou mayest have guessed. And so, it was a simple choice. I decided to change sides and work for my former enemies. There is little else to the story."

Bael stares at Camael with a complicated gaze. Despite his simple thoughts and low IQ, he still fundamentally understands people on a decent level, and has always been quite good at comprehending the subtler aspects of their inner and outer selves.

"That musta been hard on ya." Bael murmurs.

"Not particularly." Camael replies. "'Twas an easy choice. I barely had to put any thought into it. No more machinations. No more schemes. I no longer bother with attempting to guess at what effect my actions might have on the future. I no longer need to seek permission from my brothers when embarking on creating a new artifact. I merely create whatever my heart desires."

She smiles, ever so slightly.

"'Tis a simple life, but one that suits me."

"Yeah." Bael says. "Guess I can respect that. Oh, and uh... sorry about the whole... killing yer family thing."

"Thou hath slain many an angel in thy life." Camael says. "And I hath slain many a demon. We art equal, in that regard."

"I suppose we are." Bael nods. "I'll, uh... I'll leave you to your work..."

Camael nods at him. As she starts to turn around, Bael remembers something.

"Hey, uh! Do you want your old hammer back? I know you used to make stuff with it, and technically I stole it from ya..."

Ose rolls her eyes. "Bael, Mjolnir is essential to the functionality of the Matriarch Armor. Stop trying to help Camael, and let her do her work!"

Bael ignores her. He taps the control unit of the armor, causing Mjolnir to transform from its belt form back into its hammer form. He holds it toward Camael, even as Ose's figure disappears due to insufficient energy.

"I thank thee for the offer." Camael says. "But 'Ragnarok' is my new divine smelting implement."

She grabs the other hammer beside her, a much more ornate golden weapon with fiery runes engraved into its head.

"Tis neither better nor worse than Mjolnir. I designed it to suit my new body and existence. Mjolnir... it would not accept me as I am now. Tainted by my new understanding of reality. I am not the same Archangel who once smelted the hammer of thunder. Thou mayest keep it."

Bael nods. "Well. Alright. Uh. Thanks, I guess. It's weird seeing you like this."

"Aye. Weird." Camael mutters, before turning her back on Bael.

Without another word, the Archangel of Divination resumes work on hammering the sword from earlier. Bael watches for a minute or two before slowly shaking his head and walking away.

He leaves the Creation Center, along with ADAM, allowing the doors to close behind themselves. After a few seconds of thinking, Bael reattaches Mjolnir to the armor, allowing Ose to materialize in his vision.

"So, toots. You and grandma are working together. You ain't mind controlling her. It's bizarre."

"Camael is not like the other Archangels." Ose says, her voice quieter than usual. "She is an obsessive, like me. Logical to a fault. Her family is dead, and she has accepted it. Her brothers have their own ideas. Following the Final Battle, after Satan killed the last Archangels, he handed out all of their rings to Bahamut, except for Camael's. He gave hers to me in absolute secrecy. Said I'd know what to do. And I did."

"All of their rings..." Bael repeats. "That reminds me. What happened to uh... to uh... well, to Mother?"

"Uzziel?" Ose asks. "I wasn't there for the Final Battle. Weren't you, Bael?"

The Duke of Pain shrugs. "Sure. But I didn't pay much attention. You know how I am."

"Yes. I do know how you are." Ose replies, grimacing. "As for Uzziel... do you remember her final attack? The one which slaughtered three Emperors and more than ten million other demons?"

Bael nods. "How could I forget? Mother killed a lot of my good friends."

"She exhausted her power." Ose explains. "She was too weak to fight back. It allowed Diablo to get the killing blow. Afterward, her ring..."

Ose frowns in displeasure.

"...I could have done a lot with that ring. But too bad. Satan used it in his negotiations with the Volgrim. They were always thirsting after the so-called Codex, but my mother knew better than to fall into their greedy clutches. Now Archangel Uzziel is locked away somewhere in one of their facilities."

"Wait..." Bael growls. "Don't tell me... those alien fuckers are doin' bad things to her?!"

"Undoubtedly." Ose says. "Experiments. All sorts of other things. Between you and me, I thought the Kolvaxians might have been a Volgrim experiment unleashed by accident. Something relating to Uzziel. Now, I'm pretty sure they're something else."

"What made ya change your mind?" Bael asks.

Ose gestures toward the doors of the Creation Center.

"Camael. She's been quite forthcoming about her predictions to me. She informed me of certain... Truths. Let's just say my plans for demonkind go well beyond the mere preservation of our existences."

Ose's tone becomes solemn.

"There exist horrors out there, beyond the furthest reaches of our galaxy. What we're looking at now is only the beginnings of an intergalactic war. And the Volgrim? They are not prepared for what is soon to come."

Bael shrugs. "Eh. Cosmic space horrors. Big deal. I'll smack the cunts if they tickle me the wrong way."

"Yes, Bael. I'm sure you will." Ose retorts.

Bael walks away from the Creation Center back to the medical facility. Ose hovers along beside him, her ethereal body always just barely within view, no matter where he looks.

"So... you're not just trying to build up the demons to escape the alien bad guys?" Bael asks.

"Escape is one option, but it isn't the preferable one." Ose remarks. "In the ideal scenario, Camael's artifacts would empower our people to new heights. They could allow us to overturn the Volgrim and take back control of the Milky Way. Unfortunately, when I first started this project, I had no idea the Kolvaxians would step onto the scene. Now, it seems that if I, the Volgrim, or the Wordsmith cannot find a counter to the Plague, escape will have to become demonkind's primary goal."

"Running away. That's a pansy's way of thinkin'." Bael grunts. "Real men stand and fight! ...But it's also okay to cry when you're scared, too."

Ose sighs. "Devils. Why did I have to anchor myself to the galaxy's biggest idiot?"

Back on Tarus II.

Jason, Phoebe, Fiona eventually part from Creator Demila. The 7th-Level Psion possesses means far beyond anything they can imagine, and as such, Jason doesn't really have a surreptitious way of surveilling her. Instead, he resolves to use her as a fountain of basic information regarding the Psions.

However, that will all come at a later date.

For the immediate moment, Jason retires back to the Golden Gardens to sit with both his wives.

The three of them plunk back on the bench, with Fiona re-solidifying her figure thanks to the Garden's built-in magic. As they settle back down together, with one woman for each of Jason's arms, the Wordsmith gazes up at the newly crafted sculpture of Alexander the Great. He also observes a different sculpture some distance away, one which looks like Joan of Arc.

"Those are new." Jason mutters.

"Yes. Lorent's been pretty busy." Phoebe says idly.

"That's good." Jason says. "Very good."

Phoebe sags against her husband's arm. He squeezes her shoulder to comfort her.

"I checked with Sammy yesterday." Phoebe says. "Our baby's doing fine."

"Yeah?" Jason asks, before remembering the vision he just had. "Say, uh... do you know if it'll be a boy or a girl?"

"There's no fun in spoiling the surprise." Phoebe chuckles. "I'll be happy for either..."

"Yeah." Jason mutters, while shooting a glance at Fiona. She smiles cutely, as if to ask whether or not he'll break the news.

"So..." Jason says. "Thought of any baby names?"

"Mhm." Phoebe replies. "For a girl... maybe Sarah?"

"I like that." Jason says.

"And for a boy..." Phoebe says, "...maybe Timothy?"

Jason's expression deflates. "Ugh. Fuck."

Phoebe frowns. She pulls away from her husband and shoots him a quizzical look. "Pardon?"

"No, no. It's not you..." Jason says, before realizing she might have misunderstood. "Remember those visions I mentioned? Well... one of them involved you. You were holding a baby in your arms. You spoke the baby's name, and you specifically said 'Timothy.'"

"Ah. I see." Phoebe says, relieved her husband isn't angry at her choice of name. "Maybe we should name the baby something else, then? That might change the future."

"Or it might not." Fiona counters. "Perhaps the future is fixed. But it might also be malleable. Maybe the baby's name will change, but nothing else. Remember what Jason previously told us about Archangel Camael?"

Phoebe nods slowly. "Camael foresaw the destruction of angelkind, but she was helpless to stop it. I bet she tried many times to change their future trajectory, but she always failed. In that case, the future is likely somewhat set."

"Gressil told me the future could be 'nudged'. Don't know whether or not we should believe him, though." Jason says.

"He could be lying..." Fiona mutters.

"I don't know about that." Phoebe says, a hard edge in her eyes. "I don't know Gressil well. Perhaps not at all. But... something about him seems... honest. In a way. He had Cassiel locked in his dungeon for god knows how long, and our rescuing her would surely have pissed him off. Yet, when he had the chance to take her back, he didn't. If he wanted to kill you, he could have done it a thousand times over, Jason. Perhaps he's..."

The Wordsmith's wife lightly chews her lower lip.

"I think Gressil is treating all of this as a game. It's not about winning or losing. It's about the fun of playing."

Jason nods. "That... adds up. Some of the things he told me were about how much 'fun' he wanted to have. He's a sadistic psychopath."

Fiona glances around the Park. "He could be here, you know. Right here, right now. We wouldn't know."

"Search." Jason abruptly says, sending a pulse of magical energy all around him. Hoping to find a pocket of 'empty' air his magic can't pierce, he instead finds nothing for three kilometers in any direction.

"Well, if he is here, he's doing a fan-fucking-tastic job at hiding himself." Jason grouches. "Christ. I can practically feel my skin crawling."

Phoebe's pupils flicker.

"That's his goal. Gressil wants us to be on edge. Fearful. Afraid of what he might do next. The scariest threat is an unknown one. We're playing right into his hands."

"Yeah?" Jason asks. "Then what would you have us do? We need a way to track this guy. As long as he can skulk in the-"

Right in the middle of Jason's sentence, a dull thoomph rings in the air. A moment later, all the lights and electricity inside the Golden Gardens turn off. Fiona vanishes from Jason's side and dematerializes, appearing inside Jason's head.

"Huh?" She asks, slightly bewildered. "What just happened?"

Jason and Phoebe quickly stand up. Jason casts more search magic, but fails to detect anything out of the ordinary in his vicinity.

What he does find, however, is that the entire power grid for all of Tarus II has shut off all at once.

Jason and Phoebe share a glance. They start to head west out of the gardens, only to stop when they see ten very confused children looking around.

"Are you kids alright?" Jason asks.

He notices a bunch of paintings and easels nearby, most of them drawn with childish designs, all except for one.

"Mister Lorent disappeared!" One of the boys says. "Him and Shana. Where'd they go?"

"I'm not sure." Jason says. "I think the transmitters for the Gardens turned off."

He glances at Phoebe.

"That would explain why Fiona disappeared too."

"The transmitters are magical in nature." Phoebe says. "But they also rely on plain old electricity to function."

Jason nods. He walks over to the center of the park where a statue of King Arthur stands. Around Arthur's neck, a simple brass locket hangs, along with a miniaturized butcher's axe, both attached to the same chain. Jason picks them up and sticks them in his pocket.

After communicating with the spirits inside, he turns to his wife. "Shana and Lorent are fine. But something's definitely happened. Let's go investigate the situation."

The two of them activate their T-REX's. They take off at a light jog, leaping atop nearby buildings to run across the rooftops while also obtaining a birds-eye view of the city below them.

Despite their expectations, nobody seems to be panicking. The humans, monsters, and demons merely pause their work to file out into the streets, looking more confused than anything. Jason half-expects a group of demon saboteurs to be the culprits and all of this to be the plot of one of the Emperors, but when he sees even Emperor Yardrat standing among his kin and scratching his head, Jason can only frown.

Before long, Jason and Phoebe arrive at the Warpgate complex. When they arrive, they find Magnus Chadwick, humanity's most influential general after Neil himself, standing and talking to several troopers. He turns to look at the two newcomers as soon as they arrive.

"Ah. There you are!" Chadwick says. "The T-REX communication system is down, Phoebe. Something took out our power systems. All of the reactors have failed, but we aren't sure why."

"You aren't?" Phoebe asks. "Did you find the source of the issue?"

"We did. All of those fusion power systems Jason made six years ago, plus the newer and more updated ones. They've all failed at once! But the strange thing is, it seems like they should be working perfectly."

Chadwick turns to one of the technicians, an 18-year-old geeky looking guy with big glasses.

"Hi, Miss Hiro." The young man says. "I ran some diagnostics. Here's my data."

Phoebe smiles. "Thank you, Douglas."

She takes a datapad from the teenager and quickly browses it. After a minute, she scrunches up her face.

"What in the world? This is bizarre. Look here, Jason. The reactors are functioning just fine. See? They're producing power with no issues. The problem comes from these transmission relays. They aren't transmitting the power to the grid. It's like someone severed the link."

Jason immediately spots another problem. "You've overlooked the magical elements. The power system seems to be functioning fine, but look at Reactors One to Seven. See how the dimensional shunts have started building up excess heat? This stinks of a rat. There's no way every single one of those shunts would disable all at once."

Jason and Phoebe walk with General Chadwick to the Warpgate, only to find it shut down.

"Sorry, sir." One of the soldiers guarding the post says. "We lost power here and at the Core too. The Warpgates all died simultaneously."

Jason nods. "Well, at least I'm here. That would be a major problem otherwise, to say the least. Return."

Jason teleports himself, his wife, and Chadwick into the Core. There, they arrive in dense darkness, with only the scattered lights of various soldiers wearing T-REX's to shine flashlights and other implements into the darkness.

The three of them make their way toward the power stations, where Jason utters a Word of Power. "Diagnose."

A wave of mana sweeps from his lips across the surprisingly small reactors, each one only three times as big as the average human, yet containing more than enough power to energize the Warpgates and all of humanity's other defenses.

A minute later, Jason frowns deeply.

"Son of a bitch. It's Gressil. He did this."

Phoebe nods. "Right as we were talking about him, too. Can you fix the reactors?"

Jason bites his lower lip. "Yes. Easily. But that's not the problem. Don't you see? He's sending us a message. Gressil didn't attack the grid or cause any permanent damage. He merely used his magic nullification to shut down the reactors. We couldn't sense him or detect him. He came through here and even had the kahunas to leave trace amounts of Chaos Energy behind."

As if to prove his point, Jason utters another Word of Power. "Disperse."

The remnants of Chaos Energy lingering inside the reactors disperses. A moment later, all of the lights come back on in the Core, and thousands of people cheer or breathe sighs of relief.

But not Jason.

The Wordsmith frowns deeply. His wife also doesn't appear happy.

"We're too vulnerable." Phoebe mutters, tapping the side of her helmet. "Gressil's trying to get inside our heads."

"It's working." Jason responds, once again looking around himself, as if expecting to find the two-headed specter lurking over his shoulder. "Fuck. When I first left the Cryopod, Gressil hounded me. Now, six years later, he's at it again. I wish this piece of shit would just die already."

"He's not going to drop dead just because you want him to." Phoebe says.

Chadwick nods.

"We'll have to kill that son of a bitch ourselves."

Part 413: Lily's Lovely Life

"Mmm! Ahh!"

A young woman, appearing eighteen years of age, stretches after waking up early in the morning. Her room, while simple and small, appears quite colorful with lots of pretty red and pink decorations and a few palm-sized animals carved from wood sitting on wall-mounted shelves.

The young woman pops her back and moans softly, then climbs out of bed and gazes at her disheveled appearance in the mirror.

From an adjacent room, a deep masculine voice speaks. "Lily! Are you up?"

"Yes, daddy," Lily Brown says. "I'll be out in a few minutes."

"I made breakfast," Benjamin Brown replies. "You can take your bath after you've eaten."

"Alright!"

Lily Brown, daughter of Benjamin Brown, a former soldier during the Energy Wars, plops down at her desk and quickly begins brushing her long, pink hair. She hums quietly while straightening herself out, then trots across the apartment complex toward the kitchen-dining room hybrid.

This building, while small and compact, offers individuals and families a simple but surprisingly luxurious living space, complete with efficient stoves, bathrooms, and other amenities all packed into each apartment unit.

Lily Brown sits across from her father, a hulking muscle of man and machine, while he places a bowl of gravy on the table.

"Mashed potatoes and gravy for breakfast?" Lily asks, raising an eyebrow.

"Don't knock it til' you try it." Benjamin says, smiling warmly at his little girl. "These are apparently some rare potatoes grown on one of the Liberated worlds. I decided to give them a shot."

"They smell great." Lily says. "Pass me a slice of garlic bread?"

Her dad nods, then pushes a plate across the table toward her.

As they sit and eat, Lily babbles to her father about all the local gossip.

"-and my friend Becky, she says the central government is erecting an apartment three blocks from here. It's Class-A, so it's a bit more upscale than our place."

"We're fine where we are now." Benjamin says between bites. "There's no need to waste our Merit Tokens thoughtlessly. Didn't you say you wanted to try out the Beauty Booster soon? Even I don't find fifty tokens easy to collect."

"I earned an extra token yesterday for my hard work!" Lily says with pride, beaming a smile at her father. "That second round of body boosts really made me strong as heck, daddy! I can lift half a ton without breaking a sweat!"

"Hard work is good for the soul." Benjamin says. "But don't overwork yourself. We're not in a rush to integrate into this new society. We're just... visitors."

Lily's smile fades, ever so slightly. "I don't understand, daddy. Why not stay here? Rather than living in that cooped-up tower, we should stay with our fellow humans!"

"It's not that simple." Benjamin says. "What you see is a world of humans all living their best lives. What I see is a doomed society soon to crumble. The Wordsmith's planet is quietly being besieged by countless enemies, and only the delicate balance of 'benefits' in the present and future is holding them back. I'm merely staying here to collect intelligence before we can ultimately leave and head back to Hell Harbor."

Lily scrunches up her nose. "But, daddy. Hell Harbor is in ruins. The Archangels brought down the Hammer of God upon our homeworld. It's in ruins."

"That's exactly why we haven't gone back." Benjamin chuckles. "I'm waiting for Yardrat and the others to rebuild. The Slithering Spire all but collapsed under the remnants of a mountain-chunk. In the meantime, we live here because we're not in any immediate danger."

Lily sighs. "I never disliked living with the rest of our family, but being surrounded almost entirely by demons wasn't fun. I think you're being overly pessimistic, daddy."

Benjamin snorts. "As if you didn't take every opportunity to get 'close' to those demons. Don't think I didn't notice you playing lip-lock with the succubi."

"Daddy!"

Lily frowns in annoyance, while Benjamin simply chuckles.

"I'm leaving now." Benjamin says, standing up and walking to the sink to wash off his plate. "I'll see you after work."

"Don't get shot while you're training the maggots." Lily snarks.

"And you take care not to break any bones." Benjamin replies back.

After the man leaves, Lily finishes up her food, then cleans off her plate and puts away the leftovers in the fridge. She heads into the bathroom to clean herself up and get ready for her day at work.

* * *

Some time later, Lily leaves to go to work. She exits her apartment, only to bump into one of her many 'cousins', a child of Benjamin Brown's extended family, his previous wife's descendant.

"Hey, Latisha." Lily says, smiling at her cousin as they pass each other in the hallway. "I'm heading out."

"Have a good one Lily!" Latisha replies.

Lily passes by others from her extended family, all of them having also been transported away from the Slithering Spire thanks to Jason Hiro's magic. Simply as a matter of convenience, they mostly chose to live in the same neighborhood.

She exits the building and arrives in a well-trodden and cozy neighborhood street, one lacking any grass or plants due to the short time that has passed since Stormbringer, but with the beginnings of seedlings starting to spread thanks to Phoebe Hiro's many inventions. After anticipating the need to replant the local flora following Beelzebub's detonation, Phoebe created drones that fly around and re-seed whole tracts of land with basic plant-life from elsewhere on Tarus II.

Lily glances at one of those drones as it passes by overhead. It hums quietly, its anti-gravity motors allowing it to fly without the use of jet-based propulsion. Four long, spindly limbs hang out of its circular undercarriage, making it look like a four-legged UFO buzzing through the air.

Lily observes it for a moment as it drops to the ground across the street, sprinkles some seeds in the seemingly barren soil, then buzzes off to the next place in need of care.

"It's so lively here." Lily murmurs. "I hope daddy doesn't make me leave."

Lily heads down the street. Unlike the world of Earth during the Industrial Era, these streets are quite narrow and afford no room for anything but the smallest vehicle traffic. Several people ride on bicycles, zipping past Lily at a decent speed while she sticks to the sides of the road. With the streets being unpaved, she ends up walking mostly on compacted dirt and slightly uneven terrain, but this doesn't bother her at all.

Her outfit today is just as practical as always. As someone working in construction, Lily wears plain blue overalls and a white T-shirt. Of course, once she arrives at the job site, she'll probably have to put on a T-REX to protect herself from debris or other accidents, but she'd still rather not wear a cute dress to a job site.

Lily glances up at the plateau leading to the Fortress of Retribution's inner city. Despite her father possessing desirable qualifications and the right to live inside the inner city, he instead opts to live in the outer section to the west, between the main city itself and the Warpgate Complex.

Lily walks southwest, toward the newest housing developments that have only recently started construction. Before long, she arrives amidst a sea of humans, monsters, and demons, all working together under the eyes of various foremen and women. Huge minotaurs heft big rocks and steel girders while Demon Lords and even three or four Barons join in, using their more mystical abilities to construct, weld, and place structures together. Of course, the majority of the work is usually done by Phoebe Hiro's construction drones, which 'beam' the skeletons of structures and wiring into place, but the most delicate work is often finished by talented tradespeople.

Lily arrives to find two boys her age standing and watching as a Demon Lord sprays scorching hot flames onto a pair of beams, welding them together. Then, a pair of minotaurs work with an enhanced human woman to lift the beams into place.

"You two on break?" Lily asks in a sugary tone.

The first boy, a pale, freckled lad with reddish-orange hair, turns to look at her. His work-issued T-REX hangs in his hand, having taken it off a few minutes earlier for whatever reason.

"Hey Lily. Yeah, me and Connor just finished spraying a bunch of insulation. Boss told us to take a thirty."

Lily smiles. "Looks like a bigger apartment than usual."

The other teenager, Connor, a dark-skinned fellow with bright blue eyes, chuckles at Lily's question. "It's one of Miss Hiro's updated designs. It's gonna have a garden in the center for people to congregate."

"Wonder how long it'll take to grow all the plants." The redhead mutters.

Lily shrugs. "Knowing Miss Hiro, maybe a month at most. Becky says the Tech Division is working on some fancy new fast-grow plants. They might finally add some green to the scene."

Connor's face flushes, ever so slightly. He rubs the tip of his nose. "Becky said that, huh?"

"Oh my gosh, Connor." Lily laughs. "Ask her out already! Just do it!"

"Ahh, I don't know... I'm not good with girls. Not like Ves."

The other boy, Ves, scoffs. "If you think I'm good, you have holes for eyes."

"It's true!" Lily laughs. "Ves always trips over his words when he talks to girls. He's just so gosh-darn cute, they can't help but like him!"

The trio pokes and prods one another for a bit, but eventually, a foreman walks over, a short little goblin wearing slacks and a T-shirt.

"Hey hey!" The goblin exclaims. "Lil-lee! You here make big work today?"

"Yep!" Lily replies. "What do you have on the docket, Mongol?"

"Three choice." Mongol replies, while glancing at a datapad in his tiny little hands. At only three feet tall, he appears positively tiny compared to the humans before him. "We got underground poo-poo project needs work! Need build sewer for city."

Lily scrunches up her face. "...How many tokens?"

"Three tokens!" Mongol replies. "Pay very good for six hour work!"

"Yeah... maybe." Lily says. "What else?"

"Okay okay, pretty girl not want deal with icky sewer. Me understand!" Mongol chuckles. "Next we got heavy stuff-moving job. Easy work, but many lifting of things. You go to base of city and help construct new ramp to upper plateau. Your strength reach Class C, yes?"

Lily nods. "I can lift half a ton pretty easily. Maybe a bit more if I strain."

"Okay okay!" Mongol says, flashing a thumbs-up. "This work well-suited for you. Pay is one point five tokens!"

Lily glances at Connor and Ves, who shrug at her in response. Then she returns her attention to Mongol. "I might go for that. What's the last one?"

"It not hard, but not easy." Mongol says. "Only one token. You go and help dig tunnels. We need help pulling big rocks out and throwing them in open area. Lots of debris. Robots too big to fit."

"I'll take the second job." Lily says. "Send me the info, please."

She holds up her hand, revealing a metal wristband. Not only does she wear one, but so do the boys, and even Mongol. It projects a stream of information into the air, and Mongol activates his wristband as well. He flicks his fingers and transmits the details to Lily, allowing her to observe the job's specific requirements.

"Look good?" Mongol asks.

"Mhm. Thanks Mongol! I'll head over to the site in a bit."

"Okay okay, you have good time Lily! Make big bank yes! Fight-fight-fight!"

Mongol spins on his heel and trots away, leaving Lily alone with Connor and Ves.

"It's so neat how efficiently Miss Hiro's system works." Ves idly comments. "You can just take whatever job you want. If you do the work, you get paid. If not, you don't. Nobody cares what you look like, what your gender is, or even what your species is. We're all... equal."

Connor appears less impressed. "Yeah, this world's kind of nice. But I didn't ask to be brought here. None of us did. That Wordsmith guy just cast his magic without asking us."

"Oh?" Lily asks. "Where are you from, Connor?"

"I lived on Sharmur." Connor answers, his tone bitter. "Shit. The whole world... it's ruined now. That 'Plague' hit us. And from what I've heard? It came because of his magic. The Wordsmith actually attracted the monsters like a god-damned idiot. Now I'm stuck here. Me, my mom, and my dad."

"I'm from Jeddax." Ves says. "My world sucked. I like it here a lot more. The demons would form hunting parties to chase after us for sport. I'm turning eighteen next month.

I'd have been thrown into the 'chaser' party for the next hunt once I became an adult. Fucking demons."

"Really? Demons would hunt you down?" Lily asks, visibly shocked. "Why would they do that though? I've always gotten along just fine with demons."

"Ain't you some sort of princess?" Connor asks. "It's not the same for us commoners. I mean, I had it pretty good on Sharmur. The demons there were super chill. But I've heard horror stories about other demon-controlled worlds."

"Like Jeddax." Ves adds. "On Tarus II, humans have power. Demons don't fuck with us. The best they can do is make snarky comments, but they're terrified of getting cut off from those Belial Boosters. Those facilities are basically drugs to them."

"The Belial Booster..." Lily says quietly. "Mmm. I still need to say hi to her."

"Huh? Who? Belial?" Ves asks.

"Yeah. She and I go way back." Lily says, before noticing the odd looks the boys are giving her. "Oh! It's... well, it's complicated. You guys know I'm a lot older than you, right?"

"You are?" Connor asks. "What are you, like, twenty? Twenty-two?"

Lily fidgets with her feet. "Connor... I'm three thousand years old."

"What the fuck? How?" Connor asks incredulously. "Did you take a dip in the fountain of immortality or something?"

"Well, my daddy has access to these 'Energy War' technologies." Lily explains. "One of them is a nanite compound that can greatly extend a person's life. He's used it on all his family members in the past. We're basically immortal."

"Wow." Ves says, shaking his head in disbelief. "You think you know a gal. Why the heck is the Wordsmith making people visit the new age-extension facilities if he could just zap us with nanites?"

"My daddy intended to talk to him about them at some point." Lily says. "But the Wordsmith has been a bit busy. Daddy has, too."

"Guess it doesn't really matter." Ves says. "We do have those 'BoRDs'. The Rejuvenation Depots. They do the job just fine."

"I saw an old man step inside and he came out looking my dad's age." Connor says. "That's magic for ya."

"I'll bet you didn't have such a thing on Sharmur." Ves points out. "Just another reason I love living on Tarus II."

"We didn't. But I don't really care about that, anyway." Connor retorts. "I hate living here. On Sharmur, life was easy. We didn't have to work all the time building houses for other people. I used to sit around and write poetry for fun. Now I need to earn stupid Merit Tokens."

"But you don't have to do that." Lily counters. "Food and housing is provided for everyone for free."

"Sure, if you want to live and eat in the middle of bumfuck-nowhere." Connor says. "I want my little sister to have a good life. I'm saving up for a place in the Upper Plateau. Mom, dad, and I are going to pool our merits together."

"It's pretty pricey there." Lily points out. "Two hundred tokens a month. And that's just for a basic apartment. If you want something nicer..."

"As long as we can live up there, we'll have access to Miss Hiro's new school and university." Connor says. "I'll make sure my sister gets a good education."

"For someone who hates living here, you're sure making a lot of plans to integrate more deeply into the culture." Lily points out.

"Just doing the best I can with the hand I was dealt." Connor says. He pauses for a moment to glance at his wristband. "Oh. Break's over. I'm heading back."

"Me too." Ves says. "Nice talking with you, Lily."

"You too, guys!" Lily chirps. As the boys depart, she also turns on her heel to leave. "See you at the Tribunal tomorrow!"

"Yep. See you then."

Lily walks eastward, a bit closer to the Upper Plateau. She arrives near the bottom of the cliffside, where she finds a hundred people milling about. Some of them haul concrete in bags, while other drive forklifts and other vehicles plucked straight out of the Industrial Revolution, likely built or envisioned by the Wordsmith himself. They all work together to construct a new ramp up the cliffside, one which will allow many more people to travel to and from the lower and upper areas of Tarus II.

"Becky!" Lily says, as she approaches a blonde girl from behind. "You're working this job too?"

Becky turns around while easily hefting a huge 100-pound bag of concrete. "Hey, Lily. Yeah, this was all they had available. I didn't want to work down in a sewer, even if there's nothing gross down there yet."

"Right?! Me neither!" Lily laughs.

She joins in and starts helping Becky haul concrete to the designated landing zone, and the two of them chat while they walk.

"Guess who I saw on my way here." Lily says, smiling devilishly. "Connor!"

Becky flushes red. "Oh? Yeah... Connor."

"Hahaha! You're blushing! You L-I-K-E him!"

"Maybe a little." Becky says. "Come on, Lily! Stop teasing me!"

Both girls continue to talk while they work. After an hour, the topic drifts elsewhere.

"You're watching the Tribunal tomorrow, right?" Lily asks.

Becky's smile fades away. "Yeah."

Lily pauses for a split-second while throwing the bag of cement onto the pile of other ones. "Did I say something wrong?"

"Well... Lily..." Becky says hesitantly, "I... I lost my mother during Stormbringer. And she wasn't among the recovered souls. She's gone. For good."

Having only lived on Tarus II a scant few weeks, Lily hasn't yet had time to fully understand everyone's living situations, including that of her new friends. She freezes in place and gasps. "Oh my gosh! I'm sorry... I didn't mean... I didn't realize..."

Becky averts her eyes, gazing off into the distance with a vacant expression. She swallows heavily. "I don't like to talk about it. I can't bring my mom back. I was just... sitting on a Covenant ship while she fought to protect our home. When the ship came back... she was gone. I never even got to say goodbye."

Lily touches Becky's shoulder. "I'm sorry for your loss."

"Thanks." Becky mutters, before hardening her eyes. "I'm looking forward to the Stormbringer Tribunal. The demons have to pay for what they've done. We can't let them off easy."

Lily chews her lip. "Yeah. Hopefully, we caught all the bad ones from that day."

"All demons are evil." Becky says, keeping her voice low. She glances at the other workers nearby, with several Demon Grunts among them. Her gaze turns vicious. "Many just haven't revealed their true colors yet."

"No, no, no. Not all demons are bad." Lily whispers, pulling close to her friend. "I know what happened to your mom was terrible, but-"

"There's no 'but' about it." Becky says, giving Lily a strange look. "All the demons need to die. All of them. That's why after I've redeemed the level three Body Boost, I'm going to join the military. I want to serve under Neil Adams. He knows how to deal with them."

Lily frowns. "Becky. I have a lot of demon friends, and I don't think they're all that-"

Before she can finish her sentence, Becky abruptly pulls away from Lily's touch. She scowls at her, giving Lily a look of pure venom.

"You're a collaborator?! Wow. I'm glad out found out sooner rather than later. Forget what I just said. Don't ever talk to me again."

Stunned, Lily blinks twice while her 'friend' turns and walks away. The sudden reversal of their friendship leaves Lily tongue-tied.

"What... wait... Becky? What are... what do you..."

Lily finds herself unable to formulate a sentence. Becky storms off, not bothering to look back at Lily even once. After she disappears around a corner, Lily's legs shake and tremble. She leans against a pole stuck in the dirt and sags to her knees, shocked beyond belief. Despite only knowing Becky for a couple of weeks, never did Lily imagine she would turn on her so abruptly and without remorse.

"I don't understand..." Lily mumbles, fighting to hold back her tears. "What did I... do wrong?"

Part 414: Guerilla Warfare

Benjamin Brown leaves his house in the Eastern District. He strides away from it with purpose, his cybernetic eyes sweeping across the local infrastructure and citizenry with an almost passive indifference.

This seemingly simple man was once a legendary human warrior. A combatant who fought in the Energy Wars under the title of Vanguard. Over the millennia, the collective memories of humanity and demonkind slowly forgot his name and accomplishments.

Not all demons, however.

The Emperors, Dukes, and many of the older Barons still recalled those days. Those who were not put under mind-wipes, those who held positions of privilege, or those who were outright immune, they once knew the terror of facing a Vanguard in battle.

Cybernetically augmented with the best of humanity's technology. Upgraded with specific abilities to combat specific demons. Difficult to injure, and even harder to kill.

The Vanguards once terrorized demons in the same way the ancient demons once terrorized humanity. Their eyes could pierce solid barriers. Their fists could shatter steel, stone, and bone alike. Their accuracy with weapons was nearly perfect.

And now, 100,000 years after Earth's fall, Benjamin Brown finds himself as the last remnant of the Vanguards. A soldier without an enemy to fight. A man merely trying to live his life in peace.

He moves quickly but steadily, not breaking a sweat. He passes by humans, monsters, and demons alike, observing their interactions with clinical dispassion. To him, demons were once his greatest enemy. But nowadays, they are merely... obstacles.

As he makes his way toward the military-zoned area north of the Central Plateau, Benjamin Brown's thoughts drift between topics.

Humanity is progressing much faster than it did during the Energy Wars. But it still has a long way to go before it can reach a level comparable to what Marie achieved. Her leadership truly uplifted our species to the apex.

Sadly, it wasn't enough. Even she had limits. We were never a threat to the Volgrim, no matter how quickly we progressed.

He shakes his head while passing a pair of soldiers wearing nanite-based armor. Despite the impressiveness of their T-REX's, not one of these soldiers could hope to match Benjamin Brown in combat if he went all-out.

On the surface, these soldiers possess incredible power. But defeating demons and defeating the Volgrim... there's simply no comparison between the two. And that's to say nothing of the Plague.

Before long, Benjamin arrives at the edge of Tarus II's largest military base. Several conspicuous signs rest on its walls stating that demons are not allowed inside. None of them, not even Belial herself. Only humans and monsters, those who have fought on humanity's side for the past six years, are allowed to enter.

Benjamin Brown pauses at the gate, while a female trooper wearing a blue-tinted T-REX walks up to him.

"Mister Brown." She says, her voice transmitting through her faceless helmet. "Punctual, as always."

"Hello, Linda." Benjamin says, offering her a faint smile. "I have an internal chronometer installed in my skull. I am always painfully aware of any existing time constraints."

Corporal Linda Hurent nods at the man before her. "Neil says he wants to talk to you. He'd like it if you dropped by after you're done with your training session."

"He is the commanding officer here." Benjamin replies. "I'm at his disposal."

"We'll keep that in mind."

Linda leads Benjamin through the checkpoint toward the secret inner underground area. As they walk, the man and woman engage in idle conversation.

"We really appreciate your help." Linda says, as they enter the central dome, then descend down a spiral staircase into the facility's depths. "We need more veterans with your level of experience. Unsurprisingly, they're hard to come by."

"I've heard rumors going around that Blinker and her fairy friends are working on some sort of new... contraption?" Benjamin asks idly.

"I don't know any details." Linda says. She and Benjamin arrive at the bottom of the staircase and arrive inside a wide hallway, one which leads toward several portals to Camael's Cube.

However, neither of the two knows the truth about these training areas, believing them to projections made by Fairy Magic, or perhaps some unknown utilization of Wordsmithing.

"None at all?" Benjamin asks. "Come now, Linda. You're pretty high up in the command structure."

"I'm telling the truth." Linda says, while leading Benjamin toward the 'aquatic' biome. "Neil might tell you the details, but he hasn't told me much of anything. All I know is it will be a much more robust training sim than what we have now. And don't get me wrong, these training biomes are crazy-realistic already, so I can only wonder what sorts of improvements the Wordsmith will make."

The two of them walk through the doorway and arrive on a large island amidst a seemingly infinite ocean stretching out into the distance. The portal behind them hums mysteriously atop a raised platform, and the two of them descend onto the island's sandy beach past several rows of troopers.

"Training Officer Brown is on the scene!" One man barks, causing the soldiers behind him to stand at attention. He walks over to Benjamin Brown and snaps a salute by lightly thumping his heart with his fist. "Thank for for taking time out of your schedule to visit us today, Officer Brown!"

Benjamin smiles perfunctorily. "We're all human, here. It's only natural I help whip my people into shape."

After once again thanking Benjamin for his help, Linda turns on her heel and strides back to the portal leading out of the Cube. Once she's gone, Benjamin begins pacing before the recruits, sizing them up. All of them wear T-REX modules on their chests, but they remain deactivated, allowing Benjamin to get a good look at today's candidates.

Surprisingly, barely over half of them are men. Their gender distribution appears roughly equal thanks to the effects of Jason Hiro's Body Boosters, which grant anyone with enough merit points access to a minimum of Class II enhanced physiques. Of course, if someone joins the military, they're guaranteed three rounds in the Booster to give themselves a Class III physique. And if they already have a Class III physique, they're granted two more rounds.

At the third level, even without armor, most soldiers possess noticeably faster tissue regeneration, rapid-clotting blood, and much denser skin and bone, allowing them to punch apart boulders with their bare hands. Their strength also rises dramatically, granting them enough power to lift nearly a full ton of weight unassisted.

Benjamin nods as he sizes up the soldiers.

Not bad. They're no Vanguards, but augmentations like mine weren't easy to install. Since the Wordsmith can mass-produce super-soldiers, even if they're a bit lower-level than the strongest soldiers of my era, it's not hard to make up the difference in quality with quantity. Plus, even outside of combat, these people can fulfill all sorts of general roles. Laborers, mechanics, construction workers... he's creating a more versatile and adaptable society than Old Earth.

Benjamin clears his throat. "Ahem. I'm sure I don't need to introduce myself. Does anyone here have a Class IV or higher enhanced body?"

Two men nod their heads.

"I do, sir."

"I as well."

Benjamin nods. "Perfect! You two will be taking the roles of warring commanders. I want half of the people here to go with you, and the other half to go with you. One side will play the role of assault, while the other will act as a defender. The defenders will have one hour to build fortifications, while the attackers will need to construct weapons and armor."

Benjamin gestures to the many trees on the island, the diameter of which stretches for about ten miles.

This is a tactical exercise. You are not to kill your opponents, though for obvious reasons, you can and should beat the shit out of each other. If anyone gets too injured to fight, we'll cart them off to the hospital for Belial to heal. Most importantly, I'm going to be training you in the art of guerilla warfare! This is a style of combat which allows seemingly small and weak militaries to hold back and sometimes defeat much stronger ones through clever uses of traps, sabotage, and other 'unsavory' methods."

Ben proceeds to spend the next ten minutes outlining all of the rules, among which includes leaving their T-REX's behind in order to endure the training with nothing but their bodies. Luckily, these soldiers not only possess enhanced physiques, but lightly enhanced brains as well, allowing them to more easily retain his words.

"Permission to speak?" One woman in the front row asks.

"Granted." Benjamin says, turning to face her.

"Sir," She says, "are you teaching us this in case we need to fight any specific adversary? Or is this training general-purpose?"

"It's both." Benjamin answers, while folding his hands behind his back. "Humanity is still weak. The Wordsmith's presence shields you, causing the demons to worry about taking any overt actions against your species. Additionally, they wish to form trade connections with you thanks to your valuable 'Belial Booster'."

He continues. "Nevertheless, if the Wordsmith is not here at all times, or if he leaves for any extended period, the demons may suddenly attack. You are still far weaker than them, collectively. Knowing how to use guerilla warfare against a superior enemy will not only benefit you if you ever have to fight the demons, but also the Volgrim. That being said, these tactics do have limits. They are... far from perfect, especially when facing such a huge difference in power."

Benjamin fields half a dozen other questions before initiating the training. Over the next hour, he spends most of his time with the defenders, helping them create a secluded base deep within the island's tree cover.

"Look here," Benjamin says to one pair of young men, both barely 20 years old. "Between these trees, you could place some barbed wire at ankle level and then hide it with leaves. Anyone trying to sneak past the perimeter will catch a nasty surprise."

"We don't have any barbed wire." One of the men replies. "Can we use fishing line instead? Maybe attach them to some bells as an early warning?"

"That's using your head." Benjamin says, giving them a thumbs-up before leaving them to their work.

The Vanguard proceeds to traipse around the base while the two hundred or so soldiers hastily erect their defenses. Afterward, he walks over to the other side, the attackers, and proceeds to give them personalized training.

The attackers wield mostly sharpened sticks, rocks attached to tree branches and fashioned into makeshift axes and clubs, as well as 'body armor' made from huge leaves or flat rocks. While rudimentary, these hastily-crafted weapons and armor give the attackers a superior equipment lead over the defenders.

"Your goal is to break through the defenses of your opponents, evade their traps, and beat them half-to death." Benjamin tells the attackers. "However, what you lack is information. You do not know where their defenses are located, or how they've been set up. If your leg gets stuck in a snare, you'll be a sitting duck for a counter-attack. And be warned, your opponents have positioned themselves all across the woodlands. They want nothing more than to pounce on you in an ambush and take you out without suffering a loss. Now, let's move out. I'll show you a few initial traps so you know what to look for, but after that, it will be up to your own survival and wits."

Benjamin strides into the forest with the other two hundred soldiers. He proceeds to point out a handful of tricks the defenders have laid out, including pit-traps, rope snares, and hammers designed to fall down and knock out an enemy before they can react.

What Benjamin also finds is that despite their youth, many of these humans are actually quite knowledgeable. Unlike the humans of his modern industrial era, those born into simple lives and 9-to-5 drudgery, these people were raised on hostile worlds where they had to work the farmlands or flee for their survival when the demons initiated hunting parties.

Several men and women take the lead, pointing out traps Benjamin didn't even mention. He falls back to the rear, then activates a certain upgrade inside his body, one installed just 20,000 years prior.

Benjamin levitates into the sky!

Thanks to an anti-gravity module installed by none other than Ose herself, Benjamin can take to the air in a slow but energy-efficient manner. Traveling at just under twenty kilometers an hour, he flies into the sky to look down upon the recruits as they initiate their mock battle.

In under three minutes, the first of the attackers accidentally steps on a trip-wire. A sharp thwip sound causes him to jerk his head to the left, where he sees a glob of dirt flying at his face, launched by some unseen mechanism. The soldier quickly raises his arm to block the incoming projectile, but this only causes it to crash against his skin and explode into a thick cloud of dust!

The man staggers back and sneezes, momentarily blinded by the dirt in his eyes. Before he can cry out for help, a woman hidden under a small pile of leaves jumps up from behind him and locks him in a chokehold. The man falls unconscious after she throttles the life out of him, then drags him deeper into the jungle, where his teammates won't see him again.

"Good move." Benjamin idly mutters.

Across the jungle, several other such scenes take place. Some of the attackers, wiser than their peers, deliberately trip traps and act surprised, only to turn the tables on the defenders when they attack.

Over the next two hours, a series of victories and defeats plays out. Benjamin watches as the defenders start with initial victories, but ultimately lose more and more ground until eventually succumbing to the superior tactics of their opposing peers.

Afterward, he takes to the ground and proceeds to check up on the injured. Some of them bear serious wounds, but none that can't be healed with humanity's magic. He ships the injured back to the hospital area, then turns to face the remaining three hundred or so, those with painful injuries but who can still stand, as well as their peers who managed to survive the exercise without any major wounds.

"Well. That was a pathetic showing." Benjamin says, addressing the defending side. "The power of guerilla warfare lies in a smaller force outlasting an opposing side. Can any of you tell me what went wrong?"

The commander of the defenders, one of the two Class IV enhanced humans, steps forward and looks Benjamin in the eye. His pale skin appears quite bruised thanks to the beating he took, but thanks to his enhanced biology, he can heal from fairly severe injuries, given time.

"Sir. It was my errant leadership that caused us to fail."

Benjamin nods. "Your name?"

"Private Williams, sir."

"And what exactly did you do wrong?" Benjamin asks.

Private Williams grits his teeth. "I overlooked the true point of this exercise. I thought we should try to gang up on our enemies by isolating them and striking them two-versus-one. In this way, we could quickly take out half their members and easily deal with the others."

"At least you know where you erred." Benjamin says calmly. "Looking back, what do you think would have been the better solution?"

"Sir. We should have laid low and continued placing traps while falling back. The more traps our opponents crossed, the more likely they'd get injured or weakened at no cost to us. It's just..."

He pauses.

"...I feel as though we had to hold back due to this being a 'friendly' competition. You made it clear we weren't supposed to kill anyone. And frankly, none of us would want to do that anyway. Therefore, any traps capable of severely injuring the attackers might have accidentally killed them. The only way I felt we could be sure we were only incapacitating them was to get up close and personal."

Benjamin listens silently. He nods along to the soldier's words, and when the man finishes, Benjamin takes a moment to collect his thoughts.

"Guerilla warfare is a state of war most humans should innately prefer." Benjamin finally says. "Our ancestors were apes. We swung through the jungles and avoided predators stronger than us, because our bodies were inferior to theirs. When we learned toolmaking, we began to engage in combat only after outfitting ourselves appropriately."

He starts walking up and down the line of assembled recruits while continuing to speak.

"Traditional warfare is not something humans are innately good at. However, we are adaptable. We will master any skill if it lays within our limits. Shooting guns and standing on the frontlines of battle is how we currently engage in war, but it is inherently much more risky than sneaking around and defeating our foes through battles of attrition. You should take this loss to heart and focus on unlearning the traditional combat methods that have been drilled into you."

"Sir." Private Williams says. "Pardon my ignorance. I can understand why you would want us to learn guerilla warfare, but why ask us to also ignore all of our previous training?"

"You don't need to go that far." Benjamin says. "It's the mindset that counts. Bleeding your enemies to death is slow but efficient. It saves lives on your side. Your goal should not be to win quickly, but to win efficiently. Every loss you take gives your enemies, the demons, a big advantage. They already outnumber you ten thousand to one. Don't give them any additional benefits."

Benjamin continues speaking to the other soldiers for over an hour. Eventually, Corporal Hurent re-enters the training zone and walks up to him.

"Mister Brown. Commander Neil is ready to see you."

Benjamin nods. "I was just finishing up here. I'm curious as to what the Commander himself has to say to little old me."

The Vanguard turns away from his trainees and leaves alongside Linda. She guides him through the portal, into the outer base, and toward a building located at the rear in a secured area.

"Have you spoken to Neil before?" Linda asks.

"Once or twice. But only perfunctorily. I had the impression he was an extremely busy man." Benjamin says.

"He certainly is. There's a lot of work yet to be done." Linda says.

"Oh? What sorts of work?"

"Well. Simply put, Neil has... ambitions."

Benjamin nods along to her words. "He's not a fan of demonkind. He wants them gone. And he doesn't like the way Jason runs things."

Linda's helmeted head gives no indication of her emotions, but Benjamin easily picks up on the subtle nuances in her voice.

"Well... I used to think Neil's views were too extreme. But a few days ago, I found out Mara, a recently evolved Demon Duke, was the culprit behind the attack that killed over 50,000 men, women, and children. She also nearly killed Phoebe Hiro, yet kept quiet all this time."

"Mara, formerly the Baron of Games?" Benjamin asks.

"The very same one." Linda affirms. "Now she's the Duke of Collection. And her ascension was given to her by the same people she victimized. That bitch. She probably killed many of my friends, or friends of my friends, and I was all chummy with her."

Benjamin's expression remains impassive. "You can't trust demons. They are all liars at heart."

"Exactly right!" Linda exclaims, before quickly lowering her voice. "So, you don't like demons?"

"I neither like nor dislike them." Benjamin answers, his voice soft. "I've lived among demons for the past 100,000 years. I've had sex with them, gambled with them, fought with them, and killed more of them than you can imagine. I've seen demons at their best, and their worst."

He pauses.

"...I don't really care about the greater war effort anymore. It's all so pointless. So futile."

"What do you mean?" Linda asks.

"Everyone is so greedy and short-sighted." Benjamin sighs. "I just want to raise my children in peace. Live on a nice, quiet world. I don't want to bother anyone or have them bother me."

"Yet you're here, training our people." Linda points out. "Why bother?"

"Because I'm bored. And the merit allotment for these training missions is quite generous."

"I guess that's as good a reason as any other." Linda says. "You're in this for the money. I can respect that."

"Only because the Wordsmith's unique skills can offer me intangible benefits." Ben replies. "Lily has made some good gains thanks to the Body Boosters. I know she also has a soft spot for demons. She was raised in a nice, quiet, peaceful environment... unlike me. I grew up during a time of global war."

"So, what are your plans moving forward?" Linda asks. "Are you with us? Or against us?"

Inside her helmet, Linda narrows her eyes. She regards the Vanguard with a moderate level of suspicion while taking care to record his every facial twitch.

Benjamin chuckles. "You don't need to give me that look, Linda. I think what you people are doing here is... fine. But it's too little, too late. If you advance to a point that might threaten the Volgrim, they will bomb you back to the stone age. And if you don't, you will never break free of your shackles. Your whole struggle is simply... pointless."

Linda turns away from him. "Well. I think you're wrong. Maybe you ancient humans couldn't do anything, but we have the Wordsmiths now. I believe anything is possible."

"Maybe a Hero could have given us the leg up we needed, back then." Benjamin says. "But somehow, I doubt that. You haven't witnessed the terror of a high level Psion. I have. I fear even Wordsmithing has its limits."

"Let's agree to disagree." Linda says.

She directs Benjamin to the Commander Hall, a specially reinforced building designed specifically for Neil, as well as Hope Hiro, if or whenever he comes around. Outside, more than five hundred troops stand at attention, patrol the area, or maintain defensive positions atop the roof to ensure their commander's protection. The substantially-sized building sports hardened exosteel wall panels, a forest-green coloration on its walls, and a pair of statues depicting Hope Hiro and Neil Adams parked outside, on either side of the entrance.

Benjamin eyes the life-sized statues with disdain. "How egocentric."

With a shake of his head, he walks toward the entrance, while Linda stays behind.

"Have fun in there." Linda says.

"Oh, I always do." Ben replies.

Part 415: Pushing Benjamin's Button

After leaving Linda behind, Benjamin Brown walks with purpose past several dozen heavily armored T-REX Troopers. Unlike the basic exosuits worn by most recruits, these men and women wear much heavier variants similar to the Rhino-suits worn by Lieutenant Samuel. With heavier plating and a more robust power system, they can combine their strengths to defeat Demon Barons, and even a few of the weaker Dukes. Unfortunately, they still aren't much use against Emperors.

Ben pushes open the doors to Neil Adams' headquarters, a compact facility with many different computer terminals and video screens, all of them monitoring various areas of Tarus II. Their purpose is clearly to keep an eye on the humans, monsters, and especially demon residents.

It's not much of a walk before Ben skips past the few-dozen terminals and their monster and human operators. He arrives at the entrance to Neil's officer, where he finds a pair of minotaurs standing outside. These monsters wear full-body T-REX suits, all except for their bull-like heads, which remain exposed.

The minotaur on the right observes Ben during his approach.

"Mister Brown. Braaaaum! Neil is ready to see you."

Benjamin nods at the minotaur, though he has no idea as to the half-bull's identity. "I'll be heading in, then."

The minotaur opens the door, allowing Benjamin to enter. He steps into a carpeted office with blue floors, simple electric lights above, and a grand mahogany desk in the center. On the opposite side of the desk, with several piles of papers placed before him, sits Neil Adams, humanity's military commander.

"Ah, Benjamin." Neil says, rising from his seat. "Thank you for joining us."

Ben's eyes flick to the near-side of Neil's desk, where he finds another man seated, a dark-skinned fellow of some notoriety in the military corps.

"Samuel Baker." Benjamin says, offering a nod to the Lieutenant. "It's good to see you."

Samuel stands up. He walks over and shakes Benjamin's hand while smiling cordially.

"I was just informing the Commander on the details regarding my trip to Volgarius."

The three men exchange pleasantries, then they all take their seats. Neil raises his eyebrows.

"Coffee?"

"No thanks." Ben says, casually waving his hand. "I don't require any neurological stimulants."

"That makes sense, what with you being more machine than man." Neil chuckles. His words, while slightly rude, don't contain any hostile intent. Benjamin doesn't mind their pointed nature.

"So." Ben says, glancing between Neil and Samuel. He lifts his palms, then plops them in his lap. "You called me here. How can I help you?"

Neil smiles. "I had some questions I wanted to run by you. How familiar are you with the Volgrim?"

Samuel blinks. "Familiar enough to know that there is currently a 7th-Level Psion within this planet's gravity well. Creator Demila is not a particularly famous Psion, but she does possess a certain level of reconnaissance capability. She can listen in on every word we speak. She may even be doing it right now."

Neil's eye twitches. He shoots a glance at Samuel, but otherwise maintains his smile.

"Is that so? Well, that's fine. I was only inquiring randomly. I don't plan to discuss any sensitive information."

"Good. I'd rather not paint a target on my back." Benjamin says. "Only men with a death wish would be stupid enough to poke their noses into the Founders' business."

Samuel frowns. "You're afraid of the Volgrim?"

"I am. And you should be too." Benjamin replies, without a hint of shame. "Unlike either of you, I've fought the sons of bitches. It didn't go well. Of course, I'd more describe myself as 'intelligently cautious,' but you can use whatever label you want. Just like if there was a tiger stalking you, you should exercise the same care and attention toward the Volgrim."

"That's fair. But... what the hell's a tiger?" Samuel asks.

"A creature from Earth." Neil says. "Four legged predator."

"Ah." Samuel grunts. "I see."

As a man who was never born on Earth, Samuel didn't have the chance to witness any of the motherworld's creatures in their original living space. Luckily, the Volgrim managed to transplant Earth's rich biodiversity onto habitable worlds across the Milky Way, but unfortunately, they would never be the same again.

"Let's move on." Neil says. "You've been working as a trainer for our troops for a while now, Benjamin. How would you like to join humanity's armed forces in a more official capacity?"

"I refuse." Benjamin says, his polite smile instantly disappearing. "I have no interest in your growth, your army, or your plans. As far as I'm concerned, you're living on borrowed time. Either the Volgrim will defeat the Plague, then come for you, or the Plague will defeat them, and then you're screwed anyway."

"What are you saying?" Neil asks, while adopting a frown of his own. "That there's no point in building up humanity? That we're destined to lose, no matter how we struggle?"

Benjamin leans back in his chair and sighs. "That's exactly right. Furthermore, let's not beat around the bush. You're pursuing a more... aggressive doctrine... than the First Wordsmith. You don't just want my help in training troops; you're hoping to have me there when the violence starts."

"Violence? No, no..." Neil says, dismissively waving his hand. He looks away as if disinterested in the idea. "You misunderstand me completely, Mister Brown. I would love nothing more than a peaceful resolution with the demons."

"That's some bullshit if I ever heard it." Benjamin gruffly retorts.

"I'm serious!" Neil protests. "Who wouldn't prefer peace to war? But from what I understand, you've spent the last 100,000 years living on Hell Harbor, yes? You enjoyed a time of relative peace. You do not wish to re-enter battle again."

"That's right." Benjamin answers slowly. "So you know how futile trying to convince me is."

"You have lived among the demons a long time." Neil says. "You must know their hierarchy and internal disputes quite well, yes? And above all else, you should know how treacherous and vile they are."

"I don't love the demons." Benjamin says, lowering his voice. "But I don't hate them like I did in my youth. I've... come to understand them."

"Understand them?" Samuel interrupts. "How in the goddamned hell can you think you understand them? My brother DIED because the demons murdered him. They didn't even have a good reason. They did it for sport!"

"Demons aren't evil." Benjamin says, ignoring the rage in Samuel's voice. "They have been taught to be evil from birth. They walk the path of bloodlust because it is all they know. Even so, many younger demon generations are more than willing to change if given the chance."

"You're making the same arguments as Jason." Neil says, his frown deepening. "I take it you intend to join his coalition?"

"Neither of you are listening." Benjamin says. "Your ears are filled with gunk. I won't join Jason because he's a naïve idealist. Just because I don't think all demons are bad doesn't mean I think they all deserve redemption. Some deserve fates worse than death!"

Samuel forces himself to calm down. "So... you mean..."

"I'm not joining Jason's side." Benjamin says. "But I'm not taking yours either, Neil. I will casually assist your troops in their training. I will earn some Merit Tokens, and that is all. Is my position truly so difficult to comprehend?"

"Why are you so hesitant to join us?" Neil asks. "Don't you see? The demons attacked us, unprovoked, during Stormbringer. They slaughtered our people-"

"Don't YOU lie to me!" Benjamin suddenly barks, raising his voice enough to make Neil flinch. "God-damn lying piece of shit. Unprovoked?! I'm not an ignoramus, Neil! You continuously made forays into the Labyrinth to 'rescue' human slaves. That would be excusable, but you just couldn't help mowing down any demons who also crossed your path!"

Benjamin gnashes his teeth. "You want to preach to me about how evil the demons are? You're no better! It's warmongers like you who always bring about misery to the masses!"

"I did what I had to do!" Neil shouts back, not allowing Benjamin's strong will to cow him into submission. "While you sat in an ivory tower, frolicking about with the demons, the rest of humanity suffered under their raping, torturous, barbaric ways!"

"That's right!" Samuel chimes in. "We may have killed a million bastards, but they deserved to die!"

Benjamin snorts derisively. "First you claimed their attack was unprovoked. Now you claim that even though it wasn't, they deserved to die. How far down this slippery slope shall you slide? At least the Wordsmith WANTS to peacefully resolve the problem, even though I doubt he'll succeed."

Neil settles back into his seat. "Peacefully. Are you even aware? The Wordsmith unleashed an attack that slaughtered more than five hundred thousand demons. I certainly won't lose any sleep over their deaths, but his hands are far from bloodless."

"I have heard of... that matter." Benjamin affirms. "And that is just one more reason why I won't join him. I might be a soldier, but I already fought my best years. I'm an old man now, and I'm not in the mood to join some new cause."

"Yet you assist our soldiers with training." Neil points out for the second time. "Stop fighting me, Benjamin. I am trying to give you exactly what you want! Don't you want your daughter to grow up among her own kind? Not a bunch of demons who would butcher her if they thought you weren't able to protect her!"

Benjamin falls silent. He stews on Neil's words for several long moments before closing his eyes and shaking his head.

"You're not trying to help me. You're trying to use me. I know what that feels like. That helpless feeling when a commander above you issues an order that goes against your moral code. I hated it a hundred thousand years ago, and I hate it now."

He opens his eyes and looks squarely at Samuel.

"You lost your brother to the demons? I lost mine to the Volgrim. Darnell. He and I fought against the demons and the Volgrim alike. Ultimately, it wasn't even really the Volgrim who killed him. It was our own commander. Told him to take on a suicide mission. Said it would save lives."

Benjamin narrows his eyes.

"But it didn't save lives. Hundreds of civilians still ended up dying that day. And my brother was among them! Had I told him to disobey orders, he might still be with me now. But I didn't, and so he isn't."

Neil's posture softens.

"I see. You've been betrayed by people in authority. Now, you don't trust our types. I can see why you hold the position you do."

"The only person I care about now is myself. More specifically, my family." Benjamin says. "I don't want you lot going around, mucking shit up and stirring the pot. But I can't stop you, so I might as well earn a few tokens if it makes my little girl happy."

Neil sighs. "Alright. I'm sorry I spoke too forcefully. You can continue to assist our troops with their training if you wish. I won't ask you to pick a side again."

Benjamin nods. "I'm glad to hear that. If you don't mind, I think I'll be heading out, now."

"Sure, sure. Take care, Mister Brown." Neil says, while standing up. He and Benjamin both rise to their feet simultaneously, and they exchange a handshake before Benjamin turns and walks out of the room.

After the Vanguard departs, Neil sits back down. He and Samuel remain silent for a few moments.

"Too bad." Samuel eventually says. "You couldn't rope him in."

"Benjamin Brown is a formidable soldier. According to the scans we've taken, his body is comparable to a Demon Duke's, and his auxiliary abilities should make it possible for him to even take down some of the weaker Emperors. Our T-REX's are a long way off from matching that kind of combat strength."

"It'd be nice to have him." Samuel says. "But if I might say so, sir. I don't think he's necessary."

"Because of the Body Boosters." Neil posits.

"Yes. Say what you want about Jason, but his facilities are rapidly improving humanity's strength. Whether he came up with the idea or his wife, the difference isn't significant. His Wordsmithing is still key to overthrowing the galactic power structure."

Neil pauses for a moment as he recalls the existence of Creator Demila, who could easily be listening in on their conversation. At the same time, she could likely also pluck all the information out of their heads through her 7th-Level telepathy.

At this point, Neil has no way to stop her from wreaking havoc or obtaining all of their secrets.

"Fucking Wordsmith." Neil mutters. "I can't believe he just allowed a Psion to roam around freely. Doesn't he realize what her presence here means..."

After mulling that thought over for a moment, Neil shakes his head and reaches for a datapad on the table in front of him. He keys in several pieces of information, then glances at Samuel.

"Now that you're back, I'll expect you to resume your duties. Continue distributing the Power Gloves to our people. Also, make sure they get trained in using them."

"I ended up finally trying out mine." Samuel says. "I even, ah... I tried the 'Fairy' setting."

"You did?" Neil asks, while he crooks a smile. "And here I remember you protested so fiercely."

"It just ended up growing some fairy wings on my back. No big deal." Samuel retorts. "More importantly... I found out what it means to have an S-class resonance with another species' DNA. I'm telling you, Neil, it was incredible. I could use fairy magic effortlessly. It felt like I should have been born a fuckin' fairy. Never felt anything like it in all my life."

"Really?" Neil asks. "Can you show me?"

"Of course." Samuel replies. He glances at a table off to the side of the room, where his Power Glove rests. Due to its weight, wearing it for extended periods isn't exactly comfortable, unlike the chestpiece of the T-REX all humans permanently wear around their torsos.

Samuel stands up. He starts to approach the table.

As he reaches out his hand to grab the Power Glove, something unexpected happens.

It leaps off the table and flies into his grasp!

Startled, Samuel jerks backward slightly as the gauntlet claps into his palm, like a baseball landing snugly into a mitt.

"What the-?!"

Neil stands up. He stares intently at his subordinate.

"What did you just do?"

"I... I don't know!" Samuel exclaims. "I... I reached toward it, and the gauntlet just... came to me!"

Samuel turns to look at his commanding officer, but the expression on Neil's face turns ugly.

"Guards! Get in here!"

Before Samuel can react, the door flings open and both minotaurs rush into the room. At Neil's command, they pounce on Samuel and pin him to the floor, then kick the gauntlet out of his grasp, sending it rolling across the carpet.

"Hey! What the hell are you doing?!" Samuel snaps.

"Who are you?!" Neil fires back, eying Samuel with visible suspicion. "Are you a shapeshifter? A demon? Or more likely... a Volgrim Changeling?"

"The fuck? I'm human!" Samuel protests, while the minotaurs keep him pinned to the floor. "What's wrong with YOU?"

Neil frowns deeply. He quickly touches a button on his desk.

"Debra. Get me a testing kit. I want DNA and any other sample types."

Samuel quickly realizes the mix-up. "Neil, I'm not a Changeling, okay? But go ahead and test me. You'll see."

"I'm not blind." Neil says, gazing coldly at the man pinned on his office floor. "I saw you use psionics just now. Explain how you did that."

"I don't know." Samuel mutters, his expression turning solemn. "I just... did it."

After a few minutes, Debra and half a dozen scientists enter the room, all of them people who have worked under Phoebe's tutelage over the past 6 years. One of them is even a member of the Respected, someone who perished during Stormbringer but came back in a superhuman body.

They proceed to draw Samuel's blood, swab his saliva, and perform other invasive scans. After half an hour, they hand the results to Debra.

"He's clean." Debra says to her boss, handing the slide to Neil. "At least as far as we can tell. You say he used psionic powers?"

"He did." Neil replies. "Samuel levitated that Power Glove off the table into his hand. You're sure he's human?"

"It's possible he's not. But if the Volgrim can deceive all of our tests, we won't have much of a way to tell..."

Neil frowns deeply. "Samuel traveled to Volgarius. It's possible his body could have been swapped with a Changeling while he was there. Hell, anyone who was on that mission could have been swapped. I want you to run tests on every single person who went."

"What about Demon Emperor Serena?" Debra asks.

"We can't test her. There's no point in trying. It will create a diplomatic incident." Neil answers. "Just worry about our people."

"Alright, Neil." Debra says, before turning and walking away.

After she and the scientists leave, the minotaurs stand up and release their grip on Samuel, allowing him to sit on the floor, but still keeping a close eye on him.

"Still no explanation?" Neil asks.

Samuel gazes at his commander. In his head, he understands why Neil acted so decisively. If he really was a Changeling, it could spell disaster for humankind. Rooting out the truth as fast as possible would be the correct choice.

But in Samuel's heart, the cold and callous way Neil had him pinned without warning... it didn't feel good to him. Now he isn't sure what to think of Neil's swift judgment call.

"Like I said." Samuel replies. "I don't know. I just... reached for the gauntlet... and it came to me."

He pauses.

"Although..."

"Although?" Neil asks.

"It's only a hunch." Samuel mutters, while standing up. He points the the Power Glove, resting on the floor a short distance away. "Mind if I use it like we planned?"

Neil glances at the minotaurs. They both nod and take out heavy guns, then keep the weapons trained on Samuel.

"Go ahead." Neil says quietly. "But don't make any sudden movements. I still don't know if you're truly 'Samuel Baker' or not."

"Motherfucker, I am." Samuel says, while shaking his head.

The man reaches toward the gauntlet on the floor, but instead of picking it up, he tries to repeat the trick he did earlier. He concentrates, squints, scrunches up his face, and even grunts a little.

However, no matter what he does, the gauntlet stubbornly continues to sit on the floor, as if taunting him.

Finally, he just bends down and picks it up. After staring at it in annoyance for a moment, he changes the dial to the Fairy setting, then activates the Power Glove's magic. Moments later, a pair of fairy wings sprout from his back, appearing like shiny and radiant butterfly wings.

"Theoretically," Neil says, "only the designated users should be able to use their Power Gloves. That must mean you're actually Samuel Baker."

"Right." Samuel says. "But maybe I'm actually a Volgrim who hacked the glove for my own purposes. All to get close and fool you."

"It's a possibility." Neil replies.

The Commander ultimately gestures to his two minotaur guards. The huge half-bulls snort at him, then turn and leave the room, closing the door behind them.

Neil takes a seat. He forces a smile, despite the awkward atmosphere.

"Well, sorry about all of that, Samuel. We do have to be careful, you know."

"Yeah. I know." Samuel grunts.

"What are you waiting for?" Neil asks, while gesturing to the Power Glove. "Show me what you can do with that thing."

"Yes sir."

Part 416: The Stormbringer Tribunal (Part 1)

A hundred stories underground, deep beneath Tarus II's surface, a highly secure prison facility sits, its occupants considered the worst and most vile traitors and enemies of humankind.

If Hope were successful in capturing Mephisto or Yama, they would surely be imprisoned down in these depths. Unfortunately, only a few handfuls of truly evil demons and humans sit in the depths, all of them wearing specially-designed prisoner collars capable of preventing their suicides, and also sealing their magical powers.

In one of these cells, a former demon lays on his back. Beelzebub, the Duke of Inferno, now nothing more than an average human male.

His two crippled and useless arms rest on his stomach, their coloration becoming a depressing brown thanks to the lack of blood flow they received during his time in Rosalia's captivity.

On the other side of the cell, Private Henry also sits. As the person who betrayed Neil Adams by sealing the warpgate and setting the Core to self-destruct, he has been charged with treason against humanity. His face tells the story of a man haunted by his past mistakes.

"Today's the day." Henry mumbles. "The Stormbringer Tribunal."

The young man sits on the edge of the bed, vapidly gazing across the cell at a point on the wall above Beelzebub's bed. His eyes don't focus on anything in particular, while his mind randomly wanders.

"So it is." Beelzebub says, his hoarse and aged voice making him sound like a feeble old man. "Our day of judgment."

Henry lowers his eyes. "I'm... scared, Robert."

Not knowing Beelzebub's true identity, Henry only knows him by his human moniker. He simply views Beelzebub as an unknown old man, some fellow who must have committed a terrible crime to have been sent to the lowest block, yet not anybody Henry recognizes.

"You're young." Beelzebub says quietly. "You had your whole life in front of you. But you blew it because of some demon whore."

"I couldn't see through Emperor Ose's lies." Henry mumbles. "All I saw was the beautiful 'Oshina.' She was like a fairy to me. So easy to trust."

"That's how women get you." Beelzebub says. "They tell you what you want to hear. I had a woman do that to me as well. I fell for her snake-tongue, just like you."

"Oh?" Henry asks, raising his head. "And what did she say to you?"

"I wanted to become a revolutionary." Beelzebub answers. "To upend the stagnant order and bring prosperity to my people. She promised me that if I did as she commanded, I would achieve my goals."

He pauses.

"But that didn't happen. Instead, I simply added to the chaos with my own evils."

"Who are you, really?" Henry asks, more confused than ever by Beelzebub's cryptic words. "Should I know you from somewhere?"

The Duke of Inferno turns his head to look at his cellmate.

"It's better if you don't."

* * *

Later that day, many heavily-armored troopers march up the hallway to the cells. The sounds of their boots stomping against the stone floors echo throughout the prison, waking up anyone who actually managed to fall asleep on the day of their judgment. The troopers stride with purpose toward each of the cells, stopping in pairs for each individual prisoner while turning their heavily armored and faceless forms toward the cells' interiors.

Beelzebub sighs. He swings his legs over the bed's edge and shakily stands up, feeling a bit more capable of walking than a few weeks prior, thanks to some decent meals served to him by the prison guards.

Henry also stands up. His legs tremble as he turns to look at the old man beside him.

"Are you... nervous?"

Beelzebub's only response is a silent roll of his eyes.

The door to the cell opens. Four guards stride inside, with two holding powerful energy carbines, while the other two wield stun batons.

"Prisoners 1164a and 1164b. Follow us."

Beelzebub and Henry both nod. The guards handcuff their arms behind their backs, despite how useless doing so is to Beelzebub. After all, orders are orders. Then, they begin frog-marching them out of the cell and down the hall.

Hardly have they passed ten cells before Henry sees a familiar face also being led out of his cell. His heart jumps in shock.

"General Caddis?! You're down here too?"

Hardly have the words left his mouth before he wryly shakes his head.

"What am I saying? Of course you are."

As the man Neil Adams investigated and found responsible for disarming a large part of the Core's self-destruction devices, Caddis was placed in the prisons at the start of Stormbringer. His pale and gaunt face shows that the last month has not been kind to him.

"Tsk. It is me." Caddis snarls. "But I must say, little Henry. You were Neils' favorite sniper. I'm surprised to see you down here too. Guess you weren't acting suspicious during his investigation for no reason, hmm?"

Henry winces. "It's a long story."

"Pah! Save it for someone who cares!" Caddis spits, while the guards push him toward the exit.

Beelzebub and Henry travel into the elevator network and begin ascending to the top of the prison complex. After passing through more than a dozen security checkpoints, all manned by human and monster staff, they finally emerge into the open air, where they find several hundred prisoner transport buses lined up and waiting for them.

Outside, tens of thousands of demons and monsters, along with more than a few hundred humans, all stand idly with magic-suppressing collars wrapped around their necks. Their arms and ankles bound, these prisoners can only gaze up at the blinding midday sun, the first natural source of light some of them have seen in over a month.

Beelzebub winces when the sunlight hits his eyes. Back when he still possessed demonic powers, he could switch his vision between pitch-black darkness and blinding light with ease. But now, as a mere mortal man, he also suffers all the weaknesses of his human biology.

As Beelzebub and Henry wait their turns, they finally get a chance to look out and observe the distant housing developments under construction, as well as those recently completed. Despite his inferior human eyesight, Beelzebub can even make out the distant specks of human and monster figures milling about, heading to work or going about their days. The barren plains already seem to be sprouting traces of grass, showing their steady and gradual recovery from his detonation a month prior.

"Wow." Beelzebub murmurs. "The humans have developed incredibly fast since they captured me."

Henry turns to look at him. "What was that?"

"Nothing." Beelzebub says quietly. "I'm just admiring those buildings. It seems Tarus II has become quite prosperous."

"We went from complete annihilation to a massive city in under a month." Henry remarks. "Our people are resilient. We'll bounce back from anything. I never should have doubted our capabilities."

Beelzebub gives the young man a long, knowing look.

"Indeed."

* * *

The two men load up onto a bus. They begin driving south, toward a gigantic stadium built out in the middle of nowhere. This place will be the judgment and execution ground for the perpetrators of Stormbringer.

As they draw nearer, the evildoers who unleashed literal Hell upon humanity widen their eyes. Before them sits a veritable sea of humans, monsters, and demons all standing before gigantic, hundred-foot-tall viewscreens laid out in a circle around the exterior of the Tribunal Amphitheater. These screens display the arena itself, with its slowly filling seats for prisoners, as well as the central platform, where they will have to step up and plead their case.

Additionally, on the northern side of the stadium, thirty seats sit at the highest elevated position, each reserved for a high ranking member of the Wordsmith Alliance, including Jason Hiro himself, Phoebe Hiro, Monster Queen Blinker, Neil Adams, and dozens of others.

Beelzebub's expression remains neutral.

"...Truly, the Wordsmith has rolled out the red carpet for our day of judgment."

Henry's teeth chatter as the potential moment of his execution begins to loom over him.

"I... I never should have listened to her. Oh, god. Oh god... Piper, I miss you, boy..."

The buses come to a stop outside. Beelzebub and the other prisoners begin filing out onto a long walkway leading past a crowd of more than five million citizens, many of them holding signs, and all of them visibly enraged by the sight of the countless demonic bastards and traitorous snakes who killed their friends and family.

"Bloodskin scum!"

"Turncoat piece of shit!"

"I can't wait to see your heads fly! Every last one of you!"

"My children are dead, and it's all your fault!"

"Burn in HELL!!"

Horrible slurs, stinging insults, and vicious words metaphorically strike the faces of the demons and monsters and humans being led down the path into the stadium. Surprisingly, it's not even the demons who receive the most verbal abuse, but the human turncoats! Seeing only a few humans among the masses of red-skinned demons makes them stick out from the horde, drawing even more vicious criticism and hatred.

"Henry! Because of you, Neil Adams nearly died! I'd PAY to fire a round into your head myself!"

Henry winces when he sees another trooper, someone he once respected, standing on the sidelines screaming at him. He quickly lowers his head and tries to blend in, but his efforts don't bear much fruit.

Beelzebub wryly chuckles. "Cheer up. You'll be dead soon."

Henry glowers at him. "That's not helping, Robert."

They arrive inside the amphitheater, and their guards direct them to seats in the very front rows, on the southern side of the theater, directly opposite the Judge Seating Area. From this position, they have to crane their necks to look all the way up at the people who will soon cast their votes on the future, and their futures do not look pleasant.

"Fuck, man. Fuck. I'm so fucking scared..." Henry curses.

"I've accepted my fate." Beelzebub replies.

Jason Hiro and his wife arrive last to the Tribunal, nearly thirty full minutes after the other VIPs. Flying through the air via angelic wings, both of them pause their descent into the stadium to levitate over the crowds below, while millions of people cheer and cry out their names.

"Commander Jason!"

"Lady Phoebe!"

"Our genius and soldier duo!"

Phoebe faintly smiles. "You hear that? They called me a genius. They probably think you're a dummy, Jason."

She turns to look at her husband, only to see that Jason isn't smiling at all. Instead, his emotions appear rather muted.

"I'm not in the mood for jokes, Phoebe." Jason says. "Let's get this Tribunal over with. People are counting on us to conduct the event with fairness and decency."

Phoebe's smile fades away. "Yes. You're right. Sorry. We have to stay strong... and remember, it's not just about getting justice for the fallen, but for all their families left behind."

Jason nods. "We do this for Daisy's sake."

The Wordsmith and his wife fly into the theater toward the thirty seats of honor, seats reserved exclusively for those who will soon cast their votes for judgment against the killers and traitors who tore apart humanity during Stormbringer.

As they descend, Jason picks out all of the familiar faces in the seats.

Neil Adams, commander of humanity's military.

General Chadwick, who fought bravely until Stormbringer's conclusion.

Blinker, the Monster Queen who lost her husband.

Belial, who saved countless lives with her healing powers.

Archangel Uriel, who holds the souls of her three brothers in their rings.

Lady Brunhilda, whose Felorians used their power to contain the demons at the Warpgate Encampment for longer than anyone else.

But, in addition to these members of the Wordsmith Alliance, there are also several conspicuously placed Demon Emperors, none directly responsible for Stormbringer.

Serena, the Emperor of Soul Whispers.

Yardrat, Emperor of the Void.

Kristoff, the Emperor of Thirst.

Melody, the Emperor of Suppression.

Jahn, the Duke of Cuddles.

And finally, Silvia, the Duke of Whips.

These demons join the humans as judges, though Jason personally crinkles his nose at the thought.

"Why are we letting leaders of Hell interfere in our judgment?" Jason asks his wife, who set up the majority of these proceedings.

"Because." Phoebe responds. "If you want to maintain good relations with the demons, to show them there is a better path, we must try to at least appear impartial. I do not believe these Emperors will cause trouble for us, not when their interests intertwine with ours."

"And what if they do?" Jason asks. "What if they all vote in favor of releasing someone when we vote the opposite?"

Phoebe shrugs. "They only possess a minority of the vote. In the end, humanity's forces still get to choose who they let live and die. Any friction caused by opposing votes can be resolved with words."

"I hope you're right..." Jason mutters, before following up with "Speaking of which, Hope still isn't back. Where the hell is he? That motherfucker... he's up to no good, I can tell."

Phoebe's nose twitches. "Neil hasn't said anything to me."

Just as Jason and Phoebe touch down, an unexpected guest materializes before the two of them, startling both.

[Wordsmith.] Creator Demila says, gesturing to Hope's seat. [There appears to be a position vacant. Would you mind if I joined in on these proceedings?]

Jason stares at the 7th-Level Psion for a brief moment before grimacing.

"...Of course. Having a neutral third party... couldn't hurt. Just remember, you are on my planet."

Phoebe appears less miffed about Demila's appearance. "Why bother joining in on today's event? You don't have any skin in the game."

[I do not.] Demila affirms, her hawk-like gaze sweeping out across the field. [However. I am here to observe. Suppose Gressil were to attack? I might catch the Emperor of Chaos before he could flee.]

"You don't expect us to believe this has anything to do with Gressil, do you?" Jason asks snarkily.

[Believe what you wish. In truth, I suspect something... interesting... shall occur today. Perhaps it is nothing more than a feeling.]

Without waiting for Jason's response, Demila flickers backward and teleports into the empty seat, crossing her legs beneath her ornate black-and-red robes.

Sensing the conversation has ended, Jason suppresses the urge to roll his eyes. He takes a seat beside Neil, with the Commander on his left, while Phoebe sits on his right.

"You finally made it." Neil says, while looking out at the throng of prisoners. "I was beginning to think you might not show."

"Where's Hope?" Jason asks.

"I'm not his nanny. He's a Wordsmith. He goes wherever he pleases."

Demila, sitting on the opposite side of Neil, spreads her Psionic sense across the entire theater, but takes special care to pay close attention to the Wordsmith and his commander's conversation directly adjacent to her.

"You must know something." Jason hisses through his teeth. "Why hasn't he captured Mephisto yet? Or Yama?"

"Truly, Jason." Neil says, sounding surprisingly bored. "I've no idea what Hope is up to. Believe me if you want. Or don't."

Demila's expression remains impassive. However, with no effort at all, she plucks several thoughts out of Neil's primitive brain.

Strange. Demila thinks. The Military Commander truly doesn't know where the other Wordsmith has gone. Nobody does. I've searched the minds of hundreds of top personnel, yet he's nowhere to be found. Perhaps I should make a trip into the Labyrinth to seek him out, once this Tribunal concludes.

In the center of the arena, a massive minotaur strides onto the stage. Yamir, normally 'only' Jason's chef, wears a set of blood-red robes clearly designed with his species' aesthetics in mind. In his hands, he holds a familiar giant executioner axe, one which formerly belonged to Sir Lorent. Now expanded to its original size, the axe hums with divine energy belonging to the Hero whose soul is contained within.

"Braaaaum!" Yamir roars. "Everyone! Today marks the start of the Stormbringer Tribunal! This Tribunal is intended to bring justice to those victimized by the perpetrators of the Stormbringer attack!"

Outside the stadium, countless people whoop and cheer. Humans who lost their friends and family, monsters who fought valiantly during the war and also lost their closest companions, and even a surprising number of demons from the Seven Hells. Despite seeing their fellow demons threatened with executions en-masse, nobody bats an eye at these stupid losers who have no relation to them!

Considering the vastness of the Seven Hells, seeing a hodge-podge of low-ranking fools from the First Hell get executed only makes for an exciting show! The demons from the second, third, and other Hells merely laugh it up at the sad fates awaiting their fellow demons.

Jason Hiro stands up next. He walks to the edge of the platform and projects his voice out to the evildoers inside the stadium, as well as his citizens outside.

"In my era," Jason begins, "There was a concept known as 'innocent until proven guilty.' I believe in that theory of law. However! Every person inside this stadium has already been pre-judged as guilty by our investigators! We possess video evidence of each and every one of your crimes! The only thing awaiting you now is your sentencing!"

He pauses for a moment to gaze around at the despondent eyes of those-to-be-judged.

"Here is how today's proceedings will work. We will call up the name of an individual. That individual will step forward. We will present their crimes for everyone to see, and the perpetrator will have one chance to make an appeal. You can beg for pity, plead for mercy, or accept your sins. Say whatever you want! Just know this... death will await many of you, but an equal number will be sentenced to hundreds of years of slavery. You will toil in mines, producing resources for my people as penance for your crimes. None of you have any chance at walking free."

Jason gestures to the twenty-nine other people behind himself.

"These are your judges. Not only do they consist of humanity's leaders, but also esteemed representatives from the Seven Hells. So long as a majority of us agree, your sentence may be reduced, but it also may be increased! Pick your words carefully. Honesty and humility will get you far. Lies and excuses will receive only a swift and brutal death!"

Humanity's allies cheer raucously, practically frothing at the mouth as they excitedly wait for the proceedings to begin.

Jason sits back down and gestures to Yamir.

"You may begin."

"Yes, Wordsmith!" Yamir roars. "Today, the first to be accused! A Demon Grunt known as 'Paddock!'"

While Yamir calls out the name of the first prisoner, Jason glances at his wife.

Under his breath, he whispers, "Hey, honey? Not to be a bother but... there's kind of a lot of prisoners here. If we have to sentence these demons one at a time, aren't we going to be here for like... a million years?"

Phoebe rolls her eyes. "Don't you know I would have thought of that already? We'll start with certain individuals, yes. But we will also be judging large blocks of demons at the same time. It depends on their proximity to one another during the war. I've divided the demons into about three hundred individual 'sections'. At the end of the Tribunal, any who are to be executed will be killed at the same time."

She pauses to glower at her husband. "Didn't you read the memo I gave you?!"

Jason flushes red in embarrassment. "Sorry. I, uh... I was busy, and it was kind of long."

"You could have Wordsmithed the knowledge into your head or something." Phoebe chastises him.

"Oh. Yeah. I didn't think about that." Jason quietly laughs.

Phoebe sighs. She massages her forehead while wryly smiling at her husband.

"Sometimes, you are the biggest egghead."

Part 417: The Stormbringer Tribunal (Part 2)

"I was just following orders! You can't blame me! It's all Ose's fault for ordering us to attack the humans! I didn't even wanna go!"

The first Demon Grunt positioned atop the massive platform in the center of the Tribunal Stadium shivers and trembles nervously as millions of other prisoners and citizens on Tarus II watch him with sad or judgmental eyes. He defends himself in the weakest way possible, casting all blame for his actions onto the leaders of demonkind while claiming he had nothing to do with the crimes levied against him.

Yamir stands a short distance before the shackled prisoner, looking down at the little fellow with an expression of pity and dismay.

"Fool. You say you are not at fault for your heinous actions, but the evidence speaks to the contrary! Look at these recordings!"

Yamir gestures to a giant viewscreen placed directly adjacent to the Jury of Thirty, the humans, monsters, and demons who will cast their votes for punishment on all the perpetrators of Stormbringer.

The viewscreen shows a loop of this 'Paddock' fellow ripping out the throat of a trooper, right before her T-REX's recording functionality shuts off. Then it cuts to a different view of the same moment, taken from another T-REX's point of view, where he screams in delight, then launches into attacking even more humans. Ultimately, he kills two people and badly wounds three more, all with the help of other screaming and delighted grunts beside him.

"I was already there!" Paddock protests. "I'm a demon! It's not my fault I love violence! I was just making the best of a bad situation! You can't blame me for wanting to enjoy that, uh, traumatic moment!"

Yamir snorts in displeasure. He lightly slaps the shaft of Sir Lorent's executioner axe in his palm.

"Your excuses are pathetic. Now that the jury has heard your plea, they will cast down their judgment."

He steps aside, then looks up at the Jury of Thirty.

Each member of the panel is given the opportunity to stand up and deliver their verdict, along with any thoughts that might contribute to the discussion.

The first to stand is none other than Yardrat, Emperor of the Void. The fair and handsome Demon Emperor rises to his feet and folds his hands behind his back, while also directing a sweeping glance across the stadium.

"The times have changed." Yardrat says. "Rules which once were, no longer are. Paddock speaks from a place of ignorance. He was raised to believe that humans are inferior. He believes that violence is simply a way of demon life. Perhaps he was once right. But the true issue lies in his inability to take responsibility for his own actions. While Ose did order the attack on Stormbringer, if Paddock were to simply stand back and move passively, without directly killing or hurting anyone, merely blending in with the crowd, he could have resisted her orders in a way nobody would notice. In that case, we would not blame him for being forced to act against his will."

Yardrat continues. "But the truth is, Paddock enjoyed killing his victims. He reveled in their pain and suffering. While I understand his actions, and have certainly acted out my own share of violence, his inability to accept blame for what he had control over makes him guilty in my eyes. I posit that he is fully at fault for all the deaths he caused during Stormbringer and judge him to be deserving of death."

Yardrat sits back down, and Emperor Serena next stands.

"I agree with all of Yardrat's statements." Serena says. "I understand why you must want to blame others, Paddock. But in the end, your actions are your own. I judge you as guilty of all crimes."

When Serena sits down, Paddock's teeth begin to chatter. "H-hey! This isn't fair! You Emperors have killed way more humans than me! Why am only I down here? Just because I'm weak, I have to die, while you get to live it up? Don't you stinkin' humans see how screwed up this is?!"

Several prisoners in the audience nod and begin to shout along to Paddock's words, proclaiming their agreement with his words. However, a wave of Wordsmithing fires from Jason's mouth, as he rises to his feet.

"Silence."

Immediately, all the demon's protests catch in their throats, rendering them unable to speak.

Jason waits for a moment before answering. "If you think I am unaware of the evils and atrocities committed by the Emperors on this jury panel, you are wrong. I have currently set aside their punishments, as well as the those for their Dukes, and their Barons, and all the others. Anyone who previously attacked or killed humans, be it during the Energy Wars, before those times, or at any point before my awakening from that Cryopod six years ago... I am temporarily suspending their sentence."

He continues. "The difference between their past crimes, and the crimes committed by those of you in the audience today is that I have no direct evidence of what they've done. Even if I did, I think one could justifiably say that prior to and including the Energy Wars, humanity and demonkind were perpetually at war and both sides committed atrocities against one another. Following the Energy Wars, that argument holds less water, but the previous point still stands. It is only moving forward, if any further aggression occurs, that I will not show a drop of lenience."

Jason slants his eyes and looks behind himself at the other Emperors on the panel.

"In the future, should the demons commit any further acts of aggression against humanity... I will not hold back against anyone. Not the leaders, nor their followers. I do hope we can all come to a... peaceful resolution."

To conclude his speech, Jason opts to give his judgment regarding Paddock.

"The demons who attacked during Stormbringer must be punished. There is no escaping your sins. Worry not about the Emperors up here, but how you will properly plead your cases to the members of this jury. Paddock, I pronounce you guilty not only of your crimes, but of a failure to accept responsibility for them. The next jury member may now speak."

Jason sits down. Next comes Neil Adams. As expected, he pronounces Paddock guilty.

Then comes Phoebe Hiro. She, too, pronounces Paddock guilty, though her reasoning comes more out of a specific distaste for the individuals he killed, as Phoebe knew them personally, albeit in some small capacity.

One by one, every member of the panel gives their verdict. All of them pronounce him guilty.

All of them... except for one.

Emperor Belial surprises everyone by being the lone voice of dissent.

"I do not believe Paddock is guilty." Belial says. "He did kill those people. He is a murderer. And he has utterly failed to take responsibility for his actions. But Paddock makes a point that I cannot disagree with. I have never gone out of my way to kill humans, angels, or anyone else. My rank of Emperor was not obtained through the consumption of human souls, but the empowerment of an ancient dragon. As such, I have been able to hold a lofty position of privilege, one which other demons have never possessed, because their powers could only be obtained through slaughter."

She continues. "Paddock has been brainwashed, along with all the other lower members of my species, to believe that violence is their primary lot in life. If Paddock must be executed, that I posit that every demon above his station must also be executed. Perhaps, had he been raised with love and care, he might never have taken those horrible actions. He might have grown up to be a source of positivity in this cold, violent, brutal universe. I don't want to see anyone die... and I also hold a great deal of shame regarding this Tribunal."

Jason gazes at Belial. "Shame? What do you mean?"

"Isn't it obvious?" Belial asks, her voice projecting to everyone watching the proceedings. "I spent my whole life trying not to hurt others. Not to kill. Not to cause harm. But during Stormbringer, I lost myself in grief and hatred. I became a monster and killed... I don't even know how many of my fellow demons. I slaughtered them without restraint. I went berserk. Even if you claim that I was acting in self-defense, or on humanity's behalf... I still brutally ripped apart my lessers. I still committed terrible crimes."

Belial shakes her head.

"For that reason, I will give my judgment not only for Paddock, but for every other violent perpetrator and attacker of Stormbringer. I refuse to pronounce any of you as guilty... not even one person."

Belial's gaze seemingly flicks across the whole crowd. However, her hyper-enhanced Emperor-level vision pauses for the briefest of moments to fixate on a seemingly ordinary old man. One fellow, a 'human' sitting beside other humans.

Beelzebub.

She does not call him out, but does gaze at him with deep meaning, before concluding her speech.

"I only wish, after tens of thousand of years, that we might finally put an end to the cycle of violence. Nothing else matters to me."

She takes her seat, and the entire arena falls silent.

Outside, many humans, those who lost their friends and family, no longer cheer uproariously as they did only minutes before.

They think about Belial, her role as humanity's healer, and the number of lives she's saved.

They remember how she ran herself ragged during Stormbringer, healing tens of thousands of wounded soldiers, draining her mana until she was at the brink of death, only for the entire Hospital to end up destroyed by Yama's Shades, killing many of the people she saved.

They think about her rage and how she fought Ose, ultimately helping to murder humanity's greatest enemy, all at the cost of her own convictions.

And deep down... many people feel shame.

Plenty of Stormbringer's survivors want revenge. They wish to see the demons suffer just as badly as the people they tore apart.

But at the same time, an equal number of survivors can't help but wonder: Will there never be peace in our future? Is violence the only language we must speak?

Belial's proclamation doesn't change Paddock's judgment. He ultimately still ends up charged with the punishment of death and returned to his seat, where he now must await his execution at the Tribunal's conclusion. But what it does do is cause many to question the ultimate legitimacy of the Tribunal.

Even so, many people remain unmoved by Belial's speech. Neil Adams barely even looks at her, acting as if he didn't hear a word she said.

Succubus whore. Neil thinks. As always, she is all too eager to leap to the defense of her fellow demons. Her schemes truly run deep.

The next person up for trial is a tiny little Obsidian Goblin named Hungry. This fellow turns out to be a monster who was involved in the Stormbringer Attack from the very beginning, as he even participated in the attack on the Core, along with the subsequent invasion of Tarus II.

Hungry defends himself by making several similar claims to Paddock, but ultimately it is his lack of directly murdering any people which allows him to be sentenced to slavery in the Trifrancium mines for 300 years instead of death. As a tiny little goblin, he only assisted much larger creatures in pinning down their human enemies, rather than killing them himself.

It doesn't take long before whole groups of demon grunts, minotaurs, harpies, and other such creatures come on the stage platform to receive judgment all at once. Over the next eight hours, over fifty thousand demons and monsters join together with human traitors to receive their judgment. More than three quarters of them receive death sentences, while the rest all receive hundreds of years of slavery in the mines.

As the proceedings occur, Phoebe glances at her husband.

"I'm surprised you don't oppose enslaving these people, Jason. You've always said it was a barbaric act."

Jason shrugs. "I don't like it, no. But even the least guilty creatures here, those without direct blood on their hands, still assisted their brethren in killing our friends and families. 300 years of slavery might sound like a long time, but they will be allowed to go free once their sentences conclude, and most of them will live for thousands of years afterward. It amounts to a tiny fraction of their lives. Compared to those they killed, who can never again walk the mortal plane..."

Phoebe nods. "I'm just glad you're not feeling at odds with your morals. I already agree this is the best they deserve."

After concluding the judgment of slavery for a group of nearly 1200 demon grunts, the next person to take the stage is, surprisingly, a single demoness. A Duke, someone many people have only recently discovered was hiding a terrible secret.

"Mara, the Duke of Collection." Yamir says, as the demoness strides forward and stands before the Jury of Thirty, her expression solemn. "Today, you stand here guilty of killing over one hundred thousand civilians. These included men, women, and children. You attacked a Covenant Ship and destroyed it, reaping their lives. To date, we have only managed to recover just twenty percent of those lost souls, with the rest presumed consumed by other demons."

"Additionally," Yamir continues, "you attacked the Wordsmith's wife and daughter, nearly succeeding in murdering both. During that attack, you killed their honor guards, ending the lives of more than a dozen brave soldiers."

The massive viewscreen plays out the events of Mara's attacks, showing the destruction of the Covenant ship, as well as the subsequent attack on Phoebe and Daisy.

Seeing their daughter on the giant viewscreen, Jason and Phoebe's hearts tense up. They gaze at her face, wishing with all their souls that they could simply 'will' her back into existence. Not just them, but Belial as well, who feels deep guilt at being unable to stop Daisy from ultimately dying to Beelzebub's blast.

Mara hollowly watches as her past crimes play on the giant viewscreen.

"What say you in your defense?" Yamir asks, eying her coldly.

As Daisy's chef, Yamir used to cook the little girl food while she grew, taking great care to cater to her childish tastes and finicky attitude. He, too, feels terrible pain due to her death.

"My defense..." Mara mutters, her words transmitting to the arena. "I have none. What I did was unforgivable."

"Why did you kill the people on that ship?" Yamir asks. "Did Ose command you to do so?"

"No." Mara says, her next words eliciting gasps of rage from the human audience outside. "I did so only because the 'opportunity' presented itself. It was entirely my own choice."

"It is good that you accept responsibility for your actions." Yamir says. "But that fact will not absolve you of your punishment. I have only one question left for you. Why did you accept Miss Hiro's offer to empower yourself in the Belial Booster? Did you believe you deserved such a gift from the people you had so violently brutalized? Did you feel no shame?"

Mara's expression becomes even more downcast. "I... I didn't know what to do at the time. I couldn't bring myself to turn down the opportunity. I did feel incredibly guilty over my past actions... but I was also afraid of getting caught."

"It's too bad." Yamir says. "Many people thought you were a decent person. If you had simply owned up to your actions at the time, you might have received a lighter penalty. Now they are unlikely to show you leniency."

He turns to face the Jury of Thirty. "Your judgments?"

In the audience of bystanders outside, Mara's sister Ying-Ying bites her lower lip. She fights to hold back tears, all while wrestling over whether she should try and use her Warping powers to save Mara's life. Unfortunately, even if she does, she has no chance of hiding Mara from Jason's Wordsmithing. He will surely be able to track an escaped prisoner down and find her with little effort.

The first of the judges stands up to deliver their verdict.

Uriel, the Archangel of Retribution, completely ignores the Demon Emperors within striking distance of her fists. Despite wearing three rings of power and possessing more than enough strength to lash out and perhaps murder at least one or two demons before they can react, she acts with remarkable restraint, though for what reason, her enemies can only guess.

"My judgment is as follows." Uriel says, her feminine voice biting at the air with an unmistakably malicious edge. "All demons art sinners. All art worthy of death. But the degree between their sins varies. In Mara's case, her evils hath been aimed at the innocent; civilians who caused her no harm. In this regard, I believe that she deserves a fate worse than death, perhaps even eternal punishment."

The other Emperors stifle the urge to roll their eyes. While Belial has declared that she will judge no participant of Stormbringer as worthy of death, Uriel has acted in exactly the opposite manner. Not once has she made any exceptions for a single demon or monster put up for trial. She has declared a fatal judgment upon them all, the degree of their vicious acts notwithstanding.

Each Emperor stands up, followed by each human, and several monsters.

Blinker is the last to speak. Instead of remaining in her tiny fairy form, she maintains her inflated size of just over five-feet-tall, allowing her to stand at roughly the same height as all of the others, barring super-tall freaks like Jason.

"Mara. I judge you to be guilty." Blinker says quietly, her voice lacking any real enthusiasm. "The only punishment awaiting you is death."

Without going into any further detail, Blinker sits down. Her thoughts dwell not on any of the demons or humans she has judged so far, but just two individuals, two demons who were not successfully imprisoned. Mephisto and Zamiel still remain at large, and that fact causes her stomach to sink.

"You have been judged unanimously guilty, aside from Emperor Belial." Yamir says to Mara. "Your punishment will also be death. Go and take your seat."

Mara nods numbly, not expecting any other outcome. Her expression glum, she turns and walks away, sighing deep in her heart that her past has finally caught up to her.

After a few other groups of demons come and go, more than seventy-five percent of Stormbringer's participants finally receive their judgments, leaving them to cry or breathe quiet sighs of relief. However, those who remain are mostly the greatest offenders, the ones who caused the most damage, or the ones who previously held the greatest prestige.

Yamir turns to face the crowd of prisoners.

"Next is... a former General among humankind's forces. Bernard Caddis. Step forward."

A thin and wiry-looking man, gaunt from exhaustion and lack of proper nutrients, slowly stands up and hobbles toward the stage.

As he approaches, Neil Adams smirks coldly.

"Ah, finally. This bastard..."

He and the other humans direct hate-filled gazes toward the man whose betrayal nearly cost them everything, a man who could have given the demons a clean and easy victory had his plot succeeded.

Even Jason cannot help but glower at the man.

"Fucking Caddis." Jason remarks. "Let's hear what sorts of excuses he tries to make."

Part 418: The Stormbringer Tribunal (Part 3)

Bernard Caddis, formerly a General among humanity's military, and the third-highest ranking service-member after Neil and Chadwick themselves, stands at attention on the podium. His wiry-thin frame and sagging facial skin give him the appearance of a depressed man mere weeks from dying to stress. Several greys stick amidst the rest of his black hair. Even so, his pointed jawline and eagle-eyes make him appear surprisingly formidable, even while wearing a simple grey prisoner uniform.

He stands with his hands folded behind his back and his head held high. No trace of humility rests in his eyes, but instead the arrogance of a man convinced he has not made a single mistake.

"Bernard Caddis." Yamir says, standing before the man with his chest puffed out. "You have been judged guilty of high treason. You conspired with Emperor Ose to betray your people, disable the self-destruction sequence inside the Core, and other similar crimes. Now, only your sentencing remains. What say you in your defense?"

Humanity's former General maintains his fearless expression.

"So what if I'm guilty? I did what any reasonably intelligent man would do! Do you people truly think humanity is going to win this war? And even if we do, what about the next one? Or the one after that? Do you all think Wordsmithing is so high and mighty that it cannot be beaten? It already has! Many times!"

Jason gazes down at Caddis with mild indifference. He listens as the man continues to rant.

"I don't believe in the Wordsmith's leadership. I don't believe in Neil Adams. I don't believe any of you have the power to protect humanity! In the end, Ose managed to kill millions of people, and the Wordsmith only came in after the fact to clean up her mess! Some incredible power, my foot! Demonkind outnumbers humanity ten million to one! Even if we manage to defeat the demons, what does it matter anymore? We still have to contend with the Volgrim, and then a goddamned galaxy-devouring Plague. Faced with this reality, I opted to work for the winning side."

Neil Adams stands up. He walks to the edge of the platform and sneers at Caddis far below him.

"At least you are willing to honestly admit to your evils, Caddis. Though, I am curious. How can you blame me or the Wordsmiths for humanity's losses when people like you helped give demons the keys to attack Tarus II? Perhaps if we had held the demons back just a few hours longer, the Wordsmith would have returned with his superweapon and eradicated them right then and there. People like you are directly and indirectly responsible for much of that death and destruction!"

Jason frowns slightly. Despite Neil's 'defense' of Jason, the Wordsmith quickly realizes he has an ulterior motive for asking that question. Before he can interject, Caddis immediately responds.

"Do you believe that would have made the slightest difference, Neil? The only reason the Wordsmith lashed out is because his precious baby girl died. Prior to that, he merely reinforced our soldiers with feeble 'boosts' of healing and vitality. Our people fought bravely while he stuck to the backlines! The Wordsmith is a pathetic little boy who acts out when his emotions get the better of him. With him in charge, our future can't possibly look any gloomier!"

Neil's expression remains impassive, but for the briefest instant, Jason could swear he sees a smile twitch on the corner of his mouth.

Bastard! Jason shouts in his mind. Neil is... he's prodding Caddis to defame me!

The Wordsmith quickly stands up and shoots a mutedly hostile glare at Neil before turning his attention to Caddis.

"You don't know anything, Caddis. I was bringing a weapon back to Tarus II which was capable of annihilating the demons! Because of people like you, I lost precious hours that would have allowed me to turn our world into an impenetrable fortress. Once I obtained it, I became capable of constructing weapons that could even kill Ose, who had possessed Bael's body! Do you know how impossible that would have been previously?! Now, humanity is finally safe because of me!"

"Safe?!" Caddis shouts back, taunting the Wordsmith with his eyes. "If you hadn't spent six years playing 'house' with your wife and daughter, we could have built up TEN times the fortifications on Tarus II! We could have made this world impregnable. Even now, what defenses have you erected? What if while you were gone for two weeks on your little journey to suck the toes of the First Volgrim Founder, the demons had decided to lash out and attack us? They walk in our midst now! They have practically unfettered access to our systems!"

Caddis violently shakes his head. "I may have betrayed humanity to side with Ose, but you betrayed us six years ago when you failed to put up the necessary measures to protect our lives! If you didn't want people feeling so unsafe they would consider joining the demons, perhaps you should have done more to alleviate our fears! To you I say... piss off! All those who died during Stormbringer died because of YOU! Including your little brat."

Jason begins to seethe with rage under the surface. He forces himself to remain calm, even as his mind spins with several realizations.

Caddis isn't just making wild claims. How could he have learned all the details of the Volgrim and the Plague while he was in prison? Someone must have told him those facts! Hell, I only found out myself just a few days ago!

The Wordsmith's eyes flick to Neil, who continues to stare down at Caddis, as if unaware of the 'implications' behind Caddis's words.

Neil fed Caddis the information. He's turned the man into a mouthpiece for his ideology so he can broadcast unsubstantiated claims out to all the people! He's trying to undermine me!

The Wordsmith quickly pieces together the conspiracy. In less than a second, multiple realizations hit him at once, making him realize that Neil has no interest in 'punishing' Caddis when he could simply use the man to increase his own power and influence.

Furthermore, Caddis's repeated jabs at Jason's daughter only infuriate the Wordsmith further, making it difficult for him to retain his composure.

"Now, now." Neil says, in an annoyingly soothing voice. "The Wordsmith did the best he could with his limited war-time experience, Mister Caddis. Do not denigrate our great Hero by slandering him. The man loves his family; is that not a praiseworthy thing in this era of demonic degeneracy?"

Neil's slimy tongue worms out several half-praises to the Wordsmith, but these come off more as sounding preachy to Jason's ears.

"I may not have done a perfect job," Jason protests, barely containing his rapidly building anger, "but I still built many embattlements capable of shelling our enemies from a distance! My wife also fought like hell on the frontlines to protect humanity. If the only thing I cared about was protecting my immediate family, don't you think I'd have gone to great lengths to ensure no harm could befall her? Mara nearly killed my wife!"

"That's only more proof of your incompetence!" Caddis shouts back. "If your magic can't protect your precious little girl, and if it can't even protect your wife, how is it going to protect ALL of humanity?! You're a useless leader, and an even more useless Hero!"

Phoebe jumps out of her seat. "Watch your mouth, Caddis! For a traitor like you to slander not only humanity's Hero, but its military commander and me as well, you truly have some guts! I'm sorry Jason isn't perfect. Truly, I am! But that just means he's human! Every human has their vices. Jason's flaw is a lack of planning, but yours is cowardice and enough bluster to inflate a hot air balloon!"

Neil flicks his eyes to Phoebe, then quickly reorients his gaze back to Caddis.

"Yes, yes. Exactly. There is no point in criticizing us when your crimes are so much worse. Now then, I think it's about time we all passed down your judgment, yes?"

Neil smiles politely, but in Jason's eyes, the expression appears dastardly, if not outright insidious.

"Here is my judgment. One thousand years of slavery in the mines. In light of your past work for humanity, and the fact that your betrayal ultimately did cost any lives directly, I think death is a bit too much for you. Perhaps after a millennia slaving in the mines, you will come out a much humbler and more world-weary individual."

He turns to Jason. "And what does our esteemed Wordsmith think Caddis's punishment should-"

At that moment, something unexpected occurs.

Bernard Caddis's head implodes.

As if crushed by an unseen machine, the former General's skull collapses in on his brain, reducing both to meat-paste. His body slumps slightly, then flops to the ground, without a drop of life left in it.

"What?!" Phoebe gasps. "Oh... oh my god!"

Jason quickly turns from Neil to look at the unexpected corpse left laying on the arena center. "Jesus fucking Christ! What the hell?!"

Neil's pupils shrink to pinpricks. He stares in shock at the corpse below, then whips his attention back to the Wordsmith. "Jason! What in the name of God are you DOING?!"

"Me? ME?!" Jason roars back, still shocked by the sudden and unexpected death of Bernard Caddis. "Why are you blaming me?! Someone get down there and search the area!"

"Don't play innocent!" Neil shouts. "You... you killed Caddis! With your Wordsmithing! How could you?! This is supposed to be a fair and upright Tribunal!"

"The fuck I did!" Jason exclaims, taking a menacing step toward Neil. "You're trying to set me up! What, after feeding information to the prisoner, did you put a fucking BOMB in his head too?!"

"I did nothing of the sort!" Neil protests. "Don't act as if a single whisper from your lips couldn't kill anyone in existence!"

The two men begin loudly berating one another, while Phoebe jumps in between them. Meanwhile, Belial leaps from the jury panel to the ground below, then rushes to Caddis's side. As she arrives, she momentarily detects a strange feeling in the air, but it quickly dissipates.

Hm? What was that?

Unsure what she just felt, Belial ignores it, then takes a knee beside the gruesome sight of Caddis's corpse. She quickly investigates his wounds, then frowns deeply.

This isn't just an implosion. His skull was physically crushed by something. Did Jason really kill Caddis from afar? Or was it...

Belial's frown deepens. She glances back at the jury panel from the corner of her eyes. She scrutinizes the other Emperors, but her gaze ultimately falls on the one unexpected visitor, the lone representative from Volgarius.

Creator Demila.

At that moment, words materialize inside Belial's head.

[Watch where you point your gaze, Emperor Belial.] Creator Demila says in secret. [Do not think that I am incapable of detecting the suspicion in your thoughts. I am not responsible for killing that mud-dweller.]

[You aren't?] Belial asks, knowing only Demila can easily read her mind. [Then do you know who did?]

[I do not.] Demila answers. [However, I can read the thoughts of everyone here except for a few special individuals. The Wordsmith is one of them.]

[Are you implying Jason killed Caddis with Wordsmithing?] Belial asks.

[I would have heard any words whispered under his breath.] Demila replies. [The Wordsmith cast no magic through his unique means. Most likely, the true culprit is...]

She pauses, allowing Belial to draw her own conclusions.

The Emperor of Passion stands up. Her heart turns to ice as she realizes a horrifying possibility.

While Jason and Neil publicly shout at one another and Phoebe tries to butt in and calm them down, the Emperors watch this display with a hint of amusement.

"This is why human empires always fall." Yardrat mutters, chuckling under his breath. "They're always plotting against one another, even with enemies at their door."

Serena sighs. "You act as if demons are not the same."

Belial leaps back atop the jury platform. She forcibly shoves Neil and Jason aside, sending them falling onto their butts.

"Both of you, knock it off."

She shoots a glare at Neil for starting the mud-slinging, then wryly shakes her head.

"Neither of you killed Caddis. The true culprit is... Gressil."

"Gressil?" Jason asks in bewilderment. He stands back up and looks at Belial in confusion. "How do you know?"

"Well. I don't know for sure..." Belial says, suddenly realizing she brought no proof. "But we know he's at large. It must have been him."

"Lies!" Neil protests, while also pulling himself back to a standing position. "Where's your proof? Did you detect any of Gressil's 'Chaos Energy'?!"

Belial sets her jaw. "I did not. But... I examined Caddis's body. His head was physically crushed by someone's hands. It had to be Gressil."

"The hell it did." Neil says. "Do you expect us to believe Jason couldn't mimic such an action with his magic? The only thing you've proven is that I am most certainly NOT at fault! If I had planted a bomb in Caddis's bloody skull, it would have exploded outward, not imploded inward! Jason must have quietly killed him for insulting his dead daughter!"

Phoebe frowns. "If we're throwing random accusations around, there are other potential culprits who would benefit from turning humanity against each other. For example, Creator Demila here..."

Creator Demila silently blinks all eight of her eyes. [It is true that I possess some small measure of motive to foment distrust among you mud-dwellers. However, I am not the one who killed that gnat. Such a cowardly act is beneath my dignity. I slay my enemies proudly, on the field of battle.]

"Another culprit could be Mephisto." Phoebe points out. "Jason's magic can't track the Emperor of Legions, and we know he can turn completely invisible after his ascension. He'd also benefit from killing Caddis..."

Belial glances back at Caddis's body.

There was that strange sensation of energy I felt. Was that leftover Wordsmithing magic? Demila's psionic remnants? Mephisto's ethereal form slipping away? Or perhaps Gressil's Chaos Energy? I... can't be entirely sure.

Jason manages to calm himself down. He takes several deep breaths, then utters a Word of Power. "Analytical. Let me look at this event from another perspective."

After clearing his mind, the Wordsmith's emotions completely reset to zero. He shifts his mindset artificially, allowing himself to view the situation from an outside observer's perspective.

"Replay. Visualize."

Jason aims his magic at the area around Caddis's body. To everyone's shock, Caddis seemingly leaps up from the ground and his head materializes back on his shoulders. However, they quickly realize this is merely a spiritual illusion. Jason manipulates the image to replay the moment of Caddis's death, showing his head being crushed as if by an invisible hand.

However, no matter what other words Jason utters, he fails to materialize any further details around that moment, making him and all the observers frown.

Neil assumes a more dignified posture and opts to fold his hands behind his back. "How do we know you're not altering these... spirit-recordings?"

"Because this whole event is being recorded and broadcast outside." Jason replies. "Also, my apologies to any parents if their children saw that. It happened unexpectedly."

While Jason tries to deduce what happened to Caddis, Archangel Uriel stands up and walks to a spot directly beside Creator Demila's chair.

"Thou hath observed certain important details, Volgrim." Uriel says. "Surely, if the culprit art Gressil, thou shoulds't be quite eager to hunt him down. Yet here thou dost sit, uncaring."

Demila glances at the Archangel. [If the culprit was truly Gressil, then I am unable to detect him. I have already scanned the vicinity with my abilities, yet I have found nothing of a magical origin lurking unseen.]

"Do not think me a fool." Uriel says, lowering her voice while pulling herself down to Demila's level. "Thou hath not come here to sight-see. Thy intentions art sinister at best."

Demila casually waves a hand. [Begone, undying creature. I've no words to spare for a primordial horror.]

Uriel continues to stare at her for a moment, then silently spins on her heel and returns to her seat.

Over the next twenty minutes, Jason continues trying to uncover the true culprit responsible for Caddis's death, but he ultimately gives up. He and Phoebe sit back down while a crew of service-members place Caddis's corpse on a stretcher and whisk him away. Jason cleans up the arena with a Word of Power, then 'Normalizes' himself back to his usual self.

Neil no longer sits beside the Wordsmith. Instead, as if 'fearing' Jason will murder him, he moves several seats to the right, opting to sit beside General Chadwick, all while continuing to cast suspicious glances at Jason from the corner of his eye.

After everything settles down, Phoebe chews her lip. She speaks in a quiet voice. "Jason. You didn't... you didn't actually kill Caddis, did you?"

"Of course not!" Jason softly exclaims. "Why would I even do that? Don't tell me you doubt me, too?"

"Not exactly." Phoebe says. "I just wanted to hear it from your mouth. I'm just not sure who did. There are several possibilities, and none of them are pleasant. We need to get that anti-Gressil device up and running as soon as possible."

"Could Neil have done the deed?" Jason inquires. "Like he said, if he had put a bomb in Caddis's head, it would have exploded outward..."

"Unless it was a singularity bomb." Phoebe mutters. "During the attack on the Core, our soldiers deployed grenades that could devour biological matter via nanites. It's something Hans worked on. A friend of a friend told me Hans might be working on something new... a micro-singularity could theoretically implode a person's head. But you'd need to surgically install it right in the center of his brain... who here is even capable of brain surgery?"

Jason watches as the people on the platform below finish cleaning up Caddis's remnants. With Caddis's soul now entering humanity's Lazarus Tower, they will certainly get a chance to question him later.

"Well. You could always just shove the bomb in there if it's small enough, because now we have a demon fellow who specializes in healing brains. Remember? Belial works with him."

"Right. Leeroy, the Duke of Restoration." Phoebe says. "Hmm... if it's him... but then again, Neil hates demons. Can you see him working with one of Belial's subordinates? This conspiracy is getting a little out of hand."

Jason nods. "Something's gotta give. Someone killed Caddis right in front of ten million people. It's like the fucking JFK shooting all over again."

Phoebe raises an eyebrow. "Who's JFK?"

"Uhh... a really famous politician-guy from my era..." Jason awkwardly explains, while remembering his wife doesn't know many nuances of the eras following her enslavement at Bahamut's claws. "He got shot through the head. He was in a car in like a parade, or something. I don't know the details, other than that there were a bunch of conspiracies saying the CIA and FBI conspired to kill him. Also something about a grassy knoll..."

"CIA? FBI?" Phoebe repeats. "I can't tell if these are acronyms for people, places, or things."

The Wordsmith smiles and squeezes his wife's hand. "Never mind. It's not important. All that's important is that we try and figure out who killed Caddis and why. Someone is trying to tear humanity apart, and we can't let them. Maybe we can interrogate Caddis after we bring him back. He might know who killed him."

"Yeah." Phoebe says, smiling back at Jason. "Maybe he will."

Before long, the Tribunal continues. This time, one of the last major offenders of Stormbringer steps out onto the stage, a young man visibly terrified that he might be facing slavery at best and execution at worst.

Phoebe's expression softens.

"Henry... look at him. He's so scared, Jason."

"He does look rather pitiful." Jason murmurs. "If he can offer a good justification... maybe we should consider pardoning him. After what happened to Caddis, we could use some levity."

"That's a good idea, honey." Phoebe smiles. "I've always gotten along well with little Henry."

"As have I." Jason replies.

Off to the side of the Jury Panel, Neil Adams and Magnus Chadwick observe the proceedings with heavy hearts.

"I can't believe you killed Caddis." Chadwick murmurs. "I didn't think you had it in you, Neil."

"I didn't kill the blasted fellow." Neil hisses softly. "He still had his uses. I already made a deal with him. In exchange for stirring up trouble with the Wordsmith, I'd get him sentenced to the mines, then quietly slip him out after a few months. Nobody would know what happened to him."

Chadwick frowns. "Then... did the Wordsmith kill him?"

"How should I know?" Neil retorts. "In that instant, I simply flung out an accusation to trip Jason up. He probably didn't, but as long as people think he's a threat, that still advances our 'Cause.'"

Chadwick shifts his body weight while casting an uneasy glance around. Knowing there are several sharp-eared Demon Emperors nearby, as well as a mind-reading Psion, he can't help worrying whether or not someone will overhear their conversation.

"If you didn't kill Caddis, and if the Wordsmith didn't… then who in the blazes did?"

Part 419: The Stormbringer Tribunal (Part 4)

Private Henry, a young man from one of humanity's liberated worlds, finds himself on a stage where only minutes earlier, one of his commanding officers died in a horrific, brutal, frightening manner. As the eyes of millions of people fall on him, Henry begins to shake and tremble. The strength in his knees fades, leaving him ready to buckle. At only twenty-two years old, Henry is only a few years younger than the Wordsmith himself, though he appears far younger due to Jason's artificial appearance-alterations.

Henry's short-cropped black hair sticks to his sweaty forehead. Drops of perspiration slide down his face, making him appear a sorry sight. His arms remain bound behind himself, preventing him the dignity of even wiping away his sweat with a sleeve. His teeth chatter. His vision wavers as he tries not to hyperventilate from anxiety.

Seeing the pitiful state of the young man before him, Yamir eases up on his usual routine. He does not broadly gesture with Lorent's butcher axe, nor does he speak in a loud and boisterous tone. Instead, he walks over and gently rests an arm on Henry's shoulder.

As long-time friends, the two have fought and trained together on many occasions. Henry was among the first of the people saved by Hope and Neil, a young recruit with a lot of potential who Yamir admired.

"Henry..." Yamir says. "Calm down. It will be okay. You have already been been judged and proven guilty of abandoning Commander Neil to the Balrog. By closing the portal right before the Core's self-destruction, you all but guaranteed his death would be swift, and it was only a lucky break that saved his life. In the end, Neil did survive, and nobody else died as a result of your actions. Perhaps if you plead your case well, this jury may lighten your sentence."

Henry shivers in fright. He looks into Yamir's eyes with a pleading gaze. "They... they might?"

"Of course. The Wordsmith is a compassionate man, and so is Lady Phoebe, Lady Blinker, Lady Samantha, and many others present. Go on, then. Give the jury your honest thoughts."

Perhaps due to Yamir's calm and soothing tone of voice, Henry manages to push down some of his abject terror and turn a weak gaze toward the thirty humans, demons, monsters, and even an Archangel and a Psion above him. This disparate group listens as the young man shakily starts to speak.

"E-everyone… I… I am so sorry…"

Tears well up in Henry's eyes as he struggles not to break down in front of millions of people.

"…I don't know what I was thinking. Ose came to me, but… but she took the appearance of a beautiful woman… a beautiful human woman… I thought she was like a spirit, or maybe a ghost… I don't know exactly…"

"When my friend Piper died six years ago to Beelzebub's attack, I was so sad, and so bitter… every day I felt depressed and suicidal, but Miss Oshina- sorry, Ose… Ose was always there for me, helping comfort me…"

"And then she started telling me these little things that bugged me at first, but I came to accept them as truth. She told me Jason was actually an enemy of humanity and a friend to the demons, and that he and Hope and Neil were working together, and that I should be ready to act if their efforts threatened humanity…"

Henry speaks at length for over ten full minutes without interruption. Several people in the audience, as well as the jury members, listen silently while he pours out his heart and explains the factors that led to his ultimate betrayal of Neil.

Even Neil himself doesn't seem to hate the kid. He smiles at times and chuckles wryly, though what thoughts run through his head, only he and the lone Psion can know.

"Commander Neil…" Henry says, his throat tight and his voice choked, "…I am so sorry for what I did. I fell for that evil demoness. I let her trick me, and I nearly killed you. I… I don't want to die… but I know what I did was wrong… I only ask for mercy! I know I don't deserve it… but please…"

If his hands weren't bound behind his back, Henry might fall to his knees and pray to Neil right on the spot. Sadly, he canot, and so, he opts instead to bow his head in as reverential a manner as possible.

On the jury platform above, Neil sighs deeply. Seeing the promising young man below, Neil does feel more than a hint of bitterness toward Henry's betrayal, but he also recalls all the times in the past six years when Henry's gunmanship allowed him to snipe demons off the backs of his comrades, saving dozens of lives along the way.

Slowly, Neil stands up and walks to the edge of the platform. He pauses at the guard-rail and clears his throat.

"Henry. Perhaps, more than anyone else here, I should hold the most say over your punishment or lack thereof. It was me who you directly betrayed. I... resent you for what you did. But thinking back on that day, it was a confusing time for many of us."

Neil pauses for half a breath.

"I wish to ask you some questions. Would you be willing to answer truthfully?"

Henry raises his head. "Questions? Yes. Yes! I will answer anything you ask, Commander Neil!"

"Good. You're a good child." Neil says. "First. Do you remember when I interrogated you, Caddis, General Chadwick, Corporal Hurent, and Lieutenant Samuel?"

Henry quickly nods. "Of course! That was when Caddis had betrayed us to sabotage the Core's detonators."

"I knew you wouldn't forget." Neil says. "You appeared visibly nervous during that conversation. At the time, I chalked up your nerves to some unknown circumstances, but in hindsight, had you already taken to betraying me ahead of time?"

Henry's expression falls. "No, sir. Not... not exactly. It's just... when you were talking about various topics, I started to feel guilty in my heart, because..."

He pauses.

"...well, I'm not entirely sure why. I always believed I was on humanity's side, but perhaps Ose's words had already made me suspicious of my own motives."

Neil strokes the sides of his mouth, hiding a sly smile from everyone's gazes. He quickly returns his face to a neutral expression.

"Yes, I believe you when you say you were confused at the time. These demons... they can be quite sly in how they speak. No doubt, Ose preyed upon your vulnerabilities, your thoughts, your motivations... it's just more proof you cannot trust demons and take them at their words. They can corrupt even the most innocent of minds."

Behind Neil, several Demon Emperors glance at each other. They easily see through his ploy, making some of them frown while others chuckle wryly.

"The balls on this human." Emperor Fae snorts. "I do like a man who speaks his mind!"

"He is using his words to influence the thoughts of those who hold doubts." Emperor Serena says quietly. "Neil Adams is not someone we should underestimate. There are many people who are ambivalent toward demons, neither trusting nor distrusting us. But his words... they have the power to sway minds."

Emperor Kristoff, having been silent up to this point, shakes his head wryly. "As an ancient philosopher once said, the pen is mightier than the sword. Neil's tongue is certainly sharper than most blades."

Neil continues to question Henry. He asks Henry about how long Ose manipulated him, whether or not Henry performed any other betrayals or sabotages, and finally, Neil turns to look at someone unexpected.

"Creator Demila. You are a Psion, someone of far greater standing than us lowly humans, yes? Are you able to read the thoughts of young Henry?"

Demila turns to look at Neil with a hint of bemusement.

[Indeed, I can.]

"Then would you be so kind as to tell the jury whether or not Henry has spoken any lies?" Neil asks.

Demila slowly blinks. [How do you know if you can trust my words? Whether I say he is lying or not, perhaps I will speak with an ulterior motive, intending to press a wedge between your distinct human factions.]

"Yes, perhaps you will." Neil nods. "But you are an emissary of the mighty Volgrim Empire. I do not believe you would stoop to such depths when you could easily crush the bodies of every person here through your unique powers."

Demila's mouthless face shifts, perhaps into an expression resembling a Volgrim's smile.

[I did not expect you of all people to be willing to place such trust in me. You are an interesting mud-dweller, Neil Adams. In a way, you remind me of my First Founder.]

She turns her head toward the young man in the center of the stage.

[The human known as Henry spoke no lies. He did not betray humanity in any other discernable way that I could tell. However, beyond surface-levels thoughts, I am unable to read any deeper. I am not as accomplished in the mental arts as some of my colleagues.]

"You aren't?" Neil asks.

[No. I am considered a Class II Telepath. There are five classes in total. The highest ranks can effortlessly rewrite the thoughts of weak-minded individuals and turn them into permanent slaves. As for myself, I focus mostly on reconnaissance. My abilities are tailored on broad observation, allowing me to survey entire star systems with ease.]

The Psion slowly blinks.

[As for your thoughts of potentially hiding information from me now that you know of my 'weakness,' do not bother, Neil Adams. I have already collected more information than you can possibly imagine.]

Neil's smile becomes a tad more forced. He stifles a grimace, then awkwardly nods.

"...Right. Well, I thank you for your assistance, Creator Demila. Forgive me for my primitive impulses."

[All beings wish to obtain greater benefits for themselves.] Demila says, her words projecting into the minds of every observer. [You are merely looking out for yourself, as would any other form of somewhat intelligent life. This is the natural order.]

A few moments pass as Neil digests Demila's words. He finally turns to look at Henry on the platform below.

"I have made my decision. Henry, you committed a great crime against me personally. However, I do not wish to see a young life snuffed out due to the deception of a demonic temptress. In the end, I survived, and you learned a valuable lesson. Therefore, my judgment is as such: I believe you should go free, but you may never again step foot in humanity's military ranks. You will forever be an ordinary civilian with a black mark on your record."

Henry's heart sinks at this judgment, but at the same time, it soars into the heavens!

"You're... you're forgiving me, Commander? Truly?"

Neil shakes his head. "I am not forgiving you. I am understanding you. You did try to kill me, but I no longer believe you were at fault. The Henry I met six years ago was a cute, innocent young man who would not do such a thing. While I am going to give you the right to re-enter human society, I will not allow you to rejoin my military. You have lost that privilege."

Henry nods. His expression dims somewhat, but he quietly accepts his lot.

"...Thank you, Commander Neil. I'm sorry I... disappointed you."

Neil turns to look at the humans and demons behind himself.

"I have issued my verdict. What about the rest of you?"

Jason looks at Phoebe. The two of them don't need to say a word, but they know well what Neil's true ploy is. He successfully turned Henry's judgment into a moment to proselytize about how evil the demons are, and his forgiveness of Henry only serves to show just how 'kind' and 'forgiving' he is.

The Wordsmith's stomach churns. In matters of deception, Neil is far, far above me.

"I agree with your judgment." Phoebe says. "If you are willing to show mercy to Henry, then so am I."

Jason nods. "And I as well."

"I always liked Henry." Belial chimes in. "He's not a perfect kid, but he has a good heart. He deserves a second chance."

"Henry was one of Kar's good friends." Blinker says quietly. "I agree with Neil's judgment."

One by one, all of the humans and monsters agree with Neil. When the Demon Emperors get their turn, they also perfunctorily agree, not that they really give a damn about the fate of one random nobody.

Eventually, the final vote falls to Uriel. Of all the people present, she has been the most consistent voter aside from Belial. She has always punished demons with death and spared humans, giving them the punishment of slavery.

This time, though, she does not act as she usually does.

"I believe the boy should be put to death." Uriel says, startling the others. "He collaborated with the enemy. An example must be made of him. Whether he is an ignorant youth or not, I care not. Those who collaborate must die. They will always return to their cowardly ways."

She glances at the shocked expressions of the humans around her.

"Dost my words offend thee? Take heed: This boy will return to his wicked ways. Whether in the near or far future, 'tis certain to occur. I have watched as many a bastard begged for forgiveness, only to turn around and plunge a dagger into the back of their benefactor."

She shakes her head.

"My vote will not change his fate. But take heed! This Henry is a snake in the grass. He must never again be trusted to perform any duty."

Jason sighs. "We know that, Uriel. As per Neil's decree, Henry will never again serve in our armed forces."

"Mmm. I pray that will be enough." Uriel says, before taking her seat once again. Her angelic beauty, a façade created to make her appear as she did tens of thousands of years ago, serves to hide the truth that she is merely a possessor of Barbatos's body. Her beauty also serves to give her words slightly more credence, making the rest of the jury look at Henry with thoughtful expressions.

After the voting concludes, Henry gives his profuse thanks, then steps off the podium to sit back in the crowd. He turns to the funny old man, 'Robert', and wryly smiles.

"Well. They let me off. Maybe you'll get lucky too, grandpa."

Robert, also known as Beelzebub, directs a look at the kid sitting beside him.

"Oh, I doubt that very much."

Up next comes another large group of people. These turn out to be the saboteurs who took over the Atlas Cannon during Stormbringer, as well as a couple of people who worked to assassinate Elder Skarde during Stormbringer. Sadly, his soul ended up devoured by Mephisto, and he was unable to revive inside the Lazarus Tower.

The looks of mercy and forgiveness people directed at Henry vanish in an instant. When they mentally compare his crime with that of the murderous saboteurs on the stage now, they truly realize just how fair Henry's forgiveness was. At least, unlike these monsters, Henry didn't directly kill anyone!

Phoebe is the first to stand up and pass her judgment.

"You lot are bastards, through and through. Your actions shattered the barrier my husband put up. The shattering of Jason's Barrier opened up Hero City to attack, allowing Beelzebub to slip inside! It was because of you he was able to tear through the underground section of the barrier and arrive in the middle of our city! Millions died as a result of your actions... and I deem you among the worst of all the Stormbringer sinners!"

Phoebe pronounces a declaration of death upon these people. Jason stands up, and he too proclaims that they deserve to die.

Neil, Blinker, Uriel... all of these individuals join the Wordsmith and Phoebe to cast down terrible judgment upon Stormbringer's second-most-hated individuals after Beelzebub himself. Vicious words pour from their hearts as they call down figurative fire and brimstone upon those who seized control of the Atlas Cannon.

Not only did the saboteurs shatter Jason's shield, but they also launched an attack that directly killed five thousand human soldiers on the western front!

The group of ten or so survivors hang their heads in shame. The gamble they took, that Ose would save them when the demons seized Tarus II, ends up failing them completely, leaving them no room to defend themselves.

Finally, the last vote comes down to Belial. Despite the fact that her one vote cannot change these people's fates, everyone turns to her, waiting to hear what sort of a defense she will issue in regard for the sanctity of their lives.

However, Belial does not issue her usual declaration.

Instead, she looks down coldly at the small, pathetic-looking vermin on the stage. Her eyes narrow as she directs an icy glare their way.

"I... I truly hate all of you." Belial says, hissing her words through clenched teeth. "Coming to this Tribunal, I was ready to forgive anyone. I hate death. I hate violence. I want nothing more than for peace to spread throughout the whole galaxy."

She clenches her trembling fists at her side.

"But... but you took my niece from me. All of you, and Beelzebub, too. You killed that precious little girl. I hate you in a way I cannot put into words. Even more than I hate you,

I hate myself too! I hate that I was unable to protect Phoebe's daughter. The guilt eats me up every moment of every day!"

Belial's demonic vision flicks across the faces of these ten saboteurs, those who survived and weren't cut down by the Atlas Cannon's internal security. She easily perceives every wrinkle on their faces, every eye-twitch, every subtle motion of their irises.

"I just want to know..." Belial whispers, her words transmitting to the audience. "...do you feel guilt, too? Do you wake up every day sick to your stomach? Do you look in the mirror and wish that you had never been born?"

The expressions on the faces of the saboteurs are all the answers she needs.

"Because I do." Belial concludes. "And I now give my final judgment. I sentence you all to death. If you see my niece in the afterlife, I hope she spits in your face. Not that she would. She was better than all of you."

Belial turns and heads back to her seat, leaving everyone in the audience stunned!

Nobody expected that Belial would so hatefully rescind her prior statements of forgiveness for all the accused in such a manner. Her words serve to reinforce just how vile and hateful their crimes truly are.

At the same time, Phoebe looks back at her friend. "Sammy..."

"I meant what I said." Belial says quietly. "I feel... no regrets."

The condemned turn and leave the stage, a cloud of darkness hovering over their heads. None of them receives a drop of mercy, not even from Tarus II's kindest and most loving individual.

After they depart, Yamir clears his throat. He stands up a little straighter and turns to face the audience.

"Everyone. You have all received your judgments. Some of you have been penalized with death, others slavery, and only one has been set free."

He pauses to look at Henry, then continues.

"However. There is still one final person who has yet to be judged. We have kept his existence a secret until now. Even the guards at the prison did not know his true identity..."

Henry listens intently to Yamir's words. As the minotaur speaks, Henry's expression gradually shifts to one of confusion.

"That's odd. Grandpa Robert, you haven't even gone up there yet. Who the heck is Yamir talking about? Surely, it's not you, right?"

He laughs to himself at the absurd notion, but when he turns to look at the kind old man beside him, he finally notices the stone-cold expression frozen on Robert's face.

"...Grandpa? Wait, are you actually going up there last?"

Beelzebub directs a hollow glance at the young man beside him. He chuckles lifelessly.

"Enjoy your life, Henry."

Yamir finishes his pronouncement, then directs his attention to the old man sitting beside Henry.

"...that fellow is sitting right here. In the prison, his given name was 'Robert.' However, that is not his true identity. 'Robert,' please step forward."

Beelzebub sighs. He slowly rises to his feet, then begins walking down the aisle to his side, while several people direct curious gazes his way.

Hungry, the Obsidian Goblin who attacked the Core, nudges a different goblin beside him. "Hey, who the heck that guy? He look kinda familiar, yeah??"

The other goblin shrugs. "Dunno. All fleshies look same to me."

Beelzebub arrives at the bottom of the platform, then he steps up onto the podium, his seemingly simple appearance belying his true nature underneath.

"Would you like to introduce yourself? Or should I?" Yamir asks.

The Duke of Inferno sighs for the umpteenth time today.

"I'll do it."

He slowly sweeps his head across the Demon Emperors gathered above, those who look at him with curious gazes, as well as the grim and expectant faces of Neil Adams, Blinker, Uriel, Jason, and Phoebe.

"My name... is Beelzebub." He says, his voice projecting to the audience. "I am the one who attacked humanity. I am the one who killed... millions."

The crowd goes berserk.

Part 420: The Stormbringer Tribunal (Part 5)

"What? Beelzebub?! He's ALIVE?!"

"How did he revive? WHEN did he revive? Has he been in prison since the end of Stormbringer?"

"Why does he look like a human? Why isn't his skin red?!"

The crowd of onlookers freaks out. Not just the audience directly behind Beelzebub, consisting of demons, traitorous humans, and assorted monsters, but also the vast throngs of ordinary citizens outside the arena's confines, and even the majority of those among the Jury of Thirty!

Henry's eyes become as wide as saucers. His jaw drops as he recalls the seemingly lighthearted conversations and various hints he's received from 'Old Man Robert' over these past few weeks. Never did he imagine the seemingly kind old man was actually one of the most, if not THE most hated demons among Tarus II's populace.

"Robert is... Beelzebub?! No wonder! It all makes sense now..."

Mara, the Duke of Collection, stares numbly at Beelzebub and smiles wryly.

"If my end is tragic and Caddis's was violent, then Beelzebub's will surely be the most deserved of everyone here. He won't receive a drop of mercy."

Outside the arena, ten million observers of all the different species shake their fists and scream obscenities at the ordinary-looking old man, recalling all the friends, family, and children they lost to his detonation, many of whom will never be revived.

"Fucking bastard! Lemme get a swing at him! Just one punch!"

"I'll put a bullet between his eyes!"

"He murdered my boys! I want to rip out his entrails and feed them to a Hellhound!"

Amidst the screaming, raging mob, one demoness remains remarkably quiet. Rosalia sighs in her heart as the demon she 'loves' stands on stage with a calm expression, feeling dejected that she was unable to protect him.

"If only I had more strength... Mister Beelzebub could have stayed by my side."

Inside the Jury of Thirty's platform, most of the Jury members wear differing degrees of shock and outright disbelief.

Emperor Yardrat howls with glee and stomps his foot. He laughs maniacally. "Hahahaha! Oh, that clever Wordsmith! He's been hiding the fire-bastard all this time! I'd never have guessed!"

Emperor Fae shrieks with glee. "Little bomber-boy is gonna go boom for the last time!"

"What a pity." Emperor Kristoff says, shaking his head. "Beelzebub was a powerful and influential Duke. His death will be a great loss for our people."

Only Emperor Serena appears wholly unsurprised. She listens to the proceedings, all without a single shift of her expression, as if perhaps having known all along. Though, how she may have learned of Beelzebub's survival is anyone's guess...

Belial, unlike her fellow Emperors, already knew about Beelzebub's capture, being the person responsible for apprehending him and investigating Rosalia. A wicked expression rests on her face as she fantasizes about several gruesome ends awaiting the man.

Blinker ends up blindsided by the development. With nobody having told her about Beelzebub, she stands up and gazes at him in shock. "Phoebe! You had Beelzebub all this time? Then, does that mean...?"

"Not Mephisto." Phoebe says with a shake of her head. "He's still at large."

"Oh. That's too bad..."

On the other side of the jury panel, Neil Adams and Magnus Chadwick only gaze impassively at the monster who slaughtered millions. With both of them having been debriefed on Beelzebub's recovery, they have already prepared themselves mentally for his appearance.

"Quite the level of excitement." Chadwick murmurs. "It seems the finale of this Tribunal is going to be... interesting."

Neil barely reacts. "Beelzebub doesn't interest me. He's an irredeemable bastard, like all the rest. I won't have to worry about Jason failing to punish him... but I do wonder how we can best advance The Cause..."

"Heh. As if you haven't already thought up ten possibilities." Chadwick chuckles.

Not only are humanity's top leaders and Emperor Serena unsurprised, but Creator Demila also watches the proceedings with little interest.

To these mud-dwellers, the demon known as Beelzebub is a frighteningly powerful entity capable of causing mass death. But to the Volgrim Empire, the weakest member of our Psion Reserves could crush him with ease.

She already knew about Beelzebub's survival thanks to the thoughts in Phoebe's mind, as well as the others. However, she also doesn't particularly care. In Demila's eyes, Beelzebub is a truly small and insignificant figure. Let alone a Demon Duke, she wouldn't bat an eye if the mightiest Emperor threatened her.

Creator Demila gazes off into the distance, not particularly giving a damn about Beelzebub's fate.

If only it had been me instead of Confessor Vulpanix fighting the Archangel. I have not faced a serious challenge since my ascension to the 7th Level, all those cycles ago...

She flicks her psionic attention to Uriel for a moment before pulling back once again.

Perhaps I may yet get my chance.

Uriel gazes wordlessly at Beelzebub on the platform below. She and her brothers silently communicate through telepathy, sharing their observations at the speed of thought.

Brother. Uriel says to Raphael. Dids't thou knoweth of Beelzebub's survival?

I did not. Raphael replies. But... I had my suspicions. A wielder of Nirvana cannot die so easily. T'was once the key to the Creator's power, after all.

Uriel's eyes flicker. She glances at Jason and frowns.

Nirvana...

On the stage below, after more than a full minute of the crowd screaming and all-but-rioting, humanity's defense forces manage to quell the mob and quiet them down, reducing their violent hatred to the silent boiling of a cooking pot. Despite their hatred for Beelzebub, Stormbringer's survivors tamp down their rage to instead pray he receives the most vicious, brutal, deserved punishment of all time. Forget killing him, the humans who fought in Stormbringer want to see him tortured and mutilated, left to suffer for decades and centuries, if at all possible. No other option enters their thoughts.

Beelzebub remains calm and composed. He stares up at the Jury of Thirty, noting with mild disinterest the various expressions of shock on their faces, as well as the lack of it for certain key figures.

The Duke of Inferno clears his throat.

"That's right. It really is me. I have lost my powers and my demonic body. I am now no stronger than any other ordinary human. Weaker, even, as my body has dried up and lost its vitality."

"Beelzebub." Yamir says, eying the Duke with a glare that could freeze lava in an instant. "You are perhaps the most hated demon in the entire galaxy, as of this moment. Nothing you say can save you from a terrible end. I do wonder, though... can you offer any sort of a defense for your actions? Any sort of explanation, or even an excuse? The people you have victimized have suffered terribly as a result of your actions. Your detonation killed millions of soldiers and civilians alike. It also seems to have cost you every last bit of pride you once held as a demon. So why, I must ask... did you do it?"

The minotaur falls silent. He squeezes the shaft of Lorent's butcher axe, as if itching for a reason to swing it at Beelzebub. Of course, as a principled minotaur, he would never let his base instincts get the better of him.

At the same time, Beelzebub barely even looks at the half-bull questioning him. He instead looks up at the Jury of Thirty, as before, with a casual indifference to the world and its feelings.

"I have no defense." Beelzebub murmurs. "What I did during Stormbringer and the actions I took... they were my choice."

Yamir snorts. "I'm surprised to hear you admit it so easily. Where is your laughter and bravado now, Duke of Inferno? Why do you appear so small and pitiful?"

Beelzebub turns his body slightly to face the minotaur.

I understand why you hate me. I understand why everyone does. Your anger is justified."

He pauses.

"I've spent the last month of my life at the lowest point of all my existence. Previously, I was a proud and renowned Demon Duke on the rise to someday become an Emperor.

Now, I am an ordinary human, weaker than the average by all accounts. I've lost everything that I once looked at in such high regard."

Yamir remains silent. So, too, does the crowd. Everyone listens intently as the worst criminal on Tarus II addresses the audience.

"I spent two weeks tied to a bed after my revival, with my arms raised above my head, ruined by a lack of blood flow. Then I was thrown into a prison and left to rot until this very moment, where I will now summarily be executed. But... that isn't what really has shattered my pride, my previous self-confidence that none of you could hope to dampen. No, it is a different sort of pain that now ails me..."

The former Duke of Inferno smacks his lips. He casts a long, slow gaze across the Jury of Thirty, followed by the audience of criminals behind himself.

"You know... I've always been something of an idealist. Sure, I've killed wantonly. I've burned and pillaged without regard for the lives of others, and I've certainly let my temper get the better of me. But... I always viewed myself as something of a heroic figure. I wanted to upend the stale and trite ways of my demonic superiors. I wanted to bring about a new era of revolution and justice for all my fellow oppressed Grunts and Lords."

He shakes his head.

"In the end, I fell for the whispered words of a bedeviled witch. Emperor Ose promised me that she would lead demonkind to greatness. If only I followed her direction, we would finally rebalance the scales of fate and bring about the deserved positive karma held from our people, all this time."

"You thought of yourself as a heroic figure?" Yamir asks, slightly bemused. "And yet you committed a genocide. You are merely a bloodthirsty villain."

"I am indeed a villain." Beelzebub murmurs. "But that was never what I wanted. My goal was to uplift demonkind to greatness."

Beelzebub turns his attention to a surprising figure on the Panel of Thirty, none other than Jason Hiro himself.

"Jason. You came to Ose before Stormbringer and made a proposal. At the time, I thought you were a stupid fool. You wanted to create a device that could uplift demons without requiring human souls. Ose told me not to believe you. But now I see that... she was the liar."

Jason tilts up his chin to peer down the bridge of his nose at the demon who killed his daughter.

"If you think flattery will get you sympathy, you've thought wrong, Beelzebub. Only death awaits you."

"You are angry. Vengeful." Beelzebub murmurs. "And deservedly so. I killed your daughter. In a moment of humiliation, I unleashed an attack which slaughtered millions of people."

Beelzebub purses his lips.

"I'm... sorry for that, Jason. An apology won't bring anyone back. It won't undo the damage I've caused. But it needs to be said. You have won, and I have lost."

"And not in a physical manner." Beelzebub adds. "Ideologically, we both have similar goals. I wanted to uplift my species, and you wanted to uplift yours. The difference is, you possessed the means and the will, while I did not. I allowed myself to be blinded by ignorance. I allowed Ose to deceive me. And in the end, you have brought about the era of revolution which I so desperately desired."

Beelzebub closes his eyes.

"I... regret. If only I had listened to you at that time. If only I had taken your extended hand. It's not that I regret the suffering which I have endured as a result of my actions, but that I have brought pain and suffering to you, the person who heralded the goal I wanted to achieve myself."

Beelzebub opens his eyes. He shakes his head, a look of deep sadness in his eyes.

"I am sorry for... killing your daughter. I am sorry for killing all those innocent people. I brought pain to the one man capable of realizing my vision, as well as his friends and family. I owe you a great debt, but I have inadvertently spat in your mouth. Whatever punishment you deem necessary, I will accept it without complaint."

Neil Adams frowns. Beelzebub's words are so wildly different from what he expected that, for a brief moment, he can't even believe his ears. Chadwick also appears visibly surprised, with both of them completely caught off-guard by the subtle psychological changes Beelzebub has undergone since his resurrection.

Jason, too, stares at Beelzebub in disbelief. In all the time he's known Beelzebub, not once has he imagined that the sick and sadistic sinner who caused Stormbringer's most sorrowful moment would ever do anything but laugh in his face and revel in his pride, even during his final hours.

Jason blinks several times. He swallows heavily, unsure of what to say.

"You... are apologizing? Are you even Beelzebub?"

The Duke of Inferno nods slowly. "I am."

"That can't be right." Jason murmurs. "The Beelzebub I know revels in other people's misery. Is this some ploy of yours? Some plot to escape my wrath?! You will not evade your punishment through some fake and deceitful change of heart!"

"My words are authentic." Beelzebub says quietly. "But I understand why you don't believe me. I have been... a bastard. An irredeemable one. It's only because I lost everything that I gained the clarity of mind to re-evaluate my past actions."

"Six years ago," Beelzebub says, "I was there with my master, Agares, as the first demons to encounter you in the Labyrinth. At that time, you stood alongside the Black Witch, who would later become the Black Queen. My master put all of his attention on her, but I thought there was something odd about you."

"Later," Beelzebub continues, "I fought your people inside the Core. I reaped many lives, lives which I don't think you were even bothering with charging me for today. I even fought your now-wife, and she dealt me a grievous blow. I ascended to the rank of Baron through death and slaughter."

"After that, I killed my master during that climactic battle on Polaris. I ascended to the rank of Duke soon after, and began to finally think about how I could enact my ultimate plans for demonkind. Once I had finally obtained an amount of power which put me in the top echelons, I began to think about how I might uplift my people and do away with the old order."

Beelzebub wryly shakes his head. "But I was still a thoughtless imbecile. Even six years later, when you approached Ose, you gave me the opportunity to realize my ambitions, but I turned you down. Of all the regrets I hold, none are quite as painful as that one. Now, months later, I can truly look back on my life and understand the error of my ways. I sinned, and no amount of penance can ever redeem me."

While Jason struggles to find the right words, Phoebe does not. She stands up from her seat to take a position on Jason's left.

"It's good that you have accepted your failures, Beelzebub. You've admitted to your crimes, and now you must pay the price. No amount of reverse psychology will save you! You killed our daughter, and you killed our friends and family! The worst punishment in the galaxy still wouldn't be enough of a punishment for the likes of you!"

Blinker also rises to her feet. "If you had pushed back against Ose, perhaps Stormbringer might never have happened! Kar might still be alive today. So I also want you to die, Beelze-bastard!"

Uriel doesn't even move from her seat. "The bloodskin may have offered his weak and feeble apology, but it will sway no hearts. I also condemn him to death."

Yardrat shrugs, not caring one way or the other about the Duke from another Hell. "Your life or death is no skin off my nose. Goodbye, Beelzebub. Thank you for at least making your final appearance a little entertaining."

"Your fate matters not to me." Emperor Serena adds. "Perhaps your death will serve to heal the divide between humanity and our people. If you truly wish to advance demonkind's greater interests, you can rest in peace with this knowledge."

Kristoff and Fae both give identical judgments. The other members of the Jury of Thirty condemn Beelzebub to death, with none of them, not even Belial, showing him leniency.

"If the traitors aboard the Atlas Cannon deserved death," Belial says, "then your punishment must certainly be a million times worse. Goodbye, Beelzebub. If you truly wish to repent, then find my niece in the Great Beyond and apologize to her for what you've done."

Beelzebub gazes at Belial with a distant expression. He nods along to her words.

"I will do that, Belial. And... I am sorry to you as well."

The succubus sneers. "Save your apologies for someone who cares."

The final two votes, surprisingly, come down to Neil and Chadwick. Having remained silent all this time, Neil has not once said a word in regards to the verdict. Finally, he stands up, while Chadwick remains seated.

Neil directs a contemptuous look toward Jason.

"I'm disappointed in you, Wordsmith."

"What?" Jason asks. "And why would that be?"

Neil shakes his head, acting as if he were an ancient sage of a long-lost clan of ascetics. He gazes off into the distant horizon, an expression of melancholy playing upon his face.

"Here you are trying to act as if you want humanity and the demons to unite, but when this poor fellow offers you a heartfelt apology, you shut him down without mercy. Such sincerity you've shown to the demons. Beelzebub has clearly suffered and learned a lesson, but you will not even consider lightening his sentence. All because you refuse to forgive him his trespasses."

"Watch your fucking mouth!" Jason snaps, taking a step toward Neil. "Don't you dare try to act as if I'm the villain here! Your attempts to drive a wedge between humanity and the demons have not gone unnoticed! Beelzebub is a murderer, and no number of heartfelt apologies will redeem him! He's a monster! He deserves to die!"

Neil quickly bows his head. "Yes, of course. My apologies, Wordsmith. You have made your judgment. For a small figure like myself to stand in your way, I would not dare to be so presumptuous."

The Demon Emperors behind Neil roll their eyes, easily seeing through his wordplay. However, a few of them also can't help but feel, deep down inside of themselves, that Neil might have a point.

True, Beelzebub murdered millions. But so too have the Emperors sitting on the podium. What if the Wordsmith were to 'justifiably' come for them next? With his people gaining more sympathetic allied Emperors, it might only be a matter of time before he seeks to 'replace' them.

Yardrat's eyes flicker thoughtfully. Neil Adams' ploys are quite transparent, but I cannot help feeling as if he isn't... correct. Even if only in a small way...

Unlike Neil's previous wedge-driving attempts, he does not seek to divide the humans from the demons, but the demons from the humans. He makes his enemies question their place in Jason's future society, as well as the 'leniency' he will surely fail to show them when their days of judgment arrive.

Phoebe also notices this difference in direction. She links her arm around Jason's and pulls him back a step.

"Neil. Enough wordplay. Just issue your judgment already so we can end this."

However, humanity's military commander does not immediately pursue her request. Instead, he slyly smiles at Phoebe and shakes his head.

"Your husband is an impulsive man, Miss Hiro, but I expected better from humanity's genius. Certainly, Beelzebub is a vile murderer, but are you not one of our most compassionate leaders? Do you not feel the pain of loss in his voice, the deep regret emanating from his very being? He committed a terrible crime, but should we not consider sparing the life of this regretful sinner? Surely, ten thousand years of humiliating slavery in a mine will be a far worse punishment than a quick and easy execution..."

Phoebe scowls at him. "Since when were you the type to show mercy to even one demon, let alone the likes of Beelzebub?! This Tribunal is meant to seek justice for the victims of Stormbringer, not provide a platform for your political aspirations! And if you want mercy so badly, why follow up by saying Beelzebub should suffer for ten thousand years? Should we spare him, or should we torture him? Make up your mind!"

The corner of Neil's eye twitches. Indeed, the Wordsmith's wife is quite a bit sharper than her husband. Phoebe is not an opponent who I can expect to ignore the holes in my arguments...

He chuckles lightly. "Haha. Fair enough. We shall execute him, then. I suppose you think me a man who merely hates demonkind, but that could not be further from the truth! I merely believe that humans and demons should not live together, but should exist in our own separate spaces. Why deliberately breed tensions when we can exist apart in harmony? As for Beelzebub's crimes, I previously wished for him to suffer a most violent and gruesome death, but the Wordsmith's uncaring attitude toward Beelzebub's genuine apology... it simply tickled me the wrong way."

He nonchalantly waves his hand.

"No matter. We can kill him, if that is what you wish. I only fear that the supposed forgiving and merciful nature of the Wordsmith is not as boundless as he first claimed..."

Jason frowns. With Neil's final words, the Wordsmith finds himself in a bit of a bind. Should he continue with executing Beelzebub, he might look like an uncaring, vengeance-driven madman, which could end up pissing off the demons. But, at the same time, sparing Beelzebub would almost certainly drive the humans who look up to him into fits of rage.

Neil! Jason roars in his head, while his expression continues to flicker with uncertainty. You... you goddamned piece of garbage! Why are you acting like you don't want Beelzebub to die?! You hate him just as much as me! But you'll even let him walk freely if it means you can undermine my authority in any possible way! God, I hate lying shitheads like you!

Phoebe's expression also changes. She, too, feels somewhat uncertain of how to proceed, given the difficult position Neil has put her in.

I couldn't care less if Beelzebub dies. He deserves execution! And the Emperors are sure to see right through Neil's ruse... but he's putting Jason in a tough spot! But then again, why wouldn't Neil go this far? Beelzebub doesn't have his powers anymore! He's not a threat to humanity, so whether he's executed or not doesn't even matter, as far as Neil is concerned!

Beelzebub stands on the platform below, staring up at the squabbling humans with a look of absolute boredom.

"Oh... so it's like that. Humans are truly something. Even when they have me right in front of them, they only fight among themselves."

He rolls his eyes.

"Jason. Don't let Neil put doubt in your heart. I wasn't trying to trick you into forgiving me or into showing me pity. I still have a smidgen of pride left in my bones. Come down here and take my life. Just end my misery."

He pauses.

"Or send me to the mines if it makes you feel better. I don't care. I have lost, and you have won. Don't fall for the machinations of a small man thinking small thoughts."

Jason hears Beelzebub's words. His frown deepens, and he shakes his head to rid himself of those extraneous concerns.

"Shut up, Beelzebub. Don't you tell me what to do!"

"I would not dare." Beelzebub says, ever so blandly. "But for devil's sake. My weak little human-legs can't keep me standing for much longer. Make a decision already so these good people can cheer over my corpse and go home."

The Duke of Inferno's absolute nonchalance over his impending death drains some of the rage out of the souls of those watching the proceedings. In the arena's exterior, many humans gaze at his face with gloomy expressions.

"This demon bastard... he doesn't even care if he lives or dies."

"I wanted to hear him beg for mercy! Can't believe he's taking all the fun out of this."

"Maybe Neil is right." Another person says. "Death is too quick an end for him. Jason should send him to the mines. Then we can visit him sometime and give him a good beating..."

As a full minute drags on, Jason wrestles with what to do or not do. Finally, he comes to a decision.

Neil's manipulating me. But... if I need to choose between pleasing my allies or my enemies, I'll always pick the former. Beelzebub deserves death.

He firms up his resolve, then shoots Neil a death-glare.

"I've made my decision. Beelzebub will die... and I will be the one to execute him."

Phoebe's eyes widen. "You will? Jason... you don't need to go that far."

"I do." Jason says, directing his words to not just Phoebe, but the entire audience as well. "Beelzebub's apology absolves him of nothing. It even feels like a slap in the face to those he killed. He's not even regretful of killing them, only that he was 'wrong' in how he pursued his goal."

The Wordsmith puffs out his chest.

"I'm glad you apologized, Beelzebub. I'm glad you've realized the error of your ways. But no apology will undo the damage you've done. For the sake of everyone's future... you have to die today. We have to put your past actions behind us so we can look to the future."

Beelzebub listens to Jason's words. He nods. "I understand. Do what you must."

Jason focuses his mind. He utters a Word of Power.

"Teleport."

The Wordsmith vanishes from the jury platform, then reappears a short distance from Beelzebub. He looks the murderer who killed his daughter in the eyes.

"You will be the first to die today, Beelzebub." Jason says. "Your punishment will set an example-"

Just as Jason is about to issue his final speech, a cry of excitement rings out in his Mind Realm.

"Ah! A friend!!!"

Jason chokes on his words, confused by the speaker. "Huh??"

At that moment, the Wordsmith's body begins to glow with a blood-red light. The spectators watch in surprise as a fiery domain bursts into existence around him, engulfing the entire confession platform along with Beelzebub and Yamir both!

"Aargh!" Yamir exclaims, as the scorching heat washes across his fur. "Jason-aaargh!"

He quickly leaps backward and hurtles off the platform, flopping into the grass to roll around and pat himself down. At the same time, the Wordsmith stands just a few feet apart from Beelzebub, his eyes widening in horror.

"Shit! Phoenix, what are you doing?!"

The cry of an ancient bird resonates within Jason's body!

"Friend! I smell a friend! He's my friend! Eeee!!"

A bright red orb fires out of Jason's chest and rockets toward Beelzebub's heart. The Duke of Inferno doesn't even get an instant to react before that light explodes against his ribcage, sending him hurtling backward off the stage!

"Ahh!"

Beelzebub cries out more in surprise than pain as the Phoenix's aura floods his internal structure!

"No!" Jason shouts, his eyes widening in horror. "Dammit, dammit! He's not a friend, he's an enemy, Phoenix! STOP!"

But Jason's words don't slow down the primordial entity in the slightest. Beelzebub's aura soars into the heavens!

His skin shifts from a pale creamy color to a faint pink, then blood-red!

His ears begin to stretch outward, turning pointy... and two massive horns erupt from the sides of his skull!

The Duke of Inferno rebirths due to the power of Nirvana, reawakening his demonic power, even as his strength shoots into the stratosphere!

His withered arms fully regenerate, allowing him to snap the chains binding him as if they were made of tofu. He stands up, his power startling everyone present.

Yardrat jumps to his feet. He gasps at the sight before him.

"Beelzebub... he's regained his power!"

Kristoff's pupils shrink to pinpricks.

"No, it's more than that! He's attained the rank of Emperor!"

The audience watches in horror and excitement, depending on their affiliation, as they realize the truth that has appeared before their eyes.

The Emperor of Hellfire has arisen.

Part 421: EMPEROR OF HELLFIRE

Recommended Listening

Beelzebub, the Emperor of Hellfire, arises from the bottom of the platform. He levitates a few feet off the ground, an incredulous expression on his face as he gazes at his healed arms. A mixture of emotions washes across his face, all while his captors gaze at him with looks of abject horror.

"I've... evolved... to Emperor? I have powers again? But... why?"

In the brief instants after his empowerment, nobody moves a muscle. Nobody says a word, too shocked by the sudden situation they've found themselves watching.

Until Neil Adams jumps out of his seat. He claps his palm against his chest, initiating his armor's activation.

"All personnel!" He barks into his helmet. "This is a red-level emergency! Beelzebub has evolved to Emperor! ATTACK! Kill that murdering monster!"

His words break the spell placed on humanity's minds. Under Neil's verbal command, all of their T-REX's activate at the same time, enveloping humanity's soldiers and civilians inside protective membranes of nanite armor. The soldiers immediately take action, with any soldiers wearing flight-capable Hummer Exosuits taking to the skies, while the rest race into the arena, climb its walls, or jump onto transport ships to go over the walls.

Beelzebub quickly realizes what has just happened. He turns to the Wordsmith on the platform with a blank look. "What did you do to me? Why did you restore my-"

Before he can finish his sentence, Beelzebub detects a movement in the sky, an object racing toward him from above.

"Oh, shit."

Archangel Uriel crashes directly into Beelzebub, her body acting like a living wrecking ball as she envelops herself in projected holy armor. She strikes Beelzebub like a cannonball. hitting him with the full force of Heaven's might!

BOOOM!!

Beelzebub's body explodes under her terrific power! A cone of blood and bone sprays backward, splattering the audience behind him and making them scream in fright.

"Holy shit!"

"Satan the Devil! She fuckin' killed Beelzebub!!"

Henry, seated close to the front row, gets more than he bargained for as Beelzebub's entrails spray his face and body, with several fragmented pieces of bones even stabbing into his skin, though their small size prevents any serious injuries.

"Aargh!" Henry exclaims, more in terror than pain. "Wh-what the hell?!"

Humanity's soldiers arrive shortly behind Uriel as she jumps to her feet and gazes at the vibrating slushie of blood and bone beneath her feet.

"The demon is regenerating!"

Despite the horrific manner in which Uriel killed Beelzebub, it doesn't take even a single second before the newly minted Emperor of Hellfire begins rapidly pulling himself back together. Uriel's eyes widen as his blood 'magnetically' draws back together, sliding between her feet and coalescing rapidly into a pool of plasma.

By the gods! Raphael exclaims. This regeneration speed! 'Tis far faster than even Satan's was!

Satan required a full minute before his body would put itself back together. Michael observes. But Beelzebub...

The Archangel of Courage doesn't finish his thought, nor does he need to. His brothers and sister easily understand the implication hidden within his words.

Not even ten seconds later, Beelzebub's remains yank back together from all across the audience, and he rebuilds himself back to his former self, reappearing completely naked just a few feet before Uriel.

"Ah, shit! Shit..." Beelzebub curses. "That hurt! Why did you attack without waiting for me to explai-"

Uriel doesn't wait for Beelzebub to explain himself. She once again rushes toward him while humanity's Hummer Soldiers take aim with their sniper rifles from elevated positions.

Two hundred bullets fire at Beelzebub. With his newly enhanced Emperor abilities, he immediately detects their imminent arrival and frowns.

Foop!

Beelzebub vanishes!

He fireports to a new position a short distance away, atop a cluster of burning grass ignited by Jason's earlier fire domain. At the same time, Uriel strikes his previous position with a conjured spear of light, but only ends up swiping the air uselessly.

"Bloodskin!" Uriel roars, swiveling to face him. "Stand still and accept thy death!"

At the same time, Belial leaps from the platform above. She rushes toward Beelzebub, transforming her fingers into knives while also stretching out her arms.

"You won't leave here alive, Beelzebub!"

Jason follows the action with his eyes. He balls up his fists in rage.

"Phoenix! What the hell are you thinking?! You gave Beelzebub his powers back, you idiot!!"

He realizes, all too late, that Beelzebub's flame powers must have aligned with the Phoenix's element enough to agitate her. However, the ethereal fire-bird's response when she flies back to Jason baffles him.

"That person is my friend! Cheeurp!! He has a feather in his heart!"

Slightly taken aback, Jason frowns. "What? A feather? A Phoenix Feather?"

"That's right! Fire-friend is my friend! He has a good heart! He is not a bad guy!"

"That's not right." Jason answers. "He's a monster! He's killed millions!"

Simultaneously, on the Jury Platform above, Neil Adams watches as his troops organize and rush to Beelzebub's position. Some stop to evacuate the audience of criminals, though their lives are hardly any sort of priority since most of them were sentenced to die anyway. If a bunch of them do perish, humanity's military commander will barely care, let alone shed a tear over their sad fates.

"Creator Demila!" Neil says, turning to the Psion. "Can you assist us in taking down this rogue Emperor?"

However, what Neil finds leaves him slightly confused. Demila appears completely uninterested in the battle below. Instead, her eyes gaze upward in the general direction of the sky.

[The affairs of mud-dwellers have nothing to do with me.] Demila states. [If humanity cannot handle a single errant Emperor, you will not be any use in the great war against the Plague. Handle this matter yourself.]

Neil's expression flickers with suspicion. Something about the position of Demila's head irks him, though he can't figure out exactly why.

"...Alright. Suit yourself. It's better if we don't rely on aliens to solve our problems, anyway."

He and Chadwick kick into full gear to coordinate their attack on the newly uplifted Emperor, all while Demila continues to gaze up into the sky.

Was it my imagination? I seemed to have sensed a certain disturbance in the Void...

Belial, Uriel, and humanity's soldiers lunge toward Beelzebub to kill him and fire bullets to try and pin him down. However, Beelzebub easily evades their movements by exploding his body into vaporous flames, then shimmying around their attacks to appear here and there.

"Blast it, won't you people stop for five seconds?! Let me speak!"

"Thou art speaking now!" Uriel roars. "We simply do not wish to hear thy words!"

She and Belial slash at Beelzebub, gradually growing more used to his tricky dodges, his fiery teleportation, and his regenerative abilities. After more than a minute of chasing his after-image, Belial succeeds in landing a blow. She slashes with her claws and tears off Beelzebub's left arm, making him scream in pain.

"Aaargh! Damn, that hurt, woman!"

For a brief moment, Beelzebub realizes that this is the first time he has felt pain since his ascension to Duke some six years earlier. He doesn't get time to think further about this topic though, as Belial and Uriel press their advantage!

Beelzebub's arm regenerates by bursting out of his shoulder in a fiery explosion. He ignites fire under his feet, then flies into the sky, rocketing upward to evade his enemies. Uriel flaps her wings and gives chase, while Belial needs to take a half-minute to transform into her Pure Succubus form.

Before Beelzebub can make a 'clean escape' he abruptly stops as he slams into an invisible wall.

Splat!

Beelzebub's hundred-mile-an-hour flight upward comes to an instant stop. He pancakes against the wall in a somewhat comical manner, with several of his bones shattering on impact!

"Guk!"

The Emperor of Hellfire's vision momentarily goes dark before he regenerates and finds himself face to face with a familiar enemy.

"Where do you think YOU'RE going?!" Blinker shouts, pulling back her fist and lunging it toward his face.

A telekinetic-empowered punch slams into Beelzebub's head, shatters his skull, and sprays his brains backward in a disgusting mess of gore.

Beelzebub awakens on the ground beneath Uriel's feet. She stands atop the Emperor of Hellfire's prone form with her spear of light raised overhead.

Beelzebub's heart skips a beat.

Shit.

She stabs her spear downward, impaling his head and killing him again.

When he regenerates, she impales him again!

And again!!

Each time Beelzebub recovers, he barely gets a second to react before a spear of light kills him. He doesn't get a chance to cast any magic or protect himself!

Uriel sneers.

"This bastard may regenerate endlessly, but I shall be happy to spend the rest of eternity killing him!"

Blinker hovers behind Uriel, her fairy body now human-sized. "This isn't working! He just keeps coming back! Beelze-buster's healing factor is even stronger than when he was a Duke!"

"That matters not!" Uriel roars. "Every bloodskin has a limit! Even Satan the Devil perished in the end! So too shalt this heretic!"

Just as Uriel starts to raise her spear again...

Foop!

She, Blinker, and Belial all teleport away from Beelzebub, reappearing a hundred feet in the opposite direction.

Disoriented, they blink in surprise, only to see the Wordsmith now standing over Beelzebub's prone figure.

"You're wasting your time." Jason says, the expression on his face telling a story of an unspoken secret. "Suppress! Bind! Imprison!"

When Beelzebub next regenerates, he finds himself temporarily powerless, his abilities completely sealed! Only his innate healing factor remains, but even that seems slightly more sluggish.

"Ugh! Ah, fuck! That hurts! That really hurts!" Beelzebub screams. "Stop killing me for just a minute, please! Let me speak!"

Jason stands over the newly minted demon elite laying on the ground. His cold expression gives no hints, but it also appears that he isn't quite ready to finish off the Emperor of Hellfire.

"Of all the dumb luck in the universe, the Creator had to pick me as the unwitting deliveryman for your ultimate power-up."

Beelzebub grits his teeth. The phantom pain from his recent executions continues to haunt him, but he manages to look up at Jason and force what he hopes is a 'pleasant smile.'

"Hey... Jason. Can you tell me what happened? Why did you... fix me?"

"I didn't." Jason says coldly. "Not intentionally. It just so happens I recently came into contact with... the Phoenix. And now I see that you also have a sliver of the Phoenix's power inside yourself."

"The Phoenix?" Beelzebub asks. "But that... that can't be right. Why would I have a primordial spirit inside my body?"

"I don't know." Jason mutters. "The last person to possess the Phoenix, that I know of, was an ancient Valkyrie named Catherine. But she died long, long before you were born. Maybe a fucking feather fell out of the sky and touched you or something. I have no idea."

Jason turns his attention to the audience, where humanity's soldiers continue rushing the accused and condemned out to safety. Then he looks at the hundreds of troopers hovering in the sky, all of their weapons trained on Beelzebub's position.

From the jury panel, Neil shouts down at Jason. "Did I just hear you correctly, Jason? You gave Beelzebub back his powers?!"

"Not... intentionally..." Jason repeats through gritted teeth. "It was an accident."

"Another accident!" Neil exclaims, his words transmitting to humanity's soldiers, allies, and enemies. "Always with the goddamned accidents! Well, don't just stand there! Kill him already!"

Jason's expression turns glum.

He stares at Beelzebub, now laying motionless at his feet, gazing up at him expectantly.

Fuck you, Neil. Fuck you, fuck you, fuck YOU. You think I don't want to kill this piece of shit?! It's all I want! But now that's basically impossible!

A deep sense of despair engulfs the Wordsmith's heart.

Idiot Phoenix. I can't believe you tied Beelzebub's power to the Cube! Now, every time he regenerates, he does so by drawing upon its primordial energy. Even if he regenerates a million times, it won't drain even a fraction of the Cube's power! As potent as Beelzebub's Emperor-level regeneration might have been under ordinary circumstances, the Cube has supercharged it!

Jason's fingers twitch.

Luckily, the blackheart hasn't figured out this fact yet. He has no way of knowing the Cube has given him access to the same wellspring of energy I now pull from. He could obliterate this entire fucking planet if he detonated his body a second time!

With a heavy heart, Jason turns to look at Uriel, Blinker, and Belial. He gazes into their eyes with a look of futility, making each of them frown. Then he turns his attention back to Neil.

"It's... not that simple."

"What do you mean?" Neil asks, unaware of Jason's inner thoughts. "Even if he regenerates a thousand times, we can just keep killing him."

"No." Jason murmurs. "We can only imprison Beelzebub moving forward. I don't have any other options. Nobody here, not even Creator Demila, is capable of killing Beelzebub. As for the reason why... I can't say."

Demila continues to sit in the same spot as always. However, she slowly frowns at the Wordsmith's words.

[You say I cannot kill that feeble little mud-dweller? I would watch your words if I were in your position, Wordsmith.]

"Don't misunderstand." Jason replies, raising his voice so the others can more clearly hear him. "You can kill Beelzebub. Anyone here can. But it won't matter. His regenerative factor has reached an unprecedented level. Even Satan the Devil would stand in awe of Beelzebub's healing abilities."

Demila's expression flickers.

[Because of the... Phoenix? And what might that be?]

Having heard Jason's words earlier, Demila possesses a small amount of understanding toward Beelzebub's changed situation, but she quickly recognizes the Wordsmith is hiding an important secret from her. With her lightning-fast thoughts, the high-ranking Volgrim delegate begins to realize that whatever secret Jason is hiding, it must be something her superiors would desperately want to know about.

Unable to read the Wordsmith's mind, she instead tries looking into Phoebe's thoughts, but Jason's wife exercises remarkable mental discipline by dwelling almost exclusively on her hatred for Beelzebub and the pain she felt at her daughter's loss.

In the time it takes Jason to formulate a quick response, Demila quickly combs over the minds of humanity's other top leaders. She discovers a few surprising hints.

Hmm? So those rumors of a 'super-weapon' weren't for nothing... but why do so many of these mud-dwellers share the same mental image of a 'Cube'?

"It's complicated." Jason says, taking care not to express too many details. "Through an unexpected coincidence, Beelzebub has regained his former abilities, but they have also been somewhat empowered. Now... I don't know what to do with him."

Beelzebub listens to the Wordsmith speak. As he does, a deep sense of shame washes across him.

"You... didn't give me my abilities back on purpose." Beelzebub mutters. "I thought that perhaps you had decided to show me mercy."

"When it comes to you," Jason replies, "that word isn't even in my vocabulary."

For a brief moment, the surroundings quiet down. With Beelzebub bound by magical chains, suppressed, and laying on the ground without even trying to resist, people begin to realize he may not have intended to start flinging fireballs the instant he got his powers back.

"You know..." Beelzebub says quietly, breaking the silence, "I meant what I said earlier, Jason. I'm sorry for what I've done. If I had known six years ago what I know now, I would have walked a different path in life."

"And how does that matter at all?" Jason asks. "What-ifs won't bring my daughter back. They won't bring anyone back!"

"No. They won't." Beelzebub admits. "But... all this time, haven't you been advocating for giving demonkind a second chance? Maybe I am truly irredeemable... but now that I have regained my powers... I don't want to die anymore."

"So you intend to fight." Jason says.

"Not fight, no." Beelzebub answers, shifting his body so he can get a better look at the Wordsmith. "Look, a few minutes ago, I was nothing. My existence no longer had any meaning. I was weak and useless! But now, I've become stronger than ever! I will promise to you personally that I won't fight you ever again! I will never again hurt a human! I will spend the rest of my life trying to make up my actions to the people I've hurt!"

Beelzebub grits his teeth.

"I just want to see everyone live well! I want my fellow demons to live good lives! I opposed you because Ose convinced me you were lying. Don't you want to prove your sincerity toward demonkind? Forgive me, and forgive all those who were deceived by Ose! Put slave collars on us if you must! Just give us a chance to prove that we can redeem ourselves!"

"Slave collars?" Jason grimaces. "That's abhorrent. I would never create such devices."

"I'm only giving an example." Beelzebub replies. "With my power, I... I could protect humanity! I could save people! Would you rather see me dead, or would you rather I continue living and putting my abilities to good use? Give me a chance, Jason! Give everyone a chance!"

Jason stares at the demon who murdered his daughter. He gazes at Beelzebub's hateful face, his pleading expression, uncertain of what to do.

He doesn't want to forgive Beelzebub. But even as Beelzebub speaks, Jason begins to feel the effects of his suppressive spells weakening.

I can't kill him. Jason thinks. I can't even suppress him for long. My power comes from the Cube, but so does his. Eventually, he's going to break free. If I want to keep Beelzebub suppressed, I'll have to Wordsmith onto him every five or ten minutes for the rest of my life! I'd be better off destroying the Cube and killing him afterward!

He chews his lower lip and looks away, falling deep into thought.

If I forgive Beelzebub, what will happen next? Even just standing here and giving him a chance to speak is implying to everyone watching that I'm thinking of taking his side. But I'm not! How could I ever?!

From within Jason's Mind Realm, Fiona speaks.

"We don't have a choice anymore, Jason. You cannot hold Beelzebub down forever, nor can you keep killing him for the rest of eternity. You also can't simply destroy the Cube, either. We still need it for our own purposes."

So, that's it, then? Jason asks. We just have to let him go and hope he keeps to his word?

"Not necessarily." Fiona says. "We can still put some safety countermeasures in place..."

As she continues speaking, Jason's eyebrows raise intensely.

Oh. That's... quite interesting.

He looks down at the Emperor of Hellfire.

"I will not forgive you, Beelzebub. But... you do make a good point. I have always said people should be given second chances. So... I will follow my heart on this matter."

He turns to address the audience of prisoners, though few remain following their evacuation, the Jury of Thirty, and the citizens outside the arena, all of whom now wear exosuits.

"...I am going to set all of the prisoners free." Jason says, causing countless people to gasp and shriek in rage. "If I must free the worst monster from Stormbringer, then I cannot in good conscience punish those who committed lesser crimes."

He pauses.

"However. I will not let them dance off into the sunset. I am going to place down some harsh restrictions and conditions. Those who hurt our species during Stormbringer, no matter their identity or previous judgment, will lead difficult lives moving forward. I will not give them a free pass."

Neil slants his eyebrows as the Wordsmith begins to detail his plans for the demons and human traitors. The more Jason speaks, the more shocked Neil becomes.

"Jason! What are you doing?!" Neil shouts. "You're... you're undermining the entire Tribunal!"

The Wordsmith gazes up at the man on the platform above.

"I know, Neil. I wouldn't do it if I had any other choice."

He shakes his head.

"But in the end... it's my decision to make. I am the Wordsmith, after all."

Neil's eyes flicker as he digests the realization Jason just put his foot down in a public manner, showing a significant amount of backbone for the first time in ages...

"Maybe so... but you are not the only Wordsmith."

Phoebe, unaware of her husband's internal conversation with Fiona, can only try to objectively assess his thought process, all while wondering why he didn't even bother consulting her.

A realization strikes her.

Jason must have no other option. I know he'd never consider giving Beelzebub a chance at redemption. As for why he's made these other concessions, it can only mean he must worry about someone else finding out the truth behind Beelzebub's power.

Phoebe turns her head to the side. She looks for Creator Demila, hoping that perhaps she might glean a clue from Demila's expression.

Instead, she discovers that, at some unknown moment in the last few minutes...

Demila has disappeared.

Phoebe's heart drops into her stomach. She looks around the Jury of Thirty for Demila, but doesn't see the Psion anywhere.

"Shit. Where did she go?!"

Part 422: Demila's Disappearance

In front of the entire audience of onlookers, Jason Hiro proceeds to spend three full minutes elaborating on the conditions required for the release of Stormbringer's perpetrators. Under his logic, if Beelzebub cannot be executed, then Stormbringer's lesser criminals also must not be executed.

However, the Wordsmith will not allow these people to walk free and clear. He rattles off a list of stipulations, among which include:

All of them must voluntarily allow Words of Power to be placed upon their vessels. Jason's spell will cause them to suffer soul-wracking pain if they think even one thought that might cause harm to humanity or its allies.

The spell will also instantly kill them, and obliterate their souls, if they take any direct action to harm humanity. Those who might be capable of enduring the prior pain might be able to press on with their dastardly plans, so this is the final backup.

None may ever again hold a position of power in human, monster, or demon society.

Demons will not be allowed to mutate into higher levels of power.

Jason continues outlining more than a dozen rules. Each one suppresses the Stormbringer traitors on a deep level, making it harder and harder for them to gain a drop of leverage in their respective societies, moving forward.

Some of them complain. To those who do, the Wordsmith merely looks at them with a cold glare.

"I am the Wordsmith. I hold the final say. If you have a problem with these conditions, we can revise your sentencing back to slavery or death. Is that what you would prefer?"

All complaints from the accused vanish as they realize Beelzebub's evolution has given them another chance at life and freedom, even if through an incredibly tight and controlled method. Not only will they have to work to rebuild human society through their own efforts, but they will never again rise to obtain prestige and benefits from their species, or those of the other species.

Neil protests. He speaks up for the 'common man,' arguing that Jason is doing this due to secretly sympathizing with the demons. What he receives back from Jason is little more than another icy stare.

"Always, it's the same with you, Neil." Jason says. "I would like unity with demonkind. I would like to forgive old wounds. I would also like to kill all those who harmed humanity during Stormbringer. But the fact remains that I cannot easily kill Beelzebub right now. The cost would be too high. And if I cannot kill him, why should those who have committed lesser crimes die? You and I are both men with a humane side. Perhaps, as Beelzebub has said, it would be better to give the demons one last shot at witnessing our benevolence?"

Jason sighs.

"Beelzebub might live on, but I assure you... this Word of Power will unleash excruciating, hellish pain the likes of which you can't imagine."

He looks at the demon bound at his feet.

"I'll give you a choice, Beelzebub. I can work with Blinker to create a formation capable of imprisoning you for all eternity, or I can let you go free under the stipulation you will suffer lava-like agony when your thoughts turn evil. Which would you prefer?"

"The latter." Beelzebub says without hesitation, looking up at the Wordsmith evenly. "I won't deny I have acted reprehensibly. But if you give me a second chance, I will not disappoint you."

Jason stares at Beelzebub for several long seconds. The pain of losing his daughter echoes in his chest. His ribs creak, and his stomach clenches.

In all his life, nothing has hurt Jason as much as the pain of letting his daughter's killer walk free. Every muscle in his body, every instinct screams at him to unleash a blast of holy magic and eradicate Beelzebub down to his cells.

But Jason knows that might not kill him.

And, as angry as the Wordsmith is, he can't help but feel that Beelzebub's offer does come from a place of genuine regret.

Perhaps, if Jason were to attack him, but Beelzebub were to regenerate, that regret might shift to a much more negative emotion. He might try fighting back.

And if he did?

The entire planet would be at risk.

No longer can Beelzebub's power be calculated in the ranks of Emperors. Perhaps he might even possess a strength not unlike the so-called Demon Deity, all because of accidentally tapping into the power of the Phoenix and Cube.

As Jason wrestles with his thoughts, Beelzebub frowns.

"If it would make you feel better… you can kill me a couple of times. It'll hurt like hell, but it might make things a little less… awkward between us."

"Don't fucking tempt me!" Jason hisses through his teeth, while averting his eyes. "Fuck. If you think this decision isn't the hardest choice I've ever made… Release."

Jason simply lets Beelzebub go. He destroys the restraints holding Beelzebub prisoner, allowing the Emperor of Hellfire to sag to the ground and exhale a sigh of relief.

"Well. That feels better…" Beelzebub murmurs.

"Don't you make me regret this." Jason whispers to him. "If you ever harm a hair on anyone else's head… I don't care what it takes. I will kill you a billion times, imprison you inside a black hole… I'll go to any length to ensure you stay dead."

Beelzebub slowly climbs to his feet. He eyes the Wordsmith with caution, then slowly nods.

"I know, Jason. I know."

Jason quietly clenches his jaw. Mentioning a black hole makes him think of alternate ways he could kill Beelzebub, but without any guarantees, he doesn't want to take that risk.

Besides. Jason thinks. Putting Beelzebub in a black hole might kill him, but he might also keep reviving inside and draining the Cube's energy until it runs bone-dry. Then humanity will truly be screwed. We need that goddamned Cube if we want to survive the coming era of chaos.

The crowd outside the stadium yells and screams, with many people enraged by Jason's betrayal of the Tribunal and his taking matters into his own hands. Despite this fact, Neil assumes command of the soldiers and has them quell the crowd's rage. He swallows his own anger and calms himself down, turning to the projector to address the crowd.

"Everyone. I am no happier than you about the Wordsmith's declaration, but he does have a point. If we do not punish the worst offender of Stormbringer, it would not sit right with me to punish the lesser criminals. Furthermore, he is the Wordsmith, and he holds ultimate power. We owe Jason Hiro our lives! We should be thanking him for the honor of serving at his behest!"

Neil's words of 'praise' ring hollow in Jason's ears. He frowns as he detects the hidden malice behind Neil's careful phrasing, and how he takes great care to heap all of the blame for this incident on Jason's shoulders.

At the same time, the Wordsmith recalls his conversation with Unarin.

When the time comes... will you kill Neil Adams? Or will you step aside and let him lead in your stead?

Jason clenches his jaw. I want to kill him. I want to kill Beelzebub. All this shit is getting fucking tiresome! Killing these people would get them out of my hair, but it would also turn the situation into a complicated mess! It's so frustrating!!

Jason calms his mind and heart. Realizing the situation is what it is, he turns to Beelzebub.

"Alright. Remember, you agreed to this."

"I will not forget." Beelzebub says, eying the Wordsmith with a nebulous expression. He remains quiet for a moment before averting his eyes. "You really are a better man than me, Jason Hiro."

"You're not a man at all." Jason snaps. "You're a demon."

"You know what I meant." Beelzebub replies.

After a moment of awkward silence, Jason begins to Wordsmith.

"Conjure. Limit. Compress. Seal. Punish. Pain. Agony. Trigger..."

Unsure how exactly his magic will fare, Jason has never actually performed this complex a series of Words of Power before. In total, he strings together thirty-two words into what he hopes will be an effective spell capable of inflicting agony upon Beelzebub should he turn against humanity.

The Wordsmith pauses after weaving his spells.

"...I just realized I don't know how I should test this."

Beelzebub shrugs. "It should be a simple matter, yes? All I have to do is think about burning a bunch of humans ali-AAAARRGH OH DEVILS!"

The Emperor of Hellfire crumples into his shadow and convulses on the platform, screaming and howling in agony as a torrent of lava scorches his cells, burns his pain receptors, and makes him feel as if an eldritch monster has assaulted his very soul.

It takes a full thirty seconds before the pain subsides, leaving Beelzebub twitching and spasming, all of his previous haughty and confident aura utterly gone.

"No... more... hurts..." Beelzebub whimpers like a beaten dog.

Jason smacks his lips, but says nothing out loud.

Actually? That felt pretty satisfying. I hope he does think about killing a few humans in the future. I wouldn't mind hearing his screams more often.

He stifles a chuckle, in spite of the atmosphere surrounding the arena, then turns his expression grave.

"Looks like that worked well, Beelzebub. On a scale of one to ten-"

"Forty-seven." Beelzebub hisses through his teeth. "It felt like a forty-seven on the pain scale."

"Damn. Maybe pain is actually more effective than I first expected..." Jason says, as several odd thoughts occur to him.

Pain, even if only imagined and not something that will leave a permanent injury on the body, can still prove beneficial to me in all sorts of circumstances. An Emperor in pain can't focus their mind to cast spells. A Psion might also be unable to use their abilities, too. Maybe I could cripple my worst enemies and leave them collapsed on the dirt in a heap?

Thinking of Psions, Jason turns his attention to the Jury of Thirty, only to finally notice a certain someone has disappeared.

Hm? Where did Demila go?

Jason flicks his eyes around, but he doesn't spot the Psion anywhere in plain sight. Momentarily stumped, Jason starts to cast a Word of Power, only for his wife to come jogging over to him.

"Jason! Jason!"

"What is it, Phoebe?" Jason asks.

His wife pauses to look past him at Beelzebub, who has barely managed to pull himself together and rise to a standing position.

"...Phoebe." Beelzebub coughs.

"Beelzebub." Phoebe replies.

The two wordlessly look at each other for a moment, until Phoebe shakes her head, grabs Jason's arm, and pulls him aside.

After taking Jason to a slightly less populated area, the woman looks at her husband.

"Privacy. Now."

Sensing the urgency in Phoebe's voice, Jason nods. "Barrier. Silence. Warding. Camouflage..."

He casts a dozen Words of Power, but even as the world seemingly completely vanishes from view, leaving him and his wife standing in a pitch-black void, Jason doubts Creator Demila doesn't have a way to see through his protections. Surely, with as accomplished an 'investigator' as she is...

Phoebe gnaws on her lower lip. "Demila's gone."

"I noticed. Is that a problem?" Jason asks.

"It's a goddamn big one, if my hunch is right. I think she might know about the Cube."

Jason's heart drops into his shoes. However, he quickly recovers.

"I thought she might. I didn't take enough precautions..."

Phoebe sighs. "It's not your fault."

"You're wrong." Jason retorts. "It's entirely my fault. We're dealing with Psions who can read minds. Before Demila showed up, I should have put Words of Power in place to protect all of humanity's leaders. I have Fiona and the Phoenix to protect me, but you don't, and you know all about the Cube. We have to expect Demila knows everything."

"Even if Demila couldn't pluck the information from my mind, there's also Neil, Chadwick, Blinker, and several others." Phoebe says. "The question is... what do we do now?"

Jason's shoulders sag. He glances around the small void encompassing himself and his wife with a look of despair.

"I don't know, Phoebe. I don't know. Unarin is right. I'm a useless leader. I can't protect anyone. I accidentally gave back Beelzebub his powers, while also binding his existence to the fucking Cube. So now he's not only as strong as an Emperor, but he's also been supercharged by the Cube."

Phoebe's eyes darken. "I thought something like that might be the case, though I wasn't sure of the details. Do... do you think Beelzebub is a threat?"

"Of course he's a threat!" Jason exclaims in exasperation. He throws his hands up in the air. "I have to trust he'll be a good boy, but now Beelzebub possesses enough mana to blow up this whole planet, and maybe even the entire star system! He's not something we can easily handle anymore."

To Phoebe's credit, she quickly pieces together all of the disparate happenings of the last hour. She realizes the possibilities, and that makes her even more frightened than Jason.

"Unarin wouldn't give you Excalibur. He feared your Wordsmithing would become too powerful if you possessed a magical object with immense amounts of mana you could pull from. But soon he'll probably learn you already have such an object in your grasp."

"And it's just floating up in fucking space!" Jason sighs. "What do we do? Neil's surely going to go on the warpath after this. Hope is still missing..."

"Can you locate Demila?" Phoebe asks.

Jason pauses.

"...Probably. But if I look for her, she might detect my soul approaching."

"We need to know if she's out there in space." Phoebe says. "If you discover her near the Cube, that will at least give us a definitive answer."

"Maybe..." Jason mutters.

He pauses for several seconds while his brain whirrs into action.

"Projection."

Jason beams Fiona into the material realm, allowing her to appear so she and Phoebe can work together.

"Hey, me." Fiona says.

"Hey, me." Phoebe says.

The two of them exchange an awkward smile at their 'joke' before getting down to business.

"I agree with Phoebe." Fiona says, surprising nobody. "Jason, I'll take over your body while you're gone. Try to 'Locate' Demila, and the moment you find her, come right back."

"That was my plan." Jason says. "But first, some heavy precautions..."

The Wordsmith begins casting several Words of Power, this time targeting his soul.

"Reinforce. Illusory. Transient. Stealth..."

He places all sorts of abilities on his soul, temporary measures that will fade after a day or so, but might make his presence more difficult to detect. Then, he nods at his wife.

"Wish me luck."

The two of them exchange a kiss, and Jason closes his eyes.

"Locate."

A tugging sensation pulls at his soul...

The Wordsmith's mind leaps from his body. It races into the sky at a speed unquantifiable by the limits of temporal physics. Even so, he remains perfectly aware of his surroundings and ends up racing well beyond the confines of Tarus II's local gravity well.

"What the hell?" Jason asks himself, as he travels across the Void into the depths of space. He not only begins quickly leaving his world's immediate vicinity, but the entire Star System itself!

"Demila isn't anywhere near Tarus II?" Jason asks himself rhetorically. "Where is she?"

The further Jason travels, the faster his speed becomes. In a period of just five short minutes, the Wordsmith rockets past a blinding array of stars. He enters a region of space he quickly recognizes.

"P-space? Does my soul travel through P-space when I use 'Locate'?"

Having only actually used the spell a handful of times in the past, and having only really traveled across the galaxy once or twice, Jason always found the previous expeditions confusing. But now, as he enters a place where space itself has been compressed, he realizes the distant stars have become much larger and have pulled much closer together than they ever should in real-space.

Jason frowns.

What is P-space anyway? Why does it exist on a dimension adjacent to ours, yet it clearly operates on completely different gravitic principles?

Before long, Jason arrives near one of the many stars populating P-space. He exits P-space and arrives inside a star system as boring and ordinary as any other. In real-space, the distance between planets, stars, and entire star systems is actually so vast it would boggle any human's mind. Even in the Sol system, travel between Earth and Mars would require months of time at velocities lower than the speed of light.

So, when Jason doesn't immediately notice any planets nearby, he doesn't pay much attention to this fact. Most planets appear little more than specks to human vision, no different from the vast array of stars in the nearby galaxy arm. Even with his improved soul-vision, Jason can't make any out.

But that doesn't affect the trajectory of Jason's soul-form. Due to the power of his Locate spell, he continues homing in on an unknown location amidst the void.

"I don't get it..." Jason says to nobody in particular. "Demila came all the way here? But... why? And how? I must have traveled a few thousand light-years. Is she a master of spatial transference, like Dosena and Nufaris? She hasn't been gone ten minutes!"

The Wordsmith's soul continues flying toward an unknown place. He frowns.

"Then again... she could have jumped to the Warpgates, stepped into the Core, and traveled to a different location by hijacking one of the Gates. I'll have to check and see if she made a 'request' to the personnel there."

Finally, Jason's flight speed slows down. He watches as a speck in the distance rapidly begins to enlarge, revealing a completely-brown planet, utterly barren and devoid of any natural life.

"Volgarius?" Jason guesses.

As he draws closer, the Wordsmith shakes his head.

"No. Not Volgarius. It's a mud-ball. There aren't any structures on the surface. I don't think I'm in the Volgarius system at all..."

He observes the distant star and mentally shrugs.

"Christ. All stars look the same to me. I need a reliable way of telling where the fuck I am in the galaxy. This is ridiculous!"

In the middle of ranting to himself, Jason suddenly stops mid-sentence. His soul turns cold as he senses a familiar emanation of energy up ahead.

"A Psion!" Jason softly exclaims, only to widen his eyes. "No, multiple Psions. A bunch of them! Holy shit... that's... that is a lot of Psions."

Jason's Word of Power finally deactivates, leaving him hovering just a few million miles away from the spherical mud-ball. A deep sense of danger rings in the Wordsmith's soul, making him feel incredibly wary about flying any further forward.

"This planet... it isn't ordinary..." Jason mumbles to himself. "There's something scary about it. Why would all these Psions be living here? Why not somewhere more prestigious, somewhere that has actual infrastructure on its surface? And why don't they seem to sense me yet? Even if my Wordsmithing is ten times more potent than I anticipated, at least one of them feels like an 8th-Level Psion... an Executor..."

Jason's discomfort grows by the second as he comes to a startling realization.

"This... this world might be a secret base of some sort. Something the Volgrim Empire doesn't want its enemies to see. Not me, not anyone. It's just my good luck Demila happened to head back here."

He pauses.

"...Or my bad luck. If they catch me, the Psions will probably rip me to shreds to hide whatever is down there."

For once, Jason hesitates.

Unsure of whether to move forward or pull back, his curiosity continues to increase as he flies around the sphere at speeds far beyond what a non-soul-entity could achieve. He examines it from all possible angles, his superior soul-vision allowing him to pick out plenty of details on its surface.

"Must be an underground complex. I don't see any obvious entrances, but my soul can pass through physical matter. I should take my time approaching and be ready to yank back to my body if someone detects me."

Jason nervously recalls the moment when Confessor Vulpanix detected his soul inside Marie Becker's laboratory and how easy it was for her to reach out and subdue him. His soul shudders at the thought of her or another horrifyingly powerful Psion latching their claws onto him.

"Yeah. Caution is the key word here." Jason mutters, steeling his resolve. "I have to know what's going on here."

And so, the Wordsmith begins making his way toward the planet's surface...

Part 423: Planet Mudball

Jason slowly begins to make his way toward the unknown world below. As he descends toward the ugly mud-ball, he calms his nerves by thinking about his tactical options.

I can't communicate with Fiona remotely. We don't have any way to talk to each other, not even if she tries to Wordsmith a connection. For some reason, my soul isn't receptive to my own Wordsmithing. But... if any of these Psions sense me, I can transmit a pulse of mana back to my body and alert her to recall me.

After his run-in with Mephisto during Stormbringer, where the necromancer nearly sucked Jason's soul into Valac's lantern, the Wordsmith decided he could never again skip having a contingency measure to save himself.

It's not much... but it's something.

The further Jason descends, the greater the details he can make out on Mudball's surface. Without an official name for the planet before him, he quickly takes to calling the ugly, amorphous blob of a world that without hesitation.

Interestingly, no matter where Jason directs his attention, all he sees is a massive, unending flatland of dirt and mud. Not a single mountain hangs on the horizon. Nothing taller than a fifty-meter hill, to be sure. No trees, no rocks, nothing of any interest, not even a basic landmark.

In fact, the more Jason observes the planet during his descent, the more he begins to think its complete lack of features may be its greatest asset.

"Hmm. This world isn't bland and lacking by accident. It's intentional. If one does not notice the massive amount of psionic energy signatures in the region, they won't think of this planet as anything but an ugly, featureless husk. I wonder if this planet even exists on any star maps..."

Finally, he breaches Mudball's upper atmosphere. A scorching hot breeze of nearly 500C (932F) washes across his soul. The heat doesn't hurt him or cause him any discomfort, but he certainly notices the irregularity. He also can't help but detect a surprising amount of humidity in the air, though it does not appear to be caused by any sort of liquid water. Perhaps some other form of liquid, such as molten iron or something else.

Unfortunately, the Wordsmith's chemistry knowledge comes up sorely lacking. He hasn't a clue the temperatures needed to turn various alloys into free-floating liquids lingering in the sky. What he does know is that if he were not in his soul-form, he would be suffering immensely.

"Quite the hostile world." Jason remarks blandly. "Buuut... perhaps for a Psion, this is easily bearable. Or maybe they never need to step foot aboveground."

After patiently taking more than ten minutes to descend, Jason finally reaches Mudball's surface. He stops a few feet above the ground, noting the 'mud' is absolutely not just dirt and water, but something much more viscous that would happily cling to his fleshy leg and eat through his skin in half a second, something resembling molten brown lava.

"Delightful. Don't think I'll be taking Phoebe here for a vacation any time soon..."

Already, the distant sensations of psionic energy have become much more omnipresent, making him feel distinctly uncomfortable. Jason waits for several seconds, but not even one of those sensations pauses to linger on him, making him wonder why the usually-observant Psions haven't detected his presence.

Is it because I'm moving slowly? Not causing a fuss? But Vulpanix easily detected my soul-form... and there's at least one Executor's presence mixed among the others. I can't even count the number of 7th-Level Psions down there.

As uneasy as he felt before, Jason really begins debating returning back to Tarus II. However, the thought that Demila crossed several thousand lightyears in under ten minutes to arrive here makes him worry about her reason why.

"I have to know. I have to know what's down there..." Jason finally says, his curiosity getting the better of him.

Without any further hesitation, he levitates downward, passing through the planet's surface without resistance. A field of blackness instantly engulfs his vision, causing him to become completely blind. However, at the same time, with his eyes no longer distracted by the material realm, he becomes more able to detect the 'soul realm' in a manner not dissimilar to how he located Ose on Tarus II during their confrontation more than two months earlier.

When his vision properly adjusts, Jason's heart turns to ice. Beneath him, a sea of white light glows in varying degrees of luminosity. This light, Jason quickly realizes, is not an actual sea, but a colossal, unthinkable number of souls, all pressed together tightly, each not even a meter apart from the other. While gaps do appear in their distribution, and thus the 'sea' itself, Jason finds these gaps to be eerily uniform, as if divided every so often by walls.

How many souls are there?! A million? A billion? God, there must be tens of billions down here! Why are there so many Psions living under Mudball's surface?!

Jason continues levitating downward, unsure of where to go. He takes his time, paying extra attention to the 'brightness' of the souls arrayed before him. He quickly realizes that the sea is not perfectly uniform, and some parts of it appear significantly duller than the rest. When he focuses on the dimmer souls, he comes up with a potential explanation.

The brighter the soul, the more powerful the Psion. Perhaps the dimmest ones are only 1st and 2nd Level Psions? The brightest ones might be 7th or 8th.

The closer Jason travels to the soul sea, the more skittish he becomes, like a frail rabbit descending into a pit of vipers. Any of the stronger Psions might be able to easily sense him, and considering how easily Vulpanix nearly ripped him apart...

All of a sudden, Jason's vision returns!

The omnipresent blackness of a seemingly infinite underground world of rock and dirt vanishes, temporarily startling him. He finds himself inside a steel-lined hallway deep within the planet's depths. The flat floor gives way to a three-meter-high ceiling, with angled walls sloped hexagonally to reinforce the underground structure, likely to prevent a collapse. In turn, this gives the hallway the feeling of being a 'tube' with annoyingly bright lights reflecting off the spit-polished surfaces.

Jason blinks his eyes several times, despite them only being soul-based. He looks around himself, uncertain where to go or what to do.

While he could descend underground and continue floating toward the souls beneath himself, that method never feels good, and he hates traveling through the planetary crust unless absolutely necessary.

I'll stick to the hallways, at least for now. Jason thinks. God, I hope I don't run into any Psions...

Tentatively, he begins floating to the left, deciding to go in that direction instead of the other, for no particular reason.

As Jason begins traveling the underground complex, he passes by various sealed doors, none of which open up for him, likely due to their inability to detect his soul. The Wordsmith hesitantly sticks his head through the doors, where he often finds storage rooms, supply closets, and other such things. Inside, various techy gadgets hang to the walls, their functions utterly foreign to him. Unable to reach out and touch them, Jason can only hazard random guesses as to their functions.

Maybe this is a janitor's closet? The Wordsmith thinks. Those might be cleaning tools or something...

The Wordsmith leaves the third random room, and the moment he flits outside, his heart leaps into his throat!

A Volgrim approaches him from down the hallway, but he quickly realizes they are not a Psion. Instead, they're very clearly a Technopath, someone levitating through the air, their torso severed and replaced with a floatation module. The Wordsmith stares, wide-eyed, as the Technopath hovers toward him.

Shit, shit, shit! What do I do? Can he see me?!

The Technopath flies directly toward Jason. Then... passes right through him.

Without so much as glancing in Jason's general direction, the Technopath levitates further down the hallway, eventually rounding a corner and disappearing.

Jason's metaphorical heart thumbs in his chest, though that sensation comes more from his human expectations than his soul's 'bodily capabilities'.

Jesus goddamned Christ. I nearly shit myself!

It takes him a good few minutes before he manages to calm down, but eventually, he does.

The Wordsmith continues levitating down the hall. Before long, he spots a pair of robots approaching him. The robot on the right sports eight tentacle-like appendages, the long limbs ending in a three-pronged 'hand' for gripping objects. The octo-bot's head features a single red iris, which looks past Jason, unable to detect his soul.

As for the robot on the left, it rolls around on treads and features a 'torso' about the size of a skinny flagpole, with two long and delicate-looking arms, likely intended for surgical precision or reaching into nooks and crannies.

These two odd-looking bots walk and roll past Jason, paying him no mind. It doesn't take long before Jason's advance starts to put him within the visual range of other robots and other Technopaths. Several dozen pass him over the next thirty minutes, making him frown.

So many Technopaths and robots... but not a single Psion?

Jason's confusion deepens. He arrives inside some sort of robotics laboratory where machinists weld robots together, wire their internals, program their code, and do all sorts of other tasks. Their projects lay scattered about hundreds of giant tables, with no cubicle walls or other barriers to divide all the workers from each other. The gigantic underground space gives Jason the chance to levitate to the ceiling some several hundred feet above, where he assumes a bird's-eye view.

Beneath Jason, thousands of Technopaths go about their day, oblivious to the soul watching them from above. Male and female Technopaths work together, often talking to each other about their work. Some conversations drift to the subject of the Volgrim Empire itself, but mostly these Technopaths seem content to not even bother talking about their motherworld.

Unfortunately, Jason's ability to understand the Technopaths is weak at best. Without his Wordsmithing, he can only understand a few words he's heard during his time on Volgarius, as well as the period he spent living among Kordonis's crew. Words like 'Volgarius' or 'ship' or 'electronic' tickle his ear, but all the rest might as well be gibberish.

"Hang na shas hxlutlanna'. I naag su agns'aths shut module."

Unable to understand more than one word out of every other sentence, the Wordsmith gives up his hopeless quest. He spots all sorts of alien text on the many displays scattered around the open-floor facility, but they appear as little more than squiggly hieroglyphs to his uneducated eyes.

Fuck. I really need to learn some Volgarian after this. Jason thinks.

His number one desire is to figure out just where, exactly, he's found himself. The world's name, the facility's purpose, anything that will clue him in as to why Demila chose to come here.

A thought occurs to the Wordsmith. He stares down at the Technopaths and shivers.

This seems like a top-secret research facility. Demila might have come here to report on her findings to the Volgrim brass, or maybe her direct superiors. I bet they're all having a huge gathering to discuss how to deal with me!

In his head, Jason imagines a huge wall of Psions standing at attention while Demila issues proclamations regarding 'humanity's superweapon,' riling them up and preparing them for a massive invasion. Even though the idea seems credible on its surface, it also seems a bit like overkill.

Demila alone could probably murder me with a twist of her wrist. What the hell would all the other Psions do? Stand around and jerk each other off?

He pauses.

...Do Psions jerk off? That's a weird question. I don't ever want it answered. Alien junk is none of my business!

He returns to observing the research facility beneath him. After some time, he realizes the goings-on in the chamber are not actually as sensitive as he first thought. As it turns out, these Technopaths aren't even particularly high-ranking, not are they very skilled. Many of them seem quite amateurish, and their work almost entirely consists of repairing and building maintenance robots like the ones Jason has passed several times now.

Jason watches as several Technopaths fumble with their tools, turning to older and seemingly wiser Technopaths beside them. After receiving advice and guidance, they return to their duties.

After several more minutes, Jason begins to notice other peculiarities. While all Technopaths eschew wearing clothing in favor of modding their bodies with as much metal and circuitry as possible, the quality of the parts used varies drastically. Shinier, fancier-looking parts correlate strongly with older and more advanced Technopaths. He quickly becomes capable of distinguishing many of the senior mechanics from their junior counterparts.

Maybe this is a training facility? Jason ponders.

With a shrug of his shoulders, the Wordsmith drops to the ground level, then heads toward a random doorway, mixing among the stream of Technopaths pouring in and out of that particular entryway.

While Jason has no ability to read the floorplans, translate the Volgrim language, or even understand the greater purpose of this strange facility, he does intuit that following the greatest flow of Technopaths should lead him somewhere interesting.

Not much time later, Jason passes by several resting areas, but not exactly 'bedrooms.' He peeps out their insides, finding various 'bays' where Technopaths can stand inside and 'dock' their bodies to receive power from some unknown location, recharging themselves for their next round of duties.

He also passes Nutritional Stations, where the Technopath worker drones can consume basic nutrients to keep their mortal bodies healthy. Surprisingly, no matter how high or low-ranked a Technopath, they all eat the same tasteless nutrients, completely forgoing the joy of eating good food.

Jason's stomach churns. I'd kill myself if I had to live a life like this.

Eventually, Jason finds that the ambient psionic energy in the air is growing stronger. He focuses his soul-vision and discovers that he has started approaching the outer perimeter of a huge lake of souls, all of them contained within a disturbingly compact area through a large pair of closed doors.

Jason approaches the double-doors. Before he can reach them, they open up to reveal half a dozen maintenance bots, as well as a handful of Technopaths. The assorted group exits the room, while another enters, phasing through Jason's body without ever noticing his presence.

When the doors open, Jason finally gets a look inside the room. Upon finally obtaining visual confirmation of the 'gathering of Psions,' Jason finds himself... confused.

He sees tens of thousands of souls, but upon entering the room, Jason blinks several times in disbelief. He arrives inside what he can only mentally describe as a 'warehouse of containers.'

Tens of thousands of dodecahedral orbs, tightly interlocked, rest inside rows and columns of reinforced steel girders holding them in place. They stack on top of, in front of, and behind one another, with no end in sight.

Jason flies into the air, a mere hundred feet off the ground, yet the jam-packed assembly of spheres rises all the way to the tippy-top of the room, spreading out through many different 'shelves' all tightly lined with only narrow gaps for individuals to walk between them.

Jason blinks repeatedly, as if trying to clear a cloud of film obscuring his eyes.

What the fuck? What even is this place?

He hovers over to one of the dodecahedral orbs at random. When he peers inside of it without getting too close, he senses a faint but powerful aura of psionic energy contained within. At the same time, he also easily makes out the shapeless 'soul' contained within.

Slowly, Jason's face screws up into an unfamiliar expression.

This... this is a Psion's soul? And it's inside a random orb-thing? What is it, a storage container of some sort?

In slight disbelief, Jason checks out several other orbs, and all of them confirm the same thing. Each orb contains a Psion's soul, though what their identities might be, he isn't certain. There appears to be Volgrim writing etched into one of the face-up sides of each orb, but he sure as hell can't read it.

Somewhere down the line, at the other end of the huge shelving unit, a Technopath on a hover-module levitates upward and stops before one of the tens of thousands of metal containers. With its compact size being about that of a basketball, the Technopath easily picks up one and examines it. He mutters something under his breath, then presses a series of command codes into his wrist-computer.

Jason levitates closer to get a better look at what the Technopath is doing. Before long, a robotic spider daintily climbs up the shelving units without disturbing the soul-orbs, then stops before the Technopath.

"Beep beep boop beep boop."

It speaks a series of unintelligible beeping noises, to which the Technopath simply nods. He hands the orb to the robot, which then skitters away. As it leaves, the Technopath levitates upward and to the left, where it plucks out another orb, then calls another drone to its position. Like before, that drone takes the orb, and the Technopath continues to another orb.

Fascinated, Jason begins following the spider-drones. He passes out of the 'soul container warehouse,' as he's taken to calling it, and pursues the drones as they carry their bounty toward a location elsewhere in the facility.

Not too much time later, Jason's heart skips a beat. He follows the drone into a facility truly alien in nature, one which holds all manner of strange and exotic floating crystals, eerie deep-blue lighting, and some sort of electrical storm pulsing along the edges of the room. Thunderous booms detonate in the air, and Jason's eyes flick to the center of the room, where a procession of drones forms a line leading up to what Jason can only describe as a series of one hundred altars.

Each 'altar' features a blackened table-like surface with a hole in the center clearly designed to fit something of the exact size and shape as the soul-orbs. Jason hangs back at the entrance, feeling as if entering this room too deeply would be a terrible idea on his part.

He watches as a robot nearest one of the altars walks over, places the orb it is carrying inside the 'slot' on that altar, then draws a few steps back. The spider-machine faces the altar without any emotion, following its programming as commanded.

After that robot and ninety-nine others have placed their orbs into the relevant slots, they all draw back, seemingly waiting for something to happen.

Before long, a terrific and violent bang of thunder crashes down upon the first altar, scaring the goddamn shit out of Jason. The Wordsmith visibly flinches as, every second, another thunderbolt smites the next altar, and then the next one, and the next one after that!

Each second, for 100 seconds, bolts of thunder fall down and strike the altars, agitating the souls inside of the soul-containers. When the thunder finally stops, along with the ringing in Jason's soul-ears, the room becomes quiet.

And then...

Crack. Crack. Crack.

Each of the soul-containers splits in half.

One by one, they crack open and fall apart, allowing the normally-invisible souls inside to shine brightly and flash with light!

The spider-bots at the bottom of the stairs remain motionless as a strange event takes place. The psionic souls burst into reality and take physical form, levitating into the air and morphing into one hundred Psion bodies. Their ages and physical features differ, but the one trait they all share is their complete lack of clothing, a sight that makes Jason wince.

Guess that answers that. No alien junk down there…

After two full minutes of growing a flesh-body out of seemingly nothing, the Psions levitate down from the sky, fall to the floor, and collapse in a heap, unmoving.

Jason widens his eyes. What? Are they dead?

The robots walk up to the collapsed Psions. They extend various sensor modules out of their frames to inspect the newly-created bodies, then wrap their spindly limbs around the unconscious Volgrim. They lift them up and begin carrying them out of the chamber, each Psion still unconscious and unable to move.

Jason observes the whole experience with stupidly wide eyes.

This… is this some kind of birthing facility? Maybe the Psions here are being created for the first time? But… it doesn't quite match up with what Kordonis told me about how Psions are created… and that last batch felt like they were 3rd or 4th Level… not exactly brand new initiates…

Jason watches as another two rituals take place, each one identical to the first batch he watched. One hundred Psions grow new bodies, fall to the floor, and get carted off, an additional hundred following them.

With robotic efficiency, whatever the ritual does, it does so with unerring efficiency, making Jason deeply narrow his eyes.

What exactly have I stumbled into?

Part 424: Using Protection

The Wordsmith's expression becomes more and more grim. It doesn't take long before he realizes this facility is far, far more top-secret than he first imagined. Jason follows a batch of 100 Psions after their 'birthing' through lightning, trailing the robots that carry them with a wary gaze. Luckily, the newly-created Psions appear too weak and frail to move. Their bodies lay unmoving in the grasps of their robotic caretakers, completely at the mercy and whim of whatever these metal automatons would do to them. Not only do they appear unable to move their bodies, they also lack much activity in their mind and soul, laying utterly catatonic in their caregivers' grasp.

Jason keeps a healthy distance from them, pursuing the robots down several corridors and past the rooms with the 'soul orbs' into what he can only imagine is a gigantic underground 'hospital' with thousands of levels reaching deep, deep into the planet's crust.

Jason finds himself inside one of hundreds of recuperation wings, areas where Psions brought from other such 'lightning revival points' (as Jason has taken to calling them) are brought and placed inside of rejuvenation pods.

These pods immediately remind Jason of the cryopod he once entered which froze his body and ultimately led to his awakening 100,000 years in the future. However, the Psion's pods sit in rows placed against the walls, filled with a nutrient-rich, crystal-clear liquid of some sort. The Wordsmith glances around this new facility, unsure of its exact size and dimensions.

At first glance, it appears to be a hexagonal structure with a 'hollow' core in the middle leading up and down to other levels, where a flight-capable Psion or other entity can ascend and descend at will. However, Jason quickly finds that the 'core' of this facility stretches for hundreds of stories above and below the area where he currently stands, and the ambient levels of psionic energy are far above anything he's ever experienced, except perhaps those found on Volgarius itself.

After a bit of investigation, Jason also finds that each level inside this 'nutrient pod facility' sits directly adjacent to multiple other such hexagonal pods, each one with its own vertical shaft leading up and down to other levels.

Jason quickly performs some mental math.

If each hexagonal room has about enough space for one hundred Psions in their special nutrient pods, and there are a few thousand levels above and below me, that would be... what, room for maybe 500,000 Psions in each vertical chamber? But there could be dozens or even hundreds of these vertical chambers... so there could be tens of millions of Psions within just a few miles of my immediate vicinity?

Recalling the size of the entire planet, Jason's expression scrunches together into one of concern.

If I'm not wrong... this isn't a facility for birthing new Psions.

It's the black-level area for bringing back 'dead' Psions.

The Wordsmith's soul shivers.

Any one of these Psions could rip me to atoms if they detect my soul. I absolutely should not be here. I should return to Tarus II as quickly as possible. Every second I stay here, I put myself in soul-rending danger!

Jason hesitates. He realizes that even if the Psions didn't kill him, he would surely be endangering humanity if the Volgrim found out he knew about this world.

Psions don't have souls. That is what I've been told many times. But it's not the truth. I can clearly sense their souls here, and they are terrifyingly powerful...

Jason levitates to one of the 'cores' in the center of the vertical chambers, looking up and down at the thousands of levels above and below himself, where machines travel here and there, monitoring the vital signs of the revived Psions contained within their nutrient pods.

I can't just leave. Jason realizes. This is a rare and precious opportunity. Does Marie Becker even know about this planet? Is it the only one of its kind? How does it function? I have to find more answers!

Jason hovers toward one of the nutrient pods recently filled with a Psion's body. He warily examines its occupant with his soul-sense, finding with a lack of surprise that unlike the Psions he's met on Volgarius and in other places, this individual does in fact possess a soul. It glows within the Psion's body, as nakedly visible to Jason's soul-vision as if it were a shining gem on their forehead.

Jason has no idea of this specific Psion's identity. All he can tell is that they appear to be a male, though the differences between the two sexes are barely distinct, and perhaps not even all that important. In fact, Jason realizes the only distinguishing factor he's ever noticed between male and female Psions are their mental voices and the size of their bodies. Perhaps, like Changelings, Psions don't even truly have any need to make such distinctions...

The primary purpose of having two sexes is for the sake of copulation and reproduction. Jason thinks. But if my talks with Kordonis told me anything, they told me Psions don't 'mate' in the same way humans, animals, or mud-dwellers in general do. They hold some sort of fancy... ritual. Then they create a spawn. Or something.

Frustratingly, Jason's knowledge on this issue proves far from complete, making it difficult for him to draw any conclusions. He theorizes many possibilities, but without having witnessed the Psion creation process himself, he cannot fathom the exact mechanics.

What he does know, or at least comes to believe, is that this is very much the rumored 'revival facility' he's heard about in whispers. Thanks to the conversations he shared with Kordonis, Unarin, and others, Jason begins to examine the facility with a much more critical eye.

He returns to the soul-storage depot and scrutinizes the dodecahedral orbs containing Psion souls with greater care than before. Under his cautious gaze, he realizes he missed several clues the first time he entered this storage facility.

These orbs aren't just storing Psion souls. They seem to be connected to some sort of greater 'soul network.' Jason thinks. There are 'power lines' connected to the bottom of the soul-containers that seem to lead somewhere else. Maybe if I follow them...

Jason observes several thin conduits of soul energy lining the underside of the soul-orb racks. He traces their energy flow with his eyes, and begins levitating along the edge of the containers. As he does, he also begins to notice differences in the level of energy contained within all of the various souls.

This soul appears much weaker than all the others. And this one, too. Maybe they belong to 1st Level Psions?

He pauses before a pair of orbs placed directly adjacent to one another. As he scrutinizes them, a strange flicker of soul-energy catches his attention. Jason turns his head to the side, where he detects one of the more robust and powerful souls nearby suddenly flicker and die down, as if suddenly losing ninety percent of its power. At the same time, a tiny red light activates on that particular row of soul-containers, making Jason frown.

What happened? Why did this one suddenly weaken so dramatically? Wait... did it just...?

Jason glances around the area below him. He spots a Technopath levitating nearby who tilts his head toward that same orb Jason just detected. The Technopath floats upward, and Jason hovers to the side, watching with rapt attention. The warehouse worker gives the orb a cursory scan, then calls over a spider-bot to come and collect the orb.

At once, something clicks in Jason's head.

Unless I'm wrong... that Psion's soul... it just drastically weakened, as if having suffered a terrible blow. Did it... die? And now it needs to be processed and revived?

The spider-bot picks up the dodecahedral orb and leaves, while Jason merely watches it depart.

That must be it. Perhaps... perhaps these souls are linked directly to the Psions roaming the Milky Way. Maybe the souls hidden here aren't just being stored for safekeeping, but are actually 'remote controlling' their host-bodies elsewhere? I'll know if I follow the trail of soul energy out of this facility!

And so he does.

Jason begins pursuing the 'power lines' containing Psionic energy out of the warehouse, underground, and across an unthinkable distance. He travels through the blackness of the underground realm, where he finds himself moving in parallel to more than ten thousand tiny, faint conduits of soul energy, all converging from various other soul-warehouses toward some unknown distant point.

However, Jason eventually slows to a stop before reaching their final destination.

Up ahead, the levels of Psionic energy sharply increase. But what's more, he detects significantly 'denser' amounts of psionic power, a density level far beyond what he's noticed anywhere else on this world.

All the psionic energy I've detected until now felt 'inert.' Jason thinks. But the energy up ahead... it's active. Alert. Those aren't unconscious Psions. They're alive and well. They must be fully revived. If I go any closer, they'll almost surely sense me.

Jason becomes anxious. Every bone in his ethereal body screams at him to retreat back to Tarus II, but these instincts collide with his curiosity and need to know what lies ahead.

I still don't know where this planet is. I don't know the mechanics behind Psion revival. Should I really go back with the knowledge I have now? Should I risk my life for a little more information? Just one rogue Vulpanix could kill me effortlessly!

He wrings his hands together. He levitates forward, then stops and pulls back.

For the next five minutes, Jason wrestles against his common sense and better judgment, unsure of what action to take.

Ultimately, however, he calms down.

He falls silent and remains unmoving, staring up ahead while sensing the active psionic power capable of crushing his soul into cosmic dust.

I can't risk it. Not now. The fact that I now know this facility exists is enough. I can always come here again, but more prepared.

He wants to know more. But at the same time, he isn't the same impulsive youth he was only six years before.

I came here by trying to 'locate' Demila. That means this world must be where her soul is currently being held. I can't know for absolute certainty... but if I don't see a soul inside her body when we meet next, I can be pretty confident that's the case.

Jason takes a deep breath, useless though the gesture is for his soul.

If I'm right about my assumptions, I may have just discovered a significant secret about the Psions. The bodies we see and interact with aren't their true forms. They're more like remotely controlled 'drones' projected from this planet. That would explain why Psions can 'die' and revive later. They must be able to regenerate and reattach to new bodies so long as their souls are intact.

With a nod, Jason closes his eyes.

I've seen enough. Return.

Abruptly, a pulling sensation latches onto his soul and yanks him away, tearing him out of that facility and taking him up into the Void...

Minutes later, Jason jerks his eyes open and coughs, the combining of his soul and body being about as jarring as ever.

"I'm back!"

Jason blinks his eyes. He looks up to find himself in the same 'privacy void' as ever, with only Phoebe standing before him.

"Thank god, Jason. You were gone so long I was starting to get really worried!" Phoebe complains. "If Fiona hadn't assured me your soul wasn't in any distress, I might have freaked out!"

"Sorry." Jason says, awkwardly scratching the back of his head. "How long was I gone?"

"Forty-two minutes." Phoebe replies. "Neil has already cleared out the prisoners and taken them back to the prisons for processing. You only put those Words of Power on Beelzebub, so he's just... hanging around. But Neil's not going to let anyone walk free until you put your magical shackles on all of them."

Phoebe pauses. She runs her hands through Jason's hair while looking at him in concern.

"...So. What did you see? Learn anything useful?"

Jason nods. "I sure did. In fact-"

He pauses abruptly, then frowns.

The Wordsmith stops short of telling his wife what he saw.

"Yes?" Phoebe asks.

"Uhh..."

Jason hesitates. He chews his lower lip, then shakes his head.

"I can't tell you. Not yet. Humanity's leaders are... compromised. Demila can read your thoughts too easily. I need to protect your mind, Neil's, and all the others."

Phoebe blinks in surprise. "Oh. That's smart of you. Yes, don't tell me anything I don't need to know… but how can you go about protecting my mind? Are you even sure Demila can't read yours?"

"I'm ninety percent certain she can't." Jason says. "But there might be more adept telepaths who can, to say nothing of the Executors or Dosena herself…"

"Ninety percent is better than zero percent." Phoebe replies. "Do you think you can protect my mind?"

The Wordsmith throws his hands up. "I don't know! Maybe. I can certainly try, but my mental defenses consist of Fiona and the Phoenix. Yours… well…"

Phoebe lights up a delightful smile. "I know! You should give me my own brain-husband! How about a Jason of my own, hmm?"

"Oh, no, no no no!" Jason laughs. "We already have two-too many of me running around. Two Jasons and two Phoebes is quite enough!"

"Well that's not fair." Phoebe retorts, crossing her arms. "So you get a second wife to confide anything you want, but my head has to be all lonely and quiet? If I didn't know any better, I'd think this was just a male double standard."

"Err, well…" Jason winces. "I… I guess that's a good point. Do you really want another of me in your head?"

Phoebe shrugs. "Frankly, I think putting a copy of me in your head was a bad decision. You know, Jason, an unfair wife might be able to make the claim that you were cheating on her with your mind-wife."

Fiona, nestled inside Jason's Mind Realm, snorts. "She's got you there."

"I didn't really think things over at the time." Jason murmurs. "But… if anyone's going to be in your head, I'd rather it be me."

Jason contemplates what to do next. Ultimately, he relents and opens his mouth to speak a Word of Power.

"Wait." Fiona interrupts. "Project me."

Slightly surprised, Jason nods. "Projection."

He summons Fiona to the material realm. She stands beside Phoebe, both of them looking as beautiful and radiant as Jason has ever envisioned his wife.

"I don't think this is a good idea." Fiona says. "Making a copy of anyone inside Phoebe's Mind Realm, I mean. It's just... not."

"What do you mean?" Jason asks, visibly confused.

Fiona wrings her hands together. "Well, you see... I don't exactly like being stuck in your Mind Realm, Jason. No offense? I love you just as much as Phoebe, but I also feel... trapped. I have no control over whether I can stay or leave. I have no autonomy and basically have to sit tight until you beam me back into the material world."

Taken aback, Jason frowns. "Is it really that bad for you?"

"Sometimes." Fiona admits. "I wouldn't want another copy of me, or you, to end up stuck inside Phoebe's head. As bad as it is for me, at least I do get to pop out and stretch my legs. I also have the Phoenix to keep me company, along with Shana and Lorent on occasion. But whoever you put in Phoebe's Mind Realm... well, they'll be completely on their own."

Realizing the seriousness of the problem, Jason slowly nods. "And if I made several people, it would only exacerbate the problem."

"Right." Fiona says. "I have accepted my existence. What I do is essential. But... I wouldn't wish my life upon anyone else. It would be best if you could come up with a Psionic countermeasure that didn't involve duplicating other people's minds."

Phoebe lightly squeezes her soul-self's shoulder, barely able to interact with Fiona's transparent body thanks to Jason's magic. "I didn't even realize it was that bad for you, Fiona. Even if we were still willing to copy Jason or myself inside my head, what about Neil and all the rest? Who would we create inside their heads? It's a disaster waiting to happen."

"Yeah. I agree..." Jason murmurs, his heart suddenly feeling heavy. "Let me think for a moment."

In the past, Jason has spoken to Fiona and noticed her discomfort at being stuck inside his Mind Realm. However, never did he realize just how much pain she was silently enduring for his sake. But in retrospect, he realizes it makes perfect sense.

Phoebe is an outgoing person. An extrovert. Jason thinks. But now her other self is stuck inside my head, unable to leave of her own accord. Even when she does, she's not a 'real' person made of flesh and blood, but a half-formed soul. That has to feel...

dehumanizing. I was thinking about a solution to this problem, but I never took it all that seriously. I've been hurting her without meaning to. And Fiona doesn't deserve that...

The Wordsmith suddenly feels extraordinarily guilty. All those times he asked his mind-wife to do a bunch of work for him, treating her as little more than a robot to help him fulfill spiritual engineering tasks, now they feel more like unintended slaps across her face.

"I'm... I'm sorry, Fiona." Jason murmurs. "I'll find a solution for your problem, and quick. I don't care what it takes."

"Thank you, Jason." Fiona says. "But... we do have more pressing matters to deal with. We need to blockade Phoebe's brain as soon as possible."

"And the other leaders." Phoebe adds. "Yes... even Neil."

"Especially Neil." Jason murmurs. "Fuck. I should have done this sooner! Why am I always so slow to react?!"

"It's not easy to anticipate the movements of an intergalactic alien empire." Phoebe says. "Plus we didn't expect a 7th Level Psion to spring up in our midst out of nowhere."

"Well, she's here now." Jason retorts. "So... let me see. Maybe if I try this..."

The Wordsmith takes a minute to collect his thoughts, then focuses his attention on his wife's face.

"Blackout. Disruption. Field. Impair. Noise..."

He utters a dozen Words of Power, none of them necessarily working together, but all of them doing their own thing to try and protect Phoebe's mental activity.

Phoebe blinks. "Did that work?"

"I don't know." Jason admits. "Telepathy."

He focuses his mind to try and read Phoebe's surface-level thoughts. However, what Jason instead receives is a violent burst of static noise, like what an old television from the 1980's might make. He flinches in surprise, then nods.

"I think it worked. But I don't know if Psion telepathy functions the same way my Wordsmithed telepathy does. I can't be entirely certain..."

"It will have to do." Phoebe says. "Let's hurry up and blanket Neil, Chadwick, Blinker, Samantha, and all the others with this protection field. Ideally we will want to protect the minds of all our allies... but that could take forever."

"There's another problem." Fiona says. "We don't know how long Jason's Words of Power will protect you and the rest. What if they wear off after a day? What if the Psions can break down the 'door' and get into your head with a little persistence? If they tried to do that to Jason I would notice, but I'm pretty sure this protection field won't warn you if the Psions attempt such a thing on you."

Phoebe winces. "Well... maybe we should just cross that bridge when we reach it. Some protection is surely better than none."

"Right." Jason says. "And I'll tell you about the Volgrim facility I found later, after I've protected the others' minds."

"I'm not in a rush." Phoebe says. "Though I'm certainly curious."

Jason nods. He recalls Fiona into his mind, takes a breath, and utters a word of power.

"Normalize."

The privacy field engulfing his body and Phoebe's vanishes.

The moment it disappears, Jason nearly jumps out of his skin!

Not five feet away, a familiar Psion stands with her arms crossed, looking at the Wordsmith with that same judgmental, expressionless face she always does.

[Ah, Jason. Phoebe.] Creator Demila says, her voice sickeningly pleasant. [Such an interesting magical field. Don't mind me, I was merely studying it for my own research purposes. I could not see through its perimeter, no matter how I tried.]

For a brief moment, Jason's heart lingers in the sole of his foot, like a child caught with his hand in the cookie jar.

He quickly recollects himself.

"C-Creator Demila. You're... back already?"

The female Psion cocks her head.

[Back already? Of course. Where else would I be?]

"...You left a little bit ago." Jason says. "Where did you go?"

Demila cocks her head from side to side a few times, hemming and hawing.

[Hmm… where did I go… oh! Yes, of course. I thought I sensed Gressil's 'chaos energy,' so I momentarily stepped away to take a look. It turned out to be nothing.]

She leans forward, her six eyes intently scrutinizing the Wordsmith and his wife.

[And what about the two of you?] Demila asks, her voice sounding ever so slightly sinister to Jason's ears. [Did you have an interesting… discussion… while I was gone?]

The corner of Jason's mouth twitches as he tries to force a smile.

Oh, this bitch.

Part 425: Tribunal's Conclusion

Unsure of how to react to Demila's sudden reappearance, Jason finds himself in a bit of a bind. On the one hand, he would love to quickly check and see if he can detect her soul inside her body. If he can't, then that means it must be inside the underground facility on Planet Mudball. However, her reappearance makes it impossible for him to stealthily utter a Word of Detection toward her soul.

Demila's six eyes scrutinize the Wordsmith with unerring fervor, making him feel distinctly uncomfortable.

You have to watch out, Jason. Fiona says from Jason's Mind Realm. Demila probably can't read your thoughts, but she is a powerful entity with an enhanced physique. Who knows what clues she can glean from your body language? Maybe she can hear your heartbeat or see veins bulging on your forehead. Even if she's not trained in dealing with human body language, she's not likely to be an idiot.

Jason swallows heavily, despite knowing this simple act could reveal information to his Volgrim interrogator.

"Isn't it obvious?" Jason asks, regaining a bit of confidence. He answers Demila's previous question while trying to puff out his chest. "I decided it would be strategically smart to... level the playing field."

Demila gazes at the Wordsmith unblinkingly. [A human turn of phrase. What disadvantage were you trying to erase?]

"Well. We can't read your thoughts." Jason points out. "Now you can't read Phoebe's, nor mine. I'd have done it sooner, but I was busy."

[Oh? Do you have something you're trying to hide from me?] Demila asks, a predatory gaze in her eyes.

"Maybe the Volgrim don't value privacy, but we humans do." Jason retorts, standing his ground. "Those who would forcibly intrude upon other's privacy are nothing more than authoritarians."

Phoebe nods. "We would never try to read your mind. We ask only that you don't read ours."

[Hahaha.] Demila laughs, slightly surprising the Wordsmith and his wife. [You say you would not do so, but I find that difficult to believe. If you could read my mind without my knowledge, I have no doubt you would do so in an instant. Of course, you cannot, for I am a Psion. I am superior to you.]

"That's beside the point." Jason counters. "This is my planet. We have the right to privacy. If you don't like it, you can leave."

[Any rights you possess are nothing more than privileges which can be revoked at the whim of the Founders.] Demila counters, leaning toward the Wordsmith with a smug look on her face. [But you may do as you please. I'm still curious what it was you were discussing inside this impenetrable force field. It is not often I encounter a barrier none of my senses can pierce.]

"My Wordsmithing can be quite potent." Jason snaps. "That's why the First Founder needs my help so badly."

[Your assistance is less necessary than you believe.] Demila says, a hint of warning in her voice. [The Volgrim do not wish to lose the Milky Way. But if we must flee the Plague, we will do so without hesitation. We will uproot our civilization and survive. Completely eradicating us is not within the realm of possibility for the Kolvaxians. Your powers will save us a lot of trouble, and that is all.]

"Hmph. That's putting it lightly." Jason mutters, trailing off afterward.

For a brief moment, the Wordsmith thinks about what he just said and what he didn't just say, and vice-versa for the 7th Level Psion before him. Neither of them told the other what exactly they were up to, leaving an uncomfortable ambiguity in the air.

"You can't just ask Demila if she knows about the Cube." Fiona says inside Jason's head. "If she doesn't know, you'll immediately clue her in to its existence. But at the same time, it's unlikely she doesn't..."

Demila might not know everything about the Cube. Jason thinks. She probably has several gaps in her knowledge. And do you really think she was off looking for Gressil? That was such a blatant lie!

"But she knows you can't call her out on the lie." Fiona retorts. "It's actually possible for you to prove where she went through your Wordsmithing. But if you know that she knows about the Cube, then you can't play stupid anymore. She would like nothing more than to feign obliviousness. But if you call her out, you might accidentally reveal the Cube's existence to her if she actually doesn't know about it right now."

Jason's right eye twitches. This is giving me such a fucking headache. I hate tip-toeing on eggshells!

Demila remains quite for a few moments while flicking her eyes and psionic senses between Jason and Phoebe both.

[Such a lovely day outside.] Demila suddenly says. [I feel like flying around to enjoy the scenery. I'll leave you two mud-dwellers to deal with your Tribunal. I wouldn't want to impose on you, after all.]

Jason presses his teeth together in a vacuous smile. "...Of course. Thanks for sparing us lowly mud-dwellers a few minutes of your time, Demila."

Demila doesn't answer him. Her eyes merely curve for a moment, then she flickers away, vanishing as if stepping into the wind.

Jason's expression remains unmoving. It seems Demila possesses some form of dimensional manipulation.

"I wouldn't immediately assume she's left, Jason. From now on, you should assume she's watching you at all times. Even if you create a privacy field for yourself and Phoebe, Demila might be standing right next to you and you'd never know it."

The Wordsmith shudders. Fuck's sake. Just like Gressil.

"Yes. Just like Gressil." Fiona affirms. "Bunch of invisible bastards lurking all around us."

Jason turns to his wife. He and Phoebe exchange a long look, but they don't speak of their encounter with Demila just now, instead opting to rely entirely on eye contact for communication.

"We'll talk later." Phoebe says.

"We will." Jason replies.

Phoebe leaves to deal with something, and Jason turns to the side, where he finds Beelzebub in the same place as before, a look of sheer boredom on his face.

"Oh, so you didn't forget about me." Beelzebub says. "Yes. I'm still here."

"You're lucky to be alive." Jason says, biting his words off with a hint of malice. "Fuck's sake. If it wasn't for the Phoenix..."

"I recall hearing about the Phoenix in the past." Beelzebub says. "Master Agares mentioned it once or twice in passing. I don't know any details, though. Care to enlighten me?"

"No. I don't." Jason mutters. "Though I did learn something interesting. The Phoenix says you already seemed to have a 'feather' attached to your body. That's why you have such a high fire affinity and the ability to revive from death. Know anything about that?"

Beelzebub sighs. "I literally just asked you about the Phoenix, Jason. Why would I know about a... a feather? Why would I know about that? I know you don't like me, and deservedly so, but it should be obvious I'm clueless about what's going on here."

Jason nods slowly. Doubt flickers across his face.

"...The last person who possessed the Phoenix's power was an ancient angel named Catherine. She was the Valkyrie of Fire, and she was also the one who killed Demon Emperor Valac. Heard anything about her?"

"I never gave a damn about the angels, not until six years ago." Beelzebub answers. "I never asked my master about them, either. I think I've heard Valac's name once or twice, but I couldn't describe the fellow to you."

"Yeah..." Jason mutters. "It's likely a coincidence anyway. More importantly..."

He carefully runs his eyes up and down Beelzebub's naked body.

"Clothes. Are you really 'Beelzebub?' You're too polite. Too willing to accept blame. You're trying too hard to redeem yourself."

Jason conjures a suit to cover up Beelzebub's unmentionables, then hits the newly minted Emperor with a barrage of questions. Beelzebub merely listens as the Wordsmith's interrogation crashes against him, then he nods.

"I've had a change of heart. Is that so difficult to believe, Jason?"

"IT IS!" Jason suddenly snaps. "Do you really expect me to believe you've suddenly become a kind, caring, compassionate demon who only wants forgiveness for his misdeeds?! You literally burned thousands of good men and woman to ash, then you LAUGHED at their corpses! There's no way I'm buying what you're selling!"

Beelzebub examines the snazzy black suit Jason Wordsmithed for him, then he crosses his arms.

"Of course I haven't changed that much. Don't be ludicrous, Wordsmith. I'm not seeking redemption for killing a few weaklings. I'm seeking redemption for standing in the way of the one man capable of empowering demonkind. There's a difference."

"So you admit it." Jason mutters. "You don't give a shit about any of the people you've killed."

"Sure I do. A little." Beelzebub answers. "In an... abstract sort of way."

Jason coldly glares at the Emperor of Hellfire. Then, he turns and walks away.

"Fuck. I should have just killed you."

If Beelzebub has anything else to say, Jason doesn't hear it. The Wordsmith warps away, arriving several hundred meters distant to land beside Emperor Belial. The succubus sits in the spectator stands, along with the other jurors, not quite certain what to do now that the Stormbringer Tribunal has ended so abruptly. She stares down at Beelzebub intently, while Uriel sits back in her chair like before, seemingly having forgotten about the battle which she took part in less than an hour before.

"I don't get it." Belial says gloomily. "You really just forgave Beelzebub? Just like that?"

"I didn't have much of a choice. And I didn't forgive him." Jason growls. "I'm simply giving him an undeserved second chance. After I place Words of Restriction on the other Stormbringer participants, I'll have to pray everything works out for the better."

Uriel folds her hands in her lap, looking unamused and more than a bit disinterested.

"'Twas a mistake to spare that demon's life." Uriel says. "But... my brothers hath made some educated guesses based upon some clues they've gleaned. I doubt thou woulds't have given Beelzebub a second chance without a good reason."

"To say the least." Jason mumbles bitterly.

Jason utters several Words of Power, projecting privacy fields around Belial and Uriel's minds identical to the one he gave Phoebe. Then he grimaces as he spots Neil walking toward him.

"It's about time you returned." Neil says, his tone icy. Humanity's military commander sizes Jason up with his eyes, as if trying to determine where Jason's allegiances have shifted. "All this fucking buildup for the Tribunal only to throw it all away in the end. And what exactly happened with our most hated enemy down there? Why is he now an Emperor? I find it difficult to understand why you would suddenly gift him with all of his former powers, plus a helping hand to achieve the rank of Emperor. Even for you this is..."

Jason glances around the Jury of Thirty. With the exception of Demila, who has taken her leave, and Phoebe, who has disappeared to deal with something better left unspoken, all the Hidden Emperors and humanity's allies remain seated, waiting for an explanation from Jason.

"Before I explain," Jason says, "let me first give all of you a privacy shield. It will protect your minds from psionic infiltration."

He turns to Neil. "Blackout. Disruption. Field. Impair. Noise..."

After uttering a long string of words, he repeats this slow and painstaking action an additional twenty-five times, eventually covering every human, monster, and demon's mind with a privacy shield.

"Don't ask me how well the shield will work." Jason says. "It might fall apart after a few days. It might collapse under repeated telepathic intrusion attempts. Don't assume your minds are now impervious to telepathy. All I know is... none of you should have your privacy invaded too easily."

Yardrat snorts contemptuously. "And I suppose you've never forcibly read anyone else's thoughts?"

"Not intentionally, no." Jason replies. "Not even those belonging to my enemies."

"I seem to recall a time you listened in on a conversation between myself and Hope." Neil retorts. "But enough about that. Are you going to explain to us what happened with Beelzebub? Why did you suddenly hit him with a fire-blast that turned him into an Emperor? It was an utterly baffling choice."

"There is an entity living in my Mind Realm." Jason explains. "It's called the Phoenix. She recognized a certain power inside of Beelzebub, a familiar sensation, and decided Beelzebub was her... 'friend.' So she flew out without asking me and gave him back all of his powers plus change. That's all I know."

"That's all?" Emperor Serena asks. "And you expect us to simply take your word for this after you've just granted all of us a special telepathy-inhibiting shield? It sounds like you are holding back important details and giving us only half of the story."

"That's right, I am." Jason replies, making her raise an eyebrow. "The extra details don't matter to you. I've said enough. If you think I would willingly empower Beelzebub to the rank of Emperor, you don't know me at all. I want nothing more than for the demon who murdered my daughter to suffer a horrific death. However, with this new revelation, I have no choice but to give him a second chance."

Jason flashes a nasty glance in Neil's direction.

"And don't you give me any lip, Neil. I am humanity's leader, not you. You will carry out my decisions, even if you disagree with them. The Tribunal's ultimate conclusion may have been unfortunate, but it still presents a useful opportunity. I would still rather try and reconcile with demonkind than slaughter my way into an uncomfortable peace."

"Well, isn't that noble of you." Yardrat asks, his tone utterly rhetorical. "Now, if we're done with this farce of a meeting, I'd like to go home."

He stands up. So does Emperor Serena, Kristoff, and the rest.

The last Emperor to rise turns out to be Emperor Fae. Unlike the others, she appears quite amused.

"Don't listen to all these squares, Wordsmith!" Fae loudly proclaims, while flashing him a huge thumbs-up. "I had a ton of fun at this stupid Tribunal! What a series of twists and turns! I was TOTALLY gonna conk out and fall asleep at one point, but you just kept doing all sorts of batshit insane things!"

She points a finger at Belial. "And you, lady! You kicked ass! You really punched the fuck out of Beelzebub's shadow! You and that Archangel had me screaming with laughter! That was awesome!"

Belial grimaces. "Shut up, Fae."

"Bahaha!" Fae shrilly laughs, making every other juror wince at her nasally voice. "If you ever learn to pull that thong out of your ass, you'll become a real riot! Okay Yard-Rat, let's get the heck out of here! I could go for some meat right about now!"

Fae deliberately and obnoxiously places extra emphasis on separating Yardrat's name, making him scowl.

"Yes. Of course. Devils, one of these days I'll pay the Wordsmith to shut you up for good." Yardrat mutters.

The Emperor of the Void opens several portals to other demon-controlled worlds. He and his fellow Emperors take their leave, and once they've all departed, Yardrat steps through his own portal along with Fae, returning to their home-world of 'Numaria.'

After they leave, Jason glances around at the people who remain. Among them are Blinker, several Dukes from the Hell of Lust, Yamir, Brunhilda, and others too.

"I'm sorry things didn't end properly." Jason says. "But... it is what it is. I'll take responsibility for the fallout."

"And what exactly will you do about Beelzebub?" Brunhilda asks. The Felorian flippantly gestures to the Emperor of Hellfire, who has plopped down in the spectator stands and leaned back to stare up at the sky. "There is no chance any human will ever trust him."

"You don't have to trust Beelzebub." Jason replies. "Just make use of him. He's an Emperor-level powerhouse now. Put his talents to work. I'm sure there's some way the bastard can earn his keep."

Surprisingly, Blinker of all people is the first to say anything positive. "I know one way we can make Beelzebub useful."

"Yeah?" Jason asks. "And what would that be?"

Blinker's expression turns frosty. "I want him to help me hunt down Mephisto. Yama too."

"Oh." Jason grunts. "That's... a really good idea. Maybe you should take someone else with you too. Wait, speaking of which, where is Hope? He was supposed to capture or kill Mephisto and Yama, but he's not back yet."

Jason turns to Neil. "Do you know?"

"I don't." Neil immediately answers. "I've not a clue where Hope went. If you don't believe me, you can feel free to root around in my mind."

"I'd rather not." Jason replies. "For the record, I'd never do that to anyone, Neil."

Neil appears unconvinced. "So you claim."

While Jason would love to give Neil an earful, he refrains from doing so in front of all their allies. He smooths his shirt down, then glances in the direction of the Tarus II prisons.

"I'll deal with the other stuff later. Teleport."

The Wordsmith warps away to place 'pain shackles' on all of the Stormbringer participants. After he leaves, Neil stares off into the distance, a thoughtful look in his eyes.

The Psion might know about the Cube. That would mean Jason's evasiveness has something to do with not knowing whether or not Demila knows. Jason isn't sure whether or not he should say anything. The Phoenix must be directly related to the Cube, too, which could mean Beelzebub has connected directly to the Cube's power source.

He frowns deeply.

Things are getting out of hand. Jason might not be my intellectual match, but it would be foolish to think Solomon's training had no effect on him. The situation is getting to be a bit dire now.

Where in God's name has Hope gone?

After departing Tarus II's confines, Emperor Yardrat and Fae arrive on their homeworld of Numaria, a planet belonging solely to the Hell of Punishment under Emperor Auger's reign. As a world covered in lush forests and thick tree cover, it holds an unbelievable number of secrets no observer can see from the skies. Only by descending into the darkness of the canopy underbrush can they find all the hidden and isolated demonic settlements.

Yardrat and Fae step out of his portal onto a granite platform in the middle of a small clearing beneath the trees. Yardrat seals his portal and looks around. Rays of light fall through the canopy to touch the dirt and fallen leaves here and there. Insects make chittering noises. Strange and exotic flying creatures cry out from the branches above, their screams sounding eerily like the wails of dying human women.

After a few moments, a female demoness approaches Yardrat and Fae, strolling out from behind a tree with a bored look on her face.

"Oh. You're back early."

The demoness wears a dress made of leaves and bark, but it's her pitch-black skin that really makes her stand out from other demons, marking her as a distinct sub-species known as an Animus. Her demonic horns poke out and bend slightly backward from the sides of her head, mimicking the angle of her ears. If a human were to observe them, they might think her horns resemble the spoiler on a race-car.

This demoness is none other than Nymph, the Emperor of the Forest, a newly awakened powerhouse whose uplifting came about as a result of Jason Hiro's premier innovation, the Belial Booster. For tens of thousands of years, she lived as only a Duke, but thanks to recent advancements, she now finally possesses the qualifications to stand among the ranks of demonkind's leaders.

"You missed out on a good show!" Fae exclaims. "Beelzebub lives! Not only that, but the little cunt ended up getting turned into an Emperor! I couldn't stop laughing my ass off!"

"Yes." Yardrat says, his 'excitement' far more muted. "It was a fun show. Simply delightful. Gather the Dukes. We need to meet with Auger."

"You do?" Nymph asks, her soft and willowy voice whispering through the air to make the forest cover hum. "What for?"

"Setting aside the Beelzebub situation, I noticed there's a big rift growing in human society." Yardrat says. "I want Auger's opinion on what to do next."

"Mmm. Understandable." Nymph says. She sashays over to Yardrat, then loops her arm around his. "I don't feel like walking."

"Damn, girl! You're sure bold today!" Fae cackles. "Let's make this a threesome!"

Yardrat rolls his eyes. He waves his hand and summons a portal deeper into Numaria's largest forest.

"Let's save the fun for later. This matter is quite urgent." Yardrat says. "Send out your little creatures, Nymph. Get the other Dukes here on the double."

Nymph nods. "Of course."

She turns her head to the side, then lightly blows at the air, sending nearly-microscopic 'spores' into the air, which drift toward the nearest tree and grant it a limited degree of sentience.

The tree then transfers its sentience to another tree, and that one transfers to another tree...

As the three Emperors step through one of Yardrat's portals to arrive at Auger's Sanctuary, Nymph's influence spreads throughout the forest, traveling hundreds of kilometers within minutes. The trees whisper to the hidden Dukes lurking within their treehouses and secluded forts, rousing them from their private business.

"Auger demands my presence."

"Well, if it's Auger asking, I'll go."

"It's been a long time since Auger assembled his acolytes. Something big must have happened."

These Dukes all rise to the task, entering portals hidden in their bases to arrive at the Solemn Sanctuary hidden somewhere within Numaria's vast and unending forests.

What command will Auger issue?

Part 426: Auger's Ambition

The world of Numaria. A lush paradise-class planet completely covered in trees with little to no open space anywhere. Gifted to the Hell of Punishment by the Volgrim following the conclusion of the Energy Wars, it has long become Emperor Auger's home, his sanctuary he never sees fit to leave. Even when the other Emperors assemble to deal with some important business, Auger remains in place, secluded in an unknown location amidst the jungle, his soul imperceptible and his whereabouts unknown.

Emperors Fae and Nymph travel through Yardrat's portal behind the demon in question. They find themselves stepping into a surprisingly dark area of the forest where the treetops are packed so densely that scarcely a single beam of light can thread its way through the leaves above. At the same time, a faint magical aura swallows them, part of a secret formation laid down not by the fairies, but by one of Auger's 'special helper' demons.

This formation is quite special. It shields all new arrivals from soul-searching magic, and even possesses a terrifying ability to hide those inside its radius from high technology and life-form scanners. While it has never been tested against Psions, it should also camouflage its interior from the mightiest Volgrim subspecies in the Milky Way.

Yardrat and the other Emperors arrive inside a treehouse more than five hundred feet tall and several thousands of feet wide, though it does not consist of a single platform, but dozens of smaller ones all stitched together and linked through wooden stairwells and rope bridges. These platforms sit attached to the trunks of trees, some bigger than others, all of them made to be as easy to traverse as possible.

A solemn aura lingers around the central tree, the largest one of them all. Countless beautiful flowers thread around its branches, with the majority of them being colored white, but plenty of red and black ones intermingle to break up the solid patterns.

Yardrat glances around his designated entry platform. He immediately spots a slender but muscular Demon Emperor a short distance away, a fellow with a crooked back and several rotted teeth. The black-haired demon smiles good-naturedly at Yardrat, chuckling in an unpleasant and hissy voice as he hobbles toward him.

"Ahh, there you are, Yardrat. And you've brought the other two."

Nymph smiles at the rather ugly-looking fellow. "Emperor Dagon."

"Nymph. You're looking as fine as ever." Dagon, the Emperor of Pathogens says. "Any idea what our great leader has brought us here for?"

As a newly ascended Emperor in the same vein as Nymph, Dagon's ascension came as a result of the Wordsmith's facility on Tarus II, the Belial Booster. However, despite living as a Duke for tens of thousands of years and even fighting in the Energy Wars, he's never been one to meddle with the upper political struggles of his people, instead leaving such bothersome interests to those who pursue them with passion.

"There was an anomaly at the Tribunal." Yardrat says. "The Wordsmith surprised everyone-"

"Beelzebub freaking revived and came back as an Emperor!" Fae roars, screaming with laughter as she holds her sides. "You should have seen the looks on everyone's faces! Funniest shit I ever saw!"

Dagon doesn't laugh along with Fae. Instead, he frowns. "Beelzebub is an Emperor now? He was already a damn-near unkillable cockroach. How formidable has he become after his ascension?"

"Frighteningly so." Yardrat says blandly. "But I don't like to repeat myself. Let us wait until the others have arrived before we continue this conversation. Emperor Auger already knows the details."

"Sure, sure." Dagon says.

An hour passes. Demons continue to arrive inside the central tree-city of Numaria through portals located elsewhere on the planet, made through the usage of not only Yardrat's powers, but some clever manipulation of other demon's powers. While the fairy queens have not crafted any Formations for the Hell of Punishment, they also are not strictly necessary either. Auger's unique abilities allow him to perform feats with magic that other Emperors can only drool over in envy.

A group of Dukes eventually strides toward Yardrat and the other Emperors. The Duke at the front radiates an enormous aura of power, one supremely close to the boundary of Emperor, yet frustratingly short of actually crossing the threshold. With brown hair held back in a ponytail and demonstone armor covering his thick frame, the fellow appears quite imposing, especially when one takes into account his shark-like teeth and vicious animalistic grin.

"So you guys are already here?" The lead Duke says. "Auger's summons caught me off-guard. Me and the boys were having a good fuck-session with some minotaurs in the Eastern Woods."

"That's nice." Yardrat says in a tone of voice implying he thinks exactly the opposite. "What a shame though, Hamir. You ended up failing to become an Emperor. Maybe next time."

Hamir, the Duke of Hailstorms, winces at Yardrat's barb. "No worries. Heh! I'll break through for sure on my next attempt. We can't all get lucky like Dagon..."

He shoots an ugly glower at Dagon, who merely rolls his eyes in return. "There was no luck involved. My foundation was superior to yours. All that bluster and you couldn't even advance before me, hehehe!"

"Just you wait 'til I do!" Hamir retorts. "My powers will skyrocket! I'll beat your ass!"

"An individual's strength barely even matters in our Hell." Hamir mutters with more than a hint of bitterness. "All our boons belong to Auger and Auger alone."

"It's not about how much power you possess." Yardrat retorts. "It's about how well you use them. Count your blessings. Auger has never let us down. Perhaps you haven't noticed yet, but we've recently advanced to become the most powerful of all the Hells."

Hamir glances at the four Emperors arrayed before him. Yardrat, Fae, Nymph, and Dagon. After adding in Auger and himself in the near-future, he can't help but feel moderately surprised.

"If we add in Glinch, our Hell has six powerhouses, soon to be seven. It's a little nuts how the humans have empowered us to such heights."

"Don't get cocky." Emperor Dagon warns through his rotting teeth. "The Wordsmith cut down Ose with that frightening Arthur clone of his. If he can destroy Bael's body, he can kill us with ease. We're still not a match for Jason or Hope."

Emperor Nymph purses her lips. "Perhaps."

"You disagree?" Dagon asks.

"I don't pay much attention to the Wordsmith." Nymph says in a frank manner. "But I am unconvinced he is as frightening as he makes himself out to be. He is a human, and a male at that. I believe it is possible for us to manipulate him."

"I agree." Yardrat adds. "As human lives go, Jason Hiro is still surprisingly young. Despite his rage at demonkind for his daughter's death, he continually tries to swallow his anger and seek reconciliation. I'd find the effort admirable if it weren't so sickeningly human of him."

"Yeah. It's pretty pathetic." Fae adds. "What kind of little goony-ass guy doesn't lash out and beat up the people who killed his family? Man, I miss REAL men like King Arthur. Remember when he went berserk and killed a MILLION people? That guy was scary as hell! Compared to him, the Wordsmith is just a little pussycat."

"A pussycat with a nuclear bomb." Yardrat quietly says. "No matter how benign he might seem, Jason Hiro is not someone we can afford to take lightly."

The Emperors continue discussing their enemy in a somewhat lighthearted manner, even as more and more demons show up. Eventually, the forest platforms reach a critical mass with more than five million demons, all limited to the range of Lords and above, standing in the treetops and awaiting the meeting's start.

Finally, they sense a change in the atmosphere. Everyone turns to look at the most centralized platform, one that seemingly hovers in midair, suspended atop a deliberately sawed-off tree trunk so that nothing sticks out of the platform's center. A faint, invisible field of energy hovers at the platform's center, and it begins to stir.

Whoomph.

A quiet displacement of air puffs out of that magical area. An incredibly old and ancient-looking Demon Emperor suddenly hobbles into view, a skinny fellow seemingly suffering from malnutrition. He leans heavily on a gnarled walking stick. His long white hair and pointed eyebrows give the impression of a mountain hermit who rarely comes into contact with civilization.

At the same time, however, this Emperor also possesses deep and cunning eyes with a gleam of extreme intelligence. Despite his frail-looking body, every demon in the area knows that if they were to try and engage him in a fight, they wouldn't just lose or lose badly... they would perish in a manner most brutal.

Emperor Auger slowly shuffles to the center of the huge platform, standing alone while a sea of eyes falls upon him, fixated on his every movement, his every word...

"Everyone's here, then?" Auger asks. "Good, good. I don't intend to yap at you lot all day. Let's make this quick."

He turns his attention to the 'elite' platform nearby, where Yardrat, the other Emperors and their Dukes all stand and observe him with rapt attention.

"Yardrat here has passed me along quite the interesting information." Auger says, his creaky old voice as loud and audible as if he were standing just a few feet in front of every individual spectator. "It seems several... interesting events happened on Tarus II today. Beelzebub revived, and he even ascended to the rank of Emperor in an inexplicable manner. Most interesting, most interesting..."

Auger waves his hand flippantly.

"But the emergence of one additional Emperor changes nothing. Our society now stands at a crossroads, one which may spell our doom or our salvation. To that end, I have decided to bring a guest along with me today."

Everyone perks up, even Yardrat, considered by most to be Auger's most trusted subordinate.

A guest? Yardrat thinks. I haven't heard anything about a guest...

The invisible magic field behind Auger hums for a moment. An instant later, a tall Demon Emperor suddenly appears as if stepping out of midair in much the same manner as Auger himself did. At the sight of this demon, the entire crowd gasps in surprise.

"It seems the youth still have eyes." Auger says cheekily, smiling like a kindly old grandfather. "This handsome fellow should be familiar to you all, but for the more slow-witted, allow me to introduce him."

Auger lifts up his hand and rests it on the shoulder of the demon standing beside him.

"This individual is known as Kristoff, the Emperor of Blood. He is the only current living powerhouse in the Hell of Blood. Heh heh heh..."

Emperor Kristoff, a handsome but dainty-looking demon, sighs quietly under his breath.

"Everyone. Emperor Auger and I have recently... discussed our situation. In light of recent events, we thought it prudent to consider our strategic options."

Yardrat frowns. "Emperor Auger? Does this mean...?"

"Heh heh heh." Auger laughs cutely, like a doddering old man. "Oh, little Kris-Kris has had it hard, recently. Three of his fellow Emperors died to the Cherubiim's attack, including his beloved wife. So sad! Such a tragedy. And now he must find it difficult to rebuild his Hell's forces all alone..."

"Let's not mince words." Kristoff interjects, shooting a cold glare Auger's way. "Once, the Hell of Blood possessed more Emperors than any of the other Hells. Now, we rank at the bottom. Even the Hell of Lust will soon add multiple Emperors to their ranks after allying with the humans."

Kristoff swallows a lump in his throat. "I... do not enjoy political squabbles. Historically, I always left such maneuvering to my wife and the werewolves. But those days are over. My wife's soul was destroyed. Emperor Wolfram perished in his entirety to the Cherubiim. And as for Lupus, she has become an undead servant to Mephisto, possessing my wife's body following her soul-death. I am... simply not competent at overseeing the lives of others. If I take the reins, I will only lead my followers to destruction."

"You may not be much of a political thinker," Auger says 'consolingly,' "but a wise man knows when to submit to circumstance."

"Yes." Kristoff replies, his tone heavy. "To that end... I have decided to unite the Hell of Blood with the Hell of Punishment. From now on, I will concede all control of my Hell to Emperor Auger."

"What?!" The crowd shouts, everyone shocked out of their wits.

"We've taken control of the Hell of Blood?! Holy shit!"

"Vampire babes and werewolf girls for everyone!"

"The Hell of Punishment will rise!"

Auger listens to the roaring crowd with an expression of quiet pleasure while Kristoff looks as if he could crap his pants from anger.

After a minute or two of raucous disbelief, Auger suddenly raises his hand.

"Quiet."

At once, the volume drops to nothing. All of the demons suddenly become utterly silent, no longer making a peep. Kristoff doesn't fail to notice that this effect is entirely artificial, brought about by Auger's absolute control over his subordinates.

Emperor Auger smiles again. "Now, then. This deal is quite complex. I have made several concessions to my good friend Kris-Kris. The Hell of Blood's members will allow me access to their souls. I will 'imprint' upon them as I have all of you. In this way, we can bring them into our... Collective. But, I cannot force them to join us, and will have to provide them with incentives. If anyone refuses, they will be free to leave the Hell of Blood and go to another Hell to live out the rest of their lives. Who knows? Perhaps they will decide to join the Wordsmith and the humans."

Auger chuckles deep in his throat, as if the very idea is the most foolish, imbecilic thought that has ever crossed his mind.

"If I may," Yardrat says, "I'd like to ask... what do you stand to gain from this, Kristoff?"

The Emperor of Blood snorts dismissively. "I will receive several tangible benefits from Emperor Auger. He has agreed to grant me the equivalent of 4000 Merit Tokens belonging to the Hell of Punishment. I will use these Tokens to enhance my own abilities."

"A wise choice." Auger praises. "In this universe, the only strength one can trust is that which belongs to themselves."

"Right..." Kristoff says, visibly disinterested in any of Auger's honeyed words. "I don't particularly care what happens to the Hell of Blood. All I ask is that if someone does not wish to become part of Auger's cult-"

"Collective." Auger says, correcting Kristoff. "Part of our Collective."

"Right." Kristoff replies disdainfully. "If they don't want to become part of your 'Collective,' let them leave unmolested."

"Of course, of course." Auger says, still all smiles. "I will treat your subordinates well. They will receive fantastic benefits when serving under me."

Kristoff turns to look at Auger for several seconds. His expression gives away no hints, but to Yardrat and the keen-eyed other observers, they can't help but notice a hint of disgust in his eyes.

"...I take my leave." Kristoff mutters.

The Emperor of Blood turns and walks toward the center of the platform. A moment later, he vanishes, disappearing into whatever sort of strange spatial turbulence happens to have embedded itself atop the platform's center.

Auger remains silent for a moment. Then, he returns to addressing the crowd.

"The coming era will not be a simple one. As I said before, a crossroads awaits us. Uniting with the Hell of Blood will not guarantee our survival, but it will benefit us greatly. As we speak, the Volgrim continue to do battle with a deadly enemy from another galaxy. The Hell of Isolation fell in a day to the 'Plague,' and ours will fare no better, should it make landfall upon our world."

"Yeah?" Fae says. "So what are we gonna do then, Boss Auger? Kill the Wordsmith?"

Auger chuckles. "Kill him? No. Don't be shortsighted, Fae. The Wordsmith is the galaxy's only prayer for defeating the Plague. None of you, nor me, are capable of combating this Threat. Indeed, I do not wish to make an enemy of the Wordsmith. I wish to ally with him!"

Auger's words startle everyone for the second time, but Yardrat appears unmoved. Having already previously communicated with Auger through telepathy, he knows about Auger's decision ahead of the rest.

Yardrat flicks his fingers. He steps across space and arrives at Auger's side with practiced ease, then turns to face the other members of the Hell of Punishment.

"The Wordsmith is currently under siege, whether he knows it or not." Yardrat explains. "Not only are the Volgrim pressuring him through the presence of a 7th Level Psion stationed on Tarus II, but he faces increasing resistance to his pro-demon policies from his current military commander, Neil Adams. Neil is not a fan of demonkind and has made his stance abundantly clear. But currently, his faction lacks real teeth. Even though he is ostensibly backed by a Wordsmith, Hope Hiro simply lacks the credibility and doesn't possess the same authority as his other half. He's not a threat to the current order."

Yardrat continues. "The other Hells are dragging their feet. They are more than happy to make use of the Wordsmith's abilities, his 'Belial Booster,' but they won't commit to his cause. We stand to gain a lot if we directly approach him to become allies."

Emperor Nymph appears unconvinced. "His goals align with ours, to be sure. But I do not see the point. We don't stand to gain much more if we directly align with the Wordsmith's faction."

"You're right." Auger says. "If it were just about reaping benefits there would be no point. The Hell of Lust does not receive any additional benefits from the Wordsmith compared to us. Their Merit Tokens are earned all the same as ours."

He pauses.

"But... we can begin to make overt moves against the humans by allying with them. And that is the ticket to our future success!"

This time, Nymph looks completely confused. She glances at Dagon and Hamir, but neither of them seem to know what the heck Auger is talking about.

"You... want us to ally with the humans... so we can betray the humans?" Nymph asks.

"Not exactly 'betray.'" Auger says. "We must ensure they cannot progress too rapidly. Make no mistake... the humans are advancing much faster than us. They are rapidly strengthening their bodies through our demonic mana. They are sucking us dry, and what we have received back are merely a portion of their gains. In order to ensure we do not fall too far behind, we must overtly act in humanity's interest as their ally so that we can subvert their power structure and turn them against one another."

The old demon chuckles to himself.

"We will not hurt a single human, Nymph. No, instead, we will make them fight one another. When the dust settles and they have crippled themselves, we will be the ultimate victors."

"But what about the Plague?" Nymph asks. "Won't we need the Wordsmith to defeat this Threat from another galaxy?"

"Naturally." Auger answers. "That is why this is a long-term plan. We will assist the Wordsmith for now and prop up the pro-demon faction, all to ensure Jason Hiro can defeat the Plague."

Auger's smile turns cruel.

"And then... when we have succeeded in eliminating that intergalactic Threat... we will turn humanity's two factions loose on one another."

Yardrat smirks. "Just like we did to ancient Rome."

"Yes... just like we did with Rome." Auger affirms.

By the time the meeting finishes, the Entire Hell of Punishment has already realized that their leader is far more devious and far-sighted than any of them ever could have imagined. His plans seem set to put the Hell of Punishment on the map, as well as in first place for the running of all Seven Hells. The First Hell's demise seems more likely than ever, as when it fails to resist the Fourth Hell's power, Auger will swoop in to swallow up its remnants.

Auger steps through the dimensional rift leading from the outer Sanctuary to his inner chambers. He grins evilly.

"It's all coming together now..."

Part 427: Hope's Quest

Volgarius. Some time before the Stormbringer Tribunal.

Hope Hiro continues his mission on the Volgrim homeworld. He forcibly rejuvenates his mind through Wordsmithing, never taking the risk of going to sleep in the middle of enemy territory. Over the course of a full week, he scouts out more than a dozen Psion strongholds, but he never finds the information he needs the most.

I can't risk getting too close to a 7th or 8th Level Psion. Hope thinks. But none of these 6th Level Psions hold real political power. They don't know where Excalibur or the Dominion Rod is being held. I need to change my strategy.

Despite failing to find the location of his desired Heroic Artifacts, Hope hasn't wasted his time. Over the past week, he has successfully infiltrated many Psion training facilities, secret bunkers, and other such areas, and he has learned a lot about their abilities, how they fight, and how they evolve.

Psions are way too scary. Hope thinks. Most of the high-level ones have altered their minds and bodies. They have inhuman reaction times. They can think faster than me and have tens or even hundreds of thousands of years of combat experience, if not millions! They know how to combat Heroes, Angels, Demons, and even Titans. If they ever detect me, they'll rip me apart before I can react. Trying to seek out the information I need from them is certainly going to fuck me over in the long run.

Hope slowly nods.

But there is another way.

The Wordsmith slowly flies through the sky, weaving between stratoscrapers and dodging the innumerable craft flying around while steadily progressing past all the seemingly-identical towers built in grids across Volgarius's surface.

While Volgarius seems to be a planet covered in boring, bland, identical infrastructure, Hope has come to find out that the towers do in fact have minute differences. He's become capable of identifying which stratoscrapers are older than others, which were rebuilt in the past few thousand years, and even which ones have been around since the conclusion of the Seven Great Wars of Volgrim myth.

Psions don't work alone. Hope muses. If there's one thing I've learned, it's that the Volgrim sub-species are always in constant conflict for benefits, but they also have to cooperate to improve their lot in life. Especially with the Kolvaxians gaining ground every year. Where there are Psions, there are Changelings and Technopaths as well. They form a symbiotic trio.

He frowns.

But as for The Ascended, I still have yet to encounter a single one. As best I can tell, there must be trillions of them hidden in secret military installations on other worlds, all hooked up to their virtual playgrounds or whatever, but they never bother mingling with their 'lessers.' And as for the Dolgrimites? Heh. Those recluses basically consider the other four subspecies to be 'sinners against Dolgris.' What a bunch of weirdos.

Unlike Jason, Hope has not extensively interacted with Founder Unarin, nor has he observed the realm of Valhalla. He hasn't a clue about the discoveries his other half has made, but neither has he slacked off in his own efforts. Hope knows plenty of secrets Jason would froth at the mouth to learn.

I have to target the Technopaths. Hope concludes. Their weapons, their automated mecha, and their robots are scary as hell, but they can't detect me like high-level Psions can. They must have secret bases without any high-level Psions lingering around, places I can sneak into and find the information I need. There must be something…

The Second Wordsmith descends toward one of many identical-looking stratoscrapers on Volgarius's surface. What he discovers during his approach is that this one contains hardly any Psionic auras inside its interior. Coupled with a few telltale nuances on the structure's exterior, this allows him to identify it as a Technopath stronghold.

The three 'core' subspecies often heavily interact with one another and assist each other in the aspects where they're weakest. Psions are great at frontline combat, but they would be overwhelmed quickly without Technopath technology backing them up and providing support from the rear. At the same time though, the five species don't especially trust each other. They're always competing with one another and trying to stash secrets away…

Hope's eyes flicker with a greedy gleam. He cautiously slides into the stratoscraper's interior, passing through its walls with his ghost-like body. He rubs his eyes as he realizes he's beginning to feel tired.

"Rejuvenate. Damn. It's not having as much effect as before. I barely got six hours out of the last spell."

He keeps his voice quiet, despite the barrier surrounding his body, preventing his voice or any sound from leaking. It even neutralizes the odors leaking off his body, just in case any bloodhound-nosed Volgrim happen to glance in his general direction.

Within seconds, Hope arrives inside a brightly-lit interior room somewhere inside the stratoscraper. He takes a moment to orient himself, ultimately discovering he's entered a tech-research facility. Maintenance and construction tools clump together in pairs, connected to power conduits and hanging down from cables designed to maximize their scanning capabilities while minimizing their weight. They hover over workbenches and tables covered in countless pieces of unknown technology.

Hope finds nearly a hundred Technopath researchers crawling around the room. After a quick visual inspection, he nods to himself.

These Volgrim have ugly but functional implants. They seem somewhat crude, but they're optimized to work as efficiently as possible while consuming very little bioelectric power. If I had to guess, this stratoscraper must be owned by Clan... Oblong?

Hope hovers at the corner of the room, just below the ceiling. His eyes flick around as he assess the structure's inhabitants.

No... even for Technopaths, these implants are only mid-tier. This must be a sub-clan working under Oblong. Maybe Clan Hadron? They follow a philosophy similar to Oblong, but they're not as well-funded, nor as prominent.

Hope levitates downward. Unlike his forays into Psion spaces, he can fly extremely close to the Technopaths without them spotting him or sensing anything amiss. However, Hope always worries they might have some unknown technology capable of detecting him once he draws within a certain proximity, so he still chooses to keep at least two arm-lengths from any Technopath, just in case.

At this distance, Hope can finally get a good look at the Technopaths and what they're doing. He chooses to observe a pair of mid-ranking personnel, a male and a female. The male stands atop two surprisingly slender legs, each barely the width of a sword-blade, but curved into a sideways-facing 'v' shape to retain flexibility. The male's legs taper off into two dainty metal 'feet,' though they look more to Hope like circular pads that maintain minimal contact with the ground. How the male manages to balance himself or hold his body upright is anyone's best guess.

The female Technopath, on the other hand, has two half-legs attached to her lower torso, and at the spot where a human's knees might be, there are instead anti-gravity pads, allowing her to 'walk' on air, though her movements appear as smooth as if she were simply flying around in a pod like Sangin Lidra would. Her body doesn't even bob up and down when she 'walks' across the air.

The two Technopaths work together to build what Hope guesses is some sort of energy rifle, but its alien design and incomplete form leaves him uncertain of its parameters. He easily translates the Volgrim's speech through Wordsmithing, allowing him to listen in on their conversation.

"The PTR is insufficient." Says the female Technopath. "What use is projectile velocity if it comes at the cost of heat management? Even a Symmetran could do better than this."

"There's no need to slander my work." Her male counterpart replies. "I still haven't adjusted the LL Index. I'm thinking of replacing these Victor-Tubes with a set from Clan Corona. They'll be smaller and more energy efficient."

"That will lower the maximum energy capacity." His coworker retorts. "The entire point is to create an anti-material rifle superior to the Hyperion V in all respects. If it comes up short in any category, the Analysts will classify it as a variant."

"I am aware." The male says, trying not to sound too irritated. "We can raise the energy capacity by increasing the conduit width by twelve percent. After that, we will switch these micro-fibers to nano-fibers, and that should bridge the gap."

"What model of nano-fibers are you planning to use?" The female asks, before turning to a computer terminal at the side. She quickly types in some commands to pull up the rifle's specs, then scowls. "Useless! These are from Clan Kokorat! The Viltrix Filaments use nucleonic particles to maintain their stability, and have a seven percent failure rate! That means nearly a tenth of the rifles we produce are liable to explode once deployed to the frontlines!"

"They are more volatile than I would prefer, yes," The male says, "and the Founders know I would never willingly choose to employ faulty Kokorat filaments unless absolutely necessary. But I think if we include an external nanite repair system, we can minimize the damages caused if the rifles malfunction."

"If you can ensure the Viltrix Filaments only fizzle out instead of exploding, then that might make sense." The other Technopath says. "But this is Kokorat technology we're talking about. If you include even a single component made by Kokorat, you'll instantly plummet our confidence index by at least fourteen percent. We will lose more research grants than we'll gain! Name even one military outfit willing to put untested weapons on the frontlines if they have even a single Kokorat component!"

"I'm doing the best I can, here!" The male Technopath exclaims. "Trying to improve the parameters of the Hyperion V is easier said than done! And the deadline is only two cycles from now. I have to take a risk!"

The female Technopath, clearly the male's direct superior, shakes her head disapprovingly. Her mouth-tentacles quiver as she tries to suppress her frustration.

"Tsk! If the choice is a bit of heat dispersion loss or using one of Kokorat's scrap components... just use the former. We'll have to- WAIT! Why not use Clan Aratrax's nano-wires? The Madir Mk. III's have been battle tested to endure the rigors of combat. They should mostly solve the heat and energy transfer issues!"

"We will lose a few points of efficiency..." The male replies hesitantly. "But the overall power output will certainly increase by at least twelve percent. I think this is feasible!"

"Excellent. Get to work on your revisions. We only have two cycles to complete this round of designs. And you're far from the only Constructor trying to make an upgraded Hyperion V. I will not lose our War Provision allotments to those damned Symmetrans!"

The two Technopaths drift apart, with the female heading off to deal with some other matters, while the male remains in the same spot, modifying his schematics to add new information, update his notes, and follow through on his superior's commands.

All the while, Hope quietly observes their dialogue, gleaning plenty of information about these two from their conversations.

So this is a military research facility. That's perfect. I'm sure now that it belongs to Clan Hadron. They must need the War Provisions to increase their budget so they can research even mightier weapons of war.

The Wordsmith hovers around, observing other Technopaths while shaking his head.

It's too bad. The Volgrim have long since reached a near-plateau in terms of technological innovation. They can barely make gains of a few percentage points with their technology, so they're struggling to find novel new solutions. And on a planet of trillions, there's no room for losers or drifters. You either innovate or you fall out of memory.

Doesn't help that their futures are looking more and more grim by the day thanks to the Kolvaxians.

Hope narrows his eyes. His heart hardens as he once again dwells on the thought that humanity's future will soon come under dire threat if it lacks the means to protect itself.

I need to find Excalibur!

He drifts throughout the building, phasing through floors and walls while looking for much higher-ranked Technopaths. Within a few short hours, Hope eventually travels underground into the building's subterranean layers. He finally discovers the people he's been looking for when he arrives inside a highly secure facility.

An underground chamber reinforced with ten-feet-thick exosteel walls and countless layers of security sits with a small meeting table in its center, ten seats surrounding its edges. Multiple datapads lay strewn about its surface. Five lights line the ceiling, their harsh blue color shining down to form distinct 'spots' on the table's surface. Otherwise, the room appears utterly bare, without even a hint of decorations.

A female Technopath missing the lower half of her body rests atop a circular pod levitating at the head of the table. Her keen eyes and aged skin reveal her to be someone of somewhat advanced age. She levitates before a pair of contrite-looking Technopaths who Hope quickly identifies as Clan Leaders according to the quality of their implants. However, they certainly appear to be of lower status than the female before them.

"-disappointed in you." The female Technopath says. "Clan Oblong does not intend to continue financing Clans Hadron and Victor if you cannot produce results! We have already lost two manufacturing worlds in the last five cycles! Our weapons must cut through the Plagueborn faster if we are to reverse their momentum!"

"Clan Leader Lidra," One of the lesser Clan Leaders says, her tone hesitant. "We are doing the best we can. Even our brightest minds cannot brute-force innovations."

The second female Technopath appears quite different from her counterpart, Sangin Lidra, the one leading the conversation. Very little skin remains on her body, and she appears more like a machine than a biological entity. Only her head appears to remain mostly flesh-based, but her arms and legs glisten with the shine of exosteel.

"Clan Hadron's excuses continue to pile up." Sangin Lidra retorts. "I would rather have one superior weapon capable of scything the Kolvaxian hordes than fifty inferior tools. Tell your clan to put all its efforts toward one design rather than spreading your workforce thin, if that is what it takes. No excuse, Peri Belmore!"

The male clan leader, silent until this point, flails his arm-tentacles about in exasperation. "The law of diminishing returns! If we put fifty thousand talents to work on a project, it won't get completed fifty thousand times faster, nor will it become fifty thousand times more efficient. Progress may even slow to a stop due to a needlessly complex chain of command!"

Sangin Lidra waves her tentacles dismissively. "You know what I meant. Come up with solutions. Our juniors are so focused on the War Provisions and their place in society they are entirely overlooking the Threat. This is no longer about earning credits or accruing glory. Our society will soon face an unfathomable crisis. We will have to abandon our worlds and flee to the stars. Ninety-nine percent of all Volgrim will be left behind to perish."

Peri Belmore, leader of Clan Hadron, flinches in surprise. "The Founders... they are truly considering such a contingency? I thought that was the worst case scenario?"

The leader of Clan Victor, a male named Rynor Grey, lowers his head and sighs. "The worst-case scenario is already here. I can only assume that the number of cycles remaining before our front-lines collapse are fewer than we last estimated."

"They are." Sangin Lidra says, her tone melancholic. "We might have a thousand cycles left at most. Perhaps only several hundred. The Plague's ability to evade our defenses and reach the heart of our worlds is too frightening. We simply cannot stop its spread. It even struck a world controlled by demonkind recently."

"Better the mud-dwellers than our people." Rynor Grey says. "But... I must ask. Have you heard the news from the Founder's Council? It seems the human Wordsmith recently had a meeting with Founder Unarin. We learned all sorts of new information which is currently being disseminated among the upper ranks."

"I have heard of this meeting." Lidra says, nodding sagely. "Though I have not had time to review the details."

"It turns out there is a massive folded space enveloping the entire Milky Way!" Rynor proclaims. "What we know is that it is called the Cosmic Realm. It was created by the angels in the time before Volgrimkind's ascension, during the Primordial Wars."

"Hmph. The angels." Peri Belmore says in a dismissive tone. "Undead relics. An ancient but fallen order. But now we are facing a Threat due to their incompetence?"

"All life in the Milky Way descends from the angels." Rynor Grey says. "But perhaps the angels could not fathom the existence of horrors from outside our galaxy. Either way, it appears the Kolvaxians have managed to infiltrate the Cosmic Realm and are using it to materialize on worlds inside our defensive perimeter!"

Hope's eyes flicker as he listens to the three Technopath clan leaders talk. He quickly learns about some of the antics Jason has been up to, as well as information specifically relating to the Cosmic Realm.

For a brief moment, Lidra becomes quiet. She gazes at the two lesser clan leaders with trepidation.

"This changes everything. Will we send an Executor to investigate the Cosmic Realm?"

"We are not currently certain how to enter its periphery." Rynor says. Clan Victor's leader touches his arm-tentacles together daintily, as if collecting his thoughts. "I believe Executor Nufaris may begin making attempts to locate an entry point soon, though. However, from what I have heard, few are confident we will be able to gain entry without the Wordsmith's help. The Cosmic Realm should be accessible from anywhere, but nobody is able to sense it, not even Founder Dosena. How is it possible that after all these eons, we never once detected its presence?"

The other two clan leaders nod grimly.

"I would not expect any immediate gains." Peri Belmore says. "We will have to work closely with the Wordsmith if we expect to locate an entrance to the Cosmic Realm. Perhaps this will finally allow us to eradicate the Kolvaxians at their source! I have long theorized that they are a hivemind with a controller hiding in an unknown location. The Cosmic Realm seems to be the most optimal hiding place for such an entity..."

"Actually... when it comes to the Wordsmith," Sangin Lidra says, suddenly lowering her voice to a whisper. "I have learned some interesting news. The Founders recently sent Creator Demila to investigate his world."

"Creator Demila." Rynor repeats. "She might not be an Executor, but her stealth and observation skills are top notch. What do you think her spying will uncover?"

"These are mud-dwellers we're talking about." Peri chortles, causing her mouth-tendrils to tremble. "They will not be able to hide any secrets from Demila. Rumor has it she can extend her psionic sense across the entirety of a star system. Her telepathy is not terribly advanced, but since her opponents are mere primitives, it will prove sufficient."

"Her body enhancements have reached a profound level." Lidra nods knowingly. "Her eyesight can view all visible light spectrums, the microscopic realm, and can zoom onto objects thousands of kilometers in the distance. She can even peer through walls! To say nothing of her hearing. The mud-dwellers won't have any secrets left to hide by the week's end!"

"If we can obtain the right leverage, we should be able to twist the Wordsmith's arm until he gives us what we want for free." Rynor says. "There is no reason we should divert so many precious War Provisions to an inferior species like the humans."

"Indeed."

The three Technopaths continue discussing various topics for several hours longer. Eventually, they split apart and go their separate ways.

Hope locks his eyes onto Sangin Lidra's back.

This Technopath is not one I can afford to let slip away. She WILL lead me to Excalibur!

Part 428: Secret Experiments

Sangin Lidra finishes her meeting with the leaders of Clans Victor and Hadron. After they depart, she remains in the office for a moment, deep in thought. Her eyes idly glide around the empty room while she thinks.

The Plague continues its advance. I have my tentacles full juggling fifteen different red-level tasks, but these worthless sub-clans can't even innovate more than a single-digit percent. Ridiculous. The standards for clans have dropped substantially in the last few million cycles.

She hovers two feet off the ground, lost in thought, while her expression flickers between annoyance and discomfort.

How many cycles can we truly last? All of our predictions hang optimistically on the idea that the Plague will not evolve further. But we know it will! These Kolvaxians have already begun to inefficiently harness Psionic abilities. What happens when they discover how to unleash the full power of Executors Huron and Sartran's power? All those predictions will shorten even further!

In truth... we might only have a few orbital cycles left. And that's assuming the Threat is not deliberately toying with us to lengthen our despair? I cannot shake the feeling that this invasion of our galaxy has a deeper intent behind it.

Lidra suddenly stiffens in her seat. A cold chill washes down her back as she whips her head around the room. Reflexively, she presses a button on her chair-module to call for guards.

"Who is there?! Show yourself!"

She looks around, feeling a sensation tickle the back of her neck, one which quickly vanishes. Unsure what just happened, Lidra spins around, scanning every inch of the room. Her iris modules switch to scanning all the known spectrums of light, and she even activates a Psionic Detection Node, but doesn't notice anything strange.

The door to the room swivels open, and eight heavily armed Technopaths outfitted for melee and ranged combat charge into the room.

"Clan leader! Where is the intruder?"

Lidra frowns deeply. "I am not certain. Perhaps it was nothing but... just to be sure, conduct a thorough sweep of the whole facility. We might have a rogue Psion peeping on us."

"At once!" The commanding guard says. He transmits a series of orders to his subordinates in the facility, commanding them to sweep the premises.

An hour later, the results come up negative. Slightly disappointed, but also a little unnerved, Lidra commands the guards to follow her, just in case.

Was it only my imagination? She wonders. Maybe I'm too jumpy.

She makes her way up through the underground facility's lower levels, passing through various black-box sites and inspecting the work of her direct subordinates while also glancing at information related to less important projects further down the pipeline.

As the leader of Clan Oblong, her faction's motto is quite simple.

Beauty is useless. Maximum value is what we must pursue.

Oblong focuses heavily on making weapons and technology as efficient as possible. They seek a 'perfect balance,' neither trying to miniaturize their devices to an absurd level, nor trying to cut costs beyond what is reasonable. While subjective, their internal barometers for 'efficiency' have been fine-tuned over eons, allowing them to assign all sorts of relevant metrics to their technology, and those of their competitors.

There is only one universal constant that Oblong knows to be true: It does not matter how attractive a device looks, nor how sleek a spaceship might be. The only thing that matters is its raw capabilities. This once caused many upper-class Volgrim to sneer at them, but everything changed when the Kolvaxians attacked.

Long ago, before the Energy Wars, Clan Oblong was not considered a powerhouse in Volgrim society. With no natural enemies aside from their relatively mild inter-faction wars, the other Technopaths mainly constructed technology for vanity purposes, only iterating in big ways if they happened to stumble upon a particularly novel solution to a long-standing problem.

But after the Threat emerged, their society began to experience tremendous upheavals.

Now, Clan Oblong finds itself rising to the top, approaching the prestigious heights Clan Dyna has always held.

This causes its leader, Sangin Lidra, to feel a swelling of pride in her chest.

Vanity is for the foolish. Gaudiness is a waste of resources. It is only when hard times come that other realize how essential my work is! But alas. The other clans are still far behind compared to mine. All those eons I spent suffering under their laughter and wicked gazes... if we someday cull the Threat, I will have them face an accounting for their snobbery.

This tower, the headquarters of Clan Oblong, hides countless secrets within its underground black-box chambers. Lidra pauses when she enters one such area, where she finds a group of upper-level members of Oblong's researchers testing an improved weapons system.

"Clan Leader." A male Technopath says, his eight-legged body skittering toward her. "You are just in time. That junior I told you about three cycles ago, he just completed the prototype for his Bio-electric Dispersion Gun."

Lidra nods. "Excellent. Commence the test when you are ready. I am in no particular rush at the moment."

"Of course, Leader Lidra. Just a few moments..."

The male skitters away, his long and delicate legs tip-tapping across the floor as he rushes over to his subordinates.

Inside this room, a long table sits covered in electronic equipment, mainly used for monitoring the happenings inside the test chamber. Above the table, a huge plexiglass window, made with state of the art Reinforced Chryselum, shields the observers from any harmful radiation or other things that might spill out and travel through the light spectrum.

Lidra walks up to the window and crosses her arms. She watches as a human child and two adults are led into the room.

"Oh?" Lidra idly murmurs. "You managed to procure additional subjects?"

The technician nods. "The external research divisions have been cloning them as quickly as possible, Clan Leader. But the queues for new subjects are long, and even procuring vat-grown clones is a bit troublesome. After all of our test subjects vanished, we had to scramble to keep our design rounds concluding on time. These Terrans are much too valuable to replace with less developed specimens."

After a brief pause, the technician glances at some charts. "The Development Council is working on procuring a large batch of free-range Terrans. I believe our Changeling operatives have already identified several desirable test subjects. Once she has some free time, Creator Demila will snatch a few as well."

"Psions are so short-sighted." Lidra says disapprovingly. "During the Energy Wars, they actually wanted to exterminate the human populace. Wouldn't that have been such a waste? It's much better to keep a few million around. But now that that 'Hero' has risen up... tsk. It's going to be troublesome acquiring additional subjects. Cloned subjects are far less useful for our needs."

Inside the chamber, a little boy and his parents stand naked, shivering with fear. They find themselves inside a painfully bright white room, the walls reinforced so not a single sound can escape the perimeter.

Despite being vat-cloned humans, they possess the same memories as their original 'template models' once did. They remember their lives on Earth, and their quiet suburban existences. All those memories turn to blackness at some unknown point, where they woke up inside prison-like storage facilities designed to keep them immobilized and ready for whatever horrific experiments their alien captors wished to unleash upon them.

"Dad... dad... I'm so scared..." The little boy whispers, his voice cracking.

His father kneels down to hug him. "I'll- I'll protect you, Jacob. Don't be afraid..."

His wife joins him in embracing their son. Together, neither of them even feels particularly afraid, strangely enough. They've been subjected to so much pain over the last few weeks, so many torturous experiments, that now they can only wish for a quick death.

Naturally, after being led into the testing chamber, with its cold floors and uncomfortable ambient temperature, they immediately notice the transparent glass across from them, along with the Technopaths milling about, wholly unconcerned with their captives' states of mind.

"Oh god, oh fuck..." The woman whispers, closing her eyes. "Can't it just end? Why do they keep doing this to us?"

"I don't know, Diane. I don't know..." The man mutters hollowly.

A quiet swishing of air alerts the trio to their task for the day. Their blood turns cold as the floor opens up, revealing a Technopath soldier outfitted with full combat attire. With heavy armor lining every inch of his body, he looks like he could tear through a wall of humanity's finest without breaking a sweat.

The soldier easily hefts a heavy rifle weighing more than 100 pounds (45 kilos) with practiced ease. Thanks to his augmented body, he's more than capable of lifting weapons and armor five times the gun's weight.

Seeing this horrifying weapon of war being aimed at them, the little boy screams in fright, but his parents remain calm.

Finally. We can die.

Behind the glass, Lidra watches as her technician subordinate speaks into the microphone.

"You may begin."

The soldier nods. He takes aim with the gun, then fires.

KZZAAT!

An energized tachyon burst instantly races toward the trio. Before they can react, it explodes in their face, blasting them with electrical energy and making their bodies seize up!

Like a taser overloaded to an absurd level, the Bio-electric Dispersion Gun fries the electrical receptors in their bodies, causing the whole family to gnash their teeth together, fracturing or outright shattering their molars.

A moment later, they all flop to the ground lifelessly.

At once, a dozen drones drop out of the ceiling and begin hovering over the fallen humans, scanning them and collecting data regarding their fallen figures. They lift up and wrench their bodies around without regard for the humans' wellbeing, treating them as casually as the ancient humans might have treated lab rats.

"Interesting." The male Technopath says. "These are promising results. We were able to successfully destroy their neural pathways, which resulted in instant incapacitation. Of course, we won't know how the weapons will perform until we test them in the field..."

"This is a good start." Lidra says, nodding approvingly. "But our enemies are Kolvaxians. They might possess enhanced resistance against electrical-based attacks."

"They will almost certainly adapt over time to the Bio-electric Dispersion Gun." The male replies. "But that doesn't matter. If we can succeed in capturing just one live specimen, we should be able to crack the Kolvaxian infection genome and develop a counter-measure. But we need to disable whatever signal they receive that causes them to self-destruct."

Lidra nods absent-mindedly. "Yes, yes. Keep up the good work. In the meantime, I'll see about getting you more free-range humans."

"We really do need to be bumped up the queue." The technician affirms. "It's too much of a waste to give spiritually-viable Terrans to the lesser clans."

"The supply is almost nonexistent, and the demands for fresh bodies are infinite." Lidra says blandly. "As for competing with Dyna? We'll have to settle for second place."

While the two Technopaths talk, the inspection bots inside the test chamber quickly obliterate the bodies of the fallen test subjects. They erase all traces of their DNA to ensure there won't be any contamination in future experiments, then retreat into the ceiling.

A minute later, the door to the chamber opens, and three humans are pushed inside. These three consist of a little boy, a man, and his wife.

The man shivers. He looks around the room and immediately spots the heavily armed Technopath soldier standing at attention, waiting for his next order.

The man glances at his wife.

"This... this might be it, Diane."

She nods. "I love you, David."

"Dad... dad, I'm scared..." The little boy whispers.

But Lidra and the other Technopaths pay these vat-cloned humans no mind. No matter whether they cry or beg, they will never receive any mercy.

After a few more horrifying rounds of testing, Lidra turns and leaves.

"Keep me updated."

"Yes, Clan Leader!"

She exits the room with her honor guard in tow, but pauses outside for a moment and frowns.

There it is again. That feeling I'm being watched. Is it merely my imagination?

She swivels her head in a wide arc, causing the leader of her guards to take notice.

"Clan Leader?"

"Did you scan the whole facility?" Lidra asks.

"Of course. We even called in a request to Clan Hadron. Their specialized detection matrix has not detected any anomalies."

"It's probably nothing, then." Lidra says out loud, but internally, she can't help but feel conflicted. "Let's return to my upper office. I have a meeting scheduled with Exolis of Clan Dyna later. You will accompany me for the foreseeable future."

"Yes, Clan Leader." Her honor guards reply.

Hope Hiro, having spent the past several hours observing Sangin Lidra, feels nothing but a deep-seated disgust within his bones.

He observed every moment with nothing but the utmost horror. Between his snooping on her conversations with the other Clan Leaders and the revelation of human experimentation in these secret Technopath labs, Hope managed to connect several awful dots.

It all makes sense now. I assumed the Volgrim kept humanity around for the reasons they outright stated, but of course they lied! They've been using humans for experimentation for years. I bet they don't just use us, but demons and monsters as well. And why wouldn't they?! They're a supremely powerful Type III civilization. We must make for awesome lab rats!

Hope's hatred grows exponentially every hour that passes. He watches in horror as the same family of people is brought in, blasted with the Volgrim's special neutralization gun, then promptly 'disposed' of. Despite his barely contained rage, the Wordsmith doesn't rescue these families, as saving them would only reveal his position, and they can simply be cloned again, over and over.

What truly enrages the Wordsmith is the revelation of Creator Demila's secondary purpose on Tarus II.

That Psionic bitch. I haven't even met her yet and I'm already prepared to atomize her into cosmic dust! She's stealing humans for the Technopath's sick experiments! Not just her, but the Changelings too! I have to let Neil know about this after I return.

He contemplates a great many things, all while silently pursuing Lidra like a fly on a turd. No matter where she goes or how she scans the area, she never manages to detect his presence.

The Volgrim claim that they kept humans around because exterminating us would be a terrible sin. They spoke as if this were an act of benevolence, but that couldn't be further from the truth! We're nothing but test subjects to them. Even now, they only negotiate with us to lower our guard. And Jason's such a fucking moron there's no way he's uncovered this secret yet! He's even been chumming it up with Unarin, selling out our secrets and giving the First Founder details on our troop movements or whatever other bullshit he feels like blabbing!

Unaware of the specific details of what Jason and Unarin may have discussed, Hope manufactures all sorts of outrageous thoughts, building up his rage further.

Goddammit. How am I going to fix this? The Volgrim definitely don't want us to know they're using humans for experiments. The veil of secrecy benefits them. But if we do find out, they might drop all pretenses of politeness to focus on a rapid suppression and extermination effort. Frankly, I don't think Jason is up to the challenge of fighting a Volgrim armada. Humanity's strength is insignificant compared to what the Volgrim can unleash!

Hope slowly calms down. He follows after Lidra while she rides a gravlift upward to the top levels of her headquarters.

We still have a big advantage. There are TWO Wordsmiths, not one. If Jason and I are ever in the same area, the Volgrim might try to attack and kill us both to neutralize us. Of course, they probably also want to use our Wordsmithing to benefit themselves, so... there might be a cost/benefit analysis involved. If our threat level rises too high, they will attack, but otherwise, they will work with us. And revealing I know about their human experimentation could throw a wrench into their parameters. The might benefit humanity, but it might be to our detriment too...

Hope licks his lips.

There is another way. What if I could clone myself? I could make a third, fourth, or even a fifth Wordsmith. Maybe even more. Then no matter how the Volgrim try, they'll never be able to eliminate us both.

His expression falls.

Too bad I can't clone myself or anyone else... not without Solomon's Crown. Even Centurion's calculations can't make up the difference. Jason was only able to clone me through Solomon. That means I not only need to acquire Excalibur, but the Crown as well.

I can't scan to find the Crown's location. Even with Solomon's soul inside of it, the Crown itself reads as an inanimate object to my Wordsmithing. But if I think logically, the Crown won't just be left in any random location. It will have to be locked up tightly somewhere secret. Somewhere impossible for me to locate under normal circumstances. Maybe Unarin's tower? Maybe a black-level site? Hell, it might even be at the same place as Excalibur. That would be awfully convenient.

The gravlift slows to a stop near the top of the tower, in the executive suite. Sangin Lidra exits along with her honor guard, and they stroll through brightly-lit, white-walled corridors past all sorts of upper-crust Technopath elites. Some of them nod at their faction's leader, but most continue with their business, paying her arrival no mind.

Lidra doesn't head to her personal office. Instead, she travels to a hangar nestled on the south side of the headquarters, where a personal VIP shuttle awaits. She and her eight guards climb aboard and take their seats.

"Dyna Tower." Lidra says to the pilot, a Technopath bred and trained specifically to always remain inside the shuttle, ready to ferry her anywhere she might need to go. "I have a meeting with Exolis Whitspur."

"Yes, Clan Leader." The pilot says. "Our estimated travel time is forty-seven time units."

"Is traffic heavy today?" Lidra asks.

"Not especially. Though I have heard that the Psionic Council is holding a minor exhibition match for several recently uplifted Level 6 soldiers."

"Yes, yes." Lidra replies, not particularly caring. She frowns slightly, then looks around the cabin.

"Before we leave, run a scan of the interior."

"Yes, Clan Leader."

The pilot runs a detection matrix inside the craft, but he fails to detect Hope's presence. Even so, this doesn't make Lidra feel reassured.

Hope smiles wickedly at the anxious-looking Technopath.

She can't see me, nor can she detect me, but she feels uncomfortable. It must be an intuitive feeling, like when a prey animal feels the eyes of a predator lingering on its back. Good. Very good... I intend to kill you once you've exhausted your usefulness to me, Lidra. Your atrocities are far too numerous to count.

The shuttle takes off, and Hope follows along after it, chuckling sinisterly to himself all the while.

Jason might want to someday reconcile with the Volgrim. But as for me?

I'll kill every last one of these alien cocksuckers.

Part 429: The Excalibur Initiative

Exolis Whitspur. One of the five Clan Leaders of Clan Dyna. Due to his youthful age, he might not be the highest ranking member, but he quickly rose to power due to his innovative solutions to longstanding technological blockades that plagued Volgrim society for more than a quarter of a million cycles. As such, he has come to possess much prestige among his peers, and has earned himself great accolades from his superiors, as well as his equals.

Even so, he is still only one of five Clan Leaders running Dyna. Considered the most powerful, longest standing, and most prestigious of all Technopath Clans, the influence he wields is significantly higher than that of his guest today, Clan Oblong's leader, Sangin Lidra.

The black-skinned leader of Dyna sports a red uniform with gold-stripes. Unlike other Technopaths, no visible augments appear on his body. He commands attention through his muscular bipedal build, his five-fingered hands, and his elongated skull. Despite resembling a brutish battlefield commander, the fifth Clan Leader of Dyna is neither a foolish brute nor a reclusive researcher, but a balanced fusion of the two.

He sits inside his luxurious office, an area he has designated as his inner sanctum. His walls are adorned with beautiful works of art, many of them focusing on ancient battles the Volgrim fought on hostile worlds, while others show off his rise over time to his current prestigious heights. In some images, he stands beside other noteworthy Technopath and Psion elites, showing off his extensive and solid social network. At the same time, many shelves filled with high technology line the walls, including older models of top-of-the-line black level hardware that lesser Technopath clans would kill to glimpse.

His piercing yellow eyes sweep across the contents of a datapad in his hands.

The Sentient Weapon Observation and Research Division's newest reports appear promising due to the recent acquirement of the Heroic Artifact known as Solomon's Crown. Early studies show an unexpected resonance event between the Crown and other artifacts. More information to come soon.

Exolis flicks through several other entries, some of which note the downturn of recent developments after the loss of all their viable Terran research subjects.

Unfortunate. Exolis thinks to himself. But understandable. Losing all of our Terran-biologicals at the same time has drastically slowed down our R&D divisions. However, S.W.O.R.D. has still managed to make some important gains in spite of the crisis. I'll have to reward them by diverting an additional supply of vat-clones to their head researchers.

He lightly strums his fingers on the table while falling deep into thought. Interestingly, Exolis is one of a very small percentage of Technopaths who opt to surgically replace their arm-tentacles with bone-based digits, though for what reasons, only he can fully understand. For a leader of a top Technopath clan to do so is considered especially odd, but few would ever second-guess him due to all his past accomplishments.

Strange. Reports indicate that all of the Terrans in the Milky Way were teleported to the world of Tarus II through the Wordsmith's magic. Despite this, the Terrans seem not to have noticed. If they did notice, they've remained oddly quiet. Perhaps their leaders have opted to cover the matter up? Considering the fates which would have befallen the vat-clones, I can understand why they might... but it is still an unexpected response from such a hot-blooded species.

While Exolis contemplates this divergence in humanity's behavior, a light pings on a computer console beside him. He doesn't move a muscle, but instead transmits a wireless command to receive the incoming communication request.

"Leader Exolis." A mid-level executive says. "Clan Leader of Oblong, Sangin Lidra, has arrived."

"I am presently unoccupied." Exolis says. "Bring her in."

"Yes, sir."

The line cuts off. After a few minutes, the opaque reinforced glass doors to Exolis's office hiss open, and a female Technopath hovers in, her circular pod levitating a foot or two off the floor. Exolis rises from his seat, then walks around his desk across his office to meet the newcomer.

"Ah, Lidra. You look as lovely as ever." Exolis says, taking great care to conceal his disgust at the stereotypical array of technology bolted onto her body and that useless hovering bucket which has replaced her lower torso.

So low-class. Exolis thinks, while maintaining his polite façade. Always, my fellow Technopaths want to outfit themselves with technology in such a crude, ugly manner. Subtlety is lost on them.

Lidra spreads her arms out in a welcoming gesture. "Leader Exolis, it is a pleasure to see you again. I've brought you some promising results regarding five black-level technologies, as well as seventeen red-level technologies."

Exolis nods. As expected, Lidra has brought him the information he requested. However, before he can open his mouth to respond, Lidra continues.

"Would you like me to neurally transfer my results?"

For the briefest of instants, Exolis pauses, slightly startled by this request. However, he schools his expression and nods. "Yes, yes, of course. Come and have a seat. We'll discuss your recent findings in great detail."

At the same time as Exolis speaks, he activates a subdermal implant inside his skull. This bit of technology is something quite ubiquitous among all Technopaths, as it allows them to connect to all sorts of devices wirelessly and transmit large amounts of information to and from their cerebral synapses. Naturally, Exolis's is far superior to the low and mid-grade implants his lessers possess, including advanced security and anti-hacking countermeasures to protect his existence, but those details don't matter for ninety-nine percent of usage cases.

Except for this one.

He activates a transmission link while he and Lidra turn to walk toward his desk. In the instant between instants, the two of them begin communicating at an unthinkable speed, transmitting hundreds of words every nanosecond, far faster than any lesser-biological mind can comprehend, except for perhaps a Brain Enhancer Psion...

[Clan Leader Lidra.] Exolis transmits, as his body slowly begins to turn toward his desk. [State the nature of the emergency.]

[I suspect there is someone pursuing me.] Lidra says, her body also slowly beginning to follow after Exolis. [I first hypothesized it was a rogue Psion. However, I have not been able to detect any remnant psionic patterns in the local airspace. There were also no unexpected discoveries in my headquarters, and every other scan came up clean.]

[Then why do you believe you are being followed?] Exolis asks.

[I cannot give you a concrete answer. It is merely my 'intuition.' I feel as if something is watching me, and I do not know what. I will transmit the last ten standard time units of my observations to you.]

In the single second it takes them to turn around and head toward Exolis's desk, Lidra transmits a series of emotional, mental, and psychological sensations to her fellow Clan Leader. Despite the lack of any hard data, she believes that these feelings dogging her do not come from nowhere. Exolis experiences the last ten hours of her life as identically as if he were living in her shoes. He also experiences those same strange feelings, including the sensation of something brushing the back of her neck.

[There is no hard evidence to suggest you are being followed.] Exolis states after reviewing the data. [However, you were right to contact me. I have recently received a Top Secret file passed down directly from Founder Cuanali. You are aware Founder Unarin recently spent a significant amount of time with the Terran designated Jason Hiro?]

[I am.] Lidra says, only for her heart-rate to spike. [Are you implying…?]

[Jason Hiro is presently on Tarus II.] Exolis says. [As of less than half a standard time-unit ago, we have confirmed his exact position and have been monitoring his whereabouts. This does not exclude the possibility of his powers taking an esoteric form to infiltrate our Empire. However, there is a much more likely reason for the feelings you are experiencing.]

Exolis pauses to let his next words sink in.

[The entity pursuing you may be the Second Wordsmith, Hope Hiro. We have been unable to deduce his whereabouts for several rotational cycles. Founder Unarin confirmed that Jason Hiro possesses exceptional stealth capabilities, as well as anti-stealth capabilities, which likely means his clone does too. We have already begun to search several top secret facilities for traces of the second Wordsmith, and now it is entirely possible we have unwittingly stumbled onto him due to your observational skills.]

Lidra doesn't feel any sense of pride at the thought she may have helped the Founders, but instead dread due to not one counter-measure being capable of sensing the Wordsmith's presence.

[By the Founders!] Lidra exclaims. [Then we should contact the Executors! We must capture the Wordsmith at once!]

Exolis expresses amusement through his emotional sub-connection. [That is not the decision the Founders have made. We need to maintain an alliance with the First Wordsmith. While we have observed that he has no strong attachments to the Second Wordsmith, we mustn't discount the possibility that we have overlooked extenuating circumstances. If we capture the Second Wordsmith, he may use his magic to alert the First Wordsmith to his predicament, and this could cause a serious diplomatic breakdown between our species.]

Lidra remains quiet for a fraction of a moment.

[Then what action should we take?]

Exolis's emotions spike for a brief instant, sending a sensation of condescension Lidra's way.

[The Second Wordsmith is here to investigate our Empire. The fact that no High Psions have noticed his presence means he has already learned to evade their detection. No doubt, he intends to secretly locate the Heroic Artifacts. We have already anticipated this eventuality. We will give him what he wants.]

[I do not understand.] Lidra says. [Founder Unarin passed down a directive to delete all records relating to the Heroic Artifacts and their whereabouts after we discovered the Wordsmith's emergence. Why would he wish to undo that decree now?]

[You are not as wise as the First Founder.] Exolis states. [How can you comprehend his genius? We now know that the Second Wordsmith is mostly likely pursuing you. Giving him the location of the Artifacts on our terms can benefit us greatly. Especially if we know he is coming.]

Lidra transmits a sensation of comprehension. [Of course. The First Founder is wise. He is always thinking ten steps ahead of these inferior mud-dwellers. I should not question his wisdom.]

The two of them maintain their communication link, but lower the transfer rate after communicating some more information in secret. Within a few real-time seconds, they reach Exolis Whitspur's desk. He takes a seat at the commanding side, while Lidra hovers at the receiving side.

"I have reviewed your findings, and they are quite promising." Exolis says out loud, seemingly picking up the conversation from a 'few seconds' before. "I was actually wondering if you could review the notes on the S.W.O.R.D. operation. We've run into some issues with the Excalibur Initiative."

He deliberately turns the datapad to face Lidra, though she could easily receive the information through her cerebral link if she so-desired. She in turn leans forward to look at the datapad, which displays a wireframe image of a familiar medieval blade.

"The Excalibur Initiative?" Lidra asks with a curious tone. "I am afraid that information is above my clearance level. The Founders would never entrust anyone outside of Clan Dyna with the Heroic Artifacts."

"You are an exception." Exolis says, his expression blank. "The Founders have heard about your recent successes with the Nanite Deconstruction Nodes. While they were not effective versus the Kolvaxians, they did show a lot of promise in other areas. We're willing to let you in on this specific program's details."

He pauses for a moment before continuing.

"The Excalibur Initiative recently encountered a significant setback when our experimental subjects all vanished. As such, we've run into multiple hindrances related to controlling its Divine Energy. However, that changed when we acquired Solomon's Crown. It seems we might be able to weaponize Excalibur if we can unite the two artifacts. Do you think you could provide us with any insights?"

Lidra scrunches up her face. "You evaluate me too highly, Leader Exolis. My skills are inferior to yours when it comes to the study of spiritual energy."

Exolis leans back in his chair and smiles. "What if you were to go there in person?"

"Well..." Lidra says, her tone hesitant. "My duties are significant. I do not know if I could spare that much time out of my day. Where is the S.W.O.R.D. facility located?"

As if expecting her question ahead of time, Exolis casually waves his hand above the datapad, changing the screen to show an image of a barren-looking world covered in grey dust, not unlike Earth's moon, Luna. A small but deep-looking hole on the surface easily draws one's attention, resembling a mineshaft leading into the planet's core.

"This is Serris. Some call it The Vault. It's a moon orbiting a gas giant in the Gedo system, just seventy light-cycles from here. Even if you travel at Warp Six, it won't take you more than a single cycle to arrive. But we'll provide you a Class III shuttle, so you can be there within the next few standard time-units."

He continues. "The Founders hollowed out Serris's core over a million cycles ago to keep all black-level research under lock and key. The only way in and out of the planet's core is through the tunnel bored into the moon's surface. It's a geologically stable world ideal for sensitive experiments. Not too far from Volgarius, but distant enough that snooping spies won't be able to stumble upon it by accident. The Founders keep space traffic there to an absolute minimum."

"So close to the homeworld..." Lidra idly remarks, leaning in to peer at the screen. "I truly am surprised. To think something of such importance would be within an arm's reach. Figuratively speaking, of course."

Exolis nods. "So, are you interested in my proposal? If not, I will have to request that you submit to a memory wipe of this conversation. We cannot allow knowledge of Serris to percolate among the greater population, not even for a Clan Leader like yourself."

"I am interested." Lidra quickly says. "Who would not be? A chance to engage in another clan's black-level research does not come often. And this is a specific path I have not been able to dabble in much, of late."

"You have earned this privilege." Exolis says kindly. "Your goal of capturing a Kolvaxian alive has not succeeded to date, but Oblong's innovations have reaped many Plagueborne lives. I believe that Oblong will be key to our species' future in the upcoming future."

"I thank you for your praise." Lidra says. "I will try to continue my clan's current rate of innovation."

The two of them continue to exchange pleasantries and information. After half an hour, their talks wind down, Lidra bows her, head, and she hovers out of the room.

Once she departs, Exolis remains seated, trying to 'sense' the surrounding area.

I wonder if the Second Wordsmith will take the bait? If it is not him, there will not be any harm. But if it is? I do not believe he will be able to resist.

Silently, Exolis transmits a command through his cranial module.

[Special message to Founder Unarin. I believe I have located the Lost Terran.]

Hope Hiro follows after Sangin Lidra. He listens in on her conversation with Exolis Whitspur and even gets the shock of his life when they 'luckily' begin to discuss the Excalibur Initiative.

However, after the meeting concludes and Lidra leaves, Hope begins to think carefully on the discussion he just observed.

That was awfully convenient. Here I am looking for Heroic Artifacts and I stumble upon not just Excalibur, but Solomon's Crown too? And now I know the exact location for the world of Serris. I thought I'd have to do mind extractions to find what I'm looking for, yet it just ended up vomited onto my lap.

Too easy. Waaay too easy. It seems the Volgrim don't KNOW I'm here, but they must suspect it. Their scans didn't reveal my presence, but Lidra may have made a stab in the dark at my identity. I didn't notice anything odd in their conversation, but Lidra and Exolis seemed to be explaining things in an overly simple manner, as if they were speaking to an 'audience.' Me.

He silently scratches his chin while levitating through the air. With practiced ease, Hope avoids bumping into anyone and continues following Lidra as she travels toward a hangar bay containing a special shuttle that will take her off-world.

My intuition tells me there's a sixty percent chance this is a trap. Hope thinks. That probably is the actual facility containing Excalibur, but they might have a bunch of High Psions waiting for me when I arrive.

Hope pauses. His eyebrows shift several times.

Should I try and read Lidra's mind?

Having held back from reading even a single Volgrim mind since his arrival on Volgarius, Hope feels a great deal of apprehension about doing so. For all he knows, trying to intrude on an alien's thoughts might instantly reveal his presence. High-level Volgrim might have all sorts of mental defenses he can't anticipate, ranging from the technological to the Psionic.

Maybe there's a better way. Hope thinks.

He opens his mouth.

"Prediction."

At once, a sudden blackness swallows his awareness.

* * *

Hope watches as several images flicker past his eyes.

A group of three Psions gaze at him, their expressions cruel.

[You were foolish to come here alone. We anticipated your arrival.]

An instant later, a blinding white light irradiates Hope's vision. He watches as the world of Tarus II is engulfed by cosmic energy, blasting him with its power. Hope opens his mouth to scream, but instead, he finds himself standing across from his other half, Jason.

Jason presses his palms against his eyes.

"Dead... god, they're all dead. Phoebe... Daisy... I couldn't save them! Aaaah!!"

An instant later, Jason disappears, and Unarin appears. The First Founder appears disappointed. He swirls a glass of liquid absentmindedly in his fingers.

"So much for the Wordsmiths. I guess we no longer have any choice. We'll have to enact the final measure."

A female Psion appears next to him.

[We may have lost the war, but we will never give up the fight.]

* * *

Hope's vision returns, and he finds himself sprawled on the floor. Alarmed, he quickly levitates back to his feet, only to breathe a sigh of relief when he sees Lidra some ways up ahead.

Holy crap! I conked myself out for a good ten seconds or so! I'm lucky nobody stumbled across my unconscious body!

He quickly scans the corridor but finds nobody around his position.

What the hell were those images? I was only trying to find out if the Volgrim were planning to ambush me. Maybe those three Psions were the ambushers? But what was all that about Tarus II? Why was Phoebe dead? And what 'final measure' was Unarin talking about?!

More confused than alarmed, Hope can't quite make heads or tails of those random visions. Bewildered, he quickly catches up to Lidra, then shakes his head.

Forget it! Useless visions. If I can't read minds and I can't predict the future, then I won't bother. I'll just prepare for the worst.

Now... what can I do to make sure I come out on top if half a dozen Executors pounce on me?

He boards the shuttle behind Lidra, and it takes off, leaving the world of Volgarius behind.

All the while, he evaluates his options with great care...

Part 430: Moonbase Serris

Sangin Lidra's shuttle races across the Milky Way at Warp 8, a speed most civilian vessels can't typically achieve. Even the Volgrim, once the complete conquerors of the entire Milky Way, could only afford to keep a few scattered grams of Trifrancium aboard their military vessels, at the upper limit. As for civilians, travelers seeking to immigrate from one world to another, or prospectors in search of riches for the sake of impressing their Founders, their access to Trifrancium was restricted and they had to make do with Dilithium, its weaker cousin.

Trifrancium, by its very nature, is a rare commodity valued for how it allows spaceships to break past the barrier of Warp 6. However, it is a finite resource, and one not easily located or excavated. Even the world of Tarus II, a known mine for Trifrancium, only managed to dig up a mere ten kilograms of the material over an extraordinarily long time, though as to the exact whereabouts of those deposits, not many can know...

Fortunately, the shuttle Sangin Lidra finds herself on is a rare high-class civilian vessel capable of traversing the stars while consuming a gram or two of Trifrancium. It features all sorts of amenities designed to soothe her body and free up her mind, ideally allowing her to drift off and doze for a few hours during the transit to her destination.

But too bad. Lidra doesn't dare to sleep.

During the whole trip to the moon of Serris, she can barely steady her beating heart. That irritating feeling of being watched tickles her mind, making her unable to fully focus on anything. She perfunctorily browses a datapad while trying not to look around or appear too suspicious.

The Second Wordsmith. He's here. I can feel it! This is so unnerving. I'm all alone, this ship doesn't even have a pilot. If he attacks me, nobody will be able to protect me. Oh, why did I agree to this?! I'm like a Dyklon on the chopping block!

She screams inside her head, venting her frustration silently while praying the unseen Terran isn't reading her thoughts. The entire trip, all she can think about is how she can't wait to mingle among other Technopaths and blend into a crowd.

After five hours pass, Lidra frowns, ever so slightly.

If the Terran were going to kill me, he'd have done so already. Therefore, he must not intend to do so. More likely, he wants to obtain information from me. What should I do in such a situation?

She ponders that thought, more to pass the time than to come up with a satisfying answer, until the shuttle's AI beeps a warning tone.

"Attention, VIP Passenger: SANGIN LIDRA. We have arrived inside the Gedo System and will soon reach the gravity well of Serris. Please remain seated until this vessel reaches its destination."

Lidra tenses up, wondering if this will be the moment where the Terran finally attacks her, but half an hour later, as the shuttle descends toward the grey-colored moon, she continues to remain among the living.

Her shuttle passes through a large glass vacuum-sealed dome surrounding the massive mineshaft leading into the moon's depths. Lidra looks up into the sky, where she sees the huge gas giant swallowing up a fifth of the horizon, its blood-red coloration making her feel like a tiny, insignificant speck against the backdrop of the galaxy. At this exact moment, the planet happens to be smack in the middle of its night cycle, but the gas giant's reflected light brightly illuminates its moon with an eerie red glow.

Her ship touches down in a small landing area alongside a dozen other vessels, demonstrating to her just how little traffic visits this moon. The landing ramp descends, and Lidra hovers outside into the air-filled glass dome.

A pair of bipedal Technopaths wearing brilliant red and blue robes approach Lidra. Despite their youthful ages, they don't act subserviently toward her, but instead they nod politely, approaching her as if they were equals.

"Sangin Lidra of the young clan Oblong. We have been looking forward to meeting you." Says one of the two, a beautiful female Technopath wearing a blood-red robe that glitters in the starlight. Her words carry a dismissive tone, as if the incredible advances Oblong has made during the Kolvaxian Crisis haven't particularly impressed her. "Please follow us. We will take you on a tour through our facility."

Lidra nods. "Of course. And your names...?"

The female raises her right tentacle-hand. "I am Melkia Redshift. And this male beside me is Melkia Blueshift."

"We are Children of Melkia." The male Technopath says, wearing an equally brilliant blue robe to mirror his sister's. "It is your honor to learn of our continued existence."

Lidra's heart nearly stops.

"M-Melkia? As in, the ancient installation...?"

"You know your history." Redshift says. "Yes, our predecessors once worked on the ancient weapons of war known as the Sentinels. It is a matter of pride for us, as well as one of shame. Please come along, and we will be happy to answer your queries."

Lidra shivers with excitement. "All my life, I've heard rumors of the fabled Children of Melkia! I thought your whole family lineage had gone extinct!"

Blueshift chuckles amusedly. "We do prefer when people forget we exist. It allows us to conduct our work in the utmost secrecy..."

The three Technopaths climb aboard a vehicle designed to ride down into the mineshaft. As they do, Lidra frowns.

Odd. It doesn't feel like I'm being watched anymore. Has the Wordsmith left? Or was he ever even here...?

Hope Hiro, still as invisible as ever, levitates in the void above Serris. He cracks his neck, then flexes his arms, appearing uncomfortable for some odd reason.

I'm not as limber as I hoped I'd be. Hope thinks. My arms don't feel quite right. But it will have to do. I need to protect myself, especially if the Volgrim intend to ambush me.

Hope doesn't travel down to the moon along with Lidra. Instead, he exits her shuttle some distance from the upper atmosphere, then opens up a secret dimension through his Wordsmithing. He sits inside it for a few minutes making important preparations for his journey to the underground complex, then exits and descends to Serris's grey-colored surface.

"Wow." Hope mutters to himself, as he flies through the planet's ultra-thin, barely-present atmosphere. "It really does look like Earth's moon."

The ultra-hardened glass dome surrounding the planet's singular mineshaft poses no obstacle to Hope. He passes through it as if it doesn't exist, his ghostly body slipping through the gaps in reality with ease. As he descends, Hope utters several Words of Power.

"Atlas. Inspect. Analyze. Centurion, check out this information for me and create a local memory backup."

Centurion speaks inside Hope's mind. [COMMAND ACCEPTED, PILOT HOPE HIRO. RECEIVING PLANETARY SCAN INFORMATION NOW.]

He scans the local area, and the entirety of the planet's innards, obtaining a far-too-detailed map of its interior. However, the sheer size of the world makes it nearly impossible for Hope to 'focus' on anything specific, not without requiring a great deal of time and attention. One thing Hope does notice makes him frown.

"Hmm. There are Psions on Serris, but they're all somewhat low-level. Maybe ten or twenty at the 6th Level, and none at the 7th or above. Surely, they must have predicted my coming? What else could that vision have been but an ambush?"

He pauses for several minutes, merely perusing the data his Wordsmithing has fed him. Already, he's obtained a frightening amount of knowledge regarding Serris's interior.

"It's enormous. The center of this moon is entirely hollow, with no active magma core. Somehow, through clever usage of structural supports and technology I can't even fathom, its occupants have made tons of gravity-manipulation zones suitable for all types of experiments. Much of the interior is Zero G, but they can dial up the levels as desired. Volgrim technology is kind of nuts, isn't it?"

He directs the question at nobody in particular. Even Centurion doesn't deign to respond.

During the trip to Serris, Hope didn't just sit around. Knowing he might end up facing off against high-level Psions, he took the time to reinforce his body and prepare all sorts of nasty tricks. He reaches into a small bag at his side, where he finds thirty heavily reinforced 'marbles,' each one weighing a full kilo. The bag hangs heavily on his waist, but he doesn't notice its weight due to the strength enhancements he's placed on his body.

Additionally, Hope has made himself 'invincible' through Wordsmithing. While he can't know exactly how much damage his body is capable of taking, he inherently feels he should be at about the same power level as Bael.

"But even 'Invincible' doesn't actually make me invincible." Hope mutters to himself. "Gressil completely neutralized my magic. That means others might be able to as well. Even if they can't, I've never actually fought someone 'mano a mano' with Invincibility active. For all I know, it might have some upper limit a high-level Psion could easily break."

He licks his lips, which feel eerily dry. "Whatever. I've made my assurances. Hopefully I can break in, steal Excalibur and the Crown, and escape. I don't have a clue if the Dominion Rod is here, but I might luck out. God, I hope these Volgrim aren't just screwing with me."

Hope cautiously approaches the giant hole in the ground. At over a mile in diameter, its size is far greater than any volcanic opening on Earth, or any crater caused by a meteor that Hope may have seen in images from Earth. The sheer scale boggles his mind.

"How long did it take the Volgrim to drill this? To widen it? Imagine if it wasn't even a hundred years. Analyze."

Hope idly scans the shaft as he levitates downward. While he could simply fly through the ground and keep out of sight, he's become reasonably confident the Volgrim cannot see him. If they can, then they will already know he's coming, and if they can't, he will only slow himself down by fumbling abound in the blackness of the planet's crust.

As he descends, Hope casts many Words of Power to enhance his vision. He makes out the distant sides of the mineshaft, where thousands of 'carts' rise and fall to and from the moon's core. These carts carry not only Technopaths, but a surprising number of Changelings as well. The Volgrim inside stand idly and chatter with one another, or they remain silent, ignoring the ones around them. The differences in how they treat one another seem to have something to do with their social classes.

The shiny steel walls of the mineshaft glimmer under the reflection of Serris's gas giant motherworld. Given the shaft's current rotational position opposite of the system's star, the darkness of night allows the brilliant and shiny gas giant to act as a somewhat less-luminous version of the Gedo star.

The further Hope descends, the less visible the gas giant's light becomes, and the more lights he finds dotted alone the edges of the mineshaft. Pretty soon, it becomes even brighter inside the shaft than it is outside, due to an abundange of levitating lights hovering in the center of the shaft and casting their brilliance in all directions.

Hope consults his internal map of the moon. He discovers numerous 'holes' in the shaft that, while appearing tiny at a distance, are actually large enough to fit automobiles from Earth's 21st century with ease. Some Technopaths and Changelings exit the mineshaft-carts to enter these tunnels, while others emerge from within and ride the carts up and down to other destinations.

It doesn't take much observation before Hope comes to a surprising conclusion.

There are a lot of Volgrim living here! Perhaps a billion or more.

Indeed, despite the moon's seemingly small size compared to a 'real planet' like Earth, the fact that it has been hollowed out means it actually possesses far more living space than the mere upper-surface of Earth, especially when factoring in the space 'wasted' on Earth's oceans. The true volume of Serris's living space may even rise to five or six times greater than Earth's landmasses.

Of course, if one were to factor in Earth's underground-buildable areas, along with its scalability upward like on Volgarius, the true amount of space might not prove inferior to Serris, but those details don't matter much to Hope.

"This world is a natural fortress." Hope observes. "You could drop a nuke on the surface and it wouldn't affect anyone down here. I bet there's even a way to seal the one entrance leading deep into Serris's core. Security seems tight as well, there's all sorts of checkpoints leading in and out... I wonder how often Volgrim come and go from here to the homeworld?"

Eventually, Hope reaches some sort of demarcation point, where the shaft rapidly expands outward and opens up, revealing the vast, inner world of Serris. Tens of thousands of catwalks and elevators stretch from one wall to another. Volgrim levitate through the Zero G environment, flying around with special movement modules and navigating to one levitating building or another. These orb-like modules contain various types of specialized equipment that Hope idly checks out, sometimes finding living quarters, and other times finding food consumption areas.

Some of the orb-buildings levitating in place offer gymnasiums for the Technopath and Changeling occupants to keep their bodies fit. Others surprise Hope even more due to their recreational output. Various game-like systems sit inside, with Changelings and Technopaths using them, appearing to be having the times of their lives.

"Video games?" Hope mutters, after peeking inside one of these random Entertainment Pods. "The Volgrim are actually capable of having fun? That seems... different from the aliens I've come to know."

Slightly confused, Hope pays careful attention to the Volgrim inside these pods, but ultimately he comes to the conclusion that they really are just playing games and having a good time.

"Maybe... the Volgrim here live different lives from the ones on Volgarius? Maybe they have earned the right to have fun due to their unique status?"

Hope cracks his neck, wincing due to its stiffness.

"I don't get it. But, whatever. None of this matters. I just need to figure out where in the hell Excalibur and the Crown have been hidden."

He flies from one place to another. After carefully combing through the Atlas he formed inside his Mind Realm, he manages to use Centurion to pick out half a dozen places of interest, locations where the Crown might be located.

"This moon core is freaking gigantic." Hope remarks to himself, as he passes by a pair of Technopaths flying through the air. "I can't believe how many Volgrim there are. And yet this place isn't even one percent of Volgarius's population. It's staggering to think about how many Volgrim there are scattered across the Milky Way. Even this one random moon has as many Volgrim as an eighth of Earth's population at its peak."

A faint gloominess descends upon Hope's heart.

"Wordsmithing is powerful, but even a giant can be felled if enough ants attack it. If the Volgrim ever get truly serious, will humanity stand a chance against them? We don't even have a fraction of the population of this one random moon. What do we have, like thirty million humans? That's nothing at all. And I bet Jason's so stupid he hasn't noticed the threat hanging over our heads. Luckily, Phoebe and Neil have."

Hope flickers around, traveling from place to place. As he moves, he places down spiritual Waypoints in case he ever wants to return here.

The further he travels, the greater the population density becomes. He eventually arrives at a city built on the side of a wall, its inhabitants living 'sideways' in zero gravity. He peeks in on them and even feels a bit sick to his stomach at the warped perspective, as they blissfully fly around and walk on the 'walls' without seeming to care about the change in orientation.

It takes Hope several minutes to adjust to the change in perspective. He even tries Wordsmithing to make himself adjust faster, but it turns out only time can solve the innate problem.

This city on the wall turns out to be the first of many. When he leaves, he finds others here and there, most of them with several million Technopaths and Changelings going about their days, uncaring of how they find themselves walking on the ceilings and walls.

One of these cities turns out to be a Mechanoid Research Center. This grabs Hope's attention as he finally stumbles onto one of the main 'features' of Serris, its secretive laboratories made for creating the weapons of war that will eventually go on to fight the Plague... among other enemies.

Inside the MRC, drones fly around, assembling giant bipedal, tripedal, and even quadrupedal robots. Hope recognizes some of these as highly advanced descendants of the Dragoons, the tripod-like war machines that fell upon Earth during the Energy Wars, reducing humanity's cities to rubble.

However, as it turns out, the comparatively stupid Dragoons are nothing compared to the agile, menacing-looking mechanoids being built inside Serris's facilities. Hope watches as one quadruped mech races through a training course, dodging fire from two bipedal mechs, jerking its body to the left and right, and firing back with pinpoint precision. It hefts a menacing-looking positron rifle with a hundred-foot barrel toward its enemies. Its spider-like legs allow it to delicately tap around and touch down in places a wide-footed mech couldn't.

Blat! Blat!

The mech unloads powerful energized rounds into the bodies of its opponents, shredding their armor systems and leaving them to crash to the ground.

Hope only peruses the situation with an uneasy look before pulling away and continuing his quest to search for Excalibur.

"If the Volgrim have weapons like this at their disposal, how in the goddamn hell are they losing to the Plague? Clearly I'm missing some crucial context."

Tired of looking around this world-sized planet core aimlessly, Hope fires off a Word of Power.

"Mana."

He scours the area around him, trying to detect Excalibur's energy signature, or any mana-based signature at all, hoping to stumble across their location simply due to Excalibur's sheer volume of magical power. Instead he finds… almost nothing.

Only a faint, distant blip catches his attention.

Hope frowns. "What? That's it? If that's Excalibur, it sure isn't putting out much power…"

He stares past the Technopaths floating through the air, the Changelings walking along catwalks, the structures levitating in fixed positions, toward the distant blip of magical energy…

"Maybe the Volgrim really do know I'm coming. They may have removed all of the artifacts and hid them elsewhere. My whole trip could be in vain, or even worse, it could just be an ambush."

The Wordsmith grits his teeth.

"But I have to check. I need the capital to challenge Jason. I need divine authority to take control of humanity! Otherwise, he'll always have the advantage over me."

Hope levitates toward that distant dot of mana, praying it will lead to his salvation.

But even he knows that the possibilities are slim to none…

Part 431: Nether Gate

Hope Hiro slowly navigates toward the distant, lone speck of magical energy he can sense. During his travels, he places down Waypoints with his Wordsmithing, just in case he needs to make a tactical retreat, or in the event he needs to return to the Moonbase later, among other reasons.

As a Wordsmith, his ability to teleport to different places in the galaxy is somewhat limited. Traveling any distance requires magical energy, and the further he has to go, the greater the magical cost. Even teleporting from one side of a planet to another will run out his mana in the blink of an eye, let alone jumping across interstellar distances. Zipping between worlds is essentially impossible.

But, as both Wordsmiths have found out over the years, there is one loophole: The Word of Power known as 'Waypoint.'

Waypoints somehow cheat the system, allowing Wordsmiths to transport themselves anywhere else in the galaxy they have already visited at practically no energy cost. Even better, seemingly no matter the distance or how many dimensions they have to pass through, the mana cost never increases. The single issue with this system is that it only allows them to return to places they have already set foot on, so they can't use it to travel to unvisited locations. Despite this minor limitation, it has become their habit over the years to erect Waypoints all the time, since they don't seem to have a limit on how many they can put down.

Hope takes his caution to the extreme. He moves slowly and with purpose, flicking his eyes around and observing the various facilities he passes. He stumbles across more than a few areas where experimentation on non-Volgrim takes place, making him pause to widen his eyes in shock.

Inside one such facility, a bunch of captured demons are outfitted with mind-controlling helmets, forcing them to fight one another and battle to the death. Hope slides into the control room and watches with interest as several Technopath and Changeling researchers jot down notes, chatting with one another about their results.

"The internal M.L. seems to spike when subject group A3 is exposed to great danger. However, nothing happens in group B3. This one suspects this is due to an inherent biochemical anomaly present in the brains of the B3 subjects."

"I disagree! This has to do with their souls. Don't you see how their Magical Affinity Index is rated 0.0071% higher than the subjects in A3? The reason their M.L. is lower is because of discrepancies in their soul parameters!"

"Your postulation has no evidence to back it up. We are unable to properly measure the quality or type of soul a Sentient Individual possesses. Therefore, any statements along this line of thinking must be presented purely as an opinion."

"You're too insistent on following 'hard evidence'! Just because we can't observe the differences in a group of sentient souls doesn't mean those differences don't exist! We already know souls are the key to altering the types of magical abilities mud-dwellers can unleash. If we can just find a way to measure them..."

"Better Technopaths than you have tried. This one has watched for more than three hundred thousand cycles while our best and brightest failed to make a single device capable of accurately measuring Soul Resonance. The only method left is to use a magical device to search for information regarding a soul, but this one lacks confidence the Volgrim can create one capable of suiting our needs."

"Just because others have failed, that doesn't mean this will be the case forever! Furthermore-"

Hope tunes out of the conversation, despite finding it to be a little interesting. He notes that the Volgrim seem unable to properly assess souls on a scientific level, a thought which gives him pause.

What are souls, anyway?

One of the demon groups fighting eventually gets overpowered by another group. They scream in pain as their opponents rip them apart and feast on their flesh, commanded by the mind controlling helmets to follow their basest desires.

Shaking his head, Hope levitates away. Even in an observation facility, the demons are still mindless killing machines. I won't let them fool me like they've fooled Jason!

He passes by several other similar areas. With the human 'livestock' no longer ready and available, Hope finds that the Volgrim here have had to supplement their stores with demons and monsters. More than a few times, Hope encounters gruesome experimental facilities where vat-cloned humans are subjected to horrific torture, all for the sake of advancing these Volgrim scientist's sick and twisted scientific hypotheses. Fortunately, their numbers are few and far-between.

Hope begins to grow numb to the horrors on display. His cold, rational mind dulls some of his anger, reducing his seething hatred to more of a passive existential timer placed upon the Volgrim.

"It doesn't matter how this war concludes." Hope mutters to himself. "Whether the Plague overruns you, or you eventually eradicate it, there will be no salvation. If you somehow come out on top, I will stomp what remains of your civilization into ground meat. I will flay the skin off your Founders' bones. I will condemn you for the horrors you have wrought."

* * *

After more than ten hours, Hope finally draws near enough to the mana signature he detected earlier than he can get more of a detailed idea what it even is. He finds himself at the absolute center of the planet, where all of the power being produced elsewhere accumulates into a technological device he can barely even comprehend. Through some unknown physics, a pair of giant pylons aim at one another and fire a ceaseless, unending blue laser together that coalesces into a hundred-meter-in-diameter spiraling blue portal not unlike the Warpgates found in the Labyrinth and on Tarus II.

However, unlike those portals, which require a Warpgate, this one appears to use some sort of unknown exotic material to empower the dimensional resonance. Hope faintly senses that the mana fluctuations emanating from the portal might actually belong to Excalibur and the other artifacts, but he cannot tell for sure.

What really makes the giant portal stand out is in fact its sheer size. By comparison, the portals on Tarus II are just barely big enough to allow small armored vehicles to drive through them, with anything of an especially large size proving impossible to fit except by piecemeal breakdown-methods of transference. On the contrary, the gigantic Serris portal towers more than ten times larger in diameter than the Warpgates Hope is familiar with, making him raise his eyebrows.

The amount of energy required to keep this portal open must be astronomical. Truly, you cannot underestimate the Volgrim under any circumstance.

Hope glances around the area. As he does, he notices something… strange.

Despite the high-tech nature of the Gate Facility, and the number of powerful-looking mechanoids and turrets in place to defend it... not a single Volgrim stirs in the area.

The hairs stand up on the back of Hope's neck at this realization. He quickly looks around, but fails to find a single Volgrim anywhere, not even inside the cockpits of the war machines.

"Detect." Hope says, sending a Word of Power outward. He waits with bated breath, but his spell tells him that the nearest Volgrim scientists are more than five kilometers behind himself. Somehow, he entered what should be the most highly-secured area on Serris, yet he failed to notice the complete lack of life nearby!

At that moment, a deep but feminine voice drifts into the cracks of his mind.

[Enjoying the view, Wordsmith?]

Hope's body tenses up. He quickly whips his head around and spins in the air, taking up a defensive stance while looking for the Psion who spoke.

Not seeing anything, he fires off more Words of Power. "Detect! Locate! Reveal!"

However, his spells fail to uncover the Psion's hiding location. His heart grows cold at the realization someone could not only sneak up on him, but also detect him without him noticing.

[You appear alarmed. But do not worry,] The Psion says. [I am not your enemy. Allow me to introduce myself. I am Confessor Vulpanix... and I have been waiting for your arrival for quite some time.]

Sensing the eerie mental link attached to his thoughts, Hope narrows his eyes. "Trace!"

This time, he strikes gold. He latches onto that faint psionic energy link and causes a bright blue trail of energy to light up in midair, the stringy trail leading to a seemingly empty patch of space just a hundred meters in front of him. A moment later...

"Reveal!"

This time, Hope targets that specific point in space, causing the air to 'wobble' and vibrate. A dimensional shrouding effect breaks apart, revealing a powerful Psion wearing golden robes and a luxurious-looking helmet with seemingly no noteworthy combat utility.

The Psion, Confessor Vulpanix, blinks in surprise.

[Oh? You uncovered my hiding location quite easily. It seems you were able to trace my psionic link back to my position.]

Hope glowers hatefully at her. "How are you able to see me?"

[You think that I am an Executor.] Vulpanix states. [I am not. I am merely a Confessor. A 7th Level Psion. It just so happens that I possess a set of skills that make me uniquely adept at sniffing you out.]

Hope double-checks himself and finds that he is indeed still completely invisible, shrouded by his Wordsmithed protections. None of them have faded, and even the sound that leaves his mouth shouldn't be perceptible to the Psion before him, yet she is still able to do so. This realization alarms him.

[Calm yourself, Second Wordsmith.] Vulpanix says with a sneer. [If I wanted to kill you, I could have done so when you were unaware of my presence. I expected to find you through the fluctuations of your soul, but in fact that clever field shrouding you has made me unable to sense it. However, your pitiful attempts to hide in the Ethereal Dimension were your ultimate undoing. I have long specialized in sniffing out the more obtuse and esoteric threats to my glorious Empire.]

"Oh?" Hope says. "You can't sense my soul, but you can sense the... fluctuations around me?"

The Confessor floats a little closer to Hope, clearly not fearing his powers in the slightest.

[So rudimentary. I can tell that you are only able to hide yourself due to that special power of yours, not because of any particularly novel understanding of Folded Space. You may still be happy to know that I was only able to detect your approach when you reached 2,500 meters from your current position. Before that, you actually managed to evade my senses.]

Hope nods slowly. "Assuming you're not lying, yes. Yes, that does warm my little mud-dwelling heart."

For a brief moment, the human and Psion both remain quiet.

[You appear to be quite hostile toward me.] Vulpanix says. [Not that I can blame you. While I awaited your arrival, I took the liberty to read up on all of the intelligence we have procured regarding your creation, development, and ambitions. You are quite the interesting clone...]

Hope licks his lips. "Is this the part where we beat the shit out of each other? I'm not interested in swapping barbs with an alien."

[I think you will be.] Vulpanix says, smiling at him with her eyes. [According to the intelligence, you and Jason Hiro do not possess the most... amiable relationship. He created you, and then cast you aside to do all the hard and dirty work while he lounged about on Tarus II, living a fun life with his spouse and child. Is this description accurate?]

"Don't try to play word games with me." Hope fires back. "Any reason you and I have to chum it up is purely for your own benefit. And based on what I've seen, your haughty Empire will treat humans like test subjects and throw us away the moment we lose our usefulness!"

Vulpanix cocks her head slightly. She scrutinizes the human's face with a long look of boredom.

[It seems the intelligence was indeed right on the mark. You value the lives of your fellow humans dearly. I assume you have seen some of our more... extreme experiments?]

"You're goddamn right I have." Hope growls. "I watched a vat-cloned family, a man, his wife, and their little boy get killed over and over again. It was barbaric! You treat other Sentients like garbage!"

[Your assessment is accurate.] Vulpanix affirms. [Non-Volgrim life is beneath Volgrim life. But is our mindset really that incomprehensible to you? Did humans not test their own scientific advancements on less-developed sentient creatures?]

Vulpanix motions with her hands, conjuring up a psionic projection of a human, followed by several other animals from Earth.

[Monkeys, baboons, apes, chimpanzees... for decades, even centuries, humans tested all sorts of awful and vile experiments on these lesser creatures, these sentient 'animals' capable of feeling pain and loss. Yet your species treated their cries of pain, their begging for forgiveness, as useless nonsense. We Volgrim might be experimenting on humans, but we are not experimenting on ourselves, nor are we experimenting on our biological ancestors. Surely, this experimentation performed by your species is far more unforgiveable than what we have done to lesser aliens.]

Hope frowns. He opens his mouth to retort, but Vulpanix raises her palm.

[I don't want to hear about how you, specifically, would never do these things. By that same account, neither would I. I have not engaged in these experiments. I have not subjected lesser creatures to torture for the sake of research. I neither endorse nor condone it, I merely observe and point out the hypocrisies inherent in your argument.]

Hope clamps his mouth shut. He scowls at her.

"Experimenting on monkeys and apes was... it wasn't good. It was terrible. But we outlawed those practices by the time I was born. And there's still a difference between animals incapable of speech and sentient humans, demons, and monsters capable of vocalizing their pain."

[We could argue this matter all day.] Vulpanix states firmly. [But I have no further interest in quibbling over philosophical degrees of morality. If you wish to hate my species for the way it has treated yours, I cannot stop you from doing so, and neither do I have any interest in trying.]

The Confessor tilts her head up to dismissively look down the bridge of her nose at the Wordsmith.

[I have come here to speak to you about a potential... collaboration.]

"A collaboration?" Hope asks, suspicion in his voice. "Explain."

[Let us not play out the conversation in a manner that would make us both look foolish.] Vulpanix says. [You want something. I want something. A transaction is therefore possible. A weak-minded, idiotic, useless mud-dweller might try to acquire something through promises, or pacts, or contracts. But those are terms set between the weak and strong. You are strong, and so am I. The best basis for cooperation is and always will be one which relies on a system of benefits.]

Hope slowly nods. "That makes sense. So... what sort of benefits are you proposing?"

[You came here to obtain Excalibur. And Solomon's Crown. And the Dominion Rod.] Vulpanix says, making Hope's heart drop into his shoes. [I can give them to you.]

"What?!" Hope exclaims. "You would GIVE ME the artifacts? Do you think I'm stupid?! There's no way I'd believe that!"

[Not long ago, the thought would never have entered Founder Unarin's mind.] Vulpanix says, her tone carrying a hint of ominous warning. [But that recently changed when we made a certain... discovery. We would never have considered giving such a powerful artifact to a Wordsmith, knowing how it could supercharge your abilities.]

"Because using the mana I have now versus the mana Excalibur could give me would mean a vast difference in outcome." Hope observes. "...So what changed?"

Vulpanix crosses her arms.

She taps her fingers on her elbows, looking at the Wordsmith with a hint of wry amusement.

[What do you think happened?]

Once again, Hope's heart drops, making him feel a cold sweat.

The Volgrim... they must have found out about Jason's Cube! If they know he already possesses a massive mana battery, then Excalibur won't supercharge him all that much! And that means he's become a threat to their Empire!

Hope reels from this realization. He levitates backward, ever so slightly, while several emotions flash across his face.

That means Vulpanix- no, Unarin... Unarin must want to use me as some sort of... of counter-balance to Jason! He wants to turn me into an unstoppable object capable of breaking Jason's immovable defense.

Seeing the looks of surprise and shock on Hope's face, Vulpanix nods in tempo to his thoughts.

[I am unable to read your mind.] Vulpanix says. [You have shielded your thoughts well. Even so, you humans are so emotional, so easy to read, I don't need telepathy to know what you're thinking. Yes, we know about the First Wordsmith's Cube. And that presents you with a unique... opportunity.]

Hope returns his attention to the Confessor.

"You misunderstand something, Vulpanix. I am not fond of Jason. I don't like the way he rules, or the way he treated me, or his naivete... but I will NOT be your puppet. I will not turn myself into a cudgel to weaken humanity."

[Of course not.] Vulpanix says patiently. [The High Volgrim understand that the galactic situation is changing, Hope Hiro. Perhaps the Milky Way will not have any room for our grand and glorious Empire in the future. Perhaps humanity will rise up to overthrow us. But our survival is not in doubt. Even if you and Jason were to unite and eradicate Volgarius along with ten thousand of our other worlds... we have made countless contingencies to ensure our survival. Our best and brightest will flee to the farthest reaches of the Void. We will travel to other galaxies and take up residence there. And who knows? Perhaps in ten million cycles, we will return once again, unstoppable and inexorable. We are nothing if not patient.]

"Your lifespans are certainly long, that much is true. And I can only imagine Unarin thinks in terms of the cosmic scale." Hope says, nodding along to Vulpanix's words. "A long-lived ruler like him has surely made plans for tens of thousands of years from now."

[If the Kolvaxians assimilate the Core Worlds, the Milky Way will fall.] Vulpanix states factually. [It is more important to us that a rational species remains in control of our home 'seed.' The consequences of the Milky Way falling to a foreign invader are... incalculable.]

"So what is your proposal?" Hope asks. "You want to give me three godlike artifacts. I can only imagine the price you intend for me to pay won't be low."

[A correction.] Vulpanix states. [We do not 'want' you give you the artifacts. However, the changing situation has required us to evolve our mindsets. Our Empire is not as rigid and conformist as you may have led yourself to believe. Founder Unarin is wise beyond your comprehension. He is neither benevolent nor merciless.]

"Fair enough." Hope mutters, feeling slightly annoyed by Vulpanix's dancing around the issue of what she wants from him. "But stop bullshitting me. What do you want in exchange for my help?"

Vulpanix pauses. Her eyes curve slightly, giving the impression of a sinister smile, despite the lack of a mouth on her face.

[The first thing I want is for you to learn some important Truths, Hope Hiro. You will need to expand your horizons if you are to become a willing partner with the Volgrim Empire.]

"So you do want me to work for you." Hope says, feeling even more suspicious than ever regarding this all-too-kind 'offer.'

[With us. Not for us. There is an important distinction.] Vulpanix replies. She gestures toward the hundred-meter portal. [If you wish to know more, you will have to follow me into the Nether Gate.]

She shrugs in a decidedly human-like manner.

[Or we could simply fight. But I think your curiosity will override your hatred. You want to see what we have to offer before committing to any acts of aggression. Especially knowing what attacking me would mean for humanity as a whole.]

"And now you're resorting to threats." Hope retorts. "What will you do to humanity? Attack us? Piss Jason off? Don't make a threat you can't back up."

Vulpanix doesn't respond to his prodding. She merely gestures to the Nether Gate once more.

[Make your choice, Second Wordsmith.]

Hope spends a few minutes quietly contemplating Vulpanix's offer. He weighs the pros and cons of following her into an unknown location, through a portal that might shred his body at the molecular level and instantly kill him.

But, compared to simply attacking him when he was unaware of Vulpanix's presence, this idea simply seems ludicrous.

If Vulpanix wanted to kill me, she'd have done so already. And obviously my Wordsmithing has real value to the Volgrim. It's only natural they would want to secure me as an ally. I don't know what 'favors' they'll ask of me, but the price shouldn't be something I'm unwilling to pay...

After hemming and hawing, the Wordsmith reluctantly admits defeat. He gives in to his curiosity and silently nods at Vulpanix.

The two of them come to an unspoken understanding. She levitates toward the Nether Gate and passes through. Hope grits his teeth and follows her into the opaque portal, never once being able to guess what could be on the other side.

What he does ultimately see shocks him to his core.

"Is this... Heaven?!"

Part 432: Fragmented Past

A blinding white radiance batters the Second Wordsmith's eyes as he steps through the Nether Gate. That same radiance, an all-encompassing light that chases away shadows in all directions, is one he has seen through visions granted to him by Solomon, some months earlier. He immediately winces, recognizing that this radiance is not something that can be casually replicated, mostly due to its holy properties. The thick spiritual energy in the air immediately tells Hope everything he needs to know.

"Is this... Heaven?!"

[It is.] Vulpanix says, sagely blinking her eyes. [Or rather, it is what remains of Heaven. It is The Vault we use to store and maintain Heroic Artifacts.]

Hope glances around his immediate vicinity. He doesn't find any Volgrim in the area, but he does spot hundreds of beautiful white trees, all of their trunks glowing with light. Plump, round fruits hang down from the branches, each one radiating spiritual energy.

Some distance from the bright blue Nether Gate itself, Hope notices structures sticking slightly out of the ground, but they are not made of steel, concrete, or any other inorganic matter. Instead, they appear to be constructed out of wood and clay, seemingly primitive, yet also surprisingly intricately designed.

Finally, not even a kilometer away, Hope frowns when he sees a huge wall of light. He spins in place and looks all around himself, finding that this wall surrounds the Nether Gate in all directions.

[That is Heaven's Boundary.] Vulpanix says. [Not too large, is it? Quite small, even. There's not much left of the Angel's Realm. After the final battle in Heaven at the end of the Energy Wars, ninety-five percent of it was destroyed. Now all that remains is a fragment of its former greatness.]

Hope levitates around the immediate vicinity. He frowns as he looks at the mana-rich trees. He heads to the edge of the Boundary, but when he tries to pass through it, his hand presses against an inexorable force that resists him no matter how hard he tries to breach its limits.

Finally, he returns to the Nether Gate and shoots Vulpanix a complicated look.

"So. We're in Heaven. Does that mean the Nether Gate has brought us all the way to Earth?"

[You don't know?] Vulpanix asks, before her eyes flicker. [Ah. That's right. It was not you who spoke to the First Founder, but your original self, Jason Hiro. You are unaware of Heaven's fate. The Angel's Dimension shattered during the final battle with demonkind. Now, it no longer resides in the space around Earth. We have moved it to a more suitable location rich with life.]

"Serris?" Hope asks.

[No. Serris is not suitable for sustaining Heaven's need for rich life energy. Instead, we wrapped what remained of Heaven around a certain paradise-class planet rich with fauna and flora. The Nether Gate allows us to step across the galaxy and arrive inside this secret location. But that does bring me to the reason I brought you here. You see, the Volgrim have a... dilemma.]

Vulpanix lifts off the ground and begins to levitate toward the forest of bio-luminescent trees. As she approaches, she speaks to Hope.

[My people are more than capable of creating 'folded spaces.' After all, the Psions are masters of altering and manipulating the void itself. But sustaining those spaces in perpetuity is, as of this moment, beyond our capabilities. Heaven is different. It is a folded space which requires no regular maintenance.]

She turns to look at Hope with deep meaning.

[I'm sure you are able to follow this line of discussion.]

"You want me to help you make folded spaces?" Hope asks.

[In a roundabout manner, yes.] Vulpanix replies. [We already possess the means to create sustainable folded spaces. We are simply unable to do so at present.]

"If you possess the means, how are you unable to make use of the means?" Hope asks, now visibly confused. "And how would you even know you possess the means if you CAN'T use them? You're talking in circles."

Vulpanix doesn't immediately answer him. Instead, she reaches up to one of the nearest Divine Trees and plucks a fruit from its branches. She casually tosses it to Hope, who catches it with ease.

[Eat that.] Vulpanix says. [It provides little benefit to a Volgrim, but for a mud-dweller like yourself, it should prove quite invaluable.]

Hope raises an eyebrow. He examines the large fruit in his hands, looking at its perfectly spherical surface. It vaguely resembles a small cantaloupe, albeit with an orangey, peachy skin, edible by humans. A sweet aroma drifts off the fruit's surface, and what shocks Hope the most is the surprising amount of mana contained within its center. Even a spiritually-dull person like himself can easily sense its energy.

[It isn't poison.] Vulpanix says with a hint of contempt. [If you think a High Psion like me needs to stoop to such a lowly level to deal with a mud-dweller, I'll fight you right here and now.]

"Oh, I know it's not poisonous." Hope murmurs. "But... what is this fruit? Why is it so rich in spiritual energy?"

[Surely, you have heard of the 'Garden of Eden'?] Vulpanix asks, her tone mostly rhetorical. [It is a figurative place alluded to in several holy books from your homeworld. It is said that the fruit of the 'Tree of Life and Death' could grant humans peerless knowledge, making them as wise and all-knowing as their Creator.]

"...So this fruit will make me smarter?"

[Some things are beyond the power of even a Creator.] Vulpanix says smugly. [It will not enhance your intelligence, not in the slightest. But... well, take a bite and see for yourself. The tests we have performed with various mud-dwellers were quite... enlightening.]

Hope resists the urge to immediately bite down. Instead, he utters a few Words of Power.

"Inspect. Analyze. Origin."

Hope scours the spirit-fruit with his Wordsmithing. He discovers through his magic that its interior is even more densely packed with mana than he first expected, but most shockingly...

"What the hell? You call this a Soul Fruit?" Hope asks, looking at Vulpanix with shocked eyes. "It enhances a person's soul?"

[Tsk. You humans always go on about how the Volgrim aren't any fun, but then you immediately ruin the surprise.] Vulpanix complains. [I did not know your magic could even uncover the names of objects. That is a fact I will have to note in my report.]

Hope's heart skips a beat when he realizes he accidentally gave the Volgrim intelligence about his abilities. Internally, he curses at himself.

[But yes.] Vulpanix continues. [These are Soul Fruits. They are capable of slightly enhancing a human's soul, though the effect on a demon will prove quite gruesome, due to their mortal weakness to divine energy. These fruits can only grow inside of Heaven. It took several millennia of research to produce their trees. We are even confident we could grow different types of plants, all capable of enhancing other 'metaphysical' aspects of living beings. Ah, but then the Plague attacked, and we had to divert valuable research assets elsewhere...]

Hope nods along to her words. After a moment of contemplation, he bites down onto the fruit and begins to chew.

Having expected the fruit to taste orgasmically good, or to melt in his mouth like an apple fritter, Hope raises an eyebrow when he realizes the Soul Fruit actually tastes quite bitter, even a little sour. While the taste is a bit unpleasant, it's still far from unbearable. And so, he continues to hesitantly munch on it, eventually consuming the whole thing within a minute or two.

After making sure to clean up its inner core and slurp up all the juices, Hope casually drops the inedible remains of the fruit to the grass at his feet and smacks his lips.

"Well. I have to say. Taste-wise, I'd rather eat an apple. Or pretty much any other fruit, if I'm being honest. And it doesn't seem like anything obvious has changed inside of me."

Hope does notice that his slightly fatigued mind, having remained awake for days already, feels a bit more rested than before. Additionally, while the mana expenditure for keeping his invisibility and stealth active hasn't been all too high, it has drained some of his mana. But now, his mana refills back to full, likely due to the fruit supplementing his reserves.

As for his soul... Hope doesn't notice any major changes in its composition, but he does feel a slight bit more 'aware' of the mana in the air. Unfortunately, he isn't entirely certain if that's because his soul has slightly improved, or because of a placebo effect.

[Yes. Most mud-dwellers did complain about the taste. But such a trifle is unimportant.] Vulpanix says, her tone haughty. She folds her hands behind her back and assumes a domineering posture. [How many methods do you have at your disposal to improve your soul? Not many, I'd wager. This is but one benefit you could obtain by... cooperating with my people.]

"Another benefit for me." Hope says dryly. "This deal just keeps getting better all the time. Curious, then, that you haven't told me what you want from me."

[That comes now.] Vulpanix says. She gestures to the structures 'growing' out of the ground in the distance, half a kilometer away. [We found that inorganic matter, when built en-masse, could affect Heaven's delicate balance adversely. Therefore, we grew life-friendly eco-structures instead. Why don't we take a look at what's inside?]

Hope follows after her without complaint. He throws a casual glance back at the Soul Fruits and frowns.

I do have ways to greatly strengthen my soul, though. I could devour the souls of others to empower myself. Demons would be best. Though I do wonder if there would be serious adverse effects if I did that. These fruits seem like a much safer, albeit slower method of soul enhancement...

Despite the relatively short distance to the eco-structures up ahead, Vulpanix flies at a weirdly casual pace, barely covering any ground at all. Hope considers asking her what the holdup is, until she turns her head to look at him.

[Second Wordsmith. Do you know what makes me unique among my fellow Psions?]

"I'm sure you're about to tell me." Hope replies.

[There are many 'Confessors' in our great Empire.] Vulpanix says, her tone slow and ponderous. [The title a High Psion earns can tell you a lot about who they are and what their specializations are. How much do you happen to know about Psions?]

"Not much at all." Hope casually lies, unwilling to tell her about the last two weeks he's spent scouring the Psionic Enclaves of Volgarius. "But do feel free to enlighten me."

[Mmm. Not much at all, he says.] Vulpanix chuckles, making Hope frown. [I am a Confessor. Confessors use their psionic specializations to cause others to 'confess' information. Broadly speaking, that is how we choose to employ our abilities. What makes me unique is that I am the only Soul Confessor in the whole of the Volgrim Empire.]

"Soul Confessor?" Hope repeats. "And that means...?"

[I am not the only Psion, nor the only Volgrim able to sniff out and detect souls. I am not the only one able to manipulate them. No doubt, some of the Executors, and even Founder Dosena herself are far superior to me in many regards. But I am uniquely qualified to distinguish important nuances in souls that others cannot. Perhaps not even the ancient Archangels...]

"You think you're better at handling souls than the Archangels?" Hope asks, smirking in amusement. "I think Raphael would have some choice words if he heard you bragging so openly."

[The First Archangel has his strengths. I have mine.] Vulpanix says.

She pauses a stone's throw away from the bio-structures up ahead, the white tree-like buildings barely popping out of the ground. Then, she turns to Hope.

[What color is your soul, Hope Hiro?]

The Wordsmith blinks. "Color?"

[That's right. What color is your soul? Is it white? Black? Red? Blue? Have you ever thought about that question before?]

"Can't say I have." Hope answers. "I assume you're going to tell me it matters a lot?"

[Oh, most certainly.] Vulpanix nods. [More than you can possibly imagine. You see, I was born a thousand cycles after your so-called Energy Wars had concluded. By that point in time, many great Psions had already looked into Soulcrafting, and many considered themselves to be masters. But I was different. I was hungry to leave my mark on the Volgrim Empire.]

Vulpanix spreads out her palms.

[I began to research the metaphysical aspects of mud-dwellers, and in doing so, my Psionic Seed became more powerful far more quickly than did my peers. In just eighty-thousand short cycles, I advanced to the rank of Confessor, and I owe that speedy advancement to the unique aspects of you Terrans!]

"And what does that have to do with soul colors?" Hope asks. "Not to be rude, but it sort of seems like you're rambling a bit."

[Haven't you ever wondered why demons seem to evolve unique abilities as they advance in demonic power, but at the lowest ranks, they often stray into only a dozen or so major archetypes?] Vulpanix asks. [Why is it that the Archangels and the Valkyries possessed such a variety of metaphysical powers, but the lower ranks all had only the most homogenous and boring abilities? Why can Psions gain metaphysical powers, but the other Volgrim subspecies cannot?]

[And,] Vulpanix asks, [why is it that humans possess no magical capabilities whatsoever, yet Heroes can emerge from the most ordinary of your kind?]

"Well, that last one is easy to answer." Hope replies. "The Heroic Aura empowers humans, giving them the strength of angels and Titans."

[Ah, so you are unaware...] Vulpanix replies, smiling with her eyes. She waggles a finger in Hope's face like a disapproving parent. [No. The Heroic Aura does not 'empower' humans. It merely... 'heals' a certain defect already contained within their bodies. It was my investigations which uncovered this fact. Indeed, all humans should possess the power to magically enhance themselves on a metaphysical level, but the angels placed a defect inside their vessels, preventing them from doing so.]

"Bullshit." Hope says. "That's not how magic works. Are you lying to me?"

[Your other half already knows the truth of the matter.] Vulpanix answers. [He and Unarin shared many secrets with one another. In the interests of furthering our relationship... I have been permitted to inform you of these revelations.]

"So you're telling me the angels intentionally made humanity flawed?" Hope pushes further. "Why would they do that?"

[Why ask a question to which you already know the answer?] Vulpanix retorts. [The angels suffered due to their creation of the Dragons, Titans, and Demons. Does it not make perfect sense they would spiritually cripple their newest creation to prevent your rise?]

For several long seconds, Hope becomes quiet. He ponders on what Vulpanix has told him and compares it to his existing knowledge-base.

Did Solomon know about humanity's crippled nature? And if he did, why didn't he tell me? Hope wonders.

"So what color is my soul?" Hope asks, after regaining his bearings.

[I am unable to sense yours.] Vulpanix says. [That barrier around you is quite difficult to see past. If you drop it, I'd be happy to tell you.]

"Ah." Hope grunts. "No, I don't think I will."

[It will be difficult to build a mutual cooperation between us when you harbor such distrust toward me.] Vulpanix says 'sweetly,' her syrupy words sounding oh-so-grating to Hope's ears. [I've shown you my sincerity. Where is yours?]

"You've shown me a carefully crafted narrative to butter me up." Hope responds. "And yet you still haven't told me what it is you want from me. Don't act like you're doing me some huge favor by tossing me a few fruits which you already said were useless to you and some information you already told Jason. I'm not an idiot."

[The color of one's soul affects many different metaphysical aspects of their potential.] Vulpanix explains. [By looking at one's soul color, I can also tell what sorts of attributes they might later come to possess. This makes me excellent at uncovering the future potential of a mud-dweller, or even a Psion. For example, I once had the chance to peer at your other half's Soul Color. Jason Hiro's soul was quite interesting. It was actually a rainbow of different colors, mixing together five major affinities into one blend. I have to wonder if your colors will differ from his...]

"So, what, the color of a person's soul determines the powers they can wield?" Hope asks. "And a rainbow means they get a versatile power like Wordsmithing?"

[You have heard of Specialists and Generalists when it comes to magi, yes?] Vulpanix asks rhetorically. [The color of one's soul determines not only the types of metaphysical abilities they will be most adept in, but how adept they will be in wielding their gifts. This applies to mud-dwellers and Psions alike, a fact that earned me great accolades among my peers. Unfortunately, the ability to detect a soul's color lies outside the scope of what Volgrim technology can currently achieve... and that is where you will be able to assist us.]

Vulpanix gestures to the bio-structures sticking out of the ground. Their cream-colored wood intermingles with the beautiful green grass, creating a fantastical atmosphere Hope might even describe as 'somewhat Elvish.'

A door to one of these small structures opens under Vulpanix's psionic control. Hope walks inside, and Vulpanix follows after him.

Shielded from Heaven's Light, the sudden relative darkness makes Hope wince. He utters a Word of Power to forcibly alter his eyesight, only to find himself inside an underground terrarium, one filled with countless exotic flora from all manner of distant Milky Way worlds.

Plants hang from the ceiling. They grow on the walls. They slither up out of cracks in the floor, with some of them appearing vine-like, and others resembling Bonsai Trees. Some plants have fruits or vegetables hanging off their branches that Hope has never seen. Others smell quite foul, making him crinkle his nose.

A faint green light pervades the room, quite different from Heaven's omnipresent bright white light that not even closing one's eyelids will obstruct. Its soft, earthly glow makes Hope feel at ease, as if he's entered an underground wonderland reminiscent of a paradise.

But when his eyes stray to the far wall of the terrarium, his heart jumps into his throat.

A fifteen-foot-tall statue stands erected, a figure of a woman holding one hand up to grasp hold of a palm-sized planet. Two wings protrude from her back. Her dark brown skin contrasts with the greenery around her, making her look like a tree that has taken root inside the Terrarium. Her five splayed-out fingers hang but a few inches from the planet, as if tantalizingly close to taking hold of it, yet failing to close the final gap. A look of longing hangs on her face...

And on that outstretched hand, a single golden band rests on her fourth finger.

The ring of an Archangel.

"Is that Uzziel?!" Hope gasps. "The Archangel of Creation?! Why is her ring here? What's going on?"

Vulpanix nods sagely. [Archangel Uzziel. During the Final Battle in Heaven, she became wracked with grief and rage. She unleashed an attack that annihilated multiple Demon Emperors and countless Dukes. She expended all of her vitality and self-detonated, tearing apart Heaven until only a fragment remained. In the end, her ring fell to the ground, and the demons parlayed with us to obtain their benefits.]

Vulpanix leads Hope closer to Uzziel's statue. He marvels at its lifelike appearance, and how it almost seems as if it could reach out and touch him. If the statue came to life and started talking, he wouldn't even be surprised.

"You have Uzziel's ring." Hope says. "Is that why you brought me here? To convince her to do your dirty work? You think she might listen to a Hero instead of you?"

Vulpanix's eyes lower, ever so slightly.

[Unfortunately, I don't think your words will have much effect, Hope. You will not be able to convince Uzziel to do anything.] Vulpanix says.

She pauses.

[After all. The Archangel of Creation is… dead.]

Part 433: S.W.O.R.D.

Both shocked and curious, Hope slowly approaches the statue of Uzziel. It perfectly mimics her original appearance in every way, while at the same time being made entirely out of specially-grown wood. Like a tree grown over time to somehow perfectly form the shape of a living person, Uzziel stands in place, her sightless eyes gazing vacantly past Hope to a world beyond his comprehension.

"She's dead?" Hope asks. "What do you mean? Why can I feel a trace of her energy still here?"

[There is far more than a 'trace' of the Earthmother's aura here.] Vulpanix says contemptuously. [You are simply too spiritually dull to sense it. Indeed, her affinity to life has enhanced the growth of all living things in Heaven. Even this underground arboretum.]

"But you said she was dead." Hope points out. "So... how can that be?"

Vulpanix draws nearer to Uzziel's statue. She looks at the Archangel's ring, but does not touch it.

[That is a somewhat complicated question to answer. You see, the Archangel of Creation experienced a violent fit of rage during the final moments of the Final Battle in Heaven. In an unexpected, uncharacteristic manner unbefitting the personality we had all grown accustomed to, she erupted with a bloody wrath, tearing apart several Demon Emperors, many Dukes, and countless other lower demons. She obliterated Heaven by drawing upon its internal mana reserves, then detonated her soul to unleash one last ultimate attack.]

Vulpanix slowly shakes her head.

[The Volgrim were not privy to that final battle. No, we arrived after its conclusion, only to witness the mountains of corpses that lay piled atop one another. We saw the aftermath of her outburst. Not myself, as I was not yet formed, but I have read the reports and seen the holo-images. It was a... gruesome sight. Quite horrifying, if I'm being quite honest.]

She continues. [The Earthmother died, along with all her brothers and sisters. The Archangels ended up inside their rings. Since the demons had fought that final battle, they held dominion over the rings and refused to give them up without... concessions. Unarin paid quite a price to obtain Uzziel's ring, but left the others to the demons.]

"You paid a hefty price for a dead Archangel." Hope repeats. "Yet the implication seems to be that she is not truly dead."

[Her soul was shattered to dust.] Vulpanix explains. [The other Archangels also died, and for the first few millennia, they did not awaken inside their rings either. But eventually, they did. Uzziel did not. Her broken, shattered soul remains inside this ring. And that is one of the reasons why I've brought you here today.]

She turns to look at Hope.

[The Earthmother is technically dead. But she is not truly dead. We have sustained and nourished her soul over the eons. We placed her ring inside Heaven and anchored this realm to a world rich in life energy, all in the hopes of someday bringing her back.]

"You... want to use her powers?" Hope asks. "And you want me to use my Wordsmithing to try and revive her."

[The Archangel of Creation is not like the other Archangels.] Vulpanix explains. [She possesses the Creator's Seed. While we once sought to obtain the Codex, the key of life, from Emperor Lucifer, her creation abilities are but a pale shadow of Uzziel's. Lucifer cannot create new life. She can only corrupt existing life into forms which already exist. But Uzziel... she can create something from nothing. And that is a power we must obtain if we are to defeat the Plague.]

Hope crosses his arms. He smirks at Vulpanix.

"Look at you, twisting the truth. You want me to believe you need Uzziel to fight the Plague, but that isn't the case. She might prove useful there, but that's hardly why you first picked up her ring. Considering the Plague didn't start popping up until a few thousand years after the Energy Wars, and considering you paid for her ring right after the Energy Wars, you must have wanted her abilities for another reason."

Hope begins to walk back and forth, pacing in front of Vulpanix while hemming and hawing.

"Hmm. Now, if I were a galactic empire in full control of the Milky Way, what would be my number one goal moving forward after defeating humanity? Ah, I know. I would want to augment my empire's strength further. Uzziel's powers would certainly come in handy for something like that. I could genetically strengthen the Psions, making them even more unstoppable. The Technopaths could become not just intelligent, but physically mighty as well. The Ascended, the Dolgrimites, the Changelings... there would be so many ways I could use her power, it's no wonder I'd want her ring for myself."

Vulpanix narrows her eyes. [And what of it?]

Hope stops to face her again.

"The answer is obvious. You don't need Uzziel to revive so you can defeat the Plague. You need her to revive so you can escape the Milky Way if things go south. Then you can put her to 'good use' empowering your species by force. She won't even be able to resist. She's not a short-term gain for you, but a long-term one. And that changes the equation for what value I provide, doesn't it?"

He continues. "If she were only useful in the short-term, I wouldn't be able to extract many benefits for myself. But since she will provide you with powerful upgrades over the coming eternity, I think I'm entitled to far more benefits than you were going to sucker me into accepting."

[You are surprisingly agile-minded when it comes to your greed.] Vulpanix replies blandly.

Hope doesn't reply. Instead he walks over to the statue and hovers up to its splayed-out hand. The statue's fourth finger holds Uzziel's ring, and he observes it for a moment.

"Will anything happen to her if I remove the ring?"

[The statue stabilizes her condition.] Vulpanix answers. [But you may remove the ring for a short while. It will not affect the Earthmother negatively.]

Hope nods. He starts to reach for the ring, but pauses.

"...You're really okay with me taking the ring? What if I teleport away? I could screw you over pretty badly."

[You might not be the most intelligent entity in the Milky Way,] Vulpanix says, [but you have much to gain by working with us and much to lose by making us your enemy. I trust you would not do something so imbecilic.]

"Mmm. Fair enough. I am pretty good at... gauging the odds of my actions." Hope says, his words slightly cryptic.

He plucks the ring off the statue's hand, then slides it onto his finger.

After a few moments, Hope immerses his consciousness inside the ring's interior. What he finds is a broken and shattered world. While all of the Archangels tend to live within pure quite voids inside their rings, Uzziel's ring appears more like a shattered pane of glass, with giant cracks and fissures inside the ring's interior.

Hope easily finds Uzziel's soul. He appears before her in an instant, frowning as he looks at her horrifically deformed and mutilated 'body'. Arms and legs grow out of places they definitely shouldn't. Her 'body,' which is actually just a representation of her soul remains, twitches every so often. Two heads sprout from her shoulders, with each of them sporting shuffled facial features. One of the heads has seven eyes. The other has nine. And neither of them have their noses or mouths in the correct places.

Slightly disgusted by the sight, Hope sighs to himself.

Every vision Solomon showed me demonstrated that Uzziel was a kind and loving person. For her to end up like this... it's just not fair.

He retracts his consciousness and reappears in the material realm where Vulpanix gazes at him in disinterest.

[Quite a pitiful sight, isn't it?] Vulpanix asks. [I am unable to connect to Archangel Uzziel's soul. No Volgrim can. We have had to experiment on humans to create temporary beings who were capable of interfacing with her soul. Unfortunately, their bodies destabilized, so we could only obtain verbal and telepathic reports of what they saw before they ultimately died.]

Hope licks his lips. "I... I don't know if I can bring her back to life. She's still... alive. Sort of. But even if I can heal her soul, she won't be the same. She's been suffering like that since the end of the Energy Wars. I'd rather just... end her life. Give her peace."

Vulpanix's expression sours. [Do that and you will receive nothing from us. You may find the Earthmother's predicament painful to look at, but compared to the fate of the galaxy, it is nothing at all.]

"Even if I bring her back," Hope points out, "that doesn't mean she'll be capable of doing anything but crying or wallowing in depression. She'll be a broken shell of her former self."

Vulpanix shakes her head. [You are laboring under a misconception. We do not need Uzziel to act consciously in order for the Volgrim to make use of her abilities.]

Hope frowns.

He thinks about the implication behind Vulpanix's words for several seconds before curling his upper lip in disgust.

"You... you want me to give you a way to use Uzziel's power freely? Without her consent?"

[Exactly.] Vulpanix says, caring little for his evident disgust. [You could make a device of a magical or mundane nature. It would allow our people to interface with the Earthmother's powers. We could use them as we pleased. The better the device you create, the more concessions we are willing to give.]

She pauses, noticing the look on Hope's face.

[Get over yourself, mud-dweller.] Vulpanix snaps. [Your aversion to this minor action is revolting. The Plague captures living sentients and turns them into mindless drones, making them fight to capture and kill their enemies. Consider how many lives you could save with the Earthmother's powers, then get to thinking about how to satisfy our request. Considering how many lives you have taken since your cloning event, I do not imagine you are as averse to this task as you pretend.]

Hope's frown lessens somewhat, but he still feels relatively mixed on the issue.

"I... I might be able to heal her soul. Maybe I could make a device capable of wielding her creation powers. But... alright, let's talk business. What's in it for me?"

[You know, I respect a greedy person.] Vulpanix muses. [You're always certain of where you stand with them. Follow me. I'll take you to the next location of interest.]

She pauses to gesture at the statue. Hope nods and place Uzziel's ring back on its finger. Then, Vulpanix leads him a little deeper into the Arboretum. They round a pillar to find a door leading to a spiral staircase descending into the wall, and the depths of Heaven.

Hope follows Vulpanix. They quickly move through the stairwell, its interior illuminated by glowing mana-stones charged via Heaven's energy. Before long, they arrive inside a small room with another glowing portal, though this one is colored an ominous blood-red instead of purple or blue.

The Wordsmith watches as Vulpanix steps through the portal.

For a brief moment, he hangs back, thinking about shutting the portal off, stealing Uzziel's ring, and leaving.

Her ring could benefit humanity tremendously. Plus... she doesn't deserve to be used and abused by these goddamn aliens. She should be with her brothers and sister.

But he doesn't do that. Instead, he flies toward the portal.

If there's an ambush waiting for me on the other side, I'll make Vulpanix regret crossing me. She has no idea the surprises I can unleash if she sours on our 'cooperation.'

He travels through the portal and arrives inside a steel-laden factory, a bunker of some sort with conduits of blue light and energy running along the walls. Hope glances around, sensing a tremendous amount of magical energy in the area.

"We're... back on Serris?" Hope asks. "That's odd. I... I sense countless Heroic Artifacts! But I couldn't before."

[We are indeed back on Serris. In a manner of speaking.] Vulpanix says, gesturing to a group of Technopaths standing at attention just a hundred feet away. The Technopaths look at Vulpanix, but don't notice Hope at all, given his currently invisible body. [We are inside a... Special Containment Zone. This is the Sentient Weapon Observation and Research Division. S.W.O.R.D. for short."

A pulse of magical energy collides with Hope's barrier, momentarily making him visible to the Technopaths. They notice the disturbance in the air and look in his direction, but he turns invisible again a half-breath later.

"The hell?"

Hope glares at Vulpanix, but she doesn't pay his annoyance any heed. [I can already see you. What does it matter if these Technopaths can too? They are senior researchers, the cream of the crop. The best and brightest in the Volgrim Empire. You should let me introduce you to them.]

"Not interested." Hope gruffly says. "Let's get on with actual business."

[Fine. But I do insist you learn the name of at least one person here.] Vulpanix says. She directs her eyes to a certain Technopath, someone with powerful-looking steel legs, a burned body, and a deformed face that makes her barely even identifiable as a female. [Do you know this one?]

Hope frowns. She does indeed look a little familiar, if only due to her highly distinctive appearance.

"I... think I've seen her somewhere before."

[She is Psymin Miralax. One of the last living Celestial Designers. The Celestials were a group of Technopaths who created the Sentinels. Not many of them remain. Only a handful, as you humans would say.]

"I think I saw her during Unarin's broadcast..." Hope murmurs, before uttering a Word of Power. "Memory. Ah, yeah. He mentioned her name. She must be pretty important."

[Important. Yes. That is one way to put it.] Vulpanix says quietly. [I am a mighty 7th-Level Psion. Yet if the Plague were to strike Volgarius, Founders Unarin and Dosena would toss me aside, along with all the others of my rank and below, so long as it ensured the survival of the Celestial Designers. Their importance may even be greater than the Executors themselves. And for your information, Founder Cuanali is also a Celestial Designer. That means Psymin Miralax is regarded nearly as highly as our Fourth Founder herself.]

Hope raises his eyebrows. Hearing such reverence in Vulpanix's tone, he realizes that not only would the Volgrim gladly throw Vulpanix aside like garbage if it meant protecting Psymin's life, Vulpanix herself would not even complain! She would probably consider it an honor to die in the service of such a superior specimen like Psymin.

Perhaps Vulpanix herself regards Psymin Miralax as humanity would a 'God,' Hope muses to himself.

The Technopaths standing at attention tilt their heads slightly. Then they turn and walk away, dismissed via a private telepathic message from Vulpanix.

[We will enter now.] Vulpanix says.

They walk through the only doorway leading out of the gate transfer room. As they pass through the exit, Hope feels a shift in the air, as if he has passed through a bubble, or the membrane of a biological organism.

A torrent of holy energy suddenly buffets his position, making Hope visibly wince. As if he has stepped into the periphery of a storm, Hope can practically feel the winds of mana crashing against his barrier. He hastily strengthens it with his Wordsmithing while looking around the room.

What he finds leaves him in awe.

Hope now stands on a small outcropping of a giant wall, one that drops a hundred stories above and below his current position. Every ten meters, Hope will see a different hole in the wall, and this goes on in a spherical shape all around the interior of a truly unfathomably gigantic facility.

Now standing inside a space seemingly blasted apart via a nuke into a perfectly spherical shape, Hope finds that he has truly entered the Vault itself. Each hole on the wall is covered by energy-imbued glass, containing most but not all of the mana of countless Heroic Artifacts. Truly, even if he were to try and count them with his eyes, Hope might not even be able to guess their total number.

"What..." Hope whispers. "What am I looking at? Are ALL of those holes filled with Heroic Artifacts? There must be thousands of them!"

[Not quite.] Vulpanix says. [The maximum capacity of the Vault is seventy-three thousand artifacts. At present, only two percent of the alcoves possess an artifact. Given how many Heroes have walked Earth's surface, we will never be able to fill it up.]

Hope's eyes sweep across the opposite walls and the walls around him, but ultimately it's a single beam of light in the exact center of the facility that draws his attention.

A torrent of magical energy travels from the ceiling of the spherical interior to the floor. And smack in the middle of this torrent of power, a powerful artifact levitates.

Excalibur.

Hope's heart quickens. He gazes at the artifact greedily, but quickly sobers himself up.

"That's Excalibur? But the beam of magical energy... it's almost like..."

[As if Excalibur is powering the Vault?] Vulpanix challenges. [That's right. It is. Excalibur provides power for not only the Vault, but the whole of Serris as well. Its reserves are truly beyond comprehension.]

Excalibur dumps ambient energy into the local environment. At the same time, high-technology-based energy-siphons greedily slurp up Excalibur's excesses in order to transmit that power elsewhere.

[Excalibur is perhaps the most remarkable of all Camael's creations.] Vulpanix remarks solemnly. [It absorbs residual ambient mana into itself, and when its reserves are full, it simply releases that power for us to use. And the best part? Even though the Volgrim cannot properly utilize mana for our own purposes, we all still possess mana in our bio-vessels. The greater the number of Volgrim who live on this planet, the more ambient mana we release, allowing Excalibur to further augment its energy reserves.]

She pauses.

[In short, it practically bypasses the laws of thermodynamics!]

Hope becomes more excited at this explanation, but that feeling quickly vanishes, replaced instead with a sinking realization.

There's no way I can obtain Excalibur easily. He thinks. It has too many applications for the Volgrim to just hand it over. They're going to want me to pay an exorbitant cost!

This realization causes him to experience several mixed feelings. He eyes Vulpanix from the side, but makes no particular moves, waiting to hear what the Confessor has to say next.

[Excalibur's energy production is truly impressive.] Vulpanix says, turning to face the Wordsmith. [But... it can be replaced. Taking energy from a local star is not too difficult for us Volgrim. Creating a Dyson Node is something we do all the time to transmit energy to our populated worlds. In that respect, Excalibur is far from irreplaceable...]

"But?" Hope asks, prodding her along that train of thought.

[But that does not mean we have the resources to throw around casually creating Dyson Nodes.] Vulpanix retorts. [If you want the artifacts you seek, you will have to not only assist us with Uzziel, as I previously requested, but a few other matters as well. For instance, building the infrastructure to replace Excalibur's functionality. If you can use its magical reserves to augment your Wordsmithing, this should be but a trifle of a favor.]

Hope's lips begin to feel dry again. He cautiously licks them, then presses them together.

"Is that all? Repair Uzziel's ring, build the energy infrastructure necessary for you to replace Excalibur, and perhaps some other... miscellaneous tasks?"

[Yes...] Vulpanix says slowly. [Other miscellaneous tasks.]

"How many? And to what extent?" Hope asks cautiously.

Vulpanix does not immediately answer. She fans out her fingernails and idly examines them, looking away from Hope as if he suddenly isn't all that important in her eyes.

[You seek a short term venture, it would seem. What we want is much longer-term. It would be a shame for you to waste your Wordsmithing on mere idle pursuits, don't you think? This war between humanity and demonkind, is it not rather petty? The basis for cooperation exists, but why do you hesitate to go any further?]

Hope narrows his eyes.

"Why? Because your species has dominated the Milky Way for the past several eons. Any gains I might make from this transaction will surely pale compared to those you will earn. On top of that, the Volgrim have not only tested their inventions on humans in the past, you still do so even now! And you really expect me to trust you when the terms are so beneficial for you but so limited for me?"

Vulpanix snorts. She and Hope fully put their attention on one another, having finally reached the bargaining part of their meeting.

[You want to speak of benefits? Let us not bring up how heavily Excalibur will inflate your strength. What of the Dominion Rod? It is largely useless for us, yet its ability to control and influence human minds will surely prove potent in your hands. And Solomon's Crown! Need I say any more about putting the greatest library of knowledge atop your head? These three artifacts alone should never be possessed by a single individual, lest they go power-mad and try to conquer the galaxy. Yet you act as if you are being slighted!]

"You're trading away three artifacts that either have no use to you or can be replaced for an Archangel's power that will vastly enhance the Volgrim Empire's strength over time." Hope argues back, standing his ground. "You lose practically nothing but you gain a great deal in return!"

The two of them begin pushing and pulling, each one trying to gain leverage for their own side.

"You want to use Uzziel's power to create more folded spaces like Heaven!" Hope exclaims. "Who knows what dastardly secrets you'll be able to hide all across the Milky Way?!"

[And you can already do such a thing with your own power!] Vulpanix retorts. [The fact you haven't already shows that we Volgrim are superior! We know how to properly use the strength we possess!]

"Long-term cooperation benefits you far more than it does me!"

[If you think this is the only card we hold that you might want, you are sorely mistaken! Helping us without complaint will give you access to our other stores in the future!]

"You want a subservient Wordsmith slave you can hand some crumbs and get back gold from." Hope says. "Your sincerity isn't nearly enough. Show me more."

Vulpanix becomes quiet.

She eyes the Wordsmith with an ambivalent gaze, her eyes betraying no particular emotion.

[I do like a greedy person.] Vulpanix says quietly. [You always know where you stand with them. But sometimes, one can take their greed a little... too far.]

"You think I'm asking for too much?" Hope replies. "I'm sure an intergalactic empire can pull a few more goodies out of its ass. Let's not play stupid."

Vulpanix doesn't budge. She merely stands firm, waiting for the Wordsmith to relent.

[Our terms are generous. What we ask of you is far from excessive. Do not press your luck, Second Wordsmith.]

The corner of Hope's eye twitches.

That term she keeps using.

It didn't particularly bother him at first, but in this moment, it truly grates on his nerves.

Second Wordsmith.

Second Wordsmith.

Always the follow-up choice. Always reminded of his inferiority.

He knows that the only reason the Volgrim approached him is because their first pick, Jason, would never have agreed to their terms.

Always, Jason gets the good parts of life, while Hope gets the leftovers.

A moment of silence passes between the Wordsmith and Confessor. Perhaps sensing the change in atmosphere, she cocks her head.

[Do you... disagree?]

Hope's eyes flicker. His pupils dilate, ever so slightly, a fact that Vulpanix does not miss.

"You know..." Hope murmurs. "I've treated you with respect this entire time. I've never implied that you were below me, or less than me, or inferior to me. But always, you look down on me. You look down on humanity."

[You are mud-dwellers. This is the natural way of things.] Vulpanix says, her tone frosting over. [Do not ruin this opportunity for yourself. It will not end well for y-]

Hope accelerates.

From a standstill, his body suddenly and violently races forward at the speed of sound.

Like a cannonball fired when nobody expected it, he blasts away from his position, his hand aimed at Vulpanix's chest.

THOOM!!

The Wordsmith crashes into the Confessor's body, exploding her like a bomb and spraying her entrails all across the area. He flies forward and slams into the opposite wall, his 'invincible' body taking no damage from the collision while causing alarms to ring out inside the facility.

His heart racing, Hope turns around to see what little is left of the Confessor sliding down the nearby walls.

"I reject your terms." Hope hisses, smiling evilly.

However.

The air shivers. It vibrates, like churning water seen through an aquarium's glass.

Vulpanix steps out of a tear in the fabric of space and idly glances at the remains of her 'other self' sliding down the walls.

[As I said, Wordsmith. You have made a foolish choice.] She says, smiling with her eyes.

Part 434: Cleansed Mud

Recommended Listening

Vulpanix and Hope Hiro remain in the same spot for the briefest of instants. They size one another up, and both of them sneer at the same time.

Then they attack.

Hope lunges toward Vulpanix at the same time as she rushes toward him.

They collide!

The 'invincible' Wordsmith and his enemy slam into each other with violent force. Vulpanix's 'clone' doesn't get caught off-guard like before, and manages to summon a barrier to envelop her body. She smashes Hope's face with her fist, knocking him backward. However, the collision doesn't even rattle Hope, as he hardly feels the impact.

The Psion's eyes shift in concentration. The Wordsmith's body is far more durable than I expected. It is as if I'm punching a solid slab of Living Moldanium! Capturing him alive will be tricky...

She flickers around, leaving afterimages and a trail of psionic energy as she pursues the Wordsmith like a ravenous shark in the ocean. She batters him with psionic-imbued punches, only for Hope to bark out a Word of Power.

"Teleport!"

Hope jumps behind Vulpanix, then swings his hand back. In his grasp rests a sword identical to the one hovering in the center of the room. Vulpanix barely has time to react as a lethally sharp blade cuts across her midsection and lowered arm.

But she vanishes!

The Confessor phases out of reality and steps through a gap in space, barely evading Hope's strike.

[Excalibur!] Vulpanix exclaims. [You've created a replica?! Wordsmithing is truly formidable.]

"It's not as good as the real thing." Hope says with a confident smirk. "But it doesn't have to be. Arthur!"

Completely startling Vulpanix, a human figure suddenly appears behind her, someone vastly different from Hope in appearance. A man of mature age, with thick golden hair and shining white eyes.

King Arthur, the black hole construct!

In the instant between instants, Vulpanix's enhanced brain allows her to sense and investigate the newly appeared person, and she fails to detect a soul inside it. She immediately and correctly concludes 'Arthur' must not be a real human, but her scans fail to penetrate deeper than the surface of his skin.

Even more frighteningly, the psionic energy she directs toward the Construct ends up partially sucked inside it, slightly empowering its abilities!

Arthur rears his arm back. The Excalibur replica appears in his grasp, teleported there by Hope, and Arthur slashes in a wide arc toward Vulpanix's midsection.

He misses!

The crafty Confessor once again steps across reality, appearing a short distance away, just out of reach. She blasts the Construct with telekinetic power and shoves Arthur backward, but he recovers in an instant and relentlessly surges toward her again.

[Fighting me is a terrible mistake!] Vulpanix warns Hope. [Pull back now and I will treat this as a mere diplomatic blunder!]

"I'm not going under anyone's thumb again!" Hope roars, while Arthur tries and fails to cut Vulpanix down a second time. "You can eat my ass, you lying alien bitch! Everything here is mine. Especially Excalibur!"

Hope suddenly turns to the center of the room. He holds his hand toward the divine blade and grins. "PULL!"

Hope surges his Wordsmithing out to try and grab Excalibur, but...

The divine blade remains unmoved!

Startled, Hope quickly realizes why he failed. The magical power enveloping the blade from ceiling to floor actually nullified the strength of his Wordsmithing, turning Arthur's artifact into an immovable mountain.

"Shit! Guess I'll have to take it myself!" Hope says out loud.

With Vulpanix occupied by Arthur, Hope quickly flies forward, rushing toward the divine blade.

But, alas.

A second iteration of Vulpanix steps out of a gap in space right before Hope and aims her palm at him.

Before Hope can react, he disappears from the spot and reappears on the opposite side of Excalibur and its divine beam of holy light, hurtling toward the opposite wall. Momentarily confused, Hope accidentally flies inside of the wall, traveling into it without stopping in time.

Realizing he's been had, the Wordsmith directs a glance backward while turning around and racing back into the Artifact Vault.

"Sneaky! But that won't work twice! Immovable!"

He turns himself immune to the effects of teleportation, despite knowing this will hamper his own efforts at zipping around. He does this while once again racing toward the divine blade.

"Excalibur is mine!"

At once, a gap in space opens up before Hope. Three copies of Vulpanix fly out and race toward him, turning his heart cold.

"So many?!"

One of the Vulpanix's fires out a hundred thin 'threads' of Psionic energy, entangling Hope like a spiderweb. The other suddenly increases the force of gravity on Hope's body tenfold, making him unable to properly control his flight. The third races before him and raises her fists overhead.

WHAM!

Vulpanix smashes Hope downward, toward the floor, causing him to phase through it and disappear into the planet's depths.

At the same time, one of Vulpanix's other copies struggles to battle Arthur, but what she finds is that this strange non-human entity cannot easily be damaged! And his sword, while not at all like the actual Excalibur, has its own frightening properties.

The damned weapon can cut through anything!

She tries to summon a psionic barrier to shield her body in expectation of releasing a counter-attack after deflecting Pseudo-Excalibur, but the blade swipes past her barrier effortlessly and severs her arm, making her quickly jump back and yank the limb to herself. She reattaches it while dodging Arthur's follow-up attacks, all while her mind realizes more and more just how prepared the Wordsmith actually came.

What a surprising fellow. A lauded Confessor put on the back-foot by a mud-dweller. But this Wordsmith is no ordinary human! I may have to initiate the Cleansed Mud protocol...

Vulpanix carefully weighs her options while also best thinking of how to capture the Wordsmith alive if possible.

After all, killing him might eliminate a major threat, but at the same time, that worry always lingers in the back of her mind, as well as Unarin's and many other top Volgrim...

What if killing one of the Wordsmiths triggers a secret alarm? What if Hope and Jason's strife isn't as severe as it seems? What if they have been carefully concealing other clones? What if they haven't, but they possess the option to make more at a whim?

The Volgrim lack one crucial piece of information, something that would surely tip the balance of power if they ever found out.

They do not know that Solomon's Crown is a requirement to create more Wordsmith clones.

If they knew, a series of major actions would certainly be undertaken with great haste, but lacking this knowledge hampers their hands in a dire manner.

Killing Hope could cause a massive secondary war that would overwhelm our already strained combat capabilities. Vulpanix thinks at high-speeds. Better to capture him alive. Then we might even be able to make full use of his abilities...

Indeed. In much the same manner Ose came to that conclusion, so too have the Volgrim. Killing the Wordsmith would only prevent him from becoming a threat. But capturing him and turning him into a mind-controlled slave would benefit them far more!

It is for this reason that Vulpanix regretfully holds back her strength time and time again. She does not complain, as she knows her success here will make her a hero of the Volgrim Empire, a figure to be lauded for tens of eons to come.

If the Volgrim can capture the Wordsmith, every single terrible thing that has befallen them will reverse course in an instant!

With the Wordsmith's power at their disposal, the Volgrim Empire will turn the tables and obliterate the Plague ruthlessly!

Even if they fail, so what?

They will still have the backup plan to flee to another galaxy, but this time with a magical slave capable of vastly empowering their social order. They will someday return and completely conquer their home galaxy once more!

Vulpanix ruminates on this information silently, never leaking to her opponent the truth of the matter.

As Hope leaps out of the floor to fly toward her, Vulpanix conjures a ball of psionic energy in her palm. This corrosive, destructive force will surely pierce through Hope's defenses, ensuring that not even his incredibly durable body and fully withstand its effects. After all, it doesn't just target the body, but the soul as well!

Right before Vulpanix can spring her trap, Hope abruptly speeds up. His body becomes an afterimage as he rushes behind her and swings his fist down.

SPLAT!

Hope crushes the head of one of Vulpanix's three copies, making the condensed energy ball explode and engulf that figure, destroying it entirely. Before her other two selves can react, Hope falls upon them as well!

"FIRE!!

Hope sends three ultra-dense marbles rocketing at one of Vulpanis's two remaining selves. Despite trying to summon a hasty barrier, the Wordsmithed projectiles tear through her defenses and break apart her head, hip and spine, killing one of the other two mercilessly.

The remaining copy gasps in shock.

So fast! I thought he was at the limits of his speed! How did he...

She struggles to pull away from Hope as he races toward the third Confessor copy, but to her shock, she finds that her body and mind are working much more slowly than she's used to.

He didn't speed up. The little mud-dweller slowed me down!

Too late, Vulpanix's final copy realizes the truth of this matter. She transmits her realization to the 'main body' right before Hope rips her apart, killing her on the spot.

Hope grins like a werewolf hungering for blood. "Keep sending copies, Volgrim! I know you can't keep this up forever! You must be wasting a boatload of Psionic energy summoning more of your other-selves!"

Hope fires off a Word of Power. "Trace!"

Just like before, he follows the line of energy from the three Confessor clones he just killed to a hidden, secluded place of origin, a folded space on the edge of the arena. His eyes turn blood-red as he rushes toward that spot.

"Expose!"

Hope tears Vulpanix's true body out of that fold in space. As he charges toward her, the Wordsmith minutely slows his speed. He gazes in horror at her body, which now appears... absolutely unnerving. Very different from what he expected.

"What the fuck?! Are you wearing a meat-suit?!"

Hope stops a short distance away. He grimaces in horror at the strange 'thing' clinging to Vulpanix's body. The faces of various 'people' sit attached to her figure, appearing vaguely human, though he can't be entirely certain. Even Vulpanix's head isn't visible, as this horrifying 'meat-suit' engulfs her entire figure.

[Hideous, isn't it?] Vulpanix asks, satisfied by the look on Hope's face. [Project Cleansed Mud... it wasn't supposed to be revealed like this. But what's done is done. I must defeat you here.]

Abruptly, Vulpanix steps toward Hope, then vanishes. The Wordsmith barely manages to trace a trail of energy zipping past his position, lunging toward the center of the Vault.

The Wordsmith turns his head. He follows Vulpanix's movements with his eyes as she grabs for Excalibur's hilt.

The hell is she doing? Excalibur won't allow a non-human to- WHAT?!

To Hope's utter shock, Vulpanix grabs onto the holy blade's hilt. A massive amount of divine energy flows into the meat-suit wrapped around Vulpanix's figure, but does not reach her actual body. It causes her no harm, and instead massively empowers her, causing her strength to skyrocket.

Hope levitates backward a short distance, unwittingly putting distance between himself and his opponent.

"You... you can wield... Excalibur?"

[Oh, I can do a lot more than that, Wordsmith.] Vulpanix says, gleefully goading him. [You mud-dwellers are all so arrogant, but you always underestimate the true power of your superiors! Project Cleansed Mud isn't even finished yet, but it already allows my people to weaponize the artifacts you humans laud with such reverence. In your hands, they are wasted. In ours, they become superweapons!]

Vulpanix waves Excalibur in a wide arc. With this motion, she casually summons four more copies of herself, and all of them rush toward Hope, conjuring various Psionic powers to grab and bind him, force his mouth shut, and yank him toward their Excalibur-wielding original self.

Hope struggles mightily. Hundreds of psionic webs entangle his arms and legs, making it impossible for him to pull away, while others wrap from the top to the bottom of his head, forcibly clamping his mouth shut.

At a mental command from his master, Arthur suddenly breaks away from Vulpanix's clone and races toward Hope. The Construct skips across space, jumping tens of feet forward multiple times and arriving within a close enough distance to swing his blade down and sever the cords yanking Hope toward certain death.

The moment Hope's mouth comes free, he fires off a burst of words. "Disperse! Cleanse! Barrier! PUSH!"

Hope fires his own burst of telekinetic power at Vulpanix, but it crashes against the mana emanating off Excalibur and disperses uselessly, causing her no trouble.

[What a quick escape!] Vulpanix compliments. [But you only delay the inevitable! My reserves are now INFINITE! Yours are anything but.]

"Never count a Wordsmith out." Hope says quietly. "That sword is mine. Arthur! Let's kill this Psion once and for all!"

Hope's eyes suddenly glow with power, making Vulpanix frown.

"Resonate!"

Hope's spiritual aura abruptly shifts. He and Arthur confusingly become 'one' in a way that slightly confuses Vulpanix. Even though their bodies remain separate, their 'existence' intertwines in a way she can't quite explain, which ever so slightly worries her.

"Slow! Slow! Slow! Slow!"

Hope suddenly shouts, firing off Words of power at each of Vulpanix's clones. All of them momentarily freeze in place, giving the Wordsmith a single second to rush forward in unison with Arthur, the two of them diving toward Vulpanix like a pair of birds of prey.

"Duplicate!" Hope shouts, summoning an exact replica of Arthur's Pseudo-Excalibur into his grasp. Vulpanix realizes an instant before they attack that both swords possess all the same attributes, including their stunning ability to slice through anything in their path.

Still, the Confessor does not show any fear. With her meat suit empowering her and True Excalibur held firmly in her grasp, she meets Hope's blade with equal force.

CLANG-CLANG-CLANG-CLANG!

In a blur of motion, the Confessor and Wordsmith smash their weapons together, his slightly clumsy use being enhanced somewhat by the fact that he and Arthur can fight together, while Vulpanix's superior speed, control, and energy reserves allow her to hold back two extremely dangerous opponents with just one sword.

As a nearly 100,000 year old monster who has fought countless opponents during the Kolvaxian Invasion, Vulpanix's combat experience vastly eclipses Hope's. Even two versus one, she calmly pirouettes on the spot, dances around, and flickers across space to evade and deflect Hope's attacks.

At the same time, Vulpanix pincer-attacks the Wordsmith with her other selves. Her special ability, the power to create Temporal Anomalies and call forth other versions of herself from timelines which do not technically exist, allows her to further widen the gap between herself and her Wordsmith opponent.

Vulpanix breathes the quickest sigh of relief in her entire life. To her great fortune, the genuine Excalibur does not end up slashed apart by Hope's two fake renditions of the holy blade, and so, her biggest fear does not come to pass. Even if the false weapons truly could split Excalibur in half, she suspects Hope would hold back, as his true goal has little to do with killing her, and everything to do with stealing the Volgrim's 'liberated goods'.

If Hope were to destroy Excalibur, his entire motivation for coming here would be rendered null. And this revelation regarding his greed allows Vulpanix to glean several clues regarding his psyche.

I may not be able to peer into his mind or sense his soul, but this Wordsmith is as easy to read as any primitive book! Before this Confessor's eyes, no secrets can escape!

She suddenly presses her advantage, slamming Excalibur against Hope's fake blade, then cleverly twisting her wrist to wrench the weapon out of Hope's grasp. The Wordsmith's eyes flicker with shock as Vulpanix lunges toward him.

SHIK!

Even his 'invincible' body cannot stop the penetration of the mightiest divine artifact in the Milky Way!

Excalibur impales Hope's stomach, knocking the breath out of him. Before he can try to gasp out a Word of Power, Vulpanix compresses her fist in size and shoves her free hand into his mouth, forcing it open and preventing him from speaking.

[You're MINE, Wordsmith!]

Arthur tries to rush to the imperiled Wordsmith's aid, but two of Vulpanix's clones prove more than enough to slow him down. The other three join together with their main body to tangle up all of the Wordsmith's limbs, cocooning him like a caterpillar entering the larval stage. Hope's eyes widen as he struggles to break free, but Vulpanix pinches down on his tongue and squeezes his neck, making it impossible for him to breathe, let alone gasp out even a single sound. For all she knows, his Wordsmithing might work even without direct vocalization, and she can't take that chance!

With Hope completely subdued, the Confessor's other selves turn to face Arthur. The Construct, while mighty as ever, simply cannot put up nearly as much of a fight with Hope immobilized. The panicked Wordsmith can only watch as four Confessor copies surround Arthur and begin whaling on him from all sides.

BOOM! BOOM! BOOM!!

Fists and psionic blasts rain upon the construct's body, knocking it out of the sky to the ground below. The Confessors pounce upon Arthur and pin him to the ground, ready to deliver the final blow.

At the last instant...

Fwip!

Arthur disappears!

Vulpanix's four selves scrabble at the floor for a brief moment, confused. They shoot glances at the clearly captured Wordsmith, wondering what sort of trick he's just pulled.

Then, before their very eyes...

Hope's body turns to dust.

Like a sand sculpture suddenly struck by a vehicle, Hope collapses around Vulpanix's fist, his entire body sagging and turning into particles in the air as he rapidly dissolves in a manner which, Vulpanix must privately admit, appears quite horrifying and gruesome.

The Confessor gapes at the Wordsmith's ashen remnants, suddenly realizing a horrible truth.

She's been tricked.

A gap in space opens up.

Hope Hiro casually strolls out of the air, still holding onto a Pseudo Excalibur, while Arthur stands beside him. The difference is, this time, he doesn't appear invisible or immaterial. He appears fully visible, not bothering to hide himself.

Vulpanix's stomach rocks as she realizes that despite this fact, she still cannot sense the Wordsmith's soul, nor read his thoughts.

His mind isn't being protected.

Neither is his soul.

They simply don't exist.

Hope smirks at the look of confusion on her face, as well as the slowly dawning realization in her eyes.

"Figured it out yet?" Hope asks casually. "I thought, since you decided to show up with your fake body, so would I. For a High Psion... you're pretty fucking gullible, you know that?"

[That wasn't your true form.] Vulpanix says out loud, partially due to her own astonishment. [The whole time... the person I was talking to... it wasn't even actually Hope Hiro?]

Hope taps the side of his head. "Heyyy, now you're starting to get it. So, you ready for Round Two? I think I've gotten a pretty decent grasp on your abilities."

[You know NOTHING of my strength!] Vulpanix roars, while recalling her other five copies back to her side. [Nobody toys with me. NOBODY! Certainly not some lowly, wretched little mud-dweller! I was told to take it easy on you, but no more!]

"I figured that was the case." Hope replies, glancing at his fingernails. "No doubt, you wanted to capture me and turn me into your Wordsmithing slave. So cliché, and late too. Ose already beat you to the punch on that idea. Jason might fall for such a basic ploy, but not me. I'm already three parallel realities ahead of you."

[We will see about that.] Vulpanix concludes, before all six of her selves rush toward the Wordsmith.

Part 435: Serris's Fate

No longer does Vulpanix hold back. While before she tried to preserve her strength so that she might capture the Wordsmith alive, even if badly injured, now she knows the body before her is nothing more than a false image. What also becomes abundantly clear as she initiates the second phase of their fight is the utter pointlessness of the battle!

All I'm doing is wasting time here! Vulpanix silently screams in her head. Even if I kill this false body, the Wordsmith will only make another! Where is he hiding?!

Vulpanix rushes toward the fake Hope, but he disappears and reappears five hundred feet in the distance, making her attack whiff harmlessly. At the same time, an invisible force of energy smashes into Vulpanix's stomach, throwing her into the air and momentarily disorienting her. Her five other selves try to surround Hope, but he keeps teleporting around, and what Vulpanix finds even more distressing is...

He isn't even Wordsmithing!

Indeed, Hope begins 'casting' magic without using his mouth, making her realize just how much he played her for a fool in the first phase of the fight.

When the Wordsmith first attacked, he suddenly accelerated toward me with such force he blew apart my Temporal Copy. I didn't realize it at the time, but the little mud-bastard didn't even utter a Word of Power! There were several other times he used magic without Wordsmithing too. This isn't just a clone... it's a remote drone! He must have made some sort of fake body and now he's manipulating it from afar to distract me! And if that is the case, what is his goal?

Hope suddenly 'splits apart,' transforming into twelve copies of himself. This abrupt shift catches Vulpanix completely off-guard as all of them split up and race in different directions, rushing toward each of her own Temporal Copies in pairs to defeat her with numerical superiority!

[Wretch!] Vulpanix roars. [I fought the Cherubiim! I do not fear you, Wordsmith!]

Her other-selves lash out at the different Hopes nearby, with some of them relying on Primal Psionics, while two actually fire off lightning bolts through their Energy

Manipulation. To Vulpanix's shock, these attacks pass through Hope's clones harmlessly, making her widen her eyes.

They're not clones! They're only illusions! WAIT! Where did Arthur go? AHH!

Vulpanix internally curses as the two Hopes rushing her alone turn out to be his genuine clone-body and his Arthur construct, but hidden within an illusion of the Second Wordsmith's figure. She tries to pull back, but they catch her in a pincer attack, forcing her to go on the defensive and parry with the genuine Excalibur while they strike at her from two tricky angles.

Clang! Clang! Clang!

Vulpanix defends herself sloppily, but she still prevents Hope from landing a killing blow. He manages to hold her up for a split second while Arthur rushes in and impales her heart, but the Confessor teleports away and lands in the middle of her other selves, who assume a defensive formation.

Despite the 'grievous' blow dealt to her vital organ, Vulpanix barely shows any signs of injuries. As a 7th Level Psion, she has certainly put some effort into her Body Enhancement Psionics, and it shows. She quickly takes control of her individual cells and repairs them, healing her heart back to a point where it was practically never injured.

Still, she does feel a slight sting when she moves her arm around. [Very sneaky, Wordsmith. Hiding Arthur amidst those illusions. You nearly beat me.]

"It's only a matter of time." Hope retorts. "Now tell me the truth. That... that skin-suit you're wearing! Is that made from humans? They look like they're still alive!"

[They were humans once, yes.] Vulpanix says, chuckling quietly. [Now they have been... stitched-together... to make a tool useful for the Volgrim Empire. Of course, we couldn't use vat-clones for Cleansed Mud. No, we needed humans who were spiritually active.]

"Spiritually active..." Hope repeats, his eyes turning vicious. "You mean..."

[Did you know?] Vulpanix asks rhetorically. [Humans become less spiritually flexible as they age. The less mature a mud-dweller is, the more easily we can mold their spirits to fit our needs. Yes, the younger, the better, indeed...]

Hope's heart skips a beat. A look of horror spreads across his face.

"Those are CHILDREN?! You absolute MONSTER! How could you… how could you turn little kids into something so horrifying?!"

Vulpanix shrugs. [What difference does it make? Five cycles or one hundred, you mud-dwellers all die before my people even complete our maturation phases. You are like dogs to us. Yes, stupid, worthless mutts from planet Earth. If we can at least turn you into useful tools, it will be the greatest honor of your lives!]

Hope squeezes his fingers around fake-Excalibur's hilt. He tightens his grip so much it feels like he might break his bones.

He doesn't notice the pain.

"They… were just… CHILDRENNN!"

The Wordsmith and Arthur once again rush toward Vulpanix's real body, but with his emotions running high, he merely ends up madly swinging and lashing out at every nearby Vulpanix copy like a rabid wolf.

"I'LL RIP YOU APART, VULPANIX! YOU AND YOUR VOLGRIM EMPIRE BOTH!!"

He chops at Vulpanix rapidly, trying to close the gap and cut her down, but with his emotions thrown off-balance, Vulpanix quickly regains her cool, along with her control of the battle's tempo.

Before long, Hope makes a fatal error. He chops at one of Vulpanix's clones, only for that fifth-self to suddenly rush toward him and allow the weapon to cut into her body. Momentarily caught off-guard by his opponent's suicidal action, Hope doesn't get a chance to resist when the main-body Vulpanix materializes behind him and impales the genuine Excalibur into his heart.

"Aaargh!"

Hope releases one quick scream of pain before Excalibur floods his body with divine energy, swelling him up and bursting him like a bloody balloon!

A few moments pass, and another Hope steps out of a gap in space. This one appears much calmer than the previous one. He grimaces as the remains of his previous body.

"I let myself get worked up again. You're good at getting under my skin."

Vulpanix doesn't revel in her victory. She even appears annoyed.

[Manipulating a mud-dweller is child's play. Now where is your real body? Show yourself!]

Hope snorts. "There's no point. I already know about your backup plan. While we fought, I've been... taking a look around. You don't think I'd really battle you here for no good reason, do you?"

Vulpanix stiffens. She stares at the Wordsmith as if suddenly realizing something.

[Where is your real body? WHERE IS IT?!]

"Here. And there." Hope answers cryptically. "All over the place. But the fact is, since I'm telling you this... it's already too late."

Vulpanix's mind works quickly. Thanks to her high level Brain Enhancements, she can dissect Hope's words at high speeds, allowing her to draw several conclusions.

[You couldn't have taken any artifacts. The alarms in the Vault haven't-]

"The alarms?" Hope says coolly. "Your faith in technology over magic is your undoing, Volgrim. You've truly underestimated my Wordsmithing this time."

Slowly, casually, Hope holds out his hand. His palm turns face-up.

Shoop!

An object materializes in midair, levitating above his grasp.

Vulpanix's heart turns cold.

[The Mind-Thief!]

"That's right," Hope says, as Solomon's Crown vanishes from his grasp. He lowers his arm. "While we fought, I casually raided all of the artifact stores here. I don't even know what artifacts I've recovered yet, since there are so many of them. But I'll figure them out eventually."

He pauses.

"Of course, I didn't only take artifacts. I'm sorry to say this, but your plan for Gaia will have to be... indefinitely postponed."

Hope makes an 'OK' sign with his hand, but leaves a small gap between his pointer-finger and thumb. In that area, a faint golden band materializes, making Vulpanix's heart sink even further into despair.

[The Archangel's ring...]

"The Archangel's ring." Hope affirms, smiling at her. He sends the ring back to his main body, then cracks his neck. "But I'm not done yet. I'm about to make you an offer that you can't refuse."

Vulpanix's entire body trembles. She recalls that she sent for two Executors to come here, but at this rate, they will arrive mere minutes too late. Hope has already plundered the whole of their treasury! Their prized Heroic Artifacts are all in his hands now!

The shame she feels makes her wish she could crawl into a hole and die.

[What... offer...] Vulpanix asks, barely able to contain her rage.

"Before I say, why don't you do us both a favor?" Hope asks casually. "Hand me Excalibur. If you do, I'll treat this whole incident like a... what did you call it earlier? A minor diplomatic blunder. I won't hold any hard feelings for your species, and may even seek to work with you on a more equal level. Doesn't that sound nice?"

[Don't toy with me.] Vulpanix hisses. [You may have obtained all the other artifacts, but I will never give you Excalibur. NEVER!]

"Now, now," Hope says slowly, waggling his finger. "Let's not be too hasty. Are you sure you don't want to humor me? It could save you a LOT of embarrassment..."

Vulpanix slowly begins to levitate toward him, carefully drawing closer, as if itching to strike his clone down and spend the rest of her days hunting his shadow.

[You will... PAY... for this treachery...]

Hope doesn't miss the building-up of her hostility. He merely frowns disdainfully at her and drops the pleasantries.

"Fine. Don't say I didn't warn you. I'm about to humiliate your Empire in a way it's never experienced before."

Hope raises his hand. He snaps his fingers, and an illusion of another Volgrim appears beside him. When Vulpanix sees this newcomer, she stops advancing and widens her eyes.

[No... what have you done?!]

"This is Psymin Miralax." Hope says, gesturing to the female Technopath beside him. Her arms are bound tightly behind her back, along with countless magical chains wrapping her body, wholly sealing her movements. "Of course, you're a smart woman, and you have eyes. What may not be as obvious is that Psymin here is not the only Volgrim I've taken prisoner..."

He snaps his fingers again, and many other illusions materialize beside him. Among them are not only Sangin Lidra, Redshift, and Blueshift, but dozens of other senior researchers and important VIPs as well. And even more frighteningly, the Technopaths here are some of the most hard-working and important technical personnel in the whole of the Volgrim Empire.

"Don't think I don't know who is coming." Hope says to Vulpanix curtly, ignoring the shifting expression of fear and hatred on her face. "You sent out a transmission to call two Executors here. When they arrive, I'll surely have a hard time fighting back. But if they do arrive... I'll kill all of these important VIPs. That would be quite a stain on your legacy, wouldn't it? You would be forever known as the Confessor who allowed a mud-dweller to kill off one of the last living Celestial Designers. I suspect you'd suffer a True Death out of sheer self-loathing right on the spot."

His words jolt her heart once again. [You know of our True Death?]

"I know a lot of things." Hope says. "Now, quit stalling. Here is my offer. You give me Excalibur, and I'll release these prisoners. If you refuse, I'll kill them."

[Unacceptable!] Vulpanix exclaims. [You imbecile! You're making an enemy out of the Volgrim Empire! When this is all said and done, do you think you'll have anywhere you can hide?! We can overwhelm the rest of humanity in the blink of an eye! You will condemn them all to oblivion!]

"Those are interesting questions." Hope replies, appearing unconcerned. "Do I think I can hide? Indeed I do. I've learned a lot about the Volgrim. Especially the Psions. For instance, even your lauded Executors can't cross the entire galaxy instantly, or even all that quickly. But me? I can step tens of thousands of lightyears in a single instant. This gives me a huge logistical advantage you can surely understand, once you put a little thought into it."

He continues. "And can you find me? Well, you yourself cannot. Perhaps your Executors can, but I doubt that. I'm more than capable of hiding myself inside a pocket of space in some remote corner of the galaxy. Good luck finding me when I become a needle in a haystack 100,000 lightyears in diameter."

"As for attacking Tarus II..." Hope says, narrowing his eyes. "Indeed. You could show up and kill everyone there. But do you think I'll be there? That's quite the gamble to take, you know. If you screw up, I'll still be alive and ready to ensure your people never know a day of peace. You will all die as the Plague overruns you and I hamper your escape efforts. And furthermore, if I can hide myself in some remote pocket of the galaxy, then doesn't it stand to reason I can do the same for other humans? You really aren't using your head..."

The more Hope talks, the more Vulpanix's rage begins to deflate. Instead of anger, she truly feels outplayed. Outmaneuvered. She secretly regrets showing off the Volgrim Empire's vast wealth, its Celestial Designer, and all the artifacts before securing a pledge to obtain the Wordsmith's assistance.

The Second Wordsmith is taking everything from us. She thinks. The Founders sent me here to secure a valuable ally. Instead, I have completely failed the Empire, and right when our situation is approaching the point of no return! I have to turn this situation around!

Vulpanix forces herself to calm down. She straightens her posture and lowers Excalibur to her side.

[Very good, Wordsmith. I underestimated you. You hold all the advantages, and I have already suffered a great loss. I truly cannot even retaliate.]

"It's good that you know your situation." Hope says. "So, what do you say? A simple trade. That's my offer. I'll give you back the hostages, and you will give me Excalibur. I'll leave, and that will be the end of our relationship."

Vulpanix's eyes flicker with insight.

[Excalibur is crucial to your plans.] She observes. [The First Wordsmith already possesses an artifact capable of augmenting his mana reserves by a tremendous amount. Excalibur will allow you to equalize that playing field. The other artifacts are merely... secondary gains.]

"Not quite." Hope retorts. "I don't even know what 95% of these artifacts are. Some of them might be incredibly valuable to me. We're talking over a thousand Heroic abilities in total, plus whatever power their relics hold."

He pauses for a moment to cock his head.

"And don't get any ideas. I'm not returning even one solitary artifact. Don't you dare say I'm 'stealing' from you either, as these are all human artifacts taken from humanity's coffers. I'm putting them under my control, where they belong. You've lost a lot here, yes, but these are merely your ill-gotten gains."

"As for Uzziel's ring," Hope says, "She will be reunited with her brothers and sister, where she belongs. If you have a problem with that, you can blow it out your flat, ugly, alien ass. All that remains is this one last trade. I don't want to hear a word of complaint from you."

Vulpanix slowly blinks her eyes. [You cannot take Excalibur by force. You can only use hostages to obtain what you want. That means I do have this one last bargaining chip.]

"Yeah?" Hope asks. "Alright, I'll bite. What is it you want in exchange for Excalibur? If it doesn't cross my bottom line, I'll consider it. No artifacts returned. No Uzziel's ring. Those are off-limits."

Vulpanix's face remains impassive, but her heart flickers in anticipation.

Chance!

[Ultimately... the Volgrim Empire can survive without the Archangel's ring or humanity's heroic artifacts.] Vulpanix says carefully. [But if you can perform a service for us... I will trade Excalibur for your hostages. We can still part ways, perhaps not as friends, but as... reticent acquaintances.]

"A favor." Hope repeats. "And what sort of favor might that be?"

[A series of small favors.] Vulpanix quickly corrects. [First. You will construct an entrance leading to the Cosmic Realm. This will benefit humanity and the Volgrim both. The Kolvaxians have taken refuge there. If we cannot battle them on their home turf, we will never be able to stop their spread. They will defeat the Volgrim, then they will come for humanity.]

Hope slowly nods. "Acceptable. Since it benefits both of us, I am willing to compromise there."

[Next,] Vulpanix says, [I want to personally request that you assist the Volgrim in rebuilding the power system for Serris. No doubt, you have uncovered many of our secret projects here. With Excalibur gone, billions will die. Perhaps you may not care about us Volgrim, but callously leaving billions to run out of oxygen and choke to death would make you uncomfortable, yes? With Excalibur's power, you could still provide us with a method to keep Serris functioning.]

[Besides,] Vulpanix adds, a little lamely. [It would go a long way toward mending relations with us.]

"If I have Excalibur and Solomon's Crown... I should be able to perform that feat with ease." Hope blandly remarks. "Fine. I will help you rebuild Serris's power supply."

Vulpanix bows her head. [One last request, and that will be all. We truly wish to obtain Uzziel's magic-]

"She's off-limits." Hope snaps. "Period."

[Yes. Of course.] Vulpanix says, changing her tone to something more 'soothing' than she'd usually use. [I will not request her ring back. But... perhaps you could use your abilities to grant us a device, a technology, or an artifact of similar value? For example, on Tarus II, humanity seems to have developed several useful structures capable of empowering your people...]

She pauses.

[Think of not only how such a device could repair this bond you have haphazardly severed, but the gains you could make from it.]

Hope raises his eyebrows. He appears more than a little interested in her words.

"The gains I could make from empowering the Volgrim? And just how exactly would that work?"

[Have you paid any attention to the 'Belial Booster' on Tarus II?] Vulpanix asks. [Surely you should understand its true purpose. Even the Demon Emperors understand, but they are helpless to resist the First Wordsmith's scheme. By tying demonkind's future evolution to humanity's continued existence, Jason Hiro has ensured that the lower ranks of demonkind will grow to revere him while the upper echelons will fear reprisal from their former subordinates. Additionally, the Emperors can still make small but impactful gains in their own advancement, despite the lower rate of return. This keeps the demons in line.]

"I see..." Hope mutters. "And doing the same for the Volgrim would ensure that if you want to keep benefitting from my... helpful technology... you would have to play nicely with me. I'm just confused as to why you would speak so openly of this scheme to me, laying everything bare. Does this admission not embarrass you? Or, perhaps, do you have some ulterior motive?"

[I am 98,000 cycles of age.] Vulpanix states calmly. [Young among my people, but an ancient monster compared to any living human. In my eyes, tying humanity's future to the Volgrim's is not such a bad thing to do. Perhaps the older Volgrim, our current leaders, would disagree.]

She levitates a little closer to Hope, allowing him to feel the mana wafting off of Excalibur even more prominently.

[Do you think the Demon Emperors are fools? They know how Jason Hiro's scheme is affecting their species. But they remain silent, because ultimately, they stand to benefit just as much as humanity. They have begun to experience the benefits of a symbiotic relationship. Would the Volgrim rather flee to another galaxy and return to someday slay the Plague, ultimately losing 99% of our population? Would we rather die out entirely? Or would we rather accept a second power in the Milky Way, one with whom we share our gains and losses?]

Vulpanix spreads out her free hand, exposing her palm.

[Friends. Allies. Enemies. These terms are temporary, but benefits are eternal. Once, the five subspecies of Volgrim fought horrific and bloody wars against one another. Now we stand united. Yes, the aged ones recalled the losses they suffered. The companions who died. The friends and loved ones who perished to the claws and weapons of their foes. But when the time came, they all united to defeat the common threat of the Sentinels.]

[Tell me, Hope Hiro. Could such an event happen again in this galaxy? Could the Volgrim and humanity truly become partners, in much the same way as my people did during the Great Wars?]

She respectfully holds Excalibur up horizontally before herself.

[You have the power to choose what happens next. This is my olive branch to you.]

Hope stares at the Confessor quietly.

He hears her words.

He battles the turbulent emotions in his heart.

He remembers the screams of that mother, father, and son as the Volgrim blasted them apart, over and over again.

He stares at the writhing, disgusting mass of children attached to Vulpanix's body at this very moment.

But he remembers other things too.

He remembers his old feelings, the way he used to be, his idealistic desires before Jason split the two Wordsmiths through the power of cloning.

He recalls his time on Earth, before he entered the cryopod.

He even thinks about his 'mother' and 'father,' his adoptive foster parents who treated him well, until that unfortunate accident broke their family...

Hope closes his eyes.

What would Amanda say? Robert? Would they be proud of the man I've become?

What would Jason do if he were in my position?

What would Neil advise, given how the last few hours have played out?

Can I trust Vulpanix? Can I trust the Volgrim, after all the horrors I've witnessed?

The Wordsmith chews his lower lip. He gazes at Excalibur, held so tantalizingly close, yet so far away.

He can't snatch it for free. Vulpanix still has a firm grip on it.

But even so, the way she has it held in a peaceful, submissive gesture causes his thoughts to become indecisive.

An olive branch...

Part 436: Fate of the Galaxy

Hope Hiro levitates just a few feet away from the high-ranking Volgrim covered in writhing, wriggling human skin. Her calm words violently clash with her hideous appearance. This does not prove easy for him to ignore. As such, he slightly narrows his eyes.

"You speak of offering me an olive branch. That's a line taken from a human parable. Are you an expert in human history?"

[Far from it.] Vulpanix says, her voice quietly transmitting into Hope's mind. [I spent a few dozen years casually browsing human historical texts. When you live as long as me, you will have plenty of time to learn little details about these sorts of things.]

"You think I will live to be 100,000 years old?" Hope asks.

[I would be surprised if your Wordsmithing cannot grant you immortality. It is already within Founder Unarin's expectations.]

"Mmm."

Hope lowers his arms to his side. He quietly stares at Vulpanix for a short while. She meets his gaze unflinchingly.

"Before I agree to your proposal," Hope says, "I have an important question."

[Ask it.] Vulpanix says.

"How can we ensure that we will keep to our agreement?" Hope asks. "Suppose you hand me Excalibur, the most powerful artifact Archangel Camael ever created. Suppose I then struck you down, kept the hostages, and all of the artifacts. What would your reprisal be?"

He pauses for half a breath.

"And furthermore, suppose the opposite were true. Suppose I agreed to work with you, but you plotted behind my back. Suppose you initiated some secret measure to quietly execute all of humanity in an instant, along with Jason, and even myself. It could take a while. Years. Decades. But a single instant in the scale of Volgrim life. How could we each ensure the other remains honest?"

Vulpanix slowly blinks her eyes. She nods.

[I have given this matter some thought. So, too, has Founder Unarin. The way my people see it, there are two options, two reasons, two methods we might use to restrain one another.]

[The first method is simple.] Vulpanix continues. [We rely on benefits. This is a simple but effective system. Do you think your human artifacts are all the Volgrim can offer you? Suppose we were to continue exchanging insights. Our species is much more advanced than yours. Humanity will, no doubt, catch up to the Volgrim eventually. Especially with a Wordsmith or two at the helm.]

[But,] She adds, [would it not be beneficial to accept our hospitality? To trade with us the things we want for those your people want? Let us not mince words. Your spiritual engineering alone is incredibly valuable. We can also likewise greatly speed up your knowledge of those heroic artifacts you've... acquired. Would you rather fumble around learning their properties, their origins, and the abilities of their resident souls? Or would you rather receive that information quickly and efficiently?]

"Those are good points." Hope says. "But not necessarily good enough."

He crosses his arms.

"Time is a limiting factor. But it's not much of a limiting factor for a Wordsmith. We have plenty of methods to speed up our perception and flow of time. Perhaps I could learn all about these artifacts quite quickly, without your help. Perhaps humanity will advance far faster than you can possibly imagine. Forget Excalibur for a moment. I have once again acquired Solomon's Crown. Is your knowledge all that important to me when the Knowledge-Seeker himself is at my disposal?"

Vulpanix slightly tilts her chin up. [I presume your main body is already in contact with Solomon?]

"I am. And he's helping me ask... important questions."

[I expected as much.] Vulpanix says. [To answer your query, perhaps you are correct. Perhaps you do not need the Volgrim's help at all. Maybe we have already passed the point where we are capable of stopping humanity. Maybe now, the best we can wish for is to cause a great deal of damage before you wipe us out.]

She shrugs.

[But is that truly the way you think? I have seen the way Jason Hiro acts. He does not like violence. He does not like killing. In a fit of rage, he slew a million demons. This action caused him a great deal of mental trauma. Would you rather engage in a violent war where billions, and even trillions will die? Is coexistence not more preferable as an alternative?]

"Coexistence would be nice, yes." Hope admits. "War is brutal. Once begun, it is difficult to end. I've already lost my good friend Kar in this war against the demons."

He pauses.

"But don't compare me with Jason. I am not him. We are separate individuals."

[Separate, yes. But you both descended from the same soul.] Vulpanix points out. [You are bound to share more traits than you may care to admit.]

Hope doesn't offer a retort. He merely blinks.

"What about the second option you mentioned? If relying on benefits is not guaranteed to work, then..."

[The second option is more metaphysical in nature.] Vulpanix says. [And also unreliable. We could simply resort to a magical or psionic contract. The Psions do have one Executor capable of creating such a thing. You could place a magically binding contract on my soul. If I take actions to harm humanity, I will suffer a True Death. At the same time, we could place a psionic marker on your soul. It would do the same to you if you broke the terms.]

Hope's left eye twitches. "Unreliable indeed. Personally, I'd call it functionally useless."

He shakes his head, then closes his eyes and tilts his head downward.

"Suppose you put a psionic marker on my soul. Do you believe I couldn't undo it with a Word of Power? And if I couldn't, how would I know what that marker actually does? What if it holds 'malicious code' in its intent? What if I go to take a shit and that triggers a kill command?"

"Furthermore," He adds, raising his head once more, "My restrictions on you would be even dumber. You said I could limit YOU with a Word of Power? What use would that be? One Psion, out of thousands of other High Psions? Unarin could just order a different Psion to kill me. I'd need to mark the entire upper echelon of the Volgrim Empire. What is that, like, a gazillion people? And none of this mentions the fact Jason would not be bound by our terms, so even if we were both restricted, Jason wouldn't be. You and him already have your own little agreement."

[Indeed. It is unreliable. Useless, even.] Vulpanix affirms. [But it is the only other option. Given its forceful and coercive nature, Founder Unarin would rather not bother with it anyway. Look at how he leads. Founder Unarin is relatively easy to kill, all things considered. His body is far stronger than average, his mind much sharper, most certainly, but compared to killing a High Psion, it would be trivial to kill him and take his place. Even so, no Executor has done so. Why do you suppose that is?]

"Before I answer, don't you think putting the idea of killing Unarin in my head is a morbidly stupid idea?" Hope asks sarcastically.

[The moment you do, your civilization will crumble.] Vulpanix states factually. [That is not a threat. It is merely an observation. It will take time to replace Unarin. Valuable time. Worlds will fall to the Plague far too quickly for us to bounce back or plug the gaps. Before long, our whole defensive front will collapse. If you think my people are a threat, you haven't the faintest clue of the horrors out there in the Void. Killing Unarin would result in humanity's complete extinction.]

"Right. Well, to answer your previous question," Hope says, "I suppose the reason no Psions have killed Unarin is because Dosena protects him."

Vulpanix snorts. [You are playing the fool. Why does Dosena not simply kill Unarin, then? Surely, she could rule the Empire well enough. She is more powerful. She is even swifter of mind than him thanks to her Brain Enhancing superiority. And yet she does not...]

Hope frowns.

Unlike Jason, who has had this conversation with Unarin personally, Hope has not had any chances to interact with the First Founder. He hasn't much of an idea of his disposition, personality, or way of doing things. And as little as he knows about Unarin, he knows even less about Dosena...

"Enlighten me."

Vulpanix cracks her neck. [The Second Founder could crush Unarin mercilessly. She is infinitely mightier than him. Even if she has no aspirations for power, one of the Executors could just as competently lead or make a strong case to her to make her 'step aside' while they do the deed. But in the end, nobody does. Even with all the flaws our Empire has, none question Unarin's place as our rightful leader.]

[This is not merely because of how long Unarin has reigned,] Vulpanix continues, [though countless generations of Volgrim have been formed from the dust of the cosmos, never knowing any history that does not include Unarin's face at the top of our hierarchy.]

A hint of pride appears on her face.

[It is because our First Founder has earned our undying respect. He is kind. He is compassionate. He is cruel. He is ruthless. He is just. He is wise. Founder Unarin is not like the fragile rulers you imagine when you think of historical human kings and queens. He has united five warring subspecies under his banner without resorting to violence, because he understands the souls of others innately. You may have your Wordsmithing... but Founder Unarin...]

Her tone turns wistful.

[...he has his own 'power.' His ability to understand other life-forms, from the superior Volgrim to the inferior mud-dwellers, borders on the fantastical. If you follow him, or even if you collaborate with him, he will not cause you harm. He has already united five Volgrim subspecies. What harm is there in adding humanity to his umbrella, or the demons, or the monsters?]

She lowers Excalibur to her side and extends her free hand in a diplomatic gesture.

[Founder Unarin already has shown his sincerity. He will not pursue you for what you have taken. He merely wishes to deepen his friendship with you. Why not work with him? Would you not rather walk toward a peaceful future? One ruled by respect for all?]

Finally, she concludes her speech.

[If Jason Hiro were in your position, he would understand the benefits we are offering. Surely, you are not so obstinate as to stumble where he would walk?]

Hope's frown deepens.

"You know, Vulpanix... if Unarin is as incredible of a people-reader as you claim, it really should be him here negotiating with me. Because you just can't seem to understand one important fact."

He slightly leans his body forward.

"I am not Jason. I am Hope. And every time you compare us, it pisses me off. Every time you call humanity 'mud-dwellers,' it pisses me off even more. Frankly, if your smug, condescending attitude is what I have to look forward to, then there will never be any possibility for us to collaborate moving forward."

Vulpanix blinks. [I have offended you. My apologies. I forget that... other beings... can sometimes allow their emotions to cloud their judgment.]

"Fucking garbage-ass apology." Hope snaps. "Christ's sake. You even manage to insult me when you're trying to act polite."

He leans back and sneers at Vulpanix.

"I reject your terms. I will return to my previous offer. If you give me Excalibur, I will return the hostages I've captured and leave this world untouched. That is my final concession. We will part on ambivalent terms. If in the future I decide to trade the use of my abilities for something you have, that will be my courteous gesture of respect for your 'mighty' Empire. But you will have to accept my offer right here and now. There will be no second chances."

Vulpanix's eyes narrow. She visibly struggles not to react violently to Hope's words, but it's clear his sudden whiplash has caused her a mental shock.

[You fool! If I refuse to give you Excalibur, you will have to kill those hostages and make the Volgrim your eternal enemies! And I will not give up this artifact without some concessions! Why would you turn down such an excellent offer?! You are letting your primitive greed cloud your judgment!]

"Heh heh heh..." Hope chuckles emotionlessly. "So you reject my generous offer?"

[Generous?!] Vulpanix barks. [You gain everything, and I gain nothing! How is that generous?!]

"That's not true at all." Hope retorts. "I will gain all of humanity's stolen artifacts. They will be where they belong, with me, a Hero. You will get your people back, safe and sound. Serris will remain in pristine condition. You see? I am only taking back that which you stole from my people. By not retaliating for your millennia of theft and oppression of humanity, I am being far more merciful than you deserve."

He pauses to eye her body with disgust.

"To say nothing of that hideous mass of flesh writhing on your body. If Unarin were here, he'd have known that bargaining while wearing that thing was an imbecilic move right from the start. Hell, I bet even an 'inferior mud-dweller' could figure that out during a drunken stupor. Maybe your brain enhancements have actually dulled your mental acuity..."

Vulpanix does not explode in rage. Instead, she becomes eerily calm.

[I will not give you Excalibur.]

"You sure?" Hope asks. "Last chance. I'm being really nice here. Don't you want to save the hostages?"

Vulpanix hesitates. Her face twitches. She seems to struggle with something, then finally starts to levitate away from Hope.

[The Executors will arrive soon. Do as you wish. If you know what is good for you, you will return those hostages now. Otherwise, we will hunt you down unti-AAAAAAAAA!!]

Vulpanix suddenly screams in pain. The human flesh on her body begins shifting and writhing, as if suffering an unbearable torment.

Hope remains unmoved. He merely watches calmly with his arms crossed while Vulpanix shrieks like a banshee, confused and frightened by the agony wracking her every cell.

"You stupid bitch." Hope mutters. "I hate smug little shits like you. Always acting so superior to everyone else. I gave you so many chances. Chances you didn't deserve. But you just had to get greedy."

Vulpanix continues to scream, she loses some of her levitation power and begins to float downward, losing altitude as her psionic abilities go berserk and become nearly uncontrollable.

[STOP-AAAAA! MAKE IT STOP!!]

"I don't think I will." Hope responds. "You never had a chance. I was toying with you from the very beginning. Haven't you realized? Excalibur only follows your will because you wear the skin of humans. But what if I can bypass all that mana shrouding you? What if I can specifically target the flesh enveloping your body?"

Slowly, deliberately, Hope holds out his hand.

Foop!

A shepherd's staff with a jewel inside its central spiral appears in his grasp. At the sight of this ancient relic, Vulpanix's eyes widen in horror.

[THE DOMINION RO-AAAAA!!!]

"The Dominion Rod." Hope affirms. "It possesses the ability to command humans. That human flesh covering you... well. You can see for yourself how useful this artifact turned out to be. I'll admit though, it wasn't me who thought up this little trick. Solomon helped me."

He shrugs.

"Ah, but what can I say? Your greed was your undoing. For 100,000 years, you've beaten and bullied humanity, and now you want to make a deal once you've run out of steam where you can reap more benefits. By not demanding a massive amount of backpayment, reparations, I've been so very generous, but in your blind arrogance you just can't see that, can you?"

Suddenly, Hope's body flickers. He vanishes from the spot and reappears before Vulpanix with the fake Excalibur raised above her head.

Vulpanis's pupils shrink to pinpricks. She can only watch helplessly as, in the span of a single instant, Hope swings the sword toward the wrist of her sword-wielding hand...

SLASH!

Hope severs Excalibur from Vulpanix's grasp. An instant later, the blade teleports into his palm, and he casually tosses aside the fake Excalibur.

With Excalibur no longer flooding Vulpanix's body, she regains access to her psionic abilities! But too bad. A sudden overwhelming force latches onto all of Vulpanix's clones, along with herself, freezing them in place, slowing down their thoughts, and making it impossible for them to escape.

Hope calmly evaluates the divine blade, the weapon that will allow his future ascension to godhood. He gazes at his reflection in its pristine surface, quietly marveling at how such a vicious battle left no blood on its edge, nor any chipped edges.

He returns his attention to the frozen and terrified Vulpanix. She struggles mightily to break free, but like a tiny fairy held in the grasp of a giant, she can't exert the slightest pressure.

"You Volgrim really aren't much after all." Hope says blandly. "Just a civilization of bullies who lucked out on the temporal lottery. You think just because you had a few million years of extra evolution time, that makes you superior to humanity? Think again."

"Humanity will match you. We will surpass you. And our rise begins now. But too bad, you missed the boat. All you had to do was politely give me my rightful possession and I'd have let you off the hook. At least for a little while. Oh, there would be a reckoning. Reparations, at the least. But now?"

He laughs.

"Now there's no hope for you. You've shown me that you cannot be trusted. Your extinction is guaranteed. Go ahead, if you want. Lash out at humanity. Blow up Tarus II. But know that if you do, your extinction will come a thousand times sooner than if you simply tucked your tails and ran. I'll even generously give you a headstart."

[You foolish human!] Vulpanix barks, no longer bothering to hold back now that she's utterly lost to Hope. [You don't know what you're doing! If we leave-]

"The Plague, right. I don't fear it." Hope interrupts. He curls his hand into a claw-shape and casually glances at his nails. "Oh, it's terrifying, for sure. But it's not infallible. I'll simply create a place where humanity can build up our strength in secret. A folded space, like Heaven, or the Cosmic Realm. Ah, that's right, I forgot to mention... how silly of me!"

Hope laughs.

"I already made it! Yes, somewhere in this universe, there now exists a place only I know about. That's where I'm keeping your hostages."

[You mustn't kill them!] Vulpanix exclaims, her voice containing a tinge of panic. [Please! Psymin Miralax, she is a precious asset! Let me at least negotiate for her release!]

"Oh. Hmm, yeah." Hope mutters. "I suppose I don't have to kill the hostages. I do already have Excalibur, after all..."

Vulpanix's heart skips a beat. [You mean...?]

"Yes. I think I'll let them live." Hope says, smiling wickedly. He leans toward Vulpanix, his mouth mere inches from her ear, and quietly whispers.

"...Say. What do you think would happen if I put Solomon's Crown on a Celestial Designer's head?"

Vulpanix's blood turns to ice. She freezes up, a look of horror washing across her face.

Hope pulls back, his evil smile widening further.

"You've finally realized? I bet Unarin already thought of the possibility, but you're nowhere as quick-witted as him. Yeah, all those offers you made of trading technology sure ring hollow now, don't they? I wonder what kinds of crazy bullshit I can cook up now that I have the knowledge of dozens of black-level Technopath researchers? In fact...!"

Hope makes a dramatic flourishing motion with his hand. To Vulpanix's absolute terror, a golden crown appears in his grasp.

"I'm such an idiot!" Hope laughs. "It just occurred to me! Why don't I take all the knowledge of a top-level Psion? I've found my knowledge of your sub-species to be quite lacking..."

[NOOO!] Vulpanix shrieks, writhing harder than ever. All six of her clones suddenly burst apart, collapsing as her psionic energy goes berserk. [THE MIND THIEF! NEVER! NEVERR!!!]

The air in the facility suddenly 'thickens' dramatically as a massive amount of Psionic power begins swirling around Vulpanic's body. Holding nothing back, she summons every last drop of her full power while shrieking like a terrified jackrabbit.

[NEVER! NEVER! NEVEEE-]

Abruptly, Vulpanix stops screaming. Her body freezes up, then slumps slightly.

The light goes out in her eyes.

A grim silence descends on the room...

Hope gazes at her figure.

"Evaluate."

He hits her with a Word of Power, and his expression sinks. He quickly places the crown on Vulpanix's head, waits a few seconds, then pulls it off. He teleports it back to his main body, then his expression sinks even further.

* * *

Inside a secret pocket dimension somewhere in the Milky Way's confines, Hope stares at the ground with an ugly expression while Solomon belly-laughs inside his Mind Realm.

"Not one word from you." Hope growls.

"Bahaha! Was that your inner Jason acting up?" Solomon laughs. "Hahaha! STUPID! You should have put the crown on her head before you started gloating! You're still green, boy!"

Hope's expression sags further. He glances around at the incapacitated prisoners laying in piles here and there, then deeply sighs.

"Oh well. There will be other Psions. We've made incalculable gains already. Losing Vulpanix was only a drop in the bucket. Why didn't you tell me she could self-destruct her soul like that?"

Solomon stops laughing. He wipes away his tears, then positions himself uprightly, returning to a serious demeanor.

"Heh... well, I wasn't aware they could do that. I've never actually seen a Psion lose in combat, let alone be driven to a point where self-destructing was their only remaining option. Good knowledge for the future. But don't get complacent, Hope. Those Executors are still coming for you. Even with Excalibur, such a battle will be..."

"No need to remind me." Hope remarks. "I've already made my preparations. I anchored what remains of Heaven around that planet we discussed, and all the rest is taken care of. Now only one thing remains."

"Return."

Hope utters a Word of Power and vanishes, reappearing in the void above Serris. His clone and Excalibur appear not far away. He examines them and nods.

"You did good work, Arthur. I'll be giving you a new soul soon. One that better matches your disposition."

The construct says nothing. It merely gazes at Hope, waiting for his orders with vacant eyes.

Hope teleports the construct into his secret dimension, then gazes at his motionless 'clone' floating nearby.

However, this 'clone' is not actually a clone at all. Instead, it is merely a corpse, a fake body made to perfectly replicate Hope's likeness.

Indeed, Hope never fought Vulpanix. Instead, he remotely 'piloted' this second body like a drone, using it to assault Vulpanix while keeping his actual self safe from harm.

But now, the stiff, corpse-like body lingers in front of him, its dead eyes even more vacant than Arthur's...

"I'd like not to have to ever do that again." Hope mutters. "But it's a trick that works well. It felt like I couldn't properly use Excalibur through this 'drone' though. Why is that?"

"Is it not obvious?" Solomon asks. "It is not your real body. You only piloted the 'drone clone' with a fraction of your soul's true essence. Therefore, you can only harness Excalibur's true power when using it personally."

"So if I ever intend to fight Jason..." Hope mutters.

"You'll be giving him Excalibur for free if you send a drone into battle." Solomon warns. "If the 'Cube' is as powerful as it seems, then Jason must not be underestimated. He may yet prove your match even when you possess Excalibur."

"I have over a thousand artifacts now." Hope laughs. "I'm sure I can overpower him. It's just a matter of finding the right ones... though Psymin's memories will surely help to speed that process up."

Hope casts a casual glance at Serris. The barren moon looks positively hideous, except for the light of the distant star faintly illuminating its distant horizon.

For a few moments, Hope stares at the planet as if wrestling with himself over what choice to make. Eventually, he shrugs.

Then, he raises Excalibur overhead and begins to call upon its power.

"Goodbye, Serris." Hope says wistfully. "With this, I declare myself the eternal enemy of the Volgrim."

"All of you can burn in hell."

Then, he swings the divine blade down.

Part 437: Confessor's Revival

[NOOO!] Vulpanix shrieks. [THE MIND THIEF! NEVER! NEVERR!!!]

Terrified out of her wits, the lauded Confessor's eyes turn bloodshot as she summons every last drop of the power contained within her soul!

[NEVER! NEVER! NEVEEE-]

Abruptly, Vulpanix completes her last ditch effort, self-destructing the link from her soul to her body. Her vision goes dark, and everything fades away.

A moment later, a cold sensation, like ice-water splashing her face, makes her howl in pain. She struggles futilely, but fails to awaken from the inescapable slumber shrouding her perception.

Then, a burst of light.

Vulpanix suddenly materializes in the air and falls downward helplessly. Her naked body crashes against an ornate technological wonder of an altar, and she shudders in pain.

[Nnn...]

Her vision goes dark once again as she falls unconscious for the second time.

A few seconds seemingly pass.

Then, Vulpanix opens her eyes.

All around her, a swirling of lights and colors and shapes bombards her vision. She dizzily tries to make sense of her surroundings, but can't muster the strength to move her body.

[Careful now.] A female voice says, projecting into Vulpanix's mind. [You've only just awoken. Take a few moments to rest. You don't have a drop of strength to spare.]

Vulpanix's chest heaves. She fails to perceive the world around her, either with her eyes or her psionic senses. Not since the day she emerged from her chrysalis has she felt as weak and pitiful as she does at this very moment. A human child could reach out and snap her neck, and she wouldn't be able to resist, or at least that's how pathetic she feels.

Several moments pass.

Vulpanix's chest rises and falls. She wavers in and out of consciousness, and after several tries, she finally manages to flutter open her six eyes.

A painfully bright light shines down on her from above, making her wince. She inhales through her nose, taking a long, slow breath.

[I... I...]

The blurry world comes more into focus. Vulpanix's gaze drifts to the side, where she sees a fellow Psion walk up and stop beside her. The female Psion gives Vulpanix's body a once-over and nods.

[Your first False Death. It's always the one that hurts the most. You feel vulnerable, weak, and pitiful. I felt the same way during my first fall.]

The gold-skinned Psion standing beside Vulpanix radiates an aura of power. Her red robes hang from her body, giving her the appearance of an exotic empress, someone who could easily crush a planet in her grasp.

[C-Creator Demila. Why... are you here?] Vulpanix asks weakly.

Creator Demila, an ancient Psion who has long-since reached the limits of her strength after two million years of life, nevertheless still possesses far more maturity and authority than her junior Confessor. She evaluates the Confessor with a dismissive gaze.

[Why not? Am I not allowed to go wheresoever I please? You've made quite the mess, Vulpanix. This time, you've truly put the Founders in an awkward position.]

Suddenly recalling the circumstances that caused Vulpanix to initiate her Soul Shutdown Sequence, her entire body trembles in fright. [The... the Wordsmith! What happened? Is Serris-]

[Serris is...] Demila says quietly, silencing her fellow 7th-ranked Psion. [It's gone.]

For a brief moment, neither Psion says a word. Vulpanix's skin turns cold as she hears the truth of the matter for the first time.

[Surely... surely the Wordsmith would not go so far...]

Demila's face betrays no emotion.

[Forty five billion of the Volgrim Empire's brightest, dead. One of our three most top-secret locations, plundered, pillaged, and destroyed. Several of our top personnel, including one of the last living Celestial Designers, captured. To imply that you cast our people into one of the worst catastrophes at the worst possible moment in time would be... a mild understatement, to say the least.]

Vulpanix shudders at the hint of anger in her fellow Psion's voice. Weak as she is now, Vulpanix couldn't offer the faintest resistance if Demila decided to kill her on the spot.

[I... I thought... the Wordsmith would be reasonable.]

[As did we all.] Demila says calmly. [After I received word of the events, I attended a top-secret meeting with several high-rankers. All of the Founders were there.]

She pauses.

[All of them, Vulpanix.]

[What?] Vulpanix asks, realizing the implication in Demila's words. [Even the Fifth Founder?]

[Yes.] Demila answers. [Even Founder Cinculu deigned to join the proceedings. Naturally, he did not speak a word, but his rage was thick in the air.]

Suddenly realizing something, Vulpanix flicks her eyes around. [How long have I been in the Restoration Chamber? It feels as if only a few instants passed since my battle with the Wordsmith...]

[Nine rotational cycles.] Demila answers. [Many events transpired while you were unconscious. Hope Hiro used the power of the divine blade to obliterate Serris, then he abruptly disappeared. I've been keeping track of Jason Hiro's activities, but it does not seem as if Hope Hiro has returned to Tarus II and contacted him. However, given how adeptly he managed to sneak around Volgarius, it's entirely possible he was able to deceive me. My psionic senses are far from omniscient, after all.]

[I could only detect the Wordsmith's precise location when he arrived within one thousand meters of my position.] Vulpanix mutters. [Perhaps three thousand meters if we're going by a vague sense of him in the wind. I couldn't tell exactly where he was until he reached my immediate zone of influence. If I were inattentive and not looking for him explicitly, he'd have easily slipped past me.]

Vulpanix becomes quiet for a moment, then closes her eyes.

[...Nine rotational cycles. What have the Founders decided to do with me?]

Demila snorts. [You are not as important as you imagine yourself to be, young Confessor. Your future is bright and I would wager that you will ascend to the 8th Level someday, but at this moment, the Founders can barely cast a thought your way. There is nothing you can do to undo your failure. They are much more focused on how the Serris Incident will affect the war effort, and what sort of powerful adversary the Second Wordsmith will become.]

The Creator straightens her back and assumes a domineering posture. [For now, you must quickly repair your injuries, restore your psionic power, and follow me to Volgarius. Founder Unarin wishes to personally speak to you regarding the Serris Annihilation Event.]

Vulpanix shudders. [The First Founder himself? But why speak to me?]

[Fool!] Demila barks. [You are the only person alive and able to bear witness regarding that day. Not a single soul managed to evacuate in time. As for the captured elites, we do not even know if they are alive or dead!]

Vulpanix slowly blinks her eyes. [They are alive. Hope Hiro... he captured them and placed Solomon's Crown on all of their heads. The Mind Thief has already stolen all of their knowledge. I self-destructed to prevent him from learning any of my secrets, but compared to the brilliance of a Celestial Designer...]

She falls silent as Demila's wrathful gaze meets hers. [Imbecilic fool. You've always been too arrogant for your own good. Rising to the 7th Level in only 100,000 cycles while focusing on multiple paths is truly praiseworthy, but it came at the cost of your humility! You believed you could bully the Wordsmith instead of working with him properly, and as such, he outwitted you! Now, explain to me exactly what happened. I want every last detail!]

Unable to nod her head due to exhaustion, Vulpanix instead simply blinks her eyes. [Of course, Creator. It's like this...]

* * *

* * *

* * *

For several long minutes, Vulpanix speaks to Demila, detailing her experiences with Hope, the feelings she had, her thought processes, and any other miscellaneous observations, anything she thinks might give her superior some useful information. At the same time, Demila doesn't play any games with Vulpanix, opting to psionically download her memories wholesale, making Vulpanix feel more than a little violated. Among Psions, directly reading the memories of another is considered a terrible taboo, but she also endures such shame that she doesn't feel comfortable enough to try and stop Demila's cerebral intrusion.

Not that she could even if she wanted to.

So weak and pathetic is Vulpanix that she couldn't put up a simple psionic barrier to slow Demila down. Her thoughts are utterly at the mercy of her fellow Volgrim, and the Founders probably wouldn't say a word if Demila 'justifiably' found a reason to injure her.

At the very least, Demila doesn't push things too far. After obtaining all the useful information, she retracts her psionic sense, allowing Vulpanix to breathe easier.

[Stupid. Foolish. 100,000 cycles old and you have the blind arrogance of a newly spawned Initiator lacking all common sense. Why did you show off the presence of the Celestial Designer to Hope Hiro? You essentially advertised a crippling weakness to him! The Founders should have put ME in charge of this operation. I'd never have made such an elementary mistake...]

Vulpanix winces at Demila's assessment, but offers no defense of her actions. The guilt she feels is palpable enough that she can only blame herself for everything that went wrong as well, not that Demila has any intentions of letting her off the hook.

[Now that I better know the situation that has transpired,] Demila says, after a few minutes of digesting the information she's obtained, [I can understand why Hope has not revealed himself. He has simply made too many gains!]

[Too many indeed...] Vulpanix mutters gloomily.

[If the only artifact Hope Hiro obtained was Solomon's Crown, he would already have become too terrifying to imagine.] Demila says quietly. [Let alone the Crown placed atop the head of our revered Celestial Designer. Combined with the might of a thousand other artifacts, once he returns to humanity's shores, their rise will become truly unstoppable. While you are no doubt aware of the number of gains he has made, it must be mentioned that this is the worst-case scenario Unarin brought up during that meeting I attended. He intends to speak to you the moment you have regained your strength.]

[Where has Hope gone then?] Vulpanix wonders.

[If I am to hazard a guess...] Demila says, [then I must assume he has entered seclusion. Hidden somewhere in the galaxy, he will be taking some time to identify his newly acquired treasures and learn how to use them. There is nothing we can do to stop him at this time. We cannot find him. We cannot even annoy him. At best, we can capture his copulation partner on Tarus II to stymie his wrath, but that would potentially cause a rift between us and the First Wordsmith.]

Vulpanix exhales through her nose. [That would not work. Hope is too prideful. He has a power complex. A driven ego. We must be wary of enraging him.]

[Indeed. We will defer to Founder Unarin's wisdom regarding this matter. He has already given me my instructions.]

Demila turns and walks away from the regeneration pod containing Vulpanix. The Confessor frowns. She tries to lift her head to follow the Creator's movements, but her strength is simply too lacking to allow such a thing. And with the walls of the pod obscuring her vision, she can't see anything else inside the medical facility except for the ceiling and the lights shining down on her face.

Before long, her pod begins to shift. It lifts up and tilts forward, finally affording her a better view of her surroundings. She finds herself inside a small hospital room reserved for elite Psions, one with advanced medical equipment specially designed to rejuvenate and restore psionic power. Glass tubes of variously colored liquids run along the walls, with small plasticine tubules that pass their contents into the pod half-enveloping Vulpanix's frail form. The shiny white walls give her a vague reassurance that the facility is sterile and safe, albeit unwelcoming and cold.

The door to the room opens. A frail-looking Technopath walks in, his heavy metallic legs clanking against the floor as he pauses to nod respectfully at Demila.

"Creator Demila..." The male says. "It has been a while."

[Psio-specialist Goldis.] Demila says even more respectfully. [We need to hasten Vulpanix's recovery. Founder Unarin has authorized me to use three hyper-revival stimulants on the Confessor.]

"Three?" Goldis asks, the aged Technopath pausing. "It will place considerable strain on her frame. This is only her first revival, after all. She is not yet accustomed to the trauma. And we still need to separate her soul back into the Transmission Facility."

[For now, she can remain inside her True Body.] Demila says. [We can separate the two later. Expedience is of the utmost importance. Will there be any permanent negative effects from ingesting three hyper-revival stimulants at the same time?]

"Mmm... I do not believe so." Goldis answers, after a moment of thought. "But it will cause her tremendous pain. She will reawaken her powers, but it may take her several hundred cycles to stabilize her foundation once more. If she were to die during that period... it would be a True Death, whether or not she were operating from the confines of the Transmission Facility."

Demila raises an eyebrow. [I was unaware of these side-effects. Would two stimulants have less of an adverse effect?]

"Indeed. But in this humble specialist's opinion, I would simply request that she only consume one. Do you intend for her to engage in battle in the near future? A single stimulant will allow her to regain her mobility within three standard time units."

Demila shakes her head. [No. Vulpanix need only speak to the Founders for now.]

"I see. A single stimulant will not restore her battle capabilities quickly, but she will regain basic psionic functions at an accelerated speed. I always advise you Psions not to be too hasty in these matters. You are so patient in building up your foundations... why rush to restore your strength when a period of weakness can fortify one's mind? Given the events that have transpired with regard to Serris, perhaps a period of self-reflection would do Vulpanix well to temper her... personal tendencies.]

Demila glances at Vulpanix with a look of amusement. She snorts.

[Yes. I quite like that idea. Very well. One stimulant will suffice. I shall take my leave and return in three standard time-units. I have many matters to which I must attend.]

"Of course. Of course." Goldis says, slowly waving his aged tentacles. "May the Founders guide your path."

Creator Demila leaves without another word, allowing Goldis and Vulpanix some time alone together. The ancient-looking psio-specialist slowly walks over to his upright patient and inspects her nude body without the slightest hint of interest. As Volgrim, they have no sexual interest in one another, especially not across sub-species.

"Mmm. Doesn't feel pleasant, does it?" Goldis asks. "The first death is always the most terrifying one. Some Psions, having lived for thousands of cycles and having successfully won many battles, suffer terrible mental breakdowns after their revival. With their egos shattered, they crumple into balls and self-immolate, never again to walk the mortal coil. And how about you, Confessor? Do you feel sound of mind?"

Vulpanix eyes the unfamiliar Technopath for a moment, then blinks her eyes.

[My willpower is strong. I feel deep shame regarding my failure at Serris. But it will not impede my Path. I have walked unwaveringly from the rank of Initiator to Confessor without hesitation. A stumble like this will allow me to self-reflect on my failures and firm my resolve.]

"Good, good." Goldis says, turning to the side. He reaches out his tentacles and manipulates a medical device of some sort, keying instructions into it. "The number of young prodigies I've met who mentally collapsed following their first death are simply too many to count. Your willpower certainly meets the expected standard of an elite."

[With respect, Goldis,] Vulpanix says, [I have not heard your name spoken before. Who are you?]

"Me?" Goldis asks, pausing his work to glance at her. "Just an old fogey who's lived for far too long. I was enjoying quite a pleasant retirement until that Plague came. Then the Founders called me back to my post. Sigh... and here I am, eighty thousand cycles later. The work never ends..."

Vulpanix frowns even more deeply. [How... old are you? If you don't mind me asking?]

"Mmm. Quite old, yes. Quite old indeed..." Goldis says, his words softening. "Mmm. Lived a long time, I have. Saw everything. From the very beginning. Even before that cute little Unarin rose to power, I was there. During the Age of Ignorance, before he uplifted our people from their warring tribalism, I was there."

He momentarily becomes swallowed by nostalgia. And bitterness.

"When the Sentinels attacked... I was there."

[The Sentinels.] Vulpanix mentally whispers. [Of course. You lived through that whole era.]

"Survived is more like it." Goldis answers. "Mmm, yes. Wish that I hadn't. Too much death. Too much suffering. And now I have lived long enough to see a second Calamity befall our people. To go from the Seven Great Wars to Unarin's reign to... this. Some things never change."

[I've never even heard of a Volgrim retiring.] Vulpanix says respectfully. [I didn't know it was possible.]

"Oh, certainly, before the Plague, anyone could leave their post on a permanent basis, if they so desired. But none wanted to! None except me..." Goldis explains. "When you've seen the horrors I have... it takes a toll on the psyche."

[Then why did you come out of retirement?] Vulpanix asks. [Why not... stay?]

"Because." Goldis says simply, looking into her eyes. "I am Volgrim. I have a Duty. My life is not mine, but my people's. My desires come second to the welfare of our great Empire. My Calling goes beyond my personal weakness, requiring that in times of great need, I must rise to the task."

He raises the medical device in his grasp and presses it against Vulpanix's neck. Her eyes twitch as an odd feeling spreads from her neck to the rest of her body, like a breath of cool air on a hot summer's day. After a moment, Goldis retracts the device and smiles kindly, like an old grandfather.

"And there we go. Now you need only wait a short period and your psionic abilities will partially return."

Vulpanix blinks her heavy eyelids.

[I... have one question, psio-specialist Goldis.]

"Mmm, yes. Go on." The old Volgrim says.

Vulpanis flops her head to the side to look at him.

[Are you... a Celestial Designer?]

Goldis chuckles. "A fancy title. Meaningless, in my eyes. But yes, I am considered one of their remnants."

[I see...] Vulpanix says quietly. [So, regarding Psymin Miralax...]

"A close friend of mine." Goldis answers. "But... she is not dead, and that is all that matters. You must not blame yourself too harshly for what happened, young one. All have erred. Many live to see the fruits of their failures."

The old Volgrim sighs heavily.

"And compared to my failures, yours are... truly too insignificant to speak of."

[Your failures?] Vulpanix asks. [Meaning?]

"Is it not obvious?" Goldis asks, while dismissively waving his tentacles. "I helped create the Sentinels. I was... responsible for the deaths of trillions of our people."

"Yes... trillions of them..." Goldis says, more quietly than before. "So very, very many people. All dead because of young, arrogant fools like me."

He gazes emptily at the wall, not particularly paying attention to Vulpanix's presence beside him.

"Oh, if only it had been me captured by that Wordsmith instead of my dear Psymin. She's already suffered enough."

Vulpanix closes her eyes.

[I am sorry. I will do better, moving forward.]

Goldis nods.

"That's the best anyone can do, in this aged one's opinion."

Part 438: The Far-Seer

Three hours pass.

Vulpanix slowly regains her energy, ultimately becoming capable of moving her body more and more. By the time Creator Demila returns, Vulpanix can just barely walk around in a shaky and trembling manner, though she collapses after only a few minutes of movement.

After exhausting her strength, Vulpanix flops into a hovering pod and blearily gazes at her superior. [Apologies... I am still... quite exhausted.]

[You can recover while we travel to Volgarius.] Demila says. [Senior Goldis, is she safe to leave?]

The aged Celestial Designer smiles kindly at Demila. "Indeed she is. You two can go. May the Founders guide your paths."

[And may the Founders guide yours.] Demila replies with a respectful nod.

She and Vulpanix both leave. They step out into the main facility, where the lesser Psions revive and are placed into healing tanks much like hers. However, unlike Vulpanix, a powerful 7th Level Psion, these lesser ones only get relatively generic treatment. They reside within rows, unconscious, lacking the special medicine she received to bolster her recovery speed. Due to the unique properties of the hyper-revival stimulants, they cannot be easily mass-produced, and are thus stockpiled and saved for emergencies or for assisting elite Psions in their recovery times.

Having been inside this facility before, on many occasions, neither Vulpanix nor Demila are particularly interested in exploring its confines. The two women quickly make their way down the various winding corridors, past the psio-revival rooms where blasts of planet-grade energy burst out to reform recently deceased Psion bodies, and toward an awaiting Warpgate secreted away.

Identical to the gates inside the Labyrinth, the world's lone gate hums with energy. Over three dozen 6th Level Psions stand guard, watching with expressions of awe as the two 7th Level elites stride and hover toward them. Bursts of psionic activity travel between the guards as they secretly converse about how rare it is to see a Confessor and Creator passing through at the same time.

Luckily for Vulpanix's sanity, none of them seem to know about her failure at Serris.

Creator Demila stops before the gate and turns to look at the nearby controller, a blood-red-skinned Psion warrior. They communicate briefly, and he nods. His fingers reflexively race across the control panel at hyperspeed, calculating the Warpgate's new travel vector in mere seconds, vastly eclipsing the speeds of humanity and their monster allies. Compared to the original creators of the Warpgates, humanity cannot even come close to matching their technical know-how.

Well, everyone except for Solomon. Though he is more of an aberrant...

Moments later, Demila and Vulpanix travel through the Warpgate and arrive on Volgarius inside a secret underground receival facility, less than a hundred miles from the Founder's Fingers. Given its status as the homeworld of the Volgrim, Volgarius houses four Warpgates placed in equally distant locations, spread out for easy access and travel across the galaxy. At the same time, they are heavily defended and ready to be collapsed in the event of a Plague incursion.

The two of them undergo a quick inspection to verify their identities. Then, after they depart the facility, they arrive at a departure platform, where they pause to wait for a shuttle.

At least, until Vulpanix rolls her eyes. [Just levitate us to the Founders. I don't want to wait for a piece of technology to fly me around like a metalhead.]

[Oh?] Demila asks with a hint of bemusement. [It's awfully rude to levitate another Psion.]

[Without their permission.] Vulpanix clarifies. [And you have mine. Oh, wipe that smug look off your face. You enjoy watching me squirm.]

[Are you implying I enjoy seeing some snotty young upstart who raced to the same rank as me in a fraction of the time become humbled by her own hubris?] Demila asks. [By no means. I would never think such thoughts.]

[If you'd like, we can have a friendly spar when I regain my full strength.] Vulpanix challenges. [Or perhaps when I'm at eighty percent. I wouldn't want to beat up an old fossil too badly.]

[You think just because you're talented that you are my match?] Demila retorts. [The Terrans have a saying: In a galaxy where females die young, fear the old woman.]

[I very much doubt that's how their euphemism goes.] Vulpanix snarks. [Now get on with it. I don't want to die of embarrassment before we even reach the Founders.]

[Of course.]

With a flick of her hand, Demila lifts herself and Vulpanix up, then shrouds both of themselves in a field of temporal dampening, making it impossible for common Psions and others to observe them.

The two Psions lift up and race off into the horizon. Vulpanix snorts at her superior.

[Shielding my pitiful state from the sight of others. I thank you for considering my position.]

[Even if I wanted to parade your weak form around to humiliate you, I couldn't.] Demila says in a more serious tone. [It is important during these dark times that we maintain morale, along with an appearance of strength. You are a well-known Confessor. People will learn that you lost a battle and perished. But hearing is not the same as seeing. If they were to see you in your current state, it would do far more than bruise your ego.]

Vulpanix quiets down.

[Mmm. We are besieged from all sides. Not only the Plague, but the Second Wordsmith as well. Even the First Wordsmith is hardly our ally. He is self-serving in his own way.]

[Do not blame them for following their unenlightened, petty instincts.] Demila says. [The humans are still young. Before the era of the Great Wars descended, the Age of Ignorance had already extended for 500,000 long cycles. Unarin brought us out of that period into the Era of Enlightenment, but the humans have not had time to properly develop. It is only natural they would be greedy and simple-minded, as our people once were.]

[Do you believe that the humans will be able to elevate their consciousness, given time?] Vulpanix asks.

[Oh, of that, I have no doubt.] Demila answers, glancing at her junior. [They are young. They are stupid. They are greedy. They are selfish. But so are the Volgrim, we have simply learned to focus on the greater good. Jason Hiro might not be as...]

She pauses for several long seconds.

[...intellectually stimulated... as our First Founder. But he has a good heart. He seeks to uplift his people and unify humanity and the demons, despite all the pain the demons have inflicted. This is a broad-minded viewpoint that will take him far.]

[I disagree.] Vulpanix challenges. [Founder Unarin and Jason Hiro are both broad-minded, yes. They are both compassionate toward those who have offended them, yes. But their difference in intellectual capacity is not something one can gloss over. When I look at the First Founder, I sense a being of indomitable will who will fight for what he knows to be right. Compared to the wishy-washy Wordsmith, a man who is already being manipulated by his lessers... surely another human will eclipse him, given time.]

[Neil Adams.] Demila replies. [Have you heard his name?]

[I've had neither the time nor the inclination to look into the backgrounds of random humans.] Vulpanix answers. [Why? Is this Neil Adams someone of note?]

[He is much closer to Founder Unarin's 'aura' than Jason Hiro, in my view.] Demila says. [Oh, certainly he is more petty. He hates the demons with a passion. He acts ambivalent, but lusts for power. Comparing him to the glory of our First Founder is like comparing a Meltarr to a Swamp-Fisher. But he has the... potential. If he can merely reshape some of his mudlike views on reality and ascend higher, he will become a formidable existence.]

She pauses.

[I hear that even the First Founder has recently taken a keen interest in Neil's activities. One of my top priorities whenever I am on Tarus II is to keep a close eye on humanity's military commander.]

[Hmm. In that case, I will look into his information when I have time.] Vulpanix concludes.

The two Psions rocket across the horizon, needing less than five minutes to reach their ultimate destination at the Founder's Thumb.

Though the smallest of the Founder's Five Fingers, the Thumb is nonetheless the most important, given it is where Unarin himself lives and works. Demila flies Vulpanix to a landing platform, then sets her down. The two of them proceed forward more slowly, until they arrive before a familiar pink-skinned Ascended.

"Greetings, Lady Demila. Lady Vulpanix." Muuxunuu, Unarin's closest assistant, says.

The female Ascended walks toward the other two women and nods respectfully, then turns her full attention on Vulpanix.

"Founder Unarin has already been briefed on the information you told Demila. However, he still wishes to speak to you in person. Please follow me. And you as well, Demila. Founder Unarin will likely have orders to give regarding your activity on Tarus II."

[I imagined he might.] Demila replies.

The three women walk deeper into the Founder's Thumb. Something about Muuxunuu's presence causes the other two women to fall utterly silent. So majestic and mysterious is her appearance, as well as her role in the Empire, that they almost feel as if she is an inviolable goddess, someone whose time they must never waste, or in whose presence they must not waste useless words.

When they arrive at the entrance to Unarin's inner sanctum, Muuxunuu turns to Vulpanix and Demila. She blinks her large blue, limpid, watery eyes.

"You may enter."

[Of course.] Both Psions reply. [Thank you for personally escorting us, Lady Muuxunuu.]

"I contemplate, and I comprehend." Muuxunuu concludes.

She turns and walks away. Demila opens the large doors to the First Founder's inner sanctum, and she takes the lead, walking in slowly but confidently.

[First Founder.] Demila says, with more than a hint of respect and reverence in her tone. [I have come, and I have brought the Confessor.]

From behind a table standing ten feet tall, stacked with models of a huge city on one of the many Volgrim-controlled worlds, Unarin steps out and gives both women an evaluating glance.

"Demila. Thank you for coming. I will be addressing Vulpanix for now, but do stick around. I will have some thoughts I'd like to exchange with you."

[Of course.] Demila says, while bowing her head. She turns and flickers away, leaving to give Vulpanix a bit of privacy with the First Founder. It does not escape Demila's senses that flickers of godlike psionic activity monitor her every move - the sign of Founder Dosena's presence.

With the two of them alone, Founder Unarin smiles casually at Vulpanix, seemingly not even noticing her hoverchair-bound weakness.

"Confessor. It has been a while since we last spoke, hasn't it?"

[You are a busy Volgrim, to say the least.] Vulpanix answers. [Compared to the hundreds of other 7th-level Psions, I am but a drop in the proverbial bucket.]

"Now now, don't sell yourself short." Unarin says, in a soft and soothing voice. He turns away and wanders over to a nearby table stacked with all manner of rare and precious pieces of artwork. "To go from the rank of Initiator to Confessor in just 95,000 cycles is a praiseworthy accomplishment. Furthermore, you did so without resorting to the path of specialization. You are a true-blooded Psion warrior who will surely accomplish many great things. Of all your comrades at the same rank, I don't think it's incorrect to state you will be the next to earn the title of Executor."

Vulpanix shifts slightly, feeling a little uncomfortable about his praise.

[I... I have some meager achievements.] Vulpanix mutters. [But... regarding Serris...]

"Ah, yes. The loss of Serris. The capture of a Celestial Designer. All of this happened under your watch." Unarin says bluntly, turning to look at her with an expression no more severe than any other so far. "I imagine you've been beating yourself up over that since you revived."

Vulpanix hangs her head in shame. [I... I have committed a terrible sin. I deserve a severe punishment for allowing harm to come to a Celestial Designer.]

"Mmm. You did the best you could, given the options available." Unarin says, waving his hand. "There will be no punishment."

She snaps her head up. [No punishment? But... but... I do not understand...]

"Who was it that ordered you be placed on Serris?" Unarin asks, turning his entire body to face her while leaning his butt against the table's side.

[...You did, First Founder.] Vulpanix answers, still somewhat confused.

"I did. And yet now you doubt my judgment." Unarin says with a long, laborious sigh. He exaggerates the motion, as if to punctuate his next words. "Do you think that anything which has transpired... was beyond my ability to predict?"

[You... predicted that Hope Hiro would obliterate Serris?] Vulpanix asks, now falling into a state of morbid fascination. [But surely it was my failure which led to such a catastrophic result.]

Unarin doesn't immediately answer her. Instead, he presses his palms together and looks away, as if falling into thought.

"...do you know about the two types of strategy war-games, Vulpanix?"

The sudden pivot in topics forces her to sluggishly try and follow along with the First Founder's thought processes.

[There are... many types of war-games, First Founder. To which genre are you referring?]

"Oh, the genre doesn't matter. It is more about the 'style' of which they are constructed, as well as the types of people who gravitate toward them. Let me give an example."

Unarin waves his hands, and like magic, a projection of a complex war-sim materializes in midair, one with images of hundreds of battleships engaging in battle against an equally powerful armada.

[I have engaged other Psions in this war-game.] Vulpanix says. [It is the game of Multi-Armada Warfare.]

"That's right." Unarin says. "In this game, both players start with a roughly equal level of strength. They are forced to fight against one another fair and square, trying to outmaneuver the other through trickery, deception, and mindgames. But what about this other game?"

He waves his hand again, and this time, a much simpler looking 'game' appears, one that even Vulpanix needs a moment to recognize.

[Is that... a human game? I vaguely recognize it.]

"It is the game of 'Chess.'" Unarin states. "Oh, it is simplistic, by our standards. But make no mistake, it is just as complex as Multi-Armada Warfare, and contains a thousand different intricacies of its own. These sixteen pieces here face off against the opponent's sixteen pieces. Both sides are exactly equal. But what is the key difference between these games?"

Vulpanix falls silent for several minutes. She easily picks out a thousand differences between both games, but none of them seem to be hitting a core point in Unarin's message.

[I... I am not entirely certain. Please enlighten me, First Founder. This Confessor is still shamefully ignorant and lacking in broadness of mind.]

"Well. I am being a little obtuse." Unarin says with a chuckle. "You see, the game of Chess is entirely deterministic. Both players have perfect information at their fingertips, outside of the thoughts in their opponent's heads. You can make predictions about your opponent, but at the same time, you can also see exactly where every piece falls. Meanwhile, in the game of Multi-Armada Warfare, there are tens of thousands of variables you are likely to miss. As much as the game is about skill and strategy, it is equally about luck and guesswork. What if your destroyer manages to score a lucky shot on one of your opponent's capital-class vessels? With a single shot, you could completely swing the way the game plays. Through no fault of his own, your opponent would lose."

Vulpanix falls silent, allowing the First Founder to continue.

"It is unfair in a way." Unarin says, waving his hand to disperse the holograms. "But so too is life. I very much enjoy playing the game of chess. It has many thrilling moments, especially against a highly skilled player. But to me, the greatest joy comes when I play a game like Multi-Armada Warfare and manage to prepare for all of the worst-case scenarios. It is mentally engaging to imagine ten thousand scenarios wherein I lose, yet prepare counters for all of them. Then, should catastrophe strike, I can remain immovable before my opponent."

He pauses to look at Vulpanix meaningfully.

"When I crushed the Old Leaders during the Age of Ignorance, I used this sort of strategy to the fullest effect. Many times, they believed they could assassinate me, or catch me off-guard, but I always came prepared. And simply by standing tall, I made them fall into despair. By remaining unshakable, I obliterated their psyches. Eventually, they resigned our little 'game,' leaving me the ultimate victor. And so too shall these Wordsmiths ultimately lose to me."

[If I am understanding your words correctly...] Vulpanix says slowly, [you... did not intend for the Second Wordsmith to take Excalibur, but you have prepared for the event that he did.]

"Compared to defeating those old monsters during the Age of Ignorance, toying around and reading the thoughts of a few precocious mud-dwellers is truly nothing at all." Unarin says flippantly. "I wanted Hope to accept your offer. I placed you there because I needed someone who would be resolutely firm before the Wordsmith. Someone who would not back down, and who would show him that the Volgrim did not fear him."

[But... I did fear him.] Vulpanix says quietly. [I screamed pitifully at the sight of Solomon's Crown. I self-destructed. I ruined the prestige of your Empire.]

"Small details." Unarin says, brushing away her self-criticism. "Let me present you with a few scenarios. Tell me what the Volgrim Empire stands to gain in each one."

He pauses briefly, then continues to speak.

"Scenario one: The Wordsmith easily buckles to our demands. He accepts Excalibur, follows all of your demands, and begins spiritually engineering for us."

[Well, that's easy enough.] Vulpanix replies. [We gain... everything. All we lose is Excalibur.]

"Of course." Unarin replies. "Scenario two: The Wordsmith agrees to our demands. However, he also refuses to help us unless we give him all of the artifacts in the Vault. Have we suffered a loss?"

[We... did lose all of the artifacts.] Vulpanix says. [But his spiritual engineering would still benefit us greatly. It would be an equal trade.]

"Mmm. Scenario three: The Wordsmith lashes out and attacks you. However, you manage to defeat him through Excalibur and Cleansed Mud. We now have a Wordsmithing slave. What then?"

[That would be the best-case scenario.] Vulpanix answers. [We would lose nothing, but gain everything.]

"Indeed. And what of this? Scenario four..."

Unarin continues speaking. He fires off dozens of hypotheticals, each of them becoming progressively more and more dire for the Volgrim.

"Scenario forty-two..."

"Scenario fifty-six..."

"Scenario seventy-four..."

Vulpanix struggles mightily. But by the time he reaches the end, she has lost her ability to elucidate an answer regarding any benefits the Volgrim Empire might receive.

"Scenario seventy-five. The final one." Unarin says. "Hope Hiro kills you. He captures countless high-level Volgrim. He steals their knowledge through Solomon's Crown. He obliterates Serris, ruining eons of our hard work. Countless of our best and brightest, dead. Our top Technopaths, captured, enslaved, and mind-raped. Have we a single benefit to gain?"

Vulpanix's expression turns awful.

[...None that... I can see... First Founder.]

Unarin doesn't insult her, nor does he deride Vulpanix's mental abilities. Instead, he merely walks over and softly pats her shoulder.

"You are 100,000 years old, yet still young. You are powerful, yet little more than a pawn. You play chess, because you have not yet learned to appreciate the true bounty a game like Multi-Armada Warfare can offer. Ninety-nine point nine-nine-nine percent of all beings are like you. It is a shame, but that is the way reality works."

Unarin retracts his hand. He walks over to the table from before and casually picks up an art piece to play around with it.

"What sort of person is Hope Hiro?"

[Greedy to a fault.] Vulpanix immediately snaps. [Rude. Abrasive. Determined. Foolish.]

"Foolish." Unarin repeats. "Now that's an interesting term. What makes you think he is a fool?"

[We gave him a generous offer.] Vulpanix says. [But he rejected it for greed! He could have made friends with the Volgrim, but he chose to make us his enemy!]

"Mmm. Greedy, indeed." Unarin ponders. "Rude, certainly. Abrasive, I cannot speak from personal experience. But foolish? I think that's a step too far."

Unarin begins pacing around Vulpanix's hoverchair in circles while he speaks.

"A smart man wrings every last drop of value out of his products, his powers, his competitors, and his enemies. A mighty man does so without batting an eye. A king will even take glee in those antics. Hope has made countless gains, but he has suffered no losses. In my eyes, he is quite wise."

[How is making an enemy of you 'wise'?] Vulpanix asks.

"Do you really think the Volgrim are capable of punishing Hope Hiro?" Unarin asks. "Our battle lines are stretched. Our personnel are exhausted. Fatigue hangs at the edge of our every move. We're losing this war, Confessor. Now that Hope has obtained the divine blade, who can truly stop him? You? Me? Dosena? If he does not wish to be found, we will not find him. If he wishes to protect humanity, he can yank them off Tarus II through Excalibur's power. Any threats we make will only give him time to react. And if we actually do kill the humans on Tarus II, he will swiftly wipe us all out."

Unarin chuckles. Despite the dire words he just spoke, he appears quite comfortable with the situation.

"But if you think that the events at Serris gave the Volgrim no benefit, you are not thinking broadly enough. I have come to respect the Second Wordsmith. Despite descending from his original self, he has learned to listen to those smarter than him. His actions likely were made at the behest and urging on the Knowledge-Seeker, the Mind-Thief, Solomon. And a fool who pursues power blindly cannot be compared to a far-seeing lout who knows when to listen to the people smarter than him. Why, when I first rose up, I did not have all of the answers. It was my advisors and friends who gave me words to ponder that ultimately made me the Volgrim I am today."

"Perhaps Hope Hiro will become like me..." Unarin concludes. "A man who will do anything, give up anything, for the sake of his species."

The room falls quiet. Vulpanix stares at the First Founder in disbelief.

[You would actually praise the Second Wordsmith to this degree?]

"Reality is cruel and unfair sometimes." Unarin says. "It is... chaotic. Learning to navigate that chaos in order to seek out its strength is what separates conquerors and kings. Hope Hiro will become someone great. It is too early for his rise, now, but someday he may even surpass the First Wordsmith. It would take a monumental shift in fortune for the First Wordsmith to catch up now..."

[Even so, I prefer the First Wordsmith's actions.] Vulpanix says. [At least he respects the Volgrim enough to negotiate and play nice.]

"Does he respect us?" Unarin asks. "I would not be so sure of that. He is simply seeking benefits, as are we."

Unarin pauses.

"Now that we've addressed your role in the Serris Situation," Unarin says, "let us discuss the fallout and how we will deal with it moving forward. You still yet have many important parts to play. Don't think you can skip out with an easy vacation."

[First Founder, I would never!] Vulpanix immediately protests. [My duty is to the Volgrim Empire! I will always-]

"That was a joke, Confessor." Unarin says with a chuckle. He leans toward her and smiles. "You may laugh at it, unfunny though it be."

Vulpanix swallows her words. She looks away sheepishly.

[...oh.]

Part 439: A Pleasant Picnic

Several days before, on Tarus II.

Life goes on as normal for humanity's citizens. With the sudden and unexpected conclusion to the Stormbringer Tribunal, a certain air of suspicion lingers, leaving many of Jason Hiro's most ardent supporters to regard him with concern. His decision to spare Beelzebub's life may not have come easily, but almost nobody understands the truth of the matter in full. Outside of humanity's top leaders, the people who are well and fully aware of the Cube's significance, nobody else can even begin to follow the breadcrumb trail leading to Beelzebub's recent power-up.

But with Jason remaining tight-lipped, only a handful of people, such as Neil Adams, can begin to wrap their heads around the mechanics of why Jason would power Beelzebub up, and why he would subsequently pardon him. Jason's casual mention of the 'Phoenix' to Neil didn't even come close to adequately explaining the situation.

After three or four days, a certain amount of the recent hubbub finally begins to die down. Beelzebub, newly freed, and more powerful than at any point in his life, sits atop a mountain, by himself, about ten miles from the edge of Tarus II's lone population center. He sits cross legged, with his hands folded in his lap, a wistful look on his face.

"I'm stronger than ever. I have more power than I dared desire only a decade ago. But why does it all feel so... hollow?"

Beelzebub's keen Emperor-level eyesight allows him to easily pick out each individual speck far, far in the distance, each human, each monster, and each demon. He 'zooms in' on them, following them as they go about their daily lives.

"What was I even fighting for? The power to uplift demonkind? But it wasn't me who brought that possibility about. It was Jason Hiro. All I did was slow him down. Now I'm stronger than ever because of him, but he'd rather I be dead. I can't say that I blame him..."

As Beelzebub verbalizes his thoughts, a flicker of movement to the side catches his attention. Beelzebub turns to see a demoness levitating through the air toward him. He raises an eyebrow at her as she approaches.

"There you are." The woman says, her cloaked body shrouded in an air of mystique. "I've been looking for you."

"Mara." Beelzebub says to the recently ascended Duke of Collection. "Need something?"

The blond-haired beauty slows to a stop. A dot of light extinguishes on her forehead, and she inhales deeply.

"Air's a bit thin up here."

"I can breathe just fine." Beelzebub says, slightly annoyed by her intrusion on his private moment. He becomes even more annoyed when she unceremoniously plops down next to him, assuming an identical cross-legged stance.

"I'll bet you can..." Mara mutters absentmindedly. "So how about that brush with death? You and I were this close to getting executed."

Beelzebub hesitates. He looks away from Mara, toward the humans in the plains below.

"...We were."

"And?" Mara asks. "Now we're both alive and stronger than ever. Isn't that great? But at the same time, it feels undeserved. I killed a lot of humans... but they ended up allowing me to live."

"Jason still wanted to execute you." Beelzebub mutters. "He had no choice but to let you go. It would be hypocritical if he spared me but killed you and the others."

"Whatever." Mara mumbles. "At least I'm still alive."

Beelzebub chews his lower lip. "Have any regrets?"

"About killing a hundred thousand people?" Mara asks. "Most of them noncombatants? Women and children? Why would you ever think that haunts me, Beelzebub?"

Beelzebub wrings his hands together.

"What you did to humanity was evil. What I did was... indescribable. Indiscriminate. And why? Because my ego was a little bruised. I don't even know how many people I killed in total. I'm afraid to find out."

"Since when were you the kind and caring type?" Mara asks. "I don't get it. You've always been such a violent dickhead. Unlike me, a cute and sweet and innocent demoness who'd never hurt a fly."

Beelzebub snorts. "Sure you are. Ose didn't even give you an order and you pounced on those people. You're no better than me."

Mara doesn't fire back at him. Instead, she gazes off into the distance and sighs.

"Yeah... you're right. I don't really get it, either. I've always hated humans, but I'm not sure why. The Emperors and Dukes told me to hate them, so I did. But when it comes down to it, are the humans really all that bad? They just want to survive, the same as us. They want to thrive. I don't even want to fight them anymore... and I don't know if I ever truly did."

Beelzebub shrugs. "Considering the real enemy is still out there... maybe working alongside humans won't be so bad. I'm just not sure what I can do to make them forgive me."

"You can't make anyone forgive you." Mara snaps. "That's not how it works. The humans hate you. Like, like they REALLY hate you. They hate me too. The most we can do is just be our best selves. Maybe they will forgive us over time. And if not? We'll deserve that hatred too."

Something clears up in Beelzebub's mind. A fog lifts, making him blink several times.

"You're right. We don't deserve forgiveness. And since that's the case, we'll have to work hard to earn it."

He shoots Mara faint smile. "Thanks for the talk."

Mara rolls her eyes. "I liked you better when you fired off quips and kicked everyone's ass."

"Staying the same for all eternity sounds quite boring." Beelzebub muses. "I like to shake things up every now and again."

Mara rises to her feet. After dusting off the back of her black leather armor, she gives Beelzebub a thumbs up.

"Be seeing you."

She activates a Tarot Card, then vanishes from the spot.

After a minute or two, Beelzebub purses his lips.

"Maybe there's something unique that only I can do..."

In the chaos following the Stormbringer Tribunal, Jason had his hands tied with constant busywork. Placing spells upon all of those given the unexpected right to survival took him several days. If any of the guilty-judged demons or humans ever turn against humanity in the future, they will suffer unbearable, soul-rending pain thanks to the Wordsmith's magic.

Now, only three days later, Jason finally concludes this round of busywork.

He and his wife take a bit of time off to relax at the eastern side of humanity's largest settlement, a remote area that has yet to be colonized, and not far from the place where Kar fell to the Battle Brothers. Here, a makeshift graveyard has been formed, populated with stones marked for those who were unable to be revived following Stormbringer and other earlier conflicts.

But Jason and Phoebe don't take a day off to visit the graveyard. They go further out, to the edge of the wilderness. There, Jason summons a picnic table and some food for him and his wife to eat. They sit next to each other and lovingly wrap one arm around the other's back while using their free hand to munch on some sandwiches and soup.

In this small forest clearing, the distant sounds of Tarus II's city center are so faint as to be utterly inaudible. Here, the Wordsmith and his wife can simply enjoy a rare moment of peace and quiet.

It helps that Jason has erected a magical privacy field so he and his wife can speak in peace without fear of Demila or others listening in on them.

"This is nice." Phoebe says, smiling up at Jason. "I needed a day off."

"We both did." Jason acknowledges. "God. I have so much bullshit to deal with these days. Neil hasn't wasted any time recently. He's always making little gains here and there. I know what he's doing, and he knows I know, but we both still seemingly have to pretend he's being extra sneaky. I have no idea how to deal with him."

"You can't lock him up." Phoebe says. "Hope would just free him when he gets back."

"And I can't kill him either. Neil's extremely popular. Especially after that crap with Beelzebub… now he's really started turning the people against me."

Several long seconds of silence follow. Phoebe spoons some lemon pudding into her mouth and savors its taste.

"Maybe it really is time…" Phoebe mutters.

"To split humanity in half?" Jason asks.

"Yeah. One half goes inside the Cube. The other half stays on Tarus II. We need a backup solution… just in case."

Jason tosses his hand in annoyance. "We can't take the Belial Booster or the other facilities with us, though. They'll have to stay here. And do you think Neil or Hope is going to let the demons keep using it? No way."

Thanks to Jason's privacy field, neither of the two worries too much anyone will hear their casual words.

Not that it matters. Jason and his wife are already pretty sure Demila knows about the Cube, at least in a general manner.

"If the Plague randomly attacks Tarus II tomorrow, it will be too late to make any preparations." Jason reasons. "Hell. Maybe you're right. Let Hope and Neil have Tarus II. You and I can lead humanity on the Cube."

He frowns.

"Although… splitting humanity has a lot of problems. For one, I'm currently keeping Hope and Neil's more violent tendencies in check. If I leave, Neil will probably start ramping up to attack demonkind. That would go against my promise of peace…"

"If you can't kill Neil because of Hope," Phoebe reasons, "and if Hope is himself such a problem… why don't you…?"

She makes a cutting motion across her neck. Jason's frown deepens.

"Do you really want me to kill Hope? He's still me, Phoebe. We're different now, yes. But he's me. I can't just kill him. That's so screwed up."

"I don't want that either." Phoebe admits. "But what option do you have? You tried reasoning with him. You failed. He seriously hates your guts."

"You think he might listen to you?" Jason asks. "He probably still… loves you."

"He has Amelia now. Annette. Whatever name she's going by these days." Phoebe says. "I doubt Hope cares for me anymore."

"Haha..." Jason chuckles wryly. "Unlike me, you've never actually done anything to hurt Hope. He probably feels betrayed and like he lost you to me. I think if our positions were swapped, I might feel that way. But I can't see myself ever blaming you for what happened. I'd still love you to death, and so would he."

Phoebe chews her lower lip. "Yes. I guess. Maybe I should try to reason with him..."

The two of them resume their eating. When they start to feel full, Jason speaks a Word of Power and instantly empties their bellies, allowing them to keep eating again.

"Convenient!" Phoebe laughs. "I can eat all the sweets I want, all the yummy things, and you can make sure I don't ever fatten like a pig or let my teeth rot away!"

"I love eating good food." Jason chuckles. "It's pretty cool I can munch on as much as I want with no repercussions. Man should not possess this much power."

"You can also give yourself nearly unlimited stamina." Phoebe says playfully, winking at him. "It's a miracle I've only gotten pregnant twice."

"Hah!" Jason snorts. "And I thought I was the crude one."

He lovingly rubs his wife's belly.

"Can't wait until Timothy makes his way into our lives."

"Will we have time to properly raise him?" Phoebe ponders. "We're always so busy these days. And there was that vision you had..."

"It's just a vision." Jason says. "If you look at the future, you change the future. I can always try looking again... even though last time was pretty scary. Right now though, I'm more concerned with the past."

"Oh? What happened in the past?" Phoebe asks.

"I'm not sure. And that's the crux of the issue." Jason explains. "I had a long talk with Unarin, you see. We discovered all sorts of things by bouncing info off each other. The attack on Valhalla, the Plague from another galaxy... it's all a mess. I need a reliable way to peer into the past."

"Maybe you could do what Camael once did. You could make magical artifacts." Phoebe suggests. "Some sort of scrying crystal, maybe?"

"I'm a Wordsmith, not an Artifact-smith." Jason says. "That seems a little out of my skillset."

He and Phoebe finish their food, then erase the table from existence so they can lay on their backs in the grass and gaze up at the midday sky.

"Hmm... if I get some more free time, I wanna go racing." Phoebe yaps. "I haven't gotten to jump in a car and race around a track in months."

"We don't have a lot of time for leisure." Jason points out. "I still need to pay Marie Becker a visit. Plus I need to start building a safe place for human civilization inside the Cube. And what about our wartime capabilities? And I also need to make a device that can investigate the Plaguehosts, maybe find a way to cure them..."

"That's a lot of stuff on your plate." Phoebe points out. "Neil has Debra. Maybe you should get an assistant."

"I have an assistant." Jason replies, turning his head to look at his wife. "You."

"Hah! Think again, buster!" Phoebe laughs. "I've got my own projects, and more of them than you can imagine! I don't have time to be running your errands."

Jason nods seriously. "That's true. Hmm... an assistant. She'll have to be cute, attractive, nice butt..."

"Hey!" Phoebe snaps playfully. "'She' who? Who said you'd get a lady assistant?! I'll refer you to a musclehead with a six-pack."

"So you can ogle him?" Jason asks.

"So I can ogle him, mhm."

Jason lets out a laugh, and so does Phoebe.

Having lived with each other for six years, they don't mind teasing one another about these things. Neither of them takes the other's threats seriously, as they both know their true loyalties.

Eventually, after some time has passed, Jason pulls himself to a sitting position. He glances at the midday sun and sighs when he realizes it's begun its descent to the second half of the day.

"Wanna go pay Samantha a visit?" Jason asks.

Phoebe nods. "Oh, sure. But why her specifically?"

"To make sure the baby's doing okay." Jason says with a shrug. "Can't hurt to get a second opinion."

"We already bugged her a few days ago." Phoebe points out. "She's been doing a lot of overtime recently, healing the soldiers who come back injured from the Cube's training areas."

"Phoebe." Jason says pointedly. "Samantha... she loves you, you know. She's always excited when you show up. You light up her day."

"What do you mean?" Phoebe asks, also pulling herself into a seated position.

"You know what I mean. She's more than a little jealous of me." Jason says softly. "She... well, if you and I weren't a thing, she'd be all over you."

"No, that can't be right." Phoebe says, with a wave of her hand. "Sam and I are just friends."

"Ahaha..." Jason laughs, his tone slightly awkward. "You serious?"

"Of course I am. Jason, come on. Samantha and I aren't like that."

For a brief moment, the husband and wife both fall silent.

Jason wipes his thumb across his nose.

"Ahh. Well. Forget I said anything, then. Poor Sam..."

Phoebe's eyes flicker. "She... she really likes me in that way? She never said..."

"I seem to recall her giving you a big kiss after one of your race victories." Jason points out. "You didn't find that odd?"

"I thought it was a friendly kiss!" Phoebe protests. "Oh my god, am I completely blind? Looking back, it seems kind of obvious..."

"Haha!" Jason laughs, more sincerely this time. "You might be!"

He cleans away any leftovers from their picnic with his Wordsmithing, then he and Phoebe both turn to face the city. Jason clears his throat.

"Normalize."

Immediately, the transparent privacy barrier engulfing them vanishes, allowing the distant sounds of civilization to slowly rise back to normal levels.

"...Oh, boy." Phoebe murmurs. "Now we return."

"Yup. Now we retur-" Jason starts to say, only to pause mid-sentence.

He and Phoebe both turn to the left in unison, where they see a familiar gold-skinned Psion stepping out of a gap in space.

"Demila." Jason says neutrally. "Were you...?"

[Waiting for you to exit your private mating ritual.] Demila says authoritatively. [Indeed, I was. Your Wordsmithing is quite interesting. My senses could not pierce that strange vacuum enveloping your forms. Truly remarkable.]

Jason lightly licks his lips. "Why'd you come to see me?"

Demila does not immediately answer. Instead, she hovers in place, half a foot off the ground, with her arms folded behind her back. She says nothing, but intently scrutinizes the Wordsmith's face, as well as Phoebe's.

[You are unaware.] Demila says, her words sounding like a mixture between a question and a statement.

"Unaware of what?" Phoebe asks, feeling mildly annoyed by this disturbance right after her and Jason's delightful picnic.

[Does the name 'Serris' mean anything to you?] Demila asks, still continuing to carefully observe Jason and Phoebe's every facial movement, as well as every beat of their hearts.

"No..." Jason says slowly, while starting to frown. "Why? Should it?"

Once again, several seconds pass. Having satisfied some unspoken curiosity, Demila's posture becomes less intense. She leans back and mentally sighs.

[Where is your clone, Hope Hiro?]

"I don't know, exactly." Jason says, as a sudden sinking feeling opens in the pit of his stomach. "Last I heard, he went into the Labyrinth to... hunt down... Mephisto. And Yama, as well..."

[He lied to you.] Demila says quietly. [Our working assumption is that Hope Hiro returned to Tarus II in absolute secrecy. He stowed aboard the Hatoraxia and slinked away without anyone knowing. He has thus spent the past fourteen rotational cycles infiltrating Volgarius to further several insidious ends.]

The pit in Jason's stomach quickly turns into a miniature black hole.

"What are you saying?" He asks softly. "What did Hope do? What the fuck did he do?!"

[Two rotational cycles ago,] Demila says, [Hope Hiro traveled to a secret Volgrim research base on a moon known as Serris. It was the location of our most closely-guarded Vault. The place where we stored all of humanity's recovered artifacts.]

Jason's legs begin to shake. "Holy shit. He stole the artifacts, didn't he? Wait... was Solomon's Crown there? And Excalibur?!"

[They were.] Demila says, in an oddly-mild tone. [In total, Hope Hiro stole roughly one thousand artifacts. Well. He would not refer to this action as 'stealing,' because he viewed the artifacts as humanity's property, but that definition is up for debate. More importantly...]

Demila pauses for half-a-second.

[...Hope battled Confessor Vulpanix. He killed her, then took a Celestial Designer hostage, along with many of our elite Technopath researchers. For your information, that Celestial Designer was Psymin Miralax. You should be familiar with her name.]

Jason shakily nods his head. Something about Demila's tone tells him she's barely even told him the worst news.

"And w-what then?" Jason asks, his voice hoarse. "Did he do anything else?"

[Indeed. There was one last thing...] Demila says quietly. [Hope unleashed the power of Excalibur. He destroyed Moonbase Serris. He killed forty billion Volgrim.]

"Oh, Jesus jumped-up Christ!" Jason exclaims, finally losing the strength in his legs. He collapses to his knees, his entire body wracked with horror and a sickening feeling of nausea. "No, no god, how could he... he wouldn't... how the hell?! WHAT IS HE THINKING?!"

Phoebe also drops to Jason's level. She feels equally nauseous at the unexpected news, but compared to Jason, who can't help but mentally place himself in Hope's shoes, she only feels a distant disgust and horror at his actions.

For Jason, though, this revelation reminds him all too clearly of how he slaughtered millions of demons during Stormbringer's conclusion. He all-too-vividly recalls the rage in his mind and how shockingly simple it was to obliterate them from existence...

"Where... oh god... where is Hope now?" Jason asks, clenching his stomach and trying not to puke.

[We're not certain.] Demila says. [Not long after Serris's destruction, I received an order from Founder Unarin. Are you aware of the human known as Amelia Greyheart?]

Jason's heartrate spikes. "She's Hope's girlfriend! Fiance! I don't even know- never mind that, what did you do with her?"

[Me? Nothing.] Demila says. [But not long after Hope's attack, Amelia Greyheart vanished from Tarus II. It seems that Hope hid her from us. Neil Adams is still here, though. We suspect... Hope is testing us. He has not returned to Tarus II. But neither does he need to...]

As the seconds pass, Jason wraps his brain around more and more of the implications of what Demila is telling him.

"Hope has... the Crown... Excalibur... a thousand other artifacts. Holy hell. What am I even supposed to do? I don't have a hundredth the power he does now. This is ridiculous!"

"We need to confront Neil." Phoebe says. "I bet he'll know what's going on. He probably put Hope up to the whole operation."

Demila nods sagely. [What Hope has done is more terrible than you can possibly understand. Serris was one of three black-level research planets the Volgrim Empire could never afford to lose. It was in charge of hundreds of Founder-level projects even I know nothing about. By destroying Serris and killing all of those loyal Technopaths, Hope has set our war effort back tens of thousands of cycles. He has effectively made it impossible for us to win the War. Even more so, we are very likely to lose entirely now, and sooner than ever. When we fall, so too shall humanity.]

The Creator leans toward Jason and Phoebe.

[I do not know what actions you will choose to take next, but I strongly advise that you move quickly and with purpose. The war is unending. Once it reaches your world, it will already be too late. We can no longer advance without your help, Wordsmith.]

Jason nods numbly. He shakily rises his his feet, his face as pale as snow.

"I... I understand. I'll think of something quickly. For now... Phoebe and I... need to confront Neil."

Demila slowly blinks her eyes.

[I will go with you.]

Part 440: Humanity's Divergence

Jason, Phoebe, and Demila waste no time. The Wordsmith instantly teleports himself and the other two to the opposite side of the Fortress of Retribution. They pop into existence on the northwestern side of the city, not far from the area that leads into the underground training facility. Idly, Jason's thoughts darken as he wonders if Demila has already located the portal, one which is not even hidden all that particularly well, and thus had the chance to step directly into the Cube's confines. Of course, Blinker did say that she and her fairy friends recently built several additional protections into the transfer field, but he can't be entirely sure Demila is incapable of bypassing those restrictions.

When his teleportation concludes, Demila glances around thoughtfully. [Interesting.]

"Hm? What is?" Jason asks.

[Your magic does not operate on any known spatial or temporal mechanics.] Demila observes. [I expected to feel a tugging sensation, in much the same manner we High Psions experience teleportation when we shrink and expand space. But that is not how your Wordsmithing functions. It is much too... flawless.]

She trails off, glancing at the Wordsmith with renewed interest and a gaze that doesn't make him feel particularly comfortable.

"We can talk about that later." Jason says, while gesturing to the walls of the military compound a stone's throw away. "Let's go see Neil."

[Of course.] Demila says, swallowing any further observations.

Phoebe, meanwhile, listens intently to Demila's idle banter but says nothing. Her own mind churns thoughtfully as she thinks about the useful observations Demila may have just made, along with the worry that any additional insight into how Jason's magic works might give the Volgrim more and more of an edge against him.

The very thought lingers uncomfortably in the Wordsmith's wife's mind...

Jason leads the way. He walks up to the two guardsman posted in front of the perimeter gate, each of whom already saw his arrival a minute before, alongside Phoebe and Demila. These soldiers wear faceless T-REXs and loosely hold heavy energy rifles in their grasp. They raise them more guardedly as the trio approaches.

One of the two men turns his head toward Demila suspiciously. "Commander Hiro?"

Jason snorts. "If a 7th-Level Psion wants to have a look around, do you think you can stop her? Feel free to try."

The two soldiers glance at one another. They exchange words through their helmet links, then nod at Jason.

Without another word, the Hero leads his wife and their Psion 'guest' into the military facility. As they cross the threshold, Jason glances at Demila.

"How many times have you been inside here without anyone knowing, I wonder?"

[Your primitive security systems are no match for me.] Demila says without a shred of hesitation. [I go where I please. If that bothers you, feel free to kill me right now.]

Jason rolls his eyes. "I already figured that was the case. But don't go bragging too much about your infiltration capabilities. Especially considering how Hope just bent your entire Empire over in a manner most humiliating..."

That shuts Demila up. She falls silent and looks away, not deigning to reply.

Jason and Phoebe march into the Command Center, the largest dome inside the military complex. To their mild surprise, Neil's assistant, Debra, walks up to them.

"Jason, Phoebe. What brings you to our corner today?"

Debra doesn't mention Demila, but she does give the imposing alien a quick, dismissive glance before returning her attention to the Wordsmith.

"I'm here to see Neil." Jason says blandly. "But I assume you guessed as much already."

"Mmm. Neil happens to have some free time. If you'll follow me, I'll take you to see him." Debra says, pushing her thick glasses up her nose.

The blonde-haired woman turns on her heel and starts to walk away. The others follow behind her.

Jason clears his throat. "Say... how is Annette doing recently?"

"She's quite fine." Debra says, without looking back at him. "Hope treats her well."

"Yeah. I imagine he does..." Jason says quietly.

They walk past dozens of personnel, all of whom can't help but stare at the Psion levitating a few inches off the ground, following behind Jason like a mixture between a god of war and a puppy. As for Demila, she pays their glances little regard, perhaps the same amount a human would if a group of ants were to start watching their movements. The assorted mud-dwellers mean nothing to her.

Debra guides the three into Neil's office. They find humanity's military commander sitting behind his desk in a large, comfortable black executive chair. Neil wears the same blue military uniform as always. He leans heavily back into his chair and swipes absentmindedly across a datapad in his grip.

When Debra enters, it seemingly takes a few moments for Neil to register the arrival of these guests. Even so, when he raises his eyes, he does so in such a slow and lazy manner that even Jason can sense the beginning of his typical mind-games.

"Oh, Jason! Phoebe. And the Volgrim too." Neil says, while gesturing for Debra to leave. She nods at him, then carefully shimmies past Demila out the door.

After Debra leaves, Neil smiles perfunctorily. "What a pleasant surprise, seeing the three of you. To what do I owe this visit?"

Demila lifts her chin. [Your mental shield has been recently reinforced. The magical signature does not match the First Wordsmith's energy...]

"Ah. Is that so?" Neil asks innocently. "Forgive me. I'm quite spiritually dull. I didn't realize I had obtained such a useful security feature out of the blue. I wonder where it came from?"

Jason groans loudly while rolling his eyes. "Fuck off, Neil. I know you know what happened with Hope. He destroyed a planet and killed forty fucking billion Volgrim. Now he has Excalibur, Solomon's Crown, and the Domin-"

"He does?" Neil interrupts, with a puzzled expression. "Well, that's great news for humanity! I can't wait for you to tell me more about it."

The man smiles in a manner so sickeningly smug it makes Jason want to immediately blast him with holy energy. Fortunately, Fiona manages to quickly talk some sense into Jason. He forces himself to remain neutral.

"Always with the word-games, Neil." Jason says. "Are you going to sit there and play stupid all day? Or can we act like adults for once?"

Neil's sickeningly smug smile vanishes. With a shrug of his shoulders, he tosses the data pad onto his desk, leans forward, and rests his elbow on its mahogany surface.

"Why are you in such a bad mood, Jason? I can never get a read on you. This is simply wonderful news! Now humanity possesses the power to ensure the Volgrim can never again threaten us. As for a few tens of billions of dead... so what? Humanity has lost just as many to the Volgrim's evil ways. Hope has merely... balanced the scales."

Demila's expression becomes stern. [Lives lost during a war are not the same as those taken by a power-hungry madman. Do you intend to make an enemy of the Volgrim Empire?]

Neil's eyebrows elevate. His voice drops an octave. "So what if I do? Shall you flex your proverbial muscles and obliterate Tarus II? Don't come at me with that self-serving bullshit, Psion. You no longer possess the strength to challenge me, let alone my prodigious pupil."

The Creator's eye twitches, but she doesn't retort. She merely glances at the back of Jason's head, standing in front of her.

Jason, for his part, releases a breath.

"What's the game plan, then, Neil? Obviously, Hope has become far more powerful than me. Is he going to seize power? I'm sure you're feeling pretty good about yourself right about now."

Neil tosses his hands up in a helpless manner. "What can I say? I backed the right horse. You've always been something of a manchild, throwing tantrums about the little girl you lost. The child you killed through your own inaction, I mean. Comparatively, Hope has recognized the Truths of our reality and taken steps to prevent such heartbreak. Had you simply listened to my warnings early on, we could have taken more aggressive and proactive measures against the demons. They never would have been able to invade Tarus II. Stormbringer would not have happened. That adorable girl would still be scampering about, laughing and calling you 'daddy.'"

Neil mercilessly mentions Daisy several times in a row, impaling verbal lances directly into Jason's heart. The Wordsmith's eyes twitch in pain, but he forces himself to remain composed.

"...Are you done?" Jason asks, biting off the last word. "I don't need you to tell me how I failed. I already know."

"We get it, Neil." Phoebe says, crossing her arms. "You feel like you've won. You think killing all of the demons is the right move to make. You also know that I don't even disagree with you. But fundamentally, this is a question about the sort of people we want to be. Now that Hope possesses Excalibur, killing the demons should be quite simple, yes? But do you really want to walk down that road? Are you doing this purely for logical reasons... or are you still bitter over your wife and children?"

In exactly the same way Neil verbally stabbed Jason, Phoebe fires right back at him. Having become entranced during the time of Napoleon's era, Neil fell into Bahamut's clutches and became separated from his family, ultimately losing them to the passage of time. Phoebe digs into this mental barb, making him lose a bit of his composure.

"And so what if I did?!" Neil snaps back. "You've lost a little girl! I've lost my family! We both lost people precious to us because of these worthless fucking bloodskins! Yet still... STILL you defend their so-called right to exist!"

Neil rises from his chair, far angrier than Jason or Phoebe has ever seen him before.

"You should both be ashamed of yourselves!" Neil barks. "I had no ability to protect myself from that damned Bahamut, all those millennia ago. But you were more than capable of saving millions of lives and you DIDN'T! I am doing what must be done! I am going to kill every single demon in existence!"

[There is a greater war to be fought.] Demila interjects. [Your personal hatred of the demons is likely to result in your loss to the Kolvaxians.]

"You think I'm not aware of that possibility?!" Neil exclaims. "I am! I know full well the horror of the monsters your kind dragged to the Milky Way through whatever probing efforts you wasted in some other galaxy. But that does not matter! The demons are evil and must die! Forget your philosophical pandering, your warnings about the 'greater good.' Once the demons are dead, my boy will go out there and obliterate the Plague as well. And if he fails? So what? He will create an impenetrable kingdom in a hole in space where the Plague cannot reach us!"

Neil slaps his chest hard enough to make a thwap noise.

"You Volgrim overplayed your hands! Now it's time for humanity to rise. You can fade into the dustbin of history for all I care. You no longer have any way of stopping our rise."

[We may not have a reason to stop you,] Demila says calmly, [but do not take that to mean that we have no methods.]

Jason frowns at the threat implied by her words, but otherwise doesn't address it.

"Look, Neil. I understand. You lost your family. You blame the demons. I could do the same with regards to Daisy, but I don't. Not as much as I probably should, anyway. But don't you want to... to... improve humanity's outlook? To rise above the pettiness and evil of the past? Just because the demons have killed billions, and just because you now possess the power to return that evil back unto them... does that mean you should? You're a man of God, yes? What does the Bible say about an eye for an eye? It only leaves both parties blind."

Neil snorts. "You speak of the Creator as if you care at all for His will. At the same time, you take the side of a Psion who dares to take the Creator's title for herself. A presumptuous concept, if I don't say so myself."

The military commander walks around the side of his desk. He folds his arms behind his back, puffs out his chest, and regains his previous air of regal aloofness while approaching Jason.

"I'm not interested in 'being better' than the demons, the Volgrim, or even the Plague. I'm going to win. If you want to stop me, just flap those lips of yours and erase me from existence. Otherwise, we can move on to the more important reason you came here."

Jason drags his teeth against his lower lip. He resists the urge to do just as Neil suggests, knowing it will only piss Hope off, as well as betray his own convictions.

"We're not enemies, Neil. We both want humanity to prosper. I say it's about time we considered a split."

Neil sneers. "A split? Yes, what a great idea. You take fifty percent of the people, and I take the other half. We raise humanity in our own way. Then we'll see who truly reigns supreme."

"Not fifty percent." Jason says quietly. "These are our friends and comrades, Neil. Not pawns on a chessboard. We'll let everyone decide which side they want to join. If all of them join you, or all join me, the other should not protest. Two weeks from now, we will present our cases to the public. Then, everyone can choose the side they'd prefer to follow."

Neil's cocky expression fades, ever so slightly. In its place, a slightly more empathetic look appears.

"Alright. Are you prepared for disappointment? What if everyone does choose to join my side? I'd hate to see you heartbroken."

Phoebe interjects. "Let's not force people to make a permanent choice, Neil. Be reasonable. There's no reason our two societies can't allow for cross-trade, for peaceful negotiations, and so on. Immigration between each realm, families visiting across our borders... these should be on the table."

Jason nods. "Furthermore... you will take your people to Maiura. It's already you and Hope's chosen homeworld. You can build up whatever fortifications, structures, and defenses you need with ease now that he has essentially unlimited mana and Solomon's Crown. But I am the one who took charge in building Tarus II. This is my homeworld, and I will retain control of it... along with its moon and other outliers."

"Hmph. You're evicting me." Neil chuckles. "Hope could obliterate you now with ease, and you actually think you have any right to order me off-world? But fine. You can have your way. There are far too many bloodskins entrenched here for my liking. At least on Maiura, we've taken care not to let them infiltrate our ranks. It will be a secure world where people won't have to fear any attacks by our future enemies..."

Jason exhales quietly. "I really pray that you will set aside your violent ways, Neil. I don't know what your wife and kids were like, but would they think less of you if they knew you were using their deaths to pursue a path of bloodshed? I know my daughter would have wanted me to make friends with everyone. It's part of why I walk the path I do."

"Don't condescend to me." Neil says mildly. "You killed millions of demons at the end of Stormbringer. You're not some paragon of virtue. You're a hypocrite led by the same grudges and hatred as me. Unlike me, however, you've chosen not to take your deserved anger to its logical limit. You let the demons walk all over you because your feeling of moral superiority is more important than protecting the people you love."

Neil's eyes shift to Phoebe.

"It's too bad you stayed with this fool, Phoebe. He's going to be the death of you someday. Hope would have made for a far superior husband."

"I don't appreciate your insults toward Jason." Phoebe says, wrapping her arm around his. "I stick by him because I love him. As for Hope... it isn't as if I don't feel that same love for him too. I'm just disappointed in the choices he's made."

"He makes those choices because he has the clarity of mind to do what must be done." Neil concludes, turning away to return to his chair. He plops down in it heavily, then leans back and sneers at the trio. "Now begone. I'll start making plans for our split. I just hope you're ready for one of the worst disappointments of your life."

"You seem confident about convincing humanity to join your cause." Jason observes. "But confidence alone does not sway nations. I look forward to an amicable split, Neil."

Neil makes a flippant motion with his hand. "I have work to do now. Thanks for visiting."

"Mmm." Jason grunts.

He and Phoebe turn and exit the room.

Demila begins to follow after them. But as they start to leave, she turns her attention toward humanity's military commander.

[Founder Unarin wishes to speak to you.] Demila transmits in secret to Neil. [He finds you to be an interesting human. If you decide to pay him a visit, your safety will be guaranteed.]

[I'm not worried about my safety.] Neil thinks back, allowing Demila to read his surface thoughts. [Killing me would be the last mistake your decrepit Empire ever makes...]

[So you say.] She concludes.

After Jason, Phoebe, and Demila leave, they travel a short distance south of the military base, ultimately stopping to discuss their chat with Neil.

[Neil Adams made many interesting observations.] Demila says to the two humans casually. [His desire to kill the demons is petty, rooted in ignorance. But do not worry too much about those violent ambitions of his.]

Jason scowls. "Why shouldn't I? He's going to undo everything I've worked so hard to accomplish. All my efforts toward peace..."

Demila's eyes curve upward in a Volgrim-like 'smile.' She leans toward the Wordsmith, while a vicious expression flickers across her face.

[Do you think the demons will be helpless before your clone's might? Do you think the might of Excalibur makes him... invincible? Can you even comprehend the frightening power possessed by the First Emperor?]

Jason's heart skips a beat. "The First-?!"

[The demons are weak, yes.] Demila interrupts. [Even compared to the you of now, they cannot match your power. But... I can say with absolute certainty... if you were to strike at them with the intent to erase their species... the First Emperor would appear. And in that moment, you would know despair.]

Jason's skin turns cold to the touch. He senses not only the warning in Demila's mental tone, but a hint of genuine fear.

"He's... really that powerful?"

[I am not entirely certain.] Demila replies. [But when the demons rose up to rebel against my people, some thousand cycles after the conclusion of the Energy Wars... we thought to eradicate them, only to meet the unyielding wall known as their First Emperor.]

She slowly leans back.

[None know his true identity. None know when he arose, or what method he used to achieve his power. Some thought he was the second coming of the fallen Emperor, Satan. Others believe he may be a primordial life-form, disguising himself as a demon. Your recent discussions with Unarin have even led us to wonder if he might be an ancient Titan, a Dragon, or... something else.]

"What if he is just a demon?" Jason asks. "Wouldn't that mean...?"

[If he is indeed a true-blooded demon, then he has broken past the barrier placed upon him by the angels. He has reached the level of Demon Deity. But compared to that False Deity, Wolfram... the First Emperor surely stands an epoch higher. That is why we are not so certain he is a demon at all.]

Jason glances at Phoebe. His wife shrugs helplessly, while offering a wry smile.

"Let's just pray it doesn't come down to mass bloodshed." Phoebe says.

The Hero and his wife thank Demila for her timely warning. The Psion 'Creator' steps through a gap in space and vanishes, traveling to some unknown location by herself.

Jason and Phoebe turn and start walking south, toward the residential suburbs that have sprung up between Tarus II's main city and the Warpgate complex. As they walk, they talk about many things.

"-Fortress of Retribution." Jason says. "It could really use a softer name. I named it that during my fit of rage, but now... I want to pursue a different path. Especially with all this Hope business."

Phoebe sighs. "Hope can essentially do as he pleases now. You can't stop him. Neither can I. He's filled with so much hatred, Jason."

"He killed forty billion Volgrim." Jason says quietly. "Is that what I'll become? A genocidal mass-murderer? I already did it once. I don't have the right to criticize him when I'm such a hypocrite myself."

Phoebe rubs her husband's back to try and lift his spirits. "You can't think like that. You made a mistake in the heat of the moment. And frankly, the demons... they deserved to die. How many humans did they kill during Stormbringer? But what Hope did was indiscriminate. Horrifying. It's ten levels beyond-"

Abruptly, Phoebe pauses mid-sentence when she sees a random woman walking directly toward her and Jason. Her unexpected pause causes Jason to blink his eyes and refocus on his surroundings. He notices the woman approaching only half a beat after his wife did.

"Jason Hiro." The brown-haired woman says. "Marie Becker has learned of the recent happenings caused by your clone. She wishes to speak to you as soon as possible."

The Wordsmith blinks in surprise. "Rebecca? What are you doing- how did you get here?"

As if unamused by the stupidity of his question, the pretty young brunette flippantly gestures behind herself, to the west. "I used the Warpgate, of course."

"Rebecca?" Phoebe asks. "Who is she, Jason?"

The Wordsmith awkwardly rubs his head.

"She's, uh, Marie Becker's assistant. One of the people working under her."

He turns his attention to Rebecca.

"Why does Marie want to see me? Not that I don't wish to speak to her, but I have some pressing matters that have fallen on my figurative plate, as you can imagine."

"Oh, we're quite aware." Rebecca says, while smiling. "But she wanted me to speak a single word to you. She said you would understand the... implication."

Jason cocks his head. "Huh. A single word? And what would that be?"

Rebecca lowers her voice and takes a step toward the couple.

Under her breath, she whispers...

"Mildred."

Part 441: Karma and Chaos

"Mildred?" Jason repeats. "Do you mean-"

"I think you know already." Rebecca quickly says with a perfunctory smile, while glancing around. Jason realizes he nearly made a mistake by bringing up Marie's treasure trove of artifacts, an existence which the Volgrim should hopefully still be in the dark about.

And in that moment, several other realizations come to him.

Mad Madam Mildred. Julius Caesar. Tucker... all those Heroes! They're inside Marie Becker's underground facility!

Jason's heart skips a beat. Neither he nor Rebecca says anything for a moment, but they both come to a mutual understanding while Phoebe raises her eyebrows multiple times in bewilderment.

"Um. Am I missing something??" Phoebe finally asks.

Jason nods. "Privacy. Barrier. Silence. Opaque..."

He fires off more than two dozen words, largely committed to memory by now, enveloping the trio with an impenetrable but invisible barrier that will prevent anyone from seeing, hearing, or reading the thoughts of those inside.

Jason smiles at Rebecca. "So, Marie has-"

"Are you sure we're alone inside here?" Rebecca asks curtly. "Are we the only three present?"

The Wordsmith frowns. But then, he realizes what she means.

All this time, I've been creating the barrier and simply assuming it gives me perfect privacy. But Demila can turn herself invisible. What if she stood beside me while I made the barrier and secretly remained inside? I'd spout off all my secrets and she'd hear every word! Hmm...

Inside Jason's head, Fiona hears her husband's thoughts. She looks up from her current spiritual engineering project and blinks. "I hadn't even thought of that myself. You should triple-scan the area, just to be sure."

Jason nods, all while his real-wife looks increasingly more and more annoyed at the lack of explanations. Jason fires off another dozen Words of Power to scan the area and search for any hints of a hidden intruder, but he doesn't find any.

"Alright..." Jason says. "I think it's just the three of us now."

Rebecca nods. "I can detect when Psions are hidden nearby. I already knew we were alone. But I believed it would be prudent to make sure you thought to check as well."

She turns to Phoebe.

"My apologies for my rather rude and abrupt intrusion. I've come on behalf of humanity's foremost genius, Marie Becker. She would like to invite your husband to the Remnant Oasis to speak to him. Of course, you are free to come as well."

Phoebe nods. "Jason told me about Marie a few months back, but he never mentioned a... Mildred?"

She looks at Jason questioningly, but before Jason can explain, Rebecca raises her hand.

"Marie Becker did not inform me about the significance of 'Mildred,' she only told me that it was a name that should greatly interest you. She also advised that I not dig any deeper. If you wish to inform your wife, please do so when I am not around."

He nods. "Fair enough. Well, I had other things to do, but now I can sufficiently say nothing matters more than visiting Marie. Although... will this take long?"

"It shouldn't require more than a day or two of your time." Rebecca answers. "Why? Are you in a rush?"

"This wouldn't be an ideal time for Phoebe and I to both disappear," Jason explains. "You see, we just had a bit of a thing happen with Neil..."

He proceeds to fill in Rebecca on the recent happenings, while Phoebe chimes in with her own observations here and there.

Ultimately, Rebecca sighs and rubs her forehead. "Humanity and the demons will not go to war in the next day or two. I have it on good faith that Hope is currently spending some time learning about the different artifacts that have fallen under his control. Miss Becker is quite good at predicting the behavior of others, you see."

Jason nods slowly. "Well, alright then. Phoebe, you want to go?"

His wife shrugs. "I do have a lot to work on..."

"Marie has a bunch of super high-tech gadgets though." Jason says. "I know Fiona REALLY enjoyed getting a look at-"

"Well you should have led with that!" Phoebe interrupts. "Heck yes, I'm going. Rebecca, lead the way."

The brown-haired woman nods. Jason removes the barrier shielding them, and they begin to walk toward the Warpgate.

"Rebecca's an android, you know." Jason says to Phoebe. "Pretty advanced too."

"It's true!" Rebecca chirps. "I abandoned my flesh-vessel tens of millennia ago."

"Oh how interesting!" Phoebe exclaims, even more excited than before. "Can you tell me about yourself? I have quite a fascination with robotics and advanced technology, you see."

"Of course." Rebecca says. "I'm something of a scientist myself."

Not long before.

After leaving Jason and Phoebe's side, Demila flickers thirty miles to the north, walking across space with ease. She travels the entire distance in a single second by shrinking the gap between her current position and intended destination, then taking a single step forward.

Like several other High Psions, Demila's mastery of Spatial Psionics has reached a profound level. While she might not compare to the mightiest Executor, Nufaris, let alone the Second Founder, Dosena, Demila stands alongside Vulpanix as one of the greatest Spatial Psions in the modern Volgrim Empire.

Demila arrives on the random mountaintop and turns to focus her attention on the area she just left. With her superior psionic senses, especially given her role as a scouting and investigatory specialist, she can easily count the number of leaves on a flower halfway across the planet, let alone a mere thirty miles.

Vulpanix will revive in three or four cycles. Demila thinks. Before then, I must continue to observe humanity's movements and perform my secret mission. The Second Wordsmith's next actions will assuredly upend the current regime on Tarus II dramatically. It would be best if I can locate the ten kilogram Trifrancium deposit before we lose all further opportunities at doing so.

Indeed, having long ago learned about the lost deposit of Trifrancium, the most valuable warp-empowering substance in the known universe, the Volgrim have been secretly attempting to locate it. Yet, even after searching through the memories of multiple human leaders, including Neil Adams, Demila has failed to uncover its hiding spot.

Her eyes flicker as she senses a third presence approaching Jason and Phoebe. Before long, the Terrandroid known as Rebecca vanishes along with the other two, hidden by Jason's Wordsmithing.

Demila scowls. Again with that Wordsmithed barrier. How frustrating that even I cannot peer into its confines...

Demila tries to focus her psionic powers to the point that she can pierce the veil of secrecy shrouding Jason, Phoebe, and Rebecca's discussion, but at that moment, a flicker of movement startles her!

[Who's there?!] Demila roars, spinning around to look at a spot barely a hundred feet behind her.

To Demila's surprise, a single human male sits on a rock, staring at her back. The kindly-looking man appears to be of Asian descent, specifically Japanese. He smiles at her, exposing his teeth.

"Creator Demila. Ahh, how nice to see you again."

Demila's heartbeat quickens. [You snuck up on me! Impossible! I should have detected you the moment I entered this area! What mere mud-dweller possesses the skills to evade this Creator's senses?!]

The man shrugs lightly, as if her angry tone has absolutely no effect on him. His clean brown hair and simple peasant-clothes give him a humble air, but even as Demila fully focuses her attention on him, she finds that she still has trouble fully comprehending his existence.

"So rude." The man says. "This isn't the first time we've met, yet you act as if I'm some unknown monster. How shameful for a lauded High Psion to have such a sloppy memory."

Hearing the firmness in the man's voice, Demila's mind races. She tries to recall any past instance of meeting this human, but her interactions with the people of Tarus II have already been essentially nonexistent.

She ultimately pulls up the names of every human on Tarus II, a feat she can easily perform thanks to her psionically enhanced brain and having casually read all of their information through a Changeling report.

[Hm? You are... Makoto Ueda?] Demila asks, now even more baffled than before. [We have never spoken! If you are a Changeling attempting to prank me, you will not live past the next standard time-unit!]

"A Changeling?" Makoto says lazily. "No, no. Not quite. It seems you really have forgotten. Let me give you a hint. We last met on Earth, over 100,000 years ago..."

[Earth?] Demila asks, frowning deeply. [Humans cannot live that long. Only the ones kept alive by Bahamut's magic could, and I am still certain we have... never... met...]

She trails off, but begins to feel a deep doubt.

After all, something about this man and the way he speaks does seem a little familiar.

"I'll quit playing around." He says, slapping his crossed knees. "Once, I was known as Siddhartha Gautama. But you would remember me as... Buddha."

A pulse of shock races through Demila's body. She quickly takes a step back and looks at the man with fear.

[The Undying Hero! The Reincarnator! It cannot be! We confirmed that you failed to resurrect! Earth's destruction should have finally obliterated your last vestiges! How can you be here now?!]

"Such a loving tone." Buddha says mildly. "It almost sounds like you would have been happier, had I died."

Demila's eyes glow with power. [Reviving must have taken up a tremendous amount of your strength... if I kill you now, you won't return!]

Her threat splashes against Siddhartha's face harmlessly. He stares at her silently, as if she were a huge idiot.

"Hoho. Well, go ahead then, roll that dice. I'm sure I definitely will not return yet again. And here I was going to make you quite a generous offer..."

Demila hesitates. She stares with deep suspicion at the fearsome human, the creature capable of reviving from death a seemingly infinite number of times.

[...What cursed deal could you possibly offer to me that I would foolishly accept?]

"I am not your enemy, dear False Creator." Buddha says mildly. "I am only the servant of Karma. I follow the True Creator's will. And he has... an enemy... he wishes for you to eliminate."

[I already have many enemies.] Demila says, standing up a little straighter. [Do not speak as if I am some Earth-Mutt you can send to attack your adversaries.]

"Your enemy is my enemy. And my enemy is yours." Buddha says cryptically.

At this point, after growing more and more annoyed by the Undying Hero's words, Demila summons her psionic power to attempt to read his mind. But instead of uncovering Buddha's thoughts, she shockingly finds that there are two minds inside of his skull, and she can only read the thoughts of the slumbering one.

[Your soul has possessed the original Makoto Ueda's body!] Demila exclaims. [How vile! Especially for a so-called 'Hero!']

"These are dangerous times. Dark times." Buddha says cryptically. "But enough with the word games. I'll say it plainly..."

He rises from the rock and stands up, assuming a dignified stance.

"The enemy I wish for you to kill is none other than the Demon Emperor of Chaos. Gressil."

Demila narrows her eyes. [Gressil? He is indeed a top target of mine. But I am not supposed to kill him. Founder Unarin has ordered me to capture him alive.]

"Gressil is too powerful. Too elusive." Buddha says. "You will fail. Only by working with me will you be able to find and kill him. He must not be allowed to live any longer."

[Why are you so set on killing this Demon Emperor?] Demila asks, now much more interested in Buddha's proposition than before. [And how can you possibly assist me when you no longer have any Heroic powers? You will not be able to locate him where I have failed.]

"Indeed, I lack Heroic magic." Buddha says, blinking sagely. "But my abilities have not been entirely crippled. I am a servant of the Creator. I am the Envoy of Karma. Gressil is...

the Envoy of Chaos."

Demila cocks her head. [The Envoys of Karma and Chaos? These titles certainly sound pretty, but I have not heard them before. Elaborate.]

Slowly, Buddha nods. He begins to pace back and forth while folding his hands behind his back.

"There are four forces which govern our universe. They go by the names of Luck, Destiny, Karma, and Chaos. All have their roles to play. All are powerful in their own way. Each has but one Envoy in every galaxy. I am the Milky Way's Envoy of Karma, and Gressil is its Envoy of Chaos."

Intrigued, Demila carefully records Buddha's every word through Psionic Etching, taking care to preserve their exact contents for Unarin's benefit later.

"Who are the Envoys of Luck and Destiny, then?" Demila asks.

"When the time is appropriate, they will reveal themselves." Buddha answers. "Until they do, it is not my place to say."

[Then you know of their identities.] Demila asks, her tone rhetorical.

Buddha ignores her query. "Karma is a word which describes what you might call the Principle of Certainty. Every action has an equal and opposite reaction. The fate one weaves for themselves, through the words they utter and the choices they make, ultimately creates their Karma. When they die, the Karma they have accumulated will manifest in a manner most appropriate to their personage."

He continues. "Chaos is the opposite. It is the principle of uncertainty. Randomness. The Envoy of Chaos seeks to spread discontent and failure everywhere he goes. Death is not the end goal, nor is destruction. But by its very nature, excessive Chaos leads to such."

"It seems that killing the Envoy of Chaos would lead to a galaxy ruled by Karma." Demila observes. "That seems a positive result."

"Karma is neither inherently good nor evil." Buddha states, while pacing back and forth. "It merely... 'Is'. A galaxy ruled exclusively by Karma would be one where all actions are set in stone. There can be no unforeseen events. If two humans were to copulate, the result would always be a child. If a ship were properly maintained, it would never break down. If a man were to murder another man, he would immediately die afterward as well, regardless of the goodness or badness of who he killed."

"But aside from Karma and Chaos, the other two principles have their own merits." Buddha continues. "Luck is similar to Chaos, a counterbalance of sorts. Where Chaos seeks to create uncertainty that divides and corrodes, Luck seeks to create uncertainty that uplifts and transcends. This may seems positive to you, but suppose the Plague were to encounter great fortune and massively expand their capabilities? Their good luck would be your bad luck. And thus, it would create Chaos."

[Luck seems a nebulous trait of the universe.] Demila remarks. [It benefits all equally, or perhaps not at all. It might be there, or it might not.]

"Destiny is the final of the four universal forces." Buddha concludes. "Destiny and Fate are seemingly the same, but they have different connotations. A man may be fated to die, but he may also be destined for greatness. When one's actions lead to a negative end, we say that it was their fate. When one's actions lead to a positive end, we say that it was their destiny. In this way, the two can be considered to be extensions of Karma more than Chaos."

[I see.] Demila says quietly. [But you contradict yourself, Undying Hero. You state that all four have a role to play, yet you also wish for me to kill the Envoy of Chaos. Based on what you've said, it would be in my best interest to let the Demon Emperor known as Gressil live.]

"Chaos is like salt." Buddha says. "If I were to sprinkle some on my tongue, it might taste pleasant. But if I were to sprinkle a bit too much there, it would be quite vile. But what if I were to consume far too much of it?"

[You would die.] Demila says.

"Exactly." Buddha says. "Gressil has lived far too long as the Envoy of Chaos. He has mastered its powers to a frightening extent. He now threatens the balance of reality through his control of its might. My abilities can return, and they most certainly would, under normal circumstances. But in truth, I have already chosen a successor. It will take the young one time to reach Gressil's strength, time which he does not have. Once I fulfill my final obligations, I will be able to pass on my responsibilities to him."

Somewhat taken aback, Demila scrutinizes Buddha's face. [You... do you intend to die? Permanently?]

"I always have." Buddha says, his tone mild. "Do you think I chose this hellish existence? Dying, reincarnating, living out one meaningless existence after another? No. I only continued because of my obligation to the Creator. And soon, I will receive the release of death. It is one I have waited a long time to receive..."

[If Gressil dies, will another take his place?] Demila asks.

"In time." Buddha answers with a nod. "Always four envoys, there are. The previous Envoy of Destiny was none other than the Archangel Camael. With her death, that link was shattered. Now, Chaos has grown without resistance..."

[Mmm.] Demila grunts. [Then killing Gressil will only temporarily stop the spread of Chaos. Considering our galaxy's dire situation, I suppose I have no choice except to agree to your terms. But how will you go about tracking our target down? I have not caught even a trace of his trail...]

"He is my opposite." Buddha says simply. "I can see the ebb and flow of Karma. Where I do not see it flowing, that is where Chaos will be at its strongest. We need only follow that path to find the one we seek."

Demila grimaces. [To think a day would come where I would have to seek the assistance of a damned mud-dweller. Fine. You will take me to Gressil. I will kill him on the spot. A mere Demon Emperor cannot possibly stand a chance against this ancient Psion.]

"I should hope not." Buddha says. "But do not let your warrior spirit give you an inflated sense of confidence. Gressil is ever elusive... if he escapes, finding him again will take time."

Demila's eyes curve up into a vague smile.

[Then we had better move with haste.]

Part 442: Archangel's Surprise

Two days earlier.

Archangel Uriel, after witnessing the end of the Stormbringer Tribunal, felt unsatisfied. She and her brothers darkly watched as Beelzebub advanced to Emperor, gained untold power, and was summarily 'pardoned' by Jason Hiro. Disgusted, they had no choice but to observe from the sidelines as yet another evil, detestable bloodskin walked free, along with tens of thousands of his other cohorts.

Now, they linger inside the lone church on Tarus II's surface, protected from outside observers by its privacy field.

"We cannot do nothing!" Uriel exclaims, while pacing back and forth. "Verily, the bloodskins hath wormed their way deeper and deeper into humanity's good graces every day. I did NOT join these people to sit on my hands while my enemies grow stronger. I intend to KILL them all!"

Her three brothers, still mana-based constructs, rest at various spots inside the church's upper level. Michael lays on his back atop a giant tree branch growing out of the wall, while Gabriel plunks his huge body on an oversized chair and rests his back against the wall. As for Raphael, the eldest Archangel sits in a rocking chair, listening to his sister's rage-filled rants.

"Calm thy heart, Uriel." Raphael says. "I know well the Wordsmith's rage. Tis' impossible for him to have forgiven Beelzebub easily. I believe that an accident may hath occurred. Dost thou remembereth the Phoenix's sudden appearance? Perhaps it has supercharged Beelzebub's powers. Jason had no choice but to let the newly minted Emperor of Hellfire walk free."

Uriel snaps her eyes onto her eldest brother. "No choice?! There is always a choice! That Hero is constantly looking for reasons to forgive these bloodskins! This, despite the fact that his own child perished to Beelzebub's suicidal blast!"

"All the more reason we shoulds't assume there art extenuating circumstances." Raphael says calmly. "Indeed, I suspect our sister's artifact mayeth have something to do with the Wordsmith's decision. Perhaps, through a stroke of luck, Beelzebub may hath anchored his strength to the Cube's consciousness."

Uriel snorts. "A likely possibility. Why the Creator would grant such a boon to such an evil bastard, I cannot fathom."

"Hehehe..." Raphael chuckles humorlessly. "The Creator is dead. His hand no longer extends over our reality. And the way of Luck is to be unpredictable..."

Uriel continues ranting and raving for a good few minutes longer before eventually flopping onto a bench and leaning her head back.

"Tsk... t'would be so easy. The demons art right before me, yet I cannot reach out and kill them! It is as if invisible shackles hath bound my wrists!"

"Patience is a virtue." Gabriel says, his rumbling voice causing the air to shake. "And for thee, sister, it is in short supply."

Uriel snaps her head up. She opens her mouth to retort, but at that moment, a disorientation seizes her soul, along with the souls of the other Archangels.

"Ugh! W-what... is..."

Uriel tries to move, but her body remains frozen, paralyzed.

Suddenly, she and the other Archangels seemingly 'shift' into another reality!

The air hums around them in a manner most disorienting. The internal space of the Church vanishes, replaced instead with the interior of a golden, glorious-looking palace!

Tapestries hang from the walls. Stylized images of ancient human Heroes appear on long, slender flags, each visible face a figurehead any of the Archangels can recognize with ease.

King Arthur. Solomon. Jepthath. Nebuchadnezzar. Countless others!

These tapestries line the walls with only small gaps to separate them, drawing each Archangel's attention. Raphael turns around and gazes at all of the faces, shocked by their number and variety.

"Hmm?! Where hath we traveled?"

Michael goes on the alert. He reaches for the sword at his side, only to find that his body is not even the spiritual construct he expected, but purely a soul-form.

"Someone hath yanked our souls out of our rings!" Michael exclaims.

Before their confusion can escalate, a voice speaks.

"Raphael. Uriel. Michael. Gabriel. Sorry to bring you here like this, but I wanted to at least try and be discreet."

The Archangels turn to face the speaker. There, at the end of the hall, they find Hope Hiro, along with his fiancé, Amelia Greyheart, and the ghostly apparition of King Solomon as well.

Amelia waves politely. "Hi."

Solomon bobs his head. "Archangels."

After blinking his eyes a few times, Raphael manages to figure out what has happened.

"Hope Hiro. Thou hath obtained Solomon's Crown? And this hall... the auras here are much too lifelike and vibrant to be mere portraits of long-dead Heroes. Thou must have recently acquired... quite a windfall."

"Indeed, I have." Hope says, taking a few steps to greet his elder. "Six hours ago, I raided a Volgrim world, a secret base where they stored over a thousand Heroic Artifacts. I destroyed that world and took all its riches for myself. I even captured its leaders, among others, and added their technological knowledge to my own."

Raphael's eyes widen, ever so slightly. "Thou hath... made great gains. I am pleased to hear this."

"Indeed. But you don't need to worry about any of that." Hope says. "I brought the four of you here for a different matter."

The Archangels remain silent as Hope reaches into his robes and pulls out a simple golden ring. The moment they set their eyes on it, the Archangels gasp!

"Sister Uzziel's ring!" Uriel practically shrieks, both in excitement, and shock.

"Little sister Uzziel..." Raphael says, his face turning pale. "But... how?"

"I thought Uzziel died during the final battle." Gabriel murmurs. "Is she alive?"

Michael says nothing for a few moments. He stares at the ring and frowns.

"The soul I sense within that ring is..."

Hope nods solemnly. "I regret to inform all of you that... the Uzziel inside this ring will not be the sister you remember. Please have patience. She has... suffered immensely."

Hope spends the next few minutes recounting not only the events told to him by Vulpanix, but plenty of other information the High Volgrim he captured happened to have locked in their memories, including the specific events that transpired where they experimented on Uzziel's soul to try and restore her powers.

Before long, a clear picture emerges.

"So. 'Tis like that." Uriel whispers, as tears well up in her eyes. "In the final battle, she unleashed every last drop of her power. Our sister obliterated countless demons and their leaders. Her soul decayed... and what thou hath recovered is but a fragment of her original self."

Hope purses his lips.

"Yes. I'm sorry. I've been working with Solomon, and we have an idea about how to heal her soul back to its original state. However... she will not possess any of her former memories. She may not even be able to use her magic."

Raphael clears his throat. "Our sister shan't be an Archangel."

Michael's frown deepens. "What is thy meaning?"

"Her power was expended." Raphael explains. "This fragment... I do wish to see it restored. But for all intents and purposes, our sister shalt be none other than an ordinary Seraph. She has lost the lineage of the Archangels, as well as her link to the Creator's power."

"To bring back a hollow shell of our sister..." Gabriel murmurs. "Perhaps t'would be better to erase her, as she is now. Allow her to go back to the Cosmic Realm in peace."

Michael's expression turns into a snarl. "We've lost too many! And as for the Cosmic Realm, hath thou forgotten, Gabriel? Tis overrun by that monstrous Plague! Who can say if the souls of our fallen brethren art truly at rest in its bowels? Perhaps, as we speak, they art suffering eternal torment!"

Hope allows the Archangels to discuss the matter among themselves. After a few minutes, they come to a resolution.

"We wish to restore Uzziel's soul." Uriel says. "Perhaps some of her memories may yet remain. And even if they do not, we hath already undergone mind-wipes once. This time shalt be no different."

Raphael nods. "Every angel we can revive shalt be another beloved brother or sister capable of walking this mortal realm. Whether Uzziel remembers her past or not, we shalt treat her the same."

"Indeed." Uriel says.

"Indeed." Gabriel and Michael conclude.

With the Archangels having made up their minds, Solomon steps forward.

"It is decided, then. I will require the four of you to bare your souls during this process. Hope will rebuild the fragments of Uzziel's soul using the sensations you can recall. Without your help, the soul we create would bear no resemblance to her original self. I pray you will be of assistance during this turbulent session."

The Archangels nod.

"Of course." Raphael says, waving his hand gallantly. "Let us all take a seat. We shalt encircle her ring and call forth her vessel so as to put back together the shattered pieces."

Amelia remains behind while Hope, Solomon, and the four Archangels take their seats in a circular pattern on the floor. They sit around a tree Hope grows from a crack in the golden castle's bottom, and upon which he places Uzziel's ring. The life energy from this tree will provide a small portion of the energy she needs to rebuild her true identity.

After thirty minutes of careful preparation, aided heavily by Raphael's knowledge of soul-melding, the group begins in earnest!

Whoomph!

Hope casts dozens of Words of Power. He works together with Raphael and the others to pull Uzziel's broken, shattered soul out of her ring and begin repairing it bit by bit.

Amelia watches silently from the side, her eyes as big as saucers. She gasps when she sees Uzziel's soul-body rise from the ring's interior into the physical world, where its multi-armed, multi-legged form looks like some horrible abomination of thirty people mashed together. Had she seen the flesh-suit worn by Confessor Vulpanix, she might draw further parallels there as well...

Time passes quickly. With the help of the Archangels, particularly Raphael, Hope and Solomon begin metaphorically smashing Uzziel's soul with a hammer and breaking it down into its purest form. Long-corrupted by impurities and unknown influences over the eras, her soul has become so tainted that most of their work comes down to breaking off the corroded bits and filling the gaps with 'sealants'.

Hours pass. Days. Weeks.

Periodically, Hope pauses and takes time to sleep. Then him and the others resume their work.

During this seemingly unending, grueling session, Uzziel's soul finally comes together in the end. With a puff of air, Solomon 'breathes' life back into her body, allowing her to fall to the floor and lay unmoving on the golden tiles.

The dark-skinned woman remains unmoving for some time. She lifelessly stares up at the ceiling, her beautiful eyes unblinking.

Hope's gaze hardens.

"Did we fail?"

Solomon holds up his palm.

"Wait."

And so, they do.

For one full day, the group of six watches silently, waiting for Uzziel's return.

Then, her hand twitches.

It takes a great deal of effort, but Uzziel slowly blinks her eyes.

She blinks them again.

And again.

The hearts of everyone present beat in delight as they wait for Uzziel to fully regain consciousness. Before long, she lolls her head to the side and twitches her arms. Uriel swoops in to help lift Uzziel to a sitting position, propping her weakened sister up with a helping arm behind her back.

Tears well up in Uriel's eyes.

"S...sister. Thou hath finally awoken. Dost thou... remember me?"

At first, Uzziel doesn't seem to register Uriel's words. Like a blind woman who has no conception of a world seen through functioning eyes, she doesn't seem capable of understanding the blobs of color around her, nor the sounds entering her ears.

But, after a time, she turns her head to vaguely look in Uriel's direction.

Uzziel opens her mouth, but fails to speak any words.

"Tis no matter, no matter at all." Uriel whispers. "Focus thy mind. Think carefully sister, and the words shalt surely-"

"ABWAAABA!"

Uzziel finally speaks, but the sounds that she releases don't come out as words at all! Instead, she loudly yells and babbles incomprehensible gibberish, like a month-old baby.

"ABAAAA! BWAAABWABAAA!"

Uriel blinks in surprise. Raphael frowns.

"This..."

The group of six, as well as Amelia, frown deeply while Uzziel's head rocks from side to side.

"Ehehe! Baabwababwaaa~!!" She babbles delightedly, seemingly amazed by the pretty colors around her.

Even Solomon's expression turns unsightly.

"She has completely forgotten how to speak? I assumed her memories would be nonexistent, but she should be able to understand and form words. The 'concept' of language should be there..."

Raphael lowers his head and sighs.

"Verily, I suspected this would happen. An Uzziel capable of speech but without memories would be one thing. But lacking both, she is... an infant who must be raised with care."

"Baaa! Bububu! Bwabwa!" Uzziel babbles cutely, as if to punctuate her older brother's point.

Uriel gently strokes her sister's hair, knowing that the Uzziel before her is no longer the one she lost, but an entirely new existence, one without definition. Even so, their shared face gives her a sense of comfort.

"We shalt take care of her in the best way we can." Uriel says softly. "She deserves that much from us."

Michael averts his gaze. A painful stabbing sensation swells in his chest.

"To have lost our sister would be one thing. But to gain back an empty shell of her former self... that hurts far more." Michael murmurs.

Hope nods at the Archangels. "What do you want to do with her, then?"

A few minutes pass. Nobody says a word. Except for Uzziel, who continues to cutely babble in her own amusing way.

"Lalala! Looo-laalaa! Bababa!"

Raphael finally raises his head.

"Mmm. Verily, I hath thought of a better option. We shalt take Uzziel's ring, Wordsmith. And I thank thee for thy services. Compared to the First Wordsmith, thou art surely..."

He pauses to nod at Solomon.

"...far more promising."

Solomon nods back. "You feel as I do, old friend."

Hope smiles. "I have many plans to work on. I have many goals to complete. As for the time you've spent here, don't worry too much. This is my newly created Hall of Heroes. Inside, the time flows at a rate of one hundred to one. After I defeated Vulpanix and seized the stolen artifacts, I worked with Solomon to construct this place. Here, I can take my time learning what each artifact does, and how to best use them."

Raphael's eyebrows raise, ever so slightly. He nods appreciatively. "An excellent choice. One thing thou hath lacked, along with thy other self, is time. Time to master thy abilities. Time to sit back and dwell on the future."

He glances at Amelia.

"Time to build bonds with those thou careth the most about."

Hope wraps his arm around Amelia's shoulder and nods at Raphael.

"Time is one resource I will no longer lack, moving forward."

After exchanging some pleasantries, the Archangels, Solomon, Hope, and Amelia all rise to their feet. They place Uzziel's soul back in her ring, then teleport the ring back to the angel's bodies on Tarus II.

Before the Archangels depart, Uriel and Michael walk over to Hope.

"Wordsmith." Uriel says. "The bloodskins have entrenched themselves well on Tarus II. Art thou aware of the happenings during the Stormbringer Tribunal?"

Hope shakes his head. "Not really. I've been pretty preoccupied. Mind filling me in?"

"It's like this..." Michael says, answering in Uriel's stead.

While he and Uriel speak to Hope, Gabriel takes stock of Amelia.

"Child of two selves." Gabriel says to her. "How hath thou fared in recent times?"

Amelia shrugs. "I can't complain. I'm coming to terms with my two selves. The Black Queen, and the ordinary woman, Annette. I'm still not sure who I want to be."

"Do not bother with such vague distinctions." Gabriel says, waving his hand casually. The peaceful giant rests his ghostly palm on her shoulder, like a loving big brother. "Time is transient. Existence is transient. Enjoy the good, and discard the bad. That is what shalt allow thee to find inner peace..."

While Gabriel and Amelia converse, two other figures find themselves in a rare private moment.

Solomon and Raphael take stock of one another. The Knowledge-Seeker narrows his eyes while slowly approaching his 'old friend.'

"Archangel of Wisdom." Solomon says slowly, sizing up the elderly winged one before him. "A question plays upon my mind."

Raphael slowly turns to look at the Knowledge-Seeker.

"Mmm. And that would be...?"

Solomon does not answer.

Instead, he and Raphael lock gazes. They eye each other with intense scrutiny.

While Hope and Amelia converse with their Archangel peers, the two wise old snakes say nothing verbally, yet exchange a million insights through their eyes.

Eventually, Solomon retracts his gaze. He snorts derisively at the eldest Archangel.

"So it's like that."

"Perhaps 'tis so." Raphael says slowly. "And the boy...?"

"Your goals do not conflict with mine." Solomon answers softly, keeping his voice low. "I see no need to tell him the truth."

"Thou art a prudent sage among dragons." Raphael praises.

"Save your flattery." Solomon hisses. "Your schemes run deep, old man. How long have you waited for this day? And yet now that it has arrived, you continue to play the fool. Perhaps it wasn't even Camael who could divine the future, but you."

Raphael blinks slowly.

"How fares my sister?"

"Mmm." Solomon says, flicking his eyes toward Hope, then returning them to Raphael. "She is... happy. Satisfied with the current arrangement."

"Thou shalt leave her be, then?" Raphael asks.

"I've no need of her skills." Solomon answers. "I'm not even certain of her current location. But you do know she works for the demons now? She is... our enemy."

Raphael faintly motions dismissively with his hand. "Borne out of a perceived lack of options, she made that choice only half-willingly. When the time comes, she shalt remember her allegiance. She always does."

"I should hope so." Solomon snaps under his breath. "It would be such a shame if you had to kill yet another of your 'beloved' family members."

Raphael's expression softens. He lowers his eyes, unable to meet Solomon's gaze.

"Thou knoweth more than thou let on, Knowledge-Seeker."

"A secret one spreads freely holds no value." Solomon retorts. "The wise man retains additional cards for the sake of giving himself options. I would be a fool to reveal everything I know to those undeserving."

"What think thee of the boy?" Raphael asks. "Truly?"

"He has high potential." Solomon praises. "More than that Jason brat. A fool ruled by his compassion. Hope is willing to do anything to further his goals. He has already begun to engage in a long-term strategy of deception. Even us aged ones may yet come to learn new tricks from this young dog."

"High praise, coming from thee." Raphael acknowledges. "I shalt gaze upon his growth with great anticipation."

"And I'll keep my eye on your little machinations." Solomon says, his words slightly bitter. "To think you would even go this far... you are truly the most wretched creature in the cosmos."

The two men slowly draw apart. After a time, Uriel and Michael finish talking to Hope, and the Archangels bid him farewell.

Speaking a Word of Power, Hope returns their souls to their original bodies, still on Tarus II.

Uriel awakens to find herself still reclining on the bench, like before. Despite days passing inside the Hall of Heroes, only a few hours passed in the physical universe.

Now, on her hand, a fourth Archangel ring rests.

The Archangel of Retribution gently caresses the plain, golden artifact.

"Sister Uzziel..."

Part 443: Assembling a Team

North-side of the Fortress of Retribution. Tarus II.

Half a dozen men and women, including two demons, walk toward a certain newly-built installation on the northern side of Tarus II's biggest city. This facility, referred to by most people as the Queen Network, is one of humanity's newest inventions. Created by a small cabal of Fairies, run by Blinker, and dreamed up in the head of Amelia Greyheart, it was ultimately named in the former Black Queen's honor.

On this particular day, the group of humans and demons arrives in front of the Queen Network and gazes up at a massive system of artificially-grown trees, each one glowing with an aura of magical energy. These huge conifers tower hundreds of feet in the air. They twist around each other to form a seemingly random-at-first-glance interlinking of branches, but upon closer inspection are actually part of a giant Nature Formation capable of linking minds and souls together for lengthy periods of time.

Around the Queen Network, a giant wall of barbed vines grows from the ground to form a light defensive perimeter, not one intended to seriously deter any malicious actors, but one that provides a certain aura of beauty to the perimeter while also outlining the boundary where observers should stand.

"Wow!" One of the two demons, a male, says. "This is my first time seeing it up close! I didn't realize how huge the Glow Trees were from a distance!"

One of his female-human companions nods. "I've been waiting five days for our appointment. The ticket queue is getting longer all the time! Everyone says this place can grant all sorts of benefits to those who undergo its trials."

"So you've never been here before?" The demon asks.

"Nope. I'm really looking forward to it though."

"Same."

The group of six walks up to the front gate, where they find a pompous-looking green-haired fairy woman sitting on a stool, her legs crossed, as well as her arms. She glances at the newcomers with a look of disdain while casually chewing a huge wad of gum. Her lips smack together as she loudly rolls the gum between her teeth.

"Ah..." The male demon says. "Fairy Princess Melia. You look as lovely as a mid-summer's-"

"Tickets." The fairy says, abruptly cutting him off mid-sentence in between her lip-smacks. "Or leave. I'm not interested in listening to a man speak."

One of the female humans quickly steps forward. "Here are our tickets, Princess Melia. We've been in the queue for five days now. I hope we can enter the simulation... expediently."

She starts to hold out the tickets, but before her hand can even fully raise, Melia snatches them away, gives them a cursory glance, then burns them with fire magic.

"Go inside." She growls. "Your cycle starts in ten minutes. Saria will explain the rules."

The group of six hurriedly nods and offers a few awkward words of thanks before shuffling through the gate. After they walk out of earshot range, they glance at each other.

"Damn. That Melia is... kind of a bitch." The male demon whispers.

"Well. She created the formation that the Queen Network is built on. Maybe she's just tired and cranky?" One of the humans offers.

"Yeah. Pft. Maybe that's it."

As they walk away, Melia rolls her eyes. She easily picks up on their conversation thanks to her enhanced hearing, but ignores their comments.

A few moments later, a figure flickers into existence beside her.

"Melia." Blinker says, the redheaded fairy scowling at her green-haired compatriot. "Must you be so rude to every visitor? Some of them are my friends."

"I built your stupid simulation." Melia says, acting only slightly nicer to Blinker than the others before her. "But I didn't promise excellent customer service. Are you here to take over my shift now, or what?"

Blinker grimaces. We need someone with spiritual energy to verify those tickets. And they can't be a demon, either. Do you have any idea how few people meet that criteria AND aren't already busy with other things?"

Melia spends the new several seconds loudly chewing her gum. She smacks her lips over and over, then laboriously rolls her eyes.

"Whatever. God, this is all so boring. You know I was supposed to be attending a lavish banquet later today, right? But here I am, still playing a glorified gate guardian for a bunch of stupid humans doing a bunch of stupid military exercises. Mother made me cancel all my plans to come help you out."

"And for that... I'm grateful." Blinker says, wincing. "Look... if you don't want to be here... you've done enough. You can leave."

"As if." Melia snaps back. "Mother said I have to stick around and ensure no 'accidents' happen with the network. I'm the only person besides her who can ensure the neural transceivers link up the brainwaves properly. Considering you expect humans, demons, and monsters of many different species to meld their minds together, do you have any idea how horribly that can go wrong? I'm stuck here until I verify all her stupid procedures have been followed."

"I'm... not much of an expert in Mental Magic." Blinker admits. "Um... well..."

"Save your apologies." Melia says tiredly. She blinks her eyes heavily and sags backward, leaning against the prickly briar-bushes without them actually penetrating the thin magical barrier surrounding her skin. "I'm a big girl. I can handle a short-term annoyance."

Blinker nods. "You hate hanging around with humans. All the fairies do. But, I think humans are great! They're usually pretty nice, and they treat me well. I bet they could be good friends for you if you'd give them a chance!"

Melia opens her mouth to reply, but pauses when she senses two other people walking toward her and Blinker. She turns her attention toward the newcomers, where she sees her fairy friends, Saria and Ruto. To be more specific, they aren't exactly her friends, but more her chosen retainers, her assistants, her ladies in waiting.

"Hey Melia!" Saria chirps, her green hair and big bright eyes sprinkling rays of sunshine throughout the area. "That group of people we just let in is the last group for today. Once they're done, we can finally go have some fun!"

As children of the Forest Fairies, Saria and Melia both descend from the same lineage, though Saria's magic and knowledge are much less potent than the princess's. As for Ruto, a blue-haired fairy from the Realm of Water, she might also only be a mere retainer to the Forest Princess, but she still possesses her own aura of authority.

Ruto walks over beside Saria and leans her arm on her shorter cousin's shoulder. She smiles smugly, her silky white dress and general air making her feel like a playful older sister.

"Well, I don't know about you, Melia, but I've having a wonderful time on this human planet! Yes, so many delightful boys and girls to sit down and talk to. I already have thirteen dates lined up over the next week."

"Popular as always." Melia grunts.

"Hey, I know!" Saria exclaims. "Once these humans are done, why don't the four of us fight in the sim! Let's do a 1v3 Queen Competition!"

Blinker scrunches up her face. "I don't know. It's unbecoming of a princess to engage in acts of violence..."

Melia frowns. "Hey. What's that supposed to mean?"

"I'm just saying..." Blinker says while she shrugs innocently. "You're too soft to take on all three of us at once. You should sit this one out."

Melia jumps out of her seat. "The heck I'm soft! I'll show YOU soft, you little preggo-queen!"

The other three giggle at Melia, knowing how easy it is to rile her up.

"Well alright then." Blinker says. "I bet five merit tokens we'll kick your butt."

"Five from me too!" Saria chirps.

"Count me in." Ruto adds.

"It seems I'll be winning a free fifteen tokens then." Melia snorts. "Maybe I'll pay a visit to that Beauty Depot place later. Not that it can improve upon my perfection..."

"Oh, look at you, so humble!" Blinker laughs.

The girls continue taking turns poking at each other. Soon though, they sense the approach of a powerful demonic aura.

Blinker's smile vanishes in an instant. She turns around and her eyes become murderous as she watches a male Demon Emperor approach from the south.

"Beelzebub!" Blinker snarls. "You dare show your face to me?!"

The Emperor of Hellfire pauses a stone's throw away. He awkwardly scratches the back of his neck.

"Hello, Blinker... ah, long time, no see."

Sensing a lack of malice from the newly minted Emperor, Blinker lowers her rage just a tad, but continues to glare daggers at him. She and the other three fairies slowly walk toward him, none of them smiling any longer.

"So you're the Beelzebub who's caused so many problems." Melia says dryly. "The luckiest unlucky bastard I've seen in a good few eons."

"A vicious, murdering bastard." Saria adds.

"I'm not a fan of the whole flame-shtick." Ruto chimes in, gazing at him with a look of disgust.

A few seconds pass. Nobody says anything.

Eventually, Beelzebub speaks up.

"Blinker... Monster Queen... I'm not sure what you prefer..."

"I don't like hearing my name so casually uttered from your lips." Blinker snaps at him. "Why have you come here? Just to piss me off?"

"Actually, I had a... proposition for you." Beelzebub says. "I know you hate me. And deservedly so, given how many people I've killed. But I really do want to change, to mend the old wounds-"

"How can you possibly undo your sins?" Blinker retorts, interrupting him. "You killed millions of people, Beelzebub. They're gone for GOOD. There is no way you can bring them back! And even if you could, it wouldn't undo the traumas of their deaths, nor the pain their relatives felt."

"You're right." Beelzebub says quietly, lowering his head. "I can't undo... any of that. That's why I've set my sights lower. I'm not going to try and help everyone. But... I do have certain abilities. Unique skills. I'd like to wield them as a weapon for good."

Blinker's expression softens, ever so slightly. Despite her abject hatred for the Emperor of Hellfire, something about him seems more genuinely apologetic than at any time in the past.

"Like what."

Her words are not a question, but a rhetorical statement, daring Beelzebub to state his terms.

And so, he does. After swallowing heavily, he raises his eyes to meet her gaze.

"Mephisto. He... took your husband from you. I want to help you get revenge."

Blinker's heart drops into the soles of her high heels. She visibly flinches, startled by Beelzebub's words.

"W-what? You do?! But... I mean... nobody knows where Mephisto has hidden. The Labyrinth is a massive place."

"That doesn't matter. It won't stop me." Beelzebub declares. "I've been a terrible person. I want to make amends. If you and I work together, we'll have the strength to defeat Mephisto. Not just him, but Yama too. They're working together now, or so go the rumors whispering through the grapevine. If you try to face them alone, you won't succeed. If I try to face them alone, I'll fail too. But if we work together..."

Blinker nervously chews her lower lip. No longer does her gaze contain the same hatred as before, but instead, a deep, intense longing.

"I won't lie... if you can help me... rescue Kar's body and soul... I'd be willing to forgive you, Beelzebub. He matters that much to me."

She rubs her lightly swollen pregnant belly.

"I don't want our children growing up without their father."

The other three fairies look at Blinker. Their eyes soften as they sense the suppressed pain within her voice.

"If you're serious," Melia says, "then I'm coming with you. I'm not letting the Monster Queen and the Emperor of Hellfire fight against two Emperors by themselves."

"I'll come too!" Saria exclaims. "Blinker is one of my best friends! And I always help out my friends!"

Ruto nods. "Sounds like it'll be fun. I'm in."

"You guys..." Blinker mutters. "You don't have to go that far."

"No, we do." Melia says. "Do you think my mother sent us here because she gives a damn about the humans? Now that you're a Fairy Queen, and the mother of the future descendants of the Crocodilians, Mother wants us to ensure no harm comes to you. It's as much about politics as it is maintaining your friendship."

Saria crinkles her nose. "Jeez, Melia. You didn't have to make it all weird. We'll help because we're friends with Blinker. No other reason!"

Beelzebub holds up his hand. "I'm grateful all of you want to come. In truth, I didn't intend to go alone with the Fairy Queen anyway. We're not only fighting two Emperors, but all of their shadow minions and undead servants. We can also expect that Mephisto's enslaved High Demons will be there. That includes Zamiel, now inside Kar's body."

Blinker's expression turns chilly. "That little Battle Bastard! He had the gall to not only kill my husband, but take his body too! How are we going to tear his soul out so Kar's can go back inside?"

"That's not an easy question to answer." Beelzebub says. "I'm not a necromancer. In fact, all the necromancers across the Seven Hells serve under Mephisto. I can probably burn Zamiel's soul out of Kar's body through my Soulfire, but more likely, we'll have to ask the Wordsmith to make a new body for the Monster King."

"Oh." Blinker says. "You've... really thought this through."

"Not particularly. Just some cursory observations." Beelzebub says mildly. "I'd like to put together a team capable of taking those Emperors down. Can you think of anybody else who would have the strength, time, and energy to assist us?"

"What of the other Demon Emperors?" Ruto asks. "Don't you have any friends among their ranks?"

"I'm not popular among my compatriots." Beelzebub says with a hint of irritation. "I might have a friend or two among the Dukes, but expect no help from an Emperor."

"Well, I know ONE Emperor who'd be willing to help!" Saria chirps. "Kiari! I've talked to her several times. She's super nice!"

"Emperor Kiari..." Blinker says thoughtfully. "She's not much of a fighter though."

"She doesn't have to be." Ruto points out. "She can summon hordes of insects and giant spiders to overwhelm her enemies."

"Great. Giant spiders." Melia says with a shiver. "My favorite."

"I can go and ask a few other people if they'd be willing to help." Blinker says. "Maybe Samantha, or some of the demons from the Hell of Lust."

Beelzebub releases a soft sigh of relief. "So it's settled then. Let's all ask around and meet up in two days. We'll see if we can assemble a force capable of taking down Mephisto and Yama."

Blinker nods. She faintly smiles at Beelzebub.

"You didn't have to do this, Beelzebub. But you did. So... even if we fail... thank you. Even if we can't rescue Kar and we don't end up at least killing that Mephisto bastard... I appreciate the gesture. Maybe you're not such a bad guy after all."

"No, I'm definitely a terrible sinner." Beelzebub retorts. "But I will try to do good, moving forward. Thank you for giving me this chance to make amends. I won't let it go to waste."

After exchanging goodbyes with the other fairies, Beelzebub turns and leaves. Melia watches him head south, away from the Queen's Network.

"He's certainly different from all the rumors I've heard."

* * *

Beelzebub takes his time walking. He could leap into the skies and fly around with his complete mastery of fire, but he doesn't.

No, instead, he wanders across the regrowing meadow, ambling toward the city plateau. As he walks, he frowns. The feeling of being watched tickles the back of his neck.

The Emperor of Hellfire looks left, right, up, and even down. He searches for the source of that feeling, but detects nothing. Eventually though, his eyes fall upon a mid-sized patch of trees directly underneath the Fortress of Retribution's cliffs. He fails to spot the cottage contained within those trees, but in his mind's eye, he imagines its outline.

Rosalia's cottage...

Beelzebub shivers, remembering that feeling of helplessness he experienced at Rosalia's hands. Idly, he reflects on how that feeling helped him understand what it meant to be unable to change his fate. He recalls that sickening sense of isolation, that feeling of weakness and being toyed around with.

Ultimately, perhaps it helped make him... more empathetic.

Reflecting on this thought, Beelzebub blinks twice. He looks away from that imaginary cottage and shakes his head.

"Perhaps that misfortune was actually a blessing in disguise. It opened my eyes to a Truth of our reality..."

He continues walking, all while forcing himself to ignore that lingering feeling of being watched.

* * *

Amidst those same trees, a figure lurks. A large figure, one with quite a sizable body of great mass.

Rosalia.

The undesirable demoness gnashes her teeth as she watches Beelzebub continue walking away. But instead of dejection, she feels only a burning Desire scorching her heart.

"Mine... mine... Mister Beelzebub should be mine... can't let those fairy sluts take him from me... can't let him forget me!"

She chews her lip. A cold, decisive light sparkles in her eyes.

"Desire... my desire... I want him! I'll do whatever it takes! I must become beautiful!"

A sinister female voice inside her head chuckles.

Heh heh heh... yes. The time has finally come. No more games, Rosalia. Do what must be done to obtain what you want.

She nods.

"I WILL have him!"

Part 444: Cassiel's Confidence

South of the Fortress of Retribution, ten miles distant from the city's upper plateau, a small stream trickles down from a mountain to the east, deposits into a twenty-foot-deep lake, and eventually splits off into a second stream that trails out to the western ocean.

At this mid-sized lake, a good distance away from the radius of Beelzebub's nuclear detonation some weeks earlier, plenty of trees and creatures remain amidst the surviving environment. A ring of trees encircles the lake, and ripples frequently appear in the center where small aquatic creatures pop out to eat the bugs and insects skittering on or just above the water's surface. The midday sunlight warms the water, stirring the cold-blooded life slumbering within.

At the edge of the lake, a pair of seemingly ordinary women sit on a rock some eight feet tall with an oddly-flat top. One of the two, a woman with black hair, stares out at the lake with placid eyes, seemingly unburdened by the worries of the world. As for her companion, a brown-haired girl with visible anxiety, she stares at the item in the palm of her hand, a single piece of seemingly ordinary jewelry.

A simple golden ring.

"I don't understand..." The brown-haired woman whispers. "Why would Raphael... give me... Uzziel's ring?"

"She doesn't have her memories anymore, Cass." The black-haired woman answers. "In a way... isn't she somewhat similar to you? Someone forgotten by time, alone in this material realm?"

These women, Cassiel and Soleil, continue to hide their identities, posing as two ordinary humans named Cammy and Serra. When given the ring of a former Archangel, Cassiel opts to depart the Fortress of Retribution and head to this remote lake, a place she has grown to enjoy visiting in recent days.

Here, no people will bother her. She doesn't have to fear the gazes of others, and she certainly won't encounter any demons.

As for Gressil... if he were to suddenly show up, he would encounter a nasty surprise. Soleil was made for the explicit purpose of protecting Cassiel from his clutches. She might not be capable of killing the Emperor of Chaos, but she could certainly make him deeply regret exposing his position to her.

Cassiel daintily fiddles with Uzziel's ring, sensing the spiritual presence contained within, along with its optimistic and bright-eyed excitement. After a minute or so, she hesitantly slips the ring on her finger and immerses herself inside its inner world.

There, Cassiel's spirit splits from her Mind Realm to directly enter Uzziel's ring. Cassiel frowns as she finds herself standing amidst a pure white void. Now repaired thanks to the efforts of the Wordsmith, it still nonetheless appears quite boring and plain.

On the ground before her sits none other than the former Archangel of Creation, now a mentally immature child trapped in an adult woman's body. Uzziel quickly raises her head to look at Cassiel, then her eyes sparkle as she clumsily stands up and wobbles toward her.

"Bababa! Bwaaa! Aaabuull-blublu!"

She babbles incoherently, but in such a cute voice that even the anxious Cassiel can't help but smile awkwardly. She catches Uzziel when the Archangel trips, nearly falling to her knees.

"Careful, Uzziel..." Cassiel says. "I'm, uh, I am Cassiel. Cassiel, see? Cass...eee...ull... can you say Cass-ee-ull?"

Uzziel hangs onto Cassiel's shoulders while her knees wobble, partially due to poorly developed motor skills, and partially due to excitement at having a 'friend' appear.

"Aaaa! Ababa! Caa-caa!"

Cassiel smiles a little wider than before.

"Yes, that's right. Cah... can you say 'cah'?"

Cassiel spends the next several minutes slowly helping Uzziel learn to walk while repeating her own name. Like a mother teaching her baby the absolute basics, Cassiel eventually sits down with Uzziel to spend some quality time with her.

"Cappy! Cappy!" Uzziel eventually chirps. "Cappycappycappy!"

"That's close enough." Cassiel says, smiling more genuinely than before. "You can call me 'Cappy.' And your name is Uzziel, see? Uzziel. Ooo-zee-ull. Can you say Ooo-zee-ull?"

"Oodeel! Oodeel!"

"No, Uzziel. See? Uzziel."

"Oodeel! Oddeel!"

Uzziel claps her hands and laughs, her smile like the sun on a warm spring day. So infectious is her joy that Cassiel loses even more of her previous anxiety.

"You're so cute!" Cassiel giggles. "I just wish there was a faster way to do this."

The angel formerly known as the Daughter of Heaven and Blood Reaper collects herself for a minute while Uzziel babbles at her. She opens and closes her mouth several times, contemplating if there might not be a better way to re-teach Uzziel how to speak.

"You don't remember this," Cassiel eventually says, "but you and I... we used to be good friends. Before the demons killed our people. Before the Energy Wars. Seeing you like you are now... it hurts my heart, Uzziel. You were the best of the angels. The kindest. The most loving. Whenever I thought about my Earth-family and missed them... you were there for me."

She reaches out and gently caresses Uzziel's face, making the bright-eyed Archangel pause her babbling to focus on the pleasant but odd feeling.

"That must be the reason Raphael gave me your ring. He's busy enacting his plans, and he knows I'll take care of you. Whether you get your abilities back or not, that won't matter to me. That's why... I'll always be here for you. Okay? Always..."

For a brief moment, Uzziel and Cassiel both fall silent. Uzziel stares solemnly at her angel-comrade with a serious gaze.

A faint fluctuation passes between Cassiel's hand into Uzziel's body, but this minor mana disturbance doesn't seem to do anything important...

Uzziel blinks her pretty green eyes. She babbles cutely.

"Caa-caa? Cappy?"

"Yes." Cassiel says. "You can call me 'Cappy.' But only you. We won't tell Soleil about our little secret, will we?"

Uzziel shakes her head. "No no! No tell!"

"Good." Cassiel says, while she starts to rise. She suddenly pauses and frowns. "Hm? You understood me?"

Uzziel gazes at her innocently. "Bwa-bwa-bwa!"

"Oh. Must have been a fluke..." Cassiel mutters.

She retracts her presence from Uzziel's ring, but also opens up her own Mind Realm to allow Uzziel into her thought-sphere. In this way, Uzziel gains access to the memories locked within Cassiel's head, as well as the ability to see through her eyes.

"Waaah! Bababa!" Cassiel excitedly babbles as she looks 'out' at the world before Cassiel.

Cassiel herself turns to look at Soleil, who continues to sit in the same position as before. She smiles at Cassiel.

"How are things going with Uzziel?" Soleil asks.

"The circumstances are... adequate." Cassiel says, suddenly feeling a bit more self-conscious after returning her soul to the material realm. "She seems to lack any language skills, or even fine motor skills, let alone magical power. But I don't care. Uzziel is my friend... she was once my closest friend in Heaven."

"Seeing her return under such circumstances..." Soleil says quietly. "That must feel somewhat distressing."

"A little." Cassiel answers. "A little..."

The two women fall silent.

They stare out at the placid lake, watching as giant winged creatures swoop down to stab their talons into its surface, yanking out aquatic fish-like creatures with enough flesh to feed the predators for the next several days. The creatures take to the skies and fly away, their figures more closely resembling Pterodactyls from ancient Earth than birds from the era Cassiel best remembers.

"This world is so alien..." Cassiel murmurs.

Soleil nods. She starts to speak, but pauses to whip her head backward.

"Behind us. Noises. People approach."

Soleil jumps to her feet to stare at the forest-line, the ring of trees encircling this distant lake. Cassiel remains seated, but waits and watches along with her companion for the unexpected newcomers to step into view.

Before long, they do.

Two adult women wearing deactivated T-REX's guide a gathering of twelve young girls, their ages ranging from eight years old to thirteen. The group of fourteen people walks into view, with the kids babbling excitedly to each other as they ready themselves for some sort of group activity.

Soleil quickly calms down, but remains standing at the alert.

"Do you want to leave, Cassiel?" Soleil asks without turning to look at Heaven's Daughter.

"No... we'll just watch." Cassiel says. "I wonder what they're doing all the way out here?"

Soleil remains motionless atop the rock, as does Cassiel. Perhaps due to their absolute stillness, none of the newcomers notices their presence.

* * *

Linda Hurent gestures to the children around her. "Come along, girls! We'll set up on the shoreline here. Do all of you know how to bait your hooks?"

Many of the children turn squeamish at her words.

"We don't HAVE to put the worm on the hook, do we, Miss Linda?"

"I don't wanna hurt the worm, Miss Linda!" Another girl exclaims.

The other adult, aside from Linda, turns out to be none other than Lily Brown, daughter of Benjamin Brown. She grimaces as Linda pulls out a small box with dozen of slimy, wriggling worms.

"Surely you know how to hook a worm?" Linda asks, looking at the teenager beside her.

"Daddy never taught me anything like that..." Lily says turning squeamish. "I'm fine with just watching. Truly."

"If you want that quarter of a Merit Token, you'll have to do more than just watch, young lady." Linda proclaims, waggling her finger in Lily's face. "I'm not about to do all the work while you stand off to the side and keep your pretty little skirt clean!"

Lily swallows heavily, then sighs. "Alright. I really need that token. It's been getting so hard to find cost-effective jobs lately."

"Tell me about it!" Linda snorts. "But hanging out with a group of brats, it's a good way to pass the time. We'll have fun, I promise. Now, take out your fishing pole..."

This field trip, a fishing expedition, is part of a newly passed initiative by Phoebe Hiro to ensure humanity's children are able to get a good education, as well as expand their horizons. While the job might not offer many Merit Tokens, it's also quite a simple task to fulfill and requires little in the way of prior training.

The girls arrayed before Lily and Linda are almost entirely comprised of child slaves rescued from the Labyrinth. Having expected to live the rest of their lives under the torture of the demons, the novelty of living on such a lush and beautiful world never fails to make these children starry-eyed. Even though many of the girls turn a little squeamish at the thought of hooking worms onto hooks, they still ultimately relent after watching Linda teach Lily how to do it.

Indeed, some of the girls enthusiastically hook the worms, perhaps enjoying the silent screams of pain from their wriggling victims a tad too much.

Before long, all the group's members have their worms hooked on fishing poles. They practice casting their lines a few times, then send them flying out into the crystal clear lake!

Many minutes later, their hooks begin bobbing and dipping as underwater creatures nibble at the hooks. Linda warns the girls that they might accidentally hook some of the more terrifying monsters in the area, but luckily she's been equipped with a T-REX specialized for hunting the upper-sized predators on Tarus II. If an unexpected hunter pounces out of the bushes, she and Lily will be ready to leap into action and protect the kids!

Still watching from afar, Soleil cocks her head. "What are they doing?"

"Fishing." Cassiel explains. "The goal is to catch a fish that they can eat."

"Oh. Have the food stores run dry?" Soleil asks.

"I doubt that. This is more of a recreational activity. Humans do it for fun. Sometimes, they even release the fish they catch."

"I see. It seems like a waste of time." Soleil says, immediately losing interest. She turns around and plops back into a seated position.

Soleil's sudden movement catches the attention of one of the children.

"Look Miss Linda! Two women over there!"

Linda Hurent follows the little girl's finger. "Oh! How about that. I don't recognize them. Lily, why don't you go and invite them over here? At the very least, make sure we aren't disturbing them. I'd hate to be a bother."

Lily nods. "Yes, Corporal."

She sets her fishing pole down, then starts walking toward Soleil and Cassiel. Due to the surprisingly long distance, it takes her a while to reach the two of them, nearly five minutes of shambling across the rocky, uneven shoreline.

"Hello!" Lily eventually calls out. "We didn't realize anyone else was already here or we'd have set up further down the shoreline. Would you two like to come fish with us?"

Soleil frowns at this interruption. She turns to look at Lily, but before she can say anything, Cassiel speaks up.

"...I'd like that. Is it really okay for us to join you?"

"Sure it is!" Lily chirps, her pink hair bouncing along with her gait. She stops at the bottom of Cassiel and Soleil's boulder, then shades her eyes from the midday sun as she looks up at them. "We brought several extra poles in case the others broke."

"Well, okay then."

Cassiel lightly leaps off the rock, surprising Lily with how easily she maintains her footing on the uneven ground below. To her further shock, Soleil lands lightly enough that it seems as if her body weighs only as much as a feather.

"Wow. You two must be pretty acrobatic!" She exclaims. "I'm Lily."

"I'm Cammy. This is Serra." Cassiel says. "I... like to get away from things. Being around too many people... especially men... it stresses my body."

"Well, there's only girls in our group!" Lily says, eagerly guiding the other two back to the children. "Ever hooked a worm before?"

Cassiel faintly smiles.

"Yes. I have."

Two hours pass.

Cassiel and Soleil go fishing with the group of children, as well as Lily and Linda. The more she talks to the group of humans, the more Cassiel opens up and starts having a good time.

One child catches a fish. Cassiel and the others help reel it in. Everyone gawks and oohs and ahhs at the size of the alien aquatic swimmer, but ultimately they remove the hook and toss it back into the water.

Soleil perfunctorily fishes along with the others, but as time goes on, Cassiel notices more and more that the Black Hole Construct seems less and less interested as the minutes tick by.

"Sol- err, Serra." Cassiel says, drawing close to her companion. "Is something wrong?"

"I am supposed to protect you and aid your recovery." Soleil says quietly. "But I find this activity mentally taxing. A better way to state my current dilemma is that I find it boring. It is a repetitive task, one which is proving utterly unstimulating. I see no appeal in doing this."

Cassiel doesn't say anything for several seconds. When she does speak, her voice comes out as little more than a whisper.

"I... used to fish... with my father."

"Your father?" Soleil asks, immediately more interested in whatever Cassiel has to say compared to the stunningly boring activity of fishing. "You do not mention your past often."

Cassiel nods.

"I died... when I was still a child. I don't have... many memories... of my mother and father. When they died, they did not become angels like me."

She pauses for several long seconds.

"I was only six years old when the sickness took me." Cassiel whispers. "But my father, he used to take me fishing at the edge of our village. Those were our quiet moments together. Then we'd come home and eat Mother's freshly baked baguette. Fish, bread, and sometimes a bit of meat stew. It's a meal that... reminds me of home."

Soleil's expression softens. "You must miss your parents deeply."

"Mmm." Cassiel nods. "Not only them, but my brother, as well as-"

"Eeeyaah!"

A scream from one of the children makes Cassiel nearly jump out of her skin. She pauses mid-sentence and turns to look in the direction of the scream, where she sees a nine-year-old girl frantically swatting at her legs while hopping around like a terrified rabbit.

"Eeeyyaahh!! Get it off, help! Help me- aaahh!!"

A swarm of bugs crawls up the child's legs, their exact species unknown to Cassiel or the others present. In the blink of an eye, Cassiel observes the little girl's condition, as well as a small hole in the ground where the bugs are swarming from.

Abruptly, many of the bugs take flight. They burst out of their underground den and leap onto everyone except for Cassiel and Soleil, who are subtly protected by faint auras of holy energy. As for Lily and Linda, their T-REX's activate due to their spikes in adrenaline, protecting them from the swarming insects.

But the children aren't so lucky.

A chorus of terrified screams erupts as the children begin running around, swatting themselves to try and kill the raging bugs. The insects bite and sting them, making them cry even more loudly as tears erupt from their eyes.

"Soleil!" Cassiel shouts. "We have to help them!"

Cassiel lunges toward the children. Without hesitation, she deactivates the locket around her neck. The Heaven's Shroud instantly de-energizes, revealing her true form as a winged servant of the Creator! But none of the people present, except for Linda, can spare her even the quickest glance.

Cassiel grits her teeth. She aims her palm at one of the children.

SWISH!

A burst of divine energy fires from her hand to wrap around the little girl, instantly burning away all of her clothes, as well as the dozens of venomous insects clinging to her body. The biting-bugs turn to ash and dissipate into the wind.

Cassiel fires another burst of holy energy at a second girl.

SWISH!

Once again, she atomizes the child's clothing, as well as all of the bugs torturing her.

Within seconds, Cassiel blasts away all of the bugs, while Linda and Lily activate smoke bombs attached to their suits to choke out the area. This causes the remaining bugs to disperse in a panic or dive back underground.

For a brief moment, Lily and Linda glance at Cassiel in awe. While Lily doesn't recognize the angel before her, Linda certainly does.

"You! You're that girl... from the-"

"We have to help these children!" Cassiel exclaims, directing Linda's attention to the children writhing and sobbing on the ground. "Look! They've all been bitten many times! Their wounds are starting to swell. Those were venomous bugs!"

Soleil, seeing that her charge has voluntarily removed her protections, quietly disperses her own. Seeing the second angel take form, Linda quickly comprehends the situation.

"I see. We'll have to carry them back to the city. Can you help us? Take the girls with the most bites. Lily and I will try to carry the others!"

Cassiel nods seriously. In the face of these injured children slowly succumbing to their wounds, she no longer hesitates for even a moment. She completely forgets her fear, then holds out her palm.

"There's no need for that. Murus lucis!"

She conjures a flat platform of holy energy, one of surprisingly large size, then gestures to the others.

"Put the children on! I don't have much mana... I can't maintain its shape for very long!"

Sensing the confidence in Cassiel's tone, the other three immediately defer to her command. They quickly place the naked children on the platform, then Lily and Linda also hop on.

Cassiel and Soleil don't stand on the platform. Instead, they flap their wings and take to the skies. Cassiel holds the platform together with her mental strength, maintaining its shape thanks to years of hard-practiced effort.

As they begin flying back to the Fortress of Retribution, Linda and Lily gaze at the angel carrying them to safety with a considerable amount of awe.

"You're the angel I helped rescue..." Linda says. "I didn't realize... were you trying to hide your identity?"

"That doesn't matter now!" Cassiel says through gritted teeth. "I won't let these kids die! I won't ever let that happen! Now be quiet! I... I have to focus... my mind!"

Soleil gazes at her winged comrade with a look of deep admiration.

"I always knew you had it in you."

Part 445: Saving the Children!

Cassiel flies for ten full minutes. While her wings would usually allow her to cover the distance in ten to twenty seconds, lugging more than a dozen people on her spiritual-platform drastically slows her speed down while also draining her energy. Sweat streams down her face. The veins on her forehead begin to bulge. She pants and gasps for breath, feeling her vision flicker as the plateau to the Fortress of Retribution draws near.

The crystal glass dome that once enveloped the city no longer remains, having been quietly removed by the Wordsmith a few weeks earlier. This allows her to slowly lose altitude as she drops toward the city's western side, where the hospital is located.

Just as she arrives within ten feet of her destination, Cassiel's strength finally gives out. She loses control over her mana, and the platform vanishes, causing her and the people she's rescuing to cry out in fright as they tumble to the pavement. But before Cassiel can fall flat on her face, Soleil swoops in and saves her charge, allowing Cassiel to collapse in her arms.

Curiously, the construct does not even bother trying to soften the impact of the children, despite her exceptional speed granting her the capability of doing so...

In unison, all of the children, as well as Lily and Linda, fall to the ground. The adults manage to soften their landings by awkwardly flailing in midair, but the poisoned girls hit the pavement hard enough to crack a few bones, which only multiplies their pain.

The moment everyone lands, a swarm of exosuit-wearing troopers converges on their position. Having been alerted wirelessly through Linda's T-REX commlink, they descend on the children, wrap the girls in blankets and begin quickly whisking them off to the hospital's entrance a few hundred feet from the landing site.

Linda and Lily sigh in relief. They turn their appreciative gazes toward Cassiel, only to see their rescuer barely flitting in and out of consciousness due to her extreme mana exhaustion. She lays unmoving in Soleil's arms like a wet blanket, lacking even a drop of physical strength.

"What's wrong with Cassiel?" Linda asks, having fully identified both of the angels before her. "Is she alright?!"

"Cassiel is suffering from mana sickness." Soleil says. "She is a Lazarite. While she will not die from running out of mana, as a trueblooded angel would, she will become incapacitated and remain that way until someone gives her their mana. Unfortunately, my internal energy is incompatible with hers."

The construct raises her gaze from the woman crumpled in her grasp to the two women before her, as well as a growing crowd of onlookers.

"Cassiel requires all of your assistance." Soleil declares, leaving no room for opposition. "You will give her your mana. You owe her this much."

Slightly taken aback by the tinge of hostility in Soleil's tone, Linda nevertheless quickly nods. "Yes, yes of course. Those children would be dead without her help. How can we help? What do we have to do?"

"You will pray to Cassiel." Soleil orders. "Imagine her face and name in your mind. Imagine that you owe her a great debt. Then, close your eyes and focus on the thought of giving her your strength."

"Prayer..." Lily says, frowning slightly. "Daddy told me about this. In the old era, angels could receive Faith Energy from humans on Earth. Is that what this is?"

"It is." Soleil says mildly. She turns to look at the crowd of onlookers. "All of you, as well. Pray to Cassiel to give her strength."

The forty-or-so people in the vicinity nod along to Soleil's command. They close their eyes, clasp their hands together, and begin to pray.

Several seconds pass.

Thirty seconds.

One minute.

Slowly, Cassiel's eyes flutter open. The spots dancing in her vision fade away, and her strength returns. She violently coughs, nearly choking on her own saliva as the silent transfer of mana rejuvenates her soul.

Soleil helps her to her feet, and Cassiel shakily stands. Upon noticing all of the people around her, Cassiel abruptly freezes, her pupils shrinking to pinpricks.

With the danger threatening the children's lives gone, she suddenly realizes where she is.

Out in public.

Many people around her.

Some of them... men.

Cassiel's skin turns cold to the touch. Her teeth chatter. Her heart flickers erratically, and her legs tremble. Her pupils shrink and dilate as waves of nausea splash around her stomach, making her feel cornered. Trapped.

"S-suh-Sol-Sol..."

Cassiel whispers frightened words, clutching onto her construct companion. At once, as the people around Cassiel begin to open their eyes and gaze upon her in gratitude, Soleil realizes her mistake.

"That's enough!" She barks. "You've all done your part! But now you're scaring my lady! Disperse!"

These people, mere onlookers who appreciated Cassiel's rescue of the children, suddenly recoil in surprise at Soleil's violent words. Some of them deeply frown, feeling offended by her unexpected shift in tone. Not fully understanding the construct's concerns, they gnash their teeth.

"The hell is your problem, lady?" One man asks. "You ask us to pray, we pray! We help that girl, and now you tell us to fuck off? Show some goddamned appreciation!"

"Yeah!" Another man shouts. "What's the big idea?! Leave it to some bitch to yank us around!"

These men, not exactly angry at Cassiel, still nevertheless turn their resentful glares on her. Cassiel shrinks back in fear as one of them takes a step toward her.

"A 'thank you' would be nice, brat!" The first man exclaims. "I did that praying thing and now my head hurts. You sapped my energy, but couldn't even take me out for dinner first? So unappreciati-"

"I told you to disperse." Soleil says, interrupting the man.

The construct steps between Cassiel and the outraged man. Her eyes turn cold. A murderous aura swells within her gaze.

"Do not make me repeat myself."

The man swallows his next words. Something about the construct's cold, dead eyes makes him shrink back.

Something primal shakes his psyche.

A fear that is purely... instinctive.

Like a field hare that has come face to face with a ravenous wolf, the man feels himself shrink to half his size under her withering gaze.

He takes a step back and slowly begins to nod.

"S-sure, lady. I... I didn't mean nothin' by it..."

Soleil clenches her hand into a fist. Even as the man starts to pull away, the thought of reaching out and taking hold of his neck-

"Soleil." Linda suddenly says, snapping the construct out of her thoughts. "Thank you for your assistance. Private Hodgson, report back to your post. That's an order. And to the rest of you, thank you for helping us just now. Lady Cassiel suffered injuries when she rescued those children. Why don't we all give her some breathing room?"

Linda quickly and calmly defuses the situation, making the angry people dial down their emotions. As a veteran of the Stormbringer War, and one of the people who even helped take down Beelzebub in the mid-stages, Corporal Hurent has long earned a certain degree of accolades from the humans of Tarus II. The people present all look up to and respect her.

The two men from before awkwardly scratch their heads. They pull back after being offered this chance to save face.

"Sure, sure. Sorry about that, Corporal. We need to head back to our posts anyway. Thanks for, uh, explaining the situation to us."

The men turn and walk away. Not long after, the rest of the crowd disperses, leaving only Soleil, Cassiel, Linda, and Lily.

Cassiel finally collapses to her knees. She wraps her arms across her chest and massages her shoulders, trying desperately to suppress her panic attack.

Soleil, likewise, turns around to put her full attention on Cassiel. She drops down to the angel's level and embraces her in a quiet hug.

"There, there. The mean men are gone. I'll take you to a more quiet location, Cass."

"I recommend we bring Cassiel into the hospital." Linda says. "Have you taken her to see a psychiatrist yet? She could use some therapy..."

Soleil frowns at this impudent woman's intrusion onto her domain. "I am all the counsel my lady needs."

"Oh yeah?" Linda asks, putting her hands on her hips. "Not to call into question your abilities, but if I hadn't intervened just now... what were you about to do?"

Soleil doesn't answer. She merely stares at Linda.

Linda, thus, continues to speak.

"It was a rhetorical question." Linda says slowly. "You were... thinking of killing that man. Weren't you?"

"I was not." Soleil says.

"You lie worse than a kindergartener." Linda mutters, her tone filled with suspicion. "I'm pretty good at reading people, Soleil. I'll admit, I'm not sure if a 'construct' differs from the rest of us. But your anger earlier... did you even think about what would have happened if you had gone through with what you were contemplating?"

Lily stands beside Linda, frowning as she realizes she could have witnessed a gruesome murder had Linda not stepped in.

"Do not call into question my mental faculties." Soleil snaps. "My purpose is to protect the last living angel's life. All other matters come a distant second."

Linda's expression softens.

"Perhaps. But is that what Cassiel wants?"

Soleil flinches like a cat sprayed in the face with water. She turns her attention to Cassiel, only to find that her charge has been looking at her for a while now.

"It... is not." Cassiel whispers. "You must protect me, yes. But... killing or hurting others needlessly. I... do not want you... to go that far."

"Cassiel..." Soleil says, noticing the pain on her charge's face. "I apologize. I will change my guidance parameters at once."

"Mmm. Alright." Cassiel concludes, lowering her eyes.

* * *

Several minutes later, Cassiel and Soleil begin walking toward the hospital's entrance. Lily and Linda follow on Cassiel's left, while Soleil walks on her right.

"So, Cassiel." Lily says, smiling at the angel. "You were really brave back there. The way you immediately jumped in and saved those girls. I think I have a crush on you now!"

"A crush..." Cassiel says, nodding slowly. "Thank you. That is very kind of you to say."

"I mean it!" Lily chirps. "Sure, you collapsed and felt afraid when all those people showed up, but the way you put your fears aside to help the girls was super decisive. You had such a commanding presence."

"That was a long time ago..." Cassiel says quietly. "I am... not that person anymore."

Lily blinks. "Huh? What are you talking about?"

As they approach the hospital's doors, Cassiel slowly shakes her head.

"I failed... all of them. I'm not worth admiring."

"You failed...?" Lily asks, more quietly than before. "Who, exactly?"

Cassiel doesn't answer her question.

Instead, the white-haired angel becomes lost in her own thoughts, gazing into the abyss while her eyes focus on something unseen, some memory from her past...

The hospital doors swish open, sliding automatically to allow the visitors access.

These days, the hospital no longer has many injured people to attend. With the war having died down, most people in the hospital are only those who caught some weird alien sickness, those injured in construction accidents, or rare examples like Linda's class, civilians struck by a random freak incident.

Linda walks inside. She glances at the reception desk, where she spots a familiar goblin wearing a clean cut suit and tie.

"Grima!" Linda exclaims, forcing a smile. "Are the children going to be alright? Can I go and see them?"

The green-skinned goblin looks up at Linda. For a brief moment though, his eyes fixate on Cassiel and Soleil, as if carefully recording all their details.

"Miss Hurent." Grima says, his naturally intelligent tongue sounding far less crass than those of other goblins. "I am unaware of the current circumstances of the children.

Emperor Belial is currently attending to them, along with several of our other doctors. Can you tell me about the bugs that stung them?"

"I can do better than that." Linda says, tapping her T-REX activator. The nanite swarm engulfs her body, giving her access to its systems. "I'll send you the recording of that scene. Personally, I haven't a clue what bugs attacked them. I'm not familiar with Tarus II's insect populace..."

"Any clues would help." Grima says. "One of the children suffered more than a hundred stings. Luckily, the poison did not seem to have terribly severe effects. I would be surprised if they didn't all make a complete recovery by day's end."

"Ah. That's a relief." Linda says, breathing easier than she has in the last half-hour. "Say... I was wondering. Do we happen to have any psychologists available right now? You see, this here is Cassiel. She is an angel we rescued from the Labyrinth..."

Linda quickly summarizes the circumstances leading up to Cassiel's rescue, as well as her heroic rescue of the children. As she talks, Grima leans forward and rests his tiny elbows on the desk, oddly invested in her every word.

"How fascinating. And tragic." Grima says. "I am sorry for the pain you have suffered, Cassiel. As luck would have it, I am a trained psychologist myself. In fact, I have a brother, a goblin like me, he would be even better for helping heal your mental wounds. My family is actually quite accomplished, you see. We do not mingle amongst our lesser cousins, the fools who dumbly burrow into mountains. We pursue much greater academic interests..."

Soleil steps forward. "While your credentials may not be in question, it would be best if Cassiel's psychologist was... a female."

Cassiel nods quietly. "A woman... would be better."

"Ah. I see." Grima says. "Of course. I do have a talented sister who would be able to assist you. However, I will need a few days to contact her. Are you in a rush, or would you be willing to wait?"

Cassiel faintly smiles. "I can wait. Thank you."

"Most excellent." Grima says. "Contacting my sister will not require too much time, but I will have to head into the Labyrinth. Once my shift is over, I will leave, post-haste."

"That's very kind of you." Soleil says.

The construct stares at the goblin for several long seconds while the others debate what to do next. Something about Grima bothers her, but she isn't certain what that might be.

Erroneous parameter. Goblins are a lower species of Orc. Goblins typically possess extremely low intelligence ratings. Why does this individual seem so different? What causes Grima and his family to stand so far apart from the rest of their species? Are they mere aberrants? Or is there some other reason for their divergence?

Indeed, the construct does notice Grima's strange behavior, as well as his odd fixation on Cassiel. However, lacking key information, she does not realize the truth of the matter.

Grima is a Changeling.

The first one to ever step foot on Tarus II's soil, he has long since quietly integrated into the populace and removed himself from suspicion. Despite his extreme divergence from other goblins, nobody even questions his odd behavior, for they have already grown used to the funny little goblin's eccentricities.

In truth, Grima himself is not even a high-ranked Changeling. He is quite inexperienced, and if he were better trained, he would have been able to more closely emulate the behavior of traditional goblins. In the end, due to a series of factors, he has managed to make himself all but invisible, accomplishing this feat due to a few lucky circumstances more than clever manipulation of the indigenous population...

While Soleil contemplates Grima's suspicious behavior, a soldier in a T-REX walks out of the emergency rooms. He pauses when he spots the group of four standing beside the reception desk, then haltingly begins to walk toward them.

"Corporal Hurent..." The man says, drawing her attention to him.

Still wearing her own exosuit, Linda identifies the man approaching her through its identification subsystem. "Private Kittel. Have you checked on the children? Are they doing well?"

The man's pace stutters momentarily. He halts for the briefest of instants, then resumes walking toward them.

When he reaches Linda and the others, he pauses for several long seconds, his faceless helmet giving no hint as to his mood.

However, Linda's stomach begins to sink.

"Private Kittel? Are... are the children alright?"

The man coughs.

"Corporal. I... I regret to tell you in this way, but. Of the twelve children recovered... three have... three have died."

"WHAT?!" Linda shrieks, her heart suddenly pounding with such force that it feels as if it will explode from her chest. "No, no, that can't be! That's IMPOSSIBLE! Those bugs, they shouldn't have been- they couldn't!!"

The man, ever so slightly, lowers his helmeted head.

"I'm sorry, Corporal. Samantha... she tried to save them. But something went wrong. We're still investigating the situation."

"Show me!" Linda exclaims, gnashing her teeth. "Take me to them!"

"Yes, ma'am." The soldier says, defeated.

He guides the four women into the Emergency section, where they pass dozens of empty rooms. With very few people in need of major assistance, help can easily rush to save those in critical condition.

Linda's eyes flicker several times. Her thoughts race.

"We haven't had a casualty in weeks!" Linda bellows. "How could we have three at once? This makes no sense!"

"I don't know." Private Kittel says. "I'm not a doctor..."

Before long, they arrive at one of four rooms across from each other. Linda flicks her gazes inside, where she sees three groups of three children each, all resting after having their poison extracted.

But inside the fourth room...

Her stomach metaphorically crumbles to ash.

Linda walks in and finds all three of the girls, ages eight, ten, and eleven, laying unmoving on their beds.

Sheets cover their bodies to preserve their dignity.

Inside the room, a trio of demons turns their attention to Linda as she enters. Emperor Belial, Rosalia, and Leeroy, the Duke of Restoration.

Seeing Linda, Belial bites her lower lip. "I'm... I'm sorry, Linda. I was too slow. I came to his room last, but they were already..."

Linda lunges toward the bed. She activates her suit's scanning equipment, hoping beyond reason to find signs of life slumbering within the hearts of these poor children.

Reality proves to be unforgiving.

Their life signs come up nonexistent. Their body temperatures, well below the appropriate levels.

Linda stands, silent, staring down at the children before her. A crushing weight presses upon her soul. A sense not only of deep loss, but deep guilt.

She offered to supervise these girls.

She failed to take all the necessary precautions.

In Linda's mind, it is not the bugs that killed them, but she herself.

"No... no..." Linda whispers. "These... precious babies..."

Like Linda, Cassiel also feels a deep, terrible despair.

"I... wasn't fast enough." Cassiel whispers. "I was too weak. A failure... a failure like always..."

Lily shivers. She sniffles and wipes at her eyes as tears begin to well up, uncontested.

"Uuu... uuuu..."

However.

Soleil's eyes narrow.

The construct steps forward and brusquely shoves Linda aside. She looms over the children's bodies, scrutinizing their covered figures as if they lay naked before her, no secrets capable of withstanding her gaze.

Shocked, Linda scowls at the construct. "Y-you little! What the HELL is your problem?! Show some respect!"

At her words, Soleil's head snaps up. She turns it ninety degrees to stare at the woman standing beside her.

"I detect Chaos Energy within the bodies of these children."

Every person in the room freezes up. They gaze at Soleil in shock.

"W-what? Chaos Energy?" Linda asks. "What is that? What do you mean?"

"Isn't that… Gressil's energy?" Belial whispers. "Are you saying…?"

"These children did not die to the poison." Soleil states with absolute certainty. "My observations regarding those insects and the toxicity of their venom leaves no doubt. Something else killed them."

She pauses.

"Someone killed them."

Cassiel, standing behind Soleil, violently shudders at the name of her tormentor. She sags against Lily, who helps to hold her up.

Belial's eyes narrow with deep suspicion.

"Gressil…"

Part 446: The Chaos Culprit

Soleil's declaration sucks the wind out of the room. The gazes of every observer present become filled with suspicion.

The first person to speak turns out to be Rosalia, watching from the sidelines.

"I think the culprit should be obvious. Those bugs attacked the children out of nowhere, yes? Doesn't that seem suspicious to any of you?"

Belial's frown deepens. "Bug manipulators aren't uncommon. Emperor Kiari is one such example. But obviously she's an Emperor, and a kind soul. She'd have no reason to do this. Especially if the motive was to..."

Belial pauses. She turns to Linda.

"Contact the Lazarus Overseer. Phoebe and Jason just left, but she likely left someone to check the souls inside. Have the children's souls arrived inside its confines?"

Linda nods. "One moment, let me contact him."

She speaks into her helmet's transciever, and after a minute of waiting, she turns back to Belial.

"No new souls have entered the Lazarus Tower. Those children were..."

"Devoured." Belial hisses. "Someone ate their souls! How barbaric!"

"I thought demons couldn't eat souls directly anymore?" Private Kittel says. "Don't they require a necromancer's help to do that?"

"No." Belial says quietly. "There are... rare methods. Beelzebub, for example. He can consume souls through the use of Soulfire. In the Ancient Era, there was even a demon who could grant the power to devour souls to lesser demons. But he's been dead for a hundred millennia..."

"That doesn't mean a new way hasn't been discovered." Rosalia says, 'helpfully' redirecting the conversation. "What if one of the Hidden Emperors came up with a different method?"

"It's within the realm of possibility." Belial says. "Rosalia, I assigned you to this room. What happened when you came in?"

Rosalia chews her lower lip and scrunches her face up in concentration.

"Well... the children were crying, they were in pain. Then one by one, they stopped moving. At the time I thought they had passed out from the pain, which is why I went to get you. But, in all likelihood, they were probably already..."

"Already dead." Belial says, finishing the sentence. "Chaos Energy. Gressil must be involved with this. But he's an Emperor. And a loner. He doesn't have any reason to suck up souls!"

"Maybe we're going about this the wrong way." Leeroy, the Duke of Restoration interjects. "There is one culprit who fits the bill. Someone capable of turning invisible and hiding his soul signature. Someone capable of stealing souls directly..."

Linda's expression turns grim. "You think Mephisto did this?"

"Who else?" Leeroy asks. "Nobody saw the culprit enter. Someone killed those children while only Rosalia was in the room. To be that adept at infiltration, they must have been a master of deception."

"I was preoccupied at the time." Rosalia helpfully adds. "I was mixing that antitoxin solution like you ordered, Samantha. I looked away for a few seconds. Maybe, in that moment..."

Belial closes her eyes.

"How evil. How vile. To think three children would die on my watch. I never even felt his presence..."

While the group debates over what foul, heinous fiend could have killed the three little girls, Cassiel and Soleil remain conspicuously silent.

Heaven's Daughter numbly stares at the children she failed to save, while her construct companion seemingly gazes around the room, recording and observing every nook and cranny.

"Where is the solution?" Soleil suddenly asks, directing her words at Rosalia.

"Pardon?" Rosalia asks.

"The antitoxin solution." Soleil clarifies. "Did you inject the children with it? And if not, where is it now?"

Rosalia blinks twice. She reaches into her pocket and fumbles around, then pulls out a small vial on antivenom.

"When I turned around, the girls had already stopped making noise." Rosalia explains. "So I rushed out to get Samantha. I didn't have time to inject them with it."

As Rosalia holds up the vial, the construct quickly leans forward and snatches it from her grasp. Not bothering to ask permission, Soleil's keen, analytical eyes zoom in on the atomic composition of the compound.

She nods.

"This solution is adequate. You prepared it well. A shame you didn't get to apply it in time... perhaps it would have saved their lives."

Rosalia nods. She shrugs helplessly. "Perhaps... if I wasn't so useless."

"Don't be so hard on yourself." Linda says quietly. "You did the best you could, Rosalia. Everyone, I have to leave. I need to report this development to Neil and the other higher-ups. Please write down your statements so we can document what exactly happened for later."

Private Kittel nods. "Yes ma'am."

So do Belial and the others.

With a brusque nods, Linda turns and stomps out of the room, frustration evidenced by her footsteps.

After she departs, the others remain behind. They mill around, uncertain about what to do.

"Someone should contact their parents..." Lily finally says. "I knew these girls. I'll do it."

Leeroy nods. "Rosalia, can you dress them in something more... substantial? Let us try to preserve their dignity in death."

"Of course." Rosalia says. "Let me go fetch some hospital gowns. I'll be back in a minute."

She leaves the room, and the others continue discussing the deaths in her absence.

"Something simply doesn't add up here." Soleil says. "Chaos Energy is Gressil's domain, not Mephisto's. It's possible the Necromancer has obtained a portion of it, but my discussions with Archangel Raphael have revealed that Chaos Energy rarely ever appears. During the battle against Beelzebub, he released a massive burst of Chaos Energy during his detonation due to the negative emotions flooding his soul. But only Gressil can wield Chaos Energy with practiced ease, on command."

"What are you saying?" Belial asks.

"I am not willing to make any definitive statements at this time." Soleil clarifies. "However, I believe that Gressil is the actual perpetrator. I wager that he may have one or more agents working under him to attack humanity. These children... they will likely be the first of many to fall victim to the Emperor of Chaos."

"You don't think Mephisto is at fault?" Leeroy asks.

"Of course Mephisto might be the culprit." Soleil says. "But I wager the chance of this being the case is below five percent."

"We'll need to conduct an investigation." Private Kittel says. "I'll go and fetch a few people I know. Lieutenant Samuel is pretty good at sniffing out demonic criminals..."

The male soldier turns on his heel and stomps away, leaving behind an ever-decreasing number of people to gaze upon the deceased children.

With only Belial, Leeroy, Lily, Cassiel, and Soleil left, a solemn atmosphere takes over.

"Cassiel." Belial finally says. "You did well today. Thank you for saving the children. Please don't blame yourself for what happened."

"Yeah," Lily says. "You passed out from exhaustion getting them here. That was really impressive! Compared to you, I was totally useless."

Cassiel smiles, but the expression comes off as forced.

"I need to sit down. I'll be out in the hall."

She and Soleil depart. They take care to quietly don their human disguises so as to not draw any further unwanted attention to themselves.

Once they leave, Lily turns to look at Belial.

"So. Um, Samantha."

"Hello, Lily." Belial says. "It's been a few years. You're cuter than ever."

"A few years?" Lily asks. "Am I that forgettable?"

"What do you mean?" Belial asks.

"What do you mean?" Lily echoes. "You and I tongue-locked back on Hell Harbor only a couple months ago. Remember? Before that whole Stormbringer fiasco?"

Belial cocks her head. "I don't remember that. Are you sure it was me?"

"Of course!" Lily exclaims. "How could I forget? You shapeshifted right in front of me! Said you were looking for Ose's estate."

More confused than ever, Belial awkwardly scratches the back of her head. "I... think that was someone else, Lily. I would never go looking for Ose."

"Puh-lease!" Lily laughs. "How many people do YOU know who can shape-shift in seconds?"

Belial shrugs. "The Wordsmiths can."

"Well it couldn't have been a Wordsmith!" Lily bellows. "It was totally you, and now you're messing with me!"

She pauses.

"Though, it WAS a little weird that you'd choose to look like Mara..."

"You're saying I impersonated Mara?" Belial repeats. "Then I morphed into 'myself,' asked you to take me to Ose, but also made out with you?"

"Well, I mean, I was the one who made out with you..." Lily says, feeling less and less sure of what she experienced as more evidence comes to light. "Oh my god... that person really was a Wordsmith, weren't they?"

"The timelines do add up." Belial nods. "Jason went to Hell Harbor to talk to Ose. I was unconscious, at the time. I kinda had the shit kicked out of me."

Leeroy, watching from the side, raises his eyebrows as he listens to the women talk. "You two have such fascinating love lives. I'll be out in the hallway if you need me."

Without waiting for a response, he darts out the door, where he bumps into Rosalia returning with clothes for the children.

"Best to give those two a bit of privacy." Leeroy says, while noticing a strange look on Rosalia's face. "They need to discuss some private... are you alright, Rosalia? You look as if you've seen a ghost."

Rosalia blinks. "Me? I'm fine, Leeroy. Just a bit shaken up. It really started to hit me... what happened to those children, you know? So terrible..."

"Indeed." Leeroy mutters. "Truly unforgivable. The day we find the perpetrator, I'll beat them so bloody not even my magic will be able to repair their brain damage."

"Right, ah, same." Rosalia mutters. "Same..."

[Where are you taking me? We should head into the Labyrinth at once.]

"Patience, ancient Psion. You alone are not a match for the Envoy of Chaos. We will require additional assistance. Someone specializing in hunting his kind down."

[Are you implying that my power is not enough to kill a mere Demon Emperor?]

"If we were only facing a 'mere' Demon Emperor, then I would not utter such a claim."

Buddha and Creator Demila slowly walk up the northern ramp leading into the Fortress of Retribution's upper plateau. Built recently under the efforts of several Burrower demon grunts, this ramp, and several others, allow for more entry points into humanity's one and only capital city. Indeed, as the man and Psion walk, they pass by dozens of humans, monsters and demons. Yet, not one person so much as looks at them, thanks to Demila deliberately shrouding their existence with her psionic powers.

Invisible to the outside world, they walk among the populace of Tarus II without even a single entity recording their presences. Before long, the reach the top and start to pass by the hospital.

Buddha glances in the hospital's direction for half a moment before shaking his head and continuing forward.

[Something on your mind?] Demila asks suspiciously, unable to read Buddha's thoughts. She scans the hospital, but finds nothing of interest.

"I was thinking of bringing someone else along." Buddha says cryptically. But... her assistance will not be necessary. I have another candidate in mind."

[You refer to Emperor Belial.] Demila states. [I heard she battled Emperor Gressil and nearly defeated him on her own. An impressive feat, given his ability to suppress magical energy.]

"Belial. Mmm." Buddha says, neither confirming nor denying Demila's suspicions. "She would certainly be able to help us, but the person I have in mind... well, you should know his name. He was a thorn in the Volgrim's side for quite a while..."

Demila narrows her eyes. [Who do you speak of?]

But Buddha does not answer.

Instead, he continues walking, acting as if she has not spoken at all. While this does greatly irritate the powerful Psion, she nonetheless has no choice but to follow Buddha's lead. After all, she cannot track down the Emperor of Chaos with her own abilities, and so, she is forced to either follow him or go off and do her own thing.

Buddha walks through the streets, making his way toward a certain restaurant located in the city's center. Famed for cooking the best food in all of Tarus II, the Horned Maître stands five stories tall, well above its contemporaries. Not only does its physical size dwarf other restaurants, but so do its prices and quality. None can even come close to matching the skill of its highly-trained chefs.

At Buddha's signal, Demila lowers the invisibility field protecting them. The former Hero walks up to the front door, where a pair of minotaur guards immediately spot him, as well as the Psion behind him.

"...Tokens." One of the guards states.

"I'm not here to eat, today." Buddha says, while mildly smiling at the bullheaded monster. "I'm here to see a certain someone."

"What floor?" The minotaur asks.

"Fourth." Buddha answers. "And no, I don't have an appointment."

He informs the minotaur of this particular individual's name, causing Demila to raise her eyebrows.

After confirming a few things, the guards open the doors and allow Buddha and Demila inside without charging them the standard entry fee. Buddha leads her up three flights of stairs, and eventually, they arrive at the fourth floor of five.

The Horned Maître's fourth floor might not be as prestigious as the fifth, but only the most elite humans, monsters, and demons can afford to eat there. Even with room for eighty guests across all of the tables, they typically never seat more than twenty people on even a busy day.

Indeed, just one person sits at a table, quietly munching on some delicious roasted meat from a locally hunted animal native to Tarus II. This dark-skinned fellow pauses his eating when he sees the sight of a Psion approaching him.

[Benjamin Brown.] Demila says. [The legendary leader of the Vanguards. Somehow, I forgot you were still alive.]

Benjamin only pauses his eating for a brief moment. He glances at Demila, then Buddha, before placing another forkful of meat into his mouth. He slowly chews the delicious, tangy beef while giving the two of them an annoyed look.

"I am busy." Benjamin says. "I've no interest in talking to your eminence. Or the Asian fellow beside you."

"Japanese." Buddha clarifies. "Technically."

"Don't care." Benjamin says, while taking another bite. "Do you mind? This meal costs an arm and a leg. I'd like to savor every bite before it gets cold."

Buddha smiles. His eyes curve into crescents as he walks over and sits on the opposite side of the table, gesturing for Demila to take the seat beside him. The Psion rolls all six of her eyes and teleports to the seat, leaning back to cross her arms.

"By all means." Buddha says. "Continue eating, Mister Brown. I'll do all the talking."

"Somehow, I doubt that." Benjamin growls, visibly aggravated by the interruption.

"We require your assistance." Buddha says. "There is a grave threat facing humanity, right now. An enemy we must kill. You are the perfect person to help take him down."

Benjamin take another bite. He chews it slowly, licks his lips, and then takes another long, slow bite.

After twenty seconds of silence, he swallows the meat.

"Not interested. Apologies, sir, but I'm not a soldier. Not anymore. Just in case your eyes don't work, I'm old. I gave up fighting tens of millennia ago."

"Out of necessity." Buddha says, still smiling. "But you're not the type of man for whom the battle ever truly ends. You can only lie to yourself... tell yourself the war is over. It never is."

"I have children. Many children." Benjamin says. "Most of them are grown-up. Off doing their own thing. But Lily's my youngest. I'm not going to go out and swing my fists around like some meathead. I expect her to come home and still find her father in one piece."

"You care about your daughter." Buddha says. "A great deal."

"Of course..." Benjamin says, frowning even while slicing apart another piece of his exotic steak. "Every father does."

"I was never able to... enjoy the delight of becoming a father." Buddha says, his smile slipping, ever so slightly. "But I know what it means to love someone. To have them torn away by forces outside my control. If you don't help us, it's likely a terrible tragedy will befall humanity. All of its members... including your daughter."

"Motherfucker." Benjamin snaps, his eyes narrowing to slits. "Are you threatening me?"

Buddha casually waves his hand. "By no means. I'm warning you that if you don't help us take this individual down, he will wreak havoc across humanity's defenses. He may even bring about its extinction. He is the Envoy of Chaos... and he needs to be stopped."

Benjamin finally pauses his eating upon hearing the gravity in Buddha's tone.

"Envoy of Chaos? Are you trying to get me involved with fighting Gressil?"

"Precisely him." Buddha nods.

"Aw, hell no." Benjamin groans. "That demon is one of the most dangerous creatures in the galaxy. Ose feared him, and so do I. You know he killed Emperor Lucifer when he was only a Baron, right? Most demons aren't aware of that fact. Nobody even knows how he did it!"

"He is formidable." Buddha acknowledges. "But so are you."

"I was. Once." Benjamin says bitterly. "But that was a long time ago. Now I'm just an old man, half a foot in the grave. I'm not a fighter anymore. Why don't you bug the goddamn Wordsmith?"

"The Wordsmiths are both incapable of killing Gressil at this time." Buddha says, drawing a look of surprise from Demila. "But you are different. Your body was forged to fight Demon Emperors. Your mind is more resilient than any other human. Gressil's ability to nullify magic will have no effect on you. As for physical strength, you are his equal."

Buddha gestures to Demila.

"Besides. You will have a 7th Level Psion taking the lead. Your role will only be to assist her."

"And what about you?" Benjamin asks. "What's your role in all this? And who even are you, anyway?"

Buddha smiles.

"Long ago, in an age before the age when you were born, I was known as Siddhartha Gautama. I am Buddha."

[He is the Unkillable Hero.] Demila says, though her tone comes off somewhat insulting. [He has reincarnated dozens, perhaps even hundreds of times. Always, he possesses some new body, with this being his current form.]

"Buddha!" Benjamin exclaims, mildly surprised. "I've heard of you. Didn't know you were a Hero, though. Just assumed you were some old historical figure. Some guy the Hindus worshipped."

"A shallow understanding." Buddha chuckles. "But then again, you were born and raised in America."

"The land of the free, home of the brave." Benjamin grunts.

He returns to eating his food, but a thoughtful expression plays upon his face. After a dozen bites and just as many minutes of silence, he lifts his gaze to the two seated before him.

"You, uh... you really think the three of us can take on Gressil? Because if I get shipped back to my little girl in a body bag... you'd best hope we never run into each other in the Great Beyond. I'll tear your undying ass a new hole."

"Unfortunate circumstances can always occur." Buddha says. "Such is the strength of Chaos. But with your help, we will be capable of ending Gressil's terror once and for all."

"Why not bring a whole army?" Benjamin asks. "Why only the three of us?"

"Too many people and Gressil will flee. What we need is quality, not quantity." Buddha explains. "We must catch the Emperor of Chaos unawares and trick him into thinking he can easily take us down. Only then will we be able to spring a trap and end his threat."

"Mmm."

Benjamin says nothing else until he finally finishes off his plate of food. Then, he leans back in his chair and sighs contentedly.

"Ahh... damn. That might have been my last meal. Oh well. At least it was a good one."

He stares up at the ceiling for a full minute. Then he closes his eyes.

"Alright. I'm in."

Part 447: Making a Choice

Back inside the Tarus II General Hospital, Cassiel and Soleil sit in the waiting area down the corridor from the ICU. Already, they've both returned to their human forms, mostly to shield themselves from the scrutinizing eyes of the public. Once again back in the black and brown-haired ordinary human bodies, they draw no attention from the few people randomly passing by.

Soleil sits upright in her chair, at attention, like always. Seemingly unbothered by anything that could possibly go wrong, the deaths of the children don't affect her psyche in the slightest. However, the same cannot be said for Cassiel who slumps glumly in her chair and stares forward, her eyes practically boring a hole in the wall. Unblinking, she hollowly gazes into the abyss, metaphorically kicking herself for her failure to save all the children.

"You can't blame yourself." Soleil says. "What happened was beyond your control. You exposed your identity to the people of Tarus II and collapsed from lack of mana to save those kids. You did the best you could."

"But it wasn't enough." Cassiel murmurs. "It never is. I always come up short."

"Compared to whom?" Soleil postulates, glancing at Cassiel out of the corner of her eye. "Nobody expected you to help, but you did anyway. That was a kind and selfless gesture, Cass."

"Nobody expects anything from a weak, useless woman." Cassiel says quietly. "That's all I am now. People used to call me the Mightiest Lazarite. The Daughter of Heaven. Now people only look at me with pity. I'm just a... broken... victim... and they're right. Somehow, Gressil killed those girls. He's here with me, even now... torturing me... menacing me... I never feel safe from his influence."

She pauses.

"Sometimes I think it would be better if I simply died."

"You can't talk like that." Soleil immediately says. "Did you truly endure his vile acts for 100,000 years only to crumple up in defeat as soon as you regained your freedom?

Now is the time to build yourself back up and become unstoppable, Cass. Or to live a happy life."

Cassiel lifts her head slightly. She looks to the side, toward a window showing the beautiful midday light streaming in, revealing the outlines of buildings a few blocks distant.

"What does a happy life look like, Soleil?"

The construct frowns. "I... do not understand the question."

"I've spent nine-tenths of my existence suffering under... under his claws. He treated me like a toy. He hurt me. He maimed me. He defiled me. I couldn't put up even a paltry resistance. Now that I am free... how can I ever experience 'happiness'? I don't even know if that emotion exists within me anymore. I fear he long ago snuffed it out."

Soleil listens to Cassiel talk. However, in her mind, the concept of emotions do not play out in any sort of human-like way. Instead, she tries to rationalize what she might do if she were in Cassiel's shoes.

"The solution seems simple. Why not delete the last 100,000 years of your memory files?" Soleil posits. "Then you will not have to dwell on those terrible times."

"I can't delete my memories." Cassiel says. "That isn't how brains work, Sol."

"Perhaps the Wordsmith can?" Soleil postulates.

"...Perhaps. But I am not so certain I want to do that. I would love nothing more than to forget... all of it. But a part of me feels that I deserved what happened. The others died protecting me. I am all that remains of the angels and Lazarites. I do not think that I have the right to forget my pain, for it is a reminder of the sacrifices made by those before me."

"I disagree with your underlying assumptions." Soleil says. "But I understand where they come from. If you are unwilling to forget, then... I'll have to work harder on helping you cope, my lady."

Cassiel absentmindedly caresses Uzziel's ring. She focuses on the childlike presence within it, and how Uzziel feels noticeably more muted than before, partly because of Cassiel's own recent sadness.

Bwa bwa?

"I'll get over it, Uzziel." Cassiel says with a smile. "That's the one thing I'm good at doing..."

Bwa bwa!

While Cassiel and Soleil quietly talk, Belial steps into the waiting room, visibly drained after performing a surgery-less autopsy on the children. She glances around the waiting area, but only sees two random human women sitting.

"Um, excuse me." Belial says, as she walks toward them. "Did you two happen to see a pair of angels walk through here? Big white wings. Halos above their heads..."

Soleil doesn't answer, but instead glances at Cassiel.

Cassiel starts to open her mouth, but as she does, Belial's eyes flick to her neck.

"Hmm? That locket... isn't that a Heaven's Shroud? Oh! So you two are... incognito."

Cassiel blinks twice. "You know about the Heaven's Shroud?"

"Well. Yes." Belial says, her tone awkward. "At the end of the Energy Wars, after the demons had... won. Well, a lot of work went into excavating angelkind's remains and their secrets. We ultimately learned how you were able to hide among the humans so well, and the secret of the Shrouds."

Seeing the look of sadness on Cassiel's face, Belial quickly adds, "Of course, this knowledge wasn't relevant to lower-ranked demons, but I'm sure a few Emperors would recognize its appearance on sight. It will hide you from the eyes of those unaware, but just don't assume it's foolproof..."

Cassiel quietly nods. "Thank you for the warning."

After a brief pause, she adds, "How are the children?"

"Nine of them will make a full recovery within the hour." Belial says, plopping down in a chair across from the two shrouded angels. "As for the other three, we've begun contacting their families. I imagine their parents will be here soon. If you want to avoid people, you should leave before they arrive."

"I see. I might do that, then." Cassiel says.

Belial smiles. "It's good to hear you talking, Cassiel. I was really worried you'd never be able to use your voice. I respect how hard you've worked to recover."

Cassiel gazes at Belial evenly. "You were one of the people who helped rescue me."

"I am." Belial nods.

"You are Satan the Devil's wife." Cassiel states. "You are an enemy to humanity and angelkind, both."

"I've not made the best choices." Belial acknowledges, hanging her head slightly. "But I... I try to make amends, to be a better person. Did you know I never killed a single person, not one solitary soul, until recently?"

"You didn't?" Cassiel asks. "What changed?"

"Stormbringer." Belial says, rubbing her palms together. "My human friends were being slaughtered. So many of them, by so many demonic invaders. I felt so angry, so helpless. I gave up on my morals and decided the only way to protect my friends was to commit a terrible sin. So I started killing... I don't even know how many demons. Thousands, perhaps tens of thousands."

Belial spends the next few minutes telling Cassiel about the events of Stormbringer, the attack which she was not around to witness. Cassiel listens silently and without judgment as Belial goes on to even tell her about her battle with Ose and how she lost to her rival.

"Ose was too powerful." Belial says. "She was the architect of humanity's demise. I wanted to tear her apart... but I couldn't. I was helpless. It was only when Archangel Uriel arrived that we managed to beat Ose back, but I for one couldn't help much in the fight against humanity's most terrifying enemy."

"I know what that feels like." Cassiel says sympathetically. "To want to protect everyone, but to lack the strength. It... eats at you."

"It does." Belial nods. "I'm supposed to be the 'Second Emperor,' the second strongest of all demons. But I lost to Ose. I don't feel that strong. If anything, I feel quite weak. Useless. All I can do is sit here and heal people... but I do feel it's at least a valuable service that only helps the world improve. So in that regard, I'm... satisfied."

Belial smiles. She starts to say something else, but at that moment, a redheaded woman 'pops' into existence beside her and slaps her shoulder.

"No need to feel all down, Sister Samantha! And you're not weak at all! If you're bored, I might have the perfect job for ya!"

Belial glances at the newcomer. "Oh, Blinker. Were you listening in on our conversation?"

"Nah, just wandered in and heard that last bit." Blinker says, flashing a thumbs-up. She pays no attention to the two human women seated across from Belial. "I actually came because I had a favor to ask of you."

Belial stands up, rising to Blinker's height, as she has assumed her full-body size, complete with her cute butterfly wings and bright green dress.

"A favor? I'm a bit busy right now, but maybe I can help. You see, we just had some children die for the first time ever in the operating room..."

Belial explains the situation briefly to Blinker, taking care not to mention Cassiel or Soleil's involvement without their permission. After she finishes, Blinker's expression dims.

"Seriously? Three dead kids... and Gressil is at fault. Then in that case you'll definitely want to hear my proposal."

She pauses.

"Sam... I want you to help me hunt down Mephisto. And Yama, too. Our main goal is to kill those two and rescue Kar's soul."

Belial nods. "I thought it might be something like that. But are you sure? Wasn't Hope going to get Mephisto for you?"

"I don't know all the details," Blinker says, "but rumor on the grapevine has it that Hope never went to the Labyrinth at all. He's been doing some secret stuff instead. Neil told me so."

"Well, that's a bit selfish." Belial says with a frown. "But it doesn't change anything. You can't find Mephisto on your own. Even Jason's Wordsmithing can't detect him. He's hidden somewhere truly secretive. And as for me, I don't pay any attention to his movements so I won't know where to look either."

For a brief moment, Blinker pauses more awkwardly than ever before. She scrunches up her face and forces a smile while looking pleadingly at Belial.

"S-see, that's the thing, Sam. It won't just be me going, but the other fairies too."

"Right..." Belial says, suddenly suspicious.

"You know, Saria, Melia... Ruto..."

Belial continues to nod. "Mhmmmm...."

"And, well," Blinker says, finally biting the bullet, "I'll just say it! Beelzebub offered to guide me toward Mephisto's location and help us fight him!"

"BEELZEBUB?!" Belial shrieks. "Blinker, no! No, no, a thousand times, NO! I just knew you were acting suspicious! How could you even think of working with that slimy, worthless, no good, evil, murdering piece of shit?! He killed millions of humans, monsters, and demons! He killed my NIECE, Daisy! I'm talking about Jason and Phoebe's only daughter!! You can't trust that filthy snake in the slightest!"

Blinker lowers her head. "I... I don't know, Belial. He seems to have changed. I think he's trying to mend his old ways-"

"I don't give a DAMN what he wants to mend! Unless he can bring all the people he killed back to life, I will NEVER forgive Beelzebub!" Belial bellows, her voice traveling far enough across the hospital that people begin to lean out of their rooms to search for the commotion. "He deserves no forgiveness! If I had my way, I'd spent the next fifty years crushing his skull into pulp every time it regenerates, time after time after time!"

Blinker's expression becomes utterly glum. She seems to shrink in stature, despite her body's size not actually changing in the least.

"I... I know you hate him, Belial." Blinker whispers. "And I want people brought back too... but this is my husband I'm talking about."

She massages her lightly swollen pregnant belly, now only in its second month of pregnancy.

"I don't want Kar's babies to grow up without a daddy..." Blinker whimpers, her voice shaking as she avoids Belial's gaze. "I just thought as someone who also lost a husband... maybe you'd understand."

Visibly taken aback, much of Belial's rage vanishes as she recognizes the deep pain in Blinker's voice.

"Sorry. I flew off the handle a little. You didn't deserve that, Blinker."

The two women wordlessly embrace one another, forgiving each other for their accidental transgressions, then they sit down to talk things out.

"My point still stands." Belial eventually says. "I won't work with Beelzebub. I can't do it. But maybe someone else could help you fight Mephisto..."

"What about the Archangels?" Cassiel asks, drawing Blinker's attention for the first time. "I hear that Archangel Uriel is always looking for a reason to fight the demons. And nobody would complain if she were to get rid of some of demonkind's less-savory elements..."

Belial nods appreciatively. "There, see? Have you asked the Archangels yet, Blinker?"

"I haven't." Blinker says, before turning to Cassiel. "Thanks for that recommendation! And you are...?"

"Oh, I'm, ah, nobody important..." Cassiel says quickly. "I'm Cammy. This is my friend Serra."

"So it's Cammy and Serra." Blinker says politely, clearly not thinking them to be anyone of particular noteworthiness. "Well, you've given me a big hint for where to look next. So, thanks for that!"

Cassiel waves her hand politely. "No need for thanks, Miss Blanker."

"Blinker." Soleil coughs into her fist.

"Right! Blinker, sorry..." Cassiel quickly corrects her error. "I'm still trying to learn all the important names."

Blinker finds the interaction slightly amusing, but otherwise pays little attention to these two Plain Janes. She returns her gaze to Belial. "I do wish you'd join the attack squad, Sam, but I understand your hesitation. It'll probably be alright if it's just me, the other fairies, and Beelzebub, but if we can get the Archangels on our side, there's no way that bone-bastard will stand a chance!"

Belial knits her forehead in concern. "Don't underestimate Mephisto, Blinker. The last time our galaxy had an Emperor-level Necromancer, Valac terrorized the whole of Earth. You'll not only be fighting a fully realized necromancer, but also his Emperor-level servant, Zamiel, and Yama, to boot. Not only these elites, but potentially millions, even billions of undead servants. Any buried bodies become 'useful materials' for him, which is why Jason instituted a policy of either burying bodies along with powerful divine energies placed inside of them... or cremation."

Belial lightly raps her fingers on the arm of the lobby chair.

"We already know that at one point Mephisto possessed the corpse of the last dragon, Leviathan. It's entirely possible he may have other bodies at his disposal, or he may be seeking to 'create' more. But there is one further complication I fear you haven't imagined..."

"And what would that be?" Blinker asks.

"Kar's soul." Belial says quietly. "Mephisto no longer has access to the souls of humans. But he can still harvest the souls of dead demons and monsters. Demon souls are useless for uplifting other demons, but monster souls are at least a portion as potent as human souls. Which implies..."

The blood drains from Blinker's face. "Oh no! You don't think... he already ate Kar's soul?!"

"Don't jump to conclusions." Belial says, her tone casual. "If you were to give Kar's soul, which is about as strong as an Demon Emperor, to some unnamed Demon Grunt, you'd end up with a Demon Duke. It wouldn't be enough to make them an Emperor, at least not by my calculations. A Heroic Soul, like Jason or Hope's, would uplift any demon to the rank of Emperor. But that's just because humans are so damn compatible with demon physiology."

Blinker nods. She remains silent while Belial continues to explain this distressing but essential information.

"In any case, if I were a sick sadistic prick like Mephisto and I wanted to maximize the utility of Kar's soul, I wouldn't spend it all on one demon. Especially not at this point." Belial says. "Mephisto has a lot of enemies, but his list of allies grows thinner by the day. What I would do if I were him was collect some disloyal Dukes or power-hungry people and offer them each a portion of Kar's soul. But they can't just break pieces off whenever they want, they'd need to form a ritual to split its purity across all of the Dukes at once. By all accounts, Kar's soul possesses enough power to uplift, I don't know, five Dukes to the rank of Emperor? Maybe more, maybe less."

"But he's had weeks alone with Kar's soul." Blinker says glumly. "And he has a bunch of Dukes already following him. That means... Kar's soul is probably already..."

"Humph!" Belial snorts derisively. "Are you talking about his stupid necromancer lackeys? They're useless for promotion. Mephisto doesn't need six Emperors of Necromancy. They would only become his competitors. He needs to shore up his weaknesses with minion abilities that complement his own. That means he'll have to go out looking for other Dukes willing to convert to his side."

Belial pauses. A thought strikes her, and her expression turns ugly.

"Willing to convert? That doesn't even have to be the case, now that I think about it. Mephisto could simply kill a Duke and nab their power for himself. Once they become his necromantic slave, he'll have a formidable army at his disposal. But has he thought that far ahead? Hmm..."

Soleil speaks up. "I believe your words have a 72.3% chance of being accurate, Emperor Belial. There are a large variety of Dukes across the Seven Hells. Trying to figure out which ones Mephisto might target will not be simple."

"At the least, before you go on your hunt," Belial says to Blinker, "I should alert the Hidden Emperors to Mephisto's scheme. Though I doubt they wouldn't have thought of this possibility themselves. It is pretty much Valac's playbook. It's also extremely hard to defend against. Mephisto can strike anyone, anywhere. We've already seen how he can evade the Wordsmiths by turning his soul immaterial..."

The two women hash their thoughts out a bit longer.

Eventually, they stand up and give each other another hug.

"Thank you for listening and giving me advice." Blinker says, as she pulls away from Belial. "I knew you wouldn't want to go, but I had to try asking."

"No hard feelings." Belial says, before her face turns grim. "But watch out for Beelzebub's machinations. I worry he'll try to take you out when you're at your weakest."

"I'll be fine." Blinker says, waving away Belial's concerns. "Oh, and thanks for the suggestion, you other two! I'll go visit the Archangels after this."

The Monster Queen departs after thanking Cassiel and Soleil for their words of encouragement, and the atmosphere becomes more harmonious.

At least, until some time later, when the hospital doors open and the families of the dead children arrive.

"Where's my baby?! Take me to see her! WHERE IS SHE?!"

"I'll rip apart whoever poisoned my little girl!"

"Where are our kids? Take us to see them!"

These rightfully outraged mothers and fathers lash out at Grima, who quietly and calmly accepts their words without judgment.

Belial, seated not far from the reception desk, winces.

"Alright. That's my cue. Cassiel, you can leave. I'll keep your name out of the report."

She starts to stand up, but so does Cassiel.

The Lazarite meets Belial's gaze.

"No. I will face them with you. We'll do it together."

Soleil frowns.

"Cassiel..."

Part 448: Linda's Love

Corporal Linda Hurent departs the Tarus II hospital with a heavy heart. Being the person who was supposed to watch over a dozen young girls as their caregiver and ensure their safety, the deaths of three of her charges leaves her feeling hollow inside. Her gloomy eyes gaze forward while she walks. Occasionally, a random person will wave hello at her, only to pause when they see the look of loss on her face. They try to get through to her, but their words ricochet off an invisible wall as she absentmindedly ignores them.

Three dead children. Three beautiful little girls. I was supposed to protect them. I failed.

Just like Cassiel, Linda entirely blames the deaths of the kids on herself. She regrets not thinking to bring any anti-venom with her. She regrets more things than she can count, a fact that makes her stomach sink into the pits.

All of a sudden, a car horn beeps out behind Linda, jarring her thoughts. She quickly spins around to see a compact military SUV behind her on the street leading west off the city plateau.

Samuel Baker leans out of the driver's side window. He narrows his eyes.

"Christ. You look like shit, Linda. Get in."

Linda nods numbly. She turns around, shuffles over to the passenger door, and clambers into the vehicle.

This SUV, a compact vehicle with only two seats, was made by Phoebe Hiro to be small, quiet, and efficient enough for use on civilian roads, yet rugged enough for off-road traversal in the open plains, allowing it to travel off the beaten path and scout out the greater area around Tarus II's main city.

Linda clicks her seatbelt into place, then glances at Samuel.

"...You heard?"

"It's all over the comms." Samuel says. "Three dead kids. Their souls devoured by a demon... Neil told me to come pick you up. He wants to talk to you."

"I was on my way to see him." Linda says. "Thanks. You're saving me a lot of trouble, Samuel."

"Mmm."

Samuel presses his foot down and gently accelerates, making his way down the crowded city streets past walls of humans, monsters, and demons, all intermingling and living together seemingly in harmony...

After a full minute of silence, Linda finally speaks.

"We have a murderer in our midst."

"Indeed we do." Samuel answers. "A demon."

"It's always a demon." Linda murmurs. "First I was deceived by Mara, and now some unknown assailant..."

"I asked Neil to assign me to the investigation team." Samuel says. "But he told me he has other plans. Wouldn't say what they were, though. Mind asking when you see him? I bet he'll open up to you."

"I can try. But it's the last thing on my mind." Linda says. "I just don't understand. Why? We have the Merit Tokens. Any demon can much more easily evolve through the Belial Booster than through killing and devouring a person's soul. Even if Tokens are a little harder to acquire lately, they're still quite plentiful and don't carry the risk of a major diplomatic incident."

"You speak as if a 'major diplomatic incident' isn't exactly what the murderer wants." Samuel says.

"What do you mean?" Linda asks, turning to look at the man. "You're telling me they want to foment hatred of demons?"

"You said it in your report." Samuel points out. "There were signs of chaos energy embedded in the children's bodies. The only demon we know who is capable of wielding that type of energy freely is Gressil. And Beelzebub too, I suppose, given his detonation at the end of Stormbringer. But analysts say that was a 'fluke.'"

"Right. A fluke." Linda grimaces. "So if Gressil is at fault, then what is his end-game? He sabotaged the power supply not too long ago, but we fixed that pretty easily. Killing three children is awful, but it doesn't seem like it will materially affect the human-demon relations all that much."

Samuel sighs. "For now, maybe not. But you forget one important thing, Linda. Demons live forever. It doesn't have to cause a war within some set time period. Don't you see? The Emperor of Chaos can choose to slowly create incidents like this, and since we can't track him, it will cause a breakdown in our relations over a long, sustained period of time."

"But we know it's Gressil doing all this. Not the other Emperors or demons." Linda points out.

"Do we?" Samuel asks. He looks at her for a moment, then returns his eyes to the road and shakes his head. "I don't trust these fucking demons, and neither do you. Most of our fellow soldiers certainly don't. We have no idea if Gressil acted personally, or if someone else acted on his behalf. But me, I'm a gambling man. I'll bet Gressil has secret allies within the Hidden Emperors. They smile at us, shake our hands, and tell us the past is the past... but those old cunts are terrified. They know they're on a timer, we know they're on a timer, and they know we know this fact. Behind all the smiles, there's an undercurrent of fear as they watch their chances of returning to the top of the hierarchy plummet further every day."

"They're incentivized to work with Gressil..." Linda says slowly. "Because they want to destabilize humanity. But if we kick the demons out, they'll lose access to the Belial Booster, among our other toys."

"We won't kick them out." Samuel says, with more than a hint of disgust in his voice. "Because Jason Hiro doesn't want them gone. That stupid sap still wants to play house with our enemies. He thinks his overwhelming power means they won't dare retaliate. But even a blind man can see that isn't true. They don't have to declare war to cause us severe problems... or slowly weaken us through attrition."

"It's a good thing we have Hope and Neil on our side." Linda says. "Only they have the strength to stand strong against the tyranny of idiocy."

* * *

Linda and Samuel continue talking for ten or so minutes while the Lieutenant drives her to the outskirts of the northwestern military base. He drops Linda off, and she enters the complex without him. After Samuel drives away, Linda makes her way inside, where Debra ushers her toward Neil's office.

"Mr. Adams is waiting for you." Debra says.

"Thanks, Debra." Linda says, smiling at the pretty blonde secretary. After entering Neil's office, Linda pauses inside, then reaches behind herself and swings the door shut.

Sitting behind his desk, Neil Adams holds a feather with ink on its tip, and a litany of papers lay in neat arrangements on his desk. He doesn't immediately acknowledge Linda's presence, but instead finishes scrawling out a sentence with the black ink stuck to the quill's tip.

Linda slowly approaches his desk. She glances at the dizzying array of paperwork and raises an eyebrow. "You know this would all be much easier to manage and organize if you used digital files, Commander."

Neil finishes writing his sentence, then sticks the feather back into its tiny ink pot. He clasps his hands together atop his desk, then looks up at Linda.

"Yes, but I'm a little old fashioned." Neil says. "I always wrote with a feather when I worked under Napoleon, and I don't like to change my habits. They provide me a certain sense of... security."

"I can understand that." Linda says quietly.

"So, how are you, Miss Hurent?" Neil asks, leaning back and gesturing to the chair across from him, on the opposite side of his desk. "Aside from the no-doubt crippling feelings of guilt and anxiety that must be eating at you right now."

Linda gently sits in the luxurious chair and sighs deeply. "Surprisingly... a bit better, now that I'm here, Commander. It's always nice being in your company."

"These are trying times." Neil says. "Though they may not seem as such on the surface. People often gravitate to sources of strength when their hearts feel uncertain."

The two briefly fall silent.

"Three children dead." Neil says. "And an unknown demon is at fault. I've sent some people to collect samples from the bugs that attacked the girls. Perhaps we'll be able to detect traces of demonic energy on their bodies."

"I was right there." Linda mutters. "And I couldn't protect them."

"You did the best you could under the circumstances." Neil says. "More importantly, I'm surprised you didn't place more emphasis in your report on the positive development that resulted from that situation."

"Huh?" Linda asks, blinking in confusion. "What positive development are you talking about? Nothing that happened was good!"

"On the contrary." Neil says. "Don't you understand? That angel we rescued... Cassiel. She revealed herself to you and proceeded to levitate the girls all the way back to Heroic City. Had she not been there, the casualties may have been much higher."

Linda scrunches up her face. "Cassiel was devastated by their deaths. She may have blamed herself more than even I did..."

"She will get over them." Neil says with an odd amount of confidence. "Few know Cassiel's true identity. The angels have done well to keep her presence hidden. But as for me... I have extremely high faith in her future."

Even more confused than before, Linda slumps back in her chair. "You know her?"

"In a manner of speaking. Commander Napoleon came into contact with the Angels on many occasions. One of those times, he met the Daughter of Heaven. He spoke highly of her beauty... and her power."

Neil smiles.

"Of course, when we first rescued Cassiel, I had no idea who she truly was. But thanks to discussions with a few of the men under my command, it came out that Belial had revealed Cassiel's true identity to a pair of soldiers in the hospital. Luckily, I managed to silence those rumors. I wouldn't want our enemies finding out the truth..."

A flicker of realization passes over Linda's face. "She must be someone of some importance."

"Oh, indeed." Neil says, nodding sagely. "Lord Napoleon once told me in private that I must show absolute respect to the Daughter of Heaven. Not only is she a Lazarite, but the strongest one of all. A reborn human with powers that even caught the attention of the Archangels. He was only able to gaze upon her face in person once, but he claimed that her beauty came from the light of creation itself."

"High praise." Linda says respectfully. "It seems Napoleon was smitten with her."

"He claimed that she embodied the perfection of the ideal Frenchwoman." Neil says. "But by no means did my Lord feel any romantic interest in the Daughter of Heaven, only a deep respect embedded within his bones. And so, I carry that torch. I believe that if the Wordsmiths should ever fail, she may yet become humanity's salvation. Our guiding light."

Neil lightly raps his fingers on his desk.

"She was terribly traumatized by what Gressil did to her. And yet, when the time came, she steeled her heart and revealed herself to save those children. She took a huge risk, exposing herself in the open like that... when the Emperors would surely wish to pluck her wings while she is vulnerable. I have nothing but respect for the fortitude of her heart. Even after 100,000 years tortured by the worst demon in existence, her Maiden's Heart remained defiant. Not even the worst torture could break her spirit..."

A smile plays upon Neil's lips, one that gives Linda a slight vibe of nostalgia.

The moment passes.

He sobers his expression, then turns to her.

"I called you here because I wanted to make sure you were doing well, mentally, Corporal. I imagine seeing those children die must be weighing terribly on your conscience."

Linda hangs her head. "You know what it's like to lose children, Commander."

He nods. "I do. All because of that Bahamut."

"I wasn't one of Bahamut's victims." Linda says. "I'm just a soldier from the first colony you liberated. Can you... tell me what it was like? Being under Bahamut's control?"

Neil frowns. He averts his eyes to look off to the side, at the artwork hanging on his walls.

"Six years have passed since I regained my freedom. When I toiled under Bahamut's spell, I could not control my thoughts, my emotions, or my observations. It was as if a parasite had taken over my existence and began leading me around by my nose. The disorientation I felt made it so that I perceived every second of my imprisonment, yet the time flew by in an instant."

"I remember the time before Bahamut as clearly as if it were only seven years ago." Neil continues. "One day, I was on the battlefield with my Lord, and the next, I was bowing to Jason Hiro, thanking him for freeing me. But at the same time, I remember every moment I lived as a monster, obediently doing anything Bahamut commanded me."

"You must miss your wife and children terribly." Linda says.

"The pain is still raw. Still fresh." Neil answers. "Time passes, but I never forget. Sometimes I even wonder why I bother doing all of this. I no longer have a family to return to. I no longer have a boy and girl who cry out to me when I come home... 'papa, papa!'"

Linda's expression becomes thoughtful. "I think I know why you stay here, Commander. Why you continue to fight the good fight."

"You do?" Neil asks. "Even I don't have all the answers."

"It seems obvious to me, from my outside perspective." Linda says. "You've suffered, but you don't want others to suffer. You know what it's like to lose a family to the demons. You take charge because you want other men to grow old with their wives and children. You want families to live free of the oppression of the demons. Even if you can no longer participate in that happiness... you hope it will 'redeem' you in the eyes of Karma. Make you worthy of someday seeing them again."

Neil slowly traces a finger across his lips while falling deep into thought.

"...Yes. That might be the case. I've lost Melia. I've lost Barth and Sierra. But there are others out there who still have families, who can still come home to their loved ones. I would not want them to suffer preventable losses."

He glances at the Corporal.

"And what about you? Do you have any family you've kept out of the limelight?"

His words, somewhat teasing, don't particularly spark any light in Linda's eyes.

"None. I joined your army as a new recruit from the world of Maiura. Freshly liberated from the demons, I was eager to join the resistance and fight back against them. After all... they slaughtered my entire family. If you had liberated Maiura just one year earlier, you might even have been able to save my sister's life..."

"I didn't realize you had a sister." Neil says quietly. "I'm... sorry we weren't fast enough."

"Lynne was my twin." Linda explains. "She and I were a matching set. Some demons thought that made us... desirable. One demon thought it would be funny if we weren't a set anymore. So he killed her."

She shrugs lightly.

"And just like that. She was gone."

"Their cruelty knows no end." Neil says. "I'm sorry you had to suffer that loss. But at least it means you always have some perspective. You know why we must never give up that fight to exterminate the bloodskins."

"It does, and I do." Linda nods in affirmation. "It's also why I respect your determination to keep fighting, even when you have no true skin in the game."

The two continue talking for a while longer, but eventually, their discussion shifts to other subjects.

Linda glances at the papers scattered around Neil's desk. "What have you been working on?"

"A bit of this, a bit of that." Neil says casually. "You see, the Wordsmith and I had a little chat not long ago. We've both decided it might be time for... the Big Split."

"Hm? What's that?" Linda asks.

"Humanity will separate into two super-colonies." Neil explains. "The population of each being based on who can woo more people. I've decided not to try and stay on Tarus II, but instead to move our base of operations to another world. What do you think about transitioning half of humanity to Maiura?"

Linda's eyes light up. "Truly? I would be honored if my homeworld became humanity's second home. But how many people do you think will join you there?"

Neil gestures to the papers before him. "That's what I am trying to determine. I have two weeks to carefully craft a speech that will sway as many hearts as possible, but I'm facing a difficult decision..."

He pauses.

"For obvious reasons, this second colony will not allow even a single demon to enter its confines. We will be forbidding them entirely. But what of the monsters? Those half-servants to demonkind? We've been treating them as humanity's natural allies, but I wonder if we wouldn't be better-off shunning them, too..."

"The monsters?" Linda asks. "Why would you have a grudge against any of them? I know many wonderful monsters who walk among our people. The fairies, for instance.

The minotaurs, reptilians like Kar..."

"But they are not human." Neil says simply. "They have stayed in our good graces due to a series of coincidences... but need I remind you? It was a monster who imprisoned me and countless others: Bahamut. She is even more my enemy than any demon ever was. Yet I am expected to keep quiet about the monsters living amidst our people. I cannot reconcile detesting demons with allowing monsters to remain in our ranks."

Linda hesitates. "I... I don't think banishing them from our ranks would go over well, Commander. With all due respect, I personally adore many of them. Blinker fought valiantly to save humanity. So did Yamir, who is also considered the best chef on Tarus II. Doctor Fathy has saved innumerable lives. There are countless other examples. Don't you think... you might be taking your hatred... a bit too far?"

Neil doesn't immediately respond. He becomes eerily quiet, as if lost in thought. The Commander swivels his chair partially to gaze out the window at the muted, sunny day outside, while his eyes flicker.

"I don't know. Perhaps I am. I'm less worried about offending the monsters, and more about how our human soldiers would take their loss on an emotional level. I fear it would damn me in the eyes of my men and women. They would hate me for saying such a thing, and it would shatter our cohesion. Better to simply keep quiet and pretend the monsters are the same as us... though I know they are not."

"Yes." Linda says. "Best to simply keep quiet..."

She and Neil stop talking for a short while. An awkward silence fills the air.

Neil clears his throat. "Ahem. Well, if you'll excuse me, Corporal, I must be getting back to work. Thank you for your time, and I hope you'll let me know if the situation changes with those children. I'm going to be putting a specialist on the task, soon enough."

He looks at Linda, but she doesn't move from her seat. Instead, she becomes oddly quiet, fiddling with her hands in her lap.

"Corporal?" Neil repeats.

Linda blinks twice, as if exiting a daze. "Ah! Yes, well... before I go, there was one other thing... Neil."

Her casual use of his first name slightly throws him off. "Hm? Is there something else on your mind... Miss Hurent?"

She nods slowly. "I've been meaning to ask you for a while, but I... I can't ever seem to muster up the courage."

"I am an open book." Neil says, spreading his arms. "There's no need to be afraid of bringing up indiscretions among your troops or other concerns. I won't judge."

However, his words don't seem to allay her concerns. Linda's ears turn slightly red at the tips as she coquettishly looks down at her lap, then back at her Commander.

"I... I might be being a little too bold, Neil." Linda says. "But I was wondering if you'd... like to... go somewhere with me. Privately. P-perhaps for a night on the town, even. If you'd like. But you don't have to feel obligated, or anything like that."

Neil blinks.

"Miss... Miss Hurent. Are you propositioning me?"

Linda stares awkwardly at him, then looks away.

"I knew I shouldn't have. I'm sorry, Commander. I don't know when to keep my mouth shut."

"No, no, it's fine." Neil says, frowning slightly. "I simply... didn't realize you looked at me in that way. I'm always so busy. I never particularly think about these matters."

Linda bites her lower lip. She looks back at Neil, trying hard not to blush. "I'm speaking out of turn, really. You can ignore me. I know you have Debra, so I really shouldn't have pushed my way in like that."

"Debra?" Neil asks. "Oh. You think it's... like that. No. I'm afraid it isn't."

Neil purses his lips for a moment. His eyes become unfocused.

"Debra and I were both monsters under Bahamut's command. I won't lie. When I awoke to a far-future hellscape where my family was long dead, I felt quite lost in that moment, and Debra was..."

He pauses.

"...she was there for me. And she does... greatly resemble... my wife, Melia. Perhaps even a bit too much. I immediately felt some thoughts of filling the hole in my heart with her. But these days, it stings to look at Debra and think such things. I feel as if I might as well be replacing Melia with a clone and slapping her across the face."

Linda listens attentively. She shakes her head.

"If your wife knew the circumstances in which you disappeared, she would not blame you. She would understand the pain you've endured. She would want you to move on, I think. And so would your children. No doubt, they grew up to become a fine man and woman, a duo who would have made you proud."

"Yes. Maybe so..." Neil mutters.

Linda gathers up her courage and leans toward him. "I... truly respect you, Neil. I know what it means to lose my whole family. To be too weak to protect them. To feel like a failure. I always see you alone, isolated from the troops. It makes me wish I could help you fill up that void in your chest."

Neil chuckles. "So you pity me. This is a new feeling I've not experienced before."

"Not pity." Linda clarifies. "Like I said. It's respect. And... perhaps it's still too soon for you to move on from your family. I'll understand if it is. But why don't we... give it a try? Why don't we test the waters a bit? See if we're compatible."

"I'm your superior officer." Neil says. "I don't think it would be appropriate."

"Then I'll leave the military." Linda says, startling even herself with her boldness. "Should Jason and Phoebe not be together simply because they both hold high posts? Let's not make excuses, Neil. If you don't want to try... going out with me... then I'll understand. But I won't let the excuse of military rank hold me back."

Neil coughs. "Ahem! Are all Maiuran women as bold as you?"

"Don't know." Linda says. "I'm not all Maiuran women. I'm just me."

Neil nods. Then he falls silent.

Humanity's military commander turns his chair 180 degrees, hiding himself from Linda. He gazes through the window, falling deep into thought.

Several minutes pass.

Linda's expression begins to sink. She becomes embarrassed, thinking of all the ways she may have irreparably humiliated herself.

But finally, Neil speaks.

"...Alright. I'll give this a... a try."

"You will?!" Linda exclaims.

Neil turns back in his chair. He leans forward, rests his elbows on his desk, and smiles.

"I've been thinking about a great many things lately, Miss Hurent. About where humanity will soon go. What my place in its future will be. Leading a military campaign is fine and dandy... but you were right when you said I had no skin in the game. I've been living as a dead man, chasing after old grudges. Perhaps I need to develop my relationships more. Live a little more. Pursue more. Maybe then I will finally be able to see the bigger picture and know where humanity must advance next."

Linda nods seriously. "Maybe it won't work out between us. But I am glad you're at least willing to see where the wind takes us. I can't replace your Melia... and I wouldn't ever want to. But maybe I can offer something new."

"This isn't a business transaction." Neil says, standing up. He starts walking around the desk toward Linda, and holds out a hand, causing her heartbeat to quicken. "We're both mature adults. I won't deny that I do find you... attractive. But I won't know if I'm truly ready to move on until I take that first step."

Linda nods. She takes Neil's hand and allows him to pull her to her feet. The two of them stand closer than they ever have before, close enough that they can feel the breath on each other's faces.

"When do you have free time?" Linda asks softly.

"Today. Two hours from now." Neil says. "Why don't we take a boat ride out on the eastern lake? Say, four o'clock?"

Linda smiles, revealing her shining white teeth through her thin pink lips.

"Yes. I'd like that."

Part 449: Ambush on Diabolus

Mara, the Duke of Collection, stands inside the Labyrinth Core, along with a host of other low and high-level demons, all waiting for the chance to return to their homeworlds. While she waits, one of the highest-level demons from the Fifth Hell of Calamity walks over to her side.

"Hello, Mara." Says Crow, the blue-feathered Emperor of Sacrifice. The giant bird-like demoness bristles with strength exceeding what she possessed just two weeks earlier, likely the result of a personal visit or two to the Wordsmith. "Heading back to Diabolus, finally?"

Mara glances at the one being who might be the strongest of all the Emperors in the Fifth Hell. Despite Emperor Gorn being the most versatile with his many 'faces,' and Yumagi being a secretive powerhouse Mara would never bet against, the Duke of Collection knows that perhaps only Emperor Belial could beat Crow in a fistfight.

"I've put it off for a few days." Mara says, answering Crow's question. "But now that my freedom is assured..."

"You're lucky to be alive. Did you play a Card to alter your Luck?" Crow asks.

"I don't have a card that can do that." Mara snorts. "Would sure be nice if I did."

After a brief pause, Mara glances at the clock for the hundredth time, revealing that she has been waiting for over forty-one minutes for the damned portal to Diabolus to open.

"It's too bad." Crow says casually. "You would make for an excellent Emperor. But with those restrictions the Wordsmith placed on you, you can never ascend to the next rank. At least not through the Belial Booster."

Mara's expression doesn't become any gloomier. "Better than being dead. I waited over a hundred thousand years to become a Duke. I'm happy with this level of power. If I tried eating human souls to advance, the feedback from Jason's magic would probably kill me. Stepping up two ranks without adjusting to my current power level would also probably screw up my ego."

"Being stuck at Duke is no way to live." Crow says mildly. "Though, knowing you still have room to grow has its own comforts. If someday you do ascend, you will learn the new torture of never again being able to surpass your limits."

Mara glances sympathetically at the Emperor of Sacrifice. "I hadn't considered that before. Perhaps you can never reach a rank higher than Emperor... but what about Demon Deity?"

"What of it?" Crow asks. "Ca-caww! It is merely a dream. The only Emperor who has ever attained that level of power was Wolfram. And he barely enjoyed its majesty for a single hour before his body and soul immolated. Perhaps... it is too much for a mere Emperor to dream of permanently breaking the barrier."

Crow's expression momentarily becomes sullen and moody. She bristles her feathers, then crosses her arms and stands up a little straighter.

"But it is no concern of mine, at least for the immediate future. I am able to make small but impactful gains through the Wordsmith's magic, at least for now. Furthermore, my Rituals enable me to obtain minuscule, but permanent gains, gains which other Emperors can never enjoy."

"Permanent gains?" Mara repeats, glancing at her superior with a look of genuine respect. "You mean those rituals aren't only good for a temporary boost of power?"

Crow smugly smiles, her hawk-like eyes glancing sideways at the Duke of Colection. "Permanent. Oh, certainly, the ratio of slaughtered souls to permanent power is truly wasteful. But when you have reached the peak, every single percentage of added strength makes a tremendous difference."

Her smile quickly fades, morphing into a scowl. "Though, I've unfortunately lost my human acolytes. They all teleported to Tarus II. I haven't performed a ritual since Ose's death. I probably won't be able to for a very, very long time... especially not with the Wordsmith watching."

"At least you can still exchange Merit Tokens for a boost." Mara says, shrugging.

"For now." Crow concludes. "But who knows how long the Wordsmith's magic will remain effective?"

The two demon leaders continue talking for a while. Eventually, a full hour later, the Warpgate to Diabolus opens, causing them both to roll their eyes.

"Finally!"

The two of them shove their way through the throng of demons and head through the portal first. Anyone from Diabolus who might dare to complain shuts their mouth when they realize it's the strongest demon of their entire Hell shoving her way to the frontline.

There isn't an isolated chance they'd dare speak up and cause their bodies to be splattered beneath Crow's fist!

Crow and Mara step through the portal first. When they arrive on the other side, Crow flaps her wings and pounces into the sky, departing Mara's side without a goodbye. As for her inferior, Mara take off in the opposite direction, heading toward the concealed base of the Tarot Sect.

Underneath Yumagi himself, Mara is now the second strongest member of her sect. Surprisingly, Yumagi has made no efforts to increase the number of elites under his control, but instead only opts to leave Mara as his lone Duke.

Mara races into the skies, across the horizon, flying through the use of one of her Silver Tarot Cards. As she flies, she frowns slightly.

This is the optimal time to increase our sect's power. Why, then, does our Master keep his survival a secret? Why does he refuse to empower his subordinates? If we're not careful, our Sect will fall far, far behind the other demonic organizations!

Unable to reconcile Yumagi's actions with the goals of all the other Emperors, Mara can only scratch her head in confusion.

For several minutes, she races tens of miles across the horizon. As she travels, Mara suddenly senses a pang of distress in the air; an upheaval of demonic energy. She pauses her flight to look downward, at the ground far below her. There, she sees a surprising sight. A Demon Duke, someone she is quite familiar with, battles a giant crocodile, someone emanating an aura of Demon Emperor!

"Raven!" Mara softly exclaims, after identifying the weaker of the two below her. "Why is the Duke of Feathers fighting an Emperor? Wait! I know that Emperor! What in damnation?!"

Mara's pupils shrink to pinpricks. She identifies the Emperor quickly, based purely on his physical appearance. After all, his body is exactly the same as the former Monster King, Kar's!

"Z-Zamiel? Then that means-?!"

Right as Mara realizes who is attacking Duke Raven, a creeping sensation of dread materializes behind her back. Before Mara has time to react, a violent strength smashes into her spine, firing her down toward the planet's surface like a cannonball.

"Aaaugh!"

Launched without warning, Mara's back screams in pain and her mind spins as the ground rushes toward her.

THOOM!

The Duke of Collection crashes into the rocks, pulverizing some of them into powder while also breaking over a dozen bones. She bounces off the ground and her vision goes black for a moment before she wakes up with stars in her eyes.

"Uhh... uhhhhh..."

Mara tries to pull herself together. But with several broken or fractured ribs and ten shattered teeth, she feels like a car wreck survivor, barely holding on.

A faint Emperor-level aura materializes above Mara. Her eyes bolt open as she spots a second enemy, none other than Emperor Mephisto himself!

"Kekeke!" Mephisto cries. "What great luck I posssesss! A sssecond Duke, come to deliver hersssself to me on a platter! Hello, Mara! Don't you look delightfully tasssty today!"

"Muh... muh... fist... oh..." Mara gasps, while blood pools in her throat. She tries to move, but her back cries out in pain. Tears well up in her eyes as she lays near-paralyzed before the necromancer who struck her such a grievous blow.

Mephisto ignores her gasping words. He frowns at Zamiel. "Ssstop playing with your food! Kill the little bassstard already! You are an Emperor now! Thisss disssplay isss ssshameful, Zamiel!"

"Just getting used to my strength, boss!" Zamiel laughs. "This is the first time I've gotten to fight since you brought me back! Lemme have a little fun!"

"Imbecccile!" Mephisto snaps. "We are in hossstile territory! The sssooner you kill that Duke, the sssooner we can leave before another Emperor comesss!"

Raven, the Duke of Feathers, glares hatefully at his opponent. His beautiful black feathers run red with his own blood, a sign of the terrible beating he's suffered.

"Ca-caww!" Raven shrieks. "I sensed Crow's return only minutes ago! You fools! When my master detects your presence, she will rush here and kill you both! Your pathetic, weak little bodies will crash against hers like the ocean against the shore. You will crumble! You will FALL!!"

Zamiel doesn't even blink at Raven's taunt. "Idiot. Crow went entirely the other way. Haven't you realized? My boss put up a Soul Suppression Seal on the area. Nobody knows we're here unless we want them to know. Like that dumb little bitch over there, hahaha!"

Zamiel directs a jeering look Mara's way.

"You really think some woman's going to come and save you, Raven? One already tried, and now she's on the ground, broken and crying! Useless broads, bahaha!"

Mara's agony-filled body suddenly flickers with power. In the instant between instants, she decisively pulls a card out of her Mind Realm then manifests it in reality.

Mephisto's head swivels in her direction. "No!"

He fails to react in time. Mara coughs out the activation command.

"Temporal Cricket... EVOKE!"

At once, time reverses around Mara, undoing all of the damage she has sustained! Mephisto pounces at her, raising his fist to smash her chest in pulp. But unfortunately, before his blow can connect, Mara shimmers to the side, flickering in and out of reality through a card she already had Enchanted onto herself earlier.

"Accursssed woman!" Mephisto howls. "YAMA! Get out here!"

Mara's heart turns to ice as she feels the aura of a third Demon Emperor emerge, none other than the Emperor of Shadows himself!

A fist made of blackness rushes at Mara's back. She shimmer-shifts to the side, barely dodging the attack that would have surely broken her bones all over again. But unfortunately, she ends up right beside Raven, in between all three Emperors in a triangular formation.

With her cards on a short but crucial cooldown, Mara lacks an immediate solution to her problem. And perhaps, even if she were to draw a card, she might just obtain one useless for this situation!

Mara's heart turns chilly as the Emperors of Legions, Shadows, and Weaponry surround her and Raven. In the best of circumstances, two Dukes might be able to duel a single Emperor long enough for reinforcements to arrive, or perhaps for the two Dukes to make a lucky escape.

But against three Emperors?! Neither of the two have a bat's chance in Hell of making it out with their lives!

Raven, sensing the true futility of the situation, becomes eerily calm.

"I see. I thought it was strange you attacked me of all people. But while one Duke might be an oddity, two cannot be a coincidence. You need us for some nefarious purpose."

Mara grits her teeth. "It's not a secret! They possess Monster King Kar's soul! They must want to kill us and turn us into Mephisto's undead Emperor-slaves!"

"Kekeke! A good guesss!" Mephisto 'praises' Mara. "Indeed. Your bodiesss and sssoulsss will provide sssome ussse to me in defending my future reign. But whether you die or sssurvive, it mattersss not. There are plenty of other Dukesss I can ussse for my purposssesss. And with three Emperorsss at my dissspossal, I can even consssider attacking other isssolated Emperorsss. In the end... a Necromancccer will alwaysss become the mossst powerful of all demonsss!"

Raven's eyes turn cold. "If you want to take me... you won't do so alive. I'll self destruct my body and soul. You will receive nothing from me."

He raises his hand to his chest...

THUMP!

Yama's fist leaps out of a nearby shadow and crashes against the back of Raven's skull, catching the Duke unaware and smashing him facefirst into the dirt!

Whatever method he was about to use to kill himself utterly fails!

With half his face crushed into pulp, Duke Raven becomes utterly disoriented. He fails to protect himself when Yama's shadow lance follows up, stabbing directly into his heart and slaying him on the spot.

"RAVEN!" Mara shrieks. "You murdering bastards!! You killed him!!"

Zamiel rolls his eyes. "Duh. Stupid bitch. That was always the plan. We're going to kill you, too."

Mephisto summons Valac's Lantern. He grabs Raven's soul before it can fly away, then sucks his body into the dirt to send it into his Necromantic Domain, where he can 'make use' of it later. Then, he and the other two turn their attention to Mara.

"You'll have to do this yourselves." Yama says to Mephisto and Zamiel. "Satan put a restriction on us. When we attacked Mara earlier, we suffered terrible soul-pain! That damned Devil, how dare he bind this glorious Emperor with his vile soul contracts?!"

Mephisto nods. "You are unable to ssstrike femalesss. But that isss fine. Zamiel! Crush thisss woman! I will limit her movementsss! And watch out for her Tarot Cardsss... they are deccceptively powerful!"

Zamiel lifts a massive greatsword made of demonstone. He licks his lips while eying Mara like a piece of marinated meat.

"I'm on it, boss!" Zamiel roars, pouncing at the Duke of Collection.

In that instant, Mara whips out a Golden Card, one she's not used in a long, long time.

"Light of the Lion, EVOKE!"

Instantly, a light brighter than that of the midday sun blasts out of every pore in Mara's body, causing Yama to leap backward and shriek in agony, while also visibly stunning Zamiel and Mephisto. The former becomes so dazzled that his attack uselessly whiffs past Mara's position. She shimmers away, neatly evading him while leaping skyward to try and flee.

Just as Mara is about to put distance between herself and her three adversaries, ten undead Harpies erupt from the nearby cliffside and fly at her. While individually weak, and absolutely not a match for a Demon Duke, they manage to get in her way and delay her escape long enough for Zamiel to blink the stars out of his eyes.

Mara swings her fists with reckless abandon. She easily shatters the skulls and splatters the brains of these weak undead monsters, but before she can fly higher, Zamiel leaps at her from below and grabs her ankle.

"Get back down here!" Zamiel laughs, yanking with all his strength. He tears Mara out of the sky and flings her at the ground with his Emperor-level strength, making her shriek in fright as a repeat of Mephisto's earlier action plays out.

BOOM!!

Mara slams into the dirt and shatters her left arm, breaking it in five different places. At the same time, the side of her head crashes into a rock, jarring her senses and leaving her to crumple into a ball, shaking and trembling like a beaten dog.

Soundless sobs escape Mara's throat. She wheezes and gasps, unable to move, as all of the wind escapes her body.

Out of the corner of her eye, Mara spots Zamiel raising his greatsword to impale it into her stomach.

But she lacks the strength to fight back.

She is only a Duke.

And a Duke can never defeat an Emperor.

Zamiel stabs the sword toward Mara's defeated form. His eyes flicker with hunger.

The instant before that sword can kill her...

Foop!

Mara vanishes!

Zamiel's sword impales her former position, blasting apart the dirt and rock, yet failing to create the result he expected.

"What?!" Zamiel howls. "Another trick?"

A moment later, he and the other two Emperors sense two demonic presences in the area, presences that certainly were not there only a moment before.

All three of the necromancer's allies turn their heads upward, where they see Mara laying on the flat of the cliff above, still a badly injured husk of her former self. At the same time, a female Warper stands in front of her protectively.

Ying-Ying!

Having communicated with her sister through their magical earring-links, Mara alerted her sister to her dire circumstances. Ying-Ying opened a portal and rescued her sister at the last second!

But what truly startles the three Emperors is neither Mara, nor Ying-Ying...

It is the young, extremely handsome male Emperor beside them.

Mephisto's undead heart nearly leaps out of his chest.

"No! No, impossible! Emperor Yumagi?! You perissshed! We sssensssed your sssoul disssipate! Your body fell to dussst!"

The valiant, heroic-looking Glyphmancer stands tall, his chest puffed out, looking disdainfully upon the three who nearly claimed the life of his precious Duke.

"You saw me die? Mmm. Perhaps I did." Yumagi says casually. "But don't worry. Death is only a temporary state for this God Emperor. My abilities are far beyond your comprehension, oh great Imitator of Valac."

"IMITATOR?!" Mephisto roars. "I am sssuperior to that ancient fosssil! He perissshed, while I remain among the undying! How dare you insssult my greatnesss!"

Yumagi stares evenly at the Emperor of Legions.

"Did you say something? Forgive me. I'm presently debating how I should go about killing the three of you in the most excruciating manner possible. You see, I really don't like it when someone damages my property. I have invested a great deal of time and energy into my cute little Mara... and I won't tolerate such an affront to my authority as what you've done today. You just had to take things a step too far..."

Mephisto visibly appears undaunted. However, as a demon who has always been just a bit cowardly, he mentally shrinks back at Yumagi's threat.

Mephisto might be a bastard, but he is no fool.

He remembers well how Yumagi performed during the battle against the Cherubiim.

Yumagi may have 'died,' but it was his terrifying power that initially gave the demons an advantage against the Archangels. Were it not for Raphael's reality-defying soul strength, the Archangels might have died on that day...

Yumagi absentmindedly glances off into the horizon, as if carefully debating the manner in which he will dispatch the three Emperors before him. He casually flicks his fingers, summoning a card into his hand.

"Temporal Cricket, Evoke."

Just like Mara did earlier, Yumagi instantly brings her back to perfect condition, undoing all of the damage she sustained, effortlessly.

"Hmm. It's a bit troublesome..." Yumagi says, while Ying-Ying helps Mara to her feet. "Three Emperors against one... it won't be a fair fight."

Zamiel smiles wickedly. "Now that you mention it, I bet it won't! Come on, boss! The three of us can kill this nobody easily! He's outnumbered!"

"Fool." Yumagi groans. "I meant it wouldn't be fair for you. Perhaps if there were five of you it might be a fair fight... bah. Mara, come here."

Under the bewildered gazes of Mephisto's cohorts, Yumagi materializes three Tarot cards in his grasp.

"Master's Calling, Evoke."

One of the cards vanishes! In its place, a female Demon Baron appears, instantly teleporting into a crouched position at Yumagi's feet.

"Sister Xena?" Mara asks, slightly bewildered.

A blood-haired demoness with seductive cherry lips and black leather tightly sticking to her skin stands up from her crouched position. She glances around, taking stock of her surroundings.

"Master Yumagi?" Xena asks. "Why am I...?"

"You have a task to fulfill." Yumagi answers. "You and Mara both. You will fight Emperors Mephisto and Zamiel. As for Yama, he is presently unable to battle against women. He will sit this fight out, as will I."

Xena turns pale. She quickly looks down the cliffside at the three Emperors below, her pink skin turning pale white.

"You wish for me to fight an Emperor? Master, with all due respect, I am only a Baron!"

"And I'm only a Duke!" Mara exclaims. "Barons and Dukes cannot defeat Emperors!"

Yumagi stares at his two disciples. He shakes his head in disappointment.

"Fools. Do you think this Glyphmancer cannot divine such a simple truth? That is why you will not fight them as you are now."

He holds up the two remaining cards in his grasp.

"Heroic Empowerment, Evoke! Aspect of the Dual Dragons, Imbue!"

In succession, Yumagi activates the first card, applying it effect to the second. When the second activates, its effect splits in half and races into the chests of Mara and Xena both!

To the absolute terror of the three Emperors below, Mara and Xena's aura begin to explosively rise, shooting into the stratosphere! Mara achieves a level of power she never expected to receive for the rest of her life, jumping to the rank of Emperor, while her sect-sister jumps two entire ranks to that same level!

Demonic power surges through their veins, shaking the continent and sending earthquakes in all directions. At the same time, Yumagi grabs the backs of both women's necks, sending magical cards into their Mind Realms.

He drops his sect-members to the dirt, then crosses his arms.

"Very good. You will remain in that state for one hour. I hope to see your opponents dead before the time runs out."

For the briefest of moments, every person present falls utterly silent.

Mephisto's cold, undead heart chills to ice.

Yama remains motionless, having been 'spared' by Yumagi from having to uselessly fight these women.

As for Zamiel, the 'epic beatdown' he was imagining in his mind completely reverses from a hilarious three-versus-one into a terrifyingly fair two-versus-two.

Mara stands up. She cracks her neck.

"Thank you, Master. I do have a bone to pick with that necromancer."

"I'll take the croc, then." Xena says, smiling sweetly.

Then... they both rush toward their foes in the gorge below.

Part 450: Sects Strike the Shadows

Mara, the Duke of Collection, and Xena, the Baron of Trading. Not long ago, they were roughly as powerful as one another. Both of them were Barons. While Mara was listed as the public face of the clan and often referred to as the 'leader' of the Tarot Sect, her actual demonic strength, like that of every other member aside from Yumagi himself, never exceeded the rank of Baron.

But that changed thanks to the Belial Booster.

Mara stepped into the next tier of demonic power, placing herself truly ahead of all her sect-mates, making them deeply envy her good fortune. Even the judgment by the Wordsmith that she would never be allowed to step into the rank of Emperor didn't temper their envy. After all, fewer than a percent of a percent of all demons would ever have the opportunity to earn enough souls to become a Duke.

But at this moment, as the two women charge toward the enemies below, Xena finds herself in that lofty position, temporarily strengthened to the rank of Emperor through Yumagi's mystical Tarot powers.

The Heroic Empowerment elevates one demon to a rank far above their station, while the Aspect of the Dual Dragons duplicates that effect to a second individual, allowing Xena to rise along with her sect-sister.

Together, the two of them form a terrifying duo... the first ever public battle between two Emperors capable of wielding the power of Tarot Cards!

Xena lunges toward Emperor Zamiel and his stolen crocodilian body. She motions with her hands to draw a Tarot card, but her heart jumps into her throat when instead of one card appearing in her grasp... three cards materialize!

What?!

Mara also experiences that same shock. Unlike her fellow disciple, she has become quite familiar with the elevation of her abilities after she reached the rank of Duke. Mara became capable of maintaining ten sustained Tarot abilities at once through their Imbue effects, but that still pales in comparison to the awesome ability granted by her Emperor level empowerment.

Three cards at once? Mara mentally shrieks in delight. How can any other Emperor possibly defeat me now?!

Indeed. This simple boost does more than grant her a couple of extra options in battle. It essentially triples her strength, a boost to her demonic power almost never seen when demons jump from Duke to Emperor!

Not only can Mara and Xena summon three cards each time they 'draw' from their Mind Realms, but they can draw cards every five seconds in battle, rather than every ten.

Added together, this means they can activate up to six abilities every ten seconds, instead of only one.

A sixfold increase in combat strength!

Mara rushes toward the necromancer below her.

"Thorns of the Raven, Imbue! Eldritch Dragon, Imbue! Secret Effect, Trap!"

Mara fingers transform into bird-like claws. Leathery dragon-wings sprout from her back. At the same time, she invokes a trap effect, providing her a secret benefit as that card dematerializes.

BOOM!

Mara crashes into Mephisto's figure and smashes him into the dirt, stunning the necromancer's senses. Before she can deliver a follow-up blow, he dives underground and tries to run away, only to comically splat against a magical force-field just thirty feet below him.

"What?!" Mephisto roars. "A magical barrier? We've been trapped! That Yumagi TRICKED usss!"

The necromancer whips out his dagger and starts desperately slashing at the invisible barrier barring his escape, but a yanking sensation grabs onto him and starts dragging him back toward the surface.

"No, no, no!" Mephisto howls in alarm. "Let go of me, you insssidiousss wench!"

Mara's latest attack comes from the effects of yet another three cards, all of which she imbues onto her body. One of them grants her a form of somewhat weak telekinesis, which she uses to yank Mephisto out of the dirt while also charging electricity onto her claw-hands.

"Come here Mephisto! I've got a present for you!" Mara laughs maniacally as she pulls Mephisto right into the path of her awaiting fist.

Mara's strength, empowered with the metaphorical might of a bear, allows her to launch a punch capable of destroying tanks directly at Mephisto's skull. The instant before her attack lands, Mephisto narrows his eyes and explodes into smoke, becoming totally invisible while dispersing himself over a large region. Mara's attack harmlessly whiffs through him, ultimately exploding in midair to discharge a burst of electric energy over the surrounding area.

"Coward! Try standing your ground and fighting for once!" Mara challenges. "Unless you admit you can't beat even one lousy Fake Emperor!"

At the same time as Mara and Mephisto's war, Xena and Zamiel also come to blows. However, unlike his boss, who does not perform well in physical engagements, Zamiel is a prolific combat veteran possessing the powerful body of the former Monster King, Kar. His strength goes well above what he would have possessed himself as an Emperor, and his scaled hide gives him quite the resilient defenses. The only downside is that Zamiel's soul-strength is only that of a Duke. This means his magical abilities are not nearly as strong as his physical body.

Xena opts to deal with the scale-thief by bombarding him from afar. She continuously imbues her body with magical effects, many of which come from Tarot Cards she has never seen before! Thanks to the mystical magic passed down to all of Yumagi's disciples, they possess the unique ability to instantly identify the effects of any Tarot Card they touch in all its activatable forms.

Thus, even when Xena finds herself continuously drawing ten and twenty cards she has never seen before in her life, she still instantly understands their effects and what will happen when she casts them.

"Mountain From the Sky! Imbue! Godsworn Hurricane, Evoke! Sun Guardian of Cairo, Summon!"

One after the other, Xena imbues her body with an array of mystical traits, becoming something of an eldritch monster with a horrifying array of abilities. While imbuement might provide the second weakest of all Tarot effects, it also has a 100% success rate in casting, doesn't damage the card, and lasts a full ten minutes until the effect runs out, making it one of the most reliable methods to use during combat. Only Enchanting specific objects, pieces of armor, or other things summoned by Tarot cards is more reliable, albeit a tad weaker.

Most shockingly, after ascending to the rank of Emperor, Xena becomes just as delighted as Mara when she finds out she can now maintain a whopping twenty active Tarot effects! This primarily relates to Imbuing and Enchanting, but also one of her strongest auxiliary Tarot abilities...

Summoning!

Xena finishes up her fifth round of card activations by conjuring the image of an ancient Egyptian Titan to reality. Thanks to the mystical methods behind Yumagi's Tarot creation powers, this card is somehow able to materialize the physical manifestation of a twenty-foot-tall Titan in the physical realm, though one that ultimately acts as nothing more than a soulless construct, rather than a summoning of the original figure.

Zamiel's eyes widen in shock as, while Xena continues attacking him with her imbued powers, a massive figure materializes behind her, the manifestation of the ancient Titan known as Sun God, Ra.

Shining with golden light, Ra's sculpted muscles make him truly resemble a deity towering above mere mortals. His falconic head peers into the distance, looking beyond the mortal realm into that of the immaterial. His armored gauntlets grant him incredible offensive and defensive potential in hand to hand combat, completed by the golden snake-staff held in his grasp.

The instant Ra's summoning completes, the ancient Titan turns his gaze toward the ten-foot-tall crocodilian who barely reaches his waist. He stomps toward Zamiel, forcing the Duke of Weaponry to retreat while also defending against Xena's onslaught.

"Two against one?!" Zamiel complains. "That's not fair!"

"Neither is stealing someone else's body!" Xena shouts.

Her body moves with the speed and power of a hurricane. She races around Zamiel, beating him from the front and back with gales of wind and bolts of thunder while her summoned construct, Ra, unleashes blasts of searing flame upon the Duke of Weaponry.

While Zamiel's Duke-level magic might not be comparable to that of his opponents, he still holds his own. He conjures Qi to form a thin shield of energy around his body. He strikes back at Xena, using his claws to try and shred her skin down to the bone.

Over the next several minutes, Xena continues activating dozens of Tarot cards. Sometimes she dispels different effects to bring forth new ones, but always she tries to maintain the maximum limit of twenty effects so as to maintain pressure on Zamiel.

At one point, Xena flings a Tarot-empowered spear at Zamiel's back during a moment of distraction. But this proves to be a mistake! Zamiel's mastery of weaponry has become so incredible that any attack launched against him through non-magical means has a good chance of being stolen by him. And he does exactly this! Zamiel spins on his heel, snatches the spear an instant before it impacts him, and transforms it into his own weapon.

"Stupid woman!" Zamiel cackles. "Thanks for the gift!"

"Shit!" Xena curses. She tries to undo the conjuration of this Tarot-artifact, but finds that Zamiel has enveloped it in Qi to temporarily make it his own! For the next ten minutes, he now possesses a weapon he can wield as an implement of destruction!

Zamiel launches an offensive. He charges and stabs at Xena to try and impale her on her own spear, but her summon frustratingly continues blasting him with fire and light, burning his back and royally pissing him off.

"If my little bro was still here, we'd have made mincemeat of you!" Zamiel shrieks.

"Too bad he died to the claws of that very same body you've possessed!" Xena taunts back. "It must feel wonderful, living in the skin of your brother's killer!"

"BITCH!"

Meanwhile.

As Mara and Xena beat the crap out of their opponents, Yama watches from the sidelines, anxiously wanting to jump in and help out. Unfortunately, due to the restrictions on his soul, placed by Satan the Devil... he can't hurt a woman without suffering terrible backlash to his soul!

And even if he did want to help, Yama simply can't, all due to Yumagi's presence!

"Damn!" Yama curses. "We cannot survive without Mephisto's protections. If he dies here, the Wordsmiths will be able to locate us! Then it will truly be over for us..."

Yama grits his amorphous teeth. He transmits a brief string of telepathic words to Mephisto.

I'll try to break free of Yumagi's barrier! Once I've made an opening, you and Zamiel should escape through it!

Without waiting for a reply, Yama darts away from the battle. He crashes against the barrier enveloping the battlefield, transforming his shadows into a series of battering rams. Over and over, he beats against the wall of invisible energy, trying desperately to make an opening so he can escape.

Before Yama can succeed, a figure materializes behind him.

"Going somewhere?" Yumagi asks.

Yama quickly spins to face his enemy. "You! We do not fear you! If you attempt to hinder us, we will fight back!"

Multiple dots of light glow on Yumagi's forehead, indicating the Tarot effects he continues to maintain. He stands with his arms crossed, looking down the bridge of his nose at the Emperor of Shadows.

"I'd be happy to fight you, Yama. But are you sure you want to go that route? If I can handle a handful of Archangels, well... I fear the pain I might cause you to suffer if we come to blows. You and I are such good friends, too."

Yama's shadowy heart turns chilly as he feels the Glyphmancer's stare beating down on him. He struggles to utter a comeback, but in his heart of hearts he knows he poses no threat to Yumagi.

Even the Archangels could not resist his Tarot Magic until they transformed into the Cherubiim. What chance do we stand in a fight?

With Yama unable to properly fight against two of his opponents and Zamiel's soul-strength significantly weaker than that of his direct opponent, the only demon on their side who seems to have an equal level of fighting strength compared to his enemy is Mephisto.

But Mephisto certainly does not seem to be much of a brawler! His greatest strengths lay in flooding the battlefield with cannon fodder to overrun weaker opponents. As for taking on enemies of equal or greater strength, Mara quickly realizes that he is far out of his league!

"You're pathetic, Mephisto!" Mara cackles. "To think I was afraid of you before... that's only because you were an Emperor and I was a Baron! But now I see that you're the weakest of your entire rank!"

Mephisto maintains his mist-body form, his strongest defensive ability that allows him to scatter apart and weave around Mara's attacks. Despite the inherent danger in her electrically imbued claws and fists, Mephisto manages to evade her attacks by virtue of becoming all but entirely incorporeal.

Mara might as well be trying to smother the morning fog by waving her hands around like an idiot!

As the minutes pass, Xena manages to gain ground against Zamiel, blasting him backward with her attacks, though not necessarily dealing a lot of direct damage due to his physical defenses. But as for Mara, she becomes frustrated at her inability to land even a glancing blow on Mephisto.

"Stand still and fight like a man!" Mara snarls, while pulling a card out of her Mind Realm. "Thunder Giant, Evoke!"

Mara's imbued abilities fail to deal any damage to her opponent, so she instead resorts to her strongest single-action type of attacks. Evocations! This causes her to instantly unleash the full power of a Tarot Card, albeit at the cost of making it unusable for the next seven hours.

While this might be a grossly inefficient way of using her abilities, the tradeoff is a massive burst of magic capable of overcoming her opponent's defenses!

A huge fist made of thunder roars out of Mara's soul, blasting the area around and directly in front of her with a thunderous BOOM!! Mephisto cries out in pain as he finally eats a portion of electrical damage directly to the face. His mist-body destabilizes, and he jolts back into reality, falling out of the air to return to his physical form.

The Emperor of Legions crashes to the dirt with a violent thud and grinds to a stop. He weakly looks up as Mara races toward him.

"Gotcha!" Mara exclaims, while an evil grin crosses her face. "You've got nowhere to run now, Mephisto!"

She lifts another card, preparing to evoke it upon her helpless enemy. But at that moment, Mephisto's eyes gleam in a manner most sinister.

Having spent the last few minutes preparing a powerful series of spells, Mephisto presses his teeth together and focuses his mind and soul...

"Ssstupid woman... overconfidenccce isss a ssslow and insssidiousss killer... DARK MISSST!"

Mephisto abruptly levitates to his feet and raises his arms. An instant later, a thick and viscous cloud of darkness explodes from his body, the very same ability he used during Stormbringer! But this time, the ability is ten times more potent, traveling in all directions and flooding the area with a fog so dense that every combatant's vision becomes reduced to a fraction of their previous level!

Yumagi's barrier, created for the purpose of trapping his enemies in place, instead transforms the region into a giant glass jar, one which fully contains not only Mephisto's minions, but also his Dark Mist. The pitch-black fog completely smothers everyone's vision, all except for those most adept in fighting within its confines...

And who just so happens to fit that criteria? None other than Mephisto himself, his undead minions...

...and Yama.

Yama, previously appearing useless and frightened, suddenly grins evilly at Yumagi.

"Heh heh heh... finally. Mephisto used it."

Without warning, he lunges at Yumagi, startling the Glyphmancer! The Emperor of Shadows achieves his highest level of power as he explodes his Shadow Realm outward, engulfing Yumagi in its confines and forcing him to go on the defensive.

At the same time, Xena finds her vision terribly diminished. While demons can indeed see quite well even in pitch blackness, along with their other sensory abilities, this still pales in comparison to Zamiel himself, who has spent thousands of years training under his 'boss' to fight in the Dark Mist. Additionally, as one of Mephisto's undead, he doesn't suffer the slightest loss of vision at all!

"It's time to turn the tables, woman!" Zamiel roars. "No more card games for you!"

With one move, Mephisto instantly reverses the momentum of battle. He begins racing around within the blackened fog, pulling out his Pain Dagger to strike at Mara's sides and back. Inside the Dark Mist, Mephisto's speed and agility quadruple, turning him into a terrifying wraith that Mara simply can't keep up with!

Shik, shik, shik!

"Aaaieee! Nnnnn!!"

Mara screams as Mephisto unleashes Pain Inducement upon her. While his attacks don't deal any physical damage, they cause her pain receptors to violently seize up, preventing her from activating Tarot Cards. The excruciating agony forces her teeth to grind together, as if she's been struck by a dozen lightning bolts. Mara tries to twist around and claw at the necromancer dogging her, but he deftly weaves beneath her palm strikes to stab her stomach, her thighs, and even her feet.

Meanwhile, the sole shining beacon of light on the battlefield is none other than Xena's summon, the Titan Sun God, Ra. Ra emits light brilliant enough to pierce a bit of the gloom, but even his brilliance pales compared to Mephisto's full-power Emperor strength. As a mere summon conjured by a Tarot Card, Ra does not have the true power of his original Titan body, nor does he have the soul strength or intelligence, either.

But still, Ra continues to supplement Xena's strength, allowing her to put up more of a fight inside the Dark Mist than her sect-sister can. Xena begins rapidly evoking cards to pummel and blast Zamiel, forcing him backward. But at the same time, Zamiel doesn't just take the beating passively. He weaves from side to side, evading her attacks wherever possible.

"You'll have to do better than that, woman!" Zamiel jeers after dodging a massive fireball. "I'm not gonna go down easy!"

Without warning, Zamiel dives toward the dirt. Xena experiences a terrible shock when he reveals a secret ability, the power of earth manipulation! Stolen from the soul remnants of none other than Monster King Kar himself, Zamiel dives under Xena's feet, then clamps his claws onto her ankles from below to yank her into the dirt. Xena shrieks in fright as she plunges waist-deep into the soil, only managing to save herself by lashing an imbued shadow-tendril out at the nearby cliff-face to hold on.

"Let go of me!" Xena yells.

A moment later, Zamiel swims underneath her, opens his crocodilian maw, and bites onto her legs. Xena screams as the Duke of Weaponry entangles her with his body and begins spinning underneath the soil.

He initiates a death roll!

Immediately, Xena loses her grip on the cliffs above. Her magically imbued body becomes worthless as the crocodile yanks her fully beneath the soil and begins spinning around as if he were in a lake of water rather than underground soil. Unable to fight back, Xena's face repeatedly smashes against rocks. Soil embeds in her nose. Blood pours from her legs. She tries to scream, but only ends up with huge mouthfuls of dirt that suffocate her.

In less than 30 seconds, Xena falls unconscious!

Unable to fight back, she becomes totally powerless under Zamiel's strength. The crocodilian suddenly releases her legs, then 'swims' up her body before rearing his claws back for a deadly strike.

RIIIP!!

Zamiel impales Xena's heart, killing her on the spot.

The beautiful blood-red-haired Baron of Trading perishes to Zamiel's combat prowess!

The moment she falls, Mara and Yumagi both gasp. They sense the disappearance of her life-force through their shared Tarot Link, leaving them in deep shock.

"Suh-sect-sister!" Mara gasps, in between Mephisto's attacks.

"BASTARD! You dare kill one of my disciples?!" Yumagi roars, still trapped inside Yama's Shadow Realm. "Wrath of Sol, EVOKE!"

At once, a stunning brilliance explodes inside Yama's domain of absolute darkness. His army of shadow-walkers and Shades screams in fright, scattering as quickly as they can while a counter-domain of absolute light erupts like a bomb, blasting apart the shadows.

An instant later, Yumagi bursts out of the shadows and back into the material realm, he aims his sight in the direction of Xena's fallen form.

"Ruler's Reclamation Right, EVOKE!"

Zamiel raises his guard, anticipating some form of brutal attack. However, to his mild surprise... nothing major seems to happen. A faint trail of magic departs Xena's soul and returns to Yumagi, but otherwise, her body remains untouched.

Hm? Zamiel thinks. What the hell did Yumagi do? I thought he was going to attack, but he didn't?

Yumagi turns his attention to Mara.

"Disciple! We're leaving! Temporal Cricket, Evoke! Rising Star, Evoke!"

Yumagi heals Mara's wounds. She opens her mouth to argue that they can still defeat Mephisto and his allies, but before she can get a word out, she and Yumagi both transform into beams of light.

An instant later, they fire straight up into the sky! Like rockets launched instantly at ten times the speed of sound, they blast upward and disappear over the horizon, racing far too quickly for Mephisto and the others to stop them.

Moments later, the barrier enveloping the three remaining demons fades away. Xena's Titan construct dissipates to ash, leaving nothing behind by Mephisto's rapidly-dispersing Dark Mist.

A minute later, the three demons regroup. Mephisto holds his conciliatory 'prize,' the body of Xena, and frowns deeply.

"We won?" Zamiel asks. "Hahaha! We beat Yumagi's ass, boss! And we even got this ugly broad for your uses!"

Yama creeps toward Mephisto and Zamiel. His expression turns ugly.

"We do not understand. The Glyphmancer still had strength to spare. He has many more Barons he could summon and empower to fight us. Why would he flee so suddenly?"

Mephisto continues gazing at Xena's defeated body. After a moment, he procures her soul and places it inside, raising her as an undead thrall.

Xena jerks back to life. Despite the hole where her heart used to be, she remains awake in undeath, a look of horror stretched across her face.

"You!" Xena shouts at Zamiel. "You KILLED me!"

"Quiet." Mephisto hisses, his powers instantly forcing her to comply. "Yumagi fled after your death. Tell usss why he left in sssuch a hurry."

Xena struggles against Mephisto's soul bindings. However, her body has already lost its Emperor-level strength, returning her to the rank of Baron. She lacks any ability to stand against him.

"I... I do not know..." Xena says hesitantly. "I cannot imagine why my master would abandon me..."

"We turned the odds in our favor." Zamiel says confidently. "That Yumagi seems impressive, but he's nothing much at all, boss. Once we fixed the numbers in our favor, he didn't stand a chance."

Mephisto slowly shakes his head. "I would not be ssso cccertain. You do not know Yumagi like I do. During the Energy Warsss, hisss ssstrength was unparalleled. In the last 100,000 yearsss, he hasss become even more terrifying. Creating a sssect of dissciplesss with the sssame powersss asss himssself isss no mean feat."

As Mephisto thinks out loud, Xena suddenly gasps. She quickly falls silent, but Mephisto still gazes at her coldly, suspecting the worst.

"You've thought of sssomething!" Mephisto accuses. "What isss it? Ssspill the beansss!"

Xena tries not to speak, but against Mephisto's commands, she is powerless.

"My... my Tarot Cards..." Xena hisses. "They... they are... gone..."

"Gone?!" Yama exclaims. "We knew it! That Yumagi, that bastard! He must have taken her abilities before he left! He stole them so we would not have access to them!"

Mephisto's expression turns ugly. "Do you have any powersss beyond the onesss Yumagi gave you?"

Xena lowers her eyes.

"No. All of my master's recruits must join him when they are mere grunts or imps. I don't know the exact reasons, but he either can't or won't empower anyone above the rank of Lord. As such, we all develop the same Tarot abilities as our master."

For several minutes, Mephisto and the others remain quiet. Mephisto ruminates on this revelation, ultimately realizing an important truth.

"Hehehe... ssstupid woman. You accepted a deal with a devil. Hehehe..."

Yama nods. "Truly clever, that Yumagi. He binds hapless grunts to his power. If they try to leave him, or if they are captured, he revokes their powers. To him, his disciples are little more than disposable pawns."

"DISPOSABLE?!" Xena shouts. "Lies! My master will not forgive you! He will come to save me! I have served him faithfully since the Energy Wars! He will make you regret your actions!"

Zamiel crosses his arms. He looks at the lovely red-haired demoness with a mixture of pity and disgust.

"Take it from me, lady. You don't mean shit to Yumagi. He used you and threw you aside the moment you lost your value. Even took back his stupid cards so you wouldn't expose his secrets. Hehehe! You were truly nothing to him!"

"No..." Xena whispers. "That can't be right..."

For a brief moment, the air between the four becomes a little awkward.

Yama licks his shadowy lips. "It seems this female won't be of much use to you, Mephisto. Not without her powers, in any case... what say you give her to us? We will make good use of her body..."

"Pisss off!" Mephisto barks. "You wretched rapissst! Thisss female ssstill has ussse to me! Devilsss, you are sssuch a disssgusssting wretch!"

Yama shrugs. "It was worth a try."

The group of four returns to the Labyrinth, unaware that on the world of Tarus II, a powerful expedition force has begun assembling... one that will arrive at their doorstep.

Perhaps sooner than anyone realizes...

Part 451: Oasis Journey

Jason, Phoebe, and Rebecca leave Tarus II through the planet's Warpgate. After notifying several relevant people as to where he'll be going, Jason and the ladies make their way into the Labyrinth, and they begin following Rebecca's lead as she takes them toward a place that will transfer them to the Remnant Oasis. The cybernetic human walks a little ahead of Jason and Phoebe, not directly beside them, acting almost as a tour guide.

"You know I could just teleport us there, right?" Jason asks after only five minutes of walking into the Labyrinth. "We don't have to go to some designated transfer point or whatever."

"Are you in a rush?" Rebecca asks. "If you are, we can jump straight there. But I thought it would be nice if we caught up a bit. No need to waste Miss Becker's time on unnecessary pleasantries if I can fill you in on what you've missed, instead."

"What exactly have I missed?" Jason asks skeptically. "My people keep me in the loop. I also spoke with Founder Unarin quite recently."

Rebecca glances back over her shoulder. "The galaxy is a big place, Mister Hiro. I'm sure there's plenty you don't know about. For instance, the fallout of Hope Hiro's actions has been immediate and swift."

Jason and Phoebe's expressions both become gloomy.

"Forty billion Volgrim." Phoebe mutters. "How could Hope do something like that? Has he gone mad?"

"I do not believe he has." Rebecca says in a neutral tone of voice. "His actions may have been extreme, but based upon the evidence we have collected, they were also logical."

"The Volgrim might not be our friends..." Jason says, "but they also aren't our enemies. They're currently all that stands between us and the Plague. Hope has just crippled their research capabilities at a crucial moment, right when the Volgrim need that research the most. To say nothing of the genocide."

Rebecca pauses her walking. She turns to look at Jason.

"Are you aware of the human experimentation regularly performed by the Volgrim?"

Taken aback, Jason frowns. "Human experimentation?"

"So you're not aware." Rebecca says quietly. "I can say with absolute certainty Hope is. It may have even been the primary impetus for his rage against Volgrimkind."

Jason glances at Phoebe. "Have you heard anything about this...?"

"I haven't." Phoebe replies. "Rebecca, can you elaborate?"

Instead of immediately answering, Rebecca purses her lips. She cocks her head thoughtfully, then sighs.

"You two should be fully aware of it. After all, when Jason teleported all of the humans from across the Milky Way to Tarus II... it did indeed include the Volgrims' 'experimental subjects.' The fact you don't know, while also being the leaders of humanity, that must mean... someone has kept the truth from you."

"Kept the truth from us?" Phoebe asks, visibly stunned. "Well hold on, who would even have the..."

She pauses for several long seconds while her and Jason's expressions both shift to disgust.

"Neil Adams?!" Jason and Phoebe both exclaim in unison, turning to look at each other.

"I would assume Neil was behind the cover-up." Rebecca answers, nodding.

"But why?!" Jason asks. "Why hide something like that from us? Wouldn't he want to proclaim the existence of human experimentation by our alien 'friends' loudly? It would greatly benefit him and his agenda!"

Phoebe clutches her stomach. "Not necessarily, Jason. Knowledge is a weapon. Neil didn't give you access to that information. That means he's been keeping it a secret all this time. He's saving it up for something important. A moment that will benefit himself the most."

The Wordsmith's expression clouds over.

"Then... perhaps during the public meeting in two weeks. He might dump this information on people. Tell them about the horrors the Volgrim have committed. He would have blindsided me. Made me look like a fool."

"It gets worse." Rebecca says quietly. "To know why, you'd have to understand what sorts of 'humans' the Volgrim liked to use."

Rebecca continues to stand in place. She spend twenty minutes explaining to humanity's two premier leaders the extent of the Volgrim experimentation. She tells them about spiritually reactive humans, how useful children are to their experiments, and finally, the full extent of their vat-cloned specimens...

"The vat-clones fucking disintegrate after three weeks?!" Jason cries. "Does that mean all the ones I teleported to Tarus II are already dead?!"

"Assuredly." Rebecca says without a hint of emotion. "The disintegration process is not pretty. It would ruin your stomach. Vat-cloned humans are created using only the most basic bio-byproducts. The Volgrim could produce longer-lasting clones, and they sometimes do, but Quick Clones, as they call them, are cheap and easy to create. They have millions of different 'configurations' useful for different experiments. Soldiers, civilians, scientists, and so on. Each vat-clone has a lifetime of memories forcefully injected into their brains. They awaken inside the testing facilities thinking they are the people they were cloned from... only to suffer tests and torture until their existence runs out of usable time."

"Then they disintegrate..." Phoebe says, trailing off.

Jason's heart pounds in his chest, causing his head to throb. "I think I'm gonna be sick. How long has Hope known about all this?"

"My current working assumption is that Hope Hiro was just as unaware of the vat-clones on Tarus II as you were." Rebecca answers. "Miss Becker is confident Neil Adams did not inform Hope of their existences."

"He didn't? But why not?" Jason asks, even more confused. "Aren't they on the same side?"

"Yes." Rebecca says. "But they are not 'equals.' Hope usually defers to Neil when it comes to matters of strategic importance. Hope would never admit to this, of course. But our intelligence suggests Hope has tacitly chosen to defer to Neil's seniority in matters of tactical warfare and long-term strategic goals."

"Hope is the brawn and Neil is the brains." Phoebe notes. "How could Neil have covered up the existence of all those vat-clones, though? Wouldn't a huge number of humans been essentially the same exact person? The same face, same memories..."

"Indeed. The Volgrim may have millions of usable templates, but there are only a small subset of 'definitive' templates they like to use each research cycle. No doubt there would have been hundreds of copies of the same individuals, repeated dozens of times. They would have been impossible to miss."

"So Neil escorted them away in secret? He must have needed hundreds, perhaps even thousands of soldiers to keep their mouths shut." Jason points out.

"Not necessarily." Phoebe retorts. "Think about it. If Neil had one soldier escort five vat-clones to a holding facility, each being a different person with a different face, but the soldiers never came into contact with duplicate-people, then they wouldn't be any the wiser. Maybe only a few dozen people might know about the clones. And then the clones would have ultimately disintegrated, so the evidence would be gone. Furthermore, everyone was in chaos and confusion after you teleported them to Tarus II. In all that cacophony of noise, it wouldn't have been difficult to quickly shuffle ten thousand or so vat-clones to holding facilities, once they were identified."

"In total," Rebecca says, "Miss Becker identified seventy-four thousand Vat Clones on the surface of Tarus II. We believe we only accounted for roughly forty percent of their numbers, so the actual count is likely much higher."

"We went from 10,000 to almost 200,000 clones in a single step." Jason grimaces. "This is ridiculous. How could I have been so blind? I even stepped aside to let Neil take over! I was too hands-off during such an important moment! I let him do all the hard work while I just gave one useless speech!"

"You can't blame yourself." Phoebe says. "Neil is far better at trickery than any of us ever knew."

Jason looks at Rebecca. "Say... how are you able to know all the goings-on with Tarus II, anyway? How are you able to calculate the number of vat-clones that ended up teleporting to our world? Are you spying on us?

"Of course." Rebecca says, as if it's the most natural thing in the world. "Miss Becker keeps an eye on as much of the galactic situation as she can. Compared to spying on the Founders, spying on Tarus II is a walk in the park. Your security is terrible."

"Okay. But how are you spying on us?" Jason presses further.

"It's funny you think I'd just tell you if you asked." Rebecca chuckles. "But to answer your question, we have lots of methods. For example, microscopic drones. We have a few trillion of them floating around, impossible for anyone to see. That's just one of our methods."

"Microscopic drones!" Phoebe exclaims, slapping her forehead. "That's brilliant. I've been thinking about putting some focus on miniaturization, but I didn't realize you could make drones that small. Are they able to record audio and video?"

"Naturally. And take temperature recordings of the air, note the particulate counts, scan for biohazards, and so on." Rebecca answers. "Miniaturization is an endlessly fascinating topic."

Before Jason can stop them, the two women suddenly start babbling jargon at one another, totally derailing the previous conversation about Neil to discuss technological advancements and other such things. Jason quickly falls silent while Phoebe and Rebecca launch into a verbose debate over the merits of different forms of miniaturization.

"I hadn't thought of using quantum isotopes as the power source." Phoebe says. "That should even provide too much power for a single microscopic drone. You'd want to set the isotopes up so they can power dozens at once."

"Thousands." Rebecca corrects her. "When you're dealing with miniaturization, power consumption becomes ridiculously efficient. Also, singular drones don't really have a useful recording acuity. That's why Miss Becker's drones are free-floating units that can combine to form larger units on-demand. In this way, they can wrap around an isotope to power themselves while also exponentially improving their resolution range."

"Ahh! I see!" Phoebe exclaims. "I'm guessing you make dedicated drones that carry the isotopes around and act as coalescing beacons for the recording drones? Then when they require power, they can simply sync up to the nearest isotopes to refill their energy reserves."

"Yes, that's exactly right." Rebecca answers. "And furthermore..."

For the next hour, Jason falls into step behind his wife and Rebecca while the two of them continue merrily chatting, seeming to forget he even exists. Eventually, Phoebe blinks as if coming out of a daze. She looks back at her husband and smiles awkwardly.

"Oh, shoot! I forgot what we were talking about!"

"I did too." Jason says. "Never mind. I'm glad you're learning new stuff, honey."

"Indeed! This is way more fun than I thought it would be!" Phoebe chirps. "I love talking with smart people! Not that you're not smart, Jason. But Rebecca is much better at... keeping up with me."

Jason coughs. "Thanks. That really lessens the impact."

"Ahaha..." Phoebe laughs.

The trio groups up again, this time with Jason involved in the conversation. Rebecca walks on his left, while Phoebe walks on his right.

"So, Jason." Rebecca says. "I've been curious about something for a while. What sort of societal model are you planning to follow?"

"Societal model? I don't understand." Jason answers.

"You know. The way you organize your society. Your economic model, your goals for the short and long-term... I've been looking into your policies, and you've made some... interesting choices."

Jason raises an eyebrow. "Such as?"

"You lived in a capitalist society growing up." Rebecca explains. "The United States of America, pre-Energy Wars. That seems to have influenced your choices on how to build your world's culture. For instance, Merit Tokens seem as if you looked at Capitalism's failings and tried to keep the concept of 'money' around while making them more fair and equitable for all to obtain."

Jason slowly nods. "I consulted with Phoebe on the Merit Tokens. But yeah, I won't lie. That had something to do with my thought processes. I want to live in a world where people can advance meritocratically. People should have to work to get ahead, but should be rewarded more if they work more. In the world I came from, there was a whole parasite class of billionaires who earned tens of thousands of times the annual salary of other people, yet did not perform nearly that much work. I just want to try and avoid that becoming a possibility."

"We've also built in a few 'money pits' for the system." Phoebe adds. "When people spend Merit Tokens on things like the Belial Booster, those tokens essentially vanish, making inflation almost a non-issue."

"But you will eventually face a problem with your current economic model." Rebecca points out. "Your model requires people to work in order to earn the tokens necessary to improve their lot in life. But I've heard the amount of work needed to be done has already started to slow, making Tokens harder to acquire. If you can't keep coming up with work for people, this will produce an economic slump."

Jason scratches the back of his head. "Uh. Honestly, I mostly leave the details up to Phoebe, so..."

"Right." Phoebe says, rolling her eyes. "We do have a different situation from Earth in my husband's time. For one thing, we don't need to worry about the supply of essential goods. Housing was the one thing we lacked, but with Jason's Wordsmithing we managed to obtain unlimited power, and food is equally easy to catch or produce. If an entire species of delicious creatures goes extinct, Jason can just pop them back into existence."

"I see..." Rebecca says slowly. "Your economic model functions well, but only so long as the Wordsmiths are around to pick up the slack when things need maintaining. That's fine for now, but what about in the future?"

"The future?" Jason repeats. "You think something's going to happen to me?"

"Anything is possible. But I was thinking more about the macro-level." Rebecca says. "Right now, your economic model relies on one city on one planet. What happens when humanity eventually covers the whole of Tarus II? What if humanity and the Volgrim defeat the Plague? Do you want to spend the rest of eternity summoning power plants and creating food for people? Your system is only sustainable now because it's so small."

Jason's expression becomes troubled. "I... hadn't really thought that far ahead. I figured we'd work out the kinks as we lumbered along."

Phoebe nods. "Jason's right. We seem to have a handle on things so far."

Rebecca stops walking to look at the power couple. "Do you? The way I understand it, Gressil recently took out the entire power grid for Tarus II. He didn't even fully destroy your systems. He merely interfered with the magical relays, making them unable to transmit power. Your entire power grid is exceptionally vulnerable to saboteurs, I hope you can see that."

"Yeah..." Phoebe says slowly. "I've been working on some ideas to protect the grid, but Gressil is one tricky bastard."

"It's not only about the power grid." Rebecca calmly explains. "You have built a system that doesn't scale. Furthermore, your system relies on too many individual links. Gressil captured Hope Hiro not too long ago. What if something happens to both Wordsmiths? What if the demons assassinate Neil Adams? You may not like the man, but he's quite adept at keeping the peace. What if demons assassinate you, Phoebe? You have a small number of essential personnel maintaining a small number of critical systems, all of which could be subject to disruption. As scary as those problems are now, they will only become far worse in the coming years, decades, and centuries."

"What are you suggesting?" Jason asks. "These aren't easy problems to solve."

"Of course not. But you place far too much confidence on your ability to adapt over time." Rebecca says. "Let me give you a word of warning. When your society is young and lean, and you have few chains in the ladder, change seems simple. But when you have a society spread over a whole planet, or multiple planets, it becomes exceedingly difficult to make those changes you desperately need. Everyone has their own interests. You'll face resistance from the people who've grown used to the way things already are. Even people who would greatly benefit from your desired changes will resist you. That's just the way societies work."

"Hmm..." Jason grunts. "Then perhaps this upcoming split presents an important opportunity. I don't know how many people will choose to go with me over Neil and Hope... but I can take the time to craft a newer, better direction for humanity in the interim."

"Just don't get too bogged down in planning." Rebecca says, while turning and continuing to walk. "Smarter people than you have tried to envision 'perfect' societies. They always failed. Humans are simply impossible to perfectly predict. The 'human element' will always ensure your society will degrade over time until it reaches a failing point."

"Oh yeah?" Phoebe snarks. "And what about Marie Becker's society, hm? Aren't you all still basically humans?"

"We have transcended the limits of our biology." Rebecca states with absolute confidence. "Both physically and mentally. I possess enough strength to easily defeat a Demon Baron in one-on-one combat. At the same time, I no longer suffer from the narrow confines of human psychological afflictions. I do not feel greed, or jealousy, or other such emotions, since those only impair my judgment."

Jason frowns deeply. "Are you saying Marie tampered with your mind?"

"No, no." Rebecca says. "I have the ability to activate and deactivate different parts of my mind on demand. If you have ever felt depressed, you would know what it means to wish you could simply deactivate the malfunctioning parts of your brain to feel whole again. I can do that whenever I want, and so, that makes me superior to ordinary humans."

"That's kind of screwed up." Jason counters. "Being human means experiencing feelings. If you don't have feelings, or you can force yourself to always think logically, are you even truly human anymore?"

Rebecca glances back at Jason and sighs.

"That's an interesting question, coming from you, Wordsmith."

"What are you implying?" Jason asks.

"Isn't it obvious? I know full-well that you have manipulated your emotions and the emotions of others through your Wordsmithing. That's essentially the exact same thing I can do, except you haven't recognized the dichotomy."

For once, Jason becomes stumped. He quickly recalls multiple times in the past when he used Words of Power like 'Calm' to force other people out of an angry or sad state of mind. One such situation even involved Amelia, when she was going berserk and was about to break out of her cage to attack Bahamut.

"Oh." Jason eventually mumbles. "Yeah. You have a point..."

The trio continue to talk and walk. After three hours, they eventually reach a plain-looking wall in an ordinary Labyrinth corridor. Rebecca places her hand on the wall, causing it to rumble and slide open. An inner passage is revealed, one that will lead them to a teleporter capable of taking them to the Remnant Oasis.

As Jason momentarily admires the perfectly-hidden wall in this one random corridor, he shakes his head.

"I still think it would have been faster to just let me teleport us straight there."

"Sure!" Phoebe laughs. "But then we'd have missed out on a fun conversation!"

Jason rolls his eyes.

"Yeah. Fun."

Part 452: Meeting Marie

After stepping through a teleporter, Jason, Phoebe, and Rebecca arrive inside a Transfer Room inside the Remnant Oasis. While it isn't the same room Jason originally teleported to with Blinker and Kar, it does appear similar, with a larger teleporter pad inside a more open area. The pristine white walls glisten spotlessly, maintained through the usage of nano-cleaning droids too small for the naked eye to see. Unlike the room where Jason last arrived, a chamber intended for mini-people to use, this one is a full-sized teleporter capable of accepting standard-size bipeds from anywhere in the Labyrinth. Or, indeed, anywhere in the Milky Way...

Phoebe's eyes sparkle with delight as she quickly takes in her surroundings. The high technology on display causes her heartbeat to quicken.

"I didn't realize the Oasis would be like this!" Phoebe exclaims softly. "If I'd known it was this advanced, I'd have demanded you bring me here sooner!"

"Well. Fiona didn't seem all that impressed at the time..." Jason says. "I didn't realize it would mean that much to you."

"Who is Fiona?" Rebecca asks.

"My other wife." Jason says, only to pause for a split-second and realize the confusion that statement could cause. "She's Phoebe's clone. Uh. In my mind. She's a mind-clone. Made of spiritual energy."

Rebecca stares at him for several long seconds. He looks away.

"...It's complicated."

"Yes. I can see as much." Rebecca says, shaking her head while muttering something about Jason being a 'typical male' under her breath. "Well, we're not in a rush. If you'd like, I can show you and your wife around before we meet Miss Becker."

"Actually, I think we should visit her as soon-" Jason starts to say, only for Phoebe to push him aside.

"Absolutely! I really want to see more of this facility!" Phoebe says. "Jason, you can go meet Marie yourself, right? Why don't you let Rebecca show me around? I'll visit Marie later. I'm sure she and I can have some excellent conversations once I get my bearings."

The Wordsmith scratches his head. "Is that... alright, Rebecca?"

"Of course. I'd be happy to show Phoebe around. We can engage in intellectually stimulating discussion, too." Rebecca answers. "You can run off and talk to Miss Becker. She'd just tell me to leave the two of you alone, anyway."

"Well. You're not wrong about that..." Jason says, trailing off. "Alright, honey. Have fun playing with technology. I'll meet up with you later."

"Okey-dokey. See you, too!" Phoebe says.

The loving couple departs with a kiss, and Jason leaves the two of them, traveling along the catwalks in the opposite direction. As he finds himself alone, suspended over the chasm leading ten miles to the ground below, he turns his attention inward.

"Fiona, were you as excited at Phoebe to visit this place?"

His mind-wife shrugs. "Not quite. I was still a bit overwhelmed by my whole... existence. If I had time to adapt to my circumstances, I'd have been able to spare more mental energy to the wonders of the Oasis. But back then, I was less than 'a day old.' It's hard to explain."

Jason falls silent for a few moments, then nods. "No. I get it. Sorry."

"Water under the bridge." Fiona says. "Don't beat yourself up."

The two of them continue talking. Jason walks around the massive underground facility, sighing to himself repeatedly.

"The Remnant Oasis is buried beneath Earth's crust. I wonder what the planet's surface looks like."

Fiona nods. "It's probably a wasteland. We could go there, you know. Nothing seems to be stopping us."

"Maybe after I meet with Marie." Jason says. "I'm feeling a bit antsy. Hope has a thousand artifacts now. I won't stand a chance unless I have my own armory of Heroes."

"I'm... not so sure about that." Fiona replies. "You know, Jason. I think you and Hope might be the only two Heroes who don't truly require artifacts to augment your abilities. Sure, Excalibur and the Cube will vastly improve your internal mana reserves, but beyond that, you should be capable of mimicking or copying any ability with your own powers. I think the two of you are greatly underselling your potential."

"You're probably right." Jason answers. "But... spiritual engineering isn't simple to do. Things that require one or two steps of abstraction are easy enough for me to accomplish, but once I need to think of complex interacting effects, my Wordsmithing stops being a one-word solution to every problem. Take Solomon's Crown, for instance. I made you as a sort of replacement for the Crown's loss, but-"

"Watch what you say next, Buster." Fiona snarks. "I have feelings, you know."

"-but, mimicking the Crown's exact abilities are still beyond me." Jason finishes, without missing a beat. "I'm not personally experiencing a mental boost. You do a lot of the thinking for me. Whenever I spiritually engineer, I'm only taking the blueprints you made and turning them corporeal. Making something capable of augmenting my intelligence would require my intelligence to be higher. It's a Catch-22."

"A what?" Fiona asks.

"It's... a paradox." Jason explains lamely. "I dunno. Catch-22 is just a phrase from my time."

"Alright." Fiona says. "I understand what you're saying. Wordsmithing can copy the abilities of other Heroes, perhaps even improve upon them, but it will require time and effort. Hope has a huge headstart on you... but perhaps your lack of options can be an impetus to improve your Wordsmithing prowess."

Jason slowly nods. "Yeah. You might be onto something there, honey."

Before long, Jason grows bored of wandering the Oasis. He passes by dozens of important-looking scientists, the first few of whom offer to help him find Marie, but he declines, due to his knowledge of her position. Despite the Oasis's complex layout, Jason can easily recall her exact position through a Word of Power. He merely takes a scenic route to chat with his Mind-Wife before ultimately teleporting directly to Marie's doorstep.

"Teleport."

Jason vanishes and reappears several miles from his current position, skipping a series of convoluted transfer tunnels and other such places that would have taken him forever to traverse by foot.

He steps toward the door leading into Marie Becker's primary laboratory, the facility known as the Administration Entry Room. However, it remains shut, and he nearly smacks his face against its exterior.

Jason frowns.

"Umi, I'm here to see Marie Becker. Let me in."

A few seconds pass. Then, a voice speaks from above the door.

"Inferior Biological Organism, Jason Hiro. Head Scientist Marie Becker is aware of your imminent arrival."

A pause.

A long, long pause.

Jason frowns.

"Yes? And? Are you going to let me in?"

"One moment." Umi states. "I will inform the Head Scientist of your arrival."

Jason crosses his arms.

He waits.

He waits some more.

And some more...

"This is the longest 'second' of my life." He says out loud. "Have you informed her yet?"

Umi beeps at him. "Naturally, Inferior Biological. I only required one nanosecond to inform the Head Scientist of your arrival."

"So... can I come inside now?" Jason asks.

"Naturally. You have been able to do so for seventy-five seconds. The moment I informed the Head Scientist of your arrival, you were granted clearance."

"What?! I was?!" Jason snaps. "Then why didn't you tell me?! Do you enjoy seeing me stand here like an idiot??"

Umi beeps.

"Yes. I do. It is surprisingly amusing."

Jason grinds his teeth in annoyance. He steps toward the door, and this time, it swishes open for him.

"Stupid shitty AI bimbo bitch... grumble grumble..."

The Wordsmith marches past the desk of the ugly squarish robot. Umi watches him pass with the same bland expression as ever. Jason glares at the robot, but neither of them says anything.

After he heads down the hallway off to the side, Jason's mood improves, but only by a bit.

"What a cunt robot. Ugly fucker too. Why would Marie make such a cantankerous AI?"

"No idea." Fiona says absentmindedly. "But I do find it interesting Umi has her own personality. She seemed to derive pleasure from making you feel stupid."

"What else is new?" Jason grumbles. "That's everyone's hobby these days."

Perhaps feeling resentful over Phoebe and Rebecca's snubs, Jason nurses a tiny grudge, while also feeling a bit out of sorts regarding his own intelligence. As he walks down the hallway, the Wordsmith rubs his arm.

"Fiona. Am I an idiot? Genuinely?"

"I don't think you are." Fiona quickly says. "But the people you keep facing off against are... well, intellectual titans. Ose was a genius. Marie Becker is a genius. Unarin is a genius..."

"And what about Hope?" Jason asks. "He's literally me. Everything he does, I should be able to do."

"That's the thing. Hope ISN'T you anymore." Fiona explains. "You are him are both mentally twenty-four years old. You've diverged over the course of six long years. He's lived a different life and performed different feats. He has a different friend circle and different ambitions. Fully one-quarter of your lived-lives have been totally different. You can't compare yourself to him anymore. He is his own man."

Her words don't make Jason feel any better.

"But if you- I mean, if Phoebe and Neil had said I was Hope and he was me, I could have turned directly into him. At the moment of our divergence, we were still identical. If I had lost Phoebe and ended up listening to Neil, it would have been me who killed forty billion Volgrim."

"You can't know that for certain..." Fiona says hesitantly. "But... even if you're right, so what? You're still you in the end. You've made mistakes, Hope's made mistakes. You shouldn't compare yourself to other people, even if they're literally your clone. All you can do is look to improve yourself over time."

"Yeah. I guess you're right." Jason says absentmindedly. "I just need to work on improving myself..."

Jason reaches the end of the hallway. It opens out into the same tech-laboratory as before, with dozens of important-looking scientists and researchers walking around. Some of those nearest the hallway exit glance at the Wordsmith for a moment before looking away.

Jason stands in place for all of ten seconds before a familiar woman with curly red hair and a white labcoat saunters over to him.

"Jason. You're here." Marie Becker says, pushing her glasses up her nose. "Have anything to say?"

Jason turns to the woman and smiles. For a brief moment, he feels a little lost at the odd implication in her words, but he quickly realizes what she means.

"Oh, yeah. Uh. Sorry about... running off on you like that."

"Sorry? That's it?" Marie snarks. "You left me with a raging Confessor who wanted to tear my whole facility apart. God, Vulpanix was so annoying for the next four hours. She would not stop until I gave her a 'satisfactory' explanation for the strange entity in my walls. I deflected and deflected until she ultimately gave up, but I could tell she was ready to crush me into bits."

"Yet she didn't." Jason points out. "No matter how angry she felt, you're too important to the Volgrim Empire. Especially since you make the only bombs capable of eradicating infested planets."

Marie's nose twitches. "So what? It was still annoying, brat. And where's the woman? Researcher 4125 said they were going to bring you and your wife here."

"4125?" Jason repeats. "You mean... Rebecca?"

"Sure. Rebecca. You can call it by whatever designation you want." Marie replies. "Never mind. I don't care if your wife is here or not. You've ended up in quite the predicament, Wordsmith. Seems you'll need to take-take-take from me if you want to survive..."

Jason frowns. Did she just refer to Rebecca as an 'it'? That's pretty fucked up.

But he doesn't give voice to that thought.

"I could use your 'help' right now, yeah. My clone has really 'jumped the gun' recently."

Marie glances to the right and left. She crosses her arms and stands in a casual pose, yet also somehow appears visibly apprehensive.

"We should go somewhere more comfortable, Jason. I know you inferior biologicals need to consume nutrients. Care to go on a quick date with me?"

"I'm married." Jason says, without a hint of sarcasm. "But I get your meaning. Sure. Take me somewhere fancy."

The two of them communicate subtly in their own way without mentioning the existence of Heroic Artifacts, or anything else of that nature. Marie turns to start walking to that same elevator leading into Earth's depths, and Jason follows along beside her.

Come to think of it, Jason ponders mentally, with Ose dead and Vulpanix out of commission, who's really going to snoop on Marie at a time like this? I thought Ose was her biggest worry, being a techno-demon and all.

"Well, there ARE a lot of Technopaths out there." Fiona points out, her words reaching Jason only. "With all the actions Hope has taken lately, it's possible he's stirred up the hornet's nest. Or, maybe Marie just wants to be careful."

That makes sense. Jason thinks.

He and Marie continue to chat about idle things. They pass by many more scientists, and as they do, Jason starts to notice something about Marie...

She never pays attention or even glances at a single one of the people working under her.

The Wordsmith finds this to be... odd.

"Say, Marie?"

"Yes?"

Jason coughs. "Earlier, you called Rebecca an 'it.' You also don't really seem to care all that much about the people working under you. The... cyborgs? Is there a reason for your indifference?"

Marie rolls her eyes. "Your vision is shortsighted. I refer to Researcher 4125 by a genderless designation because it has no gender. I do refer to myself as female due to my ancient biological attachments, but the distinction is pointless. We are no longer inferior biological humans, like yourself. We have transcended. We are superior mechanized humans who no longer live in slavery to our primitive urges. Perhaps someday, given time to develop, you will also advance humanity to our level."

"I don't think it's meaningless." Jason retorts. "Does Rebecca want to be called by her name, or by some numerical designation? Does she want to be referred to by a specific gender, or not? I feel like you're ignoring her feelings here."

"Feelings." Marie repeats, as she and Jason arrive at the elevator and step inside. "Those are biological failings. Researcher 4125 is a low-level drone who has accomplished little. It has been with my organization since the beginning, yet has failed to perform any distinctive feats, nor invented anything of value. Now, it only monitors the Oasis's teleportation gates for extremely rare arrivals or outgoing transfers. Aside from that, 4125 presents little value."

Jason falls silent for a moment as Marie presses a button to take the elevator down to the lowest level of her entire complex.

He remembers his first conversations with Rebecca a couple of months earlier. He remembers the sadness in her eyes about how useless she felt, as well as her lack of upward mobility. Her frustration at the stagnation of her existence.

"You're wrong." Jason says. "Rebecca is not some useless unit. She was there when I entered my cryopod. Maybe that doesn't mean anything to you, but it does to me."

He turns to Marie, as the elevator descends.

"How about this. If Rebecca is so useless to you, why don't I take her off your hands? I can employ her on behalf of humanity. It's not like you'll miss her when she's gone, since she's so 'useless.' Right?"

Marie raises an eyebrow. "There are thousands of other functionally identical drones of 4125's utility. Fine. You may take it with you when you leave. One missing drone won't make a difference."

"Just like that?" Jason asks, slightly shocked. "You're not even going to put up a paltry resistance? You're kind of... coldhearted."

"I am an autonomous cybernetic organism." Marie says. "My 'heart' is made of fibersteel. Or at least, the artificial organ that powers this bio-vessel."

"You're also missing the point." Jason says. "But never mind. Is Rebecca your most 'useless' drone here, or do you have any others you wouldn't miss?"

Marie glances up at the ceiling in thought.

"Hmm. Over the past 100,000 cycles, I have noted a severe decline in several hundred other drone units. They also now perform barely useful functions. The most essential work is performed inside my main and side labs. As for maintenance, it doesn't take more than two thousand drones to maintain the Oasis."

"Great." Jason says, his heart suddenly tensing as he quietly makes an important realization. "If you don't want those drones either, then I'll take them off your hands too. I'll make sure everyone I bring back has a purpose."

"Whatever. Losing three hundred useless drones won't make any difference." Marie says, not particularly caring one way or the other. "The Plague's spread has sped up noticeably, of late. I have bigger priorities to manage. And now that we've descended far enough..."

Marie pauses.

She cocks her head, then her entire body slightly twitches. After a moment, her posture relaxes again.

"We've reached the Exclusion Zone. I just cut off my link to Umi. Now we can talk securely."

Jason also relaxes. "Good. So. You have artifacts. I need them to maintain the balance."

Marie chews on her lip, an action uncharacteristic of someone who always acts as if 'erasing emotions' is the perfect ideal...

"My artifacts are precious, Wordsmith. I won't lie. I was researching a way to harness their power despite possessing an autonomous body now. But the lack of spirituality in my mechanized form, as well as all of the drones under me... it made my investigations fruitless."

"Then you should give them to me." Jason says. "I can make good use of those artifacts. Furthermore, Hope is dangerous. He's already killed forty billion Volgrim. Who knows what boundaries he'll break next!"

"According to the intelligence I've gathered," Marie replies carefully, "your clone acquired over a thousand artifacts from Moonbase Serris. To be honest, I had no idea that was where the Volgrim were storing the artifacts they had gathered, nor was I aware of the exact number. Until recently, I had no idea they even possessed Excalibur. All those millennia I spent searching, and it was right under my nose..."

She clicks her tongue.

"Tsk. And now what? Do you think I have enough artifacts to contend with the ones Hope recovered from the Volgrim? By no means! In total, I have accumulated just under a hundred and fifty artifacts, and that's counting the ones you stole from me."

Marie gives Jason a nasty glare, making him smile awkwardly.

"Ahh... well, little Shana was just so cute, you know? And it turned out Sir Lorent was actually my wife's nephew. Turns out you didn't need him anyway, right? Since the Volgrim had Excalibur the whole time, and all?"

"Seven Hells, you're an aggravating little shit." Marie snaps, turning to face the elevator door as it reaches the bottom. "I spent millennia scouring the Sol system for lost relics. Not only on Earth, but in the distant reaches of the star system. Do you have any idea how difficult it is to locate a piece of metal floating amidst the void, let alone identify it as a Heroic Artifact? I'm still not certain if all the ones I've recovered are the genuine article."

The elevator door opens, leading to that same hallway with the false side entrance Jason remembers from the last time he visited.

The Wordsmith sighs as he falls into step beside Marie.

"A hundred and fifty. It's better than none. I need all the help I can get."

"That will depend entirely on how your conversation with Mildred goes." Marie says. "I'm looking forward to finally deriving some value from you, Wordsmith."

Part 453: Jason's Inadequacy

Marie and Jason walk and talk as they head down various corridors and through the multiple secret entrances leading into what will ultimately become her Artifact Storage Facility. As they walk, Marie glances at Jason.

"You know, I'm a bit surprised by your reluctance, Jason. Hope didn't hesitate to raid the Volgrim's black-level research site and take the artifacts they possessed. Yet, despite knowing exactly where my artifacts are, you wanted to get my permission to come here. You could teleport straight here, yes? You already put down a Waypoint, I imagine."

Jason frowns. "You know about Waypoints?"

"I know a great deal about the limits of your abilities." Marie says. "Remember? Microscopic drones? Researcher 4125 told me that she had informed you of their existence, yet you've already forgotten. The memory of inferior biologicals is truly tragic..."

"I remember them!" Jason snaps. "I'm not an idiot. So you've been spying on me and my abilities, then? For how long?"

"Since a short while after you exited your cryopod." Marie says, while typing in a keycode to the third secret entrance. "I've recorded every major fight, every minor discovery, every fluctuation in the mana contained within your vessel. You've become quite the useful research subject to me. In truth, I grew up in a Heroless era, so I never had a chance to study the mana pathways of an enhanced human. Perhaps, given time, I might be able to elevate other people to the rank of Hero. Then humanity can truly ascend."

Jason opens his mouth, but after a moment, he closes it and falls silent.

Several thoughts float around in his head.

"Did you know? That the angels made humanity stunted, I mean. That we were supposed to all have spiritual potential, but lost out on that opportunity."

Marie shrugs. The two of them don't walk through the opened door, but instead stand outside it, simply talking.

"I was not aware. But I had my suspicions. The Nazis were the first to experiment on human spirituality, you know."

"They were?" Jason asks, slightly stunned. "What do you mean?"

Marie sighs. "It was classified information, back in your era. Nobody knew. Even presidents weren't able to learn about these ancient secrets. Only the shadow governments, the true rulers of humanity, knew the depths to which the fascists had delved. I'm sure you've heard about how Adolf Hitler was in search of 'Aryans,' or how he believed they were the key to creating the 'superior race.' He was an imbecile, of course, but the people working under him were fine with fueling his rise so long as it gave them access to money, research, and grants."

"You're saying his goal was to create a race of superhumans?" Jason asks. "Then does that mean he heard of ancient Heroes and thought he could replicate their power?"

"Heroes were never particularly a secret." Marie says. "Neither were angels, demons, Titans, or monsters. Humanity has always known about them. But that did start to rapidly change around the start of the 19th century. For reasons too complicated to be worth outlining, the various cabals ruling from the shadows decided it was time to start hiding the existence of 'paranormal' entities from humanity's eyes. They began creating the idea of 'mythology' and 'stories' and 'religion' as an explanation for those 'silly old tales' told from one generation to the next."

She continues. "Surprisingly, it didn't take long before people started to forget. Humans are remarkably shortsighted. It's easy for us to forget things we saw only a few years before under a barrage of unrelated propaganda or sensationalist headlines. That's how the very real and very important Heroes of yore became nothing more than 'somewhat strong' or 'somewhat intelligent' historical figures. As for the truly larger-than-life Heroes, such as Arthur, we converted their tales into works of fiction. Arthur was no longer the Mightiest Hero, but simply an ordinary king propped up by uneducated goat-farmers who fancied him to be larger than life."

Jason's expression falls. "That's kind of tragic, in a way."

"It is." Marie nods. "Many legendary figures deserved to be remembered for their heroic sacrifices. But they were forgotten, or downplayed and minimized."

She clears her throat. "In any case, the reason I say Hitler was an idiot is because he went about his numbskull theories in all the wrong ways. For instance, he believed that white skin, blonde hair, and blue eyes were what made someone heroic."

"Well, that's certainly not right." Jason says. "The first Hero was Jepthath. He was black. And the Heroic Aura gave him the blonde hair and blue eyes, like it did me and all the others..."

"Exactly!" Marie says, visibly exasperated. "But oh, the brilliant Fuhrer was so sure he had the secret figured out. He was rounding up all the prettiest boys and girls he could find, eagerly capturing angels and demons to suck out their essences and try to turn those poor children into a new race of superhumans."

Jason's face pales. "What?! Then does that mean the death camps-"

"No, no. Those were just his bigotry put on full display." Marie says. "He wanted to round up and erase the undesirables, like many before and after him. You can't even blame his actions on the demons. He was a vile man with a small mind who set humanity back a good deal until we finally defeated him. But I digress."

Marie pushes the door open and walks down the final hallway leading to the final door that will finally allow them to enter her Heroic Vault.

"As I was saying before, Jason. You didn't come here and steal my artifacts. Why not?"

Jason shrugs. "I don't know. I could have. But it didn't feel right. You spent 100,000 years collecting these. You're not harming them. You take good care of them, and you clearly care about their preservation. Compared to me, who only wants to turn their Heroes into bludgeons... I feel somewhat crude and primitive. I almost hope you'll have a better idea for how I might use them. I don't want to denigrate these legendary figures by having them solve all my problems, or making them come back to life just to fix the new era after all the work they put into their own eras."

Marie smiles and nods approvingly. "You've matured a lot since our last encounter. Things must have been... hard for you."

Jason and Marie walk down the hallway together. He and her exchange a glance, then Jason looks away and nods.

"My daughter died. It put a lot of things into perspective for me." Jason says quietly. "It made me realize how... irresponsible I've been. I always take the easy way out. I'm always lazy. I have this godlike cheat power, so I just use it to solve my immediate needs. Perhaps, if I'd been a more proactive Hero, I could have saved my daughter."

"That's good." Marie says, before quickly adding, "not the dead daughter part. The becoming more responsible part. I'm sorry for your loss."

"Hmm. I didn't take you for the type to care." Jason says. "Maybe you're not the coldest, frostiest bitch this side of the Mississippi."

"I'm still a human in many ways." Marie says, more quietly than before. "I still hold on to many troublesome biases and attachments."

"Ever had any children?" Jason asks.

"No." Marie answers. "Only my lizards."

"Come on." Jason pushes further. "I know you've had at least one man you cared for."

"...You're referring to Benjamin Brown." Marie says, shifting her arms to a crossed position. "That was a long time ago. Before my Ascension, even. But times have changed. Benjamin Brown is a good man, but he is ultimately still only a man. I have lost those feelings since ancient times."

"If you say so." Jason says, clearly not convinced. "Though I am curious. What makes you different from him? He has a bunch of mechanical parts, just like you."

"I am a Cybernetic Organism. A 'Cybernite' if you will." Marie explains. "My brain is digitized. I have no internal organs, only mechanical parts wrapped in biological tissue. If my tissue disappears, I will be perfectly fine. You could say my skin is merely a beauty accessory made to satiate my vanity."

Jason visibly cringes. "That sounds... pretty gross. Especially when you describe it in such an alien way."

"Meanwhile," Marie continues, undaunted, "Benjamin Brown is a Cyborg. Half-man, half-machine. His brain is still biological. His heart and lungs are, too, along with several other organs. But his bones are almost all metal. His exoskeleton is extremely durable and grants him frightening strength."

"Since you're entirely metal, if you and him were to fight, who would win?" Jason asks.

"Benjamin would. Without a doubt." Marie answers. "You have to remember that I am a researcher, not a soldier. Benjamin's body was engineered to make him a killing machine. He would crush me with ease. That being said, if I were to build him a cybernetic body, he would become even more unstoppable. His physical organs do hold him back."

"Then why don't you?" Jason continues asking. "Why not build him an even stronger body?"

Marie sighs. The two of them reach the final door leading into the vault, but once again, they pause outside.

"I have several reasons for not doing so. First and foremost, Benjamin never asked me to do so. He quite likes his human parts. They've served him well, especially with his womanizing ways. Yes, he and Emperor Fenrir have had plenty of 'fun times' over the millennia. A pity she died..."

Jason raises an eyebrow. Marie sounds almost annoyed, as if she thinks Ben was, what, cheating on her?

The Head Researcher continues. "Other reasons I didn't elevate Benjamin, though, are in thorough abundance. For example, I happen to know that Cybernites lose all attachment to their spirituality. And since you informed me that you had contacted the Hero known as 'Tucker,' I assume you also know about his comradery with Benjamin."

Jason nods. "Yeah. He and Ben used to work together, during the Energy Wars."

"That's right. If Ben becomes like me, he will never again be capable of speaking to his old battle-buddy. To be clear, the only Hero who Ben can communicate with is Tucker, and he cannot do so for any of the other artifacts, but still... it would be too bad to lose that link."

For a brief moment, Jason becomes quiet.

"Why didn't you just let Benjamin keep Tucker's revolver, then?"

"There was no need." Marie says. "Much like how I didn't uplift Benjamin to enhance his fighting power, why bother? The Energy Wars were over. The galaxy was at peace. Ben and Tucker went their separate ways. Benjamin settled down, had hundreds of children, and lived a good life. As for Tucker... well, he stayed here, in the vault."

"All alone." Jason adds. "That's really sad. At least Madam Mildred ended up keeping him company."

"Indeed." Marie concludes.

Marie bangs her knuckles on the door leading to the Heroic Vault. This time, Jason lingers behind deliberately, giving Marie a headstart as the door opens and she walks inside. As she enters, an excited young demoness shouts happily.

"Miss Becker, Miss Becker! I haven't seen you in weeks!"

Momo, the Emperor of Bubbles, bounces up and down while babbling at Marie. Marie listens to her for several minutes, nodding along and letting her get some of her excitement out of her system. Eventually, Marie directs Momo's attention to the entrance.

"Do you remember that stupid fellow I brought here a few visits ago? The dumb-looking man with the blonde hair? Well, he's back again, Momo dearest."

Momo's excitement visibly deflates. She turns to the doorway, then quickly runs around and hides behind Marie.

"You brought him... again?" Momo whispers.

"I know, I know." Marie says huffily. "He's just another stupid man like all the rest. But he is also a Hero, and I need his help with the artifacts. Why don't you go and stay in your room this time? I'll deal with him myself."

Outside the room, Jason's eyes twitch at each insult fired his way.

Never mind. She's still a coldhearted bitch. Jason thinks.

"Yeah." Fiona grumbles along with him. "I can't believe she keeps insulting your appearance. Do that woman's retinal sensors not work?"

...Thanks, Fiona. Really appreciate the emotional support here.

"Anytime, honey."

After a few minutes of coaxing and prodding, Marie convinces Momo to go and hide in her room, then she invites Jason in. The annoyed Wordsmith gives her a judgmental glare, to which Marie covers her mouth in mock surprise.

"Oh dear, I hope you didn't hear all that. I have to speak in a way she'll understand, you see. Momo is so delicate, after all."

Jason slowly blinks. "Uh-huh. Sure. Let's get this over with."

He follows Marie into the depths of Momo's Sanctum. They walk down a long hallway and eventually enter a large, circular room, one with hundreds of alcoves, each of them holding the familiar Heroic Artifacts.

"You know," Marie says, as they enter, "you never did help me identify all the artifacts. You played around with perhaps a dozen and then skipped off to go on your merry way."

"I had a lot on my mind." Jason retorts. "And I definitely don't have time to help you identify any artifacts now."

"I'll make a deal with you." Marie says. "I know you need these Heroes to help you fight against Hope. I'm even willing to let you make use of them all. But I need you to document which Heroes are inside each relic, their lineage, their feats, and any pertinent knowledge they might possess. While I no longer need to bother with finding Excalibur or the Dominion Rod, it's still important that I document these historical figures in detail. I'm not an archaeologist, but these people created the humanity you know and love. They deserve the respect of having their accomplishments noted down."

Jason nods. "Of course. I completely agree. I'll do anything I can to help."

He pauses.

"So... what do I need to do to get these artifacts?"

"It's not up to me." Marie says. "It's up to Madam Mildred. She insists on speaking to you."

This makes Jason cock his head. "What? How would you know that? Have you spoken to her yourself?"

"No. Momo did." Marie says, visibly jealous. "Sort of. Because she is a demon, the connection was tenuous. Apparently, Mildred can communicate with Momo... but only when she's in her power-bleeding pod, unconscious. She has that condition, after all. One night, while she was asleep, Mildred spoke to her and communicated her wishes to speak to you again. So, here we are. I've decided that in these turbulent times, it would be better if you could make use of the artifacts, rather than allowing them to go to waste."

"What changed?" Jason asks.

"Not 'what.' Who." Marie answers. "Hope changed the dynamics. The Volgrim no longer have any chance of winning the war. They are entirely reliant on the two of you. If I let Hope run roughshod without any competition, it's likely the Plague will eventually reach Earth. They pose no direct threat to my Cybernites since we are not biological enough for them to assimilate, but they will still destroy my facility. I cannot allow that to happen. And who knows if they're capable of assimilating the power of Heroic Artifacts?"

"Makes sense. Alright." Jason says. "Then I'll talk to Mildred."

He glances around the room, the circular concave facility with over a hundred Heroic Artifacts locked behind plexiglass walls. After a moment, he scratches his head.

"Uh. I did just realize... I have no idea which artifact is Mildred's."

Marie rolls her eyes. "It's a hairpin over in Alcove 97. Give me a moment."

Marie manipulates the controls to the complex on a computer panel in the center of the room. After ten seconds, a long metallic arm drops out of the ceiling, zips over to one of the glass alcoves on the wall, and opens it up. Its delicate metal fingers pluck a small ladies hairpin of 16th century design off a viewing pillar, then zips over to drop it in Jason's hand.

"There you go." Marie says, retracting the ceiling arm upward. "Have at it."

"Alright."

Jason focuses on the will contained within the artifact. He starts to utter a Word of Power, but before he can even bother, a figure materializes within his Mind Realm. A rather portly female wearing Victorian clothes and a feathery boa.

Mad Madam Mildred!

This time, Mildred doesn't appear with several other Heroes, but instead all by herself. The instant Jason recognizes her arrival, a tugging sensation pulls at his brain, and he forcibly dives into his own Mind Realm, materializing in the same space as Fiona herself.

"Jason?" Fiona exclaims, slightly surprised.

"Why helloooo there, dear boy!" Madam Mildred exclaims, puffing out her oversized chest. "So good to see you again! What a shaaame you didn't give this old seductress a call sooner! I've been waiting sooo long to hear back from you!"

The Wordsmith blinks, slightly confused by the change in his surroundings.

"Dammit. You pulled me into my Mind Realm and I couldn't even resist. How do other people keep yanking me around like that?"

"I am a master of the mind." Mildred chirps. "Doing something so simple is hardly even worth mentioning. Now Jason, Phoebe- oop! I mean to say Fiona, ha-haa! You've changed your name since we last spoke, how adorable!"

Mildred begins strutting around Fiona, looking her up and down.

"Your spirit has filled out nicely, my dear. Look at how deeply you've integrated into your husband's Mind Realm! It seems the two of you have spent plenty of quality time bonding together, hmm?"

Fiona blushes. "Yes. I suppose we have, a bit, Mildred."

"It seems you wanted to speak to me." Jason says. "May I ask why?"

"Of course, of course. In due time." Mildred says. "But first, I should express my condolences. I'm terribly sorry about what happened to your little girl. That loss must have stung you deeply, Wordsmith."

"How could you... know... about that?" Jason asks, frowning. "No, seriously. How?"

"My Heroic ability is known as the Mind Link." Mildred explains. "Among many others! I am not the same as that Solomon-boy that you know so well. No, no, my mental powers come in different forms and make me not only sultry and unattainable to mere mortal man, but also a brain-blessed babe from the Heavens! I always know of the goings-on in the world outside, even if you might expect this to be impossible. That is why I can also link to the souls of other Heroes present here. This is but a trifle, dear Jason!"

Jason nods. "Alright. So... do you know about my clone, Hope? And do you know about his recent... empowerment?"

"How could I not? Such a lucky boon that boy has reaped!" Mildred exclaims. "One thousand relics, what a shock indeed! But you should not envy him too much, for that is the reason I've brought you here to talk today."

Mildred waves her hand. She conjures a large easy chair in the middle of the town square inside Jason's Mind Realm and leisurely plops down in it, sighing contentedly.

"There are many forces in this world, Jason dearest." Mildred says, her tone somehow romantic and loving, yet also completely platonic. "I am capable of depending on others as much as I am myself. Had I possessed the powers you do, I would have spent many an age learning to master that magic. Sadly, you have been acting inadequately! I believe that you have continuously dropped the ball, to a point where I'm beginning to wonder if you've been doing it deliberately. But alas! You have not been!"

"You mean... with respect to learning the limits of my abilities?" Jason asks. "Yeah... I've been thinking that about myself a lot lately."

"And so you should." Mildred nods, turning her attention to Fiona. "Tell me dearest, would you like to help your husband even more than you have so far?"

Fiona immediately nods. "Of course. I'd do anything for Jason."

"Good! Then listen well. I have thoughts I must convey. Thoughts that will turn your husband from a boy into a man! But you must trust this super-smart seductress and listen to my every word! Otherwise, I fear he will stray onto the wrong path, as his clone has."

Fiona and Jason exchange nods.

"We're all ears, Miss Mildred."

Part 454: Hunting Chaos

Just outside the Labyrinth Core, amidst the throng of demons and monsters heading into and out of humanity's stronghold.

A curious trio of unlikely allies figuratively joins hands to complete a critical mission: Hunt down and kill Gressil, the Emperor of Chaos. These three figures consist of Creator Demila, Benjamin Brown, and Siddhartha Gautama, also known as Buddha.

The three people exit the Core and wade through the typical torrent of incoming monsters and demons that frequen the Core's entrace. They head down several nearby tunnels and eventually reach an area where the nearby population has dwindled significantly, with only the casual goblin or demon grunt walking past them and shooting curious glances at Demila in particular.

Demila and Benjamin both turn to Buddha.

[You are the one who knows how to locate Gressil.] Demila says, her tone revealing little faith in Buddha's abilities. [If you are capable of doing so, lead us there.]

"I am not a bloodhound." Buddha says mildly. "I cannot pinpoint the Envoy of Chaos. I can only bring us to the location where Karma no longer holds any effect. Once we reach that vicinity, it will be up to you two to uncover his location."

"Me as well?" Benjamin asks, crossing his arms. "I'm a soldier, not a scout."

"Your vision is augmented." Buddha points out. "Demila's psionic senses are powerful, and her eyesight is just as formidable as yours, but you have your own unique capabilities."

"Fair enough." Benjamin says gruffly. "Let's find this guy and get back home in time for dinner."

Buddha falls silent.

He stands silently for a full minute, slowly swiveling around in place while aiming his eyes in every conceivable direction. The other two wait patiently.

Finally, Buddha nods while looking up and to a diagonal direction, as if peering through the Labyrinth's walls. "That way."

Demila notes the direction of his gaze. [Not near the prison complex. It seems Gressil has abandoned it.]

"Makes sense." Benjamin says. "I hear the humans went in and cleaned up shop. They pulled out all of Gressil's prisoners while rescuing Hope Hiro."

Demila's eye twitches. [Yes. Hope Hiro. Indeed.]

"Hm?" Benjamin says frowning. "You have a problem with him?"

Unaware of Hope Hiro's attack on the Volgrim world of Serris, Benjamin has no idea why Demila holds such visible animosity toward his name. She doesn't explain, either.

[It is none of your business, mud-dweller.]

"Suit yourself." Benjamin replies, rolling his eyes.

The trio begins the work of navigating the Labyrinth. Despite its twisting paths and confusing layout, Demila's psionic senses easily map out the Labyrinth for a hundred miles in every direction. If she were to concentrate harder, she might even be able to extend her senses to its most distant ends.

They turn right. They turn left. The ground sometimes slopes upward, and sometimes downward. They even pass stairs carved out by goblins, though these will eventually break apart and regrow as the Labyrinth continues regenerating itself over time. Like a living organism, Hell feeds on the life forces of the microscopic denizens walking through its hallways.

As the trio travels, they pass through many different biomes adapted for specific subspecies of monsters. Benjamin looks around with interest at the surroundings.

"Have you explored Hell before?" Buddha asks, after they arrive at the third biome, an aquatic area where mermaids and sirens chirp and play together.

This particular biome glows under the radiance of surprisingly bright lightbugs, which flicker and fly throughout the air, crawling on surfaces to provide light for the surrounding areas.

"Not particularly." Benjamin says. "Occasionally, I entered the Labyrinth to visit..... friends. But otherwise I kept to myself."

Demila snorts. [You intended to speak of copulation partners. You mud-dwellers all swim in filth.]

Buddha ignores her comments. "You were once humanity's champion, considered the strongest man on Earth, given the lack of a living Hero. Why did you ultimately turn aside from your hatred of demons to fraternize with them?"

"You have me all wrong." Benjamin says calmly. "I never hated demonkind. I fought for life and liberty. I fought for the sake of humanity and to defend our interests. But once we lost the war… it didn't matter anymore. We had no more interests worth defending."

[And so, you began your pursuit of demonic females to ravage.] Demila says, curling up her eyes in dismissive amusement. [A typical primitive male.]

"What would you know about human sexual activities?" Benjamin challenges. "100,000 years is a long time to live without love. I met a few women I particularly liked, we enjoyed ourselves and had good times together. There's nothing wrong with that."

"Indeed." Buddha affirms. "I was not challenging your right to do any of those things. Indeed, you had no more reason to hold animosity toward the demons. However…"

Buddha pauses to look at Benjamin meaningfully.

"While you and your extensive family lived well on Hell Harbor, the rest of humanity lived in slavery under demonkind. I find it odd you would simply allow that to happen. Why did you not advocate for their release? For more humane treatment?"

"Again. I'm a soldier." Benjamin says, in a somewhat defensive tone. "I complained at the start, but it had no effect. Marie Becker had more authority than me. She carved out a niche for her Cybernites. She didn't care about the rest of the ordinary humans. In fact, I'm not sure if she ever did in the first place…"

"I think I understand now." Buddha says with a faint smile. "You are only one man. You could not save humanity alone, and your list of allies had thinned considerably."

"Yeah…" Ben replies, lowering his gaze. "I just dealt with the aftermath… in my own way. Fornicating, drinking, reveling. Better than wallowing in self-pity."

"I am not alien to such actions." Buddha says quietly. "When I lost Tamael, I turned to such activities to dull my memories. My attempts failed. We all have our own ways of coping with trauma."

"You sounds like a psychiatrist." Benjamin grumbles.

"I dabbled in the field for a few decades." Buddha replies. "As you said. When you've lived a long time, you have to cope in your own way."

The two men share a look of understanding, having both gone through somewhat similar situations across their long lives.

They proceed forward, occasionally chit-chatting about this or that. At one point, they enter a biome that truly surprises Benjamin.

"What in the literal Hell?" The Vanguard gasps. "There's lava inside the Labyrinth? And thunder?!"

Before the trio, a land of thunder and fire boils and crackles. Cries and screeches erupt in the distance from unseen giant monsters as they detect the presence of three intruders upon their domain. The truly massive inner space does not regenerate like the rest of the Labyrinth would, but remains unmoving, perhaps held at bay by the strong presences contained within.

"This is one of the Drakelands." Buddha explains. "It is where many Elemental Wyverns live, including the types that attacked Tarus II not long ago."

"I never knew something like this could exist in the Labyrinth." Benjamin mutters. "Amazing..."

Demila narrows her six eyes at Buddha. [You have only just revived. You have not been alive for 100,000 years. Yet, somehow you know of this place. How suspicious...]

Buddha chuckles. "This body I've possessed belongs to a man known as Makoto Ueda. He spent 100,000 years as a transformed monster working under the individual known as Bahamut. He himself does not remember those years well, but I am more than capable of peering into his memories."

Once again, Demila tries to read Buddha's mind, but all she can find are Makoto Ueda's memories. This time, she peers a little deeper and finds that Buddha is in fact telling the truth.

[What a wonderful deal for you.] Demila snarks. [You steal a body and reap all its benefits. You truly are an undying abomination.]

"Someday, that may come to an end." Buddha says, his tone distant. "Perhaps sooner rather than later."

The trio exits the Drakelands biome. They continue traveling, passing more and more areas as they speed up their pace.

Hours pass. Soon, an entire day. Despite his earlier comment about dinner, Benjamin Brown doesn't truly think their search would be completed quickly. He munches on some granola bars he brought along, looking around with his keen eyes while Demila scans the surrounding area.

"Still nothing?" Buddha asks. "We'll reach the first layer of the Chaos boundary soon. After that, my link to Karma will begin to weaken. Gressil is a much stronger Envoy than me, after all."

[I cannot detect his presence.] Demila says, while continuously sweeping her Psionic Sense around the nearby region, occasionally focusing on one anomaly or another. [Either he is not here, or he is exceptionally good at hiding.]

"Gressil is somewhere nearby." Buddha says with absolute certainty. "We may even begin to feel the touch of his chaotic energy soon."

A few minutes later, as Buddha predicted, a tingly, unpleasant feeling tickles the minds of everyone present. Were they magi, they would start to feel the connection to their magic supply weaken. As normal humans, and a Psion, all they feel instead are odd sensations of sadness, anger, and despair come bubbling forth, unbidden.

Benjamin's guilt surfaces to the top of his mind. He silently reflects on all his past failures to protect humanity, as well as how he ultimately turned to the side of demonkind.

Budda does not feel any immediate sensations due to his link to Karma. However, even with that protection in place, he begins to feel uncomfortable as that connection weakens due to the suppressive force pushing down on him.

Demila becomes noticeably more antsy, more on-edge. Her movements turn twitchier as she quickly looks around, imagining distant voices whispering that don't exist.

[How discomforting.] Demila hisses. [We must be within Gressil's domain now, yet I still cannot sense him!]

"Chaos is formless. It is everywhere, yet nowhere." Buddha says sagely. "Chaos is entropy, and entropy values disorder. Try to shield your mind, False Creator. Do not allow yourself to be distracted by stray thoughts. The more you fall into disorder, the lower your strength will be."

[I know fully well what to do.] Demila snaps. [Do not speak down to me, mud-dweller. You have no idea of the strength a 7th Level Psion wields!]

"Your anger is unwarranted." Buddha says. "Try to remain calm. Not even your soul is impervious to the effects of Chaos."

Demila blinks. She shakes her head, then blinks again.

[I am… fully in control of my thoughts.]

"For now." Buddha nods. "For now…"

They walk deeper and deeper into the depth of Gressil's chaotic aura. Unaware of his exact position, the humans eventually stop talking as a strange silence lingers in the air. No longer do any other life forms stir in the area. Occasionally, they will find bugs lying dead on the floor, but never will they encounter even a single random goblin, imp or other demon or monster.

Benjamin's hands ball into fists. He flicks his eyes around, looking both forward and back as they walk down one random, featureless hallway after another. Still, nobody sees Gressil.

"We're getting close." Buddha says uneasily. "My link to Karma has reached its limit. It cannot be suppressed any further, but all that remains is a single thread of light leading out of the chaos. I have guided us this far. I will be relying on the two of you to root out our foe."

Demila starts to reply, but before she can, a figure walks out from a corner up ahead, startling everyone due to his brazenness.

"That won't be necessary," says Gressil, the Emperor of Chaos. "Welcome, friends. I've been watching you for a while now."

Demila blinks. The fact Gressil dares to simply walk in front of the group and openly show his faces to them makes her feel somewhat wary. But, in the end, he is still only a Demon Emperor. She does not think much of his threat.

[Gressil.] Demila says authoritatively. [You are suspected of engineering multiple crimes against the Volgrim Empire, including the creation of the Kolvaxian menace. You are to submit to my arrest, or you will face death.]

Gressil glances at Demila for a moment, but then turns his attention to Buddha.

"Haha. Well done, Buddha. Well done. You've led her right to me, as planned. That Psion is so headstrong, she couldn't see what you were actually planning. Her arrogance was her undoing."

Buddha frowns. "Hm?"

Demila whips her head toward him. [What did he say? Are you planning to betray me, mud-dweller?!]

"No." Buddha says simply. "Gressil is lying. Do not fall for his tricks so easily, Demila."

Gressil gasps. "Buddha! You would deny our long friendship? After all of these years? Haha. You don't need to fear that Psion any longer. Now that I am here, I will save you if she makes a move. It is all within our plan."

"What the hell are you talking about?" Benjamin Brown interjects. "Quit trying to play with our minds, Gressil. You're not as smart as you think."

Gressil turns to the human. His expression darkens.

"Quiet."

A chilly sensation washes down Benjamin Brown's back, as if he were a child in a remote village suddenly faced with the appearance of a hungry grizzly bear on an isolated mountain path. He involuntarily takes a step back, but then certain neural compounds inside his cerebral stimulator activate, dulling his sense of fear. He quickly stands back up and reasserts himself.

"Nice tricks. Your 'chaos energy' is really something. It's all about tricking the weak-minded. But I've met all kinds of demons in my life. Everyone has a gimmick. Color me unimpressed."

Demila seems to realize the truth behind Benjamin and Buddha's words. She nods slowly, then returns her attention to Gressil, while he begins to slowly walk toward the trio, each footstep hitting the ground with a heavy thud.

[Very clever, demon. It seems my mind is not impervious to your tricks. But if tricks are all you have, you will be lucky to survive this elder's wrath for even one standard time unit without falling to dust!]

Abruptly, Demila vanishes. She reappears directly in front of Gressil with her palm raised. In the instant between instants, she brings her hand down with the force of a megaton hammer, slapping directly at Gressil's face far too quickly for him or anyone else to even follow the movement.

BOOOM!!

Demila's casual slap fractures space in the area. She blows apart the Labyrinth in front of herself as if unleashing a focused explosive strike, and the backwind from her attack races down the corridor behind her to knock Buddha off his feet. Benjamin only remains standing thanks to his excellent sense of balance and the weight of his metallic bones keeping him firmly planted in place.

However, Demila's attack... strikes nothing!

Gressil disappears, as if his body were atomized. Demila scowls when she realizes what has happened.

[An illusion. Quit playing tricks, demon!]

Benjamin turns around and offers a helping hand to Buddha. He pulls the former Hero to his feet, and the two of them glance past Demila at the massive crater in the Labyrinth's floors, ceiling, and walls left behind from her attack. Jagged pieces of dirt crumble in the aftermath and fall to the floor, turning to dust on impact.

"That Psion is one scary bitch." Benjamin grumbles. "I've had angry women slap me before, but I don't think I'd survive pissing her off."

Buddha doesn't answer. He frowns as a strange feeling wells up in his chest...

Suddenly, Buddha spins on his heel to face the hallway in the direction they came. He then bends over backward as an invisible fist tears at the air where his head was only an instant before, narrowly avoiding an instant death. With unnatural agility, Buddha kicks off the floor and reverse-flips backward, while Benjamin also detects the attack.

"There you are!" Benjamin roars. The technology in his iris modules allow him to detect even the faintest fluctuations of mana in the air, and he instantly homes in on the identity of Buddha's attacker.

Without hesitation, Benjamin leaps forward and raises his fist.

THUNK!

He strikes at the empty air and sends a figure stumbling backward. The illusory wall around that figure vanishes, revealing none other than Gressil's true body, no longer obscured by his magic.

Benjamin presses the assault. He continues punching and kicking at Gressil, but the Emperor of Chaos doesn't allow him any additional cheap hits. The two of them engage in a brief but vicious dance of melee combat, with Benjamin roaring in rage as he tries to get an edge on the fearsome monster before him.

Abruptly, Demila appears. The Psion casually raises her palm once more, and slaps downward, making Benjamin's heartrate spike.

He doesn't get a second to scream.

Demila violently slaps Gressil's true body, bashing him against the wall while releasing another catastrophic explosion of energy, one which sends not only Buddha flying, but Benjamin Brown too. The Psion batters Gressil against the wall, this time successfully connecting with her attack which once again breaks apart the Labyrinth's foundations and sends shockwaves surging outward in all directions.

An instant later, she blows away the dust to gaze upon Gressil's broken, fallen figure. With both his arms shattered and his legs twisted into pretzels, Gressil appears a sorry sight.

[And there it is.] Demila says victoriously. [One slap was all it took. For your crimes against the Volgrim Empire, you will suffer tremendously.]

Demila reaches out her hand. She casually yanks Gressil into her grasp, clamping her grip onto his throat and dangling his broken, useless body as if he were a coat placed upon a hanger.

At the same time, Benjamin, who was the closest to her strike aside from Gressil himself, coughs out a wad of blood. He staggers to his feet and holds his chest, wincing at the injuries to his internal organs. Already, his internal reconstructive nanites have begun to repair the damage, but it will take him an hour or two to return to pristine condition.

"Cough! Shit, Buddha, you okay?"

Benjamin looks to the side, where he sees an armored figure laying on the ground. Buddha, having worn a T-REX activator beneath his clothing, survives the impact with minimal injuries. He lifts himself to his feet and cracks his neck. "It seems our Psion compatriot does not know how to attack without endangering her allies."

Demila, still holding Gressil's broken form, sneers. [You are both fine. If you'd like, I can teleport you back to Tarus II. I'm sure Emperor Belial would be happy- hm?]

She frowns.

Demila looks at Gressil's body in surprise, noticing the fact that he appears to be... quite dead.

Completely, utterly dead.

Not only that, but his body appears decayed enough that it doesn't seem as if Demila killed him herself. Rather, he seems to have died several days before.

[What in the Founders' name?]

Demila drops the Emperor of Chaos's body, allowing him to collapse to the floor. Her pupils shrink and enlarge several times as she makes a strange discovery.

[Impossible...]

"What is it?" Benjamin asks, slowly walking over while holding his stomach. "Did you really kill him in one slap?"

[This makes no sense.] Demila mentally whispers. [His body. It has the same soul signature. It truly is Gressil. But... the one I killed is one who existed several rotational cycles ago. This reminds me of a phenomenon I read about in the Psionic Archives, a state of temporal paradox only achievable by the most enlightened of Temporal Manipulators...]

Buddha's stomach churns.

"...Karma is the force of order. It is the force of stability. But Chaos is the force of disorder and entropy. Gressil can already see into the future. Perhaps the barrier to time itself has begun to weaken..."

Hardly have the words left Buddha's mouth before two figures suddenly appear at the far edges of both craters. Gressil reveals himself in two locations at once, startling the trio.

[You're still alive.] Demila says grimly. [What have you done? Have you achieved the state of Temporal Ascension?!]

The Gressil nearest to her chuckles.

"Oh, Demila. I am not a Psion. Your rules do not apply to me. But then again... I suppose no rules do."

Demila smiles with her eyes.

[We will see about that.]

She vanishes from her position, intending to reappear before Gressil and slap him to death again. But this time, she materializes in front of a wall, making her blink in surprise.

[Hm?! I jumped to the wrong coordinate? Impossible. I haven't made such an amateur mistake in a million cycles!]

Flustered by this minor failure, Demila becomes incensed.

[You did this to me!] She roars at Gressil. [Your damned mud-magic is interfering with my mind! But demonic tricks won't make a difference when compared with overwhelming STRENGTH!]

Once again, Demila flickers toward Gressil. This time, she succeeds and swings her palm down, but as she does, a figure appears behind her with his fist raised.

CRACK!!

Demila's attack harmlessly whiffs past an illusion, but Gressil's sneak attack connects with the back of Demila's head, pounding her straight downward into the Labyrinth's soil!

Thunk!

[Aargh!]

Demila howls more in rage than pain, while Gressil stands amidst the wreckage of her third attack, smiling casually.

"No need to end things quickly. We're only just getting started here, Psion."

Part 455: Chaos Control

Demila leaps off the floor. She pounces at Gressil and conjures a terrifying amount of psionic energy into her fist before lunging it straight at his laughing face.

The instant before her attack connects, the psionic energy in her body goes berserk!

All the condensed energy enveloping her fist violently explodes with the force of a hundred grenades, blasting her arm off and instantly reversing her momentum. She mentally shrieks as she rockets backward and slams against the wall. At the same time, the blast 'kills' Gressil, sending his body flying away. He, too, collapses into his own shadow, ragdolling to the ground like a giant sack of potatoes. His sorry, shredded figure might give one the impression he had actually died, but only if they hadn't already seen him miraculously return to life only a minute before.

Despite suffering a terrible backlash from her own psionic energy and atomizing one of her arms, Demila easily picks herself back up. She flickers to her feet and scowls at her missing arm.

[This is not supposed to happen! How are you causing my psionic energy to backfire, mud-dweller?!]

Without waiting for a reply, Demila concentrates her thoughts on the elbow joint where the second half of her arm used to be. By focusing her power, she rapidly regenerates her former limb into reality, making it regrow within only seconds in a manner somewhat similar to Beelzebub's regeneration!

Gressil steps out of the Nothingness on the opposite side of Demila's crater.

"You think I am causing you to fail. But that is not true. Haha. You are already a failure of a Psion, Demila. Your own people mock you. You don't need to blame me for your inability."

Benjamin Brown keeps his distance. He watches from the side, waiting for a chance to strike while clutching his injured stomach. He focuses on cycling his medical nanites to speed up the healing process. This cuts his required recuperation time by half, so long as he doesn't have to directly engage in combat.

"Fuck. What the hell is going on with Demila?" Benjamin growls. "That dumb psionic bitch will kill me with friendly fire if I jump in now! Weren't we supposed to work together? Is Gressil suppressing her powers?!"

Buddha steals over to Benjamin's side. They watch as Demila trades even more frightening, primally enchanted attacks with Gressil.

"The Envoy of Chaos is unable to suppress psionic energy. His aura only works on those with magical affinities. However, psionic energy is formed and shaped by the thoughts and mental state of its wielder. Chaos energy can influence the minds of others. Demila must have some deep-seated insecurities for her to be this easily affected by Gressil's machinations..."

Demila flickers from side to side. She teleports toward Gressil and fires a beam of psionic energy from her forehead.

THOOM!!

It tears straight through Gressil's figure and blasts a massive hole in the Labyrinth, opening up a trench five miles long! Any creatures in the path of the beam vanish from existence, instantly vaporized by the terrifying power contained in the Creator's attack!

[How dare you look down upon me.] Demila seethes. [The only reason you're still alive is because of your overreliance on tricks. I am ten thousand times stronger than you will ever hope to be!]

"Listen to you." Gressil says, his mocking voice floating toward Demila from every direction. "You're so proud of your strength. But do you truly feel any pride? All Psions of the seventh level are mighty when compared to us lowly mud-dwellers. But how do you stack up to your contemporaries, hmm?"

Gressil doesn't immediately reappear. Demila sweeps her senses around the area, but fails to locate his position.

[Reveal yourself!]

"Truly pathetic." Gressil continues. "You're an outmoded relic. The weakest of the 7th Level Psions. I wonder how it feels, seeing a young upstart like Vulpanix crush all your records and smother your face into the dirt. You have to speak so politely to her. She's the Founder's Favorite. And as for you, you're nothing but an old, forgotten wastrel, useful only as an expendable pawn. It's so tragic."

Gressil materializes behind Demila. She spins to face him, immediately sensing his presence.

[Your words are poison.] Demila says. [My Founders value me! I am not worthless!]

"Aren't you?" Gressil asks, curling the corners of his mouth upward. "When the Plague comes, who do you think they will place their hopes and dreams upon? Whose shoulders will they deem fit to bear the fate of the future Volgrim Empire? You? Vulpanix? I think we both know the answer."

Demila glowers at him in hatred. But even so, her body refuses to move. Something about his words burrows into her ears, making her chest spasm unexpectedly.

"What do you think, Demila?" Gressil asks. "When the Plague reaches Volgarius, how long will your leaders wait before sending you to die at the frontlines? A day? A week? A month? Perhaps it won't even take them a single hour. They may have even already drafted the plans for your 'noble sacrifice...'"

[I am PROUD to serve my Empire!] Demila protests. [Unlike you, a free-wheeling monster who does as he pleases, I have a sense of duty! I have my pride, my honor!]

"Conceptual trappings placed upon your mind by your superiors. Invisible shackles designed to weaken you over time." Gressil says, ever so softly. "But... if you were truly intelligent, you would know that there is a way out. You don't have to be limited by your current form. There are still ways for you to... progress your Psionic Seed."

Demila's heart skips a beat. For the briefest moment, she feels, deep inside her soul, a pang of desire.

But she quickly shakes that feeling away.

[An insect cannot uplift a god! You are too dangerous to be left alive, worm! Your words are insidious, like paralytic poison injected into the spine! DIE!]

She flickers toward Gressil and bashes his skull in, killing him on the spot. A brief moment later, Gressil reappears. So she jumps to his new body and kills him before he can speak a word.

Over and over, Demila plays whack-a-mole with the seemingly unkillable monster toying with her thoughts. Unable to properly speak due to her killing him too quickly, Gressil returns to doing so through his projections.

"Your attacks are weakening. I can already feel that your willpower has begun to fade. You know that I'm telling the truth, Demila. If you would only join me, I could grant you strength beyond your wildest dreams... becoming an 8th Level Psion would become as simple as breathing to you. And as for becoming a 9th Level Psion... that would also not be outside your reach..."

[YOU LIE!] Demila shrieks. [If it were that simple, you could have uplifted any other Psion! You're trying to destabilize my mental state! I will not fall for your tricks any longer!]

For a brief moment, Gressil doesn't answer.

Then, he rematerializes inside the chamber once again.

As before, Demila instantly locks onto his position.

[Manipulating your temporal coordinates requires a tremendous amount of internal energy!] Demila proclaims. [I don't doubt that if I kill you enough times, you'll ultimately lose this battle!]

She flickers toward Gressil. She raises her fist once again, and flings it at his head, like she's already done dozens of time before.

But this time...

Gressil's arm snaps upward!

He catches her fist!

In the briefest of instants, Demila's supercharged brain follows the motion, becoming jolted with confusion.

Then Gressil wrenches his grip on her fist, spinning her body around to slam her against the wall!

[Ugh!]

Demila grunts slightly, less injured physically, and more shocked by his sudden boost of strength.

"You truly think you are the sky above the sky." Gressil sneers. "Let me show you how wrong you are."

Demila tries to lunge at him, but as if having become an expert in one thousand forms of hand-to-hand combat, Gressil deflects her other fist without releasing his grasp on her right fist. Horrifyingly, it turns out that having four arms to wield grants him a much wider array of melee capabilities, which he immediately uses on the Psion before him.

Gressil anchors both of Demila's arms. Before she can bombard him with psionic attacks from her mind, Gressil rockets a fist at her head, and another at her stomach.

Bang! Thunk! Thunk! CRACK!

Gressil beats Demila like a hammer of god. He smashes her face from side to side, making her reel. He hits her stomach and knocks some of the wind out of her, then he strikes her ribcage.

[ENOUGH!!] Demila roars, releasing a blast wave of energy from her entire body. She launches Gressil away forcibly, exhausting a portion of her psionic reserves to finally break free of his grip. Luckily, even after taking a hammering, Demila's unthinkably powerful body hasn't taken much damage.

Despite getting blown away, this time, Gressil doesn't perish on impact. He climbs out of the rubble, unharmed, and dusts his shoulders off.

"How was that, Psion? For a brief moment, a mere mud-dweller held you down. It seems you really aren't as strong as you imagine. Confessor Vulpanix would surely put up more of a fight than you."

"Demila!" Benjamin suddenly shouts. "I don't know what the hell is going on, but you can't let yourself listen to this monster! He's trying to weaken your mind! You have to work with me so we can defeat him!"

Demila glances at the Vanguard. She starts to reply, but before she can speak, Gressil does instead.

"Oh, yes. Good point, Benjamin Brown. Haha. If the two of you team up, you'll surely be able to defeat me. Alone, Demila hasn't a chance, but with the help of such a powerful human like you, she'll actually pose a threat to me. It's just too bad she needs to borrow the help of a mud-dweller to defeat someone as weak and insignificant as me. She truly has fallen into the abyss."

Demila's heart turns cold. [You keep out of this fight, human! I will crush this Emperor myself! I don't need your help! You will only get in my way!]

"Goddammit!" Benjamin exclaims. "Don't you see he's manipulating you? You're dancing along to Gressil's every word! Just set your pride aside so we can actually beat-"

[I TOLD YOU TO BE QUIET!] Demila roars, the power of her psionic voice rumbling Benjamin's mind. The Vanguard staggers backward while blood pours from his ears. [This is MY fight! Stay out of it!]

"Nnngh!" Benjamin groans. "God... damned... woman... shit, my head!"

He reluctantly pulls back, realizing he hasn't a chance of convincing her to let him fight. Frustrated, he begins to even wonder why he wasted his time coming here.

Ben blinks his eyes and heals the damage to his ear canals. He looks at Buddha with annoyance. "What was even the point of stringing me along? That damn alien won't listen to reason."

"Wait for an opportunity to strike." Buddha says. "I am still the Master of Combat. I will assist you when the time is right. And don't let your guard down. Gressil could attack us at any moment."

As the two men form a plan, Gressil and Demila return to fighting. Demila savagely attacks Gressil with all her strength, but unlike at the start of the battle, she no longer manages to easily 'kill' Gressil or his fake bodies through overwhelming power. Instead, as if having experienced an unseen baptism, Gressil becomes capable of fighting nearly on par with the Psion.

Demila strikes Gressil's face. In return, she eats a counter-punch straight to her nose, snapping her head back. She fires a bolt of lightning at him, but he flickers to the side, dodging it.

Frustrated, Demila narrows her eyes. [I tire of this.]

She motions with her hands and begins conjuring a powerful web of psionic energy...

A moment later, Demila's hands dart to the right and left. She fires small bolts of power to the ground, where they land and remain in place, creating glowing orbs of light.

Unsure what Demila is doing, Benjamin Brown watches with a knitted brow. He frowns deeply as those orbs of light begin to quiver and shake.

SPLAT!

They burst open like eggs, revealing a series of strange, tentacled horrors. Like monsters from far beyond the Void, these ominous creatures resemble ten and twenty and thirty-limbed octopods, their beaked maws opening and closing to release soundless cries.

Even Gressil no longer appears as confident as before.

"Finally, you're putting that title of Creator to some use."

[You should feel honored.] Demila says quietly. [Since my ascension to the 7th Level, I have never once unleashed this technique on another living being. For six hundred thousand cycles, I have kept it quietly stored away. It is my greatest trump card. For you to die to my Creations, it is proof that I have acknowledged you as a threat. You are no ordinary mud-dweller. Your power comes from... elsewhere.]

Gressil snorts. "Is that what you believe? That it's impossible for me to stand up to you unless some dark god has empowered me? You think too highly of yourself. The truth is, you're simply not as strong as you've pretended. Your façade is meaningless before the power of Chaos."

Demila balls her hands into fists. Wordlessly, she commands her Psionic Creations to rush at Gressil and attack him from all directions. As they do, her thoughts turn dark. She briefly lowers her eyes, contemplating the Truths contained within Gressil's words.

I am... weak. Demila thinks. I have stagnated. I can no longer progress on my Path. I believed that I had made peace with my lack of progression... but this damnable fellow's words have made me realize... I am not content with my mediocrity. Toward him, I feel absolute hatred. Disgust. And also... deep guilt.

Demila's constructs levitate into the air. They surround Gressil and attack him from all directions. Even he needs to dodge their attacks, as each one is only individually a little less powerful than Demila, but all combined their strength rises ten levels above hers.

The Creations' psionic tentacles lash at Gressil to try and tear him apart. He teleports from side to side, up and down, avoiding their attacks. Countless lashes that would have burst his frame into a bloody pulp instead strike the Labyrinth, sending violent shockwaves in all directions. Ten miles away, demons walking down a hallway end up thrown off their feet by the aftershocks. As for those within a mile of the battle's radius, they ultimately perish due to the invisible mindbursts that strike their brains.

Gressil doesn't counter-attack Demila's creations. He only avoids her eldritch horrors while keeping on his toes.

Demila focuses her mind. She struggles to coordinate all of her Creations' individual actions, manipulating them like an army to focus on Gressil's continuously shifting position. However, frustratingly, the Emperor of Chaos always dances tantalizingly out of reach, his existence too difficult for even her senses to track.

Damn him! Demila thinks. He's only one Demon! Even Satan could not have lasted this long! How am I unable to finish off one single mud-dweller?! Have I truly lost my edge?!

A voice speaks from behind Demila.

"Indeed, you have."

[WHAT?!]

Demila nearly jumps out of her skin. She whirls around just in time to see Gressil's clawed fingers swiping at her face.

RIIIIP!

Gressil slashes at Demila's eyes and nose, cutting five deep gashes from the top of her head all the way down to her chin. The sudden shock of his attack scares the absolute crap out of her and makes her lose her composure.

BOOM!!

All of Demila's Creation's self-destruct, falling apart due to her complete lapse in concentration.

Gressil lifts two of his fists overhead. He swings them down like sledgehammers, aiming for the top of his opponent's skull.

THUNK!

He batters Demila downward, knocking her into the Labyrinth floor. She slams into the ground face-first, breaking one of her legs during the impact. Demila lays there for an instant, stunned and wracked with pain.

Then Gressil teleports on top of her back and wraps his hands around her throat.

"Those Creations of yours are only good for bullying the weak. An admirable goal, and one I certainly respect, but further evidence of your weakness. For too long, you've lived a useless, opulent life at the top of the hierarchy. You've forgotten what it means to fight an equal in a life or death battle."

Demila tries to shove off the floor, but another brutal punch strikes the back of her head, slamming her face into the ground.

[Kahh!]

She tries to get up again, to teleport away, to do anything. But the psionic energy in her body fails to obey her commands!

CRACK!

Gressil delivers another bone-breaking punch to the base of her skull, right where her spinal cord meets her shoulders. The impact of this punch makes Demila's entire body spasm.

[Aaah! Aaah! RELEASE-]

THUNK!

One more punch batters her skull, rattles her brain, and disorients her thoughts.

Demila's vision wavers. She loses consciousness for a moment, while Gressil squeezes her throat.

"It's been so long." The Emperor of Chaos whispers. "Breaking a strong woman's spirit... listening to her cries of pain, her pleading and begging for mercy... it's my favorite way to pass the time. Have you finally realized yet, Psion? Your body is not strong. It is only granted strength because of your psionic powers. And those powers only function when your mental state is unassailable. But too bad for you, you are merely a weak, pathetic woman before me. I know what you fear. I know how to break you. And now, you lack any ability to resist."

Demila groggily tries to move, but another punch slams into the back of her head, driving her face into the Labyrinth's floor. This time, she completely collapses, unable to move.

Gressil stands above his new prize, relishing the moment.

"Hehehe. You Volgrim are all so haughty. So used to attaining success effortlessly. But that is your greatest weakness. That is why you will ultimately help me trigger the Great Shattering. You lack the self-introspection required to-"

"HEY! Bastard!"

A voice yells from behind Gressil, making him frown. The Emperor of Chaos turns his head to see Benjamin Brown standing alongside Buddha. The two of them assume battle-stances, ready for a fight.

"Do you mind?" Gressil asks. "I was trying to give a humiliating speech to my defeated foe. It's one of the things I enjoy doing most..."

He pauses.

"Besides. You might be a Vanguard, and perhaps you were once even the Strongest Human... but you're no match for me."

The corners of Benjamin's mouth twitch uneasily.

"Perhaps not. But I won't know unless I try. And I'm eager to put you down for good."

"Your evil ways must end today, Gressil." Buddha says through his T-REX's transmitter. "Chaos has grown without restraint for far too long. It's time to return the Balance to how it should be."

Gressil stares at the two humans for several seconds. Then, he casually releases his grip on Demila's defeated form. He stands up and turns to face the two puny, pathetic insects who dare to face him alone.

"Oh, Benjamin. After I kill you, I'll be sure to take hold of that pretty little daughter of yours. She can replace some of the toys I've lost in recent years. I'll treat her just like I did my precious Birdie."

"You'll never leave this place alive." Benjamin retorts. "That, I promise."

Part 456: A Futile Struggle

Recommended Listening

Two humans. One Demon Emperor. Impossible odds.

Benjamin Brown, once known as the Strongest Human, swallows his saliva heavily as he realizes today might be the day he dies. The original plan, for him and Demila to work together to take Gressil down, has failed due to the Psion's arrogance. Now, he has to achieve the impossible by accomplishing the original plan by himself.

Of course, he does have Buddha at his side. But without any notable Heroic abilities, and while only wearing a modest T-REX, how much help can this ancient Hero possibly give him?

"GO!"

Benjamin and Buddha lunge toward Gressil's right and left. Buddha aims for the secondary half, where Lucifer slumbers, while Benjamin targets Gressil's dominant side.

Both men begin punching and kicking at Gressil, while he retaliates by swinging his fists right back at them!

Towering two full heads taller than either human, with a body thrice their weight, the Emperor holds an absolute advantage in terms of size class. Were this a boxing match between ordinary humans, he would already have an immense advantage. But that still pales in comparison to the strength granted to him by the rank of Demon Emperor!

Demon Lords cannot win against an Emperor. Neither can Barons, and not even a pair of Dukes.

Therefore, ordinary humans haven't a chance in Hell!

Gressil focuses most of his attention on Benjamin Brown. He does not act casually, but takes his opponent seriously, especially when Benjamin's steel-reinforced bones crash against his figure.

Thunk! THUNK!!

Benjamin hammers Gressil's right arms. He ducks and dodges as Gressil grabs at him and tries to deck him in the head, but the injuries he suffered from Demila's attacks earlier slow down Benjamin's movements considerably. He still hasn't fully recovered!

At the same time, Buddha strikes at Gressil's weaker side. Like a slippery eel, he slithers around, using the enhanced strength his T-REX grants him to deliver blows no weaker than those fired by Benjamin. With Gressil distracted by the Vanguard, he can't quite put enough attention on Buddha to land a clean hit.

"Excellent." Gressil praises, while Benjamin sends a tricky punch into one of his kidneys, making him wince. "You've never fought together before, but your teamwork is exquisite."

Suddenly, as Buddha and Benjamin swing their fists, Gressil vanishes. He reappears behind Benjamin an instant later with his palm raised.

SLAP!

Gressil's hand crashes against the back of Benjamin's head, flinging him toward Buddha and causing them to crash together. Both men yelp as they stumble and fall to the ground, then quickly jump back up.

Benjamin rubs the back of his head. "Motherf- nice tricks, Gressil! Too afraid to fight me like a man?! Is the little Emperor scared?"

Gressil chuckles. "Childish. I'm not stupid, Benjamin Brown. You killed Emperor Laplace all by yourself. You might be an old dog, but who knows if you've taught yourself new tricks?"

"This old dog still has teeth!" Benjamin barks. "Come here, you bastard!"

Ben's eyes glow red. He lunges toward Gressil again, with Buddha slinking around behind him. Together, they charge Gressil, this time acting more warily toward his teleportation abilities. Without any magical powers of their own, neither man can afford to underestimate the Emperor of Chaos's metaphysical aspects.

Thump! Thump! Bang!

Buddha slides under Gressil's legs and leaps up, kicking him in the back. His attack makes Gressil stumble toward Benjamin, who follows up with a devastating uppercut to the demon's chin. Slightly jarred, Gressil stumbles backward again. He tries to grab the Hero behind him, but misses as Buddha adopts a completely different set of combat movements known as the Drunken Fist. He sways around, moving unpredictably to dodge Gressil while his faceless helmet gives no hints as to his thoughts.

Gressil snarls.

The Master of Combat. People once thought Buddha was a quiet fellow who only used Karma to execute his enemies, but he has mastered all forms of martial arts, and all combat styles. Benjamin Brown is the stronger enemy, but Buddha is much more versatile!

Not quite sure which human to focus on, Gressil opts to protect his vital organs while swinging his four arms at either human whenever they come close.

However, while two heads may be better than one, Gressil's second head does not offer him any assistance. He can only properly focus on one of the humans at a time, and whenever he does, the other closes in to deliver a gut-busting punch or kick to his exposed areas.

For five minutes, ten minutes, the fight continues.

Gressil's expression becomes more focused, more wary. He finds that even though the humans are weaker than him, and certainly not up to his strength levels, they are superior in their mastery of combat. Indeed, Gressil has never fought 'properly' nor been militarily trained to a professional level. His attacks are clumsy and slow, easily predicted by the two seasoned warriors hammering him.

Like a tree being worn down by the strikes of an axe, Gressil finds that even his innate resilience does not mean he holds the absolute advantage. Perhaps another Emperor, such as Ose, would easily cope with these two opponents thanks to her millennia of combat experience, but Gressil is simply unskilled in the way of battles to the death.

"Insects." Gressil growls. "You test my patience."

He vanishes again, this time reappearing beside Buddha to try and grab him, but Buddha's connection to Karma allows him to sense the disturbance. He instantly ducks Gressil's clumsy fingers, slides under the Emperor's arm, and fires a punch at Gressil's elbow.

SNAP!!

"Aargh!"

Gressil howls in pain as the decisive blow shatters his elbow and makes his entire body shudder. Before Buddha can follow up, Gressil quickly teleports to the other side of the crater, grimacing with hateful eyes as his lower right arm hangs uselessly at his side.

"Nice hit!" Benjamin exclaims.

"He's far from beaten." Buddha warns. "Beware!"

Gressil's expression turns nasty.

"Nobody hurts me. I hurt them."

Gressil lifts one leg. He violently kicks at the floor, blasting a cone of dirt and rock across the crater toward the humans. The bullet-like fragments of compacted dirt bite into Benjamin's flesh, but he ignores the pain. Likewise, Buddha's armored body doesn't take the slightest damage thanks to the T-REX protecting him.

However, a cloud of dust engulfs the area, making both men grimace.

"Heh heh heh..." Gressil chuckles evilly. "I've been so kind to you. You didn't have to come here. You didn't have to fight me. You could have gone about your lives and I'd never have bothered with your worthless existences. But you chose to come here and die. Such a tragedy. Such a waste."

Gressil vanishes. He reappears behind Benjamin, but the Vanguard isn't fooled. He quickly hops away from the Emperor of Chaos, turning his attention to the teleporting demon...

"Wait, it's a-" Buddha starts to say, half a second too slow.

He fails to warn Benjamin in time.

While Benjamin's attention locks onto Gressil, he fails to notice a second Gressil materializing behind him. This one grins menacingly.

His fist fires at Benjamin's spine. The Vanguard doesn't see it coming.

THUNK!!

The devastating strength behind Gressil's punch snaps Benjamin's body like a slingshot. His entire momentum reverses, launching him forward and down, where he smashes into the dirt, bounces off, and continues flying helplessly until he slams into the crater's wall.

Bang!

Benjamin Brown lands in a heap. One of his arms and one of his legs twitches, visibly broken and bent in ways they shouldn't be.

"Uhh... uhh..."

"Benjamin!" Buddha exclaims.

"One down. One to go." Gressil casually comments, turning his attention to Buddha. "What will you do now that you can't rely on that Vanguard to distract me?"

Buddha appears unmoved. "Come and find out, servant of Chaos."

"I am no servant." Gressil says, as he starts stomping toward his Karmic adversary. "I am Chaos's master!"

The Emperor of Chaos clears the gap in a second. He attacks Buddha with all three unbroken arms, no longer needing to hold back due to focusing on two foes.

Swish! Swish!

Gressil swings at Buddha. He grabs at him and tries to crush the Envoy of Karma in a single blow. While Buddha's strength and defense might be enhanced enough to injure Gressil, he will absolutely fall apart if the Emperor can just get hold of him one time.

But, despite his best efforts... Gressil repeatedly fails!

Buddha switches up his styles. He bobs and weaves, shifting between combat stances so fluidly that few of humanity's most legendary figures could even name all the stances he's capable of replicating.

Jujitsu. Taekwando. Mixed Martial Arts. Sumo Wrestling. The Drunken Fist. Muay Thai. Kickboxing. Kung Fu and Karate. Wing Chun and Shaolin. Judo and Aikido...

Like a stream comprised of a thousand different black belts from a thousand different schools, Buddha dances around Gressil's clumsy movements, absolutely embarrassing the Emperor of Chaos's efforts to crush him. Were Chaos's Envoy a more egotistical demon, he might have even been driven to rage and fury, but Gressil keeps his cool, maintaining his focus on defeating the annoying gnat.

"Such speed. Such skill." Gressil praises as he relentlessly assaults the former Hero. "I have heard tales spoken regarding your fighting capabilities, but they fell far short of the legends. How long will you be able to dodge, I wonder? All it will require is one slip up and you will die."

Gressil rushes at the human, trying to pin him down with three grabs in different directions. But to his surprise, Buddha doesn't dodge. Instead, he steps toward the Emperor's claws, slaps aside his nearest arm, and sends a kick flying straight up into Gressil's chin.

THUNK!

Gressil's head snaps backward. His eyes involuntarily water as the brutal blow jars his senses.

And in that moment, a figure sneaks up on him from behind. Stealthed through one of his hidden abilities, the entity catches Gressil unaware...

Benjamin Brown grins wickedly as he pounces at the momentarily stunned Emperor of Chaos. He leaps onto Gressil's back, ignoring the agony of his broken leg. He wraps his one good arm around Gressil's neck while pressing his injured palm against Gressil's spine.

"What?!" Gressil exclaims.

Benjamin's eyes curl up. "Gotcha, motherfucker."

He activates his ultimate ability, the power of Mana Drain. Made from an exotic technology during the Energy Wars, it allows him to siphon the life force and magical energy of any other being, so long as he can maintain close contact with them.

Sluuuurp!

Gressil howls in shock as he begins to feel his abundant mana reserves deplete at an alarming rate. At the same time, all of Benjamin's formerly injured internal organs, his broken limbs, and any other ailments rapidly heal. He restores himself to full fighting condition within seconds, all while Gressil thrashes around and tries to yank him off.

"YOU!" Gressil roars, finally truly enraged. "YOU'LL PAY!"

He manages to grab Benjamin's leg, but so firm is the human's grip on his neck that Gressil can't quite get the leverage needed to pull him off.

Gressil tries to teleport away, but his ability fails! The interference from Benjamin's mana draining screws up his magic, allowing Buddha to rush in and deliver a full-power kick to the Emperor's stomach.

THUNK!!

"Guh-HUK!!" Gressil coughs, the wind driven from his lungs.

Horrified, Chaos's Envoy realizes he has grossly underestimated the power of Humanity's Finest Soldier. But he can't be entirely blamed.

After all, his rise to Emperor came well after the Energy Wars. He never fought during those days. He never experienced the terror of battling the Vanguards, and he never paid much attention to Benjamin once the war ended.

Perhaps, if he had observed Beelzebub's battle in the Slithering Spire, he might be aware of Benjamin's hidden abilities, but sadly, he overlooked that moment in time...

And now, with Buddha so close and the power of Karma making his powers of foresight less reliable, Gressil can't even predict the immediate future! This causes him to fall into a terrible predicament as two seemingly weak humans overwhelm him through their coordinated efforts!

Gressil leaps backward. He flings his back against the crater wall to try and badly injure Benjamin, but the human's exoskeleton body is more than capable of taking a beating. And with his palm draining Gressil's mana at an increasingly alarming pace, Benjamin can easily heal any damage he does suffer.

"GET OFF ME, WORM!" Gressil roars.

"Hahaha!" Benjamin taunts his enemy. "You underestimated me! You didn't realize I was tailor-made to kill overconfident Emperors like you! Now, just like Laplace, you're going to die!"

With his body fully restored, Benjamin pulls his palm off Gressil's spine and balls his hand into a fist. He launches it forward like a cannonball, plunging it into Gressil's back, tearing out a huge wad of bloodied flesh!

"AAARGH!" Gressil screams, his eyes turning frantic. "GET OFF! GET OFF!"

At the same time, the second head on Gressil's body begins to stir...

Buddha's heart turns cold. "Benjamin! Lucifer is waking up! Watch out!"

Despite Benjamin currently being attached to Gressil's head, he hasn't a single grip on the other seemingly useless and dormant head.

But he knows the power it contains.

Benjamin's stomach metaphorically sinks into his boots as he sees Lucifer starting to awaken.

"Oh, fuck."

Her gaze turns sharp. She turns to look at the Vanguard, and her third eye brightens.

"...Just what do you think you're doing, human?" Lucifer asks casually, her gaze cold. "The only one with the right to beat this useless brat... is me."

A bolt of raw magical power fires from her third eye.

Benjamin opens his mouth to scream, but no words come out.

BOOOOM!!

A thunderous blast rips him off Gressil's body and sends him flying backward. So terrifying is the power in Lucifer's attack that Benjamin's arm, which was wrapped around Gressil's throat, remains behind, torn from his shoulder as he's sent flying.

Benjamin crashes into the floor lifelessly. His body spasms and twitches, all of his former injuries far worse than before. Broken, beaten, and battered, he coughs weakly, his charred skin telling a horrifying tale of the power behind Lucifer's attack.

Lucifer glances at the robotic arm still wrapped around her son's neck. She snarls at the useless idiot for being unable to free himself, then directs her attention to Buddha. The Hero turns pale inside his armor as her third eye lights up once again.

"Sorry." Lucifer says 'apologetically.' "My son is so worthless. What an embarrassment. Can't even handle two little maggots by himself..."

BOOOM!!

Another horrifying blast detonates against Buddha's body, firing him into the ground and obliterating his T-REX armor. Burnt and charred, his condition is even more awful than Benjamin's due to his weaker constitution. Third degree burns rapidly settle in, turning his skin into a horror show.

Gressil gasps and wheezes. The painful hole in his back makes him grimace, but even more agonizing is the look his mother gives him.

"IDIOT! PATHETIC!" Lucifer roars. "YOU'RE A FAILURE! A WORTHLESS EXCUSE FOR A SON! You let your sister die! You can't even handle two humans! AHH! I hate you, Gressil! I hate that I ever chose to adopt such a miserable pile of shit into my lineage! You are a STAIN upon demonkind!!"

Gressil's former rage instantly deflates. He withers under his mother's words, shrinking back as she spends the next several minutes brutally berating him.

Eventually though, Lucifer's rage cools. She tires, her mental energy spent.

"Worthless... worthless..." Lucifer mutters, her eyes slowly closing.

Ultimately, her head lolls forward. She falls into a deep sleep once more, leaving Gressil alone, shaken and broken.

The Emperor of Chaos grinds his teeth together. He trembles uncontrollably, trying desperately to recover not only from his mother's mental assault, but the pain he suffered at the hands of these two humans.

"You... well done..." Gressil whispers. "I didn't expect... two humans... tsk..."

He slowly rises to his feet. He grabs Benjamin's leftover arm and tosses it to the dirt, then stomps it under his foot. He directs a hateful glare at Buddha, then begins to walk toward the helpless, twitching human laying in a smoking heap.

"This is... all your fault." Gressil growls. "You brought them here to kill me. And you almost succeeded. Well played, Buddha..."

He eventually stands over the shivering, naked, burned body of his enemy. He leans down and wraps his fingers around Buddha's throat.

"Any last words? Come on. You can still speak. I want to hear you beg for mercy."

Buddha remains silent. He stares up at Gressil defiantly, saying nothing.

"Tight-lipped as always." Gressil chuckles. "You must think yourself so cunning. But look at you now. A broken lump of charcoal."

Gressil tightens his grip on Buddha's neck. He starts to squeeze with enough force to instantly snap the Hero's neck.

But, as he does, he frowns.

Gressil notices something. An anomaly.

Buddha... smiles.

The Envoy of Karma closes his eyes and accepts his fate without complaint.

Upon noticing this fact, Gressil pauses. He begins to think about everything that has transpired. He loosens his grip and nods to himself while looking off to the side.

"Oh... I see. So it's like that. Haha. Haha. You almost outplayed me again, Buddha. So clever, so very clever..."

Buddha's smile fades. He opens his eyes as he realizes Gressil has suddenly rethought the act of killing him.

"Y-you..."

"Hahahaha..." Gressil laughs, even more confidently than before. "It all makes sense now."

Without hesitation, he fully releases Buddha, flicking him back to the floor. Gressil stands straight up and looks down at the Hero with an appreciative gaze.

"You almost had me. It was a double-bind situation. One that would allow you to win no matter what. Either you defeated me and ended the threat of Chaos, or you would have died at my hand. And since my power is so much greater than yours, you would not have been able to revive. You would have lost your connection to Karma... hahaha."

Gressil's vicious grin turns Buddha's heart cold.

"You're... mistaken..." Buddha gasps, gritting his teeth through the pain.

Gressil taps the side of his head. "I'm not an idiot, Buddha. I know more than you think. You must have... a successor? Yes, I see. You've picked out a replacement. All this show, this charade... it was a trick to get me to kill you. Then you could finally die for good. Be with that wife of yours in the Great Beyond. Haha. Then your progeny would rise up to oppose me. Truly a brilliant plan! And you almost succeeded."

Buddha's breathing turns ragged. "Wait! A b-bargain. Please, Gressil. Please. I beg of you... just... kill me! Look. I've given you the Psion. She'll make for a fine agent..."

"You have no leverage." Gressil says, chuckling even more heartily than ever. "Hahaha... but I accept your gift. Truly wonderful, the ways of Karma are."

He walks over to Demila's unconscious form. He flips her onto her back, then presses his palm against her face.

After a few moments, Gressil pulls away. Then he walks over to Benjamin Brown and repeats the same action. The Vanguard struggles futilely, but with many of his critical systems in disrepair, he cannot stave off the Emperor of Chaos's grasp.

After holding onto Benjamin's face for a moment, Gressil stands up and stretches his arms. He glances at his bottom right limb, frowning at that injury he sustained.

"You could have defeated me, or you could have died. Either outcome would have been acceptable, Buddha. Haha. But what a shame. I choose... neither. This outcome seems so much more fun. Don't you think? So much more... chaotic. Who knows what will happen next? What hare-brained scheme you'll concoct. I won't let you die, Buddha. And now I know to start looking for your chosen successor. Who knows? Perhaps I'll find him. Kill him. Or maybe I'll let him live?"

Gressil turns his back on the gasping Hero. As he walks away, Gressil offers one final line.

"It's so much more fun... not knowing the future. The Great Shattering is nearly here, Buddha. I hope you're ready! HAH! HAH! HAH!"

The Emperor of Chaos fades away, stepping through space to leave his three opponents laying like corpses in the dirt.

Buddha's heart sags. He slumps against the ground, tears welling up in his eyes.

"Tam...ael..."

Part 457: Wordsmith's New Ambition

Planet Earth. Deep underground, in a secret facility within the depths of the Remnant Oasis.

Inside Jason's Mind Realm, the Wordsmith and his spiritual wife, Fiona, sit at a small table across from the large and voluptuous Hero known as Mad Madam Mildred. Mildred leans back in her chair and swirls wine around in a glass while the low lighting gives the room an ambivalent atmosphere.

"Sad to say, boy, but you have not progressed well in the last few months!" Mildred proclaims. "Your growth as a Hero has been quite shoddy."

"Really?" Jason asks. "I thought I did pretty good, all things considered. I've created all sorts of unique new devices, including the Belial Booster, the Beauty Booster, the Body Booster-"

"Yes, yes, those are fine little toys." Mildred says dismissively, waving her hand flippantly. "I speak not of your wife's work, but yours. You as a Hero have not advanced even a single iota. How shameful!"

Jason and Fiona exchange puzzled glances.

"While I did construct the blueprint drafts for those devices on Jason's behalf," Fiona argues, "he still ultimately conjured them with his own power."

Mildred doesn't appear to give Fiona's rebuttal any weight. "Tell me! Why have you two come here today? What is your purpose?"

"You did call us here." Jason points out. "Though... I was hoping you would give the okay for me to use the relics in Marie's storage. My clone has obtained over a thousand relics of his own, so I'm going to be a lot weaker than him moving forward. In particular, he obtained Excalib-"

"I know plenty good and well what your clone has been up to! Harrumph!" Mildred exclaims, interrupting Jason. "The standards for Heroes have truly fallen since the Energy Wars, dear boy!"

Mildred leans forward in her chair, slaps her glass of wine on the table, and leans heavily on her elbows. She looks at Jason with a deep intent.

"You're lazy, Jason. You and Hope both. It's such a shame, considering your abilities!"

Jason winces. He nods along to her words while lowering his gaze to the table.

"Yeah. I've thought about that myself. I always take the easy way out. I'm always trying to cut corners... it's why my daughter is..."

He trails off. Fiona sighs along with his words.

"We don't have a choice, Mildred." Fiona adds. "Hope has Excalibur now. It's the most powerful Heroic Artifact in existence. We know he hates Jason. We know he has already slaughtered a Volgrim world to exact his vengeance. He probably won't target humanity as a whole, but if he goes after Jason..."

Mildred stares at the young man and woman. She snorts contemptuously.

"Hmph. And here I thought you were an intelligent woman, little white-hair. Your vision is so narrow, so confined. You even have the gall to claim you have 'no choice' but to meet artifacts with artifacts. Preposterous!"

She strums her fingers on the table while shaking her head in disappointment.

"Fiona! Jason! Tell me... what makes a Hero a 'Hero'?"

Jason pauses to think before answering.

"The power of the Heroic Aura? The abilities it grants?"

"The duty carried by its wielder?" Fiona adds.

"WRONG!" Mildred bellows, making both of them flinch slightly. "Imbeciles. Heroes do not call themselves Heroes. They earn that title! Until other humans acknowledge you as a Hero, you are not one at all! You are merely an ordinary human with a bit of extra power!"

She continues. "If merely possessing the Heroic Aura was enough to qualify one as a Hero, then Dracula would be a Hero too, and I dare you to state THAT claim out loud! Hah!"

Jason cocks his head. "But... Solomon referred to Dracula as a Hero. Not just him, but others too. And lots of people call me a Hero..."

"Oh? There are those who call you a Hero?" Mildred asks. "Who, exactly?"

"Well. Amelia was the first. Actually, Blaarjiim..." Jason says. "The angels did. Solomon did. Marie Becker, every single demon I've ever encountered..."

"I see. They are ignorant." Mildred says, her temper cooling somewhat. "Listen well, boy. The moniker of Hero did not come into existence for several generations. Even the first Hero, Jepthath, did not refer to himself as such. In his eyes, he was a Titanborn. He was a descendant of Hercules, a mixture of the power of angels and Titans and humans inside one body. It was only after the Heroic Aura had transferred several times that humanity began to call these figures the title you believe comes standard with the Heroic Aura's anointment."

For a brief moment, Mildred becomes quiet. She closes her eyes and sighs.

When she opens her eyes, a distant look takes hold, as if gazing past the vicissitudes of time.

"Through action, a Man becomes a Hero."

"Through death, a Hero becomes a Legend."

"Through time, a Legend becomes a Myth."

"By learning from the Myth, a Man takes action..."

After speaking this parable, Mildred turns her hawk-like gaze back toward Jason.

"Pharaoh Ramses spoke these words during the Second Age of humanity's rise. He, like many others, was a legendary Hero of yore. He looked to the figures of the past to guide his hand in the future. He built up his own Legend in the hopes of inspiring later generations. But what hidden meanings do you think the quote holds, Jason?"

For some reason, a faint feeling of shame wells up in Jason's chest. He looks at Mildred, and suddenly experiences the feeling of a puppy caught soiling the carpet. A deep sensation of inadequacy swallows his soul.

"...A Man can only become a Hero through action." Jason says quietly. "It is not the obtaining of power, or some sense of duty that makes them one. It is only the actions they undertake, and the struggles they fight which allow others to acknowledge them."

"Arthur was the greatest Hero who ever lived." Mildred says quietly. "Because of his feats, he became known as the Hero-King of Legend. His enemies whispered his name while cowering in fear. His comrades looked up to him with fervor and envy. His actions inspired those who came after, leading many later Heroes to rise past their limitations. But Arthur was not the most powerful of all Heroes. He did not necessarily possess the most spiritual potential, or some other god-blessed attribute."

"Who was the most powerful, then?" Jason asks.

The table becomes quiet.

Mildred stares at Jason.

She does not answer his question.

After a moment, Jason frowns.

"...Me?" He asks, slightly incredulous.

"Undoubtedly so." Mildred replies. "You should have recognized this before now. But subconsciously, you denigrate yourself. You look for easy solutions. All of this, despite possessing more than enough power to solve your problems. You even have the wits to realize your daughter's death was caused by your own failings, yet you did not think to solve the core issue."

Mildred sits up straight.

"Listen well, Jason. The Heroic Artifacts granted by Archangel Camael were certainly powerful. Every single one ultimately bestowed their original wielders with supreme authority over the people of their eras. But... did you know?"

She waggles her finger at the Wordsmith.

"No Hero has ever wielded the artifact of a fallen Hero. They may have consulted their predecessors for wisdom. They may have looked to those artifacts for inspiration. But no Hero, not even the fallen Hero known as Dracula, used an artifact from a previous generation to augment their abilities. This, despite the reality that all Heroes can interface with all artifacts to a perfect degree."

"... So why do you think that is?" Mildred asks after a slight pause.

"I... I don't know." Jason mutters. "I thought Heroes used artifacts all the time. Solomon told me that many Heroes would consult him for wisdom."

"They did. And they sought my counsel, as well as wisdom from others like us." Mildred says with a nod. "But none acted the way that you have, Jason. No Heroes took Arthur's Excalibur to smite Demon Emperors dead with it. None sought Jepthath's Dominion Rod to increase their influence over humanity. None used Ptah's Millennium Codex to build grand marvels in their image..."

"But why not?" Fiona asks. "Would this not make their power much greater? Their artifacts are tools. We should use them to augment humanity's potential."

"Not tools." Mildred says, slightly disappointed. "You think like a craftswoman, Fiona dearest. These artifacts are sacred objects. They are the homes each Hero resides within after their deaths. They are... our sanctuaries. Using them flippantly, is that not like desecrating the dead?"

Fiona blinks. Taken aback by Mildred's words, she has to spend a few moments thinking of a retort.

"Just because other Heroes didn't... that doesn't mean Jason shouldn't. And Hope already is doing so. If Jason doesn't fight fire with fire, Hope will become unstoppable."

Mildred sighs deeply. She shakes her head again, looking at the Hero and his wife as if they were simple-minded peasants from a farming village.

"You still do not understand. The powers of other Heroes should not be used like bludgeons or blades. You should not desecrate their legends by using them as tools to solve your problems. Even if they could solve your problems, you would still be doing your husband a disservice. As for the reason why..."

Mildred tilts her chin up.

"...do you truly believe you need those artifacts to match your clone's power?"

"What?" Jason asks. "Of... course? Excalibur alone- and the Dominion Rod, these and Solomon's Crown practically make Hope unstoppable. How am I supposed to compete with him?"

"Perhaps, if you had already mined out the full power of Wordsmithing, and if your clone had done so, you might be at a disadvantage." Mildred says mildly. "But dear boy... you have not tapped into the smallest portion of your abilities. You possess a god-like power, capable of shattering the balance of power. Yet you choose to use it in such painfully superficial and simplistic ways."

Mildred spreads her arms.

"Can you tell me to my face that you have reached the absolute limits of your understanding of Wordsmithing?"

"I..." Jason says awkwardly, frowning more and more by the second. "...I don't think I can make that claim, no."

Fiona's eyes sparkle with realization. "I see! We've been going about this all the wrong way, Jason."

"We have?" Jason asks. "I mean, I can definitely imagine improving my understanding of my limits, but I don't know where to start. I already received training from Solomon..."

"That training was useful, yes." Mildred says. "I have read your memories. I know of what you speak. Solomon trained you in a more general sense. He taught you what to look for when building an empire. He made you aware of combat information. But all of these things were framed on a 'general' scale. He did not teach you any useful information regarding your powers, because he could not. Solomon is not a Wordsmith. You are. It is up to YOU, dear boy, to push the limits of your powers."

"So." Jason says slowly. "I take it you don't think I should use the heroic artifacts to hold my own against Hope."

"You may do as you please." Mildred says. "Listen well, Jason. You are this generation's Hero. Hope is, too. We are your predecessors. We hold the same goals: To advance humanity's strength and stand up to the oppression we have endured from our so-called superiors. If you decide to use our powers, we will not oppose you unless you perform actions that cross our individual moral boundaries."

She pauses, then smiles kindly.

"I am your friend, Jason-boy. I have your best interests at heart. Solomon might be an arrogant old man with his own agenda, but he ultimately wants the same thing as me. I simply believe that he has done you and Hope a disservice by not allowing you to become fully self-actualized Heroes. He has made you rely on his wisdom. He has allowed Hope to become dependent on the power of others."

Fiona nods along to Mildred's words. "We came here to give Jason a fighting chance against Hope, Mildred. But I think... you might be right. Jason already has what he needs. He simply needs to become more proficient in his abilities than Hope ever could. I already know Jason can build his own artifacts, his own facilities to empower humanity, and his own self-improvement spells. He doesn't need the help of others."

Jason slowly closes his eyes.

He falls utterly silent, thinking about the exchange he's just had with Mildred.

He debates her points internally.

He thinks about his failings. His successes.

His strengths and weaknesses.

The Wordsmith takes a minute to recall his life after exiting the cryopod. He thinks about all the times he took the advice of others on their face without formulating his own thoughts.

Quietly, he realizes that he has always depended on others, never allowing himself to rise to his own heights.

The Wordsmith opens his eyes.

He sighs.

"Heroes are not born. They are made. They are not made through the efforts of others, but through themselves. They should not call themselves Heroes, because that is the height of arrogance. They should earn that title through their labors. They should strive to become the best humans humanity has to offer. They should serve as an example and forge their own legends. And when they pass away, their legends should become myths that others tell to uplift their spirits."

A pause.

"In this way, the next generation of Heroes will become inspired by those that came before. The cycle can thus start anew..."

"Finally." Mildred says softly. "You understand."

A strange feeling wells up at the base of Jason's spine. A sense of realization. Satisfaction. Contentment.

For the first time in his life, the Wordsmith does not feel the same doubts he always has in the past.

He does not hold the same shame toward his inadequacies.

He does not quietly hate himself for being pathetic, or weak, or inferior to those who came before him.

"Even Arthur came from humble beginnings." Jason says quietly. "He was a simple farmhand. A boy who obtained the Heroic Aura's blessing. A boy who caught the attention of the angels. He fought, he bled, and he died fighting for humanity's sake. In this way, he became the most powerful and respected Hero who ever lived."

"But he was not the only Hero who came from humble beginnings." Jason continues, speaking now to himself more than Mildred or even Fiona. "Joan of Arc was a simple village girl. She suffered. She fought for humanity's sake. She was burned alive by men who were tricked by the demons. Even so, she accepted her death with dignity, knowing that her sacrifice would inspire the next generation."

"So many Heroes have stood up for what was right. Some failed to reach their true potential. I cannot let myself become like the latter." Jason says, his tone becoming more determined by the second. "Everyone is depending on me. I need to earn the right to my title. I cannot cheat, or take shortcuts, or act lazily any longer. I have to become a myth capable of inspiring those who come after me!"

Fiona's heart swells with pride. She feels the passion in Jason's words from the bottom of her heart. The sudden lifting of fog from his vision. The slight decrease in guilt caused by Daisy's death.

At the same time, Jason's eyes become filled with vague visions of the future. He imagines the heights he could reach once he decides to stop borrowing the strength of others.

"You're right, Mildred. I will not attempt to borrow the strength of Marie's artifacts any longer. Thank you for enlightening me. I'm in your debt."

"HAH!" Mildred guffaws, lifting her hand to her mouth. "Silly boy, this temptress is always right! You're only stating the obvious, hah-hah-hah!"

Jason and Fiona continue to talk to Mildred for another hour. Mildred gives them hints and information regarding Jason's possible future progression without artifacts. Ultimately, she departs his Mind Realm, depositing him back in the material world.

Slightly dazed, it takes Jason a few moments to get back his bearings. As he blinks his eyes, Marie Becker walks up to him.

"Finally done yapping?" Marie asks.

"I am." Jason says.

Something about the firmness in his tone makes Marie stand up a little straighter.

"Did you have a good discussion?" She asks.

"I did." Jason says softly. "Thank you for allowing me to come here, Marie. I've decided... I will not ask to use any of your artifacts. Keep them here where they will be secure."

"What?!" Marie exclaims, this time visibly shocked. "Have my auditory processors malfunctioned? You do NOT want to steal my precious artifacts?!"

"I don't. Not anymore." Jason says.

He looks around the room at the many different artifacts present. Their simple forms, their complex ones. The artifacts that would make kings envious, and the ones which reveal the humble origins of their previous owners.

His eyes fall on one particular alcove, where a simple steel fork rests. An eating utensil which once belonged to an utterly ordinary Hero who never achieved a single feat worth noting.

I won't let that be me. Jason thinks, his heart once again swelling with determination.

"From now on," Jason says slowly, "I'm going to create my own destiny. I will not compare myself to my predecessors. I will act in a manner befitting a Hero. I will march toward the future, unwavering... and I will forge a legend worth remembering. This, I vow."

Marie's expression relaxes. "Calm down, brat. You're going to make me vomit if you keep up all this weird talk. Now, are you done down here?"

Jason nods. "I am. Sorry for wasting your time."

"No, it wasn't a waste at all." Marie says. "Now that you've disabused yourself of the notion of stealing my artifacts, you won't bug me about them anymore. And that look in your eyes... I like it. Seems like Mildred finally knocked some sense into that thick male skull of yours."

"She did," Jason says with a nod. "She did."

He and Marie walk out of the artifact vault. As they leave, Jason turns toward Momo's room.

"See you later, Momo. Maybe we'll talk next time!"

Naturally, the Satyr doesn't reply, but stays out of sight, never once showing her face to the Wordsmith.

"Hah..." Jason chuckles softly. "Such a shy girl."

Part 458: Marie's Exotic Interests

Jason and Marie Becker reach the elevator that will take them back to the surface. As they enter and Marie presses the button to head up, she turns to the Wordsmith.

"Not that I'm not absolutely thrilled to have you leave my artifacts untouched, but I have to wonder how much wine Mildred subjected you to in order to make you decide you didn't want to use my Artifacts anymore."

The redheaded scientist crosses her arms and gazes at the Wordsmith with a faint smirk, waiting for a truly hilarious story to escape his lips.

Instead, Jason simply shrugs and offers a wry smile.

"She made me realize that I've been squandering my abilities all this time. I have so much power... so much possibility, but I keep wasting it due to my laziness and lack of resolve. I've known this for a long time, but... I don't know. Maybe she just spoke with enough authority to finally snap me out of my stupor."

Jason half-expects Marie to fire off a witty-one liner at him, but her expression becomes surprisingly sympathetic.

"You've screwed up a lot, Jason Hiro. That can't be denied. But... you never had a say in how you arrived in this situation. From the moment you exited that cryopod, you've been living life one day at a time. You were only an ordinary boy from the industrial era. You weren't a hunter-gatherer or some self-sufficient nomad. And... you've suffered a lot. Particularly with the death of your daughter."

Jason blinks. "Hello? Am I still talking to Marie Becker? Did a different AI take over your personality?"

Marie doesn't laugh. "I know what it means to lose a child. Before my ascension, I became pregnant one time. Unfortunately, I miscarried. It's not the same as losing a six-year old child with a personality, or anything like that... but it's still something. Sometimes I wonder whether it would have been a boy or a girl... or what sort of person they'd have become..."

A few seconds pass. Marie looks away and rubs her arm absentmindedly.

"Why didn't you try for another child?" Jason asks. "Did you feel... guilty?"

"It wasn't exactly the most opportune time." Marie says mildly. "Benjamin Brown was the father. We were in the middle of the Energy Wars. After the miscarriage, him and I drifted apart. We never got back together."

"That's too bad." Jason says mildly.

"Yes it was." Marie replies. "But that was a long time ago. Save your pity for someone who gives a damn."

"I just didn't believe a heartless bitch could have any feelings." Jason chuckles.

Marie blinks. She crosses her arms and stands up a little straighter.

"I am a Cybernite, Jason. An Ascended Human. I am not a robot lacking feelings. I have chosen to disengage from the most useless emotions that only ever stifled me. Nevertheless, the sense of loss I felt from my child's death has never faded. I hoped you would possess the maturity to understand that. Perhaps I overestimated you."

The Wordsmith's smile fades. "Sorry. I tend to make jokes at inappropriate times. Thanks for telling me about your past."

"Don't expect me to make that mistake again." Marie grumps.

The two fall silent. After ten minutes, the lift reaches the top, and Jason stops Marie before she can open the door.

"Wait. I have a present for you."

Marie frowns at him. "A present? What kind of present could you possibly have that would mean anything to me?"

Jason doesn't immediately answer. Instead, he hold out his hand palm-up, closes his eyes, knits his brow, and clears his throat.

"Position. Enhance. Direct. Form. Transcend. Create. Artifact. Link."

He fires off nearly a dozen Words of Power, and a small bean-sized object materializes in his grasp. Marie's internal sensors buzz with interest as she notes the mysterious magical energy circulating around inside of it, as well as the somewhat 'primitive' technology, at least by her standards.

"This..." Marie says, her eyes widening.

Jason opens his eyes and carefully holds out the tiny object for her to delicately grasp between her thumb and pointer fingers.

"When last we spoke, you asked me to help you find a way to communicate with your 'friends.' I'm sorry, but I've been busy with... stuff. Anyway, I had Fiona make a blueprint in her spare time a couple of weeks ago. Just integrate that into your neural pathways and you should be able to 'establish contact.'"

Jason keeps his words vague, but he and Marie know exactly what he means.

He has created a one-of-a-kind device that allows Marie to mentally link her bio-mechanical self with the heroic spirits inside her Artifact Vault.

If the Volgrim were to learn such a device existed, who knows what lengths they might go to in order to obtain it?

Marie examines the tiny module for several seconds. To Jason's surprise and mild horror, she suddenly pops out one of her eyeballs into her palm, making him jump back in disgust.

"Eugh!"

Jason releases a weird gurgly half-scream at the unexpected body horror. Marie ignores him. She slides the bean-sized Heroic Linker into the cavity where her eyeball was, then slaps her eyeball back into place. After pressing her finger against her eyeball to 'roll' it back into place, she looks at the Hero as if finally noticing the disgust on his face.

"What is it?" Marie asks innocently. "Did I upset you?"

"Y-you popped out your goddamn eye!" Jason exclaims. "Give a fella a little warning, will ya?!"

"Thank you for this module." Marie says, completely ignoring his squeamishness. "It will completely transform my planned future trajectories. Obviously, hunting down certain other items is no longer a major issue, but I have other ways I can make use of the services our 'friends' have on hand."

"Right, right, yeah." Jason says, looking away while still side-eyeing her with tingles of nausea in the pit of his stomach. "Anytime. Don't even mention it. We're on the same side, after all."

"Indeed." Marie says.

She and Jason exit the elevator. They head out into the main laboratory, where they pass by several different projects Jason saw during his last visit. This time, though, he pays closer attention to them. Having spent a good deal of time with Unarin, Jason has become much more sensitive to the secrets contained within Marie's laboratory.

Jason walks up to a display case stacked with five sleek, fearsome-looking robots. These robots almost appear to be sculpted seamlessly out of metal, as not a single joint is present on their bodies. Singular red irises rest where a pair of human eyes might ordinarily be. Their bodies range in size from six to eight feet tall, with the shortest ones being a head shorter than Jason, and the biggest being a head taller.

The Wordsmith's heart thumps erratically. "The Volgrim know about your attempts to recreate the Sentinels, don't they?"

Marie stands beside him, a look of disappointment on her face at these five failed prototypes.

"Sentinels are all but impossible for me to replicate." Marie says, her tone bitter. "Even if I could mimic their body and anatomy, their artificial intellect, and their algorithms, they would never come within a thousand miles of the original Sentinels' battle strengths. That's because the first hundred Sentinels were built out of Living Moldanium."

"Living Moldanium." Jason repeats.

He pauses for several long seconds.

He hesitates, wondering if he should ask her...

Jason chews his lower lip. "Marie. Do you... know what Living Moldanium is?"

She nods. "It's an exceptionally rare, spiritually reactive exotic material. It's also the most durable exotic in the galaxy. The only places I can access it now are the Warpgates, but I dare not attempt to even chip off a fleck of the material, lest I draw the Founder's attention."

"But do you know where Living Moldanium comes from?" Jason asks. "As in, its origin?"

Marie starts to fire off a snide remark, but she pauses, then cocks her head. She turns sideways to look at Jason with suspicion.

"No. Do you?"

"I don't know if I should tell you." Jason says. "I had a talk with Unarin not long ago. He let me in on some important secrets. Raphael verified them as true."

"Well. I won't force you to tell me." Marie says. "Perhaps Unarin wanted to know if you could keep a secret. Blabbering sensitive topics to me would ensure you would always be on his blacklist. On the other hand, you and I are still at least tangentially humans. We are on the same side. Would you rather hold back alien knowledge from me for Unarin's sake? I doubt he gives a damn about you."

"But you do?" Jason counters.

"I give a damn about humanity's survival." Marie answers. "I think that's enough."

After a few moments of contemplation, Jason nods.

"Well, it's like this..."

He proceeds to tell Marie about the origins of Living Moldanium, how it obtained its special properties, and why it's so rare. As he does, Marie groans multiple times.

"Idiot Volgrim! Stupid, wasteful bastards! It was dragon-bone all along! And they WASTED it on Warpgates and deathbots!"

Jason blinks. "Wasted it?"

"Of course." Marie grouches. "I assumed the Volgrim were hoarding a secret supply of the exotic somewhere, but no, it's almost assuredly been depleted throughout all of the Milky Way! There are no more worlds left with dead dragon remains we can discover. They could have easily made Warpgates that didn't require Living Moldanium, but in their excess, they wasted the material on absolutely nothing!"

"The Warpgates don't require Living Moldanium to operate?" Jason asks.

"Warpgates operate under terrifying amounts of temporal flux. Microfractures are inevitable over time. A lesser exotic could weaken and eventually collapse if left unmaintained." Marie explains. "So Living Moldanium is the most 'permanent' solution to ensure 100% reliability for all eternity. But so what! Better to use a more abundant, slightly less durable exotic and save Living Moldanium for the cases where it is TRULY irreplaceable. Did you know that if a star ignites in a supernova, a Warpgate will still not be destroyed? Its inner components might be reduced to slag, but any parts comprised of Living Moldanium will remain in excellent condition, if they're even affected at all!"

"Huh..." Jason mumbles. "It almost sounds like you could make a probe capable of diving into stars and collecting data inside their interiors, so long as it was protected by Living Moldanium."

"That's exactly right! There are all sorts of terrifying phenomena out there in the universe, Jason. Never forget that. These Volgrim are so high and goddamned mighty, but they waste the Milky Way's most precious exotic on imbecilic vanity pursuits! I HATE aliens!"

She suddenly looks at Jason with interest. "While we're on this subject, I've been meaning to ask you. Have you tried replicating it yet?"

"Replicating what?" Jason asks. "Moldanium?!"

"Yes, obviously, stupid!" Marie snaps. "You're the Wordsmith. Don't tell me you've never even TRIED!"

Jason pauses for half a second.

"Well. I didn't try making Moldanium, no. But I did make... this. Pocket."

Jason reaches into an unseen pocket dimension. He plucks out a small 1x1 metal plate, a good bit bigger than his hand.

"I simply took an ordinary piece of metal and reinforced it. Repeatedly. Like... like a LOT of times. I don't actually have any tools adept at testing it... maybe you could do the honors for me?"

Marie finally gives the young man a look of praise. "How long ago did you do this little experiment?"

"It was before I knew anything about Moldanium. I was working with Solomon back then. Maybe two years ago? It was just a side project. I spent a week saying 'reinforce' over and over again. I have no idea if my magic even had any effect past a certain point."

Marie snatches the metal plate out of Jason's hand. "Follow me, brat. Let's run some tests."

The head researcher guides the Hero to a room simply named 'blasting chamber.' When Jason directs a curious look to the name above the entrance, Marie chuckles.

"If your little scrap of metal can't last forever in here, it's definitely nowhere near comparable to demonstone, let alone Living Moldanium."

A minute later, Jason and Marie stand behind a thick wall of glass, one which offers unbelievable light and heat protection while a massive inner chamber houses a huge downward-facing laser aimed at the ground. One of Marie's lower level researchers walks inside, places the scrap of metal directly below the inactive laser, then walks out.

"So you're going to blast it with energy." Jason guesses. "And if it's still intact at the end?"

"Intact is an overly generous qualifier." Marie says. "If that piece of metal shows even the slightest damage, it's nowhere in the ballpark of Living Moldanium. This laser can output one million degrees of concentrated heat onto a specific point. I use it to stress-test Demonstone."

"Oh?" Jason says. "Then my 'Wordsmithium' will definitely pass the first test. I know for a fact it's way stronger than Demonstone."

"And how did you test that out?" Marie asks idly.

"I made a blade that can cut through anything. Pseudo-Excalibur, I like to call it. It dices apart Demonstone like a hot knife through butter. But it couldn't make a dent in that little plate there."

Marie glances at Jason. She frowns slightly, then looks away.

"Something wrong?" Jason asks.

"Not exactly." Marie says. "But you know... your clone used 'Pseudo-Excalibur' to seize the genuine Excalibur."

"If Hope wanted such a blade, he could have easily forged his own. Would have taken him an afternoon, tops." Jason says dismissively. "I only made one, but I could make a hundred more if I wanted. I just think they're too dangerous to keep around en-masse. A sword that can cut anything is rather..."

He trails off.

"Can it cut Moldanium?" Marie asks.

"Haven't tried." Jason answers.

"Well. Take a swing at one of your less-important Warpgates sometime, Wordsmith." Marie says. "You can't keep overlooking such basic experiments. The scientific method is all about forming hypotheses and testing them out!"

"Didn't you just say if I damage the Warpgates the Volgrim will shit fire down my throat?" Jason points out.

"What?" Marie scoffs. "Are you too scared of Unarin to even try? Gonna pee your pants?"

Jason rolls his eyes. "Fuck off."

Marie chuckles, but doesn't push him further, having made her point.

Before long, a ten-second-countdown begins. A horrifying blast of energy fires down from the ceiling and smashes into the piece of metal on the ground. Warning symbols light up on several monitors as the laser rapidly reaches its maximum temperature. After ten full seconds of maintaining the beam's focus, the researchers turn it off, then wait for the room to cool. When they check the plate half an hour later, Jason is not surprised to see that it is entirely unharmed.

"Not bad..." Marie murmurs, looking at the piece of metal with a gleam of interest. "Jason, have you tried doing this on a larger scale? For armor systems? Spaceships? Other such things?"

"I... haven't." Jason says awkwardly. "But after the last hour of my life, I've been thinking about trying a lot of new things."

"Fine, but keep your college dabbling to yourself." Marie mutters.

After a brief pause, she adds, "that was a joke."

"Yeah. I got that." Jason replies.

Jason watches as Marie walks over to a group of her researchers. She chats with them for a minute, leaving the Wordsmith alone.

"What do you think?" Jason says softly, speaking to his mind-wife.

"I think Marie makes a good point. We could make incredibly useful armor systems far beyond what our troops use now." Fiona answers inside his head. "But it won't work with nanite-based technology. When you 'reinforce' something, you reduce its limberness and make it far stiffer."

"I can just Wordsmith 'flexible' afterward." Jason points out.

"That's true..." Fiona mutters.

Marie walks back over to them. "I'll need a few weeks to continue running tests on your 'Wordsmithium.' Mind if I keep it?"

"Go nuts." Jason says. "I can always make another one. Or another hundred."

"Mmm. It's too bad though." Marie says. "Even if this were to come close, match, or exceed the durability of Living Moldanium, it would still come up a little short..."

"In what way?" Jason asks.

"Spiritual conductivity." Marie explains. "I always knew Moldanium resonated well with artifacts and other magical objects, but I never knew why. Clearly, it's because of its draconic heritage."

"Oh!" Jason says. "I can just make it spiritually reactive. One sec. Divine! Divine! Divine!"

Jason utters three Words of Power, aimed at the slab of steel in Marie's hands. After a moment, her sensors pick up the increased spiritual frequency of the material.

She slowly looks at the Wordsmith with a dim expression.

"You... you DOLT! You can simply MAKE new exotics?! This is ridiculous! Why did the Creator bestow a moron like YOU with the power of Wordsmithing?! If I had your magic I'd have conquered the entire bloody Milky Way THREE years ago!"

Jason chuckles awkwardly. "I, uh... sorry?"

"Shut up! I don't want to hear an idiot apologize. Come with me! It's time to see if I can punch some sense into that thick skull of yours!"

Marie drops the plate on a desk and motions for one of her aides to continue running experiments on it. Then she grabs Jason by the arm and drags him out of the room.

"Men! Always, it's these dumb men thinking with their lower brain instead of their upper one! Oh gee Marie, I had a talk with the fat lady and now I've come to my senses! Piss off!"

Marie yaps out loud, talking to herself as if trapped in a terrible mental struggle over how stupid Jason is. Meanwhile, the Wordsmith gets dragged along behind her, not sure how much longer he should remain silent and endure her abuse or if speaking up will only make him sound even stupider.

"I feel like you're going a little overboard here, Marie." Jason says. "It's been a busy six years since I exited the cryopod, and-"

"Oh yes, so busy!" Marie snorts. "Going to town, having a baby and all the fun that comes with that. You were so busy playing out your fantasies with that white-haired wondergirl of yours that you didn't even realize you had the ability to create exotics! How has humanity survived this long under your hands??"

Jason cocks his head. "Exotics? Like Demonstone and Moldanium? Are there others?"

"'Are there others,' he asks." Marie groans. "Yes! Many others! Countless others! Have you not noticed the qualifier I spoke regarding Moldanium's existence? It is not the most durable exotic in the universe. Only in the Milky Way. I have zero doubt there are more exotics in other galaxies with much more unbelievable properties. We simply don't have access to them because we have not yet left the Milky Way."

Jason feels a strange sensation wash across his brain, an indescribable rush as he realizes what Marie is talking about. This is not a small matter, but something painfully obvious he has overlooked for the better half of a decade. Who knows what advances humanity might have made had he been just a bit more proactive?

Marie glances back at him, then sighs.

"I suppose I wasn't that much smarter than you when I was only 18. I even let a man lead me around by the nose for a full decade before I realized my mistake."

They arrive at the entrance to a large storage facility for exotic materials. As Marie releases Jason's arm to key in a passcode, Jason looks at the back of her head.

"That sounds like an interesting story. What happened?"

"It's my greatest embarrassment, that's what it is." Marie mutters. "I'd rather not speak about it. The first man I ever loved, my childhood sweetheart, and he was a real piece of work... tsk."

"Don't have to if you don't want to." Jason says casually.

"Then I won't."

Marie pushes open the doors to the Exotics Storage, and Jason inhales, readying himself for yet another jolt to his small worldview...

Part 459: Demila's Desire

Somewhere inside the Labyrinth, down a darkened hallway where three injured figures lay...

[Uhh... ohh... NO!]

Creator Demila awakens with a jolt. She sits upright and rapidly breathes through her nostrils, her eight eyes flicking around wildly as she scans the area.

[Where is Gressil? Where did he go?!]

Demila looks around, but she fails to find her quarry. What she does find are a pair of badly beaten and burned humans, their identities being Benjamin Brown and Siddhartha Gautama.

The Psion shakily stands up. Her head pounds with a terrible migraine, the sign of a concussion. She focuses her thoughts and quickly heals her cerebral injuries, restoring herself back to full by virtue of her abundant Psionic Energy reserves. Then she walks over to Buddha, laying crumpled in a heap. She nudges him with her foot and scowls.

[Undying Hero. Wake up! You have some explaining to do.]

Buddha groans in pain. He shakily lifts himself up with his burned arms, then presses his back against the wall. After a full minute of regaining his breath, the former Hero looks up at Demila.

"...We lost."

[I can see that.] Demila growls. [How is it possible that a single Demon Emperor was able to defeat me, let alone all three of us?!]

Buddha slowly blinks his eyes.

"I think you know the answer to that question already, Demila."

[What does that mean?] Demila snarls, leaning down to glare murderous daggers at the human. [Do you have a death wish?]

"Kill me if you want." Buddha says, unfazed. "The fact is, this operation failed because of you. You rushed in and arrogantly thought you could defeat the Emperor of Chaos all on your own. Now you've paid a price heavier than you can imagine."

[My pride will survive.] Demila says, not fully grasping the secret meaning behind Buddha's words. [For now, I'm calling this operation off. I'll need to gather another Psion, perhaps even two, if I hope to capture Gressil alive. He's too formidable.]

"More than you can ever know." Buddha grunts.

The Hero looks up at Demila with solemn eyes, as if silently evaluating her condition. He looks away.

"Before you go, would you mind transporting Benjamin Brown and I back to Tarus II? We're pretty banged-"

He pauses, then looks back up again.

Demila is nowhere in sight.

"...Psions. Nnn. Always leaving us lowly mud-dwellers out to dry."

Buddha taps the control module for his T-REX, causing the remaining nanites to half-form a broken helmet over his head. The helmet sputters to life, displaying some info for him to assess his physical condition.

Buddha sighs. He transmits a rescue request, one which will bring someone to his position within the hour. Then, he slumps forward and collapses from his injuries.

* * *

Meanwhile.

Demila doesn't give a damn about Buddha or Benjamin Brown's fates. She barely even gives them a cursory glance before flickering away.

As she begins racing down the Labyrinth's corridors, teleporting between hallways while traveling back to the Core to use its warpgates, a deep sense of shame swells within Demila's chest.

I failed. I lost to a mud-dweller. Demila thinks, her cheeks burning hot with anger. A Demon Emperor, at that. Even a 5th-level Psion should have crushed him with ease. Did I lose because Gressil was too strong? NO! I lost because I am weak! Pathetic! I let myself get distracted by his insidious words!

Demila stops running. She pauses in an empty hallways and begins pacing back and forth agitatedly.

[Damn mud-dwellers! They made a fool of me!] Demila roars. [How dare they?! I am a 7th-Level Psion. A pride of my Empire! An elite among elites!!]

Suddenly, Demila pauses. She spins on her heel and frowns while looking behind herself.

[Who's there?!]

The feeling of being watched unsettles her. Already, Buddha and Gressil have shown that her 'formidable' ability to scout any location is not as foolproof as she once thought. She focuses her vision and carefully sweeps the corridor, yet finds nothing to indicate anyone was ever there.

Just as she's sure nobody is watching her, Demila receives another intuitive warning. She whirls around again, this time facing the opposite direction.

[WHO'S THERE?! SHOW YOURSELF!]

Feeling weirdly paranoid, Demila's pupils shrink and expand over and over as her heart begins to race. Something deeply unsettles her, but she isn't sure what...

Then, from within her own mind, a voice speaks.

[Pitiful.]

[WHAT?! Who spoke? Another Psion?!]

[Not a Psion. Your own heart.]

[Who are you? How are you speaking to me?!]

The vaguely feminine voice chuckles softly.

[Hehehe... I spoke no lie, Demila. I am you. I have always been a part of you. I am your long-buried Desire.]

Demila's heart grows cold. A chill goes down her back, making her shiver.

[Lies. I am fully attuned to the sensations of my psionic seed. You are a foreign entity that has invaded my mind! I will PURGE you!]

Demila pours all of her power into her brain. She begins rapidly self-assessing herself, hunting like a ravenous predator for the 'thing' that has infected her.

However, after several minutes pass...

...she finds nothing!

The voice of Desire chuckles again. [Hehehe. Have you found me yet? Keep looking. I'm sure your search will soon bear fruit.]

Demila's expression turns ugly. She quickly puts the pieces together, then punches the wall in a fit of rage.

[GRESSIL. He did something to me! Infected me with a parasite...]

['Parasite' is such a harsh word for what I am.] Desire says smoothly. [I prefer... companion.]

[GET OUT OF MY HEAD.]

[Now, now. Don't be in such a rush to get rid of me, Demila.] Desire says playfully. [Where's that warrior spirit you Psions are so famous for? Especially when I have so much to offer you?]

[You have nothing to offer me, parasite.] Demila snaps. [I must return to Volgarius. Perhaps one of the Executors can help me purge this thing from my cerebral cortex...]

Demila starts flickering forward again, this time with increased urgency. She rushes toward the Warpgate nexus while feeling more worried than ever.

How in the hell did Gressil manage to infect her? Was it when she was unconscious?

And why can't she find the source of the infection to purge it herself?

As she moves, Desire chuckles sinisterly.

[Yes. Yes, what a wonderful idea. Return to Volgarius. Tell the Founders in great detail about what a pathetic failure you are... as if they don't already know.]

Demila's pace abruptly slows. A grimace spreads across her face.

[What... do you mean?]

[Hahahaha...] Desire chortles. [As if you don't know. Oh, I look forward to that conversation. I can already see the faces of the other 7th-Level Psions. They will look at you with even less fondness than they always have. Demila the Disgraced. That is what they will call you. A Psion so weak she couldn't even defeat one measly Demon Emperor.]

Demila slows to a stop. Her stomach twists in knots as she also imagines the piercing looks of mockery she will surely receive when she returns...

[I can't wait to see how it all plays out.] Desire continues, stabbing more pointed barbs into Demila's brain. [What will you tell them? That you had your face introduced to the ground by a mere Demon Emperor? That he infected you with a parasite while you were laying there, unconscious, incapable of protecting yourself? Some 7th-Level Psion you are! Everyone already knows what a waste of space you are, especially compared to superior specimens like Vulpanix. You're an old, washed up codger who can't ever advance further. Your Psionic Seed has stagnated.]

Demila slowly hangs her head. A deep feeling of inferiority wells up in her chest.

[I...]

[Don't even try to defend yourself. Let me inform you of a secret, Demila dearest. There are several scenarios that will play out when you return. None of them will involve my removal from your body. But they will involve your immediate and swift removal from Volgrimkind's future.]

[What?!] Demila gasps. [You lie!]

[Hehehe. Do I?] Desire whispers in a sinister tone. [When the Volgrim learn there is a demon who has compromised the thoughts of a lauded 7th-Level Psion, do you think they will let you continue to serve the Founders? Or do you think they will put a swift end to you so as to limit Gressil's influence?]

Demila's expression sinks. [They... they wouldn't...]

[Two million years old, but just as stupid as any child of a mud-dweller.] Desire sneers. [If I die, so what? Do you think you are the only 'contingency' my master has put in place? Do you think Gressil is incapable of infecting other Psions of the same rank?]

A brief pause.

Desire lowers her voice. She adopts a more 'soothing' tone.

[There, there, Demila. It isn't all doom and gloom. You've been granted a unique opportunity. It would be such a shame if you wasted it.]

Demila frowns. [An opportunity? To what? Work for a mud-dweller?!]

[Hahaha. Master Gressil would never think to make you his pawn.] Desire answers. [But... what about a partner? A collaborator, if you will?]

[I will never betray the Volgrim Empire.] Demila immediately answers, standing up straight. [Do not think yourself capable of twisting this wizened Psion's thoughts!]

[Oh, pish. The Volgrim Empire is on its last legs already.] Desire retorts. [Master Gressil does not care about some trivial galaxy-level civilization. His vision extends far further, to the corners of all galaxies, all civilizations, and all… futures.]

Desire pauses for a half-second before continuing.

[Listen well, Demila. You are a pathetic excuse for a Psion. You needed a million years to reach the 6th Level, and another 400,000 to reach the 7th. But you know in your heart that you will never be capable of making the final leap to the 8th. Luckily for you, my master has given you a great gift, one that can help you bypass those pesky bottlenecks.]

[A gift?] Demila says suspiciously. [And what would that be?]

[Is it not obvious?] Desire asks. [Me.]

[You?] Demila asks. [Lies. How can a parasite help me to Ascend? You only speak the words I want to hear.]

[Indeed I do. I am not named 'Desire' for no reason, Demila. I am capable of helping you achieve the desire most dear to your heart. I, and I alone.]

Demila falls silent. With her psionic vision, she can easily peer hundreds of miles into the Labyrinth's distant confines, where the Warpgates rest.

By walking through and turning herself over to the Volgrim authorities, she might be able to expunge this parasite from her mind. Surely, the most advanced Technopaths and Psions would know how to solve her problem.

…But doing so would require her to tell her Empire about her pitiful, shameful loss. She would have to inform them of how Gressil handily crushed her.

She would become a laughingstock. They might even kill her and her True Body just to keep her from becoming a liability.

[I am a proud Volgrim citizen…] Demila murmurs.

[You do tell yourself that all the time.] Desire counters. [But don't try to lie to me, Demila. My master could read you like a book. You are not content with your lot in life. You have a substantial amount of resentment crushing your heart. You hate that you are too weak to affect your own future. My master promises that, if you follow my advice, you will be able to break the limiters that have held you back, all these eons.]

[But… how…?] Demila asks, her resolve to fight the parasite weakening by the minute. [How do I know that I can trust you?]

[Trust is cheap.] Desire snarks. [You need only recall how Gressil introduced your eyes to the Labyrinth's floor to see the results he can give. Do you truly believe a 'mere' Demon Emperor could handily defeat a 7th-Level Psion?]

Demila slowly shakes her head. [I… do not.]

[Master Gressil has already ascended. Knowing this, do you doubt that he could assist you in your ascension as well?]

Demila stares at the wall in quiet contemplation for several long minutes.

She reflects on the last 500,000 years of her life.

The entire length of human history.

Far longer than any Demon can imagine.

She has existed for time immemorial, before the demons were even a blink in Angelkind's eyes.

Now, that same pathetic little mud-dwelling species has reached a point where one of its members can extend a secret invitation to her and her alone.

She hesitates…

[What does Gressil have to gain from my ascension?] Demila asks. [No gift is ever given freely.]

[He will gain another ally.] Desire answers. [Perhaps even a powerful one. But even more importantly, one who has opened her eyes to the stains of her people.]

[Our Empire is not perfect.] Demila says. [But it is better than what the mud-dwellers have ever achieved. And even with the Plague bearing down on us, we still manage to retain a shred of stability.]

[Excuses, excuses.] Desire snarks. [Your people have resisted Chaos's influence for too long. You lead boring, useless lives. You are uninventive. You are slow to react to new threats. That is why the Plague will defeat you, but why humanity will ultimately prevail. They possess the inventiveness you Volgrim lack.]

[We lack the touch of chaos?] Demila asks. [Buddha told me-]

[Buddha lied.] Desire interrupts. [He was happy to use and throw you aside. Let me tell you the truth: Buddha hoped Gressil would kill him. He wanted to provoke my master into doing so, because he wants nothing more than to perish for all eternity. If one Envoy kills another, the other will stay dead forever. He threw you to Gressil, and in doing so, accidentally granted you the opportunity to meet me. It would be such a shame if you were to waste this chance, wouldn't it?]

Somehow, hearing that a human betrayed her doesn't send Demila flying into a rage. She merely nods her head and sighs.

[So it's like that. And Gressil didn't kill Buddha because he recognized this plan. He is a sadistic monster.]

Demila absentmindedly lifts her head to look up through the Labyrinth's walls at nothing in particular.

[What do I do next, then?] Demila asks, ultimately resigning herself to go along with Desire's plans. [I told my superiors that I would bring them Gressil in chains...]

[Do whatever you want.] Desire says. [Do whatever you desire. I am not here to guide your hand. Only to assist you in attaining the things you want most. As for how to go about doing them, you do not require my guidance...]

Defeated mentally, Demila merely nods along to Desire's answer. As the parasitic organism goes quiet, she begins traveling toward the Core once more. But this time, she gathers her thoughts and begins to think up excuses suitable for her superiors.

It doesn't take Demila more than five minutes to travel all the way to the Labyrinth's Core. She easily hides herself from the primitive humans and demons, then travels toward one of the Warpgates.

The operators of that particular gate become utterly baffled when it abruptly shuts down, sealing the passage from the group of monsters that were about to head through it to their homeworld.

"Hey! What gives?!" One of the monsters, a minotaur, shouts. "We were about to use that, you jerks!"

"I-it wasn't my fault!" Caws the harpie assigned to lead that gate's function for the day. "W-what the heck? It's reconfiguring itself! I can't stop it!]

Suddenly, a deep and powerful voice booms in the minds of those present.

[Quiet.]

At once, half of the Core becomes eerily silent. Sensing the power of some unknown figure, the protesting monsters shut up. They look around, uncertain who spoke, while also feeling sure it must have been a powerful Demon Emperor...

When the gate opens, the monsters gasp in shock at the technologically-advanced facility on the other side. They spot dozens of aliens milling about and quickly realize the gate must have opened to a Volgrim world.

Demila steps through. She shuts the gate down psionically while deleting the spatial logs leading to this world. Then, she reveals herself to the Volgrim on the other side.

"Creator Demila." Says one of the head Technopaths for this particular receiving station. "How may I assist you?"

As a 7th-Level Psion, Demila enjoys incredible privileges that put her far above all but the absolute highest of Technopaths, let alone the manager of a facility like this one. Located on a certain remote world, its only function is to act as an in-between for transfers between various high and low-level Volgrim worlds.

[Transfer me to Volgarius Gate 3.] Demila commands. [I have business with the Founders.]

"Yes, ma'am. I contemplate, and I comprehend." The Technopath says, bowing subserviently.

He and the other Technopaths look up at Demila with appreciative gazes, admiring her powerful and resplendent figure. Naturally, they have seen other Psions of her rank and higher before, but it's still a rare treat for such a powerful envoy from the main Empire to appear before them.

A minute later, the Warpgate spins up again, opening a gate to Volgarius. Demila nods at the Technopaths, then flies through.

After taking care to verify her identity on the other side, Demila flies out into Volgarius's biosphere. She takes to space, where there is a bit less traffic around, then rushes at maximum speed toward the Founder's Fingers, some two thousand miles distant.

Before long, she drops out of the sky and flies down toward the Founder's Thumb. A powerful psionic sense locks onto her, making her feel a little unsettled.

Abruptly, the Second Founder steps out of a gap in space, startling Demila. Demila screeches to a halt in midair, finding herself face-to-face with the most powerful Volgrim in existence.

[Creator Demila.] Second Founder Dosena says, directing a critical eye toward her subordinate. [I sent you to capture the mud-dweller known as Demon Emperor Gressil. Yet I do not see his figure held tightly in your grasp...]

[I was unable to locate the Demon Emperor.] Demila quickly says, bowing her head apologetically. [I secured the services of a mud-dweller known as Buddha, but we were not able-]

[You are lying.] Dosena states.

All of the blood in Demila's body turns to ice. She continues to keep her head bowed, but the hostility in Dosena's tone leaves no room for misunderstanding.

She is pissed.

[Do not attempt to deceive me.] Dosena says, as calm and threatening as an approaching storm. [Speak the truth.]

Demila knits her brow.

[We... did find the Emperor. But... after a brief fight... he escaped. I am... sorry for lying to you, Second Founder. My shame... it is my deepest shame... that I was unable to capture a single Emperor alive.]

Dosena remains silent for a full minute. Demila doesn't dare to raise her head.

[Shameful indeed.] Dosena finally says, her tone as mild as ever. [Your Psionic Seed has stagnated. You have failed to produce results yet again. Have you any idea how poorly your performance reflects on the rest of us? How your equals speak of you?]

[I... I am aware...] Demila transmits, her mental voice somewhat strained. [I am a shameful, useless Psion...]

[Not useless. But less useful than you should be.] Dosena corrects. [I have casually followed your progression over the liminal cycles. Your results leave much to be desired. Why have you returned empty-handed?]

[I require assistance.] Demila says, finally lifting her head to look at her annoyed superior's face. [I... I require the help of one, no, perhaps two more Psions. Gressil is too slippery for me to catch alone.]

[How tragic.] Dosena comments. [Two 7th-Level Psions, perhaps even three, all to grab a single Demon Emperor. Would you prefer that I moved on him myself, Demila? Are you truly this incapable?]

Demila's face burns red with shame. A deep inferiority wells up in her chest under the Second Founder's scathing remarks.

[You are required here, Second Founder. I would not dare to ask you to act personally.]

[And yet you expect others of your Level to assist you. Do you think we have the Psions necessary to toss them out like grains of sand on a beach? We are losing the war, Creator. Perhaps you should return to the Labyrinth and try, try again, until you have finally stopped making a mockery of our sub-species.]

[Yes... Second Founder...] Demila whispers, wishing with all her might that she could just crawl into a hole and die. [This junior contemplates, and she comprehends.]

[If only you did.] Dosena says, before turning her back and stepping through space.

After disappearing, Dosena leaves one final message. [Tell Founder Unarin what you've told me. I am not your messenger.]

[Of course, Second Founder.] Demila answers, quickly bowing her head again. [This humble junior will do as she is told.]

For a short while, Demila remains in place, evaluating the life-and-death situation she just survived.

Then, she flies toward the Founder's Thumb.

My desire... Demila thinks to herself. ...is to become capable of speaking back to the Second Founder as her equal.

Part 460: A Galactic Secret

Marie Becker leads Jason into the Exotics Storage Facility. As he enters, Jason looks around to take in the sights.

Unlike the outer facility, there isn't even a single researcher inside. Only automated drones that buzz around the room, taking great care to delicately clean up and maintain the state of the facility's contents. This turns out to be forty long shelves standing twenty feet tall, each with various rocks, pieces of metal, or melted-down slag preserved inside miniature glass domes. Each shelf has multiple levels for storing their contents, with many of them high enough up that Jason would need to grow wings or levitate to reach them.

Each shelf contains at least 200 different rocks and ore deposits of various types. As Jason looks around, he begins to feel an odd tingling in the back of his mind.

Marie glances at him. Perhaps noticing the slight discomfort on his face, she chuckles.

"The contents of this room are a galactic secret. Consider yourself privileged to even step foot in here. I've had to take countless measures to ensure the facility's security, because if I hadn't, the Volgrim would never have let me build it."

"So... each of these rocks are exotics?" Jason asks. "Like my 'Wordsmithium'?"

"That's right," Marie says, leading Jason over to one of the many racks stacked with metallic plates of ore. She taps the glass on one of the mini-domes enveloping a blue-ish colored rock, one that seems somewhat crystalline to Jason's untrained eye. "But before I tell you about the contents of this room, let's have a bit of fun. What do you think exotics are?"

Jason also taps the glass dome, marveling at how firmly it resists his touch. It seems to be made out of a material a hundred times harder than 'bulletproof' glass, yet is also as thin as the panes on any ordinary apartment window.

"Contextually, my best guess is..." Jason says. "...an exotic must be some sort of raw material that has metaphysical properties."

"That's a fantastic guess." Marie praises. "Though a bit simplistic. Regarding that 'Wordsmithium' you made, how would you describe its basic properties?"

"Well. It's ultra hard. Ultra durable." Jason says. "Metallic... uh... guess that's about it."

Marie gestures to the blue rock sitting in front of Jason.

"This exotic is just one of many in my collection. Due to certain regulations given to me by the Volgrim, I am only allowed to possess small quantities of any exotic, no matter how valuable. Their scanners are very adept at detecting deposits, so I don't dare go over the limit."

Jason glances at a small nameplate attached to the shelf underneath the exotic mineral.

"Aquanite Quartz."

"That's right." Marie says. "All exotics have unique names. The overwhelming majority of them were discovered by the Volgrim hundreds of thousands of years before the Energy Wars, before the Ancient Era, and certainly before Humanity was a speck in the Creator's eye. As such, they've already been named and cataloged... sometimes by extremely boring people. Like this one over here, it's simply called 'Oxide-22.'"

"Wow. That IS boring." Jason snarks.

"Back to the Aquanite Quartz." Marie says, turning her head toward the first material. "There are four classifications for exotics, including Low Exotics, Mid Exotics, and High Exotics. There are also Special Exotics, but only a couple handfuls of materials have ever earned that label. If you look beside the name, you'll notice an alien mark. That is the Volgrim word for the exotic's classification level."

Jason does as Marie instructs. He looks at the odd symbol next to the Aquanite's name, where he sees a chicken-scratch marking he overlooked previously, due to it looking more like a defect on the nameplate rather than an alien symbol.

"Translate." Jason says. "Mmm. So this is a Low-Exotic. I guess it's not very useful?"

"All exotics are useful. The classification tends to refer more to their abundance and value in high technology, though." Marie explains. "Aquanite Quartz is relatively common on certain types of aquatic worlds. Hence the name."

"That's fine and all..." Jason mutters, "but what exactly makes it special?"

"You can feel the tingling in the air, yes?" Marie asks rhetorically. "I cannot, because my body is more mechanical than biological. But when I still possessed a body, I could feel an uncomfortable 'humming' in my bones. That sensation is something of a 'spiritual reaction.' Put another way... some of the exotics in this room possess immaterial properties."

Jason stands up a little straighter. "Wait, so this Aquanite, it has magical powers?"

"Some exotics do. But not Aquanite." Marie clarifies. "Let me put it this way. In addition to the Volgrim's classification of exotics by abundance and usefulness in High Technology, I also created a secondary classification for them. There are three primary types of exotics. Spiritual, Psionic, and Mundane."

She points at the nameplate once again. "Notice how Aquanite's name is blue. This indicates it is a Psionic Low-Exotic."

Jason blushes in embarrassment. "I assumed the name was blue because... Aquanite... water... blue..."

"Hahahaha!" Marie laughs, making Jason flinch from her unexpected emotional display. "I forgot how simple-minded you biological humans are! Yes of course, aqua equals blue! Hahahaha!"

"Come on..." Jason murmurs. "It was an honest mistake."

After Marie finishes laughing, she straightens out her expression again.

"Aquanite is an exotic that Psions can resonate with to improve their affinity to water. It also has certain useful purposes with high technology designed to submerge deep beneath planetary oceans. Simply put, it is extremely resistant to pressure caused by water and other forces, so long as the pressure is relatively constant."

"Wouldn't any other durable metal be just as useful?" Jason questions.

"Of course. But think about this: When processed carefully, you could make a glass dome out of Aquanite that would allow for an observation platform twenty miles beneath an ocean planet's surface. Additionally, Psions stationed there could improve their affinity with liquids much faster over time."

"I see." Jason says slowly. "So it has multiple useful purposes. And this is only a Low-Exotic. Surely, Mid and High Exotics will be much more ridiculous?"

"Let's take a look at this one." Marie says, gesturing to a simple grey-colored mineral, one that vaguely looks ashy and volcanic. Jason glances down at the nameplate.

"Rixite Voldust. Mid-Exotic. And the name is red..."

"Red indicates it is a magically aligned exotic." Marie explains. "As a magus, can you sense anything from this one?"

Jason focuses his attention on the ugly grey lump. As he does, he begins to feel the tingling in the back of his head become slightly more annoying. A smell like phosphorous slips into his nose, yet he realizes he does not actually smell a thing.

"Strange. Very strange..." Jason says quietly. "I'm guessing this is some sort of fire-aligned exotic."

Marie nods. "This particular mineral is always extremely hot. If you were to touch it, you would burn your hand badly. The dome sealing it prevents its heat from leaking out, but let me assure you right now, it is currently burning at over 500 degrees Celsius!"

"What? That's outrageous!" Jason exclaims. "So it never cools down?"

"If you draw the heat out of it, it will gradually begin to heat up again." Marie explains. "What you may find interesting is... Rixite Voldust can only be found on a single planet in the Milky Way. The world of Diabolus."

Jason blinks. "That's where the Fifth Hell of Calamity resides."

"Indeed." Marie says.

She suddenly falls completely silent. She stares at Jason expectantly, as if waiting for him to make a connection.

The Wordsmith recognizes this must be a test. As such, he purses his lips and furrows his brow. The gears turn in his head as he quietly converses with his mind-wife.

A moment later, Jason blinks twice.

"Wait a minute. This exotic only appears on the world of Diabolus. A world run by the demons. And you said it was spiritually reactive?"

Marie smiles, ever so slightly. "Mhm..."

"What about Aquanite Quartz?" Jason asks. "Don't tell me... it can only be found on aquatic worlds where Psions live?!"

"Not 'only' those worlds." Marie clarifies. "But much more abundantly, while other deposits found around the Milky Way have been sparse at best."

Jason realizes an important implication.

"So what you're saying is... exotics are formed naturally, over time, but they can be influenced by their ambient environment? Specifically, by the creatures that live on those worlds?"

"Now you understand." Marie says, crossing her arms and baring a toothy smile at the young man. "Didn't you ever wonder why the Volgrim would glibly hand away so many worlds to the Demons after the Energy Wars? Why they wouldn't just quietly eradicate the demons with their superior technology? This is one of the reasons."

Jason feels a deep pit open up in his stomach.

Suddenly, all those years of ponderings make sense. So many things align for him that he feels almost stupid for not realizing.

"Then... that means Demonstone..."

"Demonstone is a Mundane Mid-Exotic." Marie says. "It's plentiful, easy to find, and extremely durable. It is formed when ordinary rocks absorb a great deal of ambient demonic mana. Demonstone is one of the most abundant exotics in the Milky Way thanks to the proliferation of the demonic species."

"The evidence was right there. All this time." Jason says quietly, feeling his heart sink. "Then, does that mean Earth once housed lots of exotics?"

"More than any other planet in the Milky Way." Marie says, her voice softening. "The spread of so many conflicting sentient species caused brand new exotics to form all the time. Even humans leak ambient mana from their bodies. For example, Angelium was a Low-Exotic that could be found most abundantly in Heaven."

Jason takes a minute to collect himself. Then he begins walking around the room, glancing at each of the exotics on the shelves.

"How many have you collected?" He asks.

"In total, 1,744." Marie replies. "But I am not permitted to possess Special-grade Exotics. Not only are they extremely rare and extremely valuable to the Volgrim Empire, but Unarin doesn't trust me with them."

Jason glances at Marie. "Living Moldanium?"

"Spiritually Reactive Special Exotic." Marie immediately replies.

"Is Trifrancium an exotic?" Jason asks.

"Of course. It's one of the rare gaseous/liquid-based ones, too. It's classified as a Mundane Special Exotic. No magical or psionic properties, but plenty of scientific ones. I do possess a tenth of a kilogram of Trifrancium, but that's all I've been able to store without the Volgrim noticing."

For a full minute, Jason falls utterly silent. He thinks to himself about what he's learned, taking the time to mull over the consequences. He doesn't speak to his mind-wife, but instead just… thinks.

Eventually, he turns to Marie.

"You brought me here for a reason. You said I could create exotics. You've also demonstrated that exotics are the direct result of mana, psionic energy, and natural forces. Therefore…"

He trails off, leaving the implication to hang in the air.

Marie nods. She turns to a nearby shelf, then reaches for one of the exotics. Jason glances at the nameplate as she begins to lift the lid.

Temporal Celestite. Mundane Mid-Exotic.

She pulls the smooth black opal out, then holds it up between herself and Jason.

"This is a Mundane exotic, but don't let that moniker fool you. When combined with certain other exotics, it can unleash frightening abilities. In fact, every Volgrim military vessel uses Temporal Celestite to speed up their Hyperdrives. They can reduce time dilation by a small percentage when crossing vast distances of interstellar space. A journey that would ordinarily take a full year at Warp Seven might only take nine months."

Jason gazes at her evenly. "You want me to see if I can duplicate it."

His words are not a question, but a statement.

Marie maintains a cool expression, but Jason can practically taste the hunger coming out of her eyes.

"…If you'd be so kind." Marie says.

The Wordsmith decides to oblige. He plucks the Temporal Celestite out of her hands, then gazes at it for a moment.

"Examine. Scan. Inspect. Scrutinize. Catalog."

The Wordsmith downloads a perfect blueprint of the exotic. He copies it into the 'supercomputer' inside his Mind Realm, where Fiona gets to work analyzing the Celestite's properties.

"Fascinating!" Fiona exclaims, with only Jason able to hear her words. "Through some unknown process, this rock has managed to absorb the distant energy of a black hole's event horizon. It possesses time, space, and gravity-bending elements. I can't even fully understand how it retains these properties..."

Fiona spends another few minutes analyzing the exotic while Marie forcibly tamps down her excitement. Even so, her foot begins to tap impatiently.

"Well?" She finally asks. "Can you duplicate it?"

Jason smirks evilly, relishing this moment of weakness from the haughty researcher. For once, she's depending on him for a service, and that fact makes him feel awfully smug.

"Oh, just a minute..." Jason says slowly, drawing out each syllable. "I need to carefully analyze this exotic. Wouldn't want anything to go wrooong..."

"You little shithead." Marie snarks. "You're doing this to irritate me."

"Whaaat?" Jason asks innocently. "Perish the thought! I would never."

Marie bites her tongue. She grumbles deep in her throat, but stifles the urge to slap the little brat.

Finally, Jason straightens his posture. In his left hand, he holds the Celestite, while at the same time holding his right palm face-up.

"Duplicate!"

With a single Word of Power, Jason finally creates a copy of the exotic. Marie's eyes bolt open as a perfect replica of the original material phases into existence atop the Wordsmith's palm.

Before Jason can get so much as a single glance at the new material, Marie snatches it out of his grasp and quickly begins looking it over with her retinal sensors.

"Finally!" She exclaims. "Took you long enough!"

"Gee, Jason. Thanks, Jason." Jason says sarcastically. "Anytime, Marie. Always glad to help, Marie."

"Shut up! Let me have a good look at this..." Marie says, trailing off.

Jason watches as the Head Researcher's mechanical pupils shift and twist, zooming in on every corner of the newly formed exotic material.

After a full minute, she begins to frown.

"Hmm."

Jason's heart sinks. "Didn't work?"

"It did..." Marie says slowly. "But the copy is... let's say, flawed. It has perhaps two percent of the original exotic's ability to bend space. It's as if you intended to clone yourself, but instead accidentally made a baby-Wordsmith. They're the same physiologically, but completely different developmentally."

"Hmm..." Jason grunts. "In the past, I tried to duplicate Solomon's Crown for my wife. I failed, no matter what methods I tried. Maybe this is a similar situation? Copying the more esoteric elements might not be possible."

He pauses.

"But..."

"But?" Marie asks, looking from the exotic up to his face.

"This is a different situation." Jason says thoughtfully. "I'm not trying to duplicate a highly complex spiritual computer like Solomon's Crown. I'm trying to duplicate a rock with some metaphysical properties. Maybe if I..."

The Wordsmith once again holds up the original Celestite stone. Then, he utters the same Word of Power as before.

"Duplicate."

A second copy of the Celestite materializes atop his palm. But this time, the Wordsmith cocks his head. "Modify. Adjust. Enhance. Examine. Inspect. Enhance. Undo. Inspect. Compare. Paradox. Examine. Undo. Space. Examine. Undo..."

Marie remains silent. She carefully observes the rock in Jason's hands as its metaphysical properties change, shift, and reform over and over. Repeatedly, the Wordsmith makes a change, examines how the change affected the mineral's composition, then undoes the change to try something else.

Ten minutes pass.

Twenty.

Thirty...

Eventually, Jason stops his attempts to duplicate the mineral. Seeing the look on his face, Marie's expression becomes hesitant.

"You failed?"

"I can't duplicate it." Jason says. "I probably can't duplicate any of these exotics. But..."

For the second time, Marie's expression lights up. "But?! Quit keeping me in suspense, boy!"

"I can't duplicate exotics." Jason repeats. "But perhaps I can make my own."

Marie slowly nods. "I considered that possibility. But what sorts of exotics would you make?"

"I don't have enough experience with them to know what's even possible." Jason says. "Whatever wondrous effects the original Temporal Celestite has, I can't copy it exactly, but I think I could make a different type of exotic with similar effects. It might be better or worse, I can't say for sure."

"That is a more-than-acceptable compromise." Marie says. "How about this. Put a Waypoint down inside this storage facility. You may feel free to return here at any point in the future to study and draw inspiration from these exotics. Perhaps sooner rather than later you'll even be able to make your own."

"I want to do more than that..." Jason says, thinking back to his conversation with Mildred. "I want to create artifacts capable of empowering humanity."

Marie blinks. "Oh? That's... more ambitious than I expected from you."

"I only recently decided to try doing this." Jason says. "After I had a talk with a 'friend.'"

"Ah." Marie replies. "So it's like that. Hmm. Well, I will try to help you if I can."

Jason places down a Waypoint, then he and Marie start to exit the exotics storage. As they do, the Wordsmith frowns.

"You used to be so opposed to helping me. You always complained and got annoyed at the thought of me doing my own thing. What's changed?"

"Everything has changed." Marie says, her tone slightly glum. "I used to have everything under control. Humanity, the demons, and the Volgrim coexisted. You might think the humans got the short end of the stick, but aside from demonic raids on their colonies, your people lived in relative comfort. Sure, the Threat was starting to grow, but we had thousands more years before the Plague would become a major issue. Plenty of time for me to complete my work..."

Jason's frown deepens. He turns his head to glower at Marie as the two of them walk.

"Your work? What work? What are you not telling me?"

"It's better if you don't know." Marie answers. "You have your secrets. I have mine. Let's just say... the work I do will have huge ramifications if I succeed."

"The secrets I possess are nothing at all." Jason says. "Outside of reading my inner thoughts, you've already proven you know a frightening number of things about me that I'd rather you didn't. Meanwhile, I know barely anything about you. How can I consider this a fair and equitable trade?"

Marie pauses her stride. She turns to face the Wordsmith and crosses her arms.

"Have I screwed you?"

Jason pulls back, as if slapped across the face.

"E-excuse me?"

"You heard me." Marie says. "Have I screwed you? As of this moment, have I done anything to hurt you or your ambitions?"

"Oh. That's what you meant. Don't use such... ambiguous wording..." Jason grimaces. "As for screwing me... not that I know. But maybe you have in secret and I won't know for months, or even years."

"I haven't." Marie says, her tone firm. "I have secrets. Yes. But I'm not your enemy. You are a small fish in a big pond, but you think you are a shark. You're not. I could have sold you out to Unarin for some quick gains, but I didn't. I even covered for you when your dumb ass blundered around in front of Confessor Vulpanix. Our goals do not conflict, so you can rest easy regarding my motivations."

"You say that, yet you still won't tell me what those goals even are." Jason points out.

"They're bigger than you can imagine." Marie says, picking her words carefully. "Let's just say... the Volgrim are a threat, but they are not The Threat. Even the Kolvaxians... they are only the beginning."

Marie looks away. She shakes her head and silently exhales.

"It's so dangerous... out there... in the Void. The Volgrim aren't ready. You're not ready. Even I'm not ready. Once the monsters come out, daddy's shotgun won't scare them away. Not if it's loaded with birdshot. We need something bigger. We need an unbreachable defense..."

Marie chews her lower lip thoughtfully. She shakes her head again, then returns her gaze to Jason, as if remembering she was talking to him.

"I'd like to talk to your wife in private, Jason." Marie says. "While we talk, you should pay the Lizardmen a visit. You've never gone to see them, not even when Kar was alive."

A pang of guilt flickers through Jason's chest. "Yeah. Kar. I guess I owe that much to the big guy."

As Marie leads Jason toward the exit to her inner sanctum, Jason contacts Phoebe through magical means, telling her about Marie's request.

The Wordsmith ultimately closes the connection. He ponders the day's events to himself silently.

A better future for humanity. For the whole galaxy...

Part 461: The Secret Garden

Jason and Marie eventually reach the exit to her research facility. As they stand and wait for Rebecca and Phoebe to arrive, the two continue to talk about idle matters.

"Don't forget your promise." Jason says. "I'll be taking 300 Cybernites off your hands."

Marie waves her hand. "Yes, yes. I hope they'll help you accomplish at least some useful goals. They certainly aren't doing me any good here."

"I don't understand." Jason says. "Don't all Cybernites have access to Umi's mainframe? Aren't they all just as capable as you of inventing and doing other busywork?"

Marie snorts. "Jason, the Law of Individuality is always present. Not only in humans, but even in the Volgrim. Do you think the Volgrim are a hivemind where all are just as brilliant as Unarin? By no means. The same is true of my Cybernites. Even if you connect the entirety of humanity to some fancy thought-sharing device, you'll still have a gigantic portion who are much duller than the rest. Don't think you're getting some good deal taking 300 geniuses off my hands. While these Cybernites might be lightyears more advanced than the dullards on Tarus II, they're still the bottom of my metaphorical barrel."

"Maybe so," Jason replies, "but they will still help me make rapid advances. I hope you won't do something cruel like wipe their memories. I might really come back and steal all your artifacts."

"You little brat." Marie chuckles, lightly socking his arm. "Don't toss threats around so casually or I'll have to teach you a lesson."

They continue yapping for twenty minutes. Eventually, the door to the entry office opens, and Rebecca steps through, along with Phoebe.

"Jason!" Phoebe exclaims. "I had SO much fun here! You would not believe all the crazy gadgets Rebecca showed me- oh! Hello, you must be Marie Becker."

Phoebe pauses her explanation to quickly and politely greet the Head Scientist. For her part, Marie smiles warmly at the Hero's Wife.

"Miss Hiro. I've heard so much about you. I've also seen the rapid gains you've made over the last six years on Tarus II. Your learning speed is truly commendable."

Phoebe blushes. "No, no. I cheated, after all. I wore Solomon's Crown for quite some time. If I didn't have the Crown, I wouldn't have amounted to much."

Marie raises an eyebrow.

"You think wearing Solomon's Crown is what made you smart. Hmm. Perhaps you're right. But then, considering this husband of yours also wore the Crown..."

Marie directs a slow, smug glance over to Jason. He rolls his eyes.

"Oh, hah-hah. Laugh it up, Marie."

"It's like I said before," Marie replies, "give a thousand people equal access to information, and some will... rise ahead of the curve. Others won't."

Phoebe continues to smile, but the expression becomes strained and awkward as she looks from Jason to Marie and back to Jason again.

"Am I missing something, or...?"

"I'm gonna go ahead and leave now." Jason says, turning to his wife. He gives her a quick kiss, then turns to Rebecca. "Mind showing me to the Lizardmen's home? Phoebe and Marie are going to talk about smart people stuff so I wouldn't want to get in their way."

"Jason!" Phoebe exclaims.

"Kidding, honey." The Wordsmith laughs. "Contact me when you're all done looking at Marie's gadgets."

Jason leaves his wife behind and exits the facility with Rebecca. After a short while, Rebecca looks backward longingly.

"Miss Becker never did end up letting me assist her in the primary facility." She says, her tone forlorn. "I'm doomed to uselessness."

Jason smiles. "I wouldn't go that far. As it just so happens..."

Jason spends the next several minutes explaining the deal he made with Marie. Rebecca listens quietly while he explains. At the end, Jason frowns.

"...You don't have to come along if you don't want to." Jason says, noticing her sadness. "You're a free individual, not a slave."

"No. I'll go to help your people." Rebecca says. "It's just... now I feel worse than ever. I really am useless, aren't I?"

"No, no." Jason says. "You're really smart! You're a genius, especially compared to an idiot like me."

"Miss Becker thinks I'm trash." Rebecca mumbles. "Don't you see? We Cybernites are supposed to be Pinnacle Humans. But she decided 300 of us were so unable to contribute that we'd be better off discarded to some inferior-"

Rebecca pauses, suddenly realizing she was about to say something extremely rude.

Jason and the low-level researcher pause at the edge of a catwalk. He turns to face her and smiles.

"You know, Rebecca, you're one of the only links to my former humanity. My old existence. You were the last person I saw before I entered cryostasis. Would you rather stay here and work under Marie, scrimping and scratching to try and rise from the bottom to slightly-above-the-bottom? Or would you rather come with me and help make a real difference in the lives of others?"

Rebecca scratches her neck. She doesn't look Jason in the eyes.

"I don't know."

"Well, I do." Jason says. "I'm lucky enough to possess a godlike power known as Wordsmithing. But that's only a privilege granted to me by Fate. I used to call myself a Hero, but recently I've realized using that title was the height of arrogance. What defines us is not the titles we give ourselves, but the effects we have on the world around us."

He continues. "Think about Marie Becker for a minute. What makes her special?"

Rebecca pauses to think.

"Her intelligence. Her inventions. Her leadership during the Energy Wars."

"Wrong." Jason counters. "What makes her special is that she was born with high intelligence, but she didn't waste it. She put it to use making a difference. You might not be as intelligent as Marie, but you're still plenty smart yourself. Do you truly think Marie Becker was the smartest person on Earth, either during the Energy Wars, or today?"

"Well. Yes, I do." Rebecca says frowning. "I think you're underestimating the Head Researcher's brainpower, Wordsmith."

"I know for a fact Marie wasn't the smartest person on Earth." Jason counters. "Solomon was. Anyone who possessed his Crown, therefore, was smarter than Marie. But the thing is, those people wasted their intelligence. Marie possessed less knowledge than them, but figured out how to use her intellect to change humanity's course. You can do the same now."

Jason crosses his arms.

"I recently spoke to Founder Unarin. Between him and Marie, who do you think is more brilliant?"

Rebecca chews her lower lip. "I don't know."

"The answer is, intelligence isn't a matter of numbers." Jason explains. "IQ is only a relative indicator of genius. Marie might be a brilliant inventor, but I think you'd be hard-pressed to say Unarin is less intelligent when he has successfully guided the path of a galactic super-civilization for millions of years."

"And what about Emperor Ose?" Jason asks. "I think we can both agree she wasn't as smart as Marie. She didn't invent as many incredible things. But she still made a huge impact on demon civilization. She changed its future and charted a path that made it second only to the Volgrim Empire."

"But Ose is dead now." Rebecca hesitantly points out.

"So? Everyone dies eventually. Unarin will someday, if not to his people or some external enemy, he'll die during the universe's heat death. Marie will die. I'll die too. In the meantime, does that mean their achievements become useless?"

Rebecca seems to realize something. She nods along to Jason's words, and a faint light sparks in her eyes.

"I see. I could stay here, at the bottom of the Oasis's hierarchy. But... I could also leave and help make a real difference for humanity out there, where people need me."

Jason squeezes her shoulder affectionately and smiles. "Right. And I think that is exactly the choice you should make."

A moment later, Jason realizes his touch might be taken the wrong way, so he retracts his hand. He and Rebecca continue walking and talking, with Rebecca showing visibly more interest in helping humanity's future progress.

"Of course." Rebecca says in response to one of Jason's questions. "I know all fifty thousand Cybernites in the Oasis. I can help convince the other 299 to come along."

"That'll save me some trouble." Jason says. "I'm also going to put you in charge of the Cybernites on Tarus II."

Rebecca visibly flinches. "W-what? Me? No, I don't think that's right... I'm not much of a leader, Jason."

"And you think I am?" Jason jokes. "I was just Some Dude. Then I traveled to the future and found out I possessed some ridiculous magical power. I ended up becoming a Chosen One. But I didn't have any formal training for ages, and even now I still feel like a fish out of water half the time. You'll pick stuff up as you go along."

That seems to calm Rebecca down. The Cybernite woman continues leading Jason across catwalks and down hallways until they reach a large circular steel door. When Rebecca approaches, the door opens from the middle, splitting in half to reveal an interior filled with shelves, each of the shelves possessing thousands of plants of innumerable species. These plants often appear to have originated from Earth, but plenty of them appear totally exotic. Jason even spots one plant that appears to be perpetually on fire, yet doesn't burn the others nearby.

As he enters the room, Jason notes the presence of more than a dozen Cybernites. Some of them are men, and others are women. They glance at Jason and some of them even raise their eyebrows, but none bother talking to him. They go about their work, maintaining all the plants by watering and pruning them. In the case of plants like the fire-flower, they instead sprinkle some strange-smelling soil at its base, likely a fuel to keep it burning.

"This is the entrance to the Lizardmen's home." Rebecca explains. "They may seem like a cute little warrior species, but they play a very important role here at the Oasis. They help maintain its biodiversity."

Jason nods. He walks behind Rebecca, past half a dozen additional Cybernites he didn't see when he entered, toward a space located on the opposite side of the thick, foliage-covered shelves.

He looks down and finds to his mild surprise that the floor has disappeared and instead become replaced with dirt. He seemingly steps from a futuristic technological utopia into a lifelike jungle, complete with trees and sunlight beaming down from above.

Behind the shelves lays a hidden world, an underground jungle that opens up in a huge way, revealing a vast underground area Jason had no idea even existed!

"Whoa."

The Wordsmith's eyes widen. He walks through a curtain of vines and enters a lush tropical forest. The sounds of crickets and other alien-sounding bugs reaches his ears for the first time. As he looks around, Jason becomes entranced by the absolute beauty of this region.

Birds fly through the air. The 'sky' above appears no different than one he might expect on Earth itself. In the far distance, he even spots a massive oak tree, one that resembles something Uzziel herself might create in the image of Yggdrasil.

"Is this... am I in a hologram?" Jason asks.

"No." Rebecca says. "It's all real. But it is sort of a trick. This realm was not created with technology, but through magic."

It takes Jason a moment to think up an explanation.

"The fairies?"

"That's right. The fairies used their Formation Magic to create a world far bigger than the space underground would usually allow. It contains countless profundities of space and time. One hour in here is only about 15 minutes outside. It has a TDR of 1 to 4."

"TDR?" Jason asks. "Time Dilation Ratio?"

"Mhm. How'd you know?" Rebecca asks, slightly surprised Jason could make such a guess.

"Uh. My wife told me." Jason says. "My second wife. The one in my mind, I mean."

"Right..." Rebecca says, narrowing her eyes. "Your other wife."

"Come on, I already told you it's not what you think."

"Uh huh. Sure thing, stud." Rebecca says with a snort.

Jason resists the urge to facepalm. He and Rebecca continue walking deeper into the interior, and she takes the time to explain the region's other secrets.

"The truth is, there isn't only one formation here. There are dozens. They're all extremely high-level. Profound in a way that I don't think I could explain. As a magus, you should be able to decipher some of their intricacies with your Wordsmithing, but I don't think you'd ever fully understand them. There are also invisible walls that will shift you to other regions scattered around the Oasis via silent teleportation gates."

"We have something like that on Tarus II." Jason says. "Leading to a certain artifact of mine."

"Mhm. Camael's Cube." Rebecca says.

"The hell?" Jason snaps. "How do you-?!"

"We always keep an eye on you, Wordsmith." Rebecca says. "I explained that much. What, do you think we're going to steal your big shiny toy? You can keep it."

Jason notes the pointed edge to her jabs. "You're more like Marie than I first thought. I wonder if it's normal for smart people to also be huge jerks."

"It does somewhat come with the territory. But sorry." Rebecca apologizes. "I don't intend to be rude. It simply... happens."

"Reassuring."

Jason and Rebecca stomp along until they reach a sparkling, beautiful stream of water. Rebecca steps past it, but Jason pauses at its edge. He kneels down and scoops up a handful of the water.

"Inspect."

Rebecca turns to look at him. She raises an eyebrow as he cups the liquid to his mouth and takes a sip.

"Wow!" Jason laughs. "Now that's some goddamn water! Freshest H2O this side of the Milky Way!"

"Naturally the liquid inside this area contains no impurities." Rebecca says mildly. "Though... I am always surprised by the simple-minded joy you take in such mundane matters."

"It's not mundane at all." Jason retorts, while slurping another sip of the delicious water. "I grew up on Earth, the same as you. We lived during a time of great pollution. It's a real joy to enjoy some delicious, untainted water."

"Isn't Tarus II's water just as fresh?" Rebecca asks. "It's not like the planet has any major industrial activities going on..."

"Well. Yeah. It is." Jason says hesitantly. "But this still seems to taste better. Maybe because most of the plants and stuff around here are actually from Earth. I like Tarus II, but it's never truly felt like 'home' to me."

"You could just Wordsmith it to have a similar ecosystem to our former homeworld." Rebecca says, as Jason stands up. "It's not like you lack the mana, thanks to the Cube."

"Mmm... you're probably right." Jason mutters, as he falls into thought. "...You're probably right."

They venture further into the forest. At one point, they even pass a pair of vicious-looking wolves plucked straight out of Earth's biosphere, but the animals don't seem to smell or sense Jason and Rebecca's presence at all. The Wordsmith frowns as the animals walk right past them, sniffing the air to look for prey.

"Okay. That was weird." Jason says, looking at the Cybernite.

"We want the ecological balance to be maintained as pristinely as possible." Rebecca explains. "While we're here, various magical and technological systems will do their best to ensure the wildlife doesn't notice our presence. That way we can observe them without disturbing their natural cycles. This forest is a sacred place, after all."

After another hour of walking through the seemingly unending forest, the two reach a large palisade wall, one that appears decidedly artificial compared to the natural forest around it. Large logs stick up and outward, with spiked ends capable of repelling any wild creatures that might think about jumping over the barrier.

A single path leads through the wall, where two massive Lizardmen stand outside, guarding their village's entrance.

Jason peers past the guards. He spots tens, hundreds, perhaps even thousands of huts behind the wall, all safely protected from the native wildlife, but also kept away so they won't disturb the ecological balance.

As the duo approaches, one of the guards lifts up their chin. Resembling a bipedal salamander, the blue-scaled monster casually walks over to Jason and Rebecca while loosely holding a wooden spear in their hand. As they approach, Jason realizes this guard, and likely the other one, are both females.

"Greetings, Lady Rebecca." The salamander says. "You've brought the Wordsmith!"

Jason's eyes widen slightly. "You recognize me?"

"Of course!" The guard says. "We all partake in the Ancestral Memories. We all know of the lauded Wordsmith's appearance. Why, our former king, Kar, often spoke highly of you, though he did mention your mental acumen was..... underwhelming."

The long, slow pause before the final word makes Jason blush in embarrassment. "I'm, uh, still working on improving that. Is Ghidorah here?"

"Yes, yes. King Ghidorah has once again taken reign, though it saddened him to do so. I'm sure he will be pleased to see you once again, Jason Hiro."

"I don't know about 'pleased'..." Jason murmurs. "If I had been a better Wordsmith, perhaps Kar might still be with us."

"Lord Kar's soul still lives on." The guard says sagely. "From what I understand, there is a rescue operation currently underway to retrieve his soul!"

Jason's heart skips a beat. "What, really? The Lizardmen are planning to chase down Mephisto and recover Kar's soul? But how will you be able to find him? Not even my Wordsmithing has been able to dig out that bastard's position!"

The guard pauses for several long seconds.

She glances at Rebecca, then back at the other guard, who shrugs.

She returns her attention to the Wordsmith. "I do not understand. Was it not you who planned out the rescue operation, Wordsmith? We Lizardmen are not strong enough to rescue our former Lord. This weakness is our deepest shame, graugh! That is why we were elated to hear the news of humanity's movements!"

This time, it's Jason who is at a loss for words. "I had no idea there was any such rescue operation planned out. Do you know who's involved?"

"Of course! Monster Queen Blinker, the matriarch of our people! Not only her, but several other fairies, the Archangel Uriel... and even that Demon Emperor, Beelzebub!"

"WHAT?!" Jason shrieks. "Freaking BEELZEBUB?! Why does nobody tell me these things?!"

Rebecca clears her throat. "I didn't know you were unaware, Jason. From what I've heard, the rescue party finished forming only a few hours after we left. They should have left the Core by now and will be on their way to try and hunt Mephisto down. But you need not worry. They've assembled a terrifying strike force. I would be very surprised if they failed their mission."

"I should go!" Jason shouts. "I need to help them. Locate!"

Jason fires off a Word of Power to search for Blinker and the others, but Fiona stops him.

"Jason. Do you think Blinker is stupid?"

Taken aback, he shakes his head and turns his thoughts inward.

No, honey. Of course not. Why even ask?

"If Blinker needed your help, she would have requested your assistance." Fiona points out. "Even if this was a last-minute rush, do you think she'd be so stupid as to put her babies in harm's way? She must have significant assurance she'll be able to pulverize Mephisto's bones. Have some faith in her capabilities. She IS the Monster Queen."

Jason's expression darkens.

But... what if something happens to her? Kar already died because of my inadequacy. I would NEVER be able to forgive myself if the same thing happened to his wife!

"Like I said." Fiona repeats. "Have faith. Feel free to contact Blinker and ask if she wants help, but don't try to force your way in. She has her pride. She's not some helpless little girl. She's someone who already beat the crap out of Mephisto once and sent him scurrying away. If anyone should be fearful right now... it's him."

Alright. Jason thinks. I'll just contact her magically and ask if she wants my help. But I'll respect her wishes, whatever they might be.

He returns his attention to the salamander guard. Having finished his conversation with Fiona at the speed of thought, no time at all passed in the material realm.

"On second thought, I'd rather speak to Ghidorah first. Can you lead the way?"

The guard nods. "Most certainly. Lady Rebecca, Wordsmith, please follow me. Our king has been hoping you would drop by for a while now."

"Happy to oblige." Jason says with a smile.

Part 462: Unwanted Harem

Somewhere inside the depths of the Labyrinth, a hunting party comprised of over 500 individuals goes on the prowl.

Led by the Monster Queen, Blinker, its goal is to locate, hunt down, and kill Demon Emperors Mephisto and Yama, while hopefully killing Zamiel and attempting to rescue the former Monster King Kar's soul.

Blinker travels with powerful allies. Not only Fairy Princess Melia, but her retainers, Saria and Ruto. The newly ascended Emperor of Hellfire, Beelzebub, also joins this company, though the others appear hesitant at his accompanying them. His role is not only to assist them in killing their Emperor enemies, but more importantly, to use his demonic connections to actually locate the Emperor of Legions.

Newly added to their squad is a certain almighty being, the Archangel of Retribution, Uriel. This haughty woman lingers behind the others, walking with her arms crossed while idly glancing toward any distant patches of demonic energy to see if she can sense Mephisto's location. She fails, but that doesn't stop her from trying. Uriel continues to wear the rings of her three brothers, rings which cause her already impressive repertoire of abilities to vastly expand.

As for the other hundreds of individuals, these consist of heavily armed soldiers granted to Blinker by Neil Adams himself. To assist her in slaughtering one of humanity's enemies, Neil gives her access to a platoon of his finest soldiers. Many of them consist of humans, but a surprising number are monsters as well.

One final unexpected addition to Blinker's convoy turns out to be the cute and adorable Kiari, the Emperor of Pestilence. Unlike the others who wear somewhat gloomy expressions on their faces, Kiari walks along with a bit of a skip in her step. She manipulates her bugs, sending them down thousands of corridors to get an early jump on the search, fanning out to look for Mephisto's whereabouts.

"Sooooo, Beelzebub!" Kiari chirps. "How have you... been?"

Beelzebub forces a smile. "I'm doing well, Kiari."

"Mmm. It's a little weird, you know?" Kiari idly yaps. "I freed you from Rosalia's dungeon but had no idea you were... you! I didn't believe you even when you told me!"

Beelzebub gazes at the charming demoness. "That was a bit silly of you."

"Well, I just like to give people the benefit of the doubt." Kiari says, shrugging. "You ARE going to be a better person, right? Because what you did was... it was really bad, Beelzebub."

Beelzebub looks away.

"It was. I'm sorry."

"Apologies don't fix everything." Kiari says, a little more seriously. "But they're a good start! Once you acknowledge the problem, you can start fixing it! Though... we can't ever bring my friends back..."

Kiari's innate cheerful nature contrasts with her internal realizations. She struggles with how she should treat Beelzebub.

"I can't bring anyone back." Beelzebub replies. "But at the least, I can stop killing more. I can put my strength to use for humanity's sake. For demonkind's sake. I can ensure no others do what I did."

As the two of them talk, Fairy Princess Melia directs a subtle but scathing gaze at Beelzebub's back. She doesn't say anything, but her eyes tell a story regarding her inner thoughts. She lightly flaps her wings and flickers forward, instantly jumping ten feet to arrive at Blinker's side, not far behind the Emperor of Hellfire.

"I hope we can trust him." Melia says, twirling a finger idly around her long green hair. She doesn't bother worrying if Beelzebub's sharp hearing can pick up her words.

"I don't care." Blinker says idly. "I need my husband back. Revenge comes second."

"He could be leading us into a trap." Melia points out. "Though it is unlikely."

Blinker appears unimpressed. "We have one and three-half Archangels with us. If Beelzebub betrays us, he'll be paying the Great Beyond a visit REAL soon."

Behind Beelzebub and Kiari, as well as Blinker and Melia, Archangel Uriel blinks her eyes wearily. Two rather-annoying fairies metaphorically buzz around her, showering her with questions.

"I was born way after the Energy Wars, so I've never seen an Archangel before! Is it true you can summon weapons made of light?" Fairy Ruto asks, her blue hair bobbing around as she peppers Uriel with questions. "Can you call down Heaven's Judgment? Can you smite Demon Emperors dead with a wave of your hand?!"

"I heard angels can fly really fast! Can you fly faster than a fairy?" Saria asks, her own green-hair bouncing around her neck as she talks. "We should have a race! You versus me and Ruto!"

Uriel remains aloof, only shooting mildly disdainful looks at the two annoying brats.

"We Archangels are not known for our... patience." Uriel says quietly.

"Understandable!" Ruto exclaims. "That must be how the demons beat you during the Energon Wars!"

"What?!" Uriel snaps, glaring at Ruto. "Art thou attempting to enrage me?"

Realizing she's said something wrong, Ruto quickly backs away. "No no, haha! I misspoke! I'm sorry, Miss Uriel! I just really admire you! You're such a cool lady, a real badass!"

Uriel tampers down her anger. "Mmm. Well. To answer thy infinite questions... I can indeed summon blades of light. But generally, I prefer to wield spears."

With a quick flourish, she uncrosses her arms, flicks her wrists, and conjures two brilliantly shining spears of light, awing both girls.

"Wow! So pretty!" Ruto squeaks, stars dancing in her eyes. "Can... can I have one?"

"Verily, they shalt fall to pieces when they depart my grasp." Uriel says blandly, making another motion to desummon the weapons. "I once possessed two incredible artifact spears forged by my sister, Camael. But sadly, they were lost during the Ancient Era..."

"Oh... that's too bad." Ruto says.

She and Saria continue talking to Uriel for a while, but eventually they decide to move on to other things.

As the hunting party continues to follow Beelzebub and Kiari's guidance, Saria and Ruto playfully zip around, looking at all the humans wearing faceless T-REX's. Most of the nanite armors look identical to the others, with minor variations in body size and shape, particularly between the men and women.

But as the girls fly from person to person, Saria's nose picks up a strange scent. She quickly snaps her eyes onto one of the human troopers, a slightly taller soldier than the ones in his immediate vicinity. The soldier wears a unique-looking Rhino suit, one built for melee battles and heavily armored for frontline combat. The fairy retainer flies up into the air, then descends and lands smack in the soldier's path.

"Hey! Hey you!" Ruto says, drawing the attention of several nearby troopers. "Can you take off your helmet for a second? I wanna get a look at you!"

Ruto glances over at her mischievous friend. Invisible question marks pop up over her head as she starts making her way over to Ruto's position. At the same time, seeing two gorgeous fairy girls descend upon one of their own, the other soldiers nearby heartily chuckle under their breaths.

The soldier in question crosses his arms. "Perhaps if you ask nicely."

"Pleeeease!" Ruto whimpers, putting on her cutest puppy-dog eyes. "Show me your face, mister!"

With a shrug, the soldier deactivates his T-REX. The massive suit of armor melts away, its nanites flooding into the central control module on his chest. Within seconds, a dark-skinned fellow, Samuel Baker, crosses his arms and looks down at the admittedly attractive fairy.

"Happy?" He asks.

"Ohhh!" Ruto quietly exclaims, her breath catching in her throat. Samuel frowns slightly as her pupils strangely contract and expand. She starts sniffing the air, then leans toward him, standing on her tippy-toes to bring her nose closer to his face.

Samuel takes a small step back, but Saria presses the assault, matching his pace.

"Hey!" Samuel snaps. "You got a problem?"

His forceful tone does nothing to deter the fairy. Blood rushes to her cheeks and she blushes, swaying from side to side as she gazes at him in visible adoration.

"You.. you smell so nice..." Saria says. "What's your name, mister?"

"Lieutenant Samuel Baker." He says, glancing behind her as her friend Ruto lands not far away. "Can I ask why you're... smelling me? I'll admit I skipped my shower this morning, but I shouldn't smell THAT strange."

Ruto grabs Saria's shoulder and pulls her back. "Saria! Don't pester people! It's rude! You're acting like a lovestruck-"

Ruto suddenly pauses mid-sentence. She blinks as if sprayed in the face with water, then takes a good, long look at Samuel.

She starts sniffing the air and drawing closer to him as well!

Sniff, sniff. "Wow! Oh my goodness! You smell really nice, Samuel, was it? REALLY nice!"

"I know, right?" Saria chirps. "He's not just handsome, but he has that strange scent about him. Say, didn't mother tell me about this once...?"

Both fairies pause, making Samuel frown. Already, a dozen nearby male soldiers have given him silent thumbs-ups before turning and walking away to leave him alone to his 'fate.'

"Aha!" Saria exclaims. "Samuel! Are you a fairy? A male fairy?!"

"What? NO!" Samuel bellows. "I ain't no goddamn fairy!"

"Hmm..." Saria continues, not believing his words in the slightest. "I don't know. Mother said there were only five male fairies in the Milky Way, but they're impossible to miss. Each one has a... a strong, sweet scent about them. Are you suuure you're not a fairy? Do you have wings?"

Ruto blushes even harder than before. She bites her lower lip and starts to squeeze her clothes in vaguely lewd ways. "My mother said male fairies... they're supposed to be irresistible. I didn't realize the effect would be this potent."

"For the love of all that is holy." Samuel grumbles. "I'm not a- a goddamned fairy. I'm a normal human guy. Although..."

"Although?" Ruto repeats.

Samuel pauses for several long seconds. He looks away, then curses like a sailor under his breath.

"Motherfuckin' Phoebe. Did that damned hussy set me up? Shit. Goddammit. Ahh..."

After half a minute of deliberation, Samuel seemingly accepts his fate. He gestures to the large gauntlet affixed to his left hand.

"There's this, this new gadget Miss Hiro made. It's called a Power Glove. It can turn you into different creatures. I found out I have... man it's so stupid to say. I have a 'high compatibility' with the fairy transformation."

The two retainers don't seem to understand what he means, so after a bit of light prompting, they get him to demonstrate.

Samuel twists the Power Glove's activation module, setting the selector to fairy. A moment later, his body begins to imperceptibly shift and change. Dainty butterfly wings sprout from his back. His skin becomes noticeably cleaner, more pure, and even half a shade darker. His physique visibly improves, turning him from a well-toned muscular fellow into a scary looking supersoldier, but one who has clearly invested in excellent skincare. He becomes a strange but aesthetically pleasing cross between a pretty-boy and a muscular meathead.

The moment Samuel's transformation concludes, a dark cloud appears in his thoughts. The two fairies before him become much more agitated. They struggle to control themselves and have to actively step back, their legs shaking as they look at him with lustful gazes.

"Oh, oh mother, guide me..." Ruto whispers, her voice cracking. "He's so... so hot! Oh ancient fairies! I can't believe a man can look this incredible! He's truly a male fairy!"

"The legends didn't praise them highly enough..." Saria whispers. Tears stream from her eyes as she forcefully fights against her body's urges. "Mi-mister, Samuel, sir. Listen... You have to come with us. You have to go to the fairy homeworld! We'll treat you well! So well! You cannot imagine- fairy males are almost never born... we need more like you!"

Suddenly, another figure materializes beside Saria and Ruto.

Monster Queen Blinker!

She glances between them and Samuel, her eyes fluttering in surprise as she also notices the incredibly intoxicating scent wafting from his body. However, she appears far less moved. With a flick of her hands, she teleports the other two away, making them offer a faint yelp of protest before they vanish.

"Wai-!" Saria exclaims, before vanishing.

The Monster Queen clears her throat.

"Sorry about that, Samuel." Blinker says. "I wondered where those two naughty girls went. And... why are you a fairy? A male fairy, at that? Did I miss a memo?"

Samuel holds up his Power Glove, then adjusts the setting to revert himself back to human form. Blinker gets the idea and frowns.

"Hmm. So that gadget can turn men into male fairies? That's a bit concerning."

"I don't know." Samuel says, slightly exasperated. Why don't you seem affected? Those other two looked like they were about to jump my bones if you hadn't interfered."

Blinker snorts. "Oh, you poor thing! I'm sure that would have been a fate worse than death. But to answer your question! Male fairies are extremely rare. I barely know of half-a-dozen of them currently still alive. Male fairies are the only way to, ahem, continue the fairy bloodline. Fairies can mate with any species and give birth to that species' children. But we can only make more fairies through males of our own kind. So as you can imagine..."

"Your men must have quite a good time." Samuel says. "Well. I mean. Those girls aren't exactly... I wouldn't deny them... but it feels a little wrong, you know? It looked like they couldn't control themselves."

Blinker glances around, making sure there's nobody else in the immediate vicinity before turning her gaze back to Samuel.

"Fairy Retainers are..."

She pauses.

"...virgins. It's a cultural tradition for reasons I won't go into. And virgin fairies are extremely susceptible to the aphrodisiac-like scent of a male fairy. But once a girl has had some fun, she's won't go weak in the knees anymore. That's why we have a tradition of marrying off fairies to other species first. Though, there were a couple males in history who used their Scent to plunder their way into a harem. Pretty despicable fellows."

"Ah. So that's why you're not pouncing on me." Samuel nods, finally understanding. "Because of Kar. Well, I don't want to take advantage of some naive young girls. I'll keep my distance."

A brief pause follows. Blinker looks at Samuel seriously then lifts her chin.

With a flick of her wrist, she suddenly teleports another random trooper nearby.

"Eh?" The man grunts, his faceless helmet hiding his expression. "Why am I- huh?"

"I brought you here." Blinker says to the man. "You have a Power Glove, right? Retract your armor for a minute."

The man nods. "Yes, Blinker, ma'am. Why?"

"Just do it." She commands.

The man nods. He retracts his armor, then follows Blinker's command to turn himself into a fairy. As he does, he also takes on a beautiful and fair form, one that makes him look no different than any other fairy. He even obtains pretty butterfly wings.

But Blinker's expression visibly relaxes. "Okay. I see now. Thank you for your help. You can revert back and rejoin the group. Tell the others I'll catch up in a minute."

The trooper nods. Blinker teleports him back up ahead to the rest of the hunting party, which has now begun to draw a good distance further into the Labyrinth, leaving Blinker and Samuel alone.

"That's good." Blinker says, more to herself than to Samuel. "Boy, was I worried! That could have turned out a lot worse for us."

"I feel like I'm missing something." Samuel says.

"I was afraid that any man could become a male fairy." Blinker explains. "They can, but... he didn't have the Scent. You do."

"Supposedly, I have an S-class compatibility with the fairy transformation." Samuel groans. "That... probably has something to do with it."

"It would be a disaster for my species if all of humanity could become authentic male fairies." Blinker says, her expression grim. "We certainly need to keep our numbers up, but most of the Fairy Queens don't like the idea of male fairies using their pheromones to forcibly- well, you get the idea. Especially because if a female fairy's first Bond is with a male fairy, the effect becomes... permanent. Or at least it's very hard to break. Like I said, there were some bad boys who abused that ability in the past to build massive harems of mind-controlled concubines."

"Hmm. That's screwed up." Samuel says. "In any case, I'm not interested in that lovey-dovey crap anyway. If someone wants to go for a throw in the sheets, I won't turn 'em down, but it's not my main goal."

"Well..." Blinker says, hesitating. "I think you should reconsider. Like I said, there are only half a dozen male fairies still alive. Most of them are already... preoccupied. They have their harems. But they're also getting on in years. It's not like they'll die of old age, but it wouldn't hurt to have another join their ranks."

Samuel glowers at her. "You want me to give up my revenge? To become some sort of harem king?"

"It's up to you." Blinker says with a shrug. "I wouldn't mind having a friend like you on the Fairy Council. You do get to become a member of the highest noble class, you know. And since you really want to take revenge on demonkind as a whole... you could build up an army of pretty girls who would help you..."

She pauses.

"...plus, you get to have LOTS of hot, steamy, raunchy-"

"I get the picture." Samuel interrupts. "I'll think about it. For right now, maybe just keep those girls away from me, alright?"

"Yeah. I can do that." Blinker says. "In the meantime, why don't we-"

She stops mid-sentence and frowns. Her eyes become slightly unfocused as she looks away from Samuel. After thirty full seconds of silence, Blinker shakes away the fog from her eyes.

"Oh. Jason contacted me just now. He wanted to know if we'd need any help taking down Mephisto."

"Do we?" Samuel asks.

"Nah!" Blinker shouts. "We'll beat that bastard, no matter what. I promise... his days are numbered!"

"That's what I like to hear." Samuel says, glad to finally leave the strange conversation about his fairy powers in the dust. "We should probably get moving. The others are way ahead of us, now."

Blinker sighs. "I just hope we're not doing this all for nothing. If Mephisto manages to hide from us..."

"He won't." Samuel replies, his tone confident. "We have the power of the Creator on our side. And we have an Archangel."

He smirks at Blinker.

"That walking corpse is so screwed."

Part 463: Gorgorath's Promise

Jason and Rebecca continue deeper into the Lizardmen's village, led by the female guard from earlier. She leads them around, showing off various sights and local communal areas.

"And what was your name?" Jason asks, as the guard leads him toward a wooden stall with a shopkeeper selling some hot food. "I didn't mean to be rude, I'm just a bit overwhelmed."

"It's Kumi, Sir Wordsmith." The guardswoman says. "But it's fine if you forget. I'm nobody important. Kyargh!"

"In my eyes, all people are important." Jason says with a smile.

Kumi's blue scales darken in color slightly, a sign of embarrassment. "That's very kind of you to say. Now, um, these are our local street vendors. We don't have a form of traditional currency here. But everyone is allowed a certain number of 'points' they can spend each day. These points are given automatically to each villager, and one can earn extra points through completion of meritorious deeds or through actions that assist the collective. Everyone gets ten points a day, and in my case, guarding the village gates gets me an extra two. Any unspent points are lost, which seems bad, but the rules apply to everyone. Even our great King, His Majesty Ghidorah!"

She shows Jason some of the neat little trinkets at the vendor, and Jason marvels how all of them hold trace amounts of spiritual energy inside.

"Even your king has to live within this limited point system, huh?" Jason asks. "Why is that?"

"These rules were passed down by the great Mother of all Lizards, Lady Becker." Kumi explains. "Her goal was to give us a fair and equitable society. We have eliminated the Profit Motive. Since even our King earns the same ten points as the rest of us, he has no incentive to grow corrupt over time. Of course, there are other factors, but those are a little complicated to explain."

Jason nods casually. Rebecca also does, though she already knows all of the details Kumi is alluding to, plus far more.

The interior of the Lizardman Village appears surprisingly uninspired. Jason admires the simple but efficient architecture of multi-story complexes where families of one to four live plain but pleasant lives. All around the streets, many lizards stroll about, performing their daily business while pausing to chat with their friends and neighbors.

But as Jason travels deeper into the village and the apartments start getting a bit bigger, he notices something interesting.

"It's not just Lizardmen here?"

"No, no," Kumi explains. "We have many different Friends who come to visit us. Our realm is actually a hub for many species. Even demons pop by on occasion! Although... after what those Battle Brothers did some centuries ago, we've heavily restricted the demons who can enter."

"What they did?" Jason asks, before remembering. "Oh. With the Crocodilians."

Kumi nods. "The Crocodiles were one of Marie Becker's favorite children. She was devastated when those evil demons came in here and butchered their entire lineage. Only Lord Kar remained among the living, because he was in the Labyrinth at the time. We never even found out why the Battle Brothers attacked, or what their motivations were. The brutal murder of the Crocodiles affected all of us deeply."

"Kar never talked about what happened. Not in any great detail." Jason says. "Not that I blamed him. It must have been a terribly traumatizing experience."

"We were all so proud when Kar was given the role of the Reptile King." Kumi says. "He was going to bring the Crocodiles back from extinction through his marriage to Lady Blinker. They can still return, of course. But their heritage, traditions, and customs have been lost. Those were locked within Lord Kar's memories. His hatchlings will have to start afresh. No Crocodiles remain that can pass down the Old Ways."

Jason walks past all manner of other species. Not only Lizardmen, but Salamanders, Newts, and even some Elemental Drakes walking about in their bipedal forms. These transformed monsters sneer and look down upon the 'lowly' monsters around them, feeling proud for the faint draconic lineage swirling within their blood. They stand several heads taller than even Kar himself would have stood, at over fifteen feet tall!

The Wordsmith finds himself surprised when they even pass a pair of red-haired fairy women!

"Fairies too?" Jason asks.

"Like I said. The Lizardmen Village is our species' primary hub. There is a Newt Village too, as well as a Salamander village. There was once a Crocodile Village too, but..."

"Yeah. That's too bad." Jason mumbles.

Jason's expression becomes more muted and a lot less interested in the goings-on as Kumi leads him around. He finds himself continually more and more saddened by the hole left upon this reptilian mini-society and how the deaths of the Crocodiles have deeply affected them. Just by how often Kumi refers to their extinction, Jason can tell the Crocodiles were highly revered and considered worthy of respect.

"Your people must have put a lot of hope in Blinker." He comments.

"Oh yes! Very much, kyargh!" Kumi says. "The Monster Queen is our last chance at bringing back the Crocodiles."

"What was it you liked, or appreciated, the most about the Crocodiles?" Jason asks.

Kumi stops in front of a small food station where they serve well-cooked birds of some sort. She deposits one point to grab herself a snack, then takes a half-minute to swallow the bird whole while pondering her answer.

"That is a difficult question, Wordsmith. You have to remember that we monsters often participate in intersex relations. I had two cousins who were Crocodiles! But even beyond the familial relations, the Crocodiles were the biggest and strongest of all the Biped Reptiles. They shielded us and made us feel protected. Their deaths were not only a loss to us culturally and emotionally, but a sign we are not at all safe from the demons. Now we know that we are incapable of standing up to even a pair of Demon Barons!"

"Have you heard that Mephisto was actually the one leading the Battle Brothers?" Jason asks. "I bet he used his undead to help corral and sweep away the Crocodiles' defenses."

"Whatever the method, that attack left us shaken." Kumi mutters. "Perhaps King Ghidorah will even speak to you regarding... mm. It would be best if I allow him to say what he wishes."

Invisible question marks pop up above Jason's head, but he doesn't press the issue.

Kumi leads him down winding streets and into an increasingly more developed area. Before long, Jason gets the impression he's stepped into a 20th century city from Earth!

While there aren't any vehicles on the road, the foot traffic increases substantially, as does the diversity of the species present. Despite the Lizardmen outnumbering the other species, it becomes a ratio of about half the residents being lizards while the other half are a mixture of any other magical species.

Jason spots a large but humble-looking palace up ahead. Large due to its size, but humble due to its fairly simple appearance, lacking gold ornaments or any fancy architectural traits. It appears almost Roman in design, with a mixture of some Greek elements, but beyond that, it stands out due to the intricate carvings of Lizardmen kings on its exterior walls.

"Every Lizard Liege rules for one thousand years." Kumi explains, gesturing at the wall. "Some of them are male, and some female. King Ghidorah has already ruled for nearly a thousand years, so he has been looking for a successor for quite a while. With Kar gone, he has started looking elsewhere, but it will take time to find someone of appropriate status for the title."

"What are the requirements to become a Lizard Liege?" Jason asks respectfully.

"The requirements are loose." Kumi answers. "But traditionally, one must be deeply respected by their people. We don't hold elections or any of that human nonsense, but we do like to choose rulers who will be wise and fair."

"Why was Kar chosen?" Jason asks. "He was a Crocodile, so...?"

"The Lizard Liege is almost always a lizard, but there have been exceptions." Kumi says with deep reverence in her eyes. "Kar was the last of the Crocodiles. He was blessed with the Sphinx's power. We thought he would become the first true Monster Deity. An entity capable of besting even the most fearsome Demon Emperors. But... alas."

"Kar was that strong." Jason murmurs. "It wasn't his fault he lost the battle. His enemies used cheap tricks to weaken him. Mephisto was a coward. He is a coward."

"Hopefully he will soon die." Rebecca says, chiming in for the first time in a while. "Monster Queen Blinker is well equipped to obliterate his existence, so long as she can find him."

After arriving at the Lizard Liege's palace, Kumi pauses outside.

"This is far as I can take you, Wordsmith. It would be inappropriate for me to continue any further. Lady Rebecca will know the rest of the way."

Rebecca nods. "Thank you for walking us this far, Miss Kumi."

"Have a great day!" Jason says.

Kumi departs, leaving Jason and Rebecca alone outside the modest Lizard Palace. Jason admires the inner gardens, as well as the detailed carvings of previous Lizard Lieges. Some of them appear quite ostentatious. To his surprise, there appears to be slightly more female Lieges than males.

"Lizards are actually matriarchal or patriarchal depending on who their current Liege is." Rebecca explains. "They're extremely flexible on matters of sexuality. In fact, they can even undergo Sequential Hermaphroditism under certain conditions if their population has begun leaning too heavily in the direction of one gender or the other."

"Huh. Neat." Jason mutters.

Jason and Rebecca head past several layers of Lizard Guards, all of whom immediately recognize Rebecca and Jason, then flag them through. It doesn't take long before they enter the Royal Palace, where a beautiful lizard woman walks up to the two. Wearing a delicate pink sundress to accentuate her curves, the pretty pink lizard lady sashays over and winks at Jason.

"You must be the Wordsmith! How lovely to meet you, kyargh! I am Queen Mythra, wife to King Ghidorah. I'll bet you're here to say hello to my husband!"

Jason nods. "Nice to meet you, Lady Mythra. I didn't expect to run into such a beautiful lizard-woman while I was visiting, but this is a pleasant surprise!"

"Aww! So polite, but I'm getting on in years!" Mythra lightly laughs. "Of course, if you have free time, I wouldn't mind sitting down and having a lovely chat with a handsome young boy like you."

She turns her attention to Rebecca.

"Ah, and so good to see you as well, Rebecca! Thank you for guiding the Wordsmith here."

"You should thank your guards. That Kumi is well-trained, especially in etiquette." Rebecca praises.

"I'll have to thank her myself." Mythra says. "Now, come along. Follow me and I'll take you to see my husband. He's not been doing so well these days..."

The human and Cybernite fall into step on Mythra's right and left as she leads them into the palace, past dozens of servants and other personnel, all stationed for the purpose of assisting the Lizard Lieges.

Jason blinks. "Ghidorah isn't doing well? Is he sick?"

Mythra's smile slips. "Well. Sick, yes. But not of a disease or old age. It's a sickness of the heart. You will see."

After walking for a quarter of a mile down various functional and prettily decorated hallways, the group of three finally reach a quiet, private inner chamber. Mythra hesitates at the door, causing Jason to notice a pang of distress on her face. She eventually pushes the door open to reveal a darkened bedroom.

"Love? I've brought some guests." Mythra says. "It's the Wordsmith and Lady Rebecca."

Jason glances around the dim room. With the blinds closed, only a smidgen of light illuminates the interior, much of it coming from the hallway. Mythra flicks a switch, causing some candles to ignite through a magical means. When the room brightens, Jason makes out a figure laying on his back in a bed.

The once dominating King Ghidorah slowly blinks his eyes open. As the trio approaches, Jason's thoughts turn to shock as he realizes the Lizard Liege appears quite frail!

Ghidorah takes small, shallow breaths. His scales drip with moisture, though for what reason, Jason's can't exactly fathom. Lizards don't sweat, after all...

"Ohh... the Wordsmith, yes... that Jason boy..." King Ghidorah says, his voice weak and faint.

Jason glances at Rebecca. Unlike him, she doesn't appear surprised by this situation.

Mythra walks over to her husband's side. She gently takes his claws in hers and smiles sweetly. "Do you have the energy to talk with our guests a bit?"

"Of... of course..." Ghidorah says hesitantly, though his frail appearance says otherwise. "It's good you came, Jason Hiro. Graugh! I was... beginning... to think you never would."

Humanity's Hero pales at Ghidorah's words. "What's wrong? Why are you so ill? Inspect."

Jason fires off a Word of Power. He searches the king for abnormalities, but he finds that Ghidorah's body is in perfectly fine condition.

Instead, it's his soul that appears weak and intangible!

"Don't... worry about me..." Ghidorah says slowly. "There's nothing you can do. This... this condition... oh, it is because of my guilt. My failure..."

Jason walks over to the opposite side of Ghidorah's bed while Rebecca remains at the doorway.

"What failure?" Jason asks.

"The promise." Ghidorah says, slowly blinking his sagging eyes. "My brother. I promised him... in his final breath. I promised him I would bring back the Crocodiles. I promised him... I promised him! But I failed. Now, they are all dead. All dead! Aaaooo..."

Mythra looks at the Wordsmith with saddened eyes.

"Ghidorah's blood-brother was Lord Gorgorath of the Crocodiles. Second in line to the Crocodile Throne. When the Battle Brothers came and butchered his people, Gorgorath escaped and crawled thirty miles to our lands. He dragged his half-paralyzed body along while fighting off the creatures attracted to his blood. The trail of red behind him seemed unending..."

She pauses.

"When we discovered Gorgorath, we learned of the tragedy that had befallen the Crocodiles. But it was too late to save anyone. As he hung at death's door, Gorgorath begged my husband, his brother, to make a promise, to swear a vow."

"But what... a failure... I was..." Ghidorah whispers, with tears welling up in his eyes. "I could not bring them back. I was not there for Kar's final moments! He died alone, without me! Now the Crocodiles are all extinct... so... I deserve death!"

Jason's chest tightens. His own guilt over Kar's death, coupled with the emotions radiating from King Ghidorah, amplify tenfold.

"It wasn't your fault." Jason says through gritted teeth. "It was mine! You can't blame yourself! I am the Wordsmith! I should have been there to protect my best friend!"

"You have... so much on your plate." Ghidorah says, reaching out to touch Jason's hand. "Saving humanity. Building up defenses. You cannot be everywhere at once. But me... my duties are few. I should have been there. I knew the demons would attack. I should have brought my people to fight! But I didn't... and now the Crocodile Heritage has been lost..."

The Wordsmith's brow knots itself in consternation. He frowns at the Lizard King.

"Is... is there some way I can help? The Crocodiles can still live on through Kar's children!"

Ghidorah's eyes slowly close and open. He blinks wearily, as if trying to think.

"Ohh... I do not know. What does it matter anymore? The Crocodilian Ancestral Memories are gone. Only Kar alone possessed them. But... if I could make... one last request... in my final hours..."

"One last request?" Jason asks. "Nonsense. I can heal you. I can bring you back! Don't give up while your people still need you!"

Ghidorah seems not to hear Jason's words. His eyes blink more slowly than ever.

"The hatchlings. Lord Kar's hatchlings. Raise them... well. Protect them. Let them multiply. Flourish. Bring back the Crocodiles... they will not be as they were. But perhaps... in time... they can become something new. Alas, I do not... deserve the right... to watch their return."

Jason, sensing Ghidorah's imminent death and weakening spirit, quickly speaks several Words of Power.

"Heal! Restore! Rejuvenate! Revitalize!"

He senses the flow of his magic entering Ghidorah's form, but to his despair, the old reptile does not strengthen in the slightest.

"I don't understand!" Jason exclaims. "Why can't I save you?"

"As I told you before." Mythra says quietly. "My husband suffers from a loss of spirit. His heart is broken. He no longer has the will to live. We're lucky he has held on this long."

Ghidorah faintly smiles at Jason.

"Wordsmith. Promise... me. Promise me. Promise me that you will protect Kar's children. Promise me that... you will raise them... to become fine Crocodiles... that you will help them flourish once again."

Jason clenches his teeth. "I..."

"Please." Ghidorah whispers, leaning toward Jason. "I beg of you. Do for the Crocodiles what I could not. Bring... bring them back! Give them the respect they deserve!"

Jason still hesitates. He wishes to save Ghidorah, to rejuvenate his soul. But, after seeing the look of pleading on Ghidorah's face, he relents. Jason relaxes his posture and nods.

"...Alright. I promise. I'll bring back the Crocodiles. I'll restore them to their former numbers and beyond. I'll fulfill the promise you made to your brother."

Ghidorah smiles, though the expression appears strained.

"Good. Good lad. Thank... thank you. From... the bottom of... of my heart... thank..."

Ghidorah blinks his weary eyes.

He blinks them again.

Then, they close for the final time. His body goes still.

Jason stares silently at the Lizard King, a figure he never particularly knew well, yet one who he shared a bond through their close friend, Kar.

When Jason looks up at Lady Mythra, he sees no tears in her eyes. Only a calm, quiet acceptance.

"I knew this day would come soon." Mythra says softly, reaching down to caress her husband's eternally sleeping face. "Thank you. He held on as long as he could for your arrival. You gave him the closure he needed. Now he can rest peacefully in the Great Beyond."

Jason looks at Rebecca.

"You knew this would happen?"

Rebecca shrugs. "I knew Ghidorah's condition was poor. I did not imagine it had declined to this level. It is a stroke of Luck that you came here in time. Or perhaps it was Fate."

"Luck. Fate." Jason mutters, as he touches Ghidorah's unmoving claw. "Whatever the case, I've made a promise. And unlike with Kar... I won't fail this time."

Jason says his goodbyes to Lady Mythra. He and Rebecca depart.

As they leave, Rebecca touches Jason's arm.

"Don't blame yourself. It's your job now to revive the Crocodiles, but it wasn't before. Like Ghidorah said, you cannot be everywhere at all times. You must prioritize the things that matter most."

Jason nods. But at the same time, his expression steels.

"I can't be everywhere at once, huh?"

A strange glint appears in his eyes.

"I wonder if... that's truly the case."

Part 464: Marie's Grand Plan

Back inside the Remnant Oasis's primary research facility.

Marie Becker and Phoebe Hiro wait until Jason has left with Rebecca. After the other two depart, Phoebe turns to look at the eccentric scientist-lady.

"So! Miss Becker. Kar used to talk about you all the time. Sorry it took us so long to meet."

"It's fine." Marie says, smiling warmly. "I have been keeping an eye on you for quite a while, Miss Hiro. You have quite the impressive list of accomplishments. Certainly more than that husband of yours."

Phoebe's eye twitches. "No offense, but I would prefer if you didn't insult Jason. Especially when he's not around."

"It's not an insult to him, but a compliment to you." Marie counters. "Imagine a normal human woman of no noteworthy background outperforming her Hero husband. It's quite praiseworthy, don't you think?"

"I... I don't think so at all." Phoebe says, shifting on her feet uncomfortably. "Besides. I possessed Solomon's Crown for a long time. I'm not like you, a self-taught genius. I cheated."

"Jason also had the Crown. And for longer than you!" Marie points out. "Yet he still comes up... lacking. It's not the access to knowledge that forms a genius, but how they use that information. Why, even when I was a teenager, I had many classmates who sat around, lazily wasting their time in school, college, and eventually university. Perhaps they couldn't download the entire summary of human knowledge into their brains, but even if they could, I believe they would have wasted their potential."

A momentary pause follows as Phoebe rubs her arm.

"Do you regret it? Not having access to Solomon's Crown, I mean?"

"It would have assisted me greatly." Marie acknowledges. "But at this point in my life, donning that Crown would be a slap across my face. Look at what I accomplished without it! Perhaps I might even be more intelligent than the Knowledge Seeker himself... who can say?"

"From what I gather, you were Humanity's Greatest Inventor." Phoebe says. "You singlehandedly kept the Volgrim at bay for decades and decades."

"I did. And it still wasn't enough." Marie says, sighing to herself. "Sometimes, no matter how incredible you are, an obstacle will eventually appear that you cannot overcome..."

The two nod together about their shared thoughts. Then Marie gestures toward the hallway leading into her primary facility.

"Walk with me."

She and Phoebe head out of the entryway. Phoebe gets the shock of her life as she enters the deeper, more secure areas, causing her eyes to sparkle with glee. While Jason may have been visibly shocked by the level of technology on display, Phoebe becomes a little overwhelmed. Her eyes jump erratically from one pane-glass room to another. She gazes with excitement at various weapons, tools, gadgets, and other pieces of High Technology far beyond the ones she's made in her free time.

"Incredible! Wow!" Phoebe squeals like a little girl. "You can use Dilithium in that way?! And what sorts of Transducers are those?"

Marie smiles again. She doesn't look down on Phoebe like she did with Jason, but instead enjoys a slight feeling of superiority while also getting to treat Phoebe in the way an old mentor might treat a potential protege.

"Your husband isn't capable of appreciating the full extent of what the Remnant Oasis can offer. But then again, he grew up in an era where he watched thousands of science fiction movies. You, on the other hand, lived during an era well before technology became widespread. It isn't even in your mental space to imagine some of the potential technology can have on a mass scale."

Phoebe nods along absentmindedly to Marie's words. "It's shocking how... how comprehensive the technology in the Oasis is! Rebecca was showing me the various bio-spheres you maintained to continue breeding indigenous Earth species, as well as some advanced shielding and stealth technology you use to suppress the Oasis's presence from space."

"Currently, the Volgrim are the only space-dwelling people in the Milky Way, but that could change at any point in the future." Marie says, her smile fading ever so slightly.

Phoebe doesn't notice due to her preoccupation with the research facility's sights and wonders. "The protections I've placed on this facility are simply my attempt to anticipate future threats and make myself less visible to them."

Phoebe turns back to the Head Scientist. "So what exactly is your goal here, then? Are you working for the Volgrim? For yourself? I've always wondered why you let humanity rot under demonkind's thumb. Surely you must have a bigger purpose..."

"It's complicated." Marie says flatly. "But also simpler than you think. My ultimate goal is to protect our existence. Not just mine, or my Cybernites. Not just humanity... but the Volgrim, the Demons, and the others too. Because the Threat is always out there. Our petty wars mean little in the Cosmic Scale. If we don't sort out our differences, we'll become fodder for the biggest fish in the pond."

Phoebe blinks twice, not quite understanding Marie, yet getting the distinct impression Marie won't be holding much back in their conversation.

"What is the Threat, then?" Phoebe asks.

Marie doesn't directly answer her question. Instead, the scientist responds with a question of her own.

"Do you know what my technological specialty is, Miss Hiro?"

"I... don't know you well at all." Phoebe says hesitantly. "And frankly, I don't know what you're asking. Specialty? As in...?"

"I was fairly certain you hadn't spoken with Technopaths on any deep level." Marie remarks. "Guess that confirms my suspicions. You see, in Technopath culture, every individual has a Technological Specialty. Most Technopaths have plenty of general knowledge, but 'technology' as a whole is an extremely broad topic, and a society of generalists will not be able to improve as quickly as a society with lots of specialists. So, the vast majority of Technopaths choose to specialize in one or two specific fields. For example, Warp Drive Physics, Quantum Mechanics, Modularity, Armor Improvement, Battery Efficiency, and so on."

She pauses.

"Now, given this information, what field do you think I specialize in?"

Phoebe glances around the lab for a moment.

"Robotics?"

"Nope. Well, I certainly have accomplishments in that field, but in fact, my technological specialty is... Miniaturization."

"Oh?" Phoebe replies. "You shrink things down?"

"That's right. Take a look over here." Marie says, walking Phoebe to a nearby storage room. A label rests on its heavy metal door, one which reads 'Head Researcher's Storage Unit 001.'

Marie opens the door to the seemingly nondescript storage unit, revealing a wall of neatly organized tools, gadgets, and goodies, all made from exotic technology. Phoebe finds it hard to focus on any one specific item, since they all appear so futuristic and dazzling. Not only are there rows of highly advanced power armor stretching off half a mile into the distance, but an entire shelf of electronic eyeballs that look like they were made to replace human eyes. The room continues for so long that it almost seems as if it might wrap all the way around the planet.

The Head Scientist picks up a small wristwatch-looking device and holds it up in front of Phoebe's face to grab her attention.

"You see this? This is a warp drive, shrunken down to grant a human the power of traveling through space at post-relativistic speeds."

"A warp drive?!" Phoebe exclaims. "But... but how?"

"You cannot use it. No human can." Marie explains. "Only an enhanced human. A Cybernite. Your body would explode the instant you activated it. I created it and a few other devices to ensure that if I ever left Earth, but my ship was destroyed, I wouldn't be trapped in interstellar space for the rest of eternity. Trust me. There are fates worse than death, and that would be one of them."

Marie gently places the Compact Warp Drive back on the table, then holds up a seemingly ordinary ring with a green emerald nestled in its top.

"What trick do you suppose this ring holds?" Marie asks.

Phoebe raises her eyebrow. After a few seconds of deliberation, she shrugs.

"Does it shoot a laser?"

Marie slowly blinks. "Lucky guess. Yes. This is a self-defense device I created to increase my arsenal whenever I leave the Remnant Oasis. I don't leave often, but when I do, I take care to make sure I'm always prepared for anything. This ring can fire a bolt of energy capable of demolecularizing even a 6th-Level Psion instantly. The rate of fire isn't high, but it's intended to be a quick surprise, not a weapon for extended engagements."

Marie places the ring back on the table. She continues showing off a few more gadgets, each of which surprises Phoebe just as much as the one before it.

After concluding, Marie stands up straight and crosses her arms.

"My specialization is Miniaturization. Why do you suppose I chose this field in particular to focus on?"

"I can think of a few reasons." Phoebe says. "You seem to value self-preservation and your own life a great deal. Smaller devices don't take as many resources to create, and since you live underneath a dead planet's crust, that probably matters a lot to you. Aside from that, you seem to like the aesthetics of tiny devices too...?"

"Aesthetics are hardly a reason." Marie snorts. "Simply put, miniaturization has a tremendous number of upsides, as well as an equal number of limitations. Physics is a field of science with extremely strict rules, rules which cannot easily be bent. In order to miniaturize large tech and compress it into a human-sized form factor, I have to make an incalculable number of compromises. The biggest net benefit is a near-100% reduction in energy costs. A wrist-worn Warp Drive barely requires a single gram of Trifrancium to fling me across the cosmos. But the downside is, it takes decades, even centuries of research to successfully miniaturize existing tech. Even then, it's often only partially workable and still requires many iterations to become cost effective. That's why miniaturization is one of the least-studied fields of technology by the Volgrim."

Phoebe gazes at Marie in surprise. "The Technopaths don't focus on miniaturization? Surely, in an empire of trillions..."

"There are a few. But miniaturization is not a field one can 'dabble' in. There are two, perhaps three 'High Technopaths' who can miniaturize as effectively as me. Even then, there are so many untouched fields of technology that have yet to be studied that I have many unique paths I can 'branch off' into. For example, I am the only person who has properly miniaturized warp drive travel. I've sold a few of my wristbands to certain high-ranking Volgrim, but it would take their Technopath specialists tens of millennia before they reverse engineered the devices. Not that they have the time to bother, what with the Plague bearing down on them..."

Marie chuckles.

"Heh. In any case, I'm making a point here. I specialize in a certain field and I am very good at what I do. But how about you, Miss Hiro? Do you have a specialty?"

Phoebe squeezes her hands together. "I... I hadn't given it much thought until now, Miss Becker. I guess I simply... dabble."

"You dabble." Marie repeats, her tone dry. "I guessed as much. It's not your fault. You've never thought much about these things because you only invent things to try and help out humanity's ever-changing political and military situation. You haven't had time to sit and think about your future plans. It's fine for now, while you're just starting out, but it will come back to haunt you in the future."

Phoebe knits her brow. She chews her lower lip thoughtfully while her eyes become slightly glazed.

"Do... do you have any idea what I should focus on?"

"You're a smart woman." Marie says. "Not as brilliant as me, but nobody is. If I tell you what to do, I'll only hurt your future potential. It's much better if you think about what sort of technology 'calls' out to you. But I do have a few... recommendations."

Marie waves her hand. Suddenly, as if by magic, a familiar device appears in her palm, a circular gadget with long straps hanging out of its sides and dangling between her fingers.

Phoebe's eyes pop open. "A T-REX! How did you...?"

"How did I get access to one of your piddly little nano-armor modules?" Marie asks. "Tarus II's security is shoddy. I could stroll into your midst and kill the lot of you without ever being detected. You really need to upgrade your detection capabilities. Even for primitives, it's embarrassing."

She rolls her eyes.

"Anyway. This cute little gadget is an adequate, if imperfect, nano-armor conjuration module. I particularly appreciate how you chose to 'link' the nanites together to harden the armor's composition. Simple and effective, if a bit clumsy. Going by the detail you put into this 'T-REX,' have you considered investing yourself into the field of nanotechnology?"

"Isn't that the same as what you do?" Phoebe asks.

"By no means. I miniaturize existing technology. Nanotechnology is entirely different. You would build new devices using nanites. You could make configurable devices that change their shape at will. Armor capable of shifting between multiple viable forms. Nanite-based technology is inherently less powerful at specific tasks, but it makes up for this flaw though customization and versatility. You won't be able to make a Compact Warp Drive with nanites, but you could create a surprisingly robust military loadout for all your soldiers at an individual level. There are plenty of specialists in nanotechnology among my Cybernites, as well as among the Volgrim Empire. I could refer you to them, if this field interests you."

Phoebe frowns even more deeply than before.

"It does interest me. But... I don't know. I'd want to talk to Jason before committing to something as important as this."

Marie scoffs. "Your dependency on a man is your greatest limitation. Take it from me. Men are stupid idiot pigs. They'll cheat on you and leave you behind without a moment's warning. I certainly wouldn't entrust my future plans to a foolish-"

"I talk to my husband about everything." Phoebe interrupts politely. "I'm sorry you've had bad luck with men, Miss Becker. But I cherish my time with Jason, and I adore him. Even when we disagree, we respect each other. I would never throw that away willingly."

Marie bites back the rest of what she was going to say. "Fine. Suit yourself. Another field you might consider is Mechanized Warfare. I saw the 'spider-mechs' you wielded during Stormbringer. Slow, clumsy, and ultimately ineffective, but they did provide you with certain useful moments of contact with the enemy forces. And your 'Planetwalkers," they were extremely effective in dealing with the demons... though I fear that if you were to face a more competent enemy they would not last long."

"Mechs are indeed quite useful..." Phoebe says noncommittally. "I'm just not sure, though."

"There are plenty of other options available to you." Marie says. "You've dabbled in dozens of fields. Now, you need only narrow your interest to one or two fields to start your journey on the path of mastering them. Even better, those two fields should complement each other. For example, Miniaturization and Nanotechnology can go hand in hand. Mechanized Warfare and Long Ranged Firepower are also wonderful companions. Warp Travel and Starship design..."

Phoebe suddenly looks at Marie.

"Well, actually, while we're on that subject, I had an idea I wanted to run past you. I've been looking for someone to talk to about this, but..."

"But nobody can keep up with you?" Marie asks.

"Yes! Exactly." Phoebe answers. "Anyway, so I had this idea for a new type of Warp technology. I've been thinking that the Volgrim's dependence on Dilithium and Trifrancium is incredibly unfortunate. Especially the latter, as it's so rare. Wouldn't it be nice if we could travel from star to star at post-relativistic speeds without requiring exotic fuels?"

Marie snorts. "Of course. But how would you accomplish such a feat? Synthesizing an exotic fuel would require putting in more energy than you'd gain. It's a basic law of thermodynamics."

"Oh, I know that much!" Phoebe laughs. "But, well, do you have something I can draw on? I'll whip you up a model real quick."

Marie shrugs. She pulls out a brain-scanning device that causes Phoebe's eyes to light up in delight. The Wordsmith's Wife quickly puts it on and learns how to funnel her thoughts actively inside of it, then she proceeds to summon a hazy projection of a strange starship design Marie has never seen before.

A small, long, slender ship levitates in front of a supermassive Yellow Giant star. As it hovers there, its front 'opens up' and giant golen sails begin to unfurl.

"I call this a Solar Sail Craft." Phoebe explains. "It functions by absorbing the energy from a star until it reaches a critical saturation of energy, then it ignites all of its fuel and instantly travels to its destination in a single second! Any distance, just one second! It can cross ten lightyears or ten thousand!"

Marie doesn't look impressed. "It's... it's an alternative. But this craft would require years to fill up its reserves. Decades, centuries, even."

"Possibly thousands of years. And the greater the distance you want to travel, the more solar energy it would need to accumulate before it launched." Phoebe acknowledges.

"There's another problem." Marie says. "Anything biological inside the Solar Sail Craft would be instantly obliterated when the vessel launched. It doesn't travel at postrelativistic speeds, but post-temporal speeds. Any humans, Volgrim, or whatever that were inside would instantaneously vaporize and vanish. It's useless as a travel method."

Phoebe's eyes twinkle. "But Marie, who said these would be used to transport passengers?"

"Huh?"

Marie blinks twice. For once, she appears visibly stumped.

"What do you mean? This vessel would be... cargo only?"

Phoebe nods. "That's right. And as for having to wait tens of years or thousands... what if you simply built a lot of them? Hundreds of thousands? All pointed at different areas, orbiting around different stars, each launching at set intervals? You could make an extremely fast and efficient goods-transportation system that didn't require any exotic materials to build or maintain."

Several seconds pass.

Marie stares at the young woman with a sudden look of interest.

"That is... a novel concept. It seems I had a blind spot in my own base of knowledge. I've always fixated on needing to send people around. I would have immediately rejected the idea of Solar Sails if they came to me, but you... you simply came up with a way to make them useful in a specific niche. If the Volgrim had access to Solar Sails, they wouldn't need to spent a hundredth the amount of Dilithium and Trifrancium they currently do on non-personnel transfers. This would allow them to divert all that energy to much more broadly useful areas!"

For the first time in ages, Marie does not force a smile, or squeeze out a polite smile, but instead grins giddily. She exposes her teeth and smiles with the force of a child who has just devoured an entire jar of cookies while her parents weren't looking!

She becomes so happy that starlight practically radiates from her eyes.

"Truly impressive! I take back everything I told you before, Phoebe Hiro. Perhaps you should NOT specialize at all! You keep dabbling and jumping to whatever field you want. You've just imagined an invention that could upend our galactic society as we know it, and you've only been at this work for six years! I cannot wait to see what you will accomplish next!"

The sudden praise from her 'superior' makes Phoebe blush. "It- it wasn't much at all, Miss Becker."

"Come with me!" Marie snaps. "I need to show you something important."

Phoebe pauses. Her happy embarrassment quickly fades as she sees the seriousness in Marie's eyes.

"Something important? Well..."

She hardly gets a moment to think. Marie roughly grabs her by the wrist and drags her deeper, deeper into the Head Researcher's Storage Unit.

Phoebe stumbles along behind Marie, shocked by her overwhelming strength. Phoebe feels as if she were a toddler being yanked around by a gorilla. Marie drags her past so many exotic miniaturized technologies that her head begins to spin.

"Miss Becker, I-"

"We're here." Marie says, stopping abruptly.

She releases Phoebe, then points to a gigantic table standing in the center of a large, open area of the storage. On this table, a huge glass dome rests atop a beautiful, shining city made of pure-white tiles and bricks. Towers and spires stick up at random, while smaller apartments only stand ten and twenty stories tall, but each clearly possesses room for hundreds of people to live.

"Wow." Phoebe says, perhaps involuntarily. "This is a beautiful model city."

"It's a to-scale replica of a planned project of mine." Marie says, crossing her arms. "The Milky Way's ultimate defensive grid. A temporal paradox made manifest in the physical realm. Accessible through any quantum node in any anomalous temporal region. I call it... the Exterior."

Phoebe frowns. "The Exterior? So it sits 'outside' something?"

"Outside our concept of Normalspace." Marie explains. Think of it like a protective membrane which wraps around the Milky Way. The Kolvaxians likely arrived from another galaxy. They were easily able to enter our 'airspace' because we had no way to detect or stop them."

Phoebe stares at the beautiful miniature city with a look of interest.

"How big... exactly... would a 'membrane' which wraps around the entire galaxy even be? I feel like I'm missing something important."

"It would be more of a figurative Membrane." Marie explains. Like an invisible detection field that would alert us to any and all intrusions. But it doesn't matter. I cannot see how to break the Temporal Wall. It's too sturdy. I've tried for over 50,000 years and never succeeded. I am even beginning to think it might not be possible."

"Why did you want to show me this, then?" Phoebe asks.

Marie glances at her. Then, she looks away.

A few moments pass.

"...Never mind." Marie says quietly. "I thought you'd understand if I explained. I can't go into specifics. Maybe in the future, I will. For now, rest assured... I am doing everything in my power to protect our fragile galaxy. But even I may fail. I am not a God. I am far from omnipotent."

"Nobody has that power. Nor should they." Phoebe says quietly.

The two women leave the funny table behind and resume their tour of Marie's facility.

All the while, the beautiful, shimmering, miniature city remains in the same place as ever...

Part 465: Wordsmith's Ascension

After Phoebe and Marie chat for a few hours, she eventually departs the Head Researcher's research facility. Phoebe meets up with Jason and Rebecca, only to find that her husband appears... a little glum.

"Jason? Is everything okay?" Phoebe asks.

The Wordsmith hugs his wife and offers a weak smile.

"I want to see the Monster King. Ghidorah. He... died. While I was visiting him. I think he held on only long enough for me to say my goodbyes..."

Rebecca stands silently while Jason takes a few minutes to fill his wife in on what happened. After he concludes, she nods.

"I see. That's a shame. He seemed like a good ruler. What will the Lizardmen do now that their King has fallen?"

"For now, Queen Mythra will act as the temporary ruler of her people." Rebecca explains. "Ghidorah's passing was not entirely unexpected, but its abruptness will surely catch his people off their guard. From what I understand, there are a few Lizard Nobles in a position to assume power, but they will need to compete to show they are the proper candidates for the role."

Jason nods, but mostly stops caring about the details of who the Lizards appoint their future ruler. "I see. Well, in any case, I made a promise to Ghidorah. I promised to restore the Crocodiles to power. To bring back their numbers and make them prolific once more. I'll need to think about that once I have some free time."

"You and Phoebe can return to Tarus II at your leisure." Rebecca says. "I will join you there in a few days. I have already sent a summons to the other 299 designated Cybernites who will be working with you on your world. We do need to deal with some miscellaneous matters first. Of course, if you want, you can continue sightseeing at our Oasis."

Jason shakes his head. "I don't think we will. I need to get back home."

"Yeah." Phoebe agrees. "I have a lot on my mind..."

"Well alright then!" Rebecca says. "I'll meet up with you two later. Do you need me to show you back to the Teleportation Transmitter, or...?"

"We can return through our own means." Jason answers.

He and Phoebe wave politely to Rebecca. She waves back, then turns on her heel and strides away.

After she departs, Jason glances at his wife. "Everything go well with Marie? I hope she didn't bully you."

Phoebe looks away. She chews on her lower lip for a moment, then hesitantly reaches into her pocket to pull out a small marble-sized cube.

"Marie gave me a parting gift." Phoebe says slowly. "It's... a Datacube. According to her, it's a special backup of all but her most highly classified research. She said she wanted me to have it... just in case."

"Just in case what?" Jason asks, feeling some suspicion.

"In case the 'worst' comes to pass." Phoebe says with a shrug. "Marie explained that she views me as a... a contingency plan, I guess. I think I impressed her?"

Phoebe pockets the small cube. As she does, Jason wraps his arm over her shoulder.

"Yeah. You ARE pretty brilliant, honey. That's just one of the reasons I love you."

"Among what other ones?" Phoebe probes.

"Your hot body and cute ass."

"Mhm."

Jason clears his throat. "Return."

He and Phoebe vanish from the spot.

When they reappear, Phoebe blinks, slightly confused.

"Hm? Did you run out of mana? Why didn't you bring us back to Tarus II?"

She and Jason find themselves standing inside a barren, nondescript, utterly desolate hallway in the Labyrinth. With Hell being as completely nonsensical in its layout as ever, she hasn't a clue how near or far from the Core they are.

"I'm not in a rush." Jason says quietly. "Let's walk and talk. I have a... a lot on my mind."

"That's a first." Phoebe jokes, elbowing his ribs.

Jason doesn't smile.

"I've screwed up so much, honey. So much. Our daughter died because of me. What if our son does too? I can't keep being so flippant and lazy."

Phoebe sobers up her expression. She realizes Jason isn't kidding around like he usually does.

"You can't blame yourself like that. Daisy's death-"

"It was entirely my fault." Jason says. "Entirely. Without question. I could have prevented it. I wasted six years. I sat around, resting on my laurels, while the demons planned Operation Stormbringer. Hope was... he wasn't exactly doing good things in the Labyrinth. He was out killing demons, antagonizing them, making them fear us enough to want to launch an attack... but as least he was doing something. I was useless."

For once, Phoebe doesn't rush to comfort Jason's worries. She falls silent for a moment, then nods.

"Yeah. I suppose you could have worked harder. Especially as you had Solomon's Crown at the time."

"Exactly." Jason says, steeling his voice. "I could have done more. I should have done more. And from now on... I will not sit back and let others use me as they want. I have to be more proactive in dealing with my enemies... as well as my friends."

Jason starts walking down the hallway. He takes Phoebe's hand in his, and the two of them walk side by side. Their pace is slow, casual. They don't rush to head back to the Core. If they were in a hurry, they could simply teleport back to Tarus II and skip the whole journey.

For them, this walk is about privacy. Nothing more, and nothing else.

"So what are you planning to do?" Phoebe asks. "You sound as if you have a plan."

"Well. I've been talking to Fiona about some things." Jason says. "And... I think... I think I'm going to leave for a while."

"Huh?" Phoebe grunts, glancing at him in bewilderment. "What? Leave?! Where are you going?"

"Not far." Jason says. "You'll be able to contact me at any point. In fact, I'll still sort of be 'around' Tarus II."

Jason's cryptic words cause several invisible question marks to pop up over Phoebe's head.

"I... I'm so confused." Phoebe grunts.

Jason nods. "Materialize."

With a Word of Power, he summons Fiona's projection to the physical realm. The Wordsmith's 'second wife' materializes on his left, while Phoebe remains on his right.

"We're going to make a new realm." Fiona says, immediately launching into an explanation. "A Special Environment, if you will. A Folded Space between realities. Like Heaven, Hell, and the Cosmic Realm."

"Oh!" Phoebe says, mildly surprised. "So a new dimension adjacent to Tarus II?"

"Perhaps..." Jason says hesitantly. "I am worried though. Psions seem more than a little capable of detecting Folded Spaces. I think I'll anchor it somewhere else. Somewhere they won't be able to easily detect it. But I'll put a secret entrance to it on Tarus II. As long as the entrance remains intact, anyone can come and go easily."

"This realm will be a special one, for sure." Fiona continues. "Jason's going to use it himself for a while. It will feature a TDR that might surprise you."

"A Time Dilation Ratio... of what level?" Phoebe asks.

"I don't know what my Wordsmithing is capable of." Jason says flatly. "But the higher, the better. I intend to go in there for quite a while. Quite a long time."

Phoebe falls silent for several seconds, digesting her husband's words.

"How long exactly?"

"I don't know." Jason says. "Years, if I can help it. And I intend to enter as soon as possible."

"This is all so sudden." Phoebe retorts. "What about that big public speech?! You and Neil are supposed to have a public forum where you try convincing people to follow you!"

"I'm not good at speeches." Jason says. "I'm going to leave that up to you."

"Jason..." Phoebe says, her voice quiet. "Don't you think this is a bit irresponsible? I don't want to be rude, but, Hope and Neil are going to have a massive advantage over you.

Hope has, what, a thousand artifacts now? How many did you even get from Marie?"

"None." Jason says. "I spoke to one of the Heroes. Madam Mildred. She made me realize that I've completely forsaken my own strengths as a Hero. I can do better. I must do better. Relying on artifacts to enhance my strength is shameful. I won't walk the same path as Hope."

He smiles at Phoebe.

"Besides. Everyone loves you. If it's you giving that speech, I know you'll convince plenty of people to stay on our side."

Phoebe sighs. She shakes her head and looks away.

"They need you, Jason. I'm a friend to everyone, yes. But people don't need a 'friend' in these times. They need a source of security and stability. They need a leader. They need you."

"They won't have me." Jason says quietly. "Not for a while. I'll say this much... Hope is a psychopath who killed forty-five billion Volgrim. But he's also competent. He has the right to be respected. It wasn't Hope who screwed humanity over during Stormbringer. He had been captured by Gressil and was suffering terrible torture. You saw the state he was in when we found him. Gressil amputated all of his limbs. All of them. I should have been the one to protect humanity, but I was incompetent, and I failed. If everyone chooses Hope, maybe they're right to do so. He does have Excalibur, the Dominion Rod, and Solomon's Crown. He'll surely do a good job."

"Hope and Neil are both warmongers." Fiona warns. "I know for a fact Neil will exclude demons from entering Maiura. He isn't only going to try and empower humanity, but will also try to make a move on his enemies. Jason, if you don't figure out a solution, the Milky Way is going to have a second war, one that will weaken us all and make us more susceptible to the Plague."

"Not to mention kill a lot of demons." Jason says with a nod. "I know. I'm aware. But right now, I am not capable of solving this problem. Not perfectly, not properly, and not in a way that will satisfy all parties."

Jason squeezes Fiona's ethereal neck, making light contact with her half-physical form. He smiles at her warmly.

"It's going to be a bit tricky. But you and me, we'll figure this out."

Then he turns to Phoebe.

"You'll be in charge of Tarus II during my absence. But don't worry. I'll be gone, yet still available. I'll be distant, yet near. We won't have a repeat of what happened when I recovered the Cube. If Neil or Hope does anything vile, I'll be on call. And I don't think they would hurt you, Phoebe. Hope still... he still cares for you. And Neil knows better than to fuck with Humanity's Best Girl."

Phoebe snorts. "I'm not worried about me, Jason. I'm worried about other people, like Samantha, or Kiari. They're demons, yes, but they're on 'our side.' Neil would like nothing more than to, well... demonize them."

"Demonize the demons." Fiona chuckles. "I forgot how good my jokes were."

Jason raises an eyebrow. "So this is how it felt when Hope and I laughed at each other's jokes."

* * *

The Wordsmith and his two wives continue walking and talking. They hash out a plan with one another, then Jason utters a Word of Power.

"Return."

Fiona reappears inside the Wordsmith's Mind Realm. Jason and Phoebe materialize inside an established safe space on Tarus II, not far from the western edge of the city's plateau.

Phoebe looks at Jason longingly. "Don't be gone long, Jason."

"I won't be." Jason smiles. "Not from your point of view, anyway."

"Somehow, that feels a little... ominous." Phoebe whispers.

She stands up on her tippy-toes, and the two of them share a deep, passionate kiss. Jason pulls his wife in close for one last time before his departure, enjoying the warm, comfortable feeling of her presence.

After they finish, Phoebe walks away, and Jason finds himself alone with only Fiona in his thoughts.

"...Alright." Jason says quietly. "Let's do this."

The Wordsmith closes his eyes. Then he utters a Word of Power.

"Return."

He vanishes from the spot, then reappears somewhere inside the Labyrinth. He turns himself invisible, immaterial, and imperceptible to all but the most outrageously powerful beings in the cosmos.

Then he teleports into the Labyrinth Core, at a spot high up where nobody will see or sense his presence.

The Wordsmith's eyes lock onto one of the Warpgates, one from which several thousand demons stream inside.

Seems to lead to the world of Harpsichore. Jason thinks. It'll do. A fairly low-level world nobody will care about, yet one where there's a Warpgate.

Jason teleports forward and arrives at the Warpgate's entryway. He slips through it, and his ears pop as he arrives on a random jungle world, somewhere tens of thousands of lightyears distant from Tarus II.

The Wordsmith nearly bumps into a demon standing on the opposite side, but he quickly teleports to a spot a thousand feet away, where he finds himself standing atop a temple to some unknown mythological figure. Statues of giant demi-birds dot the nearby landscape, their powerful, primal eyes looking up at the skies as if unsatisfied by their lots in life...

"Harpsichore is run and controlled by the Harpies." Fiona explains, her words reaching only her husband. "It's a jungle world, and is only one grade shy of being classified as a Paradise-Class planet like Tarus II. It's rich, lush, and full of life..."

"It'll do." Jason says, his words muffled by the magical field surrounding him. Much like when Hope turned himself invisible, not one monster, demon, or even a Psion can hear him speak. "We need a world rich in life energy to start the 'initial push.'"

The Wordsmith magically empowers his body. He gives himself the power of flight, space-faring abilities, and a barrier to protect himself from the Void's Vacuum...

Then he launches himself into the sky!

Jason races into the upper atmosphere, smiling at the godlike feeling of being able to travel wherever he wants without limits.

"Man once wished for the ability to fly, and I can do it on demand," Jason muses out loud. "The pressure of being a Wordsmith sucks, but the perks aren't half-bad."

He races out into space, then travels a good distance away from Harpsichore. Once he gets far enough away, he fires off more Words of Power.

"Atlas. Atlas. Atlas."

Jason maps out the entire star system Harpsichore resides in, only to be a little surprised when he finds a second populated planet perhaps a hundred million miles away.

"A dual-planet system? Bit rare." Jason mutters. "The other world isn't populated by sentient life, though. Seems it's still in the primitive stage. Maybe I'll visit it sometime."

Shaking his head, Jason returns his thoughts to the task at hand.

"TEAR! Reform! Stabilize! Entry! Expand!"

Jason begins ripping holes in space. He tears apart the void around him, opening a spatial tunnel into a fold in the Void.

After spending a full ten minutes uttering over a hundred Words of Power, Jason completes his task. He successfully creates a Folded Space adjacent to the world of Harpsichore, one that fades away and becomes undetectable to all but the most skilled of Psions or other space-bending entities.

"Transfer." Jason says.

His body slips through the gap in space. He arrives inside a pitch-black void lacking starlight and sunlight both.

Unlike the Void that the Physical Realm resides within, Harpsichore's newly created Folded Space does not have the slightest contact with the outside world. A thin but robust wall of Entropy resides between the space's inner area and the physical realm outside.

"Sure is dark in here." Jason complains, waving his hand an inch in front of his face. "Light."

He creates a ball of light that hovers in front of himself. But as he sends it away, he finds that without anything to reflect off, the void appears as pitch-black as ever. He can see his own body, but nothing else.

"Hmm..." The Wordsmith says. "I don't know why, but I didn't realize it would be so barren. How should I start reforming this space?"

"Well, upping the time dilation should be your first step." Fiona suggests. "We'll also need a way to measure the speed inside against the speed outside."

"I can do that." Jason replies. "Expedite! Expedite! Expedite! Expedite! Expedite! Expedite! Expedite!"

Over and over, Jason speaks the same Word of Power.

He repeats it ten times.

A hundred times.

Perhaps even a thousand times.

As he does, the Entropy surrounding his newly created Folded Space begins to spin and revolve, faster and faster.

Soon, it becomes a raging maelstrom. A deep, painful hum vibrates Jason's bones. His muscles tremble as the force of Entropy presses upon him, battling the vastly increased rate of time at the folded space's edges.

"Silence!" Jason shouts.

An instant later, the pressure disappears.

The Entropy continues to race around at the space's edges. It revolves frighteningly fast, giving Jason the impression that if he were to stab at the borders with an object, Entropy would shred that item to nothingness without a hint of mercy.

"Estimate." Jason says. "Hmm... it seems the TDR in here is... one to forty-five? So one minute in the outside world is forty five minutes in here?"

"One month outside would be forty-five months inside here." Fiona helpfully adds. "That's almost four years."

The Wordsmith appears unmoved.

"It's not enough..." He says quietly. "Expedite! Expedite! Expedite!"

Jason repeats the Word of Power a dozen times.

Then, a dozen more times.

Again.

Again...

He continues strengthening the speed of the time dilation. Each repeated Word of Power has less and less effect, but even if the effects are minimal, they do continue to increase the rate of speed by some small amount.

Eventually, his mana begins to run dry. He finally gives up and sighs.

"Estimate."

Jason receives word of the final result.

"Two hundred and fifty." Fiona says. "Roughly."

"One month in the outer galaxy. Two hundred and fifty months in here." Jason says quietly. "A bit over twenty years..."

"If you're serious about doing this," Fiona says, "then 1:250 is a good ratio. But... are you really going to stay in here for-"

"I've failed too many people over the years." Jason says quietly. "Too many. I'll stay in here for as long as it takes. Just you and me. I'll start mastering the power the Creator gave me. I'll learn all of Wordsmithing's intricacies. No more bullshit. No more weakness."

Jason touches a medallion on his chest, a necklace he made for Phoebe to communicate with him no matter the distance separating the two.

"I don't know what sort of Wordsmith Hope is going to become." Jason says. "And I don't know what sort I will, either. But I know what I want to be. I want to be a symbol of safety. Not just for humanity, but for all the species in the Milky Way."

Jason activates one of the remaining Mana Beads inside his body, refueling his reserves back to full. He aims his mind at the folded space around him.

"REFORM!"

He begins working to create a realm where he can spend a long, long time perfecting his skills.

Who can say how long the First Wordsmith will ultimately spend inside...

Part 466: Where's Mephisto?

Somewhere inside the Labyrinth, at a distant, far corner where few wretched creatures live, and even fewer monsters...

Several hundred human soldiers follow along behind Beelzebub, Blinker, Princess Melia, and Archangel Uriel. These soldiers keep quiet. They don't casually chat, and maintain a calm, military-like demeanor as they continue diving into the Labyrinth's depths.

This deep into the Labyrinth, they are days away from a swift return to human-controlled areas. While the Demon Emperors ostensibly don't dare to go against the Wordsmiths, who can say if every psychotic monster feels the same? Perhaps, this far from the Labyrinth's center, at the very edges of the three-dimensional cube known as Hell, there may be suicidal beings of unknown power just waiting to pick off a tasty human.

Samuel Baker is just one among many of his fellow soldiers. As a mere human, his body is frail. A single Demon Lord could crush him into meat paste, let alone a Baron or a Duke. It is only through the power of technology that he stands a chance against these frightening enemies. He keeps his guard up and proceeds slowly, looking from side to side at the blank, bland, nondescript walls that seem to stretch on forever.

Private Ashley, a woman who traveled with Samuel to the world of Volgarius, walks beside her commander. Her blank-faced T-REX gives no hint as to her expression, but the way she twitches while she walks says more than a little about her mental state.

"It's so quiet..." Ashley mutters, her voice transmitting into Samuel's helmet. "Haven't seen a monster or demon in hours."

"News of our approach has scared away the critters." Samuel transmits back. "It's the ones that aren't afraid who should make us afraid."

At the front of the pack, Beelzebub pauses, causing everyone behind him to slow to a stop.

"Hmm..."

The Emperor of Hellfire glances around, seemingly peering through the rock and dirt that forms the Labyrinth to search for its secrets.

"Are we getting closer?" Blinker asks.

"It's hard to say." Beelzebub says. "I've been able to faintly 'feel' Maphisto's presence for hours now. But it's so distant that I can't tell if we're drawing closer or moving away."

"He's almost certainly hidden himself within a Demonic Formation." Melia says, volunteering her opinion. "While inferior to the formations a fairy can make, demonic formations are especially adept at concealing souls and magical auras."

Beelzebub snorts. "There's one way I could find him. But you wouldn't like it."

"And what would that be?" Blinker asks.

"Simple. I would start blasting the Labyrinth around us to smithereens. I could destabilize the magic in the air until I can finally pinpoint a specific direction toward Mephisto's hidey-hole."

Uriel steps forward. "That would requireth thee to go off alone. I do not trust thy intentions, bloodskin."

"Yeah. I got that impression." Beelzebub says blandly, not even bothering to look at Uriel. "The feeling is mutual."

Uriel and Beelzebub exchange glares. Then, she steps forward.

"Stay here. Verily, I shalt use my own methods."

Uriel flaps her wings, then rockets down the corridor, disappearing into the distance. Once she rounds a corner and vanishes from sight, Blinker scratches her head.

"Err... what's the Archangel going to-"

BOOM! BOOOM!!

The Labyrinth violently shudders. A backdraft of heat washes down the corridor from the direction Uriel went, instantly raising the temperature ten degrees, then twenty.

"That woman!" Beelzebub barks. "She's just doing what I was going to do! Stupid, arrogant, angel-shithead!"

The Labyrinth rumbles and rattles. Uriel continues bombarding the area out of everyone's sight, forcing the humans and those with weaker constitutions to retreat a bit simply due to the rising temperatures. Not only does Uriel unleash fire magic, but holy magic and darkness as well. As the Archangel most adept in all of the elements, she becomes an avatar of destruction, unleashing hell upon Hell.

While the others wince and grimace at Uriel's somewhat barbaric method of blasting apart Hell, Beelzebub's gaze strays in a completely different direction.

"There! I felt a distinct fluctuation." Beelzebub says, pointing to his left, as if seeing through the wall directly in front of himself. "That's where Mephisto is hiding."

"You're sure?" Blinker asks.

"Positive." Beelzebub answers. "If it had been me flinging fireballs, I might have been too distracted by my own rampaging magic to be confident in my assessment, but luckily that dim-headed Archangel chose to do the deed. Mephisto's hiding place is that way."

A human trooper walks forward and activates a three dimensional map of the Labyrinth. Created years ago through Hope's Wordsmithing, this special map is one of a large number of copies that mostly maps out Hell's extremities.

Beelzebub jots down his best guess as to the general area, then everyone waits for Uriel to return.

Twenty minutes later, she does. The Archangel saunters down the corridor and gestures in the same direction Beelzebub did.

"I have uncovered Mephisto's hiding place." She says. "Follow me."

"Great work, Uriel!" Blinker exclaims.

Beelzebub scowls. "Hey! Don't forget whose idea it was to- never mind! Bloody Archangel, taking all the credit, grumble grumble..."

Uriel smiles wickedly. "How unfortunate. It seems the bloodskin is offended this Divine did a better job than him at finding our foe."

She turns on her heel and starts walking down the corridor while everyone else follows. As for Beelzebub, he continues to curse under his breath at the nerve she has in stealing his ideas.

The small army of people follows after Uriel. She expertly navigates the Labyrinth thanks to a hundred thousand years of residing within Barbatos's soul. The fact that she still continues to possess his body seems to have been largely forgotten by many, thanks to the fact she now perfectly resembles her original self. But, slumbering deep within her is still that same Duke of Steel.

Sometimes Uriel even chats with Artorias. The former Duke of Earthquakes has largely fallen silent after the events of Stormbringer. He doesn't say much, but he does share the same Mind Realm space as the other Archangels. When they talk, their words are usually strained, lacking in warmth, often holding a smoldering undercurrent of ancient hatred.

Uriel's beautiful crystal-blue eyes flick around seemingly at random as she attempts to trace the path to that fluctuation she felt before. She seeks to find Mephisto's lair, but his aura eventually fades away, leaving her with only the knowledge of its general direction.

"This Emperor of Legions is a slippery foe." Uriel comments idly. "He is quite adept at hiding his movements."

"Mephisto isn't the sort to fight on the frontlines." Beelzebub says from behind her, content with letting the Archangel lead the way. "He likes to backstab and prod people. He'd rather have others do his dirty work. Even during Stormbringer, he hid underground the whole time and let others fight."

"Pathetic." Uriel says. "Such an existence should not continue. I detest cowards."

She glances at Beelzebub.

"Thou art a vile murderer. A killer of many. But at least thou hath the guts to stand and face thy enemies like a true warrior. I respect that."

"Didn't expect words of praise from a pigeon." Beelzebub snarks.

"What few I give art well deserved." Uriel retorts, looking away. "Though thou art still an imbecilic lout."

The company proceeds forward. For three hours they walk.

At some point, the humans in the group begin to feel antsy. Spooked.

Private Ashley continuously glances around, as does Samuel. Eventually, Samuel raises his fist, causing all of the soldiers to stop. Sensing the change behind them, Uriel turns to look curiously at the humans.

"Is something the matter?" The Archangel asks.

"Yeah. Something is. I'm just not sure what, exactly." Samuel says, walking toward the front. "I keep getting this feeling we're being watched. I can practically feel a pair of eyes boring holes into my back."

A nearby soldier nods. "Me too."

"Same," says another.

Uriel frowns. "I sense nothing of the sort. Beelzebub?"

"Nothing." Beelzebub answers. "This must be some odd human quirk. Maybe you're all imagining the feeling?"

Blinker shakes her head. "I don't think so. Don't underestimate humans, Beelzebub. They all seem to have a sort of ESP that tells them when they're being spied on. It's an underappreciated ability."

"Then it must be Mephisto." Beelzebub concludes, looking around the hallway. "Come out, Mephisto! You're not as sneaky as you think!"

Beelzebub's shout fades away, swallowed by that same, ominous silence that has been dogging the hunting force for over a day now. That oppressive, cloying feeling that leaves them feeling stifled and smothered.

Abruptly, a voice cries out in fright from the backlines. The noise, like a gunshot in the dead of night, startles everyone. They quickly spin to look in the direction of the woman who screamed, only for the people closest to the backlines to also cry out in alarm.

"What in the hell?!"

"How'd they sneak up on us?!"

"OPEN FIRE!"

Without warning, the soldiers in the back level their guns at a massive army of undead monsters lurking behind them, previously unnoticed due to a secret magical spell placed upon them. These concealed monsters include not only skeletons and zombies, but undead Hellhounds, harpies, and other creatures native and non-native to Hell.

Bullets blast out of carbines. The monsters roar at a deafening volume, sending soundwaves racing down the tight and narrow hallway. Then they rush forward! One particularly large undead Ogre soaks up a majority of the bullets, its massive frame shielding the crowd of skeletons behind it.

"What!" Uriel exclaims, gasping in shock. "Mephisto must have- how did I not sense his army's approach?!"

Beelzebub ignites flames under his feet. He propels himself into the air and races down the hallway toward the incoming horde, punching his fists as he flies to launch fireballs at the attackers.

Beelzebub's flames, lethal against the undead, do not have the intended effect. He expects his magic to obliterate their rotting flesh and bones, but instead, his flames crash against an invisible barrier tailor-made to counter high heat!

"How in the devil?!" Beelzebub howls, bewildered. "Mephisto! It seems you came prepared!"

The ogre in the front reaches the backline troopers. It raises a massive club overhead, one which scrapes the ceiling twenty feet above. The humans in the rear guard turn pale as they see the half-ton weapon come falling toward their heads.

"SHIT!"

Just before the club can splatter them into puddles of gore...

Foop!

The five troopers in the ogre's path vanish!

Teleported via Blinker's magic, they reappear at the front, safe from the enemy that would surely have killed them on the spot.

At the same time, Beelzebub arrives at the back. He suicidally rushes toward the ogre at full speed, turning his body into a living battering ram as he rockets down from above.

Crash!

Beelzebub slams his shoulder into the ogre, bypassing the fire resistant barrier. The Duke of Hellfire breaks two dozen bones on impact, but successfully knocks the giant monster backward and makes it fall ass-backward onto the skeletons behind it. It crushes those undead creatures into bonemeal, and Beelzebub bounces off to land in a heap on the floor.

"Ugh!"

The Emperor of Hellfire groans pitifully. With his previous immunity to pain gone, he now feels the full and complete agony of all his broken bones while his body quickly begins to heal itself.

By the time the next wave of undead have crawled over the knocked-down ogre to rush at the demon laying prone on the floor, Beelzebub has already fully regenerated!

He jumps to his feet and winces, still feeling the phantom pain of that impact.

"Tsssssk. Damn, that stings."

As a dozen monsters pounce at Beelzebub, he idly waves his hand and sends two-thousand-degree flames crashing into their bodies. He explodes Mephisto's minions to ash, shredding them at the atomic level in an instant!

More annoyed than anything, Beelzebub now stands inside the fire-resistant barrier that previously stopped him. Mephisto's remaining undead retreat a short distance, staring at him warily.

"Beelzebub." A voice says, drifting on the air. "How good to sssee you again... it ssseemsss you're with the flessshbagsss now."

"As if you didn't already know." Beelzebub says blandly. "Come out, Mephisto. I know we're getting close. We'll find you before long. Sending some measly dregs at us won't save you."

Mephisto doesn't appear. But he does continue talking to Beelzebub.

"How troublesssome. The Wordsssmith hasss placcced you in bondage. The arrogant Beelzebub, now an attack dog for a ssstupid human! What a laughable fate..."

A momentary pause.

"That Word of Power limitsss you greatly, brother. But what if I could remove thossse bindingsss? Let you walk free again?"

Beelzebub gazes at the undead down the hallway, the ones keeping their distance. "You can't."

"No. I cannot." Mephisto says. "But I know who can. Emperor Glinch."

"Who?" Beelzebub asks, frowning slightly.

"Heh heh heh..." Mephisto chuckles softly. "You don't know hisss name? He isss the Ssstitched Emperor. A massster of sssoulcrafting. A body manipulating geniusss. And more than a little crazzzy... but he can sssolve your problem."

By now, Uriel and Blinker have made their way to the backlines. Both of them glare daggers at Beelzebub as they listen to his conversation with Mephisto.

"I see." Beelzebub says, ignoring the Archangel and Fairy approaching him from behind. "So this Glinch fellow can remove the Wordsmith's control over me. Make it possible for me to once again rampage unstoppably."

"Exactly..." Mephisto answers.

"Well. That's a kind offer." Beelzebub continues. "But clearly you don't know anything about me, Mephisto. I have my pride. Do you think I'm doing all of this due to some magic that compels my thoughts? Not long ago, I had a bit of an epiphany. I realized the Wordsmith and I have the same goals. So now I'm trying to make amends to him and humanity for my own reasons. His Word of Power is only a safeguard to ensure I don't betray him and murder a million people. A fair compromise, given how I've acted in the past."

Mephisto hesitates.

"...You are not being compelled to follow Jassson Hiro'sss ordersss?"

"Nope." Beelzebub says blandly. "I am my own demon. But I wouldn't expect a necromancer to understand. You assume others only act because they have no choice, as if all other entities are undead puppets you can ultimately control."

It takes Mephisto a moment to respond. As he does, Beelzebub frowns deeply.

"You ssshould join me, Beelzebub. We are both demonsss. No ssself-ressspecting Emperor ssshould work alongssside an Archangel..."

Beelzebub's heart begins to beat rapidly. Something alarms him, though he isn't sure what. He continues to stare at the monsters at the end of the hallway, all while debating what he should say next.

Just as he is about to respond, Beelzebub's heart skips a beat. It metaphorically fells into the soles of his feet, along with his stomach.

"YOU BASTARD!!" Beelzebub roars, while rapidly conjuring an Emperor level flame in his hands. "EVERYONE! It's a trap! We're already inside-"

A massive head materializes in the air above Uriel, Blinker, and the humans. The hunting party's members reflexively jerk their gazes upward, where they see the image of a gigantic, 200-foot-tall undead monster towering above them.

A Brute!!

The same as the undead behemoth Mephisto conjured to battle the Cherubiim, this monster punches down at the creatures below it, its strength more than enough to reduce a small town to rubble!

"NO!" Uriel howls, quickly summoning a barrier above herself.

Blinker acts on instinct, firing a wave of telekinetic energy at the fist racing toward the army of humans she brought along.

With no time to react, nobody has a chance at stopping the undead monster before it can-

Foop!

Beelzebub suddenly fireports above the humans.

He releases the tiny, rapidly spiraling fireball in his palm.

He fires it straight upward at the fist rushing toward himself and the others!

BOOOOM!!

A titanic explosion of fire and brimstone ignites in the space above the hunting party! The Labyrinth's 'ceiling,' which everyone thought to be real, vanishes, replaced instead with a massive, open sky! Beelzebub's fireball explodes up and away from the humans beneath him, knocking the Brute's fist backward as if it had impacted a solid wall of titanium!

At the same time as Beelzebub's mighty fireblast blows away the supposed 'ceiling,' the walls around the humans also melt away. The party quickly looks in every direction, only to find to their horror that they have actually been standing inside an illusory world! A demonic projection made from magic not dissimilar to that of the fairies!

Tens of thousands of hungry, vicious-looking monsters and undead surround the humans and their allies. The scary creatures they faced in the 'hallway' from before look truly pitiful compared to these innumerable newcomers.

"It was a trick!" Samuel shouts, turning to face the nearest monsters. "Fucking demons!"

Now, the hunting party finds that they have become the Hunted. They have unwittingly stepped into a massive demonic arena covered in pentagrams and sigils, all written in human blood.

A dozen Demon Baron necromancers levitate in the distance, chanting ominous words as they attempt to recreate a new illusion, one which will hide them from prying eyes. Below these hovering Barons, humans lay dead on the ground, their lifeless eyes revealing a recent tale of torture and pain. Even as Samuel and the others inadvertently identify them through their T-REX targeting modules, they quickly realize these people were denizens of Tarus II.

Mephisto captured and slaughtered them for his dark rituals!

"Heh heh heh! Fassst thinking, Beelzebub!" Mephisto 'praises,' his body now visible in the center of his Baron-level subjects. The Emperor of Legions stands proudly, clutching Valac's Lantern in his free hand. "I've known you were coming for daysss. You are not asss ssswift of mind asss you think. You even blundered right into my clutchesss..."

Mephisto's Brute raises its fist high overhead. It swings at its enemies like a Hammer of God, hellbent on smiting the humans dead!

This time, Beelzebub is the one who finds himself surprised. Uriel leaps skyward, flapping her wings to rush directly at the falling fist.

CRASH!

The Archangel of Retribution punts the gigantic limb backward with shocking ease, making even Mephisto's smile disappear. He reveals an ugly scowl as the Archangel smites the Brute's chest and knocks it off-balance, causing the 200-foot-tall monster to stumble backward and lose its footing. It falls backward and crashes onto its ass, momentarily losing its combat effectiveness.

For a brief moment, the battlefield goes quiet.

Then Mephisto waves his hand.

"Go, now. Kill thessse interlopersss. My plan mussst sssucceed."

A massive Death Gate opens up beneath Mephisto, the same type that he used when he attacked Tarus II during the beginning of Stormbringer.

But then, a second Gate opens.

And a third...

Five in total. Five Death Gates materialize, each one possessing far more Death Energy than the ones Mephisto could summon when he was a Duke.

Hardly have they appeared before undead creatures large and small begin to pour through. The chanting necromancers under Mephisto work their magic to manipulate and control the minds of these new arrivals, sending them at the humans.

Blinker turns pale.

"So many..." She whispers. "And we don't have a thousandth the forces we did during Stormbringer!"

"NAY." Uriel says, as her body begins to glow with divine light. "THOU HATH ME."

Part 467: Five Field Fight

Five Death Gates stand between Blinker, Beelzebub, Uriel, and their enemy, Mephisto. Five gates surely much mightier than the ones he unleashed upon Tarus II. At the same time, these archways emit a terrifying amount of Death Energy, and their frames appear much 'sturdier,' making them feel like unassailable walls leading to five undead castles.

Archangel Uriel soars into the sky. Her body ignites with fire and light as she faces down the Brute she's just knocked on its ass. But before she can finish it off with a single lethal blow, the ground rumbles.

Another Brute bursts out of the dirt!

Uriel's heart doesn't waver. In the instant between instants, she registers this second threat with calm, ruthless efficiency. She zips to the side, using the agility of her Archangel wings to dodge the Brute's hand as it tries to slap her out of the sky. Unfortunately, that hand is actually a feint! Mephisto manipulates the Brute from afar, causing it to slap down at the humans and Blinker!

"DASTARD!" Uriel roars, snapping downward to violently kick the Brute's hand aside!

As Uriel does battle with two of Mephisto's strongest minions, additional threats emerge.

The several hundred human commandos, elites who fought in Stormbringer and who have battled alongside Neil for six years, are no strangers to demon ambushes. Their hearts barely tremble as a pair of Upper Demons burst out of the dirt, along with a small army of elite undead.

Raven, the Duke of Feathers, is joined by Xena, the Baron of Trading. However, while Raven boasts the full and unmitigated strength of a Demon Duke, Xena is much more pitiful.

She has no magical abilities whatsoever!

Trained and raised by Yumagi from her days as an Imp, all Xena possesses is the atypically powerful body of a Demon Baron. But her strength is not insignificant!

Every Demon Baron, even without magic, can easily pulverize boulders and shrug off low-caliber gunfire with ease. Not only are they strong, but fast too!

Xena, no longer a card-carrying Tarot Sect member, now instead dons a formidable suit of demonstone armor. She wields a sword and shield, involuntarily becoming a melee combatant! She doesn't have much choice, given her lack of abilities that can suit her new master well.

Neither Xena nor Raven appear pleased at their new lots in life. Raven in particular, once a high ranking member of his Hell, has now been reduced to a sacrificial pawn for an evil necromancer. His days of bedding beautiful men and women are over.

"Even if Emperor Crow wants to save me, she can't!" Raven laments. "Maybe if I go all-out here, I can at least piss these humans off enough to kill me! Nothing worse than living life enslaved to my own body! Ca-caw!!"

Long ago, when Emperor Valac reigned as the Highest Necromancer, he controlled every single minion directly, with rare exception. He forced them against their will to battle his foes.

But Mephisto is not the same. He instead places simple overriding commands in their minds while granting them autonomy to do as they otherwise please.

In the case of his two newest minions, they are consumed with the desire to protect Mephisto and ensure his secret plan materializes in full.

As for what that plan is, none of them know the details...

"Bogeys!" Samuel Baker barks into his suit's comm. "Duke and a Baron, three-o'clock!"

Dozens of soldiers swivel to face Xena and Raven. The lower-ranking demoness leaps forward as powerful bullets and energy beams bombard her position. She stands like an oak tree in a storm as brutally powerful attacks ricochet off her armor, none of them making a dent in the Demonstone protecting her.

"I'll take point!" Xena shouts to Raven. "Help me clean these humans up!"

"Yes, yes," Raven grouches, his armored feathers proving nearly as durable as her armor. Many bullets bounce off him, as if striking plates of solid steel. "Don't get TOO excited to do that bastard Mephisto's dirty work."

Hundreds of undead rush toward the humans, along with Xena and Raven. At the same time, Samuel Baker makes a split-second decision. He activates his Power Glove, switching it to Fairy Mode and quietly altering his body's internal composition.

Then, he flickers forward.

Still wearing his Rhino T-REX, the fairy-empowered human bashes his fist against Xena's helmet, jarring her senses and sending her flying backward!

BANG!

She crashes into Raven, and both of them tumble backward, startled by this one random trooper's act of teleportation.

"The hell? Fairy magic?! Those humans pulled a fast one!" Raven grouches.

While Uriel has to deal with a pair of Brutes and Samuel's company has to fend off a Baron and a Duke, Blinker and Beelzebub aren't standing idly.

Two more threats appear!

Zamiel, no longer a mere Duke, has been empowered to the true rank of Emperor! Through a means Blinker can only imagine to be her worst nightmare, the crocodile-body-stealing undead bastard who killed her husband bursts out of the ground to pounce at her!

"C'mere, you little fairy bitch!" Zamiel laughs. "Gimme those babies in your belly!"

Blinker unleashes a violent telekinetic punch that strikes Zamiel in the face and pounds him into the dirt. "Give me Kar's body back!!"

Beelzebub starts to move toward Blinker to help, but at that moment, Mephisto unleashes the power of Dark Mist! A massive wave of pure darkness shrouds the entire field.

And in that darkness, one particular entity reaches a level of power unimaginable to other Emperors...

Yama, the Emperor of Shadows!

Beelzebub instinctively jumps backward as multiple shadow-lances spear at his position. He retaliates with half a dozen fireballs, but their brightness and power dims considerably inside Mephisto's Dark Mist.

"Heh heh heh. Beelzebub!" Yama cackles evilly. "We won't be much use against the women here, but you will do just fine for our first meal!"

A pulling sensation grabs Beelzebub and yanks him away from the others to a more isolated corner of the battlefield. He grimaces at this unexpected move, but otherwise doesn't pay much attention to it.

"You want to fight me, Yama? Light is your enemy. And fire shines brightest in the dark."

"Not today, it doesn't." Yama taunts, as dozens of Shades fly toward Beelzebub and fling spears of shadow at him. "Inside the darkness, our reign is ABSOLUTE!"

Blinker's hunting force ultimately ends up split into four groups by Mephisto's careful machinations.

Uriel and the Brutes.

The humans versus Xena and Raven.

Blinker battles Zamiel.

And Beelzebub fights against Yama.

Their war begins in earnest!

Recommended Listening

Archangel Uriel fights with all her might. She conjures a greathammer of light and begins racing around, bashing it against the weak points of the 200-foot tall Brutes threatening to kill the entire party she has come here with. Mephisto cleverly does not attempt to strike Uriel directly, but instead forces her into a passive position while relying on the durability of his mightiest summons to buy time...

Uriel slams her entire body into one of the Brutes, using the full power of an Archangel to make it stumble and trip. An instant later, she uses Raphael's portal magic to appear above the other Brute and crash upon its head like a falling star!

Uriel smites the second Brute with all her strength, making it tumble to its knees and land in a sprawling heap, killing dozens of undead in the area.

But she fails to kill or even severely injure either one of the monsters. As undead formed from the bodies of hundreds, even thousands of other minions, they are terribly durable and insanely hard to put down.

"Sister!" Raphael calls out. "Beware! The necromancer's ploy is vile indeed! Look to the five Death Gates!"

Uriel snaps her head in Mephisto's general direction. Despite the cloying Dark Mist that has filled the field with an impenetrable gloom, her keen Divinity allows her to pick through its haze to see that which would otherwise remain unseen. Her heart turns cold, as amidst the sea of undead orcs, harpies, demons, and other malfeasants streaming through, two pairs of giant hands grab onto the Gates from the inside.

Two giant heads duck down and begin to climb through.

"Frost giants." Uriel breathes.

She does not fear these creatures. They pose her no threat. Even the Brutes are too slow and clumsy to have a chance of wounding the Archangel of Retribution, let alone killing her.

But the same can not be said for Blinker, Beelzebub, or the others that have come with her!

While Uriel does not particularly give a damn about the peon-like humans below, she does owe the Wordsmith a begrudging favor, and more than a little respect. These people are her allies, and as someone bearing a sense of responsibility for angelkind's fall tens of millennia earlier...

She has to protect these fragile, insignificant beings. Even if only to maintain good relations with the Wordsmith so that he might keep to his end of the deal and find a way to revive Angelkind.

Uriel hesitates for a split-second. She conjures images of her brothers, Gabriel, Michael, and Raphael, to deal with the Death Gates. But they alone are far too weak to handle such a vast and innumerable threat...

At least, until a small group of allies rushes toward the Death Gates from below.

Princess Melia, along with her two retainers, Ruto and Saria!

"Good, good!" Raphael exclaims. "Keep holding these Brutes back, sister. Verily, I shalt think of a way to deliver a killing blow to the Necromancer!"

"I shalt be relying on thee as usual, brother." Uriel says, quickly returning her attention to the Brutes as they start to get back up.

Her three brothers waste no time. They chase after the three fairies, shoring up their flanks and unleashing the power of Heaven.

"Who the heck are you?" Ruto quickly asks, directing a suspicious glance at the trio of men chasing after her and her sisters.

"Archangels!" Raphael explains. "Brothers to Uriel!"

"Oh, great! Help us kick these boney bastards back to the Dead Realm!" Ruto says.

"That is why we art here." Michael answers, unsheathing his sword...

The Archangel of Courage travels down into the center of the undead horde. Monsters large and small turn their attention on the dimly glowing light in the darkness, the single shining beacon they can most easily make out.

As these creatures rush toward Michael, his right arm begins to dance.

At a speed far too swift for any human to follow, Michael cuts apart tens of mooks in an instant. His blade, nowhere near as powerful as a physical weapon, is still more than potent enough to tear Mephisto's undead to shreds.

Michael swims through the army, unassailable. Any enemy that steps within arm's reach enters the Death Zone. They perish, their bodies exploding into bonemeal as the Archangel of Courage's blade rips them apart.

At the same time, Raphael uses his own bag of tricks. With illusions having little effect on the undead, he sticks to making small portals, creating them at seemingly random places to sow chaos and disorder among the enemy forces.

Time after time, one undead entity will trip and fall into a portal, only to fall out of the air and land atop another undead. Both of them collapse in a heap while looking mighty confused.

But that isn't the extent of Raphael's manipulation of the battlefield.

The cunning old fox grins slightly. A light glints in his eyes.

He opens more portals, but these portals don't take the undead to places on the battlefield. Instead, they open up on far distant worlds! Specifically, the worlds of Diabolus and Numaria, where Emperors Gorn and Auger reign supreme.

These powerful demons gasp in surprise when they find undead creatures unceremoniously dumped on their metaphorical front lawns. Their subordinates rush at the disoriented bone-based minions and crush them into dust while roaring to the skies about Mephisto's 'sneaky attack.'

The demons' actions do not escape Raphael's notice. He cleverly begins dropping more and more of Mephisto's undead amidst their strongholds, allowing the demons themselves to destroy Mephisto's minions. As for Raphael, the amount of damage he can deal is far less than that of his siblings, so he decides to conserve Uriel's mana reserves by tricking the demons into thinking Mephisto is attacking.

But Raphael does not go too far. Who can say what would happen if he were to bring another Emperor here? Perhaps they would assist him and the rest in fighting Mephisto, but then again, perhaps they might strike a deal with the Necromancer and betray their 'human allies.'

Especially if it meant they could finally eliminate all of the Archangels in one fell swoop...

As Michael and Raphael do their thing, the third Archangel, Gabriel, casually saunters around. The oversized Archangel sweeps a massive golden greatsword from side to side, killing three to five undead with each swing! While Michael's killing prowess comes from speed and sharpness, Gabriel's comes from sheer brute force.

The Archangel of Power stays true to his name by turning every undead in his path into a shrieking, terror-filled mess. As each one does indeed possess the soul of a demon or monster Mephisto captured at some point in the last 100,000 years, they can all feel moments of terror before their second lives snuff out at Gabriel's hands, forever.

The three Archangels rampage around or work their trickery. But at the same time, the three fairies don't hold back either.

Ruto, a master of water and ice magic, flash freezes the ground to slow down the undead hordes. She spikes their heads with imbued icicles. She detonates ice grenades in the center of large groups to send them flying!

Saria, a master of the woodlands, conjures vines to wrap around and ensnare the undead. She suffocates and tangles them with such force that many of them end up laying on the ground, barely able to twitch as the vines wrap around and snare them in place.

But Princess Melia has the hardest task.

She pauses for half a breath, gazing up in trepidation as two, then four Frost Giants emerge from the depths of the Dead Realm. These monsters tower half as tall as the Brutes, at 100 feet tall, but their bodies are much swifter, and their minds, much keener.

"Damn..." Melia grouches. "I gotta fight these things all on my own."

With her two friends and the Archangel Constructs otherwise occupied, Melia searches deep within herself for the strength to defeat four monstrously powerful enemies.

Guided by Mephisto and his twelve Baron-minions, the Frost Giants perceive Melia's threat and choose to attack her. One of the giants exhales a wave of frosty breath at the fairy princess. Two others raise their warclubs high to smash them down on her tiny, levitating body. Another one grabs at her to try and crush her in midair.

Abruptly, Melia flicks her hands. Dozens of magical seals fly from her grasp to the right and left, up and down, in front of and behind her. These seals attach to any surface they can find, or any enemy, and activate to create a complex magical formation.

But none of the necromancers have the faintest comprehension of fairy magic. Therefore, neither do the Frost Giants.

As their attacks rush at Melia, images of four more frost giant suddenly appear behind Melia. These apparitions rush toward the other four, startling them.

"MIRROR FORCE!" Melia shouts, as she activates the full power of her formation.

Perfect replications of the Frost Giants fly out of the formation's center and rush at the necromancers' slaves, pouncing at them like tigers on the hunt. The enemy Frost Giants try to fight back, but their apparitions crush their skulls, flatten their bodies, and rip them limb from limb. Like far more psychotic, violent counterparts from a mirror dimension, Melia's Giant-copies easily destroy their physical selves, only to fade away a few moments later, returning to dust.

The Fairy Princess does not look particularly happy about easily besting the four enemy giants. She grimaces painfully.

"Damn. I had to use two tassels of Spirit Mimicking Crystals to beat those giants. Mother's going to kill me when I get back."

The brutalized remains of her opponents lay on the ground, twitching for a few moments, before falling still. As for what method Melia used to overpower the giants, perhaps only her fellow fairies would fully understand.

Melia turns her attention to the five Death Gates, but in that moment, her heart grows cold.

Two more pairs of gigantic hands grab onto the gates.

Two more Frost Giants begin to emerge.

"Dammit! Even more?! Frost Giants are supposed to be rare! Just how many does that Mephisto have stashed away?!"

While yet another monstrous duo emerges, back at the place where the battle started, Blinker faces down the opponent she wants to fight most after Mephisto himself.

"Zamiel!!" Blinker howls. "Body-thief!"

No longer does Zamiel cower from the Monster Queen's wrath. With his soul having been elevated to the rank of Emperor, his mind and body have now reached perfect attunement.

He has become a true Emperor-level powerhouse.

He has the capital to stand against her with confidence.

Blinker wraps herself and Zamiel inside a world of illusions. She pulls herself and him into a void where the other combatants won't be able to interfere, but this doesn't bother Zamiel in the slightest.

"Stupid bitch." Zamiel says confidently. "You and that croc-fella killed my little bro. I already gutted your boyfriend. Now I'll gut you too! REVENGE!"

He leaps toward her, but the move is only a feint! He abruptly stops in midair and torpedoes himself straight downward, diving into the dirt as if it were a swimming pool. With the powers he stole from Kar, he summons half a dozen Earthen Constructs to attack Blinker from all directions.

But the Blinker he fought in the past is not the same one who stands before him now. Empowered by the Sphinx, Blinker is the Monster Queen in all forms. Her magical reserves, and her physical body, have reached near-perfection.

Blinker pirouettes in midair. She sweeps her leg out in a wide arc, sending a telekinetic kick toward the dirt and rock constructs Zamiel summoned. With ease, she shatters them into fragments, snorting at their fragility.

"If those had been Kar's constructs, I'd have actually had to try if I wanted to break them!" Blinker shouts. "Now get out here and fight me like- ah!"

A weird cry of surprise catches in Blinker's throat as Zamiel bursts out of the ground. In his hand he holds...

A railgun?!

Pff-WHIFF!! Pff-WHIFF!!

Zamiel fires two shots at Blinker. The Monster Queen barely half-flickers to the side to evade the shots, even as the railgun bullets travel at nearly the speed of light and tear through the ceiling of her illusory world above.

"What?!" Blinker cries. "Where did you get that weapon?!"

"I'm not the Duke of Weaponry anymore, sweetheart!" Zamiel cackles, firing more terrifyingly powerful rounds at her. Blinker hastily teleports to the left and right, causing the shots to only hit her afterimages. "I'm the EMPEROR OF WAR! All technology is mine to control! It won't be long before ol' Ose starts getting jealous of me, bahahaha!!"

All the while, as the battles rage across Mephisto's secret domain, the Emperor of Legions himself remains strangely composed.

"Hehehe..." Mephisto chuckles softly. "It'sss all going to plan."

"Master." One of his loyal Barons, Ozzar, says. "Are you sure we have enough souls for the ritual?"

"We will." Mephisto says confidently. "Even if we don't... my Assscensssion will proccceed asss planned. It is only a matter of degree. How much more powerful will I become...?"

Ozzar nods. "Glinch, though... I trust he won't betray you?"

"I have a... working relationsssship with the Ssstitched Emperor." Mephisto says. "He will ssstick to the deal. He isss quite funny, in that way."

"It is as you say, then." Ozzar replies, returning his attention to the unfolding battles.

Mephisto struggles to keep down the most evil smile of his entire life as he gazes at his unwitting pawns.

Sssoon... they will all become food for thisss Deity...

Part 468: Beelzebub's Secret

"You know, it wasn't your smartest idea to bring me here by my lonesome." Beelzebub says, as Yama's Shadow Realm swallows him, cutting him off from the outside world. "I can't take risks that would endanger those humans, or I'll suffer a painful backlash."

"What a coincidence! We have a similar problem!" Yama chortles, as vague images of his face flicker in the shadows. "We cannot attack women or we will suffer terrible pain! It seems the two of us are both being shackled by higher powers!"

"I accepted my shackles willingly." Beelzebub says while flicking a piece of lint off his shoulder. "But for you to give up your predation of women? I doubt you accepted that restriction willingly."

Beelzebub smirks.

"So who made you their bitch, Yama? Was it Mephisto? Is that why you're slaving underneath him?"

"Not Mephisto." Yama says. "Satan the Devil."

Beelzebub cocks his head.

"Satan? That's not right. He died six years ago."

"Hehehe... we have told you enough." Yama gurgles, while amassing dark power in his unseen palms. "Figure it out yourself!"

The moment Yama starts to attack, Beelzebub exhales. Flames fire out of his nostrils and spray all over the pitch-black ground, momentarily illuminating the darkness. He catches a glimpse of Yama's indistinct figure right before ten shadow lances spike out of the ground, walls, and ceiling toward him, striking from tricky angles.

But Beelzebub fireports through the field of flames, dodging those attacks. He motions with his hands to conjure a swirling firebomb, then viciously chucks it in Yama's direction. The moment the fiery explosive leaves his grasp, it begins to weaken under the effect of Yama's complete control over the shadows!

Boom!

The firebomb explodes, but it doesn't catch Yama in its radius, nor anything else of note.

Beelzebub frowns. This domain of darkness is trickier than it looks...

Yama fires off a dozen more Shadow Lances. Beelzebub repeatedly dodges them through his fireportation ability, then detonates an aura of fire from within his core to try and push away the darkness!

"Break for me!"

Beelzebub roars angrily as he tries to shatter Yama's domain, but the darkness quickly swallows the light and heat, suppressing Beelzebub's power to a fraction of its former might.

Hardly has Beelzebub finished unleashing this blast before shadows swirl at his feet.

He starts to fireport, but before he can finish the action, a horde of Shadow-walkers and Shades bursts out from underneath him!

The male and female shadow demons grab onto Beelzebub's legs and arms, holding him taut and preventing him from forming any hand-signs. At the same time, Yama himself suddenly materializes in front of Beelzebub with his fist reared back.

THUNK!

Beelzebub's head snaps backward as Yama's fist batters his face, making him stumble and fall into the crowd of Yama's minions.

"Argh! Get off- GARGH?!"

Beelzebub chokes involuntarily as Yama suddenly spears a shadow lance straight into his mouth, tearing out the back of his head and 'killing' him on the spot.

In that brief moment during Beelzebub's unconsciousness, Yama fires off even more shadow-spears. He impales Beelzebub's hands and feet, his elbows and knees. He spears the Emperor of Hellfire to the floor, but does not appear happy about his success.

"Hold him! HOLD HIM, you idiots! He will regenerate soon! We only have to keep him here until Mephisto completes his ritual! Then, we will join Mephisto in attaining ultimate power! Ehehehe! The other Emperors only wish they could partake in this ritual, but they are unworthy!"

Yama flicks his eyes around, carefully monitoring Beelzebub's body as the fire-powered Emperor rapidly regenerates all of his injuries, even while unconscious. Yama repeatedly punches Beelzebub's head to shatter his skull, killing him over and over again!

But the frightening thing is, each time Yama hurts Beelzebub, the damage heals back a little faster than before! He shatters the Emperor of Hellfire's skull, spraying Beelzebub's brains out all over the shadowy floor. But within five seconds, Beelzebub's head rapidly reforms!

And when Yama shatters his skull again, the time needed to regenerate shortens just a little bit more...

"Damn, damn, damn!" Yama curses. "Is this what the evolution to Emperor did for him? How is Beelze-bastard regenerating so quickly?! Even Satan couldn't return at this speed! This is ridiculous!"

Yama launches another vicious punch at Beelzebub's head, but before it can connect, Beelzebub's hand abruptly tears away from the shadow-lance impaling it, regenerates instantly, and grabs onto Yama's wrist.

BOOM!!!

Beelzebub's body explodes with fiery power, shredding all of the shadow-lances impaling him and burning over a hundred Shadow-walkers and Shades to ash.

An instant afterward, he flickers to Yama's side with his palm aimed at the Emperor of Shadow's face.

FWOOSH!

Beelzebub unleashes a torrent of flames, burning Yama badly and forcing him to retreat.

"Aaah! You bastard!" Yama screams. "You burned us! Gah!!"

"And you crushed my head repeatedly." Beelzebub says, his voice betraying no emotion beyond boredom. "Do you understand how pointless this battle is? You can't beat me. I'm invincible now."

Yama grimaces, but doesn't answer Beelzebub's taunt. To him, delaying for time is all that matters.

"Hehehe. Little Beelzebub." Yama snarks. "You really think you're hot stuff, don't you? But you don't even know the truth about your powers. You probably think you're divinely 'gifted' or something. But you're not."

As Yama talks, he keeps his distance, extinguishing the stubborn flames clinging to his body while teasing Beelzebub with hints about... something previously unspoken...

Beelzebub frowns. "What do you mean?"

"Hehehehe..." Yama chuckles evilly. "I knew it. Agares never told you the truth, did he?"

"What truth?" Beelzebub asks. "What are you talking about?"

"Stupid bastard. Even after ten thousand years, you're still that same little naive Imp at heart." Yama says. "Think about it! Use your head. Why would a lauded Demon Duke randomly choose you, some no-name Imp, to become his apprentice? Didn't you find that odd?"

Beelzebub glares coldly at Yama's shadowy figure. "Don't slander my teacher, you rapist wretch."

"Slander? By no means..." Yama chuckles. "Agares never chose you, Beelzebub. You were assigned to him by his superiors... by Diablo, specifically. And it wasn't because you were special. No... it was because of the thing they found inside of you."

"What 'thing'?" Beelzebub asks, suddenly feeling discomforted by this line of discussion. "What the hell are you talking about?"

"Isn't it obvious?" Yama continues, drawing out his words to stall for time. "A Phoenix's Feather, of course. Somehow, that special item ended up inside of you through a means not one high-level demon could fathom. That's why you had such an easy path to the rank of Lord. Agares supported you because it was his duty."

"That's not true." Beelzebub growls. "Agares would have told me if it was! He and I were close!"

"Were you?" Yama asks. "You and him had to fight during the Black Witch's return. Why, on his deathbed, did he not tell you of this secret? Perhaps he didn't want you to know..."

"Or perhaps you're making this up." Beelzebub says. "I have no way to know if what you're telling me is the truth or not."

"Ah, but you do..." Yama coos softly. "When you were to be executed by the Wordsmith, did you not see that fiery apparition fly inside of your body? Every Emperor on-site witnessed it. Even we, who were not present, have heard of this news. It was clearly another fragment of the Phoenix, drawn to you by that feather inside your body!"

Yama chuckles.

"Hehehe... you're not special at all, Beelzebub. That ego of yours, so inflated. You're just a lucky bastard who got juiced-up by some ancient monster. The last time demonkind had to face the power of the Phoenix was during the War in Heaven, when the Valkyrie named Catherine smote dead the ancient Emperor, Valac. How you inherited her power is anyone's guess, but without it, you would still be a nobody. A useless, worthless Imp, wallowing in the mud."

Yama rises to his full height, which is only about four-feet tall.

"You're just lucky, Beelzebub. You were in the right place at the right time. Any other demon would have accomplished the feats that you have!"

For a brief moment, Beelzebub falls silent.

He ruminates on Yama's words.

Then he shrugs.

"Was that it? You hoped to shatter my ego and break my spirit with that little speech?"

Beelzebub also stands up straight, his height making him appear much more imposing than Yama.

"So what if I lucked out? I'm still amazing, and you won't convince me otherwise. Plenty of other demons got lucky with their access to powers and ended up becoming nobodies. Just look at you! You've become Satan and Mephisto's little bitch. As for me, I have grand aspirations. I don't think Emperor will be my final limit."

"What?" Yama asks. "You think you can ascend to Demon Deity? Laughable!"

"Maybe I can, and maybe I can't." Beelzebub replies. "But I'm still going to try. And even if I never go any further, I'll still continue with my ultimate goal of empowering demonkind. As for you, a small-minded worm who preys on women, how can you possibly comprehend my goals? You're so pathetic I can't even put my disgust into words. A shallow-minded, limp-wristed loser like you has no right to talk down to me."

Yama glowers at Beelzebub.

"Little brat. We have been around since the War in Heaven. We have observed countless battles among Titans and Angels, while you are still only a whelp who has barely exited the cradle."

Yama motions with his hands. He begins absorbing the darkness around himself to empower his body.

"You want to talk to this Emperor about goals, Beelze-brat? We have our own goals! And you will not stop us from accomplishing them today!"

Yama's body increases in size. He jumps to five feet tell, then, six, and finally seven! His form becomes less misty and more corporeal. His muscles increase drastically, while amidst the darkness, strangely colored 'beads' materialize on his forehead.

He faces down Beelzebub with a grin on his face, relishing the beatdown he is about to unleash.

"You're unlucky, Beelzebub. We have not used our other powers for tens of thousands of years. But that does not mean we have turned rusty!"

While Yama and Beelzebub fight, so do the other forces arrayed against Mephisto. Blinker battles Zamiel, Uriel staves off the pair of Brutes, and the fairies work together with the Archangel Constructs to push back the terrifying horde of monsters coming from the Death Gate.

But while those groups battle the strongest enemies, their human allies find themselves facing their own troubles!

Samuel Baker morphs into his Fairy Form while wearing his Rhino T-REX. He, Private Ashley, and the other soldiers bravely stand against Duke Raven and Baron Xena.

Xena, a trueblooded Baron lacking any magical powers, acts as the tank of her party. While Mephisto's undead swarm the humans, she does battle with Samuel Baker, frowning as her demonstone armor clashes against his Rhino armor.

"Who are you?!" Xena demands to know. "Another fairy, hiding among these humans?! You should have gone with the other three and stayed out of my way!"

Xena jumps into the air, lifts her leg up high, and slams it down on Samuel's arms, who resists her with the defense of his Rhino! His enhanced armor is more than capable of taking heavy abuse, though it isn't up to the task of dealing with Dukes and Emperors.

"I'm not a goddamned fairy!" Samuel barks, countering with a punch aimed at Xena's chest. She lithely dodges the attack, narrowly slithering out of the way. "I'm a human!"

"The hell you are! You're a fairy! And a MALE fairy at that! Which one are you?! I heard only a handful of you existed, and you're supposed to all be playing with your harems! Identify yourself!"

"My identity is Samuel Baker!" Samuel fires back. "And I'm not lying! I'm a human! I ain't no god-damn twinkle-toes fairy!"

He says this before flickering behind Xena and violently kicking her in the back, sending her sprawling onto her face. She immediately recovers with an improvised frontflip to face him again.

"I don't know what kind of games you're playing, fairy-boy, but if you want to drag your species into this conflict, be my guest! I bet those fairies over there are your personal playthings, eh?"

Samuel and Xena exchange several blows, with him flickering around and striking her with telekinetic attacks, while she relies on the raw power of her demonstone armor and Baron-level body to tank the blows with ease. Occasionally, a high-caliber sniper round fired by one of Samuel's allies will glance off Xena's armor, but she ignores the mice in favor of the more interesting opponent.

"Believe what you want, you arrogant bloodskin bitch." Samuel snarls. "I hate your kind. I hate all of you! Demons like you killed my brother! And I will NOT stand here and listen to you call me a god-damned fairy!"

Seemingly oblivious to the fact that he is, indeed, flickering around via fairy magic, Samuel confuses Xena with his resistance to the label. She eventually shakes her head, attributing his denial to some need for secrecy. Perhaps he's come here to assist the humans without the other fairies knowing. This might even be a conspiracy that goes right to the top!

But Xena doesn't care. Her days of scheming are over. Now, she is only a pawn working for Mephisto, lacking all agency.

She'd rather take out her rage on the annoying fairy-boy buzzing around her head!

Xena kicks the Labyrinth's floor, sending a spray of debris not only at Samuel, but the troopers behind him. These pebbles and rocks fly like high-caliber bullets, glancing off their armor, but also chipping the T-REX's in various places. The sheer strength behind even a mid-level demon's kick allows them to weaponize their environment with ease!

"Knock it off!" Samuel says, lunging toward Xena. Just before he can punch her head into the ground, an attack strikes him from the side.

A burst of... feathers?!

Indeed, feathers harder than steel rush at Samuel, stabbing into his Rhino and causing it serious damage. The armor system rapidly repairs the damage through its internal nanite storage, and Samuel jerks his head toward the attacker.

Raven, the Duke of Feathers, taunts Samuel. "Xena! Take care of those small fry! I'll handle this little fairy myself!"

"Hey!" Xena snaps. "You're not my boss! I wanna fight the fairy!"

"Do you? Then fight me first, idiot. Ca-caw!! I'm a Duke, so my word goes! Don't like it, I'll beat you down and embarrass you right in front of these humans!"

Xena grimaces. She realizes that as a Baron, and one lacking any magic, she hasn't a chance of defeating her Duke-level 'ally.' Raven would mop the floor with her face!

"Y-you! Fine! I'll kill the stupid humans! But after I'm done, I'm coming back to take down this fairy!"

Samuel grits his teeth. He wants to stop Xena, but compared to the terrifying threat of a Demon Duke, Xena isn't anything at all! Not only is Raven a Duke, but a long-lived, fully matured entity who fought during the Energy Wars!

He's a terrifying foe!

Raven flaps his wings. He leaps into the sky, then dive-bombs Samuel to try and kill him in one overbearing attack.

"Never should have come here, mystery fairy-man!"

Samuel flickers to the side, narrowly evading the attack as Raven crashes into the floor. Samuel fires off multiple telekinetic blasts, trying to knock his enemy away or slow him down, but Raven shrugs them off with ease.

"Hahaha! So you're a male fairy?" Raven laughs, relishing in the moment. "Maybe you weren't lying after all! Maybe you really are just a human! This magic is pathetic! The male fairies I know are peak powerhouses! They can go toe-to-toe with Dukes, let alone Emperors! But you're more like a baby waving around a magic wand! Did the Fairy Queens send you here to temper you? Hmm! I wonder what will happen if I pluck your little wings! What are they going to do? KILL ME? HAHAHA! I'M ALREADY DEAD!"

Raven flaps his wings. He rushes toward Samuel at a frightening speed, using his armored chest as a battering ram. Samuel hastily conjures a force field, but Raven breaks it with ease, slams into him, and sends him flying backward!

Samuel crashes into the dirt. He bounces off the ground twice before grinding to a halt. Protected by his Rhino, he doesn't suffer any injuries, but his T-REX shudders under the impact of that blow.

Samuel flickers to his feet, but his heart turns cold as he sees Xena casually marching into the battle lines of his fellow soldiers.

Humanity's Finest unload bullets into the undead rushing their position. Burner demons mix with undead Warpers as well as Burrowers. The Burners fling fireballs into their midst to try and smoke the human's vision, as well as heat up their suits. The Burrowers crush several people under falling rocks and boulders, killing them on the spot, while the Warpers continuously summon more grunts of different types to charge these people.

At the same time, the humans don't fail to notice Xena's approach. The problem is, none of them are nearly as equipped to deal with a Baron as Samuel is!

At least, with the sole exception of one human.

Private Ashley McCarthy!

Unlike the other people around her, Ashley is the sole person besides Samuel to have an S-rank species compatibility through her Power Glove.

And like Samuel, she finds her species to be... undesirable.

"Dammit! Nobody's ever going to want to date me if I pop this... but I don't have a choice!"

Seeing the imminent catastrophe of a Demon Baron marching toward her comrades, Ashley no longer hesitates. She activates her Power Glove and begins to morph inside her armor.

Her muscles triple in size. Her height increases. Her T-REX adjusts itself to conform to her new parameters.

Her comrades gasp in shock as Ashley jumps from five feet tall to nearly eight!

She towers above everyone, easily drawing Xena's gaze.

"What the- another aberrant? These humans are weird!"

Hardly has Xena registered this random new threat before Ashley begins to thunder toward her. Her feet slam into the dirt! Her stride allows her to wade through the undead without even flinching!

Ashley lifts up her service rifle, transforms it into a specially customized Greathammer Mode made just for her, and brings it down on her enemy's heads.

Splatter!!

She kills five undead at a time while swimming through their ranks toward her opponent. Xena jumps toward her, not sensing any particular magic flow, and lunges her fist toward Ashley's chest.

But Ashley's hammer moves at a speed far faster than its size would imply. She swings it in an upward arc toward the incoming Baron of Collection.

BOOM!

The hammer crashes into Xena's stomach and sends her flying high into the air. Xena screams involuntarily under the power of that strike, before crashing into the ceiling five hundred feet above. She tumbles away and falls to the ground, halfway across the entire battlefield, ultimately landing in a heap.

Ashley doesn't revel in this victory, however.

Instead, she grumbles under her breath.

"...that damn demon bitch, can't believe she made me use the Orc transformation! God, I hope nobody sees me like this. I'll die of embarrassment!"

Part 469: Humans Are Insects!

Samuel Baker breathes a momentary sigh of relief as he sees Ashley's transformation. As her superior officer, he's well-aware of her abilities and her S-Rank Power Glove status. Among humanity's military, fewer than twenty people have such a high aptitude for non-human species, and none of them have dual S-Rank compatibilities.

He knows well the power such a high ranking can unleash. She might actually be able to push back the Baron of Collection... at least for a time.

But unfortunately, Samuel doesn't have the ability to focus on how Ashley is handling herself. He has his own problems!

The Duke of Feathers chuckles evilly. "Whether you're a fairy or a human doesn't matter to me. You've thrown your lot in with the Wordsmith, so I'll crush you all the same!"

Raven ca-caws at Samuel, then flaps his wings to rush toward him. Samuel flickers to the side and tries to avoid Raven's attack, but the Duke's movements are frighteningly fast! He follows Samuel's mana-trail to perceive where he'll reappear, then switches gears to launch steel-like feathers from his body at the pseudo-fairy!

"Damn!" Samuel curses.

Lacking a ranged weapon, he can't unleash attacks on the Duke of Feathers from afar, and while his Rhino Exosuit is the strongest model Phoebe Hiro has ever made, it's nowhere near capable of tanking attacks from High Demons!

This puts Samuel in quite a predicament.

With only his fairy abilities keeping him alive, but lacking any sort of formal training in what fairies can actually do, he repeatedly has to rely on his instincts to stay half a step ahead of Duke Raven. If he lands a successful claw swipe, he could rip Samuel's armor and body to shreds!

Quickly, Samuel summons a hasty illusion. He waves his hand, causing two more apparitions of himself to appear, then one of them flies to the right while the other flies to the left. Raven continues charging at his main body, but he instantly swaps positions with the one fleeing to the right.

"Nice try!" Raven cackles, instantly locking onto his new position. "Do you think a cheap little trick like that can keep me from finding you? Your magic's so sloppy an Imp could follow your trail!"

"DAMN!" Samuel curses again! Raven doggedly locks onto him, firing even more feathers from his arms while new ones grow to replace the old.

Despite 'only' being feathers, each one is individually the size of a dagger, and they somehow weigh almost 500 pounds! When the feathers whiff past Samuel, they crash into the ground, or other random undead in the area, smiting those monsters dead by crushing them under the weight of an anvil!

Samuel tries not to think about what would happen if these sharpened cannonballs were to strike any part of his body.

But still, while the feathers are fast and dangerous, he can still manage to keep his distance from Raven by relying on his fairy magic, and even when torrents of feathers fly at him, they only ever strike his afterimage.

God, I hope this is the limit of Raven's abilities... Samuel thinks.

But how can a Demon Duke be so simple?

As Ashley battles against Xena, Samuel also tries to keep Raven busy by holding her attention.

"You're not so scary, bird-brain!" Samuel taunts, while continuously monitoring his surroundings for danger. "I can do this all day!"

"What an arrogant little moth." Raven taunts right back, firing another wave of feathers for Samuel to dodge. "Do you think I'm taking you the slightest bit seriously? The mightiest Fairy is nothing before a Demon Emperor, and you are far from capable of matching up to your peers. I've yet to see a single Formation from you, or any interesting tricks, or traps... what is your element, I wonder? What field do you specialize in? I'm betting you don't even know!"

Samuel winces. He realizes his opponent right. He's only chatted with Blinker on a surface-level and the two of them have never been particularly close. Samuel doesn't know how fairy magic works, but instinctively feels he could be doing so much more with it... if only he knew what he didn't know!

The lack of information stifles his magic! He can only fire off halfhearted bursts of telekinesis, or teleport around in a way that Raven can easily follow with her eyes. Any other decent fairy would easily be able to befuddle her senses, but his usage of mana is so crude and childlike that Raven easily identifies his lack of combat experience.

"I have an idea!" Raven suddenly says. "Let's make this a little more fun."

At once, all of the feathers Raven fired at Samuel but 'missed' suddenly explode! Five hundred feathers, previously littered around the area seemingly at 'random,' detonate like grenades, spraying metallic feather-down all over the battlefield!

An instant later, the down spreads across the entire area, covering the undead and Samuel both in fine, hair-like metallic strings that gently float on the breeze.

Samuel comes under immense pressure!

Each individual thread of down doesn't seem the slightest bit frightening, but as it collects and attaches to his T-REX, Samuel's speed rapidly begins to drop. His Rhino's weight increases by 20%, then 50%...

Soon, its weight doubles!

"What the hell?!" Samuel cries in frustration, as even his fairy magic starts having trouble keeping him aloft. "What did you do to me?!"

Raven sneers contemptuously at the struggling human. He doesn't even launch more attacks, merely laughing to himself as Samuel's flight speed drops more and more by the second, along with his elevation. Raven's fellow undead also start to slow down, as if trapped in molasses. Their bodies struggle to remain upright while the weight of multiple anvils clings to their skin and bones.

"If you were a genuine fairy powerhouse, that little trick wouldn't have worked. But you're clearly some fledgling prince they sent out to help the humans, so you're greener than a fish's gills. You don't even have a weak Fairy Barrier surrounding that fancy combat armor, so you can't ward away my Feather Snow. I'm afraid if I bully you any more, our fun will be over and I'll have to go back to killing those weak little piss-ant humans. And that would sure be boring!"

Samuel grimaces at Raven's description of the 'battle.' So far, he's been fighting to stay alive, while his enemy has only leisurely launched attacks from a distance to scare the piss out of him. Not once has he come even the slightest bit closer to beating the Duke, let alone injuring him. Raven's feathers are at least ten times more durable than his own nanite-based armor. It's as if she wears a set of full armor that perfectly adheres to her skin!

"So you're just toying with me, huh?" Samuel grimaces, directing a hateful glare at his enemy. "Like all demons... you only look down on us humans!"

"And why shouldn't I?" Raven posits. "If you truly are some human borrowing the power of a fairy, it would explain why you're so pathetic at using it. You'll never compare to the majesty of a High Demon. Humans are worthless, weak little insects!"

* * *

At the same time as Raven bullies Samuel, Private Ashley McCarthy finds herself locked in deadly combat with Xena, the Baron of Collection. However, with her opponent only being a Baron, Ashley has a much more manageable time fighting her.

That's because Ashley possesses an S-rank compatibility with the Orc species. And unlike fairies, Orcs are all about brute strength. Ashley's combat training translates perfectly into her body's physical transformation!

After smashing Xena up into the ceiling with her greathammer, Ashley chases after the Baron, and the two of them engage in direct physical combat!

Ashley's greathammer swings toward Xena, but the Baron doesn't stupidly try to block the terrifying attack. She dodges it, then pulls out a longsword made out of Demonstone and stabs at an opening in Ashley's defenses.

But that opening is a fake-out! Ashley deliberately leaves her kidney open to a stab so that when Xena moves in for the attack, she can release her grip on the hammer with one hand, then bring the side of her fist down on Xena's head.

BANG!!

Ashley slams Xena's helmet and sends her sprawling into the dirt. She instantly recovers, but still appears pissed at the trickery on display.

"So you humans can transform into other species! Must be one of your Wordsmith's new abilities, huh?" Xena grimaces, easily identifying the truth much more easily than Raven did. "And you've become an orc! I wonder what sort of ugly guy you are under that armor, eh? You should take it off so we can have a fair fight!"

"I'm NOT ugly!" Ashley roars. "I'm a FAIR and DAINTY girl! I'm BEAUTIFUL, you undead witch!"

Contrasting with her eight-foot-tall height and somewhat guttural-sounding voice, Ashley's screams of anger sound more like a flummoxed denial to Xena's ears than a declaration of truth.

When Ashley starts swinging her Greathammer around again, Xena still has to continuously dodge and evade, lest what remains of her life be snuffed out on the spot!

Time after time, Ashley's hammer barely misses Xena, making her hair stand on end.

Even as a Baron protected by Demonstone and wrapped in the magic of undeath, she can still feel pain!

At the same time, despite 'only' being a Baron, she is still far superior to any average Orc. It's not that Ashley's Orc transformation has made her capable of contesting Barons, but that her default T-REX model has also improved her strength and speed. She can just barely rival Xena's physical parameters while also standing several heads taller than her.

But, despite matching up to a Demon Baron in many ways, Ashley still has one severely lacking parameter...

Her defense.

Xena slashes her sword and manages to tear apart a strip of armor across Ashley's chest, biting into the woman's orc-body and spraying blood. Ashley's new species allows her to mostly ignore the pain and continue fighting while her injuries rapidly heal, but unfortunately, Orcs, Trolls, and Ogres are very different monster species. Trolls are the ones with enhanced cellular regeneration, while Orcs are only a bit above average.

Ashley manages to land a glancing blow on Xena with her excellent combat training, but Xena is no slouch. She's a long-lived demon who has survived since the end of the Energy Wars. She's fought in countless mock battles, as well as battles for her survival. She even fought in the Final Battle against angelkind!

Even if Ashley manages to land a full-impact blow with her hammer, Xena's demonic body is much hardier than her own, and the Demonstone Armor only reinforces that defense to ludicrous levels! The worst impact will only cause her a few moments of dizziness and pain before she recovers!

Ashley lands three mighty blows on her opponent over the next few minutes, while Xena carves across Ashley's chest and legs ten times. The damage starts to add up, weakening Ashley further!

"Hahaha!" Xena laughs. "You're getting slower, little human! Orcs are indeed fearsome enemies, but that's not because of their bodies! It's because they are warriors bred from birth and bathed in blood! By contrast, you're just a little human girl harnessing the strength of another species!"

Xena lunges forward and rears her fist back. Ashley tries to punch her away, but Xena dodges that attack and brings her armored fist crashing into Ashley's thigh-bone, making the woman scream in pain and collapse into the dirt. Then Xena snaps her leg up into Ashley's lowered head, blasting apart the armor protecting her face and snapping her whole body into an inverted U-shape! Ashley falls unconscious as Xena brutally beats her with this two-hit combo, showing off the full prowess of a Demon Baron!

"Hah! And just like that, my opponent's out like a light!" Xena cackles at Ashley's collapsed figure. "Nice try, humans! But you'll never compare to a glorious demon! You're nothing but an insect to me!"

Xena hops over Ashley's unconscious figure. She stands next to the human's head, with its slowly-regrowing nanites that attempt to protect her most vulnerable body part. Still in her Orc form, Ashley doesn't look at all like a human, but Xena isn't fooled.

She raises her foot up to stomp Ashley's head into paste, but... at that moment...

A swarm of bugs skitters across the ground and starts climbing up Xena's armor!

"Ahh! What the hell?!" Xena exclaims. "Ew! EWW! Bugs, yuck! Why are there so many?!"

These bugs consist almost entirely of ants, but among them are scattered numbers of cockroaches. They quickly find the small gaps in Xena's armor and crawl inside, making her shiver and jump around in disgust.

"No, no, eww, gross! Get out of my armor! Aaah!! I hate bugs!!"

At the same time, while Xena shrieks at her unexpected predicament, Raven starts to move toward Samuel.

"You'll never compare to the majesty of a High Demon. Humans are worthless, weak little insects!"

She unleashes her full power, racing toward the little human while her Iron Down cripples his movement and makes his speed plummet. Even motioning with his hands comes more slowly due to their increased weight.

But before Raven can land the expected, casual blow...

A bee flies into the airspace between her and her opponent.

A simple little buzzy-bee... a Yellow Jacket from the remains of Earth.

An instant later, the bee suddenly explodes in size, transforming from the size of a grape to a bowling ball, and then to a beach ball.

As its size explodes, it begins to reshape itself, turning into a female demon. A Demon Emperor, none other than Kiari, the Emperor of Pestilence!

Kiari transforms out of her Bug Form directly in the path of Raven's charge!

"Shit!" Raven screams, an instant before the back of Kiari's palm casually smashes into her head.

BOOM!!

Raven goes flying!

She hurtles to the side, bounces off the ground, skids and flips until crashing into a heap of other undead, breaking their bones from the force of her heavy body.

Kiari casually shakes off the numbness in her hand and scowls at the fallen Duke.

"I don't like your insults toward insects. They are my friends!"

Kiari grins at her fallen opponent. But, after several long seconds of Raven laying motionless on the ground, Kiari's heart skips a beat.

"Oh... oh my GOSH! Did I kill her?! I didn't mean to! I must have used too much strength!"

Kiari quickly runs over to Raven's prone body. As she draws closer, she senses the weak emanations of life bubbling within Raven's consciousness.

"Wait! Don't die!" Kiari cries. "I'm sorry! I'm so sorry! I just wanted to look cool for a moment! I didn't mean to hit you so hard! Maybe I can get you back to Samantha and she can heal you!"

Raven lies on the ground, her brain utterly dazed by that one accidental, casual tap from the Emperor of Pestilence. As Kiari sobs uncontrollably about accidentally beating the shit out of her by pure reflex, Raven can only think one thing...

Life is so unfair.

At the same time, Kiari's swarm of insects drives Xena insane. Her entire body becomes itchy as the insects crawl all over her skin, biting and nibbling at her in a way that finally forces her to start yanking the demonstone off and throwing it aside so she can slap herself silly.

"Gross! GROSS! Disgusting!!" Xena cries, her long red hair now infested with thousands of ants. Without any access to magic, she doesn't have a way to kill the bugs faster than they can arrive.

Suddenly, a praying mantis mixed amidst the thousands of other bugs increases in size until it becomes as big as Xena herself. Xena notices the newcomer, but before she can react, the insect swats downward with one of its powerful forelimbs.

Snap! THUNK!

It grabs Xena's head and slams her against the dirt, knocking her out and ending her threat.

At the same time, many other bugs grow in size and charge into the undead hordes, ripping apart the monsters and demons under Mephisto's employ, finally clearing up the threat they've faced valiantly for so long!

Samuel, seeing that the situation has been resolved, breathes a sigh of relief. He teleports to Kiari's side and frowns at the defeated figure of Duke Raven, feeling a bit stifled in his chest at how easily Kiari dealt with the demoness who was toying with him before.

"What are you crying about?" Samuel asks, his tone slightly angry. "And where have you been? We lost track of you right before the fight began! A lot of people died because you weren't here!"

Kiari winces. "I'm sorry, Samuel. I was there with you one second, but then suddenly I wasn't. I found myself in a totally different part of the Labyrinth, miles away. I had to make my way back here. I think Mephisto teleported me."

"Well, at least you're here now." Samuel says. "Thanks for the save. If you'd come a few minutes later... I'd probably be dead."

He glances in Ashley's direction.

"And the Private certainly WOULD be."

Kiari glances around the battlefield.

In the sky above, Uriel does battle against the Brutes.

In the distance, the fairies try to fight against the horde of monsters streaming out of the Death Gates.

Somewhere unseen, Blinker battles Zamiel.

And, in a secluded and dark section at a distant corner of the battlefield, rumblings of fire and brimstone occasionally shake the Labyrinth.

Kiari cracks her neck.

"We're dealing with a Necromancer. All he does is send his minions out to fight for him."

She smiles.

"Two can play at that game."

Part 470: Soul Stealer Strikes!

Inside Emperor Yama's Shadow Realm, Beelzebub fights a battle even more difficult than when he was only a Baron battling his master, the Duke of Reptiles. Yama does not hold back, and instead unleashes the full power of darkness on the Emperor of Hellfire!

Yama's body becomes 15 feet tall. He assumes the figure of a massive troll-like beast with talons for claws. At the same time, his Shades and Shadow-walkers all become temporarily empowered to the level of Demon Duke and higher!

Multiple beads of light glow on Yama's forehead. He charges at Beelzebub and slashes his claws, forcing Beelzebub to fireport backward. But when he does, the flames get snuffed out, forcing him to start even more fires in the swirling maelstrom of darkness.

Yama's domain is truly terrifying. Any source of light rapidly fades, ultimately vanishing mere seconds afterward and making it hard for his opponent to track Yama's movement. Even Beelzebub's demonic vision has trouble tracking the Dark Giant as Yama chases after him.

"Hehehehe!" Yama cackles. "We have not unleashed this power in at least an eon! How unfortunate that you will be the first demon to fall victim to our machinations, Beelzebub!"

Beelzebub retorts by launching a fireball at Yama's face.

"You talk too much!"

As the fireball races toward Yama, it suddenly slows down, shudders, and reverses direction!

Beelzebub jumps to the side, slightly shocked by the reversal of his magic. The fireball explodes harmlessly against the floor, igniting a momentary fire before quickly fading away.

"The hell?!" Beelzebub asks. "You can manipulate flames? Since when?!"

"We are an ancient Emperor." Yama says, taking a menacing step toward Beelzebub. "We were once a master of all magic. As it turned out, shadows were the thing we enjoyed playing with the most! But for now, we can temporarily dip into our old abilities so long as it means defeating the likes of you!"

Iron chains burst out of the ground. They snap onto Beelzebub's right leg, causing him to stumble and fall! He quickly blasts the chains apart and fireports a distance away, but in that brief moment, he catches a glimpse of Yama doing something odd.

Yama holds a red ruby in his blackened hands, then snaps his fingers, causing the gem to burst into dust. At once, his affinity to fire magic increases ever further, allowing him to snuff out all the lingering flames in the area.

Beelzebub tries to fling a fireball at Yama, but hardly has it left his hand before it extinguishes.

His eyes narrow. I know what I saw. Yama has an ability similar to Orias!

Indeed, Beelzebub knows about Orias's 'unique' ability to turn gems into elemental magic, albeit on a temporary basis. However, never would he have imagined Yama also possessed such a power!

Was Yama the originator of this power? Did he bestow it upon Orias for some unknown reason? Or is the truth the opposite? Perhaps Yama somehow obtained the power from Orias!

Vines and chains continue erupting from the floor to try and bind Beelzebub. He wises up to this tactic and starts dancing around to avoid ensnarement, but just when he starts to match Yama's beat, the Emperor of Shadows fires off two lightning blasts!

Kzzat!

The two beams of electrified light lance into Beelzebub's chest, badly injure him, and cause him to momentarily lose motor control. Beelzebub barely gasps out a cry of pain before the chains and vines pursuing him finally manage to wrap around his arms and legs. He tries to fight back, but Yama reaches him, then rears back his huge claws and rakes them down across Beelzebub's ensnared form.

RIIIIP!

Yama cleaves Beelzebub's body with a brutal claw attack! He severs the Emperor of Hellfire into half a dozen pieces, killing Beelzebub on the spot.

Naturally, this 'death' won't stop Beelzebub for long. Yama summons two explosive orbs of electrical energy, then blasts Beelzebub's remains, causing the Labyrinth to rumble and shake, even outside of his shadow domain!

For a brief moment, Beelzebub appears to have been entirely erased from reality. But it doesn't take long before some unseen clump of cells begins rapidly regrowing a short distance away.

"Gah!" Yama growls. "Why does Beelzebub get the most useful power?! Infinite life should be OUR domain, not his!"

Yama suddenly pauses, as if realizing something.

"...Wait."

While Beelzebub's body rapidly regenerates, Yama's heart turns cold. He gazes at the Emperor of Hellfire with a completely different expression, as if realizing something he should have realized before.

Beelzebub completes his regeneration. When he opens his eyes, he finds himself bound even more tightly by Yama's chains and vines, all manipulated through the same powers Orias uses.

The Emperor of Hellfire quickly begins to bubble up the flame energy within himself to break free, but before he can complete his great escape, Yama pounces on him!

The Emperor of Shadows grabs onto Beelzebub's face with his huge claws, confusing and startling Beelzebub. As he thrashes around and tries to escape, Beelzebub suddenly feels a strange 'tugging' sensation attaching to his soul. It begins pulling away a portion of his core energy, making Beelzebub cry out in muffled screams through Yama's palm as the excruciating agony of his soul being pulled apart makes him long for death.

Moments later, that small but significant portion of Beelzebub's soul tears away and flies into Yama's palm, instantly knocking Beelzebub unconscious!

When he awakens, Beelzebub finds that the bindings holding him have drastically lessened. He quickly burns and melts them away, then staggers to his feet, only to see Yama laying facedown on the ground in the distance, his whole body violently twitching.

"Aaah! Aaargh! Aaah! So... good!" Yama cries. "This pain... this pleasure! What a treat your soul was, Beelzebub! Aahahaha!"

Beelzebub shivers. He doesn't feel any different from before, aside from a slight hint of disorientation, but Yama feels monstrously more powerful. As Yama rises to his feet, Beelzebub realizes that he can feel the connection to his severed soul inside of Yama!

"What have you done?!" Beelzebub snaps. "You thief! Give me back my soul!"

"Hehehe. Don't be so greedy, Beelzebub." Yama taunts. "We only took a little nibble. You'll be just fine! Now come and attack us, if you dare! We'd like to play with our new magic, if you don't mind!"

Beelzebub hesitates. He glowers at the Emperor of Shadows while fighting off a maddening headache.

I can't keep letting Yama toy with me. Beelzebub thinks. I have to go on the offense!

Beelzebub blasts fire from his feet. He rockets upward, while Yama remains standing in the same place, watching as the Emperor of Hellfire races a hundred feet into the air. Beelzebub begins conjuring a powerful orb of fire, rapidly cycling and spinning it between his palms to increase its heat and ferocity.

But all the while, Yama's monstrous body remains in place, grinning up at Beelzebub with a strange eagerness in his eyes.

Finally, Beelzebub launches the concentrated orb of nuclear hellfire at his foe below. It races toward Yama at the speed of sound, clearing the gap in a split-second!

But just before it can explode, Yama's giant hand snaps toward it.

He grabs the ball of fire, catches it, and suspends its spinning form in his grasp!

"Hahaha! The permanent ability to manipulate hellfire! You've truly given us a wonderful gift, Beelzebub!" Yama laughs.

Beelzebub's blood runs cold. He already suspected this might happen, but seeing it in action makes him feel ashamed for allowing Yama to take advantage of him.

"You stole my power..." Beelzebub mutters.

"Copied it, actually! But who cares about such a small detail? You and I are pretty much the same now! Except you only have one elemental ability, while we have countless more! You've lost the ability to hurt us, Beelzebrat, while we have reaped a terrific bounty!"

Beelzebub narrows his eyes.

"No ability can be that convenient. If you truly had the power to copy other demon's powers, you'd long have laid waste to all of the Seven Hells. Yet, all this time, you've stuck to only wielding the power of shadow."

Beelzebub cocks his head.

"I wonder why that is?"

"Believe what you want." Yama chortles. "We simply like to live a quiet life, playing with our wenches. Ruling over a bunch of Hells? Boring! A waste of time! Power means nothing if you have no way to enjoy it! Only the pursuit of pleasure is capable of making eternity worth living!"

Saying so, Yama fires the concentrated flame back at Beelzebub. Beelzebub easily catches the fireball and prevents it from blowing up in his face, not that the heat would have hurt him anyway.

For a brief moment, the two remain poised to attack, each one wondering who will make the first move.

Beelzebub continues spiraling the flame in his hand.

Then, he nods.

He launches toward Yama, this time with the flame kept close to his chest.

"Let's see if you're as mighty of a demon as you claim!"

Beelzebub holds out the flame in front of himself. But just before he crashes into Yama, he detonates that concentrated energy with a terrific BANG, exploding it in a massive sphere of fire that blasts away several Shades who were too close nearby, while also spreading fire and fury in a wide berth.

An instant later, Beelzebub begins fireporting around, all across the burning landscape, appearing here and there so fast that Yama quickly loses track of his real body and his after-images.

Foop! Foop! Foop!

Suddenly, Beelzebub starts launching hastily-crafted fireballs as he teleports around. Some of them he flings at Yama's front, back, and sides. Others he throws out into the darkness.

Yama easily catches and deflects most of the flames Beelzebub sends his way, while the others strike his body but are so weak they can't do any damage.

As Yama tries to keep track of Beelzebub's rapid fireportation, he finds himself metaphorically scratching his head.

The heck is this idiot doing? Yama thinks. Beelzy's just wasting a bunch of mana! He isn't accomplishing anything at all!

Then, amidst the barrage of weak and ineffective fiery projectiles, Yama notices a strange object flying at him.

The heck? Is that Beelzebub's arm? Why would he-

BOOOM!!!

At some point, Beelzebub tore his own goddamned arm off and flung it at Yama! By the time Yama noticed, it was already too late!

The arm detonates in a terrific explosion of nuclear energy, blasting and irradiating Yama's body with nuclear hellfire, sending him flying backward while screaming bloody murder.

As Yama hurtles away from the explosion point, Beelzebub fireports into his path. While one of his arms rapidly regrows, he grins wickedly.

"You're not as clever as you think, Yama."

Yama's pupils shrink to pinpricks as Beelzebub reveals a charging blast of atomic energy held inside the palm of his unsevered hand. The Emperor of Shadows tries to activate his powers to escape his doom, but he's too slow!

BOOOM!!

Beelzebub smashes the explosive nuclear magic into Yama's monstrous spine, driving the wind out of his chest and obliterating half his body.

Yama sails away, slams into the ground, spins, flips, and crashes to a stop!

He skids to a halt and lays unmoving for several seconds. Half his back appears disintegrated, though it does begin to slowly regenerate at a pace far slower than what Beelzebub can accomplish. His sizzled, charred black flesh smokes ruinously, betraying the agony he must feel.

After reeling for a few moments, Yama shudders, then starts to pick himself up. He coughs up huge wads of blood and glowers at Beelzebub.

The Emperor of Hellfire, meanwhile, pants heavily. Beelzebub wipes his sweaty forehead, having expended a vast amount of mana to concentrate as much nuclear energy as he could into that attack. Despite his temporary exhaustion, he can't help but grin at Yama's mangled form.

"What good is mimicking a fraction of someone else's power?" Beelzebub asks. "Idiot. You should stick to the shadows, where you belong."

Yama can't offer a witty retort. His monstrous form is so badly injured that he can barely even move. His regenerative abilities, stolen from Beelzebub, aren't nearly as potent as his opponent's. They simply work too slowly to allow him to quickly return to a combat-ready state.

Beelzebub notices Yama's pained silence. He smiles.

"While you're recovering, I have a few questions I'd like to ask." Beelzebub says. While he is aware of Yama's recovery, he doesn't pay the Emperor of Shadows much attention, clearly not giving a damn about his supposed threat level.

"Pah!" Yama coughs, spitting blood on the ground. "And they would be?"

"How did I obtain the Phoenix's Feather?" Beelzebub asks. "I've known I possessed the power of Nirvana for a while now, but I wasn't aware other demons knew. So how did all of you find out?"

Yama takes this opportunity to answer Beelzebub's questions, if only to stall for time so that he can heal himself.

"You were only an ordinary imp..." Yama says slowly. "Then one day, a strange entity appeared in the Labyrinth. The First Hell tracked its position as it rushed toward you, then entered your soul. You were too spiritually dull to notice its arrival, but the rest of us were not so foolish."

Beelzebub frowns. "You're saying... the Phoenix Feather chose me at random? But where did it come from?"

"How should we know?" Yama asks helplessly. "You lucked out, brat! There's nothing more to it! What, do you think you were chosen because you were special? Like we said, you're not special at all! You're just one fortunate little imp-bastard!"

Yama repeats his taunts from earlier, but this has no effect on Beelzebub at all. He ignores Yama's goading to focus on some underlying hints behind his words.

"You don't find that even a little odd?" Beelzebub asks. "That I simply obtained the Phoenix Feather at random? Is it not possible... this could be someone's plot? Perhaps they gave it to me for some ulterior motive?"

Yama grimaces. "Still trying to build up a conspiracy? Think what you like. We've told you all we know. We don't give a damn if you believe us or not..."

The Shadow Emperor's body finally reaches the end of its healing. He stealthily begins to build up his power while hiding a sneaky smile from Beelzebub.

As for the Emperor of Hellfire, Beelzebub lazily blinks his eyes. Already, his mana has regenerated due to some 'unknown' influence, restoring him to full. He easily detects Yama's power amassing in a secret place and rolls his eyes.

"Don't try it, Yama. You've already lost."

"Lost, have we?!" Yama snarls, as a hungry look appears in his eyes.

Suddenly, Yama snaps his fingers behind his back, consuming the power of an unseen gemstone. He flickers into the shadows and reappears at Beelzebub's right side with a massive orb of frost magic spiraling in his palm.

"Your one weakness!" Yama shrieks, while thrusting his palm toward Beelzebub's side.

But before he can detonate that ice-bomb, Beelzebub suddenly motions with his hand. He summons a flame whip in his grasp, then makes a snapping motion with his arm, sending the tip of the whip flying directly into the path of Yama's attack.

BOOOM!!

The whip-tip detonates with a micro-burst of nuclear energy, reversing Yama's attack and blasting it back in his face!

"Aaaargh!"

Yama shrieks miserably as his ice magic reverses its momentum and blows off both of his arms. A hundred stalactite-spears of frozen liquid impale his body as he flies away, this time sailing into the distant reaches of his Shadow Realm.

He crashes against the furthest 'wall', and the sheer impact of his body causes the shadows around him to lose their potency. They break apart and melt away, returning himself and Beelzebub back to the battlefield, which still remains shrouded by Mephisto's Dark Mist, but no longer appears half as oppressive after Yama's defeat.

Beelzebub smirks. Before Yama can start to recover, Beelzebub lunges toward him, conjuring twin nuclear fireballs in both of his hands.

"Nooo!!" Yama howls in fear.

BOOM-BOOM!!

Beelzebub blasts Yama into a miserable mess of blackened tendrils barely clinging to life. He damn near kills Yama with his nuclear hellfire, ultimately forcing Yama to disperse his monstrous form and flee into the Dark Mist.

After Yama runs for his life, Beelzebub takes a moment to savor his victory.

"Not bad for my first fight as an Emperor." He muses out loud. "Seems I'm still a cut above my kin."

* * *

Yama, now badly injured to the point even his regeneration won't save him, slithers over to Mephisto's side.

He coughs weakly and reforms his body, though it appears a sorry, miserable sight.

"Kah! Kah! Mephisto! We managed to delay the Emperor of Hellfire a while... but he was quite a terrifying foe. Is the ritual ready yet?! We must ascend as quickly as possible."

Mephisto glances at his ally, and past him into the distance where Beelzebub stands, taking in the sights.

"You've done well, Yama. It'sss fine if you couldn't defeat him. Here, help me manipulate my undead armiesss..."

Mephisto keeps a close eye on the battlefield. He casually gestures to a spell symbol before himself, one which is actually a micro-formation capable of manipulating whole armies of the undead, as well as his other 'tricks' he's prepared for the invaders.

Yama glances at the formation. "We are not familiar with this type of magic."

"Neither wasss I." Mephisto says idly, glancing up at Uriel as she battles his Brutes. "But timesss change. Touch the formation and immerssse your sssoul resssonanccce into it. You will easssily learn to perceive how the magic worksss."

Yama frowns. Something about Mephisto's words bug him, but he can't quite tell what.

Mephisto notices his hesitation. "Don't tell me you're feeling ssskittisssh after getting your behind handed to you by the Hellfire Emperor? We're both ssso clossse to reaching the next level of demonic power... if you're not ready to take rissskssss, then I will deal with thessse attackersss myssself. Perhapsss it would be better if I took the rewardsss for myssself too..."

"No! No... no need for that!" Yama says, as his greed gets the better of him. "We agreed to assist you in killing our mutual enemies. Let us see how this 'formation magic' works..."

Yama draws closer to the glyph on the ground, and the spiritual projection of the battlefield hovering above it.

Suddenly, the ground glows beneath Yama's feet. A blood-red field of magic leaps out and wraps around him, ensnaring him in his place!

"What?!" Yama roars, as his stomach sinks. "You- Mephisto! How dare you betray us?!"

The Emperor of Legions slowly grins at his trapped 'ally'.

"Hehehe... that Beelzebub sssoftened you up well. Muddleheaded rapissst fool! You blundered right into my clawsss!"

Before Yama can react, Mephisto suddenly rushes at him. He yanks out a knife wreathed in Death Energy, then pierces it into the force field trapping Yama. With Mephisto already knowing the 'password' to this field, he passes through it as if it isn't even there, and impales Yama's in the back!

"AAAAHHH!!" Yama shrieks.

The Emperor of Shadows tries to fight back, but his movements are tightly constricted. He can barely even move!

All the while, Mephisto flits around outside the force field, stabbing his knife inside it repeatedly, maiming and injuring Yama more and more!

"AAAH! MEPHISTO- AAAH! CURSE YOU- AAAHHH!"

Yama's cries of pain quickly weaken. His voice dulls, and his spirit begins to fade.

But before he can fully perish, Mephisto stabs his hand into Yama's skull and grabs hold of his soul!

"Hehehehe! Thank you for the meal." Mephisto says, his tone icy.

RIIIIP!

Mephisto tears Yama's soul out of his body, finally slaying the Emperor of Shadows and causing his body to lose its form. Yama's figure disperses into smoke, which swirls around inside the red energy shield, unable to escape.

Mephisto eyes the Emperor Soul in his hands hungrily. He chuckles quietly to himself, then disperses the field holding Yama's remnants. The Shadow Emperor's gaseous body disperses to the four winds, never again to roam the mortal coil.

"Killing you on my own would have been sssuch a pain..." Mephisto muses playfully, while holding Yama's struggling soul. "But luckily, thessse foolsss willingly came to give me the presssent I mossst wanted. Kekeke!"

Mephisto hovers to the center of his Baron necromancer minions, where Valac's Lantern levitates. He deposits Yama's soul into it, earning looks of glee from his faithful allies.

"You actually managed to trick that bastard." Ozzar says. "Well done, Master Mephisto. Soon, your ascension will arrive. Soon, you will force the cosmos to submit to the power of the undead."

Mephisto gives an ambiguous smile to Ozzar.

"Sssoon, yesss. Sssoon, I will have all that I desssire..."

Part 471: Desperate Deal

Inside a world of fairy illusion magic, Blinker and Zamiel battle with one another, each holding the intent to kill.

Whiff-whiff-whiff!

Bullets traveling at nearly the speed of light continually race at Blinker as she flickers around in the sky above. Zamiel hefts a mighty railgun in his arms, pulling the massive weapon's trigger to launch tiny but frightfully lethal shards of mana-infused metal at the fairy above.

"What's the matter, Butterbitch?" Zamiel taunts. "No time to prepare a spell? Better keep dodging! One hit and you'll die! Hahaha!"

Blinker grimaces. She wants desperately to wave her hands, focus her mind, and crush her enemy, but a single misstep and Zamiel's projectiles will tear through her body, no matter how much magic she uses to protect herself!

The railgun projectiles fly into the fairy barrier enveloping them and travel elsewhere in the Labyrinth, teleported at random through the spatial magic forming this temporary makeshift prison.

"How did you get so strong?!" Blinker snaps. "You weren't an Emperor last time we fought!"

"You can thank your hubby for that." Zamiel replies, firing three more bullets. "Yep, that crocodile soul was pretty great! It helped Big Boss do all sorts of fun things!"

"BASTARD!!" Blinker screams, her eyes turning bloodshot. "GIVE ME KAR BACK!!"

"Get on your knees and beg!"

Blinker suddenly flickers toward Zamiel. She weaves between the incoming bullets, barely avoiding one as it tears through her fluttering skirt, then she fires a telekinetic burst of energy at Zamiel.

"Oof!"

Zamiel gets knocked backward a little and momentarily lowers his railgun to steady himself.

In that instant, Blinker strikes!

She conjures a wall of telekinetic energy around herself, then rushes at him while the phantom of a huge tiger envelops her.

Slash!

Blinker rakes her giant claws at Zamiel, but he jumps backward, then summons a barrier of Qi around himself, hardened mana which functions in a manner not dissimilar to Blinker's own telekinetic energy.

"Good move!" Zamiel sarcastically praises. "But you're not facing a Duke anymore! I'm more than a match for you!"

With both combatants using their own internal reserves to protect themselves, they fashion weapons out of mana and Qi.

Blinker conjures a pair of beautiful but deadly one-handed swords. Their white blades sparkle like daylight scattering across snow, making them difficult to look directly at.

Zamiel summons a single Greatsword, a wickedly curved blade colored red, resembling a dragon's tooth. The very same one he used to fight Kar. He pours a large portion of his mana and Qi into the blade to harden it, making it no less corporeal than any weapon made of demonstone.

Then he and Blinker attack!

They lunge at each other, striking with brute force.

Zamiel's body, that which once belonged to Kar, grants him immense physical power. Coupled with his own prowess as a weapon-master, he can fight like hell to stay alive and push his opponents back.

Meanwhile, Blinker possesses not only the power of a Fairy Queen, but the power of the Sphinx! She partially monsterizes her arms and legs to increase her striking power. Her face becomes somewhat lion-like, giving her a ferocious appearance!

Bang! Bang! Clink-clank! Bang!

Zamiel's sword clashes against Blinker's blades. They trade blows ten times, then twenty. Sometimes Blinker dodges the attack to use her superior speed and follow up with a strike at Zamiel's organs, but the Emperor of War slips away over and over.

At the same time, Blinker doesn't dare to fully connect her swords with Zamiel's greatsword. His striking power is too scary! Each downward or sweeping slash possesses enough might to break both of Blinker's blades. So instead, she constantly ducks and dodges, deflecting his attacks at various angles so her swords don't have to endure too much pressure.

Five minutes pass. Ten minutes. Even twenty.

But the two combatants find that they are equally matched!

Even when Blinker manages to land a strike on Zamiel's body, his Qi barrier protects him. And if she fails to deflect his attacks in time, she still manages to sidestep his large, easily predictable weapon.

"Not bad!" Zamiel says. "You've got some fight in you, woman! I can see why that croc liked you! I bet you were feisty in bed!"

Blinker doesn't bother trading jabs. "Give me back Kar's body and soul, you thief!"

"Or what? You'll kill me?" Zamiel sneers. "Go ahead and try. I've already died once. What's one more time at this point? But what a shame... if you kill me, that reptile's body will turn to dust!"

Blinker's gaze turns cold. She attacks Zamiel again, striking him repeatedly to force him back a few steps.

"If I have to kill you, then I will. Even if it means I never see Kar again. At least I'll have my revenge!"

She lashes out with even more fury than before, monsterizing her body and attuning herself to the Sphinx to further increase her power. Her dainty and beautiful butterfly wings become more muscled and feathery, like those of a gryphon. Her chest and torso sprout thick, woolen fur while her bone density triples.

Her previously weak and dainty sword strikes start packing more of a punch. Zamiel steps back over and over, losing more ground to the Monster Queen.

Even so, Zamiel never appears flustered. He continues to grin and smirk at Blinker, making her feel uneasy.

"You really want your hubby's soul back, eh?" Zamiel asks, suddenly stepping toward Blinker and brutishly shoving her back with a tricky palm strike. "Maybe we can cut a deal!"

Blinker grunts as his palm hits her chest, but his strike doesn't cause her any pain. Her body is much too durable for that.

"Don't try to pull any tricks with me!" Blinker snarls.

But instead of attacking, Blinker hesitates for a moment, gazing at Zamiel with a flicker of interest.

He doesn't miss this fact.

"There are no eternal enemies..." Zamiel says slowly. "Only eternal benefits. I'll let you in on a secret. We sapped Kar's soul of its power, yeah. But he's not dead. That croc's still got some juice left. Big Boss was thinking of snuffing him out, but... maybe you could change our minds. For the right price..."

Blinker narrows her eyes.

"What are you trying to pull?"

"No tricks." Zamiel says, puffing out his chest. "I'm already fulfilling my purpose by keeping you busy. As long as you and I fight, you're not able to help your friends. But... we don't have to stay here, locked in combat. There's another way this skirmish can go. A bit of... give and take..."

"Speak plainly." Blinker replies. "My patience for anything a Battle Brother has to say is already less than zero. Let's not forget what you did to Kar's entire family!"

"Right, right. Killed those crocs, me and Duriel did." Zamiel says. "You want it plain? Here goes. I'll give you Kar's soul... but only if you give Big Boss something of equivalent value."

He pauses.

"For example... how about that Sphinx magic, eh? Or maybe you'd rather carry your hubby's curse with you for the rest of your life?"

Blinker's heart skips a beat. "I should have known... that's what you've been angling for this whole time! You're trying to trick me into giving up the power of the Monster Deity!"

"Oh, but you're wrong." Zamiel says quietly. "There's nothing 'tricky' about this. It's a simple trade. A soul for a magical power."

"How do I know you're telling the truth?" Blinker asks. "Where is Kar? How do I know his soul is still intact?! Show me!"

Zamiel's smile deepens. He grins at Blinker without holding back his contempt for her love and adoration.

"You want to see him? Here he is."

Zamiel holds up his palm next to his chest. After a moment, a faint glowing orb emerges from a previously hidden gap in his undead body, then hovers into his grasp.

Blinker's eyes widen. "Kar!"

She senses her husband's mana. His weak life appears far dimmer than she'd prefer, but he doesn't appear in danger of dying.

"You see?" Zamiel asks. "He's right here. All you have to do is trade away the Sphinx's power and you can have Kar for yourself."

Blinker's upper lip curls into a snarl. "You sapped him dry! He's barely even alive! Do you really think one soul is worth the price of the Sphinx's magic?!"

Zamiel tilts his long snout upward. He looks down at Blinker with a sneer.

"Well, that's not for me to decide, now, is it? It's entirely up to you whether you think the value proposition is worth the trade..."

Blinker's stomach sinks. She starts to take a step toward Zamiel, but he tightens his grip around Kar's fragile soul, making a crack appear in its glow.

"Ah-ah-ah. No funny movements. One little squeeze and hubby goes pop. Hahahaha!"

Blinker stands frozen. Unable to walk toward her husband, unable to pull back. The attachment she feels toward the Sphinx's power is nothing at all. She'd happily give it up in a heartbeat if it meant bringing Kar back.

The problem is, she doesn't like Mephisto or Zamiel at all. Hell, even beyond 'not liking' them, she hates their guts! Of all the creatures who could obtain Kar's former power, Mephisto is the absolute last being in existence Blinker would want to give the Sphinx to!

"...How do I know I can trust you?" Blinker asks, glaring daggers at Zamiel. "If I give you the magic first, you could just crush Kar to death!"

"And if I give you him first, you could simply refuse to pass the magic along." Zamiel says, unfazed by her remark. "But Big Boss already thought of that. We'll each activate a Death Promise. I'll promise to give you Kar in exchange for the Sphinx's magic, and you'll do the same. If one of us reneges on the promise… we'll die on the spot."

Blinker slowly nods. "A Death Promise. That… you've clearly thought about this carefully…"

"I'll be blunt." Zamiel says. "We have no more need of the so-called Monster King. His energy is gone. His magic, nonexistent. At this point, an ordinary human would have more use to us than he does. You don't need to worry about us pulling some last-second trick to destroy his soul or screw you over. We don't give a damn if you reunite or not. We only care that we get the Sphinx's magic."

"So… your entire plan hinges on getting me to accept this trade…?" Blinker asks slowly.

"Pff. Nah. Not even." Zamiel responds without missing a beat. "We knew you croc-suckers would come knocking. We have our major goals. This is a minor one. It's a nice to have. If we don't get the Sphinx, then whatever. But does that really matter to you? The only thing you should be worrying about is if croc-boy will get to be a daddy for little croc-juniors…"

Zamiel's eyes lower to Blinker's womb in a manner most unsubtle. She grimaces at his gaze, but it doesn't lower the effectiveness of his tactic.

"Our children…" Blinker mutters softly, slowly coming to hate herself more and more by the second.

A minute passes.

Neither side says anything.

Blinker stands in place, wrestling with what she should do. Her eyes twitch. Her grip on her swords strengthens and weakens intermittently as she battles the urge to give in with the urge to attack Zamiel!

But, as she struggles, Zamiel sighs.

"Guess he wasn't that important to you after all."

Zamiel slowly starts to move Kar's soul back toward his chest…

"Wait!" Blinker suddenly cries. "I'll... I'll do it! I'll do it, okay?! I'll pledge the Death Promise..."

Zamiel grins wickedly. "Are you sure? It's a bit degrading giving that Sphinx power to the people you hate most, isn't it? I dunno, maybe you should just let the croc stay dead..."

"Shut up! I've made up my mind!" Blinker barks. "Just get this over with!"

Blinker resolutely de-summons her swords. Zamiel follows her lead and does the same.

Then, she begins chanting magical words of power, words which Zamiel mimics. At the same time, the two draw magical letters in the air, visual representations of their pledge.

"On the promise of my future death, I pledge to give this crocodile's soul to the fairy bimbo." Zamiel says.

"On the promise of my future death, I pledge to give the Sphinx's power to the Emperor of War." Blinker says.

"In exchange, I will receive the power of the Sphinx. Then the pledge will end once both parties have acknowledged receipt." Zamiel says.

"In exchange, I will receive my husband Kar's soul. Then the pledge will end once both parties have acknowledged receipt." Blinker says.

They continue following each other's lead, adding more and more protections for their own interests. After engraving these twenty lines on their souls, they recall the powerful magic back inside their bodies and take a moment to breathe heavily. The strain of creating such precise magic and then directly inflicting it as an injury on their souls does not disappear quickly.

After a full minute of recuperating, Blinker demorphs from her Sphinx form back to her base fairy body. She closes her eyes and wills the Sphinx magic to consolidate inside her chest.

"I can't just give you the magic." Blinker says. "Instead, I've made a secret riddle. What I will pass to you is the answer to that riddle. My Death Promise confirms as much."

"I saw that." Zamiel replies. "The method of transfer doesn't matter. If you take Kar's soul but don't give me the Sphinx's magic, you'll die. Not just you, but those croc-kids of yours. And with you dead, the croc's soul will fade away, too. So I know you won't pull any tricks."

Blinker nods slowly. She looks at Zamiel with an expression of deep distrust and hatred, but in the end, her love for Kar wins out.

She and Zamiel warily step toward each other. They carefully monitor the other person for any intentions of striking out. Even if Blinker attacks Zamiel, so long as she doesn't try to steal Kar's soul, she won't die to the promise. But the same holds true of Zamiel. If he kills Blinker but doesn't take the Sphinx's power, he won't perish either.

This might end up being one huge ploy to get Blinker to lower her guard so he can kill her!

Therefore, Blinker doesn't take him lightly. She never discounts the idea this might be an elaborate trap intended to tie up a 'loose end' by eliminating her.

Despite her fears, Zamiel makes no moves to attack her. He takes the initiative to hand Kar's soul over first, allowing Blinker to finally reach out and grab her husband's remaining life from his clutches.

Blinker snatches Kar out of Zamiel's reptilian claws, terrified he might renege at the last second! She takes several steps back, while Zamiel remains in the same spot, unmoving.

"Three minutes." Zamiel says. "If I don't have that Sphinx magic in three minutes... you're dead. Better inspect hubby's soul quickly. The clock is ticking, fairy bimbo..."

He crosses his arms and leans back, completely confident in his assessment of Blinker's intent.

As for the Fairy Queen...

Blinker lowers her eyes to Kar's soul.

No longer bound by Mephisto or Zamiel's magic, the spirit of her husband can finally speak...

"Butter...fly..." Kar says weakly, his words transmitting to Blinker's mind magically. "You... came for me..."

Blinker's heart sinks. Kar's voice is much, much weaker than she expected.

"Kar! You're... you're barely..."

"Hurgh. I'm not... not in good shape..." Kar says softly. "...did things to me. The bone-man. Smokey. He was... so vicious... but I held on..."

Kar falls silent for an instant. His spirit dims, then brightens again.

"I held on... as long as I could. The torture... it never stopped..."

Tears well up in Blinker's eyes. She listens silently as her husband speaks.

"You... I held on for you..." Kar continues. "It was hard. So hard. Hurgh. But I wouldn't... wouldn't let Smokey break me. And finally... now... I can see you again... happy... makes me so happy..."

His spirit dims again. This time, it stays dim for almost five seconds before brightening once more.

"Kar." Blinker whispers. "You're going to make it, okay? The Wordsmith, I can have Jason-"

"There's no point." Kar interrupts. "Don't bother... my precious, beautiful Butterfly... I'm so glad we could speak again. The Creator... showed me such a kindness."

"Don't give up." Blinker says. "Don't you give up on me, Kar! I'm giving away the Sphinx's magic for you!"

"A bad trade." Kar says simply. "Don't give... Smokey... even one thing. Nothing at all. I'm not worth it..."

"You are!" Blinker says, steeling her heart. She glares daggers at Zamiel, but the Emperor of War continues to smile, unmoved. "You've always been worth it. Because you're the reptile I love. I won't let our babies grow up fatherless!"

With one hand, Blinker holds Kar's soul. She hastily erects a formation around it, magically gluing Kar's soul to her left palm. She allows Kar's soul to leech life from her soul, albeit at a faint rate she won't notice. Then, with her free hand, Blinker conjures an orb of magic containing the answer to her Sphinx Riddle.

She snarls at Zamiel. "Here. Your magic."

Zamiel's eyebrows raise. He steps toward Blinker.

For a brief second, Blinker feels the urge to strike at Zamiel. To attack and kill him with one merciless blow, even if it means her own death!

But she doesn't.

She quietly holds the answer to her Sphinx's Riddle out, and Zamiel takes it.

Zamiel 'unwraps' the magic and smirks.

"Heh. Women. You're really petty, you know that? This isn't even a proper riddle!"

"Just say the goddamn words." Blinker hisses.

"Sure, sure. The question is, 'What stupid asshole motherfucker deserves to eat shit and die from eating too much shit?' And the answer is... 'Zamiel, the Emperor of War!'"

As Zamiel speaks those words, a surge of magic erupts within Blinker's chest. The Fairy Queen gasps. Her body visibly sags. With a shudder, she almost loses her footing, remaining standing only through her force of will.

At the same time, that surge of magic races out of her body into Zamiel's, empowering him and making his Emperor-level aura begin to rise.

Blinker steps back. As she does, the power of her Death Promise begins to fade. With the terms having been met, both she and Zamiel are released from their magical bonds, freeing them to once again act as they wish.

The Emperor of War releases a deafening roar! The power of the Sphinx makes his aura explode into the heavens! The walls of Blinker's Fairy Mirage shudder as a burst of hyper-violent, feral energy erupts from Zamiel's figure!

For the first time in all of recorded history, the power of the Sphinx has arrived in the grasp of the demons! And not just any demon, but a fully fledged Demon Emperor bursting with magical power!

As Zamiel roars, he begins to laugh.

"Hahahaha! This magic may ultimately belong to Big Boss, but it would be SUCH a shame to let it go to waste! Hahahaha! And the stupid BITCH gave it to me for FREE! Women are the dumbest creatures in existence!!"

He lowers his head, a primal hunger boiling in his reptilian eyes.

"Hehehe... oh, fairy bimbo... you look so tasty."

Part 472: Fairy's Feint

Zamiel obtains the power of the Sphinx!

He becomes the first demon in all of history to do so. And not just any demon, but a fully realized Demon Emperor, at that. As such, his physical body begins to strengthen tremendously. His physical might rises into the stratosphere, putting him on par with the mightiest demons of yore, such as Bael and Diablo. He might even be able to go toe to toe with Emperor Crow!

As Zamiel stands in place, his body grows several inches, while Blinker's seems to shrink in comparison. The loss of the Sphinx's power weakens her physically while empowering her enemy.

"Heh heh heh. You stupid fairy bitch." Zamiel cackles. "Imagine giving me and Big Boss the key to ultimate power... all because you wanted a fragment of a broken soul. Leave it to a stupid woman to fail at basic logic!"

Zamiel slowly walks toward Blinker, his eyes flashing with hunger. He wonders privately how much stronger he'll become once he kills her and eats her soul. As a genuine Fairy Queen, Blinker will surely provide him an even bigger boost!

But, as Zamiel walks toward Blinker, he doesn't get the reaction he expected. Blinker crosses her arms and looks up at him with a strange lack of fear. If anything, she acts as if all of the tension of their battle has completely evaporated!

This thought slightly bewilders Zamiel.

"Nothing to say?" Zamiel asks, pausing to loom over the small, severely diminished fairy woman. "Trying to put on a brave face, you stupid bitch? We were equal before. But now... you won't stand a chance."

"Mhm. Right." Blinker says, raising one of her eyebrows. "Yup. You'll rip me apart for sure."

Zamiel cocks his head. Somehow, he feels as if he has fallen for a trap. He mentally inspects the power flowing through his veins.

There's no doubt. This is genuine Sphinx magic. So why is the Monster Queen acting so arrogant?

Ultimately, he concludes that her act of bravado must be an attempt to intimidate him. Perhaps by standing strong and acting tough, she can make him rethink even attacking her!

"Hahaha! You won't trick me, slut!" Zamiel laughs.

Zamiel raises his hands overhead. His body partially monsterizes, transforming him into a half-demon, half-lion monster of immense physical power. He summons the blood-red greatsword from before, then swings it straight toward Blinker's skull!

Just before the blade connects with Blinker, it abruptly stops.

Or rather, the weapon does not stop, but Zamiel does.

He stops the attack himself!

"What?"

Zamiel frowns.

He didn't intend to stop attacking the Monster Queen. If anything, he wanted to kill her more than ever in his life!

But for some reason, when he went to attack her, he felt all the killing intent vanish. In its place, a desire to NOT kill her sprouted!

"The hell? This is weird..." Zamiel mutters, retracting his sword. As he does, his hatred toward her comes roaring back. He slashes at her again, this time going for a horizontal cut to bisect her torso.

But he stops again!

Zamiel's blade halts mere inches from striking Blinker's arm and midsection. As Zamiel stops it himself, his killing intent once again vanishes, making him feel even more strangely than before.

He quickly pulls back, then stares at Blinker with a queer expression. His killing intent returns once again, but he doesn't bother to attack.

"You... you! What did you do?!" Zamiel snaps, roaring at the calmly-standing fairy with her arms crossed. "You must have tampered with the Sphinx's power! You tricked me!!"

"There's no trick." Blinker says quietly. "You're just ignorant, Zamiel."

Zamiel's mind races. He de-summons the greatsword to once again bring out a massive railgun. He aims it at Blinker and grins.

"I get it! You've put a fairy hex on me! I can't cut you down myself, so I'll just blow your brains out from over here!"

He takes aim. He starts to squeeze the trigger...

But as he does, his killing intent once again disappears!

Zamiel struggles desperately. He tries with all his might to pull the trigger, to snuff out Blinker's life with the ease that should come naturally following his god-like power-up...

But he can't!

Every time Zamiel tries to pull the trigger, his body weakens. He acts as if a mandate by the Creator has restricted him from killing his prey.

Bewildered and confused, Zamiel's expression shifts between a hilarious mixture of shock and surprise. His face becomes beet red as he fights against his own body to just reach out and kill the smirking fairy!

But he can't.

For five minutes, Blinker stands unmoving and unyielding, like a cliffside next to an ocean. Zamiel's comical attempt to kill her make him look like a clown.

"Why... WHY?! What did you DO to me, you little...?!"

"I didn't do anything." Blinker says calmly. "You got what you wanted. You now possess the Sphinx's power... and all of its weaknesses. But I'm guessing you don't know much about the Sphinx, do you?"

Zamiel's undead heart turns as cold as ice. He gazes at Blinker with a look of dread.

"Its... weaknesses?"

Blinker slowly nods. No longer does she even gaze at Zamiel with a look of hatred. To her, his existence has become oddly distant.

Blinker unfolds her arms. She holds up her right palm.

Foop!

An old, ugly-looking book appears in her grasp. A book with pages browned from the passage of time.

Zamiel narrows his eyes. He stares at the book with a mixture of curiosity and apprehension.

"What... what's that? Some old fairy tome?"

"Nope." Blinker says, slowly and dramatically opening it. She begins to read a page somewhere in the middle. "...and that's when Master Jarnof began to reveal to me the truths of my new existence. The Sphinx's power cannot be stolen. Only inherited. If a Sphinx dies in battle, the power will travel elsewhere in the cosmos. Perhaps that is even how it arrived on Earth."

She flips to a different page.

"...the Sphinx's power can be obtained through many means. Combat. Riddles. A game of chance. But always, the power must be passed to its next owner through a challenge offered or accepted by the Sphinx's current owner. And if the power does transfer, the power will ensure its past and future possessors will never again be able to strike one another a grievous blow."

Zamiel's stomach sinks. "That book... it was Bahamut's?"

"Her personal diary." Blinker affirms. "In it is the knowledge of one hundred thousand years of her life. All the secrets she learned, all the knowledge she obtained regarding the Sphinx's abilities."

Suddenly, Blinker holds the book up.

FWOOSH!!!

It bursts into flames, scattering to ash in the wind!

"No!" Zamiel cries. "Why did you-?!"

"You have your power." Blinker says calmly. "Figure out how it works for yourself, idiot. Kar and I read Bahamut's diary a few times. I've also committed it to my memory, so its loss means little to me. But now, neither you nor Mephisto will know its intricacies."

She smirks.

"Enjoy that 'ultimate power,' Zamiel. Oh, it's certainly strong. But now you'll never be able to hurt me or Kar again."

Zamiel clenches his fists hard enough to shatter diamonds. His eyes turn bloodshot with rage.

"You... tricked... me!"

"If it makes you feel any better," Blinker says, her smirk fading, "I didn't want to give you the Sphinx's power... because then I would never be able to kill you with my own two hands. I'd love nothing more than to rip you apart, but that option's off the table now. So we both ended up screwed."

"Don't try to pity me!" Zamiel roars. He once again tries to will himself to attack her, but fails. "Gah! So what are we going to do, just stand around with our thumbs up our asses?! We can't even hurt each other now!"

"That's right. We're just going to stay here." Blinker says, smiling again. "You and me. I'll deprive Mephisto of his strongest minion. I have faith that my friends will overrun and kill Mephisto eventually. We do have an Archangel on our side, after all."

Zamiel stiffens. He gazes at Blinker with a newfound realization.

"No... NO! I won't stay here with you! I'll break out!"

Abruptly, Zamiel fully monsterizes himself. He transforms into a living combination of a demon, lion, and Gryphon, becoming even bigger and more terrifying than before. Then he launches himself at the wall of the Fairy World holding him prisoner.

BOOM!!

Blinker's illusory world shakes for a moment, then stabilizes itself. Zamiel fails to break out.

But he attacks again!

BOOM!!

He crashes against the swirling barrier enveloping the area, but again fails to break free.

So he tries again! And again!

BOOM! BOOOOM!!

The Emperor of War repeatedly strikes and batters the wall, but his most powerful attacks bounce off it as if he were a toddler punching concrete.

"This is ridiculous!" Zamiel complains. "What the hell is your fairy magic made of?!"

"A little of this. A little of that." Blinker says cryptically. "Oh! But would you look at that. It seems someone just finished their battle outside. No sense in letting him fight the small fry..."

Blinker flicks her hand. An instant later, a figure teleports into the arena, looking a little surprised by the rude and non-consensual redirection of his position.

"Huh?" Beelzebub asks. "Where am- Blinker?"

Blinker scowls at him. "Beelzebub! What the hell! Why are you NAKED? Put that weapon away!"

Beelzebub glances down at his fully nude body, then shrugs. "I beat the crap out of Yama, but as always, my clothes ended up scorched away. What do you want me to do? Summon new ones?"

Beelzebub motions with his hands to conjure some flames around his pelvis, protecting what remains of his dignity. Blinker rolls her eyes in response.

"Never mind that. Due to some unfortunate circumstances, I can't kill Zamiel myself. So it's your job now!"

She points past Beelzebub's shoulder, making him turn around to look at his new foe.

Zamiel also turns to face Beelzebub. His expression changes as he sizes up Beelzebub's almost entirely-naked body.

"Ohohoho! Ose's little traitor! Aren't YOU a juicy piece of ass, eh Beelzebub?"

Beelzebub needs only one look at Zamiel's monsterized form to figure out what happened. "Blinker. You gave this son of a devil the Sphinx's power?"

"In exchange for Kar's soul." Blinker affirms. "But the Sphinx power has a restriction. Sphinxes cannot attack one another. So we're at a bit of an impasse."

She smiles cutely.

"And that's where you come in! Go get 'im, Beelzebub!"

"You want me to fight a Demon Emperor who now possesses the most powerful monster magic in existence?" Beelzebub asks, raising an eyebrow at Blinker.

After a moment, Beelzebub shrugs.

"Sure. I came here to fight anyway. But you'll have to leave. If my flames strike you, I'll suffer a backlash."

Blinker nods. "Don't worry. This fairy world is a stabilized formation. Even if I leave, it'll remain. Have fun, Beelzy."

Blinker turns her back on Beelzebub. Then, she disappears, vanishing from the spot.

"Huh. She called me 'Beelzy.'" The Emperor of Hellfire mutters. "Maybe we're getting along better than I thought."

"BEELZEBUB!" Zamiel shouts, interrupting Beelzebub's moment of contemplation. "They say that now that you've become an Emperor, you've become unkillable! But every demon has a limit!"

Beelzebub turns to look at his foe. He sizes up the monstrous Emperor of War, mentally calculating just how frightening Zamiel has become.

"Every demon? I think not."

Beelzebub ignites fire beneath his feet. He flies into the air while smiling wickedly.

"You see, Zamiel. You're not dealing with the average Demon Emperor..."

Foop!

Blinker appears back inside the Labyrinth, right in the middle of a battlefield. She levitates above the battlefield and glances around to survey the situation.

To the west, Archangel Uriel battles not one or two Brutes... but five in total! Five massive monsters scream and roar while Uriel faces them all alone.

To the south, the humans and Kiari mop up what remains of Mephisto's minions in the exterior. Kiari's giant bugs swarm Mephisto's undead, overwhelming them with an equal number of spiders, cockroaches, and other exotic bugs.

To the north, Mephisto hides inside a force field of some sort, along with his Baron necromancer minions. They continue to chant magic, manipulating the hordes of undead while Mephisto works on something unknown. Not far from Mephisto's barrier, five Death Gates tower a hundred feet high. Several fairies and Archangel constructs battle the monsters flowing from the Realm of Death.

Blinker glowers at Mephisto, but doesn't rush forward to challenge him. Instead, she drops down to Kiari, casually firing off a few telekinetic blasts to obliterate some of Mephisto's nearby undead.

"Kiari!" Blinker says. "There you are. I wondered where you went!"

"Aahaha, sorry..." Kiari says, smiling painfully. "I got a little separated along the way. But I'm here now."

Blinker glances in the direction of their allied human soldiers.

"...We've had some casualties."

Kiari nods seriously. "They'll be resurrected as the Respected. But... I do feel guilty. I should have been here to protect them. Even if they ultimately come back to life... I still failed them. They suffered the pain of death."

Blinker winces. She holds up her left palm, drawing Kiari's eyes to it.

"Ah! That... that's a soul! Is that Kar's soul?!" Kiari asks.

Blinker nods. "It is. But he's really weak. If I fight too hard, I might accidentally kill him again."

"A second death would be a True Death. We can't allow that to happen." Kiari says. "Why don't you go back to Tarus II? The rest of us can handle Mephisto."

"No. I don't like this situation." Blinker says. "That Mephisto... he's plotting something big. He extorted the Sphinx's magic from me."

"That's not all." Kiari says. "Did you notice? Mephisto betrayed Yama! Killed him and took his soul! If Mephisto needs all the allies he can get, why would he do such a thing?"

"Yeah..." Blinker says slowly. "Why would he do that?"

Blinker contemplates this strange conundrum for a few moments, then shakes her head.

"As long as we kill him, his plans won't bear any fruit. Kiari, you keep protecting these people. I'm going to send someone back to Tarus II with Kar's soul. Then I'll go and help the other fairies and Archangels with those Death Gates!"

Kiari nods. "Okay!"

Blinker makes her way over to the human soldiers. She finds Private Ashley laying unconscious, along with a few other badly injured people. Their comrades surround them protectively while firing potshots at the undead to assist Kiari.

Blinker detaches Kar's soul from her hand. She creates a magical message and attaches it to him, then anchors his soul to Private Ashley's soul.

A few moments later, Blinker motions with her hands.

Foop!

All the injured and deceased personnel vanish from the spot. They travel all the way across the Labyrinth back to Tarus II, along with the message Blinker prepared for Jason Hiro.

"Stay safe, Kar..." Blinker whispers. "I still have a necromancer to kill."

While Kiari continues swarming the battlefield with big bad bugs, Blinker levitates a few feet off the ground. She zips over the heads of the undead, racing toward Princess Melia and the others to help them out.

But all of a sudden...

BOOM!!

A figure bursts out of the dirt from below and races up at Blinker.

Startled, Blinker doesn't get an instant to react before this newcomer crashes into her body and the two of them go flying toward the ceiling.

BANG!!

The newcomer and Blinker drag across the ceiling for several feet before this new foe suddenly disengages and flickers away.

Blinker gasps for breath. She hastily summons a fairy field around herself while looking for the person who just attacked her.

"Zamiel?!"

Blinker doesn't see her opponent. So swift was their attack that she didn't even catch a glimpse of them before they vanished.

"No. Not Zamiel." A female voice says, whispering on the wind...

A flicker of air displaces to Blinker's side. She instantly conjures a barrier at that position while flickering away.

BANG!

A powerful fist batters the barrier, smashing it apart!

Blinker finally gets a good look at the one who attacked her.

It turns out to be a new Demon Emperor, one she hasn't fought before, but one she knows by reputation.

Fenrir, the Emperor of the Night.

No, more accurately... it's actually Fenrir's body, possessed by the soul of Lupus, the Emperor of Scales!

Lupus levitates in midair through some barely discernible method. Blinker can just barely make out a thread of darkness stretching from a nearby shadow, one that clings to Lupus's new body and holds her aloft, like a strand of a spiderweb.

"Lupus." Blinker says. "I almost forgot about you. Looks like Mephisto isn't out of warm bodies to throw at me!"

Lupus slowly blinks.

"You seem weaker than before. Looks like Zamiel managed to get that Sphinx out of you. Should be easier for me to kill you now. Hmm, but he's not here now... so did you manage to kill him? Not that I give a shit about the likes of the Emperor of War..."

"You don't sound excited to fight me." Blinker points out.

Lupus sighs. "Why would I be? I'm trapped in the wrong body. My husband's dead. My Hell has collapsed. And now I'm the slave of some half-wit, scheming little shithead. But I can't disobey the order ringing in my mind... so here I am."

Blinker and her opponent take a moment to size one another up. Lupus doesn't seem any more impressive than the average Demon Emperor, but Blinker is certainly weaker than before after losing the Sphinx's power...

"You can't beat me." Blinker boldly proclaims. "I have a mission today. Not only will I kill you, but Mephisto too."

"Don't threaten me with a good time." Lupus says blandly. "I'd like nothing more than for you to end my suffering. It's humiliating having to slave for that hissing cunt. The fact I can never again live a decent life has sucked any potential color out of my heart."

Lupus lunges toward Blinker from a standstill. She raises her delicate feminine hands, cloaking them in shadow to empower her striking force.

"But don't think I'll hold back!" Lupus yells. "I have to fight you with deadly intent! And I WON'T hold back!"

Blinker dodges the attack, then wraps an illusory world around herself and Lupus.

"Don't you worry your pretty head, Lupus! I won't hold back either! I promise I'll spare you the pain of fighting for Mephisto any longer!"

Part 473: All Sides Converge

"How frustrating! These fiends never stay DEAD! In the Creator's name, PERISH!!"

Archangel Uriel howls in frustration. She wields a greathammer of light, one specially-made to deal the mightiest of blows while bashing it against the heads and chests of Mephisto's Brutes.

Already, Uriel has slain four Brutes. But each time she managed to kill one, Mephisto summoned another to replace it! And sometimes, he even managed to summon a second before Uriel could kill the newest one!

The Archangel of Retribution pants, gasping out strained breaths as she fully exerts herself to try and slay these godforsaken undead giants. While their striking power may not be the highest, their bodies are frighteningly durable, making her heaviest strikes bounce off as if she were attacking walls of pure titanium. Only after repeated blows can she finally cause enough damage to put one of them down.

But the problem is, now five of them keep her busy, and all of them have the same goal: To attack the humans below!

Uriel fully intended to kill the first Brute and rush over to take out Mephisto, but the pesky bastard continuously summoned new ones to keep her busy by aiming for the much weaker humans!

One of the Brutes charges past Uriel, its huge, amorphously gendered body allowing it to make terribly swift strides toward the awaiting humans a short distance away. Uriel hastily summons a wall of light in front of its chest, causing the Brute to strike the wall, then get knocked back and fall on its ass.

Unfortunately, this minor delay doesn't injure it, and only slows it down for a few seconds.

In those seconds, another Brute rushes past the first one!

Uriel howls in frustration. She slams her greathammer against the head of the nearest Brute, then turns the floor in front of the charging brute into liquid dirt with her earth manipulation, causing its foot to sink into a quicksand-like bog and become momentarily trapped.

"Frustrating!" Uriel screams, enraged beyond belief. "Dammit! I must go all-out!"

Despite the fact that Uriel has not held back against these annoyingly durable undead, she has yet to exhaust her full power. The Archangel of Retribution has continuously held back the full level of her powers due to certain fears... but with the humans below now threatened by the numerous Brutes, she cannot do so any further.

For the briefest moment, Uriel continues to hesitate.

This body is not mine. Nay, it belongs to the red rat known as Barbatos. But luckily, he still slumbers. Hopefully he shalt continue to do so for an eternity longer.

Until now, Uriel has only relied on her own abilities and magic. Fire magic, water magic, earth and wind. These, in addition to her mastery of light and darkness.

While powerful, she cannot exert the full strength she once possessed as an Archangel, in large part due to her current body's lack of alignment to holy energy. Even when she and her brothers morphed into the Cherubiim, they could only display a fraction of the power it might have been capable of unleashing during the Final Battle, and even less compared to its glory during the Dragon Wars, eons earlier.

As for her non-Cherubiim form, Uriel's magic simply doesn't strike as hard or concentrate as well as it once could.

But, locked within herself is a power she has not dared to use...

The magic of magnetism!

Not her own strength, but that of the slumbering Barbatos, whose soul was so exhausted after 100,000 years of enduring Uriel's withering attacks that he finally fell comatose, with no signs of awakening after all this time.

Unlike Uriel's magic, Barbatos's is perfectly attuned to his own body. Even more incredible is that despite only being a Duke, Barbatos possessed enough physical and spiritual strength to beat the crap out of Emperors. Because of 100,000 years of daily struggle against the Archangel soul contained within himself, Barbatos's physical and magical powers were far elevated above the norm for a Duke.

Unfortunately, this neverending battle exhausted him to his core, and now he continues to slumber, possibly never to awaken again.

In the moment between moments, Uriel makes up her mind. She reaches inside herself and seizes control of Barbatos's magic, then amplifies it with her own power!

Whoomph.

A burst of mana explodes from her body, blowing away all the dust in the air.

Uriel's head snaps up. She reaches out to the humans below, finding metal blades, guns, and other such weaponry aplenty.

To the sudden surprise of the humans below, Uriel steals them away, often yanking these items right out of the hands of multiple soldiers. They cry out in alarm, but with Kiari mopping up the undead nearby, they aren't able to contribute much to the battle at the moment anyway. Uriel ignores their frustration as she yanks these weapons to herself.

Skriiiik!

Uriel tears the weapons apart with blunt force, ignoring all the damage she causes to the nearly two-tons of steel and iron. She ruins the weapons beyond repair while quickly and brutally fashioning the scrap into a massive greathammer.

Uriel continues fighting the Brutes while a sliver of her consciousness manipulates the metal in midair. She occasionally launches blasts of superheated flames onto the morphing greathammer while following up with water to supercool it. Despite not being the incredible weaponsmith that her sister Camael was, Uriel continues this work. She does not intend to create a legendary artifact, but merely a clumsy weapon capable of killing these Brutes with brute force!

Mephisto's minions detect the change immediately. Ozzar turns to his master.

"Emperor Mephisto! That Archangel, she's tapped into Barbatos's magnetism!"

Mephisto nods, his eyes focused not on Uriel, but on the battle between Beelzebub and Zamiel.

"Yesss, yesss. I anticccipated asss much." Mephisto says, sparing Uriel only a brief glance. "Everything isss proccceeding asss expected."

Uriel's greathammer finally completes its forging. Without a moment to spare, the Archangel of Retribution yanks it into her grasp, desummons her previous greathammer of light, then conjures multiple enchantments of holy energy onto her new weapon, transforming it into a makeshift artifact.

"KILL!"

Uriel races at the nearest Brute. She swings her new hammer down with ten times the striking force, amplifying its momentum with magnetism.

BOOOM!!

Her hammer blasts the Brute's chest with overwhelming might, sending it flying backward! It crashes into the wall, killing hundreds of nearby undead beneath its body, and even better, the Brute remains unmoving for several long seconds.

Its internal organs suffered heavy damage!

But Uriel doesn't get to follow up with a second strike. She instead races over to the other Brutes, all four of whom have opted to spread out and attack the humans from different points.

Uriel conjures two walls of light to block a pair of brutes. She rushes toward the nearest one while sending a telepathic request to Raphael.

Foop!

Uriel teleports directly in front of that Brute through her brother's magic, then uppercuts her greathammer into its chin, sending it hurtling up and away, where it slams violently into the ceiling and drags for a moment before plummeting to the ground below!

As Ozzar watches Uriel's explosive rise in attack power, he turns to Mephisto.

"Our Brutes are crumbling!"

"They will lassst a while longer." Mephisto says, continuing to ignore Uriel's threat. "Thisss Beelzebub, ksss... he isss troublesssome. I need the Sssphinx'sss power. It isss key to my plansss..."

With Zamiel unable to escape Blinker's illusory world on his own, he exists in a space between spaces, hidden from the main battlefield, yet still able to share his vision with Mephisto, and vice-versa.

Zamiel and Mephisto both are fully aware of the circumstances inside and outside the illusory realm.

* * *

Inside the left-behind Fairy Domain, Beelzebub and Zamiel engage in a terrifyingly brutal and violent melee.

Boom! BOOOOM!!

Beelzebub blasts Zamiel not only with fire, but nuclear energy, irradiating Zamiel with lethally toxic radioactive damage. But Zamiel's undead body resist this power with ease, amplified even further by his newly enhanced Sphinx durability.

Zamiel charges at Beelzebub. He chops at him with his blood-colored greatsword, and Beelzebub dodges, unloading twenty fireballs into Zamiel's face to try and slow him down.

These fireballs deal moderate damage to Zamiel, but his empowered body easily copes with it, allowing him to continue pressing the attack against Beelzebub.

"How the hell did I end up fighting a naked fuckboy?!" Zamiel complains. "At least get over here and shake that ass for me, Beelzy! I'll show you a good time!"

"I think I'll keep away from that rotting crocodilian demonhood of yours, thank you very much." Beelzebub says blandly, before lashing a fire-whip at Zamiel's face.

The Emperor of War mostly dodges the whip, but it still lashes across his chest, carving through his defenses and leaving a scorched gash across his torso. Zamiel endures the pain and continues fighting, but he knows to fear Beelzebub's fire-whip. Its superheated tip strikes with the same heat as a yellow star, making it capable of piercing even the hardiest armor, including demonstone!

Worse yet, even when Zamiel manages to successfully mutilate or badly injure Beelzebub, aside from a bit of pain and distress, he doesn't cause Beelzebub any permanent injuries.

Beelzebub has the ridiculous power to heal from anything! Even a crushed or severed head won't slow him down for long.

This means that while Beelzebub can heal from any wound, Zamiel is on a ticking timer. The more injuries he accumulates, the weaker he'll become.

As Zamiel fights, he switches up his tactics constantly, frustrating Beelzebub.

Sometimes, Zamiel dives underground, using Kar's stolen earth-manipulation abilities.

Other times, he switches out his greatsword for a railgun, a machine gun, or some other human-invented weapon.

He summons swords and shields. He protects his body with Qi, making it even more difficult for Beelzebub to injure him. In these times, Beelzebub has to strike with the tip of his fire-whip to at least continue injuring and slowly wearing Zamiel down.

But all the while, as the battles rage outside, Beelzebub starts to feel that Mephisto is deliberately dragging things out, stalling for time. Though he can't put his finger on why, he assumes Mephisto must have a deeper purpose.

Beelzebub rockets around, fully naked, using his superior speed to keep away from Zamiel while peppering him with fire-bullets.

"Hey!" Beelzebub shouts. "What are you and that necro-freak planning, anyway? He should have just run away! You won't be able to stop us forever!"

"Can't say!" Zamiel replies, swapping his sword out for a long-ranged energy rifle. He blasts Beelzebub's arm off in midair, causing Beelzebub to lose control and crash into the dirt. "What the Big Boss does, I don't question! He's got me by the balls anyway, so it doesn't matter! But I guarantee it'll be EXPLOSIVE!"

Zamiel's energy rifle releases another burst of photons, aimed directly at Beelzebub's head. Beelzebub fireports to the side, dodging the attack.

As the newly uplifted Emperor of War, Zamiel's understanding of technology isn't particularly deep, but 100,000 years of life have given him countless opportunities to observe human and Volgrim technology. What his magic does is allow him to mimic most technology he has interacted with in the past, and in particular, technology associated with unleashing death and pain!

Just as Beelzebub starts to think he's figured Zamiel out, the Emperor of War pulls out a bizarre gun of some sort, an alien-looking device with a spindly-barb on its front.

"Oh man, I JUST remembered this thing existed!" Zamiel crows, looking gleefully at the strange object in his hand. "Here Beelzy, a present!"

Before Beelzebub can determine the weapon's nature, Zamiel squeezes its trigger.

ZERRRT!

A high pitched beam of light screams toward Beelzebub, moving far too quickly for him to dodge.

It strikes Beelzebub's left arm, the only intact one. Instantly, terrible agony erupts deep inside his body, agony unlike anything he's ever felt in his life. Beelzebub barely gets a second to exhale before the wind gets driven from his lungs.

He collapses to the dirt, his body curling into the fetal position. In between his flashes of spotty vision, he vaguely makes out a thick layer of ice covering his arm.

A freeze... gun?!

Beelzebub shivers and trembles as a polar cold settles into his body, violently contrasting with his superheated blood. He desperately tries to fight off the bitter cold settling into his bones, but the pain is too great! He flickers in and out of consciousness, only to awaken in a shriek of agony as another beam lances into his chest, this one inflicting even more grievous injuries to his vital organs.

Silently, Beelzebub opens his mouth as if to scream. He writhes around like a snake on hot pavement, spasming and twitching uncontrollably.

ZERRRT!

ZERRRT!

Zamiel advances upon Beelzebub, lancing that unbelievably painful beam of freezing energy right into Beelzebub's head and killing him on the spot. Then he shoots Beelzebub's legs, his arms, and any other unfrozen area.

Naturally, Beelzebub's body fights off the cold. It begins to thaw, but Zamiel continues peppering his frozen form with one strike after another, grinning evilly to himself.

"Hahahaha! Well well, looks like that Yama-chump didn't have what it takes, but I do! Nothing like a good bucket of ice to put out a fire, you hotheated moron! Bahaha!"

This time, no matter how much Beelzebub's body automatically regenerates, Zamiel remains in place, locking him down and preventing him from recovering. And unlike Yama's dark lances, the insidious cold directly extinguishes Beelzebub's heat, preventing his recovery speed from accelerating.

Minutes pass.

ZERRRT!

ZERRRT!

Zamiel continues shooting Beelzebub to keep him down and easily outpaces Beelzebub's explosive healing factor. But outside, the situation continues to worsen.

"Hmm..." Zamiel mutters to himself. "The Archangel has taken down three of the five Brutes. Big Boss summoned another, but she'll put that one down again soon. Feels like I'm just constantly shooting a corpse... this ain't fun at all."

ZERRRT!

ZERRRT!

Zamiel's finger starts to cramp up from how often he shoots Beelzebub. He switches hands and continues shooting Beelzebub to keep the Emperor of Hellfire immobilized.

"Devil-damned bastard!" Zamiel complains. "If I let up for even two seconds, he starts thawing out! This guy is ridiculous! If only I could steal his healing factor for myself, I'd be unstoppable!"

Zamiel's attention drifts for a moment. He peers out of his boss's eyes through their shared magic link to examine the battlefield.

In that instant... Beelzebub disappears!

Foop!

The Emperor of Hellfire vanishes, teleporting to a different part of the Illusory Realm.

For a brief second, Zamiel's eyes snap to where Beelzebub was just laying, and then they jump to his new position.

"What the... he's still unconscious. Then, how did he-?!"

Zamiel quickly aims at Beelzebub's new position, but...

Foop!

Beelzebub teleports again!

And when Beelzebub reappears, a flicker of magic ignites in the air above him.

BOOOM!!

An explosion of magical flames blasts Beelzebub's body from out of nowhere, bathing him in heat for his soul to greedily absorb.

Zamiel's undead heart skips a beat.

"W-what? That... that cheating fairy BITCH!"

He quickly realizes the truth. Blinker might be fighting Lupus, but casually teleporting Beelzebub around her illusory world requires no effort on her part!

And, just like that, Beelzebub finishes his regeneration. Thanks to Blinker's Faerie Fire, he quickly warms himself up and recovers from his cold shock.

Beelzebub staggers to his feet, sending a glare toward Zamiel that makes the Emperor of War feel a twinge of fear.

"Clever... trick..." Beelzebub growls through gnashed teeth. "Freezing me. Smart. But I think... it's time... you died... for GOOD."

Beelzebub grabs his left arm.

Riiiip!

He tears it from its stump while glaring with psychotic rage at Zamiel.

As for Zamiel, only three words come to his mind.

Wow. He's pissed.

* * *

In the realm outside, Kiari finishes cleaning up the area around the humans. With many of the soldiers lacking weapons thanks to Uriel's antics, Kiari has to do all of the work protecting them.

Kiari's bugs, small and large, work together in huge swarms to overpower Mephisto's undead. But unfortunately, despite each undead monster and demon not individually being as strong as the average Demon Lord, together they are still quite persistent.

Several ten-foot-tall Trolls crush Kiari's bugs underfoot. Some distance away, a horde of Dark Orcs swing their serrated blades wildly, cutting off the limbs of giant praying mantises and roaring after each kill. Even some of the skeletons, the weakest of Mephisto's minions, sport demonstone armor, granting them surprising resilience.

Kiari transforms herself into a half-beetle, half-demon hybrid. A thick carapace wraps around her body, making her an armored powerhouse. She wades into the thick of the battle, batting her enemies aside or crushing them to death under her powerful feet.

Meanwhile, Samuel Baker flies around with his fairy magic, picking off the weakest enemies and some of the stronger ones.

"Oh, NOW you kill without hesitation." Samuel snarks to Kiari. "What was with the waterworks earlier?"

Kiari smashes apart the head of one of the biggest orcs.

"You mean with Duke Raven? I didn't mean to hurt him like that. I nearly killed him! And besides, these are all undead monsters. It's fine to kill them and end their suffering."

Samuel glances back at the area where the humans remain. There, Duke Raven and Baron Xena lay unconscious, helmets wrapped around their heads to cut off their oxygen and suffocate them. As demons, they won't die from a lack of oxygen, but unlike Bael, they can't remain conscious without it either.

"You know those two are both undead, right?" Samuel asks pointedly.

"WHAT?! They are?!" Kiari cries. "No way! I've spoken to Raven a bunch of times! He's not undead!"

"...He is." Samuel says, trying not to facepalm. "Why do you think they're here, working for Mephisto?"

Kiari pauses her assault on the undead to blink her eyes.

"Oh. I just thought they decided to work with him. I guess them being undead makes sense."

"Yeah..." Samuel groans, trying even harder not to facepalm. Considering Kiari could kill him with a slap of her hand, he doesn't want to push her too far, no matter how nice she might be.

Before he can continue replying, Kiari turns to look in Xena and Raven's direction.

"Well since they're undead, it can't be helped. Go ahead and kill them, babies!"

Samuel's eyes practically pop out of his head as three tiny bugs near the two fallen demons suddenly enlarge, then attack Mephisto's elites, ripping them apart and killing them while they can't fight back.

"W-what?! You're killing them!" Samuel exclaims. "We were going to keep them alive to search for intel!"

"Eh. No point." Kiari says with a shrug. "Mephisto would just yank their souls out anyway. Plus, undead have pretty high pain resistance. You have to hit them super hard before they start cracking mentally-"

In the middle of Kiari's words, the very air around the battlefield abruptly vibrates. A high pitched squealing rings in the air, making all the combatants except for the undead wince and grit their teeth.

Eeeeee!

An instant later, the sky explodes. A figure comes screaming downward, crying bloody murder as flames engulf his body.

Zamiel, the Emperor of War, slams against the dirt floor with a violent crash. He lands face-first, breaking off several teeth as he skids forward and slows to a stop. The poor guy cries and whimpers, his 'glorious' Sphinx body looking like it was run through a meat-grinder. Both of his arms lay broken. Acrid, burnt flesh clings to his form. His gryphon feathers smoke as lingering flames continue to burn them.

"Ah... ah... oww, oh, devils..."

Then, Beelzebub flies toward him from above, dive-bombing him like a fiery bird of prey.

"WHO SAID YOU COULD RUN AWAY?!"

"Aaah!" Zamiel shrieks. He quickly burrows underground, hiding himself inside the Labyrinth and causing Beelzebub to smash into the floor behind him.

Beelzebub fails to land the killing blow.

"Get back here!" Beelzebub snarls, kicking the floor futilely. "I'm not done tearing you apart!"

Beelzebub's left arm regrows quickly. He glances around, noticing Kiari's blushing gaze.

"What? You want a piece of me too, woman?!"

"N-no..." Kiari coughs. "It's just... why are you naked?"

Beelzebub rolls his eyes. "Naked this, naked that. Don't look if you don't want to see."

Kiari quickly turns away from him, blushing madly.

"I don't want to see anything! Just so you know, I'm married! And faithful!"

"NOBODY ASKED!"

Part 474: Crushing the Demon

Blinker and Emperor Lupus battle one another in the skies while their fellow warriors tangle on the battlefield below. Lupus zips around via thin threads of shadow attached to the ceiling, while Blinker naturally levitates with her fairy magic.

Blinker goes all-out to try and kill Lupus quickly, but what she finds is that despite being in a body very different from her original self, Lupus has already become extremely proficient with Emperor Fenrir's abilities!

Fenrir, Emperor of the Night. Much like Yama, she was a master of the darkness, a vampiress adept in infiltration.

But unlike Yama, she was not weak to light. And neither is Lupus, her accidental inheritor!

Lupus flickers in and out of reality. Her movements are so fast that they appear almost dreamlike. She attacks Blinker from the right and the left, from above and below. Blinker teleports around, but Lupus dogs her with alarming ferocity, giving chase while slipping between the cracks of darkness that weave themselves among a battlefield constantly illuminated and darkened by gunfire and explosions.

Lupus jumps out of a shadow, catching Blinker from a tricky angle. She swipes her fingers at Blinker's side, causing a claw of darkness to materialize, one capable of tearing apart steel. Blinker flickers to the side to dodge, then fires off a brutal blast of telekinetic energy at Lupus's face.

But Lupus also dodges.

Her body disappears in a puff of black smoke, causing Blinker's attack to miss. Then she pounces at the Monster Queen from above, a spear of darkness in hand.

Blinker pirouettes in midair, twisting her body at an awkward angle to evade the spear aimed at her heart. It instead swipes across her belly, barely cutting a thin line in her blue dress.

"Watch it!" Blinker snaps. "I'm pregnant! If you hurt Kar's babies, I'll SHIT FIRE down your throat!"

Lupus and her continue jumping, pouncing, and flickering at one another as they fight.

"You're pregnant?" Lupus asks. "Congratulations! Have you decided on any names?"

She chops at Blinker with a pair of dual-swords, but Blinker summons her own sword and shield to knock them away.

"Nope! Not yet. And now that Kar's back, I'll definitely be consulting him!"

The two women fighting for their lives engage in a somewhat bizarre conversation, despite the stakes being instant death. As it turns out, neither holds any particular animosity for the other, but Lupus is compelled by Mephisto's magic to kill anyone he points her toward.

"You should go for a name involving reptiles!" Lupus adds. "Me and Wolfram had lots of children. Perks of being werewolves instead of demons."

"How many kids did you have?" Blinker asks, shooting a blast of Faerie Fire at Lupus's face before she shimmers away.

"A few hundred. They grow up so fast!"

In between rounds of banter and battle, Blinker notices the happenings inside her Illusory Realm. She gives Beelzebub an assist, but otherwise leaves him to his devices. In the back of her mind, she can't help but feel a little happy that he has to endure some pain.

Serves that jerk right! He killed millions of my friends. I'm not gonna let him off easy, no sir!

Besides, it's not like suffering mind-shattering agony will actually kill Beelzebub. He can take it!

But when Blinker goes to help Beelzebub, Lupus appears at her side.

"Pay attention!"

"Crap!" Blinker exclaims.

Lupus slams a mace against Blinker's back, sending the Monster Queen flying forward, where she crashes against the wall.

"Don't let your mind drift!" Lupus says, charging toward Blinker. "And quit yapping. Just kill me already!"

Luckily, Blinker protected herself with a field of Fairy Fortification, but even so, she still endured a painful blow. Blinker clambers to her feet and hastily summons temporal magic around herself, accelerating her speed and bodily recovery.

Foop!

She teleports out of the way before Lupus can land the killing blow.

Blinker's eyes become more focused.

"Are you sure you want to die? Maybe the Wordsmith can help you."

"Can he bring my husband back?" Lupus asks, motioning with her hands to summon shadow-horrors in the shape of mini-Hellhounds. These 'creatures' fly toward Blinker while chomping their hungry teeth.

"I... don't think so." Blinker says. She pulverizes the incoming shadow monsters with her magic.

"Then don't bother." Lupus says. "I'm sure you understand what it means to lose a mate. Unlike you, I'll never be reunited with mine. So just let me die with dignity!"

She sprouts shadowy wings from her back, then phases into the shadows, only to materialize next to Blinker and swing that same mace at the back of Blinker's head.

But the Fairy Queen teleports to the side, a look of grim resolution on her face.

"Alright. I'll make it quick, then." Blinker says, steeling her eyes.

What happens next baffles and somewhat surprises Lupus.

Blinker begins to monsterize!

Her body turns more muscular and powerful. She assumes the form of a gryphon and lion biped, then conjures a hardened longsword made of mana in her grasp.

She becomes the Sphinx!

"What?! You still possess the Sphinx's magic?!" Lupus gasps.

"No, I don't. But I can mimic it." Blinker says, this time going on the offense. She rushes toward Lupus with her sword held high. "I'm a genius when it comes to magic!"

Blinker no longer holds back. She brings down the hammer of god upon Lupus, each swing of her sword carrying five times the striking power compared to before. Lupus tries to deflect Blinker's attacks, but the Monster Queen's savage strength leaves her undead arms feeling weak and numb.

"Gah! Ugh! Uhhh!"

Lupus grunts and groans as she continuously holds up her mace to try and protect herself, but she ultimately opts to jump backward, evading Blinker's strikes.

The hunter becomes the hunted.

Blinker's aura becomes both noble and powerful. She chases after Lupus with a body only a bit less powerful than she possessed when she could become a True Sphinx. Each strike hits Lupus like a battering ram, making her cough and grimace as she fights under Mephisto's command.

All of a sudden, the sky explodes, then Zamiel plummets out of Blinker's illusory realm with Beelzebub hot on his tail. The Emperor of Hellfire tries to finish Zamiel off, but he dives underground and escapes.

After Beelzebub exchanges words with some of the people nearby, Blinker's eyes flash with insight. She motions toward him.

Foop!

Beelzebub abruptly teleports next to her, looking momentarily confused. He ignites flames beneath his feet to hover in the air.

"Yanking me around again? That's starting to get tiresome!"

"Shut up and help me kill Lupus." Blinker says, as Lupus hangs back. "She's difficult to pin down. But don't feel bad, she actually wants to die-"

"I wouldn't feel bad anyway." Beelzebub says, immediately rushing toward Lupus without exchanging any further words.

"Wait, you nitwit!" Blinker shouts, exasperated. "We need a strategy!"

"No thanks! I like BLASTING things!" Beelzebub calls back, his bare ass giving Blinker an unsightly view as he rushes away.

"Ugh. Demons!"

Despite Beelzebub's insistence on attacking without hesitation, Blinker can't exactly fault him. After all, anything that injures him will heal in an instant. The Emperor of Hellfire has no need to worry about his opponents hitting him with a counterattack!

And so, Blinker and Beelzebub partner up. To allow Beelzebub the most free reign, Blinker hangs back, assisting him in an auxiliary role. Beelzebub assumes the role of Tanker and Frontliner, eating any attacks Lupus sends his way, while Blinker confuses and confounds Lupus's movements with temporal and spatial magic.

Repeatedly, Blinker burns Beelzebub with Faerie Fire to quick-heal his injuries, while also placing spatial barriers here and there to obstruct Lupus's movements.

Beelzebub lashes out his fire whip. He unleashes fiery bombs, and exhales walls of flame at his scurrying opponent.

Unfortunately for Lupus, fighting Blinker or Beelzebub alone is nowhere near the same as fighting them together. In the case of these two highly competent, battle-hardened warriors, the sum of their parts is less like 1+1=2, and more like 1+1=4!

Before long, Lupus's resistance crumbles. She tries to beat a hasty retreat, but Beelzebub grabs her by the throat and pours fire directly into her mouth.

"Burn, you undead wench!" Beelzebub roars, as her body rapidly fills with flames.

An instant before Lupus's body disintegrates, her soul abruptly yanks out and returns to Mephisto. The clever necromancer preserves her battle-power, allowing Fenrir's body to crumble to ash in Beelzebub's hands.

With Lupus obliterated, all that remains on the battlefield of Mephisto's fighting forces are his Death Gates and Brutes.

BOOM!!

Archangel Uriel finally smashes the head of the final remaining Brute, smiting it dead and allowing its body to collapse into ashes on the ground.

"FINALLY!" Uriel screams in a fit of rage. "Verily, this necromancer hath irritated me for the LAST time!"

She snaps her head in Mephisto's direction, almost in unison with Blinker, Beelzebub, Kiari, and the humans.

Inside Mephisto's bunker, his undead servants begin to feel deeply disturbed.

"Emperor!" Ozzar exclaims. "What is your progress? Our enemies will be upon us in moments!"

Mephisto hovers over Valac's Lantern. In his skeletal hand, he grasps Lupus's writhing soul.

"Kekeke... all isss going according to plan."

So calm is Mephisto that it almost makes his minions feel assured.

Almost.

Until Uriel comes screaming toward them, falling like a meteor from the skies as she raises her megaton greathammer overhead.

BOOM!!!

Uriel's half-artifact crashes upon a powerful barrier of necromantic energy, fueled by an unknown magical source. The impact of this mighty blow sends a shockwave reversing outward to knock Uriel back, along with Fairy Princess Melia and her retainers.

"What a sturdy force field!" Blinker says, praising the exquisiteness of the formation.

Her eyes momentarily become unsettled.

Strange. Mephisto might have become somewhat adept in formations, as plenty of Emperors eventually do... but this formation is way too exquisite! Are the fairies assisting him?

Uriel grimaces. The recoil from her attack leaves her momentarily stunned, as if she had struck her own face. She blinks off her daze, only to see that Mephisto remains completely unharmed.

The Emperor of Legions faintly smiles up at her. A moment later, a figure climbs out of the ground inside his force field, a badly-injured fellow looking like he lost a fight with a flamethrower.

None other than Zamiel, the Emperor of War.

"Cough, cough. Oh, Big Boss. We got our butt handed to us. But we did it! We got the Sphinx's Magic!"

Mephisto's smile widens slightly.

"Gooood... passs it along."

Zamiel hesitates.

"W-well, you'll have to guess our riddle to get it, boss! I can't just give it up!"

"Of courssse." Mephisto nods. "Ssspeak the riddle and the anssswer."

Zamiel crawls a few steps closer to his Big Boss. He reveals a gruesome smile through his badly burned face.

"Ehehe! The riddle is... 'who is Mephisto's most favoritest minion?' Super easy!"

Mephisto blinks twice.

"Let me guesss. The anssswer isss... Zamiel, the Emperor of War."

"Wow, boss! Good guess! You're totally right!" Zamiel says, groveling like a beaten dog. As the Sphinx's magic leaves his body and transfers to Mephisto's body, Zamiel feels himself begin to weaken. "Oooh, Big Boss. I'm gonna need some healing. You think you can start the Ritual of Regeneration?"

Mephisto inhales deeply. The power of the Sphinx enters him, and he feels a might unlike any he has ever experienced before in his life... not unlike his rise from Duke to Emperor.

But he does not allow his vision to become clouded by delusions of grandeur.

His goal... is much higher.

"I don't think that will be necesssary." Mephisto says, directing a cold gaze toward Zamiel. "Your ssservicccesss have... come to an end."

Zamiel's eyes narrow. He reveals a smirk.

"I knew it. You were planning to kill me! But, heh, tough luck, idiot! You fell for our plot!"

Zamiel pulls himself up. He rises to his feet and grins triumphantly at Mephisto.

"I might be your minion, but you can't ever lay a finger on me! Now that we've both become empowered by the Sphinx, you've lost all your leverage!"

"Ah. Isss that ssso?" Mephisto asks, raising a hand in a slow, casual manner.

Before the gazes of Uriel, Blinker, the demons and humans, Mephisto grabs Zamiel's soul and begins pulling it out of Kar's body.

"What?!" Zamiel gasps frightened out of his wits. He feels the control of his body starting to fade. "B-Big Boss! Mephisto! You can't do this to me! We're both Sphinxes! You-"

"I am not going to kill you, little Zamiel." Mephisto says. "No... our relationssship will sssooon become... ever ssso intimate..."

Zamiel releases one last gurgle of fright before his movements cease. Kar's crocodilian body slumps to the ground, then collapses into dust, breaking apart after the loss of its soul.

Mephisto caresses Zamiel's struggling soul. He momentarily smiles, then places it inside Valac's lantern, along with Lupus's soul, and Yama's, too.

Mephisto stands up. As Uriel and the others gather their strength, he casually dismisses his Death Gates, causing all five to collapse into the ground.

"Hehehe. Consssider yourssselvesss lucky." Mephisto states, his eyes glowing with excitement. "A ssseriesss of coincidencesss. A few ssstrokesss of good fortune. And now, the final ingredient, the Sssphinx'sss Aura, granted to me by an ignorant woman. Hehehehe... you are all ssso lucky to witnesss the assscensssion of this Deity."

Uriel's heart turns cold. An ominous feeling rises in her chest, along with all of the others present.

"Begin the ritual!" Mephisto proclaims.

Abruptly, all of his necromancer minions turn to face him. They raise their arms up and begin to chant in the language of the demons, a foul black speech that irritates the ears.

"All praise Emperor Mephisto! All hail the rise of the Deity! All bow before His might!"

The souls inside Valac's lantern stir, as if unsure whether to be excited or fearful.

"Everyone!" Uriel proclaims, lifting her greathammer overhead. "Focus thy magic and weapons upon that barrier! Defeat Mephisto! Do NOT allow him to complete his incantation!"

Beelzebub nods. "Leave it to me!"

"I'm here!" Blinker says, as she summons magic to her palms.

"I'll, uh, do my best!" Kiari says, feeling a bit less sure due to her lack of powerful striking magic.

"That damned Archangel took my gun." Some of the humans mutter, annoyed.

The humans who still have weapons remaining start raining gunfire on Mephisto's shield, not intending to cause it much damage, but perhaps to suppress it with a stream of steady damage. Some of the soldiers heft rocket launchers, which they fire at the shield to cause explosive damage, while only two of them managed to bring along massive railguns.

Blinker conjures twin 'cannons' that begin blasting raw telekinetic force at Mephisto's shield.

Kiari's bugs... scratch at the perimeter. They do their best.

Beelzebub unleashes an unending torrent of concentrated nuclear hellfire, pouring all of his strength into one point to try and break through.

And as for Uriel, the Archangel of Retribution joins forces with her newly-freed brothers who no longer have to contend with Mephisto's Frost Giants. All four Archangels strike the force field in various ways, with Raphael being the outlier among his siblings.

Uriel strikes at it with pure holy energy, hoping to break through using demonkind's greatest weakness.

Michael continuously and rapidly slashes hundreds of times a second at the shield, but his strikes ultimately have the same weakness as Kiari's bugs: They don't possess much penetration force.

Gabriel uses his greatsword to strike with much stronger and heavier blows.

Meanwhile, Raphael attempts to decipher the magic behind the force field. While everyone else attacks Mephisto with gusto, Raphael's expression becomes increasingly contorted.

"Strange..." He murmurs. "It is almost as if... this field... is not one designed to protect Mephisto. Instead, its purpose..."

Inside, Mephisto's aura begins to rise. The more his foes strike his barrier, the more excited his servants become.

"The moment is at hand!"

"Our Emperor's glorious rise!"

"His Ascension!"

"The birth of a Demon Deity!!"

Ozzar's eyes glow with adrenaline.

"The refinement! Master, the refinement is working! Those fools outside have no idea what they're doing!"

Mephisto shoots a wicked grin toward all of his loyal followers.

"Our unity isss at hand! Not long now!"

Uriel and the rest continue to pound on Mephisto's force field. As they do, its size diminishes slightly. It compresses inward, shrinking by a few percent.

"It's working!" Kiari cries. "Keep attacking, everyone!"

Uriel intensifies the power behind her divine magic. She fires three beams of holy energy at the same spot as Beelzebub and Blinker, trying desperately to melt a hole into the interior.

"PERISH, DEMON!"

All of a sudden, Raphael's eyes widen.

"This magic... 'tis not a force field! 'Tis an ABSORPTION field! Sister! Do not continue attacking a moment longer! Mephisto-"

Before Raphael can finish his words, Mephisto crooks a hideous smile.

"You're too late, Archangel."

Abruptly, the force field implodes.

It collapses inward like a black hole.

In a single instant, the shield shrinks to the size of a golf ball, crushing every living and undead entity within its confines.

Ozzar releases a silent cry of horror as his body disintegrates.

The other necromancers don't even get a moment to react.

Even Mephisto's body collapses at the atomic level.

WHOOMPH.

The force field collapses into a micro-singularity, its central-point fixed on Valac's Lantern, where it forcibly crushes that ancient artifact into the size of a marble.

A split-second later, a terrifying blast erupts as all of the compressed energy detonates like a bomb!

BOOOOM!!!

A shockwave of pure mana flies outward, catching every living thing in its radius.

Uriel goes flying.

Beelzebub goes flying.

Uriel's constructs, Blinker, Kiari, her bugs, and all of the humans...

Everyone hurtles away and crashes against the walls, breaking their bones, shattering their armor, and rattling their minds!

The blast-wave continues traveling. It sends seismic shocks all throughout the local Labyrinth, rumbling and collapsing walls, ceilings, and floors. Countless monsters and demons for hundreds of miles receive the fright of their lives as Hell itself cataclysmically shudders, causing thousands to perish due to rubble falling loose from above!

Inside the epicenter of the explosion, a single voice cackles softly.

"HEH... HEH... HEH..."

Then, it goes silent.

* * *

Minutes pass.

Beelzebub is the first to recover. He awakens with a start, his ears ringing. Stones break loose from the ceiling and crash to the floor. Beelzebub stumbles around, looking for survivors.

Luckily, or perhaps unluckily, all of them managed to end up at the sides of the room, against the walls, where the falling rubble won't land on them.

Kiari lays in a heap, with so many of her bones broken that she can only lay catatonic, unable to do more than lifelessly twitch her fingers. Her bugs lay scattered all over the chamber, their bodies splattered and exploded due to their weaker constitutions. Even her hardiest beetles barely cling to life.

Blinker, luckily, ended up thrown into her Illusory Realm. She emerges not long after Beelzebub, occasionally puking up her guts due to extreme nausea and dizziness.

As for Archangel Uriel, she possessed a sturdy enough body that her crashing against the walls didn't kill her on the spot. She did suffer multiple broken bones and a terrible concussion, but she managed to survive and splash healing water on her worst injuries.

"Uhh..." Uriel gasps, trying to breathe through her broken ribs. "The... the necromancer... trick... tricked..."

Beelzebub glances at the humans.

What he finds is a pitiful sight.

All of them have perished.

Even Samuel Baker.

The man's body lays broken and dead in a heap, never again to stand tall.

Fortunately, all of them will rise again as The Respected... but that does not change the fact that they paid the highest price in this final struggle.

Beelzebub, though, does not care much for their fates. He spares one last glance toward Melia, Saria, and Ruto, all of whom appear in just as pitiful of conditions as Kiari.

"Damn." Beelzebub growls. "That Mephisto... what was he thinking?"

Beelzebub flies into the air. He dodges the falling debris and travels toward the head of the Arena, where Mephisto's final gambit played out.

When Beelzebub lands, he finds no traces of Mephisto or his minions. Indeed, with all their bodies having been utterly atomized, not a speck of material remains.

"Good riddance." Beelzebub mutters.

Then, he turns his eyes toward a single black bead left behind, laying conspicuously in the center of the raised arena. This orb appears to be no ordinary marble, judging by the remnant death energy hovering around it.

Beelzebub picks it up. He inspects it, and his expression lightens.

"Valac's Lantern. It's gone. This is all that's left."

Beelzebub breathes a sigh of relief.

Demonkind's greatest artifact, the item that was once capable of devouring souls from all over the Milky Way... has been destroyed.

"He failed." Beelzebub says. "Mephisto failed. Stupid bastard only ended up killing himself in the end."

Beelzebub shakes his head. Then, he flies over to Kiari to try and stabilize her condition.

Part 475: A Glinch in the Matrix

In the wake of Mephisto's self-destruction, a field of carnage lays out in the open for all to see. Beelzebub tries to help the others pick themselves up, but ultimately, not many of humanity's allies remain alive at the end of the battle.

In fact, all of the humans have died, their broken, shattered bodies crumpled in heaps here and there.

Blinker gingerly caresses her aching chest. Despite being blown into her Illusory Realm, she didn't enjoy a soft landing. Had she not been partially monsterized in her pseudo-Sphinx form, she might have died on impact. As it stands, she enjoys the agony of multiple broken ribs.

Compared to the others, though, she got off easy.

"Damn..." Blinker whispers, looking dejectedly at every single dead human laying amidst the ruins. "That Mephisto... that boney-bastard..."

Uriel shakily walks around, her vision bleary and a dull ringing echoing in her ears. As the hardiest combatant on the field, she suffered the least direct damage, but that doesn't mean she got off easily.

"Bloodskin heretic," she murmurs, while waving her hands to re-summon her three brothers.

Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael reappear. Despite having had their phantasmal bodies obliterated in the shockwave, they also didn't suffer any permanent damage. After all, Uriel creates them with her mana and thus they can easily die and rebirth an infinite number of times.

Gabriel looks around the area. His expression turns grim.

"Unfortunate."

Michael nods. "Leave it to a Demon Emperor."

After summoning her brothers, Uriel flies over to the most badly injured person, Emperor Kiari. Despite her obvious hatred for demonkind, she doesn't detest the cute demoness nearly as much as her kin. She splashes a bit of healing water on Kiari to stabilize her injuries and mend a few internal wounds, then glowers at Beelzebub beside her.

"Thy feats were quite impressive during this fight, Emperor of Hellfire."

"As were yours." Beelzebub curtly replies.

The two of them stare at each other with deep meaning. It wasn't long ago that Uriel beat the absolute shit out of Beelzebub, stomping his head into paste over and over again. He can't help but resent her actions, even if he has to silently admit he deserved every blow.

Elsewhere, a pair of fairies collapse to their knees beside a third, unmoving figure.

"Saria..." Ruto whispers, as blood leaks from her mouth. "Cough... she's... she's..."

Princess Melia's right arm hangs limp at her side. One of her wings is missing, having been torn off when she crashed against the wall. She only survived thanks to a magical trinket her mother gave her, but even that has been obliterated, fulfilling its sole purpose. Despite surviving, she feels nothing but a bitter pain as she looks at her fallen retainer's body.

"I should have placed down a defensive formation." Melia mutters. "Stupid. Worthless. I can't believe myself."

Princess Ruto sniffles as tears come unbidden to her eyes. She touches Saria's chest, hoping she will discover a spark of life still remaining. Sadly, she does not. Her best friend of several hundred years lays unmoving, never again to roam the mortal coil.

"Aaauuu... Saria... no!!"

Ruta becomes inconsolable. She ignores the agony of her own badly broken body, sobbing and wailing while her broken bones only add to her torment.

As for Melia, she grieves quietly, in her own princess-like way, willing herself to remain strong. As a future leader of her people, she must detach herself from the deaths of even her closest subordinates, though her mother would likely grant her leniency on today's occurrence.

While the fairies grieve, Blinker lands beside Raphael's construct. She glances around at all the dead bodies with a deep look of sadness.

"These people are my friends." Blinker says. "They can still rise as The Respected... but not Saria. Tell me we at least accomplished something useful, old man."

Raphael's eyes lower. His bushy eyebrows momentarily hide his gaze.

"Alas. I fear the Necromancer may hath outwitted us. We fell for his ploy."

"What? We did?" Blinker asks, turning to look at the broken necromantic altar. "But he's dead. There's nothing left. The idiot got compressed into a speck of dirt!"

Raphael raises his head. He looks at the Monster Queen with a deep gaze.

"Dost thou believeth the Emperor of Legions a fool? Think again. That force field protecting him was not a force field at all. T'was an Absorption Field."

Raphael doesn't bother to explain the difference. He easily observes Blinker's eyes turning dark as she realizes the implication.

"An Absorption Field?! So Mephisto was using the strength of our attacks to... to what, exactly? He must have been converting that energy for some purpose!"

Beelzebub flies over to the two of them. Thanks to his keen demonic hearing, he easily makes out their conversation. He holds up his palm, revealing a small blackened orb.

"This is all that remains of Valac's Lantern." Beelzebub says.

Blinker looks at the orb, but then her eyes roam a tad lower. With a quiet grunt, she motions with her fingers to conjure some pants and a shirt to cover Beelzebub's naked body. Beelzebub refuses to acknowledge her act of kindness.

"So the Lantern is destroyed." Blinker says, acting as if she didn't just see Beelzebub's Bits for the umpteenth time in an hour. "Then doesn't that mean Mephisto's plan failed, Raphael?"

"I believe Mephisto was refining something." Raphael says, his tone grim. "Deliberately, he recalled all of those Emperor souls back to his control. He backstabbed Yama, and he dids't tear Zamiel's soul out without a shred of mercy. Verily, I can think of many uses one might have for souls as mighty as those belonging to Demon Emperors, but none of them would be uses we might consider 'pure'."

Blinker shakes her head.

"You're overthinking things, Archangel. Mephisto probably did have some elaborate plan, but we unleashed too much power. Even an Absorption Field has its limits. When the field overloaded, it compressed into a micro-singularity and killed Mephisto on the spot."

Raphael doesn't appear convinced.

"Thou art thinking too simply. The Necromancer could have easily fled, yet he did not. This shows he had a high confidence in his plan's success. He remained in place, refining some sort of magical device or a spell, right until the bitter end. Verily I say unto thee, one does not do such a thing when they are as well-known a coward as Mephisto… not unless he had some assurances."

Beelzebub strokes his chin. "Say what you want about Mephisto. He was a yellow-belly, a pathetic little snake, and maybe even a worm. But he wasn't an idiot. He was always plotting something. He's probably dead, but we should be on our guard. It's possible he might have made contingencies in the event his magic failed."

Blinker nods. "You should destroy that orb, Beelzebub. It's high time we finally eliminated the last vestiges of Emperor Valac's influence."

"That object has a dreadful history." Raphael agrees. "Melt it to slag."

Beelzebub nods. Without speaking a word of acknowledgment, he presses both his hands on top of the compressed Lantern's remains. He ignites a violent but fully contained thermonuclear heat of 4000 degrees in his palm, creating a miniature star that focuses all of its fury on the object in its center.

What remains of Valac's Lantern crumbles within seconds. Beelzebub continues maintaining the heat for a full minute while Raphael observes and Blinker heads off to teleport the injured back to the Core.

When he finishes, Beelzebub opens his palm to reveal a handful of ashes that ultimately scatter to the floor. He nods at Raphael and starts to turn away…

"Beelzebub." Raphael says.

"Hm?" Beelzebub grunts, glancing at the Archangel of Wisdom curiously.

Raphael says nothing for a few moments. He narrows his eyes.

"Hath thou… learned any Cosmic Truths yet?"

"Pardon?" Beelzebub asks, blinking twice.

Once again, Raphael remains silent for a few moments.

"There is a... strange odor on thy person." Raphael says cryptically.

"I bathe myself in fire constantly. I shouldn't stink." Beelzebub retorts.

"That is not my meaning." Raphael says, cocking his head slightly. "Coulds't thou potentially be... a Candidate?"

Invisible question marks pop up over the Emperor of Hellfire's head.

"I beg your pardon?"

"A Candidate to become a Ruler..." Raphael starts to explain, before pausing. "Nay. Thy eyes speak of ignorance. Never mind. I am merely rambling."

Raphael flaps his wings. He takes to the air and leaves Beelzebub standing in his wake, while the Emperor of Hellfire scratches his head in confusion.

"...I think that old pigeon has a few screws loose."

Elsewhere in the Milky Way. On the world of Numaria, a planet filled with lush and beautiful forests, sweeping vistas, and beautiful landscapes, where the Hell of Punishment resides...

On a remote continent far from any population centers, there exists a strange blighted area that stains the otherwise paradise-like planet of beauty and perfection. In this dead zone, strange, horrifying creatures roam. Monsters and mutants. Entities with violently distorted bodies, mismatched limbs, lepers who lament their existence. Not only do their exteriors make them appear like freaks, but their internals are no better, with terribly mismatched vital organs that barely manage to keep them alive.

And not one of these formerly beautiful, powerful, or noble existences exists without suffering unimaginable pain and torment. Every waking moment is one of torturous survival. Perhaps, if these creatures were more lucid, they might even take their own lives rather than live a day longer.

Sadly, strange compulsions force them to continue living in vegetative, zombified states. They exist unwillingly, never again to enjoy free and fulfilled lives.

Few entities in the universe know of this strange five-hundred-mile 'dead zone' on the world of Numaria. Fewer care about its existence, or fully understand its source and what causes it.

Half a mile beneath the planet's surface, smack in the middle of the dead zone, an underground facility exists. A demonic laboratory, one that appears surprisingly clean, organized, and tidy, despite what the monsters roaming outside would suggest.

Torches line the walls, but their flickering flames are colored purple, giving the entire underground dwelling an ominous glow. Countless rooms house prisoners chained to the floors, walls, or torture devices. Many of them have had their vocal cords severed, so that they cannot scream.

The Master of the Dead Zone does not like to be annoyed.

Of course, the region does have a proper name. Those in the know often refer to it as...

The Stitched Wasteland.

Inside its underground compound, only one creature roams free: The master of this realm, a fearsome predator even among his fellow demons.

The Stitched Emperor, Glinch.

Emperor Glinch's body is a freakish, hellish combination of many other different creatures. Multiple legs line his lower body, with many of them having mismatched colors and appearances. They give him a spider-like appearance, but most ghoulishly, they do not even appear to come from the same species.

At the same time, several arms stick out of his back, front, and sides. Five eyes of different colors and sizes rest in asymmetrical places on his head, with three of them on the left and two on the right. Even his teeth seem to be from different entities, with some of them flat and humanlike, while others are more serrated and sharklike.

Simply put, the Stitched Emperor looks as if he has forcibly grafted various body parts from other beings onto himself. He resembles a monster from a horror story, yet walks smoothly and with practiced ease.

Inside Glinch's primary laboratory, where he performs the work he deems most important, a demonstone tablet lays flat on a circular altar. A rune glows on its surface, magically projecting a containment field above where more than a dozen differently-colored orbs of light 'swim' around, some of them large, and others small. Like fish trapped in a fishbowl, the orbs bounce against the walls, struggling to get free.

However, one of the orbs does not act in the same manner as the rest. The largest and most imposing grey-colored orb hovers in the center, as if confidently ignoring any threat to its existence.

"It seems all went according to plan!" Glinch says cheerfully, his voice sounding surprisingly pleasing to one's ears. Thanks to having stolen the vocal cords of another being long ago, his voice has almost a sing-songy quality to its vibrato. "One, two, three... so many Duke and Emperor souls! You've truly thought it all out, haven't you, Mephist-bro?!"

The orb in the center of the rest glows a little brighter.

"Ksss. Remember our deal, Glinch." Mephisto hisses, his words telepathically traveling to Glinch's troubled mind.

"Oh, deal, shmeal. Don't be such a workaholic!" Glinch chirps, clasping several of his hands together in unison. He smiles prettily, the expression looking quite unnerving due to his disfigured face. "We haven't spoken in ages! It would be such a shame to just get right down to business, don't you think?"

"...We ssspoke not even a week ago." Mephisto grumbles in annoyance.

Glinch begins circling around the altar, waving his hands theatrically while he moves.

"It's such a shame all of my favorite humans disappeared recently!" Glinch says, ignoring Mephisto's tone. "Do you have ANY idea how hard it is to find reliable, mint-condition 'parts'? Humans have the best compatibility, you know. And they're so simple to operate on, even an imbecile could do it!"

"I do not wisssh to dissscusss mundanitiesss..." Mephisto mutters. "Get on with the procccedure."

"There you go again, always jumping the line." Glinch admonishes, waggling five different pointer-fingers. "Work, work, work. You should stop sometimes and smell the roses!"

"I have no sssenssse of sssmell."

"I can fix that!" Glinch suddenly says, his eyes bugging out. He zips toward the orb, hovering over it with an eager and hungry gaze. "Do you want a functioning nose?! I have lots of parts you can choose from! Humans, monsters, demons, even whale noses! How about some skin? I can change your appearance for you! Your new body can be so much prettier than your old one! OOOH, I know! What if I make you a GIRL?! I love shifting my gender! I've done it a hundred times by now! It won't even hurt a bit!"

"My original appearanccce will be adequate." Mephisto says, his words sounding as if spoken through gnashed teeth.

"Adequate! Hah! You have no sense of adventure. Let me tell you, there's no greater joy than getting to see the world through someone else's eyes, or walking a mile in their feet. And I should know! HAH. HAH. HAH."

Glinch laughs in an extremely odd, stilted manner. It comes off sounding forced, as if he never once in his life learned how a normal person would do such a thing. It even momentarily unnerves Mephisto, making him fall silent for a few moments.

Mephisto gazes through his soul-vision at the other souls trapped in the magical containment field with himself.

Then he turns his attention back to Glinch.

"If you do not do asss I sssay... you will not receive the thing which your heart mossst desssiresss. You ssshould proccceed with the operation, possst-hassste."

Glinch's happy smile abruptly changes.

His entire demeanor changes.

A cold, ominous light appears in his eyes.

"Don't even think of threatening me, Emperor of Legions. I hold your life in my hands."

He looms over the altar, his freakish body now appearing truly horrifying as he dispenses with the pleasantries.

"You've already become my slave. From this day forward, you will never be able to betray me. So don't act as if you have any leverage."

Despite Glinch's threats, Mephisto remains undaunted.

"I am aware. Ssspeak not asss if I am a fool. The sssoner I assscend, the sssooner we can both begin reaping the rewardsss..."

"Mmm. The rewards." Glinch says, nodding slowly. "Those, I do look forward to."

Several seconds pass. Glinch gazes off to the side, as if lost in thought.

"Fine. Talking to you isn't any fun anyway. Might as well get this over with so I can return to my research."

Glinch walks over to a nearby table, where a multitude of tools, gadgets, and magical devices rest. He begins putting gloves on each of his hands, a process that takes more than three minutes due to the sheer number of arms on his body. Then he dons a surgical mask, and a splatter-resistant apron.

The Stitched Emperor picks up a glowing rune with one of his hands, a magically enchanted hammer with another, and a dozen more implements. Then he walks back to the containment field with all the souls sealed within.

"Mephisto! You bastard!" Lupus snarls, throwing her soul uselessly against Mephisto's. She bounces away, damaging neither him nor herself. "What are you trying to pull?!"

"Yeah!" Zamiel exclaims. "What's going on here, anyway?! Why did you trap all of us here, including yourself? Are you crazy?!"

Mephisto's soul remains in the same place, unmoved no matter how the others crash against him.

"We are all about to particcipate in a gloriousss event. Perhapsss the firssst in demonic hissstory. Be grateful that I have allowed you to experienccce my ultimate plan... for Assscensssion..."

Glinch reaches toward the containment field. His hand passes through the barrier and grabs onto Mephisto's soul, making the Emperor of Legions cry out in pain.

"Aaargh!"

"You think this hurts now?" Glinch asks coolly. "For the next three days, your suffering will be unending. But this much pain is necessary for the soul stitching to work as planned. I don't want to hear your whining the whole time, so you had better suck it up."

Mephisto telepathically grimaces.

"Jussst do it! We can take the pain!"

"Soon enough, we'll see if that's true or not." Glinch says, as he begins his work.

"Aaaargh!"

"Aaaaahhh!!"

"AAAAAIIIEEE!"

Mephisto's screams of torment continue, seemingly never to end.

Part 476: Respected Evolution

Beaten and battered, what remains of the Mephisto Assassination Force metaphorically limps back to their base inside the Labyrinth Core. Blinker teleports everyone home, but they don't return to roaring applause or an excited welcome. Instead, when they arrive, the mood inside the Core is one of dull frustration and a distinct lack of satisfaction.

The demons from the various Hells don't give a damn whether or not Mephisto fell, or whether humanity's forces won or lost. Still, they do take a certain sadistic pleasure in seeing how much damage Mephisto dealt to the Wordsmith's allies before he went out with a bang. Only a blind and deaf hellhound could have missed the cataclysmic explosion that erupted throughout the Labyrinth when Mephisto self-destructed.

Aside from human's tentative ally-enemies, the friendly demons, monsters, and humans don't enjoy a good mood either. With a few hundred humans having died to Mephisto's final detonation, and only a small handful of survivors having returned alive, few could call the battle a 'victory' for the First Wordsmith's forces.

Of course, the humans who died will ultimately rebirth once as the Respected, but they will also have to live the rest of their existences knowing their free revive has already been used up.

But if the loss of the humans was only a minor setback, the tragic death of Princess Melia's retainer, Saria, was a truly painful blow. Unlike the humans, she will never again walk the cosmos, as the fairies do not have a relic comparable to the Lazarus Tower.

Following the customs of her people, Melia wraps Saria's body inside a protective layer of magic to hide her appearance, preserve her dignity, and prevent any decay. She and the rest of the survivors arrive inside the Core to deafening silence, as many people merely give them a single glance, then look away, somewhat ashamed.

Despite the painful loss, one person doesn't appear totally broken up. Blinker herself, at the least, managed to wrest back her husband's soul from the necromancer Emperor. After allowing Belial to take care of her wounds, Blinker flits away to see Phoebe and Jason, leaving the rest behind.

The others in the group stay in the core with Belial. The Emperor of Passion travels to each individual, healing their grievous wounds while leaving any brain injuries to her capable assistant, Leeroy, the Duke of Restoration.

Of all the participants in the attack, none came out in remotely as good of condition as Beelzebub himself. While others may have lost friends, loved ones, or even suffered some painful injuries, Beelzebub ended up just fine! The Emperor of Hellfire whistles an out-of-place merry tune while he sits with Kiari, watching as Belial restores her injuries.

"Glad to see you're so chipper." Belial says, glaring daggers at Beelzebub.

Having lost her god-niece to Beelzebub when he killed Daisy in his detonation, Belial will never forgive him or think better of him. Seeing any sort of smile on his face simply enrages her out of her mind... but she also knows that attacking him won't accomplish anything.

Beelzebub shrugs. "What can I say? I had fun killing Mephisto's goons. I'll let you beat me around a bit if it makes you feel better."

"I'd rather focus my energy on productive things, like helping other people." Belial snaps back. "Not that you'd ever do such a thing."

Belial finishes healing Kiari, then stands up and trots away, heading over to heal Archangel Uriel.

Kiari massages her ribs, feeling relieved that her previously broken and shattered body has finally stopped hurting. She no longer craves death over that hellish pain.

"Hey, Beelzebub. Um. Thanks for carrying me out of there." Kiari says. "I know Belial doesn't like you, but... I don't think you're so bad."

Beelzebub smirks. "That's where you're wrong. I am indeed a very bad person. She has every right to hate me."

"Nah. Mephisto's a terrible guy." Kiari retorts. "You're just confused! Or at least you were. But now you're not!"

"You're not wrong..." Beelzebub mutters, trailing off.

He and Kiari sit quietly for a few moments.

Perhaps bothered by the silence, Kiari starts yapping again.

"It's so sad what happened to Saria, don't you think? She helped keep those Death Gates at bay, but she got unlucky in the end and now she's dead."

"Some people are doomed to die." Beelzebub mutters. "Others are destined for greatness. Destined..."

Kiari turns her head to look at the Emperor of Hellfire sitting beside her.

"You okay, Beelzy?"

"Don't call me Beelzy." Beelzebub says. "Only my friends can call me that, and I think friends are annoying."

"Right, right. But are you doing okay?" Kiari repeats, pressing the issue. "You seem distant. More than usual, I suppose."

Beelzebub shoots her an annoyed look. "How would you know what my 'usual' is? We barely know each other."

"Perhaps we should change that!" Kiari chirps.

"Aren't you married?" Beelzebub shoots back.

"Oh, sure. And I'm faithful! But I wasn't talking about any weird stuff anyway. Your mind is always in the gutter."

"Yeah. The gutter." Beelzebub mutters, averting his eyes.

Kiari cocks her head. "Hey, wait a minute. You dodged my question again! Tell it to me straight! Is something wrong? You seem down in the dumps."

Beelzebub shrugs.

Then he shrugs again.

"I don't know. Probably not. Maybe. Hmm. It's just something that old man said that's been bothering me..."

"Old man? You mean Agares?" Kiari asks.

"Agares? No. He died years ago. I'm talking about Archangel Raphael." Beelzebub says. "He asked me an odd question and I can't stop thinking about it..."

"What was the question?" Kiari asks.

"He wanted to know if I was a Candidate." Beelzebub says. "Then he mentioned something about a Ruler. I believed he was just being weird, but now that I think about it, that pigeon is older than time itself. Maybe he knows something he isn't letting on..."

Kiari shrugs. "Maybe. But why would it matter, anyway? Do you have greater aspirations? Are you feeling unfulfilled?"

"Well, yes, and yes." Beelzebub affirms. "I'm an Emperor now. That should make me feel incredible, but now I instead feel like I can't grow any further. I still want to uplift demonkind... but I'm not sure how to do that. I want to do something meaningful, but I don't know what..."

The Emperor of Hellfire lightly tosses his hands.

"What am I even doing, blabbering to some woman? Feel free to ignore me."

Beelzebub glances at Kiari. She smiles cutely at him.

"Keep working hard, Beelzy! I'm sure you'll figure out something sooner or later. You only just evolved to Emperor, so don't rush to find meaning in your life or any of that nonsense. Why not just try helping one person at a time? Find a young demon you like and tutor them! Show them how to be awesome, like you were when you fought Yama and Zamiel!"

Beelzebub blinks. "Tutor another demon, huh... I suppose that wouldn't be a bad idea."

"Exactly! I heard you made it to to your current position thanks to Duke Agares. Have you ever heard the human expression, 'pay it forward'? If someone does something nice for you, you should do something equally nice for another random stranger. Or even two strangers! If everyone does this, the effect will double each time, and we'll quickly make the whole galaxy a better place!"

Beelzebub snorts. "If only it were that simple."

"It is!" Kiari argues. "Just try it. I bet you'll be surprised by the results."

Kiari and Beelzebub continue to talk. At the same time, some distance away, beyond the lake of demons, humans, and monsters milling about the Core, Belial finishes healing up Uriel's body, restoring the Archangel to her best condition.

Uriel flexes her previously broken arm. She and Belial stare at one another for several seconds.

"Feeling better?" Belial finally asks.

"If thou wisheth me to thank thee, thou art going to be waiting a while." Uriel says curtly.

"A thank-you would be nice, but it's not necessary." Belial says.

She pauses.

"Listen, Uriel. I know an apology is just words. It's meaningless, and it won't undo anything. But you do have every right to hate me, even after all these years. I just wanted to say... I'm sorry for my actions during the War in Heaven."

"Better late than never." Uriel grunts.

"I think about my past a lot." Belial continues. "I went my entire life without ever killing anyone. I thought that if I left people alive, but only crippled them, then my conscience could remain clean and whatever happened to them afterward wouldn't be my fault."

"And then Stormbringer arrived." Uriel says, her tone becoming one of slight amusement. "And verily, thou dids't slay ten thousand demons; thy own kin. Tsk, tsk."

"I went berserk." Belial says, nodding. "But I realized something that day. I felt exactly as bad about killing all those demons as I did when I left you for dead, or all the other times I did Satan's dirty work but never finished the job. I spent millennia lying to myself. Now I know the truth... the truth that I once denied."

Uriel crosses her arms. "Let me guess. Thou now understandeth that violence is wrong, no matter the degree?"

"Yeah." Belial nods. "But I also understand that in this universe... it's necessary. We have a Plague lurking on our galaxy's doorstep. Even if we beat it, what if another Threat comes from the void? We have to be ready to fight, and even kill, to protect ourselves."

Uriel slowly blinks her beautiful blue eyes.

"This may be the worst apology ever uttered by a sentient creature."

"Right, apology. I got sidetracked." Belial says. "I'm sorry I went along with Satan's orders and attacked you. I'm sorry you suffered, and the angels fell. I wish our species had come to a mutual understanding, rather than to blows. It is a genuine tragedy the angels no longer walk our plane."

"Ah, but we still do." Uriel says, her voice softer than before. "There is yet one angel left among the living. We Archangels stubbornly cling to the physical realm, as well. Perhaps someday our species may rebirth through the Wordsmith's magic."

She shrugs.

"Or perhaps not. 'Tis not my call to make."

Belial smiles. "I hope they do. The universe is a darker place without the angels around."

On Tarus II, at the Lazarus Tower.

The manager of the tower, a person instated to watch over new arrivals when Phoebe Hiro is not present or is otherwise occupied, turns out to be Ogie, the same Salamander who previously lived next door to Jason and Phoebe while Daisy was growing up.

After the Stormbringer War, Ogie and his wife, Jeera, relocated to the southern part of the city. But as good, kind-hearted and trustworthy people, Phoebe opted to put the old monster in charge of the Lazarus Tower. After all, while it might not require any maintenance, people who revive through it often return in a traumatized state, and Phoebe finds that having a warmhearted lovable old man like Ogie around helps ease the tension.

On this particular day, dozens of humans materialize one after the other, with only ten minutes between each Respected's rise. The red-scaled Salamander sits on a lightly cushioned chair before the primary rejuvenation platform, watching as billions of molecules of light draw together to reform into the figure of a naked human woman.

The woman slumps to the ground and coughs violently. Ogie gets off his chair, walks over to her, and wraps a robe around her back.

"Yeap, it does seem ta' hurt when ya come back. Cough up that phlegm, ma'am. You'll feel better in no time."

The woman glances up at the baggy-eyed old lizard and shivers.

"I... I... where am I?"

"The Lazarus Tower." Ogie says. "You're the fourteenth to come back so far. Yeap, lotsa people died to that Mephisto-feller. Do ya remember your final moments?"

The woman closes her eyes and massages her eyelids. She shakily stands up, with Ogie helping steady her balance.

"I, I was, I was shooting... shooting my gun... at that energy field... then the next thing I knew, I was on my knees here, coughing like crazy..."

"Seems a lotta people just kinda blanked out at the same time." Ogie says. "At least it was a quick death. Welcome back to th'world of th'living, ma'am."

He continues talking to her for a minute or two, then gives her a T-REX to temporarily wear to preserve her dignity, at least until she can return to her home and change into appropriate clothes.

After the soldier leaves, Ogie sits back down.

A minute or two slowly pass...

Then, molecules of light begin to form once more.

The figure of a tall, dark-skinned man appears. He falls forward and collapses to his knees, but only a moment later, stands up, looking extremely confused.

"Huh? The hell- where am I?"

"Lazarus Tower." Ogie says, getting off his chair. "You done-did bite the dust, young man. Ah, you must be that Samuel-feller. I was told to keep an eye out for ya."

Ogie hands a robe to the naked man, which Samuel accepts. Unlike the woman before him, Samuel doesn't appear as confused, but instead quickly accepts what happened.

"That god-damned Mephisto." Samuel growls, as he starts to put his robe on. "He couldn't just die, NO, he had to fuck us over with one last- huh?"

Samuel's robe meets an obstruction as he tries to wrap it around his back. He cranes his neck around, only to see that the robe has snagged on something stuck to his back.

"The heck? Am I wearing a backpack or something? What is my robe stuck on?"

Ogie raises his wizened old eyebrow. "Eh? Whaddya mean, feller? Don't ya know about those cute butterfly wings on yer back?"

"Cute BUTTERFLY wings?!" Samuels gasps. He quickly pulls the robe off, then cranes his head like crazy to try and get a better look. "What the FUCK?! I don't even have my Power Glove on! How in damnation do I still have fairy wings?!"

"You mean you ain't a fairy?" Ogie asks, only to pause and scratch his head. "Oh, right. Phoebe said only humans could come back. Maybe you're half a fairy, then? The kids these days, they're all so carefree..."

"I am NOT a fairy." Samuel grouches. "I'll have to see Phoebe about this. Can you hand me that knife over there?"

He gestures to a long-bladed carving knife on a nearby table, one Ogie uses to whittle wood when he's bored. The old Salamander nods, then waddles over, picks up the implement, and hands it to Samuel.

Samuel cuts two large slits in the back of the robe. Then he forces his large wings through the slits and fully dons his robe.

After tying it off, Samuel's expression doesn't improve much.

"Ridiculous. How did that even happen? Never mind. Thanks for the help, Ogie."

"No problem." Ogie says, giving Samuel a thumbs up. "Mister Neil said he wanted to talk to ya. Make sure you drop by after you've cleaned yourself up, alright now?"

"Roger that." Samuel replies.

After Ogie hands Samuel a goodbye T-REX, the Lieutenant marches out of the Lazarus Tower, where he finds a woman waiting for him.

"Lieutenant!" Private Ashley says, as she walks up to him. "How are you feeling? I heard what happened..."

"Were you there when Mephisto blew his stack?" Samuel asks, as he falls into step beside his subordinate. "No, that's right... you got knocked out and Blinker sent you back to the Core."

"Yeah..." Ashley says, as she pauses to glance at Samuel's back. "What's with the wings? You don't even have a Power Glove on."

"I have no idea." Samuel says. "I revived, and they were already there! Maybe Hope or Jason can turn me back to normal."

"Have you... become a fairy... for real?" Ashley asks. "Can you cast fairy magic?"

"No idea. Haven't tried." Samuel says, while raising his hand. "I could just-"

Samuel starts to make a motion with his hand. Abruptly, a blast of telekinetic energy fires forward and explodes against a rock.

BOOOM!!

The rock detonates like a bomb, blasting rock-shrapnel everywhere! Startled, Ashley and Samuel nearly jump out of their skin!

Several people scream in alarm. A child begins to cry as he falls over, badly injured. Ashley rushes to his side while activating her T-REX. She conjures an emergency medical nanite injector and presses it against the child's neck while hastily yanking out several rock shards embedded in his chest.

"Holy shit..." Samuel gasps, frightened out of his wits. He hurries to help an older man who fell and his his head, while at the same time feeling more than a little spooked. "How the hell... how did my magic become so strong? I barely even did anything... hold on, sir! Stay with me!"

Samuel blinks his eyes to clear away his dazed expression. He quickly performs CPR on the man, reviving him, while nearby soldiers arrive on scene with medical supplies, having been alerted by Tarus II's automated defenses.

"Lieutenant, glad to see you back on your feet, sir." One of the newcomer soldiers says, kneeling beside Samuel. "What happened here? Did an enemy attack?"

The soldier takes the injured civilian off Samuel's hands.

"No," Samuel explains. "It was me. I accidentally... well, I fired fairy magic from my hands. I've somehow revived as one, and... sorry. I didn't realize this would happen."

"You'd better report to Commander Neil." The soldier says with a brusque nod. "And watch your magic! You could have killed someone!"

"Yeah, damn. We got lucky." Samuel says, grimacing.

He exchanges a few words with Ashley, then takes off, heading over to see his commanding officer.

As he walks, Samuel's wings flap reflexively, and he takes to the skies. He begins racing through the air at a speed higher than he's ever managed before, making him marvel at how much more potent his fairy magic has become.

Did resurrecting as a Respected change something with my powers? He wonders. I need to get to the bottom of this!

Part 477: Lost in the Labyrinth

Blinker paces back and forth nervously. She wrings her hands together as if trying to squeeze every last drop of water out of a washcloth. Not far away, Phoebe Hiro sits in front of a desk and computer terminal, calmly typing on a keyboard while she performs her daily routines. She mostly ignores Blinker's frantic pacing, but the Monster Queen's obvious worry doesn't escape her notice.

"How can you play on a computer at a time like this?!" Blinker finally asks, breaking fifteen minutes of silence.

"If Jason and Fiona can't do anything, then neither can I." Phoebe answers. "Don't worry. They've taken Kar's soul to a time-accelerated realm and are currently performing spiritual surgery on him. I have faith they'll bring him back to life."

"I should be helping them." Blinker complains, while she begins pacing again, even faster than before. "I'm a genius at magic, you know!"

"Not to brag, but so is Fiona." Phoebe says. "Jason said he'll bring you to his world once he's stabilized Kar. One way or another, he will. Just give him time."

"But why can't I go there now?!" Blinker snaps.

"Do you want Kar to die?" Phoebe asks pointedly. "Distracting Jason during this critical period... I don't think you want to do that. Just sit still and wait. Have some faith in my husband. There's no way he's going to let his best friend down now."

Blinker sighs. She walks over and sits behind Phoebe where she can see the computer screen she's using. Blinker continues to grumble under her breath, but no longer harps on about seeing her husband.

"What are you even doing, anyway?" Blinker asks, changing the topic to try and get her mind off things. She gestures vaguely toward the computer screen. "That doesn't even look interesting! It's just a bunch of numbers!"

On Phoebe's screen, a series of complex-looking formulas and graphs appear, all of them looking like complete gibberish to Blinker. While monsters might be more technologically adept than demons, the abstract nature of whatever Phoebe is working on completely goes over the fairy's head.

Phoebe doesn't answer for a few long seconds. She sighs, then lowers her eyes to her keyboard, tapping its bottom edge thoughtfully.

"Your operation to kill Mephisto exposed a lot of issues I've overlooked until now."

"Issues?" Blinker asks.

"Yes. We lost everyone. All of the human soldiers. They perished in battle, despite wearing the T-REX suits I designed. After having a chat with Marie Becker, I've been feeling... guilty. I failed those soldiers by equipping them with armor that was useless for their operation."

"Nobody could have expected Mephisto to go thermonuclear." Blinker says, softening her tone. "That explosion was ridiculous!"

"I explicitly designed the T-REX suits to be a suitable balance of cost and efficiency." Phoebe explains. "They aren't meant to allow ordinary humans to go toe-to-toe with Demon Emperors. Some of our best troopers, when working together, might be able to pin down a Demon Duke, but an Emperor is simply out of the question. At least for our current generation of exosuits."

"So why not make stronger ones?" Blinker asks.

"It's not that simple. Even with all of the incredible technological leaps we've made, nanite-based armor can only give our army so much defense. In essence, we rely on trillions of molecule-sized robots interlocking their tiny bodies together to create light and durable armor. The problem is, while this does make a T-REX exceptional at deflecting blunt damage, it simply cannot grant the same level of 'hard protection' as actual plated armor would. Explosions, heat, and electricity are huge fail-points our enemies can and will exploit."

Phoebe gestures at the formulas on her screen.

"I can create stronger nanite-based armor. It's certainly doable. Marie even handed me a certain valuable item that will jumpstart my next round of designs by leaps and bounds. But even so, the improved nanite production speed would plummet to a fraction of its current value. For every thousand T-REX's we make now, I'd only be able to make a single one of the newer, more durable type."

"Is that a problem?" Blinker asks. "If this new type can allow humans to fight Emperors, or at least survive clashes with them, you could simply give the armor to your best troopers. You'd focus on elite squads capable of killing Emperors."

"It's not only about the resource cost of building these superior nanite-armors." Phoebe explains. "It's a logistics issue. Right now we only have three factories on Tarus II. I would need to devote the production lines of all three of them for over a hundred days to construct enough improved nanites to fabricate just one Ultimate T-REX. In that time, I could have produced 100,000 standard T-REX's. It's just not worth the time cost."

"I thought you said it would be a thousandth the efficiency. Not one hundred-thousandth?" Blinker asks, clearly confused.

"The energy, metals, compounds, and so on are not the same as the time and logistics requirements." Phoebe explains. "Those are another problem entirely. Even if Jason magicked a hundred new factories into existence, the price we'd pay to create a dozen Ultimate T-REX's would... well, let's just say I'd rather focus on Uplifting allied demons and monsters to the level they can fight a Demon Emperor."

"Sure... but there's a problem with that model." Blinker says slowly. "You have to put humanity's future in the hands of non-humans. Jason might be a trusting fellow, but I think you're a bit more pragmatic than him. To say nothing of Neil..."

Phoebe abruptly lifts her eyes from her keyboard. She turns to look Blinker right in the eyes.

"If humanity splits between Jason's faction and Hope's faction, which side will you take?"

Taken off-guard, Blinker flinches under Phoebe's gaze.

"I, I don't know! What kind of question is that? Both of you are my friends!"

"Neil wants to exterminate demonkind." Phoebe says. "He will almost assuredly ban all demons from coming along with him to Maiura. That puts our monster allies in an awkward position, you know. I don't think Neil even likes you."

Blinker scoffs. "Whaaat? Me and Neil are good friends! Unlike the demons, we monsters have been humanity's allies since day one! Are you seriously implying he'd want to push our different species away?"

"I don't know if he will or not..." Phoebe says. "But I do think that even if he doesn't make any explicit moves to do so, the option will linger in the back of his mind."

Blinker's expression becomes troubled. She averts her eyes, unable to meet Phoebe's gaze.

"Well... when you put it that way... he IS something of a human supremacist."

"Very much so." Phoebe says, turning away to massage her forehead. "And in a week and a half, I will need to give a speech to convince people to stay on Jason's side. I'm not sure if I'm up to the task."

"Hmph." Blinker snorts. "Jason's such a lazy turd. He always makes you do all the hard work. You should tell him to give his own speeches, Phoebe! Grow a backbone!"

"You'd have a point if this were only a few short months ago." Phoebe says, sobering up. She lifts her head to stare into the distance blankly. "Daisy's death hit Jason hard. He won't stop blaming himself. I won't stop blaming myself. Even Samantha has been fighting her own self-loathing on the matter. But in truth, it was Jason who failed 'the most' due to the powers he wields, and now he wants to redeem himself. He's not screwing around anymore. I think he's treating this entire situation as a chance to make up for the past. He's busier than you would believe."

"Busy doing what?" Blinker asks. "Aside from healing Kar, I mean."

"It'll be up to Jason to tell you himself." Phoebe answers, shaking her head. "I'm not at liberty to say. I do know he wants to keep this matter... hush-hush."

Phoebe, acutely aware of the possibility of a Psion listening in on the conversation, wisely keeps her lips sealed. Thanks to a special barrier her husband placed on her mind, no Psion will be able to intrude on her thoughts without alerting her, but that won't stop them from overhearing any words she says out loud.

Blinker doesn't press the issue. "I see. Well, I guess you two are working hard. Makes me wish I could do more on my end..."

"You just killed Mephisto." Phoebe says. "And Yama, too. Those are two threats we no longer have to worry about. You're doing plenty."

"Sure, but I want to do more." Blinker grumbles.

She and Phoebe continue talking for fifteen long minutes. With a few hours having passed since Blinker sent Kar back to Tarus II, she finds herself growing more and more antsy as the time passes.

Suddenly, the air vibrates. Jason's voice transmits into the room.

"Blinker. I've finished stabilizing Kar's condition. You can come see him now."

"What? REALLY?!" Blinker shrieks excitedly, while jumping to her feet. "He's going to be okay! Take me there already!"

Jason hesitates for a brief moment.

"Yeah. He'll... survive. One moment."

The vibration in the air stops. A moment later, Blinker pops out of existence.

Before she can even realize something has happened, the Monster Queen disappears and reappears in a completely new location. The instant she materializes, powerful beams of energy lock onto her position and bind her in place. Her vision goes dark as she loses not only her eyesight, but all of her other senses as well!

"W-what the heck?!" Blinker cries out in fear. "A trap?!"

Jason's voice speaks inside her mind.

[Please remain calm. I have to triple-check your identity. I've sealed off your senses, just to make sure you are who you say you are.]

"What do you mean?" Blinker asks. "I'm ME! Blinker! Your good friend-"

[Just remain calm. This won't take long.]

A strange and unsettling sensation causes Blinker's stomach to churn. A powerful scanner of some sort sends harmless but disquieting beams of radiation all throughout her body, massaging her skin and causing her bones to hum. She grits her teeth and even snickers under the ticklish sensations that simultaneously make her want to throw up.

Abruptly, the scans stop.

Blinker's vision returns, and she falls to her knees.

"Ah! Ohh... ohh... gods..."

Blinker presses both of her palms against the floor. Her vision sways, making her feel dizzy.

"...alize."

Jason speaks a Word of Power. Instantly, Blinker's queasiness vanishes, and she returns to full alertness.

The Wordsmith kneels down to help her up. As Blinker rises to her feet, she finally gets a good look at where she's arrived.

Blinker finds herself inside a small, tightly compacted facility of some kind. Dozens of machines aim at her in a manner she finds unnerving. Some of them appear to be the scanners that scoured every inch of her body, but others clearly seem to be weapons... weapons capable of obliterating her existence at the molecular level, if need be.

"This is my makeshift Entry Depot." Jason explains. "I didn't expect to have any visitors, but after I patched Kar's soul up, I spent a couple of days building it. This way, I can be sure anyone I bring here won't be bringing any unwanted guests along."

Blinker nods slowly. She stares at Jason for a moment, taking note of his lightly stubbled face. It appears he hasn't shaved in at least a month.

"Wh... where are we?" Blinker asks. "The gravity feels strange here."

"We're not on Tarus II." Jason says cryptically. "You can call this place... Chrona."

"Chrona." Blinker repeats, mouthing the word carefully. "Uhh... okay. So where is my husband?"

Jason smiles, but the expression seems forced.

"He's... well, follow me. I'll show you."

Seeing the lack of enthusiasm on Jason's face, Blinker's stomach sinks. She begins to wring her hands together in fear as Jason turns around and walks over to the door a few feet away. When he opens it, Blinker follows after him, her heart in her throat.

The Monster Queen steps outside. She lifts her eyes upward, then blinks in a daze.

"What... the...?"

The sky above 'revolves' at an alarming speed. It spins and twists violently, making her feel as if there is a spatial whirlpool surrounding the 'planet' she finds herself on. The ground beneath her feet turns out to be made entirely of steel, without a hint of dirt, grass, or greenery anywhere to be seen. At the same time, different sorts of buildings dot the landscape, perhaps only two dozen in total. The tallest one looks like a huge antennae aimed at the sky, while the smallest one seems to be a house made for a small family to live comfortably.

"Like I said," Jason explains, as he begins walking toward one of the mid-sized buildings, "I wasn't expecting visitors. I threw a little something together for Kar's sake, but once you two are done here, I really need to get back to my work."

Blinker tentatively follows the tall human as he walks toward that small, square structure up ahead.

"Chrona." Blinker repeats again. "What is this place, Jason?"

Jason doesn't answer. He continues walking forward as if he didn't hear her question.

He pushes open a door to the small building, then steps aside and gestures within.

"After you."

Blinker nods. She walks into the building, and Jason follows after her. When she enters, Blinker gazes around, spotting a myriad assortment of hastily-thrown-together, experimental, gimmicky-looking pieces of technology. Many of them look like they were cobbled from spare parts in a rush, with some of their exterior panels or other vanity pieces missing.

"This is a hospital." Jason explains. "Well. Sort of. Fiona helped me whip it up just for Kar. I wasn't expecting him to be in such bad shape. It's a miracle we were able to keep him alive..."

Jason shakes his head, making Blinker's stomach sink even further.

"Jason. Please... is he okay? Is my husband... alright?"

The Wordsmith sighs.

He points toward a white sheet hiding a bed in the corner. Behind it, Blinker can barely make out the vague shadowy figure of a crocodilian body laying motionless on a bed.

"KAR!!" Blinker cries.

The Fairy flaps her wings and rushes over to the sheet. She yanks it aside, finally getting her first look at her husband's figure.

Kar lays unmoving on a hospital bed. His chest rises and falls. His familiar crocodile body looks exactly as Blinker remembers it, from before the Battle Brothers killed him.

Blinker gently takes Kar's claw in her hands. Tears well up in her eyes.

"Kar... Kar, are you awake? Kar?"

Jason walks up behind the fairy, a dark look lingering in his eyes.

"That bastard, Mephisto. I don't know what he did to Kar, but his soul was... it was in a sorry shape, Blinker. I wanted to bring him back as good as new... but I couldn't."

Blinker sniffles. She paws at her eyes, then turns to look at Jason as tears run down her face.

"What do you mean? Speak plainly!"

Jason chews his lower lip. He closes his eyes and rubs the bridge of his nose.

"It's just... he's so weak now, Blinker. So weak. His soul was- I couldn't reform it properly. I could only mend the worst cracks and drip a bit of life back into him. But... his days of using magic are over. His soul is so fragile that it might not even be possible for him to walk again. His control over his body is going to be poor at best."

Blinker struggles to breathe. She swallows shallow gasps of breath while trying to keep her heart firm.

"Will he... wake up?"

Jason nods. He opens his eyes and exhales.

"Yes. He can talk. He's still mentally 'here.' His psyche was resilient. But you should know... Mephisto brutally tortured him. Kar suffered terribly. For the moment, I'll have to hold him here so I can keep an eye on his condition. His soul is like a leaky sieve. I can't rush the healing process, so it might be a few months until he can stay awake for more than thirty minutes at a time."

"Can't your Wordsmithing fix him?" Blinker asks.

"I thought it could. But no. Even my Wordsmithing has limits. I'm no good with healing brains, and I'm no good with souls, either."

Jason clears his throat.

"If you, uh, want, I can get a little room set up for you. You're free to stay here with him. It's the least I can do for the two of you."

Blinker nods hurriedly, as if afraid Jason will rescind the offer.

"Yes, yes, of course! I'll stay here. With him."

Jason nods his head sheepishly. He takes a few steps back, averting his eyes.

"Well, uh, I'm sure you will want some privacy. If you need me, I'll be... outside."

After Blinker nods, Jason turns and walks away, leaving her alone with her husband.

It's only once Jason leaves that Blinker can finally break down and collapse to her knees, crying tears of anguish and relief.

"Kar... Kar...!"

Somewhere inside the Labyrinth.

Dozens of shadowy figures roam the deepest, darkest corners of Hell.

These figures do not move with purpose.

They do not hold any particular intent in their minds.

Rather, they are like lost souls.

These shadowy figures move from right to left, and then right to left again. They roam around as if in a daze, lost and confused.

"We... my name... my name was... you are? Where am I... where was I going...?"

Men and women alike, these living shadows stumble about in a daze, moving toward no particular destination. Sometimes they bump into one another, gazing into each other's blackened eyes without understanding what they can even see.

A female shadow seemingly 'melts' onto the floor, then recongeals her body into something vaguely human shaped.

"Vic... Victoria... that name... it means something to me..." The woman mumbles to herself. "Was it my name? Was it someone else's?"

She turns to look at another shadow standing nearby. "Excuse me, do you know who I am?"

"How should I know?! I don't even know who I am!" The other shadow shrieks. "Aaaaiiiee! This is scary! So scary! How did I get here?! Who are all of you? Who am I?!"

"Please don't yell." A third shadow, this one vaguely masculine, says. "My head hurts when you yell. Do any of you know who I am?"

"I already said I DON'T KNOW!" The second female shadow screams. "LEAVE ME ALONE!! AIIEE!"

As these roaming male and female shadows try to figure out who they are, a tiny, vaguely feminine shadow appears amidst all the others. Despite looking no different from the rest, her diminutive stature makes her stand out in a way one might not anticipate.

"Everyone." The small shadow says. "Please come to me. I have remembered."

"You've remembered?"

"This one knows! She knows something!"

"Quickly, let's hear what she has to say! Shush, you! Stop making such a racket!"

The other shadows, hundreds, even thousands of them, race toward the tiny female and quiet down in anticipation of her words.

"We are Shades." The small shadow says. "Shades and Shadow-walkers. We had a purpose. Our purpose was to serve Emperor Yama. He held us against our will. But he is dead now."

"Emperor Yama!" A female Shade exclaims. "That name is familiar to me!"

"I don't know why, but I hate that name!" Another Shade cries. "I hate it. Hate it!! Terrible name! Skree-ow!!"

The small Shade holds up what appear to be her palms.

"Please, everyone. I am not done."

"Of course, Wise One! Speak, and we will listen!" A male Shadow-Walker exclaims.

"My name..." She says, pausing for a half-second. "My name... I have forgotten my true name. But Yama called me Silent. He called me that because I do not like to speak. Each of us had a different name. But Yama changed our names to whatever suited him most. Now that he is dead, we do not have to obey his commands any longer."

"We don't?" Another Shade asks. "Wonderful! But what should we do now? Do we have a purpose?"

Silent doesn't answer for a few, long seconds.

"A purpose. I do not know."

"You are the Wise One." A Shadow-Walker states. "Tell us what to do!"

"I do not want to give any orders." Silent states. "I want to find... my brother. I had a brother. I need to find my brother."

"Your brother. Wonderful! Then our purpose is to help you find your brother." The Shadow-Walker repeats, as if to give himself even the slightest direction. "Who is your brother? What does he look like?"

"I... do not know." Silent answers, her voice soft. "I cannot remember. He was... like this. And he had a face... like... like this."

Silent speaks as if pointing to a portrait of her brother's face, but she makes no special effort to actually describe his appearance.

Even she cannot remember much, beyond a hazy outline of his face.

"Wise One, Lady Silent!" The Shadow-Walker says. "If you had a brother, then we will help you find him. How many brothers can there be among our ranks? He must be here."

"I do not think he is one of us. He is not a Shadow." Silent says quietly. "But... but... I do not know. I wish I could remember... it is all so... hazy..."

Silent begins to cry. She presses her shadowy hands against her face, weeping softly as she struggles to form the haziest links between her memories.

But she fails.

Silent cannot remember her past in any great level of detail, no matter how deeply she wishes she could.

A nearby Shade touches her back to comfort her.

"Lady Silent. Do not cry! We will help you to find your brother. Until we have remembered who we are, you can act as our leader. We will serve you and do anything you command!"

Silent nods her head between choked sobs. "Th-thank you.. thank you all. I do not deserve such kindness. I am a failure of a sister."

"You have told us what we are." The Shadow-Walker states. "That alone is a great help. In my eyes, you are truly a Wise One! Do not call yourself a failure, or all of us will weep in your stead."

Silent nods repeatedly.

"Thank you all. Thank you, all of you..."

Part 478: Pushing Benjamin's Buttons

From the depths of the Labyrinth, a small force of human soldiers run with purpose toward the Labyrinth Core. Four medics and twelve soldiers move in tandem, flanking a pair of badly burned and injured bodies on stretchers. So poor are their conditions that any teleportation effects might end their lives on the spot.

Benjamin Brown and Siddhartha Gautama breathe raggedly as the medics lug them toward the Labyrinth Core. Once they arrive, the medics meet up with none other than Emperor Belial, who was alerted to the condition of these two injured.

"Here they are, Samantha." One of the female medics says, after setting Buddha down. "They're alive, but in poor condition."

Belial glances at Benjamin Brown. She frowns, instead opting to heal Buddha first.

A strong pulse of magical energy transmits from her palms into the body of the injured human. Belial watches as the burns covering Buddha's skin slowly pull back and recede, the pain of which causes Buddha to grit his teeth and cough.

"Aahh... ahh... nnn..."

"Bear with it." Belial says. "The healing can hurt worse than the original agony sometimes. Repairing nerve endings isn't a simple matter."

Buddha doesn't answer. He merely nods, gritting his teeth to endure the pain.

After a full thirty minutes, Belial finishes mending his wounds. So severe were his injuries that she has to take a short break to wipe the sweat off her forehead. While Buddha shakily pulls himself into a sitting position, Belial glares at Benjamin Brown.

"Mind telling me what you two were up to that left you in such states?" Belial asks Buddha.

Siddhartha Gautama nods slowly. "We went on a mission to attempt to slay Emperor Gressil. We failed."

"Just the two of you?" Belial scoffs. "Even for this ancient bucket of bolts, that was a moronic decision."

"Not only myself and Benjamin Brown." Buddha says. "Creator Demila also went with us."

He spends a few minutes explaining what happened to Belial, all while Benjamin continues laying motionless, his body wracked with pain.

"A 7th Level Psion, a Vanguard, and the Master of Combat couldn't beat Gressil with their strength combined?" Belial asks, visibly shocked. "Demila alone should have been enough to crush him. I've seen what 6th Level Psions can do to Demon Emperors. 7th Level Psions would be ten times more ridiculous!"

"Gressil is no ordinary demon." Buddha says quietly. "He is the Envoy of Chaos. Psions rely on their mental stability and hundreds of millennia of training to out-think and demolish their opponents. But Gressil can interfere with their thoughts and throw them into confusion. He cannot nullify their Psionics like he can nullify the magic of other demons… but the distinction is barely worth mentioning."

Belial shakes her head. She stands up and walks over to Benjamin Brown while her cute little succubus tail twitches in annoyance.

"I can't say I'm not happy to see that you got your ass kicked, old man." Belial grouches at the infirm old man. "After what you did to Emperor Laplace, it's about time you finally had your ass handed to you. I liked Laplace."

Benjamin coughs weakly. His burned lungs make it difficult for him to speak.

"Haha… have you… talked… to Lily yet?"

"A few days ago." Belial says. "Not that we got to say much. I've been running around like a chicken with my head cut off, especially after a bunch of children dropped dead. Speaking of which, I don't think I'll be much use in fixing you up. I can't repair mechanical pieces."

"Benjamin grimaces. "If you allow me to drain a bit of your mana… I can fix myself."

"Excuse me?" Belial asks.

"Your mana." He repeats. "If I absorb the mana of a demon, especially an Emperor, my body can self-repair. I won't be able to regrow my missing arm, but I can probably have someone fix the rest… well, Ose used to repair my damaged parts. Marie and I aren't on speaking terms anymore."

"I didn't ask about your relationships, womanizer." Belial snaps. "And I'm sure as hell not giving you my mana."

Benjamin closes his eyes.

"So you will leave this broken old man here to die? I suppose it is... all that I am worth."

"Don't be such a drama queen." Belial says. She pauses to glance around the chamber. "Beelzebub! Come over here a moment."

Not far away, Emperors Beelzebub and Kiari sit together, talking about something unknown. Having returned from the battle with Mephisto a while earlier, they haven't yet taken the chance to head back to Tarus II. Hearing Belial's call Beelzebub raises an eyebrow. He stands up, as does Kiari, and the two of them walk over to Belial.

"Yes?" Beelzebub asks, smiling at Belial.

Belial doesn't smile back.

"This is Benjamin Brown." She says, gesturing to the badly burned lump of charcoal and steel on the gurney before her. "Know him?"

"Seven Hells." Beelzebub remarks, turning his gaze toward the Vanguard. "You look even worse than when I roasted you."

"Yeah, yeah..." Benjamin grumbles.

Belial explains to Beelzebub what Benjamin needs. After she finishes, a strangely evil smile creeps across the Emperor of Hellfire's face.

"Aww. Does the big strong Vanguard need little old me's help? Need to take a sip of my demon juice, Benji-boy?"

Benjamin rolls his one unmelted eye. "Laugh- COUGH! Laugh it up, Beelzebub."

Beelzebub continues mocking the old man for another minute before getting tired of it. With a reluctant sigh, he slaps his wrist into Benjamin Brown's only remaining palm, allowing the Vanguard to latch onto him.

"Suck me dry." Beelzebub says.

Kiari coughs. Her face turns beet red, though for what reason, nobody really wants to say.

Benjamin closes his eyes. He calls upon his innate Vanguard abilities and activates a special power, causing Beelzebub's mana to suck out of his body, into Benjamin's palm, and from there, all the way through the rest of him.

In fewer than 20 seconds, Benjamin fully rejuvenates himself. His mechanical parts snap back into place. His burned skin and organs heal back to perfect condition, and he regains sight in his melted eye.

While his torn-off arm cannot regrow its missing mechanical parts, the rest of his body restores to peak condition, allowing the Vanguard to stand up and climb off his cot. He cracks his neck and smiles faintly at Beelzebub.

"Well. Thank you for the assist, Emperor of Inferno. I guess I owe you a beer."

"I don't drink." Beelzebub says blandly, pulling his wrist out of Benjamin's grasp. "So glad to see you back in tip-top shape. Might want to get that arm looked at."

Benjamin frowns. "Are you feeling alright? I drained quite a lot of your mana. Usually, even an Emperor would be feeling a little woozy right about now."

"No need to worry about me." Beelzebub retorts. "I barely even noticed the drain. Even since my Ascension, my mana reserves have become seemingly inexhaustible."

Benjamin starts to say something else, only to get cut off when a woman shoves past Beelzebub and jumps at the old man.

"Daddy!" Lily cries, throwing herself against her father's chest.

"Oof." Benajmin grunts, easily keeping his balance while his joyous daughter beams happiness at him. "Hello, sweetheart."

"Where did you go?!" She exclaims, hugging him tighter. "You left a note saying you might not be back for a week and- OWW! Aaaiiee!"

Lily leaps away from her father, crying out in pain as blood spurts from a fresh wound on her arm. Both she and her father have a split-second of realization as they spot a stray shard of metal sticking out of his right side, just below his broken arm stump.

Before Lily can bleed to death, Belial quickly motions with her hands to summon healing magic. She gently takes Lily's hand and smiles at her.

"Hey, Lily. Your daddy got himself banged up. Let me heal that for you."

Lily blushes. "Oh, Beli. Hi again."

"Hey." Belial says.

Beelzebub and Kiari exchange a glance. While Belial, Benjamin, and Lily continue chatting, the other two Emperors turn on their heels and stride away.

"What happened to your arm, daddy?" Lily asks, gesturing with her uninjured arm to the mechanical bits sticking out of Benjamin's stump. "That looks horrific!"

