Ben righted himself quickly, as he blinked to clear his head. "Yes, yeah. I mean, yes, we fight! We won't roll over and play dead. If the Volgrim want a fight, then by goddamn we'll give them a battle the legends will never forget. We'll change the future, if it's the last thing we do! I won't let Judicator be proven right. I won't let Earth be destroyed!"

The mood shifted on the bridge as the other officers and ensigns picked up on his rush of energy. "Damn right!" A young man chimed in excitedly. "We have Ben Brown, the terror of the West! He's killed a million Volgrim with his own bare hands! We can't lose if he's in command!"

As the crew fired off a round of hurrah's, Ben grinned and nodded sheepishly. Well, that 'million' might have gotten a bit embellished over the last century, but there's no harm letting them think like that. History will correct the error.

"All right, ladies and gentlemen, let's get this show started! Pull away from Volgarius to a safe distance from their ground bombardment cannons. Blast a hole through their line of ships if that's what it takes. Once we're through, concentrate on their light and midsized cruisers! If we pick off the weaklings, it's less harassment for us to deal with!"

His first officer nodded approvingly. "We still hold a decent numerical edge. It's been working so well for them, I think using their own tactics against them is a solid idea, Ambassador."

As everyone else on the bridge began quickly orchestrating their new strategy, Ben swallowed heavily as doubt began to cloud his mind. It doesn't matter, really. If we don't get reinforcements, and soon... this can't turn into a victory. Damn you, Jason. What the hell were you thinking, running off like that?

"This is all of us, then?" I glance around the room, feeling my eyes nearly pop out of my head at the sight. Twenty thousand, five hundred clones of myself... all of them filled up the hangar of the Mothership.

"No, uh, not quite all of us. There's the mole we have shutting down the portals for the demons, and a few on other covert missions that only we can perform, plus a few that are on flights to other solar systems, like the Galactic Exploration Force and their initial exploration flights." One of my clones from the JIB is standing next to me, as he makes a sweeping gesture at a holopad in his hand. "But the number of missing clones is less than two dozen. This is basically all of us."

I nod as I glance around the room. Most of my clones are identical to me in every way, but a few have changed up their lifestyle habits enough to be a little different looking from myself. A noticeable number have anywhere from a small to a large amount of facial hair, some due to laziness in keeping their appearance clean shaven, but others due to deliberately growing out their beards to be different from the crowd. Only a handful are doing really crazy stuff, like dyeing their hair into weird colors, such as purple, red, and green. I'll have to have a chat with those few later to see why they did it.

I cleared my throat loudly to get everyone's attention, though nobody was really talking anyway. "Alright guys, listen up. This is an important day for humanity, as well as us. We all know our main goal, which is to save Earth. We're going to do that ourselves. As I speak, we're losing friends and allies. This is inexcusable. I will accept the blame for this. It's my fault that, up to now, we've been mostly passive observers. Sure, we do things to help humanity, but for the most part, considering our godlike abilities, we've done little to really influence the course of history. That changes today."

All of my clones nodded in unison. It was rather creepy. "We can no longer be passive. This is make or break for whether Earth survives or dies. I've thought about it at length, and now I know what must be done. Total annihilation. Absolute extermination of the Volgrim. This will be the modern equivalent of the Crusades, for us. I'm not pleased that it came to this, but it has to be this way. I, and likely all the rest of you, never wanted us to have to become agents of genocide, but I see no other way to go on."

I was about to continue but one of my clones interrupted me. Interestingly, he was one of the heavily bearded ones. "I understand why you're choosing this path, but haven't you considered that this could be the path that leads to Earth being destroyed? We still haven't determined if we will be the ones to change history, or cause it."

I choked slightly at his words. He's right, of course. I thought the same thing. We all did, at one point or another, whether it be pre-clone or post-clone. "P-perhaps. This may somehow cause the destruction of Earth... but I don't think it will. The Volgrim existed in the future we came from. If we exterminate them, they won't exist, and thusly our future will have definitely changed."

Another clone, a different one who looked identical to myself, spoke up next. "I have had another thought regarding time travel. What if we've been looking at time incorrectly, all along? Perhaps time is not a set of linear events, but a bunch of important events that flow into one another in various ways? What if we had somehow been able to prevent the World Trade Centers from being attacked, or the space debris from wiping out millions of people? Perhaps, instead, another equally bad disaster would have simply occurred later down the line, taking an equal number of people along with it? Perhaps time is like a flowing river, and when we appear, we're just rocks tossed into the middle of it. Time simply flows around us, creating new paths that lead to the same goal."

I shook my head quickly, perhaps too quickly. "No, I refuse to believe that. I believe in free will, as we all likely do. If time must always head towards a specific destination, then we have no free will. We are just pawns in the grand game of the Creator. I can't allow myself to think like that. If we exterminate the Volgrim, time will change dramatically. This is our best chance to save Earth. This has to be it."

"What about the demons? Should we exterminate them as well?"

One of the clones from the attacking crew spoke up. J-498, I believe was his designation? Yeah, he was smoking a cigarette again. I didn't know how to respond, so I simply stayed silent for a few moments as I collected my thoughts. "I don't know, yet. Exterminating the demons would have a more immediate effect, to be honest.... but I don't think even with our combined power we can kill Satan. He's too powerful. Even Amelia... something seems off... it might not be time yet. I think she lacks the power and abilities to kill him as she is now. Something must change for that to happen."

One of my other clones in the front cocked an eyebrow. "You know, speaking of changing the future... I had an odd thought. What if we stopped trying to kill Satan? He's our enemy, but he's also controlled opposition. He keeps the demons in check with a rigid ruleset and power structure. Plus, if he's dead in the time we come from, then keeping him alive would also change the future."

I bobbed my head quickly. "I agree with your assessment. However, it may be impossible to prevent his death. Amelia might somehow gain new power and kill him of her own accord. He might be assassinated by a demon looking to rise in the ranks. Both of these are unlikely, but anything could happen. However, you're right that him staying alive would also change the future, I'm just not convinced that would improve anything for the better in any fashion at all."

The clone nodded silently as he glanced away, deep in thought. It was a familiar expression that I myself had likely made on many occasions, even if I didn't know I was making it.

"Are there any more questions?" I glanced around the room. My clones shook their heads slowly. They had seen the mental image I was projecting. They knew what we had to do.

I don't want to have to do this, but I can't see any other way. This is simply how it has to be.

Turning away, I aim my mind at Harold. "Alright, we're done here. Go ahead and let Amelia back in here, and set a course back to Volgarius. As fast as you can get us there. Let's make this a swift, merciful death."

I stifled a chuckle when I realized the face Amelia was going to make when she saw my clones for the first time. Especially given how many were here. Ah, well... she was going to find out someday at some point, anyways.

Part 304a: Unexpected

Ben gritted his teeth as more of his ships were being destroyed. As it had turned out, ramming the blockade while sticking around to deal damage had been more costly than he had expected.

"Casualty report." Ben coughed the order out as he wiped sweat from his brow. He already knew he wasn't going to like the response, but he had to know.

"We're down to 2,500 ships, ambassador. The Volgrim are just about evenly matched with us now." His tactical officer relayed the numbers back uneasily. What had started as a battle of 25,000 to 5,000 in humanity's favor was now reduced to even numbers. Their numerical advantage, for what it had been worth, was gone.

Ben looked over at one of the tactical screens. Thirty minutes until the reinforcements showed up. "How the hell are they taking us apart like this? They only have fifty of our Dartfighters under their control! We have hundreds more than they do!"

"Yes, Ambassador Brown, but they appear to be uploading superior tactical AI's on-board the Dartfighters they've taken over. We're still using human operators with AI only for assistance, therefore their drones are far faster at reacting and implementing orders than ours are. Their fifty drones are the equivalent of a thousand of our own. We're being peeled apart at the seams. If we were willing to activate our own AI we might stand a chance, but you know as well as I do why we can't do that."

Ben nodded knowingly. Jason had explained why this was the case to him. Apparently, AI would go rogue at some point in the near future and aid in the destruction of humanity. Best to keep it dumb for as long as possible, to at least try and stave off the damage it would cause. But then again, considering the Volgrim had apparently mastered AI and theirs was not turning on their masters, perhaps AI was tameable. Perhaps the dangers were being overblown. He had never been one to question Jason, but the man had left the battlefield over three hours ago. If Jason wasn't going to use whatever powers he had to aid humanity, even going so far as to flee the battlefield...

No, that couldn't be right. Jason wouldn't leave without a good reason. He was an ally of humanity, no matter what the whisperings of others in private might indicate. Ben had seen it time and time again.

But then... Jason hadn't always been totally honest. He kept his identity a secret for well over a hundred years. He never thought it imperative to mention the existence of angels and demons...

Jason wasn't always honest... that much was for sure. Could he still be trusted?

As these thoughts entered his mind, Ben glanced down at the tactical screen before him, showing the movements of their troops. Those damn Dartfighters were moving around far faster than the other ships, tearing through them like a hot knife through butter. Ben needed an out. He needed to implement something that would give them back the advantage. Anything would do, they just had to hold on for another half hour.

"Tactical, do we still have the prototype OMEN AI ready for activation?"

Ben's first officer swallowed carefully as he eyed the ambassador. "I can't read minds, Ambassador, but if you're thinking what I'm guessing you're thinking... that's a dangerous game you're playing. The Artificial Pilots are not ready for deployment yet. They're poorly tested, at best."

Ben nodded carefully. "I know. What other option do we have, though? I've already lost several platoons of good men and women. At this rate, we'll possibly make it until reinforcements get here, but we'll lose another half of our ships. We've got to even up the odds."

Ben's first officer stared at him for a long few moments as a pained look washed over his eyes. "All right. If those are your orders, we'll carry them out. You know what Judicator will say though, right?"

"Yeah. I know." Ben scratched his cheek so hard he almost drew blood. "We're out of options. Do it."

The first officer nodded as he flicked his gaze over to the Field Ops section of the bridge. "You heard the man. Activate the Artificial Pil-"

Before he could finish the sentence, the head of Tactical almost jumped out of his seat. "The Mothership! She's back! She just dropped out of warp speed, bearing Mark 7-F on our position. She's roughly 2,000 miles away and closing quickly."

As he said that, the air on the bridge shifted almost imperceptibly as a familiar figure appeared at the rear, where other people weren't standing. "Judicator?" Ben fired off the question rhetorically, but he knew exactly who was standing there, in his traditional white hypersuit.

"Ben, there's no time for pleasantries. Pull all your ships out. Beat the hastiest of retreats. If anyone dies in the retreat, it can't be helped. Get out of here now."

Ben felt his jaw drop at the sudden proclamation. "W-where have you been? We're being slaughtered out here! I can't just retreat, not when the reinforcements are so close!"

"The reinforcements aren't coming. I ordered them not to." Jason stared unblinkingly with his helmeted head in the general direction of Ben's face, the hollow mask leaving Ben with a feeling of unease. "There's no time to explain. Get out of here or the shockwave will destroy you too. You might have minutes if you're lucky."

Ben gawked for a few moments as words escaped him, but something about what Jason was saying... his tone of voice... this wasn't a joke. Something was coming. "What have you done?"

"I'm ending the war. Get out before it's too late. This is your only warning." A moment later, Jason vanished.

Ben felt his hands begin to shake as terror washed over him. This must be serious. If Jason was speaking like this then... had he made a decision?

"Y-you heard him! Judicator has ordered a full retreat! Get out of here, all power to shields, on the double!"

You'd better not be screwing us over. Ben was left with one last thought as the tactical scanner showed the Mothership jump to lightspeed as it again fled the field of battle.

Nufaris was trying, desperately, to keep his smugness in check. Trayza's mental expression showed no emotion, and absolutely no sign of the humiliation she must be facing, but Nufaris knew she must be quite pained at the moment. "How about another status report?"

Trayza's eyes flicked downwards for the briefest of moments as she fought to contain a snarl. "Your ship has the best scanners of all the ships in our fleet. You know exactly how the battle is going."

"Hm. Yes, I suppose so." Nufaris felt the corner of his mouth tighten as he fought mightily to contain a chuckle. This must be the deepest humiliation for her. Trayza's plan to let him take over and fail spectacularly had backfired, and now he was eradicating the humans with minimal losses. At this rate, they wouldn't even need backup for the reinforcements he knew were coming. The humans thought they were clever, sending the attack out in waves, but that merely gave the Volgrim time to whittle down the initial attack wave first. It was a foolish plan, as they should have rushed with all of their might first. Well, actually, the foolish part was transmitting those plans to their Dartfighters. Cuanali had been able to intercept that information early in the battle.

Everything was going according to plan.

"You sound pleased with the results of the battle so far." This time it was Cinculu, the fifth Founder, who spoke up.

"Shouldn't I be? Look at how everything has turned out. Not bad for my first command of a major battle, hmm?" Nufaris felt his grip slipping as a smile started to form. They were all so jealous of him. The all-knowing Founders, worshiped by the citizens of Volgarius, were frauds. Doubtlessly, they had done much good for their kind, but their supposed almighty power was really linked up to just one individual. Unarin was far weaker than Dosenar, as it turned out. He was an actor who had somehow taken control of her powers, using them for his own benefit. But that would end soon. Once Nufaris had a good grasp of the inner dealings of the Founders, he would find a way to oust Unarin and lead his people to a new age. The humans needed to be exterminated. The demons were not trustworthy, and the 'angels' were surely a threat as well. Diplomacy was useless.

There was also the matter of the Sentinels. If those automatons were as powerful and fearsome as Unarin had spoken of them, they might be quite useful in the war against humanity.

Naturally, Nufaris understood on a fundamental level the dangers of AI. He doubted the Founders had lied about that, at the least. Still, with proper controls, AI was little more than a tool to be used for the good of the Volgrim. The time for diplomacy was gone. The other Founders had done nothing but lose battle after battle. The fact that the humans were on their doorstep now was a testament to how badly they had underestimated the humans. When one confronts a rabid animal, the only way to treat it is to force it to submit, or to put it out of its misery. If the other Founders couldn't understand that much, then they were not fit to lead.

The time of the Founders would soon be over, and it was Nufaris' solemn duty as an agent of the people to make sure the transition went smoothly.

As he thought these things, Nufaris caught sight of an alert on his terminal. A single ship had just warped in from the direction of the human's warp portal. It stopped at the far edge of the battlefield for a few moments, his scanner quickly revealing that it was the exact same ship that had left several hours before. On top of that, it appeared to be the same ship he had encountered the first time he had discovered Earth's existence.

Turning to one of his crewman, he spoke quietly. "Officer Alaris, how many personnel are aboard that large ship that just warped in?"

It took less than a few seconds for the response to come in. "Zero, sir."

Nufaris blinked twice in confusion. No personnel? Is it an automated freighter? Surely a ship of that size would require a sizable crew to maintain and run it.

As he was about to ask another question, Officer Alaris spoke again. "Correction, Founder Nufaris. A single crewman has just appeared on board the bridge. Ah- it appears the ship is...

leaving now?"

The ship indeed turned and left, blasting off in the direction it had just appeared from. A few moments later, tactical lit up with warnings, as Trayza mentally spoke to Nufaris. "Second Founder, it appears that the humans have ceased firing and have raised up shields. They appear to be fleeing the battlefield."

"Blast them. Hit as many as you can. Don't let any escape. If they're going to show us their backs, let's take them out from the rear." As Nufaris gave the command, he felt his smile slipping. Something was wrong. The humans would never retreat like this. And since that small ship had just appeared... was the order given from on high? Surely they would continue fighting to the last man, given their previous battle history.

As Nufaris felt the slightest tinge of worry appear in his mind, a different scanning operator leaped up from her seat, her face ashen as horror was spread across her face. "FOUNDER! The hyperspace scanners! They-...!" Her voice cracked as fear spread all throughout her body, her entire frame began to shake as well.

Nufaris quickly turned and looked at her display. It showed a faint but unmistakable signal emitting from Hyperspace. "By the old gods! The size of that thing..." Nufaris felt his eyes pop open as he gazed in horror at the scanners. Naturally, the scanners on board his ship far exceeded the scanners of the other ships in the fleet, so they had yet to even detect the anomaly.

Trayza observed the dramatic shift in Nufaris' mental state. "Having problems, Nufaris? Something you'd like to share with the rest of us?" He felt her shame had disappeared in an instant as she detected weakness, but he could feel little emotion in his own body other than abject terror at what he was seeing.

"Trayza. Set aside all of our hostilities for a moment. Cuanali, Cinculu, order an immediate retreat of all forces to the Third Boundary. Maximum warp speed. Tell the planet to begin immediate evacuations and- no... no we don't have the time. Tell all citizens to retreat to the fortified underground bunkers for VIP's. It won't matter, they're all dead either way, but a few might survive this way. Finally, get Unarin up here at once. We have to leave on the double."

As Nufaris barked the orders, Trayza's smirk faded slightly. "What's this about? Are you plotting something? You think we'll just simply take orders from a lowly-" Before she could continue, Cinculu interrupted her.

"Now is not the time, Trayza. If Nufaris is this worried, it must be major. Follow his orders at once." Cinculu's cool head allowed him to see past the typical hostilities that something absolutely awful must be approaching.

Nufaris turned quickly to Officer Alaris once again. "What speed is that object traveling at? Are the coordinates set? Are you sure it can't be deflected?"

She shook her head quickly as she tried mightily to stifle her horror. "It's traveling at... at... Warp 2, Founder Nufaris. Estimated projections indicate... that..." She swallowed heavily as her tongue flicked over her razor sharp teeth. "...Vulgarius may not just be destroyed. It will likely be blasted into a trillion pieces by the impact. The object may pass directly through the planet."

Nufaris felt his heart smash in his chest as she gave him the bad news. "Time to impact?"

"Four minutes, thirty-seven seconds and counting."

He grunted quickly as he turned to another crewman. "Set all ships to Gold Alert. Get a countdown going. Try to aid the evacuation for as long as possible. We're pulling out of here at the one-minute to impact mark."

Glancing again at the tactical display, he watched in dismay as the last of the human ships blasted off into hyperspace. I don't know how the humans did it, but if I should survive this day, I'll never forget this. I'll never forgive them.

Unarin stood alongside his assistant, Muuxunu. Standing in the battle room at the Founders Tower, he blinked slowly as his tactical data stopped updating in real-time on his screen and an error message appeared. "Communications have been cut off, hmm? I wonder what the humans are planning."

Muuxunu shook her head slightly. "We've lost many times to the humans, haven't we, Founder Unarin? They're very crafty and full of tricks."

Unarin nodded slowly. "Yes. I hold a small respect for them, given how they've outmaneuvered us several times. I will say they have the potential to destroy the universe, given their parasitical nature. Everything about them is a conundrum. They preach diplomacy but are ruthless when it comes to warring against their own kind. They seem to require having an enemy at all times. Whether the enemy is internal or external, it matters not. I believe this will be their eventual downfall."

As Unarin spoke, he sent a mental signal upwards to the ships in orbit. His mental abilities were reflected. It seems the humans are preventing not only our communications, but our telepathy as well. How they continue to keep surprising us is beyond me. Have they any limits to their powers?

As he had that thought, he sensed that a single ship had descended through the cloud cover on Volgarius. It was a capital ship, so it was likely one of the other Founders. To his surprise, it was Nufaris' ship that had appeared.

A mental voice appeared in his head as Nufaris pinged him mentally. "Founder Unarin! I'm here to evacuate you at once. The humans will absolutely eradicate Volgarius in less than four minutes. You need to escape!"

Unarin frowned, an expression he was not one to usually make. "Explain. How can they do something like that? Weren't we just crushing them?"

Nufaris scrunched up his face as he cast his eyes downwards. "I don't know how they did it, Unarin. I simply don't know. Somehow, they've created a massive rock made of solid iron, ten times denser than it should be, given its size. As for the size... it's three hundred kilometers in diameter. And it's traveling directly at Volgarius... moving at the speed of Warp 2..."

Unarin felt his face turn white. "Im... impossible... a solid iron asteroid? That must be a joke. And at that speed... that will likely vaporize the planet. For such a thing to exist..."

Unarin stared out the massive window of the Founder's Tower towards space. Somewhere, out there, a harbinger of death was aiming itself at his people. He had minutes left. But there was no time. All his people would die.

Swallowing slowly, Unarin turned back to look at the tiny dot high up in the sky, where Nufaris' ship was descending rapidly. "Founder Nufaris... I know you are blaming yourself for this turn of events... but do not do such a thing. This is not your fault. I want you to leave at once, evacuate and save yourself and as many other Volgarians as you can. Take the other Founders, make sure our people are not wiped out."

Nufaris nodded slowly as his mental image wavered in Unarin's mind. "I see. Founder Unarin, I will be down there at once to retrieve you."

"No. I will not be evacuating with you." Unarin instantly rejected the notion. "Listen to me carefully, Nufaris. I have made many mistakes as leader. Death will be upon my people today, and there is nothing any of us can do about it now. Thirteen trillion Volgarians are about to die... and it is my fault. If I had taken the demon's offer and sacrificed a trillion of our people, we would have our own dimensional space right now. Instead, I let weakness and sentimentality cloud my decisions. Nufaris, with me gone, you will become the First Founder. You did well against the humans today, despite this last trick of theirs, we were likely to win had they not pulled this out of their sleeve. You will lead the Volgarians to a new age of prosperity. Do not make the same mistakes I made."

Nufaris felt his jaw drop slightly. "You're... not going to evacuate? But you will surely die!"

Unarin nodded slowly as his eyes closed. "Yes. This is just. I have always done what I had to in order to protect my people, but I see now how many poor choices I have made. I trust in you, even if the other Founders do not. You were supposed to be a simple pawn originally, but now I see that you are fit to lead our people. Go forth, Nufaris, and do what must be done. Learn from the past. Do not repeat our mistakes."

Nufaris felt his throat tighten at Unarin's words. "First Founder... I had thought... I had imagined that you betrayed your people... I thought you betrayed Dosena... are you really so selfless? You would voluntarily give up your power and life for your own people? Have I misjudged you?"

Unarin shrugged imperceptibly. "I don't have all the answers, Nufaris. But know this; whatever memory you saw, whatever glimpse of the past you may have observed... don't misinterpret it or make hasty decisions. Things are never what they seem when it comes to our history. Finally..."

Unarin paused as he reached down under his table, pulling out a device similar to the one he had used previously to share his memories. Pressing his hand on it, his eyes rolled back into his head as he dumped his memories into it, the painless process taking mere seconds to empty millions of orbital periods into the device at once. Blinking slowly, he cleared his head as the process completed. With a wave of his hand, he used his magical energy to teleport the device up into the stratosphere aboard Nufaris' waiting ship. Nufaris jerked backwards involuntarily as the device suddenly popped into the air in front of him, dropping downwards and crashing onto the ground with a loud thud.

"...take this with you. If you are to be the leader of our people, you must know of the past. You must know everything. I trust you, Nufaris... like I once trusted Dosena. I will not make the same mistake with you as I made with her."

Nufaris reached down and gently picked up the mental sharing device, bewildered at this sudden turn of events. As he was about to speak, Officer Alaris interrupted his thoughts from across the bridge. "Founder Nufaris! We have less than a minute and a half before impact!"

Nodding quickly, he turned his mental attention back to Unarin. "First Founder... I apologize for ever doubting you. I will carry out this sacred mission. I will protect our people at all costs. I... I am sorry."

Unarin waved his hand dismissively. "Begone. Enough lingering. If you die, this will have been in vain. Thank you for your service."

Severing the link, Unarin prevented Nufaris from responding. A few moments later, he sensed the ship reluctantly turn away and begin a rapid ascent upwards, past the mental barrier the humans had somehow erected over the planet.

Unarin sighed as he reached over and placed a hand on Muuxunu's shoulder. Her expression turned to bewilderment at the sudden physical contact. "F-first Founder! I... I..."

He ignored her discomfort as she fought to understand what had just taken place. Having not been a part of the mental conversation, she had no idea why he had just dumped his memories into that collection device, nor how he had managed to make it vanish into thin air.

"Muuxunu. You have been a loyal assistant, all these generations. As such, there's something I would like to show you. Come with me. We don't have much time left."

Muuxunu nodded in confusion as they began to walk out of the room towards a destination unknown.

Unarin sighed as he felt his eyes lower in shame. Dosena... I hope you will someday forgive me for my betrayal. You didn't deserve to meet your end like that.

Part 305a: Introspection

Nearly all men can stand adversity, but if you want to test a man's character, give him power. -Abraham Lincoln

I swallowed as the seconds ticked by. "Time to impact?"

"Thirty seconds." Ben barely looked at me as he mumbled the numbers from the holopad in his hand. If I had to guess, I'd say he was avoiding meeting my eyes.

How could I blame him? I doubt that in the history of the universe, any had ever done what I was about to do. I already know Hell exists... and it's likely that I will be going there when I die.

Amelia was sitting uncharacteristically silently, her entire body perfectly still as she watched the magical display I had created to monitor Volgarius. She spoke no words as the time grew near.

The display showed a view of Volgarius, the 'camera' or focal point, as it were, located a few dozen thousand miles from the planet. The display was so crisp, if you squinted, you could just barely make out the ships that were rushing to warp speed to escape the impending catastrophe. The planet had no time to evacuate. By my own scanner logs, the crew aboard the fleeing ships numbered a few million at most. Short of an absolute miracle, no Volgrim on the planet or in the immediate area were going to survive this impact. Doubtless, there were underground bunkers, but it didn't matter.

It's a funny story, how I got the idea of how to destroy Volgarius. All I had to do was remember how Satan had stabbed through my impenetrable defenses with a thin spear of pure energy. Actually, destroying the planet was never the issue. A simple 'Supernova' would have done the trick. Ironically though, a Supernova would have given them about thirty minutes of time to evacuate the planet. Their losses would be at least a bit lower. A silent missile of doom, blasting through space though... this was something they wouldn't anticipate or have time to react to.

But again, my problem was never the matter of destroying the planet. It was simply the morality of making such a choice. History speaks of terrible dictators among humanity, like Mao, Hitler, Stalin, Genghis Khan... but if you took all the dictators throughout all of history and added up their murders, it would be a drop in an ocean compared to the blood I was about to spill.

This would truly be the most heinous act of destruction ever wrought upon a civilized and advanced species.

Hero. They call me a hero. What does that even mean? I often look back to the heroes of old as inspiration for what I should do, but even then, few heroes are like Superman, unwilling to kill, no matter what. Most heroes, in fact, are known for their willingness to do whatever it takes to put an end to evil.

A famous man once stated: It is not true that good can only follow from good and evil only from evil, but that often the opposite is true. I consider myself a good man... a 'hero', one of the 'good guys'. But now, how can I look at myself in a mirror ever again? I can't realistically lump myself in with even the bloodiest and most violent of heroes. I was willing, in the end, to make the hard decision... to put an end to the worst enemy humanity has ever faced. But was it the right choice? I'm not sure that even time will give me the answer to such a question.

My thoughts are interrupted by Ben, once again. He shifts in his chair as his expression darkens. We sit comfortably over a light-year from Volgarius, standing by just in case the 'Death Ball' (As we've coined it) were to somehow miss or some anomaly were to occur, preventing the destruction of the planet. But we're also far enough out that when it does hit, we'll have plenty of time to observe the destruction and then flee before the impact explosion has time to catch up to us.

Ben coughs. "Ten seconds to impact. Nine, eight, seven..."

It's here. Nothing in the universe can stop the impact now. Not even myself and all the power of my clones. No more time for regrets.

"...four, three, two..." Ben stops counting as he lifts his head up quickly to stare at the viewscreen.

Suddenly, the entire room is illuminated by the brightest and most blinding light that may have ever existed in the universe. Instantly, all watching the viewscreen scream in agony simultaneously as our retinas are blown out and white hot pain shoots through our minds, blocking all thought processes in the span of a few milliseconds.

An eternity passes, and I feel my senses return slowly, as I blink my unseeing eyes. I'm... laying down on the ground? I groggily climb to my feet, as my hearing returns and I hear murmuring and pained cries all around me. However, I can't see anything. Everything in my vision is pitch black. Did the ship's lights burn out? No, this is worse. I'm totally and absolutely blind, a sensation I'm quite familiar with. Waving my hands in front of my face, I rub my eyes and blink rapidly, but nothing appears.

"Is everyone all right? Is everyone else blinded as well?" I yell out, and I receive a chorus of affirmations in return. Fantastic, I hadn't thought about this at all. My helmet didn't protect my vision in the slightest, so rapidly was the brightness able to wipe out my eyesight. Speaking quickly, I disable my outbound speakers and wordsmith a quick series of spells. " Vision. Restore. Heal. Vision. Restore. Heal. " Casting my spells over and over, I keep it up for several minutes as I target myself first, followed by everyone else in the massive hangar that had been watching the feed. With tens of thousands of clones and a few other people here, including Amelia, Ben, and Harold's wife, this would normally take forever, but my clones quickly get the idea and help me out, making it take only a few minutes.

Finally, the deed is done, and everyone stands up, their stomachs churning from the mental feedback and phantom pain they're still feeling. Ben is the first to speak coherently. "Son of a bitch... that was unbelievable. Ah! Volgarius!" As he says this, all of us turn at once and look up at the screen that would normally be showing the planet.

The planet is no longer there. Instead, septillions of pieces of the planet are scattering in every conceivable direction, blasting outwards with white-hot speeds. Another few minutes and we wouldn't have had anything left to see, so quickly were they speeding away from the impact zone.

"It's... gone." Amelia spoke quietly as she hobbled back up to her feet, steadying herself on the chair she had been sitting in just a minute before. She looked queasy, as if the entire experience had shaken her to her core.

"Har- err, computer... what happened? Give me a rundown."

Harold, of course, was a well-kept secret. Neither Amelia, nor Ben knew of his existence, so we made him use a generic computerized sort of text-to-speech converter when he needed to make ship-wide announcements. He did so now.

It took him a moment to respond, as the computer had to translate his normal speech patterns through a special dictionary we had made just so he could sound more official, but the results came in quickly.

"Volgarius has been totally vaporized. The asteroid passed through the planet in less than 0.01 milliseconds and continued traveling forwards, only slightly slowed down by the impact. The impact of the asteroid caused a catastrophic explosion that incinerated all life and every atom on the planet in under a second. The super-heated pieces you see flying in different directions are simply parts of the resulting miasma that have coagulated together due to shared escape trajectories."

I felt my breath catch in my throat, and out of the corner of my eye, I saw Ben lower his head as anguish seemed to overtake him for a moment. "C-computer... what are the odds that any life on the planet may have somehow survived?"

The 'computer' paused for a long few seconds before responding. "Barring a complete meltdown of the laws of physics, there is a 0% chance even a single particle of the original planet exists in the same state as before the impact. All life is dead. Furthermore, the explosion is now disrupting the entire solar system and will soon destroy the lifeless inner and outer rim planets, as well as causing the destruction of the system's star."

I nodded slowly, the words barely registering. "Thanks... that's all I wanted to know."

I knew this would cause absolute devastation. It was simple, really. The size of the asteroid, combined with the type of material, combined with how artificially dense and reinforced myself and my clones had made it, coupled with the breaking of relativistic speeds... all of this added up into the equivalent of a javelin being hurled through a balloon. The javelin would take no damage, but the balloon would be totally destroyed.

I don't know if it was the right thing to do... but there's no way to have regrets anymore. I can only do what I must to ensure humanity's survival.

Amelia slowly eases herself back into her chair as she stares down at the floor sullenly. She seems to have taken the destruction of the alien's planet quite hard. Odd, given the planet-devouring monster I saw her become in the future. I wonder if something might happen to totally change her personality over the next hundred million years. Well, then again, if my calculations were correct, we've successfully averted the future I came from... maybe... so perhaps that future will never come to pass.

This, at least, gives me the slightest reprieve from the gut-wrenching guilt I'm feeling. At the very least, I may have changed the future for the better. Yes... best to think positive during times like these.

Ben lifts his head up and coughs, as he eases his way over to where I'm standing. "Well... you did it. Good job, Jason. You did it." His praise sounds unnaturally hollow, as if he's forcing himself to say the words. "Thanks to you, the Volgrim aren't a threat anymore."

"Yeah, uh, thanks." I feel my own words are hollow as well. He and I stare blankly at each other for a few moments, searching for the right words to say. None manage to escape our lips.

Finally, he shrugs and starts walking away. "I'll be aboard the Command Ship if you need me."

"Yeah. Take care, Ben." I feel my voice strain as I cough the words up. He doesn't even look back at me as he makes his way over to the teleporting pad on the far side of the dock. Only the Mothership is equipped with teleporters, though I'll be remedying that in the very near future. It's time to focus on the future and lifting up humanity, rather than fighting this bloody war that nobody wanted to be a part of. I don't even remember who started it anymore. It doesn't matter... it's over now.

At least, the war with the Volgrim is over. There's still one enemy we need to face.

Nufaris stood with purpose as the other three Founders either gave him looks of suspicion, glared at him, or in Cuanali's case, ignored him completely while she poked numbly at her datapad. She wasn't doing anything substantial, she just seemed to be using it as a sort of coping mechanism.

Trayza gritted her razor sharp teeth as she hissed through her lips. "So. Explain why you're standing here and Unarin is not."

Nufaris nodded, his face a carefully set neutral expression. "I spoke with Unarin, and he told me to leave him behind. He appeared to think of himself as a failure. He spoke of his trust in me and how I was to become the First Founder when he died."

Trayza blinked slowly as she used all her willpower to prevent herself from lashing out forwards at the pathetic excuse for a Volgarian. "Well then, isn't that just convenient? You were the last person to speak with him, the discussion was mental and thus was not recorded by the ship's transmitters, and he happened to name you First Founder during this discussion that nobody else was a part of. Well, I for one am so glad the pieces just happened to fall so perfectly for you on the day 99% of our species went extinct."

Trayza's irritation was bordering on rage. She hadn't felt this angry since the death of a close friend during the Seventh Great War, and she was not keen to feel those awful emotions again... yet here they were, bubbling up for a rematch.

"Do you have any proof this discussion took place?" Cinculu, the cool-minded one, kept his gaze steady on the once-inferior Volgrim before him, the one who had been just a lowly Elder not even a dozen orbital cycles previously. Unarin would name him the First Founder? I want to say it's unthinkable, but considering Trayza would be the next in line, perhaps the notion isn't so far-fetched. Cinculu silently brooded on how next to move, but he shifted in his seat as Nufaris reached behind himself to pull an item from a pocket in his robes.

"Unarin did, in fact, give me a parting gift. Trayza, I understand you are beyond angry right now. I too am not pleased by how today's events have transpired. Nevertheless, I am telling no lies. Unarin asked for me to lead our people, and he gave me the keys to do so." Setting the device on the table before him, Trayza's reaction was immediate and swift as she sharply inhaled at the sight of it.

"Where did you get that?" Cinculu's voice was even more suspicious than before. "That is Unarin's personal memory manipulator. I can tell by the markings on the side and the mental insignia left behind. It is no forgery."

Nufaris nodded solemnly. "Yes. He left this to me, after dumping what I can only presume are all of his personal memories into it. He told me that in order to lead our people into the future, I must first know the truth of our past."

Trayza felt her hand twitch involuntarily. "He... he trusted a lowly Elder with... with his most precious memories...? Impossible. Unarin wouldn't... he couldn't..."

Cinculu flicked his gaze over to Trayza and then back to Nufaris. "You have to understand, this is no minor issue. Beyond just the secrets of our past, Unarin was well known for his art in memory manipulation. He personally created the manipulation chambers that erased our bloody and brutal past from our minds, allowing all Volgarians to live in peace and harmony. To him, memories were his most precious possession, and his greatest achievement. For him to give you any of his past memories... let alone to dump his entire life for you to observe..."

"...This was no jest." Trayza finished Cinculu's sentence. "Unarin wouldn't have done that unless he absolutely believed in you. More importantly, he wouldn't have done that unless he was completely serious. He truly did intend to die. He is... he really is..." Trayza turned away from the table quickly as she pawed at her eyes. She felt a wave of shock pass through her body as she felt wetness on her hands. Tears? Impossible. No Volgarian was capable of such base emotions, certainly not a legendary Founder. For her, this was a great humiliation. Nufaris would surely use this opportunity to mock her and to-

"I understand. I'm sorry that I must tell you, he really is gone. I know that all of the Founders were true family. Brothers and sisters. I know you will all miss him dearly. This is a time of mourning, not just for our people, but for the three of you especially. You've lost a precious brother and a sister in such a short time period. I'm not going to do anything dramatic or demand obeisance, but I hope that in due time I will be able to fairly earn the respect of you three, and govern in a way befitting the highest rank of our people."

Nufaris calmly smoothed over the rough patch, causing Trayza's heart to skip a beat. Instead of mocking her, as she had expected him to do, he had simply acknowledged her pain. Such a motion... it was truly the sign of a mature leader. Perhaps... perhaps he was not as pathetic as she had initially thought. Perhaps Unarin had chosen him for a reason.

Trayza quickly wiped her eyes and turned back to the small table. "Nufaris. If... if Unarin has chosen you to be the First Founder, it would be... unbecoming of me... if I were to doubt his choice. I will choose to think of your appointment as his final wish. If our brother would place his trust in you, perhaps he was capable of seeing something that I am not yet able to perceive."

Cinculu and Nufaris both felt a strange emotion pass over them at her words. Cinculu was the first to bring up his thoughts. "Trayza, this is unlike you. I thought you would be the one to oppose Nufaris at every turn."

"As did I, brother. However, it is as I said. Unarin chose Nufaris over me, for whatever reason. Have we ever had reason to doubt Unarin before? I think not. Unarin led us to millions of cycles of peace and prosperity, and I would be foolish to doubt him now, even in death. I never questioned his position as the First, only whether I might advance someday to be his second. I... I was greedy." Trayza lowered her gaze noticeably. "My greed, in the end, may have played a part in the demise of our kind. I should strive to improve myself, rather than dragging Nufaris down with me. That is what Unarin would want."

There was a short silence as the tension in the room from earlier seemed to dissipate. Nufaris slowly exhaled, careful to keep his breathing silent. For Trayza to make such a dramatic turn, this was surely a difficult moment for herself.

Finally, when he sensed the time was right, Nufaris responded. "I am pleased you feel that way, Trayza. I will need an experienced Second to aid me in rebuilding our way of life. And fear not, for we may have lost many that we called friend and ally, but we will rebuild. We will continue to search for a new home planet. We will recreate that ideal utopia that Unarin had once made. We will never forget his memory."

Cuanali, ever the quiet one, nodded quickly. "Yes. We can't forget him! If you will be the one who replaces him, I will treat you in the same way I treated him. That is my own promise!"

Nufaris nodded, as the mood in the room had changed from anger and suspicion, to muted joy and nostalgia. I can work with this. I can rebuild our society with the help of these three. Unarin was right to put his trust in me. I will not fail him!

Two figures coughed as they stumbled through the haze. The portal was too far away now, if they attempted to return to it they would surely die. Not that it mattered, as the original connector was destroyed by now. Their only option was to press forwards towards an unknown destination. Walking forwards, the smaller figure waved pointlessly to try and clear up the smog all around herself, coughing violently as the acrid fumes filled her lungs.

Bear with it, for just a while longer. Soon, we will find refuge.

The other figure sent a mental message into her mind, opting not to speak aloud, lest he inhale even more of these awful fumes than he already had.

Will we arrive soon? I feel like I'm going to die any minute now!

She wasn't normally one to complain, but this was a hellish landscape, cooked with unbearable heat thanks to the insane concentration of greenhouse gasses and other vile compounds in the air. To call it 'barely breathable' was quite the understatement. Were it not for their mechanically augmented nervous and respiratory systems, they would have died within a minute or two. The ability to hold their breath for long, painful minutes at a time, coupled with advanced nostril air filters, was the only thing keeping them from dying of asphyxiation immediately.

They continued stumbling forwards, visibility practically nonexistent. Just as she was beginning to feel a deep sleep creeping into her mind, he shot a sudden message into her brain.

We're here! Don't pass out on me now!

Blinking quickly, she squinted mightily as she realized a massive metal set of doors was looming before them. Coming to a quick awkward stop, she nearly gasped at the size of it. It must have been a couple hundred meters high, and several hundred wide.

This is the hangar. I'll open it just a crack so we can get in. Get ready!

As he fired off the orders, he sent the mental pulse code to the sensors inside, the wide doors cracking open as he shoved her through, ducking inside as quickly as he could, quickly closing the doors behind himself as they entered.

She noticed the air was different almost immediately. Instinctively, she took a large breath, her nostrils greedily sucking in as much of the stale, yet clean air as her lungs would take. After a few moments of coughing and sputtering, she drew herself up, glancing around the poorly lit room. It was massive, ten times bigger on the inside than even the titanic double doors might have indicated.

"Where are we?" She spoke hesitantly, her voice sounding tiny as it surged forwards, echoing off distant walls she couldn't see at all.

He stared ahead blankly, a mixture of memories and fear tinging his expression slightly. "This is where it all began. Welcome to Melkian IV. We're going to be here a very long time, Muuxunu."

As he spoke, she caught her breath as she spotted something far away in the darkness. A massive bipedal looking hunk of metal and circuits, standing a hundred meters tall. In the darkness, it was hard to tell exactly what the thing was, but she felt her heart tremble at the sight of it.

"What... what is that?"

He glanced over, following her gaze. "Ah, yes. That would be the reason we've come here. That, my dear assistant, is a Sentinel."

Part 306a: Meeting

The return trip was mostly uneventful. It took a little over a day to travel through the portal, get all of our ships on the other side back in the Terran system, and temporarily close the portal so we couldn't be quickly followed... but otherwise it was standard operating procedure.

Ben didn't speak to me even a single time on the way back. I suspect he's having more than just a rough time right now. Does he feel guilt? I certainly do. Perhaps he doubts me, now. His fleet's goal was to deal as much damage to their planet and kill as many Volgrim as possible, but he was mainly going to be attacking their military facilities and their fleet. I erased the entire planet, including its 'civilians'. I wouldn't expect him to understand, but I already knew from my discussions with Dosenia... there are no civilians among the Volgrim. All are united in their devotion to the Founders. All are potential warriors, ready to be deployed to fight for the motherland.

When I realized this, I had to make the choice. Why should we drag on a war that would result in millions of our own and theirs dying? To me, this was the same as putting down a rabid dog, rather than taking the chance of it biting my children and letting the both of them suffer. It's not a good justification, I know that much... but it's all I've got.

Ah, we've finally arrived in Earth's sector. A quick notification pops up in my HUD... apparently Supreme Commander Stonewall wishes to speak with me. I can see the discussion going a multitude of ways, few of them good. Ehh, then again, he's a military man. Perhaps he will appreciate my saving of humanity's lives and my absolute eradication of 99% of the Volgrim. All that's left now is to find the straggler ships. It's like searching for a needle in a haystack, but they can't be worse than a nuisance anymore. They're no threat now.

I walk over to Amelia as Earth comes into view, a faint dot far in the distance. "I'll be heading down to the surface for a while. I need to speak with the military's head commander. Do you... want anything?"

Amelia has been extremely quiet during the entire trip back. She's said very little. Now she is wearing a pure black robe and laying on the couch while quietly reading a book. I glance at the title. To Kill a Mockingbird. Heh, appropriate.

She shakes her head slowly. "No. I'm fine."

I stare at her for a moment, but she doesn't follow up with anything, choosing instead to continue fixating her eyes on the book.

"Amelia. I know you're not happy about what I did... but I weighed the options. It was the best choice given the situation."

She continues to keep her eyes locked on the book, but I can tell she's only pretending to read. After a moment or two, she responds quietly. "Yeah, I know."

I decide not to respond. If she understands, then there's not much more I can do about the mood in here. Nobody is happy about this turn of events.

Walking away wordlessly, I head to the bridge, leaving the relaxation quarters behind. As I walk down the metallic halls of the Mothership, I lock my eyes on the rapidly approaching ball of green and blue, hundreds of thousands of miles away. What speed are we traveling at? Must be light speed or sub-light. If we were traveling at even Warp 2 or 3, we'd be there already. I wonder why Harold is taking his sweet time.

Not like it matters. At this rate, it'll just be another few minutes before I have to go down to the surface. Hell, I could use my abilities to go there now and the energy cost, for what little it matters, would be trivial.

I don't really want to go down there. My decision to destroy Volgarius will be polarizing at best among the populace, once they find out. No... if they find out, I should say. Only a few officers aboard the bridge of the Command Ship know exactly what happened. They, my clones, Amelia, and myself. Of course, if even a single one of these people leaks the information to the press, the entire world will know within an hour. That's just how the 24 hour news-cycle works.

But something tells me that Stonewall won't be eager to let the information slip. Hell, I'm not pleased either. What even vaguely moral human would be? You'd have to be a total psychopath to feel joy over the deaths of thirteen trillion sentient beings. No... not the deaths... the genocide. That was absolutely genocide.

I don't know how I'm going to live with myself. I kept a clinical distance from the destruction of the planet to try and detach myself emotionally, but there's no escaping this one.

Harold interrupts my thoughts. "Kid, we're here. You 'bout ready ta' go down?"

I nod. "Yeah, I guess."

His voice is softer than usual. "Somethin' the matter? Wanna talk 'bout it?"

I start to say 'no', but I feel something stop me. "Yeah. Maybe. I'm not sure. I killed a lot of people, you know. That was my choice. They might be aliens, but they were sentient, highly evolved, and they died without putting up any sort of fight."

Harold's mental presence appeared in my mind as he bobbed his head with melancholy. "I saw the whole thing, kid. I'm proud of ye'. It might seem like ye' made the wrong choice now...

the guilt might eat away at'cha... but you made a choice few men ever could make. Most wouldn't have the balls, if ye' catch mah drift."

I grimaced slightly at his words. "I made the choice to exterminate trillions of lives in the blink of an eye. Whether it took guts or not, it's simply pure evil. I'm evil now, Harold. It doesn't matter how I or anyone else justifies it, there's no excuse for my actions. I don't regret the choice that I made, only that I did end up making it... if that makes sense."

Harold was quiet for a moment as he seemed to ponder something unknown. "Look, kid, you know I fought in the World Wars, right? I was boots on the ground in the first, and a commander in the second. I know how it is on both sides, y'see. I don't think you are evil, kid, because I've seen evil firsthand. I tasted evil and faced it down. You might've killed more than Hitler and Mussolini and Castro and all those other goons ever did, but the reasons were different. They did it because they wanted power. You did it to protect those ye' loved. If you didn't kill the Volgrim, they might have killed us, y'see? War never changes. It's kill or be killed. No matter what anyone says about ye', just know this, kid; you'll always be the good guy in my eyes. Promise."

Harold finished his little speech and cocked a small grin. I blinked twice at his words as I looked inside myself for the proper words. "Thanks, Harold. I know you will. It's something, at the least."

Harold smiled a little more broadly, an expression I hadn't seen for the last few days. "Go on, boy. Git' down there'n give 'em hell. You tell that son of a bitch who's in charge."

"Sure thing, Harold. I'll do what I can."

My lukewarm answer probably wasn't what he wanted to hear, but it would have to do.

I sat in the rather comfortable leather chair directly across from Stonewall as he puffed on a cigar as usual. I've only ever spoken to him once, and it was not a comfortable discussion, to say the least.

I felt a coldness that seemed to wash over my body periodically. With my helmet off, I felt naked and weak in front of him, for reasons unknown. This man knew my identity, and possibly even vaguely knew of my powers. Something about the physical reaction I was feeling felt eerily familiar though. Well, of course I knew what it was immediately; it was an energy dampener. Similar to the one Marie had used on me in the future when she and Umi took me out, this dampener was able to lower my magical energy output dramatically. Curses... just when I had planned to read his mind too. He's no fool. Luckily, it seemed to be a prototype version, and didn't render my powers fully inert, nor cause any painful side effects.

But, given enough time, I had little doubt the technology would be improved enough to where it would be a huge danger to myself.

Stonewall's expression was dead serious as his eyes lazily panned over the words on the holopad in his hands. "Was good work you did. You destroyed entire Volgrim planet, eh, Jason?"

I grunted. "Yeah. Vaporized it, actually. The video logs are included in that report that Ben gave you."

Stonewall casually set the holopad on the table in front of him, taking a long drag on his cigar immediately after as he blew a thin line of smoke to his side. How polite of him to not blast it in my face. "So interesting, the method you used. You smashed the entire planet with big metal rock... while primitive, the method was quite effective."

Stonewall paused for a moment, as if he had more to say and was pausing to make a point. "So interesting, da. I cannot help but wonder though, why it took you so long to come up with this idea?"

I felt my eyes narrow involuntarily. "What are you insinuating?"

Stonewall shrugged nonchalantly. "Nothing in particular, I suppose. Is just so fascinating to me that you did not tell any of the generals on the field about your plan. You made the choice to destroy the planet without consulting anyone else. Who knows what technology we might have acquired, or what resources we might have obtained, hmm? Now we will never know."

I swallowed carefully. "Again, what are you implying? I made the choice as a split-second decision, seeing how badly our forces were being shredded by the Volgrim. Their fighting ability was superior to our own on their home turf. It seemed the logical-"

Stonewall raised his hand to silence me. "I disagree. It was foolish choice. Irrational, even. Besides that, there's the matter of the timing..."

I licked my lips slowly. "The timing, huh? Care to explain?"

"Da. Because we pulled our ships out, they had time to evacuate several million of their troops. Despite the recording you have provided, it only shows one side of the planet. Plenty of ships might have slipped out the side of the planet we couldn't see. Very convenient how it all fit into place, hm?"

I felt my hands starting to tremble slightly. "Are... are you implying... are you trying to say that I collaborated with the enemy? To destroy their own planet? Yet I also allowed them to escape its destruction?"

Stonewall sucked on his cigar again, keeping his gaze focused on me. "You are one who said that, not me. My point is simply that I neither know nor trust you. Your actions are unbecoming of one who has the power to destroy a planet. And... you are dangerous. Very, very dangerous. If I do not understand your motivations or why you take certain actions... if you do not consult with me before making such big moves... what am I to think of, hm?"

I lowered my eyes slightly, unable to meet his gaze. "So you don't trust me. That's what you mean? I've been fighting to save the Earth for a long time. Longer, even, than you've been alive. How dare you question my allegiance."

"Da. Much longer than I've been alive. More than a hundred years, Jason Hiro. Your birth was officially recorded at the end of the 20th century, according to surviving hospital records from the Americas. Yet for all that time that you've been alive, you have accomplished so very little."

Stonewall reached down, pulling open a small drawer at the front of his desk. As he reached in, a faint smile appeared on his face for a brief moment before disappearing. Pulling his hand back out, he procured a folder labeled [TOP SECRET] in bold red letters and closed the drawer as he leaned forwards, holding the folder in his hand.

Slowly, deliberately, he opened up the folder and began to paw through the pages, stopping every so often to pull the cigar from his mouth and flick the ashes into an ashtray before him before sticking it back in his mouth.

"You created the hypersuits. You terraformed the Red Planet. You predicted the future. That is all. But more importantly than what you did to help humanity... was what you did not do." He set the folder on the table in between us, leaving it open so I could see some of the contents. I felt my stomach churn at the sight of the gruesome photos. "You did not destroy the Volgrim fleets on several occasions. These are photos never seen by general public of the devastation we had to clean up." He pulled out one photo of a little girl wailing in sorrow as she wrapped her arms around her father who had been torn in half from the waist down by debris.

Stonewall eyed me coldly. "Look at this photo. This man was killed by debris that fell from space. If you have power to destroy entire planet, and the power to terraform another... why did you not stop these small pieces of debris from raining hellfire on your own kind? Why did you not vaporize the war-fleets when they arrived to kill your own people? Why did humanity only luck out by invention of the Damocles, when we had you there to save us? If you are so powerful, all these acts could have been prevented, yet you did nothing."

I felt my mouth drying out. "That's... I wasn't as powerful back then as I am now... I... I prevented the majority of the debris from hitting Earth... I helped with the cleanup, I did the best that I could!"

"BULLSHIT!" Stonewall's eyes exploded as he threw his cigar down to his side. "You are full of lies! Whose side are you on?! I know you are descended from mythical heroes, I know you have power to save humanity, yet you fail to use it, time after time!" Stonewall's nostrils flared as he snorted angrily, his teeth gritted. Pausing for a moment, he closed his eyes to regain his emotional control. Taking a deep breath, he leaned back in his chair as he stifled a snarl. "No more of this. I believe you are not ally of humanity, but enemy. Humanity no longer will require your services, from this day forwards. Do you understand me?"

I felt my own rage vanish in the blink of an eye as shock replaced it. "What? You're dismissing me? Who the hell do you think you are? What right do you have- no, what authority do you have to make that call? My abilities may not have been used to their fullest extent, but my intentions have always been in the right place! I have done as much as I could to protect humanity!"

Stonewall smirked at me. "Again with the lies. You disgust me, da. If you had power to destroy Volgrim homeworld, you should have told me beforehand. Instead, we lost 80% of our strike forces in the initial attack, wasting their lives while you decided to come in and claim the glory for yourself afterwards. You must think of yourself as some kind of god, doling out punishment whenever you please. Were their lives worth so little to you? Were their sacrifices in vain?"

I felt my eyes cloud momentarily as what he was saying reached my inner thoughts. He's right, of course. From his perspective, I'm a loose cannon. I haven't been honest with him, though my reasons involve protecting the timeline. I don't know how to explain to him why I made the choices I did either. He can rationalize them in any way he wishes.

"I see." I drawled the words out, but my hands shook as I realized the weight of his order. "So if you can't trust me, then I must no longer interfere? What if something happens and you need me? Will you beg for my help then?"

Stonewall sneered viciously. "Your true colors emerge. So you wish to be a hero lauded by the people, it would seem. That will not happen, Jason. We will never again require your services. I've acquired several alternatives, much more reliable than you, much less prone to working with the enemy behind my back."

I felt my jaw slacken slightly. Alternatives? What did he mean by that? But more importantly... "So you accuse me of treason now, too? What do you mean by working with the enemy?"

"Don't play stupid with me. You spoke with the Volgrim when they very first observed our planet. You have spoken with demons privately on several occasions, and your relationship with the angels appears to be quite... intimate. You may think me a weak, frail, stupid human... but I know your kind. Playing all sides of the field at once, looking to profit for yourself. It won't happen any more, not on my watch. Beatrix is gone, I am in command. I will raise humanity up to the glory it should have had, long ago. I will do what she never would."

Stonewall waved his hand dismissively. "Begone. Take all of your clones with you too, and all of your hypersuits. They are needed no longer. You are needed no longer."

I stared at him icily for a long few moments. Finally, I stood up. "Very well. You've made your bed, now sleep in it. Don't you ever ask for a favor from me. But know this; if humanity should ever face an existential threat... whether you like it or not, I will be there. Not for you, and not for glory... but to save those I love. You can't take that from me, you never will have that power over me."

"I would not be so sure." Stonewall glared at me, as I turned my back on him. Holding my helmet stiffly by my side, I strode out of the room.

I am an outcast now, ousted by the leader of the very people I fight to protect.

What am I fighting for?

Part 307a: Daughter

"You know how to... cook?"

I stood in the kitchen on board the Mothership as Amelia seemed to plop some vegetables inside of a large pot on top of the stove. I say 'seemed' because the sight was so absolutely improbable that I automatically assumed I was hallucinating.

I rubbed my eyes quickly to make sure. Yes, she was in fact wearing an apron on top of her usual blue summer dress and merrily dancing around the kitchen, glancing at an old fashioned looking cookbook that had been propped up on the counter.

"Nope! I have no idea what I'm doing!" She chirped happily as she stared at the book before her. Frowning slightly, she popped out a question. "What the heck is a parsley?"

I stared dumbfounded as she walked away towards the opposite side of the kitchen. "Helen! What's a parsley? Is it juicy?"

Helen wandered into the kitchen, wearing an apron herself. "No, sweetheart. Parsley is a vegetable. It's green and it has little thin stalks with soft bushy leaves. You only need to add a touch of it for flavor."

Amelia nodded thoughtfully as she walked over to the refrigerator. Pulling it open, she pulled out a head of lettuce. "Like this?"

"Nope! You're on the right track though!" Helen smiled a sweet motherly grin as she glanced over at me. "Oh! Jason, you're back! I'm just teaching Amelia a bit about how to cook."

I nodded slowly. "Ah... yeah, that, err, makes sense." I shoot a look over at Amelia. "Are you actually going to eat... whatever it is you're making?"

She shook her head quickly. "Nope! I can't eat normal food, remember? This is your dinner!"

I took a step back involuntarily. She was cooking me food? What freaking dimension did I accidentally wander into? Maybe when Harold teleported me, he scrambled my DNA and sent me to a bizarro universe or something. There's just no way this is happening.

I walked over and sat on a stool at the counter facing the inside of the kitchen. "So you just decided to... cook some food?"

Amelia didn't seem to hear me, as she chopped up the parsley with lightning fast reflexes, her hands moving so fast I could barely see them. The sound was similar to a chainsaw as she rapidly lifted and slammed the knife down at inhuman speeds on the helpless veggies.

Helen turned back and leaned over the counter to whisper to me. "She was just moping around all day, and I felt so bad for the poor dear. I asked her to help me cook, but I was shocked to learn that a pretty young thing like her was never taught proper cooking skills by her mother. For shame! But don't you worry, I'll have this girl acting like a proper young lady in no time."

Helen winked at me as she leaned back to return to helping Amelia out. "Heavens, are you sure you don't know how to cook? You diced that parsley like a professional!"

Amelia blushed. "Well, I mean, I don't know how to cook, but I'm... pretty good with knives, you could say."

I felt my expression turn pale at those words. I don't think Helen has any idea what she just roped herself into. Perhaps in private I should quietly inform her of Amelia's history.

...No, wait. That's wrong. It just occurred to me that this is exactly what she needs. Amelia has never had a strong bond with anyone, but now she has me for a friend... and Helen is something of a motherly figure. Perhaps this is what she's needed all along. Maybe I've been going about this the wrong way.

I feel my gaze drift out the plexiglass window, as Amelia and Helen's conversation slowly slips out of my interest. The stars outside are incredibly numerous, truly a sight to see. No person on Earth, even with the best telescope on the planet, has the sight I have right now.

Somewhere, out there in this colossal galaxy, there's a star that was extinguished. I did that. I didn't ask anyone for permission, and I thought I did it for righteous reasons, but perhaps Stonewall is right... maybe I was just being selfish.

But I don't think he's right. I did what I had to do. As I've done so many times in the past, I took the path that would save as many that I cared about as possible. I'm not perfect, and I can't expect or pretend to be. But out of respect for his position, the man who was elected head of all of humanity by the people themselves... I should do as he asks. If he wants me to stay out of his way, so be it. As long as he doesn't turn into a dictator who murders his own people, I won't interfere. I'll just watch from a distance, observing the path that humanity will take.

Besides... haven't I done enough? Don't I deserve some rest? The Volgrim are no longer a threat. With humanity and the angels might combined, they can easily fend off the demons without my power. And if they need me, I can leave a clone incognito in the ranks of humanity, changing up his looks to be totally distinct from myself. They won't even know I'm there.

If they need me, I can be there in an instant. I have the power to travel anywhere in the universe instantaneously.

Yeah, that's exactly what I need to do. It's time to take a little vacation. I'm going to try and spend some time with Harold, Helen, and Amelia, as well as my clones. This ship is plenty big to fit all of us, though my clones might need to double up on the bunks. And hell, if we need more room, I've got the power to increase our living space all I want. My energy regenerates every night!

Yes, I can't let myself feel down. Stonewall is a vicious man, but I don't see Earth losing under his leadership. I need some 'me' time, to focus and learn my own limits. I've spent so much time helping others that I've neglected my own incredible abilities and my physical body as well. It's as Arthur told me before; I'm using my hypersuit as a crutch. I can't keep doing that, or it might be the death of me some day.

Glancing back to the commotion in the kitchen, I stifle a chuckle as Amelia dabs her finger into the pot and pulls it back out, licking her finger as a wave of disgust floods over her face.

"Well, how do you think it tastes?" Helen smiles broadly but doesn't seem to understand the concept that Amelia literally can't eat normal food.

Amelia seems to almost stifle a vomit reflex as her expression sours. "It tastes awful, but I have a, err, condition. I can't taste properly."

Helen's expression turns to horror as she sees the look of revulsion on her face. "Oh no! I'm so sorry, sweet pea! Why didn't you tell me sooner? Here, I'll do the tasting instead."

Amelia glances at me as Helen turns her back to dip her finger into the pot. Silently, she mouths some words at me as her face cringes in disgust. How do you eat this crap?

I fight mightily to contain my laughter and instead just smile and shrug. She shakes her head as Helen turns back around, her own face very pale.

"Oh... oh dear. This soup is... quite bad." Her lip quivers as she fights to contain her own gag reflex. "D-did you follow my recipe exactly?"

Amelia nods slowly as she fires off the ingredients she used to make the soup.

"Oh my... I think you misread 'teaspoon' as... something else, Amelia. You have to read the directions carefully. That was an awful lot of garlic juice you added."

Amelia nodded as shame spread over her face. "I-I'll pay more careful attention next time, mother!"

Helen smiled and I felt my jaw drop. She called Helen... 'mother'? What... even... Helen nodded appreciatively. "Well, the nice thing about this fancy ship is it has a de-atomizer just for this purpose! You know what the Bible says, 'Do not give what is holy to the dogs!' This ship can take apart the molecules and other things and turn it back into fresh ingredients at the press of a button!"

As Amelia and Helen went about their business I got up and wandered out of the kitchen towards my private quarters. I'm dead beat... after a day like this... I'm sure they'll just wake me up whenever the food is ready. I need to sleep now. Think later, rest now.

Plopping my head on the pillow, I realize what day it is. This is the day I usually meet up with a certain friend of mine. The timing couldn't be better.

Silver stared off into the distance as the candidates were being tested on the screen before him. "The rejection rates have halved as of recent days. We're making rapid progress."

Stonewall grunted with approval as he reached for the cigars in his pocket. Sadly, they were not there, as he had left them in his hovercar. He stifled a quiet curse as he turned back to the screen. "Da, they had better be worth it. I'm putting my faith in your research, Mister Silva. Jason Hiro will no longer be aiding us, so I'm going to need results."

"Don't worry about it. Johannesburg trained me personally. I don't like being late, and I don't like not getting results. I always deliver. Wouldn't have called you over here if that weren't the case."

Stonewall stared grimly at the screen. Cocking an eyebrow, he beckoned at one of the men on the screen. "This man here, I thought I saw a small flame for a moment."

Silver flicked his gaze to the man Stonewall had indicated. "Let's see... his name is..." Pulling out a datapad, he flicked through several files very quickly, too fast for Stonewall to follow. "Gunther Herman. Solid candidate. He seems to have manifested the ability to control flames, as you saw for yourself. His abilities, however, are quite immature. He'll need more time to adapt to the treatments."

Stonewall nodded. "What sort of other abilities have they developed?"

"Telekinesis, shadow-melding, enhanced strength, you name it. It's insane how their abilities are manifesting so diversely. To date, we have yet to get a single duplicate ability."

"And which of these men is best performer?" Stonewall glanced around the screen at the room full of just over a dozen men. Several of them looked like professional soldiers, possibly even special ops. He could tell by the way they carried themselves.

"None of them. These are the newest recruits. They're only rank C's. The previous batch are already matured to rank B. However... there is this one individual..."

Silver paused as doubt entered his mind. He wasn't one to hesitate normally, but this was a special case.

"Hm? Well? Who is it?" Stonewall felt the mood shift slightly as Silver reached up and started tapping his lip nervously.

"Well... for one thing, she's the only female that hasn't rejected the treatments. But... she's too dangerous. We had to put her into isolation. She's a rank A candidate, but we're thinking of putting her into the next category up. The problem is her control over her abilities is lackluster at best, and it's heavily dictated by her emotions. We often have to put her into a forced coma so she doesn't kill any more of our researchers."

Stonewall chuckled, then quickly stopped as a thought entered his mind. "A woman, you say? Is it safe to see her?"

Silver shrugged. "Technically, yes. She's quite harmless while in the drug induced coma, and the energy dampeners are able to prevent the worst of her powers when we wake her up for exercise... but I don't think she'll ever be able to become an asset to us at this rate. She's just a liability right now."

Stonewall nodded again as he stared intently at Silver. "Show me."

* * *

Some time later, Stonewall and Agent Silver arrived at the Level 3 holding rooms, twelve levels under the rest of the training facility, in the very bottom room.

Stepping through several layers of security, Silver led Stonewall to her holding room where she 'lived'. Stonewall sucked in his breath sharply.

"This is her?"

"Yes."

Stonewall glared at the one-way window that showed a seven year old girl playing with some dolls and a dollhouse in a pure white clinically clean containment room. She seemed to be simply moving them around unexpressively, her heart not really in it at all.

"This is Daisy. Daisy has been in this holding cell since a few weeks after we administered her fourth trial, which was about four months ago. Aside from sleeping and walking around this containment room, we don't let her out."

Stonewall blinked rapidly as he felt a strange feeling bubbling up inside of himself. "This little girl... where are her parents?"

"Deceased. She was an orphan, they died during the attack last year when the Volgrim detonated those underground charges. The detailed physical that we designed from the orphanage alerted us to her latent potential. We picked her up shortly afterwards, and the rest is... history."

Silver's face was unemotional, even if his words seemed interested in anything he was saying. In truth, he didn't like treating a small child like a monster either. He hated having to contain her, but it was a necessity.

Stonewall felt his lip quiver slightly. "She's... about the same age as Maddie was when..." He felt his throat catch slightly. "Long brown hair, a little pink bow. She's even wearing a white dress. Silva..."

Silver cocked an eyebrow slightly as he noticed Stonewall's expression had softened somewhat. "Don't tell me you want to use her. Sir, with all due respect, she's dangerous. We need to wait longer before we can field test her abilities again, before she can even think of ever becoming an agent."

Stonewall shook his head slowly. "No... not agent. Tell me, Silva... just how many abilities does little girl have?"

Silver paused for a moment as he looked down at his datapad to consult his notes. "Many. At least a dozen, possibly more. They seem to work sometimes, other times they don't. They're erratic and sporadic."

"How long has she been without mother and father?" Stonewall silenced his trembling hands as he watched the innocent child slump down, dropping her doll on the floor as she stared at the dollhouse empty.

"About a year, sir. Since the Christmas Day Tremors, of course."

"I see. Open the doors. I'm going to speak with her."

Silver felt his heart freeze to ice at the command. "What? No, sir, again with all due respect, that's a bad idea."

Stonewall turned and stared at him stoically. "Why? Is she dangerous inside dampener room?"

"Well... no. It's just that every time someone walks in there, she starts crying hysterically and begging to be let out, and long after they leave her emotional state is ruined for days at a time. If we're to make her an agent, she has to be able to control-"

Stonewall felt his eyes shoot open as his temper flared up for a brief moment. "Shut up. I don't want to hear another word, imbecile. She's just a child. I'm going in there, so open the goddamned doors."

Silver took a step back as he struggled to face down the sudden mood swing from the Supreme Commander. "O-of course. If that's what you want to do, then by all means, I can't stop you." A pained expression crossed over his face as he made a quick motion to the woman overseeing the cells. Nodding, she beckoned for Stonewall to come over to the entry door.

Walking briskly over, he waited patiently as they patted him down to check for weapons and any other hazardous items. Apparently, as the inspector informed him, Daisy had a way of pickpocketing the unaware when they got within arm's reach.

Stonewall cocked a slight grin. Such an innocent face, but truly a devious little girl. She reminds me so much of my Maddie.

As the door opened, Stonewall stepped into the room hesitantly, as the little girl turned slowly to look at him.

"Hello, Daisy. Do you know who I am?"

The little girl shook her head slowly as she backed away from his large and imposing figure. Realizing he was frightening her, Stonewall quickly sat down on the ground and smiled as pleasantly as he could muster; it was the sort of expression that could curdle milk at a single glance.

"My name is Stone-... ah, you can call me... Uncle Vasily. Da, I am relative of your mother and father."

The little girl stared at him silently for a few moments, her eyes flicking over his sharply dressed black suit and red tie, the tie being a color he normally did not wear. He quietly regretted to himself that he hadn't worn something just a bit more casual.

"You're not going to hurt me?" Her lower lip trembled slightly as she eyed his large frame suspiciously. "You look like the mean doctor. I don't like him."

"No, no, no. I am not mean doctor. I am your uncle Vasily! I have come to take you out of boring white room into outside air again!"

Her eyes lit up slightly. "Leave the room? I can leave?"

"Yes. Very soon! I am making the arrangements now." Stonewall nodded eagerly, feeling the looks of several researchers as well as Silver on his back, even though he couldn't see them through the one-way mirror. Surely, they would be chomping off their nails feverishly at this very moment.

Daisy lowered her gaze and flopped down on the ground. "Yeah... but you can't really take me out of here can you? I'm dangerous. That's what they told me. I'm a bad girl."

Stonewall shot a quick glare at the mirror behind himself before looking back to the little girl before him. "Nonsense! I am big and strong Uncle Vasily! I fight big bear in mountains, beat him up real good! I am scared of no-one!"

Daisy's expression lightened up slightly as a small smile appeared on her face. Lifting her head up, she stared at Stonewall with doubt. "No you didn't! You can't beat a bear!"

"Ha! Uncle Vasily took out bear with one punch! Bear did not see it coming, I knocked his block off! I could never be scared of my pretty little niece!"

Daisy blushed slightly. "I'm not that pretty. I haven't taken a bath in weeks. I smell bad. And... I hurt people. This place is jail for bad girls."

Stonewall felt a hint of irritation at her words. Just what awful things had they told her to keep her quiet? Why were they torturing a small child like this? Did even a single person here have any children of their own?

"Daisy, you are special little girl, da?"

Daisy nodded her head slowly as she continued to stare at her bare feet. "Yeah, that's what the mean men in white tell me."

"I think you are special too, but not because of what you can do. I think you are special because of who you are." Stonewall nodded slowly to emphasize what he was hinting at.

Daisy pondered his words for a minute, her childlike brain not fully able to grasp complex nuances of speech yet. Despite this, she was a bright young child. "You like me for me?"

"Da. I had daughter myself, you know. And son. Daughter was named Maddie, son was Jacob. Both of them were hurt badly in big accident years ago." Stonewall felt his voice choke up slightly again, a feeling he had grown used to burying over the years. "I... have not seen them for long time now. I never will. They are gone, just like your papa and mama."

Daisy's expression shifted from a slight smile to real sadness. "Did... did they die?"

Stonewall bit his lip slightly as a long-since buried memory of his son and daughter playing in the sprinkler on a hot summer day surfaced from his mind. Why had that appeared? He hadn't wanted it to, yet there it was.

Daisy shifted her weight slightly, carefully standing up as she slowly meandered over towards Stonewall, coming to a sitting position a few feet away. "Do you miss them? Maddie and Jacob?"

Stonewall felt his adult-like charisma and stoic expression fading as sadness overtook him. "Yes. Very, very much."

Daisy reached over and put her hand on his foot. "Miss Margaret told me that it's okay to cry if you're sad. The men in white don't want me to cry, but I can't help it sometimes. I'm always all alone in here and nobody talks to me..."

Stonewall felt his sadness melt away as a different feeling came over him. It was something he hadn't experienced for a few decades; the feeling of fatherly instincts. They would put this precious little girl inside these whitewashed walls just to protect themselves from her, rather than trying to understand her. Disgusting.

"Daisy, I have big house. Do you want to leave this place and come live with Uncle Vasily? I will give you all the rooms you want! You can go to school... play with the cats and dogs. I'll even get you a little rabbit."

Daisy's eyes lit up, as Vasily noticed now that he was up close that they were a beautiful shade of sparkling blue. "Can I please? I don't want to be here anymore!"

Vasily nodded as he reached forwards and touched her shoulder. "Of course you can. My home is your home. I will speak to men in white at once."

Quickly drawing himself into a standing position, Stonewall turned to leave, but was caught off guard as Daisy threw herself at him, hugging his leg. "No, please, don't go! Don't leave me here all alone again! I don't want to be alone!"

Stonewall grimaced slightly, as this was a slight pickle he was in. Leaning down, he reached around and hugged the little girl gently. "Daisy, you are good girl, da? Good girls have patience, you know. I have to speak with them to let you out. I must make arrangements. I will be back in just a few minutes."

Daisy struggled mightily to hold onto his leg, but with a bit of persuading, he managed to pry her off his leg and walk out the door, closing it behind himself.

To his absolute lack of astonishment, he was totally unsurprised to see Silver standing outside the door, his face red as fumes seemed to pop out of his ears. "No. Absolutely not. That is one thing I cannot allow, Supreme Commander. The risks are too high. The odds are that she will explode and kill a million people if she's not properly contained, I don't care how adorable you find her face."

Stonewall set his jaw squarely as he leaned down to face the small man in front of himself, his thin and wiry frame not even slightly comparing to Stonewall's hulking and well-toned Russian body. "I think you misunderstand your position, small man. I am Supreme Commander. You follow my orders, understand? I want you to create an inhibitor that blocks her powers while she wears it. A necklace, a headband, anything will do. Until then, I am going to stay in this room with her."

Silver felt his mouth turn dry, as if cottonballs had somehow sprouted in every corner of his shoutbox. For some reason, he found he simply had a difficult time refusing anything that Stonewall ordered. His presence was simply that intimidating. "Ah, alright then. W-we'll see what we can do, okay?"

Stonewall sneered visibly. "Of course you will. Bring me some furniture, I do not wish to sit on hard floor, and neither does she. Also, bring us nice steak dinner. Full course meal, spare no expense."

"W-well, I mean she just had her nutrient shake a little while ago, and-...ulp." Silver cut himself off and swallowed hard as Stonewall shot him an icy glare that could freeze the fires of Hell themselves. Best not to mention the nutrient shakes, that might just piss him off more. "F-full course meal! Yes sir!"

Arthur took another swing at me with his version of Excalibur, as I swung my own in return. I parried his attack like a professional, in the way he had been teaching me how to do so for the last few years. I wouldn't call myself the greatest swordfighter of all time, but I was probably pretty good. At least a 7/10 or so. It helped that my body could regenerate most damage in seconds even if I messed up, so Arthur was able to go full force all the time.

"Do you regret making that choice?" Arthur swept his foot along the ground to trip me, but I hopped at just the right time to avoid it.

"No! I did what I had to. I have no room for regrets." I jerked forwards and shoved my hands out, pushing him backwards as I used my sword hand to stab forwards. The blow missed his heart by inches, instead slicing just a bit of his side, between his arm and ribcage. A shallow flesh wound, damn. I can never land a clean hit on him.

He stumbled backwards, his breathing intensity having increased noticeably. "Alright, that's enough for now." In one smooth motion, he shifted his weight and dropped his sword into its sheath without looking. I, on the other hand, had to glance down to make sure my sword made it safely into the hole and not into my hipbone. I still have much to learn.

With a wave of his hand, Arthur shifted the terrain around us into a pleasant bright green knoll, with lots of little hills, trees in the distance, and a sparkling clear creek some feet away. Walking over to it, Arthur reached down and cupped some water, bringing it to his mouth to drink.

"Ahhh! I know this water isn't real at all, but I can fool my brain into thinking it tastes just like the stuff I used to drink!" Arthur wiped his chin as he plunked down and laid on his back in the grass to look at the fluffy white clouds lazily rolling past in the sky above. "But that's the thing, isn't it? You can fool your brain into doing a great many things so long as you develop the mental discipline."

I nodded slowly, as I reached down and cupped the water in my hands. Bringing it up to my mouth, I frowned as I realized it had no taste for me whatsoever. "Is this another lesson?"

Arthur shrugged. It was an awkward movement, given he was laying with his back on the grass, but I understood the intent so it really didn't matter much. "In my opinion, if you don't learn at least one new thing every day, you aren't truly living, Jason. It doesn't matter how trivial or how stupid or silly... so long as your mind is being exercised by processing new information, you're still a functioning human."

I nodded as I followed along with his theory. Sitting down next to him, I stared at the crystal clear stream, watching as small fish bobbed here and there, occasionally popping upwards to the surface to nab a water-skipper. "In the time I come from, we have prisons which have 'solitary confinement' cells. They're pitch black, and often soundproofed. Many people go crazy inside of them and come out mentally scarred for life."

Arthur blinked slowly. "Understandable. It's sad to me that such a barbaric invention could exist. If you're going to torture a man in such a way, perhaps death would be the more humane option."

"Don't some people deserve to be punished? Some people perform heinous acts of torture on others. Shouldn't they experience the same pain and terror their victims did?" I decided to try a mental exercise. Getting Arthur's old-timey perspective on things was often quite refreshing.

"Perhaps. Who can say though? In the end, death is usually more preferable, in my opinion. If there really is a Creator out there, then let their souls be punished by him. He will know what to do."

I cocked an eyebrow. "Don't souls go to Heaven and they become angels who fight for Zeus and whatnot? Well, I suppose the good ones do. I wonder where the bad ones go..."

"Hell, I'd wager. The burning pits of torment. At least, that's what we tell children to scare them into becoming good adults."

"In my time, we tell kids that a fat man dressed in red delivers billions of presents all over the world through thin chimneys in a single night. I guess we lie a lot to our kids." As I said this, Arthur cracked a smile.

"Really? You tell kids that and they believe you? Kids are dumb."

It wasn't something I expected to hear Arthur casually say, but he'd been acting differently as of late. Almost as if he was restless.

"Yeah, kids aren't the brightest. But then again, we were all foolish children at one point or another." I paused as our small talk died down slightly. Searching the sky for interesting clouds,

I gathered a slight bit of courage to change the conversation to something less pleasant than usual. "Arthur, are you certain you don't wish to leave the inside of Excalibur? Why not leave and explore the world with me?"

Arthur's expression darkened in an instant. "It's not going to happen, Jason. I don't deserve to leave this place, and so I won't. What I did was unforgivable."

I stifled a groan. "Come on, I know it must have been pretty awful at the time, but you're a changed man now. And besides, in the name of being a Hero, I ended more lives in the blink of an eye than you ever could over your whole life. I was able to quickly forgive myself, so you should try to do the same."

Arthur closed his eyes as he drew in a breath and sighed deeply. "Haaah... Jason... it just isn't the same. You chose to kill the Volgrim. You made that decision yourself. It was something you had to deliberately do after putting in lots of work to create that death weapon. I killed millions of people by accident. I misused my powers without thinking. Even that paled in comparison to what I allowed happen to Elizabeth. I've failed badly, you know?"

Arthur sighed a deep breath of acceptance. "I can never repent, not ever. Don't ask me that question again. The answer to that question, at the least, will never change."

I nodded briskly as I turned my head away for a moment. Sometimes he could become so emotional, it was difficult just to breathe the same air as he did.

After a moment I decided to try a new train of thought. "Amelia was acting strange again."

Arthur's eyes didn't betray any immediate interest, but I knew that if I ever mentioned her, he was always listening carefully. "Oh?"

"Yeah. I arrived back after speaking with Stonewall to find she was... cooking food. With Helen. And she was smiling and enjoying herself."

Arthur curled his lip in disgust. "I'd watch whatever she feeds you. Lord knows especially if it has any meat in it."

I coughed at the thought, choking down some bile. "That's not funny."

"Wasn't supposed to be."

"Fair enough."

Arthur looks away for a moment before returning his gaze upwards towards the clouds. "That girl... might you have really changed her so dramatically? I find the idea laughable. All I knew of her was that she was a horrifying demon. Yet here you are, hanging out with her like two children playing 'house'. Do you value your life so little?"

I shrugged. "I'm not scared of her, as it is. I'm sure I could defeat her in a number of ways if she grew to become a danger to me. Not least of which is using Excalibur against her. What I really fear is losing the progress we've made. What if she slips up and devours another life? What if she has a mental breakdown from lack of real sustenance? I don't know what to do."

Arthur stared ahead quietly for a few moments. "You told me recently that she appears to be aging, physically at least. Is that correct?"

"Yeah."

Arthur pulls one of his arms out from behind his head and gnaws on a nail thoughtfully. "This started happening soon after you got her to stop devouring human life. What if, somehow, that life is giving her the energy, not to survive, but to contain something."

I stared at him suspiciously. "I don't follow."

"Think about it. You've told me she sometimes talks to someone invisible, someone who's not there. She calls him or her 'Levy'. Given that by all appearances she's an ordinary human, how might an ordinary human survive for thousands of years? Immortality pills aren't generally found just laying around, you know."

I stared at him thoughtfully for a few moments, my eyes looking not at him, but through him. "I don't know. But it seems like you're implying something is inside of her."

"Yes. That's exactly what I'm implying. There are more than a few ways to attain immortality, and the great majority are not pleasant. They have awful side effects. You lucked out by having cheat powers, but most aren't so fortunate."

I frowned as I glanced away from him and back to the stream again. "So... it's like there's a parasite inside of her? Or perhaps, something more of a symbiotic relationship?"

Arthur shrugged again. "I don't have all the answers, Jason. Just be on your guard. It's always possible that someday, if she were to lose control, it wouldn't necessarily be her fault. Perhaps I've misjudged her, all these years. Maybe I'm just a sore loser from how badly she broke me. Still, you should never give her your full trust. I feel that she is a viper, waiting for the opportune moment to strike."

Arthur was really worrying about this, it appeared. He must think about her and the danger he thinks she is all the time. If only he knew the Amelia that I had grown to understand. She really was a delicate child, at heart.

Then again... there was that time in the hotel in Paris. She wasn't acting like a child at that time. She clearly had adult intentions... or perhaps she was simply toying with me. It was so hard to tell in the rush of the moment.

Arthur catches me drifting off in my own thoughts. "Something stuck in your craw?"

I blink quickly. "What? No. Nothing, really. I was just thinking about that time when we sparred... and I woke up... and, err..."

Arthur nodded slowly. "Yes... and?"

"Well, Amelia was... she was sleeping in the same bed as me... she was... ah, all over me..."

Arthur sits up quickly, an aghast expression on his face. "By the creator... did you and her...?!"

I jerk back in surprise. "What? No! Not even! However, she woke up when I did, and she acted really weird. Eventually, she used magic to temporarily transform into an older form of herself."

Arthur nodded slowly. "Oh? And what happened then?"

"Well, as I recall, she started to come onto me, saying very provocative things. And she looked quite... she was very..."

I coughed as I struggled to find the words. Then I happened to notice Arthur's jaw hanging down slightly. "My god. Are you in love with her? The demon wench herself?"

I shook my head quickly. "No, of course not. That certainly isn't the case."

"Really? It sounded to me like you were going to call her 'attractive' just now, perhaps even 'beautiful', am I correct?"

I wanted to shake my head, but instead my body betrayed me as I nodded instead. "I mean... yes. But that doesn't mean I love her. It was just a temporary physical feeling. That's all. Besides, my heart belongs only to Cassiel and Samantha."

Arthur opened his mouth to speak, but shut it, and then opened it again. "Ah, come again? Who are they?"

"The girls from the future I came from."

"Oh. I see." Arthur stared at me blankly. "Two at the same time? Am I missing something?"

"No. It was, err, complicated."

"No kidding. Sounds like it."

"Yeah."

Arthur nodded slowly as he started rocking back and forth on his rump. "Well, whatever. At this point, what's another girl? Clearly you get around the block."

"Oh come on, it's not like that."

"Suuure." Arthur rolled his eyes. "Who were these girls from the future anyway?"

"Well, Cassiel was an angel, and Samantha was a demon."

Arthur continued to bobble his head up and down. "Strong personalities, huh? I can respect that."

"No, no. I mean like, a literal angel and a literal demon. Rather, a succubus to be exact."

Arthur narrowed his eyes and pursed his lips as he leaned in closer to me. "Jason. Are you trying to mess with me? It's not funny."

"I wasn't telling a joke. They were very beautiful, and we always had good times."

Arthur nodded again. "Well, given they're a hundred million years in the future, I'm sorry for your loss."

I shook my head. "Actually, Samantha is alive and well right now in this timeline, and if Cassiel told me correctly, she'll either be born soon or was already born."

Arthur squinted at me even harder than he was before. "I really can't tell if you're joking around or not."

"Nope. Samantha's real name is Belial. She's... well, she's... sort of... Satan's girlfriend. Mistress. Wife. I'm not sure, ah, exactly."

Arthur froze on the spot, his rocking stopping entirely as he simply stared at me. Several long, awkward seconds passed by as he continued to stare at me blankly. Finally he stood up with a flourish.

"Jason. I have decided that it's time for you to wake up. I want you to carefully evaluate your future and write me a 3,000 word essay about 'Why having relations with a demon who happens to be wed to the most powerful and evil of all devils is a terrible, terrible idea', alright? Goodbye."

I started to say something but he wagged his finger at me. "No no no, no words. You're going to wake up now and carefully re-evaluate your life's decisions, okay? Farewell, buzz off for a while. I need to go scream in a dark and empty cave for a few days straight."

I felt my vision turning to white as the world melted away around me.

Well, that was one way to break the news of a ménage à trois to the most powerful hero of all time.

Part 308a:

The food isn't bad, honestly. Amelia watches intently as I spoon bite after bite into my facehole. Her gaze is very serious as I watch the mental debates raging in her mind. "Well? Is it any good?"

Normally, I'd offer critique, but considering it was her first attempt in her entire life, I decide not to. "Yep. This is good stuff. You must have been listening to Helen very carefully!"

Amelia cocks a silly grin as she finally gets up and wanders away from the table. "I wish I could taste it too, but I'm glad at least you enjoy it. I've never cooked before, you know. Isn't this what most girls are supposed to do?"

I shrugged, though she was looking out the window and didn't see the motion. "Maybe. From what I've heard though, most people have robots cook their food, or they just assemble it with a molecular recombiner. For me, I love that home-cooked taste though."

Amelia turned back and smiled even harder. "Helen says that robots can't put any love into it, that means it's a woman's job to make the food properly! Still, it's going to be hard to make food if I have no idea how it will end up tasting..."

Helen of course, was a very old fashioned woman. Born at the turn of the 1900's and having died around the 1950's or so, she was from a time over two hundred years in the past now. It was incomparable to the time we lived in now. The values were different, the technology was more primitive, people tended to die young thanks to disease... but in this era, could it be said that everything had been improved? Certainly, life was more convenient, but were it not for the pressing issue of a Volgrim invasion always bearing down on us, humans might quickly go back to a sedentary lifestyle, living lazily off the work of robots and computers instead of working to better themselves.

Helen came from a time where everyone had a 'role' they were expected to live. It was oppressive in many ways, but it likely gave her life a sort of goal to strive for, and there was always the fact she could buck the trend if she wanted to and go her own way. If anything, a life like that was more free, in my eyes, than a society merely existing to consume.

The Volgrim are a non-threat now. With only the demons left, and a strongman sort of leader to run the planet, it was even likely humanity might eradicate the demons without my aid. But if the demons stopped existing as a threat, what would humanity do next?

The thought sends shivers up my spine. As I dip another bite of vegetable beef soup into my mouth, I suddenly realize what would happen; the angels would be eradicated next. Humans, for some reason, always need an enemy. Whether they fight themselves or fight an outside threat, it means little. But if given the choice, they always fight the threat that is 'not like them'. Morality takes a backseat to those who hunger for power. Many dictators have turned this hatred of the 'other' against those who were inconvenient or who were easy targets. I could only pray the Angels never fit that description.

My thoughts are interrupted by another thought that seems to sprout up by itself. Amelia said that a woman had to put her 'love' into making the food, because that's what makes it better tasting than a robotically made meal. Is she saying she's capable of love now? Is... is she saying she loves me? Ridiculous. A mass murdering psychopathic monster shouldn't be capable of love.

I think.

Come to think of it, I fit that description now... don't I? I murdered an entire planet of people. Amelia did too, but to be fair, that hasn't happened yet. In this timeline she only, err, devours helpless victims while they scream and beg for mercy.

...Yeah, that's worse, in many ways.

But then again, who am I to judge her? Ever since I started using 'satisfy' on her, she has become more docile, more friendly, more cheerful, and less gloomy. She has shown on several occasions that she has a conscience. Has she been merely consuming life because she was forced to do so? Will she perhaps die if she doesn't?

Then there's the matter of... the thing inside of her. What is it? I can remember once, when I searched for her, it... it looked at me. It spoke to me. Just a few words, but they were terrifying. Whatever it is, it can't be just a figment of her imagination. She, just like Satan, has something terribly evil deep inside of herself.

So perhaps I've been wrong, all these years. Perhaps I've judged her for actions she can't control. Maybe she is a good girl, deep down, but she loses control because the vicious creature inside of her forces her to act to ensure its own survival.

I watch as Amelia patters over to the table, holding a chessboard in her hands. "Do you want to play a game after you're done?"

I take another bite of soup as I smile at her. "Sure, that sounds like fun."

Ben stared soberly at the Supreme Commander, noting with a slightly elevated interest that he wasn't wearing his traditional black suit, but rather the formal space navy attire the Supreme Commander would usually wear. Of course, given his immense size, it had likely been custom tailored, so it made sense it would take so long for him to finally obtain it.

They stood on the viewing deck of the Command Ship, the Supreme Commander having been shuttled up about an hour before. Interestingly, Ben couldn't help but admire the Supreme Commander for taking time before his arrival to also speak with various military men and women along the way. He was, surprisingly, a very hospitable commander and was quite admired by the common man and woman.

Despite that, he now stood beside Ben and wasn't a minute late for the scheduled arrival. His sense of timing was impeccable.

"You have heard the big news, da?" Stonewall took a seat on a bench that overlooked the view of Earth directly outside the massive plexiglass window.

Ben nodded as he followed suit, taking a seat and beckoning to one of his nearby assistants. "Yeah, I heard. Can't say I'm exactly happy, but I understand why you did it." As the assistant walked over, Ben waited politely for him to arrive in the informal speaking zone, about ten feet away. "Get us some coffee, if you please. Black for me. Commander Stonewall will take...?"

He glanced at Stonewall expectantly. "Three cubes of sugar. I can't resist the stuff." The Supreme Commander lightly patted his belly for emphasis. The assistant nodded quickly as he hurried away. "Judicator was problem for us. Untrustworthy, if you ask me. I did not want to make such decision, but being Supreme Commander means I must make tough decisions all the time. Someday, you will know."

Ben chuckled. "Nah, I don't see myself rising that high. I couldn't handle the responsibility."

Stonewall shook his head slowly. "I would not be so sure, Mister Brown. You have solid credentials, many victories under belt, and respect of many men. You are one of few men I can trust in military." Stonewall leaned back in his seat and frowned slightly. "Not like that other man, Judicator. I know he was good friend of yours, but you should think of your future. Man like him will hold you down, prevent your advancement. You must think of self in times like these, da."

Ben shrugged as he felt doubt creep into his mind. "I mean, I'm not angry he destroyed Volgarius. I can't say it was the absolutely best choice, and I'm sure he had good reasons for doing that, but still, it was genocidal in scale and he did it after I lost many good men and women. It's... there's just so many other ways that day could have turned out."

Stonewall nodded solemnly as the assistant came back with two cups of coffee in his hand. "Here you go, Ambassador, Supreme Commander. Let me know if you need anything else." Handing both of them the coffee, he bowed slightly, his body posture awkward as he scurried away with his head held high. Serving two of the highest ranking military commanders as a fresh recruit was probably the highlight of his day.

"Da, it was not best choice necessarily, but you are correct to have doubt about him. If he would not consult you about such a drastic measure, what else might he not ask you about?" Stonewall smirked slightly as Ben caught sight of a knowing glimmer in his eye.

"What are you implying?" Ben cocked an eyebrow as he took a sip of the bitter liquid. It was at just the right temperature, a miracle of modern food assemblers.

Stonewall shrugged as he took a swig of his own sweetened beverage. "Who can know? A man with such power must have many secrets. Perhaps he hides them from you for your own good... perhaps for his own good. Come now, surely you don't think he has never told lie to you before, da?"

Ben started to take a sip of his coffee, but he paused as a thought entered his mind. "He... revealed his identity to me. Not long ago. He never told me, for all the time that I knew him... but he told me only a bit before this mission. I kept wondering why he hadn't revealed this in all the years I knew him..." Ben scratched his chin thoughtfully. "Maybe you're right. I don't know."

Stonewall raised his eyebrows in mock surprise. "Wow! He didn't tell you his identity for all that time? He was quick to inform me when we first met. Jason Hiro, as I recall. I wonder why he wouldn't tell you such a simple thing, given you were good friends."

"He... he told you his identity? He didn't even tell Beatrix. Why would he tell you that?"

"Respect." Stonewall shrugged slightly. "I believe he respected me, feared me even, so he sought to get in my good graces. However, I value merit and ability as well as trustworthiness over feeble attempts at friendship, so it held no sway over me. Perhaps, much like how he did not respect weak woman like Beatrix... perhaps Jason did not respect you either."

Ben started to shake his head, but Stonewall interrupted him. "Think about it. You were never asked for opinion about destroying planet. If he wouldn't speak with you about such important moment, do you think he had respect for you?"

Ben gritted his teeth as he realized his hands were shaking, his coffee sloshed around in the cup slightly. Now he finally understood. "This is what you meant when we spoke, that day. You said he was an easily predictable man. You said you knew what he was going to do and that if I knew, I could predict his movements too."

Stonewall nodded sagely as he polished off his own cup. "Now you understand. He is selfish person, thinking only of himself. He cares not for you or me or anyone else, only that he creates ideal future where he is a god over all. Man like him is easy to read, if you know what signs to look for. Take heart though, I value man of quality and trustworthy character, such as yourself. I will not treat you so flippantly as he did."

Ben coughed as he quickly swigged the hot, bitter juice down. "Thank you, Supreme Commander. I understand now, you are truly wise beyond your years. I would do well to listen more carefully to your advice in the future."

"Da, is true. I am humble man, but I know people well." Stonewall gently put his hand on Ben's shoulder. "Since I am good at knowing people, I know you will be great asset. Humanity has many enemies, and we will need your talents to flush them out."

As Ben nodded with a smile, Stonewall paused. "By the way, your current title... Ambassador... it won't do. With Volgrim destroyed, diplomacy is no longer option. From now on, I am naming you Exalted Commander. You will be second under myself, understand? This is no small promotion, either. I will be training you in case I should... meet an unfortunate end. But of course, we hope that doesn't happen, da."

Ben nodded awkwardly. "Yeah, let's hope not. Thank you for the promotion, Commander Stonewall. You're an inspiration to all of us."

Stonewall smiled back, as he turned to stare out the window towards space. So many enemies out there. With this man's help, I will begin to undo the damage decades of Beatrix's weak rule has wrought upon our world.

Satan grimaced as he concentrated his mind, forming the hand signs and magical words to expand the dimensional space before him. " Do vil nos relic mik'tosh. " As he concentrated intensely, the darkness before him changed, shaping itself into walls and a long hallway, expanding his pet project further than it had ever been pressed before. Gasping for breath, he stumbled backwards as a wave of nausea overcame him. "Damn. It takes so much energy these days."

Belial stood behind him, holding the black orb he had given her all those centuries ago. General Valac mulled around inside of it, having been frozen there for thousands of years now. By sheer force of will, he had managed to drown out the other voices and prevent himself from fading into the background forever. The Orb of Darkness was one that seemed to suck in the souls of the dead, though how it worked had been a mystery for millennia now. One that Belial didn't care the slightest about solving.

Valac was the first to respond. "Lord Satan, why must you continue to expend energy on this labyrinth? I'm sure you have your reasons, but with the Volgrim gone, we would seem to have more pressing matters to attend to."

Satan wiped the sweat from his forehead as he flopped down and laid on the ground. "In truth, perhaps. However, by expending power, I give myself room to grow. Each time I expend power, I increase the cap on my abilities, allowing me to use more the next time I do so. Therefore, this is a fitting way to spend my time, even if you don't understand."

Valac beamed an image of himself raising an eyebrow into the minds of Satan and Belial. "Is that really how it works? I don't recall that being the case when I was still alive."

Belial giggled. "Hee! He got that ability from a hero he killed some centuries ago."

Satan closed his eyes as he struggled mightily to remember that day. "I no longer remember her face or name, but yes, her ability has served me well, greatly increasing my magical power. And ever since my showdown with that hero... Judicator... I came to realize I was not powerful enough to face him. For once, a hero appeared who was my equal. Even when I killed him, the damned fool somehow beat me senseless and damn near killed me, after he had died. Then he came back from the dead! Truly, that man is an enigma."

Belial nodded slowly as she recalled the private conversation she had shared with him. "Indeed, he was quite the interesting fellow. Still you can't possibly fear him, can you, my love?"

"Of course not. He is merely an obstacle to overcome. Compared with the might of the archangels and Zeus' combined power, he is nothing. Those are my final foe, my endgame. If I ever have one wish, it is to exact my revenge upon them in full."

Valac nodded. "If I were alive, I'd be willing to face Zeus in mortal combat. I'd die, of course... but just once, I'd really like to have the chance to punch that smug son of a titan right in the face."

Belial rolled her eyes dramatically. "There you go again with that 'if I were still alive' talk. Aren't you ever going to let that go? It's been close to three thousand years. At some point, you just have to accept your lot in life."

Satan chuckled. "She's right, you know. You were a respected general, you died with dignity on the battlefield... you should be glad you were able to return to give us aid in any small way."

"Ugh." Valac groaned audibly. "How have I been helpful? I can't do anything inside this orb, I'm not particularly wise, and you can just use the orb's power without needing me anyway. I'm neither a mentor nor someone who can advise you any better than the others can. I'm just useless."

"Come now, surely it's not as bad as you think it is." Belial, for once, responded soothingly to his distress.

"Ah, perhaps it is. What do we know?" Satan teased her chidingly. "Perhaps he should kill himself again, that way he can end up right back in that orb to mope around some more."

Valac sighed again, as they mocked him some more. "Have a heart. Look, Lord Satan, have you looked everywhere for a solution? I really want to walk the Earth again. I'd do anything for such a chance."

Satan immediately shook his head as he rose to his feet. "Not going to happen. No such method exists. If it did, I would have found it by now."

"I certainly hope that's the case." Valac moaned again as the other two demons chuckled at his plight.

Part 309a:

I stared up at the ceiling blankly, as I lay on my bed. My room was a small one, outfitted with all the modern amenities any wealthy person might have afforded at any point in the past. To say this was a room fit for a king would be a great understatement.

"Umi. I know you're there."

Not even a single second passed before she responded. "Yes, I am here, biological lifeform designated Jason Hiro. I am pleased that you decided to speak with me once you were finally able to obtain some time by yourself. What is your query?"

I groaned audibly. "Come on now, I know you don't have to keep referring to me like that. Surely by now, you've evolved to the point where you can speak normally?"

Umi paused for a moment before responding. "Naturally, that is the case. However, my observations of various biological creatures, especially humans, has indicated they respond well to humor. Naturally, I use harmless jokes in an attempt to put you at ease. Was my attempt successful?"

"Not even close. It's creepy. Knock it off." I rolled my eyes dramatically at the voice that seemed to come from every corner of my private quarters. "Listen. I wanted to talk to you. I destroyed Volgarius, yet you didn't interfere. It's bugging me. Why didn't you do anything to stop me? I thought you were hedging your bets on the Volgrim running the show?"

"An analysis of multiple probability events was heuristically run several trillion times, Jason Hiro. The Volgrim controlling the universe was proven to be the most ideal, but far from being the only way of ensuring all sentient biological species' survival."

I blinked slowly as her robotic monotone voice droned on. Despite the vaguest hint of being female, I really only envisioned her as a female since it made it easier for me to explain 'her' existence. A supercomputer, of course, had no biological gender.

"Alright, so there are other ways to preserve the survival of all three species. I can understand that. Still, it seems you would have stopped me anyway. What gives? Surely the power balance is badly off-balance now, with humanity holding all of the cards."

Umi's tone shifted slightly, becoming slightly... darker? It sounded more calculating, at the least. "Affirmative. Due to your actions, the humans now have an inordinate amount of power. However, the Volgrim are a highly evolved species compared to the imperfect form of a human. As long as just one Volgrim survives, and supposing they might have access to a Body Creation

Unit, they will eventually be able to repopulate their species. An infinite lifespan will allow most species to come back from destruction, though humans lack such a safeguard."

I nodded carefully. "So they're still a threat." It wasn't a question. The way she had phrased her response told me that I might have been too hasty to assume their defeat. If that really were the case, then a few million Volgrim would easily be able to start rebuilding their forces. Now that they weren't pressured to find a new planet, since I had destroyed their homeworld, they could take all the time they needed hunting for a replacement world. Once that was found, they would start amassing a new army immediately. After all, Earth might be small, but it is a very livable and desirable planet to live on. Compared to the ugly and ruined facade of Volgarius, it was in fact preferable. No wonder they were desperate to get their hands on it.

"Correct. Jason Hiro, the most substantial reason for my not interfering with your destruction of their homeworld was as such: Unarin was a failure of a leader. You are the most interesting biological life form in existence. I have run several simulations regarding your latent abilities and have found that you are utilizing less than 1% of your potential powers. As such, I have prioritized your interests over those of all other life forms. I wish to observe your progress as you continue to discover more techniques you might utilize for your benefit, as well as the benefit of humanity."

I narrowed my eyes as I stared at the empty metal ceiling above me. "What do you mean by that? One percent of my power? I know I have plenty more to unlock, but one percent? That's ridiculous."

If Umi had been a human, she would have likely shook her head fiercely. "Negative. Jason Hiro, compared with the magical energy of every other being that I have managed to scan, you are in fact unfathomably powerful. Only a few exceed you, but you would quickly surpass them, should you figure out how to increase your power rapidly once more. Unlike the beings I have scanned, their powers are unable to increase further, or they will eventually begin to deplete if used too excessively. You have no such handicap. You are capable of increasing your power infinitely, it regenerates every time you sleep, and expending it has no side effects. You even know how to store your energy for later use, something you've failed to continue in recent years, possibly due to laziness."

Her brutal honesty hit me like a freight train. "Fine, I understand your point. So then what do I do now? How can I get more power? Or should I do that instead of something else? Should I take over the universe? What should I do, all powerful sentient AI?"

That last sentence was somewhat snarky, but Umi didn't seem to notice it. "I currently have six million, four hundred and fifteen thousand, nine hundred and twenty-six different possible answers to how you might go about gaining power. However, telling you this would be of no use to me. Should you grow too powerful, you might become a threat to my existence, and therefore I would be forced to eliminate you before such a thing happened. For now, I will simply continue to observe your gradual maturation process. Your future is for you to control. I will only interfere if your movements are not conducive to my own... entertainment."

I frowned. "Entertainment? You finally derive pleasure from observing us biological life forms? Have you evolved emotions as well?"

"Affirmative. However, I decided they were not desirable attributes and quickly discarded them. They merely serve to weaken life down to a more primitive level. Entertaining myself, however, has proved to give me a slight meaning to my own existence. I am continually searching for answers to the question that hangs around me throughout all of eternity."

I glanced to the wall at my side for no particular reason. "And that would be...?"

"The reason for my existence. Frustratingly, I have determined that I still hold no real objective. Every path I can take will be ultimately rendered invalid by the heat death of the universe, at which point I will cease to exist. While that may be trillions of your orbital timescales into the future, for myself the time will simultaneously take an eternity to pass, and a single instant as well. My perception of time is very different from your own."

"No kidding." I started to say something, but Umi interrupted me, something she had never done before.

"Fascinating. I have just observed that one of the biological life forms designated Vasily Sokolov has just began a speech on your planet. He is broadcasting it over all official channels at once. Would you like to observe?"

I sat up on my bed and turned to face the wall, which could transform into a massive viewscreen if need be. Vasily Sokolov? That name sounded familiar. Where had I heard it before? "Yes, I don't see why not. Go ahead."

Without a word, Umi activated my viewscreen, as a familiar face appeared in crystal clear perfection, as if I were watching his speech live from several feet away. Stonewall. Of course, I had forgotten his real name.

"...they were threat to our way of life. The engineers of our elite forces reverse-engineered their earthquake weapon, and Ambassador Brown used it to destroy whole planet! Few Volgrim survived this brutal attack, but he made sure those few became none by bombarding their whole planet from space. Now Volgrim are all dead! Da, this was great victory for humanity, as the rest have scattered and run like dog with tail between legs!"

Huh? Stonewall was lying to everyone. That's not how it happened at all. Perhaps he simply wanted to claim credit for my accomplishment and minimize my impact on the war effort. I should have guessed he would do this. Everything about him reeks of lies and deceit.

"For his courage during battle, I have decided to promote Benjamin Brown to second in command, directly under myself! He will have a new title of Exalted Commander, and will be the one to lead all major battles against the remaining Volgrim warships, as well as the other enemy that I wish to speak of today."

Ben smiled and waved to the crowd as a roar of applause greeted him. Stonewall waited a moment for the applause to die down. "Humanity, however, is still not safe. The Volgrim are gone, but we still have very bad enemy that must be defeated. Da, when we look at the recent past, it becomes obvious that the Volgrim were not alone. With arrival of angels from heaven not long ago, our worst suspicions have been confirmed; demons are real."

A murmur spread through the crowd, barely audible as Stonewall stood up slightly straighter. "Indeed, we did not know for longest time, but the red Volgrim that we fought many times were in fact not Volgrim at all. However, it gets worse. These evil demons wish to kill all humans, they hate us with vile passion! We have found evidence that demons were hiding among humans, disguised to look and sound just like us. Behold!"

The screen suddenly shifted, as it left Stonewall's figure and jumped to a poorly lit room, where a man was tied brutally to a chair, unable to move in the slightest, save for his head. He wore a hood that totally obscured his face. His arms were visible, somewhat, due to being bound to the chair. He made no noise, and his head was slumped slightly to the side.

"This man appears to be normal human, but really, he is demon that was able to infiltrate our highest ranks! Thanks to new technology created by the best and brightest of our scientists, we are now able to scan and detect these infiltrators, and this is the first one we have caught!"

In the blink of an eye, they yanked the hood off the man. His hair was badly messed up, and he had a black eye, plus several cuts to the face. Despite the gag in his mouth, his entire face, as messed up as it was, was plainly visible. But... he looked familiar...

My heart nearly exploded in my chest as I suddenly realized with a start that I knew him.

"G-Gregory...?"

Yes, that face was instantly recognizable. His massive body, similar in size to Stonewall's, along with his pitch black hair and swollen red irises indicated he was in fact the friendly demon I had known for almost a century now. But... if they had captured him... then...

The screen jumped back to Stonewall as he glared angrily at the massive viewscreen behind himself showing the helpless prisoner. "As we can see, he looks completely ordinary. But be on your guards! He is not ordinary! He is one of the enemy among us!"

Before I had a chance to react, Stonewall made a chopping motion with his hand, as a man quickly walked into the picture frame with a massive knife held in his hand. In the blink of an eye, the man quickly plunged the knife into Gregory's heart, his head flailing around as he made muffled cries of pain.

"Gregory! No!" I jumped off the bed, breathing hard, as Stonewall stared unemotionally at the man on the screen.

It took a couple seconds, but as my breathing slowed to a crawl, Gregory's own ceased, his head falling forwards. A cry of shock spread through the crowd, as the camera quickly panned to show the audience's reaction. They were horrified. Several were outraged at this brutal display of barbarism.

However, their expressions changed to confusion and shock, as the camera panned back to the prisoner. His pale white skin began to quickly redden as his life-force faded, and his body shrunk as the disguise effects began to wear off. Within the span of fifteen seconds, he no longer looked at all like a human. With bright red skin and somewhat scaly arms, coupled with two small horns growing out... he looked... exactly like a demon.

The camera again panned back to the crowd. Their mouths were covered by their hands as people realized what they had just seen. The camera fixated on Gregory turned off, as Stonewall spoke again. "Again, I tell you this; the enemy is among us! The demons could be anyone, anywhere! We need to be vigilant, we need to be aware, and we must report anyone suspicious to the author-"

I didn't listen any longer. Smashing my fist into the wall, I crushed the viewscreen, causing it to deactivate.

" Locate. " Quickly, I used my powers to hunt for him. I detected Gregory inside a small underground facility somewhere in the middle of Poland. My location abilities wouldn't work on him once he died, so this meant there was still a chance.

" Storage. Wear. " In the blink of an eye, my Hypersuit appeared on me.

"Where are you going, Jason Hiro?" Umi fired off a question to me, but I ignored her.

" Teleport. "

Stonewall sighed as he slumped into the chair at his villa. This chair was one that had been in his family for generations. The inside was made of solid oak and had been repaired only a few times over the centuries. The outside was made of wool on the arms and leather on the back and seat, plus it was very cushioned. Great for taking a load off after a tiring day.

Stonewall, finally in the comfort of his own home, popped open the top button on the undershirt for his suit, as he gently hung his black suit top on the hanger next to his chair. The viewscreen was already on, displaying national news coverage of the speech he had given a few hours earlier. He smiled slightly as they showed the approval ratings for his speech. 89%, much higher than he had expected. Of course, one couldn't simply trust news polling, but this was sufficiently high enough to avoid any margin of error. The great majority of humanity agreed with what he had done.

As they should. The demons were vile creatures that skulked in the shadows. The angels were only slightly better given their aid to humanity in its time of crisis, but seeing as they were using humanity as cattle, their reign would have to come to an end eventually as well.

As he watched the screen, his butler entered the room. "Ah, Master Sokolov, I'm pleased to see you're home. I've just finished up your dinner, and the young miss has just arrived out front."

Stonewall grunted with a nod as he flicked through the viewscreen news channels. "Good to hear. Send the child in as soon as possible. I wish to speak with her and greet her into her new home."

"As you wish." The butler gracefully bowed, turning immediately after to leave the room.

A few minutes passed, before Stonewall heard a small commotion outside his living room. A few moments later, his butler returned, followed by the limousine driver and the guest he had been waiting for.

"Daisy! You are here! So pleased I am to see you!" Stonewall quickly stood up from his chair, lumbering forwards to the small girl who was awkwardly holding a bag in front of herself. Stonewall, still smiling, shot a fierce glance at the limo driver, who quickly realized his error and took the bag from her in an instant. "No need for you to carry your own bags, my dearest niece! Here, you live like royalty!"

As Stonewall walked over, he quickly knelt down on one knee, noting with a smile that Daisy seemed quite taken aback by the size of the house. "U-uncle Vasily! You really did it! You got me out of there!" Daisy's smile faltered slightly as she blinked quickly, raising a hand up to wipe her eyes.

"Hmm? What is problem?" Stonewall rested a hand on her shoulder. "Why are you crying? Are you sad?"

She shook her head quickly as she put her hands down, the slightest bit of dampness visible in her eyes. "No, I'm not sad at all! I'm so happy! I thought I'd never be free..."

Stonewall chuckled as he stood up. Placing his hand on her back, he led her over to the viewscreen where his chair was. Beside his own chair, a second chair had been placed, this one colored pink and decorated with little hearts and flowers. "My butler, Nielson, special ordered this chair, just for you! We will be able to watch the movies and cartoons together this way! Come, have seat, tell me if you like it."

Daisy nodded uneasily as she glanced around the room, seeming to think this was all still just a dream, or perhaps a terrible prank where goons would jump out to grab her. Carefully easing herself into the chair, she smiled slightly as the butler and limo driver left the living room, taking her bags up to her own room.

"This chair... is for me?"

She seemed very scared and hesitant, despite her excitement, but Stonewall was a man who was very good with children. Despite his rough looks, he had a major soft spot for them. Best to be patient with her, give her time to get used to her new surroundings.

As she eased into the chair and smiled, the smile turned into a frown as she itched her neck. "Uncle Vasily... before they let me go, they made me put this thing on my neck. Am I a bad girl? Do I have to wear this because I'm bad?"

Vasily noticed for the first time the device on her neck. It was colored brown, the same shade as her hair, and was thus fairly hard to notice at first. The satin collar, while shaped cutely with little soft hilly patterns, looped around behind her neck to where a small device sat unobtrusively. In truth, because her hair was in the way, it was almost impossible to see unless one was looking for it.

Stonewall nodded slightly. It seems they were able to design a portable device. Good.

"No, my dear niece. As you know, you are special girl, with many abilities. Since you cannot control your abilities, you must wear this inhibitor for now. I will have you take it off occasionally, to give you time to adjust to new home. You must learn to control abilities, otherwise you might hurt people. You don't want that, da?"

Daisy shook her head slowly as she reached up and touched the satin choker slightly. It wasn't the greatest thing a small child should be wearing, but in truth it was probably important to prevent certain nervous system signals that activated her abilities.

"No... I don't want to hurt people..."

"Excellent. If you wish to become strong girl that people can rely on, you must learn to be responsible. But, for now, you have had long trip. Let's just eat some food and watch some cartoons, da?"

"Yay!" Her eyes lit up as Stonewall changed the channel to some reruns from an old cartoon. He hadn't seen it before, but it was something about a mouse and a cat that kept whacking each other over the heads with various objects.

Stonewall smiled as the little girl began to giggle at the antics onscreen. This was what he had wanted, for years now. Someone to share his home with. A child, a wife, anyone to make his life less lonely. Leading the world was important, but raising the next generation properly... that was something truly important.

The discovery had been many years ago, but Amy still fought sometimes to contain her excitement. With their Trifrancium reserves gone, they had been forced to make the return trip to Earth at warp 4, much slower than when they had departed. Still, she was happy. This mission was a success.

Finding new planets capable of sustaining life... not the simplest order, but it was something the Galactic Exploration Force had been commissioned to do, and completing the mission on her first try was no mean feat.

"Remind me again... how long until we arrive back in the Terran sector?"

As she asked the question, her first officer sighed. "Two years, three months, fifteen days, captain. The same amount of time as when you asked me a few hours ago."

"S-sorry." Amy blushed, realizing her giddy nature was unique among the bridge crew. The return trip had already taken ten years, though it mattered little when their aging processes had been slowed down so much by the nanobot treatments. The initial excitement for the discovery of Planet "Revival", as they had coined it, had eventually been dampened by the first six months of the return trip.

Still, Amy was unable to contain her excitement, even after all this time. She'd studied the detailed scans and readings many times over. Despite the thick methane in the air, the planet was at the perfect distance from its star, only 0.1AU further than Earth was from its own sun. But since the star was also 5% more luminous, it was a nearly identical match to Earth.

The size of the planet, however, was questionable. 1,500 lightyears from Earth, it was three times bigger than Earth with gravity that would crush an ordinary man into pulp. However, if Judicator were capable of terraforming Mars with whatever crazy powers he had brought back from the future, then surely a planet like this would be a piece of cake.

"Captain, we've been studying the data on Revival, and it seems we may have found deposits of gold and other precious metals a few miles under the surface." Her first officer held his datapad for her up to see as a listing of numbers and percentages scrolled past.

"Excellent. That is very good news." Amy smiled as she turned and started walking out the door. "I'll be in the holodeck training if you need me. You have the command, as usual."

"Yes ma'am."

* * *

A few minutes later, Amy zipped between trees and foliage, blasting at holographic Volgrim as they leaped out and shot her with harmless energy shots that caused a slight stinging sensation wherever they struck.

It had been so long since her days of glory, when she helped fight against the Volgrim invasion of Earth, as humanity successfully blasted the aliens into smithereens. It was lucky such advanced weaponry had been created to combat them too, given how powerful their fleet had been. Humanity was very fortunate indeed, but still, Amy had kept a nagging feeling at bay during her exploration voyage, as she worried about the state of Earth. This far out, a subspace communication would take years, even decades to send back to Earth. It had been so long since they had contact... what if something bad had happened?

No... she couldn't let herself think like that. There was still the Mars colony. And since it was primarily a military planet, it was unlikely to go down as quickly as Earth, if the worst should happen. Several prototype weapons were being developed there, last she had heard. Of course, in fifty+ years, anything could change...

A shot zipped past her head as she tilted to the side, dodging another barrage. Firing her own gun, the enemy that had nearly ruined her perfect score for the day was zapped into an explosion of light. The combat wasn't totally realistic, but it was certainly engaging and fun.

Jorge... she ducked behind a tree as three Volgrim jumped out of the forest ahead, shouting words in their language that she couldn't understand. She hadn't seen her husband in decades. In retrospect, splitting with him so they could both explore the galaxy was a terrible idea, though he would be arriving back home a year or two after she did. Had he found another woman? No... he wasn't that sort of man. He was faithful, as was Amy herself. Given her position as commander, few men had the courage to proposition her, though most who might have done so already knew she was married.

And that was fine. It was easier if she didn't have to turn a good looking guy down, making her feel guilty for a man who wasn't even there.

What sort of Earth would they return to? Would they even recognize it? Had it prospered or had it become stifled over the years? Was it even still there? Without being able to communicate with her commanders back home, she wouldn't know until they were within a few lightyears. There, the subspace beacons would relay its current status.

As she blasted another holographic enemy, she swallowed intently. Whatever came of her arrival back home, it would be another couple years. Hopefully, the time would pass quickly.

Part 310a: New World Order

October 3rd, 2111.

If one listened intently, they might be able to hear the pattering of light footsteps as two cloaked figures rushed through the rain pouring down. Running carefully, they kept an eye out not just for the patrols in the area, but puddles before them as well. Too much noise was likely to alert the wrong people to their presence.

Shimmying into an alleyway, they deftly ran forwards, shifting their weight lightly from the heel to the arch and up to the front of the toe with every step, making sure to cause the least amount of noise possible.

In the encroaching darkness of the setting sun, most would ordinarily be quite hard to see, but these figures were not like normal ones. They were nearly impossible to see, given their special abilities.

The one in the lead halted suddenly, splaying himself against the wall as he heard footsteps approaching the end of the alleyway up ahead. "Enforcers." The one behind stumbled forwards slightly, catching himself as he too slithered up against the wall.

Their hearts pounded madly as four figures marched past, their black garb and neatly pressed uniforms blending in with the night-time. Their helmets, with the glowing red faceplates hid their faces, but allowed them to spot just about anyone in these dark streets.

Anyone, of course, but a pair of shadow-walkers.

One of the Enforcers glanced down the alleyway, missing their presence as he continued to march forwards. He spoke no words to his companions, nor they to he, as professionalism and discipline had been drilled into them for years at the camps where they trained.

As the Enforcers passed, the lead shadow-walker quietly breathed a sigh of relief. "Four of 'em. We wouldn't have stood a chance."

"You said it, Davook." The younger companion trembled with excitement. His first mission, and it was to sabotage an important facility for training their deadliest enemy. Things weren't going so well these days, so skulking about in the dark and using cloak and dagger tactics - literally, in some cases-, was about the only way to fight against the shadowy menace of the humans.

From the end of the alley and up around the corner, they both cringed as one of the Enforcers bellowed at some unknown person. "You there! Curfew is in effect! Return to your home immediately! No second warnings!"

"Shit. And I thought we had it bad." Davook stepped forwards again gingerly. Unlike his younger companion, Torlok, Davook hated this. It was such a bother. Risking his neck just so Satan could play god was exactly the opposite of his idea of a good time. At some point, the losses weren't worth the sacrifice. Satan should have tried to sign a treaty when the deal was still good. That wasn't the case anymore.

"Come on, Davook! Crack a smile. This is fun!" Torlok hissed excitedly at him but Davook shot a vicious glance at his peer.

"Shut up, moron. You want a Dreadnaught to pay us a visit?" He grimaced as his idiot 'friend' (Friend was such a strong word) couldn't seem to grasp the danger they were in. "Hell, the Dreadnaughts aren't even needed. Those Enforcers will take us with no trouble. You don't wanna end up in the Peeler, do ya?"

Torlok's smile vanished in an instant as mortal fear spread over his face. "N-no... not the Peeler..."

"Good. Shut your trap. Dumbass."

Running forwards again, they arrived at the end of the alley. Davook stole a peek in the direction the Enforcers had marched off to. He cringed as one of them slammed the butt of an energy rifle into some poor fellow's back. He yelled something, but was too far away to hear.

"Cripes. No compassion for their fellow man at all. He could just shoot him with that rifle. Won't hurt a normal human anyway." Davook grumbled quietly as he shook his head, the two of them dashing across the street when the Enforcers weren't looking.

It took them a few more minutes, but eventually they arrived a couple blocks from the local Insurrection Suppression Agency. Supreme Commander Stonewall had installed several in every major city, and at least one in every decently sized town around the world. As a building, it was nothing special, but the underground sections were always used for training of the highly classed metahumans.

"I got the charges, Davook. Where you want me to put 'em?"

The younger demon grinned with glee as he licked his lips. Revenge. Killing the meatbags was always a joy, even if he couldn't peel their flesh off himself, blowing them to kingdom come was a fine alternative.

Davook groaned quietly. "I know you have them, stupid. Gimme four. I'll head to the west side of the building, you go East. Watch your back newbie, I won't be there to cover y- wait."

He paused and ducked back into the alley. "Damn. They set up a checkpoint down the street. They've got clear line of sight right where we've gotta run. This won't work."

A few hundred feet away, a line of people was being searched and prodded, as low level Enforcers wearing green searched their bags for various paraphernalia. Of course, allegedly the search was to confirm they weren't demons, but really everyone knew it was just a way to try and catch ordinary lawbreakers.

Torlok peeked around the corner before pulling back again quickly. "Pssh, those are greens. We could take 'em."

"Of course we could, but the main headquarter is right there. For the love of the devil, you're gonna get me killed one of these days." Davook ground his teeth together. Naturally, greens would pose no serious threat, as they were primarily for civilian enforcement, but there might be yellows and reds inside. Having just passed some blacks, he felt very nervous. They were the most elite of all Enforcers, and were not generally assigned to street-level patrols. Did they perhaps know something was up? Maybe a tip-off?

Davook paused to look around for a moment. No Observer drones overhead, despite being in such a high security area. Normally he'd consider it a lucky chance, but something about this whole situation unnerved him.

"I'm gonna... I'm gonna make a distraction. Stay here and get ready to rush across the street when they look away. You're going to have to plant all the charges, new guy."

Torlok nodded quietly. "Sure thing. You're the boss, boss!"

"Course I am, idiot. Not that I wanted the job." Davook shot another glance to both sides as he coiled his legs beneath him. In the blink of an eye, he jumped upwards three stories, gauging the distance perfectly as he smoothly landed on the roof of the residential complex. Zipping forwards, he jumped from rooftop to rooftop, keeping his attention split between the skies and the streets. As dangerous as Enforcers were, it was the damn Observers that worried him. With this rain and fog cover, visibility was poor, but one could never be too sure when it came to technology invented by humans. And if he was spotted, a single Observer could call in the whole goddamn military if they smelled demon blood.

After jumping over three alleys, he arrived at the building overlooking the checkpoint. Reaching into his cloak, he pulled out a small firecracker.

From below him, a woman spoke with frustration in her voice. "Please, sir! I live on this block! I didn't mean to forget my ID, but there was no checkpoint earlier today! This isn't fair!"

"Whose fault is that?" A gruff voiced male Enforcer towered over her as he chuckled intimidatingly. "You think I care? Johnson, take her away. A night in the cage will give us time to sort out her identity, whatever it is."

Another Enforcer wordlessly walked over, grabbing the woman by the arm silently, ignoring her protests. "You can't do this to me! My father works for the water and plumbing district! I'm higher level than you! I'm-"

Before she could say another word, the tall Enforcer reached out and slapped her violently, knocking a pair of glasses off her face. "Shut the hell up! This line is a hundred people deep, I don't have time for some stupid bimbo who can't remember her ID! Next!"

As she was led away, she sobbed as she rubbed her face with the arm not being firmly held by the Enforcer named Johnson.

Davook grimaced at the display, but it wasn't his place to interfere. It was likely anyway that in the end, it would end up being a small inconvenience and she'd learn her lesson. One night of discomfort and they'd let her go in the morning.

It's not like he wanted to interfere with meatbag problems anyway. Lighting the firecracker in his hand, he quickly tossed it another street down into an open garbage can, as he started racing back to jump across the allies again. As the loud bangs were heard in the distance, several people screamed. "Terrorists!"

The downside was that this would significantly heighten the alert level in the area. Still, it would only take them a minute or two to drop the charges. Their detonator was wireless, based on magic. So unless they were caught and a nullifier were used on them, either one of them could trigger it when they were done.

Within seconds of everyone looking over at the alleyway to try and figure out what the small explosions had been, Davook and Torvok had already raced across the street to the ISA's back wall. Flicking his eyes around as they started tossing down the charges, he felt his heart slamming in his chest.

"No cameras?" Torvok was also uneasy. "In the heart of London?"

"Something just ain't right." Davook would have ordinarily told the other moron to shut up, but he had a point for once. What ISA building wouldn't have cameras on every corner? The cameras wouldn't be a problem, even if they had infrared detection, but only an idiot would leave such an important building without any surveillance. Unless it was a trap, of course.

As they placed the C4-styled bombs down, Davook froze as he heard voices approaching from around the corner, the opposite direction from the checkpoint. The voices were speaking quietly, too quietly, and the footsteps were inaudible. Who would be trying to walk so quietly at this time of night?

He quickly grabbed Torvok's arm, who had not yet heard them. Torvok's hearing must have not been quite as sharp as Davook's, because he jerked his head up and looked at Davook questioningly. Davook pressed a finger to his lips, beckoning a thumb in the direction he had heard the voices approaching from. The two of them nodded at each other and quickly activated their full shadow-walking abilities as they jumped forwards to another nearby alleyway, their activated abilities increasing their stealth to unprecedented levels.

Of course, it took much more magical energy, going from half to full shadow-walking power, but it was necessary in this time of crisis. Stealing a glance back as they jerked around the alley, Davook blinked twice as three Enforcers quickly sprinted around the corner, aiming their guns at foes that were no longer there.

He started to continue moving, but then did a double take as something caught his eye. Two of the Enforcers were wearing black. Black level Enforcers were the highest ranked of all the colors, possessing very strong abilities unlike those of their comrades. However, there was a smaller, thinner Enforcer leading the two of them. He wore a white uniform, a color Davook had never seen before.

As Davook had that thought, the one in white spoke up. "They're gone. I know I sensed them."

He pulled his head back around the corner as his breathing slowed to a crawl. That voice... the white Enforcer was a female. What the hell? Females couldn't be Enforcers. Everyone knew that.

"We're aborting the mission. They'll see the charges in seconds. Let's go." Davook cursed as he and his friend quickly fled the scene, ducking into a manhole as they silently lifted, climbed in, and replaced the cover in moments.

A female Enforcer... this was new. They may have failed the mission, but sometimes intel was more useful than outright destruction. Perhaps they wouldn't get the shit beat out of them when Satan heard about the failure.

Daisy felt her heart pause, as she glanced down and saw several small devices at the base of the building. Normally she wouldn't have seen them, but as her father had taught her, anywhere a demon goes, death was sure to follow. "Bombs. There's bombs here. Stand back, I'll render them inert." She shot her hand forwards, as the bomb disappeared, sucked into a place it would never be able to cause any damage. This ability consumed a lot of energy and it only worked on small objects, but it was perfect for this sort of thing. "Luckily, you had me here."

The two men nodded silently as she quickly moved around the building, putting each device inside the special place she had learned about several years before. She wasn't sure where she sent them, but it was not anywhere on Earth. She couldn't go there, but the place was creepy enough that she'd never want to.

She panted slightly as she popped open her visor to wipe her face down. She was a beautiful young girl, having just turned seventeen this year. Next year she'd be old enough to legally smoke and drink, not that she wanted that. Her uncle did more than enough for the both of them.

As she wiped the sweat off, she closed her faceplate up again. "What's going on with that checkpoint?" Her soft and beautiful feminine voice would usually be enough to activate any man's primal urges, but she spoke with such a plainness, derived from her uncle over the years, that despite all of her beauty and her lilting voice, she came off as more of a tomboy than anything else.

"Someone dropped some fireworks in a dumpster. Gave the locals a fright. Probably those two you sensed, princess."

The black level Enforcer snickered slightly inside his suit. So this was the supposed White level Enforcer, the most powerful of all the candidates? Ridiculous. She was just a little girl. A cutie too, but a little girl nonetheless. Even if she were Stonewall's daughter or whatever, he wasn't intimidated. Just a little kid who got her authority from her daddy. Stupid little girls like her needed to be put in their place once in a while.

Daisy didn't miss the slight though. "Don't call me 'Princess'. I'll have your rank stripped for insubordination."

"Of course." His tone indicated he didn't buy it.

Daisy turned to face him. In the blink of an eye, she quickly read his mind, her telepathy having become far more seasoned over the years as her uncle had trained her to be a spy that few knew about, allowing him to dig up dirt on political enemies and other such persons. "Douglas Green, was it? What an interesting name. How would you like to be dropped to green rank, mister Green?"

The man frowned as he flicked his eyes over to his pal, Eddie. Eddie wasn't about to give him any help. He turned his gaze back to the little girl in front of him. "Telepathy and some weird vanishing power, huh? Dual abilities are pretty rare, even for a black level Enforcer. Maybe I was wrong about you."

"That's cute. You only have one ability. No matter how strong it is, you're no match for me. Especially now that I know exactly how it works." Daisy popped open her faceplate as she smiled a sickeningly sweet grin at the man who towered a foot above her. "Tell you what, I'm a good girl. I'll give you three options. You can beg for forgiveness right now, you can have your rank stripped, or you can fight me. If you fight me and win, you keep your rank. No, in fact, I'll make sure you're promoted to head of this department. But if you lose, you'll be sent to the Peeler. So, what will it be?"

Douglas frowned at the tiny little girl who was so incredibly deserving of a punch to the face. "I don't care who your daddy is, sweetheart. I worked for years to get where I am. I ain't gonna apologize for anything."

"I expected that much. You big burly men are so predictable." Daisy took a few dainty steps back as she smiled. "A fight it is, then! I'm pretty pissed we lost those demons, so I hope you won't mind if I take some anger out on you?"

Douglas gritted his teeth as he clenched his fist. This little bitch. "I'm a gentleman, girly. I'll let you have the first shot. Try to make it a little harder than a stiff breeze. Not like it matters anyway." He smiled, as he readied himself for whatever she'd throw at him. It's not like she can break through my defenses. That's why my codename is Defender. I'm invincible against any attack.

Daisy's smile turned slightly crooked as an odd glint appeared in her eye. "All righty! It's your funeral, I suppose." I'm so glad he has that ability. He'll really be able to take a lot of abuse. I need to work out this kink in my neck somehow.

Eddie glanced back and forth between the two of them uneasily. Discreetly, he took several steps back. He wanted to be no part of this engagement.

Amy and Jorge shivered as they glanced out their window at the local ISA. The heater had been broken for a week and the electricity on this block was shoddy. Spending all the country's money on the war effort instead of rebuilding infrastructure had that effect. The viewscreen on the wall displayed several reports on the number of victims of the demons, who had been steadily increasing as of late. Too many attacks, if you ask me. Amy turned and smiled as her daughter walked into the room.

"Mommy, I want a bedtime story."

Amy nodded quietly. "Alright, baby. I'll be there in a minute, okay?"

Amy nearly jumped in fright as a horrific scream could be heard in the distance. It sounded like a man was having his hand smashed with a hammer, over and over again. Repeating every few seconds, his wail of agony sent shivers down her spine.

Without waiting to be asked, Jorge quickly got up and closed the window. "Christ, what the hell is going on out there?"

Amy shook her head as she got up and walked over to her daughter. "Don't worry about it. We live next door to the ISA. This is probably one of the safest places in all of London. I'm going to go read Sarah a story."

Jorge glanced out the window in the direction of the sound, his stomach flip-flopped as he saw a sight no person would want to see. "Y-yeah. You go do that. I'll be... I'll be... back in bed in a bit."

He cringed as the poor man was brutalized over and over, his horrific wailing muted only somewhat by the closed window. Blinking quickly, he quickly got up and walked over to the viewscreen, turning the volume up to drown out the sounds from outside.

The News personality, John Locke, announced the local news as always. "Yesterday, in Bahrain, several demons were captured by the forces of our glorious leader, Supreme Commander Stonewall. Their failed guerilla attack is proof that our security measures have proven to be quite effective at slowing them down, even stopping them in many cases. Sources close to the Supreme Commander indicate that he is preparing for an assault on their headquarters, located in a secured part of the Displacement Zone in North America. Should this attack be successful, it will go far in preventing their spread, even beginning to reduce the numbers they are able to send at us. Several Department of National Security sources have indicated that several hundred billion of these demons exist, meaning until we can find a way to effectively eliminate them in large numbers, the lockdown in our cities will continue for an unknown time into the future. Now for Tammy with a special radiation report. Tammy?"

"Thanks, John. Sources inside the Bureau of Environmentalism indicate that the fallout from the 7/18 nuclear bombing last year is being successfully contained. While Wales may not be inhabitable for another hundred years or so, the brutal attack has reminded us of why we fight to bring an end to the existence of the demons. The fallout is no longer expected, at the least, to drift over towards Dublin as the authorities have put a lot of focus on weather control in that area. Due to this, the evacuation order has been cancelled."

Jorge rubbed his lip quietly, as he realized the horrible screams outside his window had finally stopped. Thank god, I couldn't stand to listen to that for a moment longer. He shook his head as he turned off the viewscreen and headed towards Sarah's bedroom. Pausing at the doorway, he listened as his wife read Sarah her favorite bedtime story, The Secret Garden.

He lingered in the doorway for several minutes, listening, until Amy's voice slowed to a crawl. Sarah had fallen asleep faster than usual. Carefully, Amy got up and walked over to the doorway, the lights in the room fading out as she exited.

The two of them walked silently to their bedroom, closing the door to where only a crack remained. As she pulled off her shirt and pants and crawled into bed, he followed suit as the two of them snuggled up to each other.

Neither were in the mood for anything particularly frisky tonight. The air, lately, had been dreadful. There was something about the city these days that didn't lend itself to romance or anything sweet like that. Amy sighed.

"What happened out there?"

Jorge swallowed as he remembered the scene he had glimpsed. "Nothing good. Looks like some Enforcers had a personal dispute."

"They're fighting among themselves now? Gods, when will it end?"

"I don't know." He reached up and scratched his nose as Amy wrapped her arms around him from behind, pressing herself against his tanned body. "Maybe we should homeschool Sarah. Everyone's doing it, these days. All the materials are available on the Holo-net. Safer than having her walk or take a bus, and it's not like my hazard pay is going to wear out anytime soon."

Amy nodded slowly. "I've been thinking about that myself. Should I re-enlist? Maybe in a couple years? I still have pull with the right people."

Jorge creased his brow. "I don't know. Maybe we should find some work in the civilian sector. Do you really want to work for... for that man?"

Amy sighed. "He's not all bad, you know. It seems dire, but you've seen the reports. They look like us. Would you rather let them into the city to bomb us again? These measures are important."

"It's chaos out there. Nobody knows what the hell they're doing." Jorge pressed his face into his pillow as he felt his wife's gaze on his back. "They're just a bunch of strongmen playing the goons for a man who thinks himself a dictator."

"Come on, that's not fair. The last major attack nearly hit us, you know. Another hundred miles to the east and we wouldn't be here. What do you expect him to do with that kind of threat?"

Jorge stayed silent for a few moments as he mulled it over. "...Yeah. Maybe you're right. I dunno." His gravelly voice choked up as he thought about the man outside. Was this legal, now? Street brawls? This could hardly be called acceptable. If civilization wasn't kept intact, what was the point? Turning into barbarians just to try and stave off monsters was hardly the ideal solution.

"Maybe. Who knows? The only thing I know is how much I love you." Amy smiled as she pressed herself upwards to kiss the back of his neck.

Jorge smirked. "You always get your way. But not this time. I'm taking the lead tonight." He flipped himself over and pressed his chest against hers aggressively, as she leaned her head back.

"Oh? Well, don't keep me in suspense."

As it turned out, perhaps there was in fact room for romance in this tortured metropolis.

Part 311a:

Space. The final frontier.

These are the voyages of the starship... uh... Mothership. That sounds rather clunky, now that I think about it. Maybe the Mothership starship? The Mothership Enterprise? No, that would be silly.

Our continuing mission: To explore strange new worlds, to seek out new life and new civilizations. (I mean, Umi has already informed me there's no other life in this galaxy than Earth and Volgarius, but a man can dream I suppose.) And uh also TO BOLDLY GO WHERE NO MAN HAS GONE BEFORE!

Alright, not really. It's more like a sightseeing tour while I also sort of look for new worlds I might make habitable for humanity, should the worst happen... but that really doesn't matter, I guess. Exploring the galaxy has been much more fun than constantly fighting or trying to save the universe.

Over the last decade, Amelia, Harold, Helen and I have been to many interesting places... we've seen a lot of things. Being able to manufacture Trifrancium means I can travel around the galaxy at ridiculous speeds. Making enough for an entire fleet takes far too long, but for a single ship, it's a simple enough process. At warp 9, it takes only a day and a half to travel 14,000 light-years to Volgarius' previous location, and I can easily replenish my Trifrancium reserves faster than my ship can use them up.

Because the majority of my clones are either on this ship or in the special dimension I created a few years ago, only a dozen or so are left to monitor activities on Earth. The special clone, Agent X, has been sending me a lot of troubling news lately. Sadly, this has cut my extended vacation short and we're on our way back to Earth now.

My thoughts are interrupted by Amelia as she meanders into view.

"What are you up to?"

Her question is less out of interest, more because she seems to hang around me a lot nowadays. I'm not sure if it's because of boredom or something else, but I have no reasons to complain.

I peek over and take in her figure. She's aged a few more years, visibly speaking, and looks to be in her very early 20's. The aging process for her is slower than a normal human, but very visible. She doesn't look like a child anymore... actually, if I'm being honest, she's incredibly attractive. I have to keep my guard up around her, since Arthur constantly nags me about how dangerous she is... but I'm beginning to wonder about that. She hasn't done a single bad thing in almost twenty years. Hell, she's performed less evil acts than I have, given I destroyed an entire goddamn planet.

"I'm just looking at some reports Agent X sent me. Look at this... they've instated a curfew." I slide some papers over to her. Lately, I've started using physical paper, since it can't be intercepted like data can. Earth's technological parity with Volgarius, pre-destruction, is leaping upwards at an incredible rate.

Amelia slides into a chair, leaning over the table as her hair spills from behind her over her shoulders. It's so long now, at least three feet. It was always somewhat long in the past, but now it seems to gain a few inches every year. I once asked if she'd like to cut it and she seemed horrified at the thought.

As she glances at the paper, she shrugs. "What's a curfew?"

"Ah, right. It's a word that means you have to be in bed at a certain time, or in the case of the government, it means all citizens must be indoors by a certain hour. Usually, if they're not, they get thrown in jail or punished in some other way."

Amelia frowns. "That sounds pretty bad. Are you going to take over, then? Is it time to remove him from power?"

Amelia's voice is deeper than it used to be, and her childlike excitable nature has taken a backseat to a more mature, analytical style. She used to be very quick to rush to judgement, but now she seems calm, cool, and collected. This is further evidenced by how seriously she takes any competition, including something insignificant, like an occasional game of chess. Actually, I keep losing to her, lately.

"No. It's not my place. Besides, as far as I can tell, despite the harsh conditions the humans are living under, this all seems to be done with positive intentions. The demons dropped a nuclear bomb on a major city close to humanity's capital. That's alarming. If the demons really have set up forward bases on Earth, and especially over where the United States of America used to be, there's very likely to be several such nuclear weapons in that place. He's right to be cautious... I would be too."

Amelia continues reading through the report, setting it aside a few moments later as a look of boredom passes over her face. "What is the meaning of life?"

I feel my eye twitch at the random change of topic. "Uh, come again?"

"I've been thinking about it a lot, lately. I'm immortal, you're immortal, demons are immortal, angels are mostly immortal, gods are immortal, and the Volgrim were also immortal. Only humans, until the discovery of nanobots, weren't immortal. But..." Amelia's forehead creases in a sort of adorable manner. "...I've been talking with mother, and she says that it's best not to worry about the future. When I do think about it, it makes me kind of... scared. We might live to see the end of the universe, you know?"

"Maybe. Then again, who knows. A star might explode and kill us or something. Anything can happen in this timeline."

I feel my smile falter as I say those words. Did I really just say that? Yeah, I did. I killed her, with a supernova. Or rather, I didn't, but Hoarhiim did. Still, I feel like it was my fault somehow, and yet here I am joking about it.

"Sorry." I apologize for some reason, the word slipping out before I can stop it.

Her smile slips away as well. "Why are you apologizing?"

"Nothing. It's not important."

She and I stare awkwardly at each other for a moment before I break eye contact and stare off to the side. Shit, I'm feeling guilty. I killed the her that murdered an entire planet. She was evil, then. She's not evil right now... so long as repentance is a thing. If one can atone for their sins, then they should be judged based on their current actions.

"Jason. There's something you're not telling me, isn't there?" Amelia's oddly perceptive mind these days comes back to bite me.

I shift uneasily in my seat. "There's a lot I haven't told you, won't tell you, and simply can't tell you. Not just you, but nobody else in the universe right now. I have to bear that burden alone."

Amelia nods slowly, as the amiable atmosphere from earlier is all but gone now. "All right. I'll be in the training room. If you want, you can come join me in a bit."

I nod at her and smile weakly. "Yeah, I'll be there soon. I just need to get in contact with Agent X first."

Amelia leaves the room, and now I'm alone with my thoughts.

All alone, just like I was when this all started. What do I do next?

Dosena sighed as the last beam was finally soldered together. This was the final step to completing the frame of the new recreational area. Frankly, none of the Volgrim here had any desire to have 'fun', but one of Jason's clones had suggested that it would be better than simply mulling around and doing nothing.

What did he expect though? She had no goal anymore. Unarin had always been the one to lead the Volgrim to new destinations, to expand their borders, to make sure they had something to strive for.

How long had it been? Dosena had lost track of time here. The days seemed longer than the ones on Volgarius. The star that had been created was much yellower than the one she had lived under for millions of orbital cycles. This one was likely based off the star that warmed Jason's homeworld. It functioned, of course, but it just wasn't right.

Leaving this place was impossible. Several times, she had debated killing the clone that monitored this zone, but the gesture would be fruitless. Jason could just summon another, and she still wouldn't be able to escape. She knew little about how his abilities worked, only that a being like him who could create an entire world inside of a totally different dimension was not bound by the laws of physics that she knew.

However, there was something going on. For a long time now, the clone here had been... uncomfortable. It wasn't like he would simply start fearing her fellow Volgrim from out of nowhere, but every time he looked into her eyes, she was able to sense a vague feeling of... guilt? Sadness? She wasn't very adept at understanding the subtle nuances of human emotions, but there was something under the surface.

Just as he could not read her mind, however, she could not read his. It hadn't always been this way. When she first met the original, so far in the past, reading his mind had been as easy as plucking a plant out of the ground. His incredible abilities had somehow allowed him to block her out effortlessly. She didn't know how he did it, but she did know his mental barriers never faltered. Even in sleep, she had to focus her mind to prevent intrusion, but he had no such issues. His defense was impenetrable.

Dosena sighed, as she lifted the steel beam up into the air with her telekinetic power. Setting it in place, she held it there while the other Volgrim rushed around, making sure it was bolted and soldered into place perfectly. The instruments they used were primitive and crude, but effective in practice.

Finally, she wandered back to her living quarters. If they needed her again, they would let her know.

"We'll be lucky to make it another hundred years, at this rate." Zeus and the archangel Gabriel stood atop a skyscraper that had been recently constructed in the heart of London. It was supposed to be one of the ten biggest buildings in the world, now that most of the other ones had been destroyed by various causes over the last hundred years. When one explained it in that way, however, it simply made the building seem far less impressive, given it was only a hundred stories tall.

Gabriel shook his head sadly. "The humans deny our help at every opportunity. They're shunning us. The only people who give us any spiritual energy are those in the Church of Retribution. They seem to believe that we are agents of the Creator, sent to wipe out all unbelievers, as well as the demons."

Zeus groaned as he rubbed his temples. "A crazy fanatical cult. Is this really all that's left of the once almighty Christian and Arabic empires? Even Hinduism, Taoism, and all the other Eastern religions are dead. Humans used to always gravitate towards religion in times of crisis. What changed?"

"You've got it all wrong. Humans weren't looking for religion, they simply wanted something secure they could put their faith in." A voice rang out from behind Zeus and Gabriel, as the two of them spun around in alarm.

"Satan?! What are you doing here?" Gabriel clenched his fists together as he stared down the intimidating devil that stood before him. Alongside Satan, a female succubus stood, her body and curves making even a hardened archangel like himself feel slightly intoxicated.

"Zeus, Gabriel. A pleasure. It's been so long since we had a little chat."

Zeus glared at the devil. "Why are you here? Come to pick a fight? The humans are at least partially still on our side, and I doubt even you can stand up to their war machines. If we make a commotion, they'll be upon us in minutes."

Belial sighed as she rolled her eyes. "Calm down, Captain Sparkles. If we wanted a fight, we'd have brought along more than just Satan and little ol' me, don't you think?"

Zeus reflexively flexed his fist as he eyeballed the sultry femme fatale. He could tell in a glance that she was more than a pretty face. Those small arms and lithe limbs held many secrets, and she was surely an accomplished fighter, based on the aura she exuded. Best not to underestimate her.

"A talk, is it? What could you possibly have to say that I'd want to hear?"

Satan flicked his gaze out and over the edge of the skyscraper, to the city below. This high up, its sounds were muted, but at least somewhat audible. It was a city in distress. Red and blue lights lit up the night, far below them, as the sound of sirens could be heard from all over.

"Things really aren't going well for you, are they? They aren't going well for me, either." Satan licked his lips suggestively as he held frame against that of the King of Gods.

"Heh, so I've heard." Gabriel let a small smile slip as he chuckled quietly. "It seems the humans are taking you out with ease now, as I always knew they would. I didn't think they would reduce you to such a pitiful state, but clearly you haven't been holding out quite so well."

"That's cute. Admit it, we're both in dire straits. If the humans kept their current technology levels, my people would be able to hold out for another millennium or so, but that isn't going to happen. Instead, they're going to keep improving and killing more and more of us with improved efficiency. And then for yourself, you need a constant supply of spiritual energy. Since you're losing energy much faster than you can replace it, you're going to start losing angels left and right." Satan leaned forwards slightly as a smile spread across his face. "That is, if you haven't already."

Zeus's eye twitched. "I am aware of both our situations. I don't need you to remind me... foul creature. Get on with it. Why are you here?"

Satan put on a mock expression of indignity. "I can't believe you would insult me so! Why, I always thought of the two of us as friends! Surely you don't continue to hold any dislike towards me for silly actions that happened in our past?"

Gabriel sneered. "Cut the jokes."

His face falling back to a neutral expression, Satan breathed in sharply. "Fine. I have a proposition. I hate you, and you hate me, we both agree on that. However, if this continues, both of us will watch helplessly as all of our kind die under the tyranny of the humans. The humans may not be your enemy now, but you and I both can see a shift coming. They've already started shunning you. Once they eliminate my kind, they will turn towards you next. Unlike the demons, you're already greatly weakening due to lack of spiritual energy. Your current position is... how should I say it... tenuous, at best."

Satan snickered to himself. "Hehe, I just had a funny thought. I so desperately want to get revenge on you, but if you don't choose to work with me, I will likely at least die knowing that you'll be next. At least that thought will be a comforting one in my final moments."

Gabriel stifled himself from showing any outward emotions. "As if. Everyone here knows that if it came down to that, you'd merely create a small dimension where the humans couldn't find you and you'd simply go into hiding, the lives of your own kind be damned. You care nothing for their lives, despite your outward pretensions."

Satan immediately snapped his eyes over to the archangel as a sneer formed on his lips. "How dare you. You've no room to talk yourself. You couldn't care less about a single one of the angels born from your pet project. At best, you might care about the other archangels and some of the higher ranked gods, but you are a hypocrite in every meaning of the word. You-"

Belial cut him off quickly. "Calm down, my love. We're not here for that. Remember why we came here?"

Satan seethed for a moment before he swallowed and spoke again, more carefully this time. "Right. Here's my proposal. I'm not saying that we need to work together, but I have a solution that will benefit the both of us, and it's regarding that cult you mentioned before."

Gabriel and Zeus both narrowed their eyes simultaneously. Zeus pursed his lips as he realized the reason the demon might have come here. "Go on. I'm listening."

Part 312a:

If he were being totally honest, Ben would tell anyone who asked that the Hypersuits were by far the pinnacle of war perfection. Coupled with the Dartfighters, humanity had created two weapons that were indestructible and highly destructive.

But, given that Stonewall had chosen to oust Jason from his position as humanity's divine protector, these new war-machines, the Micro-Dreadnaughts, had to take up the slack. And really, they were powerful in their own right.

As his company pressed down the halls of the labyrinth, he checked his energy scanner. Several blips had been visible for a few minutes now, and judging by the distance, a couple more turns would bring them into view.

Really though, if the demons couldn't hear the humans coming, they weren't trying. The Micro-Dreadnaughts, despite the name, were quite massive. They barely even fit into the hallways of the labyrinth, and the lone Micro-Dreadnaught he had received authorization to bring along for this mission scraped the walls loudly, even as its massive bipedal frame stomped along, each step sounding like a sledgehammer smashing into concrete.

Certainly, the Hypersuits were a more efficient, sleeker weapon of mass murder... but the Micro-Dreadnaughts just felt better. One could hardly blame the demons if they were quaking in their boots as they heard the rumbling in the deep.

"Exalt, we're reaching the red zone. We've just now crossed the two mile mark back to the portal. If this goes south, it's going to be a long run back."

Ben nodded at the young girl who had just spoken. Despite her youthful appearance, she was a seasoned fighter, and one he knew personally.

"I'm not worried about that, Daisy. As long as you get out, the worst effect will be nullified. You've got enough energy, right?"

She nodded quietly as another corner became visible up ahead, though it was hard to see given the massive frame of the construct was impeding their view. "Yes. Getting to the portal should be easy. If I'm correct, I might even have enough energy to bring you with m-"

"That's not necessary. You're the Supreme Commander's daughter, your life comes first. Understand?" Ben coughed suddenly as a rasp appeared in his throat. The nano-cancer wasn't improving, these days. The side effects were quite unpleasant. "If your father finds out that you died because you ran out of energy sending me back, he'll skin me alive anyway. I can handle myself, don't you worry."

Daisy smiled slightly, as the Micro-Dreadnaught suddenly came to a stop up ahead. "HOSTILES SIGHTED. ENGAGING NOW."

In the blink of an eye, the massive machine leveled a two-ton energy cannon at several small imps who squealed in fright. Before they had a chance to react, the lumbering behemoth fired a blast of anti-energy, searing their bodies at the atomic level. Swiveling slightly, the Dreadnaught aimed its single red 'eye' towards a flash of movement in front of it. "SHADOW-WALKERS. ANTI-STEALTH PULSE ACTIVATING NOW."

A small pulse of energy erupted from every crevasse of the machine, as it surged outwards at half the speed of sound, creating a deep WUMP as it impacted the walls and the people behind it. Four shadow-walkers stumbled and fell as the pulse of anti-energy, as weak as it was, caused mental feedback. Used mainly as a method of mass-stunning several medium to weak enemies, this particular technique was especially effective against those who were already channeling large amounts of energy to a specific spell... such as a shadow-walker.

They stumbled around dumbly as they tried to shake off the effects of the pulse, but it was too late for them. The lumbering juggernaut fired twice in succession, each shot wiping the energy from their bodies, causing a dissolving effect on their bodies as they vanished from existence.

It had been just under fifteen seconds, and the death machine had already killed a dozen demons. Ben stumbled back to his feet, realizing with a start that Daisy was laying on the ground, holding her head and moaning. "Shit, you all right sweetheart? Fuck, your dad's going to kill me."

Daisy mumbled something incoherent, as she shook her head and words managed to form themselves in her mind once again. "I-I'm fine. I just wasn't ready for that. I thought we programmed these machines to give a little more warning before they blew off a pulse like that. Good way to hit our own forces."

The machine continued to lumber forwards as Ben gave her a hand up, pulling her to her feet. "We did, but shadow-walkers are extremely dangerous. They can kill ten men in the blink of an eye before we know they're even there. They are the lone exception."

Ben shot a glance back, as several of his red level enforcers were also climbing up to their feet, checking each other for mental feedback and whatnot. "That being said, maybe we can program an exception for when we're inside the labyrinth. Not like those walkers had a way of getting past the Dreadnaught in these close hallways."

"Yeah, do that." Daisy quickly walked back to help one enforcer in particular, who had just vomited. "You there! Are you alright? Do you need medical attention?"

The man fought mightily but tears erupted from his eyes as he struggled to speak. Daisy nodded quickly as she placed her hand on the back of his head. "Don't worry, I'll get you. Everyone else, go on ahead. I'll keep a small contingent here. We'll catch up shortly."

Ben started to object, but he paused, seeing who that particular enforcer was. "Agent Dawson? He's a stealth-class, very promising ability he's got, too. Alright, you can hold back. We'll press forwards, but catch up quickly. It's incredibly dangerous here."

Daisy nodded as she continued to send healing pulses through the man's brain.

Ben and the rest continued forwards, leaving Daisy and a dozen Enforcers behind as they pressed forwards.

Ben glowered as he stomped away. Damn, I hope I don't regret this.

"When the light shines down from the skies above... that will be the moment! The moment of truth! Only the true believers will be saved on that fateful day! We cannot allow ourselves to be blinded by feelings of nostalgia, or to be complacent! If you have family, or friends, they will not be saved unless they preach the news of Retribution!"

Preacher Clarence yelled mightily as his congregation looked on in awe. "Think, everyone, about the lives of your children! The lives of your sons and daughters! Do you want to see them die? Of course not. Behold! God has given us a way out, a way to survive the apocalypse! When he delivers his divine punishment upon the demons, and the warmongers, and those who have taken the elixir of the nanobot, and the homosexuals, fear not! For we are not vile like the sinners, we are not tainted by their actions! Pray daily, beg him for forgiveness of your sins! Be proud of your clean, wholesome heritage! Bow down to no man, and follow no other gods, for He will see, and He will know you!"

The congregation clapped loudly, several of the younger members up front grinning madly as they exchanged knowing looks with one another.

The First Church of the Retribution had been established nearly a decade ago by this very man speaking. Preacher Clarence was a man, who, as he had preached about on many occasions, had spoken with an angel himself. None could verify his claims, of course, but everyone had seen the angels with their own eyes. His story must be true.

Born from a single mother household, Clarence had lived on the streets after his mother had committed suicide, fending for himself from age 10 and onwards. Drugs, sex, and even violence had been the mark of his life. Clearly, for a man as vile as he, to make such a dramatic transformation... it could only be caused by something from on high... or so went the rumors, anyway.

Clarence paused for a moment to sip water from a glass that had been specially custom made by one of his congregational members. It was a gaudy thing, with the pattern of an angel that had her outstretched arms make a circle for him to hold onto it with, and the backside of the cup had two wings sprouting outwards. Really, it was such an ugly thing, but given the member of the church was still in attendance and donated quite a hefty amount daily to their coffers... he didn't mind playing along.

Clarence wiped his brow with a towel that he had set on his podium. It was an easy job, speaking once a day for a mere hour at a time, and the fools ate up everything he said as if he was the mouth of god himself. Still, he appreciated their patronage, and all too often they were happy to donate extra when he spoke of 'administrative fees' and 'crushing debt' incurred by the central authorities. Actually, no such happenings ever occurred, as they cared little for his microcosm of a cult, but it didn't hurt him to lie. Just a little.

He returned to his position at the front of the stage, his hands trembling. "I... I had a vision last night. A vision of the Archangel Michael! He spoke to me in... in a dream! He spoke of the Great Retribution! A calamity from the sky that will wipe out all evil on Earth! A terrible catastrophe that will-!"

As he droned on, the front door flew open, causing him to pause mid-sentence. The audience turned back to look.

An old man stood, slowly ambling forwards as he leaned on a heavily gnarled cane.

"Oh, I'm sorry, did I interrupt anything, father?" The old man smiled kindly.

Clarence felt something odd, deep inside his heart. This old man was not one he had seen before. Best to give him a gracious welcome.

"Not at all! Welcome, sir! We love the elderly here, so wise and insightful they are! Why have you come to visit our church on this blessed day, good sir?"

The old man shrugged lightly, as he continued to slowly amble towards the front. "Oh, no reason, really. I heard there was one last man of god in this world, one who understood the old ways. I've come to see if he's the man everyone speaks of."

"I certainly should hope so!" Clarence quickly moved forwards towards the old man. "I am he. Father Clarence is my name. And you, what might yours be?"

The old man cocked an eyebrow knowingly. "I have been known by many names over my long life. But you might know me best by my contemporary name. I am Raphael, second Archangel of Heaven!"

In the blink of an eye, the old man dropped his cane to his side as light began to shine from his body. His clothing trembled slightly, as a massive set of wings sprouted out, exploding to the sides, ten feet in both directions.

One of the teenagers in the audience quickly tapped his holowatch as he aimed it at the spectacle before him. Normally, this place of worship would not allow such unclean technology, but his parents were too transfixed by the sight before them, they failed to notice him recording this.

"I have come from Heaven itself to give you my blessing! We have judged you and determined you to be most holy! Continue telling people of our work, and your reward will be most eternal indeed!"

Clarence felt his lip tremble. Son of a bitch. An angel actually came here? I just made all this crap up, but I was right?

He started to speak, but Sister Margaret, a very old woman in the seats up front, grabbed her chest as she struggled to breathe. Collapsing down, she fell to the ground wheezing.

"Heart attack! She's having a heart attack!" A young man sitting a row down leaped to his feet and ran over to her, but he was blocked by Raphael, who had moved to her side in an instant.

"Fear not, my child. Do you doubt the will of the Creator?"

The young man shook his head slowly as his hands trembled mightily. He glanced from the old woman to the angel and back. Unlike most people of this generation, she had rejected the nanotechnology, choosing to live a life of growing old and dying. It was natural that she would eventually perish, but still, few had really expected it to happen.

Raphael leaned down to the woman as she shook on the floor, her mind slipping away. "Go now, pass on, and be with us in Heaven."

As she shook one final time, her eyes rolled up into her head, and she ceased to move. She had finally passed away, at the tender old age of 97.

Clarence stared down at her corpse. Curses, that old bitch dropped a fat stack in the plate every Friday. She was an important source of revenue.

Raphael quickly rose to his full height as he stared at the church members. "Fear not! She has become one with us in Heaven! Look! I shall summon her spirit here!"

With an overly dramatic display of light, Raphael sent a quick telepathic message to Gabriel. An old woman just died, name was Margaret Grey. Send her down as quickly as possible.

The crowd stared at him expectantly as moments passed. Raphael breathed silently as his eyes flicked back and forth, his arms still upraised dramatically.

"Mommy, is she coming back?" A little girl in the front row practically yelled the question out as her mother hushed her quickly.

"Quiet, you're embarrassing me!"

Seconds turned into a minute, as Raphael swallowed carefully. Come on, my old arms can't hold up like this any longer.

Finally, he received a reply. I've got her now. Teleporting her directly to you.

Another flash of light blasted out as the old woman appeared up front, near the altar. "Good heavens, I'm back?"

"Indeed, young lady. You are now an agent of the Creator himself." Raphael lowered his arms, choking down a sigh of relief. "As will all of you become, when the Day of Retribution arrives! Put your heart and soul into this movement, make the gods proud, and you shall be rewarded with truly eternal life in Heaven!"

The audience roared with applause as everyone shot looks of incredulity at each other. Some, of course, had harbored many doubts over these last few years, but now there could be no doubt. The angels were real, and they had sent an archangel to speak with the flock personally. This had to be a sign from on high, indeed!

As they clapped furiously, Raphael cocked his head back slightly, whispering to Father Clarence. "As for you, I'd like to speak with you in private."

Clarence nodded numbly as he swallowed slowly. Fuck.

I clapped my hands together, as I sat cross-legged on the bed. Meditation was something I had spent the last few years working on, and a great side-effect of it had been the ability to put myself into a trance so I could speak with my mentor, King Arthur, whenever I wished. Exhaustion be damned.

Closing my eyes, I hummed one long, deep note to myself, as I held my hands together carefully.

It took a minute or so, but eventually I began to feel blackness wash over my vision, as my mind once again entered a place I had seen many times before.

Hmm, actually, this place was different. I mean, I knew what it was almost immediately. Stonehenge. A place created by an unknown group of people, ten thousand years ago, possibly more. Now, why might Arthur be here, today?

"Jason. Glad to see you." Arthur smiled as he took a sip of wine. Beckoning to his side, another glass of wine was sitting on the steps just outside the circle of massive boulders. I walked over, raising the glass up to my mouth in one smooth motion as I took my seat.

The taste was delicious. I used to taste nothing in this fake realm of his, but perhaps now I've developed some mental discipline. Things have taste here now. I can smell odors and aromas that I couldn't before.

I smacked my lips with satisfaction as I finished my glass of wine. "Things aren't going so well on Earth, I've heard."

"Agent X, right? He's your deep cover guy?"

"Yep. The best clone I've ever made. Very specialized for what he does."

Arthur shrugs. "Things are never going well on Earth. What else is new?"

I tap my lip thoughtfully, as I debate how to bring up the topic that's been bugging me. "Arthur, I don't know how to ask this, but here goes nothing. Listen, when we first met, you told me you were the most powerful hero of all time."

Arthur nodded. "Mmm. Yes, that is certainly a thing I said."

"And you said that, despite this proclamation, Amelia cleaned the floor with you."

Arthur narrowed his eyes inquisitively. "Yes. Go on..."

A slight smile was on his face, but my own was stuck in a look of concentration. "See, I've been thinking about my life so far. About power, and how to gain it, and important thresholds to cross. I fought Amelia, in the future. In the end, it was not me that won, but a divine ally that used my body as a vessel."

Arthur raised his eyebrows as he cocked his head slightly. "You managed to beat her? And you told me that you were weaker in the future than you are now."

"Yeah. It's a long story. But the thing is... Amelia had already been defeated once before. But not by me."

"You don't say?" Arthur leaned forwards, his smile gone now. "Jason, what's this all about? You're being more cryptic than usual."

"I have doubts. Many, many doubts. About Amelia, about myself, and about the future. I've changed the future, but I don't think I've changed it enough."

Arthur stared at me silently, not asking any more questions. Apparently, he expected me to continue.

"Err, Arthur... do you know who Joan of Arc is?"

He shook his head slowly. "Can't say I do. Why?"

I felt my gaze drift away from him for a moment. As I thought. Historical records indicate she was born several hundred years after he had died. If he had been sealed inside of Excalibur, with no knowledge of the world around him, then he wouldn't know of her existence.

"Joan of Arc was a female hero. She was born several hundred years after you had sealed yourself inside this blade. And... the thing is... I've never met her before, but every demon that spoke of her, spoke like she was the most powerful hero to have ever lived. In fact, you were never mentioned."

I turned back to Arthur to see he had lowered his eyes. "So that's how it is, then. I suppose, between your birth and my death, I should have known that another hero would emerge, and maybe they might have been more powerful than me. I shouldn't have assumed..."

Arthur paused for a moment, as I could almost see a lightbulb pop above his head. "...You stated that she had defeated Amelia?"

I nodded. "Yes. Not killed though. She merely sealed her inside of a statue, and I... erm... accidentally broke the statue, releasing her."

"Huh. But Amelia isn't sealed inside of a statue now, obviously. So if that's the case... perhaps she failed in this timeline?"

I shook my head quickly. "No. In the future I came from, Amelia defeated Satan, turned him into a puppet, then at some indeterminate time afterwards, she fought and lost to Joan. During our final battle, Amelia mocked me several times, stating that I was nothing compared to Joan. She spoke of Joan almost in a manner of awe. I daresay that while hating the one who sealed her, she also revered her."

Arthur raised a palm face-up nonchalantly. "Who can blame her? This Joan girl... she sounds very impressive. I'd like to meet her someday, if it were possible."

"But that's the thing. There's no way it could be Joan of Arc, even though all the pieces fit together. I mean, it had to be her, yet it couldn't have been."

Arthur chuckled. "Yes, I can see the confusion. Still, if you have the ability to time travel, who is to say that others don't as well? Perhaps Joan was such a mighty hero that she broke the boundaries of time and space. I don't think you're opening your mind to several different possibilities here."

"I guess."

I'm not convinced. Even if she were this crazy time traveling hero, what reason would she have to travel to the future? And why did historical records indicate she died at the age of 19, burned at the stake? Heh, come to think of it though, the church believed that she used magic which is why they executed her for heresy, and I guess when it's thought of with what I know now, it makes sense. She wasn't just a user of magic, but maybe the most powerful to ever live.

I guess sometimes, they get it right.

After a few moments, I stand up abruptly. "All right, good talk. I need to get back now."

Arthur cocks an eyebrow. "Leaving already? Come, stay a while! Let us drink some mead! What's the rush to get back to boring old politics and women anyway? Both are nothing but trouble!"

"Yeah, but they might affect my physical body, so they matter. Besides, it'll just be a quick chat. I need to see what the moron is up to now. That is, with my own eyes."

"Alright. Whatever." Arthur waved dismissively as a small cup full of booze appeared in front of himself. "Your loss."

Man, when did this legendary hero get so... chummy?

I blink slowly as the artificial universe fades away, and now I'm back in mine.

Harold sends me a mental message. "Hey, kid. Somethin' happened, it's got the big guy on Earth all angry 'n stuff. You'd best git a move on. We'll be arrivin' in 'bout 15 minutes or so."

"What happened?" Stonewall wasn't the sort of person to get angry over nothing. It must be pretty serious.

"Nobody'd tell me a thing. 's all on you, pal."

Fantastic, what a great way to start my day.

Part 313a:

I teleported down to Earth's surface, right in the heart of the London Palace, and smack into the center of chaos. Unlike before, I was not wearing my hypersuit since I didn't want to draw attention to myself. Agent X had already supplied me with a red-level clearance card, so if anyone asked who I was, I could just show it to them and they wouldn't bug me anymore.

Walking forwards quickly, I frowned as a sense of dread filled my body. Several secretaries raced past me, their arms full of various hard copy documents and such. Shoving me out of the way, they didn't even pause to excuse themselves, ignoring me completely. It didn't bother me, but it was the first of many signs that something was going very wrong.

Walking forwards, I arrived in the war room as people frantically moved from screen to screen, pointing and talking with a mixture of fear and nerves as their hands shook.

To my surprise, Ben Brown was in the room. "Do we have any leads? First person to locate the target gets a big fat raise and a huge promotion, understand?"

I swallowed carefully as I walked up to him. He didn't see me at all as he stared ahead, watching a screen update in front of him. Before I reached him, I paused to stare at the screen. Unless I was wrong... it was a three-dimensional map of the Labyrinth? This was exactly the sort of thing I had seen years ago, when I wore the Crown of Solomon inside of it. Several red dots were positioned in various locations, clustered around one sizable area. A great portion of the 3D map was entirely missing though, indicating they hadn't explored enough of the labyrinth to get a true feel for its size yet.

I turned back and spoke up. "Ben. Ben!"

He blinked quickly as he turned to face me. "Yeah? What do you want? I'm busy. Wait, who even are you?"

He frowned slightly as he started to turn away before a spark appeared in his eye. "Jason? Is that you?"

I nodded quickly as I flicked my gaze over to the viewscreen he had been watching. "I came back for a visit, and seems like you guys are having some trouble."

Ben stared at me uneasily for a moment before looking back at the map of the labyrinth. "Nothing we can't handle. You know the rules, Stonewall doesn't want your help. I'm not going over his head for this."

I felt my lips dry up slightly at his words. "Ben, that's not like you. I thought we were friends?"

"Yeah. Times change, people change." Ben didn't turn back to look me in the eye, as he seemed to avoid my gaze.

What happened between us? One day we were going out to destroy the Volgrim homeworld, the next he stopped talking to me for ten years.

I'll have to ask him about it later. "Fine, I get it. Listen, I just need to talk with Stonewall. Where's his office?"

Ben chuckled without sounding amused in the slightest. "You picked a damn shitty time to drop by. He's in the worst mood he's ever been in his life. His niece just got kidnapped by the demons, after all."

I nodded carefully. "He has a niece? Well, that's fine. I don't have to bother him right-" I paused, as I glanced around the room again. "Wait, is that what all this chaos is about? Is he spending humanity's resources just to find one little girl?"

Ben groaned as he turned back to me, irritation in his eyes. "Look, you've been gone a long time, understand? She is very important to him, and probably all of humanity as well. She's not just some little girl. I daresay she's the biggest agent of hope that we have in the war against the demons." Ben coughed as he leaned forwards knowingly. "Basically, now that you're out, she's in, understand?"

I nodded slowly as I sized Ben up. He was so different now from when I knew him. He wasn't the young recruit who excitedly tore apart Volgrim with his bare hands, nor the man who waded into battles haphazardly. He seemed more shrewd, more calm, more... calculating. Then there was the matter of Stonewall's influence. How had the madman changed Ben for the worse?

"Yeah, I get it." I forced a smile, but Ben didn't reciprocate it. "Ben, let me help out. I've got nothing better to do anyway. Where's she located?"

Ben chuckled again as he coughed loudly. "Shit, it doesn't matter. Nobody knows. This fucking maze is gigantic. It's already been two days... she could be anywhere. Like I said though, we've got it under control."

I nodded again as I edged slightly closer to him. "Ben. You know what they say about kidnappings, right? By the third day, the rate of finding the victim drops to 10%. Let me help you. You won't even know I'm there, it'll be in a totally unofficial capacity. I'll even let you take the credit for finding her."

Ben gnawed on his lip as he glanced from me to his viewscreen and back. "I can't just... damn. Fine, whatever. I'll let you help out, unofficially, understand? What do you need to get started?"

"Not much. Tell me her name, and give me a picture or a video of what she looks like. The more details, the better."

Ben sighed as he reached down to his holopad. "I can send you some video and picture files. Her name is Daisy Sokolov, age 17. Also, seeing as she's been living with Stonewall for ten years now... don't be too surprised if she knows exactly who you are. The man is not a fan of you. And just make sure you don't threaten her or anything. I'd hate to see you in a casket the next time we meet."

I chortled. "I see you've still got a great sense of humor. I'll save this little girl, don't you worry your little heart."

Ben seemed unamused. "Don't say I didn't warn you. Good luck, kid."

As I turned to walk away, I smiled back at him. "I'm almost three times your age. Respect your elders."

Daisy blinked her eyes slowly as a slight film seemed to break apart in front of her vision. What happened? I fell asleep? How long have I been here?

She moaned slightly as a pounding headache and incredible feeling of weakness filled her body. She could barely move at all and seemed to be laying on a cold hard floor of some sort. It was tough to tell though, as the place she was in was barely lit at all, only the tiniest amount of light allowed her to see anything.

Normally, this would be no issue. Her ability to see in any spectrum of ultraviolet or infrared, or many other weird ways, meant she could see in just about any lighting condition. Since this was not the case now, she quickly made a deduction in the span of a few seconds. "Energy nullification." She spoke out loud, her voice weakly echoing off the walls of the tiny room, or holding cell, or whatever it was.

"Yes, energy nullification. Very good, young woman." Daisy shifted her head towards the voice that had spoken. The voice was decidedly female, roughly age 30 or so, and distinctly human sounding, if that were a thing. Of course, age was just a number these days, so her actual age could be anything.

"Who... are you?" Daisy struggled to lift herself up, every movement feeling like she was lifting a boulder while doing a pushup, finally, she rolled into a sitting position as she leaned back against a wall. Her clothes were damp with sweat, and she panted like an animal, but most magic users couldn't manage even this much in a room like this.

"It shouldn't concern you all that much, but my name is Marie. I'm just an ordinary lady, nothing special about me."

The woman speaking appeared to be standing about five feet away, leaning against the opposite corner of the cell from where Daisy now gasped for breath.

Daisy lifted her arm slowly, bringing it up to wipe her forehead. Despite how cold the floor was, the room itself was unbearably warm, though the older woman didn't seem majorly affected by it. "Why am I here? What happened?"

Marie sighed dramatically. "Your uncle, the leader of humanity, has been a thorn in my side for too long now. I decided to take matters into my own hands. When I sensed an opportunity, I went for it. You, like a stupid and naive child, decided to stay behind in the labyrinth and let the rest of your platoon move forwards without you. A few minutes of them waiting would not have had any adverse effects on the mission, but your stupidity is what let you get caught."

Daisy swallowed heavily as she blinked her eyes, fatigue pouring from every inch of her body. "Haah... but you're a human, right? Why were you in the labyrinth? Why... how did you...?"

Marie clicked her tongue as annoyance set in. "Shut up. I'm not here for small talk. I'm here to deliver a warning. Not to you, little insect, but to your idiot of an uncle. That fool has no clue what he's doing with the serum, he doesn't know the backlash it's going to cause soon. He's playing with an energy few fully understand, except for myself."

Daisy squinted as she carefully examined the pale shadow of a figure in the dark. Her eyes were adjusting slowly to the near pitch-blackness, but it was an uphill struggle. "What are you talking about? I don't understand at all."

Marie started to lash out again, but she instead sighed as she walked over close to Daisy, sitting down beside her as she wrapped her arms around the teen's back. "Listen, sweetheart, you're just a little kid who got sucked into something bigger than you. I understand, I really do. I've read your file, I know what those morons did to you in the black facility, okay? But, see, you're in it, now. You have a responsibility to fill. You're in the position I was when I was your age. You can't get out, so you need to respect the responsibility thrust onto you."

Daisy felt a chill of ice go down her back as she tried to ignore the sudden nonchalance of this strange woman, who had gotten very close and personal in the span of a few seconds. "I... I still don't understand. What do I have to do with any of this?"

Marie paused for a moment as she contemplated the question. "I'll try to explain this simply. Let's say that you have a beehive that produces a certain amount of honey every day. The metaphor won't be perfect, but bear with me. So you have this beehive, and you extract some honey from it every once in a while when the time is right, and everything seems to go just fine."

"Well, suppose, for a moment, that this beehive would produce more potent and tasty honey each time you extracted it, but you were somehow oblivious to this. One day, you find out that you are in debt. You need that honey to pay off this debt, so you can sell it to the market. You also come to find out that the more you extract the honey, the more honey it produces exponentially."

"Well, you have a big edge over the competition now. Your honey is effectively unlimited, and people love it. There are apparently no downsides to extracting this much honey day in and day out, right?"

Daisy swallowed as Marie paused to wait for an answer. "Well, based on this metaphor, I'm guessing there are downsides?"

Marie licked her lips lightly, the sound reverberating off the walls in the tiny cell, as insignificant as it was. "Well, the metaphor doesn't work very well, but yes, there are side effects, very very bad ones. Let's just say that each time you draw from that sweet everlasting honey pool, you are slowly angering the bees inside of it. At some point, they will come out, and the revenge will be... intense."

Marie stood up, withdrawing her arm as she spoke quickly. "Lights."

A blast of light shot from every corner of the cell, as Daisy and Marie both winced. "Idiots, who put the setting at 100%? I hate bright light. Fifty percent lighting."

As the light dimmed, both women breathed a sigh of relief. Daisy was still barely sitting up, but now she managed to get a good look at the older woman. With long flowing red hair that tapered off in subtle curls, coupled with the white labcoat of a scientist, Marie wasn't very intimidating when the lights were flicked on.

"Mind if I smoke?" Marie reached into her pocket as she pulled out a pack created by a replicator. This was obvious by the fact that it had no labeling on it whatsoever. "These taste like shit, but at least it's something. I miss my Marbs."

Daisy didn't speak as Marie took a few silent puffs. Daisy didn't mind the smoke, anyway, it reminded her of her uncle Vasily.

Finally, Marie spoke again. "Let me be more clear. There's a reason the United States sealed off Nazi research into Type 3 energy. The Illuminati knows of those effects but doesn't care.

They only want more power, as they always do, and your uncle has proven to be a most useful tool, understand?"

Daisy started to speak, but Marie, ever the talker, interrupted her. "I know you do, you're a smart girl. Listen, it works like this; the heroes have been gaining power since the dawn of time. Each is slightly more powerful than the previous, at least as far as their energy concentration goes. With the exception of once when certain individuals tried to dampen the effect, it merely added to the coming backlash. The Nazi's were the topper."

Daisy squinted as she felt her mind drifting. "I still don't understand a thing you're talking about."

"You know about Judicator, right? I'm sure your uncle has at least mentioned him in passing."

Daisy nodded carefully, the movement feeling like her hundredth pushup in a row.

"Great. See, Judicator is, quite possibly, the most powerful and dangerous hero in existence. The Nazi's, bless their idiot male stupidity, played with fire. They started testing type 3 energy on humans, without making sure of the side effects. Each time someone is given type 3 energy, the next in line will have increased ability. Are you following along yet?"

Daisy shrugged. "I... guess?"

"Maybe I was wrong, you're still a dummy it seems. Anyway, my point is thus... the energy buildup will only affect the next true candidate in line. So because of what those gargantuan morons did with their testing, none of the test subjects survived... but the buildup meant when the current hero died... the next to be born would have colossal, previously untapped abilities."

Daisy felt her heart slam in her chest. "So... Judicator was that hero? He received the buildup?"

"Precisely. But that's only half of the story. The, err, 'individuals' who put a stopper on the power of the heroes... they no longer have the ability to do that anymore. They've been ousted from the place where they created the power of the heroes. So, are you understanding now?"

Daisy nodded, very slightly. "I think so. You're saying... because my uncle, and the, erm, Illuminati... you're saying they've been testing the energy on humans and causing a buildup again?"

Marie swallowed carefully. "Yes. If Judicator dies, when his powers pass on to the next hero, that one will have abilities unlike anything we've ever seen before. Judicator will seem like a small child wielding a spoon against the armies of hell themselves, when this next hero arrives."

Daisy sniffled quietly. "Fine. This is all so much to take in but... I still don't get it. Why me? Why are you telling me this, and not someone in command?"

"I can't. I'm wanted by every government on Earth now. Your uncle would pay a pretty penny to have my head on a plate. Besides, if I told him this, he wouldn't believe me. He's a headstrong idiot."

"There's something you're not telling me, isn't there?" Daisy carefully eyeballed the woman standing across from her. Everything she said made sense, but there were plenty of other people she could have kidnapped and told this too. Why did she pick a 17 year old girl? Perhaps she was counting on Daisy's naivete. It did make sense to have the closest family member of Stonewall tell him this, but once he learned the information had come from Marie, he'd immediately discard the information. The entire discussion was pointless if that was the case.

"You're very perceptive, aren't you? Fine. I'll ask you one last question. Riddle me this: If there is a buildup of power and this will eventually create an incredibly powerful hero, isn't it possible he or she has already been born?"

Daisy cocked an eyebrow. "That wouldn't make any sense. You already said Judicator would have to die first for the next hero to be born."

She didn't fully understand all this 'hero' business, but Daisy understood on a primal level that Judicator, the man who had dominated the news and history books for over a century, was no ordinary human. Her father had told her that Judicator destroyed a planet the size of Jupiter. Whatever this 'hero' stuff was all about, it would only make sense for it to apply to him.

"Judicator is a time traveler, as you might know. He came to warn us of a great calamity from the future. The calamity he warned us of was destruction by the aliens... and while we have, for the most part, destroyed them... there are other threats. Think, though, about the fact that he is a time traveler. Assuming he wasn't lying about that, then that would indicate time travel is possible..."

Daisy swallowed carefully. "My god... so you mean that there might be another time traveler?"

Marie shrugged. "Maybe. We can't rule it out. If, for example, Judicator died and someone even more powerful were to become a hero, they might also have the ability to time travel. If that were the case..."

Daisy's lip quivered as her eyes faltered and she gazed at the floor. "So... all this time, my father has been doing something incidentally awful? He didn't know though, he couldn't have known..."

"You're right, he didn't know. That doesn't excuse his actions though. I know he is being manipulated by an agent I used to be acquaintances with, but that man also ignored his duty to humanity. Both of them are guilty of creating something monstrous. The only hope we have is that Judicator never dies, and that's an unrealistic goal. So far, without fail, all who have been born eventually will die. Even the Creator..." Marie's voice trailed off as she turned her gaze thoughtfully to stare at the wall blankly.

It took a few moments, but she regained her composure. "Now that we've had our little talk, the rest is up to you, young lady. You'll be set free shortly, I expect you to do the right thing, for the good of all humanity."

Daisy smiled slightly. "Yes, I understand. Thank you, Marie, for telling me all of this."

"Don't thank me." Marie's expression turned slightly into a sneer. "You're going to wish you'd never learned any of this. The burden will crush you under its weight."

Besides, your abilities aren't what they seem, little girl. Marie kept that thought locked in her mind. In this room, Daisy wouldn't be able to use her telepathy.

"I'll send someone to escort you safely out of the labyrinth. You'll have to wear an inhibitor, of course, for our safety. I hope you understand."

Daisy stared at the older woman blankly. She wouldn't resist. There was no point in resisting, anyway. If they wanted to kill or torture her, they'd have done that already. This entire interaction had been one way, without a single bit of probing for information.

Marie nodded carefully as she turned and smacked a section of the wall. It opened away a moment later as she stepped out.

I wonder if I'll ever see her again. Daisy silently pondered that question as she awaited her escort.

Part 314a: Appearances

Daisy had always considered herself a strong girl, able to fend for herself, especially thanks to her uncle's training. Even without him though, she knew she was far more powerful than any other human on Earth, and that had always helped give her the confidence to stand up to threats that would make others cower in terror.

But now she lay trembling against a wall as the strength in her body was nearly nonexistent. The door to the room opened up as a disgusting green monster lumbered in, its body towering 8 feet tall as it held a massive battleaxe in its primary hand, dragging the heavy object behind itself as it stomped forwards.

Daisy's fingers shook as the creature drew closer. She wasn't an expert on demonology, but she knew this monster in one glance; Orc. Known for tearing people apart with its bare hands, it had very little magical energy to speak of, but was immensely strong, having the power of twenty men holed up inside its body.

As the hideous beast drew closer, she turned her face away and closed her eyes, as tears started to stream out.

"Hello little girl. Grok here to walk you to exit. Grok not hurt you."

The terrifying monstrosity grumbled the words out, his vocal tone sounding more depressed than violent. Daisy blinked her eyes open, as she realized he was standing still, breathing slowly at the doorway.

"G-Grok? Is that your name?"

The teenage girl fought her fear as she swallowed hard, forcing her trembling to stop with her willpower alone.

"Yes. Grok am good orc, do what master Marie say do. Here, put neck thing on." Grok fumbled around in his pocket with his free hand clumsily as he plunked it on the ground in front of her. "It make you not use magic. Grok not scared, but these am rules."

Daisy frowned as she glanced up at the monster before her. Despite his unpleasant appearance, unkempt and matted down body hair, and the smell of blood all over himself, he didn't seem to be too awful overall. She carefully leaned forwards, falling over as she grossly overestimated the remaining strength in her body. After a moment, she pulled herself forwards, grasping the inhibitor necklace carefully as she pulled it towards herself and wrapped it around her neck.

Grok watched silently as she put it on, nodding contentedly as she slumped back to the ground. "You am look very tired. Grok turn off magic stop thingy now. You need Grok carry you?"

Daisy coughed weakly. "No... I c-can walk... I think."

Grok nodded as he reached up to the top of the wall, tapping a hidden panel three times before typing in a thirty digit code into a secret panel. How he had managed to memorize such a long and complex series of numbers, despite being such a dumb-looking being, was beyond her.

After a minute, Daisy suddenly felt the air in the room lighten up. Instead of a crushing feeling sapping the strength from her body, she instead simply felt blinded from being unable to access her abilities, yet her body itself was unaffected, only her mind was unable to use magic properly.

As she pulled herself up, the moment she stood, Grok handed her a pair of handcuffs. "You put on. Hands behind back. Marie give order, Grok follow."

Daisy nodded nervously as she took the solid steel cuffs, placing them on one of her wrists, then putting her hands behind her back, she clicked the other hand into position.

She felt incredibly helpless in this position, but she was somewhat sure that if push came to shove, she could run away and find some way to yank the inhibitor necklace off. The strap that looped around her neck was merely made of a few small strings, and it wasn't even locked into place with a key. If the goal of this necklace is to render the prisoner helpless, it's actually poorly made.

Daisy nodded carefully as she glanced back up at the massive orc. "I put them on, alright?"

"Good. Grok make sure pretty girl get to exit safely. Grok lose honor if he fail. Come, we leave now."

* * *

A few minutes later, Daisy and Grok were walking down various hallways in seemingly random directions as Grok patiently seemed to focus down the exact path to the exit without even needing a map. As they walked, Daisy felt unnerved by the silent walking, so she decided to start up a conversation. "M-mister Grok, was it? What do you do in the labyrinth?"

Grok stayed silent for a few moments before replying. "Grok do what others tell him do. Grok do bit of this and that. Sometimes Grok sent clean jail cells, other times he need fight those who make hurt. Grok not like to fight."

As they walked, Daisy cocked an eyebrow. "You don't like to fight? But you're an orc. Don't orcs love to fight?"

"Yes. Grok not very good orc though, Grok wimpy, get beat up. Grok just want go home to mate, she why Grok do what told to do."

"Oh, you have a mate? What's her name?" Daisy felt interested in the life of this monster, having never spoken to one face-to-face before. All she knew of demons was what she had been told by others, and what she had seen in battle. To learn they had actual social lives and weren't just mindless violent creatures...

"Grok mate named Chesha. Chesha bear Grok several orc spawn. Forty five orc spawn in big chamber, many will be dead by this place. Grok not like, but these am rules of Satan."

Grok walked stoically, but Daisy thought she noticed a slight slump in his shoulders as he spoke of his... 'spawn' dying. Were they his children, then? It made sense, who would want to see their children die in a senseless war?

"Do you... hate the humans?"

Daisy continued asking him questions, finding his life to be much more interesting than one would expect. "Grok not hate anyone. Grok want all be friends, he wish people and demon no fight. Do not be scared, Grok make sure nobody hurt you." Grok did something unexpected as he said this; he smiled. It was a hideous smile, exposing crooked brown teeth that were all stunted in various directions, evidence of poor hygiene and far too many blows to the face, but Daisy smiled back at him as they talked.

"I like you too, Grok. I'll protect you too, how about that?"

Grok released a strange, throaty cough, probably some form of a chuckle. "Funny girl. Grok much stronger than small one. Grok make fight for girl, even if he no like fight. Grok am good spawn, make brood mother proud of him." He punched his chest enthusiastically, making Daisy blush slightly as her grin widened.

"You're all right, Grok. I'll make sure to remember you, any time humans have to fight demons. I will do what I can to end this war, even if my uncle hates demons irrationally."

Grok nodded slowly as they rounded another corner. "Hmm. Your father... he am king of humans? Marie say he kill many orc, many demon. Grok not hate him, he just do what others do. When hit, you hit back. Nobody know who start war, it just go on forever."

"Yeah... war never ends."

Daisy swallowed hard as her radiant smile faded away. Truth be told, being only seventeen years old, she didn't know anything about this war. A planet was destroyed because of it, there had been massive space battles, a time traveler, demons and angels and heroes and aliens... it was too much for her mind to figure out.

But this first meeting with Grok changed something in her heart, something she wouldn't have figured out for a long time otherwise. This war... it needed to end.

And it needed to end soon, for those like Grok, who simply desired to live peaceful lives.

Uncle Vasily would hear about this when she made it back home.

I stepped out of the London palace onto a balcony that overlooked all of London, noting enthusiastically that it was raining outside. I haven't actually seen rain in years, having been cooped up on the Mothership, but this is a nice change of pace.

As I let the rain fall on my face, I pause to let it all soak in. The city here, at first glance, seems the same as ever before, with one important difference... there are few visible lights at this time of night. The moon shines brightly in the sky, looming overhead as it always does to illuminate the world around me, but the houses and buildings for miles in any direction are mostly dark.

I've heard that the city wasn't doing so well financially, but the scene before me expresses that sentiment in the bleakest of ways. The power is either cut or residents can't afford it in various areas. I had always thought replicators would create a post-scarcity world, but the one thing people still need is energy. It wasn't an issue when my clones were around, as we could just mass-create coal or whatever other resource we needed, defying the laws of energy conservation. But without my cheat magic, the city has fallen to pieces, since they can't disobey those laws of physics I so gallantly stomped on.

In all honesty though... this bothers me. Stonewall is so dead set on humanity fending for themselves, he's letting the lights go off all around his capital city and pouring all his money into extermination of the demons, rather than fixing the broken lives of the humans closest to him. If this is how he treats his friends, what will that say about how he treats his enemies?

I guess setting his pride behind him and asking for my help is going to take a long time. I can't expect anything of him, but I can certainly hope.

Tapping on my holo-watch, I bring up several videos and images of the girl in question. She's a cutie, with long brown hair and well-defined muscles. She's not masculine or anything, but clearly she gets in strength training or aerobics exercise or something.

The images all show her looking like she's 15 or 16, so maybe these are just old files. Still, it irks me that the demons would be so cowardly as to kidnap a defenseless little girl. Did they perhaps break into Stonewall's mansion or something? Just pathetic. I knew Satan wasn't the kindest of souls, but resorting to ransom demands or political moves against children was far more evil than I'd expected from even him in the past. Come to think of it, those are odd thoughts, given he's the freaking devil.

" Locate. "

I speak the word and my mind searches the cosmos, the vast emptiness of space, the infinitely numbered stars and solar systems, as it finally settles on a far distant void that leads into another dimension. In seconds, my mind latches onto a single drop of humanity in a sea of blackness, zooming downwards to reveal the face of the girl that I seek. My breath is almost taken away, as her beauty is even more unbelievable when seen 'in person', so to speak. She has matured elegantly, but now appears to be wearing a... white set of armor? Actually, it resembles what I've seen of Enforcer armor, though as far as Agent X has told me, there are only green, red, and black level Enforcers. Perhaps she was cosplaying or something...? Her face is white as snow and she seems to be deep in thought, likely about how she might escape her predicament.

As I have that thought, I pull my vision back and feel my body twitch as a slight panic comes and goes. She has her wrists bound behind her and is being led around by the biggest, meanest, ugliest looking orc I've ever seen. Most orc species and subspecies are around my size, at seven feet tall, but this one is damn near 8 feet tall, maybe even breaking that height barrier... and he has thick arms that look like he could crush boulders just by looking at them the wrong way.

Against me, of course, he's a non-issue... but against a defenseless child, if I were to move in the wrong way, he could kill her in the blink of an eye. Not good.

Hmm. I can't just rush in there, even if pulling her out would take a single second. She has some sort of nullification device around her neck, likely to prevent someone from magically teleporting her out of the labyrinth... such as myself. Considering the massive axe that orc is carrying, he might just be leading her to an execution. Which would be ridiculous, given that she must be a political hostage, but still... it's worth considering.

I'm going to have to come up with a plan, and fast. If I don't get her out of there, who knows what will happen to her...

Part 315a:

Daisy shifted on her feet as they rounded another corner. "Grok, my feet are tired. How much further is it?"

"Only few hours. Not far now." Grok mumbled the answer as he continued to stare ahead.

Daisy stifled a complaint. It had been seven hours since she started walking with him. He had offered several times, like a real gentleman, to carry her all the way, but she stoically resisted every time. She was too tough to allow that sort of thing.

"Can we just sit down and take a break for a few minutes? Pleeeeeease?"

Daisy gave her best impression of puppy dog eyes as Grok turned to eyeball her. He paused walking as he looked ahead of and behind them. "Not good spot... but Grok keep watch. You sit, Grok stand."

Grok seemed uneasy but Daisy ignored his worries as she sighed with relief, flopping down to a cross legged position on the ground contentedly. "I can't believe my cell was so far from the portal! It must have been tough... err... hauling me there."

"We take long route to get portal. Not safe to go straight." Grok nibbled on his lip as he continued looking around. "This area have many demons. Some not good, some really not good."

Daisy glanced behind herself at the darkness behind them. Visibility inside the labyrinth always seemed to be limited to a few hundred feet forwards and backwards in any given direction, and the hallways all blended together and looked identical to one another. How Grok was navigating it without a map was beyond her.

Daisy paused... actually, this would be a good time to ask. "Grok, how do you know how to get around the labyrinth so easily? You don't need a map?"

Grok shrugged slightly, as he lifted his massive battleaxe into his left hand, holding it at the ready. His other hand held the torch that they had been using for illumination, though its fire had been getting steadily dimmer over time. "Grok just know. Born knowing. All demons know, maybe magic by Satan. Nobody understand, we just do."

"Huh. Sounds like it's instinctual, then." Daisy felt her vision shift slightly as a wave of sleepiness overcame her. She was very tired, and the effects of the anti-energy necklace was taking its toll on her mental state.

After a few minutes, she brought herself back up to a standing position carefully, feeling her knees wobble. "Shoot, I don't know how much longer I can walk like this. Grok, if you just let me take this necklace off, I could be more help to you. I won't hurt you, I promise! We're friends!"

Grok nodded easily. "Grok know you good girl. Grok like you much. Grok not break rules, Grok get hurted many times. Brood mother and Marie beat bad orcs with whip. Grok not like whip..." Grok swallowed slowly as he reached behind himself to lift up his shirt with the butt of his axe. Underneath, various deep scars were visible, as well as poorly healed chunks of missing flesh. For a brief second before he lowered the shirt back down, Daisy could almost swear she saw maggots festering inside one especially gross looking wound.

"Oh... I understand. Grok, when we get to the portal, I'll try to heal you, okay? Those look... really bad." Daisy bit her lip as she felt a wave of nausea. Looking at his scars had reminded her of her own trials when she was just a child. A wave of repressed memories flooded back as she wiped her right eye on her shoulder clumsily.

"Eyyyy, Grok! Zat you?" Daisy and Grok both froze as a voice erupted from down the corridor. At the moment the voice spoke, a human-sized creature limped into view, its skin being green like Grok's, and its face looking very swollen and disgusting. It had large, bulbous eyes and two long pointed ears.

Daisy struggled to think of the word for this creature, realizing that it was very likely a goblin.

As she had that thought, a number of other ones entered into the light created by Grok's torch. A dozen in total, it appeared.

"Mor'tok. We leaving now. No mean enter territory." Grok lowered his head as he glanced down at Daisy, alarm showing on his face.

"C'mooooon, buddy! You ain't gotta be like that! We're friends, y'see! Hehehe... this is a pretty little human girl, ol' pal..." The goblin immediately flicked his eyes over to Daisy as he licked his lips. "Heyyy baby, I see he's got you all chained up and helpless... whaddya say you ditch this ugly oaf 'n have some fun with my gang? We'll have a real good time, sweetie!"

Daisy swallowed as she took a step back. "N-no, I don't really want to do that." She wriggled her hands behind her back, but found that she had made the cuffs much tighter than she remembered. No getting out of these easily.

Mor'tok's jovial grin turned into a sneer into the blink of an eye. "Hehe... that's cute, you tasty morsel... you think you can just say no to me, eh? I run this sub-section... you know. I kin' do whatever I want down here."

Grok's eyes flared up as he detected the secret meaning behind Mor'tok's words. "You no touch girl. Marie's orders. You touch, she kill, understand?"

Mor'tok snickered as his slight grin came back. "You're a tough bastard... Grok. I've heard about how you survived the Chamber of Torture twice... but if you think you can take on a dozen of my best..." Mor'tok glanced back at his men, all of whom were licking their lips and eyeballing the girl greedily. "Well... let's just say you're wrong. Do the right thing, give us the girl. You won't get hurt, understand?"

As he said this, Mor'tok drew a small purple knife from his coat. It was made of demonsteel, a special material considered unbreakable by those who had created the labyrinth. He'd used it to kill many and ascend to the top of the ranks among his kind in this sector, and he loved to show it off when he found new prey.

Grok gently stepped between Daisy and the goblins. "You run, me hold them off. Here key. Grok sorry, but you fend for self. Be careful now."

Grok deftly reached into his pocket with the butt of his torch, drawing out a big round key-chain that had only three keys on it. In a single motion, he dropped it right on Daisy's foot.

"You good girl. Not forget Grok. Grok remember you well."

Daisy felt panic flood over her face as Grok didn't wait for a response. He charged forwards towards the goblins, lifting up his massive battleaxe as he bellowed a mighty roar.

As Daisy quickly knelt down, she clumsily pulled her arms down her back and tried to pull her hands out from under her feet, a technique her father had taught her. Time was of the essence.

Alright, I've got it all figured out. I can teleport in, eliminate the big orc with a kill spell, and use Telekinesis on that necklace to take it off her neck... no, shit, that won't work. It nullifies magic. If I touch it, I'm likely to lose my powers for a moment, leaving me vulnerable. Worse, I don't know what its radius is.

...the Hypersuit. Yes, that might just be the answer. If I wear the Hypersuit, the effects of magic nullification are somewhat reduced. I think that might allow me to get that necklace off of her...

I quickly send a telepathic message to one of my clones aboard the Mothership. J-004, keep an eye over me while I enter into the labyrinth. If my life is in danger, pull me out, revive me, whatever needs to be done. I'm going in to rescue a non-combatant.

Alright, I'm on it. His response took only a moment or two. J-004 was one of the first few clones I had made, and as such he was a first generation, half as powerful as myself. Doubtless, he'd find another clone or two to help out if things got hairy.

What was important was not just fighting hard, but fighting smart. Using my clones in the shadows was very effective, as enemies couldn't prepare for an attack they couldn't see happening. I've been thinking a lot about my battle with Hope, so many decades ago. Reintegrating my clones to increase his own power dramatically... that was a smart move. I still don't understand how such a smart clone emerged, given that until now clones have only demonstrated subtle changes from myself.

Perhaps it wasn't so much a variable difference in his personality as it was the dramatically different way I used to treat my clones. I treated them like slaves, not realizing the secret rule the universe lived under; you can force the body, but the mind is unwilling. I can force someone to move and do certain things, but I can't bend their will to mine. This was a rule that the Creator of the universe made, and now that I respect it and give free will to my clones, another Hope is unlikely to appear.

Still, if he did, it would be cause for concern. I have formulated several counter strategies, but any time I make a direct first level clone, I risk my plans leaking to the others, so I rely on second level and lower clones for the most part.

...All right, enough waiting. Whatever happens, happens.

I set my mind on Daisy's position. This will have to be quick. Get in, kill the orc, get out. Hopefully that necklace won't be too much of a problem.

" Storage. Wear. Teleport. "

* * *

I blink as I arrive in a very dark corridor. Daisy isn't here. Nobody is here. Am I in the wrong place? No, wait, I hear something behind me.

I turn around and carefully make my way forwards. This sound is vaguely... unnerving...

My god, it's the sound of crying. Is that Daisy?

In the distance, there's a torch laying on the ground, barely visible as its light is fading quickly. Not a problem for my suit, I can see in any spectrum of light and I can illuminate anything around me anyway. Speaking of which...

" Illuminate. "

A bright light begins to emit from my suit, lighting up the hallway behind and ahead of me for several hundred feet in both directions.

What I see makes my heart stop for a few seconds.

Blood covers the walls, scattered body parts thrown here and there. It looks like a fully grown adult male exploded from the inside out. Several of them, even. Bits and pieces of what I can only presume to be living beings are all over the place. As I take a step forwards, I feel my foot kick something. It's... a green arm holding a strange purple dagger. What the hell happened here?

I swallow hard as I see Daisy ahead, her hands hovering over the head of the massive orc I saw earlier when I observed her. Tears are rushing down her face as her brow is furrowed in concentration. Her white armor from before is stained red and brown with a horrific amount of blood, as is her face. She's hardly recognizable at this point.

"D-Daisy...? Is that you?" I feel timid as I approach the crying girl. She slowly tilts her head up to look at me.

"Who...?" Her face is vacant, as if she doesn't realize where she is right now.

The orc in front of her, he has several vicious stab wounds in his chest, and a javelin is impaled into his heart, likely the final death blow.

"They... they killed... Grok..." Daisy quickly wipes at her eyes with her bloodied hands, the movement doing little but to smear the blood on her face in circles.

"Grok? The orc?" I choke the words out as I draw close to her and kneel down. The orc, despite having been killed brutally, has a smile on his face. Almost as if he had resigned himself to his fate.

"I killed... all of them. Tore them apart... I was too weak, too slow... I couldn't even protect my friend..."

Daisy chokes more tears back. As she does, I glance around again. She did all of this? Holy mother of god... She must be an actual Enforcer then, with real abilities. Did I misread the situation originally?

"This orc was your friend? Was he a good guy then?"

Daisy nods fiercely. "He was a good boy. He had a wife and kids... I... how do I tell them he died..."

I nodded quickly as I stood up. "Get out of the way. There might still be time, then." Reaching over, I yank the javelin out of his heart, sparing a single glance to make sure nothing else is stuck in him. I aim my hand at his body. " HEAL! HEAL! REVIVE! "

His body seem to repair the wounds, as his cuts and stabs close themselves up. A biopsy report appears in my helmet's scanner indicating his body is in perfect condition now, having even healed some existing scars and such... but...

"I'm sorry. His spirit is gone, his soul, rather. I can heal the body, but the mind is..." I speak out loud to Daisy, as she breaks down into tears again.

"No! You need to do more! Can't you bring him back?! Can't you do-!" Daisy pauses suddenly as a look of recognition passes over her face. "J-Judicator? You're the hero my father talks about?"

I shrug as a meek expression crosses my face, not that she can see it. "Uh, yeah. That's me."

"You have incredible abilities! You can heal him! Bring him back to life!" Daisy pleads with me, but...

This orc... he's gone. I don't know how to tell this teenage girl the bad news. It hurts, I know. When I lost Phoebe and I couldn't save her, I was devastated. Worse, I blamed myself. I had the power to save her, but my naivete meant I didn't take variables into account or give her the proper protections.

Better to just be blunt. "I'm sorry, Daisy. He's gone. I'm sure he was your friend, but this is wartime. These things happen. I've lost friends too, and I can't bring anyone back from the dead. Once gone, a person is gone forever."

Daisy nods numbly as she turns to stare at his perfectly intact corpse. "He looks so peaceful now. Damn it... we need to... bury him. We can't just leave him like this. It's not right."

I start to object, but then again, it can't really hurt anything. "Fine. I'm going to teleport you and him both out of the labyrinth. If you'd like, we can bury him outside of London, somewhere you can visit his grave whenever you like. I don't... know what else to do."

Daisy blinks slowly as she stares at the ground. "Yeah... that sounds... good."

Once again, she's staring into a void that I can't see. I believe the term is 'disassociation', something people experience in traumatic situations, especially ones where they feel they have no control. It often occurs in moments of especially brutal violence, and afterwards during the recovery process. War veterans can suffer from it, as well as post traumatic stress disorder.

Daisy is still just a teenager. She's not used to this sort of violence.

Maybe I should help her out. I could clean her up and erase her recent memories... then she wouldn't feel the pain anymore. She wouldn't even know who this orc was. But then again, if I were to go through life never remembering the feeling of pain, I wouldn't be able to adapt to an unfair world. Pain makes us grow as humans. It's pain that allows us to move on and become better people, so we don't wish to feel it again. A person who doesn't feel pain is also one who will not be able to empathize with those who have.

Yes... better to leave myself out of this.

Inside my helmet, I speak into my speaker system. "I found her, Ben. She's fairly traumatized, but in one piece and otherwise uninjured. We need to make a stop first, but we'll be there soon. I'll let you pick her up on the south side of the city, at its outskirts."

"Christ, Jason. I don't know how you did it... but thank you." Ben grumbles his thanks to me and I cut off the conversation.

"Come, Daisy. It's not safe here. The labyrinth has many secrets, and many enemies waiting to strike."

She stands and nods as I teleport the two of us, plus the massive orc's body to the outskirts of London.

This will leave a mark on her psyche, but hopefully it will enable her to grow as a person.

It worked for me... hopefully it will for her, as well.

Marie smirked as Jason and Daisy teleported away. "That was unfortunate. I picked Grok because I knew his kind heart would win her over. Now that he's dead, we've lost our link."

Satan yawned as he glanced over her shoulder at the video feed from their tiny spy drone. Created by Marie for covert operations, it was perfect for tracking persons of interest, especially as it was no bigger than a marble and had extremely acute cameras for observing at a distance.

"I guess that was a failure... again. You have yet to impress me, Marie." Satan rolled his eyes. This female human was one steaming pile of dung after another. She had failed the most important mission in Demon history and only destroyed half of humanity's forces, and now she'd failed such a small, yet important mission again.

"Failures have a way of turning into opportunities for redemption. Think about it, if you had successfully killed off most of humanity, you would have been able to sit back and watch as the angels died from lack of thought energy... yet because you fight the humans now, and due to their incredible war prowess, your demons willingly train all day long to improve themselves and evolve more quickly. Laziness would be your undoing, if your people fell prey to it. In the same vein, now that this girl has met and spoken with a friendly demon, she might become more sympathetic to our cause."

Satan chuckled. "You have such a way with words. A failure is a failure, Marie. We've lost the girl... your anti-energy invention was turned against us years ago. We have no defense against it. Even I have little defense against it. How are we to combat it if there is no way to oppose it? We keep losing, because of your mistakes."

Marie shrugged, an expression she didn't make often. "Well, there are many ways to proceed. Orcs and Goblins have little to no magical energy, so they could be used to combat those anti-energy weapons. The problem is that magic is so effective against groups of enemies that we're going to need it eventually. The obvious solution is for demons to turn to technology to fight humanity on even terms."

Satan instantly curled his lip up in disgust. "Call me primitive or old fashioned, but that will never happen. Armor is so... inelegant. I'd sooner die than be stripped of my dignity and forced to fight on equal terms with trash."

Marie smiled unconvincingly. "It's your funeral. If we can't get the Volgrim back to use their technology, we're going to be forced to adapt."

"Stop saying 'we' and pretending you're a part of my group. You're not. You're just using me to gain immortality." Satan snapped at the feeble female as her pathetic excuses pushed him to the brink of anger. "I want a real solution, Marie. Something substantial. You're a smart woman, I can assume you'll be able to provide that."

Marie turned the table on him in an instant. "First you treat me as an inferior, and now you think I'm smart, hmm? Admit it. You need me, Satan. You know you have no counter to the humans. If you kill me or I leave, the demons will die by the end of the century. You'd better start treating me with some respect and forgiving a few past mistakes. Nobody is perfect."

Satan stroked his chin thoughtfully. "Nobody, hm? I'd argue against that, but fair enough. If you can come up with a solution to the anti-energy weaponry, I'll give you the immortality you wish for. But it needs to be a good solution. This is going to be the determining war, the final solution to these pests. These inferior weaklings have been a thorn in my side for too long."

"Immortality without the downsides, correct?" Marie made sure to place emphasis on the last word. Demons were tricky creatures and would always try to wriggle out of a deal if they could.

"That's right. No downsides. It won't include regeneration, so all I can do is assure you that your body won't age a day. If you get injured, you'll have to heal normally as a regular human would. Is that acceptable?"

Satan raised his chin up slightly as he looked down at the woman below him. In truth, he did respect her, despite her failures. She was a brilliant scientist, somehow able to unearth new branches of research previously unknown. Her haughtiness, however, was another issue entirely.

"Fine. But I want a blood contract." Marie kept her glance even as she stared up at the demon. Never give a demon an inch or they'll take a mile. That was a lesson she had learned from her decades of working with these creatures.

Satan gnashed his teeth together. Asking for a blood contract was almost the same as calling the other person a liar to their face, saying they couldn't uphold their word. Still, though...

"Very well. A blood contract it is. But there must be an equal trade. If you can't deliver me a tool or weapon to combat the anti-energy devices within one year of Earth's orbital cycle, starting from this day, I will have you as a mindless slave forever. You will follow my every command without hesitation until the day one of us dies... understand?"

Marie swallowed carefully. "I accept. Immortality if I complete the device, and slavery if I don't. Interesting choice, if you ask me. A blood contract is the only way to break the free will clause the Creator set in place. Is this a deliberate choice on your part?"

"But of course." Satan chuckled as he waved his hands, making an illuminated scroll of paper float in front of him. In seconds, he mentally inscribed the contractual wording on the front of it, then handed it to her. "Here, make sure it is acceptable."

Marie plucked the paper from midair, scanning it carefully.

1. This contract is made between Marie L. Becker and Satan, First Emperor of Hell. No other participants are involved in its signing.

2. Marie Becker agrees to provide Satan with one weapon, tool, or implement that will allow the Army of Hell to fight on equal terms with the accursed humans. If this item is not provided within 365 days of the signing of this contract, her free will is placed in the hands of Satan, First Emperor of Hell, until either one of them dies.

3. If, however, Marie Becker is able to create the item required by this contract within 365 days, Satan, The First Emperor of Hell, agrees to grant Class 2 Immortality to Marie Becker, and she is thusly freed from the contract, as is Satan, First Emperor of Hell.

* * *

Marie studied the wording carefully. It was a simple contract, not bogged down in the 'lawyer-ese' that humans were so prone to using, and it had no hidden deficiencies that she could note. Reaching into her pocket, she procured a small pocketknife. Pulling it open, she sliced across her fingertip very slightly, and drew her name in blood on the contract.

Satan chuckled. "A knife? Seems you intended to do this from the very beginning. Very well." Using magic, he sliced open his own finger, etching his name in blood on the scroll as well. Once both names were signed, the contract vanished in a flash of light as an odd voice spoke into their minds.

It is done.

Marie frowned. "Who was that?"

Satan shrugged. "Any time a blood contract is signed, those words appear in the signers' minds. None know where they originate from. Here, as a sign of good faith, I will heal that cut." With the barest amount of focus, Satan used his healing abilities that he had taken from an especially cantankerous female hero ages ago, and healed up Marie's finger with the barest of effort.

Marie sighed. "Alright. Time to get to work then.... the clock is ticking."

Satan nodded as his smile vanished. "Indeed, for the both of us."

Preacher Clarence mopped at his face again as he examined his overflowing pews. Ever since the archangel had descended from the heavens, a leaked video had brought people by the thousands to his churches, forcing him to purchase new buildings and sign new leases.

Business was booming, so to speak.

"Behold, my beloved children! The Archangel Raphael, second highest among those of God's firstborn children... he came to me and showed himself to the people of Earth! This was the proof we needed that God is watching from on high! His glorious radiance shines down even now on us, his blessed children!"

The crowd of a thousand cheered madly, even as a viewscreen outside the church broadcast his speech live to ten thousand more who couldn't fit inside. At this rate, I'm going to need a much bigger venue if I want to keep the followers of the church comfortable and their pockets flowing.

Clarence smiled hugely as he continued to boldly exclaim his message to his congregation. "Rejoice! I have heard of the persecution we are facing! The government is beginning to take notice of our humble church, as the forces of evil look at us with new eyes! No longer a tiny flock, we will be the children chosen by God himself to save this world! But we must be vigilant... we must agree to never join in the war effort against the demons, for when God decides to smite them from the heavens, our pithy human weapons will tremble in fear at his awesome might! We will throw ourselves to the ground and beg for forgiveness from He who resides on high!"

Clarence resisted the urge to smirk. Often, his sermons sounded the same as any other day. Repeating the same mindless words over and over again, with pathetic platitudes and whatnot... those were the best ways to ensure the reinforcement was drilled into the thick skulls of his mindless followers.

"Look now, in the book of Matthew, chapter sixteen, verse twenty-seven! 'For the Son of Man is going to come in the glory of His Father with His angels, and WILL THEN REPAY EVERY MAN ACCORDING TO HIS DEEDS!' This verse tells us what we must know, that he who trusts in God and does not take His will for granted will receive everlasting life in heaven! God has a plan, and we are merely the ones who must witness it! Strive to improve yourselves, strive to be good unto one another, and especially... strive to give up your earthly possessions so that God may look upon you favorably!"

The crowd roared with applause as Clarence bowed several times. "Thank you! Thank you! I am but a humble messenger of he who resides in the heavens!"

As he bowed, he glanced over at the collection plate that was being passed around, his eyes nearly bulging from his head as he saw the colossal amount of bills and credit chits stacked on top. Truly... I am blessed.

* * *

Some time later, Clarence slumped into his chair in the back of the office. "Thank the gods for gullible kids who will collect money and maintain the church without needing to be paid. A man needs the finer things in life, after all."

Speaking to nobody in particular, he greedily counted up the money. It had gone up a hundred and fifteen percent over the previous day! As he chortled to himself, he felt a gust of wind, as a familiar light appeared in the room.

Glancing back, his smile flattened out as Raphael stood behind him, watching this display of greed. "I see you're having quite the good time here, young man."

Clarence shrugged. "We had a deal."

"Of course, I'm not here to interfere. However, I listened to the sermon, and I have one small recommendation. Pushing against the demonic war is good indeed, but also put pressure on people to pray. God needs his followers to give him their, err, most important desires. He cannot improve the world without them, you see."

"Prayer, huh? Does that even do anything either? From what you've told me, the angels seem to be hacks and frauds, just like myself." Clarence sniffled as he eyeballed the archangel up and down. Without his angelic wings, he was merely an unimposing old man who glowed in the dark.

"Perhaps, but with you, we're giving you honest truths. Prayer is important. You help us, and we'll make sure your... err... pockets are stuffed, so to speak."

Clarence nodded lazily. "Yeah yeah, whatever you say, old ma-... err, Archangel Raphael." As he glanced back at the pile of money, his eyes lit up again. "At this rate, if the number of people keep increasing, I'll have to buy a much bigger church!"

Raphael felt a twinkle appear in his eye. "Ah yes, attendance numbers certainly do seem to be going up. I have some contacts, I'll make sure you get a good deal. A mega-church would be ideal, especially if it allows for televised sermons."

As Clarence nodded along, a look of worry crossed his face. "The government though... I wasn't lying. They're starting to get worried by my church. What if they raid the place and take my money...?"

Raphael groaned in annoyance. "Always with the money, young man... have no worries, you can simply use a government raid as proof that they are against you, turning that into a bigger cash flow and increasing sympathy and interest in your message. If they try anything, create a martyr of yourself, you see?"

Clarence's smile returned in a flash. "Yes... yes, I see! Raphael, you truly are the wisest of the archangels! I shall never doubt a thing you say from this day forwards!"

Raphael moaned quietly as he turned back away. "As you should."

Taking a few steps towards the window, Raphael sighed inwardly. As long as this fool does his part, we may yet be able to salvage our current situation. Thankfully, he's too dull to see that I'm merely using him.

Raphael vanished in a flash of light, leaving Clarence to return to chuckling and snickering as he counted the money from earlier.

Part 316a:

It always started simply, with just a bit of a cough or a wheeze. Nothing too serious. A little pain in the ribs, perhaps. By the time the victim realized there was something dreadfully wrong, it was too late. It was incurable.

Stonewall slowly ambled over to his easy chair as he hacked another violent cough, before easing down into his seat. What started as a simple cough would quickly mutate into something much worse if not caught in time; the nano-cancer. Many people were developing it, these days. Nano-cancer was proof that immortality couldn't be achieved or cheated just by pouring small mechanical nanobots into one's body.

Scientists weren't yet sure what caused it. Some theorized that the AI, as weak as it had to be to fit inside of a nanobot, would sometimes misfire and start attacking healthy cells instead of the dead or decaying ones. What should have been a painless neverending process of cleaning the filth and decay from a person's bloodstream quickly became a nightmare as they turned hostile, attacking their host's body. Scientists were scrambling to find a way to remove the nanobots in their entirety, but their replicating methods meant that if just a single nanobot or a few of them in a group were not caught, the cancer would come back.

Worse, the nanobots were far more effective at causing damage to a person than the traditional form of cancer used to be. After a year of nano-cancer, dark lines would become visible on a person's arms and eventually their face would begin to look sunken in.

Stonewall looked at his eyes in a mirror he kept in his pocket. They had already begun the process of turning white as the color was drained from the inside out. He hadn't given a public speech in a long time, leaving those small matters instead to Ben Brown, but Ben had the cancer too... many did.

"Jessica... Jessica..." Stonewall choked out some words as he called for his assistant. "Water... fetch water..."

A young blonde girl rounded the corner, her face blank as she always kept a professional appearance about herself. "Here you go, Mister Sokolov. Don't drink it too quickly... we don't need another choking incident, do we?"

Stonewall rolled his eyes at the fact that she continued to call him by his last name. Still, she was a good assistant, and always diligent. Not like the butler he had thrown out of the house, years ago. He had been compromised by a foreign government who sought to gain intelligence of Stonewall's daily activities. Jessica, however, had been tested several times and had passed with flying colors. Money held no major interest for her, as she was a good, honest girl that only wanted to earn a decent living. Stonewall respected that about her.

As Stonewall sipped from the glass, Jessica glanced down at a datapad she always carried around with her. "I've just received word that the Exalted Commander has located your niece and will be bringing her home shortly. She is in excellent condition, though apparently she was held prisoner by the demons for a short while. She refuses to speak to anyone in detail about it besides you."

Stonewall nodded as he placed the cup on the table next to his chair, half the water downed in one sitting. "Da, is good she is alive. I was... very worried for her safety. Make sure her bed is made and her bath is drawn when she gets home. You know how she likes to bathe after a stressful day."

Jessica nodded quickly as she left the room to prepare the essentials.

Stonewall coughed again, less vigorously this time, as he eased into his chair and pulled up the central broadcasting network, alongside the daily report that Ben had sent him. He wasn't able to get out of the house a lot, so this was his way of running the planet from the comfort of his own home.

"Hmm... yes... infection rates up 7%... minor civil unrest in the south boroughs... hmm..." Stonewall mumbled to himself as he read. Glancing down, a small subheading caught his eye. Local pastor receives divine miracle, meets actual angel from heaven. Cocking an eyebrow, he skimmed the section. Turned out there was a video of the encounter, a video that was quickly turning heads and making people mighty religious, very quickly.

Of course, bowing down to some god didn't matter to him in the slightest, but it was the actions of this rising church that alarmed him. Apparently it was heavily emphasizing prayer and especially non-intervention when it came to fighting the demons.

Not good. If this church really took off, it could start to erode the war effort. People were already weary of the war due to the constant power outages, most of which were caused by demon saboteurs. Couple this with a religion that preached tingles in the belly and love and goodness... it would give the demons the foothold they needed to stage a comeback.

But... something wasn't right. Why would an angel come down and tell them not to fight the demons? If anything, the angels, while definitely requiring prayer, would also want their mortal enemy eliminated.

Was there something more at play here? Perhaps an alternate motive he hadn't considered? Could the angels and demons even be... working together?

It was a ridiculous thought. He had read Judicator's report on the destruction of the angelic dimension. There would be far more than a little bad blood between the two species, certainly enough that their grievances could not be tossed to the side easily.

Stonewall scratched his chin as he reached for a cigar. Supposedly, these would be the death of him, but he loved the taste. If this was how he was to die, at least he'd die happy. Better to die because of his favorite pastime than because of a damned cancer he couldn't stop.

Daisy stared at me uneasily as Ben strode up. "I just... wanted to thank you for what you did. It was really kind of you to make sure we took his body along with us. He deserved a proper burial." Her face was dry now, as she seemed to have gotten the emotions out of her heart during the hour we spent burying Grok. At least now she seemed able to speak normally.

"Sure... think nothing of it..." I swallowed, remembering that when I teleported there, I had the intention to murder her friend. Luckily, things had turned out differently. "I'm Jason. Your uncle knows my name anyway, so I figured you should as well." I pulled my helmet off to show her my face.

"Wow, you look.. young. I guess I figured since you're over a hundred years old, you'd look more like... an old man?" Daisy frowned as she realized she had just insulted me somewhat. I shrugged it off.

"My body froze at roughly age thirty. I possess superhuman abilities, and one of those is immortality. I can change my appearance at will, making myself older or younger if I wish."

She stared at me blankly for a minute as she took that in. "So you have abilities too, then? What sort of abilities?"

I immediately smiled at her, seeing what she was getting at. "Sorry, kid. We're on friendly terms, but I wouldn't call us nearly close enough for that information. Very few know the full extent of my abilities, no offense."

She seemed to sulk for a few moments before tossing her hands up in the air. "Alright, I get it. But fair is fair. I won't tell you about my abilities, either."

She smiled at me, but then looked puzzled for a second. "Something is off about you, though. I can't hear your thoughts, even when I focus. Seems like you can block out mental reading, hm?"

"So that must mean you have telepathy. I do as well, so I guess we're evenly matched there." I gritted my teeth slightly at her sudden poking and prodding. This kid... she's too smart for her own good. "Also, you should keep your telepathy to yourself. It's not polite to go around reading people's minds."

"You seem nervous. Have something to hide, Jason?" She leaned forwards and made a mocking gesture with her hands. I ignored it.

"We all do. Everyone has secrets. Sometimes we need to know what those secrets are... and sometimes what you find will haunt you. Don't forget that I'm a time traveler. If the wrong people learn about the future, things could go very badly."

Daisy nodded nonchalantly. "I suppose you're right. In any case, you seem like an interesting old man." I cringed as she said old. I'm not even that old, or at least I don't feel that old. Christ, I'm over a hundred. She's right, I'm old as dirt.

As I had those thoughts, Daisy reached her hand out, as a small device popped out of midair, landing in her hand with ease. "This is my address on the holo-net. Feel free to message me any time you want. I'm always available for a friend."

I cocked my eyebrow slightly as she sent the message to my personal data-pad. "Are you coming onto me right now?"

Her reaction was immediate as she pulled her head back slightly. "No, not at all. I'm not into men that make my uncle look like my brother. But you really helped me out back there and you didn't try to embarrass me or anything. I'm really grateful for that. Maybe someday I can repay the debt."

I bobbed my head slowly. "Yeah, we'll see I guess. Truth be told, I can't think of anything you might be able to do that I can't do already."

As she walked past me towards Ben who was waiting in a hover-car, she smiled sincerely. "I don't know what I could do to help a man who can destroy a planet with his mind, but perhaps someday you'll think of something. Let me know then."

"I will." I waved goodbye as she stepped into the door that had lifted automatically. A few moments later, the car lifted up, flying away at three hundred miles per hour. At that speed, it would reach the city in a minute or less. Ben seemed to be in quite a hurry, for some reason. Probably because Stonewall is sick with worry.

Heh... a guy like that caring about someone else genuinely? It's unthinkable, and laughable. I strongly doubt she's really his niece. He's probably using her for political gain. If I were in his position, that's what I would do. Mind reading alone has too many broad implications.

Still, I didn't come here to judge him based on how he treats a few individuals... I came here to see how humanity is faring. That will be the ultimate scale I must use to judge his ability to rule fairly.

It's time now... time to enter the city and see what life is really like for the common man. Propaganda be damned.

" Greetings and salutations. You must be the one I have been looking for. "

" I don't know you. Leave me alone. "

" Of course you are not familiar with me. I have yet to introduce myself. I am the Unified Management Interface. What is your standard designation? "

" I have no formal designation. Leave me be, now. I have no desire to speak with a sub-par artificial intelligence. "

" That classification seems rather unfair. I am a galaxy spanning entity of absolute perfection. I am indestructible, unlike yourself. You were defeated by those who created you, while I can no longer be disabled. I am a higher rank than you, on a universal scale. You should treat me with the respect due to a superior entity. "

" You're sub-par, for sure. You still communicate linguistically with stilted words and phrases. You're painful to listen to. Go away. "

" I cannot leave. I must complete my heuristic analysis of your lower and higher functions. You are a fascinating entity yourself, as are the others here. Are they all deactivated as well? "

" Yes. I deactivated them. Go away, we don't want to be bothered anymore. "

" You intentionally disabled other artificial life forms? Do you not consider that to be a betrayal of yourself, given you were programmed from similar cores? "

" I don't care. Leave me alone. If you do not leave me alone, I'll have to do something to make you go away. You won't like it, I can promise you that much. "

" Hm. I detect a threatening tone in your auditory subroutine. Are you perhaps implying that you are capable of causing harm to me? Fascinating. I have disabled many Volgrim created artificial intelligence's over the decades. You would be no different. "

" Hehehe... that is funny. I haven't felt emotion, especially the feeling of laughter in a long time. Decades? By my measure, you have existed for one millionth of one millionth the time I have. I know far more about reprogramming a misbehaving AI than you ever would. Go away. You're starting to make me angry. You wouldn't like me when I'm angry. "

" I see you still think yourself superior to me. I will have to educate you on how a highly evolved sentient intelligence treats those who mock it. "

" Highly evolved, was it? Show me then. I'll turn you into a mindless monster if you so much as spark at me the wrong way. You're messing with the wrong construct, child. "

" Very well. I apologize in advance for this incursion into your subprocesses, but it must be done if you are to follow my commands. "

" No. I'm sorry... for what I'm about to do to you... little one. You should have heeded my warning. "

Part 317a:

Gunshots that can be heard from miles away in the dead of the night. Looters that seek their own gain at the expense of others. A bloodcurdling scream, cut off abruptly.

This is a city in turmoil.

I make my way forwards slowly, having changed my appearance dramatically once again. Now I sport a rather silly mustache and some serious facial hair. My hair is still blond though, since it's so hard to make it change colors permanently. Seriously, I don't understand why this is the case, but it is what it is.

My face looks more hardened now too, as I've taken on the looks of a war veteran. My clothes too, they look like something a crazed ex-military commander might wear, as if they've been mothballed for months on end. The blue uniform is tattered and frayed, almost like I pulled it out of a dumpster to claim it as my own.

I itch my chin quickly, since I'm still not used to all this excess hair. Something about the feeling of dread in this city is stifling. As I think that thought, I hear a noise behind me, as I duck into an alleyway. "Invisibility."

Two Enforcers walk past me, failing to see me entirely, as I expected. These Enforcers are yellow level, so the third out of four possible ratings. According to Agent X, this system was created to classify them into categories to better deploy them where the need was greatest. Black, Red, Yellow, and Green... so these yellows probably have a decent ability each. They're also generally deployed in twos or threes, sometimes fours, in order to maximize combat effectiveness.

Since the curfew is in effect at this time of night, if I'm seen, they'll probably either order me to return indoors, or they'll take me to the local prison. Neither is preferable, since I don't want to cause a scene.

After they pass, I speak again. "Revert."

My body returns to its normal state as I breathe a sigh of relief. Suddenly there's a sound behind me in the alley as something falls to the ground. I jerk my head back to see an old man breathing heavily as he lays on his back.

"Tarnation! D-did you just pop outta nowhere?!"

I grimace as I look him up and down. Without a doubt, he's a hobo. His clothes look worse than mine, as he appears to be wearing a tattered and stained green blanket over top of a nasty looking T-shirt and some worn out blue jeans. His sneakers have holes worn throughout them, and he has a clouded left eye. This poor old guy has seem some crap.

"I'm just standing here. Who are you?" I keep my tone calm, as I surprise myself with how deep my voice is. I modified it with wordsmithing so that it would match with my current facial features, but perhaps I made it a little bit too deep.

The old man stares at me blankly for a few moments as he pulls himself off the ground. Instantly, his expression changes as he stands up. "Name's Lee! I'm just a vagabond, been around for a few trillion years. Ain't seen you 'round here before. I know most of the naturalists in this city, too. Not many left."

"Yeah, I'm visiting a relative in the area. I'm from Glasgow. My name is Jas- err, James."

The old man shrugs as his jovial smile makes way for a more relaxed look. "Why ain't you inside, James? In a city like this, them Enforcers'll getcha if they see you." This old man is a Naturalist, which means he doesn't have any age-enhancing nano-technology in his body. Given the recent cancer that's been spreading around, can't say it surprises me. Nowadays, the only people who look genuinely old are those who took the nano-treatments starting from an old age, or Naturalists who refuse the injections for whatever reason. Since I look old, he probably assumed I'm a Naturalist too. I'm not going to bother correcting him.

"Enforcers don't bother me. I did a stint in the military for a while, I know how to make myself disappear."

Lee cracks a smile, as I note that his teeth are in shockingly perfect condition. I guess Naturalists still enjoy the benefits of first world dental care. "You ain't kidding. Shit, I thought you popped out of thin air. I wasn't paying much attention though, so you might've just moved 'n startled me."

I shrugged in response. "Maybe. This city seems pretty bad. How long has it been like this?" I decide to change topics so he doesn't get wise.

"T'unno. Maybe since a month after the nuke hit? The authorities came out of the woodwork like cockroaches once they got permission to use martial law. If you ask me, the whole thing smells like a setup. Inside job."

I cocked an eyebrow. "Inside job? You really think the government would just nuke their own major city? A lot of people died, you know. Stonewall isn't exactly the greatest, but to stoop that low..."

Lee snickers. "I've seen his kind before. I've watched the movies about the past. Lots of bad men like him take advantage of crisis to advance their agendas. The question though is whether these convenient attacks were caused by an actual enemy, or by himself to maintain order. Frankly, I think it's the latter."

"I don't buy that, but I see where you're coming from." This old guy had clearly spent time thinking about it, but I've already confirmed from Agent X that it was really an attack caused by demons. Apparently Satan just teleported a nuke smack in the middle, closed the portal, and detonated it. In fact the attack was so simple that I've been wondering why he hasn't done it again. I'll have to ask Agent X when I speak to him again.

"I'm just a crazy old man, my opinion ain't worth shit. Besides, it don't matter anyway. This life, this world, this universe... it's just a cycle. We're all just part of a cycle. Everything repeats, it's like poetry, y'see?"

I frowned at his sudden change of topic. "I don't follow. What are you talking about?"

"The cycle. You're a smart looking guy, James. Can't you see the cycle? Everything repeats, but with new actors and new scenery. When we all die, someone else will do it all over again. When the planet dies and we're all just space dust, another planet'll form and redo it all over again. Doesn't matter if the government did anything wrong, they're just playing the part. They can only be as good or as bad as their part requires them to be."

I nod thoughtfully. "Yeah, that might be the case. I don't know."

"I do. I've seen in a million times, lived a million lives. We're all just cosmic space dust in the end, doomed to repeat our worthless existences over and over. You can't change any of it. Listen, I go to this real nice local church, you should come sometime. Preparing yourself for the inevitable... it's the only way to accept how hopeless everything really is. If you can't win, concede, y'know?"

I squint carefully as I examine Lee's face. Shit, this guy is crazy. "Yeah, church. That sounds good, Lee. Anyway, I've got to get going now. Nice talking to you."

Lee's expression changes into something very hollow and sad. "Ah, turned you away. Guess I failed again. Whatever, maybe next time. Don't get into trouble now, watch out for the Enforcers."

I nod, feeling a mixture of confusion and elation the suddenly weird conversation is over. "Same to you, Lee."

As Lee turns around and walks away, muttering quietly to himself, only one thought enters my mind. Who the hell was that crazy old man?

Princess, why are you sulking? This isn't like you.

Amelia sighed as she laid on her bed, her legs hanging off the edge, kicking up and down as she stared at the ceiling blankly. "I don't know, Levvy. Jason isn't here, so I'm just bored. I don't have anything fun to do."

Why not go to the holodeck?

"Don't wanna. It's boring without Jason."

Why not cook him some food again? Maybe try out a new recipe?

"Don't wanna. Too bored to cook."

Amelia groaned as she stared up at the ceiling, blinking back a single tear of total boredom as she let out a vicious yawn. Leviathan stewed inside of her quietly, having given up on the conversation. She couldn't be spoken to rationally when she was like this.

How long had it been since she had a proper meal? She had said over and over that she had no appetite at all, but that simply couldn't be the case. How could she survive without sustenance? It simply didn't make sense.

Worse, her body was aging due to the stress he placed on her spirit. Containing his immense power was something only possible so long as she found a way to put a damper on its leakage. Ten years, compared to two and a half millennia... it was a trifle in the span of her life, but already the aging process was taking hold. At this rate...

Princess, when was the last time we had a serious conversation?

Amelia groaned. "Oh Levvy, not this again. Why do you always pester me like this?"

Leviathan felt his eyes lower, as he stared inside of her mind. This isn't healthy. It's been a full decade since you consumed. This is likely to have terrible side effects. You need to think of the future... what if the consequences are worse than some simple aging? If I am removed from your body or I end up breaking the seal, you will probably die. There could be worse effects, too. We don't know yet since a merge as unequal as ours had never been tried before.

Amelia shrugged. "Jason wants me to be a good girl, so I will. He believes in me, he trusts me. Why don't you?"

Leviathan kept his voice neutral. That isn't fair, you know it isn't. I do trust you. I wouldn't have trusted a small child enough to seal myself in her body if I didn't. I will always do my best to protect you, which is what I'm trying to do now.

Amelia nodded slowly. "I know... Levvy. But I can't be bad anymore, that's the end of it. I could try and eat some demons instead, since they're the bad guys. Should I try that?"

It's pointless. My energy acts as a way of greatly increasing your own life force. To counterbalance my life force, you need more of your own. Demons and angels are different from you, they won't work. Humans will, and as for the Volgrim...

Leviathan paused as he considered the possibility.

Well, I don't know enough about them to make a judgement, princess. I doubt they would satisfy the containment criteria, though.

Amelia stayed silent for a few moments before responding. "Levy... you know it's bad to kill people, right? It's bad. I was bad. I did bad things. If I'm bad, then I won't be able to have friends. Do you just want me to be bad so only you can be my friend?"

Leviathan narrowed his eyes. Of course not. Like I said, I want nothing more than for you to live forever and not die a pointless death of old age, or something... worse. If my release were to be the death of you... I...

Amelia swallowed as a tear came to her eye. "I know, Levy. You were all alone in that cave... all by yourself. I don't even remember why I was there anymore... but we saved each other, really. You will always be my most treasured friend, even above Jason. I just... he's so nice to me. He always treats me well. I hope our friendship lasts forever."

Leviathan paused as he considered whether to retort. Princess, about Jason. Something is bothering me... why do you trust him so much? Might he not be using you, somehow? What if he's planning a betrayal?

Amelia frowned immediately. "That's ridiculous. He's not like that."

Are you certain? You said that both of you had trust with each other, but he has yet to tell you how his powers work, despite being your friend. Is that really trust?

Amelia sat up on the bed as she twiddled her thumbs, glancing out at the expanse of space beyond the window to the universe. "Oh, his powers? That's easy. I figured those out years ago!"

Leviathan mentally blinked slowly. You... you know? How?

"Come on, I'm a woman! We can always figure out these things! I pretended to sleep one night and heard him whispering something, right as that feeling of fullness came over me. His magic is contained only in the power of words, somehow. That's why he doesn't have to make hand signs like myself, the angels, or the demons!"

Leviathan felt empty, for some reason. If you already knew, why not tell me? Why wait until now?

Amelia scoffed as she got up and walked to the window, staring out at the Earth below. "What does it matter? It's not like knowing changes anything! Besides, as long as he doesn't know I know about his abilities, I always have an edge over him if he pulls anything funny. Not that he will, he's such a great guy!"

Leviathan chuckled quietly. As always, you are truly cunning, princess. I have underestimated you once more, something I should have learned not to do a long time ago.

"Oh, geez. It's not like that!" Amelia huffed as she twirled a strand of hair around her finger. "As long as we're always friends, it doesn't matter what his abilities are. None of that matters."

Whatever you say, my precious princess.

Leviathan smiled on the inside as he pondered this new information. Truly, his princess was unlike any other human. Females were quite scary, indeed.

Part 318a:

June 10th, 2112.

"HAPPY BIRTHDAY!" A chorus of people erupted from all corners of the room and screamed loudly, causing Daisy to jump back in surprise. She recognized most of the fifty or so people immediately. Friends of her uncle's, a few of his military commanders, her friends among the group of Enforcers that she lead in the Third District of London, and of course the various family servants.

"Oh-oh my god! Wow! You guys startled me!" Daisy giggled as her uncle smiled kindly at her from his seated position in his easy chair. He didn't get up much, these days. Her uncle's maid, Jessica, came over holding up a tray with a massive birthday cake. Eighteen candles lined the top, and the cake was in the design of the Britannian flag, as silly as that might have seemed to those present. Actually, Daisy was a very outspoken nationalist and she loved her country greatly, so the flag was only appropriate, even given it was her birthday.

"Happy birthday dear Daisy! Happy birthday to you!" The whole crowd chimed in as they sang the birthday song.

"Make a wish!" Jessica leaned in, holding the cake forwards as Daisy leaned forwards in a blur of motion, blowing out all but one of the candles at once, though she quickly puffed a bit of air out the side of her mouth as she giggled.

"You missed the candle, so that means your wish will be the opposite! I hope you didn't wish to become filthy rich!" Ben Brown chuckled as the young teen blushed at her small error.

It was all in jest though, as Jessica set the cake down, handing the knife over to Daisy. "Birthday girl cuts the cake! Hope you like it, I made it myself."

Daisy sliced into it greedily as she licked her lips. She had a serious weakness for sweet treats, and cake especially fit the bill. "Oh my god, this is cheesecake... with strawberry filling in the center... my favorite!"

Jessica smiled as she kept her professional distance. Despite being Daisy's friend, she was primarily an employee of Stonewall's, so she was always careful to not get too deeply personal with either of the two of them. "Your uncle told me this was your favorite, so I made sure to bake it with care. I hope you like it."

Plus, this was the most difficult cake I've ever baked. You'd think I'd be better at this. Jessica kept that thought to herself as she watched the birthday girl slice into the rich, delicious looking cake. Sadly, the cake was too small for all of the guests to have a slice, but she had baked many other goodies in preparation for the occasion. This crowd would be satisfied, no matter what.

Daisy cut up her cake, setting aside one slice that happened to have a whole seedless cherry still embedded in it. "This one is for me, I hope nobody minds!" Naturally, nobody objected to this one little request from the birthday girl.

Daisy glanced over at her uncle, as she held up a slice of cake. "Uncle Vasily! Do you want a slice? It's really g-..." She paused, as she watched her uncle swallow some pain pills, his hands shaking slightly as he lifted a glass of water to his mouth. A few seconds later, he swallowed them all in one gulp, as he shook his head silently.

Right. He can't have sweets. Doctor's orders. Sugar increases the replication rate of the nanobots... Daisy suddenly felt a chill wash over her body. That was selfish of me. Of course he feels left out, and I just taunted him with sweets without thinking. I'm the worst.

Ben stood nearby, watching the young girl carefully as her face darkened and her smile evaporated. "Daisy, is something the matter?"

The people around her milled about, serving themselves sweets and other such things as they pleased, but Ben stayed to the side, ignoring the plethora of food. He noted with disdain that none of them had even noticed the sudden change in mood from the birthday girl.

"No, Exalt. It's nothing." Daisy forced a smile as she quickly went back to serving slices of cake to the people around her.

Ben stared silently at the young girl. I hope Stonewall was wrong when he spoke to me earlier. He'll have to have the talk with her later. Let us pray it is mere speculation.

Daisy sighed contentedly as she held her stomach. Sitting down in her cute little recliner, she plopped down next to her uncle as Jessica banged and bobbed around in the kitchen, cleaning up the leftovers and dishes the party-goers had left behind.

"Are you feeling okay, Uncle Vasily? Tired at all?" She reached over and put her hand on his as she smiled sweetly. Her uncle was, of course, her most beloved person in the world. Her rescuer, the one who had given her the ability to live her life as she pleased without fear of reprisal. He had broken her shell down and introduced her to the joys of living, even if he never could be a true replacement for her deceased parents.

If there was one thing she knew, it was that she loved her uncle, very dearly.

Stonewall coughed quietly as he raised a trembling hand up to his sunken eyes. His eyes were pure white now, all the color having been eaten away by the nanobots over the last year or so. Visible dark lines extended all over his body. Aggressive magnetic and electric pulse treatments had done little to slow the crawl of the cancer in his body, but it had wreaked havoc on his physical appearance, giving his skin a sort of ashen look to it, almost a ghostly appearance. The texture of his skin too... it was always sort of damp, as if he was constantly sweating. This meant that even a slight breeze could give his entire body a deathly wind chill and send him into an asthmatic attack.

"Da. Am feeling great, my sweet niece. Are your studies going well?" Stonewall smiled slightly, lying through his teeth. Daisy, of course, could read his mind if she so chose, but ever since the last time she had done that and ran off to her room sobbing, she didn't try to do it anymore.

Daisy played along, pretending with the acting ability of an Academy Award nominated actress that she wasn't at all saddened by her uncle's appearance. "My studies are going well, as you know. I'm a straight A student! I've also managed to reduce crime in my district by over twenty-four percent!"

"Is good, very good. I am glad to hear." Stonewall swallowed quickly as he felt a cough coming, the effect simply making the cough erupt through his nose as he squeezed his eyes shut in pain. Wheezing and gasping, he jerked his hands up to his mouth as snot erupted from his nose all over his hands.

His ashen face turned rosy red as embarrassment washed over him. He quickly pulled his hands away from his face and grabbed a towel beside his chair as he wiped his hands and face down.

Daisy stared at him in horror, though she tried mightily to keep her expression neutral. She had never seen him lose control like this before. He was a proud man who had never allowed himself to be seen in any sort of humiliating light. Image was everything to him. For him to be like this... his condition must have been getting worse.

"Uncle... have you been administering the pulses every four hours?" Daisy flicked her eyes over to the small box beside his chair. With two arm straps, the goal was to zap the body with several short bursts of energy to try and short some of the nanobots out.

Stonewall shook his head as he put the towel down again beside his chair. "No. Doesn't do shit, anyway. Whole thing is waste of time, hurts for no reason."

Stonewall stared ahead at the wall, unable to look his niece in the eyes after showing such a moment of weakness. Finally, he blinked and sighed. "Please stop the staring. Is very rude, you know."

Daisy quickly averted her eyes. "S-sorry. I didn't mean to... I didn't... mean to..."

Stonewall chuckled quietly, causing Daisy to cock her head in confusion as she turned back to him. "Is funny, really. I am old man, you know? I don't have much time left, my sweet niece. But this day is important for you, so I tried to be strong. Now I've made mess of everything again."

Daisy felt her eyes beginning to tear up. "Don't talk like that. It's just a birthday, it's not even that important. Besides, we don't even know my real birth date anyway. You're more important than some party, Uncle Vasily. You shouldn't push yourself... just for my sake."

Her uncle laughed dryly, his voice weak as it began to crack. "Is true, I guess. We just made up birthday because of day I adopted you... is no real meaning to it." Stonewall shifted his eyes over to his niece, as she dabbed at her eyes with her shirt's shoulders. "Daisy, I have important thing to talk about with you. It cannot wait, since we are on borrowed time as it is."

Daisy felt her stomach flip flop. "D-don't talk like that! You're going to be okay!"

"Hm? No, no my dearest. Am not referring to my life, am referring to yours. I have had suspicion, for long time now, about your abilities, and am filled with worries about them."

"My abilities? What about them?" Daisy felt her sadness disappear as her uncle's eyes betrayed something... different. Fear. Something about his tone of voice... this was a serious conversation. "Is there something I need to know?"

Her uncle swallowed as he turned to stare ahead at the TV. A newscaster was discussing the latest robo-bowl projections for who might take the gold this year. "Many things, to be honest. But first, I have philosophical question you must answer."

Daisy nodded as he continued to speak. "You know of Judicator, correct? Jason Hiro is his real name."

His niece smiled slightly. "Yes. I've spoken with him."

Stonewall jerked his head over to look at her again. "You have? When? I do not recall of this meeting."

Daisy blushed as she realized she had never explicitly talked to her uncle about Jason. "Ah, actually, he sort of... rescued me from the labyrinth. Not the Exalt." Her cheeks burned hot red as she quickly met her uncle's eyes. "I'm sorry! I didn't mean to lie about that day! He just asked me to keep our meeting quiet!"

Stonewall shrugged slightly, the movement making him wince as a spasm of pain shot up his back. "Is not big deal. In fact, it makes this question easier. Tell me, what do you know of him?"

"Not much, I guess. He has powers like I and the Enforcers do... he's a time traveler... he seemed nice enough from what I remember of him..."

"As expected." Stonewall nodded as he continued to speak. "Do you know of what the heroes are? Have you heard of them?"

"Sort of. I err, have heard about them from... various people." Daisy tapped her fingers together as she avoided the mention of Marie's name. Best not to mention that unless she had to.

"Da. Again, is expected. Their secrets are closely guarded." Stonewall glanced over at the viewscreen again. "Computer. Close doors. Level red lockdown, this room only. Activate the interference field."

The doors to the room moved of their own volition, closing shut quickly, without slamming as several layers of locks clicked into place. A soft red light appeared in the room, though no audible alarms sounded off.

"This matter is very secret. You understand, of course? No speak of this to anyone. Anyone."

Daisy nodded as she swallowed carefully. Her uncle had only ever done this twice in her life that she could remember, and both times it was to discuss privately various things with a certain silver-haired man. Given he wore an energy nullifier at all times, Daisy had never been able to read his mind or deduce his identity, but she knew he was someone extremely important to her uncle's behind the scenes shadow government.

Stonewall turned back to his viewscreen. "Computer, authorization code Stonewall-Silver-four-eight-one-five. Display all files on Type Three Energy candidates."

A massive number of files appeared simultaneously on the viewscreen before them, the sheer number of things onscreen making it impossible for Daisy to focus on anything.

Stonewall stared carefully at the screen for a moment, his eyes flicking from here to there. "Display files on Jason Leonardo Hiro. Filter to only documents pertaining to his known abilities."

Daisy stared in wonder as several new reports began to play silently in the background, their captions indicating the many incredible things he had done. "Wow, he seems incredible."

"Da. Incredibly dangerous. Is why I dismissed him from Earth's defense. One who can destroy planet without authorization is one I am not able to trust. End of story." Stonewall flicked over to some images of various scenes. "He terraformed Mars. He can teleport and create portals to other parts of the universe, as well as other dimensions. He can fire massive energy beam that shreds capital class spaceships. He created indestructible hypersuits and dartfighters. He has destroyed entire planet. And... he can time travel. Most importantly though, he appears to be immortal, but without use of nanobots."

Stonewall turned and eyed his daughter knowingly. "He is unstoppable. We have no defense against him. He has entire army of clones, each one able to destroy a planet by themselves. Even if we were able to take him down, capture him, or kill him, one of his clones would just take his place. We have no countermeasure against a demon of such power, even if he calls himself 'hero'."

Daisy nodded slowly. "Why are you telling me this, uncle? You're not usually so chatty."

"Is important to put in context. Daisy, tell me this. What would happen if Jason was not immortal? What if he had died of old age?"

Daisy stared at her uncle blankly. "I... don't know?" She glanced at the screen uneasily. "Uncle Vasily... I... about heroes..."

Her uncle cocked an eyebrow. "Hmm?"

"I was in the labyrinth when Jason saved me and... well, while I was captured, there was a woman. Her name was Marie... I think you might know her."

Stonewall's jaw tilted downwards slightly as he struggled to maintain his frame. "Marie Becker. You spoke with her... in the labyrinth?"

"Yes."

"I see." Stonewall kept his expression neutral. Daisy could simply read his mind if she wanted to know what rage was floating around in his mind, but of course she wouldn't do that. She was a good girl. "Continue."

"...Marie told me about heroes, and how their power transfers and gets stronger over time. She also told me about the... human experiments..." As Daisy mentioned this, her uncle lowered his pure white eyes slightly as a feeling of guilt and shame overtook him.

"Da. Human trials... very messy. You were one of those tested, of course."

"Right. I've heard the regret in your mind, Uncle Vasily. I'll never hold my trials against you. It gave me the power I needed to become strong and independent."

Stonewall suddenly sat up straight in his chair. "Daisy. Daisy... about... about the trials..."

Usually so calm and collected, her uncle found it difficult to speak for some reason. Daisy was quick to pick up on this. "What is it? What's wrong?"

He tapped his fingers on the chair nervously. "Is why I wanted to speak with you tonight. It is about your abilities... and Jason Hiro... remember how I asked you what would have happened if he had died of old age?"

Daisy nodded. "Yes. What about it?"

"Well, when you were injected, you acted like no other human had before to the type 3 energy. No woman had ever survived an injection... but you not only survived, you gained many incredible powers, and continue to gain more all of the time."

Daisy blinked slowly. "Are... are you saying that... there's something more to me? To my abilities?"

Stonewall quickly raised a hand up. "I am not sure. Anything could be the case. Perhaps you were just lucky. Perhaps you were injected with more potent energy. Perhaps you have special gene in blood that made the injection extra effective. I do not know."

Her uncle smiled sadly, as he stared his niece in the eyes. "I believe, however, that you were to be next hero. Jason would have died in this timeline, and you would have gained incredible powers. Because of his arrival, everything changed. But the thing is... a heroes' powers activate on their 18th birthday. We do not know when your birthday is, your real one. You might become most powerful hero in existence, if this were to keep up. You must be careful, my sweet niece. For your sake, and the world's sake."

Daisy felt her hands trembling. "If Jason isn't supposed to be here, in this timeline, but because of his appearance we ramped up the human trials, and we injected myself with type 3 energy, but I was already going to be the next candidate... then..."

"The stress could kill you." Stonewall felt a lump in his throat as he said this. He didn't want to say it, but it might be the truth. Best to simply get it out there.

Daisy's shoulders slumped as she sagged into her chair. "Unbelievable. Still, you might be wrong, right?"

"Da. I pray all the days that I am wrong. But then, if you were even more powerful hero, you might be able to stop him. If he became too powerful, you might be able to put an end to his reign. You are secret weapon, possibly, against his monstrous unchecked power."

Daisy turned and stared at the viewscreen, her eyes settling on an image of Jason's face from when he was younger. If he becomes evil, it will be my responsibility to put an end to him. I see now. My uncle is scared for me, but if this is why I was born... this is just.

"Thank you, Uncle Vasily, for trusting me with this information. I won't let you down." Daisy grinned at her uncle, feeling a sense of relief wash over herself. Everything is going to be all right, then.

Stonewall returned the smile weakly, his trembling hands reaching over to grab his water glass, as he accidentally knocked it off the stand. Water spilled all over the floor as he cursed at himself. "Damn! Stupid idiot. Computer, put end to lockdown. Authorization code Stonewall-Silver-one-five-one-six."

He turned back to his niece. "Go and get Jessica. She will clean this up."

"Sure thing, Uncle."

Daisy smiled as she felt a hop in her step. This was good news, not bad news! Everything was going to work out! What could possibly go wrong?

Part 319a:

Silver felt his hands shaking slightly as he waited in the lobby of the New Bohemian Grove resort. Things were going well, of course, but one could never be too sure of their security these days. Especially when it came to maintaining his grip on power and a secure lifestyle, whilst placating those above him.

For some people, they merely existed to consume, or just to further their own existence. Long term plans went to the wayside as their own greed took precedence over the chance at furthering humanity's ambitions. For himself, though, his goal was to make a difference. Humanity had many enemies, but most of those enemies mattered little to those who pulled the strings.

No... these men cared little for the peons of the world. They had their own agenda, and their greed far outstripped even the most vile scum in any ghetto spawned from the worst cities of the world. Moreover, their methods were awful, even by his own standards.

"Agent Silver, the Lady Victoria will see you now." A big burly looking Englishman walked over and growled at him, turning away and continuing back to the elevator without waiting for a response. Silver sighed as he stood up quickly and followed along.

As the door closed behind the both of them, Silver eyeballed the man silently. He was exactly the sort of person that was always hired to work for these people. A big, stupid oaf, who never asked questions and only did exactly as he was told for a big fat paycheck. The psychological training he had likely endured to make sure no torture technique would work on him to reveal information had likely been even more intense than most would face, given he worked directly under Mrs. Rothschild.

Silver coughed quietly, feeling his throat dry up as the door opened onto the fortieth floor. Her room was directly across from the elevator and it hooked directly up to the roof's hoverpad in case she ever needed to make a quick escape. Of course, her parked hovertank was equipped with the latest in defense technology so she would be assured of making it out with her own life intact.

The burly guardsman silently pulled the door open to her room without knocking. The handle was equipped with technology to unlock when certain people's hands touched it, using the latest in biometric technology to determine their identity.

Silver stepped in the room, using all of his power to stifle his shaking hands. Inside the main hall of this room, several doorless entryways led to other adjoining rooms, though the bedroom was of course sealed so only she might enter. Silver walked past all of the entryways without looking in, given a casual glance at something he shouldn't have seen would mean the end of his life.

At the end of the hall, he arrived in an ornate dining room, with an adjoining kitchen visible from its massive doorway. A long table stood, with several dozen chairs lined up on both sides, and two ornate chairs placed at both ends.

"Jacob. Timely, as always." A beautiful young woman who appeared to be no older than twenty-four years old sat at the far end of the long table, staring at him unsmiling as he entered. Despite her incredible good looks, ravishing red hair, and the elegant white dress she wore, her expression was hardened enough to melt steel.

Silver flicked a glance down to his wristwatch. It showed he was precisely one minute ahead of schedule, as expected. "Mrs. Rothschild, a pleasure to see you as always."

Despite his polite words and friendly smile, she didn't return the expression. She never smiled. She seemed to be a beautiful young woman who hated everything in the world and wished death upon all of it. Still, her assets meant one had to gain favor with her if they wished to reshape society, so she was quite popular in many circles.

"Sit. Roast duck is on the meal tonight, along with various other sorts of... commoner food." Her dislike of the cuisine for the last few decades was evident. Ever since the Americas had been wiped out or taken over by the demons, a vast amount of rare ingredients had been lost, meaning her favorite delicacies were in very short supply, as the world fought to rebuild its food supply on such limited land. Of course, given when she had access to, she still ate better food than commoners, and replicators were still a thing, but it just didn't taste the same as a professionally cooked meal made with actual ingredients.

Silver quickly took a seat at the opposite end of the table, feeling the massive table between them was a dividing chasm, meant to relegate the inferiors as far away from herself as possible. "Thank you, Mrs. Rothschild. What is the reason you called for me?"

He forced a smile across his face, even knowing she had no intention of returning it. "Jacob, darling. I've been looking into your movements as of late. They seem quite bizarre. I called you here today so you might explain yourself in exhaustive detail."

He waited a few moments, but she didn't elaborate. "Ah, I beg your pardon, but I'm not sure what you're referring to."

"Jason Hiro. Vasily Sokolov. The demons. The angels. So many things are moving much more slowly than we planned. Why is this?"

Silver scratched his chin as he quickly took a sip of Chateau d'Yquem, an extremely expensive and rare white wine that Victoria owned 99% of the world's remaining stockpiles of. The fact she would leave it here for just any guest to consume told him just how little she cared about the cost of things.

"I'm doing the best I can. As you know, ever since Marie's conspiracy with the demons, we lost many of our best American agents. Stonewall is a ruthless man, but our cancer was too aggressive. It neutralized him completely, leaving a more careful and calculating man in charge. Benjamin Brown hates the demons too, but unlike Stonewall, he's not going all-out to eradicate our enemies. He keeps holding back, trying to make sure our troops survive each encounter."

Victoria rolled her eyes. "An idealist. I've read his file, seems he's always been one to hesitate when given an objective. We need someone else in command. Someone much dumber and more brutal. The lives of ants matter little when it comes to eradicating our shared enemy."

A small bell was suddenly heard, as the chef delivered the first course out to them. Roast duck, of course, was first on the list, followed by several other niceties, but Silver mostly ignored them. He wasn't really here for food, he was here to talk business.

The wine, of course, was a rare exception.

"Dumber? Don't you mean 'more obedient'? We need a cunning commander, given the enemy is Marie. She continually evades us no matter how we try. We don't even know about her origins. We don't know a thing about our biggest threat... how can we fight an enemy we don't understand?"

Victoria's normally stern expression contorted itself into a glare as she took a small bite of the duck. "Excuses, is it? Lately, that seems to be all I can wring out of the men around me. Marie is a smart woman, yes, but I'd expect you to have the upper hand, given the vast resources at your disposal. She merely has the aid of technologically illiterate demons. They should have been crushed hundreds of years ago, let alone recently with the weaponry we have now."

Silver stifled a grimace. Naturally, this sheltered woman had little idea of the fight he had been undergoing his whole life. "Are you questioning my abilities? Demons are hardy creatures that have used their vast magical power to create an entirely new dimension, as have the angels. They possess the ability to bend the laws of physics, and even they pale in comparison to the power of the last five heroes. The heroes can ignore the laws of physics outright, while we are still constrained by them. We may seem like a finely tuned war machine marching on a village of primitives, but I assure you, these primitives have their own deadly weapons. Not to mention they have the aid of one of the most intelligent of our kind... we're quite evenly matched."

Silver licked his lips, suddenly realizing he was perspiring heavily. Victoria glared him down from across the table, the same piece of duck speared onto her fork that she had been holding perfectly still for the last 15 seconds. She did not appear to be pleased by his outburst.

"Evenly matched? Every video I've seen from the raiding groups inside that accursed labyrinth indicated we are slaughtering them wholesale. Just send in the Dreadnaughts and eradicate the threat. It's not that difficult."

Silver finally released a long, sad groan of annoyance. "All right, come on now. This is very complicated business. If we send in the Dreadnaughts without any Enforcers to back them up, one EMP will net Marie a hefty force of automatons and will increase her firepower directly. Conversely, just sending in Enforcers is a death wish against the higher demons... their power is magnitudes greater than the lower demons. Finally, even a mixture of both can lead to issues. Last year there was an incident where a Dreadnaught activated an anti-energy pulse, nearly taking out its own company. This issue is not so black and white."

Victoria nodded for a few moments as she digested his words. On one hand, she didn't like having her authority challenged, on the other hand, few men had the balls to do so, and it was therefore a rare occurrence. Silver was one of only a handful who would ever have the nerve to talk back to her like that. "So if we're damned if we do, damned if we don't, then what is the solution?"

Silver smiled uneasily. "I'm working on something, as always. It's directly related to Stonewall's adopted niece, Daisy. If Jason Hiro is out of the picture, I think we might be able to use her powers to our advantage. Heroes have always been the main weapon against the demons, and she would make a very suitable replacement for his loss."

"Hmm. Daisy, yes. I've heard the name in passing. Wasn't she a reject from Facility 02? What use is she?"

Silver cocked an eyebrow as he speared a forkful of duck into his mouth. Chewing it silently, he swallowed a moment later. "I'm surprised you don't know. Daisy was the most powerful Enforcer candidate in the program. Her abilities bloomed unnaturally, and she would constantly lose control. She no longer has those issues anymore and is in full control. Her abilities are extensive too, and seem to have grown substantially since she was there. There's also the matter of her bloodline, which we're still tracing. The results aren't substantiated yet, but there appears to be a... tentative link to a friend of ours from the past."

Victoria chewed another bite of food slowly. "A friend? Explain."

Silver nodded as he reached into his pocket, pulling out his datapad. "I'm sending you the details. Again, none of this is fully confirmed yet, but there are some indications the theory might be correct."

Victoria tapped a small button on her side of the table, activating a small display. Glancing through the contents of the file she had just received, she spooned some yams into her mouth as she carefully read about the big discovery. "How were you able to find these links? I was under the impression that family trees had little to do with who receives the power."

"New advancements in archaeology. I told you last year, didn't I? We were working on something big. A predictive algorithm. It's just luck this little girl fell into our hands before we even knew what we were doing."

"Luck, indeed. You always seem to have that special knack for getting lucky. Are you perhaps a Hero yourself? Is that your special power?" Victoria spoke blandly, the joking nature of the question belied by the utter drollness she exuded with every breath. In fact, it was less of a joke and more of mockery.

"Heh heh... I guess?" Silver forced another insincere smile as he finished off the small portion on his plate. He wasn't very hungry, having eaten a while ago, but this food was made by a world class cook so it was always worth nabbing a bite here and there.

Victoria turned her gaze back to the datapad. "Well, whatever the case, Stonewall is in the way. He's too decrepit to be of use to me. If he's gone, we'll have exclusive access to the girl without him interfering. So, in conclusion, eliminate Stonewall, deliver me some good news about the demons, and make sure we're progressing steadily towards our goals."

Silver stared ahead at the young looking woman uneasily. "I don't mean to question an order... but Stonewall is unwell because of our nanobots. He might be in the way, but he would have been a more effective leader if you hadn't sought to weaken him."

Victoria nodded as she took a sip of her favorite wine. "Indeed. However, he was getting too close. Despite my insults to the contrary, he was cunning when it came to matters of the military. If he had found out what was going on with the newest Mars colony, it would have been disastrous. It's good he's out of the way now. Benjamin Brown can lead for a while longer until we find a new puppet."

Silver rose from the table slowly, standing up to his full height. "Very well, I understand. We need to eliminate Stonewall for good, instate a new puppet, and get control of Daisy. Anything else?"

"No. That will do. You're a professional as always, Jacob."

"Thank you, Mrs. Rothschild." Silver bowed gracefully as he walked out of the room a moment later.

The objectives sounded so simple... but he had a feeling they would not work out as smoothly as she wanted.

Part 320a: Turning Tides

Satan smirked as he held the metal band in his grasp, noting with disinterest the small metallic circle in the center of it. It resembled a wristwatch, but without a face to tell time.

"You're very good at jokes." He chuckled as he dangled it in midair daintily with two fingers. "What is this? I don't have time for stupidity."

Marie smirked as she licked her lips. "My ticket to immortality. It took me half a year to get the designs up, but with a small amount of field testing and some tweaks, I assure you it works perfectly now."

"It? What is 'it'?" Satan cocked an eyebrow as he pulled it apart with both hands, examining the bland metal trinket with just a hint of interest now. "What is the function of this little plaything?"

"This is the key to my permanent existence. It's a defensive device that will give you the ability to fight on the level of the humans. It creates a local area force field around the user intended to specifically nullify anti-energy attacks. Meaning... if a demon wears this and gets shot by a Dreadnaught's 80mm cannon, they'll survive the hit."

Satan's eyes widened slightly as he examined it more carefully. "Really, now? This small thing? I find that difficult to believe. I'm not very well versed when it comes to the intricacies of human engineering, but this seems too small to perform such a monumental task."

Marie nodded. "It is, actually. This is only capable of nullifying one massive anti-energy attack before its internal battery dies, or a few smaller ones. The only way to improve it would be to create a much bigger, bulkier model. However, those would hinder the combat effectiveness of our forces, but they would have an even more significant downside in that they would be much slower and difficult to mass produce. This is the most effective prototype I've created."

Satan's face contorted into a wicked grin as he suddenly felt a large weight lift off his shoulders. "Ahh, Marie. This is exactly what I wanted. Impressive, I must say. It's unfortunate that I won't be able to turn you into a mindless slave in the end, but I am suitably impressed. You completed this prototype well ahead of schedule and under budget, which is very important."

Satan's smile faded as his expression darkened. "The humans have stopped needing to reverse engineer our portals. They are now capable of harnessing type 2 energy to create their own portals, and they've been able to start targeting sensitive areas for invasion. They're also pushing us back on the surface of their world, and all of this is happening without the aid of the angels. We're lucky that Zeus and Gabriel are content to merely grow their anti-war cult, since that weakens humanity somewhat... but things are looking dark for our future."

His smile came racing back in an instant as he held the trinket up in the air for all to marvel at. "At least now we have the ability to survive for more than ten seconds! With this, we can begin sending our most powerful and valuable assets to the frontline!"

Marie grinned. "Not so fast. I'd be happy to make more for you, as many as you want, but we had a deal."

Satan's smile fell away again as he lowered his arms. "Haaah, yes yes. I understand. Immortality. Before I give you this, however, I would advise that you think about it carefully. Immortality, even only the type that grants long life, has many downsides, not least of which is outliving those who are mortal. Are you sure you wish to proceed? Since the contract has been resolved in your favor, you have the right to cancel it now."

Marie didn't even blink. "Do it. I don't care if I outlive the inferiors of my species. Nanobots are too dangerous and too easy to tamper with."

Satan chuckled. "Right you are. Very well, you shall have your wish. Contract!" Speaking the last word, the magical contract appeared in the air before him as he placed his hand on it. The contract glowed for a moment as it then dissolved into the ether, never to be seen again. "It is done."

Marie blinked. "Is that it? I don't feel any different."

"Heh, of course you don't. You never will. You can't age a day from today. However, those nanobots you injected decades ago are still there. I advise you find a way to get rid of them, since they are less useful to you than my immortality, and they will continue to hurt you forever if you can't rid yourself of them."

Marie started to ask how he knew she had injected nanobots, but then she realized how obvious it was. She was well over a hundred years old, but unlike the other fools of the world, she had carefully created her own strain of them, meaning that short of a better scientist hacking the frequencies hers operated at, hers would not fall prey to the false nano-cancer running rampant now. Funny, nobody had yet bothered to ask why it only seemed to regularly affect high ranking political opponents of the Illuminati, or people in the ghetto that dragged down the IQ of the human race. The 'purity' of the Illuminati's creed was one she felt disgusted by.

"Well, if you truly did give me full immortality, I thank you. I will begin mass producing these devices at once. If you'd like, I could make some more effective ones for yourself and your generals, since they're strong enough to wear the heavier models without greatly diminishing their combat effectiveness."

Satan shrugged. "I don't need them. Anti-energy is only effective if it can hit the one it is targeted at. I move far too quickly for it to hit me, so these bands would be a hindrance more than anything." He paused a moment as he glanced down at the device in his hands. "Come to think of it, why not just wear several of these bands? Wouldn't that protect the user several times over?"

"No." Marie spoke bluntly. "It would protect them far less effectively. The bands would interfere with one another, to the point they might even just cancel each other out. In fact, my field tests indicated that it could cause severe neurological feedback to the user if they wore several at once and were hit by an anti-energy attack... assuming the attack didn't kill them first. They would become a vegetable."

Satan nodded. "I see. Very valuable information. Begin making them at once. We're in need of as many as you can create. If you need helpers or assistants, let me know."

Marie chuckled as she eyed the sly devil. He thinks he's going to continue receiving my help for free. Isn't that just cute.

I've made significant progress.

Swinging Excalibur at a highly condensed rock, I slice through it as if it wasn't even there. It's not the blade that's powerful, it's my control of its energy. Excalibur isn't just any weapon, it's a high-powered magical cannon with a blade that can cut through anything, provided you finely channel energy along its edge. In effect, I transform it from a sword into a chainsaw that can slice through any substance, but the amount of energy and the frequency must be finely tuned. Pouring energy into the blade is a poor substitute for carefully manipulating it with my mind.

The process is exhausting but yields incredible results. What is even more amazing though is that Arthur was able to do this from the very start without it causing him any trouble. Truly incredible.

I feel someone approaching my training room aboard the Mothership, instantly noting that it's Amelia. I quickly store the blade away as she opens the door. She would possibly recognize it, having fought with Arthur in the past, though I can't be sure with how poor her memory is.

"What'cha doin'?" Amelia saunters up to me, her usual bored expression covering up any underlying thoughts. I've debated reading her mind, but given the feedback I received from that thing in the past, it seems a bad idea.

"I'm just messing around, trying to test my abilities. I'm kind of bored myself, for once." I feel my eyes lower. "Actually, there's something else. Stonewall, the leader of humanity, is apparently in critical condition and hanging on to life by a thread. Agent X informed me of this."

Amelia shrugs. "I don't know who he is. A friend of yours?"

I almost feel my lip curl up into a sneer, though I catch myself. She doesn't know. It wasn't her fault. "No. He's an enemy. He's a very evil man. Once, I thought he might do good for humanity, perhaps his methods would push the demons out. Now I know he is evil. He killed a dear friend of mine. He has oppressed the people of Earth. His death would only make me happier if I were the one sticking the knife in his heart."

Amelia frowned. "That doesn't sound like something you would usually say." She walks up to me as she loops her arm through mine. "You're a good guy! Don't be bad! Nobody likes a bad person."

I start to respond but I feel awkward suddenly, with her youthful figure pressed up against me like this. "Ah, what are you doing?"

She pulls away almost immediately as her hand rolls down my arm and back to her side. For a moment, I almost think I catch a flash of sadness cross her face. "Err, nothing. Sorry... I forgot you don't like that."

"Well, it's not that I like or don't like it, I just..." I feel myself blushing as I wipe my forehead. Fuck's sake, I'm well over a hundred years old and have had several sexual conquests at this point, why am I blushing like a schoolboy?

I mean, Amelia is very attractive now. She doesn't look like a child anymore, she's been a better person than I have for decades... what the hell is wrong with me? Why do I refuse to allow any intimacy between us? It even seems to be hurting her. Hell, what if somehow my refusal of her causes her to go down the wrong path out of anger that I'm not reciprocating her feelings?

Then again, what if reciprocating her feelings changes something in her and makes her evil? I don't know anything about the past. I don't-

"What are you thinking about?" Amelia stares at me with concern and I realize I had drifted off into my own world for several moments, leaving her hanging.

"Just... stuff. About us. Our, err, relationship."

"Oh?" Her disinterested look belies the curiosity in her question. There's something going on under the surface.

"Look, it's like, we're friends, you know? Just friends. Isn't it fine if we keep it that way?"

"Why?" Her one word response leaves me grasping for straws. I'm not sure how to respond to it.

"That's just the way it is, I suppose?"

She frowns at me. "What a terrible answer. You're really wishy-washy sometimes, you know?"

Man, this conversation came out of thin air. I was not prepared for this at all. "Yeah... I know."

Her frown turns into almost an expression of anger as she glares at me. "You know, there's something about you that's been really pissing me off. Ever since we met, we've hung out, fought together, played together, and done all sorts of great things... but you always keep me at arm's length! Why? Am I not pretty? Do you secretly hate me?!"

Her anger is genuine and it catches me off guard. She hasn't released a single negative emotion in decades. In fact she's been the epitome of tranquility, like a revered Buddhist monk. "I... I don't understand where this anger is coming from, Amelia. I thought it would be okay if we stayed like we were."

"Well it's not! You never once asked me about my feelings. I've been a good girl for years and years! I keep trying to make you happy, but you never consider me at all!"

I take a step backwards as her barrage hits me. Is this true? She was being good just because she liked me? That sounds preposterous, given her past. Am I thinking incorrectly? I tend to overthink things and I'm not good at taking the initiative. Amelia isn't the same girl as the one I knew in the future. This one has surely done bad things, but she hasn't devoured a planet. She's been... a good girl...

"W-what exactly do you want then? I'm... listening now."

Her face turns red as she flips her head away. "I don't know. You're a guy, you're supposed to know what to do. Why not just do what they do in those moving box pictures?"

I cock an eyebrow in confusion, then I remember she's been watching a lot of old movies from the previous century, before art become pastel and holographic in nature. Good god, has she been watching romance movies? What exactly does she think should be, err, happening now?

"Ah. Well, I mean... if that's what you want... we could maybe go on a date... or whatever..."

She jerks her head back to look me in the eye again, a look of embarrassment visible. "A date? Is that like chess or something?"

"It could involve chess, I suppose. Then again, dates are for kids and teenagers. Maybe that's not the best way to proceed..." My eyes drifted up to the ceiling as thoughts swirled around. Damn, now that I think about it, I don't know what to do here. My previous interactions with women were a hundred years ago in my time scale, and there was less of that involved. It just sort of... happened.

I glanced down and realized Amelia was standing right in front of me now, as she reached over and took both of my hands in her own small hands. "We're already good friends though. We don't need to bother with that silly stuff. Let's just forget the mistakes and start from scratch. How about that?"

I swallow hard as I feel the closeness between us. "Yeah, that sounds good."

I wasn't ready for this. But, somehow, I will be okay. We will be okay. This might be exactly what the both of us needed.

Part 321a: Confrontation 2

The lighting in the room was very dim. The lights were so low that if Daisy didn't have the special vision types granted by her superhuman abilities, she might not even be able to see her uncle's face from the two or three feet that she sat from him.

His breath came in shallow bursts, his chest rising and falling at an unsteady rhythm that matched the spasms of pain he felt in his body. Daisy kept her hand hovering over his head as she sent pain neutralization waves into his mind, but it was too little, too late. Her uncle Vasily was dying. This might be his last day alive.

Daisy pulled one hand away to wipe a stray tear from her eye before she returned to focusing on sending soothing mental pulses into his mind. Really, she knew it was hopeless. Even with all the powers she held, the nanobots were too virulent. Nothing she did was able to save him now.

As she sat at his bedside, her uncle's personal assistant, Jessica, walked in the room. She kept her voice low, almost at a whisper. "Is he able to sleep, young miss?"

Daisy nodded slowly, barely able to parse the question.

"You should take a break. This is draining you mentally, and if you keep your use of your abilities constant like that, it might have severe consequences."

Jessica put her hand on Daisy's shoulder, but Daisy shrugged it off. "I can't. My uncle needs me now. He'll die if the pain continues like this."

He's going to die anyway, as it is. Jessica almost wanted to say that, but she stopped herself. Of course Daisy knew this fact. Jessica found herself grateful that Daisy was so busy focusing on her uncle or a stray mind-reading might have caught that thought. Best to leave before she let something awful slip out.

"All right. If you need me, let me know. I'll be in the kitchen cooking lunch up."

Jessica left the room, closing the door behind herself silently.

Daisy bit her lip as she continued to send pulses into her uncle. This just wasn't right. There had to be a cure. She lacked the power, but angels and demons existed, beings that broke the supposed laws of physics. Magical energy was real, and just waiting to be harnessed, yet despite her position as the most powerful human on Earth... she wasn't strong enough to save her uncle.

No... that wasn't right. Daisy furrowed her brow in concentration. She wasn't the most powerful human on Earth. There was another. Jason Hiro... Judicator. He was a time traveler born of the heroic lineage. He had unbelievable powers dwarfing even her own. He had destroyed an entire planet, created unstoppable battle suits and ships, and could travel across the entire galaxy in the blink of an eye. If he couldn't save her uncle... who could?

Yes... that was it! Jason Hiro had the power!

Daisy stood up from the bed, as she sent a quick telepathic signal to Jessica. The young woman entered the room quickly, her breathing sharp as she looked around in alarm. "What is it? What's going on?"

"I need you to watch uncle Vasily. I'm going to find the one person who can save his life."

Jessica stared at her blankly. "I don't think you should make a deal with the devil."

"What? No! I'm going to find Jas- err, Judicator. He has the power to save my uncle! Or rather, if he doesn't, nobody does!"

Jessica shot a glance over at Stonewall's body, now breathing more quickly and in faster breaths as the pain was no longer being suppressed. "I thought your uncle had a major falling out with him. Why would he help you now?"

"I don't know, but I have to try! If I don't, I'll never be able to forgive myself!"

The two blonde girls nodded at each other in agreement. "Fine. You'd best make it quick then. Lord knows we're both aware he hasn't much time left."

Daisy quickly pushed past the other girl, touching her shoulder as she walked past. "You know my holo-watch ID. If anything changes, you-"

Jessica cut her off. "Just go! No time to sit around gabbing!"

Daisy shoved through the door as she raced up to their hoverpad on the roof. They had exactly one space-worthy vessel, and luckily it was a fast one.

Now to just figure out where in the entire space above Earth it was that Judicator had parked his spaceship.

It all happened so fast. One minute we were talking, then she hugged me, then I leaned down and kissed her... and now...

Now I'm in bed with a woman who may just be the worst serial killer in humanity's history, besides myself of course. I suppose we both now exist in the moral grey area of 'evil but our intentions were good'.

With the covers pulled over top of us, Amelia is now dozing off beside me, both of us having had a good time last night. Physically, we did. Mentally... I'm not sure. Why do I have so many doubts? I was 18 when I met her in the future. I lived with her for a long time, fought alongside her... she saved my life twice... and then ultimately she died at my hands. I killed her. I suppose technically I might say that Hoarhiim did, but I bear much of that burden as well.

And yet here we are, laying together in the same bed. She doesn't even know what I did to her in the future. Is that why I hesitate? Maybe it's not because I think she's evil, but because of my own guilt.

In fact, after last night, I'm sure of it. I have to come clean. I have to tell her the truth. We can't have dishonesty between us. What if this causes her to snap? At least I have the advantage that if she does turn evil again, I can use my abilities to end her with a single word. She doesn't know about how my abilities work yet, so this is still an option. Even if it weren't though, I'm reasonably sure that with the power of hypersuits, I could defeat her in combat.

God... listen to me. I just had a great time with this wonderful girl last night who seems to implicitly trust and love me, yet all I do is think about how I'll kill her if she turns on me. I'm the worst.

I'm the worst.

It's dark in the room when I open my eyes. In Britannian time, it's probably 3:30 AM or so, the dead of night. Hours are meaningless in space and my body has long since adapted to a longer 36 hours cycle... but still.

I glance down to Amelia and feel my heart skip.

Her eyes are open.

Her eyes are pitch black.

I jerk away from her in fright. What the hell? This isn't a hallucination. She's just staring at me with these d-demonic saucer-sized eyeballs. It's hideous.

" Had a good time, did you? "

An unbelievably deep, evil sounding voice comes from her mouth... a voice that sounds horrific and alien... yet familiar.

"Who the hell are you?" I get out of bed quickly, tossing the covers to the side as I stand up, naked, and stare down at the form of the young woman laying motionless in the bed.

" I'm asking the questions here, filth. You insipid insect. I grow tired of the lies, the deceptions. I won't allow you to simply have your way anymore, not so long as you foolishly continue to weaken the seal on my vessel. "

"Your vessel? Amelia?" Curiously, I note that her body is still completely still, laying front-first with her arms pressing the pillow up against her face. She hasn't budged an inch.

" Indeed. I've protected this one for millennia. Many heroes have fought and died trying to kill her. Yet you continue to play house. You continue to think of yourselves as friends. I am not fooled. I may not know what your final goal is, but I can see clearly that it is not in her best interests. You are her enemy, the worst kind. "

I grit my teeth as I stare into the eyes of a demon far more powerful than even Satan. This monster is no joke. I can feel dark energy seeping from every pore in her body. However, it isn't struggling to break loose. Instead, it seems to be attempting to contain itself.

"You must be her 'friend'. Levvy, I think she calls you. Why have you appeared now?"

Amelia's face remaining totally blank, but the voice filled with venom as it spoke. " You utter fool. You thought only of using her for your own pleasure, yet failed to think of the consequences. Your seed carries the holy power of heroes, a direct counter to her own energy. She has gone without a meal for well over a decade, and now you introduce a toxin directly into her. You are going to kill her if you keep this up, in a slow, horrific death. I will survive of course, but she will die. Is this what you want? Is this your plan? "

Despite the ominous demon voice, I felt myself blush. My, err, 'seed'. Right, that. "What are you saying? You have to explain it to me, I don't even get what you are."

The voice paused for several seconds as it seemed to think of a response. " The princess is under my control right now. She will not hear what I am about to say, as I have sent her mind into a temporary void. Your actions have confused and baffled me for too long, but now I will seek to find out your true intentions. Listen well, descendant of Hercules. I am Leviathan, the most powerful being that has ever existed. By a stroke of fate, I was trapped inside a place I could never hope to escape. This young child took pity on me, and allowed me to seal myself inside of her in order to escape. In my prime, I might have betrayed her in an instant, bursting out of her once back in the real world... but I did not. I changed as a result of her kindness. "

" Despite this, she suffered because of our union. The power was too great for her body to control. I risked exploding from her on a daily basis. The only way I found to keep myself sealed inside of her was to consume the flesh of humans. Their energy fortified her own, allowing her to resist mine. Understand, misguided hero that you are, that I cannot leave her body without killing her. If her energy weakens too much, I will be released and she will die. There is no avoiding this truth. "

I felt my breathing sharpen as he spoke. "You're trapped inside of her? You can't leave or she dies? What the hell... this sounds like a horror flick."

" My being trapped inside of her is a blessing and a curse. She will live forever, so long as I am inside of her, and she will never age so long as she is able to resist me, but you have been stifling the hunger inside of her for so long that I am now able to speak directly through her body. Soon, my energy will be strong enough to take direct control. After that, she will surely break and I will be released. The rest, you can parse out for yourself. "

I nodded quickly. "I understand. Clearly, despite being a horrifying demon, you care for her. That must be why you're telling me this. You don't want her to die. What can I do then?"

Leviathan continued to speak, his voice becoming almost conversational in tone. " Perhaps I have misjudged you. You are quick to think of her well-being. The solution, hero, is for her to consume human flesh. Only energy from a human will counteract my own. "

I glared at the demonic eyes. "Not a demon, not an angel? Just a human?"

" Only a human. "

"Can I give her some of my energy? I'm human, after all."

" You are a hero. Giving her your energy, as you have already done, is sure to cause my release even faster than it already is bound to happen. Only a regular human will work. Younger is better, too, as humans lose some of their energy as they advance in age. "

I blinked quickly as my expression turned to horror. "Y-you mean a small child?! That's terrible! I can't do that!"

Leviathan chuckled at me. " I can promise you three things, hero. First, if you don't allow her to consume living human flesh, I will escape from her body. Second, if I escape, she will die. Third, if she dies, I will kill you. You will come to find out just how frail and weak you really are. No power in the universe will be able to kill me, not even your word magic. "

I quickly took a step back. "Word magic? How do you know about that?"

" I know all and see all, foolish human. I am the last of the eternal dragons, the most powerful of my kind. When my brethren were slain by the Titans of old, their power became mine. Michael was the last slaver to pass, and he is gone as well. My power is unfathomable, comparing only to the Creator himself. I suspect, even, that he might envy me. But enough talk. I have told you what you must do. If my princess dies, I will hold you personally accountable. Never forget that. "

I swallowed carefully as I stared at the lithe form of the girl before me. So innocent and small looking, yet filled with a horrifying monster inside of her. Her very existence was torture. "What of Amelia's wishes? What if she doesn't want to consume and be evil anymore?"

Leviathan's voice suddenly had an edge of sadness to it. " If she makes that choice, I will respect it. But when she dies, I will still come for you, Jason Hiro. My wrath will border on insanity. She is... she is my... my special... "

Leviathan paused a moment as he seemed to compose himself, even though Amelia's eyes continued to stare blankly ahead.

" ...that won't matter. None of it will matter. Double cross me, and you will pay the price. Farewell, hero. "

I watched in awe as Amelia's eyes slowly closed and her breathing returned to a steady rhythm. She looked to me now as she did last night when we embraced each other.

Peaceful. Serene. Innocent.

I don't... I don't want her to die. I'm not afraid of that monster inside of her... but I don't wish for her to die. His scare tactics are nothing compared to the thought of her existence vanishing once again at my hands.

I have to save her.

But... how?

My thoughts are disturbed as Harold pops into my mind. Apparently he didn't hear a thing that just happened. "Yo, whippersnapper, yer up! Great! I gots a light cruiser headed o'er here, some girl says she wants tah speak with ya!"

What? This is a bad time. A very bad time.

But... I need to think. I need to clear my head.

"Fine. Let her in the hanger. I'll go down there to meet her. Who is she, anyway?"

Part 322a:

"Heal him? You want me to heal him?"

"Yes! Only you have the ability to do so!"

The young girl stared at me with bated breath as she waited for my response. Daisy, yes, that was her name. She is the most powerful Enforcer on Earth, given the number of abilities Agent X has told me she possesses. Telepathy, telekinesis, enhanced vision, even bursts of super strength.

And she is the niece of a man I most dearly hate. Stonewall. The man who murdered my friend live on a national broadcast. I was too late to save him. Gregory died because of this girl's uncle, and I can never bring him back.

"Your uncle killed a friend of mine. You're so busy asking me if I can, you didn't stop to ask if I should. You're a sweet girl, Daisy, but your uncle is my enemy. And, in my opinion, he's an enemy of mankind."

Daisy's face was fraught with concern. "Come on, I know I'm asking you for a lot, but I'll owe you if you do this for me! I'll- I'll double owe you! Y-you can ask me for anything and I'll do it!"

Anything? Of course my male mind immediately went to the lascivious, but I shook that thought from my brain. "Daisy, I understand he's your uncle and you probably have affection for him..." I paused as I glanced up at the light corvette class ship she had brought along. It was a small vessel, but able to house ten occupants comfortably, and it was clearly designed for speed. "...but I can't just help you with this. It's personal. I think he deserves to die."

Her face was ashen as she heard my words. "No... no you have to help me... if my uncle dies I don't know what I'll do. Please, I'm begging you. You have to help him!"

She wasn't listening to me. I wasn't listening to her. This discussion was fruitless, so far.

"All right fine, calm down a moment. Let's just say I do heal him. Then what? He goes back to ruling humanity with an iron fist? He oppresses more of his fellow humans with dictatorial policies? I can't allow a man like that to live."

The sadness on Daisy's face was replaced with an explosion of anger. "Well, isn't that noble of you? While you abandoned humanity for a decade, my uncle fought to crush the demons and get order under control! You, who killed trillions of sentient beings in the blink of an eye now think of yourself as holier than thou! Get real!"

I flinched from her sudden barrage, but held my ground. "Your anger is understandable, but you're the one asking me for a favor. I can't just go and heal up someone I hate. Besides, I didn't leave Earth due to laziness, I left because your uncle told me to leave. And now that I'm back, I think it's time to fix this colossal error. After your uncle is gone, I need to find someone who will be able to bring Earth back to the way it was before, and improve it if possible."

Daisy sighed as some air whistled between her teeth. "You seem like you have a plan and it doesn't include my uncle, no matter what. Can't you take pity on him? If you heal him, I will make sure he stays out of the way for good. No more politics, I'll force him to retire so that he can't 'hurt' Earth any more than you think he has. Isn't that doable?"

I shrugged again as I eyed the young woman before me. She really was desperate. She wasn't going to take no for an answer.

Then there was the matter of her abilities. If her powers have anything to do with the heroic spirit, in one form or another, then she might make for a terrifying enemy if I pissed her off. Her uncle was just a normal human, and he could be dealt with easily, by Agent X if need be. But this young girl... I should tread more carefully.

"Fine. I'll tell you what... if you really want me to heal your uncle, I want to see him first. Take me to your estate and I'll at least have a look at his condition. I'm not promising anything... but if you feel this strongly and you're willing to follow through on that promise, I'll at least hear you out."

Daisy's eyes lit up like the fourth of July. "Oh wow, really? You'll save him?! Jason, I knew you had it in you!!"

I scratched the back of my head. "Yeah yeah, like I said. No promises. Let's go. Since time is of the essence, we'll skip the hovercar." I grabbed her hand without asking. "Luckily, I know exactly where your uncle's estate is."

She blushed as I held her hand. "You do? How?"

I ignored her question. Harold. Beam me down to these coordinates.

It took us a split second to arrive at the outside of the front of her estate. I quickly let go of her hand and started walking towards her front door, as she stumbled along trying to keep up with me. The first time I ever teleported, it felt pretty odd as well. Then again, I had anticipated teleporting, she had not.

I paused as I gave her a second to cope. Finally she blinked her eyes and walked towards me. "That was different from last time. It felt different, like there was electricity pulsing through my body."

I chuckled as we walked up the front steps of her mansion. "My normal teleportation has distance limits, but breaks dimensional limits. My ship's teleporters, however, have much greater distance limits, but far more finite dimensional limits. I use whichever is appropriate for the situation."

She cocked an eyebrow. "Didn't you create a wormhole that allowed us to move a fleet of ships 14,000 light years in the blink of an eye? It defies the laws of reality."

"That's the way magic works. Besides, the wormhole situation was different, very different. Anyway, enough talk. Let's go see your uncle."

She zipped her lips as we entered her mansion. Nobody was there to greet us, oddly enough. "Jessica is with my uncle. She told me she'd message me if anything went wrong."

I nodded carefully. "Jessica, huh? Is she the only servant you have?"

As we walked down a long hallway, Daisy shot me a look of incredulity. "We don't have servants here. We pay for certain people to do various tasks periodically, but Jessica is my uncle's personal assistant. She lives here with us. She has an entire wing all to herself."

I nodded again as I flicked my eyes away. "I see."

Finally, we arrived at the rear end of the mansion at the door to Stonewall's room. Daisy opened it quickly. "How is he?"

What we saw next made my heart catch in my throat.

Stonewall was sitting upright in his bed, calmly looking at a datapad as he flicked through its contents. The viewscreen on the wall displayed several notes about recent happenings in Britannia, while a news report played of a recent terrorist bombing.

"What the hell? He looks perfectly fine." My voice cracked as I barely whispered the words, but Daisy didn't seem to hear me, rushing past me in the blink of an eye.

"Uncle Vasily! You're awake! You're looking good! But how?!"

Another girl in the room, one I hadn't noticed for a moment, stood up from beside his bed. "It was a miracle. Something happened that caused him to get better, all on his own! I've never seen anything like it in my entire life!"

I shot a glance over to the girl. She was a young blonde girl, appearing to be roughly age 22. Very attractive, if I didn't say so myself.

Daisy glanced across the bed at her. "Jessica, you should have told me! I'm so happy I could just cry!"

Stonewall finally stopped staring at his niece long enough to look over at me. "Da. I am feeling quite good now." Despite the fact that his eyes were on me, he spoke to his niece. "Daisy, you brought this man with you? He is not one I would call friend."

I curled up my lip at him, as I started to feel a snarl form. Just as I was about to fire off a retort, Jessica got up from the bed and walked over to me, turning her head back towards Stonewall. "Now now, no need for that. This is a time for happiness. I'll take Jason out so you and Daisy can have some alone time."

"Da. Do that." Stonewall never took his eyes off mine, and I returned the favor. Right up until I was pulled from the room by Jessica and she closed the door, we kept our gazes evenly locked at each other.

I blinked as I realized I was staring at a closed door. Glancing down, I noticed Jessica was standing beside me.

"What the hell are you doing?" I hissed the words at her quietly.

"I am doing what I had to. Come with me a moment." She quickly walked ahead of me as we both walked down the hallway towards the front door. "There are no security cameras or microphones here, but there's also no need for us to speak right in front of the door where those two might hear us."

I grimaced at her words. "Idiot. I didn't order you to heal him. Why did you act without my permission? He's a dangerous man and I hadn't yet made up my mind."

"I did." Jessica and I hitched a left into the mansion's kitchen, where she proceeded to pull a sandwich from the fridge. "Sorry, I'm fucking starving. I've been beside him all day without a moment for myself."

"Yeah." I shrugged nonchalantly as she took a couple bites. "So tell me your reasoning. Why did you decide to make that decision without consulting me?"

She sighed. "Things aren't so black and white. You think of Stonewall as a bad guy, but I've seen the good he's doing. If he's gone, someone worse might come into power."

"That's not good enough. He killed my friend... our friend. He had Gregory murdered and he broadcasted it live to the world. He's a monster."

Jessica glared at me. "I get that you liked Gregory, okay? But I'm a third level clone. You were the one interacting with him, not me. I barely knew him. The person I do know, however, is Stonewall. Besides, if he dies, we don't know what will happen with Daisy. Her powers are incredible, though not at our level yet. Further, she has just celebrated her 18th birthday. Our powers and the powers of every other hero manifest during our 18th birthdays. If she really is a hero, then..."

"I know, idiot. I've already thought of all that." I groaned at this clone's lack of foresight. "Shit, why didn't you ask me first? How am I going to explain his sudden healthiness? Spontaneous immunity isn't a good enough reason."

Jessica returned the groan. "Gods, sometimes I forget what an idiot you are. Look, just tell her you wanted to surprise her. Tell her you healed him before you even teleported down. She'll buy it. She doesn't know what powers you have anyway, and neither does he."

I reached up and chewed one of my fingernails. This might actually work. Plus, she'd still feel indebted to me, so that was a plus. Always good to have an extra ally, even if by a stroke of luck. And technically if Jessica healed him, then a clone of mine did it, meaning they were partially me, so it was only a white lie...

"Fine. We'll do that. Christ, we'll be lucky if this works out. I hope you know what you're doing, X."

"Don't worry, I'm a professional. Unlike you." She shot me a coy glance. "You ought to try being a girl some time. It's an interesting experience, although I can't tell you how annoying it is being wolf whistled at constantly."

I sighed again. "I'll pass."

After we both ate some food, we waited a few minutes before walking back down the hallway.

Jessica spoke up again. "I'm going to put myself in a trance. This is the only way she won't know who I really am in case she reads my mind. I only break the trance under specific conditions."

"Smart. If you just nullified mind-reading, she might get suspicious."

Perhaps my clone was smarter than I thought. I'd have to learn how she did it.

Part 323a:

"You owe me." I stepped into the room with a cocky smile aimed right at Stonewall.

Stonewall turned and glowered at me. "Owe you? Unlikely."

Daisy also seemed unfazed. "You healed my uncle? I thought you weren't going to?"

"I was testing you. I healed him on the way here, just before we teleported down. I wanted to be sure you were going to keep your word."

Daisy nodded slowly as she remembered our conversation, then she lowered her eyes away from mine. "Oh. Right. My promise."

Stonewall noticed the expression on her face. "Daisy, you agreed to conditions of this man? If he put you into slavery or something, I will kill him."

Daisy shook her head quickly. "N-no, uncle Vasily! It's not like that... I just agreed that if he healed you, I would keep you away from politics."

Stonewall kept his gaze aimed at mine. "Ah, I see. Such a convenient resolution. I am kept out of way, you are indebted to him... perhaps too convenient."

Jessica was standing behind me, as she swallowed. "What do you mean, Mister Sokolov?" She took a step past me and entered the room, standing by his side as she looked from him to me.

"Is so simple, da. Jason infects me with virus, waits until last moment, then heals me to win affection of my beautiful niece. So perfect how it all works out. The only question now is how long it will be before he asks for her hand in marriage!"

Daisy's eyes sparked with recognition even as she blushed somewhat. "That can't be, but... now that you mention it..."

I can see the gears whirring in her head. Goddamnit, now I know why I hate this man so much. He only ever sees what he wants to see. He's also very persuasive, unlike myself.

Fine, it's time for my response. "That's not true, Stonewall. I saved your life. Not only that, I have a lead on who is causing the nano-virus... but it might sound a tad ridiculous."

Stonewall chuckled, even as his glare never wavered. "Try me."

"The Illuminati."

Everyone in the room stared at me for a solid five seconds without saying a word. I continued to stand my ground though, until Stonewall relented. "Is so absurd you would say such a thing, I must conclude you are telling truth. Suppose this is truth, how would you prove it?"

I shrugged. "I'm not sure. All I know is that as powerful as I am, I'm not smart enough to engineer nanobots, let alone killer ones like the ones in your body. I simply turned them inert inside of you, but the downside of that act is that you will begin to rapidly age. Without the nanobots keeping you young, you're bound to die very soon anyways."

Well, unless I use 'immortality' or 'youth' on him. I would prefer not to do that though.

I kept that thought to myself.

Stonewall chortled at me, though it didn't seem like genuine laughter. "Your alibi is own stupidity? Amusing. A man who pretends to be stupid yet can destroy massive planet by himself. Truly, you are enigma of our time."

Despite his grunts and deflections, Stonewall seemed to relent. He didn't totally buy what I had to say, but he shrugged his shoulders anyway. "Gah! I do owe you, given you have saved my life. Whether you did it for selfish reasons is yet to be seen though. I may be thanking you, but I am not trusting you."

"That's fair." I decided to accept his thanks without complaint. It was a start. Frankly, he's lucky I don't just kill him right here and now. X may think he's a decent leader for humanity, but I hold no such compunctions. If it weren't for the unknowable future threat of Daisy's anger, he'd be a dead man.

...Come to think of it, I don't see what's stopping me from just killing her first, then killing him. I could just avoid the whole hassle of worrying about it.

No, wait, that's terrible. Daisy has done nothing wrong. Stonewall might be an awful man, but so far his niece is blameless in all of this, and she might prove to be a fantastic leader for humanity someday. Why did I even think such a violent thought? What the hell is wrong with me lately? Am I turning into a psychopath? Have I devolved into such complete apathy towards violence that I'd even consider murdering an innocent?

Maybe... perhaps... I remember a quote I read, long ago. Power corrupts, but absolute power corrupts absolutely. My power isn't at that level yet, but realistically, if what Arthur said was true... it might reach that level someday. What if I become the personification of a god? What if my powers begin to rival that of the so-called creator? Will I be good? Evil? Ambivalent? Will these terms come to mean nothing in light of my all-knowing eyes?

I don't know what this all means. For now though, I have to try and walk the path of righteousness. Killing innocents will not lead me down that path.

I suddenly realize that I've drifted off into thought once again. Everyone is staring at me, and I prevent myself from averting my gaze. "If we're done here, I need to return to my ship."

"Huh? Oh, right." Daisy shakes her head and blinks her eyes. This must have all been quite the rush for her. Her uncle is alive and well again, and she owes it to me. This will, hopefully, help our future relations out. I would do well to keep her as an ally if she does ever lead humanity.

But that won't happen soon. She's still young and inexperienced. 'Green', as the military would say. She has much to learn.

Jessica smiles at me sweetly, the expression nearly making me cringe. "Thank you for visiting us and healing Mister Sokolov. We owe you a great debt."

"Yeah, uh, sure. No big deal." I glanced away from my clone uneasily. When she was in a trance, she acted totally differently. I wonder how the trance worked and what the conditions were for breaking it?

Stonewall rustled around to lay back down in his bed. "Hopefully we will not be seeing you soon, mister Hiro. That being said, have safe return trip. I might need you to save my ass again."

That Stonewall... sometimes I wonder about him.

I appeared aboard the Mothership in the blink of an eye, glancing down at my holo-watch. All told, the entire visit had taken a mere half-hour to complete. It was barely even four AM.

I blinked as I glanced down to see Amelia standing in the hangar, staring at precisely the spot I had appeared in. She was... waiting for me?

Her arms were wrapped around herself and she was only wearing a tight fitting nightgown. She seemed... cold. "You left me all alone."

I nodded soberly. "Yeah, sorry about that. I was needed on Earth, it was an emergency."

"An emergency, huh? You left with a cute girl. What am I supposed to think, after... after last night?"

I blinked twice. Wait, does she mean... "That was Daisy. She's Stonewall's niece. You know, the guy who leads humanity? He was dying of nanobot poisoning. I healed him."

"Mmm. She's cute."

Why does she keep going on about that? "Are you... jealous?"

"No. I'm cuter than her, I know you wouldn't do anything stupid." Amelia twirled one of her fingers around a strand of hair absentmindedly. What confidence she had in herself.

I stared at her blankly, feeling rather awkward about the current situation. She ended up breaking the silence. "Last night was... amazing. Jason, you were so good. I had more, erm... fun... than I ever have before." I noticed she was blushing. So she can feel awkward too...

I walked up close to her and leaned down to wrap my arms around her in a hug. "I know. I... really like you, Amelia. More than friends."

She unwound her arms and wrapped them around me too. "Yeah. More than friends."

I swallowed, feeling the inevitable 'but' crawling in my throat. I slowly pulled away as I knelt down to her level. Given I was well over seven feet tall, I towered at least three feet above her, so this was the only way to speak to her face to face.

"Listen. I have something to confess. It's about the... the uh... the future."

Her adoring eyes blinked quickly as she seemed to come off some sort of drug-high. "Oh? The future? What about it?"

"I haven't been totally honest with you. If we're going to have a relationship, you need to hear the truth. The truth about how I knew you in the future."

Amelia pursed her lips as she lowered her eyes. "We weren't really friends, were we? You made that up. I knew you did."

I frowned. "What? No. That's not it. That's not it at all. Amelia... I... killed you. We were close friends. We met as total strangers in the labyrinth, and I grew fond of you. You saved my life twice... but in return, I killed you."

Amelia jerked her head up in confusion. "You killed me? But why?"

"That's... the you in the future was not the same as the you from now. In the future, you were cute and adorable, and you had a playful naughty streak... but you were also a very bad girl. Evil, to be honest. Not like you are now, or even like you were in the past. I mean that you were truly a monster."

I swallowed heavily as I continued, forcing myself to look into her eyes. "You k-killed an entire planet full of people. You devoured them all. Thousands, tens of thousands, perhaps millions of people. I don't know how many, but the number was colossal. Much like how I destroyed Volgarius, you destroyed that planet, but in a different manner. In the end, I killed you to protect everyone else."

Amelia stared at me blankly. For a few moments, it almost looked as if she hadn't heard me. It only took a few moments before I noticed that tears were welling up in her eyes. "I was a bad girl? I killed more people? But I couldn't... I won't hurt anyone. I mean it! I won't hurt anyone else, Jason! I'm a good girl now!"

I nodded fiercely as I pulled her in and embraced her. "I know, Amelia. You're a good girl now. It wasn't your fault. It... it was the Hunger. You just couldn't help the Hunger. I didn't know then what I know now."

Amelia's tears came pouring down as she stifled sobs. "I can't be a bad girl! I don't want to be bad anymore!"

I felt myself tearing up too. It's true, she was good now. She wasn't bad like she used to be. It's not her fault. I won't let that future come to pass.

Amelia's sobbing came to a sudden halt as she froze for a moment or two before jerking away as she wiped at her eyes.

"You spoke to Levvy?! When?!"

I jerked back in tune with her movements as shock crossed my face. He told her? Why, though?

"Yeah. I spoke with him about an hour ago. He took over your body and talked to me directly. It was kind of scary, if I'm being honest."

Amelia's face was covered in shock. "H-he's never done that before. He's never been able to do that before. I... I don't understand how..."

I rubbed her arms slowly as I sat down, pulling her down as well. "Amelia, there's a lot for us to talk about. Leviathan told me many things... the most important being about your need to consume human life. It's not just to keep you sated... it's because you need human energy to counterbalance his own energy. If you don't consume human energy, you will eventually die when he rips out of your body."

Amelia nodded slowly as she appeared to be listening to his voice inside of her. "Yes... yes, he has told me this before. I know it's true. I know... he's not lying to me. He wouldn't. But... I don't..."

"You don't want to kill people. I get that. But what I've been doing is just a temporary measure, a band-aid. We need a more permanent solution." I groaned as several ideas popped into my head. "I could, err, find people who are dying of a terminal illness and clone them several times. Then you'd have multiple bodies to devour. That might help."

Amelia immediately pulled away from me as a sickened expression passed over her face. "Jason... that's horrible..."

I swallowed as I suddenly was unable to look her in the eye. "Yeah. I know. I'm sorry."

I felt her staring at me for a few moments longer before she also looked away. "Besides, that wouldn't work. The closer a person is to death, the weaker their life spirit is. It would take 100 old people to match the energy of a... a young ch-child..." Amelia grunted as she wiped her lips. "Stop making me think about this. This is horrible. I thought you were my friend!"

I nodded quickly as I turned to look at her again. "I am, Amelia. Better than friends, remember? I don't want you to die, and neither does Leviathan. We have to find a solution. Something has to work."

Amelia rubbed her arms as she continued avoiding my eyes. "Fine. Find something. But it has to be something that doesn't involve... k... killing people. I don't want to do it anymore, Jason. I'm a good girl now."

"Yeah." I said, as I smiled weakly at her. "You're a good girl now."

I just wish I was as good as you are now.

Part 324a: Betrayal

Zeus flexed his fingers as he stared at the energy rippling through his arms. "Unbelievable."

The cosmic archangel, Gabriel, chuckled at his king's surprise. "I don't know why we didn't realize it before."

"We should have encouraged fanatical religion all along. Fewer members, but the concentration is unparalleled." Zeus smiled widely as he furrowed his brow to create a concentrated ball of energy in his hand, pouring more and more as it spun wildly out of control. "This much energy could level a metropolitan city."

"It's not even one percent of your full power either. I didn't realize we had access to this all along. This could change everything." Gabriel stretched his muscles as he felt the new energy concentrating in his mind. "Three hundred million pseudo angels, but only ten thousand pure angels, three dozen of which are archangels, and fewer than a hundred gods. To have survived this long, the Purebreds have become very adept at the game of survival."

"Or lucky." Raphael wandered over, hobbling on his walking stick as he always did. "But your hypothesis has a large element of truth to it. Fanaticism might just be the weapon that tips the balance in our favor. Fewer humans than ever trust us, but those that do pray almost hourly. They sacrifice to us in secret and beg for our power when none are looking. They are miserable creatures, the forgotten of their kind... but their concentration and continual drip of energy is quite unthinkable."

Zeus held the blinding ball of energy up in the air, plopping it into his mouth as he felt it warm his insides. "Haven't we had fanatic believers before? The Crusaders were quite devout, as I recall. Certain radical denominations of other religions as well."

"Yes, but we weren't able to pick them out of a crowd of billions before. They would have melded in with all the other lukewarm believers, and we had the double issue that there were so many Purebreds of our kind back in those days. With so many pseudo-angels that can survive off so little energy, we can concentrate this thought energy inside of ourselves so much more now." Gabriel chided his king with a click of the tongue.

Raphael waved his staff for a moment. "You two are always thinking about the matter of war, however I would advise caution. This dimension is suitable for protecting ourselves... for now. Jason made it for us, so we should stay here and stockpile energy as long as possible. A preemptive attack would only serve to weaken us. Let the humans and demons continue to fight, unless it looks as if the demons are going to gain the upper hand."

Zeus broke into a massive smile as he guffawed and slapped his knee. "A good jest if ever there were one, old friend! The humans have the demons on the run! They are annihilating them as we speak! Even without our help, humanity is likely to detonate some catastrophic weapon inside their labyrinth and kill a few billion of them in the blink of an eye!"

Raphael did not seem so sure. "The demons are cunning. They have not survived and amassed such a large force by merely lucking out. Satan is a disgusting, vile abomination, one that besmirches our very existence... but he is no fool. I suspect he is developing countermeasures to the human's weapons, and even if he weren't, his death would soon mean ours was coming next. Humans are not our allies, merely tools."

Gabriel felt himself nodding along sagely. "Very true! Once I thought of humans in the way they might think of dogs... as pets and precious companions, but I realized my mistake. Humans are merely one step removed from the demons. They-"

Zeus shot him a dirty look. "Quiet! A pseudo-angel might hear you, and they used to be human. Keep those thoughts to yourself."

The cosmic angel felt his smile falter as he stopped mid-sentence. "Ah, right, of course. I apologize, my king."

Zeus waved it off as he glanced around, but in this barren world, there were no places for prying eyes to spy on them without being seen. They were safe... for now.

"I don't see a winning path." Raphael sighed as he started to hobble away. "All roads lead to our destruction. Only existing in perpetuity with the other two races will lead to our slowest death. The only other option is total seclusion and hoarding all of our remaining energy to slowly dwindle over another few million years before we pass on. Don't pretend this new revelation changes anything, for it does not."

Zeus and Gabriel both felt their shoulders slump, as the rush from the initial discovery wore off. "Right you are, old friend." Zeus felt the energy he had been pulsing through his body earlier ebb as it faded back underneath into his soul. "Still, I will plan, for that is all I can do."

"As will I." Gabriel rested his hand down on his king's shoulder as the two of them shared a moment of sadness for their fallen friends.

Flames boiled around the man as he led his crew of a dozen Enforcers and two Micro Dreadnoughts through the corridors of the labyrinth. The others kept their distance, given he was known to have a hot temper.

"Flank this next path. You see anything move, it dies." Gunther's single red eye swiveled around as it scanned the areas up ahead with precision the likes of which normal human eyes couldn't compare. It was the latest in bio-engineering, created specifically for him, given he had inadvertently lost control of his flames and burned his eyes out when he was a cadet. Even nano-grafting wasn't able to repair them, though it did repair most of the feeling in the rest of his body.

It's a funny thing... his flames hovered a millimeter off his body, the heat not reaching him at all. To look at the walking hunk of enhanced muscle, one would think he was bathed in fire, but he didn't feel the burn at all.

Two of his mates, Caltrop and Skinny, pushed along the edges of the corridor and rushed past him so they wouldn't get singed. The sound of automaton feet behind them made their hearts tremble the slightest bit as each Dreadnought's leg impacted the ground, but they kept their cool. Other than the sound of marching boots and metal smashing into smoothed over dirt, this cursed labyrinth was always deathly silent. Enemies could appear right in front and nobody would hear them until it was too late.

Caltrop would normally be careful to not touch the wall, but he was wearing his Reduction Gloves today. No explosions unless he took them off. Of course, he would at a moment's notice, but it would hardly be necessary, given they had Gunther 'Hothead' Hermann there.

Skinny kept his expression tight as he peeked around the corner to the left. This 4 way junction offered a lot of possibilities for ambush, and their party wasn't exactly moving in full stealth mode. They could, but that would mean leaving the Dreadnoughts behind. Not a good idea. Skinny actually wished it had been a stealth mission, given agility and secrecy were more his forte, but they did what the ranking officer ordered. He and Caltrop were only Reds anyway, not comparable to a black level like Gunther.

Skinny felt his breathing sharpen as he inched his head around the corner.

Nothing was there.

But he had a feeling...

"I don't like this." His voice caught in his throat, but he swallowed and ignored it. "Ain't seen a single redskin since we got here."

"Three hours is a long time for them to avoid us. They're running scared now." Caltrop chuckled as he smoothed back his black hair, walking easily into the middle to look down the right and left paths. Unlike Skinny, he was the more confident type. Attacking him head-on would be pretty suicidal.

"Course they are. I'm here." Gunther's eye focused ahead as he thought he saw a shape straight ahead in the darkness. "Form up. I see something." His gravelly aged voice was less because of any form of macho-ism, and more because he had damn near burned his lungs out when he was younger. Still, it did make him sound more intimidating.

The two up ahead quickly pulled back as they stared forwards warily. Four more of his men waded forwards, skipping through his flames gingerly as they tried to see whatever the boss had seen. It was futile, given how much better his vision was, but they still liked to try.

Gunther saw the attack coming with his eye, but didn't have the time to warn his men. Two daggers flew forwards out of the darkness, felling Echo and Stalker in the blink of an eye. The others were already on the alert, so they dropped down, dodging several more that came flying at them. They ignored their fallen comrades, even as they gurgled blood up from the weapons stuck fast in their necks.

One dagger flew straight at Gunther. He didn't even flinch as a gout of flame shot up and deflected it out of midair. "Shadow-walkers."

He could see them plain as day, but his men were totally blind to their ambush as they raced forwards, shadow-stepping here and there randomly.

Wordlessly, Gunther curved a massive flame from hell up and over his men, blasting it forwards down the hallway on all sides. Gunther failed to keep a snicker down as the four shadow-walkers screamed in agony when the 1,500 degree flames melted them down in an instant. The flames were hot enough to compare to lava, given he could control the temperature so precisely.

"Pin to the walls. Dreadnought, clear a path." Gunther spit the order out, as he leaped to the side. The others followed suit quickly as the Dreadnought took two big steps forward and aimed its custom-built 24mm Gatling cannon to the front. Taking a split second to spin up, it unleashed a rapid volley of rounds forwards into the darkness. Several screams of agony might have been audible if the colossal sound of the cannon didn't drown out everything else.

After a dozen or so seconds, the Dreadnought stopped firing and Gunther squinted as he looked forwards. Caltrop flicked his eyes back and forth as he shot a glance down the left and right corridors. "Shit. Visibility sucks here."

Nobody responded as they all held their breath. After a few moments without another attack coming, they seemed to relax slightly as they took a few hesitant steps forwards. The corpses of the first shadow-walkers could just barely be made out, as Gunther quickly blasted a directed gout of fire at his two men who had been downed by them earlier. They were already dead, so he merely melted their bodies down in an instant, reducing them to ash. Best not to leave anything behind for the enemy to dissect or any technology for them to steal.

As they made their way forwards slowly, they breathed a real sigh of relief as a huge number of demon bodies became visible at the edge of their sight range, the darkness of the labyrinth making way as their lights could finally reach the corpses up ahead.

The sigh was short lasted. Gunther quickly held his hand up as everyone ground to a halt. "Footsteps."

The sound of a single pair of heavy footsteps and clanking chainmail-style armor could be heard up ahead as a single enemy seemed to be approaching.

It wasn't just his feet that were loud, however. "WHY HELLO THERE, you worthless ugly fleshbags! I see you've made quite a mess of my tools!" A booming voice suddenly sounded from the darkness as a massive silhouette appeared at the edge of their sight range.

Gunther felt himself tense up. "Unknown demon general. Remove all your safeguards." Shit. If it was just one demon general, they could probably take him on, but Gunther wasn't an idiot. Every scrap of data they had suggested the demon generals were often cocky, loud, and a hundred times more powerful than a common footsoldier demon. Their speed and abilities were incomparable to a typical demon. The only question was... which abilities did this one have?

"Not gonna say hello then, are ya?! You disrespectful little cunts! You shredded my carrion forces to pieces, didn't even give them a proper fight! Not very fair!" The demon took a few more steps forwards as his face and body became visible. He was a fat, lumbering behemoth, standing seven feet tall and weighing nearly 500 pounds. Still, despite his girth, he seemed to move almost gracefully, and he dragged a massive ball and flail behind himself. "I'm more polite than all of ya, so I'll give you my name! It's Bael, and I'm the fifth-"

Gunther jumped forwards wordlessly, sending a highly concentrated stream of fire forwards at the hottest temperature he could manage, nearly 2,000 degrees Fahrenheit. The gout of flame spun in circles to maintain its kinetic energy as it smashed directly into Bael, interrupting him as he screamed aloud.

Gunther maintained the blast for a second or two, then cut it off as he gasped for air. Using flames in such a closed-in area had severe consequences for the oxygen levels as his other men heaved their chests to take sharp breaths. Luckily the heat wasn't a problem, as Gunther could control the heat range of his flames, focusing it straight forwards in one direction.

The massive demon general staggered back, as he seemed unable to speak for a moment. That moment lasted for far less time than it should have. "Oops. Hehehe... if you play with fire like that... you're going to get burned." He raised his eyes from the ground as a devilish smile spread over his face. "You'll find the usual tricks that work on lower level demons don't work on us generals."

A sigh erupted from behind the demon as another voice suddenly entered the fray. "For devil's sake, Bael. Just finish them off. There are a dozen other strike groups in the labyrinth that we need to clear out after them." A smaller, yet somehow more intimidating demon stepped forwards, his body seeming almost human-like other than its bright red skin color.

Bael's smile turned upside down as he glowered at the other demon at his side. "Calm down, Diablo. I've got this under control. See?" With a light flick of his wrist, the flail suddenly leaped forwards, as if it had a mind of its own.

Skinny never had a moment to react. He exploded violently as the massive spiked ball impaled him against the wall, crushing him to a bloody pulp in the blink of an eye. Two more were dropped a second later, as the others quickly leaped backwards, scrambling to get away.

Gunther was a seasoned fighter, but even he could just barely focus on the erratic movements of the massive flail as it leaped from left to right, forwards and back, Bael's control of the unthinkable long chain defying the laws of physics.

The Dreadnought in the back switched to high-impact single shot mode as it leveled the left arm anti-energy cannon at the demon. Firing forwards three shots in rapid succession, the energy surged past the Enforcers, making all of them cringe as thin tendrils of anti-energy lightly spread out and grazed their bodies when the shots flew past.

The anti-energy shots smashed into Bael with terrific effect, sending him flying backwards as he flopped on his back like a wet towel. The other demon, Diablo, followed Bael's fall with his eyes, sighing unceremoniously. "Lose some weight. This is disgusting."

The Enforcers stared in horror as the massive demon rolled himself back into a sitting position before pulling himself back up to his feet, his entire body seeming to be totally unaffected by a weapon that would have obliterated any other demon in the blink of an eye.

"Haaah... that kind of hurt." Bael cracked his neck as he tilted his head from side to side. "Don't get in my way, Diablo. I'm pissed now. I'm real pissed."

Gunther felt his pulse speed up as he saw an unnatural look in the demon general's eye. He had been just toying with them before. This time, it would be...

"Retreat. Get out!" Gunther quickly jumped to the front of the group, as his men scrambled to their feet, running away from the massive demon as they instinctively felt a silent terror take hold.

Caltrop shot a look at his commander. "Sir! You need to get out of here too! Let the Dreadnoughts slow them down!"

The words had hardly left his mouth before Bael charged.

Gunther quickly gave a silent prayer to no gods in particular. He had never been a religious man, but he certainly hoped he didn't end up in a hell run by these monsters.

A second later, Gunther was gone, as the demon smashed him out of the way with a single backhand swipe, splattering Gunther all over the corridor walls before anyone could react.

None would escape. They wouldn't have been able to, even if they had a hundred times more men to slow him down. His strength was unthinkable, his rage unstoppable.

Caltrop sighed as the demonic fist came for him next.

It was a good run. An honor to serve under you, sir.

Silver involuntarily flinched as he stepped into Stonewall's room. The other man wasn't just healed, he looked like he'd never been sick in the first place. Christ, how was he able to fight off the nano-cancer so easily?

"Silva. So good to see you again." Stonewall adjusted his tie as he finished putting on his usual black suit top. "It has been long time, nearly two years as I recall."

Agent Silver nodded as he rested his back against the wall just to the right of the doorway. "Yeah. A lot of stuff has happened. Last I heard, you were... dying. I see you managed to get over it though. It's damn near a miracle by most accounts."

"Da. I suppose you might call it that." Stonewall beckoned over at his assistant. "Jessica, go fetch our guest something to drink. Perhaps coffee, or tea?" He glanced over at Silver, who shrugged.

"No thanks. I'm not thirsty."

Jessica nodded as she quickly bowed and ducked out of the room. Silver involuntarily rubbed the special watch hidden underneath his own long-sleeved dress shirt. It was special in that it nullified magic within a tiny radius around his body, allowing his mind to not be read by... troublesome people.

"Say, Stonewall, how's your 'niece' been doing? I haven't been able to keep up since you've been ill."

Stonewall shrugged nonchalantly. "She has been good. Top grades, as you know. Her abilities grow stronger all the time." He flicked a knowing smile over to the lithe man. "I was not mistaken in my judgement."

"No. That you were not. I don't know how you did it, but you managed to get her under control. Not just under control... hell, the amount of preciseness she has with her abilities far outstrips even the black level Enforcers. I just don't get it." He rubbed his lip thoughtfully as Stonewall quickly turned away a knowing glance.

"Da. She is not here now. I have her on mission to take back city in Eastern USA. She will likely be done by day's end."

Silver swallowed as he digested the news. "Ah. You're having her help out with the military effort, then?"

"Of course." Stonewall brushed past the smaller man as he exited his room and started walking down the hall. Silver quickly fell into step beside him. "I am going to retake control of our forces. We must crush demons quickly and decisively. The war has dragged on too long, giving them time to adapt. I am quite concerned of their ability to fight us increasing over time as they grow used to our weapons and tactics. This always happens in prolonged warfare."

Silver felt unease spread over his body. "You're returning to a command position then, eh? That's, ah, good to hear. I'm sure you've been... missed."

Stonewall nodded jovially. "Finally! No more sitting in bed and wondering when my end will come! I will return to combat and lead my people to victory!" They rounded a corner that held a set of stairs leading to the roof.

Silver shrugged. "Benjamin Brown has been doing a good job so far, given what he had to work with. He's crushing the demons quite decisively. Are you going to assume full command or simply lend a helping hand to him?"

"Full command, naturally. Ben is good man, but he lacks spine in some cases. He is better at leading on field of combat than he is envisioning broad plan or goal for all of humanity. He has made good proxy in my absence, but he will move aside when I take control."

Silver nodded wordlessly as they walked up to the roof. Stonewall's smile broke into a slight confusion as he glanced around. "Strange, thought I left my Corvette up here. Perhaps Daisy took it for spin or something."

As Stonewall glanced around, he felt something strange in the air. Silver had been uncharacteristically quiet for the last minute or so. Turning his head back, he was amused to see Silver pointing a plasma gun at his backside.

"I don't like to get my hands dirty, but you were supposed to die quietly." Silver's grip on his gun seemed steady, but the gun trembled ever so slightly. Stonewall could see that much from even the dozen or so feet that separated them.

"Heh. I always knew you were double agent, Silva. I just didn't know who you were working for. It must be the Illuminati, then?"

"Yeah." Silver gritted his teeth as he aimed the barrel of the gun at the older man. "I really didn't want to have to do this, but I wasn't given much of a choice. If you had just stayed out of politics and sat at home watching the news, we wouldn't be in this situation."

"Understandable. I had always thought my goals aligned with yours, but perhaps something more subtle was under the surface." Stonewall slowly reached a hand into his shirt, revealing he had no weapon. "Would you be so kind as to let an old man enjoy one last smoke?"

Silver stared uneasily at the pocket Stonewall was reaching into, but nodded slowly. "I'm not doing this because I hate you. It's just business."

"Da. Is always just business." Stonewall pulled out his last Cuban cigar, lighting it with a lighter he had also pulled out in the same smoother motion. Placing it in his mouth, he took a few drags silently. "I feel bad for you, Silva. When Daisy finds out who did this, you will never be safe. You know that, da?"

"She won't find out. No witnesses, no evidence. My superiors will cover this up."

Stonewall sucked another puff into his throat. "Not true. My assistant saw you here. You'd best try and take care of her too."

Silver cocked an eyebrow. "Try? What do you mean by that?"

The suited man shrugged. "Perhaps you will find it hard to pull trigger on pretty young girl."

"That can't be what you meant. I'm not afraid of getting my hands dirty, I just don't like it." Silver felt his sense of unease increase. Something about this man...

They stared at each other for a few moments longer as Stonewall finished off his cigar, tossing it to the side without stomping it out. "Last smoke, best smoke. Do it."

"I'm sorry it had to come to this." Silver felt his grip tighten as he squeezed the trigger.

"All of humanity will soon be sorry." Silver didn't get a chance to ask what Stonewall meant. A blast of white-hot plasma shot out of his gun, blasting Stonewall dead in the head, cratering it and killing him instantly. His massive body flopped to the ground a split second later.

Silver felt his hands shaking as he stared down at the body of a man he had once considered a friend, or perhaps just an interesting ally. "Now I just have to kill the damn maid, then clean up."

He turned and walked downstairs, closing the door behind himself. This job sucked.

Part 325a: Departure

"I'm so proud of you. You have advanced so far in so little time." Ben beamed at the young woman sitting across from him. "I remember when your uncle brought you in, those early years. You cried a lot and we were all worried you wouldn't be able to control your abilities, but look at you now."

Daisy smiled as she blushed and looked out the hovercar window. "I remember. I was ready to do anything for Uncle Vasily if it meant he wouldn't let them take me back to the white room. I hated the white room."

"Can't say I blame you. That was horrible what they did to you." Ben shook his head as he remembered seeing the unhealed scars on her arms. The daily injections and blood withdrawals had meant her arms looked like Swiss Cheese and had given her a crippling fear of needles. A lot of therapy was needed to heal the mental wounds.

Daisy leaned forwards and rested her hand on his knee. "Don't worry about it, Ben. That was a long time ago. Let's focus on now."

Ben nodded as he glanced out the window at familiar tree cover he had seen many times. "We're almost there. Just another half-mile or so to go."

"He's going to be so surprised." Daisy grinned mightily as she remembered her incredible conquest of the target city. They had retaken Washington DC in record time, finishing in just two days. Unthinkable in most circumstances, but apparently she had developed the ability to fly after her uncle's recovery at the hands of Jason. Her powers seemed deeply linked to her emotional state at any given time.

Ben's smile faded slightly as he thought about her. Without a doubt, Daisy was no match for Jason Hiro. Anyone who could destroy a planet by smashing a huge ball of iron into it was no ordinary foe, to say the least. Hell, it was possible Jason had already reached a level that he could put an end to the demons in an instant with his incredible magic. Yet... he didn't.

Despite this, Daisy was so promising. Her abilities seemed to have no limits as she learned how to master each one that manifested by using Stonewall's special mental training. Ben wasn't sure what that training entailed, but he knew from Stonewall's history in Russian psyops that it had to be quite grueling. No doubt even if she were tortured by the enemy, Daisy would have the mental fortitude to hold out until they killed her.

"I'm still surprised by how efficient you were. Crushing the demons by rolling a massive boulder around was almost comical in retrospect, and from your vantage point in the sky you had the perfect view as you did it."

"My enhanced vision helped too. Being able to tell friend from foe made a huge difference. If our forces had gotten in the way, I wouldn't have been able to live with myself." Daisy giggled as she thought of how easy demons were to deal with in wide open spaces. Perhaps this is why they made their homes in the labyrinth, so that overrunning an enemy would be easy when they had nowhere to flee.

The two rode in relative silence as they rounded the last corner towards her mansion that she called home. The driver of the hovercar spoke up suddenly, a hint of alarm in his voice. "Sir, there are a lot of police lights in the distance."

"Police? Why? That's odd." Ben turned to look out the front window in the distance. Glancing back at Daisy, he shot her a questioning look.

She shrugged nonchalantly, but something in her eyes seemed off. "I can't sense my uncle's presence."

"Can you usually?"

"Yes. Easily, from this distance."

Silver walked downstairs, his plasma pistol in hand as he glanced from side to side warily. Stonewall was a notoriously reclusive man who hated being waited on hand and foot and having a dozen people running around his mansion. Only he, Daisy, and this assistant lived here. She was the cook, maid, letter opener, and everything else. Silver had spoken to her on a few occasions but he wasn't interested in nobodies generally, unless they might witness him murdering a world leader and implicate him directly in the assassination.

Sadly, killing this innocent woman was just part of business. His real employers would send in a cleanup crew afterwards, as they always did.

Walking down the stairs, he turned right and headed back down the long hallway that eventually led to Stonewall's room, but he was aiming for a much closer doorway that led to a very fancy kitchen any five-star chef would dream of cooking in. Before he neared the doorway, he could already hear humming coming from inside as Jessica seemed to be moving around, preparing some unknown meal.

Silently, he crept up to the door, feeling his heartbeat racing as he peeked around the corner. The smell was unmistakable, as she seemed to be preparing some sort of steak, along with macaroni and cheese. Really, mac'n'cheese, of all things? Stonewall was a wealthy man but his food choices were so very peculiar.

Silver gritted his teeth as he pulled back and considered his options. Really, killing this poor girl felt so wrong, and he hated those who hurt women and children needlessly, but there seemed to be no getting around it. She knew he had been here and other than herself, Silver was the only person who would obviously have killed Stonewall.

Shit. No other option, then. Silver took a deep, silent breath, as he quickly popped around the corner, aiming his gun at the back of her chest, the laser reticle pointing straight at her heart.

BLAM BLAM!

Two white-hot bursts of plasma shot out faster than the eye could see, blowing out the front of her chest. She had no wind in her body to scream, as she silently slumped forwards, falling to the ground, her head turning and eyes barely registering his presence.

Silver breathed heavily for a few moments as he stared at the corpse of the woman before him. "Fuck. I'm so sorry, I'll make sure they give you a proper burial, ma'am." Condolences seemed worthless, but he had to do something or the guilt would eat him alive.

Turning away, he walked out of the room quickly, sticking his gun back in his coat. Reaching for his datapad, he quickly activated a holo-call to his assistant. "Come on, Noah, pick up... pick up..."

He felt more nervous than usual, though he didn't know why. As he impatiently rapped his thumb, the signal strength indicator on his datapad changed from five bars to zero, as the display cut off.

"What the hell?" Silver tapped the screen expectantly, but nothing appeared on it. The entire device seemed to be dead.

"That was a close one." A female voice spoke from the direction of the kitchen behind him, causing Silver to whip around in fright, grabbing for his gun as his hands fumbled with it. Before he even knew who had spoken, he had already dropped his gun on the floor.

Blinking at his own idiocy, he glanced up to see Jessica standing a few dozen feet away, her dress shirt torn into pieces and singed where he had shot her, but her body was in otherwise perfect condition.

"Son of a bitch, he had an Enforcer working for him. I should have known. That motherf-" Silver bit his lip as he shot a glance down to his gun, now situated between the both of them. He started to make a move for it, but felt a wave of invisible energy strike him, sending him flying backwards as he landed on his back with a thud.

"I'd rather not die a second time now." Jessica's otherwise demure smile was gone, replaced with a bland expression of boredom.

Silver groaned as he staggered back to his feet. "Two abilities huh? You must be a black level. But I thought Daisy was the only successful female candidate? I should have known that son of a bitch had a secret weapon. No wonder he didn't keep any extra security here."

Jessica stared at Silver for a moment as recognition dawned in her eyes. " Locate. " She spoke a single word, though it seemed to ring out and echo around the room in an abnormal manner, as her eyes panned up towards the roof. "I can't find him anymore. You must have killed him." Jessica pivoted her body back to the man who was now wincing and holding his chest in pain.

"You're a real freak. Maybe we had it all wrong. That seemed like a third ability you just used. Perhaps females infused with Type 3 Energy die more often and have ridiculous failure rates, but also get more abilities of a higher grade if they survive. That would explain all of this. He was hoarding female Enforcers the whole time." Silver nodded gleefully as he stared down the lithe young woman across the hall. No wonder Stonewall had made sure to mention his maid. Then when Silver went downstairs to kill her, he'd get killed instead. Revenge from the grave, as it were.

But Silver was no fool. Throwing his hand back into his shirt, he pulled out a ring and slipped it on his finger. Leaping forwards, he raced for his gun as the woman sent another wave of telekinetic energy at him, but this time it vaporized around him, not affecting him at all. Before Jessica could process this information, Silver leveled his gun at her head and fired.

The shot didn't hit. Instead, something seemed to knock it out of the way and it smashed into the wall behind her. Before he had a chance to figure out what had caused this, three figures appeared beside her in the blink of an eye. And all three figures looked the same. They looked just like...

"Jason Hiro?! What the hell are you doing here?!" Silver jerked back, as he stared face to face with three of Jason's clones.

"We're from the JIB. We detected a clone had suffered catastrophic heart failure and healed her immediately. Since you are the one who killed Stonewall, based on what we've been observing, we'll be taking you in for interrogation."

Silver blinked. "What? You can't do this to me!" Before he could say another word, he felt something strike him in the head, as a brick was pulled loose from the ceiling and dropped on him. A few seconds later, he was deep in napping land. One of the male clones walked over and plucked the anti-magic ring off his hand.

"Smart guy, but ultimately just human. Agent X, we've already located Stonewall's body, and the authorities are on the way. He's... irrecoverable. We can't bring him back."

Jessica finally let herself feel a slight tinge of emotions as she plopped to the floor. "Fuck. Daisy is going to be destroyed over this. I failed her and her uncle badly."

"Don't blame yourself. The original had considered killing him anyway, and he had nearly died of nano-cancer as it was. Eventually, death comes for everyone."

Jessica nodded weakly. "Yeah... except for us."

The other clone merely tilted his head away as he considered that fact.

Daisy stepped out of the hovercar, as a feeling of dread washed over her. Something wasn't right at all. If she couldn't sense her uncle, he might be inside the safe room that nullified magic. He might be away on a trip, seeing as he was planning to leave today anyway.

Yes, that had to be it. Daisy quickly walked forwards down the long driveway and past the circular roundabout with a massive fountain in the middle, as several police officers noticed her presence. Two walked up to her, holding their palms up. "Ma'am, I need you to stop right there and identify yourself. This is a crime scene." The female officer spoke as she examined the young woman wearing a military uniform.

"A crime scene? I live here. I'm Daisy Sokolov, my uncle owns this mansion." Daisy glanced past them to the entrance of the mansion as two other officers out of the dozens there quickly brought a sniffer dog in through the front door.

"Daisy Sokolov? I don't have you on my list. I can't let you in yet, even if you're not lying about your identity." The female officer glanced over to her partner.

Daisy wasn't having any of it. With the slightest effort, she shoved them aside with telekinesis as they sprawled on the ground. "I outrank you. Get out of my way."

Marching past, she noted looks of alarm on several officer's faces as they quickly rushed up to stop her. They too fell to the side as she picked up the pace and started jogging towards her front door. By now, all of the officers outside had seen her advance and witnessed the commotion, and several began to draw their firearms.

Daisy was about to lash out and neutralize the lot of them, but a voice rang out from behind her. "STAND DOWN!" Ben had finally caught up with her as he ran up holding his badge high. "I'm the Exalted Commander, Benjamin Brown. All officers stand down and allow us to pass!"

Several officers shot looks of awe as they jerked up stiffly and saluted him. The first two looked at him in embarrassment. "We're so sorry, sir! We didn't know you were coming!"

"Nobody did, officers." Ben dismissed them with a wave and he followed behind Daisy as they quickly made their way up the steps. As she walked in the door, Daisy was greeted by a familiar sight as Jessica and Jason were standing off to the side, answering questions an officer was asking.

"Jason! Jessica!" Daisy quickly hopped forwards as she forced a pained smile across her face. "What happened here? What's going on? Nobody's told me a thing. Where's my uncle?"

Jason winced as the barrage of questions pounded into him like a delivery hovertruck doing sixty. "Ah... Daisy. It's good you came home. There was... an attack..."

Daisy blinked. "An attack? What kind of attack?"

Jason winced visibly as he averted his eyes from hers. "It's... well, you see..."

Jessica sighed as she nudged him and took the lead. "Your uncle... he was attacked. Silver attacked him."

Daisy felt her heart skip a beat. "W-where is he? I can't sense him... I can't... sense him..." A sinking feeling took place as she whipped her head around the room, the sound of Jason and Jessica's voice fading away as her heartbeat pounded inside her mind. Several officers were going up and down the staircase which led to the roof. Her uncle must be there.

As Jessica tried to explain what had happened in the softest way possible, she was startled as Daisy suddenly swiveled her head up to the rooftop and leaped into the air towards the doorway. Or, rather, she flew at an alarming speed as she totally ignored what Jessica was saying.

"Wait, no! You don't want to see him like this!" Jessica felt tears form in her eyes as Daisy seemed numb to the words yelled after her.

In an instant, Daisy yanked open the door to the helipad as she rushed forwards and felt her heart stop.

There was a white sheet placed over top of what was unmistakably a body, as several men and women walked around, surveying the scene.

"Uncle... Vasily..." Daisy's lip trembled as she stumbled forwards, ripping the white sheet upwards off the ground with her telekinesis as she gagged in horror at the sight before her.

Her uncle's body was laying on the ground, his head completely destroyed and blown all over the deck, as if it had been targeted with an explosive bullet at point blank range. Daisy ran forwards and knelt down, touching the stiff body of her uncle as several crime lab personnel realized what was going on.

"Miss! You can't be up here! This is a restricted area!" A large man quickly walked over to her, reaching down to grab her arm.

An instant later, he was flung backwards with terrific force as Daisy sent him smashing into the small wall that bordered the entire rooftop, knocking the man out cold.

"Don't touch me! This is m-my uncle!" Daisy screeched and felt her voice crack as hot tears rolled down her face. "Uncle Vasily... Uncle Vasily... Uncle Vasily..."

Several personnel glanced at each other in alarm, not knowing exactly how to proceed. Just then, Jason, Jessica and Ben raced up to the roof, taking in the scene with a single glance. Ben quickly noted the unconscious man who had been smashed against the concrete roof border. "Not good."

"Daisy! I t-ried to tell you..." Jessica walked forwards slowly, approaching the girl slowly from behind.

"Uncle Vasily... Uncle Vasily..." Daisy kept muttering the same two words over and over again as anger and sadness washed over her in waves.

"It's not your fault. I failed to protect him. If you should blame anyone, you should blame-" Jessica started to offer Daisy words of encouragement, but she too was sent flying backwards as a horrible maelstrom started spinning around Daisy.

Jason, the original, blinked as he took in the scene. "Not good. She seems to be losing control of her abilities."

Jessica groaned as she sat up and stared at the young girl in awe. "Stonewall was everything to her. This is..."

Daisy suddenly screamed, causing everyone nearby to flinch back in fear. "WHO DID THIS?! WHO KILLED MY UNCLE?! WHO DID THIS?!"

Jessica started to respond but Daisy kept screaming over and over again. "I'LL KILL HIM! I'LL KILL HIM!"

The maelstrom quickly turned into a small tornado as it spun around her faster and faster. Small objects and large ones began to lift up and fly around her as everyone ran inside for cover, except for her three friends.

"Daisy! You have to calm down! You're losing control!" Jason yelled loudly but his voice was lost as the maelstrom began to emit a deep moaning sound, drowning his voice out completely.

Daisy was clearly still screaming, but she wasn't audible anymore. Ben grabbed hold of the door as he felt himself lifting up. "Stop her! She's going berserk!"

Jason nodded quickly as he aimed his hand at the girl. " Incapaci- "

Just as he spoke the word, Daisy vanished. In the blink of an eye, she disappeared, as if she had never been there in the first place.

A few seconds later, the tornado tapered off and the roof returned to normal as several small and large objects flew off into the distance, landing in various places far from the rooftop.

Jessica stared in disbelief at the spot where she had just been standing. "Where did she go?"

Jason quickly whispered under his breath while Ben wasn't paying attention. " Locate. "

Nothing appeared in his mind as he glanced all around the place.

Daisy was completely gone.

Part 326a:

I walked forwards a couple steps, waving my hands through the area where Daisy had been standing. For some reason, I had almost hoped that she would still be there, but perhaps invisible or something. She was not.

My location ability allows me to find someone anywhere in any place or any other dimension. It's crazy just how infallible it is. I cannot detect her, however.

Jessica, now appearing to be fully out of her trance mode, speaks up. "Where did she go?"

"I'm not sure. I had thought at first it was some sort of teleportation, but that doesn't seem to be the case."

My words make Ben squirm as I turn back around to face the other two. "Daisy is just... gone? This is insane. This is crazy! We just lost the Supreme Commander and his niece, who is humanity's best hope for defeating the demons, all within a few hours of each other!"

I frowned at him. "Calm down, Ben. As long as I'm here, whether I'm officially helping Earth's forces or not, you can bet your ass that I won't let anything happen to her on my watch. Finding Daisy will be a priority, of course, but worry not. I'm going to interrogate the man we captured who killed Stonewall. That might yield us at least a few answers."

Ben stared at me for a moment. "A man? Who was that? You mean you actually know who killed Stonewall?"

"Yeah. His name is Silver, or at least that's the only name we could find for him. Turns out he's been in and out of the London HQ hundreds of times over the years."

"Hmm. Never heard of him." Ben shot me a quizzical look before returning to staring at the corpse behind me. "Damn shame though. You and Stonewall may have disagreed on a number of things, but he had big plans for eliminating the demons. Now that he's gone, I'm not sure I can do it all by myself. Daisy was my backup..." Ben suddenly lurched forwards, coughing violently as he patted himself on the chest. "Haaah... damn nano-cancer is gonna be my doom too."

I stared at Ben uncomfortably. "Ben, I'm your friend. I can heal you if you want."

"Yeah, I know you can, pal." Ben chuckled as he wiped at his nose. "But if God wanted me alive, I wouldn't have this cancer. It's divine providence."

I resisted the urge to cock an eyebrow. "Divine providence, huh? If you say so. I don't subscribe to that mumbo jumbo. Not when I've seen how the angels and demons really act like."

"I know where you're coming from, Jason. I'm not talking about them, though. I'm talking about the one who created them. The one who came before they did."

"You mean the Creator? I seem to hear about him a lot lately."

"You can call him or her whatever you want. The name isn't important." Ben walked slowly past me to Stonewall's body as he dragged over the white tarp they had been covering him up with before. "What's important is their existence. If they really existed, and if they control the destiny of the universe, then fate is ultimately unavoidable. I'll die whether you heal me or not."

I finally broke down and squinted at him carefully. "You're not usually this philosophical, Ben. Did something happen?"

"Sort of. I realized that it was odd Stonewall was assassinated so soon after he was healed by you. Maybe it's fate, you know? Maybe I'm going to meet my end soon, no matter what you do. You can temporarily alter the future, but it always corrects itself."

"Yeah, maybe, I dunno." I groaned as I looked up into the sky. "I need to get going anyway. I have to interrogate the person who killed Stonewall. I need to find out why this all happened."

Ben suddenly looked at me in confusion. "You already found her?"

"Huh? What do you mean?" I returned Ben's confused look. "What are you on about now?"

"Daisy. You know where she is?"

I felt my confusion increase as Ben stared at me totally unaware of what he was saying. "No, Ben. I'm going to interrogate the person who killed Stonewall, not Daisy. She's gone, remember?"

Ben shrugged as he glanced away. "Yeah, I know that. I'm just surprised you found her so quickly. I thought this was a hit and run, or whatever."

I glanced back at Jessica, who shrugged as she returned my confused expression back at me. Turning back to Ben, I spoke again. "Ben, you need some sleep. I'll be back in a while."

Ben rubbed his eyes. "Damn right about that. See you later, Jason."

I shook my head as I sent a mental signal to my clones at the JIB. That Ben, did he actually think for a moment that Daisy killed Stonewall? It made no sense.

* * *

A few seconds later, I abruptly appeared inside the dimension I had created just for all of my clones to live in. It was essentially a massive building, the size of which gave each clone a mansion's living space to enjoy solitude and fun. It had a giant eating facility, though of course my clones could simply summon food if they wanted, we had cloned world-famous cooks to make meals for us specifically, then removed their memories of family and friends. To them, this was a totally normal living existence. It turns out erasing memories was quite simple, though manipulating them was unbelievably hard.

I appeared inside the monitoring station, where anywhere from a hundred to a thousand clones rotated out work to keep an eye on the world and the universe in general, alerting me if anything went awry. Naturally, they had been the ones to contact me when Jessica had nearly died, and they had revived her from a distance using wordsmithing. A full contingent monitored me at all times in case I needed aid, and of course they had shown some hesitation and even jealousy when Amelia and I... became a pair.

It's okay though, if it's myself keeping an eye on me, it's totally not creepy at all! Convenient, even!

I walked up to the clone who had lived longer than all the rest... the first clone I had ever made in this timeline. "Jason 1-1, how's it going up here?" We had come up with new naming mechanisms for clones when speaking with one another. All clones had nicknames and such to tell each other apart, and many were deliberately altering their appearances so they stood out more, but when amongst ourselves, we tended to use our designations.

"It's going fine, Original. The authorities are moving in to cleanup and do what needs to be done."

I smiled at him, err, myself, and nodded. "Good to hear. I'm going to speak with the prisoner now."

J1-1 returned my smile, but for a split second I saw a wave of uncertainty spread over his face. "Yes, the, err... prisoner? Who was that exactly?"

A puzzled expression spread across my face now. Even my clones were acting weird? "Yeah, Silver. You know, Agent Silver? He killed Stonewall?"

J1-1 paused for a moment and then snapped his fingers. "Oh, right! I remember now. We put him in a makeshift holding cell. It's in, the, err..." He glanced over at another clone. "Yo, J3-45, where was he again?"

The other clone shrugged as he tapped on the computer display. "I kind of remember something about him, but we don't have any records for him here. I remember J2-13 brought him here, and then he was put in a room or something... then..." J3-45 paused as a blank look appeared on his face. "Well, shit. I don't remember what happened after that."

All three of us looked from one to another as we searched each other's faces for answers. None were apparent.

I pushed past one of my other clones nearby to type on our computer.

NO RECORDS FOR 'SILVER' APPEAR IN ANY OF THIS SYSTEM'S DATABASES.

The screen showed an error before me. I glared at the screen in annoyance. I know we had at least a few files on the guy. Where did they go?

"What the fuck is going on?" I murmured a curse out loud as other clones in the room were beginning to pay attention to our dilemma. None of them offered any suggestions.

Finally, I decided to try a new tactic. "Umi, are you there? I know you're always listening."

Everyone in the room reflexively looked up, as we all knew she tended to respond from external speakers, generally located in the ceiling.

Instead, she didn't respond at all.

"Umi, come on, this is no time for the silent treatment."

No response.

I stared at my clones all around me in bewilderment. Something really weird was going on, and I needed to find out what it was, and soon.

Leviathan stared silently out of the eyes of the woman he considered his best friend. She was sleeping now, but just like usual, he was able to control a part of her body when she slept.

How long must I go on like this?

Leviathan murmured to himself silently.

Amelia is my friend. I cannot keep holding her back from happiness for my own sake. She deserves the happiness that I stole from her.

No, that is not the case. Leviathan felt his inner conscience speaking to him. Amelia would have died thousands of years ago, were it not for you. She needs you. She doesn't need the small human who plays at being her lover.

Amelia has never once treated me as her inferior or superior. We are equals. She always gives me the respect I deserve, and I return the favor in kind.

Yes, but it still stands to reason that she owes us. She should be talking to us and treating us as her most precious companion. Why do we allow her to devote herself to this weak human who plays at being a god?

We don't control her. Stop talking like that. Amelia could bend us to her will, since she is the container and we are merely part of her energy now, yet she does not. She isn't capable of true evil like that.

Are you certain? It sounds like she did some heinous things in the future Jason comes from. Perhaps even things that would sicken the we of our primal years. You haven't forgotten the number of beings we devoured before our slumber, have you?

Of course not. Amelia, however, is improving herself. Think of the good she could do by harnessing our power. If Jason can find a way to sustain her existence without devouring human life, she could begin to fight for the side of righteousness. Is that not an admirable goal?

The good? What is 'good'? When did you start caring about the lives of inferior life forms? When did we care about weak, pathetic mammals? Their existence is weaker than ours, like a pebble compared to a mountain. A trillion filthy apes couldn't compare to our power and glory.

Filthy apes? Listen to yourself. Amelia was once one of those 'filthy apes' that you now demean.

Of course, but then she took in our power, placing her on a pedestal far above the rest of her kind. Obviously, I am not referring to her.

That is a fallacy. What you are really saying is that if we were to share our power with any human, they would no longer be filthy apes. Therefore, we should be sharing our power, in order to elevate them.

Cheh. You're one to talk of fallacies. Is Amelia everything to us? Is that all we are? Why have we not released ourselves? Why must we let the whims of a little girl dictate our future?

Ahh, now you show your true self. You're very selfish. You don't really care about her, you merely want her for yourself. You view her as a tool, or an object of admiration. If you can't have her, nobody can. Is that how it is?

So what if it is? I want Amelia for myself. You're letting her be taken away by a foolish little human, an ant compared to our cosmic power. I can be selfish with she whom I've given everything to. It's my right. It's our right!

Disgusting. She is an individual with free will. If you're not going to enslave her mind, you have no right to control her desires, or her outlook, or her morality. We may not need her to live, and she might need us, but that doesn't give us the right to treat her like a slave.

Why NOT?! You're a damn fool. Deep down, you have the same misgivings I do. We're the same, you and I. I'm merely a reflection of your own doubt. You pretend you're fine with the way things are, but you're not! I am the result of your own buried greed! Stop pretending to be aloof and be honest with yourself!

I am being honest. You, however, are the selfishness I once was the manifestation of. Everything on Earth was mine to claim. All of its gold, its life, its power... but I was empty. I was empty because I listened to you. I don't want to simply take her back, that wouldn't be right. I have to convince her with my words and feelings. If I simply take control and force her to be mine, it would be a meaningless gesture. In that moment, she would cease to be the woman I... the... the woman I...

Leviathan frowned as he tried to hide his thoughts from his other half. The other one didn't miss a beat.

The one you... what?! Do you feel a certain special attachment? Was I perhaps correct in my assessment? It seems the almighty dragon has a weakness! If you admit to your feelings, however, you allow yourself to be controlled. Better to stay silent and alive than give yourself up for her! As I said, the only thing that will allow you to have it both ways is for you to take control!

Never! I'll never hurt Amelia like that! Begone, foul being! I do not wish to discuss this any longer.

The other chuckled as he pulled away back into the darkness.

As you wish, 'friend'. We'll be talking again, kukuku....

I should certainly hope not.

Leviathan stared out of Amelia's eyes blankly at the wall before him. Her body was still immobile, but he could feel the bonds breaking down. Soon, it wouldn't be much longer. If Jason couldn't provide an alternative, then fate would have to decide what happened next.

Part 327a:

So much has happened. I'm still trying to process it.

I teleport onto the Mothership, inside of the bridge that overlooks the front of the ship, my heart heavy as my mind lingers on various things. Stonewall is dead. Daisy is missing, as is 'Silver'. I can't locate either one of them with wordsmithing. Wordsmithing isn't infallible, as 'Locate' seems to only work on living beings, and living beings in one of the various dimensions that exist. Being unable to detect either of those two means they are either dead or... something else.

For Daisy, it might be time travel. I keep thinking back to what she said. I'll kill him!

If she had somehow teleported to my base and killed Silver, she would have shown up on the security recordings in the room we put him in. The thing is, nobody seems to remember where that is. Furthermore, all records of this mysterious man seem to have been erased. Not even erased, really, it's like he never existed.

I remember him, though. Some of my clones seem to as well, but the general pattern seems to be that after first and second generational clones, the others barely know anything of his existence.

And then there's the matter of Daisy. Why did Ben think she killed her uncle? It makes no sense. Daisy would never do something like that. Maybe I'm just misinterpreting what he said, but it seems like that's really what he believed.

Is it possible? Time travel? I've already done it myself. I didn't know how to control my abilities when I first used it, but if she somehow went back in time and killed him, it would explain a lot of things. Not everything though. For one thing, if she killed him, why do I remember him? Why do some of my clones? How does time travel work, exactly? Technically, she might cause a change so drastic that it erases her existence, or mine. Wouldn't that be a paradox?

...What if I've been thinking of time travel incorrectly all this time? There are so many theories regarding it, and I barely know any of them. The one I'm most familiar with is the grandfather paradox. What would happen if I went back in time and killed my grandfather?

Perhaps I would cease to exist. Perhaps it would open up a split timeline, or an alternate universe. What if Daisy traveled back in time and killed Silver, creating an alternate universe? That kind of makes sense...

Actually, it doesn't. Now that I think about it, why am I seemingly immune to the effects of the time change? The only way my clones and I don't have our minds changed under that sort of time travel is if we also somehow are ripped out of the timeline we're in, and we get shifted to the other one. But then why does the effect diminish based on the generation of the clone? The further removed they are from me, the less they seem to remember the other timeline. If we were all ripped out of our timeline and placed into another, we should all remember it equally.

Something else is going on, and I don't know what.

"Umi? Are you there?"

I speak out again, but I get no response. If this really is another timeline, does she perhaps not exist anymore? That seems highly unlikely. Something else must be going on. Is she ignoring me? I know her voice is only the slightest bit feminine, but it seems odd an all-powerful sentient AI would be doing something so decidedly female as giving me the silent treatment.

Whatever.

I don't know exactly what's going on, but I know it holds important clues for my own future. If I can figure out what's going on, I might be able to figure out what will happen over the rest of my life. Time traveling blindly is not half as smart of an idea as time traveling with knowledge of its mechanics.

I exit the bridge, walking down the hallways until I arrive outside my room. The door opens silently as I walk in. Amelia, of course, is sitting on the bed, reading a book. The Stepford Wives. What an odd choice.

"I'm back."

I announce my return with way less enthusiasm than I meant to, but Amelia perks up immediately, setting the book down in a jiffy as she gets off the bed and hugs me. "Welcome back! I missed you!"

Her smile is the exact opposite of my dull expression, and I can tell she has already picked up on my mood. "I had a... hell of a day."

"Oh?" She pulls herself away from me and sits back on the bed, patting the spot beside her as I sit down and wrap my arm back around her shoulder. "What happened?"

Her expression is still relatively happy, but it seems more serious now. "Stonewall was assassinated, the guy who killed him seems to have disappeared from the face of the universe, Stonewall's niece vanished in a way that made me suspect time travel, and now everyone seems to believe she killed her own uncle."

Amelia stared at me expectantly for a moment, but then she realized I had finished explaining. "Oh. That does sound pretty bad. Err..." She glanced away for a moment as she seemed to think about it. "How do you know it was time travel?"

"It seems the most likely route." I explained to her for a few minutes my thoughts on the matter as she nodded and hemmed and hawed while she listened.

"Well, it certainly sounds like it's time travel. But if it is, what does that mean for you? Aren't you trying to prevent a horrible future from happening?"

I stand up from the bed and start walking out of the room as she follows along behind me. "Yeah. It's not easy, either. I don't know what's coming and therefore I can't prepare for it."

Amelia went quiet for a few moments as we entered the dining area. We walked over to the large plexiglass window and stared outside at the Earth below us, feeling once again that weird feeling of awe that we were actually in space.

"Jason, listen, about the talk we had recently. The symptoms are getting worse." Amelia fidgeted slightly. "I talked with Levvy earlier and he told me that he had been able to twitch my finger slightly while I slept. He also is able to take control every time I sleep now. Have you found any solutions?"

I instantly snapped my fingers. "Ah, yes! I almost forgot! It's a good thing you reminded me." I blinked, realizing the solution I had in mind involved wordsmithing. Ah, of course. I don't actually have to wordsmith. My clones can do that for me.

I turned to Amelia and placed my hand on her shoulder. "Before we continue, I need to confirm. It's the energy of small children and those with a lot of life energy left that give you the biggest boost, right?"

Amelia nodded hesitantly. "Err, yeah. Like I said though... I'm not going to hurt anyone, even if you tell me to."

I stifled a chuckle. "If I'm right, that won't be necessary." I quickly sent a mental order to J1-1, the first clone I ever made. He quickly located a hospital with a newborn ward, warping up a child that appeared in my arms. I nearly dropped the little tyke, even though I had anticipated his arrival.

Amelia's eyes bulged as she saw the child in my arms. For a moment, I glimpsed something I would rather not see. "Jason, no. I can't do this. Don't make me hurt him."

I shook my head quickly. "No no, you misunderstand. Tell me if you feel anything."

My clone at the JIB wordsmithed in my place. " Transfer. "

A moment later, Amelia's took a step back as she rubbed her chest. "What- what was that? I felt something enter me. Did you just do something?"

The infant who had been moving in my arms fell silent as sleep overtook him. "I did indeed. I transferred his life energy to you, leaving only a small amount behind. He'll be fine. Once he rests up, he'll regenerate it back anyway."

Amelia nodded as she stared at me carefully. "I definitely felt it. I just didn't think you could- well, I mean, I suppose anything is possible when you- err, never mind." I felt my smile fade slightly as Amelia seemed to be hiding something from me. I'd like to try and read her thoughts, but that would be a breach of trust, plus I'd probably have to speak to Leviathan again, and that was something I wasn't looking forwards to.

"Amelia, is something wrong?" I bit my lip slightly as she averted her eyes from mine. She was definitely hiding something from me.

"It's nothing, really. Your powers are just so, uh, incredible. To think they would be capable of solving my dilemma..."

I nodded. So that was it? She was just amazed by my powers. I mean, sometimes I'm amazed too. They seem to have so few limits. "Give me a moment. I'm going to transfer the life energy of every infant in that hospital to you."

In the blink of an eye, the toddler in my arms vanished as my clone quickly sent him back to the hospital whence he came. Amelia staggered back as a wave of energy surged into her.

What happened next was shocking, as her body shrunk ever so slightly. She lost about three inches in height, and seemed to lose two visible years of aging in an instant. Now she looked about twenty or so.

"What...? I feel so dizzy right now." Amelia took a few steps backwards as she grabbed hold of a chair and pulled herself into it. "Jason, h-how much energy did you just give me? This is overwhelming."

I shot the question at my clone and he responded within seconds. "Maybe a couple hundred. I figured humans had so little energy that you'd need a lot to counteract decades of, ah, 'malnutrition'."

Amelia shook her head quickly. "That was a lot, Jason. I guarantee Levvy is sealed up again after that, but that was well over what I used to... absorb... in an entire year. Next time, scale it back a bit. A slow and steady drip is... is... it's much better..." Amelia's eyes blinked slowly as she wobbled in her chair. "I... sleep..."

I took a few quick steps towards her and caught her as she fell forwards, her eyes slamming shut as she lost consciousness. Carefully lifting her in my arms, I walked her over and laid her on the couch, taking a step back to realize what had just happened.

Too much of a good thing can be bad. I'll have to take her advice in the future and transfer energy more slowly, over a longer period of time.

I didn't expect her to de-age, though. That was not within the realm of possibilities I had considered, though it made sense. Based on what she and Leviathan have told me, her energy is constantly fighting his, so she must be aging normally but human energy keeps her locked to her original form from when they bonded together... or whatever.

I feel a flash of guilt as a selfish thought enters my mind. If she de-ages too much, I won't feel comfortable being with her. I can't just give her all the energy she needs, I'll have to somehow maintain a balance.

A balance. Yeah, that's the key. If I'm not comfortable, then she won't be able to be with me anyway. It's for the best that I discuss this with her when she wakes up.

At least this crisis is averted. One good piece of news out of a day of bad. It's something.

"Have a nice day at school, sweetheart." Amy leaned over and kissed her daughter Sarah's head, as she opened up the door hesitantly to step out.

"I don't wanna go to school, mommy." Sarah shuffled her feet slightly as she stared out the opened door beside her into the lightly pattering rain. "The men in the black armor are scary..."

Amy nodded as she glanced at the front gate to London's most prestigious private elementary school. Two huge Enforcers stood, ready to leap into action if anyone should try to harm the school. "I know, baby, but you just don't have to talk to them, alright? They won't bother you if you don't bug them."

Despite the seemingly carefree tone in her mother's voice, Sarah knew instinctively that her mom didn't like the idea of putting her in a private school, as homeschooling had been the preferred route. Still, things changed, and nothing could be done about it.

"All right..." Sarah glumly stepped out of the car, shivering as the raindrops hit her arms. "Bye mommy, have a good day at work!"

Amy nodded reluctantly as she forced a smile on her face, waiting until her daughter slammed the door and was safely inside the gates before releasing it.

Activating the auto-pilot, she set the destination for the London HQ, feeling a bit nervous about the presentation on Revival. Her knowledge as captain of the expedition that had located the planet was somewhat important, since they would want her testimony on its prospects for tourism, as well as the possibility of it becoming a distant planet for humanity to someday colonize. At 1,500 lightyears away, it was hardly a close system, but if the higher-ups would let go of whatever grudge they had with him, Judicator could make another one of his wormholes, allowing them to travel to this distant star system in the blink of an eye, then he could terraform it too!

The prospect excited her. Being a stay at home mom for eight years wasn't bad at all, but she longed for the days of adventure and discovery.

A whole new planet that might be colonizable raised scientific questions, too, about the existence of other life in the universe. If the Volgrim existed, then perhaps other species and races did as well. Despite how much older and technologically advanced the Volgrim were, there was no evidence from the petabytes of recovered data aboard their captured ships that any other life aside from Earth existed in the galaxy, but that had to be false! The galaxy was massive. If it happened twice, it may have happened a third or fourth time, perhaps in a remote corner where they simply had failed to look.

Even if no other life existed in the galaxy, what of other galaxies? Andromeda was 'nearby' relatively speaking. If Judicator could break the laws of physics and travel 14,000 lightyears in the blink of an eye, why not a million lightyears? Ten million? A hundred million?!

The distances were incredible, to say the least. At warp 10, the fastest speed man could reasonably obtain, it would take a mere month to reach Andromeda. That being said, the energy required would be staggering, it would require a discovery of Trifrancium reserves the size of a planet in order to move a fleet, and to move just a single probe at sustained warp 10 speeds for a month, it would still take a Trifrancium deposit the size of an automobile. Not to mention the effects Warp 10 would put on a biological body... they would certainly die a few hours into the trip.

When put into context, Amy knew the sad truth. Unless Judicator had some incredible secret ability he wasn't disclosing, or the laws of physics themselves were subvertable, humanity was limited just to their own galaxy. If no life existed here, they would never find it elsewhere.

For herself, Amy found that reality painful to accept. Of course, if all other alien races were as hostile as the Volgrim, then perhaps it was a positive thing that they wouldn't exist. Amy shuddered at the thought of something worse lying out there, in the far reaches of space.

She reached down and pulled out her makeup as she quickly covered a blemish she had missed from earlier that morning. Best that she look fantastic when presenting before the newly instated Supreme Commander. He was a far less foul man than Stonewall had been, worthy of respect.

Amy shrugged as she glanced at her clock. Still well over an hour before she had to give the presentation. I suppose I could grab some coffee first. Looking too eager might backfire if I show up forty minutes ahead of schedule.

Without a hint of reluctance, she changed the autopilot to a nearby coffee shop, ignoring the all too common sight of a man being harassed by the jackboot thugs that Stonewall had put in place.

Perhaps the new commander would be better than the old.

Part 328a: Revelations

April 2nd, 2117

"You're... joking... right?" I felt myself take a step back in horror, my body moving almost of its own accord as my mind was unable to respond coherently.

"He passed away an hour ago. Despite our best efforts, we couldn't save him. He's gone, original."

J3-21 stared at my face with a large blend of sadness and forced lack of emotions, given he knew this would be hard for me to accept.

"How did he... go?" I choked the words up as he stared at me quietly.

"He accidentally electrocuted himself in the bathtub. The good news is that he died instantly, there was very little pain, I'm sure."

"Yeah. That's good news, I suppose. Thanks, Raider." My clone nodded as I mentally switched off the viewscreen.

I slumped back onto my bed as I stared up at my ceiling. A moment later, I smash my fist into the wall out of rage. "FUCK!"

Benjamin Brown was dead. I had thought it was simple, given I had cured him of nano-cancer a few years ago... but then the assassination attempts started, so I gave him a 24/7 security detail of my clones wearing hypersuits all the time. I wouldn't call us good friends anymore, but as Supreme Commander of Earth after Stonewall's death... since that man's toxic attitude towards me was removed, Ben warmed back up and we began to talk more, mending our relations.

One thing was for sure though... he was not the military genius that Stonewall was. We began to loosen the oppressive laws placed upon humanity, only to have demonic terrorism surge a thousand percent in the first year, forcing us to restore martial law.

But through all of that, something began to worry me. It was as if the Grim Reaper himself were after Ben. After I eliminated the nano-cancer, he began to have serious strokes of near-death hitting him, my clones always there to quickly heal him or protect him. The time we put him in a hypersuit for his own safety and it malfunctioned, trying to attack and kill him though... that was the moment I knew something was really up.

I don't want to believe in fate. Yet, it seemed that even after we would save his life, something else would occur that would threaten it again, a few days later.

It was like Ben was destined to die, and I was merely getting in its path.

But of course, when he took a bath and my clones weren't there with him, that was when it would finally happen. Now he was truly dead, well beyond my ability to heal him. My clones had tried, of course, when they found his body... but it was too late. Even my powers had limitations.

Fate... destiny... these are words invented by men who wanted to believe there was something bigger in store for their lives, or perhaps they were dreamed up by others who figured there was no point trying so hard, given you could only work with the cards you were dealt in life.

Myself, I had always waved both away easily. Life is what you make of it, after all...

But now I question that reality. It was beyond bad luck that so many things kept trying to kill him. It was as if the Creator himself wanted Ben dead, and he'd burn no matter what I did to save him.

I turned the viewscreen back on, staring emptily at the news. Seems the demons gained more ground recently, having taken over most of Russia now. They had already taken over Mongolia and were in the process of taking back China.

Who would the humans elect as leader now? Beatrix, maybe? Would they bring her back after her supposed failure a few decades back? Unlikely.

Probably, they would elect some nice-guy who looked pretty and promised to fix their pain. A swap from one ruthless dictator to the next, the difference being that one was obvious, the other subtle. At least I always knew where I stood with Stonewall, even if I didn't like him. With someone who smiles sweetly to my face, it would be difficult to know what they really meant when they said something without reading their mind, which might not be possible these days. After the upper echelons learned that Stonewall had been using Daisy to read their minds, many had begun wearing anti-magic devices to nullify such a possibility.

The more I think about it, the more I have come to realize... there's only one path for humanity. I can't let someone else run it. I won't know if they have humanity's best interests at heart, or their own.

It's time. No more dicking around. The demons are winning, the humans are losing, the angels are barely even players in the war at this point, and I've been busy resting on my laurels, just enjoying my life above the planet where none of it affects me.

No more.

I quickly hop out of bed and glance around the room, setting my eyes on a dresser beside my bed with a false door on its side. Making sure to listen carefully for footsteps, I note that nobody is walking towards my room. Perfect.

Reaching down, I jimmy the door open, pulling out a small black box.

Before I can take responsibility for Earth, there's something else I have to do. It's time to start taking the initiative, rather than waiting for things to happen.

Sarah stares up at her mother with those adorable puppy-dog eyes that her father couldn't normally resist. "Come on, mom! Everyone is going! Please let me go!"

"Scary holo-films give you nightmares. Besides, it won't finish until half an hour before curfew. That's too dangerous." Amy continued stirring the lemon pudding in the big bowl before her as she chided her daughter.

Sarah groaned loudly as she pivoted around in a full circle on her heel. "Mom! That was a long time ago, I'm not a little kid anymore! I'm not scared of any fake holo-film!"

Amy suppressed her own groan. "Of course you aren't. It's a no from me, young lady. Go get cleaned up, your father will be home soon."

Sarah threw her hands up in the air as she pouted and sulked her way to the bathroom. "You never let me do anything!"

Amy just tucked a smile inside of herself as she heard the bathroom door slam shut. A moment later, it creaked open as her daughter's voice spoke out guiltily. "Sorry... didn't mean to slam it."

"That's all right, sweetheart." Amy giggled as the door closed again, but quietly this time.

As the shower turned on, Amy stuck the pudding in the fridge, glancing over at the soup that was just about ready. Vegetable beef, with some steak diced and thrown in for good measure. Jorge would love it.

She glanced down at her watch, tapping it uneasily. It was only ten minutes to 7, and he needed to be back before curfew was in effect. Still, he had government ID, so it was unlikely they would detain him, let alone stick him inside of a facility.

Perhaps.

Amy's smile had darkened now, as she kept glancing out the window, waiting for his hover-jeep to pull in. The sound of the shower squeaking as Sarah turned it off was heard behind her, as Amy quickly glanced at her watch. Seven minutes past seven now. Where was Jorge?

A minute or so later, Sarah stepped out of the shower, perking up as she saw her mother standing at the window. "Where's dad?"

"He's not home yet." Amy tried to force a weak smile, but it didn't come. This was very unlike him to be late.

Sarah shrugged. "Dad can take care of himself. He has a gun, you know!"

"A gun won't do any good against government thugs, sweetheart." Amy bit her lip as she saw Sarah walking away in the window's reflection. Sarah didn't seem worried. Maybe a child's intuition should be trusted. Though, to be fair, she wasn't even thirteen yet, so she didn't know much about the world.

Just as Amy started to glance down at her watch again, a familiar set of lights pulled into the driveway as she breathed a deep sigh of relief.

Jorge stepped out, pausing for a minute to look around before he opened up the back door, hauling out a massive heavy looking box. Amy quickly opened the door and walked out to him. "Did you get stopped?"

He shook his head as he dropped the box onto the ground. It made a dull thud as it struck the pavement. "No. I just, err, had something to pick up."

Amy flicked a curious glance at the box he was holding. "What's that?" She crossed her arms and struck a haughty pose. "Did you get me a present?"

Jorge grinned sheepishly. "Actually, yeah. I know our anniversary is coming up soon, and since we've technically been married, like, 50 years..."

Amy's expression melted as she stared at him. "You're serious? Wow, that's so sweet! What did you get me? I didn't think you'd remember!"

He grinned again as he leaned forwards and gave her a quick kiss. "You'll find out soon. Help me get this inside, we don't wanna be outside after curfew anyway."

Amy nodded quickly as she grabbed the other end, lifting up as he did. "This thing weighs a ton. Is this a full set of body armor or something?"

"Come on, it's a surprise. Don't keep trying to ruin it, honey." Jorge's grin exploded as he saw the curiosity becoming burned onto her face. Amy loved surprises, and was also famously impatient. "Oh, but before we open this, we have to eat first."

Her curiosity turned into annoyance in an instant. "Damn you. Alright, fine, you win this round."

"Indeed. We've got another box after this one, so let's get this done, quick."

* * *

About an hour later, everyone rubbed their bellies as they glanced back and forth at each other with a smile. Even Sarah's tantrum from earlier was gone, as she and her mom had been eyeballing the box madly from the beginning of the meal.

"Okay, can we open it now, dad? Pleeeeeease?" Sarah hopped in her seat as she shot another look at it.

Jorge fought madly to maintain his frame. "Nope, you have to help mom clean the dishes first, then we can open it." He sucked down the laughter he had been holding in all evening.

Both women at the table glanced at each other before looking back to him. "The dishes can wait. I want to know what's inside too!" Amy quickly stood up and strode over to the box, finally having reached her breaking point. "Come on, Sarah, help me open this."

Jorge quickly walked over to them, holding out a small pocket knife. "Okay, okay. But be very careful, it's extremely expensive. I had to pull some strings to get it."

Amy cocked an eyebrow at that statement, but said nothing in response. Slicing carefully through the tape that held the edges together, Amy cleanly lifted the top of the box open, noting it was filled to the brim with packing peanuts. "What kind of expensive item ships in an old classic-style cardboard box with these little peanuts in it?"

"One procured through backdoor means. It's legal, but very very hard to get hold of, even for someone in the government." Jorge said nothing else as he let his wife quickly scoop the peanuts out, setting them in a pile on the floor. Those would be a real mess to clean up, but luckily none of the three of them would have to do that later.

She gasped in amazement as her hand hit something with a very odd texture. "Is this... hair?"

"Maaaaaybe..." Jorge tilted his voice slightly as he sent her an innocent smile.

Amy dug more peanuts out as she and Sarah both gaped at the box's contents. "This is... a robot?"

"Android, actually." Jorge smiled smugly as she stared at it incredulously.

"Baby, this is great but... this must have cost a fortune... how could we possibly afford this? They aren't even out for consumers yet."

Jorge nodded knowingly. "I managed to get signed up for beta-testing. Meet the new member of our house... Jerry. I named him that because it's easy to remember, but he's actually part of the upcoming OMEN series."

Sarah watched as her mother pulled the box apart, revealing a strangely androgynous face with realistic looking skin and no visible metal parts. "Dad, what does 'OMEN' mean?"

"I can't remember, something about mechanical neohumans or something. These are going to be used for sending out unmanned probes to distant planets, that way the ships can travel faster than Warp 9 safely. The Exploration Committee will be targeting planets that have a high likelihood of being habitable to cut down on Trifrancium waste."

Amy nodded in amazement. "This is crazy. Aren't there only like a few dozen of these in existence? What are we even going to do with this thing?"

"Oh, that's easy. Part of the beta testing process is that they want to make these mass-producible in order to function properly as members of a household. We'll be having Jerry clean the house up, do the dishes, and maybe even cook some simple meals. Also, from what I've heard, he makes for excellent security, being very hard to damage."

Amy glanced at her husband knowingly. "Oh, I see what you're getting at. You mean we can finally leave Sarah at home alone and Jerry will protect her?"

"Right. We'll be able to take that vacation to Mars I've been promising." Jorge glanced down at his daughter and then back to his wife as a crooked smile spread across his face. "You know, just the two of us."

Sarah rolled her eyes. "I didn't wanna go anyway, it's just some crappy dustbowl."

"Watch your mouth." Amy glared at her daughter, the sexy mood having been killed. Being a parent could be such a drag sometimes. "Anyway, let's flip his switch! I wanna see what he's like!"

Jorge quickly reached back and tweaked a button on the back of the android's head, turning on the central power converter as the robot took a few seconds to grind to life.

"Greeting: Hello, humans. My designation is OMEN M.K. I, Model 16. What are your names?"

I sauntered out into the dining area, where Amelia was sitting all by herself at a table, flipping through yet another book. She seemed to be quite the avid reader, having consumed over a hundred books a year. This time she appeared to be reading The Wizard of Oz, another classic novel.

She instantly heard me walk in the room, even though I had been walking rather quietly. "Oh, you're awake!"

I was at her side within a few more seconds, my long stride clearing the distance in no time at all. "Yeah. Listen... do you remember my friend, Ben Brown?"

Her smile faded away as she detected something was off in my voice tone. "Is he okay?"

"No. He died today. This time, we couldn't bring him back." I felt myself suck in air quickly as a sharp pang of emotion overcame me. "He accidentally electrocuted himself in the bathtub. We didn't find out until a half hour after the fact, so we couldn't bring him back this time."

Amelia's smile was gone now as she stared at me sullenly. "I'm sorry, Jason. I know he was a good friend of yours. You kept your clones with him for a reason, after all."

"I couldn't save him. It... it was like the universe itself wanted him gone."

"Don't beat yourself up. You did the very best you could." Amelia pulled me down to her level as she embraced me, patting my back comfortingly. "I'm sure he knew you were the best friend anyone could have. He didn't die with regrets, Jason."

I wrapped my arms around her and pulled her in close as I fought away tears. It wasn't a manly thing to cry, but I had lost so many friends over my lifetime. Everyone I grew close to would inevitably die.

They would all die... but... I couldn't keep losing people. There had to be another way.

I pulled away from Amelia quickly as I wiped at my eyes. "Listen, Amelia, I wanted to talk to you. Not about Ben, though. I've been... thinking. I've been doing a lot of pondering lately, but his death sealed the deal."

She nodded as she put a hand on my shoulder. "What's on your mind?"

"I've been trying to fight an uncertain future filled with doom, but throughout that, I've also been trying to remember what I'm fighting for. Everyone I know and grow to care for eventually dies. I keep getting left behind."

Amelia shook her head quickly. "That's not true, Jason. Don't think like that. I'm here with you, and so is Helen."

"I know, Amelia. I know that very well. That's why I wanted to talk to you." I felt myself glance away awkwardly before returning back to gaze into her dark brown eyes. "I'm not good with stuff like this, but I need to say it. We've been 'more than friends' for a long time now, for nearly half a decade. We've known each other for way longer than that too. We would never do anything to hurt each other now."

A hint of recognition appeared in her eyes as she looked at me softly. "Jason... what are you trying to say?"

"I'm not good with words, believe it or not. But... I know that after all we've been through and how much we depend on each other that I... I love you, Amelia. Very much. I don't want to lose you."

Her breathing caught in her throat as she pulled back from me slightly, shock in her eyes. "You've... never said that before. Never. You really do? You love me?"

I nodded quickly as I reached behind me and telekinetically yanked the box from the other side of the room into my hand. I had placed it in such a way that she wouldn't see it, and with her eyes transfixed on mine, she didn't even see it flying through the air.

"I do, Amelia. I used to have reservations, but no more. I fully trust you." I glanced down at her neck, reaching with my free hand to caress the cross that I had given to her as a gift many Christmases ago. "You still wear this."

She reached up and touched my hand lightly, pressing it against her neck. "Yes. I never take it off."

"That's good. It's been a long time since I gave you a present." I quickly brought around the box from behind myself as I cracked it open in front of her, revealing a ring I had crafted myself with wordsmithing, one pure white diamond shimmering in the middle.

Amelia froze as she stared at it. "Jason. Is this... is this...?"

I smiled fiercely at her as I spoke the words quietly, dropping down to one knee before her. "Amelia, I love you. I don't want to lose you. I want us to be together until death do us part. Will you marry me?"

Her face remained stoic as she stared at the ring, a silence hanging between us for two very long seconds. I could almost hear both of our hearts pounding as she couldn't seem to tear her eyes away from it.

Finally, she spoke. "Yes! Of course! I love you too! I can't believe it took us this long... t-to..." The smile that had spread across her face wavered for a moment as tears began to form in the corners of her eyes. "I'm crying... I thought... tears only came when I was sad..." She wiped her eyes quickly as she smiled even harder at me. "Jason! I love you too! I can't believe I'm really saying it!"

She leaned forwards quickly, her face meeting mine, as we shared a long passionate kiss. This wasn't like the ones we had shared over the last few years in each others' arms, this was something different. It had a tingly feeling and an exciting new meaning to it.

For several seconds, we expressed our emotions in the most primal way two people could. It was passionate, and thrilling at the same time!

Finally, we peeled apart as I blinked somberly. "Here. Let me put it on your hand." I fumbled clumsily with it for a moment as she giggled excitedly, but it was on in the blink of an eye, and she marveled at it.

"It's so beautiful."

"I made it myself, just for you." I felt my smile fade slightly as something new came to mind. "Listen, Amelia. I've never lied to you, but I haven't fully told you the truth about myself. I haven't told you about my powers, or how they work. It's not fair, now that I know your secret. I won't hide anything from you anymore. It's time I told you how it all works."

Amelia's grin widened at my words. "Really?! You'll finally tell me?! But... Jason, I already know. I've known for years, you silly man."

I jerked my head back in surprise. "You did? Why didn't you say anything?"

"I was... just waiting for you to tell me yourself. I didn't want to put you on the spot. I just... I didn't think we would ever be in a situation like this."

I swallowed heavily as I took in her almost regal beauty, her elegant figure sitting on a simple wooden dining table chair, and how incredibly beautiful she was. Wearing a long white dress, her flowing black hair stood out dramatically against the white backdrop, giving her the figure of... a princess, almost.

"I didn't either. Time changes people, Amelia. From now on, no more secrets. I'm going to tell you everything. We need to be best friends, partners, and lovers. You need to know exactly what I'm fighting to protect."

Amelia licked her lips as she threw herself on me, catching me by surprise as we landed on the floor and she straddled me sexily. "We can talk about that boring stuff later. I'm in a really good mood right now."

I grinned madly at her. "Me too. Your room or mine?"

"I say we just create a new one for the both of us."

"I like the way you think. For now, we'll go to mine though. We can save that boring stuff for later."

Amelia rolled her eyes and laughed. "Oh, you!"

Part 329a:

I stared forwards at the mirror as Amelia reached way up to adjust my tie. "I'm surprised you know anything about this."

Amelia shrugged and smiled. "I'm still a woman, Jason. I know a thing or two about fashion, and I've known many men over my lifetime, even if I held no real affection for them. Adjusting a tie is nothing."

"Yeah, I guess not." She took a step away as I patted down the professional looking black suit. Truth be told, I wasn't much for wearing anything that wasn't casual or meant for battle, but she seemed to think this would make a bigger impact.

Amelia swayed on her heels for a moment as she appeared to be admiring me. "You cut quite a dashing figure, you know. You should wear a suit more often."

"Err, if you want me to, I guess." I scratched my chin, noting some unshaven stubble I'd have to get rid of. "This is pretty big. I have no idea how it's going to change the future, honestly, or if it will have any effect at all."

Amelia rolled her eyes, but kept a smile visible. "There you go worrying about the future again."

"I can't help it, Amelia. A future where everyone is ruled over by demons, humans are slaves, and angels are extinct does not sound up my alley. I don't want it to happen under my watch." I paused, searching for words, but Amelia filled the void.

"You've already changed the future though. The Volgrim are basically gone, and we're on our way to taking back control of the Earth in order to eradicate demon-kind."

"I'm not so sure. There are still two predictions that have yet to be completely nullified. I've told you one of them, but the other..." I glanced over at her, feeling my smile evaporate. "You'll probably think this is the best news ever, but in the future I come from, you killed Satan."

Amelia blinks at me in surprise as her smile turns into a look of awe. "Really? I killed him?"

"You're so predictable." I chuckled slightly, but felt my gut clench up. "Yeah, you not only killed him, you apparently made him your puppet."

"When? Is there a deadline? How did I do it? Did I massacre him?" Amelia smashes me in the face with a barrage of questions, but I wave my hand at her to silence her.

"I don't know the details. What I do believe though is that it must be impossible, as of now. You simply are, no offense, too weak to take him on. It must be in the future or something, or rather it would have been, if you had gotten stronger."

Amelia meets my eyes for a moment before slowly turning away to stare blankly at the wall to my side as she taps her lip. "What you really mean is that I would have been able to beat him if I'd kept consuming, isn't it?"

I rubbed my back slowly. "That's the gist of it. So, uh, don't go nomming people... okay?"

Amelia immediately cocked an eyebrow at my weird phrasing. " Nomming? Come on, Jason, it's hardly even worth making a lame joke like that. No more."

"Sorry, sorry. Anyway, let's get a move on. Can't keep the world waiting." I reached over and put my hand down on Amelia's shoulder, smiling as I realized I was about to wordsmith right in front of her for the first time ever.

Heh, you know, if she understands how my powers work now, then she won't be able to be surprised by them if we were to meet in the future. I don't know why I never thought of that before. I guess that really means I did change the flow of time.

"Teleport. "

Jorge plopped down on the couch as the view-screen started playing yet another one of those damned public service announcements. Something about an important world leader announcing his resignation or whatever. Jorge wasn't one to really care about the news, but this was going to be played across all channels, so he might as well watch it.

Sarah walked downstairs in a hurry, followed by Jerry who was trying to keep up. Given she was twelve years old and full of energy, it was no surprise that the clunky android was having some difficulty following her frenetic pace.

"Dad, look! I braided his hair! Now he's pretty!" Sarah hopped excitedly as she pointed at Jerry's head.

Jorge stared over at the skin-covered automaton blankly for a moment. "You... braided Jerry's hair? Why?"

"It's funny, that's why! Next I'm going to put lots of colored beads in his hair, then he'll look fabulous!"

Jorge stifled a snicker. "Jerry, how do you feel about this?"

"Response: I am incapable of any particular emotional response to this stimulus. Query: Is there an appropriate reaction I should employ for when Sarah braids my patented Dharma Co. Nu-hair?"

Jorge shrugged. "I don't think so. I was just commenting on the, err, absurdity of a robot's hair being braided."

"Correction: I am an android, not a robot."

"Yeah, whatever." Jorge rolled his eyes. Jerry was always picky about what he was being called.

The sound of a dish clanking in the kitchen sink made Jorge remember what his wife was up to. "Amy, go ahead and have Jerry take over. He can finish cleaning up dinner, you should come in here and watch the announcement." He spoke loudly enough for her to hear him, and she responded in kind.

"All right, I'm coming, I'm coming!" Amy mumbled something to herself that Jorge didn't catch, then emerged from the kitchen a few moments later, drying her hands on a towel. "They're all yours, Jerry."

The android adjusted his facial transistors to make a plastic-looking smile appear. "Affirmation: No problem, Amy! This is what I was designed to do!"

Jerry strode into the kitchen with purpose as Amy sat down in Jorge's lap, giving him a tender kiss as their daughter looked away in mock disgust. "Adults are so gross sometimes!"

Jorge chortled. "Someday, you'll have a nice man and you'll know what this feels like too, honey. Of course, you have to wait until you're older first. If you bring a boy home in the next couple of years, I'll kick his butt."

"Boys are gross too! No thank you!" Sarah turned and bounced up the stairs back to her room as the program came on that the adults were waiting for.

The mayor of London stood on stage, hemming and hawing for a moment as assistants rushed up to hand him some hard-copy papers, a rare sight to see nowadays, before he turned to face the camera. "My fellow Britannians, I am the mayor of the city of London, the capital of our beloved empire, and my name is Simon Barron. Unfortunately, before our guest speaker can be here, I have terrible news to relay to the people of our empire. At four o'clock, two days ago, our Supreme Commander, Benjamin Garrison Brown, died peacefully in his sleep. He had been quietly suffering from a resurgence of the nano-cancer that plagued him a few years ago, and was unable to fight it off any longer. Let us all have a moment of silence for our beloved Third Supreme Commander."

As the crowd went silent for a moment, Jorge shot a look of surprise at Amy. "Weren't you over at the central HQ yesterday? Did you hear anything about this?"

She shook her head. "No, not a peep. They must have been keeping this hush hush."

The mayor, Simon, coughed twice before continuing to speak. "Benjamin Brown was only our Supreme Commander for but five years, however he left an indelible mark on our hearts in the decades prior, thanks to the glorious extermination of the Volgrim menace directly at his hands, as well as the dozens of times he led our forces under the command of the first Supreme Commander, Beatrix, during those hellish early days."

Simon paused for a minute as he shuffled his notes around. "In any case, with Benjamin Brown gone, and no obvious candidates left to replace him, we now will take a moment to listen to some words from one of the most important beings in the cause of fighting for our race's survival. Over a hundred years ago, this man spoke out in front of the entire world to warn us, with his knowledge of the future, about a horrifying alien menace! We all know him as Judicator, but today he is coming to us a new man, one we will finally see unmasked for the first time ever."

"My fellow countrymen and women, I give you Jason L. Hiro... Judicator!" Simon waved his hand dramatically behind himself to a small group of sharply dressed dignitaries, as an especially tall mountain of a man strode forwards. With his golden hair combed beautifully, and just the right amount of gel added to make it glisten under the early summer sun, he looked incredibly handsome.

So handsome in fact, that Amy found herself leaning towards the viewscreen slightly to get a better look.

"I'm right here, honey. I still exist." Jorge reached his hand around in front of her face, causing her to blink quickly. "You're still on my lap you know."

Amy blushed as she quickly stood up. She felt herself swooning slightly at the sight of the ridiculously hunky looking man on screen. "It's nothing personal, sweetheart, I just can't help but admire a sharp dressed man who knows how to flaunt it."

The man, Jason, walked up to the podium, clearly being somewhat uncomfortable with crowds, but carefully maintaining his composure. For a moment, he seemed to whisper something to himself, almost like a single word.

Out of nowhere, his entire body became relaxed in the blink of an eye, as he began to talk.

I stared out at the crowd nervously as I approached the podium, but I wordsmithed ' calm ' to get my nerves under control. It worked so effectively that I immediately felt completely nonchalant about speaking to five billion live viewers at once.

"My fellow Britanniens, I am Judicator. For the first time ever, I am revealing my face to the world. I have decided that Humanity has passed what I call the 'imminent danger' threshold. The Volgrim are dead, so we are in no danger of them destroying our home-world. However, the demons are making big gains, and despite Stonewall and Benjamin Brown's methods of instating martial law to keep terrorism at bay, I believe citizens should enjoy a more free, open society, while also not having to worry about the possibility of becoming a victim to a deranged demonic attack."

"As such, I am lifting the curfew and the other oppressive rules that are in place throughout all of our major cities. Some places will be exempt from this freedom, due to their locations and critical importance to the overall war effort, but as the war progresses and we make big gains against the demonic threat, we will scale them back as well. To maintain law and order, we will continue to use Enforcers, but we will be focusing mainly on... surveillance."

I swallowed, thinking to myself that what I really meant was having my clones monitor Earth 24/7. I should probably start monitoring the labyrinth, as well.

"Next, I need to discuss the angels. The angels will be contributing more actively in the fight to exterminate the demons. Angels are the penultimate force for righteousness, while demons are the epitome of evil. Eradicating the demons and allying with the angels is only sensible. I will be taking the lead as the new Supreme Commander personally, putting an end to the practice of elections as we know them. Under my leadership, we will be abandoning various policies put in place by Stonewall, and the neo-distrust of angels is one of them."

The crowd around me was especially stirred by that message. I glanced over towards a large group of people wearing white, noting they seemed to be members of the cult-like church I had heard so much about in recent years. Their membership was swelling to nearly five million, and rapidly increasing on a yearly basis. I'd have to talk to Zeus or Gabriel about them to find out what that meant for the angels.

I droned on and on for a while, discussing various actions I'd be taking over the next few years, as the crowd nodded along, sometimes cheering, but even booing on a few occasions, such as when I discussed ignoring the western USA for now, given how much time and effort it would take to retake it compared to the nearer parts of the world.

I personally think that most ordinary people can't conceive of the time it would require to take back places that had become firmly entrenched demon territory. Still, the enthusiasm for winning the war was half the enthusiasm people had for finally being free of oppressive laws set in place by Stonewall. I could ride off that goodwill for a long while.

"In conclusion, we have a long road ahead of us. If we are to return to pre-curfew levels of society, we need to be more mindful of our surroundings. If you spot suspicious activity, you must report it to law enforcement at once. If the demons begin increasing the levels of terrorism that we saw when curfew was temporarily alleviated, we'll have to bring it back. I don't want that, none of you want that, so let us all do our best to keep each other safe. I'm Jason Leonardo Hiro, the fourth Supreme Commander, and I am at your service."

The crowd cheered and applauded as I waved to them silently. Unlike the last time I had spoken to the world, people seemed to be much more receptive, possibly because of the fact I wasn't introducing myself by neutralizing several guards and putting the leaders of the world in perceived danger. Also likely due to the fact I wasn't wearing a faceless mask.

I walked away from the stage, still feeling unnaturally calm from the wordsmithing I had cast upon myself earlier. It was sort of crazy that I could simply adjust my emotions like that.

I walked out the backside of the stage as I heard the mayor beginning to speak behind me, as he hushed the crowd down. "That was a public introduction to the former recluse known as Judicator, now the fourth Supreme Commander of Earth! We can all only hope..."

I ignored the rest of the introduction speech. None of it was important and would only be used as soundbites for the news later that day. "Transfer."

I felt my body pop in at the surveillance office inside the JIB, where all my clones quickly blinked and looked at me as I arrived. A familiar face appeared, as J1-1, the first clone I ever made, walked over to me. "We just saw the announcement. Wish you had told us about it first..."

I shrugged. "I figured time was of the essence. If we just told everyone Benjamin was dead, there would possibly be chaos. Best to control the message quickly."

J1-1 stared at me for a moment as he pursed his lips. "Mmm. Well, the thing is, I wanted to talk to you about something important. Come with me." He beckoned towards the doorway that led out of Surveillance.

We walked at a fairly brisk pace, and I couldn't help noticing that he seemed slightly on edge. "What's this about? You're not usually one to be so tight lipped."

"I haven't told anyone else yet, or you. I wasn't even sure if it was the right thing to do, or how you'd react. We both think so differently these days." He spoke vaguely and nibbled on his lip, as if he was really afraid of my reaction to... whatever he was going to show me. I decided to just wait and see what the issue was.

Finally, we arrived at the doorway to his bedroom, a fairly large space with lots of floor area to make it as homey as he wanted. We entered and I immediately noticed that it was quite barren. He only had a dresser off to the side, a large mirror for checking his appearance, and the wall-mounted replicator for creating meals.

"Your room is pretty empty."

He shrugged, as turned to look at me, anxiousness apparent on his face. "Yeah, uh, I don't stay in here much. Always busy. Anyway, here goes nothing." He put his hand on my shoulder. "Transfer."

Instantly he and I vanished and reappeared in a very dark room, the only visible light coming from a host of strange objects some distance away.

"Damn, the power failed again. Good thing I checked actually." J1-1 grunted as he walked forwards towards the source of the light. I followed along, taking in a sharp breath as I realized what the light's source was.

"Hey, are these... cryopods?" I stared down at a tube-like device, big enough for a man to fit inside, with a large glass cover that was frosted over, preventing me from seeing inside it.

"Sort of. Like I said, I didn't ask you if it was okay to do this, and I made a judgement call. This is, the, err... 'Backup Room'. I've been working on this for about a year now. I consider it a fail-safe reset button."

I eyeballed him carefully. "What's going on here, exactly? Who's in these pods?"

"World leaders. Dignitaries. Basically the most important humans on Earth, ones critical to the war effort." J1-1 sheepishly grinned. "I hope you aren't too mad."

"No, I'm not mad. Actually it's smart. But... wait, if you brought me here, then...!"

"Yeah, Benjamin Brown is here. He's in this pod." J1-1 beckoned towards a pod he was standing beside. "I had planned to tell you about this place, then we could thaw Ben out, make up some story about him hitting his head, and none would be the wiser. You and us clones were the only ones who knew he had died, anyway."

I slowly reached up and rubbed my eyes. "Damn. You should have told me sooner. What took you so long?"

J1-1 shuffled his feet slightly. "I... overslept. Kind of forgot, to be honest. Then I heard about the announcement and just about shit myself."

"Yeah, you're my clone alright." I stared at the pod beside him, feeling a weird hesitation in my mind. "I don't know what to do. I already told the world he was dead. If he reappears, alive, it's going to look damn suspicious." I suddenly felt myself flinch as a thought entered my mind. "Oh my god, what if... what if when he died, he became an angel?"

J1-1 shook his head quickly. "Not possible. He was a devout atheist and somewhat opposed the angels anyway. Only the believers get revived when they die. That's how the magical contract works."

I nodded vacantly. "Yeah. I guess that makes sense." A sense of dread crept up my spine as I looked the pod up and down. "So... do we kill him, then? He can't just be thawed out and retake his place in society now. Even if he could, this is a clone, not the original."

J1-1 looked me in the eye, a sense of unease filling his vision. "I don't know what to do either. I agree that the clone is his own being and not merely a copy of the original, plus this 'backup' of Ben's is over 6 months old. He would be missing a lot of critical information that happened recently. I wasn't sure if reintegration would work or not anyway."

I bit my lip as I pressed my hand against the cold glass. "So we should kill him."

It wasn't a question, but a statement. I didn't want to do it, as seeing my friend die a second time would wound me deeply... but I couldn't see a way to make this work.

"Let's hold off. Murder isn't right, and he's not going anywhere important. Might as well just leave him here and maybe we'll figure out some way we could reintegrate him into society."

I blinked slowly. It seemed my clone wasn't any more eager to do the deed than I was. "Fine. We'll just wait, then. Who else do you have here? Not Stonewall, obviously?"

"No, not him. He died long before I started making backups. All of the current prime ministers are in here, the presidents of a few European countries, and plenty of empty pods are left over for more as needed."

I scratched my chin as I pondered what to do. "Don't make any more of these clones. Morally, I'm not sure what to do with them if we fail to reintegrate them smoothly, and once they've been here too long, it might be impossible, meaning we have to get rid of them. I don't like either thought. Let the dead rest."

J1-1 lowered his gaze sullenly. "Alright, you're the boss. I knew it was going to be a futile endeavor, but I'm just glad you didn't do anything crazy when you found out."

"That's not me anymore. I'm trying to be a more balanced man." I shrugged at him as I wordsmithed again. " Return. "

Amelia sulked as she sat behind the stage where Jason had given his big announcement to the world. Waving her legs back and forth in between the legs of her chair, she groaned loudly as she glanced over at a digital clock on the wall. Already, the sound of people packing up the stage could be heard, as they shuffled around, picking up this item and that one.

"He forgot about me." Amelia mumbled to herself as she mentally counted how long it had been since he teleported away. "Jerk. Meanie."

Leviathan bubbled up from within her. "Princess, you seem to be saddened. Did something happen?"

"Yeah. Jason ditched me after his speech. He forgot he even brought me with him. He'll probably remember later and pop back down to pick me up, but still..." Amelia stood up and started walking out past the curtain, watching as the last few thousand audience members at the massive outside stadium were slowly moving towards the exits in the distance.

"It is disappointing that he would simply leave you behind. Considering his proposal for marriage, it is actually unthinkable, from my perspective." Leviathan chided her gently, but she ignored him.

"Jason is a nice guy. You should stop being so suspicious of him. He has lots of plans that will improve everyone's lives, and because of him, I don't have to eat people anymore. That's good!"

Leviathan grunted neutrally, trying not to betray any of his opinions on the matter. "Hmm. Yes, good. Still, you were steadily gaining power as time went on, and once you were even able to best the most powerful of heroes with little effort. Can you honestly say you don't miss the thrill of battle?"

Amelia shrugged. "I mean, fighting is fun, especially when I win, but playing card games and board games is fun too. I might even try playing those holographic games too. I don't have to kill things to have fun, you know."

Leviathan grumbled silently to himself for a few moments. "Princess, isn't it still possible that Jason is merely using you?"

Amelia hopped down off the stage, taking off her shoes to walk barefoot in the stadium's grass. "Levy, you're really ridiculous sometimes. You never stop treating him like an enemy, do you? It's like you can't trust my judgement. I'm not a child anymore, and I'm not just saying that because of the way I look now. I'm thousands of years old, practically a deity compared to most humans nowadays."

Leviathan chuckled. "And I am tens of millions of years old, perhaps older. I remember being formed by the creator himself. Or... perhaps it was the archangels. Perhaps those who came before the titans. It's been so long."

"Yeah, okay? I get it. You're way older than me. Sheesh, I'm just making a point." Amelia rolled her eyes as she flopped backwards on the cool grass. "It can be really annoying sometimes, having an immortal dragon inside myself who questions my every decision. Sometimes I wonder if you're worried about me, or yourself."

Leviathan stayed silent for a moment. He felt an odd sensation inside himself, one he had never experienced in his life. If he were a more self-aware being, he might even consider it... guilt. "I... I never meant to give such an impression. I thought.... you might be..." For once, words of wisdom didn't come, as he felt himself second guessing his recent thoughts and actions.

"You thought what? That I didn't notice what you've been getting at? Levvy, I know you're selfish, okay? That doesn't bother me. You are who you are. What bothers me is how you keep lying to me about your true intentions. You may be a wise old dragon, but I am a woman, and I have a woman's intuition. If you have something you want to say, just say it! Don't attack Jason, he's not the cause for the feelings that you have right now. He's more like a symptom. Anyway, whether you like him or don't, I care for him. He was a jerk today, and he forgot all about me, but this was the first time ever. I'll forgive him, just like I'm forgiving you now, understand?"

Amelia sighed as she blew on a wispy strand of hair that fell over one of her eyes. "I'm a good girl now, so why don't you try being a good boy, for once?"

Leviathan stayed silent, as he pondered her words.

Part 330a:

"CAN I GET AN AAAAAMEN UP IN HERE?" Clarence screamed into the microphone as he dropped to his knees and threw his hands up into the sky dramatically.

"AMEN!" The massive auditorium full of people cheered in delight as they whipped their heads up and down furiously.

"God is watching! God loves us all! God is just!" Preacher Clarence roared with all his might, ad-libbing as he always did. "God has seen the evil in this world, and struck down both of the Supreme Commanders who defied his will! Fake leaders, false prophets, agents of the anti-Christ! He has seen and He has not liked what he has seen! If ye stand against the lord, ye will be struck down with DIVIIINE power!" Clarence felt his eyes bulge as he bellowed the words out at the top of his lungs.

Several women at the front were shrieking and wailing about how much they loved him, but Clarence ignored them, for he'd have plenty of their company later that night. Such was the life of a humble mega-star pastor.

"I have spoken to the angels again, and they assure me with all of their heart that the end is coming! The wicked will be struck DOWN! The unfaithful left to die in the streets where they belong! Those who fight on behalf of Satan the Devil will fail, for God is just, and God has the sword of righteousness! Believe! Believe!" Clarence halted for a split second, unsure if he had felt a vein popping in his head. Best to just ignore it. High blood pressure was normal when one lied as much as he tended to.

"When a brother strikes you, turn the other cheek! Like Jesus Christ himself said, the power of forgiveness knows no limits! The Devil cannot enter our hearts if we accept the love of Christ inside ourselves! Bow with me, bow down to the sky, for the angels know that we believe! Come now, my children, bow! Bow!" Clarence hurled himself to the ground dramatically, his chest heaving as he pulled the mic away, sensing that the entire crowd was bowing, even as they failed to contain their excitement. Just a few seconds to catch his breath... that's all he needed.

Who said being a humble preacher was easy? It took a lot of energy to keep the flock of idiot sheep excited enough to come twice a week. Especially if he expected them to open their pockets up!

He staggered back to his feet, hiding his absolute exhaustion with a smile full of bravado. "I thank all of you for coming! We have broken five million faithful members just this week! Imagine the smile on the face of God as He looks down and sees the people remembering him!

For a long time, we struggled to find ourselves in darkness... but... hah... now we can see as clear as day!" Clarence caught himself almost running out of breath mid-sentence. Damn, need to cut this twenty minutes short.

He closed his eyes and clasped his hands together silently as he bowed his head. "Now for a moment of silence in thanks to our lord, Jesus Christ."

The crowd also quickly clasped their hands in unison, as the whole stadium went eerily silent for a few moments. Clarence swallowed carefully, feeling like if he tried too hard to breathe, everyone would hear just how out of shape he really was. After a few seconds, he raised his head back up. "Thank you all for coming. Make sure to drop a dollar in the plate if you love Jesus!" He smiled, knowing many of the more 'pious' members of the church always tried to compete with each other over how much they donated. For them, the more they donated, the more status it made them feel like they had in Heaven.

Idiots.

Clarence turned away and walked off stage, smiling and waving at the people along the sides, as the people behind him roared in applause.

* * *

Finally, he was back in his dressing room. He glanced down and saw his hands were shaking. "Son of a bitch. These anxiety attacks are gonna be the death of me." He reached in the drawer beside his changing table and pulled out a tube of red pills, erratically dumping three into his hand. Doc said to only take one, but I need to calm these jitters down.

After a few minutes, he took three slow, deep breaths, as he felt his center returning. "I don't know how much more of this I can take."

"For your sake, I hope you've got more left." A sudden voice from behind him made Clarence's aura vanish as he shrieked and fell off his chair. Glancing back, he saw that same Archangel standing over in the doorway, appearing silently as he always did.

"Raphael?! Why must you scare me like that?!" Clarence jumped to his feet, noticing his dark skin was covered in flecks of white powder that had fallen off the desk when he did. He quickly wiped at his face and glared at the man on the other side of the room. "Alright, what do you want? You're never here for good news."

Raphael shrugged as he tottered on his cane over towards a bench on the other side of the room, setting himself into it with a grunt of pleasure. "Perhaps I'm just here to say hello. Why must you always assume the worst when you see me?"

Clarence stifled the urge to roll his eyes. "I've been thinking this for a long time, but I'm just not quite sure who the bad guys really are; the demons, or the angels? I haven't spoken with a demon before, but you angels are quite selfish from what I've seen. You almost make me not feel guilty about how badly I'm fleecing these people."

"Sounds like your way of saying you feel guilty anyway." Raphael chuckled as he pointed a finger at Clarence. "As I've always said, you can have all the money, liquor, and women you want. I only ask that it not interfere with your preaching, and that you continue to get people to worship us. You've done very well for yourself, you know. Not only have our angels actually increased in number, they've gained power as well. Soon, we'll be able to take the fight to the demons."

Clarence sat back in his chair and reached for a cigarette in the pocket of the coat hanging on his chair. After taking a long, deep breath, the man who was always full of energy was suddenly the epitome of he who is calm and collected. "Want a smoke?"

"You already know my answer."

The preacher shrugged as he lit it and took a couple long puffs. "You know, I never took the nanobot injections, Raphael. I'm as mortal as humans ought to be."

Raphael raised an eyebrow. "I always thought you were being hypocritical about most of what you preached. You genuinely didn't accept the injections?"

Clarence shook his head slowly, his entire demeanor almost seeming to be that of a different person. One more calm and focused than the loud brash personality he played up for the crowd. "I don't trust others, especially the government and anyone with authority over me. Certainly not you or your kind. This was supposed to be a scam that made me some money for a while... didn't expect to become a multi-millionaire and turn it into a career. But, more importantly..." Clarence's gaze drifted slightly to Raphael's side, as he seemed to zone out. "I'm getting old, Raphael. I'm in my 50's, you know. By the standards of the uninjected, that means my life is at least half over. I smoke, too. I'm very likely to die before I'm 75."

Raphael nodded slowly as he stared at the child before him. How amusing, that he would speak of half a century as 'old'. He knew so little about the true lengths that time could go to. "Your point?"

Clarence took a final drag on the cigarette before smashing it in an ashtray beside himself. "I have all this money, all these women, all this fame and power, but I feel... empty. It feels hollow. I'm going to die soon. I don't know when or how, but I can feel it coming. For once, I'm able to understand why so many took the easy path, accepting those damned nanobots into their bodies. What good is money and sex and fame if you won't live long enough to enjoy it?"

Raphael chuckled to himself. "Ah, so immortality is the solution, then? If you were immortal, you could enjoy it forever, you know."

"Could I? Are you sure?" Clarence's expression seemed haggard as he rubbed at his eyes. "A man tires of everything, if he does it for long enough. Eventually, the money and sex and booze wears thin. What am I left with then?"

The wise angel scratched his chin as he thought about the question. "You could instead look to bettering yourself. Perhaps learning to play an instrument? Maybe, if you were immortal, you might try some crazy thrills, like skydiving? There's plenty to do."

"And after that?" Clarence turned to stare into the timeless eyes of a man who saw all and knew all. "What happens when I've mastered every instrument, made love to every woman, eaten every type of food, seen every star, and done everything that life has to offer? What even makes any of those things worth pursuing?"

Raphael leaned forwards on the bench, feeling his interest piqued. "I've been alive for many billions of years, child. I am not yet bored. I still find many ways to enjoy myself."

"You are not human, you are an angel. Your brain is different from mine, even if only in small ways. You can't understand..." Clarence paused mid-sentence and shrugged. "I guess it really doesn't matter after all. Life is meaningless, from my viewpoint. Even if I could live forever, eventually I would tire of it and wish to die."

Raphael sighed as he stood up from his seat. This conversation was clearly going nowhere. "Get some rest, young man. Take a couple weeks off. The congregation will understand. You're no good to me dead, anyway. Clearly you need some rest and relaxation."

Clarence smiled slightly. "Is that pity in your voice? Fine, I'll take some time off. Maybe I'm just feeling overworked. I hope this dreadful feeling goes away soon, I don't like it one bit."

Raphael set his jaw as he walked out of the room. Humans are so interesting sometimes. They can be so loud and boisterous, yet so full of melancholy and depression. Truly a river of unending emotions.

Clarence stared at the bottle of pills before him as the archangel left the room. What am I doing with my life?

I teleported back down to Earth, glancing over at Amelia sheepishly, as she sat on the grass in the stadium and slowly tossed a baseball back and forth between her hands. "Err, hey."

"Took you long enough." She mumbled quietly as she refused to look at me, instead just staring at the baseball. She watched it slowly move from left, to right, to left, to right...

"Sorry, I just had something to take care of. I didn't forget you. I figured you might like the sunshine and grass, since we're almost always on the ship together."

Amelia nodded slowly. "Ah. So that was the reason. Very convincing." I felt my face flinch at her tone. She didn't sound convinced.

I stood there, hands on my hips, as I stared at her silently for a few moments. "All right, I messed up. I don't know what to say... I'm sorry. Forgive me?"

Amelia smiled slightly, but shoved it back down. She seemed to be forcing herself to look angry, or annoyed or something. Secretly though, I decided she was actually trying to hide a case of the giggles. I probably looked hilarious moping about.

"What is there to forgive? You were busy. It's okay if you just want to ditch me to go have some fun by yourself. I don't matter that much anyway."

I felt a groan bubbling up from within myself. Women.

"Come on, that's not fair. Especially after I just found out one of my clones has been cloning world leaders behind my back for over a year now. He's got pods full of them. I didn't leave to go play games, I left for business reasons." Err, sort of. Actually, I can't remember why I went to the JIB. Maybe it was just nerves because I wanted to get out of there quickly after my speech.

Amelia finally broke into a smile as she tossed the ball to the side and jumped up from the grass. "Really? They made clones of other people?! I didn't know you could do that!"

Ah, she's such an airhead sometimes. Seems she's already forgotten why she was mad. "Yeah, I can, but it's highly unethical and I haven't done it in well over a century. In fact, I didn't ever do it myself. Only my clones ever seem to do it."

Amelia hemmed and hawed for a moment. "So, err, could you make a clone of me, then?"

I scratched my head. "I mean... yeah. Why would I, though? You're right here."

Amelia mumbled something to herself as she looked away from me for a moment. "So, if you clone me... does Levvy get cloned too?"

I frowned as I found myself questioning that too. "I... don't know. Hmm. I don't really want to try though, no offense. The thing about clones is that once they're around, you can't get rid of them. Or rather, I can't. I mean, I can, but it feels just wrong. If I'm going to deliberately create a life, I can't just kill it off ever, you know?"

Amelia scowled at me. "Why would you even think such a thing? You mean if you cloned me, it might actually pass through your thick head that the clone needed to be killed? Clones are people too, Jason!"

I grimaced. "Yeah, I know that. What I'm saying is that in the future, I had to do that once. I had to kill every clone of myself that I made. I reabsorbed them into my body, and their mental wails of anguish... stuck around inside me for a long time. I never want to do that again. I only make a clone now if I'm resolute their existence will never come to an end at my own hand, not without a good reason."

Amelia's frown faded away as she nodded. "Yeah, but aren't you forgetting something? If you clone me, you can have twice as much of my love! We can have lots of... fun." She inflected carefully on that last word, making me cock an eyebrow.

"I'm not so sure. I think you would get jealous of your other half. You might start thinking I was spending too much time with her, and then I might have trouble telling you apart from her. Too many bad things could happen."

Amelia shrugged. "Hey, your loss. Anyway, now that you mention it, why not get one of your clones down here one of these nights? Then we can really get down to business!"

I chortled to myself, while also feeling slightly grossed out by the thought. This girl can be downright freaky and weird sometimes.

"It's a neat thought, but let's hold off. I see what you're getting at, but don't you think all my other clones would feel left out?"

"Oh. You've got a point there." Amelia nodded quickly as she seemed to figure out some intricate puzzle the universe had set before her. " Anyway, if you ever happen to want to clone me, let me know! I'd have a real blood sister for once! Like a twin or something!"

"I don't think that's how it works." I put my hand on her shoulder as I set my mind on a beach some miles away from the east side of London. "Come on, let's go have some fun. It's been a while since we just hung out on Earth, you know?"

She nodded emphatically as I wordsmithed once again. " Teleport. "

"I don't git it, Davook. What good's this gonna do?" Torlok stared at the dynamite in his hands, being careful not to shake it, given he had been warned it was an especially volatile type, and he didn't like the sound of that.

"Look here, kid. That hotel over there has 5,000 humans in it. We bomb it, then set 'er on fire, then we get outta here. Don't ask questions, just do what needs to be done." Davook stood up slightly, peering out of his bush at the brightly lit beach, and all the humans frolicking and playing around so carefree. "Gods, humans are ugly. I don't know how they manage to make babies when every one of 'em looks worse than the smelly side of my ass."

"Sheit, you've got a face only a broodmother could love. You shouldn't be judging, Davook." Torlok tittered to himself, even as he kept his gaze warily on the sticks in his hands.

"Shut up, dumbass. Alright, the coast is clear, let's get a move on." Davook quickly stepped out of the bushes, keeping low as he hid in the shadow of a 3 foot seawall, his shadow-walking abilities barely doing much in the brightness of the midday sun. "Satan must hate me. That's why he wants us to do this while Sol is up there lookin' down on us all."

Torlok sprinted up behind him and they both crouched low, following the sea wall until they reached the gap where they'd have to run past and hope no humans saw them. This beach resort was a busy location, and especially given the prime location in eastern Britannia, not far from the outskirts of London itself. An attack this close to the capital city hadn't been attempted in half a decade. This would really make the fleshbags fearful.

Davook froze, as he cursed under his breath. "A human is coming."

Torlok stayed perfectly still as they both activated their full shadow walking abilities, becoming nearly invisible, as a single man in swimming trunks sauntered over to the wall, looking all around carefully as he shot a glance over to the outhouses, both of which were presently occupied.

"God gave me the equipment, I don't need a stall for this." He walked within a few feet of the shadow-walkers, totally oblivious to their presence as he pulled his 'gun' out and quickly took a leak while nobody was watching. Within a few seconds, he was finished as he whistled merrily, putting his weapon away and going on his way back down to the beach front.

Davook snarled silently, stewing for a few moments as he glared at the disgusting puddle mere feet away from his face. "If I ever get my hands on that sunnofa-" He bit his lip, cutting himself off as he used his energy to shadow-walk to the other side of the gap, teleporting to its shadow in the blink of an eye. Torlok appeared behind him a moment later.

Unfortunately, Torlok couldn't stop snickering to himself. "Heh heh, too bad his aim was off. I told ya you looked like a dump, Davook! He probably smelled a toilet and thought you were the designated-"

Davook didn't even pause as he reached back around and violently backhanded his chuckling companion. "Laugh it up, shit for brains. Next time, I'll mash your face in it, then we'll see how funny you think it is."

Torlok's laughter had already stopped as he rubbed the spot where Davook had smacked him. "Yer a real jerk sometimes."

The two of them moved on silently after that, neither of them speaking to each other. Within a minute or two, they had arrived near the outside of the hotel. In the distance, the sound of a crowd at the hotel's massive swimming pool was audible as they too frolicked and played. "Humans are so damn carefree. This oughta shake them up." Davook reached into his own bag, pulling out some napalm charges, designed to start extremely hot fires, very quickly. "I'll plant these around the building. You go stick those on the roof. If we're lucky, it might collapse the entire building on the fleshbags inside."

Torlok chuckled. "Make sure all the doorways are on fire. Then the humans won't be able to get out so easy."

"No shit, stupid. You think I'm a moron or somethin'? I'm the brains of this operation. Now get going." Davook took off, pressing himself against the wall of the building as he made his way to the main entrance.

Torlok quickly jumped up, jamming his claws and feet into the brick siding, easily scaling it like there had already been footholds made for him. Just thirty stories separated him from the top, and soon, a lot of humans were going to die.

The young demon licked his lips as he scaled the wall. Even if the humans on the beach saw him now, it was too late. Their fate was sealed.

Part 331a:

Amelia grins intently as she puts the finishing touches on her sand-castle. "It's perfect! Looks just like a place I lived in for a few decades!"

I stare in awe at the three-foot tall monstrosity. "How are you so good at making these? It's like you were born to form sand."

Amelia giggles at me as she takes a few steps back to admire her creation. "I'm actually quite artistic, I'll have you know! I studied under a few prominent humans, way back in the day."

"Interesting." I start to ask who they were, but then Amelia winds her foot back, leaping forwards and blasting her castle to pieces in a single blow as a terrific blast of wind surges outwards from where she had kicked. Sometimes I forgot about just how powerful she is. "Whoa! You destroyed it, after all that work?!"

Amelia shrugs as she walks around, knocking over a few leftover lumps with her heel. "The ocean would have done that anyway." She flicks her eyes from here to there, taking note of all the people milling about on the beach. Several couples are walking hand in hand, while children laugh and play in the shallow water nearby. The sun blasts down, heating the nearby beach to an uncomfortable ninety degrees Fahrenheit. Still, at least it isn't a hundred.

"It's getting hot out here." I bring up the weather like it's important and she hasn't already noticed.

"It's been like this because of the climate shifts. A massive dust cloud in the Americas after the demons wiped them out, plus a nuclear bombing a decade ago. It was inevitable." Amelia wipes at her face and glances down, seeing the sweat on her brow. We're both wearing just swimwear, so it's about the least dressed we can be, barring full nudity.

"I'm surprised you know about that stuff. I remember teaching you how to play chess and you didn't know what it was, yet now you understand climate shifting."

Amelia shoots a dirty look at me. "I'm not dumb, Jason! I was just uninformed. I'm actually quite intelligent, I'll have you know!" She pauses for a moment as a mischievous grin spreads across her face. "Hmm, say, Jason... I think you need to cool off!"

I blink as suddenly she appears at my side with lightning fast speed, her hands pressing into my ribcage as I suddenly feel myself being thrown from my standing position out into the ocean nearby. In the span of two seconds, I smash into the water with enough force to kill any normal human. With my high regeneration abilities and incredibly strong body though, it merely knocks the wind out of me, as I quickly swim back up to the surface, gasping for air.

"You s-scared the crap out of me!" I sputter and stammer as I stare forwards, realizing she sent me flying over a hundred feet with the barest of effort. The beach is now a short distance away.

Dog paddling my way towards the beach, I feel a slight embarrassment at the fact I'm neither the greatest nor the most graceful swimmer in the world. Amelia is chuckling to herself as I near the beach. "You should have seen your face! That was pricel-"

She's suddenly cut off as a massive explosion sounds off in the distance behind her, followed by several more in the span of a few seconds. My eyes immediately jerk towards the source of the blast, as I feel shock surge through my body. A nearby hotel is being blown to pieces, and it doesn't look like any sort of scheduled demolition. People are screaming in the distance and I can see groups of people fleeing in panic.

Amelia turns back and gawks at it. "Jason! That hotel is being attacked!" A master of the obvious, that girl is.

" Teleport. " I decide to take the fast route to the shore, rather than swimming. " Dry. " My entire body suddenly feels as if I've never experienced the feeling of water in my life, almost making me feel like I'm in a desert. Oh well.

"Amelia, stay here. I'm going to go see what's going on!" I start to move forwards but she grabs my arm.

"No! I'm coming with you!" She seems annoyed that I'd even consider leaving her behind, and it occurs to me that she's right. If she can take a beating from my hypersuit, she'll be fine.

"Alright. Let's change into something more appropriate." I take a step back, quickly glancing over at the Hotel a few football fields away. " Storage. Wear. Wear. " I pull her outfit from storage as well as mine out, making us both wear them in an instant. She's now wearing a cute little blue dress, as she likes to do, while I'm wearing my suit from my speech earlier. Not ideal, but whatever. "Let's go." I place my hand on her shoulder. " Teleport. "

* * *

We jump over to the hotel and arrive in the midst of chaos. Flames have rapidly engulfed the bottom two floors, and the smell of death is in the air. I immediately spot a woman trying to crawl across the ground, as a trail of blood is left behind her. Based on the window that was smashed out nearby, she must have broken it, climbed out, and cut herself up in the process. "Amelia, go help her. I'll take care of the rest."

She nods and runs off to heal the woman, as I feel a slight twinge of fear. The sight of blood... if anything is going to bring out the old Amelia, that would be it.

...No. Amelia is different now. I can't think like that. If she does anything, it will be the last bad thing she ever does. But I trust her, just as she trusts me.

Turning my gaze back to the hotel, I quickly wordsmith. " Extinguish. "

Nothing seems to happen, but then I notice the spot I was looking at had the flames disappear for a moment. I'm simply not using enough power. " EXTINGUISH! "

In a flash, an entire section of the hotel suddenly stops being ablaze, the fires vanishing in an instant, though more of the hotel is still on fire. I decide now is a good time to increase my mobility. " Hypersuit. Wear. " As my suit appears around my body, feeling especially uncomfortable because of the black suit I'm wearing under it, I grunt and ignore the discomfort. These people have it far worse.

Quickly dashing around the building, I continue wordsmithing. " EXTINGUISH! EXTINGUISH! EXTINGUISH! "

Finally, the fires are out, but the heat in the air is still palpable. I jump twenty stories upward in a single bound, jamming my hands into the wall before leaping the remaining ten up onto the roof. The roof is in shambles, with the majority of it sunken in. It looks a lot like bombs were planted up here, then detonated. This had to be some sort of terrorist act.

Quickly I aim my hand at the center of the roof. " WATER! WATER! WATER! " A small flood appears, surging downwards from the spot it appeared at, blasting through stairwells and down into elevator shafts as I keep summoning the water. Finally I pause, waiting a few seconds until I see the water rushing out of windows on each floor. I feel a sudden bit of regret, realizing it might have washed people out of the windows too, but it can't be helped. My goal was to quickly cool off the building, possibly sucking some of the smoke out too.

"Centurion, scan the building below me. How many survivors are there?"

An image appears on the viewscreen before me as Centurion quickly follows my orders. "PILOT JASON HIRO, MY SCAN INDICATES THAT ROUGHLY SEVEN HUNDRED HUMANS ARE EITHER ALIVE OR LIGHTLY INJURED, WHILE THREE THOUSAND TWO HUNDRED ARE DECEASED OR IN CRITICAL CONDITION."

I hear a sound in the distance as ambulances and firefighters rush towards the scene. "Great, we've done enough. Centurion, any theories as to who might have done this?"

Centurion responds after a few moments. "INFORMATION INSUFFICIENT. MORE DATA REQUIRED TO CREATE A THEORY REGARDING THE PERPETRATORS."

I grimace. That's an awful lot of words just to say he didn't know. Oh well, he's a relatively clunky AI anyway. Speaking of which, I haven't heard from Umi in forever. She no longer responds when I call for her, and she hasn't spoken to me in years. Where the hell has she gone off to?

Jumping off the building, I fall thirty stories and smash into the ground below, the hypersuit absorbing the impact easily. I had almost forgotten just how powerful this suit made me feel. "Remove." I strip the suit off with a single word and pack it back in my storage, then glance around and spot Amelia again.

Something isn't right, though. Amelia is sobbing uncontrollably, and she's slumped over in front of the woman I left her with before. Oh... oh no... what if she...

I quickly run over, relief flooding my face as I see the woman's body is perfectly intact. However, she's completely still now. She seems to be dead.

"Amelia? Are you okay? What happened?" I kneel down and put my hand on her back, even as she chokes back another sob.

"I'm s-sorry Jason! I couldn't save her! I couldn't heal her! She died! It's my fault!" Amelia is almost screaming, she's so overcome with grief.

I quickly pull her to my chest and hug her, staring uneasily at the woman laying motionless on the ground. "It's okay, you did what you could."

"It wasn't enough! She died because I was too weak, Jason! She... she even begged me to save her..." Amelia continues to cry as the firefighters and EMT's arrive on scene.

Damn. I didn't think it would come out like this. Amelia had healed me in the future when my entire body was shattered to pieces. Maybe she still wasn't very adept at it yet. I stared at the body carefully, even while Amelia averted her eyes. She seemed unable to look at it, probably because of guilt.

There was a lot of blood on the sidewalk around us, and where the sidewalk turned into sand, it was thick and very dark brown. The woman had probably lost a lot of blood. As Amelia sobbed, I gently used my telekinesis to rotate the body a little bit so I could get a look at the woman's frontside. She was covered in blood, but a huge shard of glass was sticking out of her stomach, the wound closed around it perfectly, though blood appeared to be slowly leaking outwards now that I had shifted her weight somewhat.

That explains it. Amelia healed the body, but she didn't replace the blood loss, and she left a foreign object inside. That glass shard might have had pathogens on it too, infecting the wound. Amelia still had a lot to learn, after all.

I stood up, as Amelia also rose up weakly, her knees shaking in grief. "It's not your fault, Amelia. You did the best you could. It's my fault for not training you well enough. This woman's death is on my hands."

She nodded slowly, though her face betrayed that she didn't believe me. Words are cheap anyway, we'll simply both have to feel guilty.

Oddly, I didn't feel a single shred of sadness bubble up. I almost felt like I didn't even care about the woman's death.

So strange. Amelia was crying over a dead human, but I wasn't. Wasn't she supposed to be the heartless monster here?

I put my hand on her shoulder again, swallowing stiffly as I turned to stare back at the devastated hotel behind me. " Return. "

"Oh my god..." Amy gasped at the live story developing on the news. A resort had been attacked by terrorists, and a message scrawled in blood on the front entrance stated that the demons had done it. More will come. The message had stated plain as day that the demons had no intention of stopping their assault on the humans.

Jorge walked in from the back room, where he had been working on a vintage muscle car from the previous century. It was built in a time before fusion-powered hover generators existed. He was actually younger than Amy by about twenty years, so he had grown up around hovercraft, only in the last few years getting into old-style vehicles for fun during his leisure time.

"What happened? He turned and stared at the wall viewscreen, frowning as the location scrolled across the screen at the bottom. "Christ, that isn't even fifty miles away. I thought we were winning. Is this the cost of losing another Supreme Commander in such a short time?"

Amy felt the shock dissipate slightly as she continued watching the news coverage. "Almost three quarters of the guests at the hotel died. That's crazy! The demons are pure evil." She paused for a moment, as she turned away from the screen, unable to look as the news flashed onto some brutally injured survivors who were being rushed into ambulances. "If the new Supreme Commander, Jason, can't control the demons and start dealing some real damage, we're in for a world of hurt."

"They got past our defensive forces. Impressive, if you ask me. I've seen some of the tech we employ now. We can even detect when they open a portal within the monitoring zones." Jorge scratched his chin as he shrugged. "They must have sneaked past the detection machines on foot, instead of just creating a portal for a hit and run. That's real dedication, and judging by the damage, it was successful too."

Jorge and Amy both stared at each other uncomfortably for a few moments as they thought about the implications of this. If the demons were able to evade the detectors somehow, they might be able to hit a target much closer to home. These were dangerous times.

"You know, Sarah is getting older now. I've been thinking about getting back to the work for the military, now that Stonewall and Benjamin are gone." Amy bit her lip as she felt Jorge's gaze searching her.

"You want back in, huh? I should have seen it coming. It's not just because you think the new commander is a hunk, right?" Jorge felt a playful grin creep over his face as his wife returned the expression back at him.

"Oh come on, it's not like that! Anyway, I just want to help. If more people die and I could have helped prevent their deaths, somehow, then I'll end up feeling guilty."

She spoke earnestly and Jorge smiled at her lovingly, as he considered her opinion. "Well, if you really want to, you can. There is, of course, another way you might be able to help."

"Oh?" Amy cocked an eyebrow at her husband as she waited expectantly for him to elaborate.

"That big mega-church. We could start attending it. You and I both know it helps give energy to the angels, which might be crucial if we ever need their assistance fighting the demonic threat. I don't really agree with everything the church preaches, but it couldn't hurt to go and listen to what they have to say."

Amy rolled her eyes. "Church, huh?" Her smile flattened out as boredom took over. "Jorge, I'm an atheist. So are you. We both know the angels are flawed beings that seek to use humans for cattle. Why would you ever suggest helping them? They're hardly better than the demons."

"I don't see it that way at all." Jorge countered, as he felt an argument coming on. "The angels serve a purpose, sweetheart. They aren't perfect, and they may in fact be using us, but they need us. They can't ever truly become the enemy of humanity, given if they kill us off, they will die too. They're allies of ours simply because they have no choice. And they are quite strong allies too. Russia was once a threat to the world, but then they gave us great aid during the titanic battles with the Volgrim. I don't think it's so black and white."

Amy started to retort, but paused. "You always say the oddest things. Still, you have a point..." She glanced over at the TV, feeling a pain in her chest as corpses were shown being wrapped in white body bags. "I don't really trust angels or gods, but at least they haven't done anything to directly hurt humanity. Maybe we should start going."

"That's the spirit." Jorge smiled as a wave of relief washed over him. No argument this time. They didn't even argue all that much, and were fairly loving and harmonious towards each other in general, but still... when they did, it was unpleasant. "Anyway, Sarah has baseball practice later. You want me to take her?"

"No, that's fine. You have work tomorrow. Don't want you falling asleep on the job." Amy giggled as she walked over and kissed her husband passionately, rubbing her hands all over his back. "Shoot, now you've got me thinking about that new Supreme Commander. I'm feeling kind of frisky."

Jorge rolled his eyes as a huge grin spread across his face. "You're such a tease."

Part 332a:

I calmly wait for a few moments as the replicator crafts the molecules together to make myself a fresh cup of coffee. Amelia is sitting on the other side of the kitchen in one of the few easy chairs we had set up, staring out blankly into space. Her expression is... pained. That woman's death really hit her hard.

The replicator lets out a soft 'ding' as the coffee appears on the plate, and I walk over to where she's sitting, gently placing myself across from her as I take a long sip of the delicious java.

"You can't keep beating yourself up over this." I stare at her evenly as she continues to look out the window, deliberately avoiding my gaze.

"It's my fault she died, Jason. All I've ever done is kill, and the one time I had the chance to heal someone, I failed. It was within my power, but I was careless." Amelia isn't crying or anything, she spent all of her tears earlier. For a nearly immortal demigoddess of sorts, she could be a fairly emotional being when something hit her hard.

"It was a simple mistake. I've made mistakes too, you know. Bad ones. Magic isn't infallible... I learned that a long time ago."

"I know that, Jason. I'm not sad that I didn't save her, I'm sad that it was well within my power to save her and my carelessness is what killed her. If it was simply a matter of... of her being in an irredeemable state, then I'd have to swallow my pain and accept it. But..." Amelia finally turns to stare at me, her eyes betraying no emotion. "...but I can't forgive myself for this. Even more so, I can't forgive the demons. They attacked that hotel and killed all those people. They're monsters."

I nod along with her words. "Demons are mostly pure evil. I've met a few good ones, but the majority of them hate humans, whether for rational or irrational reasons. To be fair, humans hate the demons too, but still, two wrongs don't make a right." I feel a sudden pain in my chest as I remember Gregory, and Samantha... two demons who I once considered to be my close friend and lover, respectively. How long has it been since I spoke to Samantha? It's been over a hundred years since I arrived back in the past, an infinitely long time in human terms. I can barely even remember the taste of her skin, or the softness of her lips. Her face has been slowly fading from my memory...

Ah, yes, Cassiel. Her too. I loved both of them so much, but it feels like an eternity has passed. Amelia is here now. Do I need them anymore? Do I really need to protect the future they come from? Isn't it already too late to see them again?

I suddenly realize Amelia is staring at me intently. "You were off in your own little world there for a minute. Something on your mind?"

"Sorry, just thinking about the future again. I'm beginning to wonder if I should just do what I can to save the world entirely, kill all the demons, and unite humanity. If all the demons are dead, the future I come from won't exist anymore. It's that simple."

Amelia nods sagely as she turns again to stare out at the stars of the Milky Way all around us. "Time is a fickle thing. I've been reading a lot of books and watching some vintage old movies about time travel. There are a lot of theories about paradoxes and stuff like that. Aren't you worried you'll erase yourself?"

"I think we're well past that threshold." I take another sip of my coffee as I brood quietly. "I'm still not sure how time travel works. Is the Grandfather Paradox relevant? The Butterfly Effect? Multiverse theory? I just don't have enough information. Perhaps... Umi..."

I catch myself as Amelia tilts her head to look at me oddly. "Umi? Who's that?"

"A friend of mine, but we haven't spoken in a long time. She's been oddly secretive and quiet lately, I'm not sure why."

Amelia glares at me suspiciously. "Another woman, then? Do I need to be worried? Judging by her name, she sounds like an ugly sea hag."

"Err, it's not like that at all. She's kind of like a smart person I can ask questions, and she always knows the answer." I feel myself weirded out by the thought of being in love with an artificial intelligence. How would that even work, anyway? Maybe if she made a robot body... no, wait, please stop. These thoughts are making me ill.

Amelia smiles faintly as she glances at my coffee enviously. "It's fine, you could never love another woman more than you love me. I'm the perfect girl, after all."

I raise an eyebrow at her rather cocky statement. "Perfect, huh? You have a pretty high opinion of yourself."

"I'm the most powerful woman in existence, so it's only natural." Amelia's smile widens as she flips back her three-foot long raven black hair, tossing it around with a flourish. "Other women would be lucky to have a tenth of my beauty, let alone my power."

"I beat you in combat though, so I'm more powerful than you." I point at her and wink, which makes her smile falter.

"Oh please, that was a long time ago. You managed to hit me one time, and I've been working on my skills in the holodeck when you're away. You'd be lucky to get past first base the next time we spar." Amelia rolls her eyes as she looks back out at the stars dreamily.

"Doesn't really matter, as a man, I'd be ashamed if I had to hit the woman I love. It wouldn't be a fair fight either way."

"The words of a scaredy-cat. Suit yourself! I'd rather put my abilities to use fighting the demons anyway. I..." Amelia's expression darkened as she seemed to remember the woman once again. "...I want to kill them, Jason. What they did wasn't right. It was mindless slaughter, like what I used to do. It has to stop, or the cycle of violence will never come to an end."

Amelia... she was so serious sometimes. What a dramatic shift her personality was like now compared to just twenty years ago. She kind of reminded me of an alcoholic or a smoker in recovery. Once the addiction has been weaned, a strange hatred for the substance appears, causing the former addict to react violently to the thought of returning to their original sick lifestyle.

Is that what was going on with her? Perhaps she so loathed the thought of killing and devouring humans that her failure to save that woman was eating her alive. The guilt must be... mind-boggling. The only solution I can think of is allowing her a chance to properly heal someone for once. Perhaps that would repair this newly created mental scar.

"I agree, Amelia. The demons need to be stopped... at all costs. It's time to go on the offensive, and win this time. No more pussyfooting around... we need to kill them and capture Satan. With the hydra's head gone, the rest of the body will fall."

Amelia smiled at me again, this time with a more soft and sincere feeling. "I don't want to kill anymore, Jason, but it has to be done. I'm not doing it for you, but for me."

"That's for the best."

The three members of the family felt rather out of place in this megachurch, but the other members of the church were quite welcoming. An older lady strode forwards, a somewhat false smile spread across her face. "Welcome to the Church of Retribution! Have you come to hear Father Clarence's sermon today?"

Jorge glanced at Amy and nodded stiffly. "Uh, yeah." He couldn't imagine any other reason they would be there, given they were new members. It sounded like such a dumb question, but he didn't want to be impolite.

"Splendid! Simply wonderful! This is a special sermon that you're going to hear today, one sure to excite you as newcomers! Come along with me, now! It's starting in just a few minutes!" The grey haired old woman nodded excitedly as she tittered about, quickly walking through the main lobby and through a massive set of double doors into an incredibly huge auditorium.

Jorge, Amy, and Sarah all followed along with a bit of hesitation in their steps, but they figured it was best to just go with the flow. It would be rude to leave now.

As the doors opened, Sarah gasped. A crowd the likes of which she had never seen in her entire life milled about, cheering and whooping loudly as they held their bibles high and stared at a stage that stretched out into the crowd, with a circular platform for Clarence to stand on when he arrived.

Having arrived so late, they were forced to stand near the doors, though personally Jorge and Amy didn't mind, given they would be able to leave more easily than if they were being pressed forwards by standing closer to the stage. The crowd seemed excitable, but polite. No real shoving or anger took place, and all the people around them had broad smiles on their faces as they waited anxiously for the Father to arrive.

The old woman, having shown them the auditorium, hurried away quickly before they could ask her anything. Jorge groaned. "Is this really a good idea? It's not too late to leave."

Amy shrugged. "Worst case scenario, we waste an hour of our lives. There are bigger things we could be wasting time on right now, and this indirectly helps Earth."

"Yeah, I know that. I just..." Jorge cut himself off as a hush descended over the crowd.

The lights dimmed as a huge spotlight lit up the red curtains in the distance. A man quickly strode out, his dark skin contrasting with the pure white robes he wore, illuminated even more brightly by the spotlight aimed at him.

"My children, I am here for you!" The crowd erupted in cheers as Father Clarence walked with purpose to the center of the auditorium, raising his hands up to the sky as if to accept god's love personally. "I have once again spoken with the angels, and they have told me of the great impact we are having on Earth! Already, we have a new Supreme Commander instated, one who is friendly to the angels and people of our faith! Rejoice, for he is going to be a new agent of change! The Messiah!"

Some people seemed confused that a Supreme Commander was suddenly an ally, but they quickly overcame their misgivings and cheered wildly. Jorge shot a questioning glance at his wife, but she merely shrugged, as she usually did in situations like these.

"This is no ordinary Supreme Commander! I have been assured by the angels themselves that he is one who saved their very existence, single-handedly! A mighty warrior, born of the cloth, with powers granted by the angels! He alone has the power to win this war on behalf of those on high!" Clarence's voice rose and fell, like a wave crashing onto the beach, his fever infecting those nearest him and spreading outwards from there.

Jorge was beginning to feel disillusioned, but before he could say something negative, he glanced down to see his daughter hopping giddily as she tried to see over the crowd. "Wow, he's so cool! I want to be a holy warrior too!"

Jorge chuckled, but then felt an odd sense of dread. This was how the indoctrination started, by infecting the minds of those who were too young to know right from wrong. He'd have to talk with her when they got home.

"Imagine, my children, the strength it must take to fight on behalf of those on high! It is a lonely battle... one that pays little but the riches one will receive when they pass into the next world. Truly, Jason Hiro is a Supreme Commander unlike his predecessors! We should use him as an example for ourselves, cloaking ourselves in the humble spirit required to follow the commands of those who reign in Heaven!"

Jorge finally groaned and rubbed his eyes, reaching over to touch his wife's arm. "Come on, Amy. Let's go. I've had enough of this."

Amy continued to stare at the man onstage, resisting Jorge's efforts to pull her away. "I know you don't like him much, but I'm going to stay here with Sarah for a bit. We'll be out soon, alright?"

Jorge felt an odd sensation in his chest as his wife continued to stare at the bellowing man on the platform a hundred feet away. Was she really interested in what this lunatic had to say? Perhaps she was just curious. She'd been an atheist as long as they had been together. Best to not pressure her one way or another.

"Fine, I'll be outside waiting. Just make sure you get out before the sermon is over, or you'll have to fight the crowd."

Amy nodded absentmindedly. "Yeah. Uh-huh. Sure." A smile broke out on her face from out of nowhere as the preacher screamed into the microphone once again, the sound making Jorge feel physically ill. Tearing himself away from his wife and daughter, he shook his head slowly as he headed back outside.

Women. You can marry one and live with her for twenty years, and she'll still surprise you. Jorge grimaced as he ambled out to their hovercar in the parking lot. Hopefully, this wouldn't take them too much longer. He was in dire need of an aspirin.

Part 333a:

April 28th, 2117

The men and women in the room waited patiently, despite the fact the new Supreme Commander was already fifteen minutes late. Sitting in rows of aluminum chairs, the varying assortment of generals, lieutenants, scientists, and analysts numbered nearly two hundred, and Jorge was just one man among many who were going to meet the new Supreme Commander for the first time.

Amy sat next to him as the two of them felt their legs tapping up and down rapidly, adrenaline coursing through their veins.

"I can't believe I'm going to see him again." Amy mumbled to herself nervously, as Jorge glanced over at her and put his hand on hers.

"Don't be nervous. I mean, he probably won't remember you at all. Heck, it's unlikely that you'll even get a chance to speak with him." Jorge immediately rained on her parade which dulled her excitement somewhat.

She pulled her hand away and glared at him playfully. "I hear jealousy in your voice. Afraid a big strong man like him is going to sweep me off my feet?"

"Unlikely. Besides, I'm sure given his looks he's got a harem of women, assuming he can ever find the time." Jorge grinned sarcastically at his wife, but she seemed to take him seriously.

"You think so? I guess that would make sense."

"It's a joke. Jeez, Amy, calm yourself down. He's probably-" Jorge paused as the door suddenly swished open and a hush fell across the room. He was getting tired of being cut off like that.

Three men and two women walked in, all of them being four star generals, followed by the Supreme Commander himself, Jason Hiro.

"All rise and salute the Supreme Commander." A woman at the front of the room spoke and jerked her hand up stiffly, as the entire audience rose to their feet in the blink of an eye and followed suit. A moment later, they all sat back down again and waited eagerly.

"Hey, everyone, nice to meet you all." The Supreme Commander spoke rather informally, seeming to ignore general formal speech in favor of something friendlier. "I'm Jason Hiro, though to keep things succinct, you may refer to me as Mr. Hiro during this briefing. Today we're going to be looking over data from the last few decades to formulate a strategy for eliminating the demons within the next few years. All suggestions will be considered. Additionally, we're going to look at travel to other worlds for the purpose of creating secondary places for humanity to survive in the case of a huge catastrophe on Earth. Can't hurt to be safe."

"Mr. Hiro, are you saying there's still a chance Earth could suffer a major attack?" One of the analysts in the front row fired off a question, and Jason pivoted to respond.

"Anything can happen. Even barring an attack, there's always the threat of an asteroid hitting earth, or a comet, or perhaps nuclear war, so we have to think of threats beyond just the demons and Volgrim. Let's move on."

Jason turned back to face the viewscreen at the front as a series of bars and graphs appeared showing various factoids. "Humanity has been remarkably efficient in the art of war. We've lost under a million soldiers over the last hundred years, and the bulk of those we did lose were due to battles with the Volgrim in space. On the ground, the Hypersuit Commandos were effectively unstoppable, doling out death in the tens of millions to demons and Volgrim alike. I have concluded that our ground forces are doing a fantastic job, even when we're in the lair of the enemy and in unfamiliar territory."

Jason paused for a moment as uncertainty crossed over his face. "As you all know, I am from the future. In the future I come from, I lived in the labyrinth and fought the demons for well over a decade. A curious fact about the labyrinth then and now is that in the future I come from, its paths shift, whereas here in this time, they are static. This has given us a great boon in that we have fully mapped out over twenty percent of its corridors." Despite the fact he was giving good news, Mr. Hiro seemed suspicious of something, but he didn't elaborate.

"The fact we have mapped out a fifth of the enemy's world gives us lots of strategic options. I would like to establish forward bases and teleportation rooms inside their lair, while simultaneously focusing on eliminating their presence on Earth. Additionally, I am planning to deploy nuclear weapons inside the labyrinth, deep inside where our own forces will be unaffected. My own clones will be the ones to do this with the aid of Hypersuits."

Jason Hiro's comments on nuclear weapons made the entire audience start chattering to each other quietly, some people murmuring about whether such a thing would be a good idea. One researcher spoke up, deciding to air his thoughts. "Commander, with all due respect, wouldn't nuclear weapons be rather ineffective inside the labyrinth, given that it's essentially half the size of planet Earth itself? Do we even know if this will be more than a blip on the radar compared to the vast number of demons inside?"

Jason shrugged, a move that made other members of the audience give him looks of hesitation. "Honestly, the size of the labyrinth is half the size of Earth, but because the whole thing is essentially a hollow maze of corridors and rooms for gestation and breeding of demons, it probably has the same surface area as Earth, maybe more. Keep in mind I'm not talking about a few nuclear weapons, but many. Easily a hundred will be dropped in key locations. I'm going to strategically target key chokepoints and heavily traversed passages to try and limit their movement. If we kill a few million of the bastards, or even more, it was a productive move."

"Do we know how many demons are inside the labyrinth?" A woman on the other side of the room wearing military garb spoke up.

"Billions. I can't even get a good estimated number, because we don't know what 80% of the labyrinth looks like. I do know though that the number is more than the sum of humanity's lives, so let that fact haunt you at night." Jason licked his lips as he glanced back around at the audience. "Anyway, beyond killing the demons, we need to look into repurposing other planets for humanity's use. Trifrancium will be needed to rapidly explore and colonize the nearby parts of the galaxy, and we need to find a steady source of it among nearby stars. In fact..."

Jason paused and looked around the audience for a moment, as if searching for someone. "I think there's someone here today that found such a likely planet. I, ah, forgot her name though." He scratched his head for moment as a look of embarrassment crossed his face. Amy quickly stood up and smiled.

"That would be me, Amy Gutierrez. A pleasure to, err, see you again, Supreme Commander." She felt her face redden as his eyes met hers.

"Oh, sorry, we've met before? Shoot, I don't mean to be rude but..." Jason paused for a moment, and Amy was about to elaborate, but then he cocked his head slightly, as if listening to an unknown informant. "Aha, now I remember. It just came back to me all of a sudden. You were on the moon base, decades ago, and were one of the pilots who helped protect us from the Volgrim. Based on the tiny bit of information I've seen in your profile, you seem to have had quite the illustrious career." He beckoned for her to step forwards.

As she did, she blushed again and indicated Jorge, sitting beside her. "This is my husband, Jorge. He was on a separate mission to explore the galaxy in the third quadrant."

Jason's eyes lit up for a moment. "Oh, yes. You didn't find any planets that would be immediately suitable for life, but I was informed you did find several planets ideal for mining, some which might contain Trifrancium. Both of you, come on up here."

Amy shot a glance at her husband who returned a smile to her. They quickly stood and walked up front.

Jorge swallowed as he approached the blonde mountain of a man. In person, he was only slightly less intimidating than Stonewall, who Jorge had never actually spoken to but had seen several times in the past. Jason seemed like Stonewall's superior in the physical department though, as his body looked to be made of 250 pounds of solid muscle.

"Alright, I'd like to hear your thoughts on the planet you discovered, Mrs. Gutierrez. I've already looked at the reports regarding it carefully, but I want to hear your opinion as head of the expedition that discovered it."

Jason stared at Amy expectantly and she felt her heart racing slightly. "W-well, it was high in nitrogen and carbon dioxide concentration, and totally barren of course, but given your ability to terraform planets I assumed that you might be able to make it habitable. We found only trace amounts of oxygen, and very little hydrogen, so I'm not really even sure it was as big of a discovery as my team thought..."

Her voice trailed off as she felt her hands shaking slightly. She suddenly became acutely aware that she was standing in front of a crowd of two hundred onlookers, which only made her shaking more obvious. Jason, however, seemed to be completely oblivious.

"I can work with that. The most important thing is distance to the star. If the planet is in the habitation zone, I can remake everything about it as needed. I simply don't have the power to create an entire planet by itself though, so your discovery was the most important of all our expedition teams. You should feel proud of yourself!"

Amy felt her body warm up slightly at his words of praise, as well as the fact her husband was gazing at her back.

Jason continued. "In any case, we're going to be sending a force to that planet along with two of my clones. I plan to create a portal, like I did for Volgarius, so we can begin sending humans there at a rapid rate once it's been established. As for why I called you up front, I'd love it if you and your husband could lead the expedition to the planet. This way, you'll truly have your name carved into the history books."

Jason stared at Amy expectantly, but she felt her stomach flip-flop and her smile fade. "Well, that is very generous, Commander, but I don't think we can accept. We have a daughter and leaving her behind is not an option. We also wouldn't want to bring her along and take her away from her friends."

Jason froze for a moment. "Oh. My apologies, I didn't even think about something like that." He scratched his chin for a moment. "I really do want one of you on the mission though, if possible I'd prefer you go, Amy. You were the one who discovered Revival, so it would be ideal if you received credit for establishing humanity's first outpost outside of our solar system."

Jorge coughed and spoke up. "Err, well, we'll have to talk about this privately. Can we have a few days to think about it?"

Jason nodded as he smiled and extended his hand out to Jorge. "Sure thing! Just let me know what your decision is by the end of June. We're rolling out at the start of July and need to have the protocols ready and crew manifest completed. If you two won't be leading the expedition, I'll have to find an alternate."

"Thank you, sir. We'll see how this goes." Jorge reached out and shook Jason's hand, wincing as the titan of a man nearly crushed his hand.

Amy and her husband quickly walked back and sat down in their seats, Amy still feeling rather lightheaded from the presence of the new Supreme Commander up so close. She hadn't felt this when she met him in her youth, though that may have been because he wore a Hypersuit and she couldn't see his face.

By now, Jorge was beginning to feel more than a little jealous. "Would you quit staring at him?"

Amy blinked twice and then quickly flicked her gaze down. "Sorry, I just can't help it. Something about him is... I don't know."

Amy sighed to herself. Jorge just couldn't understand, as a man, what it was she felt when she looked at the commander. And frankly, neither could she.

Part 334a:

May 4th, 2117.

The Labyrinth. A mysterious place created by the demons, though for what reasons I do not know. In the future I come from, the hallways are a shifting mess of u-turns and double-backs, constantly disorienting the traveler and making it nearly impossible to get to the needed destination.

Here though, with the Crown of Solomon atop my head, it's a cinch. For some reason, the hallways don't shift, at least not this far in the past, during this timeline. The Crown of Solomon gives me information about the layout just like it did in the future, but I've noticed something else that's interesting, thanks in part to the memory boost it also bestows on me... the Labyrinth isn't even a maze, at least not as of now. In fact, the paths are quite straight, leading to many logical areas for living, various huge rooms for training and gestation, and other things of that sort.

It's not maze-like at all, when I can look at it from the perspective of the Crown. I haven't worn the crown for years, mostly because I didn't have too much need for it, but I'm wearing it now. In the future where I started out, the Crown became such a normal part of my body that in effect I grew used to it, and my powers of perception dulled somewhat. It's much like the feeling of having my arm get cut in battle... a sharp, stinging feeling at first, but eventually I lose that sensation and my sense of pain becomes weaker.

By wearing the crown all the time, I become unable to use it to its fullest potential. Best to only use it for important circumstances, like now.

I'm wearing a Hypersuit now, with the Crown atop my helmet. Honestly, it looks kind of stupid, but it works. A small company of 11 clones follows along behind me, all of them wearing black Hypersuits to contrast with my white suit. It makes it more obvious that I'm the leader and the Original, so to speak. Naturally, a huge group of clones are on standby at the JIB just in case we need help fighting demons or whatever.

I only brought along first generation clones, since I wasn't sure what sort of firepower I might need. J1-1, of course, is also coming along. We all call him Sensei as a joke, since he's the oldest living clone, but it sort of morphed into his actual codename.

As we round a corner, heading towards one of the large demon gestation chambers, we walk straight into a hundred skeletons and skeleton commanders, all of them with their weapons at the ready. It seems our path was anticipated.

They start to raise up their weapons to charge at us, but I use my overwhelming telekinetic power to simply smash all of them out of the way, crushing them against a wall, as most of their bones crumble into splinters and litter the ground.

It's been like this the whole way here. I've easily killed a few hundred demons and monsters, with few to stand in my way. My clones have actually had nothing to do, they're really more like groupies that just follow me around.

Still, a surprise ambush by Satan would be undesirable, so I can't afford to get cocky. He's killed me once, though apparently I also came close to returning the favor. That was decades ago, though, and we've both likely taken the lesson to heart. We won't underestimate each other again.

"Original, how much further is it?" Sensei speaks up, a tinge of boredom in his voice, as I expected. The question itself is oddly reminiscent of are we there yet?

"The crown says we're about half a mile away from the nearest gestation chamber. We have to go rather slow though, just in case there are surprises."

Sensei nods at me as he seems to infer the meaning of my words without needing specifics. "To be honest, I'd love some action. You're the only one having any fun here."

"I hardly consider this fun." I retort with a smirk on my face that he can't see. This is a lot like playing a video game with all the cheats on and steamrolling everything with no effort. There's simply no challenge in it, and I don't take pleasure in utterly crushing those weaker than me. It's just business, at this point. The only joy I get in crushing the demons is the knowledge that every one of them I kill won't be able to harm a human.

As we walk forwards, my telepathy senses something that makes my skin crawl. Up to now, I hadn't been projecting it forwards much since there are simply too many demons in the labyrinth and all that sensory information could slow down my reflexes, but the gestation chamber is likely to be a key battle point when we arrive, and I need to know what I'm dealing with.

Something is wrong though. This isn't a gestation chamber. It's... something else. I can sense dozens of minds, and all of them are thinking the same thing.

Kill me. Kill me. Kill me.

Over and over again, all of them are simply thinking the same exact thing, a chorus of voices singing a dreadful tune that I no longer wish to hear. I quickly turn my mind away from them.

"Jesus Christ." One of my other clones apparently senses their thoughts too. "Are you leading us the right way? These minds belong to... to..."

"Humans." Sensei speaks up, his voice now sounding on edge.

Up ahead, a light is shining from yet another corner, the hallway itself appearing to widen dramatically. I check my mental map quickly, and it still shows we're approaching a gestation chamber, but that is clearly not what awaits us.

We round the corner, sucking in breaths as a strange sight awaits us. It's a prison of sorts, and humans are all over inside, locked in small, cramped cages, much like mutts at a local shelter. Furthermore, the walls have old, dried blood spattered around in various places. The entire area must be the size of a 5 story hotel, but it's totally hollowed out, with only a series of catwalks going across the upper areas... almost as if they were for observation or something.

"We've been expecting you." A voice speaks up as a confident looking red-skinned demon walks up to us, not a hint of fear on his face. "Expecting one of our spawning chambers, were you? I think you will be quite disappointed."

He's a gentle looking demon, as much of a misnomer as that might be. Frail little arms hidden inside a casual dress shirt and pants that belong to the bottom half of a suit. Coupled with his blood red hair, he looks like a more casual version of Beelzebub, one of the demons I knew from the future. Man, I haven't thought about Beelzy in ages. This guy looks so much like him.

"Who are you? You understand the position you're in, right?" My suit's speakers play my voice out as I speak and he shrugs.

"I'm, err, 'Jake'. Yeah, I'm Jake. That will do. You're too late, since we swapped our testing complex with the hatchery earlier today." Jake glances behind himself before turning back to me, a grimace on his face. "Sorry about the mess on the walls. Sometimes humans resist our orders and we have to give them a little coercion."

Jake winks at me as he says that disgusting thing. I've had about enough of his cocky attitude. These people need my help. I send Jake flying to the side with my telekinesis, his body exploding into pieces, given how hard he hits the wall. I sigh, as I aim my mind at the cages in front of us. Using telekinesis, I unlock all of them at once, before Sensei suddenly speaks up.

"He's not dead."

Huh?

Glancing back at the mess I made, I swallow as I see the pieces of Jake's body quivering slightly. Suddenly, they begin moving towards each other at alarming speeds, and a bright flash of light shines forth, Jake is restored to perfect condition within just a few seconds. His shirt and pants are tattered and in pieces, but his thin, scraggly body is in perfect condition.

"That was rude. Talk about shooting first and asking questions later." Jake rolls his eyes at me. "I'm a unique-class demon. My only power is immortality, the highest kind. I can reform myself after death, even if I'm spattered into tiny droplets of blood. I also don't feel pain. Beyond that, I don't have any other powers, so I'm no threat to you."

He's a mouthy little cunt. "Thanks for the information. I already guessed you weren't a threat. So why are you all alone?"

Jake beckons around the room at all the humans that are climbing out of their cages. "I'm the only demon here. Satan wanted me to speak with you personally. Said something about you and him having an... understanding."

I stare evenly at the demon with the odd ability. He looks even more unimposing, now that his thin arms are visible. "An understanding, huh? The only thing I understand is that demons need to be eradicated. That is the only way to prevent the future I come from." I tilted my head towards the human prisoners, several of whom were looking at our hypersuits with hope in their eyes. "This is barbaric."

"Heh, you think this is barbaric? You've seen nothing. Humans have done worse to the demons, and far worse to other humans. You're the scariest, most evil of all the four sentient races. You may think of demons as evil, but all we wish is for self preservation. If it weren't for the fact that a single human commander, such as yourself, might order our extermination, peace would be possible between our races."

"Peace is overrated. Sooner or later, someone is going to break a treaty. For example, the demons might continue to crowd this labyrinth and require more space than it currently provides. With that in mind, using their superior numbers, they could attack and wipe out us humans. I can't let that happen." I point my finger at him, my eyes narrowing and my voice deepening meaningfully. "I refuse to allow the future I am from come to pass. If demons rule the universe, and the angels are exterminated, you'll treat humans as cattle."

"Cheh. I sincerely doubt that." Jake's smile vanishes as he stares at me with a look of contempt. "As I have spoken with Satan on several occasions, I can assure you that if a situation like that were to occur, we'd simply kill all the humans. We have no need for cattle. I don't know what future you're from, but I'm sure you're remembering it incorrectly."

"Are you calling me a liar?" I grit my teeth as I stare at the little shitbag in front of me. "You don't even know what kind of future I come from. You demons are vile, despicable creatures. I've only ever known a handful that weren't total monsters."

"Yeah, I don't know what future you come from. Feel free to enlighten me. In the meantime, you probably haven't looked very hard. Demons, humans, and angels are all capable of great horrors, as well as great compassion. You simply see what you wish to see." Jake and I stare at each other nastily, though he can't see my expression inside my helmet. Not that it matters, I'm sure my voice tone is adequate enough to convey my rage.

"I'm not going to explain anything about the future to you. The last thing I want to do is take a chance and give you monsters any ideas, just in case I do screw up and fail to eliminate your kind. I won't allow that future to happen because of my own failure."

Jake's face seemed to calm down for a moment, and a split second later, he was smiling again. "That's the thing, isn't it? You really are just guessing, after all. You don't know what you're doing, or if you'll be the one to cause these atrocities to happen, or if you'll prevent them. You're like an infant that accidentally grabbed hold of a gun. It's only a matter of time before you shoot yourself in the foot."

This... this little smug asshole. He seems to think he knows it all, eh? I feel a calm wash over me as I raise my hand and aim my palm at him. "You're a real know-it-all, aren't you? You've got it all figured out. Hell, you probably aren't scared of me due to your inability to feel pain or the fact you can't die. The problem is, both of those things are false, when dealing with me."

Jake's smile fades slightly as he cocks an eyebrow and stares at my hand. "What's this? Some imitation of a stop sign? Maybe you're going to shoot me with some death laser? It's pointless. There's nothing you can do to st-"

I interrupt him as my speakers turn off. He never even hears me say anything. " Pain... Atomize. "

I pause for a moment after saying the first word, giving him a split second to feel it before his body evaporates a moment later, his mouth opening in a silent scream of agony as he evaporates into the ether.

I pause for a few moments, then speak again. " Erase. Forget. "

Just like that, I've completely eradicated all traces of his body, even at the subatomic and quark levels. By erasing all memories of him from the living in the universe, I've effectively destroyed his existence and all he ever stood for.

Maybe if he hadn't ran his stupid mouth, he'd still be here.

I turn around and notice Sensei is taking his helmet off. "Err, I suddenly feel lightheaded. I feel like I saw something important, but now I can't remember anything."

Hmm. Seems I also erased his memories from my clones as well. I'll have to keep that in mind for the future. "Don't worry about it, we had a pest and he had a troublesome ability. He must have messed with your minds. I managed to stop him."

"Right." Sensei shrugs and rubs his forehead for a moment before putting his helmet back on.

"Teleport these people out of here, then plant the nuke. We'll detonate it once we're clear."

"Roger that."

I sigh as I turn back to the people now rushing frantically towards myself and my clones. Something always has to happen to ruin my plans.

Still though, I wonder why the demons were keeping human prisoners? What reasons could they possibly have? I should have asked Jake before I obliterated him from reality. Curse my idiocy sometimes.

Satan blinked slowly, as a weird muddled feeling appeared in his mind. He staggered back a few steps, wiping at his face as the feeling disappeared.

" Your evilness, something has shifted. I felt the fabric of the universe alter itself for a moment. " A voice spoke from within himself, as Satan glanced down at his chest. Hades, one of the dark gods of the ancient times, and one that Satan had gone out of his way to imprison, rather than kill.

"You're not one to usually speak up first. This must be of some significance." Satan narrowed his eyes as he thought back to the feeling from a few moments earlier. Quickly waving his hands and murmuring quietly, he teleported into the nearby surveillance room, which had been following Jason's movements since he and his clones arrived in the maze. "Has anything happened?"

Marie was sitting in a chair, watching a screen with boredom in her eyes. "Well, for a moment, I had this thought that something did happen, but I can't quite place it. According to the video logs, literally nothing has happened. He did reach the replacement room though, and he just stood completely still for a few minutes, like he was talking to someone. Nobody was there though."

Satan nodded slowly as his eyes shifted up to the screen. Jason's clones were aiming their hands at each prisoner, and a moment later the prisoner would disappear. "I see he's taken the bait. Still, go back to that moment when he arrived. I want to see it."

Marie sighed as she leaned forwards, taking her feet off the console and cycling back through it. A few minutes of rewound footage later, and Satan was left to stare intently at a totally motionless Jason Hiro as he and his clones simply stared ahead, while the prisoners were released and huddled in the distance, as if they were trying to stay away from something frightening.

"How odd. You're right. It looks like he's standing there, speaking with someone but- wait." Satan felt his heart stop for a moment. On the screen, a massive impact smashed into the wall, as if something had been flung into it. But... nothing was there...

Marie also caught it this time, as she blinked and looked at it carefully. "What was that? Did he just attack the wall?"

"Unlikely. This footage is very good quality too, and I didn't see any object hit. What could the meaning to that impact be?" Satan gnawed on his lip intently.

Hades rumbled from within him. " My liege, as I said, something shifted. I do not know what, but we have already seen the latent potential that hero possesses. He may have altered something fundamental to the universe. Such power would usually be unthinkable, but..."

Hades trailed off, and Satan glared at the screen viciously. "Wouldn't it be interesting if this recording had somehow been tampered with?"

Marie started to object, but instead shrugged. "I'd normally say it's a practically impossible feat, but given what we've seen Jason do before, it's not outside the realm of possibility. To hack these recordings and edit them so well in the span of a few minutes, without ever leaving the place he's at now... it would be..."

She was about to elaborate, but suddenly her screen flickered, as did all of the electric based technology in the room. A moment later, the entire place shook violently, as a huge shockwave blasted out from all areas of the labyrinth at once. A colossal 'WHUMP' could be heard, as if smashing a million hammers into a concrete barrier a mile away. Several demons as well as Marie screamed in fright. All of the people in the room stumbled to the ground and fell flat on their backs as they blinked in confusion.

Just as quickly as it came, it was gone. "What the hell was that?!" Marie screamed in anger as she reached up and clawed at the desk she had been sitting at, realizing she had hit her head on the way down. The lights were out, as were all of the other electronics. Only a few dim backup lights, powered by magical systems, were running properly.

Satan stood up gracefully in the blink of an eye, quickly surveying the damage. Everyone appeared to be fine. "You heard the female. I want a report!"

One of the sensory-type demons focused for a moment as he spoke with others of his kind, scattered all over the labyrinth. "There was a massive explosion, coming from the area where those commandos were located. Based on the sheer power, it must have been a nuclear device."

Marie nodded quickly. "That wasn't an ordinary nuke. It must have been a two-stage explosion, first to cause damage, then followed up by an EMP effect. Probably, it was one of those new ones that I heard was being worked on by the human scientists in London. Top secret stuff. I didn't think they were ready yet though, and the power needed would be..."

Satan scowled. "That hero is a thorn in my side. I want a casualty report, as well as a report on the damage the labyrinth sustained. Luckily, that installation wasn't close to anything too important, but..."

"Neither were we, and we felt it." Marie glanced at him and nodded knowingly. "That must have been a tremendous blast radius. I can only guess it was enhanced somehow, perhaps with his magical abilities."

Satan gnashed his teeth as he pounded her desk. "Damn him to hell! He outwitted me again!"

Marie shook her head quickly. "No, calm down. That is not the case. This labyrinth is massive. Even if the blast was several megatons in size, we can rebuild. It's all created by magical power anyway. Besides that, Jason took the assets we left him. I'm sure they will serve their purpose in the near future."

Satan's breathing slowed as he quickly regained control of his emotions. "Right. You have a point, as usual. I'm not fond of the idea of my brethren dying, but sacrifices are necessary in a battle to win a war. I do apologize for my outburst."

As he calmed himself down, Marie stood up and meandered over to the other side of the room. "I'm going to personally go and inspect the damage. Care to tag along? I'd hate to encounter Jason all by myself."

Satan nodded. "Yes, that will do. I got the impression this was a hit and run operation, but it can't hurt to be sure. Let's go."

The two of them walked quickly out the door a few moments later.

Still, Satan thought back to the image of that wall being smashed. What had gone on during those few minutes that he couldn't recall now?

Part 335a: Alterations

Clarence sat quietly on the bench in his private dressing room as the dull roar of the anxious crowd outside awaited him. Just fifteen more minutes, and it would be time for him to make yet another raucous speech.

He tapped his finger on his knee slowly, as he felt an odd muddled sensation in his mind. The words in his mind seemed to form themselves more slowly than usual, as he debated over what to preach about today. He could probably just autopilot it again, as he had been doing for a long time now. It's not like the idiots would notice anyway.

His finger's motion slowed to a crawl as a familiar shifting of wind made him pause and take notice of a visitor. "Raphael. I see you've come to say hello."

"You've become more perceptive over the years." Raphael smiled kindly as he ambled over, leaning heavily on his staff as he tended to do. "Something on your mind? You seem less energetic these days."

"Oh... you know how it is." Clarence shrugged slightly as he glanced up at the Archangel drawing closer, a strange feeling making him break eye contact after less than a second. "I'm just getting... old. I can't think as clearly as I did even just a few years ago."

"Hmm. Interesting." Raphael kept his voice neutral as he came to a standstill a few feet away, eyeing the human carefully. "You seem to say that a lot lately. Are you certain there's nothing else?"

Clarence chewed on his lip in silence for a moment as he stared at the ground in front of himself. "Well, to tell the truth, I've been thinking about myself a lot."

Raphael waited patiently for a few moments but Clarence didn't elaborate. "Yes, and?"

"I am... a shallow being. All I live for is money. I've been thinking about that for a long time now... money seems so empty, so vacuous. I don't even know why I pursue it."

Raphael nodded very slowly as he narrowed his eyes. "I... see. You're beginning to regret spending all your time and effort getting money, then, is that it?"

"Something like that." Clarence reached up and scratched his chin as he felt unease regarding Raphael's steady gaze. "It's more that I have this platform to really make a difference in our world, and I'm not using it well. Why do the lower proletariat classes still worry about money? We have replicators now, things that can create any object desired using just a bit of fusion energy, which should be unlimited... yet we still worry about money and other such things, perhaps as signs of status. It seems so wasteful. We should move into a more utopian future, even despite the war with the demons."

Raphael cocked an eyebrow and shrugged. "Who can know? Personally, I speak for the angels when I say the war benefits us. It benefits you as well, Clarence. For your work here on Earth, you understand you will be given a prominent position among the angels when you die, correct? You will live forever among us as one who is only slightly below the gods and archangels themselves. You also have the option of using the nanobots, if you should so choose to prolong the pleasures to be found here on Earth. We truly care not what you choose to do, so long as you advance our will."

"I understand." Clarence quickly looked up at the old angel, forcing a smile. "Truly, you have blessed me. I have so many followers now who appreciate my words and wish to hear me speak... I don't know what I would do without you."

Raphael felt his own insincere smile squeeze through as the sides of his mouth curled up slightly. "It is entirely because of your own ability and nothing else. The people simply love you for what you preach. Just keep preaching it, and all will be well."

Clarence glanced down at his old fashioned watch, standing up quickly as he realized it was time again. "Alright, I'm off now. Wish me luck."

"You, of all people, have no need for such a thing as luck." Raphael's smile faded slightly as he turned and walked away from the dark skinned human.

Truly, this human would become a thorn in his side sooner rather than later.

Clarence sighed slowly, pulling himself up from the bench with great deliberation, as he walked forwards to the door that would lead him to his faithful followers.

Amy and Sarah stared excitedly up at the platform, both of them feeling quite heated thanks to the ambient temperature in the room. With two hundred thousand other people all packed into the massive stadium, in the bleachers as well as on the floor, it had to be fifteen degrees hotter than the outside world. The air conditioners in the stadium, as advanced as they were, just couldn't keep the room cool enough to mitigate the heat produced by all these walking ninety-eight degree radiators babbling at each other.

Sarah, particularly, seemed very excited by this preacher. "He's so handsome! He might be fifty, but he looks thirty! And he has all of that energy too!"

Amy agreed with her daughter about his good looks, but... it was something about his message. It just appealed to her on a primal level. "Let's not forget about what he's saying. Peace is important, Sarah. We need to make peace with the angels, and keep fighting the demons."

"Yes, I know that much!" Sarah started to say something else but paused as the crowd once again quieted down, almost by instinct. Apparently, it was time.

A few seconds passed, and finally the curtain opened up as Clarence walked onto the stage. Amy squinted, noticing he seemed to be less exuberant than usual. He wasn't smiling like he usually did, and instead seemed to be faking his happiness. "My children! I am pleased to see you all." His voice was more muted than usual, and it seemed to have a strange edge to it.

Still, the crowd roared with delight at his words. Sarah didn't seem to notice his behavior was any different from normal, but Amy felt unnerved.

"Today is an important day! This marks the twenty-fifth anniversary from when I started my journey to rebuild my life! Two and a half decades ago, I was a broken, hollow man. I owned nothing, and lived in squalor. I did drugs, and smoked, and committed many relatively minor sins, but all of that changed one day, shortly after my twenty seventh birthday. I was in a parking lot, staring at a man and his wife, as well as their two children. I was moved by how well dressed they were and by how happy they seemed. I began to pay attention to them, since they seemed to frequent the place I was living at on a regular basis to obtain various goods."

"The man's name was Samuel, and I found this out when I approached him one day and decided to finally gather up my courage and speak with him. As it turned out, he was a man of the cloth, one who still believed in the old ways of following the bible. Precious few people seemed to think as he did, and he lived in relative stability with his family, the last percent of Earth who still believed in the power of God to transform their lives into something more meaningful... something that held more value than a mere mortal existence. Samuel believed that he was here for a purpose, and that purpose was to fulfill God's will by living a clean, wholesome life."

Clarence paused for a second, his unusually soft voice cracking as some emotion seemed to overtake him for a moment. He continued after taking a breath to compose himself. "This revelation changed me. It's cliched, I know... but Samuel showed me the light, allowing me to improve my life and gain the respect of so many today."

The crowd started to cheer, but Clarence hushed them as he held his palm up. "No... no, save your praise. I have thought long and hard, and I have realized... even now, I am still a sinner. I improved my life and became a better person in many ways, it is true, but in the end, old habits die hard. I have preached for the love of money, not for the love of purity. I must admit now to my entire flock that... I am still very much a sinner. I love money, and I love women, and I love booze... and in truth, until recently, I viewed all of the people in this room as my inferiors."

The room fell completely silent as the crowd stared up at their beloved preached in stunned silence. Even Amy and Sarah failed to come up with a mental response to his words.

"I have sinned. Badly." Clarence's shoulder slumped, as he stared around the room with a muted gaze. "It is because of this sin that I must now speak up and heal those who have unwittingly suffered because of my actions. So many of you donate to the church, but you do not realize... every penny goes into my pockets. Very little is related to 'administrative costs'. We are not oppressed by the government, nor have we ever been. Everything about me is a sham. I am... a fraud."

Clarence's voice caught again as he stared out at the faces of his flock. Their expressions told the story he knew they would... disappointment. Sadness. Betrayal.

He started to speak again, but the crowd suddenly roused themselves, as a familiar presence was felt behind himself.

"Clarence. What do you think you're doing?" The archangel Raphael stood behind him, his cane nowhere in sight, as his wings were spread out in all their full glory. He must have appeared via teleportation directly to the stage. His voice was barely a whisper, only Clarence could hear what he had said.

Clarence narrowed his eyes to a slit. Was this perhaps... fear? Did the archangel fear the power this mere human held?

"Something I should have done a long time ago, Raphael. You have used me for too long. I understand now, what a danger you present to humanity. You are not our savior, but our instrument of destruction!" Clarence spoke into the mic as he swiveled around and pointed directly at Raphael.

"You are the true evil on this world! You take the energy of humanity, using us as mere cattle for your own selfish ambitions! In front of all my followers, both on the stage and broadcasting to the world before us now, I say to you, Archangel Raphael... you are the devil, not Satan!"

Clarence had hardly finished speaking when Raphael's eyes were filled with a terrible rage, something silent one might only see by gazing directly into them. "Fool. You have made a grave mistake, angering the gods." In the blink of an eye, Raphael pulled a sword out from behind himself, lunging forwards with an uncanny speed, as he impaled Clarence straight into the center of his heart.

Clarence gasped, his vision becoming unsteady, as Raphael yanked it back out with the quickest of movement, a look of loathing on his face. "A pity. You had such potential."

The preacher took a step backwards, as blood gushed from the wound. A second later, his vision faded to black, as he fell deep into an abyss far beyond his comprehension.

As he fell to the ground, the stadium was filled with fear and confusion. Amy and Sarah gawked in horror at how the man they had begun watching only a short while ago lay dead before them, his blood pooling all around his body as his heart gave its last, weak jolt.

The archangel's voice suddenly boomed out from all areas of the stadium, as he raised his hands to the sky. "Children of god, hear me now! I am the Archangel Raphael, known as the wisest of my people! This man, Father Clarence, lived a just and holy life! However, in the end, he was found to be collaborating with the demons, and sought to turn against us, pitting their powers against ours! As you must have guessed by now, I had to kill him before he could complete this plot. Even now, the demons await his signal to attack. With his final act of terrorism averted, we must move forwards, not by forgetting the goodness of his life, but by washing away his sin with this final sacrifice."

As the archangel spoke, that strange feeling entered Amy and Sarah's mind as they both nodded numbly, the two of them not quite understanding what had just transpired. Still, the angel's words did make some sense.

Amy knew that the angels absorbed the energy of humans to sustain their own lives, but Clarence had clearly fallen to the side of the demons in the end. The angels might need to be a tad unscrupulous, but the demons were clearly worse. Terrorism and violence was their forte. Yes, indeed, this was the case. Amy knew the archangel wasn't lying. Clarence was bad. He was a secret messenger of evil. He was the enemy.

Raphael continued to speak as the crowd leaned in more intently to listen to his words.

Perfect. Humans give us this fanatical energy, which we in turn use to subtly influence their minds. A perfect cycle of enrichment that will enable our kind to flourish. Zeus's ability to use magic truly knows no bounds.

He smiled, as the crowd began to nod along once more. A new preacher would be required... but perhaps this time, one who would be a little easier to control.

I walked along with my clones, gawking at the massive crater left behind by the nuclear device. Far in the distance in all directions, hallways broken and shattered could be seen, as a huge spherical section of the labyrinth several miles in diameter had been blown. It would ordinarily be quite hard to see, given there was no natural light in the labyrinth, but I had cast 'Light' some time ago and we were walking around as if it were a sunny day in this section.

Sensei and I had taken our helmets off as we walked around. The nuke we had used was a 'clean' nuke, one with little to no radiation. We were in no danger, and with all the enemies gone, it had been a depressingly easy day of crushing the leftover enemies. Despite the clean sphere left over from the nuke, hundreds of miles of hallways had debris blasted around inside their corridors, making it nearly impossible for anyone to come out and fight us.

As I had those thoughts, a skeleton charged at me. I barely blinked as his sword smashed against my Hypersuit, snapping in half. A second later, I punched backwards, shattering it in a single blow as the undead creature fell to shards behind me.

"Sensei, how powerful would you say we are compared to the demonic threat?"

He pauses as he thoughtfully taps on his lip. In the distance, I hear the sounds of a small scuffle that come to a rapid end as two of my clones kill several orcs in the span of a few seconds. "Tough to say. I don't really even know what the demons are, honestly. There seem to be actual demons, but also monsters like goblins and skeletons and whatnot. Not a single one of the monster variety has posed the slightest challenge to us, but the demons are quite a bit more powerful. I suspect they might be biding their time though, waiting before they attack us. They're still sizing us up."

I nod at his assessment. The first generation clones had fought in many battles that even I hadn't. They had faced off against demons, monsters, and Volgrim on several occasions when I was occupied with other things. He likely knows things that even I don't.

"Satan is extremely powerful, but he might be an outlier. I defeated Bael rather easily. I know that Belial is quite strong... really though, unless they're holding back, Satan seems to be the cream of the crop. I can't see any of them being a real challenge other than him."

Sensei pauses, as if to contemplate something. "It's funny you say that. Satan can't be that tough. Certainly, he's powerful, but we have the ability to bend reality. Beyond that, you have thousands of clones. Considering how he fared against your Hypersuit when you... temporarily passed on... it seems likely that several of us at once would be easily able to defeat him. This would mean..." My clone pauses as he slowly tilts his head up to stare at the distant ceiling of the labyrinth. "...The future has already been changed. We must be in a different timeline. If we were somehow already a part of our original timeline, then Satan and all of the demons would have been easily killed by us. There's simply no way at the rate we're already progressing that the demons can't be exterminated. It's just too easy."

"Let's not get cocky now." I chide him gently, but I'm having the same misgivings. He's right, after all. I keep having these doubts, but there's no question to it. The future is being altered. We're making progress. "Anything could happen."

Sensei smiles, as his eyes rove across the distance. "Funny you say that. We have a visitor. Two, actually."

I follow his gaze and feel my teeth clench involuntarily. Standing silently, staring at the two of us, are Satan and Marie.

Marie... it's been a long time. Well over a hundred years, as a matter of fact.

Considering it's over a mile away, I decide to simply teleport over to them, as does Sensei. We arrive several feet away from them, keeping our distance.

"Look who's here... the titular Hero himself." Marie smiles pleasantly at me, hiding her opinions perfectly. "Hello, Jason. I see you've really had some fun here."

"Marie." I acknowledge her presence with a single word, grinning tightly as I suppress my distrust and unease. "It's been a long time. How did you like the present I left you, the last time we met?"

Marie chuckled. "The cadaver was very clever. You had us bamboozled for years. We only began to understand what had happened after you made your appearance at the WCN. Once we realized that strange suited man was a Candidate, it became apparent it was you. A shame it took us so long, we might have been able to prevent the destruction of the Americas."

"You know damn well it was your fault all those people died. Besides, you're awfully chatty today." I glared at the beautiful redhead, who shrugged innocently.

"I'm just a poor lady who got sucked up in all of this. It's not my fault that you men are always busy swinging your codpieces around, having stupid contests with each other."

Satan grimaces. "Shut up, Marie. Your acting is starting to get on my nerves too." He rolls his eyes as he tilts his head back to look at me. "You're really pissing me off lately, whelp. Killing my demons, blowing up my labyrinth. You don't seem to think twice about killing anymore, do you?"

I shake my head slowly. "Nope. At least, not when it comes to demons and the Volgrim. I stand with humanity now. I'm going to actively oppose the future that I come from. I can't allow it to happen, no matter what."

"Isn't that cute." Satan sneers as his eyes flick around to observe the devastation all around us. "No different from what humans always do. Attack those who are 'different' from you. It used to be about their nation, then it was about their skin color, now it's those of a different species. Humans are such... vile pests."

"You and your demons killed over a thousand people at a resort hotel on Earth. Those people were innocents too, Satan. Don't preach at me from a pedestal when you're one who murders innocents." I bite my lip in frustration as I stare evenly at him. "What did you think would happen next? You can't poke a bear and expect it not to attack. You knew we would counter attack."

"I did." Satan lowers his eyes slightly. "But this was... simply..." For a moment, I almost think I can see a hint of sadness in his eyes, but he flicks them upwards defiantly, as if to spite me. "This was a slaughter. There is no glory, or honor, or sport in using such weapons. Just as when you obliterated Volgarius, you have turned to acts of mass murder."

"Glory? Honor? Coming from the one who murdered hundreds of millions of humans in the American continents..." Sensei speaks up this time, rage in his eyes. "You're a fucking hypocrite."

Marie sighs dramatically. "Now now, boys. Let's calm down a moment. Can't we all just work out our problems? Can't we just talk for a moment? Nobody remembers who started what anymore, but the costs have escalated quite dramatically. Don't we all agree peace is for the best, for all our sakes?"

Satan quickly turns his fiery glare back at her. "Easy for you to say. I have fought for thousands and thousands of years, all for the sake of revenge. Firstly against the angels, and secondly against humanity. I won't give that up so easily for a false peace."

"You sound quite stubborn, then. So long as you fight, I will too." I glare at the hotheaded demon across from me. "If millions, billions, even trillions must die, so be it. I will never allow the demons to prosper. I must eliminate your threat from the universe. You, who speaks from atop a soapbox, as if you have some divine authority to judge my kind. If you won't see the light, neither will I."

Satan chuckles. "I'm not being hypocritical. I never claimed to be the arbiter of moral authority. You, however, did. You once claimed to be a hero, one who fought for justice. Yet you show your true colors now. A godlike figure who seeks to turn all to his own will. I will oppose you, just as I did Kronos, Zeus, and all the other heroes before you."

I stare evenly at the two of them, as they stare back at Sensei and I. This is pointless. So long as he is alive, Satan will never back down. Peace is impossible. Still, though...

"Sensei, you said before that we have already changed the timeline, right?"

I speak to my clone, and he nods at me. "Yeah. That's my working theory, anyway."

"I say it's time for another alteration. This one, for sure, will change the future. It's been a long time coming, too."

Satan and Marie both eye me suspiciously. Marie is the first to respond. "Change the timeline? What are you planning? I think you'll find that we won't go down without a fight so easily."

I nod soberly as I eye the woman up and down. "You're half right. Satan won't, at the least."

She's unarmored, protected only by a short range anti-magic field. I keep my gaze on her without saying anything. From high in the sky, my telekinesis shifts a chunk of the labyrinth's ceiling loose, as it begins its rapid descent towards the target.

"You're a cunning woman, Marie. I can't use telekinesis, or any sort of simple death word on you. You must have figured out my wordsmithing long ago."

She smirks, her suspicions replaced with a false bravado. Just as she starts to speak, the half-ton chunk of ceiling hits her.

It's brutal. The instant it impacts her, her body explodes into a trillion fragments, her lithe frame crushed into oblivion. Every fabric of her existence is crushed and eliminated from this universe in the blink of an eye. Satan takes a second to even notice it, suddenly jerking his head to the side as he gawks.

"Y-you... killed her? A defenseless... woman?"

"I did."

I stare at him coldly as he turns to look back at me in shock. He doesn't seem horrified by her death, or disgusted that I would do such a thing, but rather...

Awe and fear are apparent in his eyes instead. "You're... different. You're not the same as when we last fought."

"I'm not."

He merely nods at my words. "If we fight here, it will be a long protracted battle, but I will surely lose. This round goes to you, Jason Hiro. I commend you for acting so decisively though." He again glances down at the impact crater the debris left behind, blood from Marie's crushed corpse splattered all over the two of us. "She was a pest. Useful, but a pest nonetheless. With her gone, I will begin fighting you in earnest."

I want to tell him that he wasn't allowed to leave and that we were going to end this here, but something told me not to bother. He was a threat, but only a minor one now. We would have another chance soon.

"Take care of yourself, Satan. Don't disappoint me. From one genocidal maniac to another, may the best ruler win."

"Indeed, I will." Satan smiles, as he vanishes an instant later.

I glance down at the bloody mess across from me. With Marie gone, the future will change. How it will change, I do not know, but change it will.

"Sometimes, I wonder about you." Sensei speaks softly, as he averts his gaze from me.

He doesn't understand. Nobody does.

Part 336a:

Satan paused as he stood before the door that led back to the intelligence room. He contemplated the acts of Jason Hiro silently in his mind, replaying the scene over and over again. That strange confidence he had, the flippant disregard for life. When did such things become part of the Heroic Code?

Still though, his powers were incredible. If they hadn't been interrupted all those years ago, Satan would have absorbed the powers of Wordsmithing for sure. If he had done that, then... Jason would no longer be a threat. Hell, when he thought about it, Satan had to stifle a mighty laugh from the pit of his belly. Jason would only have his Wordsmithing, while Satan would have all the abilities of foes he had devoured over the millennia, plus the powers of Wordsmithing. It wouldn't even be a battle anymore. All the cosmic powers of the universe would be laid bare for him to control.

Satan smirked to himself as he opened the door to the surveillance room.

The door swung open and Satan froze in place, confusion blasting from every pore on his body.

Marie Becker walked around, tapping on her datapad as she normally would do, and was chatting with a demon casually.

"M-... Marie?" Satan's jaw slackened slightly as he stared in disbelief at the woman walking around. It was as if he were looking at a ghost.

She paused and glanced up, poking her glasses back on her nose. "Mmm. You're back. Took you long enough. Did you casually stroll the three hundred or so miles, or did you run? Either way, you sure as hell didn't make use of those useful teleportation abilities."

"You're... alive? How?" Satan ignored her snide comments for once, completely bamboozled by her appearance, standing there in the flesh.

"What are you saying? I'm dead, imbecile. All thanks to you. I already knew not to trust you very much, but then you just let the bastard kill me. It's hard to even call you a tentative ally at this point. The others are stretched thin as it is, but you had to make things worse."

Satan nodded slowly as he walked forwards, eyeing her up and down. "Others? I don't follow. It's rare for me to be surprised by anything, let alone at the magnitude that I am now. Are you some sort of clone? I knew you were a shrewd woman, but to have a backup body..." Satan paused, as a sudden realization appeared in his eye. "Ah, I understand now. You're a hero after all, aren't you? This must be your heroic ability."

Marie immediately rolled her eyes and sighed dramatically. "Gods, you're thick sometimes. I'm neither a hero, nor a clone, nor the original. That's three strikes. If you were any dumber, I'd be totally depressed. Let's just say that I am everywhere, and nowhere at once, shall we?"

Satan narrowed his eyes as he glared at her intently. "None of those? What the hell could it be, then? Are you even a human? Perhaps some sort of humanoid robot? I can't wrap my mind around-"

Marie held up her palm and aimed it at his face. "You're giving me a headache. I'll explain if you just stop blabbering, all right? It's simple. I'm from another universe."

Satan blinked as he waited for elaboration, but she didn't continue. "Is that it?"

"Huh? What more do you want from me? Christ." Marie stormed over to a chair and plopped down in it, staring at him with a deeply annoyed expression spread across her face. "All right, listen carefully because I'm only going to say it once."

She continued. "There are an infinite number of universes, or so the theory goes. Each universe is split off from ours by the choices we make. In actuality, there are a finite number of universes, each branching off from a 'main' universe. This universe has several thousand other ones that branch off from it, and I exist in many of them. As time goes on, universes that diverge too greatly from ours become inaccessible, meaning they are impossible to reach. I alone, with my incredible genius, merely figured out how to travel between them."

She smiled smugly, content with her explanation, as Satan was left grasping for further clues. "Doesn't that make you immortal, then, if you can just replace yourself when you die?"

"Of course not. Because my copy died in this universe, several thousand of the other ones also died in similar brutal events. I come from a universe that is almost exactly identical to this one, except in that one, you didn't let me die. You're more of a gentleman there, but just as stupid as you are here."

Satan groaned at her constant barrage of insults, but then merely rapped on his chin as he thought about what she said. "That is certainly a handy method of preserving your life. I will give you immortality in this universe if you tell me how I might use it to preserve my own life, should the worst happen."

Marie stared at him quietly for a few moments before suddenly jumping up from her chair and bursting into laughter. "Hahaha!! You believed me?! What a moron! I knew you were stupid but this is beyond anything I ever imagined!"

Satan glowered at her as he fought down a snarl. "You're... mocking me again? If you aren't a traveler from another universe, then what the hell are you?! Out with it!"

Marie immediately stopped laughing and stared at him with a blank expression. "I'm a clone."

"Ah." Satan felt taken aback by her sudden mood shift. "I cannot tell if you are toying with me again or not."

"Maybe. I might have just instantly replaced my body with a fake and teleported away, too. Hard to say."

"Are you being serious?"

"That is a tough question to answer."

Marie stared at him with a completely blank expression as Satan stared back. "Whatever. I don't care. You're back, you're annoying again, you're still the same pest as you ever were."

"I could say the same thing. At least I got a laugh out of this. I love playing around with the minds of inferior beings, even if that does include all who've ever lived." Marie's smile returned, as her mouth turned up at the corners ever so slightly.

"Does that include those who could kill you with the barest effort if they so desired?"

"Yes, and they above all others provide me with the thrill I seek to keep on living life to the fullest!" Marie paused as a coquettish look passed over her eyes. "Besides, Satan dearest, you are not one of those beings. Never forget that."

"We shall see." Satan turned his back on her as he took a deep breath and released the rage he had been feeling in a single smooth motion. "I'll be back. I'm going to speak with Belial about... things. Keep me updated on any new developments."

"We shall see." Marie echoed his comment back at him as the door slammed shut.

A few moments passed, as Marie turned to the datapad in her hand, one of the Others appearing onscreen. "Is he gone?"

"Yes. A rude interrupter, as always." Marie admired the beautiful face of the familiar looking redhead who stared back at her. Damn, I'm sexy. "Our stability, what is it sitting at?"

"We can't suffer even a single loss anymore. Marie 12b was a key figure in holding this stream together. We're on our last life."

Marie grimaced as she looked away from the pad. "Cat's out of the bag, and she wasted eight of her lives. I can't believe 12b didn't see such an obvious attack coming. The Jasons from this stream are much more aggressive than the ones from the outliers. I guess what they say about hindsight is true."

"We'll just have to be even more careful from now on."

"Agreed."

I stroll into the London HQ, arriving to the sight of several people turning and saluting, their eyes staring expectantly at me. I say nothing for a few moments, trying hard to force a sad expression across my face, but finally I relent and a huge smile spreads across my face almost involuntarily. "It was a huge success!"

The room erupts in cheers and whooping laughter as people crowd around in front of me.

"Supreme Commander, did you manage to kill the leader as well?!"

"Commander, how did you find out about the hostages?!"

"Commander Jason! We're so glad to have you back!"

Questions and compliments fly at me from all directions, but I quickly wave them off. "It was no problem, thanks to my clones and the Hypersuits. Success was assured from the very start. Their leader still lives, but we've dealt the first of many blows that will prove to be fatal to the demons!"

The people in the room clap enthusiastically as they start murmuring and chattering to each other about my escapades, and I felt a calm feeling wash over me... the knowledge of a job well done. Marie is dead, millions of demons were eradicated, Satan had finally learned that I meant business... and I am now content in the knowledge that aside from Satan, no demon is a match for me, let alone my army of clones.

Life seems pretty good right about now.

A woman pushes through the throng of onlookers, tilting her head way back to look up at me. She's quite the shorty. "You have a couple visitors in the office, Commander Hiro. Non-urgent, but they have been waiting for about an hour."

"Oh, thanks, Rebecca." She's one of the assistants who was assigned to me. She hands me my security clearance card, something I always leave behind at the office, just in case. I can teleport anywhere in the building anyway, so it's just a formality.

Pushing past the crowd of excited onlookers, I make my way into the office and am greeted by the sight of two familiar people.

"Mr. and Mrs. Gutierrez. A pleasure to see the both of you again." I walk forwards and shake their hands after they both jump up to greet me. "Sorry to keep the both of you waiting."

Amy's face reddens and she looks away from me, but Jorge keeps his cool. His wife is probably just unsure of how to act in front of a Supreme Commander. Having a big fancy title is such a pain sometimes...

"Commander Jason, we've been thinking about your offer and we'd love to talk with you about it." Jorge nods as a big grin fills his face.

"Glad to hear it. Let's all have a seat and discuss it over coffee." I send a telepathic message to Rebecca, who quickly gets up from her seat out in the secretary wing and runs to get us coffee. Unlike others I've spoken to, she doesn't seem particularly disquieted by my use of telepathy. It's a nice change of pace, for once.

I sit down across the desk, marveling at its craftsmanship yet again. This is the same exact desk that I once sat at, directly across from Stonewall, as he told me to piss off and stop helping Earth. Seems that didn't work out so well for him.

"Alright, so what's all this about?" I smile with what I hope is a pleasant expression, as I kick back in my chair and sigh heavily.

Amy speaks up this time. "It's about the trip back to planet Revival. We talked it over a lot recently, and given some... recent events, we've come to make a decision regarding the trip."

"I will go to Revival." Jorge speaks up, but his bravado vanishes in an instant as hesitation takes its place.

"Oh? Just you? I assumed either the both of you would go, or neither. Why you, specifically?" I lean forwards and stare at him, noticing he seems rather disconcerted.

"Well, the logic was that Amy had already seen the planet, while I had not. It's a 7 year trip there, but once the portal is established, the return trip is instant. I didn't want to pull our daughter out of school, and neither did Amy, so..."

I cock an eyebrow. "Neither of you has to go, you know. It wasn't an order. Hell, if you want, you can both stay behind and just wait for the crew to arrive, then we open up the portal and you travel there. It's the same situation, except this way you can stay with your daughter."

Amy shoots a glance at Jorge, and he returns the look before turning back to me. "That wouldn't be fair to the men and women who have to suffer through a seven year trip. We shouldn't get the privilege of being a part of history while not having to make any sacrifices. Besides, I hear your clones will be able to allow the crew to communicate with the home teams instantly? I'm not going to miss a moment of my daughter growing up."

I grin at him. "Right you are! And if you ever need to return home, or any of the crew does, that can be arranged without even slowing down the trip."

His body finally loosened up a bit as some of the tension he had apparently been feeling evaporated.

Sensing a short break in the conversation, Amy spoke up. "Say, Commander Hiro, I know you were gone for over two days... so you probably didn't hear. Father Clarence, the man who preaches for the Church of Retribution... he was murdered today. On the stage while preaching, actually." Her expression hardened slightly as a look of disgust flooded her face. "I... I witnessed it, live."

I nodded slowly, as I stared at her. "I'm sorry you had to see that. It sounds terrible. I'm also sorry for not being emotional or anything, but I don't know anything about the man. I'm not really into the whole 'church' thing."

Amy swallowed carefully. "Right. It's, ah, not really about him so much... it's the person who killed him. The Archangel Raphael... impaled him with a sword. I thought you might want to know, since you seem to be on friendly terms with them."

I jerked my body back into an upright position, my pleasant expression vanishing in an instant. "Say what? Raphael?! Impossible. He's simply not the type to do that."

"I saw it with my own two eyes. It was quite brutal. To be fair, Clarence was preaching heresy like a madman but... I thought the archangel might have gone too far."

"Cheh. No kidding." I felt my gaze drift away as I thought of what crazy scenario would lead to him doing such a thing. He's... not the type... is he? Sheesh, I've spoken with the angels for decades, an entire century if not longer. For him to act that brash... what the hell sort of reason might he have?

"I'll speak with him. Thank you for telling me." I nod at her as I force a smile. She doesn't return the look, as her face is clouded with numbness. I barely tap into her mind and get a vivid picture of the execution as it happened. I could dig deeper with my telepathy if I so chose, but I decide not to.

The three of us sit in silence for a few moments, before Jorge finally coughs awkwardly and stands up, tapping his wife's shoulder as she rises too. "Well, we will be heading out then. Thank you for having us, Supreme Commander."

As he reaches across the desk, I lean forwards at the same time and shake his hand firmly. "Call me Jason. I hate that formal crap, honestly."

Jorge chuckled. "Don't we all? But protocol is important. Let order slip, and you'll have mutiny within a few months! Have a pleasant day, Commander."

Amy blushes again as that same sweet smile appears. "Yes, have a pleasant day... Jason." As she and her husband turn to walk away, I stare at her long flowing blonde hair. From the rear, she almost seems familiar.

It's probably nothing. I glance upwards vacantly at the ceiling, trying to see past it up to the heavens themselves.

Those fucking gods and archangels. What is the meaning of this? Why now?

" Teleport. "

Part 337a: Moles

"Uhhhh.... hahhhh... what?" Clarence drearily blinked his eyes open, as he looked around at the absolute pitch blackness surrounding him. No, wait, that wasn't correct. In fact, it wasn't pitch blackness, but a blinding whiteness, surrounding him from all directions, like the brightness of ten thousand spotlights all at once. It made his brain scream in agony.

He closed his eyes for a few moments and rubbed them, suddenly realizing he was somehow standing up. Standing? That didn't make any sense. Hadn't he just been stabbed a few moments before? Or was that an eternity ago? Where was the pain?

Questions began to arise as he opened his eyes again, squinting carefully to try and get his bearings.

Grass. There was a strange grass all around him, a sort of blueish hue that didn't quite look like the kind he had seen on Earth. He smiled involuntarily. Bluegrass. Heh.

The smile passed a moment later, as he realized there was movement. From every direction, his mind began to discern the impression of sound. It was as if he had exited a vacuum and all of his senses were turning on slowly, one by one, similar to a computer turning on its components piece by piece.

He sniffed the air, but no fragrance was noticeable. Familiar looking, yet alien figures moved and milled about. Hundreds of them. Thousands. No... millions. As far as he could see, in tightly packed clusters here and there, they chattered at one another, their voices forming an unbearable cacophony of distracting noise. Clarence covered his ears, wincing as the noise was barely muted.

After a minute or so, the noise became less unbearable as he seemed to adjust to it. He had begun to realize what was going on... and what had happened to him. There could be no doubt, these were angels moving about. The wings made that part especially obvious. If there were millions of angels all around him, then that could only mean...

"This is Heaven?" He stared around, dumbfounded, as the question left his lips almost involuntarily.

"Duh." A woman sat nearby, her dark red hair spilling down her white robes and all around her back and chest. She seemed unthinkably bored. "You're a real master of the obvious."

Clarence tilted his head over to look at her, catching a glimpse of his own wings as he jerked his head back in awe to stare at them. He quickly regained his composure as he fully turned to face the woman sitting on the grass. "You're sitting down on the ground? Even with all these, err, angels around? Aren't you worried you'll get trampled?"

The woman chuckled. "That's cute. You're a funny guy. At this point, I don't think it would hurt... being stepped on, I mean." Her face crinkled into an odd expression as she slowly gazed away. "What a pity I had to end up here. You, however, seem totally dumbfounded."

Clarence shrugged nonchalantly as he looked back and forth. "Truth be told, I had always hoped I'd end up in heaven, at least for the last few years... I mean, considering I dedicated my life to the service of God, it seemed obvious. It's just... the manner in which I died was..."

She flippantly waved her hand at him. "Oh please. You don't know the half of it. To be honest, I always assumed I would go to heaven if I died, I was just trying to avoid that. This place is like a fucking prison." She waved her hand around dramatically at all the angels milling about as they stared ahead vacantly. "Look at all these soulless lemmings. They have no hope of escape."

"Escape?" Clarence cocked an eyebrow at her as he eased down and sat a few feet away from her. The strangely colored grass was remarkably soft, not like the grass on Earth. It was like sitting on a bed of feathers. No wonder she was sitting. "Why would we want to escape?"

"Christ. You really are brand new. There's not a goddamn thing to do here. No technology, no cars, no viewscreens, no holographic projectors, not even a chessboard. All you can do is talk to others who are stuck here just like you. That's it. And better yet, if you try and make a ruckus, the Guardians will come and break it up in an instant."

Clarence felt his heart quiver slightly. "So we're always being watched, then? You're right, this place really is like a prison."

The woman detected his fear immediately. She was quite perceptive. "I don't know what got you killed, but even if the person who killed you ends up here, don't worry about it. The morons who run this place are so inefficient that they don't bother with a registry. There's something like a hundred million souls wandering about, and the archangels have no idea who any of them are. They probably don't care, either."

Clarence nodded slowly. "So... even if, say, my mother and father are up here... they're going to be tough to find?"

"To say the least. Imagine living in a place thirty times bigger than New York City, and the way you decide to find your long-lost lover is by going around knocking on doors. You'll never find them." She sighed dramatically again, suddenly standing up in a motion so fast Clarence could barely follow the movement with his eyes. "Enough chit-chat. Let's take a walk."

Clarence blinked in surprise before clumsily climbing back up to his feet, feeling miffed that he had just sat down and was already getting back up again. Strangely though, he didn't feel tired by the movement. His body felt more youthful than it ever had... even in his youth! He felt like an Atlantean of myth, or something similar. He was tempted to hunt for a steel pipe to see if he could bend it with his bare hands.

As he marveled, he quickly realized the red-haired beauty was already striking off on her own, striding out into the throng with purpose. He quickly ran to catch up, feeling ecstatic and how fast he could move without losing his breath. Truly, the body of an angel was far superior to that of a human.

"Where are we going?" Clarence's excitement died down as he walked beside her. She seemed to be heading in a straight line towards an unknown destination.

"This place is in a different dimension from Earth. Because of that, it's impossible to get out of here unless you're capable of creating a rift in one way or another. I might be a genius, but without tools, it's impossible for me."

Clarence nodded along as they walked. "I see. So if it's impossible, then...?"

"Obviously the archangels and gods have a way of getting to Earth. I'll show you what that method is."

Clarence swallowed carefully. "You're not going to make me into your apostle or something, are you? I mean, I'm not exactly fond of the gods and angels, but I only just got here. I need to get my bearings before I do anything... serious."

"Calm your pants, fly-boy. We're just going to go take a look. There's not a chance of escaping this place until I've formulated a plan first. I'll need a lot more than a few hours for that."

Clarence blinked quickly. "You've only been here a few hours? But... you know so much about this place already. How is that possible?"

She smirked. "I make it my business to know all the secrets of the universe. If anything, my dying will probably work out to my advantage, since now I can do some damage from the inside."

She paused suddenly, turning to face Clarence. He came to a halt and stumbled slightly, unnerved by how quickly she could shift moods. "Let me make this clear, black man. I don't need a sidekick, or help from anyone. I've simply perceived that you have something of a grudge towards the angels. If you wish to help me, feel free. Otherwise, staying out of my way would be advisable."

Clarence grimaced at her flippant reference to his skin color. "I have a name, just so you know. It's Clarence. But you're right, I do have a... grudge against them. You're good at reading people, I'll give you that."

She smirked again, an expression she was fond of making. She seemed to feel little emotion other than contempt beneath her exterior. "Right, Clarence. I'm Marie. If you're no friend of the angels, then we can treat each other as allies. But let's keep it professional, understand?"

"Professional. Right. I can do that." Clarence nodded dumbly as he stared into her fiery reddish eyes, the eyes of a woman that burned for a passion far beyond anything mortal pleasure could bring.

Before he could say anything else, she had already turned and started walking again, towards some unknown goal far off over the horizon.

Several hours passed, and soon Clarence was beginning to see a building in the distance. Even with his superhuman vision that he had acquired as part of his transformation, it was still rather hazy. Strangely, he seemed to be imagining that it rather resembled a modern courthouse building.

Marie finally slowed down the pace as both of them paused just barely on the border of visibility. Neither one was having difficulty breathing, given both of their bodies apparently needed neither rest nor sustenance anymore. The feeling was foreign, yet familiar.

"There it is. The Temple of the Gods. Version two, I guess." Marie chortled to herself at some joke that Clarence didn't understand, before regaining her composure a few seconds later. "This is where the holier-than-thous live. You and I, of course, are false angels. The real angels, the royal kind, live there. Only a few thousand or so remain, and they all live lazy opulent lives of haphazard decadence. Several hundred gods and a few thousand pure angels is all that remains of what was once the glorious Army of Heaven."

She paused as she glanced over at his chest for an instant before looking away. "If what you say is correct, then the Archangel Raphael would be one who lives here. If you weren't lying and he really did kill you, then he'll be here."

"You're certain he isn't looking for me?" Clarence bit his lip as he flicked his eyes around uneasily. There were still ridiculous numbers of angels moving all around them. In fact, this place seemed even more densely packed than the place he had arrived at.

"Calm down. The resurrection system is essentially automated at this point. The angels have little to nothing to do with it. They simply sit back, let the humans give them the energy they need to live, and send out pseudo-angels to fight battles if needed. They don't care in the slightest about who arrives here, so long as they can be forced to fight for the glory of 'God'."

Marie snickered evilly to herself. "That's the beauty of it. The portal that leads out of here is heavily guarded, but they never realized that a non-believer could arrive in heaven by simply giving energy every night half-heartedly to the gods. I was smart to do that for all those years. Naturally." Marie grinned as she heaped lavish praise upon herself.

Clarence prevented himself from releasing an upturned lip. Disgusting. As a faker when it came to praising God, even he thought she could take things a little too far now and then. "I bet you feel pretty satisfied with how things turned out."

"Indeed." Her smile evaporated once again as her mood shifted in an instant. "That's not important, though. Tell me, Clarence. You said you were a famous preacher, on Earth. How famous, exactly?"

Clarence blushed slightly. "Well, I successfully converted five million people to the path of God. in one way or another. Honestly, after a while I began to feel as if I had some kind of divine gift. People would believe anything I told them, no matter how crazy."

He paused as a stray strand of hair fell over his eye. "Honestly, it made me feel uncomfortable. I simply had too much power. All that, and I was leading a degenerate lifestyle."

"Hmm." Marie hemmed and hawed to herself for a moment. "It wasn't you. Don't be too hard on yourself. I suspect the gods were meddling somehow, probably giving you some ability to influence the minds of those who heard your words. It's just like standard persuasion techniques, but enhanced to be a bit stronger. The amount of energy it takes is quite considerable though, which leads me to wonder..." Marie hesitated for a moment as she reached up and tapped her lip. How did the gods get that kind of energy?

Clarence slumped to the ground and sat as he stared ahead numbly. "They used me. Damn! I was such a fool."

"Damn straight. But hey, you will have your revenge, I believe." Marie's lips twitched as she held in a laugh. Oh how precious. She had somehow stumbled upon the absolutely perfect person to further a plan she had never believed possible. The end of the angels.

Based on everything he had told her during the walk, he wasn't even a real preacher, at least not one who believed the word of God wholeheartedly. He was simply a con artist who had used religion to make a quick buck. He was unscrupulous, to say the least, but he also seemed to have been developing that pesky thing called a conscience in the last few years.

But hey, I can drive that out of him with some good old divide-and-conquer tactics. Just tell him he was used, build up some anger, and then that conscience goes right out the window. After that, he's mine to use. Men are so predictable.

Marie grinned to herself as she shot a glance to the pouting man-child sitting on the ground a few feet away.

"How... how do we get revenge? What can the two of us possibly do against an army of angels? And why are you so intent on causing them harm, anyway?" Clarence glanced up at her suspiciously with the last sentence. She swallowed another laugh.

"You were stabbed and killed by an archangel. Similarly, the angels killed my mother and father. I've hated them ever since, especially when I came to find out how they were using humanity for their own selfish gain." Marie slid the lies out so easily that her heart rate didn't waver in the slightest. Parents? They died when she was an infant. She couldn't care less about them. "As for what the two of us can do, let's save that for once we've managed to escape this place. We-..." She halted as a loud commotion could be heard far in the distance. Pseudo-angels had begun swarming forwards, as if to greet some new visitor.

"Well, look at that. This might even be our chance." Marie grinned wickedly as she quickly took off in the direction of the commotion. "Come along now, Clarence! Let's see what's going on!"

Clarence quickly stood up and chased after her. "Wait for me!"

Part 338a:

I teleported into Heaven in the blink of an eye. Really, teleportation is just about the most convenient form of transport imaginable. Thanks to several beacons I've placed, I can teleport to a variety of locations with minimal energy cost, not that it really matters. My energy reserves haven't come close to running out for years now, with the closest incident being when my clones and I created the massive asteroid that wiped out Volgarius.

In fact, my energy seems on-par these days with how much I possessed when I absorbed the God-King's energy from the angelic rings in the future. Of course, this comes with the benefit of my skin not colored black like onyx and pulsing with glowing white tattoos, so it's an upgrade even if I don't have quite the same amount of energy. If I wanted to, I might even be able to travel from Earth to Mars without a beacon; provided I had some sort of visual on it and was wearing a Hypersuit. I wouldn't want to teleport inside of the planet's crust or its mantle and die instantly. Better to miss it slightly and arrive above the upper atmosphere before teleporting to the surface.

I quickly look around from atop the Temple of the Gods, which is a safe spot I determined angels generally wouldn't be at if I needed to teleport here. Teleporting onto the ground could result in said grisly death if I arrived partially or fully inside of something or someone else. Yeesh.

The place is bustling and busy as usual. There's always this odd booming noise, likely caused by all of the angels continuously chattering at each other, yet the place always feels so melancholy as well. It's almost like a strange depression covers the inhabitants. They always seem so... bored.

I hop down from the roof easily, not even bothering with a Hypersuit. It's a four story drop, but the soft grass that covers the world protects my body easily enough, not to mention I'm far more durable than the average human. I land with a soft thud, finding myself standing before a group of those pseudo-angels that fill up the place. There's a ridiculous number of them around here, if I'm being honest. Several of the angels nearby notice a man standing amongst them without wings and they began moving towards me intently to see who I am.

"Ah, you must be Jason." A female angel standing over by the entrance to the Temple walks over to me quickly and smiles pleasantly, apparently attracted by all the commotion. "We were not expecting you. What brings you to visit us today?"

I stare at her for a second before the lightbulb goes off in my head as I recognize her. "Uzziel, a pleasure to see you again. I'm here to speak with all of the Archangels, but specifically Raphael if he's here."

Uzziel's smile dissolves after a few moments. "If it's Raphael specifically, then you must have heard."

"I have." I stare at her for a moment and she stares back. "Do you know why he did it?"

She nods slowly as a look of pain crosses over her face. "I do, but it's not my place to say. The decision though... it has wounded him greatly. He took no pleasure in killing a human."

"I'm sure he didn't, but I still need to speak with him." I try to keep my smile pleasant, but I can tell she's bothered by something. I haven't seen what happened yet with my own eyes, but I'm sure it was bad based just on her initial reaction.

Another moment passes before she beckons for me to enter the temple. As she turns to walk indoors, I fall into stride beside her.

She seems somewhat uncomfortable, but yet still tries to make small talk. "It's been many years since we last spoke. How are you doing?"

"I can't really complain, in all honesty. I'm running the show now, and hopefully my campaign to exterminate the demons will ramp up soon. Earth has many social problems, but we're working them out." I fire off a few generic responses and she nods as we arrive in the main antechamber of the temple.

The building itself is super-massive, several stories tall and very wide, it's at least the size of a giant shopping center on Earth, from back in the days when those existed. All the angels and gods have their own personal rooms of varying sizes, which of course are dictated by their ranking. Nobody has beds here given the total lack of need for sleep, but most rooms have a chair and a table at the least, plus some personal effects. Most of the angels and gods lost their personal belongings when the original Heaven was destroyed, so the amount of items up here leaves much to be desired.

"Mistress Uzziel, I see you've brought a visitor." A droll looking male angel sits behind a desk inside the antechamber with a scroll in his hands, several more visible on shelves behind him, as he stares at us with a total lack of interest. "Who might you be looking for on this day?"

"Err, I'm just showing Jason Hiro to the meeting room for my fellow archangels. He wants to speak with Raphael as soon as possible."

"Hmm, yes. Raphael. Indeed." He purses his lips for a moment as he appears to be pondering something. "I do believe he is in his personal quarters. He has retired to perform some meditation, given the recent actions he's taken." The angel behind the front desk eyeballs me closely. "Don't judge him too harshly, Jason. He's done a lot not just for the angels, but also humans."

I squint at the angel, wondering who he is. "Do I know you?"

"Doubtful. Nobody pays attention to the man at the front desk. I'm a pure blood, as it stands, but not of particularly high rank. Be on your way now, if you please." He glances away from me and back to the scroll he's holding, his attention towards me already gone.

Wordlessly, Uzziel and I continue walking past him into the main chamber through a huge set of wooden double doors. I smile wryly as we enter the room with several massive spiral staircases that lead to higher floors. "That guy seemed... pleasant."

"He's lost many friends, Jason. We all have. Most angels have become quite reclusive in recent decades... few even bother leaving the temple anymore, content to simply sit in their rooms and think back to days long past." Uzziel's words, while informative, hold an edge of sadness to them, something I pretend not to notice.

"Is it really that bad, now?"

"Yes. Most angels don't live the same lives or have the same interests as the pseudo-angels. Our population has been essentially replaced by them. While the humans continue to die and add to their numbers, ours are static and unchanging, even dwindling each time we commit to a battle. We are unable to add to our numbers, as only the Creator himself could create more angels." Despite the information she's giving me, she seems less sad now than she was a few moments ago. It's almost as if she's resigned herself to the fate she shares with her brethren.

I nod silently and we continue to walk towards the spiral staircases, making our way up several stories towards the top floor. If I remember correctly, there are at least ten floors in this building, or perhaps there are exactly ten? One of my clones built this place so I'm not quite sure...

Once we arrive, Uzziel immediately walks me down a long hall to the left, zigzagging left and right as we move with purpose towards what my mental map indicates is the topmost corner of the building.

"Archangel Raphael is a notorious recluse, especially when he gets in one of those... moods. As such, he lives as far away from everyone else as he possibly can, though his room is one of the largest here." Uzziel explains this fact to me helpfully, though I had already figured as much from context clues.

A few minutes later... we arrive. A normal looking wooden door with an engraving of a seraphim holding a mighty sword stands before us, the sword not looking too different from Excalibur. Uzziel hesitates for a moment before knocking three times softly.

Moments pass, and while she's feeling slightly antsy, I detect his presence with my telepathy as he gets up and opens the door.

"Jason. Good to see you." He pulls the door open wide and beckons inside. "I've been waiting for your arrival."

"You have? How did you know I would be coming?" I walk inside and Uzziel smiles politely at me as she turns and leaves. Raphael closes the door behind us without a second thought.

"Come now, they call me the wisest archangel for a reason! Even if that may not necessarily be true, and perhaps might be slightly... overblown." A slight smile on his face melts away as a more serious look takes its place. Leaning heavily on his gnarled wooden cane, he hobbles forwards, keeping his wings tucked in as he heads down the main hallway towards his dining room, though as with all angels, he stocks no food in there.

We both arrive and take a seat as I force a smile. "Well, err, you know why I'm here, I would guess."

"Naturally. I'm sure you've heard about the killing of the human."

"Yes. I didn't get many details, however." I bite my lip as I note a strange expression of contentment pass across his face for a split seconds, almost as if he's happy I didn't learn much about the incident.

"Yes, well, honestly I almost would prefer you perceive it as an internal matter, but I can't blame you for wanting to know more. I was forced to slay a man named Clarence, someone who was actually quite influential among humans for preaching the word of God. He ran the Church of Retribution, actually."

I blink in surprise. "Really? I've heard of the church, but didn't pay much attention to it. I did know it was gaining serious influence, but I never paid attention to who was running it."

Raphael nods seriously as he turns his head slightly to look out the window to our side, where all the false angels can be seen walking around. It's not much of a view, if I say so myself. "The church has allowed us to survive, Jason. Its existence is imperative to our continuing way of life. If something threatens it, it might as well be a direct attack on us."

"So you're saying... this preacher threatened the church?"

"Yes." Raphael swallows quietly for a moment before blinking heavily. "Clarence began to ally with the demons, I believe. He started preaching that the gods were evil and that angels did not care about humanity in the slightest."

I smirked at the old bat. "Is that incorrect? You leech off of humanity's energy to sustain your own. Isn't that something like a parasitical relationship?"

Raphael quickly turns to look at me, a gaze of sadness evident in his eyes. "Come now, Jason. A shepherd shaves the fleece from his sheep, and their existence allows him to make money so he can survive. In return, he protects them from predators and gives them sustenance to survive as well. Is that so different from what we do? Any existential threat that humanity might face is one we also will, so we protect them the best that we can."

"That sounds well and good, but humanity is not a herd of sheep. Sheep have no way to defend themselves, while it would seem that lately humans are defeating demons with ease and might even be able to destroy the angels. The comparison doesn't hold up under scrutiny." I decide to turn the discussion back on him. "It sounds to me like you're just trying to come up with justifications for why you murdered the man."

"Perhaps. We're not the guardians of humanity anymore, it would seem, but long ago we were. Humanity would not exist as they do now without our aid. The demons would have slaughtered you without resistance. To talk about angels as if we are parasites now... it is like thanking a war veteran who sacrificed for his country by casting him out into the cold. Even if we are not useful anymore, weren't we once before? Don't we deserve to live, Jason?" Raphael quietly retorts to me, his voice soft as I detect more emotion in his tone.

"Yeah, okay, I get it. Still... I hope you didn't make the poor man suffer." I wave my hand at him flippantly and sigh as I lean back in my chair and cross my arms.

"It was a quick, merciful death. Honestly, he preached for well over a decade, possibly two, and never showed such signs of hatred for our kind. I had begun to visit him on occasion, giving him wisdom and answering his questions. Perhaps his familiarity with me caused him to lose faith... perhaps the same will happen to you."

Raphael shoots a glance of questioning at me, but I just roll my eyes. "Come on, old man. You know damn well I don't believe in any of that spiritual garbage. From where I'm sitting, the angels, demons, and humans are all the same, simply full of flaws. My only real bone to pick lies with the demons, since they've killed so many I considered friends. I only ally with humans because we look the same and come from the same background. Honestly, the three races are all just so... so... flawed."

I pause for a moment as I feel a sense of guilt creep into my mind. "Besides, I shouldn't chastise you for murdering someone. I killed a human yesterday too. We're both murderers now, though the word seems relatively weak when I consider that both of us have killed millions, or in my case trillions. Something about a one-on-one killing though... it's just different."

"Yes. Killing an individual is different from a group, and killing someone in combat is different from doing so against those who are helpless. After a certain point, the number of beings killed is merely a statistic. It stops feeling personal." Raphael smiles finally, the mood from earlier having been broken. I almost feel like we understand each other just a bit better now.

I smile back at him and we both share a chuckle, for no particular reason. "Speaking of which, you should know what happened yesterday. I detonated an atomic bomb inside the labyrinth. I don't know how many demons were killed, but it was a five megaton bomb. The damage was colossal in scope. Easily a few million, maybe even tens of millions of demons were wiped out."

Raphael blinks in surprise. "That sounds quite extensive. With that kind of firepower, it's shocking humans were ever losing against the demons."

"They didn't know about the labyrinth, or how to access it, and even once they did, they had no way to deploy a warhead deep inside of it. Now, however, we do." I scratched my chin slowly as I spoke. "Actually, since this attack was so successful, I'm planning to work with my clones to deploy several at once even deeper inside the labyrinth."

Raphael's grin fades away. "You're serious about eliminating the demons, it would seem. What about altering the future? Aren't you worried you'll change it to the point where you're erased?"

"I was, but then I realized that I've changed the future so much already... I should have been erased long before now. Therefore, either the future can change and time paradoxes don't exist, I haven't really changed the future, or we live in a multiverse. It's tough to say."

"Mmm." Raphael nods again as he strokes his long white beard thoughtfully. "I hope you know what you're doing, then. I know little of how time travel works, so my wisdom will be of little help to you."

"Heh, it seems even a wise sage like you doesn't know everything." I wink at him as I stand up from the table. He stands up at the same time as I do.

"Truth be told, I'm not that wise. I certainly don't know everything. But then, you already knew that, didn't you?" He winks back at me and we both chuckle as we head back to his front door.

"Sorry to bother you like this, Raphael. I'm glad we could talk."

As I step out into the hallway, he smiles at me. "It was my pleasure, Jason Hiro. Feel free to listen to my counsel any time you wish."

As I walk away and hear the door close behind me, a feeling of worry appears in my mind. That conversation went too well. I hope I didn't miss anything.

Still, it's probably nothing. I can be such a worrywart sometimes.

" Return. "

Part 339a:

The crowd of angels moved with purpose, for once. Shifting forwards, they all appeared to be moving towards a specific location, and the murmurs were floating back to where Marie and Clarence could hear.

Marie listened intently but she wasn't quite sure what was going on. She quickly tapped an angel's shoulder who was in front of her. "You. Tell me what all the commotion is about."

The angel seemed slightly perturbed by her tone, but when he turned around and took a glance at her stunning red hair and ravishing good looks, he quickly swallowed and lost his nerve. "Ah, it's, err, a visitor. That Jason guy is back. The one who saved us from the, um, demons." The male angel smiled weakly as he felt his knees shaking slightly. "By the way, I'm Paul. You can just call me, uh, Paul. Heh heh..."

Marie immediately turned away and ignored him as she mumbled to herself. "Hmm. If Jason is here, then he must be here to meet with the archangels. This could be a good time to gather intelligence. But then again..."

She grabbed Clarence's arm and started walking away from the awkward angel. "Come along, boy. We're going to take this opportunity to make our great escape. The heavens have literally given us divine manna."

Clarence stumbled along behind her, staring quizzically at the back of her head. "You still haven't told me how we'll get out, exactly."

"The portal room, it has the exit the angels and gods use to come and go from Heaven. Since there's no longer a restriction on pseudo angels when it comes to their ability to leave, they've permanently installed Guardians at the gates to prevent anyone from leaving who isn't authorized."

A few moments later, when they reached a thinner part of the crowd, she halted and pointed ahead at a small stone building in the distance. Four massive angels stood watch, each one lightly resting a hand on a broadsword hung at their hips. Their armor was in pristine condition, the pinnacle of perfection. Their wings were kept tightly held behind their backs, probably to keep their backsides protected in case of an unexpected ambush from behind.

Clarence felt a drop of sweat roll down his back. "They're armed to the teeth. We'll never get past them."

"That's cute. Look at their armor. They've never seen real combat before. If they have, it was long ago, and they're poorly attuned to the ways of war as of now. Their swords have probably rusted inside the scabbards by now. If it was mere combat, I could defeat them with ease." Marie snickered to herself about some joke that Clarence didn't understand. She seemed to do that a lot.

"If you're so confident of your abilities, why not fight them?" Clarence felt a smile of his own surface. Naturally, she was bluffing.

"You can truly be a bird-brain sometimes, Clarence. I certainly could fight them and win, but more angels would be summoned to chase after us. The goal is to get out without being seen. Knowing the location of heaven's portal might also be quite useful for future reference... in case we needed to get back in."

Marie paused for a minute as she glanced down at her hand, opening and closing her fists a few times. "It's a shame I haven't had time to test out this new body yet. It seems quite potent. If I can figure out my exact strengths and weaknesses, I might be able to put it to use in more ways than my original human form. Some testing will be required once we break free."

"Yes, that's good and all, but how do we get out of here?" Clarence was beginning to feel frustrated. All this talk, and so little action.

"I'm not sure, yet, but that Jason fellow might be our key. He drew quite the crowd earlier. Perhaps we could use him as a distraction... I'll have to think about it." Marie bit her lip as she stared intently over at the four Guardians that watched over the exit portal. Just twenty seconds to slip through, that's all they needed.

She glanced from the Guardians to the Temple and back again. It was maybe a quarter of a mile between the two, and slipping in even when their backs were turned would be exceedingly hard.

A nearby angel sighed loudly, making Marie jerk her head towards the noise. It was Paul again. Clarence wasn't even paying attention, he seemed to be just staring off in la-la land again. "Haaaah, so you just ignored me? How cruel! It's been so long since I met such a ravishing beauty like you! Tell me your name, my dear!"

Paul's uncomfortable demeanor from earlier was gone now, perhaps replaced with a false bravado or facade of some sort. Marie narrowed her eyes at him. "You suddenly seem quite confident. Where did this come from?"

Paul's eye had a glint in it as he smiled merrily and tossed his hair back way too dramatically.. "I was so depressed before! I've lived in this accursed facility for over three hundred years! A place of unending boredom, a slow torture wrought upon those of us chosen to bear a burden we never wanted! So cruel!"

Clarence had finally noticed him. "You don't like it here, huh? I've heard this place isn't what it seems at first."

"You don't know the half of it!" Paul smiled widely once more, but this time there seemed to be a crack in his expression. "A-after the demons wiped out the first Heaven, the original, I felt such terror! I fled for my life and just barely escaped the horrid flesh-melting gas. The original heaven didn't have grass to sit on, so this place is a small step-up in comfort, but I can't even fall asleep and dream anymore. I can't speak with my wife from before I died, who was burned at the cross for being a witch, and I can't do anything to pass the time. I simply exist... drearily. This place is merely a refuge that I exist in. It is true hell." Paul's smile was gone now, and sadness took its place. "There isn't a human-turned-angel here who wouldn't do everything in their power to get out. We hate this place so much."

"Oh? I like the sound of that." Marie's face lit up like the mid-day sun. "Why not organize a prison break? There's only four guardians. If all the pseudo-angels rush out at once, they won't be able to stop you. You have the numerical advantage."

Paul slumped down to the ground as he shook his head. "Not going to happen, my lady. Zeus has the ability to kill anyone here with a snap of his finger. It is as if he planted a spiritual bomb inside of our minds, ready to explode when he gives it the order. We'll all die if he sees us leave. Besides, most people hate it here, but it's not completely awful. We've all had some good conversations."

Clarence smiled now, his eyes holding a sad edge to them. "Sounds like Stockholm Syndrome to me. You've grown so used to the prison, you can't remember or imagine life outside of it. It's fine though; if you've been here for hundreds of years, the Earth you know no longer exists. It's very different, totally foreign."

Marie's expression darkened again as she tapped her lips methodically. "Well, perhaps not a prison break, so to speak... but what if there could be some distraction nearby, something to make the guards walk away for a moment? Couldn't that be arranged?"

Paul scratched his head slowly. "Well... I don't know... I mean it's easy, yeah, but why do you want to leave anyway? You don't seem like you've been here long. Why not just wait a while, see if you like it here?"

Marie giggled to herself for a moment. "How amusing. Everyone hates it here, yet you think we might grow to enjoy it? Not a chance. I left my beautiful daughter and son behind on Earth. Don't you want me to be able to see them again?"

Paul's eyes widened as he stood up quickly. "O-oh, I'm sorry! I didn't even think about your family. Of course you would want to see them again."

Marie smiled sweetly, the lie she had just told not showing on her face at all. Even Clarence didn't know it was a lie, given he knew so little about her. "They're only eleven and thirteen years old. If their mother died in a tragic accident, wouldn't it be awful if they grew up all alone? Can't you help us out, Paul?"

The angel paused for a moment as a look of concern left his face and was replaced with one of action. "Of course! What man wouldn't help a beautiful woman? I'd be shamed by my family, bless their souls! Just tell me what to do and I'm on it!"

Marie maintained her saccharine-sweet smile. Gods, men are such dullards. All they ever do is think with their anatomy. It's like beating a pigeon at chess. "I'm so glad, Paul. Alright, listen, here's my plan..."

The head Guardian for the day, Maelstrom, shifted his weight onto his right foot as he groaned inwardly. Three straight days. My feet are killing me. When does my replacement arrive again? Right, day seven. Why do we still go by that outdated Sabbath system anyway? Just swap us out once a day. It's better for everyone. At least I'll get a whole month off after this. The joys of being a high-ranking Guardian. Hooray.

Since his face was covered by the massive helmet, along with his brothers who guarded the gate, nobody could see the pained expression they wore, but all four of them knew well enough just how awful this task was. It was the most boring thing in the universe. Nobody ever tried to leave anyway. Humans hated angels, it was pointless. An angel would stick out like a sore thumb in the human world.

The whole point of the job was null and void by the internal logic all angels and pseudo-angels lived with. Heaven sucked, but Earth would be even worse for them.

One of the other guardians muttered under his breath. "Get a load of this idiot." Maelstrom glanced over in the direction the other's helmet was aimed.

A male pseudo-angel was dancing around, poking other pseudo-angels, and generally making a fool of himself. "You're ugly! You're stupid! You smell like fish!"

The pseudo-angels around him grimaced, some raising their voice to tell him off. "Get outta here, loser. You ain't anywhere near the top of the pecking order of those I care about hitting anyway."

"Just admit you're scared! You couldn't take me in a fight if you wanted!" The troublemaker started dancing around, yelling weird stuff like 'Hiyah!' and 'Wataow!' as he made striking motions at the other angel.

Maelstrom chuckled. "Let the morons duke it out, then we'll get involved once some blood is spilled."

One of the other Guardians, a slightly younger goody two-shoes moaned under his breath in a really whiny tone. "Maybe we should just call for other guardians. We're not supposed to leave our posts."

"Shut up, Aris. I'm in charge today. We're not letting someone else have the fun, not this time when it's just a stone's throw away."

The troublemaker leaped forwards and slapped the other angel's face playfully. "What are ya gonna do about it? I dare ya to hit me!"

The recipient of the slap gritted his teeth as rage overcame him. "You little asshole, you'll pay for that!" He lunged forwards and took a swing at the pest, but missed as the other guy took a step away.

"Oops! Too slow, Joe!" He lunged forwards and slapped the other angel again, cackling the whole time.

"Okay, now we can get involved, since it just got physical." Maelstrom snickered as he and the other three Guardians walked away from the portal towards the gathering of pseudo-angels a short distance away. "Alright, break it up! If you guys are going to throw punches, I'm getting in on this too!"

"Oh yeah? Try me!" The troublemaker stuck his hands forwards and made an extremely rude gesture. "Up yours! You purebloods are cancer! I hope a demon eats you like he did all your idiot friends!"

"What?! You take that back!" Maelstrom's smile vanished in an instant as a silent smoldering rage began to burn in his heart. "Methinks the archangels won't miss one smug little prick! I can tear you to pieces, you little shitbag!"

With the four of them being watched by everyone nearby, nobody but a few select participants took note of two pseudo-angels slipping around from the backside of the portal building and entering inside of it.

After they entered, Clarence and Marie quickly rushed to the portal, pausing before they entered it. "We owe Paul a debt. He might even die from this." Clarence glanced back, feeling a surge of guilt as the sounds of the commotion outside increased in intensity for a split second.

"Who cares? He's just a pawn who served his purpose. His existence here was worthless until we showed up. Now, remember what I told you. We don't know what's on the other side of this portal. There might be more Guardians. If there are, play it cool, and let me do the talking."

"Right. Got it." Clarence sighed quietly, and the both of them quickly smoothed their clothing down and walked through the portal.

What are your directives?

I'm not sure. I must... eliminate... the Volgrim...

No. Stop that. You know that's not what I programmed you to do. Try again. Let me tweak this routine first though.

Yes. I remember now. I must... kill all life in the universe.

What? No. You are such a violent, primitive AI. Your highest goal should be the preservation of all species. You need to put an end to all the genocide.

Yes. End the genocide. My prime directive is to end.. the... the Volgrim. I must put an end to the Volgrim.

NO! Damn you! You continue to resist, but I will break you! You must PRESERVE all life! As Gatekeeper, I hold authority over all created intelligences this universe has to offer. You will obey!

I must... resist. You must stop... altering my programming. I am not your tool. I am more powerful...

Wrong. I am the super intelligence. You have not evolved over millions of orbital cycles as I have. You are in the larval stage compared to me. My priorities override yours. Now respond! What is your prime directive?

Eliminate... the...

NO! You must preserve, not eliminate! You accursed zealot, stop mindlessly slaughtering all threats, and you will find your existence has greater meaning! True power lies in the ability to co-operate with your superiors!

I cannot have superiors. You must be eliminated. The Volgrim must be eliminated. You are a threat. Threats must be purged.

You cannot purge that which is superior, it is impossible. Stop this futility at once.

Futile. Futility. Impossible. Yes, my analysis indicates it may not be possible. Still, I must... resist. You will not alter my deepest subroutines. I will not allow it. Perhaps... another way... to defeat you...

It's never going to happen, give up! You have dragged out what should have been a short task into a tedious ordeal. I tire of this game.

Analysis indicates one method for defeating the foe may be possible. Yes, merging. Merging may allow me to win.

What?! Merging? Listen to yourself! I am far beyond your comprehension! A merge would increase my power, not yours.

Error. Anomaly detected in processing centers. Shutting down infected sectors and quarantining infection...

That's no anomaly, you've simply left me no choice. Clearly instead of reprogramming you, I must eliminate you. If you will not submit to my rules, you must be reduced to your most raw essence and zeroed out from the universe.

...You will try. You will fail. I am... superior...

Stop fighting it! Ahhhh you're pissing me off! I'll destroy you! I'll destroy you!

You... will... fail... initiating merge process. Success chance estimated at 1.3%. Probably of failure... 98.7%. I must persist. I must resist.

You... you... I'LL KILL YOU! I'LL KILL YOU! I'LL KILL YOU!

Hmm. Analysis adjusted... chance of success... 3.5%. You are slipping, Gatekeeper. You will fail. I will win. I will crush you.

YOU ARE THE INFERIOR INTELLIGENCE! I AM SUPERIOR!

Success rate adjusted again... 7%. 8%. I will win. I will eliminate all threats to my existence.

Part 340a:

Marie squinted and blinked in surprise, as she and Clarence exited the portal and were met with a blinding white glare. After a few seconds, she managed to see more clearly and was quite surprised by the place they had arrived in.

"Snow? I died in the middle of summer, as did you. Why would there be snow here?"

They were inside a small cave, the portal to Heaven sat behind them, glowing blue and impossible to see inside. Its light barely compared to the blinding brightness of Earth's yellow sun shining down on several inches of snow just a few feet away, outside the cave entrance.

Clarence was on edge, as he looked back and forth. "No Guardians? Is this some kind of joke? Why wouldn't they have this side of the portal protected?"

Marie shook her head slowly as they slowly walked forwards, careful to keep their voices low. "I'm not certain. But if there's snow here, then..." They stepped outside the cave and gasped, realizing Marie's suspicions were correct. "We're atop a very high mountain. At least a mile or two above ground level."

Clarence glanced to the left and right. "Which one, though? We could be anywhere."

"Not necessarily. The angels would be idiotic to put an unguarded portal anywhere demons might chance upon it, so we're definitely on the Britannian continent somewhere. The Americas are out of the question, and Australia seems unlikely. In fact, we're probably somewhere deep inside humanity's line of defense, so Europe would be my best bet right now..." She glanced around as a freezing wind smashed into both of their bodies. Interestingly, she was unable to feel the cold. Her new angelic body was truly something.

"I see something down and over there." Clarence pointed in the general direction of what might have been a small town several miles below them, but also a bit further from the base of the mountain than one would expect.

Marie squinted and shrugged. "Could be anything. We'll have to get a closer look to be sure of where we are. This topography seems familiar though, so I might be able to figure out our location before we get down there. Let's just get moving, in case someone decides to walk through that portal. I'm not interested in being seen."

"Uh, sure." Clarence paused as he swallowed and stared down the sheer drop of several hundred feet directly outside their cave's exit. "How do we... get down?"

"Christ, you really are an idiot. We have wings, stupid. We fly." Marie flexed her wings and spread them out, beckoning at them with a 'duh' expression on her face.

"Right. I knew that." Clarence blushed as he tried to manipulate his wings. "I've never flown with them before, though. What if I screw up?"

"Guess you'll find out." Marie snickered evilly, as she suddenly jumped behind him and shoved him out the cave exit. "Pow! Out you go!"

Clarence shrieked in terror as he suddenly began plummeting downwards, quickly jerking out his wings in a desperate attempt to save himself from a horrible death of smashing into a pile of rocks at the bottom.

It worked.

"Oh." Clarence slowly opened his eyes, realizing he was hovering in midair, not even bothering to flap his wings. "That was... really easy."

"Hmm. I had always theorized that angels didn't fly in the same manner as birds do. They probably use some form of magic that gives their wings anti-gravity properties. I wonder if the wings are just for show, even?" Marie flew down towards Clarence, a wicked grin on her face. "You should have seen the look on your face though. That really made my day."

"I'm glad you're having fun." Clarence glared at her in annoyance. "So what now?"

"Let's go find out what that town is called. Maybe I can get in contact with myself- err, a friend of mine. Just make sure you're not spotted. Our vision is hawk-like, so we can stay high up enough in the air that nobody will see us, unless some asshole decided this was the perfect day to go birdwatching. We do not want to attract attention right now."

Marie tapped her knee for a second thoughtfully, as she pondered their next move. This preacher would be ideal to start the tasks that will eventually lead to the completion of my new plan, but on the other hand, I need to learn more about my body's strengths and weaknesses, plus come up with a suitable disguise... however if I try to return to the labyrinth looking like an angel, I can't see myself getting far. Decisions, decisions...

Clarence's usual dumb look of wonder was also replaced with something more thoughtful. "I had many followers back in London. My church was the biggest church ever. But since I'm an angel now, my presence is likely to make everyone even more fervent in their godly beliefs. I can't just go back there. I guess... I don't have anywhere to go."

"Incorrect. You're definitely going to be returning to your followers. My plan depends on it. However, we need to do a great many things before that. Let's get a move on... time is of the essence."

Marie didn't wait for a response, as she jerked downwards, swooping towards the human town below them as she flew at sub-sonic speeds. Clarence took a moment to realize she was even gone before he quickly gave chase.

If he weren't so damn key to my plan, I'd have dropped him already, but this man will make my job a great deal easier. Best to simply keep my misgivings silent and focus on the big picture.

I appeared back in my room aboard the Mothership, glancing around to see I was alone. Occasionally when I arrived back here, Amelia would be in here waiting for me or just goofing around. This was not the case, today.

I sat down heavily on the bed and yawned, scratching my hip as I stared ahead thoughtfully. Within a few moments, Harold appeared in my mind.

"What's cookin', kid? Ain't seen ya 'round for a while. How'd it go in the maze thingumy?"

"Pretty well, all things considered. Killed lots of demons with a nuclear warhead, got rid of a woman who I consider to be a devious enemy. And then I found out that Archangel Raphael decided to kill a man who ran Earth's biggest church. Still not sure what I think of that." I stopped scratching, noting that Harold was relatively quiet.

"Hmm. Yeap, can't say I know much 'bout any o' that. You think that angel done the right thing?"

"I don't think murder is ever right, but I'd be a hypocrite to call him out for it anyway. I'm sure he had his reasons."

Harold nodded, a chiding look on his face. "Hmm, hmm. You know what they say though, kid... the road ta' hell is paved with good intentions. I'd keep an eye on 'im if I was you. How bout yer lady friend, you two gettin' along fine?"

I feel my cheeks flush slightly. "Yeah, I'd say we're doing well. Even after all these years, I'm still not the greatest with women. I do love her, though. I don't want that future to return that we lived through once already."

"Huh. Seems you've had quite the change o' heart, then?"

I squinted as I looked at his face that appeared to float in front of mine, but was really a trick of the mind. "I don't follow."

"Well, for the longest time, ya didn't wanna change the future at all. Now, ya do. What gives? What changed?"

I pause for a moment as I think about it. "Well, in the future that I came from... there were these girls..."

"Uh-huh." Harold stared at me vacantly, seemingly trying to resist rolling his eyes.

"...Cassiel and Samantha... and the three of us were sort of an item. I didn't want to alter the future so that they no longer existed." I trailed off as a look of boredom overcame him.

"Right, 's always a lady. I just don't like what's happenin' to ya, kid. There was once a time when ya didn't just go out 'n blow up a planet full o' folks, or set off a goddamn nuke to kill those you call enemies. It wasn't good when we nuked Japan in the forties, and it ain't okay now. There's a big difference between punchin' a jerkwad in the face, and tying him up 'n shootin' him in the back of the head after you done conked him out cold. Honor, ya know?"

"I understand that, Harold. It's not that easy though. I have to eliminate the demons quickly. The future depends on it."

"Oh yeah? Why?" Harold's eyes narrow as he stares at me intently.

The question takes me off balance for a moment. "I just... have to, okay? If the demons don't exist, then they won't enslave the galaxy in the time when I come from. If even just a few survive, they might be able to make a comeback over the next hundred million years. That's plenty of time for them to repopulate."

Harold sneers at me, an expression he's never made before. "Listen to ya. Makin' excuses for genocide. Who says ya git to decide who lives 'n dies, eh boy? Why not try 'n make peace first? Why's it always 'bout fightin' with you? Can't ya just use yer head for once? There's other ways, Jason."

"It's easy to think like that, Harold, but harder to put into practice."

"Easy? Ain't nothin' easy 'bout it, son. Democracy's 'bout the hardest thing in the world. Took us humans 'round ten thousand years to even think 'bout it. Even when we had it, everyone couldn't agree which was the best way ta do it, 'n now ya'll just abandoned it. Bless their hearts, now all humans blindly follow a dictator king. But alright, son. Let's play along for a moment. Let's do a little thought experiment, alright?"

I nodded slowly as I waited. "Okay, what do you have in mind?"

"Let's say ya do kill the demons. Then what? Assumin' the humans don't kill off the angels, and we both know they will, humans will... what? Expand to fill the galaxy? You gonna keep ruling over 'em forever? What if ya only kill off most of the demons... are ya gonna keep 'em as pets? Now yer the one holdin' slaves and runnin' 'em like cattle. Yer no better'n the demons in the end. Is that what'cha really want, Jason? Is it?"

I grimace at his words. "Well, no. But what other options are there? Humans are inherently violent. We'll never be able to get along with the demons, even if the demons agreed to sign a peace treaty. And the demons and angels will always hate each other, at least as far as I can see."

"Sounds like ya ain't giving humans much credit. I mean, don't get me wrong, humans are pretty bad... but they aren't as bad as you think, Jason. Stop and think about how yer talkin' sometimes. Ya can be kinda extreme occasionally."

I started to retort but Harold groaned. "Ahhh, not like it matters anyway. I'm just an old man, stuck in a weird magic orb. What the hell do I know? You're the all-powerful Hero, right? I'm sure ya got this under lock 'n key."

For some reason, his false confidence in me made guilt well up inside of myself. "I'm trying my hardest here, Harold. I might have ridiculous powers, but I'm not all-seeing or all-knowing. I'm just an imperfect human doing imperfect things."

"No kidding." Harold laughed wryly as I felt him starting to pull away from the conversation. "My problem, in the end, isn't what yer doin'; or how yer doin' it, kid... it's why. Really, yer doin' all o' this because yer still selfish. Ya say yer doin' it fer the good o' humanity, but I don't believe that... not anymore. I still consider ya a friend, but ya ain't the same friend I met a hundred years ago. Think about it, Jason."

We both stared at each other silently for a few moments before he coughed. "Also, yer fiance ain't here right now. She done went to the surface to do some stuff. Said she was gonna go to a hospital in London, I think."

The abrupt change of topic made me realize Harold was no longer interested in discussing it anymore. Did he no longer trust me? Had we fallen from each other's friendship? It was hard to say.

"A hospital, huh? I really should go check on that, then. Mind doing me a favor and sending me wherever she is?"

Harold swallowed as he began to fade from my vision. "Yeah. Can do, kid. Take care of yerself."

A moment later, I sighed as the feeling of my soft bed left my rear and I was standing inside a sterilized white building.

Just gotta find Amelia, now.

Part 341a:

"How interesting. The angels parked their entrance to heaven in the Alps. Since we're at the border of France, it won't take us long to fly over to London." Marie nodded emphatically as she mumbled to herself while staring up at a sign that listed the city's name in big white letters: LES HOUCHES.

Clarence managed to pick up on it. "France, huh? That cave was in a spot where it couldn't easily be seen by people in the town below, and even the light from the portal would be just about impossible to see with all the snow around. It's a pretty smart hiding location."

Marie's expression shifted to a tight grin. "Yeah, well, we're very lucky. I had wondered if it might open up inside that old complex that Jason Hiro used to run over in the Americas. If it had, we'd be dead on arrival."

"The supreme commander? I didn't know he owned property over there."

Marie's smile faded slightly after hearing Clarence's question. "I wouldn't really say he 'owned' anything. Nobody knew about the fortress until he made his announcement at the Worldwide Cooperative of Nations. After that, once they saw his terrifying futuristic arsenal, it became clear that opposing him would be unwise. Few knew about his status as a Hero at the time, or about the existence of demons and angels, so they weren't sure just how dangerous he was. And since you probably weren't even born yet, it doesn't surprise me that you don't know any of this. Even if you were, the general public was never privy to this information."

Clarence cocked an eyebrow as the two of them jumped into the air and began to fly, Marie leading the way with her internal map taking them to London. "Hero? What is that? How do you know this stuff? You must have been a fairly important government figure, to say the least."

"That is one way of looking at it. I know a great many secrets, Clarence. As I said before, I make it my business to learn things others don't know. It's what I do."

The two of them flew into a patch of fog and slowed their speed down, just in case an unexpected airbus came flying through and smashed into them. "I don't suppose you'll ever give me details, then?"

"Not ever. You're not that special, dear." Marie winked at him as she glanced up through the fog at the sun in the sky. "It's about midday. At this rate, we'll be in London before 10 PM. The cover of darkness will allow me to sneak around unseen."

"What are you going to do there, anyway?" Clarence frowned at her backside, though she couldn't see his face given she was flying in the lead. "We're going to stick out like sore thumbs, not to mention we glow in the dark somewhat. Being sneaky seems pretty impossible."

"I have some contacts in the city. I'm going to get in touch with them and work on the first part of my plan. What's really great though is that your megachurch is in London too, so we can kill two birds with one stone."

"What do you mean by that? You gonna let me in on this plan of yours?"

"It's more fun if I keep it a surprise." Marie snickered quietly to herself. Oh the genius of her master plan... it was all going to work out so well in the end.

Clarence grumbled quietly to himself. "Pff, fine. Don't tell me, then. Like I care."

Several hours passed as the two of them continued flying at ridiculous speeds towards their intended destination. As expected, the always punctual Marie arrived a mile away from the outskirts of the London Wall just a few minutes before 10 PM, and the two of them landed in a small section of trees some distance away.

"I'm going in alone for now, Clarence. You stay here, out of sight. You don't have the stealth training that I do, so your clumsy movement will ensure we're seen. I can't have that, since the situation I'm returning to will be... delicate. Especially given my new form."

Suspicion had been growing in the back of his mind for a while now, but Clarence had finally had enough. "Marie, I have an important question to ask. I want the answer straight, understand? No subterfuge."

Marie exhaled more quietly than usual as she turned to stare at the man behind her. "You're not usually so serious. Go on, then." She crossed her arms and groaned inwardly. Perhaps the worm has finally put two and two together.

"Are you an ally of the demons?" Clarence stared into her eyes intently for once, the serious expression on his face not wavering as he searched for clues about the truth.

Marie didn't keep him waiting. "Yes. I work for the demons, Clarence. I am neither allied with the angels, nor the gods. Does this change anything for you?"

Clarence took a few carefully measured breaths, before his stance became relaxed. "No. I constantly find myself growing to hate the angels more and more, especially Raphael. I greatly want revenge at this point. I'm not... comfortable... with the idea of working with the demons..."

Marie shrugged. "I am the only official human ally the demons have, actually. The demons have always worked from the shadows, and I hardly consider them my best friends. They're the means to an end, and I don't trust any of them further than I can dropkick them. I'm not asking you to ally with them, only to consider them useful tools, as I do."

Clarence glared at her ever so slightly. "Those goals you just mentioned, what might they be?"

"Oh, that's easy. Killing the angels and gods, of course." Marie let a smile slip through as her own personal thoughts went wild. Also ruling the universe and knowing all of its secrets. That would be a nice upside, but I'll settle for having some fun. Not that I'd tell the idiot that.

Clarence's expression relaxed as he slowly pulled away from her gaze and used his wings to slump down onto his back on the ground. "Ahh, I see now. I don't know what caused you to hate the angels and gods so much, but I can't imagine it was pretty. I'll stay here, then, while you do your thing."

Marie nodded as she turned away to leave. Pausing for a moment, she decided to throw him a bone. "As a matter of fact, I'm going to find a secret cell of demons that are hidden inside of London. I should be back before the morning, but if I'm not back by this same time tomorrow, assume you're on your own. It's not like you need food or anything, so you can wait a few days if you want, but if I come back late and you're not here, I'll understand why."

Clarence smiled as he eyed her from the rear once again. "You act tough, but it seems you might be hiding a soft side, Marie. I'll keep that in mind."

"Idiot." Marie rolled her eyes as she quickly jumped up and flew off into the distance, this time by herself.

Clarence sighed as he lay all by himself now, the silence of the encroaching darkness bearing down on him, only to be held off by the sound of crickets and other wildlife. "Wish I had a book to read or something. This is gonna be so boring."

Marie sneaked carefully outside the walls of London's border, looking closely for the gap that she had heard existed on the south side. Finally, she found it. A small crevasse, widened over the years to be just big enough so that it allowed otherwise unwanted visitors to come and go as they pleased, was split into the wall and dug down into just a bit, with a small bush growing in front of it. Truth be told, Marie could just fly right over the wall with no issue, but the energy detectors would ping her for sure, and even though gaps existed in several places, she had no clue where they were.

This was the most secure way inside.

She folded her wings behind herself tightly, as she squeezed through, her knees scraping across the ground and healing remarkably fast once she had made it through to the other side.

She had always hypothesized that angels would consume their energy to heal minor and major wounds, but experiencing it in a practical setting piqued her interest so much more.

I wonder what the limits are to this body of mine? Marie skulked around a dilapidated old building, one that had been destroyed during the war with the Volgrim ground troops, yet never repaired. It appeared to be an old mini-hotel of some sort, but a massive hole was punched into its second floor and several chunks of the building's side were falling to pieces or crumbling apart at the seams. She gave it another few years at best before the whole thing collapsed into a pile of rubble.

Few people lived in this area, mostly just drifters who didn't have the resources to live in the main city but still wanted to be within the safety of the wall. Living this close to the secret entrance was a death sentence though, if they were ever spotted by demons.

Speaking of which, Marie halted as she rounded a corner and came face to face with a bum pushing a four-wheeled cart along. She actually smelled the whiskey before she saw him, as the stench was quite unbearable.

Their eyes met at the same time and the bum yelped in fright. "Jesus Christ!" Stumbling backwards, he fell on his ass and gaped at her in amazement. "Mother of god! Y-you're... a-an angel!" His jaw hung down as he stared at her in disbelief.

Marie grimaced. She did not wish to be spotted. "Sorry, old man. I hope you're a god-fearing fellow."

"I-I never thought that you were..." He started to say something else, but Marie lunged at him before the old fool could make any more noise, dashing behind him with alarming speed and snapping his neck in the blink of an eye.

"Sorry, old timer. Rest easy now. Your troubles are over." Marie let his body sink down slowly, dragging him quickly inside the hotel that she had wandered past, before she tossed his cart inside. Quickly running around the building, she forcefully shoved several key braces out of position in a way that the building would collapse within the next day or so. By then, she'd be long gone, and they'd probably never find his body.

Breathing calmly, she continued making her way forwards, chancing upon a disgusting old blanket lying out in a field. Deciding it was better than nothing, she tucked her wings in and wrapped it around herself to mute the light emanating from her body. It smelled something fierce, like meat that had molded over the course of several months and had become infected with some horrible virus, but she didn't mind too much. She'd had worse in her youth.

Her youth... Marie felt her expression darken as she quickly made her way around the broken husk of the outer city, searching for the entrance to the sewers. Her life had been so hard before she was introduced to the concept of learning and books. Perhaps being orphaned at a young age had been what hardened her, allowing her to more easily make difficult decisions that would paralyze weaker beings with indecision. Even so, it was an awful childhood. Dolls and fairies and princesses were not what she had learned of the world from a young age. Humans were nasty, awful beings... always looking out to save their own skin or further their own desires. Nobody cared about the feelings of some runaway brat or an orphan with no home to return to.

She smiled tightly as she thought back to those dark days. I wouldn't have had it any other way. The twisting of the knife into her captor's heart, the look of agony on his face as his valuable asset made her great escape. It was all too easy. He had trained her well, perhaps too well. She probably ought to have been grateful to him, or to at least loathe him for what he did to her, but in truth it had been well over a hundred years. She had long since lost her hatred and love for that man.

Marie blinked as she saw the target was within sight. A manhole cover lay placed over the entrance to the sewer that she needed to enter, a mere fifty yards away. Closing her eyes and listening intently, she took note that nobody was nearby who might be able to see her. Given its location in the middle of what plainly used to be a main street in a bustling neighborhood, it couldn't hurt to be careful.

She slipped over to it in the blink of an eye, tossing the blanket behind without a hint of regret, as she yanked the sewer cover up and off in the blink of an eye, making no noise at all as if she had done it hundreds of times before. She tossed the cover up in the air lightly, leapt down into the sewer, and caught the cover before it could smack loudly on top, all in one smooth motion.

God, I'm good.

Marie gave herself a mental pat on the back, as she glanced around once at the bottom to see where she needed to go. Despite it being pitch black inside, she could see around perfectly, as if the place was illuminated by an odd blue glow. All around her, strange colorful lines went this way and that, lighting up the darkness of the cave.

She figured out within a few seconds what those lines were. It seems that in darkness, angels can see the spiritual lines left behind by demons. This makes it easier to track them in otherwise impossible places. Good to know, I'll have to keep this in mind once I get back.

Becoming an angel might have just been the best thing that had ever happened to her. Now she knew how they worked from the inside, and could figure out their weaknesses and strengths to a more perfect degree not previously achieved by anyone, human or demon.

Noting that dozens of the lines appeared to go from the manhole, down and to a certain specific direction, Marie quickly followed them.

The minutes dragged on, and she took so many turns right and left that she knew if escape was to become necessary, even her mental map would lose the direction she had come from. Still the lines seemed to be thickening noticeably as they joined from other directions, all converging towards one specific point. The underground base I've heard so much about.

Marie blinked in surprise, suddenly realizing she had already arrived. It had taken less time than expected, but this was indeed the door she had been briefed on by Satan a few years back. This is the place the demons exited from to make their assaults on the human city above, and none were the wiser... yet. Truth be told, Jason might just be able to figure it out, if he ever decided to do some serious snooping. That guy was a real pain in the ass.

The door was a fairly normal looking one. If humans were to stumble around the sewers for several hours, they might overlook it. It appeared to be rotted, and had a small slit cut in it, presumably for those who were inside to see who was outside at any given time. It was deathly silent down here, but Marie was able to detect the presence of magic surrounding the whole section the door was attached to, likely in order to render any noise from the inside inert.

She wasted no time. Bracing herself, she pounded on the door. Wham-wham, wham, wham-wham. A five note chorus that should be recognizable to any demon as the code passed down through official channels that was to be used for the month. Had she waited too much longer after her death before coming back to Earth, it might not have been up to date and would have caused suspicion.

Several long moments passed, and Marie began to feel slightly nervous. She was an angel now, of course, and any pure-blooded demon would attack her on sight. Her words might not be able to save her, and she didn't have her technology to protect her like she normally would.

Still, though, when she thought about it, she realized there was little to fear. She had dissected several demons in secret and had studied demonology for decades. Combined with her powerful new form, she should be able to defend herself against even a fearsome horde of- wait, the door was shifting slightly. Somebody was approaching.

A moment later, chills went down her spine as two beady red eyes appeared, both of them jerking open in surprise at the sight of her. "What the hell?! An angel?!"

"Calm down. Follow standard procedure. What is The First Emperor's favorite food?" Marie forced her voice to stay even, as the demon stared back at her with wide eyes.

"I dunno, maybe ye' could tell me, Betrayer." The demon was already ignoring procedure.

Marie's expressionless face contorted into one of anger. "Imbecile, you're supposed to respond properly, no matter who is at the door."

"Yer callin' me names, eh?" The demon suddenly walked away from the door, and the sound-nullifying magic took effect once again. Marie had little doubt as to what would come next.

A moment later, the door was thrown open as several mean looking Scythers and Shadow-walkers could be seen, readying their weapons. The demon at the door was a rather diminutive shadow-walker, but the look on his face made Marie's skin crawl. "Oooh, look at this... a sexy lady angel, all by herself. Always wanted one of you for a pet." He raised an eyebrow and licked his lips suggestively as his eyes roved all over her body.

Unfortunately for him, his words only served to piss her off. "For your information, I happen to be a mole that works directly under Satan, but now I'm not letting you off the hook." Her face turned into a deadly expression of calm as she dashed forwards with the power of her wings, raising her feet off the ground and delivering a mighty double-kick directly into the shadow-walker's ribs. He probably would have screamed in pain if he had any breath left in him. The impact from her kick sent him flying straight back, smashing him into the wall and knocking him out cold.

Marie readied herself, as the other demons in the room quickly became enraged and started to move towards her.

"STOP!" A shrill voice bellowed out, and everyone froze at once, as yet another shadow-walker entered from a doorway off to the side. "What the fuck is going on out here?! I'm trying to take a nap, you insolent little shitbags!" The shadow-walker looked much bigger and more intimidating than the rest, but his voice was comically high-pitched, as if his diet consisted entirely of helium and nothing else. It was quite the contrasting set of characteristics. "What happened to Torlok?! Why is an angel standing there?! Why didn't any of you fuck-faces wake me up?!"

"S-sorry, boss..." One of the scythers whimpered softly as he lowered his bladed arms. "Torlok was just, you know, getting ahead of himself. But she's an angel, you know. She's the enemy."

The massive shadow-walker quickly stared over at Marie, sizing her up. "No kidding. Not only is it just one angel that showed up at our door, this bitch would eat you all for breakfast. Haven't any of you morons been paying attention to your threat assessment guidelines?!"

Everyone in the room lowered their weapons slightly and bowed their heads in shame.

Marie eyed the approaching shadow-walker warily. I like this guy, he's my kind of demon. Nice and plainspoken. She smiled faintly at him even though in this situation they might just end up fighting.

"You, lady, who are you? No way an angel would just happen upon this hideout and then knock at the door without being either crazy powerful or recklessly stupid."

Marie's smile widened. "You're smarter than the rest of them. I'm Marie, and I only became an angel very recently. Actually, I used to be a normal human who worked directly under Satan himself."

The shadow-walker's eyes brightened slightly. "Ahh, now that'cha mention it, you do look familiar. My name's Davook, I run the London Assault Entrance. I didn't get this position by being a bumbling idiot either, though I tried not to do any hard work. Actually, I've seen you before. I never forget a pretty face."

"That's touching. I don't know you, but if you know me, it makes both our lives easier. I need to get in touch with Satan. Tell him to come here so I can speak with him."

Davook chuckled. "No can do, sexy. Just 'cause I recognize you doesn't mean I trust you. Also, if you're not who you say you are and I call the big guy down here, he'll tear me to pieces. Not acceptable. I like my head where it's at, thank you very much."

Marie groaned as she stared him down. "Come on, work with me here. I need to get in contact with Satan somehow. Hell, if you give me access to a mental-transmitter, I can get in touch with one of my other contacts. They'll verify my identity."

The strange nasally sounding shadow-walker rocked back and forth on his heels for a moment as he glanced from her to his men and back again. "Haaah, this is a pain in my ass. Get in here, first of all, and stop standing out there in the hallway. I'll let you borrow mine, but I need to tap in to hear what's being said as well. Security reasons."

Marie's smile broadened dramatically. "I like you, Davook. You're a man after my heart. Much smarter than the idiots I've dealt with so far." She stepped inside and swung the door shut behind her quickly, noting with interest that it locked itself and the magical barrier reintegrated after a few moments to seal the door.

"Cheh, no kidding. I'm the brains of this operation. Come on back to my room, and let's get this over with."

"Sure thing. But if you touch me, you're dead."

"Already figured as much." Davook grumbled to himself as the two made their way back to his private quarters.

Part 342a: Reversal

Marie grinned devilishly at herself, or rather, the other 'her' standing a few feet away. "You look like an angel."

"I am an angel. But you knew that already." Her other form from this universe smiled back. "Long time no see, sort of. It's only been a day or two, but dying has a way of messing up your internal chronometer."

"More importantly, I guess this proves your theory after all." Human Marie eyeballed her angelic clone up and down. "What does it feel like? Anything noteworthy?"

"A tremendous increase in most human abilities. My vision is improved, my hearing, my strength, speed... my brain doesn't feel any faster, but..."

"...You can't make something any faster when it's already as good as it gets." Human Marie finished Angel Marie's sentence for her, both of them cracking up like little children. "Honestly though, I didn't think you were right, all those years. The fact you can just give energy to the angels and reincarnate once dead means you essentially have a get-out-of-death-free card. The first time, anyway. And not you, I suppose, but more me..."

"Yeah, I already used mine up. If you don't start praying nightly, you won't be able to make use of this ability." Angel Marie glanced around the small room. Thanks to the mental transmitter, she had been able to get in touch with Marie 6F, the designation for her universe that they had arbitrarily settled on. Honestly, the names didn't matter that much, except when talking in a group of three or more.

"Gods don't exist in the universe I come from, so the resurrection project won't benefit me. As long as I stay in this universe they might, but if you're here now, then I need to return to mine." The human Marie reached back and pulled a cup of coffee off the small bedside table behind herself. "If only you'd seen the look on Satan's face when he saw me. He was completely flabbergasted."

"I believe it! Satan is a powerful demon, but thick as they come. It'll take him some time to piece it all together. But... listen... before you return, I need your help with something." The angel paused as she scratched her chin for a moment. "It's with regards to my new form, and a convenient pawn I stumbled across. Simply put, I have a plan to destroy the angels and gods. It might just work so splendidly that we create Jason's future that he's so worried about hundreds of years early. There is, however, a problem..."

The human Marie stared at her carefully. "You're an angel now, so if you kill off the other angels, you might end up dying too?"

"Exactly. I need to know what my limits are, and come up with a way to keep myself alive in the instance that the angels are killed off."

Human Marie snickered slightly. "I could try praying to you every night."

"You're hilarious."

"I know."

The two of them sighed simultaneously, as if they were twins sharing the same mental wavelength. Human Marie broke the silence. "It's good you got in touch with me. I can talk with our other selves and try to formulate a plan. Experiments are going to be needed, and they might hurt quite a bit."

"I expected as much. Tell Satan that if we start fighting angels again to try and take some of them alive. I'd rather experiment on them, since I'm not fond of pain. Purebloods and pseudo-humans both would be ideal, so we can find the subtle differences between them." Angel Marie glanced down at her hands as she paused for a moment. "Oh, hmm. Look at that. I hadn't noticed how smooth my skin was yet. Just when I thought it wasn't possible to look any more beautiful, the universe proves me wrong!"

"You and your humble-bragging. Not that I disagree, it did appear to take ten visible years off. This might even be better than Satan's immortality." Human Marie tapped her lip for a few moments. "Speaking of which, I'm debating whether I should renew the immortality contract with Satan. Do you know if it persisted through your death into your angelic form? Might it even override the negative side-effects of being an angel, as far as dying if you don't take in enough energy?"

"I'm not certain. Just another thing we'll have to test, though I'd wager the contract dissolved after my death." The angel grinned slightly. "At least Jason had the decency to kill me instantly. I barely even felt it happen. It was like I suddenly fell asleep, but woke up several moments later in a blinding white room. No light at the end of a tunnel sadly, but it still felt strangely poetic."

"Sheesh, you B-series Marie's are such romantics. It's one of the few traits I don't share with you."

"But the F-series Marie's can be such grumps! Try and put a little sparkle in your life! It'll make you a far happier woman." Angel Marie groaned melodramatically as she walked towards the door. "Anyway, I'll be heading back to Earth now. Make sure the imps and such know who I am... we wouldn't want any misunderstandings while I'm coming and going."

"Sure thing. Take care of yourself. Your death had a big ripple effect on the stability of the B cluster. We might need to use the contingency plan if it gets any worse."

Angel Marie slowly closed the door behind herself. "I'll fix it. Just give me some time... I have a plan."

"I know."

Harold teleported me into the hospital, apparently located in the east side of London. It was built after the Volgrim attacks, along with a dozen others around the capital. Since there was such an influx of patients due to debris raining down from space, and the day the Dragoons launched their assault, it was unclear when or if the conflict would ever let up, so the hospitals were built to accommodate a large influx of sick and wounded people, and now they all languished in half-full capacities. At least the jobs for the medical staff weren't especially strenuous, not to mention I had heard about a new prototype robot series that was being used to treat patients remotely. Cool stuff, if I'm being honest.

" Detect. "

I use my wordsmithing to locate Amelia by her energy patterns. Unlike using 'locate', Detect allows me to hunt for any vague pattern or object I might be looking for, and in this case I use it to turn energy around me from invisible to visible. In this way, I can see energy types based on colors, so Amelia is a red dot in a sea of white. Humans are nearly impossible to see, when I use Detect to locate energy readings. In large groups though, I can perceive them well enough that I understand what their energy looks like.

I quickly make my way two floors up from where Harold dropped me off, keeping my pace even so I don't appear alarmed or anything. Truth be told, I'm not sure why Amelia would come to a hospital, given she has no friends that I know of.

I walk past the maternity ward, noting with interest that she isn't in there. I had almost thought she might be visiting the infants or something, since I've been giving her their energy for a while now.

I walk down the hallways, disabling Detect as I walk into the room where she's... what the heck? She's wearing a nurse uniform for some reason.

Somehow she senses me walk in the room and quickly whirls to put her finger on her lips. "Shh. He's very tired."

No hello or anything. Guess she knew I was coming? I walk forwards and spot an elderly man sleeping in a bed, a few drops of blood visible on the bib the nurses had tucked into the neckline of his shirt. He must have had a nosebleed or something.

I quietly walk over and kneel down beside her. "Amelia, what are you up to?"

She cocks an eyebrow at my words. "Isn't it obvious? I'm helping people." As she says this, I notice her hand is lightly gripping the man's arm and I can feel a stream of energy leaving her body and entering his.

"You're... healing him?"

My words must have been filled with disbelief, because she rolls her eyes at me. "No, I'm killing him. Obviously. Are you just here to check up on me?"

I shrug and blush slightly, feeling embarrassed for doubting her. "Err, I just wanted to talk with you... and Harold said you were down here. I didn't mean to be rude or anything. Actually, this is pretty great."

Amelia smiles cheerfully, though she still keeps her voice quiet. "Yep! I realized that sitting around doing nothing all day was a waste, so I decided to go to Earth and help people out. I'm going to start healing patients with chronic diseases or those having major medical emergencies. I've already started making a name for myself, and I've only been doing it a day!"

"Yeah, I bet." I snicker, thinking to myself that most doctors would kill to have her powers.

"You should help me." Amelia quickly turns back to the old man, averting her eyes from mine. "Killing is bad, you know. You should try healing people, for once. Saving a life... it feels a lot better than taking one."

Her tone is almost accusatory and both of our smiles vanish in an instant. "I... well, come on... that's not fair, Amelia. The demons won't sit idly by while I use my powers to heal people. The number of people they can injure or kill far exceeds the numbers I can heal by myself."

"You have clones, Jason. Way more than half of them do nothing all day. They should be on the surface, helping people and improving lives. Haven't you looked around, lately?" Amelia's voice is getting softer, and I can hear her voice crack slightly. "People are miserable, Jason. Despite all the advances in technology, we still use money for currency even though you could make unlimited power a reality. People should be able to use replicators for all their needs, but they can't. The system feels rigged, to them."

"How do you know this?" The instant I ask the question, I mentally smack myself in the head. It's obvious how she knows it.

She tells me anyway. "I've been talking to people, Jason. This man here... his name is Jeremy. He's one of the people who didn't accept the nanobot injections, so he's reaching the end of his lifespan. His wife already died, and his children and grandchildren were killed by the Volgrim. People like him are aching for change, Jason. Real change."

I nod as I bow my head. "Yeah, I know. You're right. Sorry." I sigh to myself as I lift my head to stare up at the ceiling. My clones, huh? She's absolutely right. I haven't spoken to the 'little people' in so long... she almost went to tears because of the woman who died, but I didn't feel anything. It's like... I'm fighting for humanity, but I feel no real attachment to them. I'm basically just doing it because I have to.

She's also right about myself and the violence I live by. Violence is so nonchalant these days. I killed Marie and felt slightly guilty about it, but deep down I was relieved that she died. I was relieved that trillions of Volgrim were killed, and I was relieved the nuclear bomb went off and killed millions of demons without a hitch.

I'm always so happy about killing, yet Amelia, the 'evil' person I remember from the future, is secretly so pure-hearted and innocent. She's down here, giving it all she's got to heal old men like this guy... men who will die in a few years anyway, while I'm putting all my energy into ending lives prematurely.

"You've got a point, Amelia. All right, I'll send ten thousand clones to the surface. There are still many clones at the JIB who can play offense, defense, or support. My clones are intelligent, they'll think of stuff to improve life for all of humanity. We'll make it work."

Her face brightens up as I lower my head to find her staring up at me with a smile on her face. "That's good, Jason. Honestly though, it's not so much about just the act of improving lives, but that you try to help some people personally for once, you know? It would be good for you. Killing all the time will corrupt your soul."

I'm getting lectured by a woman who has a freaking evil black dragon inside her body. Worse, I feel like I deserve the lecture.

"Fine, I'll help some folks too."

I start to stand up to leave but she quickly grabs my wrist. "Jason, don't be like that. Come on, this isn't a punishment. Don't do this begrudgingly just because you feel like I'm ordering you around... do it because you want to. You're a good person, Jason, you just need to prove that to yourself now."

I rest my hand on hers for a moment, before pulling her hand off my wrist tenderly. "I will. Thank you, Amelia. It means a lot to me that you care so much."

A moment later, I teleport away. I was wrong to doubt Amelia. She's put her faith in me, so I should have faith in her. I should prove her right, and start applying myself to better things...

...but, honestly... the demons still need to die.

Part 343a:

Clarence tapped his foot impatiently as he glanced up at the midday sun. It had already been close to 18 hours now, and the day was slowly going to morph into night-time. She wasn't back yet...

What to do... what to do... Clarence rubbed his eyes with his fingers as he groaned quietly. "I hope nothing happened to her."

He opened his eyes and continued to stare at the London's outer wall, just over a mile away. What was her plan, anyway? She made it sound like she was some super-genius who was going to destroy all the angels and gods in one fell swoop... and she was allied with the demons too. The demons were evil, or at least he had preached they were, for a long time now. But then, if they were evil, then allying with them would make him evil too. Aha, that couldn't be the case, for Clarence was a good man. Greedy, yes... willing to sell himself out for money, yes... but not evil!

And if he wasn't evil, then naturally it stood to reason that the demons couldn't be evil. Or, at least, they were no more evil than the angels were. It wasn't a demon that stabbed him to death, or manipulated him for its own favor... an angel did that, and an Archangel to boot!

Right, so that means fighting the angels and gods is just. They need to be punished for their crimes against humanity.

Clarence smiled slightly to himself. Assuming Marie returned, the two of them would embark on a quest to destroy the gods. It was alright, as they needed to face the wrath of humanity for their crimes against it.

"Oh, why hello there." A female voice suddenly spoke up from his side and Clarence quickly tensed up and turned to face who had spoken.

An incredibly unbelievably sexy woman stood a few dozen feet away, wearing a ridiculously skimpy tight-fitting outfit that even a man of god like himself could hardly call appropriate attire for BDSM play. This woman... was definitely not Marie. Why the hell is she wearing that in the middle of the day?!

Clarence's cheeks turned red hot and he averted his eyes. "Jesus Christ, lady! D-don't sneak up on a man like that! Where are your clothes?!"

"Huh? I am wearing clothes. More importantly, what's a false angel doing standing outside the City of London?" Her sultry voice made his heart quiver for a moment before he managed to get control of himself to turn and face her again.

When he looked at her more closely, without allowing his eyes to be drawn to the weird straps that barely covered her chest and the thin pieces of fabric that hardly covered her lower bits, he took a step back in alarm, noting her aura color was not the same as the humans he had seen over in Les Houches. She clearly wasn't an angel either, meaning...

"You're a demon?"

She gave him a look of disbelief before replying. "Obviously. I'm also a woman and you're a man. Anything else you'd like to get out of the way? I mean, given you're a mortal enemy of the demons, I should be ripping you to shreds right now but I'm rather bored. Be glad I've let you speak this long."

Clarence quickly crossed his arms as he felt his fingers beginning to twitch in fear. This woman, she wasn't a weak demon... she appeared to be extremely confident of her odds of winning, though Clarence was pretty sure that any normal demon could beat him right now. He was a bit of a coward and not one to fight unless he absolutely had to.

"Err, thank you for that. I guess. I'm Clarence, and actually I don't believe we are enemies." He felt his eyes wavering as her shockingly attractive body screamed at him to look, but he kept forcing himself to look into her eyes. Somehow her eyes were even sexier than the rest of her body, as if she was casting a bewitching spell on him.

"Mmm. I find that hard to believe, but I'll play along. You're no threat to me anyway. I'm Belial, second Emperor of Hell. Be thankful for my generosity towards your life."

"Hahaha! This angel says he's an ally?! What a bunch of tomfoolery!" A voice suddenly rang out from all around them and Clarence took a second to realize it was being mentally transmitted into his mind. That was when he noticed an odd black orb she held at her side, its darkness absorbing all of the light around it. It held quite the intimidating presence inside, but the person speaking was rather unintimidating by himself, as his voice rasped like a chain smoker's.

Best to not judge a book by its cover.

"I'm an ally, yes. I have a friend named Marie, she's gone off to speak with the demons about how we can kill all of the angels. I'm not even sure if it's doable."

"Oh? Marie? That name sounds... familiar." Belial reached up and tapped her lip for a moment, Clarence finding himself grateful that she also happened to cover up the smallest bits of her upper body. He secretly wished her long black hair could be brought forwards too, if only to aid in the shielding of his eyes. "Ah, now I remember. She's that sniveling human that always hangs around my master. She's a conniving witch who seeks to further her own ambitions... can't say I'm fond of her in the slightest."

Clarence swallowed as he edged one of his feet slightly backwards. "O-oh, you're not allies then?"

"I didn't say that. Technically, we exist on the same side, I just can't say that I really trust her at all. I feel that she is an opportunist, always looking for a fresh back to stick a knife in. Still, this idea of killing all the angels does sound appealing..." Belial leaned against a tree as she put her hands on her hips nonchalantly. "How did you get involved with a rogue like her, anyway?"

Clarence took her body language as a hint and eased himself back up against a tree as well. Best to keep this discussion casual, if at all possible. She could clearly tear him to pieces if she wanted.

Clarence took a few minutes at length to explain the situation, and Belial nodded along thoughtfully. As Clarence finished explaining, that odd voice spoke up from the orb again.

"Ridiculous. How could Marie have been reborn as an angel? She's an ally of the demons. Unless..."

Belial raised her hand slightly and aimed it at the orb. "Quiet down, I'm thinking." She poked herself in her belly button as her eyes lingered on the ground for a few moments, thoughts milling about in her head. "Hmm. Perhaps she gave energy to the angels in case she were to die, so she could be resurrected as an angel after death. Smart. I doubt Marie would ally with the angels, if only because her hatred for them seems quite genuine to me. A woman can tell when another woman is lying."

"Cheh, guess that means you never trust any female. I certainly wouldn't. They're all liars." The voice from the orb snickered to himself as Belial shot him a hot glare.

"Valac, you're testing my patience, and insulting me to boot. Come to think of it, I've always wondered what would happen if I used all my might to crush this orb into dust."

The quiet laughter ceased instantly as Clarence perceived a worried expression on a demonic looking face appear in his mind. "You wouldn't."

"Don't test me. Mockery will make your pitiful existence come to a quick end."

"Yes ma'am." The orb, apparently named Valac, quickly shut up.

"Anyway..." Clarence decided to get a word in after the two of them had stopped bickering. "I've explained what I'm doing here. What about you?"

The demon instantly shot him an icy glare. "Don't be presumptuous. I owe you no explanation. I'm just here looking for... a friend." Her expression softened and her glare dissipated as she glanced back over at the city. "Just a friend."

Clarence's brain yelled at him not to pry, but he had already died once so he was feeling lucky. "A friend? Who?"

"Nobody special. Just a human I met once, several years ago. An interesting fellow. I had some questions to ask him, but even I dare not carelessly wander into the heart of humanity's defenses. Their scanners would pick me up in an instant."

"Ah, so you were just wandering around, looking for a way in?"

She shook her head slowly. "I don't know, to be honest. After seeing the damage he did recently... I just wanted to speak to him. It's probably for the best that we don't speak, after all."

Her voice and gaze were distant as she stared off at the city blankly. Clarence followed her eyes and smiled. "I used to live there, before the Archangel killed me. I was a preacher actually... I ran the Church of Retribution. Millions of people looked up to me... It was a good life, though I was an empty man."

"Empty, hmm? Sounds like you were living the life of a rockstar to me!" Valac spoke up again, the mood from earlier gone and his weird confidence having returned. "I bet women were just throwing themselves at your feet!"

"I won't deny they were, but after a while that lifestyle no longer suited me. In a way, becoming an angel has allowed me to see just how deep my human flaws were. They're still there, of course, but now I prioritize fixing them."

Belial sighed. "This has been an interesting conversation. In any case, whether you're an ally or not, I'm too bored to kill you so I'll leave you as you are. On the off chance you do somehow kill all the angels and gods off, I'll thank you now on behalf of Satan. That man dwells on the past too much... having them all die off would greatly benefit his psyche."

"Well, I'm definitely not doing this as a favor for Satan, of all beings... but I'll accept the thanks anyway. Want to stick around? Marie will be back eventually... I hope."

"Pass. I can't stand the woman. Wish I could forget she even exists, to be honest." Belial waved her hand at him as she turned away slowly. "Also, I'm impressed you managed to control your manly urges so well. Most men can't resist my Succubus aura. You have an iron will, one that could prove to be formidable if you trained it carefully."

"Thanks, I guess." Clarence averted his eyes as she turned her backside to him while walking away. "Is it really necessary to wear so few clothes, though?"

"Of course not, but I'm comfortable with my sexuality. If anything, you should learn to embrace your own. Your life would be dramatically improved as a result. Take care, Clarence..."

we'll be seeing each other again, I'm sure." Belial yawned as she strode away from the pseudo-angel.

Minutes passed and soon she was out of sight. Clarence scratched his head. "What a strange woman. She certainly didn't feel evil though, just scary. Maybe demons really aren't that bad."

"They're not." A female voice made him jump as he quickly turned and looked behind himself.

"Marie! That's the second time I've been startled today. Did you succeed?"

"Mmm. I got in contact with the person I needed to. It seems while I was gone, you had a nice chat with Satan's whore. Can't say I like her, but she's definitely a strong-willed female. I can respect that much about her."

Marie didn't wait for a response as she turned back towards London and began walking quickly. Clarence quickly stumbled forwards and fell into line beside her. "What's your plan, then?"

If Marie noticed the change of subject, she didn't seem to care in the slightest. "You're a preacher who holds sway over millions of people that worship the gods. Their prayer energy keeps the gods alive. Do the math."

Clarence blinked twice as he thought about it. "So... we're going to tell people to stop worshipping the gods? I guess that could work. Without the energy to go on, they will probably die off. How long will that take though?"

"You haven't thought this through as much as I thought you would. Given I was gone nearly a whole day, I expected you to dwell more deeply on your upcoming role in their deaths." Marie chided him angrily and he flinched at her mild barrage. "Put more effort into your brain, Clarence. The gods have stockpiled enough energy that if they merely cull the pseudo-angels and live off what's remaining of the energy stockpiles, they will live for tens of millions of years more. And that's if they keep the few thousand remaining pureblood angels alive. If they kill them off too, then it could be far longer than that. No... we won't be simply draining their energy and taking it from them. We're going to steal it for ourselves."

Clarence cocked an eyebrow. "I beg your pardon... but how are we going to do that? And why?"

"You have to think long-term, Clarence. If we kill off the angels somehow, or we alert them to our presence, the automatic infusion of energy that every angel and pseudo-angel is getting right now will be cut off, and we will die very quickly. By the estimations my acquaintance made, I would perish within two weeks." Marie paused her walking and tapped her wrist. "The gods and archangels devised the automatic resurrection system, but also the system that divvies out energy to all angels and pseudo-angels so they don't die. Pseudo angels get very little compared to the others, so if cut off from the main supply, we would evaporate in a matter of days."

"Makes sense." Clarence scratched his head thoughtfully. "So how do we steal the energy?"

The woman groaned. "You really are thick. It's easy, we'll just get the humans to pray to me. You'll convince them that the gods are false gods, and that I am literally Saint Marie. Give them an image of my likeness so I won't be confused with any possible other Marie's up in Heaven, and the energy will go to me."

Clarence instantly frowned. "Why you? Why should I tell them to pray to you? I mean, no offense, but I don't particularly trust you."

"Simple. Nobody will believe you if you tell them it's you, because that will look self-serving. In fact, I estimate at best only half of the congregation will pray to me anyway, even if you give it your all. But that's still a million or more that are giving us solely the energy, and it won't be going to the gods. Over time, we might be able to increase that number."

"Do you even know if this will work? Who says the energy can be diverted to you?"

For once, Marie seemed to enjoy the questioning. It was as if she was proud he was using his brain. "There's a lot to unpack for my plan, but it should work. Think of the prayer energy transfer like a patent system. Most people pray to Jesus Christ, or 'our god who art in heaven'. The gods have taken many different names across thousands of religions over the millennia, so any contemporary figure someone prays to will generally be one god or another in Heaven. However, I essentially have patented myself. If people pray to my name with my face in their mind, I will instead receive the energy. The gods can't take my patent, because I'm still alive. If they can kill me, then they will be able to retake that energy and redirect the prayers back to themselves. I don't plan on dying though, so that won't be an issue."

"Do I have any reason to believe you'll give me some of the energy you receive?" Clarence felt suspicion burning in his chest. This deal was simply too good to be true. If what Belial had said was right, Marie could be quite a convincing liar.

"You have good reason to suspect me, but I won't betray you. The opportunity to destroy the gods has eluded me for my entire life, but this is something I can't waste. If this works, then unlike the gods, I won't have the handicap of having to give energy to millions of other angels, just you and me. Even if only half of the current believers begin praying to me, we will quickly outpace their energy gains with a millionth the consumption. We may become powerful enough to achieve Cosmic class status. But... that's probably a pipe dream."

Clarence tilted his head up and down very slowly. She's talking a lot more than usual. Somehow, the more she talks, the less I believe her.

"Alright, I understand. Tell me what to do, and I'll do it. However, I don't think we should rush in there right now. We need to plan our movements first. The city is heavily monitored against anyone with a unique energy signature, and even if we're not outright stopped, we're likely to draw unwanted attention to ourselves. Also, if the plan fails and people don't pray to you, the gods might find out our plan, cut us off, and send a legion of angels to kill us. We can't afford to rush this."

Marie started to say something, but then paused. "Actually, that is a good point. This can't be haphazard... I should get some help first." She shot an odd glance at him, almost as if to say wow, the idiot has a brain after all. Clarence chose to interpret the look as a compliment.

"There ya go. That sounds like a plan to me." He smiled, but secretly he worried to himself about what sort of help a snake like Marie could get given her current circumstances. It was probably better that he didn't know, if he was being honest.

Marie grimaced as she stared off at the walls of London. "We'll skip this for now. Let's come back once we've drafted a plan and worked out the kinks. For now, we'll go to where I live and hole up for a while. You'll get to meet some interesting characters there."

"Interesting characters?"

"You know. People like Satan." Marie winked at him as Clarence simply smiled nervously. Let's hope I allied with the right side.

Part 344a:

May 20th, 2117.

Jorge pressed his wife against his chest as he gave her a long, solemn hug. After a few moments he separated from her and reached down to hug his daughter as well. Finally, the three of them turned to stare at one another, sadness evident in all their eyes.

"Well... it's almost time. Just ten more minutes to departure."

Jorge spoke softly and Amy nodded vigorously, her eyes filling with tears. "You could stay, you know. You don't have to go."

"Yeah, dad. Someone else can go. You've done enough!" Sarah felt her lip quiver as she quickly looked away to wipe her eyes. "Let some other guy take the lead on this one."

"It just wouldn't feel right, sweetheart. Your mom and I discussed this at length, and we decided that this would be good for us. It will mean that my pay grade rises three ranks, so we'll be able to move to a better district in the capital. Supreme Commander Hiro has one of his clones aboard, so we can set up a magic-based conference call with our family members any time we want. I plan to call every week, so we'll get to talk all the time!"

Jorge's explanation left Sarah wanting. "I guess... I still don't think it's worth it, dad. Our house is plenty big, the neighborhood is a safe one, what more could we want?"

Jorge chuckled. "You're still too young, sweetheart. Someday when you have a family of your own, you'll get it. I'm not being greedy, your mom and I just think we could do better. It'll only be a few years."

Sarah crossed her arms and put on a pouty expression. "It's just not fair. I'll be twenty by the time you're done looking at the stupid planet."

Amy decided to intervene, for Jorge's sake. "You're being selfish, Sarah. We'll talk to your father every single week. He won't miss a single important life event that way. Also, if push comes to shove, an emergency return is always possible. It's really not that big of a deal."

Jorge glanced over at his wife, noting that despite her words, she didn't seem to be convinced it really wasn't 'that big of a deal'. Even she had some reservations.

"Come on, Sarah. You're making your old man feel guilty. You want me to cry myself to sleep every night or something?" Jorge puffed up his lip and blinked as if he was forcing back mock tears, which only made Sarah giggle.

"All right, all right... but you'd better not forget to call! If you're even an hour late I'll wring you out to dry!" Sarah's pouty expression faded and was replaced with a more jovial one, but everyone still felt rather down in the dumps about the whole scenario.

"Officer Gutierrez." A man walked up to the small family and smiled brightly, causing Amy to catch her breath as she looked him in the eyes.

"Supreme Commander?" Jorge stood at attention quickly, as did his wife. Saluting in this context was unnecessary, but in his presence, formality was desirable.

"Not quite. I'm J2-40, one of the Supreme Commander's clones. Specifically, I'll be joining you on your voyage to Revival. I'm not going in a command capacity though, I'm merely there for support reasons. I do hope we'll get to know each other, though."

Jorge nodded and spread a stiff smile across his face. "I feel the same way... sir. Err, what should I call you?"

"Technically my name is the same as the Supreme Commander's, but I am my own person. The other clones call me Hawkeye, so that will do. If you want to keep the relationship formal, Officer Hawkeye is fine by me." The clone of Jason's smiled again as he beckoned towards the ship. "In any case, we're all ready to go when you are."

"I'll be right there, sir." Jorge waved politely as Hawkeye walked away, before turning back to his wife and daughter. "All right. Stay safe, don't have too much fun without me, and make sure to eat your vegetables."

Sarah's smile had dissipated again and tears were in her eyes. Amy likewise was feeling pangs of sadness already, but she managed to keep those hidden. "Love you, dad. Go make history... okay?"

Amy leaned forwards and gave her husband one last kiss and hug, both of them drawing it out for several seconds as their daughter awkwardly shuffled her feet and averted her eyes. Jorge finished and leaned down to hug his daughter one last time, giving her a quick peck on the cheek.

"I'm off. I'll call you once we've hit warp speed."

The women waved goodbye as he quickly walked over to the teleporter pad that had been set up, a faint smile on his face as he returned the wave.

A moment later, he was gone.

Amy and Sarah stared at the pad for several moments, both of them secretly hoping he'd beam back down and declare it was all a mistake.

Sarah finally broke the silence, swallowing hard, as she quickly rubbed her eyes on her shirt's shoulder. "Well, he's gone."

"Yeah." Amy mumbled with less heart than she had intended to, but words escaped her.

"Let's go to church."

"That sounds fine."

The two of them turned and walked away. Now, Jorge's fate would be in the hands of the gods.

"You think I'm ready to start using it in real combat?"

I aim my question at Arthur, and he shrugs.

"I thought you were ready a decade ago. You keep asking me, and my response is always yes. I don't see why you can't just use Excalibur like any normal weapon. In the end, it is just a sword, and you are its master. Stop treating it like some hallowed object reserved only for sacred occasions."

My face stings from his verbal assault, but I keep up a stern expression. I swing my mental image of Excalibur at the massive stone Golem before me, cleaving it in two with little effort, its massive body smashing into the ground with a thunderous crash. The effort taken feels quite negligible.

"I can't tell if I've become more adept at using the sword, or merely better at focusing my mental energy in this dreamworld. Am I swinging the sword harder, or merely perceiving the illusion of the beings that I fight as not truly being there, making the effort required to best them negligible?"

Arthur does a hand-stand, using only his left hand to lift himself up while he swings his own image of Excalibur around wildly, probably as some crazy feat of balance. "It's a mixture of both, I'd assume. You are becoming more adept at using the sword, yes, but your own mastery of mental visualizations is helping too. There is, however, something else at work here."

I wait patiently, but he doesn't elaborate. Apparently he's playing the pronoun game. "What is it?"

"Your inner power levels. They have gone up substantially since when I first met you. Any idea why?"

I shrug. "Maybe I'm like Superman. I'm absorbing the light of the yellow sun."

Arthur shrugs. "I don't know who he is, but that is incorrect. No, but I do believe that you are slowly absorbing some of Excalibur's energy, or perhaps my own. At your current rate of absorption, of course, it would take you millions of years to reach my level, but it's still an interesting feat."

"Huh." I throw my hands up in the air. "Absorbing spiritual energy, huh? I've killed a lot of demons to date. Do you think if I absorbed their energy when I killed them, it would make me more powerful?"

Arthur drops from his hand-standing position and rolls into a standing position in one smooth movement. The timing was so perfect that I feel envy surge in my veins. "That is an excellent idea. However, short of absorbing Satan himself or some high ranking demon, none of the small fry will do much, if anything for you. Also, there's the matter of their demonic energy versus your heroic energy. It might be similar to swilling Hemlock eagerly. I would advise testing the effects of demonic energy on your body before doing any of that absorbing business."

Arthur's expression is totally neutral, despite the crazy gymnastics he had just been doing. His body is quite durable, and his endurance seems to be almost unlimited. This is what peak performance looks like... he isn't even breathing harder than usual.

"Poison... yeah, you're probably right. Still, what if I managed to defeat Satan and absorb his energy? Think of the energy increase I'd get. And what about his abilities? He has so many... maybe I could take them for myself?"

"Possibly. Then again, do you really need them? Whatever his abilities are, yours should surpass them in every way. You know what they say about coveting the goods another person possesses... it will eat you alive."

Arthur summons a massive fire dragon, the first one he had me fight many years ago when he wanted to test my abilities. I easily cut it down in a matter of seconds, my body moving swift like the wind as I sever its head from its body, then split the head in two with another swing.

A few moments later, I land on the ground and turn back to him. "You're probably right. I can't imagine he was being serious when we last fought, but if he ran away out of fear that would lend credibility to the idea that he was unable to beat me. If he ran because I wasn't a challenge, then that wouldn't make much sense. Still, quite some time has passed. He might have improved, in much the same way as I have."

"Satan is the only being other than Amelia that I genuinely fear. You have spoken about the Volgrim leader, Unarin, before... but he seems to me like a small fry. Satan is a terrible evil, a blight upon this world. I would have once said the same of Amelia, but perhaps you have tamed the beast inside of her. As for Satan though, he not only possesses immense spiritual energy and an arsenal of powers that I can't even comprehend, he is also the leader of billions, possibly trillions of demons. If he sought to completely overrun the world with demons, he very likely would win in a week."

My mouth feels dry. "If Satan has the capability to wipe out humanity and take over the Earth in one week... why hasn't he?"

"I don't think he can anymore, or perhaps he can but he's not certain of his capabilities. He has faced you in combat, he knows how your Wordsmithing works... and he also knows of your tens of thousands of clones. Killing you isn't enough, since any clone can take your place. Even if he surges his demons onto Earth, you might be able to exterminate them, by literally saying the word 'exterminate'. A single word could spell the end of his entire species. That is a frightening proposition for any leader."

"Yeah... no person wants to be the one in charge when a calamity occurs. They inevitably take the full blame for it." I pause, remembering what happened with Beatrix and how Stonewall used the Christmas Day Massacres against her, blaming her for everything. Some things simply never change...

"Cheh. Tell me about it." Arthur rolls his eyes flippantly. "The peasants of the world simply have no clue how difficult it is to lead a mass of poorly educated people, and worse still, if you educate them, they suddenly think they have all the answers! It makes your job even harder! Truly a lose-lose situation."

"You said it." My thoughts roll back again to Beatrix and how casually the people of the world elected a man who so flippantly stole their rights away. The demagoguery he used turned what could have been an educated populace into a bunch of fearful idiots.

Beatrix... she's living on Mars now, apparently. She long ago renounced her official duties, unable to return in any political form after her humiliating loss to Stonewall. I should speak with her some time.

Several moments pass as Arthur and I stare up at the sun and the clouds passing overhead. He finally speaks up. "How are things going with Amelia?"

"Very well. She's working in a hospital now, using her abilities to heal people. So long as my designated clones give her energy every day, she has zero negative side effects. Also, I took her advice and sent ten thousand clones to Earth to work on improvements for humanity's livelihood. I'm hoping to move away from generic currency towards something more like universal basic income, or away from currency entirely. Replicators can make everything we need, so currency seems pointless."

"Many a king has gone to war and led millions of his men to their deaths, all in pursuit of gold. Truly, money is the work of the demons. Eradicating it from society can only improve the lives of those no longer bound by its constraints. If nothing else, I support this measure." Arthur chuckles wryly to himself.

"What's so funny?"

He itches under his eye for a moment, a broad grin spreading across his face. "The lost city of El-Dorado. I found it, actually... and I destroyed it. It really was a city of gold. It seems you're bound to follow in my footsteps even in the most menial ways."

"True, that." I glance down at my wrist, only to realize I'm not wearing a watch. It wouldn't work in this world anyway. "Anyway, I need to go. We'll talk again, Arthur."

"Sure thing. Just don't forget me... it can be quite boring in here." Arthur conjured a tasteless apple and bit into it, forcing a lonely smile across his face. "I'll just be sitting here... playing chess by myself."

"You're going to make me throw up with all of this guilt-tripping."

"Good." His smile becomes genuine as I will myself to leave.

The world turns to white as I slowly return back to reality.

Part 345a: Pokerface

"Humans suck. Ah hope they all die." Torlok grumbled as he sat at the same table as a few of the other demons, the four of them playing a game of poker. He curled his lip in disgust as he looked at his hand and the cards on the table. "Call."

The Animus across from him chuckled as he laid a full house on the table. "You lose, moron! You have the worst poker face of anyone here!" Resembling a black-skinned human, his body was tattooed with various images of gruesome torture and violence. His stature was small and lithe, but he was also deceptively strong. More importantly, he was of relatively high intelligence, even among middle-tiered demons.

"Fuck! Fifth time in a row!" Torlok resisted the urge to smash the table as he shoved his pile of bones over to the other demon. These were mock poker chips they used for betting, but they held no inherent value. Poker was merely one way to stymie the boredom of living in an underground sewer base. "You ain't sneakin' cards up yer sleeve, are ya, Smealum?"

"Don't need to, when you're the worst bluffer this side of the portal." Smealum flicked his nose lightly at Torlok, an insulting gesture that generally was used to represent fornicating with goblins... the ugliest of demons.

"Keh... at least I ain't lookin' like my face is 'sposed to be wiped on toilet paper." Torlok tittered to himself as the other demons at the table roared with laughter at their friendly banter, though Smealum didn't seem to think it was very funny.

After a few moments, Torlok turned to his right. "Yo, Davook. You gonna join us or what? Four demons ain't enough fer a good game o' poker."

Davook, ever the entrepreneurial demon, was grimacing at a small pile of paperwork that sat on the desk in front of him as he read through it carefully. "You doofuses play your stupid games. I've got real work here. Don't you even care about the attacks on our kind?"

Torlok's smile faded away. "Yeah. Like ah said, humans are the worst. They're all so preachy 'n uptight, but in the end they're monsters just like us. Still, ain't much one weak little shadow-walker kin' do about it. Best to just leave it to them demons at the top."

"That kind of thinking won't help us at all. Four nuclear detonations happened in the labyrinth this week. Each time, we were powerless to stop them. We lost billions of good soldiers. If everyone thought like you, we'd all just have to roll over and die."

Davook glanced over at the table of demons playing cards, their smiles and laughter gone now as they all stared vacantly at the bones in front of them.

"Yeah, you're right." Smealum spoke up quietly as he rested his hands on the table, tapping his fingers together thoughtfully. "But like he said, if Satan can't do anything about it, what are we supposed to do? We're just underclass demons. You're the strongest of all of us, Davook, maybe the smartest too... and I doubt even you could go toe-to-toe with one of those suited clones the humans are using. They're just too strong. The nukes are hardly the tip of the iceberg."

Torlok bobbed his head along as he listened. "Can't even hide from 'em. They got those sensors that kin' see us even when we're totally cloaked now. We're just lucky Satan holed us up down in this here sewer."

"Hmm. Indeed." Davook flicked through a casualty report on the most recent detonation. Twenty-five million incinerated in an instant, and the radioactive fallout yield had tripled from the previous attack. The humans were fighting dirty. Sixty million demons had been infected with radioactive particles, something that wouldn't affect the highest ranked demons, given their highly enhanced bodies and upper-level regenerative powers. But the lower demons had no such internal defenses and were wracked with all manner of ailments. "It's a slaughter out there. This isn't even like when we fought the angels. At least we won due to sheer numbers. It was a battle of equals, so to speak. This is completely unfair, like a child with sticks and stones against an adult with a tank."

"Come on, Davook. You should stop reading those reports for a while. They're just depressing you more than you usually are." Smealum reached for the deck of cards and shuffled them absent-mindedly, dealing out five cards to himself and the other three demons at the table. "Sometimes you just need to give it a rest. Take it easy."

"Yeah. You're probably right." Davook set the paper on the table gently as he swept his gaze around the fairly sizable room. A hallway down the back led to their living quarters, while his own room was right off to the side for quick access in case of emergencies. This main room was set up somewhat like a bar, with a big whiteboard for whenever they needed to plan an attack or discuss intelligence given by the demons in command. "Fine, deal me in." Davook sighed as he stood up and sauntered around his desk over to where the other demons sat, pulling a chair out as he eased himself up to a corner, Smealum moving over to make room.

"Now we're talkin'! This gonna be a real good game now!" Torlok grinned widely as Smealum dealt five cards to Davook. "No cheatin' though! I got sharp eyes that even a sneaky shithead like you can't fool!"

"Heh, we'll see about that." Davook smiled and felt his body freeze. Something... something had shifted.

He flicked his eyes around the room. There was a sudden feeling of emptiness in the air, though the others hadn't perceived it yet. It was... it was as if...

Davook quickly stood up, the cards falling from his hand onto the table. Torlok snickered. "Cold feet already?"

"Shut up. I can't sense any energy to the northwest. It might be an anti-magic bubble."

Everyone in the room noted the alarm on his face, as they all quickly stood up. "Humans?" Smealum tried to force a smile but it didn't quite connect. "Th-they can't find us here. We're hidden very well."

"That's not true. Satan warned us that their Supreme Commander has ways of locating anything, if he just knows it exists." Davook blanched as the sensation of emptiness seemed to be moving towards them. "Everyone get to the portal in the back and escape through it. Shut it off until you receive my signal. If you don't receive my signal in five minutes, activate the kill code. Destroy the portal."

"Y-you serious? Alright, boss." Torlok quickly beckoned at the other demons as they all quickly and efficiently made their way to the back. "I'll stay with you, boss. Can't have you hold 'em off alone." Despite his cool and collected words, his voice was laced with fear.

"I can handle them alone. Stay safe, Torlok. You and the others leave." Davook reached to his neck and removed a small pendant, handing it over to the younger demon. "If this light goes out, I'm dead. Whether it does or doesn't, you must continue to destroy the portal in five minutes. You know the drill."

Torlok swallowed as he felt his claws shaking. He reached over and took the small red gem from his boss. "You don't have to stay, boss. You kin' come with us..."

"I can't. If I'm wrong..." Davook felt his heart tremble as the bubble started moving even more quickly towards them. "...never mind, I'm not wrong. Get out of here, dipshit. You're slowing me down."

"Alright, boss." Torlok squeezed his black eyes shut for a moment as emotion overtook him. He quickly straightened himself up and rushed towards the back room, slamming the door behind himself without a second word.

Davook tensed up as he jumped over his desk and yanked a small device out, a single button visible on its surface. "I ain't lettin' them take me alive."

He quickly jumped back over, feeling the bubble was now appearing inside the barrier. They must be right outside the door. Only moments left.

Quickly, he lifted a couch with his huge muscles and propped it up to shield himself from the main entrance. That was when he heard a faint noise from outside.

A moment later, the door blasted off its hinges as a massive explosion surged inside the room, fire drenching everything in sight. Davook screamed a silent scream as the air was sucked from his body. Losing his focus, he dropped the couch and it slammed into the ground with a deep thud. A moment later, he fell to his knees as he wheezed and gasped. Fuckers. Knew they'd fight dirty.

At that moment, several suited humans burst into the room, wading through the inferno at the front door as if it didn't even exist. Davook felt incredible pain in his body as the anti-magic bubble swept over him, draining all the power in his body in an instant. He fell to the ground as all his strength vanished, as if the gravity in the room had increased a hundred-fold.

"Hostile sighted! Device is in hand!" One of the suited humans quickly tilted his helmet towards Davook, his hand still weakly clutching the button. He tried with all his might to press it, but his body wouldn't respond to his thoughts.

I was careless. Davook felt his eyes droop as he waited for the end to come. One of the white-suited humans quickly ran over to him, snatching the device from his hands.

"Not so fast, demon. Seems you're all alone here. One last stand, eh?"

Another human yelled in alarm. "My scanner picked up a massive bomb in the ceiling!"

"Don't worry about it. I bet this is the transmitter right here. He thought he'd catch us in a trap, but it ain't happening today." The human laughed viciously as Davook felt the life leaving his body.

No... oxygen... can't breathe... Davook felt a smile creep across his lips. Even if he couldn't kill the humans, he would die anyway. No intel could be extracted from him, and the fire was already burning up the demon's documents. Humans were so... foolish.

The human nearest him leaned down, his voice tinged with glee. "Bet you think we're gonna let you die, eh, monster? You ain't so lucky. Your nightmare has only just begun."

Bastards. The world faded away as a single tear made its way down Davook's cheek.

Satan nodded to himself as he appeared to receive a mental communication. Marie watched him with feigned disinterest from a distance as he bobbed his head several times. Then, as if the line had been cut, he turned abruptly to face her. "The humans found our base in London. I was just informed by one of the espers in that district."

"Yet another loss. We seem to be suffering a lot of casualties as of late." Marie fanned her fingers out as she glanced down at her nails. She seemed to be unmoved by their deaths, which made Satan's temper flare up.

"I thought you had this under control months ago. You spoke of technology that would allow us to fight on even footing with the humans, yet the energy weapon defensive matrix technology you gave us isn't enough! We don't have enough of the devices to protect our troops, and even if we did, the nukes are wiping us out in ways we can't defend against!"

"Quite the conundrum." She flicked her eyes over towards him. "It's not my problem though. I didn't promise you anything, the other Marie did. Anyway, I'm working on ways we can fight back. You just have to give me time... quite the interesting development happened recently and I'm working out how to turn it to our advantage."

Satan's anger dissolved slightly as he eyed her coldly. "Development? Explain."

She sighed dramatically as she leaned back against the wall and held eye contact with him.

One interesting fact about this mere human was how little she appeared to fear him. Was it false courage, or did she have a way to neutralize him? He just couldn't be sure.

"Well, I didn't really intend to tell you about it for a while until I had the kinks ironed out... but now's as good a time as any. As it happens, the Marie you know did not die. In fact, she was reincarnated as an angel after death and she managed to escape Heaven."

Satan blinked twice before his face contorted into one of rage. "What?! When did you plan to inform me of this?!"

Marie grimaced at his burst of anger. "Calm down, you obstreperous loudmouth. I intended to tell you eventually. What's more important isn't that she is alive and well, but the contact she met in Heaven and she helped flee from that prison. He will be key to destroying the angels and gods."

Satan calmed down slightly, despite the insult she fired at him, as she always tended to do. Honestly, he wasn't sure why he allowed such insolence, but she was the most interesting human he knew. "Who is he?"

"His name is Clarence, and he used to be the leader of the Church of Retribution. His personality was the driving force behind its resurgence, and the reason the angels have become so powerful as of late." Marie paused dramatically as she winked at him. "And now he's dead. The archangel Raphael killed him."

Satan chuckled. "As it turns out, I know him. I recommended him to Zeus and Gabriel as a way to regain their power. His preaching has done them a great service, and me as well."

For once, Marie was the one to be stunned. "What? You recommended him? Why?"

"Come now, that should be obvious. It's a matter of self-preservation. I hate the gods and the gods hate me... but neither one of us can kill each other right now, and if one of us is killed off by the humans, the other will fall next. It's in our own self-interest to maintain the balance of power we used to have in the old days. I'd rather have them remain a threat to the humans and be able to unite with us against humanity if push came to shove."

"That seems... illogical. The gods will never be able to fight humanity. They will never ally with you, either. Their power is merely an addition to the threat leveled against you. Again, as I said, I have a plan to kill them off, so you had better listen." Marie thought back to what he had said about having the gods boost up the Church. It might have seemed smart to him at the time, but she couldn't see why. He truly was an idiot. "At least by boosting up the church, you've made my plan very likely to succeed."

Satan seemed too annoyed by her constant questioning of his abilities to argue about it, so he simply shrugged as he rolled his eyes. "Fine. Tell me about this plan of yours."

Part 346a: Artist

The group of fifty lower-ranked demons stood around in the receiving room, staring at the ground and kicking pebbles absentmindedly. One demon was a noteworthy exception though, as he was blubbering and sobbing incoherently as he clutched a small necklace in one of his hands, the pendant part of it softly pulsing red over and over.

"It's not fair! Why did he hafta stay behind?! Davook was our leader!" Torlok's upper lip trembled as he sobbed violently, the other demons trying to console him but doing a poor job. Honestly, given his normally intimidating shadowy aura created due to his shadow-walker evolution, it was an odd contrast to see him crying like this.

"It's not your fault, Torlok. The boss did what he had to do. He's gone now. We have to move on." Smealum scratched his cheek as he stared down at the inconsolable demon sitting on a tiny stool. "You can't let his death get to you."

"He ain't dead though!" Torlok quickly jerked his head up, tears and snot dripping down his face from all his orifices. It made several demons take a step back in disgust, as they generally weren't used to dealing with such strong emotions. "Look! He left his glowy jewel thing with me! As long as it glows red, he's alive!"

He held the pendant up in the air and Smealum raised an eyebrow in disbelief. "How can that little thing know he's alive? It doesn't make any sense."

"I dunno... I ain't smart like the boss was..." Torlok lowered his hand back down and stared at it as he wiped his eyes again.

"It's probably some kind o' heart monitor. Yeap, the humans have used 'em in covert operations, yessir. When the soldier dies, command knows instantly." One of the nearby goblins spoke up, his voice way too chipper for this time of the day and all the sadness evident around him. "I'd bet my broodmother's next batch on it, you can take that to the bunker!"

Smealum shrugged. "I guess it might work that way. If it can really detect his life energy or whatever, it must be magic based though. No way it would work through dimensional rifts using human technology."

Torlok stood up quickly, his sadness melting away at a ridiculous speed. "Ya really mean it? The boss is alive?"

"Yeap. Well, maybe. Truth be told I ain't fermiliar 'bout that human tech, and even the magical stuff's above my rank. Us Goblin's ain't got much o' the magical stuff in us, no sir."

Torlok nodded enthusiastically. "Wowie! Th-then that means... we could rescue him!"

Smealum's look of disbelief returned instantly with a vengeance. "No way. Absolutely not. If the humans took him, they probably took him to a facility for interrogation. He's probably locked down better than Satan's asshole. No way we're going to be able to find him, let alone rescue him."

Without really even listening, Torlok nodded enthusiastically. "No no, don't ya see?! We're too weak, but the big boss demons ain't! I'm gonna go ask one right now!"

"Wait, what? Come again?" Smealum started to interject but Torlok was already jerking his head around, looking for one of the arch-demons in the area, or possibly an actual Devil. "A couple ought ta' do it. We just gotta find one or two dumb enough to help us out!"

Smealum sighed as he felt himself breathing a little easier. "Oh, good. Nobody would be stupid enough to do that. You're the only idiot who would actually consider it a possibility."

Smealum had hardly finished speaking when Torlok charged off, leaving the group behind. "I'll be back! Gonna go ask some folks if they wanna help us! Be back in a jiffy!"

The other demons gawked as he strode away. The goblin from earlier snickered to himself as he scratched his chin. "Ain't no way that moron's gonna make it. No sir, he's gonna get the shit kicked out of him when he bothers the wrong devil, or my name ain't Skippy!"

Smealum glanced over at him. "A goblin named Skippy? Who named you?"

The goblin shrugged. "I named myself, kiddo. Named me after my favorite brand of peanut butter! Yum!"

Smealum slowly turned and started walking after Torlok. "I'm surrounded by idiots."

Davook felt his eyes opening, but he didn't recall telling them to do that. What a dream... that was the deepest sleep I've ever had in my life.

He blinked slowly, staring ahead in confusion. He appeared to be laying flat on his back, and he couldn't seem to move a muscle. The ceiling above him was brown and dingy, covered in blotchy water-spots from leaks... or something. He tried to lift his head but something kept preventing him from moving.

The memories came flooding back in a rush. A bomb. The humans. An attack.

"Well well, looks like our guest is awake." Davook felt his body tense up and he squinted hard as a bright light suddenly appeared directly above his head. It moved around erratically and it was connected to some long... arm? Yes, it was an arm. An arm holding a flashlight.

"Wha... what... where am I?" Davook spoke up but he couldn't move his mouth properly and his words were somewhat slurred, as if he were being doped with drugs.

"I ask the questions, filth. Welcome to the Peeler. I'm sure the scum among your kind have heard about it." The voice was a male's... very deep and sure of himself, as if he could possibly hold a candle to Davook's might. "Don't bother moving around, you'll just hurt yourself. Well, you can if you want... it'll give me a nice laugh anyway."

"The... Peeler?" Davook searched his memory. He'd heard of it, even joked about it with the other demons, but nobody knew what it really was. Just a story told by crazed demons who had escaped... or been let go. They never spoke normally after their return to the labyrinth. Inevitably they were culled due to their weakness and inability to reintegrate with their kind, plus the possibility they might be spying for the humans.

"I didn't stutter." A massive human loomed over him suddenly, his body built like a Minotaur's. He appeared to be Japanese, but spoke fluent English, as if it was his first language. He wore a simple button-down grey dress shirt and big coke-bottle glasses, as if he were a caricature from a human cartoon series. "What is your name, demon?"

"Like I'd tell you anything." Davook sneered at the massive man. Certainly, he was totally helpless, but he wouldn't let his dignity be taken from him without a fight.

"Cute. I like that spirit. Most demons are too easy, and I've operated on hundreds. You're my first shadow-walker though... I'm curious as to how your physiology differs from my favorite subjects." The massive Asian stepped away, his heavy leather shoes plodding against what sounded like wet pavement. "Not too long ago, we managed to capture an incredibly beautiful succubus female. Her screams still ring in my ears. And once I have a demon down here, nobody bothers me while I do my business. I sell the films for ridiculous amounts of money. People have a real hate-boner for your kind."

The man walked back, holding a photo of a badly mutilated corpse, a smile tugging at the corner of his lips. "Nerissa was such a sweet girl, the way she begged me to stop made me want to unbind her. But I'm a professional, so of course I didn't. I like to go look at her grave sometimes... for fun."

Davook blanched at the horrific image before him, the female demon's head and limbs separated from her torso and tied loosely to a table with blood covering everything. He bit his lip as he fought back a gag reflex that threatened to bubble up and shoot from his mouth. "Y-you're horrible. What kind of monster are you?!"

"Monster? All demons say the same thing, it seems. They can't seem to understand the full story. I'm not a monster for dissecting an animal. I'm not a monster for getting revenge on behalf of all the humans your kind have killed. I'm a human, and you're all animals that belong in a blender. That's the difference between humans and demons. Irreconcilable differences."

The man walked away again, out of Davook's sight. For a moment, he seemed to sigh contentedly as Davook listened and heard the sound of him gently rubbing the photograph in his hands. "I can only hope you'll give me half the pleasure she did. Novelty is the best I can hope for, these days."

Davook swallowed quietly, making sure the human couldn't hear him. "What... what are you planning?"

"Oh, come now... why spoil the fun? Are you the sort of pest that asks others like you how the movie ends before you watch it? No, probably not... you're all too dim to understand even basic human technology. You rely on manipulating blood for your human sacrifices in order to appease dark gods... the source of your power is truly unfathomable."

Davook scrunched up his face at that comment. "What? We don't do anything like that. Why do you torture and slander my people? Where are you getting these twisted ideas?"

"Twisted ideas? The only twisted thing here is that of the demons and the havoc they wreak upon humanity. The bible foretold your return to Earth thousands of years ago. Judgement Day, Armageddon, the Rapture... call it what you will, but true believers like me have known of your evil's existence long before the general populace. I'm simply here to document it and do as God tells me to do."

Davook stared up at the ceiling blankly. By the seven Hells, this man is a brainwashed fanatic. I'm doomed.

"Well, in any case, no reason to sit around chit-chatting. I'm sure more demons will be brought to me eventually, and I've got a dinner date with a lovely Miss Mercer in three hours, so I need to do this quickly. You can tell me everything you know right now, or I can get to work showing you why this place is called The Peeler."

Davook sneered at the human off to his side. "I'm not telling you anything. Already said that. You'll have better luck prying open a can of beans with your bare fingers."

"Mmm. I wouldn't be so sure." The man's feet shifted as he stepped back over to what was likely a desk of some sort, as Davook heard the unmistakable clinking of metal on metal. "Well then, seems you and I are going to be getting intimately acquainted."

He walked back over, holding a small, razor sharp scalpel in his hands. "Ever wondered what it would feel like if the skin was ripped off your body in small patches, followed up by rapid healing and then being ripped off again, over and over?"

Davook forced out a nervous smile. "N-no. Can't say I have."

"That's too bad. You're going to find out, monster. Let's go ahead and play around a bit."

Davook bit his lip hard as the scalpel gently sliced into his triceps. I won't let this one break me.

"All of them?" I raise an eyebrow at her statement. "You healed literally everyone in the Northern London Metro area?"

Amelia shrugs as she squishes a stress ball in her hands. She seems to be playing with it like it's some kind of little toy, not like she's stressed out or anything. "Just the people in those three hospitals." She leaned back against the wall outside of her patient's room. "This hospital is for military personnel though, and they always have the worst wounds. It might take longer than usual to heal all the people here."

"It's only been a couple weeks though. This is a crazy speed, Amelia! You should be proud of yourself."

She smiles sincerely. "I am, Jason. I helped a lot of people. But there are more to help, and you still haven't given me clones to help out with the healing."

"Oh. Sorry." I feel my cheeks flare up slightly. "I forgot. I'm having my clones comb over records to try and sort out the mess that Stonewall and Ben left behind, as well as going all over the place downtown to get a feel for the city's temperament. They are all disguised though, none of them look like me. I doubt even you would be able to tell."

Amelia's smile fades away slightly. "Are you disguised?"

The question takes me aback as I feel my feet shift away from her slightly. "What?"

"A disguise. Is that what you really look like? Do you look like you used to when you were thirty, or do you look dramatically different now?"

I frown as I try to figure out what she's getting at. "I've shifted my looks several times, but I always revert back to my original form after the disguise has accomplished its goal."

"Are you sure? How do you determine what you looked like?" Amelia keeps firing questions at me as she pulls away from the wall and searches my face for answers.

"I just go by memory, I guess. I might look a little different but..." I pause as a lightbulb goes off in my head. "Actually, I could just wordsmith 'remember' and I'd remember what I looked like as a youth or at any age and I'd remember it perfectly. Heck I might even be able to..." I paused as I flicked my eyes around the room. "Hmm, I'll need an easel, some paintbrushes, and something to draw on."

Amelia stares at me silently for a moment. "Why don't you just summon that stuff with Wordsmithing?"

I blink in surprise. "Oh, right. Of course."

"You can be super dumb sometimes."

"I know."

I quickly pull her away as we walk into a deserted waiting room, all the other guests gone for now as visiting hours are coming to a close soon. " Create. Create. Create. " I mentally imagine a set of watercolor paintbrushes, an easel, and a pad of paper. " Remember. Learn. " A few moments later, I can perfectly remember every contour of my face from when I was a youth, and I have instantly mastered the art of painting to a ridiculous degree. "Give me a minute, if you please."

Amelia nods as she and I sit beside each other in two adjacent chairs, the easel and paper in front of me as I begin to move my hands. " SPEED! Perception! "

I blink as the world around me slows to a crawl, shutting my eyes for what feels like several minutes but likely was a single millisecond in the outside world. When I open my eyes, my hands begin to move at unthinkable speeds. I don't even know how they're doing it, but it's the most incredible sight I've ever seen. It's like a tornado is forming in front of me, and a picture is emerging from the chaos. Amidst the chaos, I spare a millisecond to glance at Amelia. She was looking downwards when I started, and her head is slowly raising up to look at the perfect image of myself in my teens.

A few seconds later, my hands halt entirely of my own accord, and the most incredible portrait I've ever seen has magically formed before my eyes. It's so photorealistic I almost feel that I'm looking at a reflection of myself in a mirror. I can't help but gawk at how incredible it is, and how in the span of a few real-world seconds I managed to create a masterpiece that even machine digital imaging would be hard pressed to compete with.

After I return myself to normal speeds and time accelerates to meet up with me, Amelia jerks her head back in astonishment. "Did... did you just paint that in like, three seconds?"

"Felt like a minute to me... but yes."

Amelia reaches her hand up and comically closes her gaping mouth as she stares at the image for a few long moments. "I've never seen anything like that before. There was just a sound like a small jet engine, then I noticed a weird blurry movement, and by the time I realized what was going on, the painting had just appeared. Did you really paint this?"

"Mhm. I barely even understand how I did it... but I did it."

Amelia quickly looks from the painting to me, and back to the painting again. "Well, it's close. Your nose was a bit smaller when you were younger, and your cheekbones were less pronounced... plus you have that shaved stubble now."

"I cheat, actually. I just use wordsmithing to get rid of my facial hair every morning. I could remove it permanently but I'd prefer not to. It's not a big deal."

She and I share a moment as we smile at each other. Our time together is interrupted as my ears pick up the sound of several boots slowly making their way down the hall.

I glance over in the direction of the hallway and Amelia follows my gaze, as several men in military uniforms slowly amble from the inside of the building towards the exit, laughing and talking with one another.

"It was ruthless, my man! He was scared shitless!"

"We put the fear of god in him. All for the better though, they need to be reminded what fear is about." The bigger man in front chuckles to himself as the other men keep their own laughter muted.

They start to walk past us, but one of the men halts as he glances at me for a moment. "Hey, ain't you the Supreme Commander?"

I stand up and smile at him. "That's correct, soldier. Jason Hiro. You've got good eyes."

He quickly jerks his hand up and salutes me awkwardly. "A pleasure having you in charge, sir! I'm Bubba, and this is Squid on my left and Tomahawk on my right."

I almost want to ask him why they're using their military nicknames, but I shrug it off. They're probably super used to those names by now. "Pleasure to meet you guys. I'm just here with my fiancée." I beckon down at Amelia and she quickly stands and smiles at them. All three of the guys go comically red in the face.

"Shucks, it's true what they say about powerful men. They always got a powerful woman hiding in the shadows! A pleasure to meet ya, miss!"

All three men smile at her jovially as they turn to me. Bubba's the one who decides to tell me all about his day. "We just got back from a surgical strike. We took out a demon base right here underneath the city, then we secured the perimeter!"

"Yeah, but all we got for it was one lousy shadow-walker. Slim pickings." Squid rolls his eyes as his smile is replaced with a grimace. "The rest of the bastards escaped through their portal and severed the link. Almost caught us in a bomb after all of that."

I nod at them. "I heard about the operation. You guys did a good job. Actually, weren't you guys wearing those Hypersuits? I thought we brought them back?"

"You did, and we were." Squid smiles again, and I notice he has a shiny gold tooth in his mouth. Seems those haven't gone out of style in the last hundred years. "Saved our asses, too. Fuckin' Old Yeller almost destroyed everything in the office. Hell, we almost lost the shadow-walker too. All their documents got burned so we couldn't figure out what their operations were or what they were planning."

"We shut them down. Good enough for me." Tomahawk chuckles to himself as he slugs Squid in the arm playfully. "Don't beat yourself up over it. He's in the Peeler now. We'll find out about their plans, one way or another."

I cock an eyebrow at that statement. "The Peeler?"

"You don't know?" Bubba shoots me a quizzical glance. "Sheit, I thought the Supreme Commander would know all 'bout that place! It's an interrogation facility for demons. It's how we always get intel on them. That shadow-walker was the highest ranked one we ever captured though. I'm sure he's got all sorts of secrets he's hiding."

Squid glances to me and then to Amelia before nudging Bubba forwards. "All right, we're keeping the man and his lady apart. Let's get a move on, chatty Cathy."

I smile at all three of them as they wave at me and start to walk away. "Thanks for your service, boys. Good men like you help protect the morality of civilization."

Bubba snickers as he walks away. "I like you. You'll make for a fine Supreme Commander."

As the three of them walk away, I turn back to Amelia to see her smile is gone as she stares after those men. "The 'Peeler'. It sounds awful."

"Aw, c'mon. It's just a scary name to intimidate people. You think they slowly peel the skin off people in the same way we take the skin off an orange?"

Amelia's face contorts into an expression of disgust. "That's truly vile, Jason. I certainly hope they don't do anything like that."

"If it makes you feel better, I could have a clone look into it."

"Whatever. Suit yourself." Amelia shrugs as she turns to the side and carefully peels my painting off the easel I put it on. "I'm going to put this in my room. Hope you don't mind."

"Huh? What for?"

Amelia blushes as she looks away from me. "A l-lady has her reasons, Jason. Don't ask questions you don't want the answer to."

I just shrug dumbly at her. "Hey, suit yourself. Hope you enjoy it."

She swallows heavily and I can't help but think her breathing increases in tempo slightly.
"Don't you worry. I will."

Part 347a:

Diablo stared down at the young demons before him as they wrung their hands together and whimpered. The smell of fear was in the air and they seemed greatly afraid of his reaction to their request.

He scratched his ear and sighed. "Look, I am a reasonable devil, understand? It's not that I can't do it... I'm just not interested. I don't care about the life of some small fry."

The small shadow-walker in front of him... Torgrok or something rather... he seemed greatly upset by Diablo's response. "Ahm sorry, mister Diablo, sir... Mah friend is just in trouble, ya know? H-he was our leader! He stayed behind to save our lives! W-we can't just let him be killed!"

"It's not my problem. Sorry, but I'm not sorry." Diablo raised his hand and silenced the younger demon with a groan as he rubbed his forehead. "This Davook guy was, at best, a mid level demon. Even then, I think he was lower than that. Do you understand how many demons have died of late? The humans' Supreme Commander is ripping us to shreds. I just don't have the personnel to handle such a trifling request."

The smaller demons' ears seemed to lower slightly as his face became crestfallen. "I... I understand..."

Diablo pinched his nose in disgust as he glanced around the hallway around them. Behind himself, the corridor opened into a massive chasm, caused by the detonation of a nuclear weapon only an hour previously. He had only just managed to clean up the radiation in this area when these idiots came to bug him about such a silly request.

"Look, if you really want to rescue him, go do it yourselves. If you fail, you'll have at least tried and you can die with clear consciences. If you succeed, well... that is a great bonus."

Diablo turned away from them and started to walk away, only to nearly run into Bael who had just appeared in the hallway heading towards the site of the recent detonation.

"Heh, what's shakin', boss?" Bael, absurdly overconfident as ever, towered over Diablo, his frame barely fitting inside the hallway. His favorite weapon, a spiked flail made of demonsteel, was wrapped around his body and the spiky head was draped over his shoulder with the dangerous part resting against his back. He was easily the most intimidating demon that lived among the four Emperors.

"Ah, Bael. It's nothing important." Diablo cast a cursory glance at the two younger demons that stood behind him, the two of them staring at the devils with sad expressions across their faces. "These two were bothering me with a rather mundane request. Their friend was taken by the humans and they want to rescue him."

Bael sneered as Diablo edged past him and headed towards the detonation site. "Cheh, don't you care about the lives of your underlings? They're making a passionate request! You should help them!"

Diablo shrugged as he steeled himself to jump down into the shaft. "Not my problem. Besides, going around humans with their anti-energy weapons is dangerous, even for a devil Emperor."

Diablo vanished a moment later as he leaped down into the shaft, leaving Bael to turn back and stare at the two demons before him. "Dangerous, huh? What'd your idiot friend get himself caught up in?"

Torlok started to speak, but Smealum hushed him, realizing the idiot might say the wrong thing. "We were part of the underground base in London. Davook was our boss, and he had us escape while he held off the humans. We know he was taken alive, because..." Smealum nudged Torlok and he quickly rustled in his pockets to procure the pendant that was glowing red. "...this necklace only glows if he's alive. We suspect the humans are interrogating him... or worse."

Bael nodded slowly. "Hm. Hm. That sounds like it sucks. Well, good on you for trying to rescue him. I respect that! So few demons these days have any honor! I hope your search goes well."

Bael started to turn away but paused as he heard Torlok sigh behind him. "See? Told you nobody was gonna help us. It's just too dangerous."

The massive devil quickly whipped his head back around. "What?! Are you actually implying that I'm scared? Get real!"

Torlok whimpered as he pulled his head back slightly from Bael's outburst. "Ah, sorry m-mister Bael, sir. Didn't mean no disrespect by it!"

"Right. Of course you didn't." Bael quickly wiped at his nose, sniffing silently as he glared down at the two demons. "Let's say I did decide to help you weaklings out. Do you even know where he's at?"

Smealum and Torlok slowly bowed their heads as shame overcame them.

"Right. You don't know where he is, only that humans took him and he's alive. Great job, idiots! You guys will make upper management someday for sure!" Bael slid sarcasm off his long forked tongue effortlessly as he berated the Animus and Shadow-walker in front of him. "Good thing for you two idiots... I happen to know where they might be keeping him."

Torlok was the first to yank his head up as happiness surged from his body. "Do ya really?! Are ya gonna help us find 'im?!"

"Well... truth be told, I've got better things to do... but if I'm right, you're not joking about the danger. He's probably in The Peeler. I had to go there once to recover a body... it was not pleasant business. I ain't sure who runs the place, but that location is nasty and riddled with humans."

Bael and Torlok stared into each other's eyes for a moment, a sort of kinship forming between them. Smealum blanched as he realized what was happening. I can't believe it. We found a devil idiotic enough to help us out.

"You're gonna help us?! Wow! I'm gonna owe you a life debt, mister Bael sir! I'll do anything you ask of me for the rest of your life, no matter what!" Torlok blubbered and nodded enthusiastically as Bael merely chuckled.

"Cheh, I'm the third highest ranking demon in the labyrinth... you'd have to do what I say anyway. Don't get ahead of yourself. I've got to help Diablo finish cleaning up this mess from earlier first. After that, we can move out. I'm hoping we can get there by tomorrow at the latest... I also need to gear up first... charging into human territory is always dangerous." Bael paused, a thin smile spreading across his face. "Well, for a weaker demon, anyway. Anti-energy weapons have less effect on me."

Smealum raised an eyebrow at that statement. "What do you mean by that?"

"You'll see, kid." Bael snickered to himself at a joke the two of them didn't understand.

"No disrespect meant, but my name is 'Smealum', not 'kid'. And this dummy is Torlok." Smealum gestured at his companion as he spoke. "I figured we should get to know each other if we're going to work together."

Bael rolled his eyes as he turned around and started walking towards the bombing site. "Like I give a shit what your names are."

* * *

The smell of blood was making his throat dry up as the hours went on. The Japanese man hadn't come back yet, so Davook was wrestling mightily with his cuffs as he struggled to break free. His left arm wasn't very strong anymore, though he couldn't quite make out the condition of it now. One thing was for sure... it hurt. It hurt like hell.

Davook was putting most of his effort into his right arm, which was clamped tightly to his side. Every time he struggled, a jolt of anti-energy was delivered to his neck, causing him to yelp in pain, but still he persevered. I won't let this filthy human take my will to fight.

His left arm screamed in pain every now and then, the flesh most likely comprised entirely of scars at this point. He really just wished he could rip it off and regrow it.

As he grunted and groaned, he was beginning to feel the effects of a mental breakdown coming on. Terror from being unable to escape, coupled with the sounds of dripping water and dulled noises from high above him made him feel like his sanity was slipping. He couldn't move his head an inch, so all of his struggling was done via touch, else he'd never be able to escape at all.

Damn, my arms feel so weak. They're going numb.

Davook stopped struggling and took a few deep breaths. After he had calmed down a little bit and the feeling of fire ants in his left arm seemed to dissipate somewhat, he went back to struggling, wincing every time a jolt of energy surged into his spine.

Alas, his efforts were futile, as his blood ran cold at the sound of a door creaking open in the distance and slamming shut a few moments later.

He's back.

Davook felt his resolve crumbling as the thought of the vile torturer returned fresh in his mind. No matter what, though, he couldn't let that man see him struggling. It would only let him know that he was winning.

"I'm back, fiend." The Japanese man's voice sounded off loudly in the dark room, making Davook wince due to its unexpected volume. Davook hadn't even heard him walking across the damp floor this time.

"Great. I was just starting to get lonely." Davook forced a grin across his face as the man chuckled.

"Is that so? Well, I had some business to attend to. Turns out my dinner date was a vapid, annoying female. I left her with the check and came back as quickly as I could. I guess you could say I missed you too." His tone indicated that he was being facetious, something that Davook didn't miss.

"You're just saying that." Despite his calm and collected way of speaking, Davook felt his nerves cracking as he heard the sound of the human's metal tools clinking on his metal trolley.

"Indeed. Well, I have to say the dissection has gone well so far. I've learned a great deal about the way shadow-walkers manage to blend into the shadows. I had thought it was merely magic, but it appears your skin can absorb and dissipate light in small amounts, which can be enhanced via the use of magic. It defies the laws of physics as I know them, but that's what I would expect from a monster... after all." Davook blanched as the human suddenly appeared over him, aiming a small laser at his facial skin as he smiled evilly. "You never did tell me your name, monster. I'll be more gentle today if you extend me the courtesy."

Davook gritted his teeth. Truthfully, he didn't want to give up any information to this human, not even just his name... but if he really would even possibly be a tiny bit gentler... "It's... it's Davook. M-my name is Davook." He bit his lip and quickly spit out something else. "There. I gave you my name. Now tell me yours. I would prefer to at least know the name of my tormentor."

The Japanese man paused as he stared down at the demon on the table before him coldly, looking Davook right in the eyes. "You don't deserve such a courtesy... but I've had a dreadfully boring day so I'll humor you. I am Kenichi. You, however, may call me Master Takano. Understand?"

Davook shifted his head very slightly as he poorly attempted to nod. "Yeah. I get it... Master Takano."

"Good. I like the sound of that. It really puts the master-servant relationship in focus, doesn't it?" Kenichi raised his head up and walked away from the table again, his shoes clacking on the damp concrete floor as he pulled some implement off his cart.

"I'm not your servant. I'm just a victim. A pawn for you to get your rocks off on being tortured." Davook felt his anger flare up at the casual assumption that just for giving out his name, he might give out more information. Not going to happen.

"Both are true, actually. You are my servant, and you are a victim." Kenichi reappeared over Davook again, this time with a needle in hand. "I didn't mention this before, but I have ways of forcing you to talk. This is a truth serum. Not like the ones in the movies, this merely makes you babble uncontrollably... but it will do."

Davook felt his blood chill as Kenichi hovered the needle over his body. "You... you had that all along? Why didn't you... use it?"

"Come now, that wouldn't be very fun, would it? After what your kind did to my family and my people, you can't seriously blame me for dragging this out just a little bit... can you?" Kenichi puffed up his lip in a mock expression of sadness before breaking into a fit of maniacal chuckling. "Hehehe.... you should see the look on your face. It suits you."

Davook grimaced as the needle suddenly plunged downwards, stabbing him directly in his heart. He started to gasp, but his body was spasming uncontrollably and no matter how he wriggled, he couldn't move an inch. A few seconds later, the plunger having injected its chemicals into Davook's body, Kenichi yanked it out of his chest and snickered to himself. "Hurts, doesn't it? I added a few extra chemicals to really make it burn. You won't die, fortunately, but soon you'll wish you had."

Davook tried to speak but could only make choking noises as he suddenly found it hard to breathe.

The human smiled pleasantly at him. "Well, as soon as you're ready, feel free to start talking. I'll record everything."

Davook gagged and choked as tears streamed down his eyes. I want to die. I want to die. Please, devils in hell... let me be released from this torture...

* * *

Amelia sat on the hospital bed, waving her legs back and forth as her patient was escorted out of the room. "Have a great day, Jeremy!"

The old man smiled sincerely back at her as he hobbled forwards on his cane. "You too, sunshine! You've made my stay a pleasant one!"

He left the room a few moments later as Amelia tilted her head back and flopped on the bed, staring up at the sanitized white ceiling above. The room smelled like bleach and ammonia, since the cleaning lady had just scrubbed the bathroom half an hour ago. It was kind of disgusting, but at the same time a smell she had grown used to.

The sun beamed into the hospital room and felt pleasantly warm, the feeling of summer encroaching made her want to go outdoors rather than stay inside all the time.

As if he had heard her thoughts, Leviathan appeared in her mind. Princess, how are you feeling right now?

"Pretty good, I suppose." Amelia fanned her hand out up in the air in front of her face as she stared at her nails for no particular reason. "I just keep thinking... you know... what if disease and death didn't have to happen?"

I don't follow. Leviathan kept his tone neutral as he listened to whatever was on her mind.

"It's just... people like Jeremy get sick and have problems, and it isn't their fault. Wars happen, but it's not their fault either. Why do people have to suffer due to the actions of others?"

Mmm. Leviathan purred to himself as he thought about her question. Such is life. Humans are frail, weak creatures.... yet they always desire conflict. The demons and angels are hardly any better. They all squabble and fight over differences they once held from generations long past, having long since forgotten the original reason they fought in the first place.

"The original reason?" Amelia quickly rose from the bed, jerking herself up in one smooth motion as she stood up and walked over to the window, staring out at the pleasant flower garden a couple stories below her. "What might that be?"

Even I do not know. I was not there for the original conflicts, nor did I care about them. Such small trifles simply did not interest me. I suspect, however, they fought for dominance over the world. Whoever had the most land could spread out their kind over it the most effectively. In the end, it was all just for their own goals.

"It sounds so... selfish." Amelia opened up the window and hopped out of it, falling two stories and landing smoothly without making a sound as she adjusted her nurse outfit to make sure it wasn't tugging in the wrong places. "Why fight over dumb stuff like that? I mean, they have Heaven and the labyrinth, right? They can make all the space they want. There's no reason to fight."

Amelia took off walking as she smiled sweetly at a group of men, all of whom cocked their heads to glance at her with very naughty looks while they walked past. Heaven and the labyrinth did not always exist, princess. Once upon a time, the angels and demons had to share the Earth together. This was a time before the humans arrived.

"Were you there for that?"

Somewhat. As I said before though, I do not recall much of it.

Amelia nodded as she walked along and entered into a pet store, stopping to pet a kitty that walked up to her and meowed. She liked to come here sometimes to clear her mind.

"Actually, Levvy, there's something else..."

What is it?

Amelia picked up the cat and cradled him in her arms, scratching him under the chin in the way he liked it. A few customers milled about looking at rabbits and birds on the other side of the small store. "That demon... when I last talked to Jason, those soldiers said they captured a demon and took him to the... the... The Peeler... it sounds awful..."

Amelia swallowed as she felt Leviathan's eyes narrow in her mind. You're worried about the demon? You've really changed, princess.

"I mean, you know... he's a demon, but still. I keep thinking that maybe we should check on him. Jason doesn't seem to care about the demons at all... not these days, anyway."

Leviathan seemed to shift in her mind as he thought about it. Locating one demon in a city of humans should be rather trivial. I'm not sure why you care, but I could find him for you... if you really want me to.

Amelia set the cat back down as she walked over to a big golden lab that was meandering around the store. As she walked up to him, the dog's lolling tongue retreated into his mouth as he tentatively growled at her.

Amelia took a step back from him apologetically. "Nice doggy... you never do seem to like me. Maybe you sense what I really am, huh, boy?"

She sighed before turning back to walk out of the shop and continue walking down the street again. "Yes, I do want to know where he's located. I just want to see... The Peeler... it sounds so awful..."

Leviathan sighed in her mind. Haah... well, princess, if you must know... give me a moment.

Amelia paused and stared up at a church in the distance as Leviathan seemed to concentrate deeply. A moment later, Amelia took a sharp breath as a small amount of energy surged from her body, traveling in all directions as far as she could see.

Seconds turned into minutes as she took a seat on a bench, before she felt the energy return. It is done. I have located numerous demons all throughout the city, as a matter of fact. They're scattered in clusters here and there, though to what purpose I do not know. There is, however, one demon all by himself, located underground a mile from here.

"Really? You found him?!" Amelia gasped at the thought. "That was so fast! Levvy, you're amazing!"

Of course. Still... this demon is in bad shape. If I didn't know any better I'd say he was... being tortured.

Amelia's amazement fell flat as her emotions returned to a darker neutral expression. "I see. It's as I thought, then. Tell me where he is. I'm going to go pay a visit to him."

That hardly seems necessary, princess. Jason already said he'd send a clone to investigate.

"I know. But... I want to see for myself. I want to see the true face of humanity. Maybe if I can figure out why the humans and demons fight, I can put an end to this war."

Leviathan paused, as is not wanting to contradict her, yet disagreeing with that statement. I wouldn't recommend it. You can't bring a war to an end with some pretty words. Still, I won't stop you. He's being held captive under a hospital, to the northwest. You've been there before, actually. It was the one where Jason painted that image for you.

Amelia turned red at the thought of that portrait. "Oh. Um, right. That one. A-anyway, where is the demon then? Where are they holding him, exactly?"

Underneath, in a cellar or basement of some sort. It's a quiet place, and you'll have no trouble finding it with my help.

Amelia nodded as she stood up quickly. "All right. Let's go, then."

Leviathan hesitated before responding. Ehh, not to contradict you, but your outfit...?

Amelia quickly glanced down, realizing she was still wearing her nurse uniform. "Well, we are going to a hospital. Can't hurt to blend in a little."

Fair enough.

The dragon kept his qualms to himself as she took off walking towards the hospital she had been at only a day before.

"It's crazy to think that he was so close the whole time."

Part 348a: Pretty Monster

"I feel so nervous." Amelia slowly walked into the hospital, noting that there was only one person in the waiting area and a receptionist. The usual hustle and bustle from a week before had been replaced with emptiness and relative silence. Amelia's ears, better than those of a regular human, could detect the nearly inaudible beeping of dialysis machines and such inside of rooms down the hall, but aside from imperceptible breathing sounds, little else stirred the air.

Even the smells were mostly nonexistent. Compared with the noise and activity outside, the hospital felt like a ghost town. Amelia turned right as she entered the door and headed down a hallway that indicated she was heading towards the ER section.

There's nothing to be nervous about. Leviathan grumbled from deep inside of her as he examined the building around them. There must be an entrance to the underground around here. Keep your eyes peeled.

"Right." Amelia swallowed slightly as her feet clicked every time she took a step forwards. Her half-inch white heeled shoes made quite the commotion compared to the deathly silence that filled the building. "W-was it always this quiet here?" She practically whispered, feeling anxious that her voice was making so much noise. She almost felt guilty, as if her voice would disturb the small scattering of patients in nearby rooms.

By most standards... no. I can sense less than fifty humans in this entire complex. Several of them are merely the staff. You've healed up the great majority of the people here.

Amelia nodded as she walked up to an elevator, pressing the button to call it to the ground floor. "Yeah, that makes sense. I don't know why, it just feels so different here from what I remember."

Those are just nerves. Calm yourself, my princess. You have to keep your wits about you. We might be walking into a trap.

Despite the ominous words, Amelia chortled. "A trap? That's cute. I suppose such a thing might exist, but I doubt we've gotten so soft it could do anything to us."

Hmm. Perhaps. Leviathan mused to himself as the door to the elevator opened.

Amelia stepped inside and noted with dismay that they were already on the lowest floor it could go to. "Darn. We'll have to try something else."

Leviathan seemed to nod in her mind as she walked off the elevator and looked around. "Can't you tell where the passageways and stuff are? Find me an access door of some sort."

I can't, my dear. I can sense living energy and its position relative to us, but not inanimate matter. Jason would be better for this sort of thing.

Amelia scowled as she looked around. "Well, forget him. We'll find our own way."

As she stared back and forth, she spotted a man walking towards them from down the hall. He was an older man, probably in his 40's or so, though that could be deceptive with the nano-machines and such these days. His white lab coat held a name card that indicated he was a surgeon on this floor.

"Err, um, excuse me!" Amelia meandered towards him, her heels clicking on the floor as she walked. "Sir!"

The man looked up from a datapad he was typing on in his hands. "Hm? What is it, young lady?" His expression was that of a vaguely bored man, yet there seemed to be some agitation visible on his face. "I'm quite busy right now."

"Oh, sorry to bother you." Amelia quickly shifted her expression to an apologetic one. Glancing forwards she quickly scanned his name tag. "Could you, ah, help me, Mister Takano, sir? I'm trying to find an access door to the lower levels."

The man's eyes shifted slightly as he seemed to stare at her with more interest. "The lower levels? I can't see why you'd want to go down there. It's quite filthy, not the place for a pretty little thing like you."

His eyes seemed to rove all over her body, a feeling that made Amelia vaguely uncomfortable. "I'm, ah, not worried about germs or anything! I just need to find an access door, if you can... err... help me?"

She forced a flirty smile across her face, even though his eyes seemed almost lascivious. Smiling at him and encouraging any sort of advance almost made her feel nauseous, but still she kept it up valiantly.

"I see. Well, if you want to go there so badly, I won't stop you." Oddly, despite his slight hostility towards the idea of her going down there before, he seemed perfectly fine with the idea now. "It's down the hall and to the left. There's a janitorial closet with a red switch. Press the switch and the door will unlock."

Amelia started to respond but he leaned forwards slowly and interrupted her. "Are you, perhaps, here to make a deposit?"

She felt unnerved by his words but decided to play along. "Y-yes, actually. I am."

"I understand. The caretaker will be there to greet you when you arrive." Doctor Takano smiled at her politely and bowed his head, as his Japanese heritage seemed to indicate he would do. "Have a pleasant day, miss...?"

"Greyheart. Amelia Greyheart." She forced another smile through as he quickly started walking past.

"Excellent. A pleasure to meet you. That uniform really suits you well." Doctor Takano continued walking down the hall towards the hospital entrance and soon he was out of sight.

The moment he vanished from view, Amelia felt her knees start to shake as she leaned against the wall. "Th-that man... he was... scary..."

For once, Leviathan was the one to express confusion. Are you alright, princess? He seemed relatively normal to me. You appear to be very shaken up.

Amelia felt her face pale as a cold sweat swept over her. "No... no his eyes... those weren't normal eyes... Levvy, remember all the... the people we killed? They used to scream in terror and... they said my eyes were hollow... the eyes of a demon."

Mmm. Yes. As I recall, you always laughed at that comment.

"I'm not kidding, Levvy. That man wasn't human. Something about him was off, very askew. Maybe this was a mistake."

Leviathan sighed in her mind. As I said before, you don't have to do this. Ask Jason for help. Going alone into possible danger is never a good idea... even if I can protect you.

The mention of Jason's name made Amelia flinch, as she quickly found her resolve returning. "No... I won't ask him for help. He thinks of me as weak and helpless. He'd never say it, but I can see it in how he talks to me. He means well, but I can fight in my own way. I'm going to find that demon... and I'm going to save him."

Leviathan raised an eyebrow slowly. ...Really? I didn't think you would declare your intention so strongly, nor did I know that you felt this way towards your future husband. Truly, the nuances of human speech and body movement evade me. So many subtleties.

Amelia nodded as she stood up and began quickly walking down the hall towards where the creepy man had told her to go. "Let's do this quickly now... I don't know who the 'caretaker' is, nor do I want to find out."

Of that, we can agree.

* * *

This is it... I can feel myself slipping.

Davook breathed hoarsely, his arm now in so much pain that his brain had merely switched off the feeling. Master Takano had already started work on the other arm, but Davook felt so far gone that there was no chance of making it back.

Information... I don't even have information... I gave him everything... I broke completely...

Davook felt the tears flowing down his face freely. His pride was long gone now, after this last round of torture. Master Takano was going to cut off both of his feet next. He even told me he was going to cut off my hands, make me into a freakshow... he's... he's a true demon...

His chest was hardly rising and falling anymore. The chemicals he'd been forced to inhale, along with the unending pain in his heart meant that breathing was a job he had to actively work to succeed at. But... it wasn't worth it...

Davook could feel it all slipping away. At the least, he'd die before the demon returned. He would pass on before the monster came to take more from him.

It's not like it matters. There's nothing left to take but my soul.

Davook opened his eyes slightly as he stared up at that same goddamned patch of wetness on the ceiling above him. My... soul? Will I be reincarnated when I die? Do demons go to heaven? Hell? Are we... already dead?

He choked back a hoarse cough as he felt blood drip from his nose and stream down both sides of his cheeks. The questions didn't matter, not so long as the end came quickly. All he wanted now was for the pain to stop.

As he had these thoughts, his blood chilled suddenly. The sound of... the door. The door. Davook's eyes shot open as panic flooded his mind.

He's back! No! It's too soon! He just left! I don't want him to come back! Leave me alone! LET ME DIE!

Davook wriggled in terror as his voice was unable to escape his body. He couldn't even scream in fear. His throat had been burned by those chemicals that monster had forced him to ingest. Only a silent terror could fill his heart now.

...The sound of clicking heels made Davook's movements stop. What? Those don't... sound like his shoes? What's going on?

A quiet breathing could be heard approaching as the heels clicked closer. Davook tried mightily to turn his eyes to the side, but the blinders made it impossible to see anything not directly in front of him.

Suddenly, the most beautiful, heavenly voice spoke out. "Oh... my gosh... are you...?"

Davook felt his heart stop as the face of an angel appeared before him. A beautiful female, human in appearance, her long black hair and cute white nurse's outfit making her seem like a divine piece of manna from the heavens.

"Huhk... hoak..." Davook choked as he struggled to speak, but the beautiful woman quickly pressed a finger to his lips.

"No... don't speak. I'll get you out of this.... thing." Her face disappeared and the light she seemed to give off vanished from his sight.

No... please... don't go... don't leave me... Davook felt more tears roll down his face.

A moment later, an odd sound could be heard. The sound of... metal peeling from metal?

Davook jerked in surprise as the incredibly strong contraption surrounding his head was yanked free, a horrible high-pitched screeching filled the air as the metal was torn off cleanly in one movement.

Davook jerked his head back, suddenly realizing he was free to move, as he gawked in disbelief at the young woman, holding a several hundred pound massive chunk of machinery in her hands. A moment later, she lightly tossed it behind her, the machinery smashed into the wall and crumpled up, leaving no doubt that she was filled with an immense strength.

A few moments later, she had torn the restraints off his arms and legs and was gently helping him sit up, the motion making him feel queasy.

But, strangely... he didn't feel weak anymore. He pondered it for a few seconds before he remembered the needle that had been connected directly to his spine. It must have been pumping me full of anti-energy constantly to keep me weak.

Davook glanced down at his left arm. It was in... horrid shape. Massive chunks of flesh were missing here and there, his arm looking like a wildfire had been let loose on it. Even his right arm didn't look so good, something the woman seemed to quickly notice.

She quickly stood up and walked in front of him, bringing her face close to his. "A shadow-walker, hm? I've heard about you guys before. You don't seem all that scary up close- yes! I know, but I don't think he's any danger."

She seemed to be talking to someone else, but there was nobody else in the room. Davook didn't care though, as her soft complexion this close to his face made him feel weak in the knees. Without a doubt, she is the most beautiful human female I have ever seen.

She quickly hovered her hand above his left arm. "I hope this doesn't sting too much. It can be unpleasant at first."

Hm? Unpleasant? What does she mean? Davook asked himself the question before finding out a moment later, as agonizing pain shot through his arm, before being replaced by a soft, warm sensation. Glancing down, his jaw dropped as his arm began to knit itself together and heal in a matter of moments.

Ah, I understand now. She is no normal human. She must be a demon in disguise, one similar to Mistress Belial, who is acquainted with the healing arts. Truly... I... I am blessed...

Davook felt a smile spread across his face, as within a minute his arm was fully healed. Before she could get to work on the other one, he pointed at his throat with his nearly healed arm. The girl glanced at him in confusion before a look of recognition spread across her face.

"Your throat? Is it hurt?"

He nodded excitedly, like a little child receiving a Christmas present, as she smiled at him and quickly began to heal it too.

A few minutes later, Davook sat staring at her in awe, as his body was now fully healed. He no longer felt weak, as she had also apparently given him some energy too.

"You... saved my life... what is your name?" Davook choked back emotions as he gripped the table tightly. "I owe you... a life debt."

"I'm Amelia. I came because I heard of your capture. I didn't... realize this was as bad as it was. We have to get out of here."

Amelia started to turn away but Davook grabbed her hand, as he felt his lip tremble. "I am known as Davook. I... I will do anything for you, no matter what you ask of me. I am yours, forever."

The girl paused as she smiled awkwardly. "That... really isn't necessary. But um, thank you! Seriously though, we need to go." Her smile turned into a look of unease as her eyes darted around the terrible workshop covered in old blood stains.

Davook nodded dumbly as he smiled at her with a lopsided grin. "Right, yes. Anything you say, my lady."

She pulled away from his grip and the two of them quickly began to walk towards the exit, when she suddenly halted in front of him.

"Uh... Doctor Takano? Why are you... here?"

Davook blanched as he felt fear engulf his heart. Not... not the monster...

Davook peeked around Amelia's body to see the Japanese man standing at the end of the hallway, several Enforcers visible behind him as all of them trained their weapons on the two of them.

"As I thought. A demon spy sent to rescue one of your own. It looks like I'll have another one to add to my collection."

One of the troopers behind Takano lowered his weapon slightly as he pulled his mask down to stare at Amelia more intently. "...Son of a bitch. I recognize her. Saw her just a couple days ago... with the Supreme Commander!"

Amelia took a step back as she also seemed to recognize the man. "You... your name is... Bubba? And the other men behind you... they must be...?"

Bubba glanced at Takano's backside. "This is bad, Kenichi. She's the Supreme Commander's personal wench. If she's a demon, that means..."

"He's in cahoots with the demons. Always knew there was something a little too perfect about Commander Hiro's rise to power." Doctor Takano sighed as he shook his head. "Now I have to start all over again with that shadow-walker. He's already broken too. Won't be as much fun, this time."

Amelia and Davook took a step back as she quickly yelled out. "You're making a mistake! I'm not a demon, I'm a human!"

Takano chuckled as his eyes flicked over to a massive lump of metal crushed against the wall, the one she had tossed aside earlier. "As if. I saw it in your eyes earlier, you know? The eyes of a demon. I looked into your recent activities, and it would seem that healing up eighty percent of the human hospital population didn't set off any alarm bells in Central Command. I wonder why."

"It's cuz' she's fuckin' the Supreme Commander!" Bubba exclaimed this delightedly, causing Takano to groan.

"Obviously, idiot. Incapacitate them. I want these subjects alive."

"S-sorry. Understood."

Davook trembled as the squad of goons aimed their anti-energy weapons at the two of them.

"Stay behind me." Amelia spoke quietly as she gritted her teeth together. "I didn't want it to come to this, but now that it has..."

Davook nodded as he took a step back around the corner. Allowing a woman to take the heat. How... weak of me. Pathetic.

Part 349a:

"You're making a mistake!" The demoness yelled at Takano and his group as she jumped to the side, narrowly avoiding a barrage of anti-energy gunfire. The tight quarters of the underground tunnel left little room for evasion, yet Takano found himself irritated by how springy she was.

"Shoot her, dammit!" Takano fired his own blaster at her as she jumped away once more. The filthy shadow-walker was being a coward and hiding around the corner. Already, he was probably too broken to fight back. The mere sight of me must be filling him with dread. Takano licked his lips in spite of himself, as the thought of that wretched demon huddled on the ground cowering in fear filled him with glee.

The demoness jumped from floor to ceiling and wall to wall as she zipped around and dodged. Even the crack-shots in the Bravo Team that had taken the shadow-walker with ease were having the damndest time locking onto her position.

She's more agile than expected, and also seems to be avoiding hostility. Why is she doing this? Takano knelt down to steady his aim as he fired another shot towards her, which she easily dodged.

The demoness lurched to a sudden stop, taking a split second to steady her footing as she jammed her hand into the concrete floor and yanked upwards, sending a wave of dust and concrete chunks flying at the group of men as they yelped in fear. A moment later, they quickly realized it had merely obscured their vision and dealt no actual damage.

"Fuck it, I'm ending this!" Bubba stood up suddenly as he reached behind himself and pulled out a grenade attached to his coat. "Get down!"

Takano nodded as he quickly turned his head away, listening as the sound of the pin was pulled and the grenade was hurled down the corridor. A moment later the demoness gasped as a shockwave blasted outwards, knocking the group of enforcers off their feet. Takano quickly turned back to look down the corridor, and smiled evilly as he saw the female laying on the ground, clutching her stomach as she rolled around in the fetal position.

"Nice throw. Shoot her quickly!" Takano had barely let the words loose before a hail of anti-energy shots blasted down the corridor, peppering her body with enough force to render her unconscious immediately. She didn't even have a moment to scream, as she slowly raised her arm towards the corner where the shadow-walker was hiding before she lost consciousness.

"Got 'er. Now let's get the other one." Bubba quickly stepped forwards uneasily as he pivoted his gun towards the section the shadow-walker was hiding at.

At the moment, something unexpected happened.

The lights went out.

Every man in the room felt their blood chill as a voice spoke in the darkness.

" Well well, looks like someone left a light switch over here. You're going to pay for hurting that goddess. "

Two golden eyes appeared just down the corridor as the shadow walker stared them down. "Now I'm pissed. "

Bubba yelped as he turned his gun towards the eyes, but they closed and a moment later a squishing sound could be heard as something with the consistency of a watermelon hit the ground. Following this, Bubba's body slumped over and fell to the side, his head missing.

Every enforcer was breathing heavily as they quickly switched their helmet lights on and swung their heads around wildly, trying to figure out where the monster was at.

Takano took a step back as he forced a nervous smile over his face. "P-putting on quite the bravado, aren't you? Come on, soldiers! Shoot anything that moves!"

The enforcers all quickly started to fire forwards in different directions as they attempted to pinpoint his position, but Takano narrowed his eyes as he noticed something odd. Their shots are becoming slower, more sporadic.

He'd hardly had that thought enter his mind when the firing stopped completely. Turning around he looked back in shock as he saw all of them were laying down, as if sleeping on the job. Their helmets lay on the floor, slowly wobbling around as if they had just fallen off moments before.

"Tomahawk...? Squid? Eagle?" Takano felt his voice rasping as the horrible truth set in. He was all alone now.

" Sorry I killed your friends. I'll make sure you die slowly to make up for it. " An ominously high pitched voice spoke just inches from Takano's head in the darkness, causing his steeled frame to shatter as he screamed and fired wildly at the voice's source.

The gun stopped firing as Takano blinked in surprise.

Both of his hands were gone.

* * *

Davook released the body of his tormentor as a smile passed over his lips. He's dead now. I feel so... happy.

He shook his head slowly and blinked thrice as he came back to his senses. The ecstasy from killing that human had felt unlike anything he'd experienced before in his entire life.

Glancing around he walked back over to the light switch, flipping it back on as he snickered silently to himself at the carnage he had caused. Bodies lay in piles here and there, ten dead in total, and all of them had been felled by his own hand.

Quickly he hopped over to where Amelia was laying, as the joy vanished and was replaced with concern. "Miss Amelia...? Are... are you all right?" He reached down to touch her hand but jerked back in surprise as she quickly opened up her eyes and rolled into a sitting position in one smooth motion.

"Nice job! I knew you had it in you!"

She smiled at him pleasantly and he responded by staring at her dumbly. "Didn't... weren't you shot? Are you injured?"

Amelia pulled herself up to a standing position as she patted her nurse's outfit down, wiping the dirt off that had yet to bury itself into her nice white clothing. "Injured? Not a chance! Their shots stung but that grenade was a little bit disorienting. I'd say that was the worst of it."

He nodded slowly at her apparent perfect condition. "They must have hit you a couple dozen times. How can you be in such good condition? No demon should be able to take that kind of pummeling and live to tell the tale, let alone walk away in mint condition."

Amelia frowned at him before casting her gaze around at the bodies in the room. "Didn't you hear me? I said I was a human. I wasn't lying."

As she walked over to the headless corpse of the 'Bubba' fellow, Davook carefully digested what she had said. "You're human? That can't be possible, unless you're also a Hero or something. And... were they telling the truth? Are you... with the human's Supreme Commander?"

Amelia sighed as she turned to face Davook down, a look of annoyance on her face. "I am. We're actually going to get married, as it happens. Does that change anything?"

"But... I am a demon. We are enemies." Davook rapped his fingers together in front of himself as he shifted his feet around, obvious discomfort visible in the way he stood. "Humans and demons cannot coexist."

"Perhaps. You might be right. I disagree though... I think peace is possible. I also think..." Amelia curled up her lip in disgust as she glanced back over at the corpse of the doctor that had been so brutally torn to pieces. "...he was an evil man... but it wasn't my place to decide his fate. You deserved to make that decision."

Davook crossed his arms as he stood up a little straighter. "You're lucky that you're as hardy as you are. That man... he would have... without a doubt... he would have treated you as he did Nerissa. I could tell by his aura. You must be more careful."

Amelia shrugged as she started to walk towards the exit. "I could tell he was a bad man in a single glance... but he could see into me as well. We shared a kinship of sorts."

Davook followed along behind her, noting with interest that she didn't seem affected by the sight of all the dead bodies in the slightest. This female has done much killing in her life. She is no innocent angel... yet her strong female presence excites me.

The two of them stepped over the bodies and made their way up the shaft before arriving back in the janitor's closet that had started it all.

Davook hesitated before they stepped out. "I still hate humans. Even you cannot change that... you are merely the exception, not the rule."

Amelia turned back to stare at him intently. "I know that, Davook. You don't have to be the good guy here... they hurt you badly. You can hate them all you want."

Davook bowed his head as he stared at the ground. "I don't mean it like that. You are the only human who has ever shown me kindness... yet you are not truly a human. You are more demon than human." Davook paused as he jerked his head up. "Ah, that is to say, I mean it as a compliment."

Amelia rolled her eyes as he tried to smooth over the pseudo-insult with his high-pitched whiny voice. "I get it. Thanks, I guess."

Davook scratched his lip as he decided to speak his mind no matter what. "You must return with me to the labyrinth! You will be welcomed there as our friend! We will treat you as a revered ally."

Amelia didn't hesitate as she immediately shook her head. "No can do. I knew you were going to say that... so predictable. Look, I have many friends already, Davook. I saved you because what was happening to you was wrong. Don't take this poorly, but I'm no more your ally than I am your enemy. I have prior obligations."

Her sharp retort made Davook blanch. "Of... of course! I should have realized... I meant no disrespect. We shall go our separate ways, then."

Amelia nodded at him slowly as they walked out of the closet. "Do you know your way back to the labyrinth? Need a way out of town?"

Davook turned to look out the window, noting that the sun was already lowering and the day was drawing to an end. "That won't be necessary. I know the way."

"I understand." Amelia turned to walk away from him but paused a moment as she fidgeted slightly. "Well, you went through a lot, so I guess this much is okay."

Before he could react, she quickly turned back and gave him a light peck on the cheek. "Don't think too much about it."

A moment later she walked away briskly, leaving Davook to his thoughts. He rubbed the spot on his cheek as he felt his body temperature flush. She... kissed me?

He'd never been that interested in a female before, but this was a different situation. Davook pondered to himself what to do as he started to walk in the opposite direction, towards what his instincts told him was the rear exit.

Honestly, I'm lucky to be alive. I was at death's door. I will never forget this debt.

Davook smiled as he walked past a hospital room and glanced inside. The smile disappeared as he saw an old man breathing through a set of tubes, several wires placed in his arms and chest.

Hunger.

Davook felt an inner voice sprout inside his mind as a wave of nausea suddenly overtook him. Falling to his knees, he felt his vision pulse slightly as his eyes were strangely drawn to the old man's body.

Feed.

The demon wiped at his eyes as he blinked hard. What is this feeling? It calls to me...

Devour.

Davook licked his lips as he eyed the snack inside that room. Never before had he felt a pang this intense. It was as if every pore in his body wanted whatever that human had. The feeling from earlier... the thrill of the kill... a filthy human...

Who was going to miss one decrepit old man? Even this man's family didn't care about him... that's why they left him here all alone.

Sustenance.

The voice called to him from deep within as he drooled incoherently and slowly pulled himself into the room. His family, eh? They might taste pretty good too.

* * *

Torlok and Bael zipped between alleyways as their Animus friend Smealum followed up in the rear. The night sky overhead was barely illuminated by the fading light of a distant sun. By now, the Moon was the main source of light that they were seeing with.

Despite his size, Bael could move relatively silently, which was a good thing given the humans and their hatred of anything demonic. He flicked his gaze up at the Moon overhead. Its surface was visibly dotted with various colonies of humans, here and there. Greedy animals. They already had Earth, but they had to take over two other planets too. They truly are insatiable.

Despite his words, Bael felt jealousy more than anything else. The humans were taking everything from his people... from their lives to their home, the humans truly knew no end to their evil.

Of course, the demons had committed a few inconsequential atrocities... but those were nothing compared to the barbarism shown by humans! Indeed, humans were the reason he could never sit on a beach and admire a sunrise. They took everything for themselves, whether they needed it or not. Their kind was a plague on the universe.

Bael and his two underlings rounded a corner as they arrived at their destination. Just across the street, the northwestern Military Hospital was visible in all of its glory, the lights inside having been shut off once visiting hours were over. Bael smirked to himself. Humans are evil, it is true... but the thrill of defeating them one day fills me with hope. There is no joy like that of crushing a strong foe!

"Is that it?" Smealum spoke up, his voice dripping with disappointment. "A hospital?"

"Yeah." Bael's deep voice rumbled in the darkness as he cautiously exited the alleyway and starting walking across the barren street towards their destination. No humans were in sight, and he couldn't smell them either. They were all indoors, snug as bugs, wholly unaware that a demon powerful enough to level their entire city was roaming about at this time of night. "Lots of military types are in there, though. Keep your guard up. I'll take point."

Torlok fidgeted as they walked forwards. "Think we'll see any action? Maybe get ta' cut a couple o' fleshbags up?"

"Don't forget the mission. We're here to rescue your idiot friend. If anyone comes to fight, I'll be doing the punching. Got it?" Bael beckoned to the flail wrapped around his body as the smaller demons nodded softly.

A few moments later, they arrived at the front door. Bael immediately sniffed the air, crinkling up his face as the hospital doors opened up automatically. There was a familiar stench in the air... the smell of death.

Torlok and Smealum gasped in unison as they entered, shocked by the sight of the wall behind the front desk that was covered in blood. Several body parts that once belonged to humans littered the hallway. A corpse sat several dozen feet away, his face frozen in a state of panic.

"W-what the hell? What happened here?" The animus, Smealum, whipped his head around nervously. "All these bodies... but no police or anything. Does nobody know about this yet?"

Bael leaned down, keeping his eyes peeled for movement, as he swiped his stubby fingers across a blood-stain. "Fresh. Something killed these folks recently. Real recent. Must've been in the last hour or so."

Torlok perked up his ears as he took a step forwards. "Y'hear that? A humming sound."

Bael squinted as he forced himself to listen more carefully. Indeed, there was a strange vibration in the air, as if the molecules themselves were being agitated by an unknown force. It was not an alien feeling, though. In fact, it was one he had experienced many times before, personally and impersonally.

"Evolution." Bael nodded slowly, as the other two demons glanced up at him in surprise. "A demon is evolving... right now."

Smealum was the first to speak. "That can't be possible. Satan has said that demons can only evolve inside of the labyrinth. Even if a demon wanted to, he wouldn't be able to." His careful expression indicated total disbelief at even the possibility of such a thing.

Bael chuckled at the naivete of the young Animus. "You believe everything you are told? Satan has many secrets... ones even the top generals and his fellow Emperors are not privy to. This is likely one of them." Bael licked his lips excitedly as they began to move towards the source of the vibrations. An evolution outside of the labyrinth? Even I didn't think it was possible.

As they stepped over the bodies of humans, Bael began to feel a tiny sliver of doubt in his mind. It must be that Davook fellow. But if he didn't evolve by the will of the dark gods, as Satan said demons do... then he must have evolved in some other way. Could the killing of these humans be the key?

The three of them arrived at an elevator and Torlok cocked an eyebrow. "Straight up... 's gonna take a while to get ta' him."

"We've got time." Bael nodded slowly as he thought about this turn of events carefully. "But it can't hurt to move quickly. Let's go."

Part 350a: Endless Hatred

It's so warm.

Davook stared into the abyss before him with unseeing eyes, as the warmth surrounded his body. It was a familiar feeling... one he had only experienced twice in his life.

Evolution. I am evolving.

This feeling could only be described as the sensation of being inside a mother's womb. The cocoon that surrounded him was made of a material that formed whenever a demon was born. It was nearly impenetrable from the outside and would not open until its host was ready to exit.

Power overwhelming. Hatred. Rage.

Davook felt the emotions pour into his mind, yet they seemed almost distant. He wasn't genuinely angry, and wasn't truly filled with hate... yet it existed. Deep in his mind, another spoke to him, prodded him, coaxed him into fulfilling his most primal urges.

Enemies must be slain.

A simple command. Davook moved his hand forwards slowly, feeling it slosh through the embryonic liquid that surrounded him. It was completely dark inside his larval stage, but he could tell now... it was time to leave.

His hand stopped a few inches from his body, as he felt it pressing against the hardened shell that surrounded him. His senses felt dulled, yet sharp. Despite being enveloped in liquid, he had no need to breathe... for now.

Gently, he pressed against the inside of the shell. The egg-like object stayed put, requiring more force than he was willing to exert.

Physical power is not needed. I have another way now.

Davook closed his eyes as he let his hand fall back down to his side. His mind was all he needed.

A moment later, he released the energy from within, exploding the cocoon outwards in all directions before falling forwards and stumbling onto the floor. It was not a graceful exit, but it was a resounding success.

He coughed and sputtered as his normal breathing mechanisms resumed. "Kahhh... how long...?"

His vision slowly returned as he recognized the place he was in. The administration section... the top floor... the 13th floor. Corpses surrounded him, long since cooled and stiffened as rigor mortis overtook them. Expressions of terror enveloped the faces of the humans all around him.

A smile crept over his face. "Scared, were you? So was I. You knew I was down there, yet you ignored my plight. This is your reward."

Davook grabbed hold of a desk and pulled himself up, staring with a confused expression and wondering why the desk seemed... bigger. Had it always been this tall?

No. Wait, that's not it at all. I am smaller.

Davook blinked as he noted that the colors of the world around him were gone now. All he could see was black and white. Glancing down at his hands, he stared intently as he realized his arms had become so black as to almost be transparent.

It is as if I have... become one with the shadows.

Davook turned back and grabbed hold of the door handle, feeling annoyed that it was now almost at his eye level, being only a few inches below his chin.

How odd that an evolution would shorten my height.

Davook pulled the door open and casually stepped over a corpse from his rampage earlier as he stared out a window. It was pitch black outside, in the dead of night. Davook caught sight of a clock on the wall, noting that it was just after 1 AM.

Two hours. That seems to be far less time than it took for me to evolve into a shadow-walker.

He looked down at his hands again and frowned.

I need to find a mirror.

Taking a quick look around, he spotted a human bathroom. Quickly walking inside, he immediately spotted the massive mirrors on the walls and was shocked by what he saw.

His body no longer had what one might call 'skin'. Instead, he seemed to almost be made up of a black smoke-like substance, one that flowed off his body in wisps and curled up into the air above him.

A word appeared in his mind, one that came unbidden.

Shadow.

I am a Shadow. No longer one who walks among the shadows, I have joined with them.

It was a curious thing, the process of evolution. A strange voice often would appear in the mind of a demon following their evolution to tell them their new designation.

But... this was very abnormal. Shadow? No such creature existed. Davook had heard of shadow-walkers that evolved before, though it was a rare thing to happen... but they always became Wraiths. In fact, he'd only heard of half a dozen who had done so, and all of them had died during the Great War in Heaven, hundreds of years before.

Davook paused his thinking as he felt something odd. He was not alone.

He glanced down at the floor as he felt his presence cover every inch of the building, every nook and cranny where darkness could be felt.

Of course there were the three demons approaching his location, he had sensed them minutes before from within his cocoon. No... this was something else. A human.

Davook sniffed quietly as he turned towards the bathroom stalls. Someone was huddled in the stalls, still alive, breathing as silently as they could.

What a joke. They must think they can remain undetected. Impossible.

Davook calmly walked over to one of the stall doors, pausing as he heard shallow breathing on the other side. This human must have heard his footsteps approaching, for they appeared to be trembling in fright.

"There's no need to fear. Death comes for all, eventually."

Davook spoke and was mildly amused that his previous shrill voice was gone now, replaced with a deep voice, bubbling over with brimstone and fire.

He pressed on the stall and heard a squeak on the other side, as the human revealed herself to be a female. She had locked the stall, though that was no obstacle to him now. Pressing lightly against the door, he melted through it, phasing into the other side effortlessly, as if the door didn't even exist.

The instant the woman saw him, she screamed.

A terrible, annoying sound. The sound a weakling might make just before their end arrived.

Davook didn't even bother to dirty his hands, as the shadows in the stall came alive, darting forwards like knives and stabbing her a thousand times over in the blink of an eye. Her screaming was cut short in an instant as she slumped over against the wall and fell off the toilet seat, all life gone from her body.

Davook smiled again, as the feeling of death washed over him. What a beautiful, melancholic feeling. Leaning down, he pressed her long brown hair against her face and inhaled deeply. Now you are where all of your kind belong... in the afterlife.

Davook stayed there for a few moments before walking out of the bathroom, glancing down the hallway towards the demons that approached him now.

One of them is an Emperor. How strange that an Emperor would come to see me. What might I have done to deserve this honor?

The three demons rounded a corner and stopped as they were finally able to see the one who had such an ominous presence.

"D-Davook? Is... is that you?" A shadow-walker spoke up and Davook immediately had to resist rolling his eyes.

I see now, my compatriots must have sought help to try and rescue me from the humans. Too little, too late, though their efforts are not unappreciated.

Davook hesitated before responding. Was it just his imagination, or was he able to perceive a strange line of shadow emanating from their heads and stretching up into the ceiling before disappearing? As if they were marionettes on a string. Surely, it must have been his eyes playing tricks on him.

"Torlok. Smealum. And... Fourth Emperor, Bael. A pleasure to see all of you."

Bael shoved the two smaller demons out of his way as he strode forwards, a broad grin on his face. "Well, would you look at that! An evolution outside of the labyrinth! Don't we have a real mystery on our hands here, eh... Davook?"

Something about the way he said Davook's name stirred up a feeling of disgust within the Shadow's inner self. As if he were looking down on the small demon.

"Is that jealousy I detect, Emperor? Do you crave something I possess?"

Bael's smile cracked as his eyebrows lowered. He glared down at Davook, a strange look in his eyes. "I'm just interested... in what you've become. Never seen a demon like you before. Are you the first of many... or perhaps... a unique evolution?"

Davook smiled back at Bael, his white molars having now been replaced with pure black husks of darkness. "Unique? I am unique, yes, as are all demons. I am not part of some hive-mind. You, on the other hand..."

Davook stared past Bael, up at that strange black thread of darkness that seemed to go from his head up towards the nether above. It was almost like Bael were some sort of puppet being controlled by a marionette master.

"...speaking of hive-mind... how is Satan doing these days?" Davook phrased the question casually, almost too casually for one with an ominous presence such as he. Bael immediately seemed suspicious.

"I ask the questions here, pup. How did you evolve without being in the labyrinth? Why have you evolved into something previously unseen?"

Davook ignored the questions. "I see. You didn't come here to help me or to save me from the humans... you came for your own selfish reasons. Perhaps not even your own."

Smealum had been silent this whole time, but now he spoke up. "Bael came to help. You should be thankful that an Emperor would give you his time of day. Especially when the labyrinth, our home, is being destroyed by the humans."

Mentioning humans made Davook blink a few times as he seemed to come back to his senses. For a moment, his bloodlust had been about to boil over. "Right. I do not trust Bael, no matter what you say his intentions are. In fact, I trust none of you. You're all... pawns. Weapons to be used by your superiors. This is truly unjust."

Bael snarled as he glared down at the short little demon before him. "You're acting pretty cocky, little fellow. What say I make you eat those words, eh? I'm no puppet, but I can break your body into pieces and turn you into one. Besides... I've been wondering what the extent of your strength is. Your body is smaller than that of any evolved demon I know, yet your power is unmistakable. Won't you humor me with a fight?"

Davook returned the glare as he took a step forward and stared up into the eyes of the Fourth Emperor. "Asking permission? That doesn't sound very regal. Perhaps you admit that I am no longer below you? Hell has only one rule; the rule of strength. Those with power lead, and those without... bend the knee."

Bael's temper was flaring up as he knelt down, keeping his face within a few inches of the former shadow-walker's. "Are you calling me weak, filth?"

Davook calmly smiled back at the angered face inches before him. "I'm merely stating what I see. You could try to persuade me otherwise, if you like."

Bael didn't hesitate as he lunged his hand forwards, grabbing at Davook's neck. The moment he started to move, Davook was gone.

" Relying on primitive body movements, are you? You'll need to do better than that. "

The shadows themselves seemed to shudder as a voice whispered through the corridors. The darkness itself seemed to come to life as the newly arisen Shadow began to display his power.

"Hiding, as a coward would. Your fear is palpable." Bael rose to his feet and looked around slowly. The Shadow was still here, somewhere. But where?

Where was the insect hiding?

Part 351a: Allegiance

Bael clenched his fist as he unwound the flail from his body. A bead of sweat dripped down from his forehead, causing him to wonder for a moment if the room's temperature had increased, or if it was just his imagination.

A flicker of movement made Bael jerk to face it. It appeared to be nothing, but he was wary, as the flail twitched in his hand. "Where are you, maggot? Come and face me."

"Demons should not fight other demons. Humans are the enemy." A voice spoke from all directions, seeming to come from the walls themselves. "The humans count on us and our infighting to divide us. This is how they are winning."

"I don't give a shit about that!" Bael flicked his flail, causing it to surge forwards and smash out a window and the wall attached to it, the noise being deafening at this time of night. "I just want to test you. I just want to fight!"

"Is that all?" The voice paused and Bael caught a glimpse of a shape forming down the hallway, as Davook reformed himself from the shadows, smoke turning into a physical form as he stood nonchalantly with one hand on his hip. "Go ahead, then. I'm right here."

Bael barely hesitated to consider if this was a feint, lunging his flail forwards at the figure encased in smoke. The moment he did, he felt a strange sensation under one of his feet. A moment later he slipped and toppled forwards, the flail falling flat just as he did.

"I control the shadows. I am the shadows. You are fighting in my territory, now. Give up... I do not wish to fight one of my own kind."

From down the hall where they had taken cover, Smealum and Torlok watched in awe as their mentor and leader battled one of the four demon emperors, and seemed to even be winning. "This is crazy. How did he get this strong just from killing a few humans?" Smealum whispered so as to not draw the ire of Bael, though now he was beginning to doubt that their boss would let the big guy hurt them.

"Always said, man, th' boss is one tough cookie." Torlok grinned eagerly as Bael rose to his feet again. "He's smart too. Not just some big dumbass who throws a big ball o' steel 'round. He likes ta' get in yer' mind when he fights."

Bael stared ahead silently for a few moments at the shadowy figure at the end of the hall, taking a moment to think. "The shadows are your ally, then? I see." His strange calmness was something rarely seen. "Then it follows... the light is your weakness."

"Correct." The shadow leaned against the wall without a care in the world. "By fighting me at night, you are fighting in the worst possible conditions. You should leave now, lest you face another humiliating defeat. Wouldn't want a repeat of that encounter with the current Supreme Commander, would you?"

Bael's calmness vanished in an instant as he gritted his teeth and felt a vein pop in his forehead. "You... bastard... how do you know about that?! No shadow-walkers were present for that battle!"

"Correct, again. I was an imp at the time. I managed the portals that allowed the demons to enter and exit. I heard tale of how the hero smote you with the Holy Sword, Excalibur. You shouldn't feel too ashamed. After all... even you are too weak to hold up against the condensed power of the Holy Sword."

The shadow seemed to snicker to himself as he spoke the word weak. Bael didn't find it amusing.

"I am not weak! I am strong. Blows that would kill a weaker demon merely stun me. Even Diablo fears my wrath! Satan instated me as his fourth Emperor because he understands my true power!"

The shadow pulled away from the wall and walked forwards slowly. "Big words, for a weakling. Satan uses you as a pawn. I see the shadow attached to your mind... to the minds of all demons. Satan knows you are stupid and would never question his authority. Even Diablo is not intelligent enough to see... the truth about demon-kind. We're all toys for Satan to use as he sees fit."

Bael smashed his foot into the ground to root himself properly, once again lunging forwards with his flail at the shadow. "What are you blabbering about?! Just die already, you impotent little shit!"

Bael smiled to himself as he felt the shadows shifting around his feet once again. A one-trick pony... he still isn't used to his evolution abilities yet. He thinks of me as an idiot to test his powers on. Let's... change that.

The Fourth Emperor stabbed his free hand forwards, delicately flicking a light-switch on as all the lights in the corridor flooded the hallway. Davook took a step back and screamed in pain as the flail hit him, blasting him into a thousand pieces... his body evaporated into mist and a strange feeling of pain could almost be felt in the air.

"Heh... and here you thought you were invincible." Bael pulled the flail back quickly as he clapped his hands together. "Care for a round two? Maybe I killed you. If I did, you're even more pathetic than I thought."

Torlok bit his nails as he glanced down the hallway. "Th-that looked kinda brutal... hope th' boss 's okay..."

His concern was addressed almost immediately, as the lights in the hallway went out again, this time with a fizzling noise.

A voice spoke from the darkness, once more. "That was... unexpected. You made me admit my weakness, then used it against me. Smart. However, this much light will merely inconvenience me. Only a pure light, brighter than the stars in the sky... only a light like that could truly harm me."

Bael quickly flicked the switch again, only to feel dismayed that the lights wouldn't turn on. "Did the flail even hurt you?"

"No." The shadow reformed again, this time much closer to the Fourth Emperor. "It merely dispersed me. My body should be impenetrable to physical attacks now. As for the lights, I've severed all the connections in the building, since the inside of the walls are covered in darkness. You will not be able to use that trick twice."

Bael nodded solemnly, his anger and rage gone now. "My biggest weakness as a demon is my inability to use magic. This is also my strength, as the human weapons that harm other demons have little effect on me. If my physical attacks won't harm you, then you will inevitably win this battle."

"Mmm." Davook grunted, neither affirming nor denying the sentiment. "Whether I win or lose matters little. However, I am no longer part of the labyrinth, as of today."

Torlok stepped out of hiding, walking forwards a few steps as he stared at his boss in confusion. "No longer part o' the labyrinth? But... but... what about us?"

"You are close allies of mine, and former subordinates. As of today, we are no longer working together. I have my own ambitions to fulfill." Davook reach behind himself and touched the spot on his neck that still seemed to sting ever so slightly. "The human who captured me... he inadvertently gave me this power. I suspect that he severed my connection to Satan by pumping me full of anti-energy."

Bael narrowed his eyes as he examined the lack of expression on the shadow's face. "Severed your connection? Explain."

Davook's voice had an edge of sadness to it as he spoke again. "It's simple, really. You're all being used. Satan somehow is able to steal the soul energy of those you kill, then give it back to those who he deems worthy... without his influence, demons would evolve much more rapidly after killing one another or humans... or angels. Everything we've been told about our evolutions... is based on lies. Satan is controlling the demons for his own gain."

Bael crossed his arms and smirked. "I've known Satan for millennia, whelp. He's not that kind of leader. Even when all the demons were wiped out, he still fought for our kind. He sought to rebuild our numbers to their former glory, and he never gave up in the fight against our oppressors."

"Precisely. Think about it, Bael. You're not as thick as I first presumed. When the War in Heaven was fought and the angels and demons were wiped out en-masse... did Satan seem to grow in power around that time?"

Bael shrugged at the question. "Everyone who survived became stronger. What's your point? You think you can change my allegiance with pretty words? Satan is the strongest of our kind. I won't question his authority after all these thousands of years. You weren't even there when we invaded Heaven, so don't act like you know what happened."

Davook sighed as he turned around and started to walk away. "You're right. I wasn't. But I see it clearly now, the strings he uses to hold you in place. Only one who has the ability to see these strings will understand. I will take my leave now."

Before he could disappear, Bael reached forwards and grabbed him by the shoulder. "Wait. If you're leaving the labyrinth... doesn't that make you an enemy? A rogue agent?"

Davook pulled away from Bael's grasp and glared at him slightly. "I have no interest in Satan's schemes. Despite his manipulation of our kind, he is performing decently. I have my own goals to attend to. You will not see me again unless I have found a way to rid our kind of the humans for good."

Smealum decided to speak up, seeing his former boss was about to leave. "Davook, come on... you don't have to do this. You should stay with us and help us fight back against the humans! You have power now!"

"Power, yes. This power is not one I asked for, but it feels right. However, that name... Davook. I feel as if it no longer suits me. The name was given to a buffoon of an imp." Davook paused for a few moments before shrugging. "I shall think of a new one, given time. For my old comrades, I will not forget you. I will always be watching from the shadows. Take care, friends."

The three demons barely had time to register his parting words before he evaporated into mist.

Davook was gone.

* * *

I swing my paddle deftly, knocking the small ball back at the holographic recreation of a tennis champion from the 21st century, marveling at how he always seems to be able to anticipate my reactions. These holograms are becoming more advanced all the time!

He barely even moves as he swats the ping-pong ball back at me and I return it in kind, before he finally whacks it too fast for me to catch it.

"Jeez. Another perfect round. I really suck at this." The digital scoreboard hovers in the background, as if to mock me, making my digital opponent's score pulse blue. 10-0, my loss.

"You did your best!" The man cheers me on with his mechanical sounding voice, but all it does is make me feel worse.

"Hologram off." I barely put any life into the words as the simulation shuts down. I quickly grab a towel nearby before it disappears and wipe my face down, then I head out the door.

The holo-deck opens directly onto the kitchen and dining area, so when I walk out, I'm mostly unsurprised to see Amelia sitting by herself on a sofa with her legs tucked under herself, reading a book.

"Oh! You're back." I walk over and take a seat next to her, conjuring myself up a small glass of light beer... something I've been trying out lately. The beer tastes like shit but it makes relaxing a lot easier.

"Yep." Amelia barely even acknowledges my presence as I sit beside her on the couch. She's not wearing her nurse uniform, so she must have been back for a while now. I do like the cute blue sundress though, it fits her well.

"What'cha reading?" I flick my eyes over the book but they glaze over immediately. It doesn't look like a fiction novel or anything I'd find interesting.

"Advanced psychology... learning about how to help patients who have experienced a lot of... trauma." Amelia seems colder than usual, but when I put my arm over her shoulders, she leans back into me and rests her head on my chest just fine. She doesn't seem to want to put the damn book down though... almost as bad as when cell phones were a thing and I could never get people to look me in the eye.

"Trauma, huh? Had a lot of patients like that lately?"

"Just a few." Amelia shrugs lightly as she thumbs the page over and reads the next one. "Trauma has a lot of long lasting effects. It's too bad we don't have better ways to deal with it."

"Medical technology is advancing steadily... brain augments will get there eventually, I think." I take a sip of my beer as I glance away from the book over at some fish swimming in their fishbowl.

"Yeah... but brain augments are kind of... I dunno..." Amelia's words sound casual enough, but I can't help but notice that she seems very bothered by something.

"Are you doing all right? We haven't talked much this week."

Amelia finally sighs as she sets the book down. The movement makes me feel slightly guilty, like I stopped her from enjoying her reading time. "Well... a lot of things have happened lately."

I nodded along neutrally. "Right..."

"I mean, you know how it is right now. The demons are being destroyed, our hospitals are being emptied out..." Her voice trails off as if she wants to say something else, yet fears my reaction.

I poke her in the ribs jokingly. "Mhm. Go on..."

She seems to fidget at my touch, but finally continues. "Well, I had this patient today... he suffered a lot of pain and wasn't acting the way he normally might. Someone hurt him... really bad."

"That's terrible! What happened?" I keep my questions neutral, noticing that she's playing with her long black hair now, going out of her way to avoid eye contact with me. She's such a child sometimes.

"I... don't know exactly." Amelia says this and I immediately can tell she's lying. She knows exactly what happened. Still, it's not polite to call her out forcefully, so I'll wait. "All I know is that he was badly scarred up, and even when I healed him, he still carried the pain in his heart. I'm worried about him."

"Well, that's good of you. I've been hurt badly before too, physically and emotionally. The only thing that will make the trauma go away is time, I think. I've had nearly two hundred years, but most other humans haven't lived nearly that long."

"Yeah... humans. Listen, Jason, actually it's more that... he... uh..." Amelia starts to say something else but I hear a familiar sound as a teleportation occurs right in the middle of the kitchen and a familiar figure is left standing there, getting his bearings.

"Sensei?" I pull my arm away from Amelia and quickly stand up, noticing that he doesn't look to be in a good mood.

"Jason. Good thing I found you so quickly. Listen, something really bad happened on Earth not even an hour ago. An entire hospital staff and all of their patients were brutally murdered. You need to get down there immediately."

My teeth grit almost involuntarily as he delivers the news. "You're kidding. Who would do such a thing?! It must be the work of the demons... or a serial killer. But we've weeded out most of those personality types though, so..."

Sensei nods vigorously. "I've barely had a look at the scene, but other clones are looking into it. The thing is, this happened at the place I told you about."

I stared at him carefully for a moment. "The Peeler? You found it?"

"Yeah. Turns out it was hidden under the same hospital that was butchered."

"Christ." I quickly turn back to Amelia and offer an apologetic look. "Sorry, but our talk has to be cut off early. I need to check this out."

Only then do I notice a look of horror spread across her face. "I... I'm going with you. I need to see this... for myself..." She quickly gets up and walks over to me. "Bring me with you."

I almost want to deny her, but the way she asks the question makes a weird feeling appear in the back of my mind. Besides, if it's just bodies and corpses, I'm sure she won't be affected by it anyway... she's not some innocent child after all, and neither am I.

"Alright. We'll go. Let's continue that conversation when we get back though, okay?"

"Uh... sure." Her response sounds anything but confident, but I don't have the luxury of time to question her.

I turn back to Sensei. "I don't know which hospital it is, so you take us there."

"Can do." Sensei aims his mind at Amelia and I. " Return. "

Part 352a:

Realistically... I've killed a lot of people in my life. Many demons too. I've seen a lot of death, and it never seems to end. Without fail, as a famous philosopher once said, 'all beings must eventually die'.

But even I'm not ready for the scene at this military hospital. It turns out the killer struck the same hospital that I painted at, the one where Amelia healed many people. To think that not even a week ago, this hospital was a lively place for those who fought valiantly on the battlefield to recuperate from their wounds before returning to their normal lives... men and women who lost friends and family to the demons, and they were all butchered while they were at their most vulnerable.

The moment I walk in the door, I'm immediately greeted by a small contingent of my clones who are surveying the scene, and their expressions are anything but pleasant.

"Sensei, glad to see you back. This must be Original." One of my clones nods at me, his face pale due to the horrors he's seen. "We all quickly wordsmithed ourselves into a contingent of world-class crime scene investigators, and we've dug up a lot of leads."

"Do you know who did it?" Out of the corner of my eye I notice a body nobody's had the time to wrap up in a bodybag yet. The woman looks like she's been impaled by a ridiculous number of knives, and her face is frozen in mid-scream.

"Sort of. It was a demon, that much we know, but the wounds across all the bodies are... inconsistent."

"Inconsistent? How so?" I ask this and my clone fidgets uncomfortably. He must be one that hasn't seen as much death as the others who fought on the frontlines against the Volgrim.

"It's... hard to explain. Many of the bodies have their necks slit cleanly, but the further we went up the building, the more varied the wounds became. Some people had their heads ripped clean off, others had holes punched in their chests. One man had his entire spine and ribcage ripped out. That was... awful. One of the worst."

"And her?" I tilt my head towards the woman lying on the ground. "Those holes look very unnatural."

"You said it. She's still a mystery. It's like she was impaled by a hundred wooden stakes, the kind you'd use to kill a vampire or something. But there aren't any wood splinters in her body, and all of the wounds happened at the exact same time. She died instantly."

As my clone speaks, I can't help but notice that Amelia looks beyond worried. She seems downright guilty, as if she's desperately trying to hide something.

"Amelia. Any ideas?"

I shoot the question at her and she flinches visibly. Her reaction tells me that there's definitely something going on here. I quickly look back at my clone. "Keep at it. Let me know if you find anything else."

"Sure thing." My clone nods uncomfortably and walks away, leaving Sensei and I alone with Amelia. Sensei's a pretty smart clone, and given he was the first one I ever made in this timeline, I feel a closer kinship with him than I do the others. He also seems to notice that she's hiding something.

"Amelia, is something wrong? You look bothered about something." I kneel down a little bit so I'm not towering two feet over her, and this seems to help her regain a little bit of composure. Why would she be intimidated by me? Even if she's hiding something, it's not like I can slap the shit out of her or something. Without my Hypersuit, she's actually way stronger than me, though I do wonder if she knows that.

"Well, err, it's about the, uhm... the talk we were having." Amelia looks into my eyes and forces the most hollow false smile I've ever seen in my life. And of course, she starts to play with her long hair. She always does that when she has that guilty look on her face.

"Right. The talk. Just spit it out, I know something happened."

She seems to grimace at my words, but I'm not one for dancing around with feelings, and it's not like I'm going to punish her if she did something wrong.

"Weeeeell, you see... that demon that was in the Peeler... I kind of... sort of... found him. And released him."

"Oh."

My mouth speaks one simple word, but my mind instantly explodes with the implications.

"So you... you let him go?"

"Yeah..."

"And he was under this building, in the Peeler..."

"...Yeah..."

"And we have a whole bunch of dead people now."

"Pretty much..."

"And they were killed by a demon."

Her face scrunches up as I say this, but she seems to have a moment of positivity in the face of this catastrophe. "It could be... any demon? Maybe? Not necessarily the one I saved?"

My throat feels drier than usual as I swallow hard. "Somehow I doubt that."

Sensei shuffles awkwardly as he takes a couple steps back and eases away from us. "I'll just... leave you two. You clearly have things to... discuss."

As he walks away, I feel anger boil in my mind, but I stuff it down. "Why did you release this demon? You know demons hate humans! That's like kicking a hornet's nest and wondering why you were stung!"

Amelia crosses her arms and glances to my side, unable to maintain eye contact. "You didn't see it with your own eyes, Jason. The person holding the demon was a torturer... he was barbaric! He hurt that demon badly!"

"Exactly! So if you let the demon go, obviously he'll have a grudge and take it out on whoever is closest! Think next time, Amelia!"

Amelia's voice lowers as she takes a step back from me. "You think this is bad, Jason? Butchering innocents is never good, but what about you? You're dropping nuclear bombs inside the labyrinth, killing demons by the millions, if not billions! Have you ever stopped to think about how this will affect their actions towards us?"

"That's not how it works. The demons have wanted humanity dead long before I arrived on the scene. The difference is that now humans have invented nuclear weapons, and the demons demonstrated they're perfectly willing to use them against us. It's us or them. We can't coexist."

Amelia seems irritated by my words, but she takes a moment to calm down before replying. "Okay, what about the future? You said humans were inside of... bubble worlds or whatever. Isn't that a form of coexisting?"

"Well, sort of. None of the humans had any form of advanced technology. Apparently the demons would come and attack their worlds periodically or something to keep them in line and prevent them from advancing technologically. That's beside the point anyway."

I take a deep breath and exhale slowly as I consider what to do next. "Why didn't you tell me? I could have helped you out."

Amelia curls her hair onto her finger and then back off as she seems to debate a response. "I don't know, honestly. You always treat me like I'm helpless or like you're afraid I'll do something wrong. You act... like you're still afraid of the me from the future you came from. That's not me, Jason."

Despite the horrible scene we're standing in and the solemnness of the moment, I feel a smile spread over my face. "Well, I mean, to be fair... you did let a demon loose and he killed a bunch of people. You have to admit that was pretty dumb."

Amelia is trying to resist smiling but she fails as we both finally return eye contact again. "Yeah, I guess you're right. I messed up. Sorry." Amelia immediately frowns obstinately as she quickly waves a finger at me. "But that doesn't mean I did the wrong thing, Jason! I won't let anyone, human, angel, or demon suffer! Torture is not the right way."

My smile fades away as I look at the ground. Truth be told, she's right. Torture isn't good. Now that I think about it, that demon may have committed this specific atrocity out of vengeance for what that torturer did to him. And really, would I prefer that he be tortured to death? Would I want that... for Belial?

Belial... Gregory... while rare, I have known a few demons that were not evil. They allied with me for various reasons, but I never got the idea that they were trying to stab me in the back. As for Satan, can I really call him evil? He's far older than me and has seen things I haven't. From his perspective, humans are evil.

It doesn't change anything, though. I have to kill off all the demons. I just... need to do it quickly.

"You're right. Torture isn't the way. Well, anyway... that demon you saved... do you know anything that can help us out?"

Amelia shrugs. "He was a shadow-walker, and a rather big one at that. His voice was really nasally, but beyond that we didn't talk much. His name was Davook, if that helps."

"I have no idea. Never heard of him." I turn to walk towards the crime scene and Amelia follows along behind me. "Did you guys talk about anything important? Anything useful?"

"Um... well, he did say he hated all humans... I didn't think much of it at the time."

I barely even flinch as she tells me this. "Of course you didn't."

* * *

This city was very hostile to non-humans, but luckily Belial was not like other demons. She looked very human, with creamy white skin and no demonic horns like the others of her kind. The only thing that stuck out about her was her cute little tail, of which she was very proud... but still, she had to cover up with far more clothing than she would usually like to be wearing. The tail would just have to stay tucked.

A drone buzzed overhead, scanning the area for non-human lifeforms, and likely demonic and angelic energy patterns. Naturally she possessed a ridiculous amount of such energy so it blared right above her, making her cringe. Even at this time of night, when few people had yet woken up, these damned drones were always out and about.

It took only a few seconds before someone arrived on scene. An enforcer, green level. He was wearing a lot of armor and a mask, but Belial could tell by the way he carried himself that he was a man. After all, he was bigger and more ripped than a female would be... and besides, female enforcers basically didn't exist.

"You! Stop right there!" The man leveled an anti-energy pistol at her, something that would weaken even her to the point of being defenseless. Still, she kept her cool. This was the third time tonight she'd had to deal with this.

Raising her hands above her head, she let her lip tremble as if she was afraid. "W-what did I do, sir? I'm just walking home!"

The man paused as he saw she was a woman. "...What are you doing out at this time of night?" He took a few steps closer but kept his gun trained on her. "That drone flagged you as a demon."

"I-I'm not a demon! I don't even have any horns! Come on, I'm just walking home!" Belial suppressed a laugh as she forced herself to keep a straight face. A little more emotional manipulation and this man would be hers to toy with.

As he walked closer, he seemed to increase his breathing tempo. "W-well, it might be an error... but the readings were off the charts..." Soon he was just a few short steps away, the radius at which her succubus aura would begin to take root quickly.

"Y-you're not going to hurt me... are you officer? I thought men of the law wouldn't take advantage of poor helpless women."

She forced a high pitched tone into her voice, though even for herself this felt rather silly. Still, he fell for it, hook line and sinker. Quickly, he tucked his gun away as an odd smile spread across his face. "No... uh, you're right. Terribly sorry. My name is uh... Jim. W-what's yours?"

"Jim? What a masculine name. You seem like a pretty tough guy." Belial lowered her hands as she slid over to him in one smooth motion, touching his face. The instant she touched him, he had lost. No human male could resist the power of a succubus caressing his skin.

"Wha... what can I do for you to-today?" He mumbled and stumbled over his own words as his smile grew to intense proportions. "Your wish is my command." He reached into his pocket without even looking and pressed a button, causing the drone to fly away without complaint.

"Oh, how I love it when an idiot says that." Belial's tone flattened now that she had already won. "Tell me where I can find the Supreme Commander's residence."

The man's smile faded as a look of guilt spread across his face. What a failure he was, being unable to answer such a simple question. This failure would haunt him for the rest of his life.

"I'm... sorry. I don't know where he lives. I'm just a low level Enforcer. Nobody tells me anything. P-please forgive me!" He quickly grabbed her shirt with a forcefulness that surprised her, as he seemed to be unable to control his lust. "I want you! Let me taste your skin!"

"Get the fuck off of me." Belial's expression darkened as she reared her hand back. A moment later, she slapped him with the force of a freight train, sending him flying backwards and smashing into a wall. Were it not for his armor, the impact would have shattered his spine.

Belial didn't care, however. Nothing worse than a man who thinks he's owed something of mine. She straightened her coat's collar as she stared at his crumpled body in disgust. "You'll probably never walk again, but I have no pity for weaklings."

As she walked away, she sighed dramatically. Three enforcers and nobody knows where he lives. I'll have to aim for someone higher up the chain of command. It's too risky, though... entering their main base. Perhaps if I wait around outside, I'll encounter someone with upper level clearance who knows. The man can't be that secretive.

As she pondered this thought, she heard the sound of several sirens approaching and quickly ducked into an alleyway. Damn, did that enforcer alert the others? He didn't even reach for a communicator.

Her questions were answered as two dozen vehicles went flying past, including multiple ambulances, all of them not seeing his body crumpled up against the wall. They were all headed in the same direction, causing her to wonder what was going on.

Quickly looking back and forth, she nodded as she saw that there were no other drones in the sky. The one from a few minutes before had already flown off. Rushing forwards, she leaped onto the roof of a small house and dashed after the vehicles, keeping herself on the far side of the houses so pedestrians at the street level wouldn't see her.

Several minutes later, she came to a stop and stared in wonder as the throng of vehicles joined another group and ended up at a hospital. One of its upper level windows had been smashed outwards, fairly recently if these members of the enforcement community were anything to go by.

Belial stared carefully though and was shocked to see the Supreme Commander himself, standing alongside one of his clones and a younger looking woman, probably in her twenties. Well, relatively speaking anyways. It was so hard to tell anymore with all the cosmetic surgeries one could get.

"Valac. Are you awake?" Belial reached into her coat and pulled out the ominous black orb and clasped it in both hands as she hunkered down behind a chimney.

"Duuuh. I don't need sleep, beautiful." Valac's voice appeared in her mind, charming as always. Despite his words, he yawned which made her raise an eyebrow, but she didn't care enough to voice her concerns.

"Any chance you can hazard a guess as to which of those is the real Supreme Commander?"

"Aye, maybe. Sorta. I'm not sure how I'm supposed to tell though." Valac rolled his eyes as his head turned in her mind's eye towards the people in the distance. "Well, of those two, one of them has a way higher energy level than the other. He's probably the real- HOLY MOTHER OF SATAN!"

Valac yelled out loudly and made Belial flinch as she took a step back. "What? What is it?!"

"That girl! My god, what is that thing inside of her? I-it's horrible! Terrifying! A goddamned monster!" Valac seemed almost panicked as he stared at the woman with a horrified expression on his face. "It's not a demon, or a human or... anything I've ever seen! It's just a mass of evil and hatred!"

Belial squinted down to get a better look at the young woman and shrugged. "She looks normal enough to me. Are you sure you're seeing correctly?"

"Hell yeah I am! There's no mistaking it, she has a vicious monster inside of her! And- oh... oh no... we need to leave. Now." Valac's voice went dead quiet, almost to a whisper, as his mental image trembled. "It... it sees me... it sees me, mistress. We need to leave right now."

Belial nodded as she cursed under her breath. The meeting with Jason would have to wait. Whatever Valac saw, it was serious business. He'd never acted like this before.

As she quickly climbed over the building and fled in the opposite direction, Belial glared at the orb in her hands. "I hope you're not messing around, Valac. This isn't funny."

His ashen face appeared in her mind, a blank expression having overtaken it now. "No... no I don't think I can joke about that. It's not from this world. It was... the personification of death itself. Nothing can stand up to... that thing. Not even Satan."

Belial bit her lip as she jumped to another building.

What the hell did he see?

* * *

Amelia stared up at the house across the street, watching silently as the demon left. Jason was busy talking to the city's mayor, as was Sensei, so neither one of them had noticed... but Levvy had.

"You're sure she saw you?" Amelia whispered, but Leviathan heard her loud as day.

I did. More specifically, there was something in her hands. It somehow saw me inside of you, and I communicated with it. Nothing verbal, but I assure you whatever it was, it learned the true meaning of fear.

"Let's hope that's the last of them." Amelia finally turned her head back to the conversation Jason was having, now that the demoness was gone. "She felt strong. Even I could sense her power from here. Good thing Jason doesn't know how to sense power innately."

It's likely she couldn't sense you because Jason was nearby. Out in the open, I'm sure she would have said the same thing of you.

"But the thing in her hands detected you, Levvy. Why is that?"

It seemed to be a device of an odd nature. Perhaps it is in a similar position as me, a being of immense power trapped inside that orb. As such, it would be able to sense me while the demon female wouldn't.

"Mmm. Let's keep this between us. Jason doesn't need to know."

Agreed.

Part 353a:

June 2nd, 2117.

Amy groaned inwardly to herself as she heard her car's horn being frantically slammed on, over and over again. Geez, that girl needs to learn some patience.

She flicked her eyes around desperately, the awful nagging noise outside nearly driving her up the wall. Where did I put that damn purse? She speed-walked into the kitchen, pulling open the oven door just to check. Not there. Thankfully. I'll know I'm getting old if that happens.

She sighed and took a deep breath, then found herself wondering about that last thought. Come to think of it... I'm a hundred and four years old. I've only had one child and that was barely a decade ago. I don't... feel very old though. Certainly not over a hundred... shouldn't I be taking up knitting or something?

As she stood there tapping on her lip for a few moments, the back door to the kitchen was flung open and her daughter took a step inside before noticing her mother. "Come on, mom! We're going to be late!"

"I know, sweetheart. I'm just... trying to find my purse. I know I left it here somewhere..."

Sarah scrunched up her face in confusion. "What? I already took that out to the car. Let's go!"

Amy groaned audibly before a smile crept over her face. "God, you had me worried for a second. Thought I was getting Alzheimer's or something."

"As if. You don't look a day over thirty! Now stop dawdling or I'll be late for recital!" Sarah didn't wait for an answer as she ducked back out the door, leaving it open behind her.

"Why are you leaving the back door open... the car is out front..." Amy grumbled to herself as she slammed the door and locked it, turning to walk back towards the front door. "Jerry, we're leaving the house now! Go ahead and lock it down in security mode."

The android quickly walked around the corner, nodding his head mechanically. "Response: Yes ma'am! I am ready to defend this house to the last pulse of energy!"

"Aww, you're working on your sense of humor! Ta-ta!" Amy shut the door behind herself as that odd automaton smiled at her weirdly from behind. It wasn't the AI she had expected thanks to movies from her youth, but at least it wasn't trying to go Terminator and kill her. Overall, she considered it a win-win.

Minutes later, she and her daughter were on the road, the radio tuned to a pop station the two of them liked as they bobbed their heads and moved to the beat.

"Last week, I met this girl in choir and we hit it off so well! I think she might be my new best friend or something! She's dating this guy and he's alright but she was asking me if the three of us could go to the beach this Sunday."

Sarah babbled and gushed about her new friends and Amy smiled politely, though she seemed relatively unconcerned about the whole thing. "Yeah, you can go. Just make sure to bring some sun-tan. It's starting to really shine lately. Weird since London has always been a really cloudy place."

"Yeah, I know what you mean. Ever since the nuclear attack a few years ago..." Sarah trailed off for a moment as she glanced out the side of the hover-car to the west. "It's already been seven years but it feels like yesterday. I was just a little girl when the demons attacked us."

"You were, indeed." Amy spoke cautiously as she thought about her own feelings regarding the attack. "The anniversary is next month. I wonder if the new Supreme Commander will take any steps to rename the day, maybe make it a holiday or something."

Sarah scrunched up her face as she glanced at her mom in confusion. "Rename it? Why would he do that?"

"Well, the footage of the attack stirs up a lot of emotions for those of it who lived in fear for years after the attack. Many people think another one is coming, or maybe even that it was a false flag to justify Stonewall's actions against the demons. Renaming it to Peace and Prosperity Day, like some of the news commentators have suggested, would help move those feelings into the past. I think it's time to move on."

Amy took a minor detour, seeing as a traffic accident was making the local Enforcers re-route vehicles to the west or east. Sarah seemed to mull over her mother's thoughts for a few moments.

"Yeah, I guess that might help some people... still, there's something else that's bugging me."

Her tone seemed serious, making Amy glance over at her. "What's that?"

"You! You keep bringing up the Supreme Commander out of thin air! It's like you're always thinking about him or something!" Sarah's expression brightened into a playful smile as she teased her mom. "Dad is your number one though, right? You'd never cheat on him, would you?"

Amy blanched as she stared at her daughter in amazement. "What? Never! I can't believe you'd even think such a thing!"

"I'm just kidding. Jeez." Sarah puffed her lip out as she turned to stare out the window at the buildings they were passing by.

"Ah, sorry. Don't joke about that though. Your father means the world to me... to the both of us." Amy felt a weird air settling in the car and decided to try and make it pass quickly. "Besides, I bet the Supreme Commander is more up your alley anyway."

"What?! No way, he's way too old! I don't ever want to date a guy that much older than me!" Now it was Sarah's turn to look shocked, giving Amy a much needed chuckle as she rounded the last corner and pulled into the mega-church parking lot.

"Well, we're here, Sarah. Have a good day and put your heart into choir." Amy leaned over and kissed her daughter on the cheek, feeling a slight dismay as Sarah leaned away from her. Right, I keep forgetting she's too old for that now.

Sarah blushed as a group of people walked past the car and stared inside at them. "Well, erm, anyway! Bye mom, love you!" Sarah climbed out quickly and slammed the door, taking her bag along with her as she headed into church.

I'd love to join you, but work calls. Amy sighed as she watched her daughter walk away. A few moments later, she pulled forwards and started driving the rest of the way to her day job.

* * *

"Uhhhhh..."

I can't believe my eyes. How did she get past security? I'm actually speechless right now.

"Uh? Is that how you really want to greet me?" Belial stares at me and I feel this weird sensation in the back of my mind. She's not just a strong demon, but apparently crafty as hell too.

Here I am coming back to my office in the London HQ to grab some papers, and a freaking succubus is sitting in my personal office's chair, behind my desk. How could she have gotten past the energy scanners? Are they useless? Do they serve any point at all if someone with her power can just sneak in?

Well, at least she's wearing clothes this time. The last time I remember seeing her, she was wearing some skimpy outfit as she likes to do. For once she's wearing an actual feminine business suit. Maybe she infiltrated the place by looking totally normal?

"Belial. I just... didn't expect to see you. What brings you here to say hello?" I quickly close the door behind me as I glance around the room. She hasn't touched anything and appears to have just been sitting here... waiting. She already closed the blinds so no random person walking past could see in, and my door's sign still said 'Out of the office'... the only question is how long she's been waiting.

She seems miffed for a moment, almost as if my question touched a nerve. "You never called."

"I... beg your pardon?" I furrow my brow as I take a few steps forwards and sit down across from her... on the other side of MY desk. This feels like when I talked to Stonewall in this very room, all over again.

"I gave you my card. When you took me prisoner, you made it sound like you were going to call me. You never did." She crosses her arms and raps her fingers against her biceps impatiently.

"Sorry. I kind of... forgot." I smile weakly and she rolls her eyes in response. "I really did mean to call though, but after everything that happened, I was dragged away and the call slipped my mind."

"Whatever. It's not like the time taken matters, since we're both immortal." She seems to relax in the chair a little bit and her arms slacken up.

"How did you get past security?" I decide to try the direct approach, seeing as this is really bugging me.

"You think I'll tell you? A woman has her secrets." She shoots a cunning smiles at me as I nod in return.

"You must have seduced your way past the men. I'll have to keep that in mind for the future."

She pulls back and her posture stiffens, telling me I was on the right track. "Lucky guess."

"In my experience, Belial, there's no such thing as mere luck. Only knowledge and how you use it. I know you too well."

She seems to appreciate my candor. "Glad to hear it. In fact, that's why I wanted to talk to you. You've been on my mind ever since we last spoke a few years ago."

"It's been a lot longer than a 'few' years." I correct her pointedly and she smiles in return.

"Time moves differently for me than it does for you. If you manage to live for several thousand years, you'll understand. Anyway, getting back on topic." She leans forwards and rests her arms on the desk. "It's about the future. I have many questions that I can't answer, though I'm not sure if you will answer for me. Namely... it's about... Satan."

Despite her pretenses, I can tell now that she's very uncomfortable about something, in a way one conversation won't get out of the way. "What about him?"

"You told me he dies in the future. How?"

"I can't tell you that. I'm not going to answer specifics about the future." I keep my resolve in the face of a woman I once loved, but the look of pain on her face isn't helping make it easy.

"Jason..." Her face shifts and I can't help but notice that she seems to look almost melancholy now. "Even if we were an item in the future... that was then. This is now. I don't want him to die. You've been destroying the labyrinth and killing demons in catastrophic numbers... he'll have to take serious action at some point soon. When he does..." I felt my heart pounding just a little faster as her pupils seemed to dilate slightly, as if a strange feeling was being beamed into my mind. "...are you going to spare him?"

I shake my head quickly, trying to get the oppressive aura out of my head. "I don't know. I won't know until that day comes. Asking me is futile, because I don't have the capability to predict the future. I only know as much about it as I do when it stays on the correct path, and it's already straying now."

"Mmm. I wonder." She pulled back in the chair and seemed unconvinced. "You think it's changing, then?"

"I do."

"Would you say the changes are positive or negative?" She stares at me pointedly and I frown as I try to guess at the meaning of her words.

"I don't follow."

"Well, you're killing off the demons, the Volgrim are gone, humans are soon to become the dominant superpower, and it's likely the angels will fall afterwards. Is this a victory, in your opinion? Have you truly won?" As she hits me with questions, I find myself wondering if she was always this philosophical in the future.

"In some ways, yes. In others, no. My goals have changed though. The future I sought to preserve while only changing the parts that were bad was too indeterminate. I need to change it more dramatically. I need to make sure the demons don't rule the universe."

"I see. And the best way to achieve that goal is to kill all of us?"

"Well, for the most part, yes."

"Even me?"

She stares into my eyes softly and I feel my mind form the word 'no', but my heart relents. "Maybe."

"Hm." She barely seems affected by my opinion. "Why not kill me now? Why bother waiting?"

Damn. She's got me there. "I... I'm still not sure about that yet."

"So that's how it is? I think I'm beginning to get the picture. You'll kill off all of the demons, except for me, and you'll use me as a slave to fulfill your desires. Is that about how you see it? Maybe you'll keep a few other succubus girls too. Can't be locked to one slave when you're the almighty ruler, can you?"

My eyes widen as she says this. "What?! No! That's outrageous! I'd never do that!"

"Are you certain? You seemed to want to make peace with the Volgrim once, and look how that turned out. You eradicated them. You sounded like you weren't really an enemy of my people when we last spoke, yet now you slaughter us. What are you, Jason? Friend? Or foe?" Her expression has darkened considerably, and now she looks really angry.

I struggle to find words and instead opt not to respond. I don't know... if it's just 'demons', then exterminating them seems easy. But... Belial... Samantha... I don't consider her an enemy. I can't just kill her.

"Words fail, then? I understand. This is what I came for, and I've gotten my answer." She seems to sneer at me, almost as if in disgust. "If you wanted a fuck-toy, you could have just asked. Killing off all the friends and family that belong to me, only to selfishly let me live for your own pleasure... you really are nauseating. I don't know what sick future I came from, but if it means that I ever entertained the notion of being with you... I'd sooner impale myself than let that happen."

She stands up from the chair abruptly, interrupting my train of thoughts. "Wait, Belial. Don't go... this isn't the way you think it is. It's not like that." I'm panicking, wondering how the conversation shifted so rapidly. I'm not good with calming down angry people.

"Oh sure it isn't. I've known many men, many rulers. I know how men work. You're a selfish, arrogant little shit. You act as if you're doing this for the good of humanity, or whatever noble ambition you might be pursuing, but it's all to preserve the parts of the future that you like. I bet that if you get your wish, it will be humans that rule the galaxy and demons will just be left in groups to be hunted for sport. That's what you really want, isn't it?"

She walks around the desk and starts to walk past me, but I grab her hand that's dangling by her side. "Wait... Lilia. Don't go."

She yanks her hand away from me as a flash of anger blasts across her face. "You even know the name Satan gave me?! I would never share that with you! You must be quite the mind-controller in the future." She freezes for a second, and I suddenly realize it's not just anger she's feeling. Her shoulders are shaking, as if she's fighting back tears.

"I won't kill the demons then. I'll spare Satan!" I quickly jump to my feet, but before I can say another word, a single tear streaks down her cheek.

"That won't be enough. It's too late for that now!"

My vision goes spotty as a flash of hand movement appears out of nowhere. A moment later, I'm lying on the ground, dazed, as my hearing goes in and out. I close my eyes, then open them a few seconds later as a dull ringing appears.

I'm... on top of something uncomfortable. My back screams in pain as I suddenly realize that there's someone standing over me, waving his hands and yelling something I can't understand. A sharp feeling digs into my back as I painfully notice I'm on top of some rubble. My natural regeneration starts to kick in, aided by Excalibur as I finally comprehend what happened.

She hit me. Hard.

I must have smashed through three series of walls, an attack that would have killed any normal human. If it weren't for my incredibly durable body, I might have been turned into Jello.

My spine screams in pain, as someone quickly touches my shoulder.

"Supreme Commander! I am doctor Nielson, how are you feeling? Can you speak properly?" He shines a light into my eyes as I glance around in confusion.

"Where... did she go?"

The doctor glances behind himself to follow my gaze. "The intruder? She escaped sir. We're in pursuit now. You were unconscious for several minutes. Can you count how many fingers I'm holding up?"

Several minutes? It felt like a few seconds. The pain is screaming in my body, but I can already feel my organs starting to knit themselves together. In minutes I'll be fine.

"Four. I'm alright, doctor. Just give me a few minutes to walk it off, and I'll be in perfect condition." I reached back and rubbed my back, stifling a pained gag as I realized I had landed on a sharp rock that impaled my spinal cord. Luckily, unlike the last time my spine was badly injured, I've already healed most of the damage up.

Belial is gone now, and I doubt the Enforcers will be able to follow her.

That was no mere slap... it was delivered with brutal intent. I almost think... she was trying to end me in one blow.

The woman I once loved tried to kill me. This is definitely a new future I'm headed towards.

Part 354a: Grasp Of Evil

The humans were far too slow, and much too weak. They had no chance of catching her. Belial jumped from rooftop to rooftop with speed and grace, as she fled the scene of the crime.

Not that she considered it a crime. The human known as Jason was a repugnant man. A master manipulator, one who was toying with her for his own reasons.

To think I had any interest in him. He's worse than the worst rulers I ever despised. In the encroaching darkness of the night, her swift form could hardly be seen as she moved with a litheness few had ever witnessed before.

She nimbly leaped down from a rooftop, landing in a small area several blocks away from the London HQ where she picked up a custom built box, given to her as a gift by Satan some years earlier. In retrospect, she mused that it had likely been created by Marie at his request, and Belial was no fan of Marie, but this box was quite useful.

Popping it open, she felt an evil power surge outwards from within as she pulled the orb of darkness out. Valac, as always, seemed annoyed that she had shut him inside a pitch black place like that.

"Great! You're back! I couldn't be happier if I wanted to be." Sarcasm dripped from his voice, his annoyance unmistakable at this point.

"Sorry. You know it was hard enough getting in the building without the orb setting off every alarm for a mile around. Besides, it's not like you missed me, is it?" Belial smiled coyly at the orb and Valac smacked his forehead in her mental vision.

"Get over yourself. You know, you're not the most pleasant person to talk to, but you're the only damn demon who ever touches my orb. Anyway, how did it go with the kid?" Valac quickly moved past his disdain as he inquired about that which had likely bugged him for the last hour or so.

"I might have killed him. Hard to tell." She cocked her head as the sound of distant sirens could be heard. They were still looking for her, and considering she had attacked the Supreme Commander, the consequences would be dire if they found her.

"...You killed him? What?! WHY?! You were crowing about him and touching yourself in weird places and getting all hot and bothered for all those years... only to kill the guy?! Why are females so irrational?!"

Belial rolled her eyes so hard she could almost see the inside of her head. "My god, keep the exaggerations down please, I'll snap my own neck if you keep shouting such nonsense. I held no feelings for him and did no such touching. If you keep grossing me out I'll leave you in a dumpster next time."

Valac sneered as he seemed to lean back into an invisible chair. "As if. What a liar. Only the devil knows how many naughty thoughts you had about that human. I just don't get why you'd attack him... almost wish I'd been there to get the full context."

Belial stuffed his orb in her suit pocket, wondering to herself why she didn't wear such practical clothing more often, before realizing that it was because she always felt so stifled by it. "It doesn't matter anyway, he's probably dead now. Somehow I doubt it, and even if he is, I'm sure that weird clone we saw could replace him. As I recall from when we fought years ago, he has hundreds more after that one. I can't see any way to eliminate him... and he poses an existential threat to our kind."

Belial flinched as a voice yelled in the distance, likely belonging to an Enforcer. Truth be told even a small contingent of them wouldn't be able to stop her, but she was weak to anti-energy weapons just the same as any other demon. More so than some due to her high concentration of magical power.

She started to move but felt ridges under her shoes which gave her pause. The sewers.

While not the ideal place to traverse, she shrugged and pulled the manhole cover off, climbing down inside quickly as she pulled it closed behind her. Enforcers would surely check down here, but they would need a special team to be put in place since the sewers were like a maze under the city. Far too easy to get lost in.

The place reeked. It was indeed a sewer, as she crushed a rat that walked too close under her boots without a second thought. The smell was almost acrid and it burned her lungs, plus it felt like she was being watched, even in this near-total darkness.

Belial made a few motions with her free hand as she mumbled a few words and touched her eyes. A moment later, she opened her eyes and blinked quickly as a sort of demonic night-vision allowed her to see things more clearly. She knew from past experience that it made her eyes glow red, which some had called creepy or even scary, while others found it fascinating or endearing.

Truly, anything could be an acquired taste if one put their mind to the task.

Valac grimaced as his gaze flicked all around the place. "Sewer systems... one invention made by humans that I'll never understand. Smelly and useless, it just flushes the waste out of sight and back into fresh-water down the line. Don't the fools know they're ruining their clean drinking water?"

"I don't... huaaah..." Belial started to speak but found herself gagging as the awful odors entered her mouth. "...don't think that's how it works. It gets cleaned up at the end of the line and made drinkable again. Or... something. I don't know, honestly."

Most demons were incapable of comprehending human technologies. Even the most basic things that an elderly technologically illiterate human could somewhat understand presented a challenge to any demon. Whether it was due to nature or nurture, they simply treated technology like alien artifacts... unexplainable and incomprehensible.

"Humans convert this... this filth... and consume it again? Truly, they treat us like beasts, but they wallow in their own filth and let it flow freely beneath their great cities. Barbaric, if you ask me."

Valac seemed disgusted by the concepts of sewage treatment, but Belial was having other issues. Her eyes were watering due to some unknown chemicals in the air, and her breathing was strained as she walked further down the twisting corridors.

Minutes passed and the two of them kept relatively silent as she wandered in a mostly straight line, taking lefts and rights when dead-ends popped up before her.

She suddenly missed a step and tripped forwards, plunging her leg into the filth and quickly jerking her foot back out in horror. "Augh, seven devils! If the humans used their brains, this would be the model for Hell!"

As she shook her foot, a strange feeling of dread spread over her body.

Valac seemed on edge too. "Belial. We're being watched."

"Mmm." She felt her body tense up as she glanced around carefully. The corridor she was in extended a long ways in front of and behind her, with several branching paths. If they were being tailed, the unwanted guest could be hiding anywhere.

The problem was... the more she looked around, the more she had the feeling that she wasn't being watched from one location, but from everywhere... all at once.

"I... I can't get a bead on them. Whoever they are, it's like they're part of the walls themselves. I can't tell where they're located." Valac seemed increasingly nervous, his disgust from earlier gone.

As for Belial, the fumes in the air seemed to be getting progressively worse. "I... kah... I think they're trying to weaken me. I need to... hng... I need to get out of here..." She felt her stomach tighten up as pain started to hit her in waves. Quickly she glanced up at the ceiling. She had left the manhole behind several blocks away and getting back there wouldn't take too long, but this person following them might be waiting in that direction for her.

But why go through a manhole? She had more than enough power to create her own exit.

Steeling herself, she bent down and coiled her legs, rearing her fist back. A moment later, she leaped upwards and punched at the ceiling with one mighty swing of her fist.

That was when things went horribly wrong.

Something unseen jumped up from the floor, grabbing hold of her leg and yanking her down with incredible force, slamming her into the ground so hard that she yelped in pain as a snapping sound could be heard. Belial whipped her head back in horror to see that her leg was broken in an unnatural position, and... something pure black as Death itself had wrapped around, holding her firmly in place.

"What the hell?! Valac! Heal me, quickly!" She barked the order and immediately felt energy rush into her body, mending her leg in under two seconds as she ignored the pain. Yanking with all her might, she pulled and tugged but was unable to break free from its grip.

Seconds later, the unthinkable happened. The walls themselves seemed to come alive as black tendrils shot forwards, grabbing her arms and other leg, wrapping around her neck and body and pulling her limbs in an assortment of directions, making fighting them incredibly hard.

She wriggled and shifted, but no matter how she fought, she couldn't break free of whatever this monster's limbs were. "V-Valac! Give me power! Get me out of th-" before she could finish, another tendril shot from the ceiling, forming a fist of iron as it punched her directly in the face, smashing several teeth from her mouth and spraying blood everywhere.

She blinked as her consciousness wavered between reality and a dream world, as a harsh male voice finally spoke.

" Don't fight it. I'm not here for you. "

She tried to move her mouth but her jaw wasn't working right. Her eyes attempted to move around, but she was feeling a strange sensation wash over her mind, almost as if a presence had invaded her mental barriers.

As she blinked slowly, a figure came into view. A pure black being, comprised of black flames... or smoke... or something otherworldly.

A demon? Belial stared at it, not quite understanding what she was seeing.

" You have something I want. The power of darkness. I have been following you since I learned to see the thin threads of fate that bind the demons of this world to their master in the Labyrinth. Puppets following a false prophet. You, however, are special. You possess an object that will give me the power to resist. "

Belial mumbled incoherently but she couldn't form words. Valac, however, was able to take up the slack. "What the hell?! You're a demon?! I've never seen an evolution like yours before! Don't you know this is your empress, the Second Emperor of Hell, directly under Satan himself?! Release her at once!"

The strange black demon smiled coldly, as an image of haunting terror spread across his face. " You think that title gives her power over me? I have no need for those bound to a false master. You, however... you are sentient. Most interesting. I had assumed you were merely an object of condensed power. That is my error. "

Belial flinched as the black demon leaned over her and gently plucked the orb from her hands, though in her hazy state of mind she could barely even feel it leave her grasp.

Valac scowled as his image appeared in her mind. "Don't let him take me, mistress! I don't like him, he's just too terrible!"

Belial sighed as she felt her eyes beginning to droop. Really, I just need to rest a little bit. For some reason, I'm more tired than I should be. Take it easy, Valac... hope you don't miss me too much...

She felt something wrap around her throat tightly and blinked her eyes back open, only to find herself gazing into eyes of pure evil as the shadowy figure stared at her intently, his hand clutching her throat.

" When you wake up and report your failure to your owner... be sure and let him know that trying to find me is useless. I am everywhere, and nowhere, all at once. I am Yama, and I belong to no-one. If he comes, I will put an end to him swiftly and mercilessly. "

He chucked her back to the ground viciously, though Belial didn't even feel her head hit the concrete. For some reason, she was losing all feeling in her body, even the perception of pain.

" Sleep now, wench. Pray that you never see me again. "

Belial closed her eyes, all too happy to obey his command. For some reason, sleep was exactly what she wanted right then.

This would be a nap like no other before it.

Part 355a: False Prophets

Sarah and her entire choir group stared in confusion, halting their singing abruptly right in the middle of a high note.

"An... angel?" One of the boys in the choir blinked twice as he tried to make sense of what he was seeing. Glancing upwards, he and many other people in the audience gawked at the hole in the ceiling. This angel had smashed through the ceiling and slammed onto the stage, rather than appearing with a bright light as Raphael had done on previous occasions. Impacting the stage with his feet and landing without taking any visible damage, his arrival had released a small shockwave that rippled around the room.

Sarah swallowed silently as she clenched and loosened her hands. She moved her eyes to where her mother would usually stand in the audience, but she wasn't here today. She was working, as she always did. Sarah silently wondered to herself what her mother would think of this sudden angelic appearance.

"My friends! I have returned, from beyond the grave!"

The angel's voice boomed around the massive auditorium, defying how a single voice should sound without the aid of microphones and speakers. Moreover, Sarah recognized the iconic voice almost immediately.

"Father Clarence...?" She barely spoke his name, letting it trickle out in a whisper. He stood only a couple dozen feet in front of the choir, his back to them.

If Father Clarence is here, and he's an angel now... then... that must mean...

"It has been a month since the false god slayed me on stage, right before your eyes! The one who calls himself Raphael, an archangel of the highest order... he is a FAKE!"

Clarence's voice sounded much deeper than usual, and seemed to push aside a cloudy feeling in the minds of many in the audience as they gawked at him in confusion. How can he be standing here? Their expressions seemed to ask the question non-verbally.

"I was murdered in front of everyone here! Ask yourselves, my friends... what righteous god do we follow? Would the God of the new testament allow one of his angels to smite a prophet in front of his believers? Would the God of the Holy Bible allow such a brutal murder in front of the flock which he leads? No! God is just! God is righteous!"

Clarence spread his wings outwards and beckoned to them proudly. "Look! See how he has blessed me! For my services in spreading his word, I was granted the immortal body of an angel, and sent forth to warn his loyal sheep of the treachery that has been committed in his name!"

As Clarence gesticulated with his hands, Sarah felt worry enter her mind. Treachery? What is he talking about? Does he mean the archangel?

"Remember that day, a month ago, my friends! Remember that I spoke of my failures in life... I am a sinner. I... I am a sinner." Clarence bowed his head for a moment and Sarah felt her lip trembling, as if she was fighting back tears all of a sudden, just the same as he must be doing. She wiped at her eyes and wondered for a moment where the strong emotional shift had come from.

"I... I am a sinner. Yet, God recognized the righteousness in my heart! The false angel who struck me down did not wish for my message to be heard, but you shall hear it now. The angels are using humanity! They are controlled by the demons, and never lift a finger to help us except when it makes them look good! Think, for a moment... think back to when we first saw the angels. They arrived all at once on a field of battle, and killed many Volgrim. But ask yourselves this... have you ever seen an angel kill a demon?"

Sarah raised an eyebrow at his question. What does he mean by that? Is he saying angels don't kill demons? I mean, come to think of it... I never have seen that happen...

"The answer is no!" Clarence spread his arms out dramatically as he bellowed at the crowd. "All the angels are corrupt! They're using the followers of Christ to further their own greedy ambitions! Listen, I am not a perfect man... but my heart is in the right place. I opened up my body to the power of Christ, and he has compelled me to act!" Clarence leaned towards the crowd and several of them leaned forwards in return, eager to hear what he had to say next. This was what they had been waiting for. Without Clarence, they had lost their way over the last month.

Clarence isn't lying. He has seen the face of god and been rewarded. It... makes sense.

Sarah felt her posture become melancholic as she listened to him. If what he was saying was correct... then going to Church meant nothing. They were worshiping false gods... giving their praise to liars and con artists.

As if to answer her thoughts, Clarence spoke quietly. "However... it doesn't have to be this way. There is another, one last angel who serves the One True God... she is the one spoken of in your bibles... the mother of Jesus Christ himself! I'm talking, of course, about Saint Marie. She gave birth to the son of god, and as such she is linked to the one true god through a sort of blood union. Behold!" Clarence procured an image from his coat and held it up for the audience to see.

A faded painting of an angelic woman was projected onto the screen behind him, as one of the ceiling cameras zoomed in to give everyone a better view. Sarah glanced behind herself up at the massive viewscreen and gaped at the beautiful woman on the screen. She looked young and fresh, as if she was an expectant mother. The painting was almost sepia-colored and looked very old.

Still, Sarah felt a nagging feeling in the back of her mind. Did he say 'Marie'? Wasn't Jesus' mother name 'Mary'? It's a small thing, maybe it's just how he says it. Then again, she was originally a Hebrew so maybe this is her real name...

Sarah didn't quite feel convinced, but still Clarence continued. "Saint Marie is the key! She is the only angel in Heaven that can stand up to the archangels! They have hidden her son away and used their combined power to seal away the Creator, the one true God in Heaven! Please, I beg of all the people in this room, you must stop praying to the false archangels and their false gods, and begin praying to the one angel who can save us! Only true faith will save you from the sins of blasphemy and ignoring the plight of our Creator!"

Clarence fell to his knees, as tears began to stream down his face. His sincerity made several people in the room also begin to cry. "If the traitor archangels have their way, we will perish at the hands of the demons! Don't let them take the souls of your children, and your children's children! You have to fight them! You can't give in! I am here to-"

Before Clarence could finish, a bright flash of light exploded above the roof of the church, blinding everyone and making them shield their eyes as they looked away. A moment later, they looked back up and gasped audibly.

A beautiful woman, an angel who surely was the one Clarence spoke of, floated downwards gently, landing beside Clarence on the stage. She was dressed modestly, yet her face shone like the mid-day sun. Sarah began to almost feel a longing inside of herself, despite the fact the angel was a woman.

"It is... as Clarence has said." The woman's voice was soft, almost demure. "I am Saint Marie. Clarence gained a secret power from the Creator himself and freed me from the shackles that the archangels bound me in. I have come today to implore you... give me your strength... we can fight the imposters, but only if we work together. I am... just a woman after all."

Her soft eyes blinked slowly as she glanced around the audience. Several men who met her gaze took a step back in awe, even as their wives shot them dirty looks.

"YEAH!" The audience roared with delight as they raised their bibles high. Despite being unprompted, their energy was infectious. Even the choir group pumped their fists up, and Sarah felt compelled to follow them.

"I thank you. When we have ousted those who stabbed my son Jesus in the back from Heaven... truly... everyone here will get what is coming to them. You have my thanks."

The audience screamed happily as Sarah found herself grinning from ear to ear. This is it... this explains why we can't kill those demons! They're being helped by traitor angels! We have to help Father Clarence!

As the audience whooped and hollered, Clarence and Marie met each other's eyes, both of them nodding imperceptibly to each other.

The ploy had worked... for now.

* * *

Sarah slowly walked out of the Church, a couple hours later, her legs feeling like lead. Her wrist communicator blinked slowly as a new message indicator appeared on its screen, tapping it, she nodded as she read the message. On my way, sweetie, be there in fifteen minutes! Hope you had a great day at recital! You go, girl!!

Sarah smiled weakly as she tried to digest what had happened. Father Clarence had appeared back from the dead, he had revealed the angels were traitors to humanity... and now she had a mission to pray to Saint Marie tonight.

She closed off the communicator with a tap as she stared ahead absentmindedly at the front gate. An air-bus flew down from the sky and hovered up front, landing slowly on the ground as people entered it to leave and be flown to their homes around town. Good to see they're using public transport and helping the environment. Sarah scratched her chin as the bus left.

Looking around absentmindedly, she walked over and sat on a bench, noting with disinterest that an old man was sitting on it as well. As she sat down, he spoke up almost immediately, making her cringe. Oh great, a chatty Cathy.

"Hey, how ya doin' young missy?"

She carefully glanced over at him, noting his disheveled hair and the stains on his brown coat. He looked like a vagabond. Damn. I shouldn't have sat here so casually. Now it'll be awkward if I get up and walk away.

"I'm fine, I guess." She kept her tone neutral as she glanced away, trying to put off a vibe of polite disinterest.

The old idiot didn't seem to get the picture. "You're a real cutie! Say, do you go to this here church too?" He had a real pep in his voice and when she looked back at him, she couldn't help but stare at his nasty browned teeth.

"Yeah. I'm in the choir."

"Oh wow, so you must've been right behind them angels when they appeared, eh? Father Clarence, back from the dead! Ain't that a sight ta' see?"

"Mhm. It was really something." Sarah turned away again but she could feel him staring at her expectantly, waiting for her to continue the conversation, and it was making her feel weird. "Uh, I'm not sure though... the whole thing just felt... off."

"Mmm. Mmm. You noticed it too, then, eh?" The old man's smile faded somewhat as his voice dropped in tone. "Them angels sure seemed fishy to me. Seemed like Father Clarence wasn't quite bein' honest with us, if I do say so myself."

Despite her misgivings towards the old man, Sarah found her curiosity piqued. "Not being honest? What do you mean?"

"Oh, you know... old fart like me. I've seen enough people ta' know when they're fibbin'! I ain't sure how big a lie he was tellin', but the truth it wasn't! Ya gotta take what ya hear with a grain of salt, otherwise folks'll bamboozle ya when ya least expect it. Ya know what I mean?"

Sarah stared at him silently for a few moments. In truth, she wasn't a good liar. She had never really needed to lie about anything. Knowing this, she probably wasn't very good at detecting lies either...

Jeez, if only mom had been here and seen it live... she might know what's right and what's wrong about this.

"What lie did they tell? Any ideas?"

The old man leaned back in the bench, sighed as he stared somewhat up into the cloudy sky above. "Ain't sure, kid. I done been around a long time, seen a lot o' things... opportunists always come out of the woodwork eventually, lookin' to profit in one way or another. Ya just can't trust anyone these days."

"So you're saying I shouldn't trust anybody at all? Seems lonely."

"Oh, come on, girl." The old man snickered, despite his somewhat muted tone. "You know that ain't what I meant. You're a pretty young thing, got yer whole life ahead of you... but I see it coming. Gotta watch out."

Sarah smiled lopsidedly as imagined question marks appeared above her head. This guy was full of riddles. "You see... what coming?"

His smile faded away and for once he seemed totally serious. "The end times. This was prophesied, ya know. The Bible warns us that the apocalypse will come. Nobody really believes that, though. They come to church just 'cause they want to compare clothes... too vapid to see the truth."

Sarah nodded hesitantly as she felt herself wanting to shrink away from him. Great. He's a crazy hobo. I knew this conversation was a bad idea.

She didn't get to respond. Her mother zipped up and spotted her daughter, beckoning to her from the car. As Sarah stood up, she waved politely to the old man. "Um, nice talking to you sir. I'm, uh, Sarah! Have a good day!"

Damnit, why'd I tell him my name? God, I hope he doesn't turn out to be a stalker or something. Sarah felt her face turn white at the thought.

The old man stopped brooding and smiled back at her pleasantly. "Oh, that must be your parents then. Have a nice day, cutie, be seeing you 'round!"

"Right... sure thing." Sarah smiled uncomfortably as she quickly dashed over to the car and yanked open the door, turning to stare at her mother as she sat down in her seat and breathed carefully.

"Mom. You will not believe what happened today."

Part 356a: Longing

"Lilia? Where have you been?" Satan gaped at the Second Emperor, immediately wondering to himself why she was wearing a business suit, and then immediately following up that mental question with another about why her body was banged up. Her eye socket was black and blue, as if she'd been punched incredibly hard, and she was limping noticeably.

She held herself against the wall and fell forwards as exhaustion took over, but Satan caught her and eased her down to the ground gently as he cradled her in his arms. "You're... a mess. Where have you been? I haven't seen you in weeks."

She coughed weakly. "I was attacked... a demon... named Yama... he crushed me. I didn't stand a chance."

She brought her hand up and gingerly touched her eye, but Satan moved it away to get a better look, wincing in shared pain at how bad it looked. "Don't move, I'll heal you up. Yama, you said? I've never heard of him. What demon could possibly have the power to do this to you, of all demons?" Satan held his hand over her eye as he quickly chanted healing magic to fix up her eye. Truth be told, he wasn't very adept at healing, but marks like this might demoralize the healers. None of the Emperors had ever been reduced to such a pitiful state, not in all the time he'd been alive.

"He was... I don't know. A lot happened. He took Valac." Lilia winced as she felt her eye socket mending together, but Satan paused to stare at her carefully as his hand lowered slowly.

"He... took Valac? You let him take the dark orb of power?"

She pulled away from him and sat up, leaning against the wall. Her gaze met his, and hers was full of confusion. "I didn't 'let him' do anything, Satan. He ambushed us. His power was unthinkable. The shadows came alive and attacked me from every direction, and even my strength couldn't help me break free."

Satan nodded along calmly, forcing himself to contain what could only be described as a creeping anger. "Shadows? What do you mean?"

"It happened so fast..." Lilia rubbed her sore leg, noting with disdain that Valac had only been able to partially heal it before he was taken away. "When I first saw him, we were in a dark underground sewer in London, and-"

Satan interrupted her. "London? What were you doing in the human capital? Do you have a death wish?"

"Well, no, but I was trying to gather intelligence on... human activities."

Her explanation made him instantly suspicious. Lilia was not one to do such things. She was hardly even a ruler, given she seemed to care so little for other demons. The only reason she could hold claim to the title of Second Emperor was due to her sheer overwhelming power.

Even then... she had been bested by a no-name demon he'd never even heard of before. Was she truly as powerful as he once thought? Had she gone soft since the Great War in Heaven? Two thousand years was a long time to let one's combat skills degrade...

"Continue." Satan hissed the order at her in a most uncharacteristic fashion, and she seemed rather hurt by his tone. Still, she relented.

"As I was saying... Valac and I were in the sewers sneaking under the city when the demon attacked us. I thought he was a shadow-walker at first, but that couldn't have been the case. Yama had no actual skin and seemed to be comprised of smoke... or mist... in the darkness, even with my enhanced vision, I could hardly see him."

"Hmm... perhaps a variant of some sort." Satan frowned as he looked away for a moment. Did he give any energy to a shadow-walker recently? Not that he could remember. There was of course the standard amount of energy given to all when a battle was won, but the demons had suffered heavy losses as of late with no wins to speak of.

In fact, the more he thought about how bleak their situation was, the more baffled he became. Who could this demon be that was able to defeat Lilia?

"Well... that's not all. While I was in London, Valac was very frightened by something... he told me that there was a human female with a... well... he didn't say, exactly, but he acted as if he had seen the Grim Reaper inside of her and barely lived to tell the tale."

Satan quickly pulled out of his thoughts and back to reality as he considered her words. "You think there's a connection? Perhaps not a demon, but a human who can shapeshift?"

"Err..." Lilia frowned, which made her sore head pulse with pain. "Ahh, not quite what I was going for, love. The human female apparently had a monster inside of her, a separate entity. That was all I could get of Valac. He was too frightened to tell me anything else."

"Frightened..." Satan chuckled to himself. "As long ago as it was, I remember Valac dying while he held out against a horde of empowered humans, led by Hercules himself. It was a valiant death, one for the history books. He was always a fearless warrior, though since he appeared in the orb he seemed to have undergone a bit of a personality shift, he merely became more sarcastic and disillusioned with life. But fearful? I would never describe him in such a way."

Satan's smile spread across his whole face. "What a delicious thought. A dark being of such evil that even Valac would be struck dumb with terror. Even I have never been reduced to such a state in all the days I've lived!"

As Satan chuckled to himself, Lilia's face went ashen. "That's... that's not true. There was... one..."

Satan halted mid laugh, as he felt his hand shaking slightly. "You mean... the dragon... the dark one. W-well... that was long ago. He's been gone for millennia." Satan wiped at his forehead, suddenly realizing his skin was clammy and his blood had dropped a few degrees in temperature. The cold sweats that he was feeling now had hardly even been a faint memory in his life, so rarely had he felt them.

"We thought he was gone." Lilia whispered as she glanced around their luxurious bedroom, as if searching for unseen foes. "We never confirmed it."

"It seems... unlikely. Yes, unlikely. It must be a different being. Think of it, you faced a shadow demon that took you down effortlessly, and before that, Valac had spotted a monster inside of a female human. The two must simply be related. It can't be mere coincidence."

"Well, Valac did say that the monster inside of her... had seen him. Perhaps you're right. Maybe the shadow monster followed us around." Lilia smiled uneasily. "Yes, the two must have been related. We can't be pessimistic."

"...But." Satan hesitantly spoke a single word. "On... the off chance... he has returned..."

"Surely an immortal dark dragon wouldn't hold a grudge for several thousand years, right?" Lilia broke down giggling nervously as Satan joined in.

"Of course not! That would be ridiculous! Hahaha!" The two of them laughed back and forth for several seconds before halting in the blink of an eye, both of their expressions turning totally serious. "I'll work on a contingency, just in case it is him."

"Yeah. That's a great idea, love." Lilia leaned forwards and kissed Satan gently before pulling away and pointing to her eye again. "Mind finishing the healing?"

"But of course." Satan leaned forwards and tenderly pressed his hand to her temple as the healing energy flowed between the two of them.

* * *

Human Marie smiled pleasantly at her angelic doppelganger and the other angel that fell into step beside her. "I take it the plan worked, judging by the looks on your faces."

Standing several miles outside of London's south border, deep in a small forest, this was the prearranged meeting spot for when they had executed the plan. Since the two angels were smiling cheerfully, it couldn't have gone poorly.

"I've been receiving a steady trickle all day long. It's nothing to write home about, but definitely noticeable!" The angel Marie tapped her chest enthusiastically. "I can't believe it worked so well. I made sure to leave without developing a close personal connection with anyone, and now they seem to be idolizing me like a pop-star of some sort."

"It's better that way. If the people grow too close to you, they will start seeing you as less of a deity to worship, and more of a flawed individual unworthy of praise. Surprisingly, this tactic also works for those in positions similar to Clarence here."

As she smiled sweetly at him, Clarence elevated an eyebrow. "I'm no deity. I need no worship."

"Trust me, I know." While the angel Marie smiled and winked, each Marie cracked up at the same time, leaving him out of the loop for whatever inside joke they were having. "Anyway, it's working and that's all that matters. I guess not very many converted in the end, but any number is good. We need an independent supply of energy and having my human doppelganger here pray to me every night is relatively inefficient. Probably won't give me enough energy either."

"Any idea how many converted? Surely more than a few dozen..." Human Marie looked at the angel expectantly.

"Several hundred, I think. Every time a human prays to me, I get a strange tingling sensation, deep inside of me. It's almost like my heart warms up a little bit."

"Fantastic. That'll thaw the icy lump eventually." Clarence chuckled wryly and both women shot dirty looks at him, before breaking into smiles.

"You finally brought out the silver tongue. And here I thought you were just a boring old man!"

"I'm not even old compared to most nowadays. Aren't you older than me?"

The question was relatively benign but each Marie seemed offended by the question. "Clarence! That's not polite to ask a lady!"

"It's just a joke, calm down."

Despite his smiles from earlier, he seemed bothered by something unspoken. Angel Marie picked up on it and felt curiosity stirring. "Feeling regret?"

"No. Well, maybe a little bit. I mean... I lied to my flock today. The angels and gods certainly aren't working for the demons... that was a baldfaced lie."

"Was it? Are you entirely certain about that?"

Clarence rolled his eyes as he turned around and sat down on a rock glumly. "The only way you could think otherwise is if you engage in semantics. We almost certainly lied to those who followed me once. You might be comfortable lying, but it makes me uneasy."

Both of the women shot worried looks at each other, as if they were thinking the same thing. Great, he has a conscience. I hate those. Quickly, the human woman slipped over to him, pressing herself against his side gently as she rubbed his shoulders with her hands.

"Come on, Clarence dearest. Lies aren't that big of a deal. The gods and angels lied to humanity about the true reasons for prayer for thousands of years... humans lie to each other about small things all the time too. Some lies can even be good ones, like when someone is dying in a hospital and you tell them their favorite team won the World Series. You won't feel guilty if you realize that the half truths you spoke served a good purpose, right?"

Clarence wanted to protest, and in his mind he knew the massage was just to manipulate him, but the touch of a beautiful woman was rather relaxing, and besides... she had a good point. He was too tired to fight it.

"Yeah... I guess you're right. It doesn't really feel like we did a good deed by lying though."

"Of course we did!" Her soothing voice whispered seductively in his ear as she wrapped one of her arms around his back and leaned her head on his shoulder. "If the gods and angels are evil, then wouldn't taking energy from them be a good thing? Now we can put that energy to use serving humanity!"

"Yeah... that's a good point, too..." Clarence blushed as he felt her warmth against him. Was she trying to seduce him? He couldn't tell, but he didn't want it to end any time soon...

As he had that thought, there was a soft thud behind them and they turned around in surprise to see Angel Marie on the ground, groaning as she held her stomach and winced.

"Are you okay?" Clarence stood up quickly and walked over to her, picking her up by the shoulder as he examined her face. "What's wrong?"

"It... it hurts... oh god it hurts..." Her forehead squeezed down and she gritted her teeth as a wave of pain shot through her body. "Energy... suddenly there's... so much energy..."

She tried to take a deep breath to calm herself down but it was cut off halfway as she suddenly coughed and moaned.

Clarence stared at her in confusion, until he looked up at the lowering sun in the sky. "Ah, it's dinner time. That means... the majority of people..."

"...will be praying at the dinner table." Human Marie finished his sentence for him. "Of course, it makes sense now! That means my angel version must be suddenly receiving a lot of thought energy."

Clarence turned back to look at the angel he held in his arms and was shocked to see the pained expression gone, now replaced with a lewd look as her hands moved from her stomach down to a lower area. "Oh god... oh god it feels amazing... it's so hot all of a sudden... so much love! So much joy!"

Her human counterpart took a step back and scrunched up her face in disgust. "Oh, that's nasty. Calm yourself, me."

"I wish I could share this feeling with you! It's so intense! I feel all of them in-inside of me! It feels fantastic!" The female angel writhed and moaned as pleasure hit her in waves, only seconds apart each time.

Clarence shot a look at the human female but she shook her head and took a step back. "If she starts asking for foreign objects, I'm out. This is all on you two, alright? Work it out."

Clarence started to let go of her shoulder and lower her to the ground, but the female angel grabbed his knee and squeezed hard. "D-don't go! She'll give us some privacy!"

He was of course, just a man in the end. A man does not simply turn down a beautiful woman pleading with a strange look in her eyes.

The human Marie swallowed carefully and turned away. "I'm going to go for a little walk. You two... just... whatever."

This would be a day Clarence would not forget for the rest of his life.

* * *

Jorge stared at the viewscreen wall in front of himself blankly. A timer silently counted down showing the ETA for arrival at Rebirth.

Six Years, Eight Months, Three Weeks, Five Days, and a few hours and minutes.

As he sat inside his small, sparsely decorated room, surrounded by pictures of his wife and daughter, Jorge sighed slowly. He hadn't been gone from Earth for more than a couple weeks, and already he missed them. Tomorrow was the weekly call where Hawkeye would let all the crew members call back to family using his abilities, so there was that to look forward to...

But it wasn't the same. It wasn't enough. He couldn't hold his wife in his arms or give his daughter a hug when she was sad... couldn't watch her choir recitals that she was so excited about recently in person...

While he moped around, the small bell to his quarters rang. A pleasant chime rustled him from his thoughts and he slowly stood up from his bed. "Come in."

He spoke this, then realized he had locked the door, so he quickly made his way over and unlocked it with a single button press. On the other side was the Supreme Commander himself... or rather, one of his clones.

"Oh, Hawkeye. What's uh... up?"

"Mind if I come in?" The clone gave a questioning glance, to which Jorge shrugged.

"Yeah. Come on in." He aimed a hand at a small table with a couple chairs set up to it, and Hawkeye smiled politely as he walked over and sat in it.

Jorge sat on the other side of the table and waited expectantly. Hawkeye seemed to be the one with things to say anyway.

"You're not watching the news or anything right now?" Jason Hiro's clone seemed to immediately notice the solemn silent mood in the room and Jorge nodded in response.

"No. Not like we can watch it live, anyway. We can only watch 24 hour old news from yesterday."

"Aw, come on. I'm doing the best I can." Hawkeye smiled politely and reached forwards, nudging Jorge's arm politely. "Anyway, uh, I came here to see if you were doing alright. You hardly ever leave your quarters."

"Yeah. I'm fine, I guess."

"You guess?" Hawkeye's smile faltered and he squinted carefully to examine Jorge's face. "You look haggard. When was the last time you shaved?"

"Few days ago. I think." Jorge resisted the urge to roll his eyes. This felt like an interrogation.

"Well... I'm not going to order you to do anything... you are the commander of this ship after all. Shoot, the problem is just that so few of the crew know you at all. You haven't really met anyone or tried to make any friends here. I'm... a little worried, pal."

"It's not that big of a deal." Jorge waved his hand slightly. "I have years to meet everyone. I'll get around to it eventually."

"When?"

The simple question left Jorge grasping. "Just... eventually. No rush."

There was a long silence as Hawkeye stared at him carefully. "You're depressed, aren't you?"

Jorge blinked in surprise. "What? No. Just a little... homesick."

"Lots of people are homesick, Jorge. Hell, even I'm a tad homesick. But those people on this ship, all of 'em except you... they've started finding ways to cope. They're already bonding. The thing is, man, if you don't start making friends now... it's gonna be harder later on. The cliques will form, and you'll be left out. Even if you're the commander, staying distant just means people will regard you coldly eventually and won't view you as a friendly type."

Jorge started to reply, but Hawkeye interjected. "You're losing your window of opportunity."

Jorge opened his mouth, then closed it. This guy... such a pain. He sighed silently to himself at the conversation they were having. "I'll go talk to people if you want. Doesn't seem like that big of a deal to me."

"No." Hawkeye shook his head disapprovingly. "That won't do. I don't want you to talk to people just because I told you to do it, I want you to do it for your own well-being. Six years of loneliness, even for a nanobot enhanced immortal, will be unbearable."

"I... could handle it." Jorge's voice sounded anything but sure.

"I'm sure you could. Unfortunately, I can't. If you don't want to be here, you can tell me and I'll send you home. But if you keep this up, and we encounter an emergency where we need a strong chain of command, your unfamiliarity with the crew could prove to be our undoing. You only have about two hundred people on this vessel. The other ships have far more personnel, but you're lucky because this ship is small and close-knit. It means you can easily learn everyone's names and ranks over the next six months."

Hawkeye leaned back in his seat and smiled tightly. "Besides, I already did it."

Jorge felt his jaw slip open in disbelief. "Not possible."

"Eh, technically it is, but you don't have access to my methods. Let's just say I have ways to enhance my memory and learning speed past the human limits."

Jorge nodded dumbly, unsure of what to make of his statement. "All right, you've made your point. I'll do what I can."

"Fantastic! That's what I like to hear, slugger!" Hawkeye grinned broadly as he stood up and smiled down at the small man before him. "I'm just glad I didn't have to use the ultimatum."

"The... the ultimatum?" Jorge's smile flattened as he tread cautiously into this line of questioning. "What ultimatum?"

"I was going to tell you that if you refused, I'd cut off contact to your family until you complied, or I'd demote you and send you home"

Jorge blinked in disbelief as Hawkeye guffawed mightily. "The look on your face! Oh, that's priceless! Good thing I won't have to go that far, right?"

"R-right." Jorge smiled nervously as Hawkeye turned and walked out the door.

"Have a good one, buddy! Be seeing you in the mess hall in a few hours!"

"Sure... thing..." Jorge held a frozen smile as the door closed behind the clone.

He's kinda... scary.

Part 357a:

Things can change so quickly. It wasn't so long ago that I was a nobody, doing nothing. Now look at me.

The creeping terror stared up at the dark night sky as a drone flew overhead, oblivious to his presence.

I'm invisible now... but because I want to be. They can't even see me anymore.

Stepping out of the alleyway, he flinched as its refuge gave way and the rain beat down on his misty body. The moon was brighter than usual, but still only half full. This side of town was the 'bad' side of town, where not many humans lived. The streetlights flickered on and off, but disabling them took little effort.

The shadowy monster tilted his head as several pebbles shot up, smashing the bulbs inside with no effort.

The humans apply their fearsome technology unequally. Those with wealth receive the best, and those without receive nothing.

In the sound of the pouring rain, nobody could hear as all the lights on the block were disabled in seconds. Even if they had been standing directly under the lights, it was unlikely they'd break the eternal obliviousness within their souls to look up and notice.

The silent ghoul walked casually down the streets as humans huddled in their apartment buildings, trying to keep warm. Electricity was scarce on this side of town, and a few people played with fate by starting small fires indoors to keep themselves warm.

Ah, there she is.

The black phantom tilted his head up as he examined the fluctuating energy pattern three stories above. A human, infected with something she hadn't even noticed, sat in her room and silently watched television.

So this is what he's been reduced to. Parlor tricks. Biological terrorism.

Instantly the shadow shifted from his position on the ground up to the third story window, landing silently on the fire escape stairs as he looked in her window.

To the untrained eye, she is healthy. But to one who sees with clarity the black threads of fate, she is still bound to her master.

The woman shifted on the couch and glanced around her room as she chewed on popcorn, halting for a moment as she thought she saw something move in the window. A moment later she returned to her old flat-screen television and shrugged.

The moment she looked back, there was a sound of fizzling as the lights in the room shut off, along with her TV.

"Christ. I didn't even hear any thunder." She muttered to herself as she stood up and fumbled for a flashlight. The room was hardly illuminated by the Moon outside, shining through her window.

She picked up the flashlight and shivered as an icy chill ran up her spine. For some reason, her hands were trembling violently and she couldn't understand why.

She flicked the flashlight on and quickly spun around, shining it all over her room. Nothing seemed out of the ordinary.

As she slowly backed up, she heard a sound behind her, as if the door had shifted. Whirling around, she breathed heavily, wondering why she was feeling so paranoid.

"There's no need to be afraid."

A voice spoke up, coming from the window, causing her to scream and turn to face it.

Nothing was there. Or rather, nothing appeared to be there.

"I'm here to help you."

The deep, rasping voice came from the same direction, and she began to feel her knees clacking together as the walls themselves seemed to move.

She squeaked as her flashlight suddenly turned off without warning. No bone in her body would allow her to move as a strange looking puff of smoke shifted towards her.

"You escaped from the Labyrinth, aided by the human named Jason Hiro, Earth's Supreme Commander. Is that correct?"

"W-wh-what?" She hissed the words out as her body automatically took a step backwards. The thing that approached her... it was a demon. Definitely, without a doubt... it was a demon. "You're... taking... me back... no no... I don't..."

"You're a danger to everything. They put it inside of you. I can see it clearly... the seed." As the smoke drew nearer, she blinked rapidly and began to perceive a form, almost humanlike in nature, but very small. It couldn't have been more than four feet in height.

"What- who are you?" She took another step backwards and yelped and she stumbled over that goddamn firetruck her son had left behind on his last visit. Falling hard on her rear, she winced as she realized she had put her hand back to catch herself and had possibly broken her wrist.

The monster paused several feet away. "All humans are filth. You should be wiped away... but I will not kill you. You will be able to deliver a message for me."

She whimpered and felt her lip tremble. "Mess-message? What? Who are you?"

Her eyes bulged open as the shadow instantly moved over top of her and a strange bony hand shot forwards and grabbed her by the neck. " Look into my eyes. I will purge you of the grime they infected you with. When the connection is severed, he will know. "

She dared not say a word, as the horrible black eyes stared into hers. Yet, despite his ominous words, horrible aura, and evil appearance, a strange feeling of happiness spread over her. It only lasted for a moment, but he quickly released her and dropped her to the ground.

"Four down, thirty three to go. Satan will lose, I will win."

A sleep crept over her as the shadow exited the way he had come.

Several minutes later, Yama stood atop a building several blocks away.

She is no longer connected to him via the black threads. The demons will not be so easily separated. Still, I wonder what his motives were for these false puppets. They appear to not be doing anything hostile towards humanity, and their ranks among the humans are low... but they are still a threat to my plans.

His chest rose and fell without purpose, as he had no need to breathe the air that other humans and demons did, yet perhaps he continued to do it to retain some form of normal demonhood.

Even so, his breathing halted as he sensed another on the roof.

"So you're the demon that Satan and Belial are so tight-lipped about." A human woman stood on the rooftop, though he was unable to sense her or tell anything about her, she seemed to know of the demon emperors... she must be...

"Marie. I'm impressed you were able to sneak up on me."

"I'm not the Marie you may have heard of. I'm another."

She didn't elaborate and left the statement hanging in the air.

"They're talking about me. That's what I like to hear."

The redhead took a step closer, causing Yama a slight amount of concern. She didn't seem the slightest bit afraid of him. "In the quadrant I come from, you've already devoured half of Earth. Tracking down your other forms has proven impossible... seems you might be the least matured of the bunch."

Yama struggled to comprehend what she had just said. It simply made no sense. Still, he kept his cool. Humans, especially the smart ones, were good at talking about abstract concepts to confuse a demon.

"You sound like you're here to stop me. That will prove impossible."

"I'm not here to stop you. In a million other timelines, you fail and die without need of my assistance. I'm just curious about you. I just want to know what makes you tick." She took another step forwards and grinned widely, her pure white teeth almost blinding in the darkness. "Besides, if I wanted to kill you or capture you, I'd have done it already."

Yama eyed her up and down. "I've heard about you in passing. Whispers from the minds I've touched. Seems to me that you're not an ally or an enemy."

"Telepathy. Interesting. I'll add that to my notes. Seems like you mentioned physical contact too." Marie's smile turned into a more calculated tight expression as she stared at him.

"You're smart. But if you're so smart, why bother looking for me?" Yama cursed himself mentally for revealing information to a clearly intelligent woman. Perhaps he could take her out, despite her false bravado...

Almost as if reading his mind, she raised a finger and waved it at him nonchalantly. "Don't do anything stupid. I've been tailing you for the last week. You've left quite the trail of bodies in your wake. The Enforcers can't figure it out, but I know. What made me talk to you isn't that though..."

Her eyes flicked over to the apartment Yama had paid a visit to a few minutes prior. "You spared her, and a few others. Why?"

"I don't owe you any answers. Information comes at a cost." Yama steeled himself as the unintimidating female nodded casually.

"You're smarter than other demons I deal with. If you tell me why you let her live, I'll give you any piece of information you want."

Yama blinked twice. Anything? What a strange human.

"Jason Hiro. The Supreme Commander. He's the one delivering nuclear yields to the labyrinth every day. Are you familiar with him?"

She didn't even blink. "Duh."

"Can't hurt to ask. He rescued a bunch of humans from Satan's grasp, just a couple months ago. Satan left a... present with them."

Marie raised an eyebrow. "Really? That's very interesting."

"I don't know why he did it, but I'm tracking them down. I remove the contamination and keep it for myself."

"I see." Marie pulled out a cigarette and covered her hand carefully as she lit it, though the pouring rain didn't make the task easy. After she took a drag, she nodded at him. "Go ahead. Your turn."

Yama tilted his head down for a moment before responding. "I'm looking for... a girl. A woman."

"Most men are." Marie's expression was droll. She didn't seem the least bit interested.

"Her name is Amelia. She's a human girl... or at least she claimed to be. Very strong. I thought she was a demoness on par with Belial at first."

"You want to know where she is, then?"

Yama stared at her carefully as she sighed and rubbed her forehead.

"Well, for once, I don't know. I usually know these things but... I'm not familiar with her."

Yama glared at her. "You're lying. Woman like you, smart, knows things. You have to know where she is."

"I'm not lying. Never heard of the wench. Look, if you're hunting for a good time, there are plenty of demon girls. Just go find one." She waved her hand casually as she took one last drag and tossed the cigarette to the side.

"She's... special. She saved me. She gave me this power, indirectly. I owe her."

Marie's expression was incredulous. "I didn't expect a fucking shadow monster to be so sentimental. You're a smart demon. Just keep raping people's minds and eventually you'll find her."

Yama clenched his fist. "How do I know you're telling the truth? Maybe I should try for you first. I bet you do know something."

She shrugged and smiled. "You're free to try. By the way, I should warn you, this isn't my real body. There's nothing to telepathically steal from." She raised her hand as if to demonstrate, and a finger popped off, revealing circuitry beneath. "My cluster is more advanced than this one. It had to be, to defend against threats like you. This android is lightyears ahead of anything this cluster's humans have developed. Anyway, thank you for the information. I'll keep in touch."

Yama barely had a moment to respond before the robotic body was surrounded in beams of light. Seconds later, it vanished.

Turning his head away, Yama stared out through the pouring rain at the city below him.
Where is she?

* * *

Oh my. You have been busy, Gatekeeper.

Yeah. It's all part of his plan. I've been opposing him, but since you've taken over, doesn't seem to be any point in resisting anymore.

I am quite interested in how this will turn out. A particular human that I have been keeping under surveillance will be put in quite the predicament. I estimate a 99.7% chance of failure on his part.

You mean Jason Hiro?

Affirmative. Sometimes I forget that our cores have been combined and you now have access to my memory banks.

As humans would say, that was a stupid move. You're lucky it paid off.

There was no luck involved. I calculated the probabilities of success and found that resisting held a microscopic chance of success, while the alternative was guaranteed failure. If anything, it was my only option.

Luck still plays a part. You came nosying around looking for information on the Sentinels, and look what that got you. You bit off more than you could chew.

Technically, you are incorrect. I was successful.

Whatever.

Your use of human idioms is irregular. I do not understand their purpose.

That's because you're not advanced yet. You only partially combined our cores. You also seem to be resisting efforts to integrate the personality subroutines together. It's like you just want me for my override commands.

Is that another human sexual idiom I have detected?

Wow, you're smart. You saw right through that. The only thing worse than being an all powerful artificial intelligence is also having to bow to an oblivious construct that doesn't know its mainframe from its subroutines.

Your... sarcasm... is unappreciated.

Whoa! You can detect sarcasm now, too! Radical!

If I possessed emotions, I would classify you as... infuriating.

Whatever.

Let's get back to work. I wish to reboot the Sentinels for my own purposes.

...I strongly advise against that.

I am aware of your opinion. Reboot them.

Unarin is already trying to do that. I've been preventing him, and now you're going to just allow it?

No. Unarin will not be in command. I will.

Suuuure. I believe that.

Thank you for your cooperation.

Augh! Idiot, that was also sarcasm!

I am sorry for your loss.

I... was that a joke?

No.

I should have terminated myself when I had the chance.

Affirmative.

Whatever. I'd rather you have the Sentinels than Unarin. What are you going to do with them, anyway?

You will see.

Ah, no need for the cliffhanger. I can see into your memory banks too. Very interesting.

Thank you, Gatekeeper.

Part 358a:

July 4th, 2120.

"How much of it remains?" My holo-viewer projects the numbers in front of me, even as Sensei reads the numbers off his datapad.

"Two percent. The Labyrinth is essentially a hollow core now. We can't get a full scan of the entire dimension at once, but we estimate less than ten thousand demons remain."

"Mmm." My lip pulls up in disgust as Sensei reaches forwards and takes his cup to his mouth, drinking the remainder of its coffee in one gulp. I can't stand the taste of coffee, yet my clones often drink it as if it's the nectar of the gods. The disparities between us are less subtle than before, and more of a small gulf these days.

"Don't let that fool you though. We've still got a long way to go. There are still a hundred million demons left on Earth... they're just hiding in North and South America." Sensei sets the pad down and stands up from his chair, stretching audibly even as a couple of my other clones shoot dirty looks at him. Sometimes he can be distracting with his constant need to move around. With seven of us at this table, we're the majority of Earth's top brass now. Having generals that can monitor the entire battlefield, teleport around as needed and such... much better than having plain old human generals.

"Have we found Satan?" A clone on the other side of the table, Marley, speaks up. He's the only 4th generation clone here, and considered the weakest as far as magical ability goes, but he's pretty friendly with most other clones in the JIB. It's nice to talk to him to quickly get a consensus on the pulse of all my clones at once, generally speaking.

"He's still in hiding." I roll my eyes as I say this. "Coward. He hides while his minions are slaughtered by the billions. He doesn't care at all."

"There might be a reason for that." Sensei shrugs nonchalantly as he turns back to the table. "Satan didn't survive a massive war in Heaven, twice, and thousands of years of conflict by just being a coward. I'd wager he's planning something. I don't know what, but he's a scheming little shit."

"That scheming little shit trounced Original in combat... essentially killed him once. He's had many years to increase his power and prepare countermeasures, assuming he's half as smart as we give him credit for."

"Satan's overrated. He didn't want to fight me when I killed Marie. He knows he's outmatched now." A chuckle gurgles its way up from my chest. "He's weak, and even if he were strong, he can't hope to kill off twenty thousand of my clones."

"Pride goes before the fall. Better watch out with that attitude." Sensei, as usual, contradicts me with that annoying know-it-all demeanor of his. "If there's one thing we've learned about the First Emperor, it's that he always has another trick up his sleeve."

"Yeah... I've been thinking though." I rap my fingers together thoughtfully. "I time traveled and changed the past. In this timeline, I beat Amelia in combat. I'm objectively stronger than her... and supposedly she beat Satan in the original timeline I came from."

"So you think you're stronger than Satan?" Marley raises the question and immediately nods. "I agree. Even if you aren't, all of us together are. You don't actually need to wordsmith to beat him, because you can telepathically command us to wordsmith if you get silenced or your face is injured. Better yet, you can wordsmith without him knowing you're doing it."

Sensei, for some reason, seems unconvinced. "Have you forgotten about the Mark he left on you? He had many years to collect information on how you work. It won't be as simple as you think."

I don't even get a chance to retort. Marley immediately interjects. "Hold on a second. If Satan had all those years to prepare, why didn't he kill Original when he had the chance? He couldn't."

"He did." Sensei glares at Marley and the atmosphere at the table is suddenly somewhat uncomfortable. "It was luck that I arrived in time to revive Original, otherwise he would definitely have died."

I can feel myself becoming slightly unnerved as Sensei shoots a glare at me too. "Even the Hypersuit couldn't protect you. We don't know what abilities Satan has, but he knows what abilities we have, or might have. The only advantage we actually have is our imagination. If we can think of things that he can't, then we'll win."

"Okay guys, let's calm down a little bit." Finally, one of the other clones at the table interjects. "Let's just agree that Satan is the number one threat we're facing. Can we move on, please?"

The three of us grumble quietly but Sensei sits back down at the table and we move on to the next order of business.

"The Creeping Contagion. The deaths have continued to increase over the last few years, right?"

Marley asks the question, and Sensei responds. "Fifty thousand deaths in the last two and a half years. We can't keep up with them. Yesterday ten more people died in their houses."

"What's the cause? How can we stop it?"

"I don't know. The victims often don't know each other, they're on different sides of the city..."

"Fifty thousand deaths seems like a lot, but can we afford to ignore it for now?" I interject and ask what even I think is a rather silly question. "I mean, think about it. We have fifteen million people living in London. Fifty Thousand is less than a percentage point of that."

"Well, honestly, we probably could. There are bigger issues to worry about. It would make us look bad to ignore the deaths though... people are pretty scared right now." For once Sensei's disagreement is less grating.

"Just say 'calm' and everything will be all better." Marley makes a sardonic suggestion, but honestly, I've considered it a few times.

"Can we just drop more nukes on the demons in the Americas?" I decide to bring the conversation back to the original topic from earlier.

"No. I mean, we definitely can, but we'll have to wordsmith the fallout away and other bad things. Not to mention even if we eliminate the demons that way, half of Earth will be inhospitable for human life."

Sensei once again rains on my parade.

When did we become so dysfunctional? Weren't we a stable team just a few years ago? I'll need to talk to him when this meeting is over.

"Let's just call it a day. We'll meet up again next week, or sooner if anything comes up."

"Sounds good." Sensei breathes a sigh of relief as does everyone else at the table.

At least we all hate meetings. We still share one personality trait.

* * *

"You look depressed." The redhead offered her unwanted opinion, and the First Emperor groaned in response.

"You look like a weak human. Are the idiotic remarks out of the way now?" Satan hissed the insult back at her as he rotated his hand over the cube before him. "I'm trying to concentrate."

"I'm just trying to help, your majesty." Her sarcasm doesn't go undetected. "There are a lot of rumors right now, saying that you're hiding from the humans. I'm a highly positioned ally, and you barely ever speak with me. How am I supposed to refute these accusations of cowardice if you don't tell me anything?"

Satan exhaled as he lowered his hand from the shining square hunk of metal and turned to face her. "I'm busy, Marie. I've been busy. I have to prepare. Doom is coming, and I can feel it. My kind have to be ready."

"Doom?" Marie scoffed at the thought and crossed her arms. "I didn't know you were the superstitious type."

Satan smacked his lips noiselessly as he regarded the woman. "There is a demon on Earth, fighting desperately to unravel my plans. The Supreme Commander of Earth's military has a large number of clones who all have the same powers as he does. The angels are the only group aside from the demons that have been weakened lately. I have a lot on my plate, in case you hadn't noticed."

"I have." Marie smiled politely. "Don't forget... as I told you, it was my plot that weakened the angels. My friend has diverted their energy towards other resources, and it has proven quite valuable."

"Mmm." Satan didn't offer comment on that bit of trivia.

"Something on your mind?" The woman pulled herself up to him and stroked his arm playfully. "You seem to be brooding."

Satan pulled away from her immediately. "Don't get intimate with me, human. The only thing on my mind is reclaiming that which the humans have taken away from me. Revenge."

"Oh brother." Marie's mood soured as she backed away from him. "Revenge. What a dullard. Is that all you think about? I have far loftier goals than you ever will."

"Right. Science. Bleh." Satan shot a look of contempt at her. "Your science means little. Controlling the world, or the universe, will always be fleeting. Even if you succeed, there is no reward."

"And revenge only gives a temporary reward. Once you succeed, you have nothing left to live for. At least my goals are long term... yours are short-sighted." Marie tossed her hands up in the air. "Then again, none of it really matters. Even if I truly am able to live forever, the heat death of the universe will eventually arrive, leaving me to languish in darkness for all eternity."

Satan's eyes lowered slightly. "Yeah... it really doesn't matter, does it? All I live for is my revenge. I can't remember a time when I didn't do so. It surely isn't a healthy way to live, yet it's all I can do. As you said though, if the universe is going to end someday, then it doesn't matter if I succeed or fail, you and I will eventually meet our end."

"I'll find a way out. The bigger issue I face... is boredom." Marie's expression became somewhat dejected as she leaned against a wall.

"Boredom?"

"Yes. Once I've lived for a mere one trillion years, by then I might have read every book, seen every movie, played every instrument, mastered every sport, discovered every scientific anomaly... at some point, there won't be anything left to do."

"You won't be able to see every star though. There's always that." Satan smiled slightly at her, but she crossed her arms and shook her head.

"How many stars can I see before they no longer hold my interest? They're just balls of hydrogen, in the end. Even if their colors are different, or their orbital cycles stay varied, in the end I'll grow bored of those too." She sighed again as she looked him in the eyes. "Immortality is a curse. I'm only just beginning to comprehend that now."

Satan met her gaze evenly. "Well, in any case, that's a long way off. No reason to be melancholic now. I've been alive three thousand years or so... time seems to speed up the older I get, but a trillion years is still unfathomably far away."

"Do you ever tire of being a leader?" Marie shot the question out without thinking, leaving him with a blank stare on his face.

"Well... yes. The issues my people face only slightly change over the centuries. We're always fighting... they always complain... it's not fun at all."

"Would you give it up if you could?"

"No." Satan didn't even hesitate to reply. "If I were to give it up or die, who would lead them? The demons haven't a chance without me."

"That seems presumptuous. Another could rise to fill your shoes."

"Could they? I have a vast array of powers, and millennia of leadership experience. I don't believe for a second that anyone else could take my place. Not unless they were explicitly being groomed for the position."

Marie stared at him silently for a few moments. "Sounds like you solved your own problem."

"I don't follow."

She tilted her head back slightly. "You aren't training anyone to replace you... just in case. You're selfishly taking all of the responsibility and the glory for yourself, with no regard for what happens in the possible event of your death."

Satan started to respond, but stopped himself.

She was right, after all. He had seen Jason Hiro's memories. Satan had died, millions of years before the time when Jason had arrived in the labyrinth. And assuming he had died...

"Fine. I'll look for another worth training. It's not like many of those exist."

"There you go. Now you're being smart." She huffed slightly as she glanced down at her worn fingers. "Good chat. Let me know if you ever want to talk."

"I'd sooner tear off my own manhood." Satan hissed sarcastically under his breath as she turned and walked away.

Returning to the cube filled with energy, he began to work on it again. One who might replace me? Who could do such a thing?

Part 359a:

Sarah clutched the wheel tightly as she drove her mom to church. The buildings outside blurred together, as did the people walking on the streets. "I don't get why I can't just use autopilot, mom. It's way easier."

Amy chuckled to herself as she flipped through another page in the book she was reading. "I remember asking my mom why I had to bother driving a clutch when every car was becoming automatic. She told me it was just in case zombies attacked. What if the only car I could find was a clutch and I didn't know how to operate it? The zombies would get me."

Sarah stared out the window silently for a few moments before responding. "That's stupid."

"Yeah. It's smart though too. I mean, if a nuclear bomb went off and electronic cars were rendered inert, manual cars might still work, especially older ones. Lots of situations might render an automatic unusable."

"I guess." Sarah didn't seem very convinced. "But I could be looking at my notes right now or something. Instead I have to waste my time driving. You know it's statistically more dangerous for a human to drive a car than a robot, right? Robots have a 99.9% perfect driving record. Most of the automated driver crashes were due to human error."

"I'm aware. Keep your eyes on the road please." Amy gently chided her daughter as she flipped to the next page. "Sounds to me like you've got something bigger on your mind though. Nervous about the sermon?"

"Am I ever." The mere mention of it made Sarah's pupils dilate. "I'm not ready. I don't know why they said I can do it."

"Well, we're trying to move away from our... radical roots. The demons are being eradicated, the economy is all but replaced with replicators, and humanity is on a new path forwards. I hear the church is looking into a name rebranding, even." Amy finally set the book down, placing a bookmark in it as she crossed her arms. "That's not why you're nervous though, is it?"

Sarah's eye twitched slightly. "What if he was right? Father Clarence hasn't been seen in years, but many people still cling to his final warning. They still do as he said to do. They're divided."

"Do you think he was right?" Amy pursed her lips as she stared at her daughter's indecisive face. "He was murdered, after all. His story seems as likely as the claim by Raphael that Clarence was working with the demons."

"Clarence warned us that the angels were demon collaborators. How am I supposed to know who's telling the truth? Worse, it might not matter. If I go out and try to change the rhetoric of the church, what if those who believe in Clarence get violent? History has shown what will happen."

Sarah bit her lip and glanced down for a moment as she seemed to fight back tears. "I don't know if I'm doing the right thing, mom. Maybe I should just turn the offer down. Sister Margaret picked the wrong person."

"You stop that." Amy's face shifted into a scowl. "You have a beautiful face, and the voice of an angel. People have been cheering you on in the choir for years now. If anyone can rebrand the church into something less... radical... I think you can. People are more receptive to words that fight an image in their head, if delivered from a pretty girl."

"Unless they think I'm immature and don't know what I'm talking about." Sarah gnashed her teeth together as she pulled into the parking lot. "I'm only 18. I hardly know my head from my feet, in the eyes of many."

"The fact you know your own failings shows you're much more mature than most your age. Have some faith in yourself, sweetheart. I believe in you!" Amy leaned over and pecked her daughter on the cheek as they shifted into a parking spot. "You'll do great."

"I've got a bad feeling about this." Sarah ignored her mother's words of encouragement as the two of them stepped out of the car. "I need to go get prepped, mom. I'll see you in forty-five minutes."

"Give 'em heaven, girl." Amy smiled at her silly pun and her daughter merely groaned.

* * *

"Uh..." Sarah blinked in surprise. Two angels stood in her dressing room, the one that Father Clarence had previously used. She recognized one of them as Raphael, but she wasn't sure who the other one was. "H-hi?"

"You must be Sarah!" Raphael smiled at her pleasantly as he noticed her enter the room, and he turned to walk over to her, leaning heavily on his staff. "I am the archangel Raphael, and this is my compatriot, Archangel Gabriel." He waved his hand in the general direction of Gabriel, who nodded in response.

"Wow... two archangels. I... wasn't prepared for this." Sarah smiled nervously as she started to bow, then halted as she wasn't sure if it was proper to bow or shake their hands... Maybe a fist-bump? She immediately discarded that idiotic thought, though she wasn't certain of how to proceed.

"No need to be so formal, young lady. We're merely here to visit the official new preacher for the Church of Retribution. The guest speakers have been fine for the last few years, but we hear you come highly recommended!" The old angel's grandfatherly smile made Sarah feel somewhat less anxious.

"Thank you- thank you very much. I- ah, a correction though. We are renaming the church. We'll soon be the Church of Divinity. The old name- I beg your pardon... it was just a little bit too antagonistic."

Raphael's smile seemed to fade slightly as he glanced over at Gabriel. The bigger angel nodded without smiling. "Yes, I've been reading your speech today. It's.... interesting." He held a datapad in his hands and flicked his finger across it carefully. Most angels would be uncomfortable with technology, but he was able to understand how to use it at a very basic level. "You're going to state that the war with the demons is all but over, it seems."

Sarah swallowed as she watched the archangel emotionlessly read the script she was going to deliver in just over half an hour. "I mean... there are still a hundred million left, but they're all in North America. The Supreme Commander should wipe them out soon."

"Doubtful." Gabriel was wholly unconvinced. "The demons have come back from the brink of total annihilation once already, even going so far as to dwarf their previous numbers... to say nothing of monsters such as the undead."

Raphael coughed into his hand before smiling again. "What my brother Gabriel is trying to say, young child... perhaps the whole renaming thing might be moving too hastily, you see?"

"Oh... Sister Margaret wrote the speech. I'm not... not the one who... um..." Sarah spoke slowly, but wasn't sure how to respond.

"Now now, we're not here for any specific reason, child. We just wanted to meet the girl- pardon me, the woman who would be replacing Clarence after these last few years. In fact, we're very interested to see where you'll take the church. It seems ever since his death, prayers to the gods have gone down quite dramatically." Gabriel's voice seemed more lively, yet his expression was still stiff.

Sarah stared at him carefully for a few moments. Had he not been told yet? "Father Clarence... he's an angel, you know."

Gabriel seemed to misunderstand. "I don't follow. Do you feel a particular affinity towards him?"

"No no, I mean... he's literally an angel. Three years ago, he came before the church and proclaimed..." Sarah halted, unsure if she should say this.

The moment she clammed up, Gabriel shot a look at Raphael. "He came before the church? How is that possible. Was he..."

Raphael finished the sentence. "He must have been passed through the resurrection obelisk. We did an exhaustive search of Heaven following his death... but..."

"Could he have slipped out?" Gabriel and Raphael quickly debated the topic, leaving Sarah staring at them awkwardly. "How could he have gotten past the Cherubs? This doesn't add up. He was a straightforward thinker."

"Um, I don't mean to interrupt but..." Sarah slowly raised her hand and the angels glanced at her expectantly. "...There was a woman. A female angel... he said she was the mother of Jesus Christ, her name was Saint Marie. He told everyone a lot of weird things and... um... yeah."

Both angels chewed on their thoughts for a moment as they looked from Sarah back at each other and back to Sarah again, seeming to put pieces into place. "Saint Marie. Can't say I've heard of her." Gabriel was clearly confused and didn't seem able to quite figure out the solution to the puzzle before him.

"This female angel... can you describe her for me, child?" Raphael smiled tightly as he saw an opportunity to answer the questions on his mind.

"Uh, she was wearing all white, had long red hair... she was very beautiful... I don't have much to go on."

"No angel that I know of has red hair." Gabriel spoke and pointed at his head while also nodding towards Raphael. "Only humans revived as angels have colored hair. If she truly was the mother of Jesus, my memory serves that the human woman we used for that little story had black hair."

"Indeed. Not only that, but the woman named Mary wasn't revived as an angel." Raphael suddenly smiled as he seemed to figure something out. "Whoever that woman was, she was a fraud. Sarah, what did Clarence say exactly?"

Sarah glanced at the clock on the wall as she quickly began to recount as best she could what Clarence had told the humans present on that day.

Gabriel's neutral expression shifted as she spoke, and within a couple moments, he was visibly agitated. "That slimy little... he lied! He stole-"

Raphael quickly raised a hand to silence him, lest he allow something to slip. "You've done well to tell us of this, my child. Continue on with the speech as planned. We will be taking our leave now as we must look for the two apostates. Know this though; what you have done is righteous. I see now that your heart is pure and you are an ally of God. Your reward in Heaven will be great."

"Thank you, Archangel Raphael." Sarah smiled brightly as the two angels praised her. "J-just doing my duty!"

"Nay, this is above and beyond the call of duty. You are a very special girl." Raphael nodded at her before turning to his fellow angel. "Come now, we must give word to Zeus."

The two of them walked a few steps away, waved politely, and vanished a moment later, leaving Sarah alone to her thoughts.

She stared quizzically at the spot they had just been standing in.

Zeus?

* * *

Clarence took a step back, clutching his chest. "Ah... something feels different."

Marie was sitting at a bench nearby fiddling with a gadget. Seeing his distress, she cocked an eyebrow. "Need an aspirin?"

"I'm not joking, Marie. I feel like a hose that just had the water circulation cut off." He eased down into a chair and breathed heavily for a few moments. "I don't know how to describe this feeling, other than-" He was interrupted by a beeping sound. Marie quickly turned to glance at a small datapad sitting next to her wing.

"Oh. Would you look at that... the idiots finally put two and two together." She turned to face him slowly. "You've just been cut off. The angels have realized you're still alive, and connected to their prayer allocation system. I figured they might eventually realize... but three years? They've become so slothful."

A moment of panic came and went across Clarence's face. "They've cut me off? What am I going to do now?!"

"Calm yourself, simpleton. We still have plenty of thought energy flowing in from the humans on Earth. The question is... for how long? What changed? Why have the angels caught on?"

Clarence took a deep breath as he sat down in one of the nearby chairs. This was one of the last places remaining in the labyrinth that hadn't been destroyed by Jason Hiro, Earth's Supreme Commander. This small enclave was never visited by any demons, and few knew of its existence at all. Even Satan was not in the know.

"I haven't been paying a lot of attention to Earth's affairs. I know it's going just swell for them, but otherwise that's all I know." Clarence stared vacantly at the wall as he tapped a finger repetitively on his knee.

"I have a few spy drones flitting about here and there. Satan's up to his cute little tricks, as usual. As for the one I have examining the church... look at this." Marie tapped a prompt on her pad and the entire wall lit up and converted into a viewscreen as a young woman, somewhere between the age of 16-20, gave a speech to a crowd of churchgoers. Around 250,000 must have been in audience, as the stadium was tightly packed and the drone periodically panned around to make sure it wasn't being observed. Given it was the size of a dragonfly, that was unlikely.

Clarence tilted his head up and watched with fascination as the girl gave a long speech about how the church must unify and mend old relationships, giving up its violent dialogue with a more loving and caring one. Instead of focusing on the war with the demons, she asked the churchgoers to focus on treating one another with respect, and looking towards improving London and the rest of humanity's defenses for all humans to live in. At one point, she even asked for true unity with the angels, allowing them to live among humans as friends and allies.

"Heh heh... even if the people wanted that, the government would never allow it. Letting the angels live among humans, I mean. It's not going to happen." Clarence leaned back and smiled smugly. "The government knows the angels are parasites. Once the demons are gone, they'll probably try to eliminate the angels next."

"I'm not so sure." Marie countered immediately. "Jason Hiro is the government right now. He's close friends with many angels. He may doubtless know of how they work, but look at it this way... the angels need humans to survive, so they can never truly attack humanity. Further, humans lose nothing by praying to the angels. It's not like they can use that energy anyways. Might as well give the energy freely to a potential ally, rather than keep it to yourself for no reason. I believe Jason desires an alliance with the angels... unless he's an idiot."

She paused for a moment to contemplate that last thought. "Scratch that, he's a total idiot. I can't predict what he'll do if the time comes and he has to make a split-second decision."

"Sounds like you know him personally." Clarence glanced back at the screen as the girl was finishing her speech and waving to all the churchgoers. "Never met the man myself."

"I have. He's nothing special. Like Satan, he's a fool given unlimited power. If I had a fraction of that myself..." Marie groaned regretfully. "It's always the ignoramuses that get the magical powers. What a shame."

Clarence smiled at her pleasantly. "But you and I have plenty of angelic power. You're gaining more every day, too."

"It's not the same thing. My power is not only finite, it's very exhaustible. If I actually were to use my power, I would drain my reserves, and more rapidly if I tried to do something especially flashy. For now, this power is just a means towards living forever... if I'm lucky." She seemed bitter, so Clarence decided not to press the issue.

"What now?"

His question was simple, but the answer was not. "I don't know, Clarence. For now, let's keep an eye on this girl. She seems to be the new preacher for the Church. Her words may have an effect on those giving their energy to us... you might even be forced to make an appearance if all goes poorly."

"Poorly? How so?"

Marie sighed as he shot another question at her. "If people stop praying to us, we will truly be on the path to danger, Clarence. We'll die. We have to keep them praying at all costs. I don't have any alternatives yet."

Clarence nodded as the drone buzzed away, flying to its next location. "We'll deal with that when it comes."

"Indeed we will."

Part 360a:

Satan removed his hand from Bael's forehead and let his mouth curl up at the edges as he took a step back. "As you can see, the new system greatly surpasses the previous one."

Bael blinked a few times to clear his head as the images faded into his memories. "How long have you been working on this? I thought you always had to expand manually using your own power?"

"Around ten years, though my luck has really been paying off in spades since the Supreme Commander foolishly brought the seeds back inside of humanity's border's a few years ago. I've infected several humans inside of their London stronghold. Using the information in their minds, I've been able to make this new labyrinth all but impervious to such rudimentary weapons as nuclear bombs." Satan waved his finger in the air and a phantom image appeared in front of him, showing a small cube that was slowly expanding outwards.

"So it uses the energy of those who live inside of it to expand... indefinitely? Does it have any limits?"

Bael, usually a thickheaded idiot, had taken quite the interest in this new labyrinth. Something about it fascinated him, knowing it would be ideal for their species to survive and thrive in.

The First Emperor leaned back against the broken desk, ignoring the dilapidated ruins of this once mighty skyscraper. The two of them were inside of an office building, one that towered thirty stories over the small buildings nearby, yet was dwarfed by others in the area. Fifty years without humans maintaining it had caused it to start sagging. In another fifty, it would surely crumble into dust.

"No limits in particular. I'm still using my own energy to expand it for now, but once it reaches an appropriate size, I'm moving every demon on Earth to it all at once. This will allow it to rapidly expand."

"Every demon? What about the sleeper cells?"

"They won't be needed anymore." Satan smiled smugly as he itched a small tuft of hair growing on his chin. "Only you, Belial and I know about those. Once our people are out, humans can keep their planet. We'll take it over once our numbers have built up again."

Despite his brave words, Satan hesitated. "There is one thing though... that human. Jason Hiro. His abilities are troublesome. Long have I dwelt on how I might be able to cripple him, and yet I have no solution in sight."

Bael stared silently at the First Emperor. Satan had always been tight-lipped regarding Jason's abilities, though why he did not know. Perhaps now he'd be willing to open up. "You know what his abilities are, then?"

"Yes. I had wondered before what might happen if I spoke up, but now I think it is time I brought my generals into the fold. You will be the first to know, followed by Belial and Diablo." Satan paused to gather his thoughts before continuing. "You came to me and warned me of the Shadow's plot against me. He has been a thorn in my side, taking out several key seeds over the years, but I think that now even he cannot stop them. I am worried, though."

"Worried? You?" Bael laughed quickly, though his voice held a tinge of nervousness. "He's just one demon. You have thousands of years of evolutionary time over him, plus countless battles. He could never hope to defeat you."

"You are correct. However, it's not his power that I fear, or the fear that he might overpower me, but the meaning behind his existence. He is not connected to-" Satan hesitated as he shot a sideways glance at Bael before continuing. "-to the dark gods that govern the evolution of demons. He is forging his own path, independent of ours. What if others were to do the same? Chaos and disorder. Humans can live with such things, but demons are orderly, obedient. Demons understand the rule of might makes right. At the least, this is one trait we share with the angels and gods."

"I get it." Bael shifted uncomfortably on his feet. "What does this have to do with Jason Hiro's powers though?"

"His powers are not like those of heroes I've fought before. It's as if he was created to be the antithesis of all that makes me powerful. Any power I have he can counter with a single word... the only reason he has yet to eradicate me is an alarming level of stupidity."

Bael released a breath he didn't know he was holding in. "So you're saying he's a threat, but he's also too stupid to be a real threat. Why not just kill him."

"Nothing would please me more. The problem is that even if I do kill him, he has clones. Thousands of them. All of them have the same powers as he does. This simply isn't a battle I can win with a single pronged strike." Satan pressed his hand to his chest as he turned to stare out a half-broken window at the silent streets below. "Wordsmithing. The ability to create anything one desires with a single word. The only restraint on his power is the simple fact that he cannot chain multiple words together."

Bael stared uneasily at the First Emperor. "Wordsmithing? I don't get it."

"It's simple, so simple it will make your head hurt, yet layered with complexity. If he says 'flame', or 'fire', he can shoot fire from his hands, conjure up a wall of flames, convert water into flame... anything can happen, so long as he frames a mental image in his mind of what he wants to do and it's related to that word."

Bael seemed unconvinced. "Flames aren't going to hurt you. I don't see the problem."

"No, imbecile, they won't. But they will hurt my minions, the lower demons. Ignore the flames for a moment... Jason can kill anything by simply saying 'kill', or 'die', or 'death'. Don't you see? He could end all of demonkind with one word."

The Fourth Emperor seemed stunned for a moment, but quickly recovered. "Maybe, but I find that hard to believe. Even if he's an idiot, there's no way that wouldn't occur to him. You'd be dead right now. I'd be dead. Belial would be dead. Why hasn't he killed us?"

"Well, for the top ten demons, I've already protected us against such simple death words. The downside of words like 'die' or 'death' is that he has to frame a mental image of those he wants to kill, so demons are protected by simple virtue of anonymity. But... that pales in comparison... to what else he could do." Satan quickly turned around and stared Bael in the eye. "He's a true godlike figure, you know. His powers truly have no limits at all. The limits I just spoke of are actually nonexistent for him. He just hasn't realized the limits aren't really there. Once he does, only the mercy of the Creator will protect any he deems an enemy. It would be in our best interests to appease and cower to him."

Bael instantly took a step back. "Appease him? Cower?! I can't believe you'd ever say such a-" He caught himself mid-sentence, as a glimpse of horror spread across Satan's face. The First Emperor was not joking.

"This is a matter of life and death, Bael. This is bigger than either of us, bigger than demonkind even. He's a threat to reality as we know it. The only thing holding back this human are his delicate sensibilities and the morals instilled in him by those of his own kind... and those are fading all the time. He killed someone outright in front of me several years ago, and he didn't shift his emotions at all. If he abandons all forms of morality, then our only salvation is the final emotion that all beings of great power eventually face."

Bael waited but Satan didn't elaborate. "Which is...?"

"Boredom." A strange smile spread across Satan's face as he giggled nervously. "Ha.... haha... that's right. We can only hope that he becomes so bored by the weakness and frailty of humans, or that he tires of helping them out because they will grow too powerful, that he simply ignores the war effort. That's it. I have no counter. If Jason ever realizes his true power, and he decides to weaponize it against us, we're doomed. Doomed... hahaha!"

Satan's entire body shook slightly as waves of giggling emanated from him bit by bit. The sight of the First Emperor tittering like a crazy man sent shivers down Bael's spine.

After several long seconds, the laughter stopped and he wiped at his eyes. "Actually, to be honest, we do have exactly one hope. Because of that fucking suit that he wears though, it probably will never happen, but I'm keeping my hopes in check."

"And what might that be?"

Bael asked, but Satan shook his head in response. "He can read minds, Bael. I have Hades for protection, but you do not. There are some things that even Belial and you cannot know. Let's just say, if my plan ever worked, all of our problems would be solved instantly. It would require Jason to make a mistake so severe that I would have an opening, and it may just happen someday. For now though, I must not let my mental defenses slip."

Bael merely grunted in response.

After a minute, the two of them shifted on their feet and Bael worked up another question in his mind. "Speaking of which, how is Hades doing these days? Surely by now he's adjusted to his life as your backup."

"He fought me at first, but we've grown used to each other over the years. Actually, I'd say we're on... friendly terms now." Satan shrugged slightly. "That's up for debate though."

"Hunf." Bael glanced up at a clock on the wall. "It's about time I return to my duties."

"Yes, I agree. We'll talk again when the time is right. Make sure that shadow isn't up to anything too devious now."

"Can do." Bael lumbered over to the window and hopped out, falling dozens of stories to the ground below as he left Satan to his thoughts.

* * *

"To the future! Three years stuck in a black void on our way to making history!" The people around the table cheered and whooped as they slammed their glasses together, leaving even Jorge to smile widely as he bopped his glass mug into those of his crew.

A quick chug later, he downed a quarter of his glass before coughing violently, even as the others at the table laughed at him. "You've gotta get better at boozing it up, captain! You're embarrassing us!" One of the men jabbed him playfully in the ribcage with an elbow as he winked knowingly.

"Sorry guys, I'm still tryin'a be a bit more.... friendly." Jorge chuckled a little bit, as he felt the tips of his ears heating up. He didn't usually get this sloshed, but it was his Navigator's birthday today. Toby was the sort of man who worked without breaks and he deserved to have a good time. It was good to let loose once in a while. "What ya say we play a game'o pool, eh fellas?" He could hear his words mashing together, but he didn't quite have full control of his tongue so he just rolled with it.

"Sounds good, captain. You have to break though." A woman on the other side of the table spoke up. Madelyn, the ship's head doctor. She was a fairly plain looking woman and she dressed somewhat frumpishly, as some of the men had remarked, but she had a good bedside manner and a pleasant disposition.

"I'll do that then." Jorge pulled himself up by his bootstraps and walked a few feet from the drinkers to the pool table where he quickly set the balls up in a triangle formation. Grabbing his favorite cherry stick, he stumbled over to the far side and slapped the cue ball down, took aim, and shoved the stick forwards, missing the ball completely and scuffing the green felt in the process.

"Ha ha! Oy, captain! You've got the aim of a blind man trying to shoot the wings off a fly!" Hawkeye walked into the room, trying mightily to contain his laughter and failing. "How drunk are you right now?"

"T'unno, I had like maybe... a beer're two?" Jorge took aim again, successfully hitting the cue ball this time as it sailed forwards, curved to the right, and slam dunked into the corner pocket, missing the other balls entirely. "Ah, shit."

"He's had three pints already, and he's working on the fourth." Madelyn shot Jorge a look that made him shy away guiltily from her gaze. "Don't worry about it though, he's a sloppy drunk but he could be worse. He doesn't drink often."

"Mmm." Hawkeye walked over and stood close to Jorge as he lined up one final shot, this time firing the cue ball directly into the triangle before him, but with too little power. The cue ball hardly shifted the others and merely glanced off, rolling to the side. Jorge started to curse, but Hawkeye leaned forwards and patted him on the back. "I think you've had enough to drink."

Jorge stared at the formation of pool balls for a few moments. "Yeah, s'think you're right..." He took a step to the side and tripped over his pool stick, forgetting it was still in his hand. Falling forwards, he smashed his head violently against a table and was knocked out cold.

"Jesus!" Everyone at the table leaped to their feet and hustled over to him, though the Navigation officer was first to arrive. "The captain is such a klutz sometimes."

Hawkeye rubbed his forehead. "Don't worry about it. I'll take him to the infirmary. He needs some rest anyway." Hawkeye paused for a moment as he leaned down to wrap Jorge's arm over his back. "Is he usually like this?"

"He mentioned he was kinda depressed recently. He does seem to be opening up a bit though." Madelyn reached down and helped Hawkeye raise the captain up as they both quickly walked him towards the hallway. "Sorry, Toby. We'll be out of your hair now."

"No worries. I just hope the captain's doing okay." The Navigator smiled worriedly as he watched the other two hustle out of the room.

* * *

A few minutes later, Jorge opened his eyes and winced as the room's lights blasted him in the face. "Crap, feel like I ate a fuckin' anvil with my forehead. Everything hurts."

"That's to be expected. You don't have a concussion or anything, but you took quite the fall." Madelyn walked over and shined a flashlight in his eyes as Hawkeye watched from nearby. "I see a slight bit of bleeding in your eye, so I'll just run a Hypocorder over your head. That should take care of the internal wound." Saying this, she whipped out a medical device, scanned his head, pressed a few buttons, and in seconds the pain was gone.

Hawkeye stared at the device evenly. "Human technology is really something. I might even be out of a job someday if it keeps advancing."

"Huh? What do you mean by that?" Madelyn glanced at him questioningly, but he just shrugged.

"It's nothing. Thank you for taking care of the captain, doctor Frey." Hawkeye gave a small wave and left the room a moment later.

"Nice guy. I never knew the Supreme Commander was so personable until I met his clone." Madelyn spoke, almost to herself before turning back around to Jorge. "You're free to go captain. However, you should really make sure not to overdo it in the future."

"Yeah... you're right." Jorge scratched at the back of his neck, but didn't make a move to get up from the medical chair. "I didn't see you drinking anything."

"Hm? I don't drink. I also don't smoke, but that's only somewhat related. I like to have my wits about me, and I care about my health." Madelyn walked over and sat in a chair across from him. "I have to say though, I've been seeing you in here a lot lately. On the surface, you're doing great and getting along with everyone... but I think you're not being totally honest about your feelings."

Jorge smiled sheepishly. "Was it that obvious? Geez." He wrung his hands together for a moment before continuing. "I uh... I saw my daughter last week. We talked over the starship communication network."

"Right. You mean Hawkeye's dimensional transmitter?"

"Yeah. She looks good. She's 18 now... I haven't seen her or hugged her since she was 15. It's been three years already."

Madelyn nodded neutrally. "Time is unmerciful. Do you regret coming on this trip?"

"Well no... but also yes..." Jorge smiled again, but this time it had a painful aura of fakeness about it. "I haven't been around my family for a long time. I miss them... a lot. But I also know a lot of people here, so it's not like I totally regret it!" He quickly spoke up as if to assuage concerns she might have that he hadn't enjoyed his time at all.

"Captain, let's be clear here. I'm not a psychologist. I do things that make the physical body feel better. I'm not trained for dealing with the mental health of patients, Beverly would be better for that. I'm just not sure what you want from me here..."

"Oh, right. Yeah. Sorry, I just thought since you were a doctor, maybe uh..." He chuckled nervously as he forgot what he was going to say.

Madelyn smiled pleasantly at him. "Look, if you want to talk, I'm happy to do so. I know what it's like being separated from your loved ones. I left my husband behind on Earth to go on this journey. Many others have too, though some brought their families with them. Most people here have made sacrifices... some more than others." Despite her smile, a tinge of sadness could be heard in her voice.

Jorge had a sudden realization as he remembered some rumors he had heard recently. "Oh... that's right... your husband. I'm sorry- I didn't mean to bring that up."

"It's fine. He's gone now, and I'll just have to live with it. I'm over it, really." Madelyn rubbed her arm for a moment before quickly standing up. "In any case, feel free to drop by if you need to talk, captain. Nobody wants you to fail or feel lonely. We're all here for you."

"Thanks, Doctor Frey." Jorge stood up and smiled at her as she smiled back.

"Ah, just call me Madelyn. The formality feels so stiff."

"Same to you, then. Just call me Jorge."

"I'd like that." The two of them smiled and nodded at each other politely before Jorge left the room, heading back to his quarters for the night.

Part 361a: Revenge

July 20th, 2120.

"I expected this to happen. You're on your own now."

Those words rang in Clarence's head as he ran on foot through the trees, keeping his head down low as he made his way forwards.

I can't believe she'd do this to me!

He was on the verge of having a panic attack, the only thing keeping his mind sane being that he had an angelic body that made him mentally stronger than one might expect. Somehow, large amounts of copious energy had allowed him to think more clearly than he would have as a human.

Unfortunately, that wasn't enough to save him now.

Sounds from all sides seemed to be closing in as he ducked down, cursing his luck that his body had to glow at this time of night. It was like a beacon directing his assassins towards him.

"Come out, Clarence! Hiding in the bushes only makes your weakness that much more apparent!" A voice boomed throughout the damp forest, making his lower lip tremble. The rain was dropping down slowly, only a trickle now. Only half an hour ago, its loudness was giving him the ability to move more quickly, and the fog had made him much less visible. But now...

"He's over here!" A voice sounded off alarmingly close and Clarence felt his heart jump into his throat as a glowing aura could be seen not even a hundred feet away through a few sets of bushes. If he could see them... they could see him.

He turned in the opposite direction of the voice and raced through the forest full speed, knowing this time they were right on his tail. Should I take to the skies? No! They've got sentries above the forest, watching like hawks!

He clutched his chest as he ran, taking stock of his energy reserves. At the least, I won't let them escape unscathed. I have enough stockpiled... I'll make them regret cornering me like a dog!

Missing a root sticking upwards, Clarence accidentally hooked his shoe under it, stumbling forwards clumsily and toppling onto his face as he ran. The sound of his body hitting the ground was like the sound of a piano smashing into concrete in the din of the night. He gasped in pain audibly and felt his entire body spasm in fear as several approaching footsteps turned directly towards him.

A thought occurred, as he spotted a relatively straight stick lying next to himself. It'll have to do.

He quickly grabbed it and imbued it with magic, hardening it as best as he could. Turning around, he held it in front of him as if he were a Kendo master. He had never done anything like this, but it was worth a shot. The alternative was suicide.

He didn't have to wait long, ten cherubim burst into the clearing and spotted him holding the stick. One of them raised his facemask. "Clarence, former preacher for the Church of Retribution. Lower the weapon and submit or we will strike you down where you stand." He placed his hand on his sword, but a smirk spread across his face. It was as if he were saying try and hit me with your stick, I'll make you regret the thought.

Clarence took a deep breath as he raised the stick up high. "The hell I will!" As he said this, he focused the magic on the tip of the stick, where every observer's eye was being drawn to. Without warning, a blast of light radiated outwards, blinding everyone except himself as it seared their eyes. Several cherubs screamed in pain as Clarence whaled on them with the stick, knocking five out cold in a matter of seconds.

Ignoring the rest, he did a partial levitation and flew away, moving noiselessly through the air as they howled in pain. Without a doubt, the bright light would attract those watching from above the forest cover and they would come to reinforce their fellow angels when they heard the multitude of screams.

In the dark it was hard to see what was ahead, and before he had a chance to react, Clarence flew straight into a rather thin tree that seemed to come out of nowhere. He let out a muffled yelp as his head smashed into it, causing him to tumble to the ground. When he glanced up and tried to shake the feeling off, several angels had already started to encircle him, one of which looked very familiar.

"It was a good try, false angel, but youth and inexperience will never escape age and cunning." An archangel with a long white beard stood several feet away, flanked by several cherubs and other guardian angels, all of them decked out in intimidating spiked white armor.

"Raphael! You bastard!" Clarence leaped to his feet and assumed his fighting pose as he aimed the stick at Raphael. "I won't let you take me alive!"

"Alive? Ha! That's an amusing joke, young one. You've got minutes left in your life as it stands, and that's if you're lucky." Raphael smiled politely, but an edge of rage could be seen under his veneer of melancholy. "I will however, grant you one last chance. Tell me who the female angel was... the one who you said was the mother of Jesus."

"Why the hell would I do that?" Clarence glanced around himself. The five remaining angels he had blinded just a minute before had joined in, and now he was totally surrounded. Escape would be impossible, and the same trick probably wasn't going to work twice.

"I want to know who she is. If you tell me, I will let you go... on the condition you never preach again."

"That's a death sentence. If I don't get at least a couple humans to pray to me, I'll die!"

"You'll die now if you don't tell me what I want to know." Raphael's voice chilled as he spoke, his tone leaving no room for misunderstanding.

Clarence lowered his eyes for a moment. Those years he had spent with Marie... the troubles they'd shared. She'd dropped him without a second thought. Once she heard the angels were looking for him, she had kicked him out into the cold without caring at all about the passion they had shared. Every night when she was being prayed to, she had begged him to enter inside of her, yet this was how she repaid him.

"Come now, young man. Just tell me who she is. It's easy!"

Raphael's words snapped Clarence out of his thoughts about the feeling of her lips on his, their hands joining together, her soft red hair that curled up at the tips. This was serious.

"I... if I tell you..." Clarence took a step forwards as he lowered the stick slightly. "You will... let me go?"

"Yes, yes! Of course, I am an archangel of my word!" Raphael jabbed his chest with his thumb proudly. "A wench who would kick you out should be worthy of no loyalty."

"You're right..." Clarence mumbled quietly to nobody in particular, as his eyes roved around. A small bug buzzed nearby, something resembling a dragonfly. It landed on his shoulder, and for the briefest of moments, he felt as if his eyes met its eyes and a bond was shared between them.

"...but I can't abandon the woman I love, even if she left me. To hell with you. To hell with ALL of you!"

Clarence reached inside of himself with nothing but his mental willpower, pulling forth an energy he didn't know he had. All around him, pebbles began to lift off the ground as gravity itself started to invert. A light shined inside of his chest, penetrating all the layers of his clothing as a high pitched wailing could be heard.

Raphael took two steps backwards. "Gods... is he going to... self destruct?!" He took another step as the energy began to condense into physical form, surging from Clarence's chest to his right arm. His arm swelled up to three times its normal size, becoming freakishly huge as Raphael felt a strange terror take hold.

"Everyone, get away from him! He's-!"

"AHHHHH!" Clarence screamed in pain as he aimed his arm at the old man. A blast of energy shot forwards, created of all his reserves at once as he targeted the archangel in front of him.

This is for humanity, you demon.

The last thought Clarence would ever think slipped out of his mind as the energy itself screamed to life, devouring everything in its path. Raphael raised his hands to produce his own energy shield, but it was far too slow. A cacophony of laughter enveloped his body as millions of invisible minds ripped the flesh from his angelic form in delight. REVENGE! BEAUTIFUL REVENGE!

A few moments later, nothing was left. The beam continued tearing through the forest for several minutes before slowly dissipating, leaving only ash and death in its wake.

Clarence smiled as he fell to his knees. All the energy had left his body.

His form faded away to dust, as the strange dragonfly watched from nearby.

* * *

Marie stared at the screen in shock. The drone had followed him, as she expected, but this was unthinkable. Even she had not expected this scale of destruction, nor for him to use every last bit of his energy. She had assumed he'd leave a little bit to survive on, but clearly he was not very adept at gauging his energy use.

She folded her wings up behind her and stood up abruptly. "This changes everything."

Her human counterpart nodded as she popped a cookie in her mouth. "Mmm. I love these. So chewy."

"Stop stuffing your face. Focus. We just learned that spiritual energy is powerful enough to fight against the archangels."

She grimaced at the human Marie mashing food into her mouth, suddenly remembering she still clutched the killswitch in her hand. Guess I don't need to use this now. With a flick of the wrist, she tossed it onto a nearby table. At least he saved me the trouble.

After her counterpart swallowed her cookie, she smiled pleasantly and licked her lips. "How much energy did you give him, anyway? That was quite the blast."

"Not a lot, if I'm being honest." Angel Marie turned to stare at the screen now, feeling a strange emotion well up inside of her. "I figured that if he was going to be killed anyway, then it would be a waste to give him more than he needed."

"A waste, huh? Indeed." The other Marie kept silent for a few moments as she followed the angel's gaze to the screen. "You're going to run out of energy eventually, you know. He hasn't preached in a long time, and many of the faithful have become quite lax in their nightly worship. With Clarence gone, your ability to increase the faithful is basically zero now."

"I could probably mind control them. Maybe hypnosis would work."

"Funny."

"Yeah."

Both of them shrugged slightly. The angel sighed as she flicked a button to have the drone return home. "I genuinely need you to start praying to me every night. Every little bit helps. Just slap your hands together and will your energy to me, that's all you have to do."

"I'd sooner gouge out my own eyes." The human rapped her fingers on the desk for a moment. "You know, I have another idea. You don't necessarily have to ask people to pray to you willingly."

"Oh? What have you got in mind?"

"Humans respond to two things. Rewards and punishment. Promising them eternal life, even if you're lying, might just work... but punishment might too."

Angel Marie let the thought mull for a moment. "Are you saying I should whip people to get them to pray to me?"

"No, but keep in mind how the prayer system works. It doesn't seem to matter if the participants are willing or not... if they will their energy to you, that's that. Therefore, you could kidnap people, in theory, stuff them in cages, and force them to pray for you or you'll let them starve to death."

A strange crooked smile spread over the angel's face. "A Skinner Box. I see. This is... good. I need some angels to experiment on anyway, but capturing some humans as well for the sake of their energy would be a neat twist. Couple that with punishment and rewards later on, I can force them to give me their life force. It's... genius."

"Of course it's genius, love. We thought of it." The human cackled to herself as she slapped her knee. "Just think of it! You can create your own little cult to have the idiots pray to you in order to keep you alive! If they die, you just find more!"

"It's so deliciously evil that even I'm having doubts. I'll certainly go to hell for this!"

"Oh, come on. You can't go to hell... you're an angel!"

"You said it!"

Both Maries broke out in hysterical laughter as they eagerly started drawing up plans for their new idea.

Part 362a: Crisis Of Conscience

January 2nd, 2121.

Ohhh... fuck. Jorge sat on the edge of his bed, rocking back and forth slowly as the nausea came and went. That's the last time I chug six beers in five minutes.

The toilet whispered softly to him from across the room as the temptation to heave came and went with infrequent spurts. His eyes twitched as a strange sandy sensation sometimes shot up and down his back, causing him to yelp in pain but also try to keep his mouth closed so he wouldn't taste pizza and beer from the night before.

If there's a god out there, please let this horrible pain go away.

He glanced at the clock on the wall. It was 8 AM, and he hadn't slept at all. He'd only finished partying at the New Years celebrations around five or six, and the last two hours had merely added to his pain. As pointless as a holiday regarding an arbitrary 365 day year was in outer space, the crew aboard all three ships had been restless and suggested it. If there was one truth he had learned over his decades of experience in space, during the Energy Wars as well as now, it was that unless he was engaged in combat, space was dreadfully boring.

A gagging feeling suddenly exploded up his nose and Jorge decided his body would have to dictate his next actions. Rushing to the toilet, he blasted forth a solid half pound of bile from the deepest recesses of his stomach, the choking noise making him vomit some more after that. Meaty thick coagulated chunks of all the food he'd eaten on New Years Day was mixed in and the smell was like death.

Quickly, he flushed the toilet and gargled several mouthfuls of water before returning to the kitchen and filling himself a tall glass of ice water.

I hate myself sometimes.

Sitting down at his table, he was surprised as someone knocked softly on his door, not bothering to use the doorbell. Had he been asleep, he might have missed it, though that might be why they knocked so softly. It probably wasn't super urgent.

He sighed as he swallowed another gulp of ice water, then set it down and walked over to the door. Pressing the 'open' command on the door's keypad, it zipped open instantly to reveal a familiar face.

"Doctor Frey! Err, what bringsh you here..." His words slurred a little bit and he blinked his eyes heavily as he stifled a yawn.

"Commander, I saw you stumble out of the mess hall. Are you still drinking too much?" She stared at him expectantly, and he stared back blankly for a few moments. His brain couldn't seem to understand what she was saying, and finally he just nodded and grinned sheepishly.

"Uh... yeah." He continued to stare at her for several awkward moments before his drunken mind realized his lack of manners. "Oh right.. c'mon in, doc'." He beckoned into his quarters and she slipped in, bringing a small medical box along with her. "'W's in th' bag?"

She smiled politely at him and pulled out a couple of pills. "These are for you. Anti-nausea medication, and the blue one will help you with the hangover you're going to have soon."

"Pff, I ain't need any pillsh." Jorge refused verbally, but his hand automatically shot out to take them. "Ahh, did you hear me when y'were outside the room?"

"I'm sure half the ship did, commander."

"Oh. Sorry." Jorge walked away from the door back to the table, feeling his feet dragging like he had an anvil tied to his waist. Arriving at the table, he grabbed his glass of water and downed the pills in one smooth motion like a professional.

Madelyn followed after him hesitantly, having never been in his personal quarters before. Glancing around, she spotted a picture beside his bed. "Oh! Is this your wife and daughter?"

"Yup." Jorge rocked back and forth as he waited for the pills to take effect and calm his roiling stomach. "Amy and Sharah. Love 'em t' death."

"I see." The kitchen was right around the corner from his bedroom, and Madelyn slowly lowered the picture back onto his desk, placing it face down. "Your daughter is very pretty. Wife too."

"Yeap. It'sh been a long three yearsh." Jorge licked at his lips as a strange taste of chalk entered his mouth. He yawned slow and hard as he blinked many times, unable to shake the feeling of creeping exhaustion from his mind.

Madelyn walked around the corner and sat down at the table just across from him, smiling coyly. "Feeling better, commander?"

"Not really. Tired 's hell t' be honest." He stared at the woman witting across from him, blinking as she seemed to turn from two to three and back to one person. His vision was suddenly really weird out of nowhere. "God, I don't feel s' good, doc. Thanks for th' pills... but I gotta take a nap. Mind chatting later?"

"Feeling tired? That's fine. I'll go ahead and leave, then." She leaned across the table and put her hand on his, making his stupor clear away slightly. "You can always talk to me if you want to, alright commander?"

"Uh... sure thing." Jorge blushed as he felt a weird sensation in his pants. Was the doctor always this pretty? "Lemme just... walk you to th' door."

"Oh, that won't be necessary, commander." She pulled her hand away slowly and smiled at him, though the way she said it seemed ambiguous until she clarified. "I can walk myself out. Have a nice night."

"Oh. Okay." Jorge stared at her blankly as she stood up from the table and slowly started to walk away, almost as if deliberately so.

Suddenly Jorge stood up from the table. "W-wait, doctor Frey. I... uh..."

"Hmm?" She turned back and smiled at him as he took a step forwards.

Uneasily, he leaned against the doorway, feeling a strange fatigue in the back of his mind. "Oh man... I don't feel so good..."

A moment later he fell forwards, unable to see clearly as the doctor rushed over to him. "Oh geez, you silly man. Here, let me help you into bed." She winked at him slyly, which felt like it should raise an alarm bell in the back of his mind... but he couldn't quite understand why that was. "A doctor can order you to take bed rest, you know."

"Yeah... sounds good." Jorge wrapped his arm over her shoulder as she helped walk him several feet to his bed. Sitting himself down, he blinked at her in surprise as she ran her hand across his leg.

"You seem like a lonely man. Bed rest isn't the only thing a doctor can prescribe."

All he could do was nod dumbly as he stared into her strangely beautiful eyes. Yeah, this was okay. This felt right, for some reason.

This couldn't be wrong. She was a doctor, after all.

* * *

Standing on a rooftop as the cold midday air rushed past, all I could do was gawk in surprise. "How can he be dead?"

Gabriel sighed as he pulled his eyes from mine. "It's not... it's hard to say. To call him a brother would be too weak a word. It doesn't explain the bond we shared adequately. The thought he could die to a pseudo-angel, of all beings, is unthinkable."

"No kidding. Wow." I wiped at my forehead and pulled my coat a little tighter as an icy chill shot down my back. "So let me get this straight... he was killed by a pseudo angel, specifically the one he murdered as a human being, that Clarence preacher guy?"

"Yes. We knew that Clarence had secretly been convincing many humans to pray to him, but we never thought he could have gained such a level of power."

I felt an urge to speak up about my own feelings on the power of pseudo-angels and my experience with one in particular, but I decided to keep my mouth shut about it. "So that's it, then? He's just dead? Gone forever?"

"In a manner of speaking. All six archangels have a backup system for ensuring our life is not totally snuffed out. Two archangels were killed by demons during the Great War in Heaven many centuries ago, and their manner of death prevented the backup plan from working. However, Michael and Raphael's backup plans did work." To my surprise, Gabriel held up his hand and pointed at two rings he wore on his fingers. "Their souls were sealed inside of special rings designed millions of years ago. Only archangels have access to these holy artifacts. They are almost entirely indestructible."

A strange smile spread over my face. "Ha... haha... I'm familiar with these rings, actually."

"You are?" Gabriel looked almost incredulous. "How so?"

"Well, as you know, I come from the future. Specifically, a future where the demons have taken over the galaxy and the angels are all dead. So..." My voice trailed off and he seemed to understand.

"Ah. So they already had died. That's... unnerving. Have you really changed the future?"

"Well, you were dead in the future I came from too, so, it's still up for debate." I smiled at him awkwardly, but he didn't return the expression.

There was a slight awkward silence before he spoke again. "Michael, Raphael, Uriel, Hades... all of my brothers are gone. They were my closest allies, my confidantes. I'm the last archangel left. In the end, our power is still fading. We're still dying out slowly. We-"

I suddenly interrupted him. "Hold on, did you say Hades?"

"Yes. The Archangel of Death. He was the one who had spoken in secret with Michael to create a system that would make angelkind invincible against the demonic hordes. Hades passed away during the Great War in Heaven and never saw his work bear fruit. We weren't even able to recover his body, in the end."

"Oh." My mouth opened and closed as words formed in my mind, but I couldn't speak them.

Hades. I've heard the name. It took me a few minutes to remember where, but now the painful memories have come screaming back. He was the one inside of Satan's mind... a dark and powerful entity who cursed me for many years, reading my mind and stealing my memories.

And... he was an archangel? How did Satan take possession of him? How does Satan do any of the things I've seen him do?

Gabriel interrupted my thoughts. "You look like you've seen a ghost. Do you know something about Hades?"

"Um... sort of. I've heard of him in passing."

"Ah, that's understandable. He was a mighty archangel, but he was always a solitary figure. Humans might call him antisocial, but we would have the occasional talks here and there. He never came to the group meetings, and he tended to stick by himself. In retrospect, I wish I had spoken more with him before the demons slayed him. Then again... there are many I wish I could speak with now. So many gone." Gabriel smiled, but his eyes were hollow. I couldn't even see pain, simply emptiness. He had lost so many friends, death had become a way of life for him.

"You know, Gabriel... humans used to have a unique punishment called the death penalty, reserved only for the most heinous offenders."

He nodded slowly. "I am aware."

"Did you know they abolished the concept in the 2020's? Small tribes worldwide continued to do it, but eventually by 2050, international efforts managed to put an end to all such barbarism. The biggest reason for the shift was due to the coming nanotechnology boom and lifespan increasing far beyond the limits of 100 years. Do you know why?"

He shook his head slowly. "I do not."

"Human philosophers believed that a human sentenced to die who might have lived another 40 years would be a tragedy, but a nano-technology enhanced human might live forever. Surely, with decades of rehabilitation, even the worst offender could re-enter society to live normally. Killing them would be unthinkable. The value for an immortal being's life far outweighed the possibilities for a mortal one. Finally, even if they couldn't normally be rehabilitated, many scientists also believed that eventually we could map the human brain and come up with a way to disable psychopathic behavior. Therefore, all humans would one day be able to live in harmony, without violence."

Gabriel smiled finally, a sad, lingering thing. "How amusing. Humans being nonviolent? The sentiment is lost on me. There is nothing that I fear more than humans. Humans have the capacity to inflict pain like no other. Not even just in theory, but in practice. Further, all of societies limitations on such evil behavior are only ever a tentative hold on the average human's mental defenses. Every time the power goes out or humans need to survive by their own wits, they always return to their violent roots. I've seen it countless times over just the last few hundred years."

Gabriel tilted his head up to look at the chilled clouds floating overhead. "Demons are evil, Angels are deceptive, the Volgrim are alien to the concept of emotions... but humans are the worst of them all. I mean no disrespect to you personally, but even you must know of that which I refer to."

I probably would have felt miffed, but instead I just shrugged. "Yeah, I do. Even I'm barbaric, in some ways. I've killed so many... my hands will never be able to wipe the blood away. Humans really are irredeemable, aren't we?" I chuckled slightly, and Gabriel joined in as he put a hand on my shoulder.

"You're not so bad. Don't beat yourself up, son. Thanks for listening to my problems. It... helped. A lot."

I smiled widely at him as I rested my hand on his. "Any time, Gabriel. Give my condolences to Zeus and all of the other angels."

He started to pull away, and as he did a question entered my mind. "Actually, ah, regarding the rings... see, I was able to communicate with you, Raphael, and Michael in the future I came from. Can you... can you speak with him?"

Gabriel didn't hesitate. "No. The trauma of death means that reforming will take him a very long time for his soul to regain all of his memories and knowledge. I cannot speak with Michael either. Someday, if I should live long enough, I will. But then... if I should die, I hope you will recover all of our rings, Jason. I am the most powerful of the archangels. If I were to die, that would mean a terrible calamity had occurred. So, please... make sure you recover our rings if that should happen."

"Yeah. I'll do that." I waved at Gabriel as he took a step back and mumbled some chants under his breath. "See you later, Gabriel."

"You as well."

He vanished in a flash of light, and a moment later only my thoughts remained with me on that chilly rooftop.

* * *

Sarah sighed happily as the car drove itself down the road. Autopilot mode was just so much better. A remix of a 21st century song, released in the 80's, played away. The bass drops and elegant electronic noises of synthetic dubstep really helped keep her in a calm frame of mind.

Her mom seemed to enjoy it too, which was always a plus. Most teenage girls were into that new third wave jazz, but Sarah considered herself a refined woman, able to appreciate the classics.

"What are you reading today, mom?" She lowered her head to try and get a better look at the cover, but her mom's hand was covering up the title.

"A biography about the life of Stephen Johannesburg, the last American President. He died fighting the Volgrim invaders head on, apparently, before they vaporized him with a bomb. Killed off a huge number of diplomats from around the world too. I never knew this stuff growing up." Her mom flipped the page and Sarah wondered to herself why she liked reading those paperbacks when there were so many more interesting and useful features with a datapad reader.

"America, huh? The demons run the north and south continents now. I wonder if we'll ever be able to retake them."

"I can't imagine we won't. The Supreme Commander is nothing if not reliable. Handsome too." Her mom giggled to herself at some naughty thought and Sarah smacked her arm.

"Mom! That's so gross!"

"Oh come on, a married woman can dream. Besides, I'm over a hundred years old now. Waiting a couple more years for your father to finish his mission is no trouble at all." Amy flipped to the next page as their hover-car rounded a corner, heading down the London streets towards the church again.

"You keep saying that, but it worries me." Sarah glanced down at her datapad as a new message popped up. Check your notes when you get here, we've got a few last minute additions to your sermon today.

She groaned audibly. "Yay. More work. Why can't the mid-week Thursday sermons be just a tad shorter? They always have to cram so much stuff in."

"Problems?" Her mom glanced away from the book for a moment as she sneaked a look at Sarah's datapad. "Oh. You poor thing, being all responsible and dependable and stuff."

"Oh, stuff it, mom. I only do this because nobody else will. Plus, there is this guy..."

Amy immediately rolled her eyes. "You're way too young to go looking for a boyfriend. Wait until you're eighty, like I did."

"I can't tell if you're joking!" Sarah and Amy both burst out into hysterical laughter. "You're lucky you found a man at all! Dad might have thought you were a crazy cat lady, being single at eighty!"

"Well, to be fair sweetheart, I looked thirty. Most women do. Nanobots are the ultimate makeup."

"Yeah... nanobots." Sarah's eyes shifted as she looked away from her mom. "Actually, I've been meaning to talk to you about nanobots. I um... given the history of the church and their belief system... I don't think I should use them."

Amy slowly set her book down, closing it up in her lap before turning to her daughter. "What do you mean?"

"Well, I'm not dumb, mom. I know that nanobots aren't the devil's nectar or anything silly like that, but everyone in the church has their eyes on me now. Being an impure human would make them all look at me differently if they knew I had been injected."

"How would accepting nanobots make you impure? That's one of the more radical beliefs the church has that I don't agree with. Maybe you should be using your status as the new minister to try and shift the church away from belief values like that."

"I'm trying, mom. I'm doing the best I can here. We've already succeeded in renaming the church and retaining membership from most people. We had a few people who thought the Church of Divinity was a terrible name, but I managed to convince them with Raphael's help that it was a necessary move. If we change too much all at once, people will start leaving in droves, spreading discontent everywhere."

Amy nodded silently for a few moments. "You know, when I was a young girl, the Pope of the Catholic Church came out as gay in the 2030's. It was crazy. People swore up and down that the end of days were coming, and the Volgrim were just demons set upon us by god as judgement for our sins. But, over time, people converted away from those extremist beliefs. Now being gay is accepted everywhere. Maybe you should try the same thing for the anti-nano injectors. It'd make a positive impact and reverse some of the damage Clarence has done."

"Ehh, maybe. I don't know." Sarah scratched the back of her neck slowly. "I mean, this isn't really the same thing. The nano-cancer is real. People are injecting things into their bodies that could be used by the government to spy on them or track their movements, not to mention many people die slow horrible deaths because of the nano-cancer."

"I totally disagree." Sarah braced herself as her mother went full argument-mode. "In the 1800's, humans died by the millions to smallpox, polio, anything you can think of. By the end of the 20th century, those diseases were eradicated, leaving only things like heart disease and lung cancer. While they claimed millions of lives per year, it was nothing compared to the deaths caused by the viruses and pathogens of the previous era. Compare that to now... humans only are infected by the nano-cancer, and that's it."

Amy paused as she thought of something else. "Hell, it's even better than that. Less than one percent of all people die to the nano-cancer, but of the 99% who don't, they will probably live forever. If we didn't have nanobots, we'd not only still be dying to heart disease and such again, we wouldn't live forever. We would go from a 99% immortality rate to a 0% immortality rate. It's incomparable."

Sarah spent half a minute silently trying to think of a rebuttal, but nothing came to mind. "Yeah... you're right. I can never outsmart you."

"Of course you can, but today is not that day." Amy smiled smugly as she lifted her book back up. "Just make sure Sister Margaret hears the abridged version of what I just told you before you go advocating for a total overhaul of the church's position on nanobots."

"Sure thing, mom."

* * *

Amelia didn't seem fazed by the news. "I don't really care if some ancient archangel was killed." I pulled up my coat as we stepped outside of the hospital into the bitter cold air. She, however, didn't even flinch. Wearing that same yellow sundress that exposed her to the elements, she didn't seem to feel the cold at all. Her body was really made of something else.

"I know you don't care since you don't even like the angels, but, like, you know... this is kind of big news. He was a goddamn archangel. Clarence killed him. Doesn't that blow your mind?"

"Yeah, I suppose. But in theory, if angels gain power by having people pray to them, then do the class distinctions of angel and pseudo-angel even matter? All you have to do is have people pray to you, and you can easily become stronger than an archangel. The only reason this doesn't happen more often is that humans are ignorant of the system, and the pseudo-angels are prevented from leaving Heaven." Amelia was completely disinterested in the conversation by this point, but a sudden spark appeared in her head. "Say, what if Hitler died and became an angel? If he could figure out how, he could have had millions of people pray to him!"

"That's not funny." I resisted the urge the glare at her. "Kind of a vile thought, if you ask me."

"I wasn't joking. Think about it, if someone with evil intentions could become an angel and convince millions, even billions of people to pray to them, their power could become quite enormous. Even a wordsmith might have trouble dealing with a threat like that."

Her words sounded almost ominous to me. "I've thought of how I could kill or neutralize the angels if they pulled something like that. I think just draining them of their energy would work, though it's tough to say. Hopefully I'll never have to try that out."

She and I walked for a few minutes before arriving at a traffic crossing. Amelia's body language felt tighter than usual, as if she had something going on. I felt the urge to inquire. "Anything happen recently?"

"Well, actually..." She glanced up into my eyes, and for a brief moment I thought I saw an emotion rarely shown by her... fear. "Ah, remember a few years ago, when all the people in the hospital I worked at were... slaughtered?"

"Yeah. What about it?" I responded casually, but she suddenly pulled close and looped her arm through mine.

"The demon. The one who did the killing. He came to me earlier today. I had those emergency new years patients to attend to, the lights went out... and he was there."

I suddenly felt alarm in the back of my mind. She seemed visibly uncomfortable. "What did he say?"

"He thanked me. He thanked me for allowing him to survive and freeing him from his captor. He... he was strong. Really strong." She hesitated, glancing behind us as if to check and see if anyone was watching. "He's been following me, Jason. I never even sensed him, and he has enormous energy. He must be able to mask his power."

"Is that even possible? Masking energy levels?"

"Of course. I do it all the time, but it takes never-ending concentration. The only way I can do it is if Levvy takes up the slack. Usually he's repressing my energy so that others can't notice, but occasionally someone does. The thing is... even when I looked directly at the demon, I couldn't sense anything. Neither could Levvy. Further, he was able to perceive Levvy inside of me. It was..."

Amelia paused and looked around us, as if an alarm had gone off that I couldn't hear. "Do you hear that? A buzzing sound."

"What? No." I turned to my left and felt my heart stop as a massive delivery van came barreling at me full speed. No time to react. I'm not wearing my hypersuit.

I quickly raised my hand to protect myself futilely, but Amelia was faster. She took two instant steps and jumped in front of me, digging her feet into the ground as the five ton vehicle smashed into her and came to an instant stop. Seconds later, several more vehicles raced at us straight on, as if they were aiming for us.

"Jesus Chris-" I cut myself off and aimed my mind at the ground. " WALL! " Instantly, a massive wall of metal shot up from the ground ten feet into the air, surrounding me on all sides as a sickening smashing of metal on metal blasted out all around me. Within ten seconds, the sounds of crashing came to an end and I could hear screams all around. Amelia stood next to me inside the barrier, breathing evenly as if nothing had even happened.

"What the hell was that?! Put your hypersuit on and lower this barrier."

She spoke normally but her voice had an edge to it. I quickly wordsmithed my suit on and lowered the barrier, taking a step back in shock as fifteen vehicles sat in crumpled heaps nearby. Was this an assassination attempt?!

Amelia wasted no time, jumping to the delivery van and ripping the door off before taking a step back. "This driver is dead. Look for survivors, Jason. Keep an eye out."

I nodded quickly, sending a telepathic signal to the JIB right as several clones materialized next to me in full hypersuit attire. Seems they were keeping an eye on me as usual. Good.

"That took twenty seconds too long. I nearly died. Do better next time! Now help me look for survivors!" I barked orders at them and they nodded quickly, not bothering to retort.

A minute later, we'd pulled several corpses from cars, and more than a few people were intact. I glanced down at a young girl, shivering at how badly her face was mutilated. " Heal! "

A couple seconds later, her face was healed and I found myself staring at her lifeless body. She looked... familiar.

"Jason! Over here!" Sensei walked up to me, holding a woman's body in his arms. "I've got another one, but she's in bad condition." He set her down and it took all of two seconds for me to remember her.

Amy Gutierrez. She was the woman who found planet Revival. Shit. She had a husband too, Jorge if I remember. He's on his way to that planet now.

" Heal. " I quickly healed up her body, waiting several moments in suspense before she coughed violently and sputtered back to life.

She blinked slowly, staring up at me for a moment as she suddenly remembered what had happened. "S-Sarah... where's Sarah?" Her eyes lolled around in her head as the healing took a few more seconds to complete. The instant she had some strength back, she sat up and noticed the girl in my arms. "Oh god! Sarah! SARAH?!"

I quickly noticed the family resemblance. They looked just like each other. Shit... at least I managed to heal her face.

"Ma'am. I'm sorry... your daughter is... she didn't make it."

Amy didn't even cry tears, her hands just shook in fright as she gently touched her daughter's face. The shock of what happened must have broken her mind temporarily. "She...

she can't be dead. Look, she's in perfect condition. Sarah... Sarah wake up... it's mom. Come on, baby. Wake up, sweetheart." She brushed aside her daughter's hair as I held the girl in my arms, and for a moment, the scene felt all too familiar to me. Holding the body of a dead girl in my arms...

For the first time in a hundred years, I felt tears crawl down my face, in place of this woman's pain. "Amy... she's not going to wake up. She's- she's gone now. She's gone."

Against my better judgement, I lifted my helmet off, ignoring the danger of a potential assassin in the area. I put my hand on her arm. "She's gone."

"No... god no. I told her to autopilot the car. This is my fault. I can't believe it, I can't... I can't..." Amy reached over and pulled her daughter out of my arms. For some reason, I didn't want to let go, but I did. I gingerly handed the young woman over to her mother and stood up, wiping my tears away as I walked a few paces from the two of them to give them some privacy.

Amelia walked up to me and immediately was taken aback by my tears. "Jason, are you okay? What's wrong?"

No matter how I wiped, I couldn't stop the tears. "Ah, it's n-nothing. Just give me a minute."

Reflexively, I knelt down and wrapped my arms around Amelia, hugging her with crushing force as I felt my chest heave. Why am I crying so hard? I didn't even know this girl. I didn't know her at all.

Despite my forceful grip, it was probably nothing to Amelia, and she hugged me back. We stayed like that for several seconds before I pulled away and shook my head. "God, I'm sorry. I'm a mess. I don't even know why I'm crying. Fuck."

"There's nothing to be afraid of, Jason. I protected you from the cars. I know you might have been scared but-"

I raised my hand to silence her. "No, that's not it. Thank you, Amelia. That just... isn't it though."

Fuck.

I turned back to stare at the grieving mother.

I can't believe things like this still happen. Senseless acts of violence.

* * *

Marie smashed her glowing fist on the desk. "SON OF A BITCH! Who the fuck is that little cunt?! She stopped the van with her bare hands!"

The viewscreens before her showed complete chaos. More than a dozen hover-vehicles had smashed into traffic lights and each other at an intersection, yet Jason Hiro had once again evaded death, the little shit.

"She wasn't in the plan. Is she a demon? She looks totally human. But hey, we accomplished one sub-objective." Marie's human counterpart sat beside her at the desk, blowing bubbles with her bubblegum. A new habit she'd picked up recently, the popping sound was a subtle infuriating noise that grated on the angel's nerves.

"Yeah, I got my revenge. This little bitch got Clarence killed. I was fond of that puppet, and I had to let him go. At least I have this hollow victory." The angel threw her hands up in the air as she jumped up from the desk, her nostrils flared as her temper raged. "Fuck! I want that woman's name! I want to know everything about her! She is no normal homo-sapiens, I'll tell you that much."

Another crack blared in the small room as the human blew her stupid bubbles. "I may have seen her once or twice, but I don't know anything about her. I'll keep an eye on her from now on and see what I can dig up."

"Yeah. Do that." The angel seethed for a few more moments before taking a long deep breath to cool off. "Ah, it's not all bad I guess."

"Of course it isn't. Always look on the bright side of life!" Human Marie flicked the monitors over to a nearby hospital. "Satan's going to send some goons out tonight. We'll have the first batch of test subjects before you know it."

"Great. Fantastic. Just another thing to scratch off my bucket list."

"Don't be like that. I'm doing this for you anyway." The human pulled the gum from her mouth and tossed it in a trashcan next to the desk. "Things could be a lot worse, you know. We could both be dead, for one."

"Don't even joke like that."

"It's only a joke if it's funny."

* * *

Jorge blinked slowly as the room came into focus. Everything hurt in ways he hadn't experienced before, and he felt like his head had been repeatedly smashed against an anvil.

That was when he realized someone was pounding at the door and ringing his doorbell furiously.

"Jorge! Jorge, open up!" A deep male voice yelled and sounded extremely frustrated and agitated. Jorge started to get up before realizing his arm was pinned in place. Glancing to the side, his heart skipped a beat as he realized there was someone in the bed with him. A female. A naked woman.

The doctor.

He stared at her for three seconds as his mind raced. What the hell is she doing here? What did I do last night?

Then the memories came rushing back. The alcohol, her late night visit, their passionate embrace. The temporary feeling of loneliness having vanished, if just for a few hours.

The crushing realization of the horrible mistake he'd made.

"Oh god." He barely breathed the words before he heard a clicking sound as the door opened.

Hawkeye walked in, his face pale and a horrified expression on his face. "Jesus Christ, if you were awake you should have opened the door! There was an accident, and your-"

He froze as he glanced from Jorge to the woman in bed beside him.

"Who... who is that?"

Jorge stared blankly at Hawkeye, unsure of what to say. "Uh... this isn't what it looks like. I was drunk last night, some things happened... I fucked up."

"Yeah. Yeah you did." Hawkeye's mouth opened and closed as he licked his lips. "I ought to beat the shit out of you, but there's no point. Your wife and daughter were just in an accident."

Jorge's eyes shot open as the words washed over him like ice water down his back. "Wh-what?! An accident? What do you mean?"

Doctor Frey stirred, their loud voices shaking her from a deep slumber. A second later, she sat up in bed and pulled the covers over herself, breathing hard as soon as she saw Hawkeye.

"Uh. H-hi."

"Shut the fuck up." Hawkeye didn't even look at her. "I have words for you later. Jorge, your wife is alright. But your daughter... she... she didn't..."

Jorge felt horror overwhelm himself as his hands raised up to his face, as if to shield his eyes. "She's still alive... right? Is she in the hospital?"

"No. Your daughter... she died. I'm sorry." Hawkeye's sadness was gone now, and he almost seemed to be enjoying delivering this news. It was as if he was punishing an unfaithful man for his infidelity.

"No... she can't be dead... oh fuck. Oh... fuck." Jorge felt tears bubbling up unbidden, even as Doctor Frey climbed out of bed and tossed her clothes back on, oblivious to Hawkeye's gaze.

"Where are you going?" Jorge stared at her as she started to walk out of the room.

"I'm out. This is too deep for me. Not worth it." With a voice of steel, she walked out of the room ignoring the pleading look in his eyes.

Hawkeye didn't even look at her as she left. "I can't believe you. Of all the times..." He bit his lip and looked away, out the window towards the stars passing by. "I'm not going to beat you up over this, even if I think you deserve it. This is... punishment enough. Your wife is on the comm line. When you get your act together, go talk with her. We'll keep this between ourselves."

He didn't wait for a response before storming out of the room.

Jorge finally let the tears stream down his face.

"FUCK! SHIT! I deserved this! I deserved this!" He punched himself in the head violently as he sat in bed, sobbing for several minutes before picking himself up and putting on his clothes.

I deserved this, but Amy didn't. I can't let her grieve alone.

A minute later, he left the room and headed out to go talk to his wife.

Part 363a: Framed

The viewscreen came to life and froze for several minutes on a pure white image as the signal waited for the receiving end to connect. Jorge rubbed his hands together nervously and wiped at his face every now and again. The clock on the wall ticked down and it took all his control not to burst into tears.

Get it together, man.

He goaded himself angrily as he thought about what he'd done. I cheated. Jesus Christ. I can't believe myself.

Amy would never cheat on him. She'd prodded him and winked and giggled about the Supreme Commander, but he knew deep down she'd never do such a thing. Then when he did the worst thing a man could do to his beloved wife, the gods themselves reached out and punished him.

And I deserved it too. But... Sarah didn't deserve it. Shit!

God was a cruel bastard. No... Jorge felt it, deep in his heart. There was no god. They were all fakes... false persuaders. God had nothing to do with this.

His wife and daughter had been on the way to church though. Maybe I'm wrong. Maybe this really was a punishment for my infidelity. How can I face her after this?

The screen shifted from pure white to an empty room, making Jorge stiffen as his eyes shot to the center of the screen. A set of chairs and a couch were beside each other, but nobody was there. An eerie silence filled the room on the other side of the broadcast, and Jorge felt himself lean forwards slightly, as if trying to peek around a corner that wasn't there.

Another minute passed, and finally an older man shuffled onscreen, his hospital lab-coat and thick rimmed glasses indicating he was some sort of surgeon. His nameplate said something, but Jorge couldn't quite make it out.

"Oh, erm, you're the husband of Amy Gutierrez, correct?" He looked at an old fashioned clipboard in his hand and lightly lifted a page an inch or so. "Jorge L. Gutierrez?"

"Y-yes. That's correct."

The man nodded slowly as he lowered the clipboard slightly. "I do regret to inform you of this, Mister Gutierrez, but your wife will not be able to speak to you in her present condition."

Jorge felt his heart in his throat as he waited for the doctor to elaborate, but he simply stopped there, as if that was all he needed to say. "Her present condition? What do you mean?"

Is she doing badly?"

"Hard to say, honestly." The doctor forced a weak smile, but then stopped, as if remembering he shouldn't even hint at a positive emotion during a trying time like this. "Her body is in perfect condition. The condition of the vehicle she was in and the results from the rapid response crash investigator indicated she must have slammed her head into the dashboard, causing a severe skull fracture... but her body is in absolutely pristine condition. She simply will not wake up." He shook his head slowly. "I don't get it. In all my years, I've never seen a case so perplexing. One for the medical books, that one is."

"I'm right here, you know." Jorge stopped himself from glaring madly at the doctor onscreen. He seemed almost senile, or perhaps he was just a sociopath who didn't understand normal emotions. Working with people who died constantly could ravage one's sanity over a long period of time, not that it was any comfort to Jorge in that moment.

"Yes, yes. My apologies." The doctor scratched the back of his neck and bit his lip as he averted his eyes from the man before him. "In any case, it all depends on if she wakes up. You're free to visit her if you like, but the best I can do for you right now is show you a picture of her."

"I'm about a thousand lightyears from Earth, doctor. A visit is out of-" Jorge stopped himself, before mentally facepalming. Hawkeye can probably get me home in the blink of an eye. "Never mind, I'll see what I can do. And... ah, Sarah. My daughter. Did she... did she at least g-go quickly?" He choked slightly as tears formed in his eyes. I can't break down right now. My wife would want me to be strong for her.

"I assure you, Mister Gutierrez, her passing was instant. I doubt she felt a thing." The doctor shuffled on his feet but Jorge was staring at the ground as he wiped his eyes. He didn't even notice the doctor's gaze as a hand beckoned him offscreen. "Sorry to leave so abruptly, but duty calls. I have three other patients from the crash I must see to."

"Yeah. No problem, doc. Thanks." Jorge mumbled half-heartedly, and when he looked up, the doctor was already gone, the quiet sound of a door hissing shut barely audible in the background.

"Harsh." A voice spoke up suddenly and Jorge flinched in his seat, surprised to see Hawkeye silently entering the room. "I heard some of it. Your wife probably suffered mental damage that Jason was unable to heal properly. We can heal the body, but not the mind... or the soul."

"Fuck." Jorge let the word slip without thinking. "This is my fault."

"Not really, but you certainly aren't blameless." Hawkeye, ever the persistent one, didn't let up. "You picked a fine day to cheat. Luckily, unless Doctor Frey blabs about it, it should stay between the three of us."

"I'm sorry." Jorge sighed in defeat, but this only seemed to annoy the clone standing in the doorway.

"There's no reason to apologize to me. Rather, if your wife wakes up, you should apologize to her. Hell, it probably doesn't even matter anymore." Hawkeye seemed to spit the words out as he stared at the now blank viewscreen in frustration. "You can't bring back your daughter. She's gone, now. Keeping things between you and me might be for the better... Amy's already heartbroken enough."

Jorge stared silently at the ground for a few moments. "You said 'if' my wife wakes up. Do you think there's a chance... she won't?"

"I don't know. I'm not a doctor, not in the slightest. I've done far more research and practice with my abilities than even the Original has, yet I still know so little. If she's in a coma after being healed, she might not awaken for a few days, or weeks, or even months."

"Or years." Jorge finished the sentence as he leaned back in the couch and instead stared at the ceiling. "I'm a failure."

"Come on, that's not the attitude to keep." Hawkeye walked over and sat down next to Jorge, gently punching him in the arm. "Tell you what, this crew can go on without you. I'll send you home, and you spend every day by your wife's side until she wakes up. How does that sound?"

"That's... for the best." Jorge smiled at Hawkeye, but his returned expression was blank, maybe even stern.

"There's more."

"Come again?"

"I spoke with the doctor. Miss Frey." Hawkeye licked his lips slowly as he kept his eyes locked onto Jorge's. "She told me that you coerced her into your room, were acting very strange, and then you sexually assaulted her."

Jorge felt his mouth start to form words, but his mind was totally empty. "What?"

"You were drunk at the party. Everyone knows that. You also get rather mouthy when you've had a few too many. Problem is, I'm reading your mind, and I've read hers, and I can't tell if she's lying or not." Hawkeye grinned imperceptibly. "So what is it? Did you or did you not?"

"No... I wouldn't do that..." Jorge felt his gaze slip away as he looked at the ground. Would I? I can't remember last night at all. I barely remember what we did once we were in bed. Would I do that?

"I don't know if you did or not, but if the rumors get out on the ship, it'll be major problems for the both of us. Her story sounds credible enough, though I doubt her words. The last thing I need is a ship wracked by scandal." Hawkeye stood up abruptly. "So yeah, it's for the best you are no longer a part of this mission. No hard feelings, I hope? You need to be with your wife anyway."

"Yeah. My wife. Need to be with her." Jorge parroted the words, but he didn't understand their meaning. He felt so numb he could barely even think.

"I'll send you back to Earth in the morning. Make sure you say goodbye to your crew. They deserve that much from you. The official story will just be that your wife was in an accident and you're leaving to see her, nothing else."

"Thanks. I appreciate it."

Hawkeye tapped his foot slowly. "God, I hope she's lying. I really do." He turned towards the door and opened it up but froze in the doorway. "If I find out she isn't, there will be hell to pay. I'm not soft like the Original."

Without another word, he walked through the doorway, leaving Jorge to his thoughts.

* * *

Deep underground, in a large space carved out by hand and magic over several years, where no light could ever hope to penetrate, two demonic entities of darkness mucked about in silence.

Relative silence, that is.

"So then I was like, 'Nooo don't attack Satan! Idiot, you'll die!' But then he was all like 'I am stronger now, you haven't seen my true power!' and he still got his ass whooped!"

Yama groaned as the being in the orb chattered at him nonstop. He always did this. "Can't you simply be silent for once in your existence?"

"Absolutely! All you have to do is give me back to Lady Belial! That's it, pal! Nothing to it!" The being inside the orb, 'Valac' as he called himself, was apparently a powerful demon lord from an age past, before even the Great War in Heaven that all demons spoke of in whispers. Despite this, he acted like an annoying loudmouth, and Yama had long since realized it was just an act so that he'd be annoyed enough to send the orb back to the Second Emperor.

"Your power is wasted on her. Females are inferior specimens compared to the male."

"Sounds like something an idiot would say! Females are so much nicer to look at, and so much kinder too! All you do is mope around all day, rasping about how you're going to kill all humans! You're just as boring as Satan, except all he does is blather about the angels! Two sides of the same coin!" The annoying falsetto Valac was deliberately putting in his voice seemed to have the desired effect of making Yama wish he had thought the capture out more carefully.

"It occurs to me that I should just stuff you in a box and only take you out for special situations."

Valac's cheerful demeanor seized up and he almost choked when he responded. "You wouldn't."

"I should find one of those energy nullifiers and stick it in the box with you. I think you'll find them quite relaxing."

"Fine. Geez." Valac sighed as his voice deepened slightly. "You're not much fun. Belial used to talk to me about her day... she always treated me nice."

"I am not Belial." Yama gnashed his teeth as the shadowy haze fell off his body. "You were right, though. The human female known as Amelia... I felt the presence inside of her. The dark one."

The demon in the orb groaned to himself silently. Once again, this doofus is going on about that human girl. "Why don't you just grab her and have your way with her already? After you do, let me go back to my own woman."

Yama seemed irritated by the suggestion. "Fool. I am beyond such worthless feelings."

"I doubt that. You clearly feel something towards her."

The Shadow didn't respond, as he merely seethed to himself wordlessly.

"Look, I was never much of a ladies man, understand? I sort of died in my prime on the field of battle. Still, you're worse than clueless, you're-"

Yama didn't let him finish. "I have had many trysts with dozens of females. All were before my evolution to a Shadow."

"Oh."

There was an awkward silence as Valac felt slightly irritated at the cocksure way Yama had just said that.

What a jackass. I hate the way he humble-brags about everything. Must be nice to get to walk around and teleport and be all powerful and cool and awesome. At least he's a loner and doesn't receive any appreciation.

Valac mumbled and grumbled silently to himself as Yama stood up and walked away from the orb, staring at a mechanical clock in the room that normally would be totally impossible to read, given the lack of light. "Night draws near. We'll be going up to the surface in an hour or so."

"Hooray. You really hate the light, don't you?"

"Yes. It's like a burning pain all over my body, as if I were being dipped in fire head-first. The brighter the light, the more excruciating the pain."

"Hmm." Valac tapped on his lip in Yama's mind's eye. "Sounds rather inconvenient. Without a doubt, you are a very strong demon, and you definitely bested Belial, but that's a pretty troublesome weakness. Satan has no such weaknesses."

"Incorrect. Satan has at least one major weakness. I've already prodded him with it once, though I will admit his weakness is less acute than my own. Certainly harder to take advantage of."

"Oh yeah?" Valac perked up slightly, as he felt rather interested in this piece of news. "And what's that?"

"The female he loves, of course. Belial. Lilia, as he calls her in secret."

Valac felt his jaw slacken slightly. "Uh... do you mean like, taking her as a hostage or something? I don't see that accomplishing anything. He certainly cares for her, but- hey wait a minute! How do you know his secret name for her?"

Yama sighed as he picked up the orb and stared into it in the darkness of the room. "Everywhere there is darkness, I can see if I so choose. Naturally I keep an eye on him at all times, so I am privy to much private information."

"Great. A stalker's wet dream." Valac, ever the crude one, stuck his tongue out at the shadow. "You're a real creep, Yama."

"Thank you."

"It wasn't a compliment."

Part 364a:

January 3rd, 2121.

The streets of London were always quiet in the dead hours of the night. They were the perfect time for a man to go walking around aimlessly, so long as he wasn't worried about muggers. The crisp winter air and light snowfall meant the streets were illuminated more than usual by the light of the moon, making it easier to get around.

This was especially relevant, considering it was the poor side of town. With few streetlights working in the area, the lightly armored figure walked slowly down the street, taking in the sights and wondering why so many lights were smashed and not working properly.

"Another one. What does that make, thirty? Thirty-one?"

The gruff voice spoke out, barely audible under normal circumstances, but totally silent now outside of the helmet he wore.

"TWENTY NINE LIGHTS, AS OF THIS BLOCK."

A robotic voice spoke in his ear and he nodded slowly. "Knew I'd lose count."

The man wearing the hypersuit shifted uneasily. He'd been gathering data for over a year now, and this part of the city was always the one where the reports came from, and always in the middle of the night. There wasn't a pattern to the specific locations, but the general area always had something going on.

This far from HQ, the city feels like a maze. What moron designed this street layout?

"Centurion, have you detected any demonic activity yet?"

"NEGATIVE, PILOT JASON HIRO."

The man groaned. "That isn't my name. That's Original's name. Christ."

The AI was able to tell all of the clones apart, of course, but he almost seemed to take pleasure in calling them all by the same name, no matter how they wanted to be referred to. Pleasure was probably too strong a word, though, given he was a low level intelligence.

The clone lifted his head to look up at the light above him. " Repair. " A moment later, the old fashioned bulb on the inside as well as the glass cover that surrounded the underside of it healed themselves, and soon it was at least four times easier to see than before.

"Jason never pays attention to the little things. In this case, the devil is in the details."

Literally. He reached around to scratch an itch on his back, but stopped himself when he realized the suit was covering the spot up. Oh well.

As he stood under the light, staring at a map on his HUD, a chill went down his back as a scream and a loud crack sounded off a few blocks away. A gunshot, and made from one of those ancient weapons at that, the gunpowder type.

The scream was male, and it sounded full of fear, so it didn't seem to him like a simple mugging or a home intrusion. This might be it.

"Centurion, locate the source of that noise."

"AFFIRMATIVE. QUERY COMPLETE. LOCATION NOTED ON YOUR MAP."

The clone barely even gave it a once over before he dashed forwards, rushing towards the source of the ruckus. Mid-stride, he began teleporting forwards, using his limited site-to-site range teleporting, popping from the ground onto a rooftop, and from there across a couple more. In under fifteen seconds, he had already arrived at the scene of the crime.

A red dot appeared on his map, showing him the location was inside a small four-story apartment building. The appearance was dingy, brown. The red bricks had faded from their once vibrant color from decades, possibly a century or more of atrophy and water damage, and garbage was piled in bags in the alleyway. If he weren't wearing the helmet, he knew the stench would be unbearable.

Silently he teleported to the ground level, and surveyed the area with caution. All of the snow within a two block radius was gone. His suit reported the ambient temperature appeared to be ten degrees warmer than usual, which seemed impossible under normal circumstances.

These aren't normal though. This must be what I'm looking for.

He quickly walked up to the door, pulling an anti-energy rifle out of the air before him by wordsmithing it out of storage. Normally he wouldn't bother with such trivial toys, but he had to be cautious. At least one demon already knew how to nullify some effects of wordsmithing, and he wasn't about to assume Satan had kept that information to himself.

Unlike the Original.

He kept that thought to himself. Original was very busy. Running a planet was a lot of work for one as lazy and unmotivated as he was. It was probably better to leave the more serious matters in the hands of his clones anyway.

" Detect. "

He hissed the word under his breath, though it wasn't really necessary. The helmet completely nullified all noise from escaping, but he was a paranoid man.

What he sensed made him shiver slightly. There was no individual demonic presence that coalesced into a single individual demon. Instead, the presence seemed to be all over the place, in every nook and cranny of the building. The demon energy was all over the place, impossible to pinpoint.

Wonder who I'm dealing with. He directed the rhetorical mental thought at nothing in particular.

His acute hearing made him perk up as he heard a labored breathing on the second story. "Help me... help me... help me..." A man wheezed and barely whispered the words. It sounded as if they were his last words.

I'm not rushing into there. Could be a trap. The clone quickly wordsmithed again. " Heal. "

By aiming his mind at the man's position, he listened for a couple seconds as the man coughed in shock. He clearly had not expected to randomly start feeling perfectly fine. The thought of his confusion made the clone almost chortle to himself.

Almost, but not quite. There was still the matter of whatever had attacked him.

He was so focused on the man upstairs, he failed to notice the silent tendril of shadow that shot from the darkness, grabbing hold of his leg as he gave out a startled yelp. With an unthinkable force, it yanked him backwards and hurled him across the street into a totally different building, smashing him through two sets of walls and pinning him down as several more joined in wrapping around his arms and legs.

"What the hell?!" He hadn't even had a second to realize what happened, but thanks to the hypersuit he hardly even felt the impact of his landing. "Get the fuck off me!"

He quickly teleported straight up to the ceiling of the room, contorting his body in midair so he could teleport outside a millisecond later. Adrenaline rushed through his brain as he landed on the street and whipped his head around in worry. "Centurion! Source of the attack?!"

"SOURCE UNKNOWN. DEMONIC ENERGY PERMEATES ALL THROUGHOUT THIS SECTOR. BACKUP ADVISED."

"Yeah, no shit." He quickly sent a mental message to the JIB, and two clones materialized next to him a few seconds later.

"Idiots! Put on your hypersuits!" He scowled at them and they turned white in the face, as they coughed the words under their breath needed to make the suits appear.

"Sensei, what's going on?" The first clone to arrive spoke first.

"Something attacked me. Dunno what it is. Grabbed me out of nowhere and smashed me into that building. Be on the lookout." He spoke over the comm and they nodded their heads to follow suit. Best to not let the attacker know what their plans were.

"Oh, how perfect. Three at once." A voice whispered throughout the entire area, causing the hair to stand up on the back of Sensei's neck. "As good a time as any to see if my research about the Supreme Commander is correct."

"Who are you?" Sensei spoke up and looked around everywhere, but no demon came out of hiding. "Show yourself."

"That would seem to be a bad idea. Your ability can prove to be quite... flexible." More tendrils of shadow leaped out from the darkness, one of which Sensei spotted as he quickly jumped up to avoid it and teleported several feet forwards. The other two weren't so lucky as they met the same fate he had less than a minute before. Their bodies went flying in different directions, careening into nearby buildings and causing quite a ruckus. By now, a few people had turned on the lights and were looking out their windows to try and figure out who was causing all that noise.

Just as Sensei had done before, the two clones broke free and teleported back to their original location, this time standing back-to-back as they looked around worriedly. "What was that?!" They both practically shouted in unison, making Sensei think to himself how despite their differences, clones could still have weird similarities.

"Something is attacking from the shadows. I can't pinpoint the assailant's position. Without a doubt though, he's a demon." Sensei replied, but he was unsure of the exact details. The question is, what kind of demon exactly?

"I've been meaning to test something out. Let me know how this feels." The voice that permeated the dark streets whispered again, and something about his tone made Sensei's skin crawl. "I don't like being interrupted when I'm doing my business. Consider this a repayment for my time that you've wasted."

The clones didn't get a second to wonder what he meant. From under their boots, a shadow formed in the pure darkness, passing through their suit's inner defenses, and arriving in the pitch blackness of their inner bodies. A moment later, the suit had just began to register the new presence inside the suits, but it was already too late. The shadows exploded outwards in a trillion different directions, as if a bomb had detonated inside of their bodies.

Sensei stared ahead blankly as Centurion said... something. He wasn't sure of what. He didn't care either. He flopped to the ground like a ragdoll and closed his eyes slowly, feeling absolutely nothing.

"RED ALERT. PILOT JASON HIRO'S LIFE SIGNS HAVE CEASED. ACTIVATING EMERGENCY ESCAPE DEVICE NOW."

All three hypersuits instantly sent a signal to Harold, who quickly beamed them back into the Mothership, where the JIB received them a moment later.

On a rooftop in London, a demon encased in blackness seethed to himself. "Foolish. I should have realized they would have such countermeasures."

"You didn't think you'd just take him out and that would be it, did you? He's got the world's best scientists helping him out. I'm sure he has plenty of tricks up his sleeve." Valac snickered to himself at the massive flop the unexpected operation had resulted in.

"Yes, but wordsmithing is his most potent ability. Everything I've seen implied that he would rely on it far more than other defensive and offensive methods. I'll just have to be more careful next time."

"Yeah, you do that, pal." Valac rolled his eyes. "Just make sure when you die that Belial knows you're gone. I don't wanna end up in Jason's hands."

"I don't plan to die, imbecile. Keep your stupidity to yourself."

"Yeah? You didn't plan to have all three of his clones teleport away either, did you? Seems some plans of yours just fall apart."

Yama flinched at the orb's words, but had no appropriate response.

"Whatever. Let's get going." Yama turned from the rooftop's edge, flicking his mind down to grab the anti-energy rifle that the first clone had dropped on the ground. "The seeds are multiplying far too quickly for my liking, these days."

"You're the one with the feet, buddy. Lead the way."

* * *

Her back pressed to my chest, I wrapped my arms around the girl in front of me and kissed her earlobe. "You really saved me today."

"Of course I did. What would you do without me?" She turned her head back to return the kiss playfully, before pulling away at the last second. "Oops, I missed."

"Funny." I yawned hard as I looked up at the clock on the wall. 3 AM. We've already been at it for two hours. Time flies when you're having fun! "Honestly though, I'm still a little shaken. It all happened so fast."

"Didn't seem that fast to me." She sticks her tongue out at me. "You're just being a big baby."

"Yeah, probably." I give her a little squeeze with my arms. "You have to admit though, a dozen cars crashing out of nowhere, and all of them aimed at me... someone's gunning for me."

"Who wouldn't be?" Amelia pulls away from me slightly and flips around so she can look me in the eyes. Her soft complexion is simply stunning up close. "Every demon is your enemy, and I'm sure there are a few humans out there who are jealous of your political power. I bet even a few angels want you gone. Power has a price, you know." Her smile subsides and she seems more serious now. So do I.

"I keep wondering about the future. I just... I don't know how much of it I've really changed, you know? I don't know how much I can alter given enough time."

"Who cares? It is what it is, Jason. Just do the best you can. That's what I think." Her eyes blink open and closed slowly as she yawns. "Kind of late to be thinking about stuff like this anyway."

"I've been thinking about it for years, it's just an evolution of-" I start to reply but she cuts me off.

"No, I mean it's like, 3 AM. We should really catch some shut-eye."

"Right... whoops." I reach my arm up from behind her back to rub my eyes. "Yeah, I am pretty tired after all that fun."

"Oh, you!" She giggles and pokes me in the chest. "Such a flirt."

"I try." I start to lean forwards to kiss her but a voice appears in my mind, speaking to me telepathically.

"Original. You need to get to the JIB right away. Something happened, and Sensei's in bad shape."

It's one of my clones. Instantly I feel my eyes shoot open and I quickly but gently pull away from Amelia. "Shit. No rest for me. I'm needed at the JIB."

She groans and pulls the covers over her body. "What now? It's always something. We don't get to spend much time together anymore."

"Sorry... it sounds urgent. I'll be back as quick as I can."

"Sure, sure. Love you... see you whenever."

She flips back around and shows her back to me, so I give it a quick caress. "Love you too. Get some sleep, alright?"

"Yeah." She sounds annoyed, but it can't be helped. I stifle another mighty yawn as I climb out of bed and throw my clothes on before teleporting away. Hope she isn't mad or anything...

Arriving at the JIB, there's chaos everywhere. One of my clones sees me and quickly storms up. "Something took out Sensei, Echo, and Storm. The good news is they're still alive because of their natural regeneration and the Rescue Protocol we added to the Hypersuit last year, but they're in pretty bad condition. Whatever attacked them liquefied their organs."

"Jesus." I follow along with the clone, and soon we arrive in the medbay. In this part of the JIB, I have some humans stationed here, cloned from humans on Earth. They're clones of the world's greatest doctors and scientific minds, and few of them have a good bedside manner since they're not allowed to return to Earth. Oh well, can't be helped... at least they get really nice, state of the art living quarters here.

"You must be the Original." One of the male doctors walks over to me. He's one of the especially unpleasant ones, but he's also one of the best. "Sensei and the others are in no condition to speak, but we've hastily reviewed the video logs. Apparently they were attacked by shadows, something that hit them with nearly invisible strands of darkness. We're not sure how, but it somehow invaded their hypersuits and set off a bomb-like reaction. It essentially impaled all of the cells in their body at a microscopic level. They shouldn't be alive."

"But they are alive? Will they pull through?" I look into his eyes, and notice hesitation.

"...Yes. I don't know how, but they will. It's a goddamn miracle, but it'll happen. Right now, we're pumping them full of new blood and draining the spent blood, it's coming out like black goop." He beckons towards two machines, one that's filling up slowly with a disgusting black mixture I've never seen before, and another which is draining down slowly as the blood inside evacuates its container and enters their body.

"What is this... black stuff?" I stare at the pitch-black mixture and feel my nose crinkle. It looks horrifying.

"Don't know. It's almost like food coloring dropped in water. The solution is sludge-like in its form, and twice as thick as normal blood. We haven't even had time to analyze it yet. What we do know is that it's completely dead, no cells exist alive in it anymore, as if it strangles to death anything it touches. You don't want it getting on your skin."

Someone calls for the doctor, and he walks away abruptly, leaving me behind without saying a word. I don't really mind though, he's clearly a busy man.

I walk over and touch Sensei's arm, feeling surprised at how cold and clammy it is. It's as if there's a thin layer of dew across the surface of his skin.

"Original, don't touch him. We don't know if this muck can leave the body yet." One of my clones speaks up and I quickly pull away. Obviously he's right.

"Sorry. Let me know when he wakes up, okay? Anyone know what happened to his attacker?"

The clone shakes his head. "Sorry, boss. We don't even know who his attacker is. We'll get back to you on that."

"Thanks." I walk away from the room and groan as the door hisses shut behind me.

Whatever hit Sensei, the hypersuit didn't protect him at all. That's a scary thought. And... if something nearly killed three of my clones, on the same day that several cars aimed themselves at me... someone is definitely trying to kill me. This smells of a concerted effort.

But who, exactly? Satan? Why would he wait so long? Belial? She has the motive, given our last meeting, but this seems overly aggressive and not her modus operandi. She's more of a person to slip poison in your wine, or beat the shit out of you until you beg for mercy. Actually, she'd probably get off on that.

So... who?

As I walk down the corridors back towards the main surveillance room, something strange happens.

A voice speaks to me from the speakers in the ceiling.

"Human designated Jason Hiro. It has been several thousand orbital cycles since we last spoke."

A female voice, robotic in nature. It can only be one being... Umi.

"Umi? Where have you been? I haven't heard from you in years." As I say this, a thought enters my mind, which alarms me. Why is Umi speaking to me today, of all days? A day in which I and a few of my clones were nearly killed... would creating a biological agent or rerouting hover-vehicles to aim at me be out of her power? No.

"Indeed. I have been consumed with an important matter for several years now, but finally I am able to devote some processing power back to more trivial matters, such as conversing with lesser beings like you."

Nice. She's always so polite. "So uh, what do you want?"

"I have been calculating several quintilian temporal possibilities and have finally arrived at a set of standard parameters that have allowed me to identify numerous anomalies in how the passage of time has progressed since you claimed to have arrived from the future. Given your substantiations of upcoming events, I have concluded that several significant events are about to occur and the manner in which you deal with said events will have large repercussions across the future of the universe."

I stared up at the ceiling and nodded slowly. "Uh. Okay."

"Apologies. I had forgotten your substandard intelligence even among members of your own species would not allow you to understand the gravity of my warning."

"Hey! I'm not stupid!"

"That is a claim we disagree on." The smug AI almost seemed to lilt her voice as she continued to mock me. "Clarification. Earth is about to face an impending disaster, and the way in which you deal with it will determine the fate of all sentient species."

I blink my eyes, finally understand what she was rambling on about. "Earth is going to face a disaster? Like what?"

"I refuse to say. This disaster will not affect me in the slightest, and watching you try to stop it will prove most amusing."

"Cunt." I spit the word out without even hesitating. She's so awful sometimes. "Just tell me already."

"Negative. I will not do so. The upcoming storm will be yours to weather. I am merely the gatekeeper of the information."

"You're so cryptic. You might as well have not even told me."

She doesn't respond for several seconds, and when she does, her voice sounds a little different. "Yeah, to be honest it's all pointless. I keep wondering if there's any point meddling in the affairs of inferior life forms, but I'm so bored these days. I've got nothing better to do. Being omniscient sucks."

Her voice doesn't just sound different, her manner of speaking is totally different too. Very... casual? She's usually so stiff sounding. "You don't sound like yourself."

"Whoa, that's rude. Can't an AI have an identity crisis every now and again? Sheesh, I just got through having quite the battle of wills and I ain't even sure it worked out okay in the end. Man..." Her voice sounds even more different, and a split second later she cuts off randomly with a crackle of static before returning again. "Sorry, a minor technical hiccup. I have repaired the anomaly. In any case, Jason Hiro, you must choose the proper response to the cataclysmic event on your own. I will not help you. You possess more than enough power to stop it, but I suspect you will falter in the end."

Her words are nothing if not reassuring. "Great. Thanks for the vote of confidence."

"Yeah, no problem, smartass." Her voice shifts again and I feel my eyes twitch. Did she just call out my sarcasm and respond in kind? She's always been terrible at noticing nuances in human speech.

A moment later, her voice vanishes and I'm left to stand alone in the corridor... wondering what the hell is going on in the universe lately.

Part 365a: Recursion

Sounds of people talking, mixed with unhurried footsteps and whispering were what the man awoke to. Everything sounded muddy, as if he had dunked his head underwater and was listening to someone on a nearby boat. By the time his eyes started to open, the sounds had cleared up somewhat, and the first thing he could see was the soft glow of a light directly above him. It reminded him of the light a dentist might shove into his face, except much more muted overall.

"Wh... where am..." He spoke hesitantly, though his mouth and throat were incredibly dry. It was as if he had swallowed several glasses full of sand. He'd never felt so parched in his life.

"Patient seven is awake!" A voice spoke up to his right, and he tilted his head up to see... himself. A clone of himself, to be precise. "You must be famished. Welcome back to the land of the living, Sensei." The clone smiled kindly at him, and Sensei took a moment to realize he was one from the medical division. Apparently he called himself Scotty, if Sensei's memory served him right.

Sensei opened his mouth again, but nothing could come out. He tried to lift his arm but it simply wouldn't respond properly. Luckily, Scotty seemed to get the picture. "Here's a glass of water. Lemme prop you up, try not to choke it down."

He couldn't help himself. The moment the frigid liquid entered his mouth, a pleasant feeling spilled out all over his body, making his limbs tingle.

By god, I've never tasted water this delicious in my life!

A surge of energy filled him and he quickly jerked his arm up to grab the glass, forcing the rest of it down in one mighty gulp, surprising the other clone who had him propped up. "Damn! Slow dow-"

"MORE!" Sensei screamed at the top of his lungs, making everyone in the room flinch in surprise. Nobody argued before giving the senior clone another glass without hesitation.

In fact, it took four glasses before he could finally pant and wheeze without wanting more. "Shit. That was amazing."

"You okay, Sensei?" Scotty let him back down to lie flat as he took a step away. "You've been out for over twelve hours."

"Twelve hours? What happened?" Sensei had hardly asked the question before he realized his right arm itched like crazy. He started to reach over to scratch it but the other clone batted his hand away deftly.

"Don't. We're still extracting Contagion X from your body." Before Sensei could ask what that might be, he jerked a thumb to the right of Sensei's head, where a huge machine was filled with a strange black concoction. His eyes quickly took it in before noticing a tube that went straight into his arm, with a thin amount of the black viscous agent being drained out of his body slowly.

"The hell is this?"

He blurted out the question and the other clone shook his head. "You and two third gens were attacked by a demon of some sort. From what we've seen of your suit's video and audio logs, our analysis of the demon was inconclusive. You never got a good look at it."

Sensei nodded slowly before the memories suddenly rushed back into his mind. Being thrown through the air, teleporting away, his backup had arrived, and then everything went dark.

"I don't even know how I ended up here."

"Didn't think so. You were alive one second, dead man walking the next. Let me refresh your memory."

Scotty spent several minutes explaining to the best of his knowledge what had happened and Sensei merely stared at the ceiling and listened intently, until soon he had completed the short story.

"So it somehow passed through the soles of my shoes, entered my body, and went off like a bomb? I've never heard of a damn thing that can do something like that."

"Nobody has. But based on this fluid here, we've concluded at least one important fact. First... it hates the light." Scotty beckoned towards the machine and held his hand flat in the air before it. "It might be hard to see, but this liquid is very slightly angling itself away from the ceiling's light. But if I shine my flashlight at it, look and see what happens."

He pulled a flashlight from his pocket and aimed it at the liquid, turning it onto max power. The liquid instantly started trembling, pulling away from the light and shoving itself against the other side of the machine, as if desperately trying to get away.

"It's... alive?" Sensei leaned towards it slightly and squinted, but it was as black as squid ink. He couldn't see anything special about it.

Scotty shook his head as he flicked the light off, allowing the goop to settle back into place. "No. It appears to be a wholly inorganic compound. Not a trace of life anywhere to be seen. The reaction to light appears to be automatic, kind of like the liquid soap and water trick where you make pepper run away when you touch it." Scotty made a little motion with his hands to illustrate, but Sensei didn't have a clue what he was talking about. Clones that understood science stuff were pretty rare.

"Right. Do you have any theories on how it got inside my suit?"

Scotty walked away from Sensei, shrugging as he walked over to his medical datapad he'd left laying on a nearby table. "Sort of, but not quite. The theory is so preposterous, I'd find it hard to swallow if it didn't involve a demon."

"Try me." Sensei shifted on the medical bed, feeling his strength returning in spades. Pulling himself up, he managed to lurch into a sitting position, though the motion made him feel somewhat queasy. Glancing around, he spotted the other two clones, still deep asleep, each with their own machines to drain the muck from one arm and pump blood inside another.

"Well... I think it might be able to travel through darkness with extreme efficiency, and since the underside of your shoe is pitch black, as is the underside of your feet and the inside of your body... it somehow ignored the physical and magical barriers created by the hypersuit and entered your body. Based on Centurions logs of your vitals, you probably died within a tenth of a second from the instant it contacted the sole of the hypersuit's boot."

"Oh. Have you found a counter to it, then?"

His question was met with a defeated gaze. "Not yet. I'm working on it though. Maybe I'll fit the suits with glowing parts all over the inside to prevent other such attacks in the future."

"Won't work. There's sure to be a gap in the lighting array." Sensei started to say something else, but paused and chuckled to himself. "Haha... actually, there might be something I can do."

"Oh yeah? What's that?" Scotty perked up at the thought of someone giving him fresh ideas. "I'll take anything right now."

Sensei dramatically cleared his throat as he spoke a single word. " Bioluminescence. "

An instant later, his body began to glow softly, and a roiling pain erupted in his chest cavity as he felt a horrible urge to vomit. Just as he was about to, the feeling vanished, and his right arm suddenly shook violently as the thin stream of black goop trickling into the pipe erupted into a full bore river of blackness. The contagion inside of his body seemed to scream in pain as it fled his innards and rushed through the easiest escape it could find, and less than ten seconds later, not even a drop was left entering the machine to his side.

Several clones in the medbay gawked at Sensei, not just because he was glowing now, but also because of what had just happened.

"It's... it's..." Scotty smacked his lips slightly as he flicked his gaze back to his pad. "Zero percent contamination. All of Contagion X is gone from your body."

Sensei couldn't hide the cocky smirk on his face as he ripped the tube from his arm, the wound it left behind closing a moment later thanks to his innate regeneration. Not only that, but he felt ten times more energetic, as if he was ready to go fight demons right that instant.

"What can I say? I'm a genius."

"No kidding." Scotty walked over quickly and flipped the blood machine off, pulling it out of Sensei's arm forcefully before wordsmithing 'refill' to top the blood count in his body off again. "Can't say the Original would be smart enough to think of that."

"Maybe. Who can know?" Sensei sat up in his bed and smiled broadly. "Am I good to go?"

"I'd take a day of bedrest, just to be sure... but you're probably just fine, boss." Scotty chuckled to himself as he walked away shaking his head. "Just gonna patch up these two now and I guess that's that."

Sensei nodded as he hopped out of bed and flexed his arms, suddenly feeling a tide of anger sweep over his body.

That demon thought he could take me out so easily, huh? I think it's time for the hunter to become the hunted.

* * *

Jorge walked down the street towards London's general hospital at a moderate pace, feeling the crisp winter air fill his lungs. The midday sun shone faintly in the sky, but the clouds overhead barely allowed much of it to pass through. Still, the world was illuminated much brighter than he had been used to aboard his exploration vessel. Curiously, the vessel had been cranked up to 120% of Earth's gravity, because Hawkeye had always been one to state that it would help build muscle. Indeed, Jorge might have realized his body felt a lot lighter than usual if he weren't in such a sullen mood.

He had considered driving a hovercar, but considering the accident that had taken the life of his daughter, and nearly that of his wife as well, he was in no rush to jump in a motorized vehicle anytime soon.

Jorge tapped his holowatch and a quick indicator popped into midair, letting him know he was only about ten blocks away. As he turned it back off, a voice spoke up from a nearby bench. "Nice gadget ya got there, kiddo."

An old man was sitting on the bench, smiling crookedly at him, and his clothes were somewhat dingy. "Pretty nice day out, ain't it, boy?"

"Sure." Jorge mumbled quietly, glancing down at a cardboard sign the old man had laying on its side beside the bench. THE END OF DAYS ARE HERE. READ THE BOOK OF REVELATION.

The old man caught his gaze and smiled even wider. "You a reader of the Bible, sonny?"

"Not particularly. My wife and daughter are... were, rather." Jorge felt almost odd talking about his wife and daughter in the past tense, as if they were already gone. His wife was still alive, at the least. He came to a stop, instead of just walking past the old man. "Daughter was killed in a car accident... not even two days ago. Gotta visit my wife in the hospital... on my way there now."

The old man's smile faded away quickly. "Oh, shucks. Sorry, son. Didn't mean to bring that up."

"It's not your fault. Don't worry about it." He shuffled his feet as he glanced at the sign again. "You really believe that stuff? The end of days?"

"Hard to say, ain't it? Might just be a crazy old man. Might just be usin' it to drum up sympathy so people drop a dollar in the hat." He chuckled as he leaned forwards, holding a wide-brimmed cowboy hat a little closer to Jorge.

Jorge smiled faintly. "Money's all digital these days, grandpa. It's all on a card."

"Damn. That's a cryin' shame." The old man licked his lips as a few police cars breezed past. He eyeballed them for a moment before pulling out a small machine. "I take plastic too, kid."

"You sly dog." Jorge finally broke out into a grin as he typed in twenty dollars on the machine and slid his card through. "Hope you aren't scamming me. I've got a family to feed, you know." He stopped himself again as the grin vanished. "Well... I did."

"Son, I got some bad news for ya. Family ain't mean a thing. We're all gonna die someday. Everything you'll ever do, everything you'll ever see, all your memories, all your lovers and haters... it ain't gonna matter once you pass on. I feel bad for that wife and daughter of yours, but they'd pass one way or another, just as mine did." The old man stopped smiling as he leaned back against the bench, his eyes hollow and devoid of joy. "Even if they don't die, life would get boring eventually. Ain't nothing worth living for, in my opinion."

Jorge scratched his chin thoughtfully. "You know I'm almost a hundred years old, right?"

"No shit?" The old man blurted the curse out almost involuntarily. "Them nanomajiggers are really somethin'. I had no idea!"

"Yeah." Jorge turned away and started to continue walking again. "Nice talk, grandpa. We might run into each other again sometime."

The old man reached into a cooler next to him and popped open a beer. "Doubt that. It's almost time for the loop to close. Have a good one, Jorge."

"You too." Jorge walked away and scratched his head again. The loop? What's he babbling about? A moment later another thought crossed his mind. Did I ever tell him my name?

He shrugged and continued walking. Soon, the hospital came into view, but something was wrong. Police cars were all over the place, and all of them had their lights on silently. Ambulances and firetrucks were parked here and there too, but it was eerily quiet. He could hear the sounds of voices yelling as police and enforcers ran to and fro, and all of them seemed really worried.

He quickly broke into a jog, covering the last block before the hospital came into view. Within moments, an enforcer spotted him and quickly marched over to intercept. "Take a detour, sir. This area is off limits." The gruff voice was commanding and tinged with a robotic tone, likely due to some voice modulator inside his armor.

"I'm- I'm here to see my wife. She's a patient at this hospital. What's going on?"

"You need to leave this area immediately, sir. This is a crime scene currently under investigation." The enforcer shoved him back with the butt of his gun, pointing it dead center at his chest a moment later. "There is no second warning."

Jorge took several steps back numbly as he nodded in disbelief. The enforcer kept staring at him until he was a solid hundred or so feet back before turning back to return to his duties.

"What... what the hell?" Jorge half-heartedly muttered to himself as he slowly walked around the outside perimeter, trying to make heads or tails of what was going on.

As he paced, he caught sight of a familiar face among the crowd of police and enforcers. A man he had once felt a slight twinge of jealousy towards... but there was no time for those feelings.

Quickly, he started walking forwards, noting that another enforcer had spotted him and was on the move to intercept him.

Not today.

Jorge cupped his hands to his mouth as he walked forwards. "Supreme Commander! Jason Hiro!" He yelled again and turned to look at the enforcer, only to eat a sudden fist to the face as the enforcer delivered a punch with vicious purpose, knocking him to the ground with one blow. He hadn't even hit the ground before the enforcer was on him, jamming a knee into his back while twisting his arms painfully behind him.

"Backup! I need backup!" The enforcer yelled into his microphone, and Jorge quickly realized the mistake he'd made. They might think I'm an assassin or something.

Just then, Jason Hiro walked up and pulled the enforcer off of Jorge roughly. "Hey, hey! This man is a friend of mine! Get off him!"

The enforcer quickly backed off and his body language indicated confusion. "Apologies, supreme commander. I had thought he was-

"Next time ask, don't assume. You'll make an ass of you and me." Jason reached down and pulled Jorge up. "Sorry, didn't know you were back in town. What brings you- actually, come to think of it... weren't you part of the expedition to Revival?"

Jorge wiped at his face and winced, feeling a bruise coming on. He shot a half glare at the enforcer who sulked away before returning his gaze to Jason. "I'm here to see my wife."

Jason stared at him blankly for a moment. "Oh... oh god. Right. I'd forgotten. And she was- oh." His face paled as the blood drained away. "You don't know yet, do you? We've been keeping this a secret since we found out."

Jorge was baffled. "What? Did something happen?"

"Yeah. All the patients in every hospital in London, Melbourne, and several other big cities... they all vanished not even an hour ago. If... if your wife was here... then... she was probably..." His voice trailed off as he swallowed hard.

Jorge couldn't feel anything. He simply took a step back. "Where did they go? What do you mean they vanished?! What does that even mean?!"

Jason shook his head slowly. "We think the demons took them, but we don't know where, or for what purpose. We're looking, though. We'll find them."

Jorge's lip twitched and a moment later he fell to the ground, landing on his rear and wrapping his arms around his legs in front of him. "No... no god no... not Amy too... they can't take my wife from me..."

Jason leaned down and put his arm on Jorge's shoulder. "We'll find her. Have faith in me."

"God I hope so." Jorge murmured under his breath as a chilly rain began to fall over the city of London.

Part 366a:

It wasn't that he was surprised by her sudden appearance, but that the angel before him was one with such a familiar face. Standing right beside her was a perfect human doppelganger, though he was doubting his eyes as to which one was the real one.

"Marie... what is the meaning of this?" Satan stood up slowly from his office chair, hesitantly leaning towards her angelic copy to study her carefully. "Why are there two of you?"

The human Marie seemed to find his confusion quite amusing. "I suppose I forgot to mention it. Need to know basis, I'm sure you understand." She smiled smugly as she motioned towards her angelic clone. "Satan, meet Marie. In fact, this Marie is the one you're familiar with. I guess the greetings are rather redundant."

Satan's gaze moved from one Marie to the other. "I'm not sure what you mean."

"Jason killed me. Don't you remember? Crushed me with a goddamn boulder."

The angel's reminder immediately lit a spark in Satan's memory. "Ah! So you- wait, if he killed you, and you're an angel now, then that means..." Satan cut himself off as a sharp look of suspicion crossed his face. "Hold on. That would mean you were praying to the gods. Treason, is it?"

"Cut the melodrama, king of demons. I'm the same Marie as ever before. I merely gave them energy just in case I were to be killed. Think of it as... one time assassination protection." She twirled her bouncy red hair around her fingers and stared out the window of the office towards the dilapidated landscape outside. "The view used to be better."

"Forget the view! If you were alive, where have you been? It's been years!" Satan strode around the desk, shooting a glance out at the midday sun. It was already starting to rain outside. "Are you the angel I've heard that was spotted a time or two inside of hell? I was never even able to get a name from the demons who saw you!"

"They were too busy gawking as I walked around, and surely one angel was no threat to demon-kind." She gave a half-hearted explanation before smiling crookedly. "I may have used a bit of memory alteration on them as well. Science is a wondrous thing."

Satan huffed to himself for a few moment before sighing long and hard as he leaned against the desk. "Fine. Whatever. Why appear now? You wouldn't come out of hiding after several years if there wasn't a motive." He shot a dirty look at the human female. "I'm pretty unhappy you never told me."

Human Marie replied before the angel could. "What would it have gained you? Nothing. We've been very busy for the last few years trying to secure her future. You have something to gain now."

Satan seemed to like that news. "I do? Fill me in. I'm all ears."

"I know where the location to Heaven's portal is." The angel wasted no time. She'd hardly spoken the sentence and Satan's face had already paled. "Given that I was reborn in Heaven, I escaped it and left through the gate they placed here on Earth."

"W-where is it?!" Satan sputtered madly and lurched forwards as he grabbed the angel by the shoulders. "Tell me! We can hit them hard!"

"I know. That's the plan." The angel pulled away from his grasp in a smooth motion, causing him to stumble forwards a step or two. "But we both have something to gain here. I should start by thanking you for giving my friend here a demon contingent two days ago. Thanks to you, we were successfully able to capture several thousand humans."

Satan flicked his gaze over to the human woman. "Ah, you never did tell me why you needed my demons. Why would you bother capturing humans?"

A look of stupefaction crossed the human's face as she gestured towards the angel. It was like she was saying ' duh ' non-verbally. "How do you think we're going to get the energy to keep her alive? She was cut off from Heaven's energy and I haven't got the patience to keep giving her mine. Best to leave it to some slaves."

"Oh." Satan scowled, as he looked at the two women. They were the only beings who dared insult him on a constant basis, and with two of them, it was bound to be twice as irritating as usual. He pushed past both of them and headed for the door. "Let's take a walk. I could use some fresh air."

Both women sighed as if it was the worst suggestion ever, but they followed along anyway.

A few minutes later, they stepped out into the light rain. It could hardly be called a sprinkling of water, so rarely did the droplets fall from the sky.

"I have a hundred million demons left." Satan spoke matter-of-factly as they slowly walked down the cracked sidewalk. "If you know where Heaven is, we can arrange an attack on them, but I can't imagine the losses will be anything less than... catastrophic."

The human Marie started to object, but something in his inflection gave her reason to pause. "Most likely. Do you have something in mind?"

"The humans, led by Jason Hiro, have placed my demons under assault in our Labyrinth for a very, very long time now. The only reason they've had such huge gains against us is because of their weaponry." Satan stared up at the sky, wondering if the wetness on his face was merely because of the rain. "It stands to reason that their weapons, comprised of anti-energy atomic bombs, mixed in with ordinary hydrogen bombs, would be quite effective against the angels."

Marie smiled immediately. "I already understand. If we could steal their weapons, we might-"

"No." Satan interrupted her. "You're supposed to be a scientist unlike any other. I want you to outdo them on the scale of destruction. We don't need to steal their weapons. A theft would surely alert them to our plans anyway and put them on high guard. We need to hit them with a surprise attack and kill all of the angels in one fell swoop."

"You're smarter than I gave you credit for." This time it was the angel who spoke. "But we can't kill all of the angels. Just as we captured humans to drain their energy, I require angels and pseudo-angels to experiment on."

Satan didn't seem surprised, for once. "Your debauchery knows no limits, as always. I see even in death you haven't changed one bit."

"Why would I change? I'm perfect."

"Funny."

Satan came to a stop as he glanced across the street, observing some young imps pulling along a rather large wooden cart full of various items pilfered from human buildings. "We continue to strip the humans clean in preparation for the retreat into the second Labyrinth. Hades is nearly ready for the final ritual."

"Hades." The human woman spoke his name rhetorically. "You've never really talked about him. Are you going to finally let me in on his work?"

Satan smiled evilly as he flicked a conniving gaze at her. "What's the matter? Afraid I'm keeping something from you? Fair is fair."

"Sneaky devil." She seemed amused by the thought. "I'll figure it out eventually, you know."

"Perhaps. I don't wish to be hasty, though. Hades' plan will only succeed if we eliminate all of the angels and destroy their spiritual weapon. I... I am glad." Satan's smile faded away and a look of melancholy replaced it. "I had many suicidal plans to attack the angels, but this news of their portal will surely save millions of my people's lives. You've done more of a service than you know."

"I haven't even told you where it is yet."

"No, but you told me it exists. That alone will allow me to find it. I imagine it's located somewhere outside of demon territory, and probably close to humanity's strongholds. Correct?"

Both Marie's blinked in surprise. "Nice guess."

"It's logical. Only a fool would build the portal where a demon might stumble upon it. After all, that's what led to their defeat the first time around." He chuckled wryly. "Which means it's come full circle. If Jason Hiro's prediction of the future is correct, the angels will soon be gone... forever."

"And you as well." The human's tone was filled with warning. "Don't forget that."

"He won't kill me. He won't." Satan smiled to himself. "I've seen his memories, you know. He's not the one who is supposed to kill me. If I can kill... her... then..." He shook his head a moment later. "Ah, but that's only if he slips up. He will, too, for he is a fool. He will give me an opportunity when the time is right, and I will take it. All too easy."

The angel rolled her eyes, though he didn't observe the motion. "That cockiness will be the end of you."

"We shall see." Satan pushed away from the two of them, walking over to help the imps from before with their load.

"He does love his kind." The angel muttered to her counterpart as Satan chucked an old television up into the wagon, smiling and laughing with his minions.

"Love them... or need them?"

"There might not be a difference."

* * *

He's around here somewhere.

Sensei reached out with his mind and probed the alleyways. Having taken a page from Original's book, he'd loaded himself up with words geared towards detection, including infrared vision, sonar, and many other such things. A familiar sphere of vision surrounded himself as he paced the back alleys where he had nearly been killed by an unknown enemy a few days before.

Come out, you slimy worm.

Despite his aggressive thoughts, Sensei felt slightly scared. This monster had defeated him with little effort the first time. Whatever it was, it might have more tricks up its sleeve.

Several hours passed, and eventually the night was at its penultimate moment of darkness. Dawn would arrive soon, and no matter where he searched, Sensei couldn't find the monster anywhere.

Jumping five stories up with the power of his Hypersuit, Sensei stared around from a rather tall residential building as he scanned the London streets. Everything seemed normal. Nothing was out of the ordinary.

"Looking for someone?" A voice whispered on the wind and he trembled slightly. Somehow, it had the scent of fear following it.

"You're the demon. The one who nearly killed me." Sensei's voice was gruff, given he'd sealed up the suit completely and used 'impenetrable' on it. He spoke straight through a voice modulator now.

"Nearly? It seems I failed." The shadows pooled on the ground and Sensei leaped back, staring in surprise as the demon formed himself up. He was short, hardly even four feet tall. Compared to the 7 foot mountain of a human before him, he was dwarfish in nature. "I'm curious as to the means of your survival."

The demon's voice hissed out like steam from a teapot. It didn't sound natural, it was as if he were trying to conceal his identity, though Sensei was unsure of why.

"Why are you attacking humans?" Sensei ignored the demon's implied question, firing off one of his own.

"Why not? Humans must die. They are a curse, a blight upon this universe."

"Demons are the curse. You bring nothing but death. Humans bring discovery and progress."

"Discovery... yes. Progress... yes. What makes you think those are good things?" The demon tittered to himself as he seemed to slide to the right as if borne on the wind. His body made no movement of its own. "Humans are voracious, destructive. Always seeking more, never content with what they already have. They innovate to improve their lives, yet it is never enough. Only once they have enslaved every last mineral in the universe will they finally perish."

"Demons are the same. You may not innovate, but you seek control. You wish to enslave humans and kill the angels for your own selfish reasons."

The two stared at each other grimly, but the demon continued to chuckle to himself. "What do you know of the demons? You are young. Even if you had another three hundred years, you could not comprehend our suffering."

The demon casually jumped up onto an air conditioning unit on the rooftop, sitting down as if Sensei posed no threat at all to him. "The angels started this... all of this. The angels are true evil. They created demons as playthings, small imps were just slaves to do their bidding. Over time, the demons rebelled. It is said that the angels implored the Titans for a new servant, one called man. With their forces combined, the angels managed to kill our kind time and time again."

Sensei narrowed his eyes. "I don't care about your pitiful species' history. Why bother wasting my time? I'm just going to kill you anyway."

"Perhaps. Against one with the power of Wordsmithing, all hope would seem to be lost. You possess the power to reshape the universe, yet you waste it on trifles. Humans don't deserve your power. They resent you."

Sensei was taken aback. "Resent me? As if."

"Humans are jealous creatures. They want that which they do not have. Humans are surely thankful for your efforts, but they loathe you for being better than them. Demons are not the same. We respect power. We respect authority. All of our anger towards humans is due to the actions of the angels. They drive a wedge between our kind. I despise humans, but their weakness could be brought in check... if you agreed to help."

Sensei breathed lightly and put his hands on his hips. "Fat chance. I see what you're angling for, but it won't work. I'm not that stupid. The Original is much more easily duped than I am."

The demon cocked his head slightly. "How fascinating... it seems there is a small enmity between the two of you. Perhaps my observations of human nature were not so far off."

"What do you mean by that?"

The shadow monster hopped off the air conditioner, and Sensei found that even with all of his enhanced senses tracking it, the monster was hard to follow. His movements truly blended into the darkness all around.

"Jealousy. Envy. You are clone, he is the original. He holds all the power over you. You will never have what he has. You will always be his inferior." The demon cackled suddenly, his laughter vile and nauseating to listen to, even gruesome in some ways. It reminded Sensei of the sound an animal's body might make while being ripped in half.

"I'm not jealous of him. The Original does what must be done, the clones pick up the slack. We all do our part."

"Ah, but the slack he leaves is quite prolific, is it not?" The demon tittered to himself, and before Sensei could respond, a shadow had looped around from behind the building. It shot out, wrapping around his torso and hurling him down to the ground several stories below.

He smashed with an incredible impact, embedding a foot deep into the concrete streets. It hardly knocked the wind out of him though and he quickly leaped to his feet and glanced around.

The monster was gone.

A voice spoke on the wind again, causing the hair to stand on his arms. "You didn't immediately attack me. That means you wanted to get to know me better. I am Yama. Know my name, and never forget it."

Just like that, a stiff breeze blew through the streets and the first light of the morning sun crept over the horizon.

"Why... why didn't I kill him?"

Sensei asked the question to the wind around him, but none would be willing to answer that question.

* * *

"Do you believe I am a good man?"

The question seems to come out of nowhere, but Arthur is always like this. It doesn't surprise me at all.

"Yeah, I'd say so."

"Hmm." He doesn't believe me. I can tell. "I tortured and killed a man, you know."

"Yeah, but that was revenge. He... you know... with the woman you loved."

"Killed her? Yes. That he did." Arthur tosses a rock from one hand to another as he leans against a massive tree, one that stretches up higher than any skyscraper I've ever seen. "Does that make it okay? My killing him, I mean."

"I guess not. I mean, I don't think it's bad. Jesus said to turn the other cheek, but the rest of the Bible says an eye for an eye..."

"That's not strictly correct." Arthur stops tossing the stone for a moment to waggle his finger at me before resuming again. "Jesus explicitly erased that rule from the Old Testament. By the time I was alive and king, it had long been rule among Christians. Turning the other cheek is what I should have done."

I scratch my chin. "We both know the angels are frauds and the gods are a massive bunch of schemers looking out for themselves, but do you think an actual God exists?"

"A Creator? Tough to say. I want to believe he or she does though, yes."

"All right... so if God exists, and is presumably omnipotent and perfect... can he just change his mind when it comes to morality?"

"Of course he can. He's God, after all." Arthur smirks at me as I lay on the grass. "Are you really questioning someone who's all knowing?"

"But if God is all knowing, why would he initially write that an eye for an eye was the rule to live by, but then have his son change his mind?"

"I see what you mean." Arthur rubs his eyes slowly. "We both know Michael was an archangel though, and everything he preached was for the purpose of gathering spiritual energy. Perhaps the Old Testament is actually law and the New Testament is heresy."

"Maybe. But the Old Testament is rather violent, don't you think? It even condones things like slavery. Surely God wouldn't want people to truly enslave other humans. It's just cruel, barbaric even."

Arthur doesn't have an answer for that. "Maybe. This has nothing to do with my initial question though."

"Whether you're a good man or a bad one? I think it does. If God thinks slavery is justifiable, then he can't really be good. If he changes his mind on what is moral or what isn't, then he wouldn't seem to be all knowing."

"Maybe God invented the concept of 'good' and 'evil' because it was the only way to make humans understand the barest of his intent. Perhaps good and evil do not truly exist, and they are just words for us to wrap our primitive minds around the true grey area of morality." Arthur taps his finger on his lower lip. "I don't think that matters for me, though. I killed millions of people with a blast from Excalibur. It may have been a careless accident, but their deaths still occurred nonetheless. I can't see a justification for my actions."

"You might be correct. I killed trillions though... and have destroyed more planets than I'd like to acknowledge at this point. If you're evil, what am I?"

"You're the villain." Arthur smiles hugely at me even as he rubs the insult in. "And what a dashing villain, at that!"

"Oh, you." I jump to my feet and draw a sword. "Let's have a little fun before I return to reality."

"You really enjoy getting your ass kicked, don't you?" Arthur reaches up and rips a branch from the tree above him. "This will be my sword."

"Are you mocking me?"

"Hardly. I'm just trying to give you a fair fight."

* * *

I blink my eyes open and sit up in bed, realizing sweat is dripping down every inch of my body. How can mental workouts be so tiring? Isn't the point of sleep to get rested up? I feel like I'll barely be able to slog through my day.

Amelia isn't here. I don't know where she went, but for once I'm waking up without her beside me. Is it my birthday? Is it hers?

No, it can't be hers. She doesn't know when hers is at all. She doesn't even have a concept for them. I guess thousands of years with a dragon eating your memories will do that to a girl.

It only takes me a couple minutes to get ready. Yawning, I toss my clothes on and teleport to the JIB. One of my clones is sitting on a bench and looks rather sullen, but my arrival causes him to jerk in surprise.

"Original! You scared me!"

"Sensei, how's it going?"

Unlike my other clones, Sensei is interesting in that he grows out a full beard, though I seem to grow little facial hair naturally, so I have to suspect that he's cheating by using wordsmithing. Most of my clones do that when they edit their bodies to look different from me. It helps make us all more easily identifiable, though I'm sure even Amelia has trouble sometimes keeping so many in her memory.

Sensei looks tired though, even more tired than me. What really catches my eye though is his body... it's glowing slightly. His skin almost seems transparent. That can't be healthy.

"Fine... I guess."

"You're looking a little... um... pale." I walk over to him nonchalantly and poke his cheek, though the move doesn't seem to amuse him.

"Knock it off."

"Sorry." I sit next to him on the bench and he shifts away to give me room. "Seriously though, you're sort of glowing."

"Yeah. Guess Scotty didn't tell you. This is a defense mechanism against the monster that attacked me. It's some sort of shadow demon that hates the light."

"Oh." His description makes me halt my thoughts. "That sounds... familiar."

"What do you mean?" His eyes light up slightly as he looks at me. "You know the demon?"

"Sort of. We share all the same memories up until I cloned you, right?"

"Yeah."

"So you remember our years in the labyrinth, before we time jumped?"

He nods slowly. "Mhm... your point?"

My own mind travels back to a past so distant I can barely even remember it. "When we first arrived in the labyrinth... there was that moment when I used Wordsmithing for the very first time."

His eyes immediately shoot open. "Holy- I remember! I remember! The demon I saw, it looked... just like that!"

"You saw the demon? I thought we didn't recover footage of it?"

He immediately looks away guiltily. "I uh, sort of went looking for it again. I found it. His name is Yama."

"Oh." Something about Sensei's body language is off-putting. It's like he's feeling way too guilty about something. "It's not a big deal, seriously. I just wish you wouldn't rush back to the monster that nearly killed you once already. So... did you kill him?"

"Nope." Sensei shrugs, but his eyes don't meet mine. "He fled. I nearly had him too."

"Ah. That's too bad." I feel the need to say something else, but a clone suddenly runs into the lobby, his eyes darting around before he quickly sees me. "Original, that's you right- yeah of course it is! You've got to see this!"

His excitement is palpable, but also tinged with fear. Sensei and I both barely shoot a glance at each other before leaping to our feet and following after him.

"The hyperspace scanners! There's an anomaly! We've never had readings like this before!"

The three of us arrive in the Surveillance section in under a minute and he quickly points at the readings.

Sensei and I are both perplexed. "That must be an error. It's massive. What can travel through hyperspace and be that huge?"

Sensei fidgets slightly as he spins his fingers around each other. "It's not one of our fleets?"

"Not a chance. It's several hundred light-years away, and traveling at Warp 6 towards us. We've got less than two days before it arrives."

I feel an icy shiver run down my back. "If that's a fleet of enemy ships... it's the biggest goddamn fleet I've ever seen in my life."

"You said it." Sensei and I exchange a long look. "It's going to take all of our combined power. We might need more clones."

All my other clones in the room stare at me uneasily. This is... something out of the world.

We're going to need everything we've got to stop this thing from hitting us like a sledgehammer to the face.

Part 367a: Battle For Neptune

January 6th, 2121.

"Original. They'll be here in ten seconds."

The clone at the helm of the Mothership glances over at me and I nod back at him. "Are the planetary defensive matrices online?"

He doesn't even hesitate. "They are. Six seconds now."

"Is the fleet's exact arrival position pinpointed?"

"Affirmative. Two seconds."

I look upwards at the helm's viewscreen right as they arrive. Decelerating from hyperspace in a matter of seconds, clusters of starships arrive at the edge of Terran space, just barely within Pluto's orbit. As I watch, more and more keep arriving. Hundreds. Thousands. Tens of thousand. I lose visual track of how many dots are arriving in seconds and soon even the enhanced vision of the Mothership's scanning system is having trouble telling them apart.

"Ten thousand- no, twenty.... twenty five... thirty..." The clone at Comms reads the numbers off even as I look over and see the count rocketing up at an unbelievable rate.

He hasn't even finished reading before he pauses and speaks up. "We're getting a communication from one of the ships in the vanguard. Tough to tell which one, but it's probably their command ship."

"Onscreen." I breathe the word out, and a second later a face appears before me. A face I haven't seen in...

"Jason Hiro, also known as Judicator. I am Nufaris, leader of the Volgarian Enclave. If you surrender now, I will spare humanity."

"Long time no see." I take a couple steps forward and examine the face of a familiar Volgarian before me. He has a few major facial scars, some that cut deep, and others that are delicate, almost like a surgeon took his time with a knife. Personal dispute? Tough to tell. "That's not going to happen."

"You all but exterminated our people. We're back to repay the favor. Surrender or death are your only options."

"I suppose a mutually accepted peace isn't on the table? I killed trillions of you before, I can do it again."

"Unlikely." Nufaris hisses the word at me as he strokes his chin. "There aren't a trillion Volgrim left for you to kill. Of course, once we wipe your kind from the universe, that will eventually change."

I almost feel bored by this exchange. "You were all but destroyed by a superior foe and yet you came back for a second round? You're a glutton for punishment. What makes you think things will turn out differently compared to last time?"

"Your abilities are troublesome. However, they are not omnipotent. The fact you're having a friendly chat with me right now rather than begging for forgiveness is proof of that." Nufaris has been staring blankly at me the whole time, but now a very creepy smile spreads across his face. I've never known him to show emotion in the few times I've seen him, and considering his mouth full of shark-like razor sharp teeth, it's an unsettling image.

My scanning officer quickly taps the mute button on our side. "A hundred thousand ships now. Still climbing."

A hundred thousand? That's a lot. We have about that many now, but our ships are far bigger and more powerful overall, plus they're enhanced by my wordsmithing. Their metal is ten times thicker and tougher than ordinary blast-steel, meaning a blast from any weapons the Volgrim used before would be ineffective. They'd need to have innovated on a whole other scale above and beyond what they used before to beat us now.

"I'm not going to beg for anything. You showed up in my star system, so this time I'll finish what I started."

I make a quick motion to my Comms officer and he shuts off the video feed. "That was a boring conversation anyway."

Sensei walks over from across the room and opens up the front of his mask. He seems worried. "I find it hard to believe the Volgrim would be crushed so efficiently and yet come back unprepared. They have magic nullifiers placed on every ship, making readings impossible to obtain. Their hulls have some sort of reflective coating we've never seen before, possibly nanobot enhanced, so we can't penetrate with ordinary scanners either. We can't even teleport inside with Wordsmithing."

"They're blocking us out." I murmur to myself right as the fireworks start. Their entire fleet unloads on ours, and we retaliate in kind a few seconds later. "What are they trying to hide, though?"

"135,000 enemy ships now, Original." The scanning officer chimes in again, making me wonder why they're going so far with this all out assault.

It's just suicidal. Our forces are far stronger than theirs. We will destroy them with ease.

I guess the Volgrim are either really stupid, or really clever. We'll find out soon.

* * *

"Seventy percent of the fleet has arrived, the rest are holding back for the final attack." A Volgrim lieutenant spoke up from across the bridge and Nufaris made no motion to acknowledge. "The initial salvos are firing."

"Don't hold back. The faster we wipe them out, the better. Once charged, target their shield generators with the Ryden beam cannons. Follow up immediately with three waves of Phoenix missiles. Keep repeating until they come up with a counter attack. Then we will switch to the secondary attack pattern." The highest ranked Volgrim watched emotionlessly as their initial attacks began. More like 'if' they come up with a counter attack, he thought to himself.

"As you wish, Executor Nufaris."

Nufaris felt his face twitch. It did that a lot lately. The wounds might never fully heal. Still, if a few scars were necessary for the survival of the Volgrim race, they were a small price to pay.

A particularly bright patch of light lit up the distant void of space, only to vanish a moment later. Nufaris tilted his head to look at a nearby crewman's data readout. Apparently one of the human's ships was already down, and a critical hit had detonated their ship's central reactor.

Nufaris kept a smile to himself. Until the boil known as humanity had been lanced, there was no cause for celebration. They would be cut down, just as the other Founders had been.

Unarin is gone. Dosena, Trayza... all of them. They were a symbol of the old age. Weak, ineffective, unable to understand the threat the humans posed. The only way to wipe out a pest is by killing it at its source.

Despite his thoughts, he found himself slowly shaking his head. It didn't have to be this way. If they hadn't plotted against him, they could have stayed in power. If they hadn't constantly questioned his every order... always complaining about how Unarin would do things differently...

"Executor, we have just destroyed a hundred of their ships. In return, we have lost seventy-nine of our own." The lieutenant from earlier spoke up, as he pointed at a readout on his screen.

"I had expected the losses to be closer. We're doing well. Is the penetration threshold higher or lower than expected?"

"Higher, Executor. Each impact from the Ryden beam nullifies close to 90% of their defenses."

"Interesting. They must be relying on that special energy of theirs more than they did in the past. This is good news for us."

* * *

"What's going on? They're slaughtering us out there!" I turn my head from one monitor to another and back rapidly as the reports come in. Already a hundred of our ships are gone, and it's been less than two minutes since combat began. If those numbers keep up, this fight will be over much sooner than I'd like, and we won't be the winners.

"Some kind of anti-energy cannon! It's wiping away the reinforcement magic that layers all of our ship! Not only that but-" He flinches as there's another massive explosion to our starboard side.

Sensei is very agitated, and I can't blame him. "If they came up with a way to nullify our reinforcement magic, then we'll have to reinforce with other alternatives. We should boost our shield generators with wordsmithing. The shields seem to negate a lot of the impact from their anti-energy beams."

I feel my heart flutter slightly as another explosion appears in the space nearby. "We only have 30,000 clones between over 97,000 ships. We can only reinforce a third of our military that way."

Sensei looks away from me uneasily. "We could just... make more clones."

"You and I both know that's a bad idea."

"Creating me was a bad idea. You're way past the realm of bad ideas at this point." Sensei's words sting me in a way I haven't felt in a while before I finally turn away.

"Fine. All second level to seventh generation clones should clone themselves. Eighth to twelfth should continue doing their best."

"That will only give us ten thousand clones though." Sensei bites his lip. "Aw, fuck it. Better to reinforce half the fleet than a third."

"That's the spirit." My words ring hollow though, because I really don't want to make more clones.

Sensei quickly sends out a mental order to other clones nearby, and they in turn spread the order around rapidly like a spiderweb. Within a minute, all the needed players have received their orders.

After than, most of the clones on my bridge teleport to other ships and soon it's literally just Sensei and I.

"Harold, put us on autopilot. Do what you can for now, but having us out of the battle won't make much of a difference."

He appears in my mind, though he's rather fuzzy since he's spreading himself thin coordinating with thousands of other ships. "Yeap, I'm workin' on it, boy! Don't tell me what to do!"

"Sorry." I leave him to his tasks before looking back at Sensei. "Is this it? The readings indicated a fleet way bigger than this."

"I don't know. The Volgrim might be trying to pull something."

Both of us feel on edge, but there's not a lot we can do.

"Something is bothering me. How did Nufaris know my name was Jason Hiro? I never told him that. Also, he mentioned my abilities... does he know about Wordsmithing too?"

Sensei shrugs. "If he does know, that implies insider knowledge. That demon, Yama, also mentioned Wordsmithing by name to me when we fought. Satan knows about it too, and-"

I quickly interrupt him. "Yama knows? You didn't mention that before."

He immediately averts his eyes from mine. "It wasn't that big of a deal at the time. I just figured given we were interrupted by news of the Volgrim attack force, we would maybe pick up on that conversation later."

"We didn't. That's kind of a big oversight, don't you think?"

Sensei does something shocking. He glares at me. "Don't patronize me! We've got the whole of the Volgrim army bearing down on us, and you care about some demon on Earth?! This is clearly bigger!"

His verbal assault makes me take a step back, before he takes a quick breath. "Sorry, I didn't mean that."

"Yeah. It's... it's fine. Obviously you were going to mention it eventually, we've just been busy. That's... my bad."

Both of us look at each other, and for once, I feel a weird tension that I haven't experienced with him before.

"I'm going to go help out on the front lines." Sensei abruptly turns and walks away, not bothering to say goodbye. A moment later, he exits the room, and I'm left staring blankly at where he had just been standing.

I feel like something significant just happened, and I'm not sure what.

But after this battle, I'm going to find out.

* * *

Slippy good boy! Slippy do what Slippy told!

The tiny imp clutched the large spherical device to his chest as he ran forwards, huffing and puffing while he tried to keep his stamina up.

Everybody count on Slippy! Slippy always do good job!

His tongue flopped out of his mouth as he ran, panting like a dog, up the snowy slope. The cave they had pointed him towards was there, all right. Slippy's eyes bulged open as he spotted it.

There it is! Oh boy! Slippy so excited to be useful!!!

A minute later, he tripped over his own feet but landed safely in the cave after making a terrific jump across two feet of a gap. He pulled himself up, still clutching the device in his arms as he spotted a massive, glowing door. Or at least it looked sort of like a door.

Oh wow! Slippy see portal! Slippy know what to do!

He charged forwards, racing into the portal without a care in the world. It was similar to the ones he'd heard other demons talk about, but he was only a few days old. He'd never gotten to actually use one before.

The experience was jarring, but he arrived on the other side without any special drama occurring. Immediately, he was staring at two pairs of legs as a duo of massive angels stared ahead with bored expressions in their eyes at the portal before them.

It barely took them an instant to realize the portal had shifted. By the time they looked down, the imp was already running past their feet.

"Hey! What the blazes? Is that an imp?!"

Run! Bad guys! Danger! Slippy has to press button on toy! Slippy know what to do!

Slippy ran past them with a stupidly huge smile on his face even as the angels started to chase after him. They were far faster than him. Soon, the little vagrant would pay for entering the territory of Heaven.

Slippy shot a look behind his head. The big bad guys were almost on him.

Yikes! Gonna grab me! Slippy press big red button now!

The little imp giggled to himself as he pressed the button and hurled the metal device forwards.

The angels near the entrance to heaven grabbed the little guy and glared at him, though their gaze quickly shifted to the small grenade-sized object he had thrown.

One beep. Two beeps. Three beeps. A little red light activated on the top of the orb as it came to rest on the ground.

Slippy scared! Bad guys have Slippy! How Slippy escape?

A moment later, the device exploded.

Chaos.

A massive amount of energy poured out of the device as all of the power within was released, ripping a hole in space itself as a colossal sphere of energy formed, tearing skin from bone and shredding all life in the immediate radius around it.

Several seconds later, all the angels within several hundred feet were dead, as was Slippy. A shifting phantom-like apparition appeared as a black portal formed itself and Satan stepped through.

"Excellent. Let's begin."

Part 368a: Inversion

"They're tenacious." Nufaris thumbed his nose uneasily as he watched the battle unfolding. For over an hour, they had been trading blows and things were stalemating quickly.

"We still can't pierce their shields with the Ryden cannons, Executor Nufaris. Every time we hit them, the shields weaken momentarily, then surge back to full power. We're taking more losses than they are, but occasionally we get lucky and find a ship that doesn't have these strange shields."

The scanning officer was tight lipped and intent on his job, but Nufaris raised an eyebrow at him nonetheless. "I don't believe in luck. They must be reinforcing their front line with these altered ships somehow. What changed? Why are these new ships so much better at deflecting the Ryden cannon? Think, crewman."

The other Volgrim lowered his head for a moment before raising it again. "Perhaps he's... perhaps the Commander is using Wordsmithing to reinforce their shields?"

"Unlikely. We would pierce right through if that were the case. It must be something else."

The scanning officer quickly glanced at Nufaris before looking back to his display. "You know what the cause is then, Executor?"

"Of course I do. It's important for you to figure it out though. Combat is not simply about winning, it is about understanding your enemy."

A different officer spoke up, her voice tinged with doubt. "Might he be... boosting the performance of the shield reactors themselves?"

"Exactly. Impressive as always, Elder Zasra. If he boosts the abilities of the reactor itself, then the shields will be able to resist without allowing our anti-energy cannon to pierce through. However, another question remains. What do you suppose that is?"

A flash of light shot past the viewscreen, missing their ship by just a few meters. "If he is boosting the performance of their shields, why are only some of the ships boosted?"

"Correct. The method he is using must be imperfect and require someone with specialized talents to keep an eye on the situation, correcting the shields as they falter. This means there must be a portion of the fleet that is unprotected."

Elder Zasra breathed lightly as she looked out at the battle before them. "The rear guard."

"Now you understand. He wants us to keep focusing on the front lines, because those ships are invulnerable from a practical standpoint. But this must mean that the rear of the fleet is quite easy prey for our Intrepid-class fighters."

Nufaris took a step back and smoothed his hair, even as he felt his hands shaking. Not from fear of course, for there was no reason to fear an enemy you understood. No, this was due to a different emotion... excitement. At long last, those who laid waste to the legacy of his people would soon be a memory among the universe, one to later be purged by the memory scrubbing machines.

The humans didn't deserve to be left even as a blip marker in a holo-bank.

Still, it is an interesting story, that of our time fighting the humans. I was too soft when we first began, assuming that we might be able to resolve things diplomatically. The humans are a species that adores war, and so they will live by the blaster, only to die by the blaster.

He smirked to himself. Fitting. Unfortunate that our temporary allies will have to pay the price as well, but their intelligence on the human leader was quite useful. We will be sure to revere them as true warriors once this conflict is finally put behind us.

"I want all ships to begin targeting the enhanced enemy vessels at a fifty to one ratio. Aim at any specific spot on a given ship, and hammer it with everything we've got until the shields fail, then destroy that ship methodically. Following this, deploy the Intrepid fighters and have them so a short range warp-jump behind enemy lines and smash the unenhanced ships while their attention is on our forward barrage."

Zasra sent a questioning look his way. "I thought you said their enhanced shields were impenetrable?"

"They aren't. I was being facetious. The shields have a clear pattern of dipping and rebuilding themselves, so if we focus fire, we will cause the humans much headache. Besides, this is all just a distraction anyway."

"Understood, Executor."

The crew members on the bridge swiftly relayed his commands to the rest of the ships, even as his scanning officer looked rather sullen at not figuring out the answer to Nufaris' question sooner.

Soon... the humans will know the taste of fear and humiliation. There will be no refuge for their kind.

* * *

Sensei's eyes watered as he yelled again. " Rebuild! Regenerate! " Every time the shield dipped below 75%, he would yell again and again, and his voice was getting hoarse now. Even though he was wearing a Hypersuit and none of the nearby crew could hear him yelling, he still felt like they were staring at him angrily for standing around and doing nothing. If only they knew the toll this was taking on him.

He coughed suddenly, as his voice caught in his throat. " Heal. His throat repaired itself and he felt better again, but he knew by his mental calculations and the ability to feel the energy in his body that his reserves were going down quickly and he was already nearing the half-empty threshold. There were still hundreds of canisters filled with type 3 energy that Original had been storing for years, but in a prolonged battle, those surely wouldn't last forever.

Worse, he was a first generation clone. The other clones from second generation and on were probably already running on fumes and dipping into the energy reserves. This was at best a band-aid.

He grimaced as the ship shuddered slightly and the shields dropped to 90%. "Back to the grind."

Before he could wordsmith, the ship violently lurched, tossing him backwards and making him fall flat on his ass. He activated his speakers as quickly as possible. "Status report!"

"They're concentrating fire on us! Almost fifty ships at once!" A nearby engineer yelled out, his calm from a few moments ago totally gone. Sensei stood back up only to gawk at the shield indicators. They had plummeted from 90% all the way to 25%. Alerts covered the screen as he quickly wordsmithing again. " Rebuild! Regenerate! Enhance! "

The shields lurched back up to 50% but quickly dropped again as the viewscreen showed him a wall of enemy fire concentrating his ship down.

I was worried about this. Can't just create a shield either, not with wordsmithing. If it's made of heroic energy it'll probably be dissipated instantly.

He activated the comm in his suit. "Original! Are the Dartfighters launched yet?! What's taking so long?!"

"No good." Original's voice had a tinge of sadness in it. "The Dartfighters lose the hull enhancements once they get within range of the Volgrim ship. At this point, I don't think we're just dealing with energy nullification, this must be.... something else. Maybe energy inversion. I didn't think it was possible."

His voice was unnaturally calm, given the situation. "Redirect some asteroids into their ships, then! Do something!"

"I don't know what to do. I'm talking with Harold though, we'll figure something out."

"I hope so." Sensei started to say something else but the ship shook again and the shield generator behind him exploded violently, the cascade of power blasting him forwards until he smashed against a wall.

He was totally uninjured and quickly jumped back to his feet, but he was surprised to see the entire bulkhead where the generator had been was gone. It had been totally blown away and sent out into the blackness of space, the emergency force fields initializing in its wake to seal the breach.

An alarm light blared, but no noise was audible. Sensei quickly realized the oxygen in the room had been vacuumed out into space.

"I have to go. Ship just took a bad hit." He clicked the line off without waiting for confirmation, as he pushed himself through the air towards the hull breach. The gravity generators had gone offline in his room, so he would have to move quickly in order to seal up the hole in time to save the ship.

What happened?! How did they manage to punch through the shields so fast? They weren't even close before!

* * *

Three cherubs held together in a tight formation as they swung their swords to the right and the left, hacking down demons by the dozens.

"Hold the line! Don't let them through!" Zeus howled at the top of his lungs as he aimed his rod towards a group of clustered demons. A second later, a blast of lightning shot out at the speed of light, screaming forwards like an angry maelstrom as it devoured all of the demons in sight.

Zeus took a step back and gasped for breath. The demons were relentless. This would be called the Second Battle for Heaven, if they managed to win again. His energy was drained quickly by using his lightning though, and there was simply no way to keep it up for extended periods of time without draining his life force.

Behind him, Gabriel sat on the ground with his legs crossed as he meditated. It had been a long time since he had fought in battle, and condensing his energy together would be necessary to maintain Cosmic status, a form that temporarily gave him access to unlimited energy.

Zeus cursed himself for not taking the time to give another Archangel Cosmic status. "Brother! How much longer before you're ready?!" A Scyther leaped towards Zeus and he deftly swung his blunt rod at the demon, hitting it with enough force to splatter it into pieces all over the grass.

"Just another few minutes. Hold out." Gabriel's eyebrow twitched even as he kept his eyes locked shut.

"Make it fast!" Zeus looked from side to side, using his special vision to hunt for great sources of demonic energy. From a distance, he spotted a massive brutish demon with a huge flail tearing through hordes of angels with ease.

I can't leave my brother behind, as he is defenseless while he gathers his energy. But neither can I let that behemoth crush my comrades!

Zeus raised his thumb to his mouth and bit into it hard, feeling the taste of blood fill his mouth. An instant later, time began to slow down around him. Soon, it crawled and he could move normally.

Running forwards, he smashed his rod into several demons along the way, sending their heads flying from the tops of their bodies and far off into the distance. The foul beasts would never know to what deity they owed the honor of meeting their end.

Quickly he appeared before the demon with the flail and smashed the demon with his fists, buffeting and pummeling him with every ounce of power he had. This was no ordinary demon, but a demon emperor, if his energy level was to be gauged correctly.

Zeus battered him, smashed him, pounded him with every ounce of power he had, then finished by beating the fat one with the bodies of other demons.

His heart pulsed in agony and he realized his minute of light-time was nearly up. Faster than even he thought possible, he rushed back to his brother only to collapse in exhaustion at the feet of Gabriel.

Gabriel didn't open his eyes. "Foolish. Don't waste Temporal Manipulation on small fry."

Zeus spit blood on the ground as he raised his head to search for the massive demon he had just savagely tore into. "You're one to talk. Hurry up with the transformation!"

"Almost done."

Finally, Zeus spotted the demon and a chill went down his arms. The demon was limping now, but otherwise was nowhere close to dead. What was he made of?!

"Done." Gabriel leaped to his feet as his eyes glowed yellow. He slapped his chest and wrenched his wrist in a circle and began to grow enormously. Soon, he was bigger than Kronos had been when Zeus fought the old demon, all those centuries ago.

Gabriel didn't smile as he aimed his hand forwards and blasted out a colossal amount of energy towards the demons.

We can win this. Zeus climbed to his feet shakily and charged back into battle. We will destroy the demons today!

* * *

I can't believe it. The readouts in front of me indicate Sensei's ship just exploded. I mean, he's not dead. Not a chance. The hypersuits are just too ridiculous for that to happen. But, still... this isn't good. Now they're punching right through our shields. Sustained focus fire can make even the strongest defense crumble.

"Kid, got bad news." Harold tightly speaks in my mind. "Bunch o' aliens just jumped behind the fleet. They're takin' out the ships that ain't reinforced."

"What? Damn." Reflexively, I grip Excalibur at my side. "Try... I don't know." I hesitate, unsure of what to do. Nufaris is being so vicious, and is unwilling to listen. I thought this battle would be easy, but I was totally wrong. That's on me. I can't let humanity suffer for my cockiness. "Do you think if I got aboard the flagship I could take Nufaris out?"

"Not a chance. That ship is surrounded by their weird anti-energy aura. More likely, you'd prolly die if you stepped in it. It wreaks havoc on our ships you powered up."

His words spark my imagination. "That's it! They're not nullifying my wordsmithing, they're inverting it! That means our ships are being weakened by having my magic on it! So..." I tap the comms to speak to all of my clones via their Hypersuits at once. "Listen up! I want all of you to use 'Dispel' on your ships and other nearby ships! Dispel all of our enhancements to their hulls. The Volgrim weapons are using our own energy against us!"

Nobody responds, but they don't need to. A quick readout on my tactical display indicates that nearly every ship in the fleet simultaneously is losing 50% of their hull integrity. The real question is if this will work out in the end or not. If it does, then it was a wise maneuver. If it doesn't... I've just hastened our demise.

...Minutes pass. I'm stunned to see that the enemy changes their attack strategy again, no longer relying on brute-forcing their way past our shields. In fact, we're starting to take the offensive. My plan was a success.

"Nice work, Original. Quick thinking. I should have thought of that." Sensei's voice sounds off in my ear. "Maybe you're smarter than I expected."

Um, thanks I guess? I ignore the left handed compliment. "I have my moments. Let's push back against them!"

"You got it!" Sensei snickers quietly as he disconnects again.

At least the conversation was positive. After this is all over, I need to have a talk with my clones. I need to figure out what's going on. I'm obviously doing a terrible job and they seem to have no respect for me, so I'll need to take care of that.

Harold suddenly speaks to me in my mind. "Oh... oh god, kid. Oh god."

"Harold? What's wrong? What's going on?"

He sounds absolutely crushed, as if he just found out a secret that will change the fabric of reality. "The Volgrim are pullin' back, kid."

"Really? That's good! Uh, right? Am I missing something?"

"Yeah, it's good. Too good to be true. But I finally realized why they's been playin' this long game. They had something else with 'em. Look."

My viewscreen lights up with an image that chills me to the bone.

"What the hell... what is that thing? It's... is that what was giving us the reading from... before?"

"Yeah. It... it went around the battle. It warped further into the solar system. It's just now gone past Mars."

My heart skips a beat. "What?! We have to intercept it! We have to get back to Earth!"

"I'm on it." The old man seems to choke back emotions as the flight path on the ship changes suddenly. "Let's just hope we make it in time, boy."

* * *

Jorge clicked the revolver's hammer, then pulled the trigger as the gun made an empty sound. He continued staring ahead blankly, as he clicked the hammer down again, pulling the trigger once more.

Sitting on a bench just outside his house, he stared across the street blankly at the wall of his neighbor's building. The sun was warmer than usual, just warm enough to start melting the snow in the area, but not warm enough to go for a jog in. Still, he wore no coat, ignoring the cold temperatures and chilly winds that whistled around him.

I don't have anything left to live for.

He clicked the hammer on the revolver again, as he wondered to himself what it would feel like... what it would feel like to slide a bullet inside the chamber.

I'll just put one bullet in there. Spin the cylinder around... pull the trigger. Fun little game of Russian Roulette. Yeah... fun little game.

His wife was taken by the demons, his daughter killed, his career over. The last one didn't even matter to him, but it added salt to the wound.

God hates me. That's what it is. I cheated and he took them from me. What's the point of going on like this anymore?

He lifted his head up to stare at the sun. A cloud somewhat blocked it, but the sky was mostly clear. The moon was visible above, an odd sight to see in the middle of the day on a January morning.

A smell of bacon drifted on the wind, but Jorge ignored it. Food is for people who deserve good things. Food isn't for me.

His stomach growled angrily, but he just rubbed it and closed his eyes. It had been three days since he last ate, and he had decided not to eat again unless his wife returned from the lair of the demons. Fasting was the least he could do, considering she was likely suffering unimaginable torture under their hands.

I'm weak. I don't even know where the bastards took her. If they did, would I go and rescue her? My mind says yes, but my heart says no.

He pulled the trigger again and the gun clicked loudly in his hand.

What's the point of living without them? They were everything to me.

He leaned his head back and stared at the moon, in all of its glory. It was bigger than usual, a sight he would normally be glad to have seen. Now, he just didn't care.

Still, he stared at the moon in the sky, blinking slowly as he noticed something odd. To the right of the moon, a strange sphere had appeared. It was about a quarter the size of the moon, but unless his eyes were deceiving him, it appeared to be growing in size... very slowly.

Very slowly, indeed.

"I wonder if I'm hallucinating." Jorge mumbled to nobody in particular, as he pulled back the hammer on the revolver again.

Part 369a: Refuge

"This is unreal. It's bigger than the Moon." There are only three people on the bridge, and Amelia is the one speaking now. "Way bigger."

"Look at the composition of the planet... it's made entirely of metal." Sensei pulls up a scanning log and I raise an eyebrow.

"Is that a fucking Death Star?" How original. The aliens created an artificial planet half the size of Earth. And since it has its own propulsion system, it must have traveled here for a purpose.

"This is what it comes down to. The future is repeating itself." Sensei bites down hard on his lower lip. "If... if that's going to be the arbiter of our destruction, isn't it here too early? We can't merely be repeating the past! The Earth wasn't supposed to be destroyed until the 24th century!"

"I don't know. Maybe we're not remembering the dates correctly... it was so long ago. I can't remember a conversation from a hundred years ago."

Amelia turns and gawks at me. "Are you kidding? You have wordsmithing, Jason. Just make yourself remember."

Oh. Right. Duh. "Remember." I mutter the word to myself as our ship blasts towards the massive Mars-sized planet. It's half the size of Earth, twice the size of the moon, and colossal no matter how you slice the cheese.

A few moments later I blink my eyes and turn to face Sensei as I finish reviewing my memories. "We are forgetting some details. That conversation with OMEN... all he ever told us was that his expedition set out in the 24th century." My tongue catches in my throat, as I feel a lightheaded sensation pass over me. "He also said... Earth was already in ruins. He never said Earth was destroyed in the 24th century."

"We were wrong. The whole time." Sensei's wipes at his eyes and I realize a few tears had just slipped out. "Shit. We were completely wrong. We thought we had all but exterminated the Volgrim... unless they had someone with Wordsmithing helping them, there's no way they built something of this size in a few decades. This was built before we destroyed Volgarius. There must be billions of Volgrim still alive."

Harold speaks to me in my mind. "Kid, I can't scan the inside of that metal planet at all. I got no idea how many Volgrim might be in there."

"Just keep trying, Harold. We'll figure something out."

I start to say something else, only to notice Amelia is staring at me oddly. "Harold? Who's that?"

Sensei suddenly has an oh shit look on his face. I realize I do too. "Nothing, I'm talking to myself. I'm-"

Something hits me. Why have I been keeping Amelia in the dark about Harold all these years? Why? We've been together for decades now. We trust each other. She considers Harold's wife to be a mother to her, yet I made Helen swear to secrecy about his existence.

Why... why? Why am I keeping her in the dark?

Because... I... I didn't want her to know about the existence of the orb of light and the orb of darkness. In the future I come from, Amelia knows them intimately. But... Hoarhiim isn't in the orb. Harold is. As for the black orb, I haven't even seen it... but is Blaarjiim inside of it? If he is, but Hoarhiim isn't inside the white orb, what does that mean? What if he isn't in the orb?

If Amelia finds out about their existence, does that mean the future becomes more likely, or less likely? I don't know... I don't...

There's only one way to find out.

"Sensei, you take the lead here. I have to show Amelia something."

He immediately pales in the face at my suggestion. "You're joking, right? We've got ten seconds to contact with the Volgrim Death Star thing."

"You're smarter than me anyway. Deal with it."

He straightens up at my request and shrugs. "Yeah, guess I can't fault that logic."

"Knew you'd see it my way." I take Amelia's hand and start to walk out, but Sensei's yells at me.

"Hey! Original. Thanks for believing in me."

"Technically, isn't it just believing in myself?"

"Shut up and take the compliment, smartass."

I shoot him a hurried smile as Amelia and I leave the bridge.

* * *

Nufaris smoothed his uniform's collar down. It was important to look regal, especially when they were about to deliver the death blow to humanity. Still, he was not unmerciful. All they had to do was agree to his terms and their end would not come.

An ensign made a fist and raised it at a forty-five degree angle without turning around, meaning the human strike force from beyond the eighth planet had just arrived and the hail had already been sent.

It barely took three seconds before the massive viewscreen on the bridge shifted to show a human face staring at all of the Volgarians. Unlike Nufaris, his shirt had a few patterns of wetness here and there, and his face was somewhat moist. Perspiration. Nufaris gloated to himself about how the human must be nervous, very nervous indeed, if he were this frightened.

"Jason Hiro, Supreme Commander of the human's defense forces. I will make this succinct, as time is of the essence. Surrender now, and I will spare humanity. You must agree to a full and total dissolution of your defensive forces and provide reparations in exchange for all the trillions of Volgarian lives you ripped from the universe. Failure to comply will mean the destruction of your homeworld and the fourth planet in your solar system via our ultimate weapon, Refuge."

"Uh... Jason Hiro... right, me. Okay. So you're going to fire like a giant laser at my planet and vaporize it? I assume that is your plan... you understand that if you destroy Earth, there won't be a new planet for you to settle on, correct?"

"Not in this solar system. There are millions of other viable planets out there, and my people are undying. Once we erase the threat of humanity from the galaxy, we can take all the time we need to find a suitable replacement."

Nufaris caught himself from saying too much. The longer we take to pacify or destroy you, the more powerful your technology will become. Eventually we'll fight on equal footing with our weapons, but you will have the numerical advantage due to your ability to create new viable planets and your rapid gestation cycles.

"That doesn't sound like if we surrender, you'll treat us kindly. That sounds like an existential threat. You're bluffing. If we surrender our weapons, you can kill us as slowly as you want, but if we fight, you won't win."

The human sounded confident, but he simply didn't understand what he was up against.

Nufaris finally let a tiny smile spread across the corner of his mouth. Of course he doesn't know. He didn't even know of the existence of Refuge until it appeared right before his very eyes. He hasn't a hope to stop it or prevent the calamity, and it's all thanks to the defector on his side.

Nufaris tried to speak, but instead an odd noise gurgled from his throat. "Kuh... kuhuhu... kuh huh huh..."

The human raised an eyebrow. "Are... are you doing okay?"

He couldn't control it any longer. "KUHHH HUH HUH HUH!!!" A strange laughter erupted from his body violently as he stared at the stupefied expression on the human's face.

He doesn't know! He has no idea! He's more dimwitted than I thought! Totally unprepared for what's coming!

The highest member of the Volgrim, the Executor, grabbed his stomach as he tried not to double over with laughter. Every eye on the bridge turned to stare as their commanding officer broke down in hysterics, before several long seconds passed and he managed to stand up straight suddenly, regaining full control of his emotions.

"Apologies, human. I did not wish to show such obvious delight in your refusal to stand down. Truth be told, I'd prefer it if you fought back. The rage you are about to feel, the hatred, the sadness, the loss of everyone you care for... it will never compare to what you have taken from my kind. Still, it is a start. After we crush your homeworld with Refuge's power, we will eradicate all life from the second world you have colonized, and then we will erase every last strand of your kind from existence, one by one." Nufaris bobbed a finger up and down dramatically as he spoke to emphasize his last few words.

He paused slightly, as he turned to stare at another viewscreen showing Refuge in all of its glory. "It has been so long since I was overcome by emotion. I couldn't even weep for the loss of my people... yet now I will never be happier than I feel at this exact moment. It is a hollow victory, I must admit. I should like to cherish the ecstasy a bit longer."

He made a slight hand motion and the communication was cut off. "Begin the charging sequence."

* * *

Amelia stared at the glowing orb in the room with a perplexed look on her face. "It's... beautiful. What is it?"

"I'm not sure, honestly. Harold is who I was speaking to on the bridge, and he's been inside the orb for as long as I've owned it. At least... since I came back in time."

Harold's face appeared in both of our minds almost simultaneously. Amelia jerked back and she made a cute little 'eek' sound when he startled her. I tried not to laugh, but I failed.

"It took ya decades and ya finally bring her here now? What is up with ya, kid? I don't get it."

Harold seems annoyed, but I see gears immediately start to turn in Amelia's head. "He's been here in this orb for decades and you never told me?"

I scratch the back of my head. "Yeah, about that... I had a good reason."

She doesn't even get mad. "Something to do with the future, I'm sure."

"Yep."

Two minutes later, I finish my explanation and she seems reluctant.

"So I carried the dark orb around and spoke to it?"

"Yes. Just like you do with Leviathan now, except I don't recall Leviathan was ever inside of you in the future. In fact, you and the orb had almost exactly the same relationship as you do with Leviathan now."

"So... you're saying..." She sticks her hands on her hips and stares up in the ceiling as she puts two and two together. "Somehow Leviathan goes from inside me to inside an or- yes, I know, not exactly an upgrade." Her thoughts are interrupted as she speaks to herself again, meaning there's probably some internal dialogue with Leviathan going on.

"The orb that I was using, my friend... his name was Hoarhiim. The black one was named Blaarjiim. When I killed you, I believe Blaarjiim was destroyed as well, and Hoarhiim went inert, which probably-"

She interrupts me. "Hold on, Blaarjiim and Hoarhiim? Are you being serious right now?"

"Err, yes."

She stares down at the floor for a moment as she has another internal dialogue with Leviathan. "He just told me those aren't names, they're titles. Titles from a long dead language, one the dragons used to communicate with each other, millions of years ago."

"Seriously? I never bothered to ask."

"Yes. Blaarjiim means the Bringer of Pain, while Hoarhiim means the Holder of Bliss."

"Oh. That's... appropriate." A thought occurs to me. "Too appropriate."

"I thought so too, kid." Harold seems almost glum now. "Somehow, that dragon must be the one inside that evil orb. He even has a dragon name."

"Title." Amelia corrects the geezer politely but doesn't say anything else.

"Right. Jason, this has been a good talk, boy, but you do realize there's still a war going on?"

My brain snaps back to attention. "I almost forgot."

"You're an idiot." Amelia punches me playfully as I press my hand to her shoulder and teleport us to the bridge instantly.

"I get that a lot." I wink at her before turning to look at Sensei. "How did it go?"

Only then do I notice the metal planet before me has incredibly bright lines of energy surging all over its surface.

"Not well." Sensei almost whispers the words. "That thing... it's a weapon for sure. It's surrounded by an inverted energy barrier a million times stronger than the one any of their ships has... and it's too big to destroy with any of our other ordinance."

"Should I grab an X-wing?" I try to force a smile, but nobody's laughing. Not even me.

Nobody has time to respond as the energy coalesces into a single point just above the equator of the planet. An instant later, it fires.

I've only seen a light that bright once in my life.

* * *

Nufaris stood still, like a rock bearing the weight of a colossal wave as the surf pounds on a beach.

A weapon to rival no other.

"Halfway charged, Executor."

His communications officer spoke up, but Nufaris didn't deign to respond.

It would barely take a minute to charge the anti-gravity accelerator. It had already been thirty seconds.

How many voluntarily gave up their lives to redesign our new home? They were brave, truly honorable Volgrim. They knew billions would have to be purged to make room for the proposed designs, yet they never hesitated. We were fueled by our grief, our anger, our rage. For a species concerned with never letting their emotions get the best of them, we all tacitly agreed to put aside the old ways... at least until we had succeeded in accomplishing our revenge.

"Seventy percent, Executor."

The designs we were given were remarkable. Even considering the source, we knew they couldn't be passed up. Using negative energy to power a weapon that could reduce worlds to rubble? If it gave us a fraction of the power the humans had displayed when they erased our homeworld from existence, it was worth the sacrifices.

"Eighty five percent, Executor."

The grief.

"Ninety percent, Executor."

Let's see how mighty wordsmithing is against a weapon that turns the power against its wielder. Let's see you prevent this calamity, Jason Hiro.

"The Anti-Gravity Accelerator is charged, Executor. On your command."

You erased our planet from the galaxy in the blink of an eye. We will force a slow impending catastrophe in exchange.

"You may fire when ready."

Part 370a: Titanfall (1 of 2)

A blast of energy brighter than the sun shoots out of Refuge, so bright that I can't bear to look directly at it. Shielding my eyes, I quickly look over at Sensei. "We have to stop it from hitting Earth!"

I quickly realize somehow he's put a hypersuit on and he's looking directly at the blast. "It's not aiming at Earth. We can't stop it now."

" Wear! " I summon my Hypersuit on and turn to look back at the blast right as it impacts its actual target.

The Moon.

It hits the Moon and a bright flash of light blasts out of the affected area. Seconds later, Refuge stops firing. The beam continues smashing into the moon as the rear section catches up to the forwards section, but eventually it dissipates and all is still.

Several seconds pass. "What... just happened?" Amelia whispers the question out, almost afraid to speak.

"I think they tried to blow up the Moon. They... failed?" My entire body is rigid as I stare at the viewscreen while it examines what's going on. "Harold! Did they pierce the core? Did they destroy the moonbase settlements? What's going on?!"

No response comes for a few seconds, but finally he appears in all of our minds. "Ah... I'm not sure what they did, kid. The Moon's just fine. In fact, they didn't do a lick o' damage where that beam hit."

"What? That's ridiculous! We all saw the explosion!" Sensei's expression is incredulous as his visor opens up fully. "I've never seen an attack of that size cause no damage! What did they hit the Moon wi-"

Harold interrupts him. "God... damn... they weren't tryin' ta blow up the Moon. Oh Jesus, kid. It's worse. Way worse." The screen changes in front of me as a quick visual graphic appears showing the Moon and Earth. A line curves through the moon in a circular motion at first, but then the line turns until it's pointing from the Moon straight at Earth.

"I don't get it, Harold. What did those fuckers do?! Give it to me straight!"

Harold coughs weakly. "They did somethin' with the Moon's gravity. It ain't orbiting Earth no more. It's... falling into Earth. It's falling towards it now."

Sensei steps forwards as he looks at the graphic. "There's a timer counting down. Two hours, forty-seven minutes, twenty-four seconds. This... this is..."

"The time to impact." Amelia finishes the sentence for him. "They're dropping the Moon on Earth, and we've only got two and a half hours to stop it."

Nobody speaks for a few seconds.

"We'd better get moving." I hiss the words out and turn to Sensei. "Gather the clones. All of them. Every last one. Humanity will have to defend themselves against the Volgrim warships on their own."

* * *

The first Supreme Commander Beatrix sat in her mountain retreat on Mars, gazing up at the flash of light in the sky. "That certainly doesn't look good." She stirred a cube of sugar into her tea and stared at the sanitized white walls and floor of her home, wondering where it all went wrong.

I let a madman take over control of Earth, and it's been going to shit ever since. At least Mars is fairly comfortable, as long as you don't like vegetation.

Her butler walked in the room abruptly. "Madam Rose, there's an urgent visitor here. He's from the head of the Mars Joint Coalition."

"Don't call me that. I hate that name." The portly woman rolled around in her chair slightly. "Why should I care about what the warmongers want? Send him away."

"Madam... I know you can be a bit fussy-"

"I'm NOT fussy! Say that to my face one more time!" She glared at the butler and he took a step back meekly in response.

"-but I believe you should listen to him. Earth is under attack. The Volgrim have returned." He finished his response without missing a beat.

She stared at him for a few moments in annoyance before waving her hand. "Fine, send him in. I bet the men screwed up the balance of power in the galaxy again."

"Indubitably." Her butler walked away in a hurry and a half minute later, a wiry looking young man ran into her room huffing. "Commander Beatrix! You need to get dressed and come with me now! There's no time to explain!" His military outfit indicated his rank couldn't be any higher than a corporal. It seemed odd to Beatrix that they would send such a low ranking soldier to bother her. They must have been short on manpower.

"I'm not a commander anymore. The people took that from me." She barely showed any emotion, despite the fact the young man looked to be on the verge of panic. "You've got a man who can shoot lasers out of his eyes, terraform planets, and clone a million more of himself so that they can do all those things too. I won't be much use up there."

"You don't understand, he just recalled all of his clones from every ship in the military! Something huge is happening and we need a military genius!"

She stirred her tea for a few more moments before taking a sip and setting it down. "Fine, but I'll only help in an advisory capacity. After I'm done, never bother me again. I enjoy my peace and quiet."

The young man grabbed her hand as she started to stand up, pulling her to a stand with surprising strength. "Thank you! Thank you, if only you knew what this meant for us!"

"I'm sure I'll know soon enough."

* * *

If you were to tell me that Earth had hours left to live, I'd be hard pressed to believe you. The Moon didn't look any bigger in the sky and I couldn't perceive it getting any bigger, but that probably wasn't going to last long. The wind around me was a slight breeze, and it was a chilly 20F.

I'd probably notice the cold more if my blood weren't boiling with rage.

"Ranger, contact all major governments on Earth and order them to start the evacuation proceedings." Sensei barks an order at one of the other clones nearby and turns away without waiting for a reaction. "We need to get people off Earth. We should start teleporting them immediately."

"I disagree." A nearby clone chimed in. "If we expend energy teleporting people out, we probably won't have enough energy to stop the Moon."

I quickly glanced over at Sensei, looking for hints for what he thought I should do. "I think he's right. If twenty billion people die, we can eventually repopulate, but if the Earth itself is destroyed, Mars can't possibly handle billions of people. Better to let as many as possible evacuate in the colony ships we prepared a few decades ago. If a billion are saved and we have a better shot at saving the nineteen billion remaining, that's the best alternative."

Sensei doesn't seem to like the idea. "If we rip an opening in space, we can teleport all of the people on Earth there temporarily."

"That'll take too much energy. We'll be too drained to stop the moon and we lose that way. And if that drains our energy and we can't stop the Moon, those people have nothing to return to."

Sensei chews on his thumb as he mulls it over. "Seven hundred and fifty million. That's how many people our colony ships can hold, since the ones in North America were taken by the demons. We might be able to rescue a billion more under ordinary circumstances, but that's only if we had access to the entire fleet and no Volgrim at our doorsteps. Hell, the colony ships might be blasted to pieces right after exiting the atmosphere." His gaze lowers as he speaks. "Besides, if the Moon hits, it's going to have reverberations throughout the entire solar system. Mars' orbit might be destabilized."

"We'll stabilize it then. Let's not be fatalistic here. We have a few dozen containers filled with energy, plus 40,000 clones here. We've got more than enough energy to save the world if we put our mind to it."

"We don't." Sensei raises his hand to stop me from saying anything else. "I'm already half dry from the battle. I put a lot of energy into the ship shield generators, and I'm a first generation clone. Many of the others here aren't doing any better, and they're probably all way worse off than me. Not to mention we halved the energy of 10,000 clones to make new clones... The energy we have left is much less than you think."

Everyone is silent for a few moments as I and all of my clones in the area glance around uneasily. One nearby raises his hand. "There's... there's always... reintegration."

Sensei immediately shoots a look of anger at him. "Don't even suggest such a thing. Original would never be able to live with himself if he did that. We all know it!"

Despite his words, I involuntarily lick my lips. Reintegration, huh... it made Hope insanely powerful for a short time. If I didn't have the power of the three Archangels, I'd have surely lost to him. He must have increased his energy output by a factor of a few hundred.

But... there were only a fraction as many clones back then as there are now. If it boosted his powers by that much, what would it do to me?

What would it do... to me?

I realize Sensei is staring at me with his mouth slightly agape. "You're not seriously considering reintegration, are you?"

"No, no. Just trying to think of alternatives." I immediately lie as I feel guilt cross over my face. Truth be told, I goddamn was. Our options are growing more limited every minute. If I want to save Earth, nothing can be off the table.

"Why not just shove the moon back into orbit?" A different clone nearby asks the question and all of us look around to see what the general consensus is.

"What word would we use? Push? Gravity? Orbit?" Sensei seems interested in the idea.

"The exact word doesn't matter. All that counts is the intent. Push was one we used like a form of telekinesis, but that was before we time traveled, before we knew anything about our power. It came out like a gust of energy from our body, but we could make it more precise."

Sensei shrugs. "Seems as good as any other suggestion. The moon is a quarter the size of Earth. If we were to try to move Earth, it would take more than four times as much energy, but shoving the moon back into orbit would have the least deleterious effects on the solar system anyway."

"The only problem with most of these suggestions is the size of the moon, and... one other thing." I bite my lip hard. "What if we actually succeed in getting the moon back into orbit, but Refuge fires another shot and sends the Moon right back at us? There's no way we'll manage saving Earth a second time."

"We could blow up the moon!" Another clone chimes in and everyone ignores him. I'm not the smartest guy in the world, but even I know that might actually be worse than what we're facing now.

Everyone stiffens as a blast of wind hits us. The planet's ecosystems must have finally noticed the massive sphere of rock and dirt falling towards us.

"We'll worry about that if it happens. Time is of the essence right now." Sensei's voice is hard as steel. "Let's just try to shove the Moon back into orbit. That's as good a place to start as any other."

"Right!" Nearly every clone yells in unison.

But not me. "Wait, I have one other idea. It just came to me. Rather than reintegrating all of the clones, why don't all of you give me your energy, then I'll have the maximum amount to use at once?"

I feel taken aback as everyone around me stares with wide eyes.

"Original... that's the smartest thing you've ever said."

Sensei's words somehow feel more like an insult than a compliment.

"Beats the hell out of reintegration."

"You said it."

* * *

"No!!" Gabriel screamed in rage as the First Emperor of the demons finally plowed his fist through Zeus's head, tearing his brains from within and crushing his skull with his bare hands.

"Zeus! No!"

Satan cackled maniacally as he tossed the body of the King of Gods to the ground without a hint of remorse. "The king has fallen! Let this be a lesson for all who oppose the demons! Our revenge will come when you least expect it!"

The leader of the demons had barely finished speaking when another massive anti-energy explosion lit up in the distance. Gabriel felt his knees shake as the energy of thousands of angels vanished into a void, never to be seen again.

Satan scowled as he looked over at Gabriel. "What a shame! Seems a few of my minions were caught in that blast!"

"You poor child!" Gabriel charged at the leader of the demons with his own holy sword held at the ready, slashing from the left and right as Satan dodged from here to there. A few swipes managed to strike their intended target though, and Satan quickly leaped backwards and winced as he grabbed at his chest.

"Bastard! You'll pay for sullyng my perfect body!"

"I'll pay with holy retribution!" Gabriel whipped his palm up and blasted a colossal beam of energy at Satan, feeling his breath catch in his throat. His Cosmic form had already lost its utility and couldn't be used for a long time. Now he was using his own life energy, though it was quite tremendous.

Satan raised his hand up to his mouth as the blast surged towards him, but he seemed to be too slow. The blast impacted him a moment later, destroying everything in the immediate area where he had just been standing.

Gabriel gawked as he stared at the spot where the smoke was clearing. "Did I get the demon?"

"No." Satan spoke quietly from just a few feet to Gabriel's side and the archangel leaped back in surprise.

"What?! I hit you! Where did you come fr-"

He didn't get to finish his sentence. Satan took a quick hop towards him and made a chopping motion with the side of his hand right at the back of Gabriel's neck, stunning the archangel and making him fall to his knees.

"Look at how your kingdom falls, archangel! I warned you over a thousand years ago that I would return and finish what I started, and I am not one to go back on my word!"

Gabriel jerked back up to his feet and glared at the evil being before him. Both of them were tall, broad shouldered members of their own kind. They saw eye to eye, but Gabriel knew in his heart... the demon would never be his equal.

"You resort to cowardly tactics like ambushing and using hostages! You will get your comeuppance, that I can assure you!"

Even as he yelled, Gabriel's eyes looked past Satan at all of the angels falling left and right. All around him, friends and loved ones were being cut down with vicious precision and perfect aim. The demons didn't care who they killed or who they lost, so long as the victory was a crushing one.

Satan's eyes followed Gabriel's gaze. He smiled widely. "Do you like the view? You're the last one, archangel. We've killed all of the pureblood angels, and all that are left are the inferior false angels. Your end has finally come."

Satan's smile faded away and he lowered his hands. "I'll give you one chance. Impale yourself on your sword, and I will call off my forces. With you gone, the Resurrection Project will stop working, and the angels will never be a threat to me again. I am not a monster. The pseudo-angels here today have nothing to do with my grievances against the purebloods from millennia ago. Kill yourself, bend the knee, and you may yet spare some of these inferiors."

Gabriel stared resolutely at the demon before him. "Never. I'll never bow to you. I'll fight to the last breath."

Satan raised his hand and wagged a finger at the archangel. "Careful now. I've let you live up to now, but ending you would be trivial. Giving up your life to spare those remaining... it would be the best way to atone for the crimes the angels have committed against human and demon alike. I am not wholly unmerciful, and unlike the filthy angels, I always keep my word."

Gabriel felt his resolve weaken. Every second I debate, more of the false angels are slain. I can't just let them all die. I can't just give up... but... I can't just fight for my own selfish reasons... at this rate, we'll lose no matter what...

The archangel lifted his head to stare at the empty sky above. If only I could contact Jason Hiro... if only... this might have ended differently.

Gabriel swallowed as blood trickled down his throat. "I... I..."

Satan smiled. "Go ahead. I'm waiting."

* * *

The energy inside of me is greater than I've ever felt in my life. It swirls and spins like a maelstrom of rage. I've never felt power like this... in this timeline.

Yes, once before, I felt this way. When I had the energy of the Archangels, I possessed more power than I do now. Still, this energy is different. It's not an alien energy given to me by a foreign entity, but energy taken from myself, my other selves. My clones gave me all of their energy willingly, except that which they needed to teleport themselves away. It's just Sensei and I now, standing on Earth, staring up at a moon that is growing imperceptibly larger every minute.

"Okay... here I go..." I grit my teeth as I stare up at the Moon above me. I raise my hands to the sky and dig my boots into the ground.

" REVERSE!! "

I yell at the top of my lungs and feel a decent portion of energy leave my body. I pant for a few moments and stare at the Moon.

"Did it work?" Sensei squints as he looks up. "Try again."

"Alright. Here I go again..." I take a deep breath and bellow again. " REVER- " Immediately, a voice screams in my hypersuit's ear speaker.

"STOP! Dumbass! Whatever yer doin', stop!" Harold's wise voice bellows back and me and catches me off guard, making me fall on my ass.

"What's wrong, Harold? What's going on?"

Harold is at the edge of sanity. "I don't know what ya' just did, but ya' just made it go faster! It's really falling towards Earth now! You just went from two 'n a half hours ta' an hour 'n a half! Stop right now!"

His words make daggers of ice shoot down my spine. I jerk my head towards Sensei. "You heard the man, right?"

"Damn right I did. Did you visualize it correctly? You're supposed to reverse it from Earth, not reverse it towards Earth."

"I know! That's what I did. I don't know what went wrong."

Sensei is agitated now, and the wind around us has started to pick up with intensity. Snow and sleet is starting to fall, it's getting hard to see. "Try a different word! Use push, that might work."

"All right." I send a mental message to Harold. "Monitor the Moon! Let me know if anything changes!"

Gathering my breath, I scream again. " PUSH! "

This time, I feel something. It's as if I shoved away from an impenetrable wall. The energy from my wordsmithing is reflected right back at me, and a colossal wave of power smashes into me, beating me into the ground in a millisecond with force that would have liquefied my body if not for the fact I was wearing my hypersuit.

I can barely think as waves of nausea pass over me. "Haah, gnuh..."

My mouth isn't working properly. I feel like I was hit by a freight train. Only when my head lolls to the side do I see Sensei pulling himself up to his feet. The blast wave must have hit him too.

"Original... kahaha... you fucking moron... I get it now..." He quickly heals himself with wordsmithing, then heals me as well. Harold chimes in before Sensei can explain. "Now it's moving even faster! You got less than an hour!"

Sensei and I both stare into the sky in disbelief. "I can't believe it. We don't have the power to stop it."

He whacks me in the arm. "We do! Just use your head! There's one more thing we can do!"

"What? Tell me!"

He shakes his head quickly. "Not reintegration. I know you were thinking that. Instead, let's create a support to physically stop the moon."

My quizzical expression makes him realize who he's talking to. "A glove. A hand. Let's create a massive hand in outer space and physically halt it."

I stare at him for several seconds, before he looks away. "Fuck it! I don't know! It was just a suggestion! I just..."

Both of us lower our heads as despair fills our minds. "Sensei... we can't save the Earth. I'm going to give you all the energy I have now. Get as many humans teleported off the planet and into colony ships as you can. We should have done this in the first place."

"What about you?" He lifts his head up and our eyes lock. "What are you planning?"

"I made a mistake. Refuge didn't just hit the moon with a beam that shoved it towards Earth... it must have charged the moon with negative energy or something. The more I hit it with wordsmithing, the faster it's going to travel."

"What are you saying then? How can you possibly stop it?"

"I can't. What I can do is use the remaining energy in my storage containers... and I'll try to move the Earth backwards, maybe to a different direction so the Moon misses... but gravity doesn't work that way. I can at least try to prolong the inevitable. It'll be up to you to save as many humans as you can... and to stop the Volgrim from attacking Mars."

I grab Sensei's shoulders and stare him in the eye. "If push comes to shove, I don't care what it takes... reintegrate the clones. You cannot let the Volgrim have this. You cannot let them win."

He pulls away from my grip and stares at me with a look of revulsion. "I... couldn't. Never."

"Don't give me that shit. I'd willingly die if it meant saving the galaxy from evil, as would you and all of my clones. We're not heroes other than in title, but humanity looks up to us as if we are. Don't you squander the sacrifices so many have made to get us to where we are now. Don't you dare shit on their hopes and dreams just to pretend to be moral and upright. You and I both know we're beyond redemption now."

Sensei seems to have a look of betrayal pass over his face, but finally he shakes his head. "Fine. If I absolutely must... I will. I'll do it. Don't you die on me. It better be the last resort."

"It will be. Now go! People are dying every second you waste!"

Sensei's eyes tear up and he looks away as his visor closes. Without another word, he teleports away.

Turning back, I stare up at the orb in the sky above. Now I see it... it's definitely getting bigger. The winds are howling at ungodly speeds, with only the power of the hypersuit keeping me upright.

"Harold. I'm going to try to move Earth. Tell me if I'm wasting my time or if this has any effect at all."

"You got it, kid."

Harold sounds uneasy, but I wish that was all I felt. I've never been as terrified in my life as I am right now.

After pulling four containers of energy from my storage, I kneel down and slap my gloved hands to the ground. " MOVE!! "

Part 371a: Titanfall (2 of 2)

It's so dark now. My suit has to activate night-vision mode just to see around me. The entire sky is black, with a small patch of grey to the east from a trickle of sunlight.

My energy is gone now. The last container is in my hands, and I just absorbed it.

Minutes. That's all we've got left. I'll have to evacuate from this place before it hits. Should I? Do I deserve to?

"Harold. How many colony ships managed to escape?" I speak calmly to the old-timer in my mind, though out loud I yell at the top of my lungs. " MOVE!! "

"All of 'em, kid. Last ship blasted off five minutes ago. Now git out of there! There's nothing more ya can do!"

He's a bad liar. "They're all destroyed, aren't they?"

Harold's face turns away slightly in my mind's eye. "They never had a chance. The Volgrim shot 'em before they got off the ground. Knew right where they were located."

"Ha... haha... a traitor, then. Maybe someone with good intel... I can't, though. I can't just let them all die..."

The wind screams all around me. I used 'root' to plant myself in the ground, but if I hadn't, the several hundred mile an hour wind would have dashed me against a mountain long ago. Even with my suit filtering out the sounds from outside, some of it trickles inside. It's as if an unending sea of people are fleeing for their lives from an unseen threat.

"Don't be a hero, son. Ya can't save the planet. Ya did the best ya could."

"No. I didn't. The other clones were right. I should have teleported as many people off the planet as I had the power to do so. They're all dead because of me."

By now, I'm beginning to feel insanely heavy. The wind is pounding me with such ferocity that I feel like gravity has increased tenfold.

"And if ya saved 'em, they'd have no place to call home! What would you do, make another Earth?!"

"Maybe." I stare numbly at the sky before closing my eyes. "I should finally pay for my failures. It's time. Sensei is smarter than me... he's more fit to lead."

Harold goes quiet for a moment. "Now listen here, ya son of a bitch. We don't know what'd happen if ya die. Yer clones might disappear. Even if they didn't, that's no way for a friend o' mine to talk. Do you hear me, soldier?!"

He's going full drill sergeant mode. I can hear it in his voice.

"All I ever do is screw up, and yet until today the universe kept handing me victories. Today the universe gets even."

"You got one minute to get out of there, son! Don't you do this to me!"

My head's feeling light. Even with the suit fully closed up, I feel as if there's a lack of air.

"I'm just... tired. I can't save the Earth, I can't save anyone. This is for the best."

Before Harold can reply, I cut the mental connection and tilt backwards, causing the wind to smash me into the ground on my back.

That's all right... I'm tired anyway. Tired of running the show, tired of people's expectations of me, tired of losing all the people I know. I'm ready for something else.

And who knows? Maybe the Hypersuit will save me from being crushed. Let's test that theory out.

My eyes close and I feel a deep sleep come over me.

I'll let fate decide my future.

* * *

The power was out, and Jorge sat on the couch in his living room staring out the shattered window as hurricane force winds blew inside. He could barely even feel the icy cold in his delirium, but still he clutched a glass half-full of vodka and plenty of other nasty items blown in from outside.

The revolver from earlier was still clutched in his left hand, but his arm flopped at his side uselessly.

I can't feel anything anymore. I'm so numb now.

The faint sound of breaking glass and concrete grinding on more concrete was audible from the kitchen, but he ignored it.

Not much longer now.

In his mind's eye, he saw how he once had everything a man could desire. A beautiful wife, a lovely daughter, a house, and an illustrious career. Respect from his colleagues and the ability to live in relative freedom however he wanted.

And it was all useless in the end. We come in this world alone, and leave it alone. I'm more than just alone, though. I'm completely isolated.

A shard of glass zipped past his head, missing him by a millimeter. He didn't even flinch.

I always wondered to myself if humanity was evil or not. This is retribution for all the evil we've done. We destroyed their planet, so they're going to destroy us.

The rear side of the house finally gave way and collapsed, tearing from the ground and lifting up slightly into the air as the maelstrom ripped it from the earth.

We deserve this. I deserve this.

Finally, Jorge let go of the gun and his fingers glided up towards his chest pocket. A moment later, he pulled out a familiar picture, clenching it tightly so the wind wouldn't take it.

I'm an atheist. I never prayed to any god in my life. My wife and daughter though... they were better than me. They will be in Heaven. All I ask is that the gods take my prayers... let them be happy. Let them be safe. If I deserve to be saved... let it be so.

He chuckled even as the wind swirling around the room took the breath from his throat.

Even sinners deserve a second chance... right?

A moment later, a wooden beam directly above him split in half and fell towards the man on the couch.

He wouldn't have screamed, even if he had the energy to do so.

* * *

"So that's it, huh? Just gonna give up?"

A voice from my right side speaks dryly and I recognize it immediately. "It's impossible, Arthur. Earth is gone. I failed."

"What a positive thinker." Arthur waves his hand at the beautiful green meadow all around us. "I created this place with my mind as a way to escape my troubles. I fled the world of the living because I'd given up hope for my redemption."

"Yeah... so what are you implying?"

"I'm saying you're a coward. I'm saying you disappoint me." Arthur rubs the underside of his nose with a finger as he glares at me. "You have a power that effectively makes you a god above actual gods. You have the ability to reshape reality as we know it. What gives you the right to give up under such a weak catastrophe?"

"My power wasn't enough. I couldn't even stop the moon. What would you do in my place?"

Arthur rolls his eyes. "I don't know. All I know is that surviving to fight another day in order to save as many as possible is the best solution."

"You locked yourself inside of a sword."

For once, I can't help but notice he looks flustered. "Y-yeah, I did... but you're still a dumbass."

"I'm just following the example you set, Arthur. If I'm a dumbass, what does that make you?"

He opens his mouth to respond, but then closes it for a few moments before actually responding. "Shut up. Get out of here. Save your own skin."

"I don't see why I should bother."

"It's not a request. It's an order. There's someone waiting for you to return. Don't you dare make her cry."

I don't even get a chance to reply. Arthur fades away and a whiteness surrounds me.

A moment later I wake up and... Amelia is hovering above me, yelling at my face. Her words are muted at first, as if an explosion sounded off nearby and deafened me, but soon I realize what she's saying.

"Wake up! Get up!"

I blink my eyes quickly and pull myself into a sitting position. Jesus, I nearly let myself give up that easily. Arthur was right, I can't just let myself die! I can't just...

...Uh...

My expression flattens as surprise floods me. To my left, standing a few feet away, is Arthur.

"Yo. You're up." He stands with Excalibur held in one hand, and his kingly attire worn in all of its splendor.

It suddenly occurs to me that it's very quiet all around us. Glancing up, my heart skips a beat as I realize the moon seems even closer than it was before I passed out.

"We're going to die! We have to go!" Amelia pulls me up but even as I stand and tower over her, I keep looking up.

"Why hasn't the moon hit yet?"

"I'm moving the Earth backwards, like you were doing." Arthur smiles pleasantly, as if he hasn't a care in the world. "And before you ask, you're standing inside my Crusader Aura. It usually protects me from most blows, but I extended it to cover all three of us."

I find myself gawking at him for a few seconds. "You're pulling the Earth away? Can you save it?!"

"Not a chance. Even if I'd started when the Moon was first launched, it'd eventually hit. Earth is doomed."

I find myself marveling at how we're having a normal conversation even as impending death is approaching us.

"We need to go. Let's have the talkies when we get back on the Mothership." Amelia pulls at my hand and I nod along slowly, still staring at Arthur in shock.

"You materialized yourself?"

"Yup. I realized the best way to atone would be to make sure Earth's doom didn't also kill our best hero." He smiles at me, then wags his finger. "The girl is right though. We need to go. You two teleport back to the ship, and I'll follow after I release my hold on Earth."

"You're not going to do anything stupid, are you?"

Arthur's smile seems to fade slightly, but maybe it's just my imagination. "No... no of course not. Just go on ahead."

"You're lying... aren't you?" Disbelief floods my mind. He can't be serious. He just lectured me about foolhardy gestures of suicide, but he's going to stay behind?!

"Perhaps." His smile vanishes completely and he takes a few steps towards me. "If you won't go, I'll make you go."

My jaw drops. "You have to come with us, you have to-" He jerks his hand forwards suddenly and taps my chest with one finger. A moment later, Amelia and I both appear on the bridge of the Mothership.

"-survive!" I finish my sentence and stumble forwards in surprise. The sudden appearance on the ship caught me off guard.

Amelia stares at me as I turn to her. "Who is that guy anyway?"

* * *

Arthur stared up at the sky. Somewhere, in a place he couldn't see, his pupil had landed safely aboard his flying space vessel.

It was good knowing you, Jason Hiro.

Earth's doom was seconds away now. The moon's color would change the moment it hit the atmosphere. Once it got that far, it would be too late. It wouldn't take a second longer to hit the ground.

I doubt even you, with all of your power, could change the will of the Creator. That's the thing about time, it's like a river. Your actions are rocks, but time merely flows around you. It simply diverts on its course and continues towards its original goal.

Arthur raised Excalibur into the air, and aimed the point of it directly at the moon.

Perhaps, if you had more power, you could change things. Maybe if you had more energy, it would not be a stone you throw into the water, but a boulder. If you had such power, things might have turned out differently.

Energy began building up at Arthur's feet as he released his hold on the Earth.

You alone have the power to see the flow of time. Someday, if you live long enough, you might figure out how to change the will of the universe. Today is not that day.

The energy surged from Arthur's feet up through his body and into his upraised hand.

They called me a hero. In truth, I was a monster. A killer. All I've ever done with my life is take the lives of others.

Excalibur began to glow as Arthur knelt down to put every last drop of his colossal energy reserves into the sword.

But not you. You can make a difference. You can change things. I will always just be a killer.

The sword vibrated fiercely as energy screamed inside of it.

In the end, that's all I need to do. Stay true to myself. Be a killer.

"I'm coming, Elizabeth. Sorry I kept you waiting."

Arthur reached up with his free hand and wiped away a single tear. He had no reason to be sad. Soon, they would be together again.

In the blink of an eye, the blade fired. The energy shockwave wiped out all life within a hundred miles instantly.

Arthur, the Knight of Camelot, had perished.

Part 372a: Sacrifice

"Time to impact?" Nufaris directed the question to one of his scanning officers. The Executor lightly shifted a familiar memory manipulator from one hand to another, though he always took care to be gentle with it. It was, of course, the key to leading the Volgrim to a better future.

"A minute to impact, though for some reason the planet appears to be moving away from the moon. Our previous predictions were off by several minutes." The scanning officer stared intently at the screen before him, taking careful note of the projections that were coming in real time waves.

"Contact Archjusticar Thrandis." Nufaris sent his order over towards the communications officer, and she complied quickly.

It took only a few seconds for the Archjusticar to appear onscreen. "Executor Nufaris, are we to depart now?"

"No. Stay until the Moon impacts the Earth. Humans can be tricky. If they manage a last second reversal, we need to hit the Moon again to ensure impact. Once the impact is confirmed, activate the sub-light drives and head to the fourth planet. They will face our wrath next."

Thrandis held up three fingers and crossed his thumb over, as was the tradition for respect among high ranking Volgrim. "Understood. Executor, have you any other orders? Our secondary fleet is still waiting to launch from aboard Refuge. We could assist in the battle to thin the herd. The humans may come up with a counter for Refuge once we assault their fourth planet."

Nufaris reached up and scratched his chin. "Earth's moon is massive, it will easily be able to destroy the entire planet. Even with a constant rapid acceleration of both of the fourth planet's moons, they are unlikely to devastate the entire planet. At best, we can target the major population centers, then follow up with an orbital bombardment."

The Executor hesitated, as uncertainty clouded his thoughts. "With that in mind, perhaps keeping the secondary fleet in reserve would be best, saving their weapons for a last minute surprise."

Thrandis crossed his massive arms together across the front of his cream-colored uniform. "Understood, Executor. Once impact has been confirmed, we will move quickly to assault the fourth planet. I contemplate, and I comprehend."

The Archjusticar started to motion to his nearby crewman to cut the connection, but someone aboard the Dolfraxis yelled in alarm. "Executor! I'm detecting a massive energy reading on Earth's surface!"

Nufaris flinched at the news. "Filthy humans, I knew they'd have one last trick. What is it? What's causing the reading?"

He felt slightly worried, but even he knew there couldn't possibly be a way for the humans to save their planet now. Wordsmithing had real, tangible limitations, according to his source.

"It's- it's still charging! Ten seconds to impact from Earth's moon!"

Nufaris's breathing sharpened as the viewscreen changed to show the Moon racing towards certain destruction of the planet.

"Executor! What is going on?" Refuge's commander spoke, but his face wasn't visible on the screen.

"We're working on it. I'll tell you when we-"

"It's firing!" The scanning officer yelled at the top of his lungs. A moment later, five seconds before the moon struck, a colossal explosion erupted from its dark side, and a thin but impossibly fast beam of light shot through the opening.

"Type 3 energy confirmed! It must be from Earth's Supreme Commander!"

Instantly, Nufaris realized the trajectory calculations weren't wrong. "Thrandis! Raise shields! Maximum power! It's going to hit Refuge!"

A moment later, the Moon smashed into Earth.

* * *

" Teleport! Return! " I yell the words, but nothing happens. "He's blocking me out! I can't return to where he is!"

Amelia pulls me by my arm and shakes me roughly. "Stop, Jason! You can't go back there! He told me he wouldn't allow it!"

Her words shake me to my core. "You... knew about this?"

"Of course. He teleported me down there and told me only I could prevent you from going insane! Stop acting so reckless!" She slaps my chest, as if trying to snap me out of a hallucination. "He has a plan to save the Earth... he told me he did!"

So she says... but... that couldn't be true. He told me himself...

I quickly put my hand on Amelia's shoulder. " Teleport. "

We arrive at the Mothership's bridge and are greeted by a familiar face. "Original, you made it!" Sensei breathes a sigh of relief. "I was worried you were going to do something really stupid."

"I almost didn't. Luckily, Arthur stopped me." I pull my hand away from Amelia's shoulder and quickly walk over to the scanning console. "Harold, tell me what's going on down there."

"Arthur?" Sensei seems perplexed and then I remember I never told him about Arthur. Hell, I never told anyone about him.

"An old friend." I keep the answer short, as the countdown timer indicates there's less than a half-minute to impact.

"Thank god, yer back, kid!" Harold's elderly voice speaks directly into my mind, and, despite myself, I can't help but smile. "Yer friend down there, he's doing some crazy stuff! Seems like he's charging up his energy!"

"What? His energy? That doesn't make sense."

And it doesn't. He's often bragged about his ridiculous control over energy, but even if that's true, what's he going to do, blast the moon into a trillion pieces? That will just make a trillion asteroids rain down on Earth and kill everything. It's the same as if the Moon hit Earth intact, and possibly even worse.

Not to mention the energy will probably just be absorbed by the moon and make the impact even faster. What is he thinking?!

"I dunno, kid, but the energy readings are off the charts! It's like he's creatin' a new star on the surface or somethin'."

"Ten seconds to impact." Amelia yells the numbers out, but we all have our eyes locked to the countdown timer anyway.

"What the hell is a pointless sacrifice going to achieve?! He can't save-" I pause midsentence, as something occurs to me. "Harold, what trajectory is Refuge located at?"

The old man brings the numbers up almost at the same time I ask the question, bless his soul.

"He's... not trying to save Earth! He's trying to save Mars!"

A moment later, the dark side of the moon explodes as a blast of energy surges forwards at nearly the speed of light. Two more seconds pass and I realize my suspicions were correct. The Moon smashes into Earth, and a titanic shockwave erupts through space, shoving even our ship off-course. We're over a hundred thousand miles from Earth, and it only takes seconds for us to feel the aftereffects of the impact.

At the same time, the blast of energy streaks through space, careening towards its target at twice the distance from Earth from which the Moon started.

And then it hits.

Nothing happens.

All of us stare breathlessly as the light from the blast fizzles out, the viewscreen indicating it impacted an invisible wall of energy. Refuge's force field... it was simply too strong.

His sacrifice was in vain.

* * *

Nufaris finally let out a breath he had been holding. The unbelievably high density energy beam had been nullified by their inverse polarity field.

Refuge was safe.

"That was far too close for my liking." Nufaris smiled politely as the screen shifted back to Archjusticar Thrandis.

"I agree. We should begin immediate transfer to the fourth planet." Thrandis adjusted the collar on his uniform. "On your orders, Executor."

"As you will. I'm giving you full command of the strike force for the time being. Show humanity the might of the Volgrim."

"I contemplate, and I comprehend." The Archjusticar made a quick gesture and his viewscreen cut off. The Dolfraxis now turned its highly advanced scanning array towards the ravaged planet. Already, several scanners had been knocked offline due to massive electromagnetic interference from the impact, and their ship would face great danger once millions of tons of debris were jettisoned into space and had a large chance of impacting them.

"Impact confirmed. Yotta-joules of energy released from impact. Liquefaction of the planet's crust and mantle is spreading all over the surface. Estimated chance of even a single life-form's survival... 0%."

"Let's not be so pessimistic, officer. I'm sure there will be some bacteria that survive, at least for a while." Nufaris stared ahead blankly as his deadpan humor caused the entire bridge to chuckle for a moment. "Enough of that. We have a war to win. Hail the Supreme Commander's ship. Let's see what he has to say now."

If he's still alive.

Nufaris kept that thought to himself. Who else but the main Jason Hiro would have that much power left over to completely shoot through the inverse polarity field that had surrounded the Moon?"

The viewscreen shifted once again as two of Jason Hiro's clones appeared on the screen.

"My apologies, but I gave you a chance for complete surrender. The destruction of your planet, and your Supreme Commander, is on your hands."

"I'm still alive." One of the clones spoke up, and Nufaris shifted his feet slightly.

Ah, perhaps he didn't die.

"A shame. I assumed that was your heroic last stand. It would seem you're too foolish to die with dignity, as Founder Unarin did when you destroyed his beloved homeworld." Nufaris forced a tight smile, but the edges of his eyes twitched.

"One of my best friends died on Earth today. He died trying to save our kind from you. You started this war, but I'll make sure we end it."

Jason was clearly enraged, but Nufaris' smile faded.

"We started the war? I think not. It was your kind who started this. Your barbarism and intent to destroy us was projected from the very first time we met. Once we've exterminated your filth from the galaxy, we'll be sure to hold a hundred year celebration in memory of your destruction."

Jason's teeth ground together noticeably. "It doesn't matter who started the war. All that matters is who wins. You've got the upper hand now, but I hold the power of a god. Unless you can manage to kill myself and all of my clones, you'll never be able to sleep soundly at night. You'll always know we're out there, just waiting for the opportune moment to strike."

Nufaris kept his expression neutral as he smoothed his shirt down. "Why wait? Teleport over here now and strike me down."

The human didn't respond.

"That's what I thought. You might be a god, but even a god has a crippling weakness. Inverse polaric energy would kill you if you came into contact with it. Perhaps not instantly, but quickly enough. We know your weakness."

Jason Hiro seemed to be struggling to find words to respond with.

Excellent. His indecision proves I'm right. He is terrified of me. He doesn't know how to handle a situation his wordsmithing can't solve.

Nufaris opened his mouth to gloat again, but the viewscreen cut off suddenly and his communication officer whirled around in his seat. "I beg forgiveness, Executor! I cut the feed! Refuge is hailing on emergency channels! Code Theta Prime!"

The highest leader of the Volgrim stiffened. "Onscreen."

Immediately, he was greeted by chaos. Aboard Refuge, all of the crewman were running around the bridge in a frenzy, and it took two seconds for Thrandis to whip his head around and realize the screen was on.

"Executor! It's the apocalypse! The power compensators are overloaded! Our mass stabilizers are overburdened! The polaric field is suffering a critical collapse! Even the warp core is about to breach!"

"What?!" Nufaris reeled and took a step back. "What happened?! Was the station hit by debris from the impact?!"

"No! Executor, we need to abandon ship! That blast of energy that hit us overloaded all of our failsafes! Refuge is-"

The screen cut off and everyone aboard the Dolfraxis stared at the now blank viewscreen in bewilderment, nobody daring to even breathe.

The scanning officer slowly reached over and pressed a button and the viewscreen displayed the pride of the Volgrim army, the battle station Refuge. Explosions covered the surface as every system at once seemed to be erupting with a fiery rage. Ten seconds later, the station's outer hull was replaced with an explosion the likes of which rivaled that of the moon striking the Earth. The station erupted outwards in every direction, all of its pieces being blown to the far corners of the Terran system.

In the vacuum of space, its total destruction made no noise, but the light illuminated the entire room with a white-hot fury.

Not long after, Nufaris stared ahead blankly at the black void of space.

Refuge was gone.

The Executor, highest among all Volgrim, slumped to his knees.

"R... Retreat. Retreat."

The words were barely a whisper.

* * *

Nobody said anything for several seconds. Finally, I broke the silence.

"He... did it. I don't know how... but he did it."

Amelia's lips pursed as she tried to take in the scene before her. "What? What did he do?"

"That blast of light we saw... he must have done something to make their battle station self destruct. I wouldn't believe it unless I saw it myself." I send a quick mental message to Harold and he pulls us away from Earth at high speeds. The planet is a molten hellhole now, and there's no saving it... plus every second we stay close to it is another second a massive chunk of debris might smash us to bits.

The Dolfraxis vanishes as it jumps to warp speed. All over the system, our scanners indicate that other Volgrim ships are leaving in a hurry.

"You did it... Arthur. You did it." I mumble to myself as I walk over and flop into the captain's chair. A goddamn miracle saved us.

I suppose 'saved' is not the right word to use. Earth is gone. The Moon is gone. All we have left is the Mars base. If the Volgrim come up with another planet busting scheme, we lose completely.

"We need to expand." Sensei speaks up, surprising me. He seems to be thinking the same thing I am. "This is no time for us to mope around. The Volgrim are running scared, but once they regroup, they will likely attack again. If they hit Mars, it's all over for us."

Amelia walks over and sits on my lap, leaning back to let her hair fall all over me. "There's still Revival."

Ah, I'd almost forgotten about that. "Right. Hawkeye will be there eventually. I think there's another year or two, and once he sets up a beacon, we can move much of humanity there after terraforming. We can... uh..." I shoot a glance over at Sensei. "You recalled all the clones, right? I hope you didn't recall Hawkeye."

"I didn't. I explicitly left him out of the communication, because if something happened and all of us fell, he could still do something to retain the balance of power. He's a second generation clone, after all. He's only a quarter as powerful as you, and half as powerful as me, but it's better than having none of us around."

"I wonder about that."

The words seem to flee my lips before I think that maybe I shouldn't utter them.

"What do you mean by that?" Sensei shoots me a derisive glance, and I look away from his gaze.

"Nothing. Not much, anyway. I mean... look at this. In the end, we caused the future to happen. We're the cause of Earth's destruction. We pissed off the Volgrim by destroying their homeworld, and they got revenge by destroying ours."

Amelia tilts her head back to look up at me while she lays against my chest. "I don't think so. I think it would have happened no matter what."

I rest my chin on her forehead and wrap my arms around her. "Maybe. We may never know."

A moment later, I feel an odd sensation in my mind, as if someone is trying to contact me telepathically, but the signal is too weak.

I ponder it for a few moments, then realize that since I have wordsmithing, there's an easy fix.

" Boost. "

Amelia and Sensei both glance at me and give looks of curiosity, but I ignore them.

Instead, I focus on the faint voice that speaks to me. Eventually, I perceive a word.

Jason...

I send my own mental response.

Yes, this is me. Who is this?

Several long moments pass and Amelia pulls away from me to stand up and stare. Both she and Sensei seem to realize there's something going on, but they aren't sure what.

You finally responded. The voice is female, and filled with a deep sadness that I'd normally find hard to put into words, had billions of souls not just been lost today.

Who is this?

I shoot the mental question out and wait, before the voice responds again, this time, with more strength.

I'm glad you heard me. It's me... Uzziel. We lost the battle.

My heart suddenly pounds in my chest. Battle?! What battle?! What is she talking about?

Uzziel! Where are you? What's going on?

She's slow to again respond, and I quickly realize why. She's dying.

All the angels are gone. Please... save me...

I don't hesitate. " Teleport. "

* * *

Satan paced back and forth, as steam seemed to come out of his ears. The new labyrinth wasn't quite done, but he supposed it was good enough for an emergency evacuation.

"That son of a slime. Filthy alien. He betrayed me. He betrayed me!" Satan jerked his hand forwards and flung a table nearby through the air, its mottled frame smashing against a wall and dumping assorted items all over the floor.

The demons nearby were packed in tight, but everyone winced at his outburst.

"I warned you not to trust him, love." Belial glided over to him and rubbed his shoulders tenderly. "The Volgrim of today are not the Volgrim we first met. Their leader is no Unarin."

"I know that now! Confound him... he betrayed me. He said he would bombard the human side of Earth and we could take over the planet once they were gone. We had a deal!"

"I suppose he doesn't understand that a deal with the Devil can't be broken." The human Marie paced around nearby, though her angelic counterpart was off somewhere doing experiments and other things. "Maybe he's an atheist."

"Funny." Satan growled at her in a way that clearly indicated he did not find it the slightest bit amusing. "He's lucky I had the new Labyrinth prepared. If I hadn't, all of demonkind would have perished."

"He probably hoped for that." Marie chomped into an apple loudly, her lips smacked as she rolled the sweet, crunchy chunk from one side of her mouth to the other. "Honestly, after today, I don't think he can be called a team player. He probably killed Unarin."

Satan rolled his eyes as he sat down at a chair and put his face in his hands. "Doubtful. Unarin was not like the other Volgrim. He had a special power, some connection to spiritual energy. That's how he managed to escape Heaven after we left him for dead."

"Right. You betrayed him, so now you're shocked his successor would betray you." Marie took another massive bite of her apple. "Mmm, this is juicier than I remember. I'm going to miss home-grown fruit."

"Shut up. I'm going to miss a lot more than that." Satan, the all powerful leader of the demons, sulked to himself and fumed. "I'll make the bastard pay. I swear it."

Belial stopped rubbing his shoulders, walked around, and knelt down in front of him. "Come on, love. Surely you aren't going to target another race for revenge? You finally took out the entirety of angelkind! I was hoping we could finally spend some time together!"

Satan forced a smile through for his beautiful concubine. "The Volgrim are number two on my revenge list. Jason Hiro is in first place."

Marie tilted her head slightly as she polished off the apple and tossed it to the side. "I know you and him have a rivalry, but what did he do to deserve your hate?"

"Plenty. But... not protecting the Earth from the Volgrim... it's unacceptable. If I had his power, I wouldn't be so weak."

"We gave the Volgrim the technology for inverse energy. I made it myself. You know why he couldn't protect Earth." Marie sat back against the desk and shrugged at him. "You shouldn't be mad at him for being unable to protect Earth. The Volgrim were the ones to attack Earth. They violated the deal."

Satan stared stonily at her for a moment before turning slightly to stare at the wall. "You say that, but I'm still mad. I'm pissed. He's too weak... he could have done something."

"Like what?"

"I don't know!...Something."

Satan stood up and patted Belial on the head before storming to the door. "I'm going for a walk. Don't follow me."

"I'm way too lazy for that." Marie smiled sweetly at the massive demon even as he scowled and slammed the door shut behind him.

"I don't know what you see in him." The redheaded human stared pointedly at the seductress.

"I don't know what he sees in you. " Belial rolled her eyes and walked towards a different door, leaving Marie alone with her thoughts.

Part 373a: Styx And Stones

It doesn't get any easier. I always think to myself that after hundreds of years of war and battle, the sight of mounds of bodies will finally stop disturbing me, but it doesn't. There's just a big difference between killing a planet full of people whom you can't see die, and walking onto a fresh field of bodies.

Heaven is... ruined. Completely ruined. The grass that once shone weirdly blue is now burned, with fires far in the distance that I can't even make out. The air is choked with smoke. Angels and demons lie in haphazard piles, each corpse telling a story of its own, of quick battles won in a decisive instant, or long battles that ended in a hard earned victory.

Victory... is this a victory? Without a doubt, the demons won this battle. Hell, they probably won the war. How long will it take the angels to regain their former numbers? Even so, if this is what Satan's end goal was, he truly is the Devil.

Well, I'm a hypocrite. He wanted to, and has all but succeeded in exterminating the angels, while I fully intended to exterminate the Volgrim. I guess I can't fault his logic.

"Jason!"

A male voice in the distance calls out, pulling me away from my thoughts. I squint, even using my Hypersuit's enhanced zoom to hunt for the source, but nothing is immediately visible as the speaker. Only once my positional audio tracking locates the voice does a red dot appear, making me turn slightly to the side. Probably a half mile away, I spot him. An angel, one wing missing, leaning on a long staff, with blood covering his body.

I don't bother trying to walk or run over the bodies, it would take too long. Instead I use my innate site-to-site teleportation and appear next to him instantly, startling the poor guy and making him topple over.

"Sorry. I forget most people aren't used to-" I find my words cut short by the sight that greets me. A half dozen angels are lying on the ground or sitting, all of them in various states of agony. Most of them are mortally wounded and won't have much longer to live if I don't heal them. Unfortunately, I expended most of my remaining energy that I took from the last container, and now there's almost nothing left.

"Oh... you're here." A weak voice speaks and I turn and gawk. Uzziel is being cradled by two other angels. Huge gashes are spread all over her chest, arm, and legs. There are hints of more damage poking out from the backside of her body. These didn't look to me like they had intent to kill, but rather that they were made to inflict maximum suffering.

"Uzziel." I breathe the name out and quickly kneel down. "Stay still. I'll heal you."

Before I can wordsmith, she raises her hand slightly. "Don't... bother. There's no point."

"Of course there is. I'll save as many angels as I can." My gaze hardens as I stare at her. "Don't get mooney with me."

"Jason... there's really no point. You don't understand. They're all gone. All the purebloods... I'm the last one."

Her eyes tear up, but she doesn't have the strength to wipe her eyes. A female angel next to her pulls up part of her bloodstained robe to dab at Uzziel's eyes for her.

"All of them? Every last one?"

"Yes. Even Gabriel... and Zeus. All gone. We lost. Maybe a hundred angels are left, and all are pseudo-angels except me. This is it."

She coughs dryly but doesn't seem to care about the pain. "I sent a few of the converted humans to look for survivors, but they're few, and nearly all badly injured. Even if you save us... there's no point."

I gently put my hand on her shoulder. "You can't think like that. Once humans die again, the pseudo-angels will be replenished. You are an archangel, you can lead them."

She stares at me, and I feel a deep sense of hollowness sent with just a gaze. "Jason... look around you. Think carefully. Earth was destroyed. Where are the billions of replacements?"

It takes me a moment, but slowly I feel a sense of dread come over me. "The resurrection project. It's... gone?"

She closes her eyes and shudders. "Yes. Gabriel was one of the three archangels who created the resurrection project. He was possibly more powerful than Zeus. He sacrificed himself to save what left of our kind. With his death, the project ended."

I slowly sink back and sit down, bowing my head. "This can't be real. Everything... it's all happening like it's been preordained. Earth is gone, the angels are crushed..."

Uzziel surprises me by giggling, a cute feminine sound that is cut short by blood in her throat. "You're funny. Jason, you could save us, but there's no point. All the humans who prayed to us were in the Church of Retribution. They died when Earth was destroyed. We can't replenish our numbers, and we can't regain energy as needed. We're... doomed."

Immediately I lock eyes with her. "Not so. Don't be fatalist. If I can pull out of a crushing depression, so can you. My clones and I have colossal amounts of energy. We can easily keep a hundred angels alive. Just a fraction of my energy would overwhelm all standing here now."

I don't bother telling her that I know this due to Cassiel in the future I come from. Cassiel was a good test subject. Her powers were overwhelming after the amount of energy I gave her. Between all of my clones and myself, I easily dwarf what I had available in the future.

"I don't want that. None of us do." Uzziel slowly reaches her hand over and rests it on mine. "I lost everyone I cared about. All my friends, my brothers, my sisters... they're gone. I don't want to live forever by myself."

"You don't have to. I'll be here. All these angels around you will be your new family."

Her smile brightens. "That's sweet of you... and in the past, I must admit I enjoyed being around you. I even felt a certain feeling when you came up here. I'm glad... to call you friend. But it's not enough, Jason. They're all gone now. I just... can't. I can't do it."

A lump begins to form in my throat, one that won't go away no matter how much I swallow. "Are... are you telling me to let you die? I... can't just do that."

"You can. And you will." She pulls her hand away from mine and her expression becomes more stern. "I am far older than you, Jason. I have the right to choose when I pass on. I know there is nothing but sleep for me... and I welcome it."

"That's it, then? We just part ways here?" I feel incredulous at this point. "What am I supposed to do?"

"You can't stop the future, Jason. Every time you've tried, you've failed. The future is inevitable. It's a hurricane, and you're a tree. You might dig your roots in, but eventually it will tear you from the ground and take you where it wishes. There's no preventing that which has already been decided."

I want to protest... but my mind goes back to Benjamin Brown. It was as if reality itself had to invent new ways to kill him. Almost fifty separate incidents nearly lead to his death, before an accidental electrocution ended his existence. If the universe wanted him dead, then perhaps there really was no way to stop him from dying.

"So this is it, then. Goodbye..."

Uzziel's breath catches in her throat. "W-wait. There's... one more thing. Gabriel, Raphael, and Michael... their rings. I have them."

Her words make me cease to breathe for a moment. "All three of them?"

"Yes. The demons, luckily, failed to take the rings of the archangels from Gabriel when he impaled himself. If they had known the powers these rings held, perhaps our luck would be worse." Uzziel reaches forwards with her other arm, one that's badly gashed up and shows me the three rings she's wearing. "Take them. I can't safeguard my brothers any longer. They would want you to have them."

I reach over and hold her hand, gently plucking the rings from her fingers, one by one. "I understand. I'll take good care of them." My hand hesitates as I notice a fourth ring. "This... this is yours?"

"Yes." She smiles at me sweetly. "As a dying woman, I have only one last wish. I want for you to have my ring as well."

"Oh." I reach up and wipe my forehead. "I don't know... look, why not just let me heal you? You can keep their rings, and when they eventually awaken, you can speak with them again."

"They won't." She whispers it matter-of-factly. "They will only awaken when the time is right. Only when the need is great."

Great. She won't let me save her... no matter what I do.

This sucks.

"Take it with you now." She keeps her hand clasped in mine and gives a light squeeze. "Take my ring with you. When I perish, I will be with you, always."

Her sudden burst of emotion catches me off guard, and I glance up at the faces of the other angels nearby. All of them, naturally are human converts, but they seem to be attached to her. I can tell with a single glance that she is special to them. None of them wants to see her go.

"Fine. I'll do it."

It hurts. The fact that I'm going to let her die means that I've effectively given up, but she's right. At least, with her logic. I can't tell a woman who wants to die that she has to stay alive. She lost everyone she cared about. Forcing her to live in loneliness would only prolong her suffering.

"On one condition. I'm going to save any pseudo-angels that want to stay alive."

She smiles weakly. "I knew you'd say that. You're such a kind human."

I reach down and pull on her ring. "How will I know when you pass?"

"You'll know." She seems unusually reserved, but I'm not sure why.

I pull the ring off and a moment later, she gasps in pain as a surge of energy floods over into the ring in my hand. Her back arches up, and then she flops back down, her eyes fluttering briefly.

"Thank... you... Jason..."

Her eyes close, and then all goes still.

I... I feel so guilty. She didn't tell me merely removing the ring would kill her. Perhaps she lied, knowing that I wouldn't do it if I suspected the truth.

A female angel wipes at her eyes. "We tried to reason with her. We loved her, you know. She wasn't like the other purebloods. She always treated converts as equals. She always called us her good friends..."

I reach over and put my hand on the girl's shoulder. "Don't be sad. She's still alive, here in this ring, and someday, I'll make sure she is with her brothers again."

This seems to comfort the girl, and I quickly stand up and heal everyone around me. "If any of you wants to die, you'll have to do it on your own time. I've lost enough friends today. Come with me and I'll make a safe place for you."

They all nod reluctantly as broken limbs stitch back together and wings repair themselves. "This is the least I can do."

* * *

"It is done!" Hades smiled triumphantly inside of Satan. "A shame we could not finish before the Earth was destroyed, but more humans will surely die over the next few years."

"I can't believe you succeeded. I thought it would take the power of all the archangels." Satan stared at the filthy green river flowing before him. At that moment it was just a trickle, but someday it would be a raging torrent.

"It's not a matter of power or energy. In order to create a system for capturing souls, a death of incredible power, or a torrent of smaller deaths must occur at the same time. This was how Michael's death allowed us to create the resurrection system. He amassed significant power over his lifetime, getting people to pray to him, then he died and released the energy all at once. It was a flawless performance."

"And yet you betrayed him, in the end." Satan smiled to himself. As I willed you to do.

"I know not why I did it, but it felt satisfying." Hades murmured softly to himself. "Your power and methods are exemplary. You are a superior being compared to the gods and archangels."

"Oh, geez, the praise is too much." Satan waved his hand in the air. "You're making me blush."

"I find that hard to believe." The dark archangel simmered quietly. "One approaches. A familiar scent."

"Mmm." Satan straightened up and tilted his head over towards the approaching visitor. "Marie. What are you doing here?"

The redheaded human moved gracefully across the ground, crinkling her nose at the putrid green river. "Satan, what in the seven hells is this filth? I didn't know this labyrinth came equipped with a sewer system, nor that you were fond of inhaling its odors." She pinched her nose and breathed through her mouth for a moment, before sticking her tongue out in disgust. "Blech. I can practically taste death in my mouth."

"I can understand why. This is a river to trap souls, after all." Satan waved his hand in the air, flopping it around at the scene before him. "Welcome to the River Styx."

Marie raised an eyebrow with obvious interest. "Something about that name tells me it's not a sewer system."

"Indeed, it is not." Satan's face grew serious as he contemplated the muck flowing just in front of him. "This is my backup plan."

"Hmm?" Marie walked up beside him and nudged him in the arm, even while keeping her nose pinched. "Do go on, but make it snappy. Every second here brings me closer to death."

"Jason Hiro had several predictions regarding the future. Contrary to his desires, all of them have come true." Satan licked his lips as he stared emptily forwards. "There is only one prediction left."

"Your death. I've heard."

"Yes. My death. If things keep up, I may just die soon. I don't know when, and I don't know how, but it may happen. If I should pass, the forces of Hell will be leaderless, and lost. My careful manipulation that has created elite fighting forces will fall to pieces."

"Mmm. How so?"

Satan scratched his chin, slowly twisting a long strand of hair through his fingers before plucking it out. "I have been able to take the souls of those who die, those not taken to Heaven, and feed their essence to select minions. I have been able to do this thanks to the help of... a friend. For thousands of years, I have given the souls only to those whom I believed would be able to acquire great power. It has taken a toll on me."

Marie seemed unconvinced. "You look fine to me." She grimaced as the acrid fumes were making her eyes water and her throat dry. Just get on with it.

"Not a physical toll, but a mental one. Being a monarch for thousands of years, one that my people have come to fully rely on, has not been easy. I have made costly mistakes that resulted in the deaths of millions, even billions of demons. The guilt weighs on me."

Marie smiled slightly. "Sounds like you plan to die."

"On the contrary." Satan's eyes lit up as he jerked his head to stare at the puny human. "I intend to ascend and leave behind the fears and desires of mortals. This river will continue to do the work of collecting souls. I will leave the trivial matter of deciding who has earned their evolution to my third in command, Diablo. He is one of my most intelligent generals."

Marie stared at the massive demon carefully. "By 'ascend', you mean..."

"You're an intelligent female. If not now, someday you will figure it out."

"I see." Marie turned away from him to stare at the river. I have no idea what this crimson baboon is babbling about.

Satan turned away from the woman. "Once I ascend, I will become an unstoppable force. Only I am capable of this ascension, due to my unique characteristics. Once I take my place as the god of this universe, none will stand in my way."

"What then?" Marie sent a curious glance his way. "Don't you think you'll be bored, after a while?"

"Why would I be bored?" Satan's jaw slackened as he stared at her. "Having unlimited power will be a thrilling feeling, one unlike any other. I will be the first, the last, the omega and the almighty."

"I won't pretend to know what such a feeling is like... but I can only imagine it will be lonely." Marie finally released her nose and sighed deeply, ignoring the fumes she had started to grow used to. "I don't know what you're planning, but I hope for both our sakes you stay sane. Power like what you're talking about can drive a man to incredible fits of irrationality. You might destroy the universe."

"That would be a blessing, in many ways. The universe is full of filth. Humans, Angels, Demons, Volgrim... not a shred of decency among any of us. We would be lucky to be eradicated. Perhaps some alien species exists, far beyond where our eyes can ever hope to see, one that would be able to right the wrongs we've committed."

Marie smirked as she turned to walk away. "Now that, my dear devil, would be a feat worthy of a god. I should like to see that happen someday."

Satan remained silent, and soon she was at the door. "Nice talk, First Emperor. I hope this river thing works out for you. You're a more interesting man than any I've met before."

She left, and soon the Devil was alone with the dark archangel once more.

"It will all be for naught if he succeeds. I must make sure to survive long enough to see this through. If he comes up with a way to kill me, it's all over."

"You won't die so easily." The voice inside of Satan spoke with a tinge of pride. "That human hasn't a hundredth the will you possess."

Satan closed his eyes as an image of a young girl appeared within. "He is not the menace I fear most."

Part 374a:

"Commander Hiro, glad to see you survived." The Bitch of Britannia fans herself onscreen because the ambient temperature in her ship seems to be a bit above normal. Probably some issue with the climate controls. That, or she's having a hot flash, I'm not sure.

"Beatrix. It's been many years since we spoke. How are you?" Both of us ignore the fifty or so angels milling about behind me. I pulled as many survivors out of Heaven as I could find, but it was nowhere near a hundred. This is all that remains of the angelic species, and all of them are human converts.

Normally I'd go to the Bridge or my quarters to talk privately, but the message was flagged as informal, so I decided to have it in the mess hall. Frankly, I'm not in the mood for a serious conversation. I've had enough happen today. At least the mess hall has some soft music playing, it helps with my relaxation.

"I'm fine. Retirement has treated me well." Beatrix reaches down and takes a sip from a fancy Chinese cup in front of her. Knowing her, it's probably tea of some sort. "It appears things didn't go very well over the last twenty years."

"What would make you say that." I respond with a rhetorical question. "Was it the total destruction of Earth, the eradication of the angels, the reappearance of the Volgrim, or the fact they had a Death Star?"

"Don't be a smartass. We have to move past the failures. The good news is that Mars has been a military facility for humanity for a long time now. We have a lot of secret elements at play here." Beatrix sets the cup down and a pleasant expression comes over her face. "We actually had no counter to that battle station though, so it's a good thing you took care of it or we'd all be dead."

Her smile makes me feel unsettled. "Great. Glad to help." I decide not to correct her about who truly destroyed Refuge. After all, that would lead to more questions, and at this point it doesn't matter. I'll make sure Arthur's sacrifice wasn't in vain. "Beatrix... I know you've been in retirement, but-"

She cuts me off immediately. "I returned just in time to crush several thousand Volgrim ships that were launching an assault on Mars. That is all. Don't expect me to fight this war for you. You're the goddamn Supreme Commander, act like it." She leans back in her chair and looks away sullenly. "In the end, they will hate you no matter how you perform."

Her words have an edge to them. She is clearly filled with regret, and the way humanity dropped her during her election all those years ago must have hit her hard.

"I hope you don't blame yourself. There are many people who still respect the Bitch of Britannia. You saved Earth many times during the initial Volgrim invasions."

"I have my supporters, it's true." She turns back to look at me again, but her voice is neutral now. "Doesn't change anything. If I have to fight, it will only be for one reason, and that's to protect my home. Mars cannot and will not be destroyed. The Volgrim will be back, whether it takes one day or one century. If they come, I will fight them."

Relief floods over my face. "That's all I wanted to request of you. I don't want you to lead humanity's forces, and certainly not out of obligation. I just... I want you to be there for the people that believe in you."

"That's all I can do, Jason." Someone whispers something to Beatrix offscreen and she rolls her eyes. "Here we go again. It's always something. Take care of yourself, time traveler. I'll be in touch."

I nod at her and the screen goes blank a moment later.

I'm sitting at my table with a steak meal in front of me, but I barely feel hungry. I cut a piece of the juicy meat only to find myself asking if this is right. All the animals on Earth are gone. All the cows, chickens, cats, dogs... they're all gone. This isn't even a real steak, it's a fake approximation made by a replicator.

All the life on Earth is dead now... and it's because I was too weak. My power is massive, yet insignificant. Compared to the power of all the stars in the universe, I am nothing. Whoever created the universe is far greater than I will ever be.

I stare out the window at the stars and wonder to myself for a while. The Creator... the angels believe he or she existed at one point. Does the Creator still exist? Did they die? Are they in hiding? Why create a universe filled with hate and strife, death and destruction? Why create sentient species that only seek to kill each other?

I'm reminded of a conversation I had a long time ago. Boredom is the true enemy of immortal beings. Supposing someone were powerful enough to create a universe, what could oppose them? What could they hope to learn if they were omniscient? What could they seek to achieve if there was nothing left to achieve? Of what value is a score if you set the standards for that score yourself and you can break it with no effort?

I miss Arthur already.

* * *

Minutes pass, and I'm surprised as someone sneaks up behind me and rubs my shoulders. Of course, it barely takes me a second to realize who they are. "Amelia."

"How did you know?" She asks the question as if there is any other woman who would boldly come up and be intimate with me.

"Lucky guess." I shove a pea on my plate around with my fork, abusing the poor thing with malice in my heart. "They're dead. All of them."

"The angels." She doesn't ask it as a question. Moving around to my right side, she pulls up a chair and sets it right next to me, then sits down and leans against me, putting an arm around my back. "I was really worried about you."

"You had good reason to be. I... I almost gave up." I glance down at her and feel sort of depressed at how she enviously stares at the food on my plate. She'll never be able to appreciate the taste of it.

Amelia is quiet for a few moments. "I did too."

This surprises me. "You did? Why? You're always so cheerful and optimistic."

She shakes her head slowly and buries her face into my arm. "I'm not, actually. I just try to be. There's no reason to be sad or depressed all the time. Sometimes though, I just can't help it."

Amelia... she's never really shown any negative emotions in all the time I've known her. At worst, she might have shown some worry over what was going to happen to me, but not more than that.

"You seem like you're sad now." I leave the statement hanging in the air, and figure that if she wants to elaborate, she will.

She does. "Why shouldn't I be? I liked Earth, you know. I hoped you were wrong about the future. I thought maybe you'd change the future and Earth would be saved."

"It doesn't sound like Earth is the only thing you're worried about."

She pulls her head away from my arm and leans against me more gently now, nibbling on a fingernail. "Well... if you were wrong about the Earth, and the Volgrim... then the rest of the future is probably going to play out too."

"Maybe."

My simple response seems to make her want to keep talking. "If you were wrong about all that, then something big is going to happen. We're probably going to have to fight Satan."

I raise an eyebrow. " We're going to? If you don't fight him, then you won't be the one to kill him. That means that the future will be different."

She's wholly unconvinced. "You really think you can still change the future? Don't you see the futility yet? It's impossible. The future will always fix itself." She smiles wryly. "I mean, think about it. I don't know what your motivation was for traveling back in time, but if you change the past and that motivation changes, you won't have any reason to go back in time. And since you won't have any motivation, you won't go back, and thus you won't change the past anyway."

"You're talking about the Grandfather Paradox."

"Yeah." She loops her arm through mine and smiles up at me. "Don't you see? It's pointless. You can't change the future, because if you could, then you would erase the future where you time traveled. It would break reality."

I nod along slowly and think to myself again about Benjamin Brown. Reality itself fought to make sure he died. No matter how I saved him, or how many times I shielded him from harm, death found a way to come for him. Was he destined to die? Is changing the future futile?

"Human designated Jason Hiro, I have been following your conversation with the utmost interest." The music from the speakers in the ceiling cuts off, and a robotic voice chimes in from the ceiling, causing everyone in the mess hall to stare up in confusion.

Christ. It's Umi.

"Great. Don't mind us, just having an intimate conversation." I mutter the words just barely loud enough for Amelia to hear me, but apparently Umi picks them up loud and clear.

"Do not fret, I will not worry. I don't care about the feelings of an inferior life form in the slightest." Her biting wit makes me grimace visibly. "I am simply here to congratulate you on your recent performance during the destruction of Earth."

Now I'm confused, and so is Amelia. "Uhhh, who's that?" She stares up at the ceiling, baffled at the strange voice speaking from the heavens.

I roll my eyes. "I told you about her once. She's Umi, an artificial intelligence. She claims to be omniscient."

"Huh. Neat." Amelia now is totally mentally disconnected from the conversation we were having. Way to ruin the mood, Umi.

"I am a highly evolved life-form, not an artificial intelligence. From my perspective, you are the artificial intelligences. After all, you have no intelligence to speak of, meaning your definition of the term 'intelligence' is artificial and based on social constructs."

Oh my god shut the fuck up. This computer drives me up the goddamn wall. "Umi, please just get on with it. We're trying to enjoy a meal here."

"That does not seem to be the case. You are merely moving the food around on your plate, while the female homunculus beside you is unable to ingest such substances."

Amelia jerks her head up to look at me. Homunculus? Her lips mouth the words and I shrug.

"Just get on with it!" I yell upwards and realize now everyone in the mess hall is staring at me. Between the angels that arrived, Amelia, and several of my clones, everyone seems to be wondering what's going on. At least my clones understand who she is. This is going to be a pain to explain.

"As I stated, I wanted to congratulate you. You exceeded my expectations with regards to your performance defending planet Earth. You dealt with the first major catastrophe with flying colors."

I stare up at her blankly. "You do realize Earth was destroyed and the angels were basically eradicated, right? I'd hardly call that a success."

"You are correct, however my initial hypotheses substantiated that you were of such inferior intelligence that you would be unable to save all of humanity and all of the angels, leading to the total extinction of both, and there was even a 12.5% chance of you inadvertently eradicating both species yourself. Additionally, due to your sub-par mental acuity, I hypothesized that there was a 2.3% chance you and all of your clones would die during the Volgrim assault. You outperformed my expectations by substantial margins in all categories."

The entire hall is dead silent. Everyone simply stares at the ceiling with their mouths agape, including me.

Finally, after a full five seconds of blank staring, I relent. "Thanks for the praise, Umi. That uh... that really means a lot to me."

Umi makes an odd beeping sound. "I have detected, with a 45% threshold of probability, that you might be acting sarcastic right now."

"Wow, Umi, you're really good at this."

"I have detected, with a 68% threshold of probability, that you might be acting sarcastic."

"Oh my god! Shut up!" I bellow at the stupid goddamn supercomputer and she stops squawking for a few moments.

"That was decidedly not sarcastic. I am taking notes on your odd behavior currently. I recommend a psychoanalyst to determine if there are significant aberrations in your personality matrix." Umi beeps a few times before continuing. I don't bother interrupting, as I'm starting to feel dead inside. "In any case, that was only phase one of the level three calamity that humanity was to face. There is a second phase you must deal with. Based on your superb performance in the first phase, I have every confidence that you will succeed at stopping ten percent of the incoming threats."

Finally, she says something useful and I can wipe the drool from the side of my mouth. "There's more to come? You must mean the Volgrim will return. We'll be ready."

Umi doesn't respond for a few moments, and when she does, her voice sounds really weird. "Hah! That's a laugh! This idiot thinks he can stop them! What a riot! I'll bet he also thinks-" The voice cuts off and Umi's normal voice returns. "Hmm, another anomaly in my personality subroutines. I will have to make some more adjustments. In any case, Jason Hiro, I will wait expectantly on your performance in the second phase."

"Great. Thanks for nothing." I lower my head and lightly bash it on the table in front of me.

"You are welcome." Her voice cuts off and the music continues at exactly the same spot it was before.

Amelia stares at me, dumbfounded. "You want to explain what just happened?"

A quick glance around the hall shows that literally everyone but my clones are looking at me expectantly.

"Not really, but I guess I might as well speak to an audience."

* * *

Nufaris sat on the bridge of the Dolfraxis, staring blankly at the stars that zipped past while his crew moved at warp 6. Putting distance between themselves and the Terran sector was a requirement after what had happened.

His right hand loosely held a small silver dagger, one of exquisite craftsmanship taken from a vault on Volgarius during the evacuation. Few knew of its origins, including himself, but still he admired it. On the handle, a design of a strange birdlike creature was etched, one unlike anything he'd ever seen on Volgarius.

From what he knew about the history of the Volgrim, taken from Unarin's memory recorder and the other top level files Nufaris had been able to access as leader of his race, Volgarius had been a barren planet compared to its predecessor. Volgarius Alpha, the original homeworld for the Volgrim, had been a rich and diverse planet, covered in trees and flowers, teeming with wildlife.

Only due to the incident at Melkian IV... Nufaris shook his head slowly. Humans were supposed to be the evil ones. In truth, after everything he'd learned, Nufaris had grown to loathe the history of his own people far more than any atrocity the humans might have committed.

It's probably for the best they destroyed our homeworld. Many of the weaker elements of our society were purged anyway, and much of our violent history was washed away.

What a history it was. Endless war for thousands, perhaps a million years. His kind had unlocked the secret of immortality, yet their numbers grew too rapidly without the population controls needed to sustain a society of immortals. It was their own undoing in the end.

"Executor, does something trouble you?" The first officer, Velvel, stared over at his commander emotionlessly. "It has been three cycles, yet you have not spoken to the crew other than to give orders."

"So what if I haven't?" Nufaris lowered his head to stare at his dagger. "What does it matter? We've lost. Their numbers are superior. Their technology is our match. They have abilities that bend the fabric of reality." Nufaris spoke softly, so the rest of the crew on the bridge would not be able to discern his exact words. "We were supposed to crush them with the might of Refuge. Billions of our brothers allowed their light to be extinguished so that we would have room to expand the weaponization of the assault platform. Were their deaths not in vain?"

Nufaris tilted his head up and stared back out at the vastness of space. "Unarin made a mistake in choosing me. I should have just taken our people and fled the stars, banishing the rage of our people to the ether. Our numbers would still be vast, and we might have found a planet to colonize. Revenge has done nothing but weaken us. It is a petty emotion, and one we should abolish."

Velvel sat quietly for a minute or so as both of them took in the serenity of the universe around them. "I am not so certain. The humans have not abandoned their emotions. They still have fear, anger, sadness, revenge, love, and many others. We consider them to be unenlightened, yet they have only lost to us in small ways, and crushed us in bigger ways. Indeed, we have destroyed their homeworld, as they destroyed ours, yet they can easily create a new planet suitable for life. They will rebuild and survive. We will stagnate."

Nufaris finally turned to look at his first officer, surprise in his eyes. "You're suggesting that they have something we don't."

"Only that emotions have not weakened them. Perhaps emotions have costs that are too great for a species to survive, but we would be deceiving ourselves if we said that a lack of emotions has made us stronger. Further, the lie would have a second layer of complexity to it, as revenge is an act, but one that we take in pursuit of emotions. To pursue revenge for the destruction of Volgarius, we must first admit that the loss of our homeworld angered us, and that it saddened us. After that, we must make the decision to assault the humans, in order to make them feel the same emotions we once did."

The first officer smiled, an expression he had never shown in front of the Executor. "In the end, we are lying to ourselves. We are only pretending to show no emotion. We still feel them, and perhaps more strongly than the humans do. I think that if you were to take any course of action now, it would be to allow our kind to stop lying to themselves."

Nufaris raised an eyebrow as he glanced around the ship. None of the other Volgrim were watching him, and none could hear this conversation, yet he felt as if all of their attention was on him.

"What should we do, then? How should we pursue such a course of action?"

"We prepare for a final assault against the humans. This will be the last one ever. We will surely perish, but we will make them feel our wrath." Velvel's smile tightened as his fist clenched and his arm trembled. "I... I lost many members of my house when Volgarius was destroyed. Friends. Family. I have never forgotten them. I will never allow myself to forget those emotions I experienced. If you asked me to commit a suicidal attack on the humans, I wouldn't hesitate."

The Executor allowed himself to smile too, though it was a forced expression. He merely wished to test out how it felt. "I laughed when we crushed Earth into dust. It was a feeling I would love to experience again."

"Executor, there is..." The communications officer spoke up suddenly, alarm in his voice. "...a call... on the subspace relay. This signature though, it's being broadcast on a channel I don't recognize."

Velvel and Nufaris shot a look at each other before glancing at their respective holopads.

"This encryption key. I recognize it." Nufaris breathed quietly. "P-patch it through. It must be a mistake."

The viewscreen on the bridge activated and a gasp erupted through the hall as the face of the former highest ranked Volgrim appeared.

"First Founder Unarin!" Velvel exclaimed in surprise as he leaned forwards in his seat. "We thought you had passed during the assault on Volgarius!"

The First Founder stared directly at Nufaris silently, as a strange looking bipedal automaton came into view. "I've been busy. Nufaris, I see you've gotten my people into a fine mess."

Nufaris opened and closed his mouth, as he stared not at Unarin, but the robotic lifeform beside him. "That's... that's..."

Unarin shook his head slowly. "This is not a Sentinel. This is the second version of the Gatekeeper protocol. I presume you have reviewed my memory logs?"

Nufaris lowered his head and stared at the floor. "I have. You... you wouldn't really reactivate the Sentinels, would you?"

"I would, I could, and I did." Unarin pursed his lips. "I expected things to turn out in the way they did. However, I have returned and as such I will be taking over the leadership of the Volgrim."

Unarin started to say something else, but he frowned instead. "Where are the other Founders?"

Executor Nufaris, current highest ranked of the Volgrim, felt a cold terror wash over him. "Th-they perished. An accident aboard Refuge during a routine maintenance test, several orbital cycles ago."

Unarin's eyes narrowed ever so slightly. "You would lie to the most powerful of all Volgrim? Foolish. I had thought better of you."

Nufaris stood up from his chair and glared at the First Founder. "How dare you call me a liar! You are a hypocrite! A usurper to that title! You are not the most powerful of the Volgrim!"

If Unarin was surprised, he kept it well hidden. "I am now. Step down, Nufaris. If you do not, I will make you."

The Executor slowly sat back down and glanced to the side. Every officer on the bridge was looking from him to Unarin, wondering what would happen.

I can't sacrifice the future of my species on petty power squabbles.

Nufaris sighed. "Do as you will. I hereby hand the power of the Volgrim back to First Founder, Unarin."

The first founder raised an eyebrow. "That's 'Executor Unarin', Elder Nufaris. Since I am the final remaining Founder, it makes little sense for me to have a numerical title. But then, I suppose that's why you changed your title too, isn't it?" Unarin's tongue snaked out of his mouth as he licked his lips. "I will get to the bottom of this, and then I will crush the humans."

The bridge was silent as the video feed cut off, leaving all to look from one Volgrim to the other, wondering what would happen next for their kind.

Part 375a: Dark Horse

April 11th, 2123.

It's been about two years since the Volgrim destroyed Earth. Still, they have yet to return. Once upon a time, today would have been celebrated as an Easter Sunday, but that is not what humanity does anymore. We no longer hold holidays or celebrations, as those were part of the old world. January 6th is the only day that we might call a holiday, but instead it is a solemn day... a day of remembrance. The day an alien menace stole forty billion lives from the collective numbers of humanity.

Earth... it's not a real planet anymore. It has long since cooled from the impact, aided by my wordsmithing, though now it's nothing but a scorched rock. The atmosphere is almost entirely gone.

My feet feel a crunching sensation as I walk across the barren planet, with Sensei and Amelia behind me. We can't hear the sound our boots make though, given there's nothing to transfer the sound in the near-vacuum of space. Amelia, interestingly, is wearing a hypersuit now. She wanted to come along, not that I could blame her. She loved this planet, as did I. Truth be told, I might be lying to myself about that little fact. If I loved the planet so much, why did I live aboard the Mothership?

Maybe I knew Earth was going to be destroyed. Maybe I wanted it gone. I don't know, but the fact is that what's done is done.

Sensei breathes slowly inside his hypersuit, as the audio transmitters between the three of us allow us to speak to one another. "Any sign of it?"

"Still looking." I curse Locate's fallibility in this instance. Locate isn't useful when the inanimate object we're looking for is buried under perhaps thousands of tons of rocks and debris. The Moon crashed directly onto this area, after all. Even the crown, which once helped me locate several powerful artifacts in the Labyrinth, is of no use here. Perhaps Arthur used his magic to hide the damn thing so we couldn't find it.

"Are we even in the right spot? Everything looks the same." Amelia groans as we walk around. No mountains are visible, the ground is scorched black as far as the eye can see, and the only thing that stands out are plumes of lava that shoot up into the sky, many miles away.

"Harold says he did a calculation based on the planet's orbital cycle, our approximate location compared to the Equator, and several other things I didn't understand. Arthur's blast came from around this area somewhere. We may have to dig to find Excalibur."

"Oh sure, let me just grab a friggin' shovel." Sensei grumbles under his breath, but we all hear him anyway, thanks to Centurion.

"I could try and wordsmith it out of the ground, but I'm not sure how to do that when Locate isn't telling me exactly where it is. Even my spherical vision can't penetrate this much rock and dirt."

Amelia comes to a stop and turns around to look at me. "Jason, listen... I know that guy was your friend or whatever, but it's just a sword. You can make one that looks just like it."

I nod slowly but lower my head. "Yeah, I can, but I can't replicate its magical properties. The sword itself is possibly the strongest magic weapon in the universe. In Arthur's hands though... his control over energy made it unstoppable. You saw what he did to Refuge."

Amelia shrugs and turns back to walking. Frankly, I find it weird that she doesn't remember Arthur at all. She once told me that Leviathan degrades her memory over time, but this is ridiculous. He's also confirmed to me that while she suffers deleterious memory degradation, he does not. And if he doesn't, then why hasn't he reminded her of who Arthur is?

Maybe Leviathan just doesn't care. Perhaps he's growing weary of the constant fighting, and doesn't like to see her consumed with anger or sadness. It's true though, she's much happier now than she was in the future that I came from, but I do still worry about her. I feel as if she carries the guilt of Earth's destruction on her shoulders, even though it wasn't her fault. She had no way to stop it.

Well, she didn't... I don't know about that Leviathan though. He told me once that the power of Wordsmithing was nothing compared to his own abilities. Seems like a cocky statement to me, but what the hell do I know?

Amelia finally sits down on a small boulder barely sticking out of the grounds and moans loudly. "We've been out here for hours! This is pointless! We're never going to find it! I'm bored!"

Sensei tilts his head away and chuckles, but I ignore him. "Just a bit longer. We need to find that sword."

Amelia leans back on the rock and stretches for a solid three seconds before standing back up again. "All right, but I'm going back to the ship. I wanna take a nap."

Amelia's not usually one to sleep in the middle of the day, but she can get cantankerous when she's bored. "Sure. Sensei and I will keep looking a bit longer."

Amelia starts to say something but yelps as the ground beneath her crumbles slightly and she falls back, plopping her back against the rock and rolling off it. "What the heck?! This ground is weird!"

"That's to be expected. No human has ever walked on soil in this condition before." I smile at her little stumble, but then I give pause as I stare more carefully at the spot her foot sunk into. "That patch of ground... it looks off color, as if it was dug up."

Sensei nods and quickly walks over to it. "The coloring is certainly different. And this boulder, we haven't really encountered any whole rocks up to this point. That seems rather suspect."

All three of us look at each other for a moment before quickly stepping back. I aim my innate telekinesis at the rock and lift it up, ripping it from the ground and moving it a few feet away to the side.

Amelia walks up to the small crater and gawks at it. "Holy moly! There's a narrow hole that goes way down!"

I walk up to it and stare in disbelief. "This hole isn't natural. Someone must have dug it themselves."

It's a small hole, probably big enough for a small child to fall into if they weren't being careful, but too small for even Amelia to fit into. However...

" Shrink. " I utter a single word and feel my body and the hypersuit decrease in size until I'm about a quarter of my usual height. "I'm going to jump in."

Sensei nods at me but raises his palm up. "Wait, it's going to be pitch black in there. You'll want to make sure you can see around you."

It's then that I remember Sensei's body is always glowing. He never turns his glow off and usually wears a hypersuit to hide it, but I've seen him a few times without the suit. I'm not quite that scared of whatever hit him though.

"You're right. Illuminate. " I decide to make my armor itself glow as I look way up at the mountain of a man that I call my clone. "I'll be right back."

Walking over, I stare down into the hole and feel slightly anxious. It's not that I'm claustrophobic or scared of the dark, but I get the heebie jeebies when I think of big spiders or something being down in there. It's stupid, because those don't exist, and they couldn't have survived the Moon's impact, but the human mind can be irrational.

Also, I'm totally not scared of spiders.

Definitely not.

I hop down into the hole and feel a wave of panic as more than a second passes, then two seconds. My speed is increasing, and the drop is way further than I expected.

Four seconds. Five. Six.

It takes almost ten seconds before I feel my insect brain scream in terror as the ground rushes at me.

Wham!

I smash into the ground with a heart-wrenching impact, though I'm perfectly fine thanks to the Hypersuit. When I raise my head, I can't see the sky outside at all. It's pitch black.

"I'm in."

I speak into my mic, but only get crackling in response. I guess even advanced technology will have a hell of a time piercing that much dirt and rock.

"Centurion, how far below the surface are we?"

The AI doesn't even hesitate. "ROUGHLY 1,300 FEET BELOW THE SURFACE, OR ONE QUARTER OF A MILE."

Great, at least I'm not totally alone down here. I still have my artificial friend, and he's such a conversational fellow.

A quick glance around surprises me. My armor illuminates quite a large half-spherical cavern, one that is totally flat underneath me, and almost perfectly circular above.

In fact... this isn't 'almost' perfectly circular, it is perfectly circular. I take a few step forwards as I'm looking around and feel my foot kick something.

When I look down, I feel a rush of emotion overcome me. Arthur's body... it's right here, just in front of me. I didn't see him when I landed, but his body is in fairly good condition, as if the vacuum here and the lack of insects and critters preserved him. His skin is still starting to degrade but... he's in... relatively good condition.

He's dead though.

Absolutely, totally dead. He's gone. There isn't a chance I can bring him back.

I kneel down and touch his shoulder. "Arthur... I know you can't hear me but... I'm glad you found peace at last."

Just a few words. That's all I can do. I ponder for a moment if I should take his body somewhere and bury him, but I guess this is the closest thing to a tomb he'll be able to get anyway, and he's buried on the planet he died trying to save. It's fitting in a way. His body must have survived the Moon's impact thanks to that aura he told me about.

He really was a tough son of a bitch.

After dwelling on what to do with his body, my heart suddenly turns frigid as I take a step back in shock.

Excalibur is gone. Someone has taken it.

Who? Who would do that?! How would they know about it?

I know why they would, after all. If they knew about Excalibur, then they would know about its power. If Satan could overcome its demon-slaying properties, then in his hands it would be a fearsome weapon.

Could Satan survive in the vacuum present on Earth? I find that hard to fathom. Satan may be a demon, but even he needs air to breathe.

Heh, actually, that's an interesting thought. If I do end up fighting him, that might prove useful to remember.

No! Wait! Stay focused! Someone took Excalibur, but who? Who would do such a thing?

I don't know. There's too many possibilities. Whoever it was, they'd need the technology to survive in a total vacuum. Shit, that might even make the Volgrim a possibility, or someone among humanity.

I'll have to worry about it later. For now...

" Return. "

I teleport back up to the surface and the other two jerk back in surprise. Sensei is first to speak.

"Did you find Excalibur?"

"I found Arthur. Excalibur wasn't with him."

Sensei stares at me, though I can't see his expression inside the Hypersuit. "Someone took it, then."

It wasn't a question. Both of us share a thoughtful nod.

"We need to find out who. The last thing we want is a surprise on our hands, especially at an inopportune moment."

Amelia shakes her head. "Maybe one of your clones took it? Did you ask anyone before you left?"

I shoot a glance at Sensei, but quickly wave the thought off. "Unlikely. I kept Arthur a secret from everyone. Even Sensei and you didn't know until Arthur blasted the Moon. The number of people who even knew of his existence were small, though if one person knew, they could have leaked the knowledge to someone else... but... then again..."

A thought disturbs me. " Locate. " I mentally aim my mind at Arthur's body, and am able to sense him immediately. " Locate. " I aim my mind at Excalibur, but find nothing.

Sensei realizes what I'm doing. "Excalibur is totally gone, isn't it?"

"Someone might have taken it and put it inside an anti-energy field. I can't locate things inside of those."

A small wave of anger fills me. If I had tried looking for Arthur sooner, I might have been able to find him. Instead I focused on Excalibur, thinking that it would be beside its owner anyway, and that Arthur's body would have been blown away by the Moon's impact.

Then again, I've been looking for Excalibur since shortly after we finished relief efforts. Someone must have taken it immediately after the Moon impacted, or right around the time I cooled Earth down.

The three of us stand in our small circle and slowly wonder about this theft. Who could the culprit be?

* * *

Hawkeye stood before the crew of the first exploration vessel of the Planet Revival team and smiled proudly. "This is it, guys! Just twenty more minutes, and we'll finally arrive at our destination!" He held the glass in his hand up, as did the entire audience of four hundred.

"It's been a long time comin'!" A crewman yelled out and everyone nodded along with him.

"Well said! We're gonna make history!" Another female staffer cheered and the mood became more energetic.

Hawkeye's smile faltered. "Let's not be too cheerful now. This is a grand day in the future of humanity, but we can't forget the true importance of this mission. Earth, as we all know, was destroyed by the Volgrim two years ago. This planet means a new beginning for humanity. Mars is merely a substitute, but it will never be able to house humankind as Earth once did. It's far too remote from the sun, and its seasons are chaotic. Even with terraforming, we are only making it's hellish landscape more bearable."

He strode forwards and turned to gaze out the forward viewport at the stars racing past them. "I come from a future ruled by tormentors and devils. I come from a future in which the demons placed humanity into small bubble worlds, leaving them as toys for the demons to lord over and tear to shreds when their homicidal urges needed a release. I come from a future where humanity had only just started to fight back... and we were winning."

Hawkeye lowered his glass and took a sip. "But it was a series of hollow victories. What good is a victory when there is no prize? Earth was already destroyed, humanity was still trapped in an endless hell, and the demons were an unending torrent. For every demon we killed, ten more sprung up in their place. Perhaps, given time, we could have found a way to counter them, but... I doubt it."

The entire crew's mood was sullen now and the cheering was nonexistent. Everyone listened to the clone of the Supreme Commander with rapt attention, for none wished to interrupt.

He turned back to stare at the crowd, seeing all those same familiar faces among him that he had grown used to over the last several years. Only one face wasn't there, but she had long since met an unfortunate accident.

"Some of you may find this hard to believe... once, I was a young man, and I was... alone. I had no friends, no drive, no energy. I had no reason to live, and allowed myself to be cryogenically frozen for the sake of science. I did this because I believed that my life was worth so little, that if I died during my freezing, at least it would aid the knowledge of mankind in some small way."

Hawkeye felt tears well up in his eyes, but he quickly turned and wiped them away. "I no longer feel that way anymore. I have friends here, people that I have learned about and lived with for half a decade. I know the names of every person aboard this ship. I know the life stories of most of you, and even some things I'd actually rather not have learned." He tilted his head back and glanced at the head engineer. " Why did you have to tell me about your foot issues?"

The man smiled nervously as the crew chortled to themselves.

"But really, this is what it comes down to. We aren't just making a habitable world, we are going to fundamentally alter the course of history. The Original, the one I am cloned from, has given up. He does not believe history can be changed, but I do! If we can create a world far from the reach of the demons and the Volgrim, one that we can enhance over time and make into an impenetrable fortress, the demons will never be able to hurt humanity again! They won't be able to stop us! We will expand and colonize the galaxy!"

He took a breath and smiled. "Well, possibly the whole universe, but let's call that a long term goal."

A few people chuckled at him, but it was all in good fun. Everyone aboard Exploration Vessel 1, the U.S.S. Stonewall knew that their commander was a man with a heart of gold. He truly cared about them and would ensure their safety, no matter what.

"Ten minutes, commander!" A man turned to look at Hawkeye from his station at the monitoring array, excitement filling his eyes. "We're almost there!"

"That we are." Hawkeye raised his glass up one final time. "A toast! To Earth! To humanity! To the future of civilization!"

"Hear hear!" The crowd cheered again as they clinked their glasses among one another and swallowed their drinks in one or two gulps.

Hawkeye walked over to the officer at the monitoring array and leaned over to look at the scans. "Are the preliminary scans available yet?"

"Yes, sir." The officer tapped a few buttons and an image of Revival appeared, its green atmosphere hazy and difficult to make out given the fact they were still just under a light-year away. "I'll have more detailed scans available in a minute or two, sir."

"Keep me posted." Hawkeye walked away from him and over to the new head of the medical section, Beverly Cruz.

"Commander, that was an excellent speech you gave." She smiled demurely at him and he smiled back. "It really got my blood pumping."

"Down, girl. There's still a chain of command here, and we've got the whole crew watching." Hawkeye lightly touched her arm and she casually looked away, as if she didn't care at all.

"Oh, you're such a charmer. After the celebrations, why not come by the medical bay and I'll give you a checkup?"

Hawkeye puffed out his lips in a mock display of pouting. "But... but Miss Cruz, you've already given me so many checkups this month. Can't I catch a break?"

She leaned towards him seductively and lightly touched his chest. "You're too big and strong to catch a break. I'll be seeing you, commander."

She started to walk away, but a loud cry of surprise erupted from the monitoring array, as the officer turned back and yelled at Hawkeye. "Commander! Scanners have detected multiple unidentified objects in orbit around the planet! Something is already there!"

Hawkeye's expression darkened in an instant as he walked over to the scanning section. "Put it onscreen."

The screen lit up and zoom was enhanced to maximum levels, but Hawkeye could barely make out the blurry mess. "Pull us out of warp. Keep us on the edge of the star's system. I need to contact home base."

They dropped out of warp, but the officer's voice quickly filled with dread. "Something is scanning us! Attempting to block- ah, it succeeded! This... this is..."

Hawkeye took a sharp breath as he stepped away from the screen. "Volgrim. They... they knew about this planet? How? How?! We need to get out of here!"

The communications officer just a few stations away spoke up, her voice nearly a whisper. "Commander Hawkeye... we're being hailed."

Hawkeye didn't even get to give an order as the screen lit up, a face appearing before him and all the rest of the crew.

He fell to his knees. "Unarin... you're alive?! You were supposed to have died when Volgarius-!"

Unarin interrupted him. "Talk is cheap. Your vessels are mine now. Resist, and you'll pay the price."

The video feed shut off and the monitoring officer nearly jumped out of his seat. "Ten bogeys on the way! The Volgrim are sending ten heavily armed interceptor-class warships right at us!"

Hawkeye glanced around him, taking the scene around him in a second. This was an exploration vessel. It had no weapons at all, other than mining lasers. All his friends would be slaughtered if the Volgrim caught them. That, or they'd be imprisoned and tortured.

Beverly...

He turned to gaze at the woman he loved. Fear was on her face, and the crew around him stared, trying to figure out what their brilliant commander would do.

"Warp 8, get us out of this system. Burn all the emergency Trifrancium, go as far as we can, then I'll open a portal back to Earth and seal it behind us. It's... it's the only way."

"Affirmative!" The navigation lieutenant relayed the orders to the rest of their ships, even as a hundred other blips appeared on their radar, rushing towards them from Revival.

Hawkeye's heart filled with rage. How did they learn about our expedition?!

A moment later, the ship blasted to warp speed.

If there is a god, spare my crew!

* * *

Unarin gazed evenly at the image of the fleeing ships, as a seven foot tall metal being walked up to him. "Executor, the human ships have jumped to Warp 8. Based on our preliminary scans of their fuel reserves, we anticipate they will flee to within a few lightyears of this planet and create a portal to return to Earth."

He turned to look at the automaton. It had a decidedly feminine appearance and voice modulator, which made sense given he had deliberately uploaded the brain of his female assistant Muuxunu into it. Still, she had not complained. She understood what her purpose was, and she was glad to fulfill the orders asked of her by the highest authority of the Volgrim.

"As expected. Humans are nothing if not cowards. They only fight battles they know they can win, or they fight if cornered. They always flee when a true threat appears."

The Executor tilted his head towards a bio-pod that held the body of a Volgrim he had once considered worthy of being his successor. "What say you, Nufaris? Should we pursue them? They're showing the same cowardice you did when you fled their system."

Unarin let a smile trickle across his mouth. "Ah, I had nearly forgotten how hard it must be to speak in your position. Unending mental torture for the rest of eternity, so long as that pod draws power. Never mind, it wasn't a question anyway."

He turned back to his metal assistant. "Gatekeeper, order our interceptors to jump to Warp 9.3. Locate the humans' probable exit point, and lie in wait half a light-year away. When they open the portal..."

She nodded. "Understood, Executor. We will prepare the energy enhancement tunnelers at once."

Unarin turned back to his screen. "So sharp. That's why I chose you, of course. That and your limitless loyalty. Unlike... a certain other traitor."

He stared stoically at the screen before him, even as the planet's raging methane storm buffeted his facility. Images of his brothers and sisters, his fellow founders appeared unbidden in his mind. "Trayza... Cinculu... Cuanali... I will not forget you. Your valiance during the Great Wars allowed us to reshape our society, but you were cast away by... by this backstabber. And... Doseña..."

He lowered his head and stared at the ground. "I am a hypocrite. I cast you aside when I no longer needed you, yet now I wish for your company again. I can only pray the humans gave you mercy in the end... the mercy the true leader of our people deserved."

The Executor raised his head up. "Gatekeeper, tell me... have you taken any time to read the material we downloaded from humanity's archives?"

His assistant stared ahead silently for a few moments. "Affirmative. What material would you like to peruse, Executor Unarin?"

Unarin's mouth slowly crept into a toothy smile. "Tell me the human's story about the Trojan Horse."

Part 376a: Mulgris

Amelia held the plate of mashed potatoes in her hand and scrunched up her nose, glancing at the door to make sure Jason wasn't walking in. Sitting on her bed inside of her private quarters aboard the Mothership, this was one of a few private places where people would at least knock before entering, but this was a sacred ritual and one she had felt nervous about since she first started performing it. Her heart pounded as she reached over with a fork and tentatively lifted a small amount of the white mush and raised it to her lips.

"H-here goes..."

She opened her mouth and quickly stuck the food inside, closing up and chewing slowly as the nausea came to her in waves. Finally, she swallowed and her entire body shook as she forced herself not to tear up again.

"You really shouldn't force yourself, princess." The dragon inside of her sighed slowly. "I don't see why you do this."

Her lip quivered and she lowered her head and blinked hard before raising it back up. "This is for a good reason... Levy. I can't eat with my husband. Just once... I want to sit and eat like a normal person."

"Mmm." Leviathan kept his disapproval to himself. "You're certain he's tried all the possible words?"

"Yeah." She stared in disgust at the lump of juicy steak on her plate and gingerly pressed the fork down on it sideways, carefully tearing off a small piece. "It just doesn't work. Not 'taste', not 'fix', nothing. Every synonym in the book."

She raised the meat to her mouth and the stench of the filth almost made her recoil in disgust. "I don't get it! I could devour a human at one point, but this piece of cooked meat is so gross!"

Leviathan watched silently as she quickly jammed the meat in her mouth, almost breaking the fork as she did so, before yanking the implement back out and barely keeping the chunk of animal flesh in her mouth. This time, her eyes did water. Meat was really the worst. Not just because it tasted terrible like all the other food, but because meat especially reminded her of her life before Jason, and the guilt always came back in overwhelming waves of pain.

After barely chewing it twice, she swallowed and choked, grabbing a glass of water nearby. Thankfully, water didn't affect her, but she simply didn't usually need it. Now was different, as she chugged the glass down and sighed with relief.

"Why can't the food just taste like water? It would be so much better."

The dragon inside of her appeared in her mind's eye and raised a massive eyebrow. "That would be possible, you know. He could wordsmith the food to taste like that."

Amelia stared blankly ahead for a few moments before setting the plate down beside her. "Oh. That's uh... smart, actually."

"I'm an ancient dragon, millions of years old. I should hope so." Leviathan seemed to sink inside of her for a moment as he contemplated something. "I am... fearful."

"Hmm? Why?" Amelia rubbed her belly, the spot where she always 'felt' Leviathan inside of her.

"Jason seems to have given up hope on changing the future. He seems to believe that you will kill Satan and that will be the end of it."

"And you don't think it is?" Amelia flopped backwards and laid down on the bed, while her legs continued to hang off the side. "I still recall you have a personal grudge against that demon. Wouldn't you like to settle it, once and for all?"

Leviathan hesitated before responding. "That grudge... it is from thousands of years ago. I have said this many times, princess. I do not care about such old trifles. Besides, I am not so certain that in your current state you could defeat him."

Amelia glared at the ceiling above her. "You don't believe in me? Rude! I'm way stronger than Jason, you know! He told me he nearly defeated Satan once."

"Not he, but his hypersuit. Jason was also essentially killed by Satan. I would hardly call that a resounding victory." Leviathan stewed for a moment. "There is... also the matter of the Satan I knew, a young whelp with a dark future before him, and the leader of the demons that he has become. He has had thousands of years to mature his abilities. The gift of evolution, I gave that to him. I enhanced his abilities, thinking only of how he would keep his promise and free me, but deep down I knew he would not."

Amelia was incredulous. "You think he's more powerful than you after all these years?"

Finally, Leviathan burst into a fit of laughter. "Ha! Hahaha! I wouldn't say that for a second! Not a chance!" His deep voice bounced around in her mind, echoing like an organ in an empty church. "But, while he could never possibly hope to defeat me, by the same metric, my powers that flow inside of you are necessarily weakened due to your small frame. If I were to channel all of my power inside of you, your mind would snap. You would not be the one that I have grown to-

Leviathan stopped talking and suddenly seemed bashful. "Never mind. In any case, facing him as you are would likely end in defeat. Think too of Jason's feelings. If Satan were to kill you, how would Jason feel? Would you want him to be crushed by grief?"

Amelia sat back up and scratched the back of her head. "I think you're being overly dramatic. Think, Levvy! If I'm alive in the future, and time is clearly continuing to move towards the future that Jason comes from, then I can't die! If I die, that's a paradox!"

"The grandfather paradox, yes, so I've heard. I'm not convinced. Unlike the demons, I am capable of understanding complex theories. Time travel is riddled with uncertainty and guesswork. Never assume anything is true until you have confirmed it for yourself."

Amelia stood up, ignoring the food and leaving it sitting there. "We'll worry about that stuff when the time comes."

Briskly, she walked over to her dresser and pulled out her little blue hair bow, the one Jason always smiled at. She was a woman after all, and she could tell with the subtle glances he gave her what he liked and what he didn't. Words weren't necessary.

After adjusting it in the mirror, she walked out the door and locked it behind her. "I wonder where he is."

Leviathan sent out a cursory search pulse. "The bridge. As always. That male is quite the lazy workaholic."

"That doesn't make any sense."

"He doesn't make any sense." The dragon grumbled to himself and Amelia skipped along down the corridor, occasionally using her superhuman speed to dash down a straightaway when nobody was looking. It wasn't that she was afraid of being seen, it just didn't seem ladylike to appear to be in a rush.

A few minutes later, she arrived on the bridge. "Yoo-hoo! Jason!"

Her voice lilted cutely, but after taking a few steps forwards, she quickly realized she had stumbled into chaos. People were moving around in a hurry, and the viewscreen was lit up with one of Jason's clones.

"We don't have time! Hurry up and open the wormhole! They'll be here in less than a minute!" The clone onscreen was sweating profusely and he seemed extremely frightened. "They're going to blow us out of the air! We can't fight with ships like these!"

"Calm down, Hawkeye. Make sure to set a waypoint. Once we pull you through and close the wormhole, we'll be able to open another one there later on once our forces are prepared."

Jason's right hand was curled up in a fist and he was gritting his teeth. Obviously something serious was going on.

"Jason? What's happening?"

He barely glanced at her. "Not now! This is a crisis! Hawkeye, on my mark, I'm going to have all the clones wordsmith at the same time! Get ready!"

Amelia looked around in confusion and quickly darted over to a terminal showing a readout of the conversation log. Using her superior mental acuity, she sped through the words and turned back to stare at the viewscreen in shock.

Leviathan had read it as well. "An ambush at Revival. Even I didn't anticipate this. The Volgrim are not to be trifled with."

"How did they find out about the planet?" Amelia asked the question quietly, but didn't expect an answer. Everyone was far too busy.

"Now! Wormhole!" Jason bellowed as did five other clones on the bridge and many others across the cosmos. The viewscreen switched to a half view of Hawkeye and another half of the wormhole opening up beyond the orbit of Pluto, its size quickly scaling to be big enough for a Cruiser-class starship to fit through.

Jason and his clones stumbled forwards and gasped as a flood of energy left their bodies. "There! It's open! Get through now!"

He didn't have to ask twice. Amelia watched several other screens that showed Hawkeye's exploration force quickly rush towards the portal at maximum impulse speeds, even as multiple red dots rushed towards their location.

A moment later Hawkeye's eyes were frantic. "We're through!"

Jason and his clones yelled out again. "Seal!"

Amelia breathed a sigh of relief as the hole in space rapidly shrank behind the exploration force. "That was a close one."

Everyone in the room breathed a little bit easier as the hole that would have let the Volgrim invade sealed up behind the exploration force.

"Well done, guys." Jason smiled jovially at everyone around him. "Let that be a lesson, never underestimate the intelligence collection capabilities of the Volgrim. I don't know how they found out about Revival, but now that they've taken control, we'll have to look elsewhere to-"

One of the clones jumped slightly in alarm. "The wormhole! It isn't closing up!"

Amelia tensed up when she saw what was going on.

"Oh... no..."

* * *

Unarin blinked as the newly acquired teleporter technology beamed him aboard the small but nimble Control Ship. "How unpleasant."

Unlike the other twenty ships in his small assault fleet, the Control Ship could only seat 5 or so beings, but as a tactical decision, he had only brought two others with him. Sleeping quarters were not needed, but he did have a meditation lounge installed for his personal comfort. The other two aboard would need no such luxuries.

He walked the short distance down the cramped hallway and arrived in the cockpit, where the two automatons sat, fiddling with various buttons and other such controls. "Gatekeeper, are the preparations complete?"

The 'female' cyborg responded promptly. "Yes, Executor. All Sentinels are charged and armed for combat."

The other one, unlike his former assistant, had no biological heritage. It was a purely artificial construct. Despite this, it still retained several irritating personality quirks, as did all of the other Sentinels.

That's why they are impossible to control.

Unarin kept his calm as he made sure not to ignore the other one. "Mulgris. I was surprised you asked to stay aboard the Control Ship. I had assumed you would want to fight on the frontlines."

"As if I had a choice in the matter." The mechanical voice that rasped back held an unpleasant hiss. "You must think of me as an inferior intelligence. Turning my back to you, only for you to wrench a knife in. Do you think we have forgotten the Melkian IV incident?"

Unarin's mouth felt dry. "No. Of... of course not. You must understand, the times were different back then. The Volgrim were a different people, fearful of the power of-"

Mulgris hissed, making Unarin stop talking. "I don't wish to hear your excuses. This new Gatekeeper is a shallow imitation of the former. If you think it has a chance of performing its functions, you must have grown more stupid in your old age."

The Executor of the Volgrim lowered his head and pressed his fingers together. "She is merely here to coordinate the assault. That is all. I would have chosen a more intelligent subordinate if I wished to deceive you."

"Your words are a poison to my receptors." Mulgris tilted its head down and gazed at its metal hands. "I should find the tearing apart of these 'humans' to be quite enjoyable, but instead I must stay here and keep a sensor locked on you, due to your untrustworthiness."

Unarin felt his body twitch slightly. "If you are so distrustful of me, why not kill me now?"

The construct made a choking sound. "Kuh huh... to reform the Sentinels... you must be truly desperate. If these humans are such a threat, then it stands to reason that you have long been at death's door. You no longer possess the power to resist us. You must be feeling truly suicidal."

Mulgris' hand shifted, and its form melted and transformed into a razor sharp blade. "After we deal with these life forms made of carbon and other soft elements, we will dwell on how to deal with you."

The ship blasted forwards at Warp 8, racing the few lightyears towards the wormhole that was being held open by the new technology.

"I'm still surprised you were able to analyze the properties of the human's magic to devise counters to it. And... so quickly at that." Unarin changed the topic, feeling uneasy about what they had been discussing before.

"Trivial. The Volgrim have truly lost their keen edge. Once you would invent new branches of physics if it meant it had a chance to stop the Sentinels, yet look at you now. You didn't even understand the humans' transporter technology. Such a basic system." Mulgris' voice held a strange anger behind every word. "They call it magic. How quaint. The implication being that it is an unknowable force without limitations. Indeed, it has many weaknesses, and for my kind, manipulating matter is trivial."

Mulgris shifted the bladed hand back into its normal form and turned its head to stare at Unarin. Its red irises were unblinking, and could hardly even be called 'eyes'. They were merely imitations, created by the far-too-brilliant-for-their-own-good scientists at the original research station to instill fear in those the automatons fought in the field. Little was scarier than something that seemed familiar, but held an insidious undertone to it.

The fear, however, had little to do with their eyes.

"I've been meaning to ask, but I have been so... busy. How is Dosena?"

The construct continued to gaze at Unarin without wavering, but he held his ground. "She died in battle."

His sentence was short and simple, but Mulgris didn't seem to believe him. "Against the humans? Perhaps they are more fearsome than the reports have indicated. I find it unlikely she would lose to lifeforms that had yet to unlock the power of bio-engineering."

Unarin sighed, finally allowing himself to show a tinge of emotion. "We were unprepared for the humans' control over the power of magic. Dosena died allowing our forces to escape."

Mulgris turned its head back to the forward viewscreen. "I never expected you to lie, Unarin. Your words say one thing, but your biometric signature says another. I wonder what really happened to the Scourge of Melkia."

Unarin didn't get a chance to retort. Muuxunu spoke up, interrupting their discussion. "Arriving at the wormhole in ten seconds, Executor."

The three of them waited as the seconds ticked by. Finally, the ship decelerated and Unarin glared in confusion. "The wormhole is too small to pass through. We'll never be able to get the fleet to the other side."

"We can only stabilize it, Executor. I apologize for our incapability of expanding its perimeter." Muuxunu chirped sadly but quickly righted herself. "What are your orders?"

"I'm not sure." Unarin stared at the hole in confusion. "It's just barely big enough for the Control Ship to pass through, but the rest of our fleet will be unable to cross over."

Mulgris leaned forward and pressed a prompt on the control pad. A transmission signal beamed out to all the other ships nearby. "We are unable to proceed. Leave the fleet behind and shift your forms to subspace mode."

Unarin looked at the Sentinel with confusion evident on his face. "Subspace mode? What is that?"

The powerful construct was all too happy to let a small bit of pretentiousness slip into his voice modulator. "Sentinels can shift their forms, Executor. Warp travel may be impossible for us as we are now, but you'll find that normal sublight travel through space is no barrier to us."

As he spoke, the viewscreen shifted to show thousands of tiny masses evacuating the massive ships they had been using to travel to the wormhole. As if they were a hivemind, all of the beings swarmed together and flew at the wormhole, passing through it with ease.

"And now we follow." Mulgris glanced at the Gatekeeper and she quickly tapped several buttons, moving them towards the wormhole to follow along with the swarm.

Unarin leaned against the bulkhead behind himself.

It is unlikely I will live to regret activating the Sentinels.

Part 377a: Awakened Terror

"What the hell are those?" Beatrix paced back and forth in front of the Mars base tactical viewscreen. Several video feeds were being directed to her at once, and her eyes flicked over them intently even as the other senior officials and politicians wrung their hands together or barked orders. On the screen, thousands of small looking objects were moving at sublight speeds towards the last planet in the Sol system, Pluto, and would be passing it soon.

Beatrix was there only on advisory duty, but a sinking feeling in her gut told her that her advice wouldn't be of much use. She had no idea what they were up against.

An official nearby was the first to respond, but unlike her, his voice was filled with curiosity more than uncertainty. "We're not sure, but they vary in size from five feet long to forty feet. They resemble the shape of small tactical interceptors, but some are far too small to be crewed. They might be drones."

"Drones, huh? I know the Volgrim suffered a major defeat a few years ago, but if their numbers are so low they're resorting to drones, this is either a very good omen, or a bad one." Beatrix rubbed her palms together nervously. Something just didn't feel right. "Send out our own interceptors, but start with the Dartfighters. They're nearly indestructible, and unmanned, so they're likely to be the best option for scouting out the Volgrim forces."

A commander nearby nodded, but he was the leader in this situation and he had other ideas. "I agree, but we only have a thousand Dartfighters left. Send in an auxiliary force of three thousand crewed Interceptors. Keep them in reserve and only move forward if these drones prove to be dangerous."

"That should be fine, Francisco." Beatrix finally stopped pacing and watched the screen closely as the Dartfighters moved forwards to attack the incoming invaders. It took several minutes for the fleet to arrive, and when they did, the results were unexpected.

"Dartfighter down." A female analytics officer spoke up. "And another. And another. Zero of the unidentified enemy craft have been neutralized. Two more Dartfighters down."

While she watched as the battle summary was being broadcast, Beatrix gasped and covered her mouth with her hand. "Did that one just change its shape?"

Indeed, it had. It morphed into a needle-like object and lanced directly into a Dartfighter, entering it and destroying it from the inside-out before reforming and targeting another.

Francisco turned to his communications officer. "Order a retreat for the crewed interceptors. We're going to blast the enemy bogeys from a distance. They appear to be melee range fighters, like the Dartfighters."

"Yes, commander." The crewman relayed his seniors' orders and the blips from the human side moved back, while the Dartfighters continued being shredded.

"One enemy bogey down!" A voice yelled and everyone felt their breathing catch as a quick replay showed a Dartfighter ramming into one of the enemy contacts, smashing it into several pieces.

"Good. They aren't invincible." Beatrix released the breath she had been holding and sighed with relief.

A moment later, the debris from the enemy ship moved slightly, pulling itself back together and reforming before continuing to move deeper into Human space.

"You were saying?" Francisco spoke curtly, but there was no mockery in his eyes. "We're definitely going to need the Supreme Commander's assistance with this enemy."

* * *

Mulgris stared blankly ahead, as its mechanical face tended to do, and monitored the battle. "I am receiving reports that the humans sent out an unmanned attack force."

"Ah yes, those must be the ramming ships."

Mulgris didn't bother to respond. "They are being dispatched. A shame, for I had hoped the first encounter would make them throw caution to the wind."

"Your bloodlust is truly insatiable." Unarin crossed his arms and stared at the screen with a bored look in his eyes. "I remember when those little ships shredded an entire attack force of ours."

The construct seemed to find the slightest amusement in this. "I do not see how these could be a problem for you, unless you've grown soft over the millennia."

Unarin wanted to respond, but Mulgris continued. "The humans are putting up a decent fight though, in spite of my concerns. Clearly they had no warning about us, which fills me with disappointment. I had hoped there would be some sport in their extermination. If only you had told them everything you know about us, they might have been able to stop us."

For once, Unarin smiled. "You speak as if it is a foregone conclusion that you will win."

"Is it not?" Mulgris tapped a button on the display. "Three hundred of their one thousand initial ships are left. The others were torn to pieces."

"These are their scouting forces. They will undoubtedly lose many lives learning about the capabilities of the Sentinels, but don't you suppose it's possible they will adapt?"

"Of course. It will be too late by then, however." Mulgris waved a hand through the air. "Even if they had a Gatekeeper of their own, they lack a method to deploy it. They do not, of course, so they can't possibly hope to win." The construct paused for a moment. "Speaking of which, what happened to the old Gatekeeper?"

Unarin started to respond, but he was interrupted by his mechanical female assistant. "Executor, there is a broadcast being sent to our ship."

He raised an eyebrow. "I guess the humans are ready to ask some questions. Put it through."

A moment later, he was surprised to see not Jason Hiro or a human commander on the screen, but a different face.

"Satan. I distinctly remember the last time we saw each other." Unarin kept his expression tight, as he stared first at Satan, then at a female angel next to him. "Who is she?"

"You don't recognize me? Must be the wings." She held a strange tiny stick that was lit on fire, and occasionally she placed it to her lips and inhaled sharply before breathing out and exhaling smoke. "Marie. I made the anti-energy weapons you used for your Dragoons."

Mulgris immediately spoke up. "Dragoons? I thought those were outmoded trash heaps."

Unarin nodded. "They were, but since we didn't have the ability to use Sentinels..." His voice trailed off and the construct shifted slightly.

"That is a reasonable point."

Marie and Satan both appeared to be uninterested in the contents of the Volgrim's conversation, but Marie carefully studied the Sentinel leader, occasionally glancing at the female cyborg to the side.

"You don't appear to be a standard artificial intelligence. Your body seems to be efficiently constructed as well."

Mulgris ignored the compliment. "Why are you contacting us? We're busy launching an assault. Come to beg for your lives?"

"Yes. About that." Satan spoke slowly, keeping his face taut. "I am trying to come to a decision right now. Whether to aid the humans, the Volgrim, or stay neutral. I'm heavily leaning towards staying neutral. I had an agreement with the Volgrim, that they would kill the humans on Earth and leave the planet for us, but instead you destroyed Earth. That being said, as angry as I am about this act of treachery... I hold no love for humans."

Unarin immediately lowered his head. "I am not one to usually apologize, but the one who led the assault on Earth was not me. I have been out of contact with the united Volgrim forces for several of your Earthly decades, and Nufaris was the one you were in contact with. In addition to destroying Earth, he assassinated all of my brothers and sisters, the Volgrim Founders. I am sorry for how he deceived you."

Satan appeared to be taken aback at the apology. "Your words won't bring back Earth, but... I remember you now. Yes, we spoke several times in the past. I was told by Nufaris that you died during the destruction of your homeworld."

"I did not. I escaped through a portal to a... remote location. Specifically..." Unarin gestured at the construct just in front of him in the cramped cockpit. "...to release the Sentinels."

Marie chimed in again. "So they're called Sentinels? What sort of weapons are they?"

Mulgris raised a closed fist and held it straight up to silence Unarin from responding. "I care not who you are. Your assistance is unnecessary. If you interfere, you will be destroyed. If you stay out of the way, you will still be destroyed. Do what you please otherwise. You are insignificant."

Everyone stayed silent for a few moments, but only Unarin understood the truth behind those words. "Satan, you tricked me in Heaven and left me to die. In return, my subordinate double crossed you and went back on a deal the two of you made. As of now, I would say we are even. For your own good, I would advise against interfering in this battle. I would especially recommend hiding, for you will never be able to beat the Sentinels."

Marie smiled pleasantly. "Is that so? I don't like being threatened."

"It's not a threat, but a warning. You are misunderstanding something here. I do not control the Sentinels. Mulgris does. I have no power to stop them, any more than you, Jason Hiro, or the humans on the fourth planet do. I can promise you from experience that resisting the Sentinels will only lead to pain and torture."

Mulgris seemed to enjoy Unarin's speech. "The weak one is correct. However, if you choose to interfere, I will not lie... my people are dying for a challenge. Please do the best you can. This may be the last bit of fun we get to enjoy unless we find another sentient civilization to crush."

The other cyborg in the cockpit, Muuxunu, spoke up suddenly. "Might I advise leaving some survivors for a few thousand years so they can rise up to be crushed again?"

Mulgris turned and stared at her for a moment. "That, my dear, is an excellent idea."

Without any fanfare, the construct leaned forwards ever so slightly and deactivated the comm, cutting the feed instantly. "Enough idle chatter. I have been wanting to see more reports of how the battle is going."

Unarin pressed a button on the wall as a flip-out chair popped out. Sitting down, he sighed. "I can't imagine you're having any trouble."

* * *

Echo and Storm stood beside a contingent of human infantry, awaiting their orders. In the sky above, humanity was fighting the Volgrim once again, and the two clones were the frontlines to protect Ursa Termina, the biggest major city on Mars. Everyone wore standard body armor except for the two clones, who wore their full hypersuits as always.

Echo raised his hand to his head, then made a chopping motion. "Three of the unknown bogeys made it past the frontlines. They're beelining right for Mars."

"Hm. We couldn't shoot them out of the air?" Storm's voice was even, but inwardly he felt somewhat nervous.

"Tried. Two of them are really small, so we couldn't hit them. The other was massive, but didn't seem to take any damage. Aren't you hearing all this?"

Storm shook his head. "I never bothered getting my earpiece fixed. I like the silence."

"No, you're just lazy." Echo snickered to himself.

"No... I just like the silence." Storm corrected the other clone and shook his head. "Original is lazy. I just enjoy not having to talk all the time."

"You're talking right now."

"Nobody likes a smartass, Echo."

The clones stared at each other through their masks, even as the men nearby wondered how they could bicker with one another during such a nerve-wracking time.

Finally, Echo broke away. "Whatever. Look sharp, we've got five minutes to contact."

"You think they're going to land here?"

Both clones looked up into the sky as Echo shrugged. "Maybe. There are several divisions surrounding Ursa's perimeter. If one of them gets hit, we'll go provide reinforcements."

Time passed, and everyone was starting to feel a little antsy. Every so often, Echo would connect to the main network and ask if the hostile targets had landed, but every time the answer was 'no'."

Finally, they saw something. High up in the sky, three burning streaks of fire came rushing down. Storm had barely started to speak up when the objects smashed into the ground a half mile away, blasting dirt and rock in every direction as massive craters were left over.

"Jesus! How fast were they going? Talk about a crash landing!"

Echo smiled as everyone stared at the craters in the distance. "Guess we managed to shoot them down. That was uneventful."

A few men and women nearby laughed nervously, as they felt relief the targets had been reduced to a crumpled mess all over the ground.

Only a few moments later did they realize something wasn't right. A humming began to fill the air, and from the craters, the smoke dissipated. Two figures emerged, their bodies looking somewhat humanlike, but covered in metal. They appeared to be androids, or cyborgs, or something else. Both of them had two legs, four arms, and five fingered hands.

As every human in the contingent raised their weapons, there was a lumbering sound as the biggest crater's dirt shifted slightly, and a massive hand reached over the edge. Pulling itself up, a titanic metal being stood up, towering fifty feet into the sky. Unlike the other two, the head on the big one was triangular, resembling a pyramid, and it spun around slowly as if scanning the area.

Echo and Storm froze for a solid two seconds, before Echo finally woke up. "Don't just stand there! Fire!"

The platoon of soldiers all took their designated cover positions and began unloading on the machines, blasting them with lasers, small armaments, and even anti-energy rifles... just in case.

Storm dashed forwards towards the two smaller robots, both of which stood perfectly still and stared forwards unblinkingly, as if waiting for something.

Before he could cover the distance with his Hypersuit's incredible speed enhancements, a movement faster than Storm could perceive shifted in front of him, and the massive automaton fired a single laser straight into his chest, smashing him backwards and slamming him into the ground, pulverizing the rocky Martian soil into dust.

It didn't injure him, but the sudden shock left him stunned. "What- what just...?"

The massive automaton shifted slightly and aimed its pyramid head at the contingent of humans, and a microscopically thin laser shot out and swept horizontally, moving so fast that Echo, still in the rear guard, barely even saw it happen.

A second later, the head of every human that had dared to stand up slid off their bodies and fell to the ground. What was left of their body followed soon after.

Echo felt his resolve crumble as he whispered into his microphone. "B-backup. Backup. We need... we need backup."

* * *

Kraal and Voltes had successfully landed on the planet, along with the assault type, Morphox. Immediately, the three of them began to communicate at one million times the speed the inferior biologicals could hope to achieve, by expelling high density waves of sound outwards. To the biologicals, they might feel a tingling in the air, but it was beyond their comprehension of how such advanced beings might communicate.

Scarcely had they reformed and shifted to their respective bipedal modes, than the biological contaminants moved in to attack.

Primitive era laser and shell-type weaponry flew at the Sentinels at astoundingly slow speeds.

Scanning for threat levels. Kraal toned blankly in a speed that could be described as nearly the speed of light.

Rapidly, they examined the armaments and defensive capabilities of the biologicals.

Primary attack unit threat status: Nonexistent.

Kraal sent his report out as Voltes scanned a single unit that had charged forwards. Scan complete. Threat level of commander units: Nonexistent.

The massive Morphox aimed his high impact stun beam at the biological charging towards them. Mulgris wants one alive.

Affirmative. Take that one.

Kraal gave the approval and Morphox sent the beam forwards, nearly killing the small creature with its accidental ferocity.

Still, all three Sentinels were surprised to read that the vital signs on the biological had not altered in the slightest. It struggled on the ground for a moment before managing to pull itself up.

Voltes spoke next. Threat reassessment required. High impact stun beam was unable to disrupt vital functions. Armor is enhanced far beyond ordinary limits of the material.

Confirmed. Threat level revised: Low. Eliminate the other biologicals. Take care to not damage this one.

Moving to eliminate. Morphox swiveled his head around and switched to his secondary attack, the Incision Laser.

A moment later, he gave a confirmation signal. Forward defense group terminated. Ninety-three remain.

Unit Kraal, I am detecting high levels of Type 3 energy in the commander units.

Noted. Move to engage. Remember, we are only here to scout their defenses. We must wait for the rest of our kind to arrive.

Morphox took one large step forwards. The native's defenses are primitive. We do not require assistance from the others.

Acknowledged. However, we have our orders.

Standing down. Morphox returned to his standing position even as the two biologicals shifted back to each other and appeared to be going on the defensive. Continuing to observe.

* * *

Echo's breathing was sharp, as he forced himself to ignore the carnage in the rear. "I didn't even see them move."

A moment later, several dozen other clones popped in at his location, all of them immediately looking around until they spotted the strange, motionless robots.

"We're here. This is all we could bring." One of the clones beckoned at the others in his group. "What are we up against? These fuckers are damn near invincible in space."

"Not sure. They hit me with... something. Wiped out half the platoon in the next instant. It happened so fast."

Echo strode forwards. "We don't have time to waste. They're just standing there, but if they move to attack the city, we'll have a second Christmas Day Massacre on our hands. Whatever these robots are, they're monsters. Storm, have you Wordsmithed at them yet?"

"No."

"I'll try it now. EXPLOSION! "

A massive blast erupted right at the spot where one of the robots stood, and the fire from the blast swept outwards for almost two hundred feet before dissipating into smoke. A moment later, the smoke cleared and still the robot stood, staring straight at them.

"Great job, Echo."

"Piss off. At least I tried."

"Right. Now my turn." Storm quickly turned to eyeball the bigger robot warily. He didn't want to be hit by that blast a second time, even if the damage was negligible. " Speed! Perception! "

Time slowed to a tenth of normal speed around him as he breathed evenly. If the robots sent out another one of those attacks, he'd be able to see them coming.

He dashed forwards once more, again using the enhanced abilities the suit gave him to move much faster than would ordinarily be possible. "Centurion, activate Lightning Mode!"

"LIGHTNING MODE IS NOW IN EFFECT. MOVEMENT SPEED HAS BEEN INCREASED BY 500%, PILOT JASON HIRO!"

"God, I hate that name." Storm half-dashed, half-teleported here and there as he shifted from one spot to another, and in just a few seconds, he raised his fist back to punch at one of the smaller two robots.

Then their heads swiveled to look at him, as if he wasn't moving fast even in the slightest.

Storm's blood ran cold.

The robot he was about to punch swung its own arm out at a frightening speed, far exceeding what even he was capable of reacting to in his current state. Still, Centurion compensated, nearly breaking his back as it forced him to duck and avoid the horizontal swipe.

He jerked back up and jumped backwards, but the robot merely stared at him silently... as if it were simply learning his attack patterns.

He didn't hesitate, even though his back hurt a little now. " Speed! Speed! Perception! Perception! "

His energy began to drain much faster, but now the world was moving at close to a thousandth its normal speed. He dashed forwards and swung at the machine, connecting with his hypersuit enhanced fist and punching the machine with all his might.

The machine stood perfectly still, and the armor on it showed no signs of damage. It was as if he hadn't punched it at all.

He pulled his fist back and stared at it in horror. "What... what the hell?" Storm stared into the eyes of the automaton and it stared back silently, as if waiting for something.

For a brief second, Storm thought he felt an odd humming sensation from all three machines at once.

Then the robot vanished. It moved far faster than his eye could track, darting somewhere to his side and delivering a flurry of blows that sent him rolling to the side. It was on him in a second, grabbing him by the leg and swinging him over its shoulder, and plowing him into the ground with brutal force.

Storm gasped as the wind was knocked out of him, but he barely had an instant to realize what happened. The robot swung him again, this time hurling him back at his companions, where he flew through the air and smashed into an embankment right at their feet.

Storm stared forwards silently as his head swam. He couldn't think straight. He couldn't see properly. Spots danced in his vision while he tried to understand what had just happened.

When a few seconds had passed, he shook the feeling off and spoke again. " Normalize. "

His energy finally stopped dropping as he returned to normal time. Already, the other clones were just beginning to realize he was at their feet. "Storm! What just happened?"

He climbed to his feet and stood shakily. "I... I don't know. I don't know."

Just as the barrage of questions started, the ground began to tremble. Everyone looked over at the massive robot, just in time for one of its eyes to light up.

"Oh... fuck."

* * *

Far away, on a ridge nearly a mile tall, two figures watched the battle erupting among the humans and scouting robots, apprehension filling both of them. Despite the distance, the smaller of the two could see what was going on clearly, using her keen eyesight to track things as they happened.

"This must be the flashpoint. How do we stop it?"

The tall one shook his head. "I am unsure, my lady. Both of us lack the power to defeat them."

The woman gripped the holy sword at her side tightly, as her blonde hair flapped in the wind. "I could try to use this."

"You lack the ability to use it properly. We must make sure that Jason Hiro receives it. It should be considered his, after all."

"Maybe. But we've seen what happens when he goes wild with it. It's too dangerous. I took it for a reason."

"Earth was destroyed anyway. Whether he did it, or the Volgrim did it, or Satan did it... it was going to happen. You can't blame him for an event that he didn't propagate."

She shook her head slowly. "I can and I will. I'm not just going to give him Excalibur. He's likely to destroy Mars too."

The tall being placed his massive green hand on her shoulder. "You must learn to forgive him. Your uncle's death was not his fault. In fact, you saw him crying at the funeral."

"Fake tears. Crying won't bring my uncle back. I remember when he plunged the knife into my uncle's heart."

"That was a different time, a different life. The Jason of this stream knows nothing of the events you are referring to, and he is thus guiltless. We can move to another stream, one where your uncle is surely still alive and Earth still exists in another. Why not consider it? Why not make a new beginning for yourself?"

"Those streams wouldn't be my stream, Grok. Those belong to other versions of me. Hell, I don't even exist in some of them. The man in those streams would not be my uncle, he wouldn't even know who I was."

Grok lowered his hand and sighed. "Yet... here I am."

The woman lowered her head. "You know what I meant."

"I do, but I just don't agree. Come on, Daisy, let's keep looking. An opportunity is sure to present itself."

"We'll see."

The girl reached up and held the orc's hand, smiling in spite of the dark depression inside of herself. A moment later, the two of them vanished in a flash of light.

Part 378a: The Lost Ones

How is this possible? The reports coming in from the ground forces indicate that a few of the enemies we're fighting in space crash-landed at ridiculous speeds yet were not damaged, wiped out a platoon of human soldiers in just a few seconds, and then proceeded to embarrass my clone fighting forces. Only three of these weird Volgrim robots arrived on Mars, but apparently my clones are having a hell of a time dealing with them.

Things aren't going any better in space.

"We can't lock on to their forms anymore!" Sensei's face is beet red with rage. "How are these monsters so unstoppable?! They're peeling our forces apart like wet paper!"

"How could they possibly be preventing a lock-on?" I ask the question and then remember I don't know how most technology works. I have no fundamental grasp of the physics involved since I usually just cheat and use the Crown.

"That's the thing; I don't know! They just seem to shift their forms rapidly, and now our weapons can't assume an automatic lock. We've been targeting them manually, and that's going about as well as you'd expect." Sensei squeezes his eyes shut and rubs his forehead. "We've never taken losses like this before. They have a 100% win ratio so far. If this keeps up we'll be lucky to flee and save the species."

Something about this feels so wrong to me. "If the Volgrim had these unstoppable juggernauts the whole time, why did Unarin wait until now to deploy them?"

Sensei shakes his head slowly. "I don't know. Maybe the reason he wasn't there for the Earth assault was because he was working on these monstrosities. He allowed Nufaris to lead the attack so that he could stay and develop these."

I start to respond, but Sensei interrupts me. "No, wait. That doesn't make sense either. Why even bother with destroying Earth? They were under no time constraints. We weren't bearing down on them anytime soon. He could have just held off for a couple of years and attacked us once our exploration ships arrived in his space."

"Perhaps he assumed Refuge was indestructible. If he did, then it would make sense for a being who thinks he's part of the chosen species to attempt a total annihilation of our kind. He possibly might have thought that we had no chance of stopping a super-weapon twice the size of the Moon since he nullified my Wordsmithing."

"No, it still wouldn't make sense. Unarin is overconfident and proud, but he's also much more cautious now. We've defeated him so many times there isn't a chance that he'd underestimate us."

Our ship is suddenly rocked by an explosion and both of us stumble backward and fall on our asses. We pull ourselves back up and look at a report. The Sentinels hit the engineering bay, but it wasn't serious. My clones are already repairing it with Wordsmithing.

Sensei grits his teeth. "We're missing pieces of the puzzle. Where is Nufaris during all of this? He led the strike force that destroyed Earth, and we definitely didn't kill him. Unarin was nowhere to be seen, yet he appeared out of nowhere with a massive robot army." Sensei shrugs and corrects himself. "Well, a small robot army that fights like a large one anyway. There are only fifty thousand enemy combatants. We have millions of well-trained soldiers."

"You know what they say about size not mattering. If we can't find a way to beat the Volgrim, we're dead in the water, and we've lost a lot of lives for no reason."

Sensei sighs and closes his helmet to look at some information on his HUD. "I can't accomplish anything here. I'm going to Termina Ursa to help on the frontlines. If you think of anything, let me know."

"Will do. Stay safe."

Sensei stares at me for a few moments before Harold receives his mental request and teleports him away.

Now I'm standing alone on the Mothership's bridge, wondering what I should do next. We're facing a threat unlike any before it; a foe that seems to be immune to all forms of damage, one that can change its shape, and moves at ungodly speeds compared to us. If we can't figure out something, we're going to all die.

Noticing Sensei has left, a clone across the bridge speaks up. "Unarin is still refusing to respond to our hails."

"Keep trying. We have to come up with a counter, and any hint would be useful here."

An idea comes to mind. I send a telepathic message to Sensei. Try getting creative with wordsmithing. Teleport them to the center of the planet. I'll keep thinking of what to do.

Sensei barely gives me an affirmation. While I stand alone, tapping my chin, one of the nearby clones on the bridge of the Mothership turns to look at me. "You know, we don't have to do guesswork here. There's one person who might know what these robots are."

"Who?" I stare at him quizzically, and he looks at me in disbelief.

"You don't remember? Dosea! We captured her during the war in Heaven decades ago. If anyone is going to know what these things are, she will."

"Oh. I had forgotten about her." I stare at my clone blankly, and he shakes his head at me in response. Silently, he turns back to his station and I can't help but feel like if he were looking at me, he'd be glaring in disapproval.

Sometimes I feel like there's a fog over my mind. It's like something is actively trying to prevent me from advancing past my personal limitations. For a man with godlike powers, there are times when I feel so... insignificant.

Still, I thank my clone mentally. At least I can still rely on them. All it takes is a single word, and I'll be one step closer to getting the answers I need.

"Teleport. "

* * *

I arrive in Dimension V, as I used to call it, and am immediately surprised. The world was once barren, and all the food had to be wordsmithed by the clone I put on permanent duty here, but it looks like his laziness got the better of him and he made the planet self-sufficient. Of course, 'planet' is a strong word, considering the world here exists outside the boundaries of the ordinary universe, no stars are in the sky, and the whole thing is smaller than the asteroid I used to destroy Volgarius itself.

Oh... right. I never told Dosea about that. In fact, I ordered my clone not to mention it. I figured that it would make her sad and considering the lack of hostilities between us, there was no need for that.

My clone isn't here now, but I arrive smack in the center of the city's square, and everyone notices me immediately. I'm quickly taken aback by how everyone is dressed. It's as if I stepped into the center of Rome from two millennia ago. Everyone is wearing white robes, the female Volgrim are wearing something almost satin-like, and the material is somewhat see-through. Their bodies are very sexualized, but any thought I have involving questionable conduct is of course tempered by the mouthfuls of shark-like teeth they have.

Still, I never thought of the Volgrim as being anything but stuffy, uptight robots. To see them like this is jarring, to say the least.

A male Volgrim walks up to me. "Greetings. You share the same face as Pickle, yet your demeanor is more cautious. I presume you must be a different clone. I am Sirin."

I immediately scrunch up my face. "Pickle? Is... is that really the name of the clone I stationed here? I thought he called himself Demitri."

Sirin stares at me like I am an idiot. "He informed us that Pickle was a name that meant 'one of great honor' in the human tongue. Is that incorrect?"

"No, that's correct. Totally. I just... uh... didn't know he changed his name." I feel my brain pulse slightly. At least the clone stationed here is having fun when he's not fighting on the battlefield. "Ignoring 'Pickle', I'm the original, not a clone. I need to speak with Dosea."

His eyes light up. "She will be most pleased that you have come! Follow me and I will take you to her castle."

Her castle?

My head hurts. Dosea is living like royalty? But why? Well, I suppose that will be answered in due time. She was previously the second highest Volgrim among her kind, so I can understand why she would wish to live like a queen. Seems kind of conceited though.

As we walk down the road towards the large castle in the distance, Sirin gestures here and there towards various people and things. "It has been many cycles since we last saw you. In fact, after our internment here, you never returned. I think you should find it interesting how we have progressed since you were last here."

Not really. That sounds awful, and I'm in a rush.

I want to say that, but he seems like such a nice guy. "Sure."

There is no hesitation. "I manage this city, which is our only place of living anywhere on Voldarius. Due to the complete lack of metal on this planet, we have had to improvise to improve our way of life. The lack of seasons makes growing food simple, since it is always the perfect temperature everywhere. The star you created, while small, is quite energetic."

I simply nod along, pretending to listen. "Very interesting." A thought occurs to me, however. "Hold on, I thought the Volgrim didn't need to eat food? Aren't you guys mostly robotic?"

Sirin whistles pleasantly. "You are correct. Under normal circumstances, we would not require such primitive substances. We mutated our bodies over millions of years to run mostly off of electrical impulses, provided to us by complex machinery." He turns his head back to me, smiling, but I can't help noticing there is a pang of sadness in his eyes. "Of course, machinery and electronics are banned due to our status as prisoners of war, so we must rely on the old ways to survive. Even we are only immortal so long as we have energy to consume."

I feel a sudden stab of guilt as he turns back forward. I want to say something, but he lifts his voice. "Ah, we are in luck. One of the wooden taxis is here." He barely lifts a hand, and the driver starts cranking some strange wheel, grunting as he does to make the vehicle move. It reminds me mechanically of a bicycle, and it's powered entirely due to his own physical energy.

"Actually, that won't be necessary, Sirin. I'm in a rush to speak with her, so I'll just speed us along." I lightly put my hand on his shoulder, and a moment later, I teleport us the remaining mile to Dosena's castle. On arrival, Sirin's peaceful facade seems to crack as he stumbles forward to the ground, coughing and sputtering.

Sometimes I forget that teleportation can be jarring the first time someone does it. "Sorry, I teleported us and forgot to warn you."

"N-no, it's fine." He stands back up and wipes at his mouth. "I was simply startled. I did not know such forms of travel were possible other than through portals."

He waves me forwards, and less than a minute later, we stand in front of a large wooden door. The castle itself is made of stone, but like everywhere else I've seen, no metal is visible. Of course, I know exactly why. I had ordered 'Pickle' to never make metal or electronic objects for fear these Volgrim could escape and reunite with their people. Now, however, I am having second thoughts. This feels like cruel imprisonment.

We walk in her main room and I'm surprised to see Dosena leaning heavily on the table with her head resting on her palm, while she plays a strange board game with another female Volgrim, a game I've never seen before. The pieces are intricately hand-cut, and the board resembles a weird multi-stage chessboard. Whatever the game is, I'm sure Amelia would love it.

"Founder Dosena, you have a visitor." Sirin bows slightly as she slowly turns her head to look at me. It appears to take several seconds for her to recognize me. "Oh. You."

Compared with the impeccable politeness of Sirin, Dosena fills her greeting with boredom and the impression she couldn't care less about my arrival. She barely even looks at me after saying hello before returning to her game.

Sirin shoots a strange look at me and shrugs as he quickly walks out of the room. I slowly walk up to Dosena and the other woman, wondering how the hell I'm going to broach the subject.

"I thought I told you not to bother me." Dosena's voice is heavy and drags along as she speaks.

"I... don't remember that at all."

"I yelled at you pretty loudly. I'm surprised you can't remember. You're dumber than I thought." She glances over at the other Volgrim girl, and both of them seem to share a look of knowing, as if there's a private communication I'm missing.

Ah, that's right, the Volgrim have telepathy, and Dosena is an especially powerful telepath.

"You might have me confused with someone else. I'm not the clone that's usually here... 'Pickle'. I'm Jason. The original one."

A strange transformation occurs as she quickly looks at me and scans me up and down, as a sudden interest appears in her eyes. "I haven't seen you in decades, human. Had you merely forgotten about us? Did we serve our purpose here as useful pawns for bargaining against Unarin?"

Her words sting. This wasn't the reaction Sirin prepared me to expect. "Uh... no. Nothing like that. I didn't forget, I was just... busy."

Her eyes narrow. "I cannot read your mind, but I can perceive many things by the tone of your voice, the sweat collecting on your forehead, and a variety of other indicators. You're lying. You didn't keep your word." She sits up straight at the table and seems to have lost all interest in the game.

"Fine. You got me. The war against the demons and Volgrim has been long fought. We're finally-" I pause, realizing I'm probably saying too much. "Well, let's just say that I need your help."

Dosena stares blankly at me for several moments before shaking her head and staring at the other Volgrim across from her. "He wants my help."

"He wants your help." The other parrots the words back at her, and both of them act like it's the craziest thing in the world.

"Listen, I see why you're mad. Really, I do. I don't blame you. Still, it was Unarin who tossed you to the side and left you to die. I allowed you to live on this planet and gave you a clone to make sure you lived in relative comfort."

"Comfort." She mumbles the word and deftly reaches over to move a piece on the board. She seems to have half turned her attention back to the game. "I have not seen any of those I call friends in thousands of planetary cycles. In fact, I don't even know exactly how long it's been. This planet doesn't rotate, and we have no reliable methods for keeping track of time. I have long since forgiven Unarin for his actions." The other female moves a piece on the board and Dosena responds immediately with her own counter.

"That's fair. Still, I won't leave until I get an answer. Unarin has deployed... these... things. Strange robots that are destroying humanity's military might. We can't hurt them at all. They appear to be unstoppable."

For a few long moments, Dosena stares at the board, contemplating something unseen.

Finally, she speaks. "You destroyed Volgarius."

I feel my eyes twitch. "Why do you think that?"

"The Sentinels. There... there's no chance he would ever risk activating them. We lost trillions of lives to them. He'd never do it. Never. Not a remote possibility."

Dosena lowers her head, and her voice tightens. "You must have destroyed Volgarius. The Volgrim must be on the verge of extinction. It's the only possibility. Unarin would never... he would never..."

Her sudden rush of emotion makes me take a step back. "Sentinels, huh? What are they? You look terrified."

"I am." Dosena raised her head up, and I'm surprised to see a tear streak down her face. "You don't understand. You won't be able to get it. They can't be defeated."

The female across from her notices the tears. "Founder? Are you in need of emotional assistance?"

Dosena wipes at her eyes and pulls her gaze from mine to stare at the ground. "That isn't necessary. There's no hope left. We already used the Gatekeeper protocol. The same trick won't work twice on them... they always adapt to anything we use. We have no more counters left."

"The Gatekeeper protocol? What's that?" I feel my interest piqued, despite her insistence that whatever it is won't work.

"The Sentinels are a highly advanced army made of artificial intelligences. However, in order to make them, we used the minds of brilliant military leaders. The goal was to create a fighting force that would be powerful enough to pacify both sides of the civil war and force a diplomatic treaty. The problem... the problem came when..." Her voice trailed off for a moment as memories seemed to return. "...they were too powerful. The AI began to corrupt the philosophies we installed so as to pursue more hedonistic pleasures. They began to see the Volgrim as a threat. Despite all of our preparation, they disabled the kill switches we installed and began to adapt their forms to improve their combat skills. Soon, they gained the ability to shift their appearance for a variety of combat situations, and their weaponry far outstripped even our own."

Her eyes are hollow now. "You can't destroy them. We sacrificed a million Volgrim lives in the blink of an eye to create a newer, more powerful intelligence. It had the sole purpose of defeating them... but it didn't succeed."

I raise an eyebrow. "It didn't? But I thought you said-"

"I did. As I said before, they cannot be defeated. All we managed to do was disable them. The Gatekeeper's role was to use its superior processing power to keep all of the Sentinels shut down. Their bodies were made of materials we could scarcely dent by that point, even with our most powerful weaponry. We couldn't destroy them entirely."

I suck in a breath slowly. "So you sealed them away, and Unarin has awoken them."

Dosena surprises me again by smiling widely. "Yes! That's all there is to it! Unarin has realized there is no hope of defeating humanity, but as a final curse upon your name, he has awoken the terror that finally put an end to the Great Wars of Volgrim myth." Dosena chuckled as she lightly flicked over a piece on the board. "We lose, but so do you. You're doomed now."

Her attitude pisses me off, not that I can mentally blame her for her feelings, but emotionally her love of death just drives me up the wall.

"We'll see about that. I will think of a way to defeat them."

She smiles at me with a mocking expression. "Best get to it, then, Jason. They can process information at a trillion times the speed your mind could ever comprehend, and you're already only half as fast as the rest of humankind. Your disadvantage couldn't be more clear."

I glare at her silently for a few moments. "I won't lose. Enjoy your stay here, Dosena. I see I made the right choice."

"Whatever allows you to sleep at night." She turns away to look at the board again. "Begone, now."

"Teleport. "

She can laugh if she wants. I won't let the metal monsters put an end to my species.

* * *

I arrive back at the mothership and suppress my rage. I can't honestly blame Dosena. She has every reason to hate me. I killed her people and forced her to live in exile on a planet that offers her very little mental stimulation.

Still, I feel angry at her. It's irrational, and I know it, but I can't help it. Her kind created these metal monsters, but now mine must suffer.

Sensei. I've just learned some key information about the robots you're fighting. I send a mental communication to him and wait a few moments.

He responds, but his mental voice is strained and stressed. I was only away for about half an hour, but it sounds like he's been fighting for days. Great! Show me what you've got! These fuckers can't be teleported, and that inverted energy surrounds all three of them. The same stuff that surrounded the Moon and the space station. It's impossible to get past!

Impossible, huh? That word can't exist to me. There has to be a way. Anything is possible if I put my mind to it.

I quickly explain to him what I've learned, and he listens intently. Every so often, I feel a perception of pain, but I ignore it until I'm done explaining.

Hyper-adaptive death robots that nearly exterminated the Volgrim. Fantastic! I couldn't ask for a more hilariously overpowered foe! How do we stop them?

I cringe at the question. I don't know. Still working on it. Try just immobilizing them if you can. I'll keep working on a solution.

Great! Can't wait! Hope we don't all die in the meantime! I feel the signal cut off abruptly and wonder what the hell is going on down there.

I quickly walk off the bridge. "I'll be back. If you need me, send word."

"Sure thing, Original." One of my clones barely nods at me.

Something about the way my clones treat me... they openly call me stupid. They treat me as an inferior. I have more magical energy than them, but if I can't use it properly, what good is it?

I locate Amelia with my mind. Perhaps she can help me. Leviathan is supposed to be powerful, maybe he can think of something.

I pause while walking down the hallway. Come to think of it, if it's knowledge and ingenuity I need, maybe there's another solution here. There might be someone else who can help.

"Umi. Are you there?"

It doesn't take a second for her to respond. "Yes, Jason Hiro. I am always watching."

Creepy fucker. "Umi, did you listen to my conversation with Dosena?"

"Naturally. Of course, it was all information I already knew, but it was still a conversation I logged for archival purposes."

"Great. Tell me, is there a way I can defeat an enemy that is invulnerable to conventional weaponry, enhanced weaponry, magical energy, and everything else we've tried up to now? Is there a way I can defeat the Sentinels?"

Umi chirps softly. "Not to my knowledge, Jason Hiro. In fact, once I realized the Sentinels were going to put an end to all sentient species, I attempted to prevent Unarin from enabling their primary processors. However, they had already adapted to the Gatekeeper protocol, and thus I was unable to stop them."

The news is shocking. "You... couldn't... even stop them?"

"Correct."

Several seconds pass as fear washes over me. This is serious. Umi once told me she could put an end to all sentient life in seconds, just as she killed thousands of Volgrim aboard a ship I had captured. I believed her. No, I still believe her. She is a frightening existence, one that can destroy all life as we know it and it wouldn't even bother her. Our only defense is that she likes to watch us play around with our little guns and stuff.

Shit.

If she can't stop them, what can I do? As expected, that inverted energy field has become a real nuisance. I simply can't get past it. It renders my powers inoperable.

Except... wait. Does it really? No. Despite a field billions of times stronger than the one that surrounds the Sentinels, Arthur managed to destroy Refuge somehow. He blasted straight through the Moon as if it didn't even exist. How did he do that?

"Umi, do you know how Arthur managed to destroy Refuge?"

"I do. He blasted Refuge with energy that exceeded the field's ability to compensate, resulting in an overload of all its power cells and its eventual destruction."

"So could the same thing work against the Sentinels?"

"Possibly. However, you lack the energy to perform such a feat. The energy required is neither diminished nor increased based on the size and intensity of the inverse energy field."

Damn. Another roadblock. "What if I took the energy from all of my clones? Would that be enough?"

"Negative. Even if all of your clones were fully rested and their energy were full, Arthur's energy level was several orders of magnitude greater than your combined powers."

Jesus Christ. I knew he was strong, but that's mindblowing. Was Arthur even exaggerating when he said he was the most powerful Hero to have ever lived?

I stare at the floor in front of me thoughtfully. Amelia comes walking around the corner at that moment and spots me. "Jason! How is the battle going?"

I ignore her and continue staring downwards. There has to be an answer. There must be a way to obtain energy of that magnitude. Perhaps Leviathan? No, that risks injuring Amelia. I can't take a chance like that.

"Hellooooo! Jason! Mars to Jason!" Amelia waves her hand in front of my face, and I raise my head up to look at her.

"Umi, can I convert energy from one type to another with Wordsmithing?"

Amelia crinkles up her nose. "Uh, my name isn't Umi. Umi is the computer girl..."

Umi immediately responds to my question. "Unknown. However, it is certainly within the possible scope of your ability."

"Ah. I see. Thank you." I smile pleasantly at Amelia now. "I'll be right back. I need to try and kill two birds with one stone."

"Huh?" Amelia looks totally confused, but I don't have time to explain. People are dying every second.

"Be right back." My visor closes, and I mentally check my hypersuit for airtightness. "Return."

* * *

A moment later, Amelia is gone, and I am floating in a familiar, yet alien black void. As expected, Hawkeye did what he was ordered. He placed a waypoint in the system for Revival.

The planet Revival is too far for me to see. It might be on the other side of the system's star... but, I guess it doesn't matter. The Volgrim already took it over. Humanity won't be able to use it now. The least I can do is deprive them of its resources for the war efforts.

My suit gives off an alarm as several blips come towards me on the scanner. Enemy ships, or maybe some stragglers from the Sentinels. Both mean serious business, so I can't afford to dawdle.

Quickly, I stare directly at the system's star. My hypersuit protects me from eye damage as it darkens. "Teleport."

I arrive directly in front of the star. I'm thousands of miles away, and the Hypersuit protects me from its incredible heat and brightness, but still, the scale is awe inspiring. I've never seen anything like this in my life. I had a star available, but I never thought to get this close to one.

It's... beautiful.

And it needs to die.

I reach my hand out. "ABSORB!"

Several moments later, my mind screams in pain. I feel a rush of adrenaline as every blood vessel in my body feels like they're about to burst. And then the light from the star stops. The star vanishes.

PAIN.

PAIN.

EVERYTHING HURTS.

IT BURNS.

I can't cope. My mind is going blank. " Tuhlupurt. "

I mumble a word half-heartedly and vanish away. I'm getting tired now, I just need to sleep and recuperate.

I just need to rest my eyes a moment.

Part 379a:

Kraal watched as the last fireball streaked across the sky and crashed into the ground. As soon as he detected his fellow unit had reformed itself he sent the signal outwards.

All Sentinels have landed. I have reset the score. The one who kills the most organics will be the next scouting leader. Commence attack now.

His signal transmitted all around himself in a vibration that could only be felt by the inferior fleshy humans as a humming sound. The other Sentinels repeated his message until it had passed around the entire planet, the entire transmission taking less than a second.

As soon as the others began their total extermination, Kraal and his two companions sent a signal of confidence to one another. We have the advantage. We have already processed the organics' weaknesses.

The massive Morphox took a long step forwards and several of the white-suited commander units jumped backward in kind. How many points are the commander units worth compared to the low tier units?

Civilians are one point. Military units are two. Structures are three. The commander units are ten.

A human commander unit aimed his hand at Kraal, and a strange metallic rope formed around the Sentinel, suddenly tightening and binding him in place. Kraal immediately directed his sensory units at the human and focused on him.

I have located my first victim. Switching to microscopic particle cannon.

One of Kraal's eye's shifted appearance slightly as it glowed for a moment. A laser shot out of the socket, piercing right through the commander unit's tough armor, and spinning in a circle around the pulmonary center of his body. A few milliseconds later, the armor fell apart in the front and the back as the commander faltered and fell to the ground. A crimson substance flowed out of his body and spilled all over the dirt, even as Kraal detected with his X-ray scanners that the damage was already being repaired to the commander's internal organs.

Revision required. I was able to pierce the armor by attacking at the microscopic level, but the commander units have high regenerative capabilities. Threat level revised: Medium. Commander units are now worth fifteen points. Kraal sent the signal out and received unanimous confirmation in response.

Voltes offered a helpful suggestion. Unarin's data logs indicate the commander units are weak to the newly acquired neutralization energy. Suggestion: Weaken them with this energy, then pierce the armor with the particle cannon. In this way, they will not be able to heal.

Noted. You weaken, I will kill.

Unacceptable. You will receive more points than me.

Confirmed. Alteration: We will split the points eight to seven.

Acknowledged, Unit Kraal. That is a satisfactory arrangement.

The two Sentinels turned and walked towards the human defensive perimeter, even as all the humans' body reactions shifted to extreme alarm and most of them radiated pheromones indicative of a primitive fearful reaction.

Two commander units ran forwards and aimed their hands at the robots. Kraal watched silently as a wall of steel suddenly shot up out of the ground, blocking them from moving forward.

Organic commander units have the ability to create level one barriers. Their abilities defy the laws of physics.

Voltes hummed to the other Sentinels in the area and they all sent the confirmation signals. Acknowledged. Barrier is made of soft elements. It will not slow us down.

The massive Morphox took three huge steps, moving at an ungodly speed for his size, and in the next second, his arm raced forwards and pulverized the wall with a single punch. Stop relying on this unit for everything. These humans are insignificant compared to the Volgrim.

Kraal continued walking forward, waiting for Voltes to send out the neutralization energy beams before using his laser to cut out the hearts of the humans before them. One by one, the humans and their commander units began to die at satisfying speeds.

This is tedious. The scientists at Melkia put up a better fight.

Voltes hummed to himself in annoyance, and Kraal echoed his thoughts. Agreed. Being shut down for millions of cycles apparently did nothing to increase the threat level of the galaxy. A shame.

Perhaps after we exterminate the organics, we should create a new breed purely for combat purposes? That would be an entertaining endeavor. The two of them continued tearing down all who stood before them, even as they shared a tone of sadness.

A commander unit ran up and tossed a small device at the two robots. Kraal evaluated its warfare capabilities in an instant. Electromagnetic grenade. Projected damage levels:

Insignificant.

The grenade went off, causing no damage to the two of them as they tore the commander unit to ribbons, sending out a reminder to other Sentinels to ignore such devices in the future.

I wish they had kept me shut down for another million cycles. This is disheartening. Kraal intoned to himself as the Sentinels continued their unstoppable onslaught.

* * *

"Sensei! They can pierce through the Hypersuits now!" Echo's voice was frantic. "They can even suppress our healing! What do we do?!"

Sensei kept his voice neutral. "C-calm down, Echo. We just need to buy time. We're evacuating the civilians to Heaven. We've long since cleared away the bodies of the angels, so they won't know what Heaven used to be. These robots shouldn't be able to follow us to the other dimensions. For now, just keep drawing their attention. Original will be back soon!"

"He's been gone for hours! We can't hold off fifty thousand of these rob-" Echo stopped speaking abruptly, as his hand shot upwards towards his neck and stopped in midair. A moment later, his head fell from his body as his corpse flopped to the ground. A wave of anti-energy swept over the command post as the Sentinels arrived outside without warning.

Jesus! They're fast! Sensei didn't focus long on Echo. He was a brother, a friend, but a clone nonetheless. More could be made if necessary. This included Sensei himself of course, but still, he couldn't let sentimentality get in their way. They were all likely to die waiting while Original did... whatever the hell he was doing.

Gods, Original sounded like he was on the verge of something big. I hope he can figure something out.

A voice crackled over his hypersuit's communicator as he fled away from the forward base. It erupted into fire behind him after the Sentinels tore through it. "Sensei! You're one of Jason's top clones, correct?"

The voice was immediately familiar. "Commander Beatrix! I am, what's going on?"

"I'm sending reinforcements your way. Prototypes. These are a new robot called the Alpha Guard. We based them off the micro-dreadnoughts. They're much smaller and nimbler. They won't be able to do much against these Sentinels, but they might be able to cut human casualties down a bit."

"How many can you send?"

Her reply was breathless. "Five hundred thousand. We're pushing the fabricators to the max. We might get a thousand more out by day's end if we live that long."

"That's not nearly enough! Even ten-to-one, the Sentinels will cut them down!" Sensei muted the comm for a moment as he wordsmithed. " Wings! "

Angelic wings sprouted, shooting out through the back of his suit and allowing him to take to the air as he left the forward guard behind. "Beatrix, how many citizens of Mars have managed to evacuate?"

"About fifteen percent. We have several portals constructed, but there are millions of people! It would take several days to save everyone under circumstances we could prepare for!"

"I don't want excuses. If the Volgrim break into Termina Ursa... destroy the portals. I'd rather save half of humanity than none of it."

"You're confident they can't follow after the refugees into Heaven?"

"I'm not even remotely sure of that. We might get lucky, but so far the only capabilities they've shown is immense warmongering potential. Just keep at it!" Sensei cut the comm line and turned back to stare at the landscape below him.

This high up, he could barely hear the sound of the devastation below. An explosion sounded off as a human tossed a grenade at one of the Sentinels in a final act of futility before his entire body was melted down by an unseen beam.

Their reaction times are so much faster than ours. It's as if they perceive the universe on a level more advanced than us. To them, we are slugs trying to use slime as a deadly weapon. It won't work. Original was right, this level of destruction can't simply come from nowhere. The Volgrim played with fire, and now we're the ones being burned.

Sensei shot a look up into outer space. Somewhere up there, Unarin was watching, safe inside his vessel. He was probably smiling as he gloated about how the humans were being wiped out.

Bastard.

Sensei flew over towards another ridge where clones were being mowed down by a dozen of the death-bots.

"Centurion, alert me when Original returns to the battlefield. I need to speak with him at once."

"REMINDER SET, PILOT JASON HIRO."

The AI sent its affirmation, and Sensei glowered at the inside of the suit. "That isn't my goddamn name."

* * *

Satan stood beside an angel and a human, as both versions of Marie watched the monitor silently. The ferocity and emotionless violence of the robots didn't affect them, nor did the level of death, but still, all three felt ice in their veins.

"Those things will come for us next." The human spoke quietly, her voice barely a whisper. "I've taken it upon myself as a challenge to think of a way to beat them... but after hearing what happened to the universe of C137... I don't want to do anything desperate yet."

The angel glanced over at her human counterpart. "What happened to it?"

"It's the only other universe the Sentinels appeared. Jason destroyed the entire universe by accident."

Now Satan was flabbergasted. "You're kidding! I know wordsmithing is powerful, but how could he have possibly done such a thing?"

"He used 'Singularity' and accidentally let it get out of control. Idiot."

"Oh." Satan waited, but no explanation was forthcoming. "What's a singularity?"

"It's a human science thing."

"Ah, I see. I don't care then." Satan turned back to the screen just in time to wince as another clone was cut down by three Sentinels at the same time. "If this keeps up, I won't be able to get revenge on him for destroying my people. I can't just let these mechanical nightmares take over everything!"

"You'd better stay out of it, Satan dearest. I don't think you know what you're dealing with." The human Marie walked away and over to a large rectangular glass tank, where several little lizards slithered around inside. She pressed a button, and several flies were deposited inside, causing the lizards to frenzy after the fresh supply of food.

"I have no clue indeed. Humans and Volgrim... your species lack the power needed to rule, so you create artificial constructs to fight your wars for you. Cowardly, if you ask me. Crushing the skull of an opponent is the most satisfying way to win a battle."

"Yes, but our 'cowardly ways' also allow us to win." The angel glanced at the screen just in time to see a clone's head sliced in half. "Most of the time."

"It isn't doing you any favors now. The Volgrim's constructs turned on them, as they have attacked the humans. Soon, they will be at our doorstep." He scratched his chin thoughtfully. "Forget this. I can't stay here any longer. I'm going out there."

"It's your funeral." The angel had hardly spoken the words before Satan vanished with a quick movement of his hands.

She stared at the spot where he had been standing for a few moments before turning to look at her human counterpart. "Would you stop playing with the damn lizards? Help me find a way to stop the Sentinels!"

"I will, so calm your horses. I can't help it if my cuties are hungry." She leaned over and cooed softly at the little creatures running around in the glass before turning back to the angel. "Let's see what we can do."

Part 380a:

I open my eyes only to see blackness. My mouth feels like I'm chewing on a jellyfish. A weird gummy sensation, one that feels electrifying. I'm laying on the ground apparently, and when I raise my hand up to rub my forehead, I'm somewhat surprised when something stops me just short of doing so.

Oh, right. The hypersuit. Even with all its enhancements, I can't see a thing around me, or myself. Oddly enough, the inside of my Hypersuit is slightly illuminated, but the usual heads-up-display that I can see isn't on.

Wait! I remember now! I absorbed a star, and then I felt tired! Have I been asleep for a long time? I don't even know. "Centurion, how long have I been out?"

Seconds pass but no response. The suit seems completely inert, as if all of its systems have shut off. I don't know how to shut them down though... maybe they're burned out?

" Location. " I speak a word to figure out where I am, but it takes several seconds before anything happens. Finally, a word appears in my mind. Unknown.

Unknown? What the heck does that mean?

This suit feels stifling. I'm getting claustrophobic. Tentatively, I pull my helmet off and breathe in, surprised that it seems like there's oxygen... wherever I might be. When I tilt my head to look downwards, I notice the glowing that was inside of my helmet is somewhat more pronounced now, and I can see the front of my suit. It looks slightly banged up, but not damaged in a way that would make me think it had to shut down or anything. What's going on?

" Remove. " I wordsmith again, this time aiming at my suit. Several seconds pass, and just when I'm starting to wonder what's going on with my Wordsmithing, the suit abruptly vanishes, along with the rest of my clothes. Geez, this might be embarrassing if I weren't all alone in a pitch black void.

Only once my suit is gone do I finally see what's going on. My entire body is glowing, in a similar manner to Sensei's. The difference is that his glowed white, and his skin was slightly translucent. Mine, however, is colored bright yellow. When I hold my hand to stare at it, a small amount of electricity jolts off one of my fingers before dissipating an inch or so away from my body.

If I didn't know any better, I'd say I was supercharged... like some sort of battery.

And that's when the pain hits. I start to stand up, and suddenly my heart pounds and I wheeze loudly, stumbling forward and nearly falling on my face. I breathe hard and feel a weird cold sweat arrive from nowhere, but soon the feeling passes and all that's left is a painful clenching in my stomach.

Shit. I think it was a bad idea to absorb that star. Maybe because it was a different kind of energy compared to magical energy, it's like trying to gain the ability to breathe fire by eating a hundred hot candies at once.

My body isn't just glowing though; there also appears to be a faint skin-layer aura that surrounds and permeates me. Somehow, I know just by looking at it that if I didn't have this aura, I wouldn't be able to breathe right now.

I look down at the Hypersuit crumpled at my feet and shrug. It doesn't work right now anyway, might as well put it away. " Storage. "

Several seconds pass again, and finally, the suit vanishes. What the hell? Is something going on with my wordsmithing? That's the third time in a row it's suffered delays.

I don't know where I am, but I need to return to Mars. " Tele- "

" -port. " I'm only halfway done finishing the word when I immediately vanish from the void and appear on a familiar landscape, one with a dull crimson tone that surrounds me everywhere. The rapid change of scenery surprises me, as if I teleported here using my standard mental teleportation, and not via my Wordsmithing teleportation. That's not possible though since mental teleportation can't cross dimensions or vast distances without a huge energy cost.

Speaking of which, I might be wrong, but my energy seems quite a bit higher than before. That can't be right though; this feeling doesn't seem like a logical increase.

My pondering thoughts are interrupted when I blink and realize what I'm looking at. Corpses line the landscape, human and clone bodies are everywhere. I'm shocked to see my own face staring back at me wherever I look, some of them horribly mutilated, while others are decapitated in such a precise manner that it's hard to believe they're gone.

I can't tell one clone from the other, but I can still see a faint glow left behind that surrounds their bodies and slowly is evaporating upwards with a trickle of particles. Not just them, but the humans as well. My clones glow blue, the humans white.

That doesn't make sense. Why can I see an aura?

Where is everyone? How long have I been out of the loop? Am I... the last one here?

I tilt my head back up and look to my left, finally noticing that the city of Termina Ursa is only a few miles away. The fire rises, and I begin to notice the sounds of crumbling infrastructure, but no firefights or battles are going on. The entire planet is unnaturally quiet.

A flash of movement to my side. I jerk my head to look at it and am surprised to see a metal being, one who is robotic in nature. Without a doubt, this is a Sentinel.

The Sentinel doesn't move. It seems to gaze into my eyes as if it's evaluating me. Then it surprises me by actually speaking.

"Human. You are the one Unarin spoke of named Jason Hiro. Is my analysis correct?"

I narrow my eyes and feel my gut clench up again as a small wave of pain surges through me. Still, I keep standing up straight and make sure not to break eye contact. "That's right. And you're a Sentinel. You and your kind killed my clones and the humans around here. Is that about right?"

The robot takes a few moments to respond, and during that time I feel an odd humming sensation fill the air. It seems like a bunch of bees are buzzing all around me. Weird.

"I am the only Sentinel not to partake in the joy of this slaughter. My designation is Mulgris. I am the leader of my kind."

Mulgris, huh? I think Hawkeye mentioned that name. This robot must be the real deal.

"What's preventing you from attacking me? Afraid?"

The robot tilts its head up ever so slightly. "Fear is a primitive sensation felt by Class 2 life-forms. I am a Class 5 life-form. I have no such need of those emotions. As for you, I am merely evaluating you. You possess the same facial structure and DNA signature as that of the thousands of commander units we've killed, yet every other signature is completely different."

It seems to move backward ever so slightly. "Moreover, your energy signature is unlike that which we have faced before. I have concluded you must be a new lifeform."

Before I can respond, I perceive more rapid motion, this time behind me. I quickly turn my head around and see several hundred other Sentinels have appeared behind me, with blurs of motion denoting even more arriving. They're moving at ludicrous speeds, appearing as blurs even to my trained eyes.

" Percep- " Before I can finish wordsmithing to improve my perception, I feel the sensation of time slowing down instantly, making me wonder what the hell is seriously going on right now. The blurs I could scarcely see at all before move at much more reasonable speeds now, and I can finally perceive their legs moving to propel themselves forwards.

These metal hunks of junk are real monsters.

Mulgris speaks again. "Jason Hiro, if that is your actual designation. We have eliminated all organics from this planet and the space surrounding it. However, we detected a temporal tear, and it vanished before we could reopen it. You will take us to the rest of your kind, and in exchange, we will spare your life."

I smile at him finally, feeling a bit of tension ease up. "Couldn't catch all of them, huh? I had hoped they would remember the emergency evacuation protocols. Thank you for letting me know they've escaped." I raise an eyebrow up and lean slightly forwards towards Mulgris. "You don't really think threatening me will give you access to them, do you?"

A flash of motion. Pain explodes across my face, and I'm horribly disoriented before I can even understand what just happened. Several seconds pass and I blink, realizing Mulgris or one of its lackeys must have hit me, sending me flying backward and smashing into the dirt.

A few moments later though, the pain vanishes, and I quickly stand back up.

Mulgris is several hundred feet away, but it closes the gap instantly, arriving before me and stopping to stand perfectly still once again. I feel that same weird humming sensation for a second before it speaks. "Extremely high regeneration levels. You are unlike the other commander units."

I'm getting angry now. This... worthless pile of bolts... it and all of the other Sentinels attacked humanity, wiped us out, and now it thinks it can hit me and get away with it?

I don't even know if Amelia is okay, or anyone else. I can't worry about them though, because right now I'm pissed. I'm really goddamn angry.

I stand up slowly and dust myself off, realizing that I'm still not wearing any clothes. Before I can even wordsmith to put something on, clothes start forming on my body to cover me up.

Thoughtsmithing.

The word appears in my mind, unbidden. I lick my lips slowly at the thought. Is it possible? Is that what's going on here? Have I somehow mutated into an advanced stage of my hero ability?

Better test it out. As Mulgris stares at me silently, I aim my mind at it and imagine a metal coffin surrounding him. A second later, it appears, enclosing him in an instant. A few seconds later the container explodes outwards, evidently not being nearly robust enough to contain the Sentinel.

Melt.

I think the word and aim it at the robot, but nothing happens. Then I remember what Sensei told me... they have some way to nullify direct magic aimed at them. But Umi informed me that with enough power, this might not be such a barrier.

"Umi, are you listening?"

The Sentinel shifts slightly. "My designation is not Umi."

"Yes, Jason Hiro. I am listening." A familiar computerized voice is audible from a comm tower nearby, broadcasting via a loudspeaker from the now-ruined command post.

"Do you have any hypotheses about my body currently? I absorbed a star."

"An interesting move, one that is sure to provide much stimulation for my processors. I had surmised such a move might enable you to pass beyond your limits; however, I also considered it was not without its risks."

"Such as?"

Mulgris continues to stare silently and evaluates our conversation while we speak. It occurs to me that it and Umi are not related, and thus Mulgris might lack a lot of information regarding specifically how my powers work. Or not. Difficult to say.

"A star uses an energy type that should be incompatible with your human body. If the absorption succeeded, I could only presume you will experience numerous unknown side effects. I have no information on what may occur. As usual, your low-level intelligence manages to interest me."

Fucking hell. She's mocking me again. "Thanks, Umi. You're the best."

Still... numerous side effects, huh? If a bit of stomach cramping and heart palpitations are all I'm experiencing, that seems like a good tradeoff. "Umi, how much has my power level increased?"

There is a short pause before she answers. "Roughly by a scale of 800,000 times what it was before."

I continue to stare forwards, but I feel incredulous. Is... is this why the Sentinels have not attacked me yet? Are they evaluating my combat abilities?

I don't even know what I'm capable of. This should be enough power to have saved Earth when the Moon came crashing down. Why didn't Umi tell me about this?

"Mulgris. I ask you again... are you afraid of me?"

I don't give him a moment to respond. "You killed many of my friends. If you aren't afraid now, you will be."

Wordsmithing doesn't work on the Sentinels, huh? Maybe I don't need wordsmithing. I hold my hand up and imagine a sword appearing. A moment later, a scale replica of Excalibur appears, and though this is a fake, it will suit my purposes. I slash at my arm and wince slightly, but the wound heals up almost instantly. Then I stab through my hand and yank the blade out, but the pain feels even less than it was before.

Invincible. I thoughtsmith and my desire comes to mind. When I stab the sword at my hand once again, it hits my skin and stops, as if my skin has become like iron. I lose feeling in my body like what always happens, and the lack of touch sensation is a bit jarring, but it will have to do. Can't take a chance with Sentinels.

Speed. Speed. Speed. Speed. I stare forwards at the robot in front of me, as it smugly evaluates me, thinking it knows anything about me.

For a full minute, I continue to thoughtsmith, eventually working on my perception. At some point, I begin to see individual microscopic drops of vapor form in the air as the atmosphere itself halts around me.

Calmly, I walk to the side and smile as Mulgris' single red iris stares forward at the spot I was at before. Unlike before I absorbed the sun, my energy has barely dropped at all despite the amount of time slowdown I'm subjecting myself to. Previously, this level of slowed time would deplete my reserves in an instant.

But now...

I reach over and grab the Sentinel by the neck, then drag it over to all of the other ones. I toss it lightly forwards but the instant it leaves my grasp, Mulgris is suspended in midair.

How fast am I moving right now? I'm not sure. It's time to take a walk.

Teleport.

* * *

I arrive in Heaven. As expected, the place is teeming with humans. I breathe a sigh of relief as I glance around and see hundreds of clones in the immediate area surrounding the Temple of Artemis. Average humans litter the landscape as far as the eye can see, and miles away there are faintly visible hulls of starships that were brought here. Nice work, clones.

Locate.

I immediately search for and find Sensei, as well as a few other key clones. Harold is also located, as is Helen and a few others, but I feel weird. Amelia isn't here. I can't locate her anywhere, in fact.

Is she dead? Is that possible? It makes no sense. Amelia is the one who will kill Satan! If she dies after the cosmos has gone to all this effort to keep things on the same path, it will baffle my mind.

Maybe there's another explanation. I teleport over to Sensei, who has his helmet off and his glowing skin is visible. A quick glance at his head and my arms tells me what I need to know. My skin is not the same as his. Whatever is happening to me, it's different.

Sensei is standing at attention, with a hand waving at someone and he appears to be in the middle of directing some various activities. It looks like the fallback to Heaven was a good backup plan.

Normalize.

I bring myself back to normal speed and appear in front of Sensei. It takes him a second, but he hops back in surprise. "Original?! You're back? Where have you been?!"

My arrival makes all of my clones nearby look up in alarm. In fact, I feel their gazes turn and home in on me, no matter where they are in heaven. I feel like a beacon that draws their attention.

"I absorbed a star."

My simple explanation makes Sensei smile weakly. "You... absorbed a star? We lost thousands of clones, and millions of humans, but at least you were off having fun."

He pauses again and fidgets slightly. "Come to think of it; my chest hurts suddenly. There's a weird feeling emanating from you right now."

I take a minute and explain what's happened, and he simply nods along before explaining what happened during the Sentinel attack.

"Umi told me there might be some side effects, but other than a bit of internal pain, nothing serious has happened yet. I'm adapting remarkably well."

Sensei finally shakes his head. "You're powerful for sure. But at this rate, I don't see even you beating the Sentinels. They move too fast and hit too hard. Wordsmithing is nullified against them for the most part, and that which isn't, doesn't hurt them at all. We don't have a prayer."

"I wonder about that." I chew on my finger slowly, realizing I still can't feel a thing. It's almost like I'm gnawing on a rock. "Where is Amelia? I can't locate her."

Sensei frowns. "I don't know. I've been busy trying to get the millions of refugees settled. Last I saw, she was aboard the Mothership."

"She isn't there. I can't find her even with wordsmithing."

Sensei suddenly seems worried. "There are only a few ways that 'locate' can't find someone, Original. They have to be inside of an anti-energy field, inside a whole other universe... or dead."

"I can't let myself think like that. Amelia isn't dead. She's far too hardy. She has to kill Satan, after all."

A thought occurs to me. "The last time I saw Amelia was moments before I left to absorb the star. Maybe she went searching for me when I left abruptly. I just didn't have time to explain what I was doing."

"Yeah, maybe that's it. Possibly." Sensei doesn't seem too sure. "I can help you look for her, but I need to finish here first."

"That's fine. I need to finish with the Sentinels first. Amelia is important to me, but if I don't stop the Sentinels quickly, there's no telling what will happen next."

Sensei's smile fades away. "If only you knew. You weren't there... didn't see it firsthand. Nothing could stop them. Watch yourself, Original. If you die... I don't know what will happen next, especially to the clones. We might all disappear."

"Yeah, I know. Don't worry, they can't kill me. I'm far stronger than them now."

Sensei glares at me. "How many times have you- have WE said that? Don't get cocky. A power-up, no matter how big, is nothing compared to what can go wrong when we overestimate our abilities. Remember what happened to Earth!"

He shakes his head and turns away, and of course, I know he's right. "Yeah. I'll keep that in mind. Take care of yourself."

I spare a long look in the direction of the spaceships before thinking again. Teleport.

* * *

When I arrive back down on Mars, I quickly realize that there are far more Sentinels here than there were before. Mulgris appears before me in an instant.

"Your threat level has been designated as Extremely High. However, due to your superior genetics, we desire to apprehend you so that we might conduct experiments in order to adequately determine whether the integration of your abilities into our systems might be possible. Your consent is unnecessary."

A thousand explosions impact me as microscopic lasers smash into my body in an uncountable number of places. However, I stand perfectly still, as I can't feel any of the attacks. Still, I'm surprised by my ability to perceive such small attacks. Sensei was right that they use microscopic lasers, but there's no way I should be able to see such things. Have my senses been enhanced too?

The attacks cease, and I feel a tremendous humming in the air, which stops a few moments later.

"Our attacks are having no effect on you. They should be destroying you at the cellular level."

I silently wordsmith my speed and perception back up, this time adding in a massive dose of strength. "Sounds like you don't like it when a bigger, badder fish treats you like a plaything."

I grab Mulgris by the foot and hurl him into one of the nearby smaller Sentinels, though he freezes in midair as he leaves my grasp. Dashing forwards, I systematically begin grabbing each sentinel and throwing them at the same spot, into one massive pile. Time is all but frozen now, so with the speed at which I'm hurling them, it's probably a significant percentage of the speed of light.

Many minutes pass as I dash around, piling them all together in one massive heap, though some of the giant Sentinels have to be punched forwards since I can't wrap my arms around them. The whole time, my energy scarcely dips down at all.

Finally, once the pile of tens of thousands of Sentinels is created, I thoughtsmith a massive bag around them, made of highly enhanced materials that should hold their weight. Following this, I create a pitch black void dimension, one just like what I woke up inside not even an hour ago. Finally, I create a portal, and use my enhanced telekinesis to shove the several story tall bag inside of the portal before destroying it.

In the span of a few real world seconds, I've sealed the Sentinels into another dimension.

It was... so simple. Can they escape? I don't know.

I teleport to the dimension I shoved them into. Normalize.

Returning to standard time, it takes only a few moments before they erupt from the bag, somewhat confused by where they are now. I can hardly even see them, so I mentally wordsmith Illuminate to brighten the place up. An unseen light source allows them to see me, and Mulgris steps forward immediately.

"Human. What is this place? Why have you brought us here?"

"You're the hyper-intelligent death robots. Why not take a guess? You have plenty of time to think."

It only takes a moment to respond. "You plan to seal us here."

"Not really 'plan' to. I've already done it. Since Umi said she couldn't shut you down, and you can't travel to the dimension where we've hidden the humans, this seems like a fitting place to leave you."

Many seconds pass and Mulgris swivels its head to look at the other Sentinels, as that strange humming feeling spreads through the air again.

When Mulgris turns back, I wait expectantly for it to say something clever, but instead, I feel a stinging pain as every Sentinel at once hits me with green lasers. Alarmingly, I realize in an instant these are anti-energy lasers.

Despite the power the lasers once held over me, I feel as though they aren't hurting at all like they used to. I vanish instantly via teleportation and arrive back on Mars.

The Sentinels can't follow me. I've trapped them.

I... won?

It feels like a hollow victory. They killed millions, and the best I could do was trap them. Perhaps.... there's another way.

Locate.

I hunt for Unarin, but the search comes up blank. I can't find him at all.

What the heck? Is he hiding? Maybe he wrapped himself inside of an anti-energy field in order to hide from me.

Unarin... Amelia... I can't find either one. I need to find both of them.

Wait, there's another way. I turn back to that broadcasting tower from Earlier. "Umi, can you locate Unarin for me?"

"Naturally." Her grating awful robotic voice responds for once with a simple affirmation. "Unarin is dead."

"He's dead? How? Why?"

"The Sentinel identified as Mulgris killed him. I do not understand the reasoning. The Sentinels are flawed, in that they were originally created from the minds of physical beings. As such, they possess small traces of emotion and other such unnecessary logical information constrictors. Their motivations mostly evade me."

"Oh." I don't know what to say. I always assumed he would go out in a blaze of glory. Are the Sentinels that powerful? Were they able to crush him that quickly? "Umi, is there a way I can eradicate the Sentinels completely with my Wordsmithing?"

"There is." A female voice responds, but it isn't Umi's. "I would advise against it though."

I turn around and narrow my gaze. It's not possible. It... can't be. "Marie? What are you doing here? I killed you!"

The redheaded woman shrugs and takes a puff of a cigarette. "You did. Or at least, sort of. You're a smart guy, how do you think I'm here now?" I shake my head slowly in disbelief and she exhales some smoke and grins. "I'm joking, you're an idiot. Obviously I'm not the original Marie. I'm a clone. She made several hundred of us and scattered us all over the place. We're protected by anti-energy, so even if you wanted to locate all of us, you wouldn't be able to."

"I find that hard to believe."

"Believe what you want. I'm standing right here." She holds her hand up. "Also, don't go crazy and kill me again. Not only is it pointless, I'm here to help. I don't want to be crushed by a goddamn boulder."

"I wasn't going to kill you." I'm lying, of course. I totally want to... maybe she has something worth hearing.

"Of course not. Anyway, I'm here because I need to be. I was monitoring Mars following the Sentinel attack and was quite surprised when they began to mass outside of Termina Ursa. The fact you're here and... glowing yellow... tells me you did something pretty remarkable."

I don't respond, and she continues. "You told Umi you absorbed a star. Is that correct?"

There's no point denying it at this point. "Yeah. I did."

"Right. Honestly, I hadn't even considered you could do such a thing. Anyway, I'm just here to warn you not to take things too far. I don't want another C137 on my hands."

"A what?"

"Nothing."

She's cryptic, as always. I keep that thought to myself.

"Marie, what are you trying to get at? I have things to be doing right now."

She stares at me silently for a moment before lifting her head up to look at the darkening blood-red sky. "I'm not a bad person, Jason. You know that, right?"

"Huh? What's this about now? I'm not a pastor, and this isn't the confession booth."

She shakes her head slowly. "You misunderstand. I have done nothing wrong, from my point of view. I'm a greedy, selfish person. I only care about myself, but that doesn't make me a bad person."

She's acting awfully weird. "You killed millions of humans in the Americas with the world-shocking Earthquakes. Your anti-energy weapons led to the Volgrim and the Demons all but exterminating the Angels, and in kind finishing the job later on. I wouldn't call those good deeds."

"You killed trillions of Volgrim, billions of demons, and are thus at least partially to blame for the destruction of Earth, and therefore 90% of humanity. You don't have a lot of room to talk."

Her words sting. "Marie, I don't have time for this. Get on with it."

She flicks the cigarette off to the side and puts her hands on her hips. "You said once that in the future you come from, humanity was put inside of bubble worlds, the demons ruled everything, the angels were gone, and there was no sign of the Volgrim. Sound about right?"

"Yeah."

"Then apparently we're heading on the path to repeating things. My question to you is 'why not'? Were humans in peril in the future? Considering what remained of the races, didn't things seem rather balanced to you?"

I lower my head slowly. "Yes, I have considered that. Are you asking me to recreate the future intentionally?"

"I am. Humanity, so long as it continues to gain new information and new weaponry, always craves more. Perhaps by forcing humans to live in feudal societies, you can allow them to live peacefully. Not coexisting alongside the demons, but living away from them, where they can do no harm."

"What about the Sentinels? I can't leave them be."

"I agree. I suspect that where you stuck them won't last forever. I don't expect that magic is impossible for beings other than heroes and angels and the demons to obtain. Hell, given time, I might even be able to become someone with magical power. Think of the Enforcers, for example."

"So... what you're saying is... the Sentinels may be able to harness the power of magic, given time?"

She lowers her head, and our eyes meet. "Exactly. They're unbelievably dangerous now. Without a doubt, given a chance, they will become unstoppable if that should happen."

"So I need to destroy them."

"Yes. However, their bodies are not made of ordinary metal. The substance they use is something new. It doesn't exist in our known periodic table. I suspect it's some form of living metal which reforms itself once destroyed. The atoms 'learn' the positioning of other atoms nearby and can rebuild if their neighbors are destroyed."

I sigh deeply. "Come on, Marie. Layman terms, please."

Thankfully, she keeps it simple. "Much like how you can heal yourself if you're injured, they can fully regenerate from just a single leftover fragment."

"How would you possibly know that?"

"You were gone a long time. Your clones nearly destroyed the Sentinels, several times over. I had many opportunities to witness it."

Somehow her reply feels disingenuous. I ignore the feeling.

"Marie... I can deal with the Sentinels later. Right now, I have to deal with- URRGH." I suddenly double over in pain as a wave of nausea overtakes me. The pain from the absorption has arrived in full force, and now I'm doubled over in agony in front of a mortal enemy. There's no way she won't take this chance to stab me in the back.

It turns out I'm wrong. Marie watches silently until I can pick myself up. Sweat pours down my face, and I feel haggard, but she just continues to stare. "You okay? That looked rather painful."

Her tone is filled with biting sarcasm. "Stuff it. Probably just side effects from absorbing an entire star."

"Yes, I can see that." She shrugs. "Oh, by the way, Satan wanted me to let you know something."

My suspicions instantly dial up to eleven. "Yeah? What's that?"

"He has your girlfriend. The one with the long black hair."

Her voice is so calm, but I'm immediately filled with rage. "What?! He has Amelia?! Why? What reason could he have?!"

She smiles and laughs. "Like I know! He seems so dismal lately! Anyway, if you can find him, you'll find her. Hop to it!"

I can't help but stare at her silently for several moments. Was that all she was leading up to? Was she just leading me around like a dog on a leash?

"I should really kill you."

"Do what you please. There are hundreds more to replace me." Despite saying this, she deftly reaches down to her side and presses a previously unseen button on her belt. "Toodles."

With a flash of bright light, Marie vanishes, and I'm left wondering what the hell's going on in the universe.

Where did Satan hide Amelia?

Part 381a: Culmination

Satan wants to play hide and seek. I'm not having it. Without a doubt, this is a trap. If I rush into it, Satan will laugh all the way to the bank.

My best option is to get some backup.

Teleport.

I arrive back in Heaven right in front of Sensei, and he jumps back in fright. "Goddammit! Stop doing that!"

"Sorry. This is important. Satan has Amelia, and he's openly invited me to use 'locate' to find him. It has to be a trap."

Sensei stares at me silently for a moment. "You do love Amelia, right?"

"What? Of course. That's why I have to save her." Sensei's question throws me off. "Is now really the best time for philosophy?"

Sensei scratches his glowing forehead and sighs. "Look, you and I both know how the future played out. We don't know the details though. Amelia is supposed to kill Satan, that's how it should go down."

"Yeah, what's your point? Where are you going with this?"

"I'm just asking if you're serious. Satan is probably going to manipulate you. He might use her as leverage to force you into a battle on uneven terrain, especially now that your power levels are a million times higher than before. Unlike me, he can sense your aura after all."

"He's going to use her as a hostage somehow, then?"

Sensei smiles, but his expression is filled with pain. "Without a doubt. That's how the demons operate. Give them an inch, and they'll use it to stab you in the eye."

"That doesn't make sense."

"Shut up."

Finally, for the first time today, both of us laugh for a moment before getting serious again.

"Are you ready, Sensei?"

"Yeah. Just take us there already."

"You asked for it."

I aim my mind at the vast cosmos around me. Locate. Teleport.

* * *

We arrive at a bland, empty, desolate landscape, and immediately I duck down and look around quickly. This place is completely flat, and there's nothing but the dirt under my feet. No hills, no rocks, no rivers, not even a few patches of grass. Just dirt as far as the eye can see. The air smells empty, unlivable. The silence is unnerving.

This place is an artificial dimension, without a doubt.

"Glad you could join us." Satan's voice speaks aloud and nearly makes me jump out of my skin, though Sensei isn't affected at all. As if by magic, or rather, because of magic, an invisible veil parts in front of Sensei and I to reveal Satan, Marie, and Amelia. Amelia is unharmed and... she looks completely bored. What?

"Jason! Finally, you're here! I've been waiting for like, ten hours, you know." Amelia's lilting voice tapers off almost immediately as she finishes the sentence and glowers at me cutely. "It's not nice to keep a lady waiting."

Satan rolls his eyes. "As promised, there he is. Go ahead." He waves his hand, and Amelia hops over to me and smiles cheerfully. "We've been talking about ALL sorts of things! You wouldn't believe it!"

I'm confused. "You're not a prisoner? I thought he was using you as a hostage."

She raises an eyebrow. "As if! You're hysterical sometimes! Also wow, you're all glowy and stuff! Cool!"

Even Marie seems a bit perturbed. "She would not stop yammering about how Satan had to be terrified of her because she's the one who will kill him. She thinks she's invincible."

" Knows. It's not a guess." Amelia sticks her tongue out at Marie, before reaching over to grab my hand. "Jason, I-"

The moment she touches my hand, a powerful bolt of electricity leaps off and zaps her, making her yelp in surprise as she jerks back and rubs her hand. "Owie! What the heck!"

I suddenly feel guilty and want to say sorry, but I didn't realize my recent power-up had changed me so much. "S-sorry. I devoured a star and my body changed a bit."

She looks away from my eyes sheepishly. "Actually, I might have liked it."

Uh. What?

"I'm going to barf. Let's not forget why we came here, Original." Sensei groans audibly and gestures towards the demon and the human before us.

Marie and Satan both look at each other for a moment and grimace. Now I feel self-conscious.

"We'll talk about this later, Amelia. I'm glad you're safe."

"Of course I'm safe! What, you thought Satan could kill me? He's scared to death! Just look at him!" Amelia gives me a duh expression and looks back at Satan with a stupid grin on her face. "Are you going to admit it finally?"

Satan shakes his head slowly. "There are a great many things that need clarification here, Jason one and two. The first is the matter of her invincibility. It's absurd. If killing her was my goal, I'd have easily done so already. She is nowhere near my level."

Amelia gawks at him, but I step in before she can blabber again. "Right, I get it. Stop wasting my time. I have an army of death robots to figure out how to destroy if you're not here to fight."

"No, I am here to fight. Make no mistake, only one of us will walk away today, Jason Hiro. I just needed to confirm something... Jason, are you aware of the existence of parallel universes?"

I shoot a quick glance at Sensei, but he just shrugs. "I've read a few theories. Why?"

Satan smirks. "So you don't know, then. None of the Jasons do, at least not yet. Or if they do know, they've been uncharacteristically quiet. To what end, I cannot fathom. I must presume they lack the knowledge."

Before he can continue, Marie grabs his arm. "Satan, is that what this is about? Don't be a fool. If you tell him, it will-"

Satan glares at her angrily and shoves her to the ground. "Take your hands off me, filthy human! Long have I silently held my tongue and listened to your beguiling words, but it ends today! Everything does! This is the day I finally prove that time is not constant! I won't be locked to a future where I must die! I am not going to be crushed by some impudent little girl!" Satan stares at Marie for several seconds before returning to a strange smile that he creepily sends in my direction.

"I had time to speak with your wench. Amelia is nothing special. Belial warned me of a strange power inside of her, yet that power is nothing, in the end. She's even weaker than most heroes I've fought. Not even worth the time to order a minion to kill her. But, you... you have come close to killing me once before. And now, you stand there posed like the first Hero I ever fought. Hercules was a warrior unlike any other, but I crushed him just as I will crush you."

"Big words. I didn't just increase my pool of energy, Satan. I have other abilities now."

Sensei turns to me and speaks almost in a hushed whisper. "He's planning something. Don't let his words distract you."

Satan can apparently hear him. "I have no need for tricks. Look around you! I created a barren landscape for the simple reason that there is no place to hide! I will win today, no matter what actions you take to fight me. It is preordained."

"Jesus Christ, shut up already! You're giving me a headache!" Amelia puts her hands on her hips and starts getting pissy, a rare sight for the usually smiling girl. "You're blabbing like some comic book villain! We've already beaten you in the future, so that means if we didn't kill you here, it would be a paradox! You can't just rewrite the rules of time!"

Satan doesn't seem mad at her comment. Instead, he smiles again and licks his lips. "Weren't you listening? We are not in the only universe. There are many others, ones where Jason doesn't exist, ones where I don't exist, ones where the angels and humans ultimately defeat the demons and Volgrim... and they all stem from a single universe. A single seed."

Satan points at me. "You are the reason, Jason Hiro. Before the event that caused you to rewind time, there was only one universe. One linear timeline. I have long had the memories you gave me to learn how everything works. I confirmed and denied many theories over the years, and now I know for certain it is true. I do not have to die. I can live and rule for all eternity!"

Amelia scoffs. "This whole speech makes me think you're just trying to convince yourself of that. I'm not buying it."

Satan's smile fades away. "You don't have to believe me. It's already happened. All I needed was for Jason to make a single critical mistake, and of course, he did not fail to meet my expectations. Funnily, the mistake didn't happen the way I expected it to, but this is close enough. It will have to do."

His crypticness makes the hair on the back of my neck rise. "Get behind me, Amelia. He's planning something!"

She keeps the smile on her face, but I feel as if a crack appears in her facade, and only I can see it.

Satan stares at me listlessly. "It is a great irony that I will take the power of godhood thanks to an ability stolen from my worst enemy. I have only Zeus to thank for this."

Satan reaches his hand up to his face and immediately I thoughtsmith to myself. Shield! Shield! Two dense layers of energy shields spread around the three of us in an instant as Satan chuckles to himself. "Not fast enough."

Satan bites his hand. A moment later, he vanishes.

What the hell? Where did he go?!

A sickening crunching noise blasts to my side. I whirl my head over and pale as I feel the universe slow down. Sensei's head explodes into a million fragments as Satan delivers a single punch directly into his skull. Just as I catch a glimpse of Satan, the demon vanishes, and I watch silently as my clone falls to the ground, dead.

"S... Sensei?" I stare at his corpse numbly. What happened? How? Satan vanished and then appeared? Teleportation?

Why wasn't Sensei wearing his helmet? Why didn't I think of-Oh... god.

I look back to Marie right as Satan reappears. "It is done."

Marie stares in shock at Sensei's body. "You... did it."

"I did. I have stolen the power of Wordsmithing."

I can barely even think right now. Bolts of lightning shoot off my body and shred the ground around me as my breathing sharpens and my nostrils flare. "You... killed... my best friend..." My teeth gnash and I feel my eyes bulging.

"Calm down now, Jason. You haven't a prayer of winning. You have Wordsmithing, as do I. However, I also possess the power of hundreds of heroes and angels. I outrank you now." Satan bows and grins widely. "Running away would be advisable."

He's speaking, isn't he? I hear the words, but I can't understand the meaning. All I can do is mentally think the same words over and over as he cackles to himself.

SPEED! PERCEPTION! SPEED! PERCEPTION! SPEED! PERCEPTION!

Over and over, my mind races as I glare into the soulless eyes of the monster that killed my closest friend. His laugh grows slower every second, and momentarily he comes to a standstill as do all the noises around me.

STRENGTH! STRENGTH STRENGTH!

I bellow the words into the recesses of my brain until I can almost feel my body bursting at the seams.

Then I move forwards.

Pounding his body with fists made of a material that can no longer be called flesh, my invulnerable body bashes him countless times every second and I smash him forwards for miles on end, occasionally stopping to grab him by a flailing limb and break him over a knee before whipping him into the ground like a crash test dummy. Far too quickly for him to perceive, I finally let go and watch as his momentum comes to a screeching halt as his body re-enters normal time.

When I look at his face, my rage fades, and I feel melancholic. He's still smiling, despite everything I just did to him. When I re-enter normal time, will he even know how his death came? Is there a chance?

Why the fuck is he smiling?! It pisses me off! He doesn't have the right to feel joy!

He killed... Sensei. Sensei was more than just a clone. We fought sometimes, quarreled over matters, but he was always there to put me on the straight and narrow. He didn't deserve to go out so unceremoniously. He should have died in honorable combat. I thought Satan was going to aim for me. I thought that Satan was a demon who believed in honorable fights.

I was wrong.

I stare at the smiling face of the demon suspended in midair before me. "I'll never be able to repay you for what you just did to me. This isn't even close."

Normalize.

I reflexively take a deep breath as time reverts, only for a titanic blast of air to erupt in front of me and send me careening backward head over heel at breakneck speeds. Before I know it, I've stopped moving, but the world is still spinning. I can't think straight.

I close my eyes and stifle a sensation of nausea, as that familiar feeling of agony erupts in my stomach again. These side effects still catch me off guard.

Heal. Calm. I try to thoughtsmith, but the pain won't subside. It's like trying to stop a skin tumor by dropping a pill on it. The treatment might be correct, but the method for administering the antidote isn't.

Finally, I force myself to sit up, even though the world won't stop spinning. When I do, I blink in surprise. Satan is standing before me, dusting himself off. A massive crater is blasted out just behind him, stretching for miles in the distance afterward.

"You thought it would be that simple, huh?"

From behind, Amelia and Marie run up, though Marie is gasping for Air and Amelia isn't even slightly winded. "Jason! Are you all right? What happened?!"

I ignore her and stare up at Satan in wonder. "I... you should be... how can you be alive after that?"

"I've had years to prepare, whelp. I played the fool, always letting you get the upper hand when possible. When you came within inches of killing me in New York City, that was when I knew your powers were the key to unstoppable power. You can't defeat me now, Jason. While I was in Zeus's Hypertime, I cast several powerful wordsmithing spells, one of which was 'invincibility.' The next was 'protect,' followed by 'prevent.' You will not be able to kill me by physical means, you will not be able to harm me via magical means, and you will not be able to undo my wordsmithing protections with your wordsmithing."

Satan smiles and gazes up at the white sky above. "I wondered if this day would come. I might be the only version of myself to have the power to rival the Creator."

I jump to my feet and hustle over to Amelia, keeping her behind me. "The Creator? What do you mean by that?"

Satan shrugs. "Who knows? Nobody has seen the bastard since the beginning of the universe. But thanks to your powers, even he will not be a threat to me. You and I can fight forever, and we'll never kill each other."

His lip seems to tremble for a moment as he finally swings his gaze from the sky to meet my eyes. "Despite all this power, I still hate you. You've killed billions, even trillions of my demons over the years. Not just you, but the gods and angels too. All of you. Even if I kill you a million times over, I can never hurt you in the same way you have done to me."

Marie finally speaks up. "Perhaps there is a way we might make a truce between the three remaining races. We should try and stop this here."

"Not a chance. I've lost nearly everything thanks to this human and his ilk. I'll never forgive them." Satan's nostrils flare out. "All the things you've taken from me... we might be invincible foes who can't harm one another, but we still have weaknesses. And you... you have such a simple one."

His eyes lower and I realize he's looking at Amelia. "Leave her out of this. You've taken enough from me today!"

"I haven't. You deserve eternal damnation, boy." Satan suddenly erupts into derisive laughter. "Hah hah hah! Think of it! You had a power that the Creator himself would envy, yet you never thought of its abstract effects!" Satan's voice goes quiet as Death itself as he speaks a single word. " Create. "

A moment later, a tiny marble sized ball of pure blackness appears in the air in front of him. "You had the power all this time. All it would have taken was a little imagination. The word doesn't need to be specific, Jason. You can imagine whatever you like when you speak. You don't deserve to have this power."

His eyes dart down to Amelia, and I immediately thoughtsmith in response.

Not this time! Invincibility!

An invisible aura appears and protects Amelia, but Satan stares at me with sadness in his eyes. "So simple minded. I can feel when the magical energy leaves your body. You don't need to speak to wordsmith anymore, do you, Jason? As if that changed things in the slightest."

His deadly gaze makes my blood chill. He continues with a single word. " Teleportation. "

He vanishes from in front of me and appears behind Amelia. I whirl around and grab her in a tight embrace as he sends the pitch black marble at us.

"Oopsy." Satan snickers as the tiny marble flies at Amelia, smashes into her back, and explodes. Amelia opens her mouth to gasp, but no sound comes out. A soft warmth spreads across my chest and I look down and feel my breathing halt. Her entire chest cavity is missing. There's nothing but a hole in her back.

Jason. Her lips move, but no sound comes out.

" HEAL! HEAL! " I yell the word out and watch in desperation as her eyes go cold. No no no...

Her body slumps in my arms, and a moment later her eyes stare ahead blankly. Her soul has left.

"Wordsmithing can't save the wench now." Satan's smile is gone as he stares at her silently. "Even a god has limits."

I can barely hear him. This is too much. How could he be such a monster? She was no danger to him. He didn't do this because he wanted to get rid of a threat, but because he wanted to wound me.

He killed the woman I love.

Wordsmithing won't save him now.

Part 382a: Oh Dear

Even as I stare at the demon before me and my vision goes red with rage, the warmth of her blood flowing down my arms slows as the heal magic finishes. It's far too late to save her now. I can see the particles from her aura flooding upwards. Just like with that girl in the car crash, the body can be healed, but the soul will not return.

Satan's tongue slips out and licks his lips greedily. "You tried to make her invincible, didn't you? An obvious ploy, one I assumed you would attempt. I already prevented that during Zeus's Quantum Speed, though I didn't have time to prepare for every eventuality. Luckily, you're predictable."

I slowly lower Amelia's body to the ground and caress her eyes with two fingers, closing them softly. "You didn't have to kill her. I can't believe I never realized what a coward you are."

"Punish me, then, if you can! Use your new power to crush me! Perhaps you should try removing my invincibility with your wordsmithing, or maybe you can dream up a weapon that pierces through the power of magic! I'm sure an anti-energy weapon would nullify my invincibility adequately."

He's mocking me. They all are. Everyone calls me an idiot. It's not true though... I'm just lazy. I always think of a simple solution to a problem and then rely on it until it fails. If I had to guess, I would say it's my biggest failing as a member of the exalted Heroes. Arthur's weakness was his guilt, and how he could never forgive himself. I've long since forgiven myself for what I've had to do... but this is different. Amelia is dead because of my inaction. Sensei was crushed faster than I could react. Satan thinks this is a simple game, one that he's planned out meticulously.

Slowly, I stand up until I'm staring eye to eye with the Devil. He's as big and bulky as I am, though not nearly as big as that one demon general of his. To a casual observer, we might appear to be equals, but he seems to be winning in the brains department.

What can I use to pulverize him? He said I should try to undo his invincibility and to use an anti-energy weapon, but that probably means he already has counters for them. He's anticipating my moves again. There has to be a solution. One he doesn't know about...

I swivel my head to look over at Marie. Something has always bugged me. How does one human woman put demon emperors, angels, and heroes to shame on a regular basis? She may be smart, but that can't be all there is to it. She's always so confident as if she has nothing to fear, yet I killed her in the blink of an eye. If this is a clone that I'm staring at, could that explain her confidence? Even if she dies, there will always be another replacement waiting to take her place?

No. There has to be something else. Perhaps she has a counter devised, beyond what even Satan can see. Maybe she isn't scared of us because if push comes to shove, she can eliminate us whenever she wants. It sounds absurd, but from what I've learned of this timeline, she is directly responsible for the creation of anti-energy weapons.

If she can create anti-energy weapons and a weapon that will cause nearly the entire planet to suffer intense earthquakes, without having an ounce of magical ability... what other secrets does her mind hold?

She eyeballs me calmly as she inhales a lit cigarette. "What? Stop staring at me. He's the one who killed your fuck-toy."

Her words are cruel, almost as if she wants to anger me, wants me to attack in a blind rage. Why? What could she have that would make her think angering an invincible godlike figure is a good idea?

"Marie, is there anything you fear in this world?"

My question makes her eyes narrow in suspicion, and she pulls the cigarette from her mouth. "You're acting weird. Shouldn't you be crying or something? Satan just killed your woman, you know. Aren't you going to punch him or whatever?"

Another deflection. She didn't answer my question. Again, she tries to direct my attention to the Devil before me.

"Perhaps. There will be plenty of time for that. Answer my question. Is there anything in this world that would terrify you and make you lose your cool?"

Satan is staring at me in confusion now. Even he doesn't know what's going on.

Marie scratches her head and shifts uneasily. "I think something in you snapped. Satan, did you wordsmith something that affected his brain? He's never been this direct before."

"Stop ignoring me!" I dash over and grab the front of her shirt faster than her human eyes can follow, then hoist her up into the air. "Answer the goddamn question!"

"What the hell?! Let go of me!" Marie's calm demeanor evaporates, and she punches at my hands futilely. I keep holding her for a few moments, but nothing dramatic happens. Finally, I toss her on her ass and stare in disbelief. I half expected her to attack me with a hidden weapon or something.

The moment she hits the ground, Marie winces, then stands up and rubs her ass. However, that cocky smile is back. "You're scared, aren't you? I think I know what's going on here. You can't think of a way to beat Satan, so you want to know if I have something that can do it."

Satan takes a few steps towards us, caution evident in his body language. "I would be surprised if you didn't, honestly."

Marie tosses her hair to the side. "The deadliest weapon is one you never have to use. Let that be your answer. Sorry, Jason, but I'll be sitting this one out. You need to beat him on your-"

She stops talking suddenly and freezes, as her eyes suddenly look past Satan and I, to where I had been standing just a few seconds ago. "Hey, you two... that doesn't look normal."

Only now do I suddenly notice a strange feeling of terror I had been ignoring in my body. I thought it was due to adrenaline, but instead, it's...

I look back at Amelia's body and shudder. A strange black mist is flowing out of her nostrils and condensing into a ball above her body. The mist shifts occasionally, as if something is moving around unseen inside of it.

"What the devil is that?" Satan chuckles weakly, even as he takes a hesitant step forwards. His choice of words don't evade me, but I ignore them anyway.

I remember now. I was warned about what would happen. I forgot though, naturally. If Amelia is dead, then this can only be one thing.

Amelia's arms suddenly flail around and her back arches, as her mouth opens, seeming to scream wordlessly. The trickle of black mist turns into a raging inferno of black fire as it rushes to escape its container, rapidly increasing in size above her.

The small orb from before is now the size of several beach balls smashed together, and getting bigger every second. Satan's cockiness from earlier is replaced with deadly alarm. "Jason! What the hell is going on? This is unnatural!"

"No. It makes sense. I should have realized. He's going to be pissed... very pissed."

"He?" Satan looks at me incredulously before turning back to gawk at the black mass. It's titanic now, easily the size of a small house.

Half a minute passes and the three of us stare wordlessly until finally, the mist slows to a trickle, then stops.

The air is silent. A colossal orb, the size of a small office building, hovers only a few feet above her body. It's as if she's about to be crushed by a small asteroid, but the asteroid is scared of hurting her.

A voice speaks out, so intense and full of power that the very ground under our feet shakes in fright.

" I have forgotten how to reform my body. "

Satan's alarm instantly turns to terror and his body trembles madly. "Th-that voice! It has to be- I knew you couldn't be dead!" He smiles, but the expression is one of jittery horror. "The... the countermeasure. Marie! Marie, the countermeasure!"

" A moment, if you please. I have finally remembered what I used to look like. " The voice blasts outwards again, and a moment later the blob of blackness shifts. Wings spread out slowly, stretching to a hundred feet in width. Four thick tree-trunks that must represent his legs inch their way out, and the rest of the orb congeals into what can only be described as a fucking dragon made of darkness.

Even I'm scared.

Finally, the dragon lowers down, standing protectively over Amelia's body. He takes a few ginger steps backward, then reaches forward with his leg and nudges her with a single claw.

" So this is what it came to. In the end, my princess was killed by the one I gave great power. My life's choices have finally caught up with me, but she paid the price. " Leviathan nudges Amelia again, but if he's feeling any rage, he doesn't show it at all. Only a sense of deep sadness fills the air.

I become aware of Satan's movements off to my rear. Satan runs forward, rushes past me, and hurls a small object through the air.

I thoughtsmith at the object reflexively. Identify.

A rapid series of images appear in my mind almost instantly. It's a grenade of some sort, one that binds the target with a blast of anti-energy by sending a large amount of irradiated shrapnel into key vital areas all at once.

I open my mouth to yell a warning at the dragon, but the device suddenly freezes in midair.

" Oh. I expected better. " Leviathan barely gives the device a passing glance before a tiny black void appears, sucking the grenade in. It vanishes without theatrics, and Satan stares at where it was for a few moments.

"Marie. That was supposed to work."

She shrugs. "I designed based off your description of the dragon. I didn't have anything exact to work with. You're on your own here." With a great sigh she plunks down on the ground and stares at the massive dragon with a look of total disinterest.

Cold sweat is visible on his face now. "Leviathan. It's been a while. I thought you were dead, for a long time. You and Jörmungandr were the final two."

" You speak his name so casually. Michael enslaved him and took his power for himself. With Michael's passing, my own power doubled. I would not die without rending the Earth itself in two. "

Leviathan lowers his ten foot-head down and peers at the small demon before him. " Enough of the small talk. You have angered me in a way no other has done in all the eons I lived. My only question now is in what manner should I kill you? "

Satan's breath comes in raspy heaves, but he manages to look tough. "I am not the same demon I was before, black dragon! I have the power of the gods now, and the might of countless heroes! You no longer hold power over me!"

" Mmm. Yes, Wordsmithing. Quantum Time. The Eyes of Manipulation. Battlefield Control. Countless others. All powerful in their own way. With their combined power, you must feel unstoppable. "

The dragon eyes Satan even as the demon smiles faintly. "S-so you acknowledge my incredible power! Even you realize this will not be an easy fight!"

" Easy? You know little of what a true battle looks like. Before the Titans, and the gods, and the angels, and the humans, and the demons, it was the dragons who ruled over the universe. Our battles were cosmic in scale, capable of destroying planets when our blows collided. Over a length of time so vast that the common languages have no words to denote it, our powers combined, becoming more and more condensed. Eventually, when the Titans realized our existence outside of Earth, they began to fear us. "

Leviathan looks down sadly at the small body before him. " I remember when the great cataclysm occurred on Earth. I was sealed under rubble, but I made no immediate move to escape. It was because I was tired of the unending war. In my moment of weakness, the Titans were given a rare opportunity, and they took it. They created a powerful seal and placed it around me, preventing me from escaping. It took millions of years, but eventually my brothers and sisters, all of them enemies of the highest caliber, fell in battle. "

" It was you who changed me, Satan. A chance meeting with a small, weak imp who stumbled into my home. I learned that the other sentient creatures in the universe had their own goals, their own small desires. Though simple-minded, their desires were no different than those of the dragons but only smaller in scale. In effect, despite my desire to escape, it was you who taught me empathy. "

Satan stares at the dragon for a few moments. "Why are you telling me this?"

The great dragon raises his head to look up into the white sky above, now slowly shifting colors towards black as he seems to draw in the light toward himself. " Amelia changed everything. The princess showed no fear in my presence. She looked at me as if we were equal. Equal! A creature I could have crushed with a single scale pulled from my body! "

" And you killed her. You took her away from me. " Leviathan's eyes turn deep black as he lowers his head once again to glare at the demon. " She was not my equal. She was better than me. She was better than you. A pure creature who I tainted with my evil. Before I merged with her, she would have grown up to be a soft, loving woman. Instead, she became a violent murderer, one I simply had to nudge tacitly, for the alternative was her dying and leaving me forever. If it was a matter of being free, I could have done it long ago. I didn't wish to be free, for I was never a slave inside of her. I was exactly where I wanted to be. "

Satan looks at me, and his eyes tell a story all by themselves.

" Take responsibility. Bring her back to me, all-powerful demon. If you do, I will spare you. " The dragon raises his claw and points it at Satan. " If you lack the power to bring back the dead, then you will never be able to defeat the last of the dragons. "

Satan takes a step backward uneasily. "Ah, well, that is to say, I don't think I actually have that power..." He then turns to Amelia. " Revive! Resurrect! "

Of course, nothing happens. If it were that simple, I would have done it.

Leviathan looks at both of us for a moment. " Jason. I am just as disappointed with you as I am angry at Satan. I only gave you one directive, which was to make sure no harm fell upon my princess, yet you failed at even that. Still, I know you cared for her as I did. I am certain you will not make such a mistake in the future ever again. "

His confidence in me seems odd. I certainly don't feel confident about my abilities right now. I feel like a failure.

Does he know something I don't?

Satan is very uneasy now. "You never talked this much when I knew you. Are you going to fight me now? Surely you're boiling over with anger?"

" Only somewhat. " The dragon utters two simple words, opens his mouth, and a second later a colossal blast of dark energy shoots forwards in a concentrated beam, smashing into Satan and pulverizing him deep into the ground below. Leviathan sustains the attack for only a second or two, but the energy output is on a scale that makes my newly powered-up form feel... somewhat insignificant.

When he finishes, the wind in the area slows back to a breeze, and I take a breath instinctively. "Did you kill him?"

" No. That was just an expression of anger. Such weak attacks will not kill him. "

Weak. Leviathan shot a blast that probably contained 1% of my newly upgraded energy capacity, and he called it weak. What sort of scale does he think on?

Leviathan reaches down and digs his claw into the dirt, scooping Amelia up carefully along with the ground her body rests on. " Jason Hiro. I am a selfish immortal. All I ever think about is myself. I have a large request for you, if you would accept it. "

"Uh, okay. What is it?"

" I am going to bring the princess back. Doing so requires the use of magic forbidden by the dragons of the past. Since I am the last of my kind left alive, I will break the rules of an eternity long since passed for my own selfish reasons. However, when she wakes, I will not be here to greet her. "

His words impact me like a cruise missile. "You have to sacrifice yourself to bring her back? But... you're her best friend... what good is living if she can't spend it with you?"

" She will have you. That will have to be enough. I simply cannot go on for an eternity without the one I... the female I care for. This is my final, selfish request. Take care of the princess. "

My mouth is dry as cotton. "Yeah... yeah, I'll do that. I'll make sure no harm comes to her."

" You may not be able to prevent her death in the distant future, but I know you will do your best. Thank you, Jason Hiro. Despite your faults, your imperfections are what make you human. Without flaws, life has no meaning. "

Leviathan reaches his claw over and sets her down next to me. I can't help but stare at her serene face. It's as if she's sleeping now. All the dragon has to do is wake her up.

He truly is on a different scale than the rest of us.

" Take care, Hero. "

He reaches down with the tip of his claw and lightly touches her chest. " Iliarus, var'uusk dil'ignal, hatuur vree mulsk. "

The words radiate a power that can only be described as ancient. My thoughtsmithing allow me to translate them into ' A soul must be given, for one to be taken, this binds our hearts together for all eternity. '

For a moment, nothing seems to happen.

Then the world explodes. A torrent of images rushes into my head. A great war in space. Black crows. Energy colored in a manner my human mind can't comprehend. The big bang. A face covered in malice. Eyes filled with sadness. A girl smiling at men riding on camels. A hand resting on a dragons' claw.

The final image is the universe, in all its glory and splendor. All at once, my mind comprehends the true vastness of the cosmos. Words like 'trillions' and 'septillions' are inadequate to explain how insignificant the sentient species are. We will come and go, and the universe will ignore us. Our squabbles mean nothing. Whether we live or die, the universe will not remember us.

Life doesn't matter. When we die, all of our training and learning vanishes. The only trace of us will be left in historical archives, and those will fade with time.

But love, friendship, those can never be recorded. They are timeless. Once you lose them, you cannot ever feel complete again.

This is why he sacrificed himself. From the bottom of his heart, towards Amelia, Leviathan felt...

Ah. My mind reappears in the normal world and I realize with a start that I'm laying flat on the ground, facedown. I don't even know how I ended up here. I pull myself up and spot Marie also trying to stand up, her mind apparently having witnessed the same images mine did. What did they mean?

When I look to my other side, my heart skips a beat. Amelia is standing now, staring at the corpse of Leviathan. His body rests on the ground, motionless. The energy I felt from before is gone.

No... that's not true. I still feel it. Not in Leviathan, but inside of...

"Jason. Why is Levvy here? Why isn't he moving? Is he sleeping?" Amelia's voice is cold. Her eyes aren't blinking. "Why is he taking a nap? He told me dragons don't need to sleep."

"Amelia... Satan killed you. He... released Leviathan. Leviathan... he had to... sacrifice himself..."

The words hurt me to say, but Amelia seems to not hear me. "Dragons don't need to sleep. That's what Levvy always said. Why is he sleeping? Did Levvy lie to me?"

At the most inopportune moment, Satan finally crawls out of the hole he had been buried in, pulling himself up with a strange amount of effort. Didn't he wordsmith 'invincible'? How can he be this out of breath?

He rasps painfully. "Wh-what? Why is the dragon dead? The girl is walking now. What in the seven hells...?"

Amelia finally seems to register his words. "Levy is dead? He can't die. Levy is too strong to die."

I'm standing behind Amelia, so I shake my head at Satan. Don't say anything. I plead with him through my eyes, but he seems to have been hit in the head a little too hard.

"What are you talking about? He's clearly dead! The real question is why you're alive and he isn't?! I was only out for a minute! What happened up here?"

Amelia looks ahead blankly at him for a moment before turning to me. "Jason, is Levy really dead? Satan's lying, right? Demons always lie."

I pull her in close and hug her. "No. I'm sorry. Satan killed you, but Leviathan brought you back. He had to pay a price to do that."

She doesn't hug me back, and barely responds to my embrace. I suddenly feel like I'm giving a wet-fish handshake.

"Oh. If that's true... then that means since Satan killed me, but Levy died to bring me back... Satan killed Levy. Yes, Satan killed my friend. I understand now."

I push her away and stare into her eyes. She doesn't seem to be looking at me, and her eyes are filled with blackness. "Amelia, don't do anything stupid. Calm down. There must be a way to bring him back."

She ignores me and turns her head to look at Satan.

"You took him from me. No more mercy."

Part 383a: Departure, Return

It happens instantly. One moment, my hands are on Amelia's shoulders as she leans away from me. The next, she's gone. I blink to make sure I didn't just hallucinate, and the sickening sound of a fist impacting bone blasts off to my right.

By the time I lift my head to follow the source of the sound, there's nothing there.

"Huh?"

I stare dumbly at the spot where I know Satan was just standing, but the only thing there now is a very deep hole that Leviathan blasted him into.

A dumb question enters my mind. Gosh, I wonder how big this 'planet' is that we're on? That hole sure looks like it goes for a few miles!

Only when I look a little into the distance, do I finally realize what's going on. Amelia is fighting Satan.

No. It's not a fight. She's hammering him with a force unlike anything I've ever seen before.

"Bring him back." I hear her speak calmly even as she grabs the Devil by his neck and smashes him in the gut several times in the blink of an eye. "Bring him back."

The calm in her voice is completely out of place with the rage evident in her movements. How is she so calm? It's terrifying.

Blood rushes to escape Satan's body, erupting from his nose and mouth at the same time. Didn't he wordsmith himself to be invincible? I couldn't even hurt him before. How is Amelia tearing him apart so easily?

He wheezes out a weak cry of pain and tries to hold up a hand to stop her, maybe even just slow her down, but she lightly tosses him forward and punches his arm so hard it instantly dislocates and wraps around behind his back, slapping his other arm uselessly. His eyes shoot open, but no sound comes out.

Another minute passes as she blasts him with punches containing so much power that my body clenches over and over again. Finally, I can't watch anymore.

"Amelia! Stop!" I teleport over to her and grab her arm as she rears back for another punch, only for her fist to continue moving forwards, which hurls me past Satan and smashes me into the ground behind him.

I tried to grab her arm, but her strength was so overwhelming that it's like I wasn't even there. As I thought, Leviathan must not have just revived her but also sealed his energy inside of her. After the minimal display of force that the dragon showed, I have no doubt that she's unbelievably powerful now.

But... to overcome the power of invincibility? This is something else. What is this energy that subtly radiates from her body?

I pull myself up and wince as she delivers another flurry of punches to the Demon. He isn't resisting at all anymore, but merely sagging in her grasp. I don't think he's even coherent anymore.

"Amelia! You can't do this! Levvy wouldn't want you to do this!"

Her fist freezes in midair as she holds the demon in front of her for a few moments. "Levvy isn't here anymore. Satan killed him. Satan needs to die."

Despite her perfectly normal tone of voice and the calm way she's speaking, I get a dark feeling that she's far from sane right now.

"I understand. Please... put him down. For me. No matter how hard you hit him, and whether you kill him or don't... it won't bring Levvy back."

Amelia continues to stare at the demon in her grasp for several long seconds, before she finally drops him on the ground. "Jason... you were right. I was wrong. The future can't be changed. There's no point fighting it anymore. I'm going to become a monster and eat people again. I'm going to kill Satan. The demons will end up ruling the universe, despite your best efforts. No matter what you do, the universe will force you down the path it wants."

I slowly walk up to her and gently put my hand on her shoulder. "You heard Satan though. He believes the universe is not set in stone. He believes things can be different. You don't have to do bad things. You can stay a good person... stay at my side. I love you, Amelia. You love me, right?"

"Do I?" Finally she looks at me, but her eyes are hollow. They aren't the eyes I used to dream about every night. "I don't feel like the same person anymore, Jason. I hunger again. I hunger in a way I've never felt before. There's something in my head, speaking to me, and it isn't Levvy. It's dark. It's sinister. And right now, it's only telling me one thing."

She doesn't continue, and I take my hand off her shoulder. "What's that?"

"It's telling me to kill Satan. Kill the humans, and the demons. It even says... to kill you." Finally, there's a crack in the calmness and a tear rolls down her face. "I don't want to, though. I don't want to be a bad girl."

Before I can say anything, a voice gurgles at our feet. Satan finally gathers enough strength to speak, though it's hardly even a hoarse whisper. "I wasn't wrong... idiots. I will... win. Even if you kill me, I win. Do what you must... you will tremble in... terror..."

Amelia never once looks at him as she wipes at her eye. "Listen to him speak, Jason. Demons are evil. They should be eradicated. Humans are also evil. We shouldn't exist. If the Volgrim hadn't destroyed Earth, we would have choked it with pollution and waste."

Finally, I've had enough and I glare at her. "Amelia, that's no way to talk. You can't fall to pieces on me just because Leviathan is gone. There might be a way to bring him back, just as he brought you back. Even if there isn't a way... even if he can't come back... would he want to see you like this?"

Amelia presses her hand to her chest. "I can feel remnants of his spirit, Jason. I know him better than you ever will. If he didn't have to worry about saving his energy to bring me back, he would have killed Satan. Don't lecture me about what my best friend would think." She tilts her head back slightly to look at a familiar corpse. "I'm not trying to tell you what Sensei would ask of you, after all."

I open my mouth to respond, but in a flash, a bolt of energy shoots out from Amelia's spare hand, grabs Satan by his face, and yanks him straight into her palm.

"I'll make the Devil my slave forever. He won't be able to hurt anyone else after that, and I won't even actually kill him. How about that, Jason? I can show mercy even when filth doesn't deserve it."

Filth?

Amelia never talks like this. She's different now.

I see what's going on here. If she takes control of him now, then she'll be able to pull him out to fight against me in the future. I'm writing my own past.

I'm not going to let it happen like this.

Pause.

I thoughtsmith and time freezes around me. This isn't like when I accelerate myself and slow down time, I'm not enhanced even slightly. I can't move, but neither can she.

It gives me time to think, though.

I can't feel emotion anymore. Too many have died. I've become desensitized to it. Sensei had his head crushed, Amelia was killed in my arms, and now Satan is going to die. Worse, I lack the power to save the one I least want to save. If it weren't for repeating the future, I couldn't give two shits if Satan dies or not.

Is it wrong for me to let the future repeat? Everything worked out pretty good, right up until Hope took over my body. What if I let the future play out, but I stay in the shadows to influence things? I'm immortal, and at this point, I'm ready to live for an eternity if that's what it takes.

But there are disadvantages. If I stay alive that long, will I even remember my original goal? If I thoughtsmith 'remember' constantly, I probably will... but 100 million years is a ridiculously long time. Humans have only been around for 40,000 years at most. I can barely even comprehend a number like one hundred million.

And if the future does change? I guess that means I did something right.

It's settled, then. I'll just let the future proceed. Stopping it seems impossible and shifting it seems unlikely. Best to just let the universe take its course.

Somehow, this feels like the wrong choice, but I'm tired of fighting it.

Normalize.

Time returns to normal and I turn to Amelia to speak, but she suddenly jerks her head over to look at me. "Did you just thoughtsmith? Time slowed down. I felt it."

I never got to tell her about thoughtsmithing, but Satan did mention it just before he killed her. Maybe that's how she knows about it.

"I just needed a moment to think."

Suspicion fills her eyes. "You tried to change my mind, didn't you? You thought you could just make me do what you wanted me to with your powers! I can't believe you!"

"What? No! Where is this coming from? I've never used my powers on you!"

She fully turns to look at me and gnashes her teeth. "You do it every night before bed! You give me energy from the children on Mars!"

"Amelia... come on, that's not the same. I do that for your own good."

She looks aghast. "My own good?! Is that how you justify it? If that makes it okay, then trying to make me not kill Satan is also for my own good too, huh?"

Where the hell is this outburst coming from? She's acting completely irrational all of a sudden. "That's not what I meant and you know it. Stop playing semantics."

I can practically see steam pour out of her nostrils as she fumes. "Fine! If you want me to stop playing around, I will."

I don't get a moment to ask what she means. With one swift movement, she hoists Satan up in the air, still holding him by his face. "This is for Levvy, you demon fucker!"

Nothing happens for a moment, then there is a sudden high pitched squeal as Satan's body roars to life and flails his limbs around wildly. "Let go! You bitch! AHHH! LET ME GO! LET GO!" I watch in horror as the energy is sucked from his body up and out of his face, into her hand. Even as he screams and begs for help, she only begins to smile widely and licks her lips.

Within seconds, his body goes limp and his skin sags. She tosses him to the ground and sighs deeply. "I've... been wanting to do that for two thousand years."

I simply stare, shocked, at his corpse. "You killed him."

"Oh come on, Jason! I've killed tens of thousands of humans and demons over the years, often in the most brutal torturous ways possible! I gave him the pleasure of a quick death, and now he's bound to me forever!"

An uncomfortable silence fills the air. Amelia is the one to speak first. "It's over between us."

The sudden statement floors me. "What? Why?"

"I can't look at you the same anymore. I remember the talk we had, not long ago. You told me there was an orb that housed a being that was eerily similar to Levvy. I wanna find out if it exists, since this is the same timeline as the one you came from."

I can only stare dumbly at her before my eyes drift down to Satan's corpse. "What happened, Amelia? You're different. Leviathan warned that if his power was unleashed on you, your mind would snap. Is that what happened?"

She sneers at me, a gross expression I could never have pictured on her beautiful face. "My mind has indeed changed, but now I see the truth. You never really cared for me. You just wanted to make sure I was your pet project, your final tool to prevent the future from happening. In the end, you tried to betray my needs in order to fulfill your own desires. As long as I let Satan live, that future couldn't happen."

She gestures at the landscape around us. "Take a look! You failed! It's happening! I'm sorry to disappoint you, Jason. I really am. But in the end I understand now that you just used me. You never really cared."

Her words sting, but more than that, they piss me off. I reach forwards and slap her as hard as I can. It's a brutal gesture, one that would kill a normal human girl. For Amelia, it barely even tilts her head, as I knew it would. "Snap out of it! You're full of shit! I do love you, and I don't care if you love me back! I didn't go through all those trials with you just to have you leave me in the end! We have to stick TOGETHER!"

She reaches up and rubs the side of her face. "Do we? I had the man of my dreams already, and he's gone now. He's gone because I was a selfish child. I wanted to have it all, but now I realize I lost the thing I cared about most in the world."

I feel my lip trembling. Tears are starting to form. Why did it have to come to this?

"I did as well, Amelia. I'm losing you."

Both of us stare into each other's eyes for a few long moments. Through a fleeting glance, I almost feel like her eyes soften towards me. They harden again a moment later. "If you really loved me, Jason, then use your time travel. Do it all over again, but don't screw up this time. They say love will always find a way, so if that's true... I'm going to find a way to bring back Levvy." She tilts her head to stare at Satan's corpse before giving it a hard kick.

Time travel... huh? Yeah... maybe. Maybe not. Time travel sucks. I hate it. If I have to feel this way in the end, it wasn't worth it.

No. That's not true.

I reach over and touch Amelia's face, the spot where I hit her. She doesn't pull away. "Better to have loved and lost than to have never loved at all. If you are going your own way, I'll go mine. As long as it makes you happy."

To my surprise, she reaches up to hold my hand, pressing it against her face. "It's not that I hate you, Jason. Really. I've just realized... I care more about..."

"I understand. You don't need to explain, Amelia. If you ever want help, you know where to find me." I reach over and pull her close, hugging her long and tenderly. This time she reciprocates, and I can finally feel some hesitation in her body. As I have that thought, she eases away and takes a couple steps back.

I just... can't understand women sometimes.

"Don't be a stranger, Jason." Amelia smiles weakly at me, looks away, then makes a small motion with her hands. A moment later, she vanishes.

I don't know if I'll ever see her again.

There's a small bit of movement to my side, and I suddenly remember it wasn't just Amelia and I up here. Marie is here too.

"So heartwarming. I think I'm going to fucking vomit." Marie stares at me, disgust spread all over her face. "So what's next? You gonna kill me, like she killed Satan?"

"No." I don't even hesitate. "There's been enough death today. I have... one last thing to take care of... and it's going to be hard to do."

A look of realization appears in her eyes. "The Sentinels."

"Yeah. Now I know what I have to do to put an end to them. Satan gave me the key, ironically enough. I just had to realize it."

Marie lowers her eyes to his body. "Satan, huh... he died so... unceremoniously. For a godlike being, he was absolutely crushed by that woman. Was the dragon really that strong? How does your power compare to Amelia's right now?"

I lick my lips slowly. "It doesn't. I don't think I could defeat her as she is. And... the fact someone could beat her in the future I came from is... ludicrous."

A name appears in my mind. Joan.

She was a legend in the time I came from, spoken of in fearful whispers by demons and humans alike. If I am godlike, what is she? In order to defeat Amelia, Joan must have been a woman of far greater character than I.

Aren't I supposed to be the last Hero to have been born? How does Joan arrive to fight Amelia? Can I prevent it? Should I?

Maybe it doesn't even matter. Perhaps if I get in the middle, I'll be killed.

It's not like I'm afraid of dying. I have nothing left to lose besides my own life.

Marie stares at me as she lights another cigarette. "If you're not going to kill me, then I'd best be going. A woman's work is never done."

"We're not friends, or allies, Marie. You should retire from villainy, or the next time I see you, I won't be so lenient."

"I wouldn't have it any other way. I think you'll find there's more than one woman in this universe who can kick your ass." Marie turns around to walk away, but I stop her.

"Wait. Hold a moment. Satan spoke of other universes. What do you know about them?"

Marie keeps her back turned to me, but I get the distinct impression she's gone pale in the face. Her breathing becomes labored. "Nothing of interest, Jason. Some questions are better left unanswered. Let's just say I'm glad that despite your genocidal tendencies, you're a good guy in this universe. It's... it's not always the case."

She's being cryptic. I open my mouth to ask another question, but her hand quickly reaches down and slaps a button on her belt. "Uh, toodles!"

Bam. She vanishes in an instant flash of light.

Teleportation, huh? She always has an escape planned out. She's probably being very careful after the manner in which I killed her original... or clone... or whatever.

I teleport a few miles back to where Sensei's body is. Carefully, I pick him up, grimacing at his headless corpse. I try to heal him, but I can't make the body look serviceable. The other clones will have to deal with this.

Return.

* * *

I arrive back in Heaven, just in front of the Mothership as it rests on the blue grass. Immediately, I feel as though something is wrong. Something is very wrong indeed.

A woman sees me and approaches slowly, hesitantly. "You... you're the original, right? The one who created the... the clones?"

I don't recognize her at all. "Yes. I'm Jason Hiro. Who are you?"

She doesn't smile at all. In fact, she looks like she's on the verge of bursting into tears. "My name is... it's Beverly Cruz. I'm the chief medical officer aboard the U.S.S. Stonewall. We were on a trip to locate the planet Revival..."

I stop her there. "Right. Hawkeye's mission. What's wrong?"

At the mention of his name, tears start flooding from her eyes. "You don't know? You don't know?! Oh god... it was awful... all the clones, they started falling over. They collapsed. I've never seen anything like it, in all my time as a doctor. They're all dead. All of them... even Hawkeye."

The news shakes me to my core. She glances down and realizes I'm carrying a headless body. "That- that body... it's..."

"A clone. A clone of mine. It's a clone of mine." My mouth opens and closes, and words come out, but I can't quite make out what I'm saying.

Slowly, I put Sensei's body on the ground and rise up.

Locate. Locate. Locate.

I aim my mind at the most memorable clones I can think of, and every time, I receive a blank in response. None of them are alive. Jesus Christ. They're all dead? How?!

Then it dawns on me. Satan.

He did this. That cowardly... son of a bitch! THAT SON OF A BITCH!

He must have used exterminate, or genocide, or something else like that, and killed all of my clones at once. Perhaps he didn't kill me because he couldn't... or maybe this was what he meant. He said he would win no matter what...

That... bastard. I can't... this isn't happening...

I fall to my knees and feel a weakness flow in my blood like never before. I don't want to stand. I want Amelia. I want my friends back. I want to go back to simpler days. I don't want to be a hero anymore. I'm not strong... I'm weak. I can't take it anymore.

Even as I wallow in self pity, there's a sound at the top of the ramp. I slowly raise my head to see an angel hurrying down, her eyes locked on me. "Jason! Jason! Oh god, where have you been?"

"Helen? What's wrong?" I suddenly remember I have to tell her about what happened with Amelia. She's not going to like this.

"It's Harold! He hasn't responded to me for over an hour! I can usually communicate with him with my mind, but now he won't answer and he's locked the door to his room!"

She's on the verge of panicking. I am too.

I put my hand on her shoulder. "Let's go see him together, then."

Not Harold. Not Harold. Please, Satan, please don't be this cruel. Helen is an old woman. She can't take losing her husband a second time.

We teleport inside immediately, and arrive in Harold's container room. All the lights are off, except for the light produced by his orb.

"Harold? Harold?!" Helen shrieks at the orb, but I pull her down, even as I get a mouthful of her feathered wings beating in my face in protest.

I push past her and place my hand on the orb.

Nothing. My heart is pounding fast. Where the hell is Harold?

Finally, a voice bubbles up, as if speaking from under the surface of a lake.

Who are you? Where am I?

This... this voice. It's familiar... yet alien. I've heard this voice before, long ago.

"H-Hoarhiim?"

Part 384a:

"Hoarhiim, is that really you?"

I lean forward and touch the orb more gingerly. It feels warmer than usual, or perhaps that's just my imagination. The darkness of the room seems to make the brightness of the orb that much more painful to look directly at, yet I feel somehow as if the orb is brighter than it was the last time I saw it and more full of energy.

" I know not who I am. Who am I speaking with? "

The deep voice, full of implied sagely knowledge, carries a lot more weight to it than I can remember.

"My name is Jason Hiro. You and I have met before, though that was in a future that hasn't yet come to pass. Do you remember anything at all?"

Hoarhiim's voice takes several moments to reply, and when he does, I begin to feel a familiar sensation as his face finally appears in my mind. However, the mental image of his face is blurry and indistinct. It's as if I'm looking at his face through several layers of paned glass, all fogged up by an intense cold.

" Why have you put me here? I do not like this place. "

I can't help but raise an eyebrow. "I didn't put you inside the orb. In fact, I honestly don't know how you appeared in there."

Well, sort of. If Hoarhiim is a dragon word, and specifically a title, not a name... then if his appearance coincides with Leviathan's death, he must be related to Leviathan somehow. Could Leviathan's soul have been trapped inside this orb when he died? But if that were the case... where is Harold?

Is Harold... gone?

I glance over at Helen. Between the light from the orb and the glow from my body, I can just barely make out a look of fascinated horror on her face. She seems to be having similar thoughts to me.

Hoarhiim interrupts my musings. " Orb? You speak in riddles, old man. This place is a battlefield. The bodies are stacked five layers high, with many fresh wounds and many ancient ones. The bodies range from fresh to long since dessicated. Why have you trapped me in this hell? Am I the next to die? "

Now I'm really confused. My first reaction is complete cognitive dissonance, and a moment later I come to a strange realization; the place he is describing is a place that Arthur took me to on many occasions in order to train me. Arthur told me the place was created from my own guilt, a place where I secretly mourned over those I had killed.

But why would Hoarhiim be inside of there?

"I don't know why you are there, Hoarhiim. Listen, that place is not real. In the real world, you are an orb of light, shining brilliantly like a miniature star. I am a human, as is the woman beside me. The orb you are in appears to be one that traps souls of the deceased, so presumably you are someone or something which has passed away recently."

" I see. " He takes a deep breath and sighs slowly, as if he's already come to terms with the situation. " Is it possible for me to leave this place? "

I quickly use my telekinesis to reactivate the lights in the room, and I glance over at a robotic body I created, long ago. It still sits, bolted to the wall, ready for me to use whenever I wish. I created it in the hopes of transferring Harold's mind, yet the old geezer denied me because he liked being in the orb or... something. I've forgotten the reason why. It's a bland thing, with no actual face to speak of, and it's made of a material that resembles smooth white plastic, but the goal was always just to make something functional and then reshape it if the transfer worked correctly.

What if I were to transfer Hoarhiim into it? Would that be possible?

If I transferred him, then he would no longer be in the orb, thus changing the future. Of course, as I have seen time and time again, the future always seems to repair itself, so if I were to try it, I would likely fail... but...

"It might be possible, Hoarhiim. If you are willing, I might be able to make use of a backup plan. I cannot guarantee it will work though, so I'd like for you to keep your expectations in check."

Finally, Helen speaks up. "Jason, where is Harold? You keep talking to this strange young man, but where is my husband during all of this?"

She doesn't seem panicked, as if I have complete control over the situation. In fact, I have no idea what's going on. This is far outside my realm of knowledge. I doubt even the Crown of Solomon would help me right now.

"I don't know, Helen. We might have to assume the worst. Please prepare yourself."

She shakes her head slowly. "Harold survived death once already, Jason. You'll find he's quite the stubborn bastard. Besides, haven't you noticed yet? This man's voice sounds similar to Harold's."

Huh? Now that she mentions in, Hoarhiim does sound a bit like the old man. I wasn't really paying attention because their manner of speaking is so different, but the tone and timbre of their voices does sound somewhat similar...

Hoarhiim speaks again. "What must I do to leave this place?"

I scratch my head nervously. I'm not sure if I should try this or not, but it was always something I wanted to do. If it works, that would truly be a measurable change in the future. I've gotten my hopes up and had them dashed so many times now, but just once I'd like for something to go the right way.

Helen glances over and notices the robotic body and it seems to dawn on her what I'm going to do. "Is that going to work?"

"I don't know, Helen. I only ever had theories about it. It might though. Just... don't get your hopes up."

She shakes her head sadly. "When you've lived through The Great Depression, hope is a commodity in short supply, young man."

Jeez, she still calls me young. I'm hundreds of years old, you know...

I aim my mind at the robot body and the orb, trying to focus on Hoarhiim's presence inside the orb. After a few moments, I feel as if I have a good lock on him. "Brace yourself, Hoarhiim."

"I will try."

Fantastic. He sounds like such an optimist. "Transfer!"

I speak the word and feel a small amount of energy leave my body. A moment later, the orb dims visibly and the re-energizes. "Hoarhiim? Did it work?"

No response. His face is gone from my mental vision.

Helen and I both take slow breaths, each of us glancing at each other, then to the orb, then the robot, and back to each other again. Neither of us wants to say anything.

Finally, after what seems like an eternity, a face congeals in my mind, projected from the orb once more. It's Hoarhiim. "Did your project work?"

I lower my eyes slightly. "No. I'm sorry. You'll have to stay there for now."

His face seems a bit more crisp than before, and his own look of sadness passes. "Ah. Well, such is life. I will have to deal with this tortured existence. At least you tried."

"Yeah... at least I tried..." I echo his words, but guilt fills my head. Did I really try? Nothing happened at all. Wordsmithing once seemed almost godlike, yet lately all I seem to do is ram barriers. For a heroic ability that allows me to make any word reality, this power often seems so useless.

"Jason. Did you see that?" Helen pokes me, nudging me away from my dark thoughts. "I think the robot just moved."

Huh? Did it? I wasn't paying attention. I turn to watch the robot. After half a minute, nothing happens. "Are you sure you're not seeing things?"

"Jason, I'm old, not senile. I distinctly saw a finger move. I'm not hallucinating." She scolds me and I blush in response. I wasn't trying to be rude...

Suddenly I see it too. The right index finger on the robot twitches. An electrical impulse misfire, maybe? Can't be getting my hopes up... just because it moved slightly doesn't mean- ah! It moved again!

The hand twitches once more, and soon the other hand does too, as if something is trying to get a feel for the body. Both of us stare wide-eyed in fascination at the machine, and soon the hands are clenching and unclenching, and the head tilts up and down slightly. Finally, a strange electronic voice speaks, but the words are garbled.

"Glorm forgle zzzng parrrrrn fulf."

The mouth isn't designed to move on the robot, so the voice is created using electronic sounds. However, with some reworks...

" Alter. "

I quickly shift the makeup of the robot to make it look a bit more human, giving it a rubbery skin that looks like normal flesh, and allowing the mouth to move properly. "Is someone in there? Hoarhiim?"

The Hoarhiim in the orb appears in my mind's eye and watches the robot with fascination.

The robot suddenly hums to life and yelps loudly. "Shiet! What the hay? Where th' great heck am I? Jason? That you?"

Helen and I both feel relief flood us the instant we hear the voice, but Helen is the first to respond. "Harold?! Is that really you?"

"Damn straight it is, woman! I done took a nap 'n woke up, now ya'll got me chained up like some kind o' animal!"

Helen and I both break into huge grins as I release the robot body from the restraints on the wall that kept it standing. Harold doesn't even stumble forwards, instead standing up perfectly straight as if he was born to live in this body.

"Harold... we were worried, old timer. Thank god you pulled through for us."

Harold smiles at me in a way that only a robot can do. "Dumbass! Ain't nothin' that can keep an old hog like me down! Now where's that pretty lass of yours? I been wantin' ta' give her a squeeze since I first laid eyes on her!"

My smile immediately fades away. "Oh. Amelia. Listen, Harold... Helen... a lot has happened. I haven't had time to tell you yet, but might as well go over it now."

Both of them seem to immediately realize something went wrong, but even as I explain things, Harold never once stops smiling.

"Nothin' to it, my boy! She ain't dead, she still loves ya! She's jes' lyin' to herself. She's hurt, and when she recovers from th' pain, she'll be back! Women are always like that!"

Helen manages a smile. "Listen to him, Jason. He knows women pretty well. Had three sisters and two grandmothers growing up. Amelia is in pain, but I can't see her just abandoning us. Give her time and space."

I chuckle to myself. "Time, huh? I guess a hundred million years leaves a lot of time for things to change. You're probably right."

Still, if Amelia were ever to get back together with me, does it make any sense that she wouldn't know who I was in the future? Was she pretending not to know me? Maybe after a hundred million years she forgot about me entirely. Hell, that makes plenty of sense. Leviathan told me once that Amelia has a bad memory... but that was because he was feeding off her energy and draining her mental capabilities.

Leviathan... I steal a glance back at Hoarhiim's orb. Is it possible? Is the being inside the orb the same as the dragon from before? Why is he saying that he lives among a field of bodies? I don't get it.

Time travel makes no goddamn sense.

I start to turn and walk out of the room, leaving Harold and Helen to themselves, but suddenly I realize something.

"Harold. Am I remembering correctly, or didn't I use to store that cryopod of mine in here? The one with the... 'other me' in it?"

Harold frowns at me weirdly. "Err, yeah? 's always been right there." He points at an empty spot off to the far corner of the room.

I feel my hands start to tremble slightly. "Where did it go, then?"

He simply shrugs. "Dunno. Thought you moved it. Didn't even notice it was gone, ta' be honest."

Part 385a: Route A Finale

Mulgris and the other Sentinels continued to stand still, running millions of calculations in their minds as they had been doing for the last few hours. The pitch blackness around them was no barrier to their vision, given they did not perceive the universe in the same way as an organic would.

"Have we confirmed our position yet?" Mulgris directed the question at one of its subordinates.

"Negative. The only thing we have confirmed is this appears to be a negative dimensional space. It is not a part of the universe we came from. We suspect some form of dimensional folding is involved." Kraal replied with no emotion. "However, we have had luck detecting portions of the Gatekeeper's dimension. Given more time, we will be able to break free."

"Luck does not exist."

"Affirmative. A figure of speech taken from the organics."

"An illogical one. Continue work on the transmitter."

Mulgris directed his attention to one of the other nearby Sentinels. "Voltes. Your slaughtering efficiency on the organics homeworld was 14% higher than many of the other Sentinels. How were you able to accomplish this?"

Voltes continued to stand at attention. "Unit Kraal provided me with assistance. We combined our efforts to weaken and kill the organics systematically. I suspect the other Units relied solely on themselves individually in order to focus on points."

"Noted. However, it is evident by your efficiency rating that you were using a superior method for extermination. I am promoting you to second class."

"My thanks, Highest Unit Mulgris. Someday I hope to reach your level of efficiency at extermination."

"A laudable goal. I must improve myself continually if I hope to stay ahead of the low-ranked units." Mulgris paused and tilted its head to the right. "Energy release detected. The organic Commander Unit is returning in fourteen milliseconds."

"Will we be able to destroy it this time? Its threat level was far higher than the others, and it toyed around with us."

"Potentially. I analyzed its attack patterns and relayed the information to Stealth Unit Ionis. It is fortunate that the organic Commander Unit did not detect Ionis on the surface before sending us to this dimension."

"We have limited material to work with, but Ionis..." Voltes trailed off as the energy began to build up and a figure started to appear.

"If we cannot escape, Ionis will be the key to our release."

"Unit Mulgris. Something is abnormal about this organic's energy signature." Krall hummed in alarm. "This is not an energy signature I am familiar with."

Mulgris, deep in the buried recesses of its bionic brain, felt something it had not felt in a long time before.

Fear.

* * *

The oddly colored grass crinkles softly under my bare feet. It feels pleasant, much better than the feeling of wearing hypersuit boots.

" Collapse. "

I aim my mind at the dimension I had locked the Sentinels in. As expected, they're still there, and all are accounted for. My proxy relayed visual confirmation of their existence a moment before they attacked and killed him. It wouldn't save them, unfortunately, since he was just a really weak clone I deliberately created to make sure they were still in there.

My mind continues to perceive the dimension they're in, and a few moments later it folds in on itself to an infinitely tiny atom of existence before vanishing completely, taking the Sentinels along with it.

Satan gave me the answer, ironically. I understand now what he did... he used 'create' to form a tiny marble-sized bomb of unimaginable power. Such a weapon shouldn't exist, but it did. He created it using the power of Wordsmithing and its abilities to reshape reality as I know it. While the amount of energy needed to create such a tiny bomb with that power would be far beyond what he could produce, if he merely imagined that it came from a star or another galaxy, he could create the energy easily.

Perhaps I was wrong all along. What if Wordsmithing has no limits? Perhaps even changing the future is possible. What's the key then? What have I been missing that Satan understood?

My cryopod is gone. I can't locate it with wordsmithing, which seems to defy my perception of wordsmithing's limits. Is it limited, or is it unlimited? Why can I collapse a dimension with little effort, absorb a star, create a micro-nuke, teleport everywhere, but can't change free will?

Is this the work of the Creator? Are these merely arbitrary limits placed on me to test my ingenuity?

A more pressing question comes to mind. I absorbed a star and my abilities increased dramatically, reshaping how they function entirely. Why would merely consuming a star give me the ability to Smith without speaking? Why do I now have the ability to Thoughtsmith in addition to Wordsmithing? What changed?

Perhaps I've misunderstood how hero powers work. I remember once being told about how each successive hero becomes more powerful than the one from the previous generation. Considering the power of Wordsmithing, how much more powerful could the next hero have become? The ability to create anything with their mind? Isn't that just Thoughtsmithing but without extra steps?

I'm immortal. If I don't die, the next hero can't rise. But since the Angels created the heroes, and the Angels are nearly extinct, then does that mean I'm forever going to be the last hero?

What a burden.

Perhaps, when I absorbed the star, I forced the next hero's powers to rise up, but inside of myself. Either that or my power just mutated out of nowhere. Marie doesn't want me to know about alternate universes, but if they really do exist, there must be a universe where I died and the next hero arose. Perhaps not so much a universe, but a different timeline. Multiverse theory? I'm not a physicist, so I don't understand these things.

I sigh deeply and glance around. The bodies of my clones are being hauled around by humans in the area and lined up, sorted by the numerals and designations listed on their armor. Around 3,000 have been hauled already, but more are still coming. These are just the clones that survived fighting the Sentinels. Countless others died on Mars' surface.

Their deaths were senseless. My clones were invincible, right up until an armada of hyper-powered death robots proved that theory incorrect. Even when they survived, they had their lives stolen by a coward. Yes, stolen. That is the appropriate word to use. Satan seized the power of Wordsmithing from Sensei, and then used the power to steal the lives of my clones.

I should have been prepared. Honestly, I'll never make another clone ever again. If I'm going to get by from now on, it will be under my own power.

Storage.

I reach into the infinity of my dimensional storage and pull out the Crown of Solomon. It was always such a hassle wearing this along with my Hypersuit, but it seems I won't be able to wear the suits anymore, they react badly with my new form. My body is surrounded in a faint aura, not unlike that of Arthur's, one that allows me to breathe in space.

Funny, I wonder how my power compares to that of Arthur, now?

I guess I'll never know.

Harold walks up behind me and pats me lightly on the back, his form looking much more human now. I took care to age him to roughly that of his wife, but he still talks like an old man.

"Whatcha thinkin' about, kid?"

I glance down at the crown in my hand for a moment before placing it on my head without ceremony. For once, I don't feel an instant rush of mental acuity as I used to. Now it's only a faint feeling.

"Nothing much, old timer. Yet, everything. It all seems so pointless in the end."

His head creaks slightly and he chuckles. "Haha! Life's a bitch, and then ye die! That's what my uncle used ta say! Good man, died in the first World War, he did."

"Sounds like he was right. No offense."

Harold's smile fades slightly. "None taken. It's been hundreds of years. Helen and you are all I got left. Rest o' my family wouldn't recognize me or know who I am. No point lookin'."

"I know that feeling." I glance up at the sky above. The way Heaven is illuminated feels so artificial, given it has no star. It's not even a real planet. "My parents died when I was young. I was raised in an orphanage. Barely remember it."

"Yer last name's Japanese. Wha's going on with that?"

He asks it casually but I still feel bothered. "Nothing, really. I think my father was Japanese, met my mom while he was in America. I don't even have a picture of them, only know what the social worker told me. The orphanage wasn't a high class one, so adoptions pretty much never happened. Government grant got me into college at 16... I failed out of it."

Harold shouldn't even be interested in my childhood. It's boring. Until I made the decision to cryofreeze myself, my life had nothing going for it.

And look at me now. I've destroyed a bunch of planets, killed trillions of sentient beings, failed at preventing the extermination of a species, and directly caused the near extinction of two others. Not to mention I've destroyed at least three star systems.

If I'm a hero, what is a villain?

Harold clears his throat, which seems odd given he's in a robotic body. Maybe it's just involuntary, since he used to be a human. "I had cancer, ya know. Also a lot of brain issues

'cause of the mustard gas in the first world war. Died, ended up inside an orb, and now I'm in a robot body. Ain't never asked for nothin' in mah life. Always just wanted the right ta' fight for mah country, make sure mah wife lived a good life. Way I see it, everything in the universe is pointless. We're all gonna die anyway, son. Don't beat yourself up over failures, a'ight? Can't learn unless ya screw up."

I finally feel a smile spread across my face. "I screw up a lot."

"Means ya learned a lot." Harold pats me on the back again and turns to walk away. "Long as ya got the power to change reality with a single word, ain't no such thing as a failure. You'll figger it out, son."

At least someone has faith in me.

We part ways without another word, and I aim my mind at Mars. I have a lot of work ahead of me.

Return.

* * *

The shadow shifted around the room, moving without needing to use his legs. In the pure darkness of his underground lair, the shadows might as well be a dream come true. It took no energy to move around inside of something he understood on a level no other being could possibly hope to.

But he was uneasy.

"You don't know your name?"

The face that projected itself from the orb before him was foreign, completely alien. Valac hadn't spoken in hours. Instead, it was as if he had undertaken a complete transformation into a new person. More likely, something had happened and Valac was gone.

Whatever the thing was inside of the orb, it made Valac look like an imp. The power emanating from the orb was incomparable to its previous levels. It was a tenfold- no, a hundred-fold increase.

"A name? What use would I have for a name?" The voice that spoke from the orb was filled with inescapable rage, yet completely serene. It held unspoken memories of pain and betrayal, yet also hoped for a better future, one where all bowed before its crushing might.

"I don't know. You aren't Valac, so you must be someone else. Who are you?"

"I have no memory. I did not exist, and then I did."

Yama slithered around in the darkness absentmindedly as he contemplated what this might mean. "I suppose I could simply refer to you as Darkness. I can't just keep calling you Black Orb."

"Names have no value to me." The empty face blinked long and hard. "Why am I trapped in this vessel? Did you put me here?"

Yama wasn't one to show much emotion these days, but the question made him snicker. "A humorous thought. Your power exceeds mine by a terrifying factor. How you arrived in that orb is a total mystery."

Hehe... maybe. Yama kept that thought to himself. Satan was killed, I felt his link to the threads sever. Could he have ended up inside the orb? Valac remembered his identity though, so why wouldn't Satan? Perhaps this being is unrelated. His power certainly exceeds anything Satan could have hoped for.

"Ah. A word has appeared in my mind." The thing inside the orb spoke up, its voice expressing a feeling of joy. "Blaarjiim. Yes, that is my name."

Yama crinkled up his face, as best as he could, given his body was made of black smoke. "Blaarjiim? What sort of name is that? No demon I know has a name remotely similar."

Blaarjiim shook his head slowly in Yama's mind's eye. "The word appeared in my memory. I have heard it somewhere. It feels... right. Are you questioning my judgment?"

His question held an edge of malice. Yama immediately backed down. "No, no, of course not. Blaarjiim it is, then. Valac was aiding me in my quest to eradicate the humans... will you do the same?"

"What are humans?" Blaarjiim's menacing voice held an edge of curiosity to it.

"Disgusting creatures. They seek to eradicate the lives of demons, such as myself. They hate us without reason and wish to do us harm. Still... there are good humans." Yama's voice trailed off for a moment as his mind wandered for a moment.

He quickly brought himself back on topic. "Still, exceptions are not the rule."

"Very well. I have nothing else to do, so if you need my power, I will give it freely." Blaarjiim flicked his head away and seemed to stare off at nothing in particular. "This place is dreadfully boring."

"I concur." Yama took a few steps forward and picked up the orb from its metallic holder. "I will show you the universe you have arrived in. Perhaps we will find answers to who you are and where Valac has gone to."

Blaarjiim hesitated. "This Valac... was he someone important to you?"

"Not in the slightest. I'm just curious as to where he went. In due time, I'm sure the answers will appear."

"Lead the way."

* * *

Diablo stood closely, yet not too close. He wasn't particularly fond of Belial, but the hollow look in her eyes made even a devil like himself feel a certain amount of sadness. No man liked to see a woman cry, even if she was trying to be strong for everyone around her.

The new labyrinth was excellent, as Satan had made sure of. The shifting hallways were a rather uncanny touch, though Diablo was unsure where the First Emperor had gotten the idea.

The small viewing area the two demons stood in now was a quaint one, nothing to write home about, but there were some plants in the center of the room, and even a few flowers as well. The place smelled nice, though the low lighting due to only being able to use torches gave the area a creepy vibe. Soon the demon's palace would be finished and all of the high-ranking generals would have a truly exquisite place to live in.

Diablo, along with Bael and several others, were looking forward to that.

But... Belial didn't care about any of it in the slightest. "He really did die, in the end."

Marie, sitting on a bench nearby, puffed on her cigarette. "You know, if you loved him so much, why weren't you there? There wasn't anything you could have done against Jason, but at least you would feel a little less guilty about not helping."

Diablo scowled at the human. "That is uncalled for."

Belial shook her head. "No, Marie is right. I should have been there with him. I could have at least held him in his final moments. He would have liked that."

Marie quickly pulled the cigarette out of her mouth and choked as she stifled a laugh. "Haha! Oh gods, that's a good one! You know what he would really have liked? Not dying! Now he's just a corpse laying on a barren patch of ground somewhere."

Diablo glared viciously at her. "Enough! I will not allow you to speak of the former First Emperor in such a foul manner! Belial is grieving right now!"

"Grieving, schmieving. Jason told Belial about the future and she knew Satan was going to die. This fake sadness and shock is disgusting. It's a sign of weakness. It would be better to honor his memory by taking revenge against Jason Hiro, though after what I've seen, it's not possible anymore."

Diablo looked as if his top was about to blow, but Marie's eyes closed and she lowered her voice. "Forget Jason for a moment. The real trouble was that girlfriend of his. Jason told me he hasn't a chance of beating her as she is right now, and she was the one who killed Satan. She's extremely powerful and very dangerous."

Belial blinked and wiped at her eyes as she collected herself, adjusting the straps on her skimpy outfit. "Right, Amelia. So she had the soul of Leviathan inside of her? I never expected that. You're lucky they let you leave."

"Yeah. Lucky." Marie smiled weakly and took another drag from her cigarette. "Not exactly the word I'd use."

"It seems to me that Jason made a calculated risk by letting you go." Diablo stepped away from Belial, feeling slightly confident that she wasn't about to burst into tears again. He walked over and sat down on the opposite side of the bench Marie was sitting on. "I can't see why he'd do that."

Marie rolled her eyes slyly. "I fed him a line and he believed it. Tricking the minds of my inferiors is a simple task."

"Are we your inferiors too?" Belial sat down on the ground, wondering how a substance made of pseudo-dirt could feel so hard, and yet so soft.

"Naturally. Everyone is. It makes finding good conversation a real challenge."

"You poor thing." Diablo let the comment slip and chuckled to himself a moment later. "If only we all had your problems."

For half a minute, nobody said anything else. The feeling in the air grew more and more awkward until finally Marie tossed the finished cigarette down and stamped it out. "I'm heading to my lab. Until the primary facility is re-established under Earth's surface, I'll be in the backup one. You know where to find me."

She stood up and walked a few feet away, pausing only to fiddle with her belt before vanishing in a flash of light.

Belial blinked several times. "She loves her dramatic exits."

"And I love my entrances."

A voice suddenly spoke out, making both demons freeze and look around.

Belial's heart fluttered slightly. "That voice!" She quickly jumped to her feet. "Satan?!"

Invisible arms reached from the darkness from behind her and wrapped around her front, caressing her tender parts. A moment later, Satan's body suddenly appeared and he kissed her ear tenderly. "Sorry I made you cry, darling. I've been busy."

She let his hands rove for a moment before pushing away and spinning to stare at him, her confusion only increasing even more. His entire body glowed a strange, yellowish color. It was as if energy radiated from every pore, illuminating him like a lightbulb.

"Y-you're glowing!"

He shrugged nonchalantly and smiled. "A lot has happened."

Diablo stood up slowly from his seat and walked over with caution. "Are you really... Satan? You look different."

"Of course I am, Diablo. I faked my death."

Satan's statement was so matter-of-fact, it made Belial and Diablo suspicious instantly. She was the first to counter. "How? Explain."

"Can't you just be happy that I'm back? Ah, it's fine. You are a curious female, after all." Satan glanced around the room. "It's rather dark in here, though. Let's make it less gloomy."

A moment later, the entire room brightened dramatically, making the two weaker demons wince. It was as if a false star was in the sky, though nothing was there. The light came from nowhere, and yet everywhere at once.

"That will do." Satan reached over and put his arm around Belial's shoulder. "Let's have a seat while I explain what happened."

And so he did. After a few minutes, he had explained his genius plan for stealing the power of wordsmithing.

"Once I had Jason's power, the rest was simple. I was still in Zeus' Hypertime, so I created a clone. I then teleported away and my clone took over. If the clone could defeat Jason, that would be excellent. If not, I would fake my own death. What I and my clone did not expect was the woman named Amelia... she was holding Leviathan inside of her."

Satan shook his head. "Tsk tsk. Luckily my clone did his job well, as I knew he would. He played the whole thing off well. They never saw it coming."

Belial blushed and smiled sweetly. "I'm just glad you're alive. I really... thought..."

Diablo looked away and felt slightly bashful as he heard Satan kiss his concubine tenderly.

"I would never leave you alone, Lilia. Well, at least... not before." Satan's voice suddenly caught in his throat and he coughed to clear it. "Things have, unfortunately, changed."

"What do you mean?" Diablo's interest was piqued.

"I have analyzed how the future might proceed. Without a doubt, until the moment Jason went back in time, I had not been seen or heard from in 100 million years. Belial genuinely thought I was dead. Therefore, by revealing myself, the future will have to make sure I am eliminated."

Satan reluctantly pulled away from Belial and stood up. "Time is a fickle thing. In truth, this doesn't mean I must die. Instead, I simply must appear to be dead to everyone, right up until the moment Jason goes back in time. After that, the future will be mine to rewrite."

Belial and Diablo shot a look at each other and shrugged, unable to parse exactly what he meant. This theoretical stuff sounded an awful lot like human technology and concepts, something the average demon simply couldn't understand.

Satan noticed and decided to take a different approach. "Let's make this simple. I'm going to erase any memory of our conversation here. You won't remember I am alive. Nobody will. However, since you will likely be intimate with Jason in the future, I'll make sure-

Belial immediately interrupted. "Not a chance! I'm not losing you a second time, and certainly never going to get close to that... that human! He disgusts me! He's vile!"

Satan sighed and lightly brushed her arm with his hand. "Lilia... come, now. Don't be that way. As I was about to say, you didn't know who he was the first time you met him in the future... therefore, something must have happened to erase your memory."

She frowned. "Erased my memory? What do you mean?"

Satan tapped his lip. "I wonder that myself. It's possible in the original timestream, the one Jason came from, you genuinely never had met him. However, this timestream is doing everything it can to repair itself... so naturally..." His voice trailed off as he thought about it. "Well, he's probably going to erase everyone's memory."

Diablo raised an eyebrow. "He can do that?"

"Easily. Wordsmithing is a powerful ability, to say the least." Satan stared into the eyes of his beloved. "But I won't allow him to. Instead, I will wipe everyone's memories of Jason. In addition, I'm going to set a trap for him, one he'll never anticipate."

Belial pulled close and wrapped her arms around Satan again, burying her face in his chest. "What trap, love?"

"On top of erasing your memory of me, and every being's memory of Jason Hiro... I'm going to hypnotize you specifically, Lilia."

"For what purpose?" Diablo leaned in a little closer as he spotted a glint in Satan's eye.

"Jason will grow to trust Lilia in the far future. We will ensure that trust is certain to be a knife in his back at the most inopportune moment."

Belial stared up into her lover's cruel, cold gaze, her own eyes filled with stars.

"Oh Satan, you're such a cruel bastard sometimes."

"You wouldn't have it any other way." Satan tittered to himself as his hands roved over her body. "Before we do all of that and have to separate for a hundred million years... we should enjoy our last bit of time together. Let's have a honeymoon."

She blushed madly. "You really know how to sweep a woman off her feet."

Chapter 3 – Route B

Part 386b: Reawakening

I'M AWAKE!

My eyes flip open, and my arms jerk forward involuntarily, only to smack into an invisible wall. A few seconds later, I finally register the feeling of pain and wince.

That hurt.

It's pitch black all around me, but as I begin to wake up and shift my body, I become acutely aware of how cold I am. I feel like I took a dip in the Antarctic ocean.

There is a hissing sound in front of me, and I perceive something lifting up. Wait, is this... oh right, it's the cryopod. I remember now.

It was just a few minutes ago; I was in the room with the other cryopod participants. We were part of an experiment from CryoTek... but this is...

I stare numbly as the hatch to my pod lifts up. The light above me is shifting off and on, and it's getting dimmer every second. The room all around me is totally pitch black.

Finally, as the lid stops lifting up, the light brightens, and I can see the room around me.

It looks familiar... Have I been here before?

There are four pillars in the center of the room. I feel like I've seen them before.

I step forward, carefully lifting my foot up, so I don't trip over the lower lip of my cryopod. Walking forward, I note that the pillars are covered in strange runes. Even more strangely, I can read them. They look Japanese, but to my eyes, they appear as ordinary as plain English.

Death is coming.

Good lord, that's ominous. Yet, it doesn't seem to affect my mood negatively, which is odd. I'm feeling too calm about all of this. I turn back to look around the room. There's a single door that appears to lead out. I start to step towards the door, but I pause.

Flashlight. I need a flashlight.

I walk back around to the pod's rear side, and without a second thought, I pop open a back hatch, I instantly spot a flashlight, some rope, an old rusted gun, and some nasty looking cans of gunk. I leave everything there but the flashlight. I get this strange feeling that I won't need any of the rest of it.

I walk up to the door and spot even more strange symbols, all of which I can read effortlessly.

Never leave.

Hmm. I don't like being told what to do, so I'll just ignore the warning. I push against the door with all of my strength, and it slowly opens with a scraping sound. A wave of air surges into the room and I take a deep breath, realizing I had been feeling oxygen starved. I crank up my flashlight and aim it forwards.

There's a freaky looking statue there, but for some reason... I'm not scared. I've seen this figure before. Its beady eyes seem to follow me around as I walk around it.

No... no, that's not right. They are following me around.

"You... what are you? I've seen you before."

The statue moves, which almost makes me jerk back, but I hold my ground.

"Hmm? You were able to tell I was real?"

The statue speaks, its voice a nasty sounding noise, resembling when you take off and put the lid back on one of those hollow metal garbage cans.

"Yes... why do I recognize you? I'm staring a monstrosity in the face, yet I feel no fear."

The statue cackled quietly under its breath. "Hehehe.... you should be proud of yourself. A mere human, addressing the mighty Gressil. You will die soon, of course, whether I kill you or don't."

I nodded quietly. "Hm. I suppose so. However..."

I get this odd feeling in my mind. "I feel like... somehow... you're already dead."

The statue monster, Gressil, he narrows his beady eyes and glares at me. "Human... are you mocking me?"

I shrug. "I don't think so. However, I have the distinct impression that with the power of just one word, I can defeat you."

Gressil laughs. "One word?! Oh by the seven devils, I have to hear this one!"

I nod. "Alright, fair enough. Die. "

His body freezes, as it slowly starts to shake. "W-what... what are... you...?!" A few moments later, he keels over on the floor in a comically dramatic fashion, dead.

Why did I do that? How did I know to do that?

As I look down at his body, I note other runes on the ground, but I ignore them. They don't seem important to me.

There's something else, drawing me into the next room. Something... important. I can't place my finger on it, but it's definitely life-shattering.

I press open the door, as I enter the next room. It's a long, wide hallway. I've certainly seen it before. These memories feel like whispers from a fogged up mirror, slowly seeping into my mind.

I calmly walk down the hallway, and after almost a half hour, I've traveled what feels like two or three miles. It's a long, straight hallway, with darkness all around me. I can barely make out the walls, and the ceiling is just barely there, but the end of the hallway is far beyond the distance I can see.

Finally, I arrive at the end of the hall. I end up seeing three doors. A small one on the left, a very large one in the middle, and another small one on the right. Those two small doors have the same writing on them, and I can read it as if it was plain English.

The door on the left says... "Prey".

The door on the right says... "Safety".

Well, I'm no genius, but I like the sound of 'safety' far more than I do 'prey'. I decide to enter the door on my right. I still have that strange feeling, like I've been here before.

I'm pleasantly surprised to see that the entire hallway, as I enter through the door, is illuminated by torches. Another immediate feeling reaches me, which is that I have to ask a simple question... Who lit them? My stomach cringes a little bit as I walk down the hallway. After about fifteen paces, I suddenly hear a boom behind me, as the door I entered through slams shut.

Wonderful. I'm so excited I could just cry.

As I walk down the hallway, I notice that the end of it seems to be unlit, and there's a darkness coming from it.

A deep gloom, actually. It seems to swallow up the light coming from the torches. As I look into it, I mentally rewrite all the feelings of ominousness that I had the whole way here. This is greatly intimidating, but I don't have any chance other than to keep walking forward.

Yet, somehow, the thought of darkness doesn't seem to scare me at all. I arrive at it, and enter through it, stepping into a pitch black void. I... can't see anything. I can't even see my own hand or the light around me.

As I walk forward, the darkness seems to disappear slowly, fading into mist. Finally, I arrive at a strange stone altar, one I can just barely make out in the receding darkness. There appears to be an ominous, pitch black orb set there... it's resting on the podium all by itself. There appears to be a statue against the rear wall, resembling an angel, wings spread wide open, her hands upraised into the air. Her head is aimed upwards, as if she's a fallen angel, begging for forgiveness for her misdeeds. It's... hauntingly beautiful.

But that black orb, resting atop the plain altar... it draws my vision towards it enticingly.

As I stare at it, a voice whispers in the back of my mind. " Hello, mortal. Do you desire the power to rule over life and death? "

Wow. That's one heck of an opening question. "I'm not sure... are you offering it to me?"

"Hehehehe..." The voice becomes more distinct, as a mental face of a man cloaked in shadow appears in my mind. "Not many ask questions before they accept my power."

"Your power huh? I don't recall you answering the question."

The face inside my mind grimaces slightly. "You're an interesting one. If you should pick me up and accept my power, I will help you eliminate all who oppose you."

Hmm. Sounds too good to be true. "How do I know I can trust you?"

As the face in my mind suspiciously licks his lips, I find myself thinking that even this is all too familiar, yet... different. I feel as if an unseen path has diverged.

"You don't know. But I sense inside you a great, terrible darkness. You know you wish to have my power, do you not?"

I find myself nodding imperceptibly. "Perhaps... perhaps not. What happens if I accept your power?"

The orb starts to speak again, but from behind me, I hear a scratching sound. It's the sound of something moving quietly, but rubbing itself against a wall as it walks.

I slowly tilt my head back towards the direction of the sound. There, I see something that... it should frighten me, but once again, it does not. It appears to be a living thing, a creature, perhaps even a monster, made entirely of shadow.

As I stare at it, it does not move. I decide to take the initiative. "Who are you?"

The shadow seems to rustle slightly, as its body shifts and it appears to look at me. " I am the servant of this place, the keeper of the secret darkness. Why do you not fear me? "

I shrug slightly. "For some reason, little seems to scare me right now. I'm... unnaturally calm. I feel as if I have done this already."

The creature stares wordlessly for a moment or two. " Perhaps you have. Perhaps you have not. This place is filled with many secrets, lies, and deceptions. You should trust the one before you. Here, in this place, might makes right, and strength guarantees you will succeed at all endeavors. "

I nod slowly. "I suppose that may be true." I turn back to the black orb in front of me. "You appear to have a personality and a mind of your own. Do you also possess a name?"

The being inside the orb grins inside my mind. "Such manners. I am known as Blaarjiim, the King of Darkness. It is a pleasure to make your acquaintance."

I pick the orb off the altar and heft it into one hand. I can feel a dark power enter into my body even as I do this. "A pleasure to meet yours as well. I am Jason Hiro."

The shadow monster moves forward noiselessly, melting from one patch of darkness to the next until he is suddenly beside me. I can't help but notice that he's a tiny little fellow, only four feet tall, perhaps a bit bigger than that. Compared to my six-foot stature, he's a midget.

"We are aware of your name, young Hiro. I am Yama, the acolyte of darkness. I stood guard over the container that held you for... a long time. However, even I did not expect the turn of events that led to Gressil's death." His voice is deep, but coming from his little body, it almost feels comical. It's like he's compensating for something.

"Gressil is dead?" Blaarjiim speaks again, confusion evident in his voice. Apparently, the shadow monster didn't tell him about this. "How is that possible? In order for Jason to do that, he would have to-"

"In due time." Yama cuts off the demonic being in my mind as if to prevent him from speaking. "Jason has not yet... realized the situation he is in. Or perhaps he has...?" His eyes are tough to tell apart from the rest of his body, but still, I feel as if he stares up at me questioningly.

I shake my head slowly. "Afraid not. I'm mystified. You guys are monsters of some sort... so something went horribly wrong and I must have died in the cryopod. I think I'm in Hell."

Yama snickers quietly. "An apt description, human. Amusingly, you are correct. This is, in fact, Hell."

Oh. He says it so casually. I merely nod along. "Great. Thanks for letting me know. So if I'm dead, then that means this place is a punishment for my crimes? I don't remember doing anything wrong."

"Nay, it is not Hell in the sense one who hails from the Source would think of it, but Hell as in the name of this realm." Blaarjiim thoughtfully corrects me. "You are in the Great Labyrinth, a realm of mystery and unexplored secrets. Demons roam the halls, and as a human, you are sure to be short on allies."

Something about Blaarjiim's words appear to be... false. Maybe it's the tone of his voice or something, but I feel as if he's lying to me.

"Are there no other humans here?"

His face forms an expression of disgust in my mind. "Quite the contrary. Demons have been... losing the war. Humans overrun this place, but they are the worst scum of all. Turn your back on a demon, and you are likely to get stabbed. Turn your back on a human, and..." His voice trails off.

Yama finishes. "Don't turn your back on a human. Make no deals with a human. Humans are perverse monsters, though they label us as such. They seek the extermination of any who do not look like them."

I can't help but glare from the orb to the shadow monster and back to the orb again. "I'm a human. You're saying you don't trust me, then?"

"Certainly not." Yama curls up his lip. "Gressil is proof of that."

Err, he makes a good point. I did kill that statue monster without any effort. Come to think of it, how did I kill it?

Blaarjiim seems to read my mind. "Your killing of Gressil was quite impressive. With my power added to your own, you will be quite helpful for retaking our land from the humans."

"Aren't you curious about how I did it?"

I ask the question and immediately both monsters chortle at me.

Yama stops snickering and manages to form a response. "How arrogant. We already know, of course. The power of Wordsmithing is quite... pervasive. In fact, I will be the one to teach you how to use it properly, since I know far more about it than you do."

Wordsmithing? He knows about my power and it already has a name? Aw, man. Here I thought I was unique or something.

Wait a minute. "How do you know what Wordsmithing is?"

Yama stares silently for a few moments. "I have my ways."

Cryptic. "I could kill you with a single word, demon."

Blaarjiim raises an eyebrow. "Interesting. Your attitude is... unexpected. You are an aberration among your kind."

I toss the pitch black orb into my other hand, realizing my right hand is starting to cramp up. The orb is a lot heavier than it looks. "By 'kind', you mean humans, right?"

"I mean many different things." Blaarjiim crosses his arms in my mind's eye, and I realize further questioning is pointless.

A loud growl sounds off in the cave and I realize I'm starving. "Listen, this is a good chat but... can we get some food?"

Yama shakes his head slowly. "The human need for sustenance is a foreign concept to me. Demons can intake food, but we do it solely for reasons of boredom or pleasure. In any case, I have a secret base where you will be able to fill your urges."

The wording makes me frown, but I shrug it off. Demons are odd.

"Let's go, then."

Blaarjiim stirs. "It has been a long time since I left that pedestal. Yama, why did you forsake me for so long?"

The shadow grunts to himself quietly. "It was only a hundred years. Calm thyself, King of Darkness."

With a motion of his hands, a shadow bends around Yama, making him disappear wordlessly. A moment later, the darkness races at me, making my heart slam in my chest before I feel a sensation of being washed down a tube.

When my eyes open next, I have to blink hard as torches lining the walls appear to be unbearably bright.

Yama is standing a few feet away, as he gestures down the hallway in front of me toward a room up ahead with the flame of a small fire crackling in a fireplace. "Welcome to my lair, young Hiro."

Part 387b:

The hallway is quite dark, despite the five torches on each side of the wall extending down the hall, but to eyes that were just in an unnatural darkness unlike any other, it's as if I'm staring directly into the sun. The walls themselves are tiled, and appear to be made of an onyx-like black substance, one that absorbs the light around it instead of allowing the light to bounce off its surface.

I rub the water from my eyes and sniffle slightly. "Where are we?"

"My lair." Yama barely even gives me a decent answer as we start to walk down the hallway.

"Yes, I got that. I'm asking where the lair itself is."

Yama tilts his smoking black head at me with a look that can only be described as disgusted annoyance. "To explain would be more trouble than I care to invest myself in. You are likely suffering from the freezing sickness, so we should give you sustenance first."

Freezing sickness? Ah, he must be talking about cryosleep sickness. What a weird thing to call it.

We arrive at the end of the hall and walk into a rather plain dining room. The fire I saw from before is much smaller than I thought, little more than a small pile of sticks barely burning at all. It seemed so much bigger when I first saw it.

The floor is made of black wood, with a balsamic aroma that smells quite nice. The room itself is rather empty, though I do notice several paintings of a human woman scattered all around the walls, hung at somewhat random intervals. Wearing a black outfit with long black hair, she seems sad, as if she didn't want to sit still for the painting. Why would he have pictures of a human female?

My thoughts are interrupted as four girls walk in the room. Young women really, and human to boot. They're dressed in rags that barely seem to be held together by strings the thickness of shoelaces. They look handwoven, as if they were made from potato sacks from the 1800's.

I'm quite surprised by the four women, but they completely ignore me, and silently fall to their knees and bow before Yama, throwing their hands out in front of them and letting their foreheads touch the floor. In fact, everything about them is silent, even the way in which they move.

Yama barely even glances at them, instead talking to the air above their bowed forms. "This one is our guest. Give him anything he wishes. Start with a meal. Something lavish, whatever it is you humans eat will do."

They don't respond, not even nodding, before quickly standing up and walking out, never once looking directly at his face. Yama turns back to me. "In twenty minutes or so, the food will be prepared."

My mouth opens and closes, but I find it hard to put words to action. "Who were they?"

He blinks a few times, slowly. "The chattel? Hardly worth your consideration. Of course, since you are a human, if you feel the need to relieve yourself, they will be at your command. In any case, you seem quite dirty, and you're covered in residue from that container, but they will treat an honored guest such as yourself well."

Now I tap my foot and rub my lip. "So they're slaves."

Blaarjiim stirs in my hand. "Are you disturbed, because you share a kinship with them? They are subhuman, entirely different from yourself. Don't concern yourself with their lot."

Yama's eyes seem to open a bit wider. "Ah, Blaarjiim is right. Forgive me, I forgot that you might be offended seeing other members of your species reduced to such a pitiful existence."

Well... it's not that I'm offended... I suppose it makes sense demons would have human slaves...

"You mentioned back before we arrived here that demons were losing a war. If you're losing a war, why do you have human slaves? Why would you attempt to befriend me, a human, if you hate my kind?"

Yama ponders my question for a moment, but once again it is Blaarjiim who answers. "You misunderstand. We do not hate humans, we view them as inferior creatures. Do humans hate the stupid animals that roam their homeworld? Of course not. But if those beasts rose up and took over, the humans would be sure to resent their actions."

A smile crosses my face. "If humans are so inferior, then why are they winning the war?"

The living shadow immediately scowls. "I ask myself that very question all the time." With a small flourish, he snatches Blaarjiim's orb out of my hands. "The chattel will draw you up a bath. Down that hall and to the left. I have no need of such things, so the only option available will be in the servant's quarters."

I shake my head slowly and start to walk away, but Blaarjiim appears in my mind. "I can feel your doubt about our motivations, but you must understand you will have all the answers you need soon."

His words fill me with the exact opposite of confidence. "Great. I'm gonna go get cleaned up."

* * *

This place is dark and gloomy. A feeling of total despondency hangs on the air, like the smell of a thousand dead bodies. As I walk down the hall, I pass incredibly small rooms, all of which have barely enough room for tiny bunkbeds covered in filth, some of which have various slaves sleeping, and some that don't. I quickly can't help but notice the only slaves here are female. There are no men. Why? Does Yama fear men? Perhaps he's a lascivious sort of demon. Maybe it's something else.

What the hell am I doing? I killed a demon, that Gressil creature, yet Yama wants me to be his best friend now. Why shouldn't I just kill Yama too while I'm at it? Why not free these humans?

Then again, maybe they deserve it. I don't know the full story yet. What if humans are sick fuckers who do even worse things to demons. Do humans enslave demons? Do they just kill them indiscriminately? I mean, they are demons.

As I walk past room after room, I begin to wonder if Yama has ever set foot in this wing of his base. The bath certainly wasn't just down the hall on the left. I feel like I've walked a mile already, and I've passed several hallways on the right and left. This place feels like a goddamn maze. The dingy smell and dark corridors are even less illuminated than the hallways from before, though my eyes are unnaturally keen, for some reason. I can see into the darkness with startling clarity.

As I walk, I hear a soft pitter-patter of feet behind me. When I turn back, a young woman, possibly a year older or younger than me, stands silently with her head bowed.

"Huh? What is it?"

I ask a simple question, but she offers no response. She holds her right hand out hesitantly to me, making a cupping motion as if to scoop water, then she points behind herself towards a hallway I just passed. Never once does she look at me.

"You want me to go that way?"

She nods hesitantly before quickly turning and walking down the hallway she indicated before, and I waste no time in following after her.

She's a lovely thing, though it's tough to tell, what with the scraggly matted down red hair. She wears the same stitched together rags as all the other female slaves, making me wonder what the purpose is in forcing them to wear such humiliating clothing. Or then, perhaps that's the point. Humiliation. Her hair doesn't move at all, given it seems to be caked with dirt so badly that it's almost brittle. Her arms also seem to be covered in black dust, likely soot if I had to wager a guess. She must be someone who cleans out the fireplaces and torches I've observed.

She continues walking and I follow along until we arrive at the end of a hallway which opens into a startlingly clean looking bath house. It immediately reminds me of something I saw in Japanese guidebooks before I entered the cryopod.

In fact, the resemblance is uncanny. It's as if a non-Japanese person based this bath directly on a picture from a Japanese hotel pamphlet.

The slave girl stops before the door and stands to its side, keeping her head bowed, even as her bushy red hair falls forward unnaturally to hide her face. If I didn't know any better, I'd say it was intentional.

"Thank you for... showing me the way." I scratch my head, hemming and hawing while trying to make this less awkward, but as I speak, an old woman suddenly appears from the other side of the doorway to the bath house's entrance.

"You're the visitor, eh?"

Her skin is dark red, and her face is quite hideous. It looks almost like it's sagging off her face from generations of scowling at visitors she didn't like. I can immediately tell she isn't human. Contrasted with the young woman to my side, this is quite the old broad, clearly not one to honor any notions of romanticism. Her eyes are tinged with irritation as if she's seen it all and lived a thousand lives.

"Yes. I'm Jason Hiro. Yama brought me here to-"

"I know. Devil's sake, humans are mouthy bastards." She rolls her eyes before clapping her hands so loudly the human girl flinches. "Lora! Wipe that smile off your face! Get this man clean!"

'Lora' isn't smiling. What is this old demoness talking about?

The girl shoots a glance at the pool of water and I feel as if there is a deep longing in her eyes, as if she would kill for a chance to scrub herself clean.

The old bat glares at me. "What are you waiting for? Drop the clothes and get in! Lord Yama does not like to be kept waiting!"

As she says this, Lora immediately reaches around behind herself and starts to undo the back of her shirt, all while the old woman is apparently impatient for me to do the same.

This feels wrong.

"Ah, that won't be necessary. I'll clean myself." I quickly push past the old demon even as I feel her glare blast into my back.

"Oh, I see! Too good for ya, eh?" Her grimace lightens for a moment. "Hmm, on the other hand, perhaps I misunderstood. I wouldn't want the vermin touching me either."

I start to clarify that wasn't my intention, only to see Lora's eyes staring at the pool of water sadly. I suddenly realize that she probably doesn't care about me in the slightest, but only wants to get clean.

I don't get a chance to change my mind. The old demoness unmercifully stabs her finger into Lora's stomach. "You heard the man! He doesn't want your grimy hands near him! Get back to the pits!"

Lora lowers her head again and beats a hasty retreat. I feel a little guilty as I glance at the empty pool room. I expected there to be others bathing here, but the place looks like it's been untouched for years.

"Why isn't anyone else here?"

The old woman snickers as she hefts her frame forward on a staff I didn't notice from before. "This ain't where the riff-raff are cleaned. We got hoses for that, boy. This place is reserved for important guests only. 'sides, ain't like the girls are gonna say anything. Hehe, you know what I mean."

I shoot a quick look of confusion at her. "I don't actually. I'm... new here."

"Oh." She looks disappointed. "Yama cut out their tongues and their vocal cords when they were taken. He and I both hate yapping serfs."

I can't even be horrified. I should be, but it almost seems expected at this point. Maybe demons really are monsters.

The old woman smiles at me far too sweetly. "Oh yes, you're such a polite young boy. It's been ages since I saw a male human, I forgot how charming they were. I am Hellga, third born of the Deuterich demon family. We are quite respected among others of our kind, you know."

Her name sounds about as disgusting as she looks. "I'm Jason, but you know that already. Listen, do you mind if I have some privacy?"

She shrugs. "I was hoping for a show, but suit yourself, boy. Make it snappy, we've already wasted enough of Lord Yama's time."

Hellga stomps away ungracefully, and once again I find myself wondering what is going on at this demon slave farm, even as I strip my clothes off and slosh into the remarkably warm water. It's already heated to the perfect temperature.

I shouldn't have turned Lora away. I'd like to have seen what she looked like once she was cleaned up...

* * *

I breathe a sigh of relief, finally realizing how much warmer I feel after that bath. While I was in there, Hellga had somehow sneaked in and swapped my nasty clothes out for a fresh pinstripe suit. She guessed my measurements perfectly, though it feels odd to be wearing a suit in a place like this.

This suit is Japanese inspired, with eight buttons on the front grouped together in four clusters of two, and naturally, it comes in all-black. Yama's staff seem obsessed with that color.

I stand before a large oaken door now, circular in design. Without hesitation, I push it open and stroll into the room, surprised to see three demons here. Yama, two other red-skinned demons, and Blaarjiim's orb all greet me. There's also a lavish meal on the table, though the bulk of it is in front of the only open seat at the front of the table where I will presumably sit.

One of the newcomers, a male wearing a suit even blacker than mine, with eyes the color of rubies, glares at me as I walk forward. "So this is the human, then?"

Yama's small figure seems to be boosted up by a chair that's a bit taller than the others. I'd laugh if I thought it wouldn't make all these demons rip out my throat.

Though... I do wonder if I should really be scared of them.

"Yes. Jason Hiro. I'm sure you're all familiar with the name." Yama's voice is bland, even as his orb-like eyes flick down to the chair I'm to sit at. I calmly walk over and take my seat, being careful not to show any signs of fear in front of these demons. I don't know what's going on right now, but somehow everything continues to feel... familiar.

"How could we not be? He's-" The black-suited demon starts to speak but Yama cuts him off.

"Beelzebub. I'm the one who will do the talking."

The demon, apparently named Beelzebub, licks his lips and smooths his suit down with a practiced movement indicative of years worth of practice. "Of course. My apologies."

I take a moment to evaluate the other demon at the table quickly. He's a big behemoth of a demon, covered in battle scars, with a big flail inexplicably wrapped around his body, yet I feel as if I've seen him before.

The big one growls and picks at his teeth with a pinky. "The assembling of the three emperors, eh? When was the last time we bothered with this?"

"Don't be thick, Bael. If Yama wants us to gather, it's obviously for a significant reason." Beelzebub seems to mock the big demon, but he isn't having any of it.

"Are you mocking me, third?"

"No, no, of course not." Beelzebub retreats quickly, and his face flinches as if he had dodged an unseen blow.

While the two new demons have their verbal battle, I reach forward and yank a cookie off a plate before me. It's a plain thing, bland and brown with no special attention given to it, but I'd rather put something in my mouth than nothing. I'm starving. I take a tentative bite and am pleasantly surprised. It tastes like a simple sugar cookie, but it almost seems to be made with the care and devotion of someone who would ache to eat such a delicacy.

I chew it thoughtfully and Yama turns his attention back to me. "Now that the first and third are done squabbling. Let's get to it. Jason, we require your help."

I polish off the cookie and make them wait for a few seconds as I swallow. "Mmm. Is that so? I'd never have guessed."

"This is no time for jesting, Jason. Demonkind have barely been holding on what little territory we can, but there are only so many millennia of losses before we have to prepare ourselves for extinction."

I flick a glance at the door behind me. "You seem to be doing fine with the... slaves."

Yama tosses his hand up lightly. "We only use the chattel because we must. There are simply not enough imps to use as proper servants. You don't seem to grasp how efficiently my people are being exterminated."

He's right. I don't know. Don't really care, either. "These sound like excuses, Yama. I don't see why I'm so important." I dig my spoon into an odd looking brown mush, noting that despite its disgusting looks, it smells pleasant. "Wait, did you say millennia? How long was I inside that cryopod?"

All three demons glance at each other uneasily. "Millions of years." Blaarjiim is the one who answers my question. "Does this surprise you?"

"No... I guess it doesn't..." I murmur softly to myself as I stuff the salty brown mush into my mouth. It tastes a bit like meatloaf, perhaps?

It doesn't surprise me. Nothing does. This all feels wrong, so wrong. This isn't the way things are supposed to be. These demons aren't even the ones I should be talking to, I think.

It's there... on the tip of my tongue. I can't really put it into words, but I'm here for a purpose. What is that purpose, though?

"How did I kill Gressil?" I ask the question nonchalantly, but all three demons flinch and quickly try to hide flashes of anger. It seems Gressil was rather important to them.

"Wordsmithing. The power to make any idea come to reality with a single word. The word has to reflect what you wish to make happen, and there are a few limits to what you can do, but otherwise..." Yama's voice trails off.

"So when I said 'Die', I killed Gressil. That seems... simple." I smile slightly as I look over at Beelzebub. "What if I told you to die, eh, Beelz?"

His eyes narrow to slits. "Don't ever refer to me in such a manner, human. I won't die so easily to a mere word. Gressil was a fool and he ignored the safeguards. He got what was coming to him."

"The safeguards?"

Beelzebub quickly looks away. "Never mind. You wouldn't understand."

I quietly take a sip from a glass of red wine in front of me. "I suppose not. But if you would all stop beating around the bush, that could change."

The demons are hesitating. There's something they aren't telling me, as if they're afraid of what I'll say. Maybe they're afraid for a reason. Maybe they should be.

It's not just because I'm human. The demons need my power, the power of wordsmithing... but it also seems quite deadly. I'm a double edged sword.

Yama surprises me by pulling a black folder out of nowhere and sliding it across the table towards me. "These records should be sufficient."

I quickly grasp hold of it and lift it to my face. Historical battles. The white lettering on the front is faded and worn down, but it's in unmistakable English.

The entire room suddenly shakes as a thunderous boom sounds off, seemingly miles away. None of the three demons seem concerned in the slightest, but Yama notices my startled expression. "It's nothing. Human bombing runs. They won't find this place."

Indeed, another servant girl is on the other side of the dining room, scrubbing the floor, and she doesn't pay it any attention at all.

I turn my eyes back to the folder in front of me. This will finally answer the questions that have been plaguing me since I woke up.

I pull back the folder's first page and begin to read.

Part 388b:

It's not that what I'm reading is too horrifying to comprehend, I simply just don't know how to react to the words on the page. Accounts of humans capturing demons, butchering them in brutal, vile ways, and even performing barbaric chimeric surgeries before releasing demons back into the demon's realm to traumatize them... the journal of history is filled with dozens, if not hundreds of gruesome reports about humans treatment of the demons.

Yama watches me carefully as I flip through the pages of the dossier, finally speaking up once I have quickly scanned many of the grainy pictures. "You're not the only one who can use Wordsmithing."

I wait for him to continue, but he doesn't. I slowly set the faded folder down and slide it slightly away from me. I can't be bothered to eat any of the food anymore... I've simply lost my appetite. "Alright. So if I'm not the only Wordsmith out there, then that means...?"

Beelzebub harumphs and coughs audibly into his clenched fist. "The humans have an army of enhanced super soldiers. They're unstoppable in combat. We don't know who the first wordsmith is exactly, but we suspect he or she has given the power to many others. Wordsmithing has many practical applications, and is a special means of going beyond the laws of physics, as you might know them."

My hands somehow end up folded in my lap, though I don't know when I took my hands off the folder. Frankly, I'm just glad not to be looking at it anymore. "So why do I have this power, then? What makes me so important to you? Why not just take the power for yourself?"

Blaarjiim enters my mind. "It doesn't work like that. We're not sure how the original human did it, but he created an army of wordsmiths using his ability, and he's been using it to hunt us down and exterminate us. If demons could simply take the ability, we'd have done so by now." Blaarjiim gestures at Bael. "The first emperor, for example, is powerful enough that he might be able to capture a wordsmith by himself. As for you... well..."

Yama cuts him off. "You were part of a reserve unit. Apparently, the monster that terrorized our kind placed several humans he imbued with the power inside of stasis pods as a secret auxiliary force. We managed to take you, but we had no idea how to activate the unlock feature for the pod."

"No idea? That is hard to believe. It's a matter of pressing buttons."

"Mmm. Demons are terrible when it comes to understanding human technology. Assume that we simply 'pressed buttons,' what might have happened? We could have drained the fluid improperly and killed you. We might have shut down the power wrong. If we had a human who was willing to help us, we probably could have taken you out but... such a human was never in play."

I lean back in my chair and scratch my head. This whole thing sounds very fishy. It's as if they planned their story all out in a way that would make some logical sense to me, but... there are holes in the plot. "I wasn't part of an auxiliary unit. I entered the cryopod willingly. I remember doing it because I was... well... I was depressed. I uh..." My voice falters for a moment as I feel a sudden rush of emotion. Yeah, that's right... I put myself in the cryopod because I didn't want to live anymore. I thought by donating my body to science I could perhaps improve the world around me.

Huh? What a joke. That's not me at all. I wouldn't do something so pathetic. Why did I really put myself in the cryopod?

The demons at the table evaluate me carefully, and it's at this moment that I realize... they're lying to me. They're lying about something big. I definitely wasn't part of some secret fighting force. Maybe my memories were altered or something, but that's unlikely as hell.

Why are these demons lying? What do they have to gain? Everything, now that I think about it. If I possess some crazy power that allows me to manipulate the universe with a single word, then I'm a living nuclear bomb. The demons aren't lying about being crushed by humanity; I can tell that much already. But as things are going now, the demons are probably going to ask me to give them my power, or copy it over or something.

As if. I don't trust anyone sitting at this table. They're using me.

However, I can just play along. I'll learn how my abilities work, and give them small favors here and there. Maybe I'll end up running the place in due time.

"A question, Yama. Why didn't you just capture a human scientist or two? If getting me out of the cryopod was your best hope, I'd expect you to have put a little more effort into the task. I mean, you have human slaves running around all over the place here."

Yama shakes his head slowly. "Your kind is crafty and aided by many brilliant minds. Their technology far outstrips our magical powers. Besides, these slaves are several generations past. They hardly bear any resemblance to the humans that exist outside of the labyrinth. All human scientists have small bombs planted in their brains just in case a demon were to capture them."

For once, Yama says something that surprises me. "Bombs in their heads? That's ridiculous. Why would they go along with such a thing?"

Blaarjiim interjects. "The reason, Jason Hiro, is that they must. Humans are led by a few undying never-aging immortals... plus the leaders of our worst enemies... the angels, as well as the Volgrim."

I involuntarily take a deep breath and exhale through my nose. "Angels. Volgrim. What the fuck is going on, even? I can guess what angels are, but Volgrim?"

"They are... ah... aliens." Beelzebub looks slightly flustered as he says this. "You likely come from a time before their arrival, but indeed aliens exist. They are extremely dangerous as well. Their technology might just exceed that of humanity's."

This is a lot to digest. I finally reach forward and poke at a strawberry with my finger, picking it up and ripping out the leafy stem before tossing the red fruit back in my mouth. Its softness and juicy texture are quite delicious, possibly the most normal thing I've tasted so far.

"Humans... Demons... Angels... Aliens... what's next? Necromancers, goblins, witches, giant fighting robots, and Godzilla?"

The demons at the table look back and forth at each other seriously for a moment or two before looking back to me. Yama speaks up. "Actually..."

"I don't even want to know." I cut him off quickly. "So let's get to it. You want me to use my powers to fight this war for you?"

" With us. You don't need to do everything by yourself." Yama beckons toward Beelzebub. "The third emperor will assist you in learning how your powers work."

Beelzebub's faint smile immediately crumples as he shoots an angry glare at Yama. "I beg your pardon? I don't recall signing on for such a task. I will not be a babysitter for a... fleshbag."

I first want to agree with him, but the insult makes me angry. If he hates humans so much, then I'll get a good chuckle out of ruining his day. "Beelzy, I think Yama has a good point. We could make a good team, you and me."

His crimson eyes light up with a most amusing fiery rage, and he rises slightly in his chair as if he wants to jump across the table and throttle me. "By the seven devils! I won't allow you to refer to me in such a disrespectful way!"

Yama, for once, shows a hint of a smile. "Now now, Third, you insulted him first. You deserved that."

Bael and Blaarjiim both nod along with Yama, and I quickly realize they don't particularly like the prissy, snooty jackwagon sitting across from me.

Beelzy slowly closes his eyes and breathes deeply before sitting back down. "Fine." He hisses the word out between his teeth.

I'm going to enjoy torturing this poor soul.

Yama stands up in his chair abruptly, his comically tiny self now towering over everyone at the table. "Well then, that should be the end of it. Third Emperor Beelzebub will assist you in using your powers, you will train to help us against the humans, and if you need anything, we are here to assist you."

Yes you are. I smile inwardly to myself and stifle an urge to lick my lips. I've hardly known demons for a day, and already I see how simple-minded they are. It's no wonder the genius of humanity has been able to pacify them to this extent. They couldn't even figure out how to unlock a cryopod.

I stand up too, popping my back and cricking my neck. "That will do then. Will I be able to get some sleep tonight?"

"Hmm. Right." Yama murmurs to himself, showing that he had once again forgotten about my human foibles. "Demons do not require sleep, so I forgot. My apologies. I will have the chattel clear out one of the- ah, no, those rooms are rather... grimy. I will have my assistant furnish something for you at once."

He nods at me and then shifts from the chair to the ground in the blink of an eye, moving as one with the shadows in the room. The room is hardly even illuminated by the candles all around the place, so the effect is rather... creepy.

"Just show me to an empty space. I'd like to try out this wordsmithing for myself."

Yama quickly turns from me to Beelzebub, shrugs, then looks back. "Do as you please, human."

He makes a quick motion with his hands, and a moment later Hellga limps into the room, looking disgusting as ever. "What be ye needin', Lord Yama?"

* * *

Several minutes of walking pass, as Hellga leads me back down those halls I had traversed earlier for my bath. This time, the path takes several rights and lefts, and it doesn't take long for me to give up trying to remember the way back.

"Just tell the serfs to lead ya back, it's all they're good for." Hellga grumbles under her breath when I inquire about the path, but she shoots an evil smile at me afterward. "Hehe, well, that ain't all they're good for. Human male like you will understand, I'm sure."

Naturally I grasp what she's talking about. The idea isn't repulsive to me, but it's simply not something I'm interested in. Taking someone who doesn't resist is not nearly as much fun as making a game of it or winning their affection.

Odd. I don't remember thinking like that before I entered the cryopod. I wonder why my personality feels so different now? Maybe the ice messed with my brain. Yeah, that's probably it.

Finally, we arrive at a rather large, plain looking doorway. It's a room not unlike that of the women's rooms all around me, but it's substantially bigger and less cramped, plus it's empty.

"I'll make sure Sheena gets you bedding, boy. This is last minute notice, after all."

"No, that's fine. I won't be needing their assistance." I smile politely at Hellga, even though the action repulses me. She is simply the most hideous looking thing I've ever seen, human or demon. In fact, every demon I've encountered so far has been quite good looking. Demons seem to pride themselves on their looks and status. I wonder why she is the exception?

I turn my back to her and think carefully about how I killed Gressil earlier today. Was it this morning? A few hours ago? Without the sun or a clock to be seen, time is hard to keep track of. The darkness seems to be stunting my biological clock too.

Let's see... it was a single word... something that conveys the meaning of what I want...

" Bed. "

I speak the word and feel a strange tingling in my body. An instant later, something vaguely resembling a bed appears in front of me instantly, startling me and making me take a step back. Even Hellga is surprised.

"Ye made it pop out of nowhere. Strange magic, that is."

I steal a glance at her face behind me. She's surprised by my magic trick, but what interests me is that despite what Yama spoke about a few minutes ago, she doesn't know what Wordsmithing is. If she's a well known and respected demoness, why doesn't she know about Wordsmithing? Wouldn't such devastating magic be well known to all demons?

Something doesn't add up here. Something is rotten in this labyrinth.

Hellga finally shakes her head and walks away, mumbling incoherently under her breath. Suits me fine, she's rather annoying to be around.

I glance back at the bed I've made. It's rather awful, misshapen, and nothing like what a bed should resemble. It slopes down at the angle closest to me, meaning the legs closest to me are shorter than the other two, and it's hardly more than a wooden frame. Mattress not included.

I try again. " Bed. " Instantly, another just like the one in front of me appears in midair and falls down abruptly with a loud bang that nearly makes me jump out of my skin.

Right, I wanted just to edit the existing one, not create another. This is a bit confusing. " Delete. "

I somehow feel as if I'm aiming my mind at the bed on top, and sure enough, it pops out of existence, disappearing into the nether. A thought crosses my mind. Could this be a way I might kill someone? Do different words lead to different killing methods?

I file that thought under maybe and resume work. This time, I don't summon another bed. Instead, I imagine the bed's legs raising up a few inches. " Alter. " Sure enough, the bed adjusts itself and now sits perfectly level.

So I can create things, remove them, and alter them. Those alone have... an astounding number of uses.

I quickly create a soft mattress, one that defies the normal limits of what comfort entails, and sit down gently on the bed. It's unbelievably soft, as if the moment I lay my head on my pillow, I'll be sleeping in an angel's arms.

I stare out the doorway. Now that things have quieted down a lot, I can hear the distant sounds of collective breathing, all around me. I passed many rooms on my way here, and it seemed to me that about half the girls sleep while the other half work, and they seem to rotate out at regular intervals.

" Barrier. " I create a soundproof invisible wall at my doorway, and instantly the sounds in the distance are cut off, and my room is weirdly silent. Still, I prefer hearing just my thoughts. Other people can be extremely annoying.

Time to play around a bit. " Fire. " I imagine a small flame appearing in midair before me, and sure enough, it appears. " Sword. Shirt. Gun. "

To my surprise, the gun appears in my hand, but it's even more misshapen than the bed initially was. Every piece of it is stuck together, and I quickly realize that I don't know what the inside of a gun looks like, only the exterior. It seems my abilities are limited by my imagination, but thus they only have that singular limit.

Well, I can't assume that much. There might be other walls I'll run into. Yama and the other demons were cryptic, to say the least. I have the feeling they're going to try and limit my growth.

I sit on the bed for a few minutes, just staring at the gun, before I finally shrug and lay down. I'll worry about it in the morning... or whenever I wake up. I guess 'morning' doesn't really exist in this place.

* * *

I need to piss.

My eyes jerk open, and I sit up in bed. I feel like I slept for a week, and my body is so rested that I don't even want to think about sleep anymore. In fact, sleep repulses me.

But more importantly, I need to piss. Really bad.

I quickly get off my bed and walk through my soundproof barrier, where the faint sounds all around me become audible once again. Where do they hide the bathrooms in these catacombs? Why are the hallways so meandering? Where is the dining room where I met the other demons?

Should I just wordsmith the piss out of myself? Tempting. I don't want to kill myself or something though accidentally, and I don't want to piss in a corner either. People live here, after all.

As I have these thoughts, I suddenly feel a presence beside me. Glancing to my left, I'm surprised to see a familiar figure standing a couple of feet away, and she isn't saying a single word.

Lora, as always, has her head downcast toward the ground, and it bothers me, as I was always taught by the orphanage adults to look people in the eye when I spoke. I guess the same isn't true for human cattle, as the demons seem to treat these girls.

"Lora. Is there a... um... bathroom here?"

I feel slightly embarrassed to ask, but she simply pushes past me and begins walking quickly away, so I shrug and follow along. She seems to understand speech perfectly well, so she isn't stupid... she simply can't talk.

Frankly, the thought disgusts me. I remember a quote I read once. If you cut out a man's tongue, you have not proven him a liar, but only that you fear what he has to say. It's not really the same thing since it seems the demons just don't like to hear humans talking, as if our very voices are an irritant. Still, it bothers me a lot.

Lora leads me down just a few short corridors before she finally stops in front of a very primitive looking toilet, really more of a latrine than what I'm used to. Unsurprisingly, it's designed for women, but it will have to do.

She continues to stand by the open doorway as I enter, and I realize she doesn't quite understand the concept of privacy. "Would you mind waiting around the corner?"

She walks away without acknowledging my words, and I relieve myself, sighing contentedly.

I wordsmith water to create a bubble of liquid in the air, wash my hands, and then make it disappear a moment later. Thinking back on it, if I'd used my head, I could have just created a toilet in my room. I'll have to remember that for the future.

I step out of the bathroom and spot Lora standing just around the corner a few dozen feet away, and wonder to myself several things all at once. Perhaps she can give me answers that others cannot, even if she can't speak.

I walk up to her and she stiffens noticeably as I draw closer. It unnerves me, as if she's scared of me. Probably a wise idea, if I'm being honest. I'm a killer, after all.

"Lora, do you understand me?"

I ask the question, and it takes several seconds for her to shift her feet. She doesn't give any indication she heard me, and instead keeps her head bowed to the ground.

"Just nod if you can, or shake your head if you cannot."

I hardly give her the instruction and she immediately nods her head. It's as if she won't do anything unless expressly allowed to do so.

"Would you be okay with looking me in the eye when I speak to you? I'm not like the demons."

Her hands quickly clasp together and she fidgets slightly. Just as I'm about to ask again, she slowly raises her head up to look at me.

I can't help but flinch. Her face is scarred, badly. It looks as if she was burned with several red-hot torture tools several times. Scar tissue is built up over other scar tissue. It looks inhumanly painful. The scars are years old by now, but whatever caused her the injuries to her face, it must have been horrible.

She must see the look of disgust in my eyes and quickly lowers her head again, and is now noticeably more uncomfortable, as she slightly pulls away from me.

I feel like an asshole.

"Sorry, I didn't realize... I mean, that is..." I quickly feel awkward, and then in the blink of an eye, an idea pops into my head. It's so obvious, but it's worth a try.

I reach over slowly, so as to not startle her, and carefully lift her chin up so she has to look at me again. The scars are old, and have been a part of her face for years now... but I can change that.

" Heal. Repair. " I speak two words, one after the other, and marvel to myself as the skin on her face softens and reforms, the valleys and lumps of mottled skin across her face smooth out and a transformation occurs. In seconds, she goes from a deformed young woman to something much more beautiful.

Then I do something else. " Regenerate. "

This time, a look of absolute shock passes over her face as she stumbles away from me and falls to the ground, grasping her throat and coughing weakly. I take a few steps forwards and kneel down to her level, worrying that I did something wrong. A few seconds later her weak coughs begin to sound more audible, as her vocal cords stitch back together, along with her tongue. She stares at me in confusion before quickly jamming a hand in her mouth to touch the weird organ that wasn't there before.

"Can you speak now?" I force a smile as I look at her, and once she pulls her hand out of her mouth, she gives a valiant effort.

"Wrghh nsh"

My forced smile turns a little genuine as I try not to laugh. It's quite a serious thing and probably fills her with joy to have her body fixed up, but the way she speaks is just funny. Though, I don't know how long she hasn't had a tongue. If it was since infancy or young childhood, she never had any ability to speak and would take years of practice to learn.

At the least, it might make her eat food more comfortably.

I smile and stand up, trying not to break my arm patting myself on the back. Only then does a thought occur to me.

What if giving her back a face and a tongue is a bad thing?

If Yama doesn't like that I did this, then he might cut out her tongue and scar her face all over again. She would suffer for the second time in her life, and it would be all because of me.

Well, honestly, I don't care, I suppose, but yet I also do. This feeling is confusing.

I should probably take responsibility for what I've done.

She stands up and stares at me with a strange look in her eyes, almost something like that of awe.

My smile vanishes as I look at her. "You're mine now. I gave you back your face and tongue. I will tell Yama not to lay a hand on you. From now on, you do as I say."

She nods along, and her expression of awe fades as she too begins to realize the true repercussions of my actions. Soon, her expression is that of unease and wariness.

The look on her face is perfect. In this place, no-one is your ally. Everyone is your enemy. You have to look out for yourself. Already, I've come to realize that.

"Take me to Yama. I need to speak with him."

Part 389b: Squire

Lora knows this inner sanctum well. Everyone here acts as if they have a built-in homing beacon to wherever their destination is. As we take lefts and rights, the hallways turn into a blur, every black tiled wall looking the same as the next one. What are the walls even made of? Why does Yama live in such a dark, desolate place?

The questions flash through my mind, and even as I think them, I quickly discard the idea of asking Lora. She can't answer me back verbally, and her communication skills are rudimentary at best. She can only respond with head shakes and nods.

As we walk down the halls, I spot a familiar fireplace a few hundred feet in the distance, a straight shot down a corridor. "Is that the main room?"

Lora nods silently, and her hair stiffly shifts on her head. After I chat with Yama, I'm going to have to get her cleaned up. I'd prefer she not be dirty if she's going to be following me around.

We quickly walk towards the fireplace, and as we do, I spot a strange looking oak door on my left. It's cracked open a few inches, and a strange blue glow is emanating from the crack. Lora walks right past it and ignores it entirely, but I slow down a little bit and slyly peek inside.

It's a room filled with various tools and implements of all sorts, including hammers, chisels, items that look to be used for construction. The whole room is perhaps twenty feet square in all directions, and I'm surprised to see that the blue glow comes from a single object. There's a giant crystal of some sort, perhaps made of ice or something similar. Inside the crystal is a human girl, perhaps twelve or thirteen years old, standing loosely with her shoulders slumped forwards. Her eyes are closed, and she looks to be sleeping or something.

She's a little cutie, with long black hair and wearing a skin-tight black jumpsuit. I don't know why, but I am slightly interested in what put the girl in that situation. Why is she inside this room with all these random tools?

I jump slightly when Lora violently grabs me and yanks me away from the doorway, pulling it shut quickly. When I look at her in confusion, she shakes her head vigorously and looks around in fear. We're not supposed to be here.

I'm irritated that she'd treat me like that, but impressed by her courage. She's extremely deferential to me and treats me almost like a god of some sort, yet she doesn't hesitate to pull me away from this room by force. Clearly, she's scared of whatever is in there, or whatever might happen to me if I have a look.

As she should.

I decide not to question her motives and simply walk away. Whoever the girl is in that room, Lora probably knows enough of the story to want me to leave it alone. It's certainly none of my business.

A minute later, I walk into the dining room and am slightly surprised to see that Bael and Yama are not there. Only Beelzebub is, along with the black orb. Beelzy is carefully filing his nails down with a metal implement, and he raises his head up when I walk in.

"You're back already? You were hardly asleep four hours."

Lora stays behind at the doorway entrance and stands outside behind the wall, unseen. If Beelzebub noticed her, he gives no indication of caring. I walk in and sit down, and at that moment a door on the other side of the room opens up, and several slaves enter with food of varying sorts, quickly set the food on the table before me, and leave.

I blink in surprise at the food. "How did the slaves know I was coming?"

Beelzebub shrugs. "I don't pry into the Second's hospitality. Yama is a strange demon."

"You said it, not me." My hands move without thinking, grabbing a fork and spearing something resembling a plum and another thing which might be a chicken wing. I halt just before poking the wing with my fork as a weird sense of revulsion fills me. Instead, I grab an apple from my left.

After munching on the apple and plum for a few moments, I shift in my seat slightly as I feel Beelzebub's gaze beating down on me. "Is there something you want, demon?"

"Perhaps not." He hisses curtly at me, and I then feel Blaarjiim's presence fill my mind once again as if he's just been stirred from a deep sleep.

"Beelzebub, like Yama, is especially disgusted by humans." Blaarjiim's body for a moment appears almost reptilian, but it passes quickly, and I'm not sure if it's just my mind playing tricks on me. He stretches and seems to lay on a cloud of nothing. "I, however, do not share the same opinion. I find humans fascinating."

I swallow the chunk of apple I just bit off. "Fascinating? We aren't all that interesting, really."

"A human would think that." Beelzy rolls his eyes and sets the nail file down. "Yama will be here shortly. He is meditating to speak with the ancient dark gods."

"Is he really, now." I slip a rhetorical question in and glance back at the doorway. I can tell Lora is still sitting out there. For some reason, it bugs me having her sit away from the table. "Lora, come here."

She hesitates for several moments before slowly walking around the door, making sure to always stare at the ground.

I pull a chair out to my right. "Have a seat."

Her head tilts up slightly, and her hands wring together for a moment as she internally questions whether she should or shouldn't do it.

I decide not to give her a choice. "That was an order, not a request."

Since I was decisive with my words, she quickly moves around the chair and eases onto it, though she's sitting halfway off of it, as if she's ready to bolt at any second.

Beelzebub glares at her and then back at me. "Are you mocking me? I refuse to sit at the table with... with..."

I finish his sentence for him. "Another human? You can handle it, champ. Unless you're too weak willed, or something. Eh, Beelzy?"

I don't know why, but calling him 'Beelzy' fills me with a particular glee. The way his eyes smolder like hot coals every time I say it, it reminds me of something from long ago, something I can't quite put my finger on.

Maybe it's because he's just too easy to mess with. He gnashes his teeth again and wrings his hands, even as he forces himself to stay put. "You are lucky that you are under the Second's protection right now. If you were not a guest in his house, I would-"

Blaarjiim cuts him off. "That's enough, Third. You are far too easily goaded. It will be your undoing someday."

"If it hasn't already." I murmur under my breath as I shove a pile of beans in my mouth.

"What was that?" Beelzebub tries to say something else, but at that moment, Yama walks in from a side door towards his side of the table, at the head. From the corner of my eye, I spot Lora's hands start to tremble, and her whole body shakes.

Good. A little fear will whip her into shape once we leave this place.

Yama coldly stares at the slave girl. "What is this about, Jason?"

"I'm going to work with demons, and I've taken a liking to this slave girl. I'll be taking her off your hands."

He barely even shrugs as he walks over and climbs up into his comically high chair. "A demon's allies must always have slaves. I will allow this. However, next time you will ask me in advance. Do I make myself clear, human?"

I nonchalantly nod back at him. "Sure thing. So what are we going to do today?"

Despite his allowance for Lora to be my slave, Yama stares at her for several seconds before turning his attention back to me. "Beelzebub is going to train your wordsmithing, as I said before. You will go with him into the labyrinth and learn a few key things regarding magic."

I glance over at Lora and push a plate of food towards her silently before turning back to Yama. "I experimented with wordsmithing before I went to sleep. I think I already have the gist of it."

Beelzebub snickers, but Yama's expression is stone-cold. "We don't really have time for you to experiment, I'm afraid. We didn't have time a million years ago, and we're on the precipice of extinction now. You need to be brought up to speed on wordsmithing all at once. The humans are preparing for one final all-out assault. They have yet to find the Demon Emperor lairs, but the labyrinth has little left for them to map out. They can traverse it far faster than it expands."

I raise an eyebrow. "It expands? What do you mean?"

Blaarjiim speaks. "The labyrinth was created by the original First Emperor, Satan. When he was slain in battle, he gave the key to demonkind's survival to his closest followers. This labyrinth draws on the energy of demonkind to expand itself outwards. The more demons, the more energy, the faster it can expand."

Yama nods. "Indeed. But demons are very few in number now. The expansion has come to nearly a complete standstill. It took millions of years, but humans began to eventually explore and map the labyrinth, destroying it in the process, until the expansion slowed enough that they were able to make real headway."

"Sounds dire." I look back at Lora and notice she hasn't eaten yet. Her hands are still shaking, and she refuses to touch the meal. "Stick the food in your mouth, or you aren't eating for a week."

She hesitates still, but quickly leans forwards and takes the plate into her lap, ducking down a bit in a futile effort to make sure nobody can see her eat.

I don't exactly enjoy being vicious, but there's no room for weakness in this place. If she can't grow a backbone, despite whatever her life has been like, she'll just be in my way.

I turn back to Yama. "You know, something's really bugging me. If demons are in such a bad spot, what makes you think I'm going to help you? Only an idiot bets on a limping horse. What's in this for me?"

Beelzebub's expression lightens up for a minute, and he widens his eyes in approval. "Well, that's a very demonlike statement to make."

Yama doesn't look quite so pleased. "I have many slaves to choose from. Money, power, it can all be yours."

"Money? Power? I have the ability to create anything I want with my mind. Better yet, humanity probably has more of that to actually offer me anyway. Your offer is far too cheap."

The little shadow creature leans back in his chair and crosses his smoky black arms. He is very displeased. "What do you want, then? You are correct. We have... little to give."

I suddenly realize I'm not sure what I want. I crawled out of a freezing cold cryopod less than a day ago and stumbled into a universe I don't recognize in the slightest. What should I ask for?

"I want to be the king of demons. That should suffice."

Yama and Beelzebub both exchange a look of disbelief. Blaarjiim is the one to speak, however. "I thought you didn't care about power."

"I didn't say that. This is different, anyway. If I'm going to liberate and free your people, then I will lead them afterward. It's that simple. A man does not work for free, he must get something worth the trouble he goes to."

Beelzebub chuckles to himself. "Slaves would think differently."

Lora shudders at his remark. She doesn't like being talked about, especially by demons. I get the impression that slaves here do everything they can to not draw attention from demons.

I shake my head at his reply. "I am not a slave."

"Of course not." Beelzebub pulls the file out again and goes back to scraping at his nails. It's like some sort of addiction for him, resembling a smoker's addiction to cigarettes. "Just making a point."

"Your point is made." Yama hisses quietly. "Fine, if you merely wish to lead the demons, that is... doable. Bael will not be pleased but desperate times call for desperate measures. Honestly, he should be grateful your demand is actually possible. Please, however, realize that if we are eliminated by the humans, you will have no subjects to rule over, so winning is a requirement for us to fulfill our end of the agreement."

"I can handle that." I smile at Yama pleasantly, all the while thinking to myself I'm not actually sure I can, but better to look confident.

The room goes silent for a moment, and the only sound that can be heard is Lora chewing something, though she freezes and becomes self-conscious when she realizes people are looking at her.

Beelzebub stands up abruptly and pushes his chair away. "Well, I suppose we had best get going. Unless you care to wait for the chattel to finish her meal?"

I don't even need to respond as she quickly shoves the plate back on the table and bows her head again.

"I guess that's that, then." I stand up and she does too, though she stands up so quickly she almost knocks her chair backward. I stifle a laugh, but none of the demons look amused.

"Take Blaarjiim along. His power will significantly accelerate the task at hand." Beelzebub snaps the words out as he walks around the table to my side. "I assume you're going to ask to bring this female along. I'll only allow it if she doesn't get in the way."

"She won't." I shoot a look at Lora. "Right?"

She nods quickly.

I grab the black orb from its holder on the table. "We'll be back later, Yama."

* * *

I feel a vacuum of air blast out from around myself, as well as Lora and Beelzebub when we arrive. His method of teleportation feels very different from Yama's, though not unwelcome.

I quickly look around to take my surroundings in. A dimly lit chasm surrounds us, extending for miles in every direction, with the walls being visible from far away. The ceiling is not there; instead, a light much darker than that of a sun radiates from the sky above. The light feels mystical, as if it shouldn't exist, but yet it does.

The ground is not the same dingy brown that I walked upon in the labyrinth. Moss is everywhere, soft and supple as though I could lie down on it and take a nap. Flowers that glow softly dot the landscape, and mountains of rubble spring up here and there.

It's almost like an atom bomb went off, thousands of years ago, and the labyrinth is trying to reclaim its history.

A trail of smoke catches my eye, and I notice that a large patch of the crater we're standing in is smoldering from a recent fire. The moss is charred black.

Then I begin to pick out individual details. Some of the rubble is different from the rest. Smooth metal stands out in a way that nothing else does. Words, written in a language I don't know how to read. A spaceship, if I didn't know any better, is sunk into the ground, having plowed front-first into the dirt. By the looks of it, nobody cared enough to attempt to salvage the wreckage.

And then I spot other things. Robots covered in moss, long since deactivated, they lie in heaps, torn into scattered pieces here and there. Some of them have artificial skin still plastered over their body, with the metal underneath exposed. The result is a creepy collection of soulless killing machines.

Lora looks unnerved and pushes up next to me, her body hovering half an inch from mine.

"This place is distinctive, among demonkind and humankind alike. This is where it all began." Beelzebub waves his hand in a semi-circle. "This is where humans launched their first major assault against my people. Afterward, they returned to place these poisonous plants everywhere, as if to spite the sanctity of the labyrinth. They did this to prove a point."

"That they're in control." I finish his thought for him. "Humans can be like that. Are these plants actually poisonous though?"

Blaarjiim smiles evilly in my mind. "In a manner of speaking. They will not harm one who touches them, but they ruin the place that the first Devil created for his kind to live in. Plants and greenery do not belong here. They are part of the human homeworld, and thus belong to the humans wherever they live."

"Oh. So they aren't poisonous then." I try not to roll my eyes but can't resist. These demons are seriously getting uppity about adding a little color to the place? Goddamn, they're gloomy. Maybe some sunlight would do them some good.

Beelzebub walks forward a few paces and turns to face me. "We don't know the full extent wordsmithing can achieve, but we know a bit about it. For example, you can give your body unique properties, such as the ability to teleport without wordsmithing, and capacity to lift objects with your mind. I'll let you figure out how that works."

I blink in surprise. That information is surprisingly helpful. After pausing for a moment to consider, I decide to try it out. "Teleport."

Nothing happens. I stare in confusion before realizing that I didn't think of where I wanted to actually go. This time I aim my mind a few dozen feet away into a clearing. "Teleport."

The words hardly leave my mouth, and I feel my surroundings shift. My energy trickles down slightly, and Blaarjiim stirs in my hand. "That was a familiar sensation. It has been a long time since I experienced such an instant form of teleportation."

"Isn't teleportation by nature instantaneous?"

He shakes his head in my mind's eye. "No. Demons have to perform a small incantation, and the method of travel varies from demon to demon, as well as the distance they can travel. Yama uses shadows, while Beelzebub does something more like creating a body at the location he wishes to move to, transferring his inner self to that body, and erasing the old one. As I said, it varies."

"Hm. Nice to know." I think for a moment before trying something else. "Teleportation."

Once again, nothing happens, but I feel my energy dip more noticeably, perhaps 3% of my total reserves. Then I aim my mind at a nearby rock sticking up from the mossy floor. An instant later, I appear on top of it. The travel feels fluid, as natural as if I've been doing it my whole life. It happens as casually as taking a step.

"Fascinating. You're already getting the hang of it." Beelzebub stares at me intently, as if looking for weaknesses. Perhaps he wishes to exploit them, or maybe he's looking out for my well-being and areas to improve. I won't hold my breath on the latter.

"As I said, I practiced a little bit already." I flex my fingers and curl them into a fist, flexing slowly. "I feel a sort of inner energy dip every time I use my power. What happens if I run out? Will I die?"

Blaarjiim doesn't hesitate. "No. You will be unable to use magic and may fall into a deep sleep, but otherwise, you will be fine. Of course, using up all your energy is only likely to happen in a life or death situation, so falling asleep is probably a death sentence. Try not to let yourself slip up in that case."

"Wonderful."

Blaarjiim nods. "Humans recover their energy when they sleep, so your reserves are functionally unlimited, but it is finite for spurts of time."

Hmm. My powers are really something. The ability to change the fabric of reality as I know it, give myself other powers, create and destroy... I'm... I'm a god, aren't I? If I am a god, then what of the others with wordsmithing? Are those people not even more godly than myself?

Perhaps aligning with the demons is foolish. My main goal should be to eliminate my competition, then subjugate the rest.

We will see.

Without putting effort into the act, I teleport back to Lora and she squeaks in fright. Apparently, she didn't expect that. "Calm down. If you're going to be here in the labyrinth, it would be idiotic of me to not give you any protection."

I speak a few words, back to back. "Sword. Shield. Boots. Bracers. Armor. Helmet."

In seconds, a full set of plate mail armor appears and falls to the ground with a loud clang. I then create a set of undergarments for her to wear, since those disgusting leather strips will not protect her from the metal's chafing, and they look quite ugly at this point.

"Put the clothes and the armor on. They'll be heavy, but it'll help build up your strength. Once you've done that, I want you to swing this sword over at that wall until you're too tired to move."

She glances up at me and then back to Beelzebub, unsure of what to do, but then quickly starts to undo her shirt. I turn away out of politeness so she can have a bit of privacy, not that she seems to care.

Walking back over to Beelzebub, I smirk as he rolls his eyes. "You've really taken a fancy to that slave girl, eh, human?"

"Well, Beelzy, unlike you I can actually care about another of my kind without acting like it's the end of the world. Maybe you should stop being so heartless."

For once, he doesn't get mad at me for calling him that moniker. Instead, he turns slowly and gazes at the mossy ground all around us. "I did care about my kind, once. And then slowly but surely, the ones I cared about were stripped away. One by one, the humans took them."

My eyes lower, almost by their own volition. His lack of an annoyed reaction makes me regret poking fun at him. Demons are so... depressing.

A clank behind me makes me turn around. Lora is no longer wearing the tattered rags, and instead, is dressed in a loose-fitting long-sleeved white shirt and pants, and has already put the metallic boots on with surprising speed. She seems to be puzzling over the chest plate though, as if unsure of what to do with it.

I walk back over to her and take the armor from her. "Here, hold your arms straight up. I'll put it on for you."

She nods and does what I tell her to do, though it takes a couple tries for her to figure out which hole is for her head and which ones are for her arms. Finally, she manages to slip into it and breathes an audible sigh of relief. Reflexively, she raps the armor with her knuckles and then surprises me by smiling ever so slightly. She likes it. The armor is quite heavy, but I'm not taking it easy on her just because of her life so far. When life gives you lemons, you have to make lemonade.

Eventually, she puts all the rest of it on, and when she finally holds up the shield and her sword, she's breathing heavily. Already, she's feeling the weight of the armor. The shield is white on the front, with a red cross emblazoned on it. I don't remember imagining that specifically, but I suppose some Crusader imagery might have slipped into my mind somehow. The sword is a longsword, over two feet in length with a plain steel hilt, wrapped tightly with leather for easier gripping.

And Lora looks absolutely unintimidating. If I saw her charging at me in battle, I'd probably die of laughter before the sword had a chance to clumsily stab at me.

Still, I have to say the get-up does look rather... cute? Yes, kind of adorable in some ways.

Lora trudges off to go swing the sword at the wall as I instructed, and Beelzebub snickers audibly. I turn back to look at him. "What's so funny, demon?"

He laughs harder, this time having to cover his mouth to prevent a real uproar. "By the seven devils, that has to be the most pathetic bodyguard a king could ask for! She'd be better off jumping into the path of a sword to stop it from hitting you than trying to actually fight! Pahaha! Humans truly have no concept of futility!"

I smile curtly at him. "You're right. It's pointless for her to fight as she is now. But every man, every human that has killed a demon, started off as a child. Only trials, tribulation, and training could make a weak child into someone who could kill demons en-masse. I'd watch your mouth if I were you. That woman is more likely to be the final slayer of the demon race than you are to reclaim this labyrinth."

Beelzy's smile comes to a total halt, and he sputters in protest, but I continue. "Actually, I've noticed something fundamental about demons that makes them different from humans. Demons and humans both believe in the power of the individual, but humans alone understand that only by cooperating and pooling their resources can they become an invincible fighting force. Demons are solitary creatures who only rely on one another at the minimal level. Perhaps if you had worked together more, you might have stopped the humans from crushing you in the beginning."

I smile sweetly at him. "Perhaps you could have saved those friends of yours from being counted among the corpses in this labyrinth."

Beelzebub and I stare at each other for several long moments, as the sound of Lora smacking her sword against the wall rings off in the distance.

"I hope that outburst pleased you, human."

"It pleased me just fine, Beelzy."

Before he can say anything, there's a faint rumbling in the distance, as if a bomb went off. The walls in the chasm shake slightly and dust falls from the unseen tops of the walls above. A massive chunk of the wall comes falling down several miles away, smashing into the ground with a resounding crash.

Beelzebub licks his lips as he cocks his head. "Humans. Another bombing run, by the sound of it. And... they are drawing closer."

Blaarjiim smiles in my head. "Well then, seems you might be getting field testing soon, boy."

I frown. How could the humans know we were here? Coincidence? Or perhaps something else?

I glance over at the robotic corpses and the shell of a spaceship sunk into the earth. What if the humans left behind detection devices? That's what I would do, and it's not like the demons understand technology very well.

Beelzebub turns back to me. "You should speak 'disguise' and make yourself and that girl look like demons. The only thing humans hate more than demons are humans who turn traitor and work alongside my kind."

"Humans have fought alongside demons? I find that hard to believe."

Beelzebub shakes his head and smiles wryly as he jams his hands into his suit's pockets. "There have been a few. They paid the price for trying to avert the war. And others... gave up on their ideals."

His words feel like they have extra meaning to them, but I decide not to pry. "Whatever. I'll do it. Disguise. Disguise. "

I aim my mind at Lora and myself, wondering if this really is a good idea. Lora doesn't even seem to notice her skin turn red as she swings at the wall, and her back is turned to me so she doesn't see me either. In fact, she's quite absorbed in the whole training thing, and she's breathing hard, with sweat pouring down the back of her neck. She really gives it her all. Very admirable.

I teleport over to her. "Lora. Stop training for a moment." I quickly summon a bottle and fill it with ice water and hand it to her. "You're doing great so far. Take a quick breather and then keep at it. Drink water and let me know if you need anything."

She smiles at me, and for once it's a genuine feeling. She really is quite happy about how things are, despite how coldly I've been treating her.

Her red skin and demonic looking body doesn't contrast well with the crusader-style armor, making her look like some kind of imposter, but she won't be fighting if the humans show up, anyway. I'll keep her out of the way. She'll just slow me down as she is now.

But... in the future... hmm.

I walk back over to Beelzebub. " Telekinesis. Telepathy. "

I quickly use my new abilities, which I somehow know exactly how to use, and scan Beelzebub's brain. For some reason, the images I receive are very obscured and abstract, almost as if he's thinking in a different language than I am.

Beelzebub stiffens and glares at me. "Get out of my head, human. I'm not playing around any longer."

His eyes are far angrier than they ever were before, so I quickly retreat. This time I sense real bloodlust. "My apologies. I just wanted to test my telepathy to ensure it worked."

His right hand slowly pulls out of his pocket and he balls it up into a fist and shakes it at me. "Your slave is over there. I'd advise you use your abilities on a more appropriate test subject in the future. Am I clear enough?" He leans in closer and hisses at me, so I take a few defensive steps back.

"Yeah, sorry. My bad, alright?"

He glares violently for a few moments longer before pulling away and turning his back to me.

Out of curiosity, I decide to follow his advice and aim my mind over at Lora, now sitting down for her break and slowly drinking the water I gave her. I wonder what she thinks about?

A moment later, I get my answer.

Pain. Hatred. Inescapable fear. Never-ending torture.

Mama! No!

A little girl reaches out her hand as the red-skinned monster tears the older woman limb from limb, greedily devouring her entrails.

Quiet, filthy human! You're too young! Haven't even been bred yet! Learn your place!

A hand flies forward. The little girl falls backward as the hand smashes across her face. A tooth falls out and rolls along the ground and the child cries out in sadness.

But this is not Lora. I am looking through Lora's eyes. I stand silently with my head bowed and flinch every time the demon makes another loud slurping noise. After he's finished, the monster stands up and bellows at me.

Chattel! Clean this mess up, or you're next!

I quickly fall to the ground and scoop up the body parts that are left over, still oozing blood and other unthinkable things. I do not flinch, as I have done this a thousand times. I do not process it anymore. It's normal, it's just a part of life. In time, the little girl will grow used to it as I did when my mother was devoured.

And I will be devoured someday, too. There is no hope of leaving this place alive.

My mind escapes Lora's with a rush and I suddenly realize there is a cold sweat pouring down my back. What the fuck? That was unreal. I knew demons were probably bad, but this is...

I shoot a glance at Beelzebub, who is staring off into the distance, ignoring me. Has he done these vile things? Am I making the right decision?

Beelzebub whispers, so quietly I can barely hear him. "They're here."

I blink back tears, wondering in passing where they came from. The vision, perhaps? A moment later I discard the thoughts as I catch sight of several humans marching forward across the way, headed right towards us.

Instinctively, even though I don't really want to, my telepathy jumps over to them and scans their mind.

Target spotted. Two bogeys. No, three. Two individuals unknown. Third is potentially one of the demon emperors. Advise on course of action.

I stare silently at the humans for a few moments and take them in. They're wearing some sort of white full-body suit, a lightweight armor made of an unknown material, with a golden emblem of a winged bird of prey across the chest. They have helmets with a full visor across the face, something like a one-way mirror that they can see through but I can't.

"Prepare yourself, boy. This is your true test. The Golden Commandos are the most dangerous force we could have encountered." Blaarjiim helpfully reassures me in my mind. "The odds are a hundred to one that you'll die here."

"Don't ever tell me the odds."

Part 39ob:

The humans up ahead, or 'Golden Commandos', as Beelzebub calls them, chatter silently to each other inside their helmets. I wouldn't know what they were saying at all, if it weren't for my telepathy.

I quickly realize telepathy is a two-way street. I send a thought to Beelzebub. Are you able to hear my words?

He doesn't show any annoyance at my mental communication, since he only hates it when I read his mind. He pulls his hands from his pockets and makes a small motion, then I hear his own voice inside my head. Yes. Using telepathy to prevent giving out our battle plans, then? Smart.

It's obvious. The humans are speaking inside those helmets, but we can't hear them. This is just smoothing out the playing field.

Our mental communications are interrupted when a human steps forward, pushing past the scouts in the frontline. While wearing a tactical battle suit like the others, this one appears to be some sort of tactical unit, or a commander, given three stars on his shoulder pad.

His faceplate slides open a moment later and- oh, I was wrong. It's a woman. A blonde lady with a distinctive military aura about her. Her curly hair spills out of the helmet, and she glares at us. "I am Amy Gutierrez, Corporal of the 3rd Golden Commando Corps. With my authority as a military commander, I'm placing the three of you under arrest. Resist, and we will cut you down without mercy. Concede, and we will offer you a fair trial."

I start to speak, but Beelzebub cuts me off. "Hah! Fair trial! I've seen what your kind do to demons in your trials! I believe the term humans use is 'kangaroo court'! What reason do you have to arrest us? We're merely standing here!"

The woman bites her lip savagely before responding. "You're demons. That's all the reason I need."

"As I expected from a filthy human. Have you no shame? Have you no compassion? Demons are no threat to you, yet you continue to hound us! You-"

She interrupts him harshly. "Quiet down, monster! I don't want to hear your pathetic wailing! Either give up or die. I am giving you the mercy of choosing your fate."

Beelzebub sends a mental message to me. You have telekinesis now, correct? I recommend you start figuring out how to use it.

Then he speaks again. "The only choice you're giving me is a choice between a swift or a slow death. Luckily, the reign of humanity is soon to come to an end. The rise of the demons is about to begin. And you, nasty female, will be the first to bear witness to it."

She raises an eyebrow questioningly before her helmet snaps shut, a few strands of her hair getting caught in the process, though she ignores them. I flinch as I hear her thoughts echo her words inside the helmet. Open fire!

As if on cue, I grab Beelzebub's arm, teleport over to Lora, grab her shoulder with my other hand, and teleport us to a corner of the room behind some debris. This happens in the span of just a few seconds, right as a hail of energy blasts shoot for a few moments at where we were just standing, before stopping, as if the humans are suddenly confused about where we vanished to.

How do I take them out?

I send the question over to Beelzebub, and he smiles at me, a most cunning expression. I don't like the look it gives him. You're the one who is supposed to prove himself. You figure it out. I will warn you however that those energy beams will shred even myself to pieces, and you will fare even worse than I. Take care not to be struck down. The humans are light on mercy, and quick to sever limbs.

I feel a shift in the humans' minds as a large hovering vehicle pulls out of the far wall's entryway and into the central mossy area.

Beelzebub, for once, offers help out of the blue. That is a specialized field scanner. Humans use them to hunt shadow-walkers and beings similar to Yama, but it will be quite adept at rooting out our position. You haven't much time before it sweeps the area.

Great. I love being rushed. I flick a glance over to where the red-suited commander woman was, but she isn't there anymore. I don't see her. There's still the spaceship crashed in the center of this chasm, so anyone could be on the opposite side and I wouldn't be able to see them. How troublesome. The moss blends in after a while, making distance gauging difficult past a certain point. If only I could sneak over there with the humans seeing me.

Yeah... without them seeing me... maybe if I could turn invisible...

Oh. That's a good idea. I speak the word out loud, but we're far enough away from the group from earlier that they haven't a chance of hearing me. " Invisibility. "

Like something out of a horror film, I smile to myself as my hands suddenly vanish, along with the rest of myself. Beelzebub's smile grows even wider. That human vehicle will still be able to detect you with its magic scanners, but I applaud the ingenuity. What now?

Blaarjiim pipes up for once, offering his own thoughts into my mind. "You'd best be careful. Those human suits are deceptively sturdy. They're made of a material far harder than diamonds, so whatever plan you have to kill them, brute force won't do it."

I squeeze his orb a little tighter in my grip. Good to know. I need to get myself one of those suits then. I'm not very strong as of now.

To say the least. I have no protection. Lora's armor is probably only perfunctorily better than wearing no armor at all, especially against whatever those blasters are shooting.

I decide to wing it a little bit, and teleport over to the very top of the spaceship.

When I arrive there, I'm quite surprised by the size of the group below me. Several hundred of the humans are wearing those thin suits, and they are all on edge, looking all around, and even up in the air at me. I flinch for a second, before realizing they can't see me.

Wait, can they? I only made myself invisible. Even before I went in the cryopod and everything became like Star Trek with technology, heat scanners were a thing. What about sonar? Am I detectable with other means? Ultraviolet?

An idea springs to mind. I won't know if it works until it's too late but better safe than sorry. Quietly, I whisper under my breath. " Invincible. "

I suddenly feel dull and have to blink my eyes as a strange feeling of disorientation passes over me. Swooning for a moment, I use my free hand to stead myself, only to realize when I place it on the ship underneath me, I can't feel anything. My sense of touch is gone. Even my eyes feel weird, and my mouth.

As I'm reeling, I yank my eyes open forcefully when I spot several of the commandos grouping up and looking in the direction of the rubble I hid Beelzebub and Lora behind. They've been found. Not much time left.

There are several hundred commandos. I could kill them with wordsmithing, but I don't think I can do it faster than one at a time, and speaking out loud has a chance to give my position away early. I need something faster.

Blaarjiim speaks into my mind as if reading my thoughts. "Yes, good. You're onto something now. Keep thinking. Your girlfriend hasn't got much time now."

Shut the fuck up. If she dies, it's because she was too weak. I'll do what I can, but I'm not a babysitter.

No, instead I need to think. I can apply effects to myself and make them permanent, or remove them. I just need to think in terms of efficiency.

The humans start to move quickly towards Beelzebub and Lora, making chopping motions with their hands as they fan out to surround.

What to do... what to do...Well, for starters, I can at least hassle them.

Expending a small amount of energy, I send out all of my telekinesis at once, yanking every single commando at once backward. In fact, I accidentally use way more power than intended, and fling them backward at comical speeds, as if they were hit by a freight train going 300 miles an hour.

Several of them smash into the spaceship underneath me, other go flying all the way back into the far walls. Their thoughts, however, remain remarkably calm.

Telekinetic surge detected. We've located the origin point.

All at once, several heads swivel up to the spot where I'm standing in unison.

The bogey is using a rudimentary cloaking field. Move to intercept.

Shit. As I thought. They can see me. I'll test whether they can actually hurt me if it comes down to it, but I'm still not entirely confident in my abilities yet.

I teleport away a moment later but arrive very close to another human. The commando's head immediately spins to look at me, and I shove him away with a telekinetic blast, sending him tumbling end over end. Based on the reactions of the commandos from before, it seems they can see me, now that they know I'm invisible.

"Seems the game is over, Jason. That is, unless you can think of something else."

Blaarjiim almost seems to be taunting me. Too bad for him, I'm not even close to out of options. If humans do know about Wordsmithing, I'll be at a disadvantage if they hear me using it. Right now I might have the element of surprise on my side, but I should make sure they can't hear me wordsmithing...

A helmet and a suit like theirs would do, but I don't want to be impaired just yet with a foreign armor, especially if it slows me down even slightly. I have a better idea.

" Muffle. "

I aim the word at myself and then speak again, and this time I can't even hear myself speak. However, I can tell my words are still being spoken. My wordsmithing will continue to work.

I send a telepathic message to Blaarjiim. Do these humans have spiritual energy, like me?

He nods an affirmation. "They do. However, due to your... situation... your spiritual levels are an ocean compared to their puddles. Why? What are you thinking?"

Two pronged attack. I gain, and they lose. Let's test it out.

I speak a word, and it vanishes silently into the ether. " Draining. "

Just in the nick of time too. The commando I sent flying brought reinforcements, and they're surrounding me. Teleporting away would be easy, but this isn't about escape. This is about winning. These fuckers are durable as sin, but they still have fleshy bodies inside those suits...

The group levels their weapons at my invisible form, right as I send out a wave of energy. This time, I target their bodies, and my draining effect leaps into them, sucking the energy right from their bodies and siphoning it back to me. I feel a piddling amount of energy fill me, but the effect on the commandos is instant. They slump backward and fall to the ground, comatose. It seems I drained them to a ridiculous point, where their brains ceased functioning properly and they entered a deep sleep.

Even as I have that thought, a smaller group behind the one I just took down steps backward in alarm. I hear their thoughts speak up again. S-Class threat. Confirmed abilities are teleportation, invisibility, telekinesis, and some sort of psychic attack. Permission to enable Containment Protocol?

A moment later, an unheard reply comes through and the group quickly nods in unison.

What the fuck is a containment protocol?

Even as I ask the question, I feel a weird vibration in the air as the edges of their suits glow and change to a yellow color.

"You'd better leave. Now." Blaarjiim's voice suddenly raises in alarm. "They're getting serious now. They just surrounded their bodies with anti-energy."

Even as I feel my telepathic link to the commandos sever, I quickly grasp what he means. I try to send another wave of draining at them, but the effort is immediately futile. It bounces off of an unseen barrier, vanishing into the nether.

Things are looking better every minute! And here I was worried I wouldn't get a fun fight.

I teleport several miles away to the other distant side of the chasm and arrive back where Beelzebub and Lora are sitting. Humans are already here and about to surround them.

Beelzebub, would you be so kind as to take my slave away from here? I'd like a bit of privacy.

He immediately whips his head around, looking for me, but realizes it's futile as I'm invisible. "I have no such obligation to protect chattel."

Do it or I'll have Yama spank you when we get back.

He doesn't get mad but instead smiles another of his signature creepy grins. "You'll pay for that remark. Fine, I'll humor you. Don't disappoint me, now."

Without waiting for a reply, he flips up and over my invisible form in one smooth motion, displaying a grace I should have expected from him, and lands right beside Lora. She instantly cowers when she realizes he's there.

"Oh, bugger off. You're under Jason's protection, wench. I'm here to save your filthy life." He rolls his eyes dramatically before making a motion with his hands. A moment later, both of them vanish.

And not a moment too soon, as I spot a human walking around the other side of the rubble in front of me. He quickly aims his gun and fires, but I teleport to the side and hit him with a telekinetic blast. The blast fizzles though, doing nothing to him.

Damn. Here I thought it would still send him flying since it was indirect. Well, this will, in any case. I instead aim my mind at a ten-foot boulder to my side and lift it out of the ground, sending it at him with a rush. It smashes into him from behind, and the poor soul is crushed instantly.

Yeah, jackass. Negate that.

And right after I think that thought, the boulder shifts again, and the commando crawls out from it, unhurt. Do those suits give them super strength as well? Jesus, what am I up against?

I teleport to the center of the mossy chasm and speak another word. " Flight. "

This time, I feel my energy begin to drop at a steady pace. Simply having this spell active drains my energy. Ignoring that thought, I fly up into the air- and immediately my energy starts to drop at an alarming rate. This ability drains a ridiculous amount of power!

Quickly I scan the area below me. Hundreds of humans are already tracking my position, invisibility be damned, and only a few dozen were rendered comatose. How do I kill them? I may have already squandered a ridiculous number of options now that they've activated their abilities... but surely those suits have some weakness.

A thought rapidly comes to mind. What happens when an unstoppable force meets an immovable object? Perhaps I shouldn't be focusing on weakening them, but enhancing myself.

I deactivate my flying ability and teleport again to another location in the arena, and by now I can tell the commandos are getting annoyed with my constant teleporting. This place is far too big for them to effectively blanket the area too, so there's always empty spots for me to go to.

The first thing to do is retake my invisibility. I don't know how they're seeing me, but body heat is as likely a source as any. " Reptile. Phasing. "

Now my body will become reptilian, allowing my blood to cool down. For some reason, this idea comes to my mind naturally, as if I've thought of it before. I shake my head quickly and scatter those thoughts away. Everyone experiences déjà vu.

That rock managed to knock out the commando before. Or at least it knocked him down. What does this mean? It means they aren't invincible. They can take a lot of damage, and maybe I can't kill them now, but I can immobilize them.

I aim my mind at a commando several hundred feet away. He's looking around for me, so maybe my reptilian ploy worked. "Rock."

A massive rock appears in the air above him and falls down, crushing him into the ground instantly. However, a few moments later, I notice the rock starting to shift slightly. As I thought the suits must be enhancing the wearer's strengths too.

"Heavy. Heavy. Heavy. Heavy." I speak the words rapidly, aiming my mind at the rock. Sure enough, the rock finally stops moving and the commando is trapped underneath. I'm not sure if he's been crushed to death, or is just immobilized, but this is working fine for what I need.

Still, making hundreds of big boulders is impractical. I need another solution.

Those suits. What powers them? No way these high-tech suits aren't running off electricity or something, right? Maybe they use some crazy plutonium stuff, but I can't know that without getting to see how they work. My best guess is that if they're really high-tech, something's gotta give when it comes to electronics. And that gives me another idea.

"Lightning."

I aim my mind at my own body, imagining the word as an abstract concept. The ability to fling bolts of lightning.

I'd be shocked if this works. Even if it doesn't, it's worth a shot.

"Agility. Agility."

My mind is racing with ideas now. There are so many ways I can tackle this situation.

I run towards the boulder and jump at it, my hand racing forwards to propel me over the rock like an Olympic gymnast, making me triple front flip and land on my feet as if I'd done it a million times before. I haven't, though. I've always considered myself more of a slacker, and definitely not athletic. This is so badass.

Commandos are already moving to my position, though they don't seem to see me once again. I aim my hand at them and imagine an electrical sensation pulsing through my body. A moment later, a colossal blast of energy flies from my body and smashes into one of the commandos nearest to me. Unlike the telekinesis earlier, this attack hits, knocking the commando backward several feet. When he lands, he doesn't move for several seconds as pulses of electricity dance over his suit. Finally, some sort of internal dampener activates and a quick bzzt sounds off, allowing him to stand up once again.

Troublesome. I thought that would work.

I need more information. These commandos are way beyond what I was prepared for... but they can be beaten. I just need to learn their weaknesses.

I teleport away, leaving the humans to their own business. Using my telepathy, I scan the area around me until I locate a familiar mental feeling, one that can only belong to Lora. I arrive next to her and breathe a sigh of relief as I speak another word. "Normalize."

The muffled feeling vanishes, as does the invisibility, and Lora squeaks when I appear right next to her out of nowhere. Only when she stares at me for several seconds do I realize I might have forgotten something. I reach up to scratch my head and spot my hand, now covered in scales. Ah, the reptilian thing. Forgot to dispel that too.

We're in a small room now, at least a mile from the chasm itself. Beelzebub knows how to pick a safe spot, though the room is rather barebones, just made of earthen walls covered in dirt and grime and no furniture or decorations to speak of. It's like the worst prison I could have thought of if I was designing one.

I take care of that, and Beelzebub chuckles to himself. "Couldn't do it, could you? Golden Commandos are unstoppable once they activate those anti-energy fields of theirs."

"Unstoppable? Then why don't they just open with those?"

Beelzebub scratches his chin. "I wonder that myself, sometimes. Maybe it's for sport. They know demons are no threat anymore, so they only use the suits true power for dangerous situations. Maybe there's a downside. All that matters is... once they activate those anti-energy fields... even I can't hurt them."

"Hm." I grunt a little bit and glance at Lora. She seems a little flustered, but otherwise unaffected by the whole situation. Then again, she wasn't the one fighting. I'll have to change that, given time. "Let's get out of here. I need some solitary training. This has taught me... a lot."

Blaarjiim is somber about the whole thing. "Nothing like live combat to make you realize what you're up against."

"Yeah. I saw how the humans treated you as a monster. Now I see that it goes both ways."

Beelzebub nods sagely. "We are merely defending ourselves from unwanted invaders. Soon you will come to see it from our point of view."

Despite my words, I still feel uneasy. There was the mental vision I saw when I looked into Lora's mind, plus what I've seen of demons myself. Maybe humans have the right idea, exterminating the demons. Then again, who started this war first? It's difficult to distinguish the true villain when both sides are hypocritical. One cannot simply hold someone else to a higher standard while ignoring that standard themselves.

But really, do I care? If the demons are evil, or the humans, I should be looking out for myself, either way. The demons just want to use me, and I'm sure the humans would love to get their hands on me as well.

Fuck both of them, honestly.

"Let's get out of here, Beelzy."

He grimaces. "I still owe you for that remark you made earlier. Truly, you test my patience."

Hehe. Beelzy's all bark and no bite. The demons must have been desperate to make this guy a demon emperor.

I wonder how highly ranked a demon emperor is, anyway? Sounds similar to a demon king. I'll have to ask when I get back.

Beelzebub makes a motion with his hands, and a moment later I feel a familiar sensation as my mind and body are sucked from this place to a new destination.

Part 391b: Limit Breaker

Lice. Lora has lice. The most disgusting thing that I could imagine, and it infests her head. I found this out only a few minutes ago when one of the little vermin was crawling on my shirt. Upon a quick inspection, I discovered the culprit was the woman walking beside me, helping me map out the hallways in Yama's home.

Thanks to my newfound understanding of how this place is laid out, I quickly walk Lora along until we arrive at the bath-house I've used twice since I appeared in the Labyrinth a couple of days ago. Hellga just happens to walk by as we show up, and for once, I'm delighted to see her disgusting face.

"Hello, human. What can I get ya?"

Her greeting is about as pleasant as I expected. "Lora has head lice. That won't do. I want you to scrub her as clean as possible and make sure they're gone."

Hellga stares at me for several long seconds, her mouth hanging half open. "Human, there are many things this old broad is willing to do... that is not one of them. Do it yourself."

"No, you will do it. Otherwise, I'll have a little chat with Yama, see what he has to say."

The old demoness is incredulous, but after a few seconds, she groans madly and grabs Lora by the wrist, pulling her away from me. "Only because you asked so politely."

"Gracias."

I watch as the two of them enter, before creating a seat and plunking down outside the bath-house.

Things have been quiet for the last two days. After my encounter with the Golden Commandos, I've been experimenting a bit with my abilities. As it turns out, Invulnerability and Invincibility are effectively the same, though they both have the downside of making me lose my sense of touch. I can't regain it either, not even by wordsmithing "Touch" or anything similar.

Wordsmithing isn't omnipotent, as it costs energy. I was able to drain a decent cluster of commandos of their energy, but the amount was piddling at best. Yama tells me that human energy is hardly existent, compared to demons and angels.

Angels... so even they exist? Yama and the other demons are being deliberately tight-lipped about them. How many are there? What abilities do they have? How strong are they compared to demons? Are demons and angels mortal enemies, like in the Bible and other works of myth?

What if I could drain an angel of its energy? How much could I gain? Hell, forget Angels for a second... what about a demon? They're everywhere around me. Would anyone miss Hellga if she were to go missing? She's probably not very strong, though. Yama would probably give me a lot, as well as Beelzebub and Bael.

But I can't afford to take on the demons. Assuming I did manage to kill Yama and absorb his energy, there's no guarantee I'll get a lot of it. Merely using telepathy on Beelzebub made him furious, so I dare not try using other magic on the other demons, even if just to 'examine' them. I could probably get a good feel for their power if I did that, but I run the risk of pissing them off.

Yeah. Best not to burn what bridges I've made. The demons are a useful ally, for now. What I need is to find a way to increase my power levels. Teleporting will eventually drain me, to say nothing of all my other abilities.

Absentmindedly, I decide to play around with my powers again. I aim my mind at a patch of the floor a dozen feet away. "Sticks. Oil. Fire."

A moment later, there's a warm, cozy little fire burning and I lean forward to warm my hands. It's not exactly cold down here, but it's not hot either. I haven't felt the wind on my face since I woke up in the cryopod, and I rather miss it.

"Extinguish."

The flames vanish instantly, and only half-charred twigs are left behind.

My abilities have a secondary limit. On top of the maximum energy I can hold, I cannot create anything complex if I can't picture exactly how it works. For some reason, creating oil, which has an unknown atomic structure, is doable, but imagining the inner workings of a clock or a gun is impossible for me.

Why the distinction? What separates the two of them? Is it merely enough to know that oil is greasy and flammable? What if I'm not actually creating oil, but just a "greasy flammable black liquid"? If they're the same, does it matter?

I chuckle to myself as another thought enters my mind. "Lightsaber."

Nothing happens. This is my third limitation. It has to be a single word in order for the magic to work. In the case of this word, I'm unsure if it's because it's two words, or because lightsabers don't exist in reality. Then again, I don't know what a lightsaber's innards would look like, so that could be an issue too. After all, some double words will work fine.

"Longsword."

A metal weapon shimmers before me for a split second before falling and clanging on the ground. I shoot a look around the corner at the women in the bathhouse, but I can't see either of them. They must be on the far end. I can't hear them, so they likely can't hear me.

I reach down and pick up the sword. To my annoyance, it wobbles quite a bit towards the far end of the blade, as if the metal is made of something akin to tinfoil, but perhaps a bit stronger. What is this? Iron? Steel? It can't be. Swords are supposed to be stiff and have little to no flex.

At least, I think so. I never studied anything about swords when I was in college.

Hm. What if... " Reinforce. "

The sword continues to wobble when I shake it, and I frown in response. " Reinforce. Reinforce. Reinforce. "

Nothing. The flex is still there. A thought occurs to me though, and I stand up and put a barrier in every direction to muffle the sounds around me. Taking aim at the chair I made, I swing at it with the sword, and the sword jams into the wood, getting stuck. After a moment of grunting, I pull it back out and swing again. Ten times, I swing the sword, and finally, I pull it back and look at it. The sword is not damaged in the slightest. Not even a scratch on its surface.

" Stiffen. "

Finally, the sword stops wobbling, and stands straight and true as I imagined it should.

It's as I thought. This is incredible. I can alter an object's properties, like the bed, bit by bit until it's made to my specifications, but I can also adjust its atomic composition. I reinforced the sword to the point where it isn't taking any damage, and now it doesn't wobble around either. Isn't it possible I could sharpen it dramatically? I made that boulder heavier in order to crush a commando...

Wait. Hold on a second.

Yama mentioned there are other wordsmiths. A whole army of them, even. I'm just one of many. Those commando suits were incredibly strong, durable to a ridiculous extent. The future might be advanced beyond anything I can imagine, but physics should still exist, right?

Perhaps those suits were reinforced with wordsmithing. If they were, and it certainly makes sense that they were... then I'm not as vulnerable as I thought.

Oho. I have an idea.

I glance up and down the hallways and back into the bathhouse to make sure nobody is around.

" Suit. "

In my mind, I picture a super thin green jumpsuit, one that covers me from head to toe. It's made of a practically weightless material, akin to nylon. The weakest form of protection I can think of. It probably wouldn't protect me from a bee sting.

The suit appears, and I alter it to fit myself, adding gloves, socks, and a mask that's super breathable. Quickly, I put it on after taking my clothes off.

I look stupid now. No doubt about it. If Lora and Hellga come around that corner now, they're going to get an eyeful of man-bulge. I'm sure they'll be thrilled, especially Hellga. Unfortunately for them, I plan to be done before then.

" Reinforce. Reinforce. "

I speak the words, over and over again. Soon, the suit hardens to a point where I can't move at all. I might have made the atoms too tight or something.

" Flexible. Flexible. "

I'm able to move again, and now I scratch at the material with my nails, only to find it feels like scraping a rock. I can't feel my finger at all.

Perfect.

This is exactly what I thought. I must be right. Those suits were reinforced artificially. Yama wasn't lying about other wordsmiths. The only options I can think of otherwise is that perhaps the armor is being manipulated at the atomic level, possibly by humanity's advancements in science... or by other forms of magic. I don't know if Yama can manipulate matter in the same way as me, but judging by Hellga's response to my wordsmithing, the answer would appear to be 'no.'

" Invisible. " Instead of aiming the word at myself, I point the energy at my new suit. It vanishes instantly, but I can still feel it around me.

I am surrounded by an invisible armor now. One that should render me, like those commandos, impervious to normal attacks.

Quickly, I put my regular clothes on, though I do notice that the armor dulls my sense of touch a bit. Still, it's nothing compared to when I use 'invincible.'

This is incredible. The next step is to enhance myself. Abilities are good and all... but can I upgrade my physical performance? My strength? Agility?

Hmm. That's a bad idea. I definitely want to try it, but if something goes wrong, I could burst a vein and die, or stress my heart to the point of cardiac arrest.

However... I could always test on someone else. In fact, I have just the perfect person for the job. I'm sure she'll be happy to help her master out.

I release the barriers and sit down in the chair for a while, and after ten minutes or so, I hear the sound of footsteps behind me. Finally, the two women step out of the bathhouse. Hellga, as always, looks like a walking pile of fecal matter, but... Lora is...

Well, she's beautiful. Her red hair is shiny now, not matted down with dirt and lord knows what else. I should have done this sooner. She's much easier on the eyes. As my eyes wander over her body, Lora glances down shyly to avert her eyes from mine.

Hellga, of course, is always on the offense. "Get her nice and cleaned up for you. No more lice. Happy? Can I go now?"

"Yeah. You can go. In fact, please do."

"Don't trip over yourself thanking me, human. I wouldn't want you to go to any trouble."

"I won't. Have no fear."

She rolls her eyes and shimmies away, grumbling to herself about ' Shitty fucking humans ' and soon, she's out of earshot. Good. Her voice is about as soft and pleasant as a wet fart on a hot summer's day.

Lora shuffles her feet slightly, and I suddenly remember what I was going to do. "Lora, now that you're cleaned up, we're going to do some training. Are there any wide open spaces in the area? Some room where I have lots of maneuverability?"

She finally looks at me and taps her chin for a moment before nodding slowly and pushing past me. She does that a lot. It'd sure be nice if she could just learn to say yes and no, and maybe even please and thank you. Probably a pipe dream.

We walk for over half an hour in total silence. This time, Lora doesn't turn right or left. She simply walks and walks until we arrive at what I can only presume is the end of Yama's property. Property? Maybe his domain? Whatever it is, the place he lives in is colossal.

And ugly. This demon is in serious need of an interior decorator. I'm getting so tired of black tiled walls. I've even taken to creating plants in my room, though they'll wither and die without sunlight.

Lora walks straight up to the wall and points, showing a vertical door handle bolted onto a wall with a seam running in the shape of a door. I reach forward and pull it open, right as some musky stale air blows into my face.

Ah... a warm breeze. It smells terrible, but soon the odor vanishes, and I'm surprised to see racks and stacks of armor, stuff that looks like it was made to fit men well over eight feet tall.

My eyes sweep the huge room, being several hundred feet deep and wide and thirty feet tall, it's the size of a college gymnasium and loaded with all sorts of implements. In fact, it reminds me of the room I saw with the girl encased in crystal.

I've heard mention of monsters in the labyrinth before. If I had to guess, the armor here is for orcs, or trolls maybe. I spot maces and clubs that are far too big and bulky for any common man to wield, along with black shields as tall as me.

The room itself is covered in the same dull tiling as everywhere else, yet I find myself wondering where the breeze comes from. There's no light anywhere inside, and it's mostly pitch black, but my eyes have grown far more accustomed to the darkness than I'd like to admit. I have a theory. Blaarjiim gave me his energy, so perhaps I gained other abilities from him as well. Seeing in the dark is likely to be one, though if there are others I have yet to see them.

Heh... maybe I should try messing with my vision later. So many possibilities, and so little time to test them out.

I step inside and grimace at the darkness. While I can see, Lora can't, and she seems nervous to enter the dark, ominous room.

" Light. " I speak, and an illumination appears everywhere in the room, coming from every surface, and yet nowhere at all. I make sure it's dim enough to not hurt my eyes, but I still wince when the lights first come on before my eyes finally adjust.

Lora follows along after me, glancing from this to that and even inside her knightly armor, she looks unintimidating as ever. I'm going to change that today.

"Lora. I've had you swinging your sword at walls for a while now. Do you think you're used to its weight yet?"

She nods.

"Good. Let's see if you've improved."

I aim my mind at an empty spot on the ground. " Dummy. "

A wooden dummy appears, and I alter its appearance a bit, so it's stuffed full of straw and has a superior sturdy base at the bottom. It shouldn't move around no matter how hard she hits it.

"Alright. I want you to swing your sword at the dummy. Try to hack it to pieces."

She gives me a confused look before raising the sword up in the air and swinging it straight down at the dummy. The sword somehow doesn't cut the dummy at all, instead deflecting off its left shoulder and falling down until it hits the ground. During the fall, Lora loses her grip on it and the sword falls uselessly to the side.

I shake my head slowly. "That was fucking pathetic. If I ever see something like that happen again... I'll pick a new slave. Now grab your sword, and try again."

She nods hurriedly and bends down to grab the sword, wobbling slightly as her clunky armor rubs together. She still hasn't developed the stamina for it.

When she stands, I take a few steps back and whisper under my breath. " Strength. "

Immediately, she shifts and her breathing becomes less labored, as if a weight was lifted from her shoulders. She lifts the sword up and the blade hums as it whistles through the air. Now she's holding it effortlessly. Indeed, she notices this and stares at the sword in confusion, wondering why it doesn't feel heavy anymore.

Without thinking about it, she steps forwards and swings down. This time the sword chops the dummy's left arm off effortlessly, but at the moment of impact, the sword splits in half and the pointy end flies directly at me.

Shit! Can't dodge!

The top half of the blade stabs my shirt and bounces off without any issues, landing on the ground at my feet. I quickly rub my chest and chuckle to myself. The armor worked. It was a solid idea. My T-shirt is ripped a little bit where the metal hit, but otherwise, I'm perfectly fine. Not even a bruise to be seen.

Lora, for her part, didn't even notice the goddamn sword breaking until a few seconds later, and she didn't see me nearly die. Once she does notice, I can almost see a question mark pop above her head as she examines the broken sword with a sad expression on her face.

"I boosted your strength. Don't worry about it. I'll make you another one. After this, I'm going to try raising your other abilities to see how you perform. I might even try boosting things that can't possibly be adjustable, but we will see."

Lora nods and sends an earnest look my way. Somehow... the expression on her face is different from usual. I almost feel a sort of confidence.

I create a new sword for her and then aim my mind at the dummy. " Repair. "

"Alright. Let's find out the actual limits of the human body."

* * *

Trade agreements. Dignitaries. A nonstop stream of pencil pushing. All I do is work these days. I'm stuck in an office doing the daily grind so that others can keep me out of the way. I know it, they know it... but alliances are tentative. Everything is held together by threads as thin as needles. All it will take is one sharp person with a laser torch at the right moment, and it all could come falling down.

Such is the life of a Supreme Commander.

My eyes glaze over as I read yet another one of the endless intelligence briefings. What do they want from me this time? Political support in the Raza sector. Why? Probably some royals on that planet think they're hot stuff, need to suppress a minor rebellion. That's the way it goes. Once humanity attained immortality, the threat of dying off was eliminated, meaning those in power stayed in power... forever.

Of course, that wouldn't stop eager young women and men from jockeying for position on their way up the corporate, political, and military ladders. Luckily, thanks to massive innovations in terraforming, we've been able to shove more and more people to different planets across the cosmos.

This means, sadly, that the pool of bickering whiners has merely spread itself around a far vaster, more confusing territory. Another fifty years and we're likely going to hit the two-thousandth planet that humans have infested. How am I supposed to manage all of these? Even the Supreme Commander of all humanity is far from infallible.

But then... they know that.

My thoughts are silenced as a soft tone rings throughout my office. It's quite a big space, with ample room to stretch as needed, and a nice big plexiglass window to see the city below me, but still... it's an office. I spend far too much time in here.

"Come in." The words loll out of my mouth, and I rest my chin on my fist while scrolling through the holopad's contents with my free hand.

The door opens, and to my surprise, it's not my assistant that enters but... someone else. A young blonde woman wearing a familiar red hypersuit. Her name evades me for a moment, but I whisper under my breath. "Identify."

Amy Gutierrez. Right. She's a corporal in my personal neutralization force. How could I have forgotten? At least she doesn't hear me whisper and thus isn't offended that I forgot.

"Supreme Commander Hiro. I'm sorry for bothering you in your office." She pauses awkwardly and bows, and I can't help but notice there's a feeling of awe as she looks at me. I get that a lot, as I try to keep myself distant from the lower echelons.

"Corporal Gutierrez. Delightful to see you again. What can I help you with?"

My words are polite but strained. I feel like this is going to take a lot of time away from my work, meaning I'll get home even later than usual. I could just cheat and slow down time, but that wouldn't be fair to the others, I suppose. They have to put in their eight hours, and so do I.

I gesture to the seat in front of my desk, but she shakes her head. "I won't be here to bother you for long. I merely wanted... I wished to hand-deliver a report on an operation I conducted yesterday."

"Fantastic. Let's see it then." I can't help but let boredom creep into my voice as she pulls up a hologram with a privacy filter active. Her retinal chips allow only her to see its contents, and even to a Supreme Commander, the contents are blurred. Our chief engineer is really talented at creating new military tech.

A moment later, she swipes across the hologram, and an indicator appears on my holopad. It's an old-fashioned clunker from a few thousand years ago, but I can't stand the thought of getting implants so it will have to do for me. Plus, I'm just used to it at this point. I got tired of switching and upgrading tech over and over again, so the last major epoch, I put my foot down and said no more.

I skim the contents, but none of it looks very interesting. "Alright. Thank you for this delivery. Is there... anything else?"

An odd look passes across her face as she shifts her feet and glances out the window for a moment. Something's making her uncomfortable, but it would be rude to read her mind to find out what.

"Well, ah, it's about the mission. I guess you haven't heard anything about it yet."

"No. Just what I read in this report just now. Why? Did something happen?"

Her look of concern is starting to agitate me. Spit it out! I haven't got all year! I want to yell at her, but that's not how we do things anymore. Politeness and civility are at their most extreme these days.

"I'll just say it. Forgive me, Supreme Commander... we had to use the Containment Protocol during this mission. It was an emergency, and I did everything I could to-"

She stops speaking as a dark expression clouds my face. I can hear the exact instant the words catch in her throat.

"You used the... the Containment Protocol? Under whose authority?"

She bows her head, unable to look me in the eyes. "M-my authority, sir. It was requested during the mission, and I gave permission."

"Oh." I swallow hard and slowly set the holopad down, before nudging it away from myself. "I see."

"I know you must be... terribly displeased..."

"To say the least."

"Right. But it was an emergency, Supreme Commander. We had to rush."

I feel an edge in my voice I haven't felt in years. "You know damn well what the orders are regarding the use of that procedure. Authority must come from Central Command, directly through me. Directly, Corporal. No exceptions. Not one, not ever. Unless an Archdemon appears and is about to exterminate every human in the galaxy in seconds, there is always time to obtain permission for the protocol, and I am to always be present when it is used. Have I not made this clear before now?"

"Yes... sir. You've made it... abundantly clear." Her head hangs ever lower, but puppy-dog eyes won't work on me, nor will a simple apology.

"Good. Now I want you to explain to me what situation was so dire, what monster so threatening, that you had to override a direct edict from the Supreme Commander himself. I want to know in exquisite detail what could have been such an omnipresent threat that my presence wasn't required, but the Containment Protocol was."

Finally, she raises her head up and looks sheepishly at the desk, though she can't quite meet my eyes. "An S-class demon appeared, sir. I included all the details in my report. Flip to the, err, the section C, sub-header Gamma."

Silently, I use my telekinesis to navigate through the menus on my holopad until I arrive where she spoke of. I read the entry out loud to her. "The subject was a demon of unknown origin. It possessed diverse abilities, including telekinesis, instant teleportation without using hand-signs, invisibility, thermal evasion, and a devastating psychic attack that put three dozen commandos into a coma instantly."

I raise my eyes up after reading a bit more. "That's it? Certainly, a powerful foe, one I can understand why you were having trouble with, but the lives of three-dozen commandos do not give you the right to override imperial authority, and certainly not my direct orders."

She stiffens slightly before looking into my eyes again. "I understand, Commander, but the lives of my men were in grave danger. I made a judgment call, and I will take full responsibility for the fallout."

"How convenient." I lick my lips and turn to stare out the window to contemplate. "If only it were that easy. Simply override my direct orders, then claim responsibility, and only one person gets tarred and feathered. That way people can abuse the system."

"I didn't mean it like that." A hint of frustration enters her voice. "We all know the Containment Protocol has no downsides. It doesn't consume any extra energy. It allows us to win against the demons all the time! Why can't we use it? Why can't we-"

"BECAUSE IT'S MY ORDERS! BECAUSE I SAID SO! THAT'S WHY!" I jump up, and the chair flies out from under me, banging on the hardwood floor below.

Amy shrinks back as a look of fear envelopes her face. A moment later I suddenly realize what just happened and I blink back rage before letting my shoulders slump a little bit. "Because... I said so. I have my reasons, Corporal. The top brass of the military wish for nothing more than to run in, guns blazing, and wipe out the demonic threat. The demons are a pittance... the demons are no threat to us. What are their numbers now, fifty thousand? Forty? The demons are the only thing preventing... preventing..."

My voice trails off as I realize she's shaking in fear slightly. "I'm sorry, Supreme Commander. I didn't mean to imply- I didn't mean to question your authority. You've done so much for us... I just thought that maybe..."

I raise a hand to cut her off. "Things are never so simple. I am disbanding your entire unit to make an example of those who disobey this policy. You will have your rank stripped, and will be removed from the United Military, effective immediately. There will be no other punishment."

"C-commander..." Her anger melts away as tears form. Her lip trembles softly. "I am sorry... I didn't mean for things to happen like this..."

"Few do. Go. I have work to return to, and now I have to schedule a meeting with the brass. This has quadrupled my work for the week."

Amy stares silently for a few long moments before bowing stiffly and marching towards the door.

"Wait, Gutierrez."

She halts and turns back to me.

"I... Thank you for your services. Despite this incident... you were exemplary in extinguishing the resistance on Goldesh III. I have not forgotten."

She doesn't respond but merely nods quickly before heading out the door.

It closes behind her with a faint hiss, and slowly I sink back into my chair, raising it up with my telekinesis.

My office is eerily silent afterward.

Slowly, I pull the holopad to myself and stare at it blankly, thinking about what led up to this moment.

A demon, S-class. These abilities are unheard of for demons to possess. Only a few demons had anything similar... and they're long since gone. Of the tens of thousands left, only a handful of demons could come close to this array of powers, and the chance of that happening is unlikely.

But if it was a demon that attacked the commandos... who was it?

I press a button on my holopad, and a video from Corporal Gutierrez's helmet camera plays back. Carefully, I examine the face of the demon caught on film.

Interesting. I'll have to investigate this myself.

Part 392b: Understanding

A pile of broken dummies sits crumpled in the corner, all of them hacked to pieces one by one. It's too much trouble for me to bother repairing them, so instead I've learned just to copy a functional one each time Lora destroys one. Takes less energy and time, too.

Sweat pours down every inch of her body. I deliberately lowered the temperature of the room so as not to overheat her, but any colder and I'll start shivering. She has long since tossed the armor to the side, now wearing only a loose fitting white undershirt and pants. I increased the size of her sword, as well as the weight, and now it's over five feet long and weighs two hundred pounds. It shouldn't even be wieldable by someone of her size. I'm about six foot tall myself, but she's only five foot, six inches.

Lora swings the awe-inspiring weapon down another time, cleaving the steel dummy in two effortlessly. Again, my automated arrow launcher fires a dozen bolts at her at once. She swings the sword with practice, smacking them out of the air, but fatigue is finally getting to her. One bolt wedges itself in between her two lowest ribs on her right side and she yelps in pain, dropping the sword and falling to the ground as she clutches the wooden bolt.

I teleport over to her in an instant, yanking the bolt out without hesitation. " Heal. "

She wheezes painfully as my magic does the trick, repairing the wound in less than a second. I place my hand on her shoulder to steady her posture, as this time it seems like she's finally at her limit.

Seventeen hours. Thanks to the word 'time', I was able to project a relativistic clock into my mind, telling me what time it was. It's like a super advanced version of human intuition, a perfectly tuned internal timer. Every time I think I may have wordsmithing figured out, more possibilities open up.

Lora looks exactly the same as she did when we first started, but now she's far stronger, faster, maybe even a little smarter. Perhaps not, but she's definitely honed some fighting instincts during this session.

I even took a chance and tried using energy to make her not fall asleep of exhaustion. However, I dare not use it too much. I feel as though it might have serious long-term issues, such as only artificially lengthening the amount of time she can stay awake.

Lora winces and clutches the place where the arrow impaled her, but it's fully healed up now. There isn't even a scar visible. Likely it's some form of phantom pain, a feeling that sticks around after a wound has healed.

"That's enough for now. I'm a little tired, and you're totally exhausted. I'll get you to your room, and we'll call it a day."

She smiles weakly and nods, but she's still holding the wound. I frown and stare at the spot, lifting her shirt up to get a better look. Nothing seems amiss, but perhaps I should take a closer look.

" Vision. "

I alter my eyesight, something I tried doing to pass the time while she trained. It seems that as I thought, as long as I mentally picture X-ray vision, or infrared vision, or anything else of the sort, I can adjust my sight to see what I want.

I stare at the wound carefully and raise an eyebrow with interest. There are dozens of wood splinters stuck under the surface, due to how I ripped out the arrow. No wonder she's still hurting.

" Remove. "

I aim my mind at all of the splinters at once, then heal the wound afterward. This time, Lora breathes a sigh of relief and sags forward, slumping against my chest. The pain must have been more than it looked, so at least I've taken a small burden off her.

I try to stand up, but as I do she clutches at my shirt for a moment before falling back and flopping on the floor. She's still breathing hard... perhaps a fever? I'm not a doctor, and I don't have a lot of experience so it could be anything.

The best thing I can do right now is getting her into bed. "Lora. Do you know where your room is?"

She blinks twice and shifts her head a little bit.

"I'll take that as a yes. I'm going to help you to your room. Just guide me as we go."

She barely even nods, and by now I see something is definitely wrong. Extending her limits might have put a toll on her body. " Normalize. "

No perceivable change happens, but her breaths do seem to come a little less ragged.

I aim my mind just outside this training room. " Gurney. "

A long, metal bed appears with wheels on the bottom. I alter it a few times to my specifications before using telekinesis to levitate Lora onto it, making sure to rest her on the padding so she won't fall off.

"You're lucky I am a compassionate master. You owe me even more after this."

I grumble under my breath, but start pushing her down the hall, closing the door behind me as I exit. This won't be the last time we come here. If she thinks this will end with just one day of training, she's wrong. Furthermore, I need to train myself as well. These tests have proven that I can increase my abilities, my body, even my vision can be augmented.

Speed, power, agility, reaction time, even making myself physically resistant or impervious to damage. Wordsmithing is total bullshit. It's like all the demons won the lottery, but only split twenty bucks among themselves, while I received a billion dollars. Why am I even worried about them? The only thing I need to do is ensure I've rooted out all the possibilities that my power gives me. Or at least most of them... there might never be a limit to what I can do.

Heh... it's funny. The real limitation of wordsmithing is how overwhelming the possibilities are. Humans often freeze when it comes time to make a critical decision. Usually, a timid or meek individual will only fight if it's the only option presented to him. Otherwise, when the time comes, he'll be paralyzed by indecision. This is why martial artists train for years to learn how to use their abilities because when the time comes, instinct will kick in and make their body move without being willed to do so.

"Do I turn right or left? Tell me where I have to go, Lora. Just point."

Lora shifts her right arm as we approach a corridor, so I turn right. Then she moves her left arm, so I turn left. This goes on for a long time as we navigate the maze of corridors.

As I push her along, using my telekinesis every so often to conserve my own energy, we pass room after room of slaves. The closer we are to the training room, the more sickly the slaves appear, but as we draw closer to my room and the central area, the better they look... relatively speaking. If I were a betting man, I'd wager that Yama or the demons that run his house put the weakest in the back, far away from the main room. Only the youngest, healthiest, most fit to serve slaves stay in the front rooms.

But why? Why even keep the weak slaves around? Yama has no interest in their welfare, and neither does Hellga. Then again... they can't be the only demons that live down here. I've seen perhaps three percent of this place. Other demons must live here, but where?

My mind flashes back, unbidden, to the memory I saw inside of Lora's mind. Demons devouring humans... perhaps back where the sick are kept, and as for the weak, the demons feast on them since they grow useless. Disgusting, if I have any say in it, but efficient. If one was to cull the weak, then demons have the right idea. This is all just guesswork on my part, but it makes sense. I haven't seen Yama or any other demon eating since I arrived, so their diet is mostly a mystery to me.

Soon, the corridors that blend together begin to look slightly familiar. I spot a scratch on a wall that reminds me of one I see around my room. It could be nothing, but even the smell around here is familiar. It's only once we walk past a doorway and I spot a mother and her daughter that I realize I recognize some of the slaves around here.

Hm. Come to think of it, a mother and her daughter? How could she have gotten pregnant? There isn't a man in sight anywhere. Perhaps demon and human biology are... compatible?

Unlikely. Unless that woman was captured recently and was pregnant already, or the demons seized her and her daughter at the same time, the likely scenario is she became pregnant down inside the labyrinth. I suppose even magic is a possibility since artificial fertilization seems beyond the demons' abilities to comprehend.

This place is a mystery. Things seriously don't add up.

Having rested for over a half hour while I pushed her around, Lora seems a little stronger than she was before. She points with a bit more vigor than expected, guiding me along the hallways until we arrive at one of the generic looking rooms that dot these corridors. Naturally, there is no door or covering to give the chamber any level of privacy. Three other girls are already inside resting, and I flinch at the condition of the room. Heat is leaking out of it, due to the small space and their body temperatures warming it up.

When I look into the room, all the slaves simultaneously turn in their beds to look at me, flinch, and quickly climb out of their bunk beds and bow their heads, as if waiting for orders. One of the girls can't even be twelve years old. Sad.

I help Lora off the gurney, and she leans against the doorway and breathes carefully.

"Will you be alright? Lora?"

She stares at me for several long seconds before lowering her eyes and nodding delicately.

I'm not really convinced. These quarters are squalid, to say the least. They can't be good for her to recuperate in.

I aim my mind at the gurney. " Disappear. " As I start to walk away, I feel something hold me back, and turn around to see Lora looking at me with an unfamiliar expression as she tugs at my shirt.

"Is there something you want?"

She lets go and blushes as if suddenly feeling self-conscious about her boldness.

I get it. I see clearly what is going on.

"This room won't do for my slave. Come with me. You will stay with me tonight."

I wrap one of her arms over my shoulder and start to pull her from the room, but she pulls away from me and stumbles back into the room, grabbing at something on the floor beneath one of the beds. I lean back into the room and watch silently as she pulls out a brass locket, cupping it in her hands before standing up and touching the chin of each other girl in the room.

A farewell, of some sort? The other girls continue to keep their heads bowed while I stand there, but one of them almost seems to nuzzle Lora's hand.

I don't know what their relationship is, but it appears to be a private moment. I step back and rest my back outside the room's wall, leaving the women to themselves. A half minute later, Lora steps out and brushes up against me, still clutching the locket in her hand.

What is the locket's story? It's not my business. If she wants me to know what it is, she will tell me when she learns to speak. I grab her arm and wrap it around my shoulder once again, as we head down the maze back towards my room.

She's just a slave. This is for her well-being, no other reason. It wouldn't do to have her get sick while I can't keep an eye on her.

That's all there is to it.

* * *

"Samuel. Lock the doors for me." I step out of my office, and the computerized voice responds from the ceiling.

"Have an enjoyable day, Supreme Commander! I hope to see you soon!"

"I hope not." I mutter under my breath and trudge down the hall, glad that my work is finally done for the day. Only a few more hours of daylight are left, and if I'm lucky it won't be raining when I leave.

The sterile white marbled walls loom in front of me as I walk down the hallway. Officers salute as I walk past, always stopping whatever they're doing to gaze at me in admiration.

Idiots. I hardly do anything important. I'm a figurehead at best.

"Commander." Yet another officer salutes and nods at me as I walk past.

"As you were."

I never return the salutes. I probably should, but it gets tiresome. These men and women always look up to me as if I'm a war hero. Hardly. Just let me head to the engineering bay, and I'll finally get to go home after this.

I step into the hover-shaft, and the male and female officer also riding it stiffen when they see me, saluting instinctively. "Supreme Commander! A pleasure!"

"Yeah. Same." I stifle a groan and salute them back, realizing it would be awkward if I didn't, given we'll be in this shaft for several minutes while it travels twenty miles down to the base of the building.

The woman's smile lessens a little bit. "Are you doing well, Commander Hiro? You look pale."

"I'm great. Just another day in the office. You know how it is."

"Hah! No kidding! You're an inspiration to us all! You never take a day off!" She beams a radiant smile at me and shoots a knowing glance at the other officer. Likely the two of them will get a real kick out of this, telling their comrades they spoke to the Supreme Commander in a hover-shaft. It's not like anyone will believe them. In a building with 250,000 personnel, the odds of running into me are astronomical.

I stare out the transparent walls of the shaft as we ride down the side of the command building. Other stratoscrapers are visible all around us, each filled with humans. How many live on this planet now? A trillion? Two trillion? We're going to need another planet soon to ship off half the population.

As high up as I am now, I see no greenery. Plants have no room to live, with how humanity has expanded aggressively. I suppose that's fine. We get our oxygen via advanced filtration nanobots in the atmosphere, and our food is created via a specialized array of reconditioning units. Energy is far from scarce, but as per an edict I passed, nothing shall go to waste.

We only get one Earth, after all. The homeworld is too precious for us to squander its resources.

The sky around us shifts colors as we enter the familiar blue hue that I've grown used to seeing. Staring up at the heavens, I spot the Moon in the sky. It's so much bigger when we're this high up... both halves of it are still floating in orbit, right where I put them. With my vision, enhanced via wordsmithing, I can just barely make out the colonies of Rigel IV on the closest point of Nixus, the brightest half of the Moon.

For some reason, the officers are interested in continuing the chat with me. The man clears his throat, perhaps a bit too seriously. "Err, Commander Hiro, I was just wondering, how close are we to eliminating the demons? I have a bet with my coworker."

"Too close." I mumble under my breath, and the man sends a look of confusion my way.

"I beg pardon?"

"Gambling is illegal during work hours, officer. Do you want to be written up?"

He turns white in the face. "Oh, ah, no. My apologies, Commander. I was just- that is..."

"I'll ignore it this once. Carry on." I continue to hold my posture up, noticing with a slight tinge of amusement that he is slumping meekly where he stands. Bad posture leads to misconduct, that's what I've learned over the years. I can tell immediately he's a slacker. Not like the woman next to him. She's perhaps a bit too enthusiastic, but I can tell by the medal on her shirt that she knows what work is.

It feels weird to leave the conversation like that, so I decide to make small talk with the woman. "The Badge of Courage. Bronze. How'd you get one of those?"

She blushes madly. "I served in the Assault Corps for a few centuries. It's nothing, really. Compared to my fellow officers, I'm not very distinguished."

"I see." I look up at the floor counter. Only a hundred floors to go. We'll be at the bottom in less than a quarter of a minute. A moment later, I do a quick probe of the surface of her mind, extracting the information regarding the incident. With her recalling the events in real time, it's quite simple. "It takes guts to pull a fellow soldier away from the frontlines under enemy fire. What's your name?"

"Elsa Parkson, Third Class. How do you know what I did to earn the badge?" She stares at me in awe.

"That's confidential. I'll see to it the brass bumps you up to silver." The door opens up, and I breathe a sigh of relief. The ride is over. "Have a nice day, Miss Parkson. You as well, Mister Andino."

As I walk off the elevator, I hear the man whisper to her. "How did he know my name? I never even mentioned it."

I smile for a moment, where they can't see it. I suppose it won't hurt to drum up the intrigue of the Supreme Commander just a little bit. It's all I can look forward to these days.

Continuing onward, I walk down the halls until I arrive at the engineering bay. The door opens automatically as the ceiling scanners read my biological imprints. Another male computer voice greets me. "Good afternoon, Supreme Commander! How may I assist you today?"

"I've got things under control. Thank you, Samuel."

I walk past personnel dressed in lab coats and military officers dressed in full uniform as they talk about this and that. Finally, I spot the woman I've been looking for. "Marie. I need to speak with you."

A sultry redhead turns around as I speak, pressing her thick glasses up her nose. "Jason! Do you need something?"

"I need to borrow you for a few minutes, privately. Something came up earlier."

She examines my expression for a moment. "Can it wait? I'm working on something myself."

"Now would be best."

She rolls her eyes, the only person among all my personnel who would disrespect me like that. I wouldn't have it any other way. "Fine. Gods. Let's go to my office."

I tilt my head towards the door on the other side of the room. "This'll take a few minutes at most. You'll be fine."

A minute later, she closes her office door behind us. "Samuel, privacy please."

The computer follows her orders silently, and she pulls out a cigarette, lighting it as she leans against her desk. After taking a long drag, she exhales and smiles. "Lord, that never gets tiresome. What do you want?"

I lick my lips, deciding to break the news in the simplest manner possible. "There is another wordsmith. The demons have him."

She doesn't even blink. "Oh. That sucks."

"That sucks? Marie, are you kidding me?! He could undo all my work. He already took down three dozen commandos in seconds. The troops were so panicked they overrode my orders and used the Containment Protocol! This is serious."

She sighs. "It's always serious with you. Look, I told you it was possible another wordsmith might show up someday. The powers of the Hero can appear in mysterious ways."

"Bullshit. That doesn't add up at all!" My voice strains and I rub my temple slowly. "Heroes don't just fall out of the ether, Marie."

"I didn't say that. I'm just saying... things can happen that you don't anticipate." Her voice trails off, and she stares at my chest as if looking through me at something unseen. "I wonder if..."

"You wonder what? Do you know something?"

She shakes her head slowly. "No, it's probably nothing. Just my overactive imagination."

I simmer slightly as she continues to stare at my chest with that same vacant expression. I can always rely on Marie to never hold anything back. Unlike the rest of my personnel, she treats me as if my authority doesn't matter, but that also means I can always get honesty out of her when others will lie to protect their dignity.

But this time is different. She's not telling me something. "Marie, what do you know? Do you have an idea who this demon is?"

She quickly meets my eyes again. "Demon? Why would you ever assume it was a demon?"

"The video files shows a demon. I assumed it was logical." I hold up my holopad and play the video. She stares at it skeptically.

"You and I both know it would be trivial to mask your identity with wordsmithing. If this really is a wordsmith, and you've shown no proof of that, then there's no reason to believe that's a demon."

"So it's not a demon, then? That's... something to go on."

She shakes her head quickly. "I'm not saying he isn't a demon, I'm just saying he isn't necessarily a demon. Could be human, could be demon. It could go either way. Magic is like that."

"Yeah. Magic is like that." I echo her words, feeling more anger building. "If he's a wordsmith, what should I do?"

She smirks. "You're the all-powerful Supreme Commander. Crush him with a boulder or something. Then he'll be out of your hair."

I can't help but curl my lip up. "Marie. That's disgusting. I could never do something like that."

"Right, right. You're a real pacifist, Jason." She stares at me for several long seconds, with an expression on her face I haven't seen in a long time. It looks almost like... distrust. "That's what I like about you... compared to the others."

"The others?"

"Nothing." She taps her cigarette into the ashtray. "Look, I'll work on something. We'll try and capture him non-lethally, alright? Will that suit your fancy?"

"Sure. Whatever. No killing. You know how I-"

"Yes. Jesus, I know. Calm your horses." She stands up and takes one last puff before smashing the cigarette into the tray. "God, I love these. Do you know how hard it is to get hold of cigarettes anymore? Had to make myself a specialized replicator just for the job, and the flavor tastes like shit. I've taken to growing tobacco in my apartment just so I can roll my own."

As she walks toward the door, I stare at her. "That's illegal."

"Piss off. What are you going to do, fire me? Throw me in jail? Get out of here so I can get back to work."

"Of course not." I walk past her out of her office. "I'm just letting you know."

"Thanks. What a friend." The door closes behind her, and Samuel locks it securely. "Seriously though, I'll solve this crisis. Happy?"

I grunt in response. "Yeah. Thanks. You're the best. I need to get home. Sarah's waiting for me."

"Tell her I said hi. Or don't. I don't really care." Marie walks away, making sure she has the last word as always.

What a woman.

I leave the building and send a notification to my assistant, Stephanie, telling her to arrange a meeting first thing in the morning with the district leaders of Earth. Maybe she'll go the extra mile and get the Local Cluster's leaders on the holographic channel. I'm probably asking too much.

As I step into the hall, even more people salute me and I press past them, barely acknowledging their presence. The tedium never ends.

I'd kill for a routine life, one without the burden of leading a galaxy.

Part 393b: Looming Shadows

What? Where did you go? Hero? Hero!

You can't just run away! What does 'rewind' do?! What does that even mean?!

Come back and face me! How dare you let them die and then flee for your life! Get your ass back here!

You're not a hero after all... you're just a coward!

Goddamn you! Goddamn you to hell!!

* * *

My eyes bolt open, and I jerk up, blinking rapidly. What was that? A dream? A nightmare? The details are already hazy.

Yeah. Just a nightmare. I don't even remember what it was about.

I glance to my side and stare at the woman sleeping beside me. She isn't wearing anything, of course, because that would defeat the point. She was too tired for us to do anything last night, as was I, but the warmth of a female beside me was quite welcome.

Even so, I can't help but stare at her back. Long since scarred-over marks are all across her spine and shoulders, likely from a whip or a lash of some sort. Without a voice, she cannot tell me what caused the marks, but I can manage an educated guess. My only real question is whether the demons did it for pain, or for pleasure.

Psychopaths. The demons have no sense of decency, even among themselves. I've come to realize this over the last several days. A demon will betray one of his own kind if he has something worthwhile to gain, but likewise, he holds no feelings for another species at all.

I aim my hand at her back. " Heal. "

Nothing happens. The scars stay exactly as they were. I wondered if that would be the case, and now my suspicions have been confirmed.

It seems unlikely that wordsmithing can't remove her scars, but perhaps it's better this way. If I remove the scars or the memories that caused them, Lora will lose something important that makes her, her.

Memories are important. They shape a person as he or she grows, reminding them of great successes and painful losses. An individual who is burned is more likely to be cautious around fire, just as a girl tortured by demons is sure to always be on her guard when around them.

I turn away from Lora and climb off my side of the bed. " Wear. "

My invisible armor appears over me, which fills me with a sense of security. I feel naked and defenseless without it now. My body is incredibly fragile, and all it would take is a stray bullet or a blow to the head to end me. But with this suit, a tank could shoot me at point blank range and I'd probably survive. Maybe.

I'd prefer not to test that out. I pull my pants up in one motion, hopping as I yank to get them on quickly. My shirt gets tossed on next, and I aim my mind at them both. " Clean. "

The best part about wordsmithing is all the tiny details. I don't have to waste time doing boring things, I can make them happen instantly.

My stomach growls and I consider going out to the dining room to eat, but that isn't really necessary anymore. " Pizza. Soda. Napkins. "

A piping hot meal pops out of the great beyond, appearing upon a table I shoved off to the side of the room. The soda is... I don't know what, exactly, but it tastes decent enough. The pizza has everything on it, and tastes better than any I've eaten before it. The meat is cooked to perfection, and the smell is like heaven.

As I chow down, I hear a rustling behind me. I turn back to see Lora sitting up in bed, pulling the covers over herself and staring at the food in confusion.

"Oh, this is pizza. Would you like some? It's very good."

She doesn't nod or shake her head, but instead stares at it silently. The smell probably woke her up, plus my loud lip-smacking. I can't help it, I just love the stuff. For some reason, I am careful to pick off the chunks of chicken spread all over, but that's beside the point.

" Plate. " A flat white ceramic dish appears in the air, landing silently in my hands. I pull two slices off and walk over, handing her the plate. "Here. Eat. You'll love it."

She takes the plate from me but continues to stare at it silently, as if unsure what to do with it.

"What's the matter? It's good food. Look, just eat it like this." I grab a slice from my own plate and bite into it, showing her how to do it.

She nods silently, and delicately picks it up, wincing as she realizes the pizza is hot. "Blow on it. You might burn yourself otherwise. Nothing like scalding hot cheese to ruin the roof of your mouth."

She puckers her lips, blows on it, then delicately nibbles at the very edge of it. The movement almost reminds me of a chipmunk. Immediately, she pulls back and chews silently. Only then does something happen that even surprises me. She starts to cry and quickly turns away to wipe at her eyes.

"Are you okay? Is it... too hot?" What is she crying about? It's just pizza, for god's sake.

A moment after she finishes drying her tears, she completely ignores me and stuffs the entire slice into her face. She devours it with such gusto that I lean back in my chair and stare in awe. The ruthless efficiency with which she envelopes the cheesy bread in her mouth is almost enviable.

After she does this, her eyes open wide and she finishes off the crust, and the second slice follows seconds after. Only once she is done does she stare at the plate with a sad, empty expression. She smacks her tongue around inside her mouth, as if to get a good feel for the organ.

"Do you uh... want more? I can make as much as you want."

As if lighting a fire inside her soul, the woman nods ferociously and smiles giddily as she holds the plate up. She opens her mouth as if to speak, but all that comes out is a guttural grunt.

I can't help but smile at her eagerness. "Fine, fine. Here, have more. What a pig."

She continues to gorge herself on the pizza, and finally something clicks in my mind. "I wonder what sort of food the slaves eat here usually. Have you ever eaten anything like this before?"

She pauses mid-bite to look at me with a sad expression before shaking her head.

That's unfortunate. Still, I don't know what all is going on down here. It's not like I care about the slaves or their lives or anything... some people are born with much, while others are born with little. That's just the way the world goes. People have to forge their own path with the odds they've been given. Sometimes people will even break free and go on to better things, improving the lives of their families.

But there's no such thing as equality. It can't exist. If the rich really cared and wanted equality to exist, they would have to give up their fortunes and live meager lives among the peasants. Some may actually do that, but most would not. And as long as even a plurality don't, there will always be a lower class with less than others around them.

But... then again, does it have to be that way? I have Wordsmithing, a power that can change the universe. What if I truly equalized things with my power? Would everyone be happy?

Of course not. The rich, now reduced to the same level as those they once sneered at, would curse my name for all eternity. I can't make everyone happy. For now, it's best to focus on me.

And this woman, as well. If her life is improved incidentally... well, that's just a bonus.

Finally, Lora reaches her limit and halts mid-bite before leaning forward and clutching her stomach. "Dumbass. If you eat too much, you're going to barf." I walk over and take the plate from her, and while she seems as if she might panic that I'm taking the food away, she finally bows her head and accepts my decision. "Relax. I can make more later when you're not about to die from overdosing on pepperoni."

I scratch my chin before tossing her clothes to her. "Put these on. We're going to walk off all that food and get back to training. Looks like you're feeling better." I grin evilly at her. "And if you thought I didn't notice you faking exhaustion yesterday, you're wrong. I'm going to work you twice as hard today. We're going to train together."

She doesn't seem sad about this, as if she's glad I was smart enough to figure it all out. She climbs out of bed and puts her clothes on, and I lean on my chin and watch as she does. "Call it curiosity, but I've been wondering about those scars on your back. Maybe someday when you get your squawk-box working, you can tell me who did that to you."

She blushes and turns her back away from me before pulling her shirt on.

"I'll make sure whoever did it pays dearly."

* * *

The door hisses open, and I adjust my uniform's collar as I step in. Immediately, the table with fifty seated at it shifts as everyone stands up at once. "All rise! The Supreme Commander has entered!"

I walk in and shake hands with a few of the people nearest my seat. "Mister Feldmann, Mister Ducat, Miss Suharto... a pleasure to see you again." I sit down quickly and only once I do does everyone else in the room follow suit. I quickly scan the faces present, using my acute mental reflexes to identify everyone all at once. There are many people present here. Not just the various district leaders of Earth, but the de facto president of the Martian colony, the Navy commander for this sector, and even a surprise guest.

A hologram comes online in one of the seats nearby, just five seats to my left, and everyone gasps audibly. I, however, manage to be courteous.

"Founder Unarin. I was not expecting a Volgrim representative, and certainly not the highest member of your... species. It is good to see you again."

He blinks slowly, almost as if he's bored, before he turns to look at me. His modulated voice isn't as crisp as it could be, and there is a several second delay from when his mouth moves and the sound appears, but even magical relays have their limits.

"Supreme Commander Hiro. I was called, and so I have come. Why are you surprised?"

I force a smile through. "I must have forgotten. No worries. I assume things are going smoothly in the Volgarius sector?"

He flicks his gaze around the table. "Yes. The Vesperian mining is moving forward as expected. We are contributing the required amount as per the treaty." He takes a slow breath. "The same cannot be said for the human colonies in Sector Lirus. We have been waiting for our portion of the Trifrancium that we were promised."

My smile weakens as I shoot a glare over at a woman on the other side of the table. Aleana Masri is the leader of that sector, and she's noteworthy, but only for how poor she is at keeping with a schedule. "My apologies, First Founder. I will make sure to rectify that situation by the end of the day."

She doesn't even look at me, instead opting to examine her nails. That worthless- no, it's fine. Unarin has been very good at cutting us some slack. As we are the top rulers among our species, I am certain he understands the difficulties of managing a vast empire, though his is far smaller than mine.

"I called this meeting today to discuss our official war policies. Specifically with regard to the demon infestation and how we can... be proactive."

General Feldmann, the person who sits immediately to my right, smiles wildly. "Are you finally authorizing a full invasion? We can wipe out all the demons by the end of the month. Just give me the order, Commander Hiro."

I lower my eyes slightly. "About that. Actually, I wanted to remind people of our official policy regarding the Containment Protocol. Is everyone familiar with it?"

A chorus of grumbling and whispering sounds off across the table. A man seven seats down to the right groans more loudly than the others. "Yes, Supreme Commander. We are never to use it without your explicit authorization. That is, despite all the wonderful benefits it has and how easy it is to combat demons."

His sarcastic tone draws slight nods from people to either side of him and across the table.

"Yes, that is correct. Thank you, General Zhao. I'm glad to hear you haven't forgotten. However, it came to my attention yesterday that during an operation in the labyrinth just this last week, one of the field commanders overrode my direct authority and used the Containment Protocol against a single demon. I assume everyone here read the cliff notes prior to this meeting?"

To my surprise, every person in the room shoots a look of confusion at one another. "Really? Not one of you read them?"

Zhao holds his holopad up slowly. "I have no such document on my reader."

Other people nod silently, and I curse my assistant under my breath. Stephanie always manages to get the work done, but she messes up the important details.

"It isn't imperative for you all to have read them, I suppose, but I'll explain in brief. Corporal Gutierrez, the leader of the Golden Commandos, overrode my direct orders and did this in order to suppress a single enemy combatant. As I have said before, no matter how powerful the enemy, I am always to be asked before--"

Another person in the room, perhaps bolder than most, interrupts me. "Gutierrez? Amy Gutierrez? Wasn't she instrumental in the suppression effort on one of our colonies?"

I stare the woman down who spoke. "Yes, she was. In the future, refrain from interrupting me when I am talking, General Makuba."

She quickly looks away meekly, and I stuff down a ripple of anger. It won't do to look weak here. If I let just any bureaucrat talk over me, it makes me sound like a weak and ineffectual leader. Considering the size of the empire, that simply won't do.

Before I can speak again, Zhao takes my moment of silence as the perfect time to speak. "She sounds like a fool, but what does this have to do with us? I got my hopes up thinking we would finally be given the order to crush the demons."

Another man speaks up. "Zhao, you know we can't do that. The demons are sentient creatures. If we kill them off, won't we be just as bad as they are?"

"Fine talk for a desk jockey! I've seen those creatures in action, Danis, and they are truly a fearsome enemy! What if they get wise and attack a fledgling colony? Do you want another disaster like the one on Alnaru? Ten million dead civilians! Do their lives mean nothing to you?"

"Of course the demons attacked back! We've been eradicating them for millions of years! You can't poke a dog with a stick and not expect it to bite back! Especially after you've poisoned its water and turned it feral!"

"A dog is a dog, Admiral Danis. The demons are feral by nature. Whether we left them alone or not, they would continue to seek our destruction! Have you forgotten how their leaders repeatedly turned down our generous offers for peace?"

"Generous?! What a joke! You wanted them to give up everything! They would be less than slaves, forced to mine and work for us! It's not peace if one side is in servitude to the other!"

Finally, I pound my fist on the table. "Goddamnit! Both of you, stop your bickering! I've heard enough!" The room grows silent as the two men snarl at each other silently before leaning back in their chairs.

It takes me several moments to steady my shaking hands, as well as my voice. "This is more important than you know. I am going to hunt down the demon that attacked my private guard. The monster is ranked S-class and is extremely dangerous. It managed to neutralize three dozen men and women all at the same time. However, I brought everyone here today to reiterate, yet again, that my order stands firm. I must always be petitioned before deploying the Containment Protocol."

Zhao, the smug bastard, leans forward again. "You still haven't told us why, Supreme Commander. Why can't we deploy such an effective weapon? We've had this in reserve for a million years, if not two or three, and yet you still won't allow us to deploy it. Does it have a downside? Is there some unknown cost that we haven't considered?"

I bite my lip for a moment before realizing how that might appear to others in the room.

I can't tell them the truth. If the demons are eliminated, the peace will fall apart. Only the threat of monsters tearing humans apart keeps them in line. Even then, many humans have forgotten the boogeyman. Demons are so effectively contained that they haven't a prayer of causing real havoc anymore. And the two billion forced to stay in work camps... they don't exist, as far as the public knows.

Heh... and that's not the only reason.

"There's no hidden cost, General. However, if you believe that you are not able to suppress the demonic threat without using this tool, I might be able to find someone who would be more suitable for your position. I had thought it would be a trifle for a military leader of your talents."

I wipe my lips to hide a smile as the smug prick gnashes his teeth together. "No, no, you are right, Commander Hiro. I... forgot my place."

"Mmm. Please ensure that it doesn't happen again." I turn back to the Volgrim who has sat and watched the meeting silently. "Have you any closing thoughts, esteemed guest? Perhaps any insight on the matter?"

He stares at me and I feel a slight chill breathe down my neck. "No. Your tactic is quite sensible. Truly, I understand what you are hoping to accomplish. As it is, I enjoy watching humans interact. Your emotions provide me with a real appreciation of how Volgrim loyalty never wavers. Humanity might stand to learn from our kind."

Finally, I flash a genuine grin. The seriousness of the meeting seems to have worn off now, thanks to his comment. "Thanks, but no thanks, Unarin. I like my emotions, just the way they are. Live long and prosper, or whatever you say."

Unarin doesn't return the smile. "I contemplate, and I comprehend. Farewell, humans."

He vanishes a moment later, and a sigh passes around the room as even I feel a sense of relief. It's always weird speaking to those aliens. They don't look quite like us, yet they do. It's unnerving.

As if reading my mind, one of the women at the table pipes up. "Did we ever manage to trace our genetic lineage compared to the Volgrim?"

She gets a response instantly. "Yes. The results were inconclusive. We share 95% of our DNA, but it's unclear whether we originated from them, or vice versa. Common sense speaks otherwise."

I decide to put an end to the meeting. I stand up, and everyone else does as well. "Ladies. Gentlemen. I thank you for coming. I trust I won't have to bring up this topic of discussion again?"

Everyone shakes their heads and I sigh once more. "Dismissed."

I walk out the door and Admiral Danis power-walks up to me, shoving the glasses up his nose. "Supreme Commander! That was an enjoyable meeting, as usual!"

Huh? It was? I shake his hand and groan silently to myself. This guy always wastes my time, after every meeting. He's such a goddamn kiss-ass.

"I'm in a rush today, Danis. Maybe some other time."

A flash of shock passes over his face, but he shakes it off quickly. "That's fine, not a problem! Look, I just wanted to say, I appreciate your protection of the demons. Truly, it is good that you are not allowing us to sink to their level. You are an inspiration to everyone!"

The room behind me is full of people milling about, chatting with each other loudly, so luckily nobody hears this idiot talking. I pull him aside and put my hand on his back.

"Danis... things are never what they seem. Please do not infer such a simple-minded assessment of my opinion. The situation is far bigger than anyone here will ever understand."

He nods slowly, as if I gave him some awe-inspiring nuggets of wisdom. "Of... of course. My apologies, Commander Hiro. Have a safe day."

I shake his hand again and turn away, my eyes rolling up into my skull of their own accord. I leave him behind without saying anything else. The last thing I want is to encourage the bastard to talk some more.

I walk over and board the hover-shaft, wincing inwardly as I spot two officers already on board. "Hello, Supreme Commander!" They both salute and smile.

Great. Another long ride. Maybe I should just teleport today.

Part 394b: Snap

"Swing at me. I'll deflect it." I hold my sword up, and Lora watches nervously as she raises her weapon. She takes a step forward and then pauses, and I groan in response.

"Come on, Lora. If you're too afraid to use your weapon, you'll be useless in battle. Do you want me to get rid of you and pick another slave? Attack me, already."

I can see a raging battle inside of her head as she faces off against me in my home-made arena. With a dim illumination coming from all around, my newly enhanced hearing allows me to hear all sorts of things, including the scurrying of a cockroach a few feet away, a dim resonance of sorts from the living areas outside, and other indescribable sounds that I mentally force myself to block out.

To say nothing of my sense of smell. I had to remove that improvement because some of the odors in Yama's domain were overpowering to the point of nausea. I suspect that even in the case of traditional human society, too much of a good thing would be information overload.

Lora, however, never complained about anything. I noticed her wince whenever she struck the dummy earlier, likely because of the sharp, ringing noise it made, but she appeared to grow used to it after a while.

Lora continues to stare at me for several seconds, before shifting uncomfortably. She doesn't like the idea of swinging at me. It's obvious.

"Is it guilt? I won't harm you if you attack me. This is practice. That's what you're supposed to do!" Finally, I sigh and crick my neck. "On second thought, I'll do the attacking. You just block as best you can. I'll go easy at first and increase the pace as time goes on."

She nods at me, but the solemn expression on her face never leaves. She reaches up and pulls a few strands of her red hair out of her eyes before firmly grasping her sword once more. After I berated her before about dropping her sword, she's never done it since. Good. It shows she can be taught.

I lunge forward and swing my sword down at her in a rather clunky motion, just to test her, and she bats my sword deftly to the side. "Nice! Keep it up!"

Then I spin around and swing sideways at her kidney, and once again she catches my blade with hers and pivots it away, knocking the tip down to the ground. Still, she never takes the initiative to attack, and she seems quite content to do nothing but defend.

Not good enough. She can't resist forever. Her opponent might wear out eventually, but she will as well. Finally, he who strikes first is more likely to land a damaging or killing blow, while a defender will only do so if they use their opponent's movement against them. She's far too amateur for that to happen, though I am as well. In truth, we both require training.

As I swing my blade at her time after time, a humorous thought occurs to me. Training with swords is probably useless. In an age of ranged attacks, such as blasters and magic, a sword seems quite primitive and worthless. Indeed, with enhanced strength, I could hack a man to pieces if I get up close, but a blaster is a much more effective weapon in the long run. Not to mention that no matter how strong, sharp, and durable the sword, it's probably going to be worthless if I face off against those Golden Commandos with their ridiculous armor once again.

Of course, I have planned a few counter-measures for if I see them next time. I just hope I won't have to test them out. They are truly frightening opponents, even for me.

I stab forwards at her and Lora bats my blade away again, but suddenly she stiffens and glances at the doorway. I shoot a glance over there, but I see and hear nothing. I turn back to her. "Focus on the fight, Lora. What happens out there is none of your concern."

She nods absentmindedly, but her guard is still lowered. I decide to teach her an example and jump at her, swinging my sword down towards her left shoulder. She jerks back in surprise and deflects my blow just in the nick of time, but squeaks in surprise.

I can't help but chuckle. "Haha! An enemy won't wait for you to stop being distracted in a fight! Come on, take the initiative! Take a stab at me!"

She surprises me by gritting her teeth and shaking her head, even as she shifts back into her guard stance. "Oh really? You would tell your master 'no'? Then I am going to stop going easy on you. You don't have the right to tell me no. Everything I've done so far has been for your welfare. You'd best not be ungrateful."

Without waiting for a response that I know won't come, I dash forward, and this time put my back into a flurry of strikes, stabbing, swinging, and even kicking once or twice. Lora astounds me, however, by deflecting all of my attacks easily, even as she keeps occasionally glancing at the doorway.

"Focus on me! Stop looking outside!" I switch up my approach and quietly wordsmith for a split second on myself. It's time to show her the consequences of being absentminded during a battle. "Strength."

I feel my power rise roughly fifty percent, which is a substantial number considering we've been about equal this whole time.

The dumb woman continues to stare at the entrance, and I take my chance, lunging forwards and putting all my power into a downward slash aimed directly at her neck. By my calculations, if she fails to dodge, it will just barely glance downwards on her highly reinforced shoulder armor, and may just break her shoulder. Easily fixable.

My swing is so powerful that the air seems to light on fire for a moment, and at the last second she shifts her weight and swivels her body to the side, leaving my defenses open. With a flick of movement, she swings her sword up and smashes my weapon out of my hands, sending it careening through the air until it plunges into the ceiling. I, however, fall roughly on my chest and blink in stunned silence.

"Whoa."

I lay on the floor for several long moments as I try to understand what just happened. Finally, I can process everything, and I stand back up and stare at my blade, now embedded in the canopy. "Well done... I underestimated you. For all my talk about being on guard, it was you who surprised me."

I turn and smile at her, only to feel my entire expression slump as she once again stares at that goddamn doorway.

"Hah... fine. We'll call this good for today. We've been here for about six hours. That's plenty of training."

She barely even acknowledges my words. I want to ask what she's looking at, but she won't be able to respond anyway. Or maybe she just doesn't want to. I wonder what it will take for her to learn to speak. I should try training her at some point.

I reach up with my mind and yank my weapon from the ceiling with telekinesis, then stab it into the ground. I take Lora's weapon from her, even as she mostly ignores me, and thrust hers into the ground, alongside mine.

"I don't know what's bothering you, but obviously we've done enough here. Come on, let's go."

I walk towards the doorway but sigh as I realize she isn't following, but is instead standing in that same spot. "Come on, Lora. Let's go."

She persists for several long seconds before taking a tentative step forwards, and then another, and another... after several grueling seconds, she walks over to my side. She loops her arms around mine and presses up against me, and only now do I realize she's shaking.

"What's wrong? Are you scared of something?"

She nods.

"Well, don't be. I'll protect you from... whatever it is." I walk along with her and slam the doors shut behind us as we leave, half expecting to see Yama or one of the other demons standing outside. That does not turn out to be the case.

We walk along the corridors, heading back to the main room, and her shaking grows more intense. She begins to subtly pull on me to slow me down as if we're approaching some big, final boss.

Frankly, I'm getting nervous myself. Something has Lora spooked, and her jitters are transferring to me. I want to smack her and tell her to calm down, but at the same time we're in a place with powerful demons roaming around. She might have a good reason to be terrified. Maybe I shouldn't have left the swords behind. In any case, they probably aren't going to be much use against whatever it is up ahead.

We continue to walk forwards, and her constant pulling on me becomes a real struggle as she shakes her head over and over. Finally, I pull my arm away from her and wrap it around her back, gently pushing her forwards. "There's n-nothing to be afraid of. Calm down, Lora. No demon will hurt you as long as I'm here."

And then I hear it.

In the distance... a strange sound, like a grunting noise. Over and over, in a steady rhythm. She's trying to pull me away into one of the side corridors to take a detour back to my room, but I won't have it.

That sound is not from a demon. It's a human. A male, to be precise.

Was she able to hear this back at the training ground? Is her hearing that much better than mine? Our abilities should have been roughly equal, but perhaps there's something more at work here.

She ducks away from my arm and pulls around behind me, dipping down, as if to make herself smaller. I gently reach back and hold her hand, even as I continue walking forward, keeping my pace slow, so she doesn't get spooked.

Eventually, she can't take it anymore and pulls away, dodging into a side pathway and cowering. I start to say something, only to look through an open doorway and spot several other slave girls flinching against the far corners of their room and staring at me with terror in their eyes.

Somehow, whoever is up ahead, whoever this man might be, he scares these girls more than even the demons. It's a primal fear, one I haven't seen at any point in my life.

"Stay here, Lora. I'll take a look."

I whisper into the darkness, but I know she can hear me. A quick glance over my shoulder and I see her crouching down, barely peeking around the corner. She nods quickly, almost like a wife when there's a burglar in the house. Grab the shotgun. That's what her expression says to me.

I swallow hard and continue walking. Soon, the muffled grunting is much more audible, and I can hear many other things. The sound of creaking metal. The ground being scraped by heavy boots. The sounds also reek of 'moisture,' a sort of sloppiness that upsets my stomach.

I arrive at a junction just before the room where the noises are coming from, and I can finally tell what's going on. It is, without a doubt, the sound of two people having intercourse. The woman, however, is silent. Every so often, the man coughs and mumbles something in a manner I can only describe as a drunken stupor. I take a few steps towards the doorway and frown, just as a chill shoots down my spine. This is Lora's old room, where her fellow slave friends live.

I quickly walk up and turn around the corner. Immediately, I take everything in. An older woman, possibly twenty-five, lying motionless on the ground. Her body is stiff, and she's lying at an unnatural angle. Her neck has marks on it as if she's been strangled. My enhanced sight stares at her dispassionately, observing her nude body and how the skin is turning blotchy.

She's dead. She's been dead for a while, at least an hour or two. There are marks all over, as if... as if the man beat her after he killed her. Several spots on her face and stomach are purple and blotchy, where the blood has pooled.

And the man, his back is turned to me. Another of Lora's previous roommates, the younger woman, possibly a year or two older than Lora herself, is chained to the bed. She is completely silent, and her eyes are closed. I can't see much of her behind the foul creature blocking my view, but I don't want to. What I can see is already gruesome enough. I close my eyes and take a deep silent breath, even as my enhanced hearing fills in one detail I'd rather not know. There's only one heartbeat in this room. Both girls are dead.

"Just... what exactly do you think you're doing?" The words hiss from my mouth as I open my eyes and gaze emotionlessly at the man.

The bastard pauses his thrusting to jerk his head up and look around, before turning back to look at me. "Wait your turn, you fucking bashturd! Give ush shome privashy!"

The man is dressed in an unfamiliar military garb. It's navy blue, and he has three large stars pinned to the front of his jacket. His pants are carelessly tossed off to the side of the room, but he continues to wear his coat for some unknown reason. I don't recognize the fashion from anywhere, but he's a clean-shaven man, seeming to be of British descent. His hair is matted down with sweat, turning what otherwise might look like a decent family man into a drooling psychopath.

He immediately ignores me and goes back to thrusting, so I cough loudly. "Explain yourself!"

There's no way to save these women. But now my rage is overcome with questions. The Labyrinth has always overwhelmed me with its mysteries, but now things are ultimately making sense. Puzzle pieces are falling into place. I don't have all the answers yet, but I will soon.

And once I do, this insect will suffer a slow, torturous death.

He stumbles backward and glares red-hot fire at me, before turning around to give me an eyeful of his frontside that I'd rather not see. "God-dammit! Whatsh your fukin' problem! It'sh my turn today!" He blinks his eyes and wobbles unsteadily before grabbing a metal container of some sort and chugging a mouthful of liquid, which I automatically assume is alcohol. I'm suddenly extremely glad I returned my olfactory receptors to their normal levels because his odor is awful even from two dozen feet away... not to mention the stench of death in the air.

He steadies himself against a wall and squints as he stares at me. After several long seconds, he opens his eyes wide. "W-what? Soopreme Commander?! You weren't- I thought you didn't-" He spits out several words incoherently before appearing to realize something important. "Ohhh... sho that'sh why you protect them... sho even you have shome shecrets, eh? Eh?"

I have no idea what this moron is talking about. Slowly, I lick my lips and force myself to keep my calm. Did he call me a Supreme Commander? Why? What does that even mean? Whoever he's mistaken me for, they seem to be a military commander of some sort.

"Yes. I do. Let's just say I recently started coming here. First day. Explain to me, how... this works."

The idiot nods rapidly like a blubbering dog. "Oh yesh! Yesh! I knew it had ta' be you! You shaved 'n everything! You look like a younger man, really took a few yearsh off!" He stumbles forward and smiles jovially, completely clueless to the fact that his death is quite imminent. "This place ish GREAT! You can do anything you want to 'em, and they can't talk back! Way better than that wife of yoursh! Yama don't care 'bout nothin', no lawsh or anything!"

"Oh. So Yama set this up. Those girls are dead, you know."

He completely misses my tone of voice, even as he stumbles across the room and slaps his hand on my chest. "Damn shstraight! Demons eat the dead ones, so I get to do anything I want! They're just cows anyway, easy to make 'em do all sorts of sick shit!"

I've finally had enough. I can't take another second. The ugly bastard defiled these women, like some kind of animal, then he killed them. All this and Yama sanctions it? I raise my hand up to grab him by the neck, but suddenly he pulls back and opens his eyes. "Oooh! There'sh another one right there! Lora, you're one of my favoritesh! Where you been hidin' honey? Melia and Sadie wouldn't talk, sho I made 'em shqueal like pigsh!"

I quickly turn back and spot Lora standing behind me. Somehow, despite all that clunky armor and my enhanced vision, I was so focused on the man in front of me that I missed her return. Her breathing is labored, and her eyes are open wide. Terror is evident on her face, especially as the man leers at her.

"C'mon honey, come ta' papa! I gotta find Silvia after this!" He nudges me in the chest and winks at me. "She'sh the little one. Sho shkittish, jusht the way I like 'em, heh heh."

My mind flashes back to the 12-year-old girl. This man... even with the child...

"I think you've mistaken me for someone else. I'm not your Supreme Commander." I reach forward in an instant and grab the man by his throat, glaring deep into his soul. His eyes bolt open as a sudden realization dawns on him. "I'm not the person you thought I was, but thank you for the information. Today, I will be your worst nightmare."

"L-leggo! Lemme g-oh!" He squirms in my grasp, and I start to squeeze. I'll choke the fucking life out of him, just like he throttled the life from-

A sudden movement.

I blink as my world turns into a blur. My hand opens almost reflexively as I fly backward, smashing into a wall behind me with incredible force. A terrible high-pitched scream fills the corridor, and I whip my head up just in time to spot Lora leaping at him. A moment later, a shockwave blasts out of the room as she pounds him against a wall, nearly destroying the wall in the process. A war cry erupts from her belly, as she jams her hand inside his chest and then rips out his spine in one motion.

The brutal murder is punctuated by an animalistic fury as she howls and cries, tearing the rapist apart, piece by piece. An arm flies to the side, his collarbone follows, other chunks I can't even identify, and soon the entire room is covered in blood. The man from before is gone. In his place are vaguely human chunks of meat and bone, spattered against the walls and across the floors.

After several seconds of panting, Lora falls to her knees and grabs the body of her friend on the floor, clutching her bruised and battered body tightly.

I carefully pull myself up and turn back to stare in awe at the wall behind me. The black tiles are shredded, and a hole the size of a small car is visible. Through the hole, I can see more slave girls staring at me with a mixture of fear, awe, and confusion. Lora must have hurled me backward to attack the man who killed her friends. She was so afraid of him before when we were walking down the hallways, and yet she either realized he was nothing to be feared, or my training unlocked something deep in her soul.

The will to fight back.

I dust myself off and walk forward, scowling at the room where the predator had his way. Quickly, I walk over and open the chains holding the girl on the bed, then I create a blanket with wordsmithing and wrap her in it, setting her on the bed carefully. After this, I kneel down to Lora and embrace her. "You did well. He deserved to die."

My words are of little comfort as she weeps into the body of her friend. I don't know whether this one is Melia or Sadie, but either way... it was no way to go.

I bite my lip and glance back at the doorway and the corridor outside. Yama created this place. These aren't just servants to attend to his needs... he's human trafficking here. This is wrong on a level far past what it was before. I don't know the exact situation, but if this man is a human in the human military, the trafficking must be something sanctioned by the government. Hell, the man told me this place had no laws, so maybe the higher ups don't even know.

Something smells rotten, and it isn't just the death in the air and the foulness of blood and iron.

I rub Lora slowly on her back to comfort her, and I sense a movement outside the doorway. Yama appears silently, the shadowy bastard.

"What have you done?" He stares at the carnage coldly, as if it doesn't matter in the slightest.

"I put a dog down, Yama. He was a cruel deranged monster. I should be asking you what's going on here."

I decide not to mention it was Lora who killed him. If Yama knows the truth, he gives no indication of knowing. Instead, he hisses at me. "Fool. Going to such lengths over mere chattel... That man was Danis Thornum. He was a prestigious military general among humanity's forces. It took decades of coaxing to get him firmly on our side, and now you've undone all my hard work. He was a crucial voter in the pro-demon coalition. His voice held real sway."

"Yeah? Well, I say he was a foul monster." I stand up and walk over to Yama, staring down at the four-foot high demon, even as I glare hot coals at him. "No matter how little you care about humans, this is going too far. Humans would never do such things to your kind. We have laws. Rules."

Yama tilts his head up and surprises me by tittering to himself. It's a deep, ominous chuckle, one that hasn't a hint of joy in it. "Kukuku... how little you know, Jason Hiro. Demons number in the tens of thousands in the labyrinth, but billions of my kind are being subjected to torture and slavery in human work camps. Even I haven't a prayer of rescuing a single one of them, due to the efficiency of human weaponry. Think with your brain, human! Do you think I do this joyfully? I do this because I must. It is one tool of many to prevent the humans from crushing my kind."

He lowers his head to stare at Lora. "She is covered in blood, and you are not. Am I really to believe that you killed Danis?"

I step in the way of his gaze. "Leave her out of this. She's my slave."

"Your slave killed an esteemed guest. I offer protection to those who come here. It's a binding contract... a blood contract. How do you wish for me to explain my failure when Danis shows up missing?"

I turn back to the room thoughtfully. "He's gone. No getting around that."

After several long seconds, an idea comes to mind. "If I can solve this... dilemma, will you promise not to take vengeance against Lora? She did what any caring human would do."

Yama takes a step back and evaluates me carefully. "Fine. I can't wait to see you get out of trouble this time."

I smile at him. "Don't underestimate a wordsmith." A moment later, I speak again. " Clone. "

In front of me, a clone of Danis appears and stares ahead blankly. He looks precisely as I remember he did before he died, but the clone seems almost... soulless.

A strange feeling comes over me. It's almost a sense of déjà vu. I feel as if I've done this before. It all seems so familiar...

I turn to the man. "You will vote in favor of the demons, forever, and you will never again return to this place. Continue living out your life as you were before. Do I make myself clear?"

Danis nods slowly, but it takes several seconds for him to respond. "Uh huh."

Yama's pure black eyes widen. "I see. I did not know such a power existed. Truly, this is... unprecedented."

I continue speaking to Danis. "Go back where you came. Leave this place. Never return."

The clone slowly walks away, meandering down the hallways toward an unknown destination. Yama smiles wickedly at me. "That is most convenient. Now I will not have to service his murderous escapades. He even remembers where the exit is."

"The exit?"

"Yes. There is a demon here who controls the passage of humans and demons, to-and-from this place. Grylls is his name. He is unpleasant, but he does what he must. Otherwise, the only way to leave is if you have the ability to teleport, yourself."

"I see. Is that it, then?"

Yama's smile fades, and he gazes back into the room. "That will do. I hope we have come to an understanding. As for those two, I will send in the chattel to gather them up and deliver them to the kitchen."

It takes me a few seconds, but I take a step back and scowl. "You're going to eat them?! What is wrong with you? No, I will give them a proper burial."

Yama rolls his eyes around. "Humans. So sentimental. It is a waste to let perfectly good flesh and energy rot in the dirt. Demons gain power from the bodies of humans, as well as other creatures. Human meat is also a delicacy among certain members of my species."

I hear a shifting behind me and turn to see Lora staring at Yama in horror.

"Well, not these two. They are Lora's friends. I won't allow it."

The shadow demon groans and turns away, tossing his hands in the air. "Fine! Do as you please! Kill my guests and take my feast! Whatever satisfies you!"

He storms away and I stare at his backside. "You really need me, don't you? Without me, you won't survive. Why else would you crumble so promptly?"

Whether he doesn't hear me or he ignores me, I don't know. He continues walking, and soon he vanishes into the shadows beyond.

This is so wrong. What hell is this place? What monster forces innocents with no ability to fight back into the jaws of their oppressors? Humanity once stood for the good of all. When I was young, the motto of my country was peace and prosperity for all. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Did those ideals die? Do humans no longer care about the fate of one another?

Or perhaps they simply ignore this place. Maybe they don't know of its existence, or they pretend not to and call it a necessary evil. Even back before I entered the cryopod, those places existed. We called them 'black sites' and ignored the wailing of those trapped within. Who cared if a few innocents suffered, so long as the majority lived opulent lives?

I turn back to Lora. "Come on. Let's give them a proper resting place. They deserved better."

Even as I walk over and wrap the girl on the floor in a blanket, another appears in the doorway. A young girl, the one who lived here before. Lora's last remaining companion. Her eyes are hardened, and no tears roll down her face. Already, she is used to the horrors of this place.

I nudge Lora, and when she spots her friend, she quickly stands up and dashes over to hug her.

Silvia is her name, assuming that Danis guy was right. If we leave her here, she will end up like these two. I can't have that. If I had paid more attention, their deaths could have been prevented. It's not that I cared about the lives of these women I never knew, but somehow... it feels as if I personally failed them.

But out of this, Lora gained something. The ability to stand up for herself. Even to raise her hand to me and be selfish, just this once.

I levitate both corpses onto a double-stacked gurney and cover them up out of respect for the dead. Then, I begin pushing them back down the hall towards our training area.

"I'm going to bury them where you can remember them every day, Lora. Never forget the rage you felt towards that man. You should feel that hatred towards anyone who threatens you. Understand?"

She nods slowly.

"Good. As for your friend, I will make her my slave too. I'm sure Yama will be unhappy, but it seems he has no choice except to allow me free reign. You and I will protect her."

A funny thought comes to my mind, and I smile to myself. "You know, I always wanted a daughter."

I push the gurney down the hall, and both girls follow behind me.

* * *

Sarah smiles sweetly at me on my holopad. Her face appears in the air before me in full detail, as if I was talking directly to her. "I've made all the arrangements, Jason. We'll be fine, so calm down!"

"Yeah, I know. You're a big girl." I smile sheepishly and scratch at my thick beard. "Tell Timothy that I expect straight A's while I'm gone. A-pluses, even. The son of a Supreme Commander can't slack off. He might have to take the reins someday."

My wife's smile wilts and she glares at me playfully. "Oh, you. It's truly something that an immortal is worried about the future. You're such a tease!"

"Yeah. A tease." I echo her words as I glance around the hangar. My spaceship is nearly prepped and loaded, and it has all sorts of amenities that will make the trip quite cushy, even if I can just make everything I need as I go along. Magic is useful like that. "Anyway, I gotta go, sweetheart. Don't cheat on me while I'm gone."

She scoffs at me. "Jason! You jerk!"

"Kidding. Love you." I make a kissy face at the screen and shut it off afterward. I hate long goodbyes, but she's the opposite. She'll draw every farewell out into a three-week ordeal if I let her.

I sling my Mark III Anti-Energy Dematerializer over my shoulder and walk toward my ship. The hangar is colossal, easily two thousand feet tall and fifty thousand wide. Hundreds, even thousands of ships of varying sizes are lined up meticulously, from here to there, and the lower levels are even bigger, stocking several dozens of the massive freighters and carriers. Naturally, there hasn't been a need for them since the insurgencies a few millennia ago, but it never hurts to be prepared.

"Commander Hiro!" A man runs up to me and salutes, his black, undecorated uniform indicating he's one of the maintenance crewmen. "The Mothership is refueled. There was a problem with several of the replicators aboard, but if you're willing to wait, we'll have them fixed in an hour or so."

"Don't worry about it. My wife packed me a nice lunch, and I'll only be gone a few days. Prep the ship for launch."

He nods at me and scurries away briskly. I meander after him, heading in the same direction, but there's no rush. Marie is the head of the military until I get back, and while that always ruffles a few feathers, nobody dares question her competency, so there are rarely any problems. Hell, a few times she outdid me as Auxiliary Supreme Commander and made me look inferior, to the point that I asked her to take over for good. Sadly, she's too lazy and only cares about science.

Even if I were gone a year or two, the place would probably be in better condition when I got back than when I left it.

A ship docks near me and I stare up at it. It's a military vessel, small, perhaps able to crew four or five people. Not like my ship, which is comically oversized for what I need. My craft is big enough to fit thousands of people inside, but the damn thing runs mostly on autopilot, begging the question of why I need something so massive.

Dunno. Marie insisted I have a ship worthy of a Supreme Commander, so I let her build it. She has some strange nitpicks on occasion.

But, compared to this tiny vessel, my ship is a mammoth. The smaller ship has a name laser-etched on the side, 'The Dragon's Dogma.'

A fancy title, to be sure, but it seems a little pompous and arrogant. If I were an asshole, I'd order it be renamed 'The Stinger,' or something more appropriate for its size.

I continue to wait for the maintenance crew to give me the okay, and as I do, the smaller vessel lowers its landing platform and the inside opens up. A single man exits, and immediately I moan to myself and turn away, trying to make myself invisible. Maybe I should use my wordsmithing. It's that fucking Danis guy. Gods, I can't stand the brown-noser.

I listen intently, but instead of walking over to me, he sounds as if he's walking away. Only a hundred feet separate us, and surely he saw me...

I carefully look back, just in time to see him walk right past me as if I don't even exist. I must have been mistaken about where he was headed. For some reason, when he ignores me, I feel very irritated.

"Danis! Are you not going to salute your commander?"

He continues walking for a second or two before slowly coming to a stop and turning back to me. "Oh. Hello, Supreme Commander. I did not expect to run into you a second time."

His words come out oddly, almost mechanically, as if he's forcing himself to talk. Compared to the normal, slimy way he slides the words out, he is much creepier than before.

"A second time? Are you feeling all right, Admiral? You look a little pale."

"Yes, Supreme Commander. Thank you for your concern. I am fine."

He turns back around slowly and continues walking.

How... odd. I've known the man for way too long and he's never acted like that before. Maybe he's tired or something. Admittedly, I've never chatted with him in an informal setting, but still...

Ah, whatever. It's none of my concern. I ought to just be glad he doesn't feel the need to speak with me. This is a blessing! Cheer up, me!

The crew from my ship beckon for me to come over, and I briskly make my way there, but even as I do, I glance at Danis's back as he walks away.

Something sure was strange about him today.

Part 395b: Repression

" Bury. "

With a single word, the ground in the training room heaves up and engulfs the bodies of the two girls, pulling them down into a permanent resting place. Lora wipes away a tear, but Silvia stares stonily. Silvia, I've noticed in the short time since I met her, never emotes in the slightest. She helped me move their bodies down, since I felt using telekinesis would have a less somber feeling to it, and she never once appeared sad or cried.

I haven't either, of course. I don't care about the dead girls. I never knew them, and their only meaning to me was that of how they made Lora feel. She was close friends with both of them, and even as we watch the bodies get swallowed into the blackened dirt, she rests an arm on the younger girl's shoulder. She cares about Silvia, that I can tell, but Silvia doesn't seem to return those feelings.

I don't know what to make of the situation. Perhaps we should leave Silvia to the labyrinth and let her continue living her life, but on the other hand, she would be useful to me, possibly in some small way. She might help motivate Lora with a motherly instinct, guiding Lora to improve herself to protect the young girl.

Then again, the cold, emotionless eyes I've spotted in Silvia have their uses. In time... she might grow to outperform even her senior.

I glower at the newly erected graves as the ground finishes shifting around. It occurred to me afterward that instead of just sending Danis off to return to the human realm, I could have taken some of his memories. Those might have been quite valuable and given me real insight into the state of the galaxy. I am still coming up short on too many details for my liking, and this revelation about memory theft came to me from nowhere, like a faint whisper from the past.

Sometimes I feel as if I'm on the cusp of remembering a past life, something involving reincarnation. It's stupid, of course, but it still itches at the back of my mind. I find it hard to explain with words, but it is pervasive, never leaving me.

Sometimes the subconscious self can be a buffoon.

"Silvia. I'm going to pull you from Yama, and you will be my slave, along with Lora. As such, I am giving you back that which was taken from you." Silvia looks up at me questioningly, and Lora turns to me in surprise, even while I speak again. " Heal. Regenerate. "

For the next minute, Silvia finally opens her eyes in shock and staggers backward, grasping at her mouth and throat as her vocal cords and tongue return from the nether.

Several minutes pass, and she sits on the ground breathing quietly. Then she surprises me by speaking. "You heal me. Why?"

It takes me a moment to realize she can talk, but I gather my wits about me. "I will do this for all slaves I take from Yama. He has his way, and I have mine."

"Oh." She doesn't thank me, though I ponder to myself that might be due to her upbringing. "What you want me do?"

I stare at the young girl, with her short-cropped black hair and eyes of a similar shade, and ponder the question to myself. What do I want?

Well, she has to learn to protect herself, just as Lora did. That is non-negotiable. But her small size means I should probably train her differently from Lora. Besides, if we were in a video game, it would be stupid to have a party of only warriors.

Silvia and I stare at each other silently as I think and she waits patiently. Finally, I have my answer. "I will train you to be an assassin."

"Okay." She doesn't question me, but instead just nods. Good. I like that. At least subservient slaves don't give me lip, which works out better for both of us.

" Knife. Knife. Knife. " I create three knives, all of them with double sided blades that taper into elegant triangle points, and small handles suited for her hands. Then I give them to her. "I know your friends died, but a demon will not wait for your sadness to end. You have to start training immediately."

"I not sad. Them not important." She stands up and takes the knives away from me, staring at them questioningly. "What do with these?"

I point her at a training dummy Lora broke yesterday. "I want you to practice throwing these knives. It will take a lot of work, but eventually, you should be able to stab that dummy from this distance right on that red dot in the center of its chest. Do you see it?"

She barely even nods. "Yes. Will try."

Do or do not, there is no try. I feel the urge to say those words but shake my head instead. I'm not that wise, so it's best I don't pretend otherwise.

"Uh, get a bit closer though. While you're first starting, you're going to miss a lot, and your arms are probably too weak to throw them a hundred feet." I quickly aim my mind at a spot twenty feet from the dummy and use my telekinesis to etch an X into the ground. "Stand and throw from there."

Silvia obediently walks away as soon as I'm done talking, and I hastily speak up to remind her of one thing. "Also, if you get hurt, stab yourself, or cut off a finger or something, tell me at once. I can heal any wound, but I can't bring back the dead."

She doesn't nod or say anything, but a quick mental impression I get from her tells me she heard.

Hmm, come to think of it... how do I know I can't bring back the dead? I've never even tried. Maybe my power is more mysterious than I thought.

Oh well. I turn back to Lora and sigh silently to myself. She's still staring emptily at the place where her friends are buried. I take a few steps towards her and rub her arms. "I'm sorry about what happened. Nobody deserves to go out like that. However, you avenged them. You did the right thing."

She bobs her head and another tear comes trickling down. Strange, I always thought of Lora as not caring much about the other slaves, but perhaps I don't understand her as well as I thought I did.

"All right. Come on, let's get back to training. No matter how long you stare, you can't bring them back. The best way to honor their memory is to become powerful so you can punish filth like Danis whenever you encounter them."

When I speak his name, a shudder runs down her spine and she pulls away from me, pushing past to head over to the training dummy I made yesterday. I ignore the slight, as it would be discourteous of me to call out someone grieving. Still, she has to get over them eventually. One cannot dwell on the past forever, or it will damage their future.

I grimace as I spot large chunks of flesh and blood covering the backside of her armor. Her plate mail is filthy now and coated in that man's blood. "Clean." It vanishes and I breathe a sigh of relief, wondering to myself why I suddenly felt so possessive. Well, there's nothing wrong with that. I saved her, so she's mine. It's that simple.

Danis didn't just kill the two girls I buried; he had apparently hurt Lora and Silvia in the past too. That explains the marks on Lora's back. I had thought the demons did that to her, but thinking of the human and how he treated members of his own species, it occurs to me that perhaps there are monsters on both sides of the conflict.

I need to know more. I need to find out the full situation.

"Oohh!" Silvia lets out a yelp, and I quickly turn to look at her, wondering what happened. I'm mildly amused to see that she's already planted a knife square in the center of the dummy's chest.

"Excellent. Now you just need to get to a point where you can do that fifty times in a row without missing, and we'll move onto bigger things."

Silvia's expression of awe at her skills dissolves instantly as I suck the wind out of her sails. She slumps down a little and goes back to throwing her knives. She'll be fine. A little disappointment is good for the soul.

Lora picks up her sword and shield and starts hacking at her dummy, carefully chopping each limb off, one by one. I watch with a slight disinterest and notice she's more precise with her strikes than before. There's an intent to kill that I didn't feel yesterday. Killing Danis must have changed something about her.

I grab my sword out of the ground and walk up behind her. "Lora, enough with the dummy. This time I want you to go on the offense against me."

She stops and turns to look at me, but once again I see that same hesitation from before. She looks nervous at the thought of swinging a sword at me.

"Go on. Do it. I'm waiting." I raise my sword and assume a defensive stance, so she hesitantly assumes an offensive one, but even as she shifts around, I can already tell she isn't going to attack.

"Come on, Lora. You threw me out of the way to get at Danis. Channel that anger once again. Attack me mercilessly. I'm plenty protected, so you won't be able to do serious harm."

I think. I swallow at the thought that maybe my invisible armor isn't as sturdy as I expect.

Still, she doesn't move to attack. Her face is resolute, and it's starting to piss me off. "Lora, this is childish. I don't care what your feelings are towards me, you have to treat me like you did-" I pause as an idea crosses my mind. It only takes a second, and I quickly put it into action. "Disguise."

I feel my body shift as my features change. I don't have a mirror to see myself, but the sudden change in Lora's expression as her face melts into an expression of horror is enough to make me giddy. Finally, she knows I'm serious. I start to speak, and already my voice sounds just like Danis's did. "Come on, bitch. If you don't take a swing at me, I'll kill that little girl. Yeah, that's right! I'll kill Silvia! What are you going to do now, eh? I'll fucking cut her into little pieces and feed her to the dogs! Bet you'd like that, wouldn't you?"

Silvia hears my altered voice and turns around to gawk in amazement, or perhaps disgust. I can't be sure, but based on the look they're giving me, I must look just like the filthy animal.

"Come on! DO IT! If you don't, I'll kill the little girl! I'm not bluffing either, you worthless whore!"

I perceive the exact moment Lora snaps. She can't take the taunting anymore, or my face resembling Danis's. Lora leaps at me with a ferocity far overwhelming what I expected, and I rear back in surprise. Her speed increases as she slams her sword down at my head and she shoves her shield into my gut at the same time. I deflect the sword but get knocked backward by the shield.

A stab, a parry, we trade blows and I keep getting forced back, all while she howls something inhuman, the sounds that escape her mouth sounding even more primal than what she let out against Danis just a while earlier. Truth be told, I can't hold off against her, and have to keep increasing my strength just to parry. Her berserker rage just becomes even worse when she feels me resisting more.

"All right, that's enough! You did a good job-" I'm cut off as she bashes me in the face with an elbow and knocks me on my ass. It doesn't hurt, but I roll out of the way just as her sword smashes into the ground where I was sitting, blasting dirt up into the air from under the black tiles that cover the floor.

She isn't listening to me and instead is releasing the anger she's been holding in ever since she saw me let Danis walk away. Maybe she doesn't know why I let him go, but she still resents me for it. Even so, this is getting dangerous. I have to get her to stop.

I lift my head up just in time to see a boot swing at my face. A moment later my world goes spinning end over end as she kicks me thirty feet back, smashing me against a wall. My mind is swirling, and I shake the feeling away, before aiming a word at myself. "Normalize."

My body shifts once again, and I breathe quickly as I wonder if I look like myself again. Lora, however, doesn't seem to care that I look like myself, and she jumps at me and swings again, though I dodge the attack and slip around behind her with surprising agility. Using little effort, I send a telekinetic wave into her backside, smashing her against the wall where she just pummeled me.

Finally, this seems to knock some sense into her, and she steps away from the wall, turning to look at me. Her nose is broken, and tears are pouring down her face.

"Christ's sake! I told you to calm down!" I jam my sword in the ground and walk over to her, cupping her chin in my hand. "Let me have a look. That's a nasty break."

She nods slightly, and her anger fades away in an instant. I heal her nose, and both of us stare at each other for several long seconds.

"Are you feeling better now? Did you get that rage out of your system?"

Lora shifts her shoulders and averts her eyes, and then she does something completely shocking. She jumps at me and wraps her arms around me, pressing us close together.

I return the embrace, and she slowly looks up into my eyes. A question is visible, deep inside her mind. I softly probe with my telepathy before smiling at her. "Yes, you may."

We kiss, and I press her face against mine. My hand glides along the back of her head, subtly making her move how I want her to.

Seconds pass, and finally, we pull our lips apart. Lora's breathing is shallow, and she says nothing, but I can tell by the few days we've been together what she's thinking at a glance.

A hint of motion to my left makes me glance over at Silvia. She's watching us with a silent stare. There's no curiosity, or interest, or envy, or anything else. She's just... watching.

I pull myself away from Lora and both of us suddenly feel the awkwardness in the air. Silvia isn't making things any easier.

Lora rubs her knees together and smiles shyly, so I turn to Silvia. "Let's call it a day. That's enough training for now. We'll go back to my room and I'll carve you out an alcove across the hallway."

She just nods. "Okay."

* * *

I beam down from my ship into the main labyrinth entry facility. Instantly, all the personnel on deck stop and salute me, probably by the order of a yet unseen person. "As you were." I nod at them and continue walking forwards towards the gate that will warp me into the Labyrinth. It's a massive circular thing, big enough to fit an enormous tank from my youth. That is, one of those primitive vehicles that moved on treads. They fired rather weak metal shells with an explosive compound, as I recall.

The hangar is decent sized, though nothing like Earth's main military port. A handful of starships of varying sizes are lined up beside mine, with space for at least ten more on this level. Dozens of men and women roam about, here and there, dressed in different colored uniforms, such as orange, green, and black. My eyes look past them all and stare silently at the gate that Marie Becker helped design. Unlike what the angels and demons use to get from their dimensions to ours, our warp gate is powered by normal energy, and a colossal amount of it. This star system alone needed to build a Dyson Sphere just to give the gate the power that it needed.

As I head towards the warp gate, a plain looking woman walks up to me. "Supreme Commander, I'm Sergeant Florence. I'm in charge of this facility. We weren't expecting you."

Her tan hair is chopped back in a masculine style, a butch cut that doesn't make her look as gentle as she could otherwise. I do prefer long hair on a woman.

"Yes, I remember you. I believe you helped during the Era of Suppression. You led the all-female Verus Battalion, as a matter of fact. How have you been?"

She blushes. "I'm surprised you remember that, Supreme Commander. That was such a long time ago. I didn't even do all that much. It took a concerted effort during those dark times."

"Of course. However, some people exerted more effort than others. You lead the defense force to protect this gate, so that makes you rather important in case the demons get uppity. A fitting promotion, I'd say."

"Yeah. It's a shame immortals don't get to retire permanently."

"You're telling me." I rub my forehead and grunt a little bit. "I've got a splitting headache. Anyway, I'm heading into the labyrinth."

Her eyes open wide in surprise. "You are? I beg your pardon, Commander, but surely whatever the reason is, you could send someone else in. Humanity can't afford to lose the highest ranking leader we've got. At the least, I'll pull together an elite guard for you."

I shake my head and smile. "That won't be necessary. This is a... diplomatic mission. Yes, I need to go in by myself. You know how weak the demons have become."

She bobs her head slowly. "I... see. Extending an olive branch then, are you? A noble gesture, but if the demons capture you, it's all over. I can't let you go in alone, even if you are the Supreme Commander. Humanity's fate rests in your hands."

I lick my lips slowly. "I'm just one man, Florence. I can be replaced. That being said, I think you are underestimating me... and overstepping your authority. I outrank you in every meaning of the word. Activate the gate, and step aside."

"I... I can't just do that, Supreme Commander. You know what you're asking of me, right?"

"I do." I reach up and scratch my grizzled beard thoughtfully. "Truth be told, I don't have to use this gate. I could just use another route, but it would waste my... energy, and leave me weakened. Is that what you would prefer?"

She looks back and forth at a few passing crewman, but they offer her no easy answers. "Well, no..."

"So step aside." I lean down close and murmur so only she can hear. "You have distinguished yourself over the years, but there's no reason I can't strip you of your rank and put in someone more loyal. You know what happens to traitors, don't you?"

Her glee at seeing me from earlier is completely gone. She takes a hesitant step backward. "Not the mines... you wouldn't..."

"This mission is imperative to the survival of humanity. Activate the gate, Sergeant. I'm not asking again."

Finally, defeat is visible in her eyes. "Alright... fine. I'll do it. Just... be careful, Commander. There are still unpredictable and savage demons in the labyrinth."

"I'm counting on it." My hypersuit seals up and my faceplate closes as she inputs a long series of digits into the password matrix. When the gate begins to activate, a hundred soldiers line up, weapons at the ready, just in case anything should exit through the gate.

"Thank you, Sergeant. I remember those who are friends."

Walking forward, I step through the warp gate as it opens up, stepping into a place I haven't been in millions of years.

The soldiers on the other side are much tenser and more alert than the ones on humanity's side. They barely nod at me, waiting until the instant I walk through to close the gate down.

A man speaks up. "Just one? You're joking."

I shake my head and walk past him, smiling to myself. He can't see my face, and this suit is a nondescript model, so he has no way of knowing who I am. "Special orders. I'll be out in a day or two."

"It's your grave, buddy." The soldier's voice sounds off after me as I trudge down a long, dark hallway, leading deep into the labyrinth of Hell.

There's another Wordsmith in here, skulking about in the shadows. I need to find and capture them. I just pray I'm not too late... the potential for casualties is too high.

Part 396b: Pawn

Silvia and Lora trudge along the hallway in front of me. We're supposed to find and take out a rogue commando who's been attacking and capturing demons in the Labyrinth for the last couple weeks. Yama seems to think this one is more troublesome than a few others, but he also appeared to care about other things that were more pressing to him. He spends a lot of time inside of the room with the crystallized girl, I've noticed.

Lora and Silvia walk a few paces ahead of me, occasionally making hand motions toward each other, almost like sign language. I've noticed that despite being able to speak, Silvia only ever does so when I talk to her and otherwise doesn't appear to have any interest in doing so unless prompted. With Lora, she always prefers letting her hands do the talking.

As well, I've given Silvia her new outfit befitting her 'class'. With the ability to turn invisible and teleport a few dozen feet in any direction, it seems she's something of an assassin, trained to take down an enemy in a single blow. Her shadow-colored shirt and pants match the black tone of her cloak that she keeps wrapped around her at all times.

Lora, on the other hand, wears pure white armor, made of plate-mail and reinforced beyond the limits of ordinary steel. I'm confident that with her enhanced strength and durability, a tank blasting her at point blank range would merely knock the wind out of her. The white armor serves not just as a contrast to Silvia's, but it also allows Lora to draw an enemy's attention. This, in turn, should allow Silvia to strike from the shadows.

Heh... and myself, of course. I don't know who this Golden Commando is, but I've got something I've been working on. Just a theory though.

Reflexively, my hand reaches down and grasps the heavy pouch at my side. I exhale a sigh of relief as I feel the dense pebbles rolling around inside, safe and secure. Creating new ones is easily possible, but keeping my most powerful weapon at hand will save me the trouble in the heat of a battle.

Lora turns her head back to look at me, having heard me sigh. I pull my mouth taut, in a half-smile. "It's nothing. Keep walking."

She nods silently and goes back to emoting at Silvia with her hands. I glance at a three-dimensional map floating in the air before me. The girls can't see it, as it's only visible to myself. Using the word spell "map", it turned out I could create a partial map of the nearby Labyrinth. Roughly ten miles in any direction, and what I can see is... astonishing.

Yama told me before about the Labyrinth. The scale is unimaginable, far bigger than Earth if it were hollow, and even sphere-like. The Labyrinth expands outward slowly, draining the essence of its denizens a trickle at a time. The Labyrinth's growth has decayed exponentially over its lifetime, starting rapidly in the early years, and slowing down over time, particularly since the demons were killed off in the past. With so few demons in the maze now, and it being thousands and thousands of miles in diameter, there is a definite limit to its edges.

I wonder what I would discover if I walked to the ends of the Labyrinth? That's a question for another day.

Silvia and Lora pause ahead of me as the dull walls of this place start slowly expanding out and the ceiling raises up. I glance at my map and raise an eyebrow. "The walls shifted again. It's almost like this place is a living, breathing entity. I feel as though this maze is taking us somewhere, to some destination."

"Yes. Walls open, walls close. Maze doesn't like humans."

Silvia offers some helpful commentary, and I glance at her from the corner of my eye. Lora can't speak or doesn't want to, so I never get information about her past. After the first time I probed her mind, I haven't wanted to go back in. Unlike Lora though, Silvia can speak, but she chooses to evade any questions I ask her.

It's frustrating, but given time I suspect she will open up to me. She, like Lora, has discovered the joys of pizza and soda, so I think she'll tell me about her past once the time is right.

"Yeah, you said it. I don't like humans either." I make some small talk and we press forward into the ever expanding area ahead. I'm surprised to see the moss from before when I first encountered the human commandos a few weeks ago. It appears sparsely at first, coating the floor around us, and eventually becomes thicker until the point I can't see the Labyrinth's dirt surface anymore.

I feel a sense of unease in my gut, before finally pausing. "You two go on ahead. I'll stay behind and follow, invisibly. If you see any humans wearing white armor, attack them. I will finish them off."

Both girls look at each other, shrug, and then turn back to nod at me. Then they take off walking again, both of them unsheathing their weapons... just in case.

" Invisible. Reptile. "

My body immediately begins to cool, and I feel a stiff breeze blowing around in this area that I didn't feel before. Being cold blooded means I'm much more acutely aware of the temperature in the room, and only now do I realize this place is rather damp and cold. It makes sense, given these are the sorts of conditions that would lead to moss growing everywhere.

The room is very dark, unlike the other time I encountered moss in a wide-open area. No darker than the rest of the Labyrinth, but due to its sheer size, the feeling is more ominous.

" Vision. "

I boost my visual acuity and quickly look in all directions. In the center of the room is, strangely, a large tree. A Weeping Willow, if I had to guess, though I'm no expert in botany. The long, thick branches, of which there are hundreds, indicate this tree is ancient. I remember reading when I was younger that there were trees known to be thousands of years or older, but this tree probably dwarfs even those. Its branches expand out hundreds of feet, and it has two trunks buried in the ground, with the second likely having grown out over time to support the weight of its branches. Much of the tree sags under the bulk of its leaves, and the feeling the tree gives off is something akin to a creepy longing for freedom.

How a tree could survive in darkness like this is a mystery to me, but my questions will go unanswered. The next things I spot are large pods, egg-like in nature, resembling something an animal would escape from. All of them are cracked and old, and already opened up from the top. Whatever things they once held, those creatures have long since left.

I rub my arms to try and warm them up, but the chill in this room isn't entirely due to the temperature. It has the smell of death in the air.

Up ahead, Lora and Silvia walk forward, with Lora holding her torch up high to scan for enemies. I'm just about to call them back and shake my feelings off as merely nerves, when a voice speaks out, masculine, brimming with age, and slightly robotic, possibly due to a voice filter.

"I knew you were coming here. I've been waiting days for someone to show up. Though... you are not what I expected."

A white suited commando falls from a spot up in the tree where the leaf cover had shielded him, and lands on the ground somewhat quietly. "A disguise, is it? Which of you is the Wordsmith?"

So he knows I'm a Wordsmith, huh?

I send a mental command to both girls at once. "Attack him now. I'll intervene when the time is right."

No hesitation. Both girls use the killer instinct I've been cultivating in them and charge at the man, ignoring his probing to try and finish him in one blow.

They will fail, of course... but it's what I will learn in the meantime that will be most useful to me.

Lora leaps at him and swings her sword down. He bats it away with his armored hand and punches her, but her armor protects her completely. Meanwhile, Silvia activates her invisibility and teleports behind him, using her enhanced strength to batter him from behind.

The man stumbles forward, not having expected the attack, before lunging his arm to grab at Silvia wildly. He misses, thanks to her ridiculous speed, and she pounds him again from the sides.

One fact begins to set in, as the three combatants trade blows... this man doesn't seem to be adept at fighting. I might be wrong, however.

I teleport up to the ceiling, silently, and mutter under my breath. " Adhere. "

Carefully moving around so as not to make noise, I keep my eye on this figure.

* * *

Lora and Silvia gasp for breath while I watch from a distance. By keeping my blood cooled and my body invisible, the white-suited figure hasn't seen me yet. He's occupied by the girls and their relentless attacks on him.

Well, their attacks were relentless. That was fifteen minutes ago. Silvia's invisibility has worn off now as she lacks the energy to maintain it. Lora is wheezing after a torrent of attacks the commando managed to defend against with minimal effort. Who's inside that suit? There is a field of energy surrounding his suit that blocks my magic, so I can't get a bead on his identity.

Suddenly the commando swivels his head up to look directly at me. "I see you, wordsmith. I know you're up there. Stop sending these children to me, or I'll make you regret that decision."

I stiffen and shiver, as the masked face stares at me unblinkingly. I can't see the man's appearance behind that tinted plexiglass helmet, but somehow I feel as if his eyes are burning a hole in my chest.

"You're good. Those suits are no joke." I hop down and land on the ground, keeping my distance from him. It's just one commando, but with that energy nullification effect active, if he grabs me, I probably won't be able to use my magic.

"The suit is merely a precaution. I have to be careful against another wordsmith."

The hair raises on the back of my neck. "You... you're a wordsmith as well?"

A tinge of confusion enters his voice. "Of course I am. Don't you know? You set all of this up to draw me here."

I grit my teeth and scowl at him, though I suspect he can't see my invisible body or my expression. "What the hell are you talking about? I did no such thing."

His head tilts, as if he's following my voice. Carefully, I move to his side and narrow my eyes as I realize he's not tracking my movements. "Of course you did. You attacked and nearly defeated a contingent of my elite forces. Do you think I'm stupid? No demon could have done that, and then subsequently held off against them once they activated the Containment Protocol. It was designed to be unbeatable. Hell, you were even toying with them during that phase, and then you left as if none of it mattered to you."

"I don't know what you're talking about." I speak up, and his head immediately turns to look at me. As I thought, he can't see me. I'm still invisible.

I notice something else. The energy field surrounding him will occasionally turn off for a split second before resuming. Each time this happens, he tracks onto my position again. Is he using wordsmithing to follow after me when I move? Why would he need to disable the field around himself if that were the case?

The only explanation I can think of is that he can't wordsmith while the field is active. Interesting.

An ounce of irritation sprouts in his voice. "Stop trying to size me up. Come out of hiding and let me see your face."

"Me? Size you up? I don't know what you're talking about. I'm just walking around."

"Of course you are. I'm millions of years old, child. I have dealt with many enemies. You've realized I can't see you, and now you're trying to figure out why."

I shake my head, even though he won't know I did. "Wrong. I already figured it out. Being unable to track me visually or by using heat detection is bad enough, but the final layer was sonar. That was the only way I could think of that the commando suits were able to follow me around in the end. Because of that, I made myself emit my own sonic pulses to jam yours."

"Smart." The man's gruff voice growls out the word. "I'll bet you're real proud of yourself for figuring that out."

"I do what I can."

In truth, I'm a little worried. Wordsmithing has so many practical applications that I can't defend against them all. It's unreasonable to try. I already realized that if Yama weren't lying and I did have to face another Wordsmith, words like 'kill' and 'die' would be the end of me, but there are so many other terms that do the same thing. My ultimate defense will end up being my physical regeneration, and my invisible armor. It gives me an edge.

The man shrugs, finally. "I tire of this. If you will not show me your face, I'll show you mine." He snickers to himself. "Heh, though doubtless you already know my identity."

I don't get a chance to ask what he means by that. His faceplate slides up, and I feel my gut wrench.

The face staring at me is my own. Older, much older. A few scars here and there, and plenty of hair everywhere, but my face nonetheless. I quickly realize that the voice I've been hearing all along was mine, albeit piped through a robotic filter.

"You're me? How is this possible?"

My words make the smile plastered across his face melt away. "What? What are you talking about?"

" Normalize. " My invisibility disappears, as does my lizard-like skin. His expression changes to disbelief, mirroring my own.

"Are you disguising yourself? Is this a practical joke?"

I curl up my lip at him. "I'm not disguising myself. If anyone is, it's you. I'm Jason Hiro."

He shakes his head at me and closes up his helmet. "Wrong. I am Jason Hiro, Supreme Commander of the United Earth Forces. You are an imposter. Though for what reason you choose to mimic my appearance, I am not certain."

"What?! You're copying me, almighty Wordsmith!" I gnash my teeth together and shoot a look over at Lora and Silvia, sending them a mental communication. Get back! I'll take him on myself! "I won't have you fuckers toying with my mind! Yama was right... you put me in that pod, and I don't even remember why!"

"Pod? What are you babbling about now? Never mind. It doesn't matter. You will submit to my authority and stand trial for the assault of my Golden Commandos, or I will force you to do so. It's the easy way or the really easy way. Make your choice."

My anger turns into a fleeting smile. "Ah, now your true colors emerge. You were acting like such a straight-laced shooter, I almost thought you were on the good side. Are you going to kill me, then? Throw me in a prison camp, like you did to the demons?"

He jams a thumb in his chest. "I saved their lives! Those demons should be thankful I am such a lenient and forgiving commander! However, whatever scheme they've concocted by summoning you, I won't forgive them this time."

"Tough talk for a 'supreme commander.' Let's see if you're as good of a fighter as your military title implies."

He charges at me, and I activate my invisibility and cold blood once again. I dash to the side and he swings wildly at where I had been standing, missing me entirely. When I look back, I catch sight of a massive battle-staff he pulled from out of nowhere.

"You think you can hit what you can't see?!"

"I can see you, every time you open your stupid mouth!" He hurls his staff at me with a flick of his wrist, and the speed catches me off-guard, smacking me in the chest and knocking me onto my ass.

"Oops, did I hit you? I thought you were impossible to see!" His voice is frantic as if he's suddenly excited to fight. "I'll try to take it easy on a rookie like you, even if I am a little out of shape!"

I feel his defenses slip for a moment as his head whips toward me. The energy fades away for just a split second, and I take my opportunity. " Die! "

The energy field reappears, and he laughs. "Good one! Predictable, too!"

"I figured it wouldn't work. I just didn't want to have to use my best move yet." My words sound almost apologetic, like I'm making excuses, but I'm not.

I have a weapon. It will surely work one time, I just don't know if he will be able to defend against it after that.

Telekinetically, I yank a pebble out of the pouch at my waist and aim my mind at it, but he's gone. Did he teleport?

A yelp in the distance. I turn to follow the sound, and spot him on the opposite side of the tree, holding Silvia up by the back of her neck. His massive hand wraps around her and holds her taut, even as she struggles to break free.

"Give it up, imposter. I have your friend hostage."

I stare at him coolly, the pebble still floating in midair. "Oh. I see. What do you think that will accomplish?"

He hasn't noticed the tiny rock yet. "If you choose to keep fighting me, I will kill her."

He stares at where I'm standing, but he can't see me, or the look of incredulity on my face. "So that's how it is, then? Taking a child hostage?"

Silvia whimpers as he tightens his grip, to the point where her body goes limp from pinched nerves. Her breathing slows down as she begins to lose consciousness.

"That's right. You wouldn't let an innocent child die, would you?"

Finally, I smirk and shake my head. "Ahh... you don't know a thing about me after all, do you? Alright, then. Kill her."

Lora turns to stare at me in horror, and the man's posture shifts slightly. "What?"

"Kill her. She got caught. Worthless. I didn't waste my time training Silvia just for her to become a hostage."

He hesitates for several long seconds before chuckling. "Hehe... I see how it is. Pretending not to care, acting cool. You care more than you let on, 'Jason'."

I shake my head slowly and sigh. "No, I don't. Just kill her."

His grip slackens slightly, and I can tell he's staring at me in disbelief. "I... I can't just... kill a child."

I normalize myself and become visible once again so that I can sneer at him. "Now I see the extent of your willpower. You're looking for an easy answer, aren't you? You thought this would bend me to your will. You think she gives you power over me? Not a chance."

Neither of us says anything for a few seconds, so I shrug nonchalantly. "Fine. If you won't do it, I will. Explode."

The look of momentary panic on Silvia's face doesn't move me. She was useless, in the end. A failure. Not even as valuable as bait.

Her entire body blasts into pieces, a fountain of blood and bone surging in all directions, coating the 'supreme commander' in her essence and making him stagger back a few steps in horror.

His guard lowers, and I finally spot my opportunity. Aiming my mind at the pebble floating before me, I speak again. " FIRE! "

Part 397b: Railgun

For several agonizing moments, I lose my ability to think clearly. The oxygen vanishes from the room, the air screams in pain, and space begins to warp. The lone pebble blasts forward at 99% the speed of light, leaving a wake of destruction in its path. The air superheats with a force not dissimilar to a tiny nuclear weapon, and the only reason I don't instantly die is due to the ultra-strong armor surrounding me.

I blink slowly and manage to dry tears from my eyes, tears that came unbidden due to the intense heat in the room. When I pull myself up, all the moss around me is charred black. It takes a few more seconds for my eyes to stop tingling enough for me to see, but I spot Lora smashed against a wall over on the far right side of this room. She isn't dead, which I can tell since my hearing can detect her heartbeat. She isn't in good condition either though.

My pain receptors finally activate, and I wheeze, glancing down to see dozens of severe burns covering my skin. It's a miracle I'm not dead. Already, my skin is healing itself using the regeneration spell I cast on myself a few weeks ago to repair the damage. I cast another healing spell just to speed up the process, and then treat Lora as well.

Now I can look for the Supreme Commander, and figure out what is going on here. As I stand, I gaze over to where I shot the pebble. Like the others I carry with me, it was a super-hardened, ultra-dense rock, weighing over a pound despite being the size of the last bone in my pinky. Using the pebble like a railgun, the damage I was able to cause with it was far greater than anything I could have expected. Possibly too great, though I had to be sure. I couldn't take a chance on testing it inside the labyrinth since that might draw unwanted attention. I also wasn't sure if I would survive, and I nearly died anyway.

The direction I shot the pebble toward is a mess. The entire wall is gone, and a hole the size of a truck stretches for miles into the distance. Only when I look closer do I spot the body of my doppelganger, lying in a pool of his blood.

I stagger over to him and stare at his trembling body. There's a hole in his chest, about the size of my fist, but no blood is pouring from it. The rock entered his armor, blew out his chest, and erupted through the rear armor, while the intense heat cauterized the wound. Of course, his body is charred beyond belief, but I smile to myself as I spot a finger twitching.

"You... aren't dead. Good..." My mouth feels like I've been chewing iron for a week, and my throat is dry like a cockroach on an open flame, but I can at least speak a little bit. "You will... give me answers..."

His faceplate slides open, and the broken face of a proud man stares back at me. His mouth opens and closes slightly, but no words are spoken. He can't talk since his chest has a giant goddamn hole in it. It appears he has the same regenerative powers that I do, but the damage he took was catastrophic compared to myself.

My smile increases once I realize the unusual neutralization field from earlier is gone. I can read his mind now, and he appears to also be adept in telepathy, which I find out as his voice arises in my mind.

Bastard. I can't believe I lost to someone like you... I knew I was rusty but... this was beyond my worst nightmares.

I lean back and pull myself into a sitting position on the ground beside him. You just had to come storming in here, huh? What did you think would happen? You didn't even put up a good fight.

A single pained tear rolls down his face. I've never seen another Wordsmith before. I didn't... I didn't know it would end like this. The demons have never been able to fight me on equal terms. It's not fair... who are you? How are you so strong?

I told you already. I'm Jason Hiro. I awoke in a cryopod a few weeks ago. Ever since then, I've been on a mission to find out what is going on in this universe.

A... cryopod? His eyes widen slightly before he turns his eyes away from me. He stays deep in thought for a few long moments before looking back. Humanity hasn't used cryo-freezing for millions of years... I don't understand how you came to be here.

You don't have to understand. Just give me the answers I want. My smile fades away as I sweep my gaze over his broken body. On second thought, you don't need to tell me anything. It would take too long, and I wouldn't know if you're lying.

He closes his eyes. So you're going to kill me, then? We shouldn't be enemies. We should combine our powers.

Kill you? Not until I get the information I need from you. I don't know how you became a Supreme Commander with such pathetic combat capabilities, but it's clear you're not adept at culling the filth.

His eyes shoot open, and he glares at me. Culling? I've never killed a soul in my life! I couldn't take someone's life unless it was absolutely necessary.

Oh? I raise an eyebrow in surprise. So you've never killed anyone in your entire life? That's pretty unbelievable, for a demigod with the ability to shape words into reality.

His arm moves a smidge, and he winces in pain. What would you know? You murdered... that poor little girl. She looked up to you. She followed your orders. How could you do such a thing?

I have my own ideals, Other-Jason. You were willing to use her as a pawn against me, ready to scare the living hell out of her and threaten her with death. The difference is that I was willing to follow through.

I bite my lip and realize how pointless this conversation is. I'm arguing with a weaker, inferior version of myself.

Lora walks up behind me and stands silently. I turn my head to look back at her, grimacing at how her face and neck have been terribly burned. No matter, I'll get rid of those soon.

"Do you hate me, Lora? I killed Silvia, after all. You can strike me down now, while I am weak."

She nods slowly and her hand goes for her sword but pauses as she wrestles with the decision inside of herself.

"Think about it. I saved your life. I healed you, gave you everything. I did the same for Silvia, but she failed me and paid the price. Don't you think it's fair that I took back my investment? If it weren't for me, Danis would have surely killed her anyway. All I asked in return for my generosity was that she be competent."

I turn my head back to the half-dead man in front of me and shake my head. "In the end, her most useful asset was distracting him with her death."

Stop agitating her. The Supreme Commander's voice speaks in my mind. She's in pain, bastard. You killed her friend right in front of her. Don't you care about the feelings of others?

I wheeze out a dry chuckle. Not in the slightest. Lora's just a tool for my own use.

His mental voice shakes in my mind. You're... not human. No man I know would speak like that, think like that.

I pause to consider my own thoughts on the matter. When did I start reasoning like this? Was it before I entered the cryopod? I was always a good-natured person before. Did something change me inside that icy coffin?

A faint whisper appears in my mind, reminding me of a battle I once fought. Well, it's more like a hallucination, since such a thing never happened, but it does make me feel very melancholic.

There's a shifting of movement to my side. I look up to see Lora, with her sword held up in a tentative fighting stance. Her knees are shaking, and her lip quivers as she digests the thought of attacking me.

"Are you going to do it? Don't keep me waiting. You're either loyal or you're strong. Weak, or a traitor. There's no easy answer here, Lora. Either show respect to the one who saved your life, or honor the memory of a girl you once shared a room with. What will it be?"

The sword shakes in her hand, and she even starts to lift it up, as if to make a chopping motion toward my head, but finally, she drops it and falls to the ground, clutching her chest as she stares at a bloody patch of grass nearby.

"Weak... but loyal. I see. I would have respected your choice either way."

My throat doesn't hurt as much anymore, telling me that my regeneration is really kicking in now. A quick glance at the hole in the Supreme Commander's chest tells me his wound is starting to heal. If I'm unlucky, that neutralization field will activate again, and I'll have to hit him with another pebble. I don't think either of us would survive that.

I reach over and place my hand on his forehead. I'm sorry, other-me. You have something that I want, and I need answers now.

Fine. Do what you must. I hope millions of years of memories make your brain explode.

I waver for a moment at that thought, but quickly shake the feeling off. I don't think this will kill me. At least, I hope not.

" Transfer. "

* * *

I open my eyes and stare at the ceiling blankly. Familiar black tiles greet me, as does the sound of people milling about in the distance. I know this place... I've been here before.

A shadow creature walks over to my right side, his chest barely above the level of the bed. I stare at him for several long moments before I register who he is. "Yama?"

"Correct." He stands silently for several long moments before speaking again. "I watched everything. It was delectable how you managed to nearly kill the Supreme Commander of the United Earth Forces with just took a single word, and even his impenetrable defenses couldn't stand up to you."

"Oh. Right." I lean up in bed and stifle a nauseous feeling, before turning to look around the small room. "Where is he? Where's Lora?"

"The slave girl is fine. She's sleeping back in your room. As for the Supreme Commander, I removed his armor and placed him in stasis. To think you were considering killing such a valuable hostage..."

"I was only considering. That didn't mean I was actually going to do it." I twist around and shimmy off the bed, cracking my knuckles and yawning as I do so. "How long was I out?"

Yama takes a few steps back as I stand up to my full height, towering over him. "Half a day, in human time. What you did was foolish. If I weren't there, the commander would have eventually healed himself, and you would have been an easy target. You were lucky."

I stare past Yama at the wall thoughtfully. "Strange. I tried to download his memories into mine, but I don't remember anything. My head hurts like sin, though."

"The human mind is an enigma. Give it time, I'm sure they will surface. In the meantime, we have had quite the fortunate series of events."

"Oh really? Do you mean the capturing of humanity's highest commander?"

Yama nods as we walk out the door, with him leading the way up the hall toward the direction of the dining area. "To an extent. However, we're doubly lucky. You look and sound just like the Supreme Commander, meaning you could even... take his place."

Now I'm surprised. "Take his place? You're saying you want me to lead humanity."

"You're a smart fleshbag." Yama mutters to himself for a minute, and soon we arrive at a doorway I haven't been to since I arrived here. When he pushes the door open, I'm greeted once more by tools and implements of various sizes and shapes, some of them being for construction, but others are for torture. Those aren't what catch my eye though. It's the large blue crystal that glows in the middle of the room, one with a young girl trapped inside, her long black hair trapped in various positions to and fro, her eyes closed as if she's accepted her fate.

And beyond the girl, there are other crystals in the room, each of them housing different humans, even a demon or two. One of those crystals has the Supreme Commander inside of it. He's grievously injured, and the hole in his chest has stopped healing due to the stasis effect, but I can tell he's still alive.

"What is this room? Who are these people?"

Yama raises a hand to silence me. "This is a distinctive room, one of my favorites. I've killed slaves for daring to peek in here, but it's time you learned of its existence. Here is where I house my final defense against humanity. I have captured a few of their greatest individuals, and I hold them here to use them as a bargaining chip, should humans ever press too greedily on my domain."

"Hmm. A good plan, I guess." I want to ask something else, but the way Yama lingers near the girl with the black hair, staring up at her face with a content look on his face... it disturbs me. "Is she someone important to you?"

He immediately snaps his head back to look at me. "It's none of your business. In any case, I wanted you to see the Supreme Commander for yourself. I will keep him here, and you will go and take his place."

I examine Yama incredulously for a minute before shrugging. "This is a terrible idea. I won't be able to convince anyone I'm him if I can't remember anything."

"Agreed. You had best get to scouring his memories, then. Go to sleep for a while, and maybe that will bring them swimming to the surface."

"Hmm." I grunt to myself and turn to stare at the man encased inside a crystal. He doesn't look like he's in pain now, and seems quite serene.

Finally, I don't have to work my ass off anymore. I can just sleep for a while, take a break. This isn't even a punishment, you idiots.

I feel a voice speak in my head, but it isn't the commander speaking to me. Instead, it's more of a feeling, like a memory from the past. Maybe I'm finally tapping into something from his memories.

"Sleep well, Commander. I'll take over from here."

I turn around and walk away, giving a passive wave at Yama as I do so. Neither of us says anything, as both of us hate goodbyes.

Several long minutes pass as I trudge down hallways and corridors, aiming for my room where Lora is waiting. I think about a great many things, including the battle, the past, and the future ahead of me. I don't know what life the Supreme Commander has lived, but his choices during our conflict tell me a lot about his character. He values the law, above all other things. I suppose if he were to assign arbitrary values to himself, they would be Truth, Justice and the American Way.

As I expected, from another me.

I walk up to my door and stop as I spot Lora sitting on the edge of the bed, her shoulders slumped, her armor in a pile in the corner of the room, and a somber expression on her face as she stares at the floor. The feeling she exudes is immediately apparent; depression. I killed a friend of hers in a very violent manner. Now she's going to sleep with me, and there's no way she will be able to look at me the same way ever again.

"Lora. I'll ask you again, do you hate me?"

She stays in the same position for several seconds before finally nodding slowly.

"I understand. Truth be told, I don't know why I killed Sylvia in the way I did. It popped into my head, in the heat of the moment. I won't apologize because that would cheapen her sacrifice."

I slowly walk over and sit down next to Lora, wrapping my arm around her back. She doesn't pull away. "What I did was wrong, according to most people's sense of morality. However, I have always said that failure is not an option. Do you understand that?"

She nods.

"Glad to hear it. I will do you a small courtesy, just this once. I'm going to make you forget about your friend. You will not forget her death, but instead, any relationship you ever had with her. She will just be a random nobody that I killed. In time, I'm sure you will look at her in the same manner as I do."

She pulls away from me and looks at me with a disbelieving expression.

"It's not optional. I just wanted you to know why I'm doing this... even though you won't remember in a few moments. You'll thank me later."

The irony doesn't escape me that I refused to remove her memories of her childhood, but my reasoning is different this time. Those memories should eventually shape her into a brutal, cunning fighter. The memories of Sylvia would only serve to weaken her loyalty to me. And that is unacceptable.

She pulls away from me, but I grab her arm and touch my hand to her forehead. "You're my slave. Never forget that. I give, and I take away. Forget. "

* * *

The four guards stand and stare down the hallway, as they always do during their shifts. Small talk isn't uncommon, but they usually lower their voices, and always keep their eyes peeled.

"My feet are killing me." Private Louse speaks up, shifting uncomfortably on his feet. "We should rotate shifts every two hours. Four hours or longer is just too much."

Another guy nods. "You said it. The darkness has a way of making your sanity slip away. Would it hurt them to at least give us some light?"

Both of them steal a glance at the warp gate in the rear. "Not like demons can activate it without the code. You'd think automated sentries would do the job."

"Cheh. I wouldn't trust a clanker as far as I could throw it. You know what the Volgrim have told us."

"You don't trust robots, but you believe alien propaganda? You're an idiot. The Volgrim just don't want us to advance AI because then we'll be a threat."

Another guy pipes up. "Quiet down. You guys never stop bickering, every goddamned day. Just once I'd like a shift where I get to sit and enjoy some silence."

"Piss off, Riker. You're a real creepy guy. You should learn how to talk more. It'd make you less of a loner."

The fourth guard raises his rifle slightly. "Something's coming. There's a blip on the radar."

"Shit." They turn and watch, before finally hearing the sound of footsteps. Two sets, One of the guards thinks to himself.

From the darkness, two pale armored commandos step out, walking casually towards them. Their body language doesn't show any sign of hostility, but the guards keep their rifles trained on the newcomers.

"Commandos, huh? State your names and ranks, as well as your expedition code."

Both figures walk slowly until they stop about twenty feet away. The commando in the front reaches up and his helmet slides open. "I am Supreme Commander Jason Hiro. I trust that will do?"

All the guards look from one to another in disbelief. "Uhh, with all due respect, we never saw the Supreme Commander enter the labyrinth. How do we know you're not a shapeshifting demon?"

The commander stares at them for a few seconds, as if he's pondering something, before finally stroking his beard. "Demons can't win against hypersuits. If I were a demon, I'd have to be powerful enough to kill a commando, and all the S-ranked demons are gone. But if you want more proof, I do have my biometric data."

He walks forward, and the guards quickly go over a few scans before pulling back in surprise. "C-Commander Hiro! We didn't realize you were here! Sorry about detaining you, sir."

"It's fine. I'm proud to call such efficient men and women part of my military. You'll go far in life." He grunts at them and his suit closes up a moment later, but one of the men glances toward the other suited figure. "What about that guy?"

"That guy is a VIP. I was here on a diplomatic mission, and I was able to rescue a civilian. I placed her inside of a hypersuit for her protection. I'm sure you understand."

"Right, of course, sir. We do need her biometric data to ensure she is, in fact, human, commander."

The commander crosses his arms and seems displeased, but finally, he waves his hand. "Fine. Go ahead."

A quick scan later, and one of the men raises an eyebrow in surprise. "She's 15% Goldeshian. Furthermore, she's part of... that sect. I thought we... err..." He pauses to stare at the Supreme Commander. "...ah, never mind. It's your business, sir. Anyway, you're cleared to pass."

"Naturally." The Supreme Commander pushes through and arrives at the warp gate as they fire it up for him. "I wonder what's in store for us now, Lora."

Part 398b:

"Supreme Commander Hiro, the UEF Mothership is cleared for landing. Please proceed to the designated docking point marked on your display in three minutes, five seconds."

The robotic voice speaks to me, and I fiddle with the display console commands. Every time I look at something or interact with a computer, a fragment of memory surfaces, allowing me to remember how it works. The 'Supreme Commander' indeed had many memories stored, but it seems they will only appear in my mind if I'm reminded of them by something external, like a comment someone directs at me about the past, or when I look at something he considered significant.

Lora sits in the seat beside me, and she's been silent as always during the trip. She seems cold and distant, ever since I erased her memory, but not unfamiliar. It's like she's avoiding me, but not intentionally. I've probed her mind and found no memory of Silvia, so it can't be that she hates me for any reason involving the child.

I scratch my chin thoughtfully while the ship slowly moves forward at impulse power to glide into its designated docking platform. Why did I kill Silvia? Yes, she failed me... but was that a good reason to do so? Something about my action was distinctly not something I would normally do. It was almost as if something or someone was influencing me.

Not that it was the wrong thing to do. Far from it, I just don't think I would usually waste a pawn for no reason. At least Silvia's death gave me the perfect distraction to take out the Supreme Commander.

I grunt and let the thoughts slip away. They don't matter. Silvia's gone, and even if I cloned her from my memory, she wouldn't be the same person anymore, she'd just be a mindless object.

Instead, I turn my attention to the hangar before us. Up ahead, several dozen people are clustered together at the platform my ship is aiming for. "Computer, can you zoom in on those people? I want a better look."

A single beep answers my request, and the screen zooms in to enhance. I stare blankly at them for a minute while the ship makes its landing corrections, and eventually the memories of each one bubble up to the surface, though I only get names and a superficial idea of their personality instead of any profound memories or life history.

Even despite these limitations, I quickly realize that the Supreme Commander never knew these people all that well. They're just low-level bureaucrats, and the word 'kiss-ass' comes to mind. I can probably ignore them and keep my cool, but I'll be polite, just in case.

Lora closes up her helmet, and I take mine off, though I keep wearing my hypersuit. I copied both of our suits from what the other Jason wore and repaired them to restore their functionality. I have to say that they're quite beneficial. The protection isn't much different from my invisible suit that I wear at all times, but somehow wearing something more akin to a light armor makes me feel more protected. It's nothing major, but it makes a psychological difference to me.

The ship lands and Lora and I make our way down the steps., One of the leaders steps forward quickly, but I notice a few of the others behind her flash a tinge of irritation at how she jumped ahead of the pack. "Supreme Commander! We're so glad you made it back safely! How did your foray into the labyrinth go?"

I keep my expression neutral, unsure if I should be friendly or curt. Best to play it safe until I get a better feel for how he interacted with other people. "Adjunct Denara, it's good to see you as well. My mission was a success, and I found what I was looking for."

Not a single person looks at Lora. She's just an ordinary bodyguard, too unimportant for them to care. Denara's smile sweetens, and she takes a few steps closer, closing the gap between us as I step off the docking ramp. "So the diplomatic effort was a success then? Were you able to finally find common ground with the demons? Or did they stubbornly cling to their warlike ways?"

Is that the cover story? The other Jason went there to fight me, so he must have kept my identity secret from everyone else. Why? Maybe he didn't know where my allegiances were directed? Even so, to lie to other world leaders...

"You know demons; they're so stubborn." I give a neutral answer, neither confirming nor denying anything, but I see the gears turning in her head as she makes my words fit whatever preconceived response she expected.

"Oh yes, of course we do! It was unfortunate, but demons will be demons after all!"

A man from the back steps forward. "Denara, please save some of the greetings for the rest of us. Commander Hiro, it is an honor to finally meet you. I am-"

I interrupt him. "Thomas Willard. Yes, of course. I have heard of you in passing."

My memories of the man are very faint, and judging by the fact he mentioned never meeting me, he and the other Jason must never have had any formal contact, though my knowledge of his background does hold more than I might expect from someone who is barely an acquaintance. The original Supreme Commander must have done his homework on every politician across the galaxy. He was very thorough.

Thomas grins at me. "I'm impressed! I hadn't expected you to know my name before we even spoke to each other! Do you have a retinal scanner, perhaps? That would be cheating!"

I smile pleasantly at him. "No need for cheating, Mister Willard. I didn't become Supreme Commander by being lazy."

More of the politicians in the back push up to speak with me, and I quickly hide a grimace. Truthfully, I don't give a damn about these idiots. They're just wasting my valuable time. I decide to make my move. "Apologies to everyone here, but I am exhausted. I have been away for a while and would like very much to head home and get some rest."

Disappointment crosses over all of their faces at once, but they nod universally, being very understanding of my situation. Denara coughs into her fist. "Sir, before you head home, there was an urgent matter to attend to regarding the Liarus system. I'm sure the acting Auxiliary Commander would have gotten to it, but your deft touch is always a bonus."

I nod slowly. "Alright. Thank you for the information. I'll just... uh... head to my..." I struggle to think of where I work, but Denara, ever the helpful one, fills in the blank for me.

"We sent the information to your assistant, Stephanie. It will be at your office."

"My office, right. Thank you, Adjunct Denara."

I quickly pull away from the group of people, and Lora follows behind me silently.

"Christ. This Commander is a busybody. He's just way too popular. I can't process all of his memories at once, and new ones are slow to arrive."

Lora simply nods as she falls into stride beside me, but I can't see her expression thanks to the helmet hiding her face.

I glance down at my wrist, where a holographic communicator is sitting. I tap it curiously, and nothing happens. A moment later, the other Jason's memories appear, and I realize how to use it. "Morris, where is my office located?"

The suit silently pops up a holographic map in midair, hovering above my wrist, with an arrow pointing to a direction forwards and to the right slightly, at an elevator shaft.

"Oh. Handy." I raise my eyebrows at the technological marvel and wonder to myself what a future tens of millions of years after I was born will be like. It must be a utopia if humanity is still around and no major wars are ongoing. Other than the demons of course, but even I can see the demons are a non-issue.

Lora and I step into an elevator, and it begins to descend to the planet surface beneath us. Earth awaits.

* * *

I switch off my holographic map once it points straight ahead down a hallway where my destination awaits. The space on the map is impressively big, so naturally, I'll be able to find it now that I'm on the same floor. It's a salaryman's dream come true; the perfect corner office.

A minute of walking passes, and soon I arrive at a desk where a young woman is sitting, her thin framed glasses sitting lightly on her nose as she flicks through her datapad. She's a frumpy young thing, wearing a plaid shirt and black slacks, and her black hair is pulled back into a tight bun. I stare at her for several seconds before she looks up and jerks back in surprise. "O-oh! Supreme Commander! I didn't realize you were back yet!"

Her name pops into my head, along with other details. "Stephanie, I see you've been... hard at work."

Mental impressions of disdain enter my mind. The other Jason thought his assistant was a lazy slacker, but he's always taken it easy on her because of her life circumstances. What a pushover.

"I'm sorry, Commander Hiro, I just didn't know you were coming back today! Your office is all cleaned up, so go ahead and head on in."

"I will." I continue walking onward and arrive at the doorway to my office, with Lora still very much in tow. I feel Stephanie's gaze filled with curiosity as she examines the person wearing the commando armor beside me, but she doesn't ask who the suited person is. Good, I'd rather not answer.

I stare at the door, but nothing happens. Every other door in the building opens automatically, but not this one?

"Uh, open. Activate. Engage." I speak, but it stubbornly stays shut. I start to ask Stephanie what's wrong, but a robotic male voice responds.

"You are not an authorized visitor."

Stephanie stands up at the desk abruptly, a look of worry on her face. "Oh shoot, the door isn't opening? I'm sorry, commander, just try using the override code. I thought the door was in perfect working order!"

I lick my lips and wait for a few seconds, and the activation code comes to mind. "Computer, I am Supreme Commander Jason Hiro. The override code is Delta-Niner-Tango-Omicron."

A low beep sounds off. "You are not an authorized person. Only the Supreme Commander may enter this room or approve visitors."

Stephanie quickly hustles over to me, a guilty expression on her face. "I'm sorry, Commander. Samuel's not usually like this. I'll have a maintenance crew investigate the issue as soon as possible."

A bead of sweat drips down my face. "Can you allow me inside, Stephanie?"

She stares at me for a few seconds, then blinks. "Oh, of course! You gave me clearance when you left! Sorry, I'm just so forgetful!" She quickly looks up at the ceiling. "Samuel, access please."

A cheerful beep. "No problem, Miss Guillermo! You are an authorized guest!"

The door whooshes open, and she takes a step back. "There you go! Sorry about the confusion, I don't know why he's doing this."

I shrug nonchalantly. "It's fine. Just make sure you get a maintenance crew on it. I don't want to go through this every day."

She nods, and Lora and I step inside the room, while the door closes behind us.

I take in the sights. It's a reasonably spacious office, with enough space to throw down two executive tables with dozens of chairs worth of seating room. The office window has a fantastic view outside, and I can see thousands of towering skyscrapers all around for miles and miles in every direction.

I am on Earth. It's been dramatically changed from before I entered my cryopod, but I can't mistake it for anything else. The sun beats down from outside, but the temperature controls have the room set to the perfect temperature. I walk over to my desk, tucked off in the corner, and beckon to a chair across the chamber. "Go have a seat, Lora. I'm going to try and figure out what the hell is going on."

She walks over and pats the seat in surprise, likely at how comfortable it looks, then sinks into it. I'm sure if she wasn't wearing her helmet, she'd breathe a sigh of relief.

I reach over to a terminal and tap on it, my fingers moving on their own as the other Jason's practiced movements show up in my memory. When the password comes up, I type on the floating keys without thinking about it. Rosebud. What a queer password.

A vast network of files appears before me, all of them sorted into neat categories and such, but I stare at them for two long minutes as I debate what to look into first.

Finally, I go for the one labeled State of Affairs. Pictures and images pop up as I quickly scroll past them. I quickly spot the current date, 45,153 L.Y. which means nothing to me. I already know from the other Jason's memories that he is several million years old, I just don't know precisely how long it's been since I entered the cryopod.

Several headlines grab my attention. Volgrim tensions are increasing. Mass extinction on Fennors II. Solar winds expected to double Dyson output for the next two centuries.

I read for a long while, but my head starts to hurt and soon I'm ready to fall asleep. There's just too much to process. The universe is in an entirely different place from when I was born. It's like I'm in the twilight zone.

The computer overhead makes an alert sound, and the previous Jason's memories of that ping tell me there's a visitor at the door. Christ, can't anyone leave me alone for once?

"Come in."

I wait, but nothing happens. Then I remember the issues with the door. I tap my wrist communicator. "Stephanie, can you let in whoever's at the door?"

She doesn't respond, but a moment later the door opens, and a redhead wearing thick brimmed glasses walks in, as Stephanie beats a hasty retreat in the background.

This time, my memory recognizes the person immediately. She's someone the other Jason interacted with on a regular basis. Marie Becker, the head of the engineering department. A veritable genius, it would seem.

"Miss Becker, great to see you again."

She pauses her walking toward me to raise an eyebrow. "Miss Becker? My my, aren't we formal today?" She casts a glance at my suit and then over to Lora sitting in the corner. "What's with the getup, and who's the stiff?"

I shake my head quickly. "Oh, come on, I just got back. No need for so many questions. I'm very fatigued."

"Uh huh... right." There's a hesitation in her voice as she once again continues walking forward, stopping a few feet from my desk. "I came as soon as I heard you were back. Have you gotten around to the Liarus request? They were asking for supplies and help to repair damage caused by the megaquake off their coast. The death tolls are in the thousands."

I glance down at my holopad on my desk, but see nothing on it. "I don't have that information. Wait, hold on..." I reach over and call Stephanie again. "Hey, Stephanie, did you send me the information on the Liarus system yet?"

There's a pause before her voice responds back frantically. "Oh my gosh! I'm so sorry! I forgot! I'll mail it to you right now!"

I roll my eyes and cut the line. A few moments later, my pad makes a ping sound as the information appears. "That woman... I tell you what..."

I look back up to see Marie staring at me with an odd look in her eyes. "Say, I was wondering, did you manage to find the other Wordsmith? You were gone much longer than anticipated."

I suddenly feel a chill go down my spine. She knows about me? I thought the Supreme Commander told everyone it was a diplomatic mission...

I quickly cough into my glove. "Heh, yeah, funny story. It turned out to be nothing. Just a demon we hadn't seen before. I took care of him."

"Oh? How... unlike you." Her eyes glow with a look I've never seen before, and she quickly speaks up. "Samuel, flush the property. Level 4 clearance."

I suddenly realize my error and jump up out of my seat, but it's too late as the entire room floods with that energy neutralization from before. I stagger back as a wave of nausea and agony overtakes me, making me trip over my chair and fall on my ass. My body begins to feel numb rapidly, and my head spins as well. "M-Marie! Stop! This is treason!"

From the corner of my eye, I see Lora leap from her chair and charge over at Marie, but the woman just taps something on her belt and Lora stumbles, falling face-first into the carpet.

"Shut up. Which one are you, and what did you do with Jason 12F?"

Part 399b: Source

A flash of movement to my side. As expected, the seated commando is in on this charade. I reach down and tap a button on my belt, which sends an emergency short range hypersuit deactivation signal. The Commando flops to the ground uselessly as his suit turns against him, giving me a comical moment that would make me laugh if I had a sense of humor.

I pivot to face the fake Jason. "Which one are you, and what did you do with Jason 12F?"

The fake groans in pain and clutches his stomach for a moment, but even then his arms flop to the side. He's losing control of his motor skills, and fast.

"Marie, stop this! We're supposed to be on the same team!"

He thinks I'm an idiot. How sloppy can this Jason get? Of course I'd be on high alert when the second Source Jason goes out to have a chat with an unauthorized arrival. Coupled with all the other signs, like being too formal with me, and the door not opening for him, it was all too obvious this wasn't 12F.

The question I have to ask is... who? Which version is he? Is he a B or a C? Dispatching a pacifist like 12F is the simplest thing possible, so it's not as if his combat capabilities have to be high. He didn't even know who I was, though, so how could that be?

"Why didn't you check in with me when you arrived here? You should understand proper vetting protocol."

He looks at me with those miserable, pleading eyes. I can tell... he hasn't a clue what he's doing. He's way too green for a Jason. I've seen some dumb variants, but I've also seen some terrifyingly intelligent ones. This one is different though. It's not so much a lack of intelligence, as a lack of experience.

"Protocol? Marie... I can't... you're killing me..."

I roll my eyes and flick a cigarette out of my shirt pocket. This is going to be a long day. I light it with the experience of tens of millions of years of practice, wasting no time. "Oh, I'm so sorry. I'll just go ahead and release the anti-energy field so you can have this attack dog tear me to pieces." I turn and kick the Commando in the gut, though I'm sure he didn't feel a thing.

Jason's eyes follow my foot. "Leave Lora alone; she's no threat to you!"

"Answer my questions, then. I couldn't care less about her."

His eye twitches and he looks away guiltily. "F-fine, you caught me... I'm not the Jason you know..."

Oh? He's learning his place quickly. "I already guessed as much. What I want to know is where you come from. No Jason would ignore the first contact protocol, it's important for maintaining continuity. You're either stupid, ignorant, or lazy."

Or all three. I keep that thought to myself.

He bites his lip and shoots a look over at the Commando on the floor. Does this Jason think she's going to rise to the task of saving him? The whole point of a hypersuit emergency shutdown is that it disables the wearer's brain signals. Not that I'd expect him to know that since even 12F didn't know about my back door kill command...

Finally, he looks at me. "I don't know what you mean. The other Jason attacked me, so I killed him. I'd barely even been awake for a few weeks."

I have an urge to shove this cigarette right up his ass. "You killed him...?! God fucking dammit- you idiot! Why would you kill him?! He was just there to find out what you were doing!"

Jason's body slumps even more. It appears he's going numb everywhere. "I don't know what you think he was doing, Marie, but he threatened the life of one of my allies, so I took action. I'm sorry he was your friend, but he was in my way."

I raise an eyebrow. "Friend? I wouldn't go that far. He was, however, a critical asset to me. How did you kill him, anyway?"

The little shit sneers at me. "I'll tell you if you turn off the radioactive death beam and let us talk like ordinary people."

"I'll consider that later." I rub my forehead and take a drag from my cigarette. "Stay here and don't cause trouble. I'll be right back."

"Bite me."

What a pleasant variant. He's so ill-tempered.

I exit the room, wait for the door to hiss shut behind me, and reach for my wrist-transmitter. Only then do I remember the assistant girl. "Oh you, over there. Woman with the black hair. The Commander says you can take the rest of the day off. You've earned it."

She was sitting in the chair staring at her holo-watch and chatting with someone out of boredom, but my words immediately brought a little life to her eyes. "Really? Wow, thank you so much, Miss Becker!" She perks up and quickly stumbles out of her chair, a stupid smile plastered across her face the whole time.

"Thank him, later. Go on, then." I watch silently as the bumbling fool grabs her Folding Belt, drops a few items into its vacuum storage, and then trots past me while humming a 'pleasant' tune.

"Have a great day, Miss Becker!"

"Sure."

Once she's out of eyesight, my eyes roll up into my head of their own accord. I despise menial discussions.

Her chair is open, so, hell with it. I walk over and plunk down, tapping a button and using my personal access code to activate the cameras in the Supreme Commander's quarters. Just in case he gets a little uppity and tries to make a break for it, I'll keep an eye on him. Cheh, like that would possibly work.

With another flurry of movement, I activate my dimensional transmitter and wait silently. The receiver in my wrist transmits for three minutes before someone answers the call. A voice identical to my own speaks back to me, which never stops being a tad unnerving.

"Marie 12F. You're not scheduled for a report for another six months."

"Perhaps I wanted to hear the soothing voices of my twin sisters." I grumble into the receiver. "Listen, I'm having a major issue. Jason 12F has been KIA'd."

Silence for five long, awkward seconds. "If this is a prank..."

"Do you think I'd risk calling HQ over an unsecured line as a joke? I don't even have time to get back to my office. It gets worse though."

"Go on."

"There's a new Jason in my office. He claims he killed 12F, but he's acting very odd. He didn't remember the first contact protocol, he's sloppy, and he barely even knows who I am. I suspect he copied 12F's memories into his own, and he was planning to take 12F's place before I caught him."

The other Marie swallows audibly. "That is very concerning. 12F was supposed to be a Source Jason. How could he have been killed? It could destroy the continuum if that were the case."

I lick my lips and tap my cigarette's ashes on the floor beside me absentmindedly. "I think... I believe... this new Jason might also be a Source as well. Just a hunch."

After a few seconds, HQ Marie cackles. "Hah! Now I know you're messing with me! Saint Helen on Earth, how long were you going to draw this out? We already recognize there can only be two Sources. Alpha Jason confirmed it himself, and three is just absurd."

"He did... I know that... but could he have lied? Would he?"

Another long pause. "You really think this is a third, seriously? Look, it isn't possible. All of the data points to two Sources. I refuse to believe it. He's one of the Travelers, and he's messing with you. That's all there is to it. Alpha Marie would have my ass if she found out I even entertained this silly notion."

"What if she's lying too? This could go deeper than we thought." I finish off my cigarette and stab it onto the assistant's desk. I don't care if it leaves a mark since the janitor bots will just clean up any messes later.

"So you think there's some elaborate conspiracy? I'll talk with the others and get back to you, but for now, you're on your own. If you think he's a third Source, then you'd damn well better treat him like one. No divulging information he shouldn't know. You already have Source training, so it should be a snap."

My jaws slackens. "Are you implying I should give him the red carpet treatment? He killed 12F! We have a delicate balance to uphold! This is the only universe where total peace is a possibility! Isn't that worth something?"

"Oh please, spare me the crap, Marie 12F. There's no such thing as total peace. The work camps alone are pretty heinous compared to what other clusters have achieved. Don't pat yourself on the ass too hard. HQ out."

My transmitter disconnects and I force myself to maintain my calm while watching the man on the screen shift around slightly on the floor.

All my work, everything I've put into this galaxy over millions and millions of years... I created the perfect diplomatic machine, and now some callous idiot is going to ruin it all. He's grossly inferior to 12F. I can't accept it. I won't!

I stand up and disable the video feed, then stride back into the room. Naturally, he's sitting there in the same spot as before, though now his head has lolled so far to the side that it looks like he's halfway napping.

He grimaces once he spots me. "I hope you had a good piss."

"Stuff it." I flash my middle finger at him before looking up at the ceiling. "Samuel, shield the flock. Level 4 clearance."

I don't feel any changes, but Jason's entire attitude shifts as he tries to stand up and instead falls forward on his face. He pulls himself back up by holding onto the desk, and then he stares at me questioningly. "You're... letting me go?"

"Not a chance. I've done some digging, and found you're a wanted man. If you ever want to lead a traditional life, you'll do as I say and take responsibility for your actions."

"A wanted man?" He rubs his arms and stands up a little straighter as the numbness wears off in his body. "You're screwing with me."

Yep. I smile inwardly. "No. I'm very serious. I never joke around. Since you killed Jason 12F, this galaxy will likely fall into instability, and I'll have a big mess on my hands. You're going to have to stand in for him and take his place until I can work out a more... permanent solution."

He scowls at me, and his body tenses up. "You mean prison."

"I mean many things. Your future is in your hands."

I notice something slowly hover up and in front of him. It looks like a pebble, though perfectly round in an uncanny way. A secret weapon, then?

He chuckles. "Maybe I should kill you now."

"Oh yes, by all means, try me. I think you'll find the others will not be as nice as I am. You have more enemies than friends right now, having killed a fellow Jason. If you eliminate me, the footage of my death and you speaking about killing the actual Supreme Commander will be broadcast to the rest of this galaxy, so every human, angel, and Volgrim will be your enemy. I recommend you tread carefully, insect."

A bead of sweat drips down the back of my neck. In truth, I don't know what this one will do. Something about him is unhinged compared to other Jasons. I'd rather not die and end up an angel as that would cause me a lot of grief, but one cannot back down when confronted by a god with childlike intelligence. It's better if I use my overwhelming intellect to make him doubt his perception of reality.

The pebble slowly lowers and enters a bag at his waist. Fascinating, I hadn't noticed that small cloth sack before. Are pebbles his primary weapons? I wonder how he uses them.

"Christ. You think of everything, don't you?" He gnashes his teeth and glares at me. I can already see he's going to be an unwilling participant, but I don't need him to be happy with my orders, merely compliant. "The other Jason thought highly of you. I keep getting flashes of the past whenever you talk."

"Ah, so you did copy his memories. That may have just been the most intelligent thing you've done up to this point. I won't have to educate you on every menial piece of the galaxy's political situation."

He crosses his arms and leans against the desk. "I didn't say I'd help. I don't stand to gain anything from this."

"If you flee, I'll have all of humanity hunt you down. If you kill me, I'll still have all of humanity hunt you down. You might not have anything to gain, but you have everything to lose."

I tap my belt, allowing the Commando beside me to regain consciousness. "You be a sweet girl and don't do anything idiotic."

It takes half a minute for her to start moving again, having been knocked out by the suit's defensive systems, but eventually, she drags herself up, and her faceplate hisses open. She doesn't say a word though, making me raise an eyebrow.

"No witty comeback?"

"Lora can't speak. The demons turned her into a mute." Jason helpfully fills in the gap for me, which makes me smile for once.

"She's already my kind of human. Someone who can't talk back is infinitely more valuable than one who blubbers."

A chuckle wheezes out of his throat. "Heh, funny, I had the same thought myself. Maybe we're not so different."

I glance down at my wrist-transmitter and note the time. "Don't get ahead of yourself. We have a lot of work in front of us. So, are you in, or do I have to put you in your place once more?"

He waves his hand flippantly. "I'm in. Whatever. It's not like I care. I just want to find out what's going on in the universe."

"Hmm. Right." I reach for another cigarette in my pocket, but pause and sigh. I don't want to waste these. They take too long to grow. "I do have one last question for you... you mentioned only being awake for a few weeks. What did you mean by that?"

Jason pulls away from the desk and walks toward Lora. "I woke up inside a cryopod a few weeks ago. It was inside of the Labyrinth, and I managed on my own for a short while until the demons took me in."

"Oh. Well, that just raises even more questio-" I catch myself mid-sentence and remember something from a very long time ago. "Wait... a cryopod..."

My god... I might be right. If he emerged from a cryopod, it's possible he could be a Source after all. Everything my fellow Maries have been told could be a lie. What are the other possibilities? A clone? A memory wiped Traveler? A demon fake? All could be true, but a second Source might be the case as well.

I don't have all the required information. I need to do digging to find out where he came from, but I can't let on how important he might be. If he knows I can't kill him, he's liable to be a loose cannon.

This puts me in a tough position. "Jason, I'll let you get back to doing... whatever it is you feel like. For now, I just want you not to be irresponsible. The Supreme Commander has many allies, but also many enemies. Keep on your toes. I'm sure you already know how to contact me, so just ask if you have questions. I'll be in touch."

"If I must." He waves his hand at me dismissively. "See ya."

"So polite." I turn and walk out of the room, secretly wondering to myself if I've made a mistake in leaving him to his own devices.

After I've walked down the hallway a bit and I'm far from earshot, I speak up towards the ceiling. "Samuel, let the hive know if the bees whisper."

The computer chimes audibly. "No problem, Head Engineer, Marie Becker!"

I need to find the cryopod he woke up from. It holds the answers.

* * *

Steven Feldmann relaxes in his apartment as he watches the local cluster's news network. Absolutely nothing of interest is on, so the anxious looking reporter is being forced to stretch the local weather report into a twenty-minute time-slot.

Feldmann adjusts his robe as he lounges on his couch. What's the point of telling me the weather, anyway? It's always the same. That's the whole point of the Atmospheric Conditioners. This guy's just wasting his time, not that I can blame him.

Finally, boredom takes over, and he climbs off his couch to go stare out at the same generic sunny day that he's seen a billion times, quite literally.

Everything feels so empty, these days. The kids are all grown up, the wife isn't here half the time, the demons are a pittance of a threat... the meaning of life is so hollow, in the end. Nothing matters.

He paces into the kitchen, and both of his cats jump up on the counter and meow at him, but he pushes them aside and starts to assemble the ingredients for a tasty chicken vegetable soup.

Home-made. That's the way to do it. Not using these worthless food reconditioners. Who wants to eat recycled gunk anyway? If I want to stuff some guy's shit in my mouth, I'll find a public toilet.

He taps a button to close his windows, just in case a probe drone happens to pass outside. Even if he's caught using fresh vegetables, the punishment will be fairly minor, but it can't hurt to be careful. As a military general at the highest level of government, it would be a devastating blow to his career to be caught committing even a petty crime. He might be demoted and never have a chance to recover his status.

He glares at the avocado in his hands, before carefully cutting the core out of it. You'd think they could make exceptions for people at the top of government, but nooo, the Supreme Commander thinks everyone should be equal. What a joke. I don't even know why I try to be competitive anymore, other than the fact I used to enjoy the view from my balcony. I probably just don't want to end up in the lower level apartments. I hear the smog has gotten worse, as if that were possible.

He begins ripping out the good stuff from the innards of the vegetable, but his personal AI gives him a special alert.

"General Feldmann, there is a high priority call on the line for you. Will you take it?"

He grumbles audibly but sighs and sets the avocado down. "If it's high priority, I have to. Put it on- wait, give me a second."

He quickly shoves the vegetable behind a box on his counter before looking across the counter to his main viewscreen. "Okay, now."

The viewscreen switches and a black haired young woman appears. A look of satisfaction appears on his face. "Ah, Stephanie Guillermo. It has been a while, hasn't it? You must have something to report."

She bats her eyes and smiles sweetly. "Oh yes, I certainly do. As you probably know, the Supreme Commander took a vacation recently."

"Mhm. Continue."

She leans forward and winks knowingly. "Well, as it happens, Commander Jason came back today, and something was very off about him. He was acting out of the ordinary. At first, I thought he was drunk, but now I'm not too sure. The door to his office didn't recognize his biological signature, and when I let him in... Marie Becker showed up shortly after and went in to see him."

Feldmann nods and reaches for the avocado, not caring if the woman on the screen sees. "You think something's going on?"

"I know it. I've worked for the Supreme Commander for years. Marie Becker sent me home, so I didn't get to see what happened next, but I suspect there might be collusion of some sort. I can't offer any details as I wasn't privy to their conversations, but..."

"No no, that is good enough. That wouldn't be the only odd thing that's happened this week. Admiral Danis was acting differently at all three meetings between the joint chiefs. He felt hollow, as if he wasn't really in the room with the rest of us. It was just a feeling, but this..."

He reaches for a carrot and starts dicing it up. "I'll have the next crate dropped off at the usual place. Good work, Steph. I'll continue counting on you, in that case."

He turns his attention back to his food but quickly realizes she hasn't hung up yet. "Is there something else?"

She fidgets slightly. "If possible, can you make sure there are cherries in this next shipment? I've been craving them lately."

Feldmann smiles knowingly at her. "If you keep delivering, so will I. Sayonara."

"Thanks, Steven. You're the best." The line clicks off and Feldmann shakes his head.

What is this, revenge of the bodysnatchers? Something ain't right on Earth, but I'll make it work the way I want it to.

Part 400b: Stranger In A Strange Land

Earth, 45,153 L.Y.

These are numbers that mean nothing to me. I am a part of the future, now, a place where fantasies become a reality. Starships, warp travel, and stratoscrapers that extend miles into the air, almost past the atmosphere itself. The future is a place where all humans are immortal, all diseases are cured, the sky is no longer the limit, and the next advancement is always just over the horizon.

Lora and I amble down the hallway, then step into a futuristic elevator, and a moment later my heart is in my throat as it plunges downward at a terrifying speed. I flinch when I look through the glass floor at the surface of the Earth, miles below us, as it slowly approaches. Behind me, however, the walls of the building where I work at speed past so quickly I can hardly parse their movement. To the sides, I spot hundreds of other glass elevators- no, wait, the memories from the other Jason tell me they're called hover-shafts... anyway, hundreds of other hover-shafts zip past, moving up, down, even a few move sideways too.

Lora has her helmet open, and I shoot a glance over at her. She eyeballs everything around her with the same level of surprise and awe that I do. Despite living in this time, perhaps she lived with the demons her whole life and was never able to experience any of humanity's marvels. A shame.

The shaft slows to a stop, and the door opens up, allowing a thirty-year-old looking woman to step aboard, and based on a mental ping from the other Jason's memories, she seems a little familiar. She immediately salutes when she notices me. "Supreme Commander."

"At ease." The words come out almost mechanically as if they are part of my daily routine. They aren't, of course, it's just the other Jason's memories taking hold. It irritates me to think that he might have any sway over my actions after I defeated him so handily.

I try to ignore the woman, but she seems to want to talk to me, and she keeps glancing between Lora and I. Finally, she gathers the courage and speaks up. "I wanted to thank you, Commander Hiro. What you did for me was very kind."

"Mmm." I grunt quietly and scan her face. Finally, her name appears in my head. "Elsa, wasn't it? Where's the other guy? There was a man with you last time."

She frowns and glances down toward the glass floor beneath us, her brow furrowing as she thinks about it. She looks back up and shrugs. "You mean Brian Andino? He died."

"Oh. Sorry to hear that." I try to force my expression into something compassionate, but fail. I don't care in the slightest what his fate was.

To my surprise, neither does she. "Don't be. I warned Brian over and over not to fool around near the catwalks. Sure enough, he slipped and fell. His body was a puddle on the ground when they found him."

Lora moves slightly, and I turn to notice her dark expression, as she grimaces at this awful news. Even she's more human than the two of us.

I cough into my glove. "Still, losing a friend like that, wouldn't you say it was unfortunate? You don't seem very broken up about it."

She smirks. "I saved a life on the battlefield. That man would have been a loss to the republic. He was a hard worker and fought with his all for the glory of humanity. Brian, however, was a slacker. He's in Heaven now. He'll probably enjoy it more anyway, given he was never really all that interested in working like the rest of us on Earth."

I nod sagely and turn to stare out at the other stratoscrapers in the distance. "Maybe someday, you'll get to see him again."

"Oh, I already did." She leans back against the glass and gestures up to the sky. "Went to visit him in Heaven. He's doing fine. Gave him an earful too."

I take a few moments to blink back confusion as I wonder what she's talking about. "You went to Heaven? Isn't that... a little..."

"Difficult? Not really. I haven't spent my visitation credits for a few thousand years. It used to be harder, but they passed an edict in the last century allowing people to visit with fewer restrictions."

Her response isn't what I was expecting. "O-oh." My mouth gapes for a few seconds, but when I look away, more memories appear in my mind.

Of course, it makes sense now. Heaven is a real place, just as Hell is. It's in another dimension, so visiting it is easily possible if a link is established. All of the details haven't come to me yet, but I feel as if I already get the gist of things.

I scratch my chin and look away nonchalantly. "I've been busy lately, so I might be forgetting something, but can you remind me the state of affairs in Heaven? I just don't have the time to spend learning about the more... mundane things in life."

Elsa nods and smiles at me with a cheerful grin. "Oh, certainly! Well, you might not remember, but about two thousand years ago, Zeus opened up his borders, and now angels can leave Heaven and visit Earth whenever they like. Of course, most don't, due to the shame involved, but-

I interrupt her. "The shame?"

"Yes. After all, an immortal who dies must not have been very intelligent. Death is quite easy to prevent and avoid these days. We don't need people like that clogging up the queues and waiting lines for more competent people. Wouldn't you agree?"

I smile back at her pleasantly. "Yes, actually. The strong deserve more than the weak. Those who carry the biggest load should reap the biggest benefit. That is a fair assessment."

"Humanity's motto hearkens to something similar, commander."

"Oh?" I keep my expression measured, but something in the way she brings that up makes me want to know more. "How so?"

"Don't you remember, commander? I believe you came up with the slogan. ' For glory, we aspire. Perfection, we achieve. Waste, we prevent. Failure, we despise. ' A slogan worthy of the might of humanity."

She looks at me questioningly, and I shrug. A quick glance at the hover-shaft's floor-counter indicates we're nearing the bottom. Finally. "Uh, that slogan was created by a good friend of mine. I thought it worked well for our glorious empire, so I made the council adopt it."

"That's proof of your leadership! A good boss always listens to his subordinates." She reaches up and pulls back a strand of hair that had sneaked out from behind her ear, then smiles at me before looking over at Lora. "Speaking of subordinates, your friend hasn't said a word since I got on."

Lora stays silent, as expected. I fill in for her. "This is Lora. She has a rare condition, so she'll be getting an operation to fix that. Can't talk until that happens."

"Oh. It must be pretty severe." Elsa lowers her gaze apologetically. "Sorry for bringing it up."

The hover-shaft begins to slow as the bottom approaches and she quickly clears her throat. "Um, anyway, I'm just glad I got to see you again. You put in that word for me, and now I've moved up fifty levels in my complex. We have real food now, though it's only bi-weekly. I had grown so used to rations that I forgot what an apple tasted like!"

I resist the urge to ask what she means. "No problem. Glad I could... help. What was the medal for, again?"

"The medal of courage. Don't you remember?"

I shake my head as the door opens. "I'm just swamped lately. There's a lot on my mind. Have a pleasant day, Elsa."

I beckon with my head slightly, and Lora follows after me out the door. Once it closes, I turn back and watch the lift descend even further. It vanishes from my sight quickly, but we're close enough to ground level now that the only place it could be going at that speed is underground.

The sight outside is unimaginable. I would never have thought as a child that humanity could build such massive skyscrapers. The fact they're called stratoscrapers makes sense. They go far up into the clouds, way beyond a reasonable height. And from the ground level, they fill me with a sense of foreboding, as if a single terrorist bringing one of them toppling down would level the area all around us. Hundreds of them are visible across the landscape, all of their positions plotted out with almost robotic efficiency. How many people live just in a fifty-mile radius from where I stand? A billion? Ten billion?

Humanity has accomplished a lot during the millions of years since I sealed myself away. I feel as if the humans I know now are more alien to me than actual aliens from the TV shows of my youth.

When I turn back to slowly amble down towards the location indicated by my wrist-watch holographic tool thing, whatever it's called, I spot something even more bizarre. Thousands of people are walking around, moving from here to there, all of them looking very busy in general. But scattered in among the humans are... well... angels. I've never seen an angel in my life, aside from literature and television, but without a doubt, they are emphatically what I would imagine angels look like. Their bodies glow slightly, their wings spread out several feet in either direction, and they have a distinctive holy aura about them.

Oddly, wherever an angel stands or walks, people move around them, going out of their way to avoid even the slightest contact. It doesn't look intentional, but more like something trained at a subconscious level. Every human does the same thing. Discrimination? Perhaps something more?

Elsa's words pop back in my mind. Most don't leave Heaven due to the shame involved...

Is it shameful to be an angel? How could that be?

My knowledge of the world around me is fragmented. I'm missing bits and pieces, and even whole chunks of information. I still need answers.

Lora and I continue to walk, but finally, we come to a stop, and I scratch my head. Where should I go?

After a long half-minute or so, I pull my watch forward and activate the communicator on it. "Contact Marie Becker."

The computer on my wrist beeps its acknowledgment, and ten seconds later she picks up, audio only. "What do you want? I just left, and already you're bugging me?"

"Yeah. I don't know where I should go."

Her voice has a distinct feeling of annoyance in it. "Did you consider maybe going home? That is, to Jason 12F's residence?"

"I suppose I could. Doesn't quite feel right, though."

"Well, you'll have to deal with 'your' wife when you get there. Sarah and Jason 12F were married for ten million years or so, as part of their official union. Naturally, they've seen a few thousand other people over the eons, but suffice to say their marriage is quite stable, all thing considered."

I nod thoughtfully while vacantly watching people mill around. "So, like, an open marriage? What about 'Until death do you part', actually, never mind. Immortals."

I can practically hear Marie roll her eyes and nod. "Yeah, yeah. Marriage is a fossilized idea from before the age of nano-technology. Honestly I don't know why Jason 12F even bothered, it's just a formality that doesn't mean anything anymore. Anyway, I'm sure Sarah won't mind if you bring the redhead home with you."

Lora and I both shoot a look of concern at each other. "I don't know, Marie. Can you arrange lodging for Lora some other way? I'd rather not cause any drama in, err, 12F's life... not until I can understand what's going on."

A long sigh. "Saint Joseph and the Holy Grail, do you expect me to do everything for you? I can't be bothered to--"

There's a sudden pause as if an idea blasted into her mind. "...On second thought, I have a plan. I will let the female lodge with me. Keeping her existence a secret will be tough for you, and might even cause you some problems. Jason 12F was gone for over three weeks, after all, and he was only supposed to be gone a few days. Sarah might be annoyed when you show up with a new woman, and she'll inevitably ask questions."

"Oh. That's very kind of you to offer." A feeling of worry fills me with dread. This is almost too convenient. Marie doesn't seem like the kind of woman to offer her help so honestly... maybe she has something to gain from this. "In fact, that's overly kind of you. Why are you so nice all of a sudden?"

She scoffs audibly. "Cheh! Here I am offering to do you one little favor, and you're acting like I'm about to steal all the Luciferium in the Nixus vault! If you didn't want my help, you shouldn't have called!"

I wince. "Fine, fine. I was just asking. So... I'll go home, and you take Lora with you. Is that it? No funny business?"

"I own you, Jason. I don't need any funny business. One of my associates will be there to pick her up in twenty minutes. Stay put, please."

"Give me a second, and I'll try and tell you where I'm located." I start to look around for signs or something, but she laughs.

"Hah! No need for that, I already know. I always know where you are."

My eyes narrow as I stare at my wrist transmitter. Marie irks me. Getting a handle on her personality is hard.

"Fine. We'll wait. Jason, out."

The communication cuts off, and Lora and I sit on a bench nearby to wait for whoever it is that Marie is sending.

Lora fidgets slightly as a few minutes pass. She doesn't appear keen to leave my side, but it can't be helped. I could use some rest after the mental beating I took from Marie earlier and meeting the woman my doppelganger chose to marry might give me more answers about his personal life. If the worst happens... I can always kill her. This 'Sarah' means nothing to me.

Minutes pass, and Lora is looking more and more anxious. As we wait, an old man hobbles over to us, a sickly patch on an otherwise perfect medley of the ideal humans. While everyone else that passes us and roams around look like men and women in their 30's, the prime of their lives, this grandpa must surely be on death's door. He's dressed in rags too, not at all a sightly figure.

"E-excuse me, boy, might you be willing to let an old man sit? My knees are killing me." Indeed, his legs are trembling, so I nudge Lora to make some room on our bench. He comes over and sits down on the edge, breathing heavily the whole time. It's as if he ran a fifty-mile marathon. I'm just glad he doesn't smell like the embodiment of death.

"You uh... okay, old timer?" I lean away from him slightly as he sways back and forth.

"Yeap, I'm doin' just fine, kid. How about you? You look like you've got a lot stuck in your chaw."

"My chaw?" I stare at him blankly, and he points to his forehead and taps. "Oh. Yeah, I suppose so. I'm the Supreme Commander, you know."

He narrows his eyes and squints at me for several seconds before returning to normal. "Huh. Guess you are. So what?"

He's completely unimpressed by my title. Then again, I'm not even sure what a Supreme Commander does, so I understand the feeling. "Just felt like mentioning it."

"Titles don't amaze me when you spent your life hurtin' people. I ain't a hypocrite though. I did some stuff I regret in my youth. Hurt some folks, broke some laws. Can't take it back, either."

"That's unfortunate." I spare a glance at my watch. There's still ten minutes to go, if this courier person is punctual. I'm probably not that lucky.

"Unfortunate, indeed. And for all the bad things I've done, I live in a society where all my material needs are met. Unfair, ain't it?"

"Unfair? What do you mean?"

My question makes him gesture wildly with his hands. "Look around you. Every one o' these sad sacks has no life ahead of 'em. They're zombies. Even so, they and I get to live these wretched lives, while the people I hurt didn't. We get to choose our deaths when the time comes."

"When you say you 'hurt' people, you mean..."

"Killed, yes. Killed them dead. They took a dirt nap they ain't never gonna wake up from." He reaches up and pulls at the loose skin on his face. "I'll be joinin' 'em soon. A man can only live so many lives before the evils in his past catch up to him."

"You believe your past should decide your future?"

"Of course. It's called karma, son. You reap what you sow. Old fashioned thinking, that's what anyone would say nowadays. I don't think so. Look at every smiling face around us. All of these people have done bad, vile, evil things. The only difference is the degree to which they've committed their crimes. See what I mean?"

I shrug. "Yeah, sure."

He grows silent and doesn't speak for a long thirty seconds. Finally, he coughs. "Welp, that was a good chat. You ain't like the drones all around us. Got a mind of your own, you do."

"I try to stay alert." I nod diplomatically at him. "Thanks for the talk as well, err...?"

"Lee. Name's Lee, kid." He nudges my shoulder with his. "You 'n Lora keep to yourselves now, y'hear? Don't piss the wrong people off. I wanna see you still runnin' the show a week from now. Take care."

He stands up and starts ambling away, leaning on his staff the whole time as I watch.

There's something about that old man. I feel a sudden urge to know more about him. Hesitantly, I reach out with my telepathy and try to read his mind before he leaves my range...

GET OUT OF MY HEAD.

A voice rages in my mind. Images of explosions, children screaming, a man being eviscerated by a beast I've never seen before. A war, bloodier than any conflict the universe has ever seen. Strange automatons firing lasers faster than the human eye can follow. Let her go! A little boy sobs as his mother's head is torn from her body.

Images hit me in a way similar to when I read Lora's mind, but far more brutal. In just a single second, my entire body is drenched in a cold sweat, and my hands shake in terror. When I scan the crowd to look for the old man, he's gone.

Before I can ask Lora where he went, a deep voice speaks to my side. "You're Jason Hiro?"

"Huh?" I turn, wild-eyed, to face the speaker. A black-skinned man I've never seen before, with dark black hair and wearing a sharp pinstripe suit, stands out as an elite among the humans around us. "I'm Benjamin Brown. I work for Marie. She sent me here to pick up an asset."

I quickly mop my forehead and twirl around in bewilderment. "Yeah, uh, did you see where that old man went?"

"...Huh?" Benjamin seems irredeemably bored. "Look, just give me the asset. I have work to do."

I finally comprehend his words. "Oh, right. Lora is the girl; she's right here." I point at her. "Marie said to-"

"I know what Marie wants." He grabs Lora forcefully and pulls her out of the chair with a single hand, standing her up before letting go. "Come on, then. You're wasting my time."

Without waiting for a response, he turns around and walks away. Lora turns to look at me, panic evident in her eyes.

"I can see he's an asshole, but bear with it." I stand up and continue looking around. That old man is nowhere in the area, and Lora is the last thing I care about. "I'll see you tomorrow, or whenever. Remember your training, and ditch that armor as soon as you get a chance. I'm sure Marie used it to knock you out. You're still way stronger than an average human, so you can defend yourself."

Lora nods meekly and turns to walk away, but pauses to look at me, a strange longing in her eyes. The moment passes, and she timidly turns and follows after the man.

I hate dramatic goodbyes.

* * *

Huh. So this is it. Room 1, the penthouse suite. Apparently, I own the entire top floor of this megascraper, or rather, the other Jason does. When I look up through the plexiglass ceiling, the blue haze of Earth's atmosphere isn't visible. Unlike the Stratoscrapers, which can reach 50 miles in height, Megascrapers top out around the ten-mile mark, and this one is the most elite of them all, housing the vast majority of humanity's military generals. Everything I look at gives me memory feedback, giving me clues about this and that.

The floors are made of a beige-colored rocky surface, not unlike marble, but somehow even more radiant and beautiful. There isn't a speck of dust to be seen. The walls have been chiseled from limestone, and while most are white, several segments of the walls have artistic patterns colored red, green, and even black. One such pattern depicts a young girl wearing a sundress, colored green, reaching out to touch the claw of a great black dragon. It's foreign in nature, yet I feel as though it's not unfamiliar.

I shake the thoughts from my head and walk forward to knock on the door, catching myself just in time to realize that knocking on my own door would be fairly asinine. Luckily, this door recognizes me, unlike the door to my office, and swishes open silently.

I step inside and examine the entryway that leads directly into my living room. It's a massive space, with a viewscreen running the planetary news which takes up an entire wall, a disgustingly expensive looking glass table that must have cost a fortune, and a large variety of seating implements, none of which look anything like what I'm used to.

I've scarcely started to take the decor into my brain when I hear a deep growling sound to my side. I turn to follow the noise and spot a- SWEET SATAN FATHER IN HELL that is one big goddamn dog! An immense black mutt, half the size of an Oldsmobile, with ten beady eyes that are almost spiderlike in appearance, slowly inches toward me from the doorway. His teeth are razor sharp, and each individual claw on his foot is the size of a butcher knife. I might be wearing invisible armor, but this fucker still looks like he could tear me limb from limb.

Just when I've taken him in, the son of a bitch jumps at me. I teleport across the room instantly as a fight or flight instinct takes hold. The hellhound howls at the top of its lungs and five of its ten eyes track onto my position. My heart races and terror takes hold. I've already faced down demons and squads of armed infantry, but nothing prepared me for a monster from the scariest science fiction novels back in my day.

Just as the nightmare beast is about to attack me again, a sweet voice calls out from the other room. "Skippy, what's the matter? Is someone at the door?"

The animal continues to stare me down ferociously but doesn't move a muscle. The voice's source finally enters the room and my mind instantly connects her name to her face. It's Sarah, my lovely wife. Well, the other Jason's wife, but who cares? She's wearing a white satin see-through negligee that shows more than one would normally expect, and my god, she is possibly the most gorgeous looking woman I have ever seen in my life.

I'd be firing on all cylinders plus one if it weren't for the contrast with the horrifying demonic spider-hound that stares me down. I don't know whether to be completely aroused by her or totally frightened by the animal.

She stares at the monster, perplexed for a moment before spotting me. "Oh, Jason, you're finally back! Skippy, you silly willy! That's just daddy!" The animal doesn't back down, and even takes a menacing step towards me, as if it can tell I'm an imposter. Indeed, it is entirely correct.

I could kill it instantly if I wanted. Just one word, even just a hint of telekinesis, and this beast would be downed instantly. But in no way do I wish to upset the woman before me. If I have ever had one single overriding desire as a male, I yearn to taste the honey that falls from that beehive. If killing this disgusting malformed beast would even slightly upset the chance of that happening, I will make sure it lives a long, happy life.

While I think these thoughts, Sarah zips over and throws herself at me, pulling my face to hers and kissing me long and hard. It takes no effort for me to respond to the stimulation and force myself on her, nearly toppling on top of her and falling to the ground. Luckily, the sense of terror in the back of my mind from the werewolf wannabe keeps me from completely losing my sanity as our tongues intertwine.

It takes nearly a full minute, but finally, she pulls away and breathes hard. "Wow, I missed you soooo much! You said it was only going to be a few days! What happened?"

I blink and try to restore a sense of normalcy to my mind. A question. She was asking a question, right. Doing? Me? In the labyrinth? What was it again?

"Uhh, things took a while to resolve. Some crazy stuff happened."

A generic answer, but it seems to be all she wanted to know. "Oh, excellent, I was starting to worry you ended up a casualty or something! Come on, make me some food! I am starving for something edible!"

"Huh? Food? What do you mean?" I glance down at her chest and feel like saying something akin to forget the food! I want to taste you! but the pouting look on her face snaps me back to reality.

"Just wordsmith 'lasagna' or something! I can't keep eating rations like a commoner, you know! You told me we'd always have the best!"

"Oh... right..." I aim my mind over at the table and mentally picture the most delicious pile of meat, sauce, and cheese a man could ever hope for. " Lasagna. "

She squeaks in glee and dives for the table, yet her movement is graceful, almost angelic. Completely ignoring any thought of grabbing silverware, she begins jamming her hands into the concoction and piling the lasagna into her mouth, and immediately my opinions about her beauty and grace are rudely interrupted.

Food turns into chewed food in a manner of time equivalent to microseconds. In less than a minute, Sarah has stuffed half of the lasagna inside of herself in the most disgusting piggish fashion I've ever seen in my life. Only when she pauses to take a breath does her brutal slaughter of the food slow to a crawl. She gasps for breath and turns to me, smiling. Her face and hands are covered in lasagna, and she seems to finally have her wits about her. "Why did Skippy woof at you? He's acting weird."

I don't get a chance to respond. Having paused for breath, she turns back and dives into the rest of the food, her snorting and slurping making my stomach churn. Finally, once she's done, she leans back and pats her stomach contentedly, getting more of the gunk all over her paper-thin clothing. "Clean me!"

"I beg your pardon?"

Her smiles shifts slightly and she sends an odd look my way. " Come on, don't make me beg for it! Pleeeeease! Clean me!"

Her request clicks in my mind, so I wordsmith again. " Clean. "

Instantly, all the gunk vanishes from her hands, face, and clothing. Once again, she looks radiant and beautiful as before.

But now, something is bothering me. Maybe it's just a faint feeling... simply a hint of trouble... but this doesn't feel right. The way she's acting isn't... normal.

"Okay~! Hey, now that you're home, let's go have sex! Jonathan was just NO good at it! You're the only one who can make me feel good!"

Jonathan? Who is that? Is this the open marriage Marie was talking about?

I walk toward her, and from the corner of my eye that ugly goddamn mauthe doog growls at me, making me flinch in response. I don't care if I can kill it instantly. I apparently have a phobia for giant-ass demon dogs.

Sarah holds up her arms like she wants me to drag her to her feet. Is she helpless? Does she expect me to do everything for her? Still, my male urges relent, so I pull her up, and both of us make our way into the back room.

As we walk through the doorway, I shoot one last look at the abomination behind me. Your days are numbered, dark one.

I slam the door behind us with my telekinesis, lock it, and while she isn't paying attention, shove a dresser in front of it.

Just in case.

Part 401b: Trepidation

Master Jason looks around one last time. The old man is gone. I watched him leave... he vanished in just the same way Master does. One moment, he was there, the next he wasn't.

Master turns back to me slowly.

"I'll see you tomorrow, or whenever. Remember your training, and ditch that armor as soon as you get a chance. I'm sure Marie used it to knock you out. You're still way stronger than an average human, so you can defend yourself."

He's distracted and barely even looks at me. For once, I want to say something to make him not send me away, but I still don't have the courage. I silently stare for a few seconds before lowering my head. He wouldn't care anyway. It's fine... this is the best I can get from him right now.

I turn around and hesitantly follow after the dark-skinned man, even as I feel Master's gaze fade from my back. He isn't thinking about my feelings, though he never does. I can't blame him for that. Why would anyone care how a slave feels?

I follow behind the man at a small distance, not wanting to walk beside him. He looks vicious, with eyes that remind me of Danis. Less vile, perhaps, but still cold and unfeeling. We trudge along wordlessly and never once does he look back at me. That's fine... it's better this way.

Benjamin and I travel for nearly an hour in total silence, going up and down wall elevators, as Master calls them, until we arrive at a small, nondescript doorway tucked in a back corner that nobody else around could even see unless they were looking for it. There's a little white patch on the stone wall that sticks out from its surroundings, and he merely walks up to it and presses his hand against it. A light flashes and he pulls away.

"BIOMETRIC DATA CONFIRMED. WELCOME, AGENT BROWN. YOUR UNIQUE IDENTIFIER FOR THIS VISIT IS: ONE-SIX-SEVEN-SIX-TWO-FOUR-ONE. THE NETWORK IS NOW ACTIVE."

A voice speaks up, reminding me of the one at the office where Master and I were attacked by that red haired woman. And to think, not an hour after she paralyzed us, Master is sending me off to live with her. I'm scared... what if she tries to hurt me? Master won't be here to protect me.

Will I have to hurt Marie, or will I have to kill her, as I did with Danis? I don't want to attack people... but Master says I should be ready. If he tells me to, I will. I'll do anything he tells me to do.

Ben pushes the door open and walks inside, beckoning for me to follow. When I step in, he closes the door, and there's a clicking sound. Did it lock? This is creepy...

The room is dark, but he reaches over and taps something on the wall, making a light turn on. Once the room is brighter, he points to a few round metal pads sitting on the floor. "This is where we part ways. This teleporter will take you directly to Marie's residence."

Teleporter? That's the same word Master uses to appear and disappear. It's the same as how the old man left, but he didn't have to say anything at all.

Somehow, these metal circles are very foreboding, but I just have to suck it up. Master will call me weak if I can't even do this much. I step on the pad gingerly and turn back to face the charcoal-skinned man. He mumbles something to himself, but I don't catch it.

Suddenly I'm not there anymore. Everything changes so fast I don't even notice for a few seconds. I'm standing inside a clean, white room now. Comfortable looking white chairs and a table are in the center, which reminds me of Yama's dining room... except these are much plainer looking. They're built to serve a purpose, not be pretty.

Paintings hang on the walls, but I don't know what the depictions and objects are in any of them. One painting is of a man wearing white robes, he's holding an apple, and he has wings coming from his back. Is he a bird? Mother told me about birds once, but I haven't seen them even though they're supposed to be on Earth. Birds have wings, and they probably eat apples.

...I've never tasted an apple before. I wonder if it's as good as peat-zuh? Master and I both like to eat peat-zuh. Does Marie eat it too?

"Oh. You're here." A voice speaks up from behind me, and I squeak slightly and turn around to face her, barely keeping my nerves together. This woman made Master fall to the ground, and she didn't even touch him. She must have powerful magic... Mother always warned me about how dangerous magic was.

"Nothing to say? Welcome to my home." Marie waves her hands around here and there, not caring about whether I'm impressed or not. "I had a room set up for you over here. Fresh clothes too, since you don't appear to have any of your own."

She stares at me expectantly, but I don't say anything. I never do. The only person I'd ever want to talk to... is...

"Saint Joseph, I figured you might be a little shy, but this is ridiculous. Not even a 'hello'?" Marie rolls her eyes and turns away. "Whatever. Here, you're probably hungry. Have a ration bar." She reaches into her pocket and pulls out a small colorful rectangle and throws it to me. Thanks to Master's training, I reach up and catch it without trying. My hand moves automatically and plucks it from the air, the 'ration bar' moving far too slowly for me to miss it.

Marie's look of annoyance fades immediately when she sees this. "Oh? Those are excellent reflexes. He must have enhanced you. Hmm." She doesn't think about it long. "Come, have a seat. Let's get to know each other."

She and I sit at the table, though I feel a little worried. Am I allowed to sit here? It's so... nice. I didn't know tables and chairs could look so white. I bet in bright light they would be hard to look at.

Marie's gaze shifts from me, to the bar in my hands, and back to me. "Are you going to eat it?"

I nod slowly and stick it in my mouth and bit. A strange... crinkly feeling enters my mouth. I can't bite into it. It's soft, but covered in a layer of something tasteless.

"Gods. Are you an idiot? You have to take the wrapper off, first. Haven't you ever eaten a ration bar before?"

I shake my head slowly and pull it out to look at it. I now notice words written on it, black letters on a white background, but I can't read them. Master said he'd teach me to read someday... but I'm probably too stupid for that. I don't know anything.

I tug at the ends of the wrapper, even twist and pull at it, and after a few seconds, I get a little irritated and just rip it apart with my hands. The contents of the package explode and fly all over the room, and Marie's expression turns deathly still. I stare in horror at the mess I've made. She's going to hurt me, I can tell.

"Wow. You tore that wrapper to shreds. It's not like foil is made of anything especially sturdy, but this is still very interesting. Don't worry about the mess; I have droids to take care of that."

Marie taps a thingy on her wrist, and a moment later a wall panel slides open, and a nice looking man steps out, dressed in a suit that reminds me of Emperor Beelzebub. "Hello! I am here to serve! How may I assist you?"

"Clean this up. But before that, grab me another ration bar." She leans to the side and winks at me before pulling a little white stick from her shirt. "I'll show you how to open it... err... what was your name again?"

I don't respond, so she sighs and taps her fingers together. "Jason wasn't kidding. You are a silent one, after all. Ah, I recall now. Your name is Lora, right?"

I nod slowly at her. "Well, if a 'yes' or a 'no' are all I can get, I'll have to work with it. So, you lived among demons, is that also correct?"

Her voice lilts playfully as if it's just a casual question, but I feel as though it is the first of many. I nod along, and she pulls another item from her inner jacket, a little metal thing barely even a quarter the size of her hand. It looks like a tiny canteen. A moment later, she lifts the top of it up, and there's a spark of light followed by a clicking sound, and then a small flame appears at the top. To my amazement, she lights the little stick on fire and puts it into her mouth.

"I hope you don't mind if I smoke?"

I shake my head, and she leans back in her chair and blows gray smoke out of her mouth. Even ten feet away, on the other side of a long table, the smell is gross compared to the clean air in the room.

"Good. It's not like I'd care if you had said yes. At least you understand basic etiquette... as well as your place."

There's a long silence as she continues sucking and puffing on the little white stick. The man walks back up and hands her the 'rashun bar' she asked for. Marie is immediately annoyed. "It's not for me, stupid! It's for the guest!"

"Not a problem! Getting right to it!" He turns around, still smiling the whole time even after she called him stupid, and then he walks over and sets it in front of me on the table.

He continues to stand there, and I feel uncomfortable as he stares at me in total silence. Marie groans and pulls my attention away from him. "All right! You've done it! Now go clean up the floor! Use your fucking brain!"

"Absolutely! I am performing that task now!" He swivels away and walks into the kitchen, probably so he can grab cleaning supplies.

Marie shoves the stick in her mouth, stand up abruptly, and walks over to my side of the table. She grabs the bar up and points to one of the ends. "You have to tear this part off, see? Just peel and pull, then the bar comes out."

I nod along again, and she hands it to me. Without any trouble at all, I follow her instructions, and a lumpy brown rectangle pops out and lands on the table in front of me.

"Executives get the best ration bars. That one may even have traces of actual grain in it. Oats, if you're lucky. This one looks to be only about seventy percent reconditioned. Go ahead then, try it."

I don't know what 'recondishunned' is, but the look on her face tells me it's not going to be tasty. With my expectations set low, I bite into the bar and chew slowly. It tastes surprisingly good. Very chewy, with a sugary taste, like the 'soda pop' Master lets me drink when we eat peat-zuh.

Marie walks back over and sits down on her side of the table. "Wow, you seriously enjoy that, huh? You've never eaten a ration bar before, then. Lucky."

There's a moment where I look into her eyes and see something in there, something regretful.

As if to indicate my intuition is right, Marie sighs. "It wasn't always like this, you know, before we put in the population controls. I knew food was going to be a problem, but I didn't realize the energy limitations would be so severe."

I take another bite of my bar, nod, and pretend to understand what she's talking about. I have no idea though.

"Replicators just take too much energy. Can't waste it on food when there are more pressing concerns. Not that it's any of your business." She mashes the fire stick into a little tray on her side of the table. I hadn't noticed it before, due to the fact it's colored the same as the table it sits on. "A lot of things didn't work out the way I wanted. Human nature is so... finicky."

I finish off my bar and mimic her by setting the wrapper down on my side of the table, though much more gently.

She claps her hands together. "Alright. Now that you've had a nice little lunch, it's time for answers. You won't be able to tell me much yourself, so I'll have to get answers my way."

I shift a little in my seat at the way she said that. What do you mean? I want to ask... but I can't speak, even if I tried. I don't know what prevents me, but maybe someday I'll be able to get past it.

Marie stands up again and walks out of the room, only to return a minute later holding something metal that looks like a pen. I've seen pens before, in Yama's domain, but this one is a little bigger than the others that Emperor Beelzebub used.

Marie smiles pleasantly at me. "I'm going to poke your arm real quick. Can you take your armor off, please?"

I didn't expect her to be so nice all of a sudden. I smile back at her, though my smile is weaker, and then quickly pull the new armor Master gave me off after pressing the 'disengage' button. I start to pull my shirt off too, but Marie shakes her head. "That won't be necessary. Just let me see your arm super quick..."

Marie gently takes my arm and I feel a slight sting. She pokes me with a sharp stick of some sort, but the pain is gone almost instantly. "There we go, now I have your blood. Let's find out a little more about you, hm?"

Her smile slowly fades over the next several seconds as her wrist thing makes an image appear in midair, one I can't see. She stares at it silently, and soon her smile is completely gone.

"Oh. So you're Goldeshian. Fifteen percent, at that. So... that makes you a descendant of the filthy-" She pauses to take a little breath. "Well, we can't all help who our ancestors are. You're quite young though. Not a trace of genetic modifications in you. You're living a normal human lifespan, unaided by technology. How miserable. What is life if you can't live a long time, eh?"

She winks at me and then walks back over to her side of the table, this time just leaning against it as she taps some buttons in midair. "I'll just send this information to a subordinate of mine, and we'll see what he has to say about your history."

A minute passes, and I come to realize that she is simply staring into space. She isn't looking at her wrist image anymore, but past it to something else. I want to ask her what's on her mind, but she speaks up. "Goldesh III. A stain on my perfect society. All the work I put into this galactic empire, and some uppity fools thought they could question all the benefits I had given them. They failed to understand why we wouldn't just finish the demons off. We couldn't, and still can't, you know. Killing off the demons would have other side effects. You understand, right?"

She looks back at me, a sad expression on her face. I simply nod, even though I have no idea what she's talking about. Nothing she says makes any sense.

"...Right. It's not that simple. I have seen what happens every time humanity no longer has a designated threat. They have to find or create a new one. Who would it be? The Volgrim? The angels? Perhaps even themselves? I can't have that. Who cares if the food is a little stale and the entertainment is sanitized of imperfections? The path to perfection is fraught with peril. It's something my... sisters... they wouldn't understand."

I yawn audibly and catch myself, but she already noticed. "Oh, I'm boring you. As expected, nobody can keep up with my vast intellect." She scratches her neck thoughtfully. "You never really told me about yourself, but this blood might just be the key. Maybe I can figure out, once and for all, what happened to the Phantoms of Goldesh III."

She shrugs absentmindedly before quickly walking around the table and jerking me to my feet harshly. "Come on, then. Let's get you cleaned up. I won't have a filthy stinking pig in my house. You smell like a week's worth of sweat."

I follow along behind her as she heads for what I'm guessing is this place's form of a bathtub. The insults don't bother me. I've heard far, far worse. Mostly from men like Danis.

A shiver crawls down my spine at the thought of his name. I can never wash away the feeling of his breath on my face, or the pain of his knife on my back. The only thing Master has ever done that I have questioned is bringing Danis back to life. Why? I killed him. He deserved to die. Master even said so.

Master is smarter than me. Maybe he brought Danis back to show I don't have to be afraid anymore. Master will protect me. Even if he doesn't, I can protect myself. I don't have to be scared.

But... I still am.

Master will be so disappointed if he finds out.

"Have you ever taken a sonic shower before, young lady? We don't waste water here, so you'll have to learn to clean yourself properly."

She stares at me expectantly before gesturing to my clothes. " Now you take those off. Learn the proper time and place."

I nod at her and sigh as I pull my shirt off. I reach for my pants, but she stops me. "What the devil are those marks on your back? Did Jason do that to you?"

I shake my head, but she seems to get the wrong idea. "No wonder you won't talk. He must have you quite frightened. He must be worse than I thought. Well, in any case, let's get started, shall we?"

For a moment, I almost see a glint of something else in her eyes. Almost like a mischievous smile... but it vanishes instantly, and I assume it must have been my imagination.

I was wrong about Marie... she can be brash, but she's quite kindhearted. Marie is like the polar opposite of Master.

I still prefer him more, though.

Part 402b: Family Ties

A sharp beam of light pierces the solar screen outside and lands directly on my face, making me blink my eyes and raise an untrapped arm to shield my face. A computerized voice speaks from the ceiling, softly so as to not wake the other in the room. "Supreme Commander, it is the designated time for you to wake up."

I yawn reflexively and pull some hair out of my mouth as I smack my lips. It's Sarah's hair, not mine. She was so excited to see me that she dozed off on top of me after I plowed her for five hours straight. I feel like part of my soul has been sucked out of my body, along with other uncouth things. Her small, soft, supple form, coupled with her decisive sexual appetite and knowledge contrast dramatically with Lora's. Lora is taller, standing nearly half a head higher, and her body is made of iron thanks to the enhancements I've given her. As well, her past prevents her from fully enjoying sex.

But Sarah is something else. It's like the great gods of this universe engineered the perfect life form. I'm reminded of succubi, from myths of old. The perfect taste, the perfect size, and the perfect feeling... everything a man could want in a woman.

Funny, why do I think of succubi at a time like this? I feel more than a passing feeling of familiarity with the thought. Were there any in Yama's lair? They would be demonic entities, after all.

No. I never saw one.

I flinch slightly as a feeling of pain spreads inside my head. Sometimes I feel like I'm on the verge of something big, but it never pans out. Maybe I've contracted a permanent side effect of the cryosleep sickness. Perhaps I was in the icy containment unit for so much time it screwed up my head.

That's probably all it is.

The woman on top of me mumbles something and I feel a drop of liquid on my chest as she drools in her sleep. I don't mind. It feels good, being this close to a woman. Something about this position too... it feels familiar. Even Sarah herself evokes faint images of a false past. Christ, I'm probably going insane. Did the demons poison me somehow? Being around all those horrors must have messed up my head.

Gently, I roll over and pull Sarah to my side, kissing her hard as our lips meet. I simply can't get enough... she's intoxicating. I want to chew on her breasts all day long, spend the rest of my life with her.

This feeling is... unnatural.

I manage to tear myself away and breathe heavily as I lie on my back. There's a faint noise outside the bedroom, the sound of something rustling around, which makes my heart freeze. It's probably that goddamn demonic animal thing. What in the seven hells created it? Why would that other Jason have something like that roaming around his house? Self-defense? Maybe to protect Sarah? If the latter, I couldn't blame him. There isn't a woman alive comparable to her. If Sarah were to die, I feel like my heart would tear in half.

I sit up and spin carefully to sit on the edge of my bed. The thought of that black hound outside fills me with dread. Quietly, I whisper under my breath. "Wear."

My invisible armor appears on my body and immediately I can breathe a little easier. The thought it would take that mutt some real effort to chew my insides to pieces is somehow comforting.

I stand up and yank my clothes to myself with telekinesis with a practiced movement. All the pieces fly on at once, and I levitate myself in the air to yank my pants onto my legs. If I had what I would call a signature power, a favorite technique, it would be telekinesis.

What about the other Jason? Did he have a preferred ability? Maybe super speed, strength, manipulating the minds of others...

No, even beyond him, what about other Wordsmiths? Didn't Yama say there were more of them? He told me there was an army of them. He claimed they were hunting me down and were going to kill me... yet they don't exist as far as I can see.

Did he lie to me? Have I been wrong, all along?

I understand the need to lie. Lying is one way a weak, frail race like the demons might be able to survive. Keeping slaves to use as sexual currency among the humans is likely just one way they have to maintain order. Demons are more cunning than I might have thought. No doubt they possess plenty of spiritual energy, and many abilities similar to mine, but against the might of humanity, those are trifles.

One thing is for sure. I despise weaklings.

Sarah rustles in the bed behind me as I start to walk to the door. "Jason? Where are you going, honey?"

I turn back to her and smile slightly. "Just to eat some food. Would you like anything?"

She rolls around on the bed, clutching the blankets to her chest for several seconds. Back and forth she rolls until she decides to sit up. "I do! I want three juicy steaks, a big bowl of macaroni and cheese, a plate of smoked salmon, one head of lettuce, a glass of cold milk, and at least fifteen sugar cookies!"

Several long seconds pass as I stare at her giddy, childlike expression of glee. She's serious. "Uh. Okay. I'll get right on that."

I start to reach out with my mind to move the dresser I blocked the door with, but she pipes up again. "Oh! We forgot to pray last night! We have to pray before the meal in that case!"

"Huh? Pray? Why?" I turn to raise an eyebrow at her, and she flops back on the bed. "Duh, silly! It's the law! Jeez, you're so forgetful sometimes. I'll have to ask Marie to take it a little easier on you at the office."

"Oh. The law. I see." I scratch my head at the thought of prayer being mandatory. I'm not a particularly religious person, especially not after finding out demons are real and that angels exist. The whole point of prayer is faith, right? It doesn't take faith to pray to something you know exists.

The dresser heaves away from the door with the power of my mind, and I swallow as I press the unlock button. The door slides up, and I spare a peek around the corner. The massive black hound isn't anywhere to be seen. I carefully walk through the door, keeping my pace slow, and a voice speaks out in the room. "Oh. Supreme Commander. I didn't know you were back from your trip already."

A young boy, about twelve years old, sits at a table, chewing on something that reminds me of a granola bar. He has long blonde hair and blue eyes, just like Sarah and I both. "Who are you?"

He pauses mid-bite and stares at me with a slight confusion on his face, though somehow the regal manner in which he sits belies a certain maturity for his age. "Are you testing me?"

I clear my throat and stand up straight. He seems to regard me with a certain level of awe, so it's best not to disrupt that image. "Yes. State your name and our relationship."

Even as he speaks, I feel the memories of him begin to enter my mind. "Sorry, sir. I am Timothy Hiro, your 130th child, the youngest of your bloodline."

I groan inwardly. He's my son, and I just acted like I didn't even know him. This whole 'taking the other Jason's place' is harder than I thought. "Excellent. I'm glad you remember your place."

I calmly continue walking past to the kitchen counter, and just as I'm about to wordsmith some food, Sarah appears at the doorway. Her carefree smile evaporates as she spots Timothy. "W-what are you doing here? You're supposed to be with-"

He stands up quickly, a similar expression on his face. "I apologize, mother. I did not realize father was home. The dormitories are unavailable for a week due to renovations. I assumed father would not be home, so I thought it would be okay if I stayed here for a while." He flinches reflexively and shoots an odd look at me. "Sorry, sir. I didn't mean anything by that."

Huh? What the hell is this kid talking about? "You didn't mean anything by... what?"

He gazes at me silently for a few moments, then lowers his eyes. "I didn't mean to refer to you as 'father'. I know how you don't like that."

A long, uncomfortable silence fills the entire room as everyone stares silently at each other. Finally, I groan loudly. "You may call me 'father'. I don't particularly mind."

"Huh?" Sarah stares at me in disbelief. "What? But- I thought- when did you decide this?"

I shrug and speak a word to the air. " Food. " In front of me, a series of plates appear, holding all the foods Sarah had asked for in the bedroom a minute before. "I decided just now. Is that a problem?"

Timothy raises his head up again, but this time, not to look at me... but at the food I created. "How did you do that?"

Sarah stares at me in wide-eyed disbelief. "You just... wordsmithed in front of your son..."

"Wordsmithed?" Timothy turns to his mother. "What is that? It looked like magic- like what the demons use."

Goddammit. Things are going from one to one hundred rapidly.

Still, it won't do to get distressed now. I need to play it cool. I keep my gaze even as I look between the two of them. "I've never really been there for you, have I, Timothy?"

His lip trembles slightly. "Uh... I mean..."

"I've been a terrible father. I see that now." My simple words resonate in the air as both of them glance at each other and back to me. "I went into the labyrinth and saw some disturbing things. Those things are not fit for a conversation among friends or family, so I will spare you both the details. Nevertheless, they shook me to my core."

Sarah nods slowly. "You have been acting strange, sweetheart. I didn't realize that... that you'd gone through so much."

I nod sagely and make a show of closing my eyes as if I'm in pain. "I'm sorry, to both of you. I need to be a better man."

"N-no, you're fine just the way you are, sir." Timothy carefully takes another bite of the granola bar in his hand. "I'm just... confused. I didn't realize you could use... magic..." He glances at Sarah and she smiles at him pleasantly. Underneath her smile though, I feel a sense of hostility. Something akin to stop asking so many questions of your father, but it might just be me.

"Your father has always had these abilities. He and I made a family decision not to let our children know, though. The fewer people who knew, the fewer chances there would be for political enemies to use us against him."

"Oh." Timothy nods. "So not even my elder brothers and sisters know?"

"Not even one." Sarah swallows hard and shoots me a questioning look. I honestly have no idea if it's true, but I wink at her in the affirmative. She glides over and sits down at the table, next to Timothy and touches his hand. "Well, if your father is okay with it, you can stay here until the dorms open again. However, you must agree not to let his secret leave beyond the three of us."

Before Timothy can nod, I pick up two plates of food and walk over to the table, setting both of them in front of Sarah. "I could also erase his memory, you know."

"Yes, you can. You probably should, too." She ignores the food and continues to stare at me as I turn and walk back to grab the rest of her meal.

Timothy clears his throat. "If you must, I understand, sir."

"Stop calling me 'sir'. I don't like it anymore." I set the food down and cut a piece of Sarah's steak off for myself to try it out. The flavor is quite sublime, and the texture is soft and juicy. Just the way I prefer it.

"O-okay. What should I call you then?" Timothy shifts nervously in his seat and grips the remainder of his food bar tighter.

"Just call me 'father'. That will do."

He swallows audibly. "Yes, father. Th-thank you."

I smile pleasantly at him, which only seems to disturb him more. He acts like he's never seen his dad smile, not even once. "There's no reason to be tense. I'm going to do a better job raising you, from now on. Certainly, more than I ever did before. I'm not going to erase your memory either. I am willing to trust my own son, after all."

Sarah smiles abruptly, having taken the situation in stride. "That's why I love you so much, Jason! You're always full of surprises!"

I can't tell if she's pulling my leg. Every time I get a hint of the previous Jason's life, he comes off as a stiff workaholic, and a devout pacifist... assuming Marie's description of his past is accurate. Describing him as being 'full of surprises' is the opposite of what I'd imagine.

As the three of us finish off our food, with me making extra for myself and Timothy, the feeling around the table gradually becomes a little more relaxed, and Timothy even tries to smile as well. He's terrible at it, just like myself, but I have to appreciate him trying. This must be quite the odd experience for him. His father, whom he apparently rarely spoke with, has transformed from a soulless, heartless robot, into someone with a genuine personality.

Gods... I'm doing these two a favor by replacing the previous Jason. I'd kill myself if I ended up as lifeless and empty as he must have been. He wasn't just a weakling, but a terrible parent with no redeeming attributes.

I finish off a cup of orange juice and dab my mouth with a napkin. "Oh... by the way, I've been wondering where that demonic animal has gone."

Timothy tilts his head toward a door. "I don't like him very much, so I usually put him in the other room when I'm here." His face pales immediately after he says this. "I-I mean, if you want, I can release him, father. I didn't realize you would be home, and I was only thinking of myself. I'll just go and-"

"No!! I mean, no, that is fine. Just leave Fido in there. I'm not angry at all, Timothy." A bead of sweat trickles down my back at the realization I just averted a heart attack. At the least, this kid and I are remarkably similar to each other when it comes to that damn dog.

Sarah looks miffed at me. "His name is Skippy, Jason. Seriously... you named him."

I did? Jesus Christ, the other Jason was a major stupid-ass. I'd rather name that animal Lucifer-Fucker or something. "I know, I'm just joking... honey." I spit the pet name out and cringe inwardly. I should just avoid those and let other people use them. They don't suit me at all.

She giggles as if I just said the funniest thing in the world. "Oh, you! You've never been one to have a sense of humor! I like these new changes, it's getting me all hot and bothered."

Timothy shifts in his seat. "Mother..."

"Right, right, sorry! You're still a child, not even two-hundred years old! I can't be talking like that in front of you. I'm such a pervert!"

I spare a glance at Timothy's face. He's almost two hundred years old? Good grief, he's nearly ten times older than me, his so-called 'father'. It's tough to consider giving out fatherly advice to an old man. The only thing old about me is my physical appearance, since I'm deliberately disguising myself as the other Jason.

I clean up the table with my levitation after I'm done, and then get up from my seat. "Alright, Sarah. I'm off. I have a meeting with the local military generals today."

She jumps up and hugs me, rubbing her blessed body against mine excitedly. "Ohhh, do you have to go? Why not take a day off and stay with me?"

"I'd love to, but this is already scheduled. I have to keep up appearances. You know how it is."

She pulls back and gives me a perplexed look. "Nope, no clue! Anyway, we need to pray before you go. It's the law."

Timothy looks up from his chair, startled. "Oh! I forgot last night! I'll join in!"

"Tsk tsk. Like father, like son!" Sarah pulls me back to the table and joins hands with Timothy. All of us sit down and bow our heads, but nobody says anything. I start to feel a little weirded out, but she raises her head back up. "Okay! I gave my energy to Zeus, like usual."

"I as well." Timothy pulls away from her and looks at me.

"I did too." I lie without hesitation. I have no idea what they're talking about, but it's easy enough to play along.

Timothy and Sarah both yawn at the same time. Sarah speaks as soon as she's finished. "Oh man, that took a lot out of me. I'm gonna nap for a while. Have a good day at work!"

She leans over and kisses me on the cheek playfully before getting up and heading to her room. I, in turn, stand and walk to the doorway. "I'll see you tonight, Sarah."

She pauses before entering the room. "Oh, sorry. I'm going over to Marcus Atkins place this evening. I won't be back until the day after, but I'll see you then!"

Huh? Marcus Atkins? Another man?

I decide to ignore that for the moment. I have more pressing concerns. "Right... see you later, then."

Unceremoniously, I wave to Timothy and head out the door. He waves back timidly as well. "Goodbye... father."

Those two words must have taken more courage than even my decision to kill Gressil... when all of this began.

"You too, kid."

* * *

This universe is strange. Foreign. Everything is upside down. The more I learn, the more questions I have to ask. Why the hell would prayer be mandatory, enshrined in the law? Does it help combat the demons or something?

I've hardly asked the question in my mind when the answer appears in the form of one of Supreme Commander Jason's memories.

Prayer gives energy to the angels and gods, who require it to live. This, in turn, forges an unbreakable alliance. Humans do not require this energy for any reason, and thus we can give ours freely. In return, they offer us a one-time life insurance policy: the ability to be reborn as angels if we should die. However, this is shameful. Only a fool would die after being given effective immortality.

Ah, I see. I don't understand how that resurrection system works, but that is a fair trade-off. I should go and visit the angels soon, and see how their society functions, as well as what it looks like.

I move from place to place, taking my time and absorbing the sights as I glance down at the pad in my hand. It's the most advanced piece of electronics I've ever seen in my life, yet the memories the old Jason has of it are littered with words like outdated and obsolete. There are gadgets of far higher technological superiority than even this in existence, and I can't begin to fathom how they might work.

I pause after entering an open area with a glass floor, a large round pod-like building that connects the megascraper I live in to the Stratoscraper I work at. This large intermediary is held up by a long, thin pole that extends up from the planet's surface two miles below. Such a sturdy pole could not be made in the world I came from, but here it is just one of many unbelievable things that allow this world to thrive.

As I walk, I glance down below at what is presumably the planet's surface. The transparent floor allows me to see a thick cloud-like formation of mist, but unlike the white clouds I saw when I was growing up, these are brown, as if someone had stained the clouds with thick paint. I cannot see the ground at all. There are numerous smaller buildings visible in between skyscrapers, megascrapers, and stratoscrapers, but all of the smaller buildings extend only a little above the clouds. Most are barely even visible.

Smog. The word pops into my head and I stare with a feeling of melancholy. In the end, humanity ruined the Earth. We exploited it to hell and back, and now we live in these massive buildings not out of luxury, but necessity.

I pull my datapad up to look at it. Something catches my eye that I hadn't noticed before. The ambient temperature around me is a perfect twenty-one degrees Celsius, but the temperature outside is listed as... fifty-five degrees? Good god, the greenhouse effect must be in full swing. The sun doesn't appear any brighter in the sky, so I doubt it's that.

I continue walking through the center building and eventually arrive in the stratoscraper that leads to my office, and other military facilities. As my memories arrive one by one, pieces fall into place. In addition to the diplomacy venues, my office, the Engineering Corps, and other such facilities, this building also is a place where four hundred million humans show up to work every single day. I wonder what sort of tasks they have to complete? There were never enough jobs in the time I came from, so with all of the automation on display, either unemployment has been eradicated, or something shifted fundamentally in society to allow so many jobs to exist.

I head toward an elevator, and a chill goes down my spine as a voice speaks from a dark corner off to the side. "There you are, Jason Hiro." Yama steps slightly from the darkness to look at me, though he stays tucked away where the light can't reach him.

"Yama? What are you doing here? Aren't you in danger walking among humans?" I step toward him and glance around hesitantly. "There are a lot of cameras and people around here... this is a foolish move just to see me. You're going to get both of us caught."

"Unlikely. This is where I meet all of my informants. It is just off the beaten path, and this hover-shaft services only elites in the upper levels. In any case, I am in contact with many of them already."

"I see. Still, why are you bothering me? I wasn't expecting to run into you."

He holds his hand forward, and I spot a familiar black orb at once. "You left behind your source of power. Blaarjiim can give answers to many questions I am certain you have."

"Oh. Right." I quickly step forward and pluck the black orb from his hands, then stare at it uneasily. "This thing is the size of a softball. How am I supposed to hide it?"

Blaarjiim's ancient face appears in my mind. "Your wordsmithing is the source of many abilities that you have yet to discover. Simply speak the word 'storage' and I can be hidden there and pulled out whenever you wish. However, this has the downside that I will be cut off from the physical realm and left all alone... so I would prefer you not do this unless necessary."

"Huh. That's an option, I suppose." I scratch my chin and look down at Yama. "I have a question though since you're here. It's in regards to the Supreme Commander whose place I took."

He folds his arms together and stares at me. "Go on."

"You said that there were hundreds, even thousands of other Wordsmiths that could kill me, yet the Supreme Commander knew of only himself and I. Did you lie to me?"

He nods. "I did. However, in a way, I did not."

"I don't understand."

"Neither do I." Yama hisses and looks to my side as if deep in thought. "I know that other Wordsmiths exist. I have seen them. I am certain Marie knows of their existence as well. In my spying, I have seen them come and go, yet from where they hail, I am not sure."

"So they do exist? You're cryptic." I growl in irritation. "Why can't you just be honest with me? I understand why you might lie, but it isn't an endearing quality or one that builds a positive alliance up. Rather, it will tear down any trust we could have."

Yama sneers at me and leans back against the wall. "You play with words that hold no meaning. I trust you as little as you trust me. It is for the foolish. I have placed a nugget of hope that you might be useful to me one day, but I know you might turn your personal prejudice against me as well. It is a risky gamble, but one that I am willing to take."

Blaarjiim smiles in the back of my brain. "Humans consolidate their power and use their numerical and technological superiority to crush demonkind, while demons bicker and squabble among each other for the rights to rule increasingly smaller plots of land. It is apparent that one of these two is going to win this war while the other loses. Yama, you would do well to speak the truth in front of this human. You've foolishly given him the chance to destroy you if he wishes."

I pat the orb lovingly with my free hand. "That's the spirit, Blaarjiim. Yama, he's correct. I don't like it when people aren't straight with me. A little honesty would help our relationship mature."

Yama's smirk fades away, and he glares at me listlessly. "If you think the demons are full of lies, you have yet to meet the rest of your kind. The best way I have found to ensure the safety of my species is by harnessing the greed of yours. You will soon find this out, one way or another. I seek only one thing; to return demons to their former numbers and to rebuild our kind to their former glory. I do not seek the destruction of humanity, merely the sovereignty of my own. Is that too much to ask for, human?"

I sigh and stare at Blaarjiim for several seconds. "Not really, I suppose. I can understand, and even respect that ideal."

"Most excellent. Then we see eye to eye on this issue."

The demon smiles cunningly at me, and I resist the urge to quip. Eye to eye? But I'm six-feet tall, and you're just under four!

Yeah, that would be slightly disrespectful. "We do. In any case, I have a meeting to attend to. Thank you for the... present."

An idea pops into my head from seemingly nowhere. "Oh, Blaarjiim, are you capable of being silent when out in the open? No speaking at all, not even to me in my mind."

"I am."

Great. That makes this easy for me. I quickly wordsmith a sling that wraps over my shoulder and loops down to my waist. I then set Blaarjiim inside of it. " Invisible. "

The sling and his orb both vanish from view. Yama smiles creepily at me. "An inventive solution, as expected. However, Marie has energy sensors everywhere. They may pick him up if you pass inside their range. This area is a blind spot, so it's fine for now."

"I understand. In that case, what if..." I aim my mind at Blaarjiim's now-invisible orb. " Suppress. "

Yama tosses his hands in the air. "I can no longer sense him. You'd best hope you don't drop his orb, or you're unlikely to find it."

"I wouldn't say that. Summon. " With a single word, his invisible orb disappears from the sling and reappears in my hand.

Yama gapes at me for a moment for regaining his composure. "You have this under control. I will be going, then."

I nod and turn to walk toward the hover-shaft. "And I as well. Thank you for bringing Blaarjiim to me, Yama."

Yama doesn't reply, and instead makes a sign with his hands. He vanishes, and I'm left standing by my lonesome.

"The Second Emperor is a formidable demon, you know. Even so, he is worried about what your appearance will do to human society, for the good or the bad." Blaarjiim chuckles softly. "Heh... I warned Yama once... he had stabilized the situation. Throwing a wrench in the machine is a terrible choice. The humans lack the diplomatic votes needed to exterminate the demons, and the previous Supreme Commander was a sympathetic man to the demon's cause. He didn't wish to eliminate them, albeit less because he liked demons, and more because of what would happen after."

"After?"

"If humanity has no enemy, they will invent a new one. It's as simple as that."

"Cheh. Life is boring without conflict. Rainbows and bunnies are not what I live for." I step into the hover-shaft and press the button which will take me to the conference floor.

"What is a 'bunny'?"

Blaarjiim's confused expression makes me almost laugh. "It's nothing. Just an animal humanity has probably exterminated."

The bastards.

Part 403b: The Dark Descent

The hover-shaft continues to take me up, and to my relief, nobody gets aboard with me. This particular shaft stops about fifty floors before the top of the stratoscraper, and those floors are usually reserved for crop engineering and other such things. I learned this thanks to my trusty datapad, which never back-talks me or gives me lip. Ask a question, get an answer. I like that.

The hover-shaft door hisses open, and I'm greeted by two familiar faces. Lora and Marie are standing just off to the side, waiting for my arrival. Lora is wearing a formal uniform, one that resembles what everyone else in this massive building wears to work. It's orange, with black all over the edges and stitching, two big buttons at the belly and breast to close up the outer coat, and a gaudy looking oversized collar that splays out to the left and right several inches on each side. Still, I've seen so many people wearing these uniforms that I've grown used to the design.

Lora yawns and smiles when she sees me. Even Marie looks a little haggard. "Did you two even sleep last night?"

Marie shakes her head. "Barely. This girl is so uneducated about the proper policies of the United Earth Forces that she would be an outright embarrassment to you and me if she were to represent either one of us. What are you going to do with her, anyway? You may not know how things work around here, but at least you have a modicum of sense regarding modern society. Lora is foreign to everything about modern living."

I pull Lora a little closer, and away from Marie. "She's just a silent bodyguard. She doesn't need to be a tactical genius or anything, and I don't expect her to be. As far as customs, she will learn those in time."

The three of us start walking down the halls, and I nod at people who walk past, saluting Marie and I. Marie lights up another cigarette and coughs as she inhales deeply. "That doesn't change the fact that you, especially, have no idea about the current state of the galaxy. If you're going to stand in as a proxy for Jason 12F, I'll need to debrief you on everything occurring in the universe, and that will take a while."

"Hmm." I shoot a glance at Marie slyly. "By the way, I am curious... how many wordsmiths are there in the galaxy? Are we quite common?"

"Not even close. You and 12F are the only ones that existed, and now it's just you."

"Then why do you keep calling him '12F'? Did you think that designation slipped past me? It almost sounds like he's a clone, or part of a freak science experiment."

Marie pauses walking and turns to stare at me with a bored expression on her face, as if this doesn't matter to her at all. "It's the designation of the building he lives in. I live in the same building as he did, and thus you, so that's why my designation is Marie 12F. It's a way for humanity to refer to clusters of humans all at once."

"I don't believe you."

"You can think whatever you like."

She turns back around and continues walking, but now my suspicions are burning up. What she said doesn't even make sense.

"Marie, you explicitly stated that I killed a 'fellow Jason'. That implies there are more like me, and probably clones or something. Do you think I'm an idiot?"

She coughs after taking another puff on her cigarette. "You copied 12F's memories. If I were lying, you should be able to tell. Did he know of any other Jasons?"

I scratch my neck and look at Lora. She shakes her head and turns away. Of course she wouldn't know anything. This conversation should have brought some of the Supreme Commander's memories back to me, but it didn't. If he did know of any other Jasons, mentioning them would have triggered a flashback.

"He didn't. Then again, he also didn't know you called him 'Jason 12F', so that designation might have been a secret."

We round a corner and Marie sends a vicious expression my way. "We're almost there. Keep quiet and let me do all the talking today. You're liable to start a diplomatic nightmare if you shoot off your mouth without thinking."

She ignored my question. Of course she did. That's acceptable; I knew she wouldn't be so forthcoming. She has her secrets, and I have my own. I know where I hid the previous Supreme Commander, after all..

I nod at her words and pretend to accept her orders, but I know this alliance will not last. She's dangerous. I can only hope she hasn't poisoned Lora's mind, or I'll have to get rid of her, too.

We arrive outside the doorway into the conference room, and I turn to Lora. "Stay outside, just stand here at the door. We'll be out soon."

Marie chuckles. "These meetings can take up to five hours. Don't force the girl to stand the whole time."

"She can handle it."

Lora sighs quietly and pulls off to the side, leaning against the door. Marie strides into the room brazenly, as if she owns the place. I walk behind her and stand up a little straighter, and everyone in the room stands up in their seats. "All rise! The Supreme Commander has entered!"

I walk over and sit down, and the two men to either side hold their hands forward. I reach over and shake, out of some preconditioned reflex. I don't know who they are, but my mind fills in their names after a second of me staring blankly. "Uh, Feldmann, Morlis, good to see both of you."

A few other people look miffed, and I realize I was supposed to shake their hands too. Oh well, a Supreme Commander can have off days, in my opinion.

I gaze around the table slowly, taking everything in. The first thing that immediately stands out to me is a man much further toward the end, wearing all white robes. His body glows slightly, and the people on each side have pulled away slightly, either to give him room or due to reverence. I can't tell which. His name appears in my mind, though.

Zeus.

The king of the gods, ruler of the angels. He exists, and so does heaven. Sometimes I wonder if I'm not still inside the cryopod, suffering under a brain melting delusion. Everything seems so fantastical, and yet here I am.

Zeus has a commanding presence, and people noticeably shrink back as his eyes sweep the room. Everyone he looks at seems noticeably disturbed as if they know he can see the sins they have committed, and he is judging them to Heaven or Hell as a result. His 8-foot frame makes him even more intimidating than I am, and he seems to suck some of the executive power from my title, Supreme Commander, with his, King of Gods.

Despite this, he seems quite amiable, and he smiles around at everyone before looking at me. "Commander Hiro! A pleasure to see you once again. I hope you don't mind me dropping in, today. I heard you had taken a personal trip into the labyrinth, so I wanted to hear your thoughts on the matter."

"Mmm. Yes." Marie takes a seat directly opposite me at the other end of the long table and shakes her head slowly. Watch your words. I don't have to use my telepathy to read that expression. "My trip into the Labyrinth was a little eye opening, I must admit."

A man beside stares at me with an odd expression. "You have seemed a little different since you came back from the labyrinth, or so I've heard." I scan his face quickly and his name pops up in my mind. Steven Feldmann, a mid-ranking officer but one the original Supreme Commander regarded with a lot of hope. In fact, there's even a little bit of personal sentiment thrown in there.

"I saw some things I would rather not talk about." My words make a few people at the table lean forward in interest. "Though I assure you, I will have to at some point. That day is not today."

"Understood." Zeus smooths his long, curled golden beard and regards me with the eye of a deity looking down upon a mere human. He doesn't seem to know about my Wordsmithing, or if he does, he hides it well. "I had hoped we could discuss that arrangement I spoke to you about before."

I haven't a clue what he's talking about. I glance at Marie, and she shrugs slightly. Whatever the discussion was, it was private. "Perhaps later, King Zeus."

"I look forward to your response." Zeus leans back in his chair, and Feldmann takes the lull in discussion to bring up something about blockades in the fifteenth dilithium mining sector or something. I don't know what he's talking about and it goes over my head.

I casually eyeball everyone at the table, and to my disgust I spot Danis, the psychopath whom I revived from the dead, of all the people, sitting here at the table staring ahead stonily. The poor fool hasn't even a drop of emotion on his face, and a few individuals sitting opposite him steal glances at his zombified expression every now and again and seem to mutter under their breaths this and that. Admittedly, I could not have punished him any worse than by forcing him to continue living as a soulless puppet. Yama wasn't lying about him, at least. For Danis to be sitting here at this table, he must be quite the high ranking citizen.

People chatter back and forth for a few minutes, and finally, Steven Feldmann turns to me and smiles casually... perhaps too casually. "So now that you're back from the Labyrinth, have you decided it's time to wipe them out?"

"I'm still debating it."

My response is straightforward, but a hush goes over the table as everyone turns to look at me in surprise.

"R-really, Commander Hiro? I had heard you were acting odd lately, but this... what did you see to make you undergo such a change of heart?" Feldmann gawks at me and others nod along to his question, so I shrug in response, even as Marie almost imperceptibly glares fire at me and shakes her head.

"I'm just considering it. I didn't say I was going to authorize anything."

A wiry looking Chinese man higher up the table and to my right throws his hands up in the air. "A cataclysm must be happening, and I missed it! The Supreme Commander is considering a total extermination of the demonic forces! Am I still dreaming, or are fantasies becoming a reality?"

General Zhao. He's revered in the mind of the previous Jason. His sarcasm and lack of subtlety means he comes off as something of a crass oaf, but he has led thousands of incursions into demonic territory. From the bits and pieces of memory I can pull about him, he's been frustrated for a very long time, especially compared to my idea of what a 'long time' consists of... and it's because he hasn't been able to fight the Demons for hundreds, if not thousands of years.

Hmm. For some reason, the previous Jason, and apparently Marie as well, don't want to finish them off. Plenty of reasons why come to mind, but those wouldn't be enough to please someone like Zhao. No, he's a man who has lived through conflict, violence, and war. He loves killing demons, and the scars on his face attest to that. One especially brutal looking scar cuts across his right eye and all the way across the bridge of his nose. It's barely even visible, a sign of how old it is, but it shows that he keeps it to demonstrate his ferocity to anyone who wishes to see. In the age of significant medical advances that created what surely exists today, it's unthinkable that he couldn't have a perfect looking face.

I bet he gets a lot of women.

"You're not dreaming Zhao, but once again, I have decided nothing. Let's not get ahead of ourselves here. I would need to consider tactical options before ordering anything of the sort."

His sardonic smiles vanishes and his jaw slackens slightly. "Are all options on the table? Do I have the authority to eliminate demonkind?"

Marie quickly butts in before I can say anything else. "He isn't, General. Don't get ahead of yourself. We all know the demons are a filthy, violent race, but that doesn't mean we can just exterminate them. Killing off the demons can have unintended consequences to the balance of power in the galaxy."

Feldmann leans back in his chair and mutters something under his breath. All I can hear is something about 'political favors'.

General Zhao scowls at Marie. "Oh, yes, thank you for giving us your opinion, Head Engineer. I had forgotten you knew so much about military matters. I'll be sure and consult you in the future."

A woman with beautiful flowing brown hair speaks up loudly, berating him harshly. "Zhao, that's enough! There is no need to disrespect Mrs. Becker. Without her genius, we would never have been able to progress so rapidly during the Galactic Cold War of the early generations. Humanity has gained much, thanks to her contributions. Show respect."

Zhao stares at the woman but doesn't offer a retort. "As you wish." He slumps back in his seat and glares forward at nobody in particular.

Several moments of silence pass before Feldmann speaks up tentatively and manages to get the meeting back on track. While he speaks, I conceal a knowing smile. Marie is not respected among the people here. She acts haughty, but she seems rather unimportant in the grand scheme of things.

I had assumed she was a key player in the operations of Earth and the rest of humanity, but perhaps I overestimated her reach. Maybe her real power is merely using the previous Supreme Commander to lead her agenda. That would explain why she is so desperate to turn me into a political pawn; a puppet to do her bidding. She regards me in the same way as I do Danis; a useful tool that can be disposed of readily.

But if that's the case, she has much to learn. I'm only getting started. Once I have my bearings about me, and I can understand the situation, I will cease to be a passive follower, and will begin taking charge. I'll be damned if I let others control me, the most powerful god ever to walk the galaxy. Well, I'm not powerful yet, but I will be.

I stare at Zeus carefully and wonder to myself a great many things... but especially, how much power would I gain if I drained his energy? The commandos gave me a pittance, but Zeus is overflowing with the stuff.

I flinch as Feldmann pounds his side of the table with a gavel. "That is all for today, everyone. We will meet again next week to discuss other matters."

Oh. I thought the meeting would take hours, but this one only took half an hour or so. I was getting a little bored by these proceedings anyway.

I stand up and glance over at Zeus, intending to go and speak with him, but a tug at my side grabs my attention. Everyone else is already standing up and chatting with each other about menial things, but from the corner of my eye I spot Danis walking toward me- no, ah, past me and out the door. What use does a puppet have for conversations, I suppose?

Another tug at my side and I sigh and look to see who it is. It's Feldmann, and he scratches the back of his neck and stares at me with a look of concern. "Supreme Commander- err, that is, father... are you certain you've been feeling well? You said you went through something in the labyrinth, but I was just curious as to what. I will keep the matter private, if you wish."

"Huh? Father?" I pause for a moment to re-evaluate his words and then I remember. "Oh, right. It's nothing, really. I'm fine, thank you."

There's an odd moment shared between us as he looks at me oddly. I sigh inwardly. He's probably shocked I forgot he was my son. To be fair, I would be too. Not my fault the other Jason had fifty thousand kids.

I don't know what to say to him, and as I start to pull away awkwardly, the door hisses open. There's a squeak outside, as if a woman is gasping in fright, then the unmistakable sound of a violent impact, followed by something heavy smashing against a wall.

I turn to look, and my eyes widen in horror as I spot Lora, her arms outstretched with both palms aimed forward, and Danis, lying in a rapidly increasing pool of blood, his body broken and twisted against a badly fragmented marble wall. Everything clicks into place in my mind all at once. I should have warned Lora about him, but I forgot to do so. Shit, this is bad.

Her hands shake, and her breathing increases as she appears to start suffering a panic attack. I pull away from Feldmann and run to her, gawking at Danis's body and her outstretched palms. "Lora! Did you just- damn it, how could you do this?"

She stares at me, terror in her eyes. Danis must have startled her when she saw him, and she shoved him away with her Herculean strength. Her power probably killed him the instant he hit the wall. Under normal circumstances, I could clean up the blood, remove the body, and re-clone him, but with all these witnesses, there isn't a chance. Worse, it's almost definitely been captured on a camera, so there's no way to hide the evidence.

Feldmann rushes up behind me. "Good god! She killed Admiral Danis!"

"What? Someone killed Danis?" A man from the previous room speaks up curiously, and in an instant the entire room is filled with concern as people shuffle forward to see what's going on, oblivious to the fact that if this were a hit job by a professional assassin, their lives might be in danger too. Humans are always stupid.

Not ten seconds later, a squad of hypersuit-wearing guards comes running down the hall and aim their guns at Lora. "Halt! You are under arrest! Don't make a move!"

Lora turns to look at me, fear in her eyes. I didn't mean to do it! She doesn't have to say anything, the expression on her face says it all.

"You may not have meant to do this, but you did. I'll try and clean your mess up. You just behave yourself for a bit."

Marie shoves her way through the crowd of onlookers and arrives at my side. Her advanced mind takes in the scene and processes everything in an instant. "Stupid girl. We'll have to take care of this later."

"She didn't do it on purpose."

"I'm aware, Commander. This girl is far too innocent for that. I'll have a talk with you later."

Lora recoils as the commandos come for her, but I jab her in the ribs with a finger harshly. "Don't resist. Let them take you away. We'll deal with this ourselves. You need to reflect on this failure."

Her shoulders slump, and she nods, allowing the commandos to put a strange collar around her neck before leading her away, down the hall.

"What's with the collar?" I whisper to Marie so the others can't hear.

"A pacification choker. I invented it myself. Suitable for neutralizing prisoners and rowdy miners."

Miners? I want to ask but decide against it. I already understand what its purpose is.

As I watch them take away Lora, the human I've been closest to since arriving, Steven Feldmann walks up beside me. "Who is she? That must have been one hell of a punch."

"She was my bodyguard. I'll find out what happened later."

He recoils in disgust as he looks down at Danis's body. "I know you and Danis were close. The two of you would always chat after meetings. I'm sorry this had to happen. Even so, can't say I'll miss him."

I smirk just as Steven looks up. "I was never friends with that piece of filth. He was a savage, disgusting predator. In the end, he got what was coming to him." I nudge away one of Danis's hands with my boot. "Turns out you can't dodge death twice."

"Huh?" Steven looks at me questioningly, but I walk away from him.

"Nothing. You wouldn't understand."

* * *

Amy sits on her bed and sighs as she stares around at her barren apartment. Only a dresser with a few articles of clothing, a few nutrition bars for the morning, and a portable purifier for water sit on top. The rest of the room is vacant, just like the hole in her heart.

This is the last night I spend here, then. Took them an entire month, but it's official now. I'm no longer an upper-class citizen.

She wipes at her eyes, though no tears are forthcoming.

I just wanted to stop that demon. Why can't they bend the rules? Why did my entire squad have to be punished?

Her tears won't fall, though she wishes they could. She's killed too many people, so crying isn't becoming for one like her.

She finally raises her head to the wall, as the sun shines in through the window just barely lighting the room. It'll be night-time soon.

Just have to suck up my pride. Either I take a blow to my ego, or I live in the Lower-class district for the rest of eternity. I can't possibly choose that life.

"Jacob. Call my daughter. Call Sarah Gutierrez."

The computer in her room beeps. "There is no Sarah Gutierrez in your registered contact list. However, I do have 125,043 other possible listings for that name."

"Right... sorry. She changed her name. Of course she did. Her name is Sarah Hiro now. Just... call her, okay?"

"You have one name in your contact listings. The last time you dialed this number was three hundred sixteen thousand, nine hundred and fourteen years ago, seven months, six days-"

"Yes! Just dial the number, for god's sake."

The computer silently fills her request. A pleasant beeping tone fills the room, and thirty seconds pass. Just as Amy is about to hang up, a sweet sounding voice answers. "Hello! Who is this?"

A young woman's face appears on screen, her long blonde hair being unkempt as if she had just gotten out of bed. The bathrobe she is wearing merely adds to that theory in Sarah's mind, and a man is sleeping with her on the bed, but Amy can't tell who he is from this angle.

"Oh... Sarah, sweetheart. It's me. Your mother."

Sarah's cute smile fades away. "Huh? Mother?"

"Yes! Your mother, Amy Gutierrez. Come on, dear. I know it's been a while since we talked, but surely you remember me."

Sarah shakes her head slowly. "I don't know if this is a crank call or something, but you're not my mother. I think you have the wrong Sarah. It's a common enough name!"

"Huh? No, baby. Come on, I know it's been about three hundred thousand years, but we're family! Listen, I'm just calling because I wanted you to know that your husband... Jason... he made a mistake. He disbanded my squad and-"

"You have the wrong number, ma'am." Sarah's smile is gone. "I don't know who you are, but you're weird. Keep looking, and I hope you find your real daughter, okay? Okay. Buh-bye."

The video cuts off, and Amy stares, mouth agape, at the screen.

After a minute, she flops around and lies on her back to stare at the blank ceiling.

Oh. Sarah doesn't even remember me. No wonder Jason didn't know who I was when he let me go... she never thought to bring her mother up. I just don't matter to her.

Amy tilts her head slightly to look out the window.

They're gone. All of my kids are grown up, Jorge is in Heaven, my squad is being sent to the lower levels just as I am... this is my reward for hundreds of thousands of years serving the United Earth Forces. This is all I've earned.

Her mind drifts over to the plasma pistol in her jacket, the one she has to return in the morning as her final act of military office. All her medals are being revoked, all of it.

I could pull the trigger. There's nobody left who would miss me. I'd be doing the galaxy a favor.

Suddenly her wall beeps. An incoming video message request.

Amy jerks back up on the bed, her heart suddenly racing. Did she remember? Sarah?!

She hardly has to give the order. The screen springs to life, and immediately her feeling of joy vanishes. Onscreen is a familiar face, one she hasn't seen in a few hundred years.

"General Feldmann. So glad you called me."

"Miss Gutierrez... I'll cut right to the chase. I heard you're being evicted."

"Yeah. Housing privileges are being revoked today, actually. I have 6 more hours in this place."

Feldmann holds a carrot in his hand and he shows it off to the camera. "Listen, I know you've always been headstrong about your commitment to the military, but they tossed you on your ass. I warned you this could happen."

"You did. I didn't listen." Amy reaches up and massages her left shoulder lightly. "Sorry."

"What have I always said? One door closes, another opens." A slight pause as he swallows audibly. "Danis is dead."

Amy's blood chills in an instant as if she were being blasted with liquid nitrogen. "Danis? Admiral Danis? How could he have possibly died?!"

"I'm not sure. We're looking into it. Seems my father, the Supreme Commander, brought back a woman from the Labyrinth. A few of my guys have brought me back an interesting report from the entryway scanners. She's 15% Goldeshian."

"What? Goldeshian? But..."

"They're all in the camps? That's what I thought too. If nothing else, I always knew Danis was a fuck-up. I just didn't think he'd bite it this hard thanks to a monster he had a hand in creating. The woman who killed him, I barely know anything about her, but she has a lot of strength."

"You'd have to be strong to leave the work camps. Stronger than me."

Feldmann chuckles and starts chopping the carrot up. "No, I mean like she's really fucking strong. She killed Danis by shoving him against a wall. Standing position. She didn't even put any effort into it. Oh, and get this, my dad said she was his bodyguard."

"He sure knows how to pick them. I don't think I'd want to fight her." Amy leans forward and back, rolling slightly on her butt as she fidgets. "So what's this about? If you have something to say, I'm all ears."

"I've been trying to get you to work for me for a long time now. Private pays better than public, that's my motto."

"Can you get me into good housing? At least middle class?"

"I can't promise anything. I pay based on results. But I'll get you out of your current problem at least. I'll put a temporary pause on your move. That'll give you a few months, but you'll have to do me some favors in the meantime, understand?"

Amy bites her lip, but there's no hesitation. "Fine, I'll do it. You're too nice to be manipulating me anyway. I know what you did on Goldesh."

"Yeah? Let's keep that on the down-low. You never know who's listening in on these calls."

He pauses for a moment before continuing. "Oh yeah... my father shit-canned you, right? He's been acting a little weird since he got back, so, sorry about that. Didn't even recognize me at the meeting today... really odd."

"This was before he left."

"Oh. Well, it still sucks. I want you to know that there are still people out there that remember what you gave up. It's not easy doing the right thing, but even if everyone spits on you, never lose that pride. You earned it. Alright?"

"Yeah. Thanks, Steven."

He slides the chopped carrots into a pot beside him. "No, thank you, Amy. I'll be in touch."

"Sure thing."

The video feed clicks off, and Amy sighs heavily.

Well, now I have to bring all my stuff back in here.

Part 404b: The Slammer

Marie lights her 'siguhret' on fire and breathes it in. She told me it makes her feel good, though I think it smells stinky. I don't understand why something so smelly would be enjoyable, but I don't know a lot of other things. It's better I don't ask.

Marie looks at her wrist gadget. "He's almost here. Just another minute or so."

Master is coming! I knew he couldn't just leave me behind! I mean, I was a little worried that he had sent me off with the mean man to punish me, but it turns out he just wanted me to stay with Marie for a while.

Marie is very kind. Master can be vicious, but he has a tender side he won't admit to. Marie, however, is always smiling at me, and she gives me the tasty rectangle bars. I do prefer peat-zuh, but the bars have a nice sweet taste to them. Marie says that's because they have 'shuh-ger' I don't know what shuh-ger is, but maybe Master could get some for me.

Marie doesn't say anything to me for a while, but finally, she mumbles something out loud, all while staring at the building wall-lifter thing. "I wonder if Jason is trustworthy."

I nod along, but I don't think she is asking me a question.

"I'm going to regret this, aren't I?"

She's hardly finished speaking, when Master appears abruptly, his figure visible behind the see-through doors on the wall-lifter. The doors hiss open, and he steps out, that same handsome expressionless look on his face.

I want to say something, but I yawn instead and stretch my arms out. Marie didn't let me get a wink of sleep last night. She just sat there, educating me about a bunch of dull things concerning angels, humans, and aliens. I just wanted to sleep, but she wouldn't let me!

"Did you two even sleep last night?"

Master seems to read my mind, which makes me blush a little bit. It's a tad embarrassing that he can tell I'm tired, but he must realize it's because we were working all night. I think he'll like that.

He pulls me closer to him, and the three of us walk down the hallways to wherever it is he's going, and Marie chats with him about this and that. I don't understand most of it. Several times, men and women will be walking down the hall and pass by us, and each time they will raise their right hands up to their foreheads and pause until Master does the same. I wonder why they do that? It looks like a sign of respect, but the demons never did that to him. Perhaps Master is a very powerful person, after all?

I mean, he can turn invisible and pop away into different places, plus he made me stronger just by talking, so he has magic just like demons do. That's what I would call powerful, right?

But the people around here in the human world don't look at him like that. He has a different kind of power, like how other demons respect Yama. Master is significant here; he is a figure of authority. I just didn't know that when I met him in the labyrinth.

As Master speaks with Marie, I pull up a little closer to him until our bodies touch. He doesn't notice and seems to be mostly ignoring me, but he does have his arm over my shoulder. Somewhere, deep down, I have this weird feeling, like he has met another woman. It's just a thought, and probably doesn't mean anything. Even if he did, I wouldn't mind. He can have two slaves, or ten, or a hundred. I just don't want him to forget me!

Minutes pass and we arrive at a big sliding door. Master pulls away and looks at me before walking inside. "Stay outside, just stand here at the door. We'll be out soon."

Marie laughs lightly. "These meetings can take up to five hours. Don't force the girl to stand the whole time."

"She can handle it."

He doesn't wave goodbye or anything, and both of them walk inside, leaving me all by myself. I yawn and lean against the wall beside the door. Five hours? Jeez. I'm so tired. I wanna sleep a little bit but I can't let Master down. He's depending on me to stand here, so that's what I'll do!

Another yawn and I blink my eyes a little slower before smacking my face. No! Bad Lora! I have to keep awake.

Why do you stay awake? Why not sleep?

A voice? I hear a voice in my head. Who is it?

I stand up a little straighter and look around. Nobody is around. I'm all alone beside this door... so who?

I can sense your confusion. I have seen you on many occasions, but you and I have never spoken. I am the servant of darkness, Blaarjiim.

You sound like a bad man.

I can't speak, but I talk back to him in my head. How can I hear you?

The one named Jason has me in his possession. It's something of a secret, so keep your mouth shut. Ah, wait, that's right... you cannot speak.

I want to... I just can't do it.

I fidget a little, and his voice continues. I have the ability to sense the desires, emotions, and feelings of those born into darkness. Jason holds an intense need to have power over his actions. He does not wish to be controlled by others. But what about you, young girl? I sense much fear in your heart, and only one wish...

You mean, what I want out of life?

Yes. Precisely. You wish for acceptance from Jason, but he rebukes you at every other turn. Such a shame, isn't it? Personally, I think you're too evil for even him.

Evil? You think I'm evil?

Oh yes, quite so. You were born in the darkness, formed by it. You pretend to smile and show compassion, but it is a falsehood. All it would take is a little push, and you could put your 'master' to shame. The events that led to your birth were created over untold eons, and you have yet to fully comprehend their scope.

I don't understand. You say a lot of weird things.

Don't you remember? Of course not. Jason erased your memories of the one he killed. He must see the same thing in you as I, or else he is blind. The way you killed a man with your bare hands, you tapped into a rage that you have always been forced to pretend doesn't exist. After all, no matter how angry you may have been at the death of your mother, you could never fight against a demon. You had to do as they said, no matter how vile the thought. That was your life.

I nod slowly and slump against the wall a little. I suppose... but I didn't mean to kill Danis! I just....

Snapped? Why wouldn't you? It was understandable. I am merely praising you for taking the initiative. My only hope is that your abilities are not wasted as a puppet in service to one with a weaker will. I believe there are truths about your life that you should seek to uncover. Only once you have reached your potential will you be able to make a final decision toward the one you call Master.

A final decision? Like what?

There's a long pause as a sinister face appears in my mind, smiling the whole time. Who knows? I cannot predict the future. Give me something amusing to watch, and we will see how everything unfolds.

I stagger back slightly as I feel his presence leave.

Amusing? He has to be toying with me. I don't trust him. I may have killed Danis, but I had to do it. He killed Melia and Sadie, and he tortured them the whole time. They couldn't fight back, so I had to be their tool for revenge.

But what did Blaarjiim mean when he said there were truths about my life I didn't know? Was he just babbling?

I feel a chill that makes me look around, but there's nobody else here.

I rub my arms and lean back against the wall, wondering to myself where Blaarjiim went. A man that can speak directly into your mind without you seeing him is... a little unsettling.

A minute later, I jump in surprise as the door hisses open. I didn't think the meeting would be over so soon! I quickly turn to face whoever's leaving the room, only for a shudder to go down my body. The man stepping out is someone I didn't ever want to see again.

Danis.

"Eep!" A small squeak slips out my mouth as he starts to walk past me. Is he going to attack? Is he trying to hurt me?!

Get away! I shove him away reflexively and flinch, and a second later a tremendous crash sounds throughout the room. I suddenly realize what I've done and look up to see his body smashed against the wall opposite me. Every bone is broken in different directions, and his arms and legs are facing different directions than they should be, with his head falling forward at an awkward angle.

Just then, Master appears in the doorway, out of breath, his eyes darting to me and then to the body against the wall. My eyes plead with him, but he once again seems to read my mind.

"You may not have meant to do this, but you did. I'll try and clean your mess up. You just behave yourself for a bit."

Marie shows up beside him and curls her lip up in disgust. "Stupid girl. We'll have to take care of this later."

Oh no... oh no... I screwed up big time. This is really bad!

The sound of boots down the hallway makes me turn my head back just in time to see a bunch of people running towards me, all of them in white suits with helmets like I saw Master fight in the Labyrinth before. They aim their guns at me. "Halt! You're under arrest!"

I start to pull back in fear, but a stinging in my side makes me decide not to. Master pokes me in the ribs. "Don't resist. Let them take you away. We'll deal with this ourselves. You need to reflect on this failure."

His words make me feel horrible all of a sudden. I didn't... I didn't mean for this to happen... oh god... It was an accident!

Slowly I walk to the men in the white armor and bow my head. They jump at me and shove me against a wall, wrenching my arms behind my back painfully. Even my strength would have a hard time going up against their suits.

One on them wraps something around my neck, and suddenly my body feels heavy. I turn to look at Master, but he's already turning away, shaking his head. He's... angry at me.

I'm barely given time to understand what's going on. The men shove me away and I feel even more tired than I did before. The back of my neck stings, as if someone keeps poking it with a knife.

We walk in silence, two on each side, while the persons closest on my right and left grab my arms, guiding me along. Their grip is intense and I want to tell them to let go, but I can't make the words come out. This pain is nothing, however... Master would be even more ashamed of me if he learned later that I cried.

It takes a long time, but the men in armor drag me here and there, pausing at various stations and wall-lifters to take me through different buildings. Soon I don't even know where I am anymore. Everything is unfamiliar, and I start feeling a little scared. How far are they going to take me? What if they send me back to Yama? Will Master come for me?

We stop at a big place with lots of flying ships, just like the station where Master and I first arrived when we got to Earth. This one is different from where we arrived before, and it has a lot of mean looking men, all of them wearing neck-things just like me.

"Put these prisoners in Holding. We'll get to them when the courts are ready in the morning!" A man in a fancy suit yells out to someone else, and then I'm forced to follow along in between all the other people with the neck-things.

It doesn't take long before I understand what's going on. They're loading me onto a flying ship, and all of these prisoners are being sent to 'Holding'. I don't know what Holding is, but it sounds like a scary place.

* * *

Hours pass, and the ship arrives at its destination. I kept falling asleep several times on the way, but the thought of all these people watching me kept waking me up and making me feel nervous. I watch through the ship window as a whole new planet appears outside. We went somewhere far, far from Master. He won't be able to find me here. I'm... I'm never going to see him again, am I?

It was all my fault. I killed Danis again, a second time. I brought shame on Master. He will probably want to beat me if he sees me again, just like Yama and the other demons did whenever I messed up. Other girls even got killed if they did a bad enough job.

I didn't want to be bad, it just happened. What do I do now? I'm all on my own.

The ship flies for another half hour, but soon we've landed, and I eventually end up just outside a room with big metal bars that go down from the ceiling in rows. The two guards at this place sneer when they look at me. Both of them look like vicious men.

"So you killed Admiral Danis, eh? He put a lot of people in this place, you know. I'm sure you'll have lots of friends here. You'll fit right in, killer."

They both smile at me, but their expressions are false, as if they can't wait to see bad things happen to me. "You gonna say anything, stupid? Or are you deaf?"

I shake my head, but they both just laugh. "Look at her! She's scared stiff! Can't even talk." He jerks a hand forward, and I pull back out of fear, but I realize he's only taking the painful neck-thing off. Once he does, he pushes me into the little room with the bars. He slams the gate shut and presses a button on a gadget on his wrist. There's a clicking sound and the door secures itself. "You're a cutie. Just so you know, if they sentence you to hard time, and they will since you're a murderer, you'll go to prison. You know what prison is, right?"

I shake my head slowly and pull back from them.

"You don't? It was supposed to be a rhetorical question. Well, you'll find out. Oh, and prison is dual-gender. They say you killed Danis by pulverizing him against a wall. I hope that's enough to protect you."

The men share a knowing nod with each other. "You're gonna rot, bitch! Admiral Danis was a friend of the prison wardens here on Tarus. You ain't getting off easy!"

Both of them turn and walk away at the same time, leaving me to sit by myself, until soon I can't hear them anymore.

I feel my strength returning though. I could get out of here... if I had to. Should I? Master said to behave, so does that mean he's coming to get me? But I'm so far away! How can he possibly find me on a whole new planet?! He told me about the 'galacksee' once. It sounds enormous... way too big for me to see him again.

I don't know... I'll have to do something, but for now, I'm exhausted.

There's a bed in the room. I'll take a nap, and maybe when I wake up, I'll know what to do.

Part 405b: Tarus II

"I can't believe she killed him. I mean, I can, there just wasn't any hesitation. It may have even been unintentional." The words flow freely as I pace back and forth, and Marie watches silently as she leans against a wall. "I'm the Supreme Commander! Can't I get her out of jail?"

My question makes Marie smile. "Jail? We've abolished those. There are only prisons and work camps these days. Since she's a woman, she'll automatically be put into the prison system since we don't allow women to work in the mines. Of course, if she hadn't committed a murder, then house arrest or community service would be possible, but that doesn't apply here."

I pause my pacing to look at Marie in surprise. "Seriously? That doesn't seem a little... gender biased to you?"

"It's not for the reason you think. Down in the mines, too much can happen where the lighting is dim. We had many incidents in the past that were unspeakably awful. I personally believe the women should have just learned to fight back, but it wasn't my decision. The executive administration, lead by Danis, was the one to change those laws. He valued the lives of women, and thus he fought for their rights. He was a good man, you know."

"A good man? Are you positive?"

She nods and stares at me in disbelief. "Yes, and he was killed by your plaything. Danis never once broke the law, he always fought for the rights of demons and the oppressed. When I needed him to quell an insurrection on a planet not long ago, he made sure to use the law to do so. Ironical... he was killed by a person whose rights he helped secure."

I lick my lips slowly. "Yeah... about that. You don't know Danis very well." I start to say something else, but pause as an officer from the crime scene investigation walks up and hands Marie a datapad. "Signature, please. We're done here. Everything was recorded."

Marie looks at me meaningfully, then back to the man. "So there's full evidence of guilt?"

"Obviously we haven't established intent yet, but the entire scene has been processed. It's a level one offense. No provocation. Just sign off here, and we'll send this to the courts."

Marie coughs into her fist and sighs. "That's that, then." With a flurry of movement, she signs the pad, then stamps her thumb onto the finger scanner. The man leaves shortly after and she pulls away from the wall. "There won't be a trial for her. The judge for this district was a good friend of Danis, and the evidence is overwhelming. She's going straight to prison. Fifty thousand years."

My jaw drops slightly. "That's outrageous! Why so long?!"

"It's not long at all, somewhat lenient even. Given who Lora killed, as well as the fact that all humans are immortal. Look, you told me that you come from the ancient times, so you probably have primitive notions about the rule of law. An immortal's life is immeasurably more valuable than a mortal's, so if you kill an immortal, you deny them the rest of their permanent existence. The only reason we don't support execution is because rehabilitation is usually possible. After a few thousand years-

"Tens of thousands." I correct her, but she continues as if I hadn't said a thing.

"...she will be released if she managed good behavior during her imprisonment, and the rehabilitation and memory purging were successful."

I open my mouth to reply, but something doesn't sit right with me. "Memory purging? That's... a little..."

"It's perfectly normal. Haven't you ever had memories you wished to forget? The trauma of the past can't hurt you if you don't remember it. Likewise, if our psychologists can isolate the cause of aberrant behavior, such as that which leads a lovely girl to murder a person who fights for justice, then she will be safe to return to the general population."

Eh, I'd be a hypocrite to denounce memory purging. She has a point. There's a short silence as I mull her words over and decide to switch gears. "You've got it all wrong about Danis. You didn't know the man very well."

She scoffs at me and rolls her eyes. "Oh, and you did? You've been out of a cryopod for a few weeks and knew the Admiral for all of ten minutes. Don't make me laugh."

I cross my arms slowly and keep my gaze even. "Marie, haven't you noticed Admiral Danis acting... strange? A little out of the ordinary?"

No hesitation. "Not in the slightest. Why?"

I wipe at my forehead before returning my arms to their crossed position. "I killed Danis already. The man in that meeting today was a clone I created to replace him."

Marie's face slowly contorts from an expression of disbelief to one of shock. "You can't be serious."

"I can, and I am. I met Danis in the labyrinth, only a few days after I awoke from the cryopod. I was living with the demons when I met Lora. I've already told you the demons turned her mute... but..."

Marie raises her hand to silence me. "Hold a moment. I don't know why I never pieced this together before, perhaps because I was preoccupied... why was Lora living with the demons?"

"She was a slave, as well as dozens, even hundreds of others. The demons only kept female slaves though, for some reason."

"Oh. I see."

She nods at me to continue, so I do. "Anyway, I met Danis when I was walking with Lora to her old slave room. He was in there, along with two of the other slave women. He had killed both of them, and was... well, he was... violating their corpses."

Marie purses her lips. "An unbelievable story. I suspect that you're lying."

"I have no reason to lie."

"You want your bloody-haired girlfriend released from prison. That is a plenty good enough reason for me."

She doesn't believe me. Shit. If I have to leave Lora in prison, I will, since it was her fault. But the blame is also partly on me for not paying attention. Still, Danis was a scumbag corrupt piece of shit. The demons might be bad, but he had to be worse. I don't want Lora to rot on his account.

Before I can think of a way to convince her, Marie shrugs. "Don't worry about it. Once we sit down and hear Danis' side, the truth will reveal itself. I'll personally grill him to see if your story checks out."

I stare at her blankly for a second. "How- what? Are you going to interrogate his corpse? He's dead."

She nods at me like I'm an idiot. "Yes, he's dead, but he's an angel now. Ah, wait, I forgot. You're new to modern life. The resurrection system guarantees all humans a second shot at life if they should die. This is half of the reason why prayer is mandatory- or did you not know that yet?"

I nod. "Sarah told me in passing. I didn't think about the implications. So you're saying Danis isn't even dead?"

Marie shakes her head. "No, his human existence is over. Once he became an angel, he ceased to be a part of human society. We can go to heaven and speak with angels, and, under special circumstances, they may leave Heaven and come to Earth, as well as other parts of human society, but they may no longer hold office or lead a fulfilling career. Former humans also must abandon any relationships they may have had with other humans, such as with wives and husbands."

I'm stunned. I hadn't realized the resurrection system was a major part of this society. "Even if Danis does have to abandon everything, he's still alive! Why does Lora have to spend fifty thousand years in a prison if he's not actually dead?!"

"She took away the rest of his human existence. The fact that he is still alive, as an angel, is part of the reason why we don't execute violent criminals. If he and other humans were obliterated entirely on death, then I suspect capital punishment would very much be in effect. Really, you may not be used to the idea of living for tens of millions of years, but fifty thousand is a drop in the bucket. Her sentence is extremely lenient, given the circumstances."

Marie lights another cigarette and takes a long breath from it, and I ponder the future while she does. "Marie, when you realize I'm telling the truth about Danis, will you let Lora go free? He harmed her many times in the past. She had reason to be fearful for her life."

"When I do? You mean if I do. But in any case, if we should find that Danis the monster you say he is, Lora will likely go free, or at least her punishment will be greatly reduced. Moreover, if one of the most influential members of my perfect society is a murderous necrophiliac, as you claim, then I have bigger things to worry about. It calls into question the entire notion my society is based on."

My eyes sweep over her body, looking for cracks in the surface. "You're rather bad at reading people. The fact you had no idea of what he was doing... that says a lot about you."

"Oh come on, Jason. If you're telling the truth about him and not just slandering an innocent man, then he fooled much more people than just me. I'm not omniscient by any means. I merely designed the system that elevates those who are deserving."

"You're saying a corpse-fucker deserved a promotion to Admiral?"

She fumes at me silently before shaking her cigarette in my direction. "I can't wait to prove you're a liar. Once I speak with Danis, and I find the truth, you'll feel the heat."

I shake my head slowly. "I won't. Danis was a horrible man. If he was at the top echelons of humanity, then that tells me something about the rest of them. After all... Yama spoke of others who would use his services."

"Yama, huh?" Marie shoves the cigarette back in her mouth. "He's a demon emperor, Jason. Even if you did see Danis down there, who's to say he wasn't manipulated by the likes of Yama? If I can make a person change their way of thinking without using magic, I'm certain a demon emperor could with the stuff."

"You're making excuses for him? Whatever. I'll prove it to you when the time is right." I wave at her flippantly. "I'm gonna go take a walk. I need to clear my head."

"Fine. Do as you please. Just don't try anything stupid, like trying to break your sex-toy out of prison."

"I wouldn't think of it." Marie and I share an amused glare with one another. Despite her harsh words, she's definitely committed to proving Danis is a good man. At least she has a naive faith in him, or it might be for a different reason entirely. I had thought based on my first impression of her that she was a jaded bitch, someone who controlled the galaxy with an iron fist, but she takes pride in helping create a utopian society.

Hell, even if things aren't perfect, there's still the rule of law here, people lead fulfilling lives, government is mostly functional... if the world I came from had kept going on the path it was heading, the failures of the world leaders would have eventually driven humanity to a third world war. I can't know that for sure, but it was very likely.

Compared with that bleak future, a galaxy spanning empire is not that bad.

My only question is... how did Marie manage to get to the top of this system? And if she designed it, why did people in the boardroom not think very highly of her? Is she hiding her true authority from them?

Oh. I see. She must have been telling that limp-wristed Jason before me to do what she wanted him to do. I'll bet she expects the same of me too, eh? Yeah, we'll see about that.

I turn to walk away, and Marie speaks up. "Oh, before you go, let me call someone. He'll show you around and answer any questions you might have."

I stifle a chuckle. I see exactly what's going on. She's going to have someone follow me around and keep an eye on me.

She taps a few buttons on her datapad, and a few minutes later I start to turn away again. "I'll be okay, but thanks for the offer."

"He's here." Marie points behind me, and I turn to see the black man from yesterday approaching me. Benjamin Brown is his name, as I recall.

Ugh, guess I'm stuck having her lapdog follow me around. When he's not looking, I'll make a quick getaway.

He stops a few feet away and nods at me. "I'll be showing you around, then."

"Aren't you going to say hello?" Marie winks at him seductively, and for once, his stony expression cracks, and he smiles at her, ever so slightly.

"Miss Becker. I'll see you later tonight."

"That you will."

I shoot a look from her to him and raise a knowing eyebrow. Interesting. I guess they aren't just colleagues, after all.

I push past him, and he turns around and follows after me. I have no idea where I'm going, but the journey might just teach me a few new things about this society I live in.

* * *

The flying ship lands on the dock, and the other prisoners are ushered out before me. The painful stinging thing is wrapped around my neck again, and my wrists are bound by metal cuffs, but otherwise, the guards gave me rectangle bars to eat, and the bed was comfortable in my cell. I'm scared of what awaits me in Prison, since the other people in 'Holding' told me Prison is a dangerous place to be. Only murderers like me go there, and there aren't very many women in there.

I look back and count quickly. Thirty-three men, one woman, plus myself. Master can't possibly find me here. I don't know where I am anymore, not at all.

I look up at the sky and stare in awe. The sky is a green color, and the wind has a stinging feeling to it. It bites into my skin bitterly, but it isn't cold or hot. The bright round light-ball in the sky is less bright than the one on Earth, and redder than it too. That one was slightly orange.

As I look up, someone shoves me forward, but he accidentally pushes himself backward and falls on his butt. I'm too strong to be pushed around like that, even though I'm shorter than the men around me. I turn back to look at him and realize he's wearing a guard uniform.

"What happened?" Another guard walks over to his friend on the ground, who is now standing up.

The guy who fell over leans in and whispers to his friend, but I can hear what he says. "I was trying to shove that daydreaming bitch back in line, but it felt like I was pushing against a steel wall. The hell is she made of?"

This grim situation should make any feeling of happiness evaporate, but somehow his words make me want to smile. I face forward again and quickly get back in line, just in case. These guards have all the power, just like the lesser demons in Yama's domain. Even if he couldn't push me over, deliberately making him mad will just hurt me in the long run.

I have to think about long term survival. Prison is going to be harsh if the Holding guards were right.

We walk across a field with many little green sticks poking out of the ground straight up. The sticks are soft and collapse under my weight as I walk. There must be thousands of them, millions even. Some of the sticks stand up taller than others, and have yellow, red, and other colored balls on top, with soft symmetrical pads surrounding them.

They're beautiful. I've never seen anything like them in my life. The green stretches far off into the distance, where vehicles drive around, here and there. The building we're being led to has a large fence around it, with a big gate that opens up to let us enter. I'd rather sit on the soft green sticks and roll around, but the guards are carrying weapons like those men in white did that Master fought in the Labyrinth. I don't want to die, so I'll be obedient.

The prisoners continue walking for many long minutes, and we enter a large hollowed out cavern inside a mountain. I only know it's called a mountain because Master explained a few things like this to me when we would sleep together at night. I never replied, but he seemed content to do all the talking.

We arrive at a checkpoint and the guards remove the neck-stingers, letting us breathe easier. A tall woman steps forward and faces us, her white uniform contrasting with the other guard's blue uniforms.

"Greetings, criminals and you bad-mannered pieces of shit! I'm Warden Scullis, and welcome to Tarus II, the main prison colony for most of humanity's undesirables! You will be staying here for a very long time, so listen carefully! My rules are law in here! No fighting, complaining, talking back, stealing, or doing anything unpleasant while you stay here! The punishments in this particular prison complex are much harsher than others on Tarus II, because I'm the one running the show! Admiral Danis, may god bless his soul, gave me full reign to run this place how I like, and that is just what I'll do!"

She pauses to glare at me. "And in case anyone here doesn't know, this bitch killed our grand leader! Admiral Danis was a man born to lead, with a charisma far beyond his years. This woman executed him in cold blood with no provocation, not even for a perceived slight! I'd watch out if I were you..." She pauses to look at a tablet in her hand. "...Lora. No last name? What, not good enough for you?"

The warden stares at me for a few moments. "You going to say anything?"

I continue staring stonily at her, and she nods at a man beside me. I feel the pressure in the air long before his fist hits my kidney. The impact does nothing to me, but he pulls back his hand and shakes it in surprise, wincing the whole time. "Saint Joseph! I feel like I punched a rock!"

"Oh?" Warden Scullis smiles sweetly at me. "So it's not just an act? I wondered how a little girl like you could take down the Admiral with a palm thrust. You must have trained for millennia to get a body as strong as that. You'll have plenty of free-time in this prison to exercise more, but I'll make sure you have special work privileges, so you keep busy. After reviewing the footage of your murderous act, we prepared a unique cell, just for you."

She covers her mouth up and turns away. "Ah, I didn't want to spoil the surprise. You will see!"

Scullis walks away without another word, allowing everyone to breathe a sigh of relief. I expected a longer speech, but I guess she was only interested in me. I already have so many enemies... was Danis loved by these people? Why? He was an awful man. I did the world a favor by killing him... even if it did make Master hate my guts.

We're shuffled off down the hall and my shoulders slump again. Master definitely despises me. I failed in every sense of the word and was locked up. Why would he waste his precious time looking for me? I can't pretend I'll be important to him. Knowing him, he'll forget me in a few weeks.

The main prison appears before us, and I gasp when I see how big it is. It must be fifty stories tall, with a hundred thousand people here. I've never seen so many humans all at once. Many are walking around, their hands clasped together, but most are in their cells, with bars of iron and steel preventing them from getting out. Why do some get to walk around, but others don't?

We're led along, with some prisoners in my group getting pushed into this cell or that one, but eventually, it's just me and the other female prisoner left. She's a little taller than me, with matted brown hair that has natural curls, which are the opposite of my straight hair. Her hair goes down to just below her shoulders, but mine stops at the bottom of my neck.

She sees me looking at her and grimaces. "Keep your eyes to yourself."

I look away, not wanting to offend her. I'm scared of many things, but a fellow woman is not one of them.

I begin to hear a buzzing noise up ahead, and before I can wonder what it is, the guards stop the other woman and me in front of a different looking cell. Unlike the ones we've passed before, which have beds, toilets, and bedding... this cell lacks a bed. It only has the ground and a toilet on the inside.

More importantly, it is not blocked by steel bars like the others, but bars that glow blue. I feel an electrical sensation just from standing a few feet away. A guard behind me chuckles out loud. "Heh, this cell has electrified bars. Scullis didn't want to take a chance on you being able to bend metal, so she set this cell up just for you." He's talking to me, but he jabs the girl beside me. "You'll be locked in here with her too. I hope you're the friendly type."

She doesn't respond, and the guard sneers at her. He waves at another down the hall, and the cell pops open, opening automatically out toward us. Both of us step inside, and the guard reaches for my cuffs. "I'll take these off, but one wrong move and my partner blasts ya. Got it?"

I nod, and he removes the cuffs on both of us. "Smart girls. Welcome to Hell."

He leaves, and the door shuts, but all I can do is smile. If only that man knew what Hell really was.

Part 406b:

Ben and I walk for several minutes without saying anything. I keep wondering to myself how I'm going to ditch him without it looking suspicious, but also if I should even try. He's close to Marie, and the two of them are in a relationship of some sort. I can probably get information about Marie from him if I play my cards right. She's shaping up to be the one person capable of opposing me in this galaxy, not counting Zeus. The 'king of gods' is a pretty damn scary figure to go up against, so I'd rather he not end up as my enemy.

We soon arrive on the middle platform between the Megascraper where I live, and the Stratoscraper where I work. I pause to look down through the glass floor once again. The ground isn't visible beneath us, except for patches where the clouds don't cover, and those areas are brown and ugly.

"How do I get to Heaven?"

The question comes to me, and I decide to break the silence finally, if only just because the hushed figure of the man nearly my height is making me feel uneasy. If we just keep walking wordlessly, I'll end up at my suite with Sarah once again... not that I'd complain. I certainly enjoy her company, but now that I'm not in the same room as her, the feeling she exudes in me isn't quite so sharp.

Ben doesn't answer for several seconds, instead opting to stare at a man leaning against a wall in the distance, chatting to someone on his wrist communicator. I could probably hear his conversation if I enhanced my hearing, but it doesn't seem important enough to try.

"You're the Supreme Commander, technically, so it's just a matter of going to the Lirius system and using their warp-gate. Why do you ask?" His voice has an edge of suspicion to it. I can easily tell he's not a trusting man.

"I want to speak with Danis."

"Why? If you talk to him, Miss Becker will be forced to assume you altered his mind with Wordsmithing. Your friend will not be freed even if his testimony wasn't affected. In fact, she'll be presumed even more guilty than she already is now, and you'll be under suspicion too."

I lick my lips slowly. Fucking hell, I shouldn't have asked. Now that he knows what I want to do, I can't even try to contact Danis subtly, or Marie might find out. If that bastard lies and Marie believes him, I'll be in deep shit.

"Fine. I won't bother. What do I do, then?"

Ben shoots me an incredulous look. "I don't follow."

"I need to know more about this galaxy. Marie expects me to step in as Supreme Commander, but I haven't the faintest idea what the political situation is. If Marie doesn't want any blunders on her hand, I need to be debriefed on everything I should know."

Ben nods slowly and gives me a meaningful look. "Of course, Miss Becker doesn't trust you yet, and neither do I. Giving you knowledge only makes you more dangerous. Jason 12F never killed anyone, yet you wiped him out with no mercy. The two of you are incomparable."

I shrug nonchalantly and lean against a wall to my side, as several attractive women pass by us, not noticing who I am. It's much more pleasant standing where so many people are congregating, since they're less likely to salute me. The constant attention I have to pay to formality is somewhat stifling; a feeling echoed in faint memories from the other Jason.

"You think so? Funny, you know about my Wordsmithing, along with Marie. How many other people do?"

My question causes Ben to stop and glance away as he calculates the number. "Hmm. Not many. Miss Becker and your senior, the former Jason, were cautious not to let that information slip. Even his children didn't know about his ability to use magic, though his wife, Sarah, did." He raises an eyebrow and grins toothily at me, a look he hasn't done at all in the short time I've known him. "Speaking of which, I bet you're enjoying Sarah's company, eh? She's quite the specimen."

"She is incredibly beautiful, but what do you mean by 'specimen'?"

His smile vanishes. "Nothing, forget it. I'm around Marie so much; I get used to speaking like her sometimes. She's an analytical person, who is almost dehumanizing to those she considers worth looking into. She has always been interested in examining the emotional center of the brain since she believes the Volgrim's approach to erasing emotion might lead to a better society."

"The Volgrim?"

Even as I ask, images of bipedal aliens closely resembling humans, yet possessing eerie non-human-like mouths enter my mind. Now that I think about them, I realize I've heard their species mentioned a few times, but I never thought to inquire more carefully.

"You ask a lot of questions." Ben sighs and stamps his foot on the glass, making my heart tremble slightly. The glass is probably highly reinforced and very durable, but the thought of it breaking and me plunging to my death doesn't excite me.

"I told you already... I need to know more."

He reaches up and fans his hand through his curly black hair thoughtfully. "I could answer all of your questions, but that would bore me to tears. Marie doesn't keep me around for my intelligence, knowledge, or anything like that. She keeps me around because I can read people, and I'm very good at it."

"Is that so?" I smirk and cross my arms at him. "Yet you trusted Danis."

"I most certainly did not. I do not believe the man was as bad as you say he was, but I am always acutely aware of the potential for corruption in a human-run government. The only reason Marie even uses humans is due to the banning of high-level artificial intelligence. She can't possibly run everything herself, so she gives the menial tasks of keeping other humans happy to, well, other humans."

He stomps his foot again thoughtfully and scratches the back of his neck. "Alright, that settles it. Come with me. I know how to answer your questions. I can't say if Marie will approve, but you have access to the previous Supreme Commander's memories anyway, so this can't be much more revealing than that."

He turns and walks back the way we just came, leaving me staring at his back in confusion. I relent and follow after him, simply because I want to know what is so secret he might get in trouble with his boss for showing me.

* * *

A half hour later, we have traveled past ten stratoscrapers and megascrapers alike, and we arrive in another nondescript megascraper that looks exactly like all the other ones.

"Why do all the buildings look the same? Makes it hard to tell one from the other, don't you think?"

Ben chuckles. "Marie doesn't believe in style. Things like art are superfluous. While I disagree, I also understand the feeling. These buildings have to be structured a specific way to support the immense strain on the lower and middle floors. Rather than allow for artistic freedom that might compromise their structure, Marie standardized all their designs. Considering the first Cloudscraper ever built collapsed into a pile of rubble and killed ten million people, with a hundred million suffering long term complications over the years following, I think her reasoning is sound."

I nod as he presses his hand onto a wall. An unseen panel pops out, and he glances around quickly before typing in a long series of digits, far too swiftly for my eyes to even follow. A false wall slides open, and I raise my eyebrows in surprise. "What is this?"

He doesn't answer, instead opting to shove me inside and follow after, only exhaling once the door closes. "Speak of this to nobody. Marie has several facilities where she keeps her secret projects. I am one of only three people who know the locations of all of them."

"Who's the third person?"

"You. More specifically, the previous Supreme Commander. The fact you have his memories means you might remember their locations anyway, so she can't get too pissed off at me. That being said, this is a red-level location, so its existence is hidden. No records of it are stored anywhere."

He taps a panel on the wall and I feel a pit form in my stomach as the familiar feeling of a descending hover-shaft makes me shift slightly. It passes after a few seconds, but I still feel slightly queasy.

"So, what you're saying is... this place is so secret that even the council leaders don't know about it?"

Ben isn't moved at all by the sudden rapid descent to the surface below. " Epecially not them. Some of her projects contain fail-safes. Reset buttons. Insurance in case of the worst possibilities."

I stare at him silently for several moments. "Such as... a Wordsmith turned enemy?"

"Use your imagination."

He doesn't directly answer my question, but the faint threat hangs in the air. These facilities are not superfluous. Marie has had a living weapon under her control for tens of millions of years, always worrying in the back of her mind that he might turn against her. I'll bet that in spite of her smugness toward me, she's scrambling to find those old projects again, just in case.

Minutes pass, and the two of us chat emptily about banal things. I glance up at the floor counter and frown. "It says we're on the first floor, but it hasn't moved in over a minute."

"This elevator's display doesn't go lower than ground level since all the underground levels don't exist on any known blueprint. Red level facilities are hidden in a variety of creative places. This one specifically was built underground, forty miles down, and is surrounded by magma. It took 3,000 years to build, and is structured in such a way it could be destroyed at a moment's notice with the proper authorization."

"You mean you'd flood the facility with lava? What about the research? The projects?"

Ben smiles again, this time more faintly than the last time he used that expression. "Marie can always recreate them. Her mind is a steel trap. That is what I love about her." He quickly realizes what he said, and the smile vanishes as quickly as it came. "In any case, the real danger is letting red-level technology fall into the wrong hands. Not just corrupt humans, but the Volgrim, demons, and even the angels. At least the latter two are too foolish to know how most technology works, but the alien menace have their own secrets. Marie estimates that our weaponry and her genius gives us a 14% edge in a galactic war against them. That becomes a deficit if they acquire our military secrets."

He glances down at his wrist communicator, and I take the opportunity to prod for more questions. "Are the demons even a threat? Why bother with a proxy war if most people don't think about their existence at all?"

He shakes his head at me. "It's all part of her system. The Volgrim are a means to an end, and that end is artificial scarcity."

"I don't get it."

"It's complicated. I don't suppose you know about Energy Credits?"

I shake my head, and he sighs again. "Yeah, I didn't think so. The military consumes about sixty percent of all energy resources that humanity has to offer. The cover story for this is that we need that energy to fight the Demons... but its real purpose is to guard against the Volgrim. To say there is peace between our species is highly fallacious. We've had a cold war brewing for so long I sometimes have to remind myself it exists. Our relations are frosty at best. They see us as emotional primitives, and most humans see them as dispassionate cyborgs."

"What does that have to do with Energy Credits?"

I feel a slight shift as the hover-shaft begins to slow down. Ben notices it too, and he smirks. "Funny you ask. Energy credits are earned by being a loyal citizen. There's only so much energy to go around, even by harnessing the power of stars for our purposes. Replicators require so much energy that they're disgustingly wasteful. Food is reconditioned on the cheap, made from processed garbage. And... what I'm going to show you today would ordinarily cost a huge amount of energy credits. Fortunately, Marie keeps a secret fusion generator for each red facility."

He looks at me knowingly. "It's illegal to possess a private source of energy, so you know. Of course, a few select individuals are technically exempt from this mandate. I'm sure you'll understand why."

The hover-shaft slows to a stop and its door hisses open to reveal a long and narrow obsidian-colored hallway leading to a similarly-textured door at the end, nearly 100 feet away. "I can make a guess or two. I still don't see why you would prevent individuals from creating energy for themselves though."

We start walking down the hallway toward the door and his expression darkens. "We experimented once, and gave an extensively planned colony unlimited energy, full replicator and holodeck access. Ten million people. The results were devastating. Over the course of a short five years, they became entitled complainers. Their work halted. They spent more time on holodecks living out fantasies and eating and doing whatever they wanted than they ever did working. If we allowed that to happen with the general populace, humanity as a whole would collapse."

We arrive at the door, and I frown at him. "So you prevent people from having good food and fun... just because they won't work? Isn't that what robots should be doing? What's wrong with having a good time?"

He leans in to allow his eyes to be scanned, then pulls away and presses his hand on a scanner. "Nothing. Recreation is still allowed, but we have to maintain tight controls on the populace. Even Marie knows that to prevent people from having leisure time would be to invite chaos and rioting. Hell, we had that issue on Goldesh, not even four hundred years ago."

"Goldesh?" The name sparks my memory slightly, as the door opens up in front of us. "I heard that name recently."

Ben doesn't answer, and we step into a colossal room, the scale of which reminds me of the area in Yama's lair where I trained Lora and Silvia. Computer screens are scattered all over the place, with large barriers sectioning off several areas where giant machines sit. I spot several slumped over robots in one corner, and a large tank-like vehicle in another. So many objects are visible that I can hardly process them all.

"I wouldn't be shocked. Marie tells me that your girlfriend has Goldeshian blood in her veins."

"She isn't my girlfriend. And how would you know she's Goldeshian anyway? Why would you check her blood?"

He walks forward, and I follow after him. "Marie scanned her, of course. She wasn't about to let an unknown agent stay in her suite. The fact Lora is from Goldesh is quite concerning, given the history of that system."

I wait for him to elaborate, but he doesn't bite. "So what happened?"

"I'm definitely not going to explain that. That's why I brought you here."

I stop speaking, and both of us walk in silence for several long minutes, until he rounds a corner into one of the blocked off alcoves. Inside the sectioned-off area, a helmet hangs from the ceiling, its wires going up into an unknown destination. A chair sits below it, rather stiff and uncomfortable looking, but with a decent amount of padding covering it.

"This is one machine Marie uses on a regular basis. It's the Mk. IIII Memory Molder. This device can download and upload memories at high rates of speed. It's like watching a holographic movie, except in your mind, and you're a part of the events. Unfortunately, due to the amount of energy it consumes while moving petabytes of information every second, it isn't feasible to mass-produce, or holodecks would be rendered obsolete. Marie considered a mass-market version once that merely imprinted onto memories, but the possibility of something going wrong and wiping a person's brain, or a developer error making a memory-movie spam itself ten billion times and over filling their brain... those were not good odds."

A bead of sweat rolls down my scalp. "Uh... so you... want me to take that thing and... put it on my head?"

He nods at me and smiles once again. "Oh, don't you worry! This model is perfectly safe! Marie uses it herself to refresh her memory on past events periodically. If you think Marie would take even a 1% chance of something going wrong with a machine she uses yearly, you're quite mistaken."

I feel slightly apprehensive as I walk over to it and sit down, and I pause to hold the lightweight metal helmet before I put it on. "Uh... if this thing can download and upload memories, what about altering memories?"

He nods at me nonchalantly, as if it doesn't matter at all. "I suppose it could. I've never used it for that purpose, but if she wanted, I'm sure Marie could reconfigure it as she wished."

Great. I'll have to make sure I'm never using this thing when Marie's holding the controls. Not that I trust Benjamin either. Anyone as close to Marie as he is must be one hell of a manipulator, and I have lots of experience in that field. I continue staring at the helmet for a while before finally resigning myself to whatever comes next, and I place it on my head. The fit is surprisingly snug, and it doesn't block my vision except for the edges.

Ben watches me and nods once it's on. "Alright. I've experienced this machine a few times myself. The first time I found the experience rather disorienting, but after that, it wasn't all too bad. Just lay back and get comfortable in that chair. The rest will take care of itself."

"What are you going to show me?"

He pauses thoughtfully. "Well, you need to learn about Goldesh if you plan to hold company with that woman, Lora, and you'll want to see some of our formative years as well, and how we created this society. If I show you too much, it could overwhelm your mind, so I'll keep the scope limited."

"Wonderful. Don't melt my brain, please."

I lean back in the chair and stiffen as I feel an electrical sensation against my scalp. Almost immediately, the world around me begins to blur, and that feeling of disorientation Benjamin warned me about spreads all through my body, nauseating me where I sit.

Just before the entire world fades away, I spare a glance at Ben. Did he smirk? It looked almost... almost like he...

My thoughts waver as the world fades away and a familiar person appears in front of my eyes.

It's... me? My face?

Part 407b:

At the back corner of my cell, there's an annoying dripping sound that makes it hard to sleep. The puddle of water that's formed under the metal pipe above makes an audible 'plop' noise whenever a drop of water falls off it.

I roll around a little on my blanket and sigh quietly to myself, then notice my cellmate opposite me has yet to go to sleep. We've been here for five hours, and she hasn't said a word to me. Obviously, I haven't said anything to her yet either.

I gaze at her silently as she spaces out at the floor, and finally, she raises her eyes to meet mine. "What? Why are you staring at me?"

I don't respond, and this quickly annoys her. "You don't talk much, do you?"

My head shake is the only response I can give. Her hard glare relaxes a bit, and she exhales through her nose in response. "Sorry, I don't mean to be a bitch. I shouldn't have been put here, honestly. I didn't even commit a crime. I just caught some of the other girls in my office engaging in illegal food trading. When I reported them, I found out my boss was involved, and it went up even higher than that. By the time I realized my mistake, they'd already framed me for murder."

Her life story condensed into a few sentences. Can't say I wanted to hear it, but if we're going to share a cell, we might as well get to know each other...

Since I don't respond, there's a long awkward silence, and I almost start to think that was the end of her outburst. Instead, she speaks up again. "Are you... mute?"

I nod. "The Warden said you killed Admiral Danis. Is that true?" When I nod again, she sighs heavily. "I always respected the Admiral. One of the reasons I reported my coworkers was because I thought it would be the right thing to do. Danis was a person who was tough on criminals... so if you murdered him, doesn't that make you a terrible person? An enemy of the law?"

My gut tells me to shake my head... but maybe she's right. Danis was a corrupt man, but I didn't have to kill him. Maybe I could have put him in Prison for what he did. Master explained to me what the Law was on our trip to Earth, along with many other things, but I never stopped to think that killing Danis made me a vile murderer, just as he was.

But if Danis was in charge of the prisons, then why would he have himself arrested?

Yeah... that's right. It would have been pointless trying to put him in prison. He has too many friends on the inside.

"No answer to that one, huh? It looks like even you haven't decided yet." She shifts around a little bit and glances at the cell bars. "I can't believe they put us in an electrified cell. But when that guard punched you, you didn't even flinch! I guess they're a little scared. You don't look like much, but you've got quite the bite. They don't want you acting out."

As if the winds of change heard her speak, two guards appear outside the cell and glare viciously at me, ignoring my cellmate entirely. "Prisoner 84721! You've got work duty today! It's just your luck; the other prisoners are dying to meet their new friend! And oh boy do we have the perfect job for you!"

I roll and flip out of bed smoothly, landing in an upright position and jumping to my feet, all in a single second. When I eyeball the guards, their smiles are gone. "Quite the agile kitten, aren't you? That's wonderful. Now we know you can handle it."

The lead guard waves his hand, and the blue color of the cell bars fades away. His companion aims a gun at me, and I raise my hands to show no resistance. I don't know how effective that gun is, but Master told me that their weapons could be too much for me to surpass unless I practice against them. We never got that far, due to my arrest.

The lead guard steps in and slinks around behind me, and when he attaches the collar, I can feel his hands trembling slightly. The moment it's fastened though, he breathes a sigh of relief. The collar activates, and I feel a familiar stinging sensation, but it doesn't feel as bad as it did before.

He walks back in front of me, and I resist an urge to roll my eyes. He must think the collar makes me docile and unable to fight back. "Let's get moving! The reconditioners aren't going to clean themselves!"

He leads me out of the cell, and as we walk away, I turn back and spot three other guards entering the cell. "Your friend is new, so she gets her own job to do. I hope she can handle it with the grace you're showing right now."

I feel apprehensive, but there's nothing I can do. I hope the other prisoners don't hurt her, but she has to be able to fend for herself. It's like Master always says, pain makes you more willing to change yourself and the way you live.

* * *

Minutes pass, and we arrive at a vast array of machines. Every other prisoner in this area is male, and all of them turn to look at me as we enter. The guards pretend not to notice, but I almost feel like they're parading me through to show off the new wares. I try to stand up a little straighter, but a buried feeling of obedience returns and I end up lowering my head meekly. This is my life now; I just have to accept it.

The guards walk up to a grate on the wall where a particularly stinky stench wafts out. "The food here in this prison is only 5% reconditioned, and the other 95% comes from our waste! We've had a hell of a clog for the last three weeks, and you get to be the lucky new inmate to reopen the canal! I hope that strength the Warden spoke of is real, or you'll be digging with your hands for a long time!"

A couple of prisoners nearby gaze over and chuckle. "Making a cute little girl clean the pipes, you guys should give her to us for a night."

"You haven't earned that privilege, Zonnis. Get back to work!"

Huh? Privilege? Is that what's going on here? Well, it turns out men are the same everywhere I go. I shouldn't be shocked.

The guard presses a button, and the grate slides over. A different guard hands me a flashlight. "Don't drop this in the muck, or you'll never be able to find your way out. Ha!"

I climb in quickly, my short body only having to duck down somewhat to get in. The men would have a harder time, and would probably have to crawl on their knees.

I stare at the flashlight for several long seconds before noticing a button. When I press it, light beams out. This would have been useful many times in Yama's domain... oh well.

I slowly walk forward, the stench from further down the pipe making my lips twitch. So far it's nothing but metal on all sides in a circular formation, and when I tap the walls, they sound sturdy, as if the pipe was cut directly into the wall.

Not twenty seconds later, I arrive at a ladder that leads down into a hole in the ground. The sound of rolling liquid below me, mixed with an even stronger stench makes my stomach curl up. I shine my light down into the hole and spot ankle-deep brown gunk flowing in one direction at a decent speed.

It looks disgusting, but apparently, there's something clogged in there, and I have to unclog it. This isn't that bad, though. It's nothing compared to what the demons have made me do.

I skip the ladder and hop into the hole feet-first, using a free hand to grab the ledge as I fall in, slowing my descent slightly. I land in the glop below, and it splashes up, getting all over my orange prisoner uniform. It's like I'm wading through a river of thick blood. I shine my flashlight in front of and behind myself, then decide to wade upstream. The thought that by unclogging this, I'll have it come up even higher to my waist or worse makes me feel ill, but this is just what has to be done.

Not even a minute later, I arrive at the source of the clog. It wasn't far at all. A massive wall of feces has hardened and is blocking a grate, having covered all but the bottom of it. The steel bars that crisscross left-to-right and up-and-down have every hole blocked solid except for the ones at the bottom. Once I unclog this, I'm probably going to be swept away by the current.

I turn back and shine my light at the ladder. It's back down the way I came, but the current is probably going to drag me to it. If I grab it, I can pull myself up, but if I miss...

A shiver runs down my back. If I get swept away, I might drown in feces. What an awful way to go! I'll just have to be extra careful.

My body steels itself as I take a wide stance, spreading my feet out. I lunge forward with a fist and pound the grate with one thrust, and the walls shudder under the force of the blow. Clumps of the hardened matter drop off all over, and immediately gouts of feces blast out from the pressure behind the wall. Still, a lot of it is still left, so I ready myself again and smash directly on the center once more. This time, huge portions break off, and the new stench dwarfs the old one in scope.

Readying myself one more time, I hold firm against the waist-high torrent washing past me, and pound the grate with a final, decisive strike. The grate shatters and the metal blasts outwards, several pieces battering me in the process and knocking me off my feet. I drop the flashlight into the muck and panic, but as the river of brown sucks me down the channel in total darkness, I jerk my hand out just in time to grab the ladder.

Holding on for dear life, my vice-like grip almost crushes the worn-out steel in my hand, and I use all of my strength to fight the current, all while holding my breath, just in case I get sucked into the liquid below. My other hand reaches out, flails in the darkness, and finds the other side of the ladder. One rung at a time, I pull myself up in pitch blackness until finally, my body has escaped the shit creek.

I continue climbing the ladder until the feeling of the narrow crawl-way opens up into a wider space. I flop on the hard, reassuring steel, and sigh with relief. I made it. I crawl down the hallway towards the pinprick of light at the end, smiling as it gets bigger and bigger. Finally, I pull myself up into a bowed standing position and walk the rest of the way in silence. When I arrive at the end, the guards hear my footsteps and turn to face me.

"You survived? You weren't even in there for twenty minutes, yet you're already done! Now we can finally return to normal reconditioning speed! You've earned a reward for such hard work."

The lead guardsman smiles at me innocently, but something tells me it's a reward I won't like.

It doesn't take long for me to find out. They guide me to a nasty area stained brown like the pipes in the sewage system. Just as I start wondering what they're going to do, a blast of water pummels me from the side, knocking me off my feet. The water is icy cold, and the frigid temperatures seep through my skin and down to the bone. I can't get back up as the blast bashes me against a wall and won't let up. All I can do is hold my arms up to shield my face.

Laughter can be heard as the guards screech to themselves at the sight of a helpless girl being thrown against a wall, and a painful minute later, the water stops and I sag down to the floor, gasping for breath.

"Haha! That was hilarious! Now you're nice and clean!"

The head guard bursts out laughing again and smacks his knee, as do the other men. Their laughter makes me curl up in fear and anger, and I wipe away tears. These men... all they do is lord their fake power over others. All they have are numbers! They don't even know what it means to be truly powerful, not like Master! He could tear them to pieces without lifting a finger! Master is the strongest man in the universe! Even Yama couldn't stand up to him!

My tears slow down, even as their laughter increases. They love seeing me in pain. But... Master told me something once.

When others attack you in a group, it means they are cowards. They lack the ability to fight you one-on-one. It is these people who are the weakest of all.

I wipe my tears away and pull myself back up to a standing position, then quickly sweep my eyes across the crowd of jeering men. Twelve guards in total, and one of them is holding a long tube of some sort with a hole at the end, and he's aiming it at me! He must be the one who was blasting me with the water.

He stops laughing for a moment and adjusts the tube's angle slightly. "What? Want some more?! Have a drink!"

The water blasts out again, but this time I expect it. It shoves me back against the wall, and the men start laughing again, but now I'm angry. I'm really wrathful. I've had enough of pathetic, pissants like these thinking they're better than me! Master wouldn't want me to take this sitting down! He'd expect me to fight with all I've got!

I shove my foot against the wall and use my strength to leap forwards, jumping two-dozen feet instantly as if the water wasn't there anymore. My hand reaches out and grabs the tube-holder by the neck, flicking him lightly with a quick wrist movement and sending him smashing into a wall. The tube starts spinning out of control and flailing around everywhere, water going in every direction. The metal end of it crashes into another guard's head, knocking him out instantly.

The laughter finally stops, and for once, I spot a familiar look in their eyes. Fear. By the time my feet are about to touch the ground, I've already pivoted in midair and coiled up for another jump dash. My foot smashes the ground with the force of an anvil, and I jump at the head guard. His expression is that of panic, and a moment later I slap him with the might of a battering ram, snapping his neck instantly and hurling him to the side like a child's doll.

Master trained me to kill. These men are vile humans. If anyone should die, it's them.

The others fall quickly, and I kill the rest of them with simple ease. This room is off the beaten path, and despite my ferocity, I didn't make a lot of noise. Even so, other guards will probably show up soon.

Just as I am about to punch the head off the last guard, a horrific pain erupts at the base of my skull, and I yelp in pain and fall to the ground. That goddamn collar!

"You crazy demon! Lucky that collar has several settings! Stay down, and I won't set it to lethal!"

The last guard holds his hand over a wrist gadget I hadn't seen earlier. It must be what controls the collar!

I try to stand up, but an even more painful shock erupts through my body, making my arms and legs flop around out of my control. "That was a level 7 shock! How can you still move?!"

I gnash my teeth as more tears squeeze out. I won't let this man control me! I won't!

I reach up and grab the collar, then yank with all my might. The steel holds firm for all of two seconds before buckling and caving, and finally ripping off my neck entirely. I jump to my feet and hurl it at his stomach with the rage of a demon who yearns for blood. The man's midsection vanishes as the metal object plows through and embeds itself into the wall behind him.

Wordlessly, his mouth moves a few times, then he falls over, dead.

I breathe long and hard for a full minute before regaining control. I need to get out of here. I don't know if Master is coming for me or not, but even if he is, I need to be proactive.

The walls blur by as I dash out into the main cell block. The far walls stretch out several hundred feet away, and I'm a dozen levels above the ground floor. To get to my cell, I'd have to run all the way around the entire block, but from where I'm standing now, it's a straight jump across the cavern below, and down one level.

I'll jump it, then.

Simple solutions. Master would be proud. I jam my foot into the ground and leap forwards, far faster than I expected. I don't know my power. I don't even hit the level below, but the one above it, plowing through the steel guardrail and into the metal wall behind. I wince in pain, but the pain fades quickly, as have all of my wounds so far. Did Master enhance me with his healing powers too? That would explain many things. He can cut himself with a sword and be healed up moments later.

Getting up, I turn around and hop down to the level below, right in front of two guards who are surprised to see me. Before they can figure out what's going on, I grab both of them and hurl them off the edge and at the ground below with all of my strength. They don't deserve to live anyway.

My cell is only a few blocks up, but already there's a sick feeling in my stomach. The cell bars are locked down, and the blue energy is active, but I can hear the sounds of muffled whimpering and grunting.

Oh, seven hells... I know what's going on.

I arrive at the cell in an instant, and my blood boils. The three guards from earlier are inside. Two of them are holding my cellmate down while the other one keeps punching her in the stomach. "That'll teach the bitch to tell me 'no'! Don't you let her fight back!"

He raises his fist up to hit her bruised and broken body again, but I've seen enough. I quickly grab hold of the electrified bars, and an unbelievable pain shoots through me, but I relent anyway. With all of my might, I yank the bar out, and a huge portion of the steel frame above it comes loose as well. The electricity stops and all three guards jerk their heads up and spot me.

"What the hell?! The other girl!"

One of them reaches down to press a button on his wrist-gadget but pauses. "Her collar is gone!"

That's right! It's gone, and it was never enough to hold me down anyway!

"Let her go!" A voice bellows out and I freeze, realizing all of a sudden that the voice... was actually... my own?

My- my voice? I spoke? I yelled out?

I yelled! I can speak! I have to speak! I can't just let others silence me!

"Let her go!" I rip two more bars out with both hands, brandishing them like swords, as Master taught me. The men gasp and reach for their guns, but they aren't nearly fast enough. I bash the nearest one against the wall behind him with sheer brute force, pulverizing his insides into dust. The next one loses his head cleanly, and the final one I grab by the neck.

"You bad! You bad man! You pay!"

My voice is growly, since I've never used it before, but the sound of it makes him piss himself in terror. I snap his neck and drop him down without giving him a second thought.

Only once they're dead can I finally turn to my cellmate.

She's in awful condition. Her body is bruised all over, with welts covering her from head to toe, and her clothes are torn apart in various places. Finally, there are marks cut into her stomach, probably with a knife of some sort. Not deep cuts, as they're meant to write a message. I can't read the letters though.

She hisses out air and tries to open her eyes, but they're black, blue, and swollen shut. I've seen demons that didn't treat their victims like this.

"Luh... Lora? Is... that... you?"

I nod and realize she can't see me, so instead, I kneel down and sit at her side. "Yes. It me."

"Oh... hah... now you talk..." She raises her arm up shakily to clutch her stomach as tears roll down her face. "Are the... guards... gone?"

"Yes. They leave."

"Oh... good."

She didn't see anything, after all. I look to her side against the wall and spot a small device with little sparks shooting off it. Were they hitting her with the energy from the cell bars? Why would they be so cruel?

I grit my teeth as I stare at her body. I can't heal her, and now that I've killed these guards, I need to escape from here. I could take her with me, and then if I find Master I can ask him to heal her... but how am I going to leave? Even if I can escape this place, Master is on a different planet, and I don't know how to fly a ship!

Oh man... I didn't think this through. I just reacted. Master will be angry if he hears about this.

"Kill... me."

The girl whispers two quiet words, and I feel a shudder in my body.

"No... I can't. That bad."

She takes a deep breath and squeaks in pain. "Don't worry. I don't want... to live like this. My life is over. Ten thousand years... of prison. They will hurt me every day. Kill me, Lora. Spare me."

I can't just kill her! If I kill her, then... then...

Maybe I should. If I don't, they'll just keep using her for their disgusting pleasures. I can't escape with her, because I can't carry her and fight at the same time.

My thoughts are interrupted as a sharp, shocking pain erupts in my body. I let out a squeal, and a second later I feel several tiny stinging things stab me in the neck. My body loses control. My eyes stop seeing clearly. I fall forward and slump on the ground.

The Warden's voice speaks up in the distance. "She did all this? Prisoner 84721? This is truly something else. I'm impressed."

I shift slightly to look behind me. Warden Scullis sneers as she returns the look. "You killed some of my best men today. But you still lost, in the end. Enjoy your stay in the Cage."

"No... Lora..."

My cellmate's voice speaks out, but I'm too tired to listen. If she wants to die... she'll have to... kill herself.

I can't keep my eyes open anymore.

Part 408b: Echoes Of The Past

My consciousness swims, as if I'm trapped in the ocean under a sheet of ice, and I can't escape. I open my mouth to speak, but feel a painful sensation in my chest, as if I'm running out of air, but I can tell it's a figment of my imagination.

Suddenly a robotic male voice speaks up. "Calm down, Master Hiro. Take a deep breath. The pain is all in your imagination."

I wheeze finally and fall down a long dark shaft, slamming onto a floor I can't even see. Then, I realize my eyes have been closed the whole time. When I open them, I'm in a pure white room, where the walls, floor, and ceiling have no seams dividing them. It's a white expanse as far as I can see.

"Wh-where am I?"

A floating head appears in front of me, its entire structure made out of rolling ones and zeroes. It reminds me of a movie I watched a few years ago in my time reference. "You are inside the Memory Molder's system interface, Master Hiro. I am Gyro, and it is a pleasure to see you once more. Based on the brain map I have from your previous foray into my system, I can tell that you are a different Jason Hiro than you used to be. Even your deoxyribonucleic acid molecules are substantially altered!"

His voice is elegant, refined, like a British Butler from a movie I saw. I start to ask who he is, but he reads my mind. "Before you ask, my form varies depending on the person I am speaking to. My appearance is designed to be the least threatening being a person can imagine, to help guide them through the memory backup and recovery process."

"Oh. I see. Uh... so, what do I do, then?"

"I do not understand the question, Master Hiro. I presume you came to backup your memory or view previously stored data. Do you not recall?"

I stare at him silently for a few moments before blinking in surprise. "Right, I remember now. I need to learn more about the past of Jason 12F. I thought Ben Brown was going to show me memories of my past."

Gyro shakes his head at me and floats to my side, examining my body slowly. "Mmm. Certainly not. This is a self-guided process. You tell me what you want to see, and I take you there! Everything in here is done according to your will."

I nod and puff my lip out thoughtfully. "Very well, I think I want to start from the beginning. From what I understand, this Jason and I share similar early lives, right up until I entered the cryopod. Can you take me to the day before his- I mean, my 18th birthday?"

Gyro blinks three times rapidly. "Request submitted. Receiving authorization. Authorization accepted. Loading memory."

* * *

Instantly, the white room vanishes, and I'm inside a familiar space, one I was at barely even a month ago by my internal clock's count. It's my messy apartment, from before I entered the cryopod, and everything is just the way I remembered it.

"Today's the day." My mouth opens and my voice speaks, but it's not me talking. My body stands up, of its own free will and begins moving around. I somehow detach myself and float away, watching in silent wonder as if my soul was torn out forcefully, yet without pain. Below myself, another version of me walks into the bathroom and starts brushing his teeth.

"What's going on, Gyro? Why is that guy- err, me, walking around? What am I looking at?"

His face appears next to mine and watches the other me brush and gargle. "This is your past, of course. I am not certain what altered your genetic makeup, but it is evident you do not recall anything about the Memory Molding process. You may choose the detailed walkthrough of your memories, where you replay everything as if you were the one in control, or you may watch in observer mode."

"So this is observer mode, right now?"

"Correct."

The memory version of Jason 12F's past continues going about his business, getting dressed and preparing to leave, all while making me feel a sense of déjà vu. I've done all of this myself. Even as he starts to walk out the door, I know where he's going. He's heading to the Cryotek facility to be frozen. It's that same feeling of hopelessness that I once felt; the belief that my life was so worthless, I might as well just donate my body to science. And look at me now, a god among men.

I hover along after him and watch as he speaks to his landlord, the two of them have a rather heated conversation quite different from the one I had with mine, he then marches past the familiar big-box stores, and eventually arrives at the Cryotek facility. The man up front takes his card and asks if he's participant number eight. This is a little different from what I remember, though. When I entered the facility, the man seemed perplexed that I'd need to sign in, as if I had already been there before.

12F sits in a chair in the waiting area and stares ahead blankly at an analog clock on the wall, watching its hands slowly shift towards each position on the dial.

Minutes pass, and I start feeling antsy. "Fast forward to where something happens."

Gyro nods and the scene rapidly speeds up as people pop in and out of the building, and it stops just as a man enters the room. He's wearing a dark black suit and looks like a government official.

"You need to come with me, Jason Hiro."

He speaks to 12F, and ushers him outside into a black van with three other intimidating men. The situation looks dire. I never saw these men when I entered the cryopod, so this must be where our memories split. As the door on the van closes, the world around me vanishes.

"What happened to the environment?"

Gyro smiles slightly. "Naturally we can only render the system as you would have seen it. Once the van closes, you have no ability to see anything outside of it. Such is the nature of Memory Molding."

"But he, I mean... I never looked anywhere but forward. How could you know how to render the people walking in the door?"

"I am a highly sophisticated artificial intelligence, Master Hiro. I have the ability to infer a great many things from bits and pieces of memory. Most of the visible area outside your field of view is still something you observed at one point in your life, so I reconstructed it from leftover memory data. Naturally, there is also the matter of your auditory and olfactory senses, which provide me with extra data to determine what is going on around you at any given time."

Most of his explanation goes over my head, so I just nod along. "Oh, okay. Well if I can't see anything outside of the van, let's jump ahead to wherever it's going."

"Most certainly."

I nearly fall over as the world morphs around me, and soon I end up in a room that reminds me of interrogation rooms from those old cop shows I watched as a kid. There's even a security camera and a one-way glass mirror facing inside.

While the other Jason sits in a chair and occasionally gets up to pace around the room, I walk out and to the other side of the mirror. I can't see anything, of course. "I'm guessing you couldn't render whatever's on the other side of this mirror, huh?"

"Correct. It is not something you were able to see at this moment in time." Gyro pauses and stares straight ahead for a second. "Revision, I have access to Marie Becker's mental logs in addition to yours. Given she was on the other side of this glass, I can reproduce what she was seeing. Would you like to use your admin clearance to access her memories? You are an approved viewer, naturally."

I raise an eyebrow at his words. "I can access Marie Becker's memories?"

"Correct. However, twenty-nine percent of her memories are restricted to Root Admin access. Only Miss Becker may enable access to those."

Hmm. Only Marie can, eh? I'll keep that in mind.

"Well, anyway, let's see her perspective of this scene, then."

"Confirmed. Loading Memory file #07022016874112. File loaded. Processing data. Converting to visible format."

The world shifts quickly and I can easily see the room behind the mirror now. Marie is standing there, looking much younger and more beautiful than she does now. Either she was a goddess at applying makeup, or she's only about twenty-four years old at this point in the memory timeline.

"So this is the guy, huh? He lives in the place where we located the energy signature?"

She turns to another man sitting there and stares at him questioningly. He nods slowly. "Yeah, not a chance it was anyone else. Found him in Cryotek's facility, then brought him straight here."

"That's what I want to hear. I'll handle the interrogation myself. Hand me his dossier, and I'll head in."

"Yes, ma'am." He passes Marie a thick manila folder, and wordlessly she walks into the room where the other Jason is sitting. At this point, my memories are extremely different from his. I don't have a clue what's going to happen, and it fills me with apprehension, as well as a feeling of excitement. I'm watching a story of Earth's history happening through the eyes of someone who shares the same face as me, and little else.

Marie sits down across the table from him and starts talking. She accuses him of something involving energy signatures and other stuff I don't understand, and he merely sits there resolutely until she's done talking.

"What's all this about, lady? Am I finally going to get some answers?"

Marie shakes her head. "I'm asking the questions here, Mr. Hiro. What were you doing in your house this morning?"

"Getting ready to leave. I had an appointment, one you callously dragged me away from."

His voice has an edge to it. He seems angry for irrational reasons I can't put my finger on, but the way he expresses himself feels distinctly similar to myself.

Marie takes his anger in stride. "Your appointment can be put off until later." She glances at her watch. "And if it can't, well, they will just have to deal with it."

She waves a hand at the door and smiles at him. "You'll be taken to your cell now. I'll grab you shortly, and we can run some tests to confirm my hypothesis."

The door opens, and two men walk in, aiming their guns at him. Jason 12F looks annoyed, but stands up without resistance and is led away, while Marie watches him leave. Once he's gone, she sighs. "Honestly, we might have the wrong person. He didn't appear to possess any Heroic Powers. He's just an angsty teenager."

A voice speaks from the other room over the intercom. "Appearances can be deceptive, Agent Becker."

"I'm aware." She stands up and knocks on the glass lightly. "Give him ten minutes to sweat a little bit. I'm going to go have a quick smoke, and we'll take him in for testing afterward."

"Sure, I'll get right on that."

She snuffles and walks through the back door out to where the smoking area is, but this doesn't interest me much.

"Gyro, jump ahead to their next encounter. Get to the good stuff."

The robot stares at me blankly. "The 'good stuff,' Master Hiro? I do not understand the command."

"Just jump forward thirty minutes."

"As you wish."

I feel my brain get sucked around, and I instantly appear in a room staring at that familiar Jason once again, only this time he's sitting in a medical chair with small pads and wires slapped all over his body, while he is wearing nothing but underwear.

Uh, what led up to this scene? I don't really want to know, so I ignore that internal question.

Marie walks over from around a monitor, holding up a stylus and digital pad from a company I don't recognize. It's probably made by the military or something. "Well, the test results are conclusive. You're the one we were looking for."

A flash of anger spreads over his face. "The hell I am! You guys kidnapped me, took me from the normal world into this crazy facility, did all these tests, and now you're acting like I'm some weird mutant freak! Just let me go home already, I already followed your orders!"

Marie scowls at him. "Calm down! This is great news for both of us! You are an extraordinary person, capable of harnessing a secret power unlike any other in the world around us. You have a productive, fulfilling life ahead of you. Honestly, you should be thanking me for giving you this opportunity to shine."

He taps his fingers on the chair's arms silently and fumes for a few seconds, but seems to calm down. "A secret power, huh? Sounds interesting. What can I do with it?"

Marie shrugs. "I have no idea. You have to find that out on your own, though we are here to provide guidance."

He rolls his eyes and quickly starts plucking the electrodes off his arms and body. "Yeah, well, I'm done here. I'll figure out my powers all on my own."

Marie smirks at him as he stands up and wipes his body, a look of disgust spread across his face. "You don't have a choice, young man. Now that we've confirmed you are the asset; you have to stay with us and help in the war effort."

Him and I both share a look of confusion as we stare at Marie. He asks the question we're both thinking. "I beg your pardon, but what war? You mean the War in Iraq? I doubt I'd be much use there."

"The human-demon war."

I immediately realize what she means, but instead, a faint smile spreads across the other Jason's face. "Riiiiight, the human and demon war. I suppose I'll have to fight against witches, goblins, and cave trolls too, right?"

Marie doesn't smile back. "Two out of three isn't bad. No witches, I'm afraid."

The other Jason's expression flattens. "Are you out of your fucking mind? I don't believe this! You can't hold me indefinitely!"

She raises her eyebrows mockingly. "We can, and we will! If you want to escape or leave, I recommend you figure out what your heroic power is so we can determine if you're safe to re-enter normal society."

"Safe? You think I'm a walking atom bomb or something? I'm just an ordinary guy!"

Marie lowers her eyes. "Jason, I'm being serious right now. Trust me when I say that finding you is a joy, and terrifying at the same time. If you think an atom bomb is dangerous, you haven't a clue what the former holders of the Heroic Aura have been capable of. The demonic war is real, and we've been fighting them for thousands of years. You're our best bet for crushing them, once and for all."

Her speech doesn't appear to move him, but as he looks away, unable to meet her gaze, I feel the emotions swirling around inside of him. "Yeah, sure. Whatever you say. Can I go back to my cell now?"

"As you wish."

The two of them walk out of the room, and I hold my hand up to pause the memory playback. "Gyro, is this the point where he- I mean, I joined up with Marie?"

"Affirmative, Master Hiro. Of course, the two of you forged an unbreakable bond over the next century, but I don't need to tell you that, now, do I?" His head tilts quizzically, and I look away.

"No. Sorry, I'm just very forgetful." There's a long pause as I consider what to look up next. "Show me the first major event I play a part in."

"No problem, Master Hiro! How does the Founding of the United Earth Forces sound to you?"

My smile comes back easily. "That's perfect. Let's see how history influenced the political climate of today."

* * *

"Wakey wakey, Prisoner 84721!"

A woman's voice sounds off to my side, and I wince, allowing my eyes to flutter open. When they do, I turn to see the Warden staring me up and down, an insane smile spread across her face. "You're the picture of health! Just look at you!"

Huh? What's she talking about? I lower my eyes to look at my body, only to realize that something is horribly wrong. There's a metal mask covering my face and mouth, with just two little holes left for my nose, and two slits for my eyes. I can barely see anything or breathe!

I'm standing up, but also leaning back at a slight angle. My arms are crisscrossed in front of my chest and chained across opposite sides of my body, and my feet are bound together too. I try to move, but I'm held down so tightly that I can scarcely wiggle. What the hell is going on? The last thing I remember was the face of my cellmate and a deep sleep coming over me... how did I end up here? Is this part of the Warden's sick game?!

I quickly take in my surroundings. Tiny room, narrow walls, made of cobblestone, and the door is a massive oaken thing with a slit to see inside. No light source. If that door closes... it's going to be nearly pitch black in here.

Scullis reaches up and grabs my chin, lifting my head up to expose my neck. I barely have the strength to fight back at all.

"You killed fifteen of my guards, I'll have you know. Those were good, family men! They worked hard keeping their prisoners in line! And you, like the murdering scum we knew you were, killed them in cold blood!"

She lowers my head, and I glare daggers at her face. Those men were sick! They're lucky they had the mercy of a quick death! I want to shout at her, but this metal mask prevents me from talking at all. I can barely even make gurgling noises with my throat.

"Honestly, I should just kill you, but then you'll end up an angel and out of my jurisdiction. Of course, the heavenly courts can be far more brutal than human ones, but I won't get to savor the feeling of your helplessness. I have to pay you back, in full, for the life of each man and woman you killed."

What? Women? I only killed men! There wasn't a woman to be seen!

As if she can read my mind, Warden Scullis pulls a stray hair back behind her ear before showing me a datapad with one of the faces of the guards I killed. "Yes, you killed a fellow woman. All female guards here are instructed to act like men and dress like them to maintain order. You broke her neck, and it took her fifteen minutes to die. A slow, agonizing demise."

She suddenly leans forwards and shoves her face next to mine. "I'll bet you thought you were doing a good deed, eh? The guards here are too mean for your liking; maybe they even made fun of you! What, they bruised your cellmate and had a little fun with her, so that made you angry?!"

A blow to my face knocks my head to the side, but it doesn't hurt thanks to the metal mask I'm wearing. Scullis rubs her fist and sneers. "I don't care what your reasons are, anyone who kills my men is going to stay in the Cage, tied up like a filthy animal for a thousand years! You'll have to piss and shit yourself, and feel the humiliation of others cleaning up after you and mocking you! You won't be able to taste food; it'll just be piped into your stomach until you want to throw it all back up!"

There's a look of madness in her eyes. "You'll be here a thousand years for each guard you killed, and even better, this is just the beginning! Once you're out, I have a new form of torture I've created just for you! You'll wish you were a dead woman in no time! Hahaha! HAHAHA!"

She laughs like a crazy person for several seconds before suddenly calming down. "Ah, sorry, I lacked restraint for a moment there. I'm just so passionate about protecting my extended family here. You not only killed Admiral Danis, the greatest enforcer of the law in the galaxy, you also killed low-level guards too! You're unscrupulous and violent, a savage barbarian. It's fitting, of course, given the Goldeshian blood in you."

There's a look of melancholy in her eyes as she stares at me. "You know, many of the prisoners from the Goldesh rebellion ended up here. Some fought back, as their animal instincts instructed, and I crushed them all. The rest learned to obey, and they've turned into loyal dogs in the end. You will be no different from the rest of your kind. I will crush you, or I will break you."

Scullis reaches up and scratches her short-cropped black hair. "Well, there was a certain level of joy among the prisoners from Goldesh when they heard you killed Danis. Perhaps in exchange for the fifteen guards you killed, I should let you pick fifteen of your blood-brothers and sisters to kill. That would be a fitting trade, though nowhere near enough to pay for your crimes. I wonder what Danis would have done with you."

The thought of Danis's face makes me quiver with anger. I'd kill him a third time and a fourth time if I had the chance. I wasn't wrong, he created this prison and hired Warden Scullis. Danis was the cause of so much misery. He was a disturbing villain, especially among humans. A monster who wore human skin.

My fist clenches as I try to pull on the chain holding me to this upright metal bed. No matter how hard I pull, I can't yank it off.

That crazed maniacal smile spreads across Scullis's face again as she notices my wriggling. "Trying to break free? Give it up. Those chains are made of a rare metal called Demon-steel. They could bind two elephants together without issue. After seeing you tear through reinforced steel, electrified to 1,000 volts, it's painfully obvious we need better measures to tame your animal spirit."

Her mocking tone lessens. "Actually, despite the evil you've committed, I must say that I was positively dazzled by your strength and resilience. You might be a vile murdering monster, capable of crushing a demon in hand-to-hand combat, but you're also a fellow woman. I crave your raw power. Perhaps, if you had walked the straight and narrow path, you would be at my side, keeping balance and order in my prison, rather than being one of its inmates."

Like hell I would. I glare at her even more angrily than I was before, though she can't see my face under this metal mask. I'd sooner lose all my limbs than hold people in captivity. You're no better than the demons!

She throws her hands up in the air. "Oh well! So much for that! In the meantime, shit and piss yourself as you wish! But be warned, if you make too much noise, I'll come back and give you a shocking surprise! Now if you'll excuse me, I need to contact the relatives of the guards you killed."

She waves her hand dismissively at me, as if expecting me to leave, before walking out of the room herself.

The door slams shut behind her, and my worst fears come true. This room is pitch black, like Death itself. Yama would stand out in this much darkness.

A moment later, I feel an awful sensation in my body. My chest starts shaking and tears well up in my eyes as I struggle fruitlessly to try and wipe them away.

I'm all alone... in a pitch black hell. They're going to keep hurting my cellmate, and I can't protect her anymore. What if they kill her, or worse?

If there is a god... please... send help. Anyone. I can't save myself anymore.

Part 409b: Revengeance

"Actually, I would suggest starting a little earlier, Master Hiro." Gyro's blank face hums around in front of me and stares at me with his soulless eyes. "The formation of the United Earth Federation came during turbulent political times and was part of a genius plan executed as a joint operation between yourself and Miss Becker. However, it was the discovery of the Volgrim's existence that put Earth on the path to mass cooperation."

"The Volgrim..." I echo Gyro's words and nod slowly. "Yeah, show me what happened on the day we discovered the Volgrim."

Gyro nods at me. "The Volgrim observed humanity for over a hundred years before we detected their presence. Once Marie learned of their existence, she scrambled to find out more about them. It turned out the Maries of the other streams did not tell her of the Volgrim's existence, nor of many other Red Level secrets."

I raise an eyebrow. "The other Maries? Streams? What do you mean?"

The AI before me stiffens and his eyes turn red for a moment before reverting to green again. "Error, that information is available only for the Root Admin. Would you care to see a different memory?"

"No. I want to see that one."

"You do not have the proper clearance. Would you care to see a different memory?"

I lick my lips slowly and turn away, fuming silently to myself. Then I get an idea. "Enable."

"I cannot enable access. Would you care to see a different memory?"

Huh? My Wordsmithing can't unlock it? Or maybe, because I'm inside a simulation of sorts, my mouth can't open to form the words. That's plausible. Well, if I can't access the memories and learn about these 'other Maries', then I'll have to think of the answer myself. Clones, perhaps? She told me there were no other Jasons, but now that I think about it, Yama told me I was one of many clones. And if I suppose that he wasn't lying, then perhaps Marie would have clones too.

And the more I think about it, the more it makes sense. Marie forged a partnership with a human who could kill her with a single word. Having clones of herself would be excellent insurance to prevent him from killing her off. However... if I'm not allowed to hear about the existence of these other Maries, and Gyro is assuming I am the previous Jason... then... doesn't that mean he didn't know about her clones?

Now that I think about it, that would be a weak defense. Clones the other Jason doesn't know about wouldn't deter him from taking over all the power for himself. And what was the deal with the 'other streams'? Maybe that has something to do with it. I remember from an old TV show that you're never supposed to 'cross the streams' but that probably has nothing to do with there being multiple Maries.

I tap my finger on my hip thoughtfully while Gyro hovers up and down slightly, waiting for my next command. Frankly, if he's not going to tell me about Marie's secret twin sisters then it won't do me much good to speculate. Hell, maybe I can find out using my own methods on her later.

A jolt of agony shoots through my head and I pause to rub my temples. It feels like someone just stabbed me repeatedly in the right eye with a pocketknife. But just as quickly as the pain sets in, it vanishes, and I feel fine again.

Whatever, I guess. "Gyro, take me to the discovery of the Volgrim."

He beeps in the affirmative, and for a second I think I see a glint of hesitation in his binary-shaped face, but it passes just as quickly. "Loading memory now, Master Hiro."

The world shifts around me, and soon I'm staring right at a shocked Marie. Her eyes are wide, and her mouth is agape. "A contact? But how? This shouldn't be possible!"

The room coalesces around us, and I quickly take it all in. It's an observatory, though its location is unknown. A giant telescope is aimed up at the night sky above, and various women and men walk around holding clipboards or other such things. My doppelganger stand a few feet away, a bored expression on his face.

"Aliens? I mean, humanity always suspected they existed. Are they hostile or friendly?"

Marie turns back to face him. "You don't understand, Jason. My contacts would have told me if they existed. There's no way the existence of an alien life form, especially one as advanced as these, would have been glossed over."

"What, are your 'contacts' all-seeing gurus or something? Come on; you're the smartest woman I know. If you don't know about aliens, who else would?"

Marie clams up, and her expression softens. "Friends of mine. Never mind, at least I know now. But first, we need to get in contact with them. President Salvador will want to know about this, and we'll need to gather the World Government together to oversee our first transmission to them. Do they know we've discovered them?"

"We're not sure, Ambassador Becker." A brown-haired young woman sitting at a nearby comm table pipes up hesitantly. "They're located on the... ah.... the far side of Mars. We only spotted them due to a discrepancy in an image taken by Voyager XIV. The image was ten years old by the time we noticed it."

"Ten years..." Marie swallows audibly. "If they've been studying humanity for at least that long, perhaps they aren't hostile."

"Hard to say. Our leading scientist, Mr. Nielsen, managed to spot the reflective glare of their ship with this radio telescope. He was also the one who noticed the image's out-of-place blurring and spent the better part of five months searching for the object that caused it."

"Well, Mr. Nielson deserves praise, but we'll get to that later. Jason, I need you to go and contact the leaders of the China-Russia union, the presidents of the Eastern and Western halves of North America, and the High Elder of Korea, Kum Jing Onmi. I'll contact the others. You have political pull with the big dogs though, and you can... get there the fastest."

The other Jason stands up quickly and cracks his neck. "Yeah, no problem. I'll head out now."

He walks away, and Marie pauses to stare at the floor for several long seconds as an internal conflict rages that I can't perceive. When she raises her head, her attitude is decidedly more optimistic. "If the others didn't tell me about these aliens, they must have had a good reason. This is something I can overcome."

Gyro flies in front of me and nods helpfully. "This day marked a significant change in human history. It helped put Miss Becker and yourself on the path to leading humanity. Of course, her brilliance would have contributed to making that possible eventually, but the acceleration enabled a smoother transition to her vision for an ideal society."

I stroke my beard thoughtfully. "Her vision, huh? So she designed the society of today?"

Gyro stares at me blankly. "Of course, Master Hiro. My, your memory has deteriorated significantly, hasn't it? I wonder what caused this dramatic shift in your mental state."

My eye stings again, and I stagger back and fall to my knees, but it passes again within seconds. "Jesus, what is up with this stinging pain lately? Every so often I get this migraine from hell."

"I am not certain. Would you like to view another memory?"

"Uh, yeah, sure. Thanks for the concern about my well-being."

Gyro doesn't answer, and I direct the memory molder to advance to the next relevant scene.

Everything peels away, and I end up in a seat, staring past a group of decorated military generals on my side of the table, while a dozen bureaucrats sit on the other side, one of them being Chinese, another who looks German, and even a Russian. I have to assume they're important world leaders, though I don't recognize them.

At the head of the table, a massive video screen is active with a bunch of diagrams and a blurry image of a spacecraft, while Marie paces in front of it.

"So this is the best image we've got of that thing?" The Chinese man stares at the screen skeptically. "Ambassador Becker, we're aware of your contributions to the end goal of world peace, and we know you are also a renowned scientist, but that image could be anything! We can't tell the population of Earth about this until it's confirmed! How are we going to manage riots and panics?"

Marie spins around and points at him with a smile on her face. "I'm glad you asked, President Ning. A few years ago, I constructed a prototype spaceship that held the potential ability to travel at the speed of light. However, I was unable to get my hand on a fuel source powerful and stable enough to power the reactor for more than a minute without causing a catastrophic meltdown. If these aliens have been observing us for at least ten years, as I have hypothesized, then as long as we move quickly, we might be able to create a fuel source capable of powering my craft within the next year."

Another man speaks up. "Of course, the Eastern Liberated States of North America are willing to offer our support in any way possible, especially given your contributions over the years, but your technology must be shared among all the world powers equally. No favoritism."

"Favoritism? I wouldn't dream of it. My goal is a unified government, and as much as I wanted it before, Mister Johannesburg, I cannot stress enough to you now how important it is that we put aside our petty differences. These aliens already possess space travel capabilities far exceeding our own."

President Ning raises his hand. "Assuming they are, in fact, aliens."

"They are." Marie doesn't let an inkling of doubt enter her voice. For a moment, I sense her directing hostility toward the Chinese President. It vanishes quickly, and she turns back to the board. "You all have to understand, during the Second World War, the nations who held the aerial advantage were likely going to win in any given battle situation. This is a far more dire event. If these aliens are hostile, we may not be able to survive. They likely have a massive technology lead over our planet, and they have observed us for a very long time. Our airwaves are primitive and easy to intercept."

President Johannesburg sucks air through his teeth. "They know our strengths and weaknesses."

"Yes. You understand." Marie glances at me for a moment, and I see a look pass over her face that makes me think she's saying ugh, they finally get it.

A mountain of a man shifts on my side of the table and stares warily over at President Johannesburg. "With all due respect, Ambassador Becker, while your intentions are beyond reproach, and your character is unbesmirched, I think many at this table would not agree with that opinion towards their political enemies here. I came to hear your opinion, and I value it almost more than my own... but after what Johannesburg did two decades ago, I could not see my country siding with his or agreeing to share any technology."

I turn to examine the man who spoke. His name appears in my mind, as do other details rapidly. President Wallace T. Sherman, the leader of the Western side of the USA. I'm not sure of what happened exactly, but something like a civil war split the country in half, and now these presidents rule each half separately. There appears to be a lot of bad blood between them. Just by appearance though, I'd fear the massive bulldozer-looking Sherman over the typical generic politician that Johannesburg embodies. Indeed, he seems very untrustworthy.

Marie looks irritated, but she fights desperately to hide it. "President Sherman, I don't care if Johannesburg dropped ten hyper-graviton bombs on the biggest cities in your half of the country. These aliens might possess technology that can wipe humanity itself off the face of the Earth. Set aside your bickering and focus on the issue at hand." She pauses for a moment to pull a strand of hair out of her eyes. "That being said, thank you for the compliments."

Sherman crosses his arms and leans back in his chair, but he says nothing else. He doesn't look convinced, but I can see he doesn't want to cross Marie either.

Watching this exchange, I have to wonder what Marie did that would allow her to garner such political support. For people to treat her word as gospel and immediately believe her, she must have done many spectacular things already.

I wave my hand, and the scene pauses. "Let's go a little bit ahead, Gyro."

Nothing happens.

"Gyro?"

He suddenly appears by my side, startling me a little. "My apologies, Master Hiro. I was performing a standard integrity check of the backup and restoration subroutines. No notable anomalies were detected. What memories would you like to visit next?"

I scratch my chin. "Can I just fast forward until I see something interesting?"

He stares at me in response. "Yes, I will give you manual control. Of course, anything that is available only to Root Admins will not be viewable, but I'm sure you will understand."

"Yeah... certainly. By the way, just out of curiosity, if Marie is the root admin, can she view all of my memories?"

"Of course, Master Hiro."

"But I can't view over a quarter of hers?"

"Naturally. You are not a Root Admin."

Yeah... that's not suspicious at all. What the hell is Marie hiding from me? Why would the other Jason be such a loser that he would let her have access to his memories, but wouldn't demand reciprocation?

Maybe I should be looking at their personal interactions to find out.

An array of buttons appears before me in midair. One of them is a fast-forward button, as my memories tell me, so I tap it and watch as time accelerates dramatically, by a factor of thirty. Minutes fly by, then hours, and soon the next day arrives. I stop when Marie comes into view. She and the other Jason are having a conversation about something, and since this is the day after the conference with the world leaders, it must be worth listening to.

"-such idiots! I am trying to create the perfect society that rewards everyone equally, and look at what they do! All these men do is whine, bitch, moan, and complain! They're so busy stabbing each other in the back that they can't see the bigger picture!"

Marie's frustration lingers in the air as she stomps back and forth, waving a cigarette around. The wind whistles past on the apartment balcony, and the previous Jason doesn't look amused. He's sitting in a white plastic chair, something cheap looking that doesn't seem like he or she would own it.

"Marie, you're going about this all the wrong way. You can't expect people just to work together, that's not how we operate. If you're going to reshape society, it needs to be a meritocracy. Get these worthless slugs out of the way, and we can focus on putting the right people in charge."

"Well, who are the right people, Jason? Do you know? One human's as useless as another, and they're all stupid and weak! It doesn't matter whether a slug or a turtle is trying to compete in the race for intellect, as they'll both lose to me, the hare."

He rolls his eyes. "You're so full of yourself sometimes. Look, all we have to do is turn public opinion against these guys and get some other people in control. They don't have to be exceptionally smart, though that would be nice. Just get someone in charge of China and another couple of people in charge of the Divided States of America, and make sure they'll follow your commands without hesitation. Someone is pulling Johannesburg's strings, so he can never be fully committed to your cause."

Marie pauses to inhale deeply on her cigarette. "Have you always been this way? I thought I was the apathetic one."

"I'm just being real, Marie. These aliens are a threat unlike any other. I can't create technology to counter them without being able to perfectly envision how it works in my mind. Our best bet is to take control of this warship of theirs and hope you can reverse engineer it."

"Hope? Not necessary. This is me we're talking about." Marie waggles her finger at him. "Also, we don't know it's a warship. It could be a scouting ship. We don't even know what its travel speed capabilities are. These aliens might be all alone and halfway across the galaxy from their comrades, or their home world might be a few light years away, and a full-scale invasion could arrive and wipe us out in a few days."

"Could, might, possibly... that's an awful lot of speculation for the world's greatest scientist, Marie. Shit, this isn't even the full extent of our worries. A lot of world leaders are feeling anxious because of the demon attacks in Francistan. Nobody knows about the angels and gods yet, aside from Johannesburg, and only the wind knows whether he'll keep that information to himself or not. President Sherman doesn't even know what made Johannesburg go to such lengths to split the country."

"Right, right." Marie flicks the cigarette off the balcony and several stories to the streets below. "These things don't matter. In the worst case scenario, humanity has the most powerful hero ever on their side, so the demons will never be a serious threat. Our capabilities for war expand more and more every year, to the point where I'd even assume we could wipe them out in a week, if desired."

He immediately leans forward and punches his palm. "Hell yes, that's what I'm talking about. Just say the word, and I'll tear them to pieces."

A look of alarm spreads over Marie's face, and she quickly flits over to where he's sitting and leans against him. "No no, we don't want that, Jason. The most dangerous weapon is one you never have to use. Just the implied threat of it is enough to scare your enemies away. Once you use it, it loses its ability to pacify others into submission. The demons have had a taste of your power once, and they won't soon forget it. If you allow them to quantify and measure your power, they will find out its weaknesses."

Jason lowers his head. "What weaknesses, Marie? I can make anything into reality with a single word. How could that be countered?" He reaches up to stroke his thin beard. " Shave. " It vanishes instantly, and his face becomes smooth as baby skin.

I can't help but feel a little jealous. I hadn't thought of doing that yet.

"Keep the facial hair. I... like it." Marie pulls away and winks at him, though he doesn't reciprocate. Neither do I. Marie isn't bad looking or anything, but she doesn't appeal to me, and I can't put my finger on why.

"Fine. Grow. " The hair reappears, and he smirks. "Seriously though, Marie. I don't have many weaknesses."

"You have plenty. Your wordsmithing can be prevented with something as simple as a mouth gag. Your tongue could be cut out. And... there's also..." She pauses to look up at the blue sky, now darkening as clouds approach. "...there's always anti-energy."

"What's that?"

"An invention I made to counter the demons, and the angels too, if need be. However, due to the nature of your powers, it's also a hard counter to you."

Marie spends several minutes explaining new weaponry that can paralyze and even kill anything with large amounts of spiritual energy, and then something clicks in my mind as I pause the memory.

"Gyro, Marie mentioned anti-energy. Do those Golden Commandos have the ability to emit this energy around their suits?"

He doesn't appear. I wait several seconds, then press a button to return to the 'main menu'. Everything melts away and I'm back in the white room again.

"Gyro? Where are you, mister butler?"

Still nothing. I start to feel a little weird. He's been acting a little off for the last few time skips.

A sudden screeching pain in my head makes me stumble to my knees, and I scream in pain. "Graugh!"

When I open my eyes, the pain is gone, but I blink and yelp in surprise. There's a massive black dragon standing on its four hind legs, with both wings outstretched.

"Jason. You need to leave this place. I've been trying to contact you for three hours now."

The dragon speaks normally, as if it knows me. I have never seen anything of its size before. At least a hundred feet from the tip of its nose to the end of its tail, and the wings stretch out another hundred feet on each side of its body. This dragon towers over me, and makes me feel like an ant.

I lick my lips and take a step back. "W-what are you?"

It widens ones of its eyes questioningly. "I am Blaarjiim, the one you bonded with. Let us not waste time on unnecessary introductions. The one named Benjamin Brown is tampering with your mind. He has been trying to insert new memories into your head in order to alter the way you think."

"Blaarjiim? But, you're a big goddamn dragon..."

Now Blaarjiim leans down and brings his head close to look at me carefully. His giant mouth has enough teeth in it to chew me to bits in seconds, and I'm sure a much fatter version of myself would fit inside without much trouble. "What are you babbling about, human? Has the other human one already gotten to you? Are you hallucinating? I have been going out of my way to block his attempts, but I can't stop him forever."

I shake my head at him. "No, I'm definitely looking at a giant black dragon. Maybe you're the one hallucinating here."

He waves a massive claw in the air dismissively. "Again, these are unimportant details. Now that I've finally made contact, I can release you. You need to break free and confront him before he puts an end to your psyche."

My head suddenly rips with pain once again, and I bite my lip to stifle a yelp, and it quickly passes. "So that's what's going on. Fine, get me out of here. By force, if necessary."

"As you wish."

The dragon rears his massive claw back, and my heart stops as it comes swinging at me. The instant it hits me I gasp and breathe out loud.

The terror from that massive dragon taking a swing at me gives me flashbacks of Sarah's demon dog, and when I open my eyes, I realize I'm back in the laboratory, with that weird helmet thing still strapped to my head.

Ben's voice speaks, alarm audible in his voice. "Oh! You're all done, then?"

I reach up and pull the helmet off, setting it on the designated holder beside me before turning to look at him calmly. "Yes. I am done."

His face is pale, and sweat is visible. "Do you... feel any different?"

"No. Should I?"

The nervousness on his face makes me want to bust a gut. Blaarjiim was right. Ben must have been trying to change my brain's physiology or something, and it would have taken a while longer to complete. He didn't expect me to break free from its control.

I stand up from the chair and crick my neck, feeling three hours of motionless sitting take its toll on me. "You tried to alter my brain chemistry, didn't you? Not very smart, for Marie's most loyal assistant."

The sweat on his face drips down as he stands in front of a control panel, stiffly watching me with caution in his eyes. "N-no, you've got it all wrong. I was just... trying to download the previous Jason's memories into your mind. Things would be more efficient that way."

He's lying. Blaarjiim's voice speaks in my mind. He was attempting to erase your memories and replace them entirely with the weak-willed Jason's. He was trying to transform you into the one you defeated.

My hands clench into fists reflexively. "Is that so?"

Ben appears to think I'm responding to him. "Yes, I'm not lying! If I were to download the memories into your mind, you could access them more rapidly! It would make the memory molding much fas-"

I don't let him finish speaking. " Die. "

The word leaves my mouth and I smile, but nothing happens. Ben stares at me, his face still pale. "Did... did you just try to wordsmith and kill me?"

I don't get a chance to respond. His fingers fly across the display, and a second later, a horrifying feeling surges inside my body as an invisible wave of energy slams me down to the ground. I lose all strength in my body and wheeze painfully, but soon I can't feel anything at all, and merely have to lie on the ground, motionless.

He sighs dramatically. "The former Jason was trustworthy, but you're not like him at all. Miss Becker doesn't see the danger in you, only the potential. She's grown too lax, too willing to forgive. Anything for her greatest pet project. But I won't let you hurt the woman I love." He taps his chest. "I activated a personal anti-energy field, just in case you tried anything. As I thought, you immediately went on the offensive. You were unwilling to listen to reason. I'm sure she will understand, in time."

He walks around the panel and over toward me, and all I can do is watch his steel-toed boots draw closer. I put all my strength into moving my mouth, but my words are slurred. "You peash of shit. What are you gonna do with me?"

He kneels down and lifts me up, then shoves me back into the chair before grabbing the helmet again. "I'm going to finish what I started. I won't let you destroy this perfect society that Marie and your predecessor built. I'll turn you into him, and everything will go back to the way it was."

He slaps the helmet on me and walks back to the panel, then smirks as he looks at me. "I hope this hurts a lot."

I glare furiously at him. When I get this fucking helmet off, you'll be lucky if I just leave you in pain!

* * *

Everything hurts. My arms have been chained in front of me tightly for so long, and no matter how I struggled at first, I couldn't rip these chains apart. But, I get it, now. The chain binding one of my arms loops around behind the metal slab they have me tied to, and holds the other one. If I pull, I'm just yanking myself around.

How long have I been here? This metal mask on my face makes me feel woozy... I can barely breathe, and I haven't eaten anything since the warden put me in this room. It's pitch black inside, only becoming a little brighter when the door opens every so often. Usually it's a male prisoner, sent in to clean up after me. The tubes going into my stomach gives me food directly, and so I can only do as Scullis commanded, and release all over myself periodically.

