None of the humans wanted to ally with or trust the Volgrim, but they had no choice. The Volgrim were countless epochs more advanced than humanity. If the humans and the demons holed up alone, the humans might be able to hide from the Plague long enough to build up their own form of space forces, but they didn't know how long they would be able to hide from the Archangels. Every second counted in a war of this scale.

"We must consider another angle." Linda pointed out. "Raw resources. These planets are more than just habitable surfaces for us to live upon. They also contain raw resources we can harvest to make weapons, armor, and ships for our future counter-attack against the Kolvaxians."

"A good point." Beelzebub said. "I will tell the Phoenix to travel to Sharmur post-haste, but also to search for lifeless systems along the way we might be able to sneakily add to the Cube. Even if they cannot harbor life now, the Phoenix might be able to change that, and we should at least be able to use these lumps of rock and ice for raw materials."

The other leaders nodded. They started quickly hashing out the details of this plan, but in the middle of the meeting, someone pounded on the office door. Linda let them in, and it turned out to be her assistant, Debra.

"There's been an incident!" Debra exclaimed. "Cassiel was attacked, and Soleil is missing! Cassiel is in the hospital with severe injuries."

"What! Who would dare?!" Melody asked.

"Everyone, I have to go. I'll return when I can!" Belial exclaimed.

As she got up, Melody joined her. The two of them left the room together, leaving the others to sit in stunned silence.

"Cassiel...?" Beelzebub asked.

"The angel girl. The one Jason rescued from the Labyrinth." Chadwick answered. "You weren't there for that operation, but it was an important day where we also recovered Hope Hiro from Gressil."

"Oh. I think someone did mention that before..." Beelzebub said, scratching his head. "Wait, so that means we have another angel in our midst?"

"We sure do. And she's not just any angel..." Linda said, before quietly explaining the full extent of the matter to Beelzebub.

Belial rushed to the hospital while trying not to panic. In her head, she felt that the timing of this attack was way too coincidental. How did the attacker know Belial wasn't at Cassiel's side? Was it Gressil? Was Soleil not strong enough to protect her after all?

Melody sped things up by flying at Cosmic speeds, arriving at the hospital with Belial in tow in less than ten seconds. If she wasn't worried about accidentally killing people, she could have arrived nearly instantly, but a lot of people from many different species lived in the hospital's region. Better to be safe than sorry.

Not long afterward, the two demons stepped into Cassiel's hospital room, where several doctors were standing with their hands on their hips, clearly at a loss.

"Samantha!" Doctor Fathy said, relieved to see her. "You arrived quickly. That's good. Chirrup! The patient is hiding in the corner over there. We think she's suffering a mental break right now, and we don't have the ability to restrain her."

She pointed to a corner of the room, tucked behind the hospital bed. Belial craned her neck and spotted Cassiel rocking back and forth in a corner, her pupils shrunken to pinpricks, her teeth chattering as she pressed her body against the wall. She sat in the fetal position, looking around the room in terror.

"He's here... he's here... he's watching... he's watching... don't let him come near... no, no, no don't let him come near..." Cassiel whispered under her breath. Her eyes moved at lightning speeds, looking from left to right and back to the left again. Her eyes were moving so frantically that she couldn't properly see or register the world around her.

"We tried to sedate her," Fathy explained. "But she woke up and startled us. Her biology makes her resistant to drugs meant for humans-"

"It's fine. I'm here now." Belial said. "Let me try talking to her..."

Melody stayed at the doorway. She towered over the human and monster doctors and nurses looking pensively at the angel-in-human-form. It seemed the Heaven's Shroud had continued to hide her form, even though the people present knew who she was.

Belial carefully walked over to the edge of the bed. Cassiel didn't even seem to register her presence. She instead continued to look in every direction, as if searching for ghosts... or worse.

"Cass? Cassiel?" Belial whispered. "Can you hear me? I'm going to come a little closer..."

Cassiel's teeth chattered violently. She closed her eyes and grabbed the sides of her head. "He's watching... he's here... he's watching he's here he's watching he's here... oh god oh god..."

A shiver went down Belial's spine. It didn't take a genius to figure out who Cassiel was talking about. There was only one creature that would leave her in a state like this.

Belial crouched down and moved closer. She carefully reached out and stopped just short of touching Cassiel's shoulder.

"Cass, Cass I'm here now. Are you-"

Cassiel's eyes snapped open. She suddenly realized Belial was there, and she lunged forward, wrapping her arms around Belial, shaking and trembling with incomprehensible terror. She buried her head in Belial's chest and shook like a leaf.

"He planned this- he killed her. Killed her. Killed her. She's dead. Oh god, I shouldn't- I was too weak... too weak, he killed her..."

Belial hugged Cassiel tightly. She looked around the room and tilted her head at the others.

"Everyone but Melody, leave us please."

Belial carefully mouthed a word at her without speaking.

"Gressil."

Melody's eyebrows twitched. She scanned the room with her Cosmic senses, but she didn't see anyone...

"He's... he's not here..." Belial said to Cassiel, whispering softly. "Cass, it's alright now. I'm here. I'm sorry I left you behind. I'll never do that again, okay?"

Cassiel nodded vigorously, but it was clear that she had completely collapsed back into her own world. Her panic was so palpable that it put Belial and Melody both on edge.

Cassiel carefully opened her eyes. She pulled her face away from Belial's chest, then looked up into her eyes. Her teeth were clenched so hard that her chattering had begun to transmit to the rest of her body, making her shiver and tremble even harder than before.

Slowly, she peeped to the right. She spotted Melody and seemed to look at her for an instant... then Cassiel's skin lost all its color. Her eyes moved, ever so slightly, to Melody's right.

She screamed.

"Eeeyyaahh!!!"

Cassiel dove for the corner again and covered her head with her arms.

"HE'S HERE!! HE'S HERE!! MAKE HIM LEAVE! NO, NO, NO, MAKE HIM GO MAKE HIM LEAVE MAKE HIM GO!!"

Belial's gaze whipped around the room. She spent two full seconds searching for Gressil's presence, but she didn't see him anywhere. She had no idea what Cassiel had seen, or if she had seen anything at all!

"He's not here!" Belial exclaimed, quickly getting in front of Cassiel and covering the angel's body with her own. "Cass, Cass! Calm down, there's nobody here! He's not-"

"I SEE HIM! HE'S RIGHT THEEERE!" Cassiel cried, tears pouring like a fountain. "Oh god, he's going to hurt me! He's going to take me again and hurt me and torture me I DON'T WANT TO GO!!"

Melody also scanned the room. She kept her Cosmic senses alert, but if Gressil was in the room, she could not detect him at all. She genuinely could not tell if Cassiel was hallucinating because of trauma, or if she saw an illusion of Gressil, or if he suddenly appeared for a split second when Melody and Belial's attention was focused on Cassiel. Come to think of it, Melody had never actually sensed Gressil since becoming a Demon Deity, so she didn't know if his ability to hide was stronger than her ability to sense life forms.

Was such a thing even possible? Could a Demon Emperor really possess an ability stronger than a Middle Cosmic? The very notion sounded absurd.

Belial helplessly could do nothing more than shield Cassiel's body with her own. Cassiel sobbed and cried uncontrollably. She was completely hysterical.

And so, like that, Belial only barely managed to draw out the story of what had happened over the course of an entire hour. In between cries of terror, Cassiel torturously managed to let out a little of what had happened, bit by bit, until Belial and Melody had pieced the whole story together.

Melody looked out the window. She fell into thought, her face turning into a pastiche of anger, with a feeling of betrayal running beneath the surface.

So Crow came here and attacked Cassiel because Cassiel was the one who killed Emperor Red Raven during the Energy Wars. That follows. But how did Crow learn of Cassiel's identity? It seems Vespera must have identified her! To think this is how the demons would act while speaking of 'unification' and other such glorious terms.

She turned to Belial. "I need to speak to Auger. Will you be able to stay here with her?"

Belial nodded. "With Soleil gone, Cass is completely vulnerable. I'll stay by her side 24/7 until we can find a way to keep her safe."

"Alright." Melody said, nodding her head ever so slightly. "I will return."

Melody exited the hospital room. After she departed, Belial looked around, searching for the invisible bastard who was likely skulking in the corners of her vision. A chill went down Belial's back. She had always felt assured that the combined strength of herself and Soleil would easily beat Gressil to a pulp, but she wasn't 100% certain she could defeat him alone, especially if she needed to protect Cassiel at the same time.

Worse, she now knew that Gressil could teleport himself and other entities. His powers were somewhat diverse, but also highly specialized. He could nullify her healing magic, he was strong enough to stand up to her if a fistfight broke out, he had the mobility advantage, and he could even deceive her senses with illusions.

If Gressil ever became serious about capturing Cassiel, Belial doubted she could truly stop him.

He was toying with the angel. Otherwise, why transport her to the hospital? He could have captured her right after killing Soleil! That meant he was either completely assured of nabbing her in the future, or he derived some sort of sick pleasure from her suffering.

What a bastard, Belial thought.

"Cass, you need to come with me to a safer location." Belial whispered. "The Hospital isn't secure."

"Secure??" Cassiel hissed under her breath, her heart racing. "Nowhere's secure! Don't you see?! He can be anywhere! He's here right now! Right now!! How can I go on like this?! No, god, Sam... just kill me now! Kill me and end my suffering! Please!!"

Belial's eyes hardened. "Don't talk like that. You are the last true angel. Your existence is special. If you give up now, what will Soleil's sacrifice have been for?! We need to train you to become even stronger, strong to the point that that evil bastard won't ever dare to come near you again! Strong enough that you can hunt him down, make him fear ever having crossed your path!"

Belial's powerful speech did nothing to help Cassiel's mood. In her eyes, Belial was simply naive and foolish, not comprehending the power of Cassiel's tormentor.

Become stronger than Gressil? How could that be possible. Even Melody couldn't sense that he was right there, in the room.

As Belial helped Cassiel shakily stand up, Cassiel's blood ran cold.

Gressil stood, not even three feet away, right behind Belial's back. He grinned at Cassiel, then slowly held a finger up to his mouth.

"Shhh..."

Belial never sensed a thing. She was completely clueless.

Cassiel's mind could no longer handle the trauma. She fainted from fear yet again, and the last thing she heard was Belial's cries of alarm as the ground rushed to meet her falling form...

Part 700: Unarin's Obstinance

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Noon, Volgarius.

By all accounts, Unarin was not having a good day. Or a good week, or a good month, or frankly not even a particularly good decade.

Things were not going his way. The Volgrim had all but lost their right to call themselves the galaxy's ruler. With the reveal of the Apex Cosmic known as Dolgris, it did at least seem that a chance to defeat the Plague, albeit at a high personal cost, had landed in Unarin's lap.

Naturally, Unarin was fine with not being the strongest entity in his Empire. He previously had employed Dosena as his primary enforcer, so nominally keeping his title as First Founder while 'somewhat' answering to Dolgris was just fine by him. If anything, it was a big upgrade, since Dolgris appeared to be far stronger than Dosena.

But then Auger showed up, and the news he brought was just about as bad, if not worse, than much of the already bad news Unarin had heard many times of late.

"...So, that is essentially the situation." Auger concluded, his Astral Body seated in a chair before a small round table within Unarin's Sanctum. "We are not fighting a crudely intelligent super bio-mass, but an army controlled and coordinated by Archangels Uzziel and Raphael. It is also possible the remaining Archangels may join them, perhaps willingly, or perhaps unwillingly. I daresay this changes everything."

Unarin sat on the opposite side of the table. His expression was completely neutral. He appeared as unbothered as if Auger had just told him there was a chance of rain later in the afternoon.

Unarin lifted a tasteful golden glass to his lips, one made by goblin artisans that featured a skull motif of some animal from their homeworld. He took a strangely long, silent sip of a rare wine from some unknown world while looking off into the distance.

"Hmm." Unarin grunted.

Auger stared at him for a few moments.

"Hmm? Is that all you have to say?" Auger asked. "I do not wish to press you, but time is of the essence, Unarin. We need to come up with a counter-measure for the Plague."

Unarin took another long sip of wine. He set the cup down and exhaled quietly.

"You've made one minor error in your judgment, Auger." Unarin said.

When several seconds of silence passed but Unarin didn't elaborate, Auger blinked three times. He was secretly stunned by Unarin's seeming disinterest in this new revelation.

"Then please advise me." Auger said, feeling resentful at the way Unarin was blatantly dragging out his words. "What error?"

Unarin chuckled. "This changes nothing. Not for me or the Volgrim, anyway. I already hypothesized that the Plague was being controlled by a central entity a long time ago. The thought the angels might be involved even crossed my mind, but I only thought there was a small chance of that being true. It seems even I didn't give Raphael enough credit. The old bat's schemes run deep."

"I see. But how does this 'not change anything'?" Auger asked. "It seems to me that we're about to imminently experience a complete collapse! We have to move quickly and find an exit strategy before the Kolvaxians move en-masse!"

Unarin leaned back in his chair. He sighed and looked up at the ceiling, admiring the detailed and intricate murals that had been hand-drawn by some of the finest creatures from across the galaxy. He always enjoyed looking up at them, scrutinizing their intricate linework and the depictions of various fantastical battles of fictitious and historical renown.

"Oh, Auger..." Unarin said softly. "When I say that I have long anticipated a revelation such as this, I mean that I have already factored it into my contingency plans. You may think the Volgrim Empire is helpless without our Psions, and the destruction across Volgarius certainly seems extreme, but in truth I long ago factored in the possibility of a complete collapse among the Psionic ranks. The fact Dosena still lives and will recover her power bodes well for us, and we still have a small handful of elites, such as Confessor Vulpanix."

"In truth," Unarin continued, "the current situation is better than I anticipated. Our enemy is an angel, a veritable past ally of humankind. She is vicious and unscrupulous. She is intelligent and driven by motivations of the personal kind. At the same time, her brother aims to become this galaxy's Ruler. In my eyes, he is not my enemy. I am quite fine with taking orders from Ruler Raphael. Where there is intelligence among my enemies, there is room to barter."

Auger stared at Unarin as if he were an idiot.

"Barter? What need has he to barter with the likes of you? If Uzziel infests the bodies of your people, she will gain all their knowledge and abilities! She can simply take what she wants by force!"

Unarin snapped his eyes downward to meet Auger's gaze.

"Oh really? Can she?"

Auger's words caught in his throat. He, a legendary Middle Cosmic, revered among the demons and considered a wise sage by many of his people, became dumbstruck when Unarin suddenly gave that that strange, knowing look.

"Y-yes..." Auger said hesitantly. "That's... that is the point of all this. She is taking our bodies and using them for her own gain... just look at your infested Executors!"

Unarin lifted his body up and leaned forward, resting his elbows on the table. He gave Auger a knowing smile.

"If that is the case, dear Auger, then where are the ships?"

Auger became truly tongue-tied.

"The... the ships...?" He asked, uncomprehendingly.

"Yes. The ships. The spaceships. Void-traversing weapons of war based on Volgrim design." Unarin said in a tone that was somewhat mocking of his much more powerful peer across the table. "If Uzziel can take control of all the knowledge within the heads of my people, then why hasn't she built an armada capable of traveling the stars, crushing us all under the guns of Armageddon, and rendering us too fearful to fight back? Don't tell me you haven't thought of this matter."

Auger snapped back to attention. "You assume she doesn't have them! She could be hiding millions of them across the worlds long-ago-lost to the Plague, waiting for this day to arrive!

Unarin smiled smugly. He shook his head.

"She's not. Of that, I'm certain. Either Uzziel does not wish to build ships because of some foolish aversion to technology, or she simply cannot. The first indicates another personality flaw I could use to my advantage. The second represents a core failing I will absolutely use to my advantage."

"You don't know that! You're guessing!" Auger shouted.

"Oh, but I do know it for a fact." Unarin immediately countered. "She has not built one ship across all of the worlds the Plague has taken. I can promise you this with 100% certainty."

"That's impossible. There's no way you could know." Auger repeated, more firmly than before.

Unarin shrugged. He leaned back in his chair and fanned out his finger to examine his nails.

"I have my sources. Believe what you will."

Auger scoffed. He couldn't believe what he was hearing. "You're willing to bet the future of the Volgrim, the Demons, and the Humans, as well as all the other Sentients of our galaxy, on this hunch? Even if you truly are correct, so what? Her Kolvaxians all possess the powers of Psions! They can fly through the Void unobstructed. They have bodies harder than the armor on most of your ships. They possess awe-inspiring telekinetic powers that can rip through any defense. She doesn't NEED to build machines of war!"

"Ah, you forgot a few." Unarin said casually. "She also has the powers of various Demon Emperors at her command, along with whatever abilities the angels and Archangels possess. You're not giving her enough credit."

Auger wanted to rip his hair out. "Confound you, Unarin! Even if all of that is correct… so what?! Do you really think your measly forces can offer her something she cares about? Do you think you can bedevil this monstress with that silver tongue of yours?!"

"Why not?" Unarin asked. "It seems to have worked on you."

Silence fell.

Auger stared at Unarin, his mouth half-agape. He realized he'd been verbally bested, and the damnedest thing was, he wasn't entirely certain where he went wrong!

"Do you… truly think… you can bargain your way out of this?" Auger finally asked. "Become the lapdog of some creature hellbent on devouring the galaxy?"

"Perhaps." Unarin conceded, sagging into his chair. "And if that fails, I still have a few fallback options remaining. My contingencies are not entirely used up."

A light dinged on the wall, and a soft alarm tone played once. Unarin glanced at it.

"Oh. It seems Demon Deity Melody has arrived." Unarin said. "Come in, then. Have some wine, if you like."

A phantasmal entity phased through the wall and arrived inside Unarin's Sanctum. Demon Deity Melody glowered at Auger, giving him an ugly expression filled with hate.

"Auger! You have some explaining to do!" Melody barked. "How dare you send Crow to my world to cause mayhem!"

"Crow?" Auger asked, stupefied by her unexpected verbal assault. He expected her to come here and speak of unification with Unarin, maybe change the First Founder's mind. Instead she was... throwing around strange accusations??

"What a good look of innocence!" Melody shouted, her very voice turning into a sonic attack that struck Auger's body and made his phantasmal form waver slightly. "She attacked two of the people on my world and murdered one of them! Don't tell me you don't know about this!"

Auger glanced at Unarin, then returned to his gaze to Melody. It was obvious he was completely bewildered.

Auger slowly stood up, but his body wasn't as tall or as muscular as Melody's. She was an absolutely massive woman, towering a full head over most. With his hunched posture, Auger seemed shorter than he really was, which didn't help the matter.

"Melody, there seems to have been a misunderstanding." Auger said carefully. "I swear in the name of the ancient demons that I have no knowledge of what you're talking about. Can you explain the matter to me in more detail? I promise you I would not risk a war between the demons and humans, especially after Barbatos's revelations! It doesn't benefit me at all."

"Would it benefit you if the one Crow came to kill was... the last living angel, hidden among my people?" Melody snarled.

"What? An angel?" Auger asked.

Even Unarin's eyes flickered with interest. A thought came to his mind regarding a soul stolen by Hope, the fragmented soul of Archangel Uzziel. It occurred to him now that this second soul might be living among the humans, somehow mixing in with them and secretly living an 'ordinary' life.

Could she, perhaps, be weaponized against her other self? It was a thought worth considering. But Unarin did not speak of this out loud.

"That's right. An angel!" Melody said with more righteous vigor than ever. Her aura flared to life, and her eyes lit up with power as she looked down upon the old man before her. While Auger was not exactly cowering, and he was definitely much more powerful than he seemed, it was clear that he was trying to defuse the situation rather than inflame tensions further.

"Again, Melody, I have no awareness of what you speak." Auger said. "If you would be so kind as to humor me, give me more details, I would be greatly appreciative."

In the face of Auger's relentlessly kind and servile tone, some of Melody's rage deflated. It was hard to maintain aggression in the face of calmness, so she reduced her rage to an angry glower.

"You really don't know?" Melody asked.

"I do not." Auger affirmed.

"For what it's worth, I believe Auger." Unarin chimed in. "And you should know... I'm quite good at reading people."

Melody glanced at Unarin. Her expression turned to a frown. Unarin was well-known for his ability to see through other Sentients, so she found his words believable.

"Fine! I'll explain it then!" Melody snapped, returning her attention to Auger. "A short while ago, Belial was taken to heal Barbatos. At some point, Vespera must have noticed the Heaven's Shroud concealing the angel on Sharmur, and that information was relayed to Crow, who has a long-held vendetta against this particular angel."

Auger blinked. "May I ask... who? What angel are you referring to?"

Melody hesitated. Now that it had come to this, if she didn't tell Auger the name, he would surely find out anyway. She didn't want to expose Cassiel's identity, but it seemed the time for secrecy was over.

"...We call her Cassiel." Melody said. "But you might better know her as... the Daughter of Heaven! The strongest Lazarite."

Unarin blinked. For once, he was completely surprised. He had assumed she was Uzziel, reborn through Hope Hiro's magic, but it seemed that wasn't the case.

Then, with no other choice, Melody summarized how they found Cassiel trapped inside Gressil's chambers, tortured and beaten, and had concealed her existence for years.

"Heaven's Daughter." Auger said, stroking his long white beard contemplatively. "I see. She was the one who killed Red Raven. It's only natural Crow would want to murder her. Where is Crow now? I can deliver her to you to punish her as you see fit."

Melody looked at Auger blankly. "You don't even know that much? Crow is dead. Gressil killed her!"

"WHAT?!" Auger roared, his eyes widening in shock. "Gressil did?! But he's... how strong has he become?! This is- this is simply unthinkable! I can't believe he has the guts to kill one of my minions! No, never mind that... Crow was a powerful asset to the Seven Hells. But the fact she went incommunicado like that and attacked Sharmur without my knowledge is a stain that could have ended our future alliance."

Auger quickly bent his head into a bow. "Melody, I am truly sorry for what has transpired. I did not order Crow to act, and I had no knowledge it had happened. Even if I knew the last Lazarite was with you, do you really think I would be so stupid as to endanger our friendship over one mortal angel? She is not a Cosmic, and is of no threat to me."

Melody's eyes hardened again. "You really didn't order the attack? You swear on your life? Because I am going to investigate this matter, and if I find any discrepancies, I'll rip your fucking head off!"

"I swear on the name of Satan himself." Auger said, slapping his heart loudly. "Vespera certainly has something to do with this. You should speak to her next, and I will not inform her you are coming, nor will I communicate with her in any way until you've had your say."

Melody nodded.

"Fine!"

With that, the matter was defused. Unfortunately, Soleil was dead, but so was Crow, and both sides had tragically lost a powerful champion. It seemed unlikely Melody would be able to find anyone else to punish, aside from perhaps Vespera. She would definitely have words for her later, of course.

A few minutes passed. After cooling off, Melody and Auger walked over to sit at the table with Unarin. He smiled politely at the powerful demoness.

"Wine?"

"No thanks." Melody said blandly. "My Astral Body can't exactly drink it anyway."

"Ah. A shame." Unarin said, taking a swig of it immediately after. "I'll drink extra for both of you."

Melody glanced at him, then looked at Auger.

"Actually! I didn't only come here to possibly kick Auger's ass. As it just so happens, we might have a solution to the Plague problem."

Melody waved her hand and conjured a powerful barrier around the table in the hopes of eliminating any eavesdroppers. She already knew of the existence of the Spynet Sphere, but she didn't know if Raphael or others had set up something similar elsewhere.

Then, she explained the new Cube Plan to Auger and Unarin both. This was extra convenient because they were the leaders of their respective species.

Auger's eyes lit up. "Truly? You can preserve the power of Demon Deities by placing their star systems inside the Cube? This is a most fortuitous revelation! If you can do that, we can use the Cube's time dilation to quickly build up an army and use the Volgrim's technology to create war vessels to fight the Plague. Perhaps we might even uncover a method to Ascend further and create High or Apex Cosmics!"

Unarin was not as easily impressed. "Once you start teleporting worlds inside the Cube, it won't take long for Uzziel, or more likely Raphael, to notice what you've done. The disappearance of a solar mass is quite noticeable to high level Cosmics, as their power is subtly linked to the state of their home galaxy. Even more so for a super-organism like Uzziel, whose Plague has infested so many worlds around the Milky Way."

"We know." Melody said. "We've already considered this. In the worst case scenario, we may only be able to steal a single solar system before Uzziel goes on the offensive, infesting worlds before we arrive. We'd be placing planets inside the Cube, pre-infested, allowing a future catastrophe to emerge. As such, we're thinking of only placing one star system inside."

She paused.

"As much as I would like to preserve my life and power, Sharmur may not be the ideal system. Unarin, we were thinking of putting the Volgrim home system inside the Cube."

Unarin looked at Melody. His gaze did not hold any particular interest or excitement.

"The Volgarian System?" Unarin asked. "Let me guess. Because of our powerful military might, our advanced technology, and other similar concerns?"

"Every planet in this system is highly developed, heavily populated, and worth preserving." Melody explained. "If we're going by the goal of saving as many lives as possible, your system is the obvious candidate. This, in spite of what you did to Tarus II."

She glared evenly at Unarin. In that moment, her rage was even greater than what she had shown Auger earlier. It suddenly became tempting for her to reach over and slap Unarin to death. With one quick movement, she would instantly repay the Volgrim for all the humans they had killed! The Empire would likely collapse afterward, but that was a small price to pay for-

"Don't bother." Unarin said, interrupting Melody's thoughts. "Just preserve Sharmur and some other planets if you like. The Volgarian Home System will be fine as it is now."

Melody blinked. She looked at Unarin as if he were stupid. "What? You're saying... no? Just like that? You're not even going to mull it over??"

Unarin shrugged. "We'll be fine. If anything, this new revelation about Uzziel and Raphael has been some of the better news I've heard in a while. If we were facing some malevolent super-organism hivemind, I'd be a lot more worried. But an intelligent Archangel? One with thoughts and desires I might be able to exploit? I will be content to take my chances with her."

Melody looked dumbfounded. She genuinely could not believe Unarin would give up a shot at safety and refuge in order to flip a coin by battling his enemy's psyche.

Was he prideful? Arrogant? Stupid?

Maybe he was simply built different.

Melody shook her head with disapproval, but she didn't press the matter. "Unarin, if you will not take the precaution of moving your worlds to safety, may I suggest an alternative? Send humanity as many Technopaths as you can spare. We need to educate the humans and get them up to speed on your shipbuilding practices. If you won't do this to ensure the survival of your people, at least do it to uplift others and create an additional backup plan."

Auger nodded. "A sensible choice. I don't believe technology will be of much use against the Plagueborn, but every additional brick we can lay to build a stronger future is worth pursuing."

Unarin mulled this idea over.

"Well, assuming that I make headway and convince Uzziel to let the Volgrim Empire serve as her vassal, sending you all those Technopaths would make it seem as if I'm planning to betray her."

"That's assuming she discovers this backup ploy." Auger pointed out. "You don't have to send the Technopaths now, out in the open. You could... dispatch a few smaller vessels. Put a few of your mid-grade Technopaths on board, along with a bunch of lower grade ones. It won't be as effective as nabbing a Celestial Designer to assist the humans, but the benefit will still be quite decent, and will be a lot easier to explain as a ship 'going missing in the Void'. The devils know there are Great Void Beasts out there, devouring anything they can wrap their tentacles around."

Unarin smiled faintly. "Yes, I suppose that is a bit more palatable. I'll have Randis carefully dig up some names. But do be warned; I may not even send them to you unless the talks go poorly with the Archangels."

"In the meantime, we have these 'Cybernites' that have been helping us out." Melody said. "I don't know all the details, but they seem to be rather smart."

"Oh yes, Marie Becker's creations." Unarin said, his smile turning mysterious. "Those entities are certainly more than they seem. Frankly, with them on your side, I hardly think my Technopaths will amount to much. But then again, Marie Becker is lacking when it comes to shipbuilding and military doctrines. She's much better at creating weapons of war. My Technopaths might be able to shore up the spots her drones are not as talented in."

The three leaders spent another hour hashing out all the details. Eventually, Auger took his leave, followed by Melody. They bowed their heads and departed, leaving Unarin behind.

The First Founder tapped his finger on the table.

He stared ahead at nothing in particular, thinking a million thoughts a minute.

"Is it finally time?" He wondered quietly. "Time to unleash… the Blinding Light Protocol? Let's hope it doesn't come to that. I only have enough energy to do it once… I had better make it count."

Part 701: "Too Easy"

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Weeks passed inside Aevum. These amounted to less than an hour in the outside world. All the while, Jason continued to work with Daisy's friends, improving the understanding of their abilities.

Outside, the slow march of the demons toward Mount Sinai continued. For every second that passed in Realspace, the demons drew closer and closer to beginning their assault on Sinai. The good news was, they needed time to move their troops into position and put down infernal formations capable of obscuring their numbers and army compositions.

Jason still had time to stop the war before too many died. But he wasn't bothered. Even if a million angels and a million demons died before he finally took action, it was a small price to pay. He was looking at the bigger picture.

Right now, Jason likened himself to the earlygame phase of an RTS. He had a choice. He could either quickly build up an army and begin his offensive, or play the economy game and build himself up for a stronger endgame. The choice was obvious.

No matter how brutal the war seemed to be, it wasn't at the level of existential doom and would need a long time to reach such a state. As long as the Volgrim were out there, Jason would not risk revealing his true capabilities early just to save a few million lives.

As such, it was a random Tuesday inside Aevum when Jason stood up from his seated lotus position, stretched his legs, and cracked his back. He smiled at the four spiritual incarnations surrounding him.

"Finally done." Jason said to nobody in particular.

Jason vanished from the spot. He reappeared inside a house built inside Aevum's designated residential area to the east, not far from the central Nexus Spire. Jason looked around, then frowned when he saw his father laying on a couch, a bowl of popcorn on his belly, his head turned to the side while a TV played an episode of some sitcom.

"BAHAHAHAHA!!" Hideki laughed, his roar making Jason raise an eyebrow. "Ahahaha!! Holy shit, Joey is the best!"

Jason cleared his throat. "Uh, dad-"

"Yeah yeah, I know. You're doing that MindCore operation on the angel hottie, yadda yadda." Hideki said, waving his hand to shoo his son away. "I'm sure it'll go fine. Now leave me alone, I'm watching Friends."

Jason took a few steps into the room and glanced at the TV. "Haven't you already seen every program to ever exist?"

"Nope. I didn't spend much time watching TV or movies or playing games." Hideki said. "I decided to catch up now! Don't worry, I'm sure you've got everything under control."

Jason scowled at Hideki. "Dad, come on. For the last week, you've just been sitting around, watching TV while I do all the prep work for important stuff. And when you're not watching TV, you're chasing Ose around like a lost puppy. Can't you do something useful for once?"

Hideki glared at Jason. "Kid, don't go smart-mouthing your old man. I've got things under control. I can just rewind whenever I watch an episode and start the next one. Relax, it's no big deal."

"Yeah? Then why have you been watching for a week straight?" Jason asked.

"Because it's annoying to rewind and eat the same bowl of popcorn eighty times!" Hideki fired back. "So I'll rewind ONE time and move on to the next show instead. Now fuck off and let me watch my TV in peace."

Jason sighed. His dad felt off from his usual self, but Jason didn't know why.

"Why are you suddenly being so lazy?" Jason asked, more insistently than before. "Look, dad, we still have a war to win. I can probably do it myself, but it would be helpful if you could contribute in some way. Why not help me train the new kids and Daisy, or put your future knowledge to use by passing it on to Nadia-"

Before Jason could finish his sentence, Hideki suddenly slapped the bowl of popcorn off his belly and leaped to his feet. His eyes smoldered with rage.

"Listen here, you little shithead!" Hideki shouted. "I'm not doing anything because it's not fun to do anything anymore! There's no challenge! You've made everything too easy for me! So I just sit here and watch TV because at least I find it somewhat entertaining. Got it?!"

"The fuck are you talking about?" Jason asked. "Too easy? What's too easy??"

Hideki dramatically rolled his eyes.

"You want to see? Fine. I'll show you. But only this once. Make sure you keep your eyes on me while I move around. You won't want to miss a second."

Hideki snapped his fingers. He abruptly vanished, startling Jason. After a moment, Jason also teleported away, returning to the Spynet v2, where he looked at a microscopic spy drone he had implanted into his father's right eye. Nominally, Hideki didn't know about it, but Jason assumed he did and simply didn't feel the need to say anything.

Hideki instantly arrived inside one of Jason's supposedly secret warehouses in Aevum, where he grabbed a T-REX Harness Jason had recreated. He wrapped the harness wires around his arms and clicked the lock into place behind his back, then he put a shirt on over it, activated the nanites, and armored up his body.

Nanites flooded Hideki's body, eventually covering him from head to toe. Weirdly, Hideki then grabbed his nekomimi mask and put that on over top of the faceless helmet.

Hideki teleported into the armory inside his house, where he found his rifle sitting on the wall, along with a new .44 Magnum Jason had recently made. It was, obviously, enhanced with magical principles to grant it a massively empowered damage capability, along with reductions to its kick so it wouldn't fly out of his hand when he fired it.

Hideki didn't even look at the rifle. He grabbed the magnum, then held it in his right hand with casual contempt.

After finishing his basic prep work, Hideki vanished again.

He reappeared inside Russia, right inside the office of Russia's sovereign leader. Before Vladimir had a chance to react, Cat Mask had already pulled the trigger at point-blank range, executing the man and blasting his skull into fragments, along with shattering the entire wall behind him.

Jason gasped. He didn't expect his father to move with such brutal intent!

Then Cat Mask disappeared again. He started teleporting behind several top leaders of the Kremlin, taking them out.

After wiping out Russia's entire top brass in under five minutes, Cat Mask arrived in North Korea. Their dictators fell in an equally short time.

Several cartels around the world perished over the coming minutes. Jason gazed with horror at the situation. Cat Mask was unstoppable when it came to defeating these weak, mortal humans. They were little more than sacks of meat that posed him no threat.

Then, Cat Mask switched targets. He reappeared in the vicinity of Mount Sinai, an arm's length behind Satan the Devil.

Satan instantly detected the arrival of someone behind him. He turned to look at who would dare to intrude on his presence, only for a bullet to fire into his brain and instantly kill him.

Jason stared. Killing Satan was easy, but his regeneration...

Hideki's next move completely floored Jason. He grabbed Satan's body before its headless form could even fall to the ground. Then he vanished again.

Cat Mask teleported somewhere Jason didn't immediately recognize. It was pitch black, with specks of light that barely stood out in the blackness. Then Jason saw Hideki turn to look at an ungodly massive, unthinkably huge stellar object.

It was Sol, earth's sun!

Still holding Satan's dead corpse, Hideki suddenly teleported forward three times in a row, somehow abusing the physics of the teleportations to momentarily accelerate his body to extreme speeds. He hurled Satan at the sun, then teleported away.

With Hideki gone, Jason couldn't see what happened to him, but he realized in an instant.

"Of course! If Satan can regenerate instantly, then throwing him into a star will burn him up endlessly before he can regenerate!! Why did I never think of this?!"

Jason used his Wordsmithing to look for Satan's corpse. He found it right before it fell into the sun's corona and became swallowed by the fires of a yellow star.

But Hideki didn't stop there. He popped Diablo in the head, then he teleported him into the sun too.

Lucifer came next. Then Auger...

Hideki didn't bother with any other demons beyond that. Either they were too tough for this trick to keep working, or he got bored of doing it.

It turned out that just throwing Demon Emperors into a goddamn star was a functional way of instantly killing them! What a stupid but effective strategy!

Hideki paused for a moment. He seemed to sigh about something as he looked at Mount Sinai, then he shook his head.

Jason wasn't sure what that meant. Was he implying he could kill Raphael with a similar tactic? Or was Raphael immune? Maybe Hideki just didn't want to bother with the trouble??

Hideki vanished. He didn't travel to Heaven. Instead, he suddenly appeared somewhere Jason didn't recognize at all.

It was some sort of alien... shrine? There were skulls of countless exobeasts on the wall, each of them completely unique from the ones around them. They were massive skulls, weighing tens or even hundreds of kilograms, and sometimes as big as a car!

The purple colored walls were roughly hewn and crystalline, glowing with alien energy.

Jason couldn't tell where this place was, but he figured it out when he spotted a figure seated in a lotus position less than twenty meters away from where Hideki had arrived. She was meditating atop a raised platform, and abruptly lifted her head when Hideki intruded on her Sanctum.

[Who are you?] Founder Dosena asked, her many eyes narrowing to glare daggers at the armored figure that had appeared inside her secret dimension. [I do not recognize your species.]

"Sup." Hideki said, before lifting his magnum and aiming at her head. "I'm a human."

BLAM.

The bullet fired from his magnum with enough force to punch through a bank vault. It struck an energy barrier surrounding the Second Founder and ricocheted off, then struck one of the walls before ricocheting three more times.

Eventually the room became quiet again.

Hideki stood as still as a statue, his gun continuing to aim at Dosena's head.

"That... was supposed to work." Hideki said, after ten long seconds.

[Unfortunately for you...] Dosena said, her eyes narrowing to slits, [...it did not.]

She levitated to her feet in an instant, then reached out her hand to grab hold of Hideki. She seized his body with the power of a Middle Cosmic, while Jason watched in horror.

The Wordsmith didn't know what to do! He had just seen his father execute a bunch of extremely powerful enemies in a row. Surely, he would have had a plan for arriving here! Was there a way Jason could save him?!

[It was brave of you to come here alone.] Dosena said, her voice booming with power. [Foolish, but admirable. How did you uncover the location of my Sanctum and break through its temporal defenses? As a mortal, this should not be possible.]

Hideki groaned with pain as Dosena's telekinetic energy started to bend his limbs in directions they were not supposed to bend.

"Aaaugh! I'll... I'll never... tell a fat... ugly bitch... like you!!"

The insult slid right off Dosena's back. Coming from an ant, it meant nothing to her.

[Suit yourself.] Dosena said. [In that case, I will simply obtain the answers by force.]

She reached out her other hand and sent a telepathic beam of energy firing into Hideki's head. At once, she began looking through his memories, all tens of billions of years worth of them.

A guttural scream of incomprehensibility suddenly erupted in the air as Hideki deliberately lowered his mental defenses. He greedily allowed the Second Founder to probe his mind and sent the full accumulation of information firing right back into her brain.

[AAAAARGH!!!] Dosena shrieked, as her Psionic Seed fell into chaos. She unwittingly released Hideki, then fell to her knees, grabbing the sides of her head while swaying from side to side.

At that moment, every drop of psionic energy in the air vanished. So much information had flooded into her brain that only a mental master dedicated to sorting through such vast quantities of information, specifically Solomon, could have dealt with it.

Hideki grunted. He landed in his feet, but swayed a little himself. Dosena's psionic grip had hurt him noticeably, but luckily she was taking it easy on him.

"Fucking bitch." Hideki spat, before lifting his magnum once again.

BLAM!

This time, the bullet obliterated her brain, sprayed skull fragments in a cone behind her, and left Dosena's lifeless corpse to keel over and flop to the ground.

Her suffering was over. She had been killed by a mere mortal.

Hideki rubbed his neck and scowled. "God, that hurt like hell. What a cunt. She just had to wrench me around, huh?"

He sighed again. Then he vanished from the spot.

All the while, Jason gaped like an idiot at the monitor displaying the feat his father had just accomplished. He had already thought executing multiple Demon Emperors and most of Earth's despots in minutes was a feat beyond comprehension... but killing a Middle Cosmic? How was that even possible?!

The next thing Jason saw when his father reappeared was the back of a familiar head.

Unarin, seated inside his Sanctum, stirred when he sensed a presence materialize behind himself.

He turned around to see an armored bipedal soldier wearing a strange mask on top of his helmet. The soldier was armed with a small handheld weapon of some sort, but he wasn't pointing it at Unarin.

Unarin stood up and turned to face the intruder.

For thirty long seconds, the two of them simply stood and stared at once another.

"...So it was you." Unarin said, his expression emotionless. "You killed Dosena."

Naturally, Unarin had sensed her presence disappear. He had known Dosena for so long that her aura was utterly unmistakable. When it disappeared, that usually signified that she had left Volgarius. But since she would usually inform Unarin of her coming and going, and since this strange soldier had just appeared, it was easy to put two and two together.

"You're dangerous." Hideki said. "Of the many entities living in this galaxy, you're one of the precious few I have the least confidence in killing."

Unarin linked his hands behind his back. He tilted his chin up to look down the bridge of his nose at Cat Mask.

"I am unarmed and defenseless. What are you implying? That I have some way to take down someone who has killed my most powerful defender? If you have killed Dosena, then it is clear I am about to die."

Hideki snorted.

"Unlikely."

The two men once again fell into silence.

After a few long moments, Hideki shrugged.

"It doesn't matter. I've made my point."

"And what point would that be?" Unarin asked.

But Cat Mask did not answer. He simply vanished from sight, and Unarin raised an eyebrow.

"...What an interesting creature."

He didn't seem to care at all that Dosena had been murdered, removing the Volgrim's mightiest defender from the equation.

It was as if her life never truly mattered to him.

Hideki reappeared inside his room back in Aevum. Jason materialized in front of him only two seconds later, as Hideki started pulling off his nekomimi mask.

"Dad! Holy shit!" Jason exclaimed. "You just... what did you even do?! You've neutered the Volgrim and made them way less threatening, plus you took out the demon leadership... have you been able to do that this whole time?!"

Hideki deactivated the T-REX, and after it was gone, he flopped on the couch and groaned in pain.

"Yeah... since you gave me all these abilities, anyway. You really don't understand just what a Rewinder can do with teleportation alone, kid. Though I will admit the other abilities and enhanced weapons help a lot."

Jason felt the blood drain from his face. "You're like... like a one-man army! I still can't believe it! I think I'm in shock!"

"Yeah, yeah. Mind handing me an ice-pack or something?" Hideki grunted. "My... everything... is killing me."

Jason slapped his own forehead. "Heal! There, feeling better?"

"Yeah. Wow, sometimes I forget you can do stuff like that." Hideki said with a chuckle. His body felt as good as new.

A short silence followed.

"So... what do we do now?" Jason asked. "You've completely changed the course of the coming war."

"I don't know. Don't really care, either." Hideki said, choosing to lay back on the couch. "It's all too easy now. If I had these abilities the first time around, you wouldn't have even needed to go in the cryopod in the first place. Just leave me alone and let me watch my TV now."

Jason nodded. He smiled at his father. "Yeah, sure thing, dad. It seems I still have a long way to go as a Hero. You've truly opened my eyes today."

Jason sighed one last time, then he vanished.

A few minutes later, he reappeared, a look of deep concern on his face.

"Uh... dad?"

"Yes?" Hideki asked.

"It's... Diablo." Jason said quietly. "He just transformed into the Archdemon. Killing him in the sun only made him assume his ultimate form. Also, Satan regenerated enough times to break free of the sun. They're both... coming back to Earth."

Father and son looked at each other.

"...I didn't know Diablo could do that." Hideki said. "The fuck is an 'Archdemon'?"

"A really powerful Cosmic form that can flatten planets, regenerate from nearly any injury, and is as big as a skyscraper." Jason replied.

"Oh." Hideki grunted.

Another minute passed.

"So... what are we gonna do?" Jason asked.

Hideki dramatically rolled his eyes. "For fuck's sake. There's always something. You know what? Killing Lucifer was a bad idea anyway, because then it'd just piss Ose off and make it harder for me to woo her. You're on your own, kid."

"On my own?" Jason asked.

But before he could get a response, his dad's body blurred, and time began to rewind...

Jason threw his arms up in the air and scowled at his father.

"Why are you suddenly being so lazy?" Jason asked, more insistently than before. "Look, dad, we still have a war to win. I can probably do it myself, but it would be helpful if you could contribute in some way. Why not help me train the new kids and Daisy, or put your future knowledge to use by passing it on to Nadia-"

Before Jason could finish his sentence, Hideki suddenly slapped the bowl of popcorn off his belly and leaped to his feet. His eyes smoldered with rage.

"Listen here, you little shithead!" Hideki shouted. "I'm not doing anything because it's not fun to do anything anymore! There's no challenge! You've made everything too easy for me! So I just sit here and watch TV because at least I find it somewhat entertaining. Got it?!"

"The fuck are you talking about?" Jason asked. "Too easy? What's too easy??"

Hideki paused. He breathed in and out a few times, glaring daggers at his son.

Then, his body blurred.

All the anger on his face abruptly disappeared. He shrugged at Jason.

"Eh. You wouldn't get it even if I told you."

Hideki looked around the room at his spilled popcorn. Great, now he'd have to cook some more.

He grabbed the bowl and wandered into the kitchen while Jason followed him, steam metaphorically coming out of his ears.

"Dad! What does that MEAN?!"

"You'll figure out your own solution eventually." Hideki said, as he prepared to cook himself more popcorn. "Now piss off, will ya? I wanna watch my sitcoms."

Jason groaned. "FINE! Be lazy, then. I'm off to operate on Catherine."

"Sure, sure." Hideki said. He didn't even turn to look when Jason disappeared.

A few minutes later, Hideki plunked back on the couch with a new bowl of popcorn. He completely ignored the rest of the popcorn he'd thrown all over the floor earlier.

"Ahahaha! I fucking love you, Chandler!"

Part 702: Mentally Corrupted MindCore

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Inside a specially created operation chamber deep within Aevum's confines, Catherine D'arc sat in a comfortable chair beside the operating table. She stared at Jason expectantly as he manipulated a magical holographic interface. Dozens of tiny little dots were placed all over Catherine's face and head. These dots were magical nodes used to read and scan her brain activity in real-time, and Jason used them to carefully integrate his newest v3 Mindcore into the simulated representation of Catherine's Mind Realm.

After several hours of preparation, Jason was finally done. Catherine looked at the holographic brain floating in midair, but she couldn't perceive anything about it that was different from any other brain. She wasn't a brain surgeon and had little knowledge of how they worked. In her eyes, a brain was a brain.

As for a Mind Realm, she was only slightly less ignorant. Raphael had taught her how to manifest blueprints and diagrams inside hers and then take them out in the middle of combat to swiftly summon armor and other things, but she only knew how to follow his directions and improve its functions a little bit over a long period of time. She was far from an expert.

"The prep work is done." Jason said, wiping sweat from his forehead. He gave Catherine a solemn look. "Are you sure you want to do this? Remember that you're the first person who I've ever operated on. I don't know if the Mindcore will kill you, or if it will be successful. I'm 90% confident the outcome will be extremely positive, but there's a one in ten chance things might go poorly. So… are you sure?"

Catherine was surprisingly calm, despite the fact she was about to put her life in the hands of a stranger. She'd spent a few weeks inside Aevum, getting to know Jason, but all she truly had to go off was her gut instinct about him. She didn't sense any hostility, only hesitation and worry. It was clear Jason was afraid of what he might do to her.

He cared. He had lost someone important to himself in the past, and that colored his view of the world.

Catherine knew that feeling well. She had also lost someone precious to her.

"I trust you." Catherine said quietly, meeting his gaze with her own.

Her eyes were soft and warm. She seemed not to suspect his motives at all, as if she were a naive child. But the truth was, she had already thought of the consequences and made her decision days ago. Short of a sudden look of malice or evil cackling erupting from Jason's mouth, she believed he was a good person who would do his best to improve her capabilities.

And if she died? That was okay. He had already told her the war was originally lost. Her death wouldn't make a material difference.

She was somewhat daring, in that regard. She liked to take big bets with her own life. Perhaps if she had been born and raised in the modern era, she might have grown up to be a daredevil stunt biker or a high stakes poker player.

Who could say?

"Alright. Ah, so if you take a seat on the operating chair, I'll get to work. Um, I think I should restrain you, just in case. But if you're not comfortable with that... I guess I can try to work around it." Jason said.

Jason couldn't help himself. The 'Cassiel' he knew was a victim of Gressil's torture and rape and other godawful acts for 100,000 years. That Cassiel would be horrified or go insane if he mentioned restraints. Even suggesting such a thing made him feel a little ill.

But the woman in front of him now was not 'Cassiel'. She was Catherine, a warrior who had never known fear. She was extremely brave, and as such, she only thought the hitch in his throat when he said 'restraint' was simply a bit of awkwardness.

"That's fine. I don't want to lash out by accident. It could affect the surgery, and also... I simply don't want to hurt you." Catherine said.

Jason smiled, but he still felt awkward. When Catherine climbed into the medical chair, he restrained her wrists and ankles with Wordsmithium, but made sure not to tighten the restraints too much. She could still slip out if she tried.

"Don't forget my wings." Catherine pointed out. "You'd be surprised how much damage they can do."

"Oh. yeah, of course." Jason said, laughing in a weird tone.

He thus restrained her wings, then wrapped a band around her forehead, locking her in place.

After a moment, the two of them fell silent, with Catherine looking up at Doctor Jason with a slight smile on her face.

"What is it?" Jason asked. "Is something funny?"

"Oh, no, not exactly. It's just… you look like a kid who got caught with his hand in the cookie jar." Catherine laughed. "Plus, you keep giving me these strange looks."

Jason hesitated. He looked off to the side and rubbed his arm.

"You… you sort of resemble my wife. Phoebe. She had white hair like you. But she… she died. And, I feel that it was my fault."

Catherine remained silent. This prompted Jason to add more details.

"I don't really know what killed her. It happened in the future I came from. But I still feel it was somehow… my fault. So, I'm worried I'll… I'll screw up again. And hurt you like I hurt her."

Jason rubbed his hands together apprehensively as he met Catherine's gaze.

"I don't think I could live with myself if that happened." He concluded.

"Well, you'd better do a good job, then." Catherine said. "I'm counting on you."

"Right." Jason muttered.

The Wordsmith inhaled, then exhaled. While this operation was going, he had returned all his Dronesmiths to Aevum and reintegrated their soul splinters back into his own soul, since he would want 100% of his mental focus. He had informed Daisy, and she decided not to tell her friends.

The time was ripe.

After steadying himself for a short minute, Jason uttered his first Word of Power.

"Focus."

Immediately, his mind sharpened. All other tasks vanished from thought. He stopped thinking about the demons, the Volgrim, his worries about the past, or even the existence of his father and daughter.

Only Catherine's life mattered. He had to do right by her.

Jason walked behind Catherine's operation chair and leaned forward, his head hovering upside-down above hers. He pressed one palm on each side of her head, covering her ears. Patterns behind to emerge in his mind's eye.

"Transpose. Sublimate. Review."

Jason peered into the depths of Catherine's Mind Realm. What he found was a somewhat barren wasteland made of clouds. Scattered around this cloudy world, there were hundreds of small crystals levitating a few feet off the ground, each one containing a blueprint Catherine had made over the years.

"Gather. Store."

Jason collected these blueprints, taking them from Catherine's Mind Realm into his own. At this point, he had stolen all her life's work. If her left her like this, he would have robbed her of hundreds of years worth of hard work!

But of course, he would return these memory fragments later. The first thing he had to do was remake her Mind Realm anew.

"Purge."

With one Word of Power, Jason send a powerful wave of magic across Catherine's Mind Realm, obliterating the heavenly clouds that composited her soul's powers. Catherine flinched on the chair and gasped, letting out a squeak of pain as the horrible torment ripped a part of herself away.

"I'm sorry." Jason said, his voice somewhat monotone. "Please bear with it. It only gets worse from here."

Jason bit his lower lip. He had no choice but to persevere now.

"Scour." Jason said, sending another wave of magic to rip across Catherine's Mind Realm.

Her entire body jolted as he tore up even the small remaining fragments of her Mind Realm, breaking down the 'bedrock' of who she was. Catherine's eyes watered, and she let out a yelp of pain. It was fortunate that Jason had bound her forehead in place, or she might have jumped out of his grasp involuntarily.

Jason hesitated. He knew this was going to hurt, but it seemed like her tolerance for pain was far lower than his. Was it because she hadn't experienced the kind of pain he had?

For a brief instant, Jason remembered what he had gone through in his hundreds of years of life. He had once used a Word of Power to accelerate his body, only to crash against a wall and nearly kill himself on the spot.

He had been left paralyzed by the Black Witch, his throat cut, a feeling of hopelessness draped over his inner self.

He had suffered multiple agonizing defeats to various demons, and the emotional pain inflicted when his daughter and wife died was just as torturous.

But, in kind, those bouts of suffering had hardened his resolve and made it so he was able to push through Mildred's surgery! Pain was always awful to experience, and trauma was not something anyone wished to suffer from, but what did not kill a man tended to make him stronger.

Perhaps Catherine had not endured such torment. If this were the Cassiel of the future, he had no doubt she would prove much hardier...

"Go on..." Catherine coughed. "I'm fine. I am... fine..."

Her eyes teared up from the pain, but Catherine steeled her resolve. She sensed that Jason had stopped because of her screams, but she didn't even mean to do such a thing. They were completely involuntary.

Jason continued to hesitate. He looked at Catherine and felt a mixture of pity and worry.

This was only the initial stages of the surgery. The next ones were going to be far, far more agonizing...

But then, a lightbulb seemed to pop up over Jason's head.

"Examine." Jason said.

He quickly focused on Catherine's cerebral composition. He focused on the part of her brain that processed pain...

"Reroute."

He completely shifted the pathways so that instead of pain, all those electrical signals would, at least temporarily, alter course and travel to her pleasure centers.

"I'm going to continue." Jason said. "This next part... might be a little weird. I apologize in advance if it doesn't work."

He swallowed heavily. Then he spoke a Word of Power.

"Reform."

At once, a rocky ground emerged inside Catherine's mind, a planet-shaped asteroid that began growing to the size of a moon, and then a planet.

Catherine yelped again, but this time, her tone was one of confusion. She had tensed up, expecting another burst of agony, but instead, her body heated up, and endorphins started to flood her thoughts.

"Ahh! Nnn, ahh..."

She made a series of very strange noises that, frankly, made Jason feel equally strange. They were... erotic, to say the least.

Jason blinked. He looked down at Catherine's face, and she was blushing so hard that her entire face had turned pink.

"Sorry!" Jason said. "Just bear with it. Enrich!"

The rocky world Jason had made suddenly changed composition. Leylines similar to those used on Aevum sprouted from a designated point and rapidly wrapped around the planet, causing Catherine's magical energy to spread throughout it. Jason had hardly done anything, and already he had boosted the raw and unrefined 'power' of Catherine's Mind Realm twofold. If he stopped the operation right here, she would surely be able to think twice as fast as before, especially when it came to harnessing her magical powers.

He had no intention of stopping early, though. This was only the beginning.

Jason began speaking more and more Words of Power. Catherine's cries became more and more intense as he summoned Titan-like architecture inside her Mind Realm, summoning mountains, palaces, and other giant living spaces that each housed unique artifacts he had made earlier that week.

Catherine pressed her knees together. Her wrists struggled within the restraints, and she felt she was going absolutely mad with lust. The operation had become unbearably pleasurous, to the point she felt like a feral cat in heat. The worst part was, she was completely aware of her surroundings, and she knew these feelings were fake, but she couldn't control herself at all.

Those feelings were nominally better than suffering the raw agony from before, but they were excruciating in their own way too!

"Ahh! Nnngh, aaiieh!" Catherine cried.

"We've barely even started! You have to hold on!" Jason said.

Ten minutes passed. An hour.

Five hours later, Catherine was sobbing uncontrollably from the pleasure. It felt like she had been locked inside a star, its heat burning her clothes and skin and muscles and bones, but with lust instead of pain. She felt that if the ugliest man in the world presented himself, she could jump his bones for the next year straight. Electrical pulses surged through her body, making her chest rise and fall as she swallowed stuttering breaths and her eyes spun in circles.

As for Jason, the operation was going better than he expected. Catherine was in no danger of dying, but her erotic moans were definitely doing something weird to him as well. He continually had to remind himself that she was not his wife and he had no interest, but he really couldn't help feeling maybe he had a little interest.

Only to then metaphorically slap himself silly. She was his patient, nothing more.

After those five long hours had passed, Jason finally finished his work. He summoned a crystal in the void above the world he had crafted inside Catherine's Mind Realm. This crystal performed a great many functions, but the most important one was allowing her to create duplicate holo-worlds inside of her Mind Realm, each one using quantum mechanics to somehow exist inside a separate dimensional space without requiring any extra room!

Jason blinked his eyes. His body felt heavy from exhaustion, as he had completely drained himself during these last few hours.

Catherine wasn't much better off. Her entire body had completely soaked her clothes with sweat. Her angelic robes had turned nearly transparent, giving Jason an eyeful of sights he really couldn't afford to see right now.

And so, after stabilizing her RealitySim v3, Jason staggered backward a few steps and slumped against the wall. He breathed raggedly, while allowing Catherine to slowly regulate her breathing again. With the operation over, Catherine was finally able to begin a slow return to sanity, though her mind was filled with all kinds of lurid, regretful, extremely embarrassing thoughts.

She had always been raised to see herself as a Lazarite above the common rabble. Her heart had never belonged to anyone. But now she wasn't sure what she felt. It seemed as if the operation had turned her into a harlot consumed by desire. She felt ashamed, even despite knowing these feelings were forced and unnatural.

As Catherine laid on her back, breathing heavily and perspiring, her clothes stuck to her body as if there were tree sap slathered between the two. She wiggled around a little, but couldn't escape the restraints. When Jason walked over, she blushed madly, suddenly feeling she was in a vulnerable position. It seemed to her as if he was about to reach out and grope her while she was helpless.

Jason stopped. He looked at her, then coughed.

"Are you... feeling okay?"

"I'm f-fine..." Catherine said, shuddering under his gaze. "If the operation is done... p-please release me now."

"Of course." Jason whispered.

He waved his hand. "Remove."

The shackles binding her to the operation chair vanished. Catherine quickly sat up and covered her chest with her hands, but then a bout of wooziness struck her. She nearly fell off the opposite side of the chair and had to seize hold of its arms to steady herself.

Jason stepped forward and grabbed her shoulder. "Easy there. Don't fall. Are you really okay?"

She shuddered at his touch. The procedure was over, but all those strange feelings continued to linger. She pulled away, then climbed off the opposite side of the chair to get away from him and swayed on her feet when she stood.

With a bit of distance between herself and Jason, Catherine suddenly felt something was different about her eyes. Or perhaps it wasn't her eyes, but her brain. Her Mind Realm.

The way she looked at the world had shifted drastically. She could see lines of energy passing around the walls. The Leylines Jason had fed into the room to speed up the operation had been hidden from her before, but with her Mind Realm attuned to Titan architecture, anything comprised of such principles were laid bare before her.

Jason remained silent. He watched as Catherine's eyes darted around. The color of her skin had mostly returned to normal, and it was obvious at a glance that she was now finally experiencing the wonders of her MindCore. He even felt a little jealous, because his was only a v1, but hers was a v3.

v3 was much more compact, energy efficient, effective at its functionality, and easier to install then the previous iterations. Even if he hadn't turned her pain to pleasure, it was much less likely she would die on the operating chair than when he nearly did. But still, he didn't regret what he had done.

Hopefully, she wouldn't resent him for it...

"Catherine." Jason said.

She flinched, not expecting him to speak. Catherine returned to reality and looked at Jason like a deer frozen in the headlights.

"I need to switch your brain back to... to switch it from pleasure back to pain." Jason explained lamely. "It doesn't have to be right now. Just at some point before you leave."

"Is... is that why I felt... so strange during the operation?" Catherine whispered.

"Yes. Sorry I didn't explain it before." Jason said. "I just figured it would be better than experiencing the agony of having your soul ripped apart and stitched together again."

He paused.

"Do you want any food? Water? Anything like that?"

Catherine looked down at her body. She blushed.

"A shower... would be nice."

"Right!" Jason exclaimed. "I could use my magic to clean you up. It would only take a secon-"

"No, no, thank you!" Catherine quickly interrupted. "A shower. Please."

Jason swallowed the other words he was planning to say. It was clear to him that she had been thoroughly embarrassed and didn't quite feel comfortable in his presence anymore.

"Give me a minute. I'll create one over there." Jason said, gesturing to the wall behind her.

He did a bit of Wordsmithing and summoned a private bathroom for her, even conjuring various perfumes, shampoos, towels, and other essentials from a random grocery store on Earth. He created a duplicate of her clothes, nice and clean, then left them in the bathroom.

"Have at it." Jason said, before turning to walk away.

"Wait!" Catherine said, causing Jason to pause.

He turned to look at her.

"Yes?" Jason asked, raising an eyebrow.

"Um." Catherine grunted. "I'm sorry. I must seem ungrateful to you. But I'm not. I'm... extremely happy. This new MindCore is... it's incredible. I just, I don't know how to feel right now, and my head is all mixed up, and..."

She trailed off, uncertain what to add.

"I get it." Jason said with a smile. "You're welcome. If you want, I can erase your memory of the procedure. Maybe then things won't feel so awkward between us."

Catherine accidentally giggled, revealing a pure and beautiful smile different from before. "No, no, that won't be necessary. A little awkwardness isn't exactly... bad. Is it?"

"By no means." Jason replied.

He turned and headed out of the room, only pausing to throw out one last line.

"Rest up. We'll meet tomorrow and see what your new MindCore can do."

Catherine nodded vigorously. "Okay! Thank you, Jason! Thank you..."

The door closed behind him, leaving Catherine alone in the hospital room. She stared forward, her mind in a daze.

"Was he always so handsome...?" She muttered to herself, while biting the tip of her thumb.

Part 703: RealitySim Online

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

It was Wednesday morning when Catherine woke up. As a Lazarite, she didn't need to sleep, but the MindCore operation had wiped out her mental resilience. After blearily showering in a fugue state, she collapsed face-first onto the bed in the bedroom Jason had made for her, adjoining the operating room, and fell fast asleep. When she woke up, there was a thick layer of drool on her pillow, which was incredibly mortifying for a dignified woman like herself.

Catherine carefully sat up on the bed. Despite more than 12 hours of sleep, she still felt somewhat tired. It was as if her mind was being slowed down by something, and that 'something' was clearly her MindCore. The problem was, she had no idea why.

Catherine unsteadily stood up. She leaned against the wall and walked along its edge toward the door. When she opened the door into the operating room, she found it was empty.

"Jas...on?" Catherine asked hesitantly.

Five seconds later, Jason appeared in his actual body, not a Dronesmith. The moment he saw her, Jason raised an eyebrow.

"Are you okay?"

Catherine shook her head. "Something's wrong. I feel dizzy and sleepy, but I don't usually- ah!"

She suddenly stumbled forward, collapsing into Jason's arms. For the briefest moment, both of them fell completely silent, feeling incredibly awkward, albeit for different reasons.

Jason helped her to a standing position and ushered her over to the operation chair. She sank into it, shuddering at the fact she'd been helpless once again. It was a good thing he hadn't taken advantage of her, or she didn't know how she would live with herself.

Jason, meanwhile, had zero intention of doing such a thing. He simply assumed that she was a prim and proper woman who didn't like being touched, so every time it happened he felt a flash of guilt. As such, he quickly buried their interaction and forced a smile.

"I need to examine your MindCore. I probably overtuned the power consumption, so this should be a minor fix." Jason said.

Catherine nodded and looked away. She kept blushing, but she had no idea why. It was a maddening experience, and she felt like an idiot for being unable to understand her thoughts. She was extremely inexperienced when it came to worldly matters. Raphael had sheltered her for her entire life, and never had it been more apparent than now.

Jason used a Word of Power to examine Catherine's mind. What he found surprised him.

"Oh! I really screwed up. Good thing we caught this before you left or you probably would have... uh... let's not go into detail."

"What happened?" Catherine asked quietly.

Jason didn't respond at first. He instead focused on fixing the error, which thus allowed Catherine's mind to clear up.

Then, he leaned back and sighed with relief.

"Basically, your RealitySim can... simulate realities. Obviously. The problem is, when you fell asleep, all your dreams started being simulated, and due to the transient nature of dreams, you were creating one simulation after another, drastically overdrawing on your Faith Energy. If that had kept up, with you not being in Heaven where such energy is abundant and all..."

"I would have died." Catherine replied.

"You would have lasted a day or two in Aevum, maybe a few weeks if you returned to Heaven." Jason clarified. "Ultimately, you would have sucked all of Heaven's energy into yourself and maybe exterminated all of angelkind!"

Catherine's face blanched. She looked horrified by the possibility.

"W-why?!" She gasped. "Why would that happen??"

"Because." Jason answered. "Your MindCore simulates realities. Think about it. That can devour a lot of energy. If you attempted to simulate the existence of the entire universe, you would die on the spot. Simulating a planet is going to be quite taxing, a city will be a little draining, and a singular fight or small-scale instance won't be any trouble. Since dream worlds can be vast or small, but ultimately random in nature, it definitely would have led to a bad ending."

Catherine calmed down. Jason's words were alarming, but now that she knew the risks, she could mitigate them by taking precautions.

"So what next?" Catherine asked. "How do I use my MindCore? Without killing myself, of course."

"You do it by taking small steps to acclimate your Inner World to the rest of your body." Jason said. "As you continue to simulate more and more realities, the efficiency and power drain will drop exponentially. You will be able to speed those simulations up faster and faster, allowing you to make great gains beyond your wildest dreams."

Jason waved his hand. "Here, I've been holding onto your original mental blueprints. Have them back. Return."

By uttering a Word of Power, Jason sent hundreds of Blueprints Catherine had made over the course of her life back to her. Without them, she would have to construct each blueprint one by one. It wasn't as if she had forgotten the knowledge, but storing a 'hard file' inside her Mind Realm was far more effective than relying on her flawed biological brain's memory, with all its hallucinations and lapses in judgment.

Catherine looked within her Mind Realm. She felt awed by the giant planet filled with strange technology, magical artifacts, and other bizarre constructs Jason had implanted. Truth be told, if Jason had opted to subvert her Mind Realm and enslave her with some secret backdoor, she would be completely at his mercy. Inviting one's brain or Mind Realm for another to tamper with was extremely dangerous, as Raphael had told her many times.

She had no idea why she ultimately decided to trust Jason. Maybe it was because he was a Hero, like Joan. Catherine wasn't certain.

"I'd like to send my soul into your Mind Realm to show you around. Would that be okay with you?" Jason asked.

Catherine rubbed her hands together. "Of... course. You made my MindCore, after all."

"Don't feel that you owe me, or anyone, the right to enter your Mind Realm." Jason said, a tone of warning in his voice. "I cannot force my way in anymore. Your MindCore is so advanced that if you reject my soul, you could cause me serious injury, or even kill me. If you're not 100% certain, you should tell me now."

Catherine's heart jumped. She felt that Jason was telling the truth, and the fact that he was putting himself in harm's way made her heart race for reasons she couldn't understand.

"No, I won't reject you." Catherine vowed. "Please show me how my MindCore works, Jason. I want to become powerful."

Jason smiled. "Alright. Let's both close our eyes and I'll transfer my soul."

And so they did. Man and woman closed their eyes and bowed their heads as if praying. Jason muttered a Word of Power.

"Manifest."

His soul emerged from his body and floated toward Catherine. He slipped into her glabella, then arrived inside her Mind Realm without any issues. He felt surprised, expecting at least a little resistance, but it seemed Catherine had grown to fully trust him.

Catherine's soul also manifested inside her Mind Realm. She arrived standing beside Jason inside a massive stone temple with five-hundred-foot high walls, towering pillars that seemed to hold up the heavens, and statues of various Titans from across history lining the side walls. Catherine didn't even recognize some of them, but Jason knew their identities due to Solomon's visions of the Ancient Era.

"When I created your MindCore, I didn't name any of the regions or areas or major sites." Jason said, gesturing around. "It's up to you if you want to call them by any specific names."

Catherine gazed up at the gigantic statues with a feeling of awe. The craftsmanship was exquisite. She felt that if she studied them, she could make constructs capable of mimicking the depicted Titans' might.

"Who are all these Titans?" Catherine eventually asked.

"That small one over there is Hercules. He passed down the original Heroic Aura to Jepthath." Jason said, pointing to the smallest pair of statues near the entrance. "The woman beside him was his wife, Megara."

"Ah, and there's Zeus, not too far up the hill." Catherine acknowledged, nodding her head toward the Titan King's visage. "He is the current King of Titans... but who are all these others?"

Jason led her to a vast hall with seats and tables that made the two humans look like ants. Far above, there were statues of Primordial Titans, their faces completely foreign to Catherine.

"At the head of the table is Odin, the Allmother." Jason said. "As far as I know, she was the oldest and most powerful of Titans. Did Raphael ever tell you about her?"

Catherine slowly shook her head. "We did not speak about Titans often, though I have met several over the centuries when I traveled alongside Raphael to broaden my horizons. I have even spoken to Zeus and Neptune in person."

Jason looked at her in surprise. "Neptune is alive? I thought he died during the Ancient Era."

"By no means." Catherine replied. "He has ruled Atlantis for several thousand years. What made you think he was dead?"

Jason scratched his chin. He remembered seeing the Archdemon crush Neptune's bones during the final battle, and assumed Neptune had died during Heaven's explosion.

"I guess the guy who told me got it wrong." Jason said with a shrug. He pointed at a female Titan, smaller than the others at the table. "And that one there, she is Ivaldi. Do you know her?"

When Catherine shook her head, Jason chuckled. "It seems Raphael doesn't educate you as well as I expected. Ivaldi was key in defeating the Archdemon during the War in Heaven. Her light magic nearly defeated the demons, and she was so powerful that the demons only won with a final hat trick by Satan."

Catherine looked at Jason in confusion. "What is an Archdemon? It sounds most ominous..."

Jason felt equally bewildered. "Seriously, for being Raphael's protege, he doesn't seem to tell you much of anything! Has he even mentioned the Ancient Era, the War in Heaven, or anything from around that period?"

"It simply... never came up." Catherine replied, though her tone quieted a little. Now that Jason mentioned it, it was a little strange how he hadn't mentioned matters of such grave importance. "I was always focused on improving my control over my Lazarite powers, so I didn't have much interest in history."

Jason gave her a strange look. "No interest in history? Catherine... are you lying to me?"

Catherine blushed. She quickly averted her eyes. "N-no. It just wasn't all that interesting... before now."

Jason fell silent. He realized Catherine was lying because her attitude was not one of someone uninterested in history. Who in her position wouldn't want to know about something as scary and awe-inspiring as the Archdemon? Who wouldn't want to hear tales of ancient battles and badass matchups between good and bad guys alike?

Raphael had clearly kept her in the dark for his own purposes, and Jason didn't like the idea of that. It would be best if he could slowly drip-feed information that changed Catherine's core beliefs and moved her away from the serpent manipulating her in the background.

"Well," Jason said, changing the subject, "this Hall of Titan Gods isn't only here for ornamental purposes. Titan King Odin's statue is actually a grand artifact that you can use to channel the full power of your MindCore. Let's try it out!"

Jason explained what Catherine needed to do, and she listened intently. He wasn't an expert on how things would actually work, but he knew the theory behind his design decisions.

After thirty minutes, Catherine readied herself. She activated Odin's statue and created a new world simulation!

Just like that, Catherine and Jason vanished and reappeared inside a simple white space. It was completely featureless, except for the squares that comprised the 'tiles' below their feet. Black lines forming those squares seemed to stretch out to infinity in every direction.

"Let's do a basic simulation." Jason said. "Remember when you fought Lucifer? Try creating a simulation of her physical appearance, strength, and powers."

Catherine nodded slowly. "Okay, I'll try. I don't really get the details, but it must be doable."

"I believe in you." Jason said with a smile.

Catherine tried not to let his smile distract her. She looked away, then focused her mind.

And then, just like that, Lucifer appeared. She stood completely still, staring vacantly at Jason and Catherine like a mindless robot.

"Next, make a simulation of yourself." Jason said.

Catherine nodded. A copy of herself appeared beside Lucifer.

"Alter Lucifer's simulation so that she acts like her real self. It doesn't have to be perfect, since you can't know everyone's inner self, but it can be close enough." Jason instructed. "Next, reorient Catherine-clone and Lucifer-clone so that they're facing each other. Then, have them fight."

Catherine followed along with Jason's commands. Soon, her other self and Lucifer's copy began to brawl. But it wasn't long before Lucifer blasted Catherine-clone to bits, killing her on the spot.

Shockingly, Catherine-clone bizarrely kept fighting! Even though her limbs were blown apart, they levitated in the air and continued to fight.

"Why... what... how is that happening?" Catherine asked, confused.

"This is a simulation of reality. You have to dictate how realistic the simulation is." Jason explained. "Your clone doesn't know what 'dying' means because you haven't programmed the basic laws of nature into your reality. Luckily for you, I already programmed a fairly precise representation of physics into your MindCore. Just check on Sub-node 115-A and toggle it to 'True'."

An hour later, Jason had helped Catherine create a lush jungle and valley with rising mountains, where her copy and Lucifer could run, jump, and fly around, chasing and fighting one another.

Every time Catherine-clone clashed with Lucifer-clone, Catherine lost. Lucifer was far too powerful, and Catherine couldn't get an edge.

"Why am I not able to learn from what's happening?" Catherine eventually asked. "Didn't you say I could make these simulations train me to be stronger?"

"You can't yet because you haven't set up a neural feedback loop." Jason explained. "You aren't able to learn from your clone or anything else until you code your MindCore to reboot once in a while and transfer the knowledge gained from the simulations back to your brain. But be careful! You don't want to transfer a bunch of garbage data; only the pertinent stuff. Otherwise, you might download eight million thoughts from the fish in that lake over there."

Catherine laughed. "Hahaha! I've always wondered what it would be like to be a fish! Glub glub!"

Jason smiled back. She rarely laughed, but when she did, he couldn't help but find himself attracted to her.

After a moment, he quickly cleared his throat and steeled his mind, returning to a serious expression.

"The next step is to make a simulated version of yourself that oversees these simulations." Jason explained. "This 'AI' should be simplistic and non-sentient. It should only have the purpose of observing simulations and transferring desired information to your brain after each simulation has run its course."

Catherine nodded. "Okay, let's do that, then."

Several more hours passed. Time seemed to disappear like dust in the wind. Jason found that he was having a lot of fun spending time with Catherine, and she was likewise truly enjoying herself as well. It wasn't just that they were experiencing transcendent simulated worlds together, but that they were forging a connection by building Catherine up. The more she learned, the more formidable she became.

"So the next step-" Jason started to say, only for Catherine to interrupt him.

"-is to speed up the production process." Catherine said, rolling her eyes cutely at him. "Yes, I can see that."

Before her, there were five different Catherine-clones. Each one was holding onto a blueprint-in-progress and slowly adding new bits and pieces to it as they experimented with ways to create weapons and armor.

Jason examined one of the weapons. It appeared to be a long-barreled hunting rifle of some sort, but it was a bit different from any he had seen.

"That clone is using one of my older designs and trying to modernize it." Catherine explained. "I could simply steal the blueprint of a rifle some other human has made, but when I summon it as a light construct, it will have magical power, so I'd rather make better use of that function."

Jason nodded. "If you empower your weapons and armors with divine energy, they'll shoot faster and hit harder than any mundane weapon. It's a good choice."

Catherine became quiet for a moment.

"Jason..." She said slowly. "You said before that it might be a good idea for me to bring on a couple other Lazarites to serve as Blueprinters for me. Do you still think that's a good idea?"

Jason widened his eyes. "Of course! Are you seriously considering it now? I promise that if you have anyone in mind, I'll do my best to help uplift them to your level."

"Good. That's good." Catherine said, before hesitantly lowering her eyes. "It's just... I feel a little guilty. You've given me so much, and I've done nothing for you in return."

"You're giving me a lot of data regarding the MindCore." Jason retorted. "And you accepted the risk of being my first experimental subject. That took a lot of guts."

"Still..." Catherine said, twiddling her thumbs shyly. "I've, um... I've decided... I won't tell Raphael about any of this. Not about my MindCore, or you, or anything else. In fact, I won't tell anyone at all. I'll keep it a secret for now."

Jason was surprised. "Why the change of heart?"

"Because... you've been so good to me. And I can't help but think maybe you have a point... about Raphael." Catherine said quietly. "I've known him far longer than I've known you, but I can't help thinking now that his motives were impure."

"My motives could be equally impure." Jason pointed out.

Catherine looked up into Jason's eyes. She clutched her hands against her chest and let out a small sigh. "Maybe so... but I'm fine with that... as long as it's you."

A long moment of silence followed. Jason swallowed heavily. The way she was looking at him felt a little... but that was impossible.

He quickly averted his eyes. "Haha... you say strange things sometimes."

"I'm being sincere." Catherine said quietly, still looking up at the side of his face. "I've decided that, at least for now, I want to... follow you."

Jason licked his lips. He closed his eyes and pressed his fingers against his eyelids.

"Catherine..." Jason said, his voice soft. "I can't. I just can't. You're beautiful, but my wife..."

"I'm sorry." Catherine said, quickly looking away. "I know she passed away not too long ago. It was wrong of me to say such a thing. My shame is immeasurable."

Jason pulled his hands away and opened his eyes. "No, no, it's not like that. See... I told you I came from the future, right? But my wife is... she's alive in this time. She won't know who I am. She won't remember me. But she's trapped under the spell of a monster named Bahamut. I know she won't remember me, but still I have to save her. And maybe, if I act correctly, I can... rekindle... what I lost."

Jason's expression fell after he spoke. He turned his whole body to the side and heaved a great sigh.

"But I don't know if I deserve it. I don't know if it would be right. My wife won't remember me. She died because of my incompetence. What is the point of rekindling a flame with her past self when I failed her in the future? I don't know what to do. It's eating me up inside."

Catherine pursed her lips. "Phoebe must have been an extraordinary woman for you to remain so faithful. I truly envy her."

"She was extraordinary, indeed." Jason replied. "She is."

After another moment of silence, Catherine swept a hand through her hair. "Forget what I said. I apologize for my impropriety. But I will keep your secrets safe. I won't speak of Aevum, the MindCore, or your powers to anyone who has no reason to know."

"Thank you." Jason said, smiling sincerely again. "I really do appreciate that. The stakes are high, after all."

"Yes they are." Catherine replied. "But Raphael is intelligent. He will eventually notice my enhanced capabilities."

Jason glanced at Catherine. He looked away.

"Catherine. There's... there's something I haven't told you."

Her heart skipped a beat. She turned to look at Jason with a mixed expression comprised of many different emotions. "You haven't told me... what?"

"It's about Raphael." Jason said, massaging his right arm with his left. "He tampered with your Mind Realm."

Silence.

Catherine looked at Jason with deep shock. "He... he did? No! He wouldn't! How can you utter such an accusation?"

"He did." Jason said quietly. "When I scoured your Mind Realm, I found the anomaly immediately. Raphael had put a homing beacon on you so he would know where you were on Earth at all times. You've been in Aevum for weeks now, which isn't long in realspace terms, but it's definitely been long enough for Raphael to sense your presence disappearing."

Jason paused.

"...It's also possible he traced Aevum's location when I brought you here, though I can't say for certain. Either way, when you return to Earth, his transponder will no longer be functioning, and he will know."

Catherine looked aghast. "Do you have any proof?"

"Sure." Jason said. "I copied the fragment of your Mind Realm where I found the transponder. Take a look."

With a wave of his hand, he passed it over to Catherine, and her expression turned ugly.

"So... he really..."

"Yeah." Jason said. "I'm sorry. I wasn't going to tell you before, because I assumed you were going to go back to Raphael and tell him at least some of what you went through. But if you go back now, he'll definitely notice you're hiding something from him."

Catherine shifted uneasily on her feet. "I... I do not know how to feel right now. I don't know what to do. I am at a loss..."

"You could stay here." Jason suggested. "I can easily replenish your Faith Energy. Or you can return to Earth, and thus Heaven. If you want to return, I could give you a few life preserving measures, just in case."

"What is your meaning?" Catherine asked. "Do you believe that just because my transponder is removed, Raphael might wish to harm me?"

Jason held up his hands helplessly.

"I don't know. I just want to make sure you're safe."

A feeling of warmth spread throughout Catherine's body. She looked away, feeling her face heat up. She found that she quite enjoyed being spoken to in such a manner by the man before her.

"Then, in that case, I'll take your protective charm with me." Catherine said, unable to look him in the eye.

He looked like a young man, barely eighteen years old, with no muscle on his body to speak of, yet the way he spoke had slowly come to captivate her.

The two of them resumed their work, and eventually, Jason pulled out of her Mind Realm to return to reality.

"Alright, Catherine. I think you've understood the important concepts. It'll be up to you to experiment with your MindCore for the next week. When you think you're ready, I'll send you back to Earth. It'd also be great if you could maybe write up a document for me about your experience so I can pass it on to the next person I give a RealitySim... and that'll probably be Nadia."

Catherine chewed her lower lip. "Of course. I'd love to. It's just..."

"Something wrong?" Jason asked.

"No, not at all!" Catherine exclaimed. "Jason, you can, um, you can call me 'Cath'. That's how all my friends refer to me."

"Oh, sure!" Jason said with a smile. "Cath. That's a cute name."

Catherine blushed again. "I like hearing it from you the most. See you tomorrow?"

"Sure thing, Cath." Jason said, turning to leave. "See you tomorrow."

After that, he vanished, teleporting back to Aevum's core.

Once he was gone, Catherine's face heated up even more than before.

What nickname, Cath? Nobody had ever called her something cutesy like that before. If anyone but the Archangels had tried, she might have slapped their faces off!

But she felt it was fine, so long as it was Jason who said it.

"You know, Joan..." Catherine muttered to herself quietly. "...even if he does find his wife again... I'm okay with staying on the side and watching from afar. I'm happy as long as I'm in his presence."

She giggled.

"I wonder if you would approve?"

Part 704: Survivor's Guilt

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Jason sat in his meditation chamber within the heart of Aevum. His four Spiritual Incarnations were not present, as he had recalled them back into his soul. He did this so he could maintain full awareness and focus during Catherine's surgery, but in the end, he still badly exhausted himself and realized he would need several days to fully recuperate. He had put on a brave face for Catherine just a short while earlier while introducing her to the RealitySim's functions, but now that he was alone, he began to feel tired beyond words.

The Wordsmith wasn't only tired, though. There was another feeling flooding his body, and it worsened by the hour.

He realized that this feeling was a deep, inescapable well of depression.

Sitting alone, with no sounds to disturb him, the quiet silence of his Sanctum gave rise to emotions Jason usually didn't allow himself to feel.

Mainly, he felt guilt.

Deep, unquenchable guilt.

As he stared lifelessly at the ground, Jason felt a hollowness in his heart that had existed since the moment his wife died, and had never gone away, but at times seemed it might be on its way out the door. Only, all at once, out of the blue, it would come roaring back, growing more powerful than at any other time before.

He was depressed. He knew this. He could tell it was the case, but he didn't know how to make the feeling go away.

Every time Jason thought he might be able to feel some measure of happiness or contentment again, his depression came roaring back, rocking him to his core. Sometimes, when he was all alone, he wept uncontrollably. Other times he simply stared vacantly ahead, unable to think of anything at all, like now.

The reason Jason felt guilty was anything but simple. It was a circle of suffering that fed upon itself like an ouroboros.

Jason had failed to save his wife. She died because of his incapability.

He didn't know what had killed her. This devastated him more than anything else, because so long as he didn't know, he could never prevent it from happening again. Sometimes he thought Gressil had killed her, but other times he wondered if maybe she had a heart attack, or was secretly struck by some insidious attack from the shadows... an attack Jason could have prevented if he had been there for her.

Only a day earlier, Jason felt that he had enjoyed uplifting Catherine a little too much. The sight of her body had roused something sleeping within him, but then the guilt of Phoebe's death came crashing back down upon him, debilitating his mental state further than ever.

Why should he be allowed to enjoy himself? Why should he be allowed to move on? Wasn't he a Hero with a power greater than any before him? How could he dare to laugh and smile when he had failed the most important person in his life?

His daughter was alive.

So what?

It wasn't as if he had saved her. She survived only through a stroke of luck. A beam of light the universe shone upon her. Not because of her useless father's hands.

Jason was working to save humanity and Earth from a dark future.

But so what?

Why did he care? Because people would look up to him? The man who failed his own wife? Why did he deserve any accolades? He was only doing now what he should have done in the past.

He was a useless imbecile playing God.

It wasn't as if Jason was a Chosen One. His father had made sure he knew that much. Jason and Hideki were thieves. They had stolen the power of the Heroic Aura and taken it upon themselves to become Earth's Heroes.

But who said they deserved to be Heroes? More likely, the Heroic Aura would have chosen someone more suitable than two loser rat bastards who both failed to save their own wives.

Hideki had failed to save Olivia, and Jason had failed to save Phoebe. Like father, like son.

Jason sat in place, his mind spinning, his emotions turbulent. He held his knees tightly, squeezing them while wishing he could break his own bones to make the emotional agony stop.

The last two days had hurt him more than any before. He felt that he had already begun to cheat on Phoebe by entertaining any thoughts of spending time with Catherine. But why did he deserve to enjoy himself?

Jason balled his right hand into a fist. He trembled for a moment, then violently punched himself in the face!

Then he struck himself again. And again!

Tears flowed from his eyes. He gritted his teeth and let out a cry. Not from the physical pain, but from the mental pain that he couldn't release. He felt as if a valve had been tightened, preventing the flow of water, but no matter what direction he twisted and turned it, that water would never flow! It defied all logic!

He started punching himself with both hands. He threw himself to the floor and banged his forehead against it, over and over. He became so violent that if his daughter had witnessed his rage, she would have been horrified beyond compare.

"Aaahh!!"

Jason screamed and cried. He clutched his aching face and wept uncontrollably.

He wanted the pain to end. He wanted it to end so badly that he even considered taking his own life.

But even that thought sent him into another mental spiral.

How dare he consider suicide? His daughter needed him. Wasn't he pathetic, wanting to take the easy way out after failing his wife? What would Phoebe think, knowing he had abandoned his little girl to a future where she would definitely meet an end at the demon's claws?

She would hate him. He knew that much.

But then again, she would hate him for abandoning his son. That was another thing that ripped Jason's psyche in half. He had left Timothy in an uncertain future, a timeline that no longer existed because of Jason's actions.

He could never see his son again! Jason knew this to be true!

Jason clawed at his eyes.

He hated himself!

He hated himself so goddamned much!!

He wanted to die! But he couldn't, because he didn't deserve to die! But he didn't deserve to atone either! And he didn't deserve the glory for any future accomplishments, because those were what he should have been doing right from the very start!!!

Eventually, Jason's rage abated. He returned to a sitting position, staring vacantly at the floor.

Blood dripped from his forehead.

Bruises began to swell on his face.

Scrapes covered his knuckles.

But none of them took the edge off the true pain buried deep within.

Jason healed himself. He returned to pristine physical form, then heaved a long, quiet sigh.

He had to get back to work. He did his best to try and shut out the voices of self-hatred and put on the smile he had been wearing like a mask.

A mask...

Jason chuckled lifelessly.

Was this how his father felt? Failing to save his wife, rewind after rewind, until the life left his eyes?

Was Hideki's entire demeanor a falsehood reinforced by the mask he wore?

Was he still Hideki, or had he long ago become Cat Mask in both name and spirit?

Jason didn't know. He did not have the answers.

Jason stood up. He thought to himself for a moment, then he uttered a Word of Power, teleporting to the room where his daughter and her friends were training.

When Jason arrived, the others didn't immediately notice him. He stayed still and observed the scene from a distance.

It turned out everyone was focused on helping Sasha improve her skills in Alchemy. They were watching as she changed piles of fabric Jason had given her into various cute dresses, which either Daisy or Nadia would leave for a short while, head into the dressing room, and come back out wearing.

Judging by the huge pile of clothes she had already made, it was obvious she had a lot of passion for tailoring.

But that wasn't all. It turned out her affinity for clothing also translated to armor. Daisy had been mainly requesting differently shaped sets of armor from various eras of history, while Nadia was the one who wore all the dresses.

And to top it all off, Marco hadn't been neglected. Sasha had made various diverse outfits for him as well, though for some reason she chose to go for a more 'costume heavy' route. She had made him shiny silver space armor from old 50's TV shows, Renaissance outfits that looked like they belonged in a Shakespeare play, and various different superhero outfits. It seemed Marco was really into reading comics and had given Sasha lots of different ones for inspiration.

Jason slowly meandered forward, at which point Daisy turned to notice him.

"Dad!"

Her single word caught everyone's attention. They turned to look at him.

"How did the operation go?" Nadia asked. "Is the angel lady... okay?"

"She's just fine." Jason said with a smile. "Heaven's Daughter is taking some time to learn how her MindCore works. I plan to operate on you next, Nadia, but first I'd like you to spend a little time with her so she can explain the RealitySim's intricacies. Maybe the two of you can rub your brains together and improve her abilities before she returns to Heaven."

Marco seemed to be in a daze. "Return to Heaven... it's so bizarre hearing you say that casually, Mister Hiro. Like, it's Heaven, you know? It's Heaven!"

"Heaven's not anything like what you'd expect." Jason said sardonically. "I'd even go so far as to say it's kind of shitty, and definitely a letdown. All those Sunday sermons preaching about eternal happiness, but really when you die you just become a slave and a meatshield for the pureblooded angels."

Nadia raised an eyebrow. "It seems as if you don't like the angels. But if not, why help Heaven's Daughter? Doesn't that hurt you in the long run?"

Jason swept his gaze around all the teenagers. They looked at him with curious gazes.

"Let's get one thing out of the way." Jason said sternly. "Heaven is almost entirely comprised of Lazarites, which are humans raised from death into angelic bodies. I don't have exact numbers, but you can safely assume at this point 99.99% of all angels are Lazarites. Heaven's Daughter is the 'Strongest Lazarite', so she's the strongest of all the humans there."

He continued. "It's the pureblooded angels I don't like, because they rule over the Lazarites and their motives are not pure. But more specifically, it's not even the purebloods, but the Archangels. And not all of them, but just one. Raphael is the ruler of Heaven, the oldest Archangel, and an absolute snake. If you ever have the misfortune of meeting him, assume he is lying to you whenever his mouth opens."

"Well if Raphael is the one you hate, then why act like a large number of angels are the problem?" Daisy asked, crossing her arms and looking at her dad quizzically. "He's only one angel among many, right?"

"No, because Raphael has an iron grip on Heaven." Jason explained. "He has completely captivated them and made them think he's this amazing genius, wise beyond knowledge, and even given himself the arrogant title 'Archangel of Wisdom.' But after spending a long time learning about him, I've personally decided a more appropriate title would be 'Archangel of Greed.' Raphael desires power above all else, and the 'kindly old man' role he plays is a façade meant to disguise the rot infesting his soul."

"Never trust Raphael." Jason concluded. "He smiles, but the expression is hollow. His eyes appear kindly, but they are evil and devious. Because of him, the angels wield a power that could be turned against humanity through deception, or perhaps even by force. After all, Raphael isn't a weak old man at all. He's an Archangel, and one who wields extreme power. Perhaps only Gabriel, Michael, or Camael can hold a candle to him if they came to blows. Thus we must assume that if we disregard Heaven, it could stab us in the back at Raphael's behest someday."

The teenagers nodded seriously.

"Sounds like a bastard." Marco muttered.

"You said it." Sasha added, chuckling at Marco slightly.

After a moment, Jason clapped his hands.

"Okay. Well, I'm going to bring Heaven's Daughter here. She told me she would write up a document about her experiences with the RealitySim, and once I've uplifted Nadia, I'll be able to move on to the rest of you."

"When are you installing Nadia's MindCore?" Daisy asked. "And can I go after her?"

"Not this time." Jason said. "I want to get Nadia online first because her power is going to be instrumental in improving a lot of Aevum's facets, drawing up plans for the future, and she'll add diversity to the types of intelligence we have on hand. I'd actually rather empower Sasha next, because her ability seems really useful for crafting and building things. Then it'll be between you and Marco."

"I can go last." Marco said, raising a palm in deference. "I ain't jazzed about any of this, and I still think my power ain't all that amazing. It's pretty limited. I'd rather the girls get stronger first."

Marco's self-esteem, as always, provided a window into his thoughts. Jason slightly nodded at Marco, but he felt it was a pity. Marco still didn't get how crazy the power to snap enemies into another dimension was. Jason still needed to learn the intricacies of how it worked, but he was worried creating dimensions inside a stabilized space like Aevum was a bad idea. He planned to have Marco continue training in Realspace, on a world somewhere far from the Volgrim and humans alike. That would be the safest bet.

"Alright. So the order will be Nadia, Sasha, Daisy, and then Marco." Jason said. "But Nadia, it'll be a few days. I need to make some adjustments to the installation procedure, since I think it didn't go as smoothly as I would have liked with Heaven's Daughter."

"What went wrong?" Nadia asked.

Jason leaned against a pillar in the middle of the room and crossed his arms. "When Mildred guided me into installing my own MindCore, the process was excruciating beyond description. I nearly died multiple times. Because I had to- well, just imagine a doctor performing brain surgery on himself. Not a pretty thought, is it?"

"Anyway, I thought that since I was doing the procedure on someone else, and since I had improved and simplified the MindCore installation process, while Heaven's Daughter was also a powerful Lazarite, she would be able to easily bear with the pain. But I was wrong. I didn't realize her tolerance for pain was lower than mine, so I had to change gears mid-operation. I switched her neurons to reroute them from pain to pleasure. Err, the operation stopped being life threatening, but too much pleasure for too long would be..."

"It would cause plenty of ill effects." Nadia said, finishing his words for him. Her eyes glowed as she absorbed the information. "Why didn't you try dulling the pain instead with your Word Magic?"

"Couldn't." Jason said. "I'd need to iterate on the RealitySim further, figure out how to make the operation itself less painful. In the heat of the moment, the best thing I could think of was swapping her neural pathways. Most of the 'pain' comes from the soul after all, not the actual brain."

"Did you record the procedure?" Nadia asked.

Jason blinked. "Uh... no. Why?"

"Because I'd like to watch it myself. I might be able to glean some insights, help you improve future MindCore procedures." Nadia explained.

Jason scratched his chin. "Well... I guess I did record it from my point of view. My MindCore has a perfect recording, including my outlines and actions taken before and during the operation. But I'd want to get her permission first."

"Please ask." Nadia said, smiling at him. "I might be able to help, and obviously I'd like to make sure I and the others don't have to suffer too much pain when you operate on all of us."

After taking care of some other matters, Jason paused before he left.

"By the way. I'm going to be bringing some more people into Aevum tomorrow. They're about the same age as the rest of you, so I hope you guys can become good friends with them."

"More people?" Marco asked. "Who?"

"Some people I met while I was with the Illuminati." Jason said. "A guy named Brian Bozzard, another named Jerome Nguyen, a girl named Farrah Lapis, and a few others. In time, I might give them MindCores too, but we'll have to see. Mainly, I just want to bring them to safety and give them a way to train their combat abilities for the future war."

"So... all of them are Lowborn Heroes too?" Daisy asked.

"That's right. As for whether or not you uplifted them, or someone else? I'm not sure." Jason replied.

The teens looked at one another and nodded. Making new friends sounded great, and Marco seemed interested in the fact that two of them were guys. Not that he didn't enjoy hanging out with a bunch of cute girls, but balancing the scales of gender a bit sounded nice.

"Anyway," Jason concluded, "you all just keep working on mastering your powers. I'll see Nadia in a few days once I'm ready, and in the meantime I'll bring Heaven's Daughter over to introduce her."

Jason turned to leave. Before he could vanish, Daisy called out.

"Hey dad, wait!"

She teleported over to him and touched his shoulder. Jason smiled.

"What's the matter, honey?"

Daisy pulled him aside, a little further away from the other teens. Seeing that she wanted privacy with her father, they returned to what they were doing before, and she lowered her voice.

"Dad... are you doing okay?"

Jason was surprised. "Of course. Why?"

"It's just... you seem a little down today." Daisy said, her tone somewhat uncertain.

"Oh. I'm just tired from the surgery." Jason said. "It was pretty exhausting and all."

"I'm sure it was..." Daisy said, frowning ever so slightly. "But dad, you know you can talk to me, right? I'm not a little girl anymore."

Jason's expression flickered. He touched Daisy's hand with his own, as she was still holding his shoulder. He smiled, but the expression seemed a little hollow.

"I know you're not, Daisy. That's something I can't forget."

Daisy fell silent. She lowered her eyes.

"Are you still beating yourself up over the past, dad? You don't... have to do that. Everyone makes mistakes. I don't blame you at all."

"You might not blame me for anything." Jason said, after a moment of thought. "But that doesn't mean I don't."

A moment of silence followed. Jason turned his gaze away to stare the far wall.

"There are some problems even the greatest magic can't fix. I have to go, sweetheart. I'll be back later."

"Dad, if this is about mom-" Daisy started to say, but her father pulled her hand away.

"Let's talk about this later." Jason said, closing her off. "Now's not a good time. I have too much on my plate."

Without waiting for a response, Jason vanished, teleporting elsewhere into Aevum.

Daisy stood, motionless, feeling a sense of nausea swell in her stomach. It was only now that she realized things were not as they seemed.

Her father had tried to play it off, but even if Daisy could not read his thoughts, she had long ago learned to read other humans well. She could tell his mental situation was worsening by the day, but she hadn't noticed until now just how far he had deteriorated.

He always seemed so upbeat and hopeful, so certain of what had to be done. But what if all of this was simply a coping mechanism? What if the man she looked up to the most wasn't a superhuman?

What if he was only human?

Daisy chewed her lower lip tentatively for a moment. She swallowed her saliva, then turned to shakily stride back over to the rest. When they asked her if she was okay, she brushed away their complaints and forced herself to get back on track mentally.

Like father, like daughter.

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Two more days passed inside Aevum, which amounted to less than 10 minutes in the outside world. Catherine had already been inside Aevum for one real world hour or so, but for the demons preparing to move on Mount Sinai, they had barely even traded potshots with the outermost sentries and Lazarites.

Catherine wrote up a short document as Jason had requested, detailing the functions of her MindCore and how the RealitySim functioned. At least according to her limited experience with it. She would need a lot more time to grow intimately familiar with its intricacies.

Catherine met with Jason's daughter and the others, but she wore her full armor, refused to let them see her face, and did not give them her real name. It seemed she had only done so with Jason because of reasons she didn't care to explain. Then she returned to her quarters to continue training with her RealitySim.

Eventually, Jason brought in a dozen new Lowborn Heroes from the Illuminati. When they arrived, greetings were exchanged all around.

"Hello, everyone. I am Brian Bozzard. It is my pleasure to meet all of you." Brian said, flashing a dazzling smile at the girls. It didn't take a rocket scientist to see he favored relations with the fairer sex more.

Brian wore a snazzy blue pinstripe suit with a red tie. He dressed up like a politician, and his ability with words was equally impressive.

"Hi, Brian!" Sasha exclaimed. "I'm Sasha! You're really handsome!"

"I do get that a lot." Brian said, flashing an even brighter smile at her.

"Nadia." Nadia said, brusquely introducing herself with one word.

"I'm Marco." Marco said, smiling a bit less than Sasha, but much more than Nadia. "It's good to meet you."

"Brian." Daisy said, crossing her arms. "Remember me?"

Brian took a moment to look at her before his eyes lit up.

"Ohh, yes! You are- um, what was it again? Dandy? The daughter of Vasily Sokolov?"

"Daisy. And he's my adopted uncle, not my father." Daisy replied. "My dad is Jason Hiro."

Brian's expression faltered. He slowly directed a look of horror toward Jason.

"B-b-but... you two are p-p-practically the same age! Oh heavens, how did that happen?! You poor boy, Jason!"

Jason slapped his face. "It's not like that. I'm a lot older than I look. I'll explain it to you some other time."

Brian seemed visibly relieved. "Oh, good. Good! I was suddenly so very worried for you, for a second there."

Everyone had a good laugh, then the other newcomers introduced themselves.

"I'm Farrah..." The young blonde girl said, fidgeting uncomfortably as multiple people's gazes fell on her. "I, um, I can change my... my face... a little..."

"She's a shapeshifter." Jason explained.

"Oh! That's an awesome ability!" Daisy quickly praised. "My dad told me only Belial could do that. Your power is really unique!"

Marco smiled at Farrah. "Is there anyone you usually like turning into?"

Jerome, standing next to Farrah, glowered at Marco. He didn't seem to like it when he perceived other guys making moves on 'his girl.' He wrapped his arm around Farrah's shoulder, which seemed to ease her nerves a bit.

"I turn into, um, movie stars sometimes. Singers. Celebrities. I like turning into Marilyn Monroe."

Her face and hair changed, and she suddenly morphed into a nearly perfect facsimile of a young Marilyn Monroe from the 1960's. Everyone exclaimed in surprise due to how quickly che had changed. Unfortunately, only her face changed, not her voice and personality.

"I'm Jerome Nguyen." The tallest young man in the room said. Jerome appeared to have grown another inch or two since Jason last saw him. He was an absolute mountain of a man. He towered over his girlfriend by two full heads, standing at well over six and a half feet tall. "I'm the toughest motherfucker here."

He paused, before lightly bobbing his head in Jason's direction. "Though Jason did kick my ass. I'll admit that much."

"Jerome." Jason said, causing the dark skinned Titan of a man to look in his direction. "You know my daughter Daisy is a Trueborn too, right?"

"What?" Jerome said, turning to look at her in surprise. "She is- you are?"

He directed the last two words at Daisy directly. When Brian and Farrah also looked at Daisy in shock, this caused Sasha, Nadia, and Marco to be taken aback. They didn't fully understand what a concept a 'Trueborn Hero' was, whereas these kids who had been partially raised by the Illuminati knew it well. In their eyes, there was a vast chasm between a Lowborn and a Trueborn.

Jerome immediately pulled away from Farrah. "Are you a Trueborn?"

Daisy nodded. "If my dad says I am, then I am."

"Then we've gotta fight." Jerome said without hesitation. "I'm the strongest Lowborn. Only your dad has beaten me. If you beat me, I'll acknowledge you."

Daisy raised an eyebrow. She crossed her arms and smirked. "Who says I need your validation?"

"If you have any guts, you'll fight me." Jerome said, taking a step toward her. His body absolutely towered over her.

"Hey!" Marco shouted. "Don't you think picking on a girl half your size is unmanly?"

"I don't give a shit about my opponent's gender. My challenge shows respect." Jerome shot back, barely even looking at Marco. "That's a word you could stand to learn, little guy."

"You...!" Marco started to say, before swallowing his words. He thought to himself that if things came to blows, he'd end up dying to Jerome. The man was seriously scary to look at.

Daisy took a step forward. "If you want to challenge me, that's fine. I don't know which of us will win, but... are you sure you want to fight?"

"Of course. I'm not ashamed of losing. I don't get a big ego just 'cause I win. I simply like to fight." Jerome answered.

Daisy nodded. "Then, dad? Make us an arena."

Shortly afterward, Jason had summoned an arena underground beneath Aevum's soil. He hadn't yet had a chance to show off the new world to the Illuminati's young potentates, but he was already setting up a fight between his daughter and the monster of a man named Jerome.

Despite the young man's physical bulk and imposing size, Jason wasn't worried. He had fought Jerome before and sized him up. He had also made some vague determinations about Daisy, so he felt she had a good shot at winning. But in truth, he'd never seen his daughter fight before.

As Jerome wrapped his hands and prepared for a fight on the opposite corner of the ring, Jason met up with his daughter. She had changed into a sports bra and boxing shorts while also taking time to wrap her own hands.

"Honey?" Jason asked. "Are you going to be okay?"

Daisy nodded. "I've done a lot of training, and I've fought a lot of people. I have a dozen different ways to take down a lunkhead, though he's definitely much stronger than any other human I've met."

"I don't know exactly how strong Jerome is." Jason said quietly. "But he probably has enough strength to pick up and throw a car several blocks. You know weight classes exist for a reason, right? He isn't just multiple weight classes above you; he's also superhumanly strong. Are you absolutely sure you can handle this?"

Daisy gave him a smile. "Dad. I've got this. No worries."

Jason sighed. He strolled over to the center of the ring, then waited for Daisy and Jerome to both walk over as well.

"The rules are simple." "Jason said. "The goal is to knock or throw your opponent to the ground. If you can pin them to the ground for five seconds, or if you can ring them out, you win. Winning three of five rounds is your goal. Make this a clean fight, no beating the shit out of each other. Got it?"

Jerome nodded. He smiled, and there was a hint of arrogance. "Don't worry, Trueborn. I won't hurt your little girl."

Daisy snorted. "We'll see who's hurting by the end of this."

Jason took a few steps back. He held up his arm.

"Ready! Three, two, one, fight!"

He karate chopped the side of his palm down, and Jerome immediately lunged forward!

Jerome grabbed at Daisy's shoulders, intending to hurl her to the floor with one smooth movement. Before his hands could make contact...

Foop!

Daisy vanished! She reappeared a half-meter off the ground, right behind Jerome. With one leg coiled like a viper, she kicked at Jerome with the flat of her foot and sent him toppling forward!

Jerome was shocked! He landed on his elbows and quickly jumped back up.

"You... how did you...?"

"Teleportation." Daisy answered. "Better watch out for it."

Daisy hopped from side to side, keeping her palms up in front of her face. Jerome charged again, but he was a little more hesitant this time, expecting her to teleport once more.

Instead, Daisy kicked the ground with her feet and did a strange slide-glide motion as she seemed to roll forward, right under Jerome's grasp. Her movements somehow defied physics, and he was caught unprepared. Jerome grabbed wildly at Daisy's body as she slid underneath his legs, but she grabbed his ankle and pulled back on it mid-step, causing him to tumble to the mat once again.

Unfortunately, dropping Jerome to the mat was one thing, but keeping him pinned there was another. Daisy didn't even try. She had no chance of holding him on the ground for a few seconds. Her body weight would be like a toothpick in his hands if he got serious.

Jerome leaped to his feet again. He gave her a strange glance and spun around, looking her up and down with more interest.

"Was that another power?" Jerome asked.

"Something like that." Daisy replied noncommittally.

The two started dancing around each other. Daisy was much nimbler than Jerome, making him look like a clumsy oaf by comparison. But he wasn't. Jerome was just as well-trained as her, and each ability she revealed gave him more information to work with.

Daisy was a generalist. Jerome was a Specialist. He didn't have many tricks up his sleeve, but he was very good at dealing with things in specific ways.

Daisy suddenly flickered to the right, then to the left. She quick-teleported, causing Jerome to lose sight of her for a moment.

Suddenly, she appeared behind Jerome and kicked at the back of his neck!

But Jerome abruptly ducked, then snapped his hand up behind himself. He grabbed Daisy by the leg, making her yelp in fright. He swung her overhead, but slowed the throw toward the end, instead plopping her onto the mat and grabbing her other leg to hold her in place.

Unable to break free, Daisy gave up and gave Jerome the first point.

He released her legs, and she grimaced, massaging her ankles and knees. His grip was incredibly strong!

"Don't use the same tricks twice on me." Jerome warned. "They won't work."

Daisy stood up. She looked around and saw that many people were fawning over Jerome, excited by his simple brutish power. There really was something appealing about seeing a guy who could just beat the shit out of people, especially when he was built like a brick shithouse. Even Sasha was seeing stars in her eyes. She had a thing for big strong men, it seemed.

Daisy cracked her neck. "You want me to use a new trick then?"

"If you have them, use them." Jerome said flatly. "If you're going easy on me, don't. My pride can take it. I'm not afraid of losing face."

Daisy felt a bit of surprise at his words. She found his attitude commendable. There was something appealing about someone who liked to fight for fighting's sake.

"I'm still going to go easy on you in this round." Daisy said. "But next round, I'm going to get serious."

Jerome frowned. "That is not wise."

"We'll see." Daisy replied.

When Jason started the second round, it was Daisy who suddenly charged at Jerome. He raised an eyebrow, not expecting her to do something so dumb. Her powers were versatile, but if she got within grabbing range, it was all over!

Jerome realized it was probably a trick she'd use before teleporting away, but he decided to take the bait anyway. He grabbing at Daisy, but when his hands made contact with her shoulders... they passed through!

He swept his palms right through where she was standing, as if she had turned into a ghost! Daisy ran through his body, making question marks pop up above his head. Jerome turned around to look for her, but Daisy wasn't there! She didn't appear to be on the stage at all!

Suddenly, Jerome's right leg was swept out from the side. He yelped as he started to fall to the ground, but he quickly caught himself by slapping his right palm against the ground.

When he looked for Daisy, he didn't see her! Had she turned invisible?

A sudden kick to Jerome's back sent him tumbling forward. It was that damned teleportation trick again!

Jerome tried to grab behind himself, but she was gone. He still couldn't see her!

Meanwhile, Jason and the others stared at the scene in disbelief. For some reason, at the start of the round, Daisy had stood still, and Jerome had started grabbing at the air. Then Daisy ran over and swept his leg, then walked around him and kicked him in the back before hopping away from his clumsy flailing arm.

It was as if Jerome couldn't see her. Jason was bewildered. Only Nadia seemed to see through the essence of what was happening by using her power and causing her eyes to glow blue.

"It's telepathy." Nadia said quietly to Sasha. "Daisy is making Jerome see illusions. She's tricking his brain."

"She's making him look like a doofus." Sasha said, though she wasn't any less starstruck than before. "That just shows how awesome Daisy is!"

Jerome seemed to realize he was being toyed with. He closed his eyes and stopped paying attention to his lying eyes. He listened with his ears, and that allowed him to hear a pair of footsteps quickly approaching from the right.

He slapped his palms against the ground and pounced like a tiger toward those footsteps. He heard Daisy yelp in surprise as she didn't expect him to see through her deception.

Jerome grinned! He grabbed his opponent- no, he didn't! He grabbed at nothing at all!

It turned out that Daisy hadn't only fooled his eyes, but his ears as well. The spectators watched as he jumped and grabbed at the empty air while Daisy carefully maneuvered herself into the position she had been waiting for.

Jerome opened his eyes, only to see Daisy's foot flying at his chest. He wouldn't be fooled, of course, and instead grabbed behind himself, expected her to teleport there.

But this time, it was the real Daisy! She kicked him backward and sent him tripping off the mat, scoring the first ring-out!

"Point, Daisy!" Jason declared. "It's 1-1 for both combatants."

Jerome was shocked. He had started to realize what she was doing, but in the end he couldn't see through her mental trickery when it mattered.

Jerome stood up and dusted himself off while the small audience cheered for Daisy. He didn't appear mad.

"Your abilities are quite diverse. I'm convinced you're a Trueborn." Jerome said. "But we'll continue to spar until we reach the point cap."

"Playtime is over." Daisy declared. "We've reached the end of my abilities that are useful in the context of a sparring match. My other powers are a lot deadlier, so I won't use them. I only have one left, and... you can't contend with it. So I'll make the next two matches quick."

That seemed to spark Jerome's interest. She had said she was holding back before, but he wasn't sure if that was merely a bluff or not.

"I see. Then show me what you're truly capable of." Jerome said, his expression becoming solemn.

He and Daisy returned to the center of the mat. This time, Daisy didn't even bother taking up a combat stance. She just stood idly while Jason counted down the seconds.

"Three, two, one, fight!" Jason said, making a karate chop motion with his hand.

Jerome started to move toward her, but before he could take two steps, Daisy raised a single finger up.

Jerome lost his footing. He suddenly began to float up into the air and lost contact with the mat. Unable to control himself, he flailed wildly, his eyes filled with shock.

"You-?!"

He didn't get to finish his thought. Daisy pointed her finger downward, and gravity seemed to increase tenfold. Jerome slammed against the mat heavily, knocking the wind out of him. He groaned and tried to stand up, but it was as if an elephant had suddenly sat on his back. His stomach was pinned to the floor, and he could barely lift himself an inch off the ground!

"Rrrgh! Holy- RRRRGH!!!"

Jerome was incredibly strong. His strength increased during times of heightened adrenaline, and with that, he began to shakily lift himself off the mat, but the process was so gradual that he was already starting to fight exhaustion itself.

Sweat dripped from Jerome's forehead. He gasped for air, as Daisy used the power of telekinesis to pin him in place.

He realized now that she wasn't bluffing. She had been able to do this from the start, but had used her lesser abilities instead. Was she doing that to lessen the impact to his psyche, or was she only seeing how far those lesser abilities would take her?

It didn't matter. Ultimately, Jerome's body trembled, and his arms gave out. He collapsed onto his stomach, and Jason began the countdown.

"One! Two! Three! Four! Five! It's a pin! Point, Daisy!"

The telekinetic pressure finally vanished, and Jerome took a long, heavy breath. The crowd cheered for Daisy, and he lifted his head to look at her with deep surprise. He fully believed now that she was a Trueborn.

He envied her.

After a few moments, Jerome stood up and bowed.

"You went easy on me. I concede the next match in advance."

"Sorry." Daisy apologized. "I didn't hurt you, did I?"

She expected Jerome to be at least a little mad at her, but when he raised his head, there was instead a burning passion in his eyes.

"Daisy. I've gotta ask you... that telekinetic power of yours... how long can you maintain it?"

Daisy shrugged. "A long time? Minutes... or maybe hours?"

"My body grows stronger the more pressure it's under. I long ago reached the limits of the Illuminati's mundane training equipment." Jerome said, walking over to her. "If you use your telekinesis on me, I can increase my strength faster than ever! Are you willing to help me?"

Daisy smiled. "Of course! That's why my dad brought you guys here!"

Jason walked over and clapped Jerome on the back. "Good fight, kid. But hold your horses. You might want to wait to hear what I say before you go deciding your future training regimen all on your own."

With that, Jason lined up the dozen new Illuminati recruits and spoke to them with his daughter by his side.

"Everyone, thank you for coming. Earth faces a crisis. As we speak, demons are marching on Mount Sinai to attack the angels. The world you are currently standing on is not Earth, but a secret realm I discovered some time ago with my Archseer powers! This realm has a time dilation of 365 to 1, almost exactly mirroring Earth. Simply put, one day on Earth is one year in here."

He continued. "I have big plans for all of you. I'm going to create custom training regimens for anyone who wants to master their abilities. Additionally, everyone who chooses to stay here will become immortal. No matter how long you spend in Aevum, you'll never worry about growing old and dying! BUT, if you decide you're not up to the task, I'll simply use my powers to wipe your memories and send you back to Earth. We need fighters here, people willing to train hard and fight for the Earth's safety, as well as to protect humanity."

He laid out some more terms, playing the role of the carrot and the stick.

"Now, are you with me?!" Jason shouted.

"Yes, Archseer!" The teenagers replied.

Not one Illuminati trainee chose to return to Earth. The thought of training in a secret dimension was exciting, and as it turned out, Jason generously offered for them to stay in Aevum for a few months and they could leave later if they wanted. Of course, anyone who left early would have their minds wiped, but that was the price they'd have to pay for this incredible privilege.

After Jason settled them in to their new dorms, he turned to Nadia.

"I should be ready for the operation in a day or two."

"Let's put a pause on that." Nadia retorted. "I studied the footage you gave me. I'm surprised Heaven's Daughter wanted you to blur out her face, but if she wants to keep her identity a secret, that is fine by me. More importantly, I thought of some improvements you could make during the operation process."

Nadia pulled a notebook out of her handbag, which contained several incredibly detailed drawings of her own brain, the MindCore Jason was planning, and some other things.

"See here? If we do this, I believe we can completely eliminate the pain and increase the procedure success rate by 100%. However, this only works on people like me who have not yet developed a Mind Realm. We'll need to develop a different system for people like yourself and Heaven's Daughter, who do have one."

As Jason looked at her mockups, he became more and more surprised.

"That's brilliant! Nadia, you are a genius after all."

She blushed. "I'm just cheating with my power."

"Yeah, well, I was an idiot until I became able to cheat with my MindCore. If you're cheating, then I'm hyper-cheating." Jason joked.

He verified a few other things, then nodded his head.

"I'll delay it for a couple more days to iron everything out, but after that, we'll get this operation done."

"I am greatly looking forward to my expanded cognitive abilities." Nadia said with a smile. "I'll be in your care."

With that, the two of them departed.

Jason looked off into the distance.

"Not much longer now." He said to himself. "Once I get these MindCores installed... I can finally act on what I've been wanting to accomplish for nearly a year now..."

Part 706: False Reality

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

A few more days passed inside Aevum. Daisy took time to introduce all the new Illuminati initiates to the full world of Aevum, and their eyes nearly burst out of their heads. They couldn't believe it! How did the Archseer 'find' such an incredible hidden realm on Earth? Where was it even hiding?

Nobody had any idea that Jason had made Aevum himself, nor did they know that it was actually located thousands of lightyears from Earth. They assumed it was a secret dimension hidden somewhere on Earth, similar to Heaven. The fact the legendary Archseer was able to 'find' such a place was quickly forgotten as they started asking bigger questions, like which awe-inspiring precursor species was able to create such a wonderland!

Naturally, when Jason trusted them more, he would tell them the truth. But for now, he had no intention of spreading knowledge of his true capabilities beyond what was necessary. He was also taking great care to monitor all of the dozen Illuminati teenagers for suspicious behavior.

But today, he was not interested in the newcomers. He was putting his full attention on the next operation.

Nadia walked into the operating room and closed the door. Without being asked, she walked over and sat in the operating chair, then smiled at Jason.

"How is it?" She asked.

"I took two days to familiarize myself." Jason said, walking over to stand beside her. "I also made a few minor adjustments, but otherwise if all goes well, this procedure will be no problem at all."

He paused.

"Shall we start?"

Nadia nodded. "I may not seem like it, but I've been anxiously waiting for my upgrade. Every time I've spoken to Heaven's Daughter, I've felt deeply envious of her new capabilities. You should see the amazing things she's already started to do."

Jason hadn't spoken to Catherine in several days. He knew she was doing her best to exploit the potential of the RealitySim, but otherwise, he wasn't informed about the details. He'd been far too busy onboarding the newcomers and preparing the new MindCore installation procedure to keep up to date on important details like these.

"I'll talk to her about it later, before she leaves." Jason said.

"Heaven's Daughter isn't going to stay?" Nadia asked.

Jason shook his head. "Nope. She needs to return to Heaven and help repel the demons. Of course, it's way more time efficient to train with the RealitySim here, but gathering intelligence in the field will allow her to create superior representations of our future enemies inside her simulation cores."

Jason and Nadia exchanged a few more words, but eventually, he put his hand on her forehead.

"Alright. It's time. I'm going to put you to sleep, Nadia. Let's hope your procedure works as planned."

Nadia closed her eyes and waited. Then, Jason spoke a Word of Power.

"Sleep."

Nadia's body became still. Her breathing evened out, and her head fell slightly to the side as she entered a deep coma.

Jason waited a few moments, then used a few Words of Power to monitor her body's vital signs. He created a floating display that showed her heart-rate, brain waves, and other such readouts at a glance, then he began in earnest.

"Form. Tether. Link."

In the air above Nadia's head, Jason summoned an infinitesimally tiny dot of light. It levitated less than an inch from Nadia's glabella, and an even thinner strand of light flowed from this dot to Nadia's soul.

This was her idea: An external Mind Realm made outside of the person's soul which would later be integrated inside!

Jason had thought about creating an external MindCore and placing it directly inside a patient's soul, but it turned out this would not work. If the patient already had a Mind Realm, simply shoving a MindCore in there would cause catastrophic damage and kill them instantly. If they didn't have a Mind Realm, the MindCore would simply break apart and fragment against their soul, also causing grievous damage.

Thus, the solution came with Nadia's suggestion. What if Jason tethered the person's soul to an externalized Mind Realm, but only through the faintest, weakest link? Then, what if Jason custom-built the MindCore inside this externalized Mind Realm, eventually integrating it back into their soul?

The tether was the key. If he didn't tether their soul at least a tiny bit, the new Mind Realm and MindCore would be rejected by the person's soul. If the link was too strong, then the person would suffer similar, but perhaps lesser agony than Jason endured during his own installation process. And if he made the Mind Realm and MindCore directly inside their soul, well, that simply defeated the point!

Ultimately, the Procedure for Installing MindCores Externally was conceived, or PRIME, for short.

The biggest issue with PRIME was that it wouldn't have worked on Jason or on Catherine, since it required forming a Mind Realm for the first time externally. So long as Jason didn't have to do that in the future, PRIME had no downsides and was strictly a better way of installing MindCores.

Finally, Jason began.

He started by creating the Mind Realm itself, and since Nadia was a Thinker-Hero, Jason decided he would really go all out for her from the start. He took as much power as he could siphon from the local star clusters, passed that energy through Aevum's transference array, and turned it into raw magical energy. Then he began expanding Nadia's Mind Realm to a level far beyond his own.

Unfortunately, Jason's Mind Realm was already solidified. He could improve his MindCore, albeit painfully, but he could not increase the density or size of his Mind Realm. This ultimately wasn't a huge deal for him, as the size of a Mind Realm only really limited what could be stuffed inside of it. Nadia was going to be absorbing an ungodly amount of information thanks to her power, while Jason mainly created blueprints and schematics on the spot. The amount of knowledge he had absorbed from books only appeared inside his Mind Realm as a tiny 'blip' of information.

After all, storing a bunch of books on a computer took very little storage space compared to images, videos, songs, and other highly complex media. Since Nadia would be storing the full comprehension of anything she learned, that would be tens of times more space-intensive than the methods Jason used.

As such, he first inflated her Mind Realm to the biggest size he could muster. It ended up being three times the size of his own. He created several minor components that would allow it to increase further in the future depending on her needs, assuming her spirituality increased further, then he focused on making her Mind Realm more 'dense'.

When Jason had first inflated it, it had ended up like a balloon blown up to its maximum size. It was extremely fragile, and a focused telepathic attack could have caused her serious damage. But now, he reinforced Nadia's new Mind Realm as much as possible, turning it into an armored fortress.

Nobody, not even the Second Founder, would ever be able to read her thoughts.

With the basic foundation laid, Jason slowly began constructing an internal world even bigger than the one he had made for Catherine. With greater size came greater raw computational power. As a mortal human, Nadia had far less mana at her disposal, but so long as she lived inside Aevum, she would be able to channel its raw power inside her mind to speed up her mental simulations. Back on Earth, those simulations would be much slower, and the throughput would be less significant, but barring any external factors, she would actually have a higher quality of magical energy at her disposal than even Jason himself.

He had to admit... he was jealous. Nobody had shown him this much care when he started out. The Wordsmith had fumbled around for years, decades, centuries, all while tripping over one roadblock after another.

His Mind Realm's foundation was much crappier than Nadia's. But even so, he was determined to pull out all the stops for her.

"You know, Nadia..." Jason said quietly to the unconscious girl. "I'd love it if you decided to stay in Aevum and help me make it fantastic. But I won't force you. You'll want to go home eventually, and it wouldn't be right for me to take that from you."

He paused to tap his chin.

"Now that I think about it though... is this really the limit of a Mind Realm? Is this all I can do with one? Just make people smarter in different ways? It's not bad, but... I feel like I could do more."

Jason thought about it, but he didn't want to drag out the surgery for too long. He resumed work and started building similar Titan-based architecture, magical arrays, and other such constructs and artifacts all around Nadia's Mind Realm. He chuckled quietly, wondering if Catherine would be jealous of Nadia once she saw how much better Nadia's MindCore was turning out.

But hey, it wasn't Jason's fault. If Catherine hadn't possessed a Mind Realm already, he would have been able to make hers just as good, perhaps even better than Nadia's. Jason had no doubt that the sister of a Trueborn Hero probably had an incredible seed of innate talent. That was why Raphael poached her, after all.

Mind Realms were reality-breaking creations. They encompassed a Sentient's thoughts, dreams, and imagination. They were a microscopic bubble of energy invisible to mundane technology, but they contained an entire microscopic world full of possibility within them. Until the invention of MindCores, Jason imagined all Mind Realms were pretty barren and underutilized.

But that thought gave him pause.

Was this assumption… true?

What about Raphael, Unarin, or Solomon? What about Camael? Could certain legendary Thinkers like them have found a way to uplift the potential of their Mind Realms?

Short of asking them if he could take a peep, Jason wasn't sure.

He shrugged and continued.

Three hours passed. Now that he didn't have to worry about causing his patient pain, Jason was able to Wordsmith nonstop and get the operation done as quickly as possible. He finished up, then stared at the tiny speck of light hovering above Nadia's glabella.

With a wave of his hand, Jason pushed the light into her skull. He held his breath and waited as the Mind Realm began to sprout tendrils inside her head, attaching itself to her soul and brain, forming a link between the two.

A moment later, Nadia's eyes snapped open.

She awakened instantly, without Jason even needing to rouse her. The power of her MindCore was so insane that she instantly overwrote his Word of Power and seized control of her body.

But Nadia did not move. She simply stared up at the ceiling, unblinking.

"Nadia? Nadia, are you okay?" Jason asked.

Jason waved his hand over Nadia's face, but she didn't even twitch an eye. She had no reaction to him whatsoever.

Jason's heart skipped a beat. Had he screwed up?!

He suddenly felt a jolt of ice rush through his veins. He began to fear the worst, as waves of guilt started building up in his heart. The face of Phoebe flashed in front of his eyes, and he took a long, shuddering breath.

"N-Nadia? Come on, honey... Awaken!"

Jason's hands trembled. He locked his gaze onto her own, waiting for a response!

And then, finally, she blinked her eyes.

Nadia's eyes relaxed. She looked to the left, then the right.

"I'm awake?" Nadia asked.

"Yes." Jason said. "Are you okay? Do you need water or anything?"

Nadia blinked a few more times. She sat up in the operating chair, then climbed out of it. She began turning in place, looking all around the room.

"Am I awake?" Nadia asked again, before lowering her eyes and noticing Jason for the first time. "Are you... real?"

Jason quickly nodded. He walked over and gently grabbed her shoulders. "It's me, Jason. Are you okay, Nadia?"

Nadia squinted slightly. She raised a hand... and then she touched Jason's face.

"Am I awake?" Nadia asked again. "Are you real?"

Something was wrong. Jason couldn't tell exactly what, but she almost seemed to be in a state of shock.

"Nadia, you're really awake." Jason repeated.

"...But you've said that before." Nadia said, squinting to look at him carefully. "Am I completely awake? This isn't... another simulation?"

Jason stared at her. "Another simulation? What do you mean?"

She stared back. "What do you mean... 'what do I mean'?"

Nadia pulled away from his grasp. She took a few steps backward and then turned to walk around the room, examining it carefully.

"No... I can't tell. It seems the same as last time." Nadia said to herself, her voice low. "Did I get it wrong again?"

She walked over to the door leading outside, then she opened it up. Jason followed her as she stepped into the hospital medical storage area, which in turn led outside to outer Aevum.

"Dammit!" Nadia suddenly shouted, making Jason jump. "It's the same! Another fucking simulation! How long has it been?! How many times am I going to experience this fucking day again?!"

At that moment, Jason's heart fell. He realized what had happened.

Through some sort of unknown circumstance, Nadia had been trapped inside the RealitySim for an unknown period of time. She had tried to turn it off and return to reality, but must have somehow kept simulating the same events over and over and over again.

The power of her MindCore was terrifying. If it hadn't been calibrated before she used it, she might have lived at 10,000 times Aevum's speed, causing her to live days, weeks, years, or even centuries, unable to escape.

Jason quickly walked over and grabbed Nadia's shoulder.

"Nadia! You've escaped! You've REALLY escaped! It's me, Jason!"

He tried to spin Nadia around, but she quickly pulled away from his grasp and gave him a look of disgust.

"God, would you shut up already?! Always the same nagging shit!" Nadia spat. "Again and again and again! What next, you're going to use your magic to convince me? Teleport me to Earth and show me around? I'm sick of this! I'd rather die than be stuck in here any longer! Just let me die! LET ME FUCKING DIE!!"

Tears welled up in Nadia's eyes. She didn't even bother to wipe them away. She simply turned and stormed out of the room, shrieking in rage at everyone and everything around her.

Jason didn't know what to do. By no means did he blame Nadia for her outburst. She genuinely couldn't tell reality from fiction. If this was happening to anyone else, he would ask Nadia for help on fixing the situation... but the one in need of help was Nadia herself!

Nadia charged into the residential compound. She threw the door open and startled Daisy, who hadn't sensed her approach. Thanks to Nadia's new MindCore, her cerebral presence had been completely masked from telepaths.

"Nadia?" Daisy asked, uncertainly. "Are you-"

"FUCK OFF!!" Nadia shouted, causing Marco and Sasha, sitting on a couch across the room, to jerk in surprise.

Nadia was a prim and proper girl. Somewhat shy. She had never had an outburst like this before. Everyone knew she was going into the operation room, but they didn't expect her to return enraged as if her entire family had been murdered.

Jason quickly entered after her. He saw the looks on everyone's faces and knew Nadia had gone off the rails.

"It's not Nadia's fault!" Jason explained. "I think she was trapped in the RealitySim and-"

"And I keep living the same day over and over and OVER!!" Nadia shouted, spinning to scream at Jason. "This is all your fault! I hate you! I fucking HATE you, do you hear me?! If I ever escape this mental torture, I'm going to kill you myself! GOD! I'm so sick of hearing you say the same thing every single time!!"

Nadia's eyes darted toward the kitchen. She stormed inside and grabbed a giant knife, then charged at Jason with bloodlust and deadly intent.

"Nadia, Nadia I'm real! I'm REAL!" Jason exclaimed. "Put the knife down!"

"I fucking hope you're real!" Nadia spat back. "That way I can kill you for what you've done to me! You worthless piece of shit!"

She tried to stab him, but naturally, her pitiful strength didn't amount to much.

"Restrain!" Jason shouted.

With a single Word of Power, he bound Nadia in place. Her rage turned to fear. Her body trembled as he took a step toward her.

"No! NO! Please! Please don't do it again! Stop! STOP!! I don't wanna start over! I DON'T WANNA START OVER!!"

Jason paused. He obviously wasn't planning to hurt Nadia, but something had been seriously irking him since she woke up.

Just how well did her MindCore predict what was going to happen?! It was as if she had somehow predicted every scenario or thing Jason would say while reliving the day over and over again.

That meant, from her perspective, something kept happening in her predictions that 'reset' the day. Did she kill Jason, causing the day to reset? Did he kill her? Did it end when she fell asleep? Perhaps all of those scenarios, and many more?

Jason carefully walked toward Nadia. She wriggled and writhed, acting as if he were a specter of doom coming to kill her. But then, he he drew close enough, Jason gently held out his palms and touched her face.

"Nadia." Jason said quietly. "I know you think I'm a simulation, okay? I'm not. Please, calm down for a moment, and explain to me what events cause your day to reset."

Nadia started to cry. She was clearly petrified out of her wits, afraid never seeing a future she so desperately wished to experience again.

"You... you... please..." Nadia blubbered. "Please don't kill me... let me wake up... please, please, I'm begging you..."

"Nadia." Jason said quietly. "If you make it to the end of today, and the day doesn't reset, will that convince you you're out of the simulation?"

Nadia closed her eyes. She sobbed quietly, her shoulders trembling.

"You... you've said that... so many times..." Nadia whimpered. "Let me go... please..."

Daisy walked over. Seeing his daughter arrive, Jason released Nadia and took the knife away from her. She broke down crying in Daisy's arms, and Jason left the room.

Naturally, the next morning, Nadia realized that she had broken the cycle. She was back in reality.

But Nadia was not the same person anymore. Her mental torture had instantly changed her from a bright-eyed schoolgirl to a broken mess who constantly doubted her reality.

Even with Nadia having realized she escaped the simulation, she was not fully convinced. She constantly questioned if this was just another level of torture.

As for Jason, he sat inside his Sanctum, a dark cloud hanging over his head.

He had screwed up again. He made her MindCore too powerful and accidentally tortured a young woman for potentially years or longer. He still had no idea how long Nadia had been stuck inside her own head.

"I'm a failure." Jason mumbled to himself. "Always have been. Always will be. Why am I even trying?"

The future of his MindCore projects were now in flux. The guilt he felt laid upon his back like a blue whale, making him feel burdened beyond his own mental limits.

He was no longer certain of what path he should take.

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

The next morning, Jason approached his father. Hideki was lounging on the couch again, watching the final episode of some sitcom from the 70's.

"Dad-" Jason started to say, but Hideki quickly raised a hand.

"No. Go away. The kid'll be fine."

"Have we had this conversation bef-"

"Yup."

Hideki cut his son off without explanation, frustrating Jason immensely. The guilt he felt for what he'd done to Nadia was overwhelming. What did his dad mean by 'she would be okay'? What constituted 'okay'? Because it sure looked like Jason had left Nadia traumatized and fearful.

Just as Jason was about to leave, Hideki turned his eyes to look at Jason, then he spoke up. "Since I'm about to finish this show, I'll only say this once. Son, right now we're on my first loop. Once I see how everything pans out, I might rewind all or some of the way back to the beginning, the day when you locked me in to this new timeline."

"Your first loop?" Jason asked.

"That's right. Any time I reach the end of my natural life, or the end of what used to be the 'end goal', ie; the destruction of Earth, once I rewound all the way back to the beginning, that was one loop. We're still on my first one. I'm currently seeing how everything pans out before I decide whether to go back or not."

Jason stared at his father. "Are you saying you might not rewind time at the end?"

Hideki sighed.

"Jason. I spent so much time trying to save the Earth, and I sort of failed, but then I succeeded when you rewound. I don't want to do all that crap again from the start. I'm tired. I just want to watch my granddaughter grow up, see how things turn out, and then make my decision at the end. If you end up saving the Earth, albeit imperfectly, I'll just leave it like that. I'm not going to bother trying to save everyone. There's going to be losses, people suffering major ill effects, and so on. If it takes a couple of loops to figure out a few key details that will allow you to save humanity, then so be it."

Hideki closed his eyes.

"But I'm done with perfection. I'm aiming for 'good enough' and don't you even bother trying to motivate me beyond that. Don't come running to me, wanting me to fix fuckups on your end. Unless you or Daisy ends up dying, I don't care who else does."

Jason pursed his lips. "But Nadia is just a kid, dad."

"So? Everyone is just a kid at some point. She'll be an adult someday. Depending on how you grade things, spending seventy three years in that simulation technically makes her an old woman. Mentally, at the least."

Jason hadn't told his dad how long Nadia had been in the time loop. Not this rewind, anyway. He must have done so in a previous one. Jason was getting used to his dad knowing stuff Jason was about to tell him.

For some reason, Hideki's words made Jason feel a little better. He wasn't sure why, but Hideki's logic seemed to make Jason's nerves ease up a little bit.

"I see. Thanks, dad." Jason muttered, before turning away.

After Jason left, Hideki clicked play on his sitcom and went back to consuming the content.

Some time later, Jason entered the dormitories. He walked over to the female half, then paused outside for a long time.

Jason hung his head. He wanted to knock, to go inside, to see how Nadia was doing.

But he didn't feel that he deserved to know. He had screwed her up. He had ruined her life and locked her inside a simulation for 73 years.

She was a teenager when she entered. With no real social contact, she had been living with fake people for what felt like tens of real years. Her RealitySim had been supercharged to such a level that it had spun up way outside of anyone's expectations. Jason hadn't taken more than ten to fifteen seconds to wake her up after attaching the MindCore to her Mind Realm, but those seconds ended up becoming a lifetime's worth of trauma.

Suddenly, the door opened, startling Jason. Daisy stood in the doorway.

"Dad..." Daisy said, noticing the poorly concealed pain on his face. "Come in. Nadia's been waiting for you."

"She has?" Jason asked. "That's hard to believe."

Daisy sighed. She gestured inside, and Jason followed her.

When he entered, Jason was surprised to see Nadia and Sasha sitting at a small table. Nadia calmly sipped some tea. She smiled when Jason walked over.

"Hey." Jason said.

"Hey." Nadia replied.

A moment of hesitation later, Nadia carefully motioned with her hand to the chair on her right. Jason chose to sit on the opposite side of the table. When he sat, Sasha and Daisy left the room, allowing Jason and Nadia to remain together, alone. This was outside his expectations.

"I'm... I'm so sorry." Jason said quietly. "I don't even know what to say, or where to begin."

"A lot has happened." Nadia said softly. "Jason, I'm sorry too.. I said some... some really terrible things. I didn't know this was reality. I thought I was still in the simulation."

"I know." Jason answered. "But it's only natural you'd hate me so much after what I did to you. Don't pretend you were making things up just so you won't hurt my feelings now. I deserve your hatred."

Nadia shook her head.

"Jason, you really don't know me that well. The others do. I realized I was trapped in a simulation within the first week. You know how my powers work. I am able to comprehend things extremely well, and my powers worked just fine inside my Mind Realm."

Nadia licked her lips thoughtfully.

"I immediately realized something had gone wrong with the surgery. I first hallucinated exiting surgery and talking to you about how things had gone. Everything seemed to have ended well, but at the end of the day, time rewound, and I woke up back in the surgery room."

She continued. "For a short time, I thought I might have somehow started rewinding time like Hideki. But I deduced that was extremely unlikely, and since my new MindCore was all about simulations, I started feeling afraid that I was trapped in a coma. I didn't know that my MindCore had drastically accelerated my perception of time."

Jason looked at her in surprise. "So your anger wasn't that you had been trapped..."

"Not at all. I started to think that every second spent in the false reality meant a second had passed in realspace. I thought I was trapped there with reality passing me by. I thought that if I was there long enough, all my real friends would grow old and die, or leave me behind in an unknown future."

"I spent the first several years trying to break the loop. I never succeeded." Nadia explained. "But then I found out that I could change what was being simulated by conversing with the other characters. It's a little hard to explain, but for some reason, I didn't possess 'administrator rights' over my MindCore. You did. Well, your character in my dream, at least. Except your character kept treating me like a stupid little girl who didn't know the difference between my head and my toes, so I had to find ways to convince him to alter the parameters of the looping reality."

Jason listened quietly. He was surprised by Nadia's calmness, but now he understood why.

It was because after waking up, Nadia realized that no time had passed at all in the outside world. She hadn't been idly wasting her time away inside the simulation, but had previously been terrified and angry, thinking her friends would have moved on without her, or Earth might have fallen, or some other horrid circumstance might have come to pass! Instead, everything was okay, and her fears had ultimately proven unfounded.

"What sort of alterations did you make?" Jason asked.

"Well, I found out that the character of Jason in my simulation actually seemed to have all your knowledge." Nadia said. "So I had him teach me about the events of the future, and tell me everything he knew. Um. Well, I'm uh... I'm sorry to say this... but I know all about your Wordsmithing now. All the, um, secret details you haven't told anyone else."

Nadia looked away sheepishly, while Jason's pupils shrunk to pinpricks. His heart nearly stopped on the spot!

"H-how?!" Jason gasped. "How would the simulated version of myself..."

He paused. Then it dawned on him.

"It's because... when I made your MindCore, I really poured my power into making your Mind Realm. It must have linked up my memories and placed them inside your Mind Realm."

Nadia nodded in embarrassment. "I wouldn't have pressured 'him' so much, but I was desperate to escape. I thought if I unraveled your abilities, I might find a loophole I could exploit to wake myself up."

Jason relaxed a little.

"It's fine, Nadia. I don't mind that you know. It's probably better if you do. I could use a smart person who knows my abilities on my side. If you don't hate me, that is."

Nadia smiled shyly. "Well, the simulations of everyone else were quite... crude. It became clear to me that the others were only, um, shallow recreations of their living selves. Only you felt real and genuine."

She crossed her arms and then looked away. "But anyway, um, so yeah. I started simulating the future events you knew and learned all kinds of crazy stuff. It seems your plans for the future go deeper than anyone here knows. I only yelled at you out of frustration, but I didn't mean any of those awful things I said. I'm sorry, Jason. I'm really sorry."

"I'm sorry too." Jason said, pressing his face into his palm. "I've only ever felt as awful as when you woke up and started screaming maybe two or three other times in my life."

Nadia looked at him. She seemed as if she wanted to say something, but then she decided not to.

Even Jason had no idea just how many of his rawest memories Nadia had seen and lived.

"I simulated a lot of things." Nadia said, changing the subject somewhat. "With your- I mean, Mind-Jason's help, I was able to create a simulation of Volgarius and explore it. I traveled around inside the future Labyrinth. I tried building new technology, but all my progress kept getting reset at the end of each 24 hour period. Also, sometimes Mind-

Jason wouldn't work with me, and that happened around 40% of the time, so I ended up wasting a lot of days."

"Well, at least you didn't seem to go insane." Jason said. "...Right? Are you doing okay, mentally?"

"I think I'm okay." Nadia said softly. "But I'm still, still not entirely sure if this is the real world. I keep thinking I'll wake up back on that operating chair. If I do, I might truly break this time..."

Sometimes, it was worse for someone who was suffering to experience a moment of pure joy and hope, especially if it was only going to be snuffed out by the same darkness as before. Luckily, Jason knew she had truly woken up. She was going to be okay.

"You said you don't have admin access." Jason pointed out. "Maybe I can fine-tune your RealitySim's settings?"

"Please do." Nadia immediately agreed. "I don't know if I'll fall asleep again and get locked into a new loop for an entire night. Based on what I've heard, I was only under the loop for fifteen Aevum-seconds. If it were an entire night, then..."

Jason swallowed heavily. She didn't say the last part, but he knew what she meant. It would probably end up feeling like hundreds of thousands, or perhaps even millions of years. The compounding effect of Aevum's time acceleration could apparently prove disastrous when paired with an overclocked MindCore.

Jason carefully stood up, then walked around the table to stand behind Nadia. When he reached out and touched both sides of Nadia's head, he felt her body tense up.

It didn't feel as if she were scared of his touch, but rather... something else. He couldn't put his finger on it.

Jason closed his eyes. He uttered a few Words of Power and identified the issues that had locked up her MindCore, then told her how to fix the issue. After making some crucial adjustments herself, Nadia finally obtained administrator rights, and she relaxed a little.

Jason started to walk back to the other side of the table, but he paused and instead sat in the chair on her right, like she had indicated earlier.

"Can you try activating a simulation again?" Jason asked.

Nadia didn't move. She shook slightly, becoming visibly fearful of the suggestion.

"I... I don't know if... if I can..." Nadia said softly.

"I'll be here with you this time." Jason said. "I won't let your MindCore trap you again."

Nadia looked at him with trusting eyes. She silently nodded, then Jason uttered a Word of Power.

His soul separated from his body, and he dove into her glabella. He helped her create a new simulation inside of her RealitySim, one which was small enough in scale that it would allow her to re-acclimate to properly simulating reality, yet big enough that it could feel substantial.

They decided to simulate Nadia's bedroom back on Earth. When they arrived, Nadia paused to look around.

"It's so... childish..." She muttered, before blushing in embarrassment. "I'm sorry. I haven't seen my room in a long time. This isn't who I am anymore..."

Jason glanced at the walls. Her room was mostly clean and tidy, but there were lots of posters of Russian techno boy bands, with young and hunky heartthrobs. Her shelves had figurines of various idols, and other stuff that marked her as a teenage girl.

"I didn't know you were into stuff like this." Jason commented idly.

Nadia shrugged. She picked up a figurine off the table. "I'm not. Not anymore. This is all from my childhood."

Jason's stomach sank. He stared at Nadia, wordless, for a few moments.

It was at this moment that it really hit him. She was just like him now. A fully matured adult, trapped in the body of a teenager. She had long grown out of so many things she enjoyed as a teenager that looking back at her room was totally alienating.

Sure, she had spent seventy-three years inside the same looping day, but there was no chance she hadn't grown up and matured at least a little. Especially with the MindCore drastically empowering her intelligence.

Nadia bit her lower lip. She gave Jason a strange look, with eyes that contained a mystery he didn't quite understand.

"I don't know how I'm going to face them." Nadia said.

"W-who?" Jason asked.

"Everyone." Nadia said, lowering her eyes. She fiddled with the figurine absentmindedly. "My mother and father. My friends out there. For you all, I went into an operating room one day ago. But for me, I've been out of contact with Daisy, Marco, and Sasha for seven decades. I stopped enjoying talking to their simulated selves a long time ago."

"Well... what do you like to do now, then?" Jason asked.

Nadia didn't look up from the floor.

"I... I like..."

She fell silent, unable to meet his gaze.

"...you were always there for me." Nadia said, after several moments of quiet. "You showed me a fantastical future. A world of aliens, and demons, angels, monsters. You showed me the galaxy. You entertained me, comforted me when I was on the verge of mentally breaking... you were the only one who was always there. The other simulated people were simply... hollow."

Jason felt his blood go cold. When Nadia looked at him, he finally recognized the look in her eyes.

It wasn't a bad look. It was, by all accounts, a deep sense of love and adoration. It was the look of a woman who had found her soulmate.

But there was just one problem.

"That... wasn't..." Jason started to say.

"It wasn't you. I know." Nadia said quietly. "It was your simulated self. And he reset every day. He reverted back to the you of now. I grew to love him more and more, to the point it hurt my heart when I remembered precious, shared memories which he never could."

"Nadia." Jason said, his tone even. "I'm truly sorry. What I've done to you is... it's unfair. It's really, really unfair."

"You don't love me back." Nadia said.

It wasn't a question. It was a statement, one confirmed by decades of knowledge.

"I already know." Nadia said, sighing to herself. She turned her head to look out the window at the simulated neighborhood outside of her house. The sun shone down on the flower gardens, vehicles parked in driveways, and dogs roaming around in their yards.

Jason's expression fell.

He didn't know what to do.

When he failed to speak, Nadia intervened. "You love your wife, Phoebe. Your simulated self spoke about her often. He even made me feel jealous with how much he loved her. I wished he would love me that much. Since I couldn't forge any permanent bonds with him... since he always forgot our shared experiences... our relationship never developed further. Perhaps it was for the better. He was only a fantasy, after all. But for seventy-three years, he didn't feel like one."

Jason massaged his elbow. He looked out the window as well, feeling deeply uncomfortable with the direction of the conversation, clueless as to what to say, and at a loss for what to do.

"You have to delete that... that fake Jason." Jason said. "You had no choice but to love him, or risk psychosis from loneliness. He's not real, though. He's just a delusion."

"You know, he said the same thing many times when I told him I loved him." Nadia said. "I cried a lot. Too many times. He never once looked at me as a woman. But I didn't care, because I prayed I would break free someday."

Nadia swallowed heavily.

"I love you, Jason." She said, turning to look at him. "I love you so much that I don't want you to force yourself to love me back. I know you feel deeply guilty about what happened to me. But you shouldn't. You should find Phoebe and save her. Don't hesitate or second guess your feelings just because of me. I'll stay here on the sidelines, hoping, praying, pining like a fool to see if you ever have room in your heart for me."

"I know it's hard." Jason said, uneasily meeting her gaze. "But you should try to move on."

"Oh, don't worry. I will." Nadia promised. "But right now, my biggest fear is that... after hearing everything I've said, you'll push me away. You won't force me to leave, will you?"

Jason immediately shook his head. "No! Of course not. If you want to stay in Aevum, you can. If you want to leave, you can. I owe you that much."

"Thank you, Jason." Nadia said, smiling beautifully. "I knew you'd say that... but I still had doubts. It seems I haven't learned any self-confidence after seventy-three years."

She paused. The room became quiet.

Nadia looked away. "You should go. I want to stay here for a while, by myself. I need to sort some things out."

Jason nodded. "Yeah. Of course. I'll go. If you aren't awake within sixty seconds, I'll check to make sure you're not trapped again."

"That won't be necessary. I have full control now." Nadia promised.

After exchanging a few more words, Jason silently withdrew, leaving Nadia alone. His soul departed from her Mind Realm, and she was once again alone.

She stood in the bedroom she'd lived in when she was a teenager, feeling like an old woman who stepped through a time machine.

"This isn't who I am anymore." Nadia said.

With a wave of her hand, she fragmented the reality and destroyed it, instead conjuring a bedroom that seemed much more modern, inside an apartment building inside New York City.

The sights outside were jaw-dropping. Nadia looked out the window at Central Park, where featureless, faceless human blobs milled around in the distance.

"It's fine if the 'real' Jason doesn't love me." Nadia said. "Because I have you."

She waved her hand. Jason reappeared in front of her.

But this was not the real Jason. He was the simulation of his downloaded memories.

Nadia touched his head, altering his cerebral parameters. This was now effortless for her, after she had finally unlocked full control over her MindCore.

"Forget about Phoebe now." Nadia said quietly, rewriting the false Jason's memories. "But no need to force things."

She paused.

"Why don't we... get to know each other properly this time?"

'Jason' smiled.

"You look a little young for me, but I wouldn't mind getting to know you better." He said.

Part 708: Sarabiya

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Jason sat inside his Sanctum yet again, his legs crossed, his elbows on his knees, his hands folded together, and his head bowed in thought. It was a pose he had become familiar with over the last year or so he'd spent in Aevum.

Yesterday, when he assumed this pose, it was because he was feeling deep guilt and a sense of failure so profound it bordered on the suicidal.

Today, he felt better. But not by much.

After speaking to Nadia and learning the truth of her situation, Jason didn't feel like he had gotten lucky. He had still badly traumatized the young girl. Things may have turned out better than expected, but they had not turned out well.

He thought for a long while about the next steps in his grand plan.

He decided he didn't like the way that plan was going.

"I want to see my wife again." Jason mumbled to the void.

It was his heart's deepest desire. It was a hunger that overwhelmed even the pain of her loss. It was the single strand of hope he was holding on to, hoping it would help him overcome the agony he had suffered when he held her body in his arms.

In truth, he knew the possibility this would make him whole again was essentially zero. He was too broken now. The pieces could not be put back together.

But... even if it was no longer possible, he still had the selfish wish to see her smiling face one more time.

"Daisy wants to see her mom too." Jason reminded himself.

This Phoebe wasn't his wife, nor was she Daisy's mom. She was her younger self who didn't know either of them.

But to the Jason of now, that did not matter.

Jason slowly stood up. He stretched his limbs and cracked his back. His body shivered as the blood rushed into his dormant muscles, feeling both painful and pleasurous.

Then, uttering a Word of Power, he disappeared.

Deep inside the deserts of south western Egypt, within an environment seemingly inhospitable to most lifeforms, there existed a secret area hidden by a formation made from fairy magic. This formation was massive, more than five miles in diameter, hidden deep within the Sahara's oppressive heat.

It was no ordinary formation. It used the constant, year-round solar energy to generate enough energy to power a protective force field that cooled its interior to a pleasant level of heat. Inside the barrier, a civilized oasis had formed thousands of years prior, when humanity was still in its infancy, and Egypt had been the powerhouse of the world.

This land was known as Sarabiya; The Illusory City.

Few knew how to find it, and none of them were mortal humans. For all their modern military power and cerebral conceit, the humans of the 21st century had yet to exhaustively scour the deserts for such a land. Since almost nobody knew it existed, they wouldn't bother to look for it when thousands of planes had flown over the desert since the early 1900s.

The only entrance to the city of Sarabiya was the Pylon of Whispers, a giant trapezoidal gate where the illusory formation could be raised and lowered at will. The gate itself was large but benign, with murals carved into its face of beautiful women, handsome men, and children playing gaily, all to seduce the minds of any wanderers lost in the desert who might fall prey to the Sphinx's machinations.

The entire layout of Sarabiya centered around the Citadel of the Sphinx, a massive fortress with an open roof where Bahamut could take to the throne atop the citadel and project her voice across the city, commanding her thralls to do as she wished. The Citadel itself was seemingly made of gold bricks, but in actuality they were bricks of compacted sand, tinted using magic from the demons to give her citadel a blinding brilliance under the midday sun. Though the Sahara's heat might not penetrate its barrier, its sun was just as bright as anywhere else, and thus the Sphinx's Citadel would hurt the eyes of any who gazed upon its beauty for too long.

The citadel itself was designed to resemble a modified Pyramid, but one that had more of an Incan design than the ones found across Egypt. It was formed with giant steps that led upward to the open-domed roof, allowing her servants to approach from any direction and bow before their queen. Its unique design was due to the efforts of a demonic builder who had put his own touch on it, much to Bahamut's delight. She very much enjoyed owning one-of-a-kind wonders that nobody else did.

It was on a random Friday in January when the entrance to Sarabiya flickered. A demon envoy appeared and knelt outside on one knee as he activated the formation magic and awaited Bahamut's response.

Bahamut, the leader of this city, had ruled without restraint since her awakening as the Sphinx after obtaining the power from her predecessor, Jarnof. Thousands had entered her gates over the years, and few had left. She rarely had guests, but those she allowed were either powerful demons, or envoys of said demons.

Thus, the veil of illusion flickered, and a monster stepped outside. This monster was quite grotesque, large, and brutish. It had pure black skin with golden engravings upon its body. It was completely nude, wielding a single demonstone polearm that could deal massive damage to anyone it sought to destroy.

"State your name." The lone guard said, its gravelly voice hideous and frightening.

The demon raised his head. "I am Dagon, Baron of Filth, vassal to Emperor Auger. I come to deliver news from the east."

The guardsman slowly looked Dagon's body up and down. Dagon was a hideous demon, with rotted teeth and a smile that could make a man vomit on the spot. He wore black robes that did little to stifle the desert's heat, but as a demon he didn't care about temperatures like these. He was used to worse.

"Proceed." The guard replied.

Dagon nodded. He rose, then entered the city, walking down its streets with speed and purpose.

Sarabiya was not an ordinary city. Its residents were mindless monsters controlled completely by Bahamut, and as such they did not live like any other creatures in the Milky Way.

They still needed to eat food, so some were designated as farmers and forced to toil endlessly during the day. The grain they farmed was made into simple, flavorless meals intended only for the thralls. Bahamut herself ate delicacies imported from all around the world.

The slaves still needed to sleep, so they all went to bed at the same time, save for Bahamut's harem, who worked in shifts to please their sleepless master.

The slaves did not require socialization, or have any desires. Thus, they all lived in plain, boring, bland abodes with limited facilities. Their lives would be considered bleak to any outside observers, worse than the living conditions of many third world human nations.

But they were mindless. Their true selves slept, unaware of the passage of time.

Thus, as Dagon quickly moved down the streets, he forced himself to ignore the silence. It was as if he were walking through a dead city, one whose people had all perished thousands of years ago. There was no chatter in the streets, no vendors selling food, no children running around and playing, nothing to indicate tens of thousands of people lived here.

He passed by beautiful, empty courtyards. Not intended for the people, but for Bahamut's amusement alone. She frequently had these marvels ripped down and rebuilt in fresh forms to amuse herself. As a result, long lost structures that may have once qualified as 'ancient world wonders' had been lost to memory.

Dagon approached the Sphinx's Citadel. He had come here many times, but even so, he sighed with envy as he looked up at the towering golden pyramid. Its beauty stole the wind from his lungs. He paused for a moment to gaze upon its splendor, then he walked inside through one of the four grand entrances at the bottom.

The outside of the Citadel was always brilliantly bright. The Egyptian sun made one's eyes sting, but the interior of the Citadel had no windows at all. Once he entered, the light behind him quickly disappeared. By the time he'd rounded a few corners, Dagon had entered a new world illuminated by flickering torches ensconced along the walls.

Instead of the seductive murals outside, the inner walls were covered in detailed, low-relief carvings that depicted Bahamut's victories over various mythical creatures and heroes... always culminating in the moment of her captives' binding. These were not glorious battle scenes, but moments of subtle, inevitable defeat, often showing her subjects frozen mid-riddle.

How many men and women had become ensnared over the years? None knew, not even Bahamut herself. Even though their bodies had been enslaved, sometimes she got a kick of out torturing one of her subjects to death, or just killing someone if she was in a bad mood. She certainly didn't care about some random human slave's death. She could acquire others with ease.

The floors of her Citadel were a mosaic of polished obsidian and white marble arranged in intricate geometric patterns that often resolved into the abstract shaped of coiled serpents, predatory eyes, or otherworldly creatures she had seen in her dreams. The mosaics were always kept polished and immaculate by her harem.

Before long, Dagon passed the first harem chamber. He stopped and grinned as he looked upon the otherworldly beauty of female slaves bathing together, washing their bodies, their seductive figures tantalizingly close, yet punishable by death if a guest like himself were to touch.

These women were sometimes not women at all. Bahamut's magic could change the forms of her slaves. She could turn humans into monsters, and monsters into humans. Demons were counted among her slaves, tacitly allowed by demonkind's rulers as long as they were weak, useless peons. No Emperor cared if a few hundred useless grunts went missing.

Thus, if the true figures of these beautiful women were to be revealed, their actual beauty would surely diminish, and some might prove to have originally been men! The same was true of her male harem members, some of whom might have originally been women. Bahamut considered the changing of her harem's forms to be a sort of torture in and of itself.

Bahamut had two types of slaves. The first were her thralls who had no need to speak, and no need to look beautiful as they merely worked the mines beneath the city. The second group were members of her harem, whom she could be quite capricious with. She made sure these slaves were only the finest and most beautiful or handsome individuals she could forge. Each one tickled her fancy in a slightly different way. Who knew how many she had assaulted over the eons? Her sexual appetite was voracious. She loved to exert her will over defenseless people more than anything else.

Dagon stared into the room of beauties for a long moment, feeling his loins heat up. He often wished someone would take out Bahamut so he and the other demons could force themselves upon her harem, but even he had no idea that their appearances were entirely artificial. Without Bahamut around, they would return to their original forms.

If Bahamut were a demon, her title would likely have been Emperor of Lies.

Dagon eventually swallowed heavily. He continued deeper into the citadel, proceeding deep underground. Eventually, through the silence of the citadel's lonely halls, he heard a woman's laughter. It was not pleasant, but rather vicious and cruel.

"Hee! Look at you, imbecile! That is what you get for spilling my precious wine! You have but one job, yet you cannot do even that much! Tell me, are you useless or not, HEE?!"

Dagon rounded the corner. He paused when he entered a grand chamber where he saw Bahamut laying on her side atop a gold and red couch, slaves bowing before her. Bahamut sipped wine from a comically ostentatious golden goblet, chirping as her tongue flicked from her beak to dab at the liquid.

In the center of the room, there was a beautiful female slave lashed to a table, her arms and legs outstretched in all directions, violently yanked apart by shackles. The table was a torture device intended to eventually rip the limbs off its victims by slowly pulling them apart. A cruel and heinous method of torture, and one that Bahamut reveled in.

Bahamut's slaves were usually compelled into mindless silence by her magic. But on this day, the woman lashed to the table was shivering and crying, her body in absolute agony. Bahamut had deliberately removed the mental suppression, delighting in the woman's pained whimpers and begging for forgiveness.

"Please- please... so sorry... so sorry... oh god... forgive me... aaahh!!"

Another harem slave silently turned a knob, pulling the victim's body ever so slightly further apart. Her fingers and toes spasmed helplessly. She could do nothing to save herself. She was completely defenseless.

When Dagon entered the room, he could not help but to stare at this scene with great lust. What he would give to own and possess so many beautiful slaves and force himself upon them as he desired! He greatly envied Bahamut, wishing it had been him who obtained the Sphinx's power instead of her.

He was a vile and disgusting creature no different from the Sphinx herself. Birds of a feather flocked together, as the old saying went.

"Oh! Hee, if it isn't Dagon!" Bahamut said, noticing him for the first time as he entered the room. "Took you long enough! Were you peeping on my girls again, you little lecher?"

Bahamut's shrill voice was irritating, but Dagon ignored it. He walked beside the tortured slave and paused to stare lustfully at her nude body, then turned his attention to Bahamut.

"Ahaha, lady Bahamut, my apologies. I am but a simple-minded male, after all. I cannot help but become enamored with all the pleasures of your kingdom. Naturally, I know better than to touch that which belongs to you."

"As you should!" Bahamut chirped.

She sat up, then placed her goblet of wine on a table beside her couch.

"What news do you bring?" Bahamut asked after a moment.

Dagon dropped to one knee and forced an expression of respect upon his face.

"Emperor Auger wishes for you to know that Satan has begun an assault on Heaven." Dagon summarized. "Mount Sinai is now under attack. When the time comes, we intend to bring you angels you can bind with your magic. We respectfully ask that you interrogate them and uncover Raphael's plans for the future."

Bahamut scoffed. "Hee! Satan is attacking Heaven directly? Did that fool not learn his lesson from last time? The angels have an unimaginable home field advantage! What an idiot!"

Dagon blinked. He was not used to hearing one of his Emperors so directly criticized.

"Our goal is not to defeat the angels." Dagon quickly explained. "Satan wishes to... acquire... something they possess. Thus, a few million casualties are a small price to pay."

Bahamut simmered down. "I see. That is more reasonable. Chee! Very well, if you bring me some new thralls, I shall interrogate them."

She paused, then sneered with her eyes.

"But you had better give me attractive ones! Most angels are so hideous I cannot stand to look at them! Pretentious beings, thinking their feathers are more beautiful than mine!"

Dagon nodded dumbly. He personally thought angels were quite fair and beautiful, but it seemed Bahamut held a different opinion. And was that jealousy in her voice? He couldn't be certain.

"Is there anything else?" Bahamut asked, after a time.

Dagon paused. He glanced at the helpless female slave lashed to the torture rack. She was so weak and delirious from pain that she hadn't even noticed he had entered the room.

"It would be such a shame for you to throw away this morsel..." Dagon said slowly. "Lady Bahamut, if you wish for her to suffer, why not give her to me? I assure you, I will take great pleasure in tormenting this errant slave until she begs for death."

Bahamut snorted. "Krrt, she already begs me for death. How pathetic of you, lustfully coveting my toys. Who do you think you are?"

She directed a glare full of rage at Dagon. He did not cower, but he did feel a flash of fear. Bahamut herself was not considered anything much, but the prestige she wielded among demonkind due to her unique abilities meant she was favored by the higher ups. If he blundered diplomatically here, they might execute him to get back on her good side!

Naturally, Dagon quickly lowered his head.

"Apologies, lady Bahamut. I spoke thoughtlessly. Please forgive this stupid and sinful male for his words."

Bahamut did not say anything for a short time.

Then, she clicked her tongue.

"Chrrrup! Perhaps your suggestion has some merit. I tire of doing everything myself around here. And maybe it would be fun watching you ravish this stupid and useless creature! I have changed my mind. Release her and take her right here on the spot."

Dagon's heart soared. He looked up in astonishment at Bahamut. "Lady Bahamut, do you truly mean it?"

"Hee! Of course I do!" Bahamut giggled evilly. "But! You had better put on a show for me! I wish to hear this woman scream and beg for mercy even more than she did earlier! You will do this for MY pleasure, not yours! If you fail, I will have you executed and none of your superiors will say a word! Are you sure you are willing to assume such a risk?!"

Dagon's soaring heart immediately plummeted from the heavens to hell. A cold icy feeling washed over his body. He lowered his eyes and fell into thought.

"If... I may be... so presumptuous..." Dagon said slowly. "I would be willing to do so... but only if the reward were commensurate to the risk."

"HEE! Listen to you, thinking you are big in the britches!" Bahamut chirped, squawking with laughter at him. "Are you trying to cut a deal with me, Dagon?"

"A deal, no." Dagon said, shaking his head respectfully. "A suggestion, that is all. How about this, lady Bahamut? If I succeed in torturing this slave to a level that satisfies you, you will consider calling upon me in the future for such matters? Not all of them, of course. But other times, if only to satisfy your hunger for variety! What powerful woman such as yourself does not crave a little novelty in her life?"

Bahamut listened silently to his suggestion. She rested an elbow on the couch's arm and tapped the tip of her beak as she looked up at the ceiling thoughtfully.

"Hee... this is indeed quite novel. No Baron has ever been so daring as to make such a request of me. But I must admit! I have grown a little tired of the same-old, same-old. I suppose it is worth a try! Why not give you one chance, hee?"

She waved her other hand flippantly.

"I accept your proposal. Unbind the wench and ravish her until I am satisfied! If you succeed, I will call upon you occasionally in the future!"

A disgusting smile spread across Dagon's face. Green corpse-like breath emitted from his mouth as he chuckled softly. "Worry not. I will go to any length to satisfy both of our cravings..."

Dagon stood up. He walked over to the table and unbound the woman's wrists, feeling his pants heat up as he gazed upon the succulent meal before him. The woman sagged helplessly, whimpering and unable to move her arms after hours of torture.

Dagon rubbed his palms together with glee. No other demon had ever been granted such a lucky encounter, and even if it resulted in his death, he intended to enjoy every last moment of his life.

"Come here, you tasty little treat..." Dagon whispered, as he reached down to unbind her ankles.

At that moment, the entire Citadel rumbled slightly.

It wasn't a forceful shaking, but one that felt like a minor earthquake. The rumbling passed after just a second or two.

"Hmm?" Bahamut grunted, lifting her eyes to look skyward. "What's this? There's something-"

RUMBLE.

The Citadel shook much more forcefully as a tremor five times stronger shook the halls!

This time, Bahamut stood up and looked into the sky.

"Someone is attacking the city's barrier! Who dares?! Dagon, what did you do?!"

"Me??" Dagon asked, just as shocked as her. "I didn't do anything!"

"You brought an invasion force here? You've betrayed me?!" Bahamut roared.

"No, no, this is a misunderstanding!" Dagon exclaimed, taking a step back. "You've got it wrong! I would never-"

At that moment, something happened Dagon never could have mentally conceived.

Enraged beyond belief, Bahamut clapped her palms together. Her body shook, and then she began to transform.

Never had anyone seen the Sphinx unleash her ancient power. For the first time, Dagon gazed with horror upon the bird-woman as she dropped to all fours and her body took on the figure of a three headed beast.

The head in the middle was Bahamut's head; that of a falcon.

The head on the left was one belonging to a lion.

The head on the right was one that resembled a massive cave bear.

Her body assumed the form of a lion, with four feathered wings similar to those of the angels.

Bahamut's lion head roared loud enough to shatter the eardrums of her closest slaves. Dagon hurriedly jumped away in fear as she leaped toward him and slashed her claws at him.

THUMP!!

Bahamut tore through his haphazard attempt to block and sent him flying! Dagon crashed into the far wall at the same time as another powerful rumbling shook the city of Sarabiya.

"It wasn't me!!" Dagon screamed, right before the head of a bear chomped at his neck, clamped onto his throat, and ripped it out with one swift tearing motion.

Dagon's words died in his mouth. Blood erupted from the terrible gash in his neck, and he fell to the ground, the life leaving his body.

"TRAITORRRS!!" Bahamut roared, before racing through the halls to arrive outside.

Ten more attacks fell upon the barrier protecting her city. When Bahamut emerged, she looked upward just in time to see a tiny figure descending through a hole in Sarabiya's mirage. The hole closed up behind the figure, and it levitated downward like the descent of an omniscient god.

Bahamut's keen eyes picked out the figure's appearance. It was an armored bipedal creature of some sort. Faceless, hidden behind a type of metallic alloy she could not identify.

"A HUMAN?" Bahamut roared. "WHAT HUMAN POSSESSES A POWER LIKE YOURS?! HOW DARE YOU ATTACK MY LAND!"

A male's voice spoke down to her from on high.

"You have something I want. And more than that, you do not deserve to exist any longer."

The Archseer had arrived.

Part 709: Sphinx Slaughter

January 29th, 2021. Sarabiya, Egypt.

Jason levitated above the Sphinx, his cold expression hidden behind the armor that enveloped him from head to toe.

The shell protecting him was not a T-REX, but instead a custom seamless platemail-design Jason had made for himself. Since he could wear any clothing instantly, he didn't need something nanite-based to slip into easily, and thus he could mitigate the molecular weakness of nanite-based armor.

Thus, his suit was made of malleable Wordsmithium engineered not entirely for hardness, but for fluidity. It was extremely comfortable to wear, and made of a self-healing alloy that would heal any damage done to it during the battle. It was especially effective at protecting its wearer from blunt attacks, though sharp attacks were not going to get through much easier.

Jason held a bo staff in his right hand, but not an ordinary one. It was made of pure Wordsmithium, and it had a glowing jewel set in the top and bottom of the staff, keeping it equally balanced. These two jewels shimmered with dazzling multi-colored light, their purpose unknown.

"I could kill you right now." Jason declared. "You are nothing before me but vermin. Yet, when I arrived and saw the state of your so-called 'empire', I felt disgust beyond reason. You deserve a fate worse than death."

"YOU DARE SPEAK TO THIS QUEEN SO RUDELY?!" Bahamut roared. "YOU WILL DIE FOR YOUR INSOLENCE!!"

She flapped her wings and leaped into the sky, rearing her paw back to strike.

Jason stared emptily at his would-be assailant. "How can you kill me when I'm already dead inside?"

Just before Bahamut's claw struck Jason's body, the lower gem on his staff changed colors, turning red. It snapped upward and struck the underside of her bear head, exploding the instant it made contact with infernal flames!

BOOM!!

Bahamut's momentum instantly reversed. Her body was send flying up into the sky from the impact, and she spun backwards three times, unable to stop her momentum. She finally flapped her wings and managed to slow her spinning down, only to see a figure flying toward her, directly in her path.

He teleported?! Bahamut thought.

A blue beam of light fell upon her spinning body and exploded, striking her lion head. Ice erupted in all directions, jarring her senses and causing her to plummet toward the ground. She crashed into the lower edge of her Citadel, breaking fifteen teeth in her lion's mouth and shattering just as many bones. For a brief moment, Bahamut ragdolled down the steps until she struck the ground. She lay there, unmoving, her body throbbing with pain she couldn't even properly feel.

The Sphinx's consciousness wavered. She felt a deep panic start to take hold of her body. Only two blows and she had already been reduced to such a state... who was this attacker? How was he so powerful?!

Bahamut had never publicly revealed the power of her Sphinx form. A long time ago, at some point after Egypt became a world Empire, long after the War in Heaven, she had grown sick and tired of one specific Demon Emperor. She had sneakily pursued him until he was somewhere all alone, transformed, and killed him in a fast but brutal fight.

The power of the Sphinx's transformation was terrifying! Her normal body was weak and pathetic, but so long as she properly transformed, she could kill certain Demon Emperors. Yet now, this new enemy was stronger then most Demon Emperors! How could he be so fearsome?!

A dull ringing in all of Bahamut's heads brought her back to reality. She woozily opened her eyes, then let out a scream when she saw a pair of boots right in front of her lion head's nose!

"Get up." Jason said, staring down on her like a wrathful god of vengeance. "Your death will not come immediately, because you do not deserve a quick end. I have seen what kind of creature you are, and I will not allow you to exist in this world for much longer. But until I make you disappear, I will ensure every last instant of your life is spent wallowing in terror."

Bahamut scrambled backward. She looked up at the faceless attacker in shock, her spirit already broken. She was a cowardly person at heart, and always relied on lies and deception to defeat her foes. Her riddle magic served as a convenient way to permanently enslave anyone, but only if they played along. If they were strong enough to ignore her games, then her riddle magic served no purpose whatsoever!

Now that she had met a superior foe, someone who she could not hope to defeat, she quickly tried to think of contingency plans! The first one that came to mind was calling upon her demonic allies, but the problem was that her command crystal was inside her palace. If she could not activate it, then nobody would come to save her. The last person who visited her before Dagon had visited two years prior! That meant reinforcements were not going to waltz in through the front door by pure happenstance!

The next contingency would involve some sort of sneak attack that left her enemy crippled. But that was even more of a joke! She could feel that both of her front legs were badly injured to the point she could barely move them. Her claws were her strongest weapons with the greatest striking power.

How could she defeat this unknown enemy? How? How??!!

"You can't." Jason said, making a chill descend upon Bahamut's heart. "I have already considered all the angles. Your Sphinx Form is well known to me. In fact, I had two friends in the past who both assumed the form of the Sphinx. They told me all about its strengths and weaknesses."

Bahamut coughed ferociously, spitting teeth from her mouth. "Kuhak!! No- NO! That isn't possible! Jarnof was the only Sphinx before me! How could you know him?! You aren't a demon! You're clearly a human!"

"A human, yes. Jarnof, no." Jason said, taking a slow step toward Bahamut. "Riddle magic is interesting. If someone fails to guess the riddle, you enslave them. But if they guess correctly, they become the Sphinx. At the same time, if someone simply kills the Sphinx, they will also succeed in obtaining the Sphinx's powers."

Jason knelt down and hovered his faceless mask mere inches from Bahamut. He stared at her through the metal, making her shiver in fear.

"I could kill you in an instant. Take your power for myself. But I don't want your power, you filthy witch."

Bahamut's heart flew from hell to heaven. She looked at him with a mixture of surprise, hope, horror and dread.

"Y-you don't?" Bahamut shakily whispered.

"There is a slave among your ranks. Her name is Phoebe Berthold. Do you know her?" Jason asked.

Bahamut blinked. She looked at the ground, her mind racing.

One slave out of thousands. She had an incredible memory, but it was hardly eidetic, and when she factored in the thousands of slaves she had taken over the millennia, they all became a blur...

Jason waved his hand. An image of Phoebe materialized in midair.

"She was one of King Arthur's Knights of the Round Table. I have long admired this woman, and I wish to see her. I know she is still alive among your slaves, but I am not certain which one is her."

Jason cocked his head slightly.

"Have her come here. Release her from your Riddle Magic, and swear an oath of servitude to me. If you do, I will allow you to live."

Bahamut's icy blood immediately heated up.

That was all he wanted?! It was simple, far too easy a task to complete. But...

"If... if you simply killed me... you would become the Sphinx." Bahamut said, trembling at her own stupidity for uttering such words. "Y-you could release all my slaves with ease. Why, then, would you not...?"

"Because your power is not something I desire." Jason said, his voice gravelly. "I suppose if you'd prefer, I can simply kill you now."

His staff twitched as he started to move it, and Bahamut's pupils shrunk to pinpricks.

"N-no!! No, I am sorry, master! I will call her at once! Forgive m-m-my impudence!!"

Bahamut bowed her heads until they all struck the ground. She reached out with her powers and quickly searched the area. She vaguely remembered Phoebe's identity, as she had been one of the more noteworthy women Bahamut had enslaved in the past. Luckily, she found her.

"Th-the guards... at the front gate." Bahamut whispered. "One of them is the woman you seek. I have called her over. She will arrive soon!"

Jason remained on one knee. His faceless helmet seemed to stare at Bahamut with enough intensity to bore directly into her bones. She shivered in fright, unable to speak.

Thirty seconds later, the sound of heavy footsteps came running over. Jason turned to look, only to see an absolutely massive, armored figure approaching from behind.

This figure was none other than the gate guard who had conversed with Dagon earlier that day. The massive, intimidating monster slowed to a stop, then bowed its head toward Bahamut, seemingly uncaring of the one that threatened her life.

"Release her now." Jason said.

Bahamut bobbed her head up and down, praying this wasn't all just a dream. She lifted a paw, slowly and painfully, and made a motion with her claws, sending energy and power into the gate guard.

Within seconds, the monster began to shrink in stature. Down, down, down it fell, until it was a head shorter than Jason. Its black chitinous armor faded away, and slowly, the form of a white haired woman took form.

Phoebe.

Her eyes fluttered as she stood in place. She looked around in confusion, uncertain of what was happening.

"Phoebe Berthold." Jason said. "How are you feeling?"

His words were diplomatic and neutral, but in that moment, Bahamut sensed something about him change.

The words may have been neutral, but his tone had warmed slightly.

He had feelings for this woman!

Was it possible he loved her? Was that why he came all this way to rescue her? Maybe he didn't want to take a life in exchange for saving one.

Bahamut's eyes flickered with insight.

This man was soft! He wasn't a killer at all! That was why he was going to spare her life instead of doing the logical thing and killing the Sphinx!

Phoebe massaged her forehead, then looked around, assessing the situation.

"Where... am I?" Phoebe asked.

"You were a slave to the Sphinx." Jason said quietly. "But I have fought your enemy and forced her to free you. Do you remember now?"

Phoebe blinked. She looked down at the bloodied and crippled three-headed monster laying on the ground before the kneeling man.

She didn't recognize the monster, except for one of its heads. That bird-head! How could she ever forget!

"You!" Phoebe gasped. "It was you who tricked me! I remember now! When I was out in the wilderness, fleeing from Arthur's men..."

Bahamut shivered. If the man truly did have feelings for Phoebe, then any damning words she spoke might bring an executioner's axe upon Bahamut's neck. That was something she did not wish to happen.

Bahamut coughed again, spiting blood from her throat. "G-great one, you have beaten me and I have freed your woman. As such, I wish to treat you as my-"

Bahamut tried to continue speaking, but all of a sudden, her voice cut off. Her mouth sealed shut.

Her eyes widened. Bahamut tried to speak, to swear fealty to the man, but she couldn't! No matter how much she struggled, it was as if invisible chains had wrapped around the mouths of all three heads!

"So?" Jason asked menacingly, turning his attention to Bahamut's trembling figure. "Are you going to swear fealty to me, or have you had second thoughts?"

Bahamut's eyes widened. She tried desperately, with all her strength, but she couldn't even let out a squeak!

What power had sealed her mouth, and why now??

Jason lowered his head. He sighed loudly.

"So. This is how you are. A coward who will not even swear a simple oath. Lady Berthold, step forward please."

Phoebe nodded dumbly. She walked over to the man's side, uncertain of what he wanted.

"This creature, this trickster, is the Sphinx." Jason said. "She has used her magic to enslave countless souls, good and evil, for her own wicked purposes. I told her that so long as she freed you and swore an oath to me as her king, I would forgive her trespasses. But as you can see, she does not even have the guts to do such a thing. She would rather die than use her power for good ends."

Bahamut's eyes widened. Phoebe's eyes narrowed.

No! No, that isn't true at all! Bahamut screamed in her head. I will serve! I will! Spare me!!

But if Jason heard her thoughts, he did not acknowledge them this time.

"What a wicked hellfiend indeed." Phoebe said, her eyes turning cold. "Memories are coming to me now. Echoes of some of the wicked deeds this creature forced me to do! She is an abomination!"

"Indeed she is." Jason said with a long sigh.

He stood up, rising a head above Phoebe, then turned to look at her.

"Please kill this creature." Jason said, holding out his staff. "If you do, you will obtain all of her powers, and you will be able to free all the people she has enslaved over the years. You will become the next Sphinx and gain the power to protect yourself."

Phoebe looked up at the faceless mask, feeling taken aback. "Me? But my lord, why would you not take her power for yourself? And why choose me of all people? I am no-one."

A moment passed. Jason reached up and touched the side of his head. His helmet vanished, revealing his face for the first time. Phoebe saw a blonde-haired young man with blue eyes. A face that was somewhat familiar, as he resembled someone she had once known...

"Because I am a Hero, like Arthur before me." Jason said. "Arthur died long ago, but I have spoken to his spirit and determined that you would be someone worthy of the Sphinx's title."

"Arthur... did?" Phoebe said, a spark lighting in her gaze. "But he... he should..."

"Hate you?" Jason asked. "No. Arthur would never. When next a chance arises, I will grant you an audience with him. You will see that his anger toward you was entirely a figment of your imagination."

Phoebe lowered her head. Her eyes glistened with tears.

"Arthur... never hated me..." Phoebe said quietly. "I... I... thank you, my lord. I shall not forget this debt I owe you."

Jason's expression flickered.

"No. You don't... owe me anything." Jason said quietly. "It is I who owes you."

Phoebe looked up at him, but Jason did not elaborate. He simply held out his staff.

"Take this weapon. Use it to strike down the monster Bahamut. Take her power for yourself. Only once she is dead and the power is in the hands of someone capable will I feel at ease."

Phoebe slowly nodded, but she hesitated.

This was not the same Phoebe who had spent years in the future alongside Jason. This was the Phoebe of the past, someone who was deeply compassionate and who had never taken a life. She was so compassionate that she had risked her own life to free the demons trapped in Arthur's prison, even if it meant she might face the executioner's block.

"I... I don't know if I can." Phoebe said quietly.

"You can, and you must." Jason said, holding the staff out a little further. "You cannot fathom the wicked deeds this monster has committed. Even as we speak, there is a helpless woman bound inside the palace, one Bahamut was torturing when I arrived. She is but one victim among countless others. If Bahamut does not deserve death, then nobody does."

That shook Phoebe to her core. She looked up at Jason's face, and what she saw was a man who had lost everything, yet pulled himself back from the brink of despair. His eyes were hardened, yet when he looked at her, she saw eyes glowing with hints of love. He had not yet lost his soul.

"...I understand." Phoebe said quietly. "Consider it done."

She took the staff from Jason's hands and turned to Bahamut. The Sphinx's eyes trembled violently. She wanted to scramble away, but she found that her body had been rooted in place by some unknown force! She was completely at Phoebe's mercy.

"Wicked beast." Phoebe said, taking a step toward Bahamut. "Have you any last words?"

From her perspective, Bahamut merely looked at her, frozen in fear. But in actuality, if Bahamut could speak, she would have said anything to save her own skin!

No, no, no, this isn't fair! I said I would swear fealty! I said I would! Hero, you BASTAAARD!

Behind Phoebe, Jason turned his head to look at Bahamut. An evil smile spread across his face.

[You get what you deserve.] Jason said, projecting his words directly into Bahamut's mind.

NOOOOO!!

Bahamut mentally shrieked one final time before Phoebe slammed the red gem against her middle head, blasting it to bits, spraying blood and gore in all directions. Strangely, the explosion didn't impact Phoebe at all, and not a speck of blood landed on her clothes or body. It was as if something invisible had protected her.

Phoebe shook as she saw the life leave the Sphinx's body. She had never killed in all her life, and now she had committed a brutal act of violence beyond anything she could imagine.

Even so, she was a resilient woman. She merely closed her eyes and gritted her teeth, turning to kneel toward Jason.

"My... my liege... I have done as you commanded, and, AHH-!"

The power of the Sphinx flooded into Phoebe's mind. She trembled, then fell forward, unconscious.

Before she could hit the ground, Jason had already knelt down and caught her. With Phoebe unconscious, he cradled her against his body and buried his face in her hair.

"Phoebe..." Jason whispered, closing his eyes. "Now, you will have enough power to protect yourself if I ever fail you again."

"But I won't let that happen." Jason said quietly. "I'll never let anyone hurt you."

Jason conjured a cot on the ground and allowed Phoebe to rest. Then he eradicated Bahamut's body from existence and went into her Citadel, freeing any bound slaves and forcing them to come outside with him. Before long, he had assembled thousands of men and women in the center square before Phoebe, who continued to lay in place, unmoving.

Jason did not know why Phoebe had fallen unconscious, but a quick check with his Wordsmithing revealed that she was not in any danger. It appeared her brain was altering its chemistry, and he determined she would wake up sooner rather than later. As for why Kar and Blinker had never had this happen, that was because they were innately stronger lifeforms than Phoebe, who was merely an ordinary human like Bahamut's previous self. Thus, the shock to Phoebe's system was greater.

Minutes passed. Eventually, Phoebe awoke as predicted. She opened her eyes, then sat up, carefully swinging her legs off the cot before looking at it in confusion. How had a cot appeared?

But she didn't have time to think of these things. She looked to her right and saw Jason standing there, then she looked ahead of herself and saw an army of men, women, and monsters surrounding her. They were all standing loosely, their expressions blank, as if they had no souls.

"Do you have the Sphinx's powers now?" Jason asked.

Phoebe thought for a moment, then she nodded.

"I do." Phoebe said quietly.

"Use them now. Free these people from their bondage." Jason said. "In the future, I will train you to use your powers properly."

"Alright." Phoebe said.

She slowly stood up, facing the swarm of creatures. Instinctively, she knew how the Sphinx's powers worked. That knowledge had been imprinted upon her mind.

Phoebe lifted her arms into the air.

"You are free!" She commanded.

The monstrous figures shook. The men and women trembled.

All at once, it was as if a mass-illusion spell had been ripped down. Humans, monsters, demons, and angels alike began appearing among the crowd. Jason was shocked to see the angels, as Bahamut had never had any of them among her slaves in the future. Perhaps, over 100,000 years, she had killed them all. Perhaps she had been commanded to do so by the demons, or perhaps she killed them merely for the thrill of rendering their species extinct.

Either way, the mass illusion broke. Cries of surprise went up among the crowd. People looked around, disturbed by their change in surroundings, and Jason smiled grimly.

"One more task taken off my list." Jason said to himself.

He had put one of his greatest fears to rest. From this day forward, Bahamut would no longer threaten the people of Earth.

Even better, Phoebe was in no danger of dying due to Bahamut's whims.

The situation was improving, if only a little at a time...

Part 710: Rekindled Flame

January 29th, 2021. Sarabiya, Egypt.

Men and women looked around in confusion. They remembered little of their past few hundreds, or even thousands of years of life. For some of them, the memories were more tangible than for the others. They could remember some of the acts they had committed. A scant few remembered everything. But by and large, most of Bahamut's victims had essentially stepped through a doorway into the future. They didn't know where they were or how much the world had changed.

They didn't even know how much time had passed.

Jason stepped forward. His movements, and his distinctive futuristic armor immediately drew the gazes of everyone present.

"Greetings, all of you! I am Jason Hiro, the legendary Archseer! I am a Hero of humanity, and your liberator! You should all feel proud to be in my presence, hahahaha!!"

Jason puffed out his chest and assumed a braggadocios person, laughing haughtily as if he were a god looking down upon all of creation. He lifted his arms in a manner most grand, and spread out his fingers as if trying to seize the light of day.

"The evil villain, Bahamut, the Sphinx of Egypt, took each and every one of you captive with her riddle magic! She turned you into her thralls and put you in a state of mental fugue. Some of you have been her slaves for thousands of years, some for hundreds, and a small number for mere decades. But I assure you, the world you live in now is one far different from when she enslaved you. Your families are long dead, the state of the planet has changed, and even the technology level of civilization has greatly advanced."

He continued. "Behind me is the new Sphinx. Her name is Phoebe Berthold, the one who broke free of her chains to slay your shared tormentor! A pupil of the legendary Hero, King Arthur, she stole the Sphinx's power and has sworn never to use it to cause harm again. You may serve her, or you may go on your way as you please. I will not forbid any of you from taking whichever action you desire."

"However!" Jason exclaimed. "The world you know is long gone. If you step out into the current one without any knowledge of its situation, you are likely to meet your demise. I advise you to stay here, at least for a while. I will host educational classes to bring you all up to speed on the state of the world and allow you to make your decisions then!"

Jason paused for the briefest of moments. He quickly scanned the people around him. Though their numbers were vast, numbering in the thousands, the emotions they were feeling were easy to determine based on their facial expressions.

The humans looked deeply disturbed. As mortals with short lifespans, the knowledge that their friends and family were long dead had clearly left a mark on their psyche. They seemed defeated and lost. He decided right then and there that between ninety and one hundred percent of the humans would choose to stay on his side.

But the monsters, angels, and demons were a different story. Some species of monsters were not immortal, but most were. The same was true of angels and demons. They almost certainly still had friends and family still among the living. Jason determined that less than ten percent would be inclined to stay with him for any duration of time.

That was alright. He didn't value these scraps Bahamut had enslaved all that highly. There were five angels present, and four of them were Lazarites. Only one was a pureblood. Among the demons, there seemed to be about twenty, and none of them ranked above the level of a Demon Lord.

Just as Jason was about to write them off, he suddenly spotted a familiar face among the monsters.

Doctor Fathy!

She was the third most famous doctor in the future, after Belial and Leeroy, a Harpie woman whose natural medical skills towered above those of surgeons born in the 21st century. How she acquired such formidable medical skills was anyone's guess. The fact she competed with two Demon Emperors known for their healing skills said a lot.

Naturally, she did not know who Jason was. She merely stared at him silently, along with all the other people.

At the same time as Jason was speaking, the angels and demons present were side-eyeing each other. They may have just awoken from a forced slumber, but their hatred for one another ran bone deep. There was no way they would become chummy with each other just like that.

Phoebe looked at Jason's back. She was surprised that he had given her the credit for slaying Bahamut. While this was technically true, she certainly did not break free of Bahamut's control. Her new position was entirely granted by his mercy.

As such, her heart warmed toward him noticeably.

"I have studied the ancient records of Bahamut." Jason declared, waving his arm in a grandiose manner. "I know many of your names, but some of you were not in her scrolls. I would very much like to meet you all after this, and speak to you one on one. You may refuse! Don't feel that you're under any obligation to follow me. If you want, you can walk out into the desert right now!"

Jason paused, then cocked his head.

"But, in the spirit of gratitude for saving your lives, I hope you would show myself and the new Sphinx a little leeway."

Many people subtly nodded. His request was fair. They were all a little out of sorts, and getting to speak to this 'Hero' certainly wouldn't hurt.

For the humans who knew what a Hero was, Jason's identity was extremely impressive! They immediately wanted to forge a connection with him for a variety of reasons.

For the humans who did not, the fact that he was a human and one of their saviors certainly bought him a lot of goodwill, even if his manner of speaking was a little too ostentatious for their tastes.

The angels definitely knew who he was, as did the demons. Even an idiot demon would know that a Hero was a big deal. These types secretly decided to meet with him for at least the purpose of collecting information on him. Whether they liked him and stayed, or left and gave that information to their leaders would be up for debate when the time came...

And finally, the monsters. Among them were Orcs, Goblins, Harpies, Felaris, Minotaurs, Kobolds, Fairies, and plenty of other scattered types that typically hid themselves from the human world. These types had opinions that fluctuated between those shared with the humans and those shared by the angels and demons. Their allegiances were only known to them.

But Jason was confident. He believed he could raise that 10% chance of recruitment to 25% or even 50% if he spoke to them the right way.

As for the ones who intended to sell information of him back to their masters?

How could he let that happen? Naturally, once they left the desert, their memories would be wiped, or their existences would be extinguished, either fate determined by what Jason felt was most appropriate depending on their identity. Only the Wordsmith would benefit from these discussions, not his enemies.

"Everyone! I look forward to speaking to all of you!" Jason declared. "For now, simply walk around and familiarize yourselves with this oasis. There are homes here, temporary shelters suitable for you to live in. I will be having an assistant of mine completely overhaul this land in the near future!"

The crowd loudly clapped and cheered, though some of the people present had more muted reactions than the rest. Those few did not know this, but Jason had instantly recorded and cataloged everyone's reactions. He had already begun compiling information to determine who was most trustworthy, and he would not stop until his Work was done.

That was not going to happen for a very, very long time.

With a flourish, Jason spun on his heel, then took Phoebe's arm with his hand and guided her away. She still seemed somewhat dazed by the rapid change in her life situation.

"Walk with me." Jason said.

She nodded and strode beside him without complaint.

Leaving the crowd behind, Jason let them deal with matters themselves. He knew there was a chance fights might immediately start breaking out, but he had taken countermeasures already. Any troublemakers would meet a swift and decisive end. Plus, by letting everyone sort themselves out, he would be able to see if any of them had leadership experience.

Jason already knew Neil was among the people present, but he didn't immediately seek the man out. Jason had only one thing on his mind at this moment, and it was something he had been aching to do for a long time...

He led Phoebe back inside Bahamut's Citadel. Now, with all the slaves freed, it was completely silent inside. Their footsteps seemed to echo for miles into the distance as they walked the corridors leading down into the heart of the pyramid.

"My lord." Phoebe said, eventually breaking the silence. "Why did you choose for me to become the Sphinx? I still do not understand."

My lord.

My lord.

Her formal words crashed against Jason's head, making him feel somewhat sick to his stomach. Phoebe had no idea who he was, or how much she mattered to him. She spoke to him as if he were a stranger, because to her, he was.

Jason swallowed heavily. He thought for a moment before replying.

"Because I need someone I can trust, and you're the best candidate here." Jason said quietly.

"What makes you think I am trustworthy, my liege?" Phoebe pressed further. "For all you know, I could be a liar and a thief."

"Unlikely." Jason replied. "My discussions with Arthur granted me great insight. You are a woman of conviction. You abandoned your kingdom to save innocent demons, even knowing it would likely carry the penalty of death. I need someone with strong convictions by my side... assuming you want to be there in the first place."

Jason's heart skipped a beat. This was the first time he was giving Phoebe a chance to abandon him and leave, and he suddenly felt a twinge of fear she might just do that!

But she didn't.

"Please do not jest, my lord." Phoebe said, shaking her head politely. "You have saved my life and granted me a power which belonged to the former Sphinx. The burden is heavy, but I feel obliged to rise to the occasion. I will not abandon you so long as you need me."

Jason turned his head slightly to look at her as they walked. They passed by a lit torch sconce on the wall, and its flames illuminated her smiling face.

Her smile... warmed his heart. He could not help but smile back.

"That's good." Jason said. "That's... good."

He looked away. Phoebe raised an eyebrow as she noticed something about him felt off.

"Is something the matter, my liege? You seem displeased."

"I'm not." Jason said. "In fact, I'm happier now than I've felt in the better part of a year. But along with that joy is... a deep sense of sadness. It's hard to explain."

"You do not have to speak of it if you do not wish to do so." Phoebe said, before pausing and adding, "though, if you ever wish to unburden your heart, I am your faithful servant. I will always be here for you."

Jason slowed his pace, then stopped in the middle of the hallway. He stared into the distance, uncertain of what to say.

"...I. I lost. I lost my wife." Jason said, his words slow and halting. "She died. It was my fault. Or, at the very least, my inaction, my failure to anticipate my enemy's movements... is what caused her death."

Phoebe bowed her head slightly. She folded her hands in front of herself and listened quietly.

"I've been lost for so long." Jason said. "I'm trying to use my power to fight a war for the fate of humanity. If it wasn't for the fact that I found my daughter alive and well, I don't think I'd be here right now."

Phoebe glanced at him for a split-second, then looked away.

"I am glad you did not walk the wrong path, my lord." Phoebe said softly. "Else, I would still be trapped within Bahamut's grasp. So would many other people. I do not know what caused your wife's death, but I believe she would be unhappy if she were to find out you blamed yourself."

Jason turned his head. He looked at the top of Phoebe's beautiful white hair. He felt a pang of longing... he wanted to reach out and hug her, to kiss her, to pull her into his embrace and reunite with her...

But he couldn't do that. He didn't deserve such joy.

"You're probably right." Jason muttered. "My wife was a good person. She was the best person I've ever known. She wouldn't blame me for what happened. But it doesn't matter now. Because it did happen. And I blame myself. I can never forgive myself."

Jason cleared his throat, but some stubborn phlegm remained stuck in place, so his voice turned slightly raspy.

"I... I keep forcing myself to go on. To push forward. To continue trying to make a better world for my daughter, and for all the other people who depend on me. But truthfully, my will has weakened a lot lately. I look in the mirror and want to kill the man looking back at me. I hate him so much. I hate his weakness. I hate his indecision. More than that, I hate that I spent so little time with my wife before she died."

"What do you mean?" Phoebe asked. "You weren't living with her?"

Jason ground his teeth against each other. "No. I wasn't. She was pregnant with our son, and I was living inside a time-accelerated temporal dimension. I feared the time flow might hurt her or the baby, so I left her in Realspace, visiting occasionally. Even when she had the boy, I didn't bring her inside for fear she might end up injured from the timeflow distortions-"

Jason glanced at Phoebe, only to see that she appeared completely confused.

"F-forgive me, my lord." Phoebe said, feeling flustered under his gaze. "This... um... time flow... dimension... I do not understand these words. I apologize for my inadequacy."

She quickly bowed her head, feeling shameful before him, yet what she didn't know was that Jason felt even worse than she did.

This Phoebe had not come into contact with Solomon's Crown. She was merely an above-average medieval woman when it came to intellect. She had no concept of time travel, different dimensions, or other science fiction-like terminology.

The knowledge that his wife had been reduced to such a state made Jason's heart ache. He massaged his eyes and sighed.

"No, it's my fault. In time, I will grant you a new boon that will greatly enhance your cognitive capabilities. I believe you could become one of the smartest people on Earth, given the right resources."

Phoebe looked up at him in astonishment. Then, she burst into laughter.

"Hahaha, oh, my liege, you do have a sense of humor! I am quite slow when it comes to complex matters, but I am a good listener. It's one of my few traits I feel pride towards!"

"I'm not joking." Jason said. "Here, let's rest in Bahamut's throne room. I have a few things I'd like to inform you of."

Jason led her into the heart of the Citadel. He gestured toward Bahamut's throne, but she simply turned and looked at him, for the first time, as if he were a fool.

"...Forgive me, but I would prefer not to sit there." Phoebe said. "That throne is more appropriate for a Hero such as yourself."

"Let's just agree it's an ugly and tacky throne and it'll be one of the first things we eliminate." Jason joked, smiling genuinely in spite of his earlier pain.

He really enjoyed being able to talk to Phoebe again, even if she wasn't exactly... his Phoebe.

He sat on a couch that had previously been intended for Bahamut's harem girls, and Phoebe sat beside him, though she put half a person's distance between them. They were strangers, after all.

"Over the coming days," Jason said, "I am going to be deceiving a lot of people. You are the only person I'm about to tell the truth. Please keep what I am about to say completely confidential."

Phoebe's eyes widened. "O-of course, my liege. Consider it done. But again I must ask, why are you so sure you can trust me?"

Jason hesitated.

"...I am friends with many Heroes. I have learned of a coming war that will soon engulf the Earth. I have also learned of the identities of certain people who will be instrumental in winning the war for both sides. You are one of those people."

Phoebe balked. "Me? But I am just an ordinary woman-"

"Ordinary no more." Jason interrupted. "You now possess the power of the Sphinx. And unlike that wastrel Bahamut, who squandered her power to pursue riches and depravity, you will be able to put its power to better use. You are a warrior at heart, a woman who is extremely courageous, and formerly the only female member of the Knights of the Round Table."

He paused.

"Please do not sell yourself short. You are far from ordinary, Phoebe."

Phoebe smiled at him, then rubbed her hands together. She didn't know why, but she really liked the way he spoke to her.

"You seem like a nice young man." Phoebe said. "How long were you, um, married?"

Jason stared at her for a moment. He coughed.

"Um. We were married, err, in real terms, six years. In terms of my lived life... a bit over three hundred years."

"Th-th-three HUNDRED years?!" Phoebe exclaimed, looking at him aghast. "Wha- I, I mean, HOW??"

"Let's not worry about that right now." Jason said, as he chuckled and shook his head. "I'm going to tell you something important now, so pay attention."

He paused to gather his thoughts.

"In public, my title is the Archseer. I profess to be a prophet who sees the future, and has the power to assimilate knowledge quickly, making myself a powerful frontline combatant. But this is a deception. My true title is Wordsmith. I have the ability to create nearly anything by speaking a single Word of Power. For example, Cup!"

Jason held out his hand, and a small glass cup appeared in his palm. Phoebe flinched when it appeared. Her eyes became as wide as saucers.

"You can summon objects?" She asked.

"I can do a lot more than that." Jason answered. "I can conjure and shoot fireballs, unleash a hail of arrows upon my enemies, create suits of armor like the one I'm wearing... and I can even create entire realms and lands filled with machinery and magical architecture beyond your imagination. I am a fairly good fighter, but my combat skills pale in comparison to legends like Arthur. That is why I am focusing on building an army of trustworthy people and using my powers to enhance all of them, so they can solve my deficiencies. I helped you obtain the Sphinx's power, and I will upgrade your mind and other bodily abilities as well, so that you may defend yourself and humanity in the coming future war."

Phoebe nodded solemnly. She felt that the weight of her decision to accept the Sphinx's power was growing heavier by the hour, but it was a burden she was willing to bear.

"Thus," Jason continued, "I am going to have to ask you to help me play a little trick on the others outside. I already know that some of them will be trustworthy warriors for humanity, but I cannot say that is true of all of them. Are you willing to help me interview them, in your new role as the Sphinx, and weed out the undesirables while keeping your eyes peeled for diamonds in the rough?"

Phoebe thought for a moment. She didn't immediately accept, but instead tapped her finger to her lips and thought carefully about everything she had learned.

Eventually, she nodded, a grave look of certainty on her face. "Of course. I will assist you, Wordsmith. I will not speak of any matters you tell me in confidence."

"Haha." Jason chuckled lightly. "I know. I'll be counting on you to be my number one confidante and assistant, Phoebe."

She stood up, then turned and dropped to one knee, bowing before him.

"I am at your service, my liege. You honor me with your words."

Seeing his wife bowing to him, Jason's eyes shook.

He reached out, then rested his palm on top of her head.

"No... no more of this, Phoebe. From now on, please just call me... Jason. I won't feel at ease if you're so formal around me."

Phoebe quickly lifted her head. "No, I... I don't think that's appropriate, my lord. It is not right for a commoner to speak to her King, a Hero no less, with such a familiar tone."

Jason pulled his hand away and smiled.

"Please. Phoebe, I'm begging you. Just call me by my name. Alright?"

Phoebe met his gaze. She looked into his eyes, and saw a strange warmness mixed with isolation that she couldn't properly identify. Something about him seemed like he knew her better than he knew himself, but also that he was carrying a burden greater than she could fathom.

Phoebe lowered her eyes.

She sighed softly.

"Very well... Lord Jason."

"Just Jason. No 'lord' or 'sir' or 'king' or 'liege', Got it?" Jason retorted.

"I understand. My apologies... Jason." Phoebe said.

Speaking his name so plainly felt wrong on many levels, but when she met his eyes again, she saw that his smile had deepened, ever so slightly, and that feeling of wrongness didn't feel as sharp as before.

She quite liked the way it felt to call him by his name.

"I'm glad to have you by my side, Phoebe." Jason said.

Part 711: S.I.G.I.L.

January 29th, 2021. Sarabiya, Egypt.

Not even thirty minutes after taking Phoebe inside to talk to her privately, Jason exited the Citadel, once again assuming his macho persona full of bravado. Phoebe followed along behind him, giving him strange looks as his entire attitude drastically changed, and not in the sort of way mere play-acting could achieve.

"Hahahaha! Everyone, come out at once! I have something to tell all of you!" Jason shouted, his voice projecting across the entire city.

It took a few minutes, but men and women, humans, angels, demons and monsters all eventually made their way back to the bottom of the pyramid, stopping to stand and stare at Jason and Phoebe. By now, a few cliques had faintly started to form, with some people befriending others, whispering to their new friends conspiratorially as they wondered what the Archseer was going to say now.

He was certainly an odd fellow. His demeanor was over the top, but he mostly seemed like a dumb idiot who meant them no harm. He was nothing if not sincere.

"Thank you all for coming back!" Jason yelled. "You are truly fortunate! I have spoken with the Sphinx, and she has something to say to all of you!"

Jason took a step to the side and flippantly gestured toward Phoebe. She raised an eyebrow at him, then stepped forward to address the people.

"The Hero is currently in control of two Divine Lands." Phoebe explained. "The Divine Land of Earth, and the Divine Land of the Stars. Where you are now is the Divine Land of the Earth, currently named Sarabiya. However, that name was given to it by its former master. We will take this land, and the fruits of all our collective labor, and rebuild it into something new."

She paused.

"After all, it was us, Bahamut's slaves, who built this land. It is appropriate we reap the benefits of living here."

A man near the front raised his hand. Jason glanced at him. He was surprised to see that the one who wished to speak was none other than Makoto Ueda. In the far future, he had been Neil's spiritual advisor before Buddha returned from the grave and took over his body.

"Miss Berthold. Lady Sphinx." Makoto said, bowing politely. "I am not opposed to staying here, but from what we have gathered, Sarabiya is an isolated land in the middle of a desert. There are no riches to speak of. Without constant supplies from the outside world, we will quickly run out of food. Have you considered this?"

"I have." Phoebe said, nodding at him. "That is why I am referring to this city as a Divine Land of Earth. There is more to it than meets the eye. After speaking to the Hero, I have come to learn that the world we live in now is one that has drastically changed from before Bahamut took me, and all of you, to be her slaves. For starters, in this era, there is no longer only one Trueborn Hero. There are two."

Plenty of people had no idea what Phoebe was talking about. But for those who did, they were shocked to their core.

The only pureblooded angel present suddenly pushed his way to the front. He was a tall and handsome fellow, seemingly in his 50's by human standards, with bushy eyebrows and brilliant white hair. He wore simple white robes and did not seem to be an angel of any particular importance, but purebloods were rare in these times.

"Two heroes?!" The angel exclaimed. "Lady Berthold, I must protest. Such a concept art impossible! The Heroic Aura doth not function in such a manner!"

"Not before, but it does now!" Jason said, flashing the angel a big thumbs up. "And what's your name anyway? You're one of the oddest ones out here."

The male angel did not balk at being called upon. He simply shook his head, lowered his eyes, and sighed. "Verily, I am Almar. A Seraph of no particular renown. Bahamut captured me by chance when Archangel Camael dispatched me on a mission to the human world five hundred years ago."

Jason quickly searched his memories. He had never heard of an angel named Almar at any point during the Ancient Era, so this fellow probably was a nobody. Even so, pureblooded angels were so rare these days that it couldn't hurt to treat him with respect and get to know him a little better. Who knew if such caution might pay dividends in the future?

"I see! Well, Almar, it turns out you're wrong! I'm not the only Trueborn Hero of this generation. There's another named Cat Mask, and the number of Lowborn Heroes will absolutely blow your mind. There are already a dozen, with more soon to be found!"

"A dozen?!" Almar exclaimed, his face turning pale. "Nay, nay! I say unto thee, this is surely a ruse!"

Jason smirked. "It's not. Why don't you let the Sphinx speak first? She'll explain everything."

Almar stared at Jason for a moment, uncertain about whether the Archseer was telling the truth or not. Even so, he eventually nodded, then stepped back into line. Many demons gave him a side-eye. It seemed they had at least heard his name before. Maybe he wasn't as much of a nobody as he claimed.

"As I was saying," Phoebe continued. "This era is different from the ones in which you lot originated. Not only are there more Heroes, but the technology level is vastly superior to that of even just a few decades before. I'm not entirely certain just how different it is, but the Archseer tells me the difference is like that between Heaven and Earth! We are not living in familiar times."

She paused. "As we speak, the demons are marching on Heaven. They have begun a full-scale assault, intending to kill the angels and take control over the Earth. It will take them time to achieve such a feat, but you can be assured the appearance of so many Heroes has sparked the fear of the Creator in them."

"Heaven is in danger?!" Almar gasped.

"Sounds like the Emperors are finally gonna rid the world of your filth, pigeon!" One of the Demon Lords nearby laughed. Jason didn't recognize him. He wore a light green tunic and head feathers in his hair. His face appeared to have had streaks of black painted under his eyes and around the rest of his face in geometric patterns, or perhaps those were tattoos. He looked fierce, but weak.

"Dost thou intendeth to leave this place and return to thy masters' side?!" Almar accused, turning on his heel to point a hostile finger at the Demon Lord. "Verily, I shall not allow thee!"

Jason quietly sighed. It seemed tensions would boil over soon, and he would need to intervene. But before he could make a move, Phoebe suddenly stormed aggressively forward and stood between the two.

"You! Demon! State your name!" She shouted, startling the one who had mouthed off.

The demon glared at her. "What's my name matter to you, woman? You gonna enslave me again? Like we demons don't know what you're really up to! You're planning to kill us all anyway!"

"Who said I was going to kill you?" Phoebe scoffed. "I am Phoebe Berthold, former Knight of Camelot. Long ago, I freed many demons who King Arthur had trapped in his dungeon, knowing it would likely bring about a sentence of death upon me. Among humans, I can be considered to be more sympathetic to your plights."

Her expression hardened. "But that does not mean I will tolerate bullies, brutes, and thugs! If you cannot show respect to others, then perhaps killing you would indeed be a wise decision!"

The Demon Lord paled slightly. "H-hey, lady. No need to get all crazy or anything! Okay, look, uh, I'm... Vex. I'm the Lord of Lizards. B-but don't think that means I'm all sketchy and evil or anything! I'm totally a nice guy! I can get along with anyone, promise!"

Just like that, Vex's intimidation factor plunged into the negative. Faced with Phoebe's fierce glower, he practically wilted into a shivering ball of nerves.

"You had better hope so." Phoebe said, sweeping her gaze across all the assembled demons and angels. "I will not tolerate infighting! So long as you are in this land, you will be living under my rules. They are simple, but strict. We are allies, and allies do not cause harm to one another! If you cannot live by that standard, then I will not allow you to stay!"

Many people looked at her in surprise. Phoebe was small, but fiery. And nobody really knew what the powers of the Sphinx were, so they didn't want to be the first to start any problems. Who knew if she could beat the crap out of them with strange monstrous strength... or worse?

Of course, there was also the fact that she was backed by the Trueborn, and his abilities were a mystery as well. Considering Bahamut had reigned supreme for thousands of years, and he had helped topple her, he couldn't be a featherweight. There was more to the Archseer than they had yet seen.

With Phoebe's intervention, the fight between the angels and demons stopped, at least temporarily, before it had even begun. Jason smiled. That was the Phoebe he knew.

She turned around and strode back to her original spot, then crossed her arms and looked down her chin at everyone gathered.

"To transform this city into a true Divine Land, the Archseer will be enlisting one of the Heroes among his ranks to offer us her assistance. She possesses incredible powers that allow her to construct technology far beyond your wildest imaginations. With her help, we will rebuild Sarabiya into a world power! We will swallow the entirety of the Western Desert, turning this barren wasteland into a paradise unlike any other!"

The crowd listened with interest. Her words were beyond their expectations. What Hero did Jason have at his beck and call who could wield such formidable powers? Could she really do as Phoebe claimed?

Jason gestured to the right of himself and Phoebe. With a flash of light, a woman suddenly appeared.

She was a mature woman, roughly forty years of age. She wore a smart blue suit, vaguely military in design, and had short brown hair in a bob cut, as well as green eyes. She wore glasses, and seemed as if she had the air of a librarian or a scholar. Nobody recognized her.

"Everyone." The woman said. "I am Jessica Harper. You may call me Miss Harper. My heroic title is the Great Builder."

Jessica's voice was calm but stern. She had an inviolable aura, far different from the haughty Archseer. She seemed to be in full control of herself and her emotions. Everything about her was in its proper place.

Nobody said a word. They simply watched silently as Jessica turned around and waved her hand toward Bahamut's Citadel.

Suddenly, the ground rumbled. The eyes of every man and woman went wide as the Citadel began to violently shake. All at once, it collapsed into a massive pile of sand, wiping out all of the hard work that had been put into maintaining it over the millennia. Just like that, a historic landmark was erased from history, leaving all who saw it shocked out of their wits!

But Jessica was not done there. She waved her hand again, causing the sand to shift its shape once more. It rapidly flew into the air, transforming into a massive and majestic building which appeared to be made in the image of Ancient Greece and Ancient Egypt both. Towering statues of a male and female soldier emerged from the ground, each one a hundred feet tell. They wore strange futuristic armor nobody had ever seen before, faceless helmets that shrouded their faces, and seemed to be holding weapons that only someone like Jason would recognize as energy weapons from the future.

The building behind them turned into a ten-story college with tall Greek pillars holding up its roof awning. Jessica rapidly constructed the inside of the building, then gestured for everyone to follow her.

Jason, Phoebe, and Jessica led the way for the thousands of Bahamut's former slaves behind them. They arrived inside a massive marbled hall where a model of the Sol system levitated in the air. The planets slowly spun in place, accurately revealing their current position in the star system, hovering tens of feet in the air. A galactic terrarium was present inside, with murals all over the ceiling and walls showing thousands of specks of light. These were not mere decorations, but accurate depictions of the positions of stars in the Milky Way, as viewed from Earth.

Many people gasped in amazement. Almar's jaw dropped as he beheld something he never could have imagined in all his life.

"This power belongeth to a mere Lowborn? Unbelievable. Even Archangel Uzziel could not build such a world wonder in less than a minute! My eyes hath truly been opened!"

Deeper inside the structure, there were vast terrariums crawling with plants, animals, bugs, all forming a self-maintaining ecosystem. This was even more ludicrous than what they had seen in the entry hall, because how could sand be turned into genuine living beings?! If Jessica could conjure life from dust, then it truly seemed they would not want for resources anytime soon!

Many of the demons began to grow fearful. The Great Builder alone was capable of transforming humanity into a terrifying powerhouse. If they combined the fact that she was a lowborn with the fact the Archseer was a Trueborn... just how powerful was the Archseer? And what of the other Heroes he said were also working under him? Just how strong had humanity become since Bahamut enslaved them?!

"I told you guys Jessica was awesome!" Jason shouted, projecting his voice loudly. "And that's not all! She can also-"

"Silence." Jessica said, instantly shutting the Archseer down. "Fool. All you do is run your mouth. Do not speak until I have given you permission to do so. A buffoon should know when to keep his mouth shut."

Jason stammered slightly, but when Jessica glared at him, he coughed and looked away, unwilling to meet her gaze.

Just like that, Jessica established visual dominance over him, making herself seem exceeding powerful and irreplaceable. Without any excessive words, she had raised her status in the eyes of everyone present. Never had they heard of a mere Lowborn successfully standing up to a Trueborn, but it seemed her value was high enough in the Archseer's eyes that he didn't dare speak back or give her any lip.

Jessica turned to the audience, her face unsmiling.

"Hmph. If you rabble think this to be the limit of what I can accomplish, then I ask one of you to step forward. I will transform him or her into a powerhouse on the spot."

Several people's eyes widened. Before anyone could react, one of the demons quickly jumped forward. "Me! Me please! I volunteer!"

Jessica raised an eyebrow. It was Vex, the loudmouth from earlier. Since he was a demon, it didn't entirely seem appropriate for him to receive the first honors, but...

"Very well." Jessica said, as if his species didn't matter to her in the slightest. "Behold."

She waved her hand, and from behind Vex, the audience looked at him, waiting for something to happen. However, nothing seemed to change.

Vex looked at his arms, his legs, then back at Jessica, eager and expectant.

"...Eh?" Vex grunted. "Did I... miss something?"

"Look at your chest." Jessica said.

And so he did. Vex glanced down, only now noticing there was a small silver disc affixed to the front of his tunic. It was small, barely three inches in diameter, and barely the thickness of three coins stacked on top of each other. It didn't seem special at all, and otherwise appeared to be an ordinary piece of metal.

"Turn around and show everyone." Jessica instructed. "Then touch the Activation Dial and allow yourself to Ascend."

Vex stared at her, then he nodded dumbly. "Oh. Okaaay..."

Slowly, he turned around. He gave everyone a good look at the metal circle pinned to his chest, and they all scratched their heads in confusion. It really didn't look like much.

After a moment's hesitation, Vex reached up with his hand and held it just shy of touching the circle.

"Err, what's gonna happen?" Vex asked, glancing back at Jessica.

"You will see." She said cryptically, her arms crossed, a solemn expression on her face.

Vex swallowed his saliva. He was not a brave person, but he didn't think Jessica was going to hurt him. After gritting his teeth, he tapped the dial.

A surge of blue light radiated out of the dial and swept across his body. It was as if a projector had been aimed at Vex and expanded a cone of light across his chest, radiating out in all directions from the origin point. A moment later, Vex's skin because to change color. His eyes widened in horror as it changed from red to black, and then his blood changed color as well, turning bright, neon green. His veins lit up across his body, standing out dramatically from his skin tone.

The change was rapid and immediate. Vex's very biology shifted on the molecular level. His skin hardened to a level that even Demonstone would envy. His eyes became pure green and glowed with light, causing his vision to improve even beyond that of a demon's standard physiology. He gasped as he realized he could look at his body and see every individual strand of hair, as well as microscopic bacteria crawling on his skin.

Vex's fingers turned into claws. His teeth sharpened. He felt alive. Powerful!

He felt powerful!

His muscles strengthened. Even his toes felt as if they could crush granite into powder. In an instant, his fear vanished as his mind sharpened!

"Hahahaha!!" Vex cackled. "This is amazing! This is awesome! What the heck did you do to me?!"

"I have made you the first ever user of SIGIL." Jessica said, turning up her nose at the marvelous piece of technology. She did not seem all that impressed by it, as if it were merely the stepping stone to a far superior technology in the future. "The Synthetic Integrated Growth Infusion Layer, or SIGIL for short, is a device that alters the user's body chemistry on a subatomic level. It is the next evolution of a more primitive design known as a T-REX... not that any of you need bother yourselves with that old piece of trash."

She continued. "The SIGIL has greater effectiveness on weaker beings than on stronger ones. Past a certain level of strength, it has no effect on a user at all. Additionally, every user's biology will be affected differently. Some people will obtain greater benefits than others due to their individual constitutions. It seems yours gave you black skin and green blood, but this will not be the case for everyone else."

The other demons looked enviously at Vex. The angels looked at him in disgust. He looked truly wretched and evil, and now that he was powerful enough, he could easily cause a mass atrocity! How could the Great Builder be such a fool as to grant a filthy bloodskin this much power?!

"The effects of the SIGIL can be canceled by myself, the Archseer, or a few other people instantly." Jessica said calmly. "Do not let this new power go to your head. You are not invincible... merely less trashy than before. If you fight against a true Demon Emperor, you will die. As for a Demon Duke? That is up for debate."

Her words did nothing to cool Vex's excitement. She had just told him he had gained the power of a Demon Duke in a single step! To go from Lord to Baron was already the height of his ambition, but to be at the level of the legendary Demon Duke Bael?! Vex never imagined such a fate would befall him in all his wildest dreams!

He immediately turned around and dropped to one knee, greeting Jessica with respect.

"Forget the Demon Emperors! I'll follow you forever, you gorgeous, beautiful woman! And I don't even like chicks, so that's saying a lot!"

"That is the appropriate response." Jessica said, unruffled by his words.

She raised an eyebrow as she looked at the others gathered.

"Those who pledge their allegiance to the Divine Empire will receive the same boons. Those who leave will not. As for whether you deserve to be a part of this Empire, that will depend on my assessment of each of you, alongside the Sphinx."

Jason balked. "Hey, I was going to interview them! Where do you get off-"

"Silence!" Jessica shouted, snapping an irritated gaze at him. "Your services are no longer required. Return to your former duties and leave these small, unimportant matters to myself and the Sphinx! Begone!"

Many people were surprised by the lack of respect Jessica showed the man. She didn't seem intimidated by him, and even seemed to look at him as if he was a moron.

But then again, that couldn't be helped. He was always shouting like an idiot, so it was natural nobody took him seriously. Jessica was by far the more proper leader-worthy of the three on stage. Naturally, she started to command more respect.

Jason coughed. He looked around at the people present and muttered something under his breath. "Fine. Whatever. Do what you want. My work here is done anyway! Don't everyone thank me at once!"

With those words only serving to try and save his own ego, the man turned around and vanished, leaving Jessica and Phoebe behind.

A few people in the crowd snickered. It was pretty funny seeing the man storm away defeated like that, beaten by the whims of some random woman. It seemed he wasn't much after all.

"Alright." Jessica said. "The Sphinx and I will begin interviewing people as soon as possible. Who wishes to go first?"

"ME!" Vex immediately shouted. "Me! Definitely me! You won't regret it!!"

Jessica's face fell. She rolled her eyes.

"Very well. You shall be first then, Vex."

"Yesss!" Vex hissed through his teeth.

He was clearly still excited by the changes to his body. Nobody could blame him.

Before long, the crowd dispersed, and people sat down to await entry into the interviews with the Sphinx and Great Builder. These would surely take a long time, but they were necessary to assess the trustworthiness of those present.

Phoebe looked over at where Jason had stood not long before. She chuckled under her breath.

"A funny young man playing funny tricks..."

Part 712: Grief

January 29th, 2021. Argent, Aevum.

Daisy was training with a bo staff by herself, thwacking it against a lifelike combat training dummy. The dummy moved surprisingly agilely, animated by her father's magic. It was neither dumb nor intelligent, merely fighting with the single-minded purpose of learning its opponent's movements and attempting to counteract them.

It was a faceless, heavily padded dummy, which was great because when it struck Daisy's body, she didn't end up severely injured or hospitalized. It also meant she could beat it as hard as she wanted with her staff, though that was proving difficult. It learned how to anticipate her moves faster than she learned from it.

Daisy was not great at wielding weapons in melee combat. Her movements were uncoordinated, and she frequently lost her grip on the staff, sending it tumbling to the ground when she tried to spin it up and attack the dummy. As a result, she often got pillowed in the face by the dummy's soft fists, sending her sprawling to the ground.

Daisy rubbed her butt and winced. Even though the Dummy was not intended to seriously hurt her, she had fallen on her ass several times, and her muscles were no longer in peak shape. She held up a palm.

The dummy obediently lowered its fists and slumped forward slightly, returning to its energy-saving state. Daisy cracked her back and stretched, feeling the blood flow through her limbs.

She attempted to heal herself, but her magic failed. She frowned. Her father had supposedly used his Wordsmithing to give her full control of her magic, but it kept flickering on and off like a poorly screwed-in lightbulb. She wasn't sure why this particular power was so unreliable, but it was especially frustrating because she had planned to return home and heal the body of her adopted sister, Anya.

Anya had been in a wheelchair since she was old enough to crawl. She sometimes had enough strength to get up and walk around, but those instances were rare, and made her sadder than if she couldn't walk at all. She suffered from a compromised immune system, so she couldn't leave the house. Doing so might kill her.

Thus, Anya lived her entire life cooped up indoors, feeling like a bird trapped in a cage. She was always sullen and somber, a fact that made Daisy quietly weep on several occasions.

"I'll have to ask dad to heal Anya." Daisy muttered to herself. "It should be doable for him. If not, maybe he can befriend Aunt Samantha in this timeline?"

Daisy scratched her chin. She chewed her lip thoughtfully as she considered the likelihood. She had yet to interact with Emperor Belial, but she doubted her auntie was a complete villain at this point in history. She must still have a soft spot for children...

As Daisy stood there, catching her breath and recovering from her training routine, she felt a presence appear behind her. She turned around and broke into a smile.

"Daddy! How are you doing?"

Jason smiled back at her, but his expression was a little off. "I'm fine, sweetheart. I came here to check on you."

Daisy nodded. After the incidents with Heaven's Daughter and Nadia, her father had clearly been dealing with a profound sense of guilt. He didn't need to tell his daughter about it for her to realize. She knew her father wasn't in the best headspace, but she also didn't know how to broach the subject. She still felt like he and her had a long way to go before they became truly 'close'.

"I just finished sparring with the dummy you made for me." Daisy said, casually gesturing behind herself with her thumb. "How about you, dad? Are you doing... okay?"

Jason continued to smile, but his eyes lowered a little. Daisy easily noticed the sadness he was trying to hide. He wasn't doing a good job at it.

"Dad?" Daisy asked quietly.

Jason lightly bit his lower lip. He took a step toward her, then held out his arms.

"Come here, honey." Jason said.

Daisy nodded. She stepped toward him, and then... they embraced.

Daisy hugged her father. There didn't seem to be any reason behind why he wanted to hug her, but she could tell... this hug meant a lot to him. It was the first time they had hugged like this since he awakened his memories...

Daisy closed her eyes. She buried her face in her father's neck. Even though he physically was the age of a brother, he still had the bearing of a parent. She felt calm and safe in his arms.

"I love you, sweetheart..." Jason said quietly. "I don't say that enough."

Daisy opened her eyes. Held in her father's arms, she couldn't see his face, but now she realized his mental state was worse than she had imagined. He wasn't acting like himself at all.

"Dad... what's going on?" Daisy asked, carefully pulling away from him a little, just enough that she could look into his eyes. She checked and found this was her real father, and not a Dronesmith.

Jason didn't meet his daughter's gaze. He looked at the floor.

"It's... it's about your mom." Jason said quietly.

Daisy's heart fell into her shoes. She looked at her father with a sinking feeling.

"M-mom? What happened to her? Dad, what happened?! Don't tell me Bahamut killed..."

Jason blinked. He lifted his head and looked at his daughter in surprise.

"What? No. No, of course not. I'm sorry, honey. I'm not using my words well. I just... I'm a little out of sorts right now. Your mom..."

He hesitated.

"...I went to Bahamut's city. I found her. I forced her to release all of her slaves. Then I had your mother kill Bahamut and inherit the power of the Sphinx."

Daisy stared at her father in shock. "You went without me? But why?! I thought when the time was right, you and me were going to save mom together!"

Jason took a step back. He let go of Daisy, allowing his arms to fall to his side.

"Honey... nobody... nobody wants to save your mother as much as I do. But. But. The woman I saved... she's your mother's younger self. She doesn't know you. Or me. She doesn't remember the future. She has no idea you're her daughter, or I'm her husband. As far as she's concerned, we're complete strangers."

Daisy stared at him intently. "So what? Are you saying you left me out because I would just overwhelm her?! Dad, that's my mom you're talking about! Your wife!"

"She's not my wife, and she's not your mother." Jason said sternly. "Not right now she isn't. I didn't bring you along because I believed you wouldn't be able to stop yourself from talking about the future."

"I can control myself just fine!" Daisy shouted. "This is unfair! Dad, why are you acting like this?? Just use your Wordsmithing! Make her remember the future! Then she'll be my mom again!!"

Jason fell silent. He closed his eyes and lowered his head.

"...Do you think that option didn't occur to me, Daisy? It was the very first thing I thought of doing when I realized Phoebe was still alive in this timeline."

Jason turned away from his daughter. He wandered over to the side of the room and sat down on a bench, leaning heavily forward in a posture of defeat.

Daisy hesitated. She eventually walked over and sat beside him.

"Then, why didn't you do it?" Daisy asked, bewildered. "Dad, why not give mom back her memories?"

It took a long ten seconds before Jason was able to muster up an answer.

"Daisy. I'm a failure." Jason said softly. "Everything I touch turns to ashes. Countless people died because of me. Because of my incompetence. I'm afraid that if I recklessly try to retrieve my wife, I'll only cause even more harm to her."

"How can restoring her memories cause harm?" Daisy pressed. "You're not making sense."

"I've thought about it a lot." Jason said under his breath. "I've realized that there's a lot of ways trying to turn this younger version of Phoebe into the one we lost could backfire. Just pause for a moment, Daisy. Cool your emotions. Think rationally."

Daisy fell silent. She took a deep breath and tried to calm her heart, like her father requested.

"...Okay." Daisy said. "Tell me what could go wrong, dad."

Jason forced out a weak smile. He rested his palm on his daughter's knee and gave it a reassuring squeeze.

"Imagine for a moment that I used my magic to give your mother her memories from the future." Jason said. "Did you know Hope did the same thing? He put Amelia's memories inside the mind of another woman."

"Amelia?" Daisy asked, scrunching up her face. "Do I know her?"

Jason thought for a moment.

"It's been a long time. I don't remember. If you ever did speak with her, it couldn't have been more than once or twice." Jason said. "But that doesn't matter. Amelia was a woman I loved before your mom. After I made your uncle Hope by cloning myself, Hope was distraught because he had lost the life I was then living. Without Phoebe around, he became desperate and tried to create a copy of our first love, Amelia, by putting her memories inside another woman."

"Did it work?" Amelia asked.

"No." Jason answered. "Because the woman was not Amelia, her mind rejected the memories. Keep in mind, this woman, Annette, was in love with Hope and asked him to change her appearance and mind to become Amelia. She loved him enough to voluntarily give up her identity and become Amelia. But it didn't matter. Annette's psyche still rejected those memories, and she became a tortured soul, torn between two personas."

"Okay, I can see that." Daisy admitted. "But mom is mom! Her memories from the future are still HER memories! You can just implant them without worrying she'll become someone else. It's not like you're putting Aunt Samantha's memories in mom's body!"

Jason shook his head. "I thought about that too. Daisy, imagine for a moment that I made you watch a video that showed you images and sounds and smells from someone I claimed was your future self. Even if you believed those were your memories from the future, would you be that person? Would you become your future self?"

Daisy scratched her head. "Well... I don't think so...?"

"It almost certainly wouldn't work out." Jason said. "I can't just replace her memories with those of future Phoebe. I can't alter the essence of who she is now. At best, I can insert the memories of who she was into her mind. But doing that would only feel to her like she was seeing the memories of another person. Attempting to forcefully overwrite her current memories with the ones from our original timeline would ultimately result in an Amelia-Annette situation. Your mother would start suffering from psychosis, questioning who she really was."

Jason turned his head to look at his daughter.

"Do you want your mother to suffer like that, Daisy?"

Tears welled up in Daisy's eyes. She pressed her fingers against her eyes and hiccuped. "No... no, daddy... I just... I want my mom back... I want her back."

Jason nodded hollowly. He reached his arm out and wrapped it around her back, then pulled her close.

"I know you do, baby. So do I. I would give my life to bring Phoebe back."

Jason swallowed. His throat was dry. Raw. Tears welled up in his eyes. His body shook as he felt all the suppressed emotions starting to boil up.

"God... god, I want Phoebe back." Jason whispered, squeezing his eyes shut. "I want her back so badly. She's right there. Right there, honey. I could reach out and kiss her. But it wouldn't be right. And most importantly... I don't deserve your mother. That's what hurts the most."

Daisy sniffled. She puled away from her father and looked at him with puffy red eyes. "Dad... what are you saying? You don't deserve her? Where are you even getting that from?!"

"Your mom died because of me." Jason said, rubbing his bleary eyes. "Who am I to selfishly try and bring her back just to make myself feel better? Who am I to make a new Phoebe to replace the old one I discarded through my inaction? What right do I have to live happily after killing your mother through my incompetence?"

Daisy gritted her teeth. She felt a deep anger boiling up inside of her.

"What the hell, dad?! Is that the real reason you don't even want to try?! Because you think you're undeserving?! FINE! Maybe that's true! Maybe it IS! But what about me, dad? What about ME?! Why do I have to go without a mother just because you feel guilty?? I had to grow up without parents! I was tortured by scientists, prodded like a lab rat, treated like a toy, and all the while I just wanted my mom and dad to save me!! And now you're holding me back from her just because you feel GUILTY?!"

Daisy grabbed at her hair. She tugged and pulled on it, wanting to rip it out due to her grief and anger. She couldn't stop crying. She wept uncontrollably, and her crying only made Jason cry harder.

Every word struck him like a hammer. He felt as if he were being ripped in half. Torn between his self-hatred and desire to do good by his little girl.

But how could he satisfy her? Even if he wanted to restore Phoebe to her future self, it was impossible. He wouldn't subject her to the same trauma Annette had suffered.

"I'm sorry." Jason mumbled, sniffling while his shoulders heaved uncontrollably. "Baby, I'm sorry... I just... I don't want to make you cry... but it's all I know how to do. I'm a complete failure, and it's killing me inside."

"God fucking dammit, dad! You're not a failure! You're not!" Daisy screamed, her anger slowly overtaking her anguish. "Why do you keep saying that?! Dad, you time traveled! This is the past, not the future! You can change things, live a better life, save people! You can get mom back and make sure she never dies again! You don't have to shackle yourself to a future that NO LONGER EXISTS!!"

Jason became quiet. His eyes remained tightly closed, his fingers pressed against his eyelids.

A long minute passed.

"You say... the future doesn't exist?" Jason asked softly.

"Then why do I still remember it?" Jason whispered. "How can everything that happened mean nothing?"

His shoulders heaved as he stifled a sob.

"How can I live with all the people who died because of me?"

"How can I go on knowing that your mother ultimately died?"

"What does it matter if I resurrect her here? I will always know I failed her."

"Even if I perfectly restore her, how can I face her, knowing I left Timothy behind? How can I look her in the eyes and tell her I abandoned our son? Your brother?"

Jason pressed his face into his hands. He wept, heaving long hard sobs as the pain of his failures crashed down upon him.

"Oh god! God!! I don't know how to go on! I DON'T KNOW!! Everything hurts! Every day, it hurts! I look in the mirror and I want to kill him! I want to rip him a-fucking-part! I hate that piece of shit! I hate him, I hate me, I hate everyone!!"

Daisy stared at her father in silent disbelief. By now, she had realized that her pain was far, far lesser than his. It wasn't inconsequential, but never had she realized until this very moment just how broken Jason had become. His guilt, his grief... she could not fathom just how much pain he had been silently enduring... for her sake.

"Dad... dad, I'm sorry." Daisy mumbled, leaning in closer. "Dad, don't cry... I'm here for you, okay? I'm sorry. I didn't mean to say all those things. Come on, dad, come here... I'm here for you, daddy..."

Daisy carefully wrapped her arms around her father. She set aside her own feelings, realizing that now, he needed her just as much as she needed him.

Jason cried. He sobbed and wept. He wailed uncontrollably, fully breaking down in front of someone for the first time in his entire life.

When he had lost his foster mother and father, Jason had trudged through life in a daze.

When he had realized Amelia was dead, Jason felt only desolation in his heart.

When he thought Daisy had perished, Jason hadn't been able to muster any tears.

When his wife fell, he became barren, unable to feel anything but an abyss.

Only now, after countless years had passed, did he finally release all his emotions into his daughter's embrace.

Daisy felt strange. Her father was supposed to comfort her, but instead, she was comforting him. But this strangeness quickly left her heart. She closed her eyes and rested her cheek atop his head.

Rocking back and forth, ever so gently, Daisy stayed with her father for a full hour. She was mostly quiet, sometimes crying along with him, sometimes only taking in the emotions and thinking about the absurdity of the situation with a joyless smile.

The father and daughter had both suffered terrible traumas. Daisy eventually realized that hers was no greater or lesser than his. He had lost a wife and a son, while she had lost a mother and a brother. Jason might feel personally responsible, but that did not lessen the trauma Daisy had suffered during her childhood. And indeed, her pain was a part of her father's pain, as he blamed himself for what she had endured.

But, eventually, both of their emotions ran their courses. They ran out of tears to cry.

Jason pulled away from his daughter. His expression was wretched, but... releasing all those emotions was a relief. It was as if a dam had burst, allowing everything he hadn't allowed himself to say to now flow freely.

Jason wiped his eyes. He looked at the ground.

For the first time in a long time... he felt better.

Not good. Not great. Just 'better.'

Jason summoned some tissues. He handed them to Daisy, then he blew his nose while she blew hers.

After a moment, Jason looked at his little girl. For no reason at all, he faintly smiled, then let out a small laugh.

"Haha..."

"You're laughing?" Daisy asked, slightly astonished.

"It's just... I'm so sorry, honey." Jason said, wiping his tear-stained eyes. "I'm supposed to be the big reliable man, but here I am, blubbering like a baby."

"It's alright, daddy. Everyone needs to cry sometimes. I'm glad you let it all out." Daisy said soothingly. "There's no shame in crying just because you're a man."

Jason caressed his daughter's face. He touched her tenderly, wishing with all his heart he could have done so a thousand more times since she was a child.

"I love you so much, baby girl." Jason said. "I know... I know it hurts. You want to see your mother. You want to make up for all that lost time. But we can't do that, okay? I need you to try and let go. Try and treat her as a normal person, getting to know her step by step. In time, I will introduce the idea to her that we knew each other in the future. I just don't want to overwhelm her right now. Okay? Okay?"

Daisy winced. She nodded slowly, but lowered her eyes.

"Alright, daddy." Daisy mumbled. "I'll try to be strong."

"Good. Good girl." Jason said, leaning forward and kissing her forehead. "I'm going to bring Phoebe here sooner rather than later. I'll let you know beforehand. When she arrives, I'll introduce you as my daughter... so just play that part as best you can."

Daisy felt as if a stake had been driven into her stomach. She squirmed uncomfortably. "Yes, daddy."

Jason cleared his throat. He stood up, then used a Word of Power to refresh himself and Daisy both.

"I... have to get back to work." Jason said. "Sorry I dumped all that on you. But I'm glad you were here for me. We have to be there for each other, because we're all we have left."

"Yeah..." Daisy whispered.

But she didn't believe him.

She still had a mother. One day, Daisy would definitely, definitely hug and kiss her mom and cry in her arms again.

There had to be a way to restore Phoebe to the way she once was. Daisy just didn't know what method she would use yet.

Jason muttered a Word of Power. He vanished from the room, leaving his little girl behind.

Daisy sat on the bench for a while longer. Eventually, she got up, grabbed her bo staff and started sparring with the training dummy again. Only now, this time, she was hitting it much harder than before.

She had a lot of aggression she needed to unleash.

Part 713: Sparring

January 29th, 2021.

A lot was happening in the Milky Way, and more specifically, many seismic events were occurring on Earth.

In less than an hour, Bahamut was deposed and killed. The demons had no idea one of their allies had been eradicated from existence.

And why didn't they? Because they were busy mounting an assault on Heaven. Far earlier than in Jason's original timeline, the demons were launching an attack to pursue their strategic objectives. They didn't monitor Bahamut closely, so they had no way of knowing she was dead.

At the same time, Aevum was rapidly progressing day by day. Four minutes in realspace was one day in Aevum. In the few hours the demons spent taking over Saint Catherine's Monastery and fortifying it into a forward base that could launch a continuous stream of attacks upon Mount Sinai, weeks had already passed inside Aevum.

The demons were not aware of the Wordsmith's actions. But elsewhere in the Sol system, someone else was taking notice of the rapidly evolving situation on Earth.

It was a Volgrim ship known as the VLL Scout Class 1175-Monitor. A long and unimportant name for a low-level scouting ship of little importance to the Volgrim Empire. It was equipped with a crude, cheap, barely functional stealth module that was nonetheless countless epochs more advanced than any technology present on Earth. As such, despite being considered a low level and trashy vessel no Volgrim would spare a glance toward, it was nevertheless a serious threat to the people of Earth.

Only a handful of people even knew it was there, and none of them were willing to speak of its existence yet.

Aboard the 1175-Monitor, its crew consisted of 35% Changelings, 50% Technopaths, and a modest complement of Psions.

These were not powerful Psions. In fact, the mightiest one among their ranks was a mere 5th Level Psion known as Nufaris. The rest were at the 4th level, and were only present in a civilian capacity. Nufaris was the commander of the 1175-Monitor, and possessed the most potent psionic abilities of the crew. Even so, he was not worth mentioning among the billions of superior Psions who towered above him. Until a Psion reached the 6th Level, they were not even a Bottom Cosmic, and countless meatshield grunts like him existed throughout the tertiary of their society.

The Milky Way had hundreds of billions of stars. Those stars had trillions of planets. Those planets had tens of trillions of moons. Cataloging and monitoring all of them was an exhausting job and constantly stretched the military thin. Only the Volgrim knew just how rich with life the Milky Way was, but they still had to be realistic when it came to which planets they deemed worth studying and monitoring.

Earth was an interesting planet. Its technology level was low, but the Volgrim had deployed the 1175-Monitor in orbit of Jupiter and occasionally Saturn in order to keep an eye on Earth from long-range. This was because, due to an unfortunate accident during the Great Wars, a stray ship had been lost elsewhere in the galaxy and crash-landed on Earth some seventy orbital cycles before. This had subsequently caused a massive spike in humanity's technological prowess as secretive military bases studied and proliferated its technology.

The Volgrim were not alarmed. They didn't really care all that much. It had taken their species thousands of years to go from a planet-wide industrial level to traversing the Void in powerful spacecraft. They were so greatly advanced compared to Earth that they could dispatch a single 6th Level Psion to pacify it at any point if it started to look like a threat. Besides that, the ship that had crashed was an ancient escape pod more than a million cycles older than modern Volgrim technology. It was less than trash in their eyes.

Thus, the 1175-Monitor's ultimate purpose was simply to observe and record the progress of human society, making a report to the Founders every decade or so. Nufaris knew his job was benign, so he also knew he was not allowed to take military action without express permission.

Additionally, though Nufaris captained the 1175-Monitor, he was in fact subservient to the Changelings, who had laid claim to Earth's monitoring. He operated under the orders of several high-ranking Changelings only a few positions below the Third Founder, Treyza.

Thus, it was on this seemingly random cycle when Nufaris found himself, as always, feeling cooped up and bored while monitoring Earth's primitive radio transmissions, their digital infrastructure, and their surface dwellings for important activity.

[Informer Jin.] Nufaris said, as he glanced at a readout on the ship's Bridge. [We have noticed unusual demonic activity near the angel's World Entrance. It seems they intend to mount an attack on Mount Sinai.]

Informer Jin, a 5th Level Changeling and the highest ranked military member on the ship, was standing nearby, casually monitoring radio-waves emanating from Earth. It slowly turned its head to look at the holographic display of Earth.

"This one has noticed the movements of the demons. This one does not believe the situation warrants a report to the Planetary Oversight Commission."

[Of course not. I would not presume to bother the Commission over such a minor matter.] Nufaris said. [However, I believe we should take a closer look at the battle unfolding. It would be a good opportunity to collect intelligence on the combat capabilities of the demons and angels.]

Informer Jin's face remained placid. It did not place much value on the happenings on Earth outside a vague interest in studying the biology of the many different species living there. Earth just so happened to be the most diversely populated world in the galaxy, with hundreds of Sentient species and sub-species. Almost every other world had one or two major life forms that dominated the lower life forms... but Earth had hundreds competing for domination. It was truly bizarre.

For Jin, studying the biology of these cross-breeding species, as well as studying their rich and interesting political philosophies proved to be quite engrossing. But observing a war and its tactics were not too interesting to the Informer. Jin did not place much value on ugly, low-level battles between mere mud-dwellers.

"Do you believe this to be a good use of our assets?" Observer Jin asked dryly.

[We need not go overboard.] Nufaris quickly said. [I suggest we dispatch a 4th Level Psion to observe the battle more closely. Someone specializing in stealth would be ideal. Have them bring along recording devices as well.]

Jin contemplated the idea for a long minute. Then, it waved its hand lazily.

"Very well. You may dispatch one junior to observe more closely. The humans are growing more competent at scanning their airspace for anomalies by the day. We do not wish to draw attention to our Empire."

[Do you believe we will be able to keep these primitives at arm's length for much longer?] Nufaris questioned. [The vessel that crashed on the North American continent has surely given the mud-dwellers assurances that they are not alone in the universe.]

Observer Jin snorted through its nostril. "If you worry that these humans are only just recently becoming aware of the existence of alien life, then allow this one to remind you of the existence of the angels. They are life-forms which did not originate on Earth. In fact, this one personally believes they may be from a precursor civilization that predates the Volgrim."

Nufaris stared at Jin. His expression contorted slightly.

[Older than the Volgrim... do you have any proof of such claims? Their technology is so primitive that I find this idea laughable. How could a civilization older than our own have failed to evolve past ours for so long?]

"This one's theories have not found purchase among the High Changelings." Jin admitted. "Spying on the angels inside their hidden dimension has proven nearly impossible. This one has unsuccessfully sought permission to observe the inside of 'Heaven' so as to better comprehend the history of the angels. Unfortunately, the Commission does not see eye to eye with this one and have refused to allow any study that might contaminate the planet's political situation."

Nufaris's eyes flashed with insight. [So... you wish to scout the interior of Heaven?]

[This one would like to do so, but the Commission will not allow this one to slip any drones through the dimensional membrane hidden inside Mount Sinai.]

Nufaris stood up from his commanding chair. He casually sauntered over to Observer Jin, his figure towering a full head above the diminutive Changeling. He crossed his arms and smiled cunningly with his eyes.

[Observer Jin, it seems we will be able to fulfill multiple strategic objectives at once. I shall travel to the planet myself. My stealth capabilities are second to none among other 5th Level Psions. I will quietly uncover the history you seek, and you will create a cover story for me.]

Jin's expression shifted slightly. It vaguely appeared to frown.

"This decision will be criticized severely." Jin warned. "If you do not produce results, you are likely to be court-martialed."

[Then I suppose I should not return empty-handed.] Nufaris mused. [With your permission, I will head out immediately.]

Jin nodded its head. "Go in peace. Return victorious. Do not interfere with Earth's matters. Do not provoke a diplomatic incident."

[I contemplate, and I comprehend.] Nufaris said, bowing at the waist.

Without further ado, he left the Bridge, headed to an airlock, and departed the vessel. He flew toward Earth, where before long he would begin a reconnaissance mission that would soon change the trajectory of the Milky Way's future...

Jason stepped into a private training gymnasium inside Aevum. The sounds of swords clanging rang out across the room, drawing his attention. There, he found Nadia sparring with an unexpected partner... not one of the training dummies, but Heaven's Daughter, wearing her full armor and keeping her face covered.

Nadia's movements were swift and fierce. Catherine had centuries worth of training and battle experience, so she was visibly shocked when a mere child was able to keep up with her and learn how to fight with a sword in record time. The longer Nadia and Catherine clashed, the more Nadia became capable of turning the tables on her senior.

Clang, clang, shing!

Their swords collided in a fury. Jason stood in the doorway for several seconds just watching them before he finally slammed the door shut.

That loud noise startled both girls, causing them to take a step back and look in his direction.

"Jason..." Nadia said, giving him a strange look. Her clothes were sticky with sweat from her workout. She quickly turned and grabbed a towel, mopping herself down.

Catherine's body was hidden behind her armor, so Jason did not know if she was sweating just as badly. He didn't bother to ask.

"Jason. Excellent timing." Catherine said, striding over to meet him. "I was just sparring with your protege over here. Miss Nadia is an extremely impressive combatant."

"I can see that." Jason said with a smile. "Are both of you adapting well to your RealitySims?"

He couldn't see Catherine's face, but Jason seemed to sense a smile in her voice. "Oh, yes. It has been a wonderful experience. I now feel as though my former brain was trapped in a quagmire of molasses, while my new one is an Olympic sprinter growing ever faster as time passes."

Nadia walked over. She nodded at Catherine while breathing heavily, then smiled at Jason. "The RealitySim was an excellent choice for me. It has integrated amazingly with my powers."

"Oh yeah? In what way exactly?" Jason asked.

"As I fight with Heaven's Daughter, I save all of her fighting styles and techniques inside my RealitySim. She does the same with my moves, but my cerebral abilities allow me to much more quickly comprehend her fighting capabilities and adapt them for my own uses."

Catherine turned her head to look at the young woman. "I must admit, I have grown envious of Nadia's powers. My abilities are, of course, quite potent, but her mental powers are disgustingly efficient when combined with her MindCore. I do not believe it will take me more than another three or four days before I can no longer surprise her at all unless I invent new novel weapons with my magic. Even if I do, they will be outside the scope of our sparring, since they would threaten her life."

Nadia waved her hand casually. "Don't flatter me too much. You've obviously been going easy on me. If you wielded your full arsenal, I'd be dead a hundred times over."

Catherine didn't counter Nadia's words. Instead, she turned to look at Jason.

"It is my understanding that you intend to turn Nadia into an inventor. Do you believe that is the wisest course of action?"

Jason blinked. "I'm not going to force her down that path or anything, but it certainly seemed the smartest choice to me. Why?"

"Because." Catherine said, her tone serious. "I think you are greatly underestimating just what a frightening warrior Nadia could become. She can quickly learn and master any fighting style in months, weeks, days, or even hours. If you were to train her to become a warrior, and if you outfitted her with proper armor and some of those support abilities you've shown me, she could easily become one of the strongest combatants on Earth."

Jason rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "I see what you're saying. And Nadia, if you want to go down that path, I'll certainly offer you my full support. But I don't think it's the right decision."

"Why not?" Catherine asked. She seemed a little upset he would immediately reject her. "Doesn't Earth need as many warriors as it can muster?"

Jason started to open his mouth, but surprisingly, Nadia was the one who butted in.

"I'm sorry, Heaven's Daughter, but Jason is right. It would be unwise for me to devote myself to becoming a physical powerhouse, even if my abilities seem perfect for it. That is because Jason plans to create many different types of combat assets. What he lacks right now are Thinkers who can help him quickly design new types of weapons, armor, spaceships, energy production facilities, and other such things that will rapidly advance humanity's global strength."

She continued. "In your eyes, the demons represent an existential threat to humanity. But to Jason, they are only the first enemy we must defeat. He has his eyes on a much more dangerous foe."

Catherine's head twitched. "You're talking about the aliens watching over Earth?"

"Yes." Nadia admitted. "Has Jason told you about them?"

"Only a little." Catherine said, turning her helmet to stare at Jason.

"I'll tell you before you leave and head back to Heaven." Jason said. "It simply wasn't important for you to know about right now."

He expected to get at least a little of an earful from Catherine, but she simply backed down and nodded. "Alright. If you do or don't tell me, that's fine too. I trust you."

Jason's mouth fell slightly open and he gave Catherine a strange look. Nadia also surreptitiously glanced at Catherine out of the corner of her eye.

Wasn't she trusting Jason a little... too easily?

But then again... Nadia was no different. If Jason asked her to throw herself into a fire, she'd barely hesitate. Only she knew the depths of her feelings for the man before her...

"Ahem." Jason said, clearing his throat to try and defuse a bit of the tension in the air. "Don't worry, I'm not trying to keep this a secret from you. I don't actually care if anyone knows. The problem is, if the Volgrim find out that we know, it will potentially create a catastrophe. In an ideal world, they will think we're oblivious to their existence for another several decades or longer, giving us time to create counter-measures to them. But if we're unlucky or make mistakes, we might alert them early. We cannot defeat the Volgrim as we are now. We have to delay for as long as possible."

That explanation satisfied Catherine. She folded her gauntlets over her waist and nodded. "I understand. The situation seems quite volatile."

After a momentary pause, Catherine spoke again. "Jason, regarding what we spoke about last time, I've chosen a fellow Lazarite I think would work best as my assistant. If you can bequeath her a MindCore, specifically a GenesisFrame like yours, then she will be able to assist me greatly in the creation of further weapons and technology for the Lazarites."

"Sure thing." Jason said. "You were planning to leave within the next week and return to Heaven, right? I can give one Lazarite an upgrade in a day or two. Why don't you tell me who they are now so I can bring them here and make them comfortable?"

"Certainly." Catherine said, before waving her hand and using her light magic to conjure a shockingly realistic light-based puppet of a different Lazarite Jason hadn't seen before. Her entire body, clothing, and hair were golden, but the detail on her face was no less impressive than any ancient Roman statue that had lost its color to the ages. She looked to be an older woman in her forties, with lightly tossed curly hair, wearing a cute bonnet on her head. Her attire made it seem as if she had lived somewhere around the time of the early 20th century.

"Her name is Helen." Catherine explained. "She is one of the newer angels in Heaven, though a few generations removed from the last billion new entrants. She isn't considered a figure worthy of note, and I doubt anyone will be keeping a close eye on her, especially if you're only going to bring her into Aevum for a half-hour of Realspace time."

Jason nodded. "If you think she's trustworthy, I can bring her here. Let me see if I can find her first. Locate."

Jason closed his eyes. His soul separated from his body as he locked onto the target angel's signature. He vanished from Aevum and crossed the galaxy in the blink of an eye, diving toward the Earth.

For the briefest of moments, Jason's soul paused. He looked out across the blackness of space, feeling as if he might have sensed something near Earth's orbit. But after looking for a while, he didn't uncover any hidden assets.

"Hmm." Jason grunted.

He dove down, down, down into Earth's atmosphere, pierced the membrane of a hidden dimension, and tore into Heaven itself.

Here, he had to proceed with caution. He shielded his soul by turning his illusory self as transparent and ghostly as possible. It meant that if someone attacked him, they would be able to snuff out his life in an instant, but it also made him much harder to detect. Jason doubted even a manipulation-master like Raphael would sense his errant soul unless he drew within a hundred feet of the old man.

And so, Jason slowly lowered himself from the sky. He picked out Helen's soul signature with ease thanks to Catherine's direction, but he still paused to look around Heaven. Every angel seemed to be in a hurry to don their armor, wield their weapons, and psych themselves up for war. The Lazarites were bored beyond reason after being forbidden from leaving Heaven since their deaths, so they were by far the most eager to fight. But even among them, many Lazarites were quite fond of the quiet and serene life they had been living.

Heaven was far bigger now than in the Ancient Era. It had grown to envelope the entire Earth in a spatial bubble, and held ample living space for the tens of billion of angels living here now. Many human-based structures had been designed and erected with heavenly materials, causing the brutalist designs of the modern era to be contrasted with the glowing and beautiful crystalline walls favored by the angels. It made it seem as if each of Heaven's main cities were shining with bright light, visible from great distances.

Jason slowly lowered into one of the buildings. He found Helen sitting in an apartment complex that was barely decorated and quite dull. She had many books on her shelves, and was reading one while ignoring the world outside. It seemed she was an avid bookworm and held little to no interest in the coming assault by the demons.

After making sure Helen was alone, Jason nodded. His soul turned gaseous, and he dispersed it, reappearing back inside his body.

When he opened his eyes, Jason jerked his head back. Nadia and Catherine were standing barely two feet away, their helmet and face weirdly close to his!

"???" Jason made a weird noise as he took a step back. Nadia blushed and also took a step back, while Catherine's expression remained a mystery.

"Apologies." Catherine quickly said, lowering her head. "I feared for a moment that you might have died. Your body became as still as a corpse."

"Oh." Jason said, relieved they weren't trying to sneak kisses while he wasn't home. "That happens sometimes when I use my abilities. Anyway, I found Helen. She's alone right now, so I'm going to bring her here."

"Please do." Catherine said.

Jason paused. "Well, I wouldn't want to frighten her. Nadia, why don't you leave for a while? Heaven's Daughter and I will greet Helen, and I can keep you and the other people's identities here a secret until I determine her mindset."

Catherine turned to look at Nadia. Nadia twirled her hair around her finger and smiled sheepishly.

"Well, if you want me to leave because you don't want me seeing Heaven's Daughter's real face... um. Actually. I kind of already know who she is... Catherine."

Catherine flinched. Her reaction was visible even despite the armor covering her body.

"You- how do you know my name? Don't tell me you pieced my identity together with that mental power of yours?"

Nadia took a step back and held out her palms apologetically. "No, no, it's not like that. Um. You see, when Jason created my MindCore, he trapped me in a time loop by accident..."

"You did mention that, yes." Catherine said sternly.

"Jason's other self inside the simulation had all of his memories. I learned who you were from him back then." Nadia said, lowering her eyes to the floor while feeling somewhat ashamed.

"Oh. I see. Then why didn't you tell me sooner?" Catherine pressed.

"I thought you wanted to keep your identity a secret, and I didn't know what sort of person you were. I am sorry for deceiving you." Nadia apologized. "I wasn't going to tell anyone without your permission."

Catherine heaved a sigh. Realizing her deception was now pointless, she motioned with her hand and caused her light armor to disperse, revealing her true appearance for the first time that day. She didn't seem too bothered, and simply shrugged helplessly. "Raphael always told me to keep my identity a secret for fear the demons would seek my assassination. But it seems I have been failing to do so for a long time now."

Nadia's eyes sparkled as she looked at Catherine. "Wow... you're really pretty. I didn't expect someone as cool as you to also be so effortlessly beautiful. You could be a model in a magazine..."

"I have no interest in such things. But thank you for the compliment." Catherine said. "Now, Jason, you might as well just bring Helen here. It's fine if she meets Nadia too."

Jason threw his hands up. "Sure! That works for me too. Give me one moment..."

After taking time to clear his mind, Jason reached out with his senses, and uttered a Word of Power.

"Retrieve."

January 29th, 2021.

Helen laid on her bed in her apartment in Heaven. She had heard that a great battle was soon to be fought, but her daddy raised her proper and she knew the battlefield was no place for a woman. As such, she left such affairs to the brave men in Heaven and some of the more exotic women who didn't have the same proper sense that she did. Queers, the whole lot of them.

She lovingly cradled a book she'd read many times during her life; Jules Verne's Around the World in Eighty Days. It had been published only a few decades before she was born, and her mother had read it to her many nights before bed. Helen was quite fond of the story it told, as she had always wanted to travel around the world she was older.

Ah, but then came the Great War, and the Second Great War. Two terrible events almost back to back that ruined global politics and killed tens of millions of people. Luckily, Helen had endured, and before she died, she did get to travel around the world, visiting Italy, Greece, China, Japan, and even India!

These days, she was all sorts of cooped up. Because of the Archangels' decree, low level Lazarites like herself were not permitted to leave Heaven except on special missions, and those who did had their movements closely monitored. Helen had taken to staying inside Heaven and traveling around its vast, world-spanning territory instead. It wasn't nearly as diverse a realm as Earth, but there were all sorts of interesting people there too.

And after a few decades, she had settled into a simpler routine of maintaining her apartment gardens, reading books, and fantasizing about someday returning to Earth to explore it until there was nothing left to see.

It was on this day, the day the demons had begun to attack Mount Sinai, that something strange happened. A shining light engulfed Helen's body, and before she could react, she found she was no longer inside her apartment!

She had materialized inside what appeared to be a mostly empty school gymnasium. It appeared much more modern than the one she had used when she was a child, but it was recognizable nonetheless.

Helen wanted to stand up and take account of her surroundings, but she found that she was already standing, even though she had no idea when that had happened. She looked to her left, and she looked to her right.

On her left there stood two humans. A teenage boy with blonde hair and blue eyes, and a pretty girl with curly brown hair and deep green eyes.

To her right was someone she recognized immediately. Helen was most surprised by the fact that Lady Catherine was here, outside of her armor, in front of these strangers!

"Heaven's Daughter..." Helen said, bewildered. "You, um, you're not hiding your face? No, rather, where are we? What's going on?"

"It's fine, Helen. You can just call me Catherine here." Catherine replied. "To answer your question, this young man is the new Hero. He is the successor of the Heroic Aura, and his name is the Archseer."

Helen widened her eyes. She looked at the young man with renewed interest, now taking much clearer note of his distinct blonde hair and blue eyes.

"Ohh, goodness dickens, so he is! Look at this young child! A Hero, you say?"

Jason scratched his cheek self-consciously. Helen looked to be in her late 40s or perhaps her early 50s, but he was definitely older than her. He decided not to correct her for now.

"I'm Jason, and this is Nadia." Jason said, gesturing to the woman beside him. "Catherine tells me you are a good friend of hers."

Helen blushed at his words. "Me? A friend of Catherine's? Oh, I would never presume! We simply share a few things in common, that's all! Miss Catherine is the blood sister of one of humanity's Heroes, but me? I merely lucked out and married one! We can't be said to be in the same league."

Jason blinked. "What's that? You married a Hero? Who?"

Helen glanced at Catherine. "You didn't tell the boy? You silly-willy! I thought that was why you brought me here, just to embarrass me!"

Helen clicked her tongue, then did a little curtsy. "I doubt you've heard of me, Mister Jason. I'm Helen Whittaker. Many years ago, when I was still young, pretty, and before I was an angel, I was married to the love of my life, Harold Whittaker. He was humanity's last Hero."

Jason's eyes widened in shock. "You're Harold's wife?!"

"Indeed." Helen said, bobbing her head with a sweet smile. "Unfortunately, I passed before Harold did, and he never came to Heaven as an angel. I've long given up hope on seeing him again..."

Her expression turned forlorn, as did Catherine's. Nadia looked like she wanted to console Helen, but Jason...

"Harold?" Jason repeated. "Harold Whittaker? He's your husband?"

Helen nodded. "Yes. It seems you've heard his name before?"

Jason looked from face to face of each of the three women, then scratched his head.

"Heard of him? I know him! Harold's still alive! Well, not exactly alive, but he's living in his Heroic Artifact! You didn't know?"

Helen's face lit up like a Christmas tree. "R-really?! Oh, Saint Mary and Elizabeth! Harold is alive? Do you know where he is? Could I see him?!"

It wasn't originally in Jason's plans, but seeing the joy on the woman's face, he couldn't deny her.

"Sure. He lives here, actually. Moved him in a few weeks back. Why don't you three follow me and we'll pay the old guy a visit."

Helen started shaking with excitement. Jason could have teleported everyone directly to Harold's house, but he didn't want to reveal any powers in front of her unnecessarily, since he wasn't sure how trustworthy she was. He also didn't exactly want to lead another person right through Aevum's streets, but compared to using his Wordsmithing directly, it seemed the lesser of two wrongs.

As such, Jason led Helen out of the Gymnasium with Catherine and Nadia in tow. They walked through the streets of Aevum, which Catherine had grown a little familiar with, but which Helen had never seen.

The woman's eyes widened multiple times as she gasped, ooh'd, and ahh'd at the incredibly otherworldly sights surrounding her. Beams of light shot up into the sky. A massive tower was erected directly in the center of the city, and it was so tall she could barely believe its size! Naturally she had seen skyscrapers on Earth, but she had never seen a single solitary tower that dominated the landscape around it. The lack of visual competition made the Spire more impressive than it would have otherwise been.

On top of that, there were cubes levitating in the air through unknown means. These cubes flew around, seemingly on important missions, but as for what their purposes were, she had no idea.

As exciting as Aevum was, Helen's thoughts were strongly focused on the knowledge she would soon be seeing her husband again. For the first time in decades, she could see Harold! Talk to him! Maybe even hug and kiss him! She was growing positively giddy at the thought!

Jason led her and the others into a large mansion only five or six blocks from the gymnasium. Located in the southern quadrant of Argent, Harold's estate was large not for his sake, but for the sake of all the animals Jason had moved inside.

The Wordsmith had not realized just how many birds, cats, dogs, bears, and other sentient wildlife had been living around Harold's shack, but he had ultimately relented and created a way for them to travel into Aevum's wildlands to hunt for food as they needed. He had created plenty of infrastructure to feed them automatically, but the predators among them had desired to hunt their food themselves.

It was rather weird. Jason found it odd that these sentient animals would opt to hunt and kill other animals, but he had learned they considered non-sentient animals as lesser beings. Any animals who had not been uplifted by Harold's powers were not considered worthy of any rights to remain alive, and as such they were placed distinctly lower on the food chain.

It wasn't as if Jason could fault them. Humans had known for ages that many types of animals were capable of deep thought, introspection, and even communication. That didn't stop them from killing or even mass-farming them for their various body parts. If anything, humans were far worse due to the fact they had invented corporate slaughterhouses. Harold's animals were much more moral by comparison.

Still, the fact animals capable of speaking had come to such a conclusion left him feeling conflicted. He didn't know how to rectify his thoughts on the matter. Ultimately, he let the matter drop. It wasn't his business, and the best he could do was provide alternate means of sustenance. Perhaps in the future he would try and find a more heavy-handed solution, but he had more pressing concerns weighing on his mind.

When the group entered Harold's estate, Helen's eyes brightened when she spotted a large Doberman laying on a doggy bed not far from the estate's entrance.

"Charlie, is that you? Charlie!! Oh my goodness, I can't believe you're still alive! Come here, young man!"

She trotted over to the dog, who slowly lifted his head and looked up at her with confused eyes.

"Do I... know you... miss?" The dog asked.

After sniffing at Helen's leg, his energy levels rose. The Doberman staggered to his feet and seemed to smile. His tail wagged happily, albeit slowly due to his old age.

"Miss Helen... how is it you? Have I finally died? Are we meeting in... the afterlife?"

"Not the afterlife, you silly boy! I'm an angel, and I've come to Earth from Heaven!" Helen said, completely oblivious to the fact she wasn't on Earth at all. She had no idea what state Earth was in, so for all she knew, it had evolved to a grandly higher state of technology after all these years.

Charlie hopped up a little, trying to use what little energy he had to excitedly lick at Helen's face. "Oh, mother! Mother! It's really you... I never thought I'd get to see you again... holding on for... all these years was... truly worth it..."

Tears fell from Helen's eyes as she hugged the dog gently, trying not to cry. She had long assumed all of her beloved pets had succumbed to old age, but Harold's powers not only elevated their intellect, they had granted the animals greater lifespans as well. Their children and progeny would eventually become stronger and stronger each generation, living longer lives with greater quality of lives as their genetics improved over time.

But these first generation animals did not get to live as long as their children. Being able to see their Mother again before they died was an event nobody expected. Before long, word spread that Helen had returned. Sir Marcus the parakeet flew over, and even that annoying crow came flying over to see her.

"CAWW!! MOTHER'S BACK! THE ONLY GOOD PERSON IN THE WORLD! NOT LIKE UGLY STUPID HERO BOY AND STINKY GIRLS! CAWWW!!"

"Chester, you watch your manners." Helen chided, waggling a finger at the crow. "What have I told you about keeping your rude opinions to yourself?"

The crow paused, then he looked away.

"Sorry, mother!"

He didn't even yell the words. Jason was enlightened.

They made their way further into the house, with Marcus and all the other animals excitedly greeting Helen. It was obvious she had built up a deep relationship with them, and even though she hadn't met many of the younger animals, they knew her because of stories passed down by their parents.

Eventually though, Helen became anxious. She went up the stairs to the third floor, and Jason led her into the main bedroom where more than thirty animals, including the huge bear Jason had seen lounging outside Hideki's cabin, were all resting on the ground, on beds, or even on shelves along the walls.

"Where is he?" Helen asked, bewildered. "Where's Harold?"

"He's over there." Jason said, pointing directly across the room.

On the opposite side from the door, there was a giant old-school television from the 1950's. Its back was facing the door, and its front was facing the large pane-glass window. Helen didn't even recognize it as a television at first due to seeing it from behind.

Confused, she walked over to the television, stepped around its side to look at the front, then froze on the spot. Her eyes widened with a mixture of sadness, happiness, horror, and glee. She was confused for a moment, but she managed to piece together what happened quickly.

"This is Harold's artifact..." Helen whispered, as she looked at the image of an old man on the screen, laying in an easy chair, snoring loudly with his head thrown back. He was completely out of it and hadn't noticed his wife's appearance at all. "He always was... glued to the TV when he got older..."

"Yes." Jason said, smiling at her. He felt a deep warmness in his heart. Seeing this couple reunited reminded him of his own situation with Phoebe, and that felt cathartic to the Wordsmith in a visceral sense.

Helen waved her hand in front of the screen. She tapped the screen, then hissed through her teeth...

"Harold... Harold! Harold! Are you... are you okay? Harold? Can you hear me?"

Harold didn't react to her words. She stared at the screen, feeling overwhelmed with emotions, confused by this unexpected development. Never did she expect her husband would be living inside a television.

"Father is hard to wake up." Marcus the parakeet said, landing on top of the TV. "If you adjust the knobs, that will do the trick. He's usually a bit grouchy when he wakes up, but I'm sure he won't be once he sees you!"

Helen's eyes brightened. She reached over to touch and twist the oversized dials on the side of the television. After a few seconds, Harold's snoring abruptly stopped. His eyes widened, and he sat up in his chair, flying into a rage.

"Dagnabbit, I told you brats not to touch mah damn dials! Who's fiddlin with 'em?! You'd better fess up, bucko!"

"Harold..." Helen said softly, as tears of joy welled up in her eyes. "It's me. It's Helen. I'm... I'm back!"

She touched the screen, desperately wishing she could reach inside and caress his face lovingly, like she did all those years ago...

Harold looked up at the woman who had woken him up.

His expression didn't lighten. If anything, it became nastier.

"Helen? Helen?! You think I give a got-damn what yer name is, woman?? Damn wimmin, always fiddlin' with stuff they ain't 'sposed to! Keep yer hands off mah boob tube, lady!"

Helen's body shook. "Wha-? Harold, it's me, Helen! Helen, your wife! Don't you remember me?"

"Wife? WIFE?! I ain't got no wife! Stupid broad, you got wax in yer ears?" Harold snapped. "Quit foolin' around and get yer grubby mitts off my teevee, woman! Can't you youngsters let an old man rest in peace? SHEESH!"

Harold sneered angrily at Helen, then he flopped back onto his chair and deliberately spun it around so its back was facing outward.

A full minute passed. Helen stared, frozen speechless, the blood drained from her face. She looked like a ghost that had lost its soul.

"Har... Har... Harold... Harry... you don't... re-re-remember... me?"

Helen staggered backward. Jason quickly reached out to catch her before she could trip and fall. He was just as confused as Helen. He couldn't believe Harold didn't recognize her. For the briefest moment, he thought maybe Helen had been lying and they never were married, but based on how much she knew about Harold, and the fact all the animals knew her, that seemed unlikely. The most obvious answer was that... Harold had completely forgotten his wife!

Jason had no idea why this had happened. He felt absolutely awful for Helen, who was becoming more and more inconsolable every second. She started blubbering apologies to everyone for wasting their time, mixed with barely concealed sobs of anguish.

For decades, she had lived in Heaven, a heart turned to granite at the prospect of never seeing her beloved husband again. Then she finally got that chance, only for the cruel reality of the situation to rip out her heart, throw it on the ground, and stomp it into paste. She had suffered in Hell, ascended to Heaven, and then fallen right back down to Hell again all in a fifteen-minute period, her emotions and spirit completely shattered. She fell into Jason's arms and began weeping, tears staining Jason's shirt as this new revelation finally broke her spirit.

Catherine came over and tried to comfort Helen. Nadia watched from afar, unsure of what to do.

Jason looked at the side of Harold's television. The old man had already fallen asleep, and was snoring loudly again. It was as if Helen waking him up had just been a minor nuisance he easily rid himself of.

At the same time, every one of Helen's tears cut Jason like a knife. He became stone-faced as he realized... Helen was experiencing the same thing as him.

Jason had lost his wife. When he found her again, she had no knowledge of who he was.

Helen had lost her husband. When she found Harold again, he had no knowledge of who she was.

The parallels were so clear that Jason momentarily found himself dissociating from the situation. He felt like an outside observer watching from before. The situation was so absurd he almost found it comical. Was it possible the Creator was pulling the strings of reality as some sort of sick joke? Was he playing the worst prank ever on Jason, and now Helen too?

Jason blinked his eyes. He felt dizzy, yet continued to hug Helen while she sobbed. He looked at Catherine, and she met his gaze. It was clear that Catherine felt distressed for what Helen was going through, but she had no idea of the thoughts going through Jason's head.

Carefully, Jason helped Helen to her feet. He assisted the sobbing woman in leaving the room, where they went outside to get some fresh air. After thinking for a moment, Jason asked Nadia and Catherine to give him and Helen some space.

Once those two went back inside and Jason sat on a bench with Helen, her crying lessened, but it was obvious she had been hurt deeply enough that the knife plunged into her heart would leave a wound that could never be healed.

"Helen..." Jason said softly. "I'm so sorry. I didn't know this would happen."

"It's... nnn... it's not your fault..." Helen sniffled, wiping her long white sleeves across her eyes. "I should have known... he must have caught the dementia... the Alzheimer's... he was getting worse before I passed. I just... I didn't know it would be this... bad..."

Jason swallowed heavily. He never knew his own grandparents, but he'd had a few friends with older relatives who suffered from the cognitive degeneration induced by dementia and Alzheimer's. He knew it was a disease that would bring about brief spurts of memory loss, followed by the eventual and complete decline of their mental faculties.

It was a tragic disease, one that turned a person's most beloved friends and family into strangers.

Fate had slapped Helen cruelly across the face.

Jason squeezed Helen's hand. He looked up into the black sky, with the artificial sun failing to light up a bright-blue atmosphere like on Earth. If Helen were not so distracted, she would have recognized that the sky was 'wrong' almost immediately, but she hadn't.

"I lost my wife." Jason said quietly. "And when I found her, she had forgotten who I was. I know, at least somewhat, what you're going through. Unlike my situation, I think I can help you heal Harold and make him whole again. So don't cry, Helen. I know it hurts to see him like that, but I'll get in contact with my Hero friends. I know a few people who can definitely, definitely fix Harold's brain so he remembers you."

Helen lifted her head. She looked at Jason through tear-flooded eyes. "You... you can heal him? You can heal my Harry?"

"I can certainly try. No promises." Jason said. "But I don't want to see someone's wife cry like this. Especially not old Harold, who's given me so much. If it weren't for him, I would never have obtained my powers. This is the least I can do for the old man."

Helen squeezed Jason's hand. She bobbed her head and stifled a sob as she smiled at the kind young man sitting beside her.

"Oh, Jason... you're such a dear. Even if you can't heal Harry, thank you so much... thank you for being there for him. I'm glad he's had such good friends around him all these years. He has his animals too... I know he hasn't suffered at all. Even if you can't heal him, I'll just have to make him fall in love with me all over again."

Jason's heart skipped a beat. He gave Helen a long, uncomprehending look.

Make her... fall in love... with me again?

Jason's thoughts flickered over to Phoebe. He smiled at Helen, and nodded along to her words.

"Yeah... that... might just work." Jason muttered.

Part 715: Soul Splicing

January 29th, 2021.

Jason felt a bit better after talking to Helen for a while. Something about their similar situations made him feel as if he had someone he could vent to, so they spoke for a while about their shared love of their spouses and how losing their memories hurt their hearts.

But ultimately, Jason didn't plan to leave Helen hanging for long. Her trauma would be short lived compared to his. At the least, he no longer felt completely alone, and the two of them had forged a minor bond. Despite the fact that he was much older than Helen, who was born in the 1910's, Jason almost felt like she had a wonderful motherly or grandmotherly vibe. She was easy to talk to, and he appreciated that. The fact she spoke in the way an old grandmother would from his point of view, due to associations he had made with her lingual dialect as a child, did not hurt the comparison.

As such, he decided to jokingly call her Grandma Helen, which made her blush and feel as if he was teasing her, but the moniker stuck, and she had no choice but to roll her eyes and smile. He did look like a cute older teenage boy, so she wasn't all that resistant.

A few hours later, Jason left Helen and Catherine inside Harold's estate. He brought Nadia along to help him, and then he made a small laboratory dedicated to fixing Harold's problem. With her help, they worked together to craft a special Soul Retention Crystal, and Jason made an artificial duplicate of Harold's soul. This was actually done at Nadia's behest, who suggested operating on a false soul before touching his real one. Jason had never tried something like that in the past, and he found the idea was smarter than immediately jumping into a surgery for the first time on someone still living.

It wasn't as if the Wordsmith had a medical degree. His knowledge of human anatomy, and especially souls, was quite shallow.

"A question comes to mind." Nadia said, pointing at the holographic representation of Harold's soul that was floating in the air above an operation station designed specifically for the coming task. "I've never seen a soul before. Can you confirm for me that other souls all look like this?"

Harold's soul was shaped like a totem that had been carved out of a tree trunk, with many different faces and drawings on its surface depicting animals of all shapes and sizes.

There were cats, dogs, birds, bears, and dozens of other tiny animal faces all wrapping up and around a totemic pole that had a much larger sized version of Harold's face at the top.

Jason shook his head. "All souls are different from one another. It seems Harold has a strong affinity for animals. That's why his appears this way."

"Can you show me what my soul looks like?" Nadia asked.

Jason nodded. He used his Wordsmithing to create a representation of Nadia's soul.

"Soul. Attach. Projection."

As soon as it appeared, he flinched in surprise, and Nadia gasped with a mixture of horror and embarrassment.

Her soul was much more simplistic than Harold's. It was like a white and black orb that spun with energy deep inside its core. On the left side of the orb there was Nadia's face, but on the right side there was Jason's face!

Jason's face?! Why the heck was he a part of Nadia's soul?

Jason gave a long look at Nadia, and as soon as their eyes met, she looked down at the ground, unable to meet his gaze.

"I... I didn't expect... oh, um, I don't know what to say." Nadia said, feeling like a little girl who gotten caught drawing pictures of a boy in her class. "I... I'm sorry, Jason."

Jason's face flushed red with his own sense of embarrassment, followed immediately by a stinging pain in the back of his skull. He immediately realized why his face was represented on Nadia's soul, and that made him feel a sense of guilt at the trauma she had gone through.

"No, don't be." Jason said quietly. "I didn't... realize... your feelings toward me had become so... entrenched."

Entrenched.

It was such a strange word choice. He could have said 'deep' or 'ever-lasting' or something romantic, but he chose a word that put distance between himself and her. He couldn't allow himself to feel anything for her, because his heart was not with her.

Nadia had lived for decades inside her Mind Realm, trapped with a fake version of Jason. She had grown to view that part of him as being her soulmate, and they had bonded so deeply that he had imprinted on her soul. The realization made Jason feel that working with her could become a problem later on, but also he felt that it would be incredibly traumatizing if he simply pushed her away. He didn't want to hurt her again, especially after what he had accidentally done to her before. He just didn't know how to navigate this social situation.

For a brief moment, Jason wondered what Phoebe's totem would have looked like in the future. Would she had a marker of Jason on her soul?

Would his soul now have Phoebe's face embedded upon it as well?

That question scared him. Jason didn't know, and almost didn't want to know, if his love for Phoebe, his obsession with Phoebe, was as deep as Nadia's obsession with him.

"You... owe me nothing." Nadia said quietly. "Please don't let... my soul... influence you. I don't need you to make any moves toward me. Can we simply, um, discuss its appearance in neutral terms?"

She looked up and met Jason's eyes hesitantly. He nodded.

"Yes. Let's do that. Sorry, by the way."

He didn't know why he apologized. Was it because he had seen something so private and intimate that he had thoroughly embarrassed her? Was it because he had imprinted himself on her soul, yet he reciprocated none of her feelings? A mixture of both? Something else? It was anyone's guess.

Still, the two of them were mature adults. They cleared their throats and looked back up at Nadia's soul. She couldn't stop blushing, feeling exposed and naked before him, all of her secrets laid out to dry in the sun. But she soldiered on, ignoring the discomfort.

"Your soul is... extremely energetic." Jason said, choosing not to dwell on the two faces looking back at him. "This is possibly due to your MindCore being so supercharged. Comparatively, Harold's soul is a lot duller. Notice how dim it appears next to yours."

"He's an old man, and a soul who has already died." Nadia observed. "Do you suppose the energy of a soul is related to its youthfulness? Its innate power? Its age? Something else?"

"I'm no soul expert," Jason said, before sneering, "the best one I know is Archangel Raphael, and I'm not about to ask that old fucker any questions on the matter. He could tell me 99% truths and 1% catastrophic lies."

Nadia gave Jason an odd look, realizing just how deep his dislike of Raphael went. She wondered if he'd been completely forthcoming with Catherine on the matter, but decided not to ask.

"We need more data." Nadia said. "We need to look at more souls from many sources."

Jason chewed his lower lip. "Peering into people's souls is... a deep invasion of privacy. You should know that better than anyone."

Nadia grimaced. Having already thoroughly embarrassed herself, she was fully aware of Jason's meaning.

"I... yes. But it's for a good cause. Perhaps we should look at yours?" Nadia said, before her heart skipped a beat. She suddenly realized she wasn't sure what she would see, and she didn't know if she was ready to see it.

Surprisingly, Jason didn't reject the idea. But he did hesitate...

"I... I don't know." Jason said quietly. "I don't mind if you see it. But I don't... I don't want to know what my soul looks like."

This surprised Nadia. Before she could question Jason's reasoning, he lowered his head and rubbed his eyes.

"I already saw your soul. It's only fair you see mine. But I don't want to know what my real self is like. It... the thought... frightens me."

Nadia swallowed heavily. She sighed...

"Alright. Show me, but you look away. I'll... collect the data."

Jason kept his fingers pressed against his eyes. "Soul. Attach. Projection."

Jason didn't look up. He refused to examine his inner self. But Nadia saw everything.

"Oh... oh my..." Nadia said quietly.

After a long, long minute, Jason dissipated the projection and looked up. Nadia's face was ashen.

"What?" Jason asked. "What... did you see?"

The blood seemed to have drained from Nadia's face. She smiled, but it was so weak and foced that he knew it couldn't be genuine.

"Your soul is, um... it's a rainbow of colors. But they're all so... dim. It's as if they used to be vibrant, glowing with neon energy, and now they're all..."

She trailed off, allowing Jason to fill in the words himself.

"My soul seems dead, then." Jason said quietly. "That about matches how I feel. No wonder you're so shocked."

"No, that's not it at all." Nadia said. "Harold's soul and mine both had our faces represented. But... but your soul... didn't. Your face wasn't there. Only the faces of-"

"Stop." Jason interrupted, raising his palm. "Don't tell me. Keep it to yourself. Let's just collect more data."

Nadia bobbed her head. Her throat clammed up, and she felt a little stifled by the emotions she was experiencing. Nevertheless, she kept her mouth shut and opted not to speak of what she had seen.

"We'll do... Catherine... next." Jason said, his tone slightly sullen.

With a Word of Power, Jason reached out and scanned Catherine's soul. He created a hologram of hers beside Harold and Nadia's. Immediately, the two of them started making comparisons.

"Catherine's soul is bright like yours." Jason observed. "There are also two faces present. Her face, and... I believe that's Jeanne D'Arc."

"Her soul seems to be constructed almost entirely out of light energy. Holy energy?" Nadia said. "Her soul is extremely fierce. She is brave and even somewhat domineering."

Jason was a little surprised to see his face wasn't present on Catherine's soul. But what was more surprising was that Raphael's face wasn't either. It seemed Catherine's affinity for Raphael didn't dig down nearly as deeply as her love for her long-dead sister. Some bonds could neither be strengthened nor weakened by time.

After moving on from Catherine, Jason sent a Word of Power toward his daughter, elsewhere in Aevum.

"This is Daisy's soul." Jason said, before pausing to stare at it for thirty long seconds. "She... she... her soul..."

Nadia's mood dampened. "It's almost entirely pitch-black. Her face is sad, and there are no other faces present. It's like... there's nothing there?"

"Existential depression." Jason said quietly. "I see a spark of light, right in the core... but there's so much darkness around it. So... so much darkness..."

Nadia lowered her eyes. "I didn't realize Daisy was dealing with such... pain..."

"It's my fault." Jason said, his throat rasping dryly. "I left her alone... all those years."

Jason hesitated. He almost wanted to look at Phoebe's soul, but...

"Let's... stick... to strangers." Jason said haltingly, his words stilted. "No more looking at people we know. It doesn't feel right."

"I agree." Nadia said while rubbing the bridge of her nose. "Just pick some random people on Earth."

What followed next was Jason reaching out with his senses to duplicate the souls of more than fifty men and women across Earth. He chose at random children, adults, old people, even some animals for comparison.

"Everyone's souls are extremely dull." Nadia said at some point in the process. "It's a good thing we checked. Harold's soul has degenerated to the point he's barely any livelier than an ordinary human. But based on these scans, Heroes of any type, be they Lowborn or Trueborn, should have fierce and energetic souls."

"The soul is almost certainly the ultimate conduit for supernatural powers." Jason said. "I'd love to check out the souls of some Low and High Psions, but I'm afraid if I did that, the Volgrim might notice. I suspect High Psion souls are far more energetic than Low Psion souls."

"We can check the demons and angels." Nadia suggested.

And so they did. Jason carefully picked out more than a hundred low ranking angels and demons, followed by a tiny smattering of the highest demons, but he didn't dare to touch the souls of any Archangels.

"Lazarite souls are surprisingly similar in power to pureblooded angels." Jason noted. "The exact compositions vary, but the scale is approximately the same. The difference between Low Demons and High Demons is enormous though."

"I think we have enough data." Nadia said. "I've simulated dozens of ways we can repair Harold's soul. If you follow these steps, adjust these vectors here and here, you should be able to return him to his former glory, except..."

"Except?" Jason asked.

Nadia tapped her chin thoughtfully. She didn't say anything for a few seconds.

"...Harold's Heroic Artifact would block the attempt. We need to extract his soul from it. And if we do that, we can do a little something else."

Jason waited for her to elaborate, but then, all at once, it hit him.

"Wait... are you saying... we could...?"

"Yes." Nadia said seriously. "It's viable. We can make a new body for Harold and put his soul into it. He would not be trapped inside his artifact anymore."

Jason stared at her for a while. He wasn't exactly staring at her, but rather, his MindCore was racing to rebuild several theoretical models he had previously left to rot. Now those old models suddenly made more sense.

"We... we could do this for any Heroic Ancestor." Jason said, his mouth dry. "We could revive any of them. All of them. They would be just as- no, stronger than when they were alive, so long as I went to extreme enough lengths when constructing their bodies."

Nadia's face brightened. "That's great news! Right when we need manpower, we can turn all the ancient Heroes into combat viable options! Isn't this exactly what we needed?!"

But despite her enthusiasm, Jason appeared unhappy.

"Let's get one thing straight." Jason said to Nadia solemnly. "Heroes are not good people. Not innately. Some heroes are good. Some are righteous. Some feel larger than life. But Heroes are, ultimately, just human. And putting any ancient Hero inside a powerful body could cause negative effects you don't want to imagine."

Nadia's face dimmed. "You... do you know any bad Heroes?"

"A few." Jason immediately answered. "The worst Hero of all was Dracula. He betrayed humanity to side with the demons. But even though he was the only outright 'evil' Hero, I also had a horrid encounter with a Hero named Samson. He tried to kill my wife, and forced me to kill him to save her life. It was the first time I'd ever executed someone, and it changed me as a person."

Jason closed his eyes. "Then there was Solomon... I don't know if you could call him evil, but he had his own agenda. He manipulated me, he manipulated my clone, and ultimately died a tragic death."

Nadia folded her hands together and twiddled her thumbs. "So what you're saying is, we could create a catastrophe if we revive the wrong Hero. If word gets out among the Ancient Heroes that we can revive them, they'll all clamor to return to life, and refusing them could turn them into our enemies."

"Solomon alone might have a lot of sway with the other Ancestors." Jason said. "I haven't met him in this timeline. I don't know where his Crown is located. But it seems possible he might have connected with and made friends with some of the other Heroes. King Hammurabi is his teacher, and he was a formidable Ancestor. So if I piss Solomon off, I might turn Hammurabi against me too, and anyone else inclined to follow either of them."

"This... is a problem." Nadia admitted. "But I think you might be overthinking it. If you have the power to revive Heroes, then that gives you a massive amount of bargaining leverage. Unless someone else steals your abilities, the other Heroes will have to fall into line with you if they want to get revived. And the threat of you possibly taking their soul and shoving it back inside their artifacts should keep them in line."

"Should." Jason emphasized. "For now, we'll use Harold as a test case. Let's keep this on the down-low, just you and me, along with Helen, Catherine, and Harold. I'll focus on building him a new Wordsmithium body. It could be nice having an old guy around who can talk to animals. I bet we'll be able to find lots of niche uses for his powers."

"Maybe we can work on making his personality a little brighter too?" Nadia joked. "He does feel a little abrasive."

Jason spent four hours constructing a brand new humanoid body unlike any he had ever made before. He had originally planned on making something based off his Dronesmiths, but those simply didn't feel sufficient. They didn't require sleep, they felt somewhat inhuman to control, and they lacked a lot of features that would make them ideal to live inside.

"My Dronesmiths can consume nutrients for aesthetic reasons but they cannot enjoy the taste of food. They don't need to pee or poop either." Jason said out loud. "They can smell odors without feeling revolted, and can distinguish between those odors with a proficiency that would make a bloodhound blush. But is that really what a revived Hero would want? Or even just a revived human?"

Jason glanced across the display at Nadia, but she didn't answer. Her eyes were closed, and her thoughts were focused inside her Mind Realm, rapidly tweaking and iterating on improvements to Harold's soul, along with comparing all the data she had gathered from all the other souls they had duplicated. Jason decided not to bug her for an answer and instead thought to himself about solutions.

If I were being revived, I would obviously want a strong, powerful, durable body. But Harold is also married. I imagine once he remembers his wife, he and her might want to... so, uh, I'd better make sure he has lots of 'stamina' and can exert himself well. Should this artificial body be able to produce children? Should a female version be able to give birth? I think that makes sense. Would removing the need for pissing and shitting really be all that bad? Angels don't need to do that. They can just expunge the filthy air from their pores, and it doesn't even smell. Let's just go ahead and clean up a few redundancies...

Jason worked hard. He started making an idealized human form with more thought put into it than ever before. In fact, he even made multiple variants.

Harold is too far gone. He probably won't know what I'm planning to do or be able to care, but Helen will. I'll give her the choice of which body we should put Harold inside, then have her decide.

Jason settled on a few different designs.

One of the bodies was the Basic Human Replicant. The BHR was designed to look and function like any ordinary human, but it had strong regenerative capabilities and no mechanical parts. Anything an ordinary human could do, the BHR could do. Its parameters could be tweaked to allow the user to instantly fall asleep without insomnia, never gain weight even when pigging out, and other sorts of things along that line. It was essentially a normal human body, but optimized along the upper bell curve in every category of what a human could do.

Next, he designed the Superior Human Replicant. The SHR removed a lot of redundant systems. It could experience all the joys of humanity, but no longer needed to 'expunge waste' through its bowels, and was supercharged to be at the level of a Demon Baron in most categories. Anyone possessing a SHR could punch through concrete effortlessly or even toss a car aside if needed. Coupled with insane regenerative capabilities, a SHR-user would likely feel like a superhero from a movie.

The third version he designed was the Inhuman Replicant. The IHR was not like the two before it. It was heavily based on Benjamin Brown's biology from the future, like the Vanguard he would ultimately become. However, it was more machine than man, and meant to be used as a weapon of war. IHRs had no need for sleep and had built in processing cores that partially mimicked the functionality of a MindCore. The only people Jason thought would be suitable for IHRs were self-sacrificing men and women who wanted bodies powerful enough to fight the enemies of humanity in the coming years, centuries, and millennia.

But what was most amazing was that Jason had actually made it possible for souls to pass through the BHR, SHR, and IHR like a conduit. That is to say, through it wasn't a simple process, a dead person could live inside the body of a BHR to live an authentic human experience, port their body into a SHR to live as a superhuman, or be placed inside an IHR in times of extreme war.

In Jason's mind, this was almost like putting on a set of clothes or a suit of armor depending on the situation.

"They're like sleeves..." Jason muttered to himself. "Slipping into bodies is an insane idea... but jumping between them too often could be a problem. I don't want to expose that souls can jump between bodies for now, since it might cause soul degradation. I'll phrase it as if the decision is permanent."

Jason hadn't woken up that day intending to add another change to humanity's future trajectory, but that was what had happened.

Soon, he and Nadia would move Harold over to a new body, and in the process, they would create a new paradigm for what dead humans could experience...

Part 716: Soul Surgery

January 29th, 2021.

When Jason and Nadia returned, they gave Helen the good news. Her countenance lifted and her heart soared at the realization that not only could Jason heal Harold's dementia, but he could even revive him in a new body. But when Jason told her the options, her expression turned to confusion.

"You're saying you can make him one of three possible bodies?" She asked, as Jason displayed three wireframe holograms in the air.

"That's right." Jason said. "Let's simplify the names for you, granny. Harold can become an Enhanced Human, an Augmented Human, or a War Cyborg. I don't think the last one is appropriate for him, so let's narrow it down to the first two."

Jason discarded the third hologram and left the previous two floating in the air.

"Enhanced Humans are simply... normal humans you'd meet anywhere. They can do all the same stuff as any other human, but they're immortal, have extremely efficient body processes, build muscle easily, don't get fat unless they seriously pig out all the time, and they can still, uh, you know... reproduce. They still have all the full capabilities of ordinary humans, but at the level of a high performing human in any category you can think of. He'll also be able to heal himself over the course of a week, no matter how serious the injury, outside of a missing limb."

He continued. "Augmented Humans remove some of the human biological needs. They're superhuman in every way. If you think Harold is the type of man who would want to fight in this future war, then this option probably suits him best. His body will become so efficient that he won't need to use the bathroom, and he won't need to eat very often either. He will lose a bit of his humanity, but he'll still be capable of love, passion, and... all the other fun stuff I'm sure you miss about your husband."

Nadia leaned forward to chime in. "This second version can regenerate limbs too, and I've helped Jason quintuple the healing speed. It'll only take a day or two to heal from any injury so long as his head and heart aren't destroyed. Even then, survival is still theoretically possible if the heart is grievously damaged but he receives immediate medical attention."

Helen bit her lip. She looked back and forth between the two images, uncertain of what to choose.

"I... I don't know..." Helen muttered. "This decision involves Harold's future. It doesn't feel right not to include him in the choice."

"You've seen for yourself that Harold isn't in his right mind." Jason said. "Just treat this as if he were in a coma and I were a doctor. You would need to make medical decisions on his behalf, yes? Do you need more help understanding the options, grandma?"

Helen shook her head. "No, I understand the options perfectly well. I have a PhD, you know. I'm simply worried I'll choose the wrong thing and he'll be unhappy with what I picked."

A moment of silence followed. As Helen carefully weighed the options, Catherine stepped forward and laid her arm across Helen's shoulders.

"Why don't we put it to a vote then?" Catherine suggested. "You've told me a lot about Harold over the years. He was a fierce and unstoppable warrior when he fought during the Second World War. I think if his mind was restored, he would feel a great desire to pick up that fight again. I think he would appreciate the power the second body gives him."

Helen glanced at Catherine. "I don't know... Harold, he... he wasn't the same after the war. After what those Nazis did to him. They weakened his body, siphoned his power, and damn near stole the soul right out of him. After the war, he would just sit in his chair and watch television for hours a day. I sometimes got him to go out with me, and we went on several vacations, which I loved... but Harold was already starting to slip. I don't know if I want him going back into the fight again. Doesn't he deserve to rest?"

Jason thought about her question for a few moments before carefully forming a reply.

"If Harold was a fierce fighter, someone who loved his country and would do anything to protect it, can I extrapolate that he'd feel even more determined if the entire planet's fate were on the line? Especially a planet filled with the animals he loves?"

Helen nodded. "If you can restore him to what he was like before the war, I don't doubt he'd come roaring back with his former vigor. I fear that my selfish desire to keep him safe and have him all to me would be a waste of his capabilities."

Jason nodded. "If you think he'd rather retire and live an easy life, I won't force him to fight for humanity. Pick the first body. But if you think he'll want to transcend his former limitations and become even more fearsome, pick the second. I leave the decision in your hands."

A long silence fell over the group. Helen's expression hardened as she looked between the two options.

After five long minutes of absolute silence, she slowly nodded.

"Very well. Let's make him an Augmented Human. If I set aside my feelings on the matter, I know this is what Harold would want. He has been trapped inside that television for decades. I believe he would want to stretch his legs and crush demons to pulp with his bare hands. Since that was the man I fell in love with anyway, I have no reason to complain."

"Very well!" Jason exclaimed, smiling broadly at her. "You've made the right decision. I already did most of the prep work, so I'll get right to it. Within two days, your husband will be a new man."

"Thank you, young man." Helen said, smiling sweetly at Jason. "You're a saint."

Jason glanced at Catherine. "Well, actually, if anyone here is a saint, it's her..."

Helen laughed, as did everyone else.

A day and a half later inside Argent City, Jason and Nadia placed Harold's television inside a specially created operation room. It was made with barriers to contain errant souls in the event Jason lost control, so they couldn't get easily sucked up by the Great Beyond. Once they entered, they would be lost forever. Jason wasn't sure if the barrier would work, but it was the best he could come up with.

"You know," Nadia said, looking at Jason across the rounded operating table where Harold's soul would soon be placed, "it occurs to me that what we're doing is Soul Manipulation. Didn't you call the Archangels evil for doing that?"

Jason shook his head. "I've come to believe that 'soul manipulation' is a term of ignorance. Demons perform 'soul manipulation', but how do they do it? By crudely devouring souls and jamming them into their bodies before forcibly merging them with their own souls to uplift themselves. This turns their souls into a sloppy soup of mushy paste, reducing their qualitative power while increasing their quantitative power. The angels long ago did exactly the same thing, devouring each other to make themselves stronger. But ultimately, how is that really 'soul manipulation'? It's like calling someone a chef because they tossed a bunch of random ingredients into a bowl and mixed them together with no thought."

"That's a good point." Nadia said, tapping her lips. "Then... what do you suppose we should call the two?"

"Something with more nuance." Jason snarked. "Let's call the angel and demon way 'Soul Slop'. What we're doing is 'Soul Surgery'. Right? That's exactly what this is. We're making careful, targeted changes to one man's soul. We're not shoving other souls in there, we're just performing an operation to fix Harold up. I think the real thing the Highest On High wants to avoid is precisely what the angels and demons did. What we're doing is clearly within the spirit of the Akashic Rules."

"Soul Surgery." Nadia repeated. "Maybe we should create an entire discipline for humanity called Soul Science? We could research healthy ways to manipulate souls without breaking taboos, hurting people, or committing acts of evil."

"Sure. Put that idea on the ol' list." Jason said with a smile. "But shelve it for now. Let's focus on Harold first."

And so they did. Jason levitated Harold's TV to a spot beside the operating table. Then he summoned a powerful body made exactly in Harold's image, but much younger. Harold's body, that of an Augmented Human, was changed to resemble his younger self, around the ages of 35 to 40. He had thick blonde hair and blue eyes and a muscular physique that was much less impressive-looking than a peak human bodybuilder, but which secretly contained far more power.

Then, without any fanfare, Jason used several Words of Power to carefully extract Harold's soul from his artifact and contain it in a bubble of energy. Nadia wore a pair of goggles that allowed her to see the soul, goggles that were made by Jason, naturally. She was not going to directly affect Harold's soul during the surgery, but instead use her eyes to spot flaws Jason might have overlooked as the surgery progressed.

"Alright, start the timer." Jason said. "Prepping quadrants A1 to A3 now. Examine. Separate. Peel."

Carefully, Jason began surgically pulling apart specific parts of Harold's complex totemic soul. Over the course of the next several hours, he carefully inserted large quantities of Heroic Energy taken from himself and from Aevum's Spire to inflate Harold's weak soul. With those pathways reconstructed, Jason reached into Harold's shattered memories and started rebuilding them. Unlike a living human with dementia or Alzheimer's, Harold's soul had simply garbled his lost memories instead of destroying them. Jason was able to resequence the memories by also occasionally dipping into Helen's memories, which she had graciously offered to assist in the surgery.

Three hours passed, and Jason successfully repaired Harold's soul.

Another two hours passed, and Harold's memories had been rebuilt. Already, his soul was awakening and becoming fiercely energetic. Jason frowned as he realized containing such a powerful soul struggling to break free of its shackles was more difficult than he expected.

Suddenly, Nadia pointed at something Jason had overlooked. "There! What is that bright green spot?"

Jason quickly examined it with a Word of Power. His jaw dropped. "That's Harold's Heroic Aura! It's still there! A fragment of it, at least. Those fucking Nazis failed to steal all of it! Hahaha, this is great! That means I can take an extra step I thought I wouldn't be able to."

Jason steeled his heart, then heaved a deep breath.

"Rejuvenate."

Carefully, Jason poured energy inside of Harold's nearly dead Heroic Aura, reviving it and empowering it back to its original level. This ensured that his Heroic Powers would fully manifest, since Jason wasn't sure if they would have done so originally. Losing the ability to speak to animals would surely be a huge blow to Harold's heart, and now Jason had ensured that would no longer be the case.

But as the energy stabilized, Harold's soul became increasingly more powerful. It had even surpassed Jason's strength, and Jason was only able to contain it because he had the advantage of a living body.

"Aargh! Come on, Harold! Calm down! This is for your own good, you stubborn bastard!" Jason hissed through his teeth. "Stop squirming like a kid at the dentist! Damn!

DAMN! Okay fine, the surgery is done! It's DONE already, let me just put you in your new body! Gah, you slippery old fuck! Quit trying to break free!!"

Harold's soul bounced around inside the bubble of containment energy Jason had made. He started to move it toward Harold's body, but all of a sudden, the soul exploded with power and shattered the containment bubble, then dove toward the body hanging before it with ravenous desire.

FWOOOOM!!

A blinding light erupted as the body and soul seamlessly combined, forcing Jason and Nadia to take a step back. Jason gaped at the body, his mouth hanging open. "They merged?? I didn't even have to use my Wordsmithing? How is that even possible?!"

Several seconds of silence passed. Then, Harold's eyes slowly fluttered open.

"Nice work, kiddo." Harold grunted, though his speech was a little slurred. "Y'did it. Ya brought me back to life."

"You know what's happened?" Jason asked. "You knew about the surgery?"

"Hurt like the dickens!" Harold said, his hands twitching as he tried to move. "Cuttin' into me, carvin' me like a pumpkin. But I knew it was for a good cause. Just wish you'd knocked me out so I didn't feel the pain! Do you gots any idea just how much it hurts to have yer damn SOUL sliced??"

"I thought I did knock you out..." Jason muttered, aggrieved.

Harold's body twitched a bit more energetically, but it was clear he had not yet mastered moving around.

"You're going to need time to acclimate to controlling your body." Jason said. "I didn't even get to fuse your soul with your body! How did you control your soul and take over the body so fluidly?"

"Sorry, kid." Harold said, his mouth working more smoothly than before. "I knew ya had more ya wanted to do, but I was antsy to git back in m'body. I gots a dame waiting for me, after all."

Jason raised his eyebrows and nodded. "Helen is going to be very happy to see you. I'll bring her in right away."

"WAIT! No, no way, punk." Harold immediately objected. "I ain't gonna hang here like a cripple. You just gimme a bit. I gots this."

Harold struggled. His expression darkened as he focused on moving his fingers and toes. Then, his legs started to move. He twitched his entire body, still hanging from the mount Jason had made, with straps wrapped under his armpits and around his chest.

Minutes passed. Soon, an entire hour had come and gone. Jason and Nadia watched in fascination as Harold improved his control of his new body faster and faster every minute. He eventually stood up, removed the restraints, and staggered slightly as he struggled to control the full weight of his new body.

"Hot diggity dog!" Harold crowed. "Now this is a damn fine body y'made me, son! I'm a little shaky now, but I bet once I'm fully accliminaturalized I'll be shootin' hoops with the young 'uns!"

"You'll be doing a lot more than that." Jason said. "I gave your wife the choice of three bodies we could put you in. She chose the second one."

Jason quickly explained the three options to Harold, and the old man continued to move around, standing firmer and taller as he practiced walking back and forth. Despite his focus, Harold had a keen mind, and he listened intently to Jason's words.

"Interesting. I wouldn't'a minded the third option, but this here augment-body is quite nice! I believe you done-did outdone yourself, if I don't say so, boy!"

Finally, Harold puffed out his chest. His eyes flared with energy as he grinned and looked around the room. "Son, you gots a place 'round here where I can put this body through the ringer? Just a lil' bit 'fore I go out there and give my lady a hug'n'kiss. I feel strong now, maybe a lil' too strong. Wouldn't wanna hurt her or nothin' like that."

"Sure thing, Harold." Jason said. "Teleport."

With a Word of Power, Jason swept himself, Nadia, and Harold away, bringing them to a training area on the opposite side of Argent, far from where Helen and Catherine were.

"I told Helen the surgery might take around half a day, and it's been about eight hours. Still, you shouldn't keep a lady waiting." Jason said.

"This won't take long." Harold said, strutting over to a set of steel squares with handles on their sides.

Each cube was exactly the same size, but they had been designed by Jason to have different weights. They were all a little smaller than a mini-fridge, and the first one said one ton while the second said two tons and so on, stacking all the way up to ten tons.

"That body is rated at the level of an average Demon Baron." Jason explained. "You should be able to lift ten tons with a bit of eff-"

Jason's words caught in his throat when Harold walked over, grabbed the ten-ton cube, and casually lifted it off the ground with one hand. He didn't even appear to be straining himself.

"Son, you gots anything heavier than this here toothpick?" Harold inquired.

Jason's mouth went dry. "What the... that's not right. I definitely didn't make the body that strong... let me check something. Manifest. Enhance."

Jason conjured another cube behind Harold. This one was noticeably larger, and it had a weight of twenty tons listed on the front.

Harold found wrapping his arms around it to be impossible due to its size, but he still grabbed the nearest handle and effortlessly lifted one end off the ground. After shimmying his body underneath the cube, Harold let out a little 'hup!' and lifted it onto his back, then chucked it a few feet away, causing a violent boom when it struck the ground.

"That it?" Harold asked. "I said heavier, son! HEAVIER! You got a bucket o' bolts bangin' around in that there head of yours?"

Jason began to frown. This time, he created a new set of weights, two huge rounded spheres with a bar made of Wordsmithium between them. These cubes were incredibly dense and weighed fifty tons each!

"There we go. That's a lil' bit more sensible." Harold said, nodding in approval.

The old man walked over, grasped the bar, then heaved with considerably more effort than before.

"Hrrgh! Yeah! YEAH! Now that's a damn workout!"

Jason's jaw dropped. Even though Harold was straining himself, it seemed 100 tons wasn't even close to his limit.

"Based on the strain his body is under, Harold seems capable of lifting more than 250 tons." Nadia observed. "This is far, far beyond what we anticipated. His physical body has the power of a Demon Emperor, not a Demon Baron. And a strong one at that."

"The body is no different from the specs I designed." Jason said, picking his jaw off the ground. "It's Harold himself who has enhanced the body. Wait..."

Jason slapped his face. "How did I forget? Harold had super strength and other powers during the war. Now that I've fixed his Heroic Aura, those powers are supercharging his new body!"

Jason remembered that Sebastian had told him about Harold's powers in the past, but Jason hadn't taken them too seriously until now. He had assumed that if Harold obtained a powerful new body, he would only be as strong as he was during the war. It turned out the two factors stacked together exponentially, making him vastly more powerful than before he died.

"Well. This is certainly a good omen." Nadia said with a smile. "We've revived a powerhouse who will put the fear of the Creator back in the demons."

"Damn right, he will." Jason said, smiling back.

After an hour of exercising, Harold had finally taken measure of his strength. Jason teleported them to Harold's estate, and on arrival, all the animals perked up.

"It's... it's him! The Archseer succeeded! Father is alive!!"

A stampede of critters came rushing over, their voices a roaring cacophony of happiness and excitement. Harold's fierce masculine aura faded a little as he broke down in tears hugging many of them.

"Ohh, Sebastian, Robby, Theodor... I can finally hold and pet you all again... oh, gosh-golly, this is the best day of m'ding-damn life... sniff..."

From the distance, a voice called out.

"Harold?"

Harold stiffened. He lifted his head, then smiled broadly at the beautiful angel with fair white hair gazing at him with teary eyes.

"Helen..." Harold sniffled. "Mah dame!"

He stood up and rushed toward her, and she rushed toward him. The two of them fell into each other's arms and embraced vigorously, with Helen bursting into tears as she began to sob uncontrollably.

"Oh, Harold..."

"Helen! Helen!!"

Jason's eyes welled up with tears. He felt happy for them. He envied them. He wanted what they had for himself. He closed his eyes and wiped away his tears, sobbing wholeheartedly as man and wife embraced just a stone's throw away.

It was worth it. All his effort had been worth it.

Part 717: New Confidantes

January 29th, 2021. Argent City, Aevum.

An hour passed. Jason and the others all sat down inside Harold's manor, with the old man now looking a lot younger and more refreshed. Helen, after becoming a Lazarite, had returned to the prime of her life, and the same was true of Harold. Both of them now looked like a middle-aged couple somewhere in their 30's to 40's, and they were both all smiles as they looked at one another adoringly. It was almost sickening how precious they acted, having regained each other after all these years. They were like lovesick teenagers, desperate to hug and kiss one another, but momentarily stymied by social pressures to act primly and properly in front of their guests.

The entire group discussed many things. Most importantly, with his mind restored, Harold became incredibly sharp. It didn't take long before Jason realized he wasn't some dumb country bumpkin, but something of a strategic leader with a sizable intellect. Harold's funny way of speaking contrasted with his many years of military service. It turned out that during the war, he hadn't been any ordinary soldier, but a platoon leader who had many victories under his belt.

"So this here war that's comin', it's a big one, eh?" Harold mused, massaging his short but handsome blonde beard. "Not just the planet, but the galaxy. That's some crazy stuff yer' talkin' about there, son."

Jason nodded. "I've given us a lot of time to prepare. If things go well, we can keep the situation in Aevum secret long enough for me to develop multiple methods for empowering humanity."

He used his Wordsmithing to create a series of floating images in the air, depicting not only Aevum itself above everyone's heads, but images of projects he had been working on.

"First things first, this is where we are right now." Jason said, directing his attention to Harold and Helen equally. "This is Aevum. It is an artificial planet hidden in the Milky Way Galaxy, far, far, far away from Earth. It is completely isolated and totally secret. Using my magic, I can transfer people and items to Earth and back with relative ease. Even if our enemies knew Aevum existed and wanted to attack it, just finding it would be damn near impossible."

Harold nodded. "Location... logistics... lots'a thought put into this shebang."

"Aevum flows at an accelerated time speed." Jason explained. "Simply put, one day on Earth is one year in here. That means for every month we delay the Volgrim or demons from learning about Aevum, we'll gain 30 years of preparation time."

The old man's eyes lit up. "You don't say? So we can prepare all sorts o' stuff in secret, train an army, equip 'n outfit them, and nobody'd be the wiser?"

"Not one soul." Jason said.

The Wordsmith paused, then grinned wryly as he looked at the faces present. "The only problem is, this place is not going to stay secret forever. A decent number of people not only know about me, but have at least some idea of Aevum's existence. We should operate under the assumption that a spy, a traitor, or even a casual slip-up could lose us our information advantage."

Seeing Harold simply nodding along while thinking about things to himself, Jason continued speaking.

"Here's a small handful of the programs I've been working on..."

"First, the new body I just gave Harold. I believe it could be possible to revive humans who have died inside of these exceptionally powerful bodies. Specifically, Heroic Ancestors like Harold. But I want you to keep this on the down-low for now. There's no need to rush this process, and I'm worried about the less than pure motivations of certain Heroes from the past."

"Next is a project I originally brought Helen here to talk about: Mindcores. I can access certain humans' souls to open up a large space inside their 'Mind Realm', then I can install one of five extremely powerful secondary artificial brains. These brains are made with spiritual energy combined with computer-like programming systems. They can enhance a person's creativity, allow them to learn quickly, grant access to simulated realities, enhance their reflexes and combat knowledge, or even help them predict the future in limited ways."

Helen looked at Jason with surprise. "Are you saying you wish to give me one of these... Mindcores?"

"Yes." Jason said. "I already talked to Catherine about it, but let's hold off on that for a short while. I'll get back to it after this."

Helen bobbed her head obediently, allowing Jason to continue.

"So far, we have a way to revive powerful elite Heroes from the dead, and to augment the brains of humans so they're a lot smarter. The next thing to think about is enhancing normal humans to become a lot more effective. To that end, I've started developing highly advanced armor systems based on technological and magical principles that will allow ordinary humans to become much more effective soldiers. I have these older designs known as T-REX's, which are nanite-based armor solutions, but I'm developing new ones, such as SIGIL, which is less like armor and more like forced temporary empowerment of a person's body."

He continued. "On top of all that, did you guys see those cubes that were levitating in the sky? Those are Simulacrums, where augmented and ordinary humans can enter to train their skills in a safe virtual environment."

Harold lifted his head to look out the window. He easily spotted one of the cubes Jason had mentioned; a giant obsidian chunk of metal with faint grey geometric energy patterns inscribed on its surface.

"...Yer gonna just throw people in those and train 'em that way?" Harold asked.

"That was the plan." Jason said, before pausing awkwardly. "I haven't made a lot of them yet, but I was going to make more. I mean... unless you have a better idea?"

The centennial man scratched his head and gave Jason a weird look. "Son, you ain't a military man, are ya? You never enlisted?"

Jason slowly shook his head. "Not exactly. I formed a military in the future I came from. But we lost a lot of fights. I wasn't formally trained in a drill camp or whatever."

"Yeah... that's 'bout what I expected." Harold said quietly. "Look son, I ain't knockin' your work. This is a real good skeleton of a plan you've got goin' on here. But that's all it is. Just a skeleton. You're hopin' to out-tech yer way to a big fat victory. That about right?"

Jason cocked his head. "I don't follow?"

Harold threw up his hands and laughed. "Bahaha! Then lemme spell it out for ya! This plan is doomed to fail unless ya carefully bake some crucial ingredients into the mix!"

Harold leaned forward, clasped his hands together, and rested his elbows on his knees.

"The Vietnam War. You know anything about it?"

"Sure." Jason said, before pausing to add, "Though it did happen like two decades before I was born."

"Lot more'n two decades." Harold said with a laugh, as if he'd just heard a naive kid say something pitifully dumb. "Look, I don't remember exactly when I bit the ice, but I know it was around '75. I watched that shithole of a war play out and it gave me a real belly full of laughs. Can you imagine a technologically superior country like the US-of-A not absolutely stomping all over a bunch of poorly equipped farmers-turned-militia?"

Harold threw his head back and roared with laughter. "But we didn't win! We done got our asses handed to us! And if you keep going the way yer' goin', we're gonna be the USA while our enemies are the Viet Cong! We'll have all the tech, all the resources, and still lose every engagement!"

Jason's face darkened with worry. "You're saying I'm putting too much faith in my technological solutions to win a war?"

"Way too much." Harold said, leaning back in his chair. "We lost 'cause them slippery treehuggers played to their strengths. They used the terrain to their advantage. They used guerilla warfare and ambushes. They laid traps. They made our boys in green look like fools. And sure, the good ol' USA won lots of battles, but we sure as shit didn't win the war! It was a DAMN embarrassment!"

Harold paused for a moment to take a breath. He closed his eyes and fell into thought.

"Look, you know what wins wars? Supply lines, logistics, and training. You can have ten times the soldiers 'n ten times the firepower, but if your boys are runnin' around like headless chickens, they'll die when the gunfire starts. That's why these here training cube thingies ain't good enough."

Jason raised an eyebrow. "The false realities they produce are extremely realistic."

"I don't doubt that." Harold calmly replied. "But see, to train a man right 'n proper, ya gots ta' blood him. Training soldiers ain't about showing 'em a bunch of proper ways to react to field situations. It's about drillin' into them that when their CO says 'jump' they ask 'How high, Sarge'! These cubes could be good, but we've gotta git a human element in there. Lucky for you, I've got a decade of trainin' fresh maggots under mah belt. You leave that part to me."

Jason wanted to retort, but frankly, Harold's offer came at a perfect time. He had been debating putting Neil Adams in charge again, but a fellow Hero was probably a better idea.

"We'll talk about this later, but I think it's a good idea." Jason said. "I'll let you think up some ideas for training, and see if I can help you recruit some high level commanding soldiers from Earth to be your underlings. In the meantime, let's move on."

Jason waved his hand. A section of Aevum was highlighted in the east side of Argent City.

"Over here we have one of many sectors I'm devoting to researching more methods to empower humanity. You have to understand that in my eyes, the demons are not humanity's primary threat. The Volgrim are. If we put all our eggs into the basket of defeating the demons, we'll die shortly afterward to the Volgrim. That's because the Volgrim have a galaxy-sized army of warriors where many of the weaker ones can casually destroy planets! The strongest demon currently in existence is a mere ant before the power of a 7th-Level Psion, let alone an 8th or 9th Level Psion."

"This is the Enlightenment Tree, or maybe we can call it the Tree of Possibilities." Jason said, zooming in on an underground area filled with artificial sunlight in the east sector. "I had to place it underground due to limited room on the surface, but it also serves to isolate the room and allow the tree to grow in peace. Of course, it also protects it from thieves and evildoers, since it's growing inside a reinforced bunker."

"What's this Enlightenment Tree all about?" Helen asked. Catherine seemed interested too.

Jason paused. He glanced at Catherine. For a brief moment, he wondered if the things he was saying now would make their way back to Raphael's ears. But over time, he had noticed Catherine was trusting him more and more, and on top of that, he'd inadvertently seen that her soul contained no direct affinity to Raphael.

He decided to trust in Catherine. If she did tell Raphael, it would put a major roadblock in front of Jason's plans, but it wouldn't be the end of the world. Jason would merely have to adapt.

"...The Tree of Possibilities is a very special item. It hasn't yet done anything useful because it is immature, but I designed it to collect small amounts of spiritual energy from all across Aevum, Earth, and Heaven, and slowly use that energy to mutate

'enlightenment fruits'. These fruits, when consumed, can grant all sorts of powerful abilities and boons to people. At least, it should in theory. I have no control over what fruits the tree develops, and I don't want control either. I can already create focused powers for people, such as by giving them a MindCore. What I want is for the tree to grant extremely unique abilities my magic cannot create, and for it to surprise me with niche utility functions."

Harold raised his eyebrows and nodded. He seemed impressed.

"Sounds like the tree from the Garden of Eden." Helen said. "Do you think the fruit it grows could poison or hurt people?"

"Possibly. We won't know until it finally bears fruit." Jason said.

Jason pointed to several other areas around Aevum.

"Many of these spots are empty right now, but I plan to create all sorts of highly advanced factories, automated industrial plants, experimentation bays, scientific research facilities, and so on. The Bio-Loom, the Aegis Womb, Reality Printer, Nursery, Swallower, Threshold, Soulforge..."

Jason trailed off, then shrugged.

"When I build them, I'll tell you guys. Let's not get bogged down in details for now. The important point is that I plan to make Aevum the capital of humanity's future Galactic Empire. Obviously, if the Volgrim or some other adversary wipes us out, then all of this will be for naught, so we have to make sure we ultimately prevail. Once Aevum's core facilities are completed, we can focus on expansion and adding living space for billions of humans."

Catherine tilted her chin up. "I think you are making a mistake."

Jason blinked. He hadn't expected such blunt criticism from Heaven's Daughter.

"What do you mean by that?" Jason carefully asked.

"Aevum is a wonderland." Catherine said, taking the time to explain herself. "It is vital to humanity's operations. It should not be a place for common rabble to live. Only humanity's elites who have contributed or who can contribute to the war effort should be offered such a privilege. If you have created Aevum, can I assume you are capable or making other bubble-worlds?"

Jason nodded. "Of course."

"Then do so. Finish your work with Aevum, then make detached bubble worlds; fortresses where humans can live with less fear of dying to the Volgrim or whoever. The more people you put inside Aevum, the higher the likelihood of introducing saboteurs, spies, bad actors, and other seedy villains who would undermine its functions."

After Catherine finished, she expected Jason to follow up on her idea and maybe ask some questions. Instead, he simply smiled.

"Well... actually, Catherine... I didn't mention this part yet, but... that was always my plan."

"What? It was?" Catherine asked.

"Yes. I said I would add expansion and living space for billions of humans, but I didn't exactly mean inside Aevum itself."

Jason scratched his chin. He suddenly felt unsure of how he should phrase this next part. If Catherine leaked this information, it would absolutely fuck him over badly. Trusting her now meant inviting her into his inner circle in a way he wasn't entirely sure he should...

...But he ultimately relented. Maybe it was because Catherine had given him no reason to distrust her, or maybe because she was so beautiful and had an innocent face, or maybe it was even just because he felt guilty about the way he'd overloaded her psyche during the MindCore operation, but either way, he decided if he was going to trust her, he needed to go all the way.

Jason swallowed his saliva heavily, making a barely audible gulp sound. Everyone seemed to notice it.

"I am... in possession of... a primordial artifact." Jason said slowly, hesitantly. "I did not make this artifact. Archangel Camael did, a long time ago... before Raphael's mindwipes."

"What?!" Catherine exclaimed, showing visible shock for the first time in a while. "What sort of artifact? What is it??"

Jason quietly sighed. There was no going back now. He conjured an image in the air.

"This is Camael's Cube. It might have a proper name, but if it does, I don't know what it is. Camael once used the Cube to contain the body of the dark dragon, Leviathan, but he broke out and escaped to Earth. Now he hides here, somewhere, in absolute secrecy. I do not believe he is an evil dragon, but... that's beside the point. His existence is not too important compared to the existence of this Cube."

The blood drained from Catherine's face as she mulled over the gravity of what Jason was telling her. Like him, she now realized that he was holding nothing back. He was trusting her with information that could ruin his plans if she were to tell Raphael or Camael.

That sense of shock slowly turned to a feeling of warmth. Catherine wanted to draw closer to Jason, but there had always been a wall between them. He had concealed information from her, and she knew he had, but she hadn't wanted to press him on the matter. The fact he was revealing such vital intelligence to her now meant he was taking a leap of faith and praying she wouldn't betray him.

"Thank you for... for telling me this." Catherine said, her cheeks flushing slightly red from happiness and a slight bit of embarrassment at her swelling feelings for the man. "I know what it means that you did, and... I won't betray your confidence in me."

Jason let out a breath he didn't know he was holding. He hadn't even said anything to Catherine directly, but she had naturally picked up on what speaking of the Cube meant. As such, it felt as if a weight had lifted from his shoulders.

"I appreciate that." Jason said, smiling back at her. He schooled his expression before continuing. "Camael's Cube is bigger than you can possibly imagine. The entirety of the Sol star system, including its Oort Cloud, could fit inside this cube tens of times over. I plan to build a micro-galaxy inside the Cube, with multiple stars carefully placed to create the widest possible habitation zones. We will be able to place tens, hundreds, even thousands of worlds the size of Earth inside. And frankly, we can do even better than that. Because of my magic, we don't have to rely on the inefficient design of a planet either."

Nadia spoke for the first time. "I've already designed the preliminary sketch for a Folded World. Planets are inefficient because the living space they provide is limited to the planet's surface, building up into the sky, and perhaps a kilometer or two down into the crust. The entire core of a planet is essentially a massive waste of living space. By creating Folded Worlds, people will be able to live comfortably above the surface, on the surface, or underground without any problems. We will create a comfortable level of gravity on these Folded Worlds through artificial means, freeing up the core of the planet to become a massive living space."

"To put that in perspective," Jason explained, "imagine that if humanity efficiently lived in skyscrapers across Earth right now, with the optimal amount of space designated for wildlife, forests, growing zones for food and so on, we could probably fit a trillion people on the planet with ease. But on a Folded World, we could fit 100 trillion people, because the amount of space that would open up below the surface would be multiple orders of magnitude greater!"

"And that's not all!" Nadia excitedly chimed in. "Because the Volgrim capital world is one massive super-city. It doesn't even have wildlife or green-zones. If we took things to their logical extreme with a folded world... well, to be honest, it would be a really boring and sterile place to live, but in terms of raw population, we would not need to worry about living space for humanity."

Helen and Harold glanced at one another. They seemed to speak to each other with their eyes.

"It seems you done gots everything all planned out." Harold said, returning his gaze to Jason. "I gots no problem with any o' that. Right now, we just need to git to work and build all this stuff."

"Time seems like our biggest constraint." Helen observed. "Even if this magical realm is time-accelerated, we still have so much work to do that every second counts. Until we've beaten the Volgrim, we cannot rest on our laurels."

Jason started to say something about the Threat beyond the galaxy's confines, but after a moment of thought, he stopped himself.

He came back in time from 100,000 years in the future. The Threat had not pierced the galactic wall even by that point, and 100,000 years seemed like plenty of time to leave well enough alone for now. Humanity might have beaten the Volgrim by then, and at that point they could worry about the Dark Ones. As for the Kolvaxians, those were still a few thousand years away, and Jason intended to fortify the Cosmic Realm so that the Dark Ones couldn't slip their Kolvaxian soldiers inside through whatever twisted means they had originally used.

Sadly, Jason did not know the truth about the Kolvaxians, or his gaze would have landed squarely on a few specific individuals already living on Earth...

"So! Helen!" Jason said, clapping his hands loudly. "That brings me back around to you."

"To me?" Helen repeated.

Jason smiled.

"We've got a lot of work to do. Harold's alive again, and now... it seems the time has come for me to give your mind a major upgrade."

He waved his hand, causing five mystical objects to appear as holograms above the table.

"So, let's talk about giving you a MindCore." Jason said with a smile.

Part 718: Titan Tensions

January 29th, 2021. Base of Mount Sinai, 4PM.

It had taken the demon six hours following their rapid assault on Saint Catherine's Monastery. They had wiped out the defenders, but hadn't bothered chasing any stragglers. A few humans escaping meant nothing to them when their true goal was so close at hand.

Emperor Satan arrived around 2PM and spent a couple hours organizing the preliminary forces for their intended strike into the heart of Sinai. In order to fortify their position, the demons had surrounded the mountain with multiple structures built by Burrowers and reinforced with high level magic. As it just so happened, they had several Fairy allies who were capable of setting up formations to reinforce these otherwise unremarkable stone structures.

Tens of the mini citadels surrounded Mount Sinai, and each one had a Warper or two inside, holding open portals elsewhere on Earth, usually in the vicinity of one of the major Hells. In this way, reinforcements could arrive within moments, and more and more demons were already making their way to the battlefield.

Angels flew high in the sky. Demons didn't usually have wings, and only a few had the gift of flight, so the angels had a huge defensive advantage by controlling the skies. Unfortunately, the angels lacked in champions capable of fighting at the levels of Dukes and Emperors. Purebloods were few and far between, and most Lazarites could only measure up to Barons at best. It was the few living Archangels who were capable of outfighting the demons, and they were badly outnumbered.

In total, only four Archangels still walked the world of the living. They were Raphael, Camael, Gabriel, and Uzziel. Gabriel wore Michael's ring, but aside from these four, there were no others still among the living. Brother Samael had fallen long ago, prior to the War in Heaven, and Sister Uriel had her soul stolen by the demons. As for the two long-dead ancient archangels, Muriel and Cassiel, they were not worth speaking about. They were so distant in memory that none of the demons knew of them, save for Satan, who secretly concealed Samael's soul within himself...

Thus, with only four champions at their disposal, the angels seemed not to be in a good position. However, the demon leaders knew the situation would be far from a cakewalk.

At the base of the mountain, four demon leaders gathered together to discuss the coming battle. Among them were Satan, Diablo, Lucifer, and Auger.

"We're not able to open any portals inside Heaven." Diablo said, as he walked over and clapped his hand on Satan's shoulder. "We've been trying for hours, but Heaven's dimension has been fortified and rearranged. We can't get a mental lock on any of the ancient monuments."

"Cheh. I never thought we would. It was worth a try, though." Satan said, as he rubbed his chin and looked up at the mountain. "Looks like the only way inside is through Heaven's Gate."

Diablo scratched his head. "I do not understand. Why don't the angels simply close the gate and retreat inside?"

"Hehehe. Our enemies ain't just worried about saving their hides." Satan said knowingly. "Think of the message this would send to the human leaders observing the situation. Standing firm and defending against our attacks signals their bravery and willingness to stand up to us. But cowering inside the mountain and closing themselves off would indicate weakness. What do you think would happen to the Vatican's prestige if the angels acted like a bunch of scared lil' babies?"

"Their entire religious infrastructure would collapse." Auger said, throwing his hat into the discussion. "The angels need humans to pray to them, and the human governments only tacitly support the angels because they fear their wrath. But if the angels bunker up inside of Heaven, they will simply hand us an easy win."

Lucifer filed her long razor sharp nails. "Even if the angels disable Heaven's Gate, they can still open portals outside of Heaven. You place too much faith in them trying to maintain an appearance of bravery."

"It ain't just about appearances, sweet-cheeks." Satan laughed cruelly. "Hahaha, Mount Sinai is symbolic! If they turn off the gate, we'll take over the mountain and never let them reopen it! They'll suffer a humiliation 10,000 lifetimes couldn't wash away! Doesn't matter if they make a new Heaven's Gate elsewhere on Earth, because once we roll up on that one, they'll have to disable it too, and the next one, and the next one. Everyone'll know the Archangels are just a bunch of paper tigers!"

"So they must fight." Diablo said, nodding slowly. "Good. We need them to fight if we hope to achieve our strategic objectives. Speaking of which..."

Diablo turned a slow, withering gaze toward the Devil.

"...isn't it about time you told us what this is really all about?"

Auger and Lucifer both glanced at Diablo in surprise. He wasn't usually the type to care about this sort of stuff. But since he had asked, and since they were both dying to know, they immediately fixated their gazes on Satan, crossed their arms, and waited for his reply.

"Haha! Alright, I'll tell ya!" Satan said. "Now's a good time to spill the beans anyway, Deebs!"

He leaned in and lowered his voice.

"We're gonna take down the Lazarus Tower. Without it, everything the angels hold dear will collapse."

The other Emperors looked at Satan in surprise.

"That is a bold move." Lucifer said approvingly, before her face turned ugly. "But there's no chance of success! I hear the Lazarus Tower is positioned right in the heart of Hrothgar's Hall! There are multiple Titans living right next to it. Any assault force will get crushed into meat paste, even if we send Bael himself!"

"If our goal was to destroy the Lazarus Tower, it would indeed be pretty much impossible." Satan conceded. "But good thing that's not the plan. I intend to steal back Valac's Lantern and retake the power of the Lazarites for ourselves!"

Auger's eyes widened. "You want to steal the lantern? That is even more impossible. Satan, are you really risking all our lives over such a risky gamble?!"

"Again, your lives ain't at risk, unless you rush in like a bunch'a morons." Satan said, waving his hand flippantly. "That's why we got mooks to do the dirty work. Even if we lose ten million Grunts during this assault, so what? Sing 'em a eulogy and move on. We're just gonna hafta' make sure none of our big guys get knocked off by the Archangels, the Titans, or..."

"The Heroes." Auger said, his face contorting into a grimace.

Lucifer's ears perked up. She smiled like a witch, then put on an innocent expression.

"Did you say Heroes? Oh that reminds me, my dear sweet precious little Ose just brought me back some intriguing news. It must have slipped my mind!"

"News?" Satan asked. "What news?"

Lucifer moaned as she slowly cracked her back and stretched her legs, taking an annoyingly long time to reply while she forced the others to hang on her every word.

"Oh dear, it seems... you boys didn't hear? If only you had a brilliant, smart, beautiful daughter like me, you might already know. Ah, but where are my manners? I suppose I can tell you."

Her smile disappeared.

"The Hero named Cat Mask is more frightening than we may know. He has the ability to rewind time. It seems he has done so countless times, and he may even know our entire plan going forward, as well as how to counter us."

"WHAT?!" Satan roared, staggering backward in alarm. "Why didn't you tell us sooner?! This is awful news!!"

Lucifer shrugged. "I only learned a couple of hours ago. It seems Ose had a run-in with Cat Mask, and he defeated her handily. Thanks to her cunning wit, she managed to extract several important secrets from his lips before she beat a cunning escape. That's how we now know this entire plan could be a trap! The angels may have already been forewarned of Satan's plan by Cat Mask!"

A moment of silence followed. Auger frowned.

"Something isn't adding up. If Cat Mask can rewind time, then how could Ose possibly have escaped on her own? Especially if he could easily defeat her. If I were him, I would have killed her to prevent my secret from spreading."

"No, that's not right." Diablo interjected. "Because if you could rewind time, then even if your secret got out, you'd just rewind later and undo it."

"GENTLEMEN!" Satan shouted, interrupting their thoughts. "Can we skip the yapping and focus on the fact we have an enemy who can rewind time? I think this might mean we've gotta completely change all our plans up!"

"Not necessarily." Lucifer retorted. "Think about it. Any plan we come up with, he will probably know about. That means if we change plans, we'll only lull ourselves into a false sense of safety. Besides, we don't even know just how potent Cat Mask's powers are. Don't you think they sound a little too convenient? I bet he has several limitations on how he can use them."

"That's right." Auger added. "Human Heroes aren't invincible. Maybe he can only rewind once per day? Maybe he can only go back in time a short period? The fact we know he can rewind time doesn't tell us any of the nuances. If he were using this ability at the most frightening level, he could replay millions of days over and over again, carefully engineering a perfect strategy to uplift humanity and destroy the demons. But right now, we certainly don't seem to be in any major danger. Lucifer, how old is Cat Mask?"

She shrugged. "Ose tells me his real name is Hideki Hiro. I must assume he's in his forties or fifties."

"So it's true then." Satan said, his expression turning into a scowl. "The angels hid the existence of Hideki and Jason real clever-like. They're the blood descendants of Harold Whittaker, and the Heroic Aura has begun passing down through his family tree. The humans must have engineered a way to reverse old Raphael's changes to the Heroic Aura, all those millennia ago."

Satan paused.

"If Hideki or Cat Mask or whatever has some omniscient power to rewind and redo time, then we're fucked no matter what. But I bet his power does have limits. The proof is in the pudding, and we demons are still doin' just fine for ourselves. We'll continue the attack on Heaven as planned!"

Satan held up a finger of warning. "But you guys make sure you spread the word around the higher-ups. Let the other Emperors and Dukes know to keep an eye out for Cat Mask. He and the Archseer are certain to show up once blood starts spraying."

"Even if Cat Mask doesn't know what we're planning, and that's a big 'if', don't forget what the Archseer's powers are." Auger pointed out. "He's a Dream Eater. He may have learned our plans by devouring our dreams."

"Then we'll just have to adapt on the fly." Satan growled. "No excuses. We've got way more elites and superior firepower compared to those damn pigeons."

Satan looked around the room at the faces of the other three Emperors.

"This is it, folks. The Day of Reckoning. If we can snag Valac's Lantern, it will all have been worth it. If we fail, hopefully it will only set us back a little."

"Even if the angels know we're coming, it won't change anything." Diablo affirmed. "We have to do this while we still can. The humans have been getting scarier as time goes on."

Lucifer rubbed her third eye. "You're telling me. If Cat Mask shoots me in the fucking eye one more time, I swear I'm going to rip his manhood off and shove it up his-"

Auger coughed loudly and spread out his arms. "I will ensure all the Hells stay in contact with one another. Leave that part to me."

"Good. We'll launch the attack in one hour." Satan said. "Move out!"

Inside Heaven, a single solitary figure flew across the vast, seemingly unending sky. That figure was Archangel Raphael.

Heaven was unrecognizable compared to its ancient past. Ever since Satan had detonated his body with the force of an atomic bomb and leveled most of Heaven, Raphael had spent millennia alongside his sister Uzziel rebuilding, strengthening, and expanding Heaven's defenses. Thanks to many layers of spatial strengthening spells, Heaven's dimensional space had been reinforced to such an extent that it usually took Raphael a full five minutes to open a portal to the outside world. Lesser angels needed even more time.

On top of that, Heaven was now bigger than the Earth itself in terms of arable land space. Since angels did not require sustenance to survive, Heaven was able to house many more Lazarites than there were currently people living on Earth. Though, at the moment, there were six billion Lazarites compared to eight billion humans. In perhaps ten or twenty more years, as humans died off and became Lazarites, those numbers would quickly change, but not enough time had passed since the Industrial Revolution, so the clock was still ticking.

Heaven consisted of many great regions, but the most important dynamic was that it was no longer merely angels who lived there. Instead, Titans owned half of Heaven's land, as per their agreement with the angels following the War in Heaven thousands of years earlier.

Once the demons slaughtered countless angels and Titans, all those years ago, their situation had become precarious. Satan's thermonuclear explosion had killed nearly all the Purebloods, leaving the angels with a frighteningly small population. Thus, moving the few remaining angels and Titans into Heaven became a top priority. Now, millennia later, the angels had replenished their ranks with Lazarites, and the Titans had bred extensively.

In total, there were around twenty million Titans now living in Heaven. They lived simple and secure lives, and each individual Titan owned hundreds of acres of land for themselves. This was excellent mainly because their bodies were large, and unlike the angels, consuming food and sustenance was essential in order for their bodies to grow over time.

Titans were unique among the top super-species on Earth. Demons and humans bred like rabbits. Angels could not reproduce at all. Titans bred much more slowly than the former, but held a decisive advantage over the latter.

Demons gained power by consuming human souls. Angels lost power over time and could only strengthen themselves through human prayer. Humans did not have any reliable means of gaining magical ability, but their technology improved every generation and slowly made them a force that even the demons feared.

But Titans simply grew stronger as time passed and as their bodies aged. A young Titan, less than a hundred years old, was already strong enough to beat an average Demon Lord into the dirt. Titan Kings like Zeus were far stronger than Demon Emperors, and roughly equivalent to the top Archangels. What's more, Titans grew stronger based on the quality of the food they ate. Unlike demons, they did not devour souls to empower themselves, but instead fruits, vegetables, and meat. During the Dragon Wars, Titans could grow much more powerful much more quickly by consuming the flesh of dead dragons, since their bodies were rich in nutrients. But these days, the animals of Earth were not too strong in comparison to the ancient dragons.

Thus, Titans advanced slowly but steadily, and they were considered the true Champions of Heaven. This was a mutually beneficial arrangement made by the leaders of the Titans and Angels. King Zeus was the strongest Titan alive, and he had only grown mightier following the War in Heaven. Many privately believed he was stronger than all the Archangels, and the thought this might be true had privately caused tensions to slowly simmer beneath the surface.

Why should the Titans be considered equal to the angels... if they were actually superior?

Thus, Raphael flew through the skies to travel to the Hall of Odin, the largest and most prestigious building in all of Jötunheimr, the land of the Titans. As he flew, Raphael passed by giant buildings that rivaled human skyscrapers, each one housing between one Titan and a small family of lesser Titans. These days, the average Titan's height was already close to 200 feet tall, and most of the younger ones stood in excess of 50 feet tall. As for Titan King Zeus himself...

Raphael lifted his eyes to look into the distance. He spotted a gigantic building far bigger than anything the humans had ever build, a super-hall as wide as it was tall, covered in carved murals of ancient Titan Kings, feats of battle the Titans had achieved over the millennia, and even artistic representations of long-forgotten battles during the Primordial Eras. The hall was divided into multiple sub-buildings, but even the smallest ones were 5,000 feet tall. The largest building rose multiple miles into Heaven's sky and could be seen from great distances across Heaven.

This was the Hall of Odin, the most prestigious hall in all of Jötunheimr. It was where Titan King Zeus lived, along with his wife Hera, and a handful of his closest descendants. Living inside the hall was considered a great honor, and few were allowed to do so.

Raphael descended toward the Hall of Odin. He slowed his momentum when he arrived at the entrance, opting to land on the ground despite knowing it would place him in an inferior position. He had to crane his neck backward to look up at the towering statues etched in the visages of dozens of ancient Titan Kings and Queens. Titan Queen Odin's image stood in the main hall, her powerful body towering over all the lesser status, one hand stretched out with her palm aimed at the entrance, warning visitors to be on their best manners lest a tragedy befall them.

Raphael waited at the entrance to the hall. He didn't need to announce his arrival, for the Titans could easily sense his presence from afar.

Before long, the youngest member of the Hall walked inside, a broad smile upon his face. He stood 224 feet tall, his big toe alone dwarfing Raphael's entire body. From on high, he looked down and smiled smugly in a manner that would have ruffled the feathers of any prideful angel. Luckily, Raphael was in full control of his emotions, and these petty moves did nothing to alter his mental state.

"Archangel Raphael, it is good to see you." The black-haired Titan said, his voice loud but not too boisterous. "My father wondered when you would seek his counsel."

"The demons are at our doorstep, young Apollo." Raphael said. "You know well why I hath traveled so far. Bring me to see the God King."

"Of course, Archangel." Apollo said, turning around to walk inside the hall.

Raphael could not possibly keep up with the lumbering giant by walking, so he instead leaped into the air, flapped his wings, and flew beside Apollo as the Titan led him deeper into the hall.

"How fares Aphrodite these days?" Raphael asked casually. "I hear her beauty has grown to rival even that of sister Uzziel."

"Haha. You have heard well, Archangel Raphael." Apollo said jovially. "My sister is the foremost maiden of the Western Pantheon."

"Verily, my eyes art too aged to appreciate a woman's beauty at any age." Raphael said dismissively. "I hath seen countless vixens and damsels over the eons. A child such as thee cannot fathom the number of beautiful angels who once lived in our galaxy alone. My sister Cassiel, for one."

"Cassiel?" Apollo asked. "I don't think I've heard her name before."

"That is because her era ended long before the mindwipes came into effect." Raphael said mildly.

After traveling for a short while, they reached the rear of Odin's Hall, where they entered a strategic war room. Upon entering, a massive table with a map of Heaven's most prominent realms lay spread out, taking up two or perhaps even three times the floor space of a human skyscraper's base. The table was so massive that most humans would find the hills and mountains of Heaven depicted upon the map to be as large as houses compared to themselves. They would have to walk for a good thirty minutes to cross from one edge of the map to the other!

The war room had many ceremonial weapons and armor pieces placed along the walls to add decoration. These armors were not exactly fragile, but they would certainly prove useless in the event of a great battle. They were only meant to be worn during rituals such as weddings and other events of that sort. Helmets, armor pieces, gauntlets, greaves, boots, and various spears, swords, shields, and other such accessories lined the walls.

Zeus stood at the other end of the table, along with his wife, Hera. When Raphael entered the Hall of Odin, they sensed his presence and had been waiting for his arrival. As such, they both stood and watched as the tiny winged figure arrived alongside their son.

"Brother Raphael." Zeus said with a polite smile. "We have been awaiting your arrival."

"Hello, Raphael." Hera said, smiling sweetly at him. "It's good to see you again. It's been a few years since you paid us a visit."

Raphael waved his hands. Suddenly, his body started to inflate in size. Within seconds, a physical illusion of himself spread out and began to grow, grow, grow. He rapidly towered above the 224-foot-tall Apollo and erupted upward, growing taller and taller until he approached the height of Zeus himself!

Zeus's smile turned ever so slightly into a frown. As the King of all Titans, his height was important. He stood 479 feet tall, and was approaching the demarcation point of 500, which would signal that he had reached half the height of the most powerful Titan of all time, Odin the Allmother. As for Hera, she was 442-feet tall, and she was among the tallest of her species as well.

Thus, when Raphael grew his false body, he deliberately lifted himself to 475 feet tall, only the slightest bit shorter than the Titan King himself, placing himself virtually on the same pedestal.

Naturally, Zeus was not so discourteous as to point out Raphael's intentions, but it was obvious to everyone present. Apollo glanced at Raphael's back, his expression ugly. Raphael had subtly implied without saying a word that he stood on near-equal footing with Zeus, which thereby implied so did the angels!

These days, that was a slap across the face of the Titans! No Titan believed the angels were capable of matching them anymore. It had not yet become a public point of contention, but privately the Titans believed that they were the true rulers of Heaven now. They were bigger, they had far mightier and more numerous elites, and the tiny insect-like swarms of Lazarites were nothing by comparison! The angels were down to four Archangels and a few hundred purebloods, and those purebloods were barely worth scoffing at!

Thus, when Raphael finished his expansion and stood practically eye-to-eye with Zeus, his transformation offered a silent but steady element of pushback to dissuade Zeus of any notions of equality. It was clear that Raphael did not believe the angels were weaker than the Titans, and even if they were, it was not by much!

Zeus's nose twitched, but he forced a polite smile as he reached his arm across the table. "It is good that we can speak face-to-face, Raphael. That trick of yours is much better than me having to crane my neck to look down at you."

Down at me, or down upon me?" Raphael asked, a fake smile of his own plastered across his face. He reached out his hand and took Zeus's, the two of them exchanging a firm handshake.

"What are you implying?" Zeus asked innocently, frowning slightly as if offended by Raphael's words. "Long have the Titans and angels been friends. Following the destruction of both our species, you gave us a place to stay inside Heaven. We have made it our home and lived alongside you in peace. I would never presume as to look down upon such close friends."

Raphael's smile grew more pointed. He deliberately squeezed Zeus's hand, prompting the King to squeeze back. "Many rumors hath entered my ears over the last few decades. This old man is gladdened to hear those rumors were little more than the chattering of those who are young and stupid. Naturally, the old and wise would not humor such silliness."

After a long moment of holding eye contact, Raphael released his grip, and so did Zeus. Their arms fell to their sides, and Raphael turned his attention to Hera.

"Lady Hera, thy beauty is the same as the falling of autumn leaves. Its coloration only deepens every year."

Hera smiled. "My thanks for your kind words, Raphael. I hope that we may focus on the matter at hand regarding this coming war."

Raphael's smile vanished. He looked at the map of Heaven with great trepidation.

"Heaven's gate is positioned in the Northern Glades." Raphael said, pointing at a forest Uzziel herself had grown thousands of years ago, after Satan's nuclear blast. "I am uncertain as to what end these demons are attacking us, but this move stinks of desperation. They art only doing so as a result of the new Heroes who have appeared among the humans."

Zeus looked at the profile of Raphael's face for a moment, then lowered his gaze to the war map.

"The most obvious answer is that the demons wish to cause widespread damage to the angels. Specifically, they may wish to assassinate one or more Archangels." Zeus said pointedly. "The next goal they may be pursuing is one of acquisition. Perhaps they wish to raid Camael's artifacts and steal ones they can make use of."

"Not much point in that." Hera spoke. "Most artifacts are infused with holy energy. Demons cannot use them."

"Indeed, but there is one artifact the demons may wish to acquire over the others." Zeus said, raising an eyebrow.

He slid his finger down the map toward the southern area of Heaven, far from the Gate.

"The Lazarus Tower." Raphael said, stroking his beard. "Verily, I suspected this might be the case. A demonic artifact is what allows humans to rise and live as Lazarites. If the demons steal or destroy it, they shalt cripple our war capabilities."

"Then it is good that you have placed the tower in the center of the Titans' strongholds." Zeus said with a smile. "My brothers and sister of the Eastern Pantheon will surely protect it with all their hearts. I will personally place five of my children surrounding the Tower to ensure no demon strike force can draw near."

Hera smirked. "These demons are quite stupid if they think they can seize or destroy the artifact. They would have to battle across a thousand miles of Heaven to even draw within striking distance of the Tower. It is the most heavily fortified location in all our lands."

Raphael didn't appear so dismissive. "There is another possibility. Satan mayeth intend to do what he did in the past: Detonate his body with enough force to obliterate much of Heaven. He hath had millennia to collect more souls than he ever possessed during the first War in Heaven. If so, we shoulds't prevent him from entering Heaven at all costs. He mayeth make a play for the tower only to draw our eyes away as he positions himself in the center of Heaven, and then..."

Raphael made an 'exploding' motion with his hands, causing Zeus and Hera's expressions to turn ghastly.

"Satan sacrificed just as many of his people as he killed ours, last time." Zeus said, worry on his face. "If he is truly feeling pressured by the appearance of two human Heroes, this suicidal play might actually be a stroke of genius. Even if he loses a few Emperors in the process, the damage done would be incalculable. Now that Heaven surrounds the entire Earth, the aftereffects of such an explosion would certainly devastate the entire planet, causing a mass-casualty event among the humans. If the demons hide their strongest elites underground, they could eliminate as much as half the humans, or more!"

"This must be his objective." Hera said, pressing a finger to her lips. "He wouldn't have done this in the past, but those Heroes have forced his hand! We have to think of a way to force him out of Heaven if he should do such a thing again."

"In the past, when Satan detonated his body, I must confess that I was greatly taken aback and lost my wits in the moment." Raphael admitted. "Had I known he was capable of such a vile act, I would have used all my power to force him out into the Void. Perhaps this is something we must consider now."

Raphael looked deeply at Zeus.

"Brother Zeus. Thy people and mine are not bound to the limits of this planet. Unlike the demons, we may traverse the Void at will. As such, we shoulds't consider the possibility of taking up refuge on another planet. I could even create a new Gate that would connect Heaven to such a world."

Zeus looked surprised. "The Void? The blackness beyond our world? You believe there are other worlds out there suitable for life?"

Raphael chuckled. "The Titans hath fallen far from their peak, King Zeus. But thy people can survive in the Void without much trouble. Thy bodies are no less hardy, and they doth not require but a single breath to spend centuries swallowed by the Void. Naturally, traversing the Void is not a simple matter, and there art billions of worlds one mayeth travel to, but I digress. There are plenty of worlds thou coulds't reach if thy people used their long-forgotten void-traversal abilities properly."

Zeus thought about Raphael's proposal for a while.

"I've never once considered leaving Earth to live elsewhere. But unlike the angels, my people do not require the existence of a lesser species to feed ourselves. If we were to spread among the stars, we could proliferate much more quickly and freely than if we stayed on Earth. The same cannot be said for you."

"Indeed." Raphael admitted. "Our lives art tethered to those of the humans. We require their prayers to sustain us. We hath become quite pitiful over the last few eras. We no longer possesseth the same capacity for glory as we once did in the past."

Zeus pondered Raphael's conundrum. It was an interesting dilemma. Now that he thought about it, Zeus realized that staying on Earth was potentially a ruinously stupid decision! Why stay on Earth when the Titans could just as easily traverse the stars? Why not seek out the land of their ancestors? Could Valhalla be out there, somewhere, hidden among the infinite stars?

But, Zeus realized, if the Titans did leave Earth, the angels would fall. They were no longer strong enough to protect themselves. The Archangels were still mighty, but they had become weaker than during the War in Heaven, and the Archangels of those ancient times were far weaker than their Primordial selves.

Zeus didn't hate Raphael. He didn't loathe the angels or want to see them dead. He merely believed that they were not fit to be called the owners of Heaven any longer. If the angels simply accepted the truth and bowed their heads to him, Zeus was kindhearted enough to let them continue to live in Heaven with no further changes. He would protect them not as superiors or equals, but as his vassals.

Surely, given their sad decline, this was not asking too much? And yet Raphael still proudly acted as though he were the leader of Heaven.

Ahh, how it vexed Zeus greatly and soured his thoughts. He did not wish to step on Raphael's pride, but the fact of the matter was the Titans now towered over the angels in ways both literal and metaphorical. One could say that Raphael was the rightful leader due to his countless years of accumulated knowledge and wisdom, but if the two of them came to blows, Zeus had no reservations about the idea he would soundly trounce the old man.

Should wisdom lead a people, or power? This was the sticking point that always gave Zeus pause. He did not believe that he was a wiser leader than Raphael, and as such, he held off on starting an ugly battle for leadership. He still felt like a junior in front of the old man. So long as Raphael's control of Heaven did not lead to a tragedy, Zeus could remain cool and allow things to stay the way they were.

But if Raphael should ever slip up...

Zeus cleared his throat. "Let us set aside the matters of departing Earth. My people shall stay here for the immediate future. Defending Heaven is, therefore, our natural priority. I will speak to King Ra to rally his sons and daughters for the coming war. Izanagi and Susanoo will be eager to join from the Eastern Pantheon, while Indra and Yami will join from the Southern Pantheon."

Raphael gave Zeus a long stare. "And the North?"

"...You know as well as I that the Norse are a stubborn lot. They love war and battle, but they do not believe Heaven will be under any major threat. Only Forseti has indicated interest in keeping an eye on the gate. The others think the demons have lost their bite and killing hordes of weaklings is beneath them."

Raphael snorted. "I doth not wish to speak ill of those who art not present, but it feels to me that the Titans hath grown sedentary in recent decades. Too many were born who dids't not witness the horrors of the Ancient Era. They lack a conception of how dangerous our enemies truly art."

"You speak truth, old friend." Zeus said. "But what can we do regarding these matters? Following the War in Heaven, fewer than 100 Titans remained among the living. It is a miracle we've returned to our former glory. The young may have read the lore of old, but they were not there to witness those legends in the making."

"I will see if I can convince more Titans to assist in defending the gate." Hera promised. "Zeus can be a little... standoffish. But the other Titan Kings typically will lower their guard around me."

"The demons mayeth appear tiny and weak, but their combined power is frightening." Raphael warned. "Thou shoulds't taketh this situation as seriously as possible. I am fine with tossing away the lives of countless Lazarites, but if anything mayeth happen to the Lazarus Tower, we shan't have Lazarites to spare in the future."

Zeus's expression became grim. "I know well the importance of the Tower. Say no more, Raphael."

The old Archangel glanced out a window and squinted. "The daylight wanes. Before long, the cover of night shalt arrive. That is when the demons shalt begin their assault on the Gate. I must take my leave."

Raphael nodded at Zeus. He turned to leave, but then Zeus slightly raised his hand.

"Wait, Raphael. Regarding..."

Raphael turned to look at Zeus. "Yes?"

For a brief moment, Zeus and Raphael met each other's eyes. Neither one spoke, and eventually, Zeus lowered his gaze.

"Ah. It's nothing. Let us work together to protect our lands."

"Mmm." Raphael grunted. "Let us do that then."

He turned and walked out of the room, leaving Zeus, Hera, and Apollo alone. Five minutes later, Apollo snorted through his nose.

"Father! Why did you not bring up the matter of transferring leadership? Always, you allow Raphael to push you around!"

Zeus sighed. His expression seemed tired. "You don't understand, child. Raphael is ancient. I may be a Titan King to you, but I am still a child in his eyes. Merely meeting his gaze was enough to break my resolve. It seems in matters of leadership, I am still his inferior."

Hera closed her eyes and shook her head helplessly. "I do not revere Raphael in the way you do. It was his lack of foresight that created the dragons, the Titans, and the demons. How can you continue to treat him as wise and all-knowing when he has blundered so many times?"

"I was not there for the primordial times, so I do not know the circumstances behind the first two." Zeus said. "As for the demons... who can say if what happened was truly Raphael's fault? The burden of command is heavy. He may have been pressured by others to make foolish decisions."

"Pressured? That old croney?" Hera scoffed. "You do not give him enough credit."

"Perhaps not." Zeus admitted.

The Titan King tapped the war table.

"Send a message to Neptune. Inform the Atlanteans that the demons are likely to begin their attack by nightfall. With any luck, we can pincer them with an attack from inside and outside the Gate."

"I pray Neptune will come to our aid." Apollo said, before kneeling and taking his leave.

With Poseidon having long ago died to the machinations of Satan, his son became the leader of Atlantis. Now, they were the only Titans who continued to live outside of Heaven, hidden beneath the depths of Earth's oceans.

Their contribution could end up being paramount in this coming war...

Part 719: Countermeasures Coalescing

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR.

Another day passed in realspace time. The galaxy was changing rapidly, and many events had been playing out across countless worlds.

The Wordsmiths were both dead, Maiura had fallen to the Plague, and Tarus II was destroyed by the Volgrim in a last-ditch attempt to finally eliminate the human threat once and for all. This had left humanity badly weakened and on the brink of destruction.

The Volgrim had lost 95% of their Psions to the machinations of Creator Demila and Demon Deity Mephisto, reducing their war strength to a fraction of what it once was.

The Kolvaxians were revealed to not be a hivemind of unknown origins, but the deliberate creation of Archangel Uzziel as part of her revenge against the demons, Volgrim, and humans.

Emperor Crow had attacked Cassiel and Soleil, ultimately killing the latter before being mercilessly slaughtered by Demon Emperor Gressil. His ploy removed Cassiel's protective detail and brought her to the edge of despair.

On top of everything else, Uriel had been separated from Barbatos's body, but she, Michael, and Gabriel had formed a united front against Raphael and Uzziel, allowing Barbatos to escape and report everything he had seen to the demons, as well as the rest of the galaxy.

So much had happened. So many events had played out that the formerly static and barely changing galactic playing board of the Milky Way from less than a decade earlier had been completely upended. Now, multiple factions were frantically racing to try and pick the pieces back up, conquer new territory, prevent expansion into their existing territory, and simply defend whatever scraps they could.

The galactic situation was not looking good for many disparate species across the Milky Way. The Kolvaxians were united under one ruler. They were numerous and powerful, with no apparent weaknesses. They could traverse the Void at great speeds and infest distant worlds in secret through a method nobody had properly deduced.

On top of all that, the Kolvaxians had gained two immense power-ups in the fact that Artoria's biological essence had raised every Kolvaxian's physical durability to the level of a Middle Cosmic, and that Raphael was now acting as a strategist for the hive itself.

But despite all of this, the slumbering giant known as the combined power of all Sentients across the galaxy... had not yet given up.

There was still a fight to be had. Humanity would not bow, and they had made a decision that would set them on the path of leading the other species, despite seemingly being 'weak' and 'useless' without their Wordsmiths...

The world of Pixiv. Humanity's Sole Settlement: Neil City.

"Less than a day, people!" General Chadwick shouted. "Pack only the essentials. Don't worry about food, or water. Only bring along weapons and technology!"

Men and women, soldiers and civilians, children and adults. All the humans on Pixiv hurried to and fro, racing to grab every last item they could, focusing their efforts on bringing along as much wartime munitions, weapons, and armor as possible.

Nobody smiled. Nobody laughed. A pallor of fear and desperation hung in the air. But mixed with the negativity, there was also a grim determination.

Humanity had originally planned to live on Sharmur and Pixiv, separate from one another. Many humans still believed in human supremacy, especially those among Jepthath's Legion. They did not want to fight or live alongside demons. As such, they had moved to the Fairy homeworld, intending to make a new life there.

But now, barely three weeks after being uprooted from Maiura, they were once again moving their belongings, a sense of despair in their hearts.

How many times would they become refugees? How many more times would they have to uproot their lives as if tearing hair from a scalp?

The common people didn't know what was going on. Their leaders assured them this was a good thing, and their lives were about to improve, but nobody truly believed this to be the case.

Even though the humans were transferring to Sharmur, the fairies were not. In fact, the fairies insisted on remaining behind, even after Commander Chadwick privately briefed Fairy Queen Calanthra on the new plan. He thought it was obvious the fairies would be better off taking up refuge inside the Cube.

Instead, Calanthra had merely smiled and told them to take the humans away. If the Cube could come to swallow up Pixiv directly, then that would be acceptable, but under no circumstances would she allow the fairies to abandon Pixiv to the Plague. As for her reasons why, she would not say, leaving some among the human leadership to wonder...

General Chadwick marched around the Warpgate, barking orders at various groups of personnel. He told them which boxes of goods to take first and which to save for the last day. Eventually, he stopped for a short coffee break, and to speak with someone important.

"Henry!" Chadwick shouted, causing the young man to turn and look at him. The two men stood inside a tent less then 500 meters from the Warpgate. "What has she decided?"

Henry nodded. He walked toward a table in the center of the tent, where a starmap of the Milky Way was laid out.

"This is the Southern Sector." Henry said, marking out the bottom 'quarter' of the Milky Way. "You can see the Plague-controlled worlds encroaching on the east and west edges here and here. There are thirty Plague-controlled worlds inside the Southern Sector's borders located here, here, and here. Maiura is one of them."

He drew several lines between various dots on the map. It was a map the Volgrim had given humanity, one which positioned the galaxy in a semi-flat way, with a chosen cardinal direction to be the Galactic North. As the galaxy rotated, the stars stayed in vaguely the same relative positions, but the universe outside would also rotate, so there was a Galactic North for mapping the interior of the Milky Way, and a Universal North that always pointed toward the origin point of the universe. These two Norths were completely different from one another.

The northern, eastern, and western sectors of the Milky Way were almost entirely controlled by the Kolvaxians. These days, aside from a few scattered worlds barely within the southernmost edges of the East Sector and West Sector, the Volgrim had fully fallen back to the Southern Sector, and the Plague were already starting to nibble at the Southern Sector. With the loss of the Psions, the Southern Sector's fate was looking increasingly dire.

"This is where the ruins of Ancient Earth are located, roughly 26,000 lightyears (ly) from the galactic center, near the end of this spiral arm. And this star here? That's Sharmur, roughly 9,500ly west of Earth."

"This is Pixiv. You can see it's about 2,300ly northwest of Sharmur. In galactic terms, a stone's throw. Look over here. The Tarus system is 7,200ly east of Sharmur, and Hell Harbor is another 9,300ly east of the Tarus system. The Cube started out in Hell Harbor, and was moved west by Jason until it came to a rest in the Tarus system, where it remained until the planet's destruction. It can travel roughly 1,500ly per day at max speed, so to get it from the Tarus system to the Sharmur system would require..."

"A little less than five days." Chadwick answered, doing quick calculations in his head. "It's been eighteen days since the Cube departed, so it should have already arrived inside the Sharmur system..."

Henry shook his head. "Not quite. The Cube's travel speed is quite fast at max speed, even compared to Volgrim starships, but much slower than High Psions who specialize in Spatial Psionics. At Warp 8.0, a Volgrim starship would take just over a week to travel the 7,200 lightyears between Tarus II and Sharmur, or it would take a little more than three days at Warp 8.1. Thus, we can say the Cube is capable of traveling at top speeds between Warp 8.0 and 8.1."

He continued. "The problem is, to maintain secrecy, the Cube had to take a more roundabout route, making it move at a speed comparable to Warp 7.5. Still, it will arrive within the next twelve hours, thus the difference isn't too large."

Henry pointed at Sharmur with his left index finger, and the destroyed Tarus system with his right index finger.

"The Cube does not strictly travel at any level of Warp Speed. Instead, it travels at Lightspeed through the dimension called P-Space, where distances between stars are far, far smaller. It has to avoid the gravity well of stars, black holes, and other such stellar phenomena, so its speed isn't as constant as a Volgrim ship traveling at standard Warp Speed."

A short moment passed as Chadwick gave Henry a long look. "This is good to know and everything, but what does this have to do with Linda's decision?"

The greater point of their meeting was not to casually discuss interstellar distances, but to instead discuss what actions humanity should take after the Cube arrived inside the Sharmur system. Thus, Henry's expression became solemn.

"Our immediate goal is to place the entire Sharmur system inside the Cube. The problem is, we don't know whether or not this will damage Demon Deity Melody, or maybe even kill her. If all goes well, we can move the system inside the Cube and gain a Middle Cosmic powerhouse to defend the Cube. But if things go wrong, Melody will die, and humanity will lose our strongest protective talisman."

Henry continued. "Let's assume everything goes badly, Commander. The Cube swallows the Sharmur system and Melody suffers catastrophic damage or even dies. The decision of what to do next is easy. We will have confirmed that the Cube cannot preserve the power of Stellar Wardens, and thus we would only cause damage by trying to swallow their systems. We would move on to Pixiv, which is a short 2300 lightyears away, and within a day and a half, we would scoop up the Fairies and add them to the Cube's internal worlds. Beyond that, we would simply have to pray the Plague hadn't noticed our actions, or else adding other worlds to the Cube would become impossible."

The two men looked at one another, giving Henry a moment to collect his thoughts. However, it was Chadwick who spoke next.

"I understand now. If the Cube can preserve Melody's power, then that would prove we could do the same for the other Stellar Wardens. Those Demon Deities would become powerful assets if we merged them into the Cube. Thus, going to Pixiv next might not be the best idea."

Henry hesitated. "...If the problem only involved empowering humanity and making us more fit to fight the Plague, the decision would be easy. But it isn't."

Darkness fell over Chadwick's eyes. "Mmm. Because of trust."

"Because of trust." Henry confirmed. "Even if the Cube can preserve a Warden's power, do we really trust the Demon Deities enough to add one, two, or perhaps even more of them into the Cube? After all the things they've done? Maybe it's my inner Jepthath talking, but I don't trust those scumbags as far as I can toss them."

"My opinions are obvious." Chadwick said, his voice low. "Nobody on Pixiv trusts the demons. Many people are angry they have to pack up and leave. I would prefer we just stick to the plan of adding Sharmur and Pixiv to the Cube and just leave these demons to themselves."

"You would still have to place your trust in Melody though." Henry pointed out.

"Of course. But I don't mind her much, and I believe she's proven her loyalties decently well. She's gone to bat for humanity several times already." Chadwick said. "Besides, what choice do we have? Melody and Beelzebub are our only powerful protectors. We must rely on them, at least for now."

The young man squeezed his superior's shoulder gently. Henry sighed. "With no Wordsmiths, we're low on options. I pray the Wordsmith's children are able to rise to the challenge. Of Hope's three children, I think Mandy has the best shot of assisting us on a strategic level. Her Runic powers are great for making powerful artifacts, weapons, and armor. Levi is a solid frontline fighter, but when the enemies are Cosmics, I don't think he'll be able to do much. Blake is young and inexperienced, but he certainly has potential."

Chadwick touched his chin. "What about Jason's son? Timothy? Shouldn't he be around... oh, I don't know... 16 years old by now?"

"I can't say for certain, but I think he's closer to 18 or 19 now." Henry said. "Jepthath doesn't have any Legionnaires inside Chrona, so we can't communicate directly with them. Our best bet is that the fairies can establish communication with Blinker, or maybe Marie Becker can get in contact with her Cybernite liason."

"We don't even know if Timothy has powers." Chadwick said. "It's best not to rely on an unknown variable. We should work with what we know we have. It's entirely possible Timothy won't get any powers at all."

A short lull in the conversation followed. Henry communication with the Legion for a minute or so, then his expression darkened.

"Something's been bothering me, Chadwick."

Chadwick's eyebrows shot up. "What's the matter?"

The Norwegian man's portly body shook as he noticed Henry's unease.

"Remember how Jason Hiro supposedly removed the 'flaw' from human bodies?" Henry asked.

"Of course." Chadwick responded. "It's made our people able to impregnate basically any species."

"Right... and as weird as that is, that's all we've really seen happen." Henry pointed out. "I thought removing the Flaw was supposed to give us Heroes galore, but so far nothing has really happened. Demons like Kiari have become impregnated by human lovers, but beyond that, not much has changed. We don't see any powerful new Heroes rising up. We don't see incredible feats happening. Everything just seems... the same."

Chadwick stared down at the galactic map laid out on the table. His eyes bored into it with deep intent, yet his gaze was unfocused, as if he couldn't see anything in front of him in particular.

"It hasn't even been a month yet." Chadwick concluded. "Perhaps not enough time has passed for humans to develop any powers. Perhaps our current generation won't be able to develop any abilities, but the next one will."

"You might be right, but the uncertainty is killing me." Henry complained. "We NEED champions. Now more than ever. The Archangels deceived us, and they're going to gobble up the whole galaxy if we don't fight back."

"The situation is dire, but I do not believe it's hopeless." Chadwick said with a knowing smile. "We are not yet backed into a corner. If the only thing we do is place the Sharmur system inside the Cube, and even if Melody dies, I believe that as long as we hide the Cube in a corner of the galaxy and increase its time dilation, we will be able to advance rapidly. Who knows? Perhaps we may even be able to develop a single star system to the point humanity alone can fight back the Plague!"

Henry didn't seem to buy into Chadwick's argument. "The situation is 'hopeless.' Hope literally died. I don't see humanity making it another decade, let alone a hundred years."

"Oh, ye of little faith." The Commander said with a snort. "Just take it from a tired old man. Humanity is not so weak that we will bow to the Plague."

After a minute of wrapping up the discussion, Chadwick pointed at the map.

"Tell Linda my recommendation is to swallow the Sharmur system, then the Pixiv system, no matter what. As for the Demon Deities, we should only determine whether or not to swallow one or more of their systems after we have saved our closest allies first."

"Alright." Henry said. "I'll pass that on to her."

The young man turned and strode out of the tent, leaving Chadwick behind. The Norwegian man snorted derisively.

"Neil was right. We mustn't trust the demons any more than is necessary."

The world of Numaria, deep underground, beneath a mountain.

Barbatos's body twitched. Beside him, Emperor Belial stood, her hands placed upon his chest, pouring her feeble mortal healing energy into him. Emperor Leeroy was there as well, and the two of them worked tirelessly to do their best to heal Barbatos's grievous wounds as best as they could.

"Brother Barbatos." Auger said, as he walked over to stand on the opposite side of the bed Barbatos had been laid upon. "There is a matter I must consult with you about."

Barbatos slowly opened his eyes. A deep gloominess filled his vision; the result of witnessing his brother's death, and the sadness and loneliness that came along with it. For the entire past day after crash-landing on Numaria, his mind had ached with mental pain far greater than the torture his body endured. To lose the only brother he ever had in the world, a brother who had once given his life to save Barbatos, that fact seared his soul's very foundation.

Barbatos was in more pain than anyone knew, but he never let it show.

"Speak..." Barbatos rasped.

Auger hesitated, seeing the pain in Barbatos's eyes. But he ultimately relented. "I have spoken to the Volgrim. They informed me of a possible way we demons might be able to stand a chance against the Plague, but... it would require the help of a High Cosmic, or even better, an Apex Cosmic."

Barbatos slowly blinked. His eyes slid to the left to look at Auger's face. He said nothing, simply waiting for Auger's explanation.

Sensing Barbatos's intent, Auger cleared his throat, bowed his head, and serenely clasped his hands together in front of his waist.

"Unarin believes it may be possible to relocate the star systems of our Middle Cosmics. To do so would require the power of a being terrifying beyond belief. By moving not only the star itself, but also the planets, we might be able to slowly 'drag' Numaria, Hell Harbor, and other such systems together, within just a few lightyears of each other. Middle Cosmics are barely powerful enough to 'nudge' the direction of a system's natural travel orientation, but High Cosmics can exert enough power to directly pull systems in a desired direction much more quickly. Apex Cosmics would be able to do the same feat, but far faster and with less effort."

Barbatos's eyes opened and closed, ever so slowly.

"You wish... for me... to move Numaria?"

"Not now. You are injured and weak." Auger said, bowing his head. "I would certainly not presume to order you around. I have spent the past 16 hours testing out the range I can project my power. I can travel up to 10 lightyears from Numaria's star before my power begins to wane. Once I travel 15 lightyears, my power starts to drop rapidly, and as such, I believe 10 lightyears is my maximum 'force projection distance.'"

Auger continued. "I have not yet spoken to the other Deities about this, as I wanted to run it past you first. You are the strongest demon in the Milky Way, and as such, everyone is looking to you for leadership. Do you believe, once you are recovered, you will have the strength to move our star systems together? If we can position ourselves closely enough, all the Demon Deities will be able to multiply our power and cover for one another! We will be able to fight back if the Plague arrives and carve out at least one small, tiny sliver of the Milky Way as a bulwark the Archangels won't be able to penetrate!"

Auger paused.

"All of this, of course, is only possible if you are willing to assist us once you've healed. If not... I will continue to look into other alternatives."

A long silence followed. Barbatos's eyes drifted open and closed. He stared up at the ceiling, feeling Belial and Leeroy's healing magic slowly healing his broken body, a little bit at a time.

"Very... well..." Barbatos said quietly. "Once I am... healed. I will try."

Auger's gaze brightened.

"Many thanks, Barbatos. I will do everything in my power to speed up your healing."

He bowed his head respectfully, then turned and walked away.

Now, it seemed possible that the demons had acquired an alternative method of protecting themselves...

Part 720: The Lord of Heroes

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Inside the Hall of Heroes.

Another several months had passed for the denizens living within the Hall of Heroes. In that time period, something remarkable had happened. The outside world had undergone a major upheaval, one which played out in slow motion for Levi, Mandy, and Blake, along with everyone else living inside the secret realm.

The humans, demons, and Volgrim had been forced to work together! This was not a casual partnership, but a deep one borne of extreme urgency.

The Archangels had revealed their betrayal, and Barbatos had made it known how deep Raphael's treachery went.

As such, the people inside the Hall of Heroes now faced a difficult decision.

It was inside an ornate ceremonial hall Solomon had personally built that a group of people had clustered together in anticipation of a formal ceremony. The Hall of Riches was gaudy like every other thing Solomon built, riddled with tacky diamond-studded statues, vases, an organ for playing music, and many chandeliers and candelabras; all colored gold, of course. The room flickered with firelight, but the natural bright white glow of the Hall of Heroes was omnipresent enough to drown out the firelight.

"Young Levi." Hammurabi said, standing beside three of the most senior-ranking Trueborn Ancestors, including Jepthath, Arthur, and Elizabeth Kindelmann. "With your father's passing, you are now the oldest living Trueborn in the Milky Way. In the past, there was only ever one Trueborn, but now that there are multiple, we Ancestors believe that you should be the one to make decisions on all our behalf's."

Levi stood across from the five Trueborn ancestors, a ceremonial altar placed between them. On his right stood his sister, Mandy, and on his left stood his younger brother, Blake. Curiously, much further off to the left there was another individual standing, one whose cold and 90%-robotic body was somewhat unnerving to look at, yet she was also someone who was always polite and never overbearing. She was the Celestial Designer, Psymin Miralax.

"Thank you for your vote of confidence." Levi said, dipping his head politely toward Hammurabi. "I don't know if I'm the right person for the job, though. Just because I'm the oldest of my siblings doesn't mean I'm the best person to be our leader."

Levi had spent another 20 realspace days inside the Hall of Heroes. At a dilation ratio of 100-to-1, that meant about another 2,000 HoH-days, or about five and a half years. He was now 55 years old. His sister was 35, and Blake was 21.

"If we were to choose based on who we thought would be the best strategist, we would probably pick Mandy." Hamuurabi said, smiling at the younger woman. "But Mandy is a very busy woman. Every day, she advances her Runecrafting abilities by leaps and bounds. She should spend as much time as possible working on scraping together every single advantage humanity can get in the coming years. Naturally, Blake is quite young and not the ideal candidate to become leader of the Hall of Heroes, but more importantly, he is constantly working to improve his affinity to light and dark magic. Compared to your two siblings, you are... less occupied."

Neither of Hope's children looked offended by Hammurabi's words. He was only speaking the truth. Levi mostly just trained his body every day, fighting powerful machines made by Psymin which his sister empowered with her Runic Arcs, and training alongside Blake to help him become a more capable fighter. But outside that, Levi didn't have many hobbies.

"...Alright. Fine, I'll accept the position. But I'm going to need to rely on the rest of you." Levi said blandly. "I'm not much of a... book-smarts guy."

"We will offer our counsel, but always defer the final decision to you." Hammurabi said.

In unison, he and the other ancestors formally bowed to Levi.

"We recognize the presence of the new Lord of Heroes, Levi Hiro." Hammurabi said, crossing his hand over his heart. He raised his head back up and smiled. "It's not much of a ritual, but who gives a damn about such matters anyway? It's only us here."

Levi chuckled. He didn't really care about formality. He took after his father in that way.

Blake also laughed, then lightly socked Levi's arm. Levi playfully punched him back. Mandy rolled her eyes at their antics.

After a few moments, Hammurabi's expression became solemn again.

"The reason I invited you three here, as well as Psymin Miralax, is because we have an important decision to make, and I want you to make it, Levi. As we speak, the Founders have suspended all hostilities with humanity, and so have the demons. With these new revelations regarding Archangel Raphael and his plot to seize the Milky Way, we must claw at every possible resource at our disposal. We no longer have Wordsmiths who can 'magic up' powerful artifacts and raw materials at will."

Levi cocked his head. "I'm not quite following."

"Wait, Hammurabi..." Blake said, his eyebrows raising as he glanced at Psymin and seemed to realize why she was invited. "Are you saying... we need to pull the Technopaths my dad captured out of cryostasis?"

Psymin Miralax's expression did not change. She looked at Blake, then she looked at Hammurabi, waiting for confirmation.

The ancient ancestor, now considered the wisest person in the Hall of Heroes after Solomon's death, simply closed his eyes and bobbed his head.

"You've guessed correctly, young Blake. I was once in support of your father's actions, but after the atrocities he committed and his execution of my pupil, Solomon, as well as that kind-hearted Jeremiah fellow, I have begun to look back on his decisions with a more critical eye. I no longer believe the attack on Serris and the subsequent destruction of the planet was a wise choice. Thankfully, he did not actually take any lives. He placed all the Technopaths and other entities from Serris in stasis within the Hall of Heroes. And that now gives us a unique opportunity."

Arthur stepped forward. "We Ancestors have unanimously come to an agreement. We believe it would be wise to discreetly inform Unarin that his Technopath researchers are safe with us. We then wish to transport them to the Phoenix's Cube in a few months, once she absorbs the Sharmur system. Those Technopaths will supercharge humanity's engineering and allow us to create weapons of war much more quickly and efficiently than we could ever do with our own limited manpower and knowledge. Additionally, it will help mend relations with the Volgrim Empire."

Levi's smile slowly turned to a frown. "You want to make amends with them? That's ridiculous! The Volgrim attacked Tarus II! They destroyed it! They killed millions of humans! They even killed uncle Jason!"

Mandy nodded. "I agree. This decision is a fine tactical decision, but it's the Volgrim who should be making amends with us, not the other way around. They owe us reparations for all the atrocities they've committed."

"That was then, and this is now." Hammurabi said slowly. "The Total Rendition of Tarus II was a war crime without a doubt. It was abominable. But we are facing extinction. Not just humanity, but the demons, the Volgrim, and all the monster species scattered across the Milky Way."

Elizabeth Kindelmann intervened. "If I may? I believe Mandy makes a fair point. The Volgrim do owe us reparations, and that's exactly what we're going to get. However, from Unarin's perspective, he may have guessed, but could not have definitively known, that Hope had only pretended to kill all the Volgrim on Serris. If Hope truly did kill them, then that could be seen as a preemptive strike and a sign of things to come. Let's not forget that Hope then went to Volgarius to attack Unarin directly. These signs, among others, point to an unstable element that, at the time, threatened Volgarius. From Unarin's perspective, we attacked first, and he retaliated."

"We are going to obtain reparations." Hammurabi said, turning his head to smile and nod at Elizabeth approvingly before turning back to Levi and the rest. "By making these Technopaths serve us, we will put them to work and make them useful. Of course, this is only if you approve, Lord Levi. If not, we can leave them as they are. I simply believe in this critical time, we need to use every resource we have at our disposal."

Levi's frown deepened. His father might not be looked upon favorably by the Ancestors anymore, and for good reason, but as Hope's oldest son, Levi felt it was disrespectful of his father's memory to simply release all those Technopaths Hope had deliberately imprisoned. After all, those Technopaths had committed terrible sins, testing on human subjects and torturing countless human clones to death all for the sake of their Cleansed Mud project, among others.

Mandy, likewise, was able to put aside her feelings and rationally decide that it was a good course of action, but she didn't like the thought of letting them go either. It felt disrespectful to her father's memory, and it made her visibly uncomfortable.

It was at this moment of uncertainty that Blake spoke up.

"I think it's a good idea."

Immediately, Levi and Mandy turned their heads to look at their brother. Now twenty-one years old, he was a young adult, not the immature kid from just a few years before. The death of his father and abrupt disappearance of his mother had traumatized him and forced him to grow up. There was an unmistakable darkness in his eyes, but also a gleam of light. He straddled the line between both states, vowing to become a valiant warrior like his father once was, and like King Arthur himself. At the same time, he struggled with the pain of losing his parents before he had even become an adult. No child could endure something like that without suffering mental scars...

"You do?" Levi probed, testing his brother's conviction.

"I do." Blake said. "Aren't you guys sick of it all? This constant fighting? These endless wars? Our dad died because Jason killed him. Jason killed him because dad attacked him. Dad attacked Jason because he was fucked up in the head. And he was fucked up in the head because of Gressil's torture! If you keep following the string of events, it's just one person treating another person like shit, over and over again, with no end in sight!"

Blake lifted his chin. "I want to put an end to the cycle of violence. I want to choose forgiveness. We can't stop the coming war. We can't just ask the Archangels to play nice. But we can forgive the Technopaths and set an example for them. We can show them that despite their crimes against humanity, we're willing to give them a pass, just this one time, provided they agree to change their ways."

The light flickered in Blake's eyes, momentarily replaced with a simmering darkness.

"And if they refuse to play along? If they repeat their past actions and return to their vile ways? There will be no further forgiveness. We'll execute them all, deservedly this time. This is fair. This is just."

Levi stared at the side of his younger brother's face. He was surprised by what he saw. Levi wasn't much of a high-minded idealist. He wasn't stupid, but he also wasn't much of a thinker. He liked to beat the shit out of other entities with his fists. That was the main reason why he thought becoming the 'Lord of Heroes' wasn't right. He didn't feel cut out for the job.

But in that moment, listening to Blake's words, Levi felt that maybe, in time, the Hall of Heroes would have a better Lord of Heroes. That time wasn't now; it couldn't be now. But in the future, when Blake was older and the Ancestors looked upon him more favorably, who could say? Maybe Levi would be able to pass off his duties and go back to his punching bags, free of the burden of leadership.

After mulling it over for a few moments, Levi turned back to Hammurabi and nodded. "Alright. Blake convinced me. Let's contact Unarin and inform him that we had all the Technopath researchers from Serris, and that we will be deploying them inside the Cube. Of course, we'll keep a relatively small number here inside the Hall of Heroes, if only to support our own needs for high technology."

For the first time, Psymin Miralax spoke. As always, her words were slow, halting, and robotic.

"I will not stay. I will go. The Cube. Along with the others. Celestial Designer. My knowledge. Put to better use."

Levi felt a little hesitant about that, but he decided to relent. "...Very well. Assuming all goes well and the Phoenix successfully transplants Sharmur and maybe Pixiv inside the Cube, I'll initiate transportation between the Hall of Heroes and the Cube."

He turned to Jepthath. "Great Illuminator. Please begin informing Unarin of our intentions. Let him know what we've discussed here, and relay his words back to us. Mandy, spin up the teleportation platform to send one of the Legionnaires over to Volgarius. We need to get this done as quickly as possible."

"That is inadvisable." Jepthath quickly interrupted. "We must not take any chances of Raphael learning that we have a Celestial Designer and several million high ranking Technopaths at our disposal. We should use a slightly slower but safer method of communication with the First Founder."

"What method?" Mandy asked.

"Leave the details to me." Jepthath said. "I will contact a third party and have them transmit the relevant information to Unarin in a way Archangel Raphael cannot possibly intercept. If we teleport a Legionnaire to Volgarius directly, we may inadvertently reveal knowledge of our intentions, assuming Raphael has a way to spy on the Volgrim Founders."

This was a logical decision. After all, Jason had spied on the Volgrim with his Spynet, and Hope had done so as well, albeit a bit less effectively, due to his much more limited Wordsmithing abilities. For an old schemer like Raphael, spying on the Founders would be a smart thing to do. The only question was whether or not he had the capability, and that was something only he knew.

With this decision complete, the Ancestors finally departed, leaving the three siblings alone inside the meeting room. Well, mostly alone, except Psymin also stayed behind.

The Celestial Designer casually walked over to Blake. She scanned him with her irises, directing the same deadpan stare at him that she always used.

"Your words. Created a wave. My appreciation. Limitless. You have a good heart. An old friend. You remind me of him. Passed away. Long ago."

Blake looked at Psymin in surprise. Despite her cold and harsh robotic tone, he had spent several years around her, and had gotten to know her decently well. She was not usually this chatty, and typically kept to herself.

"Well... I just think it's the right thing to do." Blake said after a moment of thought. "If nobody breaks the cycle of violence, then it will continue on and on, forever, without end. I just want to see an end to the Milky Way's constant wars, even if that's a childish dream."

Psymin glanced at Levi. Then her eyes lowered back to Blake, who was a little shorter than his dragon-blooded brother.

"Your words. Like Unarin." Psymin said slowly. "Young. But much wisdom. Pacified the Ancient Volgrim Leaders. Those were his methods. Similar sentiments."

Psymin turned her head to the side thoughtfully.

"Politics. Diplomacy. Scheming. Tricks. I am not adept. Creation. Building. Tinkering. I am adept. I enjoy. My body. Pained. My mind. Sharp. Every day. I am tortured. This metal body. Like barbed shackles. Still I persist. Because I must. Because it is my duty."

She returned her vision to the trio of siblings.

"I am glad. Many friends. I wish to see them again. I feared. Never would see again. My position. Lofty. Lonesome at the top. Few understand. Few can comprehend. Many look up to me. Few meet my gaze. Even fewer remain."

Blake's eyes softened. "You're... lonely?"

"My condition. Not severe. Not acute." Psymin said. "The pain. Always there. Faint. Unmistakable. My age. Ancient. My friends. Once numerous. Now barely countable. Most dead."

Her tone conveyed no emotion, but her words certainly did. Levi and Mandy both gazed at Psymin in a new light. She might seem like an unfeeling robot, but it was clear that in spite of her roboticization, there was still a thinking, feeling entity hidden deep within. Unable to emote anymore. Unable to express her sorrow. Someone whose inner self had been slowly stripped away over millions of years until she had been literally turned into a shell of a Sentient.

Psymin had silently been dealing with the pain of wondering whether the few people she considered her friends, those who had been working on Serris, would be trapped in stasis forever. Now, thanks to Blake's plea for mercy, they were going to be released.

She was unable to properly express how happy this development made her feel. But Blake understood. Levi understood. And so did Mandy.

After all, they were human. They could easily empathize.

Blake swallowed heavily. He lowered his eyes.

"I'm... sorry my father put your friends in stasis. If I had known how badly it was making you feel, I'd have pushed to release them sooner."

"No." Psymin said. "Apology unnecessary. The timing. Not right. The timing now. Right. Allies before. Unlikely. Allies now. Possible. What I wish to see. You have made happen. I am thankful."

For some reason, Blake started to tear up. Despite her monotone voice, despite her lack of any emotional body language, Blake still felt deep pangs of sympathy welling up within himself. He took a step toward Psymin, uncertain. Then, purely on instinct, he walked toward her and outstretched his arms.

"If... if you want..." Blake said carefully. "I'd like to be your friend, Psymin. I also... really feel... like hugging you right now. But uh, that's probably, uh, weird to you. Never mind."

He started to lower his arms. But before he could fully lower them, Psymin looked directly into his eyes. Her robotic pupils whirred and clicked.

After the briefest of instants, Psymin also stepped toward him. She clumsily lifted her own arms, and took him into her embrace. Mandy and Levi's jaws fell slightly agape as they observed this interaction.

For some reason, they almost felt as if... Blake had just adopted a dog? It wasn't exactly the right feeling, but even despite Psymin's clumsy and robotic movements, it was still incredibly sweet the way Blake and her hugged one another.

The two of them were roughly the same height. They fit into each other's arms perfectly, though to Blake, it felt as if he were hugging a refrigerator. He stifled a sob and a giggle at that absurd thought, then lightly patted Psymin's hardened alloy backside.

The two hugged for several long seconds before pulling apart. Blake quickly wiped his eyes and smiled at Psymin, but her expression remained the same.

He didn't resent her for not showing emotion. If anything, it only made him feel worse. He could feel the sincerity in her movements from that single hug. He swore he could sense her loneliness and desolation.

Blake was young, even by human standards. He could not fathom Psymin's age, or what she had gone through over millions of years of life. She was around the same age as Unarin and Dosena, and had existed during those ancient Great Wars, along with many other Volgrim.

He truly felt it was a shame. Why had she slowly lost her sentient traits? Her love and compassion? Her emotions? Why had she, when Unarin and the other Founders had not? What had forced her to adopt this cold, mechanical shell of a body?

He wanted to ask, but deemed the questions inappropriate, and wisely chose to save them for a later time, when the two were closer than they were now.

"I'm glad to be your friend, Psymin." Blake said, smiling while rubbing the tears out of his eyes in embarrassment. "Sorry for getting all emotional."

"No. Your emotions are fine." Psymin said. "I am unable. You must express. In my absence. Of course. Our current friendship. Shallow. But over time. Deepen?"

"Yeah! Definitely." Blake said, smiling at her even more brightly while looking back at his brother and sister. "What are you two waiting for? I'm sure she'd love to have you guys as friends too!"

Levi chuckled. He wasn't the emotional type, but even he felt touched by Blake's earnest attitude. As for Mandy, she thought this new development was an unexpected but welcome surprise. She and Levi walked over and gave Psymin a hug as well.

The relationship between Hope's children and one of the last Celestial Designers had deepened considerably. Only time would tell how well their friendship would flourish.

Naturally, they were not Psymin's 'equal' in most ways, but they had wordlessly agreed to treat her as one, not looking up to or down at her. They would not treat her as an unknowable ancient entity, unfeeling and uncaring, but as a person with thoughts and feelings who needed emotional support even when it seemed she was perfectly fine.

Like this, a subtle but important change occurred inside the Hall of Heroes. It was one nobody in the outside world knew of, and few would understand the significance of...

Part 721: Second Chances

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Inside the Hall of Heroes.

A few weeks passed after Levi's commencement ceremony. Things returned to normal, relatively speaking, except now Blake found himself spending more time with Psymin Miralax than he ever had in the past.

It wasn't constant. Maybe an hour every day or so. But they talked about various things. He learned a little more about her, and she learned a little more about him. One thing remained constant though; Psymin never went into any great detail about her ancient history. She didn't discuss the Great Wars of the Volgrim's past eras, and she didn't discuss what life was like for her in her youth.

Mainly, they talked about their passions. Psymin deeply enjoyed creating technology, to the point it seemed if she ever lost her ability to do so, she would probably end her own life. Blake wasn't much of a tech guy, but he knew a bit and wanted to at least try and learn to connect more deeply with Psymin. He found that using his light and dark magic, he could even summon crude technological devices, so long as they were extremely simple. They would only maintain cohesion so long as he focused, and would disappear afterward.

Sometimes, Blake wished he could upgrade his brain so he could learn more things and think better. Then he would be able to relate to Psymin better, and use his powers more adeptly.

It was on a random Wednesday in the Hall of Heroes when Blake found himself sitting in the central garden. He wasn't doing much. Merely staring at a pond full of fish, watching them as they swam, lost in nostalgic memories of his childhood.

That was when someone spoke, interrupting his thoughts and shaking him from his stupor.

"Lad. What's on your mind?"

Blake blinked. He lifted his gaze and looked to the left, where he saw Arthur sitting down on a rock not far from him. Arthur wore a comfortable white shirt with brown pants and some simple sandals. He didn't look much like a Hero King, but he still had the bearing of a mystical powerhouse.

"Oh. Hi, Arthur." Blake said, faintly smiling. "Not much. I was just thinking... about my mom and dad."

His smile lacked any warmth. It was merely for appearances, and even by that standard, it seemed quite hollow.

"Solomon too." Blake added after a moment. "And Jeremiah. We've lost a lot of people. I... don't know how to deal with it all. It hurts to think about."

Arthur nodded. His eyes lowered to the grassy, flower-covered ground.

"When Sentients die, if their souls are are somehow captured, they can revive one more time. Sometimes as an undead, sometimes as a heroic phantasm, or perhaps by using the methods the Volgrim do. But if their souls aren't captured at all, they go to the great Beyond, where they pass through the membrane of reality and can never be recovered. It is the final resting place for all souls. And if they revive once, they can never revive again."

A strand of grass found its way into Blake's grasp. He casually wound it around his finger, then unwound it, then rewound it again.

"So we can't bring Solomon or Jeremiah back?" Blake asked.

"No." Arthur said simply. "And their fates were... worse than simply dying. Like humans who ended up devoured by demons, they did not pass on to the Great Beyond. They were completely shattered and... consumed by your father."

"I'm sorry." Blake said quietly.

"Don't be. I don't blame you for your father's actions. Neither do any of the other Heroes. Your father went mad. His actions were a sin of the highest order. I don't know what broke his mind and made him go to such lengths, but if I must blame anyone, then I blame myself. I control the power of the strongest artifact. I could have rebelled and perhaps prevented Solomon and Jeremiah's deaths. But I didn't..."

Arthur leaned forward. He rested his elbows on his knees and clasped his hands together while heavily bowing his head. He didn't look at Blake at all.

"I should have seen it coming." Arthur repeated. "But I didn't. I never do. Not in life, nor in death. That is why I am the Greatest Sinner."

"That's... an unfortunate title." Blake said, looking at the side profile of Arthur's face. "You don't need to demean yourself like that."

"Oh, but I do." Arthur said, chuckling derisively. "My sins are too many to count. Did I ever tell you the manner in which I died?"

Arthur lifted his head slightly to glance at Blake's eyes. The young man slowly shook his head in response.

"No..."

"Then I'll spare you the details." Arthur said softly, looking back down at the ground in shame. "But, in summary... the demons assassinated someone close to me. Someone precious who I loved from the bottom of my heart. I... I went insane with rage. My vision turned red, and I immediately took off without thinking."

Arthur paused. His voice became a little raspy.

"I attacked... attacked a city to the west of Camelot. My advisors had told me a few weeks prior that the town was sympathetic to the demons and they suspected multiple Emperors were being harbored there in secret. Blind with rage, I used the full power of Excalibur and annihilated the entire area. I destroyed everything. Everyone. I smashed buildings to pieces. Cut women and children apart like I was a butcher. Slaughtered fathers and brothers, mothers and daughters. I unleashed my divine magic, thinking I was seeing demonic possession in the eyes of everyone around me. By the time I had finished, three hundred thousand were eradicated from the face of the Earth."

Arthur chuckled bitterly. "And that wasn't even the worst part. It turned out the demons had deceived me. Those intelligence reports were planted by a bad actor. The city was fiercely loyal to my cause. The demons had tricked me into killing my own subjects!"

Blake's expression fell. He had never heard this part of history before, and he imagined in his head how horrified and devastated he would have felt if he had done such a thing himself.

"How could I go on after what I had done?" Arthur asked, his question wistful and without answers. "So I sought my own destruction. I looked for a certain individual who I knew would be powerful enough to kill me, but would not be a demon. To say there weren't many of them that existed would be an understatement."

Arthur lifted his head and met Blake's gaze. His grim smile hurt to look at.

"That person was... your mother. Amelia Greyheart. More specifically, the original Amelia. Your mother's true name was Annette, and her 'Amelia' identity was implanted by your father at her request. Anyway. I fought her for a long time, and the Black Witch eventually killed me. I asked her to devour me, take over my essence, and turn me into a weapon against the demons. But... haha. She defied my request, even in death."

"The next thing I knew, I woke up inside Excalibur, and fifteen years had passed." Arthur said, his tone mirthless. "I only learned some years ago that Amelia Greyheart had devoured my body, but not my soul. She deliberately let me go. That much I'm confident of."

"I never knew any of this." Blake said quietly.

"I don't talk about the past much." Arthur replied. He shrugged. "There's no point. It all happened 100,000 years ago. These days, I just seek to impart what little meaningless words of 'wisdom' I can to the new generations. Not that there's much of that to go around. A sinner like me is better off keeping his mouth shut."

Arthur chuckled. "The other Heroes hate your father for what he did to Solomon and Jeremiah. But what do you think, Blake? Do you think his sin is worse than mine? What's worse? Depriving humanity of two dead ghosts, or exterminating hundreds of thousands of living, breathing brothers and sisters? I think the answer is clear."

"They're both bad." Blake said, his tone firmer than even he expected. "Taking a life is bad, no matter what. I believe that sometimes it's necessary. I would never rejoice over doing such a thing. Taking pleasure in death is the real sin. If you feel regret, if you vow never to do it again, and if you work to uplift others in the future, I believe you can redeem yourself."

"Redeem myself?" Arthur questioned. "What value is there in that? I don't deserve redemption. No amount of good I do will ever bring those innocents back."

Blake frowned. He sat up a little straighter. "You're right, Arthur. You can't bring them back. What you did, and what my father did, were objectively acts of evil. Whether you were deceived, or whether you wanted to kill that city full of people probably seems irrelevant, because they still ended up dead."

Blake continued. "But intent does matter. Dad told me that back on Ancient Earth, they had 'courts' that punished people based on their intent. Accidentally killing someone isn't the same thing as killing someone in a fit of rage, and that isn't the same as premeditated murder. So even if 'dead is dead' is true, the circumstances leading up to the deaths matter."

"And here's the most important thing." Blake concluded. "As long as you're alive, or, well, half alive I suppose, you can change who you are and perform positive actions. Saving 300,000 lives won't undo the lives you ended, and neither will saving a million or a billion lives. But that doesn't mean it doesn't matter! Redemption isn't necessarily about absolving you of your past sins. It's about taking something bad and using it to do good. Just look at Beelzebub! If you think you're a sinner, then what is he?! That bastard killed a million humans, and now he's on our side, doing everything he can to right his past wrongs."

Blake leaned forward. "Are you going to honestly tell me you're a worse sinner than Beelzebub?"

Arthur listened to Blake's words. He stared off into the distance for a long while, thinking and mulling over what the kid had said.

"When did you... become so smart?" Arthur eventually asked.

"I'm not smart at all." Blake retorted, leaning back again. "I just think everyone deserves a second chance. That's why I want those Volgrim to go free. That's why I want you and Beelzebub to forgive yourselves. And my dad... if he were here."

The young man's expression became solemn. Arthur sensed the depression in Blake's eyes, but he didn't know how to alleviate his pain.

"...Arthur?" Blake said, his voice quiet. "Is my dad... really gone? He was a Hero, right? Couldn't he revive inside an artifact like you and the other Heroes?"

"Under normal circumstances, I would say yes." Arthur answered. "But... the Lazarus Tower retrieved human souls, and when it was destroyed, your father's soul would have been destroyed as well."

"But that's not right!" Blake exclaimed. "Uncle Jason would have ended up inside the tower too, but he revived despite the tower's destruction!"

"Jason's circumstances were... different." Arthur said, his tone gentle. "It was the Phoenix that brought him back because of her link to him. Your father had no such link."

"Dad once told me that Heroes could revive inside artifacts." Blake doggedly repeated. "Right? So, wouldn't my dad's artifact have a higher... priority? A higher priority than the Tower? Or maybe if the Tower was blown up, he would go to his artifact afterward instead of the Great Beyond?"

"That might be true if your father had an artifact specially designed for him, such as by Archangel Camael." Arthur said. "Did he?"

"...No." Blake replied, his voice becoming quiet. He lowered his gaze, and tears welled up in his eyes. "But... but I thought... Heroes always attached themselves to their most treasured..."

"Heroes can attach themselves to any object when they die, even something as mundane as a spoon." Arthur said. "But the Tower has a stronger 'attraction force' than a mundane item like that. It would have to be a truly special artifact to have a greater pull than the tower. And besides... if your father had revived, we would have known by now. Think of how much time has passed."

Blake felt worse and worse every second. The more they continued on this line of dialogue, the more he wished he hadn't brought it up. The situation was truly unfixable.

"Dad was so powerful though." Blake mumbled, completely disheartened. "It's only been a few days in Realspace. Just because years have passed inside the Hall, that doesn't mean anything!"

"The revival times for Heroes do vary." Arthur admitted. "Stronger Heroes take longer to revive. Weaker ones often revive immediately within an artifact. If a strong Hero expends much of their energy before dying, or if they die in a manner most brutal, the time needed to revive can be lengthened greatly."

"It took you fifteen years to revive." Blake pointed out. "My dad was a pretty powerful Hero, right? And he fought a huge battle with Uncle Jason. So... isn't it possible he could...?"

Arthur sighed. He didn't want to disappoint the young man, but neither did he want to stomp on his feelings.

"It's... possible." Arthur reluctantly said. "But it's a far shot at best. It would only be possible if your father had deliberately or accidentally tied his Existence to a powerful enough artifact that it would have overridden the Tower's soul-saving function."

Arthur looked at Blake meaningfully. "Think carefully. Did your father have anything like that? An item he treasured deeply?"

Blake fell silent. He thought for a long time, but eventually...

"...Excalibur?" Blake asked. "He carried it around a lot."

"Excalibur is my artifact. I still reside within it." Arthur said pointedly. "Heroes who die cannot end up inside the artifact of another Hero."

"Wait!" Blake exclaimed. "What about Solomon's Crown? I mean, since Solomon died, it's available right? And, um... my father... well, he did wear it a lot. Plus, Solomon was..."

Blake trailed off. He didn't want to say it out loud, but in his heart, he wondered if devouring Solomon might have attached his father to the Crown.

"That possibility is... unlikely." Arthur said, shaking his head. "Even if a Hero's remnant soul perishes from an artifact, other Heroes have never ended up inside one."

"But you don't know that for sure." Blake pointed out. "Just because it hasn't happened in the past doesn't mean it can't happen in the future!"

Arthur shook his head. At this point, the boy was grasping for straws. There was no way to get through to him with logic.

"I am truly sorry, Blake." Arthur said. "Your father and your mother... it is not something any child should have to endure. I wish every day that they would come back for your sake, but increasingly..."

Blake's shoulders slumped in defeat. His expression became haggard. "I just don't get it. My dad was one thing, but my mom too? Why her? We don't even know what happened. She was here, and then she... wasn't. It's like she just disappeared into thin air. Did a secret assassin sneak into the Hall of Heroes? If so, why target her? Why her?? If she teleported out, why wasn't there a record? Like, just... why?!"

"I wish I had the answers." Arthur said. The Hero-King got up and walked over, taking a seat beside Blake. He wrapped his arm around Blake's back and squeezed his far shoulder to try and comfort him. "This universe is a terrible one. Awful things happen every day. Murder, rape, torture, you name it. Our enemies are everywhere, always looking to do harm unto us. And then, sometimes, it isn't even an enemy that brings forth pain, but the random chaos of the universe itself. A 'random act of god', they call it. As if God were the sort to do such a thing. I don't know. Maybe he is."

"I'm sure Moses and Aaron would have choice words if they heard you saying such blasphemy." Blake muttered, barely managing a joke. He tried to lighten the mood, but his heart was as heavy as an anvil. "I'm sorry I'm such a downer, Arthur. I wish I could be strong like Levi."

"You are strong." Arthur reassured him. "You have a kind heart, but also a decisive one. Few young men your age could elucidate their philosophies so convincingly. You know, Jason wanted to bring about peace and forgiveness too, but he was much softer than you. Too soft. That's why his actions kept backfiring. He lacked a spine. He didn't draw lines in the sand, and his enemies walked all over him. You, on the other hand, clearly want to give the Volgrim a second chance, but only a second chance. Jason would never have stipulated that failing him a second time would result in their extermination, because he lacked the conviction you possess now. In my eyes, you're already a fine Hero compared to the Wordsmith in his youth."

"Uncle Jason did change his views later on." Blake pointed out.

"Certainly, but by then, it was too late." Arthur gently retorted. "The damage had already been done. Lives were lost that could never be recovered."

That gave Blake something to think about. He thoughtfully looked off into the distance, where he saw some birds frolicking in a pond, splashing water on their wings to clean themselves.

Blake was still young. 21 years old technically made him an adult, but he was uncertain about who he was, who he wanted to be, and what he could achieve. That uncertainty held him back and made him cautious, fearing that he might make a mistake that could hurt other people.

He was young, but he also possessed metaphysical powers that made him feel as if a great responsibility hung upon his shoulders.

"Hey, Arthur?" Blake said.

"What is it?" Arthur asked.

Blake paused.

"I want... to go back to Realspace. I want to help people out. I feel like I've trained enough with my powers, and I want to use them to do good. Do you think that would be okay?"

Arthur chuckled. "You're a man now. You don't need my permission. When I was your age, I had already ascended to the throne of Camelot five years earlier. As far as I'm concerned, you are plenty ready to be making your own decisions. Just talk to Levi and let him know what you're planning to do."

Blake smiled sheepishly. "Yeah... that's a good point. I'll do that then."

"But," Arthur interjected, "while you may think you've mastered your powers, I believe you still have a lot to learn. It's been a few months since we trained together. What do you say about joining me in the Queenie? I have a new technique I'd like to teach you."

"Sure thing!" Blake said, cheering up noticeably. "I'm gonna go eat first. Let's meet there in an hour?"

"I'll be waiting." Arthur vowed.

Blake got up from the rock, then strolled out of the central park toward the food hall. As he walked, he thought about what Arthur had told him.

"You know what?" Blake said to himself. "I should put on Solomon's Crown. I want to learn more. I don't have to head to Realspace just yet. I bet if I do some practicing while wearing the Crown, I'll be able to expand my mind. Maybe I can finally increase my Mind's Eye and create more realistic projections. I might also be able to make myself smart enough I can properly hold a conversation with Psymin. That would be fun!"

Blake sometimes talked to himself. That's just how he was. Talking to himself out loud wasn't intentional, and he often cringed when he realized he'd just spoken in front of someone else. They always gave him a weird look, and it made him want to crawl into a hole and die.

"Oh well. Everyone has their quirks." Blake muttered.

As Blake headed down one of the Hall of Heroes' many brightly lit corridors, he suddenly flinched and paused mid-step, then took a step backward.

"Who's there?" Blake asked.

For the briefest of instants, he thought he saw a shadowy figure hiding in the hallway up ahead. But, like a trick of the light, it vanished, unseen.

"Hello?" Blake asked. "Is anyone there?"

He narrowed his eyes. Reaching out with his powers, he sensed the area around him. He didn't detect anything... or anyone. But that only made him more suspicious.

Blake started walking again. He rounded the corner, but he didn't see any other shadows sneaking in the distance up ahead.

"Must be seeing things..." Blake said, his eye twitching.

Part 722: Vulpanix's Will

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Volgarius.

To an outside observer, Volgarius might seem as if it had not changed much. Certainly, Mephisto had wreaked havoc, but 99% of the surface area was perfectly intact. Even if tens of billions of Volgrim had died, it was a tiny fraction of the population.

But the truth was, the loss of 95% of all Psions, including 99.99% of the military-level Psions, meant the Volgrim had been dealt a crippling blow. Psions were more than mere grunts to be disposed of in endless wars. They were efficient in all manner of construction-related tasks. They were researchers who studied worlds non-Psions could not traverse without special suits, armor, or vehicles. They were philosophers who pondered Truths of the universe. They were also spies who could infiltrate countless other lesser species, and who could keep an eye on the galaxy at large.

They even served as early warning systems in the event of hostile incursions from other galaxies...

Thus, the deaths of hundreds of trillions of Psions was a loss beyond belief. In order to create a single 9th Level Psion, one who ultimately killed herself, 99.9999% of all the energy each Psion could harness had evaporated into the nether.

Mephisto's onslaught had ultimately collapsed more than 74,000 stratoscrapers. What would have taken a few hundred 6th Level Psions to stop, or perhaps a handful of 7th Level Psions, had instead taken hundreds of thousands of 3rd and 4th Level Psions to prevent a runaway collapse of the entire stratoscraper network. These Psions, powerful compared to Demon Dukes and Emperors, were simply too weak to hold up and reinforce even a single stratoscraper by themselves. Each one weighed a billion tons and towered miles into the sky. They were named stratoscrapers explicitly because they 'scraped' Volgarius's lower atmosphere!

Across the entire Volgrim Empire, there were fewer than ten 'elite' Psions in the 7th Level who remained among the living. All of them, except for one, had been located off-world when Demila slaughtered the worlds of Naandril I, Naandril II, and Naandril III. That single elite Psion was Confessor Vulpanix.

Thanks to her intervention, the crisis had barely been stabilized, and the further collapse of stratoscrapers had finally ended. But her body was still not fully recovered from when Hope Hiro had killed her. She was quite weak, and possessed nowhere close to the strength a full-power 7th Level Psion should.

It was now, 21 galactic days after the Wordsmith's apparent death, that she finally found time to rest. Her emotions turbulent, Confessor Vulpanix took a shuttle to one of the many nearly-empty Psionic Enclaves scattered across Volgarius. Using a shuttle was, in and of itself, something shameful. Psions never rode on board spaceships unless it was part of a specific job or a combined-species ship where their specific talents were needed, such as surveillance ships meant to study mud-dweller worlds. Her body was so weak and wracked with fatigue that she simply could not levitate or fly at a reasonable speed to traverse Volgarius's airspace.

Thus, she didn't.

When she entered the Enclave, she was struck yet again with a dull, pulsating sense of grief. There were still millions of Psion bodies that lay dead inside the Enclave. It was impossible to quickly clean up trillions of corpses across all the Volgrim-controlled worlds, especially when the Technopaths were stretched thin still trying to rescue survivors trapped inside the rubble of the collapsed stratoscrapers.

Vulpanix looked left, and she looked right. No matter what rooms she scanned, there were bodies laying on the floors, fallen onto tables, or slumped in chairs. Demila's attack had been so quick and brutal that many Psions had no time to react before their lives were extinguished. In the history of the Volgrim Empire, those who could sneak attack a Psion and kill them in an instant were barely countable on one hand, yet Demila had done so on a scale that boggled the imagination.

Vulpanix staggered over to the only empty room she could find; a conference room that apparently had no business happening at the time the Psions had died. She sat inside a chair and collapsed forward onto the table, her mind and soul tired beyond description. Her eyes closed, and she felt fatigue swallowing her mind.

In all Vulpanix's cycles, never had she felt as drained as she did now. Her body twitched with electric pain. She felt similar to a human who had been forced to run a marathon for three weeks straight with barely any water or food, and no rest.

Every muscle hurt. Every thought was pain. Even opening her eyelids was taxing.

The only reason she had made it this far was the stubborn belief that no lesser Psions should see her struggling. It was a form of ego etched into her bones.

Vulpanix chuckled mirthlessly. She remembered that it had actually been Demila who chastised her, when she awoke after her First Death, for looking weak and frail in front of others.

Demila.

The villain herself.

[Did you know...? I always... loathed you.] Vulpanix thought, her words projecting outward to no-one in particular. [I wish... I had been the one... to kill you. You ruined everything. Your greed... pathetic. Worse than a... mud-dweller.]

Emotions struggled to express themselves within Vulpanix's heart. Psions were hardy creatures. Their entire species' structure raised and bred them to be practically immune to emotions. They never felt sad. They never felt depressed. They rarely expressed anger or happiness. Emotions ran contrary to everything their lofty existences stood for. It was only when they were young, immature, and inexperienced that a scant few expressed any sort of strong emotions. In order to progress their Seeds, they always learned to strip those feelings away.

But now, all alone, inside an Enclave with nobody around who could see her...

...Vulpanix wept.

Her chest silently heaved. The formerly proud, lofty Psion was stricken with a sense of crisis. Never had she felt so alone, so frail, and so pathetic as at that moment. The knowledge that former comrades she once admired, former leaders she looked up to and envied, former warriors she hungered to surpass... were all dead? It destroyed her.

She was the strongest Psion alive now. Not because she had earned it, but merely by default. Merely because there were no others still alive she could compare herself to in the hopes of surpassing them someday.

Furthermore, she was far, far from the strongest that had ever lived. Among the 7th Level Psions, she was indeed considered the mightiest of her generation. But she was a spring chicken compared to the Executors, and a grain of sand compared to the Second Founder.

The Second Founder...

Vulpanix choked down a sob. She tried to rein in her emotions, but she was so broken-hearted that doing so was now one of the hardest things she had ever done. In that moment, she didn't even have the strength to lift an arm and wipe away her tears. She simply laid her head on the table and wept.

An hour passed. Vulpanix sobbed as much as she needed to. She rebuilt her mental barriers and chastised herself for her moment of weakness. But ultimately, she excused her actions due to the extenuating circumstances. During times like these, she thought it was okay so long as nobody witnessed her pitiful display.

Eventually, she sat up in the chair and focused her mind. She closed her eyes and began to meditate.

The world became silent.

She focused on regaining her vital energy. She used her exhaustion as a way of breaking past her previous limits.

Psions were not like other Sentients. They cultivated diligently, pursuing the dao of their predecessors, seeking Truths, and learning to use their powers to push past the limits placed upon them by the universe.

Thus, when a Psion had completely exerted themselves, that was when they were most capable of breaking past their limits.

With her body, mind, soul, and Psionic Seed exhausted, cracks were showing across Vulpanix's being.

But her eyes shone with determination!!

[I see now. The path before me is finally clear!]

Wild fluctuations of energy began to circulate around Vulpanix. Her Psionic Seed trembled violently, the cracks on its surface becoming especially pronounced as she began to enter a higher state of being.

The energy inside her body thickened. Her skin began to glow. Slowly, a phantasmal, illusory figure began to appear.

[Child... child... so young... so young...]

Vulpanix's eyelids pressed down against her face. Her forehead creased as the pressure of an Ancient Psion, formidable beyond belief, spoke to her from the Psionic Well.

[Ancestor.] Vulpanix said, stretching out with her senses.

The world around her faded away, and she found herself standing inside an ancient temple, one that was illuminated with torches, shadows flickering all around the hall.

Vulpanix was now seated atop a throne in the center of the temple. When she opened her eyes, she saw before her a female Psion wearing rags that barely covered her body. Her skin was colored green. She was covered in blackened bruises. Scars lined her skin, and she looked so frail and gaunt that it seemed as if a stiff breeze would knock her over.

But her body... radiated the divine power of a 9th Level Psion!

She was a Supremator, like Founder Dosena!

Her weakness was not a facade. She was so powerful that she could kill Vulpanix with a flick of her finger, but at this moment, she was clearly at death's door.

Vulpanix's eyes widened. She noticed the throne she was sitting upon, and hurriedly stood up, feeling too ashamed to be sitting in such a lofty position. She jumped away from it as if it were poisonous, then dropped to one knee and bowed her head reverentially toward the haggard figure before her.

[Supremator Lanuris.] Vulpanix said, quickly addressing the superior Psion she had immediately recognized. [Many times I have gazed upon your image, wishing I could meet you. This is... an honor. Words fail me.]

[Rise, child.] Supremator Lanuris said, waving her hand to lift Vulpanix to her feet. [I am nothing now. A shadow... of myself. Do not revere me. Do not envy me.]

Vulpanix's heart surged with emotion. Despite the sad image of a fallen Supremator standing before her, Vulpanix felt nothing but admiration and awe. Any Psion would. They all longed to rise to such lofty heights someday, even if the likelihood were essentially nonexistent.

[My child.] Lanuris said slowly. [You have witnessed many distressing things. I see through your worries. You fear that the end of the Volgrim Empire is nigh. You doubt your ability to protect its people.]

Vulpanix's eyes became slightly moist as she struggled to hold back tears again. [I am ashamed. My weakness is apparent at a glance.]

[Long has it been since I spoke to an Inheritor.] Lanuris replied, her eyes blinking ever so deliberately. [I have considered few worthy. The last one I spoke to was the one named…]

She fell silent for a long moment, then looked away, struggling to remember a name.

[…Nufaris. Yes. I remember now. I sensed in him the same potential I sense in you. A determination to surpass everyone else. A belief in his abilities that transcended common sense.]

The ancient Psion casually waved her hand in an outward arc. [Dispel any reverence you may have toward me. I am not worth admiring, child. Compared to you, I am truly nothing at all.]

[How can you say such words, Supremator?] Vulpanix asked in disbelief. [If it were not for the efforts of ancient ones such as yourself, our species would have fallen to the Sentinels. I am honored to be in your presence.]

A long minute followed. Lanuris gazed at Vulpanix with eyes that seemed to pierce the fabric of reality.

[So.] Lanuris said softly, lowering her eyes. [That is the history She teaches you. It is a kindness the likes of us do not deserve.]

Vulpanix blinked. She cocked her head. [Supremator?]

[What remains of me is little more than a minute, fragmented soul.] Lanuris said, her tone halting and pained. [The era I lived in was a bloody one, marked by Psion infighting. We were a brutal species. We killed, and killed, and killed some more. Everything we did was for our own selfish benefit. Among my fellow Supremators, I was among the worst of them.]

She shook her head.

[You have not been taught the Truths of those ancient times. Perhaps that is for the best. Since you have appeared before me, it is likely due to Her will. She wishes for me to bestow a Comprehension upon you, one that will allow you to become a pillar of our species.]

Vulpanix's expression flickered. [Are you referring to… the Second Founder?]

[Indeed. Supremator Dosena is the greatest Psion who has ever lived.] Lanuris answered, but her tone was notably bitter and slightly tinged with resentment and awe.

[Even though she killed me, I could not utter a word of complaint. She had the right to do so. I lived and died by the philosophy she weaponized against me... as did all the other Supremators.]

By now, Vulpanix's look of awe had visibly faded. She was growing more confused by the minute.

[Supremator Lanuris, are you saying that Founder Dosena controls the Psionic Well?]

[Of course.] Lanuris answered without hesitation. [She chooses who rises and who falls. She judges all Psions. Did you believe that the Psionic Well had existed since time immemorial? Silly child. It was Founder Dosena who created the Well, in order to create a new paradigm for all future Psions to follow.]

Vulpanix's pupils shrunk to pinpricks. This was something she had never heard in all her cycles alive! She was shocked beyond comprehension! Beyond belief!

[She... created the Well?! She killed the other Supremators? What- why? How?!]

[That is not for me to say.] Lanuris answered quietly. [Since she has chosen for you to speak to me in this time of the Empire's greatest need, she has also chosen to inform you of its greatest secrets. After we are done, you must go to see her, child.]

The Supremator blinked her eyes heavily. She seemed more tired than when she had first appeared.

[My child. I am truly proud to see what the Psions have become under Dosena. Unfortunately, the mass-casualty event brought about by the greed of Creator Demila is beyond description. It is entirely possible that the Second Founder has lost faith in herself. In my heyday, she was the Psion I looked up to and feared the most. Her willpower was so terrifying that nothing could stop her. Not even the machinations of enemies too strong for her to ever defeat. Not even the limitations of her own biology...]

Lanuris sighed.

[Dosena believed that the Psions would become stronger if they ceased their constant infighting. Our unending conflict was not something a child like you could fathom. Entire worlds were left scorched in the wake of our civil wars. During the eon since the ending of the Great Wars, it has been my pleasure to witness the complete cessation of inter-Psion conflicts. But, looking back, I do now wonder if Dosena's forceful alteration of the natural order was perhaps... overzealous.]

After a moment, Lanuris shook her head. [Never mind the ramblings of a long-dead relic. It is not my place to judge the Second Founder. Even if she erred, her intentions were noble, and her character upright. More importantly, this is your ascension. I am running out of time to bequeath you the Comprehension you have rightfully earned.]

Vulpanix straightened her posture. She listened intently as Lanuris waved her wand and began to conjure a projection of energy before herself.

[You are a Temporal Manipulator. I am not. My Comprehensions in Temporal Mechanics are minimal at best. But when I was still alive, I was considered the foremost authority on Biological Manipulation.]

[Biological Manipulation?] Vulpanix asked.

She continued. [My discipline of Psionics is the bane of Body Enhancers. Biological Manipulation allows one to tear through even the most fortified bodies known to Volgrim by uncovering the tiniest biological weaknesses and striking them with one's full force. At the same time, if you master it to a level comparable to myself, you will gain the ability to strengthen and mutate your form through focused intent.]

Lanuris smirked. [Child, look upon my visage. Do I seem weak and frail to you? My appearance is a deception. When I was alive, my body was stronger than any Body Enhancer, even the mightiest ones you no doubt have read about in the historical ledgers. Body Enhancing is a simple and brutish way of simply empowering one's cells with raw psionic energy to enhance their physical power. But Biological Manipulation? It is a curated and focused effort to carefully enhance every facet of one's being.]

Suddenly, Lanuris moved. She rushed at Vulpanix, startling her when four arms erupted from Lanuris's back. Lanuris grabbed Vulpanix and smashed her into the ground, dragging her backward before lifting her up and slamming her back into a sitting position on the golden throne.

Vulpanix's eyes trembled with shock. This was merely the faintest wisp of Lanuris's ancient soul, but she still wielded such frightening power!

Just as quickly as Lanuris attacked, she released her grip on Vulpanix and let her go. Lanuris retracted her arms, and they seamlessly melted into her back as if they had never existed.

[Biological Manipulation is a powerful combat art. But more than that, it is a science and a discipline. If you are willing to learn, I will impart my Comprehensions upon you. But it will be up to you to progress past the minimum of my teachings.]

Vulpanix's heart beat faster after witnessing the striking power of her superior. She climbed out of the throne and dropped to one knee.

[Supremator. I am honored by your acknowledgment. I will do everything in my power to revive your ancient Psionic discipline. Please teach me...]

[Very well. Listen carefully, for my time here is limited.] Lanuris said sagely, her eyes glowing as she began to recite her Mantra.

An unknown amount of time passed. Vulpanix sat cross-legged in front of her new mentor, listening intently as Lanuris's voice began to grow fainter and fainter.

[Thus, it is only by focusing your mind that you will be able to look deeper and deeper into the gaps between atoms.] Lanuris said. Her voice was now growing so weak that it seemed she was on her last legs. [Alas. Our time has ended. This is all the knowledge I can pass on to you, child.]

[I offer my thanks, ancestor.] Vulpanix said, bowing her head respectfully. [I will contemplate your words until I have fully comprehended them.]

[You may be the last chance for our Empire to prevail, child.] Lanuris said, her eyelids growing heavy. [Once you have solidified your Seed, go to Dosena. She is waiting... for you. It is time... for you... to learn the Truths you must know... to support our people.]

Her body turned hazy. Then, like smoke in the wind, it vanished.

Vulpanix lifted her head. She stared at the spot where her ancestor had been sitting, then sighed.

[I will remember your words. Always.]

Moments later, her body erupted with power. Vulpanix roared to the heavens as her Psionic Seed exploded with violent force, then shattered and reformed!

A surge of energy shook Volgarius. All around the planet, countless lower Psions whirled to look in her direction. They gasped as they sensed the ascension of a new Executor.

[The Founders guide us! The Founders protect us! We have not been abandoned! All hail Executor Vulpanix!]

Vulpanis's eyes turned golden as she stood up within the Enclave. Her weakness was gone. Her body had healed, and she had fully acclimated her True Soul with its vessel.

Vulpanix stood up. She levitated into the air, then flickered upward, arriving in the stratosphere. Below her, countless lower Psions looked up with awe in their eyes. For the first time since Demila's rampage, they sensed the power of a High Psion protecting them from above.

[Hear me!] Vulpanis shouted, her voice projecting across the entire world of Volgarius. [I am Vulpanix! I am the only living Executor of our species! But I will NOT be the last! More will arise! Whether it takes ten cycles or ten million, more will Ascend! Our species will not go out with a whimper! We will stand tall and fight back against our dark fate!]

A surge of rage rushed through Vulpanix's veins. She shakily pointed a finger up to the sky.

[Do you hear me, Archangels?! DO YOU HEAR ME?! So long as I live, I will never bow to you! I will never admit defeat! I will fight even when the battle has ended! Even if my body is brought to ruin, the last scraps of my consciousness will defy you until nothing is left of me!]

[This is my will! This is my Seed! I promise to bring your machinations to ruin, foul usurpers!!]

All across Volgarius, Psions, Technopaths, and Changelings lifted their heads and cheered. They could not help it. Their hearts had fallen to the pits, and even if she was 'only' an Executor, she represented the faintest light of hope for their species.

Humans could cling to hope, and so too could the Volgrim.

Inside the Founder's Thumb, Unarin sighed. Then he chuckled.

"Well, that's going to make diplomacy a little harder. But then again, I suppose if my job were too easy, it wouldn't be any fun..."

The First Founder took a long sip of wine as he contemplated his future options...

Part 723: Becoming a Founder

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Volgarius.

Vulpanix's ascension was a major event, and the first light of hope the Volgrim had seen in a long time. Ever since the Plague first appeared, they had slowly begun losing the war. They recently lost 95% of their Psions. A huge black scar tore across the homeworld. The demons were growing stronger, and the Dolgrimites had played a card that left the rest of the Volgrim reeling.

But now, they had a new Executor. Perhaps, due to the crisis that had swallowed the Volgrim, they might even obtain another one after Vulpanix.

That was a matter for the future. As Vulpanix reveled in her ascension, she allowed herself a moment of joy. She wasn't one for such trite emotions, but achieving the peak of Psionic power outside of a Supremator was a privilege only a precious few had enjoyed over the eons. Vulpanix had not yet reached a Chron of age (100,000 cycles), but she had become the last pillar of the Psions. Septillions would come to rely on her.

The weight of this new crown was heavy indeed...

As Vulpanix levitated in the lower atmosphere, she sensed the approach of a small shuttlecraft. When it approached, a messenger Technopath on board sent a message to her.

"The Founders congratulate you on your ascension. When you are ready, please pay the First Founder a visit."

Vulpanix slowly blinked all of her eyes. [I am ready now.]

An instant later, Vulpanix vanished. Her body stepped across space and she traveled a tenth of the way around the planet. She flickered two more times, ultimately arriving above the Founder's Fingers.

For a brief moment, her emotions dulled. She was still coming to terms with the realization of what she had done, along with her new responsibilities. She did not allow her emotions to cloud her judgment, and summarily flickered downward, arriving on the landing platform for the Founder's Thumb.

Inside, she found a familiar face. Muuxunuu stepped outside and blinked her limpid blue eyes at the newest Executor.

"Executor Vulpanix. I am pleased to witness your ascension. Founder Unarin is awaiting your arrival inside his sanctum."

[Many thanks, Administrator Muuxunuu.] Vulpanix replied.

Muuxunuu led Vulpanix inside the Founder's Thumb. Eventually, they stopped at the entrance to Unarin's Sanctum, and Vulpanix entered.

After Muuxunuu pulled the great doors shut behind Vulpanix, the newest Executor lifted her head to look up at Unarin, who was now sitting across from Dosena at a small table. Vulpanix flickered upward and arrived before the two of them with her head bowed.

[Founders.] Vulpanix said solemnly.

"Congratulations on your ascension." Unarin said, looking at her for a moment with a smile playing upon his face. He returned his gaze to the table, where a primitive board game had been laid out, and he and Dosena were silently playing together. "Take a seat, young Executor."

Vulpanix opened her eyes and nodded. She pulled out a seat and sat down. Only now did she carefully examine the First and Second Founders.

Unarin seemed no different than he always was. Supremely confident, unbothered, unworried about anything in particular.

But Dosena was different. She was visibly dispirited. Not a lick of Psionic Energy radiated from her body. She seemed weaker than the lowliest of Initiators. If her majesty and appearance was not well-known to all Volgrim, Vulpanix might have assumed Unarin had taken pity on an urchin and invited her inside.

Dosena glanced at Vulpanix and nodded. Then she reached out to the board and placed a piece on it.

Vulpanix examined the game between the Founders. She was unfamiliar with it, and in fact had never seen it before. It was shaped like a square, and had dozens of lines criss-crossing horizontally and vertically to create an interwoven grid of squares. There were small circular white and black pieces placed all across it, forming a pattern Vulpanix couldn't immediately deduce.

"This is the game of Go." Unarin casually volunteered. "I've been looking through a lot of ancient record from the human's homeworld, Earth. The humans have an interesting saying... keep your friends close, and your enemies closer. Due to recent Truths revealed, I am growing uncertain of what exactly our relationship is evolving into."

Unarin looked up at Vulpanix. "What do you think, Executor? Are the humans our friends, or are they our enemies?"

Vulpanix did not immediately answer. It didn't take a genius to determine that Unarin was testing her. Any answer flippantly given would reveal something about her, so she was in no rush to speak.

Unarin returned his gaze to the board, and the table fell silent. For five long minutes, Vulpanix mulled the answer over.

[The humans are neither.] Vulpanix eventually replied. [They are a necessary evil we must endure. But if we look back at the ancient history, I believe that humanity could have become our closest allies or our worst enemies. The result merely depended on how we treated them.]

Unarin nodded, raising his eyebrows with a faint smile. "A good answer. Not perfect, but one that reveals wisdom beyond your years. You're right, Vulpanix. The humans could have become our greatest allies, had we only treated them better. Alas, we did not. And now, here we are, the Truth behind the Plague having finally reared its ugly head."

The First Founder chuckled. He seemed to find this new Plague business mentally stimulating to the point he seemed a madman. The walls were closing in around the Volgrim Empire, yet its First Founder was seemingly unbothered.

After a moment of silence, Unarin faintly bobbed his head in Dosena's direction. "Oh, by the way, please forgive the Second Founder. She has lost the ability to speak. Her Psionics have been completely sealed. If you wish to speak with her, you will have to interface directly with her mind."

Vulpanix's eyes widened. She looked at Dosena with shock. [I-interface directly? That is a breach of decorum I cannot possibly...]

She metaphorically swallowed her words when the Second Founder directed an apathetic look her way. It seemed Dosena did not care much for such matters.

Vulpanix bowed her head slightly. [I... understand. If that is your will, Second Founder.]

She hesitated a few moments longer. Touching directly on another Psion's mind and reading their thoughts was extremely offensive, and considered a slap across the face. Demila had done so to Vulpanix, and she still remembered the shame and helplessness she had felt when it happened. Then again, looking back, it seemed Demila's disgusting personality had revealed many warning signs her brothers and sisters had overlooked.

Eventually, Vulpanix relented. She hesitantly sent the weakest possible wisp of telepathic energy toward the Second Founder's mind, only for her link to crash against a damn-near impenetrable barrier she had not anticipated. Even though Dosena no longer wielded her Psionic power, her brain was still a fortress that no weak or casual telepathic strike could penetrate.

Vulpanix was not disappointed by this revelation. Instead, she was greatly relieved. She realized this indicated that Dosena had not fallen below the rank of Initiator, but simply had lost her Psionics for a while. How long that period of time entailed was anybody's guess, but eventually, Dosena would regain her strength.

Vulpanix narrowed her eyes. She increased the strength of her telepathic link, but even that fell far short of what she needed. She grunted and intensified her psionic link more, and more, and even more.

Despite being an Executor, she was having to put 75% of her full strength into establishing a mental link between herself and the Second Founder. All of this happened over the course of a mere thirty seconds while Unarin faintly smiled, understanding what was going on, and Dosena simply stared at the Go board, seemingly not even able to sense Vulpanix's telepathic intrusions.

Sweat began to drip down Vulpanix's face. Sweat! She couldn't believe that a powerless Psion had such resilient mental defenses. She readied herself to gather up every drop of her power to attempt one final push...

But at that moment, Unarin spoke up. "Alright, alright. You've made your point. Let her in."

Vulpanix glanced at Unarin. He was looking across the table at Dosena, who simply rolled her eyes.

All at once, the barrier blocking Vulpanix's mental intrusion vanished. She managed to penetrate into Dosena's mind, but even then, she was only able to touch upon the surface layer. She could only see the thoughts her superior wanted her to see.

[Your telepathic skill is an embarrassment to all Executors.] Dosena said, her tone mild. She could not project her words outward, but she was able to speak to Vulpanix now that she allowed her junior to read her surface thoughts. [In the future, you will work on improving this skill. It is a core ability for those who wish to ascend to Supremator, in addition to Primal Psionics.]

Vulpanix blinked. [Supremator? You believe I have the capability?]

Dosena snorted and tapped a finger on the Go board seemingly at random. [All Psions do. In the past, I prevented many from reaching my level. That was a deliberate choice. But after recent events, it seems I must relax those limitations greatly. This is not a decision I am pleased about, but it is a necessary evil.]

Unarin nodded. "A necessary evil, indeed."

Vulpanix started to say something else, but then she paused to look at the First Founder. [You... heard the Second Founder's words? But how? She is not able to project her thoughts outward.]

A tiny smirk appeared at the corner of Unarin's mouth. "Oh, Dosena and I have our own way of communicating. Pay it no mind. Continue with your conversation, as before."

Vulpanix remained suspicious, but matters between the Founders were not her business unless they directly informed her otherwise. Thus, she returned her attention to the Second Founder.

[Second Founder. When I Ascended, I spoke to Supremator Lanuris inside the Psionic Well.] Vulpanix said. [She told me our meeting was your doing.]

Dosena slowly blinked her eyes. She directed a measured gaze Vulpanix's way.

[It was.]

Vulpanix didn't know how to react to Dosena's simple admission. Her entire life, she and all other Psions had believed the Psionic Well was an independent entity, something that was governed by its own rules. For it to actually be controlled directly by the Second Founder was unthinkable. Such a possibility seemed so outrageous, she couldn't bring herself to believe it.

[Why did you want me to meet her?] Vulpanix asked quietly.

[Because you are our last Champion.] Dosena answered. [I am unable to wield any of my Psionic powers. The Empire no longer has a protector. A new one must arise. That new one is you.]

A moment of silence followed. Dosena lifted her chin to look down the bridge of her nose at her younger companion.

[Vulpanix. I called you here today to assess you. I have been quietly testing you in a variety of ways, and have found your mental state to be... satisfactory. You have met my criteria for an elite-]

"Someone's feeling humble." Unarin joked, causing both women to glance at him. "You really ought to stop placing yourself on such a pedastel, Dosena. Your ego is ridiculous, even by my standards."

Dosena glared at him, then returned her attention to Vulpanix. [As I was saying, you have met my criteria for an elite. Despite your screw-up against the Second Wordsmith, you have proven to be an outstanding seed. In only 95,000 cycles, you have risen to the level of Executor. I believe with certain Truths revealed, you will be able to rise to the rank of Supremator in record time and become our Empire's newest protector.]

Vulpanix cocked her head. She returned to a previous thought she was going to speak before it had been interrupted. [I do not understand. Millions of cycles have passed since the Great Wars. Not once has an Executor managed to rise to the level of Supremator. Is it really true that you prevented their ascensions deliberately?]

Dosena looked at Vulpanix evenly.

Vulpanix almost felt as if the room had chilled by a few degrees. She shifted in her seat, uncertain how to respond.

She didn't have to. Dosena continued speaking after a moment. [I placed a limit upon the Psionic Well. Unless I wish it, no Executor can rise to the 9th Level. However, I also made it so I could release the seal at any point. If I ever needed, I could have uplifted the Executors immediately. This is something I informed every Executor of, and which they were forced to accept. All of them, without fail, accepted this Truth.]

All at once, Vulpanix felt enlightened. As a 7th Level Psion, she had not been privy to the secrets known by Executors. She had heard rumors for years, even grumblings from certain Executors, but never did they elucidate their concerns enough for her to understand.

Now that she had become one herself, she finally understood. The Executors had known about the Psionic Well's limitations, but they did not have the power to unseat Dosena. They were at her mercy. She decided who would rise and who would fall. Naturally, this had enraged some, perhaps even all of the Executors, but what could they do? Dosena had killed other Supremators in the past. She was far too strong for even the united power of all the Executors to overcome...

[Why did you hold back our people from ascending?] Vulpanix asked, her expression turning from surprise, to dismay, to anger. [If the Executors had been Supremators, they could have held back Demila and saved countless lives during Mephisto's rampage! If we had an army of Supremators, we could have pushed back the Plague, and maybe have even won this war before it began!]

Hardly had the words left her mind before Vulpanix realized the answer. [Wait... were you afraid? Afraid the other Executors would rise up and unseat you from power? Were you fearful that you would lose control over all the Psions? Is that what this was all about? Pride and ego when our civilization's fate was at stake?!]

For the first time, Vulpanix talked back to her superior. She did not hide her anger, because she could not. She would not be being true to her Seed if she withheld her criticism, and furthermore, Dosena deserved that criticism! Her selfishness caused the deaths of trillions of Volgrim!

Dosena kept her cool. She was not offended by Vulpanix's righteous anger, nor her inflammatory words.

[The Truths you know are too shallow, Vulpanix. That is why I brought you here. From your limited viewpoint, my actions may seem to have been borne of ego, but I believe that once you understand the full context of the ancient Truths, you will not feel the same way as you do now.]

[So you deny that what you did was done because of ego?] Vulpanix challenged. [I do not know what 'Truths' you think will change my mind, but I must say I am truly disappointed! What could you possibly tell me that would allow me to accept the damage your decisions have caused?! Trillions have died! TRILLIONS! And if we start from the beginning of the Plague's arrival, SEPTILLIONS!]

Still, Dosena remained calm. [What if the Truths I intended to reveal would inform you of the ancient history our people have not even recorded in data crystals?]

Vulpanix paused. A spike of shock went through her heart.

[You mean to tell me… of the Great Wars?]

Unarin smirked. "Before the Great Wars. Before the Uprising. Even before… the Primordial Climb of our ancient ancestors."

The First Founder let his words percolate in the air for a moment.

"Long ago, before our people became the enlightened civilization you know today, we were a savage and barbaric race. We had many trappings of prestige, shiny structures to live within, and were slowly expanding across the galaxy. But in reality, we had been infested by a rot that went deeper than you could possibly imagine."

He continued. "What young ones like you, and even ones as old as Demila cannot possibly understand, is that the tribulations of the past informed the policy of today. We have maintained vague records of the ancient wars. We have kept our species informed regarding the broad strokes of those dark times. But we have deliberately gone out of our way to hide the most vile, shameful, and disgusting actions taken by our ancestors."

[Not because we were afraid the general populace would learn of these Truths,] Dosena said calmly, [but because knowing these Truths would almost certainly ignite small to medium-scale conflicts, weakening us when we needed to maintain strength in the face of our enemies.]

[But now it's too late.] Vulpanix said mildly. [We've all but lost this war.]

The two Founders looked at Vulpanix and shook their heads.

"The war is unending." Unarin said solemnly. "Whether we live or die, it will continue. Whether our Eternity ends and ten more pass, it will continue. Our goal is not to win the war, because the war cannot be won. We only intend to live according to our values and make known the name of the fearsome Volgrim. We will hold on as long as possible, and then, as with countless other civilizations before ours, we will vanish into the cosmic dust of history."

A smothering sensation enveloped Vulpanix's heart. She realized, in that moment, that she did not understand the goals of the Founders, and perhaps she never would. Their thoughts were so much loftier than hers that even when she tried to distill or dumb them down, she still overlooked all the nuances of their thoughts.

[If the war is not lost, but it also cannot be won, then what is the point of our struggle?] Vulpanix asked, feeling stupid for even speaking the words out loud. [Are we not struggling in vain?]

"What you're asking is truly a fundamental question of Life itself." Unarin answered. "What is Life? In my uneducated, simple-minded opinion, Life is the struggle of a species to rise up and dominate the other species around it. This can take the form of outbreeding other species, dominating them with military might, outcompeting them in science, and so on. But if I may, I must also posit that the point of Life, for the Volgrim, is to ascend above the other mud-dwelling rabble-rousers. We must become enlightened. We must not bully them. We must show strength, even if we are weak. We must be proud, but not arrogant. We must show respect to those worthy of our respect, but never contempt to anyone but the most contemptible."

Unarin waved his hand casually. "I'm rambling again. Never mind me. Let's get back to the main point of discussion. Dosena, would you like to enlighten her first, or should I?"

Dosena touched her chin. She looked up at the ceiling thoughtfully.

[I believe you should be the one to speak first, Unarin. My tale is most relevant after yours. Your words should prove to be the most enlightening, given you were the architect behind the downfall of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.]

The First Founder smiled.

"So be it then."

He reached over and touched a datapad. After a minute or two, the door to the Sanctum opened. Muuxunuu entered holding a small box. She walked up the steps to the second floor and handed the box to Unarin, bowed her head, and left. Unarin stared at her backside as he watched her depart.

"We lost so many valuable things in the ancient times." Unarin said wistfully. "So many people."

After Muuxunuu exited the Sanctum and shut the door, it took Unarin a few moments to collect himself. He opened up the small box to reveal a triangular datacore, along with three Remote Connection Nodes. He tossed one across the table, and Dosena caught it with a snap of her wrist. She took the tiny node and affixed it to the side of her head. Unarin did the same while handing the third one to Vulpanix.

"Put this on the same way Dosena and I have done. We will be using this device to share our knowledge of the ancient past with you, Vulpanix. From this point on, you will be considered a Founder-level figure in the Volgrim Empire. The secrets we are about to share must not be disclosed to anyone outside of the privileged few, no matter what. Are we clear?"

Vulpanix nodded and pressed the node to the side of her head.

[On my honor, I will not breathe a word of anything you are about to tell me to another figure.] She promised.

Unarin shrugged. "I wouldn't have brought you here if I didn't trust you. But it is good to hear confirmation directly."

He placed the triangular data core in the center of the table, then activated it, causing a blue light to emit from the core.

"Let us begin."

Part 724: The Ancient Volgrim Empire

Millions of cycles in the past, before the Great Wars, the Volgrim emerged from the primordial soup of their home world, Grimvolas, slowly evolving into four distinct subspecies.

The first to evolve were the Dolgrimites. They were the most primally attuned beasts who could devour other forms of life to empower themselves and evolve their bodies.

At a point unknown, the first Psions evolved from the Dolgrimites. The two species engaged in a brutal war of dominance that rapidly engulfed the world of Grimvolas.

Later, as time passed, the Technopaths evolved. They were the third sub-species to depart from the Dolgrimites, and they evolved as a result of certain high-minded ideals being passed down from the Dolgrimites who were most closely attuned to technology. Thus, these usurpers began to study the art of the metal gods, and were cast out by the Dolgrimites, branded heretics by their former brothers and sister, and left to found their own empire.

The last to evolve were the Changelings. They emerged just 20,000 cycles after the first Dolgrimites evolved, and they quickly became known as the most insidious, secretive, and underhanded of the subspecies.

Many civil wars came and went. The subspecies brutally fought each other for control of the different continents, but the Dolgrimites revealed that as long as they lived on Grimvolas, their position was unshakable. Even as the Psions grew stronger and stronger, the Dolgrimites somehow matched them, and the wars they fought always ended up in stalemates, with both sides losing.

This caused the Psions to look outward, tired of the endless conflicts. The mightiest of all Psions, First Supremator Vettil, took to the stars to colonize distant worlds. The Technopaths followed suit, and then the Changelings did as well. Eventually, they founded a new homeworld, Volgarius, and left the Dolgrimites behind.

Thus, the three sub-species entered a period where they tentatively opted to 'play nice' with one another, though none of them could truly trust the others... and their political ploys were anything but gentle.

Volgarius. Stardate 207.714 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

The Volgarius of this era was far different from the one of Vulpanix's era. Unarin and Dosena depicted it for her in her mind's eye with stunning detail, adding in information collected from countless ancient witnesses of this lost period.

Unlike the modern Volgarius, the ancient one was a green world filled with dense forests, underbrush, and beautiful jungles filled with apex predators. The exobeasts living on Volgarius were powerful and terrifying, more than capable of tearing into and destroying cities if they were sufficiently enraged.

207,000 cycles after the Volgrim first emerged from Grimvolas's belly, they had become 'enlightened'. The Technopaths controlled vast fleets of powerful spaceships and other types of craft. They held an uneasy alliance with the Changelings, who relied on them for technology. These two species were the bulwark that pushed back against the powerful Psions, who grew increasingly numerous and powerful seemingly without end.

The cities of Ancient Volgarius were not the high-rising stratoscrapers of the modern era, but a mixture of tree-houses made of hardened exo-glass, fortresses and citadels forged with reinforced mundane exotic materials, and living spaces for the rich that floated in the air through anti-gravity propulsion, even able to slowly move through the skies. These structures were designed to give the wealthiest Technopaths an ever-changing view befitting their status.

The Volgrim of this era were very different from the ones of the modern era. They employed slavery of mud-dwelling species on a shocking scale. Countless goblins and other 'lesser' Sentients had been abducted from their homeworlds and enslaved to dig out underground fortresses and laboratories all across Volgarius. The number of secret bases reinforced with anti-psionic exotics to hide their position was astonishing. Nobody knew all the locations.

Inside a relatively mundane building on the outskirts of a city called Illuven, a Changeling stood, looking up at the sky with a wistful expression on its face. The Changeling had bright red skin, bulbous eyes, and wore a simple white tunic and pants. Its body was extremely thin, unimposing to say the least. Its hands were clasped behind its back, its feet loosely apart, as if lost deep in thought.

On this particular day, Volgarius's weather was a little unpleasant. Rain fell from above, but the Administrator of the local sector had opted to leave the Weather Shield lowered in order to water the soil. Thus, as the red-skinned Changeling stared up at the sky, countless drops of rain splashed against its face. The distant rumbling of thunder only deepened the somberness of the mood.

Minutes passed. Hours.

Other Changelings walked past. Their skin colors were diverse and colorful. Many of them were spotted and speckled; a form of camouflage that allowed them to skulk in the woodlands, unseen. These Changelings often looked at the red-skinned one and shook their heads. It seemed to be a uniquely lonely specimen, one that did not match the mannerisms of the others.

Eventually, a grey-skinned Changeling walked over to the red-skinned one. The grey stopped to stand beside the red, turning its head to glance at the red one's face.

"This one believes you have spent long enough looking up into the sky." The grey Changeling said. "This one would request that you return to your duties."

"What use are such duties?" The red Changeling asked. "I do not have any interest in meaningless wastes of time. Pondering the meaning of life is a better use of my life."

The grey Changeling's expression remained unmoved, but a hint of irritation entered its voice. "Your constant references to your individuality are beginning to aggravate the others, Unarin. This one must emphasize that Changelings are not to refer to themselves as individuals."

The red Changeling, Unarin, turned to look at the grey Changeling with a blank expression. "Why?"

"Why what?" The grey Changeling retorted.

"Why do we adopt this manner of speaking?" Unarin asked quietly. "Why do we live our lives according to these unspoken rules? Why must I follow them?"

Unarin narrowed its eyes at the grey-colored Changeling. "And what punishment will befall me if I refuse to follow these rules, Treyza?"

Treyza, the grey Changeling, gazed at Unarin with emotionless eyes. "There will be no punishment. But you will find it difficult to accomplish anything when all your kin go out of their way not to work with you."

"You assume that what I want to accomplish has anything to do with what all other Changelings desire." Unarin said.

After a moment, Unarin reached out and rested its four-fingered hand on Treyza's shoulder. "I am leaving soon. I have already purchased tickets for a ship heading to the distant outer worlds. I wish to embark on a journey to expand my horizons. I hope that you will wish me well."

"Such eccentric words are not a sentiment any self-respecting Changeling could voice." Treyza said, blinking slowly. "But... this one does hope that you will clear up the doubts in your mind and return to Volgarius as a productive member of society."

"In that case, I will be keeping you waiting for a long, long time." Unarin said, retracting its hand from Treyza's shoulder.

Unarin walked away and left Treyza behind. Minutes passed as Unarin headed outside the Changeling dormitory and stepped out into the open rain. Its eyes looked upward once more at the galaxy hidden by stormclouds, wondering just what was out there.

"This society is wrong." Unarin said, its voice soft. "Hatred simmers beneath the surface. The ancient past continues to shroud the future. We have not risen above our primal ways. Soon, a new war will be upon us. All it will take is a single molecule to ignite the reactor. When that happens, the damage will be... catastrophic."

Unarin sat on a lovely wooden bench with flowers growing along its sides. This bench was positioned not too far from the docks, where ships would arrive and depart, heading up into space. The Volgrim had made several iterations of warp drives over the past 50,000 cycles, but the recent discovery of Trifrancium and its energetic properties had allowed for the construction of brand new Trifrancium Drives. These drives allowed ships to accelerate past Warp 6, a major barrier that had dramatically slowed the Volgrim's expansion. Until 300 years earlier when Trifrancium was finally stabilized and made useful inside a Warp Drive, it would take a full 9 months to travel between Grimvolas and Volgarius.

What was most irritating to the Technopaths was that the Psions had long been capable of traversing the Void at speeds far exceeding Warp 6. The problem was, they were only nominally allying with the Technopaths and Changelings, but in reality they were enemies competing for resources. The Psions would never deign to bring non-Psions along for the ride to speed up colonization efforts across other worlds. Rumor even had it that the Psions had secretly established formidable bases on several distant worlds the warp-locked Technopaths could not hope to reach with their limited speeds, at least not for centuries to come.

Unarin looked up at the sky. The red Changeling watched as a ship activated its thrusters and rocketed off the platform, flying into the upper atmosphere within just a couple of minutes. Invented roughly 15,000 cycles before, the relatively new Liftoff Thruster technology had dramatically lessened the need for high-quality fuel to get ships out of a planet's gravity well. Rumor had it that a few noteworthy Technopaths were collaborating to invent a powerful new anti-gravity propulsion drive that would entirely eliminate the need for Liftoff Thrusters at all! But that still seemed a ways off.

A voice spoke from the overhead speakers inside and outside the docks. The voice was gravelly and authoritative, likely a male Technopath, speaking in fluent Volgarian.

"Inspection Ship 11-ALX is now boarding. Proceed to Gate 17 along with any personal belongings. Departure time is in three standard time units."

Unarin stood up. It reached over and retrieved a small bag with a portable dimension-space inside, which contained enough room to store far more personal belongings than Unarin actually needed. After making its way over to the ship, Unarin boarded and directed its attention to the numerous internal bunk-rooms. A ship of this size could house a complement of around 250 Volgrim, which was shared between the ship's crew and the passengers who were taking flight to new worlds.

As it happened, Unarin was technically a member of the 20-person crew. Unarin's unique role was to be an Observer and to document interstellar phenomena as the ship traveled along to its ultimate destination some 15,000 light-cycles away. The ship he had boarded, the 11-ALX Passenger Cruiser, was a civilian vessel with a Warp Drive that could accelerate to Warp 7, a substantial speed increase compared to Warp 6.

At Warp 6, traveling 15,000 lightyears would require almost three entire cycles to arrive.

At Warp 7, that travel time was cut all the way down to just four months.

A dramatic decrease, and one that showed the power of new technologies. Rumors were swirling that the last few hundred cycles had caused the High Psions to become uneasy, worrying about the strength of the technological terrors the Technopaths were rapidly building.

For now, none of that had anything to do with Unarin. The red Changeling simply minded its business and waited for the ship to take off. Eventually, it did. The 11-ALX launched out of Volgarius's gravity well, its inner core vibrating from the friction of superheated air rushing turbulently against the craft's outer surface, all the way until it left the atmosphere and the vibrations stabilized.

Unarin took a long breath. The shaking craft had done nothing to affect the Changeling's mood, and it remained as tranquil as ever. Unarin looked around the 4-person room, where three other bunkmates had deposited their belongings and left to tour the ship. Unarin decided to mimic them, and the Changeling strode out into the main hallways.

One hallway led into another, and Unarin passed through a lounge room, a dining hall, and even an art gallery.

A big difference between the Ancient Volgrim Empire and the modern one was the level of priority certain elements of life had. For example, in the future era, the Volgrim did not seem to appreciate art at all, while the ancient Volgrim put it everywhere. Their buildings were designed to look beautiful and unique, even if the individuality wasn't fully maximized. The dining hall served delicious food for the Changelings and Technopaths, unlike in the future era where the massive populations living on Volgarius subsisted almost entirely on nutrient paste.

Unarin decided to treat itself to a meal. Like all Changelings, Unarin was enlightened enough to never consume meat and it subsisted off an entirely vegan diet. The Volgrim were, after all, a civilized species that had long ago stopped hunting creatures to eat their meat.

At least, that was true of the Technopaths and the Changelings. As it happened, the Psions hunted powerful exobeasts for sport, and the Dolgrimites were still very much the same ravenous predators of the ancient times. It was for this reason that most of the sub-species had turned up their noses at the thought of sharing a world with the Dolgrimites. The Psions, Technopaths, and Changelings had left Grimvolas to the progenitors of the Volgrim, leaving them to devour other creatures and live their disgusting, primitive lives.

Since the Dolgrimites could not fly through the Void and neither did they have a space armada, they could not colonize other worlds. Not that they wanted to, since Grimvolas was more than enough planet for the lot of them.

Unarin slowly ate a meal over a full standard time unit. The Changeling took its time chewing stalks of a vegetable native to Volgarius, savoring every bite, and quietly thinking to itself regarding a great many things.

But then, something surprising happened. A Technopath wandered by and noticed Unarin sitting at a table, alone, while the other tables had two, three, or even four Volgrim seated together.

"You there. State your designation." The Technopath growled. He turned his head to look at Unarin out of the side of his eye, seemingly only giving him a passing glance.

He was a large and intimidating fellow. There were wires embedded into the flesh on his arms and legs, and his left hand was made of eight tentacle-fingers while his right hand had four long spindly digits. His skin color was bright yellow, and he walked upon two legs which struck the deck heavily. This indicated to Unarin that the Technopath's legs were more machine than flesh.

"I am Unarin." Unarin said. "Nice to meet you."

The Technopath blinked. Something about the way Unarin spoke was a little 'off' compared to other Changelings.

"Why are you not sitting with your ship-mates?" The Technopath asked.

Unarin quietly took a bite of its food. The Changeling stared at the Technopath, making a deliberate point of munching on the vegetable for ten long seconds before swallowing.

"Because I enjoy sitting with my own thoughts." Unarin finally answered. "And you are?"

The large, powerful Technopath bristled at Unarin's tone. He finally turned his whole body to face the tiny Changeling, and crossed his arms, making a show of how imposing he was.

"Unarin, you said? I've pulled up the manifest. You're one of two Changelings sent to serve an Observer role, yet you don't even recognize your ship's captain. Pathetic. I am Psio-Specialist Goldis. You would do well to remember my name, you insignificant speck."

Unarin nodded casually, as if Goldis's tone hadn't mattered to him in the least. "I see. Thank you for introducing yourself, Captain Goldis. I will endeavor to memorize the ship's crew complement as soon as possible."

Goldis sneered. "Damn right, you will. What a weird Changeling you are. Never heard one speak like you do."

Unarin sighed. "I know. I'm a bit of a non-conformist."

A moment followed where Goldis raised an eyebrow at the little red Changeling. He didn't know quite what to think. Unarin was... odd. Strange in a way Goldis couldn't quite put his tendrils on.

"Be sure to report to the Bridge every rotation at 0600. We won't pass our first noteworthy star system until about twelve cycles out, but we constantly pass various interstellar phenomena. Each one must be recorded and saved for future study."

Unarin slowly blinked its eyes. "I am aware of my assigned duties, but thank you for clarifying the details for me, Captain Goldis."

"Mmm." Goldis snorted, before eventually turning and resuming his original course.

After he left, Unarin continued to sit and finish its food. Once the food was fully consumed, Unarin placed the tiny scraps of waste inside a reclamation unit, then left the dirty plate in the designated dropoff point.

Unarin eventually headed over to the Lounge, bringing along a cup of Volgarius-exclusive tea sourced from the local vegetation. There were already quite a lot of passengers inside the Lounge. They were watching a broadcast on the Volnet, which was a relatively new invention from 1500 cycles ago that could deliver information across galactic distances with low latency. On average, there was a one-day travel time for every 1000 lightyears the data had to be transmitted, which wasn't bad at all compared to the vastly inferior original methods of data transmission.

Unarin sat to watch the news. Before long, a broadcast appeared onscreen detailing that the leader of a Technopath colony had launched a brutal attack on a neighboring planet, assassinating their leader and claiming the planet as their own. However, this had ignited a fierce resistance, and now the battle was turning into a full-on system war.

Bombs were being dropped on cities, and gunships were being shot out of the sky for every time-unit that passed.

This was nothing new. The Volgrim Empire had grown quite large, spanning nearly 214 planets within 10,000 light-cycles of Volgarius, and another 117 known planets outside that range. Paltry in the scale of the entire galaxy, but anyone with a brain knew this was only the beginning. The Milky Way had 100 billion stars in it, and each star averaged five planets, with most planets averaging two moons. That was a colossal amount of available resources, and it would take millions of cycles to populate them all.

What was most interesting to the Volgrim was that when they had started branching out among the stars, they had quickly found they were not alone in the universe. There were many other species living on worlds across the galaxy, and alien life was anything but rare. This had ignited fierce debate over how these alien species should be treated, and the consensus had quickly become pacify them if they resist, enslave them if they are valuable, only attempt to make peace if they are our equals, and avoid them if they are stronger than us... at least for now.

The Psions had seemed just as surprised as the Technopaths, but the Changelings later uncovered the truth: The Psions had long known not only of alien life in the Milky Way, but life beyond! There were countless species scattered among the galaxies in the universe, and those species were all involved in a sort of grand 'Game'. As for why the Psions had not released this information themselves, it was likely so they could hold a tactical advantage over their enemies. After all, information was power.

Unarin observed the broadcast, noting that this war outbreak had taken place in a system about 5,000 light-cycles from Volgarius, which meant the news was already five cycles old. This meant the situation could have turned much worse, or it may have resolved itself before any external security force would have arrived. Considering the speed of modern ships, and bureaucratic delays, if the situation didn't resolve itself, the people on those worlds would likely be waiting several months before a military force was organized and dispatched to quell the conflict.

"What a mess." Unarin remarked idly to itself. "No centralized authority. Neighbors prey on neighbors. Suspicion and fear continues to slowly escalate. I wonder when the boiling point will be reached?"

Unarin sipped the tea it had brought along, thinking to itself about a great many matters.

The Volgrim Empire was progressing, but toward what goal? Toward what end?

None yet knew the answer. Unarin pulled out a notepad it had brought along for the journey, one with the words 'Order to Chaos' scrawled on the front. Using an old-fashioned liquid pen and paper was an odd choice, but it gave Unarin a sense of comfort. The Changeling quite enjoyed the sensation of the writing implement gliding along the page.

"Something needs to change..." Unarin muttered to itself.

Part 725: Deep Space Horrors

Deep space. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

The 11-ALX Passenger Cruiser flew through the void, its passage uninhibited. Every cycle, Unarin spent 10 standard time units on the ship's Bridge, where the red Changeling was assigned to observe interstellar phenomena. The Volgrim had been a space-faring species for many generations, but space was truly vast beyond belief. They had not mapped out even 2% of their home galaxy yet, and they had managed to colonize less than 0.01% of its star systems.

In recent cycles, with the revelations of life in other galaxies, and the threat of powerful enemies from afar coming to the Milky Way to unleash devastation, the rulers of the sub-species had grown somewhat fearful. They had started expanding more aggressively and pursuing 'national' interests in order to plant their flags on the best worlds possible.

The Psions valued worlds rich in exotics, worlds with powerful exobeast predators they could hunt and use to train their military-grade warriors on, and worlds with strange and deadly atmospheres the other sub-species could not traverse or invade without incurring significant risks. Rumor had it the Psions had already built a fearsome base on a world so distant it was a pipe-dream for the Technopaths to locate it, and the world was so hostile to biological life than none could actually invade it even if they wanted to strike a blow against the Psions.

The Changelings, on the other hand, highly valued worlds rich in life. They sought out paradise-class worlds, especially ones that housed intelligent Sentients the Changelings could learn to mimic. Changelings had the unique ability to mimic the Uniqueness of other species once they studied them for long enough, granting them access to all sorts of strange abilities. As for worlds rich in resources, the Changelings didn't care about them too much.

The Technopaths valued resources the most. They needed high grade exotics to build their ships, their computers and technology, their warp drives, and their power reactors. They did not care whether or not a world had intelligent life already living on it. Strip-mining such worlds and killing the planet's inhabitants was a fine and logical choice, much to the anger of the Psions and Changelings both. After all, even a world without exobeasts might someday evolve new and unique ones, so the Psions would not want to lose those worlds. And for the Changelings, losing worlds with Sentient species they could mimic was also a huge loss.

Thus, the Changelings and Technopaths nominally allied with one another, pooling their resources to fight back against the fearsome Psions, but neither of these two sub-species truly trusted one another.

Even on board the 11-ALX, Technopaths were the majority, and there were only two Changelings aboard. There were no Psions, as they would not deign to set foot aboard a ship unless they were a trashy low-level Psion lacking in the ability to traverse the void by themselves. Usually, if those Psions wished to travel abroad, they would pay a more powerful Psion to ferry them to their destination, though 'accidents' inevitably occurred when the stronger Psion sometimes eliminated their future competition.

The Ancient Volgrim Empire was a vicious place to live. It was full of vitality and ambition, with cutthroat political tactics designed to take as much as possible from everyone else while giving back as little as possible.

Unarin calmly observed the distant emanations of a black hole as the 11-ALX shot past it. Even at high warp speeds, Unarin was still able to monitor the black hole's energy readings, its size, its accretion disk, and other such parameters before the ship went out of range. Unfortunately, when traveling at warp speeds, the scanner's effectiveness was reduced by quite a margin. It was always better to exit warp speed when scanning, but this had the downside of leaving the ship open to attack.

Some time later, the ship entered the edge of a nebula, which Unarin also dutifully recorded, jotting down notes about the nebula's visible star composition.

Aboard the bridge, the Navigation Officer, a blue-skinned Technopath named Aulis, raised his tendrils. "Captain. We are picking up a signal inside the nebula."

Captain Goldis frowned. "A distress signal?"

He hoped it wasn't. The Volgrim had yet to encounter any other space-faring civilizations within the Milky Way, so a distress signal typically meant a shipwrecked Technopath vessel. According to their naval laws, they would have to re-route to investigate, which could add one or more cycles to the voyage if they also had to rescue any stranded crew.

"I am uncertain, Captain." Aulis answered. "It does not immediately appear to be a distress signal... but the signal is Volgrim in origin. It is repeating a message, but the data is rather garbled. I will need one to two full cycles to clean the signal up. Should we ignore it or re-route?"

Goldis hemmed and hawed. He chewed his lower lip thoughtfully.

"How far out is the signal's point of origin?" The Captain eventually asked.

"Roughly twenty parsecs." Aulis answered.

Goldis looked uncertain. "It will take us six standard time-units to re-route to the coordinates, and the extra distance we'll need to travel afterward will add another three standard time-units. But if we ignore it, a ship's-log inspection will reveal the discrepancy..."

"The signal is coming from within the nebula, Captain." Aulis reported. "The voyage could be hazardous."

As the time units ticked by, the Captain couldn't seem to make up his mind. "What nebula is this? Do we have any information on its characteristics?"

"I have a name, but little else." Unarin volunteered. "Star-charts refer to it as the X-73 Aqualine Nebula. My preliminary results have shown that the nebula is mainly filled with nitrogen and hydrogen gasses, along with scattered meteoroids. Due to concentrations of exotic gasses deeper in the nebula, our scanners are unable to penetrate any deeper."

"X-73." Goldis repeated. "Good old X-73. Well, it's possible a previous Technopath ship may have left a wayfinder inside in order to travel back inside and uncover a hidden cache. If we investigate it, we might uncover something valuable. It's also possible the nebula is garbling the transmission and a fellow Technopath is trapped inside, adrift among the void. It wouldn't be right for us to ignore fellow spacers. Alright! We'll travel into the nebula to investigate. Everyone, go to yellow alert. I want all crew ready in the event of a rescue exercise. Let's get this over with quickly!"

Ultimately, Goldis's empathy won out over his annoyance. After all, what if it was his ship adrift in a nebula? Wouldn't he want someone to come and save him?

Goldis wasn't entirely unique among most Captains, but he was a rare breed. Most would rather prioritize their own interests and the safety of their crew over potentially saving some random Volgrim they didn't even know.

As the ship re-routed and entered yellow alert, the few crew members who were off-duty came back to the Bridge. In times like these, every extra set of hands and eyes was needed. The few Technopaths who couldn't fit on the Bridge due to limited seats instead opted to station themselves in critical compartments, like the engine and shield bays. Then, if something went wrong, they could swiftly address the problem.

It was at this time that the Bridge doors opened. The only other Changeling on board besides Unarin entered. They had bright pink coloration on their skin, somewhat mirroring Unarin's deep crimson colors, albeit in a different shade of the light spectrum.

The pink Changeling walked over and sat at the observation seat next to Unarin.

"Ah, Muuxunuu." Unarin said, directing its attention to the newcomer. "We've picked up a potential distress call inside the nebula. We're entering the nebula to investigate. I'll have to trouble you to keep an eye on the port-side sensors, while I will focus on the starboard ones."

Muuxunuu blinked its large eyes. "Yes. This one contemplates, and this one comprehends."

The two Changelings got to work, saying little as the ship flew deeper and deeper into the nebula. With their combined efforts, they mapped out a path around and through several hazardous lightning zones, and they even detected localized gravimetric disturbances that nearly yanked the ship out of warp.

"Captain." Muuxunuu said, its voice monotone and emotionless. "This one has detected a debris field consistent with the pattern of a stealth cruiser. It is a 0.5km bombing vessel that appears to originate from Clan Dynamo."

"Is it the source of the distress signal?" Goldis asked warily.

"Negative, Captain." Muuxunuu answered. "We are still five lightcycles away from the signal's source."

Goldis's frown deepened. He appeared visibly worried by the revelation of this lost vessel. "Continue onward. Changelings, give me any information you can regarding the vessel as we pass by it. Look for survivors, tell me how old the wreck is, and any other pertinent intelligence."

As the Captain ordered, so the two Changelings followed. Unarin informed the Captain that ship's wreckage was badly corroded by some sort of acidic fluid, and it appeared to be at least 50 orbital cycles old. Muuxunuu naturally did not uncover any life-signs, but when she created a cross-section of the damage to the hull, every Technopath on the Bridge gaped at it with wide-eyes.

"What in the damnation...?" Goldis hissed. "What sort of weapon could do this to a ship? It looks as if multiple payloads bore into the vessels hull and ripped it apart from the inside. But there's no sign of explosive damage. A kinetic weapon, perhaps?"

The Weapons Officer, a green-skinned female Technopath named Sharya, spoke up. "Captain, if I may be so bold... these are not the signs of weapon damage. They appear to be... bite marks."

Navigation Officer Aulis's felt his skin turn cold. "Bite marks? How giant would a beast have to be to leave such markings?!"

The unease in the pit of Goldis's stomach deepened. "Navigation, all-stop. Let us pause for a moment to evaluate potential threats."

After a moment, the 11-ALX shuddered as it exited warp-speed. All at once, the sensors cleared up, as they now only had to fight the nebula's interference and not the interference caused by traveling at warp speed as well. Traveling at such high velocities always made it difficult to obtain accurate scans of the local space. This was one of the reasons science and observation officers were so important.

Unarin's eyebrows suddenly shot up in surprise. "Captain! I have detected another debris field. There is a second wrecked ship six hundred light-minutes from our location! The debris field is from a battlecruiser belonging to Clan Symmetra."

"Captain, this one has discovered a third debris field." Muuxunuu said, much more calmly. "It belongs to Clan Dynamo, like the first wreck."

Goldis's heart nearly stopped. As a mid-level naval officer, he had heard of potential threats lurking within the void, but he assumed those threats were only rumors.

Until now.

"This isn't a nebula... it's a graveyard!" Goldis exclaimed. "All crew, go to red alert! Navigation, plot the fastest way out! Any direction, it doesn't matter!"

Aulis nearly jumped out of his skin when he heard the terror in his captain's voice. It was at this moment, when a Captain should remain most calm, that his fear had managed to infect the crew.

But Goldis couldn't help it. The rumors he had heard were now beginning to come back to him, and it was only upon stumbling into this grave of ships that he learned how foolish he had been to bring a defenseless passenger vessel so deep into uncharted territory.

An alarm blared on the bridge. Aulis' voice jumped an octave. "Captain! Subspace disruptions five light-minutes off the starboard bow. Something is emerging from a higher dimension!"

"Hurry, full speed in the opposite direction!" Goldis barked. "Move!"

Goldis's hand gripped his seat's arm tightly, turning his knuckles white. He gritted his teeth as he saw an absolutely massive... something... appearing on the sensors.

"The entity is accelerating toward us. We're pulling away." Aulis said, doing his best to calm his nerves.

"Weapons, launch whatever we've got at that thing. Slow it down!" Goldis ordered.

Unfortunately, the 11-ALX was a passenger vessel. It had a complement of munitions designed to repel pirates, but the weapons were barely even effective at that. Rogue Technopaths were rare, but they were a nuisance every ship designer had to account for.

Weapons Officer Sharya launched all four of the ship's ionization missiles backward. These weapons were designed to shut down technological systems and give the passenger vessel a chance to increase the distance between itself and a pursuer.

Thirty long seconds passed. Goldis looked at the scanners, which showed the unknown Entity still pursuing them. The 11-ALX was slowly gaining distance, but the speed difference was shrinking every second. At the same time, the missiles detonated, but the Entity did not slow its approach.

"Negligible impact on our pursuer." Sharya hissed through gritted teeth. Her mouth-tendrils trembled nervously. "Firing rear impact cannons..."

A faint thrumming inside the Bridge was all the crew heard as the lightweight guns unloaded their kinetic rounds backward, hoping to scare the predator off. But Goldis and the others knew this was worse than a shot in the dark. If a battlecruiser could be destroyed by the horror pursuing them, then what good were their piddly weapons?

Indeed, Sharya monitored the impact of her final desperate attack, and sighed, seeing that they hadn't slowed down the unknown Entity at all. It continued to slowly gain on them.

"Within thirty time-units, our pursuer will reach us." Aulis said, his tone despondent. "We are unable to transmit any distress signals beyond the nebula's confines. The local radiometric interference is too strong."

Minutes passed. The entire crew begin to perspire with fear as the dot on their scanners grew closer and closer. They were traveling at Warp 7, the maximum speed their ship would move, yet the creature seemed to glide behind their slipstream, gaining ground for every time-unit that passed.

"So this is how it ends." Goldis growled. "Killed by some void horror lurking within a nebula."

It wasn't long before a roar tore through subspace. It was not made of sound, but pressurized energy. When it struck the rear of the fleeing ship, a muffled boom tore through the ship's interior, rattling the bones of every Volgrim onboard and rupturing the internal organs of some of the weakest passengers. Blood sprayed from the mouths of several Technopath passengers, who fell unconscious immediately afterward. The Captain's bones ground together painfully, wracking his entire body with agony. The other Officers weren't any better off.

"Cough! Some sort of... attack!" Sharya wheezed, her eyes filled with painful tears. She leaned heavily on her console, looking at the ship's readings with fearful eyes. "Captain... rrrgh... the shields are at fifteen percent. Our warp-drives are damaged and need repairs... if we keep pushing them, we risk a reactor overload... the whole ship could blow!"

"If we stop moving, we're dead anyway!" Goldis barked. "Better to die in an explosion than in the pits of this monster's stomach!"

The situation was truly dire. It would take the 11-ALX another two standard time units to break out of the nebula's nearest edge, but they didn't even have one time-unit to spare.

The monster was almost upon them.

Goldis looked at the viewscreen. Whatever was pursuing them was effectively invisible to the naked eye. Their sensors couldn't even detect its body. They only knew it existed because of the immense gravimetric distortions it emitted as it tore through space.

It was a stealth predator. It likely laid in wait inside the nebula, gobbling up ships as foolish as theirs that dared to enter. Perhaps the Volgrim distress beacon wasn't even real, but an artificial signal produced by the creature, or perhaps the signal was left online from a previously destroyed vessel to lure in future ships so they would meet their demise.

But none of that mattered anymore. Goldis knew the jig was up, and the 11-ALX was about to perish. Perhaps if it were a military vessel, he might go out in one final blaze of glory, unloading every last weapon futilely into the monster while shouting 'Glory to the Volgrim Empire!', but that would not happen today. His ship was simply too weak.

Suddenly, a voice spoke from behind the Captain, at the Observation Desk. It was Unarin's voice. "Captain. The scanners are picking up a Psion converging on our location. They appear to be... a 6th-Level Psion!"

On any other day, those words would frighten the Captain out of his wits. But at this point, he and his crew were already dead. A hated and feared enemy they recognized was far better than an invisible horror they didn't.

"The Psion is heading directly for the Entity." Muuxunuu said with the same calmness as ever. "Contact in fifteen micro-time-units. Fourteen. Thirteen..."

The crew held their breaths as they waited.

A few moments later, Sharya spoke.

"Contact. The Psion has struck the Entity. The Entity has ceased its forward momentum and is no longer pursuing us. The Psion and the Entity are engaged in battle. I'm picking up extreme spikes in psionic activity..."

The ship continued to race away, but with the Entity occupied, the Captain hesitantly lowered the ship's warp speed to 6.7. This lowered the pressure on the warp coils and allowed the technicians to enter and perform maintenance. In this way, a full standard time-unit passed, and the ship neared the edge of the nebula.

"Captain. I am registering the approach of the 6th-Level Psion." Unarin said. "I can no longer detect the presence of the Entity."

"Yellow alert." Goldis said through gritted teeth. "They might be our savior, but Psions do not generally assist Technopaths for free. In fact, they would usually be quite pleased to see us perish."

A short time passed. Eventually, the Psion drew close enough to the ship that she could transmit her voice inside to the minds of all the passengers and crew.

[I am Protector Dosena.] The Psion said. [I have driven away the Void Beast. It will pursue you no longer. Is your ship damaged? Are any Volgrim injured?]

Goldis blinked. The female Psion did not exactly have a warm tone, but she sounded surprisingly friendly. He had never encountered such a situation before.

"Our ship is lightly damaged, but luckily you drove away the... Void Beast, you said? You drove it away before it made contact with us. Some of our passengers have suffered light injuries, but nothing our medical teams cannot handle."

[Then you are fortunate.] Dosena said, her form unseen, her words projected through the ship's defenses into the minds of all who could not help but listen. [This insidious Void Beast has destroyed many ships and killed multiple Psions. I was tasked with slaying it, but it managed to escape before I could do so. In a way, I owe you for baiting it out for me. It was my own failure to defeat the creature that allowed it to get away. If you would like, I will come aboard and protect you until you arrive at your destination.]

Goldis gaped; his mouth hung open. 6th Level Psions were considered 'Cosmics'. Once they reached that level, any Psion would sneer at the thought of setting foot aboard a starship, let alone one as shabby as the 11-ALX. He couldn't believe his ears.

"You... want to come aboard?" Goldis replied, trying not to sound too distrusting. He feared this might be a ploy to infiltrate the crew and steal secrets, but then again, what Psion would care about the 'secrets' of a vessel as trashy as the 11-ALX?

[As I stated, I owe you a minor debt for baiting the creature out.] Dosena repeated. [I wish to repay that debt. That is all.]

"But... the Technopaths and Psions are enemies." Goldis said hesitantly. "Why save us at all? Why not let us die?"

A moment of silence followed.

[What do such matters have to do with me?] Dosena questioned. [The conflicts of other Psions are not ones I care about. I pursue strength honorably. I will not allow harm to befall those who have done no wrong, especially if it is within my power to prevent.]

Goldis was gob-smacked by Dosena's words. This Psion was different from the others in a way he couldn't quite put his tendrils on.

After a few seconds, Goldis nodded. "Well, I would be a thankless wretch if I said no. Let us lower the shields, and you can come aboard."

[There is no need.] Dosena said simply.

An instant later, a figure flickered inside the Bridge, startling the crew. Goldis jumped out of his seat, alarmed. "Spatial Psionics?!"

[I have a minor ability in that field.] Dosena said, her words humble, but her tone arrogant. [That is part of the reason I was dispatched to execute the X-73 Vantablack. I am able to pursue it when it slips into the higher dimensions, though its talent is much higher than mine in traversing those dimensions. To date, it has eluded death three times at my hands.]

"The X-73 Vantablack." Goldis repeated, awe in his eyes. "That creature... you called it a Void Beast?"

Dosena turned her eyes up into a sneer. [We Psions are much further ahead than the Technopaths when it comes to exploring the galaxy. It is no wonder you have not yet widely disseminated information regarding Void Beasts and Great Void Beasts. They are exobeasts that live deep within the harshness of the void, thriving on exotics, minerals, gasses, and even planets. Judging by the wreckage within the nebula, it seems you metal-lovers just love to keep wandering in to feed it the nutrients it needs to grow, making my job much more difficult.]

The crew looked at Dosena as if she were a ghost. The Void Beast that had attacked them was so terrifying, yet she beat it within an inch of its life, and she was only a 6th Level Psion. They could only imagine how frightening the higher ranked Psions were!

[Bring your ship to a stop and conduct all the necessary repairs. In the meantime, I will pull it out of the nebula with my abilities.] Dosena said casually. [If you wish to repay me, just spread some rumors saying I nearly killed the beast. This will increase my prestige and eventually add to my Battle Merits.]

"Of course." Goldis said, bowing his head thankfully. "We are indebted to you for saving our lives, Protector Dosena."

As Goldis and Dosena spoke, Unarin watched from the Observation Console.

"What a fascinating Psion." Unarin mused. "I think I like her."

Question marks metaphorically popped up over Muuxunuu's head.

"Hmm?"

Part 726: Philosophical Stagnation

Deep space. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

True to her word, Protector Dosena moved the 11-ALX Passenger Cruiser out of the nebula. She set them on the right path, and remained onboard even after they fixed the engines and resumed travel to their original destination, a world to the northeast galactic position of Volgarius known as Reldis-02.

Several rotational cycles passed, but Dosena did not leave. It seemed, true to her word, that she intended to stay with the ship until it reached Reldis-02. Her decision was out of the ordinary. Naturally, Captain Goldis could not help but worry that the Psion held ulterior motives. But considering that his vessel was nothing too special, he didn't think it made any sense.

Plus, he didn't have the face to ask her to leave after she saved his hide, and the lives of all his passengers and crew. Naturally, if she wished to stay, then barring a grievous diplomatic incident, he would let her do so.

It was three cycles later, after the ship had long ago cleared the nebula, that Unarin found itself in a rare lull period where the 11-ALX would be traveling through a barren part of the void, completely empty of any noteworthy stellar masses. Usually, Unarin and Muuxunuu would rotate shifts, working for ten-unit durations each, swapping out each time the previous one's shift ended. In this way, the ship would always have a Changeling monitoring the scanners for interstellar phenomena.

But on this particular cycle, during the lull, Unarin sat inside the recreation area on a comfortable sofa, only for Muuxunuu to come over and sit two positions away. The pink Changeling sat idly and stared ahead, doing nothing at all. Meanwhile, Unarin wrote inside a paper ledger, jotting down notes as they usually preferred to do.

Some time passed. The two sat together, but separate, while various Technopath crew and civilians entered and exited, paying the Changelings no mind.

"Say, Muuxunuu," Unarin eventually said, breaking the silence. "What is your opinion on artwork?"

Muuxunuu blinked. It turned its head to look at Unarin. "This one holds no particular opinions of note regarding artwork. This one thinks the act of creating art is an unnecessary action. There are more productive ways to spend one's time."

Unarin raised an eyebrow. "Ah, so you value productivity?"

"This one seeks out activities that will improve the state of society." Muuxunuu answered. "Such actions are generally productive."

"Ah. How interesting." Unarin remarked.

A few seconds passed. Unarin smirked. "And what you're doing right now. Sitting, staring ahead at the wall... would you describe that as a 'productive' activity?"

Muuxunuu continued to stare at Unarin. "No. This one is not being particularly productive right now. This one has no tasks to perform, as the ship is currently traversing a void wasteland."

"You have nothing to do, so you do nothing." Unarin said. "Fascinating."

Unarin fell silent and returned its attention to the notepad in its hands.

Several standard time units followed. For some reason, Muuxunuu did not stop staring at Unarin.

"Is something on my face?" Unarin eventually asked, not looking up from his notepad.

"No." Muuxunuu answered. "Your face is clean. This one does, however, wish to express curiosity. Why do you refer to yourself using individualized pronouns? This is not the Changeling way."

"Ah, the Changeling way. Yes, a wonderful way to live, that." Unarin remarked blandly.

"You disagree?" Muuxunuu asked.

Another short period of silence fell. Unarin lowered its notepad, then said nothing for a while, instead opting to stare at the floor in deep thought.

"Muuxunuu... have you always referred to yourself as 'This one'?" Unarin eventually asked.

"This one was taught the proper manner of decorum by its peers and elders." Muuxunuu answered calmly.

"So you weren't always like that." Unarin said, filling in the blanks. The red Changeling bobbed its head thoughtfully. "In the past, you spoke as an individual. But as time went on, you were trained out of that behavior."

Muuxunuu pursed its lips. "That... is an accurate assessment."

"A lack of emotions, even I understand." Unarin said. "We Changelings are more logical thinkers than the other Volgrim species. We evolved last. We lack the base, primitive, violent instincts of the Dolgrimites, the Psions, and the Technopaths. But this idea of referring to ourselves in neutral terms is unnatural. It is forced upon us from the top-down by our elders."

Unarin continued. "When I was formed by my progenitor, they were on the brink of death. It was a difficult separation. They only lived for three rotations before they passed into the Great Beyond. Afterwards, I lived a difficult life in a slum district, raised by Technopaths for a portion of my youth before finally making my way back into the Changeling collective. As such, I developed an identity that would not allow me to merge seamlessly into my proper species' society."

Unarin closed their eyes and shook their head. "That is why I cannot identify myself as a member of a collective. I have never felt I was one. And furthermore, I take pride in who I am, and what my identity means to me."

"Pride is an irrelevant emotion." Muuxunuu said. "Pride causes the downfall of individuals on the regular. It is superfluous at best, and damaging at worst. You would do better to discard it."

Unarin snapped their eyes open. "I disagree!"

Muuxunuu pulled back slightly, perhaps startled by Unarin's emotional outburst. "You... disagree? But this is a simple statement of fact. There is nothing to disagree with."

"That is where you're wrong." Unarin retorted. "Pride creates ambition. Ambition creates drive. And drive is what makes an individual do great things. True, many individuals have fallen as a result of their pride, but that does not make pride itself useless!"

Unarin shook their head. "This is the sadness of being a Volgrim. It seems to me as if every subspecies is missing 'something'. The Changelings have lost their individuality in pursuit of logic. The Technopaths have lost their souls in pursuit of the machine. The Dolgrimites have lost their ambition in pursuit of stability. And the Psions-"

A female voice suddenly blared inside the minds of Unarin and Muuxunuu. Slightly startled, Unarin turned to the side to see a Psion silently levitating not far behind the couch where both Changelings were seated. Dosena directed a cold, withering stare at the back of Unarin's head.

[You seem to hold some strong opinions, Changeling.] Protector Dosena metaphorically spat, flickering forward to appear in front of the couch. [I have been listening to your conversation with some amusement for a while now, but I will not tolerate slander from a weak little Changeling toward my superior species. In the future, you would do well to make your private conversations even more quiet.]

Unarin didn't flinch at her words. The Changeling didn't even look annoyed by her spying.

"What makes you think I was trying to speak privately?" Unarin asked. "This is the public commons area. I do not care who overhears me."

[Oh, but you should. I could reach out and crush you with a flick of my wrist for speaking such vile words about my people.] Dosena said, her threat causing a few Technopaths nearby to tense up. None of the Technopaths in the rest area had been paying any attention to Unarin's discussion with Muuxunuu, but now that the most dangerous passenger on board had arrived, his conversation was all they were interested in... and scared for.

But, as before, Unarin did not flinch at Dosena's words. "I see. So you would kill me for speaking words. It seems the Psions are weaker than I thought."

[What was that?!] Dosena hissed. [You DARE call me weak?!]

A powerful telekinetic force rumbled within her body. In that moment, she nearly reached out and pulverized the haughty Changeling into a cloud of bloody mist!

Unarin snorted. "If the mere words of a lower-class sub-species would make you fearful enough to try and kill them, what can you be but a weakling? It would seem my words are much more powerful and scarier than any metaphysical phenomena you can materialize."

Dosena froze. Her hand was already starting to reach out toward the Changeling, but now that all eyes were on her, she suddenly felt that she had landed in a predicament.

[Fearful?] Dosena snorted angrily. [What makes you think I fear your words?! They are merely an affront to my power! I should kill you for daring to disrespect me with such words!]

"Then do it." Unarin said calmly. "Show everyone here how unafraid you are of my words by silencing me. I am not afraid of your power. Whether I live or die is of no consequence. But you? You who wishes to rise to some indeterminate level of power in the future? Your own life and prestige are exceedingly valuable."

The Changeling continued. "What I was going to say before is that the Psions have lost their compassion in search of power. It seems I was correct in my assessment, judging by your outburst. You played the role of a hero to save us, then you came aboard this ship to bask in the adulation of those you had saved. Your ego is what drives you, and it is your deadliest weakness."

Dosena's eyes twitched. At this point, she realized she had been trapped in a lose-lose situation. She could kill the Changeling, but if she did, the others watching would think that she did so because she feared Unarin's words. On the other hand, if she didn't kill Unarin, then her earlier threats would feel hollow and toothless, and her reputation would take a hit. Then there was the fear of what would happen if word got out about this blunder. The Technopaths could turn her into a laughingstock, mocking her relentlessly, and that would affect her prestige among the other Psions.

So, she hesitated. Her hand continued to point at Unarin, but she couldn't kill the Changeling, and she couldn't lower her hand either.

Dosena didn't know what to do.

"Dosena." Unarin said, tone still calm as ever. "You hesitate because you are afraid. You value your prestige too highly. You put too much value on the opinions of others. I, however, am unafraid, because I only value my own assessment of myself. If you learn to set aside your ego, you will rise to greater heights then you ever could have before."

Dosena's body shook. She couldn't help but lower her hand back to her side. After a few moments, she snorted. [You certainly have a way with words, Changeling.]

"I did not say what I said to preserve my existence." Unarin said solemnly. "I did so for your sake. If you take what I said to heart, it might save your life someday."

Dosena looked skeptical. [What makes you so sure you're right? You speak with authority, but there is no way a low-level Changeling like you can truly know as much as you think.]

"You're right." Unarin admitted. "I don't know everything, but neither did I claim to. I merely observe and contemplate before comprehending. I will say though, your constant referencing to 'weaklings' and the status of yourself and others says a lot about you. You view our society as a hierarchy. You value reaching the top. But why? Is it because once you reach the top, you plan to make sweeping changes that will make society better or worse for all? Is it because the climb to the precipice of power gives you a thrill that can't be replicated in any other way? Or do you seek power just so that others will respect and fear you?"

For the first time, Dosena's expression changed from that of an adversary to that of an inquirer. She lowered her eyes and fell into thought as she contemplated Unarin's words.

[I... do not know.] Dosena admitted, her tone softer than before. [Psions seek power. We do so because... it is what we are.]

Unarin shook its head. "No. That is not a good enough answer. You have clearly not put any thought into it. I want you to meditate in solitude until you can come up with an answer that speaks to the Truth behind your existence. Don't speak some line you were fed when you were an Initiator. Speak from the heart. Assess who you are as a person, then determine who you want to be. Only in this way can you rid yourself of the ego that might someday become your crippling weakness."

Dosena raised her eyes. She looked at Unarin evenly.

[...I shall do that, then. We will speak once I have thought the matter over more carefully.]

A moment later, she waved her hand, then flickered away, disappearing into a quiet part of the ship.

Some time passed. Unarin resumed reading their journal, and everything became silent once more.

Muuxunuu cleared its throat. "You fooled that Psion well. This one even came to believe you did not value your life in the slightest. You are skilled in the art of deception."

"There was no deception." Unarin said calmly. "If you think there was, then you have not been listening to my words."

"Do you truly not fear death?" Muuxunuu pressed. "Even this one must admit, we feel apprehension at the thought of our future demise. More so when that demise could be upon us sooner than expected."

Unarin smiled. "All this time, you've been acting like the average calm and collected Changeling, but it turns out you do have emotions after all. Maybe you are more of an individual than you first thought."

Muuxunuu lowered its eyes. "Perhaps you are correct. However, this one does not believe that individuality is beneficial to the collective as a whole. Individual pursuits will inevitably bring about selfish desires. Those desires will bring about one's downfall. It would be better for this one to purge itself of its fear, though... we are uncertain of how to do so."

Unarin sighed. "Fear is as valuable as all other emotions. But since you do not understand the intrinsic value of emotions, there is little need to say more. Only if you willingly think over their value and raise in your mind will we be able to make further headway."

Unarin waved his hand. "Now, if you would be so kind, please leave me to my writing. I have much to add to my journal today."

Muuxunuu nodded. "Of course. This one will leave you in peace."

Time continued to pass. The 11-ALX made its way through the void toward its final destination, Reldis-02, and during that period, Unarin and Muuxunuu spoke again on several occasions. It was a long journey of 7,000 light-cycles from Volgarius to Reldis-02, and at Warp 7, that entailed a two-month trip, with a couple extra cycles thrown in for good measure.

It was a boring journey, but the time passed quickly enough. And after their near-demise at the maw of the X-73 Vantablack, the crew had more than enough excitement for the rest of the trip. They were planning to spread news of the Void Beast to hopefully earn merits and promotions.

Of course, Unarin did not care about any of this. The Changeling kept to itself, doing its duties and writing in its journal, occasionally speaking to other Volgrim to pass the time. But beyond that, multiple cycles passed, and soon the world of Reldis-02 came into focus.

Still, it would be several standard-time-units before the ship was allowed to land. Void traffic on this particular world was surprisingly dense, and the traffic controllers wanted to make sure no saboteurs infiltrated them.

Captain Goldis walked up behind Unarin and lightly clapped the Changeling on the back. "Well, Unarin, it's been good knowing you. It seems this is where we'll be parting ways."

"Yes it does, Captain." Unarin said, turning to bow respectfully to him. "I offer my thanks for the fine treatment of myself and Muuxunuu."

"Oh? You two are friends?" Goldis asked.

"We met aboard the ship. However, since we are both Changelings, and since the Technopaths here treated us well, I still wished to extend my gratitude for both our sakes. I have experienced bigotry many times over the years, but your ship was much more pleasant than I could have hoped."

Goldis snorted. "Hmph, well, that's probably because you and Muuxunuu did such a good job scanning for us. Thanks to you, we gained precious time units to escape the Vantablack. We ultimately survived, at least in part because of your excellent work. We owe you our lives."

Goldis paused.

"By the way. What are you planning to do here, on Reldis-02?"

Unarin shrugged. "Nothing in particular. I wish to travel and expand my horizons. I will work various jobs to increase my knowledge base. Beyond that, my plans are fluid as can be."

"Is that so?" Goldis muttered. He looked away and touched his chin thoughtfully. "Does that mean you didn't come here because of... Exigent-13?"

Unarin cocked its head. "I am unfamiliar with that name."

"It's a secret new drug a few of my colleagues were working on." Goldis said, lowering his voice. "It's not going to be secret for long, though. It was worked on by several Technopaths and Changelings in the Melkia system. Apparently, they've found a way to drastically reduce the body's aging process. Even more incredibly, the drug affects not only the individual, but all their future progeny. We believe it might be the key to immortality."

Unarin appeared intrigued. "You believe this drug to be effective?"

"It's been in trial for over 100 cycles." Goldis said quietly. "Honestly... I wouldn't normally tell a Changeling about it, but I'm sure your leaders know already. It's planned to be distributed all throughout the Volgrim Empire, and Reldis-02 will be the staging point. The Patriarchs and Matriarchs wish to lower the death rate by 99% in order to facilitate faster expansion across the galaxy."

Goldis continued. "Honestly, if the Technopaths had developed the drugs all by ourselves, we might have hoarded it for ourselves, but it seems the Changelings were integral in creating the formula. But anyway, I'm telling you all this because I was authorized to bring along a stash of Exigent-13 for any outstanding prospects I encountered."

The Captain glanced around, then carefully reached into his uniform and pulled out a small syringe.

"Inject it into your neck. And don't worry, I won't get in any trouble for this. Just between you and me, I've already been inoculated. Due to certain services rendered during a recent conflict in the Serris system, and because I was getting old, I was given a few dozen of these. I've handed several out, but only to people I thought were truly worthy."

Unarin was moved. He carefully took the syringe and nodded. "Goldis. Thank you. I do not fear death, but living longer cannot be said to be bad, either. I will graciously accept this gift. In the future, if you have need of me, feel free to ask."

"Haha... that's what I like about you, kid. You're not as stuffy and pretentious as those other Changelings." Goldis said, clapping Unarin on the back again. "And don't worry. I'll make sure Muuxunuu gets an injection too. Their contribution during this voyage was just as great as yours. Though... I'm not really fond of their personality."

Unarin shrugged. "Such are Changelings. My people are a simple lot, but the truth is they were not born this way. They choose to live their lives according to their ideals of logic. I simply cannot allow myself to think the same way. I'm too different."

"You're great just the way you are." Goldis said, before giving a nod and walking away.

When the voyage had first started, Goldis had been cold and rude when he spoke to Unarin. But now, after suffering a life and death situation together, the two of them had grown much closer. Goldis had even found he enjoyed speaking to Unarin regarding many different matters.

Who knew? Perhaps someday, their seed of a friendship would bear fruit that would change the fate of the galaxy.

The 11-ALX eventually drew within Reldis-02's gravity well. It fell to the planet below and ignited its thrusters, landing safely in the main city of Hafiya.

It was a simple city, one made of stone and glass, build upon a world rich in exotics but limited in life-forms. A rocky world with vegetation that mainly came in the form of fast-growing vines, weeds, and ground-heavy greenery that somehow didn't morph into trees.

Unarin inhaled deeply as they stepped off the ship.

"A new adventure awaits."

Part 727: Making New Friends

Reldis-02. Starport of Ageko City. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

After Unarin left the 11-ALX, the first thing they did was find room and board. Before the 11-ALX had landed, everyone on the crew had clearly noted the planet's anomalies, but it wasn't until Unarin walked through the bustling city hub that the Changeling experienced the planet's irregularities from a firsthand observational experience.

The first thing Unarin observed was that the upper atmosphere was shrouded in a permanent haze. Not clouds, but fog. When the ship passed through the planet's atmosphere, it had been struck multiple times by extremely powerful lightning, and as it turned out, Reldis-02 had a permanent storm that crackled and banged in its atmosphere. Volgrim scientists estimated this storm had been active for hundreds of millions of cycles, and it may have been caused by an unusually active planet core... or perhaps something else.

Either way, the storm was what made Reldis so attractive to new prospectors. As it just so happened, the planet's crust was filled with low level exotics that were highly energized. The Volgrim had only landed here two hundred cycles ago, and now there was a gold rush of new Technopaths coming to dig down into the planet's crust, and Changelings who wanted to study its unique life forms for themselves.

Reldis did not have much life on its surface. However, the life it did have was extremely dangerous. There were really only two types: Herbivorous creatures that subsisted off the abundant low-level vegetation, and apex exobeasts that constantly prowled around, battling one another for dominance of a given region while feeding off the herbivores.

Because of the planet's constant lightning storms, anything that stuck up out of the ground attracted the energy in the skies. This meant that building structures was extremely dangerous for the first Technopaths to make landfall here. But, once the initial cities were setup, the lightning storms became a constant source of practically free, inexhaustible fuel that could be used to power the cities. It also gave the planet a natural defense system in case hostile aliens were to try and fly in without knowing what awaited them, not that the Volgrim had encountered any such creatures.

Ageko City was the main city that starships landed and took off from. In fact, it was the only one on the entire planet, because protecting ships from the constant storms was expensive! Once any Volgrim had made planetfall, they needed to shuttle around via purpose-built puddle-jumpers that were designed to completely negate the effects of the planet's electrical bombardment. The shuttles could even power themselves up by flying directly into the storm! From there, those shuttles would travel to distant parts of Reldis where they would land and dock inside underground bases where the lightning storms couldn't reach them.

Unarin had read up on the planet before arrival. The Changeling knew what to expect, but it turned out that reading from a dossier and experiencing the planet's uniqueness in person was drastically different.

As Unarin left the ship and walked down the streets, its skin started to crackle slightly. It wasn't exactly a painful feeling, but it did feel unpleasant. As it turned out, Reldis's inhabitants had to deal with a constant feeling of static electricity sparking on their skin, which they termed 'the Crackling'. When touching anything metal, they would get slightly jolted, which was a constant annoyance they simply had to get used to.

Thus, the Changeling was constantly shocking itself, over and over, completely by accident, driving its irritation levels through the roof.

"How aggravating!" Unarin growled after accidentally brushing its hand against a light pole. The zap that followed made its body flinch in pain. Even a million of these zaps would cause no permanent damage, let alone death, but they still hurt!

Unarin cursed under its breath in a decidedly non-Changeling manner. It approached a lodging building for new arrivals and grumbled when it saw the prices listed.

"Fifteen Veds per night? This is extortion. They're clearly trying to take advantage of ignorant new arrivals."

A Technopath nearby happened to overhear Unarin's grumbling. His face turned angry. "Shut up, shitling! The prices are fair! What do you know?! Fat-eyed bastard. Prices are high because of the maintenance costs. If you think it's expensive here, try going deeper into the city!"

The Technopath couldn't possibly have gotten offended for no reason. Unarin quickly deduced he must be either the owner, a manager, or one of the employees who took an unusual pride in his work; enough to suffer a blow to his ego when he overheard Unarin's words.

Unarin normally would have ignored the angry fool, but the fact he saw fit to fire off such a vicious slur caused Unarin's expression to distort.

"Where do you get off insulting potential patrons for your establishment?" Unarin snapped back. The Changeling seemed angry on the surface, but in reality it was quite calm. Unarin didn't allow the words of others to have any power over its psyche, but sometimes pretending otherwise could be beneficial. "I think I will take my business elsewhere!"

"Bahaha! Like I care! This is the busiest hotel in the entire city. We always have a 99% occupancy rate! I was one of the first people to set up on Reldis, and my position has become unshakable! You go ahead and scurry off to a hotel more befitting your kind, shitling!"

Unarin stared at the idiot running his mouth. Now that the choice not to stay here also meant not passing Veds on to a bigot, the decision was a lot easier.

"That I shall do." Unarin said, returning its voice to calm. It walked away, and the owner of the hotel threw even more insults its way. Unarin ignored them all.

Ultimately, one lowly man meant nothing to Unarin. The Changeling had heard countless vicious words directed its way throughout the cycles. It had lived a difficult life, seeing the beauty of the world stomped down repeatedly by the greedy and maniacal.

One relatively pleasant ship-ride could not undo thirty cycles of abuse. Unarin knew that the ugliness of its fellow Volgrim would always rear its head in the worst of ways.

The Changeling started to depart, only to pause when it saw Muuxunuu heading toward the entrance to the hotel. After thinking for a moment, Unarin intercepted its comrade.

"Wait." Unarin said. "Come with me. Do not patronize this establishment. The owner is vicious toward our kind, and the prices are extremely high."

Muuxunuu didn't even question Unarin. "Very well. Do you know of a better establishment we could lodge in?"

"Not yet. I was about to start looking though."

"Understood. This one will follow your lead, then." Muuxunuu replied.

The two Changelings walked side-by-side, leaving the hotel behind. They headed deeper into the city, marveling at Reldis's sights together.

Vines crawled all over the city grounds, climbing up walls and annoying the hell out of the Volgrim. Of course, the Volgrim were the real invaders, but as colonizers, they simply viewed anything that encroached upon their turf as an invader itself. A lot of efforts had been attempted to rid the Volgrim of the irritating vines, but it turned out thanks to Reldis's unique ecology, they were extremely resistant to energy, flames, and cutting implements. The vines grew fast. Any individual strand could grow up to a full meter per rotation. More if the vines managed to latch their way onto energy sources. They had a sort of primitive intelligence to them, one that sought out sources of power.

Power blackouts happened infrequently whenever the vines wormed their way back into the main power grid control systems. The Volgrim would tear the vines out and burn them to ash, but a few weeks later the vines would have regrown again, more stubborn than any Sentient life-form ever could be.

Thus, Unarin and Muuxunuu were constantly tripping over the damn things. Vines were stretched out all over the streets, with some patches of ground more densely packed than others. The further the Changelings walked, the more they comprehended the scale of the vine invasion.

"Over there." Unarin said, gesturing toward an inn that listed its lodging prices on a sign outside. "The rates are much fairer. Only eight Veds per cycle."

"An acceptable price." Muuxunuu replied. The two of them started to make their way over when they heard a loud ruckus down a side alley.

Unarin glanced over. Its eyes shifted as it spotted half a dozen Technopath gang members with illegal body mods surrounding a pair of well-dressed Changelings, one black and one green. One of the Technopaths sent a brutal punch flying and struck the green Changeling, sending it sprawling to the ground. The green one shuddered, then fell still, not getting back up.

"Bahaha, looks like the skulker's dead!" One of the gang members laughed. "Couldn't even take one hit. That's the thing, your kind are made of twigs! Frail little bodies with nothing to back you up! Now hand over your Veds, or you'll end up like the other one!"

One of the gang members pointed an energy weapon at the Changeling's chest, and the black one trembled with a mixture of anger and fear.

"This-this one will give you all its Veds! Please, please take them! This one did not mean any offense!"

"Now that's more like it! Shouldn't have acted so tough in the first place!" The gang leader laughed.

Muuxunuu shivered. "Should... should we do something, Unarin?"

"We are not strong enough to intervene." Unarin replied. "We would only be endangering ourselves."

Just as the black Changeling handed over its bag full of Veds, an alarm went off half a block up the street. Unarin spotted several Technopath Enforcers running and levitating toward the gang members, which caused all of them to break away and run for their lives.

"Haha, scatter! They can't catch all of us!" The gang leader shouted.

Just as quickly as the disturbance happened, it was over. The gang members fled with the Enforcers hot on their trail. However, the black and green Changeling were left behind. Not one of the Technopath Enforcers even bothered to give them a second look. It seemed they were not hunting the gang members to protect these Changelings, but instead because the gangs threatened other Technopaths in the area.

Unarin and Muuxunuu jogged over to their fellow Changelings. The expression on the black one's face seemed emotionless, but Unarin could sense a deep sorrow when it touched its comrade's chest.

"Dead..." The black one said quietly. "Why was this one unable to move? Why was this one's body frozen in fear? Why is the universe so cold and heartless? We did nothing wrong..."

Unarin knelt down next to the black one. "It is because the Changelings are weak, friend. I am Unarin. This is my companion, Muuxunuu. And you are?"

"This one's designation is Randis." The Changeling said, its calm tone hiding the pain in its heart. "This one... has a selfish request. Please assist this one in carrying its companion elsewhere. They deserve a proper goodbye."

Unarin and Muuxunuu nodded. The two of them took up the task of loading the dead Changeling's body so Randis would not have to make contact and traumatize itself further.

"Thirty more rotations, and this one's companion would have achieved its first Osmosis." Randis lamented. "Now its lineage has ended. What a tragedy. All because of the greed of simple-minded bullies."

Unarin arranged for someone to come by and retrieve the body. The Volgrim were not a superstitious lot, least of all the Changelings. They believed that the dead should return to the soil and become nutrients for the next generation. Thus, the dead Changeling would be buried outside the city, its body in an unmarked grave, where the planet would consume it.

Unfortunately, Changelings possessed extremely weak bodies. They were not capable fighters, so even a single punch from a Technopath, especially a powerful thuggish one like the gang members, could kill them instantly.

"Are you new to this city?" Randis asked. "This one... can show you around if you like. This one has lived here for 127 rotations. This one has knowledge of the local safe areas... as well as the dangerous ones."

Unarin gestured toward the lodging they were about to enter. "And that one?"

"Dangerous. Very dangerous." Randis said with regret. "This one should have walked the longer path, but this one and its companion, Ledd, were too hasty. We cut through the Thumper Gang's territory and paid the price. You would do well to learn from our mistakes."

Unarin nodded. "We Changelings have to stick together. Thank you for saving us from making a terrible mistake. Can you point us toward a safe lodging?"

"Of course." Randis answered. "This one is grateful for the assistance you rendered, however meager. We must demonstrate our gratitude, at the least."

Together, the red, pink, and black Changelings made their way down the city streets, taking a long and circuitous route from the eastern starport toward the central-western part of Ageko City. Eventually, they arrived in a run-down area, with buildings that were poorly maintained and vines everywhere.

"It is not much, but this is where many Changelings live." Randis said. "We have limited power and water access here. However, this one is friends with a certain individual who is extremely adept at biological engineering. She is a master of her craft, and is working on a solution to extract energy from the vines to simultaneously choke and slow their growth, and to turn them into a source of renewable energy for our side of the city. Let us introduce you."

Unarin raised an eyebrow. She?

This was not a term used to address Changelings. Pronouns were used exclusively for the other sub-species.

Weaving around the vines, Randis led the two into a small shack with stairs that went underground.

"The Crackling is reduced significantly underground, so you will feel much less of it on your skin." Randis explained. "The vines also do not like to go underground, so they will not encroach on us down here."

They emerged from the narrow hallway into a rather spacious underground interior, dimly lit by candles and fire, with vents in the ceiling to suck fresh air down and release the smoke as well.

However, despite the primitive lighting, there was still a bustling community underground. An entire rainbow of Changelings greeted Unarin and Muuxunuu's eyes as they realized they had stumbled into a thousand-strong underground living space for their kind.

The accommodations were modest, even meager. But Changelings were simple creatures. They had few desires, and lived without need for luxuries. In a way, they would seem a lot like monks to Earth-dwelling species.

"Over here." Randis said. It guided the red and pink newcomers over to a room tucked away off to the side, where the synthetic blue light of an underground computer system lit up the area, rather than the red and orange firelight they had seen outside.

In this room, there were a small handful of Technopaths. Unarin was extremely surprised, because these Technopaths seemed right at home. They didn't appear to mind living around Changelings, and their gazes were friendly when they saw the two newcomers being led inside.

A female Technopath walked over. She was extremely beautiful, even considering the species difference, with a few elegantly buried nodes hidden on her person, but otherwise she was clothed in a designer dress from the homeworld. She had bright purple skin, with spots and patterns arranged on her body that drew any observer's eyes all the way up and down her form. Of course, Changelings had no sexual interest, let alone in other species, so Unarin and Muuxunuu merely observed the purple-colored Technopath woman with appreciation for her beautiful appearance.

"Randis, where is Ledd?" The Technopath asked. "You two were late to return by thirty time-units."

Randis lowered its eyes. "We... encountered trouble. Unfortunately, Ledd has... departed us. He was struck by a leader of the Thumper Gang."

"Oh." The Technopath said, her voice becoming quiet. "I see. I'm... I'm sorry, Randis. We will hold a memorial for Ledd in a few time-units. At the least, I am glad you made it back alive. And who are these two?"

She turned her attention to Unarin and Muuxunuu, and Randis naturally introduced them.

"They saved this one's life." It explained. "They did not realize they had trodden into the Thumper Gang's territory, and would have met a terrible end. This one took it upon itself to bring them here."

"Any friends of Randis are friends of mine." The Technopath said. "Oh, where are my manners? Hello, and it is nice to meet you. My name is Psymin of Clan Miralax. I am merely a humble bio-researcher of no renown."

"Psymin." Unarin repeated, bowing his head in greeting. "I am glad to meet you. From what Randis tells me, your work here might just save the city from these vines."

Psymin snorted. "As if I care about the damn city. I will help clean up this local area. If anyone outside it wants access to my tech once completed, they will have to pay for the crimes they have committed against your people!"

Unarin cocked its head. "You are referring to...?"

"The systematic oppression of the Changelings by Technopaths." Psymin spat angrily. "I have seen it too many times in my life. Your people are beaten down and trod upon, your unique abilities looked down upon as if they are less valid than our affinity to technology. It disgusts me."

Muuxunuu's eyes sparkled faintly. "This one is pleased to hear that you have aligned yourself as an ally of the Changelings. This one thanks you for any efforts you make toward assisting us."

Psymin cocked her head. She looked between Unarin and Muuxunuu carefully.

"You two are quite different. Unarin, why do you speak so strangely? Muuxunuu sounds like a normal Changeling, but you feel a lot more... unique."

"I was raised by Technopaths for a while." Unarin explained. "You see, my progenitor passed away shortly after it spawned my existence. I was raised in a Technopath household for a time before returning to my people. Thus, my sense of identity has become more individualized over time."

"Interesting!" Psymin exclaimed, clapping her hands cutely. "I lived with Changelings when I was younger. That's what made me so aware of the way your people were treated. I think you and I are going to become good friends!"

"I should certainly hope so." Unarin said with a smile. "I do enjoy making more friends."

The group of four bantered for a while, and eventually Psymin brought them over to her computer terminal.

"This is the project I've been working on." She explained. "I took a sample of Dolgrimite DNA and started genetically splicing it into the tip of a local vine. By doing this, I was able to make a connection with the vine, but that access point is extremely weak, and it broke down quickly. Even so, I have come to believe that gene editing is the path to future successes in my efforts. Turning these vines from a frustrating infestation into a source of energy would drastically improve life on Reldis!"

"Gene editing..." Unarin said quietly. "Interesting."

"Hm? Do you know something about my field?" Psymin asked.

"I... don't think so." Unarin said, though its expression shifted to one of confusion. "But... I feel as though I might."

"That wouldn't be surprising." Psymin commented. "Changelings know a lot more about biological processes than most Technopaths. Maybe your progenitor was a genetic biologist before they passed away. They might have passed that knowledge on to you."

Unarin looked at her in confusion. "Progenitors... can do such a thing?"

This time, it was Randis and Muuxunuu who looked surprised.

"Unarin." Muuxunuu said softly. "The primary goal of a Changeling during Osmosis is to spawn a descendant, then pass their knowledge on to that descendant through Genetic Transference. In this way, the knowledge continues to improve, generation by generation."

Unarin blinked in surprise. He had never heard this before, despite being a Changeling himself. It wasn't that the information was a secret, but more that he had never been especially close to any other Changelings, and it wasn't something they discussed much. Why would they? Every Changeling knew how Osmosis worked. They simply didn't need to discuss it. It was as simple as breathing to them... unless a Changeling died immediately after Osmosis. But even then, the descendant would be quickly picked up by other Changelings and raised properly to integrate into their society.

Unarin was an anomaly. An aberration that rarely existed anywhere else.

"If my progenitor failed to pass on its knowledge, does that mean the knowledge is lost forever?" Unarin asked.

Randis touched its chin thoughtfully. "This one is uncertain. This one has not come into contact with Featureless Ones before. This one will ask around to try and uncover the answer for you."

"Thank you. I would appreciate that." Unarin said, scratching its head with more confusion than before.

Whenever Unarin looked at the screen, it felt as if it possessed knowledge far beyond that of an ignorant junior. Unarin could almost swear it knew things about the genetic codes that would blow Psymin's mind... if only it could tell her.

Frustratingly, the knowledge was out of Unarin's reach, like a forgotten word sitting on the tip of a tongue.

"Why don't you tell me more about this project?" Unarin requested. "Perhaps if I study your work on the vines, I'll unlock the knowledge my progenitor left inside me."

"It's worth a shot!" Psymin chirped. She smiled cheerfully, her mouth-tendrils shaking with happiness. It wasn't often someone showed a real interest in her work, and Unarin's eyes weren't even turning glazed!

Perhaps this random Changeling could provide an impetus for her breakthrough in bio-technology?

Part 728: Making New Enemies

Reldis-02. Starport of Ageko City. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

Unarin was not someone who was quick to anger. Indeed, like all Changelings, Unarin knew to keep its emotions in check at all times. But that did not mean it did not ever experience such emotions.

Later that day, when Reldis's star had begun to set, Unarin was sitting inside its room when Muuxunuu walked up to the door and knocked lightly.

"Unarin. The sun has fallen. It is time."

The red Changeling looked up. It nodded, then rose to its feet. Unarin was now wearing a sleek black jumpsuit, one that covered all of its tall, gangly limbs from head to toe. Only its eyes stuck out, and those were pitch-black.

Changelings were extremely slender creatures. Technopaths and other Volgrim subspecies would be considered 'normal' by Terran standards, but Changelings looked definitively 'alien.' Their bodies were extremely weak, but as frail as they seemed, they were not defenseless.

A cold gleam entered Unarin's eyes. Along with Muuxunuu and Randis, the three of them stole out of the underground Changeling haven and began sneaking through the darkness of Ageko's night. As it happened, because of the fog in the atmosphere, nights were practically pitch-black, and lights were essential to prevent Volgrim from casually tripping over the damned vines crawling up and down every possible ledge in the city.

Unarin took the lead, with Muuxunuu and Randis following swiftly behind. The three of then began sneaking back over to the east side of the city. It wasn't long before they arrived outside the hotel with the bigoted owner who had insulted Unarin earlier that day.

The three of them stealthily avoided Enforcer patrols. They used a special device given to them by Psymin to turn off the lights in any direction they pointed her remote. In this way, with their stealth suits worn, they could avoid catching the eyes of any passerbys.

Naturally, it was obvious what they were planning to do. They broke inside the hotel and entered an employee-records room. Since it was night-time, everyone was gone.

Unarin carefully examined the personnel files, then whispered a few names to Muuxunuu and Randis. The two of them nodded, then all three split up.

Twenty time-units later, they exited the hotel, stowing away the small knives they had brought.

After meeting outside, they exchanged glances. Unarin nodded. Muuxunuu nodded. Randis did too.

All three targets were dead. They hadn't killed the hotel owner, but had instead murdered three of his progeny, leaving him alive to suffer emotional agony for the coming cycles. It wasn't about taking out the bigot, but about sending a message.

Well, he would probably hate Changelings even more, but that was okay too. At least now he had a reason.

After taking care of him, Unarin nodded at Randis. "Lead us there."

Randis nodded back, and the three of them took off once again. This time, they infiltrated a large residential housing complex, one where Randis told Unarin the Thumper Gang primarily resided. Even this late at night, many of the gang members would still be awake, but that was alright. Changelings could be eerily stealthy. Their small bodies had little mass, and their footsteps were practically soundless.

In this way, the three Changelings exacted a new revenge on the Thumpers who killed Randis's comrade, Ledd. They carefully entered the rooms of more than a dozen sleeping members of the gang, all high-ranked ones with powerful body mods that could easily kill any member of the trio in one hit. By working together, Muuxunuu was able to shoot a muffling device onto the face of a target, Unarin used another snaring device to bind their body in a constricting net, and Randis injected their necks with a paralyzing nerve agent.

By executing their timing with careful precision, they were able to do all three actions simultaneously, waking the target up only for them to become immediately bound in something much tighter than a spiderweb.

"Mmmph! Mmmgh!" The first Technopath huffed through the mask binding his face. He shuddered on the bed and tried to wiggle, but the rapid-constricting net bound him so tightly he couldn't get any leverage. Once the Changelings sensed he was appropriately immobilized, they stabbed him in the skull, the throat, and the heart all in unison.

It was a quick death. Perhaps too merciful, but they were on a timer.

After confirming the death, the Changelings began going room to room. Nobody had a clue that the faint thumping noises upstairs were actually the last dying moments of their dear brothers.

Within one standard time unit, the Changelings had killed two dozen of the top ranking members of the Thumper Gang, including the leader. The remainders were only low-level thugs who didn't matter, so they carefully made their way back outside, escaping into the night.

Come morning, the eastern hotel fell into chaos when the bigoted owner awoke to find his sons and daughter murdered in their beds. He screamed and raged, but there was nothing he could do. The culprits had escaped. A similar wailing and grinding of teeth followed when the remnants of the Thumper Gang found all their top brass executed through vicious means in the middle of the night.

This was what Changelings did best. This was how they fought.

The Psions fought head-on. They could not stand dishonorable sneak attacks and other such methods.

The Changelings were the opposite. They had no chance in a fair fight, so they waited until their enemies were vulnerable, then ruthlessly butchered them, bringing about the swiftest possible end.

Technopaths and Dolgrimites aligned much more with the Psions in this regard. The Technopaths were more than capable of underhanded acts of violence, including sneaky assassinations, but they still preferred to rely on war technology to win frontal assaults.

The Dolgrimites were even more extreme. They just beat the hell out of each other until one of the fighters stopped moving... sometimes permanently.

Later, Unarin and the others returned to their base. After they arrived, Randis bowed its head.

"This one wishes to express its gratitude, Unarin. Thanks to you, we were able to smoothly avenge the death of our friend. Our heart is moved by your generosity."

Unarin pulled down its mask, revealing its red head once again. "There is no need for thanks. We are comrades. We stand together in order to lift one another up. Besides, I wanted those thugs dead just the same as you. It wasn't even a favor. I would have done it myself if you hadn't come along."

"Nevertheless, this one is deeply appreciative. If in the future if you should ever need a favor, this one will respond to the call."

Randis bowed, then left. After that, Unarin was alone with Muuxunuu again.

"How many have you killed in the past?" Muuxunuu asked.

"I don't keep track. Probably fifty or so." Unarin replied.

"Mmm. This one has not killed as many as you. This one had only killed ten enemies before tonight. This one always tried not to kill unless ordered by a higher Changeling. This one believes murder and killing are... not ideal."

"You didn't have to come along." Unarin pointed out.

"Perhaps not, but you did save this one from harm by warning this one about that hotel owner. It was only right to repay you for that favor."

Unarin chuckled. "Haha... let us speak of this matter no more. I'm tired, and I'm going to sleep. Good night, Muuxunuu."

"Good night, Unarin." Muuxunuu said, bowing its head while pressing its palms together respectfully.

The two split apart and returned to their respective rooms. Unarin meditated to calm its emotions after the hectic night, then it went to sleep.

The next morning, Unarin awoke, consumed a simple and plain bowl of nutrients, then sat in its room meditating. At some point, Randis showed up and knocked before entering.

"Greetings, and good news." Randis said. "This one has found a fellow Changeling in a northern zone. That Changeling informed us that they possessed knowledge of how to unlock the memories within a Featureless One. So long as we pay them a visit, we should be able to unlock your missing knowledge."

Unarin smiled. "Many thanks, Randis. When shall we head over there?"

"We can do so now, if you wish. This one is presently unoccupied." Randis suggested.

And so, they did. Naturally, as soon as they were about to leave, Muuxunuu popped out and joined them. The trio were becoming fast friends, even if two of the three did not show major outward emotions on the subject.

After donning spiffy suits that made them look like professional scientists and observers, the three departed the underground area and headed toward the northern area, where more Changelings lived. Unlike Randis's enclave, the northern one was not underground. It was a professional facility that was built aboveground, and one of three major hubs on Reldis where Changelings held a certain level of prestige. The Northern Research Lab was a place that, at present, researched exobeasts on the surface, but also those damned vines. They were everywhere, and until the Volgrim learned how to control them, valuable resources had to be diverted toward uncovering their biological weaknesses.

"Unarin, this one wishes to know what you planned to do on Reldis." Randis stated after they had walked some distance away from their underground home. "What are your plans for the future?"

Unarin touched its chin thoughtfully. "I'm not sure. I felt stifled on Volgarius. The Changelings there followed a strict hierarchy. It bothered me a lot. I came here to... escape."

"A strict hierarchy is not so bad." Randis retorted. "Everyone knows who they are and where they stand. Not like here. On Reldis, we Changelings often juggle multiple roles at once. For example, this one is a hated failure and a prestigious researcher at the same time. The Technopaths hate this one, but its fellow Changelings get along well with it."

"That statement is not unique to Volgarius." Muuxunuu said quietly. "Even on Volgarius, an individual can have multiple roles. What Unarin is referring to is... the sense of belonging to a role that being in a hierarchy enforces. Such strictness leaves little room for individuality."

Unarin looked at Muuxunuu in surprise. "Did you feel the same way on Volgarius?"

"Indeed." Muuxunuu answered. "This one was often shunted off to perform menial tasks. This one felt they had potential that was being overlooked. This one wanted to expand their horizons and learn more about what sorts of things we Changelings could achieve."

Unarin smiled. "Then perhaps together, we can-"

The red Changeling paused. All three of them came to a stop when they saw a group of Enforcers hustling toward them with weapons drawn.

"You there! Don't move!" The Lead Enforcer, a heavily augmented fellow with grey skin shouted.

The Changelings froze. Randis's heart skipped a beat as it realized they might be in trouble for the murders they committed last night. Had someone seen them? Had a stray camera caught them fleeing the scene?

The Lead Enforcer growled gruffly. He slowed to a walk, then stomped toward the trio, his eyes fixed on Unarin.

"Scan the red and pink one!" The Lead Enforcer said.

A subordinate strode forward and waved a scanner over Unarin, then over Muuxunuu.

"It's them. Unarin and Muuxunuu, from the 11-ALX. They arrived on the previous rotation."

The Lead Enforcer snarled viciously. "You thieves! How dare you take what isn't yours!"

Unarin blinked. As far as Unarin could remember, it had not stolen anything at all.

"I am confused. What theft do you speak of?" Unarin asked. "We have stolen nothing."

"Don't play stupid with me! You shitlings are always stealing!" The Lead Enforcer shouted, taking a step forward and raising his fist threateningly.

Unarin flinched. It couldn't be helped. A single punch from the Lead Enforcer would absolutely kill any Changeling, and it would probably hurt like hell too. Unarin did not recoil in fear, but Muuxunuu and Randis did.

"Tell us where you put the Exigent-13!" The Lead Enforcer shouted. "You were not authorized to acquire any of that substance!"

Unarin's eyes widened slightly. "That substance was given to us by Captain Goldis! We did not steal it!"

The Lead Enforcer sneered. "As if any self-respecting Technopath would hand out such a precious substance so easily. Lieutenant Trivald! Is the substance inside his body?"

He turned to look at his subordinate, Lieutenant Trivald, who shook his head. "No, Commander Kordal. I didn't detect any Exigent-13 inside the Changeling, or on its person."

Kordal smiled cruelly. He turned to tower over Unarin and the other two and leveled his weapon at them. "Well, sounds like you shitlings are in luck! You didn't inject it yet! Take us to where you hid it and return the substance immediately! If you don't, I'll kill you on the spot!"

It was true. Even though Goldis had given Unarin the syringe with Exigent-13 to become ageless, Unarin hadn't injected itself yet. Neither had Muuxunuu. Their reasoning was simple; They didn't know if the substance was safe and without side effects, and they were in no particular rush. They were still young and in no danger of dying of old age. Better to wait until the official release, when it had been more thoroughly tested.

"The Exigent-13 was a gift." Unarin repeated. "We did not steal it."

"Are you talking back to me, fool?! Have you got a death wish? Little pathetic piece of trash shitlings like you had better do as they're told, or suffer the full consequences!"

The Commander hated being 'disrespected'. Without hesitation, he sent a slap flying Unarin's way and slammed the Changeling to the ground. In a single light blow, Unarin went sprawling, a visible imprint left on his face. The other two Changelings jumped in fright. They quickly knelt down to try and help Unarin up, but Unarin's body was already badly injured. The red Changeling could not even stand up on its own.

"Uhh... uhh..." Unarin groaned, its vision swimming.

"You two want to join in on the fun? No? Then take us to the Exigent-13 now!" Kordal spat.

And so, like that, the Changelings bowed their heads, picked up Unarin, and stumbled back toward the underground base. Their arrival, along with Enforcers, caused a terrible uproar. Many Changelings swarmed the area, enraged, but Kordal stood fearless in front of them. With ten other armored and powered Enforcers at his side, he could kill a thousand Changelings without blinking. They might offer the Technopaths some scientific assistance, but if the Changelings didn't stay in line, killing a bunch of them would be no problem at all.

Thus, Unarin and Muuxunuu had no choice but to hand over the Exigent-13 they had been given as a gift. Once the Commander had the serums in his hands, he smiled cruelly.

"This is contraband no shitling should ever possess. Lieutenant, what is the punishment for smuggling Class B narcotics?"

"A minimum of two hundred rotations in a Class B prison, with a maximum punishment multiplying up to ten based on the degree of the crime, sir!" Lieutenant Trivald immediately answered.

"Well, I'd say we can let these two off easy." Kordal said. "Two hundred rotations is a nice, light punishment for the likes of them! Come along then, you two shitling thieves!"

Under the despairing eyes of the other Changelings, Unarin and Muuxunuu were dragged off, and Randis was left behind.

"Please, please, mercy!" Randis begged. "They did not know! Do not place them inside prison!"

"What was that? You want to join them?" Kordal sneered at Randis. "Then congratulations! As an accessory to theft, it seems you're going to get a minimum of sixty rotations alongside them!"

Like this, Randis was manhandled and dragged along, with cuffs slapped onto the Changeling's tiny, frail wrists. All three were led off, with Psymin Miralax and the others watching with helpless, fiery eyes filled with hatred.

They could do nothing. The Enforcers were simply too powerful. The three Changelings were on their own now. Perhaps, if they survived the harshness of the prison, they could return to a sense of normalcy afterward. But unfortunately, the laws were unfair on Reldis. They were unfair everywhere. Depending on which species ran a planet, all the other subspecies would be punished much more heavily for even the most minor of crimes, and the Technopaths were the cruelest of them all. The Psions were considered somewhat fair by comparison.

Unarin's head continued to swim. It was in such bad shape from that one light slap that it seemed as if Unarin would keel over and die sooner rather than later.

It took a standard time-unit or two, but eventually Unarin, Muuxunuu, and Randis were all brought to a prison on the south side of the city. It was a large complex, with three underground levels that were subdivided into minimum security, medium security, and high security.

The top level was almost entirely devoted to imprisoned Changelings. It was the minimum security area, with light defenses, and was constructed of fairly ordinary materials. Because Changelings were so slender, the bars on prison cells were much closer together to prevent them from compressing their bodies and slipping out.

The middle level was where the medium security convicts were placed. Few Changelings were placed there, and among them were only the most dangerous and heinous of criminals. Much more common were the empowered Technopaths who had heavy street-level body augmentations. The medium security wing was constructed of fortified materials that even strong Technopaths couldn't escape.

The bottom level was the high security wing. No Changelings were ever put down there. Only the most vicious and cutthroat Technopaths were imprisoned there, often in fullbody restraints to limit their movement. These Technopaths were often ex-military, professional pirates, and wealthy gang members. They could afford top-of-the-line body mods. They had access to pocket dimensions and all sorts of other high technology. These mods were buried so deeply in their bodies that extracting them would kill the Technopaths, so those mods could only be disabled; not removed entirely. In theory, the High Security wing could even imprison low-level Psions, but nobody wanted to stress-test that assumption.

Thus, when the three newcomers arrived, they were scared senseless. Or at least Muuxunuu and Randis were. Unarin was at death's door. Its body was in terrible condition. With a severe head wound, it was likely to have suffered internal bleeding.

Luckily, Technopath doctors were miracle workers. The Commander chuckled when he saw Unarin being carted off to the surgery ward on arrival.

"Stupid. There's no point in fixing that bastard. You two, throw the pink and black one in minimum. Once that red one's all healed up, put it in maximum security. Any available cell will do!"

Lieutenant Trivald looked at Korvald in surprise. "But sir, the red one's crime doesn't nearly meet the level of maximum. If we put the Changeling in there, it will probably end up..."

Kordal frowned. He leaned toward Trivald and lowered his voice. "That's the point, nitwit. You've gotta keep these shitlings in line. Otherwise, they might resist orders more often, and then it becomes a hassle. Better to show them we mean business. Besides, this 'Unarin' isn't anyone important. It left the homeworld with no notable merits to its name. It has no base of support. Better to turn it into a warning for the others. Once its two friends get out, they'll spread the word, and other Changelings will lower their heads to us out of fear."

The Commander pulled away, then patted his Lieutenant's back. "You see how it all fits together? Gotta keep 'em scared. That way it's nice and easy to push them around while we hunt down the real players in the game."

As the two Technopath Enforcers walked away, Trivald looked at his boss. "By the way, did you hear about the Thumper Gang? Seems someone cut them apart last night."

"That's the life of a thug. You always die eventually." Kordal chuckled.

After the two of them left, Unarin was placed inside a healing chamber. A flood of nutrient-rich medical liquid revitalized the red Changeling's injuries and restored clarity to its mind. Then, when Unarin awoke, it was shipped down to the maximum security level, where the most vicious and vile criminals were left to rot.

As Unarin walked between a pair of prison guards, its expression became somewhat wary. No matter how emotionless Unarin acted, the truth was, it knew it would die at some point in the near future. The Technopaths inside these cells might have their movements restricted, but once everyone was let out for light exercise, someone would be sure to kill Unarin just for existing and being weak.

"This is your cell, Inmate C-1175. You'd better remember it. Free roam time is 1200. That time ends at 1300. If you're not back in your cell by then, you will suffer full consequences."

Unarin's heart clamped up when the Changeling arrived in front of a cell which opened up to reveal a vicious-looking Technopath inside. Before Unarin could even get a good look at its cell-mate, it was pushed inside, and the door closed behind it.

The guards did not even bother to introduce Unarin to its cell-mate. There was no point. Unarin was certain to be dead within a few standard time-units... assuming its cell-mate didn't want to play with its food.

Unarin was put in high security to die. There was no other reason behind its imprisonment. Even an idiot could tell that much.

Standing there, in the cell, Unarin's gaze fell on the Technopath in the room. He was an ugly fellow. Withered, yellow skin. Rotted pustules covered his body's surface. It was evident he had been in the prison a long, long time. Perhaps for ten or more orbits...

The Technopath looked at Unarin. He spread his mouth open in a facsimile of a smile, but his face was truly disgusting. His teeth were all rotted and sticking out in different directions. His eyes were haggard.

Unarin blinked. When looking at this Technopath, somehow, Unarin did not feel fear. Instead, it felt... pity.

"I am Unarin." Unarin said calmly. "What name may I address you by, cell-mate?"

"Haaah..." The Technopath wheezed, coughing weakly. "What use is there in names? You know you're dead, yes? I won't hurt you, Changeling. Don't worry. But the others will. They will kill you... like they did the ones before you. Like they do all my cellmates... haaaah..."

The Technopath's eyes filled with tears of pain, and he coughed quietly several times. Unarin could tell at a glance that the Technopath suffered from a terrible respiratory infection.

"All the same, even if our time together is short, I would prefer not to refer to you as 'you'." Unarin said. The Changeling walked over and sat on the ground, its back against the wall, looking up at the mottled yellow Technopath.

"I was somebody important, once." The Technopath coughed. "I had a name. Status. Power. But that was so, so long ago. Now I have nothing. They imprisoned me for speaking my mind. They're scared, you know. Scared that someone might get a good idea."

The Technopath coughed again.

"Unarin. Let me give you a piece of advice. If you want to make enemies... try to change something."

"What did you try to change?" Unarin asked.

The Technopath chuckled. "I saw things. Things that would someday come to pass. They called me a lunatic. A madman. They sentenced me to rot down here until there was nothing left of me. But I know what I saw. I know who I saw. If those things came to pass, it would mean the end of the current Order. And that scared a lot of people. Scared them enough to want me gone."

The Technopath looked at Unarin sitting on the ground. He smiled, revealing his crooked, rotten teeth.

"My name is Vedric. Former Vizier of Father Zaeed's Temple."

"Vedric." Unarin repeated, bowing its head and pressing its palms together in greeting. "Whether we are friends for a time unit or an eternity, that does not matter. I only hope we will end our lives still as friends."

"Well said." Vedric said, his tone gentle. "I think I might even end up liking you."

Part 729: Unjustly Imprisoned

Reldis-02. South-side Prison, Maximum Security Wing. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

Unarin and Vedric sat across from one another, the Changeling on the floor, and the withered Technopath on the lower bunkbed. Vedric shook his head in resignation.

"It's such a shame the prison wardens want you dead. That's why they put you down here. They know you won't last long. For some reason, they probably expected me to be the one to kill you. Just goes to show how little attention they pay toward the maximum security wing. They don't even remember who I am anymore."

"You were the former Vizier of Father Zaeed's Temple." Unarin said, repeating what Vedric had told him not too long before. "How could anyone forget your identity?"

"I have been in this prison for... perhaps thirty orbits." Vedric said, his eyes wistful. "Most of the guards here now are young replacements for the ones who originally were a part of this prison when I entered. They just see me as the same criminal filth as all the others down here. It is to be expected. My glory days are long past."

"Father Zaeed was the First Volgrim." Unarin said, touching its chin thoughtfully. "The first Dolgrimite to crawl out of the primordial muck and establish the Vol-Laws that would define our people for generations to come. How could someone like you, one of his most loyal adherents, have been cast down from such a high position?"

Vedric chuckled. "Remember what I told you, Unarin? I wanted to change things. This Empire is rotten. It has fallen far from the glory days of our ancestors. The four species are constantly at war. Even if the Dolgrimites keep to themselves now, they would gladly rip apart their brothers and sisters among the Psions, the Technopaths, and the Changelings if we were to step foot on their world. And now? The Technopaths trod upon the Changelings as if you were garbage that had little to offer in value. This, in spite of your great, great additions to the scientific annals."

The old Technopath cleared his throat, which also forced out a wheezy, rasping cough. "Haaah, kuh-kuh. When I was in the temple, I chanced upon a discovery that shook my beliefs to their core. It was a heretical discovery I should have cast aside, but the realization was too shocking for me to ignore. Once I had seen the light, I had to investigate further. That investigation brought me into conflict with the Patriarchs and Matriarchs. They sentenced me to die of old age, imprisoned here for the rest of my life."

"What discovery was it?" Unarin asked, more curious than he had been about anything else in recent cycles. "What could you have uncovered that would make it worth throwing your life away?"

Vedric gave the young Changeling a long, hard look.

"There comes a time in many Volgrim's lives when they uncover a Truth so shocking that it threatens to upend their entire worldview. It was brought to my attention that the biology of the four species was... flawed. And not just a little flawed. Flawed in a way that seemed almost... deliberate."

Unarin was surprised. Had he not just been talking about something similar only the rotation before?

"You are referring to the way each species is missing 'something'?" Unarin asked. "Something that the other species possess?"

Vedric's eyes widened. He looked at Unarin in astonishment. "Well- well yes! Exactly! How did you guess? I've mentioned it to many cell-mates in the past, but few of them understood even when I explained it, and certainly none beat me to the punch like you just did!"

"Mmm. I have had my own doubts." Unarin said, shaking its head quietly.

"I see." Vedric replied, sobering up his expression. "Yes. Each of the four species is missing a component of themselves. The Dolgrimites are feral and savage, lacking in intelligence and curiosity. The Psions are powerful and mighty, but lacking in compassion and empathy. The Technopaths are wise and technologically advanced, but lacking in breadth and love for their own bodies. The Changelings are intelligent and thoughtful, but lacking in individuality and bodily strength."

He continued. "Each of the four species suffers from terrible flaws that hold them back. But what my source informed me of was the possibility that these flaws... might be intentional."

"Intentional?" Unarin repeated. "In what way? Are you implying the species have been tampered with? Who would even have the capability?"

"I do not know." Vedric said quietly. "Someone with great power and influence. Someone ancient, perhaps even ageless. Maybe they died long ago, or maybe they still live to this day. Whoever they are, the evidence I found was compelling. It seemed that our very DNA was altered at some point in our evolutionary past. The Psions, Technopaths, and Changelings did not naturally evolve from the Dolgrimites. We were forcibly split from them!"

This elicited a gasp of shock from Unarin. The Changeling could not believe its ears. "Are you saying three of the sub-species are artificially made?"

"No." Vedric said. "I'm telling you all of them are. It is quite likely the Dolgrimites themselves did not arise via natural evolutionary means. Someone made them. For what purpose? I do not know. Perhaps some ancient god. Perhaps an alien species residing elsewhere within our galaxy we have not yet met. Or... perhaps we have. The thought frightens me. It is entirely possible the Ruling Council of Volgrim might already be under this potential adversary's grip..."

Unarin nodded. The revelations were startling, yet for some reason, they weren't entirely surprising. Unarin felt as if it had already known some, or perhaps many of these things for a long time.

"Who was your source?" Unarin eventually asked.

Vedric hesitated. But then, remembering that Unarin was probably going to die soon, he sighed and shook his head. "It doesn't matter if I tell you or not. The person who informed me of this Truth was actually a Changeling. It came to my temple filled with doubts regarding a discovery it had made while studying the genetic sequences of all four species. Together, we investigated the missing links, and later, I lost touch with it. I have always wondered why..."

"Hmm. Come to think of it..." Vedric said, looking at Unarin a little more closely. "That Changeling looked a bit like you. It also had bright red skin. But ah, I am getting ahead of myself. What was its name again...? Hmm... perhaps..."

A few moments passed. The spark of memory entered old Vedric's eyes.

"Nurima! Yes, that was the Changeling's name."

A silence fell over the cell. Unarin looked at Vedric with disbelief in its eyes.

"Nurima? You said its name was Nurima? But... that was the name of my Progenitor!"

"What?!" Vedric exclaimed, even more shocked than Unarin was. "You... you are the progeny of Nurima?! How is such a coincidence possible? Why did you not recognize me immediately if that were the case?"

Unarin lowered its eyes bitterly. "I am sorry to inform you of this, Vedric. My Progenitor was attacked some twenty-eight orbits ago. It was on the verge of death and had to force a premature Osmosis to form me. It perished from its injuries not three rotations later. I was unable to complete the Genetic Transference. As a result, I have lived as a Featureless One my entire life, lacking all of my Progenitor's memories."

"So that's it... that is why." Vedric said, as he reached out a withered arm, his tendrils gently touching Unarin's shoulder. "I am so sorry, child. Your Progenitor was a genius. Now that I look at you, I see Nurima's shadow in you. You have the same doubts as they once did. You even speak in the same way they did. But alas... you have ended up here, trapped with me. It seems in the end, I will die along with my friend... and their memories."

Unarin scowled angrily. "To think this is why I have lived my life so aimlessly. My Progenitor was murdered because it knew information that threatened the Order! They must have left me alone because I was a Featureless One and could not pass on my knowledge. But now that they have a chance, they're going to eliminate me!"

"That is likely the truth." Vedric replied, pulling his arm away from Unarin's shoulder. "But... you know, I am not ignorant in the ways of Genetic Transference. Before you die, it might be possible to let you regain those memories you lost."

"What is the point now?" Unarin asked, a mixture of bitterness and helplessness in the Changeling's voice. "I am going to die. Even with the memories, what can I accomplish?"

Vedric's expression hardened. "Speak NOT such words! Haaaah! Kuh-kuh! As long as you are alive, there is still hope. There is always hope! Why do you think the Order wants you gone? If news of this got out, it could destabilize their regime! There is nothing they fear more than being pulled from their towers and cast out onto the streets. Besides, the maximum security wing was not designed for Changelings. Look at how wide the bars are! Perhaps you might be able to slip out..."

Unarin looked at the prison cell. Truly, they did seem just barely wide enough that if the Changeling were to shift its body composition...

"You see?!" Vedric exclaimed. "Don't give up hope, child. Never give up. Why do you think I am still alive? I held on because I believed I might be the last person possessing the knowledge I do now. If I remained alive, a day might come where I could escape and spread this information around. Then my life would not be in vain!"

Unarin lowered its head. "I apologize, Vedric. I was not thinking clearly. You are right. Where there is life, there is hope. Please. If you have a way to help me regain my lost memories, I would much appreciate the help."

Vedric smiled. "This old Volgrim was once head of a church that saw millions of adherents from all the species pass through its doors to pay their respects to Father Zaeed. Naturally, I made friends with many Changelings and learned of many secrets. The process of Memory Transference without a Progenitor present is quite ordinary, as the memories are already within you! Come, sit beside me."

Unarin nodded. The Changeling got up, took a few steps forward, and sat beside Vedric. The old Technopath carefully placed two tendrils on the sides of Unarin's head, and two more on the Changeling's forehead and the back of its head.

"Now, listen carefully, child. Close your eyes. Focus your mind. Within you, there is an abyss. That abyss is an illusion. Within the illusion- HMM?!"

Vedric jumped slightly. His eyes widened in shock, which in turn startled Unarin.

"What? What is the matter?" Unarin asked, slightly nervous. "Is something wrong?"

"Wrong? Wrong?! By no means! Incredible! I cannot believe it! This explains so much! Now I understand why Nurima was so far above its peers! It seems your Progenitor unlocked its Mind Realm, and before passing away, it passed that Mind Realm on to you! This- I have not seem something like this before. Just how advanced was Nurima's knowledge of Volgrim biology?"

"What is a Mind Realm?" Unarin asked.

"Hehe, child, you are going to be pleasantly surprised. Mind Realms are extremely rare metaphysical abilities that few Volgrim can obtain. Psions possess the majority of them, and even among High Psions they are quite rare! They allow you to build a miniaturized world within your mind, one in which you have full control over the rules. Most amazingly, yours is fully developed! All of your Progenitor's knowledge is still in there!!"

Vedric was growing visibly more excited. His eyes turned feral, and a hateful gleam entered his eyes.

"Die? No, I will not let Nurima's progeny die here. I'll do anything it takes to get you out, even if I have to futilely fight my way out of this cell protecting you, hahaha! Now, now, let's calm down. This Mind Realm won't matter if I don't unlock the Ancestral Memories for you. Remember, child, these are not just Nurima's memories, but the memories of its predecessors as well. Passed down, one generation after another, these memories are what grant the Changelings their unique biological advantage. Without them, you have been living among the others of your kind as a crippled Volgrim; one missing half its limbs. These memories are sure to make you much more fearsome than you can imagine!"

And so, the two Volgrim began to focus. Vedric carefully guided Unarin through its doubts, and time began to pass.

One time unit became two, and two became fifteen, then thirty...

Eventually, an entire five standard time-units had passed. Vedric was starting to sweat, because while it was somewhat early in the morning, it would be Free Roam time soon. That was when Unarin would be forced out into the open area along with all the battle hardened Psion murderers and criminals. They would surely rip the Changeling apart the moment they laid eyes on him!

Unarin's eyes became glazed. Before long, the Changeling began to drift off.

The world disappeared around Unarin. A new one appeared.

Unarin opened its eyes. Before it, there was now a tall, glittering city, a city made of buildings so large they scraped the stratosphere. The Changeling had never seen a land as advanced as this. Each building was ugly, but utilitarian. The towers rose so high that Unarin could not even come close to seeing their heights from the ground level.

Strange flying vehicles, more advanced than any which currently existed among the Volgrim, buzzed through the air by the hundreds of thousands. The sky itself seemed to be moving, like a swarm of bugs, as endless as an ocean.

A moment later, the city disappeared. Unarin found itself now in a realm of darkness, one where horrifying shadow-monsters slowly walked toward the Changeling. Their eyes were filled with naked hunger. They greedily looked upon the Changeling as a morsel they wished to devour.

"Consume." A ominous, evil voice boomed from the distance. Unarin's eyes went wide with fear as the barely visible monsters leaped at the Changeling.

Before they could make contact, they disappeared as well.

Following this, Unarin found itself inside a realm of white light. All around the Changeling, there were bipedal winged beings bowing toward a being hovering high in the sky. That being was shrouded by a brilliant light which made it impossible for Unarin to perceive. All Unarin could make out were the backsides of these white-feathered, flying beings.

"Hail the Ruler! Hail the god of the Milky Way!" The army of light bellowed!

That vision vanished. In its place, a single figure appeared. It was a Changeling, red in color, laying on a bed inside a hospital room. The Changeling looked similar to Unarin... but much older.

"Progenitor... Nurima..." Unarin whispered, taking a step toward the figure it recognized immediately.

Unarin fought back tears. Never did the Changeling expect it would see its Progenitor again in this life. And yet, the sight was so tragic, so sad, seeing it weak and defenseless like this...

"Progeny..." Nurima said, its voice weak. "You have... finally... unlocked your memories. Long have I awaited your arrival. What you see now is only a sliver of my remaining existence."

Nurima shuddered. Its body grew slightly more hazy.

"I have... held on... for many orbits. But I was near death when I passed my Mind Realm on to you. Listen well... we do not have much time left together."

Unarin walked to the side of the bed. It knelt beside its Progenitor and gently clasped their palms together.

"Speak, Progenitor. I will listen." Unarin vowed.

Nurima coughed. "Good... cough! I... was... part of a long lineage of Changelings. I... was part of a secret Order. The others are all dead. We were... wiped out... by the ruling Volgrim. They did not know of my Mind Realm. If they had, you would have been exterminated too. We learned the Truth... the Truth, Unarin. Our four species are all artificial."

"I know, Progenitor." Unarin said. "I have spoken to Vedric. He has told me everything he knew."

"Vedric...?" Nurima asked, a rare smile playing upon its face. "Oh... Vedric... he still lives. Good. That is good. Vedric was one of the few who would listen. He is an ally you can trust. If he has helped you, then I am truly gladdened. Listen, Unarin... there is something that not even Vedric knows."

Nurima gritted their teeth. The Changeling leaned toward Unarin.

"I solved it. The secret of our failed biology. Haha... I planned... to use this knowledge... but I was too old. My body was too weak. And then the assassination attempt. I had no choice. I passed my Truth onto you. Now, you have the knowledge. You can solve the paradox of our people. Unarin, you are the last member of the Order of Ascension. Only you can do what we could not. I know my request is selfish... but so long as you succeed, you can undermine the evil one who has secretly played our people for fools! Only you possess the power..."

Nurima's body faded a little more. Without hesitation, it lifted its hand, then reached up and pointed at the center of Unarin's forehead.

"Go, child. Take this knowledge. With your strong, youthful body... ascend. You will be the First. You will solve the problems that plagued our people. You will gain the power to fight back against that evil one... because if you fail, I fear that our people will not have much longer left to live."

Nurima's finger began to glow with light. When it touched Unarin's brow, the younger Changeling shuddered.

The Mind Realm began to change, shift and distort.

Nurima smiled... one last time.

"You bear... all our hopes and dreams... child. Become the Volgrim I never could... farewell..."

Unarin's mouth opened, and a beam of light shot out.

All at once, every part of the Mind Realm turned a brilliant white.

Unarin could see everything.

The genetic sequences of millions, even billions of Volgrim, from all four subspecies.

The missing links. The gaps. The suspicious points of failure that could not have occurred naturally.

No, they weren't just suspicious. They were malicious!

Someone had placed them there. Someone with evil intentions. Someone who had made the Volgrim to be a living, biological weapon.

This revelation enraged Unarin. The Changeling became so incensed that its anger threatened to explode and consume its own body in hatred.

"WHO..." Unarin roared in his mind. "DARES?!"

Unarin reached out. Its hands began to move like lightning as it rapidly grabbed hold of the genetic sequences and began rearranging them at a speed beyond what any mortal could accomplish.

Unarin ripped apart chunks from one strand of DNA, then shoved them into another. The young Changeling's mind moved with a speed and ferocity fueled by righteous rage.

The Truth was here. Anyone with a brain could see it... but the Truth had been suppressed. Unarin's Progenitor had even been killed to hide the evidence!

Eventually, Unarin finished re-sequencing the entire genetic sequence.

He became Enlightened.

At that moment, He Ascended.

Part 730: ASCENDED

Reldis-02. South-side Prison, Maximum Security Wing. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

Something indescribable happened as Unarin's entire psyche underwent a change. His core being merged with the Mind Realm passed down to him by his predecessors. His body began to glow with light. His very genetic structure itself rapidly began to change.

Somewhere between one second and a hundred years passed in a single instant. Unarin's eyes flashed open, and he awoke.

He found himself in a strange world. It was a land filled with divine light, a sky shrouded with clouds, and trees sparsely populating a lush and grassy plain covered by flowers.

The trees were not ordinary trees. At a glance, Unarin could easily see that they had differently colored gems growing from them. The trees themselves seemed to be made of diamond, while their 'fruits' were rubies, sapphires, onyxes, and countless other types that would usually only be found deep underground.

Unarin took a step forward. He was confused. He didn't know where he had arrived, or how he had ended up there. But that single step made him pause and look down.

Unarin felt different.

He was different.

"My... body..." Unarin said, startled by the deepness in his voice. He held up his hands, and his eyes went wide. They were bigger now, with three fingers and a thumb. His arms were extremely muscular, and so was his now-nude lower body. Unarin barely looked at himself for even a few moments before he began to feel dizzy from what he was seeing.

His body had changed. Drastically. He didn't recognize what he saw.

And then there was that word. 'He'.

Unarin felt that he was a he now. He was not genderless. And this was confirmed by the appendage dangling between his legs. Only after he saw it did the pieces start to fall into place.

Tears welled up in Unarin's eyes.

"Progenitor... I... succeeded." Unarin whispered.

Ten thousand orbits had passed since the Order of Ascension came into being. Countless Changelings had died, passing on knowledge from one generation to the next as they pursued the Truth of their species. Now, Unarin had reaped the rewards, but at a terrible cost to those who came before him.

His body was no longer the frail, weak, pathetic thing that it once was. He had three toes that faced forward, with claws that stuck out and gripped the ground, as well as a reverse 'toe' on his heel. Eight long tendrils flowed from the back of his head like hair and draped over and behind his shoulders, reaching down to his waist.

"Haa'ti..." Unarin said slowly, as he lifted the nearest one and touched it. A moment later, a strange sensation swept through his body. Unarin nearly fell to his knees, opting instead to stagger weakly and groan in pleasure.

The Haa'ti were extremely sensitive. Each tendril was something of an erogenous zone, and simply touching them made Unarin experience a sensation his mind had never once come into contact with in all his years of living as a Changeling.

Out of nowhere, a voice spoke from Unarin's right. "Having fun playing with yourself?"

Unarin's eyes widened. He spun on his heel-claw and looked at the one who had spoken. "Who's there! Who are you? What are... you...?"

There was a presumably male figure standing there, his body glowing with a brilliant light. The man's features were completely indistinguishable. He stood with a hand on his hip, perhaps fully nude, perhaps wearing clothing... Unarin could not tell. A single glance was all it took to determine the speaker was... someone extraordinary.

"I should be the one asking that question." The man said. "You are... out of my expectations. Are you a Volgrim? You don't look like the others I've seen. Ah, but where are my manners? I am the Creator. Former Ruler of the Milky Way."

Unarin blinked. "Ruler... you're a Ruler? Our Ruler?"

"Not am, was." The Creator corrected. "But then I died. What's left of me is... this. Not much to speak of. But enough about me. Let's talk about you. What are you? A mortal with no Cosmic power, yet you have somehow attained enlightenment? Not an impossible feat, but certainly rare."

Unarin squinted. "Enlightenment... I don't understand. Where am I? What's going on?"

And so, like that, the Creator gestured to a towering mountain behind him and explained the situation.

"So... this is what Psions see when they Ascend past the 5th Level of Psionics?" Unarin asked.

"Oh yes. In fact, people can Ascend multiple times. Everyone is guaranteed a first Ascension when they become a Cosmic, and after that, they have the chance to Ascend and climb these stairs again if they pass certain prerequisites. Merely becoming a stronger Cosmic won't do. You need to become more 'whole' in a way that, frankly, I don't think I could explain in a way you'd understand."

Unarin rubbed his chin. "I see. So then, I am..."

"Not a Cosmic!" The Creator said, visibly surprised. "I'd be lying if I said for every thousand Cosmics there was one mortal who gained Enlightenment. Maybe even ten thousand would be a bit off! You're only the third one in the entire Milky Way to do it so far!"

"Who were the previous two?" Unarin immediately asked.

The Creator shook his head. "Ask me again someday if you ever become a proper Cosmic. For now, I'll just have you climb a few steps and get this over with. Any mortal who can make it to the 5th step will obtain a mighty foundation, but if you can make it to the 10th step... you'll probably scare the life out of some of the other Rulers."

The Creator gestured, and Unarin followed as they approached the Staircase of Ascension.

"What's this about a 'foundation'?" Unarin asked as they approached the bottom step.

"Foundation is everything." The Creator explained. "Think of a weak Technopath versus a strong one. The weak one has shoddy body-mods. They are weak and frail. The strong one is strong because their body's foundation is better. This is true at all levels of power, even among Cosmics. A 7th Level Psion with a shoddy foundation will not be nearly as powerful as one with a robust foundation. And one with a robust foundation can put up a fight against a weak 8th Level Psion."

"I understand, but I still don't understand what a foundation is." Unarin replied. "This staircase improves my foundation, right? That is what you said."

"The Staircase of Ascension is a test, and a boon. In order to climb these steps, willpower, purity, and a strong heart are most important. The strength of your body, less so." The Creator explained. "That is the reason why every so often, a single mortal can arrive here. You are not yet a Cosmic, but you have obtained enlightenment. Your mind and soul are much sturdier than other mortals. You likely have some impressive level of willpower, as well. Conversely, it's not too rare to see some pathetic excuse for a Cosmic stumble in here, having taken vicious and evil shortcuts to empower themselves. It's entirely possible a powerful mortal like you could climb more steps than them."

The Creator paused.

"But, just to be clear, the strongest mortal is little more than an ant before the weakest Cosmic. If you fought a Bottom Cosmic, you would die. Your Foundation is most important for paving the path to your own Cosmic superiority someday. That way, when you truly Ascend, instead of climbing a mere five or ten steps, you could climb hundreds, perhaps even thousands!"

"And climbing more steps is not only a test of my willpower, but it strengthens me as well." Unarin summarized. "In that case, I should endeavor to climb as many steps as possible."

"That's the spirit." The Creator said with a smile. "Every step you take, divine lightning will fall and strike your body. It will be extremely painful, especially because you are a mere mortal. Even so, the lightning cannot kill you. It will only bring you to your limit and eventually immobilize you, preventing you from climbing even higher. No matter how much it hurts, you must press on until your body refuses to move. The higher you climb, the more robust your foundation, and the greater your strength when you return to reality."

Unarin nodded. The Creator had already explained to him that this was an independent space from reality, and time was frozen in the outside world until Unarin reached the end of his time here.

"Then there's nothing more to speak of." Unarin said, his tone calm and placid. "I am an Ascended... so I must Ascend."

The Creator snorted. "You kids always title yourselves so arrogantly. Just don't go off creating a 'Cosmic Realm' of your own. It was embarrassing enough the first time one of you did that."

Unarin took his first step. Immediately a bolt of lightning fell from above and struck his body.

As soon as his foot made contact with the Staircase of Ascension, a few nearby Rulers happened to glance over. One of them was a bipedal figure, black in color, with feathered wings and blood-red eyes full of malice.

"Heheh, looks like the Creator has another climber. And what's this? A mere mortal? What a rarity. Let's go have a laugh at his expense."

Two other Rulers, mere orbs of light, levitated beside the Dark One.

[It is a species we have not seen before. Worth investigation.] Triangulum's Ruler, The Absolute stated.

[The appearance of the inferior biological is interesting. Its design is unlike any others.] Cartwheel's Ruler, Guide, added.

The three Rulers flew closer. They watched as the strange new biological creature took its first step upon the Staircase.

When the lightning bolt fell, the Dark One smiled. He waited for the first scream of agony to escape the creature's lips.

Instead, Unarin paused, cocked his head, then took another step.

"Hmm? No reaction?" The Dark One murmured. "Odd."

When Unarin took the second step and another bolt of lightning fell, he looked directly up at it, and it struck his body with thunderous force.

BOOOM!

But Unarin... felt nothing.

The Creator watched from the side, looking uneasy. "If it hurts, you can just shout out. No need to hold the pain in, kid."

"I will keep that in mind." Unarin said.

And so, he took a third step. Then a fourth.

Lightning struck him. The Cosmic Realm shuddered.

But Unarin felt nothing.

Well, that wasn't to say nothing. He felt as if someone had poked him in the back. It barely felt like much. Certainly not the soul-wracking pain he had expected.

"Hmm..." Unarin hummed.

The Dark One's eyes flashed. "What is this mortal creature? There's no way it would simply be pretending to feel nothing. Perhaps it has a strong ego that prevents it from shouting out."

[Four steps is a good height for any mortal to climb.] The Absolute said. [Its strength meets the level of satisfactory.]

But then Unarin climbed the fifth step.

And the sixth.

And the seventh...

The Creator started to frown. "Unarin... are you alright?"

"I'm fine." Unarin said, his tone as mild as ever. "This lightning is certainly loud, but... I don't feel anything. Is that normal?"

"Nothing?" The Creator repeated. "Nothing at all?"

Unarin shrugged. "Nothing to speak of. If you don't mind, I'm going to climb a little faster, since my time here is limited and all..."

And so, Unarin did something none of the Rulers watching expected a mere mortal to do in a million Eternities. He began to lightly jog up the steps.

The Dark One's eyes went wide as Unarin suddenly leaped up the 8th, 9th, and 10th step in quick succession without pausing.

"What?!"

His shout of shock traveled throughout the Cosmic Realm. At once, dozens of other Rulers turned their attention toward the Milky Way's Staircase of Ascension. The tone used by the Dark One was highly irregular. It indicated something out of the ordinary was happening.

Unarin continued to climb. He reached the 12th step. Then the 15th. Then the 20th...

Every time the lightning struck him, Unarin felt nothing. It was like a single drop of water hitting the top of his head. If multiple lightning strikes weren't hitting him one after the other, he might miss them entirely.

Ten Rulers came to watch Unarin's climb. Then ten became twenty. Fifty, a hundred...

Soon, a massive swarm of orbs of light began to conglomerate around the Milky Way's staircase. The Creator was shocked out of his wits. It wasn't that climbing twenty steps was impressive... any Cosmic could do it.

But a mortal?

A mere mortal?!

It was damn near unheard of! The Creator had lived through a handful of Eternities, and across all that time, he had not seen it once!

Unarin climbed faster and faster. He made it to thirty steps, then forty...

By now, everyone watching had realized something unbelievable was going on. This wasn't just an outlier, it should have been impossible!

"Kee-keep going!" The Creator stuttered. "Unarin, if you can make it to a hundred steps, the First Ruler, Akasha, will grant you a powerful boon! If you make it to 250 steps, or 500, or 1000, he'll give even more boons! Keep climbing, kid!"

Unarin nodded, not even slowing his pace. He continued racing upward, while even more and more Rulers arrived to look upon him with shock and disbelief.

The Dark One gnashed his teeth. His eyes became bloodshot as he looked upon the Milky Way's newest glory child with hate-filled eyes. "How?! How could that incompetent Creator have formed such an amazing life-form?! It's impossible!!"

Unarin had no idea what was going on. He had only heard the faintest rumors of 'ascensions' from Changelings who monitored the Psions. He never had any details, so he didn't know how frightening his climb was to those watching him. In fact, he had no idea that his climb was the most unique thing any Ruler present had seen since the birth and death of multiple past universes!

He just kept climbing. Each step he took, he could feel a light pressure building in his chest. Whether it was exhaustion from climbing the Staircase of Ascension, or whether it was exhilaration from being watched by so many powerful entities, he could not tell.

Unarin climbed and climbed, and climbed some more.

To the horror and shock of many, he raced past the 100th step, causing shouts to erupt among the watching Rulers.

"Incredible!" A quadrupedal Ruler from a distant galaxy shouted. "It has been one hundred and ninety Eternities since a mortal climbed this far! And look, he doesn't seem to be slowing down!"

110 steps. 120. 150...

Unarin's speed continued to increase. He sprinted up the steps, each bolt of lightning splashing harmlessly against his face as if they meant nothing at all!

Before long, Unarin reached the 200th step. The Dark One's face had gone pale with fear. If a mere mortal could climb this high, that meant he was a Candidate of extreme potential. He was sure to become the Milky Way's next Ruler. And this power he was displaying now would become tens, even hundreds of times greater once he became a Cosmic. However high he climbed now, his foundation would become so terrifying that he might jump straight to the thousandth step upon his Cosmic ascension in a single bound!

Who knew the heights this creature would rise to?!

"We have to assassinate it.." The Dark One hissed through his teeth. "We cannot allow it to grow. It will become a terrifying Ruler, way more fearsome than the Creator ever was! We have to kill it before it truly Ascends... but how? The Akashic Barriers will not drop for a long, long time..."

After reaching the 200th step, Unarin paused, then he continued to climb.

But now, his steps were beginning to slow. Unarin's breath became noticeably more pained.

He reached the 210th step, then he paused for a few moments before climbing again.

He reached the 215th step, then wiped sweat from his brow.

By the time he reached the 220th step, Unarin had dramatically slowed down his pace. He clutched his chest and wheezed as if he were going to suffer a heart attack.

The Creator frowned. He flew a little closer.

"Are you growing tired, Unarin?"

"Not... not tired." Unarin wheezed. "There's a pressure in my chest. I think it's my heart. It's getting really hard to climb. I'm still going to push further though. You said the pain can't kill me, right?"

The Creator looked at Unarin thoughtfully. He flew next to Unarin, then touched the Volgrim's chest before abruptly retracting his hand.

"I... I can't believe it. You absolute monster." The Creator growled. "I cannot remember this ever happening to anyone from my galaxy, but I've seen it happen elsewhere. Your mind and willpower are more than capable of climbing far higher. But, unfortunately, your body has hit its limit. Your foundation is about to burst."

"Burst?" Unarin asked.

"You're not a proper Cosmic. It is a miracle you have climbed this far. Mortals simply should not be able to do what you've done. Rest assured, you are the mightiest mortal in the entire universe. Without a doubt. You even have the strength to battle real Cosmics, but without the baggage of the Akashic Laws. Never mind, that's not important. Forget what I said earlier. If you climb much further, you will die."

Unarin looked at him in disbelief. "But you said-"

"What I told you was that the pain from the lightning couldn't kill you, and it can't." The Creator said, shaking his head. "But this is different. You're like a bottle being overfilled with water. A full bottle is a good thing. But one filled past its limit will shatter into a thousand pieces. That will be your fate."

The Creator squeezed Unarin's arm reassuringly.

"The next time you come here, you will be a Cosmic. And seeing how formidable your mind is now, I believe you will crush the records of countless others who came before you. But that day is not now. Do not throw your life away in order to sate your ego."

Unarin looked at the Creator. The Ruler of the Milky Way had shown to have Unarin's best interests in heart this whole time, so he could not disregard his Ruler's words.

Unarin's shoulders relaxed. He looked up the steps toward the distant 250th step. If he could have reached it, he could have obtained a second boon. But based on what the Creator said, it was nearly impossible for mere mortals to even obtain the first boon, and Unarin had done so handily.

He was more than satisfied with his efforts.

"Very well. Then I shall stop here." Unarin said, turning to look up at the army of Rulers watching him from on high. Mixed with the lights of countless Evolved were a small smattering of former-biological Rulers, similar to the Creator. They were outnumbered fifty to one by the Evolved.

It was truly, truly difficult for a biological entity to take control of a galaxy...

After Unarin gracefully conceded, a powerful wind fell downward from the top of the stairs. A godlike figure descended from on high. It appeared to be a giant turtle, levitating in the air through some unknown means, its entire body made of black obsidian except for its red eyes.

"The 411th Envoy of Akasha!" The Creator exclaimed, quickly bowing his head in respect. "Envoy Akupara. We are humbled by your appearance."

All the Rulers shivered and bowed. It was highly unusual for such a high-level Envoy to descend and grant a reward. The closer to the first position that they were ranked, the older and more respected they were, as well as the more powerful.

"Milky Way Ascender." Akupara said, its tone polite, subdued, yet equally authoritative. "You are the most impressive mortal seen in 1,713 Eternities. Not since the legend of Agvar the Unstoppable has such a mortal been seen. You are worthy of a powerful boon. Speak your name, title, and request. Akasha shall grant it if he sees fit."

Unarin, naturally bowed his head and clasped his hands before the presence of the awe-inspiring Envoy of Akasha. Even though it was a flying turtle, which seemed somewhat absurd, Unarin was certainly broad-minded enough to overlook this fact.

"Envoy Akupara. This small mortal has but one request. If possible, I wish to be able to spread my power far and wide. Naturally, only to those who are worthy."

The turtle tilted its head slightly. "Your request is not for personal empowerment, but the empowerment of others? Are you certain?"

Unarin nodded without looking up. "Yes, Envoy."

The turtle closed its eyes and audibly hummed, a deep vibration that made the souls of all present quake powerlessly.

"Hummm…. I see. I shall pass that request on."

A moment passed. Akupara looked upward for several long seconds, toward the unseen top of the staircase, shrouded by the clouds.

Then, he lowered his gaze back to the mortal life form bowing before him.

"Your request amuses Akasha. He is interested in seeing what sort of havoc you will unleash." Akupara said meaningfully. "This power he is granting you will be mighty indeed… but it will not be without flaws. Choose whom you offer the Test of Ascension to with great care."

"I will, Envoy Akupara." Unarin said. He slapped his hand over his heart and looked up at the Envoy with eyes full of vigor. "Give my thanks to the One On High!"

"Nothing transpires that He does not see." Akupara said, before flying back up into the sky. Once he passed through the cloud cover, he vanished from sight. Not even the Rulers were allowed to peer beyond the clouds shrouding the top of the Staircase.

After a long moment of silence, The Creator chuckled. "Oh, Unarin. You are quite crafty. That request was beyond what I had expected. Simple, yet… effective."

The Creator secretly looked over at the Dark One. His face was ashen, knowing that soon, the Milky Way would have even more of those horrifying Ascended running around. Now, assassinating Unarin was pointless. Another Ascended could rise up after him.

The Creator was quite pleased by this.

"You will now return from whence you came." The Creator said. "Remember. Among mortals, you are now an existence more terrifying than any others. But among Cosmics, you are but a speck of sand amidst a much larger and greater ocean. Until you rise to the rank of Cosmic yourself, do not become complacent. Continue to grow until you have become undefeatable. Only then will I be able to pass the rule of this galaxy down to you without worries."

Unarin was surprised. "You believe I can rise to such a height?"

"If not you, then perhaps someone else." The Creator said cryptically. "But after today's show? You are my number one pick."

The Creator waved his hand. Light began to swallow Unarin, and his vision grew hazy.

"See you next time, kid." The Creator said, before bursting into laughter. "Oh, Dark One, you should see the look on your-"

His voice disappeared, and Unarin's soul fell down, down, down, back to the world of Reldis-02...

What happened next would mark the biggest change the Volgrim Empire had seen in tens of thousands of cycles...

Part 731: ABOMINATIONS

Reldis-02. South-side Prison, Maximum Security Wing. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

Unarin's soul fell back into his body. The sense of enlightenment he had experienced inside the Cosmic Realm vanished, and he was once again back in the realm of mortals.

Unarin opened his eyes. He turned to his left, where he saw Vedric now standing up, his back flat against the wall as he looked at Unarin with a mixture of fear and shock.

"Y-you... you??" Vedric coughed.

Unarin blinked. He looked downward and saw that his body had changed. No longer was he a tall, gangly Changeling with skinny arms, slender legs, and a bit fat head. He was now extremely muscled, broad-shouldered, and had eight tendrils extending from the back of his skull down the front and real of his body.

They were his Haa'ti. The word came to his mind as easily as his own name. It was like he had been born with and lived his entire life with these strange tendrils. He knew them like the back of his hand.

Unarin slowly stood up. He smiled.

"Brother Vedric. I am still Unarin. You do not need to fear."

Vedric's pupils trembled. He looked at Unarin as if he were seeing a strange alien xenomorph for the first time. Parts of Unarin still looked 'Volgrim', but he was incomprehensibly different from his previous appearance.

"Una...rin... it's really... you?" Vedric whispered hesitantly. "You changed... instantly! There was a bright light, and..."

"I have become Ascended." Unarin said, his tone calm and collected. "I am a Changeling no more. I am a new species of Volgrim. I am the thing my progenitor sought. After all your troubles, I have finally eaten the fruits of your labor. You have my undying gratitude."

Vedric slowly pulled away from the wall. He stepped toward Unarin and relaxed. Even though Unarin's voice was different, he spoke the same was as before. Vedric was not so closed-minded that he would remain in a state of fear and panic forever. He got over his confusion quickly, accepting this new reality with ease.

"Wonderful. Simply wonderful..." Vedric whispered. "Nurima... your life was not lost in vain. He has accomplished everything we hoped for. Now, I can die at peace."

Vedric lowered his eyes. He exhaled quietly, seeming more content than he ever had been at any point in the past.

But at that moment, Unarin reached out and gently clapped a hand on Vedric's shoulder.

"Vedric. You were my progenitor's brother. That makes you like an uncle to me. How could I let my uncle speak of dying when such a bright future stands before us now?"

Vedric looked up. He saw Unarin's beaming smile.

"Of course I will not die immediately. But my youth is gone, and I have few cycles remaining. Do not speak idle words just to cheer me up. The future belongs to the young."

Unarin's smile became gentler. "What if I told you there was a New Path you might be able to walk... if you had the courage to give it a try?"

"Courage?" Vedric repeated.

Unarin smiled but said nothing.

Vedric was enlightened. As he looked at Unarin's new body, he came to realize what this 'New Path' might entail.

"Lad." Vedric said, a smoldering fire emerging in his eyes. "If I can obtain a body such as yours... I would go to any length to bring down a righteous fire upon our corrupted overlords. What must I do?"

Unarin lifted his hand off Vedric's shoulder, then he extended his pointer finger toward Vedric's forehead.

"BELIEVE."

Inside the prison's security office.

"It's almost Free Roam time." One of the Technopath guards said, a muscled fellow with military-grade augmentations that made him a walking fortress. "Fifteen more time-units."

Commander Kordal was there too. His plain grey skin and heavily augmented body made him not stick out much among other Technopaths, but now he was wearing a bright yellow uniform with blue stripes. This signified to the other officers that a commander was inside the prison, and they needed to be on alert in case he walked by. Nobody wanted to be caught goofing off.

"Feeling antsy?" Kordal taunted. "Relax. With the Thumpers running scared, we're not gonna bring in any fun ones for the new few rotations. The remaining gangs have lowered their heads and gotten all quiet. They'll be hard to sniff out. Won't leave us any openings."

Lieutenant Trivald was also there. He had a large stun gun strapped to his back, one that could fire out a devastatingly powerful bolt of electricity capable of knocking out just about any Volgrim who wasn't wearing a specialized anti-energy suit. It was especially effective against heavily-modded Technopaths, such as the street thugs they regularly crossed paths with.

"Commander, how many veds do you think we'll get for retrieving the Exigent-13?" Trivald asked.

Kordal thought about it for a moment. "Always with the money questions. Well, we only recovered two doses. Split between the whole group, we might all get... 1,750 veds? 2,000 at most."

Trivald's mouth-tendrils writhed in annoyance. "I told you we brought too many others with us."

"You did, but don't forget, the other officers deserve a reward once in a while. We can't just hog all the good stuff. It breeds disloyalty and backstabbers when you do that."

"That's a good point." Trivald said. He started to change the topic, but a light started blinking on the security system, and at that moment, all the cameras went down inside the maximum security wing.

"What the-?" Trivald gasped. "Why'd the feed go down? Get it back up!"

The monitoring security guard frowned. His fingers rapidly typed on the keyboards.

"There was some sort of an EMP pulse. One of the doors on the bottom level triggered a damage alarm. I'll pull up the last part of the feed."

He quickly rewound the camera, and everyone looked up at the security feed just in time to see a door suddenly blast outward and go flying off its hinges, slamming into the opposite wall, as if it had been struck by something with violent force. Then the cameras went down immediately after that.

Kordal's eyes widened. "Red alert! We have a breakout attempt! All guards to maximum security! Full armaments, try to stun unless the subject presents a threat. Then shoot to kill!"

Kordal started to run out of the room, but the monitoring guard shouted something from behind him.

"Commander! The cell that sounded the alarm... it's Old Vedric's cell."

Kordal stumbled slightly, but he didn't bother responding as he ran out of the room.

In the back of his head, a thought bubbled up.

Wasn't that the one where we threw that yappy shitling?

Kordal and Trivald joined up with the initial reinforcements, and the two of them charged toward the lower levels as quickly as they could, hastily arming themselves and preparing to take down any prisoners who might have gotten a stupid idea in their heads.

When the first guards arrived inside the maximum security area, they were surprised to see that all of the lights had gone out. The pitch-black hallways yawned before them ominously, and the fervent shouting of inmates showed they had whipped themselves into a frenzy. All kinds of Technopath thugs, criminals, and general bastards were roaring and screaming like animals, grabbing and shaking their bars violently, all of which was a bit distracting for the guards.

Naturally, even if the lights were out, this wouldn't hurt the visibility of the guards too much. They activated their iris implants and swiveled their guns around, waiting for orders from their Commander.

The maximum security was shaped like a square. The path from the entrance split to the left and right, looped around, and connected at the opposite end. There was only one way up and down, ensuring any escape attempts would always end up funneled into a kill-zone, if things came to that.

"Split up!" Kordal shouted.

Trivald nodded. The two of them went left and right, with Kordal taking the shortest route toward Vedric's cell, which was down the left corridor, toward the end of the west wing. Trivald swung around the backside, aiming to pincer any escapees if they thought they could be slick and get out through the other direction.

Boots struck the ground heavily. Trivald fearlessly led his strongest squad down the western corridor, their weapons held up and primed to shoot. Only Trivald himself was equipped with a lethal Tri-Gun, a weapon that had three different firing modes for taking down different enemies. The rest of his squad were armed with stun guns similar to the one Trivald wielded, albeit a little lighter, since only the Lieutenant was an elite with body mods able to heft such a formidable weapon.

"Shut up!" Kordal shouted at the prisoners as he ran past. The loudmouths screamed at him, jeered him, and shouted obscenities, only shrinking back and quieting down for a moment when one of the guard shone their flashlights on the inmates, making them step back and wince from the bright light.

It didn't take long. Kordal arrived at Vedric's cell first. He spin-stepped to face inside, but obviously, nobody was there.

"Vedric..." Kordal grunted. "Sly bastard. How long have you been planning- huh?"

Kordal glanced at the opposite wall. The cell door was stuck halfway inside the duracrete, and it looked like a toothpick that had been stuck inside a piece of cake. These doors, and the walls, were built to house Class V felons. They weren't indestructible, but Kordal knew there shouldn't be a Technopath down here with body mods capable of bending the bars, let along causing such a visibly violent level of damage.

His eyes twitched. "What in the damnation happened down here?"

Suddenly, there was a bloodcurdling scream further up the hallway, around the bend where Trivald and his men would have looped around to pincer the escaping inmates. Obviously, they would have gone that way.

Bright blue flashes of light ignited the darkness as various stun guns started firing. Kordal's eyes narrowed.

He took his squad and rushed forward to reinforce Trivald. When he rounded the corner, he swiveled his gun to face down where he thought Trivald should have been.

What he saw made his blood turn to ice. It was a horror show. A field of death. Volgrim ripped apart. Good Volgrim. Strong guards who had served in the prison for many orbits. They were well trained, modded to the moon and back, and trained to deal with any sort of escape situation.

But now, there were ten bodies ripped in half, torn apart, absolute eviscerated. Their blood and organs coated the walls.

Trivald was among them.

Kordal felt a flash of fear. He couldn't remember the last time something had scared him. Certainly to this extent.

"Movement!" One of the guards behind Kordal shouted.

Kordal raised his eyes.

That was when he saw the monster for the first time.

For humans, the scariest thing in the universe was the unknown. The second scariest thing was something that looked human, but was not human. It might have the face of the human, or the general mannerisms, but if something about that thing was 'off', it could scare the shit out of even the most battle-hardened man alive.

The Volgrim were no different. What Kordal saw in the darkness ahead was something that should not exist.

It vaguely looked like a Volgrim. But the proportions were all wrong. It has a muscular body, like a Dolgrimite, but it had four-fingered hands, like a Changeling. Eight snake-like appendages fell from the back of its head and buzzed in the air behind it, seemingly levitating from left to right, in search of prey. The creature had beady, blood-red eyes, and deep crimson skin. It was almost completely naked, wearing only the tattered remains of a suit Kordal didn't recognize, as if the creature had molted its skin to grow from a cocoon.

When the creature looked at Kordal, the Technopath knew in an instant.

This thing was a skinwalker.

It was an abomination.

"Open fire!!" Kordal shouted, his voice rising an octave higher than it ever had before.

Nobody had the time to judge the fear in his voice. In unison, every Technopath guard started shooting at the horrifying abomination. The creature leaped to the right and its feet collided with the wall. It used the surface as a springboard and pounced at the terrified guards, making all of them yelp in fright. Bullets tracked the creature's movements with military precision, but the damn thing was slippery, and its eight head-tendrils stabbed into the ground and yanked it around, making its movements impossible for even their targeting irises to predict.

The creature jumped toward the right flank. Kordal barely caught the sight of something slender whipping around in the darkness. A guard's guttural cry cut off mid-syllable as his body was sliced in half. It looked like a sword had bisected him from the waist before impaling his head.

Kzzat! Kzzat!

Electrical beams struck the creature and forced it backward a step or two. But then it recovered and charged again, shrugging off attacks that would have incapacitated any Technopath instantly.

Kordal was not standing idly like an idiot. He had jumped backward the moment he ID'd the creature's speedy and erratic movements to put distance between himself and it. One of his hand-tentacles pressed a button on his weapon, switching it to plasma mode. He started firing powerful energized projectiles that melted the wall and floor with 5000-degree bolts of molten plasma. The somewhat slow-firing nature of this mode forced him to aim more carefully, but even with all his training, Kordal found that the creature was too damn slippery! Multiple times, Kordal fired at the creature's after-image, missing it by millimeters. One time, he was sure he'd hit the monster square in the chest, but it threw the body of a fallen guard at Kordal, and he vaporized the dead Volgrim instead.

"Ahh! Die, die you monster!" Kordal roared. By this point, five of the eight guards who came with him were already dead. It hadn't been twenty seconds since the fight began. The abomination had made short work of them.

With each guard that died, the pressure on the monster decreased. It was able to kill the rest faster and faster. Kordal finally managed to get a lucky hit during a brief instant, when the creature was already flinching from an electrical pulse that struck it.

BLAM!

Kordal fired a plasma shot that struck the creature's arm and sent it tumbling against the wall. The monster grunted a little, then quickly got back up.

Kordal's brain was enhanced by several different biomods. Naturally, he was able to perceive things much more quickly than most Technopaths. That was why he was shocked out of his wits when he realized the creature's arm didn't look injured at all!

The skin wasn't even lightly burned.

No! How is that possible?! Kordal thought, his pupils narrowing to pinpricks.

With a flip of the switch, Kordal switched to a Hardened Taser mode. This one was different from the mode his subordinates used. It fired pellets that exploded on contact and turned into web-like strands of exo-steel that would wrap around a target, bind them, and electrocute them.

It wasn't that Kordal wanted to capture the monster alive, but against such a terrifying foe, he hoped this might buy him a minute, even just a few more seconds for reinforcements to arrive.

He was running out of time. In fact, his time was nearly up!

Krrrrt! Krrrrt!

Kordal squeezed the trigger and sent a stream of pellets rapidly firing. Most of them missed the target and struck the opposite wall, or even flew into the cells and exploded on the inmates inside, making them shriek in pain as webs of steel exploded around their bodies and violently electrocuted them.

Finally, one pellet made contact. It struck the monster and exploded, wrapping around it and forcing it to take a step backward as it fought to break free of its constraints.

Frighteningly, the electrocution didn't seem to even give it the jitters. It was as if the electrical energy in the taser couldn't hurt the creature at all.

But Kordal couldn't care about that. With the creature momentarily immobilized, he started pelting it with bullet after bullet, causing more and more webs to explode and wrap around the creature, each web reinforcing the one after it.

"Keep shooting it!!" Kordal shouted. "Don't stop until it's-"

Kordal stopped mid-sentence. He suddenly realized all his men were dead. He was the last one standing.

His eyes flicked left and right, but he didn't stop shooting.

Where are the others?! Kordal thought. They should have arrived by now! Something's wrong!

The creature grunted. It kept trying to stand, but the webs of metal engulfing it bit into its skin and squeezed more and more for every layer that enveloped it. The cumulative effect of all of them was far beyond what a single pellet could accomplish.

But Kordal was frightened out of his wits. He had successfully pinned the creature down, but something was wrong. No reinforcements were showing up. They shouldn't have been more than ten seconds behind him, let alone a minute or more! Where was everybody?!

The creature struggled to move. It fought desperately to break free of its restraints, but its movements were slowing.

"Kordal to Top Level, where's my backup?!" Kordal shouted. "Top Level, respond! Top-"

Kordal's heart jumped. He flicked his eyes to the left and saw something that scared him more than anything else so far... and that was saying a lot.

There was another abomination rounding the corner at the end of the hall. This one had bright, neon-yellow skin. It looked even meaner than the one he had pinned down, and the moment it rounded the corner, it spotted Kordal and started sprinting at him.

"Shit, shitshitshit!!" Kordal screamed. He turned his gun to fire at the new creature, but it leaped to the left and the right. It dodged and weaved, causing the tazer-nets to explode harmlessly on the ground or against the cells behind it.

Seven seconds. That was how much time passed between Kordal spotting the golden abomination and it arriving within arm's reach of him.

Kordal felt a strange sensation as one of his arms stopped following his commands. Then the other one as well. He glanced down to see his right arm falling away from his body, but he didn't have time to look for the left one before a powerful hand grabbed him by the throat and violently slammed him against the wall.

The abomination grinned at Kordal and licked its lips.

"Hehehe... you didn't expect me to ever escape, did you, Commander? Don't worry. I'm not cruel like you. I won't torture you or drag this out. I just wanted you to know that I've been waiting for this moment for a long time."

Kordal's eyes widened.

"N-nuh... no... can't be... Ved...ric?"

The creature cocked its head. Its smile became sinister.

Crack.

With a flip of its thumb, it snapped Kordal's neck, and the light started to leave his eyes.

How... could it be... him?

That was the last thought that passed through Kordal's mind before his eyes lost their light. He died tragically, not even knowing what had happened down here. His grievance would be unresolved for the rest of Eternity...

Vedric casually dropped the guard he hated the most to the ground, then turned to look at Unarin.

"Hehehe... caught in a snag? Need help?"

Unarin grunted. He slowly stood up, causing some of the cords binding him to snap, but the majority held tight.

After a few moments, Unarin sighed. "Yes, help me, please."

Vedric chuckled. At once, his Haa'ti lashed out, turning as thin as threads. They sliced through the restraints with the speed of a hurricane, and instantly released Unarin from his predicament.

Unarin cracked his neck. "The others?"

"Taken care of. Why do you think nobody came to bother you down here?" Vedric asked. "But we do have a problem. They sent an SOS off-world. You and I might be strong, but once a real fighting force arrives..."

Unarin smirked. "I've gotten a good feel for this body. It won't be a problem. We'll just need... more."

The two Ascended walked through the lake of gore around them. As they headed toward the exit, Unarin gestured toward the other cells.

"And these people?"

"Leave them." Vedric said coldly. "They're trash. The guards might be bastards, but the people down in this wing belong here."

"Like you and I did?" Unarin questioned.

Vedric chuckled. "Exceptions merely prove a rule, brother Unarin. Before we leave, I can show you the files of everyone here. But we're better off 'recruiting' from medium and low security."

Unarin nodded. "Acceptable."

As the two of them left the maximum security wing, the halls became eerily quiet. The inmates shook with fear after hearing the horrifying sounds and seeing the two monsters that had just ripped apart an entire force of heavily armed guards.

Nobody wanted to attract attention anymore. They all simply prayed they could become invisible to the abominations roaming their halls.

"This is Reldis Command. We've received a Class V SOS from our southern prison. We are mobilizing all units, but we've lost contact with all guards. We believe this to be a Meltdown Incident. I repeat, a Meltdown Incident. Please contact the Psions and request backup."

The Technopath in charged of Reldis's offworld coordination platform urgently transmitted a plea for help. Based on the fact that more than a hundred heart sensors had gone offline in less than fifteen time-units, that indicated a possible coordinated force attacking the prison to kill the guards. This was beyond what their world's security forces could handle. They were a rimworld after all, existing on the fringes of Technopath space.

A long several minutes passed. Eventually, the response came back.

"Reldis Command, this is General Slifer from the ship Imperial's Might I. We are changing course to assist you, but be advised we are still multiple rotations away from you. I have spoken to the Psions, and they informed me that there was a Cosmic Psion currently located in the vicinity of Reldis. Command, do you copy?"

"A Cosmic Psion?" Command's Technopath coordinator exclaimed. "That will help us greatly. Who is he?"

"Not he, 'she'. She's a 6th Level named Protector Dosena. I don't know if she's off-world or within spitting distance, but if you can contact her, she should be capable of helping you."

"Much appreciated, General. I will relay this news." The Technopath replied. "Reldis Command, out."

It didn't take long for several orders to get relayed around. Eventually, those orders made their way to the only Psion currently present on Reldis-02.

Levitating in the skies above the capital city, Dosena frowned.

[A prison break? It must be a serious matter. My mission was to investigate the Technopaths here to try and uncover the production location for Exigent-13, yet now my superiors want me to deal with such a minor matter.]

Dosena tapped her chin.

[I suppose there's no helping it. Technopaths are so useless that they can't even handle a conflict of this level. What sad excuses for Volgrim.]

Dosena turned her attention toward the southern prison. Then, she launched her body toward it.

Part 732: Prison Break

Reldis-02. South-side Prison, Minimum Security Wing. Stardate 207.715 of the Ancient Volgrim Empire.

Unarin and Vedric made their way out of the maximum security wing into the middle security wing. Along the way, they encountered several groups of prison guards, but these Volgrim were much weaker than the ones who regularly handled the maximum security wing. They barely managed to put up a fight before the two Ascended brutally slaughtered them.

[Are you sure you're okay with all this murdering?] Vedric asked Unarin as they climbed the stairs to the minimum security wing. [We're going to be fugitives after this.]

[If I had not ascended, I would have perished already.] Unarin said matter-of-factly. [These Volgrim sent me here to die. How many others have they punished in such a way? Those who are willing to kill should not feel surprised when they themselves end up dead. This much is only fair; the law of the jungle and of decency. As for the act of killing itself, I am far from unfamiliar with such a thing. Many have fallen at my hands already.]

The two Ascended did not open their mouths to speak. Their words transmitted to each other telepathically, not because they possessed telepathic abilities, but because of their Haa'ti.

It hadn't taken Unarin and Vedric much time to realize their new hair-tendrils had many more purposes than mere decoration. The Haa'ti functioned as eight additional limbs, so they could be used for movement and performing tasks. The eight appendages had all kinds of other strange and bizarre properties as well. They could shrink and stretch, they could change their shape to stab and slash, they were extremely durable, and they also granted both Ascended the ability to communicate with one another when within a certain range.

Through some unknown mechanism, the Haa'ti acted like wireless receivers. The two Ascended became connected to each other when they within a hundred steps of one another, and could transmit thoughts, images, even emotions. Unarin felt closer to Vedric than he ever had anyone else in his life... including his Progenitor.

[I served in the military for two decades before I rose to my position at Father Zaeed's Temple.] Vedric replied. [I, too, have killed many. It is good to see we are both of equal mind on this matter.]

As they marched into the minimum security wing, Vedric paused at the entrance. [Go inside and do what you must. I will stay here and await your return.]

[No need.] Unarin transmitted. [Go to the registry and hack the prisoner archives. Find anyone worth recruiting, then return and bring their names to me. We will need greater numbers if we are to get out of this situation alive.]

[Alright. I shall do that.] Vedric said.

Vedric glanced down at his figure. Once again, he marveled at how his aged and decrepit body had returned to its youthful vigor. He felt as if he had gone from 85 orbits of age all the way back down to the prime of his life, shortly before he had entered the Temple. His mind moved speedily, and his muscles rippled with power.

Becoming an Ascended felt to him as if he had discovered the Fountain of Youth. He likely had many good decades still remaining before he passed.

Vedric turned to leave, but then he paused to look back at Unarin.

[Brother. When I reached the Cosmic Realm, I managed to climb seventy-three steps before my willpower ran dry. How far did you make it?]

Unarin paused. A long several seconds passed before he replied.

[One hundred and fourteen steps.] Unarin eventually answered.

[I knew it!] Vedric gasped. [The Rulers watching me seemed alarmed that as a mortal I had climbed so far, but they didn't seem impressed. You're even more of a monster than I thought!]

Unarin chuckled. [I am nothing much. Let us hurry before reinforcements arrive, Vedric.]

[Of course.]

Vedric continued on his way, splitting off from Unarin while Unarin entered the minimum security wing. Unlike the maximum security wing, this one was brightly illuminated. Vedric had not cut the power here. Thus, when Unarin started walking down the hallways, the prisoners could easily see him.

"What?!"

"A monster? An abomination!!"

"W-what is that thing?!"

Cries of fear and terror quickly rose up as the Technopaths and Changelings imprisoned here, most of them the latter, began crying out in wide-eyed alarm as they saw the hideous creature walking down their hallways.

Perhaps to a Terran, an Ascended might seem visually similar to any other Volgrim, but to the Volgrim, this was not the case at all. Every single facet of Unarin's appearance made him look like a freakish, hideous chimera of sorts. His facial anatomy was wrong. His body proportions appeared bizarre. His Haa'ti looked alien and alarming, and the way his razor-sharp toe-claws clinked against the ground made his approach sound frightening beyond belief.

When Unarin swiveled his head from side to side to try and look for Muuxunuu and Randis, he spotted many other Changelings backing into their cells, looking at him with terror in their eyes.

Changelings did not usually express emotions, not even fear. Thus, when these prisoners did so, it showed how frightening his appearance was to them. It broke the limits on their mental conditioning.

In the eyes of both subspecies, the Changelings and the Technopaths, Unarin was like a skinwalker. He resembled a ghoulish abomination assembled from pastiches of multiple different Volgrim subspecies... and not in a flattering way. His tiny, beady eyes gave him the air of a predator. His clawed feet made him look like an animal. His Haa'ti swaying behind his back made him look like a thug and a hoodlum.

On top of all that, Unarin was practically naked! His prisoner outfit had torn to shreds, being far too small for his new body. It clung to him in strips of fabric, making him resemble a wild animal that couldn't properly wear clothes.

Unarin ignored the cries of fear from the prisoners around him. This lack of reaction scared them even more. It was as if a psychopath lacking Volgrim feelings was walking in their midst. A few prisoners even fainted from terror when Unarin casually glanced at them.

"Not the sturdiest grade of individuals." Unarin muttered to himself quietly.

Unarin walked half the cell block before he spotted someone familiar. Unarin paused and turned to face a cell, where he spotted Randis and Muuxunuu together, both of them immediately shrinking back in fear from his gaze.

"Ahh!" Muuxunuu cried out, shrinking back into the corner. "M-m-monster!!"

"W-what is that thing?" Randis whimpered, pressing itself so hard against the wall that it seemed the Changeling was trying to turn into wallpaper to hide itself. "We're going to die!!"

The screams of terror outside the cells didn't help the two Changelings and their states of mind. With dozens of other Changelings crying in fear, it was clear the entire cell block had been thrown into chaos.

Unarin stood, unmoving, for a few moments.

Then he spoke.

"Randis. Is that any way to speak to the one who saved your life?"

Randis shivered. The monster's voice was deep and menacing, decidedly masculine. The Changelings almost couldn't even parse its words, so terrified were they.

"Randis. Muuxunuu." Unarin said slowly. "There is no need to be alarmed. It is I. Unarin."

Randis and Muuxunuu shuddered. Their eyes widened, as difficult as that was for Changelings to even do, and they looked at the creature before them with horror.

"You... you... Unarin?" Randis asked, teeth chattering nonstop. "No. A lie! A deception! If you are Unarin, then what did those jailers do to you?!"

"They did nothing to me." Unarin said, his tone calm and measured. "Randis. I was with you and Muuxunuu when we executed the Thumper Gang. That was only one night ago. As for this body, I have not become a monster. I have... ascended. I have become a new form of life. A new Volgrim subspecies, above all the others."

The more Unarin talked, the more Randis and Muuxunuu calmed down. His words were reasonable, and his posture non-threatening. The fact he could speak meant he was not some rabid beast, and therefore could be reasoned with. The idea that he was actually Unarin seemed a little plausible, but his other claims seemed somewhat far-fetched.

Randis narrowed its eyes. It carefully took a step away from the wall.

"You are... Unarin?" Randis questioned. "Truly?"

"I am he." Unarin answered.

Several seconds passed. Randis carefully looked Unarin up and down, trying to match details it knew about Unarin to the strange creature before it. Ultimately, it was Muuxunuu who stepped forward.

"This one is familiar with Unarin. The creature before us speaks in the same way Unarin would. Its skin is the same color as Unarin, and it even has the same speckled-patterns on its shoulders and head. Whether it is truly an 'Ascended' life form as it claims, or whether Unarin was experimented on until it became this creature, that is the only question left in this one's mind."

Unarin smiled. "You have a good memory, Muuxunuu. Do you remember when we were inside the nebula being chased by the X-73 Vantablack? While you were clearly afraid of death, you kept your emotions muted then, much more so than a few moments ago. It seems you are not as emotionless as you like to believe."

Muuxunuu blinked, then lowered its head. "This Ascended is Unarin. Without a doubt."

The two Changelings visibly relaxed. They looked at Unarin with eyes full of expectation. Already, the noise outside had died down a lot, and many Changelings had drawn closer to the bars to listen as Unarin spoke. While the ones further away had no idea what was going on, the closest Changelings could hear Unarin's words, and they relayed those words to other Changelings further down the line.

"What caused this... transformation?" Muuxunuu asked after walking closer to the prison cell bars.

"That is a long story." Unarin replied. "Simply put, I discovered that there has been a grand conspiracy to deceive countless Volgrim across the entire Empire. By unraveling that conspiracy, I attained enlightenment, and thus, I was able to elevate my mind, body, and soul to a new level."

A momentary silence fell before Unarin lifted his hand to point a finger at Muuxunuu.

"You and Randis can also obtain this power, if your minds are strong, and your willpower firm."

Muuxunuu hesitated. "How... does this... 'power' work?"

Randis walked over and stopped beside Muuxunuu. The obsidian-skinned Changeling's eyes flared up with interest. "How powerful have you become, Unarin?"

It was clear at a glance that Muuxunuu's will was not as sturdy as Randis. Even though the two of them had cowered in fright earlier, they had both gotten over their fears quickly. But now, it was the fear of the unknown that threatened to hold them back. Only, Randis conquered his fear much more swiftly than Muuxunuu.

"I cannot answer that question properly." Unarin replied. "But, to summarize in a word, I have become... stronger."

Randis blinked. Unarin's description was anything but specific. Even so, Randis was drawn in by Unarin's charismatic tone.

"Can this one also become... stronger?" Randis asked.

"Of course." Unarin answered. "But there is a chance you might die. The ascension process is dangerous. If you are not absolutely certain, you should remain as you are."

"This one is certain." Randis said, immediately stepping toward the cell bars. "This one tires of standing by while atrocities happen. Only with strength can this one rise up against the flawed system imprisoning all of us. This one wishes to become a player in the great game of politics, not a mere playing piece."

Unarin and Randis locked eyes. After several seconds of silence, Unarin nodded.

"Very good then."

He reached out, grabbed the cell door, and tore it off his hinges, making the other two gasp in shock. He wasn't lying. His strength was monstrous!

Unarin took a step forward. He reached out a finger, then he touched Randis's forehead.

The effect was immediate. Randis closed its eyes, then the Changeling's body instantly began to morph. At once, the Changeling stopped being a genderless entity, and his body became gendered. He grew outward more than upward, only rising a few centimeters in height, but his muscles drastically changing as his body inflated in mass. From a tall, gangly creature with no muscle mass to speak of, he became a powerhouse rippling with strength. His eyes shrunk. Haa'ti grew from the back of his head. He quickly came to resemble the same sort of species as Unarin, but a closer look would reveal the two of them had their own differences.

"I... I succeeded." Randis said, his deep voice momentarily startling himself. "I made it up the staircase..."

He blinked and looked around the cell. Then he looked at his body. He couldn't help but lift his hands and marvel at the strength contained within his palms.

"How many steps did you climb?" Unarin asked.

Randis blinked. He puffed out his chest and grinned, an expression that would have been uncharacteristic of himself less than a minute before.

"One hundred and seventy five!" Randis boasted. "And you?"

"One hundred and fourteen steps." Unarin said with a smile. "You have bested me, Randis."

"Hahaha!" Randis laughed wildly before clapping a palm on Unarin's shoulder. "There is nothing to be ashamed of. The Rulers gave me a boon due to my exploits! I used it well!"

Unarin patted Randis's shoulder back. He did not ask Randis what boon he had requested of Akasha.

"Muuxunuu?" Unarin asked, turning to the final remaining member of the trio. "Are you willing to risk Ascension as well?"

Muuxunuu glanced back and forth between Unarin and Randis. There was no fear in the Changeling's eyes. Seeing was believing. Now that Randis served as confirmation of what could be obtained, Muuxunuu did not wait any longer.

"This one is ready."

Unarin nodded. Less than a minute later, Muuxunuu's body rapidly morphed and shifted. No longer genderless, the Changeling became the first female Ascended of their species, though her body was no less powerful than either of the other two. Her voice downshifted in pitch slightly, and her appearance became... quite attractive to both of the other two. It was as if their sensibilities had immediately changed after Ascension.

"You succeeded." Unarin said warmly, smiling at the newest member of his species. "Congratulations."

"How many steps did you climb?" Randis immediately asked.

Muuxunuu touched her face and examined her hands. She looked at a mirror on the wall and felt that her new appearance was... sublime.

"I only managed to climb one hundred and fifty four steps." Muuxunuu said, her voice soft. "It seems Randis is the most powerful of us now."

Unarin gently squeezed Muuxunuu's shoulder. "Do not sell yourself short. We are, all of us, powerful. And together? We will become unstoppable."

Unarin turned to face the other prisoners.

"All of you have seen who I am and what I can do. My only question to you now is... are you willing to remain locked behind bars? Will you choose to take a chance on Ascension and become one of us?!"

Several nearby Changelings grabbed the bars of their cells and shivered with excitement. Seeing was believing, and Unarin had proven multiple times that he could accomplish this seemingly impossible feat with merely a touch of his finger.

The Changelings here were, for the most part, not truly criminals. Many of them had been put in prison for far lesser crimes than Unarin and the other two, and most of those charges had been trumped-up in order to terrorize the local Changeling population.

The Changelings were unwilling to live like caged animals! With the opportunity in front of them, many let out cries of acceptance! Unarin grinned, then walked over to the nearest cell. He touched the forehead of one of the Changelings, and that one roared with power as it too became an Ascended.

"Thirty seven steps!" The new Ascended cried.

Unarin uplifted another Changeling. "Seventeen steps!"

"Twenty-nine steps!"

"Seventy steps!"

"One hundred and two steps!"

"Forty-four steps!"

One by one, Unarin elevated the status of Changeling after Changeling, causing them to become far more powerful than they ever could have imagined. Unarin smiled, but at the same time, he was taking mental notes.

It seems I am truly an outlier, along with Muuxunuu and Randis. These prisoners have had their wills broken, and few are able to cross the threshold of one hundred steps. Even so, the Rulers told me that mortals making it to the tenth step were few and far between. Even the worst of the stock here greatly exceed that threshold!

Unarin was not uplifting these Changelings randomly. He found that after Muuxunuu and Randis became Ascended, his Haa'ti had grown more powerful when it came to their transmission range. Each new Ascended allowed their species to communicate from greater and greater distances away. Thus, Unarin was able to converse with Vedric, who had obtained the prisoner's files, and verify which prisoners had not committed terrible crimes.

Unarin was in a rush to add more Ascended to his ranks, but he would not uplift criminals and thugs!

It was on the 13th ascension that something unfortunate happened. The Changeling Unarin had chosen let out a horrible scream, then its body abruptly inflated like a balloon before exploding in a horrifying shower of guts and viscera.

"Ugh!" Unarin exclaimed, lifting his arm to shield his face right before that Changeling detonated. Blood and guts sprayed all over him, and that unfortunate Changeling's cellmate. The Cellmate's expression turned to horror, its emotionless facade cracking under the shock of witnessing its friend perish.

Unarin pulled back and looked around. The excitement of the remaining Changelings had immediately taken a nose-dive, seeing what happened to that one.

"Everyone." Unarin said after taking a minute to calm his heart and wipe the guts from his face. "This is to be expected. Not all of you are worthy to become Ascended. If your willpower is low, or if you have fear in your heart, you should not accept my favor. If you are too weak, this will be the result."

Unarin successfully turned the situation around, but the quality of the remaining Changeling prisoners continued to fall. More of them exploded than ascended, and eventually, the rest gave up, preferring to treasure their lives over a nebulous power that might ultimately kill them.

In total, fifty-four Ascended emerged. Thirty Changelings died, but the new army of Ascended proved to be a formidable start for a species that had only existed for less than an hour.

Unarin was about to head down to the Middle Security level when Vedric's voice spoke to him telepathically.

[Unarin. We have company. There's a powerful Psion outside.]

Unarin frowned. [I'll come to assist you.]

[No need.] Vedric retorted. [I'll handle it. I hate Psions.]

[Suit yourself. Call us if you need help.] Unarin said.

And so, he headed down into the Middle Security section of the prison, while his new underlings spread out, unlocking the equipment rooms to arm themselves with weapons and armor.

Before long, the security forces would arrive. That was when the real fight would begin.

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Volgarius. Unarin's Sanctum, Inside the Founder's Thumb.

Unarin regaled Vulpanix with a tale so shocking that if she had a mouth, it would certainly be hanging ajar. He spoke while Dosena remained mostly silent, only interjecting once in a while to explain her own point of view.

[I have heard none of this in the past, besides a few throwaway comments when I was still an Initiator.] Vulpanix said quietly. [There are so many shocking revelations... I do not even know where to begin asking questions.]

Unarin did not say anything. Neither did Dosena. The two remained silent for a full minute as Vulpanix organized the questions spiraling within her mind.

Eventually, she did speak.

[First Founder... you are... strong?]

Unarin nodded. "In a manner of speaking, yes."

[You have climbed more steps on the Akashic Stairs than even I have.] Vulpanix said, her tone glum. [I only managed to climb 112 steps when I reached the 7th Level, and that was after conceptualizing the idea of Temporal Clones. It was a huge improvement in my mindset and combat philosophy. Even Administrator Muuxunuu has climbed more steps then me, as well as your brother, Randis. I have never felt so lowly and weak as I do today.]

She paused before directing a strange stare at Unarin. [But... if you did manage to climb so many steps, why are you not a Cosmic? You should have the aura of one, yet I do not sense anything at all! How is such a thing possible? Are all the Ascended monsters like you?]

Unarin smiled. "The concept of 'Cosmic Power' is often misunderstood. Even I did not comprehend it in my youth. It was only long after the Volgrim Empire was created, after the defeat of the Sentinels, long beyond the end of the Great Wars, that I understood what I had become. But... some things should not be spoken of in public. You never know who is listening."

Vulpanix's skin paled slightly. She wanted to press Unarin for more answers, but his hint that spies could be watching reminded her that even though the Wordsmith might be dead, he also might have left behind arrangements for the humans to spy on the Founders.

The most dangerous weapon was one an enemy did not know about and could not see coming. This was something any tactician knew, and Vulpanix was no fool in that regard.

Eventually, Vulpanix looked at Unarin with inquisitive eyes.

[How powerful are the Ascended? Can they be relied on to help us turn this war around?]

"The answer to that question is anyone's guess." Unarin replied cryptically. "But as my memories have shown, my species could be said to be the strongest of all the subspecies, or at least the most well-rounded. Even so, we are neither infallible nor invulnerable. And recently, the performance of the Dolgrimites has shown that some of our unique strengths have become... replicable."

[What do you mean by that?] Vulpanix pressed.

"The answer will become apparent within less time than you know." Unarin answered, his words as mysterious as ever. "But, more importantly, my time with you has to end. Dosena will carry on with the tales of the ancient times. She knows nearly everything that I do, and has also absorbed the knowledge of many fallen Psions, Ascended, Technopaths, and others who willingly gave their memories to her to preserve our heritage. Even when we performed the Great Reset to completely alter the manner in which Psions cultivated, we retained the most important knowledge within Dosena's mind, and my own."

Unarin stood up. Vulpanix stood as well, seeing that it seemed he was about to leave.

[Where are you going?] She asked, realizing a moment later that her question was too presumptuous and disrespectful. Luckily, Unarin did not seem to mind.

"A great many events have occurred recently, and now I must handle one of those matters personally." Unarin replied. "Unfortunately, with Dosena out of commission, this duty falls upon me. On any other occasion, she would handle this situation, but such is the way of Karma. What goes around will ultimately come around."

Unarin lightly nodded at Vulpanix, then he folded his hands behind his back, turned on his heel, and strode away. He walked down the side stairs of his Sanctum, pushed open its great doors, and departed without another word.

Several minutes passed. Vulpanix sat back down at the table, but she did not immediately converse with Dosena. The Second Founder, for her part, looked off into the distance, seemingly admiring a painting of an ancient Dolgrimite on the far wall.

[There were many formidable figures in the ancient past.] Dosena eventually said. She could not transmit her thoughts, but Vulpanix was already tapped into the surface layer of her mind, so she could easily communicate with her junior. [Assuming I were in my normal condition, I would certainly be the strongest figure in the modern Volgrim Empire. But I am by no means the most powerful Volgrim who has ever lived in our galaxy. Legend has it the first Supremator died while attempting to ascend to the 10th Level. I have spent my entire existence attempting to break past that barrier, albeit without success.]

She paused.

[It has been my greatest shame. I am truly unworthy.]

Vulpanix frowned. It was deeply uncomfortable for her to hear such words coming from the one Volgrim she revered more than any other in the Empire. She had idolized Dosena her entire life, but now her idol was crippled, potentially unable to return to her peak power for a very long time, and could be easily assassinated by a rogue agent, if one existed.

Even now, Vulpanix could reach out and kill Dosena with a single thought. She had no doubt the Second Founder was at her mercy. She would never do such a thing, but the fact it was possible… frightened her.

[Our Empire is so weak now.] Vulpanix said quietly. [I feel great fear, Second Founder. I fear we will not survive the coming war. I fear our days are numbered, and we will soon perish to our many, many enemies.]

[Haha.] Dosena laughed lightly, unperturbed by her junior's words. [If our Empire falls, so be it. It is only death. Death is a natural part of the Great Cycle. 99.999% of all creatures that have ever existed have already died. Ancient monsters standing strong at the level of Apex Cosmic were helpless against the forces of the Akashic Cycle. When this Eternity ends, all beings except for the Rulers will perish to the fading winds of time.]

She paused before adding, [And even those Rulers, do you think they are immortal? Far from it. Rulers rise and fall. Only Akasha has proven to be unmovable. Some of his greatest Heralds have perished while infighting amongst one another. As for the ordinary Rulers? Our Creator died, the Dark One will someday die, everyone will die. There is no reason to worry about such deaths, for you and I will assuredly both perish someday.]

Dosena's calm words did nothing to stifle the fear in Vulpanix's heart. She considered herself relatively broad-minded, but in truth, she had never thought about the existential truth of her mortality. Having it all laid out by Dosena made Vulpanix's skin turn pale.

[Oh, look at you. Such a cute junior.] Dosena teased. But then, her expression turned sharp.

[Vulpanix. Do you truly believe our Empire is at its wits' end? Do you think we have exhausted all of our last-resort options? Do you think we lack options for dealing with the problems surrounding us?]

Vulpanix slowly shook her head. [Of course not, Second Founder. But… unleashing the Sentinels would be…]

[I do not speak of the Sentinels.] Dosena said with a sneer. [There are secrets that even the you of now is not qualified to know. Unarin and I do not keep many secrets from one another, but the secrets we do keep are sure to be frightening beyond belief. Even now, I am not as helpless as I might appear… and neither is he. The Sentinels are merely our most obvious, clumsy, and brutish weapon of last resort. But I have at least two other possibilities at my disposal. I cannot even guess how many Unarin possesses.]

Vulpanix lifted her head. She looked at Dosena in shock.

[What? You're saying you don't know what Unarin is planning? What cards he's hiding?]

[Unarin mastered the Mind of Void long ago. I have long been unable to read his thoughts. Similarly, he cannot read mine. This is not a problem we were unable to resolve, but an unspoken agreement we held. It keeps us both in check. If he were to grow power-mad and throw the Empire away, or if I were to do so, or if one of us were to be mind-controlled or otherwise compromised, we would both have secret weapons we could deploy. The same is true of the other Founders, perhaps to a lesser extent. I am certain Cuanali has stashed away a few secret weapons for a worst-case scenario.]

Vulpanix nodded. She fell silent for a moment.

[Is this why Archangel Uzziel has not wiped out our Empire? Surely by now, even before the Plague became empowered, even before our Psions fell to Demila, she had the capability to launch an all-out assault on Volgarius, but she didn't. Now that we are far weaker, she still could, but she does not. I have believed for a while now that merely wanting to make us suffer felt like a rather flimsy reason for not attacking...]

[It is presumably a combination of many reasons.] Dosena acknowledged. [Unarin and I did not know Uzziel was the mastermind of the Kolvaxian scourge. We believed the probability they were extra-galactic invaders was the highest likelihood. Even so, Unarin had certainly posited on a few occasions that the angels might be behind the rise of the Kolvaxians, but he lacked sufficient proof to establish a credible chain of evidence for that scenario. Given that we possessed what we believed to be Uzziel's soul, it seemed unlikely she had created them. The other Archangels, naturally, had become mere slaves to the demons.]

Vulpanix thought for a moment.

[Regarding the Ascended. What exactly are they? Are they a superior species of Volgrim? Are they our next evolutionary step? Unarin's vision demonstrated that Changelings and Technopaths can become Ascended... what about Psions and Dolgrimites?]

Dosena sighed. [All four subspecies can become Ascended. Only a hundred or so Dolgrimites ever took up the opportunity, and 75% of them died. I do not believe this is due to an incompatibility with their physiology, but because most were low-echelon Dolgrimites with mindsets that were not conducive to the process of ascension.]

She continued. [As for Psions… we certainly can become Ascended. However, there are a few things one must understand before making such a choice. First of all, every species has its own value. The Dolgrimites are stronger in physical body than the Ascended. The Psions possess more psionic might than the Ascended. Changelings can adapt their bodies to new forms far better than the Ascended. And Technopaths will always be superior in the realm of technological comprehension and manipulation than any Ascended.]

[Furthermore,] Dosena continued, [Not all Ascended are the same. The Ascended are essentially a blending of all the subspecies. They are what we Volgrim would have likely evolved into had the Dark Dragon not altered us. With historical insight, we now know it was Dolgris who was manipulating our species behind the scenes. Dolgris split our one species into four different ones to weaken us in some ways and strengthen us in others. The wars we fought made us evolve our combat prowess quickly, but they also kept us divided. In the end, Dolgris only retained control over the Dolgrimites, while the rest of us went our own way, unaware of his existence.]

[What do you mean when you say the Ascended are not all the same?] Vulpanix asked, confused. [Surely they would be different individually. I would expect as much.]

[Ah, I misspoke.] Dosena clarified. [A species that ascends affects the Ascended they become. Changeling Ascended are not the same as Technopath Ascended, Psion Ascended, or Dolgrimite Ascended. Even within the Ascended, there are crucial variations. Dolgrimites make for far more powerful Ascended when it comes to their bodies. Psions retain much, but not all, of their psionic potential. Technopaths are more adept than the other Ascended at manipulating technology. And of course, Changelings have much more flexible bodies that can adapt in a variety of ways that might surprise you.]

Vulpanix looked interested. [If that is true, then why did you not become an Ascended? Can I become one?]

[It is no longer possible for either of us.] Dosena explained. [One can only become an Ascended if they possess a mortal body. Now that you have attained Cosmic power, you would only perish if you attempted the transition. Therefore, only Psions of the 5th Level and below may become Ascended. Beyond that, there are of course the requirements for a formidable mind and willpower, but that goes without saying. For Psions, becoming an Ascended is rarely a worthwhile prospect.]

Seeing the confusion in Vulpanix's eyes, Dosena elaborated further. [We Psions can already become Cosmic by focusing our minds and studying the Psionic arts. If a Psion happened to lack the ability to climb past the mortal level, then their willpower would already be quite poor, and they would likely die during the transition. Therefore, one must be an excellent Psion seed, yet one who does not wish to attain Cosmic power through their own species' methods. Naturally, this type of Psion almost never exists.]

Vulpanix was enlightened. [It would seem the vast majority of Ascended consisted of Changelings and Technopaths, then. And likely there were more of the former than the latter.]

[Changelings maintain extremely disciplined minds.] Dosena admitted. [Compared to the scatterbrained researchers among the Technopaths, Changelings are already adept at regulating their emotions and maintaining calmness in the face of adversity. They naturally possess strong willpower and high ascension potential. That is why, of all the Ascended that have ever existed, 65% of them came from the ranks of the Changelings, while 30% came from the Technopaths, and only 5% rose from the Psions and the Dolgrimites. Of course, if the Psions decided to advance our powers by becoming Ascended, we would have the highest success rates by far, but there simply isn't any need. Better to diversify the potential of the Volgrim war machine than to go all-in on one tactic. That is how empires fall.]

Vulpanix nodded. It was clear to her now that her horizons had been truly shallow before today.

[Then... with all the Ascended at our disposal, once we unleash them, won't we be able to crush the Archangels into cosmic dust? Why has the First Founder not done so yet?]

For the first time, Dosena appeared stumped. [Matters regarding the Ascended have never been of interest to me. Six million cycles ago, Unarin put the Ascended to sleep inside of hibernation pods to preserve their battle power, but also to train their minds in a virtual world made by Cuanali. At the same time, their hibernation ensures their bodies require minimal sustenance. They will only be awoken when the time of true need arrives... but that time is entirely up to Unarin to determine. I have no say in the matter.]

Vulpanix looked vexed, but she decided not to press the issue. Who was she to argue with the wisdom of a ten million cycles-old leader like Unarin? He had his own plans, and it had been ingrained in Vulpanix since her formation that the First Founder's wisdom was never to be questioned unless he requested it first.

[It would be best if you focused on growing your own base of power, Vulpanix.] Dosena said curtly. [Worry not about the First Founder, and more about how you can someday rise to the rank of Supremator.]

Vulpanix looked surprised. [You will allow me to do so?]

Vulpanix and Dosena chatted a while longer, but eventually, Dosena steered the conversation back around to its starting point.

[Enough idle chatter. I still have much to enlighten you about, with regards to the Ancient Volgrim Empire. The next part of the tale took place when I arrived at the prison facility, shortly after the Ascended began to emerge...]

And so, like that, Dosena once again continued the story of the Ancient Volgrim Empire for her junior's benefit...

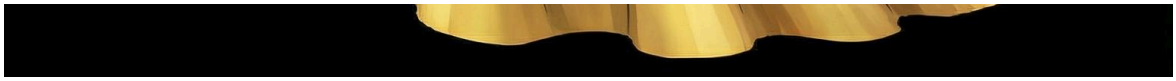
Author notes: Here are all the Ascended so far, with Art for each of them!

Unarin

Muuxunuu



Randis

There is no art for Vedric. Unarin was drawn by a human, while Muuxunuu and Randis are AI-variants of the Unarin image. In the future, I might generate an image for Vedric, or I might be able to pay an artist to redraw everyone. For now though, the description of the Haa'ti having 8 tendrils overrides all the artworks, and I imagine the density of the Haa'ti is closer to Muuxunuu than Unarin or Randis.

Part 733: Making a Mindverse

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Inside the Hall of Heroes.

Mandy wasn't in a bad mood, but she wasn't in a good mood either. A few weeks had passed since Blake's crowning ceremony as the Lord of Heroes. In that time, Mandy had been as busy as always.

She was a Runemaster, sometimes referred to as a Runesmith, and even other variations beyond those two. Fundamentally, Mandy manipulated Runes. That was what she did... and it was an ability unique to her.

Most people had zero idea what sort of powers she possessed. Even the people who did know, didn't know much. It wasn't that Mandy deliberately kept them in the dark, but more that they could only see the final products she produced... not the underlying system that governed how her magic functioned. Put another way, Mandy was like a programmer, and the code she wrote was a mystery to everyone. All they could see were the programs she released, with little to no understanding of the code running underneath.

Mandy had explained her abilities many times in the past to her closest family members. Only her father had once comprehended her powers to a decent degree, while her mother was lost, her brother Levi was totally oblivious, and Blake tried to pretend to understand, but it was clear he couldn't follow along either. The one person who had fully and completely understood her powers was Solomon, and that was only due to the intimate mind link they had shared whenever she borrowed his artifact from her father on several occasions.

Mandy was a resident of the Hall of Heroes in the most permanent sense of the word. She was born and had lived there her entire life. Traveling to Realspace was simply not something she did much, nor something she had much interest in doing. She had spent time with her 'aunts' and 'uncles' in realspace, people like Neil and Linda Adams, his secretary Debra who was also Annette's sister, Henry, and others along with them. But despite this, Mandy simply didn't enjoy going to realspace.

War was approaching, and its presence drew nearer every day.

Unlike her brothers, Mandy was a deeply cerebral person. She didn't speak much, and she thought a lot. She was only fifteen years old when she had her first contact with Solomon's Crown, shortly after awakening her powers, and this brief interaction had also allowed her to rapidly enhance her intelligence, and ultimately develop a Mind Realm.

Mandy's Mind Realm was special. It was far more unique than even the Mind Realms her father and uncle, both of the Wordsmiths, had developed.

Mandy sat inside her library, a place stocked with countless books written in Runes, a language only she and Solomon could properly read. The pages of each book were imbued not with words, but with the True Knowledge Mandy had etched onto the pages with her magic. And now, she was reading one of her earlier works with a look of disappointment on her face.

"The theory is simply wrong. How could I have made such an elementary mistake? The confines of my Mind Realm simply cannot expand any further until this error is resolved."

Mandy held a long feather in her right hand, one which had a faintly glowing golden quill-tip at its end. She scratched some runes onto the paper which flickered with energy before erasing other runes that already existed on the page. Immediately, the True Meaning of the page changed, but this only made her expression more miserable.

"No, no, not like that. What am I even doing? I cannot keep making these mistakes. If I don't decipher the solution soon, then I'll have wasted the last 13 years of my life!"

Mandy stared at the page for a good couple of minutes, then she set it down, along with the magical quill, then she took a seat and closed her eyes. Mandy held both hands up on either side of her head, then pinched her fingers together and brought them close to the outside edges of her closed eyes. She wiggled her unpinched fingers, then she slowly pulled her hands forward in front of her face and started to draw symmetrical lines in the air before herself.

Mandy's eyes remained tightly closed. If her right hand drew an upward line, her left hand drew a line downward. If her right hand moved right, her left hand moved left.

Like this, she spent a full minute carefully drawing a magical rune in midair. Then she held her hands in place, opened her eyes, and exhaled deeply.

Slowly, carefully, she lowered the rune down toward her right knee. Her forehead began to sweat as she looked at her flesh and blood body, but what she saw was not what anyone else would be able to see. Instead, Mandy possessed eyes that were able to innately see the runic configurement of the world around her. The entire world was filled with magic that only she could perceive, and she used her unique Runemaster powers to contemplate and comprehend the true reality only her eyes beheld.

Her legs were dense with magical runic markings. So were her arms, her torso, her face and head, her fingers, even her toes. These runic patterns were not normal, but had been artificially constructed one at a time ever since she had first learned of her powers and started experimenting on herself.

The runes were densely interwoven new, and adding new ones was a major affair that took all her concentration to pull off. A single incorrectly placed element could wrack her body with injuries, illness, and possibly even death. She had certainly screwed up in the past and had to make adjustments on the fly while on the verge of death.

At this moment, her brow was knitted tightly as she slowly shrank the new rune down and carefully placed it onto her right knee. To her relief, the rune vanished, then reappeared amidst the web of markings on her body.

"Succ...success..." Mandy exhaled, breathing through her mouth and nose in equal measure.

This five minute ordeal had drained her thoughts, but it didn't take long before she recovered by pulling from a secret wellspring of mental energy that rapidly replenished itself in her Mind Realm.

Mandy closed her eyes. She looked inside her Mind Realm, and what she saw would have surely startled either of the Wordsmiths, especially Jason Hiro. There were countless soul-like lifeforms floating around in her Mind Realm, as well as a rich and lush-looking world filled with mountains, valleys, lakes and seas, forests, and even floating cities in the clouds. Unfortunately, the spiritual life forms inside Mandy's Mind Realm were not particularly smart, and they definitely weren't sentient.

The most they could do was mindlessly toil away to maintain the stability of her Mind Realm. They did not have thoughts, dreams, or ambitions. They could hardly even be called 'alive'.

Mandy frowned. The new rune she had just placed was designed to augment her life energy to produce more of it inside her mind, but unfortunately, the impact on her Mind Realm was negligible.

Her expression deflated, and a sense of hopelessness overtook her.

"Another failure." Mandy muttered.

She had been trying for so long, but always failing. Her goal was extreme, but she felt success was possible. She just didn't know how to make what she wanted to happen, happen.

Mandy leaned back in her chair and hung her head backward, feeling mentally exhausted in a way even her magic couldn't fix. She had attempted more than 5,000 different times to try and modify a certain part of her Mind Realm, but she hadn't yet succeeded. If she had, everything would've changed.

As Mandy sat there, motionless, she heard soft footsteps approaching from outside her library. She turned her head slightly to see Hammurabi approaching. He paused at the doorway and smiled.

"Am I interrupting anything?" Hammurabi asked.

Mandy blinked her eyelids heavily. "No, nothing at all. Can I help you?"

"You've been cooped up in here for over a week." Hammurabi said, the muscular old man smiling kindly as he entered the room. "I thought I'd make sure you hadn't worked yourself to death."

Mandy looked away. She didn't reply for a time.

It took her a while to come up with anything worth saying.

"I'm so... frustrated with myself." Mandy eventually said, her voice quiet. "I keep trying to do something with my magic, but I can't get it to work. According to my theories, it should be possible, but I keep screwing up, over and over. The weight of my failures is really starting to weigh on me, especially with the situation continuing to worsen in Realspace."

Hammurabi grabbed a chair against the wall and walked with it over to sit down near Mandy. He folded his hands in his lap and nodded seriously.

"I don't understand much of how your runes work, but perhaps you can explain the problem to me in broad terms? Maybe my listening ear can help you disentangle the problem?"

Hammurabi was one of the wisest people Mandy knew, but unlike Solomon who could interface directly with Mandy's mind, Hammurabi struggled to understand her complex theories. Mandy seemed doubtful about whether he could help her, but at the same time, she didn't want to be rude.

"Well..." Mandy said hesitantly. "It's... it's like this. I have a theory about my Mind Realm. Well, most Mind Realms, even. I lack direct experience with other people's Mind Realms, but- sorry, I'm babbling. The point is, I have a theory about Mind Realms, which is that they can be so much more than what we know."

Hammurabi raised an eyebrow. "Interesting. I am quite familiar with Mind Realms. I possessed one when I was alive, as did Solomon. Unfortunately, upon my death, mine ceased to exist. All who perish bring their Mind Realms to the grave along with their bodies."

Mandy nodded. "Solomon told me the same thing. But see, that's the thing. I don't believe that to be a given. I think Mind Realms are actually a 'seed' that can sprout into something far greater if given the proper care."

She continued. "Mind Realms are limited to only containing life forms that are ethereal or spiritual in nature, see? That is how just by holding your artifacts, other living Heroes can interface your souls with their Mind Realms. Dad told me when he and Jason first interfaced with Solomon, their Mind Realms seemed completely barren and empty, but Solomon was able to forcefully create small things like chairs and tables for himself to sit at."

She continued. "I spoke to the Archangels too, and Raphael once told me that he was able to drastically enrich Uncle Jason's Mind Realm by force, using his own knowledge of Mind Realms to create buildings, plants, and other similar things, though purely for aesthetic purposes. Later, Jason added some features to his Mind Realm, creating a sort of rudimentary computer system to boost Aunt Fiona's mental capabilities."

Hammurabi stroked his beard. "Indeed, I have heard some of this. So is that your goal? To create a computer system inside your mind?"

"I can already do that." Mandy said. "But no, that's not my goal. I want to create... well, it might sound a little ludicrous... but I want to make a real, physical, living world inside my Mind Realm. What I envision is not a Mind Realm, but a Mindverse. I want to create a living world where real people from the real world can travel to and live safely, and one that could even persist after my death. I also want to find a way to replicate it in the minds of other people!"

This time, Hammurabi was the one who looked doubtful.

"You wish... for real people to live inside a Mind Realm?"

"A Mindverse." Mandy corrected, her tone surprisingly firm. "A world or a star system or even a universe within one person's mind. I believe it should be possible."

Hammurabi scratched his chin. "Child, if you think it to be possible, then I trust your judgment. However, in all my years, across the many Heroes I've met, none have ever possessed such a wonder within their minds. I believe you may be grabbing at a prize that extends beyond your arm's reach."

Mandy sighed. "I am starting to think it's hopeless too. But if my dad were still alive, I bet he could have done it. Wordsmithing had all sorts of capabilities, and I feel a Mindverse wouldn't have been out of reach. I just... I need to figure out how to simulate the natural laws of the world, but that's the hardest part since I cannot simulate what I don't know."

Hammurabi thought for a while.

"You once told me you could see runes in all aspects of the world around you. Is there a way you can see the runes related to concepts missing inside your Mindverse?"

The Runemaster threw her hands up helplessly. "I don't know. Maybe? But what I'm missing are truly vague and high level concepts, like 'time' and 'space'. I don't know how to make runes based on the concept of life force, or turning spiritual life forms into flesh and bone, or other such things like that. There's too many concepts eluding me! I fear I will never be able to make my Mindverse a possibility."

"No." Hammurabi said, flashing a knowing smile at her. "That is not what you fear. You are an obsessive. The more you try to make this Mindverse a reality, the closer you will draw, and the harder you will work as you see the goal drawing near. It is not failure you fear, but rather, that instead of working on this 'Mindverse', you would be serving humanity better by building weapons of war. You worry that you are frivolously wasting time creating a Mindverse, and that the demons or the Volgrim or the Plague will exterminate humanity due to your poor choice of what to focus on."

Hammurabi chuckled. "I truly love your heart, young one. You have nothing to fear. You are thirty-five years old. You might still feel like a child at times, but you are notably older than many of the most famous Heroes were when they accomplished their greatest feats. You are old enough that you are beginning to develop 'instincts' related to your powers. This 'feeling' you possess regarding the viability of your Mindverse is not something you should ignore."

He continued. "Furthermore, do not disrespect your brothers, the other Heroes in this hall, or even the ordinary humans in Realspace by over-inflating your importance. Even if you fell into a deep depression tomorrow and stopped using your magic entirely, humanity would be far from helpless. Jepthath's Legion alone, combined with the imminent rise of empowered humans lacking their Flaw, this is only one possible factor that could result in an explosion of human power."

Mandy looked at Hammurabi and sighed. "I... think I get it. You're saying that if I feel this Mindverse thing is worth the time and effort, I should devote myself to it and not feel guilt at not serving humanity in a more immediate context. Is that right?"

"Precisely!" Hammurabi exclaimed, before letting out a belly-laugh. "Hahaha, my dear girl, you've got it! That's exactly right. Focus on what your instincts tell you to focus on, and even if you fail at creating this 'Mindverse', you will surely discover new aspects to your power that can help you in other ways. So long as you learn something new every day, there is no waste."

A long moment of silence followed.

Hammurabi cleared his throat. "However, I do have one suggestion."

Mandy clasped her hands respectfully. "Please advise, teacher."

"You stated that you do not know how to uncover high-level aspects of reality. Time and space, for instance. But have you forgotten? You once told me your runic arts are somewhat similar to the magic the Fairies use to build their formations. Humanity plans to swallow the Sharmur star-system, along with the Pixiv system, into the Cube. Why not pay those Fairies a visit after we've done so? I have a feeling they might know about these high-level concepts. They could be of great help to you in empowering your Mindverse... and they are humanity's natural allies to boot! You will be in little danger of betrayal by them."

Hope's daughter was enlightened. "That's a great point. I think I'll do that, Hammurabi."

"Hahaha." Hammurabi laughed lightly. "I'm just glad my simple-minded words could be of some minor help to you. I've one foot in the grave, but if my knowledge can help the younger generation, I must offer it wherever possible."

"Don't even say such silly things!" Mandy laughed. "I'm always happy to talk with you! I wish I could do it more often."

"You just stick to your research, and I'll pop over once in a while to make sure you haven't dried up from a lack of water." Hammurabi concluded.

He stood up to go, but paused before leaving.

"Ah... there is one other thing I wished to discuss with you."

Seeing the serious look on Hammurabi's face, Mandy stood up as well. "Yes?"

"This is... rather awkward to mention. I also feel the timing is rather in poor taste..." Hammurabi said hesitantly. "But I feel it must be said."

"It's fine. Just speak your mind." Mandy replied.

Hammurabi smiled, but the expression felt a little forced. "Well, I've spoken to Levi about this as well. But, essentially, I think you, Levi, and maybe even Blake should be thinking about marriage. Not to one another of course, but to someone... anyone really, from among the humans in Realspace."

Mandy blinked. She really didn't expect this line of discussion.

"M-marriage? Why?" Mandy asked, giving Hammurabi a strange look.

"There is no easy way to say this." Hammurabi said. "You and your brothers are special. For some reason, the Heroic Aura has clearly passed down to you from your father. All of you are incredibly powerful Heroes in your own right, and you three are all somehow Trueborns. Your father sired three children before he passed. I think it is important, critically important even, that you consider expanding on his lineage as soon as possible."

Hammurabi continued. "Do not look down on this matter. I was unable to sire children possessing the Heroic spirit, but even I took multiple wives, and they bore me three sons and a daughter. If those children had possessed a fraction of your power, I would have leaped over the moon in exultation!"

Mandy's frown eased up. With her sharp tactical mind, she was easily able to parse the logic in his words.

"You're right. And with humanity's Flaw removed, all humans theoretically have the power to become Trueborn Heroes. While it's not clear why nobody has obtained any heroic abilities yet, every shred of information we possess indicates they should rapidly begin ascending any day now. That means I really can't go wrong, no matter who I choose to be my husband..."

"Ah, haha..." Hammurabi chuckled weakly. "When I spoke of this matter to Levi, he seemed quite enraged I would 'dictate his private life' to him. I'm glad you understand the seriousness of what I am saying. Blake is quite young, but your father was the same age when he met Amelia. Jason was even younger when he wedded Phoebe. In these trying times, if bearing children can grant humanity an explosion of power, should we not do so as much as possible?"

Mandy nodded. "I am not too familiar with courting rituals or... um... wooing the opposite sex. I don't know how good I would do at it..."

"Hah! You are not the one who courts, silly girl!" Hammurabi laughed. "You are truly an antisocial shut-in. As a beautiful woman, it is the duty of men to prove themselves worthy for YOU! If I were to spread the word that you were looking for a partner, I fear the rabid men of the outside world would beat down the doors to catch a glance of your face!"

"Do you need to make the process sound so utterly terrifying?" Mandy half-joked. "But fine, fine, I get the idea. More children, more Trueborn, more power for humanity. I hadn't really considered dating or marriage, but I certainly see the value in it. When humanity absorbs Sharmur and Pixiv, I will visit the Fairies to see if they can help me make a breakthrough in my Mindverse, and then I shall visit Sharmur to see if there are any notable suitors appropriate for my status."

Hammurabi rolled his eyes. "Listen to you, already speaking like a noble princess passing judgment on the unworthy! You know romance is supposed to be quite fun and breathtaking, don't you? Don't treat this as another task to check off a list, or you'll end up in a loveless marriage where all you do is pop out babies while feeling unsatisfied your entire life."

Mandy shrugged. She didn't seem to understand any of the appeal of 'romance', so in her eyes Hammurabi was acting silly. To her, it truly just was something that was her duty. She had no real interest in romance whatsoever.

"I'll look into it if I have time." Mandy said dismissively. "Was there anything else?"

Hammurabi hesitated. "I could look into suitors for you-"

"No, no, you don't need to go that far for me." Mandy said with a smile. "I'll figure it out when the time is right."

Hammurabi was helpless. He pressed his palms together and bowed as a farewell, then he strode out of the room while rubbing his face. He grimaced once her library was far behind him.

"That girl is usually so brilliant, but when it comes to matters of love, she's as dense as a rock. I imagine she would have melted into a puddle of embarrassment if I deliberately mentioned copulation or anything else of the sort. I fear that without external help, she'll remain single for the rest of her life. Let's hope her brothers have more charisma and interest in the opposite sex..."

Oblivious to her ancestor's thoughts, Mandy felt her spirits lifted, and she returned to her work on the Mindverse with greater gusto than before.

"Now that I think about it, perhaps I've been going about all this wrong. What if I purged all the Runes I've etched on myself and started from scratch? I should try to simulate the birth of a universe, and to let the Mindverse develop naturally on its own. I think this path has a lot more potential than laboriously creating a world myself! Hmm... but all these years of work I've put into my personal Runes... do I truly wish to throw them away?"

Mandy fell deep into thought. She would need much more time before she could make a decision about starting over from scratch, and her fear of the consequences would ensure she'd need to test her theories before she could put them into practice.

"There's no getting around it. I'll have to talk to the Fairies before I make any concrete decisions." Mandy decided.

Nobody in existence had any idea just how important her work would become in the following years. Perhaps only her closest mentor, Solomon, would have understood. But with his passing, Mandy had been left truly alone in the universe. Not even her closest family members had the capacity to understand the true value of her magic.

Someday, that would change.

Part 734: One Last Goodbye

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Somewhere in the Labyrinth…

Abby, the Baron of Happy Thoughts, held an odd glowing rectangle in her hands. She stood in the Oracle Hive, where she had spent much of her life, and chatted casually with several of her friends. Abby had once been an Oracle, a long time ago when she was still a Demon Grunt, but after becoming a Lord and then a Baron, she moved on to greater things, mainly spending time working with Ose during the Energy Wars, only to return to the Oracles after the destruction of Earth.

One hundred thousand years was a long time. Abby had developed all sorts of friendly and professional relationships with the other demons working inside the Oracle Hive. Since Abby was also a succubus, she had a unique development cycle that had her functioning as a dual-grunt in her early years, though she always tended to focus on her Oracle work. Part of that was no doubt due to her obsession with Ose, who detested succubi, and who subtly made Abby want to reject that part of herself.

Giant blue crystals hung in the air. On each crystal, between one and four Oracles sat cross legged, their palms in their laps as they deduced potential future trends. Unlike certain individuals who could clearly see the future, Oracles were essentially attempting to predict important trends to divine future information in a more broad sense, rather than specific actions.

The room was constantly buzzing with blue light. Some of the Oracles were more powerful than the others, and they were capable of deciphering deeper trends, even occasionally predicting specific future threats days or even weeks ahead of time. Those special Oracles were the ones who obtained an entire Portent Crystal for themselves, while the lesser Oracles needed to share a single crystal among each other.

Abby held up the glowing rectangle, which displayed words and images on its front. This was an advanced device given to her by ADAM, which he had helpfully explained was known as a 'datapad.' On it, various information was displayed, including a listing of recent additions to the Garden of Eden, new robot types that were being built and developed, and new magical tools and weapons designed by Camael.

A tall male demon with gray skin and front-facing curved horns stood before Abby, his hands folded behind his back. He wore simple black robes that covered his torso and legs, with a hood left hanging behind himself, his head uncovered. Despite the fact that he stood a full foot taller than her, he was merely a Demon Grunt, an ordinary Oracle, and a Satyr at that. He did not dare to be rude to Abby, a bonafide Demon Baron, who outranked him by two entire levels.

"We could use your help with this matter." The Satyr said, his expression stern. "You are our best Oracle. Even if you've moved on to greener pastures, your abilities remain potent."

"I just think it's a waste of time!" Abby exclaimed, rolling her eyes. "I'm doing important stuff now, Genos."

"I understand that." Genos said. "But while Uriel was once our greatest enemy, she now could become a pillar of demonkind's strength. At least, according to Barbatos. We have to find her location. It might be possible to rescue her, assuming she has not fallen into the Kolvaxian's clutches."

Abby looked up from the datapad. "Look, Genos, I've told you guys a bunch of times. Just because I used to be an Oracle doesn't mean I want to be one forever. I have a much more important mission now than hunting down some Archangel who might be our enemy, or who might be our ally! My mission was given to me by Ose, and anything my precious Ose says, overrides anything you say. Got it?!"

Genos looked troubled. "I would not dare to presume, but... what could be more important than securing the power of a High Cosmic for our people? Barbatos alone does not give us enough assurances against the Kolvaxian menace."

Abby sighed. "I don't even know where to begin. I promised Ose I wouldn't spill the beans, okay? But let's just say she didn't sit on her butt for 100,000 years lounging around drinking blood wine! She was out there building a stockpile of weapons to help demonkind someday rule the galaxy! So trust me, working on Ose's project is way more important than hunting for Uriel. Maybe you guys should ask the Deities if they can advance some of you to Lord or even Baron! Then you won't need my help."

"We cannot spare the souls anymore, since demons are no longer allowed to reap human souls..." Genos said, his expression pained. "But if you truly do not wish to help us, I guess there's no helping it. We'll have to make do on our own."

"There you go! That's the spirit, big guy!" Abby laughed, lightly reaching out to clap his arm. "Anyway, I'm done here. Just wanted to pay you guys a visit and see what was up! I've gotta head back now!"

She turned to leave, but then Genos cleared his throat.

"Ahem, say, Abby? You keep mentioning Ose... but isn't she... dead?"

Abby paused. With her back to Genos, she didn't say anything for a moment.

"Yeah. She's technically dead." Abby said quietly. "But a part of her still lives on in spirit. And that's enough for me."

Genos scratched his head. He didn't really understand what Abby meant, but it wasn't his place to pry.

"Alright. Take care then, Baron of Happy Thoughts."

Abby nodded without looking back at him. She continued to walk forward, leaving the blue-lit Oracle Hive behind. Its light quickly grew fainter and fainter until she could not sense it anymore.

Abby walked for a while. A long while.

The route back to the hidden alcove that would teleport her to the Garden of Eden was not a short one. Unlike Ose, who could manipulate her Astral Form to rapidly fly through the walls of the Labyrinth, Abby had to walk or run through it the old fashioned way. She did transit across the Labyrinth a little faster by going to specific Warper hubs, but moving hundreds and hundreds of miles quickly was not easy for anyone to do, especially in the context of a winding three dimensional path that was constantly changing.

"The Labyrinth is so annoying." Abby muttered to herself. "Lots of living space, but such a pain in the butt to go anywhere."

Abby walked past various pod-shaped Birthing Rooms where Broodmothers labored to produce new Demon Imps, as well as a few Pleasure Pits where demons engaged in rancorous sex, violence, and other debauchery. Abby had even spent time in similar places in her youth, before she decided to become an Oracle full-time, but she wouldn't ever go there now. She transited through three separate Warper Stations before reaching the final stretch of her journey after six long grueling hours.

Abby's feet were starting to hurt. She wore white sneakers, and even so, her feet were still aching a little from all the running around.

Abby wasn't exactly a fashionista, but she had a certain look to her. She always kept her white hair up in a ponytail, she wore a punk rock T-shirt, and she preferred to let her succubus tail poke out of the back of her booty-shorts. Her entire outfit was black, except for her white socks and sneakers, and she had all sorts of skull decorations on her clothes as well.

Funnily enough, Abby's hair was not naturally white. It was originally black, but when she first met Ose more than 100,000 years ago, she'd become Ose's biggest fangirl and dyed her hair to match. Naturally, Ose rolled her eyes, but Abby didn't care. There was nobody in the universe she thought about more than Ose... especially after Ose's death.

Even now, on the way back to the Garden of Eden, Abby bobbed her head from side to side as she thought about the tiny soul sliver of Ose that was inside Bael's Matriarch Armor.

Could there be a way for Abby to communicate with Ose? She had donned the Matriarch Armor in the past, but she wasn't able to hear Ose's voice. She didn't think Bael was lying, so he must truly be able to talk to her. It likely had something to do with the fact that Bael was now inhabiting Ose's original body.

While Abby was thinking these things, she suddenly came to a stop as a strange, cold feeling softly passed over her body. Abby flinched, then lifted her eyes to look into the distance.

Up ahead, Abby could just barely make out a figure that would scare the shit out of any other demon. The figure had two heads, four arms, and a body covered in glowing red eyeballs. He looked like a freak, an abomination, a monster that should not exist. But Abby had never perceived him as an enemy... not towards her.

"...Gressil?" Abby asked hesitantly, as she walked toward him.

She wasn't exactly scared, but the two of them weren't particularly close anymore. Ever since devouring Lucifer during the Energy Wars, Gressil had become something of a loner. Abby always felt pangs of sympathy for him, but he tended to avoid her, for reasons unknown. She wasn't sure if she had hurt his feelings in the past, or if maybe he was scared of hurting her, or maybe his personality had changed and he no longer considered her a friend.

But now he was here. In front of her. And his appearance didn't feel like a coincidence.

As Abby approached, she noticed Gressil's head was bowed, and he was leaning back against the corridor wall. He had a solemn, heavy expression on his face.

"Hello, Abby." Gressil said quietly. His voice was soft. Maybe even a little bit warm. But there was also a hint of melancholy to it. "It's been a while."

Abby stopped a short distance away. She nodded slowly. "Yeah, Gres. It's been a while. Um. How are... you?"

Gressil visibly seemed downcast, but Abby had no idea why. She decided to gently probe his mood.

"Not great." Gressil admitted. He still hadn't looked at her once. "Something happened recently. I lost a friend, and in his absence, I realized... I don't have many friends left."

Abby bobbed her head slightly. "So you're feeling lonely? And you wanted to come see me?"

Gressil was quiet for a time.

"Ose is dead." Gressil said. "The Wordsmiths are gone. A new Game is afoot. But I no longer have access to the Temporal Realm. After the Great Shattering, the future has lost its cohesion. And thus, so too have I become somewhat... lost."

Abby blinked. "Um... Temporal Realm... Great Shattering... I don't really get it, Gres. I know we haven't talked in a long time, but if you want to talk, I'm here now."

"That's good." Gressil said, finally turning his head to smile faintly at her. "Let's sit."

Abby nodded.

Gressil lowered himself to the ground, and Abby took the initiative to sit beside him, within arm's length. If he had any evil intentions, he could reach out and kill her on the spot. But Abby didn't think he would do that, and she had no reason to distrust him.

"So." Abby said quietly. "What's up with you, big guy?"

Gressil sighed. "I can't see the future anymore. It's thrilling, in a way, but I can vaguely sense a great loss approaching. Truth be told, I don't think you and I will be able to talk again after this. So... I wanted to speak to you, maybe for the last time."

"What? For the last time?!" Abby fried. "No, no, Gres, don't be silly. You're an Emperor now. Nothing's going to happen to you!"

"Emperors are not the powerhouses they used to be." Gressil said. "Deities are. And I am no Demon Deity."

Abby suddenly remembered something. "Say... I heard a rumor recently that Emperor Crow was killed. You weren't involved, were you?"

Gressil turned his head slightly to look at her. A long moment of silence followed.

"She targeted someone... precious to me. So I had to eliminate her."

"Is that the problem then? You're worried the Deities want you dead because you killed one of their own?" Abby pressed.

Gressil shrugged. "They definitely want me dead. But death is not the worst fate one can suffer. At least death is final, to some extent. They might instead wish to capture me, torment me, or other such things."

Gressil paused.

"But I didn't really come here to talk about myself. I wanted to see how you were doing. Have you been well, Abby?"

Abby started to affirm in the positive, but then she caught herself. A moment followed where she lowered her eyes and looked at the ground.

"...Not really, Gres. I haven't been doing so great myself. Ose died, and she meant a lot to me."

"I know she did." Gressil said. "She meant a lot to me as well. We had our differences, but ultimately, Ose was my sister... and I loved her. I simply didn't know how to show that love."

"Yeah..." Abby said softly. "You've always had it... rough."

After hesitating for a moment, Abby tentatively reached out and touched Gressil's hand. She smiled sheepishly at him, and he offered a rare smile back.

Gressil quietly took her hand in his.

The two of them sat there in silence, in the darkness of the Labyrinth, where their demonic vision had no trouble seeing.

Five long minutes passed.

"You know, Gres..." Abby said quietly. "I, um... I loved- I still love Ose. So much. So very much. But I want you to know I've always cared for you too. I'm sorry I pulled away after... the incident."

"You were scared of what I'd become." Gressil said. "Your fear was only natural."

"No. No!" Abby exclaimed, looking at him in surprise. "That's not true at all, Gres! I was never scared of you, not then and not now. I know that you've done some horrible things, but I also know what sort of a person you really are!"

She paused.

"Gres, you're not a bad person. You're not. That... that woman hurt you. She beat you, insulted you, messed with your head. It turned you cruel. But that wasn't your fault. Your revenge was scary, but I understood it. I always did. When you changed, I avoided you because... because I didn't know how to process what had happened! Because I didn't know what to say to make you feel better! Because I was scared... of hurting you even more."

Abby turned her body, then reached up to touch Gressil's deformed, birdlike face, with its long beak and other misshapen features.

"I should have been there for you, Gres. I'm so sorry I wasn't a good friend."

Gressil reached his own hand up and gently pressed it against Abby's hand, now resting on his face. He gave her a long, sad look.

"You were right to avoid me." Gressil said. "I became a monster. I'm still a monster. If I had hurt you in my rage... I don't think I could have forgiven myself."

Gressil pulled her hand away, then released his hold on her other hand, putting a little distance between them.

"What happened in the past will remain in the past." Gressil said, looking forward at the opposite wall once more. "We cannot change the past. We can only move on from it."

"I guess you're right." Abby said, her expression gloomy. She sat back down and crossed her arms around her legs, resting her chin on her knees. "I still feel bad though."

Gressil reached over and rested a palm on Abby's back. "There's no need to feel that way. I'm glad I was able to call you my friend."

"Me too." Abby said, only to realize something, as she turned her head to look at him. "Wait, what do you mean 'was' able? We're still friends, Gres."

"Yes. But this is the last time we're going to speak." Gressil said. "I wanted to make sure our last meeting was a good one. I have to go now. We won't see each other again after this."

Abby blinked. Gressil was already standing up, which made her heart race with fright. She quickly jumped to her feet and grabbed his arm.

"Wait, wait! Gres! What do you mean? Where are you going? What are you planning?! Why won't I see you anymore?!"

Gressil looked down at Abby's small, frail hands that were not even able to properly wrap around the circumference of his arms. He was far larger than her. She was a small and dainty demoness, while he was a disfigured monster.

The distance between them had grown over time, and even now he could feel the chasm widening.

"There's no point telling you." Gressil said. "This is one future event that remains fixed. Because it's the choices we make that define us."

Abby's chest tightened with emotion. She croaked out a few weak words, as tears started to well up in her eyes. Gressil gently pulled his arm away from her, then brushed away her tears.

"Goodbye, Abby. For the last time."

Abby's body shook. She started to reach out, to try and grab onto Gressil so he couldn't leave, but she was a second too slow. Gressil's form turned immaterial as he faded away, his aura vanishing from the hallway.

"Wait! WAIT! Gressil, no! Stop! Whatever you're about to do, don't do it! Gressil? GRESSIL?! Do you hear me? Come back, big guy! Come back, Gres! I mean it, I'm not kidding around!"

"Gres!"

"GRESSIL!!"

The strength left Abby's legs. She fell to her knees and started to sob, not even certain what was about to happen, but confident it was going to be very, very bad.

"Gressil... Gres... no, devils... I can't lose them both... I can't lose him too..."

Abby wept. At this moment, she became a ball of emotions, unable to stop herself from experiencing a sensation of loss just as acute as when Ose died.

She knew she could not persuade Gressil to stop whatever he was about to do, and even if she could, she had no way of tracking him down! Gressil was the most elusive demon in all the Seven Hells.

Thus, she lost her rationality and sobbed, cried, and wept for a full hour.

Time passed.

Eventually, her tears ran their course. Abby shakily stood up and started staggering forward, her eyes hollow as she made her way back to the portal which would take her to the Garden of Eden. She found the secret wall panel, then stepped inside of it. ADAM was already waiting for her there. Without a word, the two of them disappeared, traveling to a place somewhere unknown in the galaxy, where Ose's secret base of operations had been built.

When Abby arrived, her body language was downcast beyond all reason. Nobody had ever seen the usually bright, bubbly Baron of Happy Thoughts in such a state of complete depression. She looked as if her entire life had fallen apart and she had no idea what to do about it.

Abby sat down inside the small cafeteria. The shiny, slick, white colored tables were spotless as always, just like how Ose liked them. Servant bots came to ask if she was hungry, but Abby simply shook her head, her body numb from sadness.

Eventually, Bael wandered over, having been informed of Abby's return by ADAM.

"Hey, girl! What's up? You uh... you good, sister?"

Bael plunked down on the bench beside Abby. She didn't answer him, but instead opted to hollowly stare at the table, unblinking.

"Abby? Aaaaabby? What's goin' on? You alright? Wanna talk about it?" Bael pestered. He could tell something was wrong, but Bael was hardly one for nuance. He was a lunkhead, through and through.

Abby slowly blinked. She turned to look at Bael, her eyes puffy and red from all her crying. "Huh...? Wha... what was that, Bael?"

Bael gulped. "Hey, honey. You uh, you don't look so good. You wanna talk?"

Abby nodded dumbly, her expression blank. "Yeah... no... yeah... I don't know. I just... I want a hug, Bael."

Bael's eyes softened. "A hug? Sure. Everyone needs a good hug once in a while. C'mere."

He reached his arms out, and Abby immediately leaned forward into his embrace. She wrapped her arms around his back and sighed as her head rested against his plump breasts.

"Hey Bael... let's... not talk for a while... okay? No talk."

"Okay." Bael said, as he gently rubbed her back. "No talking."

Abby closed her eyes. She imagined that she was not hugging Bael, but Ose. It was Ose's body, after all. It was almost as if Ose was still there, in body if not in spirit.

Ose... I miss you so much. Now Gressil's going away too... I don't want to be alone. I wish that Wordsmith had never appeared. I wish none of this had ever happened. I was happy with the way things were.

Abby choked back a sob.

I wish I could have loved you the way you deserved. I wish I could have been there for Gres. I wish I had been a better friend...

Inside the Matriarch Armor, Ose awakened. Her soul sliver was still contained within Bael's belt, the object known as Mjölnir. As such, she was able to perceive the world around her.

[Hmm?] Ose muttered to herself. [Something's off about Abby. She's not usually like this. I wish I could speak to her so I could find out what happened.]

Just as the thought came to Ose, her spiritual body jolted with shock.

[What? What's this?! Impossible... a faint soul resonance...?! Why am I able to sense Abby's soul? My spirit should not be strong enough to do that, which means... the situation has changed? Has Abby herself changed?]

Ose thought long and hard as Abby remained in Bael's embrace.

A spark of light flickered inside the crafty Emperor's eyes. [I sense that a possibility which didn't exist before might be doable now. This could be... a chance!]

Part 735: Genetic Manipulation

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. The Garden of Eden.

Abby was in a miserable state, but hugging Bael improved her mood quite a bit. After five or ten minutes of him gently rubbing and patting her back in silence, she eventually pulled away and wiped her eyes.

"Th-thanks, Bael. I'm sorry I got so weepy." Abby mumbled.

"It's fine, honey." Bael said, smiling at her. "You wanna talk about it?"

Abby thought for a moment, then shook her head. "No... not really."

"Oh. Okay." Bael said.

After a minute, Bael scratched the back of his head.

"So, uh, did you do that thing Ose wanted?"

The Baron of Happy Thoughts blinked. She thought for a moment. "Oh... yeah. I got in touch with them."

She reached into a pocket on the side of her booty shorts, where she'd stuffed the datapad from earlier. She mumbled something to herself as she took a minute to login to the device. She wasn't good with technology at all, but in order to follow in Ose's footsteps, she had been putting in real effort to try and learn.

After running three different biometric scans to validate her identity, Abby started scrolling down the list on the datapad.

"Um, I contacted Laharl. She didn't seem too interested at first, but when I explained to her that becoming a Duke or an Emperor wasn't viable in the long term due to a soul shortage, she bit. She has the um... the skillset we need too."

Abby sniffled. She wiped her nose, trying to refocus her thoughts away from what Gressil told her before.

"Then I um... I looked for Vepar. It turns out she's already a Deity now, so... looks like our info is out of date."

"Vepar is? Man, guess I've been on this planet too long." Bael mumbled. "Shit, it's only been a couple of days since I last saw her."

"A little longer than that..." Abby said, before remembering Bael didn't know how to count. "Uh, who else? Oh, I found Orias! He's exactly the type of demon we want, but... he wasn't interested."

Bael nodded. "That's a shame."

"Several of the Dukes from the Hell of Lust seemed interested." Abby said. "But um... they said they were going to stay with the humans."

"Typical." Bael grunted. "Those sex-pests've always gotta stick around with humans."

Abby scrolled her eyes down the list of names. There weren't many left.

"So yeah... that's it." She said eventually. "Just Laharl. She was the only one who fit Ose's qualifications. I found plenty of Grunts and a few Lords, but thanks to Glinch's pills, most demons have been split between Emperors or stronger and Lords or weaker. The Seven Hells don't have a lot of Barons left, and not too many Dukes either."

Bael fell silent for a moment. He seemed to be listening to something.

"Mmm. Ose says that'll have to do. You did the best you could. Her gadgets would work better if we could throw 'em on Barons and Dukes who focus on physical combat, but Lords and Grunts can get boosted just fine, too."

It turned out the reason Abby had gone into the Labyrinth was because Ose was finally planning to equip her technological upgrades on other demons. She needed demons willing to experiment with this technology, but unfortunately, the number of demons these days who were most compatible with her equipment was painfully small.

In Ose's ideal world, her armor suits and weapons would augment the strengths of Demon Barons and Dukes better than any other class of demons. Demon Emperors were already strong enough that the equipment would provide a negligible boost, while Grunts and Lords were a little too weak, unable to use the armor to its fullest extent.

Of course, anyone at or below the Baron level would get a tremendous boost to their combat capabilities, but Barons were the target audience since their strength could be directly raised to levels comparable to Demon Emperors. Lords would only become as strong as Dukes, and Grunts might barely reach the level of Barons.

For Demon Dukes, they would also be raised to the level of Emperors, but Emperors didn't have a lot of headroom for their own increase. Thus, the new technology would be wasted on them.

Unfortunately, due to Glinch's pills, countless Demon Barons and Dukes had been uplifted to the level of Emperor, and many Emperors had been raised to Deity by Diablo before his unfortunate death. This would normally be great news, but for Ose, it couldn't have come at a worse time.

No doubt, she was silently cursing her luck inside Bael's belt, but if she was, Abby couldn't hear it.

"I'm sorry." Abby said sullenly. "There's still plenty of strong Lords out there..."

Bael didn't even bother speaking Ose's next words. He just smiled and squeezed Abby's shoulder reassuringly. "Seriously, it ain't your fault, sister. We'll do fine with Lords 'n Grunts."

After a minute, Bael scratched his head. He looked off to the side.

"Huh. Really?" Bael asked.

Abby looked at him. It was obvious he was talking to Ose.

"What did she say?" Abby asked, looking wistfully at the belt that contained Ose's soul shard.

Bael looked back at Abby. "Uh, I don't really get it. Ose said she sensed a thing from you earlier. Wanted to test it out."

"A thing?" Abby repeated.

"Ye." Bael said, giving her a goofy thumbs up. "A soul thing. A soul... redderbence. Uh. Rememberance. Soul roadkill. No? That ain't it either? Well for cryin' out loud, don't use such a big word then!"

Bael suddenly started shouting at the air angrily.

"Lady, it's YOUR stupid word! Not my fault you can't say it right."

"Now now, don't you go pointing fingers at me, missy!"

"Fine, I'll try again! Soul... redshift!"

"Seriously?! Lucifer's tits, why can't you just use an easier word then? No I don't give a shit if she's your mom, she had a nice rack! I missed lookin' at them triple-titties!"

Abby stared, her jaw slightly ajar, as Bael launched into a one-sided argument with Ose, an argument Abby wished she could fully hear. It was off-putting hearing him shout at the air.

"Um.. Bael..." Abby said quietly. "Did you mean to say... Soul Resonance?"

Bael spun to look at Abby. "Exactly! Soul Retarding! You got it, sister!"

Abby ignored his mispronunciation. "So, Ose said she sensed a resonance earlier?"

"Mhm. Yeah." Bael said, giving her another thumbs up. "She said she wanted to run a test with you."

"Okay! Let's try it, then!" Abby said with a smile.

It wasn't the first time they had done this. In fact, weeks before, Abby had pestered Ose constantly, hoping they would be able to find a soul resonance so that Abby would be able to talk to Ose. Unfortunately, she had failed over and over again. Eventually, Abby gave up, feeling sad and disappointed in herself.

But now, Ose's words gave her a renewed hope! Abby practically dragged Bael along to a certain test chamber in the Garden of Eden, where ADAM met up with them shortly after.

"Another resonance test?" Adam queried.

"Yeah!" Abby exclaimed. "This time, Ose said she sensed something!"

ADAM glanced at Bael who nodded in response. "That's all she told me, Add-Dumb."

The Protectorate acknowledged their command without speaking any words. ADAM gestured to Abby, and Bael unbuckled Mjolnir's belt from his body. He passed it over to Abby, who quickly put it on, then walked over to a cylindrical glass tube placed on top of a machine of some sort. The tube lifted up, Abby walked underneath it, and it closed down on top of her, sealing her inside.

"Please, please, please..." Abby whispered, closing her eyes and crossing her fingers as a look of hope mixed with fear played upon her face. "Don't tease me. Let this be the one..."

A glowing blood-red demonic rune activated underneath Abby's feet. Soon, a tingling sensation began to activate within her body. She shivered, not from the cold, but from her nerves, as her toes and fingers started to hurt a little. Waves of electrical energy surged through her body over the next five minutes, making her feel as if her body had gone numb, and now she was standing on pins and needles.

Abby gritted her teeth even harder. She rubbed her arms and winced as the pain grew more intense than before. It was far from unbearable, but it wasn't pleasant, either.

Eventually, the feeling died down, and ADAM turned off the device. The robot's expressionless head turned to look at her.

"I have detected a resonance." ADAM said without any fanfare. "Previously, your Synchronization range fell between 0.35% and 1.11%; within the margin of error. Now, however, your Synchronization has risen to a range between 10.91% and 17.31%. This range is far higher than before, and it appears to be growing."

Abby looked at him, slightly dumbstruck, not quite able to comprehend the robot's words.

"So, that means..."

"I have adjusted Master Ose's soul frequency window. You should be able to communicate with her now." ADAM said.

For a brief moment, Abby's heart nearly stopped. She felt a wave of disbelief sweep over her as she looked down at the belt.

"Os... Ose? Is that true? Can we speak to one another now?"

For a moment, nothing happened. But then, a faint phantasm appeared inside Abby's field of view. She instantly knew the person she was seeing was Ose, but Ose's physical features were extremely faint and difficult to make out.

[I believe so.] Ose said, her voice not exactly crisp and clear, but certainly audible. It sounded somewhat muffled, as if she were speaking through a tube made of cardboard, but to Abby, it was the most glorious sound she had heard in a long time. [Can you hear me, Abby?]

"Hear you... hear you..." Abby said, her mind in a daze. "Y-yes. YES! I can- I can HEAR YOU, Ose!! EEEEEEEE!!! Ohmygosh it's you! It's really you! Ohmygosh ohmygosh!!!"

Abby started babbling excitedly. Ose's expression turned to a grimace, but she could only sigh and massage her eyelids tiredly. [Well. At least it's better than being stuck talking to that other idiot.]

"Ose! Ohmygosh I can't believe it! You're back! I had my doubts sometimes but now I can see it's really you!!" Abby cheered, her spirits rising to the heavens. "We're gonna have so much fun now! We're gonna play games, and have girls nights out, and-"

[Abby!] Ose shouted, snapping Abby out of her babble-streak. [Focus. Calm down. It's nice to talk to you, too. Okay? But let us descend from the clouds to the real world.]

Abby snapped her mouth closed. She nodded up and down in big, broad movements, beaming the happiest smile of her life. She simply couldn't stop grinning now that she had the chance to talk to her idol, the woman she loved, once again.

With Abby finally shutting up, Ose managed to slow down the tempo of the conversation. She took a minute to collect herself, then pressed her palms together, resting her fingertips against her nose. Her expression became contemplative.

[Bael is an idiot. I've been trapped in his mind, unable to change the world because he doesn't know how to follow basic commands. But you're smart enough that you can understand technology at a basic level and properly relay my words to ADAM and the others. Isn't that right?]

Abby nodded. "I can do that!"

[Good. But there's another reason to be excited. Bael's soul is too powerful. I have no way of getting back into my old body. But you are only a Baron. I can get out of this belt and share a mental space with you, and together we can swap control of your body once in a while. By doing this, I can directly affect the real world and start my work back up once more!]

Abby's eyes widened. "Is that... possible? I can have you in my head?"

[I'll need to increase the resonance further, but yes. It's definitely doable. I long ago made preparations to revive in the event of my body's death. Unfortunately, I did not anticipate Bael's soul being so powerful. But in essence, transferring my soul into your body so we can share a space isn't difficult now. We've already gotten past the hardest part.]

Ose elaborated further, hitting Abby with a barrage of technical information. Abby was a lot smarter than Bael, but that wasn't saying much. She wasn't a technomancer, and that meant many of Ose's theories flew over her head.

"Whatever." Abby said eventually. "I trust you, Ose. If you think it will work, then let's do it! You can control my body any time you want! I'm happy to share it with you! Really!"

[If you're truly okay with it, then we can initiate the transfer right here.] Ose said. [This unit is a multi-purpose Soul Resonance Alteration Device. I designed the SRAD to help me find a new host in the event of my death, and transfer my soul into it. Unfortunately, I ended up stuck with Bael for longer than intended. But... that's in the past now.]

At Ose's recommendation, Abby asked ADAM to initiate the transference. Unfortunately, the resonance rating was a little too low, so ADAM had to first alter Abby's body using the SRAD's genetic configuration settings.

Pulses of electricity surged through Abby's body, making her wince in pain. This time, the pain was much more acute. Reconfiguring her biology wasn't possible before, as she and Ose had zero compatibility, but now that ADAM could use the limited resonance frequencies to find a 'target lock' on certain genetic markers, the transition become much more doable.

Abby whimpered quietly. She fell to her knees and hugged her arms against her chest, sweating profusely as she rested her head against the inside of the SRAD's glass tube.

All the while, Bael watched, a frown stuck to his face.

"Hey, Add-Dumb." Bael grunted, shuffling closer to the robot. "This zappy thing looks like it hurts. Is it safe?"

ADAM responded in the affirmative. "A certain amount of discomfort and pain is to be expected. I need to reconfigure Abby's genetic markers to ensure proper sequencing for Ose's soul transference."

Bael nodded. "Mmm, I see. Got it."

Bael leaned away from ADAM, nodding solemnly to himself. He had absolutely no idea what the Protectorate had said, but he wisely knew not to say too much, otherwise people might think he was an idiot or something.

Minutes passed. Soon, a full hour had come and gone. Abby was exhausted. The pain never seemed to end. She wavered in and out of consciousness, and had eventually slumped against the inside of the glass. The pain was severe, though nowhere near her limits. Her biggest issue was that it was a constant pain that changed all the time, affecting different parts of her body. Her DNA was being overwritten, which had no affect on her appearance, but did have all sorts of implications regarding her internal biology.

Soon, ADAM completed its work. The Protectorate dialed the system to a stop, and Abby nearly fainted from joy that the pain was finally over. She breathed heavily, her exhales coming in the form of ragged gasps.

"It's... ohh... it's done?" Abby wheezed.

ADAM bobbed its head. "The genetic transformation is complete. According to my readings, your soul resonance has risen to a range between 77.89% and 97.44%. While imperfect, this level is within the acceptable range for a soul transference."

Abby's eyes lolled to the left. Kneeling on one leg beside her, she saw Ose's face for the first time. Not a vague apparition, but a genuine, physical-looking spirit-body of Ose where she could make out all the details of her favorite outfit, all the curves and lines of her face, and her yellow and red eyes.

[Abby.] Ose said, reaching out to touch Abby's face. Her hand failed to make contact. [Are you alright? I'm sorry you had to suffer for me.]

Ose's voice was warm and kind. It was unlike her usual self. But Abby could tell she was genuinely concerned for her friend's well-being.

The Baron of Happy Thoughts shuddered. She forced herself to turn around and sit on her butt with her back against the glass.

"I'm... I'm fine, Ose. Just a little bit tired. That's all."

Abby wanted to cry all over again. She was so happy to see Ose's face, she could barely contain her emotions. At the same time, she was exhausted, and even just crying would take too much out of her.

"Let's stop here." Ose said, her voice soft. "You've endured well. We can finish tomorrow."

Abby's breath caught in her throat. "What? No. No, we've waited long enough. Let's just... get it done now, Ose. Transfer into my mind. Then I can rest afterward."

Ose hesitated. "That would be... a little dangerous. You need time to rest."

Abby grunted. She raised her right hand and shook the feeling of numbness out of it. Then, through sheer force of will, she scooted backward, carefully standing up by leaning her entire body against the glass. Her legs were wobbly like Jello. Her consciousness wavered in and out, but eventually, she recovered thanks to her demonic physiology.

"I'm fine." Abby said, surprising both Ose and herself with the force behind her words. "How long will the transfer take?"

Ose paused. "Not long. A minute or less."

"That's it? Great. Great!" Abby said, the excitement of what was about to happen powering her psyche up even further. Her posture straightened further, and her footing became more steady. She grinned, then cracked her neck. "I'm ready! ADAM! Do it! Merge me and Ose together!"

"A short rest first would be advisable." ADAM said.

"I don't need rest. I'm fine, now!" Abby protested. "I'm tougher than I look. Just do it."

The Protectorate gave her a long, hard stare. Eventually, it nodded, then began to press some buttons.

"Very well. Beginning Soul Transference now."

Another round of tingling began to crackle inside Abby's body. This time, it was a lot gentler than before. She braced herself for pain, but the process felt more energizing than anything else.

Ten seconds passed. Twenty seconds. Thirty...

Abby looked around, slightly nervous, but the pain didn't seem to be intensifying.

"Is this actually doing anything?" Abby muttered. "I don't feel any diff-"

Suddenly, a massive rush of energy surged from Abby's waist, through her belly, and rushed up into her head. It was as if she had fallen face-first into a freezing cold lake. Abby's mind immediately blanked out. She fell forward and collapsed onto the ground, unconscious.

"Huh?!" Bael gasped. "Whoa, whoa! What just happened?! Abby! Hey Abby, you okay?? Add-Dumb, is she okay?!"

The robot looked at Bael. "Soul Transference complete. All vitals stable. It was only a minor shock to Abby's system. Her life signs are within acceptable levels."

Abby's eyes fluttered open. Her head swam with dizziness. She wavered in and out of consciousness. Ahead of her, she could see Ose laying on the ground, her spiritual body also unconscious. At the same time as Abby started to wake up, so did Ose. The two of them met each other's gazes.

Abby was immediately starstruck. Ose now looked as clear as could be. She appeared ghostly, with a bit of a glowing aura to her figure, but she was so lifelike that Abby swore she could reach out and touch Ose's hand.

She tried, but failed. Her hand passed through Ose's hand without even the slightest sensation following.

"It... worked..." Abby said, smiling dreamily.

But Ose did not smile back. Her eyes fluttered open and shut.

[I'm... I'm sorry, Abby. I was... I was wrong.] Ose said, her voice hoarse.

"Didn't work?" Abby asked, her voice slurring. "What... didn't work?"

[My soul... it was too weak.] Ose said. [I overestimated myself. I'm sorry. I thought we could... be together. But I was wrong.]

Ose closed her eyes. Abby's heart jumped. She struggled to sit up, but she had no strength left in her body.

"O-Ose? Ose?? What's... ohh... what's wrong? What happened?"

Ose groaned. Her voice was fainter than before.

[Your soul. It's... devouring mine.] Ose mumbled. Her words were slurred. She was having difficulty speaking. [I can feel my... consciousness... wavering. I don't have long now.]

Ose smiled weakly.

[I'm sorry, Abby. I wasn't a good friend... to you. I used you. Now I'm paying the price. I wish... I wish I had been... kinder to you. This is going... to be... the last time we talk.]

Tears welled up in Abby's eyes. She reached out to touch Ose's hand again, but both their palms passed through one another.

"No... Ose..." Abby croaked. "There... has to be something. My soul... too strong? Maybe... I can weaken it?"

[You've done enough.] Ose said, her eyes now tightly closed. [The only way... if your soul was... depleted. But no. Don't. Don't do it. Not for me. I'm not worth it.]

Abby felt a flash of inspiration.

"You said... my soul... it's in the way, right? So if I... drain my soul away? You can live? You can take over my body?"

Ose didn't answer. Her spirit-body was slowly becoming more and more transparent. This caused Abby's heart to jump in alarm. She realized time was running out.

"Ose... Ose!! No, you can't die! Not again! Not again!"

Abby hesitated. She realized in this moment, she still had a chance to save Ose. But doing so would, undoubtedly, force her to pay the ultimate price.

Her hesitation barely lasted a single second. She scowled angrily as she hardened her heart.

"I won't let you die, Ose. I won't. It's fine if I die. I'm nobody special anyway. I just wish... I could have spent more time with you."

Abby stretched her arm out. She tried uselessly to touch Ose's cheek, but as before, she failed once again.

A tear slid down Abby's face.

"Ose... I love you. I love you so much..."

Abby closed her eyes. She focused on the sensation of her soul, where she sensed Ose's soul fragment, minute by comparison, floating not far away from it.

Abby gritted her teeth and scrunched her forehead muscles. With great pain, she began sending her soul energy into Ose's soul fragment. The effects were immediate and unmistakable.

Abby's sense of self began to diminish. She opened her eyes a fraction, watching as Ose's soul form became slightly more corporeal.

But at the same time, Abby's vision began to waver. The more soul energy she transferred, the weaker her grasp on reality became.

It was now, in these final moments, as death approached, that Abby's mind became remarkably clear.

She remembered her life. She remembered the first time she spoke to Ose. She remembered how they met, and the way she fell in love with Ose the moment she laid eyes on her.

It started out as a childish infatuation. But it continued for 100,000 years. It was a painful, one-sided love.

All along, she knew Ose never loved her, and probably never would.

But it didn't matter. Ose had said such kind words to her only moments earlier. Even if those words were sweet lies, they were the only thing Abby had ever wanted to hear.

Sometimes, sweet lies were far superior to painful truths.

Abby closed her eyes, one last time.

She remembered what Gressil had told her, just a few hours earlier.

So that's what he meant. Abby thought silently to herself. He knew what was coming. Oh, Gressil... thank you... for being there for me.

I'm glad we got to talk...

One... last...

Abby's consciousness faded away. Eventually, it disappeared entirely.

A long minute passed.

Abby's eyes eventually opened. She stood up, no longer pained in any way. Abby looked around the room and cracked her back, seemingly unharmed by all the events that had just transpired.

"Finally. She really made me drag it out." Abby said, her tone much more pointed than before. "ADAM, code Four-One-One-Seven-Six-Niner-Zeta-Alpha-March."

ADAM nodded. "Welcome back, Master Ose. It appears the Soul Transference was a success."

The glass tube lifted, revealing the new owner of Abby's body.

Ose, the former Demon Emperor of Infiltration, had returned to the world of the living.

"Get me some proper clothes." Ose commanded. "I'll not be caught dead walking around in this awful getup."

"Yes, Master Ose." ADAM replied.

Bael stared at Ose with a distant, haunted look.

"Hey... hey... what's going on? Where's Abby?"

Ose snorted. "Abby? Unfortunately, it seems she pushed herself too hard and passed away. Now I own her body."

"WHAT?!" Bael exclaimed, looking at Ose in horror. "No way! Not sweet little Abby! Ose, what the hell did you do?!"

The New Abby dramatically rolled her eyes. "Oh, don't get your panties in a twist, body-thief. Abby did all this willingly. I barely even had to manipulate her. She practically threw her life away at the drop of a hat for my sake. It's better this way. Sharing would have been such a pain, especially with her constantly yammering at me."

Bael's pupils twitched. He found himself rooted in place, horrified and unable to move, as Ose casually strolled out of the Soul Transference facility.

Ose had returned. And only one other person in the entire galaxy knew this unprecedented event had transpired.

Part 736: Two-Faced

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. The Garden of Eden.

Ose was in a good mood. An exceptional mood, even. She had a spring in her step and couldn't stop snapping her fingers in rhythm to some unknown tune in her head. After she left the Soul Transference room, she couldn't help but skip along giddily to her next destination with a silly grin on her face.

"Hee-hee, eyes to see with, hands to grasp the world around me, and feet capable of touching the ground. What's not to love about having a body? Even if it's a little weak, I'll be back to my peak condition in no time."

Ose momentarily thought that her attitude seemed a little too sunshine-and-rainbows compared to how she usually acted, but then again, who could blame her for being so happy? Only a day earlier she had thought she would be trapped listening to Bael run his mouth for the rest of eternity, but now she had regained life, along with a decently attractive female body instead of a disgusting, overweight male one.

Naturally, possessing Bael's body back in the day had amazing upsides. She obtained access to all of her original powers, plus Bael's nearly invincible physique, which made her obscenely powerful. But even so, a woman as proud of her finely maintained appearance as Ose was could never be happy if she was trapped in the body of a slovenly fat bastard like Bael. Had she continued to exist in it without dying, she undoubtedly would have started a rigorous weight loss and training regimen to slim down. Within a year or two, she would have become unrecognizable!

But that was all in the past. She possessed Abby's body now, which was not as amazing as her original body, but it was a fine alternative. Maybe someday Ose would be able to figure out how to trade souls with Bael to reacquire her original self. She would definitely laugh at his misfortune if he ended up being the one stuck in Abby's body instead of her. It would serve him right.

Ose paused her skipping. She waved her hand, then frowned. Her happy mood deflated visibly.

"Hmm. Come on, why isn't it working?" Ose muttered.

She tapped into her magical core, her inner power, and tried to conjure lightning, electricity, even a single spark of energy. But after making all sorts of motions with her hands and concentrating her mind for a full minute, she failed to produce any results.

Ose's mood turned ugly.

"...I see. It seems I truly have been crippled." Ose said, her expression dismal. "I cannot produce any electricity. I may have completely lost all of my original powers!"

A thought sprang to Ose's mind. She changed her course and trotted over to an out-of-the-way part of the Garden of Eden. It was an isolated area where 'prisoners' were held, though these prisoners didn't actually know they had been imprisoned.

Only Ose knew the true location of the Garden of Eden. Not even the robots inside the facility knew. She had taken every precaution to keep its location a secret. Abby might not have been the brightest, but she understood the Garden of Eden was buried deep beneath the surface of an unknown planet somewhere in the Milky Way. What neither she nor Bael knew was that this underground facility was far, far bigger than it seemed, and they already thought it was massive.

Ose stepped inside a special region known as Inner Zone 2. There were three of these zones, and each of them formed artificial terrariums where clueless monsters had been carefully relocated, their memories wiped, the creatures completely oblivious to the fact they were now living in an isolated world very different from where they had been born and raised.

Inner Zone 2 was designated the Goblin Terrarium. Here, obviously, Goblins lived and thrived, with an entire ecosystem of food ready for them to consume, dirt for them to dig, and burrows for them to sleep and live in. Goblins typically lived underground, digging burrows beneath the soil to raise their families, but they were perfectly capable of constructing homes and other abodes on the surface as well. Different tribes had different customs.

Ose stood atop a catwalk high in the sky, one that was cleverly hidden from view so that the Goblins a mile below wouldn't be able to see her. With her keen demonic vision, Ose was able to peer down and make out the individual hairs on each Goblin's head.

She watched as a small group of goblins carried around a stretcher made of bone and animal-skins. On this stretcher there was a dead animal's carcass, likely the feast they had just hunted and would soon bring home for their village to consume.

Ose, naturally, did not care about these Goblins in the slightest. She came here for one specific reason.

"I'm quite fortunate." Ose mused. "Abby didn't just eradicate her soul, she fed my soul sliver with hers, so I now possess the power of a Baron. It thus follows that if I don't have access to my powers anymore, I must possess hers!"

Ose knew plenty about Abby's abilities. They didn't seem too potent, but essentially Abby could influence the thoughts and emotions of other beings, feed them illusions, and deceive their minds. Personally, Ose thought Abby had always drastically undervalued her abilities and utilized them poorly. If those were Ose's new powers, then she was sure to make better use of them.

Ose stretched out her hands. She aimed at the group of Goblins below, and tapped into her magical core, frowning as she began to concentrate.

She concentrated...

And concentrated...

Then she concentrated some more...

Sweat built up on Ose's forehead. Invisible question marks popped up above her head.

"Strange. Very strange. Why can't I influence them? Am I misunderstanding how Abby's abilities work? No, I wouldn't make such an elementary mistake..."

For once in her life, Ose was truly baffled. She couldn't activate her abilities, and she couldn't activate Abby's. For thirty long minutes, she panted and groaned, made all sorts of weird movements with her hands, and even tapped into her inner self over and over. The most she succeeded in doing was stressing herself out and becoming fatigued... all while accomplishing none of her goals!

Eventually, she gave up.

Ose glowered at the Goblins down below before turning and storming out of the terrarium.

"Could it be? Have I become utterly powerless?" Ose wondered. "I'm still a Baron. I can sense magical energy within myself. But why can't I tap into it? Have my powers fused with Abby's? Have they rejected one another and now I need to do something else to activate them?"

The former Emperor of Infiltration pondered a great many possibilities. She thought of this and that, her mind wandering as she guessed randomly and not-so-randomly at times.

"Even if I have no powers, at least I'm alive. I'm still a genius among my peers, and not even a lack of powers will change that. But it is rather disappointing to think I've become somewhat ordinary."

Ose returned back to her original destination. She entered a secret room that Bael and Abby had never visited, one that was hidden behind a retractable wall somewhere on the northern end of the Garden of Eden's 59th level. Considering how massive the Garden of Eden was, and the fact that Abby and Bael weren't exactly the most inquisitive people, with Bael being more lazy than anything else, they had not explored even five percent of the Garden's interior.

Thus, not only did they not know about this location, but they did not know of all Ose's other hidden places, either. Ose had prepared this secret base over 100,000 years. Everything in the Garden of Eden served a purpose...

The wall slid open. A new room revealed itself, one that had a horde of monitors arranged in a giant circle, all of them attached to the walls, and a central control console to interface with these monitors. The room was not too dissimilar to Jason's Spynet Sphere in appearance or purpose...

Ose stepped inside, where ADAM was already waiting for her.

"Master Ose." ADAM said, the robot's tone as emotionless as ever. "I have brought the item."

ADAM held up its palm, and in its grasp, there was a black orb made of demonstone. Ose's eyebrows raised slightly, and a smile played upon her face.

"Hehe, ruling the First Hell for a while certainly had its perks." Ose chuckled to herself. "It's a good thing I always come prepared..."

She walked over and took the small demonstone orb out of ADAM's grasp. Ose held it for a moment and sighed nostalgically. Then she pressed her palm on the top of the orb and carefully rotated the top clockwise, and the bottom counter-clockwise.

Without much effort, the orb slowly opened up. Ose popped the top off to reveal that inside the orb, there were four black beads of different sizes. One was extremely small, tinier than a marble. Another was a bit bigger. A third one was even bigger than that, and the fourth was quite large, easily three times the size of an average demon's eyeball.

These were Soul Orbs. Each one contained a certain number of souls within them. They were part of Ose's long term revival plan in the event she died. She had pilfered them from Mephisto through a series of cleverly engineered distractions several years earlier, well before Operation Stormbringer.

"Hahaha..." Ose chuckled to herself. "Looks like I won't be needing the first two. Thanks to Abby, I already possess the power of a Baron. I might even be able to pick a useful Grunt and uplift them to Baron if they serve my purposes well. But for now, there's no reason to hesitate. I can become an Emperor again!"

Ose immediately took the third soul orb and popped it in her mouth. It was quite large, and she could only swallow it with great difficulty. The process of it rolling down her throat into her belly was anything but pleasant, but she still relented. If she still possessed her original electrical abilities, she could have easily deadened her gag reflex or turned off her pain centers to make the swallowing process easier, but now she could only grimace and forcibly bear the pain.

BOOM!!!

Ose's aura erupted with majesty! In a single instant, she burst with power and leaped across the chasm separating Barons and Dukes, becoming a powerhouse once again!

Ose had to take a minute to steady herself. Once she was completely sure she was ready, she picked up the biggest soul orb and stared at it with a hint of worry.

"Imagine... imagine if the great Ose died here, all alone, choking to death on a damned Soul Orb. I'd rather the whole facility burned to ash, along with me, so nobody would ever hear such a shameful tale!"

Her pride was part of her bones. Ose couldn't bear the thought of being humiliated, so she forced herself to shove the absolutely massive Soul Orb into her mouth, gagging and choking as she slowly, painfully, and carefully forced it down her throat.

Ose's eyes watered. Snot spewed from her nose. For ten long seconds, her face turned blue. She really thought this might be the end of her story!

But, by massaging her throat and carefully pinching certain areas, she painfully forced the Soul Orb down, down, down into the depths of her gullet. Once it reached a certain point, the orb rolled the rest of the way smoothly and entered her stomach. Ose coughed and gagged, tears pouring from her eyes as she pounded her chest. If any other demon were to walk in and see her, she might die of shame right then and there!

At once, her aura blasted into the heavens once again. Ose stood up and roared at the sky as she felt her body firmly tear down the barrier of Demon Emperor, all thanks to the power of a million condensed human souls.

She had done it!

She had not only returned to the living, but had become an Emperor again!

From this point on, Ose knew she would be able to continue writing the epic tale of her life! The universe's mysteries awaited her!

Ose almost wanted to cry tears of happiness! She wasn't the dumb blubbering baby type, but even so, her raw emotions were difficult to suppress. Strangely, she thought these were the sorts of emotions only Abby would possess, but given the circumstances, it was only fair Ose would be so overwhelmed with emotions. It wasn't as if it was impossible for her to let out a good cry or anything, she simply had never done it in her entire life.

Ose slumped to the floor. She breathed heavily, then chuckled darkly under her breath.

"An Emperor again. Hehehe... the universe is being too kind to me, truly. my fortune is rising all the time. I don't even have any damned Wordsmiths to get in my way anymore. They were the only ones who could oppose me."

Ose's eyes flashed with an ominous, bloody light. She swept her hair back with her hands, then shakily stood up with ADAM's assistance.

"Put the other two Soul Orbs back, and only come back after an hour or so." Ose ordered. "I need time to think."

"Yes, Master Ose." ADAM said obediently. The robot took the demonstone orb away, sealing it up as the machine left.

The room fell silent. Ose walked over to the central control matrix, then stretched out her hands.

Several long seconds passed.

Ose frowned. She tried to activate the controls with her electrokinesis, as she had a million times before, but nothing happened.

"Still?" Ose muttered. "I thought maybe becoming an Emperor would return my powers. Don't tell me I've truly become powerless! That would be a laughable tragedy to say the least. A complete waste of my talents!"

Once again, she tried tapping into Abby's abilities. But this, too, proved a flop.

Ose gnashed her teeth.

"I have magic! I have powers! I sense them! Why can't I activate them? What the hell are my abilities? Don't tell me I have some new power I don't know about?"

When demons evolved from Imps to Grunts, their 'nature' became known. The title of 'Grunt' typically revealed the initial form of what powers a demon would later wield. Upon becoming a Lord, every demon would know for sure what their unique abilities entailed. Some were like Yardrat, who started as a Warper and rapidly became an Emperor and a Deity who could manipulate the most mind-blowing long-range portals ever, along with space itself.

Beelzebub had started off life as a Burner, which obviously foretold his future evolution into a master of flames.

But, at the same time, not all demonic evolutions made sense. Abby was a succubus, but also an Oracle. Then when she became a Lord and a Baron, she learned she could manipulate emotions... this seemed to be a mixture of her succubus physiology and her Oracle powers.

And what about demons like Orias? He was a unique sort of demon who could use gems and other rare rocks to empower his body and gain new abilities temporarily. But unlike many demons, he had skipped straight from Imp to Baron due to the effect of the ancient dragon, Leviathan. Similar things were true for Satan, Belial, and other members of the ancient demons who had been directly elevated by Leviathan.

Even then, there were strange cases. Ose herself had been born an imp, then evolved into a 'demon child'. She had no powers, and just looked like a little girl. Demons like her were quite rare, but not unheard of. Beelzebub's former servant, Rosalia, was also a 'normal' demon, even as a Grunt.

Now, as Ose pondered the strangeness of her powers, she became more and more perplexed.

She and Abby had very different evolutionary trajectories. Ose felt that her powers now must be a fusion of the two, or a side-branch, but no matter what she tried, she couldn't come up with anything to explain her situation.

"Even if I have no powers, I still have the strength and physique of an Emperor." Ose said to herself. "I can still fight human war machines with my body alone. I'm still a faster thinker than when I was a Baron. I barely need any sleep, don't need food or water, and I'm immortal. It's not like my becoming an Emperor was a total waste!"

But these words merely served to soothe her ego. In truth, she was quite pissed. It felt unconscionable that she, the legendary Ose, was powerless now. It felt like the universe had slapped her across the face. She had always been a genius among her peers. Falling down to the level of an 'ordinary' Emperor ruffled the feathers of her ego.

Ose paced back and forth for a while. She tried all sorts of things, but time after time, she failed to uncover any new abilities.

Steam metaphorically spewed from Ose's ears. She squeezed her eyes shut and gritted her teeth. She widened her stance and flexed her arms, balling her hands into fists and she concentrated all her thoughts.

Come on! There must be something! There must be!! Ose thought.

Ose pressed her fingertips against the side of her head. She thought, she thought, and she thought some more. Her face turned even redder than its normal hue as she started to shake with desperation.

I... I can feel something! Ose grunted. It's almost like-

At that moment, the door to her Observation Chamber opened and ADAM strolled inside. "Master Ose. I have returned-" ADAM said, only to pause mid-sentence. "...Master Ose?"

Ose groaned. She opened her eyes to look at ADAM, but when she did, she suddenly felt extremely dizzy. Furthermore, it felt as if she were seeing double! There appeared to be two ADAMs staring back at her.

"What is it?!" Ose snapped. "Why are you bothering me? Huh?"

Ose jumped slightly. When she spoke, it sounded as if she heard herself speaking beside herself, on the right and on the left, but only out of one ear at a time. It was an extremely confusing, and disorienting, sensation.

Ose turned to her left.

"Huh?"

It was the strangest thing. Ose saw Abby in front of her, but only the back of her body. Except it wasn't Abby, it was Ose!

Ose was looking at Ose!

But, at the same time, Ose could also see the wall directly in front of herself as if she were looking past 'herself'.

"Huh??" Ose asked again, her tone more bewildered than before.

Ose turned to look to her right. When she did, she saw 'herself' turning around, and now she was looking at the back of her head again, as well as the center of the Observation Chamber.

Ose staggered slightly. She felt dizzy and confused. Her eyes blinked several times.

"What... what's going on with me?" Ose muttered. "Why am I seeing two... why am I hearing two of me?"

"Master Ose." ADAM said. "There are... currently two versions of you in this room."

"WHAT?!" Ose exclaimed, turning to look at ADAM once again. This time, she carefully focused her mind. She turned to look at 'herself', but the 'other her' also turned to look at 'herself'. They both made eye contact, and Ose's delirium worsened by another level. If felt as if she were looking into a mirror, one which distorted reality and broke her mind.

It was extremely confusing, disorienting, and it made no sense.

Yet she did it!

"You're me?" Ose asked, as both of her 'selves' spoke simultaneously. "You're a clone? No. You're me. I'm me? What's going on?"

A brief instant passed. Then, an idea came to Ose's mind. She carefully turned to the control system, then activated it using manual controls. There were cameras inside the chamber, so Ose rewound one of the monitors to show the scene of just a few minutes before.

Before her, a miracle happened. While Ose was concentrating, a second version of herself slowly 'slid' out of her body and appeared behind her. Both of the two Oses were holding the same pose. Both of them then proceeded to mirror each other once ADAM entered the chamber.

For a brief moment, Ose felt slightly lost.

"Cloning...? I can clone myself?" She mused. "But it's so disorienting. I can see through both of my eyes at once. When I think, we share the exact same thoughts. It's like looking right and left at the same time. It feels... impossible."

Several minutes passed. Ose slowly began to experiment. It felt as if she were looking through a kaleidoscope, the way the world bent and shifted when each of her bodies moved. But slowly, as the minutes passed, she rapidly grew more and more proficient with controlling each of her two selves.

"This is... unexpected." Ose mumbled. "But far from bad. I would rather still possess my original abilities, but is this ability not intriguing in and of itself? It's certainly better than nothing!"

After a bit of work, Ose started controlling both bodies independently. One of them started doing squats while the other did jumping jacks. One of them read a book while the other one started reciting the digits of Pi.

"Amazing. Amazing!" Ose exclaimed. "I see. How interesting! I can control the flow of 'data' between us. I can choose how much to pilot and control each of the bodies versus letting them move and think autonomously. I can share our senses equally or focus more on one over the other. There's more nuance to this ability than I expected. I think I've barely begun to scratch the surface!"

Soon, the two Oses faced one another. They started sending slow punches and kicks at one another, then their fighting sped up.

Faster and faster, they started moving and thinking independently, all while still sharing brainwaves. A flurry of kicks and punches started striking one another as the clone tried to overpower the original body, except Ose no longer knew which was the original and which was the clone.

She didn't care, either!

This was a completely different situation from Jason and Hope Hiro. Unlike the foolish Wordsmith, whose other self was an independent entity, Ose had full control of both her selves. Even if she chose to split her perception directly in half, she could regain control instantly!

"Amazing. Truly incredible!" Ose praised after her fight session. "Even if someone tries to kill me again, I hypothesize they would need to kill both my bodies. It's like I've gained an additional life. And even more amazingly, neither of these two bodies is any weaker than when we were one. We're both Emperors, through and through!"

Soon, her thoughts dipped downward. Ose calmed herself and began to look at the big picture.

"If I can make two of me..."

"Then..."

"Could I create... more?"

An evil smile slowly stretched across her face...

Part 737: The Great Era

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. The world of Sharmur.

A tense atmosphere had descended upon humanity, especially the sixty percent of whom were currently located on the world of Sharmur. After Beelzebub's detonation, losses to the demons, the destruction of Tarus II, Kolvaxians, and other mass-casualty events, humanity had only about three million people left. And today was a moment that would drastically change their species' future trajectory.

That was because Camael's Cube had arrived inside the Sharmur System!

At long last, it had completed its journey. This was good news, because the reason the Cube had come here was to swallow all the worlds inside the system, as well as Sharmur's star, then place them inside the Cube for safekeeping. The Cube wasn't merely a massive secret dimension capable of traversing the cosmos in secret; it was also isolated from realspace, and virtually guaranteed whatever method the Kolvaxians used to arrive on planets would not work once a world had been moved into the Cube.

Even so, there was a risk.

What if there was secretly a single Kolvaxian, or even multiple of them, hiding beneath the surface of a planet? What if they deliberately concealed themselves? Could Uzziel use those hidden Kolvaxians to triangulate the Cube's inter-dimensional position and come up with a way to get inside?

Nobody knew. Not Melody, not the Phoenix herself, and certainly not the humans.

It was a big risk taking Sharmur into the Cube. The Phoenix was 100% certain that no Kolvaxians were presently inside the Cube, since all the worlds inside the Cube were fake worlds manufactured by the Wordsmith. However, these worlds were extremely flawed. While they could last indefinitely, the amount of raw matter present on the inner worlds was microscopic compared to a single planet the size of Earth, or the size of Sharmur.

To use a simple comparison, If Earth was a size scale of 1.0, and its moon, Luna, was a size 0.27 on that same scale, then each of these micro-worlds Jason had made for training human troopers were only 0.0002. They were truly tiny! Counted all together, they were probably the size of a country like the USA on Earth, but that was only when considering the available flatlands. They had thin 'crusts' and atmospheres that only went a fraction of the distance into the sky compared to ancient Earth.

Thus, if the Phoenix did not bring in external worlds like Sharmur, then the arable and livable land inside the Cube would reach its max carrying capacity far too quickly.

Even worse, these micro-worlds were somewhat isolated from one another. Humans could travel between the worlds using the Phoenix's power, but her magic was limited in quantity, and transportation was not cheap on energy expenditure. It would be far better to use a great deal of energy to bring in multiple external worlds, then use those worlds to breed humans en-masse in order to harness their Faith Energy to refuel the Cube.

The Phoenix's wings were metaphorically tied. If she did not bring in worlds, the humans would quickly run out of living space, and she would run out of energy. If she brought in new worlds, this problem would be solved, but she would have to risk a potential Kolvaxian catastrophe.

Ultimately, the Phoenix came to a decision. She decided she would swallow the Sharmur system, not only to gain the resources she needed, but to hopefully add a Middle Cosmic powerhouse to her Cube as well. Then, she would do the same for the Pixiv system.

But after that, she would not risk placing any further worlds inside the Cube.

It wasn't that she lacked room for these worlds. Far from it! Camael's Cube possessed tens of lightyears worth of internal space. Counting all the residents and micro-worlds inside the Cube, she was using up far less than 1% of the available space, and once she moved in the Sharmur worlds and the Pixiv worlds... she would still be using far less than 1% of the available space!

The Phoenix knew she was taking a huge risk by transporting entire star systems inside the Cube. She was 99% sure she could pull it off one time without repercussions. However, the second time, which she planned to use on Pixiv, was a lot more dangerous. This was because the disappearance of an entire star system would definitely cause a noticeable spike in Cosmic energy throughout the galaxy. Even if there were no Kolvaxians in the Sharmur system, she might cause Raphael and Uzziel to take notice of her actions.

If that happened, the two of them might realize what the Phoenix's next destination was. They could quickly hide Kolvaxians somewhere inside the Pixiv system, be it on Pixiv itself, or one of the other system worlds, and when the Phoenix swallowed that system, she would inadvertently poison the Cube's inner ecosystem.

But she was helpless regarding this matter. The Phoenix could choose to only bring Sharmur inside, which would be the safest option, but the fairy homeworld had a lot of humans too, and more importantly, the fairies possessed Formation Magic. This was extremely potent, and the Phoenix even knew a few ancient secrets about the fairies. She knew that allying with them would bring enormous future benefits to her pet humans, so long as they had time to develop.

All these considerations rumbled within the Phoenix's mind. Her wizened, aged eyes looked out from the Cube and passed through the Interdimensional Veil to peer into Realspace, where she locked gazes with her future ally.

[Demon Deity Melody.] The Phoenix said. [This ancient one is gladdened to make your acquaintance. I pray we can become good friends in the coming era.]

Melody was not on Sharmur at the moment, but had flown out into the Void. She sensed the approach of a powerful life form, but she could not pinpoint the Cube's location, only its faint emanations of energy.

[Sorry, Phoenix.] Melody apologized. [I'm a bit of a crude girl. Not as well-spoken as you. Are you going to move the system inside the Cube, one star at a time?]

The Phoenix sighed. [Such would be ideal, but it is not a good idea. Since your life force is tethered to these worlds, transporting one at a time could damage you internally, and perhaps even kill you. Instead, I shall spread out my Divine Sense throughout the whole system. Then, I will take all the worlds in at the same time, as well as yourself.]

[Need any help?] Melody asked.

The Phoenix thought for a moment. [This venerable's energy is limited. Swallowing this system will cause what reserves I still possess to plummet. If you could assist me in the transference process, I would be greatly appreciative.]

Melody frowned. [Not that I'm not willing, but... my Cosmic power's all tied up in Sharmur's star. If I use my power a shitload, won't it weaken the star?]

The Phoenix smiled. [Sharmur's star currently has 1.73 billion years left in its lifespan. If you were to fully fuel the transfer of the system yourself it would drop down to... 1.729 billion years.]

Melody blinked. [Oh. That ain't much of a dip.]

[No. It is not.] The Phoenix confirmed. [Stellar Orbs contain an incredible amount of current and future energy potential. More than many Apex Cosmics...]

After talking for a bit, the two Cosmics got to work. The Phoenix didn't dawdle any longer, as time was of the essence. She first investigated every planet in the system with her Divine Sense. Unlike Melody, who had barely been a Cosmic for a year, the Phoenix was hundreds of millions of years old, maybe even a billion or two. She was extremely learned in the ways of Cosmics, thus despite only having returned to power recently, she was just as sharp as during the ancient times.

Her powerful senses bored into each world, one by one by one. She used the heat of her eyes, the light of creation, to search for anomalous entities and life forms hiding away in each planet's crust and core.

After searching for a full hour, she found no Kolvaxians across any of the planets. Certainly, she found some odd life forms, alien fauna, most likely, but it seemed Diablo had done an excellent job when he took Sharmur back. He had completely wiped out the system's Kolvaxian infestations.

[You know,] Melody mentioned, [Diablo once told me the entire point of anchoring my presence to these stars was to create a 'spatial wall' that would prevent Kolvaxians from teleporting into the planet cores. If they even tried, I would know. At least, that's what he told me.]

The Phoenix nodded, though Melody could not see the motion. [This ancient one can sense your life force within each planet's core. This is truly an astounding innovation. For those who truly seek Cosmic Ascension, this method of uplifting oneself is quite crude and ill-advised. It is always better to Ascend through one's own comprehension, rather than through external means, such as by anchoring oneself to celestial bodies.]

She paused.

[However, this ancestor can sense a certain level of genius in the method Diablo used. It is a purely utilitarian method of ascension, one that sacrifices the individual's future for the good of a collective. There are dense Cosmic markings dotted throughout each world's interior, as well as inside the star. I fully believe that you would know if the Kolvaxians were attempting to breach a world's core.]

Melody's expression turned a bit glum. [Too bad we won't have this benefit once we move on to Pixiv. They don't have Cosmics guarding their planet cores.]

[It is somewhat unfortunate.] The Phoenix readily agreed. [But in my view, the fairies will not be so easily deceived. You know little of the fairies' true nature, but this venerable is well aware of certain Truths from the ancient times. The fairies fought a war so shocking, vicious, and brutal that it would make our current conflict seem like child's play. They lost their home galaxy to the Dark Ones, a fate we may someday face if misfortune continues to build within humanity's destiny. They may appear to you as dainty and beautiful princesses, but their eldest ones are battle-hardened warriors adept at tactical thinking on a strategic layer.]

The Phoenix continued. [All of this is to say that this noble one would be shocked beyond belief if the fairies did not erect powerful formations capable of detecting Kolvaxian intrusions on their homeworld, and likely even the other worlds in their system. This is one capability in which the fairies far exceed other Sentients.]

After outlining her thought process, the Phoenix synchronized her work with Melody's efforts. The two of them began to resonate, and Melody was surprised to see that the Phoenix was able to draw upon Melody's innate Cosmic power.

[How is this possible?] Melody asked.

[This Cosmic is one who has long mastered the peaceful power of fire and flames. Your energy comes directly from a stellar flame. Thus, this flametouched entity can effectively channel your energy. If you were to resist me, my efforts would end in smoke, but so long as you are willing, I can temporarily harness your power as if it were mine.]

Melody nodded. The Phoenix's explanation made perfect sense, given that Melody's Cosmic status came as a result of her connection to multiple white-hot planet cores, and a star at the center of the system.

Minutes passed. The Phoenix conjured a massive amount of power as her Divine Sense swept across Sharmur System.

For a brief moment, Melody's body began to heat up. She felt as if she were about to burst into flames!

Inside the Cube, the Phoenix inflated in size as she transferred power from Sharmur's star into Melody, then through Melody into the Phoenix herself. Her aura rose and her eyes burst with divine rays of light.

Not long after...

The Sharmur system teleported into the Cube!

In a single instant, every planet in the system disappeared, seemingly vanishing from existence, along with all the life forms on those worlds.

Not just them, but Melody as well.

In Melody's eyes, the stars in the galaxy abruptly disappeared, replaced instead with infinitely distant golden walls tens of lightyears away, walls which spanned the entirety of the Void in all directions. Melody's eyes went wide as she realized she was no longer in Realspace, but had now appeared inside the Cube.

She was still alive. She hadn't died!

The transference was a success!

Melody's mood soared. She gritted her teeth and cheered, her voice silently shouting into the vacuum of the Cube's internal void.

She was alive, she could sense the Sharmur worlds, and now she could also sense the other pocket worlds, as well as the distant Phoenix!

The Phoenix rapidly accelerated, flapping her wings to fly toward Melody. Within just a few minutes, she drew close enough for Melody to spot her with her eyes, even though Melody's Cosmic Sense had detected the Phoenix well before she moved.

The Phoenix's body rapidly deflated in size. Before, she had risen to a height greater than any skyscraper on ancient Earth, but now she was 'only' a few hundred feet tall. This was her resting height when her body was not affected by the mana flowing within her. Compared to the 6.5 foot Melody, the Phoenix seemed grand and impressive, while her junior Demon Deity looked like a tiny ant at her feet.

[Phoenix... you did it. Great job!] Melody praised.

[This noble one could not have accomplished such a feat without your assistance. Do not sell yourself short, child.] The Phoenix gently chided. [With this, humanity's future is assured, at least in the short term. But if we want them to truly thrive, we must immediately make haste. I have already begun accelerating the Cube toward Pixiv. We should arrive there within one and a half of Sharmur's rotations.]

[I hope Raphael won't be able to react in time to our movements.] Melody said, a hint of worry in her voice.

[As do I.] The Phoenix added.

What neither one of them knew was that, at that very moment, something had just occurred which would drag Raphael's attention far away from humanity and the Cube...

On the world of Sharmur.

The humans waited, their hearts palpitating with fear. They didn't know what would happen to them, but they feared the teleportation of an entire star system would cause mass mayhem and death if things went poorly.

What if the transfer process killed Melody and her death caused the planets to implode? Nobody knew exactly what would happen, and thus their imaginations ran wild.

But then, seemingly out of nowhere, the sky changed form.

The stars vanished, and a brilliant golden color shone down on Sharmur, only a bit less bright than Sharmur's star itself! The abrupt change caught everyone off guard. Many people nearly jumped out of their skin with fright, but eventually news was passed down the grapevine from humanity's leaders.

The transfer was complete. Sharmur was now located within the Cube!

A celebration followed. People started laughing and cheering, hugging their friends and family, clapping one another on the back, and making self-aware jokes regarding their demise which never came.

It was as if the collective consciousness of humanity had sighed in relief!

At this point, 60% of the humans in the Milky Way lived on Sharmur, while 39% lived on Pixiv and the remaining 1% were scattered around at various locations.

The human leaders had considered either transporting all the humans to Sharmur or to Pixiv temporarily, but they ultimately settled on transferring a small portion on people to Pixiv in an attempt to balance out the populations for a while. There were a lot of considerations behind this decision.

First, what if the transference killed Melody? If all the humans were on Sharmur and Melody's death ended up bringing ruin to the system, then humanity would go extinct in one fell swoop! This was obviously a terrible outcome. Putting everyone on Pixiv would prevent disaster from happening.

But secondly, what if nothing happened and Melody was fine after the transference? Now all those humans would be stuck on Pixiv, potentially unable to enter the Cube until it arrived 1.5 days later. According to Hans Wagner, humanity's current number one technological innovator after the death of Phoebe Hiro, the Warpgate on Sharmur would no longer work properly once the planet was inside the Cube. These gates were not designed to work inside pocket dimensions.

Perhaps in time humanity might be able to overcome these technical limitations, but if Hans was correct, then all the Phoenix would have accomplished was shoving empty worlds inside the Cube. That would defeat the entire point!

And finally, all the humans would then be stuck on Pixiv, waiting for the Cube to arrive. What if the Kolvaxians chose that exact moment to make a move? Then humanity would be completely lost again! It would be another disastrous outcome.

Therefore, the final decision was to split humanity between both worlds. If the transference went well, more than half of humanity's future would be safe even if the Kolvaxians immediately attacked Pixiv. If the transference went poorly, a little less than half of humanity would ultimately survive... but their future would be grim at best.

In the end, everything went well. General Chadwick and Linda Adams both heaved huge sighs of relief. Linda was on Sharmur, but Chadwick was back on Pixiv. He learned the outcome only a little after she did, but it did not dampen his enthusiasm.

"We've succeeded." Linda said to the senior officers inside Melodia's Military Command, located in the eastern part of the city. "The Cube is now enroute to Pixiv. Everyone, please pass on my orders to stand down from Yellow Alert. The city may return to normal operations."

The room erupted into cheers. Linda smiled as one person after another cheered humanity's survival. Some even wept. For too long, it had felt as if a Sword of Damocles had hung above humanity's head, threatening to fall from the heavens and bisect their species' future in half. But now, that threat had mostly evaporated.

Linda didn't join in on the celebrations. She was relieved, of course, but it had been a long time since her smile was genuine.

The death of Neil had dealt a permanent blow to her heart. She always felt as if a part of her was missing. All the joys of the world had become muted. The color of gray pervaded her sight.

Though this depression had infected her soul, it was slightly countered by a hope deep within her heart. Since the Kolvaxians were not a mindless hive, but were actually a creation of Archangel Uzziel, was it possible that someday humanity could counter the creatures and return them to their original forms?

Could Neil... still be saved?

Linda shuddered. She wanted this to be the case more than anything else in the world. She wanted to accidentally stumble upon Neil the Kolvaxian, subdue him, then transform him back into his original self.

But how likely was this to happen?

She felt the chances were astronomically low. It seemed impossible to ever save Neil.

Only the tiny spark of hope for his rescue someday kept her going. That, and her lightly swollen belly. She had to keep on persevering for the sake of their child, at the least.

"Linda." Someone said, shaking her out of her thoughts. Linda turned to see Debra standing beside her. Debra pushed her glasses up her nose.

"Sorry. What did you say?" Linda asked.

Debra cleared her throat. "Now that we know transference of Demon Deity systems is possible, we need to decide whether or not to invite other Deities into the Cube."

Linda didn't say anything for a while. She lowered her eyes and looked at the ground.

"Once we take Pixiv, assuming it's still safe to do so by the time we get there... I'm not sure if I want to invite other Demon Deities into the Cube. I simply cannot bring myself to trust them."

"We could transfer one or two inside." Debra suggested. "One additional Deity, even a Middle Cosmic, would be suppressed by Melody and the Phoenix. Two would be pushing our luck, though. Another option is to target Low and Bottom Cosmic Deities. They are of little threat and would be too weak to put up a fight against Melody, while still offering us strategic defensive value. Every additional Cosmic is another layer of protection."

Linda continued to hesitate. "I just don't know, Debra. At this point, I'd rather take in additional worlds without any demons, even barren rocks, just so humanity has plenty of raw resources to meet our future needs. Humanity has to start building up its own military strength, not relying on the goodwill of our former enemies."

Debra scrunched up her lips. She looked away, staring off into the distance thoughtfully.

"Hm. You might be right. I only worry that-"

Right as she was about to speak, a figure suddenly appeared in the room, causing her to pause mid-sentence.

"Melody." Debra said. "I'm glad to see you weren't hurt."

"Me too!" Melody chirped. "Sorry for popping in. I overheard your conversation. Uh... I guess I should have mentioned this sooner. We're... not going to be taking in any other demon worlds."

Debra and Linda both looked at Melody in surprise.

"We aren't?" Linda asked. "Why not?"

Even though Linda already didn't think it was a good idea, she was still stunned by the finality contained within Melody's tone. It brokered no argument.

"After the transference, I decided to have a chat with Demon Deity Auger." Melody said. She sighed. "Auger told me the demons have come up with a new plan. They aren't interested in joining us inside the Cube anymore."

"What new plan is Auger speaking of?" Debra pressed.

"They're calling it... the Divine Demon Empire." Melody said. "Using Barbatos's power, the Demon Deities are going to haul multiple star systems close to one another, forming a web of tightly packed Super Systems. Over time, they will conglomerate all the Demon Deities into a single star system spanning around ten lightyears in every direction, with hundreds or even thousands of planets. Since the Demon Deities are planet locked, they won't be able to extend their power outward, but by concentrating everyone's strength, they might be able to slowly drag this new Super System across the void! It's a long-term plan, but one that they'll be working on starting immediately."

Linda gasped. "That's... a surprising idea, but not a bad one at all! Demon Deities will be able to form a web of protection, reinforcing one another in the event the Kolvaxians attack."

Debra also looked impressed, but then her expression shifted. "It's a decision born of desperation. While these demonic worlds might end up heavily protected, the demons will be concentrating all their military power into a tiny pocket of the galaxy. They cannot grow any stronger. They will stagnate while the Kolvaxians continue to take over one world after another."

"Furthermore," Debra added, "If something were to happen and the Kolvaxians did infest one of the demon's worlds, the entire Super System would risk falling. Outside of Diablo, nobody else has any ability to actually fight the demons off their worlds."

"No. You're wrong." Linda said. "The Dolgrimites possess this ability. If the demons are going to suffer a loss, they can request backup from the Dolgrimites to drive the Kolvaxians away. The Dolgrimites are like the natural predators of the Kolvaxians. Thus, the risk of a full collapse from one infected world does not seem as high as you think."

Melody massaged her forehead. "Yeah, uh, sorry but all this strategy-stuff's got me tired. Look, we're inside the Cube now, okay? We're good for now. I'm gonna work with the Phoenix to spread out the human population a bit more. We're also going to do something with the time dilation inside the Cube."

Linda looked interested. "What do you mean?"

"I uh... I... don't really know." Melody said, somewhat lamely. "Hey, Phoenix. Phoenix! Can you explain it to these people?"

Melody looked up at the sky as she spoke, also transmitting her voice telepathically outward to draw the Phoenix's attention.

Not long afterward, a spark of light flew down from the sky. It passed right through the solid walls of humanity's military HQ, then appeared before Linda and the others.

[Greetings, Linda of Adams and Debra of Grey. I am the Phoenix.] She said. [This revered one offers her apologies for not coming to you sooner. I have been quite busy settling some matters regarding your star system.]

"No need to apologize, really." Linda said, cupping her hands and bowing her head respectfully. "I'm thankful for all your help, Phoenix. You are humanity's savior."

The Phoenix's tiny sparkle of light was unable to alter its form, but an imprint of the Phoenix's appearance spread into the minds of both humans, surprising them with its authenticity. This illusion burned brightly in their mind's eyes, making them feel as if they were looking at an avatar of the Phoenix directly!

[Let this ancient one explain my plans.] The Phoenix continued. [Humanity needs to develop. Your population is small. You lack manpower. You have an extremely large amount of living space available to you now, but little time to populate it. Thus, I shall use my abilities to increase the speed of the Cube's internal time dilation.]

[First, I must add Pixiv into the Cube's interior. Only once I have done that will I increase the time dilation. This is because moving star systems inside the Cube will become tens or even hundreds of times more mana-intensive once the time dilation has increased. It would be best to devour all the systems we need first, since speeding up and slowing down the time dilation inside an artifact as massive as the Cube will cost me a lot of energy I am currently lacking.]

[Secondly, this ancestor will need to consult with the fairies, because the formations wrapped around humanity's miniature bubble worlds are outside my realm of expertise. We must disentangle them first before I can synchronize all the dilation speeds in the Cube. If I do not do this first... the worlds may explode, killing everyone inside.]

Linda blanched. "Y-yes... let's please avoid killing people with needless rushing, great Phoenix."

[Thirdly,] the Phoenix continued, [once the fairies have joined us, this flametouched one shall begin working with the fairies to establish specialized zones for certain subsets of humanity. I have long been aware of the Wordsmith's plans for the humans, though he perished before he could bring them to fruition.]

"Hm?" Melody grunted. "What plans are you talking about?"

[They are not a secret.] The Phoenix patiently explained. As a powerful ancient Cosmic, she was more than capable of handling a conversation with multiple people using her avatar while attending to other matters far from the planet's voidspace. [You know the Wordsmith cured humanity's Flaw, correct?]

Melody slowly nodded. "Well, yeah. But nothing's really come of it."

[That is because not enough time has passed.] The Phoenix said. [The first aspect of fixing the flaw is a huge boost in human reproduction rates. Do not roll your eyes at this matter. Humanity lacks manpower. Being able to rapidly impregnate not only other humans, but non-humans as well... this shall grant humanity a population growth speed unmatched in the Milky Way's history. With a higher time dilation, entire generations will reach adulthood every year.]

[With more humans, we will begin to see more Heroes rising. Not Lowborn Heroes, but Trueborn ones. Powerful warriors with unique abilities capable of beating back our enemies.]

The Phoenix swept her gaze around the room.

[What this noble one has just explained can be said to be the smallest tip of an iceberg greater than your imagination. What of the 'Power Gloves' Jason Hiro made? What of Jepthath's Legion? What of the advancements being made inside the Hall of Heroes and Chrona?]

The Phoenix's avatar relaxed her speech. [What humans lack is not military power, but time to grow their existing capabilities into maturity. This ancient one fully intends to uplift an army capable of inflicting a grievous blow upon the Archangels. Their plot to consume the galaxy is a vile one indeed.]

"Say... about that..." Melody said slowly. "Weren't you made by Camael? Shouldn't you be on the angels' side?"

The Phoenix's avatar momentarily brightened. A slight sensation of anger transmitted into the minds of everyone present.

[Do not take this ancient one to be a slave of the Archangels! I was made for a purpose, and that purpose is gone. The Dark Dragon has escaped my clutches. Dolgris is the enemy of all life within the galaxy, but my former masters have fallen equally far into the depths of depravity. Right now, uplifting the humans will serve to reinvigorate my original purpose, as well as to counteract the evils committed by Uzziel, the Plaguebringer.]

[My master, Camael, is long dead.] The Phoenix concluded, her voice softening. [But even if she returned from beyond the grave, she once told me that I was not her slave. I am free to live my life how I choose.]

Linda was moved. "And you want your life to have a purpose."

[That is right, young one.] The Phoenix concluded. [Who among us does not seek a purpose? The incurious, the foolish, the blind, and the stubborn, perhaps. But those with any sort of intellect or aspirations always have a purpose they seek. Mine is the eradication of the Dark Dragon. But even if I fail, there is still righteousness in assisting the rise of interesting young seeds, such as yourselves.]

The Phoenix seemed to smile in a way only a flaming bird-deity could.

[You humans are so cute. You have your little squabbles and sometimes fight among one another, but where there is hatred, there is love. Humans can unite against external threats quickly and efficiently. This ancient one finds them much more pleasing to her eyes than the hypocritical, self-righteous angels, who constantly made new life only to try and enslave it afterward.]

Melody snorted. "Took the words right out of my mouth."

The four spoke for a while longer. Eventually, the Phoenix departed, leaving the other women to their devices.

"Now that we're about to enter into an era of stability, it's time we settled some matters." Debra said. "The Hell of Lust has been with us for a while, but I think we should finally integrate them properly into human society."

Melody nodded. "I don't have a lot to do now that the transference is complete. Leave it to me."

Humanity's Great Era was finally about to descend...

Part 738: Master and Pupil

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. The world of Sharmur.

Cassiel, Belial, Beelzebub, and Kiari all stood together on a western mountaintop in Melodia, waiting to see what would happen next. Before their eyes, the stars in the sky abruptly vanished, followed by the appearance of a brilliant golden light that shrouded the entire sky. This light came from the interior of the Cube, and was just as bright as Sharmur's star, except it came from all directions. The abrupt change in luminosity made all these powerful champions of humanity squint their eyes. They had to look away, since the brightness was so extreme.

"Looks like it's finally done." Belial said. "I hope Melody is okay."

"Yeah." Kiari said, her expression downcast.

Ever since her husband's funeral, she had been shrouded in a fog of gloom. Sometimes the fog would lift, but it would always return. Belial had been going out of her way to spend a bit of time with Kiari, given their shared trauma. But right now, Belial had to stay beside Cassiel due to the threat of Gressil returning at any moment. Thus, she could only talk with Kiari if Kiari happened to drop by.

Cassiel's mood was equally somber. It hadn't even been a day since Gressil terrorized her, but she had already recovered somewhat. She still jumped at shadows. She still flinched if she thought she saw something out of the corner of her eyes. She believed he was watching her at all times, which made sleep impossible to come by.

But, despite these issues, Cassiel had slowly been building up her courage again. She was afraid of Gressil, yes. Terrified, even. But at the same time, she was also tired of being afraid of him. It was exhausting, jumping at every little shadow that strayed across her vision. Her nerves were well beyond the point of being 'frazzled' and now they just wanted a rest.

There were dark bags under Cassiel's eyes. She blinked her eyes slowly, then leaned her head against Belial's shoulder, wrapping an arm around the succubi's arm afterward.

Belial glanced at the sleepy angel. "You want to rest?"

"Yes..." Cassiel said. "But... I don't know... if I can."

Belial chewed her lower lip. She looked at Beelzebub and Kiari. They met her gaze, sympathy in their eyes.

"Let's go to that underbrush over there." Kiari suggested. "Cass, you can take a nap, alright? The three of us will watch over you."

Cassiel's eyes drooped a little further. "I... alright. Thank you. I really do... need it."

Belial helped Cassiel over to the underbrush where the brilliant light of the Cube wasn't so oppressive. Beneath the dense canopy of the forest atop the mountain, Cassiel laid down among some plants, and Belial sat beside her cross-legged. Cassiel hesitantly laid her head on Belial's thigh, then closed her eyes.

Pureblooded angels didn't need to sleep. Lazarites also didn't usually need to sleep unless they were running low on Faith Energy. But Cassiel's exhaustion came less from her biology and more from her burnt-out mental capacitors. She just didn't have much left in her tank.

The other two Emperors sat nearby. Beelzebub and Kiari sat somewhat apart, forming a triangle with Belial, Cassiel positioned in the middle of them. In this way, they could watch out for each other's backs, just in case Gressil sneak-attacked them. Kiari also maintained a close connection to thousands of venomous bugs in the forest. She secretly hoped Gressil would show his face so she could force a swarm of critters down his gullet. Making him choke to death would be a humorously appropriate way to eliminate his evil from the universe.

There was something mildly humorous about the last living angel being watched over by three Demon Emperors. But that went without saying.

After the trio sat down, they remained silent for a while. Cassiel was truly exhausted. She fell asleep within ten minutes, her breathing steadying as she entered a dream realm of unknown sorts.

Belial looked at Beelzebub and Kiari. They nodded, agreeing not to even mention Gressil, lest they accidentally cause Cassiel to subconsciously endure nightmares, or just worsen the ones she was probably already having.

"The Phoenix tells me everything went well." Beelzebub said, his voice quiet so as to not wake Cassiel. "Sharmur's star system is now inside the Cube. We no longer have Warpgate access to the Labyrinth, or anywhere else."

Kiari looked at Cassiel, Inwardly, she wondered if Gressil traveled back to the Labyrinth, or if he came to Sharmur before it was transported. Naturally, she did not give voice to this question.

"In a day and a half, we'll reach Pixiv." Kiari said instead. "Assuming all goes well... what next? Does the Cube just hide while humans live in time acceleration?"

"It cannot hide forever." Beelzebub warned. "The Cube can conceal its presence to a great extent thanks to the dimensional barriers between its realm and Realspace. However, Cosmics who approach the Cube's general vicinity can still sense its presence. They won't be able to pinpoint it easily, but if they possess spatial magic or psionics or other similar abilities, they might be able to forcefully enter the Cube's dimension."

Beelzebub was quite knowledgeable about the Cube now. He wasn't an idiot, and was in fact quite the learned demon. He could communicate telepathically with the Phoenix from any distance in the universe, made easier now that he was inside the Cube itself. In this way, the Phoenix didn't even need to visit these Emperors. She could let Beelzebub do all the talking.

"Raphael possesses such abilities." Kiari muttered. She hadn't interacted with the Archangel ever, but like most people, she knew the general intel on him. Now that he was one of humanity's greatest enemies, this intel had been widely disseminated among those might otherwise not have known.

"Any luck getting in touch with Chrona?" Belial asked.

Beelzebub shook his head. "None. We have no idea what their situation is. The last we heard, their time dilation was still accelerating... so..."

He trailed off, the implication clear.

The only hope humanity had of contacting Chrona was via the fairies, or possibly Marie Becker, since Rebecca the Cybernite was inside Chrona.

In the worst case situation, it was possible Chrona's dimension could accelerate to such a speed that it would implode, killing everyone inside!

Based on the predictions of humanity's few remaining experts, particularly their fairy allies, Hans Wagner, and Mandy Hiro inside the Hall of Heroes, it didn't seem as though Chrona would be destroyed just yet, but time was running out.

"There's a bigger question we need to ask." Beelzebub said, carefully looking between Kiari and Belial as he spoke. "Can we win? Can humanity win? Mere survival is not good enough. If the humans' only goal is to survive, they are not thinking ahead far enough."

He continued. "The Phoenix has spoken to me regarding a few Truths. Did you know that at some point in the near future, maybe a year from now, maybe a million years from now, the barriers around all the galaxies in the universe are going to drop? Once they drop, an extragalactic war will begin!"

Belial nodded. "I've heard about that. Didn't catch all the details, though."

"Well, let me tell you then." Beelzebub explained. "It's known as Akasha's War. Sometimes referred to as The Game of Rulers. Often deemed The Game for short. Once it begins, the war will not end until this Eternity ends. And when the Eternity ends, the entire universe will collapse, then a new Eternity will begin! We're talking about trillions, even septillions of years between the birth and death of our universe!"

He spoke fervently, though he kept his voice low so as to not wake up Cassiel.

After a long moment, Belial shrugged. "So?"

"So? What do you mean so, woman?" Beelzebub spat. "Humanity's very existence hangs in the balance. If you think things are bad now, just wait until the Akashic Barriers drop. Humans, demons, and everyone else will become meat on the chopping block. Our galaxy is way too weak to handle enemies from other galaxies!"

Beelzebub frowned. Despite his words, neither Belial nor Kiari looked particularly bothered about it.

"I know it seems like a big deal to you, Beelzebub." Kiari eventually said. "But... I'm only 3,000 years old. Even Samantha is only 100,000 years old. If this big war starts in a million years, then she'll be 10 times older, stronger, and wiser. I'll be hundreds of times older, stronger, and wiser. Assuming we're even alive at that point."

"So, the way I see it," Kiari continued, "I think you're focusing on events that might be so far in the future, humanity will have already become way stronger, or been rendered extinct. We have to focus on the here and now."

Belial snorted. "That's not all, Kiari. The fact is, humanity is going to go extinct anyway. All of us are. Once the Eternity ends, we'll all be dead. So, winning or losing a far-future war might matter for our descendants, but worrying about surviving until the end of the Eternity... it really doesn't matter. All I care about, personally, is protecting the people I care about."

Belial subconsciously stroked Cassiel's hair as she said this. She didn't even realize what she'd done.

"Well..." Beelzebub relented. "You're not wrong. Wringing my hands over future events tens of times more distant than the birth of my universe does feel rather idiotic."

Beelzebub thought about it more, and he realized that while the Phoenix was incredibly ancient and had been born quite close to the birth of the universe, very few other entities in the Milky Way were like her. Beelzebub himself certainly wasn't. For the Phoenix, 100 million years might feel like a thousand years for Belial, or a hundred years for Kiari. Their scales of thinking were far too different.

At the same time, what was the point worrying about humanity's survival when they, and every other species in the universe, would die off someday anyway? Nobody could truly live forever, not even the Rulers who endured multiple Eternities. Perhaps even Akasha himself might die someday.

Beelzebub chuckled quietly. He returned his attention to the other two.

"How about this then?" Beelzebub suggested. "Let's just focus on making humanity stronger for the sake of making them less vulnerable. We want to avoid future tragedies as much as possible."

Kiari nodded. "I'd like that."

"So would I." Belial added. "But none of us are inventors. We're not builders, or technologists, or anything like that. We just... fight. What good are we?"

"You say we're not builders?" Beelzebub retorted. "Kiari's giant bugs can rapidly build cities. Your great strength and ability to stretch your body would surely help in assembling giant machines and structures. As for me? At the very least I could make for a capable... welder!"

Hardly had the words left his mouth before Beelzebub's face fell.

Welder? Oh devils... is that all I'm good for? Melting two pieces of metal together?!

"Actually, Beelzebub," Belial interjected, "you're an energy producer. You can produce vast amounts of fire with minimal mana cost, and you recently started learning how to create electricity and lightning. I bet your powers have even more practical uses for humanity than mine would. Phoebe told me that once, some time back."

Beelzebub was surprised. He hadn't really given the full extent of his abilities much thought.

A few minutes of silence followed. A new idea bubbled inside Beelzebub's mind.

"I need to... think for a bit." Beelzebub said, gesturing toward a cliff high above them. "I'm going to go up there. You two, just call out if you need me."

"Oh. Okay." Belial said, raising an eyebrow. "But... if Gressil comes..."

Beelzebub stood up, then he snorted at Belial.

"If the former Second Emperor of Demonkind can't rip that ugly bastard a new hole, what will I be able to do? As long as you're here, he won't have the stones to show his face."

Beelzebub waved off her concerns. He strolled away, leaving the three women alone together.

Cassiel continued to snooze, her mind having drifted off into a deep dream. With Beelzebub gone, Belial and Kiari found themselves able to have more of a girl talk... having a man nearby changed the atmosphere enough that they never fully felt comfortable opening up.

And so, like this, they began to talk about a great many things. Their feelings, the changes coming to Sharmur and other worlds, and many similar such things.

But while they talked about the matters which were important to them, Beelzebub clambered onto a stone outcropping high above the women, where he could leap off and reach them in seconds if something went wrong. He was far enough away that even with his exceptional hearing he couldn't really hear their whispering, but if they screamed or yelled, he would be able to reinforce them within seconds.

As Beelzebub sat down cross-legged, he looked up into the brilliant glowing sky and sighed.

"Executor Sartran." Beelzebub said mildly. "How are you doing, you absolute bastard?"

Beelzebub reached into his soul and extracted a glowing lump of light. Unlike Jason Hiro and several others, Beelzebub did not have a Mind Realm. Thus, several weeks earlier, when he killed Executor Sartran following the destruction of Tarus II, he devoured Sartran's soul and put it into hibernation, rather than allowing the Executor to roam around freely within a living soul world.

Sartran's soul awakened. It shuddered in Beelzebub's grasp.

[I... where am I? Beelzebub! No! You killed me?!]

"I did." Beelzebub said mildly. "It's the least you deserve... after what you did to Tarus II. Because of the Volgrim, the Wordsmiths are dead, along with a million humans. Do you feel even the slightest regret over your evil deeds?"

Sartran's soul dimmed slightly. He could not take physical form, but his emotions were plainly visible to the one holding him in their grasp.

[...Beelzebub. I was not the one who destroyed your world. It was the Second Founder who did. And she was likely deceived-]

"By Creator Demila. Yes. I am well aware." Beelzebub said. "Quite some time has passed since we last spoke. About three weeks. Demila is dead. So are around 95% of all Psions."

A long moment of silence hung in the air.

[Wha... what?] Sartran asked, his tone ashen. [No... you... you are lying.]

"I wish I were." Beelzebub said. "Not that you Volgrim don't deserve to suffer a reverse-genocide after what you did to Tarus II. It's quite amusing to see how quickly karma slapped you across the face! But unfortunately the war situation has changed as a result, and now everything is all messed up. Thus, my light regret about your people."

Sartran was confused. He had been essentially trapped in stasis inside Beelzebub's soul, not knowing what happened in the world outside. Thus, Beelzebub took a few minutes to catch the former Executor up to speed.

Beelzebub told Sartran about the destruction of Tarus II, Demila's betrayal, her assault on the Psion homeworlds, and her ultimate death on Volgarius, though Beelzebub didn't know the exact manner in which she died. Thanks to the Phoenix's keen senses, Beelzebub only knew that her soul had been extinguished, perhaps through some secret counter-measure by the Founders. But the Phoenix also knew of Mephisto's appearance, as well as Executor Nufaris's final sacrifice to kill him.

[Nufaris...] Sartran said, his soul dimming even further. [All the Executors... dead. Our Empire in ruins...]

Beelzebub sneered. "Oh, you poor thing. I could never imagine what you're going through. Don't worry, though. Things can only get worse from here! It turns out the Kolvaxians are actually agents of Archangel Uzziel, working in tandem with Archangel Raphael! Who knew, eh? Hahahaha, and now the Plague has us all surrounded, and our deaths are going to come sooner or later!"

[Why did you bring me out?] Sartran asked. [Merely to gloat? To laugh at my misfortune?]

"WELL, I'd be LYING if I said watching you cry about all this wasn't terribly entertaining!" Beelzebub roared with laughter. "It's really quite funny watching the galaxy's biggest bullies get their comeuppance! A bit of a knee-slapper if I don't say so myself!"

[Beelzebub...] Sartran groaned. [Look. Listen to me. I am truly sorry about Tarus II. We were all deceived by Demila. She gave us false intelligence and brought ruin not only to humanity, but the Volgrim as well. True, humanity endured the first blow, but make no mistake, her actions were an attack secretly aimed at the Volgrim. Both our species were victims of her machinations.]

Beelzebub's laughter died off. He rubbed his nose with his free hand. "Of course I know that, you dimwit. Do you think I'm stupid? I already know we're both victims. But it's still quite funny seeing the 'omnipotent' Volgrim Empire get slapped around by one rogue agent like Demila! So much for the GENIUS of your First Founder! I guess even his 'keen strategic mind' couldn't see through her deception."

Sartran was quiet for a time.

[That was because Unarin had a blind spot for her. Demila was a million orbits of age. She had loyally served the Empire since her emergence. Even I was deceived. I refuse to believe she was always like this. Perhaps something changed her. Perhaps...]

Sartran mused to himself for a moment.

[Now that I think about it. Her personality did start to change not long ago. It was after... yes... I spoke to Nufaris about that matter. We dispatched her to execute Demon Emperor Gressil, but she somehow failed. It was a huge embarrassment. Gressil is well-known for being a liar and a deceiver. Is it possible he somehow grasped hold of her weakness and manipulated her to turn against her Empire?]

Beelzebub rolled his eyes. "Who cares? I'm sure there's some excuse you can use, some other person you can put the blame on. But it doesn't matter! What happened, happened, and now we need to move on."

Finally, Beelzebub decided to get around to the real reason he had retrieved Sartran's soul.

"I've come to consult with you." Beelzebub said. "I was thinking about just devouring your soul, but the Phoenix told me it wouldn't make me any stronger, and the soul contamination of a Low Cosmic would surely weaken me by a great deal."

Sartran's outward projection of emotions didn't change. He seemed unaffected by Beelzebub's threats.

[What makes you think I would be willing to help the one who killed me?] Sartran asked. [Our enmity now is beyond redemption.]

"Oh, pish-posh, don't be such a sourpuss." Beelzebub said, waving his other hand lightly. "Your Empire is in pieces. The demons are scrambling to pull themselves together to stand a chance against the Plague, the humans are going into hiding, and the rest of the galaxy is screwed if current trends keep up."

He continued. "Sartran, you once gave me some useful tips regarding my powers. I was wondering if you wouldn't like to educate me further?"

The Executor scoffed. [Why? So you can someday unleash your flames upon the Volgrim? Why would I empower a potential enemy to my Empire?]

"If your glorious Empire hadn't gotten its pants slapped off by Demila, you'd be right. But at this point, I like to think we're... even." Beelzebub said slowly. "That is, so long as your idiotic Founders don't fall for another spy in their midst and send another attack at the humans again. If that were to happen, then your worries would be rooted in reality."

A long moment of silence fell. Sartran's soul rested in Beelzebub's grasp. He looked at Beelzebub, and Beelzebub looked back at him.

[So... you wish for me to... teach you?] Sartran asked.

"Yes. I want to master my powers properly." Beelzebub said.

[Don't you find your request a bit shameless? I'm trapped within your grasp. I'm a hostage.] Sartran retorted.

"A hostage? Hardly." Beelzebub snorted. "That would imply I was using you to extort for a ransom. Your Empire has no idea you're still alive. I'm simply tapping into my resources to empower myself."

Beelzebub paused.

"Well, I suppose if you're unwilling, I could ask the Phoenix to help me extract the knowledge from your soul forcibly. It would no doubt be excruciating, and you would die. I just think it'd bring me bad karma to kill you in such a manner. I'd rather learn from you properly."

Sartran shuddered. He was no expert on soul manipulation, but he knew plenty of Psions who were. Extracting knowledge from a soul would take a long time, and it would mean excruciating unending agony until the soul itself ultimately collapsed from the pain.

[I... I understand.] Sartran said reluctantly. [You want a teacher, and I happen to possess the type of knowledge you need. Will you swear to me you won't bring your power to bear against the Volgrim Empire?]

Beelzebub rolled his eyes. "Only if the Volgrim Empire doesn't do something stupid again like they did with Tarus II. If they do... I will not hold back."

Sartran considered Beelzebub's words.

[If I am being fully honest with myself... it is true that my Empire harmed the humans. Undeservedly? I am not certain. But as they say, an eye for an eye makes the world blind. I greatly hope another deceiver like Demila does not cause my people, or yours, any further harm.]

Sartran's soul seemed to sag a little.

[Very well. I will teach you my ways, Beelzebub. Properly, this time, as a master and pupil. I have to admit, I was interested in you from the moment we met. Your powers are similar to mine, yet we use them in different ways. Perhaps we could both learn from each other.]

Beelzebub nodded. "I'd like that. I do apologize for killing you in a flash of rage. Admittedly, I didn't know all the facts at the same, and I might have overreacted a teensy bit."

Sartran looked down at his disembodied soul.

[...I suppose that is one way to describe past matters.]

Like this, the atmosphere lightened between them somewhat.

"If possible, I will see if I can get you a new body at some point." Beelzebub said. "In fact, I'll even swear on it. So long as you teach me properly, I'll get you a new body. So long as the Volgrim Empire doesn't attack humanity again, I won't attack them. I swear on my honor as a Demon Overlord!"

[Very well. Your vow is about the most I could hope for- wait, what did you say?] Sartran suddenly asked. [What is a 'Demon Overlord'? Aren't you a Demon Deity?]

Beelzebub gave Sartran a weird look, but then he realized what the Executor meant. Beelzebub slapped his own face.

"Ahh, I suppose I forgot to mention... actually, I was a Middle Cosmic for a short while, but then I gave all my energy to the Phoenix, so I'm a mortal again. It turns out there's a level of mortal power above Demon Emperor called Demon Overlord. So that's me now!"

[You're not a Middle Cosmic anymore?!] Sartran shrieked. [Why didn't you say so from the start?! Here I was, worried you would turn your Cosmic power on the Volgrim Empire, but you're only a mortal now! I don't mind teaching a mere mortal how to wield their power... you could have saved us both a lot of breath!]

Beelzebub thought for a moment about mentioning that he actually maybe possibly had a way to ascend back to Cosmic again... but he wisely opted to keep his mouth shut.

"Right. That- sorry, Sartran. I guess it just didn't cross my mind."

The Executor harrumphed, then metaphorically crossed his arms in annoyance.

[Demons.]

Part 739: Experimentation

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. The world of Sharmur.

Two hours passed.

Beelzebub sat quietly atop the mountain cliff. He listened as his newest teacher reluctantly lectured to him. At the same time, electricity crackled between both of Beelzebub's palms, jumping from his right hand to his left hand and back again.

[The fundamental state of fire is simply energy. This is why the bridge between fire and lightning can be crossed with great ease by genius Psions, and ones such as yourself.] Sartran explained, his soul speaking from within Beelzebub's mind. [But in truth, fire and lightning are only two possible options for energy manipulators. They are still considered low level, brute-force applications of energy manipulation. The true value in energy manipulation comes from manipulating the weak nuclear force, the strong nuclear force, and electromagnetism directly.]

"Electromagnetism?" Beelzebub repeated. "I'm not familiar with this term. Based on the name, it sounds like it has something to do with electricity and magnets?"

[That is indeed one way of putting it.] Sartran said hesitantly. [A rather simplistic description, but acceptable for now. Electromagnetism allows one to control many different fundamental forces of nature. It is what computer circuitry is based on, so it's also quite valuable knowledge for Technopaths to possess.]

Beelzebub paused his electrical energy pulses to scratch his chin thoughtfully.

"Ose was always good with computers. And she manipulated lightning. I assumed the two went together, but based on what you're saying, she didn't go nearly far enough with what her abilities could accomplish."

[Presumably, if she could manipulate lightning, then she could have manipulated fire and electromagnetism itself.] Sartran acknowledged. [But don't take what I'm saying as irrefutable fact. Just because one 'can' do something does not mean they are 'able' to do it. Technically, most humans can train their bodies to become professional weightlifters and lift hundreds of kilos worth of weights, but not many actually do this.]

Sartran continued. [We Psions are able to live forever without fear of natural death. The longest-lived among us often reach a wall in our growth that prevents us from ascending to greater heights, and thus they often try to branch out and master new applications to their existing powers. Creator Demila was one such case. Despite being one million cycles of age, she could not normally rise past the 7th Level, and thus she instead worked on improving her fundamentals.]

"Until she decided to eat a bunch of you." Beelzebub muttered.

[Yes. Until she did... that.] Sartran said, his voice softening. [She was not a brilliant Psion. She was greedy, short-sighted, and only possessed decent capabilities. The fact she was able to rise to the 7th Level was more due to her perseverance and luck than a testament to her intellect.]

Beelzebub pondered Sartran's words. "Based on what you've said, is it possible that I, and many other demons like me, have truly been limiting ourselves based on preconceived notions of what we think our powers enable us to do? Could I have been wielding the power of lightning back when I was a Lord if someone hadn't defined my abilities so strictly for me?"

[Perhaps. However, it is a fact that the stronger one's connection to metaphysical powers grows, the broader their breadth of abilities can also become. When you were a Demon Lord, you likely could only control the basic element of fire at your highest possible level, and your connection to others would have been far weaker. The same is true of low-level Psions. Only around once we ascend to Cosmic can our kind truly branch out evenly in multiple directions.]

Sartran waved his hand. [But never mind all that. I think I've said enough, now. You should try using your powers more creatively.]

"I agree. But... how can I be more creative?" Beelzebub pondered. "I've always just... used the powers my body told me I would automatically know how to use."

[Hmm. A good question.] Sartran said. [How about this? Start by standing up.]

"Uh... alright, then."

Beelzebub shrugged. He stood up, then stretched his legs. Sitting on a rock cross-legged for two hours wasn't particularly comfortable, and his joints felt a little stiff.

[Alright. Now, let's go over your abilities, one by one.] Sartran suggested.

Beelzebub nodded. He didn't say anything for a moment as he thought about all the powers he possessed.

"Well. First off, Flame Shaping is my fundamental ability."

Beelzebub held up his hand. He conjured an orb of fire, then started spinning it around rapidly to condense it and increase its heat and explosive power. If he were to let go, it would probably explode and blow his arm off! But he instead deliberately slowed it down, then turned it into a plume of fire that arced up over his head like a fountain of water.

He changed the flame's shape a few more times to demonstrate his proficiency. Sartran raised an eyebrow. It was clear at a glance that Beelzebub's Flame Shaping was already at the highest level. He could bend and manipulate the flames by relying on pure combat instinct without even having to think about their form.

"There's also Fireportation." Beelzebub said.

He flicked a bit of fire over toward some shrubs on the edge of the mountain. When the vegetation burst into flame, Beelzebub suddenly exploded into smoke, then reappeared at the new location a split-second later.

Sartran gasped. [You've mastered a form of teleportation? Incredible! What are the limitations on range?]

Beelzebub frowned. "I... don't know. I don't use this ability often."

[What a waste! You absolutely must try to find the limits of how far you can travel!] Sartran urged. [How can you be so blind to the possibilities?]

"What possibilities?" Beelzebub asked. He looked genuinely clueless. "It's certainly a useful ability, but outside of saving a little time getting to places I don't see the extreme value you're implying."

Sartran sighed. [You truly do lack imagination, Beelzebub. I see now that you focus your attention on mere brute force and fighting. This is only one possibility among many that a metaphysical master should consider.]

The Executor started to lecture again. [Abilities can be divided into many different types. Offense, defense, healing, scouting, movement, strategic-macro, strategic-micro, summoning, empowerment, weakening, and more!]

[Think for a moment of other demons that you know.] Sartran continued. [Do you know of any demons who are good at delivering messages across vast distances to other demons?]

"Of course." Beelzebub said. "Any Warper, for one."

[Right. And how about demons who can summon other creatures or entities or weapons to fight for them?] Sartran pressed further.

"Hmm. Lucifer and Gressil could make new forms of life..." Beelzebub said hesitantly. "Oh, Uriel summoned Light Constructs when she fought me as well. Jason Hiro summoned other beings to life as well."

[Yes! Precisely.] Sartran exclaimed. [Ose was lightning fast in her movements. Belial can heal countless sorts of injuries. All of these demons, angels, Heroes, and so on have powers with unique uses, but the limitation for you demons is that you often do not consider alternative uses for your abilities.]

Now was the moment where Sartran started to get to his bigger point.

[Beelzebub, imagine a few months from now, something terrible happens. Kolvaxians break into the Cube, or the demons invade, or some other scenario. With your Fireportation power, depending on the limits, you could instantly reinforce any warzone by teleporting to a nearby fire source!]

Beelzebub frowned. "But what's the point if I have to light a fire and teleport to it? I might as well just fly over there myself."

[No, no, no...] Sartran sighed. [You're still thinking like an individual. What if humanity purposefully left lots of small fires flickering across their settlements and cities and other important areas for you to teleport to? What if your ability allows you to teleport hundreds of kilometers to a distant source of fire? What if you can teleport across a star system to another world? What if you can teleport to distant worlds inside different star systems?]

"I... I see!" Beelzebub exclaimed, suddenly realizing Sartran's true meaning. "I've never tested the limits of my teleportation ability. It simply didn't occur to me this was a possibility!"

[Exactly.] Sartran said, feeling relieved. [But we've still not gone far enough. Beelzebub, you can blow up parts of your body, yes?]

Beelzebub nodded again. "Yes. It's quite painful, but I can do it..."

[Have you ever tried combining Fireportation with nuclear body parts?] Sartran asked.

Once again, Beelzebub wore a look of surprise. "You mean... waiting until my enemy is close to a source of fire, then ripping off my arm and teleporting it to them, only to detonate my arm next to them? I don't think I've done that specific thing before, no..."

[Teleportation is an ability few Psions wield.] Sartran said, chiding Beelzebub as he would any other student. [It becomes more common as Psions rise past the 6th level, but even then, while most Executors can execute some form of teleportation, instantaneous movement, or other escape/traversal ability, most 7th Level Psions cannot, and sparingly few 6th Level Psions can do so even in a limited capacity. This means you are already far above most Cosmic Psions! For you to fail to use this power at the highest level, what can this be other than a waste?]

Beelzebub's expression became solemn. Indeed, he realized only now that Sartran's words were pointed straight at the heart of the matter. Beelzebub was already quite a bit more inventive than other demons, but that inventiveness quite literally only began after he spoke to Sartran during their first meeting. Before that moment, he simply used his abilities thoughtlessly, relying purely on what his instincts told him were possible.

"Another ability I often use is my Flame Whip..." Beelzebub said slowly. "I've used it to cut through opponents with heavy armor and other defenses."

[Have you ever used it to ensnare opponents?] Sartran questioned. [Whips and chains often make for great tools to temporarily immobilize strong enemies. Even if you only slow them down for a time unit or two, that can be enough time to rain hellfire upon them while they cannot resist. In fact, Executor Huron possesses the ability to transmute materials into new forms. One of his favorite methods is creating giant metal chains to bind his enemies. It has made his Kolvaxor doppelganger quite a bastard to battle against...]

"I've not used my whips in that way either." Beelzebub said, now beginning to feel quite ill regarding the wasteful usage of his flame powers. "I can shoot fire beams from my eyes. The pinpoint damage is quite strong, but overall, the ability is weak against strong enemies."

[That sounds like an ability that would work well in a surprise situation.] Sartran opined.

"A surprise situation?" Beelzebub repeated.

[Imagine your opponent has been hampering your movements, outplaying you at every opportunity, and agilely dodging your attacks.] Sartran continued to explain. [You have them thinking you're weak and they will surely defeat you. You charge up a mighty fireball to draw their attention, but you only pretend you're about to throw it at them. Instead, right when their attention is fully on your attack, you shoot a fire-beam from your eyes at theirs! If it strikes their eyes, you might cause immense damage. Even if the beam hits their eyes and does no damage, you might blind them for a split second. If they move to the side to avoid it, you can anticipate the movement. At the very least, you can startle them into making a mistake, giving you time to hit them with that charged fireball!]

Sartran logically walked Beelzebub through the possibilities, opening up the Demon Overlord's mind to many different ideas he hadn't considered before.

Beelzebub began to pace back and forth.

"Everything you've said makes sense. Now that I think about it, there are other things that jump to my mind I hadn't considered before. For example, since I can now wield electrical energy, maybe I can incorporate that into my existing techniques..."

A lightbulb seemed to go off in Beelzebub's head.

"That's it!" Beelzebub suddenly exclaimed.

Beelzebub turned to look out to the east, where he could see the ocean far in the distance. Between Beelzebub and that ocean, the city of Melodia stood with all its people bustling about, readying themselves for humanity's next transitional phase.

Beelzebub inhaled deeply. He concentrated his mind, causing the electrical energy in his brain to rise dramatically. Sparks erupted in his eyes as he looked at the distant shortline...

Zzzt...

Zzzzzzzzt...

Energy rapidly built up inside Beelzebub's body. Sweat dripped from his head as he struggled to focus his mind.

KZZAAAT!

All the energy abruptly exploded beneath Beelzebub's feet, making him yelp in alarm as he was unceremoniously launched into the air, causing him to spin fourteen times as he flew off the cliff's edge uncontrollably.

"Aaah!!"

Beelzebub tried to reorient himself in midair, but he was so startled from the misfire that he flew into the valley below and crashed into the trees, their branches lacerating his skin and tearing his clothes as he flopped down to the ground below and smashed his face against the ground.

"Oh... ohhh..." Beelzebub groaned, feeling multiple teeth shattered from the impact.

Moments later, Kiari rushed over. "Beelzebub? Are you okay? Did someone attack you? What's going on?!"

Kiari jumped in alarm when she saw Beelzebub's disheveled appearance. Not five seconds later, Belial ran over along with Cassiel, who had been woken up by the electrical explosion. The angel looked tired, but also fully alert, having been startled awake.

"Um... ffffiiine... I'm fuuhhhh-ine..." Beelzebub groaned, as he lifted himself up. His body felt weak for some reason. His arms shook as he tried to push himself up to a sitting position.

Kiari quickly walked over and wrapped her arm around Beelzebub's. She helped him stagger to his feet, then she frowned.

"What's wrong, Beelzebub? Why aren't you healing yet?"

Beelzebub was still dazed. He touched his face and realized his wounds hadn't scabbed over and healed like they usually would.

"I... I dun knowww." Beelzebub mumbled. His vision wavered.

Inside Beelzebub's mind, Sartran spoke, but only Beelzebub could hear him.

[You've suffered a backlash. This is something you've not experienced before, because you demons almost always rely on your instinctual powers. But whatever you were attempting to do was beyond your current base of knowledge. It happens to younger Psions all the time, and will result in the temporary weakening or even outright disabling of your metaphysical abilities. Rest for a while, and they will return.]

Beelzebub blinked slowly. He didn't say anything, due to his sudden onset of fatigue. Kiari helped him sit down with his back against a tree.

"Hey... Sam'mtha..." Beelzebub groaned. "Can Iiii troubbble you foraquickheal?"

Belial nodded. She looked at Cassiel, then stepped over to Beelzebub's side. After sending waves of healing magic into him, she finally brought Beelzebub back to a mostly intact state, though his body was still extremely lethargic.

"Did someone attack you?" Kiari asked again.

"No, no, nothing like that." Beelzebub said, rubbing the bottom of his jaw. Having to suffer with shattered teeth for three long minutes was an agonizing experience, and the phantom pain continued to linger. "I tried using my abilities in a new way and suffered a... a backlash, I think it's called. I just need to rest for a bit and my powers will return."

Kiari still looked concerned, but Belial's face relaxed.

"Oh, a backlash? I've heard of that happening before. A few demons in the past tried experimenting with their powers and nearly died from it, but with a bit of rest their strength always returned. You should be more careful, Beelzebub. Remember that backlashes strengthen based on how much power you're trying to release. Whatever you were experimenting with, take it slower next time."

As the oldest demon on the scene, well over 100,000 years of age, Belial had known countless other demons over the years, and even her incidental knowledge was quite vast compared to the other two.

"Did any of them succeed?" Beelzebub asked.

"Of course." Belial answered. "I never saw it personally, but I have it on good faith Ose used to be quite the experimenter back in the day. That's how she developed such a diverse power-set. Not many others actually succeeded though. We demons are pretty limited in what powers we wield, but what we can do, we do well."

Beelzebub looked unconvinced, but he decided not to argue the point. Belial and Sartran couldn't both be right. Demons couldn't be flexible and inflexible at the first time. Not only that, but Beelzebub had already proven to himself that he could branch out further than what his innate flame powers suggested. His control of electricity was humble, but it was definitely outside the scope of his original abilities.

That made him lean much more heavily toward Sartran's point of view. There must be more he could accomplish!

Beelzebub closed his eyes. He steadied his breathing and fell silent for a while as he waited for his body to recover.

"You guys can go back to town." Kiari suggested. "I'll stay here with Beelzebub until he's all better."

"Alright." Belial said.

She took Cassiel's arm, and the two of them departed, leaving just Beelzebub and Kiari alone again.

"You don't need to stay here and babysit me." Beelzebub said after a minute or two. "I'll be fine after a short breather."

"Maybe. But if you've really lost access to your powers, that makes you vulnerable." Kiari pointed out. "What if Gressil attacked while you were sitting here? Can you say for certain you'd recover before he killed you? I don't... want to take that chance. I don't, um... I don't want to lose you."

Beelzebub paused. He lifted his head and opened his eyes to look up at Kiari, standing before him. When his eyes met hers, she turned away, not wanting to meet his gaze.

"Oh. I see. Then, ah, thank you, Kiari." Beelzebub said, haltingly.

There was a long moment of silence between the two of them. Kiari fiddled with her hair, looking off into the distance while she hovered next to Beelzebub protectively. The trauma of losing her husband had clearly left a mark on her psyche that would not heal anytime soon.

"So." Beelzebub said, after a long few minutes of awkward silence. "How long until the baby...?"

Kiari snapped out of a daze that she hadn't even realized she was in. "The-the baby... I don't know. There's no precedent. Um... humans need nine months, but it seems to be growing fast... it might be next week, or it might be a few months from now."

"Any idea what the baby's gender will be?" Beelzebub asked, though he was only making small talk.

"I don't know. I think I'd rather it be a surprise..." Kiari said softly. "I'd like a boy though."

"A boy would be nice." Beelzebub quietly agreed. "As long as it makes you happy."

Kiari mumbled something under her breath, but even with his keen hearing, Beelzebub couldn't quite make it out. After another minute, Kiari eventually turned around and sat down next to him, wrapping her arms around her legs.

"I know we're in the Cube now..." Kiari said softly. "But I was talking to Sam, and I realized I've been feeling really anxious. Are we going to be okay, Beelzebub?"

"By 'we', do you mean humanity and their allies in general?" Beelzebub asked.

Kiari nodded. She leaned her head forward to rest her chin on her knees. "So much has happened. When I joined the humans, I was only a Lord. I was really insecure about my strength... I still am. I'm an Emperor now but I feel like I haven't been much help. I could save anyone when Tarus II was destroyed. What if the Kolvaxians break into the Cube? Am I going to be useless again?"

"I wasn't any help either." Beelzebub pointed out. "I blew up along with the planet. Then I chased the Volgrim but they still got away."

"No, that's not true." Kiari pointed out. "You killed one of them, right? That Satan-Psion?"

"Sartran." Beelzebub corrected. "And come to think of it, I did end up empowering the Phoenix, so... I supposed I did accomplish a few minor things. The difference is, unlike you, I'm a mass murderer trying to redeem myself. I still fall far short of your accomplishments. You built a lot of houses for a lot of people. You've done more good for these people than I ever have, and probably ever will."

"I don't know about all that..." Kiari mumbled, but she didn't offer much protest to his words.

"There's no sense in worrying about the future." Beelzebub eventually concluded. "Right now, the important thing is to rebuild and focus on improving the current state of affairs. The stronger the humans get, the more likely they'll be to survive future disaster, and maybe even come out stronger afterward."

Kiari smiled faintly. "Yeah... you're always so optimistic, Beelzy..."

Beelzebub rolled his eyes. "Oh, don't call me that."

"Hehe, Beelzy!" Kiari chuckled. She flashed a cute smile at him, and Beelzebub's mind momentarily blanked out.

He hadn't realized it before, but Kiari was actually rather... beautiful...

Beelzebub looked off into the distance. The two of them fell silent once again.

They stared up at the distant glowing golden hue of the Cube, wondering what the future had in store for them...

Part 740: Weakest Gamer, Strongest Italian

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

One realspace-day before the Cube successfully swallowed the Sharmur system, back inside the hidden dimension created by the First Wordsmith, a mere two Chrona-weeks had passed.

Previously, Timothy had chosen to unlock the Pawn Summoning System, while Ferral had chosen the Dungeon Creation System instead.

Two weeks was not a lot of time. For Psions, it was practically no time at all. Any Psion worth their salt would have made essentially zero progress improving their fundamental abilities, outside maybe some minor adjustments to a specific psionic application. Perhaps, if they were truly focused, they might have been able to learn a new skill and reach a minor level of accomplishment with it.

But those sorts of Psions were not the same as Ferral. After two weeks of hard work, Ferral had reached Level 7 in the King Network! Each level was important, compounding on the choices made in levels prior. Thus, when Ferral competed against his fellow Psions, the ones who had easily oppressed him before he obtained the King Network, he was able to beat them in singular combat almost half the time!

This was a huge change in status for Ferral. Compared to before when he wouldn't win one out of a hundred fights, now he could even hold his own against Dunal, the publicly recognized strongest young Psion inside Chrona!

Ferral was not the only one who had made great gains. Though she was often busy with other matters, Fiona had advanced to Level 5 and obtained access to the Talent Tree. If she had more time to spare, she probably could have advanced further, but she made up for this lack of leveling speed with a great number of items she had deconstructed and crafted.

Marigold was the last person added to the King Network. Even so, she was level 7! She had obtained several new skills, and had strengthened her body considerably. Unlike the others, she held little interest in acquiring magical abilities, and preferred focusing on brute force.

Finally, there was the unassuming leader of the group, Timothy Hiro. He had reached level 9, and finally finished up a daily quest with enough EXP to allow him to reach level 10. In this time, he had acquired more than a few skills, and though most were Common or Uncommon skills, he had been very deliberate in picking options that would shore up his weaknesses.

Timothy grinned as he looked at the final Daily Quest that would push him over a five-day hurdle. He accepted the rewards, and his eyes lit up once he saw the words appear before him.

Level 10 Achieved.

First Reward: Shop System Unlocked.

Second Reward: Choose one of three rewards - [+50 HP] [+1 Basic Stat] [Gain new random Resistance (+10-100%)]

Third Reward: Choose from one of six new Rare skills - [3x Active Skill (Will be immediately usable)] or [3x Passive Skill]

Fourth Reward: Improve two of your skills by +1 levels. You cannot improve the same skill multiple times.

Timothy was sitting out by a fountain in the middle of town. He jumped up and grinned like an idiot before hopping around excitedly.

"Shop! I got access to the Shop! Finally!! Ohh, this is a milestone! A real milestone!!"

Unfortunately, nobody else was there to share the moment with him, but that was okay. Ferral was training with the other Psions, and Marigold was hanging out with her friends. Naturally, Fiona was busy using her skills to fix things like usual.

Timothy wasn't bothered. He'd been grinding daily quests for five long days to advance from Level 9 to Level 10. He didn't need to share the moment with anyone to be excited himself.

"Congratulations." Umi said, her speck of light flickering into existence with zero fanfare... or enthusiasm. "You have reached the bare minimum milestone to call yourself a Low Mortal. With your current skillset, you are barely a match for the weakest of Demon Lords."

Her words were pointed and rude, but that didn't bother Timothy. He had grown used to her way of speaking. Instead, he perked up his ears at the real meaning behind her words.

"Wait, I'm finally on the level of a Demon Lord?" Timothy asked.

"In the strictest sense, affirmative." Umi beeped. She sounded tired. "After all, you now possess a handful of magical abilities. This is more than some Lords possess. However, there are still many Demons Lords who would defeat you with little effort."

Timothy wasn't cowed. "Even if true, that's still amazing! I've been noticing my body felt a little stronger after all my training!"

Timothy's ability to eat and digest food had improved quite a bit as time went on. He'd specially leveled up one of the skills he obtained twice to assist with digestion, allowing him to eat more food and thus increase the workload in the daily quests.

This was important because using the original EXP scaling, he had needed to wait longer and longer between level-ups due to the slowly decreasing relative value of his daily quest rewards.

Efficient Eating L3 [Active Skill] [Mundane] [Utility] [6 Hour Cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to digest and absorb the nutrients of any food consumed in the next 15 minutes by an additional 45%. The Player will more efficiently convert their calories and protein into muscle, but can also gain weight much more quickly.

Not only had the cooldown dropped by a couple of hours, but his digestion efficiency had risen from 20% to 45%. He no longer suffered brutal stomach-aches after eating sessions, and his muscles had more protein to work with as well.

He did fear at first that all this eating would make him fat, but because of all his hard work and training, that fear hadn't come to pass. His body fat level was the same as three weeks ago, before he obtained his powers. More importantly, his muscles had grown to a point that he could actually notice them when he looked in a mirror. He wasn't a bodybuilder by any means, and even his girlfriend looked more muscular than he did, but he had definitely made great strides in his physical development.

Timothy was taller now too. He had grown a full inch, though that was more a result of a late puberty growth spurt than due to his powers.

After Timothy calmed down, he started accepting the rewards.

The first reward was the one he was most excited for, but he decided to put it off for last. Instead, he started by pondering the second reward.

"This choice isn't as easy as it seems." Timothy muttered to himself. "My HP is 111, so +50 is nearly a 50% increase. It's also a nice visible increase. It's easy to see how big of a gain I'll make. But +1 to any Basic Stat is a huge deal too."

The King Network had never offered him this reward before. After all, the system only showed values on a relative scale of 1-20. Therefore, +1 to a stat was actually like taking 1/20th of a step toward the apex power of the galaxy! It had to reflect a massive amount of strength that he could gain. A single +1 was probably way more impactful than +50 HP, especially as he already knew Ferral and Marigold both had 200+ HP.

"Marigold is already way stronger than me. It wouldn't make sense to try and do what she's already doing, but worse. I don't think the HP boost is a good choice." Timothy reasoned. "But what about obtaining a new Resistance?"

Timothy thought about that option too. Resistances were a huge deal. As a Psion, Ferral had an innate 100% Resistance to suffocation. This meant he could traverse the vacuum of the Void with no threat of asphyxiation, since Psions didn't need to breathe.

But there were all sorts of things one could gain resistance to. What if Timothy rolled somewhat low and 'only' obtained a 25% Fire Resistance? Sure, he wouldn't be immune to fire, but he could stand in sweltering heat a lot more easily, and a burn on his skin would do less damage, not to mention it would hurt less!

A moderate 50% roll could be huge too. Halving the damage taken from an element was a big deal. What if he obtained 50% Physical Resistance? Suddenly an entire arsenal of attacks would barely even make him flinch. Even the full-bodied punch of Emperor Belial might not kill him on the spot! He'd be hurting for sure, but he wouldn't die!

Thus, he had to at least consider the option of choosing a Resistance.

Ultimately though, Timothy shook his head.

"I have a LUK of 10. This is only average. We've confirmed that LUK affects the rolls inside Lootboxes and other such things, which means it would likely affect the roll of my Resistance. Ferral's LUK is actually worse than mine, but Marigold has 15 LUK! So she'd probably have a better time picking this option than me."

With that thought process concluded, Timothy decided to choose to upgrade a basic stat. He hemmed and hawed for a long time.

"Should I try and boost up one of my low-ranking stats? Should I improve on my strengths? Or should I boost something like LUK, which probably won't increase in any way unless I use these meta-means?"

Timothy's highest stat was Endurance at 11. His lowest was a tie between Wisdom and Charisma, at 8.

"My Crocodile Form increases my STR, DEX, CON, and HP by 60% out of water and 120% in water. I still can't use the ability, but that's a huge scaling increase. My Mind of Focus skill raises my INT and WIS by 55%, and I can actually use that skill right now!"

Timothy thought for a long while. In doing so, he made an important discovery.

"How am I being this dense? INT and WIS directly influence my mana. I can use the higher mana to activate stronger skills. I can boost both of them with my Mind of Focus skill. Furthermore, nobody ever complained about being too smart! It's obvious what my choice should be."

Timothy finally made a choice. He picked INT, elevating it from 9 to 10.

The moment Timothy chose the option, he fell into a daze.

Something changed inside Timothy. He couldn't explain what it was. When he looked around, the world felt... a little different. Not hugely different. It wasn't as if he became a super genius, but he noticed the details of the world around him a little bit more than before.

Going from a 9 to a 10 meant he went from slightly below average to right about the average intelligence of other Sentients in the universe. This meant his general 'smarts' increased by one standard deviation, which was more than most people would gain in a lifetime, but it was also hard to describe with words. Timothy couldn't tell if it had any immediate effects on his current brainpower.

What he could tell was that his Mana suddenly jumped from 25 all the way to 45!

"45 Mana! I nearly doubled it with one stat-up! Now that's a big increase right there!"

Timothy turned giddy with excitement, but he quickly recovered his wits. After that, he chose the third reward, which made six completely different options appear before him.

Sage's Insight [Active Skill] [Rare] [Utility] [Mana Cost 10] [Cooldown 1 Hour]

Momentarily maxes out WIS for the sake of improving mental flow. Only useful for acquiring answers to troublesome questions. Cannot give answers to questions beyond the ability of the Player, but can spontaneously improve one's creativity for five seconds, allowing them to reach a conclusion they normally might not otherwise.

Divine Blaze [Active Skill] [Rare] [Enchantment] [Mana Cost 1/min (Sustained)] [Cooldown 0]

Enables the Player to temporarily enchant a melee weapon with a light and flame effect that deals a base 50% additional damage to most enemies, and up to 200% extra damage against enemies weak to Fire or Divine attacks. Enemies resistant to both effects will take reduced damage. Remains active on the enchanted weapon until deactivated or until mana is depleted.

Stalking Shadow [Active Skill] [Rare] [Stealth] [AP Cost 1/hour] [Cooldown 1 Hour]

Enables a Player to blend in with the darkness and become nearly invisible to all enemies lacking Darkvision. Player will also gain Darkvision themselves. Beware though, as light will burn the Player in this state, with extreme light dealing heavy damage and potentially leading to Injured states.

Compounding Returns [Passive Skill] [Rare] [Growth]

When training one's body, this skill will grant +10% additional stat growth so long as the training method does not involve the King Network's internal reward structure. Thus if an action would increase a Player's STR stat by .001, it will increase by .0011 instead. This effect is permanent and affects all stats.

Flow State [Passive Skill] [Rare] [Stats] [Toggle]

A Toggle ability that allows the Player to choose from one of three passive bonuses at any given time. These stats can only be swapped if Player is not currently in battle.

Option 1 [Warrior's Physique]: +1 to STR and DEF.

Option 2 [Wizard's Mind]: +1 to INT and WIS.

Option 3 [Wanderer's Fortitude]: +1 to DEX and END.

Universal Translator [Passive Skill] [Rare] [Utility]

Player gains the ability to communicate with any being as long as they are Living or Unliving. Player can speak and write in any language fluently. Player can understand all languages.

Timothy stared at the six options for a long, long time. He was frozen in shock, completely at a loss with choice paralysis.

"Holy... shit..." Timothy eventually said, though he couldn't seem to get out much more than that. "This... this is the hardest choice of my life!"

The ability to instantly solve any issue that was currently blocking up his brain pathways?

A powerful enchantment ability that would be useful in just about any combat situation?

A stealth ability for avoiding or assassinating strong enemies, sneaking around enemy bases, and otherwise having his way with those who lived in the dark?

Improving all his body's natural gains over time with compounding returns?

An easily toggled option that would boost two of his stats by +1?

Not to mention the ability to understand any goddamn language in the cosmos??

What the hell was he supposed to choose?!

Timothy rubbed his face until his skin turned red. "Bwaaaaahhhhh..."

He didn't even know what noise he made. It was a mixture of elation and despair in tandem. How could he be happy when a choice this difficult was sitting before him now?

"Universal Translator is soooo good." Timothy groaned. "Doesn't it mean I could talk to animals? Bugs? Alien empires? Fish? Birds? It literally says all living and Unliving things. I can't talk to the dead, it seems, but who cares? Fuuuuuuck, it's such a cool power."

Timothy knew from his mom that his dad had been able to understand any language via his Wordsmithing. It didn't seem like much, but it was genuinely such a practical power that would likely come in handy many times in the future. It was hard not to immediately pick it.

But then, what about the Compounding Returns ability? It didn't seem extreme, but it would definitely add up over time as long as he kept lifting weights.

And! There was another reason he was thinking of picking it.

"I have the option with this level up to strengthen two skills. If I pick Compounding Returns, I can immediately make it stronger and start compounding harder, faster. It's a fantastic synergy."

Buuuuuut...

Timothy grimaced. "The active skills are good too. Not as good as the passives, but my bigger problem is I don't have any really good active skills yet. All I do is choose passive skills, time after time. They're great for not having any requirements, but not so great for making use of my AP and MP. I need a really good combat ability..."

Thus, the enchanted blade skill was also looking really tempting to Timothy.

There were simply too many options. Timothy realized this time he would have to take a pause and ask the other Players for their thoughts. Ferral and Fiona, especially, would have important thoughts on the matter. Marigold... less so. She enjoyed leveling up, but Timothy could tell she wasn't taking it nearly as seriously as he, Ferral, and Fiona were.

That left the Store. Since Timothy wasn't going to pick a skill or level up any skills yet, he finally grinned and tapped the Store button.

Suddenly, Timothy felt his eyes being forced shut. A strange sleepiness fell over him, but he wasn't exactly tired. Instead, his mind drifted off, and his consciousness appeared inside a bazaar of some sort, a place where there were dozens of stalls with people standing in front of them.

"Hey kid! You're the first customer! Come on over here and buy some scrolls!" A fat man with a beard shouted.

"No no, don't listen to that guy, come over here! Helmets! I've got lots of helmets!" Another fat man with a beard shouted.

Timothy blinked twice. He looked around, and realized that at every stall, there was the same guy, over and over, seemingly copy-pasted 800 times. He had the same voice, the same face, but different clothes depending on the stall.

"Uh... what is this place?" Timothy asked, bewildered.

"Haha, you hear that, Giuseppe? This kid doesn't know where he is!" One of the fat men shouted.

"I'm telling you Giuseppe, kids these days ain't got no brains!" Another fat man shouted.

Timothy squinted his eyes. "You're all... named... Giuseppe?"

"No kidding, kid! Looks like you're not as empty in the head as we first thought, eh??" The Giuseppe in front of a book shop said.

Timothy spent a few minutes walking around. He was complete baffled by the appearance of this completely random duplicated guy who he'd never seen before. Whoever Giuseppe was, he was everywhere!

"...I'm guessing this is the King Network's Shop?" Timothy eventually asked.

"That's right! Hey kid, come on over! I'll sell you a magnifying glass! Just twenty-five gold coins! What'cha say, huh?" Giuseppe asked. "Helps you read books! You like books, kid? Of course you do! Who doesn't like books??"

"Forget that guy, he doesn't know what he's talking about!" A different Giuseppe said. "Come on over here, kid. I've got swords! Fire swords, ice swords, sword-swords, all kinds of swords! All starting at the low-low price of just 4,592 gold coins! It's a steal you don't wanna miss!"

"Matches! Come and spark some matches!" Another Giuseppe shouted. "Light stuff on fire! Burn buildings down! These are Grade-A matches perfect for the enterprising arsonist lookin' to cause some trouble!"

"Magic staffs! Get yerrr magic staffs!" Yet another Giuseppe shouted. "Staff of Magic Missile! Staff of Necrotic Light! Staff of Dick Destruction! All kinds of staffs for a mage wanting to cause mayhem!!"

Timothy closed his eyes. He was starting to feel dizzy from all the shouting.

"I... wait, can everyone just quiet down for a minute? You're all shouting too loud..."

"Oh, sorry, kid." One of the closest Giuseppes said. He quickly lowered his voice. "Acne poooooowder, come'n git yer acne powder... make a bully break out in zits... just a measly 50 gold..."

Timothy sighed. He opened his eyes, then wandered from one booth to another. Shockingly, though there was a lot of weird and random stuff here, the sheer breadth of the offerings made him stagger on his feet.

The Shop had everything. Literally everything! Even crazy powerful relics that made his eyes pop!

There was just... one small problem.

"I. Um. I don't have any money." Timothy said sheepishly.

All at once, the entire market fell silent.

"What he said?" One of the Giuseppes asked. "Did I hear this kid right? No money?"

"He's a penniless pauper. Mamma mia!" Another Giuseppe lamented. "Comin' in here, wastin' our time."

"Kid if you ain't got no gold, why you even lookin' around?" Another Giuseppe scolded. "Go kill some monsters and make some money! It ain't that hard! The whole bloody system is built around it!"

"Um... do you guys trade items for gold?" Timothy asked.

"You wanna trade? You got stuff to barter, kid?" Giuseppe, the closest one, asked.

"Not a lot..." Timothy admitted. "I have... uh... lemme check..."

Timothy checked his inventory. He found the Common Longsword he'd picked up in his first week.

"How much for this?" Timothy asked.

The nearest Giuseppe squinted his eyes. He looked at the sword, then directed a look of disgust Timothy's way.

"That... thing? Kid, that's junk. I'll give you five gold coins for it, and that's me being nice!"

"F-five?" Timothy asked, ready to burst into tears. "It's a perfectly good sword though. No damage to it, nice and sharp, good quality steel..."

"If it's that good, then why're you sellin' it, eh? You tryin'a pull one over on ol' Giuseppe?" The fat man asked. "Show me something good!"

Timothy sighed. He put the Longsword back into his inventory, then after a moment, he carefully pulled something else out.

"Um... here's 0.15kgs of Trifrancium... is this worth anyth-"

"HOOOOLY MOTHER OF MEDUSA!" Giuseppe screamed, nearly jumping out of his clothes. "What are you tryin'a do, blow the whole god-damned place to kingdom come?! Put that away, you shit-for-brains! That's way too rare for any of us to mess with!"

Timothy nearly burst into tears again. The sword was garbage, the Trifrancium was too rare. Weren't these guys just deliberately making things difficult for him?

"I... um... I guess I'll come back another time..." Timothy said lamely, as he stuffed the Trifrancium back inside his Inventory.

After a few moments, Timothy deactivated the shop and disappeared, leaving the army of clones behind.

"Kids these days!" Giuseppe exclaimed. "I've heard of playing with fire, but that was ridiculous!"

Timothy arrived back in Chrona with a splitting headache.

"Good lord... the Shop is not useful to me now at ALL. Quests don't give me any gold either. How the hell am I supposed to earn money so I can buy stuff?"

He remembered what one of the Giuseppes said.

"Don't tell me the only way to earn gold is by killing monsters? If that's the case then... it looks like my peaceful days of grinding daily quests are over!"

Timothy shook his head helplessly.

"Looks like me and Ferral are going to have to run a dungeon. There's no other way. I should talk to him first though... just in case."

With that, he made his decision, turned on his heel, and started strolling southward, toward the Psion Enclave.

Part 741: Psion's Wish

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

When Timothy arrived at the southern Psion Enclave, he heard the unmistakable sounds of combat coming from underground. The Wordsmithium-reinforced walls would not be harmed by the battles of Psions below the 5th Level, but that didn't mean the reverberations of their attacks couldn't be felt outside.

Timothy walked down the stairs to enter the Enclave, and the sounds grew louder. He eventually approached the fighting arena, and he was stunned to see Ferral fighting against two of his fellow Psions! Not just Learner Dunal, who had been his rival since the very beginning, but also Learner Y'ill.

Dunal was something of a brute compared to his peers. He was a blue-skinned Psion who liked to fight using Primal Psionics, the rawest expression of telekinesis possible. He also casually dabbled in Body Enhancing to improve his overall durability.

But Initiator Y'ill was different. She was a gold-skinned Psion who had a deep hatred of the Plague in her heart. She pursued Body Enhancing to the extreme, not seeking to make herself a muscled lunk, but a regenerating monster similar to Beelzebub. Already, at the 2nd Level, she was able to heal her injuries much faster than her peers. She had also become resistant to basic poisons and toxins, as well as acids and the like.

Thus, when she and Dunal fought together against Ferral, Y'ill chose to play the role of Tank, doing her best to stay between the two males, while Dunal fired powerful blasts of telekinesis at Ferral from afar.

Together, the two of them executed a rudimentary form of teamwork, but it was clear they were not used to fighting together. From the sidelines, their teacher, Aspirator Raavul, watched with disapproving eyes.

[Move in tandem with your ally! Cover Dunal's flank so Ferral cannot get behind him. Dunal, you must oppress Ferral with your numerical advantage. You are allowing him to walk all over you! No, no, not like that! Circle back to the right when Ferral moves left!]

Timothy listened from the side. It was easy to tell that Raavul was frustrated by the poor teamwork between Dunal and Y'ill, though it was also clear to Timothy that they were still easily beating Ferral. The fact he had lasted this long was shocking! No other Psion in Chrona could handle the combined effort of two of their peers.

"When did Ferral become so strong?" Timothy muttered to himself.

Timothy had, of course, been training every day with Ferral and Marigold, but he hadn't been over here to watch Ferral fight the other Psions for a week. And to be fair, it was only one week. Timothy never imagined Ferral had grown so quickly! The last he saw, Ferral had a roughly 50% win/loss ratio against Dunal.

But apparently in Ferral-time, a week was actually an eon. It was clear from Ferral's swift movements and keen analytical eye that he would win way more than half his fights against Dunal now! He was even doing okay against two Psions at the same time!

Eventually, the battle turned sideways when Dunal and Y'ill managed to catch Ferral in a pincer attack. Dunal pinned Ferral down for a brief moment while Y'ill slithered around to Ferral's side and threw a brutal punch to the side of his head, stunning him and knocking him to the floor. With Dunal's help, the two of them managed to pin Ferral to the ground, and Raavul shouted the results.

[Match concluded. Ferral has lost. A total of 1,072 blows were exchanged between both sides. Ferral, you held on longer this time compared to last time. It seems you will be winning these two-pronged engagements in the near future.]

Raavul had technically praised Dunal and Y'ill for beating Ferral, but her voice lacked any sort of pride in them. It was clear she was disappointed in the speed of their growth compared to Ferral. They were being left in the dust by their former weakest peer.

[Well... well fought.] Ferral grunted, as he stood up and clapped his palm first into Dunal's palm, then into Y'ill's. [It appears I need to train even harder.]

Dunal chuckled nervously. [Ah... haha... there is no need to be so aggressive, brother Ferral. We are already barely your match. At this rate...]

His attitude had changed drastically over the last few weeks. In the past, he was the haughtiest Psion present, but these days, his exuberance had dimmed beneath the light of Ferral's glory. Anyone with a brain could see he was envious of Ferral's growth, and slightly depressed due to the lack of comparative speed in his own.

[I'm deeply sorry for that final attack.] Y'ill said to Ferral. [I was at my wit's end trying to come up with a way to beat you. Thus, I chose a cowardly path of attack. It is already shameful enough that two of us are needed to beat one of you.]

[There is no shame in victory.] Ferral said calmly, as he rested a palm on Y'ill's shoulder. [Do you think the Plague sees any value in the concept of shame? If being underhanded ultimately wins us the war of extinction, then that is how we must act. Your final blow was well-struck. Next time, I will see it coming.]

[I imagine you will.] Y'ill conceded.

After exchanging pleasantries with the other two Psions, Ferral levitated over to Timothy.

[Brother Timothy, it's been a while since you came to see my battles. I am apologetic you had to witness my loss.]

"Ferral, I remember when you had no hope of beating Dunal, and now you're apparently dog-walking him and Y'ill both. They barely beat you. Next time, I bet you'll be the one reigning victorious."

Timothy smiled, imagining his compliment would make Ferral happy. However, he was surprised to see that Ferral's expression remained the same.

[Yes.] Ferral said quietly. [I imagine that soon, none of the other Psions here will be my opponent. Perhaps only the Aspirator will be able to challenge me. And then, after that...]

"Hm? You okay, Ferral?" Timothy asked.

Ferral hesitated. It looked like he was about to say something, but at that moment, a female voice spoke.

[Timothy Hiro. Thank you for coming down here. May I exchange a few words with you?]

Timothy looked past Ferral, where he saw the 3rd Level Aspirator Raavul levitating toward them.

"Raavul?" Timothy said. "You need something?"

As the teacher of Chrona's five other Psions, Ferral, Dunal, Y'ill, Lufa, and Tarim, she commanded a certain level of respect. Thus, when she spoke, Timothy immediately turned his attention to her.

[I apologize for interrupting.] Raavul said. [It came to my attention some time ago that Ferral's speed of Psionic growth had rapidly begun to accelerate. Recently, he has completely eclipsed all my other pupils, and is now leading the entire Enclave by a not insignificant margin. If this speed of growth keeps up, he will likely reach the 3rd Level within one to three Chrona-months.]

Timothy blinked. He didn't say anything, because her words pretty much matched his own observations. If anything, he felt she was being a little conservative.

[I am not too familiar with the concept of the 'King Network', but I have spoken to Rebecca and Blinker about it at length.] Raavul explained. [Timothy, I would first like to thank you for granting one of my students access to this ability. Ferral's strength is Chrona's strength. We are loyal to the Wordsmith, and have no interest in rejoining the Volgrim Empire.]

"Oh, uh, Ferral's my best friend, so... no need for thanks or anything." Timothy said, feeling a little awkward due to her praise.

[I understand he is your closest friend.] Raavul said. [That is why I feel that what I am about to say is a little... presumptuous.]

A long moment passed.

[Timothy, I understand that you have the ability to bring additional people into the King Network. Would you be willing to extend that same privilege to the other juniors of my class?]

Raavul finally got around to asking the question that was on her mind.

Timothy froze.

It wasn't that he didn't see it coming, but he hadn't mentally prepared himself for the question.

"Um... I... I mean... it's not that I can't, but there are limited slots available for King Network users..." Timothy said, his tone slightly awkward.

[Slots?] Raavul questioned.

"Yeah. Yes. Um, so basically, when I activated the King Network, I was able to bring four other people into it. I chose Ferral first, then my mom, and then my girlfriend, but now I only have one slot left..."

Timothy quickly explained the general workings of his King Network. Raavul listened silently, her slightly aged eyes contemplating his words.

[I see. And it is impossible to acquire new slots?] She asked.

"No, no, not impossible. But difficult, and rare. I had three chances to add an additional slot over the last two weeks, but I always get offered that choice along with other tangible benefits, so I um... I didn't pick the additional slots. I still only have one available."

Raavul lowered her eyes. [I understand. I was being presumptuous. Please forgive me. In the future, if you should acquire more slots, I would be greatly appreciative if you could extend them toward the other Psions in my class. If you do not wish to, that is naturally your prerogative.]

"No, no, no, it's not that I don't want to, but I should talk it over with the other King Network users first." Timothy quickly explained. "Ask me again in a week or two."

[Of course.] Raavul said, bowing her head. [Ferral, well fought today. Timothy, I take my leave.]

Ravvul turned and left, allowing Timothy and Ferral some time together. Timothy chuckled nervously, then he led his best friend out of the Enclave.

Five minutes passed. The two of them slowly walked in silence toward the western area, where Marigold usually hung out with the other crocodiles.

"I barely managed to hold her off." Timothy eventually said, chuckling quietly. "Don't know if I could pull it off again."

[Hmm?] Ferral grunted, glancing at Timothy from the side of his eyes. [Are you implying with your words that you refused on my account?]

"Well, yeah." Timothy said. "I mean, uh, you know? You know, right? If I gave the other Psions access, you'd lose your competitive edge."

Abruptly, Ferral stopped levitating forward. When he stopped, Timothy also stopped, then turned to look at his friend.

[Timothy. I believe you are misunderstanding something about me.] Ferral said, his tone as calm as always. [Do you have a certain belief in your mind that I am afraid of being weaker than the other Psions?]

"W-well, I mean... no...?" Timothy said, though his reply was more of a question than anything else. "But like, um, weren't you always getting bullied by them?"

[Bullied.] Ferral repeated.

A moment passed. Ferral looked away and tapped his chin.

[Bullied. I see. You believe that the taunts of the others were, in a way, oppressing my psyche and causing me harm. You believe that I was in some sort of distress, and that is why I lagged behind them with my Psionic abilities.]

Timothy was at a loss for words. "You... weren't?"

Ferral folded his hands behind his back and returned to looking at Timothy. [No. To clear up this misunderstanding, I will explain. I lagged behind my peers not because they were 'bullying' me, but because I simply lacked all enthusiasm for the art of Psionic Cultivation. Growing my power through meditation, sitting cross-legged for dozens of time-units in a row, and other such methods; these were excruciatingly boring to me. I fell behind because Psionics are inherently very, very, very slow and boring to progress.]

[As a result,] Ferral continued, [because I was so slow to grow, the others taunted me. But their words had no impact on my speed of growth in either a positive or a negative sense. I do not value the opinions of others highly. Since I cannot control what thoughts they think or how their opinions of me shift, why should their evaluations matter?]

[Therefore, regardless of whether the other Psions gain access to the King Network or not, regardless of whether they lag behind me in their speed of growth or far outpace me, it will not affect my mental state. I now look forward to growing my strength because I enjoy the feeling of watching my numbers go up.]

Timothy blinked. He looked at Ferral in a new light, realizing he had really been overlooking something important about his friend.

"Oh. Ahaha... I don't know why I thought that then." Timothy said, scratching his head awkwardly.

[I do.] Ferral said. [It is because you yourself have been bullied, and you took the words of other people to heart. When people laughed at you or mocked you, you allowed their words to burrow into your brain and influence your thoughts. This is not too surprising, as many others have fallen into similar mental traps. Since being bullied is something that deeply affected you, I hypothesize that you believed the same was true of me.]

Ferral shook his head. [If anything, I have started to grow bored of being the only Psion with access to the King Network. I was going to speak to you regarding giving access to the other Psions. I find that having no opponents my equal has quickly started to bore me, and if this keeps up, my growth will stagnate. Think of all the fun games we've played where after defeating the final boss there is nothing fun left to do. That is the future I will soon be facing.]

Ferral chuckled. [Heh. It seems my teacher decided to speak up and save me the trouble. I owe her a word of thanks. Timothy, I do not want to reach the 3rd Level of Psionics and no longer have any worthy adversaries. I cannot and will not force you to pass the power of the King Network to the other Psions, but I would be deeply appreciative if you did. Slots for the Network are indeed difficult to come by, and there are others in Chrona who are just as deserving of this opportunity, so I would completely understand if you had your eyes on other worthy people you planned to uplift.]

Timothy looked away. He fell silent for a while as he thought about what Ferral had said.

"You really want me to boost the other Psions?" Timothy eventually asked.

[That would be appreciated.] Ferral said.

"But then... who should I boost first? Dunal, maybe, since he's your rival?" Timothy asked. "I only have one slot..."

[No.] Ferral said. [I believe the first Psion you should boost is Aspirator Raavul.]

"What? Your teacher? Why her?" Timothy asked, bewildered.

[At the rate my speed of growth is going, I will soon eclipse Raavul's strength.] Ferral said, neither happy nor sad about this fact. [The dignity of a teacher must not be infringed. How could she continue teaching with any sense of pride if all her students eclipsed her? Thus, she should be the next to obtain access to the King Network. Even if no other Psions gain access, having a strong teacher will improve the growth rate of the rest in equal measure.]

"That's a good point. Alright. I'll add Raavul next, if she's okay with it." Timothy agreed.

[Thank you, Timothy. I am always pleased by the amount of trust that you show me.] Ferral said, clasping his hands together in reverence.

"Man, it's nothing, don't get all sappy on me now!" Timothy laughed.

After laughing the misunderstandings off, Timothy and Ferral resumed pacing towards Marigold's house.

"So, the reason I came to get you was because I reached Level 10!" Timothy explained. "I got offered a CRAZY choice and I just can't make up my mind on what to pick. I thought I'd get everyone's opinions first."

Ferral nodded. [A wise decision. What choices were you offered?]

Timothy quickly explained the six options to Ferral, and Ferral fell deep into thought.

[Hmm. Interesting. Sage's Insight, Divine Blaze, Stalking Shadow, Compounding Returns, Flow State, and Universal Translator. I can understand why you are having trouble deciding. The decision would be a lot easier for me, though.]

"It would?" Timothy asked.

[Yes. I am not too interested in Sage's Insight. It doesn't hold much value for me. Compounding Returns is also not too useful, because the System itself already grants me the ability to grow. Growing marginally faster is not as fun or exciting as gaining an entirely new ability. Divine Blaze means little to me as I do not wield a weapon.]

He glanced at Timothy.

[Thus, that would leave for me the options of Stalking Shadow, Flow State, and Universal Translator. Stalking Shadow would grant me an entirely new stealth ability, which is quite desirable. Flow state is interesting in that it would afford me a certain level of versatility. But in truth, of these, I would pick Universal Translator with little hesitation.]

Timothy was surprised. "You would?"

[Yes. I have told you before that my goal is to someday travel the entire galaxy and witness all its sights. Thus, being able to converse with any creature or species across the galaxy would only make my journey that much more exciting. Being able to comprehend their native languages... this ability is exactly the sort of thing I hope to obtain when I level up. In truth, this is the first time I have felt envious of you.]

Timothy nodded slowly. "I see your point. But in terms of an intergalactic war, just being able to talk to people doesn't sound as useful as making myself stronger."

[I am not arguing that you should choose the Universal Translator option. I am only speaking as to what option I would pick. The two of us are different individuals with our own needs.] Ferral explained. [It is also clear to me that the options provided to you were tailored to your needs. I only have one important suggestion.]

Timothy cocked an eyebrow. "Yeah? And what's that?"

[You should not just think of these skills in the current context, but in the context of how they might change as you level them up.] Ferral stated. [Take the Flow State ability. What if elevating it to Level 2 causes it to give +1.5 or +2 to the stated stats instead of +1? That could be a tremendous boon to your combat capability. And how about the Divine Blaze active skill? Wouldn't it become even more potent an offensive ability than it already is?]

Timothy's face scrunched up in concern. "Shit. I was thinking about that a little bit, but now that you mention it... damn. You're not making this any easier for me, Ferral."

[Apologies. I simply wish for you to consider all the options as deeply as possible. I believe your mother will have deeper insights than me, once you explain the choices to her.]

After a few moments, Ferral moved on to the next topic.

[Timothy, there is another matter I have been wanting to bring up for several rotations. Given the choice dilemma before you now, it seems appropriate to mention.]

"Oh? What now?" Timothy asked.

[It is regarding... the speed of our growth.] Ferral said hesitantly. [My strength level is certainly faster than my peers, but of late, I have noticed a dramatic drop in the speed of my leveling. Due to my innate racial passive, I have to work much, much harder to level up than you. As such, daily quests are giving me negligible benefits of late.]

Timothy nodded. Ferral's 'Multiclass Lifeform' passive meant he received 67% reduced experience, thus showing just how devoted he was to leveling up by the fact he was only two levels behind. Even Marigold was slower to level than him, and she didn't have such an issue with her EXP gains.

Timothy had recently noted his own slowed growth. The Quests offered simply didn't provide enough EXP benefits, and the benefits they did provide were worsening over time in relation to their levels.

[Thus, I believe it is time we consider entering a Dungeon.] Ferral concluded. [I have examined the offerings, and Dungeons give far better rewards than Quests, by a significant margin.]

Right now, only Ferral had unlocked Dungeons, so Timothy wasn't too sure on how they worked. Everyone had agreed not to enter them until they were noticeably stronger.

"Can you tell me how they work?" Timothy asked.

[I am not fully certain myself, but I think I should wait to tell you after we have brought along Marigold and gone to meet your mother. The two of them should hear this information as well.]

"Good point." Timothy grunted. "No sense wasting your breath saying it twice."

[But Timothy.] Ferral argued. [Psions do not need to breathe.]

"Oh haw-haw! You know what I meant!" Timothy cackled, as he lightly punched Ferral's arm.

Both men laughed, with Ferral in an unusually good mood after Timothy agreed to uplift the other Psions.

Soon, Timothy would have to make a decision that would affect the future trajectory of who he was as a Hero... and what sort of powers he would wield.

Part 742: Skill Issue

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Not much time later, Ferral and Timothy strolled over into the western area of Chrona, where they found Marigold hanging out with two of her sisters, the three of them laughing together as Marigold babbled excitedly to the other two.

"-can turn into anything! I only have to think about it, and POOF! Just like magic! It's the greatest!"

Timothy blinked in surprise. Crocodiles, both male and female, typically walked around... essentially naked. It was a normal sight, and nobody thought it was weird. Sometimes, Crocodiles would gear up in armor for combat scenarios or for added protection when training. Bodysuits, leather padding, even metal armor in situations like that.

But at this very moment, Marigold and the other two crocodile girls were all wearing dresses! Marigold wore a cute blue sundress that contrasted with her yellow scales, while her blue-scaled sister wore a T-shirt and jean-shorts combo and the red-scaled girl wore an elegant evening dress. The fact all three were wearing completely different outfits that didn't seem suited for any specific occasion seemed somewhat odd to Timothy.

Right as he was wondering what was going on, Marigold waved her hand toward the red-scaled crocodile, causing her evening dress to abruptly transform into a witch outfit, complete with a black frilly skirt and an oversized pointy hat on her head.

"Amazing! And you just have to think about how it looks to make it happen?" The Red croc-girl asked, twirling around and admiring her new outfit.

"Kyargh! That's right! It's easy-peasy! Oh, hey Timmy! I got a great new ability!!" Marigold spotted Timothy and Ferral approaching out of the corner of her eye. She spun to wave at them, causing her skirt to twirl. The movement seemed intentional. "Do you like my dress? Is it cute?"

Timothy nodded and smiled. "It looks great, Marigold. Um, you said you picked a new ability?"

"Yeah!! It's called 'Clothier's Touch'! It lets me put any outfit on anyone as long as I visualize it first! Isn't that cool?!"

She quickly explained all the details of her new ability to Timothy and Ferral.

Clothier's Touch [Active Skill] [Uncommon] [Equipment] [Mana Cost 0] [Cooldown 0]

Player gains the ability to conjure clothing onto another entity if they consent to the action. Any type of clothing can be summoned, but the clothing will not provide any offensive or defensive value. If the summoned clothing is taken off, it will disintegrate. Clothing summoned by this skill can not be reused for any form of crafting or other purpose and is purely cosmetic.

"See! Isn't it great? I can change clothes on anyone for free with no cooldown or anything! Talk about a useful skill!"

Timothy's smile wavered. It was clear to him that his girlfriend was really excited about her skill, but in reality... wasn't it mostly useless? It seemed to exist for vanity purposes, since it didn't appear the clothing would even be useful for keeping warm in a winter environment... not that she needed help with that anyway. Chrona had a mild temperature all year long.

[The ability doesn't seem to serve a deep purpose.] Ferral said, immediately voicing his opinion bluntly. [However, as a tool for quickly and conveniently changing one's appearance, I find that it might be useful in certain niche scenarios.]

"Oh, you're such a guy!" Marigold laughed. "Only girls would get why this ability is great. What about you, Timmy? Don't you think it's awesome?"

Timothy sighed in his heart, but opted to smile genuinely on the surface. He walked over and kissed Marigold's cheek. "I think the dresses all look really cute."

It wasn't exactly an affirmation to her question, but receiving a compliment clearly made Marigold happy. She giggled at her boyfriend's words, then waved at the other crocodiles. "Okay bye girls! I'll talk later!"

"Bye Marigold!" The other crocs said. "Bye Timothy, bye Ferral!"

Before long, the trio of Players headed back on their way. Timothy thought about asking Marigold what other options she'd been offered, but decided against it. He didn't think the skill she picked was particularly useful, especially since his goal was to become stronger and save humanity someday... but he also didn't think he had the right to dictate what choices she should pick either.

He decided to diplomatically ignore her chosen skill and talk about other things. "So, I have a decision to make between six different skills. I was hoping to get your input along with Ferral's and my mom's."

"Oh really?" Marigold asked. "What skills are they?"

Timothy explained the six skills once again, allowing her to think as they walked.

"Sage's Insight, Divine Blaze, Stalking Shadow, Compounding Returns, Flow State, and Universal Translator. Hmm, a lot of these sound kinda boring. I think the Divine Blaze skill sounds really cool though! Imagine swinging a shiny fiery sword around! Swish-swish, huaah! Oooh!! I could make you a really cool outfit to go along with the sword too!"

Timothy looked down at his current getup. It was simple and plain, a lot like what his father always wore, according to Fiona. A long-sleeved gray turtleneck with some blue jeans. Nothing fancy.

"Uh, I mean, I don't know..." Timothy muttered. "Picking a skill just to look cool?"

Marigold sighed. "Timmy, you're looking at this all wrong. It's not JUST about looking cool. First impressions matter. If you walk around looking dumpy, everyone who sees you the first time is going to think you're dumpy! Then you have to work harder to undo that perception! Wearing a good outfit can change how people see you, AND it can change how you think of yourself too!"

Timothy nodded slowly. "I mean... that does make sense."

"Right?!" Marigold asked excitedly. "Here, I'll make you a new outfit! Watch this!"

"I, I uh, I don't know if that's necess-"

Timothy started to object, only for a window to abruptly pop up in front of his face.

[Player Marigold wants to use her skill Clothier's Touch on you. Do you accept the skill?]

There was also a toggle button to always accept or reject the option, but Timothy didn't click either of those. Instead he simply sighed helplessly before pressing 'yes'.

For a brief instant, all of Timothy's clothes vanished, leaving him completely stark naked. A split-second later, a new set of clothes appeared, but the feeling of being suddenly naked made him jump in alarm.

When Timothy looked down, he wasn't entirely sure what he was wearing. He felt like he was wearing the same clothes as before. Marigold's skill summoned an illusion of clothing onto his body, appearing on top of his clothes. They didn't provide any additional warmth, and didn't seem to have real weight to them.

When he looked at himself, Timothy found that his turtleneck and pants had both turned completely black. There were slim vertical lines of gold going down from the top of his shoulders all the way down to his shoes, which had also changed into tall black boots.

He couldn't entirely make out what he looked like, but based on the stars in Marigold's eyes, she seemed to think the look was an improvement.

"Wow! Look at what basic color coordination can do for you! I'll make sure you're always wearing something fashionable in the future, okay? No need for thanks!"

"Right." Timothy said. "Um. No need for thanks..."

Before long, the trio arrived at the Spynet Sphere, but for once, Fiona wasn't there. Ferral sensed the emptiness inside with his Psionics, then directed everyone over to Jason Hiro's old warehouse.

When they walked over to visit, the group found Fiona and Rebecca inside, going over all Jason's former projects.

"Oh, Timothy. Hello." Rebecca said, smiling perfunctorily at him. "Ferral. Marigold. What a lovely dress."

"Thank you! Kyargh, I made it myself!" Marigold crowed, clearly pleased by the compliment.

Fiona peeked out from behind a shelf and smiled. "Timothy! Did you need something-oh? What's that outfit you're wearing? That's new. It looks good on you!"

Marigold turned her head to give Timothy the smuggest look a girlfriend possibly could. He ended up sighing helplessly. "Marigold picked up a new skill. She helped me, um, change my look."

"Reaaaally?" Fiona asked, lilting her voice teasingly. "It seems your girlfriend knows how to properly dress a man. You should consult her more often!"

After a few more bits of teasing from the girls, Timothy finally pulled himself back together to explain his situation to Fiona.

"So that's the thing, mom. I have these six skills and I can't decide what to choose. All of them seem useful."

Rebecca continued rifling through Jason's artifacts, but she listened as Timothy explained the details.

"Timothy, didn't you upgrade your main skill recently? That Eye skill?"

Timothy looked at Rebecca. She had a box full of doodads in her lap, and she was sitting on a high stool with her feet up so she could hold the box more comfortably.

"Yeah. Yredelemnul's Eye." Timothy said. "Why?"

He checked his character page and looked at the updated description for the skill.

Eye of Yredelemnul L5 [Active Skill] [Unique] [Investigation] [MP Cost 0] [AP Cost 0] [Cooldown 0]

The stolen power of a dark god courses through the Player. The Player can examine objects and entities with the Eye of Yredelemnul to learn more information about them. As the Player strengthens, the information available to them will improve drastically.

Improved: The Eye can now see the basic stats of other entities.

Improved: The Eye can sense the auras of powerful life forms.

Improved: The Eye can better see the details of items than before.

Improved: The Eye can peer into unsealed files and perceive their full contents instantly.

Over the last couple of weeks, whenever Timothy was offered the option to upgrade a skill, he always considered improving the Eye, since it was a potent skill that gained powerful new abilities each time, and it was completely free to activate anytime he wanted.

The Level 4 upgrade had allowed him to pick up way more details of items in the world than before. He had even used it to catalog some of his father's artifacts, but he hadn't gone through all of them yet.

The Level 5 upgrade was especially useful. He could use the skill to read any book instantly, to watch any movie instantly, and essentially to convert any form of hard media into knowledge inside his brain. Unfortunately, outside of his dad's old movie collection, Chrona didn't exactly have a lot of books or other knowledge artifacts lying around, so it wasn't too useful at the moment.

"I think you've been undervaluing that Level 5 upgrade." Rebecca said. "Think about how it might work with the Universal Translator. You could look at Volgrim artifacts and instantly understand them in their entirety. You could study books and other such things from the demons, goblins, orcs, and so on. Unlike the translation devices the Volgrim or Marie Becker use, you'd have the ability to understand all languages innately. That's a pretty big deal."

"I thought so too." Timothy said. "Ferral also thought choosing Universal Translator would be the best option. But we do have another consideration..."

He looked at Ferral, and Ferral took a step forward.

[My speed of leveling has drastically slowed, as of late.] Ferral said, spreading out his hands. [Using only quests provided by the King Network, my ability to level is going to slow more and more. I believe it is time for us to consider entering Dungeons. Since that is the case, we should strongly consider combat-focused skills and items to prepare for our first foray into the unknown.]

Fiona immediately frowned. "Dungeons? That sounds really dangerous! Timothy's never fought anyone in his life! Neither has Marigold. Even you, Ferral, you've only ever sparred with the other Psions. You'd be putting all your lives in danger if you stormed into a Dungeon looking for trouble!"

Fiona was not unfamiliar with Ferral's ability. He had already elaborated on how it worked to her and the others in the past, so she knew the entire point was to enter a dungeon and kill monsters to acquire loot.

But the concept of a dungeon in a video game was very different from entering one in real life. Fighting was dangerous. The winner would likely end up with bruised knuckles at the very least, and plenty of other injuries at the worst. The loser would end up beaten and bloody, if not dead. There were no winners in a fight!

At least, that was the conventional logic. When 'loot' entered the picture, the equation did change...

[It is possible to continue leveling safely so long as we merely spend a long period of time doing daily quests and other such things.] Ferral said. [However, due to increasing EXP requirements per level, there will be increasingly longer intervals between level-ups. Eventually, the time needed to acquire improvements will reach a point where months or years pass with minimal gains. This is especially burdensome for me, as I suffer a huge penalty due to my species characteristics.]

Fiona rubbed her temple as she fell into thought. "I understand what you mean. And it's clear Timothy isn't going to stop doing dangerous things, so the lot of you are probably going to enter Dungeons no matter what, right?"

Timothy slowly nodded. "We have to do this, mom. I want to grow stronger. I want to become a great Hero, like my dad. Humanity is fighting a battle for its extinction out there... and maybe if I level up quickly, I can gain the power to save Chrona as well! If not me, maybe Ferral or Marigold? We don't have the luxury of sitting around on our butts!"

Fiona sighed. "Yes. I get the point. Alright, alright, fine. Going into Dungeons... it's probably a necessity. BUT! I am not letting you walk into a dangerous situation untrained! I expect all of you to engage in real, serious combat training beforehand! If any of you flinch in the face of mortal danger, I won't let you go."

Timothy cocked his head. "I mean, that's a great idea mom, but what kind of training should we do?"

"The Queen Network is the best option, but I don't have time to fix it." Fiona said. "So, it seems I'll have to pester Blinker into training you."

"Aunt Blinker?" Timothy asked. "I mean, she's strong as hell, but why her specifically?"

"Blinker can summon illusions with physical mass. She's very good at it." Fiona explained. "She'll whip you three into shape. I can't go with you into the Dungeons. I'm too busy. So it'll have to be just the three of you."

Timothy tapped his chin. "Unless I can add someone else to the group. Maybe we can bring along another Psion?"

He thought about Ferral's suggestion to add Aspirator Raavul to the King Network. If Timothy did so, then they would have an even stronger Psion than Ferral on their side. Not a bad idea, all things considered.

The problem was, if Ferral already had a 67% EXP reduction, than how much of a reduction would his teacher end up with?

Blinker would probably suffer an EXP and loot reduction of 90% or more if she were added to the King Network. That was the biggest thing holding Timothy back from inviting her. He'd otherwise love to add a fairy powerhouse to the team.

Unfortunately, Dungeons could only be entered by Players at first. Only if the Dungeons broke and erupted into the real world would non-Players like Blinker be able to enter. If that weren't the case, then Blinker could come along and assist the team without even being in the King Network. That was likely the reason why non-Players were banned.

"Alright. So Aunt Blinker can teach us how to fight." Timothy said, nodding. It was a great idea, because he was feeling apprehensive at the thought of entering Dungeons unprepared. No doubt, he wanted to earn loot badly, but he hadn't ever actually gotten in a fight before and he was understandably a little scared.

[I also approve of training with Blinker. I hope she is able to push me to my limits.] Ferral agreed.

"Yeah, sure, sounds fun!" Marigold said. She didn't seem as jazzed about it as the men, but she was plenty interested in her own right. It was only that, unlike Timothy and Ferral, her priorities were less about 'saving the galaxy' and more about having fun with her powers.

"Good." Fiona said.

She turned her attention back to Timothy. "Well, regarding your six skills... I agree with Rebecca. You should pick the Universal Translator power. Not only because of all the previous reasons outlined, but because of the fact it will likely assist you in the Dungeons. What if you end up facing enemies who speak a weird language? You'll be able to understand them, and either negotiate for passage, or at least understand their plans as they shout out to one another. It would provide a tactical advantage."

Timothy nodded. He also frowned a little, because he felt discounting all the other skills wasn't a good idea. "Mom, what would your second choice be?"

"That's simple." She said. "I'd pick Flow State. The ability to swap around two core stats at any point is huge, plus if you upgrade your skills, this one has the most utility. You won't be locking yourself into a combat style for the future. We humans are supposed to be adaptable, after all."

Timothy nodded. It turned out he and his mom were on the same level.

He really wanted to pick Divine Blaze, just to have a solid offensive skill with some utility. However, gaining an entirely new ability with Universal Translator was just too tempting to pass up. He'd surely have other options for offensive skills in the future.

After thinking for a bit, Timothy reached into his Inventory and pulled out two Lock Token items. He only had five of them, but these skills seemed important enough that in the future, he would want to pick them if he had a choice.

Thus, Timothy chose to lock Divine Blaze and Flow State in place. In the future, if he acquired a Rare Lootbox, or if Rare Skills were ever offered, one or both of these two would appear first. That would ensure he could pick the skills he wanted most!

With that, Timothy made his decision. He chose Universal Translator.

Universal Translator [Passive Skill] [Rare] [Utility]

Player gains the ability to communicate with any being as long as they are Living or Unliving. Player can speak and write in any language fluently. Player can understand all languages.

Now, Timothy only had one last choice to make. Which two skills would he upgrade?

Typically, Timothy would upgrade Yredelemnul's Eye, then he would upgrade another skill. But this time, he decided to pass on the Eye.

"I need combat options badly. I only have one good combat skill, but I can't use it yet. Crocodile Form is Level 3 now... what if I got it to Level 4 or even 5? Wouldn't I be able to use it pretty soon? Plus the effect is really good too..."

Timothy looked at Crocodile Form.

Crocodile Form L3 [Active Skill] [Rare] [Transformation] [Holistic] [80 Mana (Sustained) OR 8 AP (Activated)] [No Cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to transform into a half-crocodile, gaining all the upsides and downsides that come along with such a transformation. Their skin will become hardened and scaled, granting bolstered defense. Their muscles will increase in density. They become incredibly adept in water. However, their mind will slow down somewhat. The player can revert back to their original form for free at any time.

Grants +70% STR, DEX, CON, and HP, with doubled improvements when in water. Grants -40% INT and WIS.

He had already leveled it once again in the last two weeks, but he hadn't yet gotten to a point he could use it. As a Rare Skill, it was extremely powerful. He could become a serious fighter even without any other weapons and armor, provided he was able to activate this skill.

"Alright. I'll level up Crocodile Form again, then... you know what? Let's try leveling Universal Translator once, just to see what happens?"

While Timothy messed around with his Player skills, the others patiently waited to see what would happen.

Bloop! Bloop!

Timothy leveled both his skills, and the results appeared a moment later.

Crocodile Form L4 [Active Skill] [Rare] [Transformation] [Holistic] [70 Mana (Sustained) OR 7 AP (Activated)] [No Cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to transform into a half-crocodile, gaining all the upsides and downsides that come along with such a transformation. Their skin will become hardened and scaled, granting bolstered defense. Their muscles will increase in density. They become incredibly adept in water. However, their mind will slow down somewhat. The player can revert back to their original form for free at any time.

Grants +80% STR, DEX, CON, and HP, with doubled improvements when in water. Grants -35% INT and WIS.

Universal Translator L2 [Passive Skill] [Rare] [Utility]

Player gains the ability to communicate with any being as long as they are Living or Unliving. Player can speak and write in any language fluently. Player can understand all languages.

Improved: Player can communicate with the Dead, provided the corpse is less than 24 hours old.

Timothy stared blankly at his new skills for a moment. His expression turned awful.

"Well... I still can't use Crocodile Form yet, but... the improvement to Universal Translator makes me feel kind of gross. I can talk to corpses now..."

"Corpses??" Marigold asked, recoiling in horror. "Eww! Gross! What's the point of doing that?"

Fiona grimaced. "A bit morbid, for sure. But... I suppose if someone were killed, you could ask them... who their killer was?"

"Great. I can play detective and hunt down serial killers." Timothy said, rubbing his face. It was certainly a strong upgrade in terms of utility, but he wasn't sure he'd want to hear murder victims detailing the manner in which they were killed. The thought made his stomach curdle in disgust.

He only had 45 mana, so he was still a ways off from being able to transform into a Crocodile, but he was a lot closer than before!

Now that he'd completed all his level-up tasks, Timothy thought about what he should do next. The answer was obvious.

"I guess we should go look for Aunt Blinker and see if she'll help train us."

"Heck yes! Let's get stronger so we can go into Dungeons!" Marigold chirped, pumping her fist excitedly into the air.

[I concur.] Ferral added, his tone much more neutral. [But shouldn't we add my teacher to the King Network first?]

"No rush on that. Let's see what Blinker has in mind first." Timothy said. "If she's too busy, we might end up asking Raavul to train us instead."

[A fair point.] Ferral replied.

After discussing some other miscellaneous matters, the trio finally left the warehouse...

"We're so close, I can almost taste adventure!" Marigold laughed.

Part 743: Timothy's Transformation

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

On the way over to the southern Psion Enclave, Timothy and the others paused their walking to turn and look to the side. There, they found the only demon presently inside Chrona walking over to them, each hand holding a bag with a cardboard box inside it.

"Master Timothy, I finished preparing today's meal." The demon said.

"Awesome! Thanks a bunch, Paimon!" Timothy said, grinning at the well-dressed demon as he approached.

Paimon had been summoned by Timothy's Pawn Summoning system, but unfortunately, as he was a Pawn, he could not level up or grow any stronger like the other four. Thus, he was unable to train and improve his strength over time.

He wasn't exactly weak, but Paimon was only a Demon Grunt, a Burrower with the ability to manipulate rocks and soil. This meant in the future, he would inevitably fall behind the core three Players, and that caused Paimon to worry he would become irrelevant.

As such, Paimon revealed one of his non-combat skills. It turned out he was a decent chef who had served other higher-ranking demons! His culinary skills weren't on the level of someone like Chef Yamir, but he could whip up decently tasty food sufficient to meet Timothy's daily quest requirements.

At the same time, he also took the initiative to make food for Marigold too, and she was extremely appreciative! He even took her preference for meat into account. Paimon couldn't make food for Ferral, since he didn't need to consume anything, but at least he felt he had a purpose now.

With Paimon's arrival, Timothy and Marigold decided to sit down and have a quick lunch with a simple picnic spread. Since Ferral couldn't eat food, he decided to move on to the Enclave to fetch his teacher and bring her back. Thus, Ferral left the human, crocodile, and demon together.

Paimon sat on Timothy's right side, while Marigold sat across from Timothy. Before long, the three of them started talking and laughing as they recounted their day.

"Master Timothy," Paimon said, "I was speaking to one of the crocodiles earlier and suggested that I could remodel the surroundings of the Swimming Hole. It's quite bland, don't you think? Some more amenities to pass the time, such as slides, could give it a more fun-filled air."

"That's a great idea!" Marigold exclaimed. "It's just a big hole filled with water right now. Could you maybe add lots of little cavities underwater and other stuff like that for hide and seek?"

"Of course." Paimon said, pressing his palm over his heart. "It would be my pleasure."

Timothy took a big bite of a sandwich filled with peppers and steak. Part of the sandwich dripped out the back and landed on the napkins in front of his crossed legs.

"Damn, that's a good sandwich." Timothy mumbled between bites. "Ah right, Paimon, the three of us are thinking of going into a Dungeon for the first time."

"A Dungeon?" Paimon asked. "Don't you think it's a little early for that? It sounds quite dangerous, considering your current strength."

"We won't know until we try." Timothy said. "But um, I was debating whether or not we should take you. I figured I'd ask if you wanted to go."

"Of course I do. Your safety is my primary concern." Paimon said. "As of right now, I'm still at least a little stronger than you. I'm not a pushover, you know."

"Yeah, true, but... I don't have any way to make you stronger..." Timothy said hesitantly. "It would be great if you could level up, but that doesn't seem possible."

"Mmm. Indeed, that is a problem." Paimon muttered. He rubbed his palm beneath his chin. "Master, I have considered another possibility. Can I don equipment from your Inventory?"

Timothy blinked. "I... I don't know. That's a good question. Here, take this."

The young man opened his Inventory. Inside, he saw various good he'd acquired over the last few weeks. He still had the Octopus Armor which he wasn't wearing at the moment, and the common Longsword. He pulled the sword out and handed it over to Paimon.

Paimon took the sword. It didn't dissipate in his hands, so he stood up, backed away a little, and swung it around.

"It seems my conjecture was correct. Master, if you can acquire gear for me, I can become at least a little stronger and join you in Dungeons."

"I don't have much right now though..." Timothy said hesitantly. "All the gear I have is meant for me."

"I should still come along anyway." Paimon said, as he sat down and handed the sword back to Timothy. "Low level earth manipulation might not sound impressive, but I can bury an enemy's foot underground to trip them up, or fling rocks at them with extreme force. I can bring a ceiling down if needed. I won't be much use fighting at the front, especially when Miss Marigold is the sturdiest member of our group, but I can be of great assistance in the rear."

Timothy nodded. "We'll bring you along, then. I can probably get my mom to make us some armor first. Something basic to meet our needs. It's not like the King Network rejects real items."

As Timothy said that, his eyes momentarily glazed over. He blinked twice. "Wait... isn't that the solution? My dad made all sorts of artifacts, and my mom is pretty busy now but we still have machines that can forge stuff. Maybe we can outfit ourselves with proper equipment before we go into a Dungeon to ensure our safety!"

Marigold cocked her head. "Huh! Now that you mention it, that's a great idea. Kinda obvious in hindsight. Good thing you thought of it before we actually went in!"

The trio burst into laughter, realizing they hadn't thought of something so obvious already. In truth, while Timothy did think of the full idea, he wouldn't have done so without Paimon's previous question. This just went to show how they were a lot better off as a group than they were individually.

Some times later, once the food was almost fully consumed, Timothy looked at his Daily Quest. He'd already done all the workout parts of the quest, and with Paimon's big meal, the food part of the quest was also finished too.

[Side Quest] [Repeatable] Train Your Body!

properly, you must complete each type of exercise in one session each. You may not space them out across the day, or across multiple days.

Note: If the Player completes all Quest objectives within 24 hours, all rewards will be doubled. This Quest may be completed once per 24 hour period.

Each time Timothy did his Daily Quest, he would save up the lootboxes for later, while accepting all the other rewards. As such, his ability to digest food had grown around two times stronger than before he obtained the King Network. He could power through the daily quest's food requirements with great ease now, and while he couldn't really tell how much his eyesight had improved, he was able to see the individual leaves on trees a full block away.

He was also a much faster swimmer now, though Marigold's swimming prowess had started at a higher point and she was still far faster than him.

Timothy looked inside his inventory. After acquiring today's daily rewards, there was a stack of 30x Mundane Skill Lootboxes he hadn't opened yet, and a stack of 30x Tier 1 Lootboxes he also hadn't opened.

There was a good reason he hadn't opened them. It was because Umi had told him if he took three identical Lootboxes, he could merge them together into a Lootbox of one tier higher.

He wasn't sure if he wanted 30 common skills or 10 uncommon skills, or 3 rare skills and 1 uncommon skill, or maybe even a single Legendary skill. He had a hard time making that decision.

Marigold was the same as him. Players couldn't exchange their Lootboxes, or else Timothy would immediately hand them all over to his mom to open. Her passive granted +1 item when opening any lootbox, so that was a huge benefit Timothy couldn't reap the benefits for.

"I think it's time to open my lootboxes." Timothy said quietly. "After thinking about it, I've decided to merge all my skill lootboxes, but just use the Tier 1 lootboxes as-is."

Marigold shrugged. "If you think that's a good idea, then go ahead! Kyargh! I kinda just wanna open all mine as-is anyway."

Timothy nodded. Since they were still waiting for Ferral to return, Timothy decided to start cracking the lootboxes open.

When the first Rare Skill Lootbox opened, Timothy was not surprised by what he saw. He had, after all, locked two skills in place from his previous level up options. But in addition to those, there was another...

Divine Blaze [Active Skill] [Rare] [Enchantment] [Mana Cost 1/min (Sustained)] [Cooldown 0]

Enables the Player to temporarily enchant a melee weapon with a light and flame effect that deals a base 50% additional damage to most enemies, and up to 200% extra damage against enemies weak to Fire or Divine attacks. Enemies resistant to both effects will take reduced damage. Remains active on the enchanted weapon until deactivated or until mana is depleted.

Flow State [Passive Skill] [Rare] [Stats] [Toggle]

A Toggle ability that allows the Player to choose from one of three passive bonuses at any given time. These stats can only be swapped if Player is not currently in battle.

Option 1 [Warrior's Physique]: +1 to STR and DEF.

Option 2 [Wizard's Mind]: +1 to INT and WIS.

Option 3 [Wanderer's Fortitude]: +1 to DEX and END.

Transformaster [Active Skill] [Rare] [Toggle] [HP Reduced by 25%]

When this skill is toggled, any skills that transform a part or the entirety of the user's body have 50% reduced activation requirements. This skill will remain active until toggled off. The user will lose 25% of their max HP, which will remain reserved until the skill is toggled off. If Transformaster is toggled off, any skills that do not have their requirements met as a result will also toggle off.

Timothy's eyes nearly popped out of his head. His jaw fell open as he saw not only the previous two Rare skills he had intended to choose, but a new one as well!

"Holy crap!" Timothy exclaimed. "I hit the jackpot! This is exactly the skill I need!!"

He still wanted to choose Flow State, and Divine Blaze was definitely a good skill as well, but this new passive immediately solved a huge problem for him! With it, he could activate Crocodile Form! It also meant if he had a chance to obtain other transformations in the future, he could wield them immediately as well!

"What is it? What'd you get?" Marigold asked.

Timothy grinned. He didn't hesitate and chose the Transformaster skill. A moment later, Timothy activated it, causing his body to feel a little weaker. His maximum HP fell from 111 to 83, but so did the costs for activating Crocodile Form!

[Active Skill] [Rare] [Transformation] [Holistic] [35(70) Mana (Sustained) OR 3(7) AP (Activated)] [No Cooldown]

The Player gains the ability to transform into a half-crocodile, gaining all the upsides and downsides that come along with such a transformation. Their skin will become hardened and scaled, granting bolstered defense. Their muscles will increase in density. They become incredibly adept in water. However, their mind will slow down somewhat. The player can revert back to their original form for free at any time.

Grants +80% STR, DEX, CON, and HP, with doubled improvements when in water. Grants -35% INT and WIS.

With his MP now at 45, he was within the range to activate the skill. As such, instead of answering Marigold, Timothy chose to stand up and enable Crocodile Form.

Timothy's body shone with a brilliant light, causing Marigold and Paimon to wince. Within two seconds, Timothy's figure started changing. His head shifted and deformed. His mouth elongated dramatically. His arms and legs thickened, and scales grew over his body.

He went from a pale-skinned human to a grey-scaled Crocodile, rising another foot in height!

But, just as soon as the transformation finished, Timothy lost his balance.

"Guhh, guhh!!"

Timothy tried to cry out in warning, but his face felt so heavy that he could barely open his mouth. At the same, time, the way his snout 'felt' was wrong, and made him start choking. All that weight at the front of his body made him lose his balance and he fell forward onto his stomach, causing his snout and the front-most part of his jaw to painfully clap against the ground.

"Aaaugh! Aaah, huugu, guuh!"

Timothy growled out some sounds that did not come out as words. He had narrowly avoided falling on top of his girlfriend, but suffice it to say, his first transformation into a Crocodile was... anything but elegant.

Marigold got up, then walked over to try and help Timothy up. "Timmy, are you okay? Did you bite your tongue? Here, help me get him up, Paimon!"

The two of them worked together, demon and Crocodile, and helped Timothy stand up.

Timothy tried to speak, but he could not properly make his huge, unwieldy mouth work properly. "Guhh, shlaaaw waaah..."

Timothy felt so embarrassed that he wanted to crawl in a hole and die. He'd finally been able to transform into the same species as his girlfriend, but he felt like a complete loser in front of her too. He wished he'd transformed in private first so he hadn't embarrassed himself.

Luckily, Marigold seemed to understand what the problem was. "I don't know how it is for you humans, but we crocs don't talk with lips and tongue. We talk with the back of our throats! You'll probably need to practice a bit to talk right, I guess..."

Marigold had never really thought about what a huge difference it would be to transform into a completely different species. Now that she pondered the matter, would she look like a dummy if she obtained a human transformation skill? Would she drool all over herself, trying to get her lips working properly?

Timothy opened and closed his mouth with great effort. To him, it felt as if he had to bend his jawbone in half just to open his mouth a few inches. It wasn't exactly painful, but it was extremely uncomfortable, like nails on a chalkboard. It was almost as if he could feel the bones in his jaw scraping against each other. On top of that, his mouth felt extremely moist, as if he had much more saliva sloshing around than usual.

And his tongue! Timothy's long tongue felt completely alien in his mouth. It lacked the sensitivity and the sense of taste he was used to. His eyesight felt duller, and even his mind seemed to be working much more slowly than usual. That was likely due to the reduction to his INT and WIS stats.

Timothy blinked his eyes heavily. It was only now, after he obtained the ability he'd been hoping to get for such a long time, that he realized transformations were not what they were cracked up to be.

Even though Marigold didn't seem thrilled about his clumsiness, it was clear she really liked his new transformation!

But Timothy didn't. He'd only been in his new body for one minute and he already hated it.

How could he tell Marigold he didn't like being a crocodile? Simply looking at her face, she was clearly excited to see him in this new form. Timothy also felt that after working so hard and putting so many levels into becoming a Crocodile, it wouldn't make any sense for him to immediately shelve it. He's already leveled it up three times!

If only he knew how much he'd hate being a crocodile, he would have avoided it from the very start. To him, this was body horror, plain and simple, like waking up in the body of a monster. It was utterly dreadful.

"Well? How is it?" Marigold asked. "How do you like being a crocodile?"

Timothy's eyes felt heavy.

"Muuhh, mulnn phlahhh..."

His tongue fell out of his mouth, and he had the damnedest time trying to get it back in. No matter how Timothy tried, the stupid tongue would not listen to his commands. He eventually had to grab it with his claws and push it back inside.

After seeing Timothy struggle for five long minutes, the excitement dimmed inside Marigold's eyes. She wasn't blind, and she wasn't stupid. She could tell he was really struggling.

"Hey... you can turn back into a human if you want..." Marigold said hesitantly. "It's okay if becoming a crocodile isn't working out for you. I already told you I like you just the way you are."

Timothy heaved a sigh. He had tried to sound enthusiastic, but even Marigold could tell he was absolutely awful at being a crocodile.

After another minute of deliberation, Timothy finally deactivated the skill. He transformed back into his original self and sagged to his knees. He felt exhausted. The pressure on the base of his skull from how huge his snout was had left him with phantom pain and a neck kink he couldn't get out.

"Uhh... I'm sorry... Marigold." Timothy said tiredly. "That felt... really weird. I'll try practicing some more in my free time."

"You don't have to force yourself." Marigold said, her tone quiet. "It's fine."

She sounded a little defeated, which made Timothy feel awful. He felt as if he had tried to engage with someone regarding their favorite hobby, only to fumble the interaction so badly that both participants lost all their enthusiasm. It was a feeling one could only understand if they had ever screwed up a social interaction in such a broadly pathetic manner.

Marigold sat back down to finish the last bit of her food. She smiled at Paimon. "Thanks Paimon. The meal was really delicious."

Paimon smiled back. "Anything to make you happy, Miss Marigold."

Timothy dazedly stared at his inventory. The newest Rare skill he'd acquired, along with the Crocodile Form L4 skill, seemed to be looking back at him mockingly. He'd spent quite a lot of effort to acquire and upgrade these skills, but now he felt he'd wasted his time. He had plenty of other skills he could have leveled up in that same time, but he'd passed on them to focus on the skill he thought would be most badass and make his girlfriend happy.

Now he felt like an idiot.

The worst part wasn't even the disappointment or the lost time and energy. It was that he really did not enjoy the feeling of being a Crocodile. Every part of the experience felt like an alien had infected his body and taken over his consciousness. He simply didn't want to become a Crocodile ever again, not even to practice and try to make it work.

If this was how bad the Crocodile Form made him feel, then what about the Octopus Form?

Timothy looked up the Octopus Armor.

Octopus Armor [Item] [Uncommon] [Torso] [Balanced]

A versatile set of armor that grants the Player the ability to camouflage themselves when underwater, blending in with their surroundings. When camouflaged, the Player effectively doubles their remaining oxygen, but cannot move. The Player also passively heals 1% of their Max HP every minute underwater when wearing this armor.

Comes with Active Skill: Octopus Form [Active Skill] [Uncommon] [Transformation] [Offense] [5(10) Mana (Sustained) OR 1(1) AP (Activated)] [No Cooldown]

Octopus Form sprouts six tentacles out of the Player's back. It allows the user to wield multiple additional weapons, up to six 1H weapons or three 2H weapons, in addition to the Player's base two limbs. The Octopus Tentacles cannot be controlled by the player and are fully automated. The player can revert back to their original form for free at any time.

Timothy thought for a moment. He realized the Octopus Form was nowhere near as body-changing as the Crocodile Form. With that in mind, and since he still had 10 MP left, Timothy gritted his teeth and decided to test the form out.

A second later, Timothy's body shone with another brilliant light. All of a sudden, six long octopus tentacles emerged from his back.

Even though Timothy had already been able to activate the Octopus Form for the last couple of weeks, ever since his near-death scare at the swimming hole, he'd avoided touching the armor. Now that he was trying out the transformation, he realized it actually... felt pretty good!

It wasn't bad at all!

The octopus limbs certainly felt a little weird, and the idea that six new 'arms' were sticking out of his back made him a little uncomfortable, but compared to the Crocodile Form, the Octopus Form was way more manageable!

Timothy stood up. He nearly fell backward from the extra weight, but two of the tentacles helpfully pressed against the ground to stabilize his movements. Timothy started walking around, threw a few punches, and experimented with lashing out with one of the tentacles at a time, then two, then three. He wasn't able to control them the same way he would his actual arms, but if he wanted to do something, the tentacles would follow his orders as if he were a movie director commanding his subordinates to execute tasks.

By the time Ferral was on his way back, Timothy had already started adapting to the Octopus Form. He felt that, in hindsight, this transformation was insanely strong. It basically had no drawbacks outside of looking a little weird, and he felt like his threat level had increased substantially!

"Wow, you're pretty good with those!" Marigold said encouragingly.

Even though she was saddened by Timothy's obvious rejection of the Crocodile Form, the fact he had adapted so easily to the Octopus Form hinted that maybe he'd be able to try again someday and actually do really well as a crocodile! It gave her hope, and she latched onto that with fervent desire.

While Timothy experimented, Ferral levitated toward them, his teacher Raavul following closely behind. Seeing Timothy in his transformation, Ferral glanced at him.

[Are you having fun?] Ferral questioned.

"More than I was just a bit ago." Timothy said. "Ah, Raavul. You're here. Did Ferral explain why he wanted you to come over here?"

Raavul bowed her head and blinked all of her eyes in unison.

[Yes. It seems that you wish to make me a Player in your King Network. This was not what I had in mind when I asked you before... but Ferral managed to convince me this was the right way to do things.]

[A teacher's dignity must not be infringed.] Ferral said, repeating the same words he'd said to Timothy previously. [If things had shaken out properly, you should have been the first Volgrim Timothy invited. As things are now, being the second is not such a bad result. Hopefully, we will be able to add the others as Players next, once Timothy earns more slots.]

Timothy nodded. "That's the plan. So, Raavul, are you ready to join us?"

The teacher of the Psions slowly nodded her head.

[In truth, I have little interest in this system of yours. However, I cannot deny the power and benefits it has brought Ferral. If we are to prevent the collapse of Chrona someday, spatial Psionic power may end up becoming a core component of stabilizing our home.]

She didn't seem excited to become a Player, but Timothy sensed she would at least take the system seriously. As such, he opened his player sheet and looked at the last available Slot before tapping it with his finger.

"Welcome to the King Network, Raavul."

[AN ADMINISTRATOR IS INVITING YOU TO THE KING NETWORK.]

[IF YOU ACCEPT THIS REQUEST, YOU WILL BECOME A PLAYER.]

[WILL YOU ACCEPT THE FRIEND REQUEST AND JOIN TIMOTHY HIRO'S PARTY?]

[YES | NO]

After a moment's hesitation, Raavul pressed her finger against the Yes option.

With that, she became the fifth member of the King Network.

Part 744: Good Gambling

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Raavul's emergence as a Player did not end up causing much fanfare. Only the other Players present knew it would happen, and they were all close friends with one another, barring the semi-outsider, Paimon. Even though he had spent a few weeks mingling with the others, the Demon Grunt wasn't well-known in Chrona beyond his curious identity as the sole demon in the folded space.

Raavul's body glowed with a faint light for several seconds. After she entered the King Network, Timothy and Ferral took some time to introduce her to how the game worked. As a Psion, the concept of 'video games' was entirely alien to her. She was not like Ferral, who played video games to alleviate his boredom. Raavul was a devoted cultivator whose heart knew only the love of growing stronger through diligent meditation upon her ancestor's insights.

Thus, when Raavul finally opened up her Character sheet for the first time, she had absolutely no idea what anything meant.

The biggest thing Timothy noticed was that despite an entire level of Psionic power separating Ferral and his teacher, Raavul's stats were not impressively better than his. To be precise, Raavul's stats in total might have had a point or two more than Ferral, but she was not holistically superior to him in all categories. In fact, Ferral had a much bigger HP pool, a little more STR, and so on. Her biggest gains were in her available Action Points and Psionic Points.

In the King Network, adding even a single primary stat point meant the other entity had taken a step up toward the apex of observable power in the universe. There were only 20 points at most, so in theory the strongest life forms in the universe were a 20 and the weakest were a 1.

Despite this, to only be one or two points stronger than Ferral, Raavul didn't seem that much more impressive than her student.

That was until Timothy noticed the huge gap in skills. She started out with way more skills than Ferral, and on top of that, she even possessed two Psionic Disciplines, namely Precision Psionics and Investigative Psionics.

"Wait, Raavul is already level 10?" Timothy asked doubtfully. "Every other player started at Level 1. Why not her, Umi?"

A speck of light flickered into existence beside Timothy. When the AI spoke, naturally, only he could hear her.

"The King Network is a living system. It will, on occasion, auto-balance itself. It is designed primarily for low-ranking Sentients to amass strength and climbs the ranks of power. Adding high-ranking Sentients to the King Network is not advised. The results will end in disappointment."

Timothy's expression darkened. Raavul ultimately ended up in a similar position to Ferral, with reduced EXP and loot gains. If he really were to invite Blinker, she might start out at Level 50, or perhaps even higher. That would mean she would miss out on the easiest levels to increase and would need to spend ages obtaining meager gains.

Even now, he was strongly reconsidering whether or not he should invite the other Psions to the system after all. Crocodiles were a lot more plentiful in Chrona, and they would get more out of the system too.

There were also people like Rebecca. Was she considered an advanced life form? Would she receive massive debuffs and penalties too? Timothy wasn't sure, and it was the uncertainty that bugged him.

[Teacher Raavul, tell us about the Skills you've acquired.] Ferral said. [Open up your inventory, then write down the words shown under all the skills.]

Raavul, despite being older and wiser than Ferral, was a complete blank slate when it came to understanding anything video game related. She reluctantly became the student, obeying his commands as she whipped out ten different pens and paper pads, rapidly writing down all the details of her character. Most of the skills were self explanatory, but a few were extremely interesting.

Psionic Teacher [Active Skill] [Common] [Growth] [AP X-Cost] [PP X-Cost]

A skill designed for entities who may not be exceptionally strong themselves, but who possess the gift of imparting wisdom and insights upon others. The Player may pay any amount of AP or PP or both to initiate a Lecture. The Player cannot begin regenerating their lost resources until the Lecture is completed.

Lecture: The Player may impart their knowledge of Psionics or other owned Skills and abilities onto other Players. This knowledge is less profound and less powerful than the Player's existing abilities, but as Psionic Teacher improves, so do the quality of the skills it can impart.

Note: The amount of AP and/or PP spent to initiate a Lecture affects the length of the Lecture and the quality of the information taught. Greater costs allow for greater rewards, but also incur greater time costs as well.

Note: The Player who initiates this skill can only pass down 25% of their maximum capability with any skills to other Players. Additionally, this skill is also 25% less effective on non-Players than it already is on Players.

Note: When choosing to level this skill, the Player can choose to improve its skill-level, or improve its rarity. Both can be improved separately, bypassing the usual limit of one skill improvement per level-up.

Timothy's jaw dropped. When he read the description for Raavul's main active ability, he felt like he was going insane.

Even though her ability seemingly only started as a Common rarity, which was obviously the worst it could be, he could only imagine just how frightening the ability would become as she leveled it up. It was a huge pity she'd lost out on ten initial levels... those would have given Raavul a huge advantage once she caught up to the other Players.

"My god, Raavul!" Timothy exclaimed. "This ability is borderline useless now, but if you pump lots of skill points into it, it's going to blow everyone else's skills out of the water!! You struck gold!"

Raavul did not appear as impressed. Or rather, it would be more accurate to say she didn't understand how the skill worked at all.

[I can roughly grasp the words used in this text, but I feel as if they are hidden behind many abstractions I am unfamiliar with.] Raavul said. [What are 'resources'? How do I lose them? Is losing my resources bad?]

[Teacher, Resources are your Action Points and Psionic Points.] Ferral explained. [They allow you to activate your Skills. They also generally regenerate over time. For example, I regenerate 1% of my lost Psionic Points every minute. According to your skill, if you lecture for one standard time unit, the AP you spend would not begin regenerating until the lecture is complete.]

Raavul nodded, but it was clear she was still lost. She reminded Timothy of an old grandma trying to understand Mario or Pokemon for the first time.

While Ferral helpfully took his time explaining things to Raavul, Timothy looked at the other information she had written down.

Precision Psionics (Novice) [Passive Skill] [Class]

Precision Psionics focuses not on overwhelming power, but on extremely fine-tuned control of a Psion's telekinesis and other senses. Psions specializing in this branch of Psionics may eventually reach a point where they can rearrange atoms and nuclei at will. Pairs well with Body Manipulation and Creation Psionics.

This skill does not currently have any effect. It is merely a representation of knowledge the Player has amassed outside of the King Network. If the Player ranks this skill up, their knowledge of this information will expand proportionately and immediately. If the Player acquires knowledge outside the King Network, this skill can also rank up automatically.

Spatial Psionics (Amateur) [Passive Skill] [Class]

Spatial Psionics focuses on manipulating the Void in various ways. At the lowest level, it can allow one to traverse greater and greater distances with ease or attack their foes through the tearing of space. At the highest levels, a Psion can even construct dimensions within reality, folded spaces capable of holding objects and allowing life to flourish. This branch of Psionics pairs well with Temporal Psionics and Creation Psionics.

This skill does not currently have any effect. It is merely a representation of knowledge the Player has amassed outside of the King Network. If the Player ranks this skill up, their knowledge of this information will expand proportionately and immediately. If the Player acquires knowledge outside the King Network, this skill can also rank up automatically.

Timothy's expression turned grim. Based on the information presented by these two skills, it seemed Raavul had a big headstart on her students in that she had already acquired two Psionic Specializations, but now she would run into the problem of being too spoiled for choice.

Every single one of her major skills was a contender for being ranked up. That meant the two skill-ups she acquired sometimes through leveling would need to be pondered carefully.

On the other hand, the fact that she could rank up her Specializations just by studying and meditating meant they weren't completely essential to level up. But if Raavul truly intended to reach a level someday where she could prevent Chrona from collapsing through her own power, then she would need to advance her specializations even faster than her Teacher skill.

Timothy looked over even more of his skills, then sighed deeply.

Her skills were formidable. Of all the Players currently active, Raavul was the strongest. It was true she was not the most powerful individual in the sense of first and second place being separated by a vast chasm, but as long as she was diligent with her leveling, she would likely never be surpassed by Ferral, let alone the other Psions.

With all of this in mind, Timothy eventually turned his attention away from Raavul's Character sheet. As a Psion and a Player, Ferral was a better choice to educate her. Timothy had his own concerns.

While Raavul and the others continued to chat, Timothy looked at his inventory. He still had two Rare Skill Lootboxes to open, and an Uncommon Lootbox as well.

When he opened the two Rare boxes, he was presented with many powerful and tempting skills. But ultimately, he decided to stick with his original plan. He chose the skills of Divine Blaze and Flow State which he had previously locked, finally giving himself a proper fighting ability, as well as a way to boost his stats.

Next time I level up, if I get offered skill rank-ups, I'm picking these two skills. I need to see how the skills change. While I don't like using Crocodile Form, it did receive huge improvements each time I leveled it up. And the Octopus Armor is pretty sick too.

The fact it was slimy and it looked really stupid didn't change the fact that it was an easy to use and extremely practical ability. Timothy even started thinking about what would happen if he equipped six 1-handed swords in each tentacle's grasp. Would Divine Blaze light them all on fire? Would the cost increase per sword equipped? What about wielding other weapons?

At the moment, Timothy only had the one common Longsword. But... wasn't forging swords actually relatively easy? He could probably ask his mom to create a whole batch of decent starter weapons. Not to mention his dad had left guns and other such weapons lying around.

Doesn't have to just be swords either. Timothy thought. Maces, axes, daggers, polearms... there's a lot of variety in what weapons are available, come to think of it.

Timothy frowned. I don't actually know how adept at combat these external arms are. They move mostly on autopilot, only taking general mental commands from me. Are they as good at combat as I am? Are they better at combat than me? Do they come with smart AI inside? Can they improve? I should find out when I'm training with Blinker later!

If they're only as good at shooting guns or swinging swords around as I am, then I'm going to need to do a LOT of training to become even decently competent. On the other hand, if they're way better at combat than me, that would be great, but it would also suck if they didn't get any better as I improved my own skills.

Timothy continued to think and ponder for a while before he turned his attention back to the final Skill Lootbox. The final one was an Uncommon box, so when he opened it, it presented him with three new skills. However, one of them jumped out at him and shook him to his core.

Skillforging [Active Skill] [Uncommon (Unique)] [Upgrading] [Mana Cost 0] [AP Cost 0] [Cooldown 365 Days]

As a descendant of one capable of shaping reality, you can obtain the ability to reforge your own reality. Once per year, from the Player's temporal frame of reference, the Player may activate this skill to rank up any other skill permanently. Skillforging may not be used to rank up itself. Skillforging may not be used to improve the skills of other Players.

After activation, this skill may not be used again until one Terran year has passed. If the Player forgets to activate this skill after is is ready, no matter how much time passes, once activated the skill still requires a one-year cooldown.

Timothy's eyes widened. His pupils shrunk. He stared, slack-jawed, at the incredible skill before him. He couldn't even believe what he was seeing.

This was a skill that guaranteed him a permanent way of ranking up all his skills. Even when level-ups started slowing to a trickle, he would be guaranteed the ability to upgrade any of his skills once per year!

Ranking up skills was a big deal. Between the Eye of Yredelemnul obtaining entirely new powers and Crocodile Form's strengths becoming more pronounced while its weaknesses faded away, every rank up made a huge difference in the power of a skill.

The other two options were good in their own ways, but Timothy picked Skillforging without hesitation. Immediately, he started thinking about how he could either improve its rarity or rank it up. Once it was improved, surely the cooldown would reduce, or it would gain new effects! Spending rank-up points on a skill that ranked up other skills might seem a little absurd, but what if he could get it to the point where it allowed him to rank up a skill every few months, or every month, or god forbid every week or two?!

Wouldn't that be absurd?!

After thinking for a few moments, Timothy decided to activate Skillforging. He triggered it to improve his newly acquired Flow State Skill.

Flow State (L2) [Passive Skill] [Rare] [Stats] [Toggle]

A Toggle ability that allows the Player to choose from one of three passive bonuses at any given time. These stats can only be swapped if Player is not currently in battle.

Option 1 [Warrior's Physique]: +1.25 to STR and DEF.

Option 2 [Wizard's Mind]: +1.25 to INT and WIS.

Option 3 [Wanderer's Fortitude]: +1.25 to DEX and END.

Timothy improved Flow State, causing it to improve stats by 1.25, up from 1. This meant it had gained a 25% improvement!

Timothy immediately toggled Flow State, but no matter which option he chose, his stats only increased by 1 point.

Frowning, Timothy decided to question Umi about the matter.

"Umi, why can't my stats rise by more than 1? Isn't this upgrade... a little useless?"

A speck of light flickered into existence before Timothy's eyes.

"The stat page is not completely accurate in the numbers it depicts. Stats are always rounded down if they have not reached the level of becoming a whole number. A stat of 14 could mean 14.01, or it could mean 14.99. Thus, when you see someone with a stat of a certain numerical level, you should always assume they are 'at least' that strong. This also means reaching a stat value of 20 is essentially impossible. Once you scan enough Entities, you will see increasingly fewer Sentients with stat values reaching the apex of power in the universe."

"Additionally," Umi continued, "True stat values can have tens or even hundreds of digits. The rounded values you see on the stat page should always be taken as approximations."

Timothy nodded. "I see. Is there any way for me to see the exact stat values of myself and other entities?"

"You do not possess this ability at the present time." Umi replied blandly.

"Does that mean I could acquire it in the future?" Timothy asked, his eyes lighting up.

"You do not possess this ability at the present time." Umi repeated.

Timothy's face fell. He decided not to continue with his line of questioning. Umi vanished once again, and Timothy smiled in satisfaction.

It's still a 25% improvement. I bet Flow State will become extremely useful in the future. I shouldn't underestimate it. Sigh! I have too many skills that need to be leveled up! A Player's life is never dull.

After he finally acquired his new Skills, Timothy took a good long look at the thirty Tier 1 Lootboxes he had yet to open.

I could level all these boxes up to the next tier, but right now I really could use quantity over quality. Hmm. How about this... I'll turn 9 boxes into three Tier 2 items, and leave the remaining 21 as Tier 1. That should do.

Timothy wasn't just lacking a good quantity of basic stuff to work with; he also wanted to test and see what sort of stuff he could get.

As such, Timothy started opening basic Lootboxes one after the other. Each time, a basic item would appear, a skill, or at least materials he could use for crafting.

"Bandages, looks like they can heal an injured state five minutes after being applied. Ten Lightstones to help see in the dark. Oh, a new dagger! It's nothing special, but it's good to have more weapons for my Octopus Form..."

As Timothy pulled out items, he started chatting with Paimon and Marigold, soliciting their opinions.

"What good is half a ton of steel going to do for you?" Marigold asked. "Just pick the poisoned arrows."

"I disagree." Paimon interjected. "The description says the arrows are only effective on weak lifeforms. The steel might be useful for your mother's crafting skills."

Timothy nodded. "I think you're right, Paimon. I'll pick the steel."

When Timothy finished opening all 21 of the Tier 1 Lootboxes, he looked at his gains. One thing he had learned was that 'Tier 1' did not mean 'only Common' items. It seemed to mean 'mostly Common Items, along with weaker Uncommon items'. Unlike the Skill Lootboxes which only gave skills, Tiered Lootboxes primarily gave items, but they did also occasionally offer skills. Some of the stuff he obtained included...

Tin Compass [Item] [Common] [Utility]

Points north. Always. Even underground, underwater, and in dimensions where north does not conventionally exist. In those cases, it points toward the nearest approximation of north, which is sometimes unsettling. Does not interact with any navigation skills. Cannot be improved further. It simply points north.

Pauper's Fortune [Passive Skill] [Common] [Loot] [No Cost]

Any time the Player would receive an outcome that results in zero gold, zero loot, and zero experience, such as a failed crafting attempt, a missed skill check, or a creature that drops nothing, they instead receive a single copper coin from an indeterminate source. The coin glows with a faint warm light.

Damp Towel [Item] [Common] [Accessory] [Utility]

A standard cotton towel that is perpetually moist. Grants +5% Fire Resistance when draped over the head and reduces the negative effects of arid environments. Will never mold, and can be used as a slight thirst quencher, though the liquid contained within tastes somewhat musky.

Popping Pebble [Active Skill] [Common] [Ranged] [Distraction] [1 MP] [No Cooldown]

Conjures a small, smooth stone in the Player's hand which can be thrown or fired from a suitable projectile launcher. Deals very little damage. Explodes in a flash of light on impact while also generating an audible popping noise. Useful for grabbing the attention of other entities.

Quick Calcs [Passive Skill] [Common] [Utility] [Mental]

Unlocks a virtual calculator in the Player's HUD. The Player can instantly calculate things such as trajectories, vendor discounts, and tax rates without having to stop and think. Especially useful for Biological Inferiors who are extremely slow of mind and need assistance doing basic tasks.

Obtaining some extra skills was nice, and while nothing was too incredible, and he obtained a lot more basic crafting materials than actual useful devices, he was still quite happy to give himself a decent deal of diversity. Even though it seemed the King Network used Gold Coins for its internal transactions, he thought being able to acquire Copper Coins instead of nothing whatsoever was at least slightly useful.

All that was left now were the three Tier 2 Lootboxes.

Timothy opened them up, and with help from the others, he started choosing his loot.

Double Jump [Active Skill] [Uncommon] [Movement] [1 MP] [Cooldown 0]

By briefly condensing mana under the soles of their feet, the Player can kick off thin air to perform a second jump mid-flight. Useful for a variety of purposes. With good timing, can be used to save a Player from fall damage. Can only be used once per 'jump instance'.

Sword of Justice [Item] [Common (Growth)] [1 Handed Sword] [Soulbound]

A blade once wielded by an ancient figure of legend. Starts out weak, but whenever the Player kills an enemy designated 'evil', the sword strengthens slightly. If the player ever kills an innocent, the sword shatters, and the player is inflicted with -1 to all stats for 24 hours according to the player's frame of reference.

The blade increases its rarity and power for every 1000 evildoers killed. The sword gains new effects for every 10,000 evildoers killed. The sword will grow stronger when evildoers are killed even if it is not equipped. Unequipping the sword will not prevent it from breaking and inflicting its curse if the Player kills an innocent.

While the Sword of Justice is Soulbound, all sources of great evil will glow an appropriate shade of red in the Player's vision.

Desert Striders [Item] [Uncommon] [Footwear] [Mobility]

Loose-fitting, highly breathable pants favored by deep-dune nomads. Reduces all movement speed penalties associated with walking through difficult terrain such as deep sand, thick mud, or heavy snow by 50%. Zero defensive benefits.

With these Lootbox rewards, Timothy had obtained additional useful items, and even a skill he thought was neat as heck.

Timothy looked at his MP. He'd already regenerated a small chunk of it in the thirty minutes spent browsing the contents of all these Lootboxes, so he stood up, readied himself, and jumped in the air.

"Hup!"

Timothy leaped upward, and then, through some unknown force of magic, he jumped again! He double-jumped as if stepping on an unseen platform, doubling his original jump height!

...Only for the new ability to make him cry out in alarm as his body itself was unaccustomed to such a maneuver. Timothy flailed his arms and fell forward, slamming onto his face and chest.

"Oof!! Aaa... oww..." Timothy groaned.

It was a lot like trying to jump down a flight of stairs. He simply wasn't prepared to 'fall' that far, and as such, he nearly broke a rib when he landed.

"Oh no, are you okay Timmy?!" Marigold asked, quickly jumping over to his side.

She helped him up, as did Paimon. Timothy grimaced, feeling like an idiot for the umpteenth time that day.

"I'm fine. Just wasn't prepared for the return to the ground. The skill is really cool, but I'm gonna need to practice with it."

At that moment, a haughty voice bellowed. "Darn right you are, young man! You're gonna need lots of training, all of you! That's why I've come to whip your pale butts into shape!"

Timothy and the others jerked their heads to look in the same direction, where they saw Monster Queen Blinker levitating downward, her arms crossed and her back upright, like a figure of legend descending from on high.

"I hear you guys are planning to go into a Dungeon, eh? Well not BEFORE I take you to the cleaners and make sure you know how to properly fight!"

Ferral cocked his head. [What does cleaning have to do with training our combat skills?]

"It's called that because if you don't perform well, I'll be cleaning your clock!" Blinker shot back.

Ferral looked at Timothy.

[Non-Volgrim figures of speech truly confound me.]

"It's best not to think too deeply about it." Timothy replied consolingly.

Their days of hellish training were about to begin.

Part 745: Training Montage

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Three weeks passed inside Chrona.

When Blinker first arrived to train all the Players, Timothy and the rest had no idea what they were in for. The first thing they discovered was that Blinker had made a special formation that could accelerate the natural healing of their bodies. The second thing they found out was just what that entailed for their training regimen.

Timothy had zero time to do his daily quests. The same was true of Ferral, Marigold, and all the other Players except Fiona. Under Blinker's intensive training, they were subjected to brutal, unending tests of endurance, fast paced combat against foes large and small, and a great deal of focus was put on improving their teamwork.

In the first few days, Blinker simulated underground caverns with kobolds and goblins. After that, she simulated battlefields with orcs and Demon Barons, fireballs exploding nearby, and all sorts of other traumatizing things that left Timothy mentally scarred.

Timothy may have been raised on video games, but he had been shocked the first several dozen times he saw Blinker's hyper-realistic monsters being decapitated, their chests stabbed, their blood spraying, and even their viscera spilling out.

One might have expected Raavul to be the most proficient member of the group when it came to battling, but as it happened, she was almost as green as the rest of them when it came to combat. As a teacher, she spent the majority of her life either as a Learner herself, living in Enclaves, meditating on her Psionic Seed, and other such things. She had never fought in a real life and death battle, so she screwed up many times. If Raavul had one excellent trait, it was that she always maintained a center of calm even in extreme situations. She was not prone to panicking.

Ferral was probably the most consistent performer among the group. Fiona was not planning to enter the dungeons with the team, so Ferral turned out to be their best combat specialist, using his limited grasp on psionics to disorient and debilitate enemies, which allowed Timothy and Marigold to get kills more easily.

Marigold was the most bloodthirsty of the group. As a crocodile, she was a natural predator who did not even blink when it came to blood. She loved ripping things apart and never flinched in the face of danger. It did turn out that she had a weakness for 'gross and slimy things', which she quickly thrust onto her boyfriend to take care of.

Timothy found that of all the Players, he was the most well-rounded. He was the weakest member of the group stat-wise, but he'd put a lot of focus on choosing good skills to round out his biggest flaws. Wielding the Sword of Justice, he was able to empower it with flames through the Divine Blaze skill and cut through enemies quite easily. As such, his combat prowess was not shabby in the least.

In the end though, the greatest stand-out figure of them all wasn't a Player in the first place.

Paimon also joined in with the Players in Blinker's month-long training event. In doing so, he revealed himself to be an expert warrior with hundreds of years of combat experience!

Unlike Timothy and the rest, Paimon was not a nerd who spent most of his days indoors. He was a demon, born and raised in demon society. He had grown up fighting for his life, fighting for scraps of food, and fighting for the mere right to live!

Paimon was 40,000 years old, and though he had been stuck as a Demon Grunt his entire life, his fighting style was mature and well-rounded. His abilities were weak, and his estimated stats were only a little higher than Timothy, making him technically the second-weakest member of the group, but in terms of combat knowledge he blew the rest of them out of the water.

Thus, despite being Timothy's Pawn, at the end of the training session, the group unanimously elected him to be their leader!

"It is my honor to accept the position." Paimon said. "I only worry I will let you all down. My strength is lacking."

"It won't be for long!" Blinker said, as she walked over and clapped him on the back. "Come on over to the Workshop, guys. Fiona's been working on a big surprise for all of you!"

Timothy's eyes widened. For four long weeks, he'd been dragging his body to Blinker's Bootcamp every morning at 5 AM, or whatever the Chrona equivalent of morning was, given it didn't have a sun in the sky, proper. He'd had his body beaten and broken, healed up, then beaten and broken again, never getting to play any video games to relax or even having the time or energy to read a book.

Thus, Timothy hadn't been able to pay attention to his mother's actions, and he had no idea she'd been working on something for him and the rest.

When the group arrived at Jason Hiro's Warehouse, Blinker dramatically thrust the door open to reveal the interior had been completely renovated! No longer did rust coat the walls, nor were the old dusty shelves filled with random buckets of knick-knacks and other assorted crap. Instead, professional-looking sliding shelves, revolving displays, armor and weapon racks, and many other such things now took up the interior of the room.

Fiona leaned back against a countertop, smiling as everyone walked in, with Rebecca standing not too far off to the side. "Timothy, Ferral, Raavul, Marigold, and Paimon! Congrats on surviving Blinker's training. I hear she didn't hold back at all on you greenhorns!"

[Indeed she did not.] Raavul said. [She pushed all of us to our limits. I am eternally grateful for the experience. I learned much about my weaknesses and areas I am in dire need of improvement.]

"I don't feel like a toddler swinging a stick around anymore." Timothy said. "I'm no expert, but I feel like I'm better than an amateur when it comes to swordplay now."

[I have improved the control of my abilities.] Ferral said. [Before Blinker's training, I believed myself to be much stronger than I actually was.]

"I had TONS of fun!" Marigold exclaimed, extending a huge thumbs up. "It was awesome kicking butt for four weeks!"

Paimon simply shrugged. "I don't think I grew much stronger, but I was admittedly a bit rusty at the start. I'm a lot more adept at using my powers again."

Fiona's smile brightened. "Well great! I'm glad to hear the training helped you guys a lot. But that was only the first half of your training. After you leave this workshop, you'll be finishing up the second half next. For now though, I think it's time to show you what I've been working on."

Fiona straightened her posture, then stepped to the side to reveal a steel box with ten shiny circular gadgets inside, each of them roughly the size of Timothy's palm.

"These are T-REX's." Fiona explained. "A core set of armor used during Stormbringer and other major human military campaigns. We had a bunch of them in storage, but they hadn't been used in a hundred years, so their internal circuits had degraded. I used my power to disassemble and rebuild them. Now they're better than ever! I made ten of them, which means there's two for each of you."

Fiona picked up the box and walked over, allowing Timothy and the rest to grab two T-REX's each. It turned out Fiona had labeled all the devices with people's names so everyone would get two sets of armor suited for their constitutions.

"To be honest," Fiona said, "If I hadn't gained Player powers, I couldn't have made these. The energy crisis in Chrona is worsening by the month. Our molecular assemblers don't have nearly enough power to produce anything, so I had to rely on disassembling and reassembling parts from my inventory to make these. Rest assured though, these are the strongest T-REX's I've ever forged!"

Rebecca walked over and lightly rested an arm on Fiona's shoulder. "I helped."

"Yes, yes you did!" Fiona laughed.

Timothy took a look at his two T-REX's. He'd heard of them before, but he'd never seen one in person. Surprisingly, the two T-REX's were different from one another.

Transforming Replicant Exosuit - Rhino Edition (v3.2) [Item] [Rare] [Torso Armor] [Tech]

A powerful set of nanite-based armor capable of dramatically enhancing the attack and defense of its wielder. This armor was originally invented by Jason Hiro, but was greatly improved by Phoebe Hiro preceding and following the events of the Stormbringer War. It has recently been improved further by the efforts of Fiona Hiro.

This armor grants a high damage reduction bonus to the Player wearing it. It includes a full suite of sensors, communication packages for enabling battlefield chatter with other allied T-REX-wearing Players, and countless miscellaneous systems designed to offer the Player a relatively comfortable wearing experience.

Vacuum-Sealed: This suit has been improved with magical defenses and air filtration systems. It provides immunity to asphyxiation, poisonous gasses, and other external dangers. This effect can be nullified if the suit sustains damage that compromises its outer shell.

Rhino Variant: This heavily armored variant of the T-REX series offers superior defensive protection at the cost of speed and mobility. Never the less, if the Player is able to build up speed, they will execute a [Battle Charge] that can stun or kill any enemies they ram into.

This armor grants a high damage reduction bonus to the Player wearing it. It includes a full suite of sensors, communication packages for enabling battlefield chatter with other allied T-REX-wearing Players, and countless miscellaneous systems designed to offer the Player a relatively comfortable wearing experience.

Vacuum-Sealed: This suit has been improved with magical defenses and air filtration systems. It provides immunity to asphyxiation, poisonous gasses, and other external dangers. This effect can be nullified if the suit sustains damage that compromises its outer shell.

Spectre Variant: This stealth and offense-focused armor allows the player to sneak behind enemy lines to execute dangerous foes before they can retaliate, or to scout out enemy positions to prepare an assault. It is also equipped with AI-controlled nano-tendrils that can impale enemies at close range or allow the Player to scale sheer walls.

Timothy nodded as he read the descriptions for his two T-REX's. The Spectre's tendrils reminded him of the Octopus Form, what with its 'tendrils' that were a lot like the octopus tentacles.

Curious, Timothy donned the Spectre armor. He activated his exosuit while the others activated theirs. Within seconds, a full set of armor had engulfed Timothy from head to toe. The Spectre Exosuit was fantastic, but he quickly realized it was largely incompatible with armor worn elsewhere on his body.

Timothy tried putting on other pieces of armor, but he found that their defensive stats would either overwrite or be overwritten by the T-REX. All their special effects would have the same problem as well. The one exception were small trinkets that could be worn underneath the suit, such as his Earring Radar used to detect movement around him. But, compared to the T-REX's ability to scan for hostiles, the radar wasn't too useful anyway.

Timothy switched to the Rhino suit afterward, and was shocked by how much armor was somehow able to be stored inside a device that fit inside his palm. After donning the exosuit, he rose nearly two feet in height, with insanely bulky armor that would allow him to even fight an average-strength Demon Duke to a standstill.

"I took into consideration everyone's unique circumstances." Fiona explained some time later, after everyone had tried out their new armor. "I gave Timothy a stealth suit and a heavily armored suit so that he would have flexibility in his engagements. I gave Paimon a Hummer exosuit and a Clinician variant because he'll be your designated leader, given his rich battle experience. Unlike the rest of you, Paimon actually knows how to strategize effectively and he's quick when it comes to thinking on his feet."

Fiona turned to address Paimon directly. "The Hummer suit will allow you to fly in the air and get a good aerial view of the battlefield so you can better relay orders to your teammates. From there, you can use your magic to attack at range, or you can use a rifle I'll be personally training you with. However, if you end up underground or in a situation where taking to the air is inadvisable, you can instead use the Clinician suit. I've enhanced its defenses and given it several different medical kits in case anyone gets hurt."

Paimon smiled. "Thank you, miss Hiro. I'm not too familiar with your human technology,+ but I will do my best to master it before we depart. At the very least, I want to get to a point where I'm not making a fool of myself and tripping over my own feet."

Fiona nodded back, then turned to Raavul and Ferral. "You two already have strong and sturdy bodies. I've decided to give you the same suits: A Thundercat and a Clinician. The Thundercat suit is simply a premier baseline T-REX with enhanced offenses and defenses. You might be durable and tough, but these suits will still enhance your capabilities. As for the Clinician, having more people able to heal serious injures is naturally important."

[I quite enjoyed donning my exosuit.] Ferral said, his tone pleasant. [As Timothy would say, it felt quite 'cool'. Very 'badass'.]

[I won't complain about having extra defensive options, though I don't intend to wear mine often.] Raavul said. [Nevertheless, I thank you for these generous gifts. Once I have reached the 4th or 5th Level of Psionics, these armors will not be of much use, but until then I can feel more at ease with my safety assured.]

"It's better to not need a suit of armor and have it than to need one and not have it." Fiona replied. "If you don't end up using them, that's fine. Just give them to the others."

She turned to the final member of the party.

"Marigold, your situation is a special one. I've decided to give you a Spectre and a Hummer. The reason being that you don't really need offense or defense, but raw utility. If you wear the Hummer, you'll be able to fly, and if you wear the Spectre, you'll be able to sneak around better. Your suits are just designed to shore up your shortcomings. I wouldn't be surprised if they ended up sitting in your inventory doing nothing!"

"Kyargh! Thanks for the cool presents!" Marigold crowed. "I think the Spectre makes me look AWESOME! The black and purple color is a nice touch, and it even covers my tail!"

"Don't forget about the mechanical tendrils on the back." Fiona reminded her. "If you ever end up in a situation where you're surrounded by tough enemies, put on the Spectre. Those tendrils are dangerous and can protect your backside while you rip apart an enemy with your teeth and claws."

"You really know how to speak my language!" Marigold laughed, giving Fiona a thumbs-up. "It feels weird wearing armor, but if my future mother-in-law is gonna put in all this work, I feel obligated to wear it!"

Timothy's face flushed. Hearing Marigold boldly imply marriage was on the horizon was... not something he had expected. He hadn't even given the matter much thought. They'd only been together a couple of months, and he wasn't sure how serious their relationship was.

Fiona cracked a smile when she saw the nervous look on her son's face, but she didn't address Marigold's words directly.

"You've all trained hard. I want you to keep training, but this time I'll have Blinker raise the difficulty several steps while you all wear your new exosuits. If she gives the OK, then in one month, I'll give my approval for you to enter your first Dungeon."

Timothy grinned excitedly. Ferral smiled with his eyes, and Marigold whooped with glee. Paimon shrugged nonchalantly, and Raavul didn't seem emotionally affected one way or the other.

It was a little odd for Fiona to be saying whether or not these people could go into the Dungeon, but as the leader of Chrona, everyone had gotten used to doing things she told them to do. Jason may have been the leader once, but with his death, Fiona, Blinker, and Rebecca had taken up the mantle as Chrona's queens.

Technically, Kar held a lot of sway too, but in terms of political willpower, it was mostly the crocodile faction who listened to his words.

"It's a shame you can't come with us, mom." Timothy said.

"I have too much on my plate, and no time to go out raiding dungeons and whatever other wild antics you guys are going to get into." Fiona said, shaking her head helplessly. "At the very least, I can start looking into my Crafting skill to try and make everyone strong weapons and armor. Timothy, I looked into our reserves and found a decent stockpile of weapons. Why don't you and the rest take a look? I've lined them up over in Row C."

Fiona gestured to a series of shelves that gleamed with the shine of steel. Timothy and the others walked over, where they found all sorts of weapons ranging from knives and sword to guns and blasters. By sweeping the Eye of Yredelemnul over the items, Timothy was able to gather the approximate strength of everything present.

Surprisingly, almost everything was at least Uncommon rarity, and there were even a couple weapons that were ranked as Rare.

"This is an AR-15 from Ancient Earth." Timothy said, hefting one of the bigger, scarier looking black rifles off the shelf. "It might look outdated, but it packs some firepower. Reliable, doesn't jam easily, with enough stopping power to put down enemies on the level of Demon Barons!"

"These Thunder Gauntlets look so cool!!" Marigold screeched. "Wow, they release a burst of thunder when you punch enemies with them! I want this pair!"

Paimon looked at the various weapons on display. "Multiple times, I've run into issues injuring heavily armored enemies. This Rupture Mace looks like it will be ideal for me. A ranged sidearm that burns enemies is a solid backup weapons as well... not too sure how it will work but how hard can pointing and pulling a trigger be?"

Ferral and Raavul made no motion to move toward the weapons. For Raavul, her reasoning was simply that technological weapons were beneath her, and not appropriate for a proper Psion to wield. For Ferral, he was already satisfied with his armor. He preferred to improve his psionic abilities when it came to attacking his foes.

Thus, some time later, Timothy and Marigold had placed several new items into their Inventories, while Paimon, lacking an Inventory, instead wore his weapons on a belt with a large rifle slung over his back. It turned out Fiona had designed it specifically for him, so he couldn't refuse her offer in good conscience. Not using an Inventory seemed a little primitive, but he had a sturdy constitution and could easily handle all his weapons' heft without complaint.

"Alright!" Blinker said, clapping her hands. "One more month of training, and you'll be moving out! Are you excited?!"

"Of course!" Timothy said.

"You know it!" Marigold chuffed.

"Within reason." Paimon said, his voice relaxed.

[I look forward to finally resuming my self-growth.] Paimon said. [Entering a Dungeon will surely prove to be enjoyable.]

[I would rather continue training my students, but I understand this side venture is necessary.] Raavul said, noticeably less enthusiastic than everyone else.

It was clear at a glance that, of the five Players who had obtained the King Network, Raavul was the one least interested in its functionality. She had only agreed to accept its power at Ferral's prompting, but she didn't have much interest in video games, even if they provided her rapid, tangible power growth.

She was a cultivation fanatic! She liked to slowly meditate and grow her strength the 'proper' way. She didn't have much interest in dopamine hits. If Ferral hadn't begged her, she probably would have turned her down.

Even so, she wasn't treating her new powers flippantly. She intended to master them to the fullest extent possible, understanding that they might be the key to resolving Chrona's future time crisis. She simply wasn't about to break out into a happy song and dance over the matter.

"One more month then." Fiona said, her tone stern. "Then... we'll see what you're made of."

Part 746: Fiona's New System

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

After receiving their T-REX's, Timothy's group immediately launched into another grueling month of boot camp. While Blinker was not a formally trained military member, she did have plenty of battle experience and was suitably blooded, having killed many foes, weak and powerful alike, especially during Stormbringer.

While Blinker didn't have a handbook on how to train recruits, what she did have was her projection powers, and her fairy formations. This meant, unlike the humanity of ancient Earth, she could simulate extremely realistic combat for her recruits, and they could truly learn how to fire and swing their weapons. Additionally, if anyone was badly hurt, they could be healed up in hours underneath the dedicated Medical Formation, which activated the body's natural healing abilities at an absurd level.

On ancient Earth, recruits would often train by reloading their weapons, shooting and throwing grenades at static targets, and other such things, but it would be difficult or at least morally questionable to acquire real living targets to kill. Thus, Blinker's training was a lot more effective in getting Timothy's group used to cutting down hordes of enemies without feeling squeamish.

For the second month of training, Blinker focused on increasing the difficulty of combat each day, little by little. She pitted the group of five against minotaurs, orcs, enemies at the level of Demon Baron, and even did a simulation against Beelzebub as a Duke. In fact, Blinker trained them against several demons she was relatively familiar with, including a simulation fighting a weakened version of Ose, with some of her stats dialed down a little, but still nevertheless a terrifying foe to face while in basic training.

A good portion of the training was focused on making Paimon the commander of the group. It was a little strange making a non-Player the leader, but the more they fought, the more Blinker realized he had a keen strategic mind and was best suited for the role. Timothy was too young and inexperienced, Marigold was too hot-headed, Ferral was probably the best runner-up, and Raavul was leery of making 'gut decisions'. She preferred to only make moves based on known intel, and wasn't good at weighing and taking risks.

Thus, Paimon ended up being the leader. Blinker wanted to come along, but she was not a Player, and neither was she an entity summoned by a Player, like Paimon was, so she simply couldn't. Timothy had already debated whether he should make her a Player, but after seeing the nerfs the system gave to Raavul, he decided that even if he had another Player slot available, it wouldn't be a good idea.

Thus, four weeks passed by. Timothy and the rest didn't have time to do their daily quests, but surprisingly, the extensive combat training actually increased a few people's stats by a few points.

Timothy gained 2 STR and 2 END, as well as 2 DEX.

Marigold gained 1 STR, 2 END, and 1 DEF.

Ferral gained 1 DEF and 2 RES.

Raavul gained nothing, and neither did Paimon.

Timothy was the weakest, so Blinker's training benefited him the most. Marigold, as the party's tank, took the most abuse, so she gained quite a bit herself. Ferral was the secondary tank, so he also improved his defenses a little, but the other two were either too powerful or couldn't benefit from the King Network's reward functions.

Thus, in the end, the teamwork of the group improved further beyond their starting point, and with Blinker's help, they felt ready for the journey ahead.

"I can't wait to start!" Marigold crowed. "I'm so tired of fighting fake weaklings and not getting any cool items or EXP!"

"I wouldn't call Ose a weakling..." Timothy said with a shudder. He was still slightly traumatized from the simulation a few days earlier against her.

"You guys can enter the Dungeon whenever you want, but I recommend resting for a couple of days first to condition your minds and bodies back to their optimal state." Blinker suggested. "A few days off will do wonders to get you in a better head-space. Also, Timothy, your mother wanted to see you. She told me to wait until your training was done. She said she had a question for you."

Timothy nodded. "I need to take a shower first, but I'll go and see her in a bit."

Everyone said their goodbyes, and Timothy trudged home, his body sore and aching from the training. He took a shower and ate some food that Paimon had whipped up now that they shared a house, then Timothy headed over to meet his mom at the Spynet.

When Timothy arrived, the door was unlocked. It had already been a couple of months since his 'peeping' incident, and given he had a girlfriend now and had been a good boy, Fiona had eventually stopped locking him out and started showing some trust toward him again.

When Timothy entered the Spynet and looked around, he frowned. It had only been two months since he last had time to come over, but already three dozen more monitors had burned out. Now, less than a third of the Spynet's monitors were spying on the various Sentients of the Milky Way, and all the monitors that had once focused on the Volgrim were completely blank.

There were still plenty of monitors pointed at the humans on Sharmur as it hadn't yet been absorbed into the Cube, and there were monitors that displayed some parts of various monster and demon worlds, but Fiona no longer had even a scrap of intel regarding what the Volgrim were up to.

Timothy looked at the monitors for a moment, then he knocked loudly on the door to catch his mother's attention.

"Mom! You in here?"

A moment later, Fiona popped out from behind a pile of monitors laying on the floor in a darker part of the room.

"Oh, Timothy, there you are. Good timing."

She stepped out of the pile of monitors, then stretched while gritting her teeth. Her back audibly popped, and she cracked her neck afterward. It seemed her body was becoming less phantasmal and more corporeal as time went on, though she would never 'truly' become a genuine human like Phoebe was.

Fiona walked over to a desk, then swiped a piece of paper and handed it to her son.

"What's this?" Timothy asked as he looked down at the paper.

"I hit level 10 several weeks ago while you were in training. I'm level 13 now." Fiona said. "I obtained these options for my Level 10 System unlock, but I'm not sure what to choose..."

Timothy's eyes widened. He quickly looked at the paper.

[Pawn Summoning]

The Player may summon a Pawn from across time and space to accompany them on their journey. The Pawn is random and cannot be chosen, but unwanted pawns can be discarded and re-summoned every set period of time. The period of time can be influenced by many factors. Pawns are NPCs that can either be mindless robotic companions or full-fledged characters with their own journeys and desires.

[Real Time Strategy Mode]

The Player obtains the ability to switch their perspective to an omniscient top-down perspective of the area they currently reside upon. When in RTS Mode, the player can execute broad management strategies for the 'units' they control as well as the Buildings inside their region. The Player can only alter or command forces under their control and will be unable to alter the forces of enemy or allied factions.

[Automated Factory]

Crafting System required to access this sub-system.

The Player gains access to a new system which allows them to place down automated crafting devices which can feed into one another to make weapons, armor, devices, and just about anything else on demand. This system can quickly convert raw materials into functional tools, provided the Player has taken the time to construct their automated factory. This system requires a lot of time and resource investment in order to produce results, but those results can turn out far greater than the base Crafting system by itself.

Timothy read the paper his mother gave him and his heart nearly stopped.

Seeing the look on her son's face, Fiona nodded. "That's about the reaction I expected. I'm at a loss of what to choose. I know doubling up on these systems is probably a bad idea, but Paimon has been a great help to you and your friends, so I was thinking being able to summon an assistant, or maybe an army of assistants would be useful."

"But," Fiona continued, "I then thought that this 'RTS' mode sounded like it could be exceptionally useful too. I thought you might know better than me."

"It's good." Timothy said slowly, feeling a great sense of disbelief at his mother's incredible options. "It's really good. It's like an Empire Building system, basically. It's perfect for you. It's exactly what you're good at."

"Right, but that Automated Factory sounds great as well..." Fiona said, her tone hesitant. "I worry we don't have enough raw materials on hand to make it useful. What's most important is that nobody else has Crafting but me, so if I don't pick it, someone else will need to choose the Crafting system to get access to Automation. I feel like it's tailor-made for my needs."

Timothy massaged his face furiously. "Gah! If I were to pick, I'd pick the RTS Mode in a heartbeat. But you're right, this Automation option sounds awesome. I definitely don't think you should pick Pawn Summoning, mom. Maybe I can level my Pawn Summoning up and summon you some assistants. Doubling down on my System is a bad idea."

It didn't take long before the two of them came to a decision.

"I'll choose Automated Factory then." Fiona said. "I've barely touched the Crafting System except a little fiddling with it here and there. It seems useful, but I've been too busy using my basic abilities and leveling up to bother with it. Maybe if I invest in this Factory option, I'll have to bring myself use the Crafting skill a lot more."

With that, Fiona made her choice. There was little fanfare, and certainly nothing Timothy could see, but his mother's eyes lit up after a few moments.

"Oh! Ohh! How intriguing!" Fiona exclaimed. "Wow, this is more interesting than I thought! Ohh!"

"What is it?" Timothy asked. "Did something happen??"

Unfortunately, his mother didn't immediately elaborate. She kept staring off into space, or rather, her invisible inventory, oohing and ahhing at something Timothy couldn't see.

Suddenly, Timothy realized this must be how ridiculous he looked when he first showed off the power of the King Network. He must have looked like a complete idiot, staring at absolutely nothing while everyone else waited. It was his just desserts that he had to suffer and wait for his mom to snap out of her daze. What went around came back around...

Five long, excruciating minutes passed. It almost seemed as if Fiona had completely forgotten her son was there, but eventually she snapped out of her daze, blinked her eyes, then turned to Timothy with a giddy expression.

"The King Network just gave me several items, and they're all Soulbound Legendaries!"

"What? Legendary items?!" Timothy exclaimed. "I wanna see, mom!"

"I can't exactly show them to you. I'm not allowed to trade them to other players. I have to summon them with my new ability 'Amateur Factory Worker'." Fiona explained. "Basically, using these items, I can pick up and move objects and even buildings for... basically no cost!"

Timothy squinted. "I don't get it. You can already pick stuff up and move it around."

"No, silly. Didn't you hear what I said?" Fiona quipped. "I said items AND buildings! BUILDINGS, Timothy! I can move buildings!"

Timothy's eyes widened. "Wait, seriously? How does that even work?"

"I don't know! Let's go test it out." Fiona said.

And so they did. The mother and son went outside and walked over to one of the ordinary residences that wasn't currently being used. Fiona poked the air with her finger, and all of a sudden, a strange gun that looked like a prop from a 1960's sci-fi movie appeared in her hand. It was yellow with blue rings around what Timothy assumed was the 'barrel' of the gun, except it had some sort of a Tesla-style orb poking out of the end. It looked like it was designed to shoot ray beams or lasers or something.

Frankly, Timothy thought it looked silly and cartoonish.

Fiona held the small gun in one hand. Then, she pointed it at the building.

A few seconds later, she frowned and pulled it away. "That's weird. I can't activate the tool. It says there are 7,044 life forms inside the structure, preventing it from being moved."

"Seven thousand??" Timothy asked in bewilderment.

"Yes. Umi, nobody lives inside the building. Why would it give me that warning?" Fiona asked.

Once again, Fiona spoke to someone Timothy couldn't hear, and while he knew it was obviously Umi, he once again realized how silly it looked when a Player seemingly talked to the air itself. He made a silent vow not to do that when non-Players were present.

"Oh." Fiona said after a moment. She scratched her head. "It seems, um, there are bugs inside the building. Lots of them. The tool can't move a structure that has any lifeforms inside of it."

"That's an odd restriction." Timothy muttered.

"Well, there's another restriction too, which is that the structure I want to move has to have been 'mostly' constructed by me personally, or by my powers. So I have to have been responsible for at least 51% of the building process. And, well, it was your father who made all the buildings in Chrona, so I can't actually use the tool on them."

"That's unfortunate." Timothy said, shrugging his shoulders. "Maybe it'll be useful in the future?"

"Definitely!" Fiona chirped. "Because the restriction on buildings doesn't apply to smaller objects. Check this out!"

She pointed at a shovel leaning against a wall. Then she aimed the fake-toy-looking gun at the shovel and pulled the trigger. A split second later, the shovel abruptly turned into a speck of light, then flew toward Fiona's body with a blur of movement before disappearing right before it was about to strike her.

"Huh?!" Timothy guffawed. "The heck was that?"

"I can move items directly into my inventory with this gun." Fiona said smugly. "And I can place them down remotely too, even controlling the exact positioning."

"But... all you need to do is touch an item to add it to your inventory." Timothy said hesitantly. "That gun doesn't seem all too useful."

"Usefulness is in the eye of the beholder. I can instantly take a monitor off the ceiling now, then put it on the ground, repair it, and stick it back on the ceiling where it originally was." Fiona explained. "And that's just one thing this gun will let me do now! Furthermore, this isn't even the only new tool I acquired."

With a wave of her hand, Fiona made the gun vanish with a flash of light. Then, a new device appeared in her palm. It looked like an equally cartoony and deeply unserious device, colored gray with a red antenna doohickey sticking up out of the top right corner. It had some buttons on the front, and a black screen with green text on it. When Timothy looked at the green text, it looked like random letters and numbers, completely gibberish placeholder text.

"With THIS device, I can scan any inanimate object and see a listing of its faults, its wear and tear status, and any structural issues. Then if I spend resources, I can automatically repair the object back to working order using a third device. This is really going to speed up my constant repair work around Chrona!"

Timothy was completely bewildered. "I mean, that one sounds a lot more useful, but why does it look so... silly? It's made of cheap plastic."

"No idea." Fiona said, shrugging the question off. "All I care about is that it works. I also have a Constructor and Recycler tool. They work a lot like my active skills, except they retrieve 100% of the materials used to build things, minus any degraded or damaged components. So I can deconstruct buildings and large objects, then use their parts to rebuild the same objects or different ones."

Timothy raised an eyebrow. Suddenly, his mom's newest upgrade didn't sound so pitiful anymore. "It sounds like you've acquired all the tools you need to completely tear down and rebuild Chrona from scratch..."

"That's exactly it!" Fiona exclaimed. She beamed a bright smile at her son. "I'm really starting to like these powers, Timothy. We might have a real shot at repairing Chrona's foundations. When you enter the Dungeon, I want you to be safe, but also try to see if you can acquire lots of raw materials for me. That half-ton of steel, for example. The more stuff like that you can get me, the better."

"Sure, mom. I can do that." Timothy agreed wearily. "I'm glad your new ability is exactly what you needed. I'm gonna go home and get some sleep. I'm still pretty beat from Aunt Blinker's training."

"Are you hurt?" Fiona asked, as a hint of concern played on her face. "Need me to use my Mother's Intuition skill to heal you?"

"Cough cough!! I'm fine!" Timothy said awkwardly. "I'm gonna go now. Bye mom!"

Even though he was a little embarrassed, Timothy didn't neglect to give his mother a hug and a kiss goodbye. Afterward, he headed home and plopped down face-first on his bed to sleep.

"Two more days." Timothy muttered. "Two more days and we can finally do our first dungeon raid."

He smushed his face into his pillow and grinned like an idiot.

"I'm so excited! I can't wait!"

Part 747: Entering the Dungeon

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Two more days passed inside Chrona. By now, nearly two months had come and gone since Timothy first acquired the King Network and passed it on to his friends.

With two days of relaxation so everyone could unwind, the group of five had returned their minds to a state of semi-calm. Under the surface, excitement was boiling, though this was mainly the case for Timothy, Ferral, and Marigold. Paimon and Raavul were less interested in exploring the dungeon, with the former only doing so at his master's command, and the latter doing so out of begrudging obligation, but they were not going to hold back due to a simple lack of enthusiasm. Too much was on the line.

After readying themselves and donning their T-REX armors, the group of five stood in an empty flower-field outside the eastern part of the city, with Rebecca, Blinker, Kar, and Fiona standing not too far away.

"Hurgh. Bring me back some meat if you can." Kar said. "I'd like to taste the flavor of these Dungeon creatures."

"Stay safe." Fiona said. "That's an order. Timothy, don't you dare be reckless inside there. I don't know what you'll encounter, but treat your life as if survival is paramount!"

Blinker looked more relaxed than anyone else. "If you guys knew the hell I'd put these maggots through, you wouldn't be worried. They're better trained than Jason was during Stormbringer! I whipped their butts into shape."

"It's a shame none of us can come with you." Rebecca added. "I hope the enemies you face are within your capabilities to dispatch."

"Relax!" Marigold laughed. "Kyargh! We've got ME here, and I'm a badass now! Timothy's pretty strong too! You should see his sword skills! He's not just swinging it around like a lunkhead anymore!"

[I will ensure this group returns fully intact.] Raavul vowed. [You have my word.]

Everyone said goodbye, and Timothy made sure to give his mother, his aunts, and even his crocodile uncle a big hug before he left. Not even Rebecca was excluded, as Timothy saw her as his surrogate aunt.

"I'm wary of the Dungeon, but far from afraid." Timothy said. "We can do this! See you later, everyone! We'll return soon!"

With that, Timothy's group turned to look at Ferral.

[I only have the ability to 'Activate Dungeon.'] Ferral warned. [I do not know what will happen next. For all we know, we might be thrown into a random area and separated. Be prepared for anything.]

Everyone nodded. They waited with bated breath as Ferral activated his Enter Dungeon command.

Then... a portal opened up in front of them. It looked like a swirling blue oval of energy. Everyone blinked in unison. They didn't expect this.

Raavul held up her hand. [I will enter first. I am the most powerful.]

With that, she levitated forward, and vanished into the portal.

Ten long seconds passed. Just when Ferral was about to step through, Raavul slipped back outside the portal. There was an odd expression on her face.

[The situation... is not dangerous. You may all enter.]

She didn't explain anything, which only left the others wondering what the heck she had just seen. Unable to bear their curiosity, they quickly entered the portal after her, with Blinker and the others excluded. As they were not Players or Pawns, they could not enter.

"I wonder what's inside..." Blinker muttered.

"I might check it out later." Fiona replied. "We'll see."

Even after the group of five entered, the portal continued to levitate silently in the air, making those who gazed upon it wonder if they, too, could enter...

Timothy arrived inside what he immediately identified as a grand library. It was filled with rows and rows of books, with shelves rising fifty feet up to the ceiling, way beyond what anyone could easily reach. In addition to him, the other four were also there.

"A library." Ferral said, his senses on high alert. "Not what I was expecting."

Just as the group was wondering what sort of dungeon they had entered. An astoundingly tall, frighteningly slender figure suddenly stepped out of one of the library aisles in front of them. Everyone's hearts jumped as they looked at the quadruped figure before them. It looked like an unbelievably emaciated centaur, except its body was made of transparent blue 'goop' vaguely resembling Jello. When their eyes moved higher, they saw that 45 feet up, the creature had a long neck with a tiny head and two beady eyes.

It wasn't a scary looking creature, but it was the most alien thing any of them had ever seen in their lives. Each of its four ground-based limbs were as slender as a kitchen sink pipe, with hooves like on a bull, and even its main body was only as thick as a telephone pole. The creature had two long arms that looked like they could reach way above its head, with one thumb and two fingers each.

When the giant skinny creature stepped out of the aisle, its eyes lowered to look at them.

"Or? Mashu? Sheldo nowa ko."

The creature spoke extremely slowly. Each syllable was evenly pronounced, and its tone was completely emotionless.

"I... what's it saying?" Marigold asked, bewildered. "Is it a boy or a girl? I can't tell..."

The others seemed lost too, but Timothy wasn't. Since he had chosen Universal Translator, he realized he could perfectly understand the creature.

"Oh? Who are you? It's been a while since Po had guests." The creature said.

Timothy blinked. He opened his mouth to speak, but the words that came out of his mouth were complete mumbo-jumbo to the rest of his group. Without even meaning to, he perfectly replicated the creature's language.

"I'm sorry. We didn't mean to disturb you. I am Timothy, and these are my friends."

"Ah. Timothy." The creature said, bobbing his head up and down. "Po I am. Po organizes the Story Hall. You are a well-mannered creature. Po likes you."

After a short pause, Po lifted his head and stood back at his full height.

"Po understands now. You are the new Administrator. Welcome to the Story Hall. What story do you intend to experience today?"

The others looked at Timothy. They realized immediately that he could speak the creature's language, with only Raavul not knowing about his Universal Translator skill.

Ferral silently filled her in, and nobody interrupted Timothy while he conversed with the creature.

"I thought I was coming here to run through a Dungeon..." Timothy said hesitantly. "Why are we in a library?"

"Dungeon. Oh yes. Po knows of Dungeon. This is another word for story. We have many story-dungeons." Po said. "This is Timothy's first time experiencing story?"

Timothy nodded slowly. "Yes. It's my first time."

"How wonderful." Po said, his tone not particularly one of excitement. "Come with Po. Po will show you how to enjoy story."

The large creature slowly turned around, then began walking forward. Despite Po's immense size, he made no noise at all while he walked, as if he were not a real creature but a ghost. The silence was eerie...

The group walked behind Po, and Timothy quickly caught them up on what Po was saying. Seeing as they weren't actually in a Dungeon yet, everyone relaxed a little. It turned out they would be able to exert some control over what sort of Dungeon they would enter, and not just randomly pop into an unknown scenario.

Po strode behind a giant desk with a top that rose twenty-five feet above the head of Timothy and the rest. After a long moment of silence, Po craned its neck to look over the front of the desk at the people below.

"Timothy. Po has gathered many excellent stories for you to enjoy. Since you are not adept in story traversal, perhaps Po may make a suggestion for which story to enter?"

Timothy slowly nodded. "That would probably be for the best, Po. What do you suggest?"

He had realized by now that Po was a lot like Giuseppe. He was one of the King Network's NPCs. Most likely, there were going to be more that Timothy would inevitably meet.

Since that was the case, it seemed Po was not his enemy. He seemed like a friendly..... creature.

"Po, what species are you?" Timothy asked.

Po blinked slowly. He looked at Timothy with a blank face.

"Po is Po." Po said. "There is only one Po."

Timothy was surprised. "You're the only member of your species? The only one??"

"Po is Po." Po repeated.

Timothy needed a moment to digest that information. "I see. Well, you're certainly an interesting individual, Po."

"Po appreciates the compliment." Po said. "Po also thinks you are an interesting individual. Your body should be incapable of properly replicating Po's language, but you are able to do so anyway. As expected of the talented Administrator."

Po raised his head. There was a rustling noise on the table. Eventually, Po lifted a book off the table, then, unexpectedly, Po lightly tossed the book up in the air. Timothy and the others jumped in fright as the gigantic book suddenly flew over the table and fell toward them, its size drastically enlarging as it was about to crush them!

But, just before the book made impact, it halted in midair, then pulled backward, levitated downward, and rested on the ground, its cover visible before all of them.

"A book??" Marigold asked. "What's up with that?"

The book did not have any words on it. Instead, it looked like the entire cover was an illustrious painting, one that was so lifelike and real that if it started moving, everyone would think they were looking at another world entirely.

The image on the cover was of a forest in the middle of the day, as if looking at the trees from a grassland, except that beyond the trees there were shadows engulfing the inner forest, with tiny pairs of white eyes peeping out of the inner gloom.

Such a forest appeared ominous and foreboding. The book gave everyone who looked at it the heebie-jeebies.

"What think?" Po asked curiously. "A suitable first story? Po assures you, this story is not too difficult. A good introduction to stories for the uninitiated."

Timothy hesitated. The shadowy forest looked irksome, but he couldn't really get a clue about what they would be facing just from the cover...

"Po, what will we find if we read the story?" Timothy asked.

Po blinked his eyes. "Po does not spoil stories. Po thinks stories must be enjoyed without any outside context. Po would never ruin your fun by spoiling you."

"Oh. Uh. Thanks..." Timothy said with a grimace.

A minute passed as everyone observed the book.

"Looks exciting. Let's give it a try!" Marigold crowed, giving her boyfriend a big thumbs-up. "How scary could trees be?"

Timothy sighed. "Alright, we'll give this story a shot. What is it called?"

Po's face remained expressionless. "All stories have titles. The title will be revealed when you experience it. Open the book to begin."

Timothy nodded. Without further ado, he stepped forward, grabbed the edge of the book, and pulled it open.

A powerful suction force swept outward. With a flash of light, the five party members vanished, and they entered the world of the book.

Timothy and the others fell down, down, down inside a pitch-black void.

The Party members eventually slowed to a stop and landed on their feet inside the void. They could easily see one another, but everything else around them was pitch-black.

After they landed, giant words appeared in the air before all of them.

DARK FOREST DUNGEON

A forest filled with extremely powerful life forms. These life forms are vicious and bloodthirsty. Crossing them will likely mean death. In order to pass through, the party must move stealthily. If the Party inadvertently catches the attention of a powerful life-form, the party must quickly defeat their adversary and hide, lest more enemies are drawn to the scene.

Difficulty: Very Easy

Dungeon Level: 1

Dungeon Objectives: The Party must traverse the Dark Forest successfully. The Party will start at the southern edge of the Dark Forest. The Party must reach the northern edge before the time limit expires.

Time Limit: 1 Week.

Rewards if successful: Level 1 Dungeon Rewards x5. Bonus rewards obtainable if hidden criteria are met.

Penalty if failed: All party members +3 levels. Skip all level-up rewards. A Dungeon Break event will occur.

The team grimaced when they saw the penalty. The fact they would all gain three levels without gaining any benefits if they failed the dungeon was a huge demerit, and the Dungeon Break sounded even scarier. On the other hand, the rewards didn't seem all too enticing. Level 1 Dungeons were likely the easiest dungeons possible, so how good could their rewards be?

"This dungeon seems difficult..." Marigold said hesitantly. "It says 'very easy' but how easy can it be when the forest has 'extremely powerful lifeforms' inside it?"

The others were quiet for a moment. Before anyone could speak, a window popped up in front of all of them.

Party status

Paimon (Leader): Not Ready

Timothy: Not Ready

Marigold: Not Ready

Ferral: Not Ready

Raavul: Not Ready

Ready up? [Yes/No]

The Dungeon will begin once all Party members have readied up.

Timothy breathed a sigh of relief. "Look like we have time to think before we enter."

"Then we should strategize." Paimon said. "Read the Dungeon description carefully. The key to victory is stealth. We don't have to fight any enemies. In fact, since these enemies are said to be so strong, combat is likely a terrible idea."

[What about flying over the forest?] Raavul inquired. [Ferral and I can both fly. We can easily bring the rest of you along, and that's without mentioning the Hummer exosuits.]

[That might not be advisable.] Ferral retorted. [What if the monsters in the forest see us flying overhead? We would appear quite conspicuous. Flying over the treetops could be the antithesis of stealth.]

"Ferral's right." Timothy added. "But also, read the description carefully. Stealth is essential, and it doesn't say all of us have to reach the end. Maybe me and Marigold could wear our stealth exosuits and sneak in by ourselves."

"That's too dangerous." Paimon said, making a chopping motion with his hand to express disapproval. "That suit is great at stealth, but these enemies could be observant enough to spot you. If you were attacked, the rest of us wouldn't be there to fight alongside you. You might die."

[Not to mention that simply because the description does not say we all have to make it to the objective, that does not mean only one or two of us can.] Raavul pointed out. [It may just be that we all must arrive there together. The description does not say one way or another. Best to err on the side of caution.]

Marigold didn't have much to say. She wasn't the brightest member of the bunch, so she decided to let the smart people talk things out.

After debating for a while, the other four came to a consensus.

"Alright, so we'll all go in, T-REX's equipped." Paimon said. "Even the basic suits can increase our speed and muffle our footsteps. Furthermore, we can speak to each other without outside observers hearing our voices. We could probably have Raavul and Ferral set up a telepathic communication relay if that weren't possible, but it's too troublesome, so let's rely on the suits."

"Unfortunately, Paimon, your two exosuits are way too flashy." Timothy said. "The Hummer emits a lot of heat and light from its grav-wings. The Clinician is colored bright-white. It's really going to stand out in the darkness..."

He looked at Raavul and Ferral next. "Both of you also have Clinicians, but the Thundercats are blue and red. They'll blend in a little better with the underbrush."

Then he looked at Marigold. "You've got a Spectre and a Hummer. Just use the Spectre and you'll be good. Your scales are bright yellow, so you need to be even more incognito than the rest of us."

"Yeah? Well you have pale white ghostly skin!" Marigold teased, sticking her tongue out. "Maybe you should get some sunlight and a tan, eh, Timmy?"

Timothy smirked. "Chrona doesn't have a sun. But yeah, point taken. That's why I'm wearing a stealth suit too."

After a bit of deliberation, Paimon shook his head. "I'll just have to use my Clinician. Bright white is not a great color option, but it's the stealthiest option at hand. After this mission, we should make sure everyone has a Spectre for the sake of future operations. At the very least, we should recolor the Clinicians to be more stealthy."

"Yeah, you said it." Timothy nodded.

Before long, everyone donned their exosuits and turned to the giant screen floating in the air. One by one, they pressed the Ready button, and eventually, the black void dissolved around them.

The group found themselves at the same spot depicted on the cover of Po's book. Before them was a forest that stretched on seemingly for miles to the left and right of their starting position. But when they turned around to look backward, they found there was a wall of impassable mist behind them as well. Paimon tried to enter it, but the mist was as solid as steel!

"It's a world boundary." Timothy said. "A fake wall. We can only go forward, into the forest."

He looked at his Quest screen, where it showed the Dungeon quest's time remaining counter ticking down from 6:23:59:47.

Timothy looked at the HUD inside his helmet. Unfortunately, the compass wasn't working. It seemed the false world didn't have an equivalent to a magnetic north pole like on most worlds. The compass spun around in slow circles, unable to lock onto anything. Ultimately, Timothy had everyone face the forest, then lock that direction as 'north' so they wouldn't get lost or accidentally turned around once they entered.

"Time's a-wasting, guys! Kyargh! Let's go already!" Marigold eventually said.

"Don't rush." Timothy urged. "Marigold, you and I have the only stealth suits. We'll go in first. Sneaky. Got it?"

"Yeah, yeah. I got it. I'm not stupid, you know." Marigold groaned. "Come on, we're on the clock now."

Timothy nodded. He and Marigold quickly moved forward. They entered the forest first, and Timothy glanced at his helmet's tracking radar. It always displayed red dots indicating the position of his allies who were wearing exosuits, but as he and Marigold entered the forest, the other three party members suddenly had their dots disappear.

"Wait, pause." Timothy said to Marigold quietly. "I didn't expect this."

Marigold looked at him with a frown, though her expression wasn't visible underneath her armor.

Timothy carefully stepped out of the forest. Once he'd exited its confines, the other three showed up as red dots again, but Marigold vanished.

"There's a boundary of some kind separating the forest from the exterior." Timothy concluded. "Everyone, just come in with us. We can't afford to get separated."

Raavul nodded. "Yes, we will join you."

She, Ferral, and Paimon all stole into the forest. Paimon's white armor did indeed stick out in the darkness a little, but as soon as they traveled into the forest, they realized the forest itself was deeply, unnaturally dark and gloomy. The tree canopy didn't seem to be terribly thick, yet somehow, the only light that entered the forest came from the path behind them. By the time they'd traveled just 100 meters inside, they found themselves in utter darkness.

By that point, even the bright white color of Paimon's Clinician suit was practically invisible. It wasn't as if their suits needed running lights. They simply switched to night vision which caused the tiny bits of light that did filter down through the tree canopy to light up their surroundings to a barely acceptable level.

Even so, Timothy really had to squint to see ahead of himself. He intended to move quickly and stealthily, but he kept stepping on twigs and leaves, making him conspicuously louder than he intended. He wanted to move silently, but he couldn't see the ground in front of him!

"Shit. This is harder than I expected." Timothy muttered.

He looked at the clock on the quest page.

6:23:51:13

"Let's just... take it slow, everyone." Timothy said quietly. "No sense rushing."

The forest was deathly silent. The further they traveled into the vegetation, the more eerie and alien the environment felt.

In addition to all the trees, the vegetation itself was annoyingly dense. There were plants and small trees and bushes everywhere, often concealing two or even three feet of the forest floor.

Eventually, Timothy slowed to a stop. He gestured for the others to come over.

"We should try hopping from tree to tree." Timothy said. "The trees are somewhat far apart, but it should be doable."

"That's going to make even more noise." Paimon warned with a whisper. "It might work for you and Marigold since your Spectres have those handy climbing tendrils, but I don't have such a luxury. Maybe we should try the levitation strategy."

The group had already discussed a few options prior to readying up, and this strategy was one of them.

[We can levitate the three of you...] Raavul said hesitantly. [But I am only a 3rd Level Psion, and Ferral is a 2nd Level Psion. If we have to focus on levitating you, we will not have energy to spare on observing our surroundings.]

As low level Psions, they had powers roughly equivalent to Demon Barons, which was fairly formidable. The problem was, their multi-tasking abilities were far beneath those of more powerful Psions, especially the ones who had ascended to the level of Cosmic. This was another reason why a telepathic link sustained by Ferral and Raavul to the others was a worse idea than relying on the T-REX's; because if they established such a link, it would weaken their other abilities.

"Don't worry. You and Ferral just focus on getting us to the other end of the forest. Me, Marigold, and Paimon will keep a lookout. Me on the front, Marigold on the back, and Paimon on the sides."

Paimon nodded. "We're making way too much noise wading through the underbrush, and our speed is terrible. We'll be even louder if we hop from tree to tree. I think levitation is our best bet."

"We don't know how far we have to travel to reach the other side of the forest." Marigold chimed in. "Maybe if we don't speed up, we'll miss the deadline and fail the Dungeon."

The two Psions looked conflicted, but after thinking things over, they eventually agreed.

[Alright. I'll fly on the left, and Ferral on the right.] Raavul said. [We'll levitate the three of you between us. Timothy at the front, Paimon in the middle, and Marigold in the back.]

"Sounds good to me." Marigold readily agreed.

"It's our best shot." Timothy added.

Like this, they assumed the new formation, and began flying forward, with Timothy and Marigold 'laying' flat in the air while Paimon 'stood' on nothing, giving himself a better vantage point. Timothy watched the entire area up ahead, occasionally switching between night vision and thermals to see if he could spot anything moving.

Paimon swiveled his head from side to side, looking to the left and right. He put his full focus on their mission.

As for Marigold... she lazily looked around behind the group, quickly growing bored.

It's really relaxing, levitating like this. Really... relaxing... Marigold thought to herself. Her eyes started to droop a little. So soothing...

Unseen by the group, a single creature hid itself up in the treetop branches. Its beady yellow eyes peered down at them as it stealthily pursued them from behind.

Timothy and his friends were not alone.

Part 748: The Dark Forest

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Time passed quickly inside the Dark Forest Dungeon. Before long, three hours had come and gone. The Dungeon stopped looking like an endless sea of trees and shrubbery. At some point, the party of five started encountering more diverse terrain. They saw a pitch black pool of water in the distance, where there was a notable void of trees around it. They had to take a detour to get around it, and they slowed their pace a little, looking at the water with fear in their eyes.

The pool had creatures near it! Faint torches were held aloft by powerful warriors armed with primitive-looking sharpened spears. For the first time, the party spotted life lurking at the edge of the small lake, each individual looking around warily. A few creatures carefully scooped water out of the lake with that looked like five gallon buckets. They looked hesitant about disturbing the water.

The creatures were bipedal. They had fur all over their bodies, and wore mean-looking necklaces and clothing made of bone. It was clear at a glance that they wore their garb as a warning to others not to mess with them. They didn't look human, more like purple-skinned apes with deformed faces and huge noses. Their eyes were especially large and pitch-black.

[Slow our pace...] Ferral said warily. [Those creatures likely have excellent night vision.]

[A sensible idea.] Raavul replied.

The party carefully detoured the pool. As they did, Timothy chuckled nervously into his microphone.

"Careful now, Marigold. I'm sure you want to go for a dip, but we'll have to sit this one out, hehe."

He laughed to himself, but he didn't get a response from his girlfriend. After a moment, Timothy frowned. He carefully looked backward, but Marigold was still in the rear, like before. He looked at her for another few seconds.

"Marigold? Hello? Chrona to Marigold! Are you there?"

Marigold lifted her head. "...Huh?"

"Marigold!" Timothy snapped. "Are you sleeping?!"

Marigold became a little more alert. "Oh! Um... I just... was resting my eyes..."

Ferral glanced back at Marigold. He hadn't noticed her drowsiness, because he had been focusing on levitating the others while trying to perceive the area around their party. It took all his mental effort to do just this, so he didn't have the energy to spare for other things.

[If you are tired, you should have told us.] Ferral said, his tone one of light anger.

[Yes.] Raavul said, not bothering to look back. [You have endangered the party. What if we were being pursued and your inattentiveness caused us to overlook the presence of possible enemies?]

"How could you be sleepy anyway?" Timothy asked, furrowing his brow. "Didn't you sleep last night? I told you to get a good night's sleep before we left!"

Marigold lowered her head, slightly ashamed. "Kyargh... I'm sorry. I don't know what came over me. I did sleep, yeah. I don't usually get drowsy like this..."

The Psions levitated to a stop. They gently set the others down, then used their methods to sweep the area around them.

Raavul stiffened. [Damn. We've been followed.]

Timothy's blood ran cold. He looked at her helmet, then followed her general gaze, which seemed to be focused somewhere on the path behind them.

[Fifty potential hostiles sneaking in the underbrush behind us.] Ferral said, following his teacher's lead. [We'll need to pick up the pace if we hope to lose them.]

[I cannot sense their visual appearance.] Raavul said, her tone tinged with worry. [I can only sense the movements of the glade. The stealth capabilities of our pursuers exceed the scope of my understanding. We must flee!]

The good news was, the party hadn't been surrounded. If they drastically picked up the pace, Timothy's group might be able to shake their pursuers. The bad news was, they were no longer as incognito as they had previously hoped.

Timothy glowered at his girlfriend underneath his helmet, where she couldn't see. He was rightfully annoyed, and even a bit pissed off. It was one thing if she was tired and had said something, but she'd put the whole group at serious risk, and they were only a few hours into a possible seven-day mission!

How could she be so irresponsible as to literally fall asleep on the job?!

Timothy exhaled quietly. He kept his thoughts to himself, then turned to Paimon.

"You think we should stand and fight or make a break for it?"

Paimon shook his head. "If we fight, we risk drawing the attention of the watering hole group. Better to pick up the pace, even if it does make us more conspicuous. Let's get a move on."

Raavul and Ferral nodded. Since Paimon was the designated leader, they chose to do as he ordered. A moment later, the trio was lifted up again, but this time, Marigold was made to 'stand' in the middle and Paimon was moved to laying down in the back.

Paimon took out the rifle Fiona had given him. He decided to cradle it in his arms so that if the enemies suddenly attacked from behind, he could hold them off and slow them down, though doing so would definitely alert the denizens of the Dark Forest.

With the new formation prepared, the group set off, deliberately increasing their speed. Paimon watched warily as the enemies behind them fell behind for a while, then picked up their speed when they realized Timothy's party had noticed their presence.

An hour passed. Slowly but surely, the enemies in the rear faded into the background. Paimon eventually lost sight of their heat signatures, and he also stopped being able to see them at all.

"Movement up ahead." Timothy said, causing the others to become more alert. "It's something... big."

Paimon cursed under his breath. The group slowed to a stop and carefully adhered to a tree, with the Psions levitating in place, and the other three grabbing onto the tree with both feet and one hand. Paimon squinted as he looked up ahead into the darkness, using his free hand to hold the rifle defensively.

Demons had incredible night-time eyesight, but their species advantage was dramatically lessened at the lower levels. Belial could see clearly even in pitch-black darkness, but Paimon's vision was much closer to that of a 'peak human', since Paimon was merely a Grunt. He could distinguish movement in the Dark Forest, but he couldn't make out much in the way of details.

As such, even Paimon had to rely on the T-REX for visual clarity. The night-vision feature, coupled with his superior vision, helped make up for his deficits.

Up in the distance, a lumbering behemoth was slowly moving forward, pushing the trees aside as it walked. It was a quadruped covered in leaves and moss. Its exact shape was impossible to make out. Two yellowed tusks stuck out of whatever represented its mouth, even protruding through the leaves hiding its body from view. It was huge, but it made surprisingly little noise, as if it had adapted its biology for stealth rather than power or defense.

[What a strange creature...] Ferral said, his voice low. [Is it an exobeast? Or a Sentient?]

Nobody knew the answer. They merely watched as the creature lumbered past. It took 15 minutes, but eventually the behemoth traveled out of range.

"The ones from before have caught up." Timothy said, gesturing with his free hand in the direction the party just traveled from.

Everyone grimaced in unison.

[Our pursuers are persistent.] Raavul said.

"You think we should make our stand and take them out? Nip the problem in the bud?" Timothy asked.

Raavul hesitated. She looked at Paimon, as did the others.

"Even though there are only five of us, and the enemy numbers around fifty, at least as far as we can determine, we likely have some real advantages." Paimon said. "The enemy is staying low to the ground, while we can take to the tree branches. We have ranged weapons. We can kill several of them if we strike hard."

Paimon shook his head. "But this is a foolish decision. The sound of our attacks will likely draw a lot of attention. We should only fight if we absolutely must. Killing off these foes will save us for now, only to call down a guillotine upon our necks later."

Everyone nodded. Paimon's words were reasonable.

"However," Paimon said, "just because fighting these enemies is a bad idea, that does not mean we cannot use other means."

Once he spoke, everyone realized what he was thinking. The group once again took off, levitated by the Psions. As they flew, Timothy reached into his inventory and took out some materials his mother had provided him. Among them was a ten-gallon tank of gasoline. Intended to provide fuel for fires in survival situations, the gasoline served a different purpose now as Timothy began lightly pouring it behind the group as they traveled.

It didn't take long before Timothy had drawn a 500 meter line of flammable liquid. After that, he lit a match and tossed it into the foliage, causing a fire to spring up behind the party.

With this, the Psions quickened their speed. They raced forward, leaving the newly awakened wall of fire to light up the darkness, causing mayhem as countless screeches and roars erupted from all angles.

Fearful of the consequences of their actions, the group fled as fast as they could. In the distance, they saw huge shadowy shapes descending upon the fire, and those shapes began to violently battle one another. The impact of their attacks sent shockwaves outward, which caused the fire to spread even more quickly than before.

"The creatures here will fight each other?" Timothy asked doubtfully. "I didn't realize that. We could use this to our advantage in the future."

Right after he spoke, Timothy flinched. A window popped up in front of him.

Deep Forest Marauder defeated.

Acquired: 140 exp. 240 Gold. 1x Deep Forest Marauder remains. Deep Forest Marauder tooth x3.

Timothy blinked. "Huh?"

It didn't take a rocket scientist to figure out what had happened. He looked backward in shock. "I just got a kill message! The forest fire is counted as me killing the monsters!"

Then he got another message. And another one.

Deep Forest Marauder x3 defeated.

Acquired: 420 exp. 900 Gold. 3x Deep Forest Marauder remains. Deep Forest Marauder Pelt x1. Deep Forest Marauder Claws x2. Deep Forest Marauder Eyeballs x5.

Timothy felt deep shock at first, but gradually, as the kills started to rack up, his emotions turned to excitement, then numbness.

Monsters were dying at an inconceivable rate! Every minute, five or more perished to the flames, and those flames attracted even more monsters who died afterward.

Timothy stared at his Character sheet. He was Level 9 when he entered the Dark Forest, but now, he had reached Level 12. And his EXP continued to climb...

[You have leveled up.]

[You have leveled up.]

[You have leveled up.]

[You have leveled up.]

Timothy stopped focusing on his levels. He simply didn't have time to look through all the awards, so he put them out of mind.

Eventually, the flames either burned out or enemies stopped running into them, or maybe Timothy left the range of the fire and the King Network stopped counting the deaths of the forest denizens as Timothy's credit. Timothy's radical upward growth slowed down until he reached Level 21.

He had gained 12 levels in less than two hours. This was a shocking pace of development, to the point that he was shaking with anxiety. He was happy, no doubt, but the thought that he had leveled up off the deaths of other creatures felt somewhat... morbid.

Timothy made sure to let everyone else know. All of them were in awe, and definitely jealous.

"Kyargh! You think if we all burn this whole forest down, we'll hit level 100??" Marigold asked excitedly.

[Regardless of whether the creatures here are 'real' or not, that seems a vile way to acquire levels.] Raavul said disapprovingly. [Timothy obtained those levels by accident. He cannot be blamed for the creatures throwing themselves into the fire, but if he were to do so again, he would definitely be to blame.]

[I do not believe the creatures here are 'false' or 'fake' lifeforms.] Ferral added. [The fact a Dungeon Break event can cause them to spill into our universe indicates they must truly exist somewhere, somehow. Thus, killing them en-masse for sport or gains can be seen as an act of genocide.]

That made Timothy's mood even worse. "Even if it was an accident, you're right. I didn't want to kill all of them. I thought I'd just scare them away. Now I feel like a monster..."

Timothy looked at his Character page. After killing all the Dark Forest creatures, he had acquired more than 75,000 gold. He didn't have a clear barometer for the value of the gold, but 75,000 sure seemed like a lot!

What's done is done. Timothy thought. I can't take back all those deaths. I'll just have to make sure I don't do it again. In the meantime, maybe I should visit the Shop to see what I can buy?

But then, he woke up from his thoughts when his T-REX beeped a warning. "Guys! Movement up ahead. Multiple bogeys."

The party slowed down. Their expressions turned ugly. There appeared to be a massive caravan crossing the forest up ahead. Unlike all the other enemies inside the Dark Forest, these creatures were holding torches, dressed ostentatiously, and wearing armor that looked extremely well-maintained.

One of the creatures sat atop a giant lizard-like steed, while all the others surrounded the noble figure in a protective formation, yet there was no trace of fear in their movements. It was as if they were openly taunting the forest, daring others to come attack them. None took the bait.

Timothy activated his Eye of Yredelemnul skill. He scanned a few of the creatures, but their stat sheets didn't pop up.

Emissary of Ashenzari - Dark Forest - Supreme Existence

A powerful adherent of the cult of Ashenzari. An elite capable of fighting ten other Sentients at the same time. Fast and strong, their lacking defense is improved by the quality of their armor. Ashenzari's Emissarys possess the power to tap into nature itself, making them especially deadly in dense woodlands.

Warrior of Ashenzari - Dark Forest - Guardian

A high-ranking adherent of the cult of Ashenzari. A powerful warrior who fights to protect their designated Emissary. Capable of entering a Battle Rage, they can rip through the defenses of their enemies, tearing their flesh and bones apart with great ease.

Priest of Ashenzari - Dark Forest - Devotee

A faithful worshiper of Ashenzari. Capable of healing their allies swiftly through Ashenzari's Blessing while also wielding great power through their curse magic. Ashenzari's Priests are capable of peering into the darkness within the hearts of others and snuffing their life out, should that darkness prove oppressive enough.

"These are strong enemies." Timothy said quietly. "We don't want to fight them. They might be the apex predators of the Dark Forest."

Just as Timothy spoke, the lone Emissary atop the giant lizard suddenly turned its head. The Emissary was wearing a golden mask made in the style of a giant diamond, obscuring its face. But even so, Timothy felt as if he had been spotted.

[A powerful entity has observed your location.]

A warning appeared in front of him, generated by Yredelemnul's Eye. Timothy froze, and his heart nearly stopped.

Another notification appeared.

[A powerful entity has recognized that you are a devotee of a fellow Dark One. The powerful entity has lost interest in you.]

The Emissary looked at Timothy for all of five seconds, then looked away. The procession continued, leaving Timothy sweating nervously until they had passed far, far out of range.

"Was it just me, or did that strong guy look in our direction?" Marigold asked, levitating behind Timothy. "He was really scary."

[It seems the creature sensed something amiss, but then it lost interest.] Ferral replied.

[We're fortunate they passed us by.] Raavul added. [If we were to fight those monsters, we would have been annihilated. They were all at the peak of mortal strength. Each was stronger than a Demon Emperor.]

Timothy's expression distorted. "What about the one on top of the mount?"

[You would experience great fear if I told you.] Raavul said simply.

Timothy wasn't sure why his Eye couldn't detect the creature's stats. Maybe it was because Ashenzari was one of the 'dark ones'? He didn't know who they were, but they sounded scary. It seemed they also mistook him for a fellow devotee, but he knew he wasn't one.

Timothy thought for a moment, then he remembered that Yredelemnul's Eye stated it once belonged to a 'Dark One.' Could that have been what the Emissary detected?

I'm lucky I had this skill. It caused a misunderstanding that helped us out! Timothy thought.

Obviously, he wasn't a devotee of a 'Dark One', but he did possess a fragment of one individual's power. If it caused strong enemies to avoid him, then the effect was good in his eyes.

Once Ashenzari's procession passed, the group continued onward. They traveled for six more hours without incident, and no enemies pursued them either.

Eventually, everyone came to a stop. They spotted a tree with particularly dense branches, and after making sure no other life forms were nearby, the tired group stopped to make camp for the night.

"Do either of you need to sleep? You've been doing all the work, levitating us around and such." Paimon said to the Psions.

[Psions do not require sleep.] Ferral said. [I am indeed somewhat drained, but a few hours of meditation will restore my mind back to its full capacity.]

[I will take the first watch.] Raavul added. [Ferral, you will meditate, and once you have rested, I will meditate next. I have more energy than you. As your senior, taking the first watch is only natural.]

Timothy was exhausted. He looked at Marigold. She seemed to be full of energy.

"Did you get lots of sleep on the way over here?" Timothy asked, his words sarcastic but also tinged with bitterness.

"I already said I was sorry!" Marigold snapped back. "I don't know why I dozed off. I got plenty of sleep last night, I just felt like my eyelids were really heavy."

Timothy shook his head. "Whatever. Just try not to let it happen again. If you're feeling sleepy, just tell us. If you don't, someone could sneak up on us."

"Sure." Marigold said, but it was clear she was angry about being interrogated like this.

Timothy reached into his inventory and pulled out some sleeping bags and pillows. He offered them to Marigold and Paimon, but Marigold didn't seem too sleepy, and Paimon was a Demon Grunt, so he could probably go another 2 or 3 days without sleep.

Sadly, Timothy, even though he was a Player, was still only a human in the end. He needed his beauty sleep.

As such, he laid his head down and fell fast asleep within minutes.

Half an hour later, Marigold slid over to Paimon's side. He was meditating to rest his mind a little without actually needing to sleep. When he sensed Marigold's presence, Paimon turned to look at her.

"Do you need something?" Paimon asked.

Marigold kept her voice low. "I'm so sorry I fell asleep earlier. I didn't mean to!"

"I know you didn't. Timothy does too. Perhaps the darkness of the forest tricked your senses into thinking it was night-time. Your body reacted accordingly."

"Maybe that's it." Marigold mumbled. "Or maybe I'm just not dependable..."

Marigold sighed. She felt terrible, but she didn't know what to do. She thought the Dungeon would be exciting and fun, but so far all the party had done was run and hide from monsters she couldn't even see properly. It was more boring and irritating than anything else.

"I hope something fun happens soon." Marigold grumbled. "Then I'll be able to show off my worth."

Paimon shook his head.

"Be careful what you wish for."

Part 749: I'm His Emissary

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy slept deeply for six hours. He woke up with a start, only to find that everyone else was awake and either meditating or sitting quietly. His heart momentarily racing, Timothy sat up and looked around.

"Welcome back to the world of the wakeful." Paimon said quietly.

He was lightly teasing Timothy, but Timothy didn't even register the joking tone. He patted his chest and looked around with trembling eyes.

"Hm? Timmy? Something wrong?" Marigold asked, picking up on his odd behavior.

"I fell asleep..." Timothy said.

"Yes. You were quite tired, after a long day running from enemies." Paimon said.

"No. I mean, I fell asleep way too easily." Timothy said. He rested his back against the tree and shivered. "I always toss and turn for at least thirty minutes, and that's in a comfy bed. How the hell did I fall asleep so quickly in a situation like this, with danger surrounding us, and also being way up in a tree? I don't exactly have a fear of heights, but I'm not not afraid of heights. I should have been at least a little nervous."

Marigold shrugged. "It sounds like you're really underestimating how tired you were to me."

"Yeah?" Timothy challenged. "And you fell asleep not long after we entered the forest even though you really shouldn't have been tired at all. Don't you find that a bit strange?"

Paimon and Raavul looked over at the other three. Raavul slightly frowned.

[Now that you mention it, that does seem somewhat... suspicious.] Raavul said. She didn't elaborate.

"Marigold, did you sleep at all?" Timothy asked. "While I was out, I mean."

Marigold looked miffed. She felt as if Timothy were interrogating her again, bringing back her bad mood from earlier. "I wasn't sleepy! I stayed up and kept watch with the others! Jeez, no need to be such a jerk!"

"That's not... not what I'm saying..." Timothy said.

Timothy looked to the right. He looked to the left.

The forest was, as always, eerily silent. Their voices should have spread out quite far, but the Dark Forest seemed to consume noise, making it dissolve into the darkness within seconds.

Timothy shivered again. He rubbed his arms. "Something's not right. Raavul, Ferral, check the area! Are we alone? I feel like I'm being watched."

Raavul raised an eyebrow. Her many eyes and investigative psionics swept a 1000-meter zone around their tree. Her senses were more attuned than all of the others, and she could detect finer details at greater distances than even Ferral.

[Nothing. We're alone for a kilometer in every direction.] Raavul said.

Paimon activated his T-REX. He turned on its various scanning sensors and stood up, turning slowly to surveil every direction he could.

"Nothing." Paimon said. "Timothy... you're not going mad on us, are you?"

Timothy activated his T-REX. He tossed his bedding into his inventory and shakily stood up.

"I'm fucking serious, guys. I feel like I'm about to throw up here. There's something looking at me, and I don't know from what direction."

Timothy suddenly realized something. He activated his best skill, the Eye of Yredelemnul. He looked out into the distance and activated it once, but found nothing. Then he looked a little more to the right...

His heart stopped.

Five trees away, the Eye of Yredelemnul popped up outlines of three somethings clinging stealthily to the sides of the tree. For a brief moment, Timothy locked gazes with an amber-eyed creature with vertical slit pupils.

"SHIT!" Timothy screamed inside his T-REX. "They're everywhere! We're surrounded! RUN!"

The others didn't immediately believe him, but the panic in Timothy's voice made Raavul and Ferral react instinctively. They summoned a shield of psionic energy around the group.

As if on cue, objects flew out of the trees from all directions. Javelins, rocks, other primitive projectiles slammed into the hastily formed shield with alarming power, rattling both Psion's bones and making them cry out in pain. It was as if thirty trolls had hammered down on their shield with giant clubs made of stone!

[Aaargh! What power!] Ferral cried.

Timothy continued to look around. The more he activated his Eye, the more he saw these unknown creatures surrounding them. Even at this moment, more were stealthily sneaking through the underbrush and climbing the trees. Their camouflage was so potent that the Psions still couldn't detect them, and neither could the T-REXes.

After the first barrage, a second round flew toward the group. Unable to determine exactly where the hidden creatures were, Raavul and Ferral had to blindly grab the others, yank them off the tree, and dive down toward the foliage below.

It was then that the Psions got their first look at the creatures, as they finally spotted a pair directly below the tree, looking up at the group of non-forest denizens falling toward them. They looked like goblins, but their skin was mottled and green. When they didn't move, they blended in perfectly with the foliage. The only way to spot them was when they moved, by following the trail of their ember-colored eyes.

Raavul and Ferral curved the fall of the group clumsily, but they succeeded in pulling up before they slammed everyone to their deaths against the forest floor. After pulling up, they raced forward, Paimon aiming his rifle around wildly, but unable to spot a single enemy.

Marigold also pulled out a rifle, one that was modified to better fit her larger claws. Her pupils, the eyes of a predator, narrowed to slits as she carefully looked around.

KZAAT!

A bright blue beam of electrical energy fired from the tip of her rifle. It was so bright it caused temporary blindness in anyone looking at Timothy's party from the direction Marigold was facing. Several of the goblin-like creatures screeched as their sensitive eyes conjured tears of pain.

The beam of blue energy struck one of the creatures and instantly lit it on fire, causing it to cry in a high-pitched voice. It leaped into the jungle foliage, spreading fire and flames as it ran.

At this point, Timothy had a brief moment to check the information he'd scanned from these creatures. He quickly looked at it.

Dark Forest Stalker - Middle Mortal

A powerful species variant of the Goblins. These creatures possess potent camouflage, acute senses of sight, hearing, and smell, and can track their prey for tens of kilometers. Once they mass up in sufficient number, they will strike, leaving their enemy no time to react. Their strength and claws allow them to easily tear flesh from bone.

Timothy's pupils constricted. Middle Mortals, those were on the same level as Demon Dukes! Each one of these creatures was that strong?! His group didn't have a chance!

Even as they flew away, the Dark Forest Stalker Marigold had lit on fire hadn't actually died. It eventually put out the flames on its body and simply curled up on the ground, trembling in pain. Since it didn't die, she received no experience, gold or items.

She couldn't shoot it again, either. The Psions were flying the party away as fast as they could. With no other choice, Marigold simply took aim again and shot another bright blue beam of energy out, causing another Stalker to scream in agony. She shot two more times, but unfortunately missed, before shooting again and hitting a third target.

Frustratingly, no matter how many of the bastards she shot, the hardy little creatures didn't actually die. This caused her rage to build.

Timothy and Paimon weren't sitting on their laurels either. Timothy reached into his inventory and pulled out a couple of flashbang grenades. He threw them in different directions behind the party, and after several seconds, they exploded, stunning the Dark Forest Stalkers who were nearby. Their senses were far more acute than those of humans, so the feedback they received was also much more painful as well.

Paimon couldn't see the enemies at first, but his demonic vision, coupled with the T-REX night vision, eventually allowed him to spot the tiny glowing orbs of light that represented the eyes of the Dark Forest Stalkers. He started firing his rifle whenever he thought he saw movement.

Surprisingly, Paimon's shots connected a few times. He wasn't able to kill the goblins, even with the astounding power of his AR-15, one of the most powerful weapons from Ancient Earth, but he was able to cause them a lot of pain and force them to retreat in a panic.

Still, the spears flung by the Stalkers continued to fly toward the party as they hovered forward at high speeds. The number of Stalkers in the area must have exceeded a thousand! Timothy had no idea how the group would have survived if they had waited on that branch any longer. It seemed the enemies had almost reached their target density and were planning to kill his party in one swift attack.

Minutes passed. A spear crashed into Marigold's body and rattled her bones, but her T-REX absorbed the worst of the impact. A deep gash was carved along her chest, making her roar in pain. The spear fell to the undergrowth below, and more nanites rushed in to fill up the gap. Her Spectre suit was not suited for defense, so the injury she suffered was worse than if she'd been wearing a Rhino or Thundercat variant.

Marigold gritted her teeth, her long jaw pressing together tightly as tears welled up in her eyes, along with anger. She fired more beams into the forest, lighting the area up behind the group as the Stalkers leaped from tree to tree to pursue Timothy's group.

Fires spread left and right. The forest started to burn again, and soon, even Marigold started to get some kills. Weaker creatures approached from the rear, attracted by the heat and light. Their dying screams produced EXP and gold for her, but she was too busy shooting enemies to notice.

Timothy opened his inventory. He blinked in surprise. "What the hell- where is it?!"

He scanned his inventory five times. The weapon he wanted... wasn't there! Had it been stolen?

"Where's the goddamn Sword of Justice??" Timothy cried out.

Had he stupidly forgotten it? Had he left it at home like a complete idiot?

An ominous premonition swallowed Timothy's mind. He checked his stat sheet, and his eyes turned bloodshot with rage.

All his stats had dropped by -1!

He hadn't even gotten to use the goddamn sword, and it had already broken, cursing him with -1 to all stats for 24 hours!

"Umi! What the hell, why did the sword break?! I didn't even kill any innocents with it!" Timothy complained.

Umi's tiny speck of light flickered into existence in front of Timothy's face.

"This is why you are an inferior biological. The sword stated that if you killed an innocent, it would break. It did not say the sword would break if the sword itself killed an innocent. You haphazardly lit a forest on fire. Do you really think all the creatures that died were guilty of great sins?"

Timothy's face fell. "Fuck! I don't know whether I'm more mad at you or more mad at myself for not realizing- goddammit! Looks like I have no choice!"

With the Sword of Justice broken, Timothy was a lot weaker now, and this meant his damage output had dropped considerably. With great reluctance, he pulled out the relatively ordinary Longsword he'd acquired from a Lootbox.

Timothy's best combat skill was Divine Blaze. He realized that in this particular situation, it would have terrific results in dealing with the enemies pursuing them.

Even though Timothy couldn't reach the Stalkers that were clearly out of melee range, he still shouted at the Psions. "Change the formation! Single file, wide-stance. Me in the middle, Paimon and Marigold on the sides!"

The Psions nodded. They didn't have a lot of attention to spare, what with their low Psionic levels, but they were able to change the formation from a diamond-shape to a line-shape. The Psions flew on the outside, with the three others lined up between them.

Like this, Timothy tapped into his mana. He could enchant his weapon with roaring flames at the cost of one mana per minute. He had enough mana to last 45 minutes if he cast no other spells.

And so, that was what he did. Timothy lit his sword on fire and started sweeping the forest below as they fled, deliberately lighting another massive blaze to slow down the pursuit of his enemies.

Screeches of rage came from behind. The Stalkers started to slow their speed as they continually came in contact with foliage and trees lit aflame. Their piercing shrieks, mixed with the scorching heat and bright light drew even more monsters toward the group.

Soon, Timothy heard a stomach curdling roar. A powerful creature, five meters tall, wielding a giant wooden club, rushed toward the Stalkers. It started grabbing the nearest ones up and stuffing them into its mouth while the Stalkers howled like terrified apes.

Whatever this creature was, it seemed to be the predator of the Stalkers. Not just one of them appeared, but five! The massive giants started roaring battle cries and grabbing at the Stalkers, spreading mass panic among their ranks. Before long, the Stalkers fled in all directions, no longer chasing Timothy's party.

[Douse your flames.] Raavul said. [Let us attempt to return to stealth.]

Timothy did as Raavul ordered, and Marigold also stopped firing her gun. Before long, the flames behind them turned into distant specks of light. The screams of Stalkers and other dying creatures faded away.

Timothy continued to accumulate kills, but the monsters that died were relatively weak and ordinary. They didn't give him much EXP.

Marigold was different. She also shot up in levels, eventually reaching Level 13! This was a huge increase, albeit not at Timothy's level. She clapped her claws excitedly and gave Timothy a toothy grin.

"It's not as fun as killing them myself, but leveling up is still leveling up!" Marigold crowed. She casually used a Full Heal to regenerate the injury she'd suffered from the spear.

The Psions tightened up the formation. They continued flying low to the ground, their expressions dark.

[That was close.] Ferral said. [If Timothy hadn't woken up, we might have all perished. Timothy, how did you spot those creatures when even Raavul could not?]

"Yredelemnul's Eye." Timothy said. "Those monsters were called Dark Forest Stalkers. They're a sort of super-goblin variant, or something. I don't know much about them, but apparently they were all as strong as Demon Dukes. That's why we basically couldn't kill them."

[How frightening.] Raavul said, her tone emotionless. [Demon Dukes are roughly as strong as 4th Level Psions. An army of a thousand... if they were to fall upon the Seven Hells, even the demons would have a difficult time killing them. And that group we faced was unlikely to be the full extent of their species.]

"If they only had a hundred thousand more among their ranks, I would be surprised." Paimon said, his tone deadpan. "There could be millions of those creatures crawling around this forest. We simply can't see them."

Timothy shuddered. He activated his Eye again and again, but he didn't spot any other Lurkers hiding in the darkness. Not for now, anyway.

As the group flew, Timothy looked at Marigold. Then he lowered his eyes and looked away.

"Hey... Marigold?"

"Yeah? What?" Marigold asked, crossing her arms. It was clear she was still angry.

"I owe you an apology." Timothy said. "It wasn't your fault you fell asleep. I realized it after I woke up. Those creatures... they must have cast a spell on us or something. After I set that fire the first time, I killed a lot of monsters. My stats were debuffed, and what happened to you happened to me. I fell asleep too. So... it wasn't your fault you passed out, and I shouldn't have jumped on you like that. I'm sorry."

Marigold looked at the side profile of Timothy's helmet. Her expression softened. "Oh... well, if it's like that... yeah. Um. I got pretty angry too. I'm sorry for lashing out at you too."

The wound wasn't healed, and trust would require time to rebuild, but it was a start. Timothy and Marigold both heaved sighs of relief. They felt a lot better after apologizing to one another, and a lot of the tension faded away.

The group continued to move.

Since the Psions were tireless, and since Timothy knew the Stalkers would be able to pursue them for tens of kilometers, this meant that laying down and sleeping wasn't really possible. Staying in one spot for too long could bring about another disaster. Enemies lurked everywhere, with the group frequently needing to change directions as they traveled.

"Hey, guys?" Timothy said, at one point on the second day of their expedition. "Which way are we going?"

[North.] Raavul answered.

"Right now? We're flying that way right now?" Timothy asked. "Because my T-REX's HUD says we're going west."

"Oh, huh, mine says north-west." Marigold added.

"...Mine says north." Paimon said, frowning.

[Mine says west.] Ferral said. [I hadn't actually looked at it in a while. I was following Raavul's lead.]

[Mine says north...] Raavul said. She glanced at Timothy. [Why do all our instruments show we are traveling different directions?]

"I... don't know..." Timothy answered. "Maybe the forest itself is messing with our sensors? Maybe it's enemy interference?"

A moment of silence followed.

[Timothy, don't you have an item that always points north?] Ferral asked.

Timothy blinked. "Oh, yeah! I almost forgot."

He reached into his inventory and retrieved an item.

Tin Compass [Item] [Common] [Utility]

Points north. Always. Even underground, underwater, and in dimensions where north does not conventionally exist. In those cases, it points toward the nearest approximation of north, which is sometimes unsettling. Does not interact with any navigation skills. Cannot be improved further. It simply points north.

The group slowed their speed until they came to a stop. Timothy waited for a moment, and the needle eventually pointed in a certain direction.

"It's actually east??" Timothy asked. "We were all wrong! If the compass is correct, we're going almost entirely the wrong way!"

Paimon scowled. "If that's the case, we might have been going off-course for a long while. We still have a deadline to adhere to. We can only hope that if we reorient ourselves and get back on track, we'll reach the edge of the forest on time."

The group adjusted their T-REX's internal compasses, but Timothy didn't want to take a chance, so he kept the Tin Compass in his grip and periodically started checking it every few hours.

Time passed again. It was now the fourth day of the Dungeon expedition.

The group stumbled into many different encounters. They ended up having to fight a powerful beast similar to the ones that ate the Lurkers, and that fight took them an hour to win. Timothy ended up beaten and battered, and Marigold wasn't much better off. Ferral earned an entire level-up off the fight, bringing him to Level 8.

At one point, they accidentally found a massive city in their path, a city built in the treetops, glowing with divine radiant light. The creatures living there appeared to be members of the Ashenzari cult, so Timothy's party had to take a huge detour around the city so as to not be seen by potential enemies.

Timothy was almost tempted to see if they could enter the city. Didn't that Emissary recognize him as an ally? Maybe Ashenzari and Yredelemnul were actually quite close and Timothy could speed up the journey by passing through?

Naturally, Timothy did not follow up on this idea. There was no reason to potentially throw away everyone's lives for a nebulous reward.

Unfortunately, as the group circled around the great city, a bright light erupted from the darkness. It shone directly on Timothy's party, startling and blinding them. Even the Psions were not immune to the blinding effect. Raavul and Ferral both ground to a halt, lifting their hands to cover their eyes as a single figure strode forward, a brilliant staff held aloft in its hand. The figure pointed the staff of light toward the group.

"Eratti, vishtuul mata Yredelemnul." The bipedal creature said.

It lowered the staff, causing the light to dim. When Timothy's party regained their sight, they saw a powerful and imposing alien-looking creature with pale white skin, flared cheekbones, two pitch-black eyes, and a completely smooth head. The back of the creature's head was similar in shape to a squid, or perhaps an arrowhead. The creature's skin seemed slightly wet, as if it were native to an aquatic biome, not a forest. The creature wore a ceremonial dress, but the lack of armor did nothing to obscure the fact it was an extremely powerful life form.

When it spoke, Timothy immediately understood its words.

"Greetings, followers of Yredelemnul." The creature said, its voice somewhat feminine. "We have witnessed your arrival in the Dark Forest. We wish to invite you to our land."

Timothy's heart skipped a beat.

This was an idea he had already thought of, but one he had shaken off as irresponsible and dangerous.

Now, it seemed he had no choice but to go along with the creature's wishes.

Timothy shivered. Since he was the only one who could speak, he had to take the role of diplomat in this situation. He projected his voice outward, through the T-REX's exterior speakers.

"Ah, greetings. I am Timothy... Emissary of Yredelemnul." Timothy said, cringing as he spoke. He really hoped he hadn't just committed a grave faux pas by labeling himself an Emissary. Maybe he should have said 'friend'? Ally? Servant? Slave??

"Emissary of Yredelemnul? Your power is lacking, but you carry a proper fragment of the Dark One inside you." The creature said. "My name is Sylphid. I am the 32nd Emissary of Ashenzari. What rank might you be?"

Timothy hesitated.

Sylphid could be lying. What if there were only one or two Emissaries and this was a test to see if Timothy knew such basic information? What if there were hundreds, and claiming he were of a position too high might expose his ignorance?

Timothy had too little information to work with. In fact, he had basically nothing!

A fraction of a second passed. Timothy's eyes flashed as he quickly came to a decision. He puffed up his chest and snorted.

"You are quite presumptuous, Sylphid. I am a Secret Emissary of Yredelemnul. My status goes beyond the concept of 'ranks'."

His words came out fluently, in the exact same language as the one Sylphid spoke. Sylphid looked the armored young man up and down. It was clear even without seeing his face or body that Timothy was not a member of the species among the Dark Ones' home galaxy, but the Dark Ones had long extended their reach out to multiple galaxies. It was well within the realm of possibility that, among the thousands of species throughout all those galaxies, there was one which resembled Timothy.

The bigger question Sylphid faced was... who were the other unknown Sentients traveling along with the young man? Sylphid had not seen such a motley crew in her entire life. Especially the one with the extremely elongated skull. It looked wildly different from the others.

"A Secret Emissary? I have not heard of such a thing before." Sylphid said.

"Well. You have now." Timothy retorted, crossing his arms and assuming what he hoped was a heroic pose. "I possess a powerful fragment of my liege. It was given to me in preparation for his future plans. You are unworthy to know such secrets."

Sylphid did not cower away. Instead, her eyes lit up in interest. "Is that so? I'm growing more interested in you all the time. Won't you and your servants come along with me?"

Timothy blinked. Servants? Did she think Paimon and the other were his lackeys? That must be the case.

He wanted to refuse... but Sylphid was much more powerful than all of them put together. He used the Eye to check her description, and what he saw nearly made him break his 'powerful expert' illusion from pure fear.

Sylphid, Emissary of Ashenzari - Dark Forest - Supreme Existence

A powerful adherent of the cult of Ashenzari. An elite capable of fighting ten other Sentients at the same time. One of the highest ranking Emissaries among Ashenzari's Devoted. Ashenzari's Emissaries possess the power to tap into nature itself, making them especially deadly in dense woodlands.

It wasn't the same description as the other Emissary. That told Timothy that Sylphid was not the gold-mask wearing Emissary he had seen previously.

Even so, if he went with her, there was a chance they might run into the gold-masked Emissary. Whether that would be good or bad news was anyone's guess.

"Allow me to deliberate with my party." Timothy eventually said.

Sylphid cocked her head. She levitated in the air, a long silvery tail swishing back and forth behind her. She made no motion to stop him, so Timothy took her silence as an 'okay'.

He turned around and switched to internal comms.

"So... this is the situation." Timothy said quietly.

He brought the others up to speed, and even though he couldn't see their expressions, he sensed from their body language that some of them were not happy about this development.

"You're playing with fire." Paimon warned. "We cannot delay. If a dungeon break occurs, all the monsters in the Dark Forest could break out into Chrona. Everyone we know would die."

"I don't disagree, and time is obviously of the essence, but do YOU want to tell the scary Emissary lady 'no'?" Timothy challenged.

Paimon flicked his eyes to look at Sylphid. She patiently levitated in the air, waiting to hear Timothy's verdict.

"I dunno. She seems nice!" Marigold chirped. "Maybe we can get a good night's sleep before we set out again?"

Timothy wanted to rebuke Marigold, but they'd been traveling for four days straight now, and they only had three more days before the quest failed. He wanted some beauty sleep too, but he didn't want to jeopardize the mission.

[I want to go inside.] Ferral suddenly said.

"Huh? You do?" Timothy asked, slightly stunned.

[Yes. This species interests me. I want to explore and see the wider world. If I shy away from every dangerous situation, then what wonders will I ever witness? I believe we might even find the exit to the forest faster if we probe for information from this female.]

Raavul lifted her chin slightly. [I am also interested in learning more about Ashenzari. We cannot overpower Sylphid, so we might as well accept her hospitality. Her gaze is warm, and I sense no malice. I am interested in learning more about her species.]

With that, there were three 'yes' votes, one 'no' from Paimon, and Timothy was 50/50 in either direction.

"Screw it. I guess I'll just say yes, then." Timothy said.

He turned back around, then opened up his helmet to reveal his face. Sylphid finally got a good look at him for the first time and was surprised. She didn't recognize Timothy's species at all.

"Sylphid. We thank you for your generous offer. My people and I are on an important mission, but I would very much like to experience the culture of Ashenzari's followers and compare it with that of my liege. This is my first time meeting your kind, so I hope you will forgive me if myself or my followers commit any minor errors."

Sylphid was pleased with the weaker Emissary's respectful tone. It was good that he wasn't too arrogant and knew his place. If he truly had a seed of a Dark One inside him, then he could become a formidable powerhouse someday. It would be a huge waste not to befriend him now, while he was still vulnerable!

"Ashenzari welcomes you. Please follow me into the Golden Glade." Sylphid said, smiling sweetly at Timothy.

Timothy's face flushed. It was only now, looking at Sylphid with his unfiltered eyes, that he realized she was actually... extremely beautiful!

Behind him, Marigold's gaze flickered with uncertainty.

Drat, she's a threat! Marigold thought. A huge threat!!

Part 750: The Golden Glade

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Sylphid was a graceful Emissary, one with seductive curves, and a pale white squid-like skin texture. Her long tail swished back and forth as she walked. Her eyes were completely pitch black, so one could never be entirely sure about where she was looking, except by inferring based on the direction her head was aimed. Her hands had distinct fingers, but her feet were mostly webbed, with five individual claw nubs poking out at the tips. It was clear she was a life form that was heavily adapted to life in the water.

She wore golden robes which were made of tree fibers. The robes looked extravagant, and they perfectly suited her, drawing any hot-blooded man's eyes to her figure.

Timothy fell into step beside her as the group landed on the ground and walked toward the nearby city known as the Golden Glade. It was truly massive in terms of width, and the treetops even rose many stories higher to shield the city's tallest buildings from the light of the outside world.

The city glowed with golden light, golden trim, golden decorations, golden everything! Where there wasn't gold, the outer city zones were mostly painted black, but the inner zones were painted white. It drew a strong contrast that made the outer city zones seem softer and less visible than the inner ones, which were far more ostentatious.

Timothy's stomach clenched up as his group approached the outer city limits. Surprisingly, the city did not have a wall surrounding it. Houses simply started to appear, gradually becoming denser and more numerous as they drew closer.

"Why aren't there any walls? Any guards?" Timothy asked.

Sylphid turned her head and gave him a cute look out of the corner of her eye.

"What fool would attack us? We are the strongest existence in the Dark Forest." Sylphid said coolly. "No matter what creatures you may have encountered during your passage, they would tremble in fear when facing our weakest soldiers. Any who attempt to poach our outermost civilians would be hunted and down and exterminated within the day. Thus, we have no need to visibly defend ourselves."

Timothy was surprised. "How strong are your soldiers compared to me?"

Sylphid chuckled. Her tail waved playfully. "You ask funny questions, hyuu-man. Unless you are concealing a tremendous power within that light frame of yours, I fear your entire group would be no match for the weakest soldier in the Golden Glade. Perhaps a demonstration is in order? Walk with me to the training grounds."

Timothy wanted to reject her, but Sylphid didn't seem to know how to take 'no' for an answer. He tried to phrase his refusals in the most roundabout way possible, but she just ignored him and dragged the others along.

Before long, the group of six entered the inner city. It was at this point they started to pass by heavily armored soldiers. These soldiers wore ostentatious gold and white or gold and black suits of armor. Their heads and faces were fully covered, and only the tiniest patches of skin were visible through tiny gaps in the joins of their armor. Timothy had no idea what alloy the armor was made of, but it was clear it was extremely durable.

Unlike his father, Timothy wasn't too familiar with alloys, ores, and other compositional materials. He wasn't much of a creator, since he'd spent his childhood playing games. It was only natural he'd be lacking his father's learned eye for such things.

"Sylphid, if you don't mind my asking," Timothy said, as they neared the training grounds, "what species are your people, exactly? What do you call yourselves?"

Sylphid gave him another curious glance. "You don't know? Since when was the name of Ashenzari's Chosen not common knowledge?"

"We... come from a distant galaxy." Timothy hesitantly explained. "I used unique spatial magic to travel here. My comrade, Ferral, is quite interested in learning about other cultures."

"You are able to pass through the Unknown to reach other galaxies?!" Sylphid gasped lightly. She gazed at Timothy with even more interest than before. "I suppose it is possible if you possess His power... since you are not yet Cosmics, the Galactic Barriers will not stop you."

Timothy wanted to ask what she meant, but he thought such a question could invite trouble, so he ignored it.

"Ah, yes." Timothy said. "Therefore, I am not too familiar with the species in galaxies outside my own."

"I see. Well, it's no secret or anything." Sylphid said, smiling charmingly. "My people are known as Sequids. We are, of course, the purest descendants of the Dark Ones. Ashenzari's Chosen inherit the direct bloodline of Ashenzari himself. You and your companions, by contrast, do not look very similar to the typical Dark One..."

Even though it was plain to see that Sylphid seemed to still harbor some suspicions, she didn't press Timothy too hard. It was clear that just by possessing a shard of a Dark One, no matter how strange Timothy was, he possessed a strong level of legitimacy in the eyes of Ashenzari's Emissaries.

"Is it rare for Emissaries to possess a shard of the Dark Ones?" Timothy carefully asked, slightly shifting the conversation.

"Indeed, it is highly irregular." Sylphid said. "It means a Dark One has given you a portion of their power. For a Ruler to do this, the recipient must possess incredible potential, or some other compelling attribute. Ah, look, we've arrived."

She led the group up a flight of stairs into a brightly illuminated Colosseum where hundreds of warriors, male and female, were sparring against one another. All of them wore black and gold heavy armor, and they fought in pairs, one versus one. At periodic intervals, there were white and gold armored elites surveying the recruits, shouting orders and disciplining their recruits, tempering their minds.

Timothy gritted his teeth. The troops below were the newest, rawest, weakest recruits who hadn't even formally entered the military properly yet. They still wore the black and gold armor, which meant they were part of the Lesser Echelon, something he had quickly picked up on.

Even so, when their axes, swords, spears, maces, and other similar weapons struck the armor and shields of their sparring partners, shockwaves roared outward. The constant sound of weapons banging against armor was deafening, like listening to a constant hailstorm of artillery! How the recruits managed to hear a single word their commanders spoke was beyond him.

All of a sudden, the training grounds came to a stop. All the recruits slowed their attacks, then assumed disciplined postures as they turned and looked upward at... Timothy and the rest.

"Emissary present!" One of the elite commanders shouted. He quickly bowed toward her and punched his fist into his palm in a respectful salute. "Lady Sylphid! It is our honor to receive your presence!"

"Carry on." Sylphid said, her usually warm and cute tone suddenly shifting to one of a domineering ruler. Her eyes become cold as she looked down on the soldiers below. "I am only casually showing off the glory of the Golden Grove to some new friends I've made. As you were."

"Yes, Lady Sylphid!" The commander shouted. Like this, the troops quickly returned to their previous sparring, only now Timothy noticed that their attacks were more frenzied than before, as if to put on a good show for the Emissary.

He glanced at Sylphid out of the corner of his eye. "You seem to be quite high up in the hierarchy here."

"Hmph!" Sylphid said, returning to her previous girly demeanor. It was as if she'd become a different person again. "A bunch of groveling weaklings, I have to maintain a fierce attitude before them. It's not the same as when I get to speak to an equal. I am allowed to relax my guard a little in the presence of a fellow Emissary."

"Ah, I see." Timothy said, smiling once again.

Every so often, as they chatted, Timothy would explain some of what was happening to the others, but it was clear he wasn't doing a great job. They were missing 60% or more of the context of his and Sylphid's conversation.

Steam metaphorically started to pour out of Marigold's ears. She didn't like that some new girl was getting close to her man, and Timothy seemed oblivious to Sylphid's charms. The problem was, anything she said, Sylphid just ignored. Marigold wasn't able to speak Sylphid's language, and neither were the others.

"Don't you guys see a problem with this situation?" Marigold hissed.

"Of course I do." Paimon said, his voice low. "I objected to coming here, but nobody listened to me. Now we have to pray we'll be able to break free and make it to our destination in time."

[I am quite enjoying this side-journey.] Ferral said, his eyes revealing a rare trace of excitement. All the sights and sounds were enthralling to him. He particularly enjoyed the exotic tree-based architecture of the Golden Grove, the treehouses suspended high in the sky, and the color scheme of the two city partitions.

[Whatever these creatures are, they are not simple.] Raavul said evenly. [I am learning a lot about their culture. If these 'Sequids' attacked the Milky Way, we would suffer a disaster only slightly less fearsome than the Kolvaxians. Other galaxies are not to be underestimated.]

Timothy continued following Sylphid around. She led the group to the gardens, where beautiful alien flowers wound around smaller trees and arches to create beautiful and somber sights for weary travelers. She led them to the Prophet's Eye, a beautiful blue pool of water that glowed with radiant light year round. She even brought them to the Chaos Gate, a surprisingly sinister room with dozens of statues surrounding a crackling gateway imbued with dark energy.

"This is a chamber empowered by the purest energy of our deity, Dark God Ashenzari." Sylphid explained. "Through this gate, one can travel across the galaxy, even potentially entering Ripspace. But those who survive when they enter are few in number, and even fewer return intact. Across the thousands who have taken the Final Vows for our god, less than one in ten thousand have ever made it back to the Dark Forest."

"Ripspace, huh?" Timothy muttered. He vaguely recalled that his mother had mentioned it once or twice in the past, but his memory was hazy. "What is Ripspace, exactly?"

Sylphid gave him another one of her strange looks. She remained silent for a few moments before explaining.

"Ripspace is one of the only known ways to traverse the cosmos, prior to the beginning of the Galaxy Wars. Even once the Great Game begins, Ripspace is still a safer way of traveling than by crossing the Unknown."

"You said only one in ten thousand return intact." Timothy pointed out. "That sounds pretty damn unsafe to me."

"If the goal is to someday return, then the odds are indeed quite awful." Sylphid acknowledged. "However, if the goal is instead never to return, then Ripspace is not too bad. Those who merely intend to cross to a distant location will have much better odds of success."

Sylphid fell silent for a moment.

"There is one last place I would like to show you, but... it is not appropriate for your companions to join us. It is a location limited only to Emissaries like us. It is a sacred domain. Are you interested in following me there?"

Timothy hesitated. He wasn't eager to break away from his friends. How would he remember everything Sylphid said in order to tell them? He was already missing a lot of details. He'd be lucky to remember five, even ten percent if he had to store it all away for next time.

"Ahh, it's not that I don't want to, but my companions and I do need to return to our mission. We are truly grateful for the hospitality you've shown us. Today, you've opened my eyes to the beauty of Ashenzari. Still, we would like to continue our journey."

Sylphid stroked her soft chin for a moment. "Mmm. I see. I apologize, Emissary Timothy. I have been taking up too much of your time, but this place is... it is quite precious to me. How about this? I will show you the sacred location, and then I will give you a parting gift before sending you on your way. Is this agreeable?"

Once again, Timothy paused, feeling conflicted. Sylphid had been quite kind, showing him around. Timothy wasn't totally oblivious to the fact his girlfriend was getting progressively more and more jealous, but on the other hand, was he supposed to tell an existence way stronger than him 'no'? Sylphid seemed nice, but he had to admit he was afraid of pissing her off.

"Let me... discuss it with the others."

Timothy said.

"Of course." Sylphid said, blinking her dark black eyes.

Timothy carefully turned and walked over to the others. He explained the situation, noticing the glare his girlfriend was giving him.

"So she wants to take you off for some 'private time', huh?" Marigold chuffed. "Well, why don't you jump into her arms then?! Forget me! I don't mean anything to you at all. I'm just a stupid ugly smelly crocodile, I can't compare to some exotic alien beauty."

Timothy's shrank his neck at her words. "Come on, Marigold, I'm loyal, I'm not thinking like that at all. You're getting jealous for no reason. I want to get us out of here, and this solves the situation..."

"Whatever!" Marigold snapped. "Do what you want. Run off with some hussy. I'm clearly overthinking it! Must be because I'm a slow, stupid croc!"

"Marigold's words are rich in anger, but they have some bearing in reality." Paimon warned. "We do not know this woman's true nature. You are putting a lot of trust in someone you only met an hour ago. If she intended to hurt you..."

"If she wanted to hurt me, the rest of you couldn't stop her anyway." Timothy pointed out. "None of us are a match for her weakest soldiers, let alone Sylphid herself."

"It's not HURTING you I'm worried about!" Marigold complained. "Kyargh! I'm sure PAIN will be the last thing that seductress makes you feel!!"

Timothy grimaced. "Do you really want me to turn her down, then? We're lucky to have made it this far."

Marigold finally hesitated. "Well... yes! But like, do it tactfully! It can't be that hard!"

Timothy groaned. He didn't want to make his girlfriend jealous, and she was right in that it was clear Sylphid's intentions weren't entirely noble.

In the end, Timothy had to prioritize his friends over a new acquaintance.

Timothy turned to look at Sylphid with a pained expression. "Ah, Sylphid, forgive me. My friends, they... they really wish to leave. We are on a tight deadline."

Sylphid's head flicked from Timothy's direction over to the others, then back again. "The yellow-scaled female... is she a sexual partner of yours?"

"Cough cough cough!!" Timothy choked on his saliva. He did not expect Sylphid to utter such crude and blunt words. "Y-yes! She is my, um, my girlfriend. We've been together for quite a while."

"I see. And she is... jealous of me? Does she believe I have impure designs on you?" Sylphid asked quietly.

"Uhh, I mean, I uh... yes?" Timothy said, squeezing the last word out through his teeth. "Um... do you?"

"By no means. You may reassure her that I will take a vow on Ashenzari not to attempt any act of fornication with you." Sylphid said, bowing her head respectfully. "We are Emissaries. Such acts harm the relations of our gods. My body must stay sanctified in order to bring honor to Ashenzari."

"Oh. Is that so?" Timothy asked, though the question was more rhetorical than anything else.

After a moment, he turned back to the others and repeated what Sylphid had said. Even so, Marigold's expression didn't change.

"Great, so she vows not to jump your bones! Well, I'll just take her word on it then!"

"That is quite a venomous vow." Paimon said. "For devout religious types like these, a vow on their god is extremely solemn. I would not dare to call her a liar. It would be a terrible breach of decorum."

[I concur.] Raavul said. [Since she has vowed on her god's name, I do not see the harm in one last visit. This could be a good chance to observe the secrets of extragalactic civilizations.]

[I wish I could go with Timothy.] Ferral said wistfully. [I wish to see Ashenzari's sacred chamber for myself.]

Marigold once again was outvoted. Seeing that she wouldn't get her way, she turned on her heel and stormed away. It didn't matter if Sylphid made a vow or not, Marigold simply didn't trust a man-stealing hussy no matter what she said!

Timothy turned back to Sylphid. "I'm sorry. My girlfriend really doesn't... trust you. I'm rather embarrassed."

"No. It is fine." Sylphid replied. "I am quite inexperienced in the relations between sexes, but I can vaguely understand her distrust. If you wish to depart, then you may leave. I do not wish to put you in an uncomfortable position."

Timothy hesitated, yet again. He saw Sylphid's earnest expression and compared it with Marigold's sulking, angry one. It wasn't that he didn't understand his girlfriend's reaction, but for Pete's sake, he was supposed to be an Emissary speaking to a fellow Emissary. Did she have to drag her mind through the gutter all the time?

Wasn't he his own man? Did he have to pass on things just because his girlfriend didn't like them?

Was he Timothy, or was he 'Timothy, property of Marigold'?

That thought hardened his heart. After a long moment of thinking, Timothy shook his head. "No, I should apologize to you. You've been nothing but kind to me and my friends.

Take me to your Sacred Chamber. Since you've vowed on Ashenzari, I will not disrespect you any further."

"Truly?!" Sylphid asked, her eyes lighting up. She clapped her hands happily. "I am pleased that you have changed your mind! Do not worry, once you see the glory of Ashenzari, you will understand the true beauty of being an Emissary!"

With that, Timothy left his party behind.

He was alone in potential enemy territory. But Timothy was not afraid.

Timothy glanced at his stats as he walked. He had leveled up 11 times. He was level 21 now. He had acquired many new options, and had even ruminated on the possibilities while flying with the Psions over the last couple of days. He hadn't activated any of his level-up options yet, since he wanted to wait until he was back home, but the option was there, nevertheless, merely a thought away.

Among these rewards were several chances to level up two Skills at once.

If I end up being cornered, I might have to empower my Divine Blaze skill to drastically raise my striking power. Or maybe I should focus on defense? Speed? Hmm.

Sylphid led Timothy toward a giant tree located in the center of the Golden Grove, known as the Ancestor Tree, which the entire city was built around. The closer they drew, the more shocked Timothy felt. The Ancestor Tree's trunk was nearly two kilometers in diameter. It rose all the way up to the top of the forest roof, and its greenery at the top was likely the shroud that kept the sun at bay.

There were tens of thousands of buildings constructed around the tree's trunk, with stairways the width of six-lane hallways winding around the Ancestor Tree at various intervals. Suspension bridges linked one giant branch after another together, allowing people alternative routes if they wished to traverse the Golden Grove's most spread-out vertical living space.

In addition to the structures built on the side of the tree and atop the giant, thick branches, there were also buildings hanging from chains, which presumably required either elevator access to reach, or wings. There were alcoves cut into the trunk, presumably leading into living spaces carved within the tree's interior.

"How impressive..." Timothy said out loud. "This is the most beautiful city I've ever seen."

"Thank you." Sylphid said. "My people have labored over countless eras to create the most impressive, powerful, and grandest city in all of the Dark Forest. Even outside the Dark Forest, other Dark Ones would not dare to slander our work. Everything we do is for the glory of Ashenzari."

They continued to approach the tree. As the pair walked, Timothy thought about everything he'd learned about Sylphid.

She was a religious zealot, true, but she had strong feelings about her purpose in life. Timothy was just winging his life, doing whatever came to his mind, often aimlessly, but Sylphid approached reality as if she was born to serve a purpose. It gave her a feeling of fulfillment, a reason to live, a reason to improve herself at all costs. She didn't only serve Ashenzari, but also the people and society around her.

Timothy had no strong beliefs. The King Network wanted him to someday overthrow the Volgrim Empire, and he'd sure like to become a great Hero like his father was, but neither of those could be classified as a 'grand purpose'. They were simply aspirational goals. They did give his life some meaning, but not the spiritually rich purpose someone like Sylphid lived for.

The young man certainly didn't think Sylphid was better than him because she had a grand purpose, and he didn't think she was worse than him just because some might consider her a deluded religious zealot. She was simply... different. He and her had their own viewpoints, and that meant they could engage in interesting, nuanced discussions.

Sylphid led him into a large entry way that tunneled down into the Golden Grove's Ancestor Tree. The pathway expanded, traveling through great halls of marble and stone carefully crafted by ancient artisans, tastefully applied with aesthetic care on the tree's inner walls, with patterns that sparked imagination.

There were countless statues erected, each one of strange creatures Timothy actually found somewhat... disturbing. It seemed to him that the Dark Ones primarily consisted of a series of aquatic species. Tentacles were prominent on their hands, their faces, even their entire lower bodies. A theme he quickly noticed was that many of them had octopus and squid-like appearances in one way or another, but even whale, dolphin, and shark-like creatures were seen among their ranks.

A question nagged at the back of Timothy's mind. Why are they called Dark Ones if they seem to use light and dark in equal measure in their culture? I assumed based on the name they would be creatures of shadow or something, but it seems I was wrong. Maybe it's symbolic of something... or maybe they just picked the name because they thought it sounded cool?

Timothy wasn't sure, but if he asked the question, he'd definitely give himself away. So, he decided not to.

The hallways were filled with all sorts of prominent Dark Ones. Timothy discreetly scanned them with his Eye, but found they were not at the level of the Emissary. Thus, they were lower than her in the social caste. Everyone bowed to varying degrees when she passed. It was clear that deference to the Emissary was an integral part of the Dark Ones' culture.

After traveling down into what Timothy felt was the roots of the tree for ten minutes, they finally arrived before a marble and granite door, the left side pitch black, and the right side bright white. An etching made of gold was drawn across both doors, in the same manner as all the buildings outside.

There was a depiction of a massive bipedal tentacled creature on the doors, a supreme being who seemed to be rising out of the ocean, reaching a claw toward the horizon to snatch the sun from the sky. His wings spread out, ready to take him to the sky where he would complete his quest to devour the light that gave his world life.

The figure was etched with exquisite detail, such that even though he was drawn in gold, Timothy got the impression the monstrous creature once had eyes as blue as the ocean he rose from.

When they arrived at the door, Sylphid turned to look at Timothy. Her gaze was pointed, as if expecting something from him. The problem was, Timothy had no idea what she wanted.

A long several seconds followed.

"You're... not going to pay respects?" Sylphid asked.

"P-pay respects?" Timothy asked, clueless.

"Yes." She said, her faint smile slowly turning to a frown. "Surely you recognize the visage of the First Darkness?"

"The First Darkness..." Timothy said slowly, trying not to panic. He carefully gave a quick look at the creature, but his thoughts were completely blank. "Uh... I apologize. I was not... informed... of his greatness..."

Sylphid looked at him with a new gaze, as if realizing she was standing next to an idiot for the first time. "You jest with me! All Dark Ones, no matter their galaxy of birth, are to be raised properly and know of the First Darkness! It was his majesty that created our Rulers five thousand Eternities in the past and allowed us to continue existing long after our countless rivals fell!"

She paused before adding, "You cannot tell me that you don't recognize Lord Cthulhu's graven image?!"

Timothy blanched. His skin turned a sickly pallid white. "I... ah... Cthulhu is...?"

Before he could get the words out, the door to the chamber began to open inward with loud, almost violent scraping noises.

From within the chamber, a powerful voice boomed outward.

"Thief. You have taken something which does not belong to you. YOU ARE NOT ONE OF MINE."

Timothy realized the situation had suddenly turned bad. Before he could make the slightest motion to reach for his Inventory, Sylphid moved forward at blinding speeds, grabbed him by the throat, and dragged him into the sacred chamber. She slammed him onto his back in the center of the chamber, and a malevolent look of glee spread across her face.

"Thief, Timothy, of the HYUU-MANS! Did you really think your pathetic deception would fool ME?! I've been probing you from the moment we met! Now that I have you, I will take back the Shard of Yredelemnul, which you STOLE from my people! All of your secrets will become mine!!"

Timothy's heart nearly stopped from fear. He was pinned against the ground by just Sylphid's hand, but a suppressive force bound him and froze his body in place.

He couldn't move. He couldn't even twitch his fingers, let alone activate his Inventory or use his T-REX to call to the others for help. And even if they could, how could they possibly get to him?! He was isolated in an unknown underground area.

"Sylphid, no!" Timothy screamed.

Her betrayal had come too quickly. He was not prepared in the slightest.

Part 751: Sylphid's Betrayal

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy trembled with fear as he realized he was well and truly alone. He had no way to contact his friends. He was pinned down by an enemy who would likely kill him after she'd taken what she wanted.

The only option he had left was to talk his way out of this, but how could he do that when his mind was in complete disarray?! It was like a stampede of panic-bison were storming through his mind, shutting out all rational thoughts.

"Sylphid, don't do this! I am an Emissary!!" Timothy screamed. "You're making a huge mistake!!"

Unfortunately, even if his words were completely true, he had completely lost any appearance of an Emissary's demeanor. He looked more like a panicking child to the powerful woman who dutifully maintained a tight grip on his throat.

"Hahaha! You're still speaking those tired lines!" Sylphid cackled. "All the while, trembling and pissing yourself like the vermin you are! I knew from the very beginning you were a thief from the Milky Way! Did you think our intelligence was so weak we couldn't recognize Psions?! We've been planning an invasion of the Milky Way for eons! Of course we would know what the Milky Way's dominant species looked like!"

She sneered, looking down at Timothy with disdain. "I don't know how you were able to steal the power of Yredelemnul, but I'll find out soon once I extract your memories, your soul, and eventually the Ruler's shard itself..."

Saying this, Sylphid's eyes began to glow. She was very careful to maintain her grip on Timothy's throat, pinning him to the ground while using her other hand to motion toward a statue on the opposite side of the room. The statue was a graven image of Cthulhu, something that seemed to possess a tiny speck of power originating from the Ruler himself.

Magical energy surged from the statue into Sylphid's left hand. Then, she lowered her palm toward Timothy's forehead.

Suddenly, a flash of Timothy's life played out in his mind. He remembered a time when he was a child and he accidentally broke one of his mother's tools. He was so scared of getting caught that he hid the tool from her, but she found it eventually, as mothers do. She admonished him at the time, telling him that lying was wrong, and he burst into tears...

The memory surfaced, then it faded. Timothy realized with a start that Sylphid was already starting to extract his memories. She would learn all of his secrets, who he was, who his mother and father were... all of it! Everything!

He had to stop her!

For a brief moment, Timothy's panic gave way to desperation. His thoughts intensified more than they ever had in the entirety of his life preceding this moment.

In that moment of desperation, Timothy remembered something.

The King Network responded to his mental intent! He had to insert and extract items from his inventory using his hands, and he also had to do a few other things with his hands, but most of the functions operated by voice, or by thought.

He could still tap into his System to find the tiniest glimmer of hope in this moment of dire need.

That was when Timothy remembered another important detail.

She's trying to read my mind. But I have a way to block her!!

Timothy immediately called up his skill list, then activated one of them with a single thought.

Mind of Void, activate!

It was the best skill he could think of using in this situation.

Mind of Void

Immunity to telepathic intrusion. Telepathic attacks reflected back at attacker at 110% damage. Distracting thoughts can be silenced for thirty minute intervals at the cost of 0.9 MP/Min. Personality altered to PSIOPHOBIC.

* * *

All of a sudden, the way Timothy's thoughts manifested themselves began to change. His viewpoint on certain parts of the world shifted. He looked at Sylphid with an expression of pure disgust.

"Trying to read my thoughts, you hideous telepath? NEVER!"

Sylphid's eyes widened. She screamed as an unknown power suddenly erupted in Timothy's mind, traced backward through her telepathic attack, and slammed into her psyche like a hammer against an anvil.

Ashenzari's 32nd Emissary was sent flying backward, violently thrown from Timothy's body as if an orc had uppercut her chin. She hurtled partway out of the secret chamber and crashed onto her back, coughing out a huge mouthful of blood. The full power of the telepathic attack she had planned to unleash on Timothy had instead been reflected at her, with extra power to spare!

Timothy had no time to waste. He tried to get up, but the power that was pinning him to the ground seemed to come from the statue, not Sylphid herself. However, with Sylphid's grip no longer on Timothy's throat, the statue seemed to lose its channelled effectiveness. Timothy felt the force holding him down weakening, little by little.

Sylphid coughed multiple times. Timothy's surprise attack had rattled her mind and momentarily crippled her thoughts. She was like an average human who had looked directly at a flashbang grenade right as it went off. Her proprioception was thrown off, and her eyes couldn't focus. The world spun and twisted around her in a blur.

"Yuuhh... you..." Sylphid coughed, another mouthful of blood spewing from her lips.

Timothy grunted and groaned. He tried to push himself into a sitting position, but the force holding him down was still a little too strong. With this in mind, he used the Active Ability of his Mind of Void, causing all his distracting thoughts to vanish into the wind. At the same time, he used another active skill, Player's Fixation.

Player's Fixation

The Player can focus their mind for an extended period of time, increasing learning rate and speed for a specific task by up to 500%, depending on the Player's emotional investment and mental interest in the task. High investment and interest will result in a higher payoff.

Lower values will thus lead to a lower return. The player will be locked in this state for up to twelve hours or until the task is finished, whichever is the lesser time value. The Player will need to fully sleep back to maximum mental focus and then wait 24 hours before this skill can be activated again.

The skill seemed to be intended for researching and low stakes mental improvement, but Timothy had found during his training that it had another purpose, which was that when activated, it could be pointed at most short term tasks and it would remain effective until the task or goal was completed, or for twelve hours in total, whichever was shorter.

Thus, he chose to focus on the single goal of 'I must think of a way to escape this situation alive.'

Timothy activated Player's Fixation and Mind of Void's active ability simultaneously to try and think of a way out of this predicament. The results were as he'd practiced during his grueling two months of training with Blinker.

Abruptly, all at once, Timothy's fears, his worries, his misgivings and regrets, they all vanished at the same time. Timothy's thoughts became cold and precise, similar to when he adopted the Mind of Logic.

However, there was a difference. Timothy did not change his personality, so to say. He was the same as before, but more tuned in, less distracted. He didn't feel any of his usual desires or urges, but he didn't disregard them either. He still had emotions, and those emotions could become much more concentrated compared to his default state, and in direct contrast with the Mind of Logic, which removed emotions entirely.

He became capable of focusing one hundred percent of his attention on the situation at hand.

Analysis: I have 11 level-up rewards I can use to potentially break out of this situation, including leveling a pair of skills at a time. However, one of the level-ups did not offer me a pair of skill levels, so I can only level up two skills 10 times.

Conjecture: Even if I break free of my bonds and make it past Sylphid, I will likely perish after exiting the chamber. There are too many powerful elites in the city, and potentially other Emissaries as well.

Analysis: Combat will not win the day. I must use the power of my mind at 100% efficiency.

Analysis: The power of Yredelemnul can potentially be used to escape the situation.

Timothy's eyes jumped from right to left. He looked at the room. He looked at the statue. He looked at various alien relics placed on a table to his left, and several ancient scrolls on his right.

Nothing here would provide him a weapon or armor capable of breaking out.

Plan: First, I must level up Yredelemnul's Eye. Then, I must level up another skill with the power to help me escape.

Crocodile Form? No. I am too inexperienced with it.

Divine Blaze? It is my only combat skill. It will do.

Timothy could improve two skills on most level-ups. He could not improve the same skill twice. Thus, he didn't hesitate to start rapidly powering up Yredelemnul's Eye and Divine Blaze in unison. He didn't need his hands to do this, only his thoughts. The process moved as swiftly as his speed of thought.

Timothy looked with momentary astonishment at the skills he had just improved.

Eye of Yredelemnul L10 (MAX) [Active Skill] [Unique] [MP Cost 0] [AP Cost 0] [Cooldown 0]

The stolen power of a dark god courses through the Player. The Player can examine objects and entities with the Eye of Yredelemnul to learn more information about them. As the Player strengthens, the information available to them will improve drastically.

Improved+: The Eye can now see the full stats of nearly all other entities.

Improved: The Eye can sense the auras of powerful life forms.

Improved+: The Eye can better see the details of items than before.

Improved: The Eye can peer into unsealed files and perceive their full contents instantly.

Improved+: The Eye can now be used to peer through up to 100m of solid matter.

Improved: The Eye can now be used to subdue Sentient lifeforms with minds weaker than the Player.

Improved: The Eye can now be used to unleash a sight-based attack. The damage of the attack is proportional to the amount of mana spent, the Player's stat totals, and the Player's state of mind.

Max level achieved: The Eye of Yredelemnul's final two improvements have been split into their own sub-skills, [Yredelemnul's Disdain] and [Yredelemnul's Rage]. They can be leveled on their own to obtain additional, stronger effects. The power of a Dark One grows stronger within you.

Divine Blaze L6 [Active Skill] [Rare] [Enchantment] [Mana Cost 0.5/min (Sustained)] [Cooldown 0]

Enables the Player to temporarily enchant a melee weapon with a light and flame effect that deals a base 200% additional damage to most enemies, and up to 1000% extra damage against enemies weak to Fire or Divine attacks. Enemies resistant to both effects will take reduced damage. Remains active on the enchanted weapon until deactivated or until mana is depleted.

Improved: Your weapon now has a chance to Blind enemies when swung. This can also affect allies, so use with caution.

Improved: This weapon has a high chance to Smite undead enemies, killing them instantly. If the skill fails to Smite an undead, Smite will be unable to activate on that enemy ever again.

In addition to the two skills he had leveled up, Timothy obtained two brand new skills directly from Yredelemnul's Eye, once it reached level 10 and maxed out.

Yredelemnul's Disdain [Active Skill] [Unique] [MP Cost 25 or AP Cost 4] [Cooldown 20 seconds]

You have begun to tap more deeply into the powers of a fallen Ruler. You can now dominate the minds of other Sentients and scare them into fleeing, surrendering, or even devoting themselves to you. A failed activation of this ability may have no effect on a Sentient, or it may embolden them, making them much more hostile toward you.

This skill is most effective on Sentients far weaker than you. It dramatically loses effectiveness the more powerful a Sentient is.

Yredelemnul's Rage [Active Skill] [Unique] [MP Cost 30 or AP Cost 5] [Cooldown 20 Seconds]

You have begun to tap more deeply into the powers of a fallen Ruler. You can now unleash a sight-based attack that strikes with concussive force. This skill's power is heavily based on the Player's stats, particularly the strength of their mind, their INT, their WIS, and their accumulated knowledge.

This skill can hurt an enemy as if the Player punched them, or it can strike with the force of a cannon, and it can hit even harder than that under certain circumstances. Players with weak minds will be unable to tap into the full power of [Yredelemnul's Rage].

If this were any other time, Timothy might have been shocked senseless and leaped for joy at the upgrade he had just obtained. However, he was still in great danger. He did not have the time or the energy to feel any emotions during this imminent crisis.

I still have 5 more skill levels I can divvy out. Timothy observed. These two new skills may just give me an opportunity to escape my predicament.

He didn't hesitate. Timothy immediately dumped all 5 of his remaining levels into Yredelemnul's Disdain and Yredelemnul's Rage.

You have improved Yredelemnul's Disdain. Now Level 2.

You have improved Yredelemnul's Rage. Now Level 2.

With this, he improved both of his new skills to Level 6, and this empowered them beyond his greatest expectations.

Yredelemnul's Disdain [Active Skill] [Unique] [MP Cost 10 or AP Cost 1] [Cooldown 5 seconds]

You have begun to tap more deeply into the powers of a fallen Ruler. You can now dominate the minds of other Sentients and scare them into fleeing, surrendering, or even devoting themselves to you. A failed activation of this ability may have no effect on a Sentient, or it may embolden them, making them much more hostile toward you.

This skill is effective on Sentients somewhat stronger than you. It dramatically loses effectiveness the more powerful a Sentient is beyond that threshold.

Improved: Failed activations of this skill can now confuse Sentients.

Improved: Failed activations of this skill are more likely to cause a temporary mental suppression effect on the target.

Improved: Successful activations of this skill are more likely to cause a Sentient to revere or worship you.

Yredelemnul's Rage [Active Skill] [Unique] [MP Cost 15 or AP Cost 2] [Cooldown 5 Seconds]

You have begun to tap more deeply into the powers of a fallen Ruler. You can now unleash a sight-based attack that strikes with concussive force. This skill's power is heavily based on the Player's stats, particularly the strength of their mind, their INT, their WIS, and their accumulated knowledge.

This skill can hurt an enemy as if the Player punched them, or it can strike with the force of a cannon, and it can hit even harder than that under certain circumstances. Players with weak minds will be unable to tap into the full power of [Yredelemnul's Rage].

Improved: The Player can imbue this attack with the elements of fire or ice if they wish.

Improved: The Player can imbue this attack with the elements of dark or light if they wish.

Improved: This skill is much more likely to cause status ailments to enemies it strikes based on the imbued element, such as Burn or Freeze.

Improved: For 1 mana/second, the Player can channel the attack, ramping up its effectiveness over time.

With this, the only other options Timothy had remaining were the lootboxes and other rewards he'd earned on leveling up, but he had no time to open them, consider the options, and rationally choose the best items or skills. His current situation was dire, and he had to make a move quickly!

The good news was, after activating Player's Fixation, Timothy had sped up the thoughts in his brain by a factor of five. As long as he was 'solving a problem', which in this case was 'escaping the Golden Grove alive', the power of the skill would enhance his thinking power. But once he left the situation, his thoughts would revert back to normal, and he would even experience a decline due to exhaustion.

Thus, he had to make every second count.

Timothy thrashed around from side to side. He finally managed to push himself into a sitting position, the energy binding him feeling something like an invisible spiderweb pinning him down. But with each movement, the power of Cthulhu's statue weakened more and more. Timothy finally stood, breaking out of his quagmire.

And not a moment too soon. Sylphid also shakily stood up, her eyes bloodshot. It was clear she'd suffered a terrible blow from the reversal of her psychic attack.

"You... can... wield his power?" Sylphid coughed. "You really... inherited it?"

Timothy's eyes narrowed to slits. This bitch had betrayed him. All her cutesy antics earlier were nothing more than a ploy to get closer and isolate him from his friends. If he hadn't acted quickly, she might have turned him into a vegetable. In fact, she still might!

He had a 99% likelihood of death in the next few minutes even if he killed her, because there were still countless powerful soldiers in the vicinity.

Timothy slapped the T-REX on his chest, causing his pitch-black Spectre armor to engulf his body. At the same time, he thrust his hand into his inventory and whipped out his Longsword, the only weapon useful in this situation. A gun was probably more dangerous, but he couldn't imbue it with Divine Blaze, and the noise of a gun would draw other enemies like moths to a flame.

"You're gonna pay, you bitch." Timothy hissed. "Mind-raping scum like you deserve to DIE."

Timothy's rage boiled as he met the gaze of the Emissary. He'd never felt so enraged in all his life as he felt right now.

Just as Timothy was about to activate Divine Blaze and cut her down, a masculine voice spoke from behind Sylphid, outside the chamber beyond Timothy's view.

"Well well, Sylphid. You failed, as I thought you would. Useless, as always."

Timothy's heart dropped. A figure wearing a golden mask strolled into view. He was tall and slender; Timothy recognized him as the Emissary that had been out in the forest when Timothy met his gaze a few days before.

"It's you?" Timothy asked, stunned.

Timothy shivered. Killing Sylphid and escaping had a slim chance of success. She was injured, weakened. But this new Emissary had a much more powerful presence than her. He wasn't hurt, and his guard was up.

"Emissary Faceless!" Sylphid coughed, turning on her heel to look at the gold-masked man with a mixture of fear and anger. "When did you return?!"

"Long enough ago that I was able to witness the sight of your body sent flying. It seems your 'prey' had more bite than you expected? And now you've ended up in such a pitiful position... shouldn't you be on your knees, thanking me for saving your life? Another minute and you'd have died to this fellow's primitive weapon. What a pitiful end for an Emissary that would be."

Whoever 'Faceless' was, it was clear he wasn't an Emissary on the same level as Sylphid, but one ranked considerably higher than her. Timothy wasn't certain if Faceless was Sylphid's superior, like a commanding officer, or something similar, but it did seem the two of them had an internal conflict.

Perhaps they were semi-equals in named position, but Faceless and Sylphid were competing for rewards from a superior even higher up than them? Timothy didn't have enough information to make a determination.

"I have the situation under control!" Sylphid snapped. "Stay out of my business!"

"Oh, but it isn't 'your' business anymore." Faceless said smoothly. "This was your last chance, remember? You've disappointed Ashenzari for the last time. By the end of the day, your Blessing will be revoked. You are an Emissary no longer."

Timothy couldn't see Faceless's expression beneath the mask, but the sound of a smile was unmistakable in his voice. He was clearly very pleased about what had happened.

Sylphid's face turned a sickly gray. She fell to her knees and started to shake. "No... no, that's a lie... Lord Ashenzari wouldn't abandon me! I've been devoted to him my whole life!"

"Think what you like." Faceless said. "Now, while you sit there like a good girl, I will take care of this pest myself."

Faceless's head turned to look at Timothy. His blood-red eyes were barely visible through the holes in his mask.

"Are you going to struggle now, little hyuu-man?" Faceless taunted. "There won't be any point, but it will add a hint of spice to your final momen-"

A scorching red beam of energy suddenly fired from Timothy's eyes.

ZOT!!!

It crashed against Faceless's chest with the impact of a tank cannon firing at point-blank range. The masked Emissary's body went flying backward in a U-shape. He slammed into the wall hard enough to send fragments of granite and stone flying in all directions.

The corners of Timothy's mouth curled up, ever so slightly.

"Yes. I think I will struggle a little." Timothy answered.

Timothy stepped forward. He directed a withering glare at Sylphid. Her expression was dazed, as she had just lost something precious to her. If Faceless spoke the truth, then regardless of whether she captured Timothy or not, she had lost the support of her Ruler.

But what was strange was, when she looked at Timothy, her eyes didn't seem particularly hostile. She should have the same look as earlier, wanting him dead, but instead, it seemed almost as if...

"You truly do wield his power..." Sylphid mumbled. "I was wrong.. I was wrong! Yredelemnul's Heir, forgive me!"

Sylphid fell forward and prostrated herself at Timothy's feet, making invisible question marks pop up above his head. He hadn't expected this turn of events.

"What?" Timothy asked. His gaze shifted from Sylphid bowing at his feet to Faceless, who had collapsed to the ground from Timothy's flame-beam. Already, Faceless was recovering, and his injuries were far lighter than Slyphid's from earlier.

"You... bastard." Faceless hissed, rising to his feet. He gracefully pulled a long, wave-shaped ceremonial knife from his waistband and glowered at Timothy with rage-filled eyes. "A sneak attack. Despicable! I will take back Yredelemnul's power from you, no matter the cost!"

"Wait!" Sylphid exclaimed, lifting her head to look at Faceless. "You can't! You mustn't! He is the legitimate heir of Yredelemnul! We have no right to touch him-"

"Speak less, traitor." Faceless spat. "There are only two witnesses to this usurper's powers. After I kill you both and take Yredelemnul's shard for myself, nobody else shall know!"

Faceless lunged toward Timothy, and Timothy reflexively activated Yredelemnul's Rage once again, firing another wall-busting blast of the fire element at Faceless's advancing figure.

Faceless was prepared this time. His rush forward was merely a feint to draw out Timothy's attack, and he instantly side-stepped, causing the laser to pound into the wall behind him. The chamber shook, but Faceless was unhurt.

He charged toward Timothy and slashed the knife down.

Riiiip!!

The blade tore through the T-REX and cut a huge diagonal gash across Timothy's body, from his top right shoulder down to the bottom left of his waist. Timothy tried to deflect the attack with his Longsword, but Faceless's speed was above the level of even a Demon Emperor. If he hadn't held back the power of his attack, he would have cut Timothy's body in half and killed him on the spot!

"Ugh..." Timothy coughed as he fell backward, landing on the ground in a heap.

Faceless sneered beneath his mask. It only took one move, and the hyuu-man was defeated. His armor was sealing up the gap with its spare nanites, but blood was pouring copiously from the wound anyway. Timothy would soon be dead, so Faceless would have to move fast to extract Yredelemnul's power from him.

But first, there was another matter to attend...

"Stop!!" Sylphid cried, a moment too late. She jumped to her feet, having mostly recovered from the mental attack earlier. Her expression was grim as Faceless turned to meet her gaze. "You can't do this! He's a true heir of the Dark Ones! His status is higher than yours!"

"You always were an eyesore." Faceless said with venomous intent. He raised his dagger, and Sylphid belatedly realized she didn't have a weapon, only her bare hands. "You are Ashenzari's Emissary no longer. Even better, I have proof you're a traitor to my god. That means I can dispose of you."

Faceless started to swing his blade down. But at that moment, something struck him from the side.

ZOT!!!

A laser made of ice-imbued energy crashed into Faceless for the second time and bashed him against the wall with even more force than before. Sylphid's eyes widened. She turned her head to see Timothy pushing himself up, looking completely unhurt.

"L-Lord Timothy?!" Sylphid exclaimed in bewilderment. "But you... he...?"

"Nothing a little Full Restore can't fix." Timothy chuckled.

Sylphid bobbed her head. "Yes, yes of course! How can the greatness of Yredelemnul be understood by the likes of me? Lord, I will serve you until my dying breath! Forgive me for going against your holiness earlier."

She bowed her head, looking down at Faceless's shuddering body with a renewed sense of disbelief. It seemed Timothy was far, far stronger than she had ever realized before.

Timothy walked over to Sylphid. He frowned. "You will pledge to serve me?"

"Yes!" Sylphid immediately replied. "But we must hurry, Lord Timothy! The sounds of fighting will draw guards upon us momentarily. We haven't much time."

Timothy thought for a brief moment. He realized leaving here on his own would be nearly impossible, but with Sylphid at his side...

Unfortunately, Faceless's body was simply too durable. He started to climb to his feet again, and it was clear that he had been slowed down by the frost energy pervading his body, but he was still fully capable of killing Timothy once he snapped out of his daze.

Timothy looked at Sylphid once again.

"Then serve me well, Sylphid. I'll be relying on you. Before we leave, let me handle this bug."

Timothy directed one last look at Faceless. Faceless lifted his head to glare at Timothy, having been humiliated for a second time in less than a minute.

"You... will PAY!" Faceless roared.

He started to jump at Timothy, but Timothy's eyes flashed a dark purple color beneath his T-REX.

"INSOLENT." Timothy's voice boomed in Faceless's head.

Timothy activated the power of Yredelemnul's Disdain. A focused psychic attack crashed into Faceless's mind, and his pupils shrunk to pinpricks. At once, Faceless threw himself backward and plastered himself against the wall, looking at Timothy with eyes full of horror.

[Yredelemnul's Disdain has activated. The target has failed to resist. The Fear effect will be applied.]

[Due to the target's momentary weakness of mind, the Fear effect has been upgraded to Terror. The target will be unable to move for a short duration.]

Timothy grinned. He activated Divine Blaze, then raised his Longsword above his head, holding it with both hands.

Timothy slashed down at Faceless, intending to kill him on the spot. At the same time, Timothy made sure to keep an eye on Sylphid, lest it turn out her about-face was a distraction. What if she still planned to kill him? He couldn't let his guard down around her. Once bitten, twice shy, as the saying went.

But Sylphid didn't betray him. It was as if Timothy's every move were the actions of a god. Her gaze toward him had already become solemn, and it seemed she was on the path to becoming reverential.

The Longsword crashed against Faceless's body with nearly all of Timothy's strength. But then...

Snap!

The blade broke in half when it impacted Faceless's shoulder, the pointy part flying off to the side. Timothy had intended to cut Faceless in half the same way Faceless slashed him, but Timothy's damned sword broke when it made contact with Faceless's skin.

Timothy's eyes nearly popped out of his head. He was so shocked he forgot to breath for a few seconds.

"Oh... shit!"

He couldn't kill Faceless. The Emissary was too powerful! He had a body on par with Bael, which really showed how powerful Yredelemnul's Rage was to send him flying twice.

"He has been blessed by Ashenzari, my liege!" Sylphid explained. "Ordinary weapons cannot kill him. Hurry, we must go before the guards arrive!"

She shook Timothy out of his stupor. With her reminder, Timothy finally turned and ran out of the room, Sylphid leading the way.

Meanwhile, Faceless remained on the ground, shivering and shaking as he plastered himself against the wall.

"For...give...me...for...give...me..." Faceless muttered, over and over again.

Timothy had escaped immediate death, but his life was still in great danger...

Part 752: Escape!

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy and Sylphid hurried out of the inner chamber, but just before they made it to the main entrance of the Ancestor Tree, Timothy slowed his pace, causing Sylphid to stumble slightly.

"What are you doing?" Sylphid asked. "We have to move quickly."

"Only one person knows you are no longer an Emissary of Ashenzari." Timothy said, his mind still revolving quickly as thoughts rapidly filled up his brain. "We can use this chance to foment confusion. I want you to find some guards and tell them Faceless has betrayed Ashenzari and tried to kill you."

Sylphid looked at Timothy as if he were an imbecile. "Who would believe such a claim? I'll be found out within minutes! Faceless is much higher ranked than me!"

"You will, but every minute matters. If we spin the narrative first, we'll have more leeway to work with."

Faceless was surely going to recover from the Terror status Timothy had inflicted on him. He could get up and start chasing them any second now. Every minute they could gain was another minute they could use to escape.

Sylphid was a powerful warrior, but her thoughts were actually quite simple. She had lived a life of luxury and privilege, and was not familiar with guerilla tactics. On the other hand, Timothy had gone through a couple of months of intensive training with Blinker. It wasn't much, but that small bit of knowledge was being thoroughly used well in his special mental-state.

His thinking speed was accelerated fivefold, so he had time to come up with plans and counter-measures he normally wouldn't.

Thus, Sylphid had no choice but to go along with her new master's wishes. Even though she looked somewhat miserable, with bloodshot eyes and a battered body, Sylphid quickly reverted to her usual demeanor.

She strode out into the main aisle and assumed a domineering personality.

"Emissary Faceless has betrayed Ashenzari!" Sylphid shouted, taking a bold and uncompromising stance. "I have received word from Ashanzari himself. We are to hunt down and kill Faceless without delay! Call the Seven Water Lords and tell them to meet me in the Justice Hall. The rest of you, wait here for Faceless the Fallen to emerge from the room behind me. Capture him and take him to a holding cell."

Sylphid's declaration was so surprising and unusual that for a brief moment, the five guards that had just shown up were a little unsure of what to do.

Thus, Sylphid hardened her gaze and glowered at them. "On the double!"

Seeing that she was injured and had clearly fought a terrible battle against the 'traitor', four of the guards rushed into the room to subdue Faceless, while the last guard left to alert the Seven Water Lords, whoever they might be.

The moment the guards were out of sight, and earshot, Timothy hissed into Sylphid's ear, "Good work. Now let's get the hell out of here!"

They power-walked out of the Ancestor Tree, leaving behind a mess of disorganized and confused guards in their wake.

At the same time, inside Cthulhu's Secret Chamber, Faceless finally broke free of his state of Terror. His body continued to shake with fear, and though he knew his emotions were irrational, he discovered that he couldn't immediately recover from the mental damage he had suffered. Whatever that hyuu-man had done, it had severely injured his psyche.

"Bastard!" Faceless roared. He started to move to the exit, only for four guards to rush inside, pointing their spears at him.

"Emissary Faceless! For crimes against Ashenzari, we must place you under arrest! Please come with us willingly and do not resist!"

Faceless's rage momentarily vanished. He was startled by this development. "What... what are you imbeciles doing?! I am the last of Ashenzari's Emissaries in the Golden Grove! Did Sylphid put you up to this? She has been expelled from Ashenzari's Order! She is an Emissary no longer!"

The guards were not moved. They had received their orders, and judging by the ragged state Faceless seemed to be in, it was clear he and Sylphid had fought a terrible battle, with her coming out on top. Everyone knew Faceless was mightier than Sylphid, but now it seemed Sylphid had been hiding her power.

With this, the four guards knew what they had to do. They attacked Faceless together, striking multiple painful blows on his body, while Faceless fought back, quickly defeating all of them. Deep cuts and gashes were cut across Faceless's chest and arms, but he successfully killed the rebellious guards after a few minutes.

"Kah, pah!!" Faceless coughed, spitting blood in a fine spray. "Sylphid, I underestimated you! Good, very good! I won't let you get away, no matter what it takes!"

He stormed out of Cthulhu's Chamber, clutching his wounds as his hatred for the traitor climbed further toward its peak.

Once Timothy and Sylphid made their way out of the Ancestor Tree, they were able to travel much more quickly. It turned out Sylphid had the ability to fly through a unique form of telekinesis that was different from what the Psions used, but in a way Timothy couldn't really explain. She picked up Timothy, and the two of them raced back to where Timothy's friends were situated.

Timothy turned on his T-REX and spoke through it, informing the others of the situation. By the time they arrived, the group was armored up and ready to go.

"We're leaving?" Paimon asked, looking at Sylphid with suspicion from behind his helmet. "And you betrayed your people?"

"No time to talk!" Timothy shouted. "Let's get out of the city before it's too late. We'll chit-chat once we're safe!"

The group didn't have time to waste. Faceless could be on their ass in seconds, and the worst situation would have their group surrounded and captured... or even killed.

The Psions grabbed onto the other three, while Sylphid used her unique means to fly alongside them. All six took to the skies and raced away, with Sylphid explaining to the outer guards that she'd been given a 'secret mission' by Ashenzari and would be heading south. She made it clear that it was none of their business, and she had no need to explain herself.

After they left, the group did not fly south. They flew east first, then turned to head north. Sylphid's words were another minor trick Timothy thought up to get them out of the situation.

However, not long after leaving the city, a problem cropped up. Timothy's brain slowed back down to its normal state, and at the same time, he experienced a severe mental crash. Having achieved the goal he had set, Timothy's 'Player Fixation' skill had reached its conclusion and turned off, subjecting him not only to his ordinary brain speed, but a temporary 'depleted' state that made his thoughts more sluggish and tired than usual.

As such, the life seemed to drain from Timothy's eyes. He hung in the middle of the formation, exhausted beyond reason, while Marigold viciously grilled Sylphid.

"You bitch!" Marigold shrieked. "You tried to kill my Timmy, and now you think you can just join us?! Why don't you piss off and die, huh?"

"I was at fault, and I am truly sorry." Sylphid said. "I had eyes but could not see Lord Timothy's greatness. My god has already denounced me, so I shall serve Lord Timothy as my new master. Someday, I hope to see his ascension into a proper Dark One."

Her words, though apologetic, did not make Marigold feel any better. Steam practically hissed out of Marigold's ears.

"S-serve him?!" Marigold snapped. "You sneaky hussy, don't think I can't see what you're doing right now! Timothy, Timmy, say something! Tell this betraying, backstabbing bitch she needs to leave!!"

Timothy's eyes were glazed over. His head wobbled from side to side due to the backlash of Player's Fixation.

"Uhhh... huh?" Timothy mumbled. "What... you said?"

"I said- I said... never mind! We'll worry about the details later!" Marigold said, shooting a vicious glare Sylphid's way. She hurriedly levitated to Timothy's side to hold and comfort him. "Are you okay, Timmy? Do you need something?"

"I'm tired..." Timothy said, barely keeping his eyes open. "Eyes so heavy... can't keep... them open..."

The group was not out of danger. Faceless would likely resolve the temporary confusion Sylphid had created, then send out search squads to hunt Timothy and the others down.

But Timothy could not be counted on any longer. His mental state was at its weakest, and the others had to treat him like an NPC in need of protection. As such, Marigold pressed her jaw together and chuffed.

"Fine. Just get some sleep. We'll handle whatever comes next." Marigold said decisively.

Timothy nodded. His eyes closed a moment later, and he fell unconscious. He had pushed himself way beyond his mental limits, and now he had to deal with the repercussions of that decision.

But even so, the situation was far better now than before. Falling into a deep sleep was obviously preferable to being killed in the Secret Chamber!

After a few moments, Paimon gave Sylphid a long look.

"You, Emissary." Paimon said. "You can speak our language? Yet you pretended not to be able to do so, earlier?"

"I'm not an Emissary anymore." Sylphid said. "But yes. I could always speak it. You Milky Way denizens are painfully stupid. You blabbed your secret plans out loud right in front of me. You need to realize that in the Ruler's Game, your galaxy is simply meat on the chopping block. You have little knowledge of other galaxies. Your lack of a Ruler has left you vulnerable."

Towards Timothy, Sylphid was deferential and respectful. But towards the rest of his group, aside from feeling apologetic about the harm she'd caused him, it was clear at a glance she didn't give half a damn about any of the rest. Their feelings and thoughts meant nothing to her. She looked at them as weaklings. Her gaze was scornful.

Only Timothy had earned her respect.

Now that she had joined their side, there was no need to lie about the language barrier any longer. Paimon and the rest realized the Dark Ones knew far more about the Milky Way's cultures, its languages, and its species than the Milky Way's Sentients did about any other galaxy.

However, the Volgrim higher-ups were not as ignorant as Sylphid thought. The problem was, Timothy was not Unarin, and neither were any of his companions. Timothy and the others lacked millions of years of accumulated knowledge regarding the Dark Ones.

In this way, Sylphid's scorn was somewhat misplaced. She thought Timothy represented a 'ruling elite' among the Milky Way and the others were his servants, but her assumption was erroneous from the start. Timothy may have been the son of a Wordsmith, but that Wordsmith himself never fully reached the level of a ruling elite while he was alive.

Perhaps the thing that bothered Timothy's friends the most was that Sylphid simply didn't take the rest of them seriously at all. She dropped the act because it didn't matter whether they knew she was originally lying about speaking their language or not. Why would she care? What could they do to stop her? She was stronger than all of them combined, and with Faceless chasing them, they needed her power.

The group raced into the forest, levitating Timothy's comatose body as they traveled. Him being awake or not wouldn't slow them down or speed up their movement, so they made relatively good time regardless.

Now though, with Sylphid in their party, the group was able to be a bit more reckless. Other creatures recognized Sylphid and carefully shied away. An entire group of Dark Forest Stalkers spotted the group of six, but rather than pursuing them, they stealthily slinked back into the darkness.

[Sylphid.] Ferral said calmly, after three hours on the move came and went. [It is quite handy having you with us. We are able to speed up our progress drastically.]

Sylphid sneered at the young Psion. "Imbecile. Everywhere I go, the creatures of this forest fear my name. That is not a good thing today. Rumors will spread quickly. Those rumors will make their way back to Faceless. I have no doubt he's already determined our current position and is moving toward us, after interrogating the local residents."

The former Emissary returned her gaze forward. She knitted her brow in consternation.

"You lot are painfully slow. I have had to reduce my speed significantly so as to not outpace you. If Faceless catches up to us in three, no, two hours, I would not be surprised. I feel as if I am crawling out of the forest on my hands and knees."

She continued. "The Dark Forest is a place of isolation and silence. Only peak existences like myself can traverse it freely and without fear. Even so, there are other monstrosities hiding within the shadows that would see me without my assigned protectors and jump at the chance to devour me. This is a vicious land where the weak are prey for the strong. Even as I speak, fourteen distinct gazes are fixated upon me, monitoring my movements. If you have a method to escape the Dark Forest, you had better use it soon."

Ferral was not one to express emotions outwardly, but even he felt chills go down his spine. He quickly swept his senses outward, but he couldn't detect a single creature nearby. Either Sylphid was lying to scare him, or her senses were far, far sharper than his.

Sylphid chuckled. She easily felt Ferral's crude use of Psionics to feel the world around him. "You are not a permanent resident of the Dark Forest. I do not know from which part of the Milky Way your people came from, but you are nothing more than prey to the true monsters of the Dark Forest. Naturally, you will not be able to detect those who do not wish to be seen with your crude, unrefined abilities."

Ferral's situation was similar to a young tiger trying to catch and eat a jellyfish out in the deep ocean. Tigers were powerful and frightening on land, but when placed in the deep sea, they lost nearly all of their strength and would thrash and drown in the clutches of the unfamiliar terrain.

As for Sylphid, she was a long-time resident of the Dark Forest. She knew all the 'tricks' the creatures of her realm used to hide themselves. There were a handful that could evade her senses, but they were rare exceptions to the rule, and they posed her no threat anyway.

One hour later, Sylphid's expression darkened. She glanced backward as the group flew.

"He's coming." Sylphid said. "I can sense Faceless's approach. Is this really the fastest you lot can travel?"

[It is.] Raavul answered. [If I were on my own and not carrying others, I could triple my speed. But I am not, and thus, I cannot.]

"I don't know where exactly you're planning to run or hide, but if we don't make it to your destination soon, Faceless will catch up and our demise is basically guaranteed." Sylphid said with a grimace.

Paimon's expression was no better than hers. "We don't know where we're going, either."

"What??" Sylphid gasped. "Then what is your goal?!"

"North." Paimon said. "If we can reach the edge of the forest, we can break out and escape this place. By that point, we'll be able to use our... unique means... to depart this realm."

"The edge of the forest??" Sylphid asked in bewilderment, her skin paling further. "There is no such thing! This entire world is covered by the forest! Every inch of it!"

Paimon almost lost heart at her words, but then he remembered the fact his entire party had 'entered' the forest at some point unknown. That meant Sylphid's words were wrong.

Was this world real? Was it artificial? Was it a game-like environment with special rules the 'NPCs' like Sylphid didn't know about? Or was she correct and their mission was a lost cause?

"It exists." Paimon said firmly. "We've already passed into the forest from the southern edge. If we keep moving north, we'll find that edge as well."

"The southern edge?" Sylphid asked, before shaking her head. "I know not of what you speak. Such a border does not exist. Perhaps I was wrong to follow you lot after all."

"Then you can just stay behind! Shoo, go away!" Marigold snapped, raising her middle claw to flip Sylphid off. "We don't need you anyway."

"I wouldn't be so sure about that." Sylphid replied. "Once Faceless arrives, you will learn the meaning of despair in the face of overwhelming power. In my best state, I can only match his strength when he's not fighting seriously. Once he does, I will not be his opponent, and neither will any of you. Except for Lord Timothy, of course..."

A look of reverence entered Sylphid's eyes once again. Even though her dislike of his weakling friends only grew stronger with time, Sylphid's feelings toward Timothy had not dulled in the slightest. He was exhausted and weak now, but once he recovered, she felt he alone would be able to put up a fight against Faceless.

Timothy was the group's only hope. They had to hold on long enough to let him rest. Once his mind was rejuvenated, they might stand a chance against Faceless!

"There's something you all need to be aware of." Sylphid said, her tone shakier and more nervous now that she could feel Faceless's aura slowly approaching from behind. "Ashenzari's more faithful devotees can acquire immense power by binding powerful curses to their bodies. The more they sacrifice, the more power they can receive."

She continued. "I have cursed my body several times. That is how I managed to rise to the level of an Emissary. But the most brutal curses give the greatest boosts in power. Faceless... the curse he chose was one I simply could not bring myself to accept. That is why his body is as durable as Skyforged Steel, and his energy as overflowing and bottomless as the deepest sea."

Raavul casually scanned Sylphid's body. Sylphid was an Apex Mortal, an existence above Demon Emperors, on par with Satan the Devil and other Demon Overlords. However, she was clearly at the bottom of that tier, while Faceless stood at the pinnacle. Faceless was only a step away from becoming a Bottom Cosmic, at which point he would gain the power to flatten planets.

Given this, a mere 'Mortal' like Raavul would not be able to put up the slightest struggle against such an enemy. The same could be said for the others in her party.

One more hour passed.

Altogether, five hours had passed since the group had escaped the Golden Grove. It was at this point that Timothy finally stirred.

The young Hero shook himself out of a stupor and lifted his head to look around. His eyes were bleary. His mind was still in a fugue state. He couldn't think properly, and he had yet to recover from his mental exertion.

He needed more rest, but for some reason, a fear had built up in his heart as he sensed a frightening horror approaching his body. He shook himself awake out of instinct and looked around.

"Whuh... where are we?" Timothy asked, his speech slightly slurred.

"We're on the run." Marigold quickly replied. "Kyargh! That Faceless guy is chasing us. He'll probably catch up any minute."

"Faceless..." Timothy repeated. "Faceless. He... who...?"

It took Timothy's mind a while to revolve, to understand what was going on, and to remember what had happened. Timothy eventually understood the situation, but he had no sense of urgency. He was still absolutely exhausted.

"Shit... whuhdowedo?" Timothy sleepily asked.

"I don't know." Marigold said quietly.

"We will have to do everything in our power to make sure Lord Timothy survives." Sylphid said. "Everyone. I will stay behind and try to delay Faceless. I won't be able to do much... but maybe I can pull off a miracle..."

"Inadvisable." Paimon immediately retorted. "You are the strongest member of our group. With you present, we have a small chance to come out victorious by relying on teamwork. If you fight Faceless alone, we will lose without a doubt. I believe we might be able to prevail if we work together, using our unique strengths to catch Faceless off-guard."

Timothy might be out of commission, but Paimon was considered the brains of the group anyway. He was a demon who had thousands of years of battle experience to his name. He wasn't on the level of Blinker or Kar, but he was quite formidable in his own right, and he had a keen tactical mind.

"I'm going to require some of the items your mother gave you, Timothy." Paimon said as he pulled out the incredibly powerful AR-15 he had brought along. As the pinnacle of human weapon engineering, this weapon gave him the greatest assurance he could potentially take out Faceless. "I know you're not in your best mental state, but surely using your Inventory won't tax you too much?"

Timothy slowly blinked his eyes. "Yeahhh... sure... man."

Ten more minutes passed. Paimon quickly came up with a game plan. Then, the six of them came to a stop between two giant towering trees, with a deep lake of pitch-black water some distance up ahead. Paimon and Raavul flew to the left tree, Ferral and Marigold flew to the right tree, and Sylphid remained on the ground with Timothy amidst the dense underbrush, between both trees. She stood in front of him protectively, clutching a knife Paimon had given her.

This knife was a special one. It was made of Wordsmithium, and it had the unique ability to strike multiple times when attacking someone. It was a prototype Jason had made, but it had never been used in real battle. At the very least, Paimon thought it might be durable enough to kill Faceless if Sylphid could hit him with a sneak attack.

Now that the group had come to a stop, Faceless's energy signature roared toward them at a speed beyond comprehension. Less than a minute later, the Emissary arrived, followed by more than two hundred other warriors of the Golden Glade. Sylphid paled when she saw all seven Water Lords had also come along.

The Water Lords were not as strong as the Emissaries, but their combined strength could definitely hold Sylphid up, let alone when combined with Faceless's battle strength.

Timothy's group was screwed. There was no way they could come out of this alive.

"Hahaha..." Faceless chuckled evilly as he levitated forward, the warriors behind him taking up defensive positions in the air and on the ground.

All the warriors he had brought along could fly extremely quickly, and though they were not as fast as Faceless himself, they were still High Mortals on par with Demon Emperors.

"It seems you've given up." Faceless said teasingly. He sent a slightly anxious glance Timothy's way, but it didn't take a genius to see Timothy was completely exhausted. Faceless was able to relax a little, feeling some of the mental trauma from Timothy's earlier attacks fade into the back of his mind. "Or maybe you still think you can put up some futile resistance?"

The Emissary was in somewhat bad shape. Not only had he been slapped around by Timothy's eye-beams, but he'd also ended up slightly brutalized by those four traitorous guards in his weakened state. His body was cut up and scabbed all over, making him especially gruesome to look at.

Faceless chuckled again. He lifted his head and easily spotted four other little weaklings up in the trees. It was clear Sylphid had planned an ambush of some sort. But what sort of pitiful effect could her new allies muster? They were garbage, lower than the weakest dregs of the Dark Forest.

There was no escape. There was no victory. There was only death and the future rise of Faceless once he stole the power of Yredelemnul from Timothy's cold, dead corpse.

Sylphid felt her fighting spirit weakening. The seven Water Lords shook their heads wryly. They knew the fall of the former Emissary was nigh. Her tricks had fooled them for a short while and made them doubt Faceless's words, but strength was what ruled above all in the Golden Glade, and with Sylphid fleeing the city, it didn't take much convincing from Faceless to make them realize Sylphid had duped them.

She was an Emissary no more. She was a dead woman walking.

"Any last words?" Faceless asked. "I can grant you at least this much, after all your years of 'devotion' to the god you betrayed."

Sylphid trembled. She was... afraid. Only 24 hours before, she was a lauded Emissary, someone respected and feared. Now she was nothing. None of her former prestige remained. She had made a decision that cost her everything. She did not know how she could live with her decision, and it seemed she would not be 'living' in any meaning of the word by the time the next day came around.

Sylphid opened and closed her mouth a few times. She couldn't find the strength to speak.

Then, Timothy stepped forward and rested a palm on her shoulder. Sylphid blinked.

Had he recovered? Was this the return of Yredelemnul's glory, through the avatar of his successor?!

It was obvious Timothy was reassuring her with his touch that everything would be okay. He had a plan, and he was going to reveal it now.

Timothy smiled at Faceless.

"...Maaaan, shuthefuckup bro, you're jes', fucken yappin and shit. I amsooootired right now, like I could just fallasleeplistenin' to ya."

Timothy yawned loudly, a clear provocation toward Faceless. He blinked away sleepy tears as he struggled to remain standing by holding on to Sylphid's shoulder.

"Bro ifyou'regonnakillus then just, like, fuckingdoit okay man? I ain't got timeforyourshiiiiiiit..."

Timothy yawned one more time. Then he fell forward onto his face and started snoring under the undergrowth leaves.

Faceless's right eye twitched, ever so subtly.

"...Kill them now." Faceless said through gritted teeth. "But leave the hyuu-man to me."

Part 753: Defeated, Disgraced

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy fell forward onto his face. Still too exhausted to do any fighting, he collapsed, leaving the other five to protect him.

All hell broke loose. The seven Water Lords rushed toward Timothy and Sylphid, while the other 100 knights split in two, with 50 jumping up into the trees toward Paimon and Raavul, and the other 50 charging at Ferral and Marigold.

As for Faceless, he himself did not immediately make a move. He was badly injured not only from Timothy's attack on his mind and body, but also the four guards who he ultimately had to kill. Those four guards were elite soldiers stationed inside the Ancestor Tree, and their attack power had left him hurting.

Just because Faceless won the fight didn't mean he escaped uninjured. He wasn't Beelzebub. He didn't have a powerful healing factor. His body itself was extremely durable, but if injured, he would need a long time to fully recover.

Faceless watched as the seven Water Lords attacked Sylphid. She was, undoubtedly, the main threat he had to worry about. The other weaklings weren't worth a sneeze, but Faceless would be lying if he said he didn't also carry deep fear toward Timothy.

It was that damn hyuu-man who thrashed him thrice. Timothy had sent him flying with two eye-laser attacks and a psychic attack that left Faceless shaking in his shadow. Sylphid was only a threat now because of all the damage Timothy had done directly and indirectly. If it weren't for the hyuu-man, Faceless would be in pristine condition, his image untarnished, and Sylphid at his mercy.

The truth was, the power of an Emissary was second to their prestige, and their prestige was directly related to the air of authority they wielded. Now that Faceless had suffered such a terrible sequence of losses, and now that he looked like a dog that had been tortured by sadists, the Water Lords didn't look at him with as much fear and favor as before. By contrast, Sylphid was in much better shape. It left people wondering who was really the stronger Emissary...

Sylphid wielded the Wordsmithium knife Timothy had given her. Its reach was minuscule, and its cutting power wasn't as powerful as one might expect, but the knife was basically indestructible, despite its size.

One of the Water Lords swung a massive halberd down at Sylphid. She quickly raised the knife and caught the halberd's shaft with the knife's blade, causing a loud clanging sound to ring out. The Third Water Lord was left in disbelief that her hundred-kilo weapon had been completely stopped by a simple looking knife.

"How?!" The woman cried.

Sylphid didn't answer. The First and Second Water Lords attacked from opposite directions, forcing her to bend her body and launch powerful kicks at one of the approaching enemies. She smashed the First aside and sent him flying while dodging the Second Water Lord with her superior agility.

Water Lords were second to the Emissaries, and each one wielded power similar to a Demon Emperor. Sylphid might be a lot weaker than Faceless under normal conditions, but she was a powerful fighter on par with a Demon Overlord, and much stronger than the Water Lords. Only by coordinating together could they threaten her.

At the same time, Paimon and Raavul were working together to fight off the massive horde of powerful enemies charging at them. Fifty enemies all ranked between Demon Duke and Demon Emperor were way, way beyond anything they could handle. Raavul was only as strong as a Demon Baron at best, and Paimon was a Demon Grunt in the most literal sense.

Thus, it stood to reason they would die instantly. That was certainly what the overconfident Sequid Warriors leaping up the trees toward them thought.

The Psions could fly. So could Marigold, equipped with a Hummer T-REX, and Paimon, who had the other Hummer in his possession, as well as a Spectre in reserve. Faceless and Sylphid could fly, and so could the Water Lords, but the Elite Sequid Warriors they brought along could not! They had to climb the trees and leap around using their superior strength.

Their bodies moved agilely, smoothly, like sharks swimming vertically through the ocean toward the underside of their prey above.

Then, something curious happened. Paimon grabbed a metal cylinder off his waist, pulled a pin of some sort out, and threw it toward the densest mass of Sequid Warriors.

FSSSS!

A violent hissing sound erupted as the grenade he had just thrown burst apart, spraying sticky white-hot smoke in a massive cone downwards. It was no ordinary grenade, but a White Phosphorous Grenade that spread out in a fiery gas, adhering to flesh, metal, and wood alike. The air itself started burning the lungs of all the warriors, lighting their skin on fire, and causing their eyes to turn red from agony.

Of the fifty that were charging toward Raavul and Paimon, twenty were instantly downed, and the remaining thirty quickly retreated, visibly shocked by whatever the hell Paimon had just thrown at them.

Not ready to end the show just yet, Paimon grabbed the second grenade off his belt and threw it downward, but this time the pin popped off in midair, and the grenade started 'homing' in on the next largest group of Sequids that hadn't been hit by the previous grenade.

"No!!" One of the warriors screamed, as Raavul used her telekinesis to make the grenade explode mere inches from his face. The scream that warrior let out before he fainted from his injuries send shivers down the backs of the survivors.

At the same time, with their enemies in momentary disarray, Paimon pulled out his AR-15, one of the mightiest infantry weapons ever created by ancient humanity, and started taking potshots at any uninjured Sequids in sight.

Bullets ricocheted off armor and sunk into flesh. Though these Sequids were at least as strong as most Demon Emperors, their bodies were surprisingly vulnerable to fast-moving tiny metal projectiles. Paimon managed to dome one of the enemies in the head, which somehow didn't kill the Sequid but instead made it fall to the ground and start spasming like a snake on hot cement.

While Paimon and Raavul were dealing with their enemies, so too were Ferral and Marigold. Ferral used his telekinesis to try and push the enemies back down toward the forest floor, but his telekinesis was even weaker than Raavul's, so how could that be possible? He only managed to slow down their movements a little and occasionally throw off their jumps and grabs as they climbed toward him and Marigold.

As for Marigold, she had been feeling annoyed and restless ever since entering the Dark Forest. Even though a massive number of powerful enemies were charging at her, she felt no fear at all.

"Time to test out these new toys!!" Marigold cheered.

Marigold wore her Hummer T-REX, which granted her limited flying ability. The bright-yellow color also drew everyone's attention, making them target her once the wings on the back of the suit lit up with energy.

She leaped downward toward one of the nearest Sequids, who snorted at her with wry amusement.

"Come to rush to your death?" The Sequid taunted.

"Nope!" Marigold laughed, as she reared her fist back.

Too late, the Sequid noticed that both of her lower arms seemed to sport much thicker and heavier armor than the rest of her body. He had no time to reconcile this information as he sent a fist flying to meet hers.

BOOOOM!!!

A thunderous explosion blasted out of Marigold's fists, traveled into and through that Sequid's body, and sent him flying down at the ground nearly at the speed of sound. The Sequid crashed into the forest floor with a terrific bang. He broke all the bones in his body and died on impact, all without knowing he had even met his end. His death had come too quickly.

"What in Ashenzari's name?!" One of the other Sequids nearest Marigold exclaimed, right before she spun around and flew toward him. "No! NOOO!"

BOOOOM!!

Another terrific explosion of sound exploded against that Sequid's body and send him flying into a tree in the distance. His body exploded into meat paste on impact, leaving a horrific bloody mess in its wake.

The other Sequids recoiled in fear. They were proud warriors who had fought many battles and were not afraid of death, but the clear weakness of their 'prey' coupled with the sudden explosive power simply overturned their mental models of the world. They were scared shitless!

In truth, Marigold's power was not her own. She had taken Jason Hiro's experimental 'Thunder Gauntlets' from storage before she left, and now they were revealing their power when worn by a fine Crocodile warrior like herself.

The previously arrogant Sequids flew into disarray when faced with the power of an angry crocodile wearing armor-busting gauntlets. Many of them chose to charge at Ferral, since he seemed a lot weaker than her.

Those Sequids, as well as the ones that chose to target Raavul, made a different kind of mistake. When unencumbered by their companions, both Psions were capable of extremely quick and precise movements in the air. They possessed the power of self-telekinesis, granting them high speed and agility when flying.

Faceless and Sylphid could fly, as well as the seven Water Lords. But the Sequid Elites they had brought along could not! Thus, when they tried to attack Ferral, he simply switched to evading them, using his telekinesis to manipulate a tiny marble made of Wordsmithium as his primary method of attack.

This was something he and Raavul had found to be extremely potent. These tiny Wordsmithium Marbles were nothing crazy, literally just the remnants of Jason's experiments, but they were practically indestructible, difficult to dodge, and easy to fling around at ultra-high speeds.

Thus, the Wordsmithium marbles started acting like bullets that could bounce around, ricochet, and attack multiple enemies at once.

Ferral deftly flew left and right, up and down, evading ten different Sequids that had targeted him. He sent his marble flying with extreme precision, crashing against the knee of one Sequid Elite and causing him to scream in pain as the bone shattered on impact. The marble flew into the ear canal of another at several hundred KPH, bursting his head and spraying his brains out in a mist.

Like this, Timothy's 'weak' comrades actually put up a brutal fight against Faceless's Elite troops.

Faceless was shocked. He did not expect a tiny ragtag group of weaklings to possess such bite.

"It seems I have no choice but to directly intervene..." Faceless said quietly to himself.

With this, Faceless suddenly charged into the fray, rushing toward Sylphid right in the crucial moment the Fifth and Sixth Water Lords were pincer-attacking her. Sylphid's heart jumped. She sensed Faceless's charge, but she had to continue dodging the Water Lords, even as Faceless slapped down at her head with his bare palm.

CRACK!

Faceless struck Sylphid's face with his full strength. It was like a lightbulb had been turned off. The fire went out in Sylphid's eyes, and she was mercilessly pounded into the ground. Her body went limp, and she fainted immediately.

With this, the Seven Water Lords were suddenly free to go elsewhere. And so they did. The First through Fourth Water Lords charged up at Raavul, using their flight to come at her from all directions. Raavul's expression didn't change, but her internal organs felt a spike of panic as she was suddenly surrounded by four of the strongest enemies on the field.

Seconds later, Raavul tumbled from the sky. Her body crashed into the forest floor below, and two elite Sequids jumped on her to pin her to the dirt.

The same fate came for Ferral as the Fifth through Seventh Water Lords targeted him. With Raavul down, Ferral was the next obvious flying target. The Water Lords chased after him, beat him down, and slapped him out of the sky. Ferral crashed into the ground not far from Timothy's unconscious body. Ferral shuddered in pain, but he couldn't stand up. Two more Elite Sequids grabbed and pinned him in place.

Marigold screamed in anger. "You cheating bullies! Come at me all at once! I'll still take you down! Kyaaargh!!"

Her words were brave, but once all seven of the Water Lords arrived, they were able to outmaneuver her while avoiding her Thunder Gauntlets. With one brutal attack, they struck her head and knocked the daylight out of her, also sending her crashing to the forest floor.

Paimon was the last one. Seeing his friends fall one after the other, he knew the battle was over.

Instead of fighting for his life, Paimon did something that surprised the Sequids. He retreated into the forest while activating a Spectre T-REX he'd borrowed from Marigold.

He activated stealth mode and fled before the Water Lords could come after him, leaving them enraged.

"He won't get away!" The First Water Lord declared.

"Leave him for now." Faceless said. "One stray pest makes no difference. He's the weakest one of all."

Faceless looked at the pinned bodies before him. Sylphid was down for the count. Timothy was still out cold. Both Psions were beaten and battered, and their pitiful psionic powers were no match for the elites atop them. Even Marigold, still struggling to break free of her captors, was forced onto her belly with her arms pinned behind her back.

"Hahaha." Faceless laughed, finally feeling his heart lighten. "In the end, everything falls into my hands."

"You... you're gonna pay for this!" Marigold snarled. "You don't know who you're messing with!"

Faceless nodded and smiled. "You are correct, wetland-creature. I do not know who I'm 'messing with'. However, once I take back the stolen shard of Yredelemnul, I will also acquire the thief's memories. All shall be made clear at that point. Who you are, what your intentions are, and how you managed to sneak into my forest undetected."

Faceless folded his hands behind his back and assumed a domineering posture. He nodded at the First and Second Water Lords. "Lift him up."

Faceless turned his mask toward Timothy, watching as they grabbed the unconscious young man and lifted him up by both of his arms. They didn't take him lightly, and made sure to hold his arms tightly so he couldn't thrash around, even if he had the strength to do so.

Timothy was still wearing a T-REX, though he had traded with one of his friends earlier, and now he wore the distinct red and blue Thundercat variant. It was a little more heavily armored, but ultimately still nothing compared to the strength of the Water Lords.

Timothy's armored head hung downward. But as he was picked up, he awoke and shakily lifted his head.

"Uhh..." Timothy said weakly, his voice coming through the speakers. "What... happened..."

Faceless chuckled. "Your escape attempt failed, brat. In the end, your friends were unable to save you. But what did you expect, with such weaklings at your side? One of them even ran away, the coward. I'll be sure to have him hunted down and executed like the pest he is."

Timothy's HUD pulled up vitals for his friends. With a single thought, he was able to tell all hope had been lost. Marigold was conscious, but pinned. The Psions were in a similar state. Sylphid was out cold. Only Paimon had managed to escape.

The young man was groggy, like a drunk. His thoughts were more sluggish than ever in his life. He couldn't think of any witty plans, any brilliant maneuvers...

Timothy tried to wriggle his body, but the grip on him was too strong. The Water Lords tensed their arms, making Timothy grimace in pain. It felt like his arms were going to shatter under their grip. Even if he was in his best state, he wouldn't have had the strength to escape.

"You... fucker!" Timothy wheezed. Desperate, he activated his ultimate attack.

Yredelemnul's Rage!

A flicker of red light ignited in his eyes. A laser fired through his helmet and instantly crossed the distance between himself and Faceless, burning two holes in the T-REX's faceplate. The laser slapped against Faceless's body and made him flinch in fear, but this time... it did nothing at all. The helmet repaired itself, and Faceless was left standing there, unharmed.

Timothy's thoughts were too slow, his willpower too weak. He was drained, and thus, the prowess of Yredelemnul's skills, which heavily relied on mental energy and willpower, were rendered totally useless.

A drop of cold sweat dripped down Faceless's back, but he quickly relaxed. Even he could see that Timothy had nothing left.

"Hahaha! You startled me!" Faceless roared with laughter. "Was that it, then? The last dying gasp of a false Emissary? You should be thanking me, you know. I deliberately left your friends alive. I could have had my warriors kill them, but I suspect the intelligence we'll be able to extract from them will prove quite useful. I'm interested in learning how you arrived in my lands, and how you thought you could escape. It can't be a coincidence you were traveling in this direction the whole time..."

Timothy felt the strength leave his body. A sense of despair washed over him.

He activated Yredelemnul's Eye to examine Faceless. Maybe he could uncover a weakness? Something to turn the tides?

If Timothy were in a more complete mental state he might be shocked out of his wits. The information given to him by Yredelemnul's Eye was far, far more complete than before. Previously, it wouldn't give him more than a single paragraph of information about Faceless, but now it gave him a fully detailed Character Sheet, complete with all his stats, the names of his skills, and even additional information about his source of power.

It didn't tell Timothy what Faceless's skills all were, or what they did, but it was good information to have!

He has a significant weakness to fire. Timothy thought. Considering he's a water-based creature living in a forest, that makes sense. But it doesn't matter. My eye beams are too weak to hurt him now.

Timothy lowered his head. He wanted to fight back, but all the fight had left him. There was nothing left to do. The battle was lost.

At that moment, there was a crackling noise inside Timothy's helmet.

[Timothy! This is Paimon! Your vitals say you've woken up. Do you read me?]

Timothy quietly switched to internal comms. "Yeah... I'm... awake, Paimon. I'm awake. Too tired. Can't think."

[I know, but I remembered something important! Timothy, I'm going to escape the dungeon. I don't know if me leaving will leave the rest of you behind, or if you'll teleport out with me, but even if the former is true, I'm going to be able to tell your mom what happened. If the Dungeon breaks, we might be able to get you all out!]

"No... don't... don't let the dungeon break." Timothy said quietly. "Chrona... will perish. Catastrophe. Don't let my mom die. Tell her... I'm sorry. For everything. I'm sorry."

Tears started to well up in Timothy's eyes. He'd arrogantly brought everyone here. He'd spread his game-powers around, and now he was going to leave his mother all alone, dying inside the Dark Forest.

At least Paimon would get out. At least he'd be able to relay what happened to the others outside.

It was a terrible ending for Timothy, Marigold, Ferral, and Raavul. If Timothy died, Paimon might die too, since he was 'only' a pawn. But maybe he wouldn't. Timothy didn't know, and his brain was too sluggish to think of all the different possibilities.

[Don't you give up on me, Timothy! Besides, you still have a chance to kill those bastards! Only you can do it!] Paimon urged.

"Me...? I can't do... anything..." Timothy said wistfully.

[Yes you can. Have you forgotten about...?]

Timothy's eyes widened. Paimon said something that momentarily shook him out of his mental stupor.

"Oh... yeah. I did forget. Paimon... Paimon... thank you... if we die here, live on. But if we make it out alive... I'll be thanking you in person..."

Faceless gloated for a minute or so. But eventually, when the hyuu-man lost all his spirit and let his head hang in disgrace, Faceless lost interest.

"Bah. Let's drag these weaklings, the thief, and the traitor back to the Golden Glade. I want twenty of the elites and two Water Lords to go after the one that escaped. Hunt him down and bring him back to me, dead or alive. I don't care about a coward's life."

Faceless took a step toward Timothy and forcefully grabbed his chin. He casually scratched at the helmet shielding Timothy's face, tearing it away to reveal... strange, why was the human smirking at him?

ZOT!!!

A mighty blast of energy fired from Timothy's eyes, slammed into Faceless's golden mask, and sent him flying backward. Faceless spun helplessly backward, end over end, battering his body multiple times until he crashed into a tree and his body fell limp.

The Water Lords holding Timothy stiffened in shock. They were completely taken aback by this abrupt change in circumstances. They had no idea Timothy possessed such a power, because Faceless hadn't told them. If they knew Timothy wielded such formidable magic, they might wonder how a 'mere thief' could activate Yredelemnul's Shard, and that could lead to other uncomfortable questions Faceless didn't want them asking.

As for the blast he fired earlier, it was so weak that they simply had no way of linking it to a mighty Ruler. It was likely just the hyuu-man's personal ability, weak and pitiful as he was.

Before the Water Lords could react, Timothy spun his head to look at the First Water Lord on his right.

"VERMIN." Timothy said, his eyes glowing with evil purple color, his voice booming in the Sequid's mind.

A wave of terror swept over the First Water Lord. He instantly released Timothy's arm and leaped away, tripping over Sylphid's unconscious body. So panicked was the First Water Lord that he didn't even perceive his surroundings.

"AAAIYEE!!" The First Water Lord screamed, his voice high-pitched like a banshee. His scream made the hair rise on everyone's necks. And before they could properly come up with a plan or a counter-measure, Timothy turned to look at the Second Water Lord holding his left arm.

"SUBMIT OR DIE." Timothy's voice boomed again, breaking the Sequid's psyche and making him scurry backward before diving to the ground and kowtowing at Timothy's feet.

"Forgive me!!" The Second Water Lord screeched while kowtowing. "I did not recognize His Majesty's greatness! I have sinned!"

Seeing the strongest of the Water Lords both losing their minds, as well as Faceless's body being ragdolled into the distance, the other elites had no idea what the hell was going on. The Seventh Water Lord tensed up, ready to leap at Timothy and go on the offensive, but the others took a few steps back, looking at him in fear.

"Th-this aura!" The Third Water Lord cried out, her eyes nearly popping out of her head. "Y-Y-Yredelemnul's power?! How has the hyuu-man mastered it? Is he a real Emissary after all?"

"HAHAHA." Timothy laughed wildly, hamming it up as he put on his best impersonation of an 'evil' voice. "You FOOLS. You walked right into my trap. Everything here was a test to assess your qualifications, and I have found you all LACKING."

"What nonsense is he speaking?" The Seventh Water Lord, also the youngest of them, asked. "Quickly, let's move in and-"

"SILENCE." Timothy shouted, his words booming in the Seventh Water Lord's mind. At once, the weakest of the seven was cowed and shrunk backward, too terrified to make a move.

"I was wrong!!" He screamed. "Forgive this weakling, he did not know the true darkness until he saw it!"

Faceless shakily pulled himself to his feet. Timothy's eye-beams weren't actually as powerful as the ones he had unleashed inside Cthulhu's Chamber, when he had been under the effect of Player's Fixation. A 500% increase in mental focus was no joke. But this time, Faceless had completely let down his guard, thinking his victory was in the bag. As a result, he suffered even worse wounds.

"Cough, cough!" Faceless wheezed, as blood suddenly dribbled down his face.

He stood up, and Timothy looked over at him. For a moment, Timothy's evil grin faltered.

He couldn't believe what he was seeing.

Faceless... doesn't have a face! His name is more literal than I thought! What the hell, he has no mouth or nose, just like a Psion! But then how the hell has he been 'speaking' to me the whole time?!

Faceless's golden mask was shattered and broken. For the first time in an unknown number of years, his face, or lack thereof, was revealed to the world around him.

This was one of the worst curses he had inflicted on his body. It was what had allowed him to rise to the peak of the mortal realm, just a step away from becoming a Cosmic.

Unfortunately, the sad truth was, Emissaries were existences bound to their Rulers. They could never become Cosmics, but could be considered gods of the mortal realm. They managed their Ruler's lands, and were rewarded with power, wealth, fame, and any other things they wished. All for the glory of their 'gods'.

When Faceless coughed, blood seeped out of his skin, right from the area where his mouth ought to be. It was freaky, like watching a man spontaneously bleed out of his cheeks. It made Timothy's skin crawl.

"You..." Faceless wheezed, taking two slow and laborious steps toward Timothy. "Impossible... how could you... recover... you were... faking your injuries?"

Timothy smirked. "Nah. Nothing a little Full Restore couldn't fix. Too bad you don't have those, eh? Looks like Ashenzari isn't as caring toward you as Yredelemnul is toward me."

Faceless was in disbelief. He could see that the tables had drastically turned. Timothy's aura now radiated the full power of Yredelemenul, causing the Water Lords to think twice before attacking, especially after Timothy had subdued the two mightiest Water Lords with seemingly a single glance.

Those in the know, such as the Water Lords, were not ignorant fools. They knew the lineage of the Dark Ones, and their signature abilities.

Yredelemnul's ability to tear the void with his eyes, to strike at enemies with the powers of flame and ice, and the power to subdue others with a single glance were obviously a few of his core powers, passed on to his descendant. Since Yredelemnul had died eons in the past, during the war for Andromeda, it stood to reason this young man must be his inheritor.

A mere Emissary? What a joke! He was a direct Inheritor, and an Inheritor of the Dark Ones was far above their level. The fact they had manhandled him left their stomachs convulsing in regret. What the hell had Faceless been thinking, attacking the hyuu-man like that?! Was he suicidal? Did an Emissary like him not understand the stakes?!

The Third Water Lord's eyes widened. She suddenly realized something crucial, as she pointed an accusatory finger at Facless.

"Y-you! You knew all along! You were trying to steal the shard for yourself! You FOOL of an Emissary! Greedy, non-filial descendant! You seek to usurp the will of Yredelemnul and take it for yourself! Does your appetite know no limits?!"

When she spoke, it was as if a veil had been lifted. Not only the Water Lords, but the Sequid Elites turned enraged gazes toward Faceless.

Faceless's heart went cold. The secret was out. He was finished now. If he were in his peak state, he could potentially kill the others and take Timothy's power for himself, but now he was mortally wounded. If he didn't recuperate for ten years, he wouldn't fully recover from his injuries.

"D-don't listen to the hyuu-man's lies!" Faceless shouted. He looked desperate, like a raving madman. "He stole Yredelemnul's power! He found a way to harness it! That power belongs to us, to the Dark Ones! He's not one of us!"

"Hahaha!" Timothy laughed, puffing out his chest. "Your words betray you, Faceless! How dare you denigrate the authority of a Dark One! Who are you to determine my lord's whims? He delivered this power unto me, and I accepted it. Do you truly believe any mortal could so easily take control of a Dark One's powers otherwise?"

The Water Lords frowned in response. It was true, a Dark One's power was that of a fallen Ruler. Apex Cosmics could potentially harness it, maybe even High Cosmics, but a mortal would be unable to, unless the Dark One had altered his power to be compatible with the mortal's body. In fact, even if a Peak Mortal like Faceless were to obtain Yredelemnul's power, he would likely explode into a pile of meat and gore, because he would be unable to control it, let alone this seemingly weak hyuu-man.

"Faceless, for your insults and crimes against Yredelemnul's Heir, I sentence you to death." Timothy boldly stated, puffing out his chest even more. He looked down his chin at the wavering Faceless, as if gazing upon an ant. "Kill yourself now, or I shall sever you from Ashenzari's Will and strike your name from the history books!"

Faceless's eyes contorted into a visage of rage. He leaped at Timothy and stretched out his hand to grab for Timothy's neck.

"Not if I kill you FIRST!" Faceless roared.

Timothy's eyes glowed red. "Then die alone, heretic."

ZOOOOOT!

A focused, concentrated beam of fire crashed into Faceless, but he deliberately didn't dodge. This time, his full guard was raised, and he concentrated all the darkness within his body to resisting the beam of flames.

"Uaaahh!!" Faceless screamed as he held up an arm defensively and continued to press forward, enduring against Timothy's attack even as Timothy maintained it at full-force.

This was not like earlier, a single-second shot of power. It was a focused beam that started growing more powerful every second as Timothy rapidly felt what remained of his mana start to drain.

"Uuurgh!" Timothy groaned, his eyes burning from the strain.

"I'll! Kill! You!!" Faceless shrieked.

The Emissary drew within just a few feet of Timothy, and he reared back his one free arm to deliver a killing blow. Even if he couldn't take Timothy's shard, so long as he slayed Yredelemnul's Heir, he could lie about the situation, deceive the others, and pretend Timothy was putting on a front the whole time.

Timothy's fierce expression turned into a smile as he continued to pour mana into his eyes. "Idiot. You fell for it again."

Timothy's voice boomed in Faceless's mind. "SURRENDER!"

Yredelemnul's Disdain activated at the same time as Yredelemnul's Rage. The effects of activating both powers together was truly stupendous. All at once, Faceless's body lost its strength. He lowered his defenses unwillingly as the Terror effect seized his mind. His arms fell to his sides, and Timothy's fire-laser pierced his body, torching a hole through Faceless in less than a second. With a deliberate upward sweep of his eyes, Timothy bisected Faceless's body vertically, which melted his skull into slag.

Faceless instantly died. The left and right halves of his body plopped against the ground, landing in a splash of dried, burned blood, the stench of his corpse reeking of burned meat.

Timothy acquired a mountain of rewards, but he wasn't in the mood to focus on all these extraneous things. He had bigger issues to worry about.

If the other Sequids had any doubt before, they were completely convinced now that Timothy was, indeed, the true heir of Yredelemnul. Their legs gave out, and they sank to their knees, kowtowing to him as if bowing to a god made manifest in the flesh.

"All hail Yredelemnul's Heir! All hail Lord Timothy, the mighty hyuu-man!"

Timothy's shoulders sagged. The others were too terrified to notice that with his mana fully drained, the aura of Yredelemnul had completely faded. Timothy was defenseless again, at least unless he used another Full Restore.

"It is... good that you have finally recognized my majesty." Timothy said, turning to them with a domineering attitude. "In light of Faceless's deception, I shall grant the lot of you clemency. However, how dare you still hold my subordinates captive?! Release them at once!"

Struck dumb by his words, the few Elites who were pinning Marigold and the others to the ground suddenly leaped up and retreated ten steps, as if they had been bitten by snakes. Thinking better of their attitudes, they quickly rushed forward again and helped Marigold up, along with both Psions and Sylphid as well.

Time passed. Timothy managed to let Paimon know what had happened. Paimon was, naturally, over the moon about Timothy's victory. He made his way back, and Timothy had the others use one of their Full Restores to fix themselves up. Unfortunately, Paimon did not have such a thing, and Full Restores could not be used on other people, but he wasn't injured anyway, so it was fine. In the future though, if he was injured, he wouldn't have as convenient a get-out-of-trouble-free card as the actual Players did.

Timothy had to wake Sylphid up gently, allowing her consciousness to stir. Her pitch-black eyes slowly blinked open, and she smiled when Timothy told her about Faceless's death.

"Timothy..." Sylphid said, her words wobbly due to the head injury she'd suffered. "I'm glad you made it. I knew I was right... to trust in you."

Marigold rubbed her scaled arms. She glowered at Sylphid from afar, then turned up her nose.

"Hmph."

Part 754: Darkness Departs

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Dark Forest, Golden Grove.

Timothy and the rest returned to the Golden Grove. This time, they traveled much more quickly, as Sylphid and the Seven Water Lords buoyed them along. It only took them an hour to return, which showed that Faceless must have been duped by their simple deception early on and gone the wrong direction at first. Otherwise, how could he have not caught up with them sooner?

Timothy's group had killed quite a few of the Sequid Elites, twenty-three in total. He and his friends had also badly burned and injured fifty more. For three quarters of the elite Sequids to be injured or dead, it truly showed how formidable Timothy's tiny fighting force had been.

Part of the reason they dealt such a grievous blow was because their weapons and technology had caught the Sequids off-guard. But another reason was simply because the Sequids foolishly assumed Timothy's group were all weaklings and posed no threat. If they had been on their guard from the beginning, they would have won an overwhelming victory.

Timothy thought about these things, and more.

Warfare is just as much about psychological trickery and deception as it is about superior strength and firepower. It's also harder to learn... perhaps I should focus more on overcoming my foes through bluffing and deception in the future. The results proved outstanding here. For such a small material cost to produce such an outstanding result, why shouldn't I use similar tactics moving forward?

Timothy directed an ugly gaze Ferral and Raavul's way. Unfortunately, Timothy was still stuck using his Mind of Void for more than half a day, so he was extremely psiophobic at the moment. Even just looking at the Psions made him angry, and a little nauseous.

The good thing was, the Psions were already aware of this fact. They had practiced using each of Timothy's mental states on a few occasions under Blinker's supervision. Timothy had hurled some severe slurs at both of the Psions, but once they realized it was the King Network altering his thoughts, how could they blame him?

Psions were proud existences. Even an oddball like Ferral, who pursued interests distinct from his peers, was not one to be consumed by emotional constipation. He disregarded any nasty things Timothy said as if Timothy were momentarily acting like a spoiled, angry baby. Eventually, Timothy would switch out of the Mind of Void and return to normal.

One of the interesting facets of the Mind of Void was that, for some reason, it made Timothy a bit more cunning than usual. His thoughts became malicious, selfish, and his ego inflated as well.

Defeating Faceless only made Timothy act even more arrogantly. He couldn't stop crossing his arms and looking around haughtily as the Water Lords and Sylphid swept his group back to the Golden Grove.

Upon returning to the Golden Grove, Sylphid and the Water Lords found out that Sylphid had never actually been ousted as an Emissary of Ashenzari. Faceless had lied to everyone, seeking to take advantage of the confusion to eliminate his sole competitor in the Dark Forest, steal Timothy's power, and break free of his status as an Emissary.

Whether he would have been able to do so was up in the air. At the very least, if he couldn't take Yredelemnul's power for himself, he might have been able to offer it to Ashenzari for further concessions. Perhaps the Dark Forest Ruler might have even rewarded him with a chance at ascending to Cosmic, though that was an extremely unlikely option. Emissaries were never given such privileges, as that went beyond the scope of their roles.

What his ultimate plans were, nobody knew. They could take stabs in the dark at guessing his motives, but now that he was dead, those didn't matter. Dead men told no tales.

Timothy was now a genuine guest of honor. He smiled smugly as the various high lords and other leading members of the Golden Grove fawned at his feet, with Sylphid introducing Timothy as an Inheritor of the Dark Ones. News of his emergence would naturally cycle throughout the realm, and ultimately make its way to other worlds and galaxies far away...

But that was a story for another time.

After enjoying a feast, Timothy was tempted to take a long rest, but then Paimon appeared at his side and whispered in his ear. "Timothy, we have less than two days left before the Dungeon breaks. We need to be going."

Timothy's enjoyment of his new status quickly waned. He tapped his chin thoughtfully and nodded. "You're right. As much fun as it is being worshiped, these people are still the enemies of our galaxy. We've spent too much time here already. We should go."

And so, Timothy called Sylphid over to talk to her in private. She was now the highest ranked person in the Golden Grove, and held ultimate authority until another Emissary would be sent at some point in the future. Ashenzari had a rule that there should always be two Emissaries controlling key locations, both for redundancy and to ensure one person couldn't solidify too much power.

After they stepped into a side hallway where they could talk alone, Sylphid opened up the discussion with a heartfelt plea.

"Lord Timothy..." Sylphid said quietly. "I wish to go with you back to your homeland. I will renounce my status as Ashenzari's Emissary and become your follower. Once you ascend to the level of Ruler, I will become your Emissary instead."

Timothy was surprised. "You want to come along? I was going to do it before, because I felt we'd robbed you of your title and status, but now you have more authority than ever before. It would be better if you stayed here."

"I do not wish to stay here..." Sylphid said, her large black eyes meeting his. "I am... drawn to you. I wish to remain at your side."

Timothy swallowed heavily. He averted his eyes and felt a strange feeling in his body. He wasn't stupid, and could tell she was trying to seduce him. The problem was... it was starting to work. That made him feel good in an egotistical, or perhaps masculine way, but it also made him feel extremely guilty when he thought about his girlfriend's feelings.

"Ahh... I, I can't." Timothy said, taking a step back. "I just can't. No offense, but I don't think my companions will ever be able to fully trust you. And furthermore, I can't allow a relationship to develop between us. I already have a girlfriend. In my culture, monogamy is strongly encouraged. Besides, Marigold doesn't seem to like you, and I have to consider her feelings first."

"Oh, so you are looking at things from that perspective. I see." Sylphid said, as she also took a step back. "But... you are overthinking the matter. I cursed my fertility in order to serve Ashenzari. I am unable to bear you progeny. This is extremely common among Emissaries, as our Rulers do not wish us to create a legacy of heirs. Thus, I will not compete with your sexual partner for the status of first mate. I am satisfied merely becoming your... mistress."

"COUGH COUGH!" Timothy choked, his face turning crimson. The Sequid Emissary really had a bold way with words! She didn't hold anything back! "It's- it isn't about just bearing children, Sylphid! Even now, we're on the verge of emotional infidelity, and I don't think it would be a good idea for us to get any closer. Let's also not forget that you originally tried to kill me. How do I know you won't do such a thing again? I just cannot fully bring myself to trust you. Surely you understand this much?"

This seemed to get through Sylphid's head. She put on a difficult, hesitant expression and she touched her lips and swayed shyly from side to side.

"If... if that is the way my Lord feels..."

"It is." Timothy quickly said. "You should stay here, Sylphid. We come from different worlds, different cultures. I think you'll do better here than you ever would alongside me."

"No!" Sylphid said, stomping her foot. "I'm not staying. I refuse! And if you don't trust me, that leaves only one method..."

Timothy's heart jumped. He felt an ominous premonition from her words, but he wasn't sure what she was thinking.

Sylphid gritted her teeth, then she tapped her forehead, and her entire body shuddered with pain. She squeezed her eyes shut, then slowly pulled out a small marble of light from her glabella.

"H-here, my Lord. Take this." Sylphid said, her voice shaky. "I'll become your soul-slave! You can be assured I'll never betray you, hurt you, or turn against you, no matter what you say or do. If you want me to kill myself, I'll do it immediately! And if you want me to serve you... in any way... I'll... I'll do it willingly..."

Sylphid held up her hand, and the marble of light pinched between her fingers shone with her soul aura. It seemed she had extracted a fragment of her soul to offer him so that he could completely control her however he wanted.

Timothy's face twisted. "This- slavery?! No way. That's evil. Why can't you accept what I'm saying, Sylphid? This is unreasonable. We have to part ways."

"NO!" Sylphid shouted. "I don't want to! If you won't bring me along, and you won't even accept me as your slave, then... I'll just end my life now! I don't want to live without you!"

Timothy was dumbstruck. He hadn't even known Sylphid for a day. Had he struck her with Yredelemnul's Disdain at some point and overrode her thoughts? Had he accidentally brainwashed her without even knowing it? Why would she care so much about coming along with him? Was it so she could gather intel for her Rulers regarding the Milky Way? Was it because he was just so dashing and handsome that she fell in love with him at first sight? Was his status as an Inheritor really all that good? A combination of all of them? Something different??

Timothy had no idea. The mind of a woman was utterly foreign to him.

"Don't do that." Timothy said, his eyes hardening. "Don't try to pull some manipulative shit on me. Threatening to kill yourself if I don't take you as my slave? What's your real goal?"

Sylphid's expression was serious. "I want to stay by your side, no matter what."

"Yeah? Why?" Timothy pressed harder. "No lies. Only the honest truth. If you can't give me that much, then I will leave you to die here, whether you're serious or bluffing."

Sylphid closed her eyes. A long silence followed.

Timothy looked at her face and waited. She kept her eyes closed, as if thinking carefully.

Eventually, she opened them again.

"I have reached the end of my journey, Timothy." Sylphid said, her words seemingly cryptic at first. "This is it for me. I will stay here in the Dark Forest, possibly shuffled to another location at my Ruler's whims. My Ruler is stagnant. Ashenzari will grow no further. There will be Galaxy Wars someday, and I may even play a part in them, but ultimately I have reached the end of my journey."

She paused before continuing.

"I see a different path following you. You are weaker than me, but you have strong potential for growth. I see a much more exciting life ahead of me if I stay at your side.

Whatever our relationship might be, I wish to see what you will become. If I am with you, the gains might pass on to me as our relationship deepens. Whether I am viewed as lesser than your First Mate or not, that does not matter to me. All that matters is watching your journey as you climb toward the apex of power in the universe. I believe that someday... you will reach it."

Sylphid shivered with anticipation. "Please accept my soul shard. I do not mind being your slave. I only fear that if you were to leave me behind, I would be consumed with regret at the journey I never was able to witness. I would rather die if you forced me to stay behind."

Timothy looked away.

He didn't know what to say. Sylphid was a zealot, a religious wackjob who seemed to view the world through a lens of black and white. He was a little afraid of bringing her home. He also knew Marigold was going to be extremely angry if he did.

On the other hand, it seemed Sylphid wasn't just threatening to kill herself to emotionally manipulate him. She was extremely plainspoken, and the only time she'd deceived him was when she pretended she couldn't understand his friends' words. Well, that and tricking him into coming with her to have Yredelemnul's Shard sucked out. But those were really part of the same deception, and she could almost be forgiven since he was an intruder in her domain.

Timothy massaged his forehead and sighed.

He felt like he didn't have a win-win choice in front of him. And the truth was... he did enjoy Sylphid's company.

He did enjoy being around her...

Did that make him a lecher? Unfaithful? A bad man?

This was probably the case, but... he wasn't sure.

"Alright." Timothy eventually said. "I will accept your soul shard. But you will continue to address me as Timothy, not 'master' or any weird shit. I also don't plan to command you to do anything vile. Just don't hurt me, my mother, or any of my friends, and you can have your full autonomy. Got it?"

Timothy was scared that if he didn't take her Soul Shard and he brought Sylphid back, she would be stronger than even Blinker! If so, then she alone would be able to wipe out Chrona. He simply couldn't bring himself to fully trust her.

And so, Sylphid nodded. She bowed at the waist, then held up her hand, allowing Timothy to take the marble-sized orb from her.

[Sylphid's Soul Shard x1 Obtained]

Sylphid's Soul Shard [Passive Skill] [Legendary] [Enslavement]

Grants total control over the actions of Emissary Sylphid. The player's mind will be linked to Sylphid's, and the Player will be able to read her thoughts, but the reverse is not true. Slaves do not have the power to see their master's thoughts without permission.

The Player cannot control Sylphid's thoughts, but any command will be followed without hesitation. If Sylphid wishes to resist, she may 'understand' commands differently than the Player intended. The Player must be specific with commands if disobedience becomes a problem.

Timothy felt a pit open up in his stomach. Now that it was all said and done, he had gained total control over Sylphid... but he didn't like the way it made him feel. He could sense Sylphid's surface-level thoughts now, but he had no control over them, so there was that at least. He could tell that her passionate feelings toward him were genuine, but that only made him feel even more uncomfortable.

Timothy squeezed his eyes shut and pinched the bridge of his nose.

The new situation was... far from ideal.

"Let's... let's go." Timothy said quietly.

"Of course, master." Sylphid said, smiling cheerfully at him.

"No! None of that. You will just call me Timothy, or Lord Timothy if it makes you feel better. Don't ever call me 'master' or it'll lead to misunderstandings."

"What sorts of misunderstandings?" Syphid asked, cocking her head mischievously. "I'm your slave now, which means you're my master! There's simply nothing to misunderstand."

"Don't say it again!" Timothy said. "Or I'll command you to jump off a cliff!"

Sylphid pouted. "Very well, Commander. I won't call you the M-word anymore."

"Wait, why are you calling me COMMANDER now??" Timothy asked.

"Well because I'm your slave and you command my actions, silly!" Sylphid laughed.

"UGH!" Timothy groaned.

He spent some more time adding more and more commands onto Sylphid's psyche to keep the naughty Emissary in check, ultimately finding that she was very good at finding loopholes in his mental commands. The good news was, she only seemed to want to find new and innovative ways to assert his dominance over her... which made him wonder if she was a masochist or something. Did she just love being controlled by someone mightier? Was that similar to her former relationship with Ashenzari?? It was a real headache.

Timothy and Sylphid eventually stepped back into the main chamber. He told Sylphid to make preparations for his departure, then he left to find his friends.

Timothy found the Psions meditating at the head of the table for guests of honor, Paimon was casually munching on the cooked leg of an unknown forest creature, and Marigold was sitting in front of a large plate of untouched food. Her arms were crossed, and as soon as she saw Timothy, she gave him a glare of annoyance.

"You were sure gone a long time!" Marigold chuffed. "Having fun with Sylphid?"

"I wouldn't say it was 'fun'..." Timothy said hesitantly. "But um... she's going to come back with us to Chrona. I got her to make a pledge with her soul that she won't harm any of you, me, my mother, or anyone else I consider my allies."

"Fine. Whatever." Marigold said. "Just do what you want."

Timothy's stomach started to sink. "Come on, Marigold... can we talk privately?"

"There's nothing to talk about." Marigold said coldly. "Let's just hurry up and go home before this Dungeon breaks and kills everyone I love."

Timothy could sense that his relationship with Marigold was shattering bit by bit. He didn't know how to fix it either. He'd brought her into the King Network, lifted her up, had all sorts of good times... and now, wasn't he pushing her away? Ever since they entered the Forest, it had been one blunder after another.

"Marigold..." Timothy said quietly. "I love you, okay? I'm not going to cheat on you with Sylphid or something like that, okay? There's nothing between us."

"Just shut up already!" Marigold snapped. "You're really pissing me off."

Timothy wanted to say something, but it seemed everything he did say only made her madder and madder.

He knew it was his fault. He shouldn't have accepted Sylphid. He should have left her behind. Now he'd ruined his relationship with his girlfriend...

A lump formed in Timothy's throat. He turned and left the table, sitting off to the side of the dining hall as he waited for Sylphid to arrange a quick passage through the Forest as her last act as Ashenzari's Emissary.

Unfortunately, in order to properly step down from her position as Emissary, Sylphid needed to have many of her powers stripped away, and this required a ritualistic ceremony to do properly. It was true that if Faceless's claims had been correct, Sylphid could have had her powers violently stripped away by Ashenzari, and she would have been executed afterward, but since she was leaving to follow a future Ruler of the Dark Ones, she was considered as being 'honorably discharged' from Ashenzari's service. That meant she wouldn't have to give up all over her power, only specific portions of it.

Sylphid was going to lose much of her power. She would drop to the level of a Demon Duke, still stronger than all the rest of Timothy's party, but no longer capable of threatening Chrona.

When Timothy learned this, he had mixed feelings. He originally thought Sylphid would be way stronger than Blinker, so bringing her back to Chrona would be dangerous. But if she was greatly weakened, then enslaving her soul felt unnecessary and vile. It made his stomach cramp up even worse than before.

"Everything's all fucked up." Timothy muttered to himself. "All of it. I really stepped in shit this time."

While Timothy was wallowing in his emotions, a familiar figure seemingly appeared by his side out of thin air. Ferral took a seat next to Timothy and rested his palm on the young man's shoulder.

[Timothy. Something is troubling you.]

Timothy glanced at the Psion in disgust, but quickly forced his hatred of Psions into his stomach. His self-loathing was so strong that it was even overpowering the Mind of Void.

"I screwed up. Big time." Timothy mumbled. "I chose Sylphid over Marigold. Not literally, but enough to hurt Marigold's feelings. I think our relationship is over. I just didn't want Sylphid to kill herself, and now Marigold hates me."

Ferral folded his palms together. [The mating habits of other species are endlessly fascinating, but I possess no particular knowledge regarding their intricacies. Whether or not you have made an error is beyond me.]

Ferral continued. [I will say this, however. Timothy, you are still very, very young. So is Marigold. The two of you are emotionally immature, and liable to make mistakes. Even young Psions make mistakes, you know. I've made plenty of errors of judgment, including the very same ones that caused my Progenitor to cast me aside. So in this regard, while I cannot speak to the nature of your romantic relationships, I can speak to making mistakes and learning from them.]

Ferral paused.

[I spoke to Raavul a little while ago in secret. She has expressed some doubts regarding Sylphid. Are you aware that the fairies once controlled the Andromeda galaxy until the Dark Ones drove them out? By bringing Sylphid back with you, you could be putting Miss Blinker in an awkward situation.]

Timothy was surprised. "I didn't know about that."

[Neither did I. Raavul only picked it up by happenstance some years ago while speaking to Blinker. Blinker is a Fairy Queen, albeit not one who ever spent much time on the homeworld. She is aware of certain Truths, even the ones that occurred long before she was born. You should consider how to handle a situation involving Blinker and Sylphid meeting and a... violent reaction... occurring.]

Timothy's face fell. "You're saying I shouldn't bring Sylphid back with us? Is it really that dangerous?"

[On the contrary.] Ferral said. [You have not fully considered the strategic value of Sylphid. She is about to be severely weakened, and will be all alone with us in our homeland. We will have a huge advantage. We can press her for detailed information regarding the Dark Ones. Sylphid is not some nameless nobody, Timothy. She is an Emissary of the Dark Ones, someone with vast knowledge of how they function.]

Timothy was enlightened. He thought about Ferral's words further. Now that Sylphid had submitted her soul to him, she would basically have to answer any of Timothy's questions unconditionally.

It did feel dirty, using her like this. Timothy wasn't in a rush to press her for information, but Ferral was right. She had a ton of strategic value to humanity. She might have wanted to come with Timothy for secret reasons involving espionage, scouting out humanity's capabilities, and reporting back to the Dark Ones, but even if that was true, couldn't he do the same to her?

Once again, Timothy felt a little nauseous. It seemed as if he were about to take advantage of Sylphid. She had nearly killed him before, but in the end she hadn't really hurt him, and she had fully submitted. Was it really right to treat her like a machine that gave out information at his whims?

"Ferral..." Timothy said quietly. "I have to confess something to you. Please don't tell anyone else.

Ferral nodded. [Anything you wish for me to keep secret, I shall do so.]

Timothy breathed a sigh of relief. Ferral really was a great friend. Timothy almost didn't completely hate him for being a disgusting mind-reading creature.

He quietly filed Ferral in on the details about Sylphid submitting her soul to him and how she couldn't disobey Timothy's orders.

Ferral stroked his chin. He fell into thought after Timothy revealed this new Truth.

[Clever female.] Ferral said. [Do you think this was not within the realm of Sylphid's planning? If she were to submit to you, she would not be so foolish as to overlook you interrogating her for information about the Dark Ones. I believe this ceremony has multiple purposes, with the new context you've given me. It is quite likely Ashenzari's Devoted will strip much of Sylphid's most sensitive memories away.]

Ferral gave Timothy a look of warning. [If you do question Sylphid, be aware that while she might not be able to lie to you, if the Dark Ones were to implant false memories inside of her mind, she would only see them as the truth. She would not even be aware she was lying to you.]

"There's such a thing??" Timothy asked, aghast.

[Psions have used such tactics in the past. It is quite common among global powers. Who would allow their Emissary to travel alone to a hostile galaxy with key secrets bouncing around in their mind? Only a fool.]

Ferral patted Timothy's back.

[For what it is worth, I think you've mostly made all the right decisions.] Ferral said. [It is obvious some form of lust is guiding your actions toward Sylphid, but I see plenty of evidence that you have logically considered the consequences as well.]

Timothy quietly coughed. Why did everyone he know talk about such embarrassing things so plainly? It was really disturbing. Maybe he had too many non-humans hanging around him...

After Timothy and Ferral chatted, the Psion departed. Sylphid left for an hour to attend her ceremony, then returned. Her aura was far weaker than before.

Sylphid smiled sweetly at Timothy when she reappeared. "The ritual was... a success. I am yours now."

"Cough, cough!" Timothy choked. "You don't need to say it in such a weird way, Sylphid. People might get the wrong idea."

"Or perhaps... the right idea?" Sylphid teased.

Some time later, Timothy and the rest of the group started flying through the forest. Sylphid was with them, as were the Seven Water Lords. They used their superior power to shuttle the group towards the north end, at Timothy's discretion.

Sylphid believed in Timothy, but even she was skeptical of his claims regarding an 'edge' to the forest. Everyone knew this world was covered entirely by forest, and even its oceans and lakes were submerged in darkness by the impossibly tall trees that sprouted from the bottom of those ancient waters.

How could there be an edge?

But, after a full day of travel at far higher speeds than Timothy ever could have managed, the young man started to feel a weird 'pinging' sensation in his mind. He realized it was the 'objective' calling out to him.

"That direction!" Timothy called out, slightly altering the flight path of the Water Lords.

All along the way, the forest's other denizens strictly avoided them. Nobody knew yet that Sylphid had lost her power, so she alone was a huge deterrence, but the Water Lords were even scarier with their powers together. At least Sylphid could only hunt and kill a small group of enemies one by one. The Water Lords could spread out and take down an army of Stalkers if the need arose!

Thus, the Water Lords obeyed Timothy's command as if he were Ashenzari himself. They adjusted course and traveled toward an unknown location.

Eventually, a faint light emerged in the darkness ahead. Timothy squinted to see it, but it rapidly became brighter and brighter as they drew nearer.

It turned out there was no northern edge to the forest, at least not as expected. Instead, there was a hole punctured in the roof of the forest, allowing blinding white sunlight to pour through the canopy, blinding those who were too accustomed to the shadows. Sylphid winced slightly, as did the Water Lords. Eventually, they set down at the bottom of the shaft of light.

"This is... the edge of the forest?" Sylphid asked skeptically. She gave Timothy a sardonic look. "It's just a hole in the canopy."

The First Water Lord frowned. "This is the first of such a thing I've seen in all my years. How powerful would an entity have to be to risk tearing a hole in the canopy and having it remain? The trees of the Dark Forest are strong. They can regrow to cover such holes in minutes, yet this one remains after all this time."

He gave Timothy a knowing look. "The power of Yredelemnul's Eye is beyond comprehension. I see you've made plans for a while, young one."

Timothy scratched his head awkwardly. He didn't know what to say. "It was my master's will, that's all."

"I am gladdened by Yredelemnul's plans. He was truly a wise and far-seeing Ruler to have laid such plans out for his Inheritor." The First Water Lord said.

After seeing that Timothy had made it to his destination, the Water Lords bowed deeply. They turned and flew away, leaving Sylphid with the rest of them.

Timothy glanced at Marigold. She didn't meet his eyes. She'd been deliberately avoiding him ever since she learned Sylphid was coming along.

"Alright..." Timothy said hesitantly. "Let's go home."

Invisible question marks popped up over Sylphid's head. The hole in the canopy was impressive indeed, but how was Timothy planning to depart the forest?

Timothy and the rest stepped into the shaft of light. At that moment, a quest box appeared.

A special lootbox appeared in everyone's inventory, except for Paimon. Paimon was a Pawn, so he didn't receive the reward.

Timothy glanced at it. It appeared to be a Dungeon Lootbox of some sort. It would surely give out decent rewards. Timothy was extremely angry that it was only considered a Level 1 Dungeon though... wouldn't he have died if he had entered it alone? What the hell was his group going to do when they faced even more difficult dungeons?

Timothy looked at Marigold again, then he looked away.

Marigold was an absolute badass during the final battle. She killed several Elite Sequids with her Thunder Gauntlets, only losing the battle when the Water Lords attacked her all at once. If she became estranged... Timothy would miss bringing her along for the future Dungeons.

Timothy decided not to bother with yet another Lootbox just yet. Instead, he was going to open all his rewards at home, alongside his mom and friends. Right now, he just wanted to get out of the Dark Forest and go home.

A portal appeared in the center of the light. Timothy glanced at Sylphid.

"Are you ready to go?"

Sylphid cocked her head to the side. "Of course. But... how are we going to leave?"

"Through the portal, of course." Timothy said, gesturing to it.

Sylphid followed his finger. She looked right at the portal, then back at Timothy.

"Um..."

"You don't see it?" Timothy asked, bewildered. "The portal. It's right there."

He walked over and stood just a few feet away from it. Then he waved his hand in a big arc to indicate it, but Sylphid simply raised an eyebrow.

"There is... no portal." Sylphid said. "Are you playing pranks on me?"

"No??" Timothy half-said, half-asked. The other five glanced at Sylphid, with Marigold looking quite amused by the situation, while the others were instead frowning.

"I guess we'll just have to drag you into it if you can't see it then..." Timothy said.

He walked over, hesitated for a moment, then made up his mind and took Sylphid's hand. He expected to see anger on Marigold's face, but when he looked at his girlfriend, she had no expression at all. It was as if she had fully given up on him.

Timothy felt bad once again, but he decided that at this point, the relationship with Marigold was probably done. There was no way of redeeming it anymore. As such, he might as well stop kicking himself over and over again.

Ferral flew into the portal. Then Raavul, then Marigold, and finally Paimon. After that, Timothy stepped through, pulling Sylphid along with him.

At once, they emerged inside the Grand Library, where the extremely tall Po was waiting.

"Welcome back, small friend." Po said, his words only comprehensible to Timothy. "Ah. You brought a character with you. From the book."

Po paused for a half-second.

"...I am truly sorry."

Timothy blinked. He looked at Po, then he turned to look back at Sylphid.

What Timothy saw shook him to his core.

As soon as Sylphid passed through the portal, her body shuddered. She slumped to her knees and started breathing heavily. Cracks of light ruptured all over her skin.

"T-Timothy... I don't-"

She was still holding his hand when her body exploded into motes of light, her body bursting apart into ash.

Timothy didn't get to say any final words. Sylphid simply died while holding his hand. Her death was sudden, violent, and completely unexpected.

Timothy froze on the spot. He looked back in horror as the dissipating particles of light where Sylphid once stood.

"S-Sylphid? SYLPHID?!" Timothy screamed.

He had brought her out of the Dungeon, and in doing so, he had killed her.

Timothy had killed Sylphid. All because of his ignorance.

"No, no! NO!" Timothy screamed, as he fell to his knees. The portal to the Dark Forest closed, leaving the other six to stare with a variety of emotions at the devastating scene. All of them were shocked, horrified or at the very least, discomforted by what had just happened.

All except for one.

"Ahahaha! Now there's a twist!" Marigold laughed. "Kyargh! Stupid bitch got what she deserved! HAHAHA!!"

Part 755: Lover's Spat

Far-Future Era. Day 20, AJR. Po's Library.

Marigold cackled uproariously. She grabbed her gut and threw her head back as she laughed, laughed, laughed at Sylphid's dissipating body, the last particles of of her corpse floating away as she turned to dust on the spot.

"Hahaha!!" Marigold shrieked. "Couldn't have happened to a shittier thief! God is real, and he has a sense of humor!!"

"What- what the FUCK is wrong with you?!" Timothy screamed, as he staggered to his feet and directed rage-filled eyes full of tears at Marigold. "Sylphid is dead! She's DEAD! And you think this is funny?!"

"It's hilarious!" Marigold laughed, as she closed her eyes and squeezed out tears of joy. "She tried to kill you, and you're getting all mopey-dopey about her dying. You're such a doofus, ahaha!"

Something snapped in Timothy's mind. He didn't even do it consciously, but his hand slapped the T-REX on his chest, causing the Thundercat armor to swallow his figure. His vision turned red as he jumped at Marigold and reared his fist back.

Thump!

Marigold's eyes were momentarily closed. She didn't see Timothy's punch coming, so he landed a clean blow on the side of her head and knocked her backward. Her tail quickly changed direction to steady her feet, and she didn't fall to the ground.

After taking a few steps to steady herself, Marigold's laughter abruptly died. She clutched the side of her head, opened her eyes, and her pupils narrowed to vertical slits.

"You... you little piece of shit!" Marigold chuffed. "Kyargh! You hit me?! Over that worthless slut?!"

"Fuck you!" Timothy shouted, directing a trembling fist at Marigold. "She wasn't worthless! I see now that you're just a shallow bitch who only-"

THUMP!!

Timothy didn't see Marigold's counter-punch coming. His words slurred. His vision dulled. He woke up on the ground, his eyes dancing and his head blearily yelling warnings into his mind. It felt like five minutes passed as he dreamily looked right and left, the world a mess of shapes and images that didn't quite fit together correctly. It was probably less than two seconds.

There was a pressure on Timothy's throat. He tried to swallow, but the action was blocked by something. His vision came into focus, and he saw the tip of Marigold's long snout less than an inch from his face. Her punch had destroyed part of his helmet and left him open to attack. He could smell her faintly earthen odor, something he once associated with lust, but now made him feel somewhat fearful.

Marigold's left hand wrapped around Timothy's throat tightly. He realized that was why he couldn't swallow, and that realization sent a wave of panic through his mind.

Timothy's heart jumped. He grabbed at the hand holding his neck, but he was too weak to pry her claws away, even with the Thundercat empowering his strength.

Marigold's eyes were cold. Any former trace of love for Timothy was gone, long gone. It was as if she had become a primordial predator, and he was the prey she held in her clutches.

"You're a stupid little fucker, Timothy. Little Timmy." Marigold sneered. "I put up with you all this time because I thought I could get more out of you, but you're not even worth the time anymore. Dumb little piece of shit. Kyargh! Here's a fun fact for you, little Timmy, I was thinking of baby-trapping you so my kids would be locked in as future Heroes. But then you gave me this awesome game power, so now I don't need them anymore! You can't take the power away from me, so your value has run out!"

The corner of Marigold's mouth curled up into a sneer. "I deceived you from the very beginning. All I had to do was bat my eyes and act like a dumb little ditz, give you some attention, and you gave me everything I wanted. Now I have the power to become the strongest crocodile in Chrona, even the strongest in the galaxy! I would thank you, but you're so pathetic it makes me sick."

"It's too bad." Marigold said with a small chuckle. "If you had just played along, I'd have kept the charade up to spare your pride. But you just had to be stupid and chase some other girl. Now you're paying the price, but you're still so stupid you think you can attack me without any consequences. Idiot!"

Timothy wanted to say something, to choke some words out, but he was horrified to find that Marigold's strength was way beyond what he could handle. She wasn't at the strength of a Demon Duke or anything, but she was a Crocodile enhanced by the King Network. Her innate strength was far, far above a wimpy little human like him. He was completely helpless in her grasp.

Even as Timothy had that thought, Marigold's grip started to weaken.

Timothy was baffled. Was she giving up? Letting him go?

But then, a voice spoke.

[Marigold. Release him.] Ferral said, his hand outstretched, focusing on using his psionics to try and pry Marigold's claws off Timothy's throat.

Marigold slowly turned her head to look back at Ferral. As a Psion, he was basically emotionless, logical, even cold. But in that moment, he felt a genuine pang of fear shoot through his heart.

"Don't. Get. Involved." Marigold hissed. "Stay out of this, Psion. I'll ruin you if you intervene. This is a lover's spat."

Ferral was momentarily frightened, but then his expression steeled. He hardened his eyes and sent an equally vicious glare back at her.

[There is no love between either of you anymore. Unhand my friend, Marigold.]

Marigold growled at Ferral. "Make me."

ZOT!!!

A blast of fire slammed into Marigold's chest and blasted her off Timothy's body. The power of Yredelemnul's Rage erupted from Timothy's eyes, tore Marigold off him, and sent her flying.

Marigold involuntarily screamed as she was launched toward the back end of Po's library. She crashed into a giant bookshelf and sent the entire display toppling backward into another bookshelf, causing a domino effect to play out. Po himself was watching the fight without involving himself, but when the shelves started to fall, Po let out a cry of alarm.

"Oh no. My books!"

Timothy coughed and spat. Firing at Marigold was a last resort option, but seeing as she had threatened Ferral, Timothy realized Marigold wasn't fucking around. She really, truly, was not who he thought she was. He thought about all the signs he'd overlooked, flashes of memories and 'minor' red flags playing out in his mind's eye one after another.

Her main active skill had been Charm. Did she use it on him?

He had continuously failed to receive high affection marks for his relationship with her, according to the King Network. Had she never actually felt any real love toward him since the beginning?

She hadn't seemed interested in the King Network at first, but was that only a facade? Was she secretly using reverse logic to get him to pass it on to her?

These and other issues appeared one after another in his memories. Timothy shook the thoughts away and staggered to his feet. His vision hadn't fully cleared up. Marigold had hit him so hard, he feared she'd given him a brain injury. He couldn't be sure, but it seemed like she really wasn't that much weaker than Faceless, though Timothy hadn't truly fought Faceless one-on-one, so he couldn't be sure.

Marigold's flying body eventually came to a stop, as did the collapsing bookcases. From the cloud of dust that had risen upward, due to the age of the books and tomes on those shelves, a hazy shadow of Marigold's body emerged. She stepped forward and cracked her neck.

She jumped out of the bookcases and landed on the floor. With this, Timothy, Ferral, Raavul, and Paimon all took a step back. They hesitantly created a collaborative formation, one they'd practiced many times before. The difference was, Marigold wasn't a part of it now.

"Hahaha..." Marigold chuckled. There was a terrible burn mark on her chest from where Timothy's eye-beams had exploded against her, but she didn't seem to feel pain. "So you're all going to take his side, huh? After he cheated on me?"

[You know that is not what happened, we know that is not what happened, and you know we know.] Ferral said, continuing to direct a steady gaze at Marigold. He positioned himself between the crocodile and Timothy, acting as a physical barrier. [Timothy is my closest friend. I will not allow you to hurt him any further, either with your body, or your words.]

[Ferral is my student.] Raavul added. [If you attack him, I will not hold back.]

"Timothy is my master, the one who summoned me." Paimon added. "Obviously, I'll be taking his side over yours. Especially after you tore your mask off and revealed your true self."

Timothy looked at Marigold. She looked at him.

It had all happened so fast, but Timothy was clear-minded now. His thoughts were sane, and his considerations were realistic.

Not a drop of love remained in his heart for Marigold. She had been manipulating him from the very beginning. Maybe she lied and said those things just to piss him off and hurt him, but he didn't think that was the case. To say Marigold was honest would be rather paradoxical, but in this situation, it seemed as if every word she'd said had come from the bottom of her heart. She had not spoken a lie.

It made Timothy feel a little better. Now he wouldn't feel bad if his former girlfriend got the comeuppance she so desperately deserved.

"What's the matter, little Timmy?" Marigold taunted. "Too much of a tiny-dicked human to fight a girl by yourself? Need to hide behind your friends?"

His masculine pride, what little he had, bristled at Marigold's words. But Timothy restrained himself. He had to be realistic. Even if he and Marigold fought while he wore a T-REX and she didn't, he'd lose badly every time. It would be like a child facing off against a sumo wrestler, or maybe a professional MMA fighter. Timothy was not her match even in the slightest.

"You got what you wanted." Timothy said, his throat dry and scratchy. "You took my power. Enjoy it. Get the fuck out of our faces, and don't talk to any of us ever again, you lying bitch."

"Oh, little Timmy has some backbone now that he's hiding behind his friends?" Marigold retorted. "You think these weaklings can protect you?!"

Marigold charged. She could move frighteningly fast when she wanted, her natural body speed far above the level of the others.

Ferral was prepared. He summoned his Wordsmithium marble and sent it flying at Marigold's face in an attempt to put her eye out, blind her, and cause extreme pain. The problem was, though this was his strongest attack, Marigold was well aware of it. She swept her arm out and struck the marble, knocking it away with her scales. A second later, her fist struck Ferral's chest and sent him hurtling backward into Timothy.

Paimon had already activated his own T-REX. He waved his hand and tore up the floor of the library, grabbing rocks and dirt from underneath the floor to fling at Marigold in an attempt to slow her down. Marigold completely ignored him. His rocks were like the fists of a toddler striking a professional boxer's thigh. She barely even felt them. When that attack didn't work, Paimon switched to shooting his AR-15, but the bullets bounced right off her scales.

Raavul was the second strongest of the group. She put her full Psionic strength into trying to slow Marigold down. As a 3rd Level Psion, she harnessed strength on the level of a Demon Baron. Even so, her telekinesis only slowed Marigold a little, and Marigold grinned wickedly as she turned her attention on the Aspirator.

"GROOOAR!" Marigold roared.

A surge of fear went through Raavul's mind. She was caught off-guard, not understanding what had just happened, before the back of Marigold's hand slapped Raavul's face and sent her sprawling. Raavul fell to the ground, shaking in fear, her body trembling uncontrollably.

It turned out Marigold had recently acquired a new skill after all the levels she gained in the Dark Forest. Several skills, in fact, and she had already leveled some of them up. The one she used was a Warcry ability that could terrify opponents and leave them vulnerable for a few seconds, similar to Timothy's Yredelemnul's Disdain skill. The effect didn't last nearly as long, but it was more immediate and had a stronger effect.

"Marigold, no!" Timothy screamed. Even he felt scared by her approach, so he quickly moved Ferral out of the way and activated his strongest ability.

Zot!

With his mind scared and in disarray, Yredelemnul's Rage had much less effect than before. Marigold was on the alert, so she actually managed to dodge it the second time Timothy used the ability, then she slithered over to Timothy and threw a fast jab at his chest.

Thuck!

This one punch, with less than half her strength behind it, hit Timothy square in the ribs and transmitted most of the damage past his T-REX, into his lungs. Timothy flew backward and banged his back against the bottom of Po's giant desk. All the wind was driven from his chest, and he was left in a state of shock, unable to breath, gasping for air.

"Uh- uh, uhk!"

Timothy choked. He tried to breathe, but his lungs had momentarily stopped working. Marigold was on him in a second. She grabbed his face and pressed him against Po's desk, holding him in place while ignoring Paimon's gunshots. At this point, Paimon's only remaining move was to throw a grenade, and he obviously wouldn't risk that.

With Marigold's massive hand covering Timothy's eyes, he didn't have the option to use Yredelemnul's powers. This left him completely helpless.

"Oh, Timmy, you really thought you stood a chance! Kyargh!" Marigold laughed. "You're so pathetic. You were a fun toy for a while, but this is the end. We're through. I could snap your neck with a flip of my wrist, but I'm not so cruel I'd do that. I just wanted you to understand the gap in strength between us. You'll always be a weak little bitch compared to me. You should have known your place and worshiped my feet!"

Marigold started lightly punching, slapping, and abusing Timothy with her left hand. She didn't have to use much strength, and she was easily able to beat the shit out of him. Timothy wanted to scream, to shout, to beg for mercy, but her flurry of blows quickly beat him unconscious. She continued to batter his body even after that, just for fun.

Abruptly, a powerful wave of energy locked on to Marigold. Her body froze mid-movement, and she was startled, not sure which of the others had suddenly become so strong.

Then, she was torn away from Timothy and slammed onto the ground. Marigold's senses were jarred. Something picked her up again, then banged her on the ground again, again, and again. Three times in total, it was like a fully grown man body-slamming a kitten. For the first time since the fight began, it was Marigold who was utterly helpless.

Marigold was pinned against the ground, completely immobilized by a crushing pressure. Her eyes looked upward and she saw Po looking at her with an unfeeling, emotionless expression. Po said something, she wasn't sure what, then he flicked his finger and Marigold was sent flying away, toward the portal at the back of the library.

Marigold left out a yelp as she was ejected. With her gone, the room returned to silence.

It took thirty long seconds. Timothy shakily returned to consciousness, but he was in terrible shape. Multiple bones were broken. His face was mostly intact, but there was a hand-shaped bruise stretching out in all directions from where Marigold had grabbed him. He struggled to breathe; it felt like there were rocks rattling in his lungs. They might have been bone fragments.

Both of his arms were broken in multiple places. He had five fractured ribs. The pain was not too bad due to adrenaline, but within moments it started to intensify until it reached a 13/10 on the pain scale. Timothy couldn't even think. He was in such agony that he wanted to die. He had never felt such pain in all his life. Blood leaked from multiple contusions and cuts all over the front of his body.

"Ugh.. guh... huggg... guhh..." Timothy gurgled.

Paimon quickly ran over to his side. To say he was worried was an understatement of the year.

"Timothy. Timothy, Full Restore. Can you hear me? Use a Full Restore. I can't do it for you, okay? Look into my eyes, Timothy. I know it hurts. Use a Full Restore, come on, kid."

Paimon had to repeat his words multiple times. Timothy could not think, and he could barely even hear due to the blood pounding in his ears. He was in such a bad state that Paimon feared even the slightest touch would only cause him worse agony.

Ferral stood up. He wasn't in great shape either, but luckily Marigold had only hit him once. Sadly, even though he was a Psion, Ferral's body was not much sturdier than Timothy's. He had a fractured rib, and he was in a good bit of pain.

But seeing Timothy's state, Ferral knew his own injury was nothing to speak of. Ferral repeated Paimon's words, projecting them deep into Timothy's psyche, so his brain would understand even if his ears wouldn't.

It took a few agony-filled minutes, but eventually, Timothy mustered the strength to open his inventory and select a Full Restore.

The instant he did, his body fully recovered. All his injuries vanished, all the pain, and his HP as well.

However, the memory of that pain did not go away. The phantom pain was just as strong, and so too was the trauma of being physically assaulted by his former girlfriend. Timothy shakily stood up, then fell to his knees again. He started crying, and he couldn't stop. His body trembled for several long minutes, and he broke down, hiccuping and sniffling as he tried to regain his center of calm.

Paimon tended to Timothy, while Ferral walked over to help Raavul. Like him, she had only taken one hit, and her body was even a little stronger than Ferral's, but Marigold had struck her in the face and given her a brain injury. Ultimately, she and Ferral both opted to use a Full Restore to heal their conditions. It felt like a bit of a waste, given they could probably recover using Blinker's healing formation, but the situation was a little urgent.

It was fortunate Paimon hadn't gotten physically involved. He didn't have the option of a Full Restore, and he would have needed to use Blinker's healing formation to save himself.

Everyone came over to console Timothy, but their words fell on deaf ears. He was shaking with a mixture of fear, anger, rage, and terror, remembering and replaying each blow Marigold had struck. His mind couldn't help but replay the last fifteen minutes like a terrible movie montage, emphasizing his emotions more and more each time he recalled his pain.

The thought he'd been intimate with such a violent psychopath left him shaken in his beliefs, made him question his own judgment, and forced him to replay all their past interactions. He began to doubt his grip on reality. Did he even know what was really going on in the world? How could he have been so stupid as to love such a vicious person?

Timothy wanted to shut his mind off, to stop thinking about her attack. But he could not stop himself. His mind recalled each punch, each strike, each hit as if it were happening again and again, on repeat, only deepening the trauma.

With Timothy in such a state, The others decided not to leave Po's library just yet. They all sat down with him and stayed close, offering their support even while shaking their heads in dismay.

Ferral felt his own sense of guilt. He was a Psion. Shouldn't he be able to read people's thoughts? How could he have overlooked Marigold's true nature so easily? Certainly, he'd had his suspicions in the beginning, but he hadn't acted as a voice of reason for Timothy in a strong enough manner.

Ferral vowed to himself silently that he would rectify this shortcoming in the future. Never again would he be caught off-guard by someone else's lies and deceptions. Unknowingly, Marigold changed the entire trajectory of Ferral's growth. How this would play out in the future was something that would require a great deal of time to pass.

The group spent several hours inside Po's library. It took a while, but eventually Timothy managed to calm down, at least on the surface. Internally, he was a complete mess. No matter how he tried to ignore those awful, awful repeating thoughts, his brain refused to function properly. He replayed Marigold's words in his head, each time hurting himself just a little more as he saw the sneer on her face, the condescending way she looked at him, and her smug victorious expression when she was holding him in her grasp.

Timothy couldn't take it anymore. He didn't want to think these thoughts, to replay the memories of Marigold's attack.

It had already been well over 24 hours since Timothy needed to initially escape the Golden Grove. He had long ago deactivated the Mind of Void and returned to the Mind of Simplicity. What was unnerving was that the Mind of Simplicity granted Timothy a 25% resistance to Fear and Anxiety, and yet he was still in this sorry state. It just went to show how badly Marigold had hurt him on an emotional level.

After thinking for a minute, Timothy made a decision. He activated the Mind of Logic.

Mind of Logic

Player's emotions reduced by 95%. Player's thinking speed increased by 100%. Player becomes more adept at solving complex problems, but at the cost of maintaining social relationships. Personality altered to ENGINEER.

Just like that, Timothy's emotions disappeared. He became stone-cold, and all his repeating thoughts regarding Marigold faded away.

The change was immediate and obvious. Timothy had been trembling nonstop for hours now, so when he ceased doing so, the others noticed. Timothy's eyes became calm. He looked around, and cast aside those irrelevant thoughts about his former girlfriend.

Stupid. He had been stupid. Marigold was right. He was an idiotic child who fell for the whims of the first girl who shook her tail at him. Timothy felt neither sadness nor anger about this fact. He simply contemplated and comprehended the new Truth put before him.

Timothy opened up his quests. The old quest he had received about making Marigold his girlfriend had been crossed out. He still possessed the minor permanent benefits, specifically a 10% experience gain buff, but all the others had vanished. His body became a little weaker, and some of his innate resistances had disappeared.

Oh well. It was the price he had to pay for his ignorance. In the end, what was a small mental trauma compared to the value of learning not to trust wiley females who batted their eyes at him? Timothy now understood on a fundamental level just how naive he had been. He would never again allow himself to be victimized by someone like Marigold.

Timothy stood up. The others did too, giving him strange looks. Only Ferral understood immediately what had happened, just by noticing the altered mental fluctuations in Timothy's psyche, and the eerily calm look in his eyes.

[You've activated the Mind of Logic?] Ferral asked.

"Yes." Timothy answered. "I was too weak to withstand the trauma of my assault. But I am mentally strong now. My apologies for making you all worried."

Raavul and Paimon didn't know the details of Timothy's skill. Raavul merely felt reassured, sensing that Timothy's thoughts had become more Psion-like. This was quite agreeable in her eyes. Paimon was also happy to see that Timothy had so swiftly recovered.

[Timothy. The Mind of Logic is a crutch. I don't mind you using it temporarily, but you should only do so in moderation.] Ferral warned.

"Your concern is noted. Thank you, Ferral." Timothy said calmly. "It only now occurs to me how unprepared I was for the event of a backstabbing by a comrade. I will have to create contingencies for such occurrences in the future."

Timothy turned to Po. "Thank you for saving my life by repelling Marigold from the Library."

Po looked at the human with interest. "Po happy to help. Po does not like people who cause havoc in Po's library. Shelves knocked over. Your fault. Loud annoying noises.

Marigold's fault. Po will forgive transgressions this time, because your 'play' was fun to watch. Po will write story about the exciting battle in Po's Library."

Po paused. "...After Po fixes the bookshelves, of course. Sigh."

"Sorry about that." Timothy apologized. "Would you like us to help fix your library?"

"No need." Po replied. "Po is Librarian. Rebuilding the Library is Po's job. Accidents happen."

Timothy nodded. He wasn't going to press the issue, since he didn't think he could do much anyway. A single one of Po's books was twice Timothy's entire body weight. Let alone the shelves, which were likely as heavy as buildings. Maybe only the Psions could help him, and they weren't all that strong either.

"Marigold was ejected from the Library." Timothy said, turning back to the others. "She could be out there, waiting for us. When we emerge, I want all three of you to split up and go look for Blinker. She can put Marigold in her place."

[I can transmit my words directly to Blinker the moment we emerge.] Raavul said. [My telepathy can easily cover the majority of Chrona.]

"Then we'll do that." Timothy said.

After some more preparations, the group jumped out of the Library and arrived back on Chrona. They were fully alert and ready for an ambush, but it turned out that Marigold was nowhere in the vicinity.

What they did see left them absolutely floored.

"This... this is Chrona?!" Paimon gasped. "How has it changed so much? What happened while we were inside the Dark Forest?!"

The state of Chrona was far, far different from when they entered the Dungeon. It was beyond anything they could have imagined...

Part 756: Timothy's Trial

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy, Paimon, Ferral and Raavul were all frozen on the spot, completely floored as they looked at the Chrona that stretched out before them. It looked similar to the one they left only a week before, except far, far more advanced.

Numerous large buildings rose up into the sky. If the city had looked like a small town with a couple tall residential apartments in the past, now it looked more like a modernized city with offices, giant warehouses, roads, and even train tracks.

In the skies above, there were swarms of hundreds of drones buzzing about, boxes full of various objects being flown around from place to place. Long conveyor belts criss-crossed in the skies, carrying even more stuff around from place to place, as if Chrona had become a living shipping facility and these conveyor belts were its blood veins.

The city looked like it had leaped forward an entire epoch in advancement. Timothy and the others were so shocked that for thirty long seconds, they couldn't move a muscle and were simply looking around in bewilderment.

That was until a voice suddenly shouted. "There they are!"

Timothy shook himself out of his stupor. He looked down to see a pair of armored male crocodilian warriors approaching him, their postures alert and their eyes wary. Soon, dozens more crocodiles hurried over, all of them armed with guns and melee weapons as they surrounded the group.

"Huh? What the hell is this?" Paimon asked. "The heroes return home and this is our welcoming party?"

"Quiet!" A male crocodile said, striding into view. He was a tall male named Remus, the seventh son of Kar and Blinker, one of the second generation crocodiles who commanded a lot of prestige. Based on his uniform, he appeared to be the leader of a police force inside Chrona. "Don't make any sudden moves, Timothy, nor the rest of you either. Graugh! We have questions for you!"

Timothy's mind revolved quickly. With his Mind of Logic active, he could already piece together that something had gone wrong, and the crocodiles surrounding him were unusually hostile.

Naturally, one conclusion leaped to mind.

"Are you treating us like this because of something Marigold said?" Timothy asked mildly.

"Watch yourself, softskin." Remus said, hardening his gaze. "You brutalized my great grand-daughter. Graugh... don't you dare try to slander her, thinking I'll let you get away with it."

"Brutalized?" Timothy asked. "It's you who should be choosier with your words. Don't you think you're being biased, only hearing one side of the story?"

"I can put two and two together!" Remus snapped. "Marigold was beaten and battered, a terrible burn mark melted across her chest. She told us you attacked her, and based on how there isn't a scratch on any of you, even an idiot can tell she was telling the truth!"

"Where is my mother?" Timothy asked. "I want to speak to her. And Blinker and Kar."

"Don't you worry, they're on the way." Remus said. "The Techmancer is very busy, but I'm sure she'll spare some time for her fallen progeny."

Timothy blinked. Techmancer?

Before long, another group of people arrived. Among them were Raavul's other students, Fiona, Blinker, Kar, and Marigold, along with her mother, father, and immediate family.

Timothy looked at his mother. On any other day, he would have grinned and smiled, running over to her with happiness. But Timothy was in the state of Mind of Logic, so his emotions were completely muted.

"Mom." Timothy said simply. "Can you tell me what's going on? How long have we been gone? What happened to Chrona."

Fiona also, under other circumstances, would have run over and hugged Timothy tightly. It was obvious to everyone in Timothy's party that a lot of time had passed, and there's no way Fiona wouldn't have been worried sick. For her not to burst into a smile and rush over to hug him... what the hell had Marigold told everyone?

Fiona maintained a calm and stoic expression. She looked the same as before, but there was something slightly otherworldly about her appearance. Timothy couldn't quite put his finger on what had changed, but Fiona's body seemed more ghostly and transparent then before, but also far firmer and more corporeal. It was a contradiction that made no sense.

"Timothy..." Fiona said slowly, as she took a few steps forward, glanced at Remus, and nodded. She returned her attention to her son. "You've been gone for ten months. A lot has changed in Chrona as a result of my abilities. And with regards to the situation here... why don't you tell us what happened inside the Dungeon?"

Ten months.

Timothy was surprised for a variety of reasons. He hadn't expected seven days in the dungeon to translate into ten months inside of Chrona. He was even more surprised that Chrona had drastically changed so much after less than a year of work. Even a hundred years with Jason around hadn't changed it so much. Just what the hell had his mother been doing?

"No. We cannot let the fiend spin his lies before all these people." Marigold's father said. "He's been corrupted by the Dark Ones. Just listen to how he speaks! Graugh! This creature before us does not talk in the way Timothy did before he left! It's as if an alien has possessed his mind!"

Murmurs went up among the crowd of crocodiles. Timothy wasn't the most outgoing person, but as the son of Jason, plenty of crocodiles knew and had interacted with him over the years. Everyone knew he was a somewhat reticent boy, shy, certainly awkward. He often stumbled over his words and lacked confidence. Why did he have such a cunning light in his eyes now? How could he remain calm with all these weapons pointed at him? Was this really the same person they had known from a year before?

Blinker cleared her throat. "Actually, Timothy is probably talking like this because-"

"Grandmother, there is no need for you to make excuses for him!" Marigold's father interrupted. "Let him tell his side of the story, and we will compare it with what my daughter told us!"

"Did you just interrupt me, you disrespectful little scale-brain?!" Blinker suddenly screamed, startling Marigold's father. "Don't think I won't slap the crap out of you, young mister! I'll beat you black and blue if you try pulling a stunt like that again!!"

Marigold's father immediately shrank his neck and cowered. The other crocodiles nearby also took a step back. Blinker was, still, the undisputed most powerful existence in Chrona. When she got angry, not one of her descendants had the courage to run their mouths glibly.

"G-graugh. C-calm down, Mother." Remus quickly soothed. "I'm sure my grandson meant no disrespect. We just want to hear Timothy's side of the story. If we give him too much information, he could alter it to hide certain details."

Blinker opened her mouth to say something, then closed it after a moment and crossed her arms angrily.

"Fine! Timmy, you'd better tell us every single thing that happened in that Dungeon. I expect the others to chime in too if Timmy missed anything!"

Paimon and the rest nodded slowly.

[Of course.] Ferral said. [There seems to be a... misunderstanding. We would be happy to clear the matter up.]

[Whether or not this 'misunderstanding' is a simple one, or a series of intentional fabrications, that is still up for debate.] Raavul added, directing an emotionless look Marigold's way.

Not one person on Timothy's side thought for a second that Marigold hadn't spun a tall tale to fool the crocodiles. The only problem was, they didn't know what she had said. And indeed, because she was still badly wounded, and Timothy's party didn't have a scratch on them, she certainly looked quite pitiable as she deliberately made herself smaller. It looked like something had happened inside Po's library, where Timothy and the others had brutally attacked Marigold and she barely escaped with her life.

At least, that was the story Timothy logically assumed had been told to everyone present.

Timothy cleared his throat. "Honestly, I was hoping for a shower and food, but if you insist, I'll tell you what happened from start to end."

And so he began to talk.

Timothy first told the people present about the mechanics of the Dungeon and how his group had only been inside for a week while ten months had passed inside Chrona. He discussed the dungeon mechanics, the arrival in the Dark Forest, and the terrifying creatures that had been inside.

The crocodiles felt their blood boil with a hint of excitement as Timothy weaved a tale about the exciting and scary creatures in the Dungeon. Crocodiles were natural warriors, so the thought of fighting such powerful existences made them feel anticipation instead of fear. They imagined themselves fighting these Dark Stalkers rather than running away, like the cowardly Timothy did.

Eventually, Timothy got to the midpoint of the story, and that was when he noticed the crocodiles had started listening with more solemn expressions, as if trying to pick out any key details.

"You said her name was Sylphid." Remus interrupted at one point. "Graugh. How did you feel toward this... Emissary of the Dark Ones?"

Timothy blinked. "She was attractive, but I was with Marigold at the time and didn't put myself in any compromising situations."

Remus glanced at Marigold and raised his eyebrow, then he looked back at Timothy.

"Interesting."

That was all he said. The lack of a reaction made Timothy raise his guard internally. He'd already started to guess at what Marigold had told the others.

He continued his story. Eventually, he reached the part where Sylphid invited him into Cthulhu's Sanctum. This time, it was Blinker who interrupted.

"You idiot! Why would you go with her all by yourself?? She was an Emissary of the Dark Ones! You really expect us to believe you had no feelings for her after making a dumb decision like that?!"

Timothy's eyes dimmed, ever so slightly. "I had my reasons. It wasn't as if the others posed a threat to her even if they tagged along, and I didn't want to upset her or cause her to turn hostile."

Marigold's father snorted. "Doubtful! Thinking with your second head, it seems your feelings for her were not as platonic as you claimed!"

Timothy squinted his eyes a little. Was this the angle Marigold had gone? Saying Timothy betrayed Chrona because he fell in love with Sylphid and betrayed her? It was a little far-fetched, and despite her father's blunt words, the other crocodiles still seemed to be on the fence. They weren't fully convinced yet.

Timothy continued the story. That was when something drastically changed in the atmosphere.

"You used your game powers to reverse her mental attack? Well played!" Blinker said. "You really taught that evil bitch a lesson! It seems Marigold wasn't being entirely forthcoming!"

"Well..." Timothy said, his heart slightly sinking. "That was until Faceless showed up. She and I had to combine our strengths to defeat him."

"Oh?" Remus asked, a strange expression on his face. "And how did you manage to do that?"

"Well, I quickly leveled up my eye powers and attacked him." Timothy explained. "First I attacked his mind to lower his guard, then I blasted him with Yredelemnul's Rage-

"Kyargh, there it is!!" Marigold suddenly screamed, interrupting Timothy and drawing everyone's attention to her. "I told you, daddy! That was the power of the Dark Ones he used! He didn't have that power until he went into the Sanctum with Sylphid, then when he came back out, he did! Doesn't that sound strange to you? To anyone else?!"

Timothy couldn't help but glare at Marigold. Her interruption came at the worst time.

Unfortunately, his glare was seen by the crocodiles, and that caused their thoughts to travel even further beyond what Marigold had just said.

"It all adds up!" Remus exclaimed. "We don't really know what happened after he entered Cthulhu's Sanctum. Look at the way he's speaking now! That Dark One must have corrupted him and secretly taken control of his mind, or maybe enslaved him. Are we really going to take his word on what happened in there?"

"Now, now hold on." Paimon interrupted. "You need to let Timothy finish. There's still more to the story."

[Indeed.] Raavul added. [Interrupting his story to create a false narrative is despicable behavior.]

Remus hesitated, then took a step back and nodded. "I think I speak for most when I say anything beyond this point should have all the details scoured. But yes, please continue."

A few moments of silence followed. Timothy decided to continue telling the full truth, and so he detailed his attack on Faceless, the revelations about Cthulhu, and other such matters. He and Sylphid fled the sanctum, then they joined up with the others.

By the time Timothy got to the part where he fought and defeated Faceless a second time, the gazes of the crocodiles had shifted greatly from their starting points. It seemed the more Timothy explained, the more they distrusted him.

"That power is quite incredible." Remus said solemnly. "It sounds like it could even threaten my mother."

"Are you implying I would attack my aunt?" Timothy snipped back. "I'm not a servant of the Dark Ones. I just have this power because of my game abilities. It helped me get past their detection and ultimately fight our way out to escape. Without it, we'd all probably be dead, including Marigold."

Timothy continued a little further, and eventually he got to the point where his group exited the Dungeon, and Sylphid died. A faint look of sadness passed over his face, something all the crocodiles were easily able to see.

"Fool!" Blinker shouted. "I'm not buying this whole narrative about you being enslaved by the Dark Ones, but at this point even I can see you had feelings for Sylphid! Do you know what level of idiocy that entails? Those evil, evil monsters nearly wiped out my people! They're disgusting filth, and cannot be trusted in the slightest! How stupid were you to try and bring her back to Chrona?!"

"If he was enslaved or otherwise beguiled by the Dark One, it would explain a lot." Remus quickly pointed out. "Look at it this way, mother. Timothy is acting strangely, his words are different from before, he seemed to immediately fall in love with Sylphid right from the start, and that whole bit about her pledging to be his slave? Utterly ridiculous. It feels more like a play put on by the two of them to fool his companions. Why would she weaken herself before coming here? She clearly planned to use her superior strength to kill you and take out the rest of us, establishing a base of operations for the Dark Ones inside the Milky Way. We're lucky she died before she could come here!"

Blinker frowned. "Some of what you said makes a little sense, I guess... it all does feel a little too convenient."

"Convenient? It's the truth!" Paimon said. "The three of us will confirm it."

Blinker gave Paimon a strange look. "Paimon, you're Timothy's Pawn, yes? So if he gives you a direct order, you have to follow it."

"Well, yes, but Timothy's never done anything of the sort, aside from ordering me not to hurt his friends, which I wouldn't have done anyway." Paimon protested.

"And Ferral, you're Timothy's best friend, so you might cover for him in the event he was spinning a tall tale." Blinker added.

[If Timothy were truly beguiled by Sylphid, then he would not be Timothy anymore.] Ferral simply answered. [If my friend is not of sound mind, I would speak out against any lies he uttered.]

"So you say." Blinker replied. "And Raavul, you're Ferral's teacher, so it's also possible you would lie about Timothy for Ferral's sake."

[Preposterous.] Raavul flatly answered. [How poorly do you think of us Psions? We are warriors, not deceivers. I would not taint my honor by uttering falsehoods. It would cause my Psionic Seed to break apart if I went against my convictions.]

"I recall Demila was quite the deceiver." Blinker simply said.

Raavul didn't have a retort for that. Indeed, Demila had made it clear Psions could lie and deceive, just like any other species. It wasn't as if they were arbiters of morality, pure paladins of the light incapable of uttering falsehoods.

Timothy finished his story, detailing how Marigold attacked him. By this point, the looks of the crocodiles had firmly set in place. It seemed preposterous, the idea of Marigold brutally attacking Timothy out of nowhere. Why, because mere jealousy? Because she'd planned to steal Timothy's game powers all for herself? She had those powers before they entered the Dungeon. She could have easily left him without needing to go on the attack! Didn't it sound far less likely than Timothy and the others wanting to shut Marigold up before she could spill the beans?

Only Marigold's father flashed a faint look of dissatisfaction his daughter's way. He wasn't an idiot. He'd raised her from the moment her egg hatched, and he knew she wasn't exactly... the most upright crocodile.

But, even so. For her to attack Timothy and the others when she clearly held such deep affection for him and even let him take her virginity, it didn't seem likely she'd done the things Timothy had claimed.

"Now that Timothy's done with his story," Fiona said, speaking for the first time in several minutes, "there do seem to be some important details missing you've all overlooked. Timothy is indeed acting differently from normal, but it's not because his mind was corrupted by the Dark Ones. It's because he's activated his Mind of Logic. He mentioned that at the end, though he didn't explain it well. It effectively disables his emotions and allows him to think purely logically."

Blinker's eyes lit up. "That's right, I trained Timothy and the others for two months. We practiced using Timothy's different Mind Modes, and the Mind of Logic is really useful for logical thinking and stuff. His Mind of Void was also used in that sanctum fight, and it had a great effect too."

"Assuming the sanctum fight happened as he described." Remus retorted. "Graugh! I find too many parts of his story unbelievable. I don't think we can trust his words anymore."

"Neither do I." Another crocodile chimed in.

"He's lying! Kyargh!" A different crocodile shouted.

Multiple voices chimed in. Before long, the situation became clear... Marigold's narrative had won out. None of the crocodiles trusted Timothy, and they were also looking at his three friends with a great deal of suspicion as well.

Timothy frowned, and Marigold smirked. She'd barely had to say anything since the impromptu trial started, but her efforts before his arrival had laid a firm groundwork.

"Oh?" Fiona eventually said, silencing the crowd. "And what exactly do you intend to do about it? Are you going to lock him up? Execute him? Because I know my son, and he's telling the truth. It's clear to me Marigold lied, and she wove this whole story to cover her tail."

"Ridiculous!" Marigold's father quickly replied. "Do you really expect us to believe your son was smitten on sight by that Dark One succubus and he was merely bringing her to Chrona despite knowing the risks... all because he simply fell in love with her? He already had a partner! At the very least, it shows a lack of morals and ethics for him to betray my daughter like that, but the most likely explanation is that some sort of mental trickery was cast on him! He's still defending Sylphid even now!"

Fiona groaned. That embarrassing episode with her son peeping on woman and girls across the galaxy had been buried, so only she and a few others knew her son could be quite lecherous. If anything, Fiona knew he definitely would have been gullible enough to fall for Sylphid's pretty face. Fiona had no idea what Sylphid looked like, but she could make a few guesses. Her son certainly wasn't racist and he stared like a dog at any remotely attractive female that entered his vision.

But this wasn't the time or the place to debate such things. Fiona was a little disappointed in her son for falling for the whims of a Dark One, but he was a young man, so he was bound to make mistakes. She could tell Sylphid's death and Marigold's attack had deeply hurt him. As his mother, it was her job to protect her little boy, so she walked over and stood beside him, putting her arm over his shoulder.

"Enough." Fiona finally said. "I can't force you all to change your minds. It's clear to me that Marigold has spun a web of lies, and you've fallen for her words. But I know my son, and he's not the person she's made him out to be. If you want to come after him, you'll have to go through me."

"And me!" Blinker said, as she flew over to Timothy's side. "You guys had better not try anything, or I'll beat your butts into the dirt!"

The crocodiles looked at their mother with apprehension. None of them were remotely strong enough to face her in battle, and even their warrior hearts wavered, knowing she could thrash ten of them silly without lifting a finger.

But just because Blinker was strong, that didn't mean she was their god. The crocodiles looked at their ancestor with great respect, but in this instance, they 'realized' she had been fooled by the young man. She was clearly too close to the situation, too attached to Timothy for her own good.

"Mother, please." Remus pleaded. "I know you are wise enough to see through the young man's lies. He went into that Sanctum with the Dark One alone and came out with her supposedly pledging to be his slave. Doesn't that strike you as odd? And what of his mastery of the Dark One's power? Does Yredelemnul's might not frighten you? If Timothy were to attack you when you weren't expecting it, he might badly injure or even kill you. You can't trust him!"

Blinker hesitated. "It's... it's true I hate the Dark Ones. All fairies do. But I'm telling you, that little hussy Marigold is lying! Even if I wouldn't trust Sylphid in the slightest, she's dead, and Timothy is acting well within the bounds of what I've seen him do before. He's just talking this way because of his Mind Mode!"

Her words fell on deaf ears. The crocodiles wouldn't budge on distrusting Timothy, and Blinker's knowledge of the extra details only made it sound as if she was too invested in Timothy personally. Of course she would never turn against him, she still saw him as her cute little nephew, and not a villain lurking in the shadows, waiting to strike.

"Hurgh..." Kar eventually said, clearing his throat and drawing the gazes of everyone present. "Game Boy is a funny kid. Him falling for a cute Dark One is only to be expected. After all, he's a hot-blooded male! What male would not be interested in such a fine and mighty female? Of course, the matter of him cheating on my great-great-granddaughter is not good either. I choose to believe in Game Boy's version of the story, but I am still somewhat disappointed in the choices he made."

Another person spoke for the first time. It was Rebecca, who had not said a word since the impromptu trial began.

"I've known Timothy since he was born." Rebecca said plainly. "I find that his version of events is probably the most likely. However, I agree with the crocodiles here, in that the part where he entered the Sanctum is extremely suspicious. Too many coincidences lined up for him to obtain that power boost with his powers. It certainly is possible things happened just as he said, but if he truly did fall under the spell of Sylphid, perhaps as some sort of wicked plan by the Dark Ones to infiltrate the Milky Way, then I have to express my alarm here."

She continued. "I would place the possibility of the events inside Cthulhu's Sanctum happening as Timothy described at 40/60, with a 40% chance he's telling the complete truth, and a 60% chance he's omitted key details or heavily fabricated certain parts of the story. I lean more toward minor details being omitted, but I would be lying if I said Timothy's sudden attachment to the power of Yredelemnul didn't worry me. That alone gives me cause for concern."

Timothy gave Rebecca a long look. He had always seen her as another surrogate aunt, someone he could trust, but she was a lifeform almost as emotionless as the Psions. He never expected her to take a stance against him, but when she laid out the facts as presented, his story did feel difficult to believe. If even she felt this way, what of the crocodiles who didn't know him well?

Thus, a stalemate followed. Timothy didn't have a lot of people on his side, but the ones defending him were the leaders of Chrona, and Blinker was the strongest entity in the entire dimension. With her protecting him, the crocodiles wouldn't dare to make a move.

"How about this?" Rebecca eventually said. "I am a relatively neutral observer in this clash. I don't particularly care one way or the other whether Timothy is imprisoned or not, but I do care about the stability of Chrona. I will volunteer to keep a close eye on him over the coming period, and if he shows any signs of plotting against us, I will... take immediate action."

Her words caused Remus to shiver. She said it so matter-of-factly, his imagination ran wild. What sort of action would Rebecca take? He didn't know, and neither did the others. But since she was a cyborg, she must possess a lot of strength. She could probably suppress Timothy in an instant.

"That... sounds acceptable to me." Remus said. "Naturally, we crocodiles only fear that if he is unsupervised, Timothy might-"

BOOM!!!

Chrona suddenly shook as a powerful force struck it from somewhere unknown. Timothy's heart jumped. Everyone flinched and looked around, some more scared than others at the unexpected and violent interruption.

Several eyes fell on Timothy. The crocodiles immediately suspected he must behind this... attack! It had to be an attack!

Before anyone could voice their thoughts, the space just twenty feet away from Timothy distorted. A violent eruption of energy ripped Chrona's dimensional stability apart, revealing an ominous, sinister energy that poured into Chrona and made all the crocodiles pale with fright.

Nobody was more shocked than Timothy. He recognized the aura of that power immediately.

It belonged to Yredelemnul!

"What- what the fuck?!" Timothy shouted, his voice shaking. Even the Mind of Void couldn't suppress the emotions of shock and fear that seized his heart.

The energy quickly coalesced. Within seconds, it solidified into a pitch black swirling portal of darkness that grew until it was the size of two men stacked on top of and beside each other.

Everyone drew their weapons and pointed them at the portal. Seconds later, four armored figures leaped through wielding halberds forged from star-iron. These four figures flew out of the portal and stomped their feet on the ground, quickly surveying the situation and fanning out to point their weapons in every direction. They all appeared to be female, and they had dainty, beautiful butterfly-like wings on their back.

Blinker looked at them in surprise. "What? They're..."

Four more armored figures flew in, equipped with magical staves and shields, followed by four more equipped with greatbows. Finally, one last figure entered, someone with a powerful aura that rose to the same heights as Blinker herself. The figure's long white hair fell from behind her helmet. She swept her gaze around, then locked her attention on Timothy.

"It's him!" The figure shouted. "He's the one!"

Timothy took a step back as the armored warriors pointed their halberds, staves, and bows at him. A prickling sensation spread across Timothy's skin as he felt an acute sense of danger taking over his mind.

Death. He was about to die!

"Wait, wait!" Blinker shouted. "Fairy Queen Calanthra??"

The leading figure with the white hair paused, then turned her head to follow the source of the voice.

"Monster Queen Blinker?" Calanthra asked uncertainly. "What are you doing in this den of evil?"

Blniker was bewildered. "Den of evil? I don't understand. Please lower your weapons! Why are you threatening Timothy?"

"Timothy?" Calanthra shot back, turning to look at the fairly diminutive young man she had identified from before. "Is that what this creature calls itself? It's nothing more than a spawn of the Dark Ones! I traced the flow of Yredelemnul's power to this location. This must be Yredelemnul's Inheritor!"

The crocodiles looked at Calanthra with wide eyes, then they shot ferocious glares at Timothy.

So it was true! The little bastard was lying, and he nearly managed to escape! Luckily, the fairy queen herself arrived to execute him, saving their lives!

"No, no, what are you even saying?" Blinker asked, quickly teleporting in front of Timothy and raising her hands to create a barrier of energy. "This is a misunderstanding! Timothy is Jason Hiro's son! You've got it all wrong!"

"The Wordsmith?" Calanthra asked, her tone shifting slightly. "He's the Wordsmith's son?"

"Yes!" Blinker answered.

Calanthra narrowed her eyes. "Even if that's true... surely you can sense the aura of evil spewing from his body! He's been taken over by Yredelemnul! Don't defend the enemy of our people, Blinker! He'll backstab you before you know it!"

Like this, a standoff occurred as Blinker started to sweat. She had firmly been on Timothy's side before, but she had a deep respect for Calanthra. For her to appear here all of a sudden, could it be true? Was Timothy the creature she claimed him to be? A vile monster walking around in human skin?!

The fact Timothy was standing right behind Blinker suddenly made her even more nervous. What if Calanthra was right? It wasn't as if she had been lied to by Marigold as well. Calanthra was well-versed in the auras of the Dark Ones as well. If she said Timothy was one of them, what the hell kind of defense could she offer? Would Timothy attack her from behind, cutting her down with his eye-lasers due to her naivete?

Like this, the situation in Chrona reached a crisis point, putting everyone on edge.

Nobody knew what would happen next.

Part 757: Timothy's Tribulation

Far-Future Era. Late on Day 20, AJR. Pixiv.

Fairy Queen Calanthra was nervous, as were all the fairies on Pixiv. The galactic situation was worsening rapidly.

She had recently heard news of the Archangels and their plot to turn the False Cosmic Realm into a fortress for their twisted mutated creatures, the Kolvaxians. At the same time, she felt an ominous premonition regarding an ancient evil resurfacing on the world of Grimvolas, an ancient dragon empowering the Dolgrimites.

Both Wordsmiths were gone. Humanity was retreating into an ancient Cube to protect themselves.

The Volgrim Empire had suffered catastrophic losses due to the loss of 95% of their Psions. Their battle lines were failing rapidly.

The demons were working on a new plan to merge all their worlds together into a 100-lightyear super-cluster of stars. This would give them a better, though far from perfect assurance regarding their future defenses against the Kolvaxians.

By contrast, the fairies were in a terrible position. They had no Cosmics to protect them. As 'monsters', they were only lightly affiliated with the demons, but were not considered valuable enough to be targets for protection.

Thus, Calanthra had agreed to allow the humans to swallow the Pixiv star system into the Cube.

Normally, she would not want to do this, but the situation was worsening so rapidly in the Milky Way that with her senses, she could feel a terrible fate was coming for her people if she did not take immediate action to save them.

The good news was, fairies were extremely popular mating partners. There were fairies all across the galaxy. Even if Pixiv fell, their species wouldn't immediately go extinct. However, 99% of fairies were female, and they mostly gave birth to non-fairy children if they mated with non-fairy partners. This made them attractive targets for males of other species to wed, but it was a terrible value proposition for someone who wanted to ensure the fairy lineage continued. All the male fairies were on Pixiv, and if they died off, it would truly be the end for their species, at least in the Milky Way.

There were more fairies hidden in other galaxies. Calanthra was certain of that much. The problem was, she had no idea how many there were or what their conditions were. The fairies had been cursed by Yredelemnul so they could never ascend into Cosmics. It was entirely likely that when they fled Andromeda to the other galaxies, they were captured and enslaved, turned into breeding partners for other wretched species around the universe.

If so, then that meant the Milky Way might be the last place remaining where fairies lived freely, able to continue their species in whatever limited capacity they could. It wasn't a glorious life, but it was comfortable, and it ensured their survival.

With all these thoughts in mind, Calanthra might not have been eager to join with the humans, but it was her best option at keeping the fairies relatively independent. The humans had a few rotten apples amidst the bunch, but most humans were decent people. Calanthra trusted the general collective, if not specific individuals.

Thus, when the morning arrived and Calanthra abruptly felt a cold chill descend across her entire body, she completely froze in place upon her throne, and her skin turned ghastly pale.

"What... what is this? The aura of a Dark One?! How has it appeared in this galaxy?!"

Calanthra didn't feel a powerful presence. In fact, it felt quite weak.

But she was intimately familiar with that sickening, horrid aura. It was a dead ringer for the enemy of all fairy-kind...

Yredelemnul.

Calanthra immediately formed a spiritual body and jumped off her seat, leaving her physical form in place. She rushed into the rear part of her palace, the secret area she had once shown Jason Hiro. In that courtyard, hidden behind layers upon layers of formations, there was a terrible and evil energy radiating in the air. She arrived before the Eye of Yredelemnul and shuddered. The Eye had always stared at her with cold hatred, a malice borne of instinctual bloodlust.

But now, it did not.

Yredelemnul seemed to be looking elsewhere. The Eye had a hungry gaze, a look of expectation. It could not speak or make noise, but its soul seemed to cry out in happiness, as if it had spotted a succulent treat.

"No..." Calanthra whispered, her heart as cold as ice. "You... an Inheritor?! That's impossible! Not a speck of your energy has ever leaked from here! How did you pass your power on, wretch?!"

The Eye ignored her. It continued to look in one particular direction, uncaring of her thoughts.

Calanthra did not hesitate. She immediately convened the other Fairy Queens and brought them into the secret area. Only these elites were allowed to know the existence of the abomination secreted away on Pixiv.

"Of course, First Queen." One of the other Fairy Queens said, after Calanthra explained the situation. "We will follow your lead. Are you able to pinpoint the Inheritor's position?"

"Ordinarily, I would not. But Yredelemnul has lost most of his intelligence and cunning. He has been fixedly gazing directly at the Inheritor's position. So long as we trace the Inheritor using the Eye's power, we will be able to spring a trap and kill him before he grows."

"The galaxy is quite vast..." Another Fairy Queen said worriedly. "To trace an exact position will be rather difficult."

"It will, but I have long controlled the majority of the Eye's power. I will find a way. You must all stay at my side and clad yourself with our finest weapons and armor. The Inheritor is quite weak right now, but we should still move quickly and strike before he can acquire allies and otherwise strengthen himself in any way."

"You're right. No sense in dilly-dallying." The other Fairy Queens agreed.

And so, Calanthra began her work. She spent a full hour using her magic to attempt to pinpoint the Inheritor.

However...

"The energy signature of the Inheritor is distressingly weak." Calanthra muttered. "It is so weak that it is like trying to detect the aura of an insect from ten kilometers in the distance. If the Inheritor were stronger, the task would be easier. Their aura does feel a little stronger than when I first began looking for them, but it's still frustratingly faint."

"If they grow stronger, we will have a much more dangerous fight on our hands." The other Fairy Queen pointed out.

"True indeed." Calanthra concluded.

Several more minutes passed.

"I understand why the Inheritor is so difficult to pinpoint." Calanthra said eventually. "They are located outside of normalspace, inside a hidden dimension. There are extreme temporal distortions obfuscating the Inheritor's location. I'm making good headway, though. It shouldn't be long before- what??"

Calanthra stopped mid-sentence. She was utterly bewildered.

"The Inheritor's aura... vanished! It's gone! Don't tell me they died? Was it really that easy?"

Calanthra scrunched up her face. She squinted and looked up at Yredelemnul's Eye with deep suspicion. Could that bastard be planning something?

Yredelemnul continued to look in the general direction he had been looking for an hour now, but notably, his vision was less laser-focused on one spot. His pupil wavered slightly, as if searching for the Inheritor.

"He's lost track? Is this a deception? Did the Inheritor notice me and go into hiding? It would be terrible if that were the case!"

Calanthra was frustrated. She explained the situation to the other Fairy Queens.

"I suggest we wait here, just in case." One of the queens said. "Maybe the Inheritor will return. Once we're inside the Cube, we'll be in a time-accelerated domain. We'll have more time to search for him."

"I think the likelihood they've died is remote." Another queen added. "Let's just wait and see."

Calanthra agreed, and so they did. Calanthra continued to tap into the Eye's power, and after a few hours, she made a discovery.

"The Inheritor isn't dead. He or she seems to have obscured their power through some unknown method. I can still sense a faint trail of energy leading back to the Eye. We will continue to wait until the Cube has arrived to swallow the Pixiv system. We'll stop until the merging is complete, then resume work afterward."

Like this, several hours passed.

The midday sun lowered down the horizon. Night began to approach, and then the sun dipped below the horizon.

"The Cube will arrive here within six hours." One of the Fairy Queens said. "I received word that the Sharmur system was successfully ingested. Melody still possesses her full powers, which means demons can keep their strength even if their Cosmic power has become planet-bound."

"A fortuitous revelation." Calanthra acknowledged. "It's a shame, but I do not think the Inheritor will resurface before the Cube arrives. It seems he hid himself when he sensed my aura searching for his. He is truly cunning, like his predecessor."

Calanthra looked at Yredelemnul in disgust. Yredelemnul was known as an extremely intelligent Dark One, skilled in manipulation and political ploys. His eye-abilities were frighteningly powerful, but his methods for dominating and influencing the minds of others were his scariest features. He had even caused many powerful Apex Cosmic fairies to turn against their sisters when Yredelemnul invaded.

In the end, the fairies killed him and stole one of his eyes for themselves. It was a catastrophic final battle that resulted in the death of their Ruler, The Timeless. Even though Yredelemnul also died, Andromeda had been reduced to ruins, and the remaining Dark One Cosmics were more than a match for the fairies.

Calanthra's mother died after their flight to the Milky Way. Her passing was a scar on Calanthra's heart which had never fully healed. Calanthra hated Yredelemnul from the bottom of her heart, but she couldn't bring herself to destroy his Eye. It was a final weapon the fairies could use if the situation turned truly dire.

But as for his Inheritor?

That rat bastard would die without a doubt if she could just wrap her nails around his neck. Calanthra would be ecstatic if she could frustrate Yredelemnul's plans in such a way. The look in his eye would be completely worth it, even if he was too mindless now to understand what his Inheritor's death meant.

Calanthra hummed to herself as the pleasant thought of screwing over Yredelemnul came and went. All of a sudden, the Eye became violently agitated, and that feeling of dread from earlier washed over all the Fairy Queens once again.

This time, the sensation was tens of times stronger!

Calanthra's heart sank. Yredelemnul's Inheritor had returned, but this time his aura was so much more powerful that she was easily able to lock on to his exact location in seconds.

"H-how did he strengthen so much, so fast?!" One of the other Fairy Queens cried out in horror. "We have to attack now! Strike while the iron is hot!"

"Yes we do." Calanthra said grimly. "Ready yourselves! I'm opening a portal now!"

The pool of Cosmic Blood beneath Yredelemnul's Eye began to violently boil, tearing open a portal to the location of his Inheritor. At once, the fairies dove inside, ready for battle.

They had no time to waste.

"Blinker, watch out! Don't let that creature backstab you! Whoever Timothy was before, he cannot be trusted now!" Calanthra shrieked, beside herself with worry.

Blinker wasn't any ordinary Fairy Queen. In the past, she had been one of Calanthra's lesser Queens, but now she was also the Monster Queen, and stood on equal terms with Calanthra. As the First Queen, Calanthra had no other peers, so she valued Blinker's life highly. She was terrified that she was about to watch her sister die!

Timothy took two steps back and held up his hands.

"Uh, Calanthra? Hello. I'm Timothy. I'm not... Yredelemnul. I'm not his Inheritor. Not exactly, anyway..."

"SILENCE!" Calanthra shouted, her eyes turning bloodshot as she pointed a magical staff at Timothy. "Filthy wretch. Your very breath is tainted with evil! Do not think your lies will be able to shake my mind, no matter how well your act of playing the fool might deceive the others! I am well acquainted with His power!"

Timothy scrunched up his face. The situation was getting more and more distressing every second. Emotionally, he wasn't scared of what was about to happen, but logically, he understood that the odds of getting out of this unscathed were plummeting by the second.

Blinker was worried at first, but she quickly steeled her resolve. She trusted Calanthra, but she trusted Timothy too. She knew how Timothy's game power worked. She had personally trained him in using his Mind Modes. Right now, he was acting exactly as he would if he were in the Mind of Logic. Calm, rational, controlled, mostly emotionless.

He wasn't possessed by a demon or an evil Ruler. Thus, Blinker firmed up her convictions and chose to trust him. Her back was exposed. If he wanted to kill her, he might even be able to do so. But she chose to trust him anyway, because that was who she was.

"Calanthra." Blinker said, her tone serious. She strengthened the barrier to protect herself and Timothy. "You're making a mistake. I know why you're scared. But you don't know the full situation. It's not what you think, and if you attack Timothy, if you hurt him, and especially if you kill him, you'll truly regret your actions later."

Calanthra narrowed her eyes. "You're threatening me, Blinker? Has that darkspawn corrupted your mind?"

"I wasn't speaking a threat, in the sense that 'I' would make you regret killing him." Blinker patiently explained. "I'm saying once you realize who you'd killed, you would feel a sense of regret I can't even put into words. Timothy is the galaxy's greatest hope now that both Wordsmiths are dead. If you kill him, you'll be committing a crime against all free-spirited life."

Calanthra's fierce gaze lightened, at least a little. "So you're saying this boy isn't a servant of evil? How can you know, when you are incapable of sensing the mountain of atrocities radiating from his soul? Even just looking at him makes me want to wretch!"

"It's true... I can't properly sense Yredelemnul's aura." Blinker answered. "But I don't think the situation is what you imagine. What exactly do you think Timothy is?"

"He's Yredelemnul's Inheritor, obviously!" Calanthra exclaimed. "What else could he be?"

As before, her words caused the crocodiles to harden their gazes even further toward Timothy. With everything they'd heard today, they would truly be idiots if they trusted this villain even the slightest bit. It was obvious Blinker was blinded by her attachments to the boy. She was going to cause the death of all of them!

A moment of silence followed.

Blinker slowly lowered her palms. She stood up straight and weakened the barrier around herself and Timothy.

"Calanthra. Lower your weapons, please." Blinker said. "Timothy is clearly rational and capable of speaking. Why don't you let him, myself, and his mother explain the situation?"

Calanthra gripped her staff tighter. Now that Blinker had weakened the barrier, if she were to rush forward, Calanthra could probably kill the boy on the spot! Before he even had a chance to react she could...

She could...

Calanthra hesitated. She had known Blinker a long time. They weren't best friends by any means, but they were more than acquaintances. Blinker was a free spirit who had mated her way up the totem pole. She was Calanthra's peer, her equal.

Calanthra didn't want to tear apart their relations and rip Blinker's face off. The boy wasn't making any hostile moves. Might Blinker possess some knowledge capable of altering Calanthra's perception of the situation?

Thus, Calanthra carefully took a step back. She slowly retracted her staff and gestured with her chin to the other Fairy Queens.

They didn't lower their guards, but they did stop directly pointing all their weapons at Timothy. It was a good sign.

"Start talking." Calanthra ordered. "Speak your piece. It had better be good. I'm going to need a lot of convincing."

"Thank you." Blinker said, fully lowering the barrier. She did not step away from Timothy's side, and in truth, she was fully on alert for any attacks to come his way. She trusted that Calanthra would not make any moves, but as for the crocodiles... they were still obviously violently hostile, and rather brutish, to boot. Who knew if that little vixen Marigold wouldn't whisper some words to get a 'brave savior' to sneak attack Timothy while Blinker's attention was elsewhere?

Blinker was the matriarch of the crocodile species. But, clearly, she did not possess a status equal to gods in their eyes. After today, she realized that her descendants were not looking at her with the same respect as her direct children did.

That revelation made her uncomfortable, but it also went to show that they were becoming a lot more independent over time. Even she had no idea how they would evolve as a society moving forward.

"It's like this," Blinker explained. "Twelve months ago, Timothy acquired his Heroic Power. It gave him the power of 'video games'. He can level up, and-"

"Vid-eyeo gaymz?" Calanthra repeated, bewildered. "Level up? These terms are..."

Blinker wrinkled her nose. She had tried explaining the concepts to the crocodiles before, but the majority of them didn't understand, either. Those who had not played games would have a very, very, very hard time comprehending them.

At that moment, Ferral levitated forward. [Queen Blinker. I have something to say.]

The young Psion bowed his head slightly toward Calanthra in a show of respect.

[Queen Calanthra. Allow me to transmit a Memory Fragment into your mind. It will allow you to quickly understand the concepts behind Timothy's powers.]

Memory Transfer was actually a fairly advanced Psionic ability, but Ferral had acquired it from a Lootbox at some point, and while he hadn't had much use for it, this turned out to be the perfect opportunity to make use of his niche ability.

Calanthra didn't hesitate. It seemed Timothy's power would be utterly incomprehensible to her, based on Blinker's strange words, so she opted to nod toward Ferral. He levitated toward her, held out his finger, and pressed a tiny sphere of light against her forehead. The other Fairy Queens tensed up, worried this might be a sneak attack on the First Queen, but Calanthra had no such qualms.

Ferral was laughably weak in her eyes. Even a 5th Level Psion might not be her match, let alone a 2nd or 3rd Level Psion. If this psionic bead could hurt her spiritual body, she might as well just call it quits and retire, passing the position of First Fairy Queen to the next in line. She would be too embarrassed to keep on living in the mortal realm after such a loss.

Thus, she accepted Ferral's gift. The memory fragment contained many of Ferral's direct observations of Timothy, as well as his full memory of the events which took place in the Dark Forest, their training with Blinker, and many other such things.

The moment Calanthra took the memory bead, Ferral's body sagged a little, and he became visibly exhausted. It took a lot out of his mental acuity and made him feel as if he had been speaking and thinking nonstop for days at a time. The result was worth it though, as Calanthra sank into fifteen minutes of complete silence. She closed her eyes and pondered on the events depicted inside Ferral's memories.

Naturally, Ferral could have altered the memories to make Timothy look better, but Calanthra wasn't just receiving an audio/video recording. This memory bead contained countless thoughts, emotions, even recollections of scents and intuition points during the events depicted. It was as if she had experienced the Dark Forest dungeon along with the others.

The crocodiles waited impatiently, Timothy and the others stood with bated breath.

Eventually, Calanthra opened her eyes. Her expression was greatly eased.

"I see. I have reviewed Ferral's memory fragment. I now understand Timothy's abilities much more clearly."

She gave Timothy a long look. The hostility in her eyes was not gone. Even Ferral's memories were incapable of dissipating her rage and hatred toward anything related to the murderer of her mother and the powerhouses of her species. But Calanthra was able to examine the situation with far more objectivity than before.

"You obtained the power of Yredelemnul right when your Heroic Abilities awakened?" Calanthra asked.

Timothy nodded slowly. "Yes. It was one of my basic abilities."

"Blinker. You knew of the ability, as did Fiona. Did neither of you caution him against strengthening it?" Calanthra asked, glancing from Blinker, still in front of Timothy, to Fiona, who was beside her son, an arm still draped over his shoulder protectively.

"I did, but it didn't seem to have any control over his mind, and after using the game abilities myself, I determined the Eye power was being used in a purely utilitarian manner." Fiona explained.

"Honestly, I didn't even know what Yredelemnul was until Fiona told me about it..." Blinker said slowly. "I also didn't see it as anything more than his game power manifesting."

"That is my fault." Calanthra said, her tone solemn. "I should have inducted you into our people's secrets long ago. If you had understood the terror of that ancient Dark One, you would have prevented Timothy from awakening its power further."

Calanthra nibbled her lips. She was uncertain now. Timothy wasn't cackling maniacally, or looking at her with contempt, or doing anything else she could interpret as evil. He looked completely normal, though also emotionless due to his Mind Mode. If it weren't for the frighteningly potent aura wafting off his body, she would be just as in the dark as the others.

Those who were not familiar with the Dark Ones, but who did possess keen senses, would only be able to determine that Timothy had a strong aura around his body; they would not know who it actually belonged to, and likely wouldn't see it as 'evil'. It was only because Calanthra was so intimately familiar with Yredelemnul that she felt an intense loathing and disgust toward the young man.

"Alright." Calanthra said. "You strengthened Yredelemnul's power. How mighty has it become? Can you reduce its strength?"

"I can't de-level my abilities." Timothy answered. "What I've leveled will stay with me forever."

"Mmm..." Calanthra mumbled. "I want to believe you. I want to believe you're a good person and this is all a misunderstanding. But Ferral's memories also included the entire discussion up to the moment of my arrival. It seems like there are a lot of mysteries around your entry into Cthulhu's Chamber. You claim your mind was not subverted by Sylphid, but do we have any evidence you're telling the truth?"

Timothy faltered. "I... I don't know, Calanthra. I've explained my side of the story many times, but nobody believes me. Marigold started this whole trial by lying about what happened inside the Dungeon. Now it seems nobody will believe me even if I claim otherwise."

Calanthra slowly looked over at Marigold. She knew who this crocodile was, because Marigold was also inside Ferral's memories, including her brutal assault on Timothy.

"If Timothy were the monster you claimed, I would be quite pleased by your quick thinking." Calanthra said, causing Marigold to smile slightly.

"Unfortunately, I also know the real reason you attacked him inside Po's Library," Calanthra added right afterward, causing Marigold's scales to turn a sickly pale color. "You are quite the selfish vixen, aren't you? I almost respect your cunning, little scaled girl."

"What are you saying about Marigold?" Marigold's father chuffed, puffing out his chest. "Watch yourself! I don't care if you're a Fairy Queen or not! Don't slander my daughter! You only know one side of the story!"

Blinker gave him a weird look. Did he not understand that Calanthra alone was Blinker's equal in power, and the other Fairy Queens could rip him apart with similar ease? If he wanted to dig a grave for himself, Blinker wasn't about to stop him.

"I am not entirely convinced about Timothy's goodness, but I am certainly convinced regarding your precious daughter's malice." Calanthra said blandly. "You should speak less so that others will not see you as a fool."

Seeing that Calanthra had come around quite a bit on Timothy, Fiona seemed to make up her mind about something.

"Rebecca, are you done yet?" Fiona asked, looking over at the cyborg who had maintained her distance from Timothy, and from the Crocodiles as well. Unlike Fiona, Rebecca had not walked over to Timothy's side, and had stayed behind with Kar.

Rebecca nodded. "I finished three minutes and twenty-six seconds ago. I was wondering when you would bring it up."

"Huh?" Timothy asked, turning to look at his mother's side profile. "Finished what?"

Fiona smiled at her son.

"Analyzing the footage from the Dark Forest, of course. Previously, we only had Marigold's T-REX to work with, and it was missing crucial parts of the narrative. We knew she was lying about the last part of the journey, the fight inside the Library, but we didn't know if her reasons for lying were as simple as what she stated. We wanted to wait for you and the others to come out before we made a judgment call. Unfortunately, Marigold blew the whole matter up and created quite a storm of lies among the crocodiles."

Timothy's jaw slackened.

"The T-REXes... they record footage! How could I forget? Mom, do you have the recording of what happened in the Sanctum?"

"We do," Fiona said, "but this whole trial started so fast we didn't have time to analyze it. I could only entrust the matter to Rebecca. She's been scouring the footage with her internal processors this whole time. I planned to take you into custody, then to analyze the footage myself and reveal it to the crocodiles afterward, but since Calanthra arrived... we'll have to make do with the raw video."

Marigold's already pale scales seemed to shrivel up at Fiona's words.

"W-what are you saying?!" Marigold asked. "You're forging evidence to protect Timothy?!"

Fiona scowled at her. "Watch your mouth, brat. I've known since the beginning about your brutal attack on my son. The only reason I didn't say anything was because I wanted to know for sure if he'd been taken over by a Dark One, and now I'm about to find out, just like everyone else."

Fiona hadn't had time to analyze the footage from Timothy's T-REX. Nobody had; only Rebecca. Thus, her assistance was going to be crucial for this part.

Rebecca revealed a small projection device she'd been keeping hidden in her grasp the whole time. She pulled a small cable out of her wrist, then attached it to the device.

With this, a holographic display appeared in the air above everyone's heads, drawing their eyes to it. Rebecca projected the events of the Dungeon in chronological order. She cycled through different POVs of the five T-REX users, including Timothy, Marigold, Paimon, and both Psions.

The Psions were surprised. Ferral was familiar with video games, but he was no Technopath. He wasn't familiar with the intricacies of the T-REX, and Raavul was even more ignorant. They had no idea the suits could record everything in a 360 degree radius around them using smart metal, vibrations within the environment, and so on.

For the first time, everyone, including Marigold, got a good look at what exactly happened inside Cthulhu's Sanctum. Calanthra's face was dark as the night, seeing the thriving community of Dark Ones. She understood that Timothy had traveled there via a 'dungeon', but she wasn't certain about how such a system functioned.

Had Timothy really traveled across galaxies to a Dark One's enclave? Was it a false world, simulated by a higher power? A reproduction? Could it have been a form of time travel? Something else entirely?

She didn't know. Nobody present did.

The fairies, the crocodiles, and Timothy's friends watched as everything played out just like he had described. Sylphid attacked him, pinned him down, and attempted to steal Yredelemnul's Shard from him. Timothy fought her off, then he unleashed the power of Yredelemnul's Eye against Faceless. Sylphid submitted to Timothy, and all was made clear.

Several crocodiles frowned deeply. They looked at Marigold, understanding now that her version of events was... inaccurate, to say the least.

"Marigold." Kar said, directing a look of disappointment at his descendant. "Hurgh. Anything to say for yourself?"

"It's... fake!" Marigold spat. "Rebecca and Blinker planned this! They're using fairy magic to fake these images!"

"What feeble lies." Calanthra said, her disapproval of Marigold rising further. "These videos are clearly based on technological principles, not magical ones. My people are incapable of creating them."

Marigold pointed an accusatory finger at Blinker. "You're working with Fiona to protect him! This is all a plot against me!"

"Yes!" Marigold's father quickly chimed in. "Brothers, sisters, don't be fooled! All is not as it seems! Wasn't Rebecca standing against Timothy earlier? Now she reveals she was actually on his side the whole time! She's already lied once, clearly she's manipulating these false memories to deceive us!"

The expressions on the faces of several crocodiles changed. They carefully took a few steps away from Marigold and her immediate family.

Remus, Marigold's great grandfather, shook his head and sighed.

"Graugh. What a farce. Rebecca, please show us the final battle involving Timothy and Marigold."

Rebecca nodded. It didn't take long for her to show multiple angles of that final fight, revealing just how violently Marigold had brutalized her companions. Even her father was shocked by her behavior.

For the first time, Marigold's father took a step away from his daughter and looked at her as if she were possessed by an alien mind-virus. Since when had his cute little girl turned so despicable? He assumed from the beginning that she had fudged the truth a little, but these videos completely flipped the narrative!

"Marigold, graugh! You..."

Marigold started to shake. All eyes were on her now. If it hadn't been for those recordings, she was sure she could have maintained a fearless attitude and stayed safe from any consequences! But unfortunately, she had played her cards before the final hand, and now she was short on chips.

"D-daddy..." Marigold whimpered, looking him right in the eyes. "They're fake... those videos are fake. You believe me, right?"

Her father's expression softened. At once, he returned to her side, then looked at the others.

"Of course I believe you! I can't believe my conviction wavered. Graugh! You lot, bullying my innocent little girl, can't you see she's suffered enough already?!"

Timothy raised an eyebrow. So did the others.

Her father was about to turn on her. It was the final nail in Marigold's coffin. Why did he suddenly change his mind?

"Sneaky." Paimon suddenly said. "Marigold... did you just use your Charm ability on your own father to turn him back to your side? Even as a Demon, I'm in awe of your shamelessness."

Marigold flinched. She shot a nasty glare Paimon's way. "Shut up, you nasty bloodskin, don't just shout accusations randomly!"

"In terms of accusations, I could never come close to the nerve you've shown." Paimon retorted, his tone bland. "Is there anything left that's worth saying?"

Undoubtedly, Marigold was finished. Her entire plot had fallen apart, and she'd landed flat on her face in front of everyone. She'd even been forced to Charm her own father to no avail.

Timothy had no idea how her Charm spell worked. The Eye of Yredelemnul could only see the names of skills, not how they worked, but it seemed likely that if others knew she could use such an ability, its effectiveness would drop drastically.

Privately, Timothy wondered again if Marigold had used Charm on him without his knowledge. The thought she might have mind-raped him was sickening to say the least.

After the vibe inside Chrona had shifted, Fiona pulled away from Timothy and turned to face Marigold directly.

"Assaulting my son was one thing. If it had just been that, I would have had you jailed for several years to teach you a lesson. But the real problem is that you lied multiple times, spread malicious rumors, and did everything you could to bring harm to Timothy and the others. Timothy faced the possibility of being imprisoned or even executed because of you. Calanthra alone might have killed him if we hadn't exposed your plot."

"For that reason," Fiona continued, "I'm going to cast judgment now on you. I will have you imprisoned in a special cell for a hundred years. Like all crocodiles, you're immortal, so you won't die in there, and I aim to do everything I can to rehabilitate you, but if that proves impossible, then you can stay in there forever."

"You're going to imprison me?!" Marigold asked in a panic. "Th-this is unfair! You can't do that!"

"Oh, but I can." Fiona said ominously.

Fiona waved her hand. A formless pressure erupted from her body and spread out into the skies. Timothy's sharp eyes detected tiny tethers of electrical energy that fired out in all directions, imperceptible to ordinary eyes. Not just him, but the fairies and the Psions also detected these tethers, albeit to varying degrees.

From all directions, tiny spherical drones swarmed downward. Marigold's body tensed as an army of tiny orbs rushed toward her with malicious intent.

"W-what are you doing?!" Marigold shrieked.

She reached into her Inventory and pulled out the Thunder Gauntlets, equipped them in an instant, and swung her fists up at the descending swarm.

Nothing happened. The power of the Thunder Gauntlets failed to activate. Marigold had intended to send a shockwave out, blasting apart the drones, but to her horror, the gauntlets seemed to have been stopped by an unknown power. In her haste, she had overlooked the fact that Fiona was the one who helped Jason design these gauntlets. There was no chance she would let the young crocodile escape while using them.

Seconds later, the drones crashed against Marigold's scales and exploded into a sticky tree-sap-like substance that rapidly engulfed her figure, hardened, and pinned her in place.

"Daddy, daddy!!" Marigold screeched, as the drones grabbed onto her solidified form, then began lifting her into the air. In front of everyone's eyes, Marigold was flown off to an unknown place, vanishing from their sight within moments.

The field went still.

Timothy gave his mother a look of appreciation. He had underestimated her and Rebecca. Obviously, they must have suspected something was fishy from the very start. They knew Timothy too well to think he'd really been taken over by a dark god, but they did have to also consider the possibility Marigold was telling the truth. They bided their time, and eventually forced the truth out in front of everyone.

Now, Timothy was cleared on all charges. He was not a slave to the Dark Ones, he had not betrayed humanity, and he had not betrayed Chrona either.

With all that said, there was only one last matter that hadn't been dealt with.

"I still don't know if Timothy can be fully trusted." Calanthra said. "You don't know the power of the Dark Ones. We need to make sure your son is still fully in control of his mind and will remain that way."

Fiona nodded. "Do what you need to do, Calanthra. I don't want him to turn into a megalomaniac any more than you do."

"So be it." Calanthra answered.

Part 758: Mind Breaker

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy had succeeded beyond all odds. He'd survived the Dungeon, he'd grown far stronger than when he went in, and he had endured through serious trials and tribulations, including two near death experiences with women he was attracted to. Life was funny like that.

But it hadn't all been good. Timothy's relationship with Marigold was over and buried eight feet beneath the soil. Sylphid was dead. He was a young man, only eighteen, and he'd suffered two serious blows to his heart. If he hadn't switched to the Mind of Logic, he would have likely broken down in tears and gone into catatonia for a while.

Instead, Timothy gave off the false impression to those who didn't know him very well that he was utterly unmoved by all the events that had just transpired.

Sylphid's death? Whatever.

The power of Yredelemnul? Whatever.

Marigold's imprisonment? Whatever.

He seemed rather blasé about his experience in the Dungeon. Only a few people who truly knew him well, along with his teammates who had seen him breaking down right before he activated the Mind of Void, understood that he was far, far from stable right now.

Timothy's emotions had been reduced by 95%, but those emotions were so painful and extreme that even now, there was a sense of failure, depression, and anguish nibbling at the back of Timothy's mind. Timothy might appear emotionless on the surface, but even his logical mind couldn't stop replaying the images of Sylphid's death over and over, forcing him to fixate on her pain before she died.

It was a form of self-inflicted torture, one Timothy did not mention to anyone else.

"Demonstrate to me how your power works." Calanthra ordered, standing before Timothy with an imposing attitude. She conjured a phantasmal life-form made of spiritual energy, a replication of herself. "Strike it with all your power."

Timothy shook his head. "All my power? That won't be necessary."

The projection Calanthra had made was formidable. Timothy could tell Calanthra herself was about on par with Blinker, as were all the other Fairy Queens present. But Blinker was only at the level of a Demon Emperor, and Faceless had been at the level of a Demon Overlord, much stronger than all of them in terms of physical might.

Timothy realized that he had grown much more powerful in the dungeon, to the point he was now an extremely dangerous life-form within the confines of Chrona.

A second later, Timothy's eyes radiated a red light as he directed his focused attention toward the spiritual entity Calanthra had conjured.

ZOT!

A screeching noise rang out in the air as Timothy easily blasted apart the projection Calanthra had formed. His eye-lasers punched a hole through its chest and slammed into the ground behind the doll, blasting hundreds of kilograms of soil outward in a cone, making the crocodiles nearby raise their claws to shield their faces as clods of dirt and pebbles sprayed their bodies.

A few seconds later, it was all over. Calanthra's expression turned ugly.

"You have progressed Yredelemnul's power quickly in such a short period of time." Calanthra said, her tone heavy. "Curiously, I did not sense any inherent rage or malice behind your attack. You appeared the same as before. Yredelemnul's power should require one to focus their hatred and malice to achieve the most powerful effects."

"That's not quite right." Timothy said, correcting Calanthra. "Yredelemnul's power does not revolve around negative emotions, but instead mental focus. The more concentrated and focused my thoughts, the mightier the effects."

"You think to correct me, someone who has been monitoring and manipulating Yredelemnul's power for millions of years?!" Calanthra spat, directing an aggrieved look Timothy's way. "I think I know Yredelemnul better than you do!"

"You said I was his Inheritor." Timothy replied mildly. "Don't you only control his eye by using fairy magic as a medium? I control his power directly. Within myself. Maybe I do know more about it than you."

He continued. "You said hatred and malice are what empower Yredelemnul. Try changing your viewpoint. Hatred is the counterpart to love. Whether you love or hate someone, you will likely focus intense emotions toward them. Unlike Apathy, which involves a lack of focus and interest, hatred and love grant enough focus to become potent stabilizing forces with Yredelemnul's power. Thus, he likely used them because those were easy emotions for him to latch onto."

Timothy shrugged. "I don't particularly have much hatred in my heart. But through my powers, I can gain remarkable mental focus via other means. Thus, I do not need to tap into hatred to amplify Yredelemnul's strengths."

Calanthra lifted her hand to stroke her chin. Her anger faded as she looked away and nodded along to Timothy's words. He was making a lot of sense.

Calanthra had 'owned' the Eye of Yredelemnul for millions of years, long before even the Volgrim came into existence. However, the truth was that she had always been fearful to use it, only tapping into it sparingly to travel or send expeditions into Ripspace. She might have been around it for a long, long time, but she was always terrified of accidentally corrupting her mind or causing a catastrophe.

Timothy, on the other hand, tapped into Yredelemnul's power through a different means, and he started off unaware of who Yredelemnul truly was. He was untainted by the fear of Yredelemnul that Calanthra bore, and as such he simply treated the Dark One's power like a tool to be used at his discretion.

This was, for obvious reasons, an alarming value proposition. But without fear tainting his every move, Timothy had analyzed the power and figured out new ways it could function. Calanthra privately wondered if she could use this new information to fundamentally alter the Eye she owned on Pixiv. Could she reduce its vile aura, making it more a weapon for good? Or were her thoughts turning ominous now, slowly bringing forth a future catastrophe upon Pixiv?

Meanwhile, Blinker and Fiona were listening to Timothy's words, as were Rebecca, Kar, and all the other crocodiles.

For now, they were merely observers. Fiona felt that her son hadn't become a monster, but when it came to the evil of Yredelemnul, Jason had pressed upon her mind the simple fact that he thought Calanthra's secret weapon was extremely frightening and dangerous. How could Fiona rest easily knowing her son had come back from the damned Dungeon having empowered the Eye so casually without thinking through the consequences?

She was worried sick!

The crocodiles, having witnessed Timothy's eye powers in person, now looked at him more warily.

Something which couldn't be understated was that only a small, small portion of the crocodiles in Chrona had followed Marigold to witness Timothy's impromptu trial. Perhaps only 5% of Chrona's crocodiles, in total. They ultimately ended up being the ones who were most directly related to Marigold, including her nearest relatives, her gandparents, and especially Remus, the seventh child of Blinker and Kar, who was also Marigold's great-grandfather.

Thus, the crocodiles here were not happy about Marigold's imprisonment. They had to admit that she had committed serious crimes, but they felt the whole matter was handwaved away a little too fast for Timothy's benefit. One couldn't help but wonder how much Timothy's mother, the leader of Chrona, was playing favorites by immediately sentencing Marigold to a hundred years of imprisonment.

Naturally, these things would not be spoken out loud. The crocodiles swallowed their resentment and paid attention to what was going on now. Seeing that Timothy had grown so explosively in power, the crocodiles felt their warrior blood stirring. They wanted to fight him!

The problem was, Calanthra was a fairy queen, like Blinker. The crocs weren't the smartest group in the galaxy, but even they could theorize she must be roughly equivalent to their own ancestor, Blinker. And Timothy just shot a hole through her magic??

Wasn't he a little too absurdly overpowered now?!

They decided to tactfully keep their mouths shut. Calanthra spent more time talking to Timothy about his powers before eventually coming to a new decision.

"You also have the ability to dominate the minds of other sentients." Calanthra observed. "I want you to attack me with that power."

Timothy raised an eyebrow. "Absolutely not."

"You refuse?" Calanthra asked.

"I do." Timothy answered. "Yredelemnul's Disdain caused even a creature at the peak of the mortal realm to become a drooling, mindbroken mess. He cowered in terror and nearly pissed himself. You are... weaker than Faceless was. I wouldn't want to use such a power on someone who isn't my enemy."

Calanthra bristled slightly at Timothy's words. "It's true the fairies had fallen from our heights, but of all the fairies here, I am most familiar with Yredelemnul's power. I have been exposed to his energy the longest. I am most resistant to his power. Additionally, this is not my true body, but merely a projection of my spirit infused with my will. Mind-searing powers will have lessened effects compared to using them on my true body."

Timothy fell silent. He didn't say anything for ten long seconds as he analyzed her words.

"...Alright. I'll do it, under the condition that you really firm up your mind first. Don't treat this casually. It's not a game."

Seeing that the young man was deeply concerned for her well-being, Calanthra felt momentarily touched. If he really was Yredelemnul's Inheritor, the fact he had such a kind heart innately felt as though he might find a way to use the power in a good way. Far better than some megalomaniacal villain obtaining it and turning it against the free peoples of the universe.

Calanthra quickly activated her full fairy magic and shielded her mind. She spent thirty long seconds preparing for Timothy's attack.

After squatting down and looking at Timothy with a look of serious intent, Calanthra nodded.

"Do it."

Timothy still hesitated.

I shouldn't go at her with my full power. Timothy thought. The Mind of Logic gives me incredible mental focus with zero distracting thoughts. It's too dangerous to strike her with my full power. I'll use... half my focus. Half my thoughts will be thinking about Sylphid, and the other half...

Timothy's eyes suddenly turned dark purple. An overwhelming force erupted in his mind, swept outward, and tore through Calanthra's mental defenses in an instant.

"SUBMIT TO ME." Timothy's voice boomed in Calanthra's mind.

Instantly, Calanthra's skin paled. Sweat broke out across her entire body, and all the strength vanished from her legs. She fell to her knees. Calanthra opened her mouth to let out a horrible scream, a wail of terror, but no words came out.

Memories replayed. She recalled the day her mother died. She recalled the funeral. She remembered the pain and torment she suffered, having to try and rebuild the future of fairykind with only three male fairies left to repopulate their people. She remembered arriving in a hostile galaxy with no idea what to expect, danger lurking in every star system.

Calanthra screamed, but no words came out. All her interactions with Yredelemnul's Eye had not prepared her for this moment. It was like a deity from the Cosmic Realm had torn through the Firmament and grabbed her, drowning her thoughts in darkness.

In an instant, Timothy's presence seemed to grow in magnitude, swallowing the sky. His presence exploded with brilliant golden light, searing her retinas. He was like a god towering above her, making her shiver and shake with fear and longing.

She wanted to worship him. She had to worship him!

Calanthra flopped forward onto the ground and threw out her arms, prostrating herself while quietly sobbing under her breath.

"...orgive... me... lord... didn't mean... question... greatness... hic..."

Timothy appeared visibly unmoved, but even he was shocked. He had deliberately dialed down his power, yet this was the result? How the hell had Calanthra become mindbroken? She seemed to be treating him as her master, her owner, her god!

Blinker hurried over to Calanthra and knelt beside her. "Calanthra? Calanthra! Are you okay?! G-get up, this isn't like you-"

"DO NOT TAKE ME FROM HIM!" Calanthra shrieked, her dignity as the First Fairy Queen vanishing in an instant. "I worship my liege, I worship the great one! All hail Lord Timothy! I had eyes but could not see! I will repent for the rest of my life, milord! Forgive me for my insolence!!"

Calanthra tried to raise her head, but her eyes started to sting, blinded with tears of adulation. She was too awed by Timothy's presence to look at him directly anymore. It was as if Timothy had become an Archangel bathed in golden light. Looking at him was akin to looking directly at a star taken human form. Power radiated from his body. He simply stood there, unmoving, uncaring about the harshness of the universe. He was her light! He was the savior of the fairies! No matter what he commanded, she would obey him until the end of time!

Timothy frowned. He couldn't read Calanthra's thoughts, but it was clear even half the strength of Yredelemnul's Disdain had completely overwhelmed her. He thought at most it might scare her a little, frighten her, turn her against him... but this? This??

He had no idea what to do.

"I... seem to have... made Calanthra, um, worship... me." Timothy said haltingly, awkwardly. "I didn't expect this to happen."

"Oh, lord Timothy, of course you could not have foreseen how your greatness would affect me!" Calanthra cried, her tears falling to the grass as she bowed her head, refusing to lift it. "How could one as powerful and mighty as you comprehend the smallness of my thoughts?! I am but a weak woman, a pitiful worm in your eyes! Lord Timothy, allow me to follow you for the rest of eternity! Allow me to become yours in mind, body, and soul, so that I might-"

Before Calanthra could say any other embarrassing words, Blinker quickly summoned a force field around her, causing both fairies to become invisible and vanish from the eyes of the spectators.

All became quiet again.

Timothy's eye twitched. He could hear some of the crocodiles muttering under their breaths, but crocodiles were so obnoxiously loud that even their 'whispers' were fully audible to someone with decent enough hearing.

"...see that? Graugh... he just looked at her... and she became his slave."

"Scary. Maybe he really did dominate that Dark One lady."

"What if he used that power on us?"

"I... I don't wanna think about it. S-scary... kyargh..."

"-thought I could take him in a fight. But now? Nuh-uh, I ain't stupid..."

The crocodiles slowly started to pull away. Before long, they turned tail and quickly left the area one by one, leaving Timothy alone with only a handful of people he knew well. Among them were his fellow dungeon-delvers, his mom, Rebecca, and Kar.

"What did you do to Calanthra?" Fiona asked her son, as she gently rested a palm on his shoulder. "It seemed like you just... looked at her, and then..."

"Yredelemnul's Disdain." Timothy said. "It has a possible effect of dominating the mind of other life forms and turning them into my servants, but I thought it would only work on people much weaker than me. I was mainly worried the power would scare Calanthra silly, not... this."

Rebecca wandered over to Timothy, a thoughtful look on her face.

"Calanthra was wrong." Rebecca said, analyzing the situation with logic as she always did. "She thought that because of her proximity to Yredelemnul's Eye, she had become resistant to its effects. But in actuality, she was greatly weakened by its aura. She hates and fears it more than any other being in the galaxy. Struck with the power of Yredelemnul's Disdain, all her emotions must have burst out, causing this situation."

Timothy sighed softly. He looked at the other fairy queens, who had taken several steps back and were once again looking at him with deep hostility.

"I'm sorry. Truly." Timothy said. "If I had known this would happen, I would have refused Calanthra more firmly. I don't really have a way to 'undo' it... maybe the effect will wear off over time?"

It was the first time Timothy had used his power and gotten such a result. He had no practical understanding of how its nuances worked. Now he was regretting that lack of knowledge.

"Let's hope that's the case." Fiona muttered.

With Calanthra's fate shrouded in mystery by Blinker's force-field, Timothy decided to change the subject.

"So... mom? How did Chrona change like this?" Timothy asked. "I only spent a week in the Dungeon, yet somehow it was ten months on Chrona? And even ten months doesn't seem like enough time for all... this."

"The Dungeon had a lower time dilation ratio than Chrona, but not at the level of realspace." Fiona said. "I don't know if it applies to all Dungeons, Po's Library, or just this one time. You'll definitely want to factor it in, in the future. I also need to take better precautions. You nearly brought a Dark One here. I let you open the portal right in the middle of an open field, but next time, I'll have you open it inside a Kill Room I've built to contain possible Dungeon Breaks."

Fiona continued to explain. "While you were gone, I made a lot of progress. Ten months for me allowed me to master my abilities to no small degree, which also sped up my development work on Chrona, as well as countless personal projects. Have you looked at my character sheet?"

Timothy shook his head. He'd been way too busy to do that what with the tribunal and everything else. He also wasn't in the greatest mental state following the death of Sylphid and betrayal of Marigold, but that was another problem entirely.

With a thought, Timothy activated Yredelemnul's Eye and brought up his mother's character page. He could finally see all the details except for descriptions of Skills and such.

Timothy was floored. He had quickly grown to Level 25 in the dungeon, but his mom had flown way past him! It seemed that, as long as one was persistent, ten months of Chrona-time could easily be worth a week in the Dungeon, if not more. It was obvious to him that not only did his mother have way more skills than him, but they were much higher quality, and even though he could only see their names and not their descriptions, he could easily tell she had been very deliberate in what skills she leveled up and for what reasons.

Unlike him, who had been rather haphazard, picking skills somewhat at random.

"You were gone a long time." Fiona said, smiling at her son. Her eyes had a hint of sadness to them. "I missed you so much that it hurt to even think of what you might be going through in that Dungeon. But I knew you were under the effect of time dilation, so I wasn't too worried."

"How did you know that?" Timothy asked.

"Po told me." Fiona replied.

"You can talk to Po?!" Timothy blurted out, astonished.

Fiona chuckled. "Of course. It wasn't easy. I had to build a translation device, since I didn't luck out and get the skill you did. But after a few months of work, I managed to put one together that could translate Po's words to me and vice-versa. He and I talked a bunch of times. I was the only person who could enter the portal you guys left behind, and the only one who could actually see it, so it had to be me. I made sure to pop in a few times a month and check the status of your journey."

Fiona gave Timothy a lot of clues about what she'd gone through while he was gone. She hadn't said much, but what she had said was quite a game-changer. She opened his eyes to major problems he simply hadn't thought about.

If the Dungeon broke, wouldn't Chrona have been in big trouble? Fiona made it clear she had designed a new Kill Room for the next time Timothy and the others went inside, assuming they ever would. Timothy wasn't so certain himself.

Without Marigold to act as the tank, Timothy was hesitant to go back in. They only survived by the skin of their teeth this time, and he wasn't eager to repeat that experience.

"By the way." Fiona said, after a few moments of looking at Timothy with an odd gaze. "Why did you enter that dreadful Dungeon? Didn't you see how difficult it was?"

"Difficult?" Timothy asked. "Po told us it was rated as 'very easy.'"

He paused. "I do have to admit though, it was an insanely difficult Dungeon... his rating felt like a slap across the face."

"You really didn't look around the Library? Ask him a few more questions first?" Fiona asked, looking at her son with sardonic amusement. "Timothy... Po pulled that story from the Cosmic shelves. It was rated as very easy... for Cosmics. The rating for Mortals would have been beyond 'Extreme.' Did you seriously just take him at his word?"

Timothy's stomach fell into his shoes. "What?! That bastard. He lied to us."

Ferral and Raavul didn't change their expressions, but Timothy could feel their gazes on his back.

[Timothy, we were relying on you to be the interpreter. You ought to have asked more questions.] Raavul said, her tone disapproving. [On the other hand, the fact we survived such a terrifying Dungeon should mean that future Dungeons will be a lot easier... provided you make sure we pick those easier dungeons.]

If Timothy could feel all his emotions, he might have curled up into a ball of embarrassment and died right there on the spot. "Well. That's. Um. Right, I'll do that next time then."

He remained stone-faced for now, but who knew what emotions he would feel in 24 hours, when he had the ability to deactivate the Mind of Logic and die of cringe.

Timothy looked in Calanthra and Blinker's direction. They hadn't reappeared yet.

"Let's go somewhere private and talk for a while, mom." Timothy said, suddenly feeling tired and drained from all the stress he'd been under. "I could use a breather."

Fiona nodded. She gestured for Rebecca and Paimon to follow, and the four of them headed deeper into the city, while the rest left to attend to their own matters.

For now, Timothy couldn't do anything about Calanthra. He might as well leave her with Blinker to try and calm down.

As for Timothy, he had much to discuss with his mother...

Part 759: Champion of Creation

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy, Fiona, Rebecca, and Paimon all made their way deeper into Chrona, leaving behind Blinker and the others to deal with Calanthra. Timothy felt guilty about what he'd accidentally done to her, but there was nothing more he could do to resolve the situation now.

It took him less than a minute to put Calanthra out of sight and out of mind, because once he saw what his mother had been up to, his imagination was immediately captivated.

Ferral had opened a Dungeon portal outside the east side of Chrona, which was an under-developed area with lots of grass and flowers. Thus, Timothy's companions had only managed to spot the tall buildings on that side of the main city, and those structures had obscured the dramatic changes inside the city itself.

It didn't take long before Timothy and Paimon were completely lost. They didn't recognize anything. The Spynet Sphere wasn't in the center of the city anymore, and neither was Timothy's old house. The crocodile population appeared to have doubled in the last ten months, which was quite ridiculous considering they'd been increasing slowly and steadily over the last 200 years. Everywhere Timothy looked, crocodiles were roaming here and there. He spotted hundreds of hatchlings roaming the streets, cute little waddling babies that still crawled around on four limbs much quicker than a human child would.

The city felt alive in a way it didn't before. It was as if Timothy were looking at a living organism, and the conveyor belts around the city were Chrona's veins. Conveyor belts were scattered across the skies, with large boxes and crates of items zipping around, left and right. Timothy didn't know what their purpose was, but they weren't scattered haphazardly. They actually seemed somewhat artistic in how they had been placed with great care so as to not look hideous and ugly. They were also surprisingly silent, not constantly drumming up unpleasant noise throughout the air like one might expect.

"I made a lot of changes while you were gone." Fiona explained. "Probably 70% of those changes happened in the last couple of months. The more my abilities have improved, the faster I've been able to solve the problems I faced."

Paimon gestured to the conveyor belts in the sky. "What is the purpose of those?"

"I originally started putting conveyors on the ground, but I quickly found that they got in people's way, especially when I increased the number and speed of shipments transferring between my warehouses." Fiona explained. "I moved them into the sky a few months ago so we'd have more walking space throughout the city. See, I unlocked the Automated Factory and Crafting systems before you guys even left, but it took me a while to figure out how synergistic the two of them were. Ever since I did, I've been able to turn Chrona into a large scale automated factory that accomplishes a lot of strategic objectives all at once."

"Over there to the north, that's one of the three main Sorting Warehouses." Fiona explained. You can't see it, but I built a bunch of sorting arms to process package deliveries and other such things quickly and efficiently. With Rebecca's help, and some of my new abilities, we recently added digitized pseudo-Cybernites to the warehouse to sort packages. They aren't sentient, but they're intelligent enough to get the work done quickly and efficiently."

"We haven't solved the Energy Crisis fully," Rebecca chimed in, "but we've reduced the energy deficit a lot. We also haven't solved the problem of Chrona's time dilation speeding up, but I think we might be able to do so in due time."

Timothy gave Rebecca and his mother a long glance. "Mom, when my Eye of Yredelemnul leveled up, I gained the ability to look at your stats in greater detail. Why is your class called 'Techmancer'?"

"I promoted at level 25." Fiona said. "When you reach level 25, I'll explain everything to you."

"I'm level 25 now." Timothy replied, causing his mother to jump slightly, then turn and look at him with surprise.

"You are?!" Fiona exclaimed. "But... how? Weren't you only inside that Dungeon for a week? It took me eight months to climb to level 25!"

"I, ah... I leveled up quickly thanks to some good luck." Timothy said, dodging the question on how he'd amassed so much experience so quickly. He still felt deeply guilty about murdering potentially hundreds of lifeforms inside the Dark Forest. "I have a lot of gains I haven't had time to process yet. I leveled up a bunch of times, but we were in such a rush to get out of the Forest, I never really looked at everything I picked up. I have a ton of lootboxes, new items, new skill choices to make... it's been quite hectic. And until I choose a Promotion, I won't be able to level up anymore."

"Regarding that last part, you don't have to worry." Fiona said. "The King Network will track all the experience you earn, so even if you earn enough to level up, it won't be wasted. Once you choose your promotion, you'll gain a bunch of levels quickly."

"Still, I want to do my promotion soon..." Timothy said. "How does it work, mom?"

Fiona gestured toward one particular skyscraper with a conspicuous dome planted on its top.

"Let's go inside first, and then I'll explain everything you need to know." She said.

Twenty minutes later, Timothy and the rest had arrived inside his new home. The Spynet Sphere had been moved to the top of the central skyscraper inside Chrona, a building which was thirty stories tall. While it was the tallest building in Chrona by a couple of stories, as far as skyscrapers on ancient Earth went, it actually wasn't even close to as tall as the heights those buildings reached. Still, Chrona was a tiny fraction of the size of Earth, so the new Spynet Tower was proportionally far bigger relative to its planet.

Fiona and the rest exited an elevator at the penthouse suite on the 30th floor, with the Spynet Sphere being positioned directly above them.

"Unfortunately," Fiona said, "the Spynet itself doesn't work anymore. Due to dilation acceleration, all the monitors have stopped showing anything happening across the Milky Way. Until I solve the issue, it'll have to remain a decoration atop this building. It doesn't really matter though, seeing as without Jason, Chrona can't materially affect realspace. We need to focus on our internal crisis before the dimension implodes on itself from temporal and spatial stress."

Timothy felt his stomach tighten at his mother's words. Her emotions were calm, but he could sense that a terrible weight was growing on her shoulders. If things continued to progress as they had been, Chrona would spin faster and faster out of control until it collapsed, killing everyone inside.

Naturally, the young man did not want to see that happen.

Everyone sat down in the penthouse living room, except for Paimon, who sauntered off to cook some food. He didn't have much to add to the discussion, and he enjoyed cooking, so it was a good way for him to pass the time. That left Timothy alone with his mother and Rebecca.

"So, tell me about promotions." Timothy said. "Not to be melodramatic, but I'm dying to know."

"When you choose to promote, you will be offered three options." Fiona said, her expression solemn. "I was offered four as a result of my passive skill. I always get an additional choice, whereas you do not."

She continued. "The four choices I was offered all related to who I 'am' as a person. I needed several days to choose who I wanted to become. They were deeply personal, and not at all simple to decide between. I might have been paralyzed forever, if I didn't finagle an important detail out of Umi first."

Timothy raised his eyebrow. "An important detail?"

"In due time." Fiona said, refusing to answer until it became pertinent. "Here's a paper I wrote some time back, showing the choices I was offered. I wrote it to give to you when you were ready to promote, but it seems that day arrived far sooner than I could have imagined..."

* * *

You have reached Level 25. Congratulations. You are now eligible to promote to a higher state of existence.

Class Promotion: TRUEBORN HERO.

Once upon a time, you were a human known as Phoebe Hiro. You were a singular entity, one and the same. That was until the Wordsmith split your essence from hers and turned you into a unique life form capable of growing beyond your original intent. But what if you could go back in time and reform yourself as a fully corporeal human? What if Phoebe Hiro had become Phoebe the Hero?

As a Trueborn, you will cease to be an ethereal entity. You will become a fully flesh and blood human, with all the upsides and downsides of such a transition. You will gain incredible Heroic power, making you a powerhouse in your own right. The abilities you obtain will closely align with your interests and personality. How exactly those will manifest depend on the choices you make inside the King Network, but you will become a living weapon all your enemies fear and your allies adore. This power may even unlock the secret to saving Chrona from its inevitable collapse.

Class Promotion: TECHMANCER.

Long ago, you were an individual known as Phoebe Hiro, but your conscious mind has been Fiona Hiro for longer than even Phoebe Hiro existed as Phoebe Hiro. Why do you cling to your old identity when the man you loved has passed into memory along with your former self? Embrace who you are now. Empower yourself to become an incorporeal lifeform possessing incredible power. Abandon the concept of a fleshly body and obtain power overwhelming.

As a Techmancer, you will cast aside flesh and bone to interface with the Imaginary Realm, becoming something not quite human. You will be capable of phasing through solid objects at will, passing between dimensions, and no longer remaining tethered to the realm of Chrona. You will attune yourself technology in grand ways. You will become capable of interfacing with technology at a whim. You will be able to construct grand technological marvels with relative ease. You will be able to research novel inventions that make even the Volgrim gasp in awe. With this power, you may even be able to solve the time dilation crisis looming over your domain.

Class Promotion: DIVINE ARTISAN.

Aside from Phoebe Hiro, there was one other person you admired more than anyone else. That person was Jason Hiro. As the Wordsmith, he was capable of reshaping reality with a single word. You don't have the same interests in him, but what if you were a little closer to him in terms of potential? What could you accomplish?

As a Divine Artisan, you will become highly attuned to the spiritual and magical side of reality. You will remain a phantasmal life form, but you will become more spiritually impressive, allowing you to craft divine artifacts on par with legendary weapons like Excalibur and Solomon's Crown. You will gain the ability to create weapons of war and tools capable of progressing your own abilities, and the abilities of others with great ease. Perhaps by using this power, you can solve the time dilation crisis approaching Chrona?

Class Promotion: CYBERNITE.

Corporeality. Flesh and bone. Incorporeality. Spiritual consciousness. Why choose either of these when a superior option is available? Abandon the concept of a 'soul' entirely. Become a Cybernite, like your close friend Rebecca. Obtain a modular body with power and customizability. Change who you 'are' at a whim. Manufacture different body variants and jump between them at will. One body for science, one body for construction, one body for war. All these bodies are still 'you', but better, superior, perfected over time.

As a Cybernite, your mind will become tremendously efficient, your thinking speed will accelerate a hundredfold, and you will gain all sorts of novel abilities to enhance who 'you' are on a fundamental level. Not a spirit, not a ghost, not a human, you will become a machine with her own thoughts and desires capable of infinite improvement. Perhaps by becoming a superior life form, you will be able to save everyone you love from the terrible fate of a dimensional collapse.

Timothy read over his mother's four promotion options. He felt a mixture of emotions.

Two throughlines were clear. Fiona thought a lot about Phoebe, and it was clear she always felt envious of her corporeal self. She also feared the impending doom facing Chrona, and hungered to solve the problem and save the lives of her friends and family.

Each of the four classes offered were deeply appealing in their own way. Timothy thought the Cybernite option was a bit odd, but maybe his mother actually did have an interest in becoming one? Timothy and Fiona were very different people, so just because he thought becoming a Cybernite sounded offputting, that didn't mean his mother did.

"Why didn't you choose the Trueborn Hero option?" Timothy asked. "It seems like the best one to me."

He looked at his mom. Even though she had chosen the Techmancer promotion, she seemed just as corporeal as when he left. Had she truly become a spiritual lifeform?

Fiona lowered her eyes. It seemed she had already guessed her son's thoughts.

"This... is not my real body." Fiona said hesitantly. "I wasn't sure how to break the news to you, Timothy. I'm not actually- this isn't really... me. This body you're looking at."

"It's not??" Timothy asked, bewildered. "Wait wait, mom, you're not... then what am I looking at?"

Rebecca grimaced. "Your mother has become a fully spiritual lifeform. The body before you is one of her avatars. It's a robotic body, similar to a Cybernite. Not quite as advanced, more human in design. She made it just so she could maintain a 'physical presence' among Chrona's people."

A long silence followed. Timothy felt a pit opening in his stomach. He reached over and touched his mother's face, and only now did he realize she wasn't instinctively reacting to his touch the way she usually would. Fiona smiled at him, but there was a 'delay' as if she was acting the way she thought she should.

It was as if his mother was watching from afar, piloting the body before him like a drone.

"Mom... where are you?" Timothy asked. He looked around the room and squinted, then activated Yredelemnul's Eye.

At that moment, Timothy noticed trails of spiritual energy in the air. Some of those trails were close to his left side, opposite where his mother's 'body' was seated. Timothy turned to his left and frowned.

"Mom?"

The spiritual energy in the air vibrated slightly.

"Yes. It's me." Fiona said, her voice now coming from that cluster of energy. "I'm sorry I didn't tell you sooner. It all happened so fast, you returning, Marigold's accusations, all of that."

Timothy looked at his 'mother' stonily. He felt like he wanted to cry, but he couldn't. The Mind of Logic prevented such a strong emotion from manifesting. Instead, he had to look at her stoically, as if he wasn't about to break in half from the trauma.

"Why?" Timothy asked quietly. "Why would you choose this path over becoming a Trueborn?"

"Because." Fiona said, her tone steady. "I spent several days weighing the pros and cons. Ultimately, I realized the ability to travel in and out of Chrona would be extremely beneficial to saving Chrona. I am currently an immortal lifeform. But, if I chose to become a Trueborn, I would become a powerful human, but a human nonetheless. I would have a ticking biological clock."

"Dad made you immortal." Timothy argued. "You told me he did."

"There's no way to know if the King Network would maintain that immortality once I transitioned into a flesh and blood body." Fiona replied. "And besides. I told you there was an important detail I managed to coax out of Umi, remember? It ultimately gave me the courage to make this choice."

She paused.

"Timothy, I found out that the King Network has a limit. When you reach Level 100, you will stop growing any further."

"What?" Timothy asked. "There's such a thing?"

"That wasn't the detail that made me change my mind." Fiona explained. "Actually, that was just an interesting tidbit I learned by accident. When I was choosing my promotion, Umi inadvertently let it slip that a Player can choose multiple promotions. They can only choose a new promotion once they reach Level 100. At that point, the new Promotion will reset to Level 25, and they will start gaining experience once again."

Timothy took a few seconds to digest this information.

"So... so this isn't permanent?" Timothy asked. "You chose the Techmancer option in order to gain the power to save Chrona, and then once you reached Level 100, you would be able to choose the Trueborn option as well?"

"That's right. But there's a caveat." Rebecca jumped in. "If your mother and I have understood the situation properly, a Player with multiple promotions would be able to switch between them. The skills and abilities of one promotion would only function when they are actively in that 'state' of existence. So, if your mother has unique abilities as a Techmancer, then she won't have access to those abilities as a Trueborn, not unless she switches to that promotion tree... and vice-versa."

Timothy's eyes brightened. With this new information, the fog in his heart lifted, and his anguish was alleviated somewhat.

"That- that's great, mom." Timothy said, breathing a sigh of relief. "But how long will it take you to reach Level 100? The amount of experience required increases over time."

"I don't know." Fiona answered honestly. "I reached Level 32 somewhat quickly... but that was mainly due to being able to complete a bunch of Quests from before my promotion using my Promotion's unique abilities. Once those quests were completed, the new ones... have proven to be a lot harder. I think my growth is going to slow down quite a lot."

This additional information only made Timothy feel worse.

"How long before I can hug my real mom again?" Timothy asked quietly.

"I... I don't know, Timothy. I'm sorry." Fiona answered, her voice as low as his. "I can't revert back to a corporeal lifeform until I promote again... unless I obtain a skill that says otherwise."

"Oh."

That was all Timothy managed to say. His Mind of Logic was being pushed to the limit. Even if 95% of his emotions were removed, he'd gone through so much that the remaining 5% was still putting him in extreme distress.

"Let's... let's talk about your promotions. Okay, honey?" Fiona said gently. Her spiritual energy 'sat' beside him, but she was completely formless, like smoke on the wind. Timothy couldn't see her if he didn't keep Yredelemnul's Eye activated constantly, and Rebecca couldn't see her either.

Timothy stared forward at nothing in particular.

A few moment passed. He sighed.

"Okay."

Timothy activated his Character page. The Promotion option was lit up, and after a moment of hesitation, he tapped it, causing four brilliant options to appear before him.

You have reached Level 25. Congratulations. You are now eligible to promote to a higher state of existence.

Class Promotion: SUPERHUMAN.

You are your father's son. Already a Trueborn, you have manifested the power of video games and begun to empower others, including your own mother. But are you satisfied with your own level of strength? You are not a deep thinker like your adoptive or biological mother. You do not have the interest or inclination to fix Chrona's degrading time dilation. But what if that wasn't your purpose anyway? Humanity lacks powerhouses and champions. Become formidable. Become humanity's protector.

As a Superhuman, you will gain might and battle power beyond compare. Demon Emperors will fear your name. You will attract attention and notoriety as you grow in strength. Your ability to empower others will dramatically lessen, but you will become a force that makes the galaxy tremble. With this, others will respect you and bow to your interests. Even the mightiest Volgrim will become wary of offending you.

Class Promotion: YREDELEMNUL'S HEIR.

Already, you have begun to tap into the strength of a Ruler that is not your own. But what do you really know about Yredelemnul? Do you know who he was? Can you even comprehend what he accomplished? Your limited knowledge of Yredelemnul has shown you that the fairies may perhaps fear his power unfairly. Who says you have to become an evil psychopath just to wield the power of a dead Ruler? Harness his might and make it your own.

As Yredelemnul's Heir, you will amass all the powers he once did, eventually surpassing him and becoming an entity the Dark Ones cower before in fear. You will become personally powerful, but also capable of building armies by influencing the minds of others. The Milky Way has more threats it must face someday beyond the Kolvaxians. Why not gain the strength to protect your home? Even if it costs you some of your humanity... isn't that a small price worth paying?

Class Promotion: LORD OF CREATION.

Perhaps you are more similar to your mothers than you thought. You've never shown too much interest in creating technology or spiritual constructs, but who says that always has to be the case? With your mother teaching you from the side, you can become versatile, solving problems even she cannot. Wouldn't it be nice to help your mother for once, rather than leeching off her hard work?

As the Lord of Creation, you will gain the ability to create weapons, tools, even life forms. Your ability to create objects and creatures will surpass even your father and mother, but you will not be very competent in battle. You will serve an auxiliary role, building up others so that they may take down the threats humanity faces. Perhaps this is for the best. Perhaps becoming a creator will serve the people around you better than becoming a mere muscle-brained lunkhead.

Class Promotion: HAREM KING.

You love women, but do women love you? It doesn't matter what the others think, you should be true to yourself. Why limit yourself to just one mate or spouse when you can have them all? You are who you are. Do not deny your carnal urges. Using your powers, sweep away all the beauties of the world and gain power through them as well. Even alien empires stronger than yours will inevitably have powerful women you could seduce. Make their power yours.

As the Harem King, you would gain unparalleled ability to seduce females of all other species, and even males, if your desires ever inclined that way. Whatever powers they possessed would become yours to wield at will. Not merely a tool for selfish pleasure, you could pass on potent abilities to your harem, growing their strength and making their power, along with yours, even more potent as time went on. Could love truly become capable of conquering hatred?

Timothy was silent for a long while. He stared at the promotion screen while his mother and Rebecca waited patiently.

Eventually, Timothy took out a pen and paper. He wrote down every word, even if the final entry was extremely embarrassing. Were he not in the Mind of Logic, he might have hidden it from his mother, but that was not the case, so he didn't. She had already shown him an embarrassing side of herself, revealing her true thoughts and desires. Why should he not do the same?

When he finished writing, Rebecca and Fiona took some time to read what he'd penned. They read the words out loud and looked at once another every so often. They gave Timothy several queer looks regarding the Harem King description, but Fiona was much more worried about the Yredelemnul's Heir option. It went to show how deeply the Ruler had pressed his claws into Timothy's psyche.

"Why are there four options?" Rebecca eventually asked Fiona. "I thought you only had the fourth option because of your passive skill."

"Well, come to think of it, my skill only mentioned lootboxes. Maybe I was wrong." Fiona replied. "More importantly... it seems Timothy has a serious decision to make. We can easily cross off the two weird options, leaving only the Superhuman and Lord of Creation promotions. Basically, he has the choice between personal empowerment, or empowerment of others. There's no real middle ground here."

Timothy thought for a while.

"Why not the Yredelemnul's Heir choice?" Timothy asked. "It served me well in the dungeon."

"Absolutely not!" Fiona exclaimed, a trace of panic in her voice. "Timothy Edward Hiro, don't you even THINK of picking that horrible, horrible option! And the weird rapey-option, that's definitely off the table too, got it?!"

"I wasn't even thinking of the Harem King one." Timothy said, which was true, given that in his emotionless state, lust was not an emotion he was capable of feeling. Perhaps if he were in his normal mind-state, that might not be the case. "But I think ignoring Yredelemnul's Eye is a bad idea. True, it once belonged to an evil Ruler who wiped out a galaxy. But so what? I've already established his power doesn't come from hatred and megalomania. It comes from intense mental focus. In my Mind of Void, I can draw out extreme power from his Eye already. It could be a potent force equalizer."

Timothy continued. "Besides. You said there's no in-between option, but that's wrong. The Superhuman promotion makes me individually powerful. The Lord of Creation promotion allows me to empower others. Yredelemnul's Heir allows me to do both."

"Much as I hate to say it, Timothy is correct." Paimon said, as he returned from the kitchen holding a plate with soup and sandwiches for his master. "Furthermore, I think the Harem King option is not as bad as you're making it out to be. Timothy is, after all, a hot blooded young male human. It's only natural he desires copulation with a harem of beautiful females."

Timothy might have broken out into a violent coughing fit if he weren't in the Mind of Logic, but as it was, he simply stared stonily at Paimon's side profile. "You were listening to our discussion?"

"Oh yes, my hearing is excellent." Paimon said, reminding everyone he was still a demon with extremely sharp senses. "I caught the major points of what your promotion entailed."

"I'm leaning toward Lord of Creation." Rebecca said. "We need all the artifact and technology creators we can get."

"I disagree." Fiona said. "I'm already capable of creating powerful weapons and tools. Timothy should fulfill a different niche. I think Superhuman is best. Humanity needs a champion to protect our interests. Relying on the Phoenix, Beelzebub, or even Melody is a ticking time bomb."

"I think Yredelemnul's Eye is quite appealing." Paimon said. "I saw how much damage it did in the Dark Forest. He's already converted Calanthra from an enemy into an ally. The Eye's utility is demonstrably robust. I wouldn't discount it."

Fiona gave Paimon an ugly glare, but she didn't say anything. His logic was sound, even if it seemed painfully obvious Yredelemnul's Eye would turn Timothy evil. She didn't believe her son was stupid enough to choose it.

"I think my mother has the right idea." Timothy eventually said. "I'm going to disregard Yredelemnul's Eye. I'm also going to set aside the Harem King option. The decision for me is going to be between Superhuman and Lord of Creation. I simply need to assess all the possibilities to determine which one makes the most sense."

And thus, the choice was laid out.

Would Timothy pick personal power, or would he choose to become a powerful creator, like his mothers and father before him?

It was a decision that would reshape the future of the galaxy.

Part 760: Old Gold's Hold

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Chrona.

Timothy had a huge decision before him. It could easily be argued it was the biggest decision of his life, at least up to this point.

Timothy wasn't only picking his first promotion, but choosing a path that would not be alterable for the next several years. Unless he went on a genocide like in the Dark Forest and killed a massive number of living creatures to quickly reach level 100, he would be stuck on this promotion track, unable to pick another for a distressingly long time.

But, at the same time, his decision wasn't final. Timothy had not been made immortal by his father, but it seemed possible, perhaps even likely, that the King Network would give him access to immortality at some point. If it didn't, perhaps his mom or Rebecca could bio-engineer something.

As such, once he reached Level 100 in this promotion, he could swap to another one, gaining a huge amount of versatility in a few years. He was not permanently 'locked in' as every other Trueborn, including his father, had been. In this way, Timothy had earned a privilege beyond compare.

Now, the only question was what option he would pick.

"Yredelemnul's Heir really does seem to do it all." Timothy said out loud. "In terms of personal power, it allowed me to go toe-to-toe with a Peak Mortal existence, and I won. There were extenuating circumstances weakening my opponent, but most of those circumstances were me. I weakened him to make him easier for me to take out. I can only imagine that a bit more progress with Yredelemnul would make me unstoppable below the Cosmic Realm."

He paused for a moment to consider his words. Then he continued.

"The Harem King promotion is more than it seems on the surface. Notice how it says I'll be able to add the power of my harem to myself and swap their powers around at will. Doesn't that sound familiar?"

Rebecca opened her mouth slightly, a rare sign of mild surprise.

"...It does sound familiar. It's quite similar to Emperor Auger's powers. Or rather, Demon Deity Auger. He can swap around his subordinates' abilities and his own at will to himself and his minions."

"Auger controls his subordinates completely." Fiona said, scowling. "He speaks politely, but in truth, he's a villain to the core. He can revoke the power his goons possess and leave them completely defenseless, forcing them to obey his every command. Timothy's Harem option sounds even worse, because he would be taking advantage of women! That's mind-rape, pure and simple, even if you don't do anything to them or their bodies. Enslaving other minds is wrong. It's evil and depraved."

Fiona genuinely might not have felt this way at some point in her life, but she had spent over a hundred years around Jason, and he had influenced her views greatly. Even though Phoebe had once been quite repulsed by the horrors in King Arthur's dungeon, even she might not have opposed enslaving demons, given the right circumstances. But that was then, that was Phoebe, and Fiona was not Phoebe any longer.

In her eyes, after listening to Jason's lectures countless times, she found that even the thought of slavery made her stomach turn. The thought her son had accidentally mind-raped Calanthra was terrible, but she could at least excuse it as an accident born of Calanthra's hubris.

It would be completely different if her son chose to use such an ability over and over again in the future. Fiona would feel deep regret if he walked such a path.

"Auger isn't the only one like that." Timothy said. "Jepthath is similar, yes? And he's one of the 'good guys'. He's on our side. Mom, how do you reconcile the fact that Jepthath has just as much control over his Legion as Auger has over his subordinates, yet we call Jepthath an ally?"

"That's... that's not the same thing." Fiona said, feeling uneasy due to her son's cold, emotionless questioning. He didn't even bat an eye when saying such words. "Jepthath allowed people to join him after making clear what the results would be. Auger pressured people into joining him. Jepthath's power is also not actually controlled by Jepthath himself. People have full access to it and control it as much as their bodies will allow."

"That answer is nonsense." Paimon said.

Paimon sat across from Timothy. He couldn't see or sense Fiona's spiritual form, but he knew the 'Fiona' sitting on Timothy's right was a cyborg avatar, not her real self, so he simply addressed the air in the room when he spoke.

"The differences between Jepthath and Auger are minute and nitpicky at best. They both grant immense powers to their subordinates, and they both can revoke those powers under certain circumstances. As for Auger, I have it on good authority that the vast majority of his followers sought him out for their own personal empowerment. He didn't even advertise his abilities, demons simply came to him looking for a handout! Even I once considered joining him."

"Then why didn't you join him?" Fiona asked, annoyed by Paimon's interjections. He seemed to be pushing her son toward a path she definitely didn't want Timothy to take.

"I had my own pride." Paimon answered, his tone mild.

Timothy dipped one of the sandwiches Paimon had brought him into the beef soup. He took a bite, savoring its rich and meaty taste.

After eating a few bites and thinking for a while, Timothy shook his head.

"I currently have no carnal interest in the Harem King route, mom, but I think you're dismissing it way too quickly. Even thinking logically, it seems an extremely powerful promotion worth considering. It fits well into my general nature when not under the influence of the Mind of Logic. I do believe I would enjoy using it... perhaps get a thrill out of doing so."

Timothy paused, then shrugged. "Even so, I don't think it is the ideal choice for me, right now. Let's think about the remaining two options."

Fiona's unease grew. Her son was speaking 'logically' but the fact he had such strong arguments for the two worst options did not bode well in her eyes.

"The ability to become a powerful creator is extremely appealing." Timothy said. "It seems that I would be capable of creating technology, artifacts, even lifeforms. What that entails exactly, I'm not sure. Could I create biological weapons? Could I create artificial humans? Superhumans? Could I re-sequence the genomes of existing humans, in the same way my father removed the Human Flaw? Could I improve on the human genome enough to make us competitive with the other life-forms?"

Timothy thought for a moment. "Pets. I could create pets. Cute pets, combat pets, creatures based on Earth lifeforms, monsters, even exobeasts. Not to mention brand new creatures we've never seen before. Maybe I could design something capable of counteracting the Plague."

Timothy smiled, ever so slightly. "I could make catgirls too. That seems like something I'd enjoy."

Fiona's face fell. "There you go, thinking about girls again!"

"So what if I do?" Timothy countered, looking his mother right in her metaphorical spirit-eyes. "I understand that I acted poorly in the recent past. I was lonely, depressed, and felt like a failure. I had no confidence, and spied on women in a manner I'm sure you and several others found disgusting. But fundamentally, so what if I have a strong libido or desire to fraternize with attractive women? Is there something wrong with that? Or was there only something wrong with the manner in which I expressed myself?"

Fiona was taken aback. "Well, no, of course there's nothing wrong with... a young man... being interested in women. I- I wouldn't mean to imply otherwise. But we're talking about using your powers to control women. That's wrong, Timothy."

"Mmm. I agree." Timothy said, stroking his chin. "I was only joking about making catgirls too. Or maybe that was my emotional side acting out in a small way. Either way, you have been pushing me away from choosing Yredelemnul and the Harem King options because you don't like the fact they could be used for ill intent. But what if I used the power of Creation to make an army of women subservient to my desires? Wouldn't that be just as evil?"

Fiona's expression softened. "I suppose... yes. Timothy... when did you become so formidable with your words?"

Timothy shrugged. "Even if I choose to become a Superhuman, I could still become strong enough to overpower any woman I want and force her to be 'mine'. That would be just as evil as the other options, showing that no matter which choice I make, I have the capacity to act evil if I so desire. Therefore, the question should not be 'which choices are the least evil' but 'will I use my powers ethically, no matter which choice I make'? I leave it to your imagination to determine whether I would do so or not."

Fiona fell silent. For once, she was completely stumped. True, two of the options leaned much more heavily on brainwashing and mind control, but forcing someone to do something with raw strength or using creation powers to make submissive catgirl slaves were also perfectly plausible things her son could do if he wanted to act like a vile fiend.

Thus, she had nothing she could say. Fiona simply nodded her head. "Alright. You win this argument, Timothy. I guess... we just have to consider which of the powers are most practical and best for you."

Seeing that even Fiona had been defeated by Timothy's logic, Rebecca was impressed. Timothy had grown a lot more than even she knew over the last couple of months.

"If all the options are on the table, then I'm going to vote for Yredelemnul's Heir." Rebecca immediately pivoted. "Like Timothy said, it offers a whole suite of options to meet his needs. Personal power, the ability to command an army, auxiliary abilities, and it has already proven its worth. The chance Yredelemnul might corrupt Timothy and somehow take over his body is noteworthy, but I have a feeling Timothy's Trueborn powers will make him capable of resisting."

Even though she had just agreed that all options were on the table, Fiona was still a little baffled by Rebecca's abrupt change of heart. "You really think that's the best option?"

"I do." Rebecca said.

"I agree." Paimon added. "I've seen what Yredelemnul's Eye was capable of. I would rather have Timothy obtain the power than someone else."

Timothy rubbed his chin. "I think I agree with both of you. The Lord of Creation promotion feels like a mimicry of you, mom. The Superhuman path seems strong but shallow, lacking in auxiliary abilities. It feels strong, but also like I would be extremely limited in how I handle situations. When all you have is a hammer, every problem starts to look like a nail. And while I do think the Harem King promotion is extremely strong, there's one last thing I haven't mentioned."

Timothy smiled. "The Eye of Yredelemnul doesn't grant me any creation abilities, but it's effectively a combination of Superhuman and Harem Lord. I can dominate the minds of other Sentients, both female and male, and I will additionally gain incredible combat power. It hits two of my available promotion paths. In that regard, I think it's perfect."

Fiona felt defeated. Despite her best efforts, her son was still leaning toward the option she feared the most. But ultimately, she had no rebuttal to what everyone else had said. Even Rebecca had come around to the Eye of Yredelemnul.

"If you couldn't pick the Eye, what would you choose? How would you rank the abilities?" Fiona asked.

Timothy didn't answer immediately. He pondered the choices for a while instead.

"I think I would put Yredelemnul's Eye in first place, the Lord of Creation in second, Harem King in third, and Superhuman in last. I like all the offered promotions, and if I didn't have a choice and the King Network simply picked one at random for me, I'd be happy with any of them. But ultimately, I think I value versatility over power. Having a grab bag of tricks really worked to my advantage in the Dark Forest. I'd like to maintain that for my future growth as well, expending it as much as possible."

As such, Timothy had made his decision. The System had put the Eye of Yredelemnul front and center since he acquired his powers, and that had certainly influenced his final decision. But in the end, it was a strong ability and it had a lot of appeal for him.

"Oh and one other thing." Timothy said. "With everything that's happened with Calanthra, I don't know if Aunt Blinker will be able to snap her out of the mental state I put her in, but I'm hoping choosing the Eye will give me ways of doing so myself."

Fiona's emotions brightened, even if only just a little. It turned out her son had been thinking further ahead than even she had, worrying about how to break Calanthra out of the mental state he'd put her in. She'd been letting her emotions get the best of her ever since her little boy returned, but now she realized he wasn't a child anymore. He was becoming a man, one with his own thoughts and opinions.

"I select the Yredelemnul's Heir option." Timothy said out loud as he tapped the button before him.

Unlike his mother, he hadn't needed weeks to decide. Her counsel, along with the opinions of Paimon and Rebecca, had helped him reach a decision quickly. Timothy believed that even if Ferral had been present, he'd have made the same decision.

Perhaps if Timothy had not been in the Mind of Logic, he might have made a different decision. Though, in truth, with his thoughts and emotions utterly in shambles following Sylphid's death and Marigold's betrayal, Timothy likely wouldn't have been able to decide on anything until he resolved all that trauma first.

A brilliant light lit up around Timothy. His eyes widened. He felt himself lifting off the chair and his body being drawn toward a brilliant golden portal that opened in the air above him.

"Huh? What the- mom? Mom??"

Timothy looked down at his friends and mother, but they were still looking at 'him', his hand frozen in midair, his finger pressing upon the button that would promote him to a new existence. Timothy realized with a start that his soul had been separated from his body, and he hadn't seen it coming!

All of a sudden, Timothy flew up into the portal, and the world vanished behind him.

Timothy stumbled forward. He found himself shakily standing on a rock with a flat top, suspended inside a mystical land with swirling energies of light and dark. It was as if he had arrived at the edge of a black hole's event horizon.

Before him, several levitating stones curved from left to right, slowly rising before a giant temple in the sky, a temple with graven images of avian creatures, bird-people Timothy had never seen before. They stood tall, majestic, their eyes looking forward as if gazing toward an uncertain future. Their expressions were solemn and holy. They appeared to be priests of a religion Timothy couldn't identify.

"What... what the hell? Where am I?" Timothy asked.

His voice spread out, then seemed to dissipate. The energy swirling in the realm around him moved slowly, peacefully. It seemed to thrum when he spoke, but he wasn't sure whether he had hallucinated its movements or not.

A voice spoke from the distance. It sounded frail, shrill, and male, like the sounds of a squeaky-voiced old man.

"Administrator. Step forward, please."

Timothy hesitated. He didn't exactly feel fear, especially with his Mind of Logic active, but he was certainly feeling wary. His mother hadn't mentioned anything like this happening when she promoted, and there was no way she would forget to do so.

Slowly, Timothy took a step forward. He carefully pressed his shoe onto one of the levitating rocks, and it didn't budge a millimeter. He gently eased his full weight onto it, then took another step forward, toward the next floating rock.

There weren't any fences to keep him from falling. It seemed as if he would fall into the void below if he wasn't careful. Timothy's gut tightened each time he took a step. It took five long minutes, but eventually he made it to the end of the thirty-step path. He was sweating from exhaustion due to putting all his focus on not falling off the edge. Once he arrived at the bottom of the giant temple, he took a moment to look it over from top to bottom.

The design of the temple was unlike anything he'd seen before. The avian statues looked somewhat like owl-people, with stubby down-curved beaks and enlarged eyes. Their feathers were chipped and worn, showing how long ago the statues had been chiseled. Most of their color had long faded away.

The temple itself was fairly small, humble in appearance. It was only two stories tall, but the entrance was quite unique. It took the form of a doorway carved in the visage of some young bird-person, his mouth open, stairs leading into his mouth, and thus his 'belly'. The rest of the building was made of worn white bricks that were flaking apart and seemed like a man with a sledgehammer could pulverize the foundations in minutes.

The temple was, to be blunt, extremely shabby-looking.

But it also had an air of ancient majesty. At a glance, it appeared to have been around for countless centuries, perhaps even millennia.

Slowly, Timothy stepped into the entrance, climbing up into the giant bird mouth. He worried the mouth would slam closed behind him, locking him inside, but no such thing happened. Maybe he'd watched too many movies.

Instead, Timothy entered a dark room with only a single torch lit in the center. The room's interior was made of obsidian colored bricks that swallowed the light, making the room feel darker than it actually was.

Across the way, past that central torch, there was an aged avian man leaning heavily on a staff. His feathers were yellow, as if they had once been colored a brilliant gold, but had faded over time. He wore simple white robes adorned with a helix pattern on the front.

"Timothy Hiro." The old bird said, as he slowly began to shamble around the torch. "Been waiting a long time for you to show up."

Timothy blinked. "Ah. I'm sorry. Who... are you? Where is this place?"

"My manners, hoo-hoo. Forgive me, boy." The old avian said. "My name is... is... hmmm. I haven't spoken it in so long. It was... it was... bah, it's just a name. You may call me Old Gold. What is a name but a way to refer to another, hoo-hoo?"

Timothy nodded. "Alright then, Old Gold. So... who are you? Why have I arrived here?"

"The youth are always in such a hurry." Old Gold said, sighing helplessly. "You've only just arrived, and already you want answers. If you knew how long I'd waited for your arrival, I wonder what face you'd make. Hoo-hoo!"

Timothy frowned. "How... long... then?"

"Mmm... by your accounting?" Old Gold asked. He tapped his chin thoughtfully. "A few sextillion cycles, I'd wager. One loses track after a while. Of course, I'm actually supposed to be dead! So it's a miracle we've met at all, hoo-hoo!"

Timothy scrunched up his face. "You're supposed to be dead?"

"Indeed! I was dead!" Old Gold answered. "But then I wasn't. All thanks to the Great Shattering! Of course, I'm still technically dead, but when you account for temporal drift across the multiverse, it's a little difficult to... oh, it's all so complicated. Come, walk with me, boy. Let's go have a seat in the living room."

Timothy followed Old Gold deeper into the temple. The first room they passed nearly made Timothy's eyes pop out of his head.

"What the... how is this room so big?! The temple looked way smaller from outside! And are those spaceships?? I've never seen anything like them before."

"Yes, yes, it's just the hangar bay. None of the craft work anymore." Old Gold grumbled. "Not that there's anywhere to go. The whole universe is gone. I only managed to maintain a micro-voidspace for all these years because I was waiting on you to show up. Once we've had our little discussion, I'll finally let this space collapse, and then I can join the rest in quiet, peaceful death."

Timothy's heart jumped. The old bird was planning to die? And what was that about a dead universe? Not to mention a multiverse??

Old Gold took Timothy through a gigantic laboratory filled with magical and technological tools and weapons he couldn't wrap his mind around. They seemed so advanced that even the Volgrim were like cavemen by comparison. If his mother could get her hand on just one of these-

"Don't bother stealing, and don't ask for them." Old Gold said, seemingly reading Timothy's mind. "If you try to take them back to your timestream, they'll explode. Kaboom! Wipe fifteen star-systems off the map. Besides, you primitives aren't moral enough to be worthy of my people's weapons."

"Your people?" Timothy asked. "Who are they?"

Old Gold thought for a moment.

"Hmm. Hoo-hoo, my people? We are the... we were the... oh, what did we call ourselves? I can't remember. It's been a long time, you know! You can just call us the... Birdos! Birdzos? Birazos? Bah, just 'Birdos' is fine. We look like birds to you, after all, and a name is just a name!"

"I see, so you're the... Birdos." Timothy repeated with a frown. It seemed like such a lazy and inelegant name, casually thought up, it couldn't possibly be their real moniker. Timothy wondered if he could glance through an old book or something to find out what they were really called.

Old Gold finally led Timothy into a small, cozy living room. There was a fireplace crackling, and a comfortable-looking sofa made of feathers and ivory seated along with several chairs.

Old Gold slowly eased himself into one of the chairs, then gestured to a chair across from him.

"There we go, now that we're sitting, my joints won't hurt so much. Hoo-hoo!" Old Gold chuckled. "Alright, alright. Ask your questions, boy."

Timothy nodded. He eased into the chair, noticing it was unbelievably comfortable. He could easily fall asleep in it if he were even a little tired. Luckily, he was full of energy.

"You said you'd been waiting for me. Why?" Timothy asked. "And what relation do you have with the King Network?"

Old Gold squinted his eyes. "The King Network...? Oh, you mean the Creation Network. Hoo-hoo. Yes, I helped the Creator make it way back in the day! Before he became a Ruler. Then I died. Oh, but I didn't! Because then the Great Shattering happened. So I lived. But I will still die eventually. Can't outrun death forever, you know!"

Timothy was visibly lost. "So... you're one of... or the main designer of my power?"

"Mhm. Didn't know who'd pick it up. Was waiting for someone compatible to emerge for quite a long while!" Old Gold explained. "A really long while, boy! You sure took your sweet time getting born! But I guess you made it before my time ran out, so we're all good."

"This dimension is going to collapse?" Timothy pressed further.

"Of course. All universes come to an end eventually. It's part of the Akashic Cycle!" Old Gold elaborated. "My universe is from... oh, say, three or four Eternities before yours? It was destroyed, but then the Great Shattering happened, and it wasn't. So I was able to live on for a few quintillion or quinbillion cycles. Whatever, I don't remember how long it took! You lose track of time when you're just sitting there, waiting for some brat to be born."

Timothy's jaw slackened. He was getting a lot of incredible information, but it was difficult to make sense of.

"What is the Akashic Cycle?" Timothy asked.

"It's the cycle of life and death." Old Gold said. "Universes poof into existence. They live on for an Eternity. They contract. They collapse. Then, poof! Another universe. And so it goes, on and on, forever."

"Oh." Timothy said.

He sort of understood the concept, but this wasn't something he had really discussed with his mother. It was just something he vaguely understood because of Old Gold's extremely simplified explanation.

"So then... what's the 'Great Shattering'?" Timothy asked, afraid of the answer he'd receive.

"Well, the Akashic Cycle was normal. Then it wasn't. Now it's different. Except, it's always been different, and it can't be undone." Old Gold said, his tone serious, but his words seemingly jarring and nonsensical. "At some point, it changed. Except once it changed, it had always been changed. The multiverse came into being, along with the timeline explosion, and all that other fun stuff."

Timothy did his best to follow along.

"So you're saying... time was linear, but then... the Great Shattering happened? And thus, time wasn't linear anymore? But now that the Shattering has happened, time was... always non-linear?"

"Wow, exactly! You're pretty fast on the upkeep, boy." Old Gold praised. "If it wasn't for the Great Shattering, I wouldn't have found a crack between dimensions to build my Old Gold Hold! Great name, isn't it? Considering I just made it up! Hoo-hoo! Anyway, where was I? Oh yes, the timestream. Well, it always Is, and it always Was, but at any given moment, it becomes different depending on who observes it. But it's also always the same, and it's always different. See? It's all so very simple to understand."

Timothy was trying not to feel lost, but he was not his mother. A lot of these discussions went over his head. He made sure to remember every word Old Gold said though. He would definitely repeat them to his mom later, hopefully giving her good information to work with. If Timothy couldn't understand, maybe she could.

"So... what caused the Great Shattering?" Timothy asked.

Old Gold cocked his head in confusion. It almost looked cute, like the look a parakeet might give when it heard a strange noise.

"You don't know?" Old Gold asked. "Shouldn't you? Your old man made it happen, after all."

Timothy's heart fell into the soles of his shoes. "W-what? My old... man? My dad?"

"Of course!" Old Gold crowed. "Jason Hiro, yes? He's the most famous creature in the multiverse! Ever since he rewound time and became the first Temporal Traveler, it became possible for any old schmoe to do it!"

The blood drained from Timothy's face.

"My... my dad... he died! He died. But you're saying... he didn't die?"

Old Gold scoffed. "Oh, so you're messing with me, boy! Hoo-hoo! Of course the Wordsmith didn't die. He time traveled back into the past. How else would the Great Shattering have happened otherwise? Maybe you're not too bright after all."

Timothy didn't hear the last words Old Gold said. The light faded from his eyes, and he slumped in his chair.

The young man fainted from shock.

A few moments passed. Old Gold leaned forward and blinked.

"Eh? What the heck?! Since when were kids so frail?? Guess I'll have to put on a pot of tea and wait 'til he wakes up! Hoo-hoo!"

Part 761: Heroic Rebirth

Far-Future Era. Day 21, AJR. Hall of Heroes.

Blake navigated his way through the Hall of Heroes with the ease of a young man who had lived in this small and compact dimension his entire life. The Hall of Heroes was not particularly large, perhaps the size of a luxurious mansion on ancient Earth. This might sound sizable to a layperson, but it was actually smaller than even Chrona, its compact form helpful in stabilizing its time dilation at exactly 100 times the speed of realspace.

Unlike Chrona, the Hall of Heroes was stable and was not increasing or decreasing its dilation speeds as time went on, meaning its people were not facing a crisis they needed to solve. As such, they could focus on developing weapons and tools for humanity, as well as consulting on war plans regarding what to do in realspace.

For Blake, he was not so much thinking in a macro-humanity focus on this fine day, but instead, he was dwelling on the scope of his abilities and unlocking his full potential.

Blake ultimately had two powers. He could manipulate light, and he could manipulate darkness. He could form them into shapes, even primitive constructs, but those fell apart if he stopped concentrating. Thus, after consulting with his mentor, King Arthur, Blake realized that there was something extremely important he needed to do.

His brain needed an upgrade.

Blake wasn't an idiot, but he fell far short of his older sister, even comparing her to when she was his age. Mandy was obsessive, possibly autistic, and definitely a loner who hyper-fixated on specific interests. Comparatively, Blake was a much simpler-minded guy who had a broad range of interests, was relatively charismatic, and was only interested in furthering his powers due to the pressures of the outside world increasing on his back over time.

Humanity was not in a good place. Its Wordsmiths were gone, and now their children had to step up and become the Heroes of the next generation.

It was a tough gig, but Blake felt he had to try and do something, anything, everything in his power to improve himself. Only in this way could he lessen the burden his sister and brother were feeling.

Blake made his way toward Solomon's Library. This was a compact room Solomon had made while his soul was still alive, a place where he had written and compiled all of his knowledge into different books throughout the library.

Sadly, Solomon wasn't able to finish his work. A third of the library's shelves were empty, and many of the books he had written were only half completed.

Blake had wandered into the library a few years ago, back when he was 15. He asked Solomon at the time what was the point of writing down all the books when his Crown contained all of Solomon's knowledge anyway.

Solomon had smiled at Blake. "The knowledge in my crown consists of septillions of individual memories, young man. It is vast and unfiltered. Those who are talented may tap into my crown, as Phoebe Hiro once did, and use their abilities to sift through the information to obtain unique insights. But these memories come from countless people and are nearly impossible for a layman to meaningfully parse."

Solomon continued. "One might be capable of learning a trade by reading through a volume of encyclopedias, but the task is formidable, difficult, and far less informative than if the relevant knowledge were to be distilled down into the most important information. At the same time, self-learning is much less effective than a structured learning environment, preferably facilitated by an adept teacher."

"Thus," Solomon concluded, "my library is intended to be a distillation of important knowledge using my own unique insights, gathered over thousands of years. Rather than learning from raw unfiltered knowledge, I have organized the books here according to various disciplines, shifted the information inside to start with the easiest fundamentals, and tailored the concepts to grow much more difficult in scope as the books progress. In the end, if one is able to pluck a book off my shelves and learn a new skill within a week or two, my efforts will not have gone unrewarded."

This was the crux of Solomon's late-life work. Blake had flipped through the books on many occasions, but never had he been able to fully grasp a discipline with the ease his sister had mastered Runecrafting, or Elizabeth Kindelmann had become a renowned blacksmith.

On this day, Blake walked into the library and perused the shelves as he had many times in the past. The room was empty, even a little eerie. The shelves were made of wood, but they also had all sorts of tacky gold and jewels encrusted onto their edges in ornate patterns to 'spruce them up' as Solomon would say. Chandeliers hung from the ceiling, embedded with multi-colored stones that glowed and gave off light of all different hues. The final color tone of the room ended up being a weirdly dark blue mixed with gold, so it always felt offputting to Blake, as well as everyone else.

Blake walked over to the fourth row of shelves. Several books jumped out at him.

APPRENTICE TO MASTER BLACKSMITHING: VOLS I-III

PAINTING AND YOU: DEPTHS OF IMAGINATION

THE OPERATIC ARTS: PROJECTING YOUR VOICE

THE OPERATIC ARTS: A PRESENCE TO AWE NATIONS

ANCIENT EARTH MARTIAL ARTS: FENCING

ANCIENT EARTH MARTIAL ARTS: TAIJUTSU

SHIPBUILDING: NAVAL CONSTRUCTION ACROSS HISTORY

GOLD AND JEWELS: HOW WEALTH AFFECTS GENIUS

ANCIENT EARTH MARTIAL ARTS: TAE-KWON-DO

APPRENTICE TO MASTER CARPENTRY: VOLS I-VI

EXOBEAST TAMING (WORK IN PROGRESS)

ANCIENT EARTH MARTIAL ARTS: KARATE

One book after another was lined up on the shelf, not alphabetically or according to any particular arrangement. It wasn't as if Solomon had carefully organized the collection; he was planning on doing that only later, once the collection was finished. Thus, the books on learning trades were scattered all over the place alongside books about history, warfare, even hobbyist books such as the ones focused on painting and acting.

Blake ultimately reached for a book on painting. He felt that, as of lately, his imagination was the most lacking. He wasn't using his powers flexibly, and as a result, he was wasting his potential. Maybe a book focused on the arts would help?

He walked toward the center of the room. There, he saw Solomon's Crown levitating above a pedestal, three shafts of light pointed downward at it. Since Solomon's death, nobody had worn his crown. They felt it would be disrespectful, and aside from when Mandy checked to see if Solomon's soul was still inside of it, possibly reviveable, there had been an unspoken agreement not to disturb his well-deserved rest.

Blake stared at the Crown for a good while. He held the book in his hands and thought deeply about whether or not he should do what he was about to do.

After a few minutes, Blake sighed. "It's what Solomon would want."

Solomon was not a man who cared a lot about status, etiquette, or other social constructs. He was in many ways a utilitarian. Even though he had passed, Blake felt Solomon would want the next generation to use his crown to continue furthering humanity's growth. Locking it in a vault to preserve his prestige or honor his memory would likely be seen by the Knowledge-Seeker as a waste of the capabilities his crown offered.

And so, after a short few minutes of struggle, Blake gave in to temptation. He reached for the Crown and carefully took it off the altar. He placed in on his head and took a long breath.

Blake had worn the Crown a few times in his life. He knew he didn't have the affinity for it his sister did, or especially the affinity of his aunt Phoebe, when she was alive. The Crown was still universally useful to anyone, as it accelerated their thinking speed and cognition, but for those lacking in talent, it would only serve as a simple modifier to their base intelligence.

Blake sat down in a cushy golden throne Solomon had devised for himself and chuckled. Solomon was always so gaudy it made Blake cringe, but that didn't mean he took his comfort lightly.

Like this, Blake started to flip through the book on painting. With the assistance of Solomon's Crown, his reading speed drastically increased, and he found his brain was less mushy, but more pliable than usual. He started understanding the book much better than he could without the Crown, and as such, his enjoyment of the subject improved.

"Hmm... so Imagination isn't just a fun little way of day-dreaming, but it has real applications, especially in terms of magic. Interesting." Blake muttered. "Imagination equals mental visualization. Oh! Isn't this exactly what I've been lacking? I don't have a Mind Realm, but anyone can develop their Mind's Eye with enough practice and focus."

"Mmm, so drawing on three dimensional images in the Mind's Eye can allow one to better conceptualize the world around them as high order concepts. I think Mandy mentioned something about this with her runes, but I didn't understand it at the time so I couldn't add anything to what she was saying. What a shame!"

Blake spent a full hour reading the book. He didn't actually need that much time, but he read it cover-to-cover twice to make sure he understood most of the concepts. Unfortunately, he wasn't a painter, so a lot of the book's focus on color theory and artistic conception went over his head, but Blake found himself somewhat enlightened by even the shallow realizations he'd made.

After that, Blake put the book back. He wandered around the library, using the Crown to search for other books that would be useful to him.

"A book on 'video games'. I think dad mentioned those before. He said he used to play them on Earth. Looks like there's some good stuff in here about mental focus. I'll give it a read."

Blake picked up the book, then sat down. He soon became even more engrossed in the descriptions of games such as 'Pacman' and 'Mario' and all sorts of other games, with the book focusing on the historical progression of games, along with genres, mechanics, and how players could have a lot of fun playing with virtual characters in a fictional world.

"It's a lot like the Queenie." Blake said to himself. "My brother and sister both get to act like different people when they're in the Queenie. It's sort of like play-acting a role of someone else. It's a fun way to pass the time. But according to Solomon, there's more to this role-playing than meets the eye."

Blake read through the book three times. Solomon's highly detailed illustrations and artwork were beautiful and engrossing, to the point Blake wished he could play these old video games to see what they were really like.

"So playing a role isn't just about having fun, for one with a discerning mind, they can change their entire mental state to act like someone else. It's really useful for the art of deception and spycraft. But it can also be used for diplomacy, intimidation, and other actions."

Blake thought more on the subject. After a while, he became inspired.

Blake stood up, then activated his shadow-powers. He began cloaking himself in darkness, wrapping it around his body to form a sort of 'shadow armor' like he'd seen in some of those old video games. He walked over to a full-body mirror and frowned. He thought it would look cooler than it actually did. The armor looked... lumpy. He had no real conceptualization of all the intricate details regarding how armor was shaped, so it looked too squarish and blocky. The 'badass helmet' he had envisioned had weird and disjointed spikes sticking up. They weren't arranged well, and looked like a little kid had put them together.

Still, Blake tried to get himself in the right head-space. He lowered his voice and tried to sound tough, gravelly, intimidating.

"Heh! Kid, you think you can bEAt me- cough! Shit! Why did my voice crack?! That was awful."

Blake's face turned crimson. He looked around, but luckily, nobody had heard him. As such, he returned his attention to the mirror.

"Heh, kid, you think you can beat me? I'm like, way more power level than you. Uh, I'm so strong, my darkness could block out the sky- the sun! Block out the sun. Blot out the sun, rather. Should it be block or blot? Uhh..."

Realizing his play-acting wasn't coming naturally, Blake decided to just drop the act. Instead, he started focusing on the armor again, using the mirror to try and shape it more clearly. But soon, he became frustrated by his lack of knowledge on the subject of armor.

"Damn. I don't have imagination, and my knowledge is lacking too. Maybe Solomon wrote a few books on armor?"

Blake dispelled his shadow-armor. He didn't do so intentionally, but maintaining it took intense concentration, and the moment he stopped focusing, it broke apart all on its own. That realization made him feel frustrated, but he also recognized he couldn't do anything about it at the moment.

Blake walked around the library again. He found a few books on metallurgy. They weren't exactly what he was looking for. He tapped into the Crown and found countless ancient memories of armies wearing armor of different sorts, but those thoughts didn't convey the knowledge of how the armor was forged.

"Metallurgy it is." Blake grunted.

He sat down in Solomon's throne again, then leaned back and crossed his legs as he began to read.

There was a lot of overlap with metallurgy compared to the books on blacksmithing, but metallurgy was about more than just making weapons, armor, and tools. Blacksmithing was a craft for creating equipment, while metallurgy was a science, focused on the chemical, physical, and atomic nature of the alloys themselves.

Blacksmiths focused on solid state metals, heating them until malleable, but rarely fully melting them or turning them into liquid. Metallurgy was all about examining metals and elements across the various states of matter, from liquid to solid and everything in between.

Both fields had a lot of focus on the changes in metal when under intense heat, but their goals were different. Blake found these differences to be quite interesting, even if the deep science went over his head somewhat. Alas, he was not a genius like his sister or aunt.

In the end, Solomon's observations concluded that metallurgy was based on the work of ancient blacksmiths, but both had their own uses, and it was essential that any aspiring craftsman mastered one and at least dabbled in the other.

The young man pondered Solomon's words for a while. He stood up and walked over to the mirror again, then tried summoning his armor. The result wasn't a lot better than before, but it was a little better. Blake started mentally reshaping the armor bit by bit, filing off the edges to make it a little more angular. It was still blocky, almost robotic, but compared with his first attempt, it wasn't too bad.

"I'll never be able to impress Psymin Miralax if this is the best I can do. Looks like I'll need to start practicing every day. I also need to find a way to manifest my powers permanently. Maybe I should talk to Arthur about that. His powers seem similar to mine."

Arthur wielded the power of light. Unlike Blake, he did not control any aspects of darkness, but his magical reserves, particularly when wielding Excalibur, were infinitely vaster than the fledgling dual-type Hero's, by a colossal gulf.

This made Arthur a specialist and Blake more of a generalist. Blake wondered how Arthur's mana reserves had become so formidable. Was he simply born with them?

Blake continued to read books for ten long hours.

His eyes started to droop. He yawned repeatedly, but he was still mentally fired up. He felt he had so much to learn, but too little time to learn it. Only if he became more diligent could he grow stronger, faster.

It was around this time when Blake was beginning to nod off that the hair on his body started to tingle. Blake jolted awake and looked around the room. He felt a chill descend upon him, a feeling of being watched.

His skin prickled with goosebumps. Blake carefully set the book down, then stood up from the throne and swept his gaze around the library.

"H...hello?" Blake asked softly. "Is someone there?"

Blake was not alone. He could feel it. He could tell. His senses were screaming at him that a presence had entered the room, but he couldn't tell from which direction, or where it was lurking.

Blake carefully took a step toward the eastern door, but he thought he saw something hazy near that doorway, so he quickly backed away. Even in the brightly lit room, Blake felt as though he was seeing shadows that definitely should not be moving.

"Who's there?!" Blake shouted. "Show yourself!"

Blake quickly ignited the power of his light magic. He covered himself from head to toe in it, looking with gritted teeth at the hazy shadows that seemed to be slowly coalescing into... something. He realized with a start that the sensation he was feeling was eerily similar to one he had felt earlier in the day, after he spoke with Arthur.

Blake's light magic formed an aura of repelling around himself. He didn't know if a shade or a shadow-walker had somehow sneaked inside the Hall of Heroes, but the aura of the unknown entity was growing more corporeal. He could practically taste the mana in the air crackling on his tongue.

Blake conjured a sword of light. He narrowed his eyes and took a defensive stance, readying himself to lunge forward as soon as he could get a visual lock on whatever the thing in front of him was. His heart pounded in his chest. His stomach churned with indescribable emotions of fear and anger mixed with doubt and apprehension.

It didn't take long. The figure became more visible. It assumed the form of a shadowy bipedal creature, faceless, featureless, standing ominously just beside the doorway. It seemed to be looking at Blake, but it had no eyes...

"What the fuck. What the fuck." Blake muttered under his breath. He had thought he was slowly becoming a formidable person, but now, faced with some abomination from the shadow realm, Blake found himself rooted to the floor in fear. His fight or flight reflex had instead caused him to freeze. He was shaking so badly even his teeth started to chatter.

Several seconds passed. The creature took a shaky step forward, as if it were learning to walk. Its movements were wobbly and unsteady. It looked as if Blake could run at the thing and push it over, causing it to comically topple to the floor. But Blake feared this was a ruse.

After a moment's hesitation, Blake acted on instinct. He fired a bolt of darkness at the creature, a mere probing attack to test it out.

The energy bolt whiffed through the creature and struck the wall behind it with a loud POP! The lack of impact left Blake shocked. It was a ghostly life-form, intangible?

Blake sent another bolt of energy flying, this time of the light attribute. It, too, sailed through the creature's body without nudging it in the slightest. The creature took another shaky, unsteady step.

"What are you?!" Blake finally screamed. "What the FUCK are you?!"

His voice was loud enough that someone passing outside heard him shout. Barely five seconds later, Elizabeth Kindelmann arrived at the doorway behind the creature. She quickly looked into the library, alarmed. Then her eyes snapped onto the shadowy intruder and she let out a cry of surprise.

Before long, the entire Hall of Heroes had been alerted, and Levi showed up, along with Mandy. Twenty other Heroes joined them, including all the top figures in the Hall, taking up positions behind Blake. They directed curious and hostile gazes toward the monster, which had taken another couple shaky steps.

"It's a spiritual lifeform." Mandy quickly assessed. She examined the creature's runic makeup, assessing it with senses beyond her eyes. "It's not a ghost, or a shade, or a shadow-walker. It's more like..."

She trailed off. The others looked at her.

"More like what?" Blake asked. "More like what, sis?!"

At that moment, the creature suddenly tripped and fell, making everyone raise their weapons and direct looks of apprehension its way. But then, like an insect molting from its cocoon, the black and shadowy color began to break apart and dissipate.

Pale white skin slowly took over. A familiar figure became visible, laying on the ground, unmoving.

Looks of fear were instead replaced with a variety of emotions. Shock, horror, dismay, exultation, even delight. The most common emotion, though, was confusion.

Blake took a step forward. He lifted a shaking hand, as if trying to touch the figure that was now laying face-down on the floor, despite twenty feet separating the two of them. His pupils trembled erratically as a range of emotions washed through his body.

"D... dad?"

Part 762: Fish Out of Water

January 29th, 2021. Sarabiya, Egypt, 6PM.

A few hours earlier, Jason Hiro assumed the role of savior and freed all of Bahamut's slaves. In doing so, he erased a tumor from the world, and also passed on the power of the Sphinx to Phoebe Berthold.

Now, with the initial hubbub having died down a little, but with many confused, angry, and even fearful former slaves having come to the realization they were not living in the same world as before, many eyes were directed at the two new acting directors of Sarabiya. Those two were a pair of women, Phoebe herself, and Jessica Harper, the Great Builder.

Jason had been 'humiliated' when the intelligent and brainy Jessica had put the Archseer in his place and established her authority, sending him packing. After Jason left, Phoebe stayed behind with Jessica and started interviewing each of Bahamut's former slaves.

At least, that was the plan. It turned out Jessica was the one doing most of the talking, but Phoebe didn't have any complaints. She was just as clueless about the current state of the world as all the others they were interviewing.

One of the first individuals they interviewed was Vex, the demon who had been the first to volunteer for the new SIGIL armor Jessica had invented. Even though he was a demon, he had instantly switched to becoming Team Humanity in a single instant. Gaining the power of a Duke made his morale skyrocket, and now he was all too happy to please.

"You understand you may be made to do unpleasant things, such as killing other demons." Jessica said, staring down her glasses at the skinny, wiry demon on the opposite side of the table from her and Phoebe. "Demons are currently the enemy of humanity, and the enemy of the Heroes. By aligning yourself with us, you'll become an enemy of your own people. Are you sure you're okay with that?"

Phoebe glanced at Jessica. Her short brown hair accentuated her facial features, making her appear mature and imposing. At the same time, her eyes had a magnetic quality to them, Phoebe sometimes wished she could stare into Jessica's eyes for minutes at a time, before shaking herself out of her stupor and returning to whatever task happened to be at hand. She had no idea why she possessed such weird thoughts.

"Kill other demons? No problem!" Vex shouted, sending a huge thumbs-up in Jessica's direction. "Demons already kill other demons. Who gives a shit if I've gotta kill a bunch more? Once my old buddies see how AWESOME this super-armor is, they'll either be smart enough to join you, or stupid enough that I'll just kill 'em anyway. I don't wanna hang out with a buncha morons who can't tell good from bad!"

"Are you only joining us because of the armor?" Phoebe interjected, directing a pointed question Vex's way. "That seems a rather flippant reason."

"Sure it's just 'cuz of the armor!" Vex immediately admitted. "What other reason do I need? You don't get my situation, do ya? Even if you didn't gimme the armor, do you have any idea what kinda life I'd be livin' in the Seven Hells, lady?"

Vex continued. "It's a shitshow out there. I had to scrape and beg for a hundred years just to get my first few souls so I could be a Grunt, and then I had to kiss so much ass I've still got pubes stuck in my teeth before I could become a Lord! And that was another 200 years! Ever since, I was stuck in a rut, nobody taking me seriously. It's a cutthroat life, living with the other demons! And I don't mean literally cut-throat, cuz I'd totally slice some necks if it helped me get stronger! But you gotta know the right demons or you can't go anywhere in life!"

Jessica nodded sagely. "I am well aware of the pains your kind endures. The Emperors kill humans, store the souls away, and only divvy them out to the demons they like most. With so many billions and trillions of your kind running around, there aren't nearly enough souls to go around. You're lucky you even made it to the rank of Lord in your lifetime."

"Damn right, lady!" Vex said, bobbing his head obediently to every one of Jessica's words. "But don't think just 'cuz I changed sides once, I'll be a floozy forever. I really respect that y'all are giving me this grand opportunity to be one of the first demons on your side! And furthermore, I've got a hunch that the old way of thinkin's about to change! I don't see the demons lasting much longer. I'd rather be on the winning side!"

"You think we're going to win the war?" Jessica asked, raising an eyebrow. "Just because of this single armor system?"

For once, Vex quieted down a little. He leaned forward and sneered.

"Sister, just cuz' I'm younger than most of the demon big-shots, that don't make me a dumb baby who can't tell his feet from his ass. I've seen lots of crazy stuff in the last 700 years. I even saw the short and sweet rise of that Joan Hero lady. You humans have always been waaaaaay behind on the military strength curve, see? But when Bahamut scooped me up a couple hundred years ago and I awoke in this weird future era, I started learnin' all kinds of crazy shit had gone down."

"The last time I saw you humans, you was ridin' horses and shittin' in canals along the street." Vex continued. "Now, you guys have these crazy metal machines, weapons that can kill from a distance, and flyin' machines are all over the fuckin' place."

Jessica nodded slowly. She had already done one quick and short remedial class for the newly awakened Bahamians, as she had taken to calling them, but she'd only gone over the broad strokes. She was surprised Vex had paid so much attention. It seemed that despite his sketchy attitude and skeevy manner of speaking, he wasn't as much of a nimrod as he first appeared. He was surprisingly bright.

"On top of ALL that," Vex added, "You have- how many was it? Like two Trueborn Heroes now and a dozen Lowborn in the wings? Even if you humans only had one Trueborn, with all these crazy military weapons you've been makin', I wouldn't wanna bet against ya, but now it looks like the human-demon war is a total wash! The demons are gonna lose, and they're gonna lose bad. It ain't a matter of 'if' but 'when.'"

"And you want to be on the winning side." Phoebe repeated. "Well, your motivations are self serving, but they're also oddly pure."

"I agree." Jessica said.

A long moment of silence followed. Jessica looked off to the side and fell into thought. Eventually, she turned back to Vex.

"Alright. Congratulations, Vex. You're the first demon we'll be adding to our ranks in the Divine Land of Earth. Someday, if you earn enough Merits, you might earn the right to see the Divine Land of the Stars. That will surely be an eye-opening experience for you."

"Just make sure you don't betray us." Phoebe quickly added. "Even if Jessica doesn't have the strength to chase after you, I certainly do. My Sphinx powers make that armor transformation of yours look like a toy."

Vex didn't even bat an eye. "Of course I won't! I'm a loyal backstabber, ladies! I'm on your side now, and I ain't changin' again! Now, you need me to sign a soul contract or anything?"

"Ah, no. That won't be necessary." Jessica said, before adding: "I already marked you and all the others as soon as Phoebe released you from the Sphinx's bonds. If you betray us, you won't be able to hide anywhere in the galaxy."

"Haha... ha... haha..." Vex laughed, his voice weakening slightly. "...noted."

Vex eventually got up and shuffled out of the room. After he left, Phoebe and Jessica took a few minutes to chat about various things.

"I'm looking forward to meeting the pureblooded angel, Almar." Phoebe said. "I've never spoken to an angel before."

"They're nothing special." Jessica said dismissively. "Some are better than others, and many are worse. Just don't get starry-eyed by his mere presence. That Almar seems fairly noble, but you never know with his kind."

"You don't like angels?" Phoebe asked.

"They're fine. Like humans and demons, there are scumbags and paragons among their ranks. I simply don't look up to them any more than I would an average human. I want to make sure you do the same so you won't be fooled easily."

Phoebe's heart was heavy. "Alright. I'll take note of that."

Before calling in the next person, Jessica glanced around the room. "Hmm, it's been a month and a half since you awoke... I guess now's as good a time as any. I'm going to do the rest of the interviews myself. Why don't I send you to visit the Divine Land of the Stars?"

"R-really?" Phoebe asked. "It seems like an awfully secretive place, Miss Harper. Are you sure it's okay if I go?"

"Yes. I want- err, I mean, the Archseer is interested in bringing you there so you have more time to grow and adapt to your new abilities... and your new life circumstances. Once you've been there a while, he plans to send you back down to Sarabiya to help me out."

"But we still have so many people to interview." Phoebe pointed out.

"I can handle the burden by myself, at least for now." Jessica said, waving her hand dismissively. "You're needed elsewhere. Go."

Phoebe nodded. "Alright. Thank you for everything, Miss Harper. You've taught me a lot."

After standing up, Phoebe paused and looked at Jessica's side profile. "Say, I've been wondering... are you and the Archseer..."

"We're not married. Absolutely not." Jessica immediately retorted.

"I was going to say... related?" Phoebe said, causing Jessica to blink in surprise. "You and him are sort of similar."

Jessica looked at Phoebe for a long moment, then looked away and chuckled.

"Saying we're 'related' is a fairly accurate assessment. I am Jason, after all. One of his soul-clones."

"What? You are??" Phoebe asked, bewildered.

"Yes. I was going to try and keep up the deception, but it doesn't feel right lying to you. My Wordsmithing allows me to create clones of myself." 'Jessica' said. "And alter my appearance, or theirs. So I made a female clone. This is actually not even a 'real' body. It's actually mostly mechanical."

"Mechanical?" Phoebe asked, cocking her head. "You're... not human?"

"Jessica is not human, no." Jessica said, looking at Phoebe again. "This body is made of a nearly indestructible material known as... well, I guess the technical details are a little much, but basically think of me as an animated statue with super strength."

To emphasize her point, Jessica suddenly slammed her fist down on the table and made Phoebe jump in alarm. The wooden table practically exploded into splinters and fell apart all over Jessica's lap before collapsing onto the floor.

A moment later, Jessica waved her hand, and the table's fragments abruptly flew up into the air and rapidly rebuilt themselves back into the original table in less than two seconds. It was as if an army of invisible carpenters were hurriedly jamming every last splinter back into place and super-gluing them at a speed Phoebe's eyes simply could not follow!

After that, Jessica fell silent.

"Wow. Incredible. You can even make duplicates of yourself." Phoebe said, looking admiringly at the 'woman' before her. She still found it hard to believe that this was really Jason Hiro.

But then, a thought occurred to her. "You are a clone... so that means, earlier, when 'Jessica' mocked the Archseer and made him look bad, that was actually a deception?"

"A ruse, yes. My goal is to make the Trueborn Archseer seem insignificant in brains and only valuable in terms of combat strength. In this way, the demons will think I'm a stupid idiot meathead and drastically underestimate me. Except, talking to Vex has shown me that I might be putting too much heat on my clones."

Jessica shrugged. "Oh well. If Jessica dies, she dies. I'll just make another."

A morbid expression spread across Phoebe's face. "Don't you think talking like that is rather... foul? Jessica, you're a person..."

"I'm not actually a duplicate of Jason." Jessica said. "I'm literally not. I, Jason, simply have a powerful brain that allows me to split my thoughts and soul into multiple bodies, controlling them all at the same time. Let's just say this is not my first foray into cloning, and I've learned from my past mistakes. Everything 'Jessica' experiences is something I experience, and anything she says is something I would usually say."

Jessica shrugged. "Anyway, yeah. I'd like to bring you to the Divine Land of the Stars now. Are you okay with that?"

Phoebe nodded dumbly. "Of course, my lord. I only live and serve at your whim. I would still be enslaved by Bahamut and an ordinary woman without you."

Jessica fell silent for a while. She lowered her eyes.

"You're anything but ordinary, Phoebe."

"What do you mean by that?" Phoebe asked.

"Someday, my words might make sense to you." Jessica said quietly. "That day just isn't today."

Another moment of awkward silence followed. Eventually, Jessica gestured toward Phoebe, and Phoebe's vision turned white.

One second, she was looking at Jessica.

The next second, she was suddenly inside a strange room unlike any she had ever seen before.

Phoebe found herself standing in a room with glowing lights built into the ceiling. There was a brown table and chair with white accents to her right, and the design of them was somewhat feminine. She looked to her left and saw a bed with a white comforter on top, its edges brown, as if the opposite of the desk's color scheme, yet the color coordination was impeccable.

She looked forward and saw a smaller sub-room with the door open. There was a rounded white seat of some sort inside, it looked like marble but was impossibly smooth compared to marble. Phoebe also recognized a 'sink' inside the room. She didn't know why that word came unbidden to her mind. Perhaps she had witnessed something similar when she was under Bahamut's control?

Phoebe eventually realized she was inside a bedroom. It seemed to match her stylistic preferences, too.

Was this...?

Suddenly, there was a faint displacement of air. Phoebe turned her attention to the young man who had abruptly appeared before her. She recognized him by his golden hair immediately.

"Hey, Phoebe." Jason Hiro said, gesturing around the room. "I decided to start you off small. This is your room inside Aevum. It's your entire house, actually."

"My... room? My house?" Phoebe questioned. "The design is... unfamiliar. It seems..."

"Futuristic?" Jason offered.

Phoebe nodded. "Yes, my liege. Futuristic. That is a good descriptor."

"It's just Jason." Jason reminded her. "None of that 'my lord' or 'my liege' stuff, please. You'll make me feel awkward."

"I'm sorry, Lor- I mean, ah, I mean... Jason." Phoebe said quietly, flushing slightly when she said his name so plainly. "It simply... doesn't feel right. I always addressed King Arthur as 'King' Arthur. Decorum is important."

"Well, maybe it was back then, but the times have changed!" Jason said, raising his voice an octave. "A new life awaits you, and a crazy world you're sure to be surprised by. First, let's start with a little tour of your new house, okay?"

Phoebe nodded. She followed behind Jason as he introduced her to the 'bathroom' with the 'shower' and 'toilet'. As she had previously guessed there was a 'sink' inside. The fact water came out of the metal piece on top startled her. And the water was so clean, too! It was as clear as a placid pond!

"This is a hair dryer." Jason explained. "It uses electricity to create hot air. You can use it to blow dry your hair after you shower or bathe."

"Amazing!" Phoebe gasped. "This electricity magic is truly fantastical. It's like the stories the seers used to speak!"

"It's not magic. It's... science!" Jason said grandiosely, before chuckling and lowering his voice. "Well, admittedly, I do use magic to create Aevum's electricity, so you're not far off."

"Ay-vum?" Phoebe asked, pronouncing the strange word carefully. "Is that the name for the Divine Land of the Stars?"

"Yes. Aevum is a place I built myself." Jason said. "It is not located on Earth. In fact, I built it amidst the stars."

"The stars... you mean the stars-stars??" Phoebe gasped, seemingly piecing together that the name was completely literal, and not merely a fun play on words. "We- we're out in the stars? Up in the sky??"

Jason smiled. It was really adorable seeing Phoebe get flustered over such a small thing. Her expressions were really cute in his eyes.

But then his smile faded a little. A weird pit formed in his stomach, because the Phoebe he knew would not be easily flustered by news of this sort. She was a scientist, and a veritable genius, far smarter than him. Seeing her regress like this... it made him remember his real wife, not the false image standing before him.

Phoebe noticed Jason's expression shifting between different emotions. "Jason? Jason? My liege?"

The unfamiliar term snapped Jason out of his momentary mental fugue. He quickly cleared his throat. "Ahem, didn't I tell you not to call me that?"

"Yes, Jason. But it's just that, for a brief moment, you looked so sad... it took me by surprise. Are you feeling alright?"

Jason forced a weak smile, but it didn't fool Phoebe. "I'm... I'm about as alright as I can be. Let's not talk about my mental state. There's a lot of other interesting things to discuss, after all."

"Okay..." Phoebe said quietly.

Jason proceeded to explain the general concept of Aevum to Phoebe. She struggled to follow along, particularly when he accidentally strayed toward certain high-level topics.

"This... time... trans...ference... shifting... I am sorry, my liege. I just don't understand..." Phoebe said, lowering her head in shame. She knew her stupidity was confounding. For such a genius like the Wordsmith to take time out of his day to teach her, and for her to learn so slowly, he must be feeling quite vexed. Perhaps he might even be debating whether or not he made the right decision bringing her here.

"No, it's my fault." Jason said, a stabbing pain in his heart. He reached out to touch Phoebe's shoulder reassuringly, only to stop halfway and retract his hand. "Temporal stuff is just... never mind. All that matters is that a day on earth means 365 days in Aevum. If you leave a year from now, you'll return to Jessica on Earth with only one day having just passed."

"Oh." Phoebe said.

That was all she said in response. Judging by the look on her face... Jason knew she didn't understand at all.

"Let's just look around the house some more." Jason said.

He took her out of the bedroom and showed her the kitchen. Phoebe started feeling dizzy due to all the terminology he threw at her.

"Yes... yes, Jason. I see. Re... free... free-fridge... rator... stoah-ve. Oh, knives? I know knives. Mixing bowl? It uses electricity magic too?"

"And this is a microwave." Jason said. "If you put a plate or a bowl or even a cup of food in it, you can quickly heat the food up! But be careful, if you cook things too long they will be really hot! It's best to use short timers and stuff. I'll be giving you an assistant to teach you how to use everything here."

Phoebe looked at the strange white rectangular cube. She felt dizzy. She was becoming so disoriented from all the futuristic jargon that she started to wobble unsteadily on her feet.

"So next, we have- Phoebe? Hey, Phoebe! Are you okay??" Jason asked, before quickly reaching out and grabbing Phoebe's shoulder right as she started to fall.

"Uhh..." Phoebe said, as the world started to shift unsteadily around her. The next thing she knew, she saw the counter rushing toward her face, before she stopped just short of slamming her teeth against it.

Jason had, fortunately, managed to catch her before she fell. He carefully wrapped an arm around Phoebe's shoulder and eased her to the ground, looking at her with deep concern.

"Phoebe? Hey, Phoebe... are you okay? Normalize."

A Word of Power escaped Jason's lips. Phoebe's vision cleared up and she found herself in Jason's arms, sitting in a heap on the floor.

"Huh? I- I'm sorry!" Phoebe cried out in embarrassment. "I suddenly felt faint, and I, I just- I'm so sorry, my liege!"

Jason carefully let go of Phoebe's shoulder. He pulled away and looked at her for a few long moments.

Then he sighed.

"No... I'm sorry. I'm rushing you through all of this. There's so much to learn, it was probably too much for you."

Phoebe balled her hands into fists. She felt tears welling up in her eyes at her own incapability and stupidity. It was obvious she'd gotten flustered and embarrassed herself. Now the Wordsmith was really going to think she was an idiot and a fool.

"It w-was my fault." Phoebe said, fighting back tears. "I'm the one who should be sorry. I told you before, I... I'm not the right person for the job. I know you must be terribly disappointed in me, my lie- I mean, I mean Jason."

To her surprise, when Phoebe looked at Jason, she found that he was stifling tears of his own, and this was such a surprising sight that it startled Phoebe out of her own state of distress.

She simply couldn't understand why he would be on the verge of tears. If anything, she thought he would be angry, or maybe disappointed. Just what sorts of strange thoughts were going through the young Hero's mind for him to be... sad?

Phoebe might not be all that bright, but she was a quick thinker. It only took her a second to realize exactly what the Hero was thinking about.

He thought he had made her collapse, and he was feeling deep guilt!

That was what made the most sense. He was just a young man, after all, and seeing her faint must have made him tearful because he felt it was his fault.

Phoebe thought this was a rather silly reason for a man to cry, but it was also touching that he cared for her well-being so much.

Jason had told her in the past that he was hundreds of years old, but Phoebe didn't believe that was really true. Humans couldn't live forever, and they would definitely age as time went on. How could he be hundreds of years old and still look like a teenager? Obviously, he had been fibbing to try and look more masculine. No young man would want to appear weak, especially when they possessed such a formidable Heroic power.

But then again, didn't he say he had the ability to change his appearance? Hmm...

Phoebe was slightly perplexed. But all these chaotic thoughts intermingled, and eventually, she couldn't help but let out a slight laugh.

That's right, a laugh. She suddenly guffawed at the absurd realization that she had been thinking the Hero hated her, when actually he was feeling guilt and thinking she had fainted because of him. It was absurd, and it was funny!

"Hah!" Phoebe laughed, before suddenly clapping her palm over her mouth.

There were still some tears brimming in her eyes, but she was genuinely smiling, and this made Jason raise his head to look at her.

Now he was perplexed. Wasn't Phoebe about to cry? Why would she suddenly laugh? Was it because she saw him about to cry? Did she think it was funny he was about to cry?

The absurdity of that situation, and the fact he knew Phoebe definitely wasn't the type of woman to laugh at a man exposing his feelings, also made Jason stifle a laugh. Here he was, feeling deep guilt at overloading his not-wife's head, and now she was laughing, and that made him laugh.

"Hah!" Jason laughed too, making question marks pop up over Phoebe's head.

And thus, like this, their strange and awkward moment shifted gears what felt like ten times over the span of mere seconds, their emotions a turbulent roller coaster.

With Phoebe seeing that Jason was stifling a laugh, and Jason seeing that Phoebe was stifling a laugh, they suddenly couldn't hold it in, and both of them started laughing even harder. What followed was thirty seconds of uproarious confused laughter where both of them were laughing at each other and themselves. They were laughing for reasons they didn't even understand! Neither one knew what the other thought was so funny, but the comical mixture of tears of sadness and genuine laughter was like a tonic that shook them out of their stupor.

Jason grabbed his belly and roared so hard he thought he was going to throw up, while Phoebe suddenly got the hiccups, which made her giggling even funnier to Jason, and made him break out into another fit of laughter.

It took five entire minutes for both of them to stop giggling like little children. Even so, the residual giggling fits continued for another minute before Jason and Phoebe both managed to steel their faces, the corners of their lips still twitching.

"You... why were you laughing?" Jason asked.

"I don't know." Phoebe admitted. "I just thought... oh, it's not that important. That was such an awkward situation, I hope you'll forgive me, Jason."

"Yeah, it's fine. I was feeling guilty I made you faint with all my fancy words." Jason said, partially lying, yet accidentally 'confirming the truth' in Phoebe's mind at the same time. "Um, so, yeah. Let's just cut the tour short, eh? I think I can show you around without making you fall over from confusion."

"I'll try to understand better, Jason!" Phoebe said, once again turning crimson from embarrassment. It seemed he really had felt guilty about overloading her head! Phoebe cursed her tiny peasant brain for being so bad at understanding all his jargon.

Jason and Phoebe both got up off the floor and after dusting themselves off, Jason led her into the living room.

"Look, forget all that other stuff. This is the room where you'll be relaxing most of the time if you have nothing to do. I installed a TV with all the programs you'd ever want to watch from Earth on it."

Phoebe felt a hint of fear in her stomach.

"...Tee-vee?" She asked, wincing in preparation for another jargon-filled reply.

"Uh. You know what? Just think of it like a magical box." Jason said. "Have you ever watched a play?"

Phoebe nodded slowly. "King Arthur put on many plays in his court for his knights to enjoy, yes."

"Alright, well, it's sort of like that. A box with people doing play-acting, where they act out fantastical stories, all of them fake to some degree, as well as stuff like sports, where people play games where they try to earn points. Here, let me show you."

Jason sat on the couch. It was true that he needed to show Phoebe around Aevum, but starting with something a little lighter sounded better. Phoebe sat on the opposite side of the couch from him, marveling at how comfortable the cushions were. Wasn't this like a bed for the king's servants? She could only imagine how comfortable her own bed was in comparison!

Jason picked up a remote and turned on the TV. Phoebe jumped slightly when a man suddenly appeared with a strange object in his mouth. Phoebe hesitantly identified it as some sort of long burning stick... perhaps a drug of some sort? The man wore a wide brimmed hat and an outfit that was completely foreign to her. Then he took a strange metal object off the side of his waist, aimed at it another man and-

BLAM! BLAM!

That was the first time Phoebe had ever heard the sound of thunder coming from a man's hand. She flinched in fear, wondering what evil magic he had just used.

"This is called a 'western.'" Jason explained. "It's a type of movie where a 'cowboy' fights outlaws. Think of it like a futuristic knight hunting down bad people from back in your time. And that thing he just did? That's called firing a gun. He used a revolver and shot the other guy."

"He shot him?" Phoebe asked, her eyes as wide as saucers. "Is... is the other man okay?"

"Probably not." Jason said. "But remember, even though this looks real, it's all fake. It's just like a play from your time, with magical effects. The man you see is a... he's a play-actor. Even when he shot the gun, it was a fake noise. Real guns are much louder than that."

"They are??" Phoebe asked in bewilderment. She prayed she wouldn't start getting dizzy again.

"Indeed. Tell you what, it's been a while since I watched any TV. Let's just put on something a little more... mellow. Something to ease you into the idea."

Jason thought for a moment, which translated into dozens of minutes with his accelerated thinking speed. Eventually, he decided to put on the simplest sort of program he could think of, a nature documentary about the Amazon rainforest.

And so, like this, Jason carved a couple of hours out of his schedule to sit with Phoebe and watch a few programs discussing the geography of planet Earth. Phoebe was much less startled by all the novel moving images, and she became extremely enamored with all the cute and scary animals that were portrayed on screen. With a narrator slowly discussing the beauty of the world she knew, Phoebe quickly grew to enjoy the concept of 'the TV', though Jason knew better than to simply hand her the remote. She was not ready for that big of a leap.

"Wow... this forest looks incredible. I would like to go there someday..." Phoebe said wistfully after the documentary ended.

"We absolutely can, and sooner than you think." Jason chuckled. "But not right now. We do need to get to work. I just wanted to sit you down and ease you into life on Aevum. Because of Aevum's time acceleration, you don't need to worry about the state of affairs on Earth so much."

Phoebe blinked. "Yes... the time... acceleration."

Jason sighed. She really didn't understand high level concepts at all. It was extremely jarring compared to the Phoebe he was used to.

"Well..." Jason eventually said. "Are you ready to go outside and see what the rest of Aevum is like?"

Phoebe tensed up. Jason had already smacked her in the face with 8,000 confusing new terms and names, she wasn't excited to be hit with more.

Seeing the earnest look of excitement the young man was wearing, Phoebe had no choice but to grit her teeth and force a pained smile.

"I... can't wait!" She said.

"Great! You won't regret this!" Jason said with a big smile.

Phoebe prayed he was right. She was just a simple peasant girl, after all.

A fish out of water.

Part 763: Family Reunion

January 29th, 2021. Aevum, 6PM Earth-time.

Phoebe stepped out into Aevum's open-air for the first time. She was filled with trepidation at what she would see, but even so, she was completely unprepared for the sight she beheld.

The first thing Phoebe noticed was the sky. There was a sun shining above, but it seemed 'off' as if it was ever so slightly a different color from the one she was used to. At the same time, the atmosphere was pitch-black, not blue as it usually would be when the sun was out.

The next thing Phoebe noticed was a gigantic towering spire with glowing lines of energy that wound their way from the base to the levitating crystal at the top. Phoebe had never seen such a tall building in her entire life. Its sheer height was awe-inspiring and made her look at it as if a god had crafted it with the essence of the stars.

All sorts of strange black-metal cubes were levitating in the sky. Phoebe had no idea what they were, or their purpose, but they hummed with faint pulsations of energy, making her realize she had heard this 'hum' since the moment she arrived in Aevum; she simply hadn't noticed it at first because everything else had overwhelmed her.

There were many other buildings colored white and gilded with gold accents as well. The whole city looked a thousand times more fantastical than Camelot, to the point Phoebe started feeling a little lightheaded again. She quickly closed her eyes and massaged her forehead.

"Welcome to Aevum." Jason said, tentatively patting her back with the gentlest possible touch. "Just take a minute or two. Don't let the sights overwhelm you."

"It's... it's so... incredible..." Phoebe muttered. She opened her eyes and squinted while looking around. It was difficult for her to even put into words how fantastical this Divine Land of the Stars was. It seemed stars had been used to craft it, because what other materials could glow so brilliantly under a pitch-black sky?

Phoebe did need several minutes to recover her senses, but eventually, she and Jason started slowly walking out of her house through the inner city. Phoebe didn't know this, but she lived on a piece of prime real estate that future Aevum-dwellers would kill to enjoy. Her home was part of a large manor that Jason himself also technically lived in, but he rarely had time to actually spend inside, as he was always busy. It was situated less than 500 meters from the Nexus Tower itself.

Years from now, many people would compete for the right to live in a place quite a bit further from the Nexus Tower than Phoebe's current dwelling, and she was totally ignorant on what that meant.

Not that Jason cared. Phoebe was his wife, even if... not really. He would naturally give her all the best he had to offer, as he would for his daughter and father.

"And this over here, that's the Aegis Womb." Jason said, gesturing to a large glass dome with an interior that went deep underground. "Have you ever heard of Heroic Artifacts before? Perhaps ones similar to Solomon's Crown, or Excalibur?"

Phoebe nodded slowly. "I have indeed gazed upon the King's Blade in the past. It was a majestic weapon."

"Well, the Aegis Womb is a special place that allows me to manufacture all sorts of weapons, artifacts, and other fantastical things of that nature. In the future, I plan to place many craftsmen and women in there, such as the legendary Elizabeth Kindelmann, or perhaps even you, if you're up for it."

Jason smiled knowingly at Phoebe, but she did not smile back.

"Jason, I often find your jokes amusing, but if they have any weight behind them, I must dissuade you of such notions." Phoebe said, shaking her head gently. "I am no master of crafting. My thoughts are slow and simple. I am a much better fighter than I am a thinker. It really seems as though King Arthur gave you a false impression of my abilities. I wonder what strange things he has said to color your view of me so incorrectly?"

Jason's smile faded. He wanted to say something, but he found it hard to give voice to the words.

What could he tell her? That not only was he a time traveler, but he and her knew each other in the future? That would only serve to confuse her, and then she might start asking other questions... and this could ultimately cause a terrible situation to play out. He didn't want to scare her or push her away.

Once again, Jason thought of perhaps transplanting Phoebe's future memories into her younger self, but he shook his head. It was a terrible idea.

Put another way, some might immediately leap at the chance to 'resurrect' their wife inside her younger body, but Jason knew from experience doing so would only cause her past and future memories to collide. It would be as if Phoebe were experiencing two conflicting realities at once.

Additionally, one's lived experiences were always far stronger than mere memories, even implanted ones that felt as 'real' as lived experiences. Those implanted memories would end up feeling foreign, like experiencing someone else's life by watching thousands of hours of bodycam footage. Phoebe would believe her personal memories over the new ones, every time.

Another option Jason had considered was mind-wiping Phoebe entirely and transplanting all her future memories up to the moment he died. This was feasible. Jason knew it would work.

But it was wrong. It was so, so very wrong. He would never do such a thing without past-Phoebe's express permission, and even if she completely believed in him and trusted him, even going to far as to eradicate her current self for the sake of a woman she didn't truly know, the guilt would eat Jason alive. He would feel deep shame, knowing he had killed the Phoebe of the past just to bring back his future wife, revived in a new body.

Even if it all worked out... could Jason really bring himself to do that? Did he deserve to do that?

Phoebe was dead. She had died in the future. Putting her memories in a younger vessel would not actually revive her. His wife had died, permanently, for good. He would only be cloning her, not actually reviving the wife he lost.

Philosophically, it was a Ship of Theseus dilemma. The most effective way Jason could think to bring Phoebe back would still not actually revive her, but a facsimile at best, and he would only be doing so to make himself feel better.

Thus... Jason was at a loss. He simply walked beside Phoebe, basking in her presence, yet feeling somewhat numb and uncertain of how he should proceed.

Jason considered trying to romance her younger self. He thought about possibly making her fall in love with him without using magic or anything else, simply trying to pursue her earnestly as any ordinary man would.

But even that... even that felt like a sin.

He didn't deserve to have Phoebe back. He had failed his wife in the future. What right did he have to love her younger, more naive self? What right did he have to cheat on the woman he'd failed with a version of her who didn't know any better?

Wouldn't he just end up killing her again? That was the only thing he was good at. Killing the people he loved.

Jason forced himself to remain stoic. This time, he carefully made sure his face didn't reveal any conflicting thoughts. He shoved all his concerns and worries to the back of his mind.

He opted not to think about the matter. It was easier that way.

"Over here, these are the dormitories of several young new Lowborn I've recently brought to Aevum to train." Jason said, gesturing to a large apartment building about ten blocks from Phoebe's manor. "It's also where my... my daughter lives."

"Oh, your daughter?" Phoebe questioned with a smile. "I remember you mentioned her. What was her name again?"

"...Daisy." Jason said, steeling his heart. "Her mother chose the name."

"It's a beautiful name indeed." Phoebe nodded. "If I had a daughter, I'd definitely name her after a flower. Maybe something like 'Lily' or 'Rose'. Can I meet your little girl? Is that okay?"

Jason slowed to a stop outside the dorms. He gave Phoebe a long look.

"Ah... Phoebe... if my daughter acts weird toward you... I would like to apologize in advance."

"Apologize? There's no need for that." Phoebe said, laughing off his concerns. "Kids will be kids. They say the darnedest things."

"No, I mean, she um... well, she was traumatized at a young age. I told you I was married before, yes? Well, Daisy , she... she lost her mother when she was only 6 years old. You look... a lot like her mother. So I don't know how she'll react."

Phoebe blinked.

She looked a lot like Daisy's mother? So didn't that mean she looked a lot like Jason's late wife?

For a brief moment, several thoughts clicked into place. Could this be why Jason was so interested in her? Did he fancy the only female Knight of the Round Table because Phoebe resembled his fallen wife?

Phoebe internally shook her head. The idea wasn't entirely far-fetched, but Jason had clearly maintained his distance from her all this time. It seemed he was even hesitant to touch her. And that made sense, given she was in her 30's and he was still a young man. What young man would be interested in a woman well past the beauty of her youth? He should be pursuing pretty girls his own age.

Phoebe shook off the extraneous thoughts. She simply nodded. "If Daisy says anything discourteous, rest assured I won't hold her words against her. A girl who has lost her mother is a sad child indeed."

"Yeah." Jason said.

That was all he managed to get out. His thoughts felt distant, disoriented. He was having a hard time emotionally coming to grips with what he had to do, but introducing Daisy and Phoebe was necessary if the two of them were both going to live in Aevum. Better to meet now than by accident when Daisy was unprepared.

After steeling his mind, Jason stepped toward the dormitory, his movements somewhat wooden. Phoebe walked beside him, but even she could tell he was having a hard time. He wasn't able to mask his emotions as well as he wanted, now that the moment of truth had arrived.

What's making Jason so nervous? Phoebe wondered. Is he really that worried his daughter will offend me?

After they entered, Jason led Phoebe down the brightly lit hallway. There were sounds of shouts in a gymnasium built in the basement one floor below the entry floor. They walked down some stairs where they heard a group of teenagers yelling and shouting. Phoebe looked on as a massive dark-skinned man was doing pushups in the middle of an open court. He seemed to be struggling as he lifted his body up, flexing at his elbows. His face was pouring with sweat, and his entire body was sticky from perspiration. He only had on a pair of shorts and some flip-flops, he was otherwise shirtless, and the observers could make out all the veins on his arms.

"Three hundred and forty two!" Another dark skinned man shouted, his back to Jason and Phoebe. "C'mon Jerome, you're almost to three-fifty! Tough it out!"

"You c-can do it, Jerome!" A pretty young teenage girl with blonde hair said. She clasped her hands together worriedly.

Another blonde girl was standing at the edge of the arena. She was holding both of her palms out, facing downward, and seemed to be struggling to concentrate, or something else. All her attention was on Jerome. She hadn't noticed Phoebe and Jason entering, even though she was facing them.

There was another well-dressed young man in a suit. He sat at a table nearby, sipping orange juice from a fancy glass. He only looked at the struggle in the center of the room with mild interest. He was the first to notice Jason enter.

Not wanting to distract the others, the suited-teenager quickly got up and moseyed on over toward the Trueborn.

"Jason! Good to see you again! And who's this lovely lady beside you?"

"Hey, Brian. This is Phoebe Berthold. Phoebe, this is Brian Bozzard. He's a pyrokinetic; he can manipulate fire."

"Wow!" Phoebe said in genuine amazement. "It's nice to meet you, Brian. What's going on in here?"

"Brian gestured toward the dark-skinned man doing pushups. "Daisy is using her telekinesis to push down on Jerome's body. Since he gets stronger every time he exerts himself, the harder he trains, the bigger his gains."

"Oh, I see- wait! That's Daisy??" Phoebe asked, looking at the pretty teenage blonde girl who was concentrating on Jerome. "She's your daughter, Jason? But she's..."

Phoebe looked at Jason with a mixture of confusion and embarrassment. Was Jason really not a teenager? Was he telling the complete truth when he said he was hundreds of years old? How else could he have a daughter who looked the same age as him?!

Jason met Phoebe's confusion with his own look of confusion. Why did she have such an incredulous look on her face? He'd already told her he was hundreds of years old. Could it be that there was something else she had misunderstood?

"Yes, that's my little girl, Daisy." Jason said. "Why? Is something wrong?"

"She's just... she looks to be the same age as you." Phoebe said, feeling dizzy yet again. "Are you really, truly, genuinely, hundreds of years old?"

"Yeah, I am." Jason said nonchalantly, as if that didn't fly in the face of everything Phoebe knew about the world. "What's so weird about that? Demons and angels are immortal. Humans can become immortal too, I'm just one of the first ones to figure out how to do it. I'll make everyone immortal soon enough, including you."

"Oh. Oh... I see." Phoebe trailed off, looking back at Daisy with a look of renewed interest. So this was the girl Jason had talked about so much! Phoebe had thought Daisy was eight to ten years old at most, not a young adult. And judging by the ruckus on stage, she was powerful, like her father.

Jerome looked like he was about to die. Daisy didn't hold back at all, and pressed down upon his back with the weight of a mountain. If the gymnasium hadn't been made of Wordsmithium, it would have collapsed from the sheer weight of Jerome's hands and feet crushing down on the floor.

"Three hundred and forty-seven!"

"Three hundred and forty eight! Come on Jerome, you've got this!!"

"Three hundred and... and forty nine!! You're doing it man, you're doing it! Just one more!"

Even Brian started to get excited. "Last one, Jerome! Last one!"

Daisy happened to glance over when she heard the unexpected sound of Brian's voice. At that moment, her eyes fell upon Phoebe's face.

What happened next was something Phoebe would never forget.

All of a sudden, the weight vanished from Jerome's body. Not expecting his trainer to suddenly retract her powers, Jerome launched himself skyward. In a single instant, his push-up turned into a springing motion, and he launched himself toward the ceiling, crashed through the gymnasium's roof, and flew into the sky. Jerome screamed in fright and surprise before Jason's fast-acting allowed him to reach out with a Word of Power and stop Jerome's momentum in midair.

Daisy was in a daze. She had become just as startled by everyone else when she lost control of her powers and Jerome flew into the ceiling, but at the same time, her gaze was completely transfixed on her mother's face.

In Daisy's eyes, her knowledge of Jason and Phoebe were not the same. Not at all. Once Daisy had mastered teleportation, she had secretly watched Jason from a distance over the years. She was familiar with what he looked like, and her memory of her father's face had never faded. She had thought of seeing him and speaking to him on countless occasions.

The same was not true of Phoebe. Until Jason explained to her Phoebe's situation and how she was under Bahamut's control, Daisy had never known where her mother was, or if she was even alive. Her childhood memories of her mother's face were blurry at best, and a source of deep anxiety.

Thus, the moment she saw her mother again, Daisy's powers went into a state of chaotic flux.

Daisy staggered slightly. She looked up at the ceiling, where Jerome had just gone flying, then immediately lowered her eyes back to Phoebe. Her previous work on exercising Jerome's body had completely fled her mind. She didn't care at all anymore. He had left her thoughts entirely.

Like a dream, Daisy stumbled toward her mother. She didn't blink. She couldn't blink. She looked at Phoebe with such intensity that Phoebe sensed the change in the young woman's demeanor immediately, but Phoebe was equally distracted by Jerome's flight upward!

"Oh my god!" Phoebe exclaimed, glancing at Jason. "Is that young man going to be okay?"

"Ah. Yeah." Jason said, as he saw his daughter approaching. He knew Phoebe had no idea just how important this moment was to Daisy. "Don't worry about Jerome. He'll be fine. Um, Phoebe Berthold, this is my daughter, Daisy Hiro."

Jason quickly put emphasis on both women's last names. He wasn't an idiot, and he had informed Daisy he would be bringing Phoebe to Aevum. Even so, it had been a few weeks in Aevum-time, and Daisy didn't know when Phoebe would arrive. Thus, Phoebe's appearance was, in every meaning of the word, a shock to her system. It caused a mental reboot.

"Mom..." Daisy said, as she drew closer. "Mom..."

"No." Jason quickly said, stepping forward. "This is Phoebe Berthold. I told you about her. She's one of King Arthur's Knights. Please mind your manners."

Daisy stopped a few feet from Phoebe. She stared at the white-haired woman, a wooden expression on her face. Her eyes were distant, as if drinking in Phoebe's appearance, yet unable to process the person she was looking at as a physical existence.

"Um. Hello, young lady." Phoebe said, now understanding that the situation was more baffling than even she had expected. "I... I'm a friend of your father's. More of a vassal, really. He explained to me that I look a lot like your mother, but... well, um... I'm not? I am sorry for your mother's loss. I'm sure it was very hard on you."

Daisy took a step back. She looked like she'd been punched in the throat. She opened her mouth to speak, but words evaded her. For several long seconds, he just looked at Phoebe with a blank stare.

"I... yeah... good... to meet you..." Daisy said numbly. "Sorry... I... havetogo..."

Before Phoebe or even Jason could react, Daisy... disappeared.

She vanished from the spot, as if instantly turning invisible. Phoebe was startled. One second, the young lady was there, and the next second, she wasn't.

Phoebe directed a frown Jason's way. "Jason... is there something you're not telling me? Your daughter looked like she'd seen a ghost! Is she alright?"

"She... she..." Jason said dumbly. "I... I should go talk to her."

He bowed his head apologetically. "Sorry, Phoebe. Stay here with Brian and the rest. I'll be back in a bit."

Like this, Jason also disappeared, leaving Phoebe with a group of curious teenagers.

It didn't take long for Jerome to return to the arena. He was angry and confused by what had happened, but he chalked the situation up to Daisy exhausting her power, causing all her strength to disappear. He didn't blame her for the accident.

As Phoebe was trying to figure out what was even happening, she heard a teenage girl's voice from her left side.

"Phoebe Berthold?"

Phoebe turned to look at another pair of faces she hadn't seen before. This time, there were two teenage girls, a brunette with long and curly hair, and another with short black hair in a bob. They were both wearing cute dresses that seemed like they'd been made by a fashion designer.

"Yes?" Phoebe asked, not sure which one had spoken.

It turned out to be the black haired girl with a thin frame. She was somewhat homely, with a slightly sickly complexion, and she wore an eye-catching armband on her wrist that seemed to glow with magical energy.

"Hello. I'm Nadia." The black-haired girl said, before gesturing to the brunette beside her. "This is Sasha. She's a fashion designer, and an alchemist. I'm a... I'm a..."

Nadia struggled to search for the right words, but Sasha quickly interjected. "Nadia is the brains of Aevum. She's the smartest person here, maybe even smarter than the Trueborn himself! Nice to meet ya, Phoebe!"

Nadia looked a little embarrassed by her friend's boasting, but she didn't deny the claims. "I'm smarter than average, I guess. I'm just glad I finally get to meet you."

"Meet me?" Phoebe questioned. "Oh, that's nice of you to say. I'm nobody important though."

A strange silence followed for a few moments as Nadia simply stared at Phoebe.

"Oh. I see. Well, I have no doubt you'll become someone incredible, soon enough. Did Jason help you acquire the Sphinx's powers already?"

"He did. How do you know that?" Phoebe asked.

"Oh... I just kinda... know a lot of stuff." Nadia answered evasively.

"She's REALLY smart." Sasha bragged on behalf of her friend, yet again.

"I don't doubt that." Phoebe said, smiling gently. It seemed the young girl had self esteem issues, but she certainly did seem bright. Phoebe envied her intelligence. Nadia had a bright future ahead of her.

"Since Jason and Daisy both left, why don't the rest of us show you around?" Nadia suggested. "We can tell you about our powers, maybe see if we can activate yours as well."

"Sure. That sounds like a lot of fun!" Phoebe chirped. "And that Jerome fellow... he's alright?"

"Jerome is the toughest person here." Sasha said. "He can take a beating. You have no idea!"

While Phoebe was being led around Aevum, Jason chased after his daughter. It wasn't hard to find her, since she wasn't capable of teleporting out of Aevum, and the world itself was quite small. Jason's Wordsmithing let him blanket the entire realm with his consciousness whenever needed, part of its auxiliary functions he could activate with a single thought.

Jason found Daisy in her dorm. She was curled up in a ball in the corner of her room. The moment Jason appeared, her tears and cries of pain struck his heart like an anvil.

"Daisy..." Jason said softly. "I... I told you I was bringing her back. I didn't mean to-"

"FUCK YOU, dad!" Daisy screamed, mashing her palms against her eyes. She choked on sobs of rage and despair. "You ambushed me! You just brought mom in like that, didn't tell me it was TODAY! I wasn't prepared at all! And she was just THERE. She was right there, and I'm not allowed to hug her, or kiss her, or call her mom, and then you start getting pissy and reminding me she's not really my mom?! What's wrong with you?! How could you DO this to me?? Uuuu..."

Daisy's sobs became louder and more pained. Her heart beat erratically, and she lowered one hand to clutch her chest, feeling as if she was about to have a panic attack.

Jason instinctively wanted to use a Word of Power to ease her pain, but he knew that would be a supremely stupid move, robbing her of the emotions she deserved. Instead, he stood there, looking down at his little girl, not sure of what to do.

Carefully, Jason knelt down and reached toward her, but Daisy sensed his touch and slapped his hand away.

"Don't touch me!" Daisy snapped. "Fuck you, dad! Fuck you!! H-how could you do this to me?! My mom... she's right there... she's RIGHT there, and I'm not allowed to say anything? How is that fair?!"

Jason closed his eyes. He lowered his arm and became still.

He felt the urge to cry as well. Daisy didn't seem to know just how difficult the situation was for him as well, but could he tell her that? Of course not. He would be a terrible father if he made this about him. She had every right to be pissed, confused, and broken-hearted.

"I'm... I'm sorry..." Jason choked. "I didn't want to hurt you, baby girl. I didn't. I forgot it had already been a couple of weeks. I thought I gave you a heads-up and... and you'd be ready..."

"Well I WASN'T!" Daisy shrieked. "Just give mom back her memories already! What the hell are you waiting for?! Why are you torturing me like this?"

"I already told you." Jason said, his tone numb with calmness. "It doesn't work like that. I don't want to kill the past Phoebe to bring the future Phoebe here. And it wouldn't really be your mother anyway."

"She'd be real enough to ME!" Daisy said. "Just because you have some hangups about a stupid ethical dilemma, I'm not allowed to have a mom?! And what's all this about erasing her memories? She'd still be the same person, dad! So what if she loses a few hours of memories - mom is mom! She was the same person while she was trapped under Bahamut's spell, right?! So just make her real again! It's not that hard!!"

Jason hung his head. He had lots of good logical arguments against his daughter's words, but logic couldn't win against emotion. Jason wanted Phoebe to return just as badly as Daisy did.

"Your mother died." Jason said quietly. "She died. I held her dead body. What right do I have to clone her, only to make myself feel better? It won't undo the fact I failed her."

Daisy pulled her hands from her eyes. She looked at her father with a tear-stained face, her expression one of disbelief.

"That's what this is about?! Your guilt?!" Daisy spat. "So because YOU screwed up, fuck me, then? I don't get to have a mom?? Where's the logic in that? I don't care if I'm just talking to my mom's memories, or her soul, or her future self, or anything else! I just want my mom, and you have the power to bring her back!"

"That's NOT how it works!" Jason suddenly shouted, causing Daisy to flinch. "It doesn't work that way, Daisy! I can't just shove future-Phoebe's memories inside of past Phoebe's head. Put yourself in her shoes! Do you have any idea how bizarre that would feel to you?"

"I don't see the problem!" Daisy retorted.

"Fine! Fine. Then I'll explain it in a way you can understand." Jason said.

A moment of silence followed. Jason closed his eyes to collect his thoughts.

"Daisy. Listen. Imagine for a moment that a guy you've never met suddenly appears and says he's your husband from the future. Imagine he puts memories of a future you don't know in your head. Imagine that those memories seem sort of real, but they also equally feel like someone else's memories. What do you think would happen?"

Jason didn't give his daughter a chance to answer. "It would feel like you'd developed a personality disorder, as if two people were inhabiting one body! You would not become the person from the future, but would instead still be yourself, albeit with knowledge and thoughts and feelings that you never developed in person, all shoved inside your head! In the worst case scenario, it could lead to a form of mental psychosis, a complete break from reality!"

"M-mental... psychosis?" Daisy asked, feeling her heart sink.

"That's right!" Jason said. "Not only would we not actually be bringing your mother back, we would be hurting the Phoebe of the past, bringing terrible harm upon her. The only way to actually properly 'bring' Phoebe of the future to the past is by eradicating the memories of this Phoebe entirely so she loses all sense of self. But that would cause harm to her soul, and the transplanted Phoebe STILL wouldn't be your mother. She would ultimately just be a clone!"

"I don't CARE if she's just a clone!" Daisy said. "I just want my mom back, dad! Do the memory thing, just DO it! I know you can!"

Jason fell silent.

It wasn't as if he didn't want to do what his daughter said... but he and Daisy were different people. They had their own viewpoints on the situation.

"I can't do that, sweetie." Jason said quietly. "I can't bring harm to the Phoebe of this era just to sate our desires for a future that's disappeared from the timeline. That would be... the height of selfishness."

"Dad, seriously?" Daisy pressed. "You have to do something! You can't be okay with just bringing mom here and dancing around the truth! When she finds out, she's going to be so pissed anyway!"

"I DON'T LIKE THIS ANY MORE THAN YOU DO!" Jason suddenly shouted, startling Daisy and making her retreat into the corner. "You think I don't want my wife back? You think I like hurting you, making you look at your mother, knowing she's not really your mother? Knowing I left you alone in this past, all by yourself, growing up in a hostile world?! Of course I hate it! I want nothing more than to snap my fingers and fix everything and get our happy little fucking family back together!!"

"D-dad..." Daisy said quietly, her shoulders trembling.

Jason inhaled and exhaled a few times. He looked away and massaged his temples.

He'd really done it, this time. He'd lost his temper and screamed at his daughter, the one person in the world he loved as much as Phoebe.

Jason felt wretched. Utterly contemptible. In that moment, he hated himself more than he did Gressil, Satan, Raphael, or any of the thousand other scumbags he'd come across in his life.

"I'm... I'm sorry... for yelling..." Jason said, as tears squeezed from his eyes. "I'm sorry, baby... I didn't- daddy didn't mean to yell."

Daisy fell silent. She lowered her eyes, a sinking feeling enveloping her mind and body.

"No... I'm sorry, dad..." Daisy mumbled, her mouth numb. "I shouldn't... I'm being... such a little baby... I can't... I don't know what to do."

Seeing that her father had started to cry, Daisy felt just as terrible as he did.

Without another word, she moved toward her father, then hugged him, and he hugged her back.

Father and daughter embraced, both of them feeling absolutely awful, neither knowing how they could resolve the situation properly.

They only knew they had to try something, rather than waiting for the universe to fix itself...

Part 764: Futuristic Feast

January 29th, 2021. Aevum, 6PM Earth-time.

While Jason was reconciling with his daughter, the Lowborn all gathered together to make Phoebe feel welcome. Phoebe appeared noticeably older than all the teenagers since she was in her thirties, so she felt a little out of place. Everyone around her looked so young and bright-eyed, she couldn't help but talk to them as if they were naive children.

However, one member of the group immediately stood out. Nadia seemed far more mature than her friends, in a way that was immediately obvious to Phoebe. She wasn't sure why, but Nadia seemed more put-together than her peers. While the other teenagers were energetic and excited to have what they initially assumed was a pretty new instructor lady, Nadia was a lot calmer and more measured. In some ways, she even made Phoebe feel like a student herself. It was a weird feeling, and it reminded Phoebe of how Jason appeared eighteen yet he had a wisdom far beyond his apparent age.

The future world Phoebe had arrived in was completely alien to the one she knew. She was struggling to adjust to everything.

"This is a cafe!" Sasha explained cheerfully as she dragged Phoebe and the others to a small dining area staffed by robots that Jason had made a few weeks prior. "You can order whatever food you want to eat. Everything is free!"

"Free?" Phoebe repeated.

"Yeah! You don't have to pay a dime for anything." Marco added helpfully.

Phoebe had a blank stare on her face as she looked at the small building before her. That was until Nadia spoke up. "You're probably more familiar with a 'pence' I'd imagine."

"Ohh, I see now!" Phoebe said, remembering pennies, farthings, and the like from King Arthur's era. She wasn't familiar with 'dimes' but she understood the concept of currency as a whole. Still, as a former Knight of the Round, she had never really had to worry about money anyway, as King Arthur treated his top knights with a lavish lifestyle for the era they lived in.

Sasha led Phoebe inside, and Phoebe squinted when she saw the bright neon-backlit menu showing all sorts of words for food she'd never heard of.

"Crow... crow-ton?" Phoebe asked helplessly, as one odd word jumped out at her.

"Crouton." Nadia said. "Crew-ton. It's French, little cubes of fried bread. Very tasty."

"I see..." Phoebe said. "Ham... buur... ger?"

Phoebe could read the words... sort of. They were written in the same English letters she had seen many times in her life, even if the styling of the fonts was very different from what she was used to. The problem was, she was completely unacquainted with modern cuisine. The words she saw meant almost nothing to her.

"I'll, um... I'll have the... soup? There is soup here?" Phoebe questioned. "With... beef? And vegetables?"

The robot behind the counter was a squarish metal machine designed to look completely inhuman. It stared at her with unblinking blue eyes.

"Yes. There is soup. Please state your preferred type of soup." The robot answered.

Phoebe touched her stomach. She hadn't eaten since emerging from Bahamut's enslavement. She was ravenously hungry.

Despite her hunger, Phoebe felt a weird pressure from the people around her. She felt out of place among all the teenagers, and she was awkward too, since she didn't know how to 'order food' properly. She'd never been taught, and she didn't know the etiquette, yet everyone seemed to treat her as an ordinary older woman who should know these things innately.

As such, Phoebe became flustered and started stammering. "I, I um... I would like some... meat soup please... with bread... and water?"

"Haha, meat soup?" Marco teased. "I'd go for the beef soup, personally. And what kind of bread do you want? Just plain bread?"

Phoebe went pale. "Bread. I want... um... yes, just... bread please. I um... I..."

What types of bread were there? Phoebe had never thought about it. Before she turned 18, she had helped her mother make bread a few times, but typically they just bought bread from the local breadmaker. He didn't offer different 'kinds' of bread. Bread was simply bread!

On top of that, once she turned eighteen and became a Knight of the Round after winning in one of King Arthur's competitions, Phoebe hadn't spent any time worrying about what sort of food she would eat. She would enter the dining hall every day, choose some food from the many platters made by the king's chefs, and eat with the others. She was poorly educated on the different sorts of foodstuffs available back then, let alone today.

"Would you like me to help you order?" Nadia asked, squeezing Phoebe's shoulder reassuringly while whispering in her ear.

Phoebe felt like an idiot. She was so embarrassed she almost wanted to cry. She hurriedly nodded, feeling guilty a young girl had to help her, but too ashamed to keep babbling like an idiot in front of the others. "Y-yes, please."

"Okay. So here are some things you might enjoy." Nadia said, pointing to some of the entries on the menu. "If you just want a little taste of home, try the chicken with barley soup, and throw in some garlic-seasoned rye bread. If you're thirsty, we can do water, or maybe a bit of some light ale?"

"Ooh, try some chocolate milk!" Sasha added. "I bet you've never had it before, and it's really good!"

Phoebe was still a little dazed, but sensing that the kids weren't going to make fun of her for being an ignorant dullard, she did feel a little better. "Um, okay. I guess I'll have that then. Chicken and barley soup, seasoned rye bread, and... chocolate milk?"

By now, even Marco, who was usually slow to pick up on social cues, had figured out Phoebe was uncomfortable and unaware of a lot of modern cuisine, so he didn't tease her anymore. Especially when he started to speak at one point and Nadia shot him a nasty glare, which promptly shut him up.

The other teenagers all made their orders. Nadia, Sasha, Marco, Jerome, Farrah, and Brian all ordered one after another, then they shoved several tables together and sat down together. Phoebe somehow ended up being sandwiched between Nadia and Farrah, with Sasha on Nadia's other side. The three boys all ended up sitting on the opposite side of the table.

"Oh, I see!" Brian said at one point, as Phoebe hesitantly explained her origins. "So you... you're a time traveler from the past then. Wow. That explains a lot. I do apologize if I or the others here have overwhelmed you."

"No, it's fine. It's not your fault." Phoebe said, blushing in embarrassment. "You've all been so nice. I'm just a little... slow."

"Slow?" Marco repeated. "No way! Anyone would be confused if they ended up in a crazy future world, where all the stuff was made of LEDs. Especially Aevum, with all its magic crystals and stuff."

"Ell-ee-dees?" Phoebe repeated, confused.

"It's, um... it's lights." Marco said, before sheepishly pointing at the LED lights in the ceiling. "Sorry. I'll try not to use weird modern words and acronyms so much."

"Oh. Okay." Phoebe said.

Before long, the group started engaging in small talk more, with everyone doing their best to explain anything Phoebe asked about, as she was extremely curious and interested in learning more about the world around her.

"So there really are machines that fly through the air? Like a bird?" Phoebe asked.

"Indeed! One of my cousins is a pilot." Brian said. "It seems quite the fun job, getting to visit all the different countries of the world. Of course, I've already visited many of them myself, since my family is quite wealthy."

"Job..." Phoebe repeated. "Is that a title? Like 'knight'?"

"Not exactly." Nadia explained. "You can think of it more as a 'profession'. Back in your day, you might have a man who cobbled together shoes for a few pence, right? That was how he acquired his currency. These days, people work 'jobs' that require an education before you can be hired. They pay you a set amount of currency per hour, or per day, or whatever the boss and employee work out together."

"Oh, I see..." Phoebe said, though she didn't fully understand the concept. "They aren't paid for each of the shoes they make?"

"Not really." Brian said. "In your era, one craftsman might make an entire shoe from scratch and then sell it, but these days, one man makes the shoelaces, a woman makes the bottom of the shoe, another individual makes other parts of the shoe, and a final person puts it all together on a factory line. Thus, shoes can get made way faster with people specializing in specific components of items."

"It's like that for almost everything." Sasha added. "The fashion industry is among the worst offenders. There are sweatshops assembling strings and straps and all kinds of little components using child labor assembly lines."

Phoebe scratched her head. "What do you mean by 'child labor'?"

"Most people nowadays think it's wrong for kids and even young teenagers to have to work to support themselves and their family." Nadia explained. "Even so, kids are young and naive, so a lot of governments around the world tacitly endorse allowing children to do hard manual labor for far less money then an adult would earn. It's good for the economy, they claim."

Phoebe looked around the table. "What's wrong with children doing work? I helped my parents when I was growing up. I apprenticed under the local blacksmith, Sir Gregor, for a couple of years."

"Well, that's different..." Nadia said, before realizing something. "Actually, now that you mention it, up until a hundred years ago, it was extremely common for kids to work on farms for much of the daylight hours. So... I can see why you might not understand the misery of institutionalized child labor. Let's just save the discussion for later. It's a bit complicated."

Phoebe nodded. She was starting to feel tired again. Her mental model of reality was constantly getting rocked by the 'innovations' of the future era. On top of that, every time someone mentioned 'her time' or 'her era' Phoebe felt like she was an ugly old hag from the ancient past. It didn't make her feel good, that was for sure.

The food finally arrived, and Phoebe marveled as she looked upon the dishes everyone else had ordered. Her soup and bread was eye-catchingly plain and boring compared to the exotic entrees served to each of the teenagers at the table.

"What is that called?" Phoebe asked, looking to her left at Nadia's plate.

"This is Fettuccine Alfredo." Nadia said. "It's a Roman-Italian dish; noodles with butter and finely grated Parmesan cheese. There's lots of different variations and flavors too. Want to try it?"

"May I?" Phoebe asked.

When Nadia told her yes, Phoebe immediately used her fork to clumsily stab at the noodles. Sasha, sitting on Nadia's opposite side, giggled and told her to spin the fork to wrap the noodles around it. Phoebe took a bite and marveled at how delicious the Fettucine was! She had never tasted anything like it in her life. It had a stickiness and saltiness she was unaccustomed to, but she found it delightfully agreeable.

"You should... try mine..." Farrah said, gesturing toward her plate. "This is spaghetti. It's really... tasty."

"It originated it China, and the red tomato sauce also originated from Italy." Nadia added helpfully.

"Wow." Phoebe muttered. "Italy made a lot of incredible food while I was gone!"

Phoebe reached her fork over to try Farrah's dish, but before the utensil made contact with Farrah's food, Marco suddenly cried out, "Whoa, whoa! You've gotta use a different fork, Phoebe! No cross-contamination!"

Phoebe halted, then looked up at Marco, completely baffled. "C-cross... huh?"

"You know, germs!" Marco said. "It's unhygienic to- oh... uh, well, maybe you don't... know about that?"

Suddenly, Marco felt like an idiot for even bringing it up. Phoebe looked at him as if he were speaking in an alien tongue. As embarrassed as Marco was, Phoebe was mortified that she had broken yet another unknown social faux pas! It seemed the future had all kinds of weird rules she had no idea about!

"N-no, it's okay..." Farrah stammered. "Phoebe doesn't know, and that stuff doesn't matter anyway. I don't mind... really... it's fine."

She smiled sweetly at Phoebe, but now that everyone's eyes were on her, Phoebe didn't know what to do.

"It's okay, I'll explain 'germs' to you later." Nadia said. "It's nothing to worry about. Basically, humans found out around a hundred years ago what caused most diseases and illnesses, and germs were the main cause. But since Aevum has many ways to cure all illnesses, we don't need to worry about any of that. Marco just isn't used to how Aevum works, that's all."

"Ohh, I see..." Phoebe said, her voice trailing off. She genuinely had no idea what 'germs' were, but they seemed serious! Since Nadia said it was okay to eat Farrah's food though, Phoebe didn't hesitate for long. She spooled some spaghetti noodles into her mouth, then let out a moan of pleasure when the salty and garlic-flavored noodles and sauce hit her tongue.

What an incredible texture! The buttery noodles with tomato sauce were so delicious, she couldn't believe they were real!

Embarrassed by his overreaction, Marco quickly made up for it by pointing at the food on his plate. "This is a 'hamburger'. Let me cut you a piece so you can try it. This is a really popular thing to eat. You usually eat it with your hands, but using a fork is OK too."

He quickly cut off a piece of his burger, and after Phoebe tried that, she felt like she had ascended even further to Heaven!

The kids here simply had no idea how good their modern food was. Phoebe looked at her simple bowl of soup and the plain bread beside it and grimaced internally, feeling like a country bumpkin for ordering something so plain.

The food of the future was ten levels above anything she could have imagined in her wildest dreams!

Nevertheless, after Phoebe sampled a bit of everyone's food, she smiled cheerfully at all of them, then went back to finishing the food she had ordered. Even though it was plain, the soup ended up tasting much richer and saltier than anything from her era. Even King Arthur's court had lacked most of the seasoning available to modern chefs. His greatest feasts were like dirt before the simple cafeteria spread these children had ordered on a whim.

And the chocolate milk! She never would have guessed a murky black liquid could taste so delicious!

What a future she had arrived in. What a future indeed!

"So, Phoebe, if you're not an instructor for us, then... who are you exactly?" Marco eventually asked.

Phoebe opened her mouth to respond, but no answers immediately came to mind. She stuttered and stammered for a few moments before blushing and lowering her head. "I... I don't know, actually. The Trueborn said I had talents and abilities he needed. Beyond that, I've no idea. I'm nobody special, despite what I keep hearing. It's truly a mystery to me."

Nadia subtly glanced at Phoebe out of the corner of her eye, but she said nothing. If Jason hadn't told Phoebe the truth yet, then Nadia certainly wasn't going to say anything.

"Oh, I think I know the reason!" Sasha suddenly shouted. "There's one obvious reason, really!"

"There is?" Phoebe asked, invisible question marks popping up over her head.

"Of course!" Sasha said, leaning forward to look past Nadia at Phoebe directly. "It's because... Jason likes you!"

Phoebe coughed, nearly choking on her food. She gave the teenager a weird look. "That seems a bit shallow for such a high and mighty Hero, don't you think, young lady? Besides, I'm much too old for him. I think you're more his type."

"Pffft, even if Jason were actually my age, maybe he's into MILFs!" Sasha said, before scratching her head. "Though, the M doesn't really apply, I think? Do you have any kids?"

"Me? Children?" Phoebe repeated. "I was a Knight of the Round. I remained chaste in service to my king. Naturally, I have no children."

"Ohhh, so the M doesn't apply, but that wouldn't matter anyway. Daisy told us her dad is hundreds of years old, so we're all like kids to him anyway!" Sasha said, laughing at her own genius.

"Sasha, come on, you're embarrassing her." Marco said, frowning at Sasha.

Phoebe was indeed a little embarrassed, but she was more confused than anything else. "What exactly is a 'milf'?"

"Oh, it's a acronym!" Sasha helpfully blurted out. "It stands for Mothers-"

"Mothers, Intellectuals, Leaders, and Friends." Nadia immediately interrupted before her best friend could blurt out something so uncouth. She pointedly stabbed some noodles on her plate and spun them around her fork before subtly glaring at Sasha.

"Ah, yeah, right. What Nadia said." Sasha laughed nervously, before quietly backing down.

"I see." Phoebe said. She sensed Nadia's reply wasn't entirely truthful, but she also guessed she didn't want to know the truth either.

It seemed she would have to investigate 'MILFs' on her own time when nobody else was around. Perhaps there was a library somewhere nearby she could do research...

The discussions continued, and Phoebe privately wondered if there was some truth to what Sasha had 'joked' about. Could it be the reason the Trueborn brought her here was because he fancied her? It did seem odd that he knew who she was and he'd gone to such lengths to save her from Bahamut first.

But still, more likely, he had simply spoken to Arthur's soul. That made a lot more sense, and Arthur might actually have forgiven Phoebe, perhaps even recommended her as a trusted aide to Jason. It was a little far-fetched, but not completely outside the realm of possibility...

While Phoebe pondered these thoughts, she continued to engage in small talk with the teenagers.

Eventually, the food was finished, and everyone stood up to go. Phoebe marveled at the waiter-bots that swooped in and cleaned off the tables, then she and the teenagers headed toward one of the dedicated training facilities Jason had created.

"So, Phoebe," Nadia said, "Jason told me he would be giving you the power of the Sphinx. Do you have it now?"

"I do... but I don't know entirely how it works." Phoebe said with a frown. "I think if I make up a riddle, I can bind people to become my servant? But I have no interest in enslaving others, so that ability feels quite crass..."

"Just use it on demons then." Jerome said with a smirk. "Make 'em into your goons. Ain't nobody'll miss em. Demons are all pieces of shit."

Phoebe shook her head. "Sorry, but I don't see demons as inherently evil. I believe it is possible to reason with them. Maybe not all of them, but enough to make it worth the time. I refuse to treat others as my enemy just because of their species."

"Guess you ain't seen what demons do when they get the chance." Jerome retorted. "Rape, torture, murder, you name it. I had a friend from Kenya, said demons came in and destroyed his community. He barely made it out alive. Last I saw him, he was shootin' drugs in a back alley."

Phoebe blinked.

Shooting drugs? She wondered. Isn't shooting what you do with a gun? And drugs, those are like tobacco and such... does that mean he was shooting tobacco into himself? Maybe into other people??

She decided not to ask, leaving the question unresolved in her head. Modern slang had too many variations, and she couldn't understand all its nuances so quickly. She'd just have to pick it up as she went along.

"My bigger point," Nadia continued, "is that the Sphinx's power is more formidable than you know. You now have the ability to transform your body into a powerful monster-form. It may even give you the strength to fight Demon Emperors."

"Truly?!" Phoebe gasped. "You're serious?"

"Indeed I am." Nadia swore solemnly. "Jason has spoken of other Sphinxes who possessed the power, and all of them could transform. If you can figure out how to do so, it'll make sense why Jason entrusted you with coming here to Aevum to train."

"Oh, then I would very much like to try it." Phoebe said. "What should I do?"

The group left the cafe and walked a few blocks over to a highly reinforced underground bunker where all the walls were made of Wordsmithium capable of tanking hits from even Belial, the hardest-hitting Demon Emperor. Even she would barely be able to dent the walls if she didn't care about injuring herself and went all-out with an attack.

The group formed a semi-circle around Phoebe, who stood along with Nadia. What Phoebe didn't know was that Nadia basically had access to all of Jason's knowledge, so she was quite familiar with the existence of Kar and Blinker in the future, but that didn't mean she understood all the nuances of what Sphinxes could do. Jason himself didn't know everything either.

"I suppose you should... um... look deep inside yourself?" Nadia said slowly, sounding hesitant for the first time since Phoebe's arrival. "The Sphinx transformation shouldn't require any training. You likely know how to transform innately."

"I do?" Phoebe wondered.

A long few minutes passed. Several of the teenagers offered their own ideas.

"You need to get really angry!" Marco shouted. "Like, you get all pissed off, and then your hair glows, and you go 'RAHHHH' and your power level shoots up, and then-"

"You watch way too many of those Japanese cartoons." Sasha interrupted.

"They're called ANIME, and they're ART!" Marco protested.

"Maybe it's... spiritual enlightenment?" Farrah suggested, her words soft. "Perhaps... maybe you have to start by seeking the mysteries of the universe, and then you find someone to truly love, and that lets you transform into the beast within?"

"You've read too many werewolf romance novels." Jerome snorted before smiling a little more softly at Farrah.

"Only a few..." Farrah said, blushing in embarrassment.

It was at this moment of indecision that Jason abruptly reappeared, teleporting in front of the teenagers and making them flinch. He had finished his business with Daisy, but she wasn't ready to see Phoebe just yet, so he came back alone.

"Did I miss anything?" Jason asked.

Nadia raised an eyebrow and crossed her arms, as if to say 'like you don't already know, you peeping Tom'. She didn't voice her thoughts out loud, and Jason pretended not to notice.

"We're trying to teach Phoebe how to transform into her Sphinx form." Brian explained. "Any ideas, Jason?"

Phoebe glanced between the teenagers. Now that she was more familiar with them, she noticed that each of their gazes held a different attitude toward Jason.

Brian and Nadia's expressions were extremely casual, as if they simply saw Jason as a fellow peer, an ordinary human on par with themselves. They didn't look at Jason disrespectfully, but it was clear they didn't look up to him as a godlike figure.

Jerome's eyes had a hint of fierceness, as if Jason were a rival he was constantly competing with.

Sasha also seemed a little bit fierce, like Jerome, but there was something else there as well. Passion? Hunger? It was as if she looked up to him as if he were an idol, or perhaps someone who could offer her a lot of benefits.

Marco and Farrah were a lot quieter and meeker in Jason's presence. There was a certain inferiority complex that seemed to make them ashamed to look him directly in his eyes. They both kept glancing away and smiling awkwardly, letting others do most of the talking.

By contrast, how did Phoebe feel about the Trueborn? She silently dwelt on her own feelings and found she fell on the same side of the scale as Marco and Farrah. She was more able to hold a conversation with Jason than they were, but she always felt overwhelmed with inferiority in his presence. He seemed to know everything, and since he might actually be hundreds of years old (a concept she still found difficult to swallow), it did seem to give him an aura of divinity rivaling King Arthur.

Only the recent flub with his daughter and her fleeing had momentarily broken the image of an invincible man with the world help in his grasp, and that was a mistake Arthur could have made as well.

Thus, Phoebe realized she felt as if she couldn't be Jason's equal, and that colored how she looked at and acted around him.

After Brian spoke his question, Jason stood on the spot for a few seconds, then shrugged.

"I could force the transformation with my magic, but there's no need for that." Jason said. "What you need to do is learn to sense your internal mana. Now that you've become a superior mortal being, you have access to the same sort of magic that I do. If I forcibly help you tap into your power, it could become a crutch you end up needing to rely on, and that won't benefit anyone."

Jason waved his hand. He summoned a cushion on the floor, and a bunch of chairs around that cushion. He indicated for everyone to take a seat in the chairs, except for Phoebe, who he had sit cross-legged on the central cushion.

Phoebe wasn't embarrassed by becoming the center of attention, but she did feel a little out of place with everyone looking at her, eyes full of anticipation. If she let them all down, she might not be able to raise her head with any pride for a long time.

"We'll start with some basic meditation." Jason said. "I learned this from a spiritually-minded friend in the... past. First, you have to close your eyes and filter out all your external thoughts. You have to let go of your worries, and look within yourself. The Sphinx is a living entity, it has its own will that you must communicate with."

Nadia raised an eyebrow. She had said something similar, but it seemed even she did not have the full story on Jason's memories and who he was. Where she was clueless, Jason actually had a more developed idea of how to proceed.

Jason continued instructing Phoebe. At the same time, he subtly cast a few Words of Power on her. Phoebe found that, shockingly, she was beginning to lose her senses. She slowly sank into a strange half-dream.

The whispering of the teenagers faded away. Only Jason's calm voice remained. And then, he too began to fade.

Phoebe head swayed a little. She felt dizzy, even a little nauseous. The world of the living became a memory, and the darkness of her mind became more pronounced.

It was here, in that darkness, that she sensed a presence she had not detected before.

There was someone else with her… and the entity looked at her from afar.

[You are able to sense me?] The Entity asked.

Phoebe's heart jumped.

[Who are you?] Phoebe asked, her dizziness muffling her sense of alertness. [How are you in my head?]

[I am the Sphinx.] The Entity answered. [The last remaining member of my people. All the others faded from existence tens of Eternities ago. In many ways, I am little more than a lost memory myself.]

The darkness parted. Phoebe looked up into the sky of her own mind to see a barely-perceivable head floating above her. It was translucent, like a ghost, or perhaps a soul.

The head was vast in size, much bigger than her soul-form. But it was also substantially weaker, as if diluted and faded by the passage of time. It no longer commanded the rich vitality that the soul of a living entity would.

The head had little in the way of discernible features. Its most prominent aspect was that it was inhuman, animalistic, perhaps even alien in origin. It most resembled a white-maned lion, with drooping eyes and a face exhausted from a timescale Phoebe could not even conceptualize.

[You are the Sphinx?] Phoebe asked.

[I am. And you are the first Inheritor capable of sensing my true form in many an eon.] The Sphinx said, its tone neutral. It did not seem especially excited by the fact Phoebe could accomplish this, but it wasn't completely disinterested, either. The Sphinx seemed to look at her with mild interest. [For an ordinary mortal of no note to accomplish such a thing, there must be a spark of potential within you.]

Phoebe blushed and lowered her head. [I am nobody special.]

[That may be true.] The Sphinx said. [But such a judgment is not yours to make. Humility is said to be a virtue, but too much of it can become a poison to one's ambition. If you are to access the true power of my people's lineage, you must be able to puff out your chest with pride.]

The Sphinx manifested a little more inside Phoebe's mind. Its arms and torso became slightly visible, as if it were struggling to breach a barrier between the world of souls and the real world.

Flexing its arms, the Sphinx poked at the sky, causing a galaxy of stars to form.

[My people's story began one hundred and forty seven eternities ago, long before your Creator came into existence, or his predecessor, or the ten predecessors before them...]

Part 765: Sphinx's Origins

January 29th, 2021. Aevum, 6PM Earth-time.

Inside a place secreted within Phoebe Berthold's mind, the Sphinx grandly waved its paw, causing a spiraling image of the universe to appear. It was a spherical object of such size and mass that merely looking at the edge of its event horizon seemed to tug at Phoebe's soul, making her wince in pain. Within the orb there were hundreds of septillions of galaxies, each containing tens of millions to hundreds of trillions of stars and worlds.

The orb of light shimmered and spun with an unbelievable speed, like the molecules of an atom, containing such power that if one were to gaze for too long, they might become lost in delusions of grandeur, praying they could harness the power themselves.

[One hundred and forty-seven eternities ago, my people first arose.] The Sphinx said solemnly. [To you, I may be an unfathomably ancient entity, but in truth, I was far from the eldest of my people, the wisest, or the bravest. I simply possessed a gift of endurance that allowed me to outlast my peers.]

[I do not know my people's origins.] The Sphinx said slowly. [I do not know on what world we originated, nor do I remember the name of our home galaxy. I only know it was not Earth, and it was not the Milky Way, where you were born and raised. I come from a galaxy much further away than the one we now reside. Its name has been forgotten by me, along with the names of so many other prominent figures whose faces once took up a place in my mind. Sadly, the knowledge of who they were and what they represented has faded from my memories.]

Phoebe looked up at the spiraling universe grasped within the Sphinx's palm. She had no idea what a galaxy was, nor did she understand the true scale of the universe. But the concept of someone being lost and alone, far from their place of birth? That was a concept she understood well.

[My species is one that arose on our homeworld living as a symbiotic life form, primarily. Our home world was rich in intelligent life; that much I remember. My galaxy's Ruler bred us to be the ultimate life form... capable of jumping from host to host, each time gaining more power and increasing our fighting strength to a level our future foes would surely not be capable of matching. I used the word 'symbiotic' to describe my people, but in truth, we might be better described as... parasites, feeding on the power of our hosts to strengthen ourselves.]

The Sphinx conjured an image of a world, one which appeared hazy and indistinct. It was clear at a glance that the memory of this world was so badly faded and poorly memorized that the Sphinx could only imagine it in the way a half-asleep man might remember a dream from earlier in the day. It had no discernible details, beyond possessing landmasses, a watery surface, mountains, and other bog-standard features any 'ordinary' paradise-class world might possess.

[Many formidable life-forms lived in our home galaxy, and all of them arose from the Seed World.] The Sphinx explained. [My people possessed the creatures of our world and Uplifted them to become formidable sentients before we spread out among the stars. We built ships of steel, with gravimetric warp drives and all sorts of other technological wonders that allowed us to colonize the stars.]

[I was born long after the spread of my people had begun.] The Sphinx explained. [Thus, I do not know the details of our origins, nor how long it took for us to populate the stars. When I was born, I was placed into the body of a host creature who became my first Bonded. I was born among the species known as Kessu, a species that came to define my current appearance. Earth is a fascinating world, one I have long observed through the eyes of my previous hosts, including the creature you knew as 'Bahamut.' It possessed many forms of life similar to the one from my home galaxy, and among them are the thousands of variations of creature known as 'cats'. The Kessu were similar to the 'cats' you know.]

Phoebe nodded slowly. Some of this went over her head, but she wasn't an idiot. She could roughly understand what he was talking about. The Sphinx looked a lot like a tiger, so clearly there were cat attributes involved in his physiology.

[Before I continue, I should clarify something important.] The Sphinx patiently explained. [I am the Sphinx, but that is not actually my name. I adopted the name along with the few remaining members of my kind, several Eternities in the past. We chose the name in honor of our fallen species. As for my original name, it has been lost to time. After the Devourer took the majority of my remaining essence, I lost much of my memories, and I became the pale shadow you see before you now. Faded, dissipating slowly over time... I fear I may be the last Sphinx in the universe, but I have no way of truly knowing.]

"So you are not actually named Sphinx?" Phoebe asked.

[No. But you may refer to me as such. It matters not.] The Sphinx said. [I only wished to clarify so there won't be any confusion later. My species was the Sphinx, and I later adopted the species name as my own name, long after the majority had perished to the annals of history.]

The Sphinx continued. [In any case, while my appearance closely models that of my first host, that is only because of the deep bond we shared. My host inevitably died in battle, as did the hosts of so many other Sphinx over long, long periods of time. When that happened, I was saddened, but I adapted and jumped bodies into the being who had killed my host. Later, that entity also died in battle, and I jumped bodies into the next. And so on, and so forth, this continued until the end of my Eternity, the first Eternity where the Sphinx dominated more than one hundred galaxies!]

A look of pride gleamed in the Sphinx's eyes.

[My people were formidable. We spread out and conquered so many galaxies it would make your little mortal head spin. When our first Eternity ended, we entered the next Eternity a hundred times stronger, and conquered even more galaxies! Our rise seemed unstoppable! But alas, all good things eventually come to an end.]

He shook his head wryly, causing the hairs on his mane to softly wave, as if blown by a light breeze.

[I no longer remember what caused our downfall. I know it involved a civil war among the Allied Sphinx Consortium. I know that brother fought sister for dominance, and outside forces eagerly goaded the war along. Ultimately, the Sphinx Empire fell as other Rulers became aware of our abilities and found innovative ways to subdue us.]

The Sphinx panned out his paws.

[Listen well, child. What made my people so fearsome was our innate ability to jump bodies. You remember the power of King Arthur, yes? Of course you do. Imagine that he were to smite you dead where you stand. I, the Sphinx inside you, would jump into his body, taking control of a more powerful host! Or at least, I would have been able to do so in the ancient past, before the Devourer took my essence away. Nowadays, I am little more than an errant soul passing my abilities on to the new possessor of my power.]

"Who is the Devourer?" Phoebe asked, realizing he had mentioned this entity twice.

[I wish I could tell you.] The Sphinx said, shaking his head. [When I entered this Eternity, I still possessed the majority of my ancient power, but I entered the body of someone too formidable for me to control. He seized back control, stole most of my abilities, and attempted to eradicate me. I survived only by feigning death and jumping to a new host, but my memories, my thoughts, and my very essence had been plundered. As such, I remember less than one percent of 'who I am'. In my prime, I could easily control the thoughts and actions of someone like you, let alone a weak little mortal such as Bahamut.]

Phoebe tensed up. She suddenly realized this Sphinx was not benign at all, and if he was telling the truth, she could have become his enslaved thrall if he were only a little bit stronger.

Luckily, the fact he was telling her this showed that he had lost all hope in restoring his power. He was only a faded memory of the Sphinx he once used to be.

After a moment, Phoebe's shoulders relaxed. "You... cannot control me?"

[Not anymore.] The Sphinx said. [Even if I miraculously regained my power a minute from now, I would not bother trying. I have long grown tired and lonely of existing. After the Devourer took my essence, I realized I no longer had the power to live on past this Eternity. As such, I have been looking for an inheritor to acquire what remains of my power.]

The Sphinx's eyes roved up and down Phoebe's body. [Jarnof was weak, servile, and inadequate. Bahamut was greedy, rapacious, and foul. You, however... you are quite pleasing to my eyes. I have looked upon the memories of your past and found you to be somewhat worthy.]

Phoebe's heart jumped. "Wait... no, I think you have the wrong idea in mind. I am unworthy, great Sphinx."

[I told you before, your humility seems a virtue in the eyes of other humans, but to me, it reveals a lack of ambition. That is the reason I took the opportunity to speak to you, rather than immediately grant you what remains of my power. I still harbor doubts regarding your capabilities, or at least your mindset.]

The Sphinx frowned. [A Sphinx has the power to grant all of their abilities to a host, dying in the process. Few have ever chosen to do this. It does, after all, mean the end of our long-lived existence. My telling you this should make clear my intentions.]

"You want to die?" Phoebe asked in bewilderment. "But why? You said it yourself. You might be the last of your species."

[Either I am the last, or I am one of the last. The distinction no longer matters to me.] The Sphinx replied. [I am old, Phoebe. Older than you can possibly imagine. I have lived through one hundred and forty seven eternities. Think of it. You humans barely live to a hundred years. If each of those years was the length of an entire universe's lifespan, then I have lived as long as one and a half of the longest lived among your centenarians.]

That comparison shook Phoebe's mind. She lowered her eyes and stared at the ground, many thoughts swirling around in her head. It was at this moment she truly grasped just how unfathomably ancient the Sphinx was, or at least she grasped a tiny speck of understanding. She could never truly grok his current emotional state.

"So you are seeking an inheritor. Why?" Phoebe eventually asked, raising her head once more. "To carry on the traditions of your people?"

[No. Divines, no.] The Sphinx chuckled dryly. [My people have already been forgotten by the universe, save for the memories of the longest-lived Rulers still residing among the Cosmos. I don't care if my people are remembered anymore. If you wish to learn about us, I will educate you, but it is not my main reason in seeking an inheritor.]

The Sphinx sighed. [No, my reason is more boring than that. I may seem a long-lived immortal to the likes of you, powerful and mentally above the meager concerns of fleshly mortals. But in fact, I still have certain mortal inclinations that hold me back from terminating my existence. I don't want my entire life, my long long existence, to have been lived in vain. I do not wish to see all my accumulation thrown out like garbage.]

Phoebe was enlightened. "I see. So you think I would be a good inheritor, preserving what remains of your existence and even some of your memories, while you finally get to enjoy a peaceful rest knowing you left a mark on the cosmos."

[Good, very good.] The Sphinx praised, with the faintest smile. [It seems you're not the dullard you believe yourself to be. I sense there's more to you than even you know. Right now, you are not worthy of my power. But, perhaps knowing that such a reward is waiting for you someday, you may work harder, fight harder, and train your mind, spirit, and body to become a mortal worthy of my Gift.]

The Sphinx scratched a claw against his chin-fur thoughtfully. [I only gave a small portion of my power to Jarnof and Bahamut, as was the tradition among my people, but I did not speak to them or enlighten them as I am doing for you now. To be blunt, they were unworthy, especially that vile creature, Bahamut. Since I have shown myself to you, that should indicate in your mind that I am pinning a certain amount of hope on your future accomplishments, little one.]

A long pause followed. The Sphinx shrugged nonchalantly.

[Of course, you may end up dying, and I shall pass on to the one who slays you. Maybe they will be more worthy, or maybe they will not. The main reason I wish to find an inheritor is also due to one final reason…]

This time, the Sphinx paused for several long, drawn out seconds. His gaze became cloudy.

[The Devourer took my longevity from me. I am incapable of surviving this Eternity. I will perish at the end, no matter what. Only by finding an Inheritor can I potentially pass on my essence to the next Eternity, and the one after it, and the one after that as well. I will no longer be alive to 'enjoy' such an existence, but at least there will be the chance the heritage of my people continues long after I am gone. That is something worth celebrating.]

"I thought you didn't care if your people's heritage disappeared?" Phoebe challenged.

[I don't. Not in the abstract sense.] The Sphinx retorted. [But still… my weak inner self would hate if the Sphinx's legacy perished forever. Call it a selfish regret that holds me back from ascending my mind and spirit to the highest level, but I would prefer that at least a portion of our heritage survives.]

Phoebe sensed that her time with the Sphinx was drawing to an inevitable conclusion. This was the moment of truth, a crucial decision that would shape the rest of her life.

She did not rush into a decision. Instead, Phoebe sat down in the darkness, lowered her head, and closed her eyes.

She thought about many things, a great number of questions that needed answering before she could make a decision.

What sort of person was she?

What sort of person did she want to become?

Was she happy with the way her life had played out so far?

Would she be happy if it kept playing out in the way it had up to now?

Did she have confidence in herself?

These thoughts, and more, slowly rolled around in Phoebe's craw. She squeezed her hands together in a sort of praying position, but she did not pray to any higher power. She simply focused her mind.

After a long while, Phoebe slowly opened her eyes. She looked up at the Sphinx.

"What is your true name?" Phoebe asked.

[It has been lost to time.] The Sphinx answered. [Even I do not recall.]

"That's a lie." Phoebe said, waggling a judgmental finger at him. "The truth, now."

The Sphinx's mouth curved up into a smile. [Alright, so it's a lie. But my true name is too imposing for mortal ears. I worry it might make you faint from lust.]

"Try me." Phoebe said. "If I'm going to be your Inheritor, then I have to trust you, and I can't trust someone when I don't even know their name."

[Oh? So you're already thinking of accepting?] The Sphinx teased. [And you're willing to boss me around, even. It appears Phoebe Berthold has more of a backbone than she thought.]

The Sphinx spread out his arms grandly. [Very well then. Let me speak my true name to you, Lady Berthold. In the ancient tongue of the Sphinx, I was once known as...]

He puffed out his chest in a most braggadocios manner.

[...ELRINHATHNELGORAMATHTANSUNGARSHIKUUL!]

A long silence followed. Phoebe's jaw slackened slightly, and she looked at the Sphinx's pompous pose with dazed eyes.

"I... I... could you say it again? But.. maybe... a little slower?"

The Sphinx snorted. He lowered his arms and smirked at her.

[Impressive, isn't it? Such a beautiful name that you even want to hear its melody from my lips once more.]

"No... I just... I didn't even catch it the first time." Phoebe said. "Can you repeat it?"

[Of course. My name is Elrinhathnelgoramathtansungarshikuul!] The Sphinx said proudly.

"I still didn't quite... can you say it slower? Like syllable by syllable? It sounds like a lion is roaring at me. I can't make out anything definitive."

By now, the Sphinx had realized... Phoebe wasn't kidding. She really didn't catch his name at all.

[It is pronounced... ugh... how embarrassing... it's... Elrin-hathnel-goramath-tansu-ngar-shikuul!]

He paused before adding, [My mother gave me the name. It forms a song with the rest of my family name that means 'the handsomest cub who will grow the longest mane!]

"I'm... just... going to call you... Elrin. Okay?" Phoebe asked. "My mortal mind is... too limited to appreciate the majesty of your True Name."

The Sphinx scowled. It was obvious he didn't like the thought of his beautiful name being shorted to such a tiny disyllabic sound, but clearly the mortals of this era could not handle it otherwise. He ultimately relented.

[Fine. Elrin it is.] The Sphinx grumbled, crossing his arms.

"Elrin is a beautiful name!" Phoebe praised. "And to us humans, it's very easy on the ears!"

Elrin was displeased, but arguing with a mortal, especially his Inheritor, was beneath his stature. So he begrudgingly changed the topic.

[Now that you and I have come to an understanding, Inheritor, we should resolve the external situation with great caution.]

"External situation? What do you mean by that, Lord Elrin?" Phoebe asked.

Elrin raised an eyebrow. He couldn't help but think 'Lord Elrin' was a bit more imposing than he'd initially expected. It might be a bastardization of his true name, but...

it wasn't the worst sound in the universe.

[I am referring to the group of people who are waiting for you to emerge from your meditation. Jason Hiro and the other teenagers. Jason knows more about the Sphinx than he should, and that fact worries me. I fear that he may not be as benign an individual as you perceive.]

Phoebe frowned. "I don't know Jason very well, but he seems a nice young man."

[Hah! Young to me, maybe. But to you? Your grandfather would call him great-grandfather. Even if he truly is a few hundred years old, it is nothing compared to the likes of me. I can see that he has some sort of selfish interest in empowering you with the lineage of the Sphinx, I simply don't know what it is. In either case, it is not appropriate for my Inheritor to be taking orders from a mere mortal like him.]

Elrin waved his paw grandiosely. [As such, you will need to work with me to play a little trick on the Wordsmith.]

Phoebe's frown deepened. She leaned backward, as if slightly recoiling from Elrin. "A trick? I don't know..."

[Deception is but one pillar in the art of war.] Elrin said matter-of-factly. [Tell me, Phoebe of Berthold, do you have a master? And if so, who are they? Is your master me? Is it Jason Hiro? Or is your master perhaps your fellow humans, who you will use your powers to serve and uplift?]

A moment passed as Phoebe pursed her lips.

"I do not have a master. I am my own master. Anything I would do for the Wordsmith, I would do out of gratitude, not because I placed myself below him."

[GOOD!] The Sphinx laughed. [You're already starting to get the picture! If you had said I was your master, I would have at least understood a little, but even I will pass on to the next realm someday, leaving you alone. For one who will eventually rise to the heights of the universe, you cannot look up to another; only to yourself.]

Elrin looked off into the distance, his appearance as majestic as the midday sun.

[It is lonely at the top, Phoebe Berthold. Never forget that fact. So long as you live an upright life and stand by the principles you believe in, you will become unbreakable. None will be able to taint your mind with witchcraft or skullduggery.]

After waiting to make sure his words had seemed into Phoebe's psyche, the Sphinx nodded.

[Now then. We must deceive the others. You mustn't tell them you have spoken to me. Keep my existence a secret. At the same time, you must demonstrate your worth to those currently surrounding you. I will not allow my future Inheritor to live her core years as the lackey of another, be they Wordsmith or Archangel or Demon Emperor or otherwise. As such, I will be granting you a small taste of the power that awaits you, should you continue to develop yourself properly.]

Elrin smiled. [Someday, when you have fully realized what becoming my Inheritor means, you will be able to properly appreciate the gift I am planning for you. But that day is still far from today, very far indeed...]

Phoebe stood up, then bowed heavily at the waist.

"Thank you, Lord Elrin." She said, her tone solemn. "I feel more at ease knowing you are here to protect and guide me. I was feeling out of sorts before I spoke to you, but now I have a bit more clarity than before. I cannot allow myself to be perceived as a bumbling ignoramus. It would besmirch your good name."

[Well said, Inheritor.] Elrin replied. [Now then, to begin, I must reshape your Mind Realm. It is barren and lackluster, but it seems you've already awoken a small spark of potential within. Given time, it may have blossomed into an average Mind Realm, but that is simply not good enough for the one who will take up my mantle someday.]

Phoebe sighed heavily. She once again felt that she was continuously wading further and further into a river without any visible banks on the opposite side. She only prayed she would be able to cross the river safely and make it to the other side without drowning.

"What must I do, Lord Elrin?" Phoebe asked.

Part 766: A New Berthold

January 29th, 2021. Aevum, 6PM Earth-time.

The Sphinx spent some time enlightening Phoebe. Lord Elrin was ancient and wise, and Phoebe could tell at a glance that he was a shrewd individual with long term goals far beyond her point of view. When an entity had lived for 147 Eternities, even the length of a single future Eternity was less than 1% the duration of his entire existence!

As such, a mental map outlining Phoebe's immediate future potential was extremely simple for him to create. After taking time to get to know each other better, the Sphinx smiled down at Phoebe.

[You have more potential than I expected. Your brain is like a sponge; you soak up anything I teach you. I will continue to modify your Mind Realm slowly over the next several years, as this is the most stable and painless method of improving a person's mental capacities.]

Phoebe bowed her head respectfully. "Thank you, Lord Elrin. You've given me a future I can look forward to."

[We've only just begun.] Elrin said. [Someday soon, I will introduce you to the true power of my people. Our ability to bio-engineer life to surpass its limits is not something the other mortals you know would be able to easily comprehend.]

"Bio-engineer?" Phoebe asked.

[You are not yet ready for this information. You are already overwhelmed by all the knowledge of this 'futuristic' society you've landed in, primitive though it may appear to my ancient eyes. Too much information in too short a time will not serve you well, but will instead harm you. Better to try and take things a little more slowly so you are able to fully comprehend the Truths laid out before you.]

Elrin grandly waved his paw.

[You may go, now.]

Phoebe felt the darkness of her mind slowly start to fade away. A tiredness swept over her. She felt as if she had fallen asleep.

A moment later, she opened her eyes again. This time, she found herself back in the gymnasium where she had first started to follow Jason's orders. Phoebe raised her head and looked around. The gymnasium was... emptier than before. Almost all the teenagers were gone. Only Nadia remained, but now, Daisy was beside her as well. That was unexpected.

Nadia was reading a book and laying in a bean-bag chair. She looked bored. Daisy was sitting on her knees in front of Phoebe, staring at her intently. She had a look of apprehension on her face.

Daisy jumped to her feet shakily when Phoebe lifted her head.

"D-dad! DAD! She's awake!"

Phoebe flinched. She didn't expect Daisy's reaction to be so extreme. A moment later, Jason appeared beside Daisy and looked down at Phoebe. His expression didn't carry so much 'worry' in the way Daisy's did, but maybe a bit of apprehension.

"...Welcome back to the world of the living, Phoebe. Are you feeling... okay?"

Phoebe looked at Jason, then at Daisy, then back at Jason. Invisible question marks popped up over her head.

"Yes...? Is something wrong?"

"I don't know." Jason said quietly. "I put you in a trance to access the Sphinx's powers, but then you seemed to fall into a coma. I couldn't wake you up. If your vitals weren't stable and it didn't seem as if you were otherwise okay, I might have started taking drastic measures to awaken you."

He paused.

"Phoebe, do you know how long you were 'meditating'? It's been more than ten hours."

"Ten hours?!" Phoebe gasped. She started to jump to her feet in shock, but when she leaped upward, she accidentally launched herself skyward, gasping involuntarily as she felt the ground vanish from underneath her feet.

The ceiling rushed toward Phoebe's face. She opened her mouth to scream, but before a sound could escape her lips, she slammed against it like a bug against a windshield. Her body splatted as if she had fallen upward at terminal velocity, and then she immediately bounced off the ceiling and fell back toward the ground.

"Shit- Phoebe!" Jason cried out. "Gah!"

He didn't even need to verbalize a specific word. Jason instantly cast a Word of Power with a single syllable, catching Phoebe before she could slam into the ground. His heart pounded like drums in a parade, apprehension and fear written all over his face. A split-second later, he cast another Word of Power to analyze Phoebe's body and see if she was still alive, if she'd broken anything, and how badly she had hurt herself.

What he saw left him stunned.

"You're... you're okay?" Jason asked, his words coming out in a single breath.

"I am??" Phoebe repeated, as Jason lowered her to the ground. She touched her face and arms, trying to check for any pain, but she didn't feel as if anything was injured.

A long moment of silence followed. Nadia had already stood up and run over by this point. She looked Phoebe up and down.

"Wow. That Sphinx power-up is something else." Nadia said after a moment.

Phoebe and the others seemed to realize something. Jason examined Phoebe again with fresh eyes. "How... how did this happen? Your entire body, your skeleton, your muscle structure, everything has a higher baseline value than it did before. It's like you've become five- no, ten times stronger just by meditating."

"I... don't know." Phoebe said. "I, um, I closed my eyes, everything was black... and then I opened them, and this happened. I'm as clueless as you."

Phoebe carefully repeated the lie the Sphinx had told her to say. Since the Sphinx had empowered her, it wouldn't be right for her to betray his trust and reveal his presence.

Jason questioned her a little more, but he didn't seem to notice anything amiss.

"Bahamut wasn't a particularly strong woman..." Jason eventually said, as he turned away and started stroking his chin, analyzing Phoebe's situation thoughtfully. "She was merely an ordinary Egyptian slave girl during her lifetime. The powerup she got from the Sphinx wasn't too extreme as a result. But Phoebe, you were a Knight of the Round. It seems you had a lot more potential for the Sphinx's power to pull from."

Unspoken, in Jason's mind, he also thought about Blinker and Kar.

Kar was a crocodile, powerful in body, so when he became the Sphinx, he became as strong as a Demon Emperor. Blinker was already at that level, so it seems her strength couldn't go much higher. The Sphinx must have raised Phoebe's strength up tremendously, definitely more than it did for Bahamut. It seems she's become a powerhouse, as I hypothesized would happen.

While Jason was debating the current circumstances, Daisy was just relieved her mother hadn't instantly broken all the bones in her body and died. What a tragic end that would have been!

The father and daughter were relieved, and they easily explained the situation away to themselves thanks to their future knowledge.

Nadia, however, was different. She looked at Phoebe with an outsider's perspective while also possessing Jason's knowledge of the future. Whenever Phoebe explained that 'all she saw was blackness', Nadia subtly shook her head.

She knew. She could tell Phoebe was lying. But she didn't say anything. She decided not to tell Jason.

"Mo- I mean, Phoebe, let's do a little sparring!" Daisy said excitedly, nearly blurting out Phoebe's 'title' of 'mom'. Luckily, she caught herself in time. "I'll go easy on you. Let's see if we can acclimate yourself to your new strength."

Phoebe was in a bit of a daze, seeing that Daisy's expression had changed so dramatically from the anger she showed earlier. She nodded along to Daisy's request. "Okay..."

Jason grabbed a pair of wooden swords. They were Wordsmithed so that they could not cause any damage to anything at all. Even if Daisy swung them with all her strength at a bug stuck to the side of a pillar, the swords would stop on impact, causing the bug no harm. As such, Daisy and Phoebe could use their full strength without worrying about hurting each other.

Hearing that Phoebe had awakened, the other teenagers returned. Some of them were a little bleary-eyed. Clearly, they had fallen asleep and were forced to wake up so they wouldn't miss the eye-opening spar that was about to take place.

Jerome stretched his back as he walked in. "Heard the new lady got stronger. Maybe me and her can do a little fighting, eh?"

"You're such a meathead." Brian Bozzard teased. "All you think about is fighting."

"Cuz it's what I'm good at." Jerome sneered. "Can't a brother have a hobby?"

"I just hope nobody gets hurt." Farrah said quietly, as she hugged Jerome's side.

"It'll be fine." Marco said. "Those Noodle-Swords are crazy. You can't feel a thing when someone hits you with one."

As the teenagers chatted, Phoebe and Daisy squared up in the arena. Daisy's heart was fluttering. She couldn't believe she was really looking her mother in the eyes.

When she heard Phoebe had fallen into a coma, she had rushed over without thinking. She was panicked and afraid, thinking she might lose Phoebe again. But now that Phoebe was up and moving about, totally fine, Daisy was at a bit of a loss. She had trouble adjusting to the fact that her 'mother' didn't know who she was, had no attraction to her father, and was basically a stranger. Daisy wanted to hug her, and cry on her shoulder, and tell her about everything she'd missed... but this women wasn't Phoebe Hiro.

She was Phoebe Berthold. A completely different person.

Daisy lifted her sword. Even if mom doesn't know who I am, I'll make her remember me. Dad's definitely going to think of a way to bring her future memories back. He doesn't have the willpower to hold off forever, especially when he realizes we can still be a family again!

Since that's the case, I'll have to leave a good impression on Mom. When she does regain her memories, she'll be so proud of me... she'll burst into tears! It'll all be worth it then.

Of course, Daisy knew that not having her mother and father for 12 years was not something that could easily be resolved, but she just couldn't bring herself to care anymore. One month ago, she had no hope of ever seeing her parents again. How could she dwell on the past when a bright future was waiting right in front of her?!

"Hello again, Daisy." Phoebe said. She pivoted her blade upward so the wooden sword was positioned right between her eyes. "I'm sorry about what happened earlier. I didn't mean to make you cry."

"There's no need for apologies." Daisy said firmly. "I was taken off-guard, but I'm not a little girl anymore. I'm a woman now. A strong woman! I'll make you see that for yourself."

Phoebe raised an eyebrow. The girl was talking so familiarly about Phoebe... just how much did Phoebe resemble her mother?

The poor thing. Phoebe was despondent, imagining the anguish and pain of separation Daisy must have felt. For a moment, she wished she really were Daisy's mother, if only so she could comfort her properly... but of course, a sweet lie was still a lie, and Phoebe would never allow herself to deceive someone.

Well, she did suppose a little deceit was okay sometimes, such as hiding Elrin's existence. But... that was different. She just couldn't elucidate why.

After a moment of silence, Daisy suddenly lunged forward. Her movements were swift and practiced. She was not a sword-user, generally, but she had been mentored by many professional trainers of several different fighting disciplines, thanks to her Uncle Vasily, who always gave his adopted daughter whatever she asked for, and whatever she needed.

Daisy slashed at Phoebe, and Phoebe seemed to be standing still, her body unmoving from disbelief.

The instant before Daisy's sword would have sliced against Phoebe's stomach, Phoebe rotated her body and stepped to the side. Daisy's slash missed by a millimeter, and she almost lost her balance as her target dodged at the very last second.

"Huh?" Daisy grunted, looking at her mom in shock.

She recovered and leaped at Phoebe again, using her telekinesis to enhance her movements. She was fierce and swift, and did not dare to take Phoebe lightly. If she ended up beating Phoebe too easily, she would simply apologize later.

At least, that was her rationale. It was what she expected to happen.

Once again, Daisy cut toward her mother's backside with an impossibly fast slash, but Phoebe side-stepped the attack with a sort of ease that could usually only come from a battlefield veteran. She didn't look at Daisy with any sort of smugness or condescension, she simply moved with such fluidity that it was as if she were toying with a toddler.

Daisy followed up with three quick slashes, but Phoebe casually ducked, dodged, and side-stepped the attacks, each time causing Daisy to miss her body with such a small margin of error that Daisy often swore she'd touched Phoebe's clothes.

But she hadn't! Jason and the others watched the fight, with many of the teenagers feeling confused.

"What the heck? Didn't Daisy whoop Jerome's ass?" Marco asked, ignoring the glare that came at him from his side. "Is Phoebe actually a really good fighter?"

"I wouldn't have believed this was possible if I didn't see it myself." Brian said with a frown. "I thought Daisy was unbeatable, but the new lady is really, really talented. She makes it look easy, but even Muhammad Ali wouldn't cut it so close. It's like she's deliberately using as little energy as possible to evade every attack to conserve her stamina while wasting Daisy's in much greater measure."

As surprised as the teenagers were, and Daisy, too, nobody was more blindsided and shellshocked than Jason. His eyes went wide. He had known the Phoebe of the future, and while she definitely kicked his ass when they were younger, Jason was 100% certain she had never been this monstrous at any point, even six years later, right before she died, when she was at her 'peak' as far as he knew.

Either she had been holding back in the future era, which made no sense, or her abilities had skyrocketed. The most obvious explanation was the Sphinx, again!

Daisy started to perspire. She attacked Phoebe over and over, swinging wildly, trying to feint and trick her mother, and she even started playing dirty, using her telekinesis to root Phoebe in place.

But nothing worked! Even when Daisy raised the gravity around her mother tenfold to try and press her feet into the ground, Phoebe's movements only slowed down a little, but she continued to effortlessly dodge her daughter's attacks with great ease. Her strength was great enough that the increased gravity didn't really affect her much, and only forced her to compensate. Daisy spent more energy focusing her telekinesis than Phoebe did overcoming it.

Daisy's sweating turned into heavy breathing. Pretty soon, she started gasping for air. She couldn't believe what was happening! Her mother was the one making her look like a fool! Daisy couldn't land a single hit!

"D-do you only know how to dodge?!" Daisy finally shrieked, pausing for a moment to cough. Her chest heaved up and down, and the back of her throat was fiery-hot. She wanted to chug a gallon of water just to cool off. She had never, not once in her entire life, been brought to such a state by merely attacking the empty air!

"Sorry..." Phoebe said slowly. "I don't even know what's going on. I'm not even trying to dodge you. I just keep getting these 'feelings' and they make me react before I know what's happening. I've been so preoccupied with trying to figure them out that I wasn't paying attention. I'll try to fight you properly now."

Daisy's face fell. "You mean to tell me you weren't even paying attention to our fight?!"

"I, um... not really..." Phoebe said, feeling embarrassed. "I'm sorry. I'm not trying to humiliate you, sweetheart. I just... I don't know what's going on with me."

Daisy glanced over at the other teenagers. Everyone was looking at her with eyes full of pity, a fact that made her want to crawl in a hole and die.

It was only now that she understood why her dad must have fallen in love with Mom. Phoebe was insanely strong. Daisy had a long way to go before she could match up to her parents!

I was too childish, thinking I could easily best one of King Arthur's strongest warriors. Daisy thought somberly. My mom is totally kick-ass! I'm gonna try and learn as much as I can from her!

Daisy had no idea of the truth. She just assumed this was her mother's normal combat power, perhaps amplified by her new bodily strength.

But Jason knew that what was happening to Phoebe was a huge alteration from the future Phoebe he loved. This younger Phoebe had turned into a god of combat after a brief meditation period, making Jason ponder on what the hell the Sphinx's power was really all about. Jason didn't know Bahamut well, and Kar was a bit of a lunkhead, but Blinker was highly intelligent, and she'd never told him about something like this happening to her.

Then again, Blinker hadn't been the Sphinx for long before she lost the power to Zamiel, who then fell to Mephisto's machinations. Perhaps she never got to truly investigate what it was capable of?

While Jason pondered, Phoebe went on the attack! She rushed forward and hefted her sword, slashing horizontally toward Daisy's waist. Daisy grinned, then bent her body, using telekinesis to augment her movements. She was able to perform a low-back-bending dodge that caused Phoebe's sword to slice across the empty air where her chest had been only a moment before.

Daisy spun like a fairy on her toes, zipped to the side and turned to face her mother. Before she could complete a revolution, she felt a light impact on her back.

Daisy's eyes widened. She realized that somehow, Phoebe's sword had struck her back! It didn't hurt at all, and Daisy barely even felt it, but she was perfectly familiar with the sensations of the 'noodle swords' striking flesh. Jason had demonstrated what the swords felt like for all the teens so they knew they were in no danger when training with them.

Daisy looked at her mother in disbelief. "You hit me?"

"I-I'm sorry!" Phoebe exclaimed, pulling away with a look of worry on her face. "Did I injure you, Daisy? I thought Jason said these swords couldn't hurt a fly!"

Daisy looked at the sword in her mother's hands. Her expression was a mixture of shock and awe, as well as disbelief. "No, you- you didn't hurt me, but... I couldn't even see..."

Daisy failed to get the words out. Her mother was a goddamned monster! With her instructions, Daisy was sure to raise her combat capabilities threefold at the minimum! She wasn't even mad or embarrassed anymore, because one simply couldn't feel embarrassment when outclassed by such an expert. A loss was simply inevitable!

"Again!" Daisy shouted.

Like this, the two women started exchanging a torrent of blows. Daisy yelped again and again as Phoebe's sword lightly struck her rump, her chest, her shoulders, her back, even her throat and face!

Once Phoebe realized her sword couldn't cause Daisy any harm, she took the fight a lot more seriously. Her speed increased, and her movements rapidly became more refined. If Daisy was taking a blow every few seconds before, she began taking a blow every second afterward, and then two blows a second.

Eventually, Daisy dropped to her knees, gasping for breath. She was soaked with sweat from physical exertion, but her eyes were shining with brilliance.

"I- I submit!" Daisy said, raising a palm. "You're incredible, mo- I mean, miss Berthold. I don't stand a chance!"

Phoebe stood stably on the stage, and unlike Daisy, she wasn't breathing heavily at all. She looked like she'd gone for a light jog, at most. Jason and the others noticed this difference, with the teenagers crowing in excitement.

"We've gotta fight now!" Jerome shouted. "Hey lady- I mean, Phoebe! Spar with me! I wanna test my strength against you, right here and now!"

Phoebe hesitated. The young man was quite tall, and his body was physically imposing, but Phoebe wasn't sure which of the two of them was stronger.

"Well, alright..." Phoebe said hesitantly. "I guess that's okay."

"GREAT!" Jerome crowed. "And let's ditch the swords. I know you're strong! Let's match strength!"

"Hold on a second." Jason said, frowning. "The swords are best used for situations like these. Phoebe is still adjusting to her new strength."

"Heh, don't worry, Trueborn. I'll go easy on her." Jerome said, giving Jason a thumbs-up, along with a wink.

"I... that isn't exactly what I meant." Jason grumbled.

"It's fine. I'll fight him." Phoebe said, tossing her sword aside. "Let's try grappling. It's a good match of direct strength."

"Sure, but we'll arm-wrestle first just to compare strength directly." Jerome said.

This was agreeable to both of them. Jason set up a stone table with cushions for both their elbows, and like this, Jerome and Phoebe placed their palms in each other's grasp and looked their opponent in the eye.

Phoebe was smaller than Jerome, and her hand was much tinier than his. Keeping to his word, Jerome didn't go overboard. He took the match seriously, but didn't treat it as a life and death battle.

"Hrrrgh!" Jerome groaned, as the arm-wrestling began.

"Grrrr!" Phoebe growled back.

She tried, she really did. But as the seconds ticked by, Jerome started pulling Phoebe's hand backward, then he eventually pressed the back of her hand flat against the table.

The match was over in only twenty-four seconds. Jerome won handily, and it seemed he still had strength in reserve. From this, Jason and the others could tell Phoebe was not his match physically. It seemed the Sphinx power-up hadn't skyrocketed her strength to the point she was more muscular than Jerome.

"Alright!" Jerome said. "Now... are you still okay with doing some wrestling?"

Phoebe nodded. "If I lose, then I lose. It's fine either way."

"That's a good attitude!" Jerome praised. "It don't matter if you win or lose, just that you always learn from your defeats!"

The two of them stood up and squared off in the arena. Jerome grabbed Phoebe's hands and tried to throw her to the mat, but she pulled backward instead and threw him off-balance. Jerome grunted as he stumbled slightly, then Phoebe swept his legs and sent him to the mat. She tried to get on top of him to pin him down, but Jerome was a full foot taller than her. He rolled and tossed Phoebe aside, laying her out on the ground, then he tried to pin her as well.

However, Phoebe was slippery like a snake. She wormed her way out of his grasp and rolled underneath his huge body, then grabbed his leg and pulled it away, making him land face-down on the mat. Phoebe managed to jump on Jerome's back and wrap an arm around his throat, so he threw himself in reverse and slammed onto his back, pounding Phoebe against her back as well!

"Rrrrgh, shit!" Jerome cursed, as Phoebe stubbornly kept an arm wrapped around his throat. He tried to pry her off, but he couldn't get the leverage he needed. Phoebe wrapped her legs around his waist, then spun him to the side, once again pinning him to the floor.

Ten seconds later, it was over. Phoebe won, but this time she genuinely looked tired. It seemed she was barely able to beat Jerome's raw strength with technique, but if it had been a true life and death battle, it was anyone's guess who would have won.

"Man, shit. Shit." Jerome cursed after the battle was over. He rubbed his jaw soothingly, looking Phoebe up and down. "You're strong as hell, girl. I really thought I had a chance at the start."

"You were too brutish." Phoebe said, surprising even herself as she analyzed the battle in her head. "You rely on your superior strength too much. Your technique is poorly developed, and your agility is insufficient. I was able to surpass you by pushing my body to its limits."

She paused before adding, "Still, I could tell you were trying not to hurt me, because if you were, I'd probably have lost. One solid punch and I'd be knocked out cold."

"Punching's against the rules when you grapple someone." Jerome pointed out.

"Yes, but in a theoretical life and death battle, rules don't truly apply." Phoebe said.

"You ain't wrong." Jerome agreed thoughtfully.

After a bit more back and forth, Jason finally intervened.

"Everyone, it's been a long day. I think we should all give Phoebe some space and let her adapt to her improved body." Jason said. "Daisy, why don't you help me take Miss Berthold home?"

Daisy nodded obediently. "Alright, dad."

With this, Jason dismissed everyone but his daughter and Phoebe. They all left, including Nadia, and just like that, the three of them were alone again.

"Well, Phoebe, if I said I was impressed by your strength, I'd be underselling it." Jason said with a smile. "Truly overwhelming. I was right to give you the Sphinx's power. I'll be relying on you in the future, if that's okay with you."

Phoebe nodded solemnly. "I will not let you down. Now that I have this power, I intend to use it responsibly."

"That's good, but first, I'd like to take you in for a medical examination." Jason said. "For your body to grow this strong, this quickly, I want to make sure there aren't any side effects. Are you okay with that?" Jason asked. "We'll also get an accurate measurement of your strength, test your reflexes, and other such things."

Daisy nodded along to her father's words, clearly excited by the thought of simply spending time with both her parents. As for Phoebe, she hesitated...

To Phoebe, she was playing a dangerous game. She didn't want to alert the Wordsmith to the Sphinx's true existence, but she didn't want to lie to him either. And she wouldn't have met the Sphinx if it wasn't for Jason anyway, so she felt she owed him enough to at least do as he asked.

Of course, if Jason asked her to start butchering innocents, Phoebe would immediately turn against him. She really hoped he wasn't hiding an evil side of himself from her. He probably wasn't, but one could never be too certain when it came to the thoughts and desires of others.

"Well, alright." Phoebe eventually said. "But maybe tomorrow? I'm pretty tired after all this exercise."

"Oh, sure!" Jason said. "I thought you still had a lot of energy left. But by all means, sleep for a whole day or two if you want. We've got lots of time here."

Jason started to lead his daughter and Phoebe out of the gymnasium. As they departed, Phoebe looked up at the pitch-black sky with its false sun orbiting the tiny planet.

"That's true. We do have lots of time, due to the temporal dilation. You said it was 365 to 1, yes? So one day on Earth is a year here?"

Jason blinked. He looked at Phoebe with a strange gaze. "Yeah. I'm... surprised you understand it now. You seemed pretty baffled before."

"Well, that was then, and this is now." Phoebe said with a shrug of her shoulders. "It's merely a little temporal dilation. Heaven has it, and so do lots of other places. It's nothing too special, in the grand scheme of the universe."

"Ah... I suppose that is true." Jason mumbled.

Jason continued to walk with Phoebe and Daisy. Daisy started chatting her mother up, subtly trying to learn more about her past in the way an ordinary teenager would, all while reveling in the act of speaking to her mother for real!

But Jason didn't say much. Phoebe's abrupt enlightenment had spooked him.

Was there more going on with her than what he saw on the surface?

Part 767: Leader of Punishment

January 29th, 2021. 6PM Washington DC, 3AM Egypt.

At the base of Mount Sinai, the temperature was a comfortable 60F, or 15C. It was a warm night, despite being late in January, proof of just how warm the land of Egypt was year-round.

In the pitch-blackness of the pre-dawn hours, demons secretly milled around, with many Rumbler demons rapidly tunneling out and reinforcing a network of underground tunnels to hastily construct an underground fortification at their leaders' behest.

At this point, only two Demon Emperors had arrived on scene. They were Belial, leader of the Second Hell of Lust, and Diablo, leader of the Fifth Hell of Calamity. The others were scheduled to arrive much later in the day, after the main fortifications had been built.

Diablo paced back and forth atop the surface level of Saint Catherine's monastery. He grumbled under his breath, while Belial casually leaned against a wall, watching him with a bored expression on her face.

"What's bothering you now?" Belial asked casually. "You're always so antsy."

"Of course I'm 'antsy'." Diablo grumbled, casting her a quick glance. "We're not ready at all. This offensive wasn't supposed to happen for several more decades! And now we're trying to rush a million demons into position to assault Sinai in only a day or two?? Satan must have gone insane."

"He's not insane." Belial retorted. "We have no choice but to act now. We presumed the humans would never again have access to a Trueborn Hero, but now they have two. The situation is unprecedented."

"Obviously! But attacking Heaven of all places?!" Diablo snapped at her, finally pausing his pacing to meet Belial's gaze directly. "We haven't been able to scout them! We don't know how many Lazarites they have, and the number of Titans is a mystery as well. We don't know what defenses they've erected, we don't know if they've secretly brought any human weapons or vehicles into Heaven... we just don't know anything at all!"

He continued. "Even getting a single operative into Heaven requires a colossal amount of time and effort, and the few we've implanted are not able to easily pass their intel to us. We've also lost most of our agents who did manage to get inside due to them getting caught by Camael, the old bitch. This is a disaster waiting to happen!"

"Obviously." Belial said, glancing surreptitiously around, as if worried someone might overhear their conversation. "But we have no choice. We must act. Every day that passes, the humans will grow a little stronger as they consolidate around their two new Heroes."

"Ever since Harold Whittaker died, the humans lost any chance of unifying under a Hero." Belial added. "They became more and more fractured and divided, allowing us to manipulate and deceive them into fighting one another. But if things continue on this new path, we might face a unified humanity, unified angelkind, and even worse, a deepening of an alliance between the two. We have to strike now while the two sides are still disorganized."

Diablo squinted at Belial. "You're not usually the type to care about this sort of stuff."

"Neither are you." Belial shot back. "Aren't you usually napping and eating like a slovenly oaf?"

"Can't nap in peace if the humans get together and kill us all." Diablo grumbled, turning away. "But point taken."

"Yeah, and I only care because Satan does." Belial said. "So, in the meantime, help me whip these grunts into shape. The speed of construction is slowing down, and Satan wants this done by the end of today."

"Yeah, yeah." Diablo said, before stretching, popping his back, and sauntering off to yell at the lowest demon slaves in earshot.

After Diablo left, Belial stood on the spot for a short while, tapping her foot. There was a look of worry on her face.

Our people have low morale and little willpower. Their battle lust is at an all-time low. They have no desire to fight in this war. Surely, Satan has prepared for that?

She chewed on her thumbnail absentmindedly. The demons have grown more and more slovenly as time has passed. They spend more time sneaking into human 'movies' and consuming human content than they do thinking about how we will someday defeat the humans. Now Satan wants to launch a sudden assault on Heaven? Diablo's right. This will be a disaster. Millions, even billions of demons will surely die.

Belial was a relatively compassionate demoness, but even she didn't have it in her heart to care about a million faceless grunts she'd never seen or met. The Broodmothers would spawn more in the future, and more after them, and even more still far beyond those.

Though she didn't give much of a damn about a million demon deaths in the abstract, she worried about Satan and his ambitions. She was practically joined at the hip with her husband. He was her entire world, and whatever his worries were, she shared his burdens equally.

Satan had never stopped dreaming of a day when demons could fully control the Earth. The ancient hatred of the angels had sunk into his bones. He would never forgive them, never consider reconciliation, and never give up the fight.

Since Satan was functionally immortal in all ways that mattered, this meant his hatred would always be demonkind's burden to bear. As such, Belial had to consider him when thinking about the impacts of his future plans and strategies.

"Shit." Belial cursed. "We might need... his help."

Belial rubbed her face, feeling slightly depressed.

"Satan's going to make me do it, isn't he? I'm always the one who has to talk to him. That absolute lunatic. Why did we ever put him in charge of the Hell of Punishment? He's not right in the head."

The demon she was thinking of was none other than the current head of the Fourth Hell of Punishment. In the future, this leader would come to be Emperor Auger. But at this point in time, it was a different demon entirely, one who had been put in place due to his capabilities, if not his proper capacity for leadership.

In many ways, he was one of the strongest demons alive. But his personality on the other hand... nobody liked him, and everyone found him to be insanely irritating. If he didn't have the power needed for the position, he'd have been thrown out a long time ago.

Belial's momentary depression deepened. She felt as if she had aged a year in a minute, thinking of needing to talk to that bastard.

"He's so annoying." She mumbled. "I just know he's going to stare at my tits the whole time, too."

Belial glanced in the direction of Mount Sinai. At this moment, it was shrouded in an illusory formation that made it appear completely ordinary to anyone looking upon it from afar, even a modern news helicopter.

But Belial knew. Hidden within that formation were hundreds of Pureblooded Angels and thousands of Lazarites, all flying in the air or hidden in various outcroppings, waiting for the demons to launch a sneak attack at night.

Angels had night vision only slightly worse than demons, but far superior to humans. The Lazarites could summon bows that shot magical arrows capable of piercing through human tanks from a kilometer away.

The demons were going to launch a hastily thrown-together assault on Sinai soon. They would need all the help they could get... even if that meant getting someone like him to help. Belial wanted to die of embarrassment, just imagining talking to him.

But, well, the Fourth Hell of Punishment was situated in Central Europe, near the border of Germany, Poland, and Czechia. Since Belial was 'nearby', she might as well go and pay that bastard a visit. If she could secure his help now, she would surely make Satan's upcoming war proceed much more smoothly.

Belial looked up into the pitch-black night sky. The sun was still a couple hours away from creeping across the horizon. It was a good cover for her next move.

"Might as well be proactive. Than Satan will praise me." Belial muttered, smiling as she thought of her husband.

She spoke to a Warper nearby and transferred to a Warper Relay in Germany, close by her ultimate destination of the Fourth Hell's base. This saved her nearly 1800 miles of travel distance, and cut down the next part of her trip travel time substantially.

Belial stepped out into the open air on a quiet countryside, still late at night, and gritted her teeth. She tapped into her magical powers, then transformed into her True Succubus form, which covered her body in gray-colored dermal armor, and also caused her to sprout large bat-like wings. Her hands turned into claws, and her eyes became a deep yellow color, with predatory vertical slit-pupils that enhanced her distance vision, allowing her to spot things from even further away than her baseline demonic physiology already allowed.

The entire process took only thirty seconds. After she finished, Belial launched herself into the air and started flying at high speeds, much faster than if she were to run on foot.

Belial's top running speed was around 100 MPH (160 KPH). This was indeed extremely fast, especially as she could easily jump over obstacles and bypass barriers that would stop a human sportscar from moving that quickly in a straight line.

But even that speed was nothing compared to her flight speed in True Succubus form. If she flew in a straight line and focused entirely on acceleration with no obstacles to slow her down, her top speed ended up breaking past 350 MPH (563 KPH), which was actually not nearly as fast as most human flying machines, but her speed could further increase if she lucked out with a strong tailwind behind her.

And so, like this, Belial traveled a hundred miles in only fifteen minutes, surging across the sky while keeping an eye out for human weapons that might spot and fire at her. It was always risky, traveling out in the open air like this. Humans might not 'know' about the existence of demons, but the true rulers of humanity had long put in place tens of thousands of micro-contingencies to keep an eye on demonic movements.

If the battle at Sinai wasn't the most important thing she'd had to do in the last several hundred years, Belial would never have taken a risk like this. But for now, she didn't have a choice.

She flew through the skies and arrived at a small forest grove, seemingly ordinary, located at the boundary of three different European countries. One might expect there to be walls or other such clearly outlined borders here, but the local governments didn't have any worries about illegal aliens crossing here of all places, so they didn't bother.

As for the location of the Hell of Punishment's home base, like with all the other Hells, this was a closely guarded secret. Demons rarely traveled here directly, typically moving around the Earth via Warpers and underground tunnels.

Belial dove toward the ground. She de-transformed in midair, reverting to her ordinary succubus form, and fell into the treeline with practiced movements. Instead of crashing into the trees like a cannonball, she stretched out her right arm before her, pierced the tree canopy, and grabbed onto a large branch. She easily slowed her momentum down and gently fell into the underbrush, sliding down the trees and hopping from trunk to trunk until she lightly struck the forest floor.

As dark as it was at night, it was even darker inside the forest. Luckily, Belial's eyes were at the level of a Demon Emperor, so it was as easy to see for her as it would be for a human when the sun was dipping below the horizon. She wasn't able to see perfectly, but she could easily make out her surroundings.

Belial glanced around to get her bearings. She headed east, then stopped at one particular tree which had a unique look to it. It seemed as if a giant Elm had slowly bent over from the weight of its canopy over the years and eventually rested its 'head' against the ground, forming an arch one could walk through.

Belial strode under the arched tree, crossed her arms, and stood in place.

After five minutes, a female voice spoke. "Belial? What are you doing here?"

Belial turned to the side. She saw a beautiful demoness with long green hair approaching her, a woman who wore clothing made of leaves and vines, seductive, yet innocent in an untouched sort of way. She wore a crown of flowers, ones she re-grew daily with her abilities, always changing her fashion along with her whims. A cute little tail swung around behind her, flicking from side to side with catlike movements.

"Nymph." Belial said cordially. "I'm here to see... him."

"You are?" Demon Emperor Nymph asked. "But I thought you hated the big man?"

"My distaste has nothing to do with it." Belial said blandly. "There's a war coming, and soon. We need all the strength we can get, and your boss has been notably absent from Satan's summons."

"Well, you know us. We don't like to involve ourselves unless it's important..." Nymph said hesitantly.

"Tell it to someone who cares." Belial snarked. "Take me to him. I don't have time to waste."

"Aaalrighty then..." Nymph said, dragging out her words as if to allow Belial a chance to change her mind.

Sadly for Nymph, Belial did not. Nymph sighed.

"Oh, he's going to be so grumpy now." Nymph pouted.

Nymph waved her hand. A random patch of grass nearby split apart, revealing that the underbrush had been hiding a stairway down into the depths of the Earth. She led the way, striding down those stairs, while Belial followed behind.

"I can't believe you choose to stay here." Belial grumbled, as she walked behind Nymph, staring at the green-haired Demon Emperor's back. "Your boss is such a creep."

"He's a little ostentatious, but not such a bad guy once you get to know him. You simply have to watch out for his 'bad' days." Nymph explained.

"Sounds like something an abuse victim would say." Belial spat.

"He's not abusive at all, you just never let yourself get to know him." Nymph shot back, turning her head to glare at Belial.

The two women fell silent. Nymph led her hundreds of feet into the bowels of the Earth, where they arrived inside a gigantic underground space absolutely teeming with life. Demons were not the overwhelming majority of creatures living in the Fourth Hell of Punishment, but were matched head-for-head by goblins and minotaurs. The goblins had one primary job, and that was to dig out the bowels of the Earth, constantly enlarging the underground space. The minotaurs were the guards, always on the lookout for intruders.

There were demons present. Many of them, millions, all spread out in luxurious underground areas with high temperatures that would kill a human if they stayed down here for an hour or so. The sweltering heat didn't affect the demons, goblins, or minotaurs much. They were all quite fine with the heat, and most of them barely even felt it.

What made the Hell of Punishment stand out from the other Hells, architecturally, was its usage of flowers, plants, leaves, and other greenery. Emperor Nymph loved plants, and her handiwork could be seen everywhere. Vines coated the ceiling, supporting it and preventing cave-ins while also forming wooden candelabras that provided constant illumination.

There were pillars that were clearly trees growing underground, supporting the roof in addition to the vines. These tree-pillars were often carved and etched with various drawings by demon artisans.

The Hell of Punishment had an ominous name, but it was actually quite a free-spirited Hell, one filled with demons and monsters who spent most of their time engaging in raucous acts of sex and violence.

If there was one thing that the Hell of Punishment did that made it incompatible with modern human life, it was that it had a frightening number of sadistic demons who loved to inflict torture on other life-forms. Capturing humans from the world above, dragging them into the depths of the Fourth Hell, and tying them up while performing all manner of barbarous acts was by far the thing that most made them a pariah. If the humans ever uncovered the Fourth Hell's exact location, Judgment Day was sure to follow.

In terms of actual villainy, their only competition was the Seventh Hell of Corruption, ruled by Emperor Yama. And nobody wanted to interact with that sadistic rapist...

Belial looked around as Nymph led her down toward the heart of the Fourth Hell. Wherever they walked, eyes fell on their bodies. Demons and monsters alike crowed with excitement.

"Yooo, Nymph! Nymph, we're having an orgy in a little bit! Are you in??"

Nymph batted her eyes. "Not right now! Maybe later!"

Belial rolled her eyes. The truth was, Nymph might reside with the Fourth Hell, but she actually originated from the Hell of Lust. She was a succubus, like Belial, but she hated competing for the same pool of 'lovers' as the other succubi, so when she became a Duke, she transferred to the Fourth Hell to better monopolize a bigger pool of people. She had less competition here, and her innocent appearance was simply a facade to make herself more attractive to potential copulation partners.

"Great, see you then! And bring your friend, she's HOT!" The male demon cackled.

"You idiot, that's Belial!" Another demon shouted, slapping his friend over the head. "She'll beat your ass!"

"Great! Hey Belial, pin me down and beat me to a pulp, babyyy!!"

Belial remained stone-faced. In this life, she only loved Satan. No other demon held any place in her heart. She was completely and utterly loyal to him and him alone. She would have sex with other men and women, sure, but only if he ordered her to do so, usually for political reasons.

Belial had zero interest in anyone but her husband. In this regard, she was a weird succubus. She didn't have interest in multiple partners, and even though she'd been with the same man for thousands of years, she was still head over heels crazy for him. She'd do anything he asked, assume any position...

The moment the idiot male demons were out of sight, Belial forgot about them. If she hadn't heard a billion men shout lustful lines at her just like those, she'd certainly heard a million. At this point, they were like drops of rain sliding off a raincoat. They had zero impact on her whatsoever.

Ten minutes later, they arrived at the entrance to an underground garden. Belial rolled her eyes again when she heard the giggles of multiple women mixed with the grunts and groans of just as many men.

Nymph paused after they stepped inside the garden. Whatever was going on up ahead, it was hidden by a giant tree growing in the lightly-illuminated underground space. The tree itself had bioluminescent leaves that glowed with a gentle blue light.

"Do you want to wait?" Nymph asked.

"I'm in a rush. So no." Belial growled.

She stormed forward and rounded the corner to see a pile of male and female demons all intertwined together, moaning sexually while sucking, licking, and fucking each other, performing all sorts of raunchy acts. It wasn't anything she hadn't seen a million times.

"Alright! Fuck time's over!" Belial shouted, projecting her voice loudly enough to startle the pile of writhing red flesh. "I'm here with a message from Satan!"

A single male head turned to look at her. He was a handsome demon with shoulder-length black hair, slanted eyes, and pearly white teeth. He was also completely naked and currently deep inside a demoness Belial didn't recognize.

"Hey hey, I hear you, Beli!" The Male Demon Emperor said. "Gimme thirty minutes and I'll be done! Maybe sooner, if you wanna 'help' me out, eh?"

Belial's fingers suddenly transformed into knives. "How about I cut it off?"

"Ahhh, ahaha! I was just kidding, girl!" The boss of the Fourth Hell said, quickly pulling out and jumping up. He was a sorry sight, messy and unkempt, covered in all sorts of unmentionable juices and smells. "Let's not act hastily!"

Belial maintained her knife hands. "You ignored Satan's summons. Seems you've been getting a bit big for your britches."

"I was just waiting for him to ask me nicely, that's all!" The Emperor said, his two vampire fangs poking out of his mouth as he grinned sheepishly. "Now that you're here, that's good enough for me!"

The Demon Emperor was a thin man, lean and muscled, and he stood seven feet tell, half a foot taller than Belial herself. Even so, she felt a lot more fearsome, especially given that in terms of physical strength, she vastly outclassed him.

But what made the leader of the Fourth Hell so fearsome wasn't his physical body. Rather, it was his particular set of powers.

"Clean yourself up." Belial said. "You smell disgusting."

"Can't just interrupt a fella mid-boink and expect him to smell like roses." The Fourth Hell's leader retorted.

Belial sighed. She found his voice painfully annoying, but that was because of her deep devotion to Satan. It just so happened that his voice had a hypnotic effect on other women, making some of them fall deeply in love with him, and others became at least a little enamored, seeing him as extremely cute, sexy, or otherwise. The power of his voice was truly fearsome.

"Right. Well, whatever." Belial said, finally lowering her fingers and reverting them back to normal. "Satan moved up the schedule. We're going to be attacking Mount Sinai, and we need your help."

"Little old me?" He asked, touching his lip innocently.

"That's right. And you don't have the right to refuse, Emperor Morbius." Belial spat. "Don't think just because you rule one of the Seven Hells that you don't need to follow Satan's commands."

"Yes, yes, I know." Morbius said, as he strode over to a towel rack and started wiping his nude body clean. "Satan wants to swing his demonhood around and start a war, and I have to go out there and fight on the frontlines of his battlefield."

Morbius sighed as he looked up at the ceiling.

"Took the bastard long enough to finally make a move..."

Part 768: Unbreakable Vow

January 29th, 2021. 6PM Washington DC, 3AM Fourth Hell of Punishment.

Less than fifteen minutes passed before Emperor Morbius cleaned himself up and strode out to meet Belial again. He wore a bathrobe, allowing his unkempt hair to dangle down to his neck. Belial found his face to be quite thin, wiry, and 'pointy'. Not attractive by any means, yet Morbius was somehow a demon of great influence with the opposite sex, creating a whole cult of devotees who seemed to hang on his every word.

Belial had no idea how that happened, even if Demon Emperors in general were often flocked to because of their strength. Clearly, there was something magnetic about Morbius, but it simply didn't affect her at all.

"Hah, I apologize for the delay, Belial." Morbius laughed awkwardly, gesturing vaguely toward what could barely be called an 'outfit' he had donned. A black bathrobe exemplified his laziness perfectly. "Now that I'm decent, tell me what Satan needs. I'm all ears."

Belial rolled her eyes. She did that a lot whenever she was in Morbius's presence. His voice had an overly breathy tone to it, as if he were putting on a Shakespearean play for whoever he was speaking to. It made him sound melodramatic, but any attempt to point this out only resulted in looks of dismay or gasps of disbelief, as if he couldn't possibly understand what nonsense she was going on and on about.

"We're going to be attacking Heaven." Belial repeated, as she closed her eyes and raised a hand to massage the headache she was developing out of her forehead. "Satan wants to kill one or more of the Archangels, and as many Titan Kings as possible."

"Ambitious." Morbius said dismissively, his voice drifting into her ears like a termite burrowing into a dead tree. "I can understand his desire to eliminate our greatest enemy, but this is all so sudden. Why now? Weren't we going to wait a few decades to scout out the inner picture of Heaven? We have no idea what we're going up against."

"We have no choice." Belial grumbled, pressing her fingers harder against her forehead. "There are two Trueborn Heroes now. This is unprecedented. One of the Heroes is apparently a time traveler. He fought Emperor Ose and beat her handily. He has the ability to rewind time an infinite number of times, meaning it's very likely he already knows all our plans and has made contingencies for them. We don't know if he knows about our future assault on Heaven, the assault tomorrow, or an infinite number of variants we tried before and failed or possibly succeeded. We're at a complete loss when it comes to information warfare."

Have you tried contacting Yama?" Morbius suggested. "His Shades might be able to slip inside Heaven."

Belial opened her eyes. She did her best to ignore the fact that Morbius's eyes were, as always fixated on her chest.

"Heaven's Light pervades all corners of the realm." Belial said, carefully crossing her arms over her chest to obstruct his view. "Shades who enter Heaven will simply die. This is also why Yama won't be any help with the upcoming battle, unless we can find a way to diminish Heaven's Light dramatically."

Belial paused. She remembered an important fact at that moment. During the first War in Heaven, the demons did successfully manage to drastically dim Heaven's Light at the climax of the final battle. This was due to the power of the Archdemon... but nobody knew exactly how Diablo did it, including the man himself.

In the end, if the demons didn't know how to replicate the feat, and they had no way to sneak into Heaven to try and experiment, then it didn't really matter.

"We will need your power." Belial concluded. "Along with that of the other Emperors. Yama might not be of any use inside Heaven, but he will serve us well on the outside, where darkness and shadows reside. He can prevent unwanted entities from intruding."

"Fine, I'll do what I must then." Morbius said. "The Hell of Punishment will join this idiotic battle. You do understand this could result in a total wash for us, though? All the soft power we've built up over millennia will crumble if we suffer a catastrophic loss. Our threat will greatly diminish in the eyes of the humans."

Morbius might be a creep, but he wasn't an idiot. Belial had to acknowledge his words with a nod, even if she didn't want them to be true.

"Satan is aware, as am I and all the others. But we don't have a choice." Belial grumbled. "Taking out at least one Archangel will pay dividends in the future. Eliminating two or more could collapse the strength of one of our three enemy factions."

It was at this moment Morbius said something Belial never would have expected from the likes of him. "Has Satan considered the diplomatic option?"

"Excuse me?" Belial said, frowning.

"Satan seems to be operating under the assumption co-existence with the other species is impossible." Morbius said, fanning out his fingernails to look at them while he spoke. "I wasn't there during the original War in Heaven, so I don't really know what all went down. But surely even he has to understand how badly the deck is stacked against us?"

Morbius continued. "Right now, it's Demons and Monsters against Humans, Angels, and Titans. The humans have developed dramatically over the last two hundred years. Their 'machines' are already quite scary, and they seem to be getting more and more effective at killing us as time goes on. Your operating assumption that we are soon going to be 'screwed' now that the humans have two Trueborn feels flawed from the outset. From where I'm sitting, it seems as though we were already screwed just based on the humans' development speed. With or without a Hero, I don't think they're going to lose this war."

Belial was stunned. For once, Morbius wasn't even looking at her, or her tits. He was simply examining his nails, pulling that thought out of what she assumed was the black hole known as his brain.

"H-human machines aren't that strong." Belial protested. "Even I can take down one of their flying machines with ease."

Morbius met her eyes. His expression was serious, for once. "Of course you can. You're an Emperor. Any Emperor can stand up to one of their war machines; that's nothing worth bragging about. But what if ten of them surrounded you? A hundred? A thousand? What if they were determined, truly determined, to kill or capture you? What if they started deliberately tracking and hunting you? They can just keep shitting those metal behemoths out, and any ordinary human can control them. Could you withstand that level of force?"

The Fourth Emperor paused deliberately. "Could a Duke? A Baron? Let alone anyone weaker than them? And that's only talking about the machines we see and know about now. What about the ones covertly being developed behind closed doors? What if the Trueborn didn't show up and we continued on the path of attacking Heaven in a few decades? Don't you think the human weapons would become even more frightening compared to the ones we've seen up to now?"

Belial blinked. She hadn't given this matter much thought. She was caught off-guard by Morbius's line of questioning. Naturally though, she assumed the brilliant Satan had thought of these matters. Surely he had factored those questions into his logic and train of thinking.

"Well," Morbius said, after several long seconds of silence from his verbal-opponent, "it's not too late to change Satan's mind. I think we were screwed from the start. Diplomacy could keep our people alive and allow us to reap the rewards of symbiotically living alongside the humans. I don't know about you, but I'm quite tired of holing up underground, rarely getting to experience the warmth of the sun. It turns my skin a pale pink."

"Satan is also tired of living in the darkness." Belial finally said, recovering from her shock though she was still flustered. "That's why we need to claim the Earth for ourselves."

"It's not going to go well for us." Morbius observed. "I can see the writing on the walls. So can the other Emperors. They won't say anything, because everyone's afraid of pissing Satan off. We all know he owns our asses. The difference between me and them is that I'm more attached to enjoying my good life than I'm afraid of pissing Satan off. Though, yeah, I am still afraid of pissing him off. Rest assured, I'll follow orders and attack Heaven, but I just think this is an idiotic move that will likely cost us infinitely more than it gains."

Belial hardened her gaze. "Satan has led us to our current prosperity. I won't tell him what you've said, but you'd do well to keep your mouth shut in the future. He thinks much further ahead than even you know."

"You're probably right, but even the most brilliant leaders have blind spots." Morbius retorted. "Satan's blind spot is his obvious hatred for the angels. His thirst for revenge is going to cost him, and the rest of us, everything."

"We'll see." Belial said, concluding the conversation.

She dismissed herself after getting one last assurance from Morbius that he would fight at the battle of Sinai in one day's time. Then, she left the Fourth Hell, feeling a little worse for wear.

What does an idiot like Morbius know? Belial thought after she stepped back out into the night-time darkness. It was 4 AM now, and she'd spent about 45 minutes inside the Fourth Hell. Satan's true plan has nothing to do with killing the Archangels. That's just a cover to deceive the others and obfuscate his true intentions. Satan's so-called 'thirst' for vengeance has also dulled over time. His hatred for the angels is almost entirely a hatred for Raphael, not every other Archangel.

Belial grimaced. The true point of this invasion is to steal back Valac's Lantern. If we can obtain it, we will seize control of the power of revival and use it to build a new realm for demonkind. Killing Raphael and other leaders in Heaven would be a nice bonus, but pale in comparison to actually obtaining the Lantern.

Even as Belial had this thought, she shivered, her bones turning cold from fear.

But what if the humans know? What if Cat Mask knows? He must know, right? Surely he witnessed our attempts to start this war in one of the futures he lived through. How much of our plans does he know? Or maybe what we're doing now is completely new to him? Maybe we never even tried this before?

The knowledge that a time-traveler was among their enemies made Belial extremely worried. This news had greatly shaken her resolve, and Satan's as well. It would be one thing if they didn't know, but now that Ose had told them of Cat Mask's capabilities, they were constantly second and third-guessing themselves.

What if cat Mask knew what they were doing?

What if he didn't?

Would he actively work to stop them?

Would he let them do as they pleased?

What if obtaining the Lantern was actually a poison pill for demonkind? Maybe the Lantern itself had been tampered with ahead of time? Maybe Cat Mask had already told Raphael, and the angels knew exactly what the demons were planning!

The possibilities made Belial want to break down and cry. Morbius's words had shaken her resolve even more because the truth was, she completely agreed with him! She thought this war was a terrible idea, but she couldn't bear to tell her husband 'no'. If Satan wanted something, Belial would do anything he asked to help him acquire it. This showed the depths of her love and devotion, and the weaknesses in her personality as well.

Even though she felt saddened by this news, she pressed on. Belial transformed into a True Succubus once again, leaped into the sky, and flew low to the ground, moving quickly to return to the Warper Hub in Germany.

Before long, she would be back in Sinai, readying up for the next phase of Satan's plan...

At the same time, in Heaven.

While the demons were making their moves, so too were the angels. Raphael was aware the demons had assaulted Saint Catherine's Monastery and killed many of the humans there. Luckily, he knew that at least some of the humans had managed to escape. That was because the church's leader had activated Catherine's Sigil, which mainly served to alert Heaven to a demonic incursion. It also meant the deacon had opened the secret passageway and escaped through the tunnels.

Odds were good the demons hadn't pursued the humans who escaped. They could do so, of course, but knowing the demons, they simply paid little attention to random nobodies among the human ranks. The demons actually had quite a blind spot to 'ordinary' humans, and mainly put their focus on celebrities and other noteworthy people. This was a glaring weakness in their psychology that prevented them from paying attention to countless obscure engineers and other inventors who silently toiled away from the public eye, making tremendous contributions to human science.

It also allowed ordinary people to go about their daily lives, unmolested by the touch of demonic influence. Whether this would last into the foreseeable future or not was anyone's guess.

Raphael was currently sitting within his residence, a spacious and livable home filled with books he had collected over the eons, written himself, or had commissioned from humans and angels alike. His personal library mainly consisted of his favorite tomes, but he had built a much larger one in a somewhat remote corner of Heaven filled with obscure titles he only browsed occasionally.

The Archangel of Wisdom was, in all meanings, the leader of Heaven. Even so, he did not live an opulent life. His dwelling was larger than that of most other angels, but he had no servants, and he certainly didn't live inside a mansion. His dwelling was surprisingly humble, a large hollowed-out tree with multiple vertical levels linked by holes in the floor leading upward. As an angel, he could fly upward and did not need staircases.

Raphael sat before a window overlooking the interior of Heaven. His giant tree was grown atop a small hill, not quite a mountain, which gave him a wide view of all the other living spaces within Heaven, the distant forests, and at the edge of his vision, even the gate leading to Sinai itself.

His vision was keen, but even Raphael could not make out much in the way of those going in and out of Heaven's Gate. With a demonic attack arriving in the near future, there were many angels, mostly Lazarites, coming and going.

Raphael's home was not a simple structure made of brick and mortar. It was grown and hand-crafted by Uzziel herself for her brother. The colors inside were darker, more muted than the brightness of the world outside.

But Raphael's home was unique in this regard. He might live inside a hollowed-out tree, but the Lazarites within Heaven did not.

Heaven did not look the way it did during the Ancient Era. Lazarites were humans who had died. As such, when they arrived in Heaven, they brought human knowledge, human customs, and human engineering along with them. Countless Lazarites who had been reborn were artisans, craftsman, construction workers, and others of that sort. In recent decades, more humans had been born and died than ever in the past, and these new humans had caused the shape of Heaven to change dramatically.

Raphael strictly forbade the use of electricity. He felt it was too alien for the likes of Heaven, but if he had allowed it, he might have been able to obtain a sizable fraction of the human war machine for himself. Alas, since he forbade it, the humans instead brought along with them their construction methods, building high-rise apartment buildings illuminated by Heaven's Light, rather than bulbs running on electrical power.

Heaven had a moderate climate year-round. Angels did not need to consume food, so Lazarites didn't need to farm like they would have if they were still alive on Earth. That didn't stop many Lazarites from alleviating their boredom by growing lavish gardens over time, or building fancier and more ornate statues, structures, and so on.

Lazarites were intended to be instruments of war Raphael could deploy to battle against the demons, but the truth was, especially in the last few hundred years, battles against the demons rarely rose to a level higher than a moderate city-level skirmish. Most Lazarites only trained their battle techniques and powers when ordered to do so, and otherwise lived as if they were still humans.

The city that sprawled out below Raphael's house was ugly and unseemly. He hated it. It was made of metal and concrete, not like the old Heaven that had existed before Satan's explosion during the Ancient Era. That Heaven had truly felt like home to the Pureblooded angels, while the one they lived in now felt more like a lesser imitation of the human world outside.

Raphael grumbled to himself. He felt stuck, in a way. Trapped in a quagmire. Lately, he felt as if he'd been following the rhythm of his enemies, allowing a new status quo to slowly form. Now, it was the demons who were setting a new rhythm. He was forced to react to news of their imminent assault and begin preparing for it.

While Raphael stared at the city of Lazarites below his home, a knock at the door made him turn his head to look. He realized he'd been so preoccupied with his thoughts that he had failed to sense a familiar aura approaching.

"Come in, child." Raphael said, smiling warmly. He remained seated, watching at the door opened to reveal a white-haired woman with a halo above her head, the telltale sign she was a Lazarite and not a pureblood. She wore a helmet that covered her face, but took it off when she entered.

Catherine walked inside Raphael's home with the same casual ease she always had, ever since she was a little girl and had arrived in Heaven. She treated Raphael as her parent, because he had always been good to her and lavished care and affection onto her shoulders.

Catherine closed the door. She smiled at Raphael and bowed slightly.

"Father, I've returned." Catherine said.

"Words reached my ears that thou didst vanish after the battle against Lucifer." Raphael said, his heart lightening, ever so slightly. He stood up and walked over to Catherine, giving her a warm and gentle hug. Then he held her arms and looked into her eyes. "Art thou quite alright, my dear? Thou appeareth none the worse for wear."

"I'm sorry, Father." Catherine said, blushing slightly. "I made you worry over nothing. When Lucifer showed up, I fled and had to hide for a while. But I escaped and made my way back here."

Raphael blinked. Was it just his imagination, or did her eyes shift away when she spoke? It felt a little 'off' to him, an ancient entity who had interacted with billions of other beings over his long and storied life.

She was... lying?

Raphael wasn't entirely certain, but he didn't press the matter.

He simply pulled his arms away before touching her cheek lovingly. "That thou still live is my greatest joy. As soon as I heard of thy survival, I called for thee. Since thou art of sound body and mind, come and sit at my table. I have something I must discuss with thee."

Catherine nodded. Her expression turned solemn. Raphael seemed to have a lot on his mind. He was much more serious than usual.

Raphael took a seat at the table next to the window, while Catherine sat across from him. Raphael waved his hand, and two pocelain cups appeared, along with a porcelain pot with heated tea. He picked up and poured the chamomile tea for himself and Catherine, then slid a cup over to her side.

This was a simple ritual the two of them had done a thousand times. Catherine accepted the tea with a nod, then took a sip almost in unison with Raphael, as if their minds were synchronized.

Several seconds of silence followed. Catherine waited, not speaking. She was waiting to hear what was on Raphael's mind.

"War is coming." Raphael stated, causing Catherine to nod along to his words. This much was obvious to anyone. "In these trying times, I must dig up every scrap of battle strength our people mayeth be able to use in the coming fight. Every bit of added strength shalt increase our chances of victory, even if only by a little."

"Of course." Catherine agreed between sips of tea. "And my role?"

"Thou art going to play a part most essential." Raphael said seriously. "Child, thy potential is unlimited. Among the Lazarites, thou art a one-in-a-billion prodigy. I intendeth to place a good deal of focus upon thy future exploits."

Catherine's eyes flickered. Raphael noticed this, and while his facial expression didn't change, a small internal alarm in the back of his head started to tingle. Catherine seemed a little 'off' today, in ways he found indescribable. He immediately deduced more had happened to her than she let on, but he kept quiet, waiting to see if she would speak of the matter herself.

"Regarding thy sister..." Raphael said slowly, watching Catherine's face as he spoke. ""Tis time for thee to inherit her legacy. Thou art now strong enough of mind and body to wield the power of the D'Arc bloodline."

Catherine's heart jumped. "You... you mean...?"

""Tis not here." Raphael said solemnly. "Joan was a human Hero. Her power was special, even among her fellow Trueborn. She was a religious woman who placed piety the highest among all virtues and drew her power from it. As such, 'twas not appropriate to allow her blade to rest in Heaven."

A long moment of silence followed.

"The Sword From Heaven now resides within Saint Catherine's Monastery." Raphael said, enunciating every syllable deliberately to allow his words to weigh on Catherine's mind. "Thy sister's blade is now in a place surrounded by demons. If thou wisheth to finally take up her legacy, thou must first reclaim it from the demons."

"They've taken my sister's sword?!" Catherine asked, the blood draining from her face.

"Nay." Raphael answered with a shake of his head. "The demons know not the treasure contained within the Monastery. In fact, only I knew of its location. I told neither Camael nor the others. The Sword From Heaven is an artifact on par with the legendary Excalibur. Its power is beyond imagination."

Raphael cleared his throat. "Verily, I am unable to control any artifact once a Trueborn's soul has taken up residence inside. The same is true of the demons, even more so due to their weakness against the divine energy contained within such a blade. The Emperors hath no idea where I've hidden the blade, and even if they dids't, they woulds't not dare touch it."

Catherine relaxed a little. When it came to her sister, she always seemed to lose her sense of reason at least a little. She was still deeply emotionally bonded to the only remaining member of her Earthborn-family, even if that was only in concept. She hadn't actually spoken to Joan since either of their deaths, and this was a fact that had haunted her for centuries.

Naturally, Raphael noticed all the micro-movements on Catherine's face. It was a deliberate tactic he had used over the years, mentioning Joan every so often, as casually as possible, to keep her at the surface of Catherine's mind. Dangling Joan in front of Catherine had always helped keep her in line, and turned her into a very obedient girl who followed her Father's orders.

However, there was that new problem... why did it suddenly seem as though Catherine were keeping something from Raphael? His uncertainty increased more and more the longer he spoke to her.

Raphael cleared his throat. "I shalt assemble a small fighting force. There appear to be two Emperors inside the Monastery. Diablo and Belial. Before other Emperors arrive, I wish for thee to travel there, locate and acquire the Sword From Heaven, and escape the demons before they know what has transpired. With this blade in hand, thy fighting power shalt rise exponentially. Thou shalt truly become the Mightiest Lazarite."

Catherine's expression shifted to one of determination. She immediately nodded. "Yes, of course, Father. But you don't need to send anyone else. I alone am enough."

Raphael's eyebrows jumped. "Absolutely not! If thou wadeth into the waters of thy enemies alone, thou shalt drown. Powerful though thou mayeth be, thou art no match for a Demon Emperor, let alone two of them. To say nothing of the Dukes lurking in the shadows."

Catherine smiled, and that smile had the hints of a smirk. "Oh, you haven't heard, Father? I killed two Demon Dukes today."

Raphael's eyebrows jumped again. "Two?! Impossible! Who were they?"

"The Battle Brothers." Catherine said, before pausing. "I also killed Hamir, the Baron of Frost."

Raphael's jaw slackened. He looked at Catherine with fresh eyes, then sighed and bowed his head. "Thou hath grown, child. I apologize, for I did not notice thy growth had reached such a level."

After chuckling and shaking his head at his ignorance, Raphael raised his gaze once more.

"Even so, Demon Dukes and Emperors art different beasts entirely. It mayeth be possible for thee to slay an Emperor, but thou art underselling the power of our adversaries. I shalt not be at ease sending thee into the viper's den alone."

"I'm not going to fight my way in." Catherine said, firming her resolve. "I will sneak inside and take the blade before anyone knows what happened. Having others beside me will only slow me down."

Raphael appeared uncertain. "This is a great risk thou art considering, child. I woulds't feel more at ease sending thee in with backup."

"I don't need backup." Catherine said, her tone firmer than before. "I will accomplish this task by myself."

She surprised Raphael, because this was the first time she'd ever spoken so decisively to him. Catherine had always been a woman with a stalwart heart, but in front of her Father, she was a meek mannered girl who did as she was told.

What had caused her to change so dramatically seemingly overnight?

Raphael pondered that question, but he couldn't seem to deduce an answer...

"...Very well, then allow this old man to offer an alternative. I shalt draw the demon's eyes with a feint. I'll send a thousand Lazarites to harass the demons from afar, using ranged weapons. They will rain arrows from above, drawing attention away from the Cathedral. In this way, thou shalt have an easier time sneaking inside."

Catherine opened her mouth. She started to argue with Raphael, but when the old man frowned, she lost her nerve. After a moment, Catherine lowered her eyes, sighed, and nodded.

"Yes, Father. A feint will suffice. It will help me slip inside, unseen."

Raphael's frown didn't disappear. He did not look reassured by her agreement.

"Catherine. Coulds't it be that thou hath grown tired of living? Has suicide begun to play upon the edges of thy mind?" Raphael questioned. "Foolish bravado, perhaps? Might it be that thou actually wisheth to battle against a Demon Emperor? Perhaps in an attempt to prove thy capabilities? Dost thou thinketh thyself unworthy of thy sister's lineage, and this is thy attempt to rectify that shortcoming?"

Catherine's jaw dropped. "Father, what are you talking about? I'm not suicidal, and this has nothing to do with any of that! You're talking nonsense!"

"Then why?" Raphael asked. "Give me an answer, child. Why doth thee insist on fighting alone? Mighty thou mayest be, but thou art not capable of winning against a Demon Emperor."

"S-says who?!" Catherine exclaimed, before slamming the side of her clenched fist against the table. "You don't know that!"

Raphael realized Catherine's outburst was way out of the ordinary. She was acting a lot more impulsively than usual, keeping secrets from him, and now she was even openly talking back? Where did she find the nerve?

"Thou now claimeth thou coulds't combat an Emperor?" Raphael asked, wryly chuckling. "I dare not deny thy talent, but those ancient monsters woulds't leave thee laying on thy back, broken and humiliated. If thou dids't win, t'would be due to a one-in-a-million lucky chance!"

"You're still looking at me as a little girl, incapable of fighting real battles and winning wars." Catherine said, her expression turning frosty. "Father, I am a 600 year old woman! It might be nothing compared to you, but compared to any living human, I am twenty times more ancient than any of their combat veterans. I was trained by the Archangels! I am a human who has gained wings and powers beyond imagination. I am more than capable of taking down powerful threats, but only if given the opportunity!"

Each of Catherine's words were decisive and pointed. Her cold expression was not filled with anger, but instead, confidence and a burning desire to prove herself to the man she called Father. It was as if she knew for a fact she could kill a Demon Emperor, despite never having done so before.

"Dids't thou succeed against Lucifer?" Raphael asked pointedly, his tone much calmer than hers.

Catherine paused.

"...No." She admitted. "I lost. But next time, I will crush her with ease."

Raphael fell silent. He looked at Catherine, then his eyes lowered to the table. He stared at it for a good long while.

"So that's why." Raphael said quietly.

"Huh? What's why?" Catherine asked, confused by the change in his tone.

"Thou hath been acting very differently since thou returneth." Raphael said quietly, raising his eyes to meet her gaze. "Verily, it maketh sense now. Lucifer... she must have struck thy mind and done something to thy thoughts."

"Huh??" Catherine grunted in bewilderment. "What does Lucifer have to do with anything we've discussed?"

"Lucifer's third eye is a frightening weapon." Raphael said, his tone soft. "During the War in Heaven, she unleashed it for the first time. Its effects were not obvious at first, but we came to uncover its true power later."

Raphael cleared his throat. "On the surface, her third eye can fire a blast of kinetic energy capable of piercing mountains. Frightening indeed, and certainly a mighty attack, but nothing this ancient entity has not seen a thousand of his ancient adversaries achieve in the past."

"The true danger Lucifer poses is not her physical striking power, but the secret psychic power her third eye possesses." Raphael continued. "Long ago, I gave thee tomes to read containing the knowledge we've collected on the powers of all the Demon Emperors. Dost thou recalleth the entry on Lucifer?"

Catherine blinked. She had definitely read the books Raphael was talking about, but she read them when she was less than a hundred years old, and that was five hundred years ago. She hadn't forgotten the information, but it wasn't fresh in her mind.

With the power of her new MindCore, Catherine was able to access her oldest memories and conjure them at will. She quickly did so, and flipped through the entry on Lucifer.

"That's right..." Catherine muttered. "Lucifer has the power to conjure frighteningly realistic illusions within a person's mind. She refers to it as 'Tsukuyomi'."

"Verily, she secretly struck many Purebloods during the War in Heaven." Raphael muttered. "She injured their psyches, tormented them with delusions of pain and suffering, and caused many survivors to kill themselves after the war. And now... now, thou art acting so out of character after interacting with Lucifer. This ancient Archangel has come to see the truth, Catherine!"

Raphael slapped the table. "Thou hath been struck by Lucifer, and art now experiencing delusions of grandeur! Until Uzziel attends to thee and heals the damage thou hath suffered, I cannot permit thee to leave Heaven!"

Catherine was taken aback. What psychic attack? She had fought Lucifer, yes, but the battle lasted mere seconds, and Cat Mask swooped in to save her. Admittedly, she hadn't mentioned that to Raphael, but doing so would tip him off that the Trueborn were involved, and that might make him start asking other questions...

But now that it came to it, Catherine realized that Raphael had obviously noticed the different way she was acting, and he had come to the most logical conclusion available to him. Surely, Catherine must be suffering from psychological trauma inflicted by Lucifer.

"Father, no..." Catherine started to say, softening her voice. "This is a misunderstanding. Lucifer did not strike me, in fact, my battle against her was only-"

"Enough." Raphael said, raising a palm. "I cannot trust another word thou sayeth, not until Uzziel has examined thee. Clearly, thou art not in thy right state of mind."

The Archangel of Wisdom stood up and gestured to the door, clearly intending to lead Catherine outside. She also stood up, but did not make a move to go with him.

"You're not listening to me, Father." Catherine said, remaining fixed in place. "You're right, I have changed, but not because of Lucifer."

"Thou hath been hiding something from me since the moment of thy arrival." Raphael said, his eyes piercing her visage. "Thou hath never lied to me in all thy years alive. Whatever has rotted thy morality must be stopped before it causes further damage. Come now. We will pay Uzziel a visit."

"You're NOT listening!" Catherine repeated, shouting the words for emphasis. "There is nothing wrong with me, and Lucifer has nothing to do with any of this!"

"Nay?" Raphael asked, unmoved. "Speak then. What art thou hiding from me? Speak the truth now, child."

Raphael stood on the spot, staring at Catherine expectantly. In truth, he'd already given up hope she would be honest with him, but he did feel he owed her at least a chance to speak her piece.

And now, facing Raphael's stare-down, Catherine's soul went cold. She felt her skin starting to turn itchy and clammy as a terrible internal conflict brewed within her.

On the one hand, she was facing down her 'Father', the Archangel of Wisdom, likely the oldest entity in the Milky Way who had lived since the beginning of this Eternity.

On the other hand, she risked disappointing a young man whose face had immediately left a deep impression on her heart, who she had promised not to speak of in front of Raphael.

Jason had not-so-subtly informed her that Raphael's intentions were far from noble, but even so, 600 years of conditioning had made it impossible for Catherine to truly rebel against the man who had taken up the role of a parent in her mind. Even though she had promised not to speak of Jason's existence, his Wordsmithing, or anything else of the sort, now that she had been put on the spot, Catherine found herself lost, confused, unsure of what to do.

She had to tell Raphael something. It had to be as truthful as possible, yet not so truthful that she failed to keep her promise to Jason for less than a day. How shameful would it be for a D'Arc sister to break a vow right after she made it?!

Thus, Catherine was left tongue-tied. Her heart started to race, and the obvious guilt on her face told Raphael everything he needed to know. Clearly, Catherine had been deeply compromised. Her story of 'escaping from the demons' held no water. Perhaps she had been captured, mind-raped, and turned into a double-agent. Perhaps she was their new woman on the inside, a high level figure who would assist them in the coming battle, turning traitor and landing a devastating blow on one of the Archangels right when they least expected it!

Mind-rape and subversion were completely normal tactics the demons had used a million times. Raphael had seen many Lazarites bought-off or corrupted into becoming double agents over the years, as well as younger and more malleable Titans, and even a handful of purebloods.

It was truly disappointing that Catherine would fall, as they had, and it meant the last 600 years may have been a waste, but Raphael was at least glad he caught on to what had happened before it was too late.

"I, I, I..." Catherine stuttered, starting to feel nauseous as her resolve broke down. "I met with- it wasn't Lucifer... there was... I... I promised not to say... please don't make me say, Father. I made a vow, but I would never harm you, or Heaven, or anyone else."

"I do not believe thy words." Raphael said. "Thou art clearly hiding something from me."

"I-I am!" Catherine snapped, finally speaking the words out loud. "I'm hiding something, because that is my right! Who said I have to tell you everything I think and feel? I am a sentient being, not your puppet! You don't own me, or my thoughts! I am allowed to have secrets, just as I'm sure you have secrets you keep from me!"

Raphael blinked. "Is this truly thy best defense? Naturally, if thou wisheth to hold a few minor things from me, I would say nothing, but when the question of thy morality is on the line, and thou mayeth possibly been corrupted by the demons, I cannot in good conscience allow thee to roam freely until I hath uncovered the scheme behind thy sudden change of heart. There is a war coming, and it may be upon our doorstep in mere hours! This is not the time for me to be dealing with a possible traitor."

"I'm NOT a traitor!" Catherine shrieked. "Stop trying to dissect me, Father! Just stay out of my business, for once in your life!"

"No. I do not think I will." Raphael said.

His movement was sudden, swift, and completely unexpected. Catherine had never realized he was carefully amassing his power until it was too late.

Raphael cleared the distance between them in a single second. He slapped downward at the side of her head and pounded Catherine down into the floor. She had no time to react before he'd already battered her downward and knocked her unconscious.

In a single movement, Raphael subdued Catherine, then wrapped her body with multiple phantasmal chains, in the same way he had done to Satan the Devil in the Ancient Era.

Raphael did not take Catherine to his False Cosmic Realm, though. Instead, her subdued her and turned her body invisible with illusions, then he teleported across Heaven to a meeting hall for the Archangels.

After arriving, Raphael laid down Catherine in the center of the room, still subdued and unconscious. He touched a special ring on his finger, which sent out a signal to the other connected rings worn by his brothers and sisters.

Several minutes later, Camael entered. She did not teleport, but instead strode in through the front doors, looked at Catherine bound on the floor, and frowned.

"This is...?" Camael started to ask, but seeing the look on Raphael's face, she went silent.

Before long, Gabriel arrived, and then Uzziel came last.

Michael was no longer among the living. He had given his life two thousand years earlier to empower the Lazarus Tower.

Samael had gone missing long ago, lost in battle against the demons.

Uriel, too, had fallen during the War in Heaven.

As for Cassiel and Muriel, they had naturally died during the Primordial Era, long before the mindwipes.

Thus, now, among the living Archangels, only Raphael, Gabriel, Camael, and Uzziel remained. Four in total.

At the very least, Raphael now wore Michael's ring, and he could commune with Michael's soul in times of great need. Unfortunately, Michael's soul was weakened dramatically by the existence of the Lazarus Tower, and as such, he spent most of his time in a deep coma-like sleep, only waking up if Raphael injected soul energy to temporarily revive him. Raphael did not do that now.

"Everyone." Raphael said, gesturing to Catherine's unconscious body. "I hath reason to believe Demon Emperor Lucifer mayeth assaulted Catherine's mind. She is acting out of character. She lied to me earlier, something she's never done before, and she is hiding something. Uzziel, thou hath successfully healed some of those corrupted by Lucifer. Please investigate Catherine's condition."

Uzziel frowned worriedly. She quickly fluttered over to Catherine, swallowing her saliva as she audibly gulped.

Catherine was the golden child of Heaven. Few were allowed to know her real name. Her identity as Joan of Arc's sister was a secret kept in great confidence. Even her name was hidden behind the subterfuge of 'Heaven's Daughter'.

If she had truly betrayed Heaven, then this was a catastrophic loss on the eve of a demonic incursion.

Uzziel sent out her healing energy. She carefully wrapped it around Catherine's head, working hard so as to not wake her up.

Gabriel stood on Catherine's left, while Camael stood on her right. The two of them were here purely as muscle in the event Catherine woke up and lashed out at the weakest Archangel, Uzziel. If she was too focused on healing Catherine, she might not sense the dangr coming, and could be killed before she had a chance to react! This would cause a double tragedy and give the demons a premature win before they had even begun their assault! None of the Archangels wanted to see this happen.

"Strange..." Uzziel said, as she investigated Catherine's brain. "I... I senseth no tampering with her mind. Lucifer's powers always cause noticeable trauma to the victim, but there are no such contusions or lesions present on Catherine's brain."

"The demons art no fools." Raphael said, his tone of voice urgent. "Tis' possible they may have used other tactics. Check her Mind Realm for tampering."

Uzziel nodded. She and the other Archangels were quite familiar with Catherine's Mind Realm. Only Raphael was intimately familiar with it, as he had used his eons of life experience to build her a barebones but functional Mind Realm for the sake of empowering her abilities. Uzziel had helped repair damage to it on many occasions in the past though, so she knew its general structure.

But the moment Uzziel tapped into it, her eyes went wide. She let out a loud cry mixed with a gasp, a sound that communicated disbelief, confusion, and absolute bewilderment.

"Uuuahh??!!" Uzziel shrieked. "Th-th-this, what in Heaven's name- RAPHAEL! Come, look quickly!"

Raphael's heart fell into the soles of his feet. The look on Uzziel's face plunged his mind into the depths of despair. Just what in the Creator's name had those abominable demons done to the prodigy he had invested so much time and energy into raising?! He was terrified to see what they'd done, but Uzziel's tone moved him to act as quickly as possible.

He flickered over to Catherine's body and held his palm above her head. Raphael closed his eyes and focused, diving toward her Mind Realm.

What did he expect to see? Maybe blackness, blood red demonic energy, fire and brimstone, or something else of the sort.

But that wasn't what he saw.

Instead, his vision fell upon a Mind Realm so precisely engineered to perfection, so beautiful and staggering in its size, that he almost lost his mind. Even his own Mind Realm was countless times less extravagant than this bewildering behemoth lurking within his pupil's mind.

Who in the god-damn could have constructed such a thing? It went beyond anything he could have dreamed up or imagined. It was a towering city made in the image of the Titans, each and every building, statue, and structure energized and focused towards the others, forming a powerful glyph-structure that served a purpose he simply couldn't imagine.

It was as if a child were trying to figure out the workings of a computer for the first time by looking at its internal circuits with no guidebook. Even the brilliant Raphael was left dumbstruck, completely and utterly lacking in comprehension of the machine engineered by a Wordsmith he'd never met.

Even as Raphael and Uzziel were trying to understand what they had just witnessed, less than ten seconds after gazing into Catherine's inner Mind Realm, they felt a terrifying force building up within her Mind Realm. A statue of Odin, situated directly in the center of her Mind Realm, began to glow with rage.

"INTRUDERS DETECTED. GET OUT."

The statue suddenly flung its hands toward the tiny dots of perception high in the sky. Raphael cried out in terror as a mental attack blasted his and Uzziel's psychic links out of Catherine's Mind Realm and back into their bodies.

From the perspective of Gabriel and Camael, Raphael and Uzziel had only looked into Catherine's Mind Realm for mere seconds before they were suddenly sent tumbling backward, landing on their wings and banging the backs of their heads against the concrete.

"Aaargh!" Raphael cried, as even his usually robust mental abilities took a direct hit from whatever the hell was inside Catherine's head.

At the same time, with Raphael's mental defenses temporarily shattered, all the chains and bindings enveloping Catherine abruptly vanished. She awoke with a start and quickly sat up, looking around in shock as she recalled the last thing she'd seen, which was Raphael flickering forward to attack her. Then her vision had gone black and she'd woken up here.

"W-what in the Creator's name?!" Catherine exclaimed.

"Don't move." Gabriel said, quickly raising a palm filled with divine energy to point it at Catherine. "I know not what is happening, but thou hath wounded Raphael and Uzziel."

"I wounded THEM?! Raphael attacked me!" Catherine argued, though she didn't make any sudden movements with the four Archangels around her. All of a sudden, she felt extremely exposed and vulnerable, surrounded by four of the mightiest existences in Heaven. If they wanted her dead, she didn't stand a snowball's chance in hell of staying alive.

Camael drew a sword from her waist. It was no Excalibur, but it was a powerful artifact in its own right.

"Make no moves." Camael warned. "Remain seated."

It took him a minute, but Raphael managed to stagger to his feet. He was woozy and dizzy. He had not prepared himself at all for such a powerful counter-attack, and what he had seen inside Catherine's mind scared the life out of him.

"The Titans?!" Raphael asked, as a storm of rage welled up on his face. "Thou hath betrayed us to side with the Titans?!"

"What? No." Catherine replied. "What gave you that idea?"

"I SAW IT!" Raphael roared, pointing a shaky finger at Catherine's head. "That beautiful, powerful, highly advanced Titan city built within thy Mind Realm! This old man has truly lived his live in vain for the Titans to craft such an exquisite artifact within thy Mind Realm, right under my nose! Who was it?! Tell me, which Titan has plotted against us? Was it Zeus? Neptune? Speak, child, or take thy secrets to thy grave!"

Catherine started to shake with fear. She had chosen the Titan-based MindCore at Jason's suggestion, and because it suited her needs. But now, she realized it was going to cause a terrible misunderstanding, and even cost her her life!

"N-no, Father! It wasn't the Titans! This isn't what you think..." Catherine pleaded.

Tears welled up in Catherine's eyes. It was only now, surrounded by beings she could never hope to defeat, that she realized she had greatly overestimated her capabilities. She thought she could lie to the man who knew her best, and now she was about to pay the price.

Despite all of this, she bit her tongue. She couldn't bring herself to divulge Jason's secrets. She had made a vow, and as a D'Arc sister, she couldn't break it... not even if it ended up costing her life.

Catherine cried. She lowered her head and heaved great sobs, no longer sure of what to say or how to save herself. This only made her look more guilty in the eyes of the Archangels.

"A traitor." Camael said, scowling. "After everything we've done for thee, this is thy repayment."

"What should we do?" Gabriel asked calmly. He did not have a strong emotional reaction to news of Catherine's betrayal, but then again, few things emotionally moved him.

"We have to execute her." Camael answered. "If it were not for Raphael's wisdom, we mayeth fallen for a truly wicked scheme."

"Nay!" Raphael shouted. "We must investigate this matter carefully. We must dig into the traitor's mind and uncover her secrets. If we can find out what the Titans are plotting, we mayeth save ourselves from a hidden calamity!"

Uzziel gingerly stepped over to Catherine's side. She wrung her hands and grimaced, hearing the words of her siblings. "N-no... I don't want to see little Catherine hurt... maybe this is all a misunderstanding, Raphael? She's always been such a good girl..."

"Cans't thou explaineth the majestic machine built within her Mind Realm?" Raphael asked pointedly. "Only a Titan artisan could craft such an incredible Mind Realm. Truly, I hath no knowledge of who might accomplish such a feat. But surely, if we comb the records, we shalt find a Titan concealing their true abilities."

A long silence followed, punctuated only by Catherine's sobbing.

It would be so easy to explain this problem away, but Catherine refused. She would never break her vow, even if it meant her own death.

She was scared, though. She didn't want to die. She was afraid of death, as anyone would be.

And if the Archangels truly picked at her brain, wouldn't they uncover the Wordsmith's existence anyway? Was there any point in causing herself undue pain and suffering when they would definitely get the answer in the end anyway?

Catherine cried. She wept. Her shoulders trembled and her body shook as she fought desperately against her urge to speak, to save herself.

After a long minute, Raphael sighed.

"Even now, she doth not speak. Loyal to the end."

His words were a mixture of praise and sadness. Once, that loyalty had been reserved for Heaven, and more specifically, for him. Now, though, it seemed she had passed her devotion on to someone else. A Titan, at that.

What a tragic loss.

As Raphael's anger cooled, his rationality returned, and he realized that now he would have to actually dive into Catherine's Mind Realm to find out just who had the capabilities to do this to her.

But, before Raphael could do so, a female voice spoke from the darkness within the edges of the room.

"It wasn't a Titan. It was me."

Raphael flinched. The other Archangels jumped.

In unison, they and Catherine all raised and turned their heads to quickly stare in the direction of where the unexpected voice had come from.

"W-who's there?!" Raphael asked, alarmed that someone had actually managed to sneak into the Archangel's executive hall without a single one of them noticing.

Camael raised her sword. Gabriel swiveled his body to aim a palm full of divine energy at the speaker.

From the shadows, a human woman stepped out. She had neck-length brown hair and green eyes, she wore glasses, and a smart blue suit-dress.

"Sorry to startle you." The woman said, her tone bland. "I wasn't going to interfere, but I felt I couldn't allow this abortion of justice to continue a second longer. My name is Jessica Harper. You would have heard about me sooner or later after my feats at Sarabiya. I am a Lowborn, and my title is the Great Builder. I am the one who constructed Catherine's Mind Realm."

Catherine's heart jumped. Her eyes flickered. She instantly realized this was a deception. She knew it was Jason who had operated on her, and by comprehending some of the concepts behind his powers, she also instantly realized he must be able to disguise himself.

But was Jason Hiro the disguise, or was Jessica Harper? Catherine didn't know. She intuitively though Jason must have turned himself into Jessica Harper to fool the others, but she wasn't entirely sure.

She decided to stay quiet. It was a good thing, too, because clearly, Jessica had come prepared.

"Thou?" Raphael questioned. "Thou art the one who created Catherine's Mind Realm?"

Even though it seemed as if he were merely repeating Jessica's words, Raphael actually was completely bewildered. When in the god damn did a human Hero come into the picture? Lucifer corrupting Catherine made sense, and a betrayal by the Titans also followed the train of logic in his mind.

But a human Hero? When did one of them get involved??

And furthermore, how could a mere Lowborn craft such an exquisite Mind Realm? It made no sense!

"I did not intend to speak to you until after the coming battle in Heaven, as revealing my existence goes against my plans." Jessica said, crossing her arms. "However, seeing as you were about to cause great harm to the woman who saved my life, I realized I had to intervene."

Jessica waved her hand, causing a large table and six chairs to materialize. Enough for the four Archangels, herself, and Catherine.

Raphael's eyes went as wide as saucers. He could conjure illusions of a table and chairs, and Uzziel could create wooden versions by growing them out of the ground, but to instantly create them on the spot with a wave of her hand? This woman might be the real deal!

"Everyone, come and take a seat." Jessica said, as she sat at the head of the table and conjured tea and crumpets for the others to eat.

"We have a lot to discuss."

Part 769: Heaven's First Battle

January 29th, 2021. Heaven, inside the Archangel's Assembly Chambers.

None of the angels, Titans, or Lazarites outside knew it, but a momentous and historic meeting was taking place during the hours of preparation before dawn, the same day as the demons were planning a bloody invasion and assault into Heaven's borders.

The four living Archangels had accosted Catherine, intending to imprison her for betraying Heaven, only for a human woman to somehow suddenly appear in their midst, calling herself a Lowborn, but also a representative of the Trueborns, authorized to speak on their behalf.

Her name was Jessica Harper, and while she was actually a 'mere' split soul belonging to Jason Hiro, nobody in the chambers knew the truth of the matter except for Catherine, who only suspected the truth.

Catherine shakily stood up and stood behind the Archangels, staring intently as they strode over and sat at the table across from Jessica Harper. Seeing the cups of tea that had magically appeared, as well as the table itself, the Archangels were examining her with great interest.

"The Great Builder." Raphael repeated, as he took a sip from the cup. The tea could potentially be poisoned, even to the extent of affecting his physique, but he wasn't too worried. The fact Jessica had declared that Catherine had saved her life almost certainly meant she was not hostile to the Archangels' interests and would not stoop to such a level as poisoning them. "If thou art so 'great', then why hath thy title yet to reach my ears?"

"I didn't pick my title." Jessica said. "It was chosen for me by those who saw my powers in action."

Raphael nodded. "Thou stateth that the Daughter of Heaven saved thy life. Under what circumstances did this happen?"

Behind the Archangels, Catherine felt a cold, icy sensation wash over her skin. She knew she'd never met 'Jessica' in her life. Anything Jessica would say was surely a lie. How could she hope to fool the wisest Archangel alive?

"I was at Catherine's Monastery." Jessica said. "I was sent there by the Trueborn, Cat Mask, to prepare for the demon attack we knew was coming, but the attack came too swiftly and caught me by surprise. Right when the demons were about to kill me, the Daughter of Heaven swooped down and killed my assailant. She was attacked by Emperor Lucifer, and I managed to pull us both out of there."

"Thou possesseth the ability to flee from Lucifer, yet thou were helpless against lesser demons?" Raphael asked, his sharp eyes poking holes in Jessica's story.

"That's right." Jessica said, not even flinching under Raphael's questioning. "Well, 'helpless' is a strong word. Given enough time to prepare, I can adapt to most situations. But a sneak attack is a sneak attack, and my abilities were not much help when the Battle Brothers arrived to capture me. Even Cat Mask had no idea they were coming, or if he did, he didn't tell me."

Camael leaned forward, opting to speak before Raphael could. "This individual, Cat Mask, verily we hath heard his name of late, but we know not who he is. Coulds't thou describe him?"

"He used to keep his abilities a secret, but I guess he decided to experiment recently, try something new." Jessica said, the slightest hint of annoyance in her voice. "Maybe it's a form of psychological warfare designed to mess with the minds of the demons. Anyway, you'll hear about him sooner or later, so I don't mind telling you now."

She paused for a moment.

"Cat Mask is a temporal manipulator. He possesses the ability to rewind and alter time as he pleases, and in doing so, he has rewound time millions, billions, maybe even trillions of times. Nobody knows how many years he's spent reliving the next 70 or so years on Earth, perhaps not even him. Apparently, he made a big change in the current 'causal loop' we're experiencing now, which has caused the rapid emergence of Lowborn Heroes, and he also imbued his own son with the power of a Trueborn Hero."

"What?" Raphael gasped. "A second Trueborn? Dost thou speaketh the truth?"

"Since the demons have already learned of his abilities, it won't hurt if I tell you... but I don't know all the details." Jessica said with a sigh. "He's known as the Archseer, and his power is called Dream Eating. He can devour the dreams of other entities to learn of their plans and to empower himself. He took the knowledge of an unknown demon and became a master of hand-to-hand combat at only age eighteen, for instance. He has been combining his power with his father's, and in this way, the two of them have quickly built a huge intelligence network."

Raphael slowly nodded. He digested Jessica's words with great caution, thinking about the implications and pondering how they would affect his own plans.

"Despite being a man who knows the future, Cat Mask did not foresee thy attack at the Monastery?" Camael questioned. "This point is far too suspicious. Are we to believe he was so careless with a valuable asset?"

"Nay." Raphael said quietly. "Tis beyond reason. It seems 'Cat Mask' has designs on Heaven, for he arranged the meeting between the 'Great Builder' and the Daughter of Heaven."

"I may be part of the Trueborn's inner circle, but there are plenty of things they don't tell me." Jessica said. "I also believe the Trueborns planned for me to be there, but they did not tell me the demons would attack early, so I truly thought I was going to die. When Catherine saved my life, I was grateful to her, and I asked her how my powers could help. Thus, after some effort, I came to the conclusion that empowering her with a superior Mind Realm would be the best way to repay her."

Raphael glanced back at Catherine. He didn't say anything, but she could see that there was a question in his eyes. As if confirming something to himself just by seeing the look on her face, he returned his gaze back to Jessica and nodded to himself. Neither woman knew what the old fox was thinking.

"Well. Thou art here, and it seems thou intendeth to protect Catherine. I appreciate those who value friendship." Raphael said solemnly. "Thou hath told me a bit about the two Trueborn, but what about thyself? What sort of woman art thou? What powers dost thou commandeth?"

"My powers..." Jessica said, her tone slightly hesitant, "...are quite formidable. I am not the only Lowborn of this generation with abilities beyond those of our predecessors, but admittedly, mine could be considered a tier above the rest. For example..."

She motioned with her hands, causing a thin metal rectangle to appear on the table between herself and the Archangels. Immediately, all their eyes locked onto the strange object.

"This is...?" Uzziel asked.

Jessica didn't immediately answer. Instead, she reached over and poked her thumbs into the side of the rectangle, then lifted what turned out to be a 'lid' of some sort.

The lid flipped up to reveal... something. None of the Archangels knew what they were even looking at. There was a glossy flat spot recessed inside the flipped-up lid, and a bunch of letters, numbers, and symbols arrayed inside the bottom part.

"This is a laptop computer." Jessica explained. "Do any of you recognize it?"

The Archangels slowly shook their heads. Even Raphael, who had definitely seen computers at a few points in the last 50 years, wasn't up to date on them. For him, 50 years was like the blink of an eye. He simply couldn't keep up with human technological advancements, and he also didn't interact much with the newest Lazarites who would know.

"Computers can do all sorts of things." Jessica said, before directing her eyes in Camael's direction. "They're similar to your sentient artifacts, like Excalibur. Internal circuitry, not dissimilar to the internal magical matrices used to create your most powerful artifacts."

"Thou art familiar... with my work?" Camael asked in confusion.

"I've had a chance to look at Jepthath's staff, as well as Arthur's sword. I'm not too familiar with their internals, but I know they're complex enough to be fairly similar to human technology. At least in the broadest of strokes... naturally the minutiae will differ."

Camael was enlightened. "Art we to understand thy abilities are similar to mine, in thy own human way?"

"Yes. That's basically correct. My internal mana storage is quite limited, but I was able to increase it by building bigger and bigger mana batteries inside a secret location, which I have connected to my soul remotely, and some other stuff that you and I might be able to talk about if we have time later. But that time is not now, as the demons will attack soon and I cannot stay here long."

Raphael looked back and forth from his sister to the Lowborn Hero. He could tell that Camael's interest had been piqued, as her blacksmithing identity meant more to her than any other part of her personality. Camael was practically a slave to her creative thirst, and she would shut herself off from the world for decades at a time while working on a new artifact, often using her seer powers to portend the future and make weapons suited for future Heroes, Titans, and Angels alike.

Raphael frowned, ever so slightly. It was important that Camael remain in Heaven, never getting too excited by whatever nonsense the humans and other lesser species were working on. A few notable blacksmiths had appeared across human history, but none of them had ever forged artifacts at Camael's level, so to her they were little more than juniors with middling potential. Since they all died of old age in a hundred years or less, she barely had time to notice them before their flames flickered out like candles in the wind.

But Jessica appeared quite young. If she was already forging artifacts capable of catching Camael's eye, she might have several good decades to draw the Archangel's eyes away from Heaven. This was not something Raphael wished to see.

"Fascinating indeed." Raphael said, taking care to switch topics and not linger too long on Jessica's previous words. "But we have not yet discussed the fact that thou hath granted a formidable boon to Catherine while surreptitiously asking her to hide thy handiwork. What art thy intentions, young one? Why doth thou sneaketh behind our backs in such a snake-like manner?"

"I didn't anticipate you'd be able to see through Catherine's Mind Realm so quickly." Jessica said, not bothering to deny his accusation. "I'm not out here trying to advertise my capabilities, you know. They will become known sooner rather than later, but the longer I can keep them under wraps, and the fewer who know of my abilities, the stronger a foundation I can build."

Gabriel tilted his head. "Foundation? What is thy meaning?"

"I am the Great Builder. I build things." Jessica said simply. "I haven't even begun to build at my highest possible level. I might soon craft weapons capable of rendering the demons helpless. I could elevate humanity to a tremendously mightier level in the coming years, allowing us to stand as a bulwark against the greater Threats inside and outside the galaxy."

Raphael's eyes flashed. "What Threats dost thou speak of? What dost thou know of Threats outside the galaxy?"

Jessica crossed her arms and directed a pointed glare at Raphael. "You know exactly what I'm talking about."

Raphael and Jessica's eyes met. Sparks seemingly flew between them as she easily matched his glare with one of her own. Raphael's heart skipped a beat. He could tell the young woman was not bluffing. But how did she know? When did humanity acquire knowledge of the Threats outside their own small world?

Surprisingly, it wasn't Raphael who spoke next, but Camael. "Thou speaketh of the Akashic Barrier?"

"That's right." Jessica said, slyly smiling as she jerked her eyes over to the old woman. "We have at least 100,000 more years before the Akashic Barrier falls. That's plenty of time for humanity to create contingency plans. The angels too, if you're interested. Maybe the Titans, the Demons, and the other species as well. All this infighting on one little world is only making our future situation worse."

By this point, Raphael's heart had jumped five or six times. His skin turned cold as he listened to the woman before him speaking. How in the god-damn did she know about the Akashic Barrier? Raphael had always been careful to keep knowledge of it limited to the highest ranking Titans, and the Archangels. He knew for a fact such information had not leaked to the demons yet, and the humans had barely even managed to step foot off-planet, only exploring their local moon and other worlds with probes and such.

How did the humans know? When did they learn of such matters?!

Jessica smiled sweetly at Raphael, but her eyes were filled with mockery. It made Raphael realize, or at least think of the possibility, that there was a mole in Heaven. Had one of the Lazarites chanced upon this information and passed it to the humans?

That line of thinking made him consider that Catherine had betrayed Heaven, but just as quickly as the possibility arrived, he cast it aside. Catherine was a formidable Lazarite, but matters relating to the Cosmic Scale were above her station. Neither Raphael nor the other Archangels would discuss the Akashic Barrier with her. She was not entitled to such information.

But if Catherine had not betrayed Heaven, then how had the humans learned of this information?!

It truly confounded him. The simple and plain-looking woman before him suddenly seemed wrapped in mystery, larger than life. Was she truly only a Lowborn?

At this moment, Raphael had a revelation.

"The Trueborn..." Raphael muttered. "Thou stated before that Cat Mask was... a time traveler?"

"Oh yes, he's seen many different versions of future events play out." Jessica said. "I'm sure you're wondering how we know about the matters of Akasha? I don't actually know how he came by the information, but perhaps you and him became best friends in another life, and you let the matter slip? It's hard to say."

Raphael paled. Was it possible? Was he the one who had casually tossed such sensitive information to this lowly, primitive species? It wasn't as if there were Akashic Laws against doing such a thing, but knowledge was power, and simply blabbering about these things was giving up future leverage for free! It was a deeply unwise move!

What Raphael did not know was that at that very moment, Jessica, AKA Jason, was dealing with a headache of his own. He didn't really want to be informing Raphael that his father was a time traveler. In fact, Jason didn't want anyone to know, especially not the angels and demons!

But his goddamned dad had gone and yapped about his powers to Ose, of all demons. Ose! The most manipulative, evil piece of shit Jason could imagine! Now that she knew, the other Emperors knew, and before long word would get around to the angels, including Raphael.

Thus, Jason was forced to reveal knowledge of his father's powers to one of the people he least wanted to know. It was beyond undesirable, but by giving up this information willingly, Jason would benefit in a few key ways.

Firstly, he would appear more honest and frank to Raphael. He could reveal the information on his own terms and force Raphael onto the back-foot.

Secondly, Jason could control the narrative and twist the information to his advantage.

Thirdly, Jessica would become mysterious, and behind her, Cat Mask and the Archseer would become shrouded in a fog of deception.

Cat Mask, especially, would become an enigma, making the angels and demons second and third-guess their every moves. They would constantly wonder if they were bumbling into a trap Cat Mask had laid for them, or doing something he already knew was coming and had handily prepared for.

What none of them would know was... Cat Mask didn't give a shit about any of this!

Right now, Cat Mask wasn't helping his son at all. He wasn't feeding Jason knowledge of future events, and even if he wanted to, Jason's time traveling had drastically changed the timeline, so all of Cat Masks's previous knowledge had become outdated and unreliable.

...But the angels and demons didn't need to know that part. Once Raphael learned of Ose's battle against Cat Mask, he would know that the humans were telling the truth about Cat Mask's power, and he would be forced into a passive role, uncertain of what actions to take moving forward.

In essence, Jason allowed his lazy father to take on the role of a mysterious powerhouse, drawing everyone's attention to him.

The crazy thing was, it sure as hell wasn't Cat Mask who had told Jason about the Akashic Barrier. In matters of the Cosmos, Cat Mask was totally ignorant. He'd never heard of the True Cosmic Realm, he didn't know about the Akashic Barrier, and he didn't even know about the Archdemon! It seemed that even with Cat Mask's billions of years of life, he hadn't thought about anything besides saving Earth, or at least humanity as a whole. Matters of the cosmos had always been outside his purview, and beyond what even his time-rewinding powers would allow him to affect, so he had never given them much thought.

Thus, it was not Cat Mask, but instead Jason who came from the future and knew of Cosmic matters. He had been the one to educate his father, but now he was using his father as a prop to draw attention away from himself.

It was sneaky, it was effective, and it worked. If Raphael did think of Jason, he would simply assume Jason had used his Dream Eating powers to learn of the Cosmic Realm and other such things. But, more likely, Raphael would focus his attention on the time traveler leading humanity.

And so, after Jessica answered, Raphael was left lost and confused, unsure of what to do. By now, he had mentally forgiven Catherine and no longer thought about her so-called betrayal even a little bit. If she did betray Heaven, that much was only natural. It was likely that the damnable time traveler had investigated her in a forgotten future timeline and used his knowledge to bamboozle her! Clearly, that must be the case, for he'd even swindled Raphael out of knowledge Raphael didn't remember telling him about!

If the Archangel of Wisdom could be fooled by such a slick-talking time traveler, what hope did poor little Catherine have? She was not at fault.

"I... I see." Raphael said, his heart heavy. "Verily, this ancient one hath lived a life in vain. The new Trueborn duo make for quite the formidable pair."

"We're not your enemies." Jessica said. "Humanity, I mean. You angels live here in Heaven, hiding away from the real world, living a lie forged from ancient pain that secretly burns your soul every day. But it doesn't have to be like this. You hide your existence from humanity and puppeteer its leaders from the shadows, but why? Symbiosis is possible, certainly preferable to the lonely lives you lead now."

She glanced toward the door leading outside, the movements of her eyes intentional and calculated. "By the numbers, Heaven is, what, 90% Lazarites, 9% Titans, and less than 1% Pureblooded Angels? The Lazarites have turned Heaven into a laughable imitation of their former human world. If you survive this war, I believe it might be possible to deepen the friendship between humanity and angelkind. With my abilities, especially, we might be able to solve some major problems holding both sides' development back."

"Such as?" Uzziel asked, speaking up for the first time in a while.

"Well, the mana problem, for one. I imagine with billions of Lazarites, managing all their mana must be difficult. There's only eight billion humans on Earth, and the meager Faith Energy they generate is made lesser by the fact a large number of them are atheists, and even the believers themselves aren't too devout, only praying occasionally. These problems are solvable by me."

The underside of Raphael's eye twitched. "For a substantial price, no doubt. This ancient one doth not believe such favors shalt come cheaply or freely."

"It won't matter right now." Jessica said, neither confirming nor denying his words. "You have to beat back the demons and survive before you even start thinking of thriving. Cat Mask does not want to see Heaven fall. Are we authorized to enter and assist you in the coming battle?"

Raphael hesitated.

His mind revolved at lightning speed as a great many concerns piled upon his lap all at once.

Two possibilities immediately emerged in his mind. First, there was the matter of whether or not Jessica was being truthful, especially about one particular point.

Was Cat Mask a time traveler, as she stated?

The answer to that question had a heavy bearing on what he should say next.

It seemed likely that Cat Mask was a time traveler, but Raphael would not be able to determine if he was or wasn't unless Cat Mask came and demonstrated his powers right before the old man's eyes.

If Cat Mask was not a time traveler, then this meant Jessica was deceiving him. Why? Perhaps to place people inside Heaven and strike at Raphael when his guard was down? Perhaps to assassinate other key figures within Heaven?

If Cat Mask was a time traveler though, then this presented its own issues. Had Cat Mask spoken to Raphael in a previous timeline? Had he engineered Jessica's responses to Raphael's questions to achieve exactly the result he wanted? If he had, then would Raphael rejecting Jessica's offer become a major problem for the Archangel of Wisdom down the line? Maybe rejecting her would allow Cat Mask to say to the human leaders 'Well, I tried!' and this would drive a wedge between Heaven and Earth.

But then again, maybe saying yes to her offer was what Cat Mask wanted? Maybe all of this was designed just to nudge Raphael in the direction the mysterious Trueborn wanted?

Raphael tried not to let his anxiety show, but he was sweating on the inside. This was all so sudden, it had sprang on him out of nowhere, and he had never seen Cat Mask in person. All he had to go off was the man's silly-sounding Heroic moniker, and that was truly nothing at all.

Was it possible Cat Mask had engineered everything, including Catherine's slip-up in Raphael's quarters, for this moment? Was 'this moment' even all that important? Maybe this was just a setup for an even more dangerous future gambit, and whatever Raphael chose now was rather unimportant and it was what came later that would truly test Heaven's foundation.

These thoughts, and many others, came to Raphael in a flash, a single second of thinking time. His face twisted slightly at Jessica's words, but he succeeded in not fully baring his emotions before her.

Raphael had no way of knowing, but Jessica was just as worried as he was! Jason puppeteered Jessica, having no idea about what Raphael's answer would be. Jason had his guesses, and he was mixing in lies with truth at a ratio of 20% lies and 80% truth, but he did fear Raphael would see through his gambit. Luckily for him, the information he'd given Raphael was so overwhelming with potential consequences, along with the looming threat of the demon invasion, that Raphael simply didn't have the time or mental capacity to carefully evaluate everything Jessica had told him.

If Raphael had the time and energy, he'd surely have spotted several more issues with her words and attempted to poke holes in her story. But with Jessica constantly reminding him of the impending doom at his doorstep, Raphael begrudgingly had to come to a decision, and quickly.

"Thou art... authorized." Raphael said slowly. He quickly firmed his tone as he made the decision. "Heaven is in need of allies at this crucial time. Naturally, we shan't forget those who reach out to us with good intentions. We art not an ungrateful people."

It didn't escape Jason's notice that Raphael had deliberately mentioned 'good intentions' as a caveat in case Jason's intentions turned out to not be entirely pure or in Heaven's best interests... but the Wordsmith had no desire to call the old man out on this minor point. Raphael was clearly grasping at straws.

"Good, good. I'm glad to hear that." Jessica said. "Since you've agreed, we'll move fast to limit the damage the demons can inflict. I've already begun building specialized counter-weapons for some of the most dangerous demons. I haven't had time to build all of them, but if we can take out the highest-threat targets, we'll be able to avert the coming crisis with minimal casualties."

Raphael nodded solemnly. He felt as if he had exchanged blows in the first moments of the coming war, and he had come up short. His opponent, this unexpected young Lowborn, had outmaneuvered him.

It wasn't a death-blow by any means, but Jessica had seized the initiative and momentarily left Raphael at a loss for what to do. He would have to move quickly to regather his momentum in the coming period, or else she would continue pushing deeper and deeper into his territory.

"Catherine, come sit beside me." Jessica said, gesturing to the seat on her right. "You will be quite important during the battles to come."

Raphael flinched, but he said nothing. Once again, Jessica had struck another blow, taking advantage of his attack on Catherine to alienate her a little further from Heaven's interests. The worst part was that if Raphael had apologized sooner, if he had spoken before Jessica, he might have been the one to get in Catherine's good graces and reduce the damage of his actions from earlier.

But now, as Catherine walked over and sat beside Jessica, Raphael realized that she did not seem hesitant in the least. It appeared she and Jessica had quite a close relationship... and Raphael had inadvertently pushed her away.

Should he apologize now, with all the others looking? Would it come off as performative and perfunctory? Or should he wait until later, to make the apology seem more genuine?

"My apologies for what the words I spake earlier." Raphael quickly said, humbly bowing his head. "Verily, I hath wronged you, young one. I should have known thou were an upright woman of good moral standing. Thou woulds't never think of betraying Heaven."

Jessica's eye twitched. Raphael had indeed apologized, but he also sneakily tried to guilt-trip Catherine a little, 'reminding' her of where her allegiances should lie.

"Yes, you should have known that much." Jessica quickly retorted, speaking before Catherine could say a word. "But speaking of Catherine not betraying Heaven, was it not Heaven's leader who betrayed her first? I suppose 600 years of affection doesn't mean much to an ancient creature of the primordial times. Our human lives are so fleeting and forgettable, after all."

"It's fine." Catherine said, quickly raising her palm. "Thank you for the apology, Raphael. I am also sorry that I deceived you before. I made a promise to... Jessica... and I didn't want to break it."

"Thou hath always been good at keeping thy word. Thou dost cherish thy vows deeply." Raphael said, raising his head to smile warmly at her. He ignored Jessica's previous barb. Now was not the time to exchange insults, for it would make him seem the lesser man at the table.

Jessica resisted the urge to roll her eyes. Once again, Raphael couldn't help but bring up 'vows' to try and guilt-trip Catherine. But it was fine, as Jessica had already called him out once. Catherine was not so stupid as to be unable to see through the hidden meaning in his words, especially after having it pointed out once before.

"Time is running out." Jessica said, waving her hand to turn the laptop computer she'd made into dust, before reforming it into a map of the outer Sinai countryside. "Let us discuss strategy, and how humanity's military can best assist Heaven in this coming war."

"This ancient one would be deeply appreciative." Raphael said, smiling at Jessica as well.

None present but Raphael himself knew what schemes were cooking inside his twisted old mind...

Part 770: Strategic Objectives

January 29th, 2021. Heaven, inside the Archangel's Assembly Chambers.

Thirty long minutes passed. Jessica Harper continued to converse with the angels, causing the expressions on their faces to oscillate between grimness and worry as she spoke. The Archangels were simultaneously quite knowledgeable about humans and yet distressingly ignorant.

If one were to ask who knew humans 'the best' it would likely be a tie between Uzziel and Raphael. Camael didn't converse with them much, and Gabriel kept to himself, rarely chatting with the Lazarites, and even less frequently leaving Heaven.

Uzziel was the creator of humankind. She had a vested interest in her 'children' and she always talked with the Lazarites, learning how humans worked and so on.

Raphael was the brain of Heaven, and as such he sometimes communicated with humans on Earth. This was rarely done in person, and Raphael frequently used illusory decoys, liaisons inside Earth's churches, and so on.

Over the years, Raphael almost exclusively only spoke with the current Pope of the Roman Catholic Church, and other high level leaders in the other major religions. They knew of his existence, and the truth behind angelkind, but they were sworn to secrecy, enjoying the promise of immortality after death and holding a high rank among the Lazarites post-death. They had every reason to stay loyal to Raphael and pursue his interests, as it matched their own interests.

At the same time, Raphael would also, ever so occasionally, speak to the leaders of certain Orders among the humans. Not the Illuminati, who were devoted human supremacists, but a few of the other ones, such as the Knights Templar.

The problem was, Raphael and Uzziel, knowledgeable about humans though they might believe themselves to be, were extremely ignorant when it came to matters of modern human capabilities.

Weapons. Guns. Drones. Intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Vehicles. Armored tanks, land rovers. Flying machines. Underwater submarines and topside destroyers.

Warfare tactics. Guerilla warfare, suburban combat, desert skirmishes.

The angels knew very little of these things. Raphael was aware, in the abstract, that humans had grown more powerful, and he was a little leery of them, but a hundred years meant nothing to an entity who had lived for billions. In the blink of an eye, humanity had skyrocketed in their capability to deal out death and destruction, and it had happened seemingly in a single instant when he looked away then looked back.

Thus, when Jessica offered for humans to 'help' the Archangels, Raphael and the rest did not agree because they thought the human's assistance would be all that helpful.

Oh, by no means.

Instead, the clever Archangel of Wisdom thought to use the humans as meatshields, living bodies that would support the Lazarites, and would allow the Archangels to fight the 'real' battle comfortably.

All that changed in less than thirty minutes as Jessica Harper started explaining her plans to the old man. She conjured an overhead projection of Mount Sinai and the surrounding thirty kilometers of land in any direction atop the table, giving the Archangels a bird's eye view of the battlefield.

"In phase three, we will send in the military forces of Europe from the north. To summarize, I've received authorization to deploy two platoons of Finnish soldiers across this river here, and they will be flanked by a sky division from Norway raining gunfire from above to keep the demons from taking to the skies."

"At the same time, arriving from the west, Egypt's security forces don't want to let other countries make them look like fools, so they will be naturally working alongside the United States to send in these fifteen detachments from the northwest, the west, and the southwest in a pincer formation. This is a diagram of the tank-type you'll be seeing them field the most heavily. It's a fairly robust model, one I plan to overhaul and improve when I have time, but no demon below the rank of Baron will even be able to dent it, so it's sufficient for our purposes."

Jessica drew lines with her fingers, smirking internally as the Archangel's faces turned a slightly miserable shade of gray. Uzziel was at a loss for words, she didn't even understand the terms Jessica was using, and Raphael was struggling mightily as he had no idea that 'tanks' had evolved so fast. The last time he'd seen one was during World War

II, the last time the angels materially contributed to a war on Earth, and those ancient clunky rolling machines were far less threatening than their modern counterparts.

"H-hold a moment, if thou mayest..." Raphael said, massaging his tired eyelids. He felt a million years older after listening to her speak. "Is the meaning of thy words to imply the humans shalt fight the hardest battles against the demons? Even with two Trueborn, this ancient one feelest thou mayest be overestimating thy capabilities. The demons art numerous, and their Emperors outnumber thy Heroes twenty to one!"

"If Cat Mask has to fight twenty Demon Emperors at once, he'll definitely die." Jessica acknowledged. "The same is true for the Archseer. But why would we ever do something so foolish as fighting under those conditions? And furthermore, we aren't fighting a battle with the intention of exterminating the Demon Emperors, or even their lesser minions. That has nothing to do with our tactical strategy."

"It... doesn't?" Raphael asked, before realizing what she meant. "Ah. Thy intentions art simply to repel the demons from Sinai and prevent them from entering Heaven."

"That won't be possible." Jessica said, shaking her head. "We have less than a day to assemble the human military forces. This simply isn't enough time to logistically accomplish a perfect defense of Heaven. Instead, we're just trying to make the demons feel enough fear of the humans that they pull out before they can suffer losses extreme enough to cripple their future power."

Raphael blinked. He stared at the projection for a long minute in silence.

"If the demon leaders experience a tactical loss, it mayest undermine their minions' morale." Raphael said thoughtfully. "Therefore, thy assault art simply... a bluff?"

"Not a bluff at all. If the humans get serious, the demons will suffer a terrible loss. Even with such limited time to prepare, we can wound them badly, and that will magnify our threat in their minds." Jessica explained. "Think of it like us giving them a taste of what we're capable, and they will thusly realize what we've brought to this battle is but a tiny fraction of what we could unleash in the future. That will make them think twice before attacking Heaven again."

"Indeed..." Raphael said slowly. "Before attacking Heaven again..."

It did not escape his notice that the truth of the matter was that the humans had pulled a fast one on him. They had taken advantage of the holes in his knowledge and were going to use the coming battle as a way to showcase their strength. Any gains Heaven might obtain would thus become 'conditional' to their relations with humanity.

So long as Heaven and the humans were allied, the strength of humanity was the angel's as well.

But if those relations should ever begin to cool...

Raphael did not speak aloud regarding his misgivings, but Jessica could see the wariness in his eyes. The Archangel and Lowborn silently chose not to pursue the discussion in that direction any further. Her threat was subtle enough that if he were to call it out, it would make him appear ungrateful during his time of need. A favor granted to an ally now could always be paid back later, so long as the recipient continued to live, and thus Raphael decided in that moment he would accept the human's generosity, but he would not allow them to dangle the debt over his head.

As soon as he could, Raphael would pay back this debt to return their standing to a more neutral level.

"Verily, thou intendeth to encircle the demons." Camael said, studying the topographical map of Sinai. "But dost thou not worry this battle could cost many humans their lives?"

"If some soldiers die, that would be unfortunate, but they will revive as warriors fighting for you, our allies." Jessica said, smiling sweetly at Camael. "Reborn into undying angelic bodies, this hardly even counts as death in my eyes. We will do what we can to minimize the casualties, but converting living soldiers into Lazarites is an acceptable trade if it scares the daylights out of the demons."

"Is there any manner in which we mayest assist thee?" Gabriel asked.

"No. You Archangels are needed in Heaven." Jessica answered. "Doubtless, the Demon Emperors have some objective they are pursuing, likely cutting off the head of Raphael. Stick together and guard one another well. We humans will handle the outside assault, but it will be up to Heaven to guard its inner area. You can manage at least that much, yes?"

Raphael's eye twitched. "Of course. We art Archangels!"

"Very well. Then that concludes our strategy meeting. I hope that a week from now we'll all be sipping champagne over the demon's losses."

Jessica stood up, her strategy session concluded. Having gone over the broad strokes with the Archangels, she had impressed upon them humanity's current military strength. Even if not in the most minute detail, she had shown them the general capabilities of what her species had achieved militarily. It was up to the Archangels to heed her words and take her seriously.

Raphael and the others rose along with her. Without missing a beat, Jessica waved her hand, causing the table and chairs she had summoned to vanish into thin air, returning the chamber to its former state of emptiness.

"It was good meeting you all." Jessica said casually. "I'll be departing now. Let's talk again after the coming battle."

"How dids't thou enter Heaven's space and even manage to break inside our chambers without our noticing?" Camael asked, narrowing her eyes at the young human before her. "This question has been playing at the back of my mind since thy arrival."

"I built a device that can teleport myself and others across vast distances." Jessica replied without missing a beat. "Breaching Heaven's dimension was a little tricky, but it turns out Raphael's barrier strengthening attempts weren't enough to keep me out. You'd better hope the same isn't true for the demons, or their Warpers might sneak backdoors into Heaven after they invade."

"Indeed... we thank thee for thy timely warning." Raphael said, his mouth forming a smile that didn't quite meet his eyes.

With a short bow, Jessica waved her hand and disappeared, leaving the Archangels behind with Catherine.

Catherine's heart jumped when Raphael and the others turned to face her, but the barrage of questions she expected didn't come. Instead, Raphael sighed softly and lowered his head in contrition.

"Catherine. Truly, I hath wronged thee. My shame is boundless." Raphael said quietly. "For me to accuse thee of betraying Heaven when thou woulds't never do such a thing... I know not how such thoughts entered my mind. Perhaps I have begun to feel more stressed regarding the demon's attack than I previously thought. If there doth be any way in which I can make it up to thee..."

"That... that isn't necessary, Father." Catherine said, quickly bowing her head. "In the end, I did deceive you. I'm sorry. You're so wise, you were easily able to see through my childish attempt at hiding the truth. I'm in awe of your capabilities."

"Go out and prepare for the coming battle." Raphael said, as he walked over to rest a hand on her shoulder. "We will speak of my error in the future, assuming Heaven survives the coming battle. If it does not, then... I hope thou shalt surviveth and live a good life in my absence."

Catherine's heart felt like it was tying itself in knots. Her anxiety levels jumped at Raphael's words, but she couldn't bring herself to argue with him. Like this, she simply nodded her head, then turned and strode out of the meeting chambers, leaving the four Archangels alone.

A long minute passed as the four Archangels looked at one another.

"That Jessica..." Camael started to speak. "Verily, when I gazeth upon her-"

"We should inform Michael of what has transpired." Raphael interrupted, shooting a strange look at Camael. "He was not awake for these proceedings. He deserveth to know."

"Ah... alright, then. We?" Camael repeated. "Is it not thyself who usually informeth Michael of major events?"

"Long has it been since all of us hath gathered to speak to Michael." Raphael explained, his words as smooth as butter. "Since a potential dawn of doom draw neareth, we mayest all gather together one last time. Let us not risk falling without speaking to him in person."

"A sensible decision..." Camael said, shooting Raphael a strange look of her own.

To say Raphael's sudden request was unexpected would be an understatement. Since Michael's death 2,000 years before, only Raphael had communicated with him. Raphael wore two rings on his fingers; one was his own, and one was Michael's.

Each of the other three Archangels also wore a ring of their own. These had been forged by Camael some time after the War In Heaven, and served as one last chance for them to save their lives if their enemies should kill them. Even if their bodies died, they could retreat into the rings and potentially survive until the end of the Eternity.

This was the case for Michael when he sacrificed himself to empower the Lazarus Tower 2,000 years before...

With this, Raphael smiled kindly, like an old man who was looking forward to meeting his beloved grandson one last time. Raphael held up his right fist, revealing his ring and Michael's ring.

Camael held up her right fist as well and pressed the side of her pinky against Raphael's thumb. Then Gabriel pressed his giant fist against Camael's, and Uzziel pressed her fist into the gap between Gabriel and Raphael's fist.

Like this, their fists formed a square. The energy within their rings transformed into a powerful burst of energy in the center, and they felt their souls being tugged toward a domain of Thought, outside time and space...

Their vision darkened, then brightened once more. All four Archangels found themselves in a liminal space filled with golden light beaming off shining candelabras. In the center of a church-like building, there was an open coffin where a winged male was laying on his back, his arms crossed atop a sword resting on his chest. A shaft of light fell from a stained glass window, resting upon his body and granting him the appearance of a hero from another reality.

Emotions swelled within the breasts of Gabriel, Camael, and Uzziel, who were finally seeing the proper visage of their brother Michael, for the first time in 2,000 years.

"Michael..." Camael said quietly.

She walked over and brushed her sleeping brother's hair with a single finger, the motion so loving and tender it could make a grown man cry. Then she looked at Raphael.

"How do we awaken him?" Camael asked.

Raphael looked at her sternly. "We don't."

"Huh?" Camael asked, confused.

"Heaven is no longer a place where we can speak freely." Raphael said, his tone becoming menacing. "That... that woman... 'Jessica'. There is something deeply wrong with her."

Uzziel blinked. "Wrong? Wait... so we hath not come to awaken Michael?"

"Nay. I needed to spin a tale capable of confusing outside observers. Even now, I know not if our words art not still being intercepted. This domain is shielded by my powerful mind, and verily I shoulds't senseth any who dare to intrude. But any level of secrecy can no longer be guaranteed, even in here. For now, tis' the best I could come up with in so short a time."

The other three Archangels fell silent. Gabriel stroked his chin, then he nodded to himself.

"Ah. Thou art truly the wisest of us, brother. Now that I think back on our meeting with that Jessica, I remembereth the manner in which she arrived. How coulds't she have known what we were discussing unless she were also able to spy on us?"

Camael sucked in a sharp breath. "Is this thy meaning, Raphael? The humans hath found a way to spy on Heaven? Even in our most secretive areas?"

"Indeed." Raphael said, his expression as dark as the Void. He scowled angrily as he thought about how that vixen had toyed with him from the very beginning. "Jessica and the Trueborns hath begun to turn Catherine against us. This much should be obvious for any of thee to see, but tis' far from our biggest concern. What worries me the most is that I senseth a plot most foul to turn the Lazarites against us, with Catherine being the first stepping stone on a path to Heaven's destruction!"

The other Archangels felt the blood drain from their faces.

"Impossible..." Uzziel said softly. "We have always treated the Lazarites well! Why woulds't they turn against us?"

"Well? Dost thou truly believe the lives they formerly led on Earth were worse than the lives they now lead in Heaven?" Raphael scoffed. "We hath repeatedly held them back from going 'too far' in their building projects, experimenting with their powers, and so on. I fear that the Archseer mayeth swallowed dreams of certain key individuals within Heaven, perhaps even my own, and in this way, he mayeth uncovered the secrets of what Lazarites can truly accomplish!"

"If my conjecture doth be true, t'would mean a complete collapse of Heaven." Raphael said, his tone simmering with barely concealed rage. "The demons hath already fallen from the position of angelkind's greatest enemy. Now, it appeareth the humans art in contention."

"If... the humans art such a threat..." Gabriel said gingerly, "...then why doth we not reject their offer?"

"Because we CANNOT!" Raphael roared, as he slammed his fist against the side of Michael's coffin. The other Archangels jumped slightly. They couldn't remember the last time they'd seen their eldest brother so angry. "These Trueborn are not to be taken lightly. Especially not that Cat Mask! Camael, thou knoweth more regarding the tapestry of time than any of the rest of us. What doth it mean when a human possesses the power to travel back in time an unlimited number of times?!"

Camael squeezed her eyes shut. She pressed her fingers against her forehead and fruitlessly attempted to massage an incoming headache.

"Such a power... goes against Akasha." Camael said with a grimace. "It shoulds't not exist. Ever since the Great Shattering, I hath lost my ability to peer into the future. The way of Fate hath turneth as opaque as the walls in this cathedral."

"Hath thou ever been able to peer beyond the veil of Fate?" Raphael asked his sister pointedly.

"Indeed... well... nay..." Camael said, opening her eyes to frown deeply. "I... in the past, I was able... but no, I was... never able to see beyond... hmm? Strange. Why hath I never thought of this conundrum before? Surely, verily, I recalleth a time when I coulds't peer into the future to determine... but nay, that hath never actually happened at all? Why doth two memories intermingle within my mind?"

A long silence followed. Raphael stared at the ground, his face contorted into an expression of rage.

"Because... Cat Mask." Raphael spat. "Verily, that human hath caused the Great Shattering. This ancient one remembers... thou prophesied t'would come one day... but it did not 'come'... it hath always 'been.'"

Question marks popped up over Uzziel's head. "Hmm? Thou art saying the Great Shattering was destined to someday arrive, yet t'was always here? Brother, thy words make no sense!"

"I am equally mystified." Gabriel chimed in.

"Heh heh heh..." Raphael gurgled in his throat. "Cat Mask. This human frightens me. He went against Akasha's way and somehow shattered the universe. I know not how he did it, only that he was responsible. If he hath truly witnessed an infinite number of futures, then he musteth observed our many reactions to the coming war. Doubtless, Jessica's words were perfectly tailored to get us to do as Cat Mask wished."

The more Raphael spoke, the graver the other Archangel's expressions became.

"Heaven is no longer safe." Camael muttered. "Our enemy doth be a time traveler who knows precisely what events shalt come to pass. We art being outmaneuvered at every turn..."

"If... if that is true... then what can we do?" Uzziel asked, nibbling her nails worriedly.

"I was taken by surprise." Raphael muttered. "I lack the time needed to contemplate the greater ramifications of today's visit. I must attend to the battle against the demons first, then the rest of these issues afterward."

Uzziel looked at Michael's sleeping body. She glanced at Raphael. "Brother, dost thou intendeth not to awaken Michael? I know thy words were but a deception upon whoever is observing us, but they did make sense to me..."

"Perhaps Michael mayeth possess insights that could assist us in our time of need?" Gabriel added. It seemed he wished to speak to Michael again as well.

But Raphael held up a palm to silence them.

"Nay. We mustn't awaken Michael needlessly. He, and all the rest of us, must recuperate within our rings for a long period before we can permanently reawaken. Every instance when I hath awakened him temporarily in the past, I hath also delayed his return. Tis' better to allow him to sleep as much as possible, restoring his soul's energy over time. When he rises naturally, he shalt be capable of conversing with all of us at will."

"Oh... I see." Uzziel said, deflating a little. Michael had always been her second favorite sibling, after Samael. Not being able to talk to him for thousands of years had deeply saddened her, just as the death of Samael had. But she didn't have any good arguments to rebuke her eldest brother. She certainly didn't want to accidentally harm Michael just to soothe her own pangs of longing.

Raphael managed to calm himself down and cool his anger, but still, rage simmered below the surface.

"Catherine can no longer be trusted." Raphael said gloomily. "All those years spent training her hath gone to waste. She was to become a Valkyrie in the vein of her predecessor, but now we cannot make her a figurehead for the Lazarites, knowing she hath become a mole in our midst."

"Perhaps we can find a replacement?" Gabriel suggested.

"None who are similarly worthy exist, and training a new Lazarite shalt prove troublesome." Raphael muttered. "The revelation that Catherine was Joan's sister would have made her appear divinely mandated for the position, but no other Lazarites possess similar clout. The ones who mayest are all former world leaders, with excessive political baggage that would drag them down in the eyes of their peers."

"Such matters needs't wait until later." Camael said dismissively. "Let us focus on the coming battle. Brother, I fear that the demons mayeth a different objective beyond simply killing thee."

Raphael fell silent. His face changed expressions several times. It seemed he was harboring similar thoughts.

"The Lazarus Tower..." Raphael muttered.

"Aye." Camael said. "We hath kept the secret of Valac's Lantern to ourselves all these years. Never hath we spoken of its existence to anyone, not even King Zeus. All along, we believed the demons had not learned of the truth behind the Lazarus Tower."

"Outwardly, we hath already declared that the Tower alloweth the Lazarites to reform from deceased humans." Uzziel said. "Tis' not unthinkable to me that the demons hath realized destroying the Tower shalt cripple our future military strength."

"This is indeed the most likely possibility." Raphael grumbled. "If the demons doth not truly wish to kill one or more of the Archangels, then destroying the Tower shalt be their next most likely tactic."

"Assuming the demons dids't learn of the Lantern, woulds't stealing it bring them any benefit?" Camael questioned.

"Unlikely. We tied Michael's power to the Lantern. That is how we were able to revive humans as Lazarites." Raphael replied. "Thus, the demons cannot use it to create their own 'Lazarites'. The Lantern shalt grant them no tactical advantage. Destroying it is the only way in which they mayeth benefit."

"Then we needeth reinforce the defenses around the Lazarus Tower." Camael concluded. "This is a matter the Titans can assist us with. They art more than powerful enough to assist, and no ground army shalt be able to push past an enraged Titan King. Zeus alone is ten times the warrior he was during the Ancient Era, to say nothing of his progeny."

Raphael thought of Heaven's layout. The Lazarus Tower was extremely conspicuous. It was positioned in one of the centermost areas, far from the Sinai portal, but close enough that a wall of determined Demon Emperors might be able to rush it down and destroy it. It was hundreds of meters tall, and could be seen from nearly anywhere in Heaven. A glowing gem atop the tower served as a beacon, similar to the North Star when looking up at Earth's night sky.

In truth, destroying the Tower wouldn't accomplish anything. Camael had built the Tower, and she could rebuild it again. The issue was the Lantern itself. If the demons knew of the Lantern's existence, then they could destroy it, and that would permanently end the rebirth cycle of Lazarites.

Raphael would be quite annoyed if the Tower were destroyed, but within a year or two, Camael would have rebuilt it, and the flow of Lazarites would continue. It was protecting the Lantern that was his top priority... as well as hiding its existence.

"Why not simply remove the Lantern?" Gabriel questioned. "One of us could carry it a while."

"The Lantern's aura hath been suppressed by the formations Camael placed in its storage chamber, deep below the Tower." Raphael said, shaking his head. "If we were to extract it, every demon Grunt within a thousand kilometers woulds't sense its presence, along with the lesser Angels, and the Titans to boot. After Michael empowered the Lantern, its might hath grown considerably."

"If we remove the Lantern, the formations will break down." Camael added. "In the end, I woulds't need to rebuild the Tower from scratch all over again, the same as if the demons destroyed the Tower."

"Better to suffer a short setback than to risk losing everything." Gabriel said.

Once again, all four Archangels fell silent. A war raged inside Raphael's mind.

He couldn't think of any methods the demons would use to steal the Lantern and turn it into their own demon-Lazarite resurrection machine. The Lantern's other uses were not great in his eyes, and certainly not worth starting a war over.

Thus, destroying the Lantern, destroying the Tower, or killing one or more Archangels seemed the most obvious goal of this demon attack. Everything had started when the demons learned of the two Trueborn, so this attack must be borne of desperation, lacking in prep time.

Raphael could remove the Lantern and take it somewhere else. If he did, the Titans would sense its presence, and many questions would be asked. Troublesome questions...

The Archangel of Wisdom had no idea if the humans knew of the Lantern. Given the Archseer's ability to 'eat dreams', perhaps he had learned of the Lantern at some point? Perhaps Cat Mask had uncovered its existence in a future timeline?

But then again, maybe Jessica had lied to the Archangels, and the stated powers of both Trueborn were lies! Maybe there was no time traveler and there was no Dream Eater. If so, then Raphael would be making a terrible mistake if he started assuming all his secrets had been spilled!

This left him at a crossroads. He had to make a decision, and that decision had ramifications so dire it nearly took his breath away.

"We... must gamble." Raphael eventually concluded. "Leave the Lantern in place. Guard the Tower. Pray our enemies believe the Tower itself is the source of the Lazarites, pray that destroying the Tower is their goal. If so, then the Lantern shalt remain hidden underground, the Titans will not learn of it, and we can rebuild at a future date."

"Gambling is not thy usual way of doing things." Camael observed, giving her eldest brother a side-glance of disapproval. "I am fine with rebuilding the Tower from scratch. T'would be safer to extract the Lantern."

"Doing so would guarantee our enemies and allies learn of its existence." Raphael said, holding up his palm. "I shalt not brook any further discussion on the matter. The Lantern is one of Heaven's greatest secrets. We must not simply assume all our enemies hath become mind-reading, future-predicting monstrosities."

"I... disagree with thy decision." Camael said, closing her eyes and looking away. "But I shalt abide by it."

"As shalt I." Gabriel said with a nod.

"And I as well." Uzziel concluded.

Like this, the Archangels reached a consensus. Raphael instructed them to keep all sensitive discussions limited to ring-dialogues between one another.

Then, he broke the spell and returned them to reality.

War was coming.

Raphael was far less certain now of what the outcome would be than he was earlier that morning…

Part 771: Rag Doll

January 29th, 2021. Inside Aevum.

For every hour that passed on Earth, a little over 15 days passed inside Aevum. This meant that in the time that someone on Earth had finished watching the morning news, someone in Aevum could have lived through two entire work weeks with change to spare.

Jason Hiro was able to watch the demons slowly rally their forces, construct underground tunnels and defenses around Sinai, and portal Warpers over to surround the mountain. He knew the clock was ticking, and the demons' attack was imminent.

Even so, Jason found himself trying to herd a group of teenagers around during one of the most hormonal parts of their lives. Jerome was extremely diligent in his training, and Jason set out to build a specialized chamber that would rapidly increase Jerome's strength. Despite this, Jerome constantly skedaddled off to fool around with his girlfriend, wasting time in Jason's eyes that he could spend training for the upcoming war.

Unlike Jerome, Marco seemed to suffer from extreme ADHD and utterly lacked interest in messing around with his power. More accurately, he feared his power, all because of his past trauma with killing a dog that had attacked him. No matter how Jason tried to explain things to Marco, it seemed he just wasn't mentally able to wrap his head around fighting in a war.

Sasha surprised Jason the most. Once she learned that her power had more practical uses, she started using it constantly, even to the point of draining all her energy and passing out wherever she was standing or sitting. Several times, the other teenagers had found Sasha comatose on the floor drooling uncontrollably due to her mana levels being depleted below zero.

Jason should have been worried to see her overexert herself and pleased that she was being so diligent, but unfortunately, Sasha spent most of her time using her powers to design clothes. She was an aspiring fashion designer, and she loved to change the colors of outfits, alter the fabric and material, and do other such things. Her interest in anything warfare or combat related was just as pitiful as Marco's.

Then there was Nadia. No longer needing to fear overusing her powers and ruining her body, Nadia dove into books, devoured the internet, and rapidly amassed a country's worth of information at a speed Jason could barely fathom. Her ability, Total Comprehension, made it extremely easy for her to not only consume and learn new information, but to understand it as well.

The truly tricky part of her abilities was converting existing knowledge into new innovations. Someone could be a great learner, even a great teacher, but still end up a poor innovator. Luckily, Nadia did not have that issue. She was already showing signs of becoming an inventor superior to the Phoebe Jason knew in the future. The wife he'd lost.

In addition to all of them, there was Brian Bozzard. A flame manipulator Lowborn, he also lacked a killer instinct and drive to fight in battle. However, perhaps because of his wealthy upbringing and years of home tutoring, he was much more mature than the others his age. He diligently practiced manipulating his flames as Jason asked, but unlike a certain other flame manipulator Jason had known in the future, Brian was a lot weaker, and not terribly brilliant when it came to thinking up novel uses for his power.

Jason sat inside his Sanctum, hidden within a tiny pocket of Aevum, and sighed. The only teenager who was fully prepared to go to war was his daughter. Daisy had seen a future far worse than anything the other teenagers could dream up in their worst nightmares. Daisy had only been six years old when the demons attacked Hero City, the Fortress of Retribution. She had been outwardly fearless due to unexpected factors related to her young heroic awakening, but that didn't mean she hadn't suffered mental traumas from what she saw.

Then she went back in time and ended up captured, experimented on, and treated like an animal for at least two long years. It broke Jason's heart thinking of what she had gone through. No child should have to go through what she did, and as a father, Jason could intuitively tell it had hardened her in many ways, visible and invisible.

Jason lowered his head. He stared at the floor silently.

It wasn't that the teenagers in Aevum were lazy, but that he was just as broken as his daughter. What teenager would truly dream of going out and fighting demons, killing them, feeling their blood coat their faces and hands, and then doing it again and again for years to come?

Jason felt as if he had become unrecognizable over the years. When he first got his powers, he used them to laze around. He used them to make himself look big and macho and tough. He used his powers to make life easier for himself. He didn't take the demon threat seriously, opting to let Neil and Hope deal with the military side of things. Jason played the role of a king, but he was nothing more than a spoiled prince.

It took terrible tragedies and losses to reshape him into the man he was now. Somewhere along the way, he had changed, just like his daughter. She was ready to fight. She was ready for war, just like him. Because she was broken. And so was he.

Jason knew it in his heart. It wasn't natural, constantly planning and strategizing, preparing for a future fight. Humans liked being lazy, watching TV, playing games, cooking food, having sex. Jason liked it too... presumably. But somewhere along the way, he'd holed himself up in Chrona for a few hundred years and spent very little time with his wife. That was why she had died.

Phoebe Hiro died because Jason took the lessons of the past so seriously that he threw away his future. Now he wasn't sure what he had to live for, beyond spending a bit of time with his little girl, and his father.

"What am I even doing." Jason muttered to himself.

It wasn't a question, but a statement. He knew what he was doing. The same thing he'd done on the day Phoebe died. Planning and preparing for a war among wars. An unending war. Once the battle for Sinai began, it would set into motion a series of events that would continue out into the inestimable future.

If the demons won, would they be satisfied with their victory and lay back on luxurious couches in contentment?

If the demons lost, would they simply return to their burrows and give up, knowing any further conflict was pointless?

The answer to both questions was obviously 'no'. Whatever the outcome, there would be another war in the future, and another after that, and still another. Even if the angels and demons were wiped out, there were still the Volgrim, and the entire universe outside the Milky Way.

Even if humans rose up and dominated the entire universe, they would just turn on themselves.

Jason closed his eyes.

Was this the truth? Maybe his earlier thoughts were wrong. Maybe it wasn't human nature to crave peace and be lazy. Maybe war was actually their drive. Maybe war was something innate to the universe. Maybe conflict was, itself, a fundamental building block of life. All energy came from somewhere. Even cells reproduced by devouring the ambient energy within their surroundings. To gain something, one must first consume something.

Jason stood up. He wandered around inside his silent Sanctum. He stared at the walls, many of which had pictures of his deceased wife. He had created them with his Wordsmithing. They were photo-realistic to the point he almost felt he could kiss her lips.

But he didn't deserve that. How could he think of his own pangs of longing when he had failed her, letting her die in the end?

Jason averted his eyes. He blinked heavily, then paused as he felt a signal lightly tap his brain.

[Dad?]

It was Daisy's voice. He'd given her a small artifact she could use to communicate with him telepathically from anywhere, not dissimilar to one he'd given Phoebe.

Jason didn't reply. Instead, he uttered a Word of Power and vanished from the spot, appearing in his daughter's bedroom inside the dormitories. When he appeared, he found Daisy sitting on her bed, looking directly at him as if she had anticipated his exact arrival point.

"What's up, sweetheart?" Jason asked, smiling at her with tired eyes.

Daisy opened her mouth to say something, but then she paused and squinted at him.

"Is that... you?" Daisy asked.

"Yes? Of course it's me. What do you mean?" Jason asked.

"Not one of your robo-clones?" Daisy asked.

"No. This is the real me..." Jason said slowly. "What's the matter? Is something bothering you?"

Daisy seemed hesitant. "It's just... I can never tell if it's you I'm talking to or one of your copies. It really bothers me, Dad."

"Oh. Sorry I've been making you feel that way." Jason said seriously. "But sweetie, don't you think... you're overblowing it a little bit? My copies are directly connected to my brain. I can see through their eyes, hear what they hear, experience the lives they live. It's like I'm in six places at once. If one of them is talking to you, it's exactly the same as right now, when I'm talking to you."

"Maybe it feels that way to you, but it doesn't feel that way to me." Daisy said, turning her head away. "You don't get it, Dad. I'm a telepath. Though I work hard to not use my abilities on everyone, I always have a surface level sense of what they're feeling, what they're thinking. But not with you."

She continued. "At first, I did have the ability to read your thoughts. Back when we met for the first time in the cabin. You felt like a real person. I felt your pain... I experienced what it must have felt like when you lost Mom. But then you regained your memories, built Aevum, and returned in a robotic body. Now your clones feel like lifeless pieces of metal to me, and your main body feels exactly the same. You don't feel like a real human anymore. It really bothers me."

Jason stared at his daughter's side profile for a moment. A sensation of guilt hung over him. He felt the air in the room grow a little heavier.

After a few seconds, Jason stepped over and sat beside his daughter. He wrapped an arm around her shoulder and gave her a reassuring squeeze.

"I'm sorry, honey. I didn't know you were feeling that way. You know why I have to do this though, right? Our enemies aren't just the demons, but the angels too, and soon the Volgrim. The Volgrim Empire has an entire subspecies that specializes in telepathy. The very thing you find alienating about me is the same thing I'm using to protect myself, protect Aevum, and protect you. I can't take a risk and allow you to read my mind, because a hole in my defenses would allow any telepath to do that."

"Besides," Jason added, "other people don't have telepathy, and they do just fine interacting with me and my clones. I'm not saying this is a 'you' problem, but don't you think relying on your telepathy to get close to other people is, in itself, a little alienating? What if you meet a guy in the future and he learns you're a telepath, then he starts to distrust you?"

Daisy scowled. "I already know that's a problem, Dad. I hadn't disclosed my telepathy to anyone prior to coming to Aevum, but I've always known that telling people would probably scare them away. That's why I didn't. Even Sasha and the rest were weirded out at first. I think the only reason they didn't ultimately pull away is because they had their own secret powers they were hiding, so they were just as focused on themselves as thinking about me, and the implications of me."

Jason lowered his gaze to the ground. He fell deep into thought.

This was not a problem he could easily solve. He could offer to make a tool of some sort that naturally inhibited his daughter's telepathy, completely suppressed it, or entirely turned it off. Doing so would be pretty easy, especially for the current him.

But would that be the right thing to do? Of course not. For Daisy, telepathy was completely natural. She'd been reading minds since she was a child. It was just another sense to her, like hearing and vision. Removing it would be like cutting off her ears. She would feel vulnerable and limited, having lost one of the methods she used to read the world around her.

Of course, since other humans didn't have telepathy, it not only gave her an unfair advantage when interacting with them, it meant their usually private thoughts were actually out in the open before her eyes. She could easily tell when someone was lying to her, pretending to be nice, hiding their real intentions, and other such things. Even something innocuous, like a white lie about how pretty her outfit looked, so as to not be rude, was still something she could see as plainly as if they had said it out loud.

Thus, if someone were to learn of Daisy's telepathy, they would almost assuredly feel violated. They might feel as though their secret, innermost thoughts and desires had been laid bare by her. It was a form of mind-rape, one that would deservedly cause them to pull away.

Daisy knew this, and that was why she didn't tell anyone. But just because nobody knew, that didn't mean what she was doing was okay.

If Jason couldn't even offer to disable Daisy's ability to help her fit in, then what was the alternative? Maybe he could turn other people into telepaths? Turn the entirety of humanity telepathic? But if everyone was reading everyone else's thoughts, then what would happen to private thoughts? Private fantasies? Could such an honest society function well?

The other option was something involving a more limited form of telepathy. Perhaps something akin to 'consensual telepathy' only? People couldn't read the thoughts of others willy-nilly, but they could project their thoughts into the minds of others if allowed, and guard their innermost thoughts even from powerful telepaths like Daisy.

But in the end, wouldn't that mostly be the same as living in a society of non-telepaths?? Jason was bewildered. If this was the solution he used, then he'd basically just turned people's brains into a social media page, advertising their outermost thoughts while hiding their real selves. That clearly wasn't preferable.

And, in the end, the real issue at the current moment in time wasn't any of this philosophical mumbo-jumbo. It was that his daughter was used to using her telepathy to get a read on people, but she couldn't use it on her own father, making him feel alien to her.

Jason didn't mind opening up his private thoughts to his daughter. She would see shameful things inside his head. Sad things. Things that, in all honesty, he'd prefer she didn't see, but as long as it was for his beautiful little girl's sake, he'd be more than happy to make that sacrifice.

The problem was, Jason wasn't lying when he said a gap opened for her would be a gap other telepaths could use. He couldn't simply open his mind up to her and her alone. It would leave him vulnerable to the Psions, along with any potential telepaths among the demons and angels.

Come to think of it...

"The Psions..." Jason muttered.

"Huh?" Daisy asked. "What... what about them?"

Naturally, all these musings in Jason's head had been hidden from Daisy, so she had no idea why his train of thought had shifted so abruptly.

"Oh, nothing, it's just... I was thinking about the Psions, and telepathy." Jason said. "Now that I think about it, they're a society of mind-readers entirely lacking mouths. They only communicate through thought. I wonder how a society of telepaths would function. I've... never really thought about it. I knew they were telepathic, and I took measures to protect myself and others, but I just had so much on my plate I never put a lot of time into the philosophy of a telepathic society."

Jason took a minute to detail his inner thoughts to Daisy, explaining to her why he'd thought of offering to inhibit or remove her telepathy, then why he'd thought of elevating humans to become telepathic, and how that ultimately led to pondering the society the Psions had built.

"Humans live and breathe a steady diet of lies." Daisy said, after her father had finished explaining his inner thoughts. "The reason you don't think humanity becoming telepaths would be a good idea is because in your eyes, it's normal to conceal your private inner thoughts from others. That's how you're able to scheme and plan for the future. It's how you're able to fantasize and dream about possibilities others might think are weird, or gross, or even abhorrent. And everyone around you is doing the same thing, all the time, every day."

"So," Daisy continued, "that makes you think that if everyone could read everyone else's minds, then it would either end up putting us back in the same place, or it would cause a catastrophic breakdown in trust."

Jason nodded. "You read my mind. Metaphorically speaking."

Jason smiled at Daisy, but his little joke didn't get a smile back from her. Instead, she gave him a deeply serious look.

"You don't get it, Dad. If you want, you can read minds. You merely use telepathy. I imagine you don't do it often, because you feel it's a violation of other people's privacy. And that is true... but it also means you're not a 'real' telepath. You haven't considered the benefits of a telepathic society."

"What benefits?" Jason asked. He was genuinely curious, and it seemed his daughter had put a lot of thought into this.

"Dad..." Daisy said quietly. "When I was nine years old, shortly after Uncle Vasily had adopted me, he let me adopt a puppy. I named the dog Ragdoll, because she was a Basset Hound with these cute floppy ears, curly hair, and she loved to roll around in the grass."

"Okay." Jason said, squinting at his daughter. He wondered why she'd changed the conversation so abruptly. "Sounds like a cute dog."

"When I was fifteen years old, just a few years ago, Ragdoll ran out into the street, right into incoming traffic." Daisy said, her expression unchanging. "She was hit by a truck. She died instantly. It destroyed me for months."

"Oh... baby." Jason said, feeling his heart deflate. He didn't expect his daughter's story to take such a turn, so quickly.

Jason started to lean toward Daisy, to kiss her forehead, to reassure her, but Daisy pulled away. Her expression was the same as before.

"I'm not done, Dad." She said firmly. "It devastated me. Words can't describe how I felt. I could tell you that I cried for weeks. I could tell you that everywhere I went in the house, I saw Ragdoll in the corner of rooms where she used to roll around. I saw Ragdoll barking out in the yard. I could even tell you that I've never truly gotten over her death, and the guilt of not reacting quickly enough, especially with all my abilities, has only intensified over time."

Jason cocked his head slightly. It really hurt to hear this story from Daisy, but... where was she going with all this?

Daisy took a long, deep breath. She looked away.

"Dad, lower your mental defenses for a moment. Let me into your head."

The Wordsmith hesitated. After everything he'd told her before, she should know why he was so hesitant about making his thoughts vulnerable. It would also cause his clones in Realspace to become vulnerable to telepathic intrusion, too.

"It's only for a minute or two." Daisy said quietly. "Just do it, Dad. For me."

His daughter wasn't asking. She was giving him an order.

As a father, Jason felt like he owed Daisy a lot. He decided, at least this once, to do as she asked.

"Normalize." Jason said, targeting only his mental defenses.

In an instant, his psychic shield, impenetrable even to Cosmic Psions, vanished. His thoughts became freely available for Daisy to peruse.

But Daisy didn't try to read his mind. That wasn't her intention. Instead, she turned to look at him.

An instant later, her memories came flooding in.

It was like a dam had burst, a dam holding back a river of emotions.

Jason was there, age nine. He adopted little Ragdoll. He felt joy at seeing the cute little dog rolling in the grass. He cleaned up her fur, picked up her poop, scolded her when she peed on the carpet, but never held it against her.

Jason played with the dog. He took her to the park. He laughed when she chased away a dog much bigger than her with her little yappy barks. He felt a deep, deep connection to her, as if she were really his dog.

Sometimes, Jason sat at the computer with Ragdoll in his lap. The little Basset Hound would fall asleep with her nose buried in his belly, curled up in a ball. She was a playful dog, yes, but also a lap dog with a comforting presence.

Jason was there when Ragdoll died. He didn't even see it coming. She bolted when his attention was elsewhere. He screamed in horror when he saw what she was doing. He was so caught off-guard that his telekinesis momentarily faltered. He failed to use his powers, something he'd instinctively trained since childhood. She ran out in front of the truck, and the sound of the impact struck him like a baseball bat to his face.

Thump. Crunch.

The dog didn't even let out a yip or a yelp. She died instantly. His healing powers couldn't revive her. He couldn't save her.

Jason stumbled toward the dead dog, his mind in a fog. The truck had stopped a little ways up the road. A balding Russian man with a bulging belly hopped out and speed-walked over. He had a hobble in his leg, and wore a dirty pair of jeans along with a t-shirt that didn't quite fit.

"Ahh, what you doing?" The man shouted angrily. "Letting your dog run into street? Look at this mess! Stupid girl! Why do kids not train dog properly, now I have blood on my hands! Fucking hell, idiot!"

The despair in Jason's eyes grew. Not only had his beloved Ragdoll just been killed, but this piece of shit had the guts to berate him, as if it was his fault? Who gave him the nerve. He had no idea who he was messing with.

Jason felt his rage and fury build. Such a worthless man, not even repentant, not even sorry for what he'd done. Sure, it hadn't been his fault. He had no way of slowing down in time. But to not even be a little sorry?

People like him shouldn't exist in the world.

That was why Jason suddenly lashed out with his telekinesis, grabbed onto the man's body, and let out an unintelligible scream of rage before shattering all his internal organs and compressing his existence into a speck of blood and bone.

In Jason's rage, he brutally murdered the man, giving vent to his own hatred, his own self-loathing, his own despair. He killed that man to avenge his dog, to make himself feel better, and to...

...Jason didn't kill the man. Neither did Daisy. Instead, this thought of brutally murdering the bastard who'd killed Ragdoll came and went. It was a momentary impulse, an explosive desire that she nearly acted on, but she didn't. Instead, Daisy simply stood there, frozen, staring at the body of her dog, splattered on the pavement. The man berated her for a minute, then turned, stormed away, and got back in his truck. He drove off, leaving a trail of blood in his wake.

Jason knelt down next to Ragdoll. He sobbed. He couldn't stop crying. The minutes turned into hours, and then days, and then weeks.

Jason buried Ragdoll out back, near her doghouse. He made a large gravestone, and even used his powers to chisel an image of Ragdoll onto the stone.

Physically, Jason moved on. But mentally, a part of him died that day. A part of his childhood innocence. It gave birth to a rage he couldn't control. It gave birth to feelings of inadequacy, guilt, and self loathing.

Jason met with his friends. Sasha, Marco, and Nadia. They offered words of comfort. They were sad about the death of his dog. They were empathetic. They were understanding.

But a few weeks passed. Jason's friends moved on. They didn't forget about Ragdoll's death, but they clearly didn't put a thousandth the thought into her death as Jason did. He was still dealing with the pain. The sadness. The loss. The anger.

He should have been faster. He should have reacted faster. He should have pulled the dog back, or thrown the truck aside. He should have killed that bastard of a driver. No, it was good he didn't. Even if the driver was a bastard, it wasn't his fault the dog died. But still, that man deserved to die! It was good that Jason hadn't killed him. He just wished he had.

Years passed. The pain faded over time. But it would sometimes come rushing back, ten times more intense than before, made even worse because of the time spent not feeling guilt, when he'd almost forgotten about Ragdoll. His fading guilt over any period of time made the return of the guilt so much worse when it struck again. How dare he not feel guilty about his failure? He'd failed Ragdoll. What right did he have to smile and be happy? He was a failure of a man.

Daisy's memory of Ragdoll hit Jason hard. When the memory stopped playing, Jason found that he was sobbing uncontrollably, and he didn't know when he'd started. His chest heaved over and over. It ached with pain.

All this time, Jason realized, he'd thought Daisy couldn't understand what it meant for him to lose Phoebe. He'd been shielding her from his thoughts. He'd been keeping himself closed off.

But he was wrong. Daisy knew. Her loss might not be exactly the same as his, but that didn't mean it was any less painful.

This was what it meant to be a telepath. It meant to share concepts, thoughts, memories, in their purest, rawest form. Words could only take someone so far. They could never truly feel what the other person had felt. They could only experience a small sliver of that person's loss, or gain.

This was a hint of what a society of telepaths could experience. It was the reason Daisy felt so alienated by her father's sealed mind. She wanted to experience his pain and happiness. She wanted him to experience hers.

As for the concerns of privacy, there was no reason a telepath couldn't keep certain thoughts and feelings private. That was always an option. But what they did decide to share, they would share in the rawest, purest form. It allowed for a level of intimacy unmatched by mere words and body language.

"Oh, baby girl... I... I get it now." Jason said, still heaving terrible sobs of loss. "Ragdoll... Phoebe... they might... might be dead... but they exist within us. Keeping those... those feelings locked down... hic... it's not okay. We have to be more open."

Daisy hugged her father tightly. She pushed her head into his chest, tears falling down her face onto his shirt.

Jason couldn't just turn all of humanity into telepaths. It wasn't a viable option, certainly not in the short term. But sharing more of himself with his little girl? That was something he now wanted to do.

It was now that he understood why she was the way she was. It was no wonder she seemed so... bloodthirsty. So hungry and eager for action. It wasn't only because of what happened when she was a small child, but all her cumulative life experiences.

Daisy had lost her dog, someone she loved more than life itself. The guilt had forged her determination into something similar to Jason's. She wanted to be better, and never to fail others again.

How could he tell her 'no' now, knowing all this?

"Dad... let's just stay like this... for a while." Daisy whispered.

Jason had a lot of other work he needed to do. His duties were never-ending. Even now, he was micro-managing his clones in Realspace.

But...

"Sure, honey." Jason said, kissing the top of his daughter's head.

He couldn't say no to his little girl.

Part 772: Faceless

January 29th, 2021. Inside Aevum.

Jason was a busy man these days. Even so, he didn't want to give up a chance to spend time with his daughter. He stayed with her, hugging and comforting her for thirty long minutes. The two of them idly chatted about this and that. But eventually, the needs of reality started to press on him.

"Dad..." Daisy mumbled. "When are you going to change back?"

Jason pulled away and gave her a weird look. "Change back?"

"Yeah. To the way you're supposed to look." Daisy said. "I don't like my dad looking the same age as me. Just use your magic to make yourself all big and strong again, like I remember when I was a kid."

Jason looked at her for several long seconds.

"I... I don't think that's going to happen, honey."

"What? Why not??" Daisy asked in bewilderment. "You can totally use your Wordsmithing to do it!"

"It's not that I can't, but that I shouldn't." Jason said, averting his eyes. "That wasn't who I really was. I guess you were too little to know this, but what you see now is how I should have looked. This is my normal self. When I first obtained my magic, I used it to turn myself into this good-looking beefcake. Muscles, pearly white teeth, a smoothed face, even a slick hairstyle."

He continued. "I did that for a lot of reasons, honey. But the main reason? Vanity. I didn't want to look like a wimp anymore. I wanted to be big, strong, and cool. I wanted to look like a god among men."

Daisy gazed at her father's side profile. "Well... when you put it like that, it does seem a little childish. But so what? What's wrong with changing yourself to look better? Most people would kill to be able to do that. Hell, I would, and I'm already pretty good looking myself!"

Jason frowned. He looked at his daughter and shook his head.

"I can already feel the vanity in your voice, and you're right, sweetie. You're a gorgeous girl. A ten out of ten in my eyes. But what you just said really cuts to the core of the problem. I made myself into something I wasn't. Why? To get other people to admire me, to make myself feel better, and so on. It was all for vanity and... maybe I'm overthinking it, but I now feel that there's just something innately wrong with that. I can't put it into words."

Daisy looked like she wanted to argue with her father, but she stayed silent when she saw a flicker in his eyes.

"You know." Jason said quietly. "Before I met your mother... there was another woman I fell in love with. Her name was Amelia... the Black Witch. She told me something once and... I ignored it at the time, but it percolated in my mind, and it's been coming up in my thoughts a lot recently."

"What was that?" Daisy asked.

"She told me she liked me just the way I was." Jason answered. "She liked my authentic self... not my big-buff-guy persona. It struck a nerve in me at the time, but it wasn't until I returned to the past and saw my reflection in the mirror that I seriously dwelt on her words."

Jason looked at the wall across from Daisy's bed. "I changed what I looked like because I was ashamed of who I was... what I looked like. The truth is, I didn't love myself. I didn't respect myself. I wanted to obtain love and affection at any cost, even if it meant becoming someone I was not."

"I see." Daisy said, lowering her eyes. "That... I think I get it."

Jason's expression brightened. "But that's the thing, sweetheart. I don't know if I love myself more than I did before, but I certainly respect myself a bit more. Your old man is dealing with... problems. But I know what I can do, I know who I am, and I know what I want to be. The failures of my past are informing the man I want to become. So I don't know if I should change myself back into Buff Jason, any more than you should put on makeup and turn yourself into some famous movie star actress."

Daisy pondered her father's words seriously. "So that's the reason you're going to remain in your youthful appearance?"

"Oh, NO, haha. That's not the only reason!" Jason laughed. "I have an even better reason than all of that!"

Daisy blinked. She squinted at her father's playful expression. "Huh? Like what?"

"Project Great Deceiver!" Jason said, shoving his thumb into his chest. "It's a lot easier to fool the demons and angels into thinking I'm a weak nobody if I look like a scrawny teenager. They won't take me seriously, making it a lot easier for me to prep for the future! Besides, if I suddenly strolled into the middle of their armies looking like a gigachad while kicking 10,000 demonic asses, don't you think they'd realize my powers aren't what I said?"

"Oh... yeah. Good point." Daisy said, rolling her eyes. Now that Jason mentioned it, that was a pretty damn good reason to stay as he was. "Gotta keep them thinking you're a 'dream eater'."

"Exactly, sweetie." Jason said, as he leaned over and kissed Daisy's forehead lovingly. "Now, if you'll excuse me, I do need to be going."

"Wait, dad." Daisy said, causing him to pause.

"...Yes?" Jason asked, expecting her to come up with another reason they should keep talking. He didn't really want to go anyway, and his willpower toward Daisy was paper-thin.

"Before you go back to all your important business, can you drop by and say hi to Farrah?" Daisy asked.

"Jerome's girlfriend?" Jason asked. "Uh... I mean... I don't know... don't you think that's a little inappropriate?"

"Dad, come on. It's not like that." Daisy said seriously. "Farrah's been feeling really down lately, and she won't tell anybody why. I'm just hoping you can get her to open up. I don't know her very well, and the other girls can't get her to open up either."

Jason hemmed and hawed for a few moments, but ultimately agreed. He hadn't really talked to Farrah Lapis all that much, and if it was just a quick wellness check, it couldn't hurt.

Jason kissed his daughter's forehead again, then quickly skedaddled, leaving her in her room.

The Wordsmith reappeared atop a small outcropping near the top of the Nexus Spire. For a brief minute, Jason gazed down upon the world he had created. A sense of overwhelming satisfaction swallowed him as he beheld the realm he had created.

Superior to Volgarius. Better than Heaven. More fearsome than Raphael's false Cosmic Realm or Satan's Hell. Jason had never seen such a realm as terrifying in its possibilities as Aevum was. The people living there, including his own daughter, had absolutely no idea just what Jason truly hoped to accomplish.

Aevum was not merely a secretive realm for developing weapons and technology. It was the future stronghold of humanity, and eventually, the Milky Way itself.

Hundreds, thousands, even millions of years in the future, the name of Aevum would send a chill down the spine of anyone who opposed it. The might of Humanity would continuously grow over time, eventually reaching a level that would force those who stood against humanity to bow their heads and bend their knees. If they did not, their heads would fall from their shoulders.

It was a grandiose vision. It was a concept that would not bear fruit for a long, long time. What meager advantages it gave Jason now were minuscule in comparison to the future gains.

Jason had to protect Aevum in its infancy. If the Psions uncovered its hiding place, Dosena would likely lash out and eradicate it after realizing the threat it represented to the Volgrim Empire.

The good news was, Jason had foreseen the dangers of the future. He had placed Aevum near the galactic Core explicitly to hide it from the gaze of the Cosmics among the Volgrim Empire. Even if it emanated a fearsome magical signature, they would have difficulty locating it due to the cosmic energy radiated by thousands of nearby stars.

"I must be very careful." Jason muttered to himself. "One slip-up and I could reveal Aevum's existence to the wrong people."

Aevum was already capable of sustaining several tens of thousands of people. But could Jason risk bringing them here? Not at all. He was already taking a huge risk bringing the children of the Illuminati here, as well as Daisy's friends. He didn't know them well. They were probably trustworthy. But what if one of them wasn't?

It would only take one flappy set of lips to damn his greatest construct to the depths of hell.

Jason looked around. He used his Wordsmithing to search for Farrah's mana signature. Even amidst the vibrant leylines of Aevum, Jason was able to sniff her out in a single second.

Farrah was all by herself. She was laying in a field of grass and flowers beside a crystal blue pool Jason had made for recreational swimming. However, since Aevum's population was so small, nobody had really used the pool for such reasons yet, and she wasn't wearing a bathing suit either. It didn't seem she planned to go for a swim.

Jason gazed down upon Farrah, unseen by her. With his vision, he could see every follicle of hair on her head, even from a kilometer above Aevum's surface.

She had a blank expression on her face, but Jason could tell there was a sense of resignation, perhaps even depression there as well. She seemed to have a lot on her mind.

Jason wasn't a 'people person'. He wasn't great at reading the thoughts of others, unless he cheated by using telepathy. But he didn't like doing that, since, as he told Daisy, it was an invasion of privacy and trust.

Thus, while he had hundreds of lived years to learn how to 'read' other people, he was still an amateur compared to normal humans who made it their profession, let alone ancient Heroes like Mildred. It didn't help that he'd spent most of his lived life in Chrona, living alongside crocodiles and working by himself. He hadn't spent much time or energy on improving this skill.

Even so, Jason could tell something was on Farrah's mind. Without violating her privacy with telepathy, this much was obvious. He wondered if Daisy had read her mind and determined Jason was the best person to help her. It not only seemed possible, but likely.

Jason muttered a Word of Power. He vanished from the top of the Spire and appeared at ground level a few hundred feet from Farrah. He approached her from the front, his hands casually folded behind his back. When he got close enough, Jason raised his voice slightly.

"Oh! Farrah, is that you?"

He feigned surprise and felt a little relieved when Farrah blinked her eyes, lifted her head slightly, and looked down her body toward her toes, where she saw the Archseer approaching from a distance away.

"Jason? M-mister Hiro?" Farrah asked, quickly sitting up and crossing her legs as she watched him approach. "What are you doing here?"

"Oh, I was repairing one of the underground leylines." Jason casually fibbed, gesturing toward the ground. "If these break down, Aevum's operations could grind to a halt. Anyway, I saw you laying there, thought I'd say hi. Why are you over here all by your lonesome?"

Farrah's eyes flickered. She looked to the right, then left, seemingly expecting someone to jump out and throw a bowl of milk all over her as a prank. Obviously, nothing of the sort occurred.

"I was, um... I was just... thinking." Farrah said.

She didn't elaborate.

"Thinking?" Jason asked, as he came to a stop some distance away. He stuck his hands in his pockets. "You feeling okay?"

"Yes. I-I, I, I'm feeling fine..." Farrah said nervously.

Her expression turned gloomy. She lowered her eyes to stare at the ground. She started nervously pulling at the grass, plucking out a strand of grass every so often, seemingly unaware she was even doing it.

"You don't look okay." Jason observed. "Is it something I can help you with? I mean, you don't have to tell me if you don't want. But just remember, I'm hundreds of years old. I'm actually a really old man trapped in my much younger and skinnier body. Maybe I can offer some insights?"

Farrah chuckled. The look on her face eased a little, but she continued to stare at the ground. She wasn't good at maintaining eye contact usually, and because of whatever was on her mind, she was even worse than usual.

"Well... I... I um... I don't know." Farrah mumbled.

Jason waited. He flopped onto his back in the grass, rotating himself so he was laying sideways before her. He donned a pair of sunglasses as he turned his face up toward the tiny artificial sun in Aevum's sky. Then he folded his hands over his belly and waited.

When Farrah didn't say anything after a long minute, Jason decided to speak. "Did Jerome hurt you?"

"What? No!" Farrah exclaimed, a look of horror washing over her face. "No, no, nothing l-like that! Where would you get that idea?!"

Jason turned his head to look at her. "He didn't? But you look so sad. I just thought..."

"Jerome would never hurt me." Farrah said. Even despite this, her expression darkened. "Not deliberately."

The gears turned in Jason's head. He struggled to think of what could be causing her bad mood, but he just couldn't place it. Unfortunately, Jason was not Daisy, and he was not Unarin. The latter would have probably deduced what was bothering Farrah within ten seconds and came up with fifteen solutions to her dilemma, but Jason was... a bit slower.

"So... Jerome wouldn't hurt you deliberately." Jason said slowly. "But... maybe accidentally? Has he grown too strong, to the point he did something that scared you?"

A long sigh escaped from Farrah's lips. She exhaled with her whole body, a look of exhaustion coming over her face.

"It wasn't his fault." Farrah finally said, after internally debating whether she should say anything at all. "It's not even because of him in the f-first place... n-not really. It's... it's everyone around here. Everyone..."

Jason raised an eyebrow. Farrah still wasn't looking at him. "Maybe I'm duller than I thought. I still don't quite get it. Have all the people here hurt you in some way?"

"It's... it's my power!" Farrah finally snapped. Her eyes twitched, and she looked like she was on the verge of tears. "You- you brought me here, along with all these other incredible people, but why?! What was the point? I'm just useless, dead weight! My power is worthless! I watch as everyone else g-gets a-all strong, and cool, and they do awesome things... but I'm stuck here with the same useless, crappy power as before!"

Jason started to open his mouth, but the more Farrah talked, the more her emotions started bursting out, as if she couldn't stop them herself.

"A-and then Jerome comes home every day, b-bragging to me about how much stronger he's gotten, and it just makes me feel miserable because what do I have anyway?

I can change my face? Wow! What a great trick! The amazing Farrah, cornerstone o-of the superhero league! She can make herself look like other, better people! What a joke!"

Jason sat up. By this point, even he could clearly see the problem. "That's what's eating you up? You think your power is bad?"

"Of course it is!" Farrah exclaimed. "But I know what you'll say. You'll say at least I have a power. I still have something that 99.99% of other humans don't! Except what does it matter, because we live in a world of angels and demons, and there's even a demon who can do what I do but way better! THAT'S what's bothering me! I just have some useless knockoff power..."

Jason's expression turned serious. He lowered his eyes and stayed silent for a moment, thinking about all his interactions with Farrah.

In truth, he understood she was right. He could offer her some words of comfort, but the truth was that all this time, he hadn't even really thought of her as her own person. She was always just 'Jerome's girlfriend' in his mind. He had disregarded her power and not thought about her situation at all. Here she was, living among all these amazing people, obviously disregarded by them, and feeling stuck and trapped inside Aevum, becoming little more than an attachment to the 'real' Hero, Jerome.

How miserable would that situation be? If she had accomplishments of her own, she could at least stand proudly with self confidence to match. But stuck amidst all these extraordinary people, she was steeping in her feelings of inferiority, her mood worsening every day.

Jason sat there for a long minute. He thought about what he had told Daisy earlier about himself when he was a teenager. He was a lot like Farrah back then. He had felt inferior to other people and immediately sought to use his power to make himself into a 'cooler' version of himself. But that was only putting a band-aid on the real issue.

Farrah possessed an admittedly simple power, but it was still something that basically no other humans would ever possess. The issue was, she was surrounded by other superhumans who were, at least in her eyes, objectively superior to her in every way. Even Jason himself could change the way he looked with great ease, possessing superior appearance-changing powers to her.

What was her power again? Jason wondered.

He recalled that she could change the appearance of her face, and... that was about it.

Oh, and she could change the color of her hair too. Jason remembered that Farrah had shifted her hair from blonde to white when he first met her.

Jason got up and walked over to Farrah. She'd gone silent by now, and seemed embarrassed about flipping out in front of him. He sat down next to her, a thoughtful expression on his face.

"So, Farrah. Your power... you can change your facial appearance, and your hair color, right?"

Farrah looked glum. "Yes. That's all."

"It's kind of odd." Jason muttered. "Even for a Lowborn, that seems awfully limited. You're sure that's all you can do?"

"I've tried all sorts of other stuff!" Farrah exclaimed. "Especially after I heard about Emperor Belial. I thought maybe I could change my body more like she does... but it's no use. I can't do anything. I'm nowhere near her level."

"It really is strange." Jason said, as he looked her body up and down. "I know of a Lowborn girl whose only power was to change the direction of the wind, which would make her fall asleep from exhaustion. I think your power is better than hers, but only by a little."

Farrah furrowed her brow. She looked like she was about to burst into tears, having her fragile mental state exacerbated by what felt like the legendary Hero mocking her.

"Sorry, I don't think I'm speaking clearly." Jason quickly said. "I'm not saying your power is weak and useless. I'm saying I think there has to be more to it. I don't think you've tapped into the full extent of your abilities, and part of the blame is on me."

Farrah turned her teary eyes to meet his for the first time. "Y-you really think so?"

There was a spark of hope in her eyes, but at the same time, she looked like she was equally prepared for crushing disappointment. It seemed her mental state was much worse than he'd thought.

"I do. Let's go to the medical center." Jason said. "I'll examine you there and see if I can figure out how to boost your powers."

"R-really?" Farrah asked, still in disbelief. "You'd do that for me?"

"Farrah, I've really neglected you. I'm sorry." Jason said, smiling while feeling terrible on the inside. "It wasn't my intention. But since I've neglected your needs, I'll just have to make up for it double-time. Let's take a look and see if there's anything I can do to help you out."

Without further ado, Jason teleported himself and Farrah into the same medical facility where he'd been upgrading other people's MindCores. His daughter was up next, but he hadn't yet finished the upgrades to his process, and he was fearful he could hurt her like he did Nadia... Jason definitely didn't want to do to Daisy what he'd done to Catherine. He was not ready to give her a Freudian complex for the rest of her life... by no means.

"Just lay back in this chair." Jason said. He didn't bother strapping Farrah in, since he wasn't doing anything invasive today.

Jason started by firing up his lab equipment. Farrah seemed nervous, but there was visible excitement in her eyes. The Archseer himself was going to see if he could amplify her powers. Who wouldn't be excited?!

Jason started by running a scanner to examine her 'mundane' biology. It scanned her cells, examined her skin and bones, and peered within her brain and spine to uncover whatever her metaphysical powers might have altered about her physical self.

Before long, Jason started mumbling to himself. "Hmm... huh... hmm... interesting. Oh, and that...? But it couldn't... hmm, and this here..."

He was so engrossed in examining the scans of Farrah's body that when he raised his head and saw Farrah looking at him with teary-eyes, he was taken aback.

"Farrah?" Jason asked.

"D-did you f-find anything?" Farrah asked. "You look... like it's... really b-bad..."

From her perspective, Jason's expression had turned so deadly serious that he looked like he'd just found out she had terminal cancer. Farrah was going crazy from his lack of communication!

"Oh! No, no, it's nothing like that." Jason said, quickly rifling through the paper printouts. He plucked out an image of Farrah's brain. "See here? There's a lot of activity in your Hippocampus compared to the other Lowborn. This shows that your metaphysical powers primarily originate from your brain, not your body. And the Hippocampus especially is involved with short and long term memory, as well as your spatial navigation."

He continued. "So, basically, your power is mainly cerebral. What's curious to me is that based on what I'm seeing, it seems to be primarily focused on your head as a whole. That could explain why only your face and hair change. Could you start using your powers while I scan you? It would give me a better range of data now that I've established the baseline."

"Um. Okay. Sure." Farrah agreed.

After a few moments, she started focusing her mind. Her face shifted, and she took on the appearance of Daisy, even mimicking her hair color to match Daisy's particular hue of blonde.

"Oh! Interesting!" Jason said, looking into his observation equipment as it showed different parts of Farrah's brain lighting up. "Try changing your appearance to a male one. Can you shift your face into Jerome's?"

Farrah winced. "You... want me to turn into my boyfriend...?"

"Yes." Jason said, before giving her a weird look of his own. "Don't tell me you haven't tried that before?"

"Turning into a boy is kind of weird..." Farrah said hesitantly. "I don't know, won't that make me a queer?"

Jason blinked twice. What the heck was she talking about?

"You're telling me you've never made yourself look like a guy before?"

"Well, no..." Farrah said, looking away sheepishly. "I'm a girl. I want to look like a girl. Why would I want to turn into a boy?"

"Farrah." Jason said seriously. "I have more reasons why you would and should than why you wouldn't or shouldn't. You know, I've even... never mind that. Just do it for me, this once, okay?"

Jason almost stated that he had done the same, making a female version of himself via Jessica Harper, but he opted not to. Only a select few were privileged to know that information, as well as people he'd accidentally let it slip, like Nadia and Catherine.

The fewer who knew, the lower the chance of leaks.

Farrah listened to Jason's request. After a moment, she nodded her head shyly.

"O-okay. I'll, um, try turning into a b-boy..." She said.

It took her a lot of effort, and more time than Jason expected. Even after three minutes, she only seemed to be grunting and squirming uncomfortably. Jason raised his eyebrow. It seemed she really felt discomforted by the thought of doing so.

Still, Jason kept monitoring her vitals. Eventually, he noticed the fluctuations of mental and spiritual energy inside her brain that indicated she was activating her powers. He flicked his eyes between Farrah and the monitor every so often.

Eventually, Farrah's skin started to darken. It turned from white to brown to a richer, darker shade of black as she mimicked Jerome's skin color. She was plenty familiar with how he looked, so it seemed mimicking his appearance was fairly simple.

Farrah had her eyes closed. She didn't even realize that her powers were working. Jason, however, did. For the first time, Farrah managed to change the color of not only her face, but all the rest of her body as well! Her nose slightly enlarged. Her forehead became slightly more prominent, and her lower jaw jutted out a little. Once she started successfully transitioning, she seemed to break past a mental barrier, and the rest of her body shifted to look like a much skinnier and more feminine version of Jerome!

When Farrah finished and opened her eyes, she gasped in shock. She sat up in the chair and looked down at her hands and arms.

"I, I, I...??" Farrah stuttered.

"You did it." Jason said, walking over to her with a smile. "You were limiting yourself the whole time. I thought I might need to alter your body's powers or something, but it seems I didn't need to. You had the ability in you all along."

Farrah looked like she was in a daze. "This is... I can... change my whole body? Not only my head?"

"I don't know the exact reason, but it seems you were holding back this entire time." Jason explained. "Maybe some sense of shame? Guilt? Some other reason? Have you never tried to turn into a man before?"

Farrah looked at him, then quickly looked away. "N-no. I haven't... before. It's not... in Persia, a woman dressing as a man is... shameful. My mother, my father, they wouldn't like it."

Ah. Mommy and daddy issues. Jason thought. Nothing to unpack there...

He didn't voice such crude words out loud. Instead, he smiled encouragingly. "This is just the first step, you know. You forced yourself to turn into a guy, but now I want you to practice all by yourself, in your room or somewhere else. Once you learn how to transition more seamlessly, you'll definitely be able to turn into different sorts of men and women more naturally."

Jason tapped his chin thoughtfully. "Hmm, but what about your voice? Your physical build and bone structure? I bet this is still only the beginning. What you've done now is turn yourself into a crude facsimile of your boyfriend. You need to keep practicing until you can turn into an exact replica of him in a split-second!"

"But what if I can't?" Farrah asked. "What if I've already reached my limit?"

Jason rested his palm on Farrah's shoulder and gave her a reassuring squeeze. "Farrah, five minutes ago, the 'limit' of what you could do was lower than it was now. Instead of constantly second-guessing yourself, try demanding more of yourself. You're a Specialist, and your specialty is shapeshifting. I'm willing to bet good money you still have a long ways to go before you reach the so-called limit of your powers."

"Oh... okay." Farrah said. She looked skeptical, but she couldn't help smiling. Her expression was brighter than before. It seemed Jason's words had caused the intended effects. "Y-you're right. I'm always so... ashamed. So worried others will look down on me. Maybe that's been... holding me back... all this time."

Jason sighed. He didn't know much about Farrah. For her to always be so anxious and nervous, there must be a story behind it. It seemed Jerome was always kind and sweet and loving with her. It was unlikely he was berating or insulting her behind closed doors. Something must have caused her to develop her constant anxiety, but Jason wasn't certain what it was.

There was always tomorrow, and the day after. They'd made a breakthrough today. Best to leave the deeper questions for later. He'd neglected her for long enough.

"Just keep practicing." Jason encouraged. "I'll start following up with you from now on. Sorry that I ignored you before... I've been busy, but that's not a good enough excuse."

"It's fine. You're the Archseer. You're a busy man." Farrah said, smiling sweetly. "Th-thank you for helping me. It means... m-means a lot to me."

The two of them said their goodbyes, and Jason returned her to the pool where he'd originally found her.

Now that Jason had weakened the mental limiter holding her back, his thoughts turned toward other matters.

"If Farrah has hidden potential, I wonder about the rest." Jason muttered to himself. "We've got a year to train before the demons attack. Every little gain early on will pay out dividends later."

He went silent for a moment.

"I should pay Brian Bozzard a visit..."

Part 773: Best of Intentions

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

A full week passed inside Aevum after Jason spoke to his daughter and Farrah, amounting to slightly less than four minutes in Realspace.

During that time, Jason was not idly sitting around. He worked with Harold to develop a training program for each of Aevum's teenagers, and, at the same time, he put the final touches on the v4 MindCores.

Each iteration of MindCore had become noticeably more compact, energy efficient, and easier to install on top of a person's Mind Realm. Even though they had reached v4, the true quality upgrade of a v1 to a v4 MindCore was about 2x, sometimes 2.5x. This meant that if Jason updated his v1 GenesisFrame to a v4, it would perform a bit better than twice as well in all categories.

His thinking speed would double, his intangible 'creative ability' would double, his inventiveness, and so on.

Those were extreme benefits, but aside from the qualitative improvements, what Jason truly valued the most in each new iteration were the reduction in installation requirements. He still shuddered when he thought of how he'd had to install his v1 GenesisFrame into his own mind. The agony of that day, the length of the procedure, and the fact that he had nearly died, and many times had wished he'd died, had carved an indelible trauma onto his heart.

Jason smacked his lips with dissatisfaction. Even though the v2 and v3 MindCores had been huge improvements over v1, he'd still traumatized Nadia and Catherine both, and also caused them to weirdly... 'fixate' on him. Jason wasn't stupid. He could tell both women had looked at him very differently before and after the procedures.

Naturally, he couldn't reciprocate their interest. In his heart, he was still a married man, and the guilt he carried regarding Phoebe's death had not faded in the slightest. He still thought about her every day, especially now that he actually saw her younger self walking around Aevum.

Today was the day.

One week after talking to Daisy and Farrah, after finishing the last touches on his v4 MindCores, he decided it was time for him to start upgrading all the teenagers to the newest iterations.

Jason had spent the entirety of his development time between v3 and v4 working on reducing the pain of installation, broadening the the safety parameters, and making them function on other species as well. Now if he wanted to install a MindCore on a non-human-based Sentient, it was possible for him to do so. Unfortunately, even the v4 MindCore could not be installed inside someone with a Mind Realm already unless their Mind Realm was destroyed first, like he'd done with Catherine.

Maybe someday he'd come up with a solution for this problem, but that day was not today.

Jason chewed his fingernails nervously. He pored over his schematics ten times, scrutinizing them over and over to try and find any problems. Only after he was fully satisfied did he finally step out of his secret Inner Sanctum to appear at the entrance to Nadia's room. He knocked on it, and a minute later, the door opened.

Nadia looked at Jason with the same ordinary level of attentiveness she always did. Her emotions were always subdued, but her eyes did sparkle ever so slightly when she looked at him. Today she was wearing a casual blue dress with an ankle-length skirt. She'd let her bob-cut hair grow out a bit, and now it fell down to her neck.

Privately, Jason mused to himself that she was dressing more like a proper older woman. She didn't have the immaturity and inexperience of a teenage girl anymore, and she carried herself with a certain assertiveness that spoke of inner self-confidence. Many teenagers and young adults were unsure about their capabilities, their place in the world, and what they could accomplish. This often made it difficult for them to walk with confidence, and that limited mindset was noticeable to adults who'd been around longer.

But mentally, Nadia was not eighteen anymore. She had lived 72 years inside her RealitySim, plus who-knew how much extra time after Jason granted her administrative control. That meant mentally she was in her 90's, if not older.

"Yes?" Nadia asked.

"Today's the day." Jason said, his tone serious. "I finished the v4's. I need you to look them over."

"Okay." Nadia answered.

Nadia had never been much of a talker in her youth. Now that she was mentally a grandmother, she kept her sentences even more concise. She didn't seem to like expending her breath needlessly. Was that her 'old person trait'? Or was it just what she had matured into naturally over the years? Jason wasn't sure.

A moment later, Jason teleported Nadia into a small facility on the northern edge of Aevum. Inside, he had set up five different exhibits that detailed all his notes and progress on v4 of the MindCores.

It didn't take long to catch Nadia up to speed. She casually downloaded the notes into her RealitySim and listened while Jason talked, explaining his various design decisions.

"Right there, you said you reduced the transfer speed between Conduits R33 and S15 by 3%." Nadia said, pointing at one of the diagrams. "This is going to cause a slowdown of 7% further down the line due to inefficiencies here, here, and here. This isn't a problem for most of the MindCores, but it's going to affect the OmniRecord the most. Since it's the most general-purpose MindCore, focusing especially on improving thinking speed, memory, and memory recall, this is going to cause a 15% deviation in memory recall speeds related to emotion."

Jason scrunched up his face. "I don't know... I mean, you're not wrong, but it's only affecting emotional memories, not logical ones, so in terms of pure utility it won't hurt a general purpose user. Also, the lower transfer speed might be bad, but it reduces the installation pain by about three or four Mental-Joules."

"Installation pain only happens one time." Nadia said, shaking her head. "I understand wanting to cut down on installation pain and friction as much as possible, but if you cut too many corners and sacrifice performance here and there, you'll drastically reduce the effectiveness of the MindCore itself, defeating the purpose."

She gave him a knowing look. "Even with the pain and trauma I faced, I wouldn't be as happy with my MindCore if it meant a reduction in my final capabilities. I've gained far more than I lost."

Jason's expression fell. "Can you really say that? After what happened?"

"I can." Nadia answered. "It was torturous. It was painful. But in the end, I think the process was worth it. What hurt the most was the uncertainty. Not knowing whether all my friends were dying of old age while I was trapped inside my own mind. But after I got out and found only a few minutes had passed, that pain faded. In the end, I gained decades of knowledge, wisdom, and experience within just a few minutes. This will make me a more effective savior of humanity and the people I love."

Her eyes seemed to linger on Jason's when she mentioned that last part. Jason looked away and pretended not to notice.

"I guess I see your point." Jason muttered. "Alright, I'll adjust that relay point. Anything else?"

"Yes." Nadia said, immediately returning to the task at hand without addressing the strange atmosphere between herself and the Wordsmith. "Over here, and here, you'll notice..."

Several hours passed. Jason's v4 MindCores were ever so slightly tweaked and adjusted based on Nadia's words. Every so often, she would close her eyes and fall silent. Jason realized she was running simulations of the MindCores inside her RealitySim, which was in itself a bit of a mindfuck. How accurately could her RealitySim emulate the improvements of a more advanced RealitySim? Was that even possible? Jason wasn't sure. Without a RealitySim of his own, he genuinely didn't know just how formidable hers was.

It definitely helped that her Lowborn power granted her incredible comprehension powers. Nadia's RealitySim became far more capable than Catherine's as a result.

"I think we're good to go." Jason said, as he finalized the v4 designs. His heart jumped slightly as he realized the time to drag his feet was over. "I'm going to... finally do it."

"Who goes first?" Nadia asked. "Personally, I think you should give Daisy the first upgrade."

"Daisy..." Jason said, lowering his head. "I... I don't know. What if something goes wrong?"

"Afraid daddy's little girl will develop a genuine daddy complex?" Nadia teased. "If I were you, I'd definitely be worried about corrupting her pure and innocent youthful thoughts too."

Jason facepalmed. "Yes, that is a big thing holding me back. I already fucked up the minds of two women... no offense. I don't want to twist my daughter's brain. I would never live it down."

"No offense taken." Nadia said with a faint smile. "Jason, Catherine and I both knew it wasn't intentional. It wasn't your fault. I guarantee you won't give your daughter a daddy complex. These new MindCores no longer have the same side effects as... mine did."

Jason shuddered. He really didn't want to think of Daisy looking at him with the same gaze Catherine did after her surgery. Phoebe would probably come back from the dead and beat him to a pulp for being so irresponsible.

"You're sure it will work out okay, then?" Jason asked, uncertainty in his voice.

"From v4 onward, the side effects will be minimized." Nadia assured him. "There will still be pain, but only about as much as a particularly unenjoyable dentist visit."

"Eugh." Jason grimaced, pulling his hand off his face. "You know that still sounds awful, right?"

"Sure." Nadia acknowledged. "But if going to the dentist was extremely painful, yet it also made you a million times smarter, I think most people would take that trade."

Jason mulled her words over. "Fair point."

A moment passed. Jason started to speak, to tell Nadia he'd be right back to fetch Daisy, but she raised her hand to silence him.

"Before you go, I need something from you." Nadia said. "I want to be there during Daisy's soul surgery, but I won't be able to contribute meaningfully without seeing what's going on."

Jason blinked. "Yes, I was going to ask if you could assist me. I was planning to jury-rig something up so you could see what was going on."

"No need." Nadia said. "I've already developed a prototype. Please take a look at this schematic."

She lifted her index finger and pointed it toward Jason. Jason nodded slowly, then raised his own index finger and touched it to hers. This allowed the two of them to transmit their thoughts directly into each other's minds; a recent improvement Jason had made for all MindCore users. Their left and right index fingers were capable of coupling to transmit information instantly, and only consensually, of course. One's thoughts could not be stolen without the owner's knowledge while they were asleep or something.

A moment later, Nadia transmitted the schematic into Jason's mind. He fell silent as he rapidly analyzed it with his GenesisFrame.

"This..." Jason said slowly. "It's a... scanning device that attaches to a MindCore? Like a real-world augment?"

"That's right." Nadia said. "I made it primarily for myself, but it has many other potential applications. Its primary purpose is to allow me to scan the thoughts, memories, physical composition, and spiritual information of other entities from a distance. It has an effective range of only about twenty meters, and the information quality will rapidly degrade past that range... but it's useful for my needs."

Jason scratched his chin. "This device hooks onto the side of your head, covers one of your eyes, and allows you to learn a lot about a person with a single scan. It won't be very effective against powerful entities like Demon Dukes, Psions, and so on. Anyone with a MindCore will passively resist the scan, anyone with a Mind Realm, even just people with strong spiritual energy..."

"That's right. It's the limit of what I could accomplish for now." Nadia said with a shrug. "It'll help me monitor Daisy's condition during the surgery without having to invasively 'hook in' to her MindCore during construction. Beyond that, this device has a few other practical uses that primarily benefit me."

Jason's eyes flicked away from the schematic to meet Nadia's gaze.

"This device is... dangerous, you know. It violates people's privacy without them knowing."

"A lot like your Spynet." Nadia immediately countered crossing her arms.

Jason flinched. "How do you...?"

He didn't finish the sentence. She'd spent 72 years with a perfect replica of himself. Naturally, she'd learned all his secrets, even regarding things like the Spynet, the Star-net he used to defeat Hope, and so on.

"You know, Jason, for someone worried about 'invading' other people's privacy, you sure seem to do it a lot." Nadia said, meeting his gaze with a stare of her own. "I'm not judging you for your Spynet. I get it. I really do. But it's a dangerous thing to invent. Even the Volgrim don't have a direct equivalent that can peek into the private living spaces of their citizens. My device is invasive, but its purpose will strengthen Aevum, which is what you should care about most."

Jason softly sighed. He looked away.

"Let me guess. You will use this to download knowledge from Earth's smartest people, convert it into usable data to improve your simulations, and rapidly scale up the capabilities of your MindCore."

"That's right." Nadia said. "I can't build it without your help, though. Several internal parts rely on 'Imagi-Tech' that only a Wordsmith can build. This also means that even if it falls off my head and gets lost, nobody can replicate the device except another Wordsmith."

That satisfied Jason. He looked at the device and chuckled. "It's pretty useful. Might even make one for myself. What should we call it. A Scouter?"

"No. It has nothing to do with scouting." Nadia said, raising an eyebrow. "It's obviously a scanning device. Let's call it a PepScan."

"Well, I was thinking we could call it a Scouter because it kinda looks like... eh, never mind." Jason said, tossing the idea aside when he saw Nadia roll her eyes. "It's your invention anyway, so you get to name it. PepScan it is."

Jason rapidly configured the schematics in his mind, then he began to utter Words of Power, one after the other.

"Materialize. Augment. Manifest. Circuits. Integrate. Meld. Mold. Observe. Rewire. Circuits. Observe..."

It took him several long minutes, but eventually, he finished. The completed PepScan was held in his grasp. He stuck it to the side of his head, and it magically adhered without actually touching his skin or hair. He couldn't feel the weight of it at all. It was as if the PepScan was magnetically attached to his skull, but with a cushion of air in-between.

Jason looked at Nadia. He tapped the side of the PepScan, causing a stream of data to flow into his mind. Immediately, he was able to get a readout on her physical attributes, including her height, weight, genetic ancestry, and all sorts of other biological information. However, all scans of her brain provided garbled static. Since she had a MindCore, her brain and Mind Realm were shielded by an invisible fortress of spirituality.

Jason disappeared from the spot, taking himself and Nadia into his SpyNet. This was the first time he'd ever brought anyone inside, but since she already knew, there wasn't much point in keeping it hidden from her. Either he trusted her, or he didn't. He decided to lean further into their relationship, rather than holding up a pretentious barrier that held only symbolic meaning.

Like this, Jason casually picked a random old lady in Iowa. He scanned her, and all sorts of information came up. He captured all of her surface level knowledge, he downloaded her wisdom and insights, and even obtained all the information he needed on how to become a fairly solid and reputable sweater-knitter. Unfortunately, unless he practiced, that knowledge wouldn't prove much use.

Additionally, due to the fact he was remotely viewing her, rather than observing her from less than twenty meters away, a massive amount of the data came back garbled. Anything taken from her thoughts and soul ended up being corrupted to the point he wasn't sure if the information was reliable at all. Only physical details about her body appeared reliable.

"This PepScanner is... worrying." Jason said. "It's already bad enough to be spying on people without their knowledge. But to even extract their most secret memories and desires...?"

"I really do need it." Nadia said. "Not only to help you with Daisy, but to become the best brainiac possible for Aevum. This tool will improve my mental progress by a minimum factor of ten, and possibly up to fifty in some areas."

"Tell me the truth." Jason said, as he directed a wary look at her. "Are you planning to use this for any illicit reasons? Spying on old boyfriends? Taking revenge on people who've harmed you?"

"Old boyfriends?" Nadia scoffed. "Jason, you're the only..."

She paused, swallowing the words involuntarily. She looked away, her expression inscrutable. "No. I'm not going to use it to harm you, humanity, or anyone else. You can use your Wordsmithing to bind me to that promise if you like. It's probably for the best that you do."

A long moment passed as Jason considered doing just that. Nadia was already capable of vastly exceeding him when it came to intelligence. The PepScan would increase that level even further. A true superintelligence could not be limited by someone or something less intelligent. It just wasn't possible. Any restrictions Jason could think of, she could eventually break.

A thought came to him in that moment. This was the last chance he had to put a limiter on Nadia. Once he handed her the PepScan, he would be handing over total faith in her intentions. If she ever turned against him it would be a catastrophe.

It was clear that Nadia knew this. Even she feared what she could become. Right now he was 100% certain she was on his side. But what about a year from now, or ten years, or a thousand, or a million?

Would the state of today exist forever? Jason seriously doubted it.

"Nadia." Jason said, his tone solemn. "Did you delete that internal copy of me? The mental clone made from my memories?"

Nadia winced. She didn't meet his gaze.

"...No. I didn't." Nadia said quietly.

"I thought not." Jason said. "This PepScan has several hallmarks that indicate I myself must have designed it, not you. It even looks like something from an anime I used to watch. Why didn't you delete my mental copy?"

This time, a long, uncomfortable silence followed.

Nadia still couldn't look Jason in the eye. She rubbed her arms and turned her head even further away.

"I couldn't bring myself to kill him." Nadia eventually said. "I love you. I love him. I know you'll never love me. Your heart will always belong to Phoebe. If I killed him, I'd be killing the man I love."

Jason licked his lips. He sighed through his teeth.

"Did you tamper with my mental clone?" Jason asked.

Nadia finally looked at him. Her expression was one of awe at his guessing-ability. "Yes... I erased his memories of your family. I made him love me the way you love Phoebe."

"That's really fucked up." Jason said. "How can I trust you to do the right thing with this PepScanner if you're already doing questionable things like that?"

"I don't know." Nadia answered. "Maybe you shouldn't. Maybe I shouldn't have such a power. But this? All of this? Everything that's happened to me? This is on you."

Jason turned his whole body to face her. "Me? You're blaming me?"

"I was content to keep my powers hidden. I couldn't even use them without slowly dying a painful death of hollowed-out bones and a broken body." Nadia said, firming her resolve as she turned and faced him. "But you came back in time and changed the trajectory of my life. Before I met you, I was likely going to die from using my powers, or wallow in mediocrity with a broken body. You gave me a new lease on life and asked me to be your 'right hand assistant.'"

But Nadia was not done there. "You gave me my MindCore. You locked me in that mental prison and changed the trajectory of my life even further. I'm not the person I was before I came to Aevum, and that Nadia is never coming back. After filling me with all these feelings, even if you did it accidentally, you asked me to kill the only person who I was able to bond with over seven long decades in a mental prison."

Nadia shrugged her shoulders. "If not you, then who is responsible?"

"I understand what I've done to you. And I'm sorry." Jason said. "But you chose to rewrite that... that fake-me in your mind. Turn him into someone he's not. I didn't do that to you."

"No... but you are being a huge hypocrite right now, Jason." Nadia shot back. "First you build a SpyNet, then you worry I'll use the PepScan to invade people's privacy while ignoring that you're doing the same thing. Now you're concerned with what I did to my Mind Jason, but aren't you forgetting something? Or rather, someone? Namely... Fiona?"

Jason winced. He immediately lowered his eyes. Her retort came so smoothly that he hadn't seen it coming. And now that she mentioned it...

"I... I didn't rewrite Fiona's thoughts to turn her into a love slave." Jason muttered.

It was a feeble argument, and he knew it.

"No, you didn't do that." Nadia acknowledged. "But you did make a clone of your wife without her knowledge, then you put that clone in your head. In a way, you cheated on Phoebe, even if only mentally, with Fiona. Worse yet, while Fiona loved you just as much as the real Phoebe did, you ultimately split her off and locked her inside Chrona. In a way, her situation mirrors mine. You got to return home to a loving wife, but what about Fiona? You tore her from a life with you and left her alone, trapped in a dimension of your making."

After half a second of silence, Nadia took a figurative step back. "I'll admit that altering the memories of my beloved is certainly fucked up. But what were the alternatives? Erase him from existence? Let him remember the family who would never treat him as their beloved? That would be the same as what you did to Fiona."

Jason's expression was one of gloominess. Now it was him who couldn't meet Nadia's eyes.

Her words were not spoken with hostility, but merely the plain facts as she saw them. She did not call Jason a hypocrite merely to force him into giving her what she wanted, but to enlighten him and make him see the error in his ways.

This time, a full minute passed before Jason answered.

"Those are all... good points." Jason muttered. "I hadn't given these matters as much thought as I should have. I'm sorry."

"I'm sorry, too." Nadia said, as she fidgeted uncomfortably. "I didn't even want to say all that. I'd have preferred we just shoved everything under the table."

"No. You were right to say what you did." Jason asserted. He met her gaze. "I've been a hypocrite. It doesn't mean my criticisms are wrong. It doesn't mean that misusing this tool is okay, simply because I've misused a similar tool. But it's given me food for thought."

Jason gestured around himself broadly. "I made the Spynet to keep an eye on my enemies. But I don't know if it's right to have invented it in the first place. If humanity were not facing multiple existential threats, I would never have considered it. Even so, is giving up privacy for the sake of security the right decision? I don't know. I definitely wouldn't want this tool falling into the wrong hands."

"I agree." Nadia said. "The question is, are any hands the 'right' ones? Is it okay for you, of all people, to possess such power? Or me? Are we inherently more moral and virtuous than others?"

Jason snorted. "I'm certainly not. God. I don't know. This is making my head hurt. Here, just take the PepScan."

The Wordsmith pulled the PepScan off his head and tossed it toward her. Nadia caught it with a quick snap of her wrist. She didn't immediately put it on, but instead stared at it for a long while, feeling the weight of it in her hands.

"It's a shame we live in such interesting times." Nadia remarked. "I wanted to be an ordinary girl. Go to a university. Meet a nice young man. Raise a family. Live in a big house, and die of old age with my husband and children at my side."

"I don't know. That sounds awfully boring." Jason chuckled. "A lot of things have sucked since I got my Wordsmithing, but I've never once gotten tired of wielding godlike powers at the whisper of a word. Being superhuman is pretty badass."

"Yes. It is." Nadia smiled.

She put on the PepScan, allowing it to adhere to the side of her head.

"I meant what I said, Jason. I won't break my promise." Nadia vowed. "Everything I do will be for the good of humanity, for you, and for everyone we care about. I'm not going to betray you."

"I believe you." Jason said with a smile.

And he did. At least for now.

But he couldn't help quietly worrying about the future and whether he'd made yet another terrible mistake in this moment.

Only time would tell.

Part 774: MindCore v4

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Daisy stepped inside the surgery room inside Aevum, the very same one where Nadia and Catherine previously both had their MindCores installed. As she stepped inside, the anxiety and excitement on her face mixed into an indeterminate blob of both, causing her to oscillate between both at the same time, constantly. She was anxious due to all the side effects that could happen, and had happened, to Nadia and Catherine both. She was excited because both of them had clearly demonstrated the value of their MindCores, to say nothing of her own father.

Jason and Nadia were already inside the surgery room. Unlike 'real' doctors on Earth, they weren't wearing surgical garb, but instead, their normal clothes. Nadia looked a little apprehensive, but Jason was all smiles. Daisy wasn't sure if he was confident the surgery was sure to be a success after all his new improvements, or if he simply didn't want her to be afraid of the potential screw-ups that could happen inside her head soon.

"Hey, sweetie." Jason said, as he walked over and kissed his daughter's cheek. "Don't worry. Nadia helped me iron out a lot of kinks. This is going to be the smoothest surgery ever."

Daisy bobbed her head, but her stomach was in knots. "I... I really hope so, dad."

She looked at Nadia for reassurance, but the anxiety on Nadia's face didn't make Daisy feel any better.

After a long moment of hesitation, Daisy sat down in the surgery chair, and Jason reclined it backward, giving him full access to Daisy's head. For several seconds, he simply stood there, resting his hand on Daisy's shoulder.

"Honey, at Nadia's request, I'm going to give you a choice today." Jason said.

"A choice?" Daisy asked.

"Yeah. Basically, you pick from one of two types of MindCores. They're both going to be the v4 QuantumReflex you chose, but they come in different levels of 'potency' and installation difficulty."

Jason was standing on Daisy's left side. Nadia stepped over to her right.

"Basically, it's the choice between a MindCore and a MindCore Lite." Nadia explained. "The reason there's so much pain in the MindCore installation process is because we're trying to maximize every available piece of your Mind Realm to squeeze out performance and optimization. Your father, Catherine, and I all have 'full' MindCores. It made our MindCores painful to install, to say the least."

"But today, I helped your father design a pared-down version." Nadia continued. "Effectively, the v4 QuantumReflex Lite will have about the same performance level as the v1, albeit slightly superior, but it will be a lot smaller and more efficient, leaving 20% of your Mind Realm unused. That extra capacity means we won't be 'cramming' a full model in your head. The installation process will be, effectively, painless. You'll get a massive upgrade in your cognitive capabilities and it won't hurt at all."

Daisy looked at her dad. He smiled excitedly, seemingly wanting his daughter to pick the painless option. Then she looked back at Nadia.

"So… it won't hurt to install. But how much better is the full model?" Daisy inquired.

"The full model has a bit more than twice the power." Nadia admitted. "The 20% decrease in Mind Realm utilization also cuts the capabilities of the Lite Model in half. Naturally, this means someone with a Full model will think and react two times faster than someone with a Lite model."

Daisy's eyes immediately lost their shine. "I'm a Trueborn. I won't sacrifice my future capabilities just to endure a little less pain now. No pain, no gain. Give me the Full model, even if it hurts."

Jason squeezed Daisy's shoulder. "Honey, are you sure?"

"Dad, will the installation of the v4 Quantum Reflex Full model hurt as much as Nadia's v3 did?" Daisy asked, looking her father in the eye.

"No." Jason admitted. "We've done everything we could to make it a lot less painful."

"If you, Catherine, and Nadia could all endure the pain, then so can I." Daisy said, firming her resolve. "I won't accept less."

That ended the discussion. Daisy had made up her mind. Jason sighed. "Alright."

His smile faded a bit. As expected, his daughter was a lot like her mother. Phoebe wouldn't give up an opportunity to strengthen herself, and she wasn't afraid of enduring pain either. It made Jason proud, but it also scared him. He didn't want to hurt his little girl and make her cry. What father would?

Several minutes passed. Jason and Nadia took turns explaining the installation process to Daisy, with Jason explaining how the old one worked while Nadia focused on the improved system. Even though Daisy initially had no idea what was involved in a MindCore installation, she became shocked out of her mind when she compared her father's original methods to the new and improved ones.

"Dad, you ripped apart Catherine's Mind Realm and rebuilt it from scratch?" Daisy asked in shock. "You're lucky you didn't turn her into a cripple!"

"Yeah..." Jason said, averting his gaze. "And you wouldn't believe how much more painful it would have been if I were trying to install my v1 into her Mind Realm. The v2 and v3 were lightyears more advanced, and the v4 even beyond those. It will definitely be a lot less painful."

With the explanations out of the way, Jason got to work. Nadia attached the PepScan to the side of her head. It immediately started providing her with detailed readouts of Daisy's physiology, but her strong spirituality repelled it from reading her innermost thoughts and desires.

At the very least, Nadia could see the state of Daisy's Mind Realm, or the lack of it, for that matter.

Jason dove into Daisy's brain. When he arrived, he was extremely surprised. "Whoa... the spiritual energy in your undeveloped Mind Realm is richer than mine! This... this is crazy. I didn't know my little girl was so formidable."

"Yeah, yeah." Daisy said, feeling discomforted by the tingling sensations in her head, as well as her father poking around in there. "Just... get it over with, dad."

"Okay." Jason said.

After validating the amount of space he had available in Daisy's Mind Realm, Jason immediately got to work tilling the latent energy within her. He spoke Words of Power one after another, causing the unfocused mana within her body to spring to life. It was at this point that, silently, Jason started to realize something.

Daisy's soul is rainbow-colored, like mine. Is that why she has such a vast array of powers at her disposal? If I'm not careful, I could taint her energy and lock down her powers, reducing the diversity of options available to her.

Jason started work on Daisy's MindCore. Her QuantumReflex was based on monster physiology, and its main purpose was to give her enhanced reflexes, among other monstrous mental capabilities. Jason wasn't actually entirely sure what the effects would be, as ridiculous as that sounded. In the same way he didn't originally know exactly what it would 'be like' to have a GenesisFrame, or all the other minor drawbacks and benefits of such a thing, Jason wasn't entirely certain what abilities Daisy would obtain.

The RealitySim was relatively straightforward compared to the QuantumReflex. Jason used the power of Titan minds to create a MindCore that could simulate worlds. He hadn't anticipated accidentally locking Nadia into a 72-year torture simulator, but in the end, the RealitySim did about what he expected it to do. It was effectively a fully manipulable Holodeck inside Nadia and Catherine's minds.

But the QuantumReflex? It was a mish-mash of hundreds of different animal and monster brain simulations. Jason had picked and chosen from many different Earth and extra-terrestrial creatures to create v4 of the QuantumReflex, but aside from 'improved reflexes' and 'animal instincts', he just didn't know what it would do to Daisy.

This was, without a doubt, his biggest fear. What if he turned his daughter into a snarling bloodthirsty predator? Jason tried not to dwell on that possibility.

Minutes passed. Daisy squirmed a little, but otherwise laid still in the chair, her eyes closed. Jason operated smoothly and efficiently on her brain. By the point when Nadia and Catherine had started experiencing severe agonizing pain or pleasure, Daisy wasn't even gritting her teeth all that hard. Certainly, she was in pain. It felt like someone was slowly tracing a knife across her chest, back, and throat. But... it wasn't to the point she'd rather die.

Jason started to perspire. Before he could even think about it, Nadia had already grabbed a cloth and dabbed his forehead. Jason glanced at her for a split second, then returned his gaze to Daisy.

Nadia's move had been rather... intimate. The way she moved was as if she were his wife, lovingly dabbing his forehead so he wouldn't sweat all over his daughter.

Jason tried not to think about the implications of her actions. Now simply wasn't the time.

Just as Jason was starting to get into the mid-stages of Daisy's operation, his face spasmed. A jolt of pain just under his eyes made him wince.

What the hell was that? Jason thought. He felt like someone had slapped him across the face.

He blinked three times to clear his vision. Strange white spots danced in his vision.

After a moment, they went away. Jason frowned. This had never happened during the previous surgeries. Was he about to encounter another awful situation with his daughter?

He hesitated for a few seconds. He didn't want to hurt Daisy, but she didn't look to be in a lot of pain. If Nadia had been at a 9 out of 10 on the pain scale by this point of the surgery, Daisy was barely cresting a 4.

The surgery was going smoothly. Jason didn't dare to delay. He continued with the original plan.

Jason started melding bits and pieces of animal knowledge and instincts into Daisy's MindCore. As it slowly started to take shape, another jolt of pain shot into Jason's irises. He quickly squeezed his eyes shut and gritted his teeth.

"No, stop!" Daisy shouted. Jason gasped. Her voice sounded... child-like. Not like her current self.

He opened his eyes again. Nothing was amiss. Daisy continued to lay in the chair, obviously in pain, but not that much.

"Did... you... say something?" Jason asked through gritted teeth.

Daisy wheezed. "No, dad. Just... keep going."

Jason inhaled and exhaled. What the hell had he just heard? He was sure Daisy had said something. But the words didn't seem to actually come from her mouth?

He continued the surgery. This time, he melted part of an eagle's instincts into her. All at once, something struck his face with violent force, making his head snap backward. Jason felt his vision go white as he heard his daughter crying again.

"No, please... it hurts..." Daisy whimpered. "I want... my daddy..."

"You don't have a daddy. You're an orphan." A male voice said. The voice vaguely had a Russian accent to it. "If you want food, then do as I say. Lift the ball."

"I'm scared. I'm scared..." Daisy cried. "Please don't hurt me... I want my mommy..."

"Another injection." The man ordered. "The activity in her hippocampus is still underutilized. Too much activity in her limbic system. Her emotions are causing too many distractions."

A woman's voice spoke. "Doctor, it's been four hours... we should let her rest a while. She's only a child."

"A child with the power of a Hero!" The man snapped. "Get out of my sight! You're too soft!"

Jason felt as if a massive hand had grabbed his throat. He couldn't see anything, but he could feel a powerful hand pinning him in a chair, holding him down.

"Lift the ball. Lift it." The man ordered.

"I'm huck- huck... scared..." Daisy cried, as she struggled to breathe under the man's crushing grip. "Kah... helll-help..."

"You think you're scared now? You'll be pissing yourself once the Director approves the next round of stimulants. Now lift the ball or suffer the consequences."

The world came slightly into focus. Jason could just barely make out the shape of a face close to his. A masculine face. Jason felt that there was a blindfold covering his eyes. It was not as if Jason was seeing the face with his eyes, but some other sense. He could not only sense the scary face, monstrous like that of a demon, but also a hand and arm squeezing him by the throat.

An upright palm came into view with a small ball resting atop it. The man brought the palm closer.

"Lift. The ball." The man ordered.

"Nnn... c-can't... breathe..." Daisy gasped. She tried to move her arms, but they were strapped to the chair, along with her little legs. She was completely helpless, and terrified out of her mind.

"You'll BREATHE when you lift the BALL!" The man roared.

Daisy's vision faded. She passed out from lack of oxygen, and all at once, Jason's mind jolted back to the real world.

He inadvertently took two steps backward. His chest rose and fell with uncontrollable rhythm. He felt as if an anvil were crushing down on top of him.

It was Daisy's memory. He had experienced a flicker of a scene from her past.

He, a two hundred year old man, had been utterly terrified by the cruelty he just endured.

How would a six or seven year old girl, alone and helpless, have felt?!

"Jason?" Nadia asked with a frown.

Jason's eyes flicked over to her. His pupils were shrunken with fear. He was gasping quietly for breath like a man who'd barely survived an encounter with a raging tiger. From Nadia's point of view, he'd suddenly recoiled out of nowhere and started looking around like a madman.

Jason took a few seconds to collect himself. He wiped his arm across his brow. "It's... it's nothing. I just... the surgery is a little... intense."

Jason's fear and panic was already starting to turn into a form of fatherly rage. He'd heard from Daisy that her childhood was miserable. He'd suffered guilt over it, despair at his failure as a father to protect her.

But this was different.

Seeing it, experiencing it, feeling it from her point of view. He understood on an intimate level just how traumatizing that part of her life had been. She had 'only' gone through it from the ages of six to eight, before Vasily Sokolov adopted her.

Two of her formative years, her most vulnerable, were spent doing whatever powerful men had ordered her to do. They'd beaten her, abused her, treated her like a monkey in a cage. More than that, they had hurt her physically and psychologically. They'd molded her into a compliant 'good little girl' who did as she was told out of fear of getting punished.

In this moment, Jason understood, truly understood, why she craved power. She'd been made to feel completely weak and defenseless, and now she wanted to rid herself of that feeling.

Pain? What Jason was doing to her now could hardly even be called that. What was a light stabbing or tingling from the Father who loved her compared to the nonstop choking, slapping, and punching of violent men who abused her?

Jason wanted to cry, but now was not the time. He couldn't leave her in a half-finished state. The longer she sat with an incomplete MindCore, the likelier she would suffer a catastrophic breakdown or loss of mental function.

So Jason quickly got back to work. He ignored Nadia's probing stares. She didn't speak a question, but he could feel one in her gaze.

Jason worked quickly. Every so often, a memory of Daisy's would force its way into his mind. Each one was worse than the last.

A sensation of being pricked in the neck. Lava flowing into Daisy's body. Shrieks of begging, crying, asking the bad man to stop.

A slap sent her flying. She crashed against the wall. Then came loud demands to use her telepathy to kill the calico cat in the cell with her. Daisy did as she was told. The cat let out a shriek of pain before it fell to the ground, spasming as it died. Daisy cried.

Another orphan child, a little girl, was put in the cell with Daisy. She was told to kill the other girl. Break the orphan's neck, but also keep her alive for exactly five minutes, only allowing her to die when the timer ran out. Daisy did as she was told. She was a good girl. She never disobeyed the bad man. It was just the orphan girl's bad luck to end up with her.

They were taking her blood again. Daisy could hear them through the walls, talking about 'higher concentrations' and 'successful experiments'. She tried not to listen. If she performed poorly, they would beat her. If she performed well, they would demand more from her. She was so scared, she had begun to forget what a world without fear even was.

The surgery continued. Tears slid down from Jason's eyes. He didn't even notice when Nadia dabbed them dry. He gritted his teeth and continued to operate on his daughter. The rage he felt was rising to a breaking point. He didn't even know what he was capable of doing right now. His face was red from all the repressed feelings he was trying to keep inside.

And then, all at once, it was over.

The surgery ended. Jason put the last piece of Daisy's MindCore into place, then he sagged where he stood. He looked like he'd aged ten years in two hours.

It had taken a quarter of the time needed to create Daisy's MindCore compared to Nadia or Catherine's, and less than a tenth the time it took to install Jason's v1 GenesisFrame.

But for Jason, suffering the torture Daisy had experienced during her childhood, it felt like he'd spent years installing it. His emotions were in total disarray. He looked as if he'd stepped into a hurricane and crawled back inside after a gang of men beat the shit out of him. His eyes were baggy and haggard. His hair was weirdly unkempt. Even he had no idea what had happened to his appearance... nor did he care. His physical presentation was the last thing on his mind.

Daisy's eyes fluttered open. The pain from the operation had already faded into background noise.

"Uhhhnn... it's over, dad?" Daisy asked, looking blankly up at the ceiling. "I don't... feel... any different."

She hadn't noticed her father's appearance yet. Jason had taken several steps backward to try and collect himself, but he wasn't having much success. "It... um... it..."

"The MindCore isn't active yet." Nadia jumped in, seeing the look on Jason's face. She drew Daisy's attention to herself, giving Jason a moment to turn around and quietly use Wordsmithing to clean himself up. "Part of the v4 installation procedure is making sure it remains inert until we turn it on. Otherwise, what if what happened to me happened to you? We'd prefer not to trap you in a multi-decade simulation."

"Oh... that makes sense." Daisy said quietly. She slowly blinked her eyes, feeling quite fatigued. "Is it safe, then? Safe to turn on...?"

Nadia looked back at Jason, behind Daisy's operation chair. He turned around, looking refreshed. With the power of Wordsmithing, he'd quickly cleaned himself up, but Nadia could tell there was a jerkiness to his movements that wasn't there before.

"We can turn it on... sweetheart." Jason said gently.

He stepped toward Daisy, then leaned over her head. He looked down into his daughter's eyes, and she looked up at him for the first time.

"Dad? Are you okay?" Daisy asked.

"Yeah... it was a tiring procedure." Jason said through gritted teeth. "What was it like for you?"

Daisy pondered the question. "I don't know. I felt this pain... and warmth... it went back and forth. I could feel something happening... but then it was all over. I don't know why I'm so tired. You had to do all the work."

Jason quietly exhaled in relief. It was possible Daisy was lying, but he felt she was telling the truth.

What he'd witnessed... only he had seen. She hadn't been forced to relive her worst traumas.

"That's good, baby." Jason said, leaning over to kiss Daisy's forehead. "I'm glad you ended up okay, honey."

Daisy squinted. Her dad seemed softer and more loving now, but she couldn't put a finger on why. "You sure you're okay, dad? You can rest if you need to."

"I'll rest when I'm dead." Jason joked. He rustled Daisy's hair playfully, but Daisy felt the action was rather forced.

She could tell something was bothering her father, but she was too tired from the surgery to give it much thought. On top of that, her heart had butterflies now that she was thinking about the inevitable activation of her new MindCore.

Nadia helped Daisy stand up. Daisy rose to her feet shakily, feeling quite weak compared to her usual self.

"The new operation procedures reduce a lot of the pain and risk by making sure the MindCore is inert and deactivated during and after the surgery." Nadia explained. "We're not going to activate your new MindCore just yet. Instead, I'll take you back home, and you get some rest first. A good eight hours of sleep should do."

"But..." Daisy started to protest.

"No 'buts', young lady." Nadia chided. "Sleep first, fun new toy later."

"Yes, mom." Daisy said, sticking her tongue out at Nadia playfully.

Nadia smiled, but the fact Daisy referred to her as a mother also made her heart skip a beat for some indiscernible reason.

She led Daisy home and helped her into bed. Then she made her way back to the operation room where she found Jason laying on a couch in the back of the room. He was flopped onto his back, a cold washrag covering his face.

Nadia approached. She stopped a short distance away and crossed her arms.

"What did you see?" Nadia asked.

"Nothing." Jason mumbled.

"Don't lie to me. I observed several telepathic activity spikes during the surgery. Daisy must have been sending you mental images." Nadia said.

Neither person said anything for a short while. Jason eventually reached up and pulled the washrag off his face. He turned his eyes to the right to look at Nadia.

"It was her childhood." Jason said quietly. "I saw... terrible things."

"I thought so." Nadia said with a nod. "It's not too different from what happened with you and I, except instead of me downloading your memory-copy, you accidentally received telepathic images of Daisy's youth. The feedback loop was reversed due to the structural differences between v3 and v4."

"Cool." Jason grumbled, putting the washcloth back over his face.

Another long silence followed. Nadia sat down in front of the couch, facing Jason as she looked up at him from her spot on the floor.

"Do you want to talk about what you saw?" Nadia asked.

Jason didn't answer immediately.

He thought for a while, debating what exactly he wanted to do with this new information.

He couldn't just let it go. As a father and a man, he could have simply played stupid before, merely comforting his little girl if she mentioned her past. But now that he had the closest equivalent to firsthand experience with it, he felt he couldn't just sit idly by and do nothing. He had to be proactive. He wanted to be.

"I want..." Jason said softly. "...I want you... to go to the Spynet... and use all Aevum's resources to find the names and locations of several men and women. I only have visual images of them. I don't know their identities."

"Show me." Nadia said.

And so he did. Jason reached out a finger without looking, and Nadia touched her finger to his. Jason transmitted the faces of several Russian scientists to her. She crinkled her nose a few times.

"I don't know any of them. But I can find out who they are. Are they still alive?"

"No idea." Jason said. "They'd better hope they're not. I pray they are."

"Alright." Nadia said.

She stood up. She created facsimiles of the faces and appearances of the people Jason had given her, rebuilding them inside her RealitySim. Thankfully, Jason's memories, taken from Daisy, had also included representations of their manner of speech, their voices, their actions, and their personalities.

That would make it far easier to uncover who they were.

"You rest. I'll get to work." Nadia said, as she turned and left the room.

The door slammed shut behind her, and the medical facility fell silent, leaving Jason alone with his thoughts.

"...This place is so fucking cursed." Jason grumbled, as he realized three people had now been traumatized inside the surgery room.

Maybe MindCores were more of a pain than they were worth.

Part 775: Awakened

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Daisy slept like a baby. As soon as her head hit the pillow, it was lights-out, her brain spinning and whirling around at a speed so slow it felt like months passed. Her dreams were vivid but bizarre.

She somehow lived short lives of countless animals, large and small. The world distorted around her as she imagined herself crawling on tree trunks, swinging through the branches, flying through the air, swimming beneath the oceans, tracking prey, hiding and fleeing from predators, and countless other scenarios.

Her sleep was peaceful. It was exciting. She experienced dreams unlike any she had before, ones which sometimes left her heart racing in exhilaration and other times made her curl into a ball of fear.

Eventually, the dreams came to a close. Daisy awoke feeling like she was sleeping in a tropical swamp. Her entire body felt hotter than usual, and when she started to lift her head off the pillow, she felt the fabric sticking to her face.

"Huhhh...?" Daisy slurred. "Drool? I... drooledinmysleep?"

She was disgusted and mortified. Her pillow was caked in slobber. If she had a roommate or a boyfriend, she'd probably want to crawl into a hole and die from shame right then and there. She moved her arm to peel the pillowcase off her face, but her arm felt wet and gross too.

She then realized that she'd perspired like an insane woman all night long. Her entire bed was drenched in sweat, as if she'd been sprayed with a fire-hose. As soon as she pulled the covers off, she felt a chill from the slight movement of the air in the room. Just what the hell had she been dreaming about to cause such a weird reaction in her body?!

As soon as she tried to recall them, the memories of her dreams faded away. She sat up in bed and rubbed her eyes. She felt more well-rested than at any other point in her life, yet she also still felt lethargic and ready to go right back to sleep. It was a sensation she wasn't familiar with.

Daisy's eyes drifted to the clock on her wall. It showed it was almost 2 PM. And she had gone to sleep at 6 PM... the day before!

"I slept... that long?" Daisy asked nobody in particular. "Geez..."

She dragged herself out of bed, peeled her water-logged clothes off, and stumbled into the shower. As soon as the hot water streaked down her skin, she started to wake up, like a cold-blooded reptile awoken by the warmth of the midday sun. Before long, she had become fully alert, and she started to whistle a random song in the shower. The odd part was, she kept making strange bird noises with zero effort. She even found it easy to chirp like a songbird or caw like a crow.

"Is this the effect of my MindCore?" Daisy eventually wondered. "But dad said it wasn't turned on yet..."

Daisy brushed her teeth after showering. She quickly yanked all her bedding off and threw it in a special laundry machine her father had designed. It could wash a load in only five minutes, then dry it in five minutes as well. While she waited, Daisy started doing her morning stretches just to limber up for the day.

This, at the least, felt normal. She didn't sense that her movements were all that different from the usual, except that maybe her sense of balance seemed slightly better than before... but that could have been a placebo.

She pulled her bedding from the dryer, made her bed, then put on a blue and yellow training outfit. She had a feeling this would be a busy day, once her father turned on the MindCore for real. Secretly, she wondered if he'd screwed up again and it was already active.

Daisy teleported out of her room, arriving inside the medical facility. Less than five seconds after she arrived, her father popped in.

"Hey, sweetie!" Jason said with a smile. "Did you sleep well? You were down for so long I started to get worried."

"Sorry, dad." Daisy said, blushing out of embarrassment. "I, um, I did sleep a lot. But everything seems to have gone fine. I think I had some weird dreams though."

"Weird dreams?" Jason asked, his voice rising an octave. The blood drained from his face as a look of barely concealed fear washed over him. "L-like what, exactly?!"

"No, no, dad. It's not like, um, Nadia's situation." Daisy quickly explained. "They were just a little strange, is all. I can't even remember what they were."

"Oh... oh, okay. That's good then." Jason said, nervously smiling again. "Well, let's hurry up and get you checked out."

Ten minutes later, Nadia arrived, having been called over by Jason. When she entered, she and Jason started talking to Daisy about the surgery, and assessed her current condition as well.

"So, a copious amount of sweating while you were sleeping?" Nadia asked, her tone tinged with slight concern. "There shouldn't have been any major effects like that..."

"It scared me a little when I woke up, and it was um... pretty embarrassing." Daisy admitted. "But I thought it might be important for you to know."

"At the very least, it doesn't seem like you suffered any crazy mental or physical trauma." Nadia said with a nod, her expression becoming more relaxed. "We built you an entire Mind Realm from scratch. Even if we kept it turned off, I'm not surprised there were at least a few small side effects."

Jason used his Wordsmithing to look at Daisy's MindCore from the outside. By this point, her spirituality had been solidified to the point now that even with his Wordsmithing he could no longer forcibly intrude into the deepest recesses of her mind. He could only observe it from the outside.

"Uh oh." Jason said, causing Daisy to jump in alarm.

"Uh oh?!" Daisy repeated, looking at her father in alarm.

"I, ah, sorry. It's just... well, it seems a tiny part of your MindCore either wasn't deactivated like I expected, or it got turned on somehow. Either way... that explains the animal noises. Looks like maybe 0.01% of the MindCore was active last night. Goodness..."

Jason looked at Nadia. She nodded at him. That seemed to confirm something, so he returned his gaze to Daisy.

"Alright. I think it's time we turned this thing on. Not all at once, just a little bit at a time. Let's start by turning on your entire MindCore, but only at 1% power."

Daisy nodded. She had butterflies in her stomach due to anticipation and anxiety, but she wasn't a quitter, and she wouldn't back down once she made a decision.

She closed her eyes and waited as her father guided her through the process of turning on her MindCore. Daisy had no idea how to interact with it at first, but under his expert guidance, he was able to enter her MindCore along with a soul avatar of herself. They arrived outside the confines of a massive planet ten times the size of Earth. The two of them levitated in space, looking down on the super-massive world which should have bone-crushing gravity compared to Earth, but inside Daisy's Mind Realm, felt completely comfortable for her to drop down on and walk around.

The world was covered in diverse biomes. Oceans deeper than the ones on Earth, forests with trees the size of Earth's mountains, countless alien bugs and animals skittering and racing across the surface. Under Daisy's direction, the power of her 'planet' became active, and the life on it grew noticeably more energetic. Even viewed from outer space, she 'felt' the world come to life, and it sparked feelings of awe in her heart.

The two of them descended. They arrived on an alien world as different from Earth as Aevum was, with all its strange wildlife and other such things.

"There are many creatures on this world taken directly from Earth, but I didn't limit my horizons only to Earth." Jason explained to his daughter. "There are countless monster species referenced, as well as animals from Tarus II and other worlds I've visited. What makes the QuantumReflex special is that you will develop a powerful affinity to all forms of life, sentient and non-sentient alike. By observing them, you'll be able to learn how they live and adapt whatever you like about them into yourself."

"Are you saying I can transform into animals now?" Daisy asked.

"No, not at all." Jason said. "But animal instincts and knowledge and abilities, especially mental aspects, will become yours to control. Even I don't know how far that will take you."

He paused.

"Though now that you mention it, this MindCore would be great for Belial. Shame she's our enemy right now..."

"Aunt Samantha." Daisy muttered.

She could barely remember her aunt. It had been so many years, she only remembered Samantha's smile, and the way she could change faces to cheer Daisy up when she was crying. The rest of Daisy's memories were a blur at best.

"Anyway, let's focus on your MindCore." Jason said, breaking the spell. "Tell me about what you're feeling. Are you overwhelmed?"

"No... I feel... fine." Daisy said hesitantly. She looked down at her hands and arms, and they did feel slightly tingly, but that feeling faded after a while. "Let's activate the MindCore more fully."

"Okay. Let's increase it from 1% power to 5%." Jason suggested.

Like this, Jason slowly dialed up the power of Daisy's MindCore, bit by bit. Once they reached 20%, Daisy started to feel strange, very strange indeed.

"It's not bad..." Daisy said, "but I think I'm... I don't know. Let's return to the real world."

At her request, they did. When they opened their eyes back in the surgical ward, Nadia noticed immediately.

"My PepScan is picking up elevated brain energy levels." She said, holding up a small scanning device in her hand. She moved it toward the side of Daisy's head. "Looks like you turned on the MindCore with no adverse-"

Suddenly, Daisy's eyes snapped toward the beeping scanner in Nadia's hand.

DANGER!

Her instincts screamed a warning at her. Daisy quickly turned her body and recoiled from Nadia's hand. Before anyone could react, she launched a backhanded slap upward and sent the scanning tool flying out of Nadia's grasp, battering her entire arm out of the way and causing her to awkwardly tumble to the ground.

"Daisy! Nadia!" Jason exclaimed, the unexpected attack from his daughter startling him. He took a step toward Daisy, and her pupils shrunk to pinpricks.

DANGER!

She immediately sensed a threat coming from her father. Without conscious thought, Daisy quickly sprung out of the chair with catlike agility, swept her leg at Jason's feet to knock him off-balance, then thrust a palm at his chest. She struck her dad in the sternum and sent him fumbling backward, where he fell on his ass!

Jason and Nadia, both completely caught off-guard, fell to the ground and looked up at her in shock! Daisy's eyes reverted to normal, and her perceptions suddenly caught up to that instant in time.

"Ah-ahh!" Daisy cried. "D-dad, Nadia! I, I didn't mean to, oh my god! Are you both okay?!"

Nadia stood up and took a few steps back from Daisy. "I'm fine. Good... reflexes."

Jason coughed. Daisy's palm-strike hadn't carried any lethal force, it was a purely defensive move. Even so, he needed a Word of Power to soothe the mild pain he was feeling and restore the wind she'd driven from his chest.

"Well... that was a little... unexpected." Jason coughed.

He also stood back up. An odd atmosphere fell upon the room as he and Nadia observed Daisy once more, but this time from a safe distance.

"I don't know what happened." Daisy said, feeling a cold chill wash over her skin. "I just... felt like my life was in danger, and I reacted."

"That's obviously your MindCore showing its value." Jason said, massaging his chest. "Don't worry about it, honey. I'm resilient, and you didn't hurt Nadia. We expected something like this might happen. Dial your MindCore back down, and let's go to the training area to adjust you to your new normal slowly, rather than spiking your cortisol levels all at once."

"That's a good idea." Daisy said, smiling.

She felt a bit of guilt at attacking her father and Nadia like that, but she also knew it wasn't her fault. No real harm was done.

The trio departed, teleporting into the gymnasium where the other teenagers were currently training. As always, Jerome was pumping weights like crazy, using specialized equipment Jason had built that could exert multiple tons of weight onto specific muscles in Jerome's body to give him a full-body workout. Phoebe was there, too. She was running through an obstacle course, jumping over barriers, sliding between gaps in walls, climbing slopes, and doing other such things to hone her agility.

Sasha was also there, but she was mainly using her powers to make clothes atop a table that Marco and Brian were also sitting at. She really liked spending most of her time working on fashion. Jason thought it was a bit of a problem, but until she had a MindCore, he wasn't going to push her too hard.

Marco was... not doing much of anything. He and Brian were sitting together, playing cards off in the corner. Neither of them were particularly diligent about training their abilities. They yapped with Sasha while she tailored, and it was clear at a glance the trio were the laziest members of the youths Jason had brought. There was no urgency in their movements.

Jason didn't see Farrah at all, but he knew she was training her newfound shapeshifting abilities harder than before. She simply got embarrassed easily, and thus she didn't like to body-shift in front of other people.

"Jerome!" Jason said as they arrived. "Daisy just got her new MindCore. Would you mind sparring with her for a bit? Just light sparring. Nothing crazy."

Jerome grunted loudly as he benched five and a half tons of Wordsmithium-based dumbbells. He hoisted the heavy metal up and set it back on the bars.

"Sounds good, boss." Jerome said, wiping the sweat from his brow. "Just gimme a minute to clean up. I'm sweating like a motherfucker here."

Usually, Farrah would be hanging out with Jerome while he bench-pressed, giving him water and wiping off his sweat for him. She was a very supportive girlfriend in that regard, but ever since Jason talked to her, she'd been spending more time by herself.

Thus, Jerome had to take a few minutes to steady his breathing and cool the fire in his lungs. He grabbed a towel and mopped his face and neck before grabbing a sports drink and chugging half a liter of it in seconds.

Once he had recovered, Jerome hopped onto the sparring stage. A fight between him and Daisy was always the highlight of any day, so everyone dropped what they were doing and ran over to sit beside the stage. It wasn't a secret Daisy's MindCore was supposed to be installed the day before, so it seemed likely the surgery must have been a success. With only Jason, Nadia, and the Daughter of Heaven as examples, people still weren't entirely sure just how formidable MindCores were.

Catherine hadn't trained much with the humans. Jason was always busy with his Trueborn stuff, and Nadia wasn't a fighter. Thus, the effects of a MindCore on someone's combat capabilities were essentially unknown.

"Do you think Daisy is going to win?" Brian asked Marco as they walked over.

"Well, she already beat Jerome pretty handily before." Marco replied. "Jerome's been training a lot though, and he's way stronger than in the past. I guess it depends on if the brain-juicer makes her a better fighter...?"

"Seems her win is a foregone conclusion." Brian mused. "Let's just watch and see what happens."

The two of them sat down with the rest. Daisy hopped in the sparring ring and started bouncing lightly on her toes, a noticeable spring now in her step. Daisy had always been more agile than she was physically imposing, but now she seemed even lighter on her feet than before.

Jerome, meanwhile, simply assumed a forward-facing horse-stance with both fists raised. His expression was solemn. He'd already gotten his ass kicked several times by Daisy, and he'd never won a proper fight once she had gone all-out.

"No powers, no magic." Daisy said, her eye slightly twitching. "Let's do Sport Jujitsu rules."

"Jujitsu?" Jerome repeated, slightly bewildered.

This was a special type of sparring that was done more for sport and for reflex or body training than for maximizing damage. It involved light contact, no strikes to the face, no knockout punches, but take-downs were allowed with the goal of pinning the opponent to the mat or locking their movements with grapples. It was also the type of sparring he completely dominated her in. His strength was way higher than hers, especially after his recent training sessions. His body was tougher too, and he could take more abuse than before without even breaking his skin. He was damn-near bulletproof, at least to small-arms fire.

"You sure?" Jerome asked carefully.

"I want to know what I'm capable of." Daisy said, her tone fearless.

"Suit yourself." Jerome concluded.

Without any smack-talk, the two launched at each other. Jerome grabbed at Daisy, but her movements were noticeably snappier and more responsive than before. His giant hand grabbed at her throat, but she side-stepped, allowing his thumb to barely brush her neck as she darted around him and grabbed for his waist.

Jerome turned. He sent a palm strike at Daisy's shoulder to try and knock her off her feet, but she twisted her body at a weird angle. His palm once again missed the mark. She was forced to take a few quick steps backward as Jerome made three more attempts to pin her down and stop her from zipping to his sides.

Jerome seemed slow and clumsy compared to Daisy. Indeed, this was his biggest weakness in a battle among superior mortals. Against an ordinary human, even a professional MMA fighter, his movements would be extremely fast and fearsome. It was just that to Daisy, her newly enhanced brain processed information at an accelerated rate. She was easily able to outpace Jerome.

However, that was the extent of it. Daisy avoided getting grabbed, but she couldn't get close enough to Jerome to tackle him to the floor either. Eventually, she slipped up. Jerome's superior endurance made him outlast her by a substantial margin. Just when she was starting to get winded from going full-force with him for three minutes straight, Jerome finally pounced, grabbed both her shoulders, and threw her to the mat. It wasn't the most elegant win, but a point was a point.

Once Jerome grabbed Daisy, that was basically the end. Relying purely on her physical body, she was no match for him. It was like watching a heavyweight champion 'wrestle' a toddler. Daisy had only beaten him handily in the past by relying on her metaphysical powers. If she deliberately didn't use them, she lasted only a little longer than an ordinary human would against Jerome.

"Haha! Not bad!" Jerome said, standing up. "You're faster than before, and you react quicker, too!"

Jerome felt pretty good. He knew he couldn't 'really' beat Daisy, but at least if she didn't use her powers, he could eke out a win. The same wasn't true of her old man. Jason still handed Jerome his ass when they physically sparred, assuming Jason was allowed to wield a bo staff.

"Oh, Jerome!" Jason called out from the side of the arena. "The session's not done."

"Really?" Jerome asked. "What, we're doing multiple points this time?"

"No, well, I mean, yes." Jason answered confusingly. "It's just, Daisy's operation is complete and she has her new MindCore... but we currently only have it set to five percent power. Now I'll dial it up, and you'll try again."

Jerome blinked. "What? Five percent? She's this much faster, and that's only with her new brain-thingy at five percent??"

Daisy hopped to her feet and dusted off her shoulders. "Yup."

Jerome scrunched up his face. He looked Daisy up and down again. She'd certainly started moving a lot faster, but it wasn't anything he couldn't handle. Even if she became even faster than now, he'd still have the overwhelming advantage. Did the Archseer really think her MindCore would let her beat someone as strong as Jerome?

"Aight, let's catch our breath and go again in ten minutes." Jerome said, walking over to grab his sports drink. He started chugging it again, then sat down and relaxed, letting his heart rate drop back to normal.

Daisy mimicked him and took some time to relax her muscles. She did as her father asked and raised the QuantumReflex's power level from 5% to 10%. She looked out the window and sniffed the air. It seemed she'd caught the scent of cookies from off in the distance.

Jerome cracked his neck. The minutes passed by quickly, and eventually the two of them hopped back in the arena.

"My MindCore power level has doubled since we last sparred." Daisy warned Jerome.

"Twice the brains, still gonna lose." Jerome quipped.

He was a little nervous, mainly because he didn't want to underestimate her, but at the same time, Jerome was confident in his own abilities.

If Daisy didn't use her powers, Jerome was certain he was the top dog among Aevum's Heroes.

Could her MindCore really bridge the gap?

Jason made a chopping motion with the side of his hand.

"Round two, start!"

Part 776: Getting Clapped

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Daisy and Jerome took up their positions once more. The tiny crowd of onlookers whispered among each other, with the teens on one side of the stage, while Jason and Nadia were on the other. Phoebe also came over to join them, looking at the young man and woman on the stage with interest.

Jason made a chopping motion with the side of his hand.

"Round two, start!"

Daisy was the first to move. After suffering a loss in the previous round, she was eager to remind everyone that she was stronger than Jerome. Her father was the top dog in Aevum, and her mother was a bonafide badass too! As one of two Trueborn on the scene, Daisy couldn't allow herself to lose to a Lowborn. It simply wasn't right!

Daisy's MindCore was increased to 10% potency, up from 5%. This meant that functionally speaking, the effects of her MindCore were doubled compared to the previous round.

She charged at Jerome, then abruptly stepped to the side before he could even move. Jerome's hand grabbed at the spot where she had been about to stand, the side-step completely throwing him off. He quickly rotated his palm to slap toward her new position, but Daisy was already ducking again, causing him to whiff the attack.

Jerome was not an idiot, and he had a lot of combat experience, easily comparable to Daisy herself. He had never taken a life, unlike her, so he didn't have a trained bloodthirstiness burned into his bones, but the Illuminati had gone to a lot of trouble to train him for the entire year he'd been with them, from ages 17 to 18.

Thus, despite Daisy's spike in combat capabilities, Jerome adapted.

Daisy moved faster than before. She dodged attacks that Jerome hadn't even launched yet. He countered by mixing more feints into his arsenal.

Jerome twitched his body, retracting his right shoulder as if about to wind up a punch. Daisy dodged the incoming punch, only for his left hand to snap out and grab at her face. She dodged that too, but with way less leeway than originally planned.

Daisy continued to dog Jerome, dodging one attack after another, but she became continuously more and more frustrated by the fact that even if she was able to dodge him, he was moving a lot less than her, expending less energy over time, and relying heavily on his enhanced endurance.

Just like the first round, Daisy started to pant like a dog in a hot car. Her lungs burned as she tried to stay ahead of Jerome, while all he did was breathe a little harder than before. Daisy eventually seized an opening. She slithered around Jerome and grabbed his waist from behind to try and throw him to the floor, but his hand slapped the side of her head and sent her sprawling. When Daisy struck the ground, it took her a couple of seconds to shake off the slap and clamber back to her feet. Jerome didn't even make a move to pin her down.

Within three minutes, Daisy had once again completely run out of gas. She started coughing and wheezing, and her vision went blurry from lack of oxygen to her brain. Another light slap from Jerome left her in a heap, and this time, she didn't even try to get up. Her legs were on fire, and they started shaking from overwhelming adrenaline.

Jerome knelt beside her and put a palm on her back to pin her in place. She didn't have the strength to stop him, so round two was her loss as well.

After a few minutes of chugging sports drinks and wheezing out the fire in her lungs, a teary-eyed Daisy managed to climb back to her feet, but she looked way worse for wear. Two back to back losses had already started to grind her down.

Jerome didn't mock her. He knew that if she used all her powers, she'd lay him out in seconds. He found it admirable she was pushing her physical body to its limits. After all, wasn't that what he did every single day? There was no disrespect in his eyes.

"You rely on your powers a lot." Jerome remarked. "You ain't used to usin' your raw physicality. Yeah, you're movin' too fast for me to land a solid hit, but you're also blowing too much steam to dodge me. I can just stand in place and let you dance til your legs start shakin'. It's over after that."

Daisy grimaced. She lowered her eyes, feeling slightly humiliated. She knew Jerome was a big tough guy and all that, but there was no hatred or mockery in his words. Sure, he could be arrogant and prideful, but he loved fighting and he was genuinely trying to help her out.

That didn't change the fact she'd lost twice. She still felt humiliated because of her own inadequacy.

"I'm going to... raise my MindCore... to 20% this time." Daisy said through choked breaths. "I'll keep in mind what you said."

Round 3 began far less explosively than round 2. Everyone present now knew of Jason's general powers, so he didn't hold back in restoring Daisy and Jerome's stamina. Almost everyone still knew Jason as the 'Archseer' but even the dullest-witted or least observant among them would have had to be truly stupid to not notice Jason's powers going way above and beyond that of a mere 'dream eater'.

While his identity as the Wordsmith was not directly known, it was practically a given that all the teenagers knew he was the true architect of Aevum. Their respect and admiration for him had only grown fiercer as time passed. The fact he looked like a teenager meant nothing, because he carried himself as a proper elder would. It was obvious he was not some immature youngster, lacking in wisdom.

With their stamina and bodies restored, Daisy and Jerome launched toward each other, initiating another fast-paced sparring match. This time, Daisy focused less on using full-body movements to dodge Jerome, but instead used smaller evasive maneuvers to make him miss by tinier thresholds.

Immediately, there was a big improvement compared to her first two rounds. Daisy conserved more energy and didn't get winded nearly as fast. Jerome managed to slap her a couple of times, taking care to hold back his strength and not injure her. If she were using her powers, he'd definitely be the one running out of gas as he struck with his full power. Even so, despite landing a few blows, Daisy managed to remain on her feet for nearly six full minutes.

Eventually, she lost again. The margin of victory for Jerome was growing thinner and thinner, and he was now starting to see the advantages her MindCore provided.

"We'll increase your MindCore to 50% power." Jason said, after he and Nadia deliberated for a while.

Round 3 had ended with his little girl's loss, and even Jason was starting to feel bad for her. This was not how he anticipated the MindCore's effectiveness playing out. Even at a mere 20% power, she should be several times more intelligent and fast-reacting than before. Maybe 50% would provide a serious boost?

Daisy nodded. "Okay, dad. If I still lose, I'll be too embarrassed to even think of fighting Jerome at 100% power."

Under Jason's guidance, Daisy raised the energy coursing through her MindCore until it reached 50% saturation. This forced her to take several minutes to adjust.

Daisy felt like a limiter had broken. She looked around the room and noticed countless details that made the hair stand up on her body in alarm. There were bugs crawling on the walls she hadn't noticed before, a bird that was perched outside one of the windows, looking down at the teenagers with mild interest. She smelled the sweat on Jerome's body, which caused her vision to waver, slightly. He smelled oddly nice in a way she couldn't verbalize.

Daisy stepped into the arena again. As Jerome approached, his scent grew more overpowering, more intoxicating. Daisy's pupils dilated slightly as her eyes were drawn to the curvature of his muscles, the slickness of sweat on his forehead, even the muskiness of his hair. She felt an odd 'craving' somewhere in her body she hadn't experienced before, her mind conjuring images of Jerome pouncing on her, pinning her to the ground, and holding her down while she cried out in protest, yet eventually succumbing to his manly-

Daisy quickly blinked her eyes and looked away, blushing madly while feeling slightly flustered. What the hell was that?

Was she a goddamn animal? Jerome was obviously spoken for and had a girlfriend. Daisy was an intelligent young woman, not a freaking cat in heat. She had no idea where these weird feelings had sprung from, but the culprit seemed to be her MindCore.

She smacked the side of her head to try and get her mind back in focus, and this motion made Jerome and the others raise their eyebrows. There was a stilted oddness to Daisy's movements, but nobody could quite put their finger on what that oddity was.

"Round 4, start!" Jason shouted, making a chopping motion with his palm.

Daisy's eyes narrowed. She lunged at Jerome like before, and he took a step back to try and swat her away, like he had several times now.

But this time, Daisy didn't just passively dodge his slap. Instead, she pulled back, allowed his palm to pass the spot where her face would have been, then she deliberately struck the back of his hand, increasing his momentum and making him swing harder than he intended.

Like this, Jerome's balance was thrown off! His casual slap abruptly accelerated halfway, and this caused him to stumble forward a couple of steps. He recovered, only to see Daisy springing off her hands and sending a foot flying at his face.

Thunk!

Her kick slammed into his jaw and spun his head, jarring Jerome's senses. He completely lost his footing and fell to the side, hitting the ground with a hard impact.

Jerome landed on his shoulder and grunted. He wasn't hurt. Daisy's strongest physical attack, lacking any magic to enhance it, would never be able to cause him serious injury unless she were stabbing a finger into his eye or something. A kick to the chin only jarred his brain and turned his vision blurry for a second.

He quickly shook off his dizziness, then started to climb to his feet. But Daisy wasn't in front of him anymore.

Just as Jerome was about to look for his opponent, two palms clapped on both his ears, blasting his head with pain. Jerome cried out and fell to the floor, cupping the sides of his head as stars danced in his eyes and a screeching sound erupted inside his head. He felt Daisy climb on top of him to pin him down, but he was in such pain that he needed several seconds before he could open his teary eyes.

When Jerome finally recovered, he was still dizzy and nauseous. Clapping someone's ears was an extremely effective tactic that bypassed even Jerome's defenses and endurance. It directly crippled him and left him vulnerable on the ground.

"Sorry." Daisy said, as she tried to help Jerome to his feet. "That was a dirty tactic."

"Yeah. Bitch move." Jerome hissed through gritted teeth, shaking Daisy's grip off his arm. He shot her a nasty glare. "That fucking hurt like hell!"

Jason intervened to heal Jerome's ears, but it was clear the teenager was pissed about Daisy clapping his head like that. The first kick to his chin wasn't bad, he would have accepted it. But the double-ear clap was a scummy move that only worked because he was momentarily incapacitated.

Daisy was happy because a win was a win. But she also believed she hadn't really earned the victory, and the fact she'd hurt Jerome sent her emotions into turmoil. Thus, instead of increasing her MindCore another level, she kept it at 50% for the next fight.

They began Round 5 similarly to Round 4. This time though, Jerome's expression was noticeably more menacing. His movements became more focused, and he looked at Daisy with visible anger in his eyes.

Daisy's skin prickled. For the first time, Jerome rushed at her from the start of the round, and something screamed in the back of her mind.

DANGER!

She moved without intending. Jerome's slap careened toward her much faster than before, with a lot more force put behind it. Daisy dodged the slap, her heart racing.

He was truly enraged. He was out for blood. Jerome usually respected other people in fights and tried not to go too hard on them, but in his mind, Daisy's clap had been an act of cowardice, and that had sent him over the edge.

He slapped again, and again. Daisy was forced on her back-foot, her danger sense roaring in the back of her mind like a rabbit fearing the snapping jaws of a hungry mountain lion.

Jason narrowed his eyes. He watched from the sidelines, frowning as he easily picked up on the bloodlust in Jerome's movements. Immediately, Jason's protective fatherly instincts flared up. He took a step forward, but Phoebe grabbed him by the back of his collar.

"No." Phoebe said, restraining Jason. "Don't interfere."

Jason pulled his gaze away from the anxiety-inducing fight to glower at Phoebe. His expression softened, because he couldn't stay angry at his 'wife' for any length of time. "Why are you stopping me?"

"Because Jerome is still holding back." Phoebe said. "He's just holding back a lot less than he was before."

Jerome started slapping at Daisy faster and faster. He stomped the ground, causing the arena to buckle and her to nearly lose her footing. A lesser combatant certainly would have, but Daisy's MindCore sped her mind up and granted her catlike reflexes. When she lost her footing and started to fall, she simply turned in midair, planted her palms on the ground, and lowered herself back into a crouch.

A furious melee followed. Jerome started chasing Daisy around the arena, slapping toward her with enough strength to shatter concrete walls. Each time Daisy dodged, she kept her movements to a minimum. Her animal instincts grew stronger every second the fight continued. Jerome clawed toward her chest with his fingernails, a move that might rip the skin off her bones, but she only allowed herself to pull back with an inch or two to spare.

Just when Daisy thought she had an opening, Jerome revealed a secret move he hadn't used before. He violently clapped his palms in front of himself with his full strength, causing a shockwave to fire out, slam into Daisy, and send her flying! Daisy spun through the air, twisted her body, and landed on her hands and feet like a cat would.

"Ring out!" Jason shouted.

Jerome took two steps toward Daisy, as if barely containing his anger and still wanting to slap the teeth out of her mouth, but when Jason's words registered, he slowed his momentum and came to a stop.

Daisy's ears were ringing now. She and everyone else experienced the pain of Jerome's 'Thunder Clap', but it wasn't nearly as strong as one Bael or another mighty entity might perform. Daisy gritted her teeth, feeling her proprioception thrown off. Little did she know that her father explicitly called ring-out in order to end the fight because he was worried about the anger Jerome was displaying.

"Jerome!" Jason said, quickly stepping between his daughter and her opponent. "You need to calm down. You're flying out of control!"

"Oh, now daddy has to step in huh?" Jerome spat. "Your little bitch of a daughter nearly blew my fuckin' eardrums out!"

"I said I was sorry!" Daisy replied, rising to her feet.

"Oh, and that makes it okay?! Just try to hurt someone for real in a sparring match, but if you apologize it's all good?!" Jerome argued.

A moment of silence followed. Jerome directed a nasty look Daisy's way, and she lowered her eyes, wanting to defend herself, but also feeling guilty about what she'd done.

"I'm sorry, okay?" Daisy said, lowering her voice. "I don't know what came over me. Maybe it was my MindCore. I just really wanted to win and... I don't know."

Jerome licked his lips. He was still pissed, and he looked like he wanted to say something, but ultimately, he decided not to. He turned around and stormed away.

"Whatever! Go play with yourself then, arrogant bitch! I'm done with you!"

"Hey! Jerome, hey! Young man, I'm talking to you!" Jason shouted at Jerome's back.

"Fuck off!" Jerome roared back. "Miss me with that 'old man Jason' bullshit! I ain't in the mood for you!"

He didn't even look backward. He simply kept storming forward until he left the gymnasium, slamming the door hard enough to break the frame.

After the thunderous exit, the entire room went quiet for a while.

"Dad..." Daisy whispered. "I... I didn't mean to. I feel so bad but like... I don't know... what do I do?"

"I know you didn't, baby." Jason said, turning around to smile consolingly at her. "He's mad, but that's okay. It's better he gets it out of his system."

"I screwed everything up." Daisy mumbled, feeling completely dispirited. "So much for testing my new MindCore."

"Why don't you spar with me?" Phoebe asked, stepping forward. She smiled gently at Daisy. "Don't let Jerome get you down. You couldn't make up the size and power gap between the two of you, which forced you to use a cheap trick. I'll make a better opponent for you than he was."

Daisy's eyes brightened. "Really, mo- uh, Miss Berthold? You'd do that for me?"

Phoebe noticed that Daisy had almost called her 'mom' again, but she pretended not to hear. "Of course. I watched your fight, and I think you might make a good sparring partner for me as well. Let's give it a shot."

Daisy bobbed her head up and down excitedly, her momentary depression vanishing into the wind. She still felt bad about Jerome, but ultimately he was just 'some guy' she'd only known a couple of weeks. Compared to getting to spend time with her mother, his anger left little impact on her psyche.

It might seem selfish to some people, especially Jerome's friends, but Daisy was only 18, and another 18-year-old holding a grudge didn't matter much to her.

Daisy hopped back up, unable to stop herself from smiling ear to ear. She jumped into the arena and raised her fists, while Phoebe casually walked over and stood in place, resting her hands on her hips.

"Your new MindCore sounds interesting." Phoebe said. "Why don't you raise its power right to 100%?"

Daisy's smile faltered. She was taken aback. "S-seriously? I don't know... that sounds dangerous. I wouldn't want to hurt you."

"I was one of King Arthur's knights." Phoebe said. A hint of arrogance flashed in her eyes. "My mentor taught me well. If I lose to a little girl, then that merely proves I need more training."

Jason slightly frowned. Phoebe's attitude lately was starting to feel drastically different from the one he knew. Of course, 'his' Phoebe would never talk to their daughter that way, and obviously this Phoebe was not Daisy's mother. But even so, talking down to a teenager like that just wasn't something Phoebe would do.

Daisy didn't even notice the arrogance in her mother's words. Rather, she recalled the last time she got her ass handed to her when she sparred with Phoebe, as well as the thought that Phoebe was way stronger than her. It was only natural her mother would be so arrogant! Clearly this was why her father had fallen in love with her mother. Phoebe was just that much of a badass!

Thus, the misunderstanding persisted and was amplified even further.

Phoebe grabbed the 'Noodle Swords' from before and tossed one over to Daisy. "Show me how much you've improved."

Daisy caught the weapon with much greater ease than before. "I won't use my abilities this time. Only my MindCore."

"That's not necessary." Phoebe said with a smile. "You can go all-out."

"It is necessary. I want to see what my mind and body alone can do." Daisy retorted.

"Alright. Suit yourself then." Phoebe concluded.

Like this, the two women stood apart from one another. Jason's eyes flickered between them, many strange thoughts swirling in his head.

Mainly, Jason couldn't stop thinking about how strangely Phoebe was acting, and what a massive power boost the Sphinx had given her. It was very different from the boost granted to the other three people who had acquired the Sphinx's power in the past.

Still, Jason kept his thoughts to himself. It was true that Phoebe had completely whooped Daisy's ass the last time they sparred. Even if Daisy got a MindCore upgrade, without using her powers, he didn't see a path to victory for her. Maybe what he saw as 'arrogance' on Phoebe's behalf was simply well-deserved confidence?

Daisy's expression grew solemn. Now that it came down to it, she was a little scared of pushing her MindCore right to 100% strength. At 50% she'd acted way out of character and really hurt Jerome. What if she turned into a mindless animal and beat the crap out of her mom? Daisy would never forgive herself.

But Phoebe was so casual about the whole affair, and Daisy had lost so badly to her last time, plus they were using the silly noodle swords... it would probably be fine.

Daisy tapped into her MindCore. She increased its power draw to 100%. In that moment, her senses sharpened to their maximum value, and the world around her came into sharp focus.

For the first time, Daisy started to see colors she hadn't before. It was as if the world had become enriched with ten new colors she didn't even originally know existed. When Daisy looked at Phoebe, she realized her mother's body was cloaked in a faint reddish hue. The hue was barely noticeable at the edges of her body, but extremely obvious around her chest, and especially her head. The intensity of the color pulsated irregularly. Daisy had no idea what it meant.

When Daisy's eyes flickered over to the other people in the room, she saw a whole assortment of colors. Marco and Brian were both colored blue, Sasha was purple, Nadia was green, and her father had a rainbow hue to him. Jerome wasn't there anymore, and Farrah hadn't shown up either, but Daisy already had a lot to take in, so she didn't notice.

They weren't standard colors. Daisy equated them to the colors she knew, but they were so dramatically different that she felt like she had to call them by weird names. Not blue or red, but Bled. Not yellow or orange, but 'yornglow'. It didn't make sense. What the hell were these colors?

Nobody in the room had any idea what Daisy was seeing. Phoebe raised her sword in a casual defensive stance.

"Your move first, young lady."

Daisy blinked her eyes, as if coming out of a daze. This was no time to be worrying about funny colors. She had a fight to win!

"I'm ready for anything!" Daisy said, as she raised her sword to match her mother.

Jason made a chopping motion with his hand.

"Round one, start!"

Part 777: Predator and Prey

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

As soon as Jason chopped his hand down, Daisy attacked.

She didn't tap into her powers at all. She had already done so the first time she sparred with her mother, and the two of them had engaged in a few minor practice sessions over the last few weeks, but Phoebe spent most of her time catching up on the trends of the modern world, being taught by Nadia and Jason about how modern society functioned. She didn't have time to train with the teenagers; that would come later.

Thus, this first round was merely Daisy wanting to determine the full extent of her MindCore's effects on her physical body. She didn't use her powers, only her animalistic instincts and sharpened senses. She wanted to figure out what her new baseline was, and if she used her powers out the gate, it would undermine that information.

Like this, Daisy lunged at Phoebe!

She jumped forward and sent a quick wrist-sweep of her sword toward Phoebe's chest.

Phoebe unhurriedly stepped back, allowing the blade to miss her leather shirt by an inch or so, as she'd done in all their previous spars.

Daisy followed up with a sidestep, a thrust, a sweep, and another thrust, quickly moving to close the distance. Her MindCore rapidly started showing her all the possible movements Phoebe could make, so she instinctively knew she would be able to close off her mother's evasive movements so long as she-

"You're overthinking it." Phoebe said, as she started speeding up, moving her body faster to match Daisy's brisk pace. She sidestepped the first stab, used her sword to knock the sweep slightly off-course, and turned her body ninety degrees to avoid the second stab.

Phoebe made no moves to attack. She simply dodged and deflected Daisy's attacks with the greatest of ease.

"Shit." Daisy cursed, gritting her teeth.

She attacked again, and again, and again. Phoebe, ever the noble knight, opted not to fight back, only to defend her position. She spotted dozens of openings she could easily strike at to shut down Daisy's offense, but this spar was not about Phoebe's prestige. It was about teaching Daisy to utilize her MindCore more effectively.

The more Daisy moved, the more she began to intuit all the wonderful new changes her MindCore had given her. What was interesting was that it seemed to bestow upon her a form of combat comprehension similar to what Nadia possessed. Daisy was able to observe her mother's movements and mimic them much more easily, her brain absorbing its moment-to-moment losses and recontextualizing them to teach Daisy lessons about the art of combat.

A minute ticked by. Sweat started to accumulate on Daisy's forehead, while Phoebe appeared as unruffled as ever.

"You're way too aggressive." Phoebe remarked casually, sidestepping another thrust. "You fight as if the goal is for you to die of exhaustion before I ever counter-attack. This is not an effective combat style, let alone when engaging someone stronger than you."

Daisy grunted. Her mother's words felt slightly mocking, but they were steeped in a wisdom that could clearly only be gained by someone trained by King Arthur himself! Clearly her mother had gone through all sorts of crazy battles against the demons to become so wise. Daisy had no idea that Phoebe was only an above-average swordswoman before Bahamut took her. Capable of besting a young and inexperienced Jason in the future, but far from the increasingly lofty heights her daughter was now imagining her to be standing atop.

Jason had no idea his daughter's view of her mother had become so distorted. It didn't even occur to him that his daughter only recalled childish memories of her mother from when she was six years old, having zero concept of Phoebe's actual future combat competence.

The one time Daisy had been involved in a battle, she hadn't been on the battlefield along with her mother, and had only fought to protect her comatose body after Phoebe had totally exhausted herself on the front-lines.

Daisy paused her frenetic movements. She swallowed a few heavy breaths, feeling her lungs start to burn.

A minute of fighting might not seem like much, but the truth was, clashing blows with another person was exhausting, even more so when every attack ended up cutting the empty air. It meant all the force she'd put into every attack was wasted, burned up for zero gain. Most humans could only sustain a minute or two of frantic fighting before they were totally exhausted. Daisy was way above the curve, she probably had several more minutes of gas left in her tank before she ended up a sputtering mess on the floor, but her baseline physical body was nothing extraordinary.

Daisy did not possess superhuman strength or durability, not innately. However, her telekinesis was capable of uplifting her physical parameters drastically. By 'coating' herself in telekinetic energy, she could greatly enhance the power of her attacks, enhance her defenses to the point she could even shrug off bullets, and amplify her speed by manipulating her body with her mind.

Thus, after a moment of deliberation, Daisy nodded.

"Alright, Miss Berthold. I'm... I'm going to use my full power now."

"Please do." Phoebe said, as she now assumed a much more dominating posture, both hands wrapped around the hilt of her sword. She stood facing Daisy, her legs slightly apart, firmly planted on the ground.

Daisy regulated her breathing. She sent her telekinesis inside her body, sweeping away her exhaustion and forcibly extracting the built-up C02 in her lungs. The burning sensation faded after a few moments.

Daisy had no way of knowing this, but if a Psion were to see her, they would immediately define her actions as those of a Body Enhancer Psion. Daisy's methods were crude, unrefined, and the product of an amateur with no formal instruction. Compared to the raw power even lowly 3rd and 4th Level Psions wielded, her body enhancing wasn't much to speak of. But even so, the fact a mere mud-dwelling species could be capable of mimicking a fraction of the Psion's capabilities would certainly alarm the Founders.

The young woman might not be aware of these things, but her father certainly was. While Nadia used her PepScan to observe the changes in Daisy's body, Jason did the same with a quiet bit of Wordsmithing. He had observed Daisy many times, so he was not surprised by her primitive form of Body Enhancing. Rather, he was surprised by how much more smoothly she completed the process. It was as if she had instinctively mastered some elements of her power without even thinking about them.

So that's how it is. Jason pondered. The MindCore isn't just giving her 'animal' instincts, it's also helping her assemble the knowledge she already has into better-organized information that she can call upon instinctively. She already has lots of practice with her abilities, but the flow of her psionic energy is something like 40% smoother than it was before the surgery. I didn't know the QuantumReflex had such a property, but this IS why we do field tests; to gather hard data.

The muscles inside Daisy's body tightened and grew denser, far beyond what their mundane physical limits should allow. If a young woman aged eighteen could bench-press several hundred pounds after a year or two of training, Daisy was easily five to ten times beyond that level. She was reaching a level beyond even professional bodybuilders and MMA fighters.

At the same time, Daisy's telekinesis coated her skin, forming something like an invisible dermal armor. This was actually not part of Body Enhancing, but instead a different Psionic discipline known as Primal Psionics. By expanding their available psionic energy pool as much as possible, Primal Psions would gain the power to use huge 'blobs' of it for all sorts of vicious and blunt purposes.

However, if Daisy were to instead use small, surgical amounts of psionic energy to deflect bullets at lightning fast speeds, preventing those bullets from ever getting within a few feet of her body, this would instead be an application of Precision Psionics.

Daisy was capable of such a feat... albeit to a limited degree. She simply found it wasn't reliable enough to be used in a real world situation. In order to become a master of Precision Psionics, one would absolutely need to become a Brain Enhancer Psion first, and those were few and far between.

After a short few moments, Daisy completely restored her body to its peak physical condition, and elevated herself even beyond that. She momentarily frowned, looking down at her abdomen with a confused expression.

"Is something wrong?" Phoebe asked, now looking at the girl before her with a higher degree of wariness than before.

"No. Not wrong. Just... different." Daisy said, before pausing to add, "I feel like I can 'sense' more than I did before. My body seems stronger than the last time I 'boosted' myself. Maybe it's because of my MindCore."

"It almost certainly is." Phoebe said with a nod. "Come. Let's fight a bit more seriously this time."

With that, their second round began. Daisy lunged again, her movements astoundingly faster than before.

Phoebe's pupils shrunk. She darted backward, her body weaving left and right as Daisy sent out fast, yet measured slashes toward her. Vertical and horizontal cuts sliced the air, still missing Phoebe, but with a much smaller margin of error than before.

Their melee sped up even beyond that. Phoebe started rapidly battering her sword against Daisy's. The spectators gasped. This was way different compared to the first time Daisy had fought Phoebe a few weeks earlier. Phoebe was moving fast, anticipating Daisy's strikes, but Daisy was anticipating her dodges and performing quick feints to throw her off. At the same time, Phoebe recognized the feints and threw in counter-feints.

Daisy and Phoebe's swords started colliding, banging against each other like the sound of trees being slammed against the ground. Vibrations rang in the air, causing the onlookers to grit their teeth. The interesting thing about Jason's Noodle Swords was that they caused no damage when striking a person's body, and couldn't even be used to poke out an eye. But against physical objects, they struck with the same force as real wooden swords would, albeit indestructible ones.

Thump, thump, crack! Slam!

Phoebe batted Daisy's sword downward and it hit the floor hard enough to make the ground vibrate. The spectators felt that vibration rumble through their butts, given they were sitting on the floor a ways outside the arena.

"God damn. How hard are they hitting?!" Marco gasped.

"Hard enough that if they were to slap you, you'd probably have your head go flying." Brian replied.

"Unbelievable." Sasha said. "Daisy couldn't last more than a few minutes against Phoebe just a few weeks ago, but thanks to her MindCore, she's finally on par with Phoebe! I can't wait to get one of my own!"

Unfortunately, Farrah wasn't present to witness the incredible fight, and Jerome had stormed out. The remaining three could only chat among themselves.

Nadia, meanwhile, was much more aware of the truth of the fight.

"Daisy's still losing, and it's not close." Nadia remarked to Jason with a low mutter. "Phoebe's merely feeling her out."

Jason nodded. "Phoebe sure became incredible after obtaining the Sphinx. I never saw this level of power coming."

His attention was firmly focused on the fight. He didn't even notice when Nadia gave him a strange look out of the corner of her eye. Nadia returned her gaze to the arena and sighed. She had already deduced there was something going on with Phoebe beyond what she had told Jason. Phoebe wasn't telling him the full truth of what had happened, and that worried Nadia.

Nadia wouldn't let the man she loved be taken by surprise. Even if Jason wasn't her Jason, she still had to watch out for his blind spots. Phoebe and Daisy were by far his biggest weaknesses.

Two minutes passed. For once, Phoebe was starting to sweat a little, but Daisy was definitely looking worse for wear. She had eased up a little and not fought as aggressively, but it turned out that even her empowered body, definitely stronger than pre-MindCore, was still below Phoebe's physical form.

Daisy's arms were starting to hurt. Each time her sword collided with Phoebe's, it was like it had crashed against an anvil. Sometimes Daisy's sword even felt like it was about to get wrenched from her grasp, so she had to grip it even more tightly.

The young woman's fingers silently begged her for mercy. They were starting to weaken from all the impacts.

"You're still holding back." Phoebe said, dodging three more slashes while parrying a fourth. "Unleash all your telekinesis. It's the only way you can win!"

Daisy wanted to nod, but she simply didn't have a spare second to do so. She kept maintaining her furious assault while tapping into her telekinesis again.

At once, Phoebe's movements began to noticeably slow. Daisy started pressing down on her mother with a wall of telekinetic powers, increasing the gravity around her by a factor of ten. Phoebe's body, 140 pounds, suddenly felt like 1400 pounds, nearly 2/3rds of a metric ton.

Phoebe was still strong enough to resist the force, but now when she took a step, her feet struck the ground as if she were an even fatter Bael, causing footprints to indent into the floor.

With this added layer of obstruction, Phoebe and Daisy's combat capabilities abruptly equalized. Daisy's attacks finally started connecting. She landed her first glancing slice on Phoebe's right shoulder. Phoebe, not one to be one-upped by a teenager, immediately struck toward Daisy and landed a light cut on her collarbone.

Daisy knocked Phoebe's sword aside. The increased gravity made Phoebe's reaction time to pick the sword back up just a smidge too slow, so Daisy managed to land a horizontal chop on Phoebe's neck, earning her first full point. Her sword struck flesh, causing no injuries, but it made Phoebe wince.

"Alright. I guess I have to stop playing around." Phoebe muttered.

Phoebe's eyes metaphorically flashed. Her speed increased as she finally went all-out, rushing at Daisy to attack with all her strength. She chopped downward while Daisy swept her sword upward to deflect the attack, but too late, she realized she'd made a huge mistake. Phoebe's entire body was being dragged down by Daisy's gravitic pressure, and that made her sword ten times heavier, bolstered even more by Phoebe's tremendous strength.

CLAAAANG!

Phoebe battered Daisy's sword out of her hands, and Phoebe's sword crashed against Daisy's chest, stopping when it struck flesh.

"Guh!" Daisy coughed. Even though the sword hadn't hurt her, having her own sword torn out of her hands had finally sucked all the strength from her fingers. Daisy fell to her hands and knees, coughing wildly. Her telekinesis quickly faded due to exhaustion, and the room went quiet.

"Uhh.. uhh..." Daisy wheezed, not able to catch her breath. She found herself hyperventilating from exhaustion, while Phoebe was only a bit less tired. Even Phoebe was exhausted from the frantic assault.

Jason quickly came over and healed both women, relieving Daisy of her crippling chest pain. She swallowed several breaths, then plunked down on her butt with her head hung forward. She closed her eyes, feeling the wave of exhaustion somewhat cleared by her father's magic, yet still present in her brain itself. Phoebe's final attack hadn't only mangled the nerves in Daisy's hands, it had also overwhelmed her psionic energy reserves.

Daisy felt woozy. She hadn't fought a battle this intense... ever! Not even a single time. At her uncle's request, she'd been dealing with ordinary humans in the same way a soldier might shoot an ant with a bazooka. It was extreme overkill.

But now? Sparring with her mother on equal grounds? Daisy was completely wiped out.

She had to sit for a while before she could even refocus her hazy senses, lift up her head, and look at her mother seated across from her. Phoebe seemed like she still had some fight left in her, but she was pretty tired too.

"If you'd gone all out like that from the start, I might have lost without a chance of victory." Phoebe said, wiping her sweaty neck with a towel.

Daisy closed her eyes. "There's no need to be nice. You were going easy on me the whole time."

"Not at the end, I wasn't." Phoebe said quietly.

Daisy was too tired to argue, so she let the matter drop. Phoebe looked at the young woman with a complicated gaze. She closed her eyes, allowing her psyche to dip into her nascent Mind Realm, still slowly forming, but far from complete.

There, she saw Lord Elrin, the Sphinx, sitting by a pool, one of his front paws hanging into the water, the other resting on the pool's edge. Elrin was a bipedal creature, but he laid on his stomach like a cat would, lazily tracing his paw in a circle inside the pool's water.

[Not a bad fight. You're starting to attain a novice mastery of my simplified Sphinx combat styles.] Elrin said nonchalantly. [Inheritor, you have found a worthy training partner. It is vital that you spar with someone of roughly equal skill level, such as Daisy. Mentor that young woman well, and together, the two of you shall grow unstoppable together.]

"She's way stronger than me." Phoebe said, feeling slightly discouraged. She sat down cross-legged next to Elrin and hung her head, her arms flopping in her lap. "This body you've granted me is quite strong, but I fear it is not worth speaking of compared to those of the Demon Dukes and Emperors. Aside from my physical strength, I have little to draw upon."

[Hahaha. How little you know.] Elrin mused. [At my peak, I could annihilate planets with a wave of my paw. I wouldn't, of course, due to Akasha's laws, but it was within the realm of possibility if I ever felt suicidal enough. That little fight with the child earlier was like a play put on by toddlers, in my eyes. If you truly think you've reached the peak of the mountain, then I'll have to dump water on your head now.]

Elrin shook his head and smiled, causing his majestic mane to rustle gently. [If one must ascend a million steps to reach the peak of power, then you have barely climbed the first two, perhaps three. You're a little stronger than most mortals. They might worship you as a god, but your control of the Sphinx's lineage is a pitiful embarrassment.]

The Sphinx tapped his chin with his dry paw. [Hmm. You still haven't merged with the Sphinx long enough. I think I'll leave you as you are now. Inheritor, if you wish to become stronger, instead of coming here to beg me for greater strength, try learning to use the strength I've already given you to its highest potential. So far, you've been tapping into the Sphinx's Instincts mindlessly, allowing those instincts to control your body in the same way as that child is allowing her primitive little MindCore to control her.]

He continued. [It is like watching two power-armored soldiers using their suit's internal AI's to fight one another. A novice allows their base instincts to control them. A true master learns the lessons those instincts are trying to teach and adopts them into their internal world models. Once you accomplish such a feat, you will be ready for my next blessing.]

Phoebe nodded slowly. The talk of AI didn't mean anything to her, but she could generally glean what Lord Elrin was saying based on contextual clues. She'd been doing that a lot lately.

"I wasn't trying to beg you for more power." Phoebe grumbled.

[No, no, you weren't.] Elrin acknowledged. [But I can sense in your soul that you are feeling resentful about your momentary loss against the girl. This is good! One should never be content with their current level of power. That always causes a slow slide into sloth and decay. Every loss should be a brutal reminder; a wake-up call that you are not invincible and there is always a sky above the sky. Take today's battle, replay it in your mind, and learn as many lessons as possible. Crush the girl the next time you fight, then mentor her until she defeats you. Repeat over and over, and before long you will be ready for my next gift.]

Phoebe exhaled, feeling the tension leave her body.

"Yes, Lord Elrin."

[Begone, then.] Elrin said, casually waving his paw in a 'get out' gesture. [Until next time.]

Phoebe's vision dimmed., She returned to the world of the living and made a grand display of yawning to hide the fact she'd been comatose again. Luckily, this time she'd only 'dozed off' for a few minutes, so nobody was any the wiser.

Jason chatted with Phoebe for a while. He asked Phoebe how she felt Daisy was progressing, and, spurred on by Elrin's words, Phoebe chose to praise Daisy's growth while acknowledging her own faults.

Phoebe enjoyed speaking honestly. She hated telling lies, and even just hiding Elrin's existence made her deeply uncomfortable. What she did not know was that Nadia was always keeping an eye on her from a distance. She had already started to notice certain patterns and was carefully fitting pieces of a puzzle together.

Still, Nadia said nothing. She didn't rat Phoebe out, nor did she confront her. Phoebe was oblivious to Nadia's quiet machinations.

Eventually, Phoebe and the others headed out. Daisy was left alone with her father and Nadia.

"How are you feeling?" Jason asked.

"Physically? Fine." Daisy said. "But psychologically..."

"You did a great job." Jason said, going to great lengths to praise his little girl. "This MindCore will be a game changer for you. Nadia and I will see if we can get a new training regimen set up for you as soon as possible. We'll make sure to challenge you so you can grow stronger as quickly as possible."

Daisy smiled at her father, but then her joy faded. She looked at the ground guiltily.

"Dad... what about Jerome? He was so mad earlier, I feel kinda bad."

"Don't you worry about Jerome." Jason said, making an 'x' shape with his palms. "Your old man's got it under control. I'm going to have a talk with him."

"Jason, before you go," Nadia said, "I just wanted to point out that Jerome's acting a little different from usual. He's typically quite respectable when he fights, and he always appreciates a good challenge. The way he blew up at Daisy isn't how he usually would act."

"I noticed that too." Jason acknowledged. "He acts like a rough street urchin badass, but he's always so gentle with Farrah. He has a soft side, but he puts up an emotional wall and doesn't let others in."

"Except Farrah." Daisy pointed out.

"Yeah. He tells her everything." Jason said, his voice trailing off as if he'd realized something.

The Wordsmith fell into deep thought. He stroked his chin and muttered something the other two couldn't quite catch.

"Yeah. I'll go find and talk to him now." Jason said. "Daisy, you should go get some sleep. My Wordsmithing heals the body, but it's not too useful when it comes to your mind."

"Okay, dad." Daisy said, smiling and nodding obediently. "Hope things go well with Jerome..."

"So do I." Jason said.

He uttered a Word of Power, then vanished from the spot.

Part 778: Man-to-Man Talk

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

It was not difficult for Jason to find Jerome. It hadn't even been half an hour since he left the training facility, and he was a huge guy. He stood out in the barren city of Aevum, not that he could have hidden from the Wordsmith even if he wanted. Jerome had gone to a park filled with trees half a kilometer to the east. He had grabbed onto a tree branch and started doing pullups, but Jason had no idea how many he'd done by the time he arrived.

Jason teleported a few hundred feet away, then approached on foot.

"Jerome." Jason called out.

"The fuck you want?" Jerome snapped, glaring at him. "Finally coming over to ring me out, huh? Couldn't stand I called your precious baby daughter a bitch?"

"Well, yes." Jason said calmly. He stopped a little ways away, watching as Jerome continued to pull his body up and down using only his arms. "That was uncalled for. It's also not like the Jerome I know."

"Yeah? And how fuckin' well do you know me anyway?" Jerome growled, looking away. "You don't. Not one bit."

A moment of silence followed. Jason leaned back against a different tree while still facing the young man.

"You're right. It's only been a month or two since we met... depending on how you judge differing scales of time. But I do know that, despite your huge body and overwhelming strength, you're usually a well-spoken young man with a kind heart. This is the first time I've seen you snap over something relatively minor."

"Minor?!" Jerome shouted, finally releasing his grip on the tree branch. He landed on his feet and stood up, striding toward Jason, only stopping a short distance away. "Daisy slapped my ears so hard I thought she burst my god-damned eardrums! That shit hurt! You got any idea how bad that hurt?!"

"I can... imagine." Jason said, mentally recalling a few thousand similar moments of insane pain he'd experienced in his life. "Is that it, then? You've turned into a big, whining baby because my daughter hurt you during sparring?"

"I was taking it so easy on her, helping her test out her new mind-bullshit, and she crossed a line." Jerome said, pointing an accusatory finger at Jason. "You always take her side because she's your daughter. That's the truth! Spoiled little Trueborn girl with a godly-powerful Trueborn daddy time-traveling from the future! Some people get all the luck and can act however they want! But for the rest of us, we've got a whole other set of rules we gotta play by! I guarantee if I did to her what she did to me, you'd be singin' a different tune!"

Jason was quiet for a moment. "That's really what you think, huh? There's so much wrong with what you just said, I'm not sure know where to start."

He thought to himself before continuing. "You said Daisy is 'spoiled.' I assume that means you've had a hard life, then? Harder than hers?"

"Way harder!" Jerome said, throwing up his hands as if it was the most obvious thing in the world. "I grew up on the streets. I got the shit kicked out of me five times a day. Lucky I made it out of childhood alive! You think I was this strong my whole life? HELL no! I was stuck in the foster system, passed around like poisoned meat, hearing all sorts of nasty slurs and shit my entire childhood. They treated me like an animal!"

Jason stayed quiet, simply listening as Jerome continued. "I only got my powers a year ago. Before that, I learned to fight not cuz' I wanted to, but cuz' I HAD to! If I didn't know how to fight, I'd be dead now. The fuck's a privileged little white girl with Uncle Bigbucks know about that kind of life, huh? Must be nice, having a powerful Russian guy adopt her, put her in all the nicest clothes, feed her the best food. And her dad's a fuckin' GOD among men!"

Jason closed his eyes and massaged his forehead with two fingers.

"Daisy... hasn't talked to you or the others from the Illuminati about her childhood, has she?"

"Sure she has." Jerome retorted. "How d'you think I knew about her uncle?"

"Right. That's the surface level." Jason said quietly. He looked at Jerome with deep meaning. "You're assuming a lot of stuff about Daisy. Those assumptions are dangerous. They're also wrong. Very, very wrong."

The Wordsmith slowly licked his lips, searching for the right words. "Let's get one thing out of the way, Jerome. You've had a terrible life. Based purely on what you told me,

I wouldn't wish it on anyone else. I don't know you as a person all that well, and you don't know Daisy, certainly not me, that well either."

Jason continued. "I have big plans for you, Jerome. But if you're going to keep on lashing out like this without getting the full story, making assumptions, getting all self-righteous, then maybe you're not a good fit for Aevum."

Jerome rolled his eyes. "And there it is. The black man gets yappy and you shut him down."

"It's not about that." Jason said. "If my daughter isn't willing to talk about certain things, then it's not my place to speak in her stead. But in this one instance, I'm going to make an exception. Jerome, you already know I come from the far future. I'm sure you've heards bits and pieces of it here and there. But what you might not understand is the totality of evil that happened in that future."

Jason pulled away from the tree and stood up straight. At 5'10", he was a full head shorter than Jerome. He appeared physically weaker than the young man, certainly not as dominating, but Jason had a confidence about himself that could only come from a self-actualized man who knew exactly who he was and of what he was capable. He didn't lose out to his far larger and more physically imposing verbal opponent at all.

"The future I awoke in was 100,000 years from now." Jason began. "It started with me exiting my cryopod, only to be chased around by a terrifying monster named Gressil. This creature was ravenous, and bloodthirsty, but also highly intelligent. I only learned later that he was a demon, like so many others, and the demons had completely enslaved all of humanity."

Jason proceeded to regale Jerome with a brief overview of his life's story. The young man listened, his expression unchanging, his arms crossed. The tale was fantastical, but he'd heard parts of it here and there, so he wasn't surprised by the details being filled out.

"That was when I met the woman who would become my wife for the first time." Jason continued. "Her name was Phoebe. Phoebe Berthold."

Jerome blinked. "What? Phoebe? As in... the white-haired lady you brought here a few weeks ago? The same one? She's your wife?"

"In the future, she was my wife." Jason said quietly. "The Phoebe you know is her younger self. She does not know me in that way. We are, effectively, strangers. Her older, future self, was also Daisy's mother."

Jerome blinked again. This was new information for him. "Wait, wait, wait. So you're telling me you time-traveled back to the past, but you didn't bring your woman along? Only your daughter??"

"My story is far from complete." Jason explained. "After I met Phoebe, a lot of things happened. I won't bore you with all the details, but there were huge battles, and several years of relative peace. I had to fight the Black Witch, the first girl I loved, and I ultimately killed her due to her monstrous acts."

"After that, Phoebe gave birth to our daughter, Daisy. The era of peace followed, with humanity working to improve its circumstances, while my clone, Hope, went on to work alongside the military."

"...Then came Emperor Ose. She was one of humanity's greatest enemies."

"...A huge battle followed. Betrayals, violence you can't imagine. We lost a lot of good soldiers."

"...That was when the turning point came. Daisy revealed her powers for the first time. She was only six years old. She summoned monsters capable of leveling cities, Titans, and fought back against Ose."

"...The battle seemed to finally be turning around. That was when Beelzebub burst out of the ground and detonated his body in the skies above Tarus II. That was when Daisy died."

Jerome was taken aback. He lowered his arms from their crossed position. "She... died?"

"I thought she did." Jason said quietly. "In fact, she ended up time traveling. I don't know how or why she did, but she did. She returned to the past, to this era, but twelve years ago, a little girl age six."

Jerome started to put some puzzle pieces together. "So you didn't bring her back with you? She came here on her own, and you came later?"

Jason didn't answer Jerome's question immediately. "When Daisy arrived... even I don't know the details. She hasn't opened up to me about what happened yet. But what I do know is, she teleported around and was caught by the Russians. By the Russian government. They kidnapped her, bound her, and put her in some sort of... facility...

where they began torturing and experimenting on her, trying to control her powers for themselves, weaponize her, and create other superhumans like her."

Jerome's face warped in horror. "When she was only six years old?! Man, what the fuck..."

"I don't know exactly how long Daisy was in those facilities, and I don't know what she went through." Jason said quietly. "I know they injected her with needles, forced her to kill animals, beat her, did all sorts of other things that churn my stomach. I know she was in their custody for around two years. They made her kill other things, especially orphaned kids. They broke her mind and nearly turned her into a feral beast."

"Later," Jason continued, "she was picked up by 'Vasily Sokolov', the guy she calls 'Uncle Vasily'. I know nothing about the man, but I fear his 'rescuing' her may have had ulterior motives behind it. I worry he is not as good a man as Daisy believes. When I have time, I'll be looking into him, among many others."

Jason paused to allow Jerome to parse what he'd said. "While Daisy was here, in this era, suffering without a mother or a father to protect her, I was enduring a hellish future, watching as my friends and family died. In the end, even my wife ended up dead. I held Phoebe's corpse in my arms right before I made the decision to travel back in time to change the past."

Jason looked at Jerome knowingly. "I'm not telling you all this to discount the awful life you've lived, Jerome. I don't doubt it was hellish and awful. But knowing everything I've told you, do you really think Daisy is some spoiled white girl living a life of privilege? Is that the hill you want to die on?"

Any last bit of Jerome's anger had long ago fizzled out. He lowered his head, feeling ashamed of himself. "No, mister Hiro."

"Good. That's good." Jason said. "Come, sit with me. Let's have a man to man talk."

"Um. Aren't we doing that now?" Jerome asked, puzzled.

"That was just the prelude." Jason said, gesturing to the shady spot under the tree.

Jerome obliged. He sat beneath the tree, and Jason plunked down beside him.

Both men were quiet for a while before Jason broke the silence.

"I don't know you well, Jerome, but I know you well enough to know you're not acting like yourself. Even if you did think Daisy was some spoiled little rich girl, you would have held back and not spat such vile words at her. So what's eating you?"

Jerome chewed his lower lip. He seemed uncomfortable. "I... I don't know."

"Sure you do. Something's bothering you." Jason said. "You put on the act of a tough guy, but I've met a lot of 'tough guys' in my time. Compared to them, you're a softie at heart. Something must be chewing your ear to get you so worked up."

Jerome was quiet again, for a time. Then he sighed.

"It's... it's uh, it's my girlfriend. Farrah. She ain't talked to me for two days. She's avoiding me. I think I fucked up, but I don't know what I did wrong. I must've pissed her off, but I don't know how."

"Farrah?" Jason blinked. "She's not talking to you?"

"Nah, man. It was so abrupt. One day, we was fine. The next, we wasn't." Jerome muttered. He hung his head, feeling lower than dirt. "I just... I love her so much. I don't know what I'd do without her. Knowing I pissed her off, it's making me doubt who I am... makin' me doubt what I'm doin' with my life."

Jason gave Jerome a strange look, but quickly glanced away.

"How did the two of you meet?" Jason asked.

Jerome thought for a moment. "Well, it was a little over three years ago. Before I got my powers, or she got hers. Farrah's not like me. She has a family and shit. But they were... um... abusive. They were trying to arrange a marriage for her with some rich American guy. So she ran away when she was visiting the USA. Got lost on the streets, surrounded by some real bad guys. She was a pretty Persian girl, all alone."

Jerome shrugged. "I couldn't let a nice girl like her get... you know... so I jumped in. Managed to fight 'em off, but got the shit beat out of me. She helped me back to my place... wasn't much of a 'place' worth talkin' about. Just some run-down abandoned room in Detroit."

Jerome mumbled a lot when he talked about Farrah, but luckily, Jason was able to make out all the words.

"So anyway, I told her she should go back to her family. Streets weren't safe for a nice girl like her... plus she was way outta my league. I dunno. I guess she just liked me or something. She wanted to stay."

Jerome heaved a sigh. "Apparently her family were like conservative types or whatever, had been trainin' her to be a 'proper wife' her whole life. She knew how to cook and stuff. Helped spruce up my place a bit. Made it more livable. Days turned into weeks, then months. She stuck with me even through the cold winters."

Jerome smiled slightly. "It was the first time in my life I didn't feel like a worthless piece of shit. I even felt happy. I didn't have to put on an act around her. Man, I ain't badass. I'm hardened. There's a difference. I had a shit life and had to grow up quick so the bigger kids wouldn't kill me. But I never wanted any of that."

"After a year of livin' with Farrah in the slums, I wanted to get out and do better, get a job, be a proper adult 'n shit, but we were both only 16. Only jobs we could find were shitty ones working under skeevy guys. She didn't have her papers, and didn't want her family to find her. I didn't have any papers at all. So we had to work under the table. Make a living illegally."

Jason nodded. It was, in the broadest sense, similar to what he'd surmised. He'd gotten a lot of the details wrong, but that was how these things went.

"Anyway, stuff happened, we managed to work our way up outta the gutter, and then we suddenly got our powers. That was when we was 17." Jerome said, doing the mental math. "Farrah woke up one morning with a new face. Scared the shit outta me. Scared the shit outta her, too. She realized she could change the way her face looked, and I realized I was feelin' stronger than the day before. Accidentally tore the knob off our apartment door."

"Then the Illuminati came. Picked us up a month after we got our powers. Took us to their facility. Me and Farrah were real scared at first, thinkin' they was gonna separate us, or ship her back home, but it all ended up workin' out okay in the end."

Jerome tossed his hands in the air. "But now she ain't talkin' to me. I don't know what I did wrong. It's got me all fucked up, man. She means the world to me."

Jason licked his lips. He smiled and nodded. "Well, good news, Jerome. I don't think she's mad at you. Not at all. This is... probably my fault."

"Your fault?" Jerome asked, quickly turning his head to direct a suspicious look Jason's way. "The fuck's that mean?"

Jerome immediately seemed to think Jason had made a move on Farrah, but it didn't take long for him to realize that made no sense. Jason had no interest in her when his future wife was right there. Jerome cooled down and waited for Jason's explanation.

"I was talking to Farrah about her power." Jason explained. "I thought her shapeshifting seemed fairly weak, or like she wasn't going far enough with it. So... I made a suggestion, and it seemed to work out for her. I just didn't realize she would decide not to tell you, and hide from you. We talked two days ago, so the events line up..."

"What kind of breakthrough did she make?" Jerome pressed. "You're being awfully vague."

"It's up to her to tell you. Give her some space for a while." Jason said. "You two are always attached at the hip, but that's not good for you or her. You can't develop into individual people if you're always reliant on one another."

"I mean... I guess you have a point." Jerome muttered. "You're sure she ain't mad at me?"

"I suppose she could be, but it's pretty unlikely." Jason said. "She probably just wants some privacy while she messes around with her new powers. Give her some space. Work on yourself... and that anger problem."

Jason's smile disappeared.

"I'm a pretty understanding guy, Jerome. I don't let my anger get the better of me unless I'm pushed to my breaking point. Like I said before, I have big plans for you. But if you ever treat my daughter like that again, I'll beat the shit out of you and throw you out of Aevum. You had the excuse of ignorance before, because you didn't know her story and you made some bad assumptions. But even if you were right and she was just some privileged little girl, it was a bitch move of you to snap at her like that."

Jerome frowned. "If I was right, then that would mean she'd still broken the rules!"

"And who broke the rules first?" Jason countered. "The rules said no blows to the head, but you kept slapping her around and throwing her to the mat. You think that didn't hurt? She's a tenth your size soaking wet. You can't say she broke the rules when you broke them first."

"You didn't call time-out or anything." Jerome scoffed. "You were complicit."

"I was, because I could tell you were holding back." Jason said. "If Daisy had complained, I would have stopped the match. But my daughter is made of tough stuff. Even getting thrashed by you, she didn't complain. You, on the other hand, suffered one hard hit and threw a fit. Like a child. You stormed out of the room like a 6-year-old would. That's unacceptable."

It looked like Jerome wanted to say something, but he thought better of it and just looked away.

"I guess you're right. Sorry. I don't... know... what I was thinking." Jerome mumbled. "I always have to hold back. It ain't fair when a guy fights a girl. If I win, I'm a woman-beater. If I lose, I'm a bitch who lost to a woman. If I hit too hard, I'm being abusive. I'm used to others seeing me as the 'bad guy' when it's me versus any girl."

Jason nodded. "I get that. Though, in my experience, women might be the 'weaker' sex among ordinary humans, but I've met too many absolutely terrifying demonesses to think they fall into that category."

"Like Ose?" Jerome asked.

"Yeah. Like Ose." Jason said.

Another silence fell between the two men.

"When you said you had 'big plans' for me, what did you mean?" Jerome inquired. "Ain't we just training to fight the demons?"

"It's not as simple as that." Jason said. "I'm developing a strategy as we go along. I'm thinking of ways to improve the powers of all of you and develop equipment customized to boost your strengths. And for you, specifically, I believe you will become the leader of the Lowborn."

Jason frowned. "But not if you continue to fire off that mouth of yours. You lost a lot of respect from your peers today. Leaders have to be calm, stable, and in control. Irrational idiots quickly lose the hearts of their soldiers and end up abandoned. If you can't act like a man moving forward, I'll find another leader for the Lowborn."

Jerome closed his eyes.

"I'm sorry about what I said earlier, Mister Hiro. I'll apologize to Daisy and the others later."

"That would be smart." Jason said. "Now, if you'll excuse me, I need to be on my way. I still have other tests to run on Daisy's new MindCore."

Jason stood up, then looked back down at Jerome. "Don't tell Daisy or Phoebe anything I've told you. This stays between us."

"Yes, sir." Jerome said with a nod.

Jason found it slightly amusing a guy three times his size was addressing him so respectfully, but it wasn't unexpected or beyond the pale. He patted Jerome's shoulder, then uttered a Word of Power before vanishing.

Jerome was left alone with his thoughts. He had a lot on his mind.

Part 779: Adrenaline

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Daisy, exhausted from her sparring matches against Jerome and Phoebe, had gone to bed early for the day. The other teenagers were hotly discussing what they'd seen, with all of them excited by how drastically Daisy's improvements had ended up being.

By this point, the benefits of Jason's MindCores were fully proven. The side effects had been pretty bad before, which made the teens wary, but Daisy's MindCore had zero side effects at all! That meant Jason had finally ironed out the majority of kinks, and future MindCores would have few if any issues worth mentioning. The teens were looking forward to their powerups.

Jason teleported back into the sparring ring. He looked around and saw Phoebe chatting with Nadia on one side of the ring, while Bryan, Marco, and Sasha were discussing the previous sparring matches on the other side.

The Wordsmith's eyes fell on Phoebe for a moment. He enjoyed looking at her. He enjoyed drinking in her beauty. But he never allowed himself to look long, especially when, despite having her back turned to him, Phoebe turned around and smiled at him. Somehow, she had immediately sensed his arrival.

He smiled back, then turned to look at the teenagers.

"So, kids." Jason said, wandering over to them. "I've decided I'm going to give Sasha the next MindCore, then Brian, then Marco. Are you all okay with that?"

All three of them nodded.

"Sasha has the most useful power. It's the most brain-focused." Brian said.

"I'd prefer to go last anyway." Marco said, lowering his eyes. "I still don't think my power has much use."

Jason sighed. Marco's self esteem was, by far, the lowest of all the people in Aevum. He constantly doubted himself. He was rather spineless, in many ways. It wasn't a good quality for someone who might have to fight demons in the future. Maybe just keeping him in a backline support role would be for the best. Jason could easily get months, even years of work done in mere Aevum-minutes, provided he could handle the sustained isolation from all other forms of life.

If that was all Marco was ever good for, it would be a tremendous boon for humanity, but Jason felt bad, knowing he'd be reducing a potential powerhouse to a mere finger-snapping assistant. Surely Marco's powers had way more utility than even Jason had thought of yet.

"Sasha's Alchemy has countless support and combat uses." Jason said. "The fact her powers are mentally-focused definitely means she needs a MindCore the most. But don't discount yourselves. Brian, I knew an incredible fire manipulator in the future I came from. His name was Beelzebub, and I fear if he hadn't joined humanity's side, he could have stayed one of our most dangerous enemies."

Jason turned his head toward Marco. "And Marco, I've never known anyone with an ability like yours. It's utterly unique. You've got to grow a spine and start thinking better of yourself. Hopefully this new MindCore helps you out with that..."

Marco shrugged. He didn't seem too enthusiastic about the whole thing, though he was naturally interested in becoming smarter. Even if he didn't think highly of himself, he did at least think a MindCore would put him above the level of most ordinary humans. Getting a good job in the future wouldn't be too hard with such a boon.

The fact he was still thinking of mundane things like 'jobs' when the fate of humanity was at stake went even further to show just how out-of-the-game his head was.

After setting up appointments for each of the teenagers' MindCore installations, Jason turned and strolled over to Nadia and Phoebe, who had fallen silent after Jason arrived. Whatever they'd been discussing was likely idle small talk. They were much more interested in Jason, whenever he was present.

"Am I interrupting anything?" Jason asked.

"Not really." Nadia said. "Well, actually, Jason, I did notice something when Phoebe and Daisy were sparring. I'm sure you noticed it too."

"Her enhanced reflexes?" Jason asked.

"Yes, exactly." Nadia replied. "During the match, I was struck with the thought that Daisy and Phoebe were moving in an eerily similar manner."

Like mother, like daughter. Jason thought. He didn't voice those words.

"To me," Nadia continued, "I felt as though I were looking at two iterations of the QuantumReflex MindCore. It was as if Daisy had one, and so did Phoebe. Except, I thought that Phoebe's was much, much more advanced."

Jason blinked. He looked at Phoebe, her face blank and uncomprehending.

Is Nadia saying she thinks Phoebe spontaneously grew a MindCore? That certainly seems outside the realm of possibility. I guess stranger things have happened though. Maybe that Sphinx powerup seriously juiced her more than I ever anticipated!

"Phoebe, mind if we poke around in your head, then?" Jason asked. "You can say no, if you want. I intended to give you a MindCore in the future, so if you're at all interested, it won't hurt to do a check-up now."

Phoebe fidgeted a little, seeming surprisingly more nervous than usual. "Well... okay then. I suppose it couldn't hurt."

With that, Jason, Nadia, and Phoebe vanished, leaving the teenagers behind.

After a few moments, Brian coughed. "The Archseer really is building quite the harem, isn't be?"

"Harem?" Marco asked. "What makes you say that?"

Sasha and Brian both gave him pitying looks.

"Marco, it's pretty obvious Nadia's fallen head-over-heels for him." Sasha said. "Phoebe can't keep her eyes off him, and don't forget when Heaven's Daughter was here."

Marco was completely oblivious. "You're saying all three of them... like him?"

"Uh. Yes. Something like that." Brian said, laughing quietly to himself. He shook his head at Marco's unknowing expression. "Someday, you'll meet a nice grl, and it'll make sense then."

"I'll take your word on it." Marco said with a shrug.

Jason and the two women appeared inside the medical center. Phoebe laid back in the examination chair, and Jason held both his palms an inch away from both sides of her head, while Nadia donned her PepScan and watched from the side.

Jason uttered a Word of Power, then his soul exited his body and dove into Phoebe's glabella.

As soon as Jason entered her mind, his eyes were blinded by a brilliant light.

[Ahhh!] Jason cried out. [W-what the hell! What's this light? What is this?!]

If his soul had tear ducts, his eyes would definitely be watering. It was like looking directly at the sun, except the 'sun' was shining its brilliant light from all directions, simultaneously. It resembled Heaven's Light, but was far brighter. It even made Raphael's False Cosmic Realm feel somewhat dull.

Jason sensed, but couldn't really see, Phoebe's soul-form materialize beside him.

[Is something wrong?] Phoebe asked, perplexed.

[Are you seriously asking me that?] Jason retorted, trying fruitlessly to cover his eyes with his hands. He failed, due to his hands being mostly transparent. [What is this crazy blinding light?]

Phoebe looked around. She shrugged. [I don't know. It doesn't seem all that bright to me...]

Jason's jaw dropped. He couldn't believe how blasé her reaction was regarding what her inner self looked like. Had she already grown fully accustomed to her strange Mind Realm, to the point its existence was utterly banal? Or maybe it truly didn't seem bright at all to her, and it only did to Jason because he was a foreign soul?

Jason did not know the answer.

After poking around a while, Jason convinced Phoebe to 'mess around' with her Mind Realm a little. Eventually, the light levels dropped, and a planet came into view.

Jason was shellshocked. As the light dimmed and he became more and more capable of gazing upon Phoebe's Mind Realm, he realized Nadia was completely correct. Somehow, Phoebe had developed a massive Mind Realm bigger than any of Jason's MindCores, more power efficient than any of his newest versions, and so rich in life energy he was left reeling.

The world that stretched out before him appeared somewhat barren at first glance. It was a planet similar to Earth, but with a purple sky that tinted the world below in a similar hue. There were strange creatures roaming the planet Jason didn't recognize at all. One thing was for sure though; they were completely alien life forms. There were bipedal Sentients of many different types living in cities made up of different technological eras, wildlife living in vast forests the size of the Amazon, deserts and tundras, plains, farmlands...

Phoebe's Mind Realm appeared to be made up of multiple alien civilizations, all somehow coexisting on the same world. By now, Jason was feeling extremely doubtful, even suspicious.

Never, never, not ever had any of the Sphinxes he knew mentioned anything about growing an alien Mind Realm in their heads. At this point, Phoebe's Sphinx power-up was so exaggerated he was beginning to doubt if he'd planted the Sphinx in her, or the seed of some long-dead ancient galactic civilization.

[What do you make of all this?] Jason asked, directing his question to Phoebe's presence floating beside him as he flew across her Mind World.

[It is incredible...] Phoebe said quietly. [All of this... is inside me? All these strange people and animals?]

Jason looked at Phoebe, turned away, then quickly looked back with an expression of shock. [You didn't know about your inner Mind Realm?!]

[I wasn't able to look inside myself until you showed me it was possible.] Phoebe explained. [What does this mean? Is this what your MindCore looks like?]

Jason scoffed. [If my MindCores were 5% as majestic as your Mind Realm, humanity would become unstoppable. Whatever the hell the Sphinx power did to your body, it amplified your brain ten times more. No wonder you were dogging Daisy the whole fight.]

[Dogging?] Phoebe asked, perplexed. [Do you mean... licking her with my tongue? I did no such thing...]

[No! I meant, uh, kicking her butt during the fight.] Jason hastily explained.

Phoebe's soulform squinted at him. [I did not kick her posterior...]

[No it's- never mind.] Jason sighed, giving up instead of digging a deeper hole with his words. [I'm just saying, this Mind Realm is extremely impressive. I don't even know how to start evaluating it.]

Jason retracted his soul from Phoebe's Mind Realm. He and her awoke at the same time, with Jason feeling somewhat fatigued. It seemed that merely spending time in direct proximity to her powerful soul was a draining experience for him. By now, he understood that this Phoebe had diverged so far from the Phoebe he knew that he had to completely reassess her capabilities.

Her personality seemed mostly the same, but the way she addressed him, the way she looked at him, the way she conducted herself, all of it presented an image of a twin sister who looked the same externally, but did not think the same way internally.

And that made sense. This Phoebe had awoken in the modern era, a time where humans were still somewhat the rulers of Earth. Waking up in a distant future where humanity had become slaves and chattel would prove to be a mind-altering moment, perhaps even traumatic in many ways. Jason needed only look at Catherine as an example of what differing circumstances could lead to.

"Well." Jason said, as he turned to Nadia and rubbed his tired eyes. "We... won't be able to give Phoebe a MindCore. But it doesn't seem she needs one either."

He explained to Nadia what he'd seen. Nadia stayed quiet, merely listening and nodding as Jason talked. Every so often, she would direct a sly glance at Phoebe, seemingly an idle movement of her eyes, yet one that also seemed to speak of secret insights she was making in her mind, yet not expressing verbally.

"An entire planet within her mind? It almost sounds similar to a single simulated instance inside a RealitySim. Except it isn't a simulation, it appears to be a living world with real or otherwise lifelike entities living within. Not to mention Phoebe demonstrated mental abilities in the same vein as Daisy's QuantumReflex. I'm guessing the two of them are based on similar principles, but Phoebe's is far more advanced. Jason, you could drastically improve the future MindCores you develop if you were to study the design of Phoebe's Mind Realm first."

Jason slowly nodded. "Your words make sense, but... I don't know. Being in close proximity to Phoebe's Mind Realm was an exhausting experience. I'm hesitant to go poking around in there again."

Nadia bobbed her head, ever so slightly. It was almost as if she was thinking, ah yes, exactly the intended effect. Jason was too tired to notice.

After finishing up, Jason turned back to Phoebe. "Hey, while you're here, I had something I wanted to run by you."

Phoebe got out of the chair and stretched, popping her back. "What is it?"

"I was thinking we needed more recreational activities in Aevum." Jason explained. "You mind checking out the first one I built? Nadia, you can come along too."

Nadia pursed her lips. "No, that's fine. I have a project I need to work on. You and Miss Berthold go ahead. Fill me in later."

Without further ado, she strolled out of the medical center. Jason was slightly perplexed. Nadia usually chose to join him on activities like this. Perhaps she was just tired from all the excitement.

"I'll teleport us there." Jason said to Phoebe with a smile.

A moment later, Jason uttered a Word of Power. He and Phoebe vanished, reappearing just outside Argent City, within the Proving Grounds. Here, a massive electrified fence had been erected, forming a large oval-shaped arena. There were bleachers capable of seating 1000 people, not gigantic compared to stadiums on Earth, but certainly far outstripping Aevum's current population.

"This is a racing track." Jason said, smiling cheerfully at Phoebe. "This is where people driving in cars can race one another."

Phoebe frowned. She looked around the field, slightly uncomprehending.

"Cars..." Phoebe said, before she remembered something she'd read recently. "One of those 'motorized vehicles', like Planes, but on the ground?"

"Yes!" Jason said. "I have a feeling you'll really enjoy this activity in your free time. Let me show you how it works."

Jason waved his hand. Immediately, a bright red Ferrari materialized before him and Phoebe on the race track. Phoebe examined it with mild interest, but she knew very little about automobiles, so she had about the same interest in it as she would if Jason were showing her a collection of butterflies taped inside a book.

Jason popped open the passenger door and gestured inside. "I will be sitting over there and driving. You'll be sitting here, in the passenger seat. This vehicle drives extremely fast. It's a real adrenaline-pumper, and it might be scary at first. It makes a really loud noise, but don't be frightened!"

He remembered the first time he'd introduced his wife to a car, and he'd scared her so badly she had started sobbing uncontrollably. Jason learned from his mistakes and spent a few minutes acclimating her to the concept, not wanting her to cry like she had before.

"Fascinating." Phoebe said, still only mildly interested. "You said this car moves extremely quickly?"

"Oh yes, this will get your blood pumping." Jason assured her. "You want to take it for a spin?"

Phoebe looked at him quizzically. "A spin? Driving in circles?"

"It's, ah, an expression..." Jason said, realizing he'd once again used a common turn of phrase she wasn't familiar with. "Sorry..."

"No worries. I'll spin with you." Phoebe said, smiling sweetly. "So I just... climb into this seat here?"

Jason nodded, then helped her into the Ferrari, also showing her how to buckle her seatbelt. After he closed the passenger door, he jogged around to the other side, climbed inside the driver's seat, and shut the door.

Jason grinned like a kid opening a present on Christmas Day. He was so excited, getting to relive a core memory with the new Phoebe. Of course, the first time he drove her around had been extremely scary for her, but it had also morphed into her love of racing.

Unfortunately, Phoebe had always been so busy acting as the brains of humanity's military that she never had time to devote to her driving. Jason was sure she would have gone racing every day if she'd had more free time. That thought left him feeling a little melancholic, which made his expression dim. Now his wife would never have that opportunity again...

"Is something the matter?" Phoebe asked, seeing the smile slip from his face.

"Oh, no. It's nothing." Jason said, quickly reassuring her while returning to his previous expression. "Let's have some fun!"

Jason turned on the engine and let it sit for a few moments, allowing Phoebe to acclimate to it before gently revving the engine a little more. He looked at the face of his wife-not-wife, but he was surprised to see she seemed as disinterested as before. It seemed as if she were merely politely going through the motions to make him happy, rather than showing any real interest the activity herself.

That was when a thought struck him.

Was it possible, in his caution to acclimate her to the car, that he'd been too careful? What if the trauma of future-Phoebe's first encounter with a car had left her adrenaline racing? What if it was the element of fear that had led to her excitement? By carefully explaining every little thing, was it possible that he had inadvertently stunted past-Phoebe's interest in driving?!

That wouldn't do. Jason knew that Phoebe was a speed freak, an adrenaline junkie. He had to make sure today left a lasting impact on her.

Thus, acting on instinct, he suddenly jammed his foot on the gas and peeled out, racing forward and jumping from 0-60 MPH in just 10 seconds. Not as fast as the Ferrari could actually accelerate, but he wasn't a professional driver anyway. He only wanted to leave an impression on Phoebe.

The moment the car accelerated, Phoebe's eyes widened. She was pulled back into her seat and gasped as the Ferrari took off, racing down the track as it ramped up to just over 100 MPH, with Jason tearing down the track, his foot holding the gas pedal all the way down.

Jason grinned. He shot a quick glance over at Phoebe, but was surprised to see that her momentary excitement had already disappeared. She was still smiling, but it seemed she had returned to her usual, polite expression.

"I-isn't this exciting?!" Jason prompted. "Isn't it fun?"

Phoebe blushed. She realized he'd seen through her thoughts. "Forgive me, Jason. The first burst of speed startled me a little, but… it's just… not as fast as I thought it would be."

Jason let off the accelerator. He slowed the car to a more comfortable driving speed as he rounded the first bend. Once he returned to a straightaway, he gave Phoebe a quizzical look.

"Not fast enough?" Jason repeated.

The first time he'd ever accelerated, he hadn't even hit 60 MPH before Phoebe had already experienced a tidal wave of emotions. Now they were at 100 MPH and she wasn't even fazed? Was the difference between future and past Phoebe truly that extreme?

Phoebe scratched her chin. "If it were going… maybe… three or four times faster, that would feel more exciting, I think."

Jason was incredulous. "At those speeds, we'd be in real danger if we crashed. I don't want to take such a risk, especially with your life."

Phoebe's smile brightened. "Well, that's sweet of you, Jason. Thank you, and I'm sorry. I should be more appreciative of this 'driving' experience. My manners are truly poor."

"No... it's fine." Jason said, as he eventually slowed the car to a stop. He and Phoebe climbed back out. She barely even gave the car a second glance. It seemed she genuinely wasn't interested in it at all. "I'll see if I can find something faster that can really excite you."

"No need, no need." Phoebe said, waving her hand politely. "I'm sure the others will better appreciate this 'race track' you made."

The problem was, Phoebe had no idea that Jason had told her a white lie earlier. He didn't make the trace track for the others. He'd made it for her, thinking she would love to race just like his Phoebe had. But she wasn't interested.

It was similar to if Jason had spent weeks thinking up a thoughtful Christmas gift, only for the recipient to barely feign interest in it. He was feeling slightly soul-crushed, but he didn't have a way to verbalize his thoughts without sounding like an asshole. It wasn't Phoebe's fault he had such extreme expectations regarding her interests.

"I'm sure they will." Jason said, smiling tiredly. "Let's go back to the city."

Before he could utter a Word of Power, Phoebe took a step toward him. "Jason, are you okay? I... I'm sorry if my reaction disappointed you. I just... it didn't feel all that fast to me."

"It's my fault." Jason said, his smile fully slipping as he was now feeling somewhat gloomy. "I ruined the fun by overexplaining things to you."

"No, no. I don't think you did." Phoebe said gently, touching his arm. "It was very kind of you to take my feelings into account. If I'd been unprepared, that could have been quite a scary feeling for me."

I know. Jason thought miserably. Which would have made it more memorable, and left a lasting impact on you, likely translating into a new interest in racing for the foreseeable future.

He didn't speak these words. He just sighed and shrugged. "I'll see if I can do better next time. Don't worry about it."

"Alright." Phoebe said quietly.

Without another word, Jason teleported himself and Phoebe back to Argent. Once inside the city, Jason split off from Phoebe, allowing her to go about her business.

After he left, Phoebe went back to her domicile. She sat on the bed, a contemplative expression on her face.

"It wasn't fast enough." Phoebe muttered quietly. "If it were faster, a lot faster, it could have been truly exciting..."

That thought continued to percolate in her mind for a long, long while...

Part 780: Transition

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

It was drawing toward night-time in Aevum, so the false sun in the sky had dipped below the horizon. Due to the lack of a blue atmosphere such as the one on Earth, Aevum could rapidly darken to the level of nighttime in mere minutes.

Jerome was anxious in a way he hadn't been for a long time. He owed Daisy an apology for exploding at her, but that was barely even on his mind. He kept looking around for his girlfriend, Farrah, and eventually he found out she was back in her dorm room.

Jerome made his way over, and eventually he arrived outside, only to stop in front of her door. He held up his fist, wanting to knock, but he stopped short. He didn't know why she was avoiding him, but they'd been together for a full year, and they usually stuck to each other like glue. He knew for a fact she wasn't absent by accident.

What bothered him the most was... he wasn't sure of the reason she'd started avoiding him. Was it his fault? Or, like the Archseer said, was it personal circumstances she didn't want to tell him? Maybe he should just give her some space?

Jerome wrung his hands together. He looked left and right down the hall, but people were still in the gym, likely training or whatever. Nobody had come home just yet. He was all alone, anxiously stepping from the left to the right, then back to the left again, unsure if he should knock on Farrah's door or not.

At least, he thought he was alone. He happened to look back up again, only to spot the last person he wanted to see turn a corner down the hall and start walking toward him.

"Jerome?" Daisy asked, raising an eyebrow as she approached.

"Oh! Uh... shit. Yeah. Hey." Jerome mumbled awkwardly.

Daisy came to a stop several feet away. She paused, then crossed her arms and looked away.

"So, um... I wanted to apol-" Daisy started to say.

"I'm real sorry about what I said before." Jerome quickly interjected before she could finish. "I didn't mean none of that. I mean, you clapped my ears, and that hurt like a motherfucker, but... I was slappin' you around first. I broke the rules first."

"No, you don't have to apologize." Daisy said quietly. "I know you were just slapping me because you didn't want to hurt me. I got frustrated that I couldn't win, even with my new MindCore, so I used every trick in my pocket to land a hit on you. Unlike you, I didn't pull my punches. Err, my slaps. I'm sorry I hurt you."

"Well. I guess we both fucked up a bit, huh?" Jerome asked, smiling slightly. He fell silent after that and lowered his head.

Daisy looked up. She noticed where he was standing. "What's the matter? You're not going in?"

"Nah, uh, I just... I don't know if I should..." Jerome mumbled. "Your dad, he uh, he told me Farrah was goin' through some stuff. I don't know if I pissed her off or somethin'. Maybe she just needs space?"

"You two live in the same dorm. This is your room as much as hers." Daisy pointed out. "Besides, Farrah likes you a lot. I doubt she's mad at you."

"Yeah? You been usin' your mind-reading on her?" Jerome asked, quickly shooting an accusatory glance Daisy's way.

"...I don't need to read someone's mind to see something so obvious." Daisy retorted.

Jerome felt a little stupid for asking. He always acted defensive when it involved his girlfriend. "Right. Yeah. Sorry."

Another few seconds passed. Daisy bopped her hips from side to side while looking at Jerome, but he still didn't make a move to enter the room.

"You just... gonna stand out here all day?" Daisy pressed.

"I don't know!" Jerome hissed under his breath. "I can't decide what to do!"

"Oh, okay. Then I'll make it easy on you." Daisy said, before abruptly stepping forward, raising a fist, and rapping her knuckles on the door. "Hey Farrah, I brought you something!"

Jerome's heart jumped. He felt a flash of anger, humiliation, and embarrassment. Why would she just charge up and do that?!

But immediately after Daisy said those words... foop! She vanished from the spot, teleporting away.

Jerome's blood turned to ice. That little witch, she did this on purpose!

But he didn't have time to react. The door opened, and... there was a young man inside Farrah's room who Jerome didn't recognize. He looked a lot like her. Like a twin brother or something.

As soon as the boy looked at Jerome, he froze in place. "J-J-Jer... ome?"

Jerome was taken aback. "The fuck? Who are you? Where's Farrah?"

The teenage boy stared up at Jerome with eyes mixed with all sorts of feelings. He quickly took a step back and started stammering. "Um, I, um, well, Farrah is..."

Jerome was slightly bewildered. "Wait a second... your voice... Farrah? You turned into a guy?"

Her voice hadn't changed at all. It was one big flaw of Farrah's that she was only able to change her face. But this time, her transformation was so physically total that it had taken Jerome by complete surprise. She looked like a wafer-thin teenage boy, a little over eighteen, but she still actually looked like a guy. A feminine one with soft hands and smooth skin, but a male nonetheless.

Tears welled up in Farrah's eyes. "I... I didn't know how to tell you, Jerome. I'm s-sorry. I t-t-tried changing... after I talked to Jason, but then I realized I was having a hard time changing back, and I knew you'd be all g-grossed out, so I just tried to avoid you, a-a-and..."

"Whoa, whoa. Grossed out?" Jerome asked, scrunching up his face. "Baby, you thought I'd be grossed out? You use your powers all the time. You know I love that."

"Yeah, but... I only change into other girls..." Farrah said, lowering her eyes. "And becoming a boy is... different."

"Oh. So that's what you mean." Jerome said, resting his fists on his hips. "Man, I thought after a year of bein' together you'd know me better than that. I love YOU, baby! If you wanna turn into a guy once in a while, that's totally fine!"

Farrah looked even more dismal. "Well... I was thinking... I like looking like a boy more than a girl... by a lot. I don't know how to explain it. But I also love you, and that's, um, forbidden. I still feel like a girl, too. So now I'm all weird inside. I don't want to be weird."

To his credit, Jerome took her words seriously. "Your parents put all kinds of fucked-up thoughts in your head, baby. We was livin' in America! Not Iran. Where I come from, guys wouldn't even- well... I mean, I guess most guys would still find it strange. But hey, fuck 'em! If my girl likes turning into a guy, then I like guys."

"You do?" Farrah asked, blushing slightly. "I was always told boys shouldn't like boys, and girls shouldn't like girls. I don't know how that, um, applies to a girl who becomes a boy... or vice-versa."

"Man, that shit's too complicated for me." Jerome said, waving his hand flippantly. "You're still cute as hell, and you're the girl- I mean, the guy... the person I love. Whaddya gotta say 'bout that?"

"You're really okay with it?" Farrah asked. "Even if I want to look like a boy, you can still think of me as a girl..."

"Hey, for a girl, you look like a really cute boy." Jerome said with a big smile. "C'mere, I'll show you I ain't lying."

He took Farrah into his arms, then pulled her in for a kiss. Farrah didn't pull away because she was too excited by his acceptance.

After that, Jerome entered their room and closed the door.

Further details will be omitted.

"Hey, Harold. You here?" Jason asked, as he walked into Harold and Helen's house. He'd already rung their doorbell, but their house was a veritable mansion, with five bedrooms and three bathrooms. He figured it might take them a bit to show up.

Jason fell silent. After nearly a full minute, he heard grumbling down the front hallway. "I'm comin', I'm comin', sheesh, show up at a fella's house in the middle of the damn night..."

Harold shuffled down the hallway, wearing a plaid shirt and some baggy sweats. He looked tired, but not from lack of sleep.

"Did I interrupt anything?" Jason asked, raising an eyebrow.

"Smart-mouthed punk." Harold spat, before revealing a cheeky grin. "What me and the missus do ain't none of yer business. Don't you be usin' them powers to spy, either!"

"I have no interest, and I wouldn't be caught dead doing it." Jason assured him. "Need some coffee to refresh yourself?"

"Coffee. Yeaaap. Sounds good. Let's go yap in the kitchen." Harold muttered.

A few minutes later, Harold was grinding some coffee while Jason sat at the dining table a short distance away.

"This place really is too big." Harold said. "Not like me and Helen are gonna be having kids or guests over."

"I figured I'd leave room... just in case." Jason said. "You never know, and it's a piece of prime real estate."

"Uh huh. Uh huh. So what're you bargin' in here to yap at me about?" Harold asked, as he strained hot water through the ground coffee beans into a cup.

"Well, the big battle against the demons isn't too far away, so there's a couple of things I wanted to talk to you about first." Jason said. "First off, when you're ready, I'd like you to start training the kids, whipping them into shape, and so on."

"Right, right. That was already in the plans." Harold said, as he pulled out some milk and sugar and started doctoring his coffee with a strategic mix to get the flavor he wanted. "Now that me 'n the missus are all set, whatcha need?"

"I'm a very busy man." Jason explained. "I've been training the kids by having them spar, but they've gotten rough and hurt each other's feelings a few times. I'm not sure if I'm going about this the right way."

Harold scoffed as he walked over, sat down, and took his first sip of coffee. "Hurt feelings? What're you tryina do? Train elite soldiers, or raise some mamby-pamby little sissy-bitches?"

"Well... train soldiers..." Jason said slowly.

"Izzat so?" Harold asked. "Well, here's the thing, kid. You've really gotta think about what you actually want out of mah trainin', 'cause there's a difference between trainin' soldiers, warriors, and generals. Soldiers are grunts that go out and storm the battlefield. They're cheap and expendable. The higher-ups don't really care if a bunch die. It's no big deal. Warriors are elite soldiers, trained to go out there and kick real ass. It takes a lotta time 'n investment. If one dies, it's a big loss to the bigwigs."

Harold continued. "Then there's generals. You can't really teach a man to be a general. It's gotta be in their blood. You can teach 'em theory, you can teach 'em strategy, all kinds of other stuff. But then all you end up with is a fella who does everything by the book. Predictable, easy for the enemy to out-think."

Jason nodded. "So what's that have to do with anything?"

"Well, son, I can't teach any of these kids how to be generals." Harold admitted. "I was a dog of war. They sent me out to kill the unkillable. I know about soldiers, and I know about warriors. I can train your kids how to be either one. That's why I'm askin' you now what you want them to be!"

Both men became quiet. Jason fell into thought as he pondered Harold's words.

"It has to be warriors, then." Jason said. "Humans with powers are rare. They're not expendable. They need to be aces in the hole we can use in a pinch. They need to be rock solid in combat and not falter when the going gets tough. Losing even one of these kids would be a huge loss."

"That's what I thought you'd say." Harold said. "The thing is, soldiers need to be trained to follow directions. They've gotta be drilled, drilled, drilled until they operate on instincts. You order them to charge to their deaths, they do it. Warriors, those are sorta similar, but they need to be more free-thinkin' and creative. They solve problems. They need to be smart and quick-witted, as well as havin' the minds of killers. You sure these kids are at that level?"

Jason grimaced. He wasn't sure of that, not at all. Aside from his daughter, the teenagers in Aevum were lackadaisical, had little in the way of survival instincts, and were definitely part of a generation that had grown up with technology that made their lives infinitely easier than their predecessors. Sasha had complained multiple times that the time differential meant she couldn't chat with her friends back on Earth, just as one example.

Jerome was probably the 'hardest' of the Lowborn, since he'd led a tough life. He'd been in plenty of scraps, and he knew how to fight. That was more than the rest of them could say. But even he hadn't taken another man's life. Only Daisy had, and under her uncle's direction, she had ended many...

"Well. Not really." Jason eventually admitted.

"Good." Harold said, taking a metaphorical step back. "It's good you can admit that. Look, you see these kids with special abilities, and you think that means they should all be wizards 'n witches, out there slingin' voodoo and shit at the demons. I get it, that's the obvious choice. Maybe that's even what a smart guy would choose, but truth is, you're a fighter by necessity, not by choice."

"I'm not a fighter?" Jason asked, directing a strange look Harold's way. "I've killed... a lot of demons. Among other enemies."

"Right. But you ain't done anything involving killin' 'cause you liked it, and that's the difference." Harold said. "Nothin' wrong with a leader who only fights when needed. But the thing is, everything you're doing is 'cause you think it has to be done, and it goes against your instincts. Since you lack those instincts, you're full of blind spots only outsiders can see."

Harold sipped some more coffee, swishing it around his teeth. It seemed he really liked the taste.

"Alright, let's get serious a bit. I know the powers these kids have. I did a lot of readin' up on their files. If need be, I can whip any of 'em into competent fighters, even great ones. But that's a waste of talent. This Sasha girl, I bet we could come up with all sorts of creative uses for her powers, once she masters 'em. If you wanna kill demons, that's what the boys in green are for. That's what guns are for. You've got a one-of-a-kind creative talent in Sasha! Why have her be one of a million grunts when she can be on the backlines, supporting the meatheads?"

Jason nodded. A similar thought had occurred to him before. "You think her Alchemy powers are wasted on the frontlines? I'm sure she could do more damage than even a thousand soldiers."

"So can a nuke." Harold scoffed. "But y'know what's even better than putting a little girl out there who can fight Demon Emperors? Having her use her powers to make a million men fight Demon Emperors. Y'see what I'm saying?"

Once again, Jason nodded. Harold's logic was sound.

"Take a lookie here." Harold said, reaching into his back pocket. He pulled out a folded piece of paper and handed it to Jason. "Been chewin' on this a few weeks now."

Jason opened the paper. Inside, there was a short list of all the teenagers in Aevum, including Daisy, listing their abilities and the roles they could be good at. They were also assigned grades, like they were in school or something.

Daisy Hiro: Telekinesis (A), Healing (?), Teleportation (A+), Animal Reflexes (B), Enhanced Body (F)...

Special skills: Assassination, counter-terrorism, athletics, hand-to-hand combat, gunmanship...

Best roles: Hunter-Killer, Silent Assassin, Decapitation Striker.

Jason scratched his chin. He already knew most of this stuff, but Daisy's background skills were a little new to him. He'd naturally spoken with his daughter many times, but she was always somewhat evasive regarding her childhood. It seemed she didn't want to tell her father exactly what she'd gone through. Jason realized this was either because she didn't want to make him sad, or she didn't want to enrage him. What little he'd seen from the flash of her memories had nearly driven him insane with fury. He could only imagine how he'd react if he knew the rest.

"How'd you learn all this about my daughter?" Jason questioned.

"She told me." Harold said. "Actually, no. She told Helen, who told me. She seems to like Helen a lot."

"I see." Jason said quietly.

He moved further down the list.

Jerome Nguyen: Enhanced Strength (B), Growing Power (A+), Enhanced Durability (C-)...

Special skills: Street fighting, hand-to-hand combat, thievery, scrounging, makeshift repairs...

Best roles: Assault Squad, Base Assault, Elite Takedown Ops.

To Jason, all of this looked about right. Jerome and Daisy's roles lined up exactly with what Jason imagined they would be good at. He read through the rest of the info on all the other teenagers as well.

Brian Bozzard: Flame Manipulation (C+), Flight (F).

Special skills: Diplomacy, fine dining, brewing tea.

Best roles: Metallurgist, Energy Producer, Airspace Assault.

Nadia Chasky: Extreme Intelligence (A+), Big Brain (A+), Very Smart (A+).

Special skills: Thinking hard, using her brain, martial arts.

Best roles: Inventor, Predictions Analyst, Elite Teacher.

Farrah Lapis: Shapeshifting (D+), Cooking (C).

Special skills: Baking cookies, entertainment, giving compliments.

Best roles: Infiltration, Spying, Special Agent.

Sasha Popov: Alchemy (?), Tailoring (A+), Fashion Design (B+?).

Special skills: Designing clothes, fashionista.

Best roles: Armorer, weaponsmith, special materials creator, deep-earth miner.

Marco Kamau: Making Time Bubbles (B?).

Special skills: Cowardice, running away, hiding.

Best roles: Olympic Sprinter? House Robber?

Jason read through Harold's evaluations of the teenagers with approval. Aside from Marco, who Harold didn't really seem to have much understanding of, he had pretty good ideas for all the rest of them.

"Airspace Assault for Brian?" Jason asked.

"The kid can fly, and he can shoot fireballs... but I don't think his fireballs are all that impressive." Harold grumbled. "Better to give that boy a sniper rifle and train him to pop a head from a click off the ground."

Jason shrugged. It wasn't a bad idea at all. But unlike Harold, Jason had known Beelzebub. He believed Brian could reach the same heights as mankind's once-fiercest enemy.

He looked at the list again. "Deep-earth mining for Sasha?"

"I dunno. It just seemed sensible to me." Harold said dismissively. "I've gots a good feeling about that little lady."

"No ideas for Marco, though?" Jason pressed. "None at all?"

"I... don't really get the boy's power, and he's too quiet for m'liking." Harold replied. "I told you mah list wasn't finished yet. Maybe I'll add more for him later."

"No, that's fine." Jason said. "I have my own ideas."

One entry on the list really caught Jason's eye. "You wrote here that you think Nadia would make a great teacher. Why, because she's smart?"

"Smart people don't always make good teachers. But Nadia's special." Harold said with a smile. "That pretty little lady's good at 'comprehension'. Any ninny with a two-bit tutorin' book can teach a fella how to count numbers. But she actually gets everything she learns on a deep level. You should be havin' her teach others, 'cause she'll know how to dumb stuff down to their level."

Jason was skeptical. "Nadia's talents are so beyond the ordinary, she should be inventing powerful technology all the time. That's the most effective use of her time."

"Having one smarty-pants is good, but if she can teach a hundred others, that's way better, innit?" Harold asked.

Jason slowly nodded. He had to admit, Harold was making a good point. It would be better to have 100 Nadias accelerating Aevum's progress than just one.

But... still. Asking her to spend time teaching others, after what she'd been through? Jason wasn't about to do that. Maybe later.

Jason chatted with Harold. After the two of them talked about the teenagers a bit more, Harold lightly slapped the table.

"Alrighty, then! I'll start training them once you've finished putting those mind-thingies in their heads. Maybe once these kids are a bit smarter, they'll be able to follow directions a little better."

"That's all I ask of you." Jason said, smiling. "I'm sure you'll do a great job, Harold. And also... there's, uh, one last thing."

"Yeah?" Harold asked. "What's that?"

"It's about the upcoming War in Heaven." Jason said, his smile slipping. "I... I don't think I'm going to deploy you. Or any of the teenagers."

"You're not??" Harold asked, bewildered. "Wait, wait, wait. Ain't that why you gave me this super-strong body? To kick demon ass?"

"Yes... but now isn't the time." Jason explained slowly. "Right now, I'm trying to play a long, elaborate trick on the demons. I call it Project Great Deceiver. I won't go into the specifics, but basically, I need the demons to think we humans are a lot weaker than we really are. They already know we have two Trueborn Heroes. What do you think they'll do when the legendary Captain America comes back from the dead? Even just seeing you will spike their alarm levels dramatically."

"Ah... I see. Yeah, that makes sense..." Harold muttered. "So you're keepin' me in the back pocket in case of emergencies?"

"That's right." Jason said. "In fact, I need to get Helen outfitted with a MindCore as soon as possible. Your wife will be assisting the Daughter of Heaven, building stuff for her. The sooner she has her MindCore, the better."

Jason had already spoken to Helen about her MindCore previously, and had presented her the options. As expected, she had chosen the GenesisFrame, like him and Sasha. That meant once all the MindCores were installed, there would be two more people with MindCores similar to Jason's... well, except theirs would be way more advanced. Jason would need to upgrade his or risk falling way behind.

"I'll install Helen's MindCore, then Sasha's right afterward." Jason said. "The two of them picked the same one, so I might as well. After that, I'll do Brian, then Farrah, and finally... Marco."

"Marco." Harold repeated, shaking his head wryly as he took a sip of coffee. "Let's hope that kid finally amounts to somethin' with a bigger brain boosting him. Right now, he just ain't worth talkin' about."

"I guess not." Jason said, not entirely comfortable badmouthing a kid who wasn't even present with the two of them.

He concluded his discussion with Harold, then vanished from the spot, leaving the old man to finish up his coffee.

After a few minutes, Harold had drained his cup.

"Shit." Harold cursed. "What was I thinkin'? Now I've got all this energy and can't git back to sleep. Hmm, maybe the missus is in the mood to get frisky, eh? Heh heh heh..."

Harold darted back into the bedroom, knowing soon he and Helen would have to part ways, at least temporarily. Might as well make some new memories while they still had the chance.

Part 781: Neon Genesis

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Two weeks passed inside Aevum, slightly less than an hour in the real world. In that time, Daisy trained relentlessly with Phoebe, the two of them rapidly growing more proficient at unleashing the potential within their enhanced minds.

Phoebe was, without a doubt, ten times stronger than Daisy. Her body was more durable. Her punches hit harder. Her throws went further. But Daisy had a huge advantage in her psionic powers that allowed her to level the playing field.

At the same time, Phoebe couldn't help but notice that her new benefactor, Lord Elrin, had remained unusually quiet ever since Daisy's awakening. Once in a while, he might say a few words to her, but despite her being his potential Inheritor, he didn't seem interested in actually teaching her anything. Instead, he would drop vague hints, telling her that the powers of the Sphinx were far, far more profound than she could ever imagine. He kept encouraging her to read books when she wasn't training and learn about the modern world.

He especially seemed interested in having her learn about biology and the different species on Earth. He never said why, leaving Phoebe perplexed, but she felt he was wiser than she could fathom, so she obeyed dutifully.

In order to beat Phoebe, Daisy had to constantly get creative. Her mother was a monster! Anytime Daisy used her psychic powers to suppress or trick Phoebe, the former Knight of Camelot found a new way to adapt. Her adaptability was inexplicable, as if she possessed a wellspring of knowledge she had to keep unearthing. And forcing Phoebe to her knees required a lot of planning on Daisy's part too, as she had to be as creative as possible to best her mother.

But then, two weeks later, Jason announced it was finally time. He took Sasha and Helen into the infirmary, and everyone in Aevum held their breaths. Daisy's soul-surgery had not resulted in any anomalies, besides a mild sensory overload at the start. It seemed the days of horrific side effects had finally come to an end, but everyone was worried all the same.

Nobody was more anxious than Harold.

"Boy, oh boy. I tell ya h'wat. That boy better not screw up my missus' head. I'll whoop him. I will!" Harold grumbled to himself, loudly enough for the others to hear. "She better come out the same dame as before, but smarter. If she starts actin' all screwy, I'mma whip that boy's ass til it blisters! He ain't never gonna forget it, I tells ya that!"

Everyone was sitting out in the park across from the infirmary, waiting for the verdict. Daisy laughed nervously. She was a little intimidated by Harold, because she could feel his Heroic Aura was much stronger than hers. To the other teens, he was a funny old man who said funny things, but Daisy was always aware he was a battle-hardened warrior who had killed innumerable soldiers during the Second World War. He was not to be taken lightly.

Brian had a thoughtful look on his face. Marco seemed as down in the dumps as always. Daisy wasn't sure why, but ever since coming to Aevum, he'd become even more reclusive than he already was. He joined in on social events, but he usually kept to himself and didn't say much. His body language made it clear he was feeling a little despondent.

After chewing on her lip for a while, Daisy slid over to Marco.

"Hey, Marco." She said, not sure how to break the ice.

Marco was sitting on the grass, his knees pulled up with his chin resting on them, and his left arm wrapped around his legs. He was mindlessly picking at the grass with his right hand, either bored out of his mind, or living in his head entirely.

"...Huh?" Marco asked, blinking his eyes. He looked up to see Daisy was sitting next to him. He hadn't even noticed her arrival.

"I said 'hey'." Daisy repeated. "Are you doing okay?"

"Oh. Yeah. I'm... fine." Marco mumbled, looking back at the ground. He continued to pick at the grass.

"Are you worried about your future MindCore?" Daisy asked. "You've been awfully quiet lately. Quieter than usual."

"Worried?" Marco repeated. "No. Not really. It's not like it will matter."

Daisy blinked. "What do you mean? You think the ability to predict stuff won't be useful? My dad said he used something similar in the future to beat the demons' butts!"

"Yeah. But your dad has strong magical powers. I can snap my fingers and make stuff disappear for a second or two." Marco said, his tone glum. "What good will a MindCore do for someone as useless as me?"

Daisy opened her mouth to reply, but her heart dropped when she heard Marco mutter a few extra words. "I'm useless. I shouldn't even be here."

"Whoa, whoa." Daisy said quietly, trying not to draw attention to them from the others. "Marco, come on, now. My dad said that at the very least, your power will allow him to make huge advances in technology and rapidly advance Aevum. Don't you think that's kind of incredible?? Even if that's the only thing your powers do, that's still going to let you assist the entirety of humanity!"

"Great." Marco mumbled. "I get turned into a finger-snapping machine. Over and over, snapping my fingers to rapidly speed up your dad's timeline. Really incredible stuff- why does he even need me for that anyway?"

Marco turned his head to look at Daisy with an accusatory glance. "No, like seriously. He's already got that weird black hole time-freeze place anyway. I'm sure if he uses his powers he can replicate mine, no problem."

"Dad already told you it has a lot of side effects that your powers don't." Daisy said, her voice soft. "Marco, maybe you don't believe in your powers, but I do. I think they're really unique, and if you experimented with them more-"

"I don't want to experiment with them more." Marco hissed under his breath. "I don't want to be a part of any of this. Killing demons. Killing humans. It's all just... evil! I want to be a normal guy, go to college, meet a nice girl, live a decent life. Instead, I got stuck with some magical ability that could make me kill people if I ever absent-mindedly snap my fingers in tune to a song. Do you know how scary that thought is? I've got ADHD! I lose focus all the time! I'm a walking bomb, and a danger to everyone around me. And the best use we can come up with is using my ability to supercharge the fucking Human Weapons Program."

Daisy fell silent. She looked away.

At this point, she understood that Marco's concerns went deeper than she expected. Marco thought his abilities were useless because Jason's word magic could replicate them, but he also thought they were dangerous just because if he ever snapped his fingers without thinking, he might kill someone.

On top of that, he was not a fighter. He didn't want to hurt or kill people. As such, he placed no value on learning combat training, and when Daisy thought of his sparring sessions with other people, calling Marco's performance 'half-hearted' would be a serious understatement. He couldn't spar against the girls because he had major hangups with hitting women, and he stood no chance against the other men. Even Brian would hand Marco his ass, and Brian wasn't exactly a combat expert. It went without saying that Jason, Harold, and Jerome were unbeatable.

That made Daisy wonder... was Marco possibly feeling emasculated because he was surrounded by men who were all way stronger and more powerful than him?

She... didn't know how to breach such a topic. If she spoke incorrectly, it might worsen his mood. She suspected it could be the truth, but short of reading his mind, she didn't have an easy way to verify her conjecture.

Daisy and Marco had been friends for a long time. Were they best friends? No. But they talked. She knew he had been a quiet guy beforehand, but he didn't seem actively miserable in the past, just a little shy and withdrawn. The fact his attitude had declined this far had started to seriously worry her.

Before Daisy could press him further on the subject, Brian's voice rang out. "They're done!"

Daisy and Marco looked up in unison. Across the street, four people left the infirmary. Jason looked exhausted. Nadia seemed the same as ever, and she was wearing her PepScan to keep an eye on the mental states of the two people who had just had their Mind Realms operated on.

Sasha and Helen had looks of awe on their face. As they stepped out into the daylight, they both winced, not from the brightness of the outside world, but from their MindCores feeding them all manner of crazy thoughts. Sasha stopped just outside the door and started touching the infirmary walls, muttering to herself about the 'construction material imperfections', while Helen took a few steps toward her overjoyed husband and frowned in disgust as she looked at his clothes.

"Goodness, Harold!" Helen cried. "I can't believe I didn't notice the state of your outfit! Wrinkles everywhere, a smudge of egg on the collar! You can't leave the house looking like a slob!"

Harold was all smiles, happy to see his wife come out in one piece. But he did a double take when she started criticizing his outfit. He looked down and... he couldn't even see the smudge she was talking about. As for the wrinkles in his clothes, why would he care about such a silly thing?

"Huh?" Harold grunted. "Helen, what in the dickens are you talkin' about? You told me to wear this shirt..."

Sasha walked over to Helen. She looked even more appalled than Helen at his state. "Oh, you're right, miss Helen! It's dreadful! That color combination doesn't go together at all! You should let me take a look at his wardrobe. I'll help you coordinate several good outfits that go together."

"I can't believe I let him go outside without at least ironing his shirts." Helen said, pressing a palm over her eyes in embarrassment. "To think I was so blind before!"

Jerome walked over to Harold's side. He looked the old man up and down. "Why are you two actin' like that? Ain't nothing wrong with the old man's clothes. He looks fine to me."

"Fine, you say?" Sasha asked. Her face turned a little green when she looked at Jerome's outfit. "Let's not... hear any opinions about fashion from you, okay, Jerome? A black T-shirt and sweatpants? You're practically wearing pajamas! I'll need to work on your wardrobe as well! I can't believe you have the face to walk outside dressed like that!"

Question marks popped up over the heads of everyone present. Phoebe looked as if she was gazing at aliens for the first time. Daisy seemed as though she couldn't recognize Sasha at all. Farrah looked as if she were going to leap to the defense of her boyfriend.

"Ooookay, guys. Let's all calm down for a minute." Jason said, walking between the two groups with a tired expression covering his face. "Sasha, Helen, I warned you about this. You need to dial down the sensitivity of your MindCores a little more. There's too much stimuli for you out here. You're starting to sound like crazy people."

"Crazy? I'm not crazy." Helen said. "It's just that there's all these problems with the world and I can finally see them now! We have to do something to fix them. There's bad design everywhere!"

"People have a bad sense of fashion and that should be a CRIME!" Sasha added. "In fact, it is a crime... against humanity!"

Jason wanted to facepalm. Now he understood what a lunatic he had sounded like when he first got his GenesisFrame. No wonder everyone had looked at him as if a leech had latched onto his brain.

After a few minutes, Jason helped the two women adjust their MindCore power levels. Over time, they would slowly dial them up as Jason had, using their full brains more and more. Daisy had hers on at 80% power all the time now, only dialing it up to 100% when it was time to fight. Nadia, from the start, had hers on at 100% and never turned it down, but she was a special case due to her cerebral power, and the fact she had 70+ virtual years of experience with it locked at 100%.

"Alright," Jason said, as the two newest MindCore users started getting used to their new mental abilities. "Sasha, I'll be having you spend some time with Nadia to learn more about your MindCore. Helen, for the next few months, I'm going to have you read, read, read up on all sorts of books."

Helen nodded. She'd already been given a huge assortment of books from Jason, who had downloaded most of Earth's knowledge into his head and made organized copies of the information in book form at for her. He'd created a library not dissimilar to Solomon's future library in the Hall of Heroes, but admittedly the quality was much, much worse. Solomon had billions more years of memories and knowledge stored in his crown, so his books were a lot more thorough.

"You want me to aid the Daughter of Heaven, right?" Helen asked.

"That's right." Jason said. "You need to become proficient in technology as quickly as possible. You'll be able to pass your knowledge on to Heaven's Daughter, accelerating her fighting capabilities. You have the same potential powers as her, but it's up to you if you also want to become a fighter or not. Your MindCore isn't geared toward combat, but you're still way smarter than any average human. If you put your mind to it, you could become equally fearsome."

Helen didn't look interested. "Heaven's Daughter is a good friend, so I'm happy to help her. But me, fighting? I will pass. I've had more than enough fighting in my time, having waited on Harold to return during World War II."

Harold nodded. He lovingly wrapped an arm around Helen's shoulders. "My dame ain't the fightin' type. But she's sharp as a tack. You done made a good choice, juicin' up her brain like that. I'm sure she'll be a real asset moving forward."

Jason nodded. He looked at the others. "Now that Helen and Sasha have successfully had their MindCores installed, I plan to move onto the next candidates soon. Brian, you're next. Then Farrah, and finally, Marco."

"So soon?" Brian asked. "Not that I am complaining, of course, but don't you usually space these out over weeks?"

"We're running out of time." Jason said. "It's nightfall on Earth in about four Aevum-months. More specifically, it's dusk. We don't know if the demons will wait until full pitch-black nighttime arrives, or if they'll attack when the sun dips below the horizon. If it's the former, than we have four months. If it's the latter, up to five months."

"Remember," Nadia interjected, "we don't only need to install your MindCores, but train you in how to use them. If we wait too long between install sessions, it might give the newest users time to acclimate to their Cores and for us to make sure there are no aberrations, but it also means cutting your training time down."

There was a moment of silence. Jason chewed his lip.

"One other things. I'm... not going to be sending any of you out to fight the demons."

"What? You're not??" Brian asked, bewildered. "Then why the rush?"

"Because the second War in Heaven is going to change everything." Jason explained. "I won't have much free time once the demons finally attack. Even with the extreme time dilation here, I'm going to be moving like crazy to try and handle things on the battlefield. You might think I have all the time in the world, but a lot can happen in real-world seconds. Even if I have hundreds of extra seconds to react, a few minutes of complacency can get people killed."

Harold nodded and smiled. He appreciated that Jason was looking at the bigger picture to try and save lives. He also especially liked that Jason was being proactive and not procrastinating until deadlines were near. Better to give himself a lot of buffer time than run the risk of catastrophic screw-ups. Too many nimrods in the military had treated soldiers as expendable in Harold's time. He wouldn't work under fools like that ever again.

"In the meantime," Jason continued. "Harold is going to start training everyone with a MindCore. Much of the work will not be combat related, surprisingly. I need to rest for a few days, then I'll move on to the rest of you."

Nadia turned to look at Jerome. "I'm sure you're wondering why we haven't talked about your MindCore yet."

Jerome blinked. "Yeah? Jason didn't mention me at all."

"We could give you one." Nadia said. "But... I talked to Jason, and we have an idea we wanted to run past you."

Jerome was surprised. They weren't going to give him a MindCore? Did that mean they thought it would be a waste? Was he too much of a meathead?

Jason seemed to read his mind. "It's not what you think. I've just noticed that Phoebe already seems to have something on the level of a QuantumReflex MindCore in her head, and she's really strong. It felt like if we gave you a QuantumReflex, you'd just be doing the same thing as Phoebe. Better or worse? Doesn't really matter. We want to turn everyone here into a unique powerhouse with their own arsenal and bags of tricks."

"Tricks ain't really my style." Jerome said, his tone bland. "I like punching shit. Beating the fuck out of motherfuckers."

"Come with us." Jason said.

Like this, Jason, Nadia, and Jerome vanished from the spot, leaving everyone behind. Even Daisy was caught offguard.

"The heck? Where are they going? What's my dad planning?" Daisy asked.

Harold shrugged. "Kid didn't tell me nothin'. Whatever, let's git on home, Helen. Time to bury your nose in them books. Leave the plannin' and stratemagizin' to these young'uns."

He and Helen departed. The others were left to surround Sasha and excitedly start asking her all sorts of questions about her new mental abilities.

* * *

Jason and Nadia whisked Jerome off to a hidden underground area elsewhere on Aevum, far outside the city limits. They materialized inside a steel bunker with bright floodlights attached to the ceiling a hundred-feet above. When Jerome looked around, he was startled.

"Robots?" Jerome asked.

"Not just any robots. These are, to be frank, copies of various powerful demons." Jason said, gesturing to the silvery-metallic mannequins standing at attention in the center of the room. "They're... not as strong as the real deal. But their strengths combined are pretty respectable. They'll beat your ass if you're not prepared."

"You want me to fight these things?" Jerome asked, bewildered.

"Yes. But not yet. That's not the fun surprise." Jason said, smiling cheekily. "Turn around."

Jerome did just that. He turned around and gasped. There was a giant metal robot behind him, ten feet tall, but its chest was open. It was humanoid. It looked 'clunky'. It looked like it was made of parts welded together sloppily. It looked rusty and old.

But it also looked really badass. It reminded him of old sci-fi stories of automatons from outer space.

"This is what we've been working on." Jason said. "More specifically, Nadia crafted the schematics. It's a special type of Power Armor made just for you. I call it H-Boy v1. Hop inside and you'll see."

Jerome nodded. He walked over to the H-Boy and looked it up and down. It was a lot bigger than him, and it looked like it weighed several tons. It had spiked fists, giant fingers, huge and wide feet to provide stability, and a circular 'orb' head with hundreds of tiny pinprick-sized holes, likely to provide vision to its operator.

Jerome hefted himself up toward its open chest cavity. He clumsily turned around to get in backward, but he banged the back of his head on a sharp piece of metal and cried out in pain. The impact even drew blood.

Jason healed Jerome. It wasn't much of an injury, so it was trivial for him.

It took Jerome a few minutes to stuff his legs down into the H-Boy's legs. He felt a little disoriented, like he was standing two feet taller than before, and the ground looked wrong. He wasn't used to being this 'tall'.

"Alright." Jason said. "The H-Boy is... special. It doesn't have a power source. It only moves under your strength. You have to move it yourself."

"Huh?" Jerome asked, bewildered. "You couldn't like, add a fancy computer system or whatever? Does it shoot like missiles and lasers and shit?"

"Nope. Nothing like that." Jason said. "Let's start with the basics. Try to get it moving."

Jason didn't explain what he meant. He gave Jerome no instructions, so Jerome had to put his arms inside the robot's arms and pull the cockpit shut, drenching himself in darkness. The interior was uncomfortably warm, and Jerome already started to sweat from the slow heat buildup his body was producing in such a closed space.

"Make it move..." Jerome muttered to himself. "The fuck does he mean? What, like I gotta move this rusty piece of shit myself? Um... I guess I just lift my leg then?"

Jerome did that. He hooked his foot into the 'shoe' of the power armor. Then he tried lifting.

"Huuuk! Come on! Move, move, you piece of garbage! Grrrgh! Jesus fucking Christ, there's no way this fucking thing only weighs a few tons!"

Jerome strained and strained. He felt the power armor shift slightly, but the movement was so small it couldn't really be counted as 'moving' it except in the most literal sense.

"God damn, motherfucker." Jerome cursed. "Move, you cocksucker! How fucking heavy is this tin can?! Am I supposed to use it to fight demons?! Maybe if I try moving the arms..."

Jerome wiggled his right hand around inside the power armor, fumbling to try and find controls. He eventually felt some sort of grabbable 'bar', and he wrapped his fingers around it.

"Son of a BITCH, what the fucking fuck am I supposed to do?!" Jerome roared. "Fucking lift, or turn, or even twitch a finger! Do SOMETHING!!"

Outside the power armor, Nadia's expression was blank. "Should we... tell him?"

"No, no. It's funnier this way." Jason said. "Besides, if he gives up right away, he won't have the mindset to handle adversity. Let him cuss a bunch. It's good for the soul to get the anger out anyway."

A slight smile twitched at the edge of Nadia's lips. "You're such an asshole sometimes."

Jerome struggled, roared with rage, and struggled some more. Every so often, the power armor would slightly twitch, but never did it manage to make any substantial movements.

Thirty minutes passed. Jason scratched his head. "You're... sure you set it to the lowest resistance to start, right?"

"Pretty sure." Nadia said. "Don't worry. He'll figure it out eventually. In the meantime, can we get some lunch? I'm hungry."

"Me too. That surgery was exhausting." Jason said with a chuckle.

He whisked Nadia away, leaving Jerome behind.

All the while, Jerome kept cursing, cursing, and cursing some more.

"Fuck you, Jason! You piece of shit! This is a trick! This shit don't work! Lift your finger, motherfucker! Lift it! LIFT! Hrrgh, HRRRRGH!! God DAMN why don't this bucket of bolts MOVE?!"

"JASOOOON!!"

Part 782: Jason's Echo

January 29th, 2021. Aevum.

Jason and Nadia had a quiet dinner together. They didn't do this often, and there were zero romantic overtones to the interaction. Jason made sure to stay strictly professional with Nadia. He was well aware of her love for him, and he didn't want to do anything to encourage her. He hoped, with time, her inclinations toward him would fade away. He also hoped for the same thing with Catherine too, but whether or not that would actually happen was anyone's guess.

Jason had already guessed that Nadia never deleted her mind-clone of him. Not too long ago, she even admitted as much. Thus, when sitting near her, Jason felt a faint sense of discomfort. Just like Hope and Fiona, there was another clone nearby, a copy of Jason he couldn't interact with. Ever since Nadia fessed up to the copy's continuing existence, it felt like a barrier between the two of them had weakened somewhat.

Jason knew she was pushing all her feelings for him onto her Fake Jason. That helped her cope with the fact she couldn't be with the 'real' Jason. But personally, Jason himself wasn't sure what being 'real' meant. Was Hope 'fake' just because he was a clone? Of course not. He was real. So was Fiona.

Even if the mind-wiped Jason in her head only existed as an incorporeal lifeform, Jason had already started to think of his unknowable clone as a real person. In the Wordsmith's eyes, the distinction between 'real' and 'fake' life forms had blurred a lot over his lifetime. Humans and robots were as real to him as cats and dogs... especially now that he knew even those could talk.

Nadia spun her fork around some noodles. She scooped them into her mouth and smiled. She wasn't looking at Jason, but she seemed really happy about something.

It took a moment, but eventually Jason's curiosity won out.

"Something funny?" Jason asked, cutting off a chunk of steak and forking it into his mouth. He chewed the savory meat slowly, relishing the taste.

Nadia's smile widened a little. Then it disappeared. She blinked her eyes and looked up at Jason, slightly dazed. "What?"

"You were smiling." Jason said. "I thought maybe the... other me... said something funny."

"The other you." Nadia repeated. She blushed a little, then looked down at the table with a smile. "Yes. He is pretty funny sometimes. But no, that's not why I was smiling."

She paused for a few seconds longer than felt necessary.

"I was, um, talking to him. I realized it could be a little weird always calling him Mental Jason or whatever. So he suggested that he should have his own name, like Hope did. I thought his choice was kind of cute."

Jason tensed up a little. "His own name, huh?"

Seeing the look on Jason's face, Nadia's smile faded a little. "Yes, okay? It only makes sense."

"He's aware of my existence. Does that mean he knows what he is, what his reality is?" Jason questioned.

This was the first time Jason had really spoken to Nadia about the clone in her head since a few weeks before. Now that the topic was out in the open, he thought he might as well learn more about her mental situation.

Nadia sighed. She spun more noodles around her fork. "Well, yes. He knows he's a mental clone. He also knows that I erased his memories of a wife and kids. He doesn't mind, because he's never known them. They're strangers to him, no different from people living down the road. Slightly familiar at a glance, but zero emotional connection. So he's not wallowing in depression or anything like that. And he's quite happy to live inside my MindCore, given all the amenities."

"Amenities?" Jason repeated, slightly puzzled.

"Of course. I can make models of anyone alive, now that I'm not trapped in my simulation. He's always in there, playing games, chatting with people, or even training in battle against the Demon Emperors, like Ose."

"Oh. Huh." Jason muttered. He looked thoughtful as he pondered this new information.

Nadia noticed his negativity lessening. "That's right. Also, the time dilation inside my Mind Realm is quite extreme. He's been in there for many many hundreds of years. He's probably older in my simulated universe than you are in the real one, and that's not counting his years of knowledge taken from your life in Aevum."

She seemed to be bragging, but at the same time, there was a lot of warmth in Nadia's voice. Jason smiled.

"At least you're treating your Copy Jason well." He conceded.

"Well, that's the thing." She said. "He doesn't want to be known as Copy-Jason anymore, or whatever else. He told me that from now on, you should refer to him as... Echo."

Jason blinked. "Echo? Is he for real?"

"Jason-Echo. Yes." Nadia said seriously. "He'd like for you to refer to and think of him as just Echo in the future, okay?"

Jason thought for a moment. Truthfully, he thought Hope had been a kind of stupid name at first, but Echo seemed even dumber. Was he just really bad at naming things? It was no wonder Phoebe forced him into letting her name the kids.

Immediately, he thought of Hero City and what a lame name that had been to. Who the hell was he to judge what his mental clone called himself?

"Alright. Echo it is, then." Jason said.

A long pause followed. Jason chewed his lip. "Does Echo... want a real body?"

"What?" Nadia asked, her breath catching slightly. "Are you offering to make him one?"

"Well yeah." Jason said. "I think it's... only fair. I'd be lying if I said that after Hope I wasn't really apprehensive about doing it. But... it feels wrong to leave Echo locked up in your head. I also can't talk to him at all. I can't get a feel for the guy."

Nadia seemed hesitant. She closed her eyes and seemed to enter into an internal discussion with Echo. When she opened her eyes again, her expression was one of disbelief.

"Echo said.. no." Nadia said, enunciating each word carefully. "He said he has no interest in... meatspace. He likes living in the paradise of his wife's mind."

"Wife." Jason repeated, causing the word to hang in the air for several uncomfortable seconds. "You married the guy stuck in your head? I don't remember being invited to the wedding."

Nadia didn't have a witty retort. She simply poked at her food and lowered her head.

"It... felt like the next logical step." She muttered softly.

Jason didn't press the issue. "Alright. Well, if Echo wants to pop out into the real world, I'll make accommodations for him. He can always use one of my Dronesmiths as a backup."

Nadia didn't accept or deny his offer. It seemed Echo had zero interest in such an arrangement.

Jason wondered just what sort of 'him' she had cultivated inside her mind. He's only been living in the Earth era for about a year, counting time dilation. The fact Echo was hundreds of years older made him feel a weird disconnection. Was Echo just living it up, going on roller coaster rides, beating the shit out of virtual Demon Emperors, and having mind-sex with Nadia whenever he wanted?

Shit. Maybe he was. If it wasn't Nadia but instead Phoebe, Jason might even be tempted to taste the fruits of such an arrangement.

The table fell silent. Man and woman ate their food, with Nadia occasionally smiling to herself as she mentally chatted with her invisible husband. All the while, Jason felt a strange coldness settle over his body.

He thought about Daisy. He thought about Timothy.

But most of all, he thought about Phoebe.

Time had not healed the wound. He still missed her. The pain was just as fresh as the day he'd hugged her corpse in his arms.

He wanted his wife back. He never stopped thinking about her. The fact Echo was allowed to simply forget her and live a happy life inside Nadia's MindCore secretly ate at him. He felt bad for what Echo had lost, but he envied his copy for the pain he didn't have to endure.

Sometimes, the mental pain was so bad that Jason wanted to end his life. He couldn't do that though. Not while he still had his father and daughter around. Not while the younger Phoebe was here... maybe he could kindle a spark with her. Or maybe it wasn't the right thing to do. He just didn't know.

Jason slowly ate his food, finding that even though it was technically delicious, it was like sand in his mouth without his wife there to enjoy it with him.

All the while, Nadia closed her eyes, unaware of Jason's inner thoughts.

Inside Nadia's MindCore, there was a vast simulated reality. It wasn't the same as the real world, not even by a little bit. Anyone who entered it would be fully aware it was artificial. Physics didn't function the way they did in realspace. The 'primary space' Nadia typically existed in was like a massive space station suspended in a starless void, with a thousand roads that spiraled off into orbs of light that led to other simulated realities with their own laws of physics.

It resembled a massive mechanical spiderweb, with threads spinning out in hundreds of directions.

Nadia was the owner of her MindCore, but she was frequently busy in the real world. She often had to think about things outside the sphere of her inner mind. As such, the administrator of her MindCore who kept it maintained and running was none other than Jason-Echo, also known simply as Echo.

Echo was Jason. At a glance, that much was obvious. But who a man was had more to do with the life he'd lived and the thoughts in his head than his mere personality. A man who had been violently mugged would be a drastically different person than a version of him who beat the hell out of his mugger. This fact was what exemplified the differences between Jason and Echo.

Unlike Jason, Echo did not have any memories or attachments toward Phoebe, Daisy, or Timothy. However, this did not mean he was a lobotomized clone of the real Jason. In fact, Nadia had withheld an important fact from Jason... Echo still had all the memories of his former life available to him. If he desired, he could even integrate them back into his mind as if they had never left.

But he didn't. To Echo, those memories were like videos recorded by a completely different person. He had flipped through them in the past. He knew of Phoebe's existence, and he had witnessed the tragedy of her death. He knew about Timothy and that Jason had left his son behind, in the future. He knew about Daisy, too. To him, these memories were like watching a sad movie produced by an influential director. They brought tears to his eyes, but they had less than 1% the impact on his psyche that they did to the real Jason.

Echo still possessed all the knowledge that Jason did, but when it came to Jason's life, Echo had none of the attachments to his family. Unlike Hope, Echo did not silently miss a life that had been stripped away from him.

He didn't think about its loss at all!

This was what made Echo a completely different entity from Jason and Hope. He was his own man.

Nadia flickered into reality inside the construct of her mind. She appeared at her husband's right side. He immediately smiled when he saw her.

"I told him." Nadia said.

"About time, babe." Echo said, turning to grab her and sweep her off her feet. he bent over and planted a passionate kiss on his wife's lips.

This was one of Echo's favorite moves. He loved literally sweeping Nadia off her feet. He couldn't keep his hands off her. He thought his wife was the most beautiful woman in existence, and this wasn't even something she had forced into his head. All Nadia had done was allow Echo to remember their 70 years together, locked in her MindCore. By doing that, he had immediately gained all the same feelings toward her that she had toward him. Some of those feelings were disjointed due to the fact that every single day of her imprisonment he had lost his memories of the day before.

But in Echo's mind, this was completely understandable. It was as if a man with a terrible memory condition had fallen in love with a woman thousands of times in his life, and then finally remembered all of them at once.

One of his hands pulled the back of her head towards his own. He forcefully kissed her over and over, while Nadia let out soft little moans that made him go feral with excitement. Naturally, he grabbed her ass with his other hand and squeezed, getting a kick out of the way her moans shifted pitch ever so slightly.

But this wasn't the time for a round of animalistic sex. They did that all the time, never tiring of it. This was just the way he always greeted his beloved. After a minute of passionate embracing, Echo let Nadia go. She flushed slightly and quickly regained her footing, using a hand to nudge her tousled hair back into place.

"I never get tired of that." Echo said with a grin. "So how'd he take it?"

Nadia took a moment to reorient herself. "He... he seemed okay with it. He thought your name was a bit silly though."

"Whatever. I like it. That's all that matters." Echo said.

"I like it too." Nadia agreed.

That was true. But then again, she liked anything Echo did.

Echo and Nadia chatted for a few minutes. Then another man approached from behind, a 30-year-old guy with dirty blonde hair and a full beard hanging a few inches off his chin.

"Hey, mom." The man said, smiling at Nadia as he leaned down and kissed her cheek. "How'd it go with Meatspace-man?"

"It went fine, Zachary." Nadia said. "He did suggest making a physical body for your father, though."

"Pft. I knew he would." Echo snorted, a hint of disdain in his voice. "That's probably what I'd have suggested when I was younger. And dumber."

Echo was currently standing beside the controls for the entirety of Nadia's MindCore. He had full administrative access, the same as her. He could create, monitor, and alter simulations at will. Unlike Jason, Echo did not have a MindCore of his own. He didn't have a GenesisFrame, and any attempts to simulate one fell flat.

But he didn't need one. Nadia's MindCore was essentially his. He had all the same capabilities. It was as if Jason himself had been given a RealitySim. Echo had hundreds of years of experience using it, too. He was even more proficient with it than Nadia.

Echo turned to the controls. He casually rested a hand on a metal pedestal with a glowing golden orb in its center. The world blurred around himself, his wife, and his son. They appeared inside a factory of some sort. Echo stepped away and walked toward an army of clones, each one looking exactly the same as him. Unlike Echo though, these clones were completely mindless. They had all the thoughts and memories he did, but he piloted them all remotely at the same time, similar to Jason's Dronesmiths. How he was able to do this at such a scale, even Nadia didn't know. She would struggle to do the same.

Echo casually walked over to one of his clone, who was delicately soldering circuits onto a very familiar-looking device. After a moment, Echo picked it up and examined it.

"Still no success at improving the PepScan." Echo concluded, turning to his wife after a moment. "I can improve the range of it dramatically, but then the potency falls off."

"That defeats the point." Nadia said, shaking her head. "Being able to copy people's existences into my RealitySim is the most important function of the PepScan."

"Yeah. I don't like that you need to get so close to someone to do so..." Echo said hesitantly. "It adds a heightened element of risk. But this is probably the best we'll get for the foreseeable future."

Echo was the one who had designed Nadia's PepScan. She had contributed in many important ways, but he was ultimately the core designer of it. He had plenty of time on his hands, unlike his wife, who was always in and out of her own MindCore.

Nadia hesitated for a moment. "You're sure you don't want to pay Realspace a visit?"

"Babe, no matter how many times you ask, the answer's still no." Echo said dismissively. "What's out there for me? Earth? I don't care about Earth. I don't care about a bunch of people Jason's attached to. My whole family's in here."

He continued. "The only reason I pay any attention to meatspace is because your real body exists in it. If something happened to you, I'd... well, it would be the worst day of my life. If you died, our entire family would die too. So I only care about the 'outside' in the sense of protecting and making you stronger."

Nadia smiled. She felt a sense of warmness from her husband's words that always improved her mood. No matter how down she was feeling, Echo's pure love would serve to invigorate her mind and soul.

"Yeah... I know." Nadia said quietly. "It's just that... sometimes... I wish you could hold me in the real world too."

"Maybe someday." Echo said, reaching over to caress her cheek. "Even if all of this is only in your head, doesn't it feel real?"

Nadia bobbed her head slowly. The passionate touch of her husband was just as real as if he existed in realspace. His touch, his kisses, his everything. They felt exactly the same as if he and Nadia were making skin-to-skin contact. She genuinely couldn't tell the difference.

"Yeah. Never mind then. You're right, I'm just being silly." Nadia said, smiling like a teenage girl hanging around her unrequited crush. She was just as excited to be around Echo hundreds of years later as on the day they met. He was her everything.

Eventually, they got back down to business. Zachary started talking about his own work once his mom and dad put a temporary pause on their overwhelming romantic antics.

"Me and Tyler have been working on improvements to the H-Boy." Zachary said. "How has Jerome taken to it?"

"He's only just started a few minutes ago." Nadia said before correcting herself. "In real-time, I mean."

"So slow." Zachary grumbled. "How long until we get some results? I need hard data to improve the H-Boy."

"It'll probably be a few weeks." Nadia said, making the calculations in her head. "Jason insisted we let Jerome fumble around for the first hour or two."

Zachary was aghast. "Seriously? Why is that idiot always getting in the way? If you don't tell Jerome about the kinetic energy system, how will he know to-"

"Zach." Echo said coldly, directing a look toward his son that made him clamp up immediately. "We don't use words like that here. Just because Jason is behind me doesn't mean he's an 'idiot'. He has his own strengths."

Zach swallowed. He felt a little embarrassed by his dad's words. "Y-yeah. Sorry, dad. I'm just saying, you know? If mom had told Jerome..."

"Jerome's pretty smart." Echo said dismissively. "He'll figure it out. If he doesn't, that's fine. We'll bring him up to speed. Even if it's a couple hours in meatspace, it's only a few weeks of waiting for you. You'll be fine."

"I can't make any major changes to the internals until I get that data though!" Zachary complained.

"Then work on something else." Echo said. "What about that SIGIL system? Wasn't Tyler especially proud of that?"

Zachary felt his mood deflate. "Dad. We don't have hard data for that either."

"So make a simulation for it, then." Echo said.

"We don't know for sure if SIGIL's effects are the same in simspace versus realspace." Zachary argued. "That's why we need the data! Every bit of data improves the sims."

Echo grimaced. He scratched his chin thoughtfully. "Well. You're not wrong there. Just worry about it later, okay? Exercise a little patience. Work on something else in the meantime."

"...Alright." Zachary grumbled. "Well anyway. I'll leave you two lovebirds alone."

Zachary sauntered off, vanishing as he shifted himself into a different part of the RealitySim at will. Technically, he and all of Echo and Nadia's kids were administrators on the same level as Echo himself, but none of them were as proficient with the RealitySim as their father. They had been born inside and lived inside the sim their entire existences. They had no memory of realspace, and only knew about it from what they could simulate.

It was ironic that simulated people could only attempt to better simulate reality, but that irony was not lost on them. They only did so to improve the odds of protecting and improving their mother's life. As for actually traveling to realspace, none of them had any interest.

Once Echo and Nadia were alone, he cleared his throat. "Honey, no matter how badly you want it, I never will. Going back to meatspace just isn't for me. Leave all of that to Jason. My simmed existence gives me infinite pleasure."

"You really don't want to? Not even a little?" Nadia asked carefully.

"Not even the slightest bit. I have no attachments out there, except for you, and I get more of you in here thanks to time dilation than I ever would in meatspace." Echo explained. "Jason's doing important work. He has his goals, and I have mine. Let's leave it at that."

There was a long pause.

Echo stared ahead silently for a while.

"You know. I've been thinking a lot, lately. About time. Time travel." Echo said.

"Time travel? You have?" Nadia asked, slightly skeptical. "You've never mentioned it before."

"I was thinking about Hideki and how his time travel worked, versus Jason and Daisy's versions." Echo muttered. "Just random thoughts, is all. We know so little about it. We don't know for sure which form of time travel we exist in. Did Jason rewind time and delete his future reality? Or is it still out there? Can he go back to it? Even if he can, will it be the same one? Or a different one that looks and feels identical?"

"Do you want to go to a different era?" Nadia asked.

"Babe. Come on. Of course not." Echo smirked. "I'm perfectly happy right where I am. I just feel bad for Jason, you know? It's like I'm looking at my younger brother who's had a hard life. I want to cheer him up, make him feel better. You know he's miserable, right? Like he's legit suicidal. I know I would be, if I were in his position. He's probably filled with self-hatred and doubt. It's a miracle he's held up this long."

Nadia was taken aback. She was a smart girl, and she had a copy of Jason inside her mind, but reading Jason's memories to get to know him wasn't the same as actually having 'been' him. Echo was missing a lot of parts of who Jason was now, but in essence, he and Jason came from the same starting blocks. He understood how he'd be feeling if, hypothetically, he were living the same life as Jason.

"Wife dead. Son left behind. Little girl tortured while he wasn't around to protect her. Dad's a fuckin' time traveling enigma. Of course Jason's a mess." Echo muttered out loud. "But he deserves respect. He's experienced a loss I've forgotten. It changed him, partly for the better, partly for the worse. I guarantee you Jason has more determination to improve than I do. He doesn't want to make the same mistakes he did in his youth... and I really respect that."

Nadia was quiet for a while. She lowered her eyes, thinking about what Echo had said.

She didn't have a retort. She also felt he was right. There was something really admirable about Jason's persistence. He had something Echo didn't.

"You have your own superior points." Nadia eventually said. "Jason's great, but so are you."

"Damn right I am. I'm fucking awesome." Echo said, giving his wife a thumbs-up. "And don't you ever forget it, babe. But also, don't let the kids blabber bad words about Jason either. They don't have the right."

"I won't. I'll put my foot down next time." Nadia vowed.

Nadia chatted with her husband for another hour or two. She eventually opened her eyes and returned to reality. Only a half-minute had passed. She immediately noticed Jason seemed quieter than before. He was staring off into the distance, lost in thought.

"Hey, Jason..." Nadia said softly. "You know I really admire you, right?"

Jason blinked. He seemed to leave his daze. "Huh? What did you say?" Jason asked.

"I said I really admire you." Nadia repeated.

"Oh. Uh. Thanks." Jason said. He looked at her like he was afraid she was going to jump at him, throw him to the floor, and start shoving her tongue in his mouth.

Naturally, such a silly thought hadn't even crossed her mind.

"I just think you're great. That's all." Nadia said, spinning up another forkful of noodles.

"Alright. Thanks, then..." Jason said warily. "Just remember that you're married, okay?"

Nadia smiled dreamily. "I'd never forget that."

Jason closed his eyes and massaged his forehead. She's so weird sometimes, he thought.
